“‘Of course, my lord,’” Sharlan appeased in a mild, lilting tone. “‘They have all sworn undying loyalty to you. All eight of my lovely little pets.’” The lascivious man hummed. I was still staring forcibly at the far wall, the corners of my mouth turned down in inimical disgust; but, somehow, I felt the heavy weight of the man’s intrusive gaze land on me. “‘And is this your own personal pet, my lord? Is this Bastila Shan herself?’”

Malak said nothing. I continued my blank, unseeing stare away from them both. Soft footsteps whispered toward me. I felt Sharlan’s shadow eclipse me before I saw it.

“All porcelain beauty and silent outrage,” the man murmured, trespassing into my field of vision. “Attractive enough, for a Human.”

It was an odd comment from one who was Human himself, and the irregularity of it drew my gaze to meet his. His eyes were sharp, superficial, corrupted yellow; just like Malak’s. Just like every fallen one who had damned themselves-

Revan’s gaze had once been black, I recalled. Black as the far reaches of space. Black as the lips of this abominable creature who strutted in front of me-

Sharlan smiled, a cruel widening of a thin mouth in an alabaster face marked only with a curious slit on either cheek. He lifted one long-limbed hand to touch my face-
I jerked backward, awaiting Malak’s directive to cease, to desist toying with what he continued to label his apprentice-

But the Dark Lord of the Sith said nothing.

Sharlan stepped forward again, so close I should have felt the heat of his body. Even amongst the waves of the Force, so wild and efficacious here on the Star Forge, I could barely sense this foul creature of the dark. His presence was a muted, oily thing; like dregs of silt marring the crystalline depths of an untouched lagoon. His hand reached out-

“And don’t touch me again,” I hissed, but heard the shakiness in my own feeble voice. I glanced back to Malak, but he was as still as a corpse, observing us both in quiet detachment.

The embers of outrage simmered in my heart. I would not suffer indignity again... not like this. Not as a tool of amusement from a depraved scion of Malak’s.

“You are more potent than I expected,” Sharlan commented. There was a brush of Force against my mind, and I recoiled from the obtrusive touch. “I understand my lord’s fascination, now.”

He leaned over and clasped my jaw tight in his claw-like grip.

“I wonder, my lord...” His evocative words were meant for Malak, but his creeping gaze bored into mine. “I wonder... would you allow me a taste of her?”

A moment of eternity, hinged upon a deathly silence. No words uttered from Malak.

Sharlan inched closer, his round eyes piercing into mine, his black lips-

Self-control shattered. An inferno flared inside me, burning away all residue of fear or inaction. The Force in all of its chaotic brilliance exploded, and I became no more than a vessel for unholy emotions as they streamed out through my hands in a manifestation of energy.

Sharlan Nox went flying across the room.

“I said, do not touch me!” The howl ripped from my lungs. I still felt the ghostly imprint of his bloodless fingers against my chin. Scarlet retribution leapt from my hands as I chased him down, lost to everything but the burn of passion-

A figure blurred in front of me. Oh, but if Sharlan Nox thought he could withstand the vengeance he had just unleashed then he was deluded-

With a sharp cry, my body began a swift ascent into a sweeping lunge.

Something whispered- intuition or the Star Forge itself-

-change course, catch the dodge that will come-

I wrenched downwards, my lightsaber changing direction in an unnaturally abrupt move reinforced by the primal power that sang passion through my blood.

There was a vague, mild resistance as scarlet plasma seared through flesh.

A body collapsed in two charred, useless pieces; thumping to the ground with a hollow thud.

The tempest ebbed, retreating in shuddering gasps. A mechanical chuckle reverberated throughout the room. The mutilated corpse at my feet sharpened into focus, as sanity crawled back into
It was the Human. The pet. Now in pieces, having inserted himself between my wrath and the useless depravity of his master-

Beyond, Sharlan slowly rose to his feet, dusting off his tunic with pale hands in an outward display of insouciant nonchalance. “Well,” he drawled, tilting his head at Malak. “It turns out I have brought you seven pets in total, my lord.”

Malak’s laughter dwindled as his deathly gaze pinned mine. He began to stride toward me, and now fear became my only master. My stomach bottomed out, extinguishing the remnants of the fury that had blossomed in such magnificence.

“I had wondered when your backbone would show,” Malak murmured. His eyes creased in pleasure, and a finger rose to touch the side of my cheek gently. I flinched, but against him- all I felt was a galling subservience. “Weakness does not become you, little one.”

...

He had sent Sharlan Nox away, after that. Raised his lightsaber at me once more, and again inveigled me into our dance of darkness, allowing me no recourse to ruminate over what had just happened.

It matters not. If I could have ended all of Sharlan’s filthy little pets and Sharlan Nox himself, I would. Malak had plans for Sharlan, no doubt... he had plans for me. And Revan.

But I had plans of my own.

The console lay dark and quiet beneath my gloved hands. Spidersilk black encased my limbs, now; offset by a sweeping cloak of midnight that Malak himself had clasped around my neck. Gifts from the Star Forge, little one. I did not sense any work of the Force within these garments, but I could not be certain. Malak garbed me to his liking, and his liking was that I became more attached to the Star Forge with each pressing day...

...and I could see the advantages in that, myself.

Malak thought to own me, to court me with the allure of omnipotent power the Star Forge offered – and there was truth amongst his duplicity, glimmers of reality amongst his delusions. Things were not so black and white as they had once appeared, to my younger, more innocent eyes.

I had been blind, and so naïve and rigid in my blindness.

Now, shallow words of appeasement might fall from my lips to gratify the Sith Lord, but it was all a waiting game.

Revan understood. She had always understood that, sometimes, one must do or say the unthinkable, in the name of the greater good.

She understood, even if she did not remember.

...

The immense kaiburr rippled with energy, each pulse buffeting against me. I was like a helpless child struggling against almighty waves of icy seafoam that engulfed me with the frigid strength of nature at its terrifying best.
-surrender, succumb and see the truth-

The voice of the Star Forge was more than just potent; it echoed deep into my marrow, compelling me to stop railing against what I could no more overpower than a starship could hold back a black hole.

-let down your guard and evolve to what you were meant to be-

The core of the Star Forge beat a steady thrum, as if it were an ancient, massive heart, almost predatory in nature. Each beat promised power. Strength. Freedom.

It was unfathomable in its depth. And at its nexus was Malak.

See, little one. It was a command. I had no perception of his physical presence in this room, this inner chamber of the Star Forge he had brought me to; but his psychic presence suffocated me nonetheless. See what we once found.

His images burned through my mind, entangled so deeply with his black emotions that I felt rather than saw what he intended.

A purple world. A creeping plague of darkness. Death. Death of....

...death of the Force itself.

I beheld shadows of licking anti-life, twisting through the nether, winking out the beauty and the feral power that fuelled the Force, be it light or dark or somewhere in between. The shadows left nothing in their path but an empty organic life; a shallow mirror of dull existence, beyond horrifying to perceive.

The shadows were sentient. The shadows were... spreading.

This... this was it, I thought numbly. This was the turning point. Revan’s turning point. Even the pinnacle of the kaiburr’s power couldn’t hold back my terror. I didn’t comprehend what Malak saw; what Malak felt- not truly. Just a bone-chilling knowledge that this threat- whatever it was-

It was... it was...

Come back, little one. Lose yourself here and you will not return.”

It was worse than anything the universe had seen before.

-the power is here to combat the threat. all you need do is grasp it-

Come back, Bastila.

Malak’s voice, of all the damned things in the galaxy, was my life-line now as panic sunk its claws into the foundations of my being. The death of the Force. Something is... hunting down the Force itself... and extinguishing it. Forever. Chaotic waves of kaiburr-enhanced Force crashed into me, submerging me with pure energy, the very antithesis of the memory Malak had plunged me into.

The Force cannot die. It is never-ending. It cannot...

So, you see a glimpse, at least, of what set us on our path.

What form the threat was, exactly, I did not comprehend. Malak’s shared memories were a turmoil of half-formed conceptions and emotions, a blinkered remnant of something he had once experienced. But there was a shattering truth at the core of them I could not deny.

The Republic with their pretty fleets and ineffectual bureaucracy cannot counter it. The Jedi Order with their trite mumblings of harmony would crumble like dust in the face of what we have seen.

Malak’s psychic recollections faded, and my terror ebbed as rational thought returned. The power of the Star Forge was a comfort, now; a reminder than any threat, no matter how colossal, could be retaliated against with the correct means.

-yes, and the power is here-

Revan thought to build an empire strong enough to attack it. Malak laughed. A mirthless sound of automated whirring through his vocabulator. Power... she had the right of that, at least.

He spoke no more, and yet I wondered what he believed.

Revan’s war against the Republic coalesced into sense, now. I had suspected there was an ulterior motive in her actions beyond the undeniable corruption of the Dark Side- and this appeared to be the essence of her reasoning.

In contrast, as Dark Lord, Malak was always more willing to destroy resources and planets. He was more destructive, more gratuitous, less invested in keeping his vision fixed upon that which had turned them in the first place-

Some things are better left alone, little one. He had said that to me, once, not so long ago- and had been referring directly to the Unknown Regions.

Why, then, had he shown me his truth, if he never meant to fight?

Knowledge, dear Bastila. Knowledge and understanding. You are at the edge of becoming what you could be, and yet fear holds you back. Fear of the Dark Side that has hamstrung you since the Jedi Masters first starting spouting rhetoric into your young ears.

I slowly became aware of physical sensation: the rasp of air pushing in and out of my lungs, the tightness of my eyes squeezed shut, the pressure of hands clasped down hard on my aching shoulders as energizing waves of kaiburr promise rallied around the both of us.

I do not undermine my empire with the pointless fear of the unknown reaching us. That was Revan’s weakness, not mine. But ask yourself this, little one: wouldn’t you rather have the power to stand against this threat – or any other – should it emerge? To grasp the almighty magnificence of the Force at its greatest?

-the Force is not dark. it is not evil. evil is only in the intent of the beholder-

The chrome of Malak’s jaw brushed against the nape of my neck, and his words rasped against my ear. “Do you truly believe this is the Dark Side? When you have caught a glimpse of what we have seen?”

-evil is the death of the Force-

“Can you not sense the power I wield, and what we could achieve together, when you take the final step to my side?” Malak’s gloved grasp still anchored me. Wild spirals of unbridled Force encased us both and shaped my thoughts.

To think, once, this was Revan’s dominion. How great she must have been. How immensely powerful. And yet, even in her glory, she had still lost herself in the end. She had still not been strong enough to hold back the insidious madness that such power ultimately brings.

But together, together through our bond, we would be stronger still-

“It is time for you to make a choice, Bastila,” Malak murmured. “Are you a prisoner or my apprentice?”

choices are not always what they seem. people believe what they wish-

There was a hot tightness in my belly.

“I am no prisoner.” My thoughts were an inferno of chaos. Revan was still not here, and I would do better to strengthen myself while this waiting game unfolded. “I am no prisoner,” I repeated, holding back a small kernel of emotion deep inside my psyche, where even Malak could not reach.

“Name yourself then, little one. I would hear the words from your lips.” His jaw pressed tight against my neck; cold, cold metal that chilled my skin. “Are you my apprentice?”

“Yes,” I gasped, hating the treacherous curl of betrayal that burned like bile. Words did not matter, even if he thought they did. “Yes, master.”

I would say what I had to, but that did not make it truth.

...

The words had appeased Malak, and I was careful to keep my true loyalty as hidden as I could. But soon... soon, it would all change.

Everything had changed so much already.

Had the masters, any of them, ever had an inkling of what lurked beyond known space?

There had been rumours- no more than whisperings of rumours- that the Mandalorian invasion may have been triggered by something more than just their eons-old lust for conquest. Force knew the Mandalorians had always tested their so-called mettle by engaging in barbaric combat, but never on such a scale. Never at such risk to their own territory, to the security of their much-valued Clans.

The theory of a great threat had led on to suppositions of what had caused Revan’s dramatic fall after Malachor – but the party line of the Order had always remained steadfast: it was due to horrors of war. Revan Freeflight and all who followed her should have listened to the Jedi.

But the Jedi had been fools after all. Little more than misguided cowards, hiding behind the protection and the Republic-sanctioned status of their robes.

Even before Malak had shared his warped version of the truth, I had begun to doubt the Jedi’s account of events. I had begun to see what most of the Republic had believed: without Revan’s interference, the Mandalorians would have won.

And now... and now I began to understand why she had turned on those she had once thought to protect.
Malak said it himself. Revan thought to build an empire strong enough to attack whatever is out there. Revan thought to conquer the Republic, and in doing so, save it.

Before the madness took her. Before she became what Malak is now: a power-hungry slave to the chaos of the Force.

Revan had lost her objectivity along the way. But I could see what it had been, once. And I could remind her, show her what we could achieve together-

The danger of the Dark Side is ever present. The memory of Master Vrook’s voice murmured in my mind, dry and severe with his ceaseless caution. You cannot trust what you were shown from a Sith Lord’s mind!

My old master. I had loved him, as a padawan should love their master. But he held no power over me now. The recollections of his tutelage were naught more than a fading shadow, a shadow whose disappearance I welcomed.

For it turned out, I could trust Master Vrook about as far as I could trust Darth Malak.

...

::Send the western fleets to Admiral Dodonna::, a slurring voice shot out from a uniformed Mon Calamari atop a holo-stand. Age spots dappled down his sloping forehead. ::Anything within seven days range of the Edean sector. If this is our one chance to destroy Darth Malak, then we shall hit quick and hard!::

The hologram flickered in front of us: intercepted communications some days old that Malak delighted in sharing.

“General Adashan,” I uttered in recognition. My voice was hollow, as hollow as my heart. General Adashan had been responsible for my alacritous removal from Manaan; it was his clout that had Commander Wann transfer me, still comatose, onboard the fleeing Ebon Hawk in the company of a former Sith Lord.

The Republic had been keen to extract me, a valuable dejarik piece, out of the growing political quagmire on Manaan. So keen, they thought nothing of playing games of chance with my own personal safety-

“Yes, Adashan has been licking Republic boots since the Mandalorian Wars,” Malak commented. “The Republic are rallying, little one. Do you wish to see what their orders are?”

I stared at him, mute. Truly, it was not as if he offered me a tangible choice.

But it was not as if I would turn it down, had it been one.

He chortled, and leaned forward to press another silvery button.

::We will waste no time in reconnaissance::, the next voice said; the smooth timbre of a serious Human. Her greying hair was pulled tight in a severe bun underneath a crisp military hat. ::Assuming no further intelligence returns from our scouts, the orders remain the same: a direct assault on the Star Forge until it is destroyed. As soon as our fleets exit hyperspace, we advance. We give no quarter, no warning, no chance of defence::

The hologram winked out underneath Malak’s gloved finger.
Forn Dodonna. Leading the advance. To attack the Star Forge, even though they know-

“They move to strike, Bastila. They know of your presence here, and yet they are willing to sacrifice you – even after all you have sacrificed in their name.”

The Republic had to weigh gains versus losses. The gain of Darth Malak’s end, versus the loss of...

me.

The realization burned. Deep and hot.

“They have Jedi Masters advising them, little one. Would you like to see the manifest?”

I was not even aware of the traitorous droplets of moisture clouding my vision as the text scrolled on the impersonal screen. Even through my beclouded eyes, one name shone through, crystallizing into cursed recognition.

Vrook Lamar, Master of the Dantooine Enclave of the Jedi Order.

The betrayal struck like a shaft-spear straight through the centre of my heart.

This was one of the many crimes they attributed to Revan Freeflight. Sacrificing individuals for a strategic cause. Master Vrook... he always- he always despised Revan, and yet here he is-Acting in exactly the same fashion. Ceding my life, the life of his only padawan, for a so-called higher purpose.

Your master, Bastila. He is part of the Republic assault. He is willing to sanction your death, for his vision of the greater good.”

...

And, still, the console I stared at was dark.

There were motion sensors active on the top of the pyramid; the flight-droid that controlled the starship’s landing had installed them. The moment Revan stepped close enough to the holo-stand, the communication channel would open.

It could not be long, now, before she did. An hour or so had already passed since I had awoken her.
She must be close to clearing the pyramid, close to speaking with me.

It may have been Malak’s design, but he was a fool if he believed I danced to his tune. I had the opportunity of warning her while he slept, deep in meditation at the heart of the Forge.

The greater good.

I understood sacrifice in the name of the greater good, now more than ever- now that I had tasted true evil. But I also knew the greater good required my survival- mine and Revan’s.

Every sentient struggled for survival. Malak might desire my gifts as his apprentice, but he would willingly sacrifice me for his own purpose. My old master had already accepted my sacrifice, as evidenced by his advisory position to the Fleet that travelled to attack.

To attack me.

There was one sentient I could trust to never surrender my life – no matter that she had spent her years yielding whatever she had to in the name of the cursed greater good.
For our bond shackled us both, with a trust and dependency deeper than Malak knew. His awareness of its strength had grown, but he was not cognizant of just how intermeshed our individual connections to the Force were. The moment Malak realized that the death of one of us would mirror in the other, would be when my usefulness to him would narrow to one event only: my death.

It was the secret I kept tightly locked away, hidden deep beneath all other extraneous thoughts. It was also the binding truth of why he would never, truly, own me.

I would act out his demands because I had to, or because I believed them necessary regardless; but always, always, my final loyalty remained with the one whose loyalty was just as firmly returned: because it had to be.

Because our lives depended on each other.

...

“Eight hours until the first of the Republic starships enter the sector,” Malak murmured. Screeds of info-data scrolled in the air, transposed over a holo-map of the Star Forge. “The pyramid’s signal will scatter them, but I expect a few to reach the Star Forge nonetheless.”

“You fighters will no doubt destroy them, my lord.” The words burned less the more I used them. They were empty, hollow utterances that meant nothing.

“Indeed. But this is where you prove your loyalty.” He turned to face me, his eyes gleaming with a supremacy that was galling.

He believes I bow to his whim. But I only do what I must... for now.

“You will use your Battle Meditation to hasten the destruction of their fleet, Bastila. I will accept nothing less from you. There will be no second chance if you falter in this, my new apprentice.”

The words brimmed with mechanical satisfaction. His order to attack what had been my allies, my people, those I had sworn to defend...

...it should have felt harder than it did to bow my head in acquiescence.

They come to vanquish me! The rebuttal rang with righteousness in my head. I had no other choice. The Republic was damned whether I acted against them or not... and even if they did, implausibly, defeat Malak and the Star Forge, they would never be strong enough alone to face the real threat.

As for the Jedi Order... they had failed me. Just like they had failed Revan.

“Yes, master,” I whispered.

“Good,” he murmured, turning away. “For I shall be otherwise engaged with Revan.”

It took a moment for the bold nature of the words to scythe though my calamitous thoughts.

“Wha- what?” I gasped, the words hissing from my lungs. “Is- is she here?

“The shell of my old master is trapped on the surface of Lehon,” Malak said. “It seems she is retracing our old steps... not that it will do her any good.” There was a low humming from deep within his vocabulator. “In six hours, you shall reach out to her, Bastila. Invite her to meet you on top the pyramid that houses the Forge’s first line of defence. Coax her, tempt her, demand her presence. Do whatever is necessary to ensure she comes at your call.”

“Am I- am I to travel to Lehon?” I whispered. Unbelieving hope dawned a sunrise after an eternity of night-

“Do you take me for a slack-jawed imbecile?” Malak growled, the cadence of his voice switching abruptly with his mood. “You stay here, my apprentice. You stay here until she has died her final death.”

He strode forward, and again his gloved hands captured my face, holding me immobile with my own fear. “Do you think me unaware of the fruitless hope you cling to? How you hold her existence tight in your heart? Oh, I understand such fragility well, little one. Remember, I once called her master, much the same as you do now.”

An indignant denial rose within me- No. No! He can say what he will, but I know the truth. The bond we share makes us equal, no matter Revan’s power. It was not the first time Malak dared imply such a thing. The bond makes us equal, my mind repeated. No matter that Revan’s Force power blazed like a supernova- we were equal. We were!

If I had been braver, I would have denied such a preposterous claim to Malak’s face. But I was learning... had learned... when it was best to stay silent, and allow Malak the victory of voicing his own, misguided conclusions.

The pressure of his hands, unyielding against my face, stopped any refutation of mine issuing forth regardless.

“I am your master, Bastila. And once Revan is dead and the Republic forces destroyed, I shall own you in every way.”

I am your master.

Malak’s words echoed in my head, and the frantic nature of my own thoughts froze in self-preservation. Better that he believe I accepted his words. Better that he think I bow my head in compliance.

“Observe, little one.” His voice ebbed back into mild neutrality, and his hands dropped. A swish of a gloved limb, and the holo-map vanished, to be replaced with the scene of a courtyard dappled with the last gasp of daylight.

“The vid-cam from the viewport of a Forge snubfighter,” Malak clarified. “It has been remote-flown to the pyramid on Lehon, and its flight-droid has installed a holo-stand for visual communication. My ships are not affected by the scrambler, dear Bastila. You shall lead Revan into this ship and bring her to me.”

If Revan and the others were truly stranded on Lehon – and I had no reason to doubt Malak on this – then her only option for departure was in his chosen vessel.

“Why the holo-stand?” I mumbled, trying to make sense of Malak’s reasoning. He had once assured me that he would kill Revan in the most expedient of ways- not risk granting her an opportunity for victory-

“So she can see you are talking with her alone, of course. I doubt she is truly the match of the Revan I once knew, but even a broken, mind-addled fool would expect my hand here.”
Malak had mocked me, once – dared me to believe he would allow Revan to reach the Star Forge unhindered, when he could kill her from afar. If she was already trapped on Lehon, why would he grant her an opportunity to leave?

I had countered with the transparent ploy of a fair fight, at which he had laughed.

Could it be the idea had grown in appeal to him?

“She can only hear your voice through your telepathy. But by using a holo-stand, she can see with her own broken eyes that you act alone.” His eyes narrowed; whether in pleasure or irritation I could not perceive. “It seems you shall get your wish after all, little one. Revan shall return to the Star Forge. Alone, without her allies, to face me in my place of power.”

A curl of unease sat in my gut. There was something off about this- something I did not quite comprehend-

“In six hours’ time, you shall reach out to her.” He tilted his head, and gestured toward the exit of the command room. “But for now, we sleep. Even the Force cannot hold back exhaustion forever.”

No matter what Malak’s game was, if it meant Revan made it to the Star Forge then there was still hope- still a chance-

“Come, little one.” He folded his arms, awaiting my subservience. “We shall rest in deep meditation, and arise in six hours. There is a lot to prepare for.”

“Yes, master,” I whispered, bowing my head. And the thought shone with startling clarity – maybe this was his trap, his machination – but who said I had to play by his rules?

...

Deep meditation was akin to sleep; a resting of the physical and a re-energizing of the mind. While the Force protected one in such a state, it also dulled the physical senses.

Malak only allowed me to rest near the kaiburr, these days. He would sit, cross-legged, and sink into a deep trance himself. The Force would wrap around him in a thick shield of energy that was both impenetrable and glorious.

I had lulled myself into meditation as per usual, but I had kept part of myself back. Just enough to grasp upon the edge of awareness, the corner of full consciousness.

I had waited until I was sure Malak was as submerged as he could be. And then I had waited some more.

When I could wait no longer, I silently rose to my feet and slipped out of the inner chamber.

I had hours left until Darth Malak would arise from his meditation. Hours in which I could lure Revan to the Star Forge, sooner than Malak expected, and everything would change.

It could not be long, now.

Patience.

Any moment, any moment now, the motion sensors should register her presence, and the holo-stand would activate.

Patience is an art of discipline.
Bastila? I’m here.

xXx

Chapter End Notes

Coming up next: Revan talks to Bastila.
Thanks as always to kosiah for the beta.
The snubfighter rose sleek and proud in my Force-enhanced vision. It wasn’t a large ship by any means, but its elongated lines and protracted curvature were distinctly different from any Republic craft I could recall.

The design of it was completely alien... and yet familiar enough to raise the hairs on my neck.

It’s a ship from the Star Forge itself. The thought shone with certainty, and I hated the encroaching recognition that drove its blind fingers into my riddled mind.

Once, I flew in starships like this. Once, I commanded fleets of them. I’d accepted my past – as much as I could, anyway – and I understood there would always be spectres resurrected to haunt me.

I knew I’d always have to make the choice, again and again, whether to ignore them or listen.

Bastila? I called out a second time. She had to be in the starship. I took a cautious step forward, my gaze landing on the innocuous holo-stand, the one that’d been placed on the ground some metres before the snubfighter.

It wasn’t connected to the console. It wasn’t part of the temple’s infrastructure – it’d come from the snubfighter, I thought, one of those moveable vid-comms that had an inbuilt battery for easy portability – and likely programmed to transmit on only one channel.

Which had to be directed at the Forge, didn’t it?

The magnificence of kaiburr-enhanced Force clouded my senses, beating a steady thrum that overtook almost everything else... but almost was not everything. I frowned as my awareness snagged on a series of muted oscillations running directly to the holo-stand.

There’s a wireless signal running to that... and from that... my head turned, tracing the source-

An electronic hiss permeated the air, followed by the sharp radiance of artificial light converging into my Force-enhanced vision. I jerked back to the holo-stand, my Force-sight dropping as I sucked in an involuntarily gasp.

“Bastila!” I breathed, as the projection atop the stand sharpened into high-res focus. The shaft of disappointment was both deep and gutting. “I thought- I thought you’d be here. In person.”

::If only.:: Her voice was clear, if low, and reverberated with urgency. Her lustrous brown hair was caught back in intricate braids – even more ornamental than her norm – and they framed her pale, heart-shaped face.
I had a fleeting thought of triviality – some tech hasn’t set the colour-adjustment quite right – as Bastila’s skin-tone appeared an unnatural chalk-white, offset by sweeping midnight garments that encased her form. Her gaze glinted with ferocity and purpose.

::The ship, Revan,:: she urged, leaning forward. ::It is not impeded by the scrambler, as I am sure you have guessed. It is your passage to the Star Forge. To me.::

No time for small talk, I thought idly, as I scrutinized my erstwhile bond-sister. The holo-projection muted her environment into shades of fuzzy grey, so all I could really focus on was her.

Bastila. The Jedi Padawan who had saved me. The young woman who had shown a Sith Lord mercy.

So much had happened since I’d last seen her. It felt like a lifetime ago: back on Korriban, inside the safety of the Ebon Hawk, when psychic exhaustion from both Manaan and mouthy Mekel’s resurrection had scored fault-lines into Bastila’s mental guards and physical well-being.

Would Bastila have even been captured had she been at her best? As quick as that errant thought slithered through my mind, I dismissed it. Kylah Aramai had been watching us from spaceport control, then; biding her time. Kylah had been waiting for the opportune moment to strike.

Kylah was now dead, and I could not forget our visceral pleasure at her end.

Bastila and I had been through so much together since Korriban, all due to the intricacies of our connection. And yet, there was something different about seeing her face-to-face, over a holo-call. Something that clenched at my heart.

Our bond was quiet. Bastila was holding back in obvious retreat, and I found myself emulating her as I pulled the Force tightly inward. She had already warned me that our telepathy might rouse Malak- that he grew interested in psychic abilities- that he has his fingers deeply ensnared in her mind.

Wariness kept me silent. Bastila’s gaze was sharp, sparking a tawny brown through the holo-projection- a lighter, more radiant colour than I recalled.

Karon’s hilt was still clasped tight in my hand. Beneath my fingers, I could feel the faint echo of my old master’s lightsaber crystal. The vibration of energy was indistinct – so weak and inconspicuous when contrasted with the blast of kaiburr behind me – and yet, despite that, a comfort in my grasp.

::I can see the suspicion on your face,:: Bastila said at last, breaking the loaded silence. ::So listen, for time is of the essence. Malak is expecting you to travel in that starship to the Star Forge. To face him alone.::

My gaze had shot back to the snubfighter. Bastila’s earlier words rang through my head- it’s not a trap!- and the uneasiness began to curl tight in my gut.

::But I play not by his timeline, and nor should you. He planned for me to contact you in four hours. He sleeps now, Revan. He is unaware that I am acting pre-emptively.::

“Wait a minute,” I cut in, and heard the steel forming in my tone as I guessed her intentions. “You want me to walk into a snubfighter that Malak expects me to board?”

::Yes.:: Her words were resolute; unyielding in their purpose. Her brown eyes glowed. ::It shall take you no more than half a standard hour to reach me, Revan. Together, we shall overpower Malak. It is a destiny we have been travelling toward since I first pulled you from the Nexus. You must know this, as much as I do.::

The cockpit was small. Enough for one pilot. Possibly a second sent could squeeze in behind, but it was difficult to tell from outside. Bastila’s intent was clear, though. She wants me to travel. Now. Without the others.

Without informing the others.

Jolee’s scolding about running off by myself sprang to mind... and an instant later, I realized that was exactly what I had already done, right here, right now.

“Why?” I rapped out. I lowered my Force-shield, just a little, just the smallest amount to lay a metaphorical ear along the path of our bond. “Why alone, why without my... without our allies?”

::How, exactly, do you expect to bring them to the Star Forge?:: she shot back tartly. ::From what I understand of the scrambler, it encompasses the entire sector. You are lucky you crashed on Lehon rather than into the heart of an asteroid.::

I felt myself grimacing, recalling Carth’s steady grip on the controls of the ‘Hawk as I spat out half-coherent directions. Luck had nothing to do with it. Since when does Bastila Shan attribute anything to the fanciful notion of luck? “I can disable the scrambler right here, Bastila. I can face Malak on my own terms, not in one of the Forge’s own snubfighters.”

::Revan.:: Bastila’s voice had a sad tone that bordered on pity. Immediately, my spine stiffened in response, but all I could sense from her psychically was deep resolve. ::The console behind you may as well be an ornamental fixture. The scrambler is controlled by the Star Forge.::

The air caught sharply in my lungs, and I found myself turning on the spot, turning back to look at the console-

“No,” I muttered in denial, shaking my head. “I came here last time-“

::Once, the signal was programmable from both the temple and the Star Forge. But you could not expect Malak to leave a system unguarded that could bring down his first line of defence. The console is not just deactivated, Revan. It has been erased of all functionality.::

That made a horrid sense. The realization tightened claws into my gut.

“That’s why there’s no guards,” I muttered, blinking. “That’s why there’s nothing here to stop a Force-user- to stop me-“

Of course Malak wouldn’t have left a functioning console accessible on Lehon – not if he could control the scrambler from the Forge.

But I had, once. I’d more or less left the pyramid alone after bringing down the scrambler the first time around. Yes, but by all accounts, I’d been an overconfident idiot. Or had I relished the thought of an unexpected challenge? Maybe I’d believed the Forge had additional defences? I didn’t know. It was yet another small, insignificant detail that would likely never emerge from the holes of nightfall in my head.

::All that remains on Lehon is the kaiburr itself.:: Bastila continued. ::That, and it’s mechanical enclosure that transmutes the Force into an EMP scrambler. So unless you plan on traipsing into the bowels of the pyramid and running your lightsaber through the kaiburr personally-::
I frowned. That wouldn’t work- a crystal large enough to power all of this would undoubtedly hold up against the plasma of a lightsaber, but the idea of destruction itself-

::Revan,: Bastila snapped, as if she knew my attention was wandering. ::That was said in jest. Stay away from the crystal. You do not- You could lose yourself. The allure... it is hard to resist, and harder to return from.::

“No, I get that,” I muttered, my gaze returning to her. “Having just hiked through this frelling pyramid myself.” I clipped my ‘saber away, before folding my arms and looking hard at her. Bastila stared back unflinchingly. “Why did you insist I come alone?”

::You cannot fit the crew in that starfighter, Revan! Even if the scrambler were not an issue, there is no way the Ebon Hawk could land on the Star Forge. Malak has a fleet of fighters. The Ebon Hawk will be immediately tracked and shot down.::

My breath caught. That was a detail we hadn’t exactly thought through. How the frell could we safely get the ‘Hawk through squads of attacking starships?

::What, truly, do you expect the crew to accomplish on the Star Forge anyway?: It may have been a question, but it was obviously a rhetorical one. ::This is a place of great Force power. The non-sensitives would be no more than chaff, here. And Juhani... do you really suppose that a young, flawed padawan like her would be able to walk here unscathed?: Bastila snorted. ::The Cathar couldn’t ascend the temple you now stand upon without losing herself, let alone stay true on the Star Forge.:;

My mouth opened... and then shut again. Bastila had always had a great deal of empathy for Juhani... but she hadn’t seen how our Cathar friend had walked away from Korriban. Shaken, and yet stronger for it.

Bastila doesn’t know about Juhani’s knighthood. Stars, she doesn’t know about Dustil, or Jolee, or even sodding Yudan.

The lure of the kaiburr here on Lehon was strong, but I believed in my companions... more than Bastila did. Juhani had the mental fortitude to resist. I had faith in her strength of will... and Jolee’s. Yudan’s. Not so sure about Dustil, though.

I grimaced. “What, exactly, is your plan, Bastila? You want me to fly to the Forge without the others, and then- what? Chase down Malak and gut him in his sleep?”

I couldn’t help the scathing tone that entered my voice. How could Bastila trust my survival to a ship from the Star Forge? The sensors would probably zero in on it the moment I launched from Lehon, if it wasn’t otherwise compromised.

I frowned, unfurling my awareness towards the snubfighter. It was powered down, and all I could really pick up were the muted pulses of a system on standby. If anything, the signal lines running to the holo-stand were more distinct than the electronics of the snubfighter itself.

::It is not as absurd as you may believe,: Bastila retorted. There was a frown creasing her pale forehead, and through the open crack in our bond I could sense her irritation. Some part of her had expected me to capitulate with ease.

Bastila sighed, leaning back from the holo-cam. ::You have no chance with the Ebon Hawk. But with my ship you do. You could be here, with me, before Malak even wakes.:

“How do you know he’s not already awake, Bastila?” I said quietly. “How do you know he isn’t expecting exactly... this?"

::I can sense him. Every moment, be I conscious or asleep, I know what my- what Malak is doing. He rests deep in meditation now, Revan. He is not aware.::

The holo-projection was crisp and detailed, enough for me to see the faraway look in her eyes. She was feeling out with the Force, seeking out the state of Malak. How often has she done that? Had to reach out, in fear that he would be coming- doing stars-knows-what-

A shudder of guilt wracked through me. I couldn’t- I didn’t want to imagine what Bastila’s life had been like, this last month, centred entirely around the whims of a Sith Lord I was responsible for creating.

I’ll get her away from him. If it’s the last thing I do.

Bastila swung back to face me. She was shining with conviction, but there was desperation lacing her thoughts, too. I couldn’t deny her, my bond-sister, my rescuer... but I had to be smart about this, too.

“Why would Malak choose to bring me to the Star Forge?” I asked. That was the part bugging me. It just seemed too... neat. “When he believes me trapped here?”

::He wants your death, Revan!:: Bastila scoffed, as if it were the most obvious thing in the galaxy. Maybe it was. ::And what better place to stand against you, than in the heart of his own stronghold?:

There was truth, there. I’d be alone, and Malak would be surrounded by his own strength. No doubt he was getting sick of how I kept wriggling away from him and his forces. But... I frowned. Malak betrayed me from afar above Deralia. That had been a trap, a machination organized so he didn’t have to face me directly. I couldn’t remember the specifics, but the frontal assault had come from his followers... he had not risked himself against me.

Something must have slipped through our mind-link, for I saw Bastila’s expression soften.

::He did not face you head-on in the past, Revan. For you were stronger than him, once.::

Once... No matter how I felt like the Jedi Knight of old, I wasn’t the same person anymore. And neither was he.

“Once?” I said quietly. “And now?”

::Now, he is the master of the Star Forge. He believes merely bringing you here will be enough for him to defeat you.:: Bastila sighed. ::Malak thinks you damaged and broken... and perhaps you were, when we took our initial footsteps together back on Taris::: Her lips pursed, and a fierceness tightened her sharp gaze. Bastila was steeling herself to face the inevitable- and yet there was a sense of anticipation emanating from her, too.

::Malak expects me to sit back in fear while he challenges you. Oh, he understands my loyalty to you but believes his hold over me counter balances that.:: She broke off with a hollow laugh. ::I do not deny he scares me... but Malak does not appreciate the depths of our bond. He does not realize how I can aid you... how strong we can be together. He saw Kylah’s death through my mind, Revan.:: She paused, staring hard into the holo-cam. A spark of dark satisfaction slipped through the cleft in our bond.

It echoed within me, too.
Malak believes I was no more than a bystander. He does not grasp that it was I who raised your lightsaber and drove it through Kylah’s chest. He does not understand how our power can combine, or I highly doubt I would still be alive.

Had it been Bastila, raising Karon’s lightsaber, plunging it into the traitor’s dying body? Somehow, I recalled it differently. A fusion of our combined will, both veneful and predatory in nature. We had both been lost onboard the Leviathan, sinking into the depths of chaotic rage and seductive power. We had been one, for a short time— one with the dark.

You were the strongest Force-sensitive in the galaxy once, Revan. Together, I know, we will be stronger still.

A ghostly shiver danced down my spine. “I’m not sure... I don’t think that’s a good thing, Bastila.”

It is a necessary thing. I know you better than anyone alive, Revan. Her tone was implacable. And yet, how true were those words, really? I didn’t even know myself, at times. You still possess the same power, the same drive—all you lack is your memory, and I can help you there.

The words were issued boldly, hanging stark and crisp in the air. I had told myself, again and again, that I didn’t want those memories— they weren’t important, they held no power over me, and delving into my past was dangerous besides—

All valid arguments, but the burning desire to remember remained, regardless.

“Help me? How?” I countered sharply, needing Bastila to say the words out loud. “Are you talking about somehow restoring my memory?”

I wouldn’t accept it. No matter how tempting— I was who I was, now. Letting the past back into my head could very well damn me to the same path as before.

Bastila looked startled, and I realized I’d misunderstood. Sympathy eked through our mind-link, hot and poignant. Her gaze softened. No. You must understand the damage to your mind was extensive. We knew some fragments remained… the image of the Star Map, for instance, was startlingly clear. A distant look crossed her face as memories of my past crossed her mind. You and I have not had the chance to speak of this in depth, and we shall not until Malak is defeated. But Revan… I saw your medical scans, when you were imprisoned on Dantooine. Pathways in your pre-frontal cortex were completely burned away. Much of your long-term memory will never return. You must accept that.

I found myself swallowing, my gaze moving away from her to rest back on the sleeping snubfighter she wished me to enter. My grief at her words sat in my throat like a shiv-blade, sharp and unyielding.

Yet, there was a bitter sort of relief there, as well. The decision about what to remember was out of my hands.

“I still get the odd flash, Bastila,” I said, my voice calm and neutral as if we were speaking about Coruscant’s three-day weather forecast. “Should I always expect that?”

Possibly. It was those fragments, those whispers that drove the Council to do what they did. The corners of her mouth turned down, and a flash of scorn blazed through the bond. The mind-wipe… Oh, it was enough to fan my bitterness at the Order, but I was surprised to feel the same echo of repudiation from her. Galdea alleged you would never recall anything on a conscious level. Vima claimed you would only see the briefest of visions, wholly unconnected to anything Bastila had told me Galdea had died with the Endar Spire. Karon’s death still sat heavy in my mind. It was this Vima who still lived... the only one left who’d personally reconstructed my mind to the liking of the Jedi Order.

Dovetail into insanity... It was difficult to admit this unknown Jedi might have had a valid concern. The flashes of memory that returned to me stood on their own, with no indication of what occurred before or after. So often, they were a picture of people I didn’t know or events I didn’t understand... and yet the emotions were still there.

I had little conscious remembrance of my time as Dark Lord – and that was a good thing – but the feelings remained. The visceral pleasure of commanding power... the icy calculation that transcended everything... the ancient grief beneath it all....

And I felt more than just the darkest part of my history. Nisotsa was nothing but a whispered name in my head, and yet my grief at her death had been deeply personal. I remembered so little of Yudan, but he was important to me... as important as any member of my crew- and that wasn’t logical, either, given how little I knew of him.

Malak... Malak was different. Once we’d been close. Objectively, I understood that once I’d loved him fiercely, as fiercely as the stars. That feeling simply wasn’t there, within me, any longer. Maybe it was simply my lack of memory at work here... or some innate sense of survival responding to his betrayal.

Maybe the Dark Side had burned away every remnant of what we had once shared.

Or maybe it will come flooding back when I see him face to face. I shivered.

::They were blind, Revan:: Bastila continued, wrenching me back to the present. ::Vima and Galdea and every other member of the Council. Perhaps it was a subconscious blindness but, at times, it feels more contrived than that. They needed justification for brainwashing you, for turning you into a mindless puppet that danced at their whim, all the while telling themselves that they remained true to their code. What better argument than claiming you were broken regardless?::

She gave a bitter laugh. ::Truly, none of those hypocritical old fools ever considered giving you a chance. The real you.::

I was shocked into silence at her words. Bastila sounded like she had no faith in the Council. Bastila Shan. The battle meditation princess. The emerging Jedi hero of the war effort.

I was plenty pissed at the Order. Maybe screwing around with one sentient’s mind paled in comparison to my own crimes, but the whole event was too personal for me to ever be objective about it.

I hadn’t expected Bastila’s reaction, now, to be so similar.

Is it the bond? Have some of my feelings... my emotions... been leaking through to her?

::Look at you now:: Bastila murmured. She almost sounded gratified. ::Even with no memory you have returned to yourself. The Order, Malak... They still underestimate you, Revan. But I do not. And there are some memories I can restore, some that are crucial beyond::

“Wait a minute,” I snapped. My hand jerked up in a halting motion, my gut clenched. “What?” Restore memories- but she’d just said- she’d- “I thought the last thing you wanted was for me to recall anything of my past!”
The Unknown Regions.

Bastila cut in, her radiant eyes blazing. "I have seen what Malak saw. I understand what set you on your path. I comprehend what the Jedi do not... what they would refuse to acknowledge even had they the chance. I know, a facet at least, of what you and Malak found."

Shock shuddered through me like a glacial wind, chilling me to the bone.

"No," I mumbled through numb lips. The burning desire was there, again, but caution was stronger still. "Whatever Malak has shared with you... For frell’s sake, you can’t trust him- and even if there is some truth there- don’t you see, whatever’s in the Unknown Regions is the catalyst that tipped me over the edge last time."

"Yes," she challenged, leaning forward so her entire face filled out the holo-image. "Yes, you fell and you failed. The whole galaxy knows that. But the reason... surely, you must have suspected something great set you on that path. You! The saviour of the Republic! There was more than just a lust for conquest that drove you... and, at best, I can only call the Jedi misguided for blaming it on the horrors of war. She snorted in disgust. "They thought nothing of entering battle when the enemy leader was a Dark Jedi, and yet they sat back when it was Mandalore."

She paused, then, and her stare was as hard as ferracrystal. "The hypocrisy, Revan... sometimes, I hope they choke on it."

My breath froze in my throat. My lungs began to burn as I denied them oxygen. Everything she was saying... it all made sense, it seemed to echo with what I had once believed, and yet... and yet-

"How can I begrudge her anger at the Jedi? I couldn’t; I felt it myself. I understood it. And... whatever had driven me in the past... it must have been important. Critical. Something I believed more momentous than the fate of the Republic."

"I can’t, Bastila," I said through clenched teeth. "I can’t risk falling again."

"You risked everything last time, Revan, because you knew you had to! Because you understood that sometimes the lightest path cannot prevail against the greatest darkness! And that sometimes-" Bastila paused abruptly, lips pursing, faint spots of colour blooming on her porcelain cheeks.

"Sometimes, what? Sometimes sacrifices have to be made? Sometimes the end justifies the means? Hadn’t Bastila condemned me for taking that too far in the past?"

"And that sometimes," Bastila repeated, her voice dropped to near-inaudibility, "words are not enough."

I had my mental shields mostly drawn up, closed deep around my psyche; all apart from that one small opening between us. I was completely unprepared for Bastila, in a sudden movement, to throw a blast of kaiburr-induced Force straight through our bond.

A memory, rich and dark and thrumming with power, slammed into my head, and I staggered backwards under the power of it.

A wave of death. The matrix of the Force itself, burning and shrivelling, each thread withering into nothingness as it was extinguished forever. The backdrop: an eerie purple world with the specks of five distant suns glaring a cold light from beyond-

I knew that scene. I knew that world-

My mind reeled with the sensation of a null life, where all senses were dulled, like a neural disruptor was permanently affixed around one’s neck. But the psychic feeling jarred within me-that wasn’t how I’d remembered it, that brief flash that’d scoured my mind back in the Shadowlands, the one with the same, alien world-

I gasped as Bastila retreated, leaving only her lingering need for me to understand.

::The death of the Force,:: Bastila murmured. Her voice broke, before firming once more with purpose. ::Whatever is out there, it poses an incalculable risk to us all. You knew, once, that you could not sit back from such a threat. I cannot either, Revan. I shall not.::

The death of the Force... but, no, no! The Force had been alive! I remember... it was seemingly sentient... and evil, in its intent. An evil awareness driving behind it all-“Bastila...” I whispered again. Bastila said Malak had shared this with her, like a commander divulging intel to his subordinates- yet when the commander was a Sith Lord whispering images straight into the mind, how much credence could that intel be given?

But how could I trust my own instincts more, when all I recalled was the smallest snippet, sparking across the surface of my brain?

The truth could be both, or neither, or something in between.

::Malak said you thought to create an empire strong enough to invade the Unknown Regions. Strong enough to attack, before the galaxy itself was threatened.::

“I don’t even understand what you’re showing me, Bastila!” I said, feeling my jaw clench. “The idea of the Force dying-”

::I know,:: she murmured. ::I can still feel the Force turning to ash. Revan, I am not fool enough to naively believe all Malak shows me, but I sensed the truth of that image. He saw the Force die, in a way that it would never return. He saw the malaise spread. Revan... nothing like this has ever threatened the galaxy before.::

“But what... what is it?” I threw my hands up in the air. “You say my purpose behind the Sith Empire was to attack... attack what? Some Force sickness? How can a fleet of starships attack that?”

Unless there’s something behind it? An alien empire? A single sentient more powerful than we can imagine? A disease of the Force itself?

::Whatever the truth is, Revan, we must claim the Star Forge to fight it.::

There was a sinking feeling in my gut. It was obvious where she was heading. “No-”

::Yes,:: she hissed. ::You knew before. You-::

“You’re getting this from Malak, Bastila,” I protested, but I wasn’t wholly sure I believed my own words. It sounded more like this was Bastila’s plan... Bastila’s desire... “You’re believing what he wants- doing what he wants-”

“Do not be preposterous,:: she snapped. ::What Malak desires is for me to bring you to him four hours from now, neatly gift-wrapped for him to dispatch while I cower in the shadows. The last thing he would wish is for you to once again claim mastery of the Star Forge!::

The words were out. Her plan was openly spoken between us.
Something... in my heart... cracked. A deep anguish... undercut by a familiar drive to do what was necessary. What I had to, no matter the cost.

::Revan:: Bastila’s voice was softer, now. Resolution pulled deeply at me from the other side of the bond. ::You cannot be blind to the fact that Malak – Jedi Knight Malak Devari – followed you once before. Most of the Jedi... half the Republic Fleet... they followed you. You convinced them this was the correct course of action.:: She blinked at me, eyes full of the same fire and purpose that resonated between us. ::You and I may not understand everything that you and Malak once found – but we know the threat is real. You had a higher purpose before. Your men followed you because your actions were necessary... they were just not enough.::

“Necessary?” I choked, blinking, feeling the sting of emotion at the back of my eyes. All those who’d followed me – most of whom now lay dead – how much had they really known? Would some fanciful tale about a Force threat beyond known space really turn half the Republic Fleet? Or had I simply used pretty words, manipulations and threats and promises, to get them on my side? Anything, to bend people to my will, because the end justified the frelling means?

::Yes, necessary!:: Bastila blazed. ::We’re talking about the death of the Force here, Revan! Think what that would mean to us- to, to everyone!::

The death of the Force. It was a horrible idea to consider.

But it would mean no more fallen Jedi, a sepulchral voice creaked in my head. No more Darth Malak. No more Exar Kun. A shudder racked through me. No more Darth Revan.

Somehow, I didn’t think this concept would have ever crossed the old Revan’s mind.

“You think I decided the Dark Side – which the Star Forge is an instrument of – would be strong enough to combat this- whatever this is?” I whispered.

A thought sparked- shaking and quicksilver- a murmur from my past-

The Light isn’t strong enough for what I must do. I don't know if this will work- it's time to roll the dice-

::I believe you thought yourself strong enough to master the Star Forge without losing yourself in the process,:: Bastila said, her voice gentling.

And she was right. Somehow, I knew it. Roll the dice... I knew there was a risk. I knew it was a gamble. But gambles had always paid off for me before-

::You were almost strong enough, Revan. Almost::: Her pale face was set with righteousness, and I heard her next words before she even spoke them. ::Together, we are stronger still.::

But I recalled the Leviathan. Our powers merging, combining, surging to greater heights as we spiralled out of control-

::We were unprepared.::: There was a grimace on Bastila’s face as she flawlessly picked up on my thoughts, but she didn’t drop her gaze. :::I was unprepared. I allowed my baser desires to control me. But we are aware of the danger, now. We can rely upon our connection and empathy toward each other to direct our power. Revan... my bond-sister. My friend. I know you fear falling to the Dark Side once more, but you must think through both sides here. If you hold back, Malak will remain a blight upon the galaxy. Our only chance is to grasp this opportunity. To defeat him while we can, and remain true to ourselves. And we can do this, Revan, we can. I have faith in us both.:::
I wasn’t ready to make this choice- I felt like I was teetering on the edge, torn between my desire to aid Bastila and stay firm against the lure of the Dark Side- wanting to protect the galaxy but unsure which option would be best to do so-

::The threat remains, Revan,: Bastila insisted. ::Perhaps it is merely biding its time, or perhaps it is already moving through known space. We do not know... but it is there. And someone needs to stand against it.::

Us. The word hissed through my mind like a sandsnake. Us.

::Us, Revan:: Bastila repeated, louder this time, her voice ringing out over the courtyard. ::You and I are strong enough. And the Star Forge shall be our shield with which we defend the galaxy.::

Her tawny eyes widened, then; flashing sharp with outrage as her gaze drifted over my shoulder. It was the only warning I had before the incongruity of a raspy throat clearing echoed through the still night air.

“Can’t say I think much of this place,” came the dry voice of Jolee Bindo. “Even in my day we installed turbo lifts.”

I told you to come alone!

Bastila’s mental voice was both thwarted and annoyed, and the injustice of her accusation was enough to keep my attention firmly fixed on her. I didn’t need to turn around. I knew who was behind me.

Jolee. Juhani. Yudan. At least they’d had the brains to leave Dustil behind.

“Our presence has nothing to do with me,” I muttered. My thoughts were still on Bastila. She had turned away from her original objective. Bastila wanted us to harness the Star Forge. Us.

We would be powerful. More so than I had been last time. And Bastila was convinced the threat was still out there, still waiting, still an unfathomable danger-

She could be right. I believed it once before.

“Bastila,” Juhani’s voice, low and intense, spoke behind us. “I had hoped you would be here in person. It is good to see you again, even under these circumstances.”

There was a tightening on my bond-sister’s face, the briefest twitch of a forced smile, before her gaze pinned back on me. ::Revan. I can see you are not wholly convinced. We must speak more and this is a private conversation.:: Her gaze never wavered from mine, her eyes never blinked. Get rid of them.

I felt my eyebrows raise. What does she expect me to do, order them to leave? I turned around, slowly, deliberately, to face my crew-mates.

The illumination from the holo-projection was enough to bathe the darkened courtyard in dim light, enough to reveal my friends without the aid of Force-Sight.

They were mere metres away, having cleared the kaiburr already. My gaze caught briefly on the empty air behind them. Force-enhanced vision depicted the beacon as a burning crimson; but without it, there was nothing to see. Only the sense of ultimate strength, once more humming a loud promise of power against my soul.
I jerked my attention back to the others. I should’ve sensed them earlier, I thought with mild irritation. The kaiburr still inundated my senses, and the conversation with Bastila was all-consuming, but... I should’ve sensed them earlier. Once, I would have.

Maybe Bastila is right, maybe I still have the same depth of power I once wielded— but I don’t have the same finesse or training. In some ways, with years of tutelage and experience sitting firmly behind her, Bastila was a more complete Jedi than I.

Jolee Bindo came to a stop not far from me, his lined face genial and relaxed as ever. Juhani’s expression was fixed, intent; her ears laid flat against the side of her head and her mouth pursed in thought. They were both keeping their gaze firmly on the holo-projection.

Yudan, in their shadow, betrayed no emotion at all—but he was staring at me.

“Get rid of them?” I muttered, the words meant for the woman behind me. “Yeah. Somehow, Bastila, I don’t think they’ll be listening if I tell them to sod off.”

“Eh, what was that?” Jolee drawled, the casual nature of both his words and expression at odds with the tense lines of his body. He folded his arms. “I’m afraid my ears don’t work so well these days. Old age. Heh, you know how it goes.”

“Bastila,” Juhani began once more. She took another step closer, leaning forward, ears twitching. “This—”

Revan! ::Revan,:: Bastila snapped, the words echoing strangely in my senses, loud enough that I found myself pivoting on the spot, back to face her once more. Her eyes glittered through the holo-projection. The last thing she desired, I could see, was this exchange out in the open. ::You insist on speaking of this in front of them? A runaway padawan who more feared the Dark Side than embraced it, some irreverent old man I do not even recognize, and...:: she paused, her expression tightening further as her gaze roved over the others. ::...one of your fallen generals, who appears almost as hard to kill as you yourself?:::

“Bastila, we are a team,” Juhani said. Her voice was gentle. “We are all in this together. We can all help you—”

::This is far beyond your scope of understanding, Juhani,::: Bastila interjected. I could see her taking in a deep breath, trying to control herself, trying to hold back her irritation. ::This has nothing to do with you, and you trespass upon a private conversation. You know nothing of what is at stake!:::

“I know we are all tempted—”

::You think this is about the Dark Side?: There was a definite lacing of scorn in Bastila’s voice. Juhani meant well, but Bastila was correct: this went beyond the Dark Side.

But it has to do with the Dark Side as well, my mind whispered.

“The Dark Side is ever present,” Juhani murmured. Pious words, even if there was a shining truth to them. Juhani, in contrast to my bond-sister, sounded completely unruffled. Serene. Calm. “We are sisters of the Order, Bastila. Tell us—”

::The Order? You clutch to your dreams of forgiveness, but what has the Order ever done for you? Karon imparted quiet platitudes in appeasement, but do you really believe your Quatra will allow you to amount to anything of note, now?: Bastila scoffed. ::The Order will hold you back, Juhani. You will spend your years as a padawan mired in the depths of self-flagellation.::
Sometimes, I forgot just how much Bastila had missed out on—

“I stand in the light,” Juhani replied. “The Order is my shield, my family; but I hold myself true to the will of the Force.”

_Tactful_, I thought with respect. Juhani had always been a contradictory mix of humbleness and pride. Surely, some part of her was dying to slip the knowledge of her knighthood—

_What?_: Bastila hissed in shock. Uneasy mortification jolted through me—Bastila was keeping a closer watch on our mind-link than I—_Knighthood? You cannot be serious!_:—

I felt the vehement taste of her anger, then; her betrayal—_After all I have done for the Order, all those years Vrook refused me_- her righteousness surged through my mind—I am no more than a tool to them, to be used as required—

“Bastila,” I snapped. “You said our telepathy might rouse Malak. Rein it in!”

I sensed her retreat, then; her eyes sparking a russet outrage through the holo-projection. _This must have occurred on Kashyyyk. Vrook was there, wasn’t he?_: she all but snarled. I couldn’t help but notice the distinct lack of honorific. _It all makes a bitter sort of sense, if you’re a manipulative hypocrite. They completely failed to control you during the Mandalorian Wars, Revan. They weren’t going to let me, their only tool against your Sith, acquire any sort of autonomy for myself. A padawan is much easier to control than a knight._—

I stared at her in silence, my lips thinning. I had no obvious retort. Certainly, I’d _always_ thought it patently ridiculous that she’d spent years unleashing her battle meditation out in the field, while remaining held back as a padawan.

_It matters not._—she bit out, but her words still simmered with unchecked resentment._The Order matters not. They would sit back while the galaxy crumbles, with their hands fixed firmly over their eyes. You knew this once, Revan. Force help me, you will understand this again._—

“She wants you to take over the Star Forge,” a low voice intoned behind me. I stiffened. As always, Yudan’s words came out detached and monotone, to the point where I had no idea what he was truly thinking. “She wants you to replace Malak.”

_Do not be an imbecile. Malak is just as misguided as the Jedi!_: Bastila retorted. Her eyes flashed fire over my shoulder, before coming back to rest on mine._Revan, leading the Sith Empire and surrendering to the Dark Side was never your intention, for all that it may have happened. You needed an army, which is why you first fashioned yourself as Dark Lord. But the Sith, the Jedi—both are no more than extremes with little consideration of the middle ground. Both are too entrenched in dogma to see the whole picture and act accordingly. And part of you knows this, or you would not surround yourself with scions from opposite ends of the spectrum._—

“I am no scion, Bastila,” Juhani said. She’d taken a step forward, almost flanking me now, as we both faced Bastila. “I am Revan’s friend. Your friend. But I follow my own values.”—

_You are a follower._—Bastila fired back._Revan, must you persist with their presence here?_:—

Did Bastila think I had some control over them? _Once, when I was a different person, my allies were my followers. Once, I could have demanded their departure._ Even had I that power now, I wasn’t sure it would be the right course of action. I desired to speak with Bastila in private, and yet… how objective was I, about her?
How objective is she?

In that regard, having my allies- not my followers- nearby to weigh in with their opinion might not be a bad thing.

Bastila must have interpreted something in my expression- or, she was merely translating what she felt between us. All I could sense from her was, once more, a growing resolve. Steely and righteous. She believed in herself, I could tell.

::So be it,: she accepted, even if the lines in her face belied her irritation. ::Revan, Malak must be stopped. We have a few hours while he remains unaware. The ship in front of you can take you straight to me. He expects you to dock at the primary landing bay on the Star Forge, but while he has been deep in meditation I have opened a smaller dock. An officer’s private one, right next to the ventral wing I am occupying. There is no one here but me – I am not taking chances with your life that I do not have to.:,

“No, you just want her to travel, alone, back to the evil artefact that corrupted her in the first place,” Jolee grumbled. “I think there’s a flaw in your plan, there.”

Bastila ignored him. She was completely focused on me, now. ::Go. You will be earlier than he expects, and not in the location he expects. Malak doesn’t understand the power we wield together.:: Her eyes narrowed. ::The threat remains, Revan. If you are still uncertain... well, we can decide what to do with the Star Forge afterward. But first we must master it to defeat Malak.:,

I didn’t want to grasp the mantle of the Star Forge again. But what if it’s the only way? The only way to defeat Malak? The only way powerful enough to stand against whatever is out there?

Last time... I had failed. So badly, so horribly- how could I risk that again?

I have to stop Malak. I have to save Bastila. If there was no other way getting to her but this... and if I could arrive before Malak expected- with the element of surprise on our side-

“I can’t let you do this, Revan.” Jolee’s voice was low and serious, all traces of his customary irreverence gone. I found myself turning, once more, to face the others. “You have the self-awareness to realize what will happen if you travel alone into the heart of darkness. Alone, to your bond-sister, who is conflicted herself-”

::Stay out of this, stranger!: Bastila decried. ::You know nothing::

“I didn’t stand in your way in the Shadowlands,” Jolee spoke, his words rolling over Bastila’s. Jolee had stepped forward, close to me now. He looked grim. “When you went after the Star Map alone. Twice, as it turns out. But this is different, and you darn well know it. We go to the Forge together.”

::Revan!: Bastila commanded, snagging my attention once more. ::You stay behind and Malak can pick you off at his leisure! There is no way off Lehon other than in my starship!:,

“There is another way off this planet,” Jolee contradicted.

::You think Carth Onasi can fly through the scrambler?: Bastila said with disbelief. ::Even if that is true, you fly in the Ebon Hawk and you will be immediately shot down. Malak wins. You stay behind on Lehon, and Malak wins. The only way forward, that has any chance of success, is getting into that snubfighter and leaving now.:: Her eyes flashed. ::I reviewed its schematics. It has advanced cloaking technology – you can hide yourself from even the sensors of the Star Forge itself. But the longer you delay, the more risk you bring to your life, to the lives of everyone- to the Jolee snorted, and I could feel the weight of his scrutiny settling on me. “Greater risk is letting you run off alone again, young pup. And I think you know that.”

I stumbled back a pace, closer to Bastila. My lips were dry. My thoughts spun like the vortex of a tornado. It was hard to rasp the words out- “I know it’s better for our team to travel together, but Bastila has a point about the Ebon Hawk. And Malak. If I can get there before he expects-”

“Revan.” Juhani’s velvet voice held a deep thrum of intensity, enough that my gaze slipped to hers. “I agree with Jolee. You recall what Korriban was like, how we struggled against the influence of that dark planet... and how we had each other to lean on, there. Going to the Star Forge alone is unwise... more than unwise. It is perilous to your soul.”

There was a heaviness seething inside me. A tingling on my skin, as if events were converging together, intersecting into an unavoidable nexus.

And, in my mind, the irritation from my bond-sister was mounting, transforming into hot anger at the continued interference of the others.

I cut in before Bastila could. “The ‘Hawk’s repairs are not finished, are they?” I asked, my voice low, holding Juhani’s slanted gaze. The Cathar’s slight grimace gave the answer away. “So Malak will likely wake before our ship is space-worthy, and rip our intentions from Bastila’s mind. There’s no way the ‘Hawk alone can clear a fleet of Sith snubs.”

Bastila’s argument was beginning to coalesce into sense- that our only chance was right now, to take the charge to Malak, before he was awake, before he was aware-

“Lass.” The moniker, spoken deep and low, had me turning back to Jolee. His expression was fixed. “I will not stand aside if you try to board that ship.”

I felt the frown as it furrowed into my forehead. Puzzled, I stared at him, taking another step backwards, closer to the starship, further from Jolee- until both he and Juhani were in my field of vision.

“Wh-what?” I stuttered, not sure if I could believe my own ears. “Are you saying you’ll- you’ll try and stop me?”

Juhani, on Jolee’s other side, looked as serious as the old man. My frown deepened as my attention darted between them both. “Seriously?” I almost choked on the word.

Jolee nodded. It was no more than an abrupt, jerk of the head. “I’ve seen the horrors the Sith under Kun’s banner unleashed on the galaxy. Your time as Sith Lord was just as bad.” There was something in his gaze that- that- I didn’t think Jolee blamed me, exactly, for the past- but he was the sort to demand accountability. As he should. As everyone should. “Don’t do this, lass. I don’t want to, but I’ll fight you if I have to.”

::This is not about leading the Sith, you old fool!:: Bastila cried. There was an impassioned edge to her voice. She was thwarted, frustrated, angry... and I couldn’t help but empathize with her. The emotions resonated between us. ::This is about stopping Malak!::

“Bastila desires you to retake the Star Forge,” Juhani declared. “There is no coming back from that, no deciding to walk away afterward, no matter what Bastila claims. And I... I cannot look away if that is your intention, Revan.”
They do not comprehend what is at stake, Revan! This is why you walked away from the Order once before... because they are blind and weakened by fear!

I couldn’t- I couldn’t deny Bastila, but there was no way I could cut down my friends to achieve my goals-

You do not need to cut them down, Revan! Just get to the snubfighter! Their misguided intentions cannot be allowed to stop us from doing what we must. Otherwise Malak has already won- and the Force has already begun its death.

The hiss of a lightsaber activating cut through the air, froze my thoughts, curled my fingers tight against my thighs-

A green blade that pierced a bright light, overwhelming the dim glow of the holo-projection.

It was wielded by Yudan.

He has Zhar’s lightsaber, I thought dumbly. Yudan was between the others, but some metres further back, his gaze still pinned on mine. There was no perceivable emotion on his damned, detached face. He’s made the first move. He’s standing with them – against me – if I choose to follow Bastila.

I couldn’t do this-

Then slowly, deliberately, Yudan moved his head to stare at Jolee. “Revan can make her own choices.” His words rang out loud and clear. “I shall not allow anyone to take away her right to decide.”

A cut-off gasp from Juhani, a puff of surprised air from the old man-

“You’ll fight against me?” Jolee said, jerking back slightly, his voice higher-pitched than normal. My stunned gaze darted back to the old man; he was facing Yudan, now. “After everything, sonny, you would allow Revan to walk back into darkness?”

“Free will, old man,” Yudan intoned. “That is something I have always believed in. You are not allowing Revan that.”

My mind was stuck, a block of permacrete in my head, as I stared wildly between the three of them.

Surprise mingled with approval though my connection to the Force. To Bastila. He, of all people, actually has the right of it, she murmured. One of your old followers, who fell just as surely as you did.

Jolee’s brows slammed down. “It is my choice to stop Revan making the same idiotic decision she did years ago. Just as she still has a choice- to back away, or cut me down on her way to this darn Star Forge.” He swung back to face me. “Revan, you getting in that ship alone will end in only one place: darkness. You might as well strike me down now – you’ll be killing a lot more down that path.”

::You have a greater strength of will than this geriatric claims, Revan. It is not like before. This time you are aware of the dangers. This time you will be stronger – for you have me. And I am not Malak.:: Bastila’s voice dropped. ::Together, we have the power to stop him... and to face what lurks in the Unknown Regions.::
“Bastila,” Juhani’s voice raised in challenge. “It does not matter how you justify this. You must know, deep inside your heart, where this will lead. I shall do all in my power to stop Revan from once more falling.”

And the sheer of dark blue plasma dawned from the hilt in the Cathar’s grasp.

We can master the Star Forge, Revan, and still remain true to ourselves. We must, for the sake of the galaxy. ::Stand down, Cathar!:: Bastila called out in frustration. ::You do not understand- this is beyond the Republic- this is the fate of the galaxy!::

“Stopping what you found in the Unknown Regions,” Yudan announced. He was scrutinizing Bastila’s image over my shoulder, but his eyes narrowed suddenly and snapped back to mine. “That was your purpose, once before, in claiming the Star Forge. I will never follow Darth Revan again.”

His gaze bored into me; the silence hung thick in the air for a short, pregnant moment. “But it was Revan Freeflight who first claimed the Star Forge... not Darth Revan.”

My mind shook. Was it? Are you so sure about that, Yudan? The brief recollections of the temple ascent once more flooded my mind; it had been me, I hadn’t fallen, not quite, not yet- but there’d been a colder, darker edge to my thoughts-

_Maybe all that means is I have a better chance this time around- as Bastila believes-

“Whatever you found beyond known space convinced you this was necessary. Convinced all your followers. I pledged my allegiance to you, Revan. So make your decision.” Yudan didn’t blink. He didn’t move either, still holding that green ‘saber tight in a defensive guard. “I shall follow you either way.”

Yudan Rosh was, by all accounts, unbendingly loyal to you once, Revan. One of your most gifted generals, one of the strongest Jedi Thirteen. If you believe you can still trust him-

“You have a chance to walk away, Jolee Bindo.” Yudan’s voice was flat. Cold. Remote. “You, too, Cathar. But I shall not stand aside if you lift your lightsabers against Revan. And you both know I will win.” His hand lifted, his ‘saber pointed directly at the old man from Kashyyyk.

“There is no death, Yudan Rosh,” Juhani shot back. There was an undercurrent in her voice, the slightest hint of a feline snarl. “I am disappointed that you would choose this side. But I shall remain true to my values, no matter what price I must pay. I-” Her voice faltered, her slanted gaze slipped back to mine. “I stand in the light, Revan. Stay in the light with me.”

::There shall be no light if there is no one strong enough to hold back the darkness!:: Bastila cried. I felt her will surge through the bond, her emotions buffet against mine. ::You know this to be the truth, Revan! Do not allow an old fool and a misguided Jedi to bring about the downfall of the galaxy! For that is what their interference threatens!::

Jolee sighed heavily as he faced me. I flinched when, at last, a bright green activated in his grasp. “Come back to us, lass. I ain’t standing if you take another step closer to that cursed snubfighter.”

“And I will cut you down if you attempt to stop her,” Yudan said coldly.

Juhani’s profile turned, her nose upraised in the air, her fingers tightening on her ‘saber hilt as her attention fixed on the Twi’lek.

The four of us, spread out like a diamond, three deadly beams of light. And me, whose hands were entirely empty.

For once in my cursed life, I had absolutely no idea what to do.

xx

Chapter End Notes

Coming up next: Canderous wakes up to find half the crew gone. Without wrist-comms. Kriffing again.
Big thanks to kosiah for the beta and support. Much, much appreciated.
"Ordo."

It was Onasi's voice that had me waking, thoughts snapping logically into order. The ship's repairs must be complete. It's time to get moving.

There was always that sense of feral urgency – anticipation, really – when heading into combat. Battle lust zinging through the blood, sharpening the mind, knowing it could be the end, but a glorious one-

And what was flying to the Star Forge to take on Darth Malak – fighting next to Revan herself – but a glorious way to live or die?

It was when my feet hit the durasteel floor that I realized something had gone balls-up.

The old man's not in his bunk. Neither is Rosh. And, hovering over me, pissed-off panic in every line of his body, was Onasi – who should've been warming up the engines or something useful had things gone according to plan.

"What the kriff is going on?" The words came out in a growl as I reached for my boots.

My gaze stilled on the damned empty bunks in front of me. I didn't have to bet a pile of creds as to who else was missing – I already knew.

Revan. Haar'chak kriffing Jedi!

Minutes later, I strode into the central hub of the freighter; fully armoured, jaw set, heart pumping steadily as my mind zeroed in on exactly what crap had exploded where. The weakest link in our crew was obvious to me, and so it was a surprise to see Carth's kid standing awkwardly in front of the gloop machine, instead of also missing. Mission was sleepily rubbing her eyes in his shadow.

Kid Onasi shot me a furtive glance. "Um. Dad's just getting Zaalbar." He folded his arms, all defensive and wound up like a slink-spring about to let go.

"I can't believe they've gone," Mission mumbled. "I should... I mean, sheesh, it's not the first-"

"Clarify," I barked. "Who's they? Rosh, Bindo... Revan?"

"Juhani, too." Mission was nodding, eyes downcast as she leaned against the wall at Sithkid's side. She sounded more subdued than customary – and that just pissed me off all the more.

"Tell me they took a wrist-comm," I growled, as the stern hatch opened on my left. "Tell me someone took a kriffing comm!"
"No." Onasi had returned through the door, Carpet hot on his heels, and he sounded just as furious as me. "First thing I checked when Dustil woke me."

"No," I echoed, barking a laugh- but it wasn't funny in the slightest. Oh, I was gonna knock some heads together when we caught up with the others. Revan, you better have a damn good reason for leaving us behind!

The Wookiee rumbled something that caused Mission to push off against the wall and walk to him, one hand reaching out for his furry arm.

"You were only half-coherent when you woke me, Dustil," Onasi stated. The anger in his voice had firmed into a hard-edged command, levelled directly at his spawn. "We're all here, now. Tell us what happened."

"Revan ran," Dustil muttered. "The others- we all woke up- and, they went after her."

"Where? To this temple we're planning to blow up?" I stared hard at the boy, but he refused to meet my gaze- or his dad's, for that matter. "How long ago?"

"The temple, yes, but I-I don't know how much time has passed."

"He said that bastard Rosh knocked him out," Onasi cut in, before I had a chance to growl at the stupidity of the answer. It was then that I noticed the blaster held tight in Onasi's grip, the mesh armour he was already wearing, the glint of purpose hardening his face. He was about as willing as I was to be left behind.

My gaze slid back to his son. "You said Revan's the one who ran. So, she fell under this mystic spell you lot are so enraptured by? With the way your eyes glazed over the other day, boy, I find it hard to believe that Revan's the one who crumbled."

Sithkid's head snapped up, the fire of anger apparent in the deep lines of his scowl. "Well, she did, okay? She ran... she'd already gone by the time that damned voice woke us all-"

Carpet howled. Mission mumbled something, sinking into his side. Onasi cursed under his breath- "Voice?" I snapped. "You mean to tell me this pyramid is talking to you lot now?"

"We have to extract them and then blow the blasted thing up," Carth muttered. "Dammit, Revan! How could you run, after everything-"

But his son was shifting awkwardly on his feet, his temper vanishing as something close to embarrassment burned his cheeks. "Um, maybe what I said- maybe it's not entirely fair to Revan-frakk. I can't believe I just said that-"

Onasi blinked. "Dustil-"

"Spit it out. Now!" I demanded.

Kid Onasi shot me an almost-hostile look. "It wasn't the Force-beacon talking to us, or whatever you're thinking. The voice was speaking to Revan- only Revan- it was just so powerful that the rest of us heard it." He bit his lip, looking uncertain. "Juhani said it was Bastila Shan."

Bastila. The name was a shock. Oh, I'd thought of the princess often since her capture, but I'd never known how much to believe in the Force-vooodoo between her and Revan. Revan had confirmed Bastila'd been having a hard time, but little else- and that bit of intel wasn't exactly galaxy-shattering in revelation. I knew they could speak to each other with their minds, but...

My eyes narrowed. Bastila had been a prisoner for over a month. Young, softly-bred woman like her- she would've broken by now. She's lured Revan away. Question is, why the kriff did Revan listen?

There was another howl from Zaalbar, this one more insistent than the last.

"We'll get her back, Big Z," Mission soothed, empty words considering half the damn crew were gone. "We'll get them both back."

"Bastila..." Onasi trailed off. Just like that, the fight leached out of him as he wearily scrubbed at his face. "The bond... I- Revan's been worried... Dustil- what exactly did you hear from- from Bastila?"

"I heard her say it wasn't a trap," Sithkid muttered. "It's what woke me. I think Juhani heard more. She- she thought Bastila's state of mind was- was- and then Yudan Rosh said it was a frakking trap and Revan was an idiot and waking up the rest of us would only slow them down-" His jaw clenched.

"Huh," I grunted. "I've seen how fast those Force-bastards can travel, so I might actually be with Rosh on this one. Except that shabuir should've kicked us awake before leaving. Doesn't make any sense to knock you out, either." As I stared, a dull red darkened the boy's smooth cheeks once again. He held my gaze, this time, but it was obvious there was still more to his damn story. "Why'd he knock you out, Sithkid?"

Dustil looked over to his dad, who had a firm, uncompromising look on his face. I was one step away from shaking the boy, myself, when Dustil sighed. A heavy gust of air that signified defeat. His shoulders sagged and his head dropped.

"To stop me following, I think," Dustil mumbled. "I said I could help, and then all three of them looked at me like- like I was the biggest liability- and next thing I knew I was lying face first on the frakking ground and they'd long gone."

"To stop you following?" Onasi's voice had deepened. "Rosh knocked you out- you didn't tell me that before."

The boy's jaw tightened, but his head stayed bowed.

There was no denying we had to get a move on- maybe old man Bindo and Juhani and Rosh had this under control- but I wasn't counting on it and, somehow, I didn't think Onasi was, either. But for the first time since I'd met Onasi's difficult, resentful kid, I actually felt a wedge of sympathy for him.

Staring down at the ground, a mixture of shame and belligerence hunching his shoulders up to his ears, I could see that despite the boy's issues with just about everything – he wanted to prove his worth. Like a young Mando'ade unblooded in battle, Kid Onasi wanted to race after the others and throw his might at the enemy.

He ain't exactly a weakling, either. Can't forget all he got up to on the Leviathan.

The dumbest thing Dustil Onasi could've done upon waking was run after the others – but he hadn't. He'd woken his dad up instead – and I didn't think it was from a sense of fear. Maybe the boy was learning to think things through.

Onasi's gaze shifted to mine. We stayed silent, and I knew he'd come to the same conclusion as me.
His son was the only Force-user left on the ship, but there was no denying he was a liability. I could still see Sithkid's nose in the air, his eyes unfocused like a spice junkie, as he failed to see or hear anything until Revan had slammed him backwards with the kriiffing Force.

Dustil Onasi may have kept control of himself since then, but there was no telling what getting closer to this pyramid would do to him. Yet... I didn't want to crush the whining boy's pride, either.

You're getting soft, Ordo.

"We can't leave the ship undefended," I said abruptly, swinging my gaze to Zaalbar. "How's the repairs going, Carpet?"

He answered, a long and low rumble, followed by a shaggy shake of the head that looked entirely too negative for my peace of mind.

"Slow," Mission translated, her voice muffled as she leaned against him. "The patching's done, but Teethree's worried it'll explode." A short howl drowned out the rest of her words, and she pulled back, rolling her eyes at Zaalbar in an echo of her normal sass. "Okay, okay. They're worried about the integrity of the fuel tank, and that it might explode further along." Another rumble had her huffing and poking him in the side. "Sheesh, Big Z, rupture or explode, what does it matter?"

"How long until we're done?" Onasi demanded.

"Big Z says maybe another six hours?" Mission relayed after a long series of howls. Her voice was tentative. "Canderous got him enough material, but there's another spot- Teethree's scans show a weakness in the metal seam from the collision... they're worried it might tear when you re-pressurize the fuel tank."

Haar'chak! My gaze snagged on Onasi's again; he was frowning in consternation. They said four hours before we went to sleep!

"The longer we're on this damn planet, the longer we're a blind target," I said. "We gotta keep the speed on the repairs."

"Yes," Onasi rapped out in agreement. "Any minute the Republic fleet could be jumping out of hyperspace – and straight into the scrambler. We can't help them until I can manually launch the 'Hawk and target the temple... but- but we have to get the others away from there, first."

Zaalbar roared. Short, sharp and loud.

"Big Z's going after Jen," Mission said quietly. "He- it's the lifedebt. You won't be leaving him behind."

There was no denying the Wookiee's strength in a fight, but I didn't want the astromech fixing the 'Hawk without assistance. "Trashcan's gonna need another set of hands or we'll be here forever. Ad'ika, you're the only one who can understand him. I need you under the ship helping him."

"And Dustil can protect the two of you," Onasi added. "While you're busy working-"

"Hey, I don't need protection-" Mission flared.

Dustil glared at his father. "You're only saying that to make me stay behind-

"Dustil, we need the ship repaired as quickly as we can. Ordo's right." Onasi's jaw had firmed as he stared down his son. "There's enough Force-users already after Revan, it makes sense to leave one with the ship. We send muscle after them-

"I can help!" the boy implored. "Dammit, Dad, I'll be nothing but useless while Mission and Teethree fix the ship-"

"A true warrior knows his own strengths and weaknesses," I snapped, slamming an armoured glove down hard on the table. Sithkid jumped, his gaze swinging back to me. "You're susceptible to this kriffing Force temple – you're a blind utreekov if you pretend otherwise. And we'd be a pack of di'kuts if we didn't leave someone behind to guard our only way off this damn planet."

"This planet's deserted," he muttered. "You're just-"

"You think I'm saying words for fun, boy?" I growled as my impatience surged. "Our sensors – the ones that actually work – only show the immediate area. We don't know enough about this place to equivocally state it's deserted. But I have seen your abilities. Guarding home base is just as vital as leading the vanguard, and you're a powerful warrior in your own right. As long as you stop whining about everything and focus."

I wasn't the sort to waste bolstering words on weaklings. And while I might label Onasi's son any number of uncomplimentary words, weakling was not one of them. Not since the Leviathan.

... The Sith armour sat tight around my waist, tight enough that I was concerned about it hampering my manoeuvrability. There's prison guards in the next room, Ordo. This suit's better than nothing. Wander in there half-naked and one shot will drop you. I grimaced, feeling my head pound, my thigh throb, and the superficial grazes over my torso sting like a swarm of sugar-bees.

I'd been worse off – more than once – but I knew if I didn't find a stim or painkiller soon then my injuries were gonna compromise matters. Especially my damn leg, where those Czerka di'kuts had got the better of me back on Kashyyyk.

Zaalbar howled something, waving a blaster around, as he crouched over the two corpses Kid Onasi had sliced effortlessly into pieces.

"Nothing else on the bodies," Mission translated. She was hovering behind him, wearing the armour suit of the smaller guard. Good thing, too, because she'd been just as under-dressed as me – and I had the feeling things were gonna get hairier than Zaalbar's furry arse once we left the prison cell.

And, at least now that she was wearing more than just her damn underwear, Kid Onasi might stop blushing whenever he looked her way.

"No matter. We gotta move." My words were brisk, and I motioned the others closer. There was only so long before one of the guards outside tried the hatch, or ran a wary eye over the forged vid-feed-

Someone banged heavily on the other side of the only exit.

"Time's up," I muttered, before jabbing at the wrist-comm that Sithkid had been using earlier to get to us. "Trashcan, send a malfunction report through to the next room, informing them there's a fault with the hatch to our containment cell. Say that maintenance has been despatched." It should be enough to stop the guards next door from sending out an alert – at least, for the next few minutes.
I looked over the three allies I had to work with. Somehow, we had to get from this prison complex to the suite of interrogation rooms where Revan and the others were being held. It was only three floors up from here, but we had little in the way of armament – and I couldn't discount how my own injuries would impact my abilities.

My gaze fixed on the young man who'd just broken us out. "Can you do that hiding trick again, boy?"

He stared at me before nodding firmly. His fingers tightened on his deactivated glow-stick.

"Right. Here's the plan. Trashcan reports there's five guards in the next room. I'll get him to seal all exits, then we'll open this one and Dustil will take the lead." I could see Mission steeling herself next to the Wookiee, but it was the Sithkid I kept my attention on. He'd done damn well to get us out of the cells without being seen, but now I needed to use him in outright combat. "Dustil, you go straight for the soldiers further back in the room. Carpet, give your blaster to Mission – you'll be taking out the closest Sith with your fists. Mission and I will follow with covering fire. We all good?"

Mission swallowed, nodding a little shakily. Zaalbar handed her the lightweight blaster he'd frisked, hilt-first, before rumbling something and striding towards the exit.

"I'm ready," Dustil said in a low voice, standing next to the Wookiee. "Don't shoot, though. Not unless you have to. You might get me instead." He gave me one last intent look, before vanishing in front of my eyes.

The boy had a point. "Ad'ika, we cover Carpet. Only Carpet. Don't go firing wildly unless you want to hit Sithkid."

"Yep," she whispered, stepping closer to me. "Got it, Canderous."

"We'll secure the next room, grab whatever equipment we find, and move on to the others," I said. "They're counting on us, and we damn well won't let them down."

Mission's chin lifted. Zaalbar roared in agreement. I stared back down at the wrist-comm. "Trashcan, seal all exits of the next room, and disable the defense turrets and surveillance." There was a heavy minute of silence before the bucket droid beeped an assent that translated as confirmation on the small screen. "Now, open the cell hatch."

The door hissed as it opened.

I had no way of knowing where Sithkid was, and instead placed myself behind the towering form of Zaalbar as he barrelled into the room. My focus narrowed down the scope of the standard-issue blaster; five marks – all armoured Sith – the nearest one straightening in surprise just before he copped a hairy limb to the head.

The Sith's scream was drowned out by the cracking noise of shattering plasticeel as Zaalbar's fist pounded again and again through his helm.

My aim moved immediately to the next mark, who was running straight for the Wookiee's back with an upraised vibroblade. A double-tap of my gun crackled against a blue energy shield; at my side, Mission opened fire in unison. The guard stumbled as his blue-white shield dispersed; my next flurry of bolts smashed the neckpiece of his armour suit right open.

The Wookiee roared, spinning around, before laying a wild roundhouse into the faltering Sith.
I wrenched my attention deeper into the room as Zaalbar flattened the second mark. Standing awkwardly over three prone corpses, a red 'saber in his grasp and a fierce glint in his eye, was the visible form of Dustil Onasi.

Mand'alor's balls! He'd taken out three guards quicker than the rest of us had neutralized the other two. I'd seen – and firmly discounted – the use of stealth belts in combat. They had nothing on this clever trick of Dustil Onasi's.

And it seemed his sword arm wasn't too shoddy, either.

...

We'd run into heavier fire before we'd finally made it to the interrogation rooms, where we'd found Onasi, Juhani, and the old man – all prone on the lilac floor until Mission shot them full of stims we'd looted on the way there.

I'd taken another hit, by then, and was barely walking myself. It'd been a close call, more than once, as we blasted through the enemy cruiser. And it was Kid Onasi who'd led the way; sometimes hidden, always with that red bar of death in his grasp, silently obeying my snapped orders as he cut through most of the enemy and Zaalbar mopped up the remainder.

There was no denying that Dustil Onasi worked a lot better under pressure than he did when he had time to whine about his life.

"You got us off the Leviathan, boy. Hold the damn ship. Stop feeling sorry for yourself, and hold the damn ship."

"We need you here, Dustil," Onasi said, his voice low and resolute. "You wanted to be part of this. That means you put your personal opinions aside and do what's required. I need to be able to trust the 'Hawk's covered."

"Okay." The boy swallowed, and lifted his chin. All traces of resentment had vanished, and his nod of agreement was firm. He stared at us steadily. "I won't let you down. Either of you."

"Armour up, the both of you," I rapped out, inclining my head at Mission. "Then grab a kriffing comm and go help the astromech. Ad'ika, you do whatever Trashcan needs to get the 'Hawk fixed as fast as possible."

"Dustil, keep your eye on a bio-scanner," Onasi added. "Make sure nothing catches you unawares, and stay within sight of the landing ramp. I'll be in touch over the comm."

"Sure." Kid Onasi nodded again. "I'll go- just, be safe, okay Dad? Let the Force-users do- whatever they need-"

"Go," I snapped, suddenly impatient. "Get your kit on, and get to work."

The kids left, and Onasi and I stared at each other, grim and resolute and ready, as the Wookiee rumbled something incomprehensible. The three of us made a tough trio – if we were up against anything other than kriffing Force powers.

We don't know the area. Only the general direction of this damn temple. We'd have to rely on comms back to the 'Hawk-unless there was someone else who might know something about this cursed place-

My thoughts spun quickly. And another gun in the hold is always a good thing.
"Carpet, get yourself armed," I ordered the Wookiee. "I'll grab a belt full of grenades. No telling what we're gonna run into."

"I'll get medkits and visors," Onasi added. "And a bio-scanner. It's still dark out, we need to make sure we know which way to go-"

"Leave that to me," I ground out, feeling a feral grin spawn on my face. "I've got an idea."

xXx

Crimson photoreceptors flared to life as HK's head swivelled in my direction.

"Greeting: I am-"

"We're on the only planet in the Lehon system," I interrupted, not interested in any sort of deranged waffle that Revan had once programmed into him. "Are you familiar with it?"

There was a slight whirring from the robot before he answered. "Query: Does the master wish to travel to the defense structure of the Star Forge?"

I grunted at his acknowledgment of the pyramid. "So, you've some knowledge of the area, at least. Can you lead us to the damn structure?"

HK's angular head cocked; if he'd been a sent, I would've expected a puzzled look of curiosity. "Acknowledgment: If the master commands me to perform the belittling duties of a tourist guide, then my programming has no option but to comply, even under duress."

"Here's the thing, Tinhead," I cut in, leaning forward. "I remember how you ran off in the Shadowlands, last time Revan played truant. This time you're taking orders from me."

"Statement: My primary objective is the safety of the master." His head canted even further, while his unblinking electronic gaze stayed pinned on mine. "Inference: The master has once more disappeared into danger. Primary objective initiating-"

"You take one step on your own and I'll shove that triangle head of yours down your own gullet," I growled. "We're leading an extraction to rescue your damn master, and if your aim is Revan's safety then the best thing you can do is follow my orders and lend supporting fire. Don't test me, Tinhead, or you'll find yourself marooned on this chivhole of a planet while I have all the fun killing the enemy on the Forge."

I wasn't really gonna disable HK if he was determined to do things his own way, as the one thing I could count on was his loyalty to Revan. But if I couldn't trust his back in a firefight, then the droid could damn well rot on this beach while we took to the skies.

"Observation: You are a harsh, harsh taskmaster. I like you more already."

The hatch to the cargo bay opened, and Onasi took two strides in before stilling.

"Oh no," he said. "You're not taking that thing-"

Behind him, Zaalbar walked in, huffing with disapproval as he also spotted the droid.

"Commentary: Geriatric Blockhead has wisely deduced that you frail meatbags require my superior assistance." There was a clicking noise as HK withdraw a blaster rifle and cocked it. "Mockery: It is beyond my processing power to account for your survival before I entered your meaningless lives."

"He knows the area, and he's loyal to Revan," I pointed out when Onasi's frown landed on me.

"Fine," Onasi grumbled. "Maybe his shields will fail and enemy fire will take him out." He shot HK a look of intense dislike. "Again."

There was an electronic squawk of protest from the droid. "Indignation: The first time that occurred, I had no shielding to fail, about which I had already warned the master. As for the second time: you fell to Calo Nord's offensive the same as I did."

"Only twice?" Onasi muttered. "I seem to recall you were a heap of useless metal after Korriban-"

"Retort: That had nothing to do with my shields, Paranoid Has-Been. Did your half-blind, organic eye-receptors fail to see that my head had been removed-"

"I'll remove your head from your-"

"Children," I growled, a second before the Wookiee rumbled something that was probably the Shyriiwook equivalent. "Shut your traps and focus on what's important." I levelled an irritated scowl at Onasi; to his credit, he looked somewhat sheepish.

"I checked in with Teethree," Onasi stated, turning his attention back to me as he tightened a strap on a small backpack. "The Hawk's external scanners are useless with the scrambler active, but Teethree's picking up an electromagnetic spike six klicks from here. That'll be where we need to go."

"Confirmation: The radiation is the emittance of the kaiburr housed within the defense structure of the Star Forge. Even a portable paperweight should be able to sense that."

I glanced back to HK, and wondered just how long his obedience would last without a direct order from Revan. "What else can you tell us about this place, Tinhead?"

"Statement: Now that my memory core is fully unlocked, I can access the navigational charts of Lehon and the schematics of the Rakatan structures from my databanks. Elucidation: This planet was once the homeworld of the Rakatan species. They used a transmutation technology to convert Force-power into other forms of energy. On Lehon it was converted into a sector-wide EMP scrambler that disabled any starships missing their designated decryption protocols." The droid gave a mechanical shrug of indifference. "Commentary: While the Rakatan were both ingenious and innovative in their use of kaiburr-enhanced Force, they failed to fully account for the cerebral and biological side-effects of such constant immersion in transmuted Force power. It is simply another indication of the superiority of artificial life-forms."

"Force power," I muttered. "Makes sense. And I think I can guess the side-effects, judging by the impact it had on Sithkid."

"You've been on this planet before?" Onasi said, his voice abrupt as he stared hard at the droid.

"Negative: I have not personally walked upon Lehon's surface."

"Revan uploaded this intel into your head," I surmised, rolling my eyes. Haar'chak, to think how much shorter this mission could've been, had we all known the truth back on Tatooine."

"Speculation: While the master did not divulge her reasons for storing this intelligence in my databanks, my hypothesis is that her motive was to provide an alternative route to access the Star Forge, should it be compromised. The information I have is locked to be released only to those I calculate as fully loyal to the master's well-being." The robot sniffed. "Reluctance: Despite your obvious biological deficiencies, I suppose I can consider you all to fall within those parameters. For now."

Probably, HK meant for it to sound ominous. But I'd heard too much of his thinly-veiled threats for it to hold any water, and I highly doubted it had any effect on the others, either.

"Let's get a move on," Onasi said, his voice gruff. "We can always grill Psycho-droid on the way."

xXx

"Okay," Onasi muttered into his wrist-comm, acknowledging his son's report of absolutely nothing. "We're about a klick away. I'll check in with you when we reach the pyramid."

The forest we traipsed through was low-lying; a tangle of dry brambles that wasn't the easiest for humanoids to clamber through. Zaalbar led the way, forcefully clearing a path for the rest of us to follow, the vegetation posing no challenge beneath his muscle.

::Right. Talk to you then,:: Sithkid returned, before Carth's comm switched off.

"Commentary: Internal bio-scanners are sensing nine mink-rats within close proximity of our position," the droid droned. My visor picked up the small, swift blur of a projectile the same time as a faint thwacking noise resounded through the air. "Amendment: Eight mink-rats now within close proximity."

"What, killing the native fauna now?" Onasi's voice was laced with disgust. "It's no surprise you're a creation from the blasted Forge, with all your gratuitous killing."

I hadn't heard Onasi's reaction to HK's origins, but I highly doubted it'd been a positive one. Frankly, I was surprised the Republic pilot wasn't, once more, calling out for the droid's scrapping. Onasi generally allowed his tedious moralistic principles to override his pragmatism, but maybe in this case he was smart enough to concede HK's usefulness had its place in our team.

"Objection: The Rakatan considered the mink-rat species to be a native pest. Without their presence to keep the rodent population in check, one could argue that I am merely providing a planetary duty." The damn droid sounded far too smug for that argument to hold any weight. An irritated howl from the Wookiee seemed to agree with my observation.

"Retort: Taking pride in my prowess does not make me evil, Mobile Carpet. In fact, from a nauseatingly emotional viewpoint, it is merely one route to an ephemeral form of happiness."

"These Rakatan," Onasi cut in. "What happened to them?"

"Conjecture: The answer to that is not conclusively known. There are theories of some sort of plague decimating that Rakatan population, but the odds for that to drive a galaxy-dominant species to near-extinction are mathematically unfeasible. Commentary: It was the master's belief, once, that the Rakatan suffered from too much Force-exposure, and may have inadvertently caused their own demise with their experiments. Perhaps it was a combination of both, or some other unknown factor."

"She thought that, back then," Onasi whispered as he strode in front of me. His steps suddenly seemed faster, angrier. "And she still did what she did, despite believing the Rakatan had dabbled too far."
"Revan had a reason," I replied to him, hearing the gruffness in my own voice. "She may not remember it, and it may not have worked out how she planned... but she had a reason. We both know that."

"She was wrong, whatever it was," Onasi returned bluntly. "Nothing good can come from that Forge."

I shrugged, unwilling to encourage the pilot's melodrama. My gaze returned to the droid, striding in front of me, ducking smoothly behind a branch that swung back from the Wookiee's grasp.

"Tinhead," I called out. "You said near-extinction. Are there some of these Rakatan still around, then?"

The droid whirred as he continued walking. "Answer: That is unknown. Four years ago, all Rakatan on this island perished. But Lehon is comprised of many islands and archipelago. There are two landmasses larger than this one, and I have little data on the habitation of them. Extrapolation: There is no evidence of Rakatan surviving elsewhere in the galaxy, and there is no advanced technology of note on this planet – with the exception of the Star Forge's defense structure. One can surmise that if the Rakatan are not yet extinct, then they are surely on the brink of becoming so."

We lapsed into silence, following the Wookiee, as he snapped spindly branches and pushed through dense undergrowth in the dark. It couldn't be too far from dawn, now; the nav-charts gave Lehon an eighteen-hour solar cycle, and it'd been night for at least six hours. Though I had no damn idea about any seasonal fluctuations on this planet.

The jungle was dense enough to block out the light from Lehon's two moons. The visors more than coped for the lack of visibility – not that either the Wookiee or the droid required one.

"HK," Onasi said, some time later. "The scrambler. What's the best way to bring it down?"

"Answer: There is a console at the top of the defense structure that corresponds to one on the Star Forge itself. Either can be used to shut down the transmission of the EMP scrambler."

"Then what's to stop ole Malak from turning it right back on?" I growled. "Not exactly an infallible plan, if that's what Revan's going for."

Zaalbar stopped in front of us, turning to briefly howl something over a furry shoulder before moving on.

"Translation: The Wookiee's opinion, debatable though its value may be, is that the master's primary desire is to rescue Bastila Shan. Obviously the idea of having more than one concurrent objective is a foreign one to his inefficient brain, but, that is hardly surprising."

"It comes right back to blowing up the pyramid," Onasi cut in, his head turning to face me. "That's the only sure-fire way of taking down the scrambler for good."

"Cautionary: While destruction of the kaiburr itself will certainly disable the scrambler, it will also leave it inoperable for when the master once more assumes control of the Star Forge-"

"Revan's not looking to take that cursed thing back over!" Onasi said heatedly. "That blasted factory is getting destroyed, one way or the other!"

Frankly, I didn't care if Revan blew the kriffing thing to bits or appropriated its functions again. I was here for her end-game – to take down Malak. If that meant stealing his ship factory out from under his nose, or exploding it while he stood on it – well, the end result was the same.

Zaalbar halted again, this time long enough that the rest of us stopped as well. He turned around to face us, before rumbling something long and low in Shyriiwook.

"Statement: The Wookiee wants something to eat." There was a howl of protest, loud enough that it made me wonder about the reliability of HK's translation. "Commentary: The bio-organic fuel required to power you meatbags is an obvious design flaw of your life-form. Example: Withhold rotting matter from the Wookiee for a single rotation of this planet, and one could probably coerce him into doing just about anything."

Zaalbar growled, a hand waving in either disagreement of the translation, or simply a desire to dismember the droid.

"Mockery: Your organic flailings amuse me."

"Keep food from the Wookiee, and I think he'd be a lot more likely to rip your arms off than do what you want," I said drily. "What else did he say, Tinhead?"

"Extrapolation:," HK continued. "The Wookiee also points out that we have reached the pyramid."

I stepped sideways, looking beyond Zaalbar to see an immediate thinning of the vegetation.

My fingers tightened on the heavy blaster in my grasp as I prepared to face the unknown. It felt-strange, almost, to go striding into a danger I couldn't even perceive – an enemy that wasn't a group of people to be fought against, but rather a foreign energy that might be screwing with the minds of our Force-sensitive crewmates.

And Bastila Shan.

I couldn't think of the princess as an enemy, but I wasn't blind to the edginess some of the others had whenever her name was mentioned. Dark Side, Light Side... the labels mattered little to me, but it was obvious Revan and Juhani were both deeply concerned about Bastila.

Which made it even more idiotic for Revan to have run off alone. Bastila saved her, though. Just as the Wookiee owes his life to Revan, Revan owes hers to Bastila. That, maybe, I could understand.

"Let's go," Onasi said in a low voice, striding forward to flank Zaalbar.

The treeline completely disappeared within metres, and we were left staring into a large clearing, lit by the same sharp moonlight as on the beach. In the centre of it, rose the oblique pyramid that could be easily seen from the skies.

The angles of the structure were sharp, sharp enough that I guessed its height more than twice the length of its base. The pyramid narrowed to an almost-tip at the top; it was hard to see clearly from the ground, but it looked like a small roof or platform was notched into the very peak of the building.

"Commentary: The kaiburr and its transmuting enclosure are housed within the ground floor of the defense structure. The controlling console is located on the apex of the structure. Observation: I cannot sense any life-forms in the immediate area, but the emittance of kaiburr radiation is interfering with my scanners. I would speculate the master has likely travelled to the apex to gain control over the scrambler."
My eyes narrowed as I kept them fixed on the pinnacle of the building. Is that where Revan was? And the others? Bastila?

A flash of light sparked from the top.

"Hypothesis: The master is currently blasting-"

The light morphed silently into a large fireball; a second later, the cacophony of detonating explosives hit my ears.

"-her enemies-"

Before my stunned eyes, the peak of the pyramid ripped apart beneath the might of what could only be high-grade munitions-

"What in the blazes-"

"Haar'chak!" They're there – or were. They've triggered a damn minefield!

The flames of conflagration receded; another deafening rumble sounded through the air, and beneath the dying flames of what I guessed to be permacrete detonators there was a new shape to the apex of the pyramid.

Something whistled. Debris, firing down from up high, as chunks of the structure's framework were blasted through the air.

"Take cover!" I snarled, spinning around to see Onasi already yanking the Wookiee back into the treeline. Alarm wedged a spike of ice in my gut as I sprinted after them. No matter the droid's rosy belief in his master's superiority, I knew this wasn't her work.

I threw one last look over my shoulder before disappearing back into the vegetation. There was no clear apex anymore – simply an uneven gouge, running metres deep, like a massive claw had taken a swipe to the very top of the pyramid.

An explosion like that – I knew the odds, even for Force-users. If taken unawares, it'd be game over.

_For the love of Mand'alor – Revan, are you still alive?_

_xXx_

Chapter End Notes

_Coming up next: Revan makes a choice. The unexpected happens._
_A thousand thanks to kosiah for the beta._
The silence lay as thick fog; oppressive and heavy between us all.

The scene was almost absurd, like a line of topple-over chits: Juhani facing down Yudan facing down Jolee – who was staring grimly at me.

All were waiting for my next move. All was silent around us.

Except for the clamour in my head.

You do not need to cut Juhani and the old man down, Bastila urged again, as if she believed that to be my only hesitation. Stars knew, it was my primary one, but it certainly wasn’t the whole of it. Knock them out, neutralize them – just do not allow their ignorance to stand in our way!

It wouldn’t be that easy. It wouldn’t be that simple. And I knew Yudan would not act with such restraint.

He’d fallen into a battle-ready stance: muscles tensed, gaze fixed, green ‘saber held at guard.

The lightsaber that had once belonged to Malak’s old master.

Jolee must have pocketed Zhar’s weapon upon leaving the Leviathan – the old man must’ve decided Yudan was worth it after everything – and now Yudan thought to stand against him?

What the frell is Yudan’s game?

He believes in our cause, Revan. Unlike the others, he understands – of course he does. He’s travelled this road with you before.

She was right... but she was wrong, also. Yudan had made clear his primary objective again and again – and did that really fit with allegiance to me while I once more claimed the Star Forge in the name of the galaxy?

My gaze shifted to Juhani. Eyes narrowed, ears laid flat against the side of her head; in the illumination of her royal blue ‘saber, I could almost make out her fine fur quivering on end as she glared fiercely at Yudan. Ready to pounce.
Juhani had been with me since Tatooine, and there was no denying her unyielding stand against the Dark Side. More than perhaps anyone who followed me, I could rely on her loyalty – with the caveat that I stayed true to the right path.

What is the right path, Revan? The sound of a dismissive snort echoed through my mind. Conquerors rewrite history in their own image to justify their actions. You know this. You know things are not black and white – Juhani never will. One poor decision led to her fall, because of her blind conceit that a true Jedi cannot fail. Rather than face the consequences of her actions, she ran away to cower on a foreign planet, believing a single misstep equated her as evil. Juhani is no authority – not on the matters we are dealing with.

Bastila’s voice was a buzzing in my head. An intrusive eye, attempting to shape my indecisive thoughts as I struggled to think everything through-

Of course I am trying to convince you! I have laid my motives bare. We have the stability of the galaxy at stake here, Revan – the galaxy! There was an obvious thread of frustration running through her psychic monologue. Bastila had been concerned this communication would rouse Malak, but her desperation was overriding that now-

Because you are faltering! Due to nothing more than meddlesome ignorance!

Jolee’s mouth thinned. That small action, in the periphery of my vision, drew my attention back to him. He’d been involved in the Exar Kun conflict. He’d seen his wife fall. He understood the pitfalls of pursuing power – no matter the intentions used to rationalize it. Jolee had instigated this stand-off, for all that he had been the last to power on his weapon.

He is willing to lay down his life for his values. I had to respect his tenacity, at least. There was a grim acceptance in Jolee’s expression – for he’d already acknowledged that opposing me would mean his end.

Can I really allow it to come to that?

While your reluctance to confront your friends is admirable, do not forget that two lives balanced against the weight of the whole are meaningless.

But where does it stop? When sacrifice merely begets more sacrifice, and with each death our souls are hardened to the very real cost-

You would prefer to sacrifice the galaxy?

No, no... but I was missing something, here. And Bastila wasn’t helping any. I need a moment, I whispered to my frantic bond-sister. A clamminess stole over my skin as I stared upon the others. One move, right or not, would set everything into action.

If I followed Bastila, the crew would be trapped on Lehon. Carth might be able to launch, but only straight into a Sith bloodbath-

The snubfighter can fit two. Yudan will follow you. The others- it would be better for them to stay on the planet.

-unless the Republic Fleet turned up, but the Fleet had no hope of survival while the EMP scrambler was still active-
The scrambler is controlled on the Forge, Revan. If you so strongly desire it disabled, then it is yet another reason for you to travel here-

-because I’d certainly have time to go traipsing through an alien space station looking for the right controlling mechanism-

What are their lives to you, Revan? Her irritation was mounting, threading like skeins of dark emotion through the mind-link. The Republic forces travel here not just to end Malak, but also you. And myself, by proxy. The only threat they see is the Star Forge itself – which is naught more than a weapon.

My throat dried. Every argument Bastila thrust at me had truth in it, but each word also deepened my unease. What are their lives to me? There was a sense of unreality, of fuzziness fraying at the edges of my concentration as I considered that.

I’d answered Rulan Prolik’s interrogation over loyalty, and my disclosure had surprised me more than him.

Before... beyond the veil of amnesia that clouded my past- I knew I’d once turned against the Republic for valid reasons – with the arrogant intention of building a better, stronger Republic.

Because, once, Republic lives had been important to me.

I felt beads of sweat break out on my neck as the thoughts spun. Once, I’d led the Republic instead of conquering it. Once, I’d been willing to risk everything in the name of defense, of protection – anything I could, to help save as many Republic lives as I could.

Once, there had been nothing more important to me.

...

The Force sang.

I took one step into a massive hangar that stretched forever.

A thousand pinpricks of life shimmered ahead of me.

A thousand star pilots, their nervousness saturating the air as they faced away, listening to a panicked member of the brass trying valiantly to conceal just how badly the Republic was losing.

Flat words spoken to me earlier skimmed through my train of thought. “General Adashan wants us to pull back,” Yudan had said. His tone had been neutral, but I knew him too well to be fooled. Adashan’s sentiment sat as well with him as it did me. “He believes we are too valuable a resource to risk on the frontlines.”

We’d arrived the previous week, all thirteen of us. We burned with righteous determination to do what the High Council would not. If we allowed Adashan to herd us, we’d be of assistance – there was no doubt of that. Vital resources, to augment the midfield.

But thirteen Jedi following a traditional general’s command wouldn’t be enough to hold back the Mandalorians. Adashan lacked the foresight required to change the tide of war... or to upturn the game-board and play a different game entirely.

My fingers clenched around the anonymous mask I’d carried since Cathar.
In the centre of the hangar the officer was still firing out frantic orders. Behind him was line upon line of prepped snubfighters, waiting to launch into the skies.

But there was an undercurrent of fear amongst the crowd, whispering through the matrix of my Force awareness. The grunts out there didn’t believe in victory. They’d hold off the incoming wave of Mando fighters – this one, and the next – but their hearts had lost faith in the Republic prevailing.

In my mind, I could see the drawn cast to Em’s face from the previous day. Her gaze had been bleak as she’d relayed the news. “Kavar has returned to the Core.” She’d struggled to appear unaffected, as I’d struggled to bite back a curse regarding Kavar’s parentage.

His departure hurt Em personally, but worse- it undermined our position with the brass.

The High Council denied my final petition. The Order still refuses outright aid. And now, the military commanders and Senate bureaucrats see that not even a master is willing to lead us.

The Republic would fall. I could see it happening, if things stayed as they were. Traditional, Senate-ordered ripostes were completely ineffectual against Mandalorian shock-tactics and basilisk drops. Outer Rim planets were ceding from the Republic in response to overwhelming civilian casualties, while other sectors were willingly absorbed into the enemy’s ever-growing empire. Our morale was fractured by the waves of soulless refugees that had simply seen too much.

That same morale plummeted as the mystics- the saviours- the heroes that every little kid wanted to be- sat back and did nothing but meditate on a peace the galaxy no longer had.

What good is the Jedi Order, if we don’t protect peace itself?

I still felt the heat of Mal’s firm grasp as it had clasped mine. He’d found me, hours ago, seeing straight through my veneer of calm to the uncertainty that simmered beneath. “All of us followed you here, Revvie.” His whiskey-coloured eyes had been dark with fierce conviction. “Lead, and we will follow. Lead, and show the Republic what it means to fight alongside a Jedi.”

The mask sat heavy in my hand as I stared at the back of a thousand flight helms.

Weeks ago, back on Coruscant, as I’d waited for the Council’s impending denial of my petition, I’d had an idea. It wasn’t a path that appealed to me – but, maybe, it was a path that would give the Republic what they needed. What they deserved.

A faceless hero. A symbol of righteous might. An icon that taunted the enemy with their own face.

My fingers clenched again, and in a sharp movement I lifted the plain Mandalorian mask and placed it over my face.

No rank. Not a master, not a knight.

Just, simply, a Jedi.

The mask was more comfortable than I’d thought. The metal alloy had a certain flex to it that moulded perfectly around my face. With a steely conviction, I pulled up the hood of my grey travelling robe, and drew deeper on the Force.

Deep, deep, deeper.

The sensation was as rich as mola-syrup and as charged as a conduit about to blow. This hangar was the largest on Vanquo, hundreds of metres long; and yet I could trace out the electrical systems of each individual snub in my head; feel the lilt of every turbine compressor as it warmed to life.

Taste the agitation and despair of the crowd as it seeped into the Force. It was a gnawing shakiness eating away at them all, a blackening of morale I had seen everywhere during my renegade year of truancy from the Order.

I was back on the frontlines, now, and this time I meant to stay.

The sound of my boot landing on the ferracrete floor was audible as I took a step closer towards a thousand Republic backs. My next footfall was louder still. The slightest breath on the Force was all I needed to amplify the echo of my strides.

Make an entrance. Make an entrance, and give them something to believe in.

I felt rather than saw when they first became aware of me.

Another, tiny, release of energy; just enough to let the air whip around in a benign display of power.

The crowd turned, the crowd parted, and the brass stuttered into silence.

The officer was a Sullustan, standing on a raised platform addressing the room. His large black eyes widened in astonishment. Commodore stripes marked his shoulder – I vaguely recognized him as Karath’s second.

Directly behind the man was one of the many snubfighters about to be deployed.

My focus narrowed. I lengthened my strides, jogging, running, sprinting with the celerity of the Force – leaping high as an influx of sweet energy boosted me clear over the startled commodore’s head.

I landed on the roof of the fighter, and whirled around to face the crowd.

No title, I reminded myself. No family. No face.

“I am Jedi Revan!” I bellowed, letting another wave of power deepen my voice, carry through to every sentient in the hangar. A vortex of energy swirled, billowing my cape out behind me. A thousand visors stared, transfixed.

In the centre of it all, I felt strangely calm.

“The Republic bleeds. The Republic burns. The Republic cries out for help, and the Jedi are here today to answer that call!”

My free hand clenched tight into a fist. I centred the Force around me in a swirl of visible static that unleashed as a show of bright sparks spitting out from my closed hand.

There were at least a few gasps.

“Imagine a war where we shield you from incoming fire. One in which we sabotage the enemy’s weaponry with a single thought. A war where we detonate mines from a distance, anticipate Mandalorian movements before they occur, and heal mortal wounds within minutes. This is the war I shall bring to you.” I called a ‘saber from my belt; in a showy twist, I thumbed it on before brandishing it in the direction of the far wall. “Myself, and twelve of the best Jedi Knights stand with you, ready to take the battle to the Mandalorians and show them that the Force fights with the Republic!”

My ‘saber was aimed pointedly at the others – for they had followed me in, silently watching from the back of the crowd, far enough away that I couldn’t even pick Mal out from the group. My friends, no more than a group of specks in my vision.

The brown of their robes was still noticeable, though.

There was a shuffling as many turned to look. I settled my awareness deep into the crowd – through the Force, every spark of life was inter-connected, every pinprick made up part of the whole.

And every single one was precious.

I could taste their awe as it began to build. Their fear, as it was slow to recede. And their disbelief – for twelve Jedi, I realized with a start, might not look like much from a distance to those who had never seen Jedi in action before.

I had to make them believe.

“One Jedi alone can change the outcome of a battle!” Reining the Force back in, I tightened it on the mass of durasteel beneath my feet. With my free hand raised aloft, the snubfighter gently rose under my command.

A metre or so, just enough to make a statement.

The Sullustan officer on the platform was quick to scrabble down and disappear into the crowd. A spattering of gasps was audible; the first few lines of soldiers stumbled back from me in caution.

With a slow, measured drop of my hand, the snub returned silently to the hangar floor.

“Thirteen Jedi can do a lot more!” I called out, my voice resonating loud and clear with the Force. “But I stand before you today, before the whole of the Republic itself, and vow this: more Jedi will come. Many more. I have spoken with my brothers and sisters from Coruscant to Taris, and I speak for them now as I promise you: the Jedi have not forsaken the Republic! We stand with you, and we will fight alongside you!”

The words were true, and I unleashed them with all the passion I could muster. I’d talked with many during my disjointed journey to the frontlines. Kavar I’d failed to win over, but other Jedi had listened, had believed. Some were already following in my wake. Some were sitting back to see if we’d follow-through on our defiance of the Council’s decree. Then they’d come, too.

The Jedi hadn’t forsaken the Republic – only the High Council had.

I swung the ‘saber up high, now, pointing to the hangar’s roof like a golden beam of light.

“Up there, in the stars, I will be the first to fly against the Mandalorians. I will ride co-pilot, in this snub beneath my very feet, and show those bastards who dare burn our worlds and enslave our children what the Force is truly made of. I will teach them what it means to attack an enemy with the Force on their side!”

With a deliberate flash of static light, I levelled the ‘saber back down to point at the crowd. “The Force is with me. The Force is with you all. And we will not allow a horde of barbarians to take
All eyes were on me. A battalion of Navy pilots, transfixed, following my every word. A singular focus, stripped of its earlier fear, and ready to be aimed at the enemy. This was what the Republic needed. Faith. “Death comes to us all, but not today. The Republic is worth dying for, but not today. Today, it is their turn. Today, we bring the war to the Mandalorians!”

There was a cheer; ragged, at first, as if half of them had forgotten their voices. It built louder, deeper, rolling into a frenetic, battle-ready echo of defiance.

The growing belief of so many bled into the fabric of the Force like a rich melody of life. I was part of it, as little or as great as every single sent who stood with me.

“Take to the skies! Let’s show those bastards what we stand for! Let’s reclaim our lost worlds! For the Republic!”

The cheer was louder, this time.

I brandished the golden ‘saber once more, spinning it around in a flamboyant arc. With one last burst of ionizing light, another charge of static erupted from my free hand, shooting harmlessly above my head.

“Now, we fight back!” I howled. “For the Republic!”

A second later, a thousand voices roared with me.

...

The vision departed, leaving me gasping, stumbling back with its intensity.

There were three figures in front of me, but I could still see- hear- feel- the crowd I had faced.

Another step back- the visceral feeling of inter-connectedness with so many sentients- it was something I’d forgotten- that sensation of oneness-

In my head, there was a distinct impression of awe.

Bastila. My thoughts were sluggish, as the image of the hangar slowly dispersed into memory. I blinked, taking one last step back to steady myself. Bastila and her snub are behind me.

Bastila saw what I just remembered.

“Revan,” Jolee snapped. I looked up through blurry eyes to see him striding forward. It took a second to comprehend he was reacting to my movement. His earlier words scythed through my mind-

“I ain’t standing still if you take another step closer to that cursed snubfighter.”

A blur- Yudan launched himself into the air, ‘saber raised-

Sudden realization punched panic hard into my stomach.

“No!” I screamed. Desperation morphed into instinct, and I was calling out to the Force before even conscious of it. “Stop!”

The Force answered; and oh, there was a sibilant darkness to it here, a temptation to fill myself to the brink, the knowledge I could make everyone here do what I thought was best-

Get to the snubfighter, Revan, that’s all you need to do.

The power erupted from my outstretched hands, a concussive wave of need that slammed into all of them. Yudan was knocked back before his `saber could reach Jolee; Juhani toppled down from mid-pounce; the old man sank to his knees-

The Force burned.

-anything you desire can be made a reality-

That power you wield – that is what we shall master, Revan. It is stronger, still, on the Star Forge. It is what we need. It is what the galaxy needs.

The kaiburr’s amplification transformed the Force into a raging torrent, laced with the cold desire to do my will. I could feel it responding to me, tightening around my crewmates and holding them fixed in a stasis prison, for all I wanted right then was a damn moment alone-

Hold them there, and come to me.

Air scraped against my throat. I could feel Yudan's immediate attempts to hammer against my invisible bonds, followed a second later by Juhani. On my own, it should've taken some effort to contain three powerful, experienced Force-users this way.

-glimpses of the truth can be found here. and truth is power-

Jolee... he wasn't pushing back at all. Yudan's strength was beginning to buffet against mine-

-draw deeper, for you are master here. once again, you can be master-

That voice- but it wasn’t so much a voice, was it? More like a nebulous yearning that echoed from the kaiburr, and pervaded deep into my own Force connection. It promised the power to unleash my decree – like it had once before. The ability to do whatever I needed – whatever I wanted.

Revan, stop analysing everything- we don’t have time! Come to me!

And if I wanted the others silenced and stilled so I could think through my options, then why the frell wasn’t I thinking through my options?

Because power overwhelms. The thought came from deep within. An understanding, a comprehension, a lesson learned from past consequences. Overwhelms and corrupts free will, until nothing is left but the addictive pull of power itself.

Drawing back was hard. It was frelling hard. Like dragging out from a mud-bog, one torturous hand-hold at a time. The kaiburr-imbued Force didn’t want to be released, as if it had found a home immersed deep within my flesh.

-do not be alarmed. you know better this time. you are in control-

I wouldn’t be in control. And that damn voice wasn’t sentient. It was merely the Dark Side calling to my own weaknesses, so much stronger here on Lehon – but, in the end, a challenge that all Force-users faced in one form or another.

And the path to falling felt far too easy.
With a final, gut-wrenching discharge, I let the threads of power go.

“A moment,” I rasped, shaking slightly with reaction. “I need one damn moment to think.”

Yudan was the first to find his feet, golden lekku lying flat behind him as his burning gaze pinned on me. He’d dropped Zhar’s ‘saber – but in one swift movement it flew back to his grasp and reignited.

I jerked up a hand, palm first. “If you make one sodding move, Yudan, I swear I’ll wrap you back in stasis and throw you down the frelling pyramid. Just- just- stay still!”

His eyes narrowed and his grip firmed, but he otherwise remained motionless. Juhani launched upright, mirroring his actions, and a second later she was also standing with her weapon held aloft.

This time, at least, their attention was on me.

Revan-

Quiet! I half-snarled through the bond. One sodding minute of quiet, Bastila!

In the silence, I heard Jolee’s knees creak as he pushed himself upright. He was frowning, as if a grumble trembled on the edge of his lips – but he said nothing.

I drew in a loud breath, closed my eyes, and focused on calming the raging chaos of my mind. Pulled myself inwards, away from the bond, away from Bastila, and deep into my own core.

The Republic Fleet is key, here. My thoughts slowed down into a line of cool, ordered logic. The scrambler is blocking the Fleet. Without the Fleet, the ‘Hawk has no chance of survival in the skies – regardless of whether I am onboard.

A bloodbath in the skies between Malak’s armada and the Republic forces would provide an appropriate distraction for the ‘Hawk to approach the Star Forge. Contrast that with journeying in a Forge snubfighter – where I had the element of surprise, of time, on my side – but I did not trust the origins of the craft itself, no matter Bastila’s assurances of its safety.

At the crux of my deliberation was the searing realization that I simply could not sacrifice lives so callously again. Not the lives of my crewmates, nor the thousands of anonymous troops from a Republic I had once sworn to defend.

My first objective must be to disable the kaiburr, I realized with a chill. Before I embark on anything else. Before I travel to Bastila or go after Malak. There was still Carth’s plan – but I kept that thought small, tiny, hidden, from my bond-sister. For I didn’t trust her, not wholly, not while she was still Malak’s captive.

Carth will follow through even if I fly straight to Bastila. But... the ‘Hawk was outfitted with just one proton torpedo. While its turbolaser turrets should turn the pyramid into rubble, kaiburr crystals themselves were amongst the more indestructible of minerals. And one this size...

The ‘Hawk will have a single shot to get it right.

Maybe one of us had to traverse into the bowels of the pyramid itself. Actually see what mechanical enclosure surrounded the kaiburr, ascertain any other defences that may or may not be there, and judge how best to destroy it with the armament we had.

Getting that close to the source of the scrambler would be highly dangerous for any Force-user.
Revan? What are you thinking? Is it the Republic Fleet causing this indecision?

A cold anger bloomed deep in my gut. Bastila was allowing me no space, unlike the others who had withdrawn into silence-

I do not wish to be intrusive, Revan, but you are not thinking logically. You cannot compare a fleet with the whole of the galaxy-

I could block her. Draw deep into the Force, twisted as it was here, and block Bastila’s influence from my mind.

Or I could level the playing field. Bring her arguments to the table for us all to hear.

“Bastila,” I said out loud, snapping open my eyes to stare at the others. “Somewhere, you have to draw the line. And if you keep pushing it back and back, then the line fades. It blurs, it dissolves, until it eventually disappears.”

And there is no empathy left. And the greater good you were fighting for is no longer a good anything... just a cold, selfish drive for your own ambition.

I could feel her recoiling in reflex indignation.

::This is your line?: she spluttered, a note of incredulity emanating from the holo-stand behind me. ::A few hundred Republic ships?:

A soft breath escaped my lips, a hollow excuse of a laugh. “I’m not sure where my line is anymore, Bastila. But I know it has to be firmer than it was.”

There was an easing in Jolee’s grim countenance; the slightest hint of a nod. Acceptance. Maybe even approval.

I’d defend my decision to join the Mandalorian Wars until my dying breath... my conviction remained, that the Council had been too cautious: so scared of the past repeating itself that they failed to comprehend the magnitude of the Mandalorian threat. Had I done nothing, the Core would have fallen, billions more would have died, or been enslaved, and the Republic would have lost all faith in the Jedi as guardians.

Somehow, I knew the latter had happened regardless.

I’d spent years fighting an enemy in beskar. And when that enemy was broken, I found myself a new enemy. A greater one. And my actions ramped up in magnitude and consequence. All justified by my perceived belief in yet another threat to fight against – and strengthened by the power I had amassed during the years of Mandalorian conflict.

Power corrupts. Every idiot knew that. Power and the Force combined corrupts on a galactic scale.

I had no idea what this threat was – and part of me still wondered if Malak’s approach would have been the wisest course after all. Let sleeping demons lie. The galaxy might have been a different place if I’d only listened to a man I should remember more than I did.

Perhaps, if I had, I wouldn’t have fallen. Wouldn’t have transformed into a villain. A villain that, so far, had done a lot more damage than whatever had so shaken me out there in the Unknown Regions.
And if it felt so easy to succumb now – to surrender to the dark glory like I had on Tatooine, on Rii’shn, Manaan, the Leviathan – then attempting to master a corrupted Force weapon was the last thing I should be doing.

::Revan!:: Bastila was angry. I could hear it behind me, feel it between us.

“Bastila.” My voice croaked. I caught Yudan’s gaze, tainted a fierce yellow from the shadows of our shared history, and was sharply reminded of the Jedi he must have once been. I swallowed, lifted my chin, and spoke louder. “I’ve done this before with the best of the Jedi, and it didn’t work. It didn’t frelling work then, Bastila-”

::You were not strong enough then, Revan! But together-::

“Strength in the Force is not everything!” I burst out. “And I’m not the same person I once was! I can only judge myself on events since the Endar Spire. Every time I’ve failed, I’ve been alone. It’s been my friends, at my side, who’ve drawn me back from the edge. Who’ve kept me strong.”

Golden bonds of friendship and love, a safety net of support, and a reminder of the cost-

And what am I?

The memory of the Leviathan simmered between us. Spiralling darkness, heady bloodlust, the sweet taste of righteous vengeance. Bastila had faith that such a fall wouldn’t recur, but I... I didn’t.

My heart stuttered as the realization chilled through me. And, between us, there was a sharp prick of hurt as she understood that.

“You are a friend,” I whispered. “A friend who needs the whole crew behind you, as much as I do.”

Bastila’s hurt tainted our connection with bitterness, before it shrivelled back beneath her determination.

::There is no other way to succeed.: Her words were cold with censure. ::You will remain stranded on that dead planet for Malak to target at his whim.:::

“There is another way.” A better way. A safer way. But I didn’t dare relay anymore of my thoughts regarding it. “I will not forsake you, Bastila. But I will not step into your snubfighter. Not like this.”

Everything paused for the briefest moment. I saw Jolee’s mouth twitch with the slightest of smiles; Juhani’s expression soften with relief. Yudan cocked his head- I couldn’t read him, but oh were we going to have words once we got down from this frelling pyramid-

::The Fleet will be here soon.,:: Bastila bit out. ::Do you know what my orders are?::

“What?” I rapped out, spinning on my heel to face her. “When?” The demand ripped from me, a driving need to know exactly what she did. “Bastila, do you have intel on when they will enter this sector?”

Her copper eyes flashed bright with fierce emotion. I will convince you. Anyway I must. There was a gritty desperation in her thoughts that felt almost foreboding in nature, before she withdrew from me in one swift movement.

“Bastila-”
I shall leave that to your imagination. The timbre of her voice cooled into clipped tones as she leaned back from the holo-com, face set in a pale, rigid mask of disapproval. I lurched out psychically, only to slam against a solid mental shield. Malak commands me to employ my battle meditation against all enemy ships that survive the scrambler’s signal. I remind you, once again, that they come here not only to destroy Malak and the Star Forge – but also you.

She was hiding - retreating behind a block that shimmered with the intensity of her growing fury. The bond was a shadowy tunnel connecting our minds, one end closed tight with her command of the twisted Force that radiated from the Forge.

The Star Forge had to go.

“That hardly matters, in the grand scheme of things,” I forced out through gritted teeth. “I’ll see the Forge destroyed, Bastila. Like you planned from the beginning. Whatever is in the Unknown Regions isn’t worth the risk of using a cursed, dark relic that warps everyone idiotic enough to use it!”

I will not disobey Malak and suffer his wrath while you dither over an inconsequential number of lives. Her eyes narrowed. What the scrambler does not destroy, I shall. It was a proclamation of intent, hard and sharp-edged like I’d never heard from her before. There was nothing seeping through our mind-link, now – I slammed hard against her shield, but there was no give. She’d well and truly distanced herself.

“Bastila!” Juhani gasped from behind me. “You cannot-”

If these Republic lives mean so much to you, Bastila continued, ignoring Juhani, her voice growing in volume and steel as she stared me down, Then you best enter that snubfighter now and stop me yourself.

Outrage, or shock, or a mixture of both, seared hot through my veins. She couldn’t mean-

“Do you hear yourself?” I snapped, fists curling, stepping closer to the holo-stand. “Employing blackmail, willing to kill simply to force me into doing your bidding-”

I look to the greater good, Revan. As you once did. She could’ve been a statue, carved from chalk-stone, face tight with condemnation. Every minute you delay is another Republic ship downed.

“Don’t you do this, Bastila!” I growled, voice thick with angry desperation, heart pounding loud in my head. Hot words firing into our bond- A fall is simply a series of stumbles into the darkness, justified or not! Dammit, Bastila, this is another stumble! She wasn’t hearing me. She wasn’t listening, not through the mind-link, not anymore. I threw myself psychically, harder, harder, pulling deep on the Force- “You’ll hate yourself for it-”

You alone have the power to stop me. So, come and stop me. Her hand reached out, underneath the holo-cam, stretching towards the controls at her end. I shall see you soon.

The image cut out.

And a signal sparked from the holo-stand as it powered down. The Force wavered in my grasp, turning instinctively to focus on the minuscule stream of electrons-

-oscillating straight back to the snubfighter, but it was a portable holo-stand, why was there a damn feed back to the ship-
Inside the snub, numerous devices on stand-by sprung to life-

My eyes widened.

“Trap!” I screamed, spinning around, the Force flaring out to the others in a haphazard shield. I was already sprinting back- “Run!”

The ground behind me exploded. A concussive wave of air punched me from behind, and I was flying, desperately struggling to hold firm on the Force as it wrapped around us all-

Metallic shards punctured my shield. I was plunging down, down, and my vision dimmed-

We’re falling into the pyramid. The top will collapse above us! The shield- it was clasped tight around the four of us, even as exploding rubble peppered it from all sides. I had to keep it intact-

Distantly, I was aware of pain scoring against my back. Behind, a screech of tortured metal as an entire wall crashed inwards. One edge of my shield shattered underneath the impact, and I lost all sense of Juhani-

No! The Force thinned as my palms slammed into a moving surface- Jolee and Yudan blazed bright, adding their weight to my shield- but I could feel the fractures in our defense grow as debris rained down from above, fired by a second wave of detonation-

Sithspit! Must- protect-

One last flare of Force, one last injection of power to hold back this collapsing ruin of Rakatan legacy-

Something sideswiped me. I was thrown forward into darkness. And then everything cut out.

xXx

Chapter End Notes

Coming up next: HK-47 leaves the others behind in a bid to locate his master.
A gazillion thanks to kosiah for the beta, suggestions and corrections.
Primary Objective: Locate and Defend Master

- HK-47 -

Input – Carth Onasi: “What in the blazes-”

Input – Canderous Ordo (Mando’a): “Damn!”

Audio/Visual Tracking: Explosion On Summit Of Star Forge Defense Structure

Analysing Visual Input ...
Conclusion: Multiple Permacrete Munitions Detonating On Summit

Hypothesis #1: Explosion Designed By Master
Hypothesis #2: Explosion Designed By Unknown Hostiles To Target Master

Testing Hypotheses...
...Factor: Probable Objective Of Master To Rescue Bastila Shan
...Factor: Probable Objective Of Master To Deactivate Controlling Console
...Factor: Unknown Time Elapsed Since Master Left Ebon Hawk
...Factor: Master Not Known To Be In Possession Of Permacrete Munitions
More Data Required
Preliminary Conclusion: Hypothesis #2 Accepted

Audio/Visual Tracking: Flying Debris Entering Targeting Area

Sensor Scan: Target: Multiple: Incoming Debris
...Optical Sensors Lacking Required Illumination!
...Infrared Sensors Focusing:
#Warning: Interference From Kaiburr Affecting Long-Range Infrared Sensors

Visual/Thermal Tracking: Fixed On Incoming Debris

Input – Canderous Ordo: “Take cover!”

Analysis: Incoming Debris
...Debris: Multiple Projectiles Detected
...Debris: Velocity Of Debris Falls Within Movement Capabilities
...Debris: Trajectory Of Debris Calculated Threat Assessment: Moderate
#Warning: Interference From Kaiburr Affecting Long-Range Infrared Sensors
Threat Assessment Modified: High

Evasive Protocols Engaged
Visual/Thermal Tracking: Canderous Ordo, Carth Onasi, Zaalbar Retreating Into Treeline

Primary Objective: Locate and Defend Master
...Factor: Allies Can Assist With Extraction
...Factor: Allies Are Fragile Organic Meatbags
...Factor: Allies Have Retreated
...Factor: Hypothesis #2 Implies Presence Of Unknown Hostiles
Primary Objective Amended: Locate And Defend Master With Urgency

Boosting Maximum Electrical Power To Motor System

Physical: Moving To Star Forge Defense Structure

Optical And Infrared Sensors Focusing On Incoming Debris
#Warning: Interference From Kaiburr Affecting Long-Range Infrared Sensors

Visual/Thermal Tracking: Multiple Projectiles Within Targeting Range

Physical: FC-1 Flechette Launcher Loaded
Target Lock: Closest Incoming Projectile
Physical: Firing FC-1 Flechette Launcher

Visual/Thermal Tracking: Closest Incoming Projectile Destroyed Count: HK-47 – 1; Debris – 0
Internal Response: Satisfaction

Optical And Infrared Sensors Focusing On Star Forge Defense Structure Analysis: Star Forge Defense Structure....
...Factor: Explosions Have Ceased
...Factor: Estimated Height Of Defense Structure: 197 metres
...Factor: Detonation Affects Highest Portion Of Star Forge Defense Structure
...Factor: Estimated 91.34% Of Structure Remains Unscathed
...Factor: Infrared Sensors Malfunctioning: Kaiburr Scrambler Remains In Place
Conclusion: Quickest Method To Locate Master: Enter And Ascend Pyramid

Stealth Mode Enabled Assassin Protocols Enabled

Physical: Entering Pyramid

xXx

Closer Optical Examination Of Environment (Infrared):
Location: Stairwell Of Star Forge Defense Structure

Visual Identification Of Current Environment (Infrared):
...Calculated Ascension: 177.44 metres
...Archway To Inner Chamber Located Ahead
...Minor Damage Visible To Archway Framework
Conclusion: Entering Damage Zone

Echo Primary Objective:

Primary Objective: Locate And Defend Master With Urgency
...Factor: Unknown Hostiles May Be Present: Assume Force Abilities
...Factor: Master May Be Injured Due To Explosion
Conclusion: Prepare For Hostiles
Physical: Primary Blaster Primed

Boosting Power To Infrared Sensors
#Warning: Interference From Kaiburr Affecting Long-Range Infrared Sensors

Physical: Moving Through Archway

Scanning External Environment (Infrared):
...2 Organic Meatbags Detected On Far Side Of Room
...Ceiling Of Chamber Destroyed
...Debris In Chamber Blocking Alternative Exits

Target Analysis: Organic Meatbag 1
Species: Twi’lek, Male
Facial Recognition Analysis: Unavailable From Rear
Body Language Analysis: Alert, Tense
Visual Analysis: Crouching Over Organic Meatbag 2, Intent Unknown
Temporary Name Assigned: Tailhead Prey

Target Analysis: Organic Meatbag 2
Identification: Master
Body Language Analysis: Unconscious
Visual Analysis: Lying Prone On Ground, Injuries Unknown

Target Lock: Tailhead Prey

Initiating Combat....
Hidden User Defined Sub-Routine Activated: Master Command Required Attempting Safety Override....
...Factor: Master Is Currently Indisposed
...Factor: Tailhead Prey Unknown Sentient
...Factor: Explosion Likely Caused By Unknown Hostiles
...Factor: Tailhead Prey Unaware Of HK-47: Surprise Attack Available
Conclusion: Tailhead Prey Fits Parameters Of Unknown Hostile: Force Abilities Assumed Direct Threat Assessment: Extreme
Anecdote: Even A Force-User Can Be Taken Out With A Surprise Shot To The Head
Override Successful

Null-Force Field Activated #Warning: Null-Force Field Severe Drain To Primary Energy Source: 3.73 Minutes Remaining

Physical: Firing Blaster

Blaster Shot: Dodged By Tailhead Prey

Analysing....
...Factor: Speed Beyond Natural Capabilities Of Bipedal Sentients
Conclusion: Confirmed Force-User: Tailhead Prey

Evasive Protocols Engaged

Visual/Thermal Tracking: Tailhead Prey Activating And Throwing Lightsaber

Physical: Retreating Behind Archway
Incoming Projectile: Dodged

0 Meatbags In Targeting Area

Physical: C-22 Flame Carbine Powered On Target Lock: Archway

Visual/Thermal Tracking: Vibrations Around Archway

Analysing....
...Factor: Debris Shaking Loose From Archway
Conclusion: Force-Propelled Concussive Wave Directed At Archway
Predictive Algorithm: Tailhead Prey Will Launch Follow-Up Physical Attack

Physical: Igniting C-22 Flame Carbine

Tailhead Prey Within Targeting Range

Carbine Discharge: Direct Hit To Tailhead Prey
Analysing....
...Carbine Discharge Force-Reflected By Tailhead Prey
...Calculating: Superficial Impact Only
...Visual/Thermal Tracking: Tailhead Prey Retreating Into Chamber

#Interrupt: Facial Recognition Match: Yudan Rosh Reference Apathetic Fleshbag
Permanent Name Assigned: Yudan Rosh To Tailhead Prey Reference Apathetic Fleshbag

0 Meatbags In Targeting Area

#Interrupt: Master Defined No-Kill List Activated: Identified Match: Yudan Rosh
...Internal Response: Disappointment
Reassessing Calculation Of Hostile Intent To Master: Unable To Compute

Physical: Kamino Saberdart Readied (Non-Lethal)

Output: “Suggestion: Shall we engage in a cessation of hostilities, Apathetic Fleshbag, at least until the master is awakened?”

Input – Yudan Rosh: “A combat droid appears from nowhere, attempts to kill me, and then pleads for mercy?”
Voice Stress Analysis: Mocking

Input – Yudan Rosh: “Walk back into the room, little droid. I will be glad to show just how merciful I can be.”

Calculating Threat To HK-47: Extreme
Calculating Threat To Master: Unable To Compute

Primary Objective: Protect Master
#Warning: Null-Force Field Severe Drain To Primary Energy Source: 1.01 Minutes Remaining

Physical: Entering Chamber
Physical: Moving Through Archway
Physical: Firing Kamino Saberdart

Kamino Saberdart: Deflected By Yudan Rosh
Visual/Thermal Tracking: Yudan Rosh Unleashing Force-Driven Electrical Discharge

Electrical Discharge: Negated By Null-Force Field

Evasive Protocols Engaged: Rolling To Ground

Physical: Firing Kamino Saberdart

Auditory Input: Groan
Source: Master

Kamino Saberdart: Deflected By Yudan Rosh

Output: “Demand: Master, permission to remove Apathetic Fleshbag from your banal and nonsensical no-kill list?”

Physical: Moving To Master

Visual/Thermal Tracking: Yudan Rosh Raising Clenched Fist
Analysing...
...Force-Attack Assumed: Bodily Constriction Or Weapon Disarmament Likely

Force Attack: Negated By Null-Force Field

#Warning: Null-Force Field Severe Drain To Primary Energy Source: 0.71 Minutes Remaining

Input – Yudan Rosh: “A droid with incorporated Fett technology?”
Voice Stress Analysis: Disbelieving

Input – Master: “Wha- what the frell is going on?”
Voice Stress Analysis: Groggy

Output: “Statement: One of your followers is intent on my destruction, master, over a simple misunderstanding. Repetition: Permission to remove him from your inefficient no-kill list, so we can blast him and save ourselves the trouble of any tedious melodrama sure to follow?”

#Warning: Null-Force Field Severe Drain To Primary Energy Source: 0.06 Minutes Remaining

Null-Force Field Deactivated

Input – Yudan Rosh: “Revan. Why is this demented droid calling you master?”
Voice Stress Analysis: Flat

Visual/Thermal Tracking: Yudan Rosh Deactivating Lightsaber

Primary Objective Completed

Exiting Combat Mode

Input – Master: “Er-”
Voice Stress Analysis: Confused

Visual/Thermal Tracking: Master Moving To Sitting Position

Sensor Scan:
Target: Master
...Physical Analysis: Movement Is Slow But Unhindered
...Body Language Analysis: Conscious, Tense, Shaky, Organic Breathing Patterns Within Normal
Infrared Analysis: Body Temperature Within Normal Human Parameters, Minor Elevation To Internal Blood Pump Frequency
Conclusion: Master Is Mildly Concussed

Input – Yudan Rosh: “And what exactly does he mean by a no-kill list?”

Input – Master: “That’s... a good question. HK?”
Voice Stress Analysis: Faint

Output: “Explanation: As Dark Lord of the Sith, you had a short-list of sentients I was not allowed to harm in any meaningful fashion, should I encounter them during any of your assignments. I believe you had an ulterior motive for their survival rather than any sort of sentimental lapse, as is so frequent in sentients hampered with inefficient biological processors.”

Input – Master: “Yudan, meet HK-47. Apparently, he used to be my personal assassination droid.”
Voice Stress Analysis: Weary

Output: “Conjecture: Master, the equivocation of past tense is disingenuous-”

Input – Yudan Rosh: “He’s Star Forge built, isn’t he?”
Voice Stress Analysis: Angry

Output: “Statement: I am a product of the Master’s inspired programming and the technological superiority of the Star Forge. It is no boast to state that I am both unique and unmatched in design, functionality, and statistical philosophy.”

Auditory Input: Harsh Laugh
Source: Yudan Rosh

Input – Yudan Rosh: “Who’s on this supposed no-kill list, then?”

Output: “Retort: I don’t take orders from you, Apathetic Fleshbag. One word from my master-”

Input – Master: “HK. Answer the damn question.”

Input – Yudan Rosh: “How informative. Revan, I can see why you have allowed this deranged apparatus of pedestrian taunts to stick around.”
Voice Stress Analysis: Sarcastic

Output: “Conjecture: I was still assimilating my thesaurus at the time those references were created, Apathetic Fleshbag. Perfection is not an expeditious process, even for a superior artificial lifeform such as myself.”

Input - Master: "HK, shut up. And include every member of my crew, whether here or elsewhere, on that damn no-kill list. And Yudan- stop insulting my frelling droid. Instead, why don't you explain why you were one inch away from lopping Jolee's head off?"
Voice Stress Analysis: Vehement

Input – Yudan Rosh: “I was allowing you a choice.”

Input – Master: “Cut the crap. I could have- we could have left without resorting to killing-" dammit, Yudan, I don’t even get how you could supposedly support both sides-”

Input – Yudan Rosh: “Is this really the time?”

Input – Master: “I- Stars, the others! Where- where are they?”
Voice Stress Analysis: Frantic

Visual/Thermal Tracking: Master Moving To Standing Position
Visual/Thermal Tracking: Master Unsteady On Bipedal Limbs

Input – Yudan Rosh: “I have not had the chance to investigate the area, nor look for the others. Sit down, Revan, before you topple over-”

Input – Master: “If you make one more move against any of them-”

Input – Yudan Rosh: “Revan. You have made your decision. Your allies will not stand against you, and I will not strike out at them.”

Facial Analysis: Master: Glaring
Body Language Analysis: Master: Disbelieving

Input – Master: “This conversation is not over, Yudan. Dammit- HK, can you sense Jolee or Juhani nearby?”

Output: “Answer: No. Extrapolation: My long-range biothermal sensors are affected by the residue of the Star Forge Defense System, master. Any scan beyond the closest proximity gleans results about as accurate as competitive projectile vomiting.”

Input – Master: “The kaiburr- I can still feel it travelling into the skies- but the roof of the pyramid is caved in ahead-”

Visual/Thermal Tracking: Master Moving Towards Destroyed Section Of Chamber

Input – Yudan Rosh: “I am unfamiliar with the material of this structure, but the signal passes through the rubble unimpeded. This is likely by design.”

Visual/Thermal Tracking: Master Levitating Debris

Input – Master: “Help me.”
Voice Stress Analysis: Commanding

Visual/Thermal Tracking: Master and Yudan Rosh Levitating Debris

Sensor Scan (Infrared): Target: Star Forge Defense Structure Inner Chamber
#Warning: Interference From Kaiburr Affecting Long-Range Infrared Sensors
...2 Organic Lifeforms Detected Underneath Debris

Output: “Observation: My infrared scanners are-”

Input – Master: “Jolee!”

Input – Yudan Rosh: “He’s fine. Coming to, even as we-”

Input – Jolee Bindo: “There you are. What have you been waiting for, an engraved invitation?”
Voice Stress Analysis: Groggy
Sensor Scan:
Target: Jolee Bindo
...Physical Analysis: Minor Bruising Noticeable, Organic Breathing Patterns Within Normal Human Parameters
...Infrared Analysis: Upper Torso Constricted By Debris, Body Temperature Within Normal Human Parameters
...Body Language Analysis: Conscious, Alert, No Further Signs Of Physical Distress
Predictive Analysis: Force Shielding Prevented Serious Injury
Conclusion: Jolee Bindo Is Healthy

Input – Master: “Jolee, are you okay?”

Input – Jolee Bindo: “Oh, I’m fine. Nothing a hip replacement or two won’t cure. How about you get this darn thing off my chest?”
Voice Stress Analysis: Disgruntled

Visual/Thermal Tracking: Debris Removed From Jolee Bindo

Visual/Thermal Tracking: Jolee Bindo Moving To Sitting Position

Input – Master: “I lost Juhani from the shield before the end. She’ll- she might have-”
Voice Stress Analysis: Worried

Input – Jolee Bindo: “Well don’t lollygag about then, young pup. Let’s get this rubble moved.”

Visual/Thermal Tracking: Master, Yudan Rosh and Jolee Bindo Levitating Debris

Incoming Transmission: Source: Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device
Physical: Accepting Transmission

Input – Yudan Rosh: “There she is. Look.”

Input (Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device) – Canderous Ordo: “Tinhead, where the kriff have you disappeared to? Again?”

Input – Jolee Bindo: “Stop! Don’t move that section! She’ll bleed out!”

Sensor Scan:
Target: Juhani
...Physical Analysis: Left Lower Limb Mostly Severed By Metallic Framework, Organic Breathing Patterns Below Normal Cathar Parameters
...Infrared Analysis: Lower Torso And Limbs Constricted By Debris, Body Temperature Within Normal Cathar Parameters. Internal Blood Pump Frequency Below Accepted Levels, Severe Blood Loss Noticeable
...Body Language Analysis: Unconscious, Limp
Conclusion: Juhani Severely Injured, Mobilization Risk To Organic Life

Output (Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device): “Explanation: While you were cowering in an attempt to prevent any damage to your fragile outer coating, I have been completing my primary objective.”

Input – Master: “Oh no, is that her-”
Voice Stress Analysis: Stricken
Input (Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device) – Canderous Ordo: “Do you want your robotic trap welded shut?”

Input – Jolee Bindo: “Make yourself useful, sonny boy, and put her in your fandangled deep stasis. I’ll see what I can do.”
Body Language Analysis: Purposeful

Input – Master (whispered): “This is my fault.”

Output (Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device): “Sarcasm: My tactile receptors are aquiver in anticipation.”

Visual/Thermal Tracking: Jolee Bindo Kneeling Next To Juhani
Visual/Thermal Tracking: Yudan Rosh Moving To Juhani

Input – Master: “I- HK, is that-” Voice Stress Analysis: Shaky

Input – Master: “Give me the comm, HK.”

Physical: Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device Relinquished To Master

Input – Master: “Where are you, Canderous?”

Input (Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device) – Canderous Ordo (Mando’a): “Revan. I see you’re not dead.”
Voice Stress Analysis: Pleased

Input (Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device) – Carth Onasi: “Revan-” Voice Stress Analysis: Emotional

Input (Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device) – Canderous Ordo: “We’re just inside this alien treefort. Onasi and Carpet are with me. State your location, and we’ll intercept you.”

Input – Master: “Just- just keep heading up. There’s only one stairwell, and nothing here that affects non-Force users. Hurry- we need... we could do with some help.”

Input (Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device) – Carth Onasi: “On it.”

Input (Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device) – Canderous Ordo: “On my way.”

Audio Tracking: Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device Deactivating

Input – Jolee Bindo: “Let’s hope they thought to bring medpacs with them. This limb can’t be saved, though. We’re going to have to deal with it here.”

Input – Master: “Oh, Juhani-”

Output: “Observation: The loss of an organic limb represents the opportunity for Brooding Tabby to improve her flesh-like status with superior cybernetic prosthetics. Frankly, master, this incessant moping is as illogical as it is inefficient.”

Facial Analysis: Master: Furious
Body Language Analysis: Master: Aggressive

Output: “Appeasement: Er, I mean, nice master, goo-ood master.”
Input – Master: “HK. Get out of here. Get to the bottom of the pyramid, and locate that damn kaiburr. Run an analysis on how we can destroy it with the armament of the Ebon Hawk, and upload your calculations directly to the ‘Hawk’s navicomputer. Not another word. Not another damn word until I give you leave to speak.”

Voice Stress Analysis: Cold

New Objective Received

Output: “Statement: Of course, master. Shutting up now.”

Physical: Leaving Chamber

xXx

Chapter End Notes

Coming up next: Revan's POV as the troops head back to the ship. Explanations and reconciliations ahoy.

A megatonmilliong thanks to kosiah for the beta.
If I hadn’t run off alone...

The temptation to sink into guilt was familiar. As familiar as the tinny scent of blood and burnt metal that distorted the air. The acrid smell of warfare that part of me recognized all too well.

Juhani’s limp figure lay some metres ahead, wedged firmly under a collapsed wall of alien metal. I felt my teeth grit as I stared at her body, bloodied and half-concealed by the kneeling form of Jolee.

I had no right to guilt. It was Juhani’s decision to come here. Just as it was her choice to stand against Bastila. Juhani was my crewmate, my comrade... not my follower, despite what Bastila had espoused. Juhani had thrown her life on the line for her values, and I had to respect that. I knew my Cathar friend – she would willingly bear the sacrifice of a limb, and call it a fair exchange.

“We wait for the others, then we free Juhani,” Jolee said, in a low voice that matched the grimness in my soul. He was crouching over Juhani, an amber figure glowing softly in my Force-enhanced vision. Spilled blood speckled a lattice of blue-black over his steady hands. “We need a more suitable place to assess that leg.”

“I thought you said the leg couldn’t be saved,” Yudan intoned. “A lightsaber will give a clean, cauterized cut. I didn’t pick you as the sort to shy away from hard choices.”

Yudan was idly twirling the deactivated hilt in his grasp, as if field amputations were commonplace to him. Perhaps they were. I felt the sensation of familiarity heighten, and I didn’t need a flash of the past to know this was the sort of situation I’d been in countless times before.

“Don’t assume you know me, sonny boy.” Jolee’s rejoinder was no more than a mild rebuke. His attention was fixed upon his palms as they gently pressed against Juhani’s upper thigh. “I ain’t chopping off legs without adequate reason to. Her limb’s a goner, but with proper medical facilities more of it can be saved—”

“Proper medical facilities?” The derision in Yudan’s voice was palpable. “Is that what you call your storage closet filled with kolto ‘derms and kiosk-strength painkillers?”

“Not the ‘Hawk,” I cut in. “Jolee’s thinking about afterwards.”

“Aye,” Jolee assented. He raised one hand, and I felt the Force draw to him, gentle and unassuming, as his ‘saber rattled free from underneath a pile of debris. A second later, it thudded into his grasp, and Jolee deftly cinched it onto his belt. “The Star Forge beckons, sonny boy. After that, we’ll either be space dust or nestled in the bosom of a Republic Fleet. With fancy med-droids and bacta tanks aplenty.”
“That’s an assumption or two,” Yudan drawled. He stood back from Jolee, arms hanging loosely at his sides, and lekku trailing proud behind him. As casual as Yudan’s stance was, I could sense an undercurrent of readiness about him. I wasn’t sure if the man ever truly relaxed. “I have seen enough to know you deal to injuries with immediacy, for predicting the future is no more than a spice junkie’s game.”

“Jolee’s right,” I said softly. “Leg or no leg, Juhani is too injured to assist in any meaningful way on the Forge. If we had more time for her to recover...” I trailed off, as I eyed over a skewer of metal that stabbed into the Cathar’s hip. It wasn’t just her leg that needed seeing to. “We keep her under and treat the wounds. We leave the leg alone. And, stars willing, she’ll be in better hands within a day or two.”

My gaze drew unerringly to Yudan’s. He tilted his head in a slight gesture of acquiescence, but I wondered if he was thinking the same as me. Victory means us in the hands of the Republic. Yudan Rosh and Revan Freeflight. It would be an ending rather than a beginning for the likes of us.

One step at a time. Focus on what’s needed, right here and now. I shut my eyes against the indigo backdrop of Force sight, and centred myself.

Emotions sat like sick in my gut. Not just guilt- for I couldn’t deny that anger seethed in my soul as well. At Bastila, at Yudan. At the awareness that a friend’s leg might be only a sliver of the final cost. And inflaming everything, interleaving deep within the Force, was the kaiburr’s susurrating promise of power.

Yet... yet, calming the morass of those emotions, rising above them, and spurning the crepuscular voice that tempted me with the weight of my own desires... it was becoming easier.

Gently, I once more unfurled my senses. A clean, raw strength rushed through my limbs, and a second later my lightsaber flew home into my palm. When I looked up, it was to see Yudan still appraising me from the other side of the room.

“Bastila set this up,” he stated, as if daring me to deny the truth. “She betrayed you.”

“No.” An instinctive denial rallied forth from my lips. No more than reflex, really; an innate response to refute that anyone so close to me would succumb to treachery-

“‘You have always been blind, Revan, when it comes to the few who truly know you.’ There was a damnable look of something close to pity on Yudan’s face. I felt myself flush in mild irritation. Yudan had never met Bastila. He didn’t know a sodding thing about our relationship-

Not Bastila. The bleak realization chased away my ire. He’s referring to Malak.

Had I ever predicted Malak’s betrayal? Considered it? Taken into account the possibility?

Somehow, I didn’t think so.

I’d always been more powerful than him, a voice whispered. But he’d always been able to surprise me.

“No,” I repeated, softer now, my thoughts less reactive as they skinned over recent events. “It wasn’t Bastila’s betrayal.” Not when it might mean her death. “She knew nothing of the explosion. Malak’s hand was behind that.”

“You believe Bastila Shan would never betray you?” One brow shot up in disbelief. “Malak Devari swore undying love to you once, Revan. He promised fealty. He knelt and named you master.
What makes you convinced Bastila Shan would stay true when Malak did not?"

I glanced away, my lips twisting. “I never shared a Force bond with Malak. No, he used Bastila. Used her to lure me to top of the pyramid and straight into that primed snubfighter.”

He must have considered that I might not fall into line with Bastila’s desires. That I might have enough warning to survive. The whole chain of events had an orchestrated feel to it, like Bastila had been set up to take the fall. What does Malak think I’ll do next, once he realizes I still live? Turn on Bastila? Maybe. If he ever understood the depths of our bond-

I bit off a broken laugh. I didn’t understand the depths of our sodding bond.

“I’m glad you find something amusing in this situation,” Yudan said, his voice droll. “For I fail to.”

“Oh, there’s nothing amusing about any of this,” I muttered, my eyes narrowing as a flash of Yudan’s swinging lightsaber burned through my mind. One inch closer, and it would have seared into Jolee’s neck. The old man hadn’t commented on it so far, but I damn well was not going to let it lie. “Or about-”

Something sparked in the Force; close enough that I halted, mid-speech. There was a scuffing noise from the stairwell-

“The others,” I murmured, turning back to face the archway.

The armoured hulk of Canderous was the first to appear. He took one step inside, visored face scanning the room, his repeating blaster hefting in his grasp.

“Is this area secure?” he demanded, in lieu of greeting.

“We’re the only ones here.” Something inside me eased as Zaalbar and Carth followed him in. Despite everything – Bastila, Juhani’s injury, the scrambler – we’d find a way forward. I didn’t know how much to believe in the frelling will of the Force these days, but there’d be a solution. There always was.

“The princess?”

I shook my head. With a deft twist of a plated gauntlet, Canderous broke open a light-stick and threw it into the room. Invariably, my gaze trailed to Carth. I couldn’t see his expression behind the visor he wore, but I could feel the heaviness of it.

“What happened?” Carth asked. His voice was low, and brimming with intensity.

“Give me a hand over here,” Jolee cut in before I could answer. “And tell me you brought some darn medkits with you. We have to get Juhani moved, so leave off the recriminations until we’re back at the ‘Hawk.”

There was a distressed moan from Zaalbar as they collectively looked to the limp form of the Cathar. Metallic rubble had collapsed over her legs, but the primary source of concern was the sharp edge of a panel shearing diagonally into her left thigh. From this angle, it looked to have sliced almost entirely through the limb. Blood pooled beneath Juhani’s body, saturating up the sides of her robe. While Yudan’s stasis may have slowed the bleeding, now, I was worried about the amount that had already been spilled.

Carth took one step towards me, before striding purposefully to Jolee, shrugging off his pack and “(Jen. You ran off alone),” Zaalbar admonished, his rumble gravelly with discontent. “(I may not understand all that you face, but I thought you understood I have a right to face it with you).”

“Bastila begged me to hurry,” I replied, staring at the steadiness of Carth’s hands as he pulled out hypo-sprays and bactawraps from one of the ‘Hawk’s medkits. “I thought she might be here in person. I—”

I couldn’t deny her. Her desperation, her urgency. Her need. We stood on opposite sides, now, but the link between us was ever-present.

“But the princess ain’t here,” Canderous ground out. “Revan. What the kriff happened?”

Malak happened.

“Bastila wanted me to travel to the Forge alone,” I said, semi-absently, as I watched Carth inject drugs into Juhani’s thigh. It brought back a fleeting recollection of his expertise dealing with Belaya’s broken ribs. He’d had more than basic medic training. Despite everything we’d gone through, it made me realize how many parts of his past I didn’t know. “She thought she was acting without Malak’s knowledge. She underestimated him.”

That drew a dismissive snort from Canderous. “Well. She always had a penchant for missing the obvious.”

“Yeah. You could say that.” The bond was still quiet. A dead, empty tunnel ending in a barricade. Had anything filtered through to her? Did she have any idea what happened... how bad the repercussions could have been?

I didn’t think so. But Malak wouldn’t allow her to remain ignorant for long. Which meant... will she reach out to me? Malak will make her. Malak will...

“Malak will understand we are alive, and soon,” Yudan weighed in, echoing my thoughts. “He will move against us, if the Fleet doesn’t distract him.”

I saw Carth’s shoulders stiffen at that. “Do you have intel on the Fleet?” he demanded, without turning from his position next to Juhani.

“No,” I whispered, as I considered my next words. Throw the truth out there. Best we are all prepared for what is to come. “But Bastila plans on using her battle meditation against them.”

Carth inhaled, a sharp intake of air audible within the room. This time, he did turn. “Are you serious?”

"Yes." The word breathed out as I recalled the fiery passion of Bastila's conviction. She was utterly convinced of something worse out there, worse than Malak, worse than the downfall of the Republic. I knew we couldn't harness the Star Forge without losing ourselves, no matter our intentions- and the thought that Bastila might be wrong about a threat lurking beyond known space had skimmed wildly through my head more than once. But, perhaps, I also had to consider- what if she's right?

"Maybe you saw HK on your way up - he's gone to assess the kaiburr," I continued, my thoughts still on my bond-sister even as I relayed the information. "We'll destroy the scrambler, wait until the Fleet arrive as a cover, and then travel to stop Bastila. Extract Bastila."
If Bastila was right, if I had been right, last time – and, frankly, I’d had a lot more information then than I did now – then what else could I do about it?

I needed to focus on Bastila. Malak. The Star Forge. But the possibility that I might not prevail had to be taken into account. The idea that the galaxy itself might have no inkling of something worse-

Something worse than Malak ruling as Dark Lord?

“Why’d I go to the Unknown Regions?” The words came out low and hard. I stared at Yudan, before transferring my focus to Canderous. Two people with me, who might have some idea of the missing link. Yudan had said I’d discovered ruins of a Sith Academy on Malachor V that pointed to the Star Forge. I’d found something else in the Unknown Regions. But how were the two associated? What had propelled me beyond known space? “I went straight there after Malachor – why?”

There was a heavy pause as both men appraised me. Yudan hadn’t been at Malachor. Canderous had only been on the fringes. I didn’t know what sort of answer I expected from them, but it surprised me to hear Carth speak instead.

“The party line was that you led a third of the Republic Fleet to mop up the remnants of the Mandalorians.” His voice was so quiet I could barely hear it. “Maybe some of the Clans led you there.”

“No.” Canderous’ negative was sharp and harsh. “Even in the face of defeat, even broken, we Mando’ade do not run. And we know well the risks of venturing into unknown space.”

“You always believed the Mandalorian Wars masked another purpose,” Yudan uttered. “To lure the Jedi into outright battle.”

“Huh. It was me who did that, in the end.” I bit back a bitter laugh. “Under the guise of building a stronger Republic.”

“There’s no denying the Republic was weakened after the Wars,” Carth said slowly. He was still kneeling next to Juhani, but his concentration was firmly fixed on the conversation. “Even in victory. But a deeper reason behind the Mandalorian offensive other than their love of combat? Blast, I don’t know.”

“Combat and honour make a warrior. Family and blood make a clan.” Canderous shifted, slinging his weapon over a shoulder before folding his arms. “But it is Mand’alor’s will that has always united us, whether into battle or peace.”

“Mandalore’s will...” I trailed off, frowning. The Mandalorian culture sometimes had the feel of a dictatorship about it. Clan leaders had clout, sure, but it was Mandalore who ruled above all. Above blood, above individual desires, above Clan honour.

What was your will? A voice demanded. It sounded like mine. To throw your people against mine? To claim territory you had no hope of holding for long, even had you won?

“He dreamed our battle songs would echo through the ages,” Canderous added. There was a faint touch of nostalgia in his voice. He must have been so invested, once – Canderous, a significant leader from a significant clan. “We Mando’ade have always followed our Mand’alor, even if it meant leaving our posts in the Outer Rim.”

The Outer Rim... the traditional home of the Mandalorians.
Why leave the Outer Rim? The heart of your Clan territories? Why over-extend in a fashion that would weaken the Mandalorians, much as it did the Republic?

A ghostly throb of pain lanced deep into my stomach. My hands pressed there instinctively, as an echo of discomfort travelled down one leg.

What set you on this path, Mandalore?

...“They tricked me,” the burly man gasped. A dark rivulet of blood dribbled over his thick, fleshy lips. I dug my palm tight against the deep slash in my gut, and had the inane idea that it was the only thing still holding my guts inside. “We were never meant to win this war. They used me and my people to test the Republic’s strength.”

I pushed the pain back. It was unimportant. The Force could hold my flesh in for now.

“Who used you?” I demanded. I had to get off this dustball planet, and quick. Em and Xaset were waiting for my command, and it had to be now. Now, while most of the Clan leaders were rallied here, at the culmination of everything.

I did not want to think about the sacrifice ahead. There was no way I could pull all the troops out. Not in time. Not while so many Mando warships sat in orbit, like sitting tach, halted from any offense only due to the mystique of a blood duel on their sacred planet.

“The Sith.” Bubbles of death trapped in his throat, distorting his words. Proud blue eyes creased with virulent dislike as they glared up at me.

“The Sith?” I’d thought it before, but I’d never been certain. The Sith were an ideology that hadn’t been heard from since the demise of Exar Kun. And, yet, Kun had involved the Clans back then, hadn’t he?

A rasping laugh coughed mockingly from the older man’s lungs. “Not those pretenders from a generation ago. You want to see the real puppet-master behind my work, little jetii? Follow my trail beyond the Outer Rim. Follow my footsteps. You’ll be played, just as I was.”

... “Revan, why are you clutching your side?”

I stared down blindly. My fingers clawed deep into my stomach. I expected to see dark blood oozing over my hand, and yet there was nothing.

My other hand... my other hand was holding an ornate, horned helm. A symbol of leadership, an icon of Mandalorian history more powerful than the mask I’d bartered against it. I’d always planned to destroy their cursed helm, launch another blow against the unification of the Clans, another strike at their common banner-

But the Clans held parts of the Outer Rim firm. They always had. Not all sectors, no, but if anything was going to emerge from beyond known space, it would likely be the Mandalorians who encountered it first.

And now I was one blow away from breaking them entirely.

My fingers clenched against nothing. The destruction at Malachor had happened regardless, but I remembered making one slight change to my plans, that day. One out, in case there was ever a need for the Clans to rally again-

“Canderous,” I croaked. “Throw me your comm.”

HK. I can leave a message with HK-

I needed to focus on Malak. This wasn’t the time to go chasing the ghosts of the past. But that didn’t mean I couldn’t leave a trail of crumbs behind.

xXx

The walk back through the Lehon undergrowth was sombre. Jolee led the way, pulling aside the bracken with a good-natured grumble as Zaalbar carried the unconscious Juhani in his arms. Low-lying brambles and spurs of sprawling shrubs made the journey vaguely unpleasant, but at least I knew it to be a relatively short walk back to the beach.

Canderous brought up the rear, dominating the conversation with an ongoing cross-examination of HK and his knowledge of the Star Forge. I was grateful for the distraction, listening to their diatribe with half an ear. For Carth strode next to me, and I knew he was just waiting for a moment to speak. I didn’t know if I was sensing something with the Force, or if it was the way he kept turning to face me, but I could tell he was brimming with barely held-back questions. The personal mingling with the important. It made me feel an uncertainty I couldn’t afford.

Sooner or later, he was going to interject-

“Revan, what... what did you need to say to that blasted droid that was so important?”

I tensed. I had asked the others – told them, really – to grant me ten minutes alone. Used Canderous’ comm to organize a private rendezvous with HK outside the pyramid, while I left my crewmates behind to deal with Juhani.

Of course, HK had remained obstinately silent until I’d lifted the sodding gag order-

Well, it was done, now. HK had his future commands and a holo-recording for safe-keeping. I had no idea if it would make any difference in the end, but at least the knowledge from Malachor was somewhere else other than the murky fractures of my head.

“A message for someone,” I said quietly. “It’s- it’s not important right now, Carth.”

He wasn’t going to let that go easily – and I couldn’t blame him. Carth had always disliked a lack of transparency, and such a vague answer from the likes of me made it worse by an order of magnitude.

But as I wasn’t sure about the message, about my memory, about the truth of anything I recalled-

No. It was best to keep it private, for now.

"HK's uploaded his assessment of the scrambler's mechanism to the 'Hawk,'” I offered, in the faint hope that Carth would be suitably distracted. The assassination droid had completed his objective before my transmit to him and, in that regard, things actually looked promising. "If we open with the turbolasers to damage the outer framework of the pyramid, we can follow up with the proton torpedo. It should be enough to disable the scrambler – if not destroy the kaiburr entirely."

All we needed was the Republic Fleet to arrive, now. And the ‘Hawk* to be flight-worthy.
“I know.” Carth’s response was curt. “I heard the tail-end of his report when I exited the pyramid, Revan.”

“Oh.” I felt strangely tense and awkward as we dwindled into silence. The crunching sound of dry undergrowth beneath our boots seemed discordantly loud. I knew Carth wasn’t pleased with my earlier response, and could guess at his thoughts. He doesn’t know whether to push this topic, or move onto something else. Stars knew there were enough matters left unspoken between us, and I vacillated between believing that was a good thing and wanting to spill my heart out to him.

“So, Tinhead,” Canderous drawled from behind me. He’d been marching next to HK since we’d left the pyramid, peppering him with questions about what we’d be up against. Most were details we’d already gone over with the droid while in hyperspace, but I respected Canderous' desire to revisit the specifics. “Let’s go over the outer defense specs of the Forge. There’s a standard deflector shield to repel enemy fire. We should be able to get past the short-range heavy lasers that guard the three primary docking bays. Our main resistance looks like whatever forces ole Malak has in the skies. Is there anything else we need to take into account?”

I frowned, thinking on the defense matrix over the primary docks. There was something bothering me, an elusive detail I should be catching-

“Answer: Spontaneous fusion-drive malfunction is always a possibility. Not to mention one of Gizka Spawn’s pazaak cards getting wedged in the turbine compressor.”

“The docks,” I murmured to myself. Bastila. There were three massive entrances to the Star Forge that we’d studied from the schematics, all designed to allow large deployments of factory-built starships. But Bastila had mentioned something else. “HK, is there an officer’s dock on the ventral wing of the Forge?”

“Affirmation: There are three small, private docking bays designed for high-ranking meatbags and their own personal craft. These are detailed as supplementary exhaust vents on every diagrammatic, at your command. Elucidation: You desired a means of travelling to and from the Star Forge largely unseen, master. It is also a method I utilized myself.”

Secret docking bays known only to a few. How did Bastila find out? She’d wanted me to land in one of those docks. The ventral one, she’d said, was located close to her. Would Malak have known she’d planned that? He knew the Forge’s snubfighter would never launch from Lehon, so it might very well be a detail he was missing.

If Malak thought on the possibility of the Ebon Hawk reaching the Star Forge, would he account for us using an alternative entrance?

“Alright. We check those out back at the Hawk,” Canderous commented. The thud of his footsteps were heavy behind me. “Could be that’s the best ticket for a Dynamic class freighter to land unseen, assuming the docks are open.”

Bastila had said they would be. Bastila could help, in that regard... if Malak wasn’t watching over her personally.

Bastila still wanted me to stand onboard the Star Forge, no matter that our objectives now stood worlds apart.

“We’ll need to go over the internal defences in that area of the Star Forge,” Canderous continued. My gaze slid sideways, to see Carth’s visor turned in my direction. “So far, we’ve been planning under the assumption of landing in one of the primary docks.”
“Commentary: Anti-personnel turrets and heavy blast doors are standard throughout the entirety of the Star Forge,” HK intoned, from his position next to Canderous. “The true might of the Star Forge comes from its ability to produce machinery, not any sort of humdrum defensive capability.”

“Machinery?” I asked, shooting the droid a quick frown over my shoulder. “Are you referring to the ships it creates, or something else?”

“Clarification: The Rakatan created the Star Forge as an automated starship production facility. However, it must be noted that you were exploring its ability to create battle droids, when you last held mastery of the Star Forge.”

“Droids, eh?” Canderous issued a mild grunt of interest. “Suppose that explains your origins, Tinhead.”

“Agreement: I am the forty-seventh iteration of the master’s brilliance marrying with the Star Forge’s technological prowess. The perfection of my own designation required an exhaustive amount of time and resource, and so the master was exploring the mass-production of a simpler, and hence inferior, model.” There was a faint whir from HK as he took the moment to pause for what he probably calculated as dramatic effect. “Reflection: Had the master been able to replicate my design on a large scale, no doubt we would already be ruling the galaxy in a choke-hold of efficiency and superior intellect.”

Canderous snorted. “Alright, so I guess we assume ole Malak continued along the same line as Revan did. Tell us more about these kriffing battle droids.”

It was odd, hearing of my past plans and deeds, issued forth from the creepy vocabulator of an ominously capable assassination droid. Sometimes I felt like HK’s presence was nothing more than a big karmic joke.

“Revan.” Carth’s low voice dragged my attention away from HK’s onslaught of mechanical specifications. “This isn’t the time for secrets. Whatever set you running off to HK, if it has any bearing on the Star Forge or Malak or anything you need to tell us.”

“It’s not-” I sighed. I owed Carth the truth. I owed him a damn sight more than that, but being around him now just reminded me of the fleeting moments we’d had... the poignant moments I’d lost. “It’s no secret, Carth. A future set of orders and a change of ownership, in the event of my death. I hardly want him to end up in the back corner of a substandard droid shop again.”

“Revan-” Carth sounded like he was biting back curses. “You can’t go into this accepting your own death-”

“I’m not. Trust me, Carth, I’m not. I just- remembered something I had to take care of.”

“Interjection: And by something, the master means diminishing my abilities into no more than a holo-recording unit. Perhaps next I shall be put to use scrubbing the deck of the freighter. Sarcasm: My actuators are abuzz with excitement.”

“It’s called planning, HK,” I returned, rolling my eyes. “Something we meatbags do to maximise our chance of success.”

“Observation: I suppose you have to account for the frailties of your flesh. It must be rather depressing, to be at the whim of your own organic weaknesses. Suggestion: Shall we kill something to cheer you up, master?”

“I see you programmed him with no understanding of his own mortality,” Yudan drawled, a faint touch of amusement in his voice. He’d been silent, until now, picking a clear path through the undergrowth as he kept pace with Zaalbar. “If you hadn’t come to when you did, Revan, your droid would be no more than a heap of plasma-scored pieces left behind in the pyramid.”

“Interjection: I was one step-”

“Carth,” I said quietly, tuning out the sounds of HK’s indignant invective. “The instructions had nothing to do with the Star Forge. Ask me when this is all over and I’ll tell you. But for now let’s keep our eye on the endgame, okay?”

Carth sighed as he ducked underneath a low-lying tangle of spindly branches. “I hate this,” he muttered. “I feel like there’s a thousand things I need to wrap my head around. But Bastila... Revan, are you absolutely certain about what you said earlier? That Bastila has turned on the Fleet?”

“Yes.” There was so much more I could say. How Bastila had tempted me, laid the convincing groundwork for turning against everything Carth stood for. How she had made it sound the right decision. How I had turned it down.

I could win back Carth’s trust. Part of me knew that. Say the right words, sink back into his arms, enjoy a brief moment of intimacy that would bolster the both of us. He wants to trust me. Despite everything.

I didn’t know if it was self-denial or bitter resignation that held me silent. Carth and I would never work. Even with a Republic victory – and, dammit, I would see that come to fruition – I had no future in his world. My past actions had long since burned away any hope of that. Trying to forge a relationship between the two of us would do nothing but destroy a good man.

Malak had been a good man, once.

I stared forward blindly, barely registering how the vegetation thinned and the dry ground slowly transformed into soft sand. Moonlight glinted as we spilled out onto the darkened beach. The ‘Hawk was a welcome shadow ahead of us. With a soft sigh, I lifted my gaze to the sky.

The indigo night was slowly lightening with the onset of dawn. Hanging low on the horizon, the spark of an artificial satellite winked at me. The Star Forge.

“I didn’t find her inside,” Jolee ordered, as we drew near the closest thing I had to a home.

The heavy thud of Zaalbar’s footsteps upon the landing ramp was enough to bring Dustil and Mission scurrying out from underneath the freighter. Mission gasped, one hand flying to her mouth as she silently watched her oldest friend carry the unconscious Cathar inside. Blood-stained bactawraps did little to conceal the mangled condition of Juhani’s leg.

“Bastila?” Mission turned to me, light eyes blinking back moisture. One hand shakily pushed back a pair of goggles high on her lekku. “Did you- did you find her? Was she there?”

Once more, I shook my head in silence.

“The repairs,” Carth cut in, striding to the underbelly of the ‘Hawk. “We need to get moving. Mission, come with me and translate for Teethree.”

I watched Carth as he disappeared beneath the freighter, Mission and Dustil in tow. Jolee followed Zaalbar inside the ‘Hawk, and I took the moment to order HK to stand by in the cargo bay.

For there was a conversation I wasn’t going to let lie – not now I had the opportunity.
With a grimness that still edged into anger, I turned back around. Canderous was standing silently near the treeline, armoured limbs folded. But it was Yudan my eyes fixed upon.

He stared back at me, a remote statue of impassivity.

“You would have killed Jolee. Juhani.” I felt my lips thin. The recollection of his ‘saber lunging at Jolee replayed through my mind. And, back on the Leviathan, the Force as it swirled threateningly around his fist. As he speculated what killing Carth would do to me.

Even in the dim light of early-morning darkness, I could still make out the sharp yellow of Yudan’s gaze as it held mine. Uncompromising and unapologetic. “The old man said it himself, Revan. You would have killed a lot more had you been swayed by Bastila Shan. Stepping back from the precipice had to be your decision, unencumbered by the bonds you hold to anyone else.”

“How?” The word wrenched from my lungs. “Dammit, Yudan, I can barely understand why Jolee was going to attack—why the frell would you have followed me to claim the Star Forge? And don’t give me that line about Revan Freeflight being the one to master the Forge in the first place. You saw what happened last time!”

“Yes.” The word was hissed out, and his expression tightened with blazing emotion that shattered his standard façade of detachment. His fists clenched tight at his sides, and I could feel his intensity as it spilled out onto the Force. “And if you had truly decided that was your path, then I would have followed you. Followed, and plunged my lightsaber into your back before you became Darth Revan again!”

The shock of Yudan’s words slammed into me like a deluge of frost-choked sleet. A test. There was a lump in my throat I could barely swallow past. He was testing me. The bastard was testing me.

Like the flames of a hearth-fire blazing into existence, I felt my anger at him ignite once more. Again and again, he funneled all his energy into measuring my actions, rather than thinking on anything else that was going on. Yudan Rosh didn’t give a damn about Malak or Bastila or whether the galaxy was safe. No, all he cared about was ensuring Darth Revan stayed buried in the bitter cinders of history.

The Force flared. And I found myself submerged in a torrent of emotions directed at a spectre of my past that had more than enough reason to hate me.

The satisfaction as my fist landed hard into his face was most un-Jedi-like.

Yudan stumbled backwards, almost falling. I had the errant thought that maybe he’d let me have that blow; realizing that on some level, he deserved it—

He took one more step back. A bronzed hand raised to rub at the side of his face, but he made no move in retaliation.

I flexed my fist, still glaring, as my fury slowly ebbed. In the distance, I heard Canderous snort with amusement. He and Carth still sported identical shiners from their brawl earlier, and I really hoped I’d given Yudan one to match.

“Would you damn well figure out what side you’re on,” I growled through clenched teeth.

“I’ve already told you, Revan,” Yudan said quietly. He didn’t look angry. In fact—the bastard was always so damn hard to read—he almost looked gratified. “I’m on the side that Darth Revan is not.”
Stars, he’d said those words so many times. Everything he’d done so far was to place himself in the best position to kill me should the worst happen. I understood his drive, but that didn’t stop my resentment. Yudan was a chiv-blade lodged at my heart, ready to be thrown at the first misstep. One I wasn’t sure I’d have the fortitude to dodge.

And I, just like everyone else, was fallible. Something I hadn’t believed, once.

Everyone is fallible, a disapproving man’s voice snapped in my head. An echo I’d heard before. Even you. Especially you.

“Except—” Yudan paused, staring at me, and his expression – just for a moment – softened. “I am starting to see that Darth Revan really was vanquished a year ago. And Revan Freeflight, whom I thought long buried, rose anew from the ashes.”

With a tilt of the head, he turned and walked away from me.

The breath escaped my lungs in surprise. That was a redemption I didn’t expect.

The image of a fallen friend flashed through my mind, lying charred and strangled on the Leviathan by my dark will alone.

A redemption I didn’t deserve.

And yet… and yet, I couldn’t deny how much it meant to me, to hear those words.

I glanced back to the Hawk, blinking. To my surprise, Jolee was standing at the top of the ramp, watching the scene in silence. And Carth… Carth had backed out from underneath the ship, arms folded, legs apart in a military stance, attention solely fixed on me. I had no idea what they’d overheard, but Carth’s expression was inscrutable. I tensed, and immediately knew he’d be angling for a conversation I wasn’t sure I wanted— I couldn’t—

More to distract me from whatever Carth might be thinking, I turned to Jolee.

“Juhani?” I enquired in a low voice.

“She’s stable, for now,” the old man returned, slowly trudging down the ramp. “I came out to see how long before launch.”

“Two hours, maybe less.” Carth’s reply was matter-of-fact. “Revan, much as your old general likes to hide away and sulk, I won’t wait for him to wander back. We go as soon as we’re able.”

“Noted.” I felt my eyelids droop briefly as I levelled out a sigh. “Jolee. Jolee, what were you thinking? Yudan would’ve killed you. I could’ve killed you. You’d already made your point— why throw your life away like that?”

The old man snorted. “You know, lass, sometimes you miss the obvious.” Jolee rubbed absently at his fingernails, staring down at them as if hand-hygiene was the most important item on his to-do list. “It’s all that flouncing about you do. And probably too many holo-vids. They rot your brain—” “Jolee!” I snapped.

Jolee sighed, an annoyed sound like he was irritated at having to spell it out. “Maybe it’s not the dying that’s important, Revan. Maybe it’s the way we die. What we choose to stand up for.”

Well, that sounds suitably cryptic and unhelpful, I thought with mild irritation.
“What would your death have achieved, Jolee?” I stared hard at him, willing the old man to look up and face me. Slowly, he did, his expression shadowed with the heaviness of age. “How could it have done anything but cement me on a path you didn’t wish me to choose in the first place?”

“Ach, you’re looking at it from the wrong angle,” he murmured, his voice gentling. There was a discernible emotion glimmering in his eyes, and I could see the old man was suddenly turning serious on me. “My wife fell, Revan. You know this. She was strong in the Force, my Nayama. So strong. But so ill-trained.” He trailed off, turning his head to stare into the bleakness of nothing. “We fought, you know. Duelled, when it became clear neither of us could convince the other. In the end, I won, but I could not kill my own heart. So, like a love-struck idiot, I let her walk away.”

I could feel a frown of confusion etching into my forehead. “You wish you’d killed her?”

The brief gust of a laugh escaped him. “No, young pup. I should have stood my ground. Forced her to cut me down on her way to Exar Kun. Oh, she longed for training, the ability to harness the Force that the Jedi denied her- despite offering it to her sister. Nayama... she didn’t stand wholly in the darkness then. No, our duel tore her heart apart as much as it did mine.”

Jolee slowly turned back to face me. His expression trembled with emotion he wasn’t too proud to reveal. Love, for his lost wife, still shining brightly beneath a layer of soul-wrenching grief. "The journey to the Dark Side begins small, you know. Concessions, desires, lapses of judgment... all without reflection. Every day, I regret not forcing Nayama into a real, tangible choice. Every day I regret not making her face what the end of her journey would look like, before she became so twisted she no longer cared."

His voice, deep and gravelly with the sorrow of ages, felt like the only sound on the planet.

“She might have killed you,” I whispered.

Jolee inclined his head, and the ghost of a wry smile touched his lips. “Aye, yes, she very well might have. In which case, nothing I would’ve said would have mattered anyway.” He shrugged, and the rueful expression deepened. “But my life might have been enough to stop her. That’s the curse that’s been on me, since the day I let her walk away and join Exar Kun. And that’s why I stood against you, young pup.”

He paused, and I took the moment to weigh his words carefully. In some ways, Jolee represented to me the very embodiment of a seasoned Force master, bowed but not broken with the injustices of life. A man who knew himself, and accepted the disappointments and recriminations that self-reflection could bring – without letting it damage his own self-worth.

A master, but not a Jedi. Not a Jedi of this galaxy. The dangers of emotional attachment had burned the Jedi Order, hardening and blinding their ethos. I had no right and no place to judge the Order, but when it came to attachment... they are wrong, Jolee knows it, and so do I.

“Did she die, Jolee?”

“Ach, I have no idea.” His hands lifted in a gesture of the unknown. “Exar was killed in battle. Nomi stripped Ulic of the Force and he disappeared. Nayama... I tried to find out. I tried. But the only Jedi who might’ve known...” he broke off with a half-hearted snort. “Well. Nomi refused to see me. Then, or any time since. She’s dead now, and I’m left without answers. My wife... my wife was fairly infamous, by the time Exar was defeated, and yet there was no trace of her. Perhaps Nayama died an anonymous casualty of the war, or maybe she fled into exile. Eventually, I stopped looking. If Nayama had still lived, she would have known where to find me.”
His last words trailed our conversation into silence. Jolee nodded at me, before turning to shoot Carth a knowing glance.

“I’ll go check on Juhani,” he said, shuffling back to the ramp. “Your friends are what give you strength, Revan. Don’t forget that.”

“Huh,” Canderous muttered behind me. I’d almost forgotten the Mandalorian was still there. “It is true that Clan is strength. I’ll give the old man that, even if he is a protein bar shy of a field-ration.”

“I heard that!” Jolee hollered as the hatch closed behind him.

Canderous snorted. “Won’t be long till we leave this rock. I’ll go drag the brooding Twi’lek back.” There was a knowing, almost sly tone in his next words. “Don’t yap too long. We’ve got a ship to fix and a plan to discuss. And Mand’alor knows you two do seem to have the worst timing.”

He chuckled under his breath as his footsteps thudded away.

Carth’s gaze hadn’t left me since I’d turned around. At some stage, he’d removed his visor. It would be morning, soon. I could see it in the dim light of near-dawn as it kissed his face.

“Carth-” I didn’t know what to say to him. I didn’t know what I wanted to hear. A stronger woman would’ve walked past, walked inside, or found the words to quench the glow of hope that shone in his face.

“Bastila tried to make you claim the Star Forge, didn’t she?”

My head dipped in a silent nod.

“Why?” Carth whispered. “I’m trying to make sense of what went on up there, but I don’t understand... you once predicted Malak would warp Bastila into turning against the Republic, but why would she now want you to- to-”

He seemed unable to finish the sentence.

“Malak showed her... he showed her what we found. Why we turned. Why we attacked the Republic, four years ago,” I murmured, and felt my eyes close. “Bastila isn’t loyal to Malak, Carth. She believes the right thing to do is for me... for us to reclaim the Star Forge. She is convinced it’s the only way for the galaxy to prevail.”

“That’s why you were asking why you went to the Unknown- wait, Revan, do you remember any of it?” His voice edged into sharpness. “You can’t- you can’t think it’s still out there? What- what is it?”

“I- I don’t know.” A creeping plague of death. A sentient spread of malaise. An evil hand guiding the Force, darker than any seen before. “I don’t know how real it is... but it- it broke us. Mal and I. We- we meant to save the Republic.” My own words cut deep into my heart. I felt the tears brim, and willed them back. “Instead, we did our damnedest to destroy it. Whatever we found in the Unknown Regions, Bastila believes in the truth of it. Just like I did, once. Fiercely enough to turn on everything I held dear.”

“And now?” His voice ghosted to mine as he inched closer.

“I don’t know. I don’t know, Carth. But I do know claiming the Star Forge ends in only one way, and it’s not a victory for the Republic or the galaxy. I think- I think I once believed the light wasn’t strong enough... but what I understand now is the dark has only one master... and it’s not the one who wields it.”

“So. You’ve turned your back on it, then.” His words were so low I could barely hear him. He stood close enough that I could almost feel the brush of his body against mine. “On your Dark Side. The Star Forge. Even on Bastila.”

My shoulders slumped, and my eyes opened to stare blindly at the ground. “I’ll get her back, Carth. If it’s the last thing I do. I won’t let her become something she despises.”

His fingers burned as they touched my cheek. And I knew, then, that this was the moment to step back. To break away, from something precious and fleeting and golden... something that wouldn’t stand the test of time or the consequences of my past – no matter how much we wished it would.

I stayed motionless.

“I stopped thinking of any sort of future years ago,” Carth whispered, as his hand gently encircled my jaw. Tentatively, he raised my chin and my gaze slowly followed. “And now, it seems, I can barely think of anything else.”

“You can’t... you can’t seriously forgive me, after all that I’ve done.”

Carth’s mouth curved in a gentle smile. “Believe it or not, I’m getting there. You’re not who you once were, Revan. It’s taken me awhile to see that, but I do. You can be... you can be so much more than your past. Whatever the Jedi did to you, however wrong they were, they gave you that chance, at least.”

I blinked furiously. “I’m not some sort of redeemed paragon, Carth. The darkness- it still calls. I think it always will.”

“That’s why you need people who love you to stand by you, Revan. To remind you of what you have, right next to you. I-” A faint colour rose on his cheeks, but his gaze didn’t waver from mine. “I want to give you a reason to stay true. To who you are, right here, right now.”

There wasn’t an answer to that. I knew, deep down, that the strength of will he was talking about came from within. But there was no denying how the bonds of friendship, of family, of love, could bolster that strength.

Nor could I refute how precious his words were, even if the promise of a future felt like a daydream’s wisp that wouldn’t stand against the harsh realities of life.

But still. The moment itself was worth treasuring.

“So,” I murmured, feeling the corner of my mouth twitch. “Are you going to kiss me, or do I have to do all the legwork around here?”

Carth blinked, before both eyebrows rose in disbelief. “You’re really something else, you know that?”

And he grinned, before lowering his lips to mine.

xXx

Chapter End Notes
Coming up next: Yudan receives an unexpected offer.

A dancing Twi'lek troupe's worth of thanks to kosiah for the beta.

Comments regenerate a fanfic author's HP. It's true!
Sunrise

- Yudan Rosh -

The early morning air was a cool comfort as I faced the darkened shore. Waves died quietly upon the soft sand, a gentle lap of noise intermingling with the faint buzz of nocturnal gnit-flies. Above, twinkling innocently in pre-dawn sky, was the Star Forge.

Soon the nascent light of a new day would blot out its artificial glow, but the Star Forge would remain visible to the naked eye for what it was: an alien curse orbiting an empty world.

Bar her apprentice, Darth Revan had never let any Force-sensitive stand upon that eons-old relic.

...

"The Dark Side is strong there, Yudan. So strong that it becomes tempting to lose oneself." She had her back turned to me, staring out through the tempered transparisteel viewport in her quarters. As she so often did. "I risk only what is necessary for my purposes. The Star Forge is my tool, and I shall not allow it to become my weakness."

In my quieter moments - away from her - I knew that it already was.

...

It seemed ironic, now, that Revan Freeflight was the one to finally lead me there.

I had studied the schematics well, and had an idea of the size of the Star Forge. Somewhere onboard was the flawed Jedi who had saved Darth Revan's life, despite all logic and common-sense. I wasn't sure if I, at that point in time, would have shown Darth Revan the same mercy.

There was no denying Revan owed Bastila Shan her life. And yet, she had found the fortitude to deny Bastila, to turn away from the biggest mistake she had ever made. I had not truly believed Revan would reject the Dark Side's call, despite the hope I had denied existed within my heart.

Bastila Shan was a challenge Revan would face again. Worse than her, though, was Malak.

Malak.

We had been friends, once. It had taken years. Time for him to mature, to trust me, to understand that I would not step where I had no right. Once we were fully engaged in the Mandalorian Wars, the four of us had formed the core of the Jedi Thirteen. Revan, Malak, Meetra and I.

Despite the blood, the sacrifice, the despair- in many ways I still viewed that time as the golden age of my past. Before Malachor. Before the Star Forge. Before Revan reinvented the Sith Empire, and all our friends and allies fell, one way or another. Seduced or killed by the primal side of the Force.

The Dark Side had a way of obfuscating the past in an unholy marriage of burning emotion and frigid detachment. One could not function as a Dark Jedi if the past retained tangible holds on one's soul.

Now... now, too many parts of it were leeching back to me.

...

"You won't be at Malachor." Meetra's voice, soft and musical, stated a fact rather than posed a query.

I inclined my head in agreement. "I will be posted with Adashan's forces. We will be the net to catch any survivors."

"Good." Meetra glanced away, an uncharacteristic expression of uncertainty on her face. She, who sensed the emotions of others so readily, rarely came across as flustered. Once I had envied Meetra that ability, before I had seen what the isolation had done to her.

"What is it?"

Her lips pursed. "Casualties," she murmured, her pale blue eyes dimming with melancholy. "We can't hope to pull out all our forces in time. Xaset and I... given our proximity, there is a very real chance we won't survive."

I felt my heart clench as I stared hard at my oldest friend. I did not know all the intricacies of Revan's plan, but I understood that Meetra and Xaset were fundamental to it. And that had its own underlying risk.

My mind, as always, trailed back to the woman at the core of everything. There was a twitch to Meetra's wide mouth, as if she sensed the betrayal of my thoughts. Perhaps she had. I knew part of what made our friendship so strong was my own emotional shields; Meetra had once told me I was the quietest soul she'd ever had the grace to befriend, and I knew she was not talking about a lack of expansive verbiage.

But, still. I could not hide everything from an empath.

"Revan understands sacrifice," she said quietly. "Too well, these days. I remember how she reacted when her homeworld Talshion was destroyed. When Cariaga died. Every time we lost more than expected. I'm worried what my death might do to her, Yudan. She'll allow her guilt to harden her further, and she is too hard already."

"Malak will be there for her," I said, without a trace of bitterness. I had long since accepted his role in her life, or so I told myself daily. "I do not like to think of your death, Meetra, no matter that we may have accepted our mortality years ago. Perhaps you need to focus on your own survival."

Meetra shot me a half-smile, but would not be derailed. "Malak holds Revan's heart, but don't underestimate the depth of her regard toward you. We all need friends as much as lovers." Her soulful eyes held mine. "And sometimes, a friend can reach where a lover cannot."

...

In the end, neither friend nor lover had been able to reach Revan. Only Bastila Shan's inexplicable stroke of mercy - and the Jedi manipulations that followed - had achieved that.

But by then the four of us were long shattered. I had seen Meetra, once, during the aftermath of Malachor. Empty, broken, grasping desperately onto Xaset's hand. What had the deaths of so many done to such a gentle, empathic soul? Xaset himself was but a walking corpse, pain etched deep into his hollow eyes.

Even the smallest creature, even the trees themselves, could be sensed through the Force. Whatever had happened to Meetra and Xaset, the Force was burned out of them. My senses told me it was impossible for them to be standing, breathing, living in front of me.

I had not heard from Meetra or Xaset since that day. And as the Dark Side clawed ever deeper into my soul, I stopped thinking of them. Now... now it was like the scab had been torn open, bleeding anew. Was my oldest friend still alive, still Force-less, still radiating with the horrors of Malachor?

A selfish part of me was glad she disappeared. That one person from my past had not been a party to all we devolved into. Had not seen first-hand all we had done.

The thud of footsteps in the distance broke me from the bitter ruminations of my past. It was not Revan's light tread, no; judging by the tenacious look in her soldier's eyes earlier, I thought she might be otherwise engaged.

I could not begrudge her happiness. Not now, not anymore. Who knew, perhaps her soldier would be a better fit for her than Malak. From the little I had seen of Carth Onasi, he struck me as the sort who would not compromise his own values for the love of anyone - even one such as Revan.

And, he lacked the Force.

Perhaps a partner who was not exposed to the temptations of the Force would be a better fit for Revan Freeflight. A better shield, a better grounding force.

I did not begrudge Revan her happiness. But after this - after the Star Forge, should we survive - I would not stay in her orbit. I could not.

I turned around, to acknowledge the oncoming figure of Canderous Ordo.

We had reached an accord, I felt, over the weeks of travelling together. Yet I had not forgotten the black look of retribution on his face when I had ordered the Leviathan soldiers to bring him down.

"Rosh," Ordo greeted, as he trudged within earshot. Dawn was close. The early morning light outlined his armour; a patched-together military suit of duramesh and a garish purple chest-plate. Functional and heavy, for all that it wasn't beskar. Ordo was visibly unarmed, but I had a wealth of experience with Mandalorians - they liked to squirrel away weapons all over their person. It often seemed to be a competition amongst them. "The droid's almost done on the Hawk. It's close to end-game. I reckon you never planned to be here, doing this, but here you are." He looked me up and down, as if taking my measure. "Have you spared a thought for what you're gonna do after?"

I had. And the thoughts were both tumultuous and inconclusive.

Incarceration amongst the Jedi. Execution sanctioned by the Senate. Death somewhere onboard the Star Forge. Each option more likely than the previous.

I threw Ordo an unconcerned shrug. "Your assumption of our survival is a rather large one, Ordo."

"I plan on survival, Rosh," he retorted, his voice dry. "What would be the point, otherwise?"

I had to concede that to him, with a nod of my head. Canderous Ordo was both a simple man, and a smart one. Like a number of Mandalorians I'd known, over the years.

Although, there'd been plenty who were thick as tusk-pig crap, too.
"Look, I ain't sure about you, Rosh. But I'm sure what will happen if you let the Republic get their hands on you."

My eyes narrowed, but his stare back was flat and steady. "You think I should run."

A faint look of irritation crossed his weathered face. We weren't far away in age, but I'd guess he had a decade on me, maybe. A man of war, much the same as myself, yet one who knew his own values and foibles - and accepted them.

"I ain't suggesting anything, Rosh. But you're too focused on Revan and Malak's little factory to think past it. And look, I get that, I do - but you gotta think past it. Sounds like the robes caught up in all of this have kriff-all status now. It's the Republic calling the shots, ain't it? And if you don't watch out, you'll end up walking straight into your own publicized execution."

It is what I expect. I didn't say it, well-aware what Ordo's mocking reaction would be to what he'd label melodrama.

Ordo let out a non-committal grunt. "I'll be headed back to my clan, after this. It's time the Mando'ade pulled their heads out of their collective arses and started being true to themselves. I intend to be a pivotal part of that."

I sent him a short nod of acknowledgment. "Good luck."

I was surprised, with him being both Mandalorian and wholly unconnected to me, that my words were both genuine and heartfelt. I really did wish the warrior the best.

He nodded in return, turned, and walked away. Some five metres gone, he stopped.

I frowned at his back. Canderous Ordo wasn't one for uncertainty, or dramatic pauses.

"Ordo will need new blood, new strength," he said slowly, his voice low and deep. He did not turn. "The Mando'ade value adoption of those who know and honour our way of life. We're wary of the Force for good reason, but Force-sensitive Mando'ade ain't entirely unheard of. Rare, yes, but not unheard of."

He paused again, while I was shocked into silence. I could feel my mind racing, even as my limbs froze in disbelief. Truly, it had been so long since anyone had offered me something that wasn't given out of fear.

"I ain't sure about you, Rosh, but I think I'd gamble on you," he offered, still facing away. "And a simpler life might be a happier one for you."

I... had no rejoinder. No idea what to say or think in response to such a generous, unwarranted offer.

"Think about it. But not too long, alright? We got a battle to win first."

And then, he left.

xXx

A simple life. A happy life.

I recalled the time I'd mercilessly killed a family of Rodians pleading for their lives. They were simple farmers, no doubt happy with their lot on a remote, rural planet that we ear-marked as a
They likely had a simple, happy life before we arrived. But sentients who refused to leave were forcibly removed. In the quickest possible fashion.

I bombed a resource planet of Onderon to cow a royal leader into submission. I located a suitable moon for a Jedi containment complex, and did not dwell on the fate of the prisoners of war shipped there. The Dark Side was good at eroding conscience of any sort.

I ran Jonn Dan through with my double-blade, when he mocked my attachment to Darth Revan one too many times. Jonn had been my friend, my comrade, my fellow Jedi Thirteen, once.

The idea of a future after the Star Forge - a future actually worth something - had not occurred to me until now. I did not know if I damned Canderous Ordo or blessed him for the thought. It meant coming to terms with the entirety of my past, and that was harder without a mind-wipe to erase all the gory details.

The descent to the Dark Side had been a series of slow, measured steps. At first, it was easy to justify ruthless acts with the end result. To convince oneself that, in the future, we would rise above this sort of behaviour. That we were only doing what had to be done, utilizing the quickest route to unlock the power and strength necessary for the times we lived in.

That it wouldn't always be like this: things would change when the dust settled and we had our established peace and order that was stronger than the antiquated beast they called the Republic.

Then, slowly, I cared less. The awareness was still there, the understanding between right and wrong, but the empathy eroded. What did others' pain mean to me? I had lived through many lifetimes of pain. One grew hard and strong, or one died, and that was reality of life.

The Force itself was intoxicating. The rush of strength, augmented by emotion, burning through my body as pure, undiluted energy. I held the power to do anything I wanted, be anyone I wanted. All it meant was kneeling to those few stronger than me.

And I'd been kneeling to Revan my whole life, light or dark.

When Revan died, I ceased to feel anything but the icy core of the dark. Fiery emotion was conquered by an endless winter of detachment, freezing my every desire. I continued on with Malak's will, my only motivation the twisted addiction of the Force, as it swirled shadows of arctic despair that dogged every beat of my cursed heart.

I cared for nothing. I spoke little. I sent starships into combat in an empty echo of Mandalorian battles and Republic glory that felt more like a half-forgotten dream than my own past. I didn't fear death, not really. I thought it would come at Malak's hand, one day; maybe even Bandon or one of the others if they caught me off-guard.

And then, Revan.

And then.

Her resurrection was a blazing meteor that crashed into my indifference, shattering it into a million fragments.

I swore to find her, kill her, kill us both, and put an end to this tormented corruption that had spiralled into insanity after Malachor. I would have followed through on my vow had she been anything like the Revan after Malachor. Any glimpse of evil, any breach of morality, any lack of empathy.

But once more, she completely blind-sided me. I found a damaged woman; but one who was also driven, reckless, and loyal.

The Revan I had once known, a lifetime ago. The passionate Jedi my life once orbited around.

The descent to the Dark Side was a series of slow, measured steps. But the climb back up- that was a crawl. As, inch by inch, my fingertips scrabbled to purchase higher on the cliff of awareness and consequence.

It would get harder, I thought. And yet I was once more following Revan - this time, back to the light.

That- that had to stop.

That had to change. For the sake of myself, I couldn't do it for her, because of her. Not anymore.

Revan might show me the path back to the light, but I had to take it for myself.

With a shaky inward breath, I knew it was time to head back to the Ebon Hawk. Somehow, I wasn't surprised to turn around and see Revan strolling toward me.

She was a figure wrapped in a lightweight duramesh suit, feet shod in scuffed boots, her old master's lightsaber clearly visible on a tattered utility belt. Revan cared little for appearances, these days; much like the pragmatic youth I had once known.

"I came to say we'll be departing soon." Revan's voice carried over to me, the faint breeze ghosting it to my ears. "But- I wanted to talk, first."

"Did we not already talk outside your freighter?" I asked, lifting a brow in rhetorical inquiry. The skin on the side of my face had tightened, already, with that one blow. I could allow her that transgression, if it meant she now had some understanding of my actions.

Revan's mouth twitched, but she did not rise to the bait. "There's- there's more, isn't there?" she murmured. "Between us. Our history, I mean. It's more than just us falling to the Dark Side. It's- it's personal, somehow. Isn't it?"

My shoulders stiffened, despite myself. There is no 'just' about falling to the Dark Side. But, still, her perception was painfully correct.

"There are some matters best left forgotten, Revan," I clipped out, turning away to stare blindly at the indigo ocean. From here, it looked endless. "Or best left alone."

I would not speak of it. Not to her, not to anyone. The twist of passion and hate still knifed in my gut at times. In the depths of Darth Revan's corruption, all her allies had been no more than dejarik pieces used to keep each other in line.

Even her childhood love had been broken down and measured as nothing more than his usefulness to her objectives.

If Malak had no chance, then I certainly didn't.

Our loyalty had been absolute, and Revan took it for granted that it would always stay that way, no matter what she did. Maybe- maybe, Malak's loyalty would have remained steadfast, had she actually taken a care with it.

"It's not like I want to remember anything from those days," she was muttering behind me, "But sometimes I feel like there's no choice- that to move forward I have to uncover-"

"You don't," I cut in, and I could hear the ice in my voice. "Some events are better buried in the past, where they belong. They would only rip open the scars and bleed the darkness out if you keep picking at them."

There was a pause. "Okay. A bit on the tragic side there, Yudan, but I'm coming to expect that from you." There was the soft sound of feet padding on sand, and I felt rather than saw her walk to my side. I kept my eyes fixed on the blurred line of the horizon, that promise of infinite distance, and wondered if she did the same.

I wasn't sure if she sought me out for anything further, for we both lapsed into a silence that was more comfortable than I expected. I still felt the camaraderie we had once shared - but it surprised me that she seemed to, also. To her, surely, I was no more than an unbalanced villain teetering on the jagged edge of redemption. No more than a lost Jedi who had once followed her lead.

"After this I won't follow you again, Revan," I whispered, unsure if the words were for her or myself. Perhaps they were meant for us both.

"Follow me?" she questioned, a sharpness cresting in her voice that was either surprise or indignation. "Did I ask you to, Yudan? Sun and stars, where would you follow me anyway? To our public execution, on the off-chance that we actually survive the frelling Forge?"

Despite myself, a chuckle fell from my lips. "I wonder if Ordo's bent her ear, too. "Maybe the Republic will throw us a joint trial. Save on the administration costs."

"Like a combined birthday party, but with beheadings instead of lolly scrambles," she muttered, and I heard the wholly inappropriate grin in her voice.

But my smile faded, as I recalled a deranged event Talvon had organized once, in celebration of his fourth decade of life. He'd killed a pair of lieutenants he'd caught screwing in a lift while on-duty. Hacked their heads clean off after watching them eat a slice of his overpriced anniversary spice-cake.

And Talvon had smiled sweetly, before forcing the remaining officers to stay for hours afterward and indulge in idle chitchat with him. Talvon had kicked the ensanguined heads to the side of the room, and blithely ignored the streaks of gore smudging beneath boots as they trekked over the titasteel floor.

The noose of insanity held Talvon tight, then. That was right after Telos. Right before Revan executed him.

Will it always be this way, where the slightest comment dredges up a sliver of evil from my past? And it slices against my soul with the black conscience that I had refused to feel at the time?

Maybe there was no escaping it. Certainly, I had been involved in enough to warrant infinite self-flagellation. I could only hope that Revan remained mostly unaware of those memories of the worst part of her life. She might never understand the mercy her amnesia and mind-damage truly was, but I did.

"I don't want you to follow me, Yudan," she whispered finally. "Not after this. I don't want anyone to follow me, ever again."
I sighed. Revan had always been sharp on the uptake, remarkably perceptive, and yet with regards to herself- almost wilfully blind. "That is not is up to you, Revan. People follow who they choose. But I- it is time I found my own way. I am not sure what that will be, but it needs to be on my own terms, now."

I could feel her eyes on me, and finally, finally, I turned back to meet her. There was a depth of curiosity in that moss-green gaze - for she did not know me anymore, not truly, and that still burned at times - but at least there was solid respect there.

"Will you go back to the Jedi?" she asked quietly.

"Perhaps." I inclined my head. The conversation with Ordo tempted me in another direction, a wholly unexpected one, and I had no idea which path I would choose. All I knew was that it would not be Revan's. "Perhaps I owe Vandar that much. If there is any sentient whose counsel I might heed, it could very well be his."

A frown creased her face at that. "Vandar- he's the short green one that talks funny, right? I got the impression he was Vrook's oddball sidekick."

I couldn't repress a snort of incredulity, at that. Despite my comprehension of her memory loss, there were times when it caught me completely off-guard. "Vandar Tokare is centuries old, Revan, and a Grand Master besides. He is the only Jedi Master who holds a seat on both the Dantooine Council and the High Council. While Vrook Lamar is a respected and established Master who occasionally reports to Coruscant, Vandar is surely one of the pillars of the Order itself."

Her lips twitched. "So he's more important than I realized. You going to check yourself in to him, then?"

I shrugged. "He was my master, Revan. I was a Dantooine child. I had only recently ascended to knight and transferred to Coruscant when you and Malak first joined the Order."

Her shoulders hunched uncomfortably, as they always did when one spoke of Malak and her youth. I could see, sometimes, her desire to learn more about of past- mingled with a horrified denial she still struggled with.

"We trained together a lot, didn't we?" she asked softly. My gaze flew to hers, but Revan already anticipated my rejoinder with a grimace. "I don't- I don't remember, Yudan, but our spars... they're familiar. Very familiar."

I turned away again, to face the ever-dawning horizon. Slowly, slowly, the sky was paling to a cerulean blue. The few puffs of cloud visible were edged in sunrise pink. "Yes," I said finally. "You asked me to teach you, the first time we met. All but begged me, if I am honest."

I heard the sound of a half-choked chuckle as she stepped close to my side. "How did we meet? Would you tell me?"

I didn't want to. Enough excogitating of history, I was ready to head back and face the present.

"Please," she whispered; and the word, sincere and heartfelt, was a ghostly echo of that first meeting. I found, as a fond smile rose unbidden to my lips, that some things had not changed. It was as hard to deny her now as it had been so many years ago.

... "Perhaps that's enough for today," Master Kavar said, his voice mild as he thumbed off his lightsaber. The Jedi Master was cloaked in a demeanour of tranquillity, his stance relaxed and his manner serene, as if our hour-long spar affected him not at all.

But I could detect signs that belied his composure. The sheen of sweat glistening at his brow. The slight tremble of fatigue in his forearms. I pushed back a surge of accomplishment that bordered on pride, and instead acknowledged him with a formal bow.

"Thank you for the duel, Master Kavar," I intoned. I had heard of Master Kavar's lightsaber prowess before I had met him, and was already thinking on what he could teach me. Kavar was young for a master, as I was young for a knight, and there was more than one similarity between us. "I look forward to our next bout."

"(You do your home enclave credit, Knight Yudan)," Master Kavar continued, still with the calm expression clouding his blue Human eyes. It was the sudden switch to Ryl that made me blink, though. "(I hope you will come to see Coruscant as your new home, much the same as you did Dantooine, once)."

The reminder of arriving on Dantooine as a bewildered twelve year old was unsettling. Coupled with Kavar's use of my home tongue, it immediately set my mind racing. Was he deliberately referring to my origins? My childhood spent readying for a life of political leadership, only for it to be wrested away by a chance encounter with a Jedi? Perhaps. After all, the Onderonite Kavar Kira would have been a royal delegate of import himself, had he not been found as Force sensitive.

Once a Jedi, all former ties are forgotten, a raspy voice echoed. Equal, here, we all are. One with the Force, no matter our lineage or background.

That had been true on Dantooine. But, here in the Core of the galaxy, it seemed Jedi matters were more enmeshed in governmental intrigue. Perhaps I had been naÃ've in assuming the Jedi High Temple would remain detached from the political machinations that were the heart-blood of Coruscant's Galactic City. Ambassadors from member-states all over the galaxy came to Coruscant, each bringing their own entourage of advisors and officiates and trade bureaucrats. Many would knock on the entrance of the High Temple. Many would be admitted. And Ryloth, my once-home before the Force claimed me, had always been an influential member of the Republic.

I had no leverage with the past and the people I had left behind, but it did not seem that others understood that. A mere ten days had passed since my arrival, and I had already dealt with more allusions and speculations regarding my genealogy than the entire eight years of training on Dantooine.

I was beginning to doubt the wisdom of my transfer to Coruscant.

Master Kavar was still looking at me expectantly, awaiting my reply. His gaze danced briefly over my shoulder before landing back on mine. Keeping a watchful eye on our silent observer, no doubt. Someone had sidled into the senior training rooms halfway through our duel, and although neither of us had acknowledged the presence, it was impossible to miss the flare of raw power ebbing on the sidelines.

"(I am sure I shall, Master Kavar)," I answered finally, sticking to Ryl. Master Vandar always chided me for my innate suspicion. Perhaps Master Kavar had merely been searching for a way to make me comfortable and welcome in my new home. "(Coruscant will have much to teach me, I am sure)."

"(Vandar Tokare does not often train apprentices)," Kavar mused. He took a step back, eyeing me over in consideration. "(He is renowned for his duelling technique, however, despite how rarely he switches on his 'saber. I begin to see why he picked you, Knight Yudan)."

My old master had been the one to urge me to transfer to Coruscant. As formidable as Master Vandar's lightsaber forms were, his style was also unique and distinctive. Dantooine had little to offer in the way of duelling masters, other than Vandar Tokare.

"(Master Vandar has taught me much)," I agreed. "(Combat has always been my focus. That is when the Force calls strongly to me, like it is but a natural extension of my body)."

Perhaps I had hoped for more from the Human master than a smile of agreement. My greatest struggle had always been the flipside of combat: meditation, oneness, self-reflection. Finding the peace of the Force through a non-physical channel. It was not a weakness of Vandar Tokare, but I did not know enough about Kavar Kira to judge if he attained the same level of enlightenment.

Master Kavar was looking beyond me again. "Perhaps we should ask our visitor from H'ratth if she wishes to join us?" he suggested, switching fluidly back to Galactic Basic as his voice raised in volume. "Come forward, Jedi Knight, and let us hear your observations of our spar."

I turned, to witness a Human teenager walk cautiously closer. Long-limbed, olive-skinned, and a tad on the scrawny side, our spectator strolled toward us with a half-smile twitching along her mouth. She wore the dark brown robes of the delegation from H'ratth - five Jedi Knights, all told, recognizable from the samite-thread robes they wore - a slightly darker shade than the garb of Coruscanti Jedi. I knew little of H'ratth, other than that they were reputed to be as reclusive as Dantooine was untraditional. A delegation from their enclave was rare.

"I am Jedi Master Kavar Kira," Master Kavar introduced, bowing in greeting. "And this is Jedi Knight Yudan Rosh."

The youth of the mysterious Jedi Knight surprised me. Not much more than a girl, really; somewhere in her mid-teens - I had a handful of years on her at least. A few dark curls fell into her eyes, escaping a haphazardly knotted braid tossed carelessly over one shoulder. That H'ratth would send a youngster as one of their envoys surprised me, considering this was their first visit in over three years.

The Human grimaced, her slightly up-turned nose wrinkling in discomfort. I was drawn, suddenly, to the expressiveness of her moss-green eyes. My once-clan on Ryloth had been seen as more cosmopolitan and worldly than most, and I had grown up around many Humans.

This one was easy to read.

Her stance was tense and wary, and her attention darted between us. There was no denying the spark of mischief in her expression, even as it warred with a growing uneasiness. The H'ratth delegation had been here less days than I had, and were expected to depart with the next morning's sun. I had not thought I would meet one of their envoys surprised me, considering this was their first visit in over three years.

But as I stared at the Human in dawning suspicion, I began to comprehend that I still might not.

"I'm not from H'ratth," she admitted, lifting her sharp chin proudly as she addressed Master Kavar. One hand plucked at the sides of her robe - which, now that I looked closer, were at least a size too large. "I just wanted-"

"You thought to sneak into the senior training chambers by masquerading as a Jedi Knight," Master Kavar finished for her, his voice cooling. "What is your name, Padawan?"

"Revan Fr-Freeflight," she answered, stumbling over her surname as if it were unfamiliar. Still, she held Master Kavar's gaze, despite his obvious disapproval.

Kavar blinked. There was a slight twitch on his face - surprise perhaps - before it smoothed over.

"You are one of Karon's urchins," he said heavily. Her name meant nothing to me, but there was no denying the exasperated tone of recognition in Kavar's voice. "Not even a padawan, yet. I bid you welcome to Coruscant, apprentice, but these training chambers are out-of-bounds to both apprentices and padawans." There was a thinning of his lips as his gaze trailed over the bulky robe the girl had wrapped tightly around herself. "Nor do we look kindly upon theft, no matter your background."

"I didn't steal these robes," she interrupted, as her green eyes darted to me briefly. I realized I was staring back in fascination. I would never have dared such an act as a youngling- sneaking somewhere prohibited under false pretences-

Her indignation was clear, and levelled directly at Kavar. "And what do you mean, my background? Look, I won a wager against one of those H'ratth Jedi, alright? And-

"Stop." Master Kavar's voice had turned to ice, echoing loudly throughout the chamber. One hand rose, palm open, a command that rippled on the Force. The girl halted her tirade, a flush of chagrin dawning belatedly on her smooth cheeks.

I did not know whether to be appalled or impressed. A wager? An apprentice won a wager against a H'ratth Knight? And took his robes? The girl called Revan ebbed into silence. I could see the embarrassment on her face, the sense that she had done wrong- but I did not know if that equated to regret.

Kavar's jaw squared as he stared down the girl. A master's disapproval radiated from his hard expression. "You shall address me as Master Kavar. You are not to approach the H'ratth delegation again, Apprentice. Get yourself to your master, and do not enter these chambers until you have earned the rank required."

The girl bowed, a gesture both inelegant and stiff in its execution, before leaving the room. She was quick to depart, but it surprised me that she did not run.

"I'd better ensure the envoys have not been offended by an errant street kid," Kavar grumbled, before frowning, as if he regretted that careless slip. It reminded me that Kavar had been a master for about as long as I had a knight - a handful of months. For all of Kavar Kira's composed authority, he was likely still settling into his new position. "I'll see you in a fourth-day, Knight Yudan."

I nodded in acknowledgment of our next bout, and Master Kavar strode away in the direction of the inner Temple. I found myself staring back at the outer exit, where that brash, tempestuous teenager had vanished. Her strength in the Force had been noticeable, but she was strikingly old for an apprentice. More so than I had been. I doubted she would last long here- and nor did I think I would see her again.

I was proven wrong the moment I stepped out of the senior training chambers.

"Knight Yudan? Can I ask you something?"

It was difficult to stop my mouth dropping open in shock at the girl, perched high on an ornamental railing some metres beyond the chambers. This part of the Temple was open to the elements, and the winter sun glinted a warm brown in her tousled tresses. "You have been directed to your master forthwith, Apprentice," I said stiffly.

The girl grimaced again. It was becoming obvious that she struggled with authority. "Sure," she muttered, "But he didn't say straight away, right? And besides, it's 'Padawan', now." The girl called Revan grinned, an easy curve to her lips that didn't conceal the wariness in her eyes.

I blinked, and had to quash the errant desire to congratulate her. "You should have corrected Master Kavar in that case."

She snorted. "I think he was pissy enough with me already. Look, I wanted to see some real sparring, alright? I get that I broke the rules, but it's not like I actually lied to anyone."

She halted as my expression hardened. "Deception comes in many forms, Padawan," I intoned, even as I disliked how uptight the words made me sound. "Now if you will excuse me-"

"I-" Her shoulders hitched as her eyes darkened with self-awareness. "You're right. I told myself it was okay as long as I came out with the truth if caught. It's just- it's not like I'm doing any harm, here. I just want to learn." A scowl flashed over her face, quick and fleeting as a summer storm. "Isn't that the whole point of being a Jedi? Learning?"

I had thought so, once. It was strange, seeing similarities of my earlier self, in someone so different. "What would you sacrifice for knowledge, Padawan? Your morality? Your compassion? Your soul?"

Her green eyes narrowed on me. I was abruptly uncomfortable with the realization that I was parroting one of Master Vandar's lectures. It was time to leave. I took a step to the side as she expelled a noisy sigh - one more thoughtful than irritated, I believed, even though I'd hardly had her acquaintance long enough to tell.

"Master Karon told me to seek out all knowledge," she muttered, brow creasing in thought. "I guess, maybe, I used that as a justification to do what I wanted."

"How interesting," I lied politely. My gaze shifted pointedly to the corridor behind her. "But I have somewhere to be, Padawan. Excuse me."

Even by then, I should have known that would not stop her saying her piece. I had walked a mere five metres past her when she spoke again.

"You said something to Master Kavar." Her voice dropped in pitch. "About the Force calling to you in combat. About it being a part of you."

I could not help but stop.

"I've been here for almost two months," the girl called Revan continued. "Everyone keeps telling me how strong I am, and yet I can barely feel the frelling Force. Except when I pick up a 'saber."

"I said that in Ryl," I commented, slowly turning back to face her.

"And?" She frowned, before deftly switching tongues. "(My oldest friend Jonohl was Twi'leki. What's so strange about me speaking Ryl?)"

I blinked in lieu of answering. She had a thick, drawling accent, but her fluency was undeniable.

"Oh." A flare of irritation darkened her gaze. "I heard Kavar call me a street kid. Therefore, I must know nothing, right?"
"I did not say that," I answered stiffly, even if it had been my assumption. In my experience, homeless illiterates often spoke a smattering of gutter dialects that were of no use beyond the borders of their hometown.

"I don't pretend to be educated," the girl muttered, pushing back a stray lock of hair. "Look, I'm here because I'm hoping to find someone to train me." Her jaw squared. "With the lightsaber, I mean."

I took a step back from her. "That is why you have a master, Padawan-"

"Karon's great, but we spend all our time theorizing if we're not traipsing out somewhere for some higher purpose I'm meant to understand. Stars, Karon's the one who encouraged me to see out alternative teachers. I know you're new here, and a hotshot at the 'saber besides-"

My head was shaking all the way through her impassioned invective. "Padawan, you need a master to train you-"

"No, I need a duellist to train me-"

"I am on Coruscant to hone my own skills, not teach younglings-"

"What better way to do so, than to learn through teaching?"

We were squared off against each other, her fierce gaze imploring me into an engagement I had never considered let alone desired.

"I am no teacher, Padawan," I said finally. "Nor do I wish to become one."

The girl called Revan folded her arms. "I'll make you a wager," she threw back, lifting her chin as she flat-out ignored my reservations. "Grant me thirty lessons, and I bet I can best you in the ring."

I did not bother hiding my snort of derision. "Girl, you would not last a minute before I disarmed you, thirty lessons or a hundred."

"Prove it, then."

My eyes narrowed in distaste at her fumbling attempt to manipulate. "I do not need to."

Again, I walked away. Again, she spoke after me.

"Please." The word hung in the air. Not desperate, not quite - but it was genuine and heartfelt. "I'll do what you say. I'll listen. I know you don't like me, Knight Yudan, but I just- I just want to learn. I just want to feel the Force again. Please."

...

"And that actually worked?" Revan stared at me, eyes wide with disbelief.

I let out a small sigh of capitulation. "Our backgrounds could be polar opposites, Revan, but in that moment I understood you a little. I came late to the Jedi, too, and I had my own struggles with the Force."

She blinked, wonderment warring with open curiosity. In some ways, Revan was as easy to read as she had been then. "I sound like I was a bit of a brat," she murmured, shooting me a half-grin. "I'm guessing I didn't win in thirty matches, huh?"
"Well-" I concealed my smile of amusement. "You cheated, Revan."

"I- I beat you?" The delight was sharp in her carefree snigger. "Hah! You can't hold back on those details-"

"Do you fail to comprehend the meaning of the word 'cheated', Revan?" I threw her a stern look. "You conceded the bout to me later. Of course, that may have been because I was refusing to train you any further."

"Stars, Yudan," she said slowly. "I wish I had some memory of this..."

So do I, I thought with a sharp pang. "You were a street kid, Revan. It took me time to understand that utilizing all means for victory was no more than a survival mechanism for you, just as it took you time to adjust to life amongst the Jedi. Still, I did not stay angry at you for long. You had a knack for public apologies and concessions of my superiority-"

"Right." She snorted, raising an eyebrow in disbelief. Ah, but it made me yearn for her to recollect those rather effusive demonstrations of atonement. Even in the early days, I had found it difficult to harden my heart against her. "So, cheated, huh? What, did I dare use the Force against you?"

"Try a flash grenade," I murmured, watching her just to see her eyes widen at the admission. "What?"

"You heard me." I kept my expression impassive, but the memory brought nothing but mirth, now. "I have no idea where you located that from. Armaments such as those are not readily available in the temple. But, well, you were determined to best me."

Revan paused, before asking- "Did I ever best you? Fairly?"

I breathed in, reminding myself that I should not be surprised at the question. "A handful of times with the 'saber alone," I answered, tilting my head. "It is a different battleground when you throw active Force use into the mix."

Revan had transformed into an adept duellist- not the master I was considered to be, but some would have labelled her an ace, perhaps even an expert. Her strengths, however, spanned more than one focus. When she truly immersed herself in the Force - be it light or dark or somewhere in between - I could not hold my own against her.

There was a contemplative look furrowing her brow. "You must have trained others? Others who were with-" she broke off, air hitching in her throat. "Malak. Did you train him, too? You must have- you were his friend before- and you followed him-"

I jerked away. My shoulders stiffened, my jaw clenched, my mood plummeted. This was the minefield of the past, and I would not indulge her in traipsing down those back-alleys.

Malak had been a friend, once. After the initial years of mistrust, we eventually became close; a bond of comradeship and camaraderie that remained for a time after Malachor. Even while feuds and power-plays sprang up like bush-fires amongst our allies, Malak and I still maintained some degree of familiarity.

It had taken one incident, one moment, for that final thread to snap.

I would not think on those memories. I would not-
Despite my self-resolve, the heady shadows rose as a noose twisting tight around my heart-

...

I stared forward blankly, ignoring the flare of Force power as I tuned out the argument that raged in the room beyond.

Fleet statistics and tactical opportunities ran through my head; a litany of data that was no more than numbers on an info-pad. Figures on a game-board. Cold facts to relay to my master. Sometimes, they made her smile - a cold reflection of something that had once been beautiful.

"I am your Shadow Hand!" Malak roared, from deeper in the now-empty command room.

The dark had turned Malak hot, a flashpoint of fury that bubbled with rents of twisted ambition and possessive emotion. Revan, in contrast, only burned the rare times she chose to show her anger. Otherwise she was cold. As cold as space, and just as far-reaching.

"I am your lover, your second!" Malak towered over Revan. The Force choked in his unsteady grasp. "You cannot risk my men - me! - so callously, not without divulging your plans! I have a right to know your next move!"

He did not often challenge her, but the place cleared out when he did. And Malak was growing more unstable these days.

I wondered if my master noticed. I wondered if she realized it was slowly happening to her, too. Talvon Esan was no more than an accelerated snapshot of what we all faced.

I barely heard of the sharp crackle of lightning as it streamed across the far side of the command center. White sparks danced along the periphery of my vision, but I did not look. Revan knew I was here. She would address me when ready. I was long since accustomed to the dance my master and her apprentice engaged in. In many ways, it was more palatable now than when we had all been Jedi.

"You do not." Her command was dark and implacable. Revan stood over the crumpled form of her apprentice, arcs of white pain dying out against her fingertips. "We are but cogs in a machine, Malak. And everyone is replaceable on our journey."

"I am not," Malak gasped. His yellow eyes, damned as the lot of us, stared defiantly up at her, but his crumpled form acceded surrender. "You are not!"

I shifted, staring away from the spectacle that raged on the Force as much as in their hearts. I followed Revan, and by extension Malak, but sometimes I wondered how much of that was merely due to habit. A pattern of behaviour that had once had meaning.

"Then you truly do not understand."

She left Malak there, collapsed on the ground, and turned her back on him. As if she sensed his resistance was spent for now. The sound of her footsteps drew close. My gaze snapped to her, a spectre of shadows, midnight robes wafting in her wake, a darkly beautiful figure of monochrome death and breath-taking power.

I would not think on the golden icon of light she had once been.

Revan paused in front of me, a hand lifting to remove the mask that had once been other than a piece of a Sith Lord's ensemble. Her obsidian gaze, pitch-black and starless, appraised me coolly.
“Everyone is replaceable,” she told Malak, but she was staring at me. Her head cocked, and she took a step closer. “That is your next lesson, my apprentice.”

I thought she could not surprise me anymore. I thought I had seen the worst already.

I was wrong.

In one swift movement, Revan slid a gloved hand behind my head, and her cold lips crashed against mine.

My mouth parted in shock. Instant passion scorched to life. I thought I could feel nothing anymore— but I was wrong, so wrong, and those lips moved so sweetly against my own, hot and demanding and undeniable—her hand drifted to the base of my neck, that sensitive spot right between my lekku—

With a wrench I stumbled back from her, blazing lust warring with pride, both of which shot all rational thought straight to some nether-hell I could not reach. My fists clenched and shook, and it was so hard not to raise them, to reach forward and tear that gods-damned robe from her body, show her what it meant to play with fire, lose myself in a way I had long since taught myself not to think of—Revan was staring at me curiously. With a start, I realized I was spilling everything out onto the Force. My respirations fast and loud, my heartbeat thundering with want, my desire shouting out through my own signature loud enough that any Force-sensitive onboard her flagship would notice.

And Revan, once blind as a shyrack bat, was eyeing me over in unconcealed interest.

"I will hear your report in two hours, Yudan." Her mouth moved, but I could barely comprehend the words. Her head cocked, before her face smoothed into pale impassivity, and she stepped away. Gliding fluidly past, a figure of unconcerned damnation, while the Force rocked wildly in my shaking grasp. I didn't turn to watch her go, still frozen in lust and shock, my gaze skittering further afield.

Malak was clambering to his feet.

"Everyone is replaceable." Revan repeated the phrase, cool and collected, as a hatch groaned open behind me with a pneumatic hiss. "Any means to get the job done, Malak. Remember that, and toe the line."

She stepped through and the exit thudded shut, with Malak staring at her wake. The look on his marked face...

...I had not seen that before, not directed at Revan. Not such a raw, naked hatred.

Slowly, Malak's head turned. His gaze met mine. And, tightening around my soul, the first stirrings of fear dawned. I stood immobile, as the fear grew, slicing through all primal emotion as I watched him watch me. I had to swallow, then, at just how deeply I had been used to drive home a point. Nothing was sacred amongst the Sith. Not honour, not friendship, not even a loyalty that spanned more than a decade.

The impassioned acrimony in Malak's damned eyes was hardening into something more soulless. It wasn't aimed at me, for all that I stood directly in Malak's path. I was but the spectator, the third party, the pawn.

Still, Malak said nothing.
She won't do that again. I couldn't bring myself to say the words, not even for him. And if she does, I won't- I won't- But I couldn't bring myself to finish the lie, not even in the sanctuary of my own head. All I could see was that intrigued speculation on Revan's face, as she looked at me in a way she had never done before.

Malak may not have seen that, but he had seen enough. I was conquered with inertia as seconds stretched into minutes and we both remained still and silent as statues. Survival instinct on my part, maybe. My gut told me the slightest twitch would break Malak from the shackles of inaction. I could face many, but not Malak Devari- and he knew it.

With a final narrowing of the eyes, Malak strode forward. Artificial lighting gleamed against the pale curve of his head where it wasn't inked black. With each step, the Force gained momentum in his grasp, the temperature dropped, and the air became hard to breathe.

He stood opposite me, poisoned yellow eyes demanding silence and submission, as a palpable vortex of power whipped to life around him.

"This did not happen," he whispered, as soft as a caress, as hard as a threat.

I bowed my head, and remained there for some time after he left.

... Malak departed the Nexus that day.

I was sent away to front the Rodian Corridor two weeks later.

The blip of time in between I would not think about. Just as Malak said, it didn't happen- "Yudan?"

Incandescent madness- but if no one acknowledged it then it did not happen. I threw myself into battle and vowed I would not return, I would not be used as a dejarik piece between them-

The point was moot, for it was not long afterward when the news broke: Arran Da'klor's fantastical failure; Malak's subsequent disfigurement; Revan's death. Deralia.

Malak rose to power, and I knelt to him in dead, frozen supplication.

Whether he suspected anything further had happened - whether he even cared, at that stage - I still did not know. Darth Revan's lesson in her command room was not the reason for Malak's betrayal, no. That had been inevitable, to anyone watching from the sidelines. No, but perhaps it had been the final tipping point.

"Yudan? You didn't answer?"

Sometimes I damned her for not knowing, not remembering, for surely thinking me nothing but a failure from her past, while her slate of misconduct was painted over with forgetfulness.

Sometimes, I burned with the urge to remind her.

"Okay." She sighed, a soft sound of capitulation. "We won't talk about Malak. I- I'll leave it alone."

The grace of a friend, backing away, when surely she had all the questions in the galaxy.

Most of the time, I knew it was better to do what I told her earlier: keep the past where it belonged.
Revan struggled with enough... and I had, truly, forgiven her for everything— even if the memories sometimes made that difficult.

My attention was caught by the movement of her palm, rubbing idly over the communicator affixed to her other wrist.

"We should head back," I murmured, staring at her long fingers. Two of them, and a thumb. Her maimed hand.

"I told Carth where I was going," Revan said, her voice softening. "He'll ping me when it's time."

I refused to feel guilty, as I wrenched my gaze away from the knobbing of pink scar tissue where two little fingers had once been. I would not feel guilty. Sometimes, I was still surprised we had both come out alive from that encounter. But it did pose an interesting question—

"The Shadowlands," I said abruptly. "How did you escape Bandon's disruptor?"

"I might leave that one a secret, Yudan," Revan said lazily, her eyes twinkling with suppressed mirth. I wondered if she'd noticed my gaze. I wondered if she resented me for the injury... and damned myself for caring.

My eyes narrowed. Neural inhibitors - far more common than kaiburr-based disruptors - could be overcome by a strength of Force-will. Null-Force fields based on Fett technology submerged the fabric of the Force itself, but could be counteracted with an amplifier. But a neural disruptor... as far as I knew, there was no way to overpower one once it was cinched around one's neck.

Yet, in the depths of the Shadowlands, I'd felt Revan's Force-strength dawn out of nowhere to disable the restraints on her limbs, and yank my lightsaber to her grasp.

The restraints... I felt her short those out... but not the collar. "The neural disruptor was already defunct," I realized slowly. "Before Bandon even clasped it around your throat."

Revan's smile widened, but she said nothing.

But her Force signature had vanished the moment Bandon- "You were hiding. Much the same as that Dustil boy. You've learned his tricks."

The smile turned to a full-blown grin, then. "Well, one of them. I reckon I can get the other one with enough practice."

"That boy needs a proper master," I said, dragging my gaze away from her carefree grin. I had once admired Revan's ability to find joy in the darkness, before her darkness submerged every vestige of light. It was almost painful to see that old trait once again present in her character.

"I don't see him voluntarily going to the Order. Guess he's stuck with old man Bindo." She shifted, one hand running through her hair, before abruptly shifting topics. "Do you... do you think the Order will protect you? If you go back to Vandar?"

"From justice, you mean?" I clarified, and received a short, sharp nod in response. "They shouldn't, you know. But history tells me they will shelter those that truly repent, no matter their crimes." I sighed. "I do not know if I fall under this umbrella, Revan. The Jedi way- there are facets with it I no longer agree with. This was true before... before I fell. It will always be true, I believe."

"I-" Her quiet voice dropped. "It's the same for me."
The acknowledgment hung in the air between us like a primed thermal detonator.

She reminded me strongly of the Jedi I had known on Coruscant. Not the padawan I had first met, no- perhaps the knight, seasoned but still shining with optimism and righteous conviction, as she stormed fecklessly to the Mandalorian frontlines. Back then, Revan had struggled with certain parts of the Jedi ethos. She had not accepted their limitations on attachment. Nor had she agreed with their policy of non-interference outside of the Order's walls.

But she had been a paragon of the light.

I had changed from the Jedi I had been; I was hardened, scarred and shadowed with all of my misdeeds. It was almost absurd that Revan, in contrast, appeared to have turned full-circle back to her past self.

She is not the knight she once was, I reminded myself fiercely. But, perhaps, she is a close enough match that the flaws do not matter.

I blinked back emotion, looking away from her again. "The Republic will judge you on your past actions, Revan. But the Order will judge you for who you are now." I paused. "They will offer you a safe harbour if they can."

"I'm not sure I want it," she said softly, and turned to gaze once more across the endless Rakatan ocean.

"Neither am I," I whispered.

A chime sounded from her wrist; the noise discordant and harsh against the soft tones of our conversation. Revan's dark hair bowed over the communicator.

"It's time," she murmured. "It's time to go."

Our eyes met once more, before we turned in unison and began the walk back.

Away from the shoreline, both wrapped in our own thoughts, as a quiet introspection settled over us and stifled any further conversation. As we crested over a nearby dune, I threw one last glance at the brightening horizon.

The first touch of a sun breached it, casting a weak ray that shimmered over the shadowy ocean. Light dawning after an endless winter of darkness.

Like hope, pure and intangible and seemingly out of reach, yet touching our souls regardless.

xXx

Chapter End Notes

Coming up next: Vrook Lamar discovers that even the overly cautious can be tempted into recklessness.
Yikes, we've hit Chapter 100! That deserves a review, right?

An anniversary spice-cake's worth of thanks to kosiah for the beta (minus the beheadings, of course). You mentioned in your last fic that your OC Davad Arkan owed something to Yudan Rosh. Well, the influence certainly goes both ways. Sometimes I think Yudan is a cross between your Davad and your Malak. Thanks as always for your support and insights!
Reckless.

It was a character trait I had little time for. An impatience that exhibited a lack of mental discipline - the assuaging of one's desires at the expense of studying the larger design. A bit like allowing one's temper to win: sure, there was visceral satisfaction at first, that heady feeling of triumph-right before reality broke in to slap one over the head with the consequences.

Up until now, recklessness had never been an emotional weakness of mine. I'd more or less prided myself on it.

My fingers were encased in the sound-dampening material of a starpilot's envirosuit. I tapped them against the dash regardless, inordinately irritated at the lack of noise the motion provided.

Recklessness was one of the many traits I'd always damned Revan Freeflight for. Ah, but that comparison burned. Recklessness, overconfidence, and an uncanny knack for landing on her feet that so many damn idiots labelled as luck.

Yet, what could I call my own behaviour right now, if not reckless?

..."We will enter hyperspace the moment Admiral Gant's fleet arrives in this sector," Forn Dodonna relayed, her lined face folding in a frown as she scrolled through a data-feed on her command table. "General Adashan's fleet has already jumped from Trandosha. He may reach the Star Forge before us, but if he does, it shall only be for a time measured in minutes rather than hours."

Davis Tar'coya harrumphed, shooting me a suspicious glare before turning his black gaze on Dodonna. Ach, but the commodore's consistent resentment of Humans and Jedi both was more than a little tiresome. "And the intercepted comms?" Tar'coya growled.

"Changes nothing," Dodonna clipped out, not even lifting her head. "Malak may know of our advance, but at this proximity we shall reach his stronghold before much of his armada can be successfully recalled. He has over-extended himself across the breadth of the galaxy, under the assumption he would have enough warning should we learn the location of his base. Once Darth Malak and his Star Forge are finished, the remnants of the Sith Empire shall either scatter or yield."

I could hear the burn of disappointment in the greying Admiral's voice, for all that she tried to conceal it. Republic Intelligence was widely regarded, and the discovery that our tactical comms - along with the manifest of command detail - was intercepted directly after delivery had been a hard one to swallow.

Darth Malak will soon know who is leading the Republic vanguard. And who the advisors are.
The thought was acid in my heart. For Malak would waste no time in relaying it to his captive, and I could only imagine his delight in telling Bastila Shan that her master travelled to aid in the destruction of her prison. Of her.

Decades of emotional control should have prepared me for such a bitter scenario. But it didn't.

With a half-choked harrumph that made me sound like even more of an old fool than I was, I muttered a weak excuse for departure and stalked out of Dodonna's strat room.

Bastila. What must you be thinking of me?

All of this damn foolhardy plan, from the minute Galdea had suggested it over the comatose body of a broken Sith Lord, had done nothing but set Bastila Shan up to fail. To fall. No one put the interests of my young, gifted padawan first - not when the likes of Revan and Malak were involved. And now...

There was a thump of a walking stick hobbling behind me.

"What?" I snapped in irritation, as I strode down a restricted corridor of the Meridus. A passing lieutenant threw me a glance of surprise, before diverting his attention to the short figure travelling in my wake. With a mumbled greeting, the Republic officer hurried away.

"Heavy, your heart is," Vandar murmured behind me. "Despair-"

"Spare me your platitudes of the Force, Vandar," I grumbled, even as I paused so he could catch up. I didn't particularly feel like listening to Vandar Tokare, but striding away under the power of my longer limbs seemed a disrespect beneath me. Besides, I knew Vandar. He'd find a way to speak his piece.

"Vrook." The centuries-old Jedi Master sighed as he stepped close. "Both a challenge and a heartache is training a padawan. More for the master than the youngling. You know this."

Aye, I did, and it was part of the reason I had delayed so long before choosing my one and only padawan. Vandar, in contrast, had trained many. But the creaky sadness in his voice told me he was thinking on his last. His failure.

At least I knew my old padawan still lived.

"She'll see this as a betrayal."

"Understand the sacrifices of war, Bastila Shan surely does-"

"Bah! She's spent weeks as a prisoner of a Sith Lord, Vandar. You can't expect me to believe her judgment isn't skewed by now."

He paused, bright blue eyes staring at me steadily. "What will you do?"

That question, right there, set my heart burning. Vandar had sensed my desire earlier, the reckless urge to race out in my scoutship, track down Bastila myself seeing as no else gave a damn about her-

But caution had quickly curtailed that. If Malak captures me, I'll be used against her. What did that matter, now, when all Bastila would see was me advising the Republic front to destroy her?

She'll fall. I knew my padawan well. She was a good woman, who had been protected for much of her young life. I'd been adamant Bastila Shan would not receive accelerated training the likes of which Revan and Malak had, but the war had thrust her into the limelight anyway, with less preparation than was wise. Bastila yearned for acknowledgment, and that was not something I had ever been good at granting.

What would Kylah Aramai's betrayal have done to her?

The thought of Bastila truly falling, devolving into one of Malak's Dark Jedi, blackened my soul with self-recriminations and unyielding despair. I'd never fully appreciated the internal self-doubt that Karon and Zhar and even Vandar exhibited after their apprentices sunk to such depths, but I was beginning to.

"I don't know," I said heavily. Dashing off in my scoutship was a fool's game, I knew that. The Force might enable me to fly a starship with pre-cognizance and skill beyond a normal starpilot, but I could not hope to slip through whatever armada Malak had stationed outside his fortress. Not in a Republic scoutship. My only chance of infiltration would be-in a Sith ship.

...

The console of the snubfighter blinked at me, counting down the minutes until hyperspace exit. The cockpit was large enough for two, and behind was a small room jammed full of supplies and a closet refresher. Some snubs were offensive craft only; not designed for hyper-travel, but rather a supporting limb of a larger starship's arsenal.

This was an Aurek-class, a snubfighter that had its own internal hyperdrive, a model that had been in production for many decades. I'd flown Aurek-class fighters before. A fair swathe of them had been manufactured for the Republic, and they were still being built today. This one, in particular, had been around since the dawn of the Mandalorian Wars, and no doubt seen more than its fair share of the frontlines.

Of course, it had been retro-fitted since then.

...

"I got every grunt studying this thing, ever since we got our interdiction back online," the head engineer commented, his large blue eyes swivelling around to survey the diagnostics. One limp forearm indicated the underbelly of the common Republic ship. "The stealth tech's wheedled into the thrusters and sublight drive both, so the ship can be well-cloaked at any speed barring a hyper-jump. It's easy enough to activate, too, but understanding the tech's a different skillet of scalefish."

I tried to ignore the ethics of using mild Force persuasion on the Ithorian. The snubfighter in question sat in one of the smaller repair bays of the Meridus, docked and clamped one bay along from my very own scoutship.

"Understanding it- so it won't be an easy task to replicate this technology?" I kept my voice mild and non-threatening, with the slightest hint of Force adding gravity to my words. I didn't like this sort of intel-gathering, but ever since the thought had flashed through my head-

The Meridus captured two of Saul Karath's stealthed snubs. Two of the original six that had targeted the Meridus' gravity-wells.
-it kept taunting me with possibility. Five hours estimated until Gant's fleet would arrive, and then Dodonna would order the jump to hyperspace. Five hours for me to decide on a stupid, reckless course of action that was entirely uncharacteristic.

Yet all I could think of was Bastila. I'd worried that if I took the insane route, I'd end up being used as a means to twist her further. But what if the opposite were true? What if the one thing that might adhere her to the light was witnessing her master risk everything for her safety?

The Ithorian engineer snorted. "Honestly? I reckon it'll take years. Look, we've snagged this tech before, but never undamaged - so this last week's been a real eye-opener, and let me tell ya we ain't even scraped the surface. The OS of the stealth mod is coded in a language we can't crack. The power source of the cloak is a bio-mineral I ain't never seen before. And when ya add in the fact that we've seen the Sith use this tech on an' off for at least a year - but only ever on a handful of their marks - well. I'd lay my creds on them not being able to mass-produce it either."

The engineer's drawling commentary certainly raised an interesting assumption or two. Republic tactical command had encountered cloaked Sith starships before, but only sporadically. That such a massive advantage hadn't been reproduced throughout Darth Malak's fleet indicated the technology was still emerging, difficult to implement, and likely available from only one source.

The Star Forge.

The snub that rested so innocently before me must have visited Darth Malak's stronghold before. And it was housed right next to my scoutship. I had full clearance to open the airlock of this minor repair bay and depart at my leisure. I was under no oath to remain- frankly, some of the brass would be happy to see my back.

My eyes burned as I stared at the Sith snub. What more of a sign from the Force do I need?

I cleared my throat. "Any plans to use this ship in the offensive against the Sith?"

My mind was reeling with a mounting excitement that was as unfamiliar as it was dizzying. But if Dodonna fancied some sort of battle tactic utilizing this spoil of war, then the one sure way to stoke her ire was to sneak this very ship out from underneath her nose.

Last thing I needed was for the Republic brass to distrust the Jedi Order even more. Still, after Atris Surik's shattering revelation to the Senate, it was hard to know if relations could get any worse. While I didn't entirely blame Atris for relaying Dantooine's misguided and highly contentious actions regarding Darth Revan, the fact that she decided to inform the Republic Senate before the Coruscanti Jedi surely said something of fractures within the High Council itself.

The Ithorian's eyelids drooped in confusion. "Eh, I doubt it. What can a single snubfighter do? Nah, this is our chance to study the tech, man! I'll be gassed if they don't send this snub off to one of our bases before the jaunt into hyperspace."

What can a single snubfighter do? What can a single person achieve?

A lot, if the Force was with them.

...

Have faith. Vandar's last words to me, after he'd found me standing alone in the repair bay, internally warring with myself. And may the Force be with you.

It hadn't taken much to convince the engineers to take a break; the Ithorian, for all his enthusiasm, had just about burnt himself out studying Karath's elite snubfighter. All sentient needed sleep, sooner or later.

Vandar had hummed, then; his bright blue eyes dancing over the *Aurek-*class snub before resting on my scoutship. He said nothing more, merely turned on his heel and left the repair bay in silence.

He'd known. I wasn't sure if it was simple deduction or if the old bat had skimmed my thoughts - and I wouldn't put that sort of sly snooping past him. Too many saw Vandar Tokare as nothing more than a wrinkled old coot who knew nothing past the philosophies of the Jedi. He was an easy one to underestimate.

I'd acted quickly, the unfamiliar recklessness spurring me on, as I readied the repair bay for the supposed departure of my scoutship. I hadn't risked refuelling the Sith ship - the readouts, at least, claimed the tank had enough reserves for a week in hyperspace. Another sign from the Force, or maybe that was purely my own scrabbling for justification. One could see the Force's hand in just about anything - and while Vandar liked to prescribe to that philosophy, I was too cynical to allow it as an excuse from personal responsibility.

One sole transmission from the Meridus had reached me, a handful of seconds after I'd cleared the external airlock.

::Halt! Unknown starpilot, we will open fire-::

I'd shot into hyperspace, likely just as they were scrabbling to activate the interdiction drive.

Dodonna was going to flay me alive.

And, now, here I was. Truly alone in space, acting like a reckless idiot.

It felt right, though. For the first time in what seemed like forever, my mind was focused and fixed on one clear objective only. The Republic could take care of the Star Forge and Darth Malak - or maybe blasted, broken Revan Freeflight will, if Vandar turns out to be right yet again - but I was heading for Bastila.

I'd failed to protect her from the frontlines. Failed to stem the exploitation of her gift in the name of the greater good. Failed to shield her from the deception and treachery of her closest peer- one I should have seen through back on Dantooine.

I would not, could not, fail Bastila again.

Attachment. I knew well what the Jedi ethos had to say, being one of the staunchest critics of individual attachment myself. Deep, intense emotions directed at singular individuals were fraught with risk: jealousy, resentment, anger, betrayal- all of these feelings were dangerous to one who could reach the Force. All could tempt one down dark paths that would forever throw shadows over one's future.

A Jedi pulled back from individual attachment, and practiced unconditional love for the many. Everyone was tempted towards unbalanced feelings for others, but someone who truly embraced the Force in the light could rise beyond that, and have the judgment to see all of life as something worth preserving equally.

But Bastila was my padawan, and I had more than just an obligation to her. I cared for the young woman, the closest thing I had to a daughter. I could not ignore her.

I'd rejected a different attachment, once, and spent my life denying the regret it had brought me. Even now, the familiar heaviness still weighed on my heart. I was a servant of the Force, and considered myself blessed for it, but even I had dark moments when I wondered just what sort of life the Force had cost me.

If I closed my eyes, I could still see the flash of a young woman, wild brown hair aloft in the wind, a yearning loneliness in her soul that called to me-

...

She was sitting atop the crumbling stone wall, legs swinging idly as the warm breeze rifled through the strands of her loose hair. It had once been a ritual, where every Baker's Day we'd meet. Ours was as an innocent friendship between two very different souls, and I couldn't even admit to myself how much I treasured it.

That was before.

Now, she turned up rarely. But my feet still tramped the same trail twice a week, every Baker's Day, one hour before the noon feast. Each time I noted her absence on that derelict wall, my heart would skip a painful beat.

Now it was racing.

I deliberately made my footsteps audible, and saw the slight cock of her head when she heard my approach.

"Bored again?" I asked, striving for a light tone as I vaulted the stonework. This part of Dantooine was dotted with forgotten ruins, marks of civilization long abandoned. Acidic renni-grass grew dominant here, a consequence of land tilled into near-barrenness. Other than the wild kath hounds, the only life to be found on these empty plains was the odd wandering Jedi.

"Yeah." She threw me a guarded smile that only served to illustrate the awkwardness between us.
"I've sat through enough history lessons today, no matter what Nomi says. Though from the way she laps it up, you'd think she was Force-sensitive herself."

I didn't miss the twist of sibling resentment in her voice. Oh, there was no doubt Nayama adored her older sister, but she was envious all the same. Nomi was strikingly lovely, and had a sweet temperament coupled with a mettle of morality that made near-all admire her.

It was easy to understand Nayama's ill-feeling. Her sister had bagged a powerful Jedi one step away from ascending to knighthood. While Nayama, in contrast, was merely a Force-blind teenager stuck on a planet full of mystics. She would have been better off boarding with a nearby farm, but it was her ties to Nomi that kept her ensconced in the enclave - and Nomi was too busy proving herself as a pillar of strength to her new husband rather than a hindrance.

And where did that leave Nayama? Jealous and bored and with nothing tangible in her life - all because of her attachment to her sister.

Attachments are dangerous. That is why Jedi break from family. That is why Jedi love all unconditionally, rather than singular individuals. That was why Nomi's marriage should never have been permitted.

I lowered myself next to Nayama, allowing my gaze to slip to her out-stretched hand. Long fingers, lean and wiry like the rest of her, twitching with the desire to do something.

She withdrew her hand swiftly into her lap.
The heat of embarrassment scoured my face, even as I damned myself for the lack of emotional control.

"Why are you here, then?" she asked, her voice abrupt and cool. "Bored from all your Jedi training?"

My mind flashed with a traitorous what-if. That day, when she’d reached out to clasp my hand, a shy invitation warming her brown gaze—what if, instead of snatching my limb away and dovetailing into a stuttering discourse regarding Jedi and attachments, instead I’d curled my fingers around hers—

Then I’d be making as much a mockery of the Jedi Code as Andur Sunrider is. More, even. Nayama is barely more than a girl, and a good eight cycles younger than me. She is as innocent as a sunrise, and as lonely as a desert. She deserves a man who can be her everything.

"I wanted to—talk to you," I said, stumbling over the words. "I, ah, I have something to tell you."

I didn’t warm to people easily. Never had. The Force had bloomed in me young, and I could barely remember a time before Dantooine. Understanding the mysteries of the Jedi Order was the driving purpose in my life, and that had always been enough.

"So, talk." Nayama was looking ahead, profile turned from me, as she watched something in the distant hills. I longed for the easiness of our past, even as I accepted it was long gone.

She’d been here for near-on a year, now. I still recalled the flurry of excitement when dashing Andur Sunrider had returned, with his outspoken master and the two sisters in tow. Force-blind nulls, a few of the more acerbic Jedi muttered, as they cast a suspicious eye over the enclave-sanctioned marriage between Andur and Nomi.

Somehow, Nayama and I had fallen in together. Maybe it was a shared loneliness— but I hadn’t truly thought I was afflicted by that sort of heartache. Deliberate solitude did not equate to loneliness— I’d always told myself that. I only knew it for a lie after that fateful day, when Nayama retreated from our friendship, hurt pride and insecurity simmering behind a mask of poorly-built indifference.

You are lovely. The words stayed lodged in my head. I would choose you, if the Force had not chosen me. Ach, but I’d never been good with words. And why would she accept them, when the likes of Andur Sunrider had thrown caution to the wind, and found victory in doing so? When his master spoke out against our established ethos, proclaiming that the Order had forgotten the old ways, that once Jedi did not eschew attachment but embraced it instead?

There were enough rumblings of discontent from the Council, but so far the Sunrider marriage seemed to be surviving the fallout. I wasn’t sure I would have that sort of strength.

"I’m leaving for Coruscant." The words came out in a rush, twisted as the grimace that sat on my lips. "For padawan training. In ten days."

Her stifled gasp pulled at something in my chest. She still cared; a little, at least.

"P-padawan training? But— you are a padawan!" Nayama had jerked to face me, wide-set eyes hot with emotion. It gave her an exotic look, I’d always thought. Nomi might be the classical beauty, but there was something wild and free about Nayama that drew my gaze.

"Yes." I shrugged uncomfortably, looking down. "There’s not enough masters here, Nayama. They’re sending the more experienced padawans away."
How could I explain Jedi politics to her? Andur and Nomi’s marriage had ruffled tempers in the Core, where the more conservative masters frowned at the liberties Dantooine so often took, and worried over the padawans trained here. And it was true, we were bottom-heavy in the ranks. Another five Force-sensitives had been picked up from the Outer Rim in the last quarter alone, and then there were trouble-makers like the Qel-Droma brats who, frankly, needed at least two masters each just to keep them in check. Whereas I- I hadn’t had a dedicated master since Master Yatree left for Coruscant with padawans Karon Enova and Zhar Lestin three years ago.

I didn't want to leave. I'd always disliked Coruscant. While Karon and Zhar were... tolerable, I'd grudgingly admit, I knew next to no-one else there.

"Andur's sitting his knight trials in ten days."

I blinked, jerking back up to meet her gaze. "I- I did not know that."

"Why aren't you?"

"I'm not ready, Nayama." Another reason for my transfer. Andur and I had been on Dantooine for the same number of years, but he’d had extensive field training. I was well-aware that the more practical aspects of my Jedi education had fallen short of the mark - and that Coruscant offered more experience and opportunities in that regard.

My stomach turned at the flash of disappointment in her eyes. She moved, once more, to stare into the hills.

"I'll be going too." Her words were so low I barely caught them as the warm breeze stole them away.

"You- you are? Why?"

"Andur has some mission in the Mid Rim once his trials are over. I didn't catch all the details. Not like I really have a choice, anyway." Her distraught sigh softened the edge of bitterness prevalent in her words. "It'll be better when I leave. I think- I think Nomi- she's been worried about me. This place- it's not for me."

I stared, transfixed, at the line of her profile. The curve of her nose tipped up ever-so-slightly at the end. Her hair, the colour of darkened malt, whipped in the wind. I found my gaze lingering over the turn of her face, wondering if this would be the last time I ever saw her.

"That's Exar," she muttered, eyes narrowing.

"What?" I jerked around to the hills that had so captivated her attention, and realized she hadn't been staring blindly at nothing-

The brown-clad figure of a Jedi Knight was stalking purposefully towards us.

Exar Kun. I’d never warmed easily to people, and enigmatic, glib types like Knight Exar least of all. He was the sort who innately knew which words would cut and which would charm, and he used those gifts well. Always with a cool smile on his striking face, while his deep green eyes glimmered with intelligence and his aura shone with barely-checked power.

The Force loved him, and he knew it.

But I certainly didn't expect Nayama to be familiar with him. Sure, I'd seen them in conversation once or twice, but thought nothing of it. Exar was the type of Jedi to use words like null, and I highly doubted he'd ever spend time on the likes of Nayama Da-Boda.

But, as I turned back to observe the pink blush blossoming on her face, I started to wonder if I was wrong.

"Knight," I returned stiffly.

"Exar," Nayama murmured. I must have imagined the breathlessness in her voice. "Are you out showing the kath hounds who's boss again?"

The man gave a lazy chuckle, coming to a halt a few metres from us. "We cannot have predators too close to civilization, my friend." He lingered over the possessive pronoun, and I felt the simmer of malcontent in my gut. The Jedi Code ran through my head instinctively, but it didn't stop my mouth tightening. Green eyes flashed at me, followed by the amused arch of a dark brow. "I am merely trying to comport myself as a Jedi."

I tried to stop the dark flush of embarrassment returning. At least Nayama wouldn't notice my discomfort. She was too busy gazing stupidly at the cocksure man.

"I hear the packs can get quite large, deeper into the hills," Nayama commented. It sounded forced, like she was struggling to find some way to keep the conversation going.

"Not these days." He threw her a wicked smile and, despite myself, I suddenly saw the knight the way a young woman like Nayama must. A tall figure, strong and at ease with himself, lightsabers displaying proudly on a gleaming utility belt. His mop of black curls was matted to his head with sweat, and his olive skin glowed with health. The man looked every inch a warrior, and I tried not to hate him for it.

"You've left your hair unbraided," Exar observed, a cool smile twitching at the corner of his mouth. "As wild and untamed as the Dantooine hills."

The pink on Nayama's cheeks deepened, and I knew then I was not imagining anything.

"Are you heading back to the enclave?" I asked, gruff and abrupt, feeling my mood plummet further as Nayama stiffened.

Exar glanced back to me, his gaze darkening with awareness. "Are you looking for an escort, Padawan?" The amusement thrumming in his voice was obvious. "I suppose, even here, the odd kath hound can rear its ugly head. They can be dangerous if you are not prepared."

I scowled at the unjust implication, but Exar had already turned from me, offering an arm of welcome to my companion. I tried to ignore the stab of regret as she stifled a shy giggle and leaned forward to clasp his hand.

..."Nayama didn't bid me farewell from Dantooine. In fact, the next time I saw her was many years later, following in the wake of a man I disliked almost as much as Exar Kun.

The now-grown Nayama, swirling with wild Force, halted my steps. Her hand, intertwined with the runaway padawan I'd resentfully trained with on Coruscant, staggered me into silence.

Jolee Bindo had returned to the Jedi, married to my old friend. Who now shone with the Force, as unexpectedly and brightly as her sister.

::Five minute warning until hyperspace exit::

The automated alarm from the console wrenched me back to the present. I grimaced. It did no good to dwell on the failures of the past. Nayama was long since dead, and I laid that squarely at the feet of Exar Kun and his innate corruption that had shadowed the galaxy more than a generation ago.

Today, I had a different Sith Lord to elude.

The logs of this vessel had confirmed my suspicions: some months back, an elite six-man squad of Karath's fleet had been sent to the Star Forge. The coordinates had been scrubbed from the logs, but the entry was still earmarked as High Command. It had to be the Forge - which meant this ship's signature would be recognized. Should be recognized. I could only hope my cover story would hold.

The console beeped, an incessant sound that grated. The seconds ticked down as my hands steadied on the controls. With gritted teeth, I slowly eased the snubfighter out of hyperspace.

The minute-long deceleration seemed to take forever. Space-lines of white slowly protracted, before finally snapping back into real-time.

I had a brief impression of multiple starfighters dotting the black skies in front of me, before a discordant wail screeched throughout the cockpit. The A-236 snub jerked wildly under my grip, and the console lit up in a disarray of flashing alarms. Indecipherable sigils flashed on the screen, before a translation in Galactic Basic appeared beneath:

::Decryption activated::

The alarm cut off with a whine, the lights blinkered back to normality, and the vessel steadied.

What the blazes was that? No time to puzzle over it, or the foreign symbols, because next followed the lower-pitched beep of starship detection - many upon many, all flickering into friendly green specks on the nav-screen.

Back through the cockpit transparisteel, the sight of the enemy greeted me.

Snubfighters. Strikefighters. Sith warbirds. A vast array of ships, milling around a massive space station that was immediately recognizable from the schematics I had so studied.

Darth Malak's fortress. Darth Revan's discovery. The heart of the Sith Empire. It was colossal, with three elongated fins aimed sharply downwards like a tripod of alien incisors. Sleek snubs assembled near the rise of each tooth, exiting and entering precisely where the plans placed the factory docking bays. Circular trajectories, like three hive minds working in unison, all mobilizing into squadrons of readiness.

Some of the marks hovered in stationary formation, like fire-ants guarding a mountain. There was a group of six visibly closer to me than any other squad. As my attention fixed upon them, they all canted to the left, before levelling into a trajectory aimed directly at me.

My hand jerked straight to the onboard ship communicator.

"This is snubfighter A-236 of Saul Karath's armada, requesting permission to dock." I opened the transmission wide, broadcasting on all available channels. "High Command, please respond. Transmitting the ship's signature now."
I waited, grip tensed on the controls, for a forthcoming reply. None came. The incoming fighters didn't deviate from their course.

"I repeat, this is snubfighter A-236, the sole survivor from Elite X squadron of Admiral Saul Karath's armada. Requesting permission to dock."

The incoming warbirds remained steady on their course. The message had to be picked up somewhere, but the comm still stared blankly back at me. My hands hovered over the stealth mod- but they'd already seen me, the second I'd lurched into realspace.

"Dammit, I'm a friendly!" I growled into the mic, my gaze narrowing as I speculated on the torpedo-range of the Sith snubs. Wouldn't be long, before those bastards could get a lock. "The Leviathan's blown into space-dust, so I'm returning to home base. Is someone going to answer?"

It seemed not. Like a game of who would blink first, except that I was ridiculously outnumbered. The lead snubfighter dipped, and hot red spat from its apex-

My palm slammed on the stealth controls. Acknowledgement bleeped from the ship's computer just as a hazy purple sheen erupted over the transparisteel. My hands, pulling back hard on the thrusters, diving the snub laterally, G-forces slamming me against the pilot's chair-

Turbolaser bolts skimmed past the viewport as the A-236 abruptly changed course.

A proximity alarm wailed belatedly before sputtering into silence. Trigger-happy bastards! I veered into an evasive roll, the specks of distant snubfighters now a vague violet as the stealth tech encased me in an illusion of refuge. I was cloaked, but that didn't mean safe. With another draw on the steering column, I canted the A-236 back in the direction of the Forge, now some degrees askew from the hostile snubs.

Blood pulsed in my ears. If the Sith weren't even going to talk-

An incoming message blinked on the comm.

::Er, unknown starfighter,:: a young voice croaked. A holo-image blinkered into existence on the nav-stand, sharpening into the image of a spotty youth who couldn't be old enough to be manning comms anywhere outside of a virtual-gaming complex. ::This is Lieutenant Jha'hasi. Um, we can still detect you.::

Jha'hasi had the wide-eyed look of a gormless tach, one corner of his mouth drooping in an uncomfortable grimace. He blinked, leaning forward to peer into the holo-cam.

"Yes, I'm sure you can," I snapped back, glancing down briefly at the nav-screen. The ship's diagrammatic revealed the Sith warbirds were thinning out, shifting course- but not directly gunning for me. "Explains why you're hailing me now, right?"

Actually, it was a pretty solid assumption that Forge command could track their cloaked snubs - but whether that was relayed onto ships without the stealthing mod was another story.

::We request- er, demand that you uncloak now, and ready yourself for an escort back to base.::

"And I request that someone other than a damn greenhorn speak to me over the comm," I growled. "I didn't survive the Leviathan to get blasted by a delinquent who can't distinguish between bogey and friendly!"

Still, the Sith were talking to me now. I felt my blood-pressure ease, my mind sharpen. Steady.
Focus. Make the act convincing.

I was getting closer to the Star Forge. A massive bay door gaped open from the nearest fin, and from here I could see multiple vessels exiting the factory, even as two swarmed back in. I'd shot past one squad, but directly in my path were at least another twenty marks. Two of them shimmered, before disappearing entirely.

Ah, damnation. I glanced sideways to the nav-screen. They weren't there, either.

A scuffling sound of static erupted over the comm, before the youngling was unceremoniously pushed out of view.

::Unknown starfighter, identify yourself and report.: The voice was dead calm and levelled with authority. The weathered face that stared back belonged to a Zabrak male, who was capped with a ridiculous military hat tilted askew over one horn. The lack of introduction was not inviting.

Play it cool. I'm a Sith starpilot who wants nothing more than to fight the Republic. I cleared my throat. "Star Forge, this is Captain Elias Troystar of the A-236 Aurek-class snubfighter from the late Admiral Karath's armada. I'm sure you're aware of the rout in the Edean sector. I only just made it out. My squad's all gone. Requesting permission to dock, sir."

My cover story had the right details- the luckless pilot of this snub was sitting pretty in a prison cell in one of Dodonna's transport ships. While I didn't know what the interrogation team had gleaned from him in terms of intel, his name had been an easy find on the Meridus' detainment register. The Sith landing protocol had been a quick study from the snub's internal logs. It seemed like all the details had fallen into place for me, like it was meant to be. Now if only I could convince the Sith-

The Zabrak had folded his arms. Black tattoos formed a lattice of lines on his cheeks and forehead, adding to a formidable presence. I couldn't tell if the man was suspicious or indifferent. ::Didn't feel like seeing the battle out, Troystar?:

I eyed over the general stripes on the Zabrak's shoulders. "I held the line, sir, right up 'til the Leviathan issued evac orders. Seemed like a choice between turning into a smear of space-dust or retreating to fight another day. I'm interested in claiming more Republic scalps, not adding to their kill-count."

A hairless brow raised sceptically at my reply. ::Mind explaining why you're here, Captain? Our lord sends out starships from here to link-up with fleets throughout the galaxy. They are not expected to return. Not to the Forge::

That wasn't a surprise, not with the coordinates missing from the logs. It was probably a safeguard if the ship was captured- up until now, the Star Forge's location had been a closely-guarded secret. I forced a nonchalant shrug. "Well, sir, this is an Aurek-class snubfighter. I have, at max, a week's worth of fuel onboard. Not enough to meet up with Admiral Sara on the Rodian front, or, frankly any of the offensives in the Mid Rim-"

::Enough,: he interrupted. Impatience furrowed his brow. ::Aurek-class snubs are widely spread throughout our enemy's forces, so I'm sure you can appreciate our immediate reaction. We're expecting an enemy assault within hours::

"Indeed," I bit out. "Why do you think I returned home?"

The Zabrak's eyes tightened.
"Sir," I tacked on. Easy does it, Vrook. Play the part of a battle-angry pilot, not an insubordinate one.

::You privy to the enemy's plans, Troystar?::

I snorted, struggling for an outward display of scorn even as I scrabbled for a plausible riposte. "Republic comms aren't hard to crack, sir," I fired back, shooting off an inward apology to Dodonna. "And the Leviathan agents weren't exactly circumspect with their intel. Gossip of a Republic assault on the Forge was a bit of an open secret over the airwaves."

::Sloppy::. The disapproving tones of the general lay thick through the comm. ::Not what I expect from Saul Karath::.

I debated an answer to that, before leaning on silence as the best rejoinder.

The Zabrak's gaze was stony as he appraised me. All he'd be seeing in return was a starpilot's targeting helm, orange visor occluding what was visible of my face. I had no idea if Darth Malak's home base had dossiers on Karath's doomed crew, but at least the pilot I was impersonating had been a male Human.

::Alright, Captain, time for you to uncloak before Zephyr-3 gets a twitchy trigger finger::. The corner of the Zabrak's hard mouth curved. ::She's got you on lock, Troystar. I suggest you don't give her an excuse for target practice before the real fun begins::.

My gaze snapped to the nav-screen as something lurched in my gut. Dozens of green blips were visible, but nothing close enough for immediate danger—the two marks that vanished earlier. Could they track me? Through the trace of the comms, maybe. Wasn't like I had much of a choice but to go forward with my cover story, and hope the hard-bitten general bought it.

Trust in the Force. I could almost hear Vandar's damn voice in my head. Well, I'd come this blasted far-

The purple hue of the stealth tech crackled before vanishing. A second after deactivation, two specks of green dotted into existence on the nav-screen—right on my tail.

The Zabrak was wearing a grin as cold and sharp as his damn flinty gaze. ::I've tacked your comm-signal onto Zephyr squad, Troystar. Your new designation is Zephyr-13::. He leaned back. ::Get some kills under your belt. Maybe it'll make up for running out on the Leviathan::

I was just starting to realize a dock wasn't forthcoming when the general stood, with the shadow of that spotty lieutenant hovering at his side. Blast it! I'd been counting on getting pulled in to dock for a debrief. Surely, I'd thought, some slimy Sith officer would want to grill a lone survivor from the Leviathan-

I leaned forward in desperation. "General-"

::*Hop to it, Captain::. the general growled as he stepped away and the stuttering greenhorn slid into the chair. The general's last words were muffled—::I have enough to prepare for without micromanaging a rogue runaway, Lieutenant. His signature's authentic. Don't bother me again unless there's an actual Republic bug to squash::.

Force, I have to get on the damn Star Forge, not join the blasted Sith fleet!

Lieutenant Jha'hasi muttered a cowed sir before turning to face the cam, a forced smile on his face that wavered into a pained grimace. ::*Zephyr-13, you heard General Daelidar. You need to form-
"I'm flying on fumes here, Lieutenant," I cut in, trying to edge my tone into neutral. If spotty idiot was back in charge, I'd have to play him. Might be easier than the general, now that the Sith aren't trying to shoot me. "I need to dock and refuel."

The kid frowned, one hand scratching at the fuzz on his face. ::I'm looking at your readouts, Zephyr-13. You've got more than a quarter-::

So said my diagnostics, too. I pasted on a smile. "Damn internal specs have been unreliable since the stealth mod was installed. A-231 sputtered out in the middle of a dogfight, Lieutenant. We all learned quick to refuel before the quarter-mark was hit."

Jha'hasi blinked. ::Um, that's news to me, Captain.::

"Apologies, Lieutenant, I'll be sure to log it with Quality after the battle," I replied in a bland tone. Easy, I warned myself, as Jha'hasi flushed a mottled red. Intimidate the kid, don't annoy him. I lowered my voice. "Look, all I want to do is kill those bastards who got my comrades. Please, get me docked and refuelled, so I can do just that."

Jha'hasi's head twitched sideways, as if he was looking to the general's retreating form for assistance. His young shoulders slumped, before he turned back to me with a long-suffering sigh. I wondered, not for the first time, just how depleted the ranks of Darth Malak's experienced nav-officers were.

::Alright, fine. I can get you a window to refuel in the Anterior factory bay, Captain.:: The kid frowned, leaning over a console. ::I've got a spot- er, dock F14 is empty. Fly on in, and comm the dockmaster for entry. I'll let Zephyr-I know that you'll form up within thirty minutes.::

"Thank you, Lieutenant." I switched the comm off. It was only then that I realized my hands were shaking.

So far, so good. I took a deep breath in. My pulse was steady, my head clear. One second, to re-focus myself. Alright. Game on. The Force is with me.

My hands twitched a slight adjustment to the trajectory, aiming the snub straight for the midsection of Forge's closest fin. Landing protocol should be easy to follow. Wouldn't be long now, before I took my first steps on that cursed space station. Smooth flying from here on in-

The comm blinked again. My jaw clenched in a forced smile as I leaned forward to answer it.

::Er, you're heading to the wrong bay.::

Great. Stuttering Greenhorn was back. And I was a fool for assuming the nearest factory bay was my designated destination. I sighed noisily over the comm. "Useful. Even more useful would be some actual directions."

I heard a faint snigger over the airwaves, which made me wonder just who else was listening in. The kid grimaced. ::Sure, yeah, it's the factory bay to the left. My left. So, um, your right.::

Jha'hasi's expression was pained, like he'd just bitten into something rotten. I wondered whether he'd survive the day, and felt vaguely sad despite my irritation. Kids like this one, on both sides, were nothing more than numbers. Despite the horrors Kun had unleashed a generation ago, nothing had truly changed.
"Understood." I gave the boy a curt nod, bit back an acidic retort about his communication skills, and flicked the communicator shut once more.

xXx

I wasn't interrupted again. And as the Star Forge slowly eclipsed the entirety of my view, a great heaviness weighed on my soul. A creeping desolation, as if this entire plan was doomed from the start. It wasn't reckless, it was flat-out insane-

This place reeks of the Dark Side. Despair was but one of many paths, and I knew the taste well. I also knew that the best counter was beyond me- I couldn't reach out to the Force. Not here. Not so close to Darth Malak.

The dockmaster had commed through an approach vector and landing coordinates. I'd been surprised to see it was a droid, a sleek cinereal protocol droid that issued forth automated docking instructions. That's a good thing. One less sentient to placate or win over. My Aurek-class snub hovered, pausing just outside an external airlock at the anterior maw of the Star Forge, waiting for the chance to enter.

The delay itself, transmitted from the dockmaster as an estimated eight minutes, was gruelling. I was so close, and yet felt so far away. That insidious trickle of doubt returned, the creeping belief that everything was about to go belly-up in the worst of ways-

Patience. Faith. Master them both. The Dark Side shall not prevail. With a deep cleansing breath, I cleared my mind and waited.

When an airlock finally opened and spat out three enemy marks, I slowly edged the A-236 into the heart of Darth Malak's empire.

As the ship crept ever forward, I tightened my focus inward. Kept the Force around me small. It wasn't possible to make one's signature entirely vanish, but dampening it was a skill I had some proficiency with. Maybe, if Malak was searching for an intruder he might hiccup on me, but it was a risk I'd accepted when I first jumped into this stolen craft.

He'll be concentrating on the Republic advance. His focus will be on Bastila. On Revan. So long as I don't cast any attention to my presence, I can slip through his fortress without him even realizing.

The turbine compressor whined as I cleared the airlock into the internal docking bay. The room beyond was- colossal. Larger than I expected, even from the outside. Rows of individual docks, many empty, spanned the massive hangar. The ground was teeming with flight-bots and astromechs and protocol droids. Refuelling gigs lined up in columns between the bays.

The snub held steady as my gaze spanned the hangar through the viewport. I'd seen enough docking bays in my time: large military bases housing dozens of strikefighters on Coruscant, on Duro, on the Chandrilan moon... but this one pipped them all for sheer size. Only snubs here, though. Out in the field, we've seen Forge-created destroyers, cruisers, transports-

But there were two more factory docks on the other fins of the Forge. Possibly meant for the deployment of the larger warbirds. A chill crept down my spine as I suddenly saw first-hand the military might that Darth Revan had brought into being.

The console blinked with a docking designation. Nearby, a display panel secured by a large robotic arm blinkered with the letters F14. With an inward breath, I flew the snub slowly forward before descending.
As the snub touched down on the launch pad, I killed the repulsors and powered the engine down. The lights on the dash winked out as I glanced sideways through the viewport. From here, near a dozen alien warbirds were visible, sleek and elongated and unique to the Sith armada. My craft may have been one of Karath's elite, but I was well-aware of just how badly it stuck out.

Move. My limbs moved automatically, unbuckling the safety harness, opening the cockpit window. An automated refuelling gig was already wheeling closer, along with an astromech droid that bleeped at me in surprise. If the Force wills it, this entire dock is run by droids. No one to question why I am suddenly leaving-

With a wrench, I pulled myself upright and clambered out of the snub.

My booted feet echoed as they landed on the shiny floor with a thud.

-glimpses of the truth can be found here-

I glanced around wildly- a column of crates blocked my view in two directions, but to the right I could see various launch pads dotting along in a row to a distant wall of the hangar. The closest snub was some five docks away, with a suited pilot sitting ready in an open cockpit. He paid me no mind, leaning over the dash of his readied ship.

Move. Get out of here. I lifted my chin, and began walking. I need to find a soldier or an engineer. Change out of this flight suit. Find an outfit to blend in-

-draw deep. you can find what you're looking for. you can find Bastila-

My breath caught in my throat. The urge to embrace the Force swelled: to search for my padawan using my strength, for surely that was the only way to locate her in a station the size of this one-

-yes, and there is great power here. you will find her, if only you reach out-

Oh, that dark desire was dangerous. I could not draw Darth Malak's attention. I knew that. So why was I even considering it?

-because you can't find Bastila without it-

No. No. I drew tight, tightly, tighter within myself. I was small, insignificant really, not noticeable-

The whispering voice ebbed before fading. The Dark Side... I knew it would be strong here, but I'd been an idiot to believe it would be easy to remain unaffected. I'd always thought Revan Freeflight and Malak Devari had been well-scarred, corrupted even, before Malachor- they would have thrown up little defence against the constant pull of temptation that emanated here.

Something alien and ancient and massive brushed against my soul before moving away. A presence, perhaps; or merely a coalesced corruption of the Force. And I knew, then, that Darth Malak sensing me wasn't the only danger I faced.

I had to stay sane. I had to stay true. Which meant doing things the old-fashioned way. Sneak. Lie. Impersonate the enemy, and don't get caught. I would risk delving into the Force only if I had to, only with the lightest of touches, only if there was no other way to find Bastila.

The Force had led me here. Surely, it would guide me to my padawan. I kept walking, focused on that distant wall, on a nearby exit that offered a glimmer of hope.

Recklessness had always paid off for the likes of Revan Freeflight. Force-willing, maybe it would for me.

xXx

Chapter End Notes

Coming up next: Multi-POV as the end-game finally opens.
A flight-squad's worth of thanks to kosiah for the beta.
Bastila Shan:

The soul-curdlng memory whispered to me. Replaying the same vision; taunting with the same dark malevolence. Again and again in an ever-growing echo of evil.

Shadows of licking anti-life, twisting through the nether.

The images burned when I slept. When I woke. Whenever my mind wandered from its tightly held directive.

Winking out the beauty and the feral power that fuelled the Force, be it light or dark or somewhere in between.

The true threat behind everything.

Death of the Force itself.

My hands clenched tight against the smooth alloy railing of the meditation chamber Malak had so thoughtfully bestowed upon me. My head bowed, tightly twisted braids dangling like limp vines slowly suffocating for lack of sunlight. My eyes squeezed tight against the inevitable.

-evil is the death of the Force-

How could Revan turn from me? How could she behold this horror, this most crucial remnant of her cursed past, and then bleat on about the insignificant lives of a fleet doomed to destruction?

She was broken. Truly broken, when I first saved her. Since then, Revan had vaulted from strength to strength, despite the hurdles along the way, until even I had dared dream she could once again be the mighty hero the galaxy needed.

She still retained her old power. Oh, yes, I had tasted that enough times. But what was the power of Revan Freeflight against the death of the Force? When she refused to claim our only hope of triumph?

-the power is here to combat the threat. all you need do is grasp it-

Malak would awaken soon, if he had not already. He would find me. A platitude or two might soothe my forbidding master, but he would soon command me to contact Revan, and when she did not answer the holo-call-

He will tear into my thoughts, discover I have already spoken with her-

I had expected Revan to be here by now! Now, before I had to face Malak again. *Maybe- maybe she has changed her mind, stepped into the snubfighter, and is already on her way- For Revan, of all sentients, should comprehend what was truly at stake.

The old Revan had known, had understood.

Shoulds and maybe don't make a wall, Bastila. Rely on them and you may as well tuck your head beneath your bedcovers. Focus on what you can do.

I had to reach out to Revan again. Contact her, before Malak arrived. Pride held me back- pride and resentment were emotions I did not wish to admit- but the sting of Revan denying me, when she had been upon the precipice of truth-

She does not grasp the truth in its entirety. Perhaps Revan was still too broken. But while her strength eclipsed mine, I was the one who stood upon the Star Forge. I understood the limitations and possibilities of the bond that shackled us. I could sense the deep reverberation of promise echoing from the mighty heart of this very factory.

Perhaps, all I needed to do was remind her that our power was greater as one.

With a shaky breath, I called upon the Star Forge and released the psychic shield I had built between us.

There was...

My heart froze in disbelief.

...nothing.

What? No sense of my bond-sister. No presence intermingled within my connection to the Force. No tangible block on her end, nothing but an empty space where Revan should reside.

The taint of vague horror uncurled in my stomach. My thoughts raced as wildly as a summer storm. Nothing. How could that be? She is missing... again?

It took a moment for my frantic mind to slow. To ease back into something approaching order. This has the same feel as Kashyyyk, I thought numbly, when Darth Bandon collared her. Somewhere, Revan had vanished from the Force. Or the Leviathan, when that schutta had thrown her into a Force-cage.

The flurry of panic threatened to soar again. Is Revan once more someone's prisoner? Is this all for naught? Is her death merely one heartbeat away- and mine, also?

Yet... yet I did not know how she escaped Bandon, nor the cage on the Leviathan. Revan had never shared the specifics; all I had was Malak’s patchy guesswork. A desperate laugh choked from my lungs. Perhaps Revan has willingly donned a disruptor, to ensure neither I nor Malak can contact her.

It seemed an absurd thought. Such an incongruous image: Revan forfeiting the Force.

I blinked back the sting of moisture in my eyes. Curse you, Revan. Do you stand upon Lehon now, Force-blind and hopeful, with no plan behind you other than your thrice-damned luck?

But... had she not alluded to another plan? An alternative method to reach the Star Forge? That geriatric who now followed her said as much atop the pyramid. There is another way. The sting of bitter distaste was acrid in my mouth. If Revan truly believed the Ebon Hawk could navigate against Malak's scrambler and through his armada both-
Then she was even more broken than I realized.

-you can be the saviour. the power is here-

I had so little time. If Revan remained on Lehon, then Malak would target her only after the ill-fated Republic forces had burned into space dust. I would do my part; it made no difference if the chaff headed our way destroyed themselves against my battle meditation or Malak's scrambler. They were dead regardless.

And their objective of destroying the Star Forge was as nihilistic as Revan's. They were blind bantha butting heads against a wall, without seeing that the wall was the only structure capable of holding the darkness at bay.

In that regard, Malak reigning victorious was a more desirable outcome.

At least he would have a chance against what lies in the Unknown Regions. Another bitter laugh bubbled from my cold lips. To think, I was driven to such a dark place that the thought of Malak winning was the lesser of two evils-Malak's triumph over Revan would mean my death. But it would give the galaxy a chance of survival.

-you can be the saviour-

The power that Revan and I could wield together would be greater than the fist of Darth Malak. And I alone was grounded. I, alone, had my focus fixed where it should be: the true threat behind it all. For I had little faith in Malak's sanity - or Revan's objectivity, now.

And if, somehow, Revan was on her way here and despite the odds made it through-

Then we destroy Malak. And I would make her see the truth, or Force help me, the Star Forge itself could.

For now, I would wait. Appease Darth Malak, and wait for Revan. I swallowed against the lump in my throat. My entire life had been spent waiting for someone else to decide my next move. It was a bitter realization.

Malak might be the master, but only in this ephemeral moment. Masters changed, usually to whomever held the seat of power. And the power was here.

If I could not make Revan see reason, then I would step up and seize-

The hatch behind me opened with a hiss.

"Little one," Darth Malak murmured.

xXx

Zez-Kai Ell:

"The Senate demands transparency of all financial matters. Establishment and assessed compliance of our own professional standards." Kavar's eyes were so hard they'd turned a slate grey colour. His knuckles bleached white as they gripped the offending datapad. "Minutes of board meetings. They want us to scribble down specifics of High Council Meetings?"

"They seek to define us, Kavar." I sighed. There was a weariness deep in my soul that made me feel, for the first time in my life, truly old. Defining the Jedi Order within a framework meant we could be all the easier controlled. That was obvious, to any master worth his robes. "Their recommendation is a non-profit corporation, although there is the alternate option of declaring the Order a religious organization."

"Religion." Kavar shot the word back at me, his head lifting briefly. "We have faith in the Force, Zez, not some dogmatic consortium revolving around a fictional deity."

I tilted my head. "Many have compared the Order to a religion in the past. It is a better fit that a non-profit, if you ask me."

"Dammit, Zez, that's not the point!" Kavar slammed his hand down on the poraclay surface in a rare show of temper.

"I know," I murmured. "But we knew the Senate's reaction was coming. Perhaps the shape of it was unknown, but nonetheless, their displeasure was guaranteed to fall upon us one way or another."

"Ever since Atris-"

I cut him off with a dry laugh. "Be honest, my old friend. Our reckoning has been due for a lot longer than our colleague's revelation to the Senate. Revan Freeflight's resurrection was merely the last straw for a generation of disgruntled politicians."

Kavar closed his eyes in defeat. "They blame us for non-involvement," he said softly. "Then they turn around and blame us for Revan and Malak."

"The Jedi have always enjoyed a position of impartiality from judgment, Kavar. Do I like the Senate enforcing limitations on us? No. Do I think it's fair? That is a harder question."

"Fair," he muttered. "It's never been about fair, Zez. Life isn't fair-"

"Yet fairness, or lack thereof, is what the masses see." Truly, there were times I found it difficult to believe that Kavar had been born into a political family. He was an honest man - and I loved him for it - but there was no denying his objectivity was sometimes clouded. "The Order has been a part of the Republic for centuries. Yet we are granted concessions no other institution or member-state can solicit. We pay no tax. We cannot be indicted to the Senate. We are allowed to claim - even exonerate - the galaxy's most heinous villains. Why?"

Kavar shot me a strange look. "We wield the Force, Zez."

I shook my head almost impatiently. "There are all manner of sentients and cultures who have special abilities. What separates the Jedi from them?"

Again, his expression appeared to be debating on whether I had sprouted another head. "The Force, Zez. The power that the Force grants us."

"Power." There. That was the key. Kavar and I had engaged in shades of this dialogue before, and never reached an accord. Yet there had been something different about Kavar, lately. A jaded bleakness at the edges of his mind. Not an emotion I desired to see my friend inflicted with, for all that it seemed to have granted him some badly-needed gravitas. "It is the power of the Force, Kavar. That is what the citizens of the Republic see, that is what the Senate once trusted. That we would step up as galactic guardians, with the power of the Force as our might and their shield, should the need ever arise."
A faint sigh ghosted from his lips. It sounded wistful. "Then the Mandalorians came."

Kavar turned his head to stare blankly through the open viewport. Outside, the fragrant gardens of the inner Temple scented the air with rose petals and starflowers, and I doubted he even noticed.

That would be an end to our conversation, I suspected. For if there was one topic that had always divided us, it was the Order’s decree regarding the Mandalorian invasion. My given opinion had been scarce in the High Council chambers: that we could not sit back, no matter the danger to our souls. That we could not expect the Republic to understand our need for caution, when all they saw was millions of their own dying-

For if we weren’t able to convince our own knights to embrace non-involvement, how could we believe the galaxy at large would accept it?

Whatever impetus had driven the Mandalorian Clans may have been hazardous to our fractured Order, but our chosen route of inaction instead felt like a gradual death. A death of our integrity, our principles, even our own meaning. There had been something behind the Mandalorian thirst for conquest - our grand masters had been convinced of it, even if their deep meditations had never revealed precisely what. That ominous presentiment, coupled with the scars of Exar Kun’s war, had been enough to convince the High Council to sit back. Wait for the opportune time. Allow the true threat behind it all to show itself-

Allow the Republic to burn, first.

I’d had dark times, in years past, when I had doubted my loyalty to the High Council. When I had wondered, dangerously, if I should do what no other master would- if I should follow my old padawan into war-

Aye, but would that have meant falling alongside her? That was the true danger we all feared. The temptation of losing oneself, of transforming into a being held hostage by the whims of one’s own dark desires. Or the flipside. Could I have drawn her back?

A bitter, bitter thought.

She was dead, now.

I’d felt it, some weeks ago, her life a dark spark that snuffed out in caustic bitterness. A shock sensation that woke me from my slumber; that pulled at the shadows in my heart.

The Senate refused to share beyond the most basic of military statistics, but I did not need to review the casualty lists from the skirmish above Kashyyyk. The timing fit: she had been on the Leviathan. My cautious, irreverent, once-padawan.

I’d begged her not to follow Revan Freeflight, but when she did- aye, and when her name was one of the Thirteen emblazoned on the hearts of the Republic- I had silently praised her courage.

So many of us had lost padawans. So many of us had watched them ascend to knighthood, only to fall from afar.

"Self-realization is a bitter pill to swallow," Kavar murmured. He was looking back at me again, expression heavy with grief. His fair hair was peppered with grey, and hard lines of age bracketed his sturdy face. Somewhere along the line, even my youthful friend had begun to show his years. "I’ve spent so long blaming the likes of Revan Freeflight for our slipping status within the Senate.
But when I look back...

He trailed off. And I discerned, then, the note of regret clouding his voice. After all this time of staunchly defending the Order's decision, I had to wonder- did Kavar, now, wish he had chosen differently?

As Jedi, we looked to the past for guidance, not self-flagellation. But it was so intrinsically difficult not to dovetail into defeatist what-might-have-been's, when so many lives were on the line.

The corners of Kavar's mouth turned down. "Have you spoken to the others?"

"Some." I inclined my head. "Lonna is furious. Deshtar is scrabbling for a loop-hole. And Atris-well. She is adamant that we must appease the Senate."

Kavar snorted. Funny how Atris Surik always managed to bring out the worst in him. "She's a blind mynock for not seeing how this would backfire so badly."

"Perhaps. But even you must admit that Atris' intentions were sound, no matter how ill-thought out. She believed full disclosure would regain some trust."

"Because informing senators that Dantooine sponsored the release of Darth Revan was always going to rebuild trust," he muttered darkly.

"Sarcasm ill befits you, Kavar."

He threw me a crooked grimace of chagrin. "To be fair, I don't necessarily disagree with the actions of Dantooine. Stars, letting this broken version of Revan loose seems to have granted us a long-shot at taking out the heart of the Sith. It's just the secrecy-"

"Which is why Atris revealed it," I said calmly. "Because she did not trust the High Council to do so."

"We would have told them eventually," he grumbled, but his heart wasn't in it. Neither was mine. Every High Council member was well-aware of the growing mistrust the Senate harboured toward the Order. To admit to them that one of our enclaves had undertaken such action- not only without Senate knowledge, but also their own High Council's-

I could see why the Senate wished to rein us in. I detested the very idea, but I could certainly understand why.

"We should head to the chambers," I said. "The others will be waiting. We all need to work together to form an appropriate response for the Senate. That means you need to play nice with Atris."

Kavar shot me a grin that echoed with his wry candour of old. "I can do that," he assented. His grin only grew at my look of disbelief. "Trust me, Zez. Force, she might be our only inside line left to the Senate. If Atris has news of the Star Forge, I'll even slap a smile on my face and compliment her shiny outfit."

xXx

Malak Devari:

She stood before me in silence. Eyes downcast, figure preternaturally still - the young woman had come far, in the short time her soul had been mine to mould.
"I cannot reach her, master."

She was a much more proficient liar than she had been.

My gloved hand dropped to Bastila's shoulder. I could feel the ridges of slender bones beneath my grip. Fragile and delicate. Just like her mind, as it fluttered to defend against the touch of my own. Ah, but I had been inside Bastila's mind too often, these days. The path was well-worn and beaten down.

"Your words are honest," I intoned, interleaving my thoughts with hers. Her relief at my agreement was a sharp tang that failed to conceal her fear. "But your intent is not."

Physical contact made a psychic breach so much easier. I had always found this side of the Force obscure and indirect, but it certainly had its uses. With the power of the Star Forge augmenting my strength, any facet of Force use was possible. Surmountable. Masterable.

"I- I- tried to speak to h-her, but she w-would not answer-" Blabbering words. Stuttering like an invertebrate slave. Her bones ground together beneath my grasp as I let the first edge of my displeasure show.

Holding back a gasp of pain, Bastila looked up. Her tawny eyes widened as she understood that I already knew of her treachery. A swallow, but she held my gaze, face pale and bloodless, as she awaited her master's next move. Her chin lifted.

There. There was the steel I needed in an apprentice. The perfect blend of steel and sweet fear.

"You disobeyed me, little one," I murmured. "You spoke to your old master before I gave you leave to."

As always, such a reference shone sparks of indignant amber that glowed in her eyes. She struggled valiantly to conceal it, but Bastila's weakness was obvious. Her innate objection to naming Revan as her superior was strong. Greater, perhaps, than her resistance at bending knee to me had been. It was... an interesting observation.

The past is merely the journey one has taken to reach the now. No point feeling the sting of self-disgust at what one had done. Bastila may never have knelt in subservience to Revan the way I had been forced to, but her heart had been bound just the same.

Throwing off the shackles of the past was what allowed one to embrace the present.

Now, my present stood, shaking in my grasp and yet awaiting my displeasure in silent readiness. An influx of energy levelled in on her mass. Holding her upright, alert for my retaliation. The power of the Star Forge. She had called upon it, and the Forge answered. The kaiburr... liked her. The Star Forge approved of my choice.

A curl of pleasure unfurled in my gut. Truly, I had chosen well.

"I am your master," I uttered, as I toyed over what to do with her. Pain was a price to pay. A battle to win. A challenge to overcome. This was one of the most valuable lessons I could give her. "I know your mind, your hopes, your desires. Did you believe I would not notice you rising early? That I would not account for it?"

Shock blanked her face.

She doesn't know, I realized with vague amusement. The detonation on Lehon had been tripped successfully, tied to the completion of the holo-stand's transmission. The report had been waiting for me once I roused myself from meditation. All had gone as planned.

Although, truly, I had expected Bastila to have some inkling through her bond—unless one of them was deliberately blocking the other.

Revan is not dead. That is not the reason. Her death would have been a sweet prize, but I was not foolish enough to count on it. Force bonds rarely bloomed between a master and an apprentice, but when they did, one recipient almost certainly sensed the death of the other.

Their bond ran deeper.

"Show me," I whispered. My gloved hands held firm on her shoulders; my mind aimed like an arrow into hers. Show me. I would know all that went down on that dead world. Revan might still breathe, but she was trapped on Lehon's surface regardless. Perhaps the explosion had taken out some of her allies, and it must have broken her trust with Bastila—

A torrent of images unfurled like spring buds opening to the sun, each sprouting to life in my apprentice's mind. I saw the courtyard. I heard the conversation. The entrance of Revan's allies. One raising a green lightsaber at the others—

Wait. A green lightsaber, wielded by a shadowed Twi'lek. No. No! That misbegotten, traitorous bastard cannot still be alive!

Rage, as turgid and torrid as the molten core of a star, fired to life in my heart. The Star Forge rallied around me—end him. end her. show your superiority—

Bastila was wildly thrown from my grip across the chamber as a snarl ripped from my vocabulator, buzzing against the ruin of my throat. That bastard Twi'lek had the temerity to bend knee, vow to hunt Revan's walking corpse down and eviscerate her if Bandon failed, yet now he was once more glued to her side—

-he will pay. she will pay. you are no longer first amongst followers, to be replaced at the fickle whim of an ex-lover. you are the master—

I was.

And my rage... my rage was useful, but it would own me only when I allowed it. That was one lesson Revan had taught me well. She is impotent. She is weak and imprisoned by my scrambler. I shall deal with her—with them—in due course.

The rage winked out to a slow-burning ember. I would fire it back up when required. But first, I had an apprentice to forge. And the destruction of a fleet to oversee.

"Show me the rest," I whispered. Touch made it easier, but surely I could delve into my apprentice's mind from across a mere room by now. The Force was mine to own. And Bastila would become the most prized tool in my arsenal.

I raised one black-clad hand toward Bastila's crumpled form. Her head lifted as my psychic probe once more entrenched upon her consciousness. It was getting easier. I was struck with the idle supposition on whether Force bonds could be created by such constant transgressions.

Wasn't that an intriguing thought? An enduring mind-link with my apprentice, who was indelibly connected to the spectre of my past. To think, I might even taste Revan's death through Bastila, and wouldn't that be sweet-

Bastila's psyche, once more, opened beneath my touch. Truly, it seemed like she wasn't even trying. Perhaps she had succumbed to the inevitable.

"Malak commands me to employ my battle meditation against all enemy ships that survive the scrambler's signal." Bastila's words atop the Lehon pyramid, cold and clear, as she raised a mental shield to separate her and Revan.

"I will not disobey Malak and suffer his wrath while you dither over an inconsequential number of lives. What the scrambler does not destroy, I shall." A narrowing of purpose, of anger, when she could not make her bond-partner listen. Oh, I recognized that emotion.

"If these Republic lives mean so much to you, then you best enter that snubfighter now and stop me yourself." The steel conviction in her words could have matched my old master's.

Bastila had come far.

"You are angry with her," I murmured, rifling through the end of their exchange. Revan didn't enter that doomed snubfighter. A pity, but Bastila's reaction was nothing short of delightful. "For she chose the Republic over you."

Bastila's eyes opened, a sharp gleam of tawny brown, glistening with emotion. Her chin lifted, and she stared back at me in trembling resentment. And it was not wholly directed at me.

The historical precedence of this moment! I knew it too well. This was a Revan I could easily vanquish. This was a Revan Bastila could turn away from.

"Come here, my apprentice."

There was a certain wariness in her wan countenance, but Bastila walked forward silently, stopping shy just within arm's reach. I could feel her inner struggle to suppress her emotions; a raw anger that battled over her brittle resolve.

It was that anger, familiar to me by now, but most certainly fledgling in its recipient, that made me hold back on the consequences Bastila did not yet realize. She had no awareness of the fallout on Lehon - and I saw that enlightenment was not required. Not at present. No, far better she clasp tight onto this delightful belligerence, and believe that Revan did not come out of a continued choice, rather than the lack of a working vessel.

"Bastila." I raised one hand to touch the side of her cheek gently. The black glove contrasted with her chalk-white skin. One day soon, the stipples of corruption would be visible amongst that youthful pallor. "We shall deal with Revan later. You know what the true threat is."

A flash of something dark sharpened her gaze before her eyelids fluttered closed. Her head dipped in a nod.

"The Star Forge is our bastion of defense against the Unknown Regions, little one. You and I both understand this. Perhaps, once, my old master did too, but now..."

I could feel that soft skin tense beneath my gloved fingertips. Her heart rallied in futile objection, even as her head listened. Bastila was on the path of becoming a truly great apprentice. I would have liked to smile down at her, to brush my lips tenderly against her forehead, but that was yet one more thing Revan had stolen from me.
"For now, she places the Republic first," I murmured. So sweet, to drive that shiv-blade in deeper. "First above all."

She will come for me. She- she must-

Bastila's head still bowed, and her thoughts edged with the hysteria of the desperate. Even she did not believe her own words anymore.

_In due course, my apprentice._ Let her hold onto that image of the snubfighter still safely snug on the pyramid's roof courtyard. Let her remain ignorant of the truth: that Revan was entirely trapped on a dead world. How gratifying, to think that the shell of my old master would be powerless, as the Republic Fleet was destroyed above her head. _First, we must strike down those who seek to destroy us. You know what your next step is._

Brief images flashed like quicksilver through Bastila's mind, fleeting and almost too swift for me to grasp. Memories of her past, when Bastila had knelt in subservience, unleashing her gift under the watchful eye of a robed protector. Cloistered and guarded while her power was used.

"Your battle meditation leaves you exposed," I realized, my eyes narrowing. I had been waiting for this precious moment, waiting to taste the breadth of Bastila Shan's battle meditation that had been a thorn in my side for so long. And, now, her uneasiness caught me off-guard.

I was still hooked into her psyche, just enough that I caught the image of an indolent figure sauntering toward her, and the reactive disgust that pooled in her mind-

"Oh, Bastila." Another day, that show of vulnerability would irritate me. But, perhaps, even the keekest of tools required reassurance at times. "You have nothing to fear from Sharlan Nox. You are my Shadow Hand, my apprentice above all others. I will not leave you unguarded."

I stepped back from her, enjoying the way her near-golden gaze unerringly returned to me. With a tap on my wrist, I hailed the scourge of her thoughts.

"Sharlan, send two slayers to Bastila Shan's meditation chamber immediately. They will report to her."

::As you will, my lord.:: The man's insouciant drawl echoed from my personal communicator, and I saw Bastila's bloodless lips tighten in response.

"Oh, and one more thing," I murmured pleasantly, keeping my eyes fixed on Bastila. "Come within twenty metres of my apprentice and I shall rip out your entrails and wrap them around your neck."

There was a slight pause. A flash of something akin to satisfaction narrowed Bastila's gaze.

::I would not dream of displeasing you, my lord.::

The communicator clicked off with a faint whine. Bastila drew in an unsteady breath. "You think to place two of his- his pets here?" she squawked, and the heat of her tone bordered on defiance.

"Careful," I warned. "I act in your best interests, little one. Do you not realize that by now?"

She swallowed, but kept her chin aloft. "Master, I- I don't see how his- his playthings could adequately guard me."

"His pets are nothing more than batteries, Bastila. Just as Sharlan Nox is nothing more than a means to an end." My chosen Shadow Hand should not require such words. She had already shown her fire against the likes of Sharlan Nox; that she now quailed meant her use of battle meditation must leave her vulnerable indeed. It was, perhaps, something for me to remember. "The slayers I speak of are not Sharlan's, and you will find them enough of a guard should you be interrupted. Come, now. It is time to unveil your vaunted battle meditation."

Something firmed in her expression then; an inner resolve perhaps, a tightening of will to continue on the path I had chosen for her. This was one of Bastila's final steps, to turn on those she had once labelled allies, and the moment itself was as sweet as the memory of biting into a sun-ripened honey-pear.

Bastila nodded, turned from me, and sank to her knees.

I let my hands settle gently on her shoulders as her first tendrils of Force grasped slowly outward.

Show me, I repeated, sinking into her mind.

The Force pulled out from her like a spiderweb's lattice made of the finest titasteel. The power swelled, and I could feel the heart of the ancient kaiburr echo through me, to her, as our combined will spread through the walls of the Star Forge.

So strong, she murmured, as the alien power threaded through our joint grasp. Yes. My eyes had closed against the sensation, against the influx of energy as it caressed my soul. The Star Forge was a circular mass around us, threaded through with the occasional pinpricks of life that scurried like beetles in a sand-hill, wholly unaware of the titans standing above them with the power of the galaxy clutched in their fist.

Beyond, Bastila whispered, and then began to transcend from her body.

It started out the same as a deep meditation, but this... this part was new to me. This was my apprentice's vaunted gift. Such a rare talent, such a promise- and one that now belonged to me.

I could not see how to emulate her machinations of the Force, but I could follow.

Bastila spread herself thin, ever outward, dispersing her self until she was no more than a misting of intangible energy resting gently over a large circumference now extending into space. Her body was left behind, no more than organic dross, a limp figure in the very nexus of her realm. You are vulnerable in this state, I mused. There was a distracted murmur of agreement from my apprentice; her focus remained as fixed as her concentration.

Specks of life flared in clusters around the edges of our consciousness. Show me, I ordered once more, pausing as I considered a small array of entities. A snubfighter squad, I thought, formed up in readiness to execute my will. These are my men. Show me what you can do.

Her attention turned at my command, zeroing in to settle over the specified group. It was a strange, almost passive sensation, as foreign emotions fed back through to us, all too transitory to grasp.

It is like manipulating the clay of a utensil. She touched one life briefly before moving on. It flared a brighter spark than before. I can focus their mind, disperse unease and sharpen concentration. Their reflexes, their reaction time- all augmented.

Like an adrenal stimulant. One fleck in the squad was noticeably duller than the others. What if the clay is defective?

I felt Bastila pause to examine the deadened flare of light. I will have some effect on near-all sentients. The magnitude depends on how open they are. This one- he fights the limitations of his own flesh. Her presence pulsed, a gentle ripple in the fabric of the Force as she hovered over the life in question. I cannot entirely counteract the effects of too little sleep and an overindulgence in gree-spice. Her thought was laced with mild disgust. I had the sense that Bastila was experiencing more from each sentient she touched than I could see. As she drew back, the dull speck remained a sullied glow contrasting with the sharper lights in the squad. There is only so much I can do.

Weakness does not belong in my fleet. My displeasure rallied; from deep in my bones I could feel the promise of the Star Forge. I called, and it answered.

The kaiburr blazed. I surged forward. There was a flash of alarm from Bastila, a shudder in the matrix of threads held gently in her clasp.

That's too-

I shot forward, and pinched the light out.

-far too much-

A crash against the senses, a sharp recoil between us, a loss of control as the Force bucked wildly-Rage at the unknown blazed into being, and I would halt this effect, for the Force answered to me-
But I was falling. Flying, drawn down into a vortex of plummeting power. Like a spring, pulled to its apex, before snapping shut with a crash.

There was a loud clap of sound. A slamming into something hard as the sensation abruptly stopped.

A residual dizziness slowly receded. The press of gravity under my feet, the confines of my flesh once more surrounding me. Eyes opening, I found myself standing, staring down at the fine, delicate braids that bedecked the back of my apprentice's head.

She was gasping. Her kneeling form shook with tremors of reaction.

"We must increase your capacity to wield power, little one," I observed, mildly displeased. "You lost control entirely."

"Cannot- cannot get too deep in the lives I touch," she whispered. "Might- might lose the way back." She drew in a shuddering breath, tilting her head sideways. I stepped around to look down at her. There was a hollow look in Bastila's eyes, and I wondered exactly how much of that feeble life she had experienced before it was snuffed out. "You- you killed that pilot."

The cast to her expression- it was surprise, I realized. Bastila had never envisaged such an execution was possible. Perhaps it was not, for her. My apprentice called upon the kaiburr, but she did not yet comprehend its full capabilities.

"You disapprove, my apprentice?" Surely, she was not still that soft-hearted. I had made her better than that.

"No." She blinked, and her body stiffened. "A sentient in that condition would be a liability to his own squad. He should not have entered a ship."
The correct answer gratified me. War was a numbers game, a calculation of odds, and Bastila was learning well. I glanced over to the far side of the meditation chamber, a muted curved wall of silver that faced the skies. With a flourish of my hand, four large panels dissolved into clear panes of translucency.

"This is our game board today, my apprentice. The Republic are due any moment, if the first wave is not already encroaching at the edges of Lehon space." The specks of my rallying snubfighter squads dotted the panorama in clusters of formation. All marks of my might. I wondered, idly, which group had just noticed one of their own careen out of control. "My scrambler will decimate the Republic advance, Bastila, but it is your responsibility to mop up any remnants that come close."

"I will not fail you, master." The words were low, but not subdued. "The Republic is nothing but a distraction to what we truly face."

"Good." A soft chime echoed from my wrist. Ahead, underneath a windowed-panel, lights on an inset console blinked. In the deep throes of space that yawned back at us, faint flashes of blaster fire flared into being.

My eyes lidded in anticipation. "It starts, little one. Focus on the Sith fleet. I want you to direct every shot my men aim at any ship capricious enough to evade my scrambler."

Bastila nodded, bowed her head, and reached out once more. This time, I did not follow.

It would be over quick, I thought, as I drew the Force in deep. Every death Bastila orchestrated would be another nail hammering her onto my path. She would never be able to turn back, nor did she even want to, at this stage. As for Revan...

That shall come after. The core of the Star Forge murmured agreement with me. I stared hard at the viewport. The flickers of light were pitiful, really. Every Republic starpilot out there was merely toiling against the inevitable, helpless as my scrambler aborted their sensors and my apprentice ensured their end. If I drew in deep enough, I could feel the faint echo of the kaiburr's child, that daughter crystal on nearby Lehon, as it pulsed disruption throughout the sector.

Out there on the fringes of my game board would be some of the Republic greats. Had the officers I'd once served with arrived yet? Adashan, Dodonna, Gant? The loss of Karath at Edean went beyond vexing, but this- ah. This would more than make up for it.

It truly was a moment to savour. Bastila's body knelt limply beside me as she enacted my will, and the victory today would be a cataclysmic blow against the crumbling Republic forces. Oh, there would be other battles as I drove my advance back into the heart of the galaxy, but taking out the three leaders listed in the intercepted Republic comms would send ripples of panic through my faltering enemies.

Nothing more to do but enjoy-

A shudder. An undulation, somewhere, searing through the Force. A flare, before a distant echo died abruptly, and suddenly all my senses dulled. A keening cry of loss from the kaiburr-

What? Four strides to the console. No. No, where is it? A tap on the keys. A message in red:

::EMP scrambler not available.:

Black rage followed quickly on the heels of alarm.
Revan. The name was a sibilant curse hissing through my mind. A poison seeping through again and again. Revan!

Instinct gathered the Force in, coiling tight, burning with need. The scrambler. The Lehon crystal. But how- how had she-Another rap on the console. No link with Lehon, no connection to the daughter crystal. It was gone.

Fury was a scorching heat of hate. Revan. The Force was an influx of unsteady acrimony, a retaliation of fire from the kaiburr-

-the power is here. and it is yours-

I was turning around, ready to atomize anything in my path, rend it apart in reaction-

My gaze landed on Bastila. Kneeling, slack-formed, compliant and unaware. Cold. Cold, not hot. Use the hate. Feed it with Revan's death. Bastila wouldn't know, couldn't know. If she learned that Revan had somehow destroyed or disabled the first defence of the Star Forge-

Revan will travel here. She will use the recovering Fleet as cover, and travel in her freighter here.

-then my apprentice might once more be afflicted with a glimmer of hope.

The Republic cannot withstand my forces backed by Bastila's battle meditation.

I could not afford Bastila to weaken. Even now, Republic lives would be winking out beneath my apprentice's will.

I will deal with Revan myself. Perhaps I always knew it would be this way.

-you are the master. and this is your stronghold-

The desire to destroy still rose dominant, but I would use it with calculation until the endgame reached fruition. Battle droids. The slayers. The sheer might in the very heart of the Star Forge. Defences to be rallied that would make a mockery of Revan's rogue assault.

Revan thinks to challenge me on her own terms. Ah, let the crippled shell try! This was a flawed Revan, who knew not her power nor her past. That, I had clearly deduced from Bastila.

The rage simmered into a darkness that thrummed wildfire through my veins. This will be sweeter than her first death upon the Nexus. More satisfying than emasculating her on Lehon. Let Revan see her allies fall one by one, until I finally taste the gratification of tearing her heart out from her chest with my own hands.

Or- maybe I could install her as an impotent conduit of the kaiburr itself, right next to those lifeless pets.

The supposition was entertaining, but- no. No. It ends here, today. No more shall Revan be a blight upon me, ghost-shell or otherwise. I will end her, along with any idiot asinine enough to follow in her wake.

My footsteps echoed as I strode to the exit. The hatch was bordered on either side by a Force-blind assassin now, the two slayers I had called in earlier. There were others, elsewhere in the Forge, awaiting my orders. Somehow, I doubted that Revan remembered them.
And the kaiburr itself... Revan had never uncovered all of its secrets. I, already, drew in greater power than she had once understood.

Come to me, Revan. So many times had she escaped death. Not any longer. I am waiting.

And you have exhausted all of your lives.

xXx

Jordo Merrix:

"Kappa Three is down," Fulmosh reported. He shifted on the co-pilot's chair, one hand hovering over the comm. "He shouldn't have turned the blasted sensors back on."

I could feel a hard grimace twisting my face. My grip stayed firm on the steering column. "Squad-wide channel on my mic, Fulmosh. Now!"

On our flank, Zeta squad was flailing like a nest of ash-rabbits scattering from an encroaching kath hound. I'd seen two of our ships crash into each other, and felt the pained flinch from Fulmosh every time he reported another one down.

"It's ready, sir," Fulmosh muttered, and the pilot's mic blinked in recording mode.

"Kappa Squad, this is Captain Merrix," I bit out, canting to the left as a snub careened wildly across our trajectory. "Stay on manual control! Until we get confirmation from the Meridus, we are all flying manual. We've trained for this, troops. Get to the frontlines, and target those blasted Sith!"

We weren't close to the enemy marks, not yet. We hadn't even reached Adashan's cursed fleet. They were further ahead, clustered around our final objective, engaging directly with the enemy. Although if what the Meridus had reported was truth, then this damn scrambler was affecting us all. I didn't have read-outs on the status of our armada, but the current silence from Meridus command was ominous.

Adashan's flagship, the Lightstar, was a granite slug far in the distance. Swarmed by flecks of Sith fighters. Without nav-data, it was all guess-work - but my gut told me the general's heavy cruiser was one leap shy from turning into space dust.

Somewhere behind us, in the thick of Dodonna's forces, someone else was captaining the newly refurbished Ruby's Claw. I'd had the option of keeping that baby; stars knew, I had a greater chance of survival in the better-armoured frigate. The tow and repair from Kashyyk had concluded in the nick of time; half a day longer and I'd have missed the rendezvous with the Meridus. After all that'd happened, Commodore Tar'coya assumed I'd stay with the 'Claw - but I'd known where my place was.

I'd spent my life fighting and winning as a Wing Commander, and this might be the most crucial battle yet.

"Incoming ping," Fulmosh muttered. I was half-aware of him leaning forward over the secondary nav-console. "Don't recognize the source. It's- er, it's broadcasting on all frequencies. Should I pick it up?"

Transmit like that, it had to be some sort of morale-sapping taunt from the bastards out there. Like they needed another damn edge.

"Order the squad not to receive." I felt my teeth grit. Stang, does it really matter if I hear it? "Then play the damn message."

Fulmosh muttered a curt command into the mic, before tapping hard on the console. A crackly, audio-only message echoed throughout the cockpit.

I tensed, ready for the worst-

::This is Captain Carth Onasi of the Ebon Hawk. The scrambler has been destroyed. I repeat, to all available Republic forces: the scrambler is confirmed down.::

The jolt of recognition hit me a sec before the meaning of the message registered. Carth, you old kath hound! A punch of visceral glee burned in my gut. You got the blasted scrambler! "Activate the nav-computer," I growled. "Quick, Fulmosh, see if he's right!"

Before my co-pilot even had a chance, another transmit overrode our comm.

::All Wing Leaders revert to automatic ship-control and engage the enemy.: The iridescent sphere of a hologram flickered on the nav-stand. I didn't have to look down; I recognized the slurring tones of Tar'coya immediately. He was one of few who could force a message over any sort of acceptance protocol. ::The EMP scrambler has been confirmed as destroyed. Inform your squads, and haul arse to the frontlines!::

An array of lights blinkered dizzyingly on the dash, before settling into familiarity beneath Fulmosh's expert hands.

"It's back," Fulmosh breathed. He leaned forward, fingers dancing over the dials and read-outs. "All sensors online. Targeting module ready. Hyperdrive back. We're- we're good to go!"

I jammed the pilot's mic back on squad-wide broadcast. "Scrambler is down! All pilots, switch back to auto now!"

"I can see the others rallying," Fulmosh muttered. "Zeta's following us, with Upsilon and Chi right behind. We're the vanguard, sir."

"Then let's show them how to scythe through enemy lines." My eyes narrowed as I spoke once more through the comm. "Kappa squad, full power to thrusters and form up in echelon formation. We're leading Dodonna's fleet. Let's make her proud!"

"Boosting aft shields." Fulmosh retracted the turbolaser module, hands resting firmly on the targeting joystick. He was an expert gunner; one of the reasons I'd hand-picked him as my co-pilot. "We'll hit the first Sith bastards in thirty seconds."

Our snub shot forward, at the apex of the formation Kappa squad had trained in countless times before. There were twelve of us left; a brief glance to the nav-chart assured me the empty spots left by Three, Four and Eight had been adequately filled. Behind us, Zeta squad mirrored our stance.

"Six bogeys at the forefront."

"I see 'em," I muttered. The vast bulk of the Sith armada was kilometres ahead, but we'd be striking the stragglers at the forefront any second now. "Kappa Two and Five, follow me in a starboard roll. The rest of you hit them straight on!"

Fulmosh hummed under his breath; a reedy noise of anticipation I'd heard countless times. I waited a span of painful seconds until the bogeys were almost within range, then pitched the snub into a barrel roll.
I barely felt the G forces as adrenaline coursed fire through my veins.

Snapping out of the roll, we came out directly underneath the bastards.

"Lock!" Fulmosh cried in exultation, jamming hard on the turbolasers. "That'll be him down-stang!"

His squawk of protest told me all I needed to know. "Focus." I rapped out, angling the nose of the fighter up. There were another two, bearing directly down on us. Red laser spat from our guns; the two marks dived in opposite directions, and the fire of our bolts seared uselessly into black space.

_Damn evading bastards!_ "Leave the bogeys for Zeta squad!" I ordered into the mic. "Follow me, we're going in deeper!"

"Another eight coming in from aft-starboard," Fulmosh growled. I could hear the pissyness in his voice. He didn't like missing. "I'm gonna slam the first one with a missile."

"Only on a sure hit," I muttered, even though I knew Fulmosh wouldn't waste our limited concussion torpedoes. I canted sideways, and there- Adashan's heavy cruiser was visible again, and beyond- the powerhouse we were all aiming for. The massive factory of the blasted Sith. "Get ready."

Fulmosh hummed again; I yanked the snub up and the enemy squad sprang into view.

"Lock!" Fulmosh yelled again, a sec after a missile streaked forth. Faster than a fighter at full throttle, no mark could dodge a guided projectile at this range-

"Dammit all!" Fulmosh cursed, even as he fired another salvo of lasers at the dispersing marks as they all plummeted out of view. "How can they be that quick?"

"You winged one." I'd seen the spark of fire against a Sith's wing, but it looked no more than a glancing blow. "They're underneath us now. See if they're doubling back or engaging our ships behind."

The view ahead turned ominous. Dozens of alien craft lay between us and Adashan's embattled fleet, and more still swarmed all over the Republic front.

"Kappa Five's down. Nine's critical," Fulmosh snapped out. The thin note of displeasure in his shrill inflection was readily obvious. "Four bogeys are circling around on our tail. I'm balancing the shields."

"Hold steady," I warned, spinning the snub into another dive. The stabilizers groaned in complaint; I pulled the ship out, and straight into-

The burn of red splattered against the viewport. The ship bucked violently, alarms screamed, and I wrenched the steering column straight up. "Status!" I hollered, before jerking the snub starboard.

"Shields down to twenty! Aft stabilizer's pinging low! It's like those bastards knew where we were coming out!"

"Lucky shot is all," I growled as I levelled the snub's trajectory. "And now it's our turn!"

I didn't have to tell him; Fulmosh released another missile the instant a mark swam into view. Even the screech of the discordant alarm didn't dampen my vicious pull of triumph as the Sith turned into a brief flare of orange.
But not before it'd released its own retaliation-

My gut churned as I rolled the ship again; laser fire spat past the viewport harmlessly, missing us by scant metres. Fulmosh was hot on the turbos again, firing wildly as we came out of the barrel, only to face a line formation of three enemy Sith.

Three missiles were already flaring-

Stang! I wrenched hard on the steering again, reminding myself that Kappa Two was still on my tail, and the rest of the squad right behind him.

Yet even with the friendly fire coasting past us as we dropped low, I already knew it was too late-

xXx

Revan Freeflight:

"Second diagnostic's cleared," I confirmed, skimming rapidly through lines of successive nav-data. Victory was riding me, riding us all like a stim high; each confirmation of success punching the visceral satisfaction up another notch. It was fleeting, I knew, when compared to all we still had to face - but I'd take my joy where I could. "No residual issues from the scrambler. All systems are humming."

Carth made a non-committal noise deep in his throat. There was a shadowing of permacrete stubble on his jaw, and his rich chestnut hair was ruffled, as if he'd been throwing his hands through it more than usual. All those little characteristics had become so intensely personal, so poignantly familiar to me, somewhere along the line.

When I granted myself leave to dwell on my own memories, the soul-baring truth was that the events from the Endar Spire onwards made the bulk of it. Carth - his presence, his companionship, his growing affection - was my one constant since I'd woken with a blinding headache in a dingy Tarisian apartment. He was the anchor grounding me through the turmoil of my splintered life.

Carth's attention remained pinned on the darkening azure sky. I glanced down to the nav-map; miniature specks of company flared into existence as we rose, yet another indication of the ship's sensors feeding accurate data through to the nav-computer.

I'd thrown the auto-systems back on, seconds after that proton torpedo had slammed home under Carth's manual guidance. As soon as the first electronic lights blinkered across the dash, he'd been hot on the comm.

The Hawk had strafed the pyramid first in preparation; a gunning run for our turbolasers to gut deep into the foundations. The outer layer of metallic skin had peeled back from the Rakatan relic, exposing the vulnerable bowels on one side as the upper framework crashed inward. I'd wanted at least one more strafing run - we only had one damn chance, one sole torpedo, and so much was weighing on the outcome-

But Carth had flat-out ignored me. He'd had an intent cast to his features, a stilling to his body, as if he'd sensed the moment was upon him and was now reaching out to grasp it with an expert hand.

As if he'd been in the zone. I've heard this before. Somewhere. A feeling, a voice, some blind knowledge from my past. Pilots, gunners, and soldiers- they talk about that moment, when time itself seems to crystallize. When the target gets bigger and bigger, and it's like nothing can make you miss-
The only thing I could compare it to was the Force.

...it works through us all, Jedi and non-Jedi alike.

Karon's words to me, once. Maybe she was right- or maybe it was simply a starpilot's life worth of experience and mental discipline at play.

The Republic hadn't answered our call, not yet. We had no clue if anyone above had even picked up the transmit. They could all be running manual up there, heavily disadvantaged from a lack of nav-sensors and self-correcting targeting modules, not to mention Bastila's battle meditation-

"How long can you keep this up?" Jolee broke through my mental tirade, a muttered voice from behind, stationed in the cockpit's third seat. For once, he sounded entirely neutral.

I sighed. "As long as I have to," I replied grimly.

Cut off from the Force. Yet again, I was employing Dustill's trick that baffled Jedi and Sith alike. Everything felt dull, slow, dreary - safe.

For there was no bond, shielded or otherwise, lurking like a cursed vulnerability in my head. Not until I was ready to reach out for it.

"Dustill has to do the same," I continued. "Even when we land on the Forge. If that place is anything like the frelling pyramid, he has to keep his mind guarded-

"Revan." Carth's voice cut through my impassioned words, words he'd already heard me pitch directly to his son. "You have to- you have to promise me something."

I glanced sideways to scan his profile, handsome face set as it stared fixedly into Lehon's upper atmosphere. The first sparks of distant blaster fire were dawning into view, now; hundreds of kilometres away. Fleets of ships, echoed by the blinking telemetry on the dash. I didn't look down to count them.

"What?" I'd promise him anything if I could- if I could.

"Promise me you'll get out of there alive."

A barbed jolt of emotion seared through me. Carth didn't turn, merely kept his grim attention fixed on the viewport. Glancing wildly over my shoulder, I could see Jolee raising his hands in mock surrender.

"Eh, don't mind me. My old ears don't hear much these days," he muttered, in an obtuse attempt to grant us some privacy. "And what they do my mind scrambles anyway. Just make like I'm not even here."

My face was hot. My heart stuttered. How the frell could I promise something like that? "Carth-

"Promise me."

The low, simmering words sounded like they'd been torn from him, and completely blind-sided any train of thought I might have had. Oh, Carth-

A discordant beep sounded from the nav-console. An incoming transmit, shattering the charged moment, as welcome as a Hutt in a communal sonic.

"You gave HK orders for a transfer of ownership in the event of your death," Carth ground out.
One hand lifted from the steering column to rest gently next to the nav-comm. "I don't know what's going through your head, Revan, but I'm worried once you're up there you'll let your guilt convince you to do something stupid. Promise me you'll get out of there alive."

I swallowed thickly. It was hard to know what truth there was to his words. HK- well, HK's message was wholly unrelated. I didn't plan on sacrificing myself - not unless it was necessary - but I also didn't envisage myself walking away from the Star Forge intact.

Oh, I could believe in victory, yes; find Bastila, shake some damn sense into her, stand off against Malak-

And then, what? Kill my once lover, that colossal fragment from my torn past, and walk blithely away while the Republic destroyed my old superweapon? I couldn't- I simply couldn't see the shape of that future.

Carth wasn't going to let it drop, though. That was evident, in the square of his jaw, the clenched knuckles of his gloved hands. I'd always respected his tenacity, even when turned against me.

The nav-console beeped again, twice, and I just knew Carth was going to sodding well ignore it until I produced the answer he desired.

And I owe him. So much.

I blinked back the stinging moisture that blurred in my vision. "I- I'll promise." My voice hitched. "If you promise something in return."

"Revan-"

"Hear me out," I blurted in a rush. "Carth, you lost your planet, your wife, your son... we may not have had many heart-to-hearts, you and I, even in all this time together... but I'm smart enough to know you stopped living after Telos. If I don't make it out, Carth - and, dammit, you have to acknowledge that's a possibility - then I need you to live. To show Dustil what it's like to live, to move on, to be sodding happy-"

I halted, mid-sentence, suddenly finding it hard to breathe. The silence lay thick between us, and I could feel my fists squeezing tight- if there was one personal desire I yearned for out of this whole mess, it was Carth's happiness-

He didn't say anything. I wondered, wildly, if such a vow was just as difficult for him. His jaw had firmed at the mention of his son, and a life-time's worth of reading people whispered to me that Dustil- Dustil is the angle I can use to secure his compliance.

Even in a moment like this, so fraught with heartfelt sentiment, I felt myself flinch at the machination of my own perception.

I said the words anyway. "You know Dustil lost a girl on Korriban," I whispered. "He used to blame Mekel... but he blames himself, now. Blame, self-guilt - it can be soul destroying." The next sentence felt so hard to force out. "I promise I'll do everything I can to make it out. Promise me you'll do more than just survive if I don't."

Carth turned, finally. His eyes were black with emotion, and slowly- so slowly- his head dipped in a nod. "I promise," he breathed. My heart clenched in my chest. No matter what happened, at least I had that intangible vow to bolster me. Carth's gaze held mine firm, as if we had all the time in the galaxy-
The corner of his mouth quirked. "We'd better- uh, you might want to move out of line of the holo-cam."

His hand was hovering over the receive button. My lips curved in a distant echo of a smile as I shunted myself sideways. A second later, the nav-comm sprang to life, illuminating an iridescent figure in shades of blue and white.

::Carth.:: The greeting shot through the speakers, crisply uttered from the image of an older Human woman. She was capped with a formal military hat, and her shoulders were adorned with admiral pips. Face lined with age, and gaze both sharp and intelligent. She didn't look remotely familiar. ::Captain. We have the Ebon Hawk on our sensors:::

"Admiral," Carth acknowledged. I could hear the warmth in his voice. "You got my message."

::Yes:: There was an arch to the woman's mouth; no more than a slight twitch, really. I had the strange feeling it was the woman's version of a joyful grin. ::The whole fleet did. Both sides, I'd wager. Good job. You will fly straight:::

Carth threw me a wild glance.

::to the Meridus, coming in to:::

Oh, sod it all. Really, I'd known it would come to this.

::land at the alpha docking bay:::

I cleared my throat, loudly, leaning back into the projection field of the 'Hawk's holo-cam. The moment she saw me, the admiral's words halted mid-speech. Like a shutter slamming over a moisture-lock, her expression turned dark. Thin mouth, pinching tight, into a line of something that far superseded censure.

"Admiral," I said in a forcibly neutral tone. Carth stiffened next to me, and I could just imagine the black look of exasperation plastered all over his face.

There was a slight pause as the Republic officer regarded me through dangerously narrowed eyes. ::Jen Sahara:: she bit out at last. The words were more than glacial; they were dripping in black ice. ::I'd label you a wanted criminal, but that is akin to naming a loose rancor a trifling nuisance:::

I had to force back a wholly inappropriate grin. The admiral's distaste aside, I admired her presence of mind. I had no idea who was listening in on her periphery, but she was, at least, circumspect enough not to name me - despite her obvious desire to.

I found myself liking her, and wondered if the contrary emotion was a figment from my past; if this experienced officer was someone I'd once worked with- or against- Hardly the moment to dwell on it, bonehead! The admiral's recriminations, justified as they were, simply had to wait. It was time. It was time to go to Malak.

"We need an escort to the Star Forge," I began. Kept the words cool, neutral - calm. I could feel my chest tightening in self-castigation as I considered what I was about to impart next - but I had to lay the truth bare. I couldn't ignore this threat. The Republic couldn't. "Bastila Shan has vowed to unleash her battle meditation on our forces until I set foot on that place. I'm the only one who can stop her."
The admiral's jaw worked. "Our forces, you have the unmitigated gall to request an aided transport to the Star Forge? Did the Order completely scramble your mind, or do you merely take us for braindead imbeciles?"

Carth leaned forward, nudging me roughly in the side. "Admiral-
"

"Bastila Shan." My bond-sister's name came from elsewhere - from a creaky, high-pitched voice that preceded its owner. The admiral frowned as a short figure hobbled into the holo-image. "Feel her strength already, I can. Did not know, perhaps did not wish to admit, what I was feeling."

It took me a second to place the newcomer. Vandar Tokare. The little green Jedi Master from that seemingly useless holo-transmit, the one Carth'd pulled me in to watch back on Lehon. Vandar had been one of three who'd awaited me on Kashyyyk, who'd made Zhar Lestin fear for the safety of my mind.

"This is Fleet business," the admiral forced out. Her lined face was implacable, but I could hear the irritation burring her voice. "You are on shaky ground already, Vandar. Do not presume to interfere here."

"Forn. Allow us a moment." The Jedi's voice was gentle. "Check on your forces, you should. Confirm the truth of this, for it may yet change everything."

The admiral's head turned slowly back to appraise me, and like a shot of spice, I suddenly knew her name. Forn. Admiral Forn Dodonna. Carth's admiral. The one who'd dispatched Carth to the Endar Spire. A high-ranking member of the brass - the officer in charge of the mighty Meridus.

In a way, I was surprised she still allowed a Jedi Master to set foot on her command deck.

"Don't even think of doing anything," she told me in a dark voice, before swinging her gaze on Carth. "Captain, a squad of fighters are enroute to flank you. They have orders to fire should you deviate from your trajectory. I shall return in a moment."

"Admiral, you must-" Carth cut himself off mid-sentence at the woman's upraised hand. She shot me another glare that dripped with dark suspicion, before moving out of sight.

Carth heaved an exasperated sigh. "You should've stayed out of sight," he muttered quietly under his breath. "Blast it, Revan, have you no sense of self-preservation left?"

I ignored him, leaning forward to eyeball the Jedi Master. His large blue eyes peered back soulfully. "Vandar Tokare," I said softly. There was no sense of familiarity. Stars, there'd been none in that inane holo-message, either, but maybe I'd been hoping it would be different, in a real-time conversation. "How well did we know each other?"

The master's wrinkled head cocked. "A handful of times only, we have met. Know each other, truly, we do not - other than what the Force shows us." His small mouth rounded into a gentle smile. "The Force shows me a Jedi Knight. One that stands firm, no matter the darkness that has been."

I stillled, staring at the bright-eyed alien. I felt a sudden regret, then, for storming out halfway through that holo-comm. I'd not exactly been in the mood to listen to what I considered little more than Jedi-waffle. Stars, I didn't think I ever had been.

But now, I wondered if there might have been some wisdom, something of use, deeper in that message. If I'd only had the patience to see it out, the foresight to hold back my reckless urge to flee. In hindsight, it seemed - pointless, really - for a master like Vandar to fire off a patronizing comm with no ulterior motive. Perhaps his counsel would have been bolstering, if I'd only taken the time to listen. After all, Yudan had said-

My thoughts stilled.

"One of my crewmates told me you're seen as a pillar of the Jedi Order itself." My words were slow, considering. The complete manifest of our freighter was unlikely to be known, unless Carth had spilled the beans in a previous transmit. Somehow, despite having every reason to, I rather thought he hadn't. We were all being granted second chances, here; every single Force-user onboard the Ebon Hawk.

::Many pillars is the Order made of::: the little master returned. He was impossible to read. Much like his old padawan. ::Precious, each one:::

"He also said that of all the sents in the galaxy," I spoke loudly over him, "Your counsel might be worth him seeking out."

He stopped talking. His eyes widened, ever so slightly.

"Assuming, of course, that we survive all of this," I finished wryly.

Vandar was budged to the side as the admiral returned. ::It's confirmed:: Dodonna's burr was laced with distaste. Vandar was still staring at me, but the admiral didn't notice. ::Adashan's reporting overwhelming casualties at the front, and this is after they've regained control of their systems. My ships are closing in, but from the shape of it:::

She bit the words back, as if suddenly realizing exactly who she was talking to. Deep trenches of displeasure bracketed her thin mouth. Dodonna didn't need to complete the sentence, though. It's going to be a rout. Surely, she'd seen the effects of Bastila's battle meditation before.

Vandar's little head had dropped in a silent nod of acknowledgement. Message received. I had no idea if Yudan would curse me or thank me for such interference - the former, if I had to lay creds somewhere - but at least his old master knew of his survival. And, perhaps, had some inkling to his current state of mind.

"We need to stop Bastila." Carth was leaning forward again, allowing the 'Hawk to run on auto-pilot as he stared intently at his superior. Blinking ominously on the nav-chart, I could spot the squad of snubs moving into position around us. "We're the only ones who can. We're the only ones she'll let close to the Star Forge, Admiral - if we can clear the Sith fleet."

"I can get to her," I added. The desire to reach out was there. What if I could stop Bastila now, right here, before she downed even more starfighters that she'd later hate herself for?

But what if Malak sensed me? What if, with the strength of the Forge behind them, they could incapacitate me before I even came close?

There is no other choice. I had to retrace my old steps, to the nexus of my past evil. I'd always known that. My chin lifted, and the next words I spoke rang with the steel of conviction. "I can get to her. I can make her listen. I might even convince her to work with us again."

The admiral's eyes flashed with dislike. ::Ignoring the absurdity of allowing you back on that Star Forge, if Bastila Shan has allied herself with Darth Malak, why in the blazes would she permit you to board?:::

"Because she's not loyal to Malak." I had to hope that was true. My heart said it was, but my head pointed out that loyalty was not always black and white. Particularly in the case of Bastila Shan. My eyes closed in a brief flurry of despair. "Bastila wants me to take Malak out and reclaim my past. She believes in a greater danger- a greater peril- something worse to threaten the galaxy. What spurred me on in the first place."

::Well, that's tempting:: the admiral snapped, in a sarcasm I suspected wholly uncharacteristic to her. ::Your skill at persuasion is hardly what it once was, Jen Sahara. I see little point in continuing this conversation::

But she was still listening. That counted for something. "I want to see the Forge destroyed as much as you, Admiral. I-"

::This threat you mentioned. What exactly:: the words rapped out, each one as hard and cold as ice-crystals. ::-is it?::

The all-consuming question. "I don't know. I don't- remember-" I quelled back a bitter laugh that threatened to spill. "It's actually not important right now. Destroying the Star Forge is. And to do that, you need to get me there first. Let me take care of Bastila. Malak, too. I'll keep him occupied. You focus on blowing that cursed thing up, whether we're on it or not."

Her eyes had narrowed to slits. ::Trust me, Jen Sahara, your survival would not impact my judgment one way or the other::

Had I ever worked with the damn woman? Her burning acrimony should drive me to a like-minded flare of enmity, or even the same old morass of shame- but, instead, I felt a solid core of respect for her. It didn't make sense. I must have worked alongside the admiral in the past. Some part of me- once more dredging up the emotions of a forgotten life.

"I can stop Bastila," I urged again. "Convince her, or force her through our bond. First chance you get, target the damn factory and wipe it from the face of our galaxy."

::Destiny:: Vandar murmured. I wasn't sure if he was beseeching Dodonna as well, but his bright gaze stayed on mine. ::The shape of destiny, this has. Save Bastila, you will, as she once saved you::

"Admiral, I believe in Revan," Carth said. He was an idiot for naming me when the others had so clearly avoided any mention, but my heart warmed at his words regardless. "We all do, everyone onboard with us. Get us to the Forge, and let us play our part. Let's end this war."

"I won't make the same mistake," I uttered in a softer voice. The look on the admiral's face said that hardly mattered, in the grand scheme of things. Perhaps she was right, but the words tumbled out regardless. "Nothing can convince me to walk down my old path."

A dark prescience stirred in my mind. Words like that were so easy to express, to believe in, when facing the true evil from a distance. But my expression remained resolute as I stared the stone-faced admiral down.

::I am little concerned whether it is you or Malak fashioning yourself as a cloaked harbinger of doom:: she muttered. Her lips pursed, then, and I could almost see the infernal debate waging war within her mind. ::I care about winning this war. Halting the destruction of Malak. Returning peace to the galaxy you sundered::

::Believe in Jen Sahara also, do I:: Vandar murmured at her side. He'd turned, finally, to stare up at the older Human. ::A pragmatic leader you are, Forn. The way forward, this is, to break through Bastila's battle meditation. Force or not, you can see this must be our chosen path.::

There was a slight loosening to Dodonna's shoulders, a deepening of the furrows on her brow.

::Tell me you have some plan for getting through to the docks,:: she said, and in that moment, I tasted the hot rush of another victory. Ephemeral, maybe, but things were finally slotting into place. We had a way forward. ::For I cannot conceive of how you mean to land without being shredded into space dust:::

"They'll be on the lookout for the Ebon Hawk. Bastila will do what she can to ensure our survival." Furious at me or not, she hardly had any other choice. "At the last minute, we'll diverge our course to a hidden docking bay."

Carth cleared his throat. "There's three small landing docks, Admiral, that aren't noted on the schematics. We believe at least one of them is open."

::Where?:: she demanded, leaning forward once more.

And as the conversation narrowed into a series of short commands and sharp nods of agreement, the warmth in my soul stayed constant. The Republic would get me to the Star Forge. The Republic I had championed, I had loved- I had betrayed.

Whatever victory I- we- could pull out from this wouldn't erase the past, and nor would the Republic owe me anything bar a public execution, but the thought didn't concern me as much as it should. They were leading me to the Star Forge, to Bastila, to Malak- and that was all that mattered.

xXx

Chapter End Notes

Coming up next: Defences of the Star Forge are rallied, and the Ebon Hawk touches down.
An echelon formation's worth of thanks to kosiah for the beta.
Sharlan Nox:

Thirteen slayers stood before me. Upright, at attention, each clasping a metallic sphere of Fett technology, ready to activate a field as null as their aura. Thirteen slayers, the legacy of Jonn Dan, a Dark Jedi pioneer with the foresight of a Selkath sea-sponge.

I smiled.

"And how many Jedi have you ended in your tenure?" I asked the closest slayer.

The duramesh-armoured assassin stood still as the night. Her reply echoed through an anonymous voder. "Seven, my lord. Three were successfully turned."

"And tell me," I drawled, stepping around the figure, allowing my fingertips to trail lovingly down her scaled shoulder carapace. "Do any still serve?"

Don't play with your food, an echo of my master snapped in my head. Ah, but these ones weren't food. Nulls. Not much more than carrion beasts, truly, and I had stopped snacking on dead meat long ago.

"None still live, my lord." The slayer didn't flinch, even when I sauntered behind her, skimming my fingers across the barely-covered sheen of her neck. Jonn Dan's little tools- different from mine, far less powerful, but I wouldn't deny their effectiveness. He'd trained them well. A pity Jonn hadn't directed the same level of diligence towards his interactions with his peers, otherwise Yudan Rosh may not have split open his entrails to the air.

And wasn't it amusing to hear that Rosh still breathed?

...

The Force choked tight around Lord Malak, a viscous cloud of barely-checked anger. His eyes were slits, spitting yellow poison as they fixated on me.

The common colour of corruption.

When my own gaze had turned a smooth amber, I'd been surprised by a vague stirring of disappointment. Hubris on my part, perhaps, to assume that a creature such as I would possess a hue of something special, something distinct.

Nisotsa Organa's studies on the Dark Side's interactions with organic physiology found little logic behind the transmutation of optical organs: neither genetics nor Force-power explained why most darksiders bore a shade of yellow, barring a scant few.

Not that it mattered. Flesh was simply fuel: either to control or to be consumed by someone greater. Flesh was hardly what made one special.

"I hope my pets are serving you well, my lord," I murmured in a placating tone. Malak looked truly riled. Perhaps all those incoming toy ships were aggravating him.

Sometimes I wondered at just how exhausting it must be, to constantly surge from fiery rage to deathly amusement the way he did.

Anger might fuel the Force for Lord Malak, but we were all different. Some of us drew power in other ways.

"They'll do," he snapped, without offering more. He'd taken my pets into the bosom of the Star Forge, a place where I was forbidden to follow. The heart of the Force in this sector of the galaxy.

It wasn't in my interests to disobey Lord Malak, but I'd tried to enter that chamber. For there was a tantalising scent upon the Force, here, and it originated from the very nexus of this factory.

Something great was housed there. Something magnificent. Something that would be a true joy to taste.

But every time I walked towards the Star Forge's black heart I found myself elsewhere. Esoteric whispers murmured in my mind; I couldn't decipher the words, but the tone was forbidding. Almost as if the Star Forge itself was warning me away.

No matter. I still had time to try again. I knew how to be patient.

"The echo of Revan travels here, Sharlan," Malak said. His eyes narrowed, and now I wondered if it was satisfaction burning the fire in his soul. "In her tin can, the Ebon Hawk."

A showdown between those two would be a sight to behold. From a safe distance, of course. I had knelt to Revan once, as I had knelt to Malak. Sometimes, I fancied myself as nothing more than a prized bantha, passed from master to master. And with each reincarnation, my need and my knowledge grew.

"What are your orders, my lord?"

"Revan is mine." He looked past me, one fist clenching tight. White sparks traced a spider web of static around his gloved hand. He did not seem to notice. "When she walks upon the Forge again I will end her once and for all. You will take out her followers."

I felt my lips curve and my belly tighten. "I believe there are at least two Force-sensitives amongst her crew."

His marked visage snapped back to me. The inked lines of tattoos on his scalp morphed into ripples of corruption along his deathly pale cheeks. "Kill them, Sharlan. I want her to feel their deaths. Take whatever slayers are here and assault that freighter the minute it is docked and Revan departed."

It would be a relief to have something tangible to do. I enjoyed idleness when surrounded by ripe pickings - but the Star Forge was noticeably lacking in desirable fruit. Lord Malak had filled this entire factory with nulls, and the only life-forms onboard that drew me were my now-forbidden pets and the untouchable, delectable Bastila Shan.

Malak often left her alone, these days-
An invisible band snapped tight around my throat, clawing deep without warning. I could feel the fleshy sides of my oesophagus cave under the pressure.

"Do you require a physical reminder to stay away from my Shadow Hand?" Malak murmured, a whispering rumble through his vocabulator. When Lord Malak spoke softly, it paid to take heed. "You can still obey my commands with only one arm, after all."

My wandering thoughts stilled with quick precision. Sometimes, Malak's brutish demeanour obfuscated my assessment of his abilities.

Sloppy. Your extended life-span curses you with insolence to your betters. It was a reprimand I had heard from many, including Lord Malak. If you cannot control your hunger-

The pressure eased, and I bowed my head in submission.

"I do prefer both my arms, my lord. And your Shadow Hand is safe from me for as long as you will it."

There was a pause. I did not raise my head.

"I destroy tools when they outlive their usefulness, Sharlan," Lord Malak rasped. "If you allow your appetite to become a liability, I will ensure it no longer exists."

"My appetite serves you the same as my skills, my lord. Both are yours to command."

"Good." Satisfaction thrummed through his voder. "Keep an eye on the dockmasters' logs for the Ebon Hawk. I shall ensure the battle droids are mobilized. On the off-chance Revan scrapes through my defences, well... the heart of the Star Forge awaits her. My Star Forge."

Lord Malak turned, a looming figure in black-and-grey armour, striding away from me in a sudden move of haste. Unlike his former master, no midnight robe billowed out behind him, just as no ominous mask concealed his face. Malak's presence meant such tools of showmanship were not necessary; his musculature and height made him imposing in his own right.

Lord Revan, on the other hand, had played on her iconic appearance, allowing the mystique and mystery of her anonymous spectre to unsettle her enemies.

Perhaps there was an advantage in both methods of presentation.

Malak had paused at the hatch, which opened beneath a wave of his gloved hand. "At least three, Sharlan."

"Three?"

The Dark Lord of the Sith threw me a speculative glance over his shoulder.

"Three Force-sensitives amongst her crew. I saw three on Lehon." His voice had deepened with what I could only label as feral anticipation. "An old man, a Cathar and Yudan Rosh. Kill the first two, but if you encounter the Twi’lek then I shall allow you to choose. Dead or one of your pets—either would be acceptable."

...

So many Dark Jedi fell victim to delusions of power, but I knew my own limits. Yudan Rosh had been beyond me - nor had I ever had reason to challenge the man. Now... well. Taking down a Dark Jedi of his calibre would be an interesting venture. I would simply need to be smart about it.

One day, sentients with the power of Yudan Rosh- with the power of Revan Freeflight- would easily be mine for the tasting. But that day was not here yet.

With each meal, my strength increased- but it was a transitory peak only, the energy bleeding back into the fabric of the Force. The loss would be frustrating, if the meal itself wasn't so satisfying.

A slight shuffle refocused my attention back to the lines of Force-blind assassins. After Jonn Dan's evisceration, Lord Revan had passed leadership of them to Malak- who may have utilized the slayers effectively, but did little to fill their ranks. Still, I'd seen the slayers in action. These nulls might not have the Force sharpening their senses and augmenting their speed, but they were dangerous in their own right.

The Jedi were wise to fear them.

I eyed over the slayer that had shifted on his feet. "And you?" I drawled, taking a step closer. "How many Jedi do you claim?"

"Twelve," he muttered. His form had stilled, but his visor pointed down. "Only turned one, and she's spacedust now."

A sudden pulse- the tiniest of sparks- something peaked on the Force before vanishing. My head cocked, and the hidden gills on my face flared at the scent. They were Force-blind, all of these sharpened tools of flesh-murder, but for a second there I could've sworn the Force had glowed from the slayer in front of me-

"The Force- it glowed from you, for a second." A wisp of a memory, surprised words from a gentle soul, the first to sense my true potential when I had been nothing but a craven parasite nibbling at the edges of the galaxy. A pity what had happened to her-

The same shuffling noise from earlier snapped me back to the present. The slayer still stood, head bowed, form poised in readiness. He'd moved again- or so I thought, just like I'd wondered if that flare of Force had spiked from him- but there was nothing, now. Just a blank slate awaiting my command.

Slowly, softly, I unfurled a gentle finger of Force into the null's little mind.

Flip over a 5, that makes 21, but the +/- 2 bonus scores a certain win-

Witless mark seemed to be ruminating over basic mathematics. Still, he'd taken down his fair share of Jedi, if his words held true. I felt my lips smile as I reached a hand out to lift the null's armoured chin.

His asinine addition skills ceased, mid-thought.

"You all have your orders," I whispered to him, but my words were for each and every slayer. "If the Ebon Hawk docks here, we expect a small party of them to disembark. One, maybe more. Leave those to the battle droids and our lord. Your task is to kill any who remain behind with the ship."

I leaned forward to kiss the man's mirrored visor. Beneath my fingertips, I wondered if I felt the null shudder. "Complete your objective, or die in the attempt. Lord Malak has promised me any survivors who fail."
The visored head dropped away from my hands in a short, compliant nod.

I stepped back, allowing my smile to rest on all of the sharp little tools. "I am without playthings at present. And a failed slayer would make a satisfying plaything." My smile widened. "For me, at least."

XxX

Jolee Bindo:

"Revan."

"Trio of marks coming in port-side," the darn woman muttered, flat-out ignoring me. "They'll be in Canderous' sights within seconds."

"Tell Ordo and Rosh to improve their blasted aim," Carth snapped. Through the cockpit viewport, a flare of red sputtered against the fin of a friendly. Like a wyyschokk's flying-web glancing off a daubird's wing. Not fatal- but not good. "Dodonna's squad is covering us, but we've lost half of them already."

"Revan."

The thrumming sound of the dorsal turrets re-engaging was noticeable, even at this end of the ship. It wasn't loud enough to drown out conversation, though. Revan pretending not to hear my hail was as unconvincing as it was irritating.

"Another five coming in aft of our lead snubs," Revan rapped out. Her voice had turned flat. "Any more and they'll outnumber us."

Aye, and they have that fandangled battle meditation on their side. The Force was thick out here; humming tendrils of psychic manipulation clawing deep into the enemy ships. I could feel it like a burr chafing against my shoulder blades.

"Lame-brained chit," I grumbled. "You can't save Bastila if she accidentally kills you." In front of me, Revan tensed. "You can't save her if you keep hiding from the Force."

"I know." The words were growled out through gritted teeth. "I'm waiting for the opportune moment."

A prox alarm pinged from the console; our pilot swore as he wrenched the freighter into a sideways dive. The safety harness bit into my torso as Carth stood hard on the thrusters, and the entire framework of the 'Hawk shuddered in response."

"Sithspit," Revan cursed. Something red flashed on the telemetry. "We're hit. Glancing one, but there's minor damage to our shields."

"Now's your opportune moment, young pup!" I snapped. "Talk to your darn bond-sister. Or maybe I'm wrong, and you do have a preordained destiny. One that involves plasma, suffocation, and a new existence as space dross decorating Darth Malak's pretty little fortress!"

"We can't make it to the Forge like this, Revan," Carth added in a low tone. I could see the Star Forge through the viewport, an alien canker with three elongated pincers needling downwards, but between us and the Forge were just too many blighted ships. "You have to risk it, even if Malak senses you."
I wasn't sure what Revan was most wary of: Malak, Bastila, or the sibilant temptation of the Star Forge itself. Aye, her caution was warranted, and shrewd- but not up to the point of near-death.

"Fine." Her assent was swift, followed by the bright beacon of pure Force splaying out from her core. Like a monsoon deluge drenching me in power; all the more obvious when contrasted with her absence a nanosec ago.

I blinked, momentarily startled. Ach, when Revan decides on action, she doesn't dither about it. The Force pulsed, strong enough that I had a fleeting worry on it rousing our injured Cathar from her drug-induced coma.

I stilled my thoughts; allowing my tired eyes to close and my mind to centre. Somewhat akin to ignoring the brilliance of a supernova in high blast. Possible, but intrinsically difficult.

"She hears me." Revan's words were thick and slow. The Force ebbed, contracting back to her. "She- she won't talk to me now. But she's drawing away from us. Focusing on the rest of the battlefield." A broken laugh choked from her. "We'll get through. She'll make sure of it. Bastila wants me on the Forge."

"Meridus, this is the Ebon Hawk." Carth was snapping out a despatch to the comm, but his profile never strayed from the viewport. "We have confirmation that the enemy are pulling their battle meditation away from our squad. Get any nearby fighters to follow in our wake-"

"The enemy." Revan's words were muttered to herself. "You mean Bastila's battle meditation."

"-they'll have a better chance staying within proximity of the Ebon Hawk. Any Sith near us won't have the same advantage."

"She's our enemy out here, lass, whether willing or not," I said quietly. "Better that our pilot keep her involvement as impersonal as possible." If she's to have any hope of forgiveness. Ach, I'd never met the woman, but I could guess at her character. Proud. Impatient. Flawed, just like the rest of us.

::Understood, captain.:: The audio acknowledgement spat from the speaker. The same admiral as from earlier, I'd wager, keeping a close eye on our movements.

Revan didn't answer me, but simply kept her head bowed over the nav-screen. "That's one ship knocked out." Her report was crisp and clinical, cold enough at first that I had no idea which side she referred to. "Make that two. Tide's going to turn, at least in this small corner of the carnage."

"So long as it's enough to get us there." Carth angled the freighter slightly to the right. Near the ship's blunt nose, I could spot four friendlies moving into protective position. "So long as it's enough to make a blasted difference."

"It will be." There was no measure of fragile hope in Revan's words, merely a hard statement of fact. "Jolee. You're staying behind with the 'Hawk."

I blinked. "Eh, what?" Sometimes, conversations with that darn woman felt like a continued barrage of unexpected sideswipes from a kinrath hive.

"I want a Jedi staying behind."

"Labels, young pup," I harrumphed. "You've always done me the courtesy of not lobbing labels in my direction. Don't disappoint me now."
"Force-user then." She was impatient. "Dustil has to keep his signature hidden unless absolutely necessary. None of us trust the constancy of his mental guards--" she cut herself off with an irritated sigh. "Jolee. I need you with the ship. With Carth and Mission."

I'd expected to enter the Forge with her. I'd expected the Wookiee or the Mandalorian, at least, to stay behind and secure our route of escape. Didn't sound like it, from what she was implying.

"I should go with you." Carth's rejoinder was muttered- and torn.

"No."

"Revan, this is hardly the time to debate it." The growl from our pilot told me that it wasn't the first time they'd spun this conversation, even if he, ironically, was the one still contesting it.

"It's not a debate." Her voice steeled with authority. "Your place is with Dustil and the 'Hawk, and you know it."

"It's easier to wrench a stone mite from a ship's hull than change your mind, sometimes, you know that lass?" I grumbled. "Damn parasites. Had a group of them bore through my scoutship once--"

"Revan, I--"

"It has to be this way, Carth." Her voice had gentled. "Look. We're closing in."

As a measure of halting objections, it worked. There were eight friendlies in front of us now, fragile-looking Aurek II's the Republic had started favouring in place of their aging, less-manoeuvrable Aureks. The nearby Sith snubs had deviated away from our path, clustering around a distant Republic destroyer that could only be seen on the sharp starboard pane of the viewport.

Whether the enemy had been gifted new orders, or simply trailed after the lingering tendrils of battle meditation, I didn't know- but we now had a clear run straight to the Star Forge.

"The closest prong is the ventral one," Revan said. Her voice had switched to monotone again. "Halfway down, that black circle- that's the factory bay. We aim straight for it."

"I thought you--"

"Just before we're in range of any turret matrix, we veer upwards. The officer's dock is much higher. Near the apex, just below the lip of the viewing chambers. I'll guide you."

There was something in her voice- or nothing. Maybe that was it. Somehow, I had the feeling she wasn't navigating due to any deep study of the schematics. The jaws of memory are biting deep again.

I coughed loudly in an attempt to distract her. "So. You're taking Ordo and Zaalbar. Why?"

Revan was silent for a minute, her concentration fixed on the encroaching factory. "I'm not sure either of them would stay behind if I told them to."

"Bah. Quit dissembling." I'd been around Revan long enough now to recognize when she was trying to tease me down a fool's trail. "That's not your reason."

I was following her, aye, and I'd hold the fort if she insisted. But it was her reasons that interested me.

There was a time when Revan had no need nor desire to explain herself. But while echoes of that woman might still cast darkness over her from time to time, that wasn't who she was anymore.

Sometimes, it didn't hurt to remind her of that.

A quiet sigh slipped from her lips; a soft sound of concession. "Zaalbar... his life-debt shackles him. His part in Bastila's capture weighs on his soul, even though there was nothing he-" she paused, one finger flipping the console's mini nav-map around as something caught her eye. A generation or two ago, we made do with a simple 3d holo-pic from the dash, not some fancy glittering doodad that one could spin around like a top. Revan hummed, evidently satisfied with what she saw, and continued. "Zaalbar has a right to address what he sees as his debts. And... did you know that Juhani and I were captured by a mad Sith on Korriban?"

Once more, she veered the conversation on an incomprehensible tangent. I shrugged. "Eh, can't say I'm surprised. Korriban has mad Sith the way Kashyyyk has trees. Got a point to that sentence?"

"Yeah. We were too reliant on the Force. Totally missed a gas trap." It sounded like an interesting yarn. But, much as I liked to hear stories - almost as much as I liked to tell 'em - we were busy pootling along in enemy airspace heading to an enemy fortress. This wasn't really the time to be waffling. If even I realized that, then surely Revan did-

"We underestimate those without Force ability." Her voice had lulled to a whisper. "All of us. Jedi, Sith, anyone who wields the Force. The more powerful we become, the more we see Force-blind sent as checkers on a game board. Figures on a data-sheet. And we forget... we forget that anyone can be killed by a single blaster shot."

Revan cleared her throat suddenly, profile slanting to face the pilot. "And, sometimes, a blaster shot is all that's required."

"We're nearing," Carth said. Whatever Revan was referring to, he had no interest in recognizing it. "The lead snubs will be in range of any automated defense matrix within minutes. Keep your eyes ahead, Revan. Tell me when it's time to deviate course."

The view out the cockpit was completely dwarfed by the Rakatan factory, now. All shiny metal and sleek curvature, with a gaping maw of black that belched out a trio of strikefighters as we drew close.

The Force thrummed around me. Hidden within its beguiling power, lurked a slippery, suggestive coil that I had waded through on Lehon.

-glimpses of the truth can be found here-

Laser spat between our friendlies and the new marks, Revan whispered "now", and the 'Hawk lurched upwards to our destination.

xXx

Rulan Prolik:

"That's the ventral wing released," Kampton muttered, bending over his console. "You done yours yet, Carly?"

I hummed in response. My fingers tapped the keys in idle pretence, for my attention was absorbed in the data-feed scrawling down the inset of my visor.

Full-body titaplate armour. Inlaid cortosis weave to block lightsabers, and resistant to any form of ionization. These battle-droids were custom-built to face down Force-users. They had gone through many design iterations, but the ionization resistance was new. There'll be a weak spot somewhere, if I can just figure out how to best shear through that plate.

"Carly? You heard General Daelidar's order. You'd better release the droids-

Thermal motivator's in the torso. Three inches down from the neck segment. If one can get through the armour, a hit straight there would-

"Do you want me to show you how?"

I glanced up, to see Kampton's shiny green face staring down at me in solicitude. One mention of my nervousness, and the poor sap had been all over me like nerf-pox.

My smile would be visible beneath the edge of the visor. I let it blossom. "Thank you, Corporal. I-I'm not really sure how to work this system."

He flushed a dark green as he leaned over me. "You can call me Kampton, y'know. While- while there's no one else around."

"Thank you," I murmured again, ducking my head like a simpleton. My painted hands retracted from the console, allowing Kampton to accomplish his basic data-entry. Magenta nail varnish looked ridiculous on the skeletal digits of a Rodian, but the luckless sentient I was emulating had primped herself with all manner of mating inducements. Powdered snout, waxed antennae, plucked eyelids and bright nails.

I had no idea if it was bumbling Kampton she'd had her eye on, but the inept corporal certainly seemed receptive.

"There," he said with satisfaction, laying one limb possessively on my shoulder. "It's okay, Carly. I'm sure this is simply a precaution. You don't- you don't have to suit up, y'know."

He was staring at my visor, before his gaze dropped to the duramesh-and-leather armour wrapped around my slender form. Not a piece from dear Carly's ensemble, it was true, and I'd had to make some modifications to the enclosures before it suitably fit this body.

Armour like this was beyond difficult to procure. Even allowing for safe harvesting of the source material - and terentatek hide was hardly simple to obtain - the manufacturing process failed more often than succeeded. I still maintained Spymaster Gaalin had been an imbecile to sell a suit of it to that bounty freelancer, even if Nord had shelled out a king's ransom.

"There's a chance of an invasion, or we wouldn't be ordered to ready the droids," I whispered, allowing my lips to tremble. "Will we be safe here?"

"Course." Kampton's antennae flared in my direction. I supposed it must be some sort of masculine display for his species. "There's few enough of us sents here - so long as we stick to the lower levels, the droids'll leave us alone. Don't you worry about any Republic slugs actually boarding, Carly. They can't get through our star fleet."

But I did, little bug. True, finding a way onto the Star Forge had been a far greater challenge than slicing the factory's location from the Ebon Hawk's transmission to the Republic. But, well. No one could impersonate other sentients that way I could.

I allowed myself to lean against him, adroitly switching data-feeds as I did so. I'd intercepted enough transmits to inform me that the intriguing sector-wide scrambler had been destroyed, but Kampton was right, regardless. The Republic forces were taking a hammering.

Still, the assault might be enough cover for the Ebon Hawk to slip through. I had trackers on the dockmasters logs linked to my data-feed, and would be aware the instant that smuggling freighter dared broach one of the factory docks. It would be tempting to meet the fragment of Revan Freeflight there-

Eridius' words whispered through my mind. It is in our interests to see Darth Malak overturned, but only if we can do so unnoticed. There was too much surveillance in the factory docks, even for one such as I. The GenoHaradan worked best from the shadows.

We pull strings in the dark. We aim for stability, but only from the depths of secrecy.

The GenoHaradan might desire to pin Revan down and see what answers we could shake from her damaged mind- but only if the risk was worth it. And the neural scans we stole from the Jedi databanks are disheartening: the damage to her mind is, indeed, severe. Although our slicer's hack was incomplete; I had little data on Revan's cerebral cortex, and the reconstructed graphics of her hippocampus looked like a corrupted feed.

The scientist in me itched to strap that notorious woman down and get a half dozen medi-droids to cut open her mangled mind.

"We should head back to the commons," Kampton said. "All remaining personnel have been directed to the sub-levels. We're the only techs left on the cardinal floor."

Ah, but I am headed up, not down.

I threw the hapless Rodian a coquettish smile. "Have you- have you sent our job acknowledgment through?"

"Yeah." ◆ His fingers tentatively pressed against my hide-covered shoulder. "Defense diagnostics double-checked. Surveillance re-routed to the battle droids. And them released, of course. Our sector is cleared for droid-only control, Carly."

"So you mean-" I let my voice turn coy, "No one will expect us for awhile?"

The hitch in his breathing was pathetically obvious. Poor insect had probably never got into anyone's pants before. "I-" He licked his lips. "No. But- surveillance-"

I scanned the room quickly. There, close to the main server rack, an innocuous utility hatch that was likely never used by anything but mini clean-bots as they benignly whirred and buffed every inch of factory floor.

"Bet there's no surveillance in the clean-bot closet," I breathed, wrinkling my snout at him. The powder had a disgusting florid scent. "And those closets are roomier than you would think."

Kampton's thin lips twitched as his blood travelled south. He grabbed my hand and dragged me as I giggled stupidly alongside him, tripping past the empty bucket-seats and the morass of sentient debris on the ground. Looked like the clean-bots had a fairly shoddy routine, at least in this section of the Star Forge.

The grilled hatch to the utility locker yawned ajar under Kampton's bony hand. I saw a brief flash of graffiti defacing the door, lower down at knee level, in what oddly looked like scrawled Massassi script of all things- but then the closet opened fully and Kampton tugged me inside.
His hand moved hesitantly to the back of my helm as the hatch groaned shut and immersed us in relative darkness. My limb moved swiftly to the shiv-blade in my armour's hidden side-sheath.

That was the good thing about clean-bot closets: even if someone had installed holo-cams, no one would bother looking up the footage without reason. A dead tech's body could stay there, unnoticed, for days.

xXx

Revan Freeflight:

Canderous, HK, and Yudan were already out of the freighter by the time I cleared the loading ramp.

"Not much of a dock," Canderous grumbled. His helm swivelled in tandem with his repeating blaster, sweeping over the deserted consoles and empty corners. "And no defense matrix to stop an enemy infiltrating. Kriffing airlock was wide open. Suppose the Sith thought leaving this dock off the schematics was enough. Blithering di'kuts."

"Statement: Infrared sensors are picking up a disappointing lack of sentient life." HK had already stalked deep into the hangar, pausing only to stare disconsolately into a trio of empty snubs parked ahead of us. "Reminiscence: In your heyday, master, you at least left this area armed with a whimpering fleshbag. Or twelve."

"I don't think the airlock's normally left open, Canderous," I said absently, scanning the room myself. The three abandoned Aurek-class vessels HK was nosing into were bordered by discarded refuelling gigs, almost as if some unwitting tech had considered jumping in one himself before abandoning the idea. It was odd to find ex-Republic craft here, rather than the alien strikefighters we'd encountered so far. "Bastila ensured the interior bay doors would open for us."

"Pity she didn't leave them open," Carth commented, hot on my heels. "Two snubs came in with us before the airlock closed, but the rest of Dodonna's squad are left outside."

I turned, to see a grimace on Carth's face as Zaalbar edged past, bowcaster in hand. Carth's gaze was bleak.

The Republic's main thrust was to obliterate the Forge from the outside, but Dodonna had been gunning for the entirety of her "protection" squad to dock with us. Aid us, maybe.

Maybe.

Part of me wondered if they had an ulterior agenda. Backup orders of assassination, should events turn awry. Myself, Bastila- maybe we'd both be targets. Sun and stars, it's likely what I'd have done, in Dodonna's boots. Carth might not imagine such a thought, but the admiral struck me as shrewd enough to consider it.

Worst part was, I wouldn't blame her if she had.

"Get Teethree to see if he can hack into the Forge from the cockpit. Or, failing that, from one of the consoles out here," I commanded, shaking the irrelevant notion from my stream of thought. Orders or not, these soldiers would be nothing more than starpilots, considering they'd been hot in the skies before we'd even left Lehon. They weren't a threat to me, not at this point in time. "See if he can find a way to override the bay doors."

"Teethree and Mission are already on it. I'm going to talk to the pilots." Carth jumped the final metre from the loading ramp, before striding off to the rear of the ‘Hawk where the two Republic snubs perched, repulsors whining softly in cool-down mode. I could hear the clatter of booted feet from around the hull of the freighter, and hoped the unknown grunts would be amenable enough to follow Carth's leadership.

We didn't have time to knock any heads together, as Canderous would say.

The dock itself was smallish, its total capacity a dozen snubs- give or take a few. With the three Aureks ahead of us, the duo of Republic strikefighters behind, and the ‘Hawk itself taking the space of at least another four, this place was almost crowded.

It made the lack of both organic and artificial company feel a bit discordant in contrast.

A glimmer of light drew my attention from beneath the nearest Aurek snub. Broken shards of transparisteel, glinting a rainbow sheen of dross on the ground.

My eyes narrowed. The cockpit of the snub in question was smashed. Like someone had forced it down so hard it smattered the space-strengthened glass - even though that seemed patently ridiculous considering the military-class hydraulics of the cockpit mechanism-

Malak. Bastila. My breath hitched. Suddenly, I was seeing through her eyes again, panic burning wildfire in her throat, the interior bay doors opening as we scrabbled desperately up the side of the ship-

This is where Bastila almost escaped. Something clutched at my heart. It'd felt like we'd been so close to freedom, that day. Maybe we had.

Or maybe Malak had simply been playing her all along.

It didn't matter. That snub means she's nearby. She's close. She wouldn't have sent me to this dock if she wasn't.

-she is here. you are here. together, anything you desire can be made truth-

"Place is deserted," Canderous called out, chasing the opaque voice from my mind. "No turrets, only one exit. Should be easy enough to defend. I'll knock out the surveillance."

It was tempting to tell him not to bother. The holo-cams sat on the ceiling sidings like fat round grenades, prime for the plucking. A short burst of ionization and the whole lot would fry-

-you can save everyone. if you just reach out-

Hold tight on the Force. Keep it drawn in. Don't be a frelling bonehead.

"Do it," I said shortly.

HK whirred in acknowledgment, taking the order as his own with a certain glee apparent in the crimson flash of his eyes and the sharp rise of his rifle. Canderous simply grunted in acknowledgment before striding deeper into the dock.

Yudan, standing still mere metres away, shot me an unreadable look. I wondered if he'd predicted my errant desire to short out the cams. Likely. Bastard knows my instincts better than I do, at times.

"Lass." Jolee's voice from behind had me turning. The first shot from Canderous ended in a fizzle, echoing throughout the hangar. "You sure about this?"
I knew what he was asking. The old man still wanted to go with me. I could see it in the set of his grizzled jaw. But I wanted- needed- a Force-user behind with the others, with the 'Hawk. With

I nodded at him firmly. And at the very top of the ramp, deep in the shadow of the open hatch, Mission's young face peeped out to stare curiously around the hangar.

"S'not very big, is it?"

"It's not meant to be." What had HK said? Something about these docks being for the private use of high-ranking meatbags? I grimaced, and supposed I could qualify as that, even now. "Thought you were in the cockpit?"

The grin on her face was bright. As always, showing eternal optimism and bravery in the face of everything the galaxy hurled at her. Sometimes, I had no idea how a chivhole like Taris could've produced Mission Vao.

"I'm allowed to say goodbye at least, right?"

"So say goodbye." It was a mutter from Dustil as he sidled past her, before leaping off the ramp and slouching against the 'Hawk's hull. His null aura was as obvious to me these days as Jolee's Force signature. Dustil had years of experience under his belt, holding the Force at bay. I simply had to have faith he'd keep it up.

Dustil shot a frown back at Mission. "You should get back to the cockpit. It's dangerous out here.
You should go where it's-"

I winced. Somewhere, behind me, was the ping of HK's blaster. Dustil, don't say it-

"-safe."

"Hey, ronto-breath!" Mission flared, before side-stepping to aim a kick at his shoulder that he narrowly avoided. "I can take care of myself! I can't believe you-"

But Dustil was grinning. And despite everything - the danger, the risk, the frelling galaxy at stake - seeing Dustil Onasi learn to tease a friend choked a startled laugh of joy from me.

Mission must've realized, too, because she stopped squawking and settled for poking her tongue out at him.

"(Mission)," Zaalbar rumbled gently. His bowcaster was still held aloft, but he'd turned back to face the others. "(Go inside now. We need you to work with the astromech)."

Mission's gaze slipped back to mine. "Jen-"

My smile was tight. Tell her to get back to the cockpit. Tell her this isn't the time for goodbyes, for as every warrior knows, goodbyes do nothing but bring bad luck.

Ah, sod it.

I stalked fiercely back up the loading ramp and flung my arms around the Tarisian street kid. "Hold the fort and get the bay doors open," I whispered. "I'll go find the princess, kill the bad guy, and then we can all haul jets back to a known world. In less than a standard week, we'll be in a cantina somewhere and I'll introduce you to Corellian whiskey."
Her giggle against my chest was more of a snort. "Too late, Jen. Canderous has already done that. An' that stuff is foul."

I pulled back to stare down fondly at the girl who reminded me of a childhood I barely recalled. Leaning forward, I kissed her gently on the forehead.

"I'll see you soon, Mission," I whispered.

Zaalbar lurched past as I left. His footfalls thumped softly up the ramp. I heard him rumble an endearment to Mission, and then I deliberately blocked the rest of his Shyriiwook out.

I didn't need to hear their farewells. I hadn't teared up yet, but listening in to those two parting might be the thing that tipped me over.

He'll get out. We'll all get out, dammit.

"Uh, Jen."

The name had me stiffening. No matter that it wasn't mine; I imagined that in some small way Jen Sahara would always have a hold on me. It was strange to hear it from Carth- even though the four troops in his shadow immediately explained why.

Two pilots, two gunners, I assessed quickly. They all wore standard Republic flight suits - better protection than nothing, sure, but I still had an irritable desire to rush into the 'Hawk and throw whatever duramesh suits I could find at them.

Would've been a good idea, too, if Carth hadn't offloaded everything we collectively owned just to keep that alcoholic Rodian back on Yavin quiet.

"This is Corporal Tensey. Ensigns Joss, Lilani, and Tobards."

They all nodded cordially. I supposed Carth must have informed them I was in command, as one even made it halfway through a salute before dropping his hand awkwardly.

Good thing they're all lower ranks. I grimaced. No conflict of hierarchy here.

"Protection of the Ebon Hawk is priority," I stated, eyeballing the assembled troops. They all grasped blasters and wore grim expressions beneath grimy orange blast helms. I didn't want them anywhere near me when I left the dock, but an extra four guns for the 'Hawk's defense was nothing but a good thing. "Defend under the assumption you'll be leaving with us in our ship. Our resident slicer inside is working on the bay doors, while my team head in to extract our target."

"Statement: Objective complete, master." At some stage, Canderous and HK's blaster volley had died out. I was vaguely aware of both of them striding closer behind me. "Reflection: Performing as a mechanism to destroy our enemy's hardware was mildly amusing. Consider my weapon modules adequately warmed up. Plea: Let us depart this area and find something that offers at least a modicum of challenge to eviscerate?"

The flight helms of the Republic grunts swivelled sharply in HK's direction. One poor sap even took a wary step back.

"Er... what type of robot is that?" one of the pilots muttered stiffly.

HK's angular head twitched in her direction, and one mechanical limb waved in a dismissive flourish. "Statement: Just a simple droid here, ma'am. Nothing to see. Move along."
My lips twitched as I glanced back to Carth. He wore the same stony look of exasperation that HK always evoked in him. He must have felt my gaze, for he turned back just in time to see my smirk before it vanished.

"Airlock," Carth muttered, but for once the threat almost sounded fond. His expression slipped, then, before turning serious. "You should go, beautiful." His words were low, almost whispered. "It's time."

It was.

I allowed myself one last look over the Ebon Hawk. Mission had disappeared back inside, but Jolee stood ready near the freighter's entrance, scant metres from Dustil who was gripping his Korriban-grown lightsaber tight in one hand. The four soldiers all had their attention on Carth, awaiting his orders.

It was the best party I could leave behind to defend the 'Hawk, and Carth the best leader. I had to carry on: with a Wookiee, a Mandalorian, an assassination robot, and a Dark Jedi as my allies.

With a muffled oath, Carth strode forward, grabbed me around the waist and kissed me soundly. His kiss was more a hard press of need than anything else- desperation- hope- a fierce display of faith that we'd both get out of here, because we simply had to-

Then his lips gentled. Suddenly, softly, moving tenderly against mine, as I was kept safe in the cocoon of his arms. I could almost believe we were back in the 'Hawk's pilot quarters-

He pulled back, just as abruptly. "Go," he choked out.

In that very moment, it seemed like all the iterations of Carth I had come to know overlaid one another. The suspicious soldier on Taris, the grudging one on Manaan, the man who had learned to trust me on Korriban and love me on Kashyyyk-

"Come on, Flyboy," I murmured, as I felt an impish grin widen my mouth. "No tears. Don't I always come back from certain death?"

His gaze warmed, but he said nothing, as I turned, and walked into the Star Forge proper.

xXx

Vrook Lamar:

It had been hours. Hours of evasion: masquerading as a lost mechanic, chanceing an occasional mind-trick, slipping into empty rooms when my senses warned me of company nearby. All the while, holding tight onto a fragile faith that my slight use of the Force would go unnoticed.

But compulsion wasn't a trick worth anything, now. Not on the upper levels. This part of the Star Forge was run entirely by droids. Some of them were benign-

"Bleep! Dur-whoop beep!" a clean-bot squawked, as a tiny infrared scanner protracted from its carapace, scanning the name tag visible on my stolen coveralls. The clean-bot whined in complaint before scurrying down the corridor.

-some were infinitely more dangerous.

I'd kept to the shadows, concealed in the corners, shrouded my signature from the psychic probe of the almost-sentient Star Forge- but I couldn't hide from biothermal scanners. And those battle droids I'd seen eject from internal blast doors only minutes ago were bound to have biothermals.

All a clean-bot could do was log my unauthorised presence somewhere in the databanks of this rotten Dark Side relic. Somehow, I doubted the armoured droids now clanking a few shiny floors below would treat me with the same ambivalence.

It was fortunate I'd been some levels higher, on an open-air railing that crossed over the heads of the mechs as they spat out and unfurled, snapping disruptor rifles to their serrated forearms. Fortunate that I'd been quick enough to sprint through the next hatch before one of them could get a read on me.

But they were nearby. And if Darth Malak had kicked a load of battle droids into open sentry, then he was concerned about infiltration. I didn't think he was aware of me-

The Fleet will be here by now. They'll be attacking. Had someone managed to actually board this forsaken place? If so, they'd be headed straight for a reactor, or some other sabotage vector meant to obliterate the Forge from within.

Republic resources wouldn't be wasted on a fallen Jedi who'd been failed by everyone.

A fallen Jedi who - I could damn well sense it, much as it blackened my heart - was now reaching out to smite those she had once named ally.

>-you can reach her. you can help her-

Every now and then, my mental guards would drop and that infernal voice would susurrate through my mind, a creaking promise of whatever I desired most.

>-the power is here to save her-

I wasn't an idiot. I wasn't about to trust whispers from the dark. But I had to keep my walls up lest Darth Malak became aware of my presence.

I had to reach Bastila on the quiet.

The corridors here were a muted silver, almost perfectly circular in shape, marred only by the occasional scratch of graffiti that the clean-bots likely couldn't buff out. There had been little sentient life on the lower levels, but here- nothing but these damn droids.

Malak's released them to guard Bastila.

No doubt he saw her as the most prized jewel in his stolen treasury.

But I could be wrong about the Fleet. Bastila's unleashed her gift on them- on us. Could be they've sent a special ops taskforce to take her out.

It was a foreboding thought, but truth was- I had no idea. None. For all I knew, it could be blasted Revan Freeflight boarding that had sent Darth Malak into a tizz.

Regardless, the battle mechs were spanning out here. Which meant I was in the right place. The intelligence I'd scored was correct.

I grimaced down at the name tag on my lapel. Alan Ber'keek was stunned and trussed up in a supply closet. A voice in my head had murmured that it would be safer- cleaner- to kill him.
Jedi do not kill.

He might escape; aye, I knew that. Or someone might stumble on the hapless mechanic, learn of an intruder on the Forge-

I had a choice. Jedi do not kill unless they have no choice.

What choice had it been, really? A rogue Sith worker, if found, might bring about my capture—throw away my shot at saving Bastila.

There is always a choice.

In the end, I simply couldn't bring myself to lay a death blow on a comatose man. Whether it was Jedi mercy or simply a way of proving to myself that the damned Dark Side wouldn't control me—bah. I didn't know.

I'd made the choice, no point lamenting the stupidity of it now.

Up ahead, the corridor flared into a junction.

The internal diagrammatic I'd studied with Alan's comp login told me that left spiralled downwards to crew quarters, and eventually a hidden officer's dock - one not detailed on any schematic the Republic brass had eyeballed. But right, ah- that wound higher to the upper viewing decks. Chambers that were restricted to system droids and the master of the Star Forge.

Presumably, also, holding the woman he labelled his new apprentice.

I drew right, and the 'saber on my waist hummed.

No Force, though. I didn't dare. Stayed small as a gnit-fly, an old fool that was no threat, slipping between the radars of Dark Jedi and the Dark Side alike. But the kaiburr housed in my lightsaber's casing buzzed like I was waving it about in battle.

Even my damn weapon can hear the blasted Star Forge.

There was a dark, slippery taint in all of my senses - like a sheen of oil both polluting and pervading through an ocean.

To think that my padawan had been helpless and imprisoned in such a place for so long...

The burn of attachment cinched tight around my heart. Attachment was a danger; aye, I'd always known that, and fiercely believed in the truth of it. But without attachment, what was left but isolation?

...

Place hasn't changed.

That was the first thing I'd said, in a voice abrupt enough to discourage Dorak from indulging in any more superfluous chitchat.

Dantooine hadn't changed. I'd left the planet an inexperienced padawan decades ago; heart a little bruised, maybe, but otherwise a typical young Jedi in need of shaping and moulding beyond Dantooine expertise at the time.

I didn't much enjoy my time on Coruscant. Hadn't expected to, and wasn't that just the way of it-cast a shadow on your own future, and most of the time you'll draw it true.

Aye, knowing the wisdom didn’t necessarily mean one was smart enough to prescribe to it. People were idiots. Myself just the same as any other.

I'd never liked Coruscant. I could've ignored the politics, the annoying training partners, and the ceaseless millions of sents all scheming just outside the Temple's walls.

But no one could ignore Exar Kun.

Dammit, I'd known the bastard, and still never imagined his depth of depravity. The reach of his influence had been far, farther than any Jedi could've foreseen.

Knights turned. Masters fell. Padawans broke the code- and, aye, no matter how I grieved over Nayama's fall to Kun's ranks, I couldn't help but blame it partly on her unsanctioned marriage to Jolee Bindo.

She was turned away by us, though. Her sister wasn't. Her sister never fell, despite a marriage.

I wrenched the thoughts in. They were always bitter, and the what-ifs even more so.

"...good to have you home," Dorak said mildly. He'd always been an affable sort, even when we were both padawans. Reminded me a bit of Zhar, back on Coruscant - and one day Zhar would come back home, too; him and Karon both. I'd wager on it, if I'd been a betting man. "We have too many apprentices without a master."

I grunted in non-committal response. "Place really hasn't changed then."

I didn't want an apprentice, but I had little choice in the matter.

We must train the new generation. Heavy words laid on me, what seemed like a minute after I'd ascended to masterhood. All of us have a responsibility to rebuild the Order from the ashes of Exar Kun's corruption.

Ach, I couldn't deny that. At least I'd used the High Council's desire as a way to wrangle myself back home.

"Walk with me to the younglings," Dorak suggested. "Allow me to acquaint them to you. They're all in the courtyard beyond, listening to Vandar."

Some things didn't change. It was an echo of my earlier ruminations. Men like Exar Kun would rise and fall, but the renni-grass on Dantooine would forever grow wild, and Vandar would forever lead the Enclave.

There was a certain peace in that thought. I might not admit it to Dorak, but I was glad to be home.

"I'm hardly going to choose an apprentice on my first day back," I groused.

As we traipsed onwards, the courtyard opened into view. There were a dozen or so younglings, ranging from little more than toddlers to a bright-eyed tweener, all sitting cross-legged in a semi-circle facing Vandar and an older Twi'lek padawan who stood in his shadow.

A couple of kids were making lewd faces at each other - and I had a sudden, bittersweet recollection of the Qel-Droma twins. I'd never liked the brats, but that didn't mean I hadn't mourned their fate. Both of them.
The rest of the younglings had their keen eyes and expressive faces fixed wonderingly on the short green master.

Apart from one girl.

She was sitting slightly apart from the rest. Young, maybe six or seven, dark hair knotted into decorative braids that looked more at home on a Core noble than a kid learning in the Dantooine wilds. Her expression was blank. But her gaze was aimed intently on Vandar just the same.

Dorak chuckled. "No one expects you to select your apprentice immediately, Vrook. We all appreciate such a responsibility should not be rushed."

Vandar rasped something that made the kids giggle. All but the girl. Her head cocked, as if she were digesting every word.

"Who's that?" I asked, abruptly pointing to her.

"Bastila Shan," Dorak offered. "Middling strength for her age, although it's always hard to predict how that'll come out after puberty. The girl's shy. The other younglings see her as snobby and standoffish, but honestly, I think she just doesn't know how to be a child."

I was aware of him shrugging in my periphery, the corners of his mouth twisting in a wry grimace - but I kept my gaze on the girl.

"She was home-schooled by her mother, a Talravin noble who lost her fortune. The woman never bothered to socialize her daughter. My observation is the girl's hampered by a fair wallop of social awkwardness - but she's young. Young enough to change, to adjust."

Shy. Socially awkward. Seen by others as standoffish.

I'd be a liar if I couldn't see myself in that description. My acerbic manner was my own damn fault, I knew - but, well. Knowing the wisdom didn't necessarily mean one was smart enough to prescribe to it.

Dorak was looking at me with a gleam in his eye. "Not going to choose one on your first day, huh, Vrook?"

I threw him my fiercest scowl. "Thought you were going to introduce me, Dorak." I flourished a hand towards the students, and demanded, "Well?"

Dorak chuckled. "You say Dantooine hasn't changed. Neither have you, my old friend. Neither have you."

... I'd immediately been drawn to Bastila because of her isolation. Because I felt a certain kinship with a young girl-child.

In all likelihood, that probably made me the worst damn master for her- for if I shared the same weaknesses, how could I ever help her overcome them?

The corridor ended up ahead, drawing into a mammoth oblique hatch inlaid with foreign sigils I didn't recognize. One of the upper viewing chambers, if I recalled correctly from the schematic.

I unfurled a tiny finger of Force-
-she is here. draw on the power, make her listen-

-and snapped it hard back to me.

My lips tightened. One hand clenched my 'saber, and the other threw a sudden burst of Force directly into the entry sensor.

The half-moon doors opened. I had the briefest image of a kneeling robed figure alone in the centre of a cavernous room, as I took a cautious step forward-

A movement along the edges of my vision had me ducking sideways, lightsaber flaring high, reflecting the first laser bolt back into the midriff of an armoured guard-

Everything dulled. Like a cessation of light, the entire room was immediately muted in coagulation.

Another bolt streamed at me- so fast- and my limbs were sluggish in lifting the 'saber to block-

The Force. It's- it's- gone-!

A burn of agony punched into the side of my chest. I felt it, a nanosec before the scent of charred cloth hit my nostrils, and then the pain hit higher-

"Halt!" a woman's voice ordered. Stone-cold, and ringing with command.

The flare of green wavered unsteadily in my hand. My other clutched desperately at my mangled chest. Pain was an iron band squeezing hard against my ribs, but I kept my eye on the black-armoured guard who held a mini-pistol aimed directly at my heart.

Behind me, I thought, was another.

And the Force- it had completely vanished! I reached out desperately, frantically- at this stage I'd welcome the cursed murmurings of the Star Forge itself, but- nothing!

"Vrook."

My head turned to face her. My fingers seared with the heat of scorched flesh and warm blood. I could feel the shaking of shock set in on old limbs disconnected from any aid of the Force.

"My padawan," I managed through dry lips, as my gaze roved over her. She was sopale. And thin. And her eyes blazed-

My breath hitched, and the stones in my soul grew heavy.

"I am not yours any longer, old man," she hissed, and I saw the flare of emotion lighten the unnatural yellow taint in her eyes.

The taint I had known would be there.

"Perhaps you have gone through too much to be mine any longer," I rasped. "But you are not Malak's. You are too strong for that. *I know you are."

Something snapped in her countenance. "You should not be here." Her voice was cold, and damned me for my presence. But her tawny eyes- there was distress, there. I could see it. I simply had to find a way to reach her.
"I used to say that to you every Baker's Day," I whispered. "Do you remember?"

"You should not be here, Bastila," I said. My heart was burdened each day of freedom I found her in Dorak's library - because it reminded me of myself. Aye, other than a singular year in my own youth, I'd done exactly the same.

Hidden away amongst the dusty archives, in the pretence that learning was my only desire.

Her head lifted, and a small smile of welcome flittered nervously on her young face. Almost a teen, now - a time I'd been expecting to lecture her on the dangers of attachment, of emotion, of allowing reckless idiocy to reign over logic.

But not my Bastila.

"I am studying the building blocks of deep meditation, Master." Bastila indicated to the crystalline polyhedron that sat, deactivated, on the beech wood table next to the plasticeel datasheets she had been perusing. "Master Galdea has directed me toward a holocron that might aid in my understanding."

"Child." I could hear the grump in my voice. I certainly didn't besmirch my padawan from honing her burgeoning knowledge, but Baker's Day was a traditional rest day on Dantooine, a break from study or work - be one a Jedi or a common-folk tilling the fields. "You should be outside. Mingling." I cleared my throat. "With the other padawans. Having - having fun."

Forming attachments.

Aye, singular attachment was dangerous, but a complete lack could be just as perilous. The Force interconnected all life, and that was not something Bastila could experience while hiding away with her nose in a book.

Bastila blinked, before her gaze dropped from mine. "Master, I train with them every day. If Baker's Day is meant to be a pursuit of pleasure, then can I not utilize it in the way I see fit?" She loosed a tinny, awkward laugh. "This is what I wish to do, Master. I am learning so much -"

I harrumphed, cutting off her stilted tirade. Ach, and how could I berate my padawan for living a childhood so similar to mine?

Her young face tilted up, but there was an edge of guardedness in her countenance. It'd never really left, not since I'd first laid eyes on her.

"One more hour, Bastila," I told her severely. "I shall return and expect this room to be empty. A Jedi should embrace experience beyond just the academic. Galdea's teachings can wait."

She bowed her head in compliance. "Yes, master."

Most days I hadn't had the heart to cut short her solitude. And as the years passed, Bastila had slowly escaped her self-imposed shell, slowly allowed others to reach her -

Aye, and I'd been such a grateful idiot to finally see another befriend her that I'd completely failed to comprehend the inequity of their friendship, the fractures of corruption that must have been prevalent in Kylah Aramai, even as a padawan.
I'd always been a suspicious old bugger. But I'd been blind to the sandsnake as it slithered into our den.

"I remember Baker's Day." Her voice was a blast of arctic wind. I'd hoped a stab of nostalgia would reach her, but I couldn't even spot the slightest chip in her impassive face.

"Bastila," I said softly. The beat of my heart drummed against my fingertips. I punched off the 'saber in my other hand and held it aloft, in surrender. "Come with me. Leave this place. Please."

She was silent for the longest time. Behind her, curved transparisteel viewports shot through with the flashes of battle. I didn't know what she saw in my face, but in hers I saw disdain. Condescension. Superficial emotions that everyone had always believed as her true self, even when young. Whereas I'd always seen them as nothing more than the mask of the insecure.

Bastila wore those emotions well, now.

"Too little, too late, old man," she said at last. There was grief in those words. Dammit, I was sure there was.

"It's never too late!" I growled, feeling the surge of my emotions briefly overwhelm the gripping pain of my injuries. "You of all people know that! Any other Jedi would have left that woman behind on the Nexus, but you didn't. You didn't-"

... She is alive.

The thought was a savage prayer of faith. A need to make desperate hope a reality. Because I would know if my padawan had fallen in battle, no matter what the Republic comms from Deralia spouted forth.

Galdea said nothing, merely nudged a tray of Dantooine tuber-roots smeared in white sauce across the mess table. He knew better than to speak pithy platitudes.

And if damned Karon or Zhar came anywhere near me right now I'd clock 'em straight in the face. There is no emotion. There is peace.

It was hard to calm down. Had been all week. And annoyingly dim as those two could be, I had to concede they meant well. They always did.

No one felt the fall of Revan or Malak more than them.

Revan and Malak should never have been trained in the first place-

"There's a presence in the sector. Just exited hyperspace." Galdea's large head jerked up, nose in the air like a kath hound. He'd always had a strong sense for that sort of thing. "Fear. So much fear. I-"

"Who?" I demanded, my voice hoarse as I shoved the lukewarm tray to one side. Galdea's unerring accuracy at recognizing Force signatures was as adept as his detection skills. "Who is it?"

His eyes shot to mine. There was a widening to them that told me the answer before he did. "Bastila Shan," he breathed. "But she's so scare-"

I ran.
Every step, my heart in my throat, vowing I'd never let the Republic sympathizers collar her again. It'd been Kester this mission, but if not him then it was Galdea or Vima-

By the time I'd reached the small dock a klick outside the Enclave I could sense her, too. A few minutes later, and the speck of her craft dotted in Dantooine's pale blue sky.

Another few before I saw the shape of it clearly-

What manner of ship is that?

The realization was numbing. One of Darth Revan's. Somehow, my padawan had escaped in one of the Sith Lord's own vessels.

As the sleek snubfighter descended on an erratic landing trajectory, Bastila's Force signature became apparent to my own senses. There was only hers. No one else on board, and my padawan's fear eclipsed all other emotion. She'd last been with masters Kester and Jai'lel, two of Dantooine's most powerful and most experienced.

I accepted they were dead before the ship landed with an unstable skidding on the open dirt dockyard, spitting billows of dust into the air. I'd feel grief for the masters later. All I cared about was Bastila, safe.

But why is she so petrified?

Galdea and Karon and Vandar were flanking me by the time the ship's curved hatch opened and Bastila tumbled out. She was a mess- but not visibly wounded- no obvious reason for the overwhelming fear that buffeted against my grip on the Force-

"Master!" she sobbed, and the closest thing I had to a daughter launched herself at me. My arms tightened around her awkwardly.

"It's alright," I said, voice gruff, blinking back tears of relief I'd deny to my dying breath. But this last week, since the news from Deralia had broken- I hadn't truly thought that Bastila was gone- but I'd feared it-

I cleared my throat hurriedly. "You're back home, Bastila. It's alright. It's over."

"No." She whimpered like she hadn't done since she was a tweener. And then her entire body stiffened. She drew back and stared up at me bleakly.

The look on her face- and I saw, then, the dark hollows in her cheeks, the tracery of veins taut on her pale forehead, the smudges of exhaustion starkly visible under her eyes-

Like she'd been pumping herself full of stims for a week just to stop from sleeping.

"It's not over, Master." Her eyes fluttered closed and her voice dropped to a stage whisper. "I'm not alone."

The words were a kick in the guts.

I threw the Force outwards, my gaze snapping to the alien ship as my hands tightened on Bastila's arms, and then- there- I felt it-

The faintest spark of evil. A dying black hole of grief and shadow.

"Oh no," I whispered. There was a sharp, startled gasp of recognition from Karon, and that told me exactly who Bastila had brought back with her. "My padawan. What have you done?"

"Mercy," she mumbled, her eyes still squeezed tight. "I couldn't... Malak fired on her flagship- then she was out cold and her mind broken... I couldn't leave her! Not when... not when I could save her. We preach mercy, and I- I just couldn't- I couldn't leave her to die."

I said nothing, even as my limbs stiffened and Karon and Vandar strode forward in haste. The only thought running through my mind, as I pushed Bastila roughly behind me and glared at the now-threatening snub, was simply that I wished Bastila had.

...

"No one else could have accomplished such a thing in the face of their own fear. But you were right, Bastila, right to show the mercy of the Jedi. Right to understand that it is never too late-

"It is too late! Too little, and far too late!" The words seethed like acid, and her eyes flared golden. "You believe I refer to a redundant redemption of my own actions?" Her words cut through me like a razor of ice. She followed it with a mocking laugh- a sound of contempt I had never thought to hear from her. "You misguided old fool. It is too late for you to comprehend what is truly at stake! It is too little- this- you reaching out for me after all this time, like there is any time left-

Her mouth snapped shut with a click, and she threw a sudden glare at the viewport. "Time. This wastes my time. I have a battle to attend to, Vrook, and you- you made the choice to step foot on enemy ground."

"I am not your enemy." I would believe that, say that, until the last breath had choked from my lungs. "I am on your side, Bastila!"

I kept my palm facing upwards, the deactivated 'saber rolling loose between my fingers. Still no Force, and the dizziness of blood loss was setting in, as it seeped through the calluses of my other hand. But I'd hold it together. I had to. "Please. Listen to me. This is not- whatever is happening, whatever it is that I don't understand... this is not the right path. Tell me what's going on. Tell me, Bastila."

The slightest flinch- if I hadn't been watching her so intently I wouldn't have seen it- but she was tempted. Part of her was, I could see it.

I stepped forward. Wounded and with one hand open in a gesture of peace, I was no threat to her. So I thought, so she must know, but the damn silent guards I'd forgotten thought otherwise-

It felt like two flaming shiv-blades stabbed deep into either side of my lower back. A scream tore from my lungs. The 'saber dropped with a clatter-

"Halt!" The same stone-cold command from the same frigid voice.

I was still standing. How, I had no idea, as the agony of seared flesh was overriding everything.

"The Force." It was Bastila's voice. But so cold. So emotionless. "You. Slayer. Why does it disappear when I step forward?"

"Null field technology, my lord." A mechanized response. One of the damn guards. Slayers. She called them slayers.

I was swaying, both hands now clutched tight around blazing ribs, breath coming in shallow gulps that rasped against my throat.
"Our portable devices have a six metre radius, my lord." My lord. The bastard was naming my padawan a dark lord. "If you stay back it shall not affect you."

There's been whispers in the Core. Whenever I landed on Coruscant, making my grudging report to High Council. Jedi assassins. Assassins of the night. First Revan's and later Malak's- deadly silent warriors the Force didn't touch.

Could it be these slayers, who now pledged obeisance to my old padawan?

A flicker of movement through my half-closed eyelids. One of those anonymous bastards had scooped up my dropped 'saber as a trophy.

My thoughts were fraying like a lit fuse. No Force to hold the pain back, to hold me upright. But I had to keep talking, keep fighting for her, keep thinking-

"Did you honestly believe you could rescue me from Malak?" She was speaking to me again. And her voice oozed with scorn. The pain blazed whenever I moved, but I was still standing- I lifted my heavy head to stare at her-

Bastila's yellow eyes flared with disgust. "You cannot even make it past two slayers, Vrook. Look at you. You are dead on your feet. You should have stayed on Dantooine."

Numbness was setting into my body, my mind. "Dantooine was- was- bombed-"

She knew that. She had to know that. And the Enclave was already being rebuilt, having mostly survived-

Her expression didn't budge, even as it blurred in front of me. "Dantooine would have been a more noble death for you than this pathetic display."

"Bastila." I wouldn't let those words cut me. "I believe in you. In the Jedi you are. No matter what has happened, what you have done in the name of Darth Malak or simply to survive, you can come back. You believed that of Revan, and I believe it of you. Come with me-

Her gaze was pitiless, and that was enough to choke the words in my throat. "I shall not allow you to interfere, Vrook. You made your choice to infiltrate the Star Forge. This is the price of your ignorance." Her profile swivelled to the left. "If he disturbs me or moves another step closer, shoot out his knees."

"Bastila!" I cried. The words stabbed something deeper than the blaster burns that'd butchered my flesh. "I don't believe you'll kill me." I didn't. I would keep faith with her. I had to show her- and she could control the blasted guards- "Tell your slayers to stand down. Leave this place. Come- come with me- p-please-"

My words were starting to slur together as my head swam. I couldn't raise my hands from their tight grip against my torso, but I could make my next step so obviously slow that it'd give her a chance to halt them before they fired-

The impact was a detonation of pain. Nothing but pain as it eclipsed everything else. I couldn't see, couldn't hear, just the hard, sticky press of metal against my face as my body burned.

I'd fallen.

"Scrape him off the floor of my chamber." I barely heard the words made of ice. "Put him by the wall. If he tries anything, kill him."
It was a place beyond pain, now. Coherency had completely shattered. Vision was fuzzy, but opening my eyes I could see a black-robed figure in the distance-

"Perhaps you are a fitting witness, Vrook. Perhaps as you lay here; a useless, old, dying fool; you can bear witness to the heights of my battle meditation married with the galaxy's most powerful defence."

She turned. A blurry cape of black spidersilk flurried over her shoulder as she stepped away. Further, further away from me, and knelt to do the Dark Side's bidding.

xXx

Chapter End Notes

Coming up next: Battles on the Star Forge.
A year's worth of clean-bot service to kosiah for the beta.
Nexus: Furtherance [Revan Freeflight, Mission Vao, Canderous Ordo, Jaq, HK-47]

Chapter Notes
See the end of the chapter for notes

Nexus: Furtherance

Revan Freeflight:

The sound of Canderous shooting out another holo-cam echoed down the strangely circular corridor.

"You know anyone tracking us can just follow the lines of dark cams?" I commented. It was more an idle remark to distract myself, really, for I inferred the sense in Canderous' actions. He'd already despatched a comm back to Teethree regarding a remote disabling of surveillance, but there'd been no declaration of success, yet.

"Better they see black screens than a feed showing them exactly how many of us there are," Canderous clipped out behind me. His voice was derisive, like he'd expected me to deduce that already.

Sure, Canderous, but I'm willing to bet that in between the milliseconds of you firing and the cam blowing out, a feed has already transmitted a couple of frames somewhere. Somewhere.

Better odds to hope no one was monitoring the surveillance, but that didn't seem particularly likely, either.

"Observation:," HK piped up, after a blast from his upraised forearm. He and Zaalbar were metres ahead, leading us through the warren of silvery tunnels. "That's six to me, Geriatric Blockhead, and only three to you. Reflection: As expected, I am once more topping the kill-count."

"You're in front, Tinhead," Canderous replied in a dry voice. "If you had less than me, I'd be worried."

Mere minutes had passed since we'd embarked on this final journey, stepping out from the officer's dock and into the bowels of the Star Forge. So far, the only sounds had been the idle banter between Canderous and my pet assassin droid. There was a razor-edge to my thoughts, like the charged calm before a storm's unleashing - for I knew this might be the final minutes of peace for us all.

"I believe I comprehend the origins of Malak's insanity," Yudan murmured, a quiet whisper by my side. "And yours, once."

I glanced sideways at the man. His smooth, bronzed face was set, and his eyes glittered with intent. He hadn't said a frelling word since he'd walked out of the 'Hawk.

"The voice," I acknowledged. I knew what he was referring to. "The voice that's promising you everything you most desire."

He nodded; a small, sharp motion of assent. "The voice is louder here than on Lehon."
"The crystal is larger," I said shortly. "It's not- it's not sentient, Yudan. The voice, it's simply..."

"Amplification of the Dark Side," he finished for me. His profile was facing straight ahead as we moved quietly behind Zaalbar and HK. Yudan stalked forward like a jungle cat, fluid and graceful, yet ready to strike at a moment's notice. "I understand, Revan. I did not believe I would ever need to resist this temptation again, but I shall. I shall."

The corridors in this place were a maze. Like stark, shiny sewer pipes, and we were but mink-rats scrabbling through them. I had no cohesive skeins of memory rushing forth to aid me here, just the odd, tantalising glimpse of reminiscence. Like the scent of rose-apple pie that made me yearn for home.

Home. What a twisted, jarring notion, labelling this place as home - as odd as baked rose-apple pie; for, really, my childhood home had been streets and danger and scrabbling for crumbs in the gutter-

Jen. Da's pie. He hadn't been much for kitchen-work, but he'd taught her how to bake that Deralian rose-apple pie-

I blinked, and cut through the errant thought at its stem before it could flower.

"Observation: We are nearing the experimental droid complex, master." HK had halted at a junction where the corridor split into three like spokes of a wheel, glistening and starkly chrome. There was nothing but the odd vent or scratched marking to mar the pale, silvery metal.

"Statement: To reach our destination, we have the option of wading directly through the droid complex, or scaling higher to the transport railings that overhang the complex. Addendum: While ascending directly to the railings is the shortest route, it will leave us more vulnerable to any potential threat." HK paused. "And with less opportunity to destroy any inferior droids directed into sentry mode."

"We'll take the railings, HK," I said. Bastila was above me. I didn't have to reach out to feel her now. The Force diffused outwards from her signature like aphotic fingers of night stretching into the nether.

"Acknowledgment: Onward, to the path of lesser enjoyment," HK intoned, as he selected the right-hand corridor.

As we all followed HK, my attention snagged on a handful of gouged lines in the wall, lower down at knee level. Odd, to see such markings throughout the place. They were scattered around sporadically, clusters of vertical lines that were easy to dismiss as historical damage, perhaps the scrape of a sentry droid grinding against the curved alloy walls.

Something squeezed taut in my mind-

...

"We've already walked down this corridor twice."

"Yes." I kept walking. I didn't need to hear his sigh to know it was present.

"Revvie, you're going around in circles."

"And I shall continue to do so until I have adequately familiarized myself with this place," I snapped. I lengthened my strides, and felt the ache of a tension headache setting in.
The Star Forge was mine, now. I was determined to thoroughly acquaint myself with my surroundings. For soon it would be time to activate the crystal we had found in the very nexus of this superstructure.

The uncut, colossal kaiburr stood more than twice my height; faded to a dull grey within the filigree strands of Rakatan metal that clasped around the crystalline edges like a claw. The kaiburr was more immense, more beautiful, more powerful than the thrumming one on Lehon, but this crystal was dormant. Only an echo of something alien and hauntingly compelling emanated from the behemoth mineral rock.

Once we powered on the internal reactors that housed the crystal, it would surge brilliantly to life. Like Lehon, but stronger. And possessing a vastly greater purpose.

The crystal would draw in solar energy from the nearby star, amplifying its own power, sparking this entire factory to life.

Oh, the power here might just be enough. Enough to roll the dice, to make a pre-emptive strike; to secure the galaxy under a singular choke-hold and turn our eye to the true threat-

"Revan, I want to contact the Fleet," Malak muttered, striding forward to reach my side. "It's been too long. They are waiting for our hail, standing guard in the Outer Rim-

"And they will continue to wait," I snapped again. My words echoed down the corridor, harsh and unyielding, rebounding back to me. I sighed, as my irritation abruptly ebbed. Malak was right. The Fleet were important. I was allowing my hard-edged purpose in mastering the Star Forge to preclude all other considerations.

Sometimes, there was wisdom in his words.

"Tomorrow," I relented. "Tomorrow, I will send a transmit. Update the commanders, at least. Give them an ETA of our return."

Allow me a window of time to activate the Star Forge, and see what I can manufacture. A strikefighter prototype, perhaps, to show the Fleet brass.

For my new objectives would need to be unveiled, soon, and that would start with my generals.

"Tomorrow, then," he vowed, as if my words were a promise. "Alright, Revan. One more round of our new home. Then you're stopping for a meal if I have to tie you down and force-feed you myself."

I felt the corner of my mouth twitch in a distant reflex of what had once been a carefree grin. More habit than anything else, these days. "Not sure about the force-feeding part," I quipped, "But the other..."

I let my words trail away into silence under the weight of his frown. In truth, our old banter had felt stale for some time. Too many heavy deeds resting on our souls. It was a grim reckoning I had long accepted: that we would never make it out from under the bloody shadows cast by the Mandalorian Wars.

Our individual futures do not matter. Only our survival. So I can achieve what I must.

"Odd, all these scratches," Malak muttered, swinging one leg idly to catch at the wall. "They appear in some places, but not others. I thought they were just scuffs left from some clean-bot or tech droid, but the pacing is too irregular."

I cast my eye over the marks. Almost looked like primitive markings counting the numbers in a beast-flock.

"Superficial damage to utility corridors is hardly what is relevant here," I clipped out, before striding forward, having already dismissed the unimportant markings from my mind.

...

The edges of the memory swam, dispersing into haze. I found myself walking further down the next corridor, but my eyes were locked on another cluster of scratches.

Vertical lines, interwoven with the occasional flourish or sharp borderline. The marks looked meaningless. Almost...

"They're nothing," I muttered. "Just random marks."

I had known that. My old self, cold-edged and driven with hard purpose, had known that. If there was any sort of legibility or meaning to them, surely I would have interpreted it years ago.

"What is it, Revan?" Yudan asked. He must've noticed me staring at the walls.

I couldn't pull my gaze from the odd markings, though; I felt like if I just tried hard enough, I'd be able to comprehend- comprehend some meaning....

I squinted, vision blurring, and a whisper of something almost artificial curled in my mind. Not from the shadows-

Not from me-

"Wait a minute," I called out sharply, as I came to an abrupt halt in front of another group of interlinked lines. I dropped to my knees and tilted my head at a right angle purely on instinct.

The lines abruptly morphed into a series of archaic glyphs. Sigils, scratched sideways along the corridor of an ancient Rakatan superstructure. I frowned, struggling to follow, the glyphs looked so primitive and coarsely made, and it was not a language I innately knew-

Early Massassi. Sidi-script, before their alphabet evolved into true hieroglyphics. A primitive, simple means of written communication. There are so few preserved fragments-

The hitch in my breath seemed inordinately loud. That wasn't my thought-

The stirring in my mind was mild and timid, as if the slightest surge of emotion would banish it back into nothingness.

This is from the first reign of the Massassi. The Sidi-Massassi, the least known about, the ancestral line that died out when the true Massassi evolved. The Sidi-Massassi were physically inferior to their descendants, but believed to have a deeper Force-sensitivity. Enslaved by the Rakatan regime-

My fingers were running down the sharp-edged grooves as I crawled forward, trying desperately to let my cursed mind think by itself.

That's the siga rune. There- the aleric, and that must translate to- to...
There was a sluggishness to my own internal computation, a difficulty in comprehension that I somehow knew Jen Sahara never had. Not over translation of archaic texts dating back to the field of her expertise.

Balance. The glyphs keep repeating balance.

The glyphs clustered together in a group beneath my fingertips. I heard someone ask something behind me, but my attention was wholly absorbed.

Builders upset balance. Balance of magic- no, no the Force! The Builders have upset the balance of the Force!

I rocked back on my heels, mind whirring as the faint thought-stream began to dissipate.

This was a curiosity, nothing more. Because it wasn't like I didn't comprehend what balance meant to a Force-user.

Canderous' heavy glove thumped down on my shoulder as I canvassed the glyphs one last time.

The balance between life and death.

"Revan? What are you doing?"

I blinked, looking up to stare at Canderous' visored helm.

"We have to keep moving. Get your head together, Revan." It was a barked command, which meant my friend and ally was worried about me.

"I'm fine," I said absently, getting to my feet. "I actually- I actually am. I think I've just discovered something about this place that I didn't know before."

The Rakata kept Massassi slaves here? Why? Why would they allow Force-sensitives, even enslaved ones, to step foot on a Force-relic like this?

The thoughts were all my own, now. The vague, lingering remnants from the dead scholar had completely vanished.

And what were the ancient Massassi trying to tell someone - anyone - by scratching sideways messages at knee level?

Once, I had dismissed the graffiti as nothing more than damage done to a factory over its lifespan. Possibly, so had the Rakata.

Balance between life and death.

I'd always thought the balance was between light and dark.

"(Jen?)" It was Zaalbar, now, emitting a worried rumble from the front.

"Lead on," I said, nodding, storing the information like a nugget in the back of my head. Perhaps this was simply like the terraforming computer on Kashyyyk: an intriguing puzzle, a potential source of information, a fragment of history that piqued my interest - but also something I simply did not have time to indulge in.

Yudan was staring hard at me. Maybe that was an expression of concern on his face.
"Lead on," I reiterated, once more following Zaalbar down the corridor. "It's nothing of import. Nothing that could help us today, anyway."

xXx

Mission Vao:

Place is dead empty, I thought, as I shimmied out through the cargo consignment hatch.

Sure, I'd been watching the Hawk's cams, and I'd seen Carth point those extra pilots deeper into the hangar. I couldn't spot them from my crouch under the Hawk's hull, but I knew the direction they were in. That way. Past those other snubs. Near the exit.

But where's Dustil and old man Bindo hiding at?

Teethree clanked on the hard flooring as he lowered himself from the cargo hatch, and I flinched at the noise. Sheesh, I had to find a stealth mod or some way of muffling his gears, 'cause he was freaking loud-

"Mission!" Dustil hissed, face popping under the edge of the ship's loading ramp. "What are you doing?"

Poodoo! I shot him a carefree grin as I crawled silently forward. He musta heard Teethree's landing, but Dustil had his eyes pinned on me. It was dark, under the belly of the Hawk, and I'd hoped that would be enough-

He scowled. "You know those mainstream stealth belts are frakking useless, right?"

"Not all of us can turn invisible," I muttered, maybe a little sulkily, because it wasn't fair that he could just wave his stupid hand and disappear like that. "Anyway, I figured something was better than nothing, right?"

Stealth-fold technology had never really taken off- except in dark ops, but then infrareds could turn them from mostly useless into totally useless. Still, there'd been more than one time in the shady tunnels of Taris when my trusty belt had helped me shake loose a Vulkar or two. And stealth tech had been surprisingly wizard against those creepy rakghouls. Between my belt and Big Z's immunity, we'd freaking owned the Undercity.

Well, kinda.

"Why are you- why are you coming closer?" Dustil was still whispering in that outraged voice as I wriggled out from underneath the Hawk. "Mission. Get back inside the ship."

Sometimes, it was sorta cute the way he tried to act like his dad. Like I ever listened to *Carth."

Up ahead, I could see Jolee lounging against one of those snubs that had been parked in here when we'd arrived. Weird, because it looked more like a Republic bird than a Sith ship - but it'd been sitting pretty here, in the badass factory of freaking Darth Malak.

Jolee's head swung in our direction. One bushy eyebrow raised, like the old guy was mocking me or something, and then he turned his attention back to the rear of the hangar.

Far out, he's like, twenty metres away, and he can still spot me through the belt? Maybe the thing was just a piece of useless Jawa-scrap.
"Mission-" Dustil had turned plaintive, like he realized ordering me about wasn't gonna work.

"Teethree can't do anything from the cockpit." I flipped my goggles on, fiddling with the dial as I parsed the hangar. The bio-scan feed overlaid the lens in red- there. I could see the heat of a body past the next snub, and another two on either side of the exit hatch. Marking the door.

"Does Carth reckon someone's gonna attack us?" I asked quietly. Everyone was silent and still. Everyone was aiming at the only hatch like it was gonna explode out with monsters.

I shivered suddenly. The monsters were deeper in. With Canderous and Jen and Big Z. Last thing I was gonna do was sit on my tail and hide away, when everyone I cared about might not even be coming back.

"Honestly?" Dustil muttered, shifting uneasily from his perch by the ramp. "I have no frakking clue. I mean, uh- I don't think anyone is coming here. But Dad's so on edge-" Dustil cut himself off with a huff, turning to glare into the hangar. Every line of him was sprung tight like a swoop ignition coil.

_Carth ain't the one on edge, Dee._

Dustil saw me looking at him, and scowled again. "I'm holding myself back from the Force, Mission. I won't be able to sense anything coming close. I'm as blind as a frakking shyrack."

If we'd been anywhere else, I'd be telling him to take a freaking chill pill. But everything was at stake here- and everyone.

So, instead, I reached out and placed a hand on his arm, ignoring the way he tensed at the contact. "Jolee will be able to sense anyone coming. Don't stress, Dee. Jen and the others - they got this. All the nasties running around here will be gunning for them."

It was supposed to cheer him up, but instead, the comment just made me feel worse. They were all out there - and Big Z, well, I knew how bad he still felt about prissy Bastila, and his life-debt would make him do anything for Jen, no matter how dangerous-

_We've come so far. I got faith. All of us, we're the only ones who've been smart enough and strong enough to get all those Maps and find our way here, in Darth Malak's stupid super-secret Star Forge._

_We'll finish things and save the galaxy. I just know we will._

"Yeah." Dustil still looked worried. "Mission, Dad'll flip if he spots you. Get back in the 'Hawk, alright?"

I rolled my eyes. _Round and round like a broken spin-disc, playing the same borked song._ "Look, I was serious, alright? Teethree can't do anything from the 'Hawk. The bay doors of this place - they're not just closed, they're not even responding to the core engineering system." I puffed out an annoyed breath. "An' it's not just here, Dee. The minute the _Ebon Hawk_ got in, every airlock in this place snapped shut. Completely overrode everything."

Teethree beeped sadly at my side.

"That- that sounds like it was planned." Dustil's eyes were wide.

I shot him a look. "Gee, ya think?"
His teeth were worrying his lower lip. Sometimes, Dustil went all serious and dark on me, and seemed years older. Other times, like right now, he looked just like a kid holding a lightsaber.

We're not kids. We ain't been kids for years.

"Entry sensors," Dustil whispered hoarsely. "Or something- something must have been triggered by the Ebon Hawk. Even in this supposedly undisclosed dock, they were looking out for us. They know we're here."

They. Darth Malak. And everyone who followed the freakazoid.

"Yeah." I sighed. "Apparently Bastila pointed us here. Guess she's probably the one who slammed shut all the airlocks."

It seemed weird, to think of Bastila being able to override systems like that. Maybe she'd ordered someone else to do it. Some underling. Because from what Jen and the others had been saying, it didn't sound like Bastila was a prisoner here anymore.

"I still don't get that," Dustil muttered in an echo of my thoughts. "I mean, Bastila Shan! She was the shiny symbol of the Jedi when I was at the Academy. Her battle meditation and all that rot. Hard to believe she's using it for the other side now..."

"I suppose people thought that about Jen, once." I still found the whole Revan thing almost impossible to get my head around, even now - much as I knew it peeved Dustil off. I mean, I'd seen plenty of bad poodoo in my life, but deep down I knew it was nothing on what Darth Revan had once unleashed.

I was glad I'd never known her then. It would've been- harder, to get past it.

Maybe explains a bit of Yudan's snarly attitude. Maybe. Didn't mean I'd ever give that ronto-turd the time of day.

"But y'know-" I made a face. "Bastila used to be a real goody-two-boots. I don't reckon she's gone truly bad. Jen'll sort her out."

Dustil threw me a pitying look. It was difficult not to reach out and slap him one.

Instead, I turned to look down at Teethree. At least he didn't talk back - well, not so anyone else could understand.

"Go to the consoles, Teethree. See what you can slice into. We need to get those bay doors back online."

Teethree's dome spun. He beeped happily, before extending his tracks and rolling away.

"Er-" Dustil looked oddly hesitant, as he turned to peer into the hangar.

And then, suddenly, the tiny little dock looked a heck of a lot bigger. And empty. As Teethree pooted along the entire width of it, travelling in first freaking gear by the looks, and in complete line of sight of the only exit.

The droning noise as he whirred forwards echoed loudly throughout the eerily silent hangar.

"You said you reckoned no one would come here, right?" I hissed. Teethree was a wizard astromech, but one bolt could completely fizzle out his actuator. And anyone strolling into here would immediately spot a utility droid chugging along slowly in front of them-

"Well, maybe," Dustil muttered. He, too, was staring intently at the droid.

The sound of Teethree's gears was ridiculously loud. I bet stupid HK had hogged all the gear oil and my poor droid was slowly rusting away because of it.

A flurry of movement near the door shook a frightened gasp from me.

But it was only Carth- his head peeping around one of the ships near the exit.

My wrist-comm beeped, and I jumped without meaning to. Looking down, I felt my nose wrinkling as I accepted the call.

::Mission, get back in the 'Hawk:: Carth growled.

Sheesh, my lame belt really is banthacrap if he can spot me from the other side of the room.

My eyes narrowed in suspicion. Or, maybe, he can't-

"Um, what do you mean, Carth?" I faked into the comm. "I sent Teethree out to slice into the consoles."

That wasn't actually a lie, as such.

::Oh:: Carth sounded nonplussed. ::Sorry, Mission. I just assumed- never mind::

The comm clicked off. I stifled a giggle as I glanced up at Dustil, who was grinning like an idiot.

Up ahead, the whirring of gears ceased as Teethree finished circling around the line of consoles.

"Dad knows you well," Dustil snickered. "But not well enough to tell when you're lying-"

Something hissed.

Our heads jerked around.

Ping of a blaster firing-

The hatch! My stomach lurched. The freaking hatch hissed opened!

Dustil's arm thumped hard into me. "Get back inside!" he yelled roughly.

Oh, crap! Fright choked in my throat as I heard the hum of a lightsaber snapping to life, and I had no idea if it was one lone Sith or a whole battalion of them, or- or- a Dark Jedi-

"Go, Mission!" With a last holler, Dustil abruptly vanished. The sound of his disappearing footfalls was drowned out by a scream. Two snubs parked between me and the hatch, so all I could see was wild blaster fire shooting upwards, all I could hear were thuds, a cut-off yell, tell-tale pop of a grenade-

No way. No way am I gonna hide! Fear felt like sick in my belly, but if Dee thought I was gonna cower away when I could actually help, then he really didn't know me.

I sprinted to the nearest snub, mini-blaster already in hand, heart beating fast, and legs pumping as I made a wild dive under the ship's hull.
I skidded along the floor, coming to a halt just underneath the front-mounted hyperdrive of the parked strikefighter.

There was another snub between me and the hatch, mostly blocking my line of sight, but I could see legs blurring beyond it on the other side. The Bek's used to hide in utility vents, marking places to take pot-shots at Vulkars sneaking in on our turf. 'Course, Zaerdra never let me go on sentry duty, but I imagined it was something like this.

Lying flat on the ground, propped up on elbows, aiming down the sights as the sounds of blaster volleys and clashing blades filled the air.

Hold your aim steady. Wait for a clear shot.

A black-armoured leg paused for a nanosec.

I fired twice.

The legs stumbled to the ground, and then the green of a 'saber stabbed straight into the fallen body.

"Status!" It was a holler from Carth. No more blaster pings, and I couldn't see anyone's legs now. If Carth was yelling then did that mean all the bad guys were dead?

"Three enemy down, sir!" someone rapped back in response. "No one else outside the hatch!"

I felt my thundering heart begin to slow, just a bit. My arms shook. *Get to the others-

"We lost- we lost Lilani, sir," the same voice said. "Tobards is badly hit."

I scrambled out from under the snub's angled nose. Snapped the gun to my waist. Stood, pretended I didn't feel my stupid legs shaking, and began to walk forward.

"Stang." A quiet curse from Carth. "Search the bodies. They were well-equipped. Professionals. Only reason we didn't lose more was because we were prepared."

"Eh, I wasn't," Jolee growled. I spotted him as I cleared the last snub, crouching down over a corpse. "Not for the Force to wink out. If it hadn't been for that snipe-shot under the snub, I think I'd be looking at my grave right now."

Three black bodies. Smears of dark blood on the shiny floor. Two more bodies, in orange flightsuits- no, wait, one was moving. I blinked. We won. We killed the bad guys.

It felt hard to swallow, suddenly.

And we lost a stranger who'd come to help us. It seemed oddly terrible to realize, in that moment, that all I really cared about was that the orange-clad body wasn't Carth or Dee or Jolee.

"The Force. It's gone." Dustil's words were a shocked whisper as I neared. "And not because I'm doing anything!"

"Aye, I know, kid," Jolee grumbled. He had a shiv-blade in one bony hand, cutting apart sections of armour from a black-clad body like he was skinning an ash-rabbit. "Something to do with these dead fellows. We just have to find out what."

"Mission!" Carth had spotted me. 'Course he had. I felt strangely numb - I'd been in spots like this before, I'd seen so much death already, an' the Shadowlands had been a bloody blur of screams and corpses- but, somehow, nothing about this felt any easier.

Carth had taken a reflexive step closer. His gaze dropped to the blaster held loosely at my side.

Something crossed his face, then, like he knew it'd been me firing that last shot, for he seemed to choke back whatever he'd planned to say next. He just looked- sad. Resigned, maybe.

I walked the remaining steps to Dustil's side. My limbs still felt shaky, but my stride was steady.

One of the Republic pilots was propped up against the wall, his flightsuit drenched in blood all over his gut. There was another one leaning over him. The injured guy lifted one hand to unsnap and rip off his flight-helm. He was an older Human, maybe Jen's age, and he was staring solidly at me.

"You winged that last one in the knee, miss," he said, his voice wavering. "Saw it clear as day. Mighty fine shot."

"Huh," Jolee muttered. He tossed another section of cracked armour behind him, head still bowed over the corpse he was mangling. "Think you saved my life there, kid," he threw over his shoulder. "Remind me to buy you a drink."

Carth hadn't shifted his gaze from me, either. He still looked like he was biting back protests.

"We're all needed here, Carth," I said softly. "All of us."

Which reminded me- I swung around, frantically scanning the empty hangar, eyes roving the line of consoles where Teethree had been-

The droid was hooked innocently into a comm-port, all shiny chrome under the lighting, as if nothing had been going on at all.

Silly astromech was just fine.

"Ah, got you, you bugger!" Jolee crowed. I heard the smashing sound of shattered glass, and turned back to see Jolee grinding his booted heel down on a mess of ferraglass.

"What's going on?" I whispered to Dustil. "What did ya mean about the Force?"

There was a wild look in Dustil's dark eyes, a sort of helplessness that I hated to see. "I can't- something is stopping us-"

"Make yourself useful, boy," Jolee cut in, directing his bark at Dustil. "Go strip the other corpse, see if you can find a trinket in his belt. Ten creds say that's what's causing the Force to black out on us."

Dustil blinked quickly as his expression firmed into resolve. He reached out to squeeze my hand before moving away.

"Tobards, you can't fight like this," the pilot who was leaning over the injured one said. She was pulling apart a medi-kit, tearing open bacta patches to pack over his exposed gut. His blood was soaking into the sleeves of her flightsuit.

"No, not fight," the one called Tobards muttered. His hand was clenched tight around his belly, and the other pilot had to pry it away as she peered clinically at his wound.

Too many times I'd seen the mess of battle afterwards. Too many times I'd smelt the charred scent of burnt skin. Some of the older Beks used to say it was something you got used to, but I hadn't. Not yet.

"Sir, that Twi'lek of yours has the right idea." It was the injured one again. Tobards. I didn't think I'd be able to talk so calmly with so much of my own blood spilling out everywhere. "I scored top marks in marksmanship. If someone can give me a lift to the top of your freighter, I think I can find myself a good sniping spot."

"Tobards, I have to halt the bleeding first," the other one scolded, the one with stripes on her shoulders.

Carth was silent for a moment before nodding firmly. I could see in that brief instant how part of him hated this, this cold way of placing peeps around in battle for the best outcome. Using sents for the good of all.

It was the sort of thing that'd always come so natural to Jen.

"Stabilize his injuries then move him topside," Carth ordered the woman, before swinging his gaze on a third pilot who was busy pulling weaponry from a corpse- I hadn't even noticed him. "Joss, get back to marking the door. Jolee, as you were. Dustil, I want you standing ready and hidden by that second snub. Mission..."

Carth trailed off, gazing at me with that stupid concerned look. I'd helped, more than helped, and Carth had to freaking realize that-

Something firmed in his face. "Get back under the snub," he commanded. "Back into your sniping position. Belt on, and sight the door."

I blinked, as something warm curled in my belly. He's finally got it. Finally understands that I ain't just a kid. That I can help, just as much, even without the stupid Force.

Sheesh, Jen had figured that one out back on Taris. It'd only taken Carth, like, six planets.

But I knew, really, that snapping out orders to me would've been hard for him. All Carth had ever tried to do was protect me - just like Big Z. Stupid and annoying, maybe, the way he kept trying to put me somewhere safe - like there was anywhere truly safe in the galaxy - but Carth was one of the few sents who actually gave a cred about me.

One of the few I cared about, too.

"Got it," Dustil muttered, as he cracked something under his boot.

"I might just turn this one off." Jolee hummed, thumbing at something in his hand. A small round object that was glittering, until it suddenly went dark. "Heh. Just like that, eh?"

"It's back," Dustil breathed, as Jolee slipped the weird object into his robes. "The Force. It's back."

"Remember to keep yourself hidden, cub," Jolee warned. "Don't let all this," he flapped a hand around the room, "allow you to forget about the danger of the Star Forge itself."

Dustil mumbled something in return, but I was busy focusing on Carth again, who'd walked close enough to lay a hand gently on my shoulder. His brow was creased with concern, and his mouth was tight.

"Go, Mission," Carth told me, but his words were less like an order, now. "We need you out there."
"You reckon- you reckon there will be more of these guys?" I whispered.

"Yeah." His return was grim. "Whoever sent these men will know they failed, as soon as they go dark on the comms. And I think we can expect more than just three next time."

xXx

Canderous Ordo:

_Whoever dreamed up circle tubes for a station's navigational system needs their kriffing head read._

Even under my boots, marching down the centre of a long spherical tunnel, I could feel some curvature to the flooring. Considering the diameter of the corridors, it meant a lot of this factory was nothing but wasted space.

_Maybe the laandur Rakata died out due to inept architectural design._

The extinct fish had been a space-faring, battle-hungry people, once. They must've had space stations dotted around aplenty; the fact that only this one survived the ashes of history had to be down to the magical diamond Revan said was in its belly.

_Take the pretty Force gem outta the Forge, and what's left is a badly-designed, resource-hungry hulk of strange metal._

At least Revan had stopped crouching down to examine every little scratch we passed. She seemed fine, now; stalking ahead of me with her 'saber at the ready, but her intense interest in the kriffing walls a few minutes back had been... concerning.

_Don't let your mind crack, Revan. Not now. Not heading into this battle._

"Statement: We are above the entrance to the experimental droid complex, master. Beyond this hatch are the elevated railings that cross overhead before leading to the meridian viewing chambers." HK and the Wookiee had paused next to a large oblique hatch at the corridor's end.

"Prediction: We should expect Forge-built battle-droids from here on in, unless your former pupil's biological processor has decayed beyond recognition."

There was a moment of silence as Revan walked to the half-moon doors, before laying a gentle hand on them.

"Former pupil," she muttered, with a dark twist in her voice. "You mean Malak. Did you ever meet him, HK?"

HK's angular head swivelled to face Revan. "Answer: A handful of times, Master. I found him to be efficient and brutal for an organic. I rather liked him. Retrospection: If I had known what he would do to you, Master, I would have gladly removed his entrails right then!"

"Forget I asked," Revan growled. "Instead, how about relaying what you can sense in this frelling complex?"

HK emitted a clucking sound before answering. "Admonishment: As stated earlier, Master, the radiation from the kaiburr interferes with my long-range infrared scanners. All I am detecting within a five-metre radius are four organic meatbags." HK swooped his rifle over all of us in turn. His photoreceptors gleamed. "Suggestion: Would you like me to kill Mobile Carpet or Apathetic Fleshbag to cheer you up, Master?"
"Put a bolt in it," I drawled from my place at the rear, as Revan turned to throw me the faint echo of a grin. "Or disclose something useful. How much open-air railing are we headed into, Tinhead?"

"Answer: Multiple walkways branch throughout the upper cavity of the experimental droid complex, but in the interest of limiting fun, our chosen route should be the most direct walkway. Extrapolation: A forward run of railing from this hatch extends for approximately fifty metres before reaching an enclosed maintenance room at its end."

"Fifty metres?" I echoed in consideration. "Huh. Must be a pretty large room then."

"Statement: The chamber beyond is the experimental droid complex of the Rakatan Empire's largest space station. Mockery: Did you expect it to be a closet?"

I had to say HK was good at dishing out what he got. Before he got it, even. If HK'd been an actual sent, I daresay I would've liked him.

Revan's fingers drummed against the closed hatch. Her expression had firmed into hard resolve, and the glittering in her green eyes told me it was time. I felt my mouth tighten into a fierce grin of readiness.

"Zaalbar, Canderous and HK, I want you to head out first," Revan rapped out. "Run straight to the room HK detailed. We'll be exposed, so go as fast as you can. Yudan and I will follow and use the Force to fry anything shooting projectiles our way."

She paused, scruffy head turning back to face the hatch. Other than a lightweight duramesh tunic, Revan wore no battle-suit, no carapaces shielding her limbs or torso - not even a helm protecting her head.

I got why Force-users eschewed armour, when toe-dancing around in the middle of their fancy duels, but at times like this the lack seemed nothing more than a kriffing liability.

"We might be preparing for nothing," Revan said in a low voice. One of her hands lifted, wavering in the air. "Could be that all we're faced with next door is a large, empty room."

My own armour was the best I could manage. A patched-up suit the Wookiee had repaired, with duramesh links fused around an old purple chest-plate from that di'kut Davik. Nothing like the beskar'gam I'd once earned. Still, at least this jigged battle-suit had a working stimulant system and standard utility mods built into the belt.

"Well, get on with it then," I growled, amping up the levels of adrenastim vaporising into my helm, just as Revan waved her Force voodoo at the door.

The dual half-moon hatches slid ajar, and Zaalbar was the first to clear, shooting straight through them like a sprinting loth-cat.

The adrenastim vapour hit my bloodstream with a tell-tale burn as I surged forward next to HK.

Railings were only wide enough for two. More like maintenance routes this high-up, near the ceiling of a cavernous warehouse, above what had to be a twenty metre drop.

All fleeting impressions, quick-fire thoughts, as I stormed into a chamber thick with the din of automatic machinery snapping to attention. The snicking sound of projectiles loading. A dozen mechanical voders issuing identical intruder alerts-

There was even a bastard on the walkway itself-
An animalistic howl erupted from the Wookiee as he leaped forward. My hand, thumbing the safety-lock from an ion grenade even as I sprinted behind. A Revan-shaped blur above my head-

The railing thudded as Revan landed, well clear of Carpet. The battle-droid sailed off the walkway, shoved by an unseen force, the elongated red stripe of a disruptor bolt aiming wild from its forearm.

The air was shot through with laser.

Revan whirled back to face us, face white. "Go!" she hollered.

I lobbed one grenade, readying a next as my legs pumped. Jarring impact under my feet- something exploded into the walkway behind me. The Wookiee sprinted past Revan as currents of purple-white sparks streamed from her hand. There was the crackling of the same at my back.

Another ion grenade thrown from my grasp, as I grabbed a third-

"Revan!" The Twi'lek's voice was hoarse behind me. "We are not damaging them!"

A thwarted roar in Shyriiwook, as tens of metres ahead Carpet was slamming an angry fist against a closed hatch.

I'd almost caught up to Revan- I saw her lurch around, one hand waving open the exit next to Zaalbar, just as a red stripe bore directly into her shoulder-

I heard no scream from her, for in that moment the world exploded.

The impact deafened everything - sight, hearing, touch - but not my mind.

Missiles launched into the kriffing walkway. I'm sliding, about to fall-

I wrenched an arm I could barely feel against my suit's belt, launching the standard grappling hook blindly, for either the damn visor had gone dark or I was more damaged than I knew at that moment-

I fell-

No more than a metre, before something yanked against my waist and pulled taut, and then I slammed sideways into something else.

The reeling sensation of concussion ringing in my ears-

"Ordo!"

My hand ripped the visor clear. Vision blurrily returned. I was hanging, hooked some metres down from the broken corpse of the walkway. One section of path hung limp, the section of path I'd slid down before falling.

Below- six of the robots still standing, still firing, even as two more sailed uncontrollably through the air before either Revan or Rosh smashed them into a nearby wall.

My hands were numb but I could still fish out another ion grenade from here-

"Ion doesn't work on them, Ordo!" Rosh's voice, from somewhere above. Couldn't spot the bastard.
Wookiee was howling in the distance. "Retract your grapple, I'll hold them off- shavit, there's more in the room with the others- Revan!"

There was a note of stark alarm in the Twi'lek's normally emotionless voice.

I reached out to the grapple just as the world exploded again. This time, I fell all the way.

Even in the falling, I knew my fumbling grasp had found a 'frag grenade.

Safety-switch off, throw-

xXx

"Intruder sighted!"

Awareness slammed back with the lingering burn of the adrenastim high.

I was rolling on instinct- there was a crackling, shattering sound to my battle-suit that I knew wasn't good, but it'd taken the brunt of the fall-

This had to be my end, dropping in full armour on six of those Forge-built aru'e with my comrades pinned down in a room topside.

Still, end or not, I found myself coming up ready in a crouch, prepared to glare into the jaws of death with a war-cry on my lips-

Odd. The jaws of death were a mere two battle-droids that weren't even facing me. One was stomping sideways, disruptor rifle levelled at the smoking remnants of another droid.

A humanoid figure darted away from the metallic detritus just as both active battle-droids fired.

Donno who that is, but I ain't gonna complain about the diversion. My breath rattled as my limbs straightened and I glanced wildly about for a nearby weapon - my repeating blaster having dislodged somewhere in the fall. With an internal shrug, I drew out two mini-pistols, switched 'em on, and aimed.

In the seconds it'd taken me to ready my guns, one of the droids had already deactivated, head and shoulders curling into itself like a giant metallic seashell.

Quelling my surprise, I sighted the remaining droid. I'd no idea how the strange humanoid - a lithe figure garbed in what looked like primitive beast-leather - could've dismantled a battle-droid three times his height, but the final droid had its disruptor aimed straight back at him.

I might owe my life to this stranger, and it was better to resettle any debt while I had the opportunity.

I loosed a quick volley - ineffectual laser bolts that pinged from the battle-droid's back carapace - seconds before the droid unleashed a disruptor shot directly at the stranger.

The flare of a blueish energy shield glowed as the humanoid dropped into a crouch, levelled a rifle, and fired an identical, elongated disruptor bolt in return.

This time I heard a muffled explosion inside the battle-droid's torso as it deactivated in the same manner as the other.

Mand'alor's balls! One kriffing disruptor hit did that?
My eyes narrowed. Disruptor bolts were effectively the same as standard blaster bolts - but the energy was concentrated by several orders of magnitude. Point of impact disintegrated matter at a molecular level, and the area of effect depended on the concentration of the disruptor.

Disruptor tech was rare due to its high-energy needs making the required therm batteries stupidly short-lived - not to mention, of course, that disruptor-based armaments were classed as illegal throughout the hu'tuun Republic.

Another interesting fact was that standard energy shields, just like Jedi glow-sticks, couldn't stop disruptor bolts.

Which meant the stranger now strolling towards me must be equipped with a very specialized personal shield - on top of knowing exactly how to disable Darth Malak's pet defence droids.

Odds were, he'd taken out more than just the last two.

I surveyed the room quickly to get my bearings. The cavernous droid complex had been emptied of any live threat, for now. All original battle-droids were disabled or smashed.

Well, at least the ones down here-

My head jerked up. Twenty metres above, the hatch of the maintenance room yawned open, but I couldn't see or hear a damn thing. Rosh had said something about there being more droids-

Everything blurred. A sudden weariness in aching muscles warned the adrenastim was wearing thin. I locked my knees too late- my legs gave out, and the thud as my backside hit the ground jarred painfully up my spine. There was a throbbing at the base of my skull. A piercing stab into my thigh, like a piece of armour had cracked and was slicing into flesh-

Get up, Ordo. The others-

"Canderous Ordo."

My name, dropped so casually from a stranger's lips, had my fingers ready on the mini-blaster and my attention once more engaged.

The man was a tall, wiry Human, who appeared relaxed as he stood a few metres away, disruptor rifle slung back in a shoulder harness. His custom duramesh-and-leather armour was topped with a sleek durasteel helm, whose visor was currently lifted to reveal a grizzled face. Pale eyes appraised me without any noticeable expression.

"(This is not our battlefield; now is not our fight,)" he greeted, in fluent Mando'a.

The pain in my leg was worse, now. I'd have to remove a section of armour if I wanted to walk. Get a couple of kolto shots in me, hope the kriffing comm survived the fall-

I stared hard at the stranger. I had to address this man, first. The one I owed my life to, this unknown Human who spoke Mando'a like he was born to it.

The man didn't move as he appraised me in return. "(As they die upon my blade, my adversaries know me as Harten of clan Itera.)"

The traditional greeting of an unknown Mando'ade who claimed no harm on the battlefield. And the Itera were a solid clan who'd fought well in the wars, a clan that could claim both status and pride despite their diminished ranks.
My honour demanded I acknowledge my fellow countryman: acknowledge his name, and the battle-debt I now owed him.

There was something very kriffing familiar about this situation-

I barked a laugh. "Y'know, the last time an unknown Mando'ade saved me from probable death, he didn't act from the good of his heart." My eyes narrowed as I watched the man. "He saved me to get close to Revan."

To give the stranger credit, he didn't even blink. "My goals align with your leader," he replied, in smooth and flowing Galactic Basic.

And that means I owe you no debt, Harten of kriffing Itera.

"She ran into trouble up there," I said shortly, jerking my chin to the distant ceiling. No idea if the man - and I'd wager he wasn't sworn Mando'ade - meant Revan harm, but I highly doubted I was telling him anything he didn't already know.

The Human's head cocked; one ear facing the hatch topside. "There are no weapons being discharged. All I can make out is the rumble of your Wookiee."

"Aural implants," I muttered, impressed despite myself. Highly-specced ones to cover that distance and not be affected the way Tinhead's sensors are.

A faint smile barely curved the Human's mouth. "I have superior hearing," he murmured, and I wasn't sure if that was assent to my comment or not.

"Look, what the kriff do you want?" I rapped out, impatient. I had to find a way back to the others. Glancing down, I could see my wrist-comm had smashed in the fall. A jagged crack ran up the length of battle-suit covering that arm, and I could tell a blaster hit there would penetrate straight to my skin.

"I desire a conversation with Revan," the Human said, after a pause. "I saved her ally's life. She will owe me that, at the least."

His gaze dropped overtly to the mini-blaster held firm in my hand. I wasn't raising it - yet.

"I mean your leader no threat, Canderous Ordo. Particularly not in this place."

"So you say. Not exactly the place for a chat between strangers, though, is it?" I leaned forward, dropping the gun to pull the leg segment of my battle-suit free. A sharp sting and a rush of blood-it wasn't serious, but I'd have to attend to it now. "And I suppose you want me to introduce you, Harten Itera?

I didn't bother concealing my disbelief over his name.

"You should head back to your freighter."

That got my attention. "Why?" I snapped out, leg forgotten as I glared up at the man.

"There are more droids deeper in the upper levels, Canderous Ordo. It will take you time to double-back and find another walkway to meet up with your team." The man's pale eyes lingered over my battle-suit, before coming to rest on my arm. "Your armour is splintered in several places. You have no disruptor rifle, and that is the only easy way to disable the battle-droids." He paused, gaze shifting back to mine as his hand tapped on his upraised visor. "My data-feed has returned information detailing two groups of five hostiles apiece converging on your Ebon Hawk.

I wasn't gonna react to that. Maybe the sent was right, but that docking bay wasn't a bad spot to defend. Between Onasi and the old man, they should be able to stand guard with minimal casualties.

A slight twitch on his face, like the stranger picked I wasn't buying his intel. His thin lips curved. "I have my suspicions on who these hostiles are, Canderous Ordo. If I am correct, they are specialized assassins from the Lord of the Sith himself."

Was Harten Itera looking to get rid of me? If he was working against Revan, I couldn't see why he'd bother using words - especially as I was wounded and separated from my team already. Easier to just shoot me in the head right now.

I let my eyes travel slowly down his busk-leather armour, pausing on a pair of fancy beast-hide boots before drawing back up to meet his pale gaze.

"Specialized assassins." I snorted in disparagement. "And what, exactly, are you?"

"No one of import." His bland smile widened, before his head tilted to face upwards. "But I am willing to inform Revan of your whereabouts. Assuming she still lives."

"She lives," I grunted in irritation. But still, my attention swung unerringly to the open hatch topside. If Revan was alive and well, I'd expect her to be yelling something down at me if she didn't just magically jump- And then what? Walk the krifffing long way 'round while I limp behind? That railing was as bust as my grapple, and it wasn't like this krifffing battle-suit boasted a jet-pack. I'd have to find an alternate route to join up with Revan, and she was in a hurry to get to Bastila before the princess killed more of their laandur Republic-

I glared back at the annoying stranger. "You wanna talk to Revan, huh? How? You planning on scarpering around quick enough to catch up to her?"

"I thought I would climb the walls." He was still smiling, like it was all a krifffing joke. "I shall spend no more time convincing you, Canderous Ordo. Your actions are your own."

I had no reason to trust this guy's intel - but ulterior motives or not, if it weren't for him I wouldn't be having this debate right now.

My hands roved along the util belt of my suit. Stim system was erroring. Grapple was krifffed - of course. Armour had gaps along a forearm and shoulder, and I'd have to ditch the entire left leg carapace.

But I still had blasters, a blade, and a drukload of grenades. That would make me more effective at ambushing a bunch of ole Malak's assassins from behind, rather than slowing Revan down and firing ineffectual lasers at those haar'chak droids-

"Give the Wookiee your disruptor," I barked. The stranger had already moved to the wall, as if he'd given up on me answering. He turned, visor now pushed down and occluding his face. I scowled. "Tell Revan where I've gone. Tell her how to disable the battle-droids. An' if all you want is a krifffing conversation, then there ain't no reason you can't hand over your rifle to Carpet. Might buy you some trust before one of them tries to lop your head off."

If Revan was injured - and I hadn't forgotten Rosh's shout of alarm - then I didn't think either Rosh or Tinhead would be particularly receptive to a stranger's company. But I'd seen this unknown sent disable two droids in under a minute, and knew it was an advantage my side needed.

The pretend Mando'aide gave me a slow nod. "I shall consider your request, Canderous Ordo." His voice turned almost formal. "And I will inform your leader of your survival and destination."

He turned, metres away from me now, and placed one hand on the shiny wall.

The man began to climb.

I blinked. Sent rose quickly, like he had suckers on his naked hands - although I coulda sworn they'd been covered in the same busk-leather as the rest of him.

*No way a Human can climb like that, like a kriffing tree-lizard-

Wasn't the time to puzzle over it. Man was a good six metres high already. But if his words held truth - and I didn't see much point in assuming they didn't - then I had to find my kolto, get to my feet, and join in the fun before Onasi got swamped. He'd be prepared for an attack, but a bunch of specialized assassins might be a whole different skillet of scalefish from what he was expecting.

*I swore I'd see this to the end with you, Revan."

She lived, still. No point thinking otherwise without proof. Not here.

But I guess the 'Hawk is part of your end, ain't it?

It chafed, to be slowly climbing to my feet, stabbing two kolto 'derms in my exposed thigh and one in my neck, before turning to face the corridors that would lead back to the dock.

But a true warrior understood when best to lead the vanguard, and when best to defend the base. And the sooner I got back to the 'Hawk, the sooner I could comm Revan myself.

And kick some of this 'assassin' arse.

xXx

Jaq:

Bugger this for a game of soldiers.

Toc, Min and Des made no sound as they moved through the tunnels of the Star Forge. Behind me, Ran was just as silent. Slayers never made a sound until it was too late.

Slayers are never sent on a frontal assault like a kriffing squad of soldiers.

Data-feed had pinged us the docking location of our target. The ventral officer's dock. We'd all thought Ros, Bor, and Yal had been wasting their time, heading that direction soon as ole greaseball Nox released us; but turned out those three might've already scored the home-run.

The other five- who knew? Probably they'd meet us when we all regrouped, bending knee to Sharlan Nox as he slimed over the winners.

Bitches. We're nothing but Sharlan's bitches now. Lord Jonn at least gave us purpose, used our strengths, didn't turn us into a special-ops covey, no more than a herd of grunts-

Rogue thoughts had been creeping into my mind for months, now. Like spice eroding a matrix of purpose. Sure, I enjoyed kicks the same as any other slayer- shot of glim-laced spice, willing piece of arse, glass of sweet single-malt whiskey - but only off-duty.

When in the game, my mind was focused. Should be focused, honed like a gleaming shiv.

All slayers had been shaped in the Force-hands of Lord Jonn: recreated in his image, moulded into weapons for his higher purpose.

But Jonn Dan's dead. Entrails splattered all over the command deck of Darth Malak's Invictus. Jonn Dan's kriffing higher purpose can rot in a Corellian nether-hell-

::Alright, Jaq?:: Ran's voice shot through my helm. Individual feed-only, and I was glad of that- but he must've picked something up- maybe my stance wasn't exact, maybe my gloved hands had clenched- something had raised his instincts.

Wasn't the first time, either.

"I'm fine," I shot back shortly. "Let's haul arse to the dock already. Maybe Ros and the others left us a mark."

I inwardly damned that woman, that Jedi scow I'd almost turned, before I reeled my wandering thoughts back in. Turned my mind back to the lines of pazaak cards, the jump-point coordinates, the hyperdrive ticks- all the mental exercises Lord Jonn had taught us so well.

None of us had a past. Whatever we'd once been, it'd burned away in a hazing of pain as we were reborn as Lord Jonn's slayers. Renamed as his tools. Re-forged as his things, for the glory of the Sith.

Lord Jonn's bitches. Darth Malak's bitches. Sharlan kriffing Nox's bitches-

Part of me knew all those rogue thoughts belonged to a person I had been once. Someone I had no name or history to place against, someone that had died under Jonn Dan's tender ministrations.

Someone that had been silent, until that Jedi scow had waggled her dying fingers in my brain.

Ran snorted through the feed. ::Not likely there's marks left, issit? Twenty creds say the crew of the Ebon Hawk are in casserole pieces, and Ros'll make us clean up. You know how she gets.::

There was a reason slayers were sent out alone. We were assassins of shadow, whispers in the night, unseen blades to strike at the opportune moment. Lord Jonn had known that. Even Darth Malak had understood that. To be sent out like a bunch of sodding infantry-

Means they're desperate. Means they're losing. Means there's nothing kriffing keeping me here-

Slayers didn't desert. Their minds were too well-trained, grinded away to a chiselled point with no room for deviation. I'd never thought of anything beyond my master's objectives first, and my own physical gratification second. Never, until-

... Wet gasps rattled like glue in her lungs. Her blood seeped into the medi-cot, staining the white sheets almost black with her fading life. A neural inhibitor clawed into her sweaty forehead.

I would turn this one. My twelfth Jedi. Prove I could master the art of breaking as much as any other slayer.
I was close already. She had just let slip her own name - the first sound of sweet surrender.

I’d known her name before I’d netted the woman. But always better to make a captive spill. Get them to admit the intel you know, then you can squeeze out what you don’t-

There was still defiance in her dark eyes. "Sure, if you count an uncle's nephew's cousin's frakking former roommate a relation."

I allowed myself a chuckle. The woman was no threat, not with the inhibitor biting into her Force-strength. Only the strongest of will could overcome those pretty little gems- sure, I’d prefer a neural disruptor or my Fett ball, but the former was hard to come by and the latter busy recharging.

"Maybe I should comm Lord Nisotsa," I said softly, watching the woman. Slightest widening of her bloodshot eyes- no relation, indeed. "Nisotsa Organa lost her cousin Neiza. I'm sure she'll be overjoyed to hear we've snagged a Jedi cousin in our net."

...::Ros ain't answering.::: Toc's feed shot through to the four of us, all marching behind him like a kripping row of cannon fodder.

::Ros never answers.::: Min was always dismissive of Ros. Toc and Ran had a betting pool running on how long before those two jumped in the same fart sack. Now that was something I'd pay to see.

::Yeah, but I'm not getting a ping back from Bor or Yal, either.:::

"Wager's on, Ran. Twenty creds say at least one mark's still kicking," I threw in quickly. If Bor wasn't bleating on the comm - and that sucker loved to hear his own voice after a kill - then that meant they'd gone dark. Hit trouble. Were still busy, maybe, or worse-

Because this is a kripping joke. Throwing slayers together in a frontal assault. The dice are rolling and coming up skulls-

::No wager, Jaq.::: Toc was grim. He'd put himself in lead, like a corporal dragging a squad.

This isn't my game. I don't have to do this-

..."You don't have to do this," the woman gasped. She was fading in strength, now, but a semblance of inner will had returned. Earlier, I’d reduced her to broken begging, sobbing out some girlfriend's name like a benediction while she thrashed about in semi-consciousness.

"I don't have to do this," I parroted in a pleasant tone. A mini blow-torch rolled in my hand. Ran's favourite way of breaking, he claimed. "I want to do this."

"I don't frakking believe that," she mumbled, shaking her head wildly enough that her messy topknot slithered on the stark sheets like a sandsnake. Beya Organa had a drawling accent, from one of those colonial Outer Rim rocks, and her dark skin and dark eyes looked nothing like Lord Nisotsa. Hard to believe they were related. "I know about you slayers. No more than a herd of frakking hessi, broken to some Dark Jedi's will. Doesn't mean you can't get out. Live your own frakking life-"
I snorted, leaning forward with the torch. "Typical Jedi, always trying to show some loser the light. I've got a different light to show you, Beya Organa. One your cousin knows well."

"The Jedi's lips pulled back in a snarl. "I'll show you my frakking light first!"

An explosion in my head, a shattering of everything as I reeled back-

She's overcome the kriffing inhibitor! I lurched towards her, but was suddenly blinded, as the damn woman clawed fangs into my mind-

You will release me, slayer. You are no match for the Force.

The pain was intense. Someone was screaming, and it wasn't my tortured captive.

You-

A blinding vortex of light- a rushing sensation of feeling- like a grid; no, a matrix, no- threads and threads of energy spreading out everywhere-

A stunned moment of wonderment from my companion. You- frakk! You can touch the Force!

I opened my eyes, and saw her.

...::Ina's group will meet us outside the dock,:: Toc's barked comm brought me back to the present. ::The ten of us will enter together.::

::If there's a Jedi in the mix-:: Min began.

::Neutralize::: Toc's command back was stern. Like an order. Maybe he'd been a kriffing officer in his past life. ::We'll worry about turning them later.::

They would turn me, if they only knew. And sooner or later, someone would find out.

Secrets rarely made it to the grave.

::Lord Nox will suck the juice out of any Jedi before we get a chance to turn 'em,:: Ran muttered.

Lord Nox will suck the juice out of me if he finds out. That slime-ball had paused in front of me, earlier, before greasing on my helm. Maybe he'd sensed something, suspected something.

I still didn't know if I believed that Jedi scow, but if she had been telling the truth-

...::You can't go back, you know. You're like me.

I'm not like you. I'm not kriffing like you!

I didn't know if I was saying the words or thinking them. I couldn't feel my own body. Just this overwhelming sensation of light and energy spiralling like clusters of stardust all around me.

And one dying cluster, brighter than the rest, but slowly fading-

My prisoner. Or was I hers? Trapped within this golden web of life, I felt myself falling, floating, flying- and living through even one more heartbeat like this felt so exquisite, so painful, so beautiful-

Guess it was buried deep in you, slayer. If the Force doesn't awaken before puberty, it generally never does. Look. You are more than just a tool of the Sith.

She reached out, and dragged me with her.

...

::Jaq?::

I'd paused, falling behind Ran.

See, slayers didn't pause. Slayers didn't desert.

But slayers didn't march together like a line of bantha to the slaughter.

Kriff this. I'm more than just a kriffing tool. Kriff this for a buggering game of buggering soldiers.

"I'm gonna find a vent," I spat through the comm, turning on my heel. "There's always air-con ducts. I'm gonna come in from the roof."

I was running back, running away, deserting- I didn't know who I was anymore, but kriff all of this if I was gonna keep marching on like trained little Jaq or Toc or Ran-

::The ducts leading into the officer's dock are too small, Jaq, you saw the schematics!::

::Jaq, get back in line!::

"I'm going dark, team. Bet I get the first kill." The lies slipped from my lips so easily. Mark of a good slayer, when the lies sounded like the truth. "You know we work best alone. Don't wait for me- fifty creds say I'll be there before any of you."

I deactivated the comm-feed as I dived into a service lift.

...

Look. The Force. It is everywhere around you.

The intensity of an electric current shot through me- my mind- my body- I didn't know. Everything felt exposed, raw to the touch, hyper-sensitive. It was too much. Too much. Too much for me to handle.

The Force is in everything. It is in you.

With a violent wrench, I could suddenly feel the trappings of my body again. I lurched to her-

...

Whatever that Jedi scow had upended in my mind, it'd disappeared with her death by my hands.

First death I'd shed tears over. At the end, I no longer knew if I'd been close to turning her, or she turning me.

I hadn't felt that sensation, the one she claimed was the Force, since.
But rogue thoughts kept slipping through my mind, breaking the facade of Jaq. Reminding me that I had been someone else, once, someone who'd died in Jonn Dan's hands.

Maybe, someone I could find my way back to.

Down, down, I ran to the lower levels. Discarding sections of assassin armour along the way: the helm, the carapace, the tracking-comm module, even the Fett ball- until there was nothing left but a man in his skivvies, with nothing left to mark him as a tool named Jaq.

Down to the factory bays. Striding confidently into the public 'fresher stalls-

"Who're you?"

One lone occupant. Garbed in a flight suit, flight helm on the bench as he sanitized his hands under the clean-spray.

The pazaak cards were flipping over in my favour, now.

I threw the sent an easy smile. "Just suiting up. You don't wanna know what happened to my other flightsuit. Say, why aren't you hot in the skies?"

The mark scowled. "Factory airlocks slammed down on the last two squads, and maintenance still ain't got them open." Suspicion reared in the man's swarthy face. "Whaddaya mean, your suit? And where's the one you're changing into?"

You're standing in it.

Slayers didn't need a weapon to kill. We were that quick- and that good.

A few minutes later one of the closed stalls held a body, and I became a Sith strikefighter pilot.

The keycard access had the location of my snub, and told me my new name. Holo-pic might not look much like me, though at least the man had been the same species. The name on the keycard would do, for now.

Atton Rand.

It was a better name than Jaq.

With a jaunty whistle, I snapped the flight helm around my head, and waltzed towards the nearby factory bay in search of my new ship.

Sooner or later the airlocks would open, and when they did, I would be just another Sith chump fleeing the burning nest.

    xXx

HK-47:

Input - Master: "I'm fine."
Voice Stress Analysis: Pained

Input - Yudan Rosh: "Clearly, you are not."
Voice Stress Analysis: Aggrieved

Visual/Thermal Tracking: Yudan Rosh Injecting Kolto Hypoderm Into Master (Left Hip)
Sensor Scan:
Target: Master
...Physical Analysis: Disruptor Wounds: Moderate Damage To Left Shoulder, Minor Damage To Left Hip, Superficial Damage To Right Lower Limb, Organic Breathing Patterns Strained
...Infrared Analysis: Minor Blood Loss Noticeable
...Body Language Analysis: Tense, Breathless
...Location: Slumped Against Maintenance Duct
Conclusion: Master Has Sustained Minor Injuries To Organic Shell, Winded

Visual/Thermal Tracking: Zaalbar Applying Bacta Adhesive Dressing To Master (Upper Left Shoulder)

Input - Master: "Zaalbar, Yudan, stop- stop fussing. We need to get back to Canderous."

Input - Yudan Rosh: "Fussing?"
Voice Stress Analysis: Cold

Input - Zaalbar (Shyriiwook): "Jen, we must attend to your wounds first."

Input - Yudan Rosh: "I will go after Ordo when I am certain you will not die due to a damn droid."

Output: "Interjection: The master's injuries are minor and healing expeditiously. Observation: Master, your inferior flesh responds nicely to kolto injections. If you continue in your sentimental refusal of cybernetic implants, my recommendation is an internal kolto applicator housed within your organic shell. Rumination: This may take some expertise to adequately install without biological rejection."

Input - Master: "I'm just winded from Zaalbar's throw into the wall. Zaalbar, your- your arm..."
Voice Stress Analysis: Concerned

Visual/Thermal Tracking: Yudan Rosh Activating Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device

Sensor Scan:
Target: Zaalbar
...Physical Analysis: Disruptor Damage: Severe Damage To Right Upper Limb, Minor Damage To Lower Torso, Organic Breathing Patterns Strained
...Infrared Analysis: Moderate Blood Loss Noticeable, Body Temperature Within Normal Wookiee Parameters
...Body Language Analysis: Tense, Minor Involuntary Shaking Present
Conclusion: Zaalbar Moderately Injured, Organic Shock Possible

Input - Zaalbar (Shyriiwook): "I am capable of continuing on, Jen."

Input - Master: "You took two disruptor bolts for me, Zaalbar. One of which would've pegged me straight in the chest. Your life-debt-"

Input - Yudan Rosh (interrupting): "Ordo's communicator is down."

Input - Master: "Sithspit! Zaalbar, dammit, take a kolto 'derm- Yudan, open the frelling door and see if-"

Visual/Thermal Tracking: Outer Hatch Opening Combat Mode Initiated
Physical: Primary Blaster Primed

1 Organic Meatbag Entering Targeting Area

Target Analysis: Organic Meatbag
Identification: Jolee Bindo

Combat Mode Aborted

Input - Master: "Jolee? What are you doing here? Have you seen Canderous?"
Voice Stress Analysis: Surprised

Auditory Input: Growl
Source: Zaalbar

Input - Jolee Bindo: "Eh, the Mandalorian is fine. Well, his armour's half-broken and he's got a nasty limp, but I guess it's all a matter of perspective, right?"

Input - Zaalbar (Shyriiwook) (muttered): "Only droids are scentless."

Input - Master: "But why are you here? And what are you wearing?"

Sensor Scan:
Target: Jolee Bindo
...Visual Analysis: Customized Duramesh And Busk-leather Armour
...Infrared Analysis: Body Temperature Falls Within Human Parameters
...Body Language Analysis: Relaxed
Conclusion: Jolee Bindo Has Acquired Alternate Armour, Detail Irrelevant

Input - Zaalbar (Shyriiwook): "Only droids, and the Faceless One."

Auditory Input: Chuckle
Source: Jolee Bindo

Input - Jolee Bindo: "Should have known I couldn't fool a nose from Kashyyyk."

Visual/Thermal Tracking: Jolee Bindo Spreading Arms In Supplication

Input - Jolee Bindo To Master: "I wish to continue our conversation from the Shadowlands."

Auditory Input: Growl
Source: Zaalbar

Input - Zaalbar (Shyriiwook): "Jen, this is not Jolee Bindo."
Voice Stress Analysis: Alarmed

Visual/Thermal Tracking: Yudan Rosh Activating Lightsaber

Sensor Scan:
Target: Jolee Bindo
...Species: Human, Male
...Facial Recognition Result: Positive: Jolee Bindo
...Electromagnetic Scan: No Devices Found
...Body Language Analysis: Relaxed, Calm
...Direct Threat Assessment: Minimal
Conclusion: No Photo-Electronic Field Generator Detected, Sentient Matches Organic Form Of Jolee Bindo
Conclusion: Zaalbar Is Acting With Meatbag Irrationality

Facial Analysis: Jolee Bindo To HK-47: Suspicious Frown

Hypothesis: Jolee Bindo Detected Electromagnetic Scan
Conclusion: Jolee Bindo Lacks Required Sensors, Hypothesis Discarded

Input - Master To Jolee Bindo: "Oh."
Voice Stress Analysis: Comprehending

Input - Master To Jolee Bindo: "Here? Seriously? On the sodding Star Forge?"
Voice Stress Analysis: Irritated

Audio Tracking: Growl
Source: Zaalbar

Input - Master: "Zaalbar, Yudan, stand down. Rulan, you can wait. I need to find Canderous first."
Voice Stress Analysis: Resolute

Accessing: Internal Dictionary
...Analyzing
Parameter "Rulan", No Matches Found

Input - Jolee Bindo: "Canderous Ordo has returned to your freighter. He has sustained only minor injuries, but both his communicator and armour suit are badly damaged."
Voice Analysis Mismatch: Vocal Depth Out Of Range From Recorded Match: Jolee Bindo

Hypothesis: Sentient Is Posing As Jolee Bindo Error: No Photo-Electronic Field Detected To Mask Organic Build Conclusion: Organic Voice Is Decaying With Sentient Age, Hypothesis Discarded

Visual/Thermal Tracking: Yudan Rosh Moving To Outer Hatch

Input - Yudan Rosh: "All I see below is the rubble of deactivated droids."

Input - Jolee Bindo: "I have no reason nor desire to dally in untruths with you. As a token of my good faith, allow me to gift your Wookiee with my disruptor rifle. There are further battle-droids ahead, and the quickest way to deactivate them is-"

Output: "Evaluation: a clear disruptor charge aimed eight centimetres below the cessation of the neck segment will disperse through the titaplate armour and disable the thermal motivator located in the chest cavity. Mockery: I have already ascertained that, Doddering Fossil. Perhaps you would like to return after we have eliminated our remaining enemies, and inform us how best to kill them, too?"

Visual/Thermal Tracking: Jolee Bindo Appraising HK-47

Input - Jolee Bindo To Master: "Interesting droid you have there, Jen Sahara."

Input - Master To Jolee Bindo: "You might as well call me Revan. And change your frelling face, alright? I'll give you five minutes to say whatever is so damn important to you."

Input - Jolee Bindo: "Very well."
Visual/Thermal Tracking: Jolee Bindo Is Transforming Organic Shape

Parameters Recalibrating: Jolee Bindo Does Not Match Jolee Bindo

#Alarm: Unknown Meatbag In Targeting Area

Permanent Reference Removed: Jolee Bindo
Temporary Alias Assigned: Mutating Somatic

Sensor Scan:
Target: Mutating Somatic
...Species: Human, Male
...Facial Recognition Result: Negative
...Electromagnetic Scan: No Devices Found
...Body Language Analysis: Relaxed, Calm
...Direct Threat Assessment: Unable To Compute
Conclusion: Undetectable Technology Is Dissimulating Mutating Somatic

Deeper Electromagnetic Scan Initiated: Target: Mutating Somatic

Input: Mutating Somatic To HK-47: "Stop that."

Facial Analysis: Mutating Somatic To HK-47: Forbidding Glare Body Language Analysis: Mutating Somatic: Tense

Conclusion: Mutating Somatic Detected Electromagnetic Scan

Direct Threat Assessment: Moderate
Combat Mode Ready
Physical: Arming Disruptor Pistol

Input - Mutating Somatic To Master: "Is your droid going to be a problem, Revan?"

Output: "Observation: I am not a problem, you useless organic meatbag! You and your lack of any detectable technology or parameter matches are the problem!"

Input - Yudan Rosh To Master: "Revan. This wastes time. We should find Ordo, or move on."

Input - Master To Mutating Somatic: "Four minutes. Start by convincing me why Canderous would have returned to the 'Hawk."

Input - Mutating Somatic To Master: "I informed him of two groups of hostiles converging on your freighter. As he is separated from you and ill-equipped to defend against battle-droids, he has returned to where he can be of further assistance."

Input - Master To Mutating Somatic: "Okay, say I buy that. Cut to the chase. What do you want?"

Input - Mutating Somatic To Master: "In the complex below I disabled five battle-droids and saved the life of your ally. Canderous Ordo can confirm this when you next speak. In return for my assistance, my organization politely request that you meet with them when your business on the Star Forge is concluded."

Indirect Threat Assessment: Probable

Output: "Analysis: My vernacular interpretation construes that as a threat. Permission to blast him, Input - Master To Mutating Somatic: "Why? I am not Darth Revan, Rulan Prolik. Our alliance no longer exists."

Permanent Name Assigned: Rulan Prolik To Mutating Somatic

Input - Rulan Prolik To Master: "If you recall our alliance, then you recall more than just your name."
Voice Stress Analysis: Speculative

Input - Master To Rulan Prolik: "No. Other remnants of my past have... enlightened me, shall we say. I have no memory of any dealings with your kind, other than the shindig on Rii'shn and our charming little chat in the forest. I am not the Sith Lord who worked with you in the past."

Input - Rulan Prolik To Master: "I comprehend that you no longer lead the Sith Empire, Revan. What my organization desires are answers-

Input - Master To Rulan Prolik (interrupting): "I suffered severe brain damage followed by a personality replacement. Exactly what answers do you expect me to have?"
Voice Stress Analysis: Forbidding

Input - Rulan Prolik To Master: "All I request is a conversation between friends, Revan. No threats, no danger, no trap. I once told you the purpose of my organization. Do you remember?"
Facial Analysis: Master To Rulan Prolik: Hard Stare

Input - Master To Rulan Prolik: "Stability of the galaxy."
Voice Stress Analysis: Monotone

Input - Rulan Prolik To Master: "Yes. You convinced us, once, of something greater than the Mandalorian Clans threatening that stability. Even if you have no recollection, a Force-user with your strength might still have a critical part to play in future events. Or, perhaps, one day your memories will return. Either way, my organization wishes to remain, at the very least, an amicable associate with reciprocal interests."

Visual/Thermal Tracking: Rulan Prolik Handing Disruptor Rifle To Zaalbar

Input - Rulan Prolik To Zaalbar: "Here. Take this. You may find it difficult to use with your injury, but a disruptor is your best offense against a battle-droid."

Input - Zaalbar To Rulan Prolik (Shyriiwook): "I am capable of wielding a weapon, Faceless One."
Voice Stress Analysis: Wary

Input - Master To Rulan Prolik: "You make a lot of assumptions regarding my survival, Rulan Prolik. Both from this place, and from a Republic victory. I can't even say I'll be around long enough to meet up for a play date."

Visual/Thermal Tracking: Rulan Prolik Shrugging
Body Language Analysis: Rulan Prolik: Indifferent

Input - Rulan Prolik To Master: "My organization watches the possibilities of many futures, Revan Freeflight. However, a victory for you on the Star Forge does not necessarily denote your fate in the hands of the Republic."
Input - Master To Rulan Prolik: "What do you mean?"
Voice Stress Analysis: Wary

Input - Rulan Prolik To Master: "I sent your Mandalorian back to help defend your freighter. But there are more... anonymous ways to leave this place than the ship you came in on. You may be aware there are three officer docking bays in the Star Forge. All have a handful of strikefighters still docked within them; modified ships that belong to Sith officers or Dark Jedi. And by modified, I am referring to a stealth technology that the Republic Fleet cannot decrypt."

Input - Master To Rulan Prolik: "You think I should leave in one of them."

Input - Rulan Prolik To Master: "It is merely an option I offer, in the name of our future association. I have encoded all remaining docked strikefighters to activate upon the vocal passphrase 'nexus'."

Input - Yudan Rosh: "That is in particularly poor taste."

Input - Rulan Prolik To Yudan Rosh: "Is it? I thought it fitting."

Accessing: Internal Dictionary
...Analysing

Output: "Analysis: Reference: 'nexus'... a connected series; the core or centre of a matter or situation. From the literal definition, such a comparison to meatbag's strikefighter may appear disproportionate. However, as this is a proposed escape vehicle for my master, and may even be the vessel that assures her survival, it can certainly be considered a core or central factor."

Input - Yudan Rosh To Rulan Prolik: "And what is the deactivation passphrase? 'Invictus'?"
Voice Stress Analysis: Sarcastic

Output: "Mockery: Apathetic Fleshbag, do be quiet."

Input - Master: "Obviously I'm missing some historical reference."
Voice Stress Analysis: Wry

Input - Rulan Prolik To Master: "At this juncture in time, it is truly nothing of import."

Input - Master To Rulan Prolik: "Alright, you've passed along your friendly request. Unless you're planning to stick around and help me, I don't think there's anything further to say. I'll think about meeting your... organization, once I've finished with slightly more pressing matters. You know, Malak. The Forge. The space battle raging outside around us."

Input - Rulan Prolik To Master: "I shall leave the current battles to your capable talents, Revan Freeflight. Just do not forget my organization in the midst of victory. Your ally owes me his life, and a conversation is a small price to even the scales. My overseers are not fond of waiting."

Output: "Reiteration: Definitely a threat, master. Hypothesis: Mutating Somatic will be unable to transform shape after his neck is crushed. Shall we test this theory, master?"

Input - Rulan Prolik To Master: "Let me reassure you, once more, that my organization is no threat to your person, Revan Freeflight. Consider this, instead, a promise. If you do not seek us out within three months, one of our agents will find you instead."

Visual/Thermal Tracking: Rulan Prolik Moving To Outer Hatch
Input - Rulan Prolik To Master: "One last matter for you to take into account. My organization can offer you amnesty, Revan. Something the Republic will not. Your memory may be incomplete, but you know enough about us to have some understanding of our resources. We would prefer to think of you as a friend, and friends help each other out. So - until we meet again, Revan Freeflight."

Visual/Thermal Tracking: Rulan Prolik Exiting Targeting Area

Input - Yudan Rosh: "His organization does not sound like one you wish to be indebted to. Although I suppose one could argue it is preferable to public execution."

Input - Master (muttered): "We should go. Bastila is near. Then... then Malak. Sometimes, I feel like I'm just... just..."

Input - Yudan Rosh To Master: "Rushing in recklessly without a plan? In that respect, Revan, you behave a lot like how you were before the Mandalorian Wars."

Input - Master To Yudan Rosh: "Just with a few more battle scars and wrinkles, I guess."

Input - Yudan Rosh To Master: "Well, your species is not renowned for aging gracefully."
Voice Stress Analysis: Droll

Auditory Input: Laugh
Source: Master

Input - Master To Yudan Rosh: "Fighting words, Yudan. Next time we spar I'll show you just how well I've aged."
Voice Stress Analysis: Amused

Output: "Repetition: Again, master, my programming compels me to remind you that cybernetic implants do not suffer from decay due to any organic aging-"

Input - Zaalbar (Shyriiwook) (interrupting): "Do not despair, Jen. Bastila will listen to you. You are her bond sister. All you need to do is communicate."

Visual/Thermal Tracking: Master Moving To Inner Hatch

Output: "Commentary: Communication can come in a variety of forms. With Force-users, some of my favourites include grenades, sonic screamers, cluster rockets, and plasma charges. Mines are also effective, since many Force-users will run to meet you in hand-to-hand combat. Silly Force-users."

Visual/Thermal Tracking: Zaalbar Readying Disruptor Rifle
Visual/Thermal Tracking: Zaalbar And Yudan Rosh Moving To Inner Hatch

Input - Yudan Rosh: "Interesting this droid was programmed by you, Revan, considering his opinions on how to eliminate Force-users."

Output: "Statement: I speak from experience as much as programming, Apathetic Fleshbag. Recitation: When it comes to Force-users, weapon selection is critical. If I see one more idiot attacking a Jedi face-on with a blaster pistol, then I'll kill them myself."

Input - Master: "Enough, HK. Ready your disruptor, and let's go finish off these battle-droids."

Visual/Thermal Tracking: Master Opening Inner Hatch Output: "Statement: With pleasure, master."

xXx

Chapter End Notes

Coming up next: Things get real down by the Ebon Hawk, and Revan faces Bastila.

A Sith Lord's flagship worth of thanks to kosiah for the beta.

Beya Organa belongs to kosiah's 'verse in her sagas 'Memory' and 'Oblivion'. Thank you for letting me borrow her, kos – even if Beya didn't survive here, at least she's responsible for the birth of Atton Rand. I think that's a good thing, lol!

Props to anyone who spotted the line Beya blatantly stole from the Star Wars spoof 'Spaceballs'. Obviously it's not mine, disclaimer disclaimer etc etc.
Carth Onasi:

The same charged readiness from earlier had settled once more throughout the docking bay. From my vantage point in the corner, I could spot Ensign Joss marking the hatch, ducking behind a discarded refuelling gig as he kept his sights firmly on the one point of entry.

We were both a good thirty metres away, but we'd still be the first to hit enemy fire.

Corporal Tensey had set two proximity mines either side of the internal exit hatch, set to trigger the moment anyone stepped through. The prox mines might be enough to startle any incoming hostiles, give us all a chance to fire off a few quick shots-

Those blasted energy shields, though. Standard military issue would resist four direct blaster bolts, but the first wave of Sith bastards had taken more heat than that before they'd fallen. I'd hit that last one standing at least seven times before Mission's rogue shot had scored through his shield.

And Mission herself was far too exposed, her and Dustil both-

She's as safe as can be. Dustil's guarding her, and he's invisible.

My worry for them both was a sick thing, twisting in my guts.

::I'm moving to the roof of the 'Hawk.:: It was Jolee's voice, crackling through the ear bud linked to my wrist-comm. ::Seems our best bet to take these vermin down from a distance is Tobosh. I'll make sure nothing hits him.::

I kept my gaze tight on the hatch as I considered his words. Jolee's strength was neutralized if he came within reach of any Force-nullifying tech, and he was right about Tobards-

::Er, it's Tobards.:: Ensign Tobards corrected. First thing we'd done was synchronize the pilots' comms with the Hawk's. ::And I've got good cover up here. I don't want anyone drawing attention to me.::

I could understand the ensign's reluctance, but the moment he ducked into view he'd be vulnerable.

::Ach, you get hit, Tobosh, and we've lost our best marksman. If I'm standing pretty near you, they'll be too busy aiming at me.::

::Tobards,:: Tobards muttered again.

"It's a good idea," I weighed in. "It won't take long for professionals to sight the source of blaster bolts, Tobards, no matter how good your cover is. Jolee can use the Force to stop you taking any fire. We need you protected."
There was another ghost of static in my ear. ::Guys, Teethree says there's something heading down the transport corridors towards us. Five minutes away, he reckons::

::What?: I clipped out as my gut tensed. ::Mission, I need a little more detail:::

Something coming- that seemed blasted ominous, given our current predicament.

::Well, if Psycho-Droid hadn't shot up all the cams, then Teethree might actually have visual::: Mission snarked back.

::Explain:: I demanded. ::Where's the astromech getting this from?:

::I got Teethree to slice into logistical command, see if he could track any hatch openings. Give us a warning of anything coming, maybe. Whoever it is, they're definitely headed this way:::

"Alright," I said quietly. There was a preternatural calm settling over me, now, as I focused hard on the exit. "Everyone, stand ready."

::Uh:: Dustil's voice was hesitant. He'd never been afraid to speak up, when he was a kid. Now, he only did when he was angry about something. ::Mission, if Teethree can- uh, do you think he can hack into the air-con controllers:::

::Sure. Why:::

::It's just- in Dreshdae, well, Mex used to- I mean, in the early days, when all we wanted to do was leave, but of course we couldn't, and it wasn't like we could do anything in the Academy itself:::

::Dustil:: I cut in. I hated the way he second-guessed himself. If I could see Korriban destroyed, one day, I'd throw a damn party. ::Spit it out:::

::Mekel would slice into the Czerka atmo regulators back in Dreshdae, and sometimes we'd blow the conduits up. A way of rebellion, I guess. We stopped- we stopped after:::

He trailed off. I didn't have time to wallow in bleakness over what my son had endured. When I was a kid, our way of railing against authority had been nothing worse than insipid holo-graffiti that didn't hold up against a sani-clean. "Someone died," I finished for my son in a quiet voice.

::Yeah:: he whispered. ::Some trader. We only meant to cause material damage, but:::

::Lemme see what Teethree says!:: Mission interrupted. Seemed even she knew that now was hardly the time for a heart-to-heart. I would've liked to assure Dustil that it wasn't his fault, everything he'd had to go through, been forced to participate in-

My mouth etched into grimness, and I deliberately flat-lined my thoughts. First, we had to get everyone out.

::If you go blowing bits of this place up the moment someone walks past- eh, how can that bucket-droid even tell if it's a friendly or hostile::: Jolee's concern might've had some weight, if the prox mines weren't already primed with the same anonymity.

Besides, I'd already tried hailing Revan with no success. "We'll get a transmit from the others if they're on their way back, Jolee."

No answer meant they were busy. Just like us.

I chanced a quick look down at my wrist, pinging the status of the crew comm-links. Seven of the remaining eight wrist-communicators from the 'Hawk were currently deployed, the droids having their own inbuilt comms, and Zaalbar, as customary, refusing to clip anything around his shaggy wrist.

My gut lurched. One of the wrist-comms was black.

::Yeah, he can do it!:: Mission enthused over the airwaves. ::Better yet, there's an air-temp alternator just outside. Teethree can set it to overload when the hatch is opened!::

::That could trigger the mines:: Corporal Tensey murmured. ::Might make a decent enough explosion to go straight through their energy shields. Will likely render the hatch inoperable, though.::

Ordo. It was his comm-link that had faded into inactivity on the tiny screen. Ordo's down.

::Then we hope there's only one lot of bad guys left, right?:: Mission sounded so damnably optimistic. If she thought of checking the comm-

"Do it, Mission," I ordered tersely, wrenching my gaze back to the hatch. A dead wrist-comm didn't mean anything. A crew member could just as easily go down with their comm still active. And- Mission's had blacked out in the Shadowlands, when she'd run into Dark Jedi-

Ordo's failed signal told me nothing other than that his wrist-communicator had been damaged. Revan was still out there, still active, and I wasn't going to believe any of the crew had fallen while she still led the way.

She'd make it out. She promised. And after all of this, we could finally start thinking about a future.

::Done:: Mission confirmed. Her voice was breathless. ::Just in time, 'cause they're right outside-::

I started firing the second the hatch opened.

xXx

Inon Daelidar:

Star Forge High Command was a salient fusion of contemporary technology and the archaic. Our starships were superior to any in both breadth and manoeuvrability but, as Fleet Commander, I was reliant on a row of ancient flat screens as my only guide to what was actually manifesting in the skies.

I might be copacetic about our current fleet advantage, but the antiquated surveillance was nothing short of irritating. There was no excuse for my predecessor to have overlooked something so basic as installation of holo-topographies and a semi-decent sector surveillance matrix.

Her incompetence led to her end. Just another smear of Lord Malak's wrath marring the command floor. That would not be my path. Fleet Commander of the Star Forge was a coveted position, even with its inherent dangers - but I knew how to placate our tempestuous lord.

I knew how to win battles.

The glower stayed fixed on my face as I perused the line of consoles blinking delayed snub location and health status back to me.
"Reactor core explosion detected on the Lightstar, General!"

I didn't allow my fierce expression to slip, not even an inch. All the officers milling around this command deck were incompetent clods who responded best to fear; frankly, trying to implement a sound battle strategy within the limitations of poor fleet data and maladroit staff had been challenging at best.

The Lightstar, though. That's Adashan down.

Inexperience amongst the Sith brass aside, the EMP scrambler had gifted us the early advantage, and the famed battle meditation of our lord's latest apprentice was now driving that advantage deep into the Republic's craw.

"The Lightstar is breaking up, sir," the breathless voice of the console tech gasped out. He turned, young face staring gormlessly at me. "She's a goner!"

"Keep your eyes on the screen!" I growled.

One out of three. Oh, the words struck satisfaction deep within. Adashan, Gant, Dodonna. Three Republic fleets spearheaded each by a fossil from the Mandalorian Wars. A lifetime ago I'd fought with them. Reported to - even respected, in the case of Forn Dodonna. A lifetime ago. But all three commanders had been too cautious to grasp the opportunity Supreme Commander Revan had offered - too blind to accept the inherent weaknesses of the Republic we had once defended against a barbarian horde.

"Gen-general-"

It was damn Jha'hasi, stuttering like a tenderfoot, back again and as welcome as the scent of decomposing faecal matter. I did not turn to face him.

"Um, we- we can't get the airlocks open to release the last few squads. I can't find-"

My impatient growl stumbled the idiot back into silence. Jha'hasi hadn't been able to handle that insubordinate starpilot Troystar, the runaway from Karath's disaster who'd turned up in his A-236 in the middle of our defence formations. After that singular waste of my time, it was hardly surprising to find Jha'hasi flummoxed by a stuck airlock.

"Commodore Beso is in charge of internal defence, Lieutenant," I clipped out impatiently, still with my back to him. Beneath my fingertips, the flat-screen displayed Gant's fleet moving in to flank Dodonna's; as if one final, desperate thrust of their combined strength would punch through our defence. They lack the numbers to stand firm against our augmented armada. I could throw all squadrons at them now and cement a Sith victory. I frowned. It was a tempting proposition, but edging our craft too close to those powerful Republic dreadnoughts would accelerate our own losses - and, the simple strategy relied on the three Republic fleets being the whole of the enemy assault.

Even I had to admit Sith Intelligence had been sketchy in recent weeks; I could not conclusively assume more bugs wouldn't spit out of hyperspace beneath a fourth banner.

The Republic's attrition rate so far bordered on the extreme, and their vanguard was attenuating sharply beneath our superior fist â€“ but the shrewdest of commanders knew that, sometimes, the unbelievable could eventuate in the fires of battle if one didn't consider all possibilities.

The reports of the skirmish above Kashyyyk showcased that. Admiral Karath would have assumed victory was his for the taking, right up until his flagship ripped to pieces around him.
Without Karath, our only commander left with any modicum of experience is Admiral Sara, and she's pinned down in the Mid Rim with no reinforcements. It was a grim thought I did not have time to indulge in. Lack of qualified high command was one topic that had to be addressed with our lord, sooner or later - but without an obvious solution to present, I risked raising his ire.

"Yes, but- but General, um-"

"What?" I snapped, spinning around to glare at the floundering lieutenant.

Jha'hasi had an eye for detail and was adept on the comms, but damn if he wasn't an irritant who demanded a stupid amount of micromanaging. Once this battle had morphed into victory celebrations, I was going to think seriously about transferring him to head of Janitorial Services.

Jha'hasi had taken a wary step back. The teenage pustules on his disgusting Human face contrasted starkly against his chalk-white skin. He swallowed. "Commodore Beso told me to tell you he doesn't know what to do."

Disgust at others' incompetence was nothing new, really. It was almost a relief to let it show, even if Jha'hasi was an overwhelmingly easy mark.

"I am overseeing the defence of Lord Malak's Star Forge, our most vital resource, the very station we are standing in - and Beso dares bother me with maintenance faults?"

I was fair roaring by the end of it. Damn Beso was two weeks into the position after Commodore Jinna had smirked at Lord Malak - imbecile! - and, quite frankly, I was beginning to think a spiced-up Gamorrean would do a better job.

"General." Jha'hasi's weak chin shook, but he lifted it. "Commodore Beso is otherwise engaged with the surveillance blackout spreading through the Forge."

I could feel the twitching in my jaw. Common sense told me none of this was Jha'hasi's fault - the pathetic Human just required someone to handhold him into action â€“ but if Beso was so inadequate that he couldn't multi-task simultaneous maintenance failures, then I'd be making damn sure his head rolled after this-

"And the battle droids," Jha'hasi finished on a whisper. His gaze darted to the left and right. "Um-they're dropping fast, sir. Something or someone is disabling them â€“ and quickly. Two-thirds have already- already gone dark."

The soft words had me backpedalling into silence.

Someone's breached the Star Forge. Someone competent enough to scythe through our internal defences.

"Why isn't Beso working with Maintenance?" My words snapped out, cold and hard and showing none of the unease that Jha'hasi's report had just stoked.

It doesn't matter if all the damn droids get ripped to shreds. No one is more powerful than Lord Malak. What's the worst the Republic can do, send one of their wrinkled Jedi coots after the Lord of the Sith himself?

"Maintenance Head's missing, sir." Jha'hasi was still whispering. Easily cowed he might be, but at least the boy understood how to be circumspect. "So is his second, Corporal Kampton. A handful of other maintenance techs as well: Ensign Carly, Ensign-"
I jerked my hand upright to halt the soft diatribe. In my gut, the unease grew.

Someone's inside. Someone dangerous. Someone ignoring the fleet combat to gun straight for our lord.

Absurd, how victory could sometimes teeter on the edge of one powerful person. I'd seen it too many times - throw a Force-user into the mix, and everything could upend in the most unexpected of ways.

There is no one in the galaxy more powerful than Lord Malak. He, who toppled Lord Revan herself. It didn't matter who the miscreant was that dared broach our perimeter: Lord Malak would eliminate them in a blink. The only battle of uncertainty was in the skies, and that uncertainty was slim, indeed.

The comfort of those thoughts felt shakier than it should have.

"Tell Beso to ignore the droids and surveillance," I ordered Jha'hasi. "Find someone from maintenance - a corporal, even a damn ensign - and get them to report directly to Beso. He needs to get those airlocks open to release the last of our strikefighters."

"But- but the droids-"

"I will contact Lord Malak myself." *He will already be aware if there is any true danger. Lord Malak ordered no interruptions. Ignoring his command might have... unpleasant consequences. A text-only feed, then. Less chance of repercussions, particularly if I signed it with Beso's electronic auto-print. "If there is any internal threat of import, Lord Malak will extinguish it. We need those ships out, Lieutenant. Hop to it!"

Jha'hasi offered me a limp salute, before dipping his head and turning on his heel.

My attention drew back to the flat consoles. At a glance, the stats looked as reassuring as before: victory was at hand, it was only a matter of minimising our own casualties that I had to concern myself with. Enough time to break and send a forged comm to the Dark Lord. All was well, and the Republic's loss today would go down in the galactic archives as one of the most decisive.

Hard-edged facts, backed by the fleet data blinking at me from the antiquated consoles.

And yet, as I felt my mouth compress into a thin line of grim displeasure, I realized my satisfaction from earlier had all but vanished. All that remained was the same condescension for the incompetence that surrounded me - and a nascent, unwelcome sense of foreboding.

Sammy Tobards:

Aim, shoot.

Blighters were moving fast.

Hold. Keep the sights steady.

I'd seen one duck behind the nose of that snub a nanosec ago. I'd wait for a flicker of movement-

Double-tap.

He ducked out of sight again, but not before discharging a blaster bolt back at me. I was beginning to appreciate my Jedi defender, standing firm in front of me and slightly to the side, deflecting any heat headed my way with an upraised glow-stick and the ability to invisibly hurl grenades away before they even came close.

Wait.

I didn't think the mark would pop back into sight from the same direction, not with the way I kept hitting him. Which meant I should guard the rear of the snub, right there-

Fire.

The mark stumbled. Through the scope mod on my weapon, I saw the tell-tale crackle of an energy shield dying. Another double-tap: the body jerked, collapsed, and then stilled.

I swung my sights back over the hangar.

That was three I'd personally downed, but space knew how many - if any - had fallen when that explosion had ripped the entrance hatch clean open. One of the Sith buggers had detonated a cluster of smoke grenades, hiding them all from view at first.

I'd seen Ensign Joss fall. Pegged his murderer before moving on. Didn't know Joss well, but I'd raise a drink to him later on.

"I'll be right back," Jedi Bindo muttered. I edged back from the scope, just enough to spot the old man jumping fluidly off the edge of the freighter's roof.

Blast it! He must've had a solid reason for disappearing but, despite my earlier reluctance for his presence, I suddenly felt a heck of a lot more exposed.

I squinted back into the sights. I had to trust the Jedi, and keep focused on my own game.

Another sweep back across the hangar- there, I spotted a black figure, dropping fluidly into a crouch, aiming a rifle elsewhere-

Something scuffed softly behind me.

Footsteps, on the roof of the Ebon Hawk, coming at my back.

Too soon for it to be Bindo, who'd at least warn me of his returning presence.

It was moments like these - charged, heady moments in the thick of battle - that tested a soldier's mettle. I could unleash one, maybe multiple, hits on the unsuspecting mark below, knowing whoever was behind me only needed a second to land a killing blow.

Or I could lurch to the side, and hope to evade an enemy that already had the jump on me.

My trigger finger squeezed. Twice-

I felt the pressure before the pain. The thud against metal as I was slammed sideways into the freighter's roof, a heavy weight pinning me, a sharp stabbing pain biting deep into my shoulder-

My... shoulder?

"Got him," someone muttered.

The weight - a fully armoured body, I realized dazedly - was half-dragged away. I rolled on instinct, the sharp burn of adrenaline hastening my movement, as I ended in a crouch with no weapon in my grasp.

Staring in disbelief at the old Jedi who couldn't even get my name right.

"He was too close," the man muttered, shuffling forward to turn over the body that had been pinning me seconds ago. The Jedi began fishing through the corpse's utility belt with a practiced hand. "I had to double back, and hope I'd down the fellow before he got to you. Just give me a minute, lad."

My shoulder throbbed, deep into the bone. The grind of pain only intensified as I leaned forward, flattening myself once more against the freighter's roof, minimizing my visibility in a combat zone.

In stark contrast, the crazy old Jedi looked strangely calm as he crouched next to the dead, more concerned with the fruits of his looting than being sighted by the enemy.

_He saved my life_, I realized numbly. Didn't seem right to lecture a mystical Jedi, but part of me just wanted to push the old man flat before a rogue bolt got him straight in the chest.

My gaze caught on my discarded blaster; I leaned forward to grasp it, barely biting back a moan as a deeper shaft of pain made its way down my back. It was bad.

Not mortal, no; but bad enough to affect my aim. Bad enough I wasn't sure I'd be lifting my weapon any more today.

"Stang," I muttered under my breath, jaw clenching. Couldn't hear any noise elsewhere in the hangar, but I wasn't pinning my chances on all enemies down until I was certain. "Jedi Bindo, take my gun. It's got a specialized targeting scope modded onto it. I can't- I can't shoot like this."

"One minute," the crazy Jedi grumbled, like I was asking him to hurry out of the 'fresher. I jerked back to stare at him in disbelief.

The old man was grinning at a plasticeel ball held in his wrinkled grasp. He looked absolutely absurd.

"Uh, there's likely other Sith still out there," I hissed, still pressed taut against the ship's roof while the Jedi thumbed at a toy in his hands.

Bindo raised one bushy eyebrow at me, before tucking the ball away and lifting his arms. Making him _even more_ visible up here, and he hadn't even turned his glow-stick back on-

My whispered protest died as a gentle amber light began to glow around his fingertips.

"Yes. That's why I thought I'd heal you up so you could take 'em out. I'm a useless shot, lad."

_Lad._ I was going to be a grandpa in three months, if I managed to fly out of here, if I executed all my orders. I was-

I gasped as the back of my shoulder suddenly plunged into ice, simultaneously pricking through with needles of burning heat. The pain, though... the pain then _completely ceased._

"There." The Jedi wiggled his thick white brows, which stood starkly against the leathery brown of his skin. "That should do you for now. Get back to work, lad."

I tentatively rolled my shoulder. No discomfort, no restriction of movement- I found it impossible to believe my injury had completely vanished- I didn't even know what had caused it; a blaster or vibrosword or heck, even the old man's 'saber cutting through the Sith's body- but my shoulder felt as good as new.

It was then I remembered feeling the same weird sensation earlier, when Corporal Tensey had been guiding me to the Ebon Hawk, when I'd been crippled from that shiv to the gut in the first wave. I hadn't even thought on my previous injury since then, other than a vague surprise that no pain had stopped me-

"You healed me before," I mumbled in awe, my eyes widening. "Just like that? I'm all fixed?"

"Ach, not quite." The Jedi looked vaguely uncomfortable. "Part is just blocking out the pain receptors in your shoulder. I don't have time for much else, and doing this much is dangerous if you're stupid with it." The old man harrumphed, scratching absently at his bald head. "I can look after you proper, lad, when we're not in the thick of action. Just keep yourself as still as you can, and let's take care of these Sith first."

I shuffled forward, muttering a dazed word of gratitude as my hands reached to retrieve my fallen gun. I'd heard of Jedi miracles many a time. Never experienced them personally, though.

This was the sort of stuff you told your grandkids about. Desperate battles. Miraculous Jedi. Victory, hopefully, despite the odds.

My gaze narrowed through the scope as I once more shifted into a sniping position.

"Can you... can you sense any hostiles around?" I whispered, not budging from the sights. That was a Jedi skill, I thought. Being able to see people... except not with the eyes.

"No," he said quietly at my back. "Their fandangled trinkets kill the Force around 'em, meaning all they'd be is a..."

The old man trailed off as I began another visual sweep of the hangar. There was a fresh black-clad body next to the second Sith snub - I saw the captain's son pull something from the corpse's belt, rub at it briefly, before tucking whatever he'd found away in a pocket. Funny, it was exactly what the old man had done.

"...a null patch of Force," Jedi Bindo was muttering. "Aye, she always said it was the absence she could pick up on. Huh, and these buggers are using tech that nullifies the Force for metres, so surely I should be able to..."

I blinked, and the Onasi boy had vanished from my sights. He must've moved fast, to get that quick behind cover without me spotting him.

My scope moved steadily to the far wall, before trekking back again. "I can't spot anyone," I whispered. I might have to move, get into a position to sight the rear of the docking bay, in case they'd infiltrated that far. Or, maybe, this was finally it.

*The captain would be on the comm if he thought it was over. Unless he's down-

"There's three left." The Jedi was right next to me, then, lying flat as if he had a gun in his grasp, too. His words echoed strangely in my ear, and it took me a second to realize he'd opened up a comm channel. "Eh, one's underneath the darn Hawk. Someone gun for that guy. The other two have made it to the Republic birds by the airlock. Tobosh and I will get those."

I flipped around, biting back the urge to correct the Jedi as I shuffled forward. The freighter's roof was flat, but large - I had to wriggle metres forward to get a clear view.

"Not spotting anything," I whispered again, spanning my aim over the Aurek II snubfighters I'd flown in with.

"Behind the hyperdrive of the furthest one." The old man had moved with me, but he was standing, now, lightsaber back in hand. From my angle, I couldn't see the ground beyond the snubs. "They know you're up here, lad. Keep your sights fixed and I'll tell you if I sense any movement."

::The mark under the 'Hawk is down.:: Captain Onasi reported in my ear. ::It wasn't me, though.::

My gaze narrowed as my aim firmed.

_Hold._

"The remaining two are pinned behind the last starship," Jedi Bindo said over the airwaves. "Ten creds say there'll be an incoming projectile headed our way."

_Keep the sights steady. Wait for any movement._

::On it.:: The captain's response was terse. ::I'll try to draw them out.::

Blinding light flared behind the snub, then a second time; flash grenades possibly thrown by Onasi-

"One's down," Bindo muttered. "There's only one left."

A black-clad figure darted into view. I let my barrel lead the target, squeezing the trigger, as the mark turned to fire a wild shot back at us- but I knew Bindo could deflect that-

The flare of a shot landing next to me barely registered; a strangled cry of pain from my side, as I felt the old man collapse next to me.

"Bindo!" I cried, firing once more before rolling in evasion, feeling the burn of a second bolt glance off my forearm.

"Blasted- disruptor- can't deflect-" the old man wheezed. "Get- the last-"

Gun was still in my grasp. Pulling into a crouch, I saw one form standing below through a blurry gaze.

"Last one-" the old man choked.

This Sith bastard was wearing some ugly purple chest-plate, even missing armour from one entire leg. My hands firmed, and I made to depress the trigger- this hit would go straight into the bastard's un-helmed face-

"Last one's down!" Bindo gasped.

My finger twitched. At the final moment, the old man slammed a hand roughly into my leg, causing the shot to skim just above the mark's head. In turn, I could see the mark wrench a weapon in my direction, and only then did I recognize the man: that Mandalorian merc who'd left with the others earlier.

"Stang," I muttered in askance, quickly thumbing open a comm channel. "The Jedi says they're all down. Er, someone tell that Mando-" Onasi was already there, down below, striding to the Mandalorian with an upraised hand waving in my direction.

::All Sith reported down.:: the captain's voice said in my ear. ::Tobards, fix your aim back on what's left of the entrance. Mission, get Teethree monitoring the nearby hatches again. Everyone else, report in.::

"They're dead," I said with relief, feeling my shoulders sag. "It's over. You alright, Bindo?"

::On it,:: the Twi'lek kid affirmed.

::Mission and I are fine.:: the captain's son commed in. ::Saw the two Republic pilots go down. Dad, are you okay?::

"Stang, not Tensey too," I muttered, squeezing my eyes tight. I'd been her gunner for near on a year. Professional and a darn good sort, even if she did have a tendency to run her mouth after a couple of beers-

::Tobards? You marking the entrance again?:: the captain asked. ::You two alright up there?::

"Yeah, I'll be there in ten seconds. Just need to move around." Grief came later. Every grunt knew that. Sometime in the future, I'd bring Tensey back to life with a tale or two over a fresh beer. "I'm fine. Bindo-"

It was then I became aware of the ominous silence at my side.

"Jedi Bindo?" I whispered.

xXx

Revan Freeflight:

"You holding up okay?" I asked Zaalbar, after the last droid had been thrown into the corridor wall by Yudan with a devastating crunch. Hadn't taken long for HK to fire a redundant disruptor bolt into the thing's torso and claim the kill; but, frankly, we'd all stopped quibbling over the accuracy of his stats weeks ago.

Zaalbar nodded at me. The side of his furry face was matted with dried blood, sign of another injury - although this one, at least, had been glancing.

My shoulder still throbbed when I dropped the Force. We'd exhausted our remaining kolto 'derms and bacta patches - Canderous having been the one to carry most of our medkit supplies.

It'd been a risk to leave Jolee behind, considering his expertise with healing. For all I knew, though, the others back at the 'Hawk needed him more. At least it was a damn sight easier taking the droids down, now that we knew their weak spot - and were sticking to the narrow transportation tunnels.

I grimaced as my gaze gleaned over HK. One robotic limb hung sparking intermittently at his side. Good thing he was ambidextrous.

In fact, the only one of us not injured so far was Yudan - and considering the way he kept leading the charge around each corner I was putting that down to blind luck.

Luck. Skill. The Force. Whatever the reason - I'll take it.
As for Bastila - she was close, now. Very close.

"How far until the upper meditation chambers, HK?" I asked, drawing the Force in tight to minimize my presence. Up ahead, the silvery corridor veered to the left. Even here, this high in the Star Forge, the odd sigil was scratched low down on the arc of the wall. Repeating the same, obscure, message.

The Builders have upset the balance between life and death.

"Statement: The entrance to the meridian viewing chamber is around the next corner, Master."

Life wasn't the same as Light; nor was death anything more than a natural part of the survival cycle. Not to say that the Force couldn't kill, but any Jedi worth their robes knew that the light and dark sides of the Force did not simply equate to life and death.

I frowned. I didn't think it was a translation error, even if Sidi-Massassi script seemed to be a notoriously simple scripting language-

"Revan. Can you feel that?"

Yudan's low voice scythed through my thoughts; I glanced up straight into his narrowed, intense gaze.

Something malignant was crawling through the Force.

I stilled, both in mind and body, as the creeping sensation tiptoed eddies of swirling malevolence in the air around us. Slowly, slowly, increasing in strength. Not Bastila, no; this close, it was impossible to ignore the way her meditation oscillated in rays of psychic strength aimed beyond the walls of the Star Forge.

This felt more exploratory. And originated from deeper in the Forge.

Something whispered-

Revan.

In my periphery, I saw Yudan jerk with surprise.

Revan, I can sense you.

Malak. My heart stuttered, and I could feel him now- a morass of dark energy centred in the very nexus of this cursed place. Growing, magnifying, swelling in strength.

Come to me, or I shall find you.

The threat was almost a caress as it brushed against my mind.

Do you hear me? Do you remember me? A soft chuckle. I remember you. In all of your iterations. Which one is it, I wonder, that I shall finally have the pleasure of squeezing the life from?

Bravado. Mockery calculated to induce me to reach out in return; but his words had the opposite effect. I withdrew, thoughts cooling, instinct simmering into patience - for he was not my first objective.
Do you remember us, Revan? The way you used to moan beneath me? You would-

The Force thickened, tightened, and encased hard around my mind. Blocking the taunts that crawled through the air around me.

Malak would still be able to sense me, yes- but he'll stay by the kaiburr if he can lure me there, my intuition whispered. There is little time left - but there is time. Time to save Bastila, or better yet, use her-

"Revan-" Yudan's voice was choked with emotion, and the sheer oddity of that was enough to silence the crepuscular voice of my own cursed soul.

"They're both drawing on the kaiburr now," I said quietly, meeting Yudan's burning gaze. "Which might even work to our advantage. Let's go. Let's go find Bastila."

xXx

Dustil Onasi:

"Nine Sith accounted for." Ordo was sneering at a disruptor pistol he'd pulled from a corpse, before chucking the disassembled therm battery to the side. "Problem is, there should be ten."

"Where'd you get your intel?" Dad demanded. "And the others- I haven't heard from them-"

The minute Dad had commed the all-clear, I'd rushed to his side. I knew Mission was okay; I'd been marking her, somehow managed to make sure none of those bastards came close- but Dad had been right in the thick of things-

"I got separated," Ordo grunted, grabbing another mini-disruptor to pull apart. I didn't know where he'd found the time to loot the frakking dead.

"So there's one guy left," I muttered, fingers clenched tight around my 'saber hilt. Maybe those incoming marks could blank the Force out on me, but I'd had practice stabbing Sith without the Force.

Problem was, I was used to staying unseen. That frakking tech totally castrated my skills - same as old man Bindo.

My gaze slipped back to the loading ramp of the Hawk. We'd brought Jolee down from the roof, but he was in bad shape. Disruptor hit had chewed right through what looked like half the flesh on his chest. Dad had tried to get him inside after shooting him full of kolto and ceramol, but he should've stuck a tranq in the old man as well. Jolee had regained consciousness - and was as crabby as ever.

"One left - Ordo, why do you think there should be ten?" Dad asked again, before thumbing open a channel over the comm. Didn't know why he bothered, really. All the Republic pilots except that wounded marksman were dead, and Mission was still within earshot. "Mission, has Teethree picked up on anything nearby?"

::Nothing so far,:: Mission replied. She was still lying under the snub, snug in her sniping spot. I'd seen her shoot down at least one Sith, and she'd hurt another before I'd shoved my 'saber through his black heart.

Together, we'd downed our share of 'em, at least.
Killing felt too easy, these days. I remembered Mekel saying that, once, a bleak look on his face that he usually didn't let show.

"I ran into an associate of Revan's," Ordo answered at last. He threw the second weapon away in disgust. "Haar'chak disruptors. One-shot wonders before the battery completely kriffs itself."

"Associate?" Dad demanded. "What do you-

"Don't get your jockeys in a twist, Republic. Whoever the sent was, he saved my arse and took out a pretty number of battle droids at the same time. Fairly sure he ain't here gunning for Revan." The Mandalorian shrugged. "Leave her to do her job, and let's focus on ours."

::There's hatch movement.:: Mission said suddenly. I hated the unwelcome lurch in my stomach. ::Um, not sure if its headed this way yet.::

"Tobards, take point," Dad ordered into his wrist, before turning back to shoot me a hard stare. "Dustil, get-"

"Already on it," I muttered, pulling tight on the Force before inverting the weaves with a deft twist.

Just like that, and I was once more hidden to the naked eye.

Just like that. Except if Ordo was wrong, and there were another nine of those chivholes, then we were truly frakked.

Dad was striding to the side of the hangar. I saw him duck behind a refuelling gig, the same spot one of the ensigns had been in before he'd karked it. Dad swiftly dropped into a ready crouch, turning to sight the jagged hole that'd once been a hatch. I'd always thought of Dad in the skies, shooting down starships with perfect aim from behind the safety of a snub's turrets.

He seemed just as competent and calm here, fighting face-to-face with the enemy.

Ordo- Ordo looked frakking ridiculous, flattened against the wall, his right leg naked and marred with streaks of dried blood. One hand raised a steady blaster at the entrance, and a grenade was primed in the other. Ordo's teeth were bared, and he looked for all the galaxy exactly like how Dad had once described the bloodthirsty, savage, Mandalorian barbarians.

But this Mandalorian barbarian was Dad's ally. And, despite all the snark between them, I got the distinct feeling they were pretty much friends, too.

::ETA, Mission.:: Dad clipped out, his voice echoing through my earbud. ::And I hope Ordo's blasted intel is right.::

::Definitely coming here. Four minutes.:: Mission sounded quiet. She'd wanted to see to the old man, she'd sounded shocked when she heard those pilots had karked it, she'd- she'll be scared spitless, stressing out over her Wookiee and frakking Revan.

But Mission was still lying ready, gun in hand, looking to shoot more of the bastards.

Mission was so- so genuinely nice and good, just like Selene had been- funny, and cheerful, and optimistic- but there was an inner strength to Mission that I wasn't entirely sure Selene'd had.

But Selene was smart enough to know Korriban was killing us. So was Mex. I was the dumb idiot more into increasing my own frakking power than finding a way off that dirtball planet.

Mekel'd had nothing to do with Selene. Maybe part of me had always known that. Maybe that was why I'd always wondered- what if I'd agreed with her straight-off? Would we have made it? Would she still be alive-

::Intel can only help so much.:: Ordo muttered. ::One di'kut or many- with our limited resources and time, our strategy boils down to nothing more than blasting anything walking through that hole.::

::Two minutes.:: Mission whispered. ::Moving fast. Carth, can you check- I mean, it's definitely not the others, right?::

::They'd answer the comm.:: Dad replied in a tight voice. ::Jolee, haul your arse back inside the freighter.::

::Eh, 'm not moving.:: The old man's voice was faint. I'd put it down to a crappy line, if I hadn't seen the bloody mess of his chest. ::Might be I can help from here. Not sure I'm up to moving anyway. Heh.::

::One hatch away.::

::I'm ready.:: the Republic marksman threw into the convo. I'd forgotten what his name was. ::One more Sith blighter going down.::

::There's something-:: old man Bindo wheezed. ::Something off- I sense-::

A robed figure in red stepped through the hole.

Something exploded in mid-air, like Ordo's grenade had detonated prematurely. Time seemed to-stop.

I caught a glimpse of Ordo, thrown back from the frag blast, caught like a flutter-gnat in the wind.

Dad, on the opposite side of the entrance, flung high into the air - before smashing down into the line of consoles.

Mission, shrieking behind me, as something dropped from her hands with a clatter.

I froze in horrified disbelief as the figure sauntered nonchalantly into the hangar. Tall, thin, bedecked in silver and scarlet, with black lips marking a damned, pale, face.

Sharlan Nox. Oh no. No. No frakking way!

Something blurred in the air.

Jolee Bindo. Landing limply in the Sith Lord's outstretched arms. A long, thin hand rested over the old man's forehead.

I didn't have to sense the Force to know it was at work.

But then, thin, pink tentacles - frakking tentacles! - protruded from slits in the Sith Lord's cheeks, and slithered towards the old man's face.

Numbly, I remembered wondering, once, what those slits were for-Something kicked me in the side.

"Wake up."

Slowly, I became aware of the grilled press of metal, hard against my face. I groaned, tried to stretch, but my hands were caught tight against something-

"Wake up, you gimboid," someone whispered.

Violent images flashed through my head: fire, raining from the skies; buildings shattering as I ran in desperation; the sight of my apartment complex exploding, before something slammed into my head and everything blacked-

"Mum!" I screamed, jerking awake, struggling to sit, only to stare into the prettified face of a stranger.

He was scowling. "Not so frakking loud! You'll get Lord Arseface back in here."

Panic fluttered like a horde of gnit-flies assailing the inside of my throat.

My hands were bound behind my back. Legs tied together. Something cinched into my forehead, and someone was sobbing- no, two someones, a pair of Twi'leki girls in the corner. The corner- the corner of what looked like a starship's brig-

"Mum," I cried again, helpless, as my mind replayed the rending destruction of my home beneath the weight of turbo-lasers shooting down from the heavens. I could hear the discordant wail of planetary alarms again, feel the panicked throng of people shoving me this way and that-

"Frakk, are you gonna be as bleeding useless as Blue One and Two over there?" the boy hissed. His dark blue eyes flashed as I stared at him dazedly.

The boy was Human, mid-teens, with a handful of years on me. His glittering, skin-tight costume and painted face immediately identified him as the sort of sent I would never normally associate with. A delicate circlet of gold wrapped tight through his jet-black locks.

"Thani," I said numbly, blinking. "It was- was-"

"Blitzed," the teen said bluntly. "Same as the rest of Telos."

My stunned gaze then noticed something else: he was bound, too.

So were the whimpering girls.

The teen followed my gaze. "Cantina dancers. I've seen 'em before, rolling in the creds at Starshine's Waterhole. Everyone likes twins." He snorted in disparagement. "Helpful as tits on a Hutt, in this place. Say, don't suppose an upper-class nob like you knows how to slice through restraints?"

"Where are we?" I asked hoarsely. Nothing seemed real. War was something that happened out in space - tales of adventure that Dad would occasionally relay, although he never made it sound as exciting as I thought it really was.

"Picked up by a bunch of scum-loving Sith." The teen's blue eyes were outlined in black kohl, and his lips were an unnatural shade of red. He's a hooker, I realized in horrified awe. A joyboy. A sent who sells- sells his-Picked up by the Sith. The words hissed through my stuttering thoughts with terrifying comprehension.

Don't trust the Sith, Dee, Mum's voice murmured in my head. Don't trust the Jedi. Don't trust anyone who uses the Force. Just hide like I showed you-

Hide, Dee. Hide-

It wasn't working! There was nothing there! I couldn't feel the weaves she had painstakingly shown me in secret, the weaves to wrap tight around my body and invert so no one would notice me.

I could feel my eyes widening, my body shaking, my heart thundering like a swoop about to explode on the track-

The boy kicked me with his bound legs. "Keep your dumb head together! This isn't the frakking time to bawl your soft, stupid eyes out."

I swallowed. My throat was dry. I blinked stupidly at the teen, who seemed a lot more confident and in control than I was. "What the fr- fra-" I swallowed again, forcing the curse word out, ",-frakk can we do, then?"

He was about to say something, just as the only hatch to the room opened.

The man who walked in was as dressed-up as the boy. But different. Imposing instead of handsome. Robed instead of sequined. Authoritative instead of imprisoned.

Sith.

Black lips in a white face smiled down at us. "Mm, four pretty little playthings."

"You told me you only had two, Sharlan," a voice snapped out behind him. Another figure emerged, this one clad in combat-armour, with sun-streaked blonde hair pulled tightly back from a beautiful face.

Both of them had sharp, unnaturally yellow eyes.

"Two finds inventoried against your five, my dear. Consider it a showcase of your superiority." The man trilled a high-pitched laugh. "Perhaps that will be enough for a transfer back to command."

"Yes, you're only thinking of me," the woman drawled sardonically.

I t was the robed man, sauntering closer, that my horrified gaze fixated on. He raised a pale hand, and I couldn't move, but something was lifting me, off the ground and into the air-

"I shall send the girls to Uln," the man murmured, stepping close. On the ground behind me, the pretty boy was strangely silent.

"No you frakking won't," someone growled, but all I could see was a thin white face. A hand grasped my jaw, and I flinched- but the rest of my body was suspended. I hung; lifeless, helpless, useless, as the pale man moved ever closer.

The air was cold. A black slit on either cheek of the man's face breathed open.

Gills, my mind squeaked in petrified shock. But that's not right, he's Human not aquatic, so what are they?
I didn't want to know the answer.

I'm gonna die. A sob stuck in my throat. My body wracked with shudders. Mum. Dad. Where are you?

Dad was a warhero. Surely, somehow, he'd come for me-

"You threw inhibitors on the boys. That means they're strong." The woman was close now, too. "We're in a frakking war, Sharlan. I don't give a ronto's arse what you do in your spare time, but I'm not letting you piss around wasting valuable resources just because you get off on the strong ones. What's your name?"

The last question was snapped out like a command, and made no sense until I heard the pretty boy answer.

"Mekel Kadoni." The teen sounded sullen.

"And yours?"

All I could see was gleaming yellow eyes. Two pairs, now, staring at me with the detached observation of the powerful. Two faces waiting for my answer.

Dad, where are you? Dad- Dad was a famous starpilot. If anyone could find me, Dad would. Dad had scored three medals against the Mandos, Dad was pretty much a household name these days - even if it didn't make up for him never being home. Dad was-

Dad was a famous starpilot. Dad was a household name.

A hand tightened cruelly around my jaw. Tears I didn't know were there spilled out over my eyes.

"Answer the lord, little pet," the man said. The inky slits had disappeared, now, leaving behind only pale, smooth cheeks.

"Dustil," I gasped. "Dustil Balon."

A common Telosian surname, from my mum's line. Her dad had been a Telos native. Not her ma, though, she'd been some sort of exile who'd sought refuge-

The woman snorted. There was the sound of boots clanking away. "I expect to see them both on the roll-call at the Academy, Sharlan. Otherwise I'll go straight to the top, and make damn sure Revan knows what you do with half your frakking finds."

Swish of a hatch closing. Fingers, gentling on my jaw, as the pale man leaned close again.

"Looks like you have a lucky escape," he murmured, before pressing black lips against my forehead in a feather-light touch of benediction.

I gagged, recoiling, panic flooding like acid through my limbs.

I was dumped to the floor in a heap.

"What a shame," the man drawled. "I suppose I'll have to make do with the twins, instead."

... The old man from Kashyyyk hung lifeless in the Sith Lord's arms. Something shuffled behind me-
Mission, who must've lost her weapon, and would lose her brains if she moved out from the cover of her snub.

Dad and Ordo and that Republic marksman were nowhere to be seen.

I'm the only one who can stop Sharlan Nox. The realization was as terrifying as it was liberating. Crashing through the frozen, petrified stillness of my mind. *The only one who can stop him killing Jolee or Mission or- or Dad, if he hasn't already karked it on a frakking console screen-

Hatred felt good. Blinding fury battered into my impotent sense of fear, breaking through the hidden Force weaves, and submerging everything with the roaring promise of vengeance.

I was not the same scared, powerless, little boy anymore.

"Hey, arseface!" I hollered.

Sharlan jerked, dropping Jolee Bindo to the ground as he turned to stare at me in surprise.

I thought I heard the old man groan. It was hard to tell above the rush of rage in my ears.

"Yeah, I'm talking to you, frakkwad!" My 'saber was tight in my grasp. The Force rocked a promise of power around me, all the potential to do whatever I wanted-

Fear. Hate. Passion. They can fan the strength of your Force, my boy. Uthar's voice chuckled in my head. But only if you master them. Use your emotions as fuel, but stay in control of the fire they ignite.

I was going to fry that perverted bastard's heart.

"I thought you got off on the strong ones, turd-for-brains! So leave the old man, and come after me instead!"

Korriban scarlet blazed in my grasp.

Sharlan's head cocked. He took a step towards me. And then I felt it- a vortex of raw, swirling Force, centred solely on the corrupted Sith Lord as his intrigued, damned, eyes pinned mine.

He was stronger than me, even in the throes of my hatred.

Those slimy tentacles - or whatever the frakk they were - contracted back into the Sith Lord's face.

His hand lifted.

"Well, aren't you just the loud-mouthed delicacy," Sharlan Nox murmured. His eyes blazed, even from the distance between us. I felt the oddest sensation of magnetism, dampening my rage- like my limbs had suddenly frozen, like all I wanted to do was walk towards his glowing, glowing eyes-

Hide, Dee, Mum hissed. Hide!

The Force rushed inwards like a torrent, curling tight around me before inverting.

All the emotions returned, but this time undercut with a chilling comprehension.

I had to get out. I had to get out, and lure him away, away from the others, back through the hatch, away from everybody-

"Where did you go, little snack?" The Sith Lord was frowning, now. I began moving; silent, silent steps to the side. Uthar had been intrigued when he'd chanced upon my trick.

You are not inaudible, my boy. Forget that at your peril.

Silent steps. Forward and sideways. Then- Sharlan Nox moved faster than I could see without the Force. I blinked, and he was standing still in the place I had just been. Right next to the snub that Mission was hiding beneath.

I was halfway to the hatch already, but all he had to do was bend over and peek underneath that frakking starship-

"What's the problem, bonehead?" I jeered. The Sith Lord spun around, the scarlet of his robes billowing out behind him. "Can't you see me?"

More steps towards the exit- a blur in the air, and suddenly Sharlan Nox was in the spot I had been a second ago, one hand grasping at empty air.

Mere inches from my sleeve.

My hand grasped tight around the 'saber hilt, concealed within the weaves of invisibility. My feet moved forward; slowly, quietly, as I held my breath. My other hand slipped into my pocket as I breached the hole that had once been a hatch-

I was slammed back into a jagged edge of durasteel by a fist in my gut. Breath exploded from my lungs on the impact, the Force unravelled, but my sword-arm moved on instinct-

An iron band twisted my hand back unnaturally; I screamed as agony shot up my limb, something crunched, and the 'saber hilt fell from my prone hand with a clatter.

The red disappeared as the 'saber knocked off into fail-safe mode.

"Too predictable, going for the exit." The bastard's grip still forced my arm back, and it hurt like a schutta, and his other hand was now on my throat-

I choked, flailing desperately for the Force.

"Still, you are a clever little titbit." His face was so close, now. Frakk! Frakking frakk! My eyes blurred, I could barely see or breathe, and in the centre of his pale white cheeks gaped open a slit of darkness. His eyes glowed, and his voice turned mesmerizing. "I think I shall keep you."

No! No you frakking won't, you frakking Hutt-spawned gimbold!

In my pocket, my other hand brushed against the trinket I'd pulled from a Sith corpse. With a squeeze of my fingers, I felt the thing vibrate.

The Force winked out. Sharlan's eyes dimmed. My knee jerked up, hard, straight into the sleemo's crotch.

He bellowed in pain, stumbling back, releasing me.

The air was harsh in my crushed throat. My arm was agony- but I could still bend it into my chest, stride forward, jerk my elbow hard into the bastard's face-

He caught my upraised limb and swung it further, launching me into the ground.

"I don't need the Force to extract your soup!" He was on me; I was rolling frantically, trying to wedge a knee between us. "This shall simply be all the more unpleasant for you!"

Somehow, I wriggled free, clambering to my feet one-handed, hearing the clink of that Force-nullifying gadget drop to the ground, the hiss as the Sith Lord's lightsaber exploded to life within his grasp.

I stumbled back, out through the hole, eyes fixed on Sharlan as he rose to a seated position. A twitching proboscis curled out from both sides of his face.

Run!

I turned, and sprinted down a gleaming corridor.

Six steps, and the Force flared to life.

Hide, Dee!

Another step, and I was tucked back into the realm of invisibility. One hand, punching forward to release a hatch, hearing footsteps behind me, praying uselessly that I had enough of a lead to keep going, to find a place to ambush the knobhead-

If you're facing a superior foe, make them do the work. Of all the frakking sents, it was frakking Revan whispering in my head. Words she had said back on Lehon. Make them chase you. Tire them out. Don't stop moving.

"Come and get me, arseface!" I yelled, and ran.

xXx

Bastila Shan:

This is our game board today, my apprentice.

Malak had murmured that earlier, whilst pointing to the viewport that boasted the glittering lights of his armada. What I discerned through battle meditation was the same game board, albeit seen from an alternate dimension. Pinpricks of life, all sparks for me to mould, all pieces to be played in the dejarik match for the galaxy itself.

And Revan was the most powerful piece of all.

*you can be the saviour, both of you. if she will only listen-

The battle of ships was still raging in the skies. A last gasp of Republic forces had entered the fray, adding a further impotent push to their beleaguered front. Without the scrambler destroying their sensors, perhaps it would have been enough.

But my battle meditation had tipped the scales.

Ironic, really, to think on how often my gift had been used in the name of the Republic, only to be turned against them at this final moment.

It matters not. All these ships, all these lives, they are but an infinitesimal slice of the whole.

If I had more time, I would muscle the pressure further, expedite our victory by remaining in a Force trance until destruction of the Republic assault was a shining certainty. But my influence thus far should be enough for the remaining Sith pawns to gain dominion; I had to attend to Revan.
"Deactivate the null field," I ordered the slayers standing over the broken body of my once-master. He had to be one heart-beat away from death’s door. There was no sentiment left inside of me for him.

After all, Vrook had chosen his path.

A wisdom all Jedi adhered to was accepting responsibility for their own actions. Vrook should have realized that. Should have discerned-

What? That his padawan would turn on him?

-individuals do not matter. you see this now. what matters is the whole-

I could not would not allow myself the weakness of emotionalism. The Revan of old understood the necessity of shedding one’s vulnerabilities for a greater cause. And it was the Revan of old I would resurrect, buried deep in the fractured shell of my bond-sister.

I kept my gaze firmly away from Vrook’s fallen body.

"My lord?" a slayer asked in question, straightening from his post.

Through the Force, I could sense my once-master ebbing into unconsciousness. Perhaps, that small reprieve, was the final gift I could grant him.

"We have company," I said smoothly. My gaze drew unerringly to the oblique hatch at the end of the chamber. This was the moment I had been waiting for.

A sharp wedge of nervousness chafed through me, like the brittle sensation of crushed ferracrystal scraping against my skin. A minor discomfort I would prevail over. "Stand down, slayers, unless I command otherwise."

-you can show her. draw deep-

Around me licked the power of the Star Forge.

-draw deep. the power is here. the power to save everything-

The half-moon hatch opened.

Somehow, I had known she would enter first.

Revan strode in, cyan bar blazing in her hands, attention drawn briefly to the slayers before dismissing them as unimportant.

"Bastila," Revan said, voice quiet, as she stepped deeper into the meditation chamber.

I called to the Force, and it answered. Oh, it answered. Rocking around me with the power of planets.

"Revan. I knew you would come."
It felt almost... aberrant, to be staring across from her once more. The woman my life had revolved around for what had to be more than a galactic year, now, since the death of the Nexus.

Revan appeared the same as on Korriban: dark curls a mink-rat's nest atop her head, with her expression broadcasting every tumultuous emotion as it crossed her soul. Concern, suspicion, anguish. Vulnerabilities. Vulnerabilities when you do not use them.

I may have only encountered Darth Revan once, in all her glory, yet I knew the woman standing before me was but a pale shadow of what she had been.

Her power still blazed, though. And her old self... her old self was still there, buried beneath the dross of Jedi brain-washing.

Revan's mouth quirked. "I told you I would come. Can't say the journey's been all pazaak and spice-shots, though."

She halted some metres in front of me. The Force beckoned, swelled, surged, as I drew in its life-beat. Revan had to be sensing that, now.

-show her the power-

"Again. You could not come alone?" I could hear the censure drip from my voice as my gaze travelled scornfully over her companions. That distasteful robot. Oh, her old general I could perhaps understand - but the Wookiee? "Honestly, Revan. You did not think it wise to bring the other Force-users with you? Or, better yet, allow us the chance to converse alone for once?"

"All of my companions grant me strength, Bastila, Force-borne or otherwise," she replied in a neutral tone. "I would have asked Juhani to accompany me, but she hasn't been conscious since your snubfighter exploded on us."

I could feel my lips curl at the asked- if Revan had not yet realized that every member of the crew was hers to command-

My thoughts stilled in shock as the rest of her words evolved into meaning. "Wait- did you say exploded?"

The look she levelled on me was sad. "Lehon was a trap, Bastila. The snubfighter was primed with permacrete set to detonate the instant your holo-transmission cut out. If I'd followed your plan, the pair of us would be nothing but spacedust now."

The calefaction of anger was fierce and immediate. Malak. Malak! I should have known- but I had suspected something, had I not? Of course a Sith Lord would manoeuvre me to his own ends! It was to be expected of Lord Malak, but the betraying taste of being exploited was a recurring thread woven bitterly throughout my entire life.

-no one can use you if no one is more powerful than you-

At least Revan had never sought to manipulate me-

"Malak tricked you, Bastila. We have to get you away from him. Back to the 'Hawk." Her face was impassive, but the bond between us yawned open. We have to get you away from the frelling Forge-

Never sought to manipulate- oh, the shock of such deceit originating from her!
"Do you honestly believe you can conceal your thoughts from me?" I spat the words out, indignant and vehement and flat-out seething with rage. Power churned a conflagrant fire in my soul, burning alongside my anger. "I will not allow you to destroy the Star Forge!"

The flare of Force awakened in Revan, also; the strength that not even near-death and a mind-wipe could erase.

But it did not compare to the torrent coursing through my veins, stemming from the ancient kaiburr itself.

"And how do you plan on stopping me?" Revan's voice had turned soft. Her eyes narrowed. Weaves of Force shielding curled around her presence, like she believed I would pre-emptively strike out.

-I would not attack her. I could not! No, I had to persuade Revan, remind her, induce her back to the cognizance that had once empowered her to act for the good of the galaxy, no matter how ruthless that direction required her to be.

But, first, to showcase the almighty power at my- our- fingertips.

Mere hours ago Malak had fumbled through my meditation to snuff out the feeble heart of one lacklustre pilot. I had noticed. I had always been quick to learn.

My fury focused to a sharpened point. My hands clenched into fists, and I struck.

Two heartbeats stuttered into silence. Two gasps choked through the air. Two thuds echoed as two bodies fell to the floor.

Lifeless and still.

Revan whirled around in shock.

"Bastila! You just- your own guards?"

"This is the power of the Star Forge, Revan," I said coolly. My emotions were back under leash. I would make her see - and if this small display of power shocked her so, then it wouldn't even take me long. "The power over life and death."

"Power over life and death," Revan muttered, turning slowly back to face me. Her expression was granite-hard, now, as she began to comprehend. "And where's the balance? When you kill your own?"

"These were slayers. Jonn Dan's slayers." A murmur from Revan's old general, Rosh. "What were they still doing in circulation?"

"They were Malak's guards, not mine. I trust not their loyalty." I eyed over Rosh and the Wookiee, both standing metres back by the dead. The former held his weapon ready in guard, like that was any sort of peril with the Star Forge responding to my will. "Tell me, Revan. Should I trust the loyalty of your guards?"

"Is that a threat?" Revan hissed at me. Her muscles bunched beneath bloodied, tattered clothing. Her desire to protect her followers was evident - Darth Revan had shed that weakness, but I had come to know my bond-sister well during the months aboard the Ebon Hawk. She was pertinacious. Reckless. Loyal - even when it handicapped her.

-make her angry. her shields will slip-

"This is- this is Vrook Lamar." Rosh's voice laced with disbelief. "Jedi Master Vrook Lamar! What is he doing here?"

Startlement widened Revan's gaze, but she did not turn from me this time. "What? Bastila-

"Irrelevant," I forced out. I would not look at his fallen body. "Revan-

"Vrook is your master!" she cried, interrupting me with the histrionics of the weak. "Bastila, what did you do?"

"He still lives. Barely," Rosh muttered. "Despite being riddled with blaster burns."

"He was an obstacle in my way," I snapped. "You have not answered my question, Revan. Are your allies obstacles as well?"

"Query: Master, permission to remove Uptight Soporific from your redundant-

The Force shone from Revan like a star, battering my senses and occluding our bond, drowning out whatever meaningless drivel her inane droid was spouting. Revan's power was a growing storm, lashing alongside her temper, rocking the foundation of her shields as she threw them over her allies instead.

"You will leave them alone!" she growled.

And the bond was open. So open.

All the kaiburr's power I had assimilated was waiting. The memory of that evil, dead world was forever at the forefront of my mind. With a deep wrench on the Force, I threw all my conviction and dread and visceral sensation that Malak's vision evoked directly into our mind-link.

Revan stumbled back, gasping.

-show her the death of the Force-

I could see Malak's past again: the necropolis of a space rock bordered by an eerie, violet atmosphere, devoid of everything. The plague growing, as if directed by some unknown hand, eradicating all light and dark Force until there was nothing—nothing—left.

I relived the experience once more, further magnified by the Star Forge, and projected it ruthlessly through our bond.

The Star Forge crooned in my grasp.

-show her the power you can draw to defeat the true evil-

Flashes of feeling, of memory, of truth.

The kaiburr's amplification of the Force. The means to build fleets within weeks. The augmentation of my own battle meditation; the ability to extinguish individuals with a thought; Darth Revan's original conquest that almost brought the Republic to its knees - and collectively we could achieve so much more.
All, all, all, possible with the Star Forge! Together, we would be each other's strength, and the galaxy would prevail.

Revan was struggling, ramming the psychic Force back through our mind-link, fighting with the desperation of the fearful. For I could sense her fear: fear of her own darkness. Fear of that kernel of black emotion she still carried, the kernel of strength that could be enkindled to nothing short of epochal.

_We can control the darkness together, Revan! Together!_

_The purple world..._ She was gasping in my mind, gasping to hold herself together. _There was someone... something... I had to find a way to stop_-_together nothing can withstand you_-_Roll the dice..._ Another gasp, another flail. _It didn't work. All I know is that it didn't work!_

_You must have faith in me, in us!_ I demanded, my mental voice shouting alongside the currents of power that submerged us both. _You shall not be a slave to the Dark Side this time!_

For what was the Dark Side, really, but freedom from constraint?

One merely required the wisdom to harness it with impartiality, and with this much power surely we could-

"Release her!"

The furious growl snapped my awareness to the burn of plasma. Yudan Rosh, Revan's faithful kath hound, pointing a green glow-stick at my throat. In his shadow, the Wookiee had a disruptor levelled in my direction. The robot was aiming some sort of ridiculous projectile at me.

And Revan... Revan was on her knees, head clutched in hands as the Force rocked a hurricane around her.

"Kill me and you kill Revan," I said softly, staring into the burning gaze of Revan's pet Twi'lek. His slight pause as that thought sunk in was all I required.

Like yielding to a vacuum, the Force surged back through our bond, wrested from Revan's impotent, stricken mind. It was instinctive to transmute the Force into telekinetic energy, and hurl the power wildly outward.

But the moment Revan's three servants were thrown into the wall, she was right there, a closed fist launched straight at my face.

Her punch cracked hard in my jaw. I flew, sprawling backward, stunned, angry, furious- my emotions rocking frenetically around me-

-show her everything-

Revan was on me, pinning me to the ground, her thoughts chaotic- _I'll knock her out if I have to!_ -show her-

The kaiburr ignited emotion within me - all the volatile affectations I could feed it I did - resentment for years of impotency, fear at holding the leash of an amnesiac Sith Lord, enmity directed at a duplicitous childhood friend - emotions black as tar-mud as they resonated through our bond.

An earthquake of passion battering against her restraint.

Oh, and I felt the depths of Revan's desires, too - for there was fury within her, and grief, and the lingering residue of frozen calculation that had once mastered her.

Stronger still, deep in my own soul, was my unyielding abhorrence at whatever could so permanently extinguish the Force from existence - the only thing that made me special.

The same revulsion echoed in Revan. She might not consciously recall the Unknown Regions, but she still knew. She still knew.

"Stop it!" she was screaming. Futilely fighting and failing to remain unaffected. Stop it!

I was on my feet again, and she was clutching at her head again, as fragments of the past rose in her mind like flowers of truth.

Movement elsewhere- My hand lifted to hurl the returning Twi'lek back from me. He landed, collapsing next to Vrook.

Good. Two useless bodies for the clean-bots to clear.

Get out of my head! She was building a wall, but it could not stop me. Not when the same fervour of passion echoed in her own core. I won't yield, Bastila! I will not fall again!

Her will was stronger than ever. I had to concede that, without the Star Forge, I would not prevail against her.

But I did have the Star Forge. All Revan had was a broken mind, and a tempest of power over which she lacked the training to master.

"If you cannot overcome me then how do you expect to defeat Malak alone, Revan?" I hissed. You need me. And the galaxy needs us!

Not... this... way!

That ridiculous robot bleated something about a no-kill list as I deflected one of his projectiles. Lightning was not something I had ever initiated, but now was as good a time as any-

The minute a sharp current exploded from my fingertips, Revan vanished.

What? Revan?

A fizzle from the robot, but still he levelled a weapon at me. Thermal energy narrowed into a weave of need in my grasp, and my mouth tightened in satisfaction as the droid's hapless weapon began to bend. Folded, twisted, its barrel turning full circle to point back at its owner.

-do not lose sight of her-

The kaiburr whispered a warning, and the instant I stepped away, something unseen skinned hard against my forehead. I reeled, realizing instantly that without my step back the blow would have struck me direct on the temple. Knocked me out. By my ignorant, unseeing, blinded bond-sister.
Revan was utilizing some fancy Force trick to render herself invisible, but she could not hide from the Force as it spat currents of nascent lightning, dawning from my fingertips, an achromatic discharge engulfing this side of the chamber.

A flicker- there. There. Her signature flared back to life, as her body flared back into view. My tracery of purple-white twined around her figure- she shuddered, but somehow my attack was absorbed into her instead of assailing her flesh.

Revan's chin lifted. Sparks of white died into nothingness. Her green gaze glinted rock-solid determination as she glared.

"That will not work on me." Her voice was as cold as space.

"I did not intend it to, Revan."

Did she still not understand? Did she still believe I meant to attack her?

No, no, I only unleashed that lightning to see her, to make her see, make her see the past, and understand-

And what better way, than to show her the past?

The past I had once thought to hide from her, to let those dark memories die with me, before I saw the glimmers of truth that shone between the shadows.

All through my trial of purgatory and perdition, those early days when I was relegated as nothing more than Malak's conduit to Revan, I had cursed every assignment he had imposed upon me.

Every taunting question he dared me to level at Revan through the bond. Who found us? What were Talyon Esan's last words? How did Arran Da'klor die? Who was our first recruiter? What happened to Kreia? How did I lose my jaw?

Why did we invade The Republic?

And with every refusal of mine to accede to his will, Malak had shown me his truth before moving onto the next, damned, question.

...

The pain burned like acid through my limbs. Inside my skin, like molten fire, like flames licking through every nerve centre.

Even now, after Malak had pulled back, tears still streamed helplessly down my face as I begged for the torment to cease.

"You should have asked Revan my question," Malak murmured. "I shall win in the end. You understand this. Your defiance does nothing but break your spirit and body."

I could not answer. It seemed an inordinately difficult task merely to force oxygen through my cracked lips. Still, still, I would hold onto my resolution to remain separate from Revan. Malak's twisted games would not have me reaching out to her, tempting her with her dark past...

...no matter the cost to myself.

"Perhaps I shall show you the answer, before moving onto your next assignment." A gloved finger touched me gently on the cheek. I jerked, but the restraints had no give. "Would you like that, little one?"

...

Bastila!

And Malak showed me. With my every refusal to pose his absurd memory trips to my fugitive bond-sister, Malak rewarded me with both pain and memory.

Every shadow of his past allowed me a glimpse of Revan, Darth Revan, the Sith Lord I had never seen as anything more than a spectre of corrupted evil.

I slowly began to perceive the depths of her calculation and power.

By the time I learned the truth of what they had found in the Unknown Regions, I understood so much more than Malak.

The wider picture. The greater good. The whole requires protecting, not the individual.

Revan and I were the best defense for the galaxy. If only she saw, and embraced, the truth of her past.

Bastila, Malak can't hurt you anymore! I won't let him! She was choked with emotion, still dwelling uselessly on the ravages of pain I had endured at her old lover's hand. That wasn't the point!

That was hardly worth thinking on!

Those glimmers of truth, obscured within the gloom of Malak's petty mind-games, were what she had to see!

I felt the snarl on my lips, in my soul, as I dredged forth one of those cursed memories and exposed all of Malak's thoughts straight into the esoteric link that chained us.

...

"Are you certain Nisotsa is the correct choice?" I asked without preamble, stalking into the room.

Revan was leaning over a transcript, masked and robed despite the anonymity of her chambers. She struck a deathly beautiful figure, but there were times I hungered for her to drop the disguise, even if only between the two of us.

Opportunities for intimacy were so rare, these days. So inconsequential with what we had to face. But a corner of my soul mourned regardless.

"Jorak Uln will shape the adepts I require on Korriban. Nisotsa shall recruit them for him." She did not look up, merely tapped one gloved finger on the techJournal in front of her.

I knew the production of the Star Forge eclipsed all other priorities, but once Revan had taken the time to listen.
"Nisotsa will resent the transfer, Revan. You know she has been angling for another crack at command."

The mask lifted to appraise me. "Nisotsa is no commander." Revan's rejoinder was smooth, but implacable. "She excels at intelligence retrieval and discovery of Force adepts. That is where I shall utilize her."

Even midway through the Mandalorian Wars Revan had perceived that. But, somehow, I did not think my lover would have phrased it so clinically then.

Revan's head bowed back over the transcript. "Ensure her compliance, Malak. She will submit beneath a firm hand or a stroke to her ego. I trust you to handle her with alacrity, for we have no time or resources to indulge her desires."

We have no time for our own desires. It could have been my thought, or hers - whispering a warning directly into my mind.

...

Malak had thought my fealty to Revan would erode upon exposure of her true character. How she clinically withdrew from those closest to her. How she came to utilize their skills with detached ruthlessness, precisely like - as Malak took perverse pleasure in pointing out - my talents had always been used.

Perhaps he believed that in showing me thus, I would no longer have faith in Revan's loyalty to me.

Malak had never understood.

Nisotsa. A horrified murmur. She turned from me in the end.

Revan had mourned Nisotsa Organa's death on the Leviathan, without even remembering the woman. But the Revan of old knew that friendship was an extravagance true leaders could not afford.

Loyalty had to be absolute, whether induced by fear or respect. The fickle bonds of camaraderie could only extend so far before they became meaningless.

...

"Remember me as I was."

"What?" I looked back to Revan, but her mask still faced the anonymity of space.

"Talvon's last words," she elaborated. Her voice was cold. "He made a fine Jedi Knight, once. Remember him as that man, Malak. Not as the failure he became."

She turned fluidly from me, silent as a wraith, pale skin marked with Sith-black and fingertips tarred with brown blood. In one smooth motion, she leaped down from the viewing platform.

Had her words been wistful? Nostalgic? No, I decided. That was merely my own frail longing for the woman she had once been. The Supreme Commander of the Republic might not have had the fortitude to cut down a monster of her own creation, but Lord Revan certainly did.

What about you, Revan? Will you remember Talvon Esan, insane Sith commander or revered Jedi hero? Is there any room left in your heart for that, or am I to do your grieving for you?
Talvon. I killed him.

Executed. You did what was necessary.

I... I had to. I could hear belief in her words. Talvon's death didn't strike the same echo of devastation that Nisotsa's had. But I don't know why...

To prevent another Telos. You kept your eye on the end game, Revan, so other sentients could enjoy the fragility of emotionalism. That is what makes a true guardian - knowing what to shape into a weapon, what to cut down, and what to leave behind.

"She has gone."

Revan's two lightsabers crashed against my single blade. I thrust back in a show of strength; the second our weapons no longer crossed, one hand dropped from my hilt to clench tight in the air.

Revan's choked gasp was satisfying, but it did not last long. I launched sideways, already anticipating her counter-attack-

Needles of piercing hot pain engulfed me regardless.

"Too predictable, Malak." There was a measure of mirth in her voice that galled. It took me only a thought to fling her lightning away, but Revan's continued success in striking me was beginning to fray at my reserves.

"Who has gone?" I demanded, lunging forward to strike again. The creeping residue of electrical burn on my skin was both an irritant and an accelerant for my Force-use. Physical suffering. Passion. Resentment.

Emotions to fuel my own strength.

In the spiralling depths of our training spars, there were times where I did not know what was more potent: my love for her or my hate.

"Kreia." She grunted as she ducked beneath an overhand, sidestepping neatly before her shoto glanced off my armoured shoulder. "Focus, Malak. There are consequences if I keep slipping so easily through your guard."

I had always been the better duellist, but I had always been handicapped by my concern for her. It was a weakness I was slowly learning to shed.

"That old bat?" I snorted, as a rippling wave of poisoned energy flared from my fingertips. Revan, anticipating a concussive force, tensed as she guarded against a threat that did not eventuate. Her eyes widened as my blade knocked hers aside, and my boot kicked hard into her knee.

Revan stumbled back, almost falling.

"I never trusted her," I said, striding forward to drive home my advantage, but she launched herself into the air before my blade could strike. I could feel the taint of Force-poison seep into her veins before she dispersed it. Enough to have weakened her, at least. "Desertion though... shall I track her down for you?"
Revan landed silently behind me. As I turned in response, her flying lightsaber almost caught me side-on. Our robes were cortosis-woven, but we were duelling bare-handed. Minutes ago, my calloused fingertips had been trailing down the vulnerable skin of her neck.

A flare of animosity dawned deep within. In one stroke, she could have sliced through my hand, just to win a training bout.

"No," Revan answered, as her scarlet blade snapped home. "Kreia is no threat. She is perhaps the only one who truly perceives what the galaxy faces. She will have disappeared to fight against the threat in her own way."

"The only one?" The rage turned black, now. I was the only one, the only person who had been at Revan's side her entire life. I was her Shadow Hand, and both my power and my experience trumped some wrinkled, miserly, sarcastic old woman!

A cold smile curved Revan's bloodless lips. "Use your emotions, Malak. Do not allow your emotions to conquer you. Too many have become slaves to the Dark Side, and I would not have that same fate befall you."

...

Stop it! Damn you, Bastila, I don't want to see this! I could have- could have sliced his hand off-and for what? You think showing me this will induce my cooperation?

The horror etched deep within her. But I could sense the comprehension, also. A part of her still understood.

You created Darth Malak. At that point in time, he was still a capable, adept commander of your empire. He may have taken your lessons with resentment, but he grew strong from them.

He's a monster! Oh, there was fury in her, too. A flash of my own tortured screams flickered between us, and it stoked her rage. You can't be blind to that!

He is, now. Tools do not last forever. But you knew how to forge them, Revan, much how you forged yourself. You understood that emotions fuel the Force. That you can exploit emotion for the power you require, no matter how arduous or galling the task is.

I failed, Bastila! The Dark Side controlled me, not the other way around!

She was angry. She was devastated. She was beset with emotion, for the names and faces of a past all glimpsed through the bitter eyes of her old lover.

If Revan would just allow those emotions to break free, she would experience the might within our grasp, the full depths of what the kaiburr had to offer - and I could help her control it.

I would not fail like I did on the Leviathan. This time, I would embrace my own strength with the calculation required.

Perhaps that is so, Revan. But you- we- shall not suffer the same fate this time. You were close, Revan! So close to remaining the guardian you strove to be! Even at the very end, you almost- almost! - had the fortitude to undertake the most distasteful of actions to do what you must! You almost mastered it all!

No one can master the Dark Side! She didn't believe now, but she had once, and she would again.
We can! We can and we shall! Even if I have to force you-

...

Agony stabbed into my ribs. Even gasping for breath was torture. Punctured lung, perhaps. Snapped ribs. Right leg definitely broken with that last attack from Revan.

Fury roared in my soul. Like a wild rancor, flinging back his head and bellowing his discontent to the universe. My own rage burned and broiled, deeper than ever before.

And it was still not enough to overcome the Force holding me impotent against a starship's bulkhead.

Unholy chaos swirled a firestorm in Revan's black eyes. Her robe rippled and flared, her steel mask long discarded in a distant corner somewhere.

Inky shadows of death danced an eerie vortex around her as she prowled closer.

Rarely had I seen her so undone, and this time - directed at me.

"It wasn't me!" I growled, barely able to force the lie out beneath her invisible bonds. My lips were numb. I would go down fighting, but she did not even allow me that grace, held shackled beneath her will the way I was. "I knew nothing of Arran's actions, Revan! I have always been your shield! You know I would never betray you!”

"I know."

Like the flipside of a light plunging into darkness, the black aura of insanity extinguished into nothingness.

Her pale, Sith-marked face smoothed into calm.

She... knows?

Revan had always taken my fealty for granted; always, always, always - to the point where she would toy with my emotions and my pride and even my own men without bothering to divulge her motives. Perhaps she had none, beyond a sadistic delight in seeing how far her Shadow Hand would bend.

But at this juncture, I had actually believed she would open her eyes to the truth.

You can only push people so far before they push back.

"Arran's treachery on Deralia has left me with a problem, Malak. All my leaders are convinced you are implicated. Alaki, Saul, Sara, Jorak, Daelidar... even Yudan. They may not name you directly, but I know my men, and I am aware of what they do not say. Arran could not have worked alone."

Did I betray Bandon or Nisotsa now? Neither of them were particularly charismatic leaders, but she could pick the truth from their minds. If I toppled them to save myself, I would have to see to their demise personally.

Or, perhaps Revan could be convinced to believe this was all Yudan's doing, and wouldn't that be a particularly sweet twist of irony to see him fall by her hand-

"You are too useful for me to eliminate, Malak." Her voice had dropped to a rasp of a whisper, but there was no feeling in it. Her lightsaber pointed at my face. "But I cannot have my entire upper rank believe in any weakness of my will. Know that everything we sacrifice is for our cause."

I did not understand what she meant to do. Not at first.

And then, when I did, I still did not believe it. Even as the torch of pain against my face turned unbearable, and my screams morphed to struggling gurgles, the situation was simply incomprehensible.

But the pain incinerated everything away. Love, trust, loyalty... not that there had been more than a dying flicker of that left.

In the ashes of agony, only enmity remained. And it burned bright.

"I shall send in the medi-bots." Her words came from far away, from some nether-hell of hate I would send her to. My breath bubbled, struggled, faltered, and every remnant of consciousness not twisted in torment focused purely on drawing in oxygen. "I will find who was behind Arran Da'klor's treachery, Malak, and you shall have the pleasure of dealing with them."

There was a pause. Footsteps. I was lying in a puddle of my own spilled blood.

Like a mewling kit drowning in water, I was drowning in pain, struggling and failing to clutch onto the Force as it slipped from my helpless grasp.

"I trust you understand that I only act as I must, Malak. I cannot afford weakness, no matter where the blame for it lies."

...

Mal! Mal! NO!

It was him, Revan! That was your mistake! I screamed the words at her, willing her grief to die beneath the anger I knew she was holding back. You should have killed him at that juncture, innocent or not!

She was swimming in self-desolation, but the turgid depths held passion, too. Innocent-

For he was guilty after all! He turned Nisotsa Organa against you! Arran Da'klor! Heroes from the war you won, tools you could use to defend the galaxy!

I didn't believe he could be guilty. Her words choked. With shock, with horror, with budding comprehension. Was that comprehension discerned from Malak's memory, or her own? I didn't believe he was behind Deralia, the first time. Arran said I would never know-

"You will never know." The faint sneer of a dying man's voice, the echo of a memory I had never seen before. "You will always doubt your followers, my Lord Revan."

The bond between us thickened with ice. And the kaiburr danced fire through us both. I no longer knew if the Force was originating from me or her, but in the end, the strength was ours combined. If she would simply stop flailing about-

Use your emotions, Revan! Do not allow them to master you - for that was why you let Malak live, was it not? Even believing in his innocence, had you been truly objective you would have known his death sent a more powerful message than a dismembered jaw. That one moment of impaired judgment showcased your remaining weakness - and allowed Malak to strike again.
But it was Malak after all. The horror morphed into disbelief, which was slowly transforming into something more feverish. He cost me Arran Da'klor.

"You're right, we were loyal once." The same skein of memory combed dead fingers through Revan's mind. As intertwined as we were, I heard all she did. "And you burned that out of us, burned it out of us all."

Burned it out of him... but was it my doing or Malak’s? Something clenched in the bond. A fount of fury - held back by the jaws of determination, perhaps, but the turmoil of the past was eroding her will. And her passions would melt it away. He turned Nisotsa-

"Redeemed... what a joke." Rasp of a woman's voice. "What a frakking joke."

I had no choice but to kill her by then.

Malak turned them against you for no reason greater than his own ambition. He considered blaming Deralia on Nisotsa. You saw that. He thought to implicate Yudan-

Oh, there was the anger, belching into life, screaming a roar in synchronization with the kaiburr.

Some of the fury was directed at me, but that did not matter, for Revan could no more lash out at me than I her. Malak betrayed you. I would hammer that home until it evoked the rage such treachery deserved. You, the one he had sworn to protect and shield and follow. Even as a Jedi Knight he sought to play you-

"Beautiful Bastila," Malak had murmured, that one time I met the famous Jedi Knights from Coruscant. Knight Malak Devari, gazing soulfully at me and kissing my hand just to make his childhood love jealous.

I could sense her recoil at that thought, and her dark emotion grow.

If not for Malak, you would stand at the helm of an empire now, holding firm against the worst threat the galaxy has ever seen! The death of the Force, Revan. The death of the Force!

I rolled the dice... but it wasn't enough-

There's two of us now! With a stronger Force-bond than any master has ever seen! What is that, but a sign from the Force itself? Why else was I placed in a position to save you, but for you to save the galaxy once more?

A ghost of a woman flickered through our consciousness. A robed Jedi, yellow double-blade in hand, as she walked shakily past two corpses. I- Revan- we could sense her fear, and it was vaguely amusing in the way a bleating tach could be; but there was surprise, too, as she lifted her lightsaber and stepped close with a fierce expression conquering the fear on her face-

Me. You remember me?

Revan did not hear, caught in the tailspin of past emotion. I will test the psychic strength of this Jedi paragon before capturing her. But I won't draw it out too long. There is a person responsible for her presence, here, and only one knew of my current location.

Revan-
I trusted him as no other, and he dares to send Jedi after me?

Revan, come back-

He would ruin everything we fight for, all I have sacrificed. All, all, ruined! Her growl turned visceral. A thousand needles of raw power pierced through me, as the rush of a Force high engulfed the bond. A tempest of black rage roared in our minds. He betrayed me. And I lost everything!

So take it back! I gasped, we gasped, and I could no longer see the separation of our thoughts. Do not let the galaxy turn into sectors of dead worlds. Reclaim what was yours, what is ours, and defend the galaxy once more!

Everything upended in a rush.

I choked, the physical making itself known, lying on my back as my body burned. Veins pumping blood through limbs that suddenly felt engorged, every beat of my heart thudding like a jungle drum in my hollow chest.

-power. power. power-

Revan shone white in my senses, glowed black to my eyes, as I turned to see her.

There was a movement from the wall, from the Twi'lek, as he slowly lifted his head off the ground to stare at Revan. He was no concern, not now that Revan understood. After all, he had been her faithful subordinate, when she was both light and dark.

Visible black wisps danced around Revan's kneeling form. Her head bowed. The tunnel of psychic connection that joined us was iced in black permafrost.

So cold... but our pool of power was fathomless. The Force ricocheted, echoed, doubled back on itself, and amplified into sheer magnificence. The fury in Revan's soul had been quenched by a calculating glacier of the night.

One she could rule, this time. One we could both master - and save the galaxy along the way.

xXx

Chapter End Notes

Coming up next: What happens afterward in the meditation chamber.
A Republic vanguard's worth of thanks to kosiah for the beta.
Yes, there is an interesting backstory to Morgana Balon's parents. This fic probably does not have the scope for it. Maybe one day I'll write an off-shoot.
My nose wrinkled in distaste. Ahead of us, Chuundar raised a cautious paw as he halted beneath a low-lying tangle of kshyyy vines.

"(Our burned-out campfire)," I answered slowly. But that wasn’t quite right. I knew the scent of soot well. Any Wookiee worth his chest-fur did. This odour sat thick in the humid air of the Shadowlands, acrid and rancid and pungent with ash.

"(Wildfire)," Chuundar muttered, his voice a warning, as he turned his shaggy head to stare intently at the pair of us. "(You rested in the thicket ahead, cubs? You turned over the remnants of your cooking embers?)"

"(Yes)," I assented, answering for Drawwlog. But our friend had turned away, his young shoulders bunching uncomfortably.

That morning I had been the first to leave, freshly rested beneath the guard of Drawwlog's watch. As I padded back toward the Rwookrorro waypoint, my sole concern had been luring the katarn that had chanced upon us into the waiting might of my elder brother.

I had left Drawwlog behind to deal with the dregs of our night's habitation.

Chuundar huffed, loping forward again. The harsh air scraped against my throat as I followed.

"(I was in a hurry)," Drawwlog whispered beside me. "(I was worried there might be more katarn)."

My stomach, empty but for the wasaka berries we had foraged the previous day, lurched at his quiet words.

Drawwlog and I were not yet grown enough to prove our mettle against the might of our planet, alone and unaided, as the gods bid all young warriors should. This excursion was merely a trial; a practice-run Chuundar had successfully argued for, despite the oddity of sending two younglings out alone without the watchful supervision of an Old One.

My brother had a keen eye and a sharp mind that would serve him well as chieftain, one day. He understood the need for our friend to test himself away from the shade of his autocratic sire, who would no doubt preside over Drawwlog's coming-of-age.

"(You did not see to the campfire cinders)," I said to Drawwlog, my words heavy. Ahead, I saw my brother's muscular form tense as he caught my words.

"(Stay here)," Chuundar barked at the both of us. With an irritated grunt, my brother bounded forward and soon slipped out of sight.

I did not drop Drawwlog’s gaze.

"(Fire does not catch in the Shadowlands)," Drawwlog replied, but it was a feeble protest, and judging from the worry in his dark eyes, even my young friend realized as much.

Over Drawwlog’s shoulder, beyond the nearest wroshyr, I caught the first glimpse of blackened, shriveled gorse.

Our home was a humid environment. Moisture hung dense in the air, even in the depths of the Shadowlands. The sap of the wroshyrs ran thick through branches and roots alike, and the musty soil held water enough to sustain all manner of life that called Kashyyyk home.

But fire was always a danger in any forest.

"(My father...)?" Drawwlog muttered. "(If this is my cause, he will never allow me...)

He did not finish the statement. Drawwlog’s sire had little faith in his youngest cub, and no patience with failure of any kind. Let alone the sort of mistake that no true guardian of Kashyyyk should ever make.

"(It is out)." I heard my brother's words before the pad of his returning feet. "(No wroshyr caught, of which we can be grateful. But the fire damage is extensive enough that there will be questions)."

Drawwlog’s head drooped. The charred scent of burnt tinder irritated the inside of my muzzle. Chuundar, drawing close to us, bore streaks of soot marring his shaggy coat.

I caught my brother's gaze above Drawwlog's bowed head. Castigating Drawwlog for idiocy would aid no one, but I wondered if Chuundar felt the desire to do so regardless.

I did.

"(It was my mistake)," Chuundar said after a lengthy pause. "(A pack of katarn took us all by surprise, and I chased you both away to safety. By the time I returned, it was too late)."

"(Chuundar-)?" Drawwlog gasped.

"(Go. Look)." My brother's voice had turned hard. "(See the ramifications of your actions, cub, and then we shall never speak of this again)."

Drawwlog ran, and I stared mutely at my brother.

"(Perhaps it was too soon for you both to come here)," Chuundar muttered. "(But what is done is done. Drawwlog needs the chance to grow from beneath the bough of his ancestors)."

"(You will tell Father?)"

"(No)," he answered, voice sharp. "(I will tell no one. And neither shall you, Zaalbar. Freyyr would not understand, and Drawwlog's sire would not forgive. The truth of today shall stay silent as the wroshyrs)."
The odour was acrid against the back of my throat.

The mighty wroshyrs in my mind slowly dissolved as the grind of pain made itself known. My forearm was numb. Somehow, I knew that was a bad sign.

I gasped in a wintry breath that smelled of ash and tasted of death. It was not quite the same as wildfire in a forest, no; I could recognize the difference now. This was the residue of ozone upon the air, mingling with charred organic material-

Jen

I lurched off the floor as awareness scalded through my body, overriding the deep lance of pain that bordered on debilitating. We had been facing Bastila Shan. Jen had been talking- arguing- with her bond-sister, before Bastila had done something to her and then I was thrown back-

I was barely aware of my own unsteadiness as I gazed in horror upon the scene in front of me.

The air was iced with cold. The scent - I knew it now - was the taint of foul electrical discharge. This was nothing like a Shadowlands bushfire.

This was everything like the Leviathan had been.

Madclaw madness.

...

The slam as cauterized durasteel landed on the ground ahead was loud, but the blast of frigid air from beyond was worse.

"(Jen!)" I howled, unable to see ahead, my arms full of Carth Onasi and my shoulder weighted with Canderous Ordo.

"Whoa!" Mission cried, having followed Jolee Bindo through the hole he had made in the welded lilac hatch. "Jen- what's all that black stuff- Jen, are you okay?"

I leaned against the wall, unable to bend through the makeshift entrance without dropping the comatose pilot. My nose wrinkled in immediate disgust; I had to fight the urge to gag against the rancid stench of scorched hair and flesh.

"Jen!" Juhani gasped. She was deeper in, having entered first with the old man. "Jen, are you alri-
"

"Stand back!" Jolee Bindo's voice was loud and sharp with an alarm I had never heard from him before. "All of you, get back, now!"

A low voice I did not know murmured something in reply.

"Juhani, you must take the others back to the ship," Jolee Bindo ordered. "Do it now, child!"

The Cathar protested something, but Onasi's cub heeded the old man, clambering back out through the hole. Mission followed, and as she retreated behind me I finally caught a clear glimpse into the chamber beyond.

Jen was kneeling, surrounded by an aura of darkness. Threads of madclaw black licked flames around her frozen figure, like spirits from the netherworld resurrected to conquer her mind and body alike.
The fur on my neck stood up in shock.

"Do not come near," the same foreign voice from before ordered, quiet as the night, commanding as nature itself. "I will be alone. I will it."

...

My soul howled at the sight of the woman I was indebted to, bowed beneath the weight of a foreign anathema I could not comprehend. Slips of inky black wisped about her, the shackles of a curse she could not chase away.

This is what Mission meant when she said Jen was once Darth Revan. I knew it only as a title of the baseborn Sith, but now I understood the name went deeper. The roots of a perfidious evil had risen forth to claim Jen Sahara once more.

On the Leviathan, Jolee Bindo had drawn Jen Sahara back to herself. The Human male who knew the Shadowlands like one of my people, the hermit who was more of a Jedi Old One than he would admit. Jolee Bindo had spoken words of Jedi counsel; words I had not heard, words I could not replicate.

Jolee Bindo was not here this time. Only I, and...

Beyond Jen Sahara, standing preternaturally still next to a vast viewport window, was her lost bond-sister.

Bastila Shan was facing away, a figure netted in flowing black, garbed as the Jedi I had once travelled with would never have desired.

Neither of them moved nor spoke - lest not so I could hear. But, somehow, I knew words were flowing between the two of them.

I must reach Jen Sahara. I felt my hackles rising; whether at the unnatural cold or in stark trepidation, I did not know. I have not the wisdom of a Jedi, nor the strength of a magic bond, nor even the easy camaraderie of one such as Mission. But I must try. This madness is not what the woman I vowed my life to would wish upon herself - or upon her bond-sister.

I took a step forward, wholly uncertain of what I would do or say, but only knowing that I had to do something.

As I did so, however, I caught the slightest flicker of peripheral movement.

My limbs stilled, my head turned, and my gaze darted sidelong to see Yudan Rosh in a ready crouch, one golden limb raised high at Jen Sahara's back-

"(No!)" The roar was feral. My muscles bunched into a frantic leap toward him. But I was metres away, and no shield against the Force. "(You cannot!"

The Twi'lek's fist released, fingers spanning out in invisible attack. I skidded mid-sprint, glancing back wildly to Jen, praying she had guarded her back against an ally that everyone else had doubted-

She did not fall. She did not stand. She did not turn around to face us.

Whatever Yudan Rosh had attempted, it did not work.
"Stasis, Yudan?" Jen Sahara's voice was naught more than a murmur, deep and throaty like the purr of a rancor. "I expected a lightsaber in the back."

Inaction held me still; I no longer knew if I should go to Jen, or stride forward to knock the duplicitous Twi'lek flat.

"I will not allow you to fall again, Revan." Yudan's voice had lowered just like hers, but when I looked to him, I saw the palpable cast of defeat cross his face. His outraised limb shook, clenched, and then fell down to grasp his lightsaber.

Perhaps we fought for Jen in our own way, but Yudan Rosh could not win. Not like this. All he would accomplish would be to further damn the woman we both swore to follow.

"I know," Jen whispered.

Like a loose vine swinging back and forth in the depths of darkness, I once more stared uselessly at her bowed figure.

Further ahead, Bastila Shan had whirled around, flurries of dark material spinning around her like a wyyyschokk's web. Her skin was chalk-white, and her eyes blazed with the foreign hue of corruption I had seen in the alien irises of Yudan Rosh. Bastila Shan had always been lithe for a Human, but the woman in front of us now bordered on skeletal.

Bastila's mouth tightened.

"Revan. We have spoken enough," Bastila clipped out. Her foreign accent was as crisp as I recalled, yet there was a hardness to it that was unfamiliar. "You must deal with your... your allies, and then face Malak alone. I cannot follow. From a distance I shall lend you my strength, all that we have together, and he shall be defeated."

I stepped forward.

"(Do not turn against her, Yudan Rosh)," I rumbled in the softest whisper I could muster. I took another stride, allowing the man the advantage of my back as I focused only on Jen. "(Honour can come after dishonour. Jen Sahara taught me that. Strength after corruption. Have faith in her, as she does in you)."

"Revan," Bastila prompted again, this time in overt irritation. "You understand enough. Your old general just assaulted you. We cannot accommodate unnecessary sentiment - not even yours."

"(Jen)." I was near her, now. I could see my own breath puff in the arctic air. Around her, the obsidian flickers held steady, like an encircling wreath of death. "(Please. This is not the way)."

But what words did I have to offer? Nothing more than the simple, stark utterances of a sentient that had no comprehension of the struggles one like her faced. All I had was a Wookiee's understanding of right from wrong.

Jen Sahara did not answer.

Bastila was glaring at me, now, as I stepped around to face Jen.

"I shall abide no interference, Wookiee," Bastila snapped. "Abide by the terms of your life-debt to Revan and obey our will, or face the consequences."

"You will leave him alone."
Jen's voice was not loud, but the words still crashed implacably throughout the room. Her chin snapped up, and the turn of her profile was angular, almost sunken, in her strange hairless cheeks.

"Revan, the galaxy-"

"Will wait a minute. He has earned the right to speak his piece." Jen glided to her feet smoothly, silently, turning to gaze upon me. Her eyes... I had never been adept at reading the emotions of aliens. Yet the dispassionate way she viewed me through those darkened green eyes caught at my heart.

The woman I had travelled with for so long looked like she did not even recognize me.

"This is the only way." Her lips barely moved. "There is more at stake than we knew when we first embarked upon this quest."

Jen Sahara's words were slow, measured, and laden with a deep grief I could only presume stemmed from the horrors of her past. My gaze dropped to the flashes of nightfall that danced around her. I did not know if they were a manifestation of the corruption that shackled her, or simply an indication of her state of mind.

"(I know little of your Force, Jen Sahara)," I began slowly. "(I can only say what you and Bastila Shan and Juhani and Jolee Bindo have told me. This Dark Side is not a tool that can be controlled. You may have the right intentions, but when you start compromising your own honour those intentions change. You have been down this path before. You know where it ends)."

Jen jerked a hand upright, in the abrupt and universal motion for halt. It took me a brief moment to realize the gesture not directed at me - but at Bastila Shan.

I could not forget the mind-talk those two were capable of.

"(Your bond-sister would have you reclaim this factory)," I continued. I wondered what Bastila Shan was murmuring in Jen's mind. Lies? Threats? Promises? "(What will you sacrifice to do so? Will you destroy the starships outside that you vowed to fight for? Will you kill the allies that have been at your side and bled for your cause? Will you forsake everything, Jen Sahara, only to find you have become what you once were?)"

Jen's closed expression did not change, not at my words. But a second later, there was a flinch, and those heavy eyes shot back to Bastila.

Her bond-sister, whispering words of poison I could not hear.

"Sacrifice is required for a higher purpose," Jen said hoarsely, but she was staring at Bastila, now. "You must understand that, Zaalbar. I... sacrificed everything I held dear, last time, for the sake of the whole. All, all ruined..." The words trailed away, lost and bereft as a winter's breeze.

"For the sake of sentiment," Bastila cut in. Her eyes flashed the bright yellow of sunstone. "Because you trusted where you should not. This time it is different."

"(Is it?)" I whispered. "(Would any Force master truly agree with that?)"

"You know nothing, Wookiee!" Bastila snarled, face contorting in a fury that was as sudden as it was unbridled. One hand shot up, fist clenched, and for an instant I felt a tight band compress around my neck-

"I said no!"
Something frozen lashed through the room.

The pressure against my throat dispersed as if it had never been. Jen made no move that I could see, but the thwarted scowl on her bond-sister's face was answer enough.

"We have the power this time, Revan." Like the flick of a switch, Bastila Shan retreated into an eerie calm. "We have the strength to use it wisely, and the understanding to keep our focus on the true threat. Revan-
"

She stopped talking, but the two women were still fixated on each other. Words, unspoken, were travelling between them, and I had the sinking image of Bastila's will slowly entangling Jen's like a kshyyy vine-

...

"(We are the guardians of Kashyyyk, Zaalbar)," Chuundar rumbled. "(And the wroshyrs are the pillars)."

We stood together in the depths of the Shadowlands, quiet and still as the area around us.

There was a balance in nature that Wookiees understood well, and the harmony of the encircling kshyyy vines as they grew upon the mighty wroshyrs were but one example.

Sometimes, though, that balance was upset.

"(Tell me, brother, what do you see?)"

I frowned, staring at the massive hulk of the wroshyr. Everything from the tiniest dirt-bug to the ancient trees obeyed the cycle of life, and even the centuries-old wroshyrs would eventually succumb to old age or disease. Rough hanks of bark would erode, then, and the symbiotic kshyyy creepers would no longer encircle the outer shell, reaching for the skies with the aid of Kashyyyk's pillars.

No, instead the kshyyy found cracks in the trunk to snarl deep inside, slowly strangling the inner bark, tainting the wood-flesh with sap-poison as the vines hastened the inevitable.

The tree might take generations to die, but a decomposing wroshyr could make a gigantic mess.

"(This tree is not old)," I said slowly. "(Nor do I see any sign of disease, bar the blackening tar of kshyyy sap breaching its trunk)."

Chuundar huffed in approval. "(Come)."

He began loping around the girth of the colossal tree; which, down here, bore little evidence of the kshyyy vines that had overcome it hundreds of metres above. The creepers were no danger to Wookiees; in fact, their tough, sinewy fibres made them a staple in many of our constructions topside. But their prolific nature made them a danger to much of Kashyyyk's foliage - even the wroshyrs, if circumstances allowed.

"(There)." Chuundar raised a paw, indicating a jagged hole in the trunk only a scant few metres from the ground. I frowned again, staring at the edges of thick bark as the hole narrowed half a metre deep into the tree. I knew not what manner of event could have dealt this damage - but I could clearly see it was not a mark of decrepitude.

Near the base of the hole, a pale creeper - so thin and weak, down here in the lightless Shadowlands - had wormed into the inner hull of the wroshyr.

"(This happened some time ago. An accident. Perhaps some off-worlders trespassed here to hunt our big game, and crashed their vehicle into the wroshyr)." Chuundar's voice was calm. In his stead, my father would have been full with invective at the blight of foreigners, who found their way to Kashyyyk from time-to-time. "(But the tree is sound, Zaalbar)."

Chuundar reached down, one paw trailing the thin kshyyy vine down to the soil, before yanking it out by the roots.

"(I thought Father always left the kshyyy vines alone?)" I ventured, as my brother began applying a ground paste of fermented wasaka leaves to the tangling fibres of the kshyyy. It was one of the few substances known as toxic to the pervasive plant.

There was a rumble of amusement from my older brother. "(Father believes in allowing nature to find her own course. I think, sometimes, a guiding hand can help forge nature's strength. This wroshyr will remain a pillar of Kashyyyk for many generations yet)."

"(But it still bears the same weakness for a kshyyy to find)."

"(The trunk shall thicken and scab over in time, Zaalbar)." Chuundar shrugged, wiping his paste-stained fingers on his flank. "(In the interim, we can stand watch. After all, we are Kashyyyk's guardians)."

It was a more proactive approach than our chieftain would take, but I found myself nodding in agreement. Chuundar snorted, before clapping a heavy hand on my shoulder.

"(Our father is wise, and it behooves you to listen to his words. But he is not all-knowing. Take heed of your elders, but learn to grow your own wisdom too, little brother)."

...

Was Bastila Shan the kshyyy vine slowly strangling Jen Sahara's will? Or was it the dark side of their Force, intertwined in that insidious mind-bond, that fettered the both of them?

"(My brother was once good and righteous, Jen Sahara)," I said softly. "(The Wookiee I faced a few weeks ago was not the same brother I revered. Yet there was a time when Chuundar's honour was greater than his ambition)."

I did not think she was even hearing my words. Jen, still, had her eyes locked with her bond-sister.

An angry hiss cut through the chamber as Bastila Shan took a step closer. "Revan, this wastes time we cannot afford! The petty squabbles of some meaningless individuals-"

"(Chuundar did not wake one day a villain!)" I hollered, drowning out Bastila Shan's disparagement with the strength of my voice. "(He could justify every action, Jen. Every time he believed the compromise of his own integrity was necessary-"

"The Wookiee is raving," Bastila snapped, her voice almost a growl. "Revan. This is of no import. Deal with him, so we can focus on what we must!"

I drew away from Jen to meet Bastila's vengeful glare. The battle was with her, I realized suddenly. With the tortured woman who had not even been on Kashyyyk. The one who no longer addressed me by name, whose poisoned eyes spat scorn and enmity and labelled me as nothing more than an obstacle to remove.
I understood, then, that I could not reach Jen Sahara over the acidic invective of the one chained to her.

And Bastila Shan was a Human I understood even less than Jen Sahara.

I huffed, drawing in a draft of air as I held the furious gaze of the fallen Jedi. "(My brother wrested control of the largest settlement on Kashyyyk, Bastila Shan)," I said, hurriedly searching for the words before she intervened again. "(Chuundar believed in the greater picture. He thought he was strengthening Rwookrroro, and that sacrifices were a small price to pay for his vision of the future. Right to the very end, when he struck out at his father and brother alike to hide his own atrocities, Chuundar still believed in his own ideal - and could not see how it had warped along the way)."

Did Bastila Shan dare to ignore the parallels? How sacrifice would erode objectivity, even in the best of men, even without the pernicious nature of their Force influencing matters?

There had been a time when Chuundar had revered and loved our sire. My brother had believed in a better world, and no doubt envisaged Freyyr as part of it. Once, Chuundar would never have dreamed of exiling our father, of striking out at him, of silencing Freyyr by any means possible.

Jen Sahara had labelled the man dying behind us as Bastila Shan's own master. From what I understood of the Jedi Order, their masters raised Force-sensitive cubs as their own.

Riddled with blaster burns, Yudan Rosh had said. Vrook is your master! Jen had cried. Bastila, what did you do?

Sparks of furious white sprung to life, spitting and crackling around Bastila's clenched fists. At my side, the black glow dimmed. Bastila did not move forward to attack me, but I could read the desire to do so in the bunching of her shoulders.

"You dare compare the scrabbling of some backwater village with the fate of the galaxy?"

"(Look upon the body of your Jedi father!)" I roared, flinging a hand behind me.

Bastila Shan blinked. The jagged shards of white vanished, as if in surprise, as the woman stumbled back a pace.

But Bastila did not turn to look.

"(That is what you shall become, Bastila Shan!)" I cried, my forearm still gesturing to the wall behind us. "(How can you claim the greater good when your own actions belie it?)"

Her eyes narrowed. "Sacrifice-

"Sacrifice is fundamental, Zaalbar." It was Jen, stepping forward to flank me. I felt the bottom of my stomach fall out with the weight of her heavy words. My head turned, slowly, apprehensively, to face Jen Sahara again.

Her face was drawn; blank and dead as if she were no more than a carved effigy of remembrance. Her lips did not seem to move, but Jen Sahara's strangely low voice was impossible to ignore. "Sacrifice is a truth I discerned during the Mandalorian Wars. Cede a few thousand to save five times that many. Grant the enemy ground if it gives you the overall strategic advantage. The Mandalorians are a warlike people, and we had to learn to fight the way they did."

All attention was on Jen Sahara, now. With a start, I realized the black dregs of her corruption had completely gone. Jen stood facing Bastila, eyes wide and dark and ancient as the galaxy itself. With a shiver of foreboding, I realized I had no idea if anything had reached Jen at all - or which side she now stood upon.

"Many thought the galaxy would be a safer place if the Mandalorians were driven to extinction." She continued speaking, voice as quiet as it was commanding. "Their culture encourages honour through combat, strength through the subjugation of others. But the Mandalorians are not the only warlike people amongst the stars. One could argue the Zabrak of Iridonia are just as bloodthirsty. Their love of violence blights the Zabrak species as a whole. Would peace not be more prevalent, galactically speaking, without the existence of the Iridonians?"

"(Jen, what are you saying?)" I rumbled, fists clenching in stark alarm.

"And we cannot forget criminal organizations like the Exchange. What do they offer, other than a means of encouraging the base desires of all who engage their services?" Jen Sahara's voice was monotone, hard as titasteel and just as implacable. "No, better to wipe every element of the Exchange from the galaxy. Czerka, too, if they keep dealing in extortionist trade and indigenous enslavement."

Bastila Shan was frowning, now. "Revan-"

"Disease is another factor, Bastila. Think of the rakghoul plague. Malak stopped at surface bombardment. Perhaps he should have bombed Taris into complete oblivion. Can you imagine the death toll should that virus ever be transmitted to other worlds?"

"Revan, you are being preposterous-"

"Am I?" Jen cut in coldly. "Differing cultures and beliefs breed friction, and it is far more efficient to stamp out dissent than inveigle oneself in any form of mediation that fails more often than it succeeds. Think of the whole, Bastila," she mocked. "Think of the galaxy, not the individual."

"Of course there must be a balance-" Bastila was spluttering, bright spots of red dawning on her pale cheeks.

"Yes." The word was a hiss. "Balance. There's the magic word. And where's yours? When you cannot even look upon Vrook's body?"

"That is not fair!" The cry was plaintive, but Bastila still did not look.

"How much do you sacrifice, Bastila? How far do you go?" Jen drew in a deep breath, and she turned to face me. Somewhere, between the blank expression and the green eyes that now blazed with emotion, I could once more see the honourable hero I had sworn my life to.

Jen's next words, barely more than a whisper, stuttered us all into silence.

"How far do you go, until you become the war?"

xXx

Yudan Rosh:

Have faith in her, as she does in you.

I stood silent and still, my will eroded by a Wookiee's simple loyalty, realizing that my faith was as much with him as it was with Revan. That, perhaps, Zaalbar's method of vanquishing Darth Revan was a redemption I had started to believe in.
She had returned. She had stumbled, perhaps even fallen... and somehow found her way back to her feet again.

The Force convulsed around Revan, an icy tidal wave of potential - once more held tight beneath an iron will. The power was deep, it was dark and all-encompassing... but it no longer owned her.

Revan glanced sideways, to acknowledge the Wookiee who embodied more wisdom than most Jedi I had ever known.

"How far do you go," she said softly to the room at large, "Until you become the war?"

Oh, Revan.

I heard a harsh intake of air as Bastila Shan struggled not to react. The latest paragon of the Jedi was younger than I expected, for all that I had seen her atop the Lehon holo-stand. She was shorter than Revan, and carried herself with an innate poise even while flaring with passionate fury. Bastila's rich brown hair was cinched back in tiny ornamental braids, leaving bare an aristocratic and unnaturally shock-white face.

So strange, to think that this slip of a Human had been the one to show Darth Revan such unwarranted mercy. It would have taken a special brand of devout courage... courage, that later faltered beneath the machinations of her own Order.

"The depth of power we can reach will hold us true, Revan!" Bastila's verbal riposte was more of a dying splutter. "You have seen this before-

"And it's a load of kath crap I used to justify my own helplessness in the face of a horror I could not overcome," Revan broke in sharply, swinging back to stare solidly at her. "Bastila, all such power guarantees is that our darkness will simply be all the darker."

My jaw clenched. Fingers pressed hard against the grooves of Zhar Lestin's lightsaber. Revan recalled so little of her past, but the cursed Star Forge had evidently been bleeding back remnants to her. And despite that - or perhaps because of it - Revan now understood a truth that had eluded her before.

The Dark Side cannot be mastered without losing oneself.

I felt my voice return as I stepped forward. "No one in the annals of history has ever mastered the Dark Side and simultaneously remained true to the Light," I said in a low voice. Once again, I was entrenched at Revan's side. But this time - I hoped - it was a more conscious decision than in the past.

I would find my own path away from Revan one day. But not yet. Not yet.

Revan's head tilted ever-so-slightly in my direction, but she kept her attention fixed on the young woman Force-bonded to her. "It is the height of hubris to assume we can achieve what is patently contrary to everything the Dark Side entails," Revan said. "Your guards struck down Vrook. I highly doubt he was here to fight you, Bastila. How can you justify that with your goal of galactic harmony?"

The young woman flinched visibly. "He was- he was-"An inconvenience," Revan finished. Her voice softened. "I know. I mutilated the face of my own lover for the same reason."

Revan... remembers? She remembers that? The passion in her voice wasn't dark, but at that moment I worried just how close she was to breaking. Revan was reaching Bastila Shan, now, but would either of them recover from the fallout?

"Malak was guilty!"

"But I believed him innocent!" Revan roared. "I saw that cursed memory, Bastila! I cared more about losing face among my own damn subordinates than the well-being of the man who had stood by me since infancy!"

My breath caught. I had always imagined that Revan had known at that juncture...

"Balance, Bastila," Revan continued hoarsely. "I don't know where the frelling balance should be, but I'd slid light-years past it by then. While slicing off a lover's jaw was by no means the worst atrocity I enacted, perhaps it was the most personal." She paused to draw in a shuddering breath. "When you lose empathy for those closest to you, what do you have left?"

Bastila Shan did not answer. She stood stock-still, unshed moisture glistening in those flawed, sun-bright eyes that mirrored my own.

Revan's voice dropped to a gentle murmur. "Look at Vrook's body, Bastila."

The younger woman jerked, but she still refused to heed. Twin tears budded and fell, tracking a telling path down her pale face. "You are- you are forgetting-"

"The true threat?" Revan whispered. Like a sandcrawler, slowly but inexorably pressing her point home. "The scary danger we can't even define? The horror in the Unknown Regions? I claimed the Star Forge to fight against whatever it is. Who's to say that wasn't the enemy's plan in the first place?"

"What?" Bastila hissed in shock. The widening of her eyes said it all: that was a speculation that had never occurred to her. Or to myself. Or, I assumed, to Darth Revan.

"If so, then all I achieved, in the end, was to continue what Mandalore started. To further weaken the Republic - and the galaxy as a whole."

"No." Bastila shook her head wildly, delicate braids swinging, artificial light glinting against the betraying wetness on her cheeks. "No-"

"We don't know, Bastila. I don't know, and neither do you. All we have is broken fragments from my mind, and a handful of Malak's corrupted memories that he forced upon you. We can't trust either source!"

"The Star Forge is a relic of the Rakatan!" Bastila protested. "Their species is extinct! Whatever is beyond known space-"

"Yudan told me I learned of the Star Forge before I went to the Unknown Regions, Bastila," Revan cut in doggedly. With each word, I could sense the chaotic Force encompassing her harden, and the uncertainty around Bastila Shan grow. "So the knowledge was in my mind, when I rushed head-long to face something powerful enough to start the Mandalorian Wars." A harsh laugh escaped Revan. "Or maybe the Star Forge was purely my own decision. I simply don't know. But enlivening a millennia-old superweapon of the Dark Side to take on the Republic sure doesn't sound like the actions of a galactic guardian."

"You did it to save the Republic. To save the galaxy," Bastila whispered, her voice wobbling. "It was the only way to be strong enough to fight against- against- Dammit, Revan! If not for Malak, the galaxy would be stronger, more defensible, lean and war-hardened and ready to stand firm against anything!"

"I don't believe that anymore," Revan countered in a flat voice. "And I certainly wasn't thinking about the Republic at the end. Bastila-" She broke off with a sigh. "This place amplifies every insidious desire and destructive thought you have. It slowly warps your intentions and purpose. If you allow yourself to succumb - no matter what your end game is - then one day you will find yourself betraying everything you value. Because you no longer value it." A ghost of a wry grin twitched at Revan's mouth, but her eyes were still so damn bleak. "I guess the Jedi don't have it all wrong - and I rather think you know it."

"But-" Bastila swallowed, and Revan took a step closer. Little more than a metre separated them, now. "But everything you've- I've- done... it's all been because... and it's all..."

"Ruined," Revan finished. "I know. We did it to ourselves, Bastila. But that doesn't mean we can't try to make it right. That you can't find your way back to the person you were."

There was a painful ache in my soul. It did not escape me that Revan excluded herself from that last sentence. You are more like the champion you once were than you realize, Revan Freeflight. I yearned to say the words aloud. More than I believed could be possible.

"I- I-" the young woman stuttered, and another teardrop trembled on her lashes. "I am not sure I know anything anymore."

Revan snorted loudly.

There's my old friend, I thought in exasperated affection. Once more displaying her irreverence in the most dire of situations.

"I know that feeling well," Revan muttered. "But the one thing I'm certain of is that the Star Forge must be destroyed. For the sake of the galaxy, Bastila." Her words were wry, teasing. "For the greater good."

"You- I- you cannot-" Bastila broke off, voice hitching and shoulders shaking. With a loud sob, she abruptly dropped her head into her hands. "Damn you, Revan!" she cried, voice muffled and broken. "How can you jest- such serious matters- must you always-"

Revan strode the last step forward, and with a half-muttered oath, embraced her bond-sister fiercely.

The sense of amelioration was cathartic. My eyes closed briefly as I felt the inherent darkness around the two women contract. A victory like this wasn't won in a single conversation, but Revan was successfully holding the tide of calamity at bay. And Bastila Shan, I dared to hope, would prove strong enough to keep fighting the same demons we all did.

As the young Jedi prodigy fell to pieces in Revan's arms, I looked sideways to see the Wookiee appraising me.

"(Jen Sahara is unlike any sentient I have ever known)," Zaalbar rumbled in a quiet whisper. "(She is an astonishing individual)."

"I heard that, Zaalbar," Revan muttered, but she kept her arms tight around the sobbing Bastila. For all of Revan's levity, she sounded on the verge of tears herself. "Hah! You're the amazing one."
Personally, I rather thought they were both correct.

xXx

Bastila Shan:

"Go to Vrook," Revan murmured. "While there's still time."

"I can't." I detested the feeble whimper my voice had devolved into, the helpless shaking of my shoulders as I stood, impotent, in the embrace of a mind-damaged former Sith Lord. Oh, the absurdity of allowing myself to become so undone, of being unable to hold back the tide of mortification, of shame-

-you will lose everything. they will not forgive. and Malak will win-

"The Star Forge-" I mumbled brokenly. What is the right way? Revan speaks of balance and empathy, but when I have sacrificed so much already... How can I truly know if turning back is the right path?

-the right path is the one that ensures the galaxy's survival at any cost-

Well, I'm hardly the judge on what's right, Revan's thought nudged against mine. There was an almost soulless quality to her mental presence. Trust me, Bastila. Trust me.

-you convinced her before. you can do it again-

"The Star Forge still calls." My eyes were squeezed tight, yet still leaking incriminating tears of unchecked emotion. My face, wet and sticky like a child's, pressed hard into Revan's shoulder. My heart stuttered and shook with uncertainty, and I felt more adrift and lost than I ever thought possible.

"Yes," Revan uttered, a hollow echo of fathomless grief. She pulled back gently, and I could sense the exhausted struggle within her as she scrambled to overcome her own pain. "Right now, it's telling me I'd murder for a cup of caffea."

My breath hitched, and I found myself frowning in nothing more than pure reflex against such impudent flippancy. "Revan-"

The faint twitch at the corner of her mouth forestalled my response. "Coping mechanism, Bastila," she murmured in wry apology. I was at once beset with a recollection of her muttering something similar, during that thwarted escape run that now seemed a lifetime ago.

Surely no more than weeks had passed. Days, even. Yet in such a short span of time, I had transformed into someone entirely different. I no longer knew myself, let alone what I would do next.

-save the galaxy. what else can you do? what else would any true protector do?- All I felt like I could do was follow Revan's lead.

Revan stepped back, dropping her arms. Her eyes were dark pools of desolation, and through the bond ricocheted a vacant sense of emptiness, a pervasive desire to cede all purpose and drive.

The sentiment stemmed from us both.
The Dark Side offered seductive power and freedom from transgression. The Light demanded accountability even as it strived for the lofty heights of selflessness.

I simply wanted to surrender and let someone else look after the galaxy for once.

"The kaiburr is nothing more than your own thoughts, Bastila," Revan said gently. "Corrupted, warped, and louder than normal... but it stems from your own soul."

"I am not sure if that makes it better or worse," I whispered.

The smile on Revan's face was so sad. My own despair and self-doubt were choking me, but every now and then I sensed a glimmer of her disposition... if my soul was a turgid ocean, hers was a chasm of devastation that spanned planets. Impossible to quantify or breach.

Yet there she was, standing before me, somehow finding the wherewithal to do what she must. I had the awful supposition that the only thing holding Revan together now was me. My brittle fragility and failure to cope, compelling her back into the role of leader.

Or, perhaps, Revan Freeflight merely had the grit to keep on going, no matter what she had to suffer through.

"It is not anything but an explanation, Bastila Shan," the quiet voice of Yudan Rosh spoke. Another flawed, fallen sentient, standing aloof from us with a distant expression on his Sith-marked face. "The Star Forge... the Dark Side tempts you with your deepest desires. Some of us have learned the hard way that what is delivered is but a corrupted version of your original intent. Of course, your intent has changed by then, but in the end, what you desire is often not even what you truly need."

He blinked, as if startled by his own words, and his attention sharpened on Revan who had raised a brow in question. The Twi'lek smiled faintly. "But now I am waxing philosophical, and that is most unbecoming for a former Dark Jedi."

Revan snorted. "Well, I did say you liked to act on the tragic side, Yudan. Although I suppose you've earned the right." Her gaze darted back to mine. "Bastila. The kaiburr is calling you because you are allowing it. You're meant to be at least moderately proficient at mental guarding," she said dryly, before her voice snapped into a steel command. "So raise your shields."

My teeth clenched.

And like a padawan bowing beneath the will of a master, I did as I was bid.

"Go," Revan ordered, taking a step back from me. "Go and see to Vrook."

I stumbled forward, blinking back the blurriness that obscured my vision, vaguely aware of the Wookiee - of Zaalbar - leaning over the fallen body in brown that was crumpled against the sloping wall.

Did Vrook still live? Could he still be alive, after all those- those bolts-\n\nThe searing sound of my own words - shoot out his knees. Scrape him off the floor of my chamber. If he tries anything, kill him - mocked me with my own cruelty.

I could have ordered him away- no, no, he would not have listened- but surely I could have stunned him or found some other method rather than order those Force-cursed guards to butcher my own master-
Hot tears scalded down my cheeks as I collapsed next to the man who had mentored me since childhood. Vrook had always been gruff and distant - but he was one of the only people I had left in the galaxy, now that I had spurned everything the Order had taught me.

"(His wounds are serious)," Zaalbar rumbled from across Vrook's motionless body. Dark blood soaked into tattered robes, leaving them more crimson than brown. "(The torso one is the most worrying)."

It was impossible to halt the flood of unbearable shame.

"Bastila," Revan said, coming to stand next to me. "The old man risked everything to come here for you. If he's any sort of Jedi, he'd consider his life a fair exchange. Vrook would be proud of you, right now, for turning away."

"Proud of me?" I stuttered in disbelief. "Revan, I have failed at everything-"

"No, you haven't." Her voice was oddly quiet, and yet it silenced me regardless. "Because we're going to win."

I glanced up sharply; she had sequestered her mind from mine, a faraway look on her composed face, and a cool, steel edge to her presence in the bond. Perhaps Revan felt the weight of my gaze, for she looked back down at me with a faint smile.

It did not breach the hollow look in her eyes.

"Internal bleeding," Yudan Rosh intoned, walking closer. I could feel the strands of Force venture forth from the Twi'lek's grasp, investigative threads of energy that were well beyond any concentration I could currently muster. "He needs medical attention, and we have exhausted all supplies. My own prowess with healing was somewhat mediocre, even when I claimed the title of Jedi Knight."

Force abilities warped and changed with one's use of power. But surely, I could at least try-

"Draw him down deeper, Yudan." Revan's tone turned abruptly flat. "We're out of time. Malak is calling me."

I gasped, my eyes flying back to Revan, whose shoulders had tensed as she stared at the chamber's half-moon doors. What- what does she mean? Malak is calling her - how?

Revan sighed; a quiet slip of sound that barely registered. "It's time to move, and I need your skills elsewhere, Bastila. Vrook's survival will just have to rest upon luck."

"Luck," I mumbled brokenly, as the Force surged out once more from the Twi'lek. I fought against the inane urge to block the fallen man, even as I felt my old master subsume into a deeper, more stable, state of subconsciousness. "Master Vrook never believed in luck."

"Call it the will of the Force, then," Revan returned quietly. Her hand dropped to rest on my shoulder, a gentle prompt to leave. To leave my master, broken because of me. "Bastila, I need your skills out there. You can turn the tide around."

"Battle meditation," I whispered, feeling my eyes flutter at the thought. My entire being was fragmented into a hundred vacillating slivers of indecision, and even the thought of lapsing into normal meditation seemed absurd. "I- I cannot, Revan. It requires a level of concentration and purpose of mind that I simply do not have right now."
How could I play at being the Republic's puppet saviour again? After everything? It felt like hypocrisy of the worst sort.

"You can and you will." Revan's hard-edged command brooked no argument. "Because you must."

Only you can achieve this, Bastila. Revan's indomitable will hammered into me from all sides. The Republic has a shot at destroying the Star Forge, and that is the real victory today. I'll do my damnedest to get you out of here alive- but if I don't- if I fall against Malak, then we must make sure the Forge is taken out.

Despite everything I had considered and formulated in recent times, I found myself beginning to agree with her objective. Her objective, that had once been mine.

If the Star Forge is destroyed while we are on it-

Then we die. Yes. Revan did not even sound grieved at the thought - merely resolute. But the Republic will have a chance to rebuild. A chance to survive. If the threat is real, it has made no overt move yet.

The threat was real. That I was more convinced of it than the redeemed Darth Revan was absurdly ironic.

We blow the Forge, Bastila.

My head dipped in a nod.

I could not undo the travesty of my own actions, much the same as Revan, but perhaps- perhaps- we could begin to set things aright.

Revan. A low baritone punched into our conjoined awareness with the subtlety of a permacrete detonator. I will go after your little crew if you do not come-

A brief flash of psychic power flared from Revan, and the mocking voice was cut off abruptly.

My gasp was loud and harsh. Revan's eyes narrowed as my own widened in shock. Malak. His voice was familiar and frightening and loathsome, and had never entered my consciousness from such a distance before.

Malak was- was speaking into Revan's mind from afar- and how long had that been happening?

I knew how powerful he was, with the kaiburr's strength in his clenched fist, deep within the nexus of this place. That is part of why I strove to claim it for our own. Because I knew we could not be victorious otherwise.

No, no, I had been thinking of the galaxy-

"Bastila, you can spend your days berating yourself for a fall you had no chance to evade after-" Revan's voice was almost a growl. "After we win. But we're out of time. Leave Vrook, and-" she stopped, abruptly, frowning as she stared at the body. "Overconfidence," she muttered under her breath, glaring at Vrook.

Everyone is fallible. Revan's voice rang in my mind, but somehow I knew she wasn't speaking to me. Even you. Especially you.
I felt like I had heard those words before.

"Bastila," Revan said sharply, giving her head a little shake. "Stand up."

With a start, I remembered. The memory, sharp and brittle like broken ferraglass, of Darth Revan floating in that kolto tank while one master after another took turns apiece to stare at the comatose Sith Lord I had brought to Dantooine.

I had shared that recollection with Revan, during our desperate flight for freedom. So odd - and strangely sad - that what she focused on was Vrook's castigation as he had glared upon her stricken form.

"Leave the past behind," Revan was saying, as she pulled me to my feet. "I need you in the present, Bastila. I have faith in you. Just like you have always believed in me."

In that instant, I could feel the strength of her regard shine through our bond like a beacon of warm light.

"You had the courage and strength to face down a Sith Lord on her own flagship," Revan murmured, "Even when the corpses of Jedi Masters lay warm by your feet. This- this is no more than a hand of pazaak by comparison."

The smile on my face was tremulous, but the hope within, I thought, beheld a stronger core.

Whatever would happen to me later was of no import. Not now. My focus narrowed to one objective only: destruction of the Star Forge.

"Three fallen scions of the Jedi Order, standing against the might of the Sith Empire," Yudan mocked in a gentle voice. "Things are never dull around you, Revan."

The corner of Revan's mouth twitched, but she did not turn from me. "I will stand watch until you start, Bastila," she murmured. "But then I must go."

Revan gestured impatiently to the centre of the chamber, and as I began to move, I saw her gaze linger over the dismantled form of that dreadful robot. Her thoughts grew distant, once more, as she withdrew from us all, thinking only on her next steps. On what was required of her, despite the yearning desire to avoid what she must be anticipating as the most horrific encounter of all.

Malak.

As I fell to my knees, I glanced one last time over my shoulder. A thoughtful frown was pleating Revan's brow as she looked over Yudan and Zaalbar, before she took a deep breath in and her mouth edged into grimness.

I knew, then, that she meant to go alone.

xXx

Forn Dodonna:

::It has been a pleasure, Forn.:: Admiral Rickard Gant stared at me seriously through the holostand. His Core-bred accent was almost drowned out by the wail of his dreadnought's emergency sirens. ::Get as many of those Sith bastards as you can. I'll see you on the other side.::

"Rickard," I bit out. "Get yourself to the escape-"
Gant's holo-image winked out abruptly.

I allowed my eyelids to flutter closed for one second only.

"Sensors indicate the inertial compressor of the Astral Pride has been destroyed," a tech said, his inflection devoid of any emotion. Only the sharpest made it to my command deck; only those that wouldn't break in the face of death. "Thermal readouts indicate life support systems are failing."

Gant's Astral Pride had been in service longer than the Meridus. I never, truly, thought I would live to see the dreadnought's demise. I never thought I would hear Admiral Rickard Gant admit defeat.

Or Adashan, gruff old dinosaur that he was.

"Status report on the Meridus," I clipped out. Surrender was no option; I knew that as well as Gant. As well as Adashan. "Inform all Wing Leaders to evade any proximity to the break-up of the Astral Pride, and absorb all of Gant's remaining starfighters into our squadrons."

"Right away, ma'am."

"Epsilon Squad are surrounded," Commodore Tar'coya slurred, from his place next to the holo-topographic. He was pointing a stubby finger deep into the diaphanous map, near one of the needling fins of the Star Forge. "They made it near that cursed thing's turbines, but they're taking too much heat to do anything about it."

"Ma'am, our primary shields are down to forty percent," the closest tech said. His neighbour was busy muttering orders into his headset. "We've isolated the hull breach, but otherwise the Meridus is sound."

I had Gant to thank for that. He'd drawn the Astral Pride away, knowing it would tempt the advancing Sith forces into targeting either his flagship or my own, leaving one of us intact to direct the Republic vanguard - for whatever time we had left.

A fourth and final force had entered Lehon airspace some minutes ago, beneath the banner of a commodore who was as inexperienced as his fleet was small. The accompanying snubfighters had been immediately ordered to defend the Meridus, allowing my men to forge further ahead. I doubted not the commander's bravery: merely the longevity of his life, once the Meridus faltered.

I felt my lips thin as I struggled to tamp the bitter ash of defeat down. Oh, the Senate would rally more troops, no doubt; but this had been our one chance to strike while Darth Malak was on the backfoot, our one shot at blowing out the heart of his strength before the Sith had time to reinforce.

This battle was the epoch of the war, I knew. And between the initial assault of the scrambler, and the ongoing cancer of Bastila Shan's battle meditation, the outcome had been painfully obvious for some time.

I turned from the holo-stand, and strode firmly to Tar'coya's side. However it would end, we would go down fighting - for the Republic.

"Have they landed any damage?" I asked, frowning at the isolated group of the snubs swamped by almost three times as many. All other squads were too far away to assist; Epsilon were on their own. We simply could not afford to send them any of our dwindling fighters.

I knew when it was time to cut one's losses, but it never sat well.

"No," Tar'coya growled. "Damn bogeys were all over Epsilon the moment they got close. Although our losses have stabilized in the last few minutes - there! Another one down," he ended, as a red spark died beneath his finger.

"Leave Epsilon," I ordered curtly. "Order Rho and Tau squads to the ventral fin. They might have a chance while the Sith are occupied with Epsilon."

"Stabilized," Vandar murmured, thumping his walking stick gently on the ground. The Jedi Master had been oddly quiet ever since the Ebon Hawk had docked in the space station - and the uncertainty of allowing blasted Revan Freeflight free passage still sat uncomfortably within me. At the end, I had to concede her logic was sound: we gained nothing by detaining her at this juncture. If, against all odds, she actually prevailed, there would be opportunity to deal with her later.

The Jedi Order's time of exonerating their own villains had come to an end.

"Not the only squadron, I see, that has found their fortune transformed." Vandar had raised his stick to gesture at a group of green specks on the other side of the battleground. Adashan squad, the few surviving remnants from the old general's fleet, all patched together in one final fist of strength.

"Adashan Seven is down," the tech behind me reported. "Adashan Wing Leader reports all nearby bogeys cleared. They are free for another run at the Star Forge, ma'am."

"About time we had some flaming luck." Tar'coya's jowls were twitching. "Look, Rho's closing in already."

"Luck," Vandar echoed, but his word was a question. The little green Jedi had closed his eyes and, of all things, appeared to be humming.

"Send Adashan in to back up Rho and Tau," Tar'coya commanded, frowning as he submerged his stocky head deep within the translucent holo-map. "If they're fast-

"Epsilon Three is down." Another clipped update from the consoles. "But he took out five marks first."

"I can see that," I said slowly, wonderingly, my eyes pinned on the remaining four Epsilon strikefighters that were taking an awfully long time to die.

"Done it, she has." Vandar's voice was strong, suddenly, and brimming with emotion. "Effects of battle meditation on our side, now, we are beginning to see."

"Vandar," I snapped, glaring at him, unable to believe the sudden burn of hope in my chest. "Are you- are you absolutely certain?"

"Battle meditation," Tar'coya parroted, jerking back to scowl angrily at the Jedi Master. Oh, Tar'coya had been riled when Vrook had absconded; even more so when he learned that Bastila Shan was working against us. Any more of the truth would likely set the veteran Sullustan off into a righteous rage for weeks.

Good thing Tar'coya had been otherwise occupied when the Ebon Hawk - and Revan - had been on the holo-comm earlier. I held the man in relative high regard, but Tar'coya did have a tendency to allow his biases to colour his objectivity.

Not that I could entirely blame him. Not when it came to Revan Freeflight.

"How come a wrinkled master of your supposed experience can't achieve what a traitorous young Human can?" Tar'coya growled, flashing his black eyes at the short Jedi Master. "It's ridiculous that no one else in your flaming Order knows how to waggle around this fancy meditation."

"No more than myth, many of us believed, before Nomi Sunrider rediscovered the art," Vandar replied in a calm, high-pitched creak. He dropped to one knee, then, and raised a three-fingered hand to his furrowed brow. "But help, at least, I can. My strength, I can send, to bolster Bastila Shan - if she will accept it."

The cryptic old master hummed again, before his eyes shut tight, and a golden glow of esoteric light began to radiate out from his crouching form.

To give my men credit, only two of the console technicians glanced Vandar's way, startled, before their attention snapped back to their work. Tar'coya let out a derogatory grunt - such a contrast from the adulation he had once levelled at the Jedi - and turned back to the topographic.

"Epsilon squad is down. But they- they wiped out all bogeys bar five. That won't be enough to stop Rho and Tau." The reports of my comm techs were always relayed in flat, emotionless tones - but this time I heard something new.

"Rho squads' going in for their first sweep on the ventral fin," another said. "Tau's holding the heat back; it could be a good run."

Hope.

"Vandar's right," Tar'coya admitted with a snort. "We're badly outnumbered, Forn. But we're beginning to break through despite the odds. Sigma are still active around the anterior fin. And, look- Rho and Tau are holding steady, they might be okay without Adashan squad. We could send Adashan in between the fins to aim for the belly of the beast."

I frowned, considering. Targeting the turbines, as we had been, would only halt factory production. There were generators behind the turbines we hoped to breach - as a means for destroying the superstructure - but we'd always known it would take multiple direct hits.

A quicker route would be blowing the massive transformer housed at the base of the Star Forge. Tucked away in the centre of the three massive prongs, and protected by turbo-laser defense matrices on all sides. Between the factory-powered lasers, and the swarm of Sith strikefighters, we hadn't come close enough yet to even try.

"Send out a Fleet-wide comm to all starpilots," I ordered suddenly. Morale, I knew, could sometimes achieve as much as the Force could. "Inform them that Jedi Bastila Shan is now empowering the Republic armada with her battle meditation. Tell them that today, we will see the fall of the Sith Empire."

Tar'coya frowned at first, and I could see his doubt over the wisdom of my missive lurking in his alien gaze. Beside us, Vandar Tokare crouched motionless, still encased in a mystical hue of light.

I lowered my voice to a murmur. "Many out there won't know she was working against us, Tar'coya. Many won't even know she was captured - and if they do, what they will glean from the transmit is that we have liberated her."

"Bastila Shan is a war criminal," Tar'coya growled. "Who is personally responsible for any number of our fallen today."

"She is a young woman who has been held captive by a Sith Lord, Commodore." I allowed my tone to harden with displeasure. My men were circumspect, and professional - but I'd be an idiot if I didn't expect the closest techs to be listening in with half an ear. "Bastila Shan is a Republic hero, and has no doubt suffered through unimaginable horrors at Darth Malak's hand - all because of the Force abilities she used relentlessly in the name of the Republic. Be glad our strike team have recovered her, and be proud that she is still strong enough to fight on our side."

Tar'coya subsided, and his sharp nod, while not exactly cordial, did appear to be in grudging agreement with me. For even Tar'coya could admit that Bastila Shan was more hero than villain. That she could be forgiven, if not lauded.

The Force and the Jedi Order alike could damn me, though, before I allowed them to grant Revan Freeflight any form of refuge - brain damage or not. I may have denied her abilities to her face, but I'd known exactly who I was dealing with on the holo-comm. That had most assuredly been the same Jedi Knight I'd once known. The driven, passionate, powerful Knight who had fallen so dramatically.

If Revan had already rescued Bastila Shan, then it was a safe bet to assume she still grasped the same astronomical power.

"Send Adashan in to target the transformer," Tar'coya ordered, and I followed his command with a curt echo of approval toward the nearest tech. With Rho unleashing their first torpedoes at the ventral turbines, and Adashan swinging around to engage on a risky trajectory that might yield an even bigger payload, we were on the offensive for the first time.

We'd had no communication back from the Ebon Hawk, or from either Zeta snub that'd made it in with them. The statistician in me hadn't expected success; heck, the odds on any of them making it inside the Star Forge in the first place had been minimal.

But I'd been the one to approve the use of Zeta squad to cover the Ebon Hawk, despite Tar'coya's overt incredulity.

It hadn't been Captain Onasi's faith, nor Vandar's urging, that had convinced me to cede to Revan. No - simply that I had seen her nail too many reckless manoeuvres in the past, no matter what side she stood on. From rogue Jedi to Republic hero to Sith Lord to... whatever she was now.

If Revan toppled Darth Malak - her old second, her own creation - I wouldn't even be surprised, although I imagined Tar'coya would eat his own hat.

But Revan was too dangerous to let live.

Focus on the star battle, Forn, I chided myself, reigning back the wandering thoughts. One step at a time.

And as one of the techs confirmed a direct hit on the ventral turbine, and another rattled through a series of Sith snub casualties, the blaze of hope burned brighter.

There'd been a time when it had felt natural to have faith in Knight Revan. Now, as I stood knowing that no one in the brass would allow her survival, it was surreal to recognize that my faith in her was still there.

xXx

Revan Freeflight:

A hard knot in my chest eased when I sensed the first fingers of Force stretch out from Bastila's kneeling form.
My soul was ground away; worn down and brittle, like a hollow echo of something that had once been whole. If I let myself pause, I could still taste the uncontrollable rage from earlier, mingled with the frigid floe of calculation that saw the galaxy as nothing more than a game board. A dejarik match to win. A round of And'zhai runes marked out to obliterate any who stood against me.

It was a struggle to conceal the strength of my detachment from Bastila, and I wasn't entirely sure I'd succeeded. I'd pulled her back - but only because Zaalbar's words had reached me.

To think, that the analogy of a scramble for Wookiee chieftainship could be compared with what we face. I'd understood Bastila's derision, but the weight of Zaalbar's wisdom had hit harder.

Golden threads of attachment; the links I had forged with all my companions. Anchors holding the dark at bay.

Jolee brought me back from the edge on the Leviathan. Carth did the same, back on Korriban.

And now I meant to face Malak alone.

A knock from behind had me turning: Zaalbar, leaning forward, to pound on HK's unresponsive back.

"(His actuator is damaged, I believe)," Zaalbar growled. "(A loose connection due to his crash against the wall)."

"So you try percussive maintenance," I muttered, recalling HK suggesting something similar once. On me.

It'd seem like an amusing titbit of karma, if not for the fact that HK was my own, creepily comical, creation.

Zaalbar grunted, before thumping harder against the droid's torso. With a faint electronic hum, a crimson glow shot to life in the droid's photoreceptors. Zaalbar landed one last blow, before HK spun on a metallic foot, his working limb shooting suddenly upwards to point a weapon directly at the Wookiee.

"Threat: Do that once more, Mobile Carpet, and my personal safety parameters will override the master's no-kill criterion."

"(You will need a better weapon first)." Zaalbar huffed, flicking a dismissive paw at the upraised projectile launcher in HK's grip.

The barrel of the thing was warped - no, bent - almost a full one-eighty, turning the launcher into a more a work of abstract art than a weapon. HK's head cocked, as if in surprise. With a mechanical cluck of disgust, he threw the scrap weapon on the ground.

One second later, and a slim-line disruptor had retracted smoothly from the droid's forelimb.

"Statement: Master, while Upright Soporific is no longer an apparent threat to your personage, I point out once more the limitations of my abilities when I am forced to work within the restrictions of your dewy-eyed directive."

There was a soft footfall at my side. "Bastila Shan has commenced her meditation. Leave the Wookiee behind to guard her," Yudan murmured. I could feel the intensity of his gaze. "Malak's strength grows, Revan. It is time for us to face him."
My eyes drifted closed. Oh, Yudan wasn't going to like this.

"Exultation: My joy at facing a worthy foe such as Meatbag is tempered only by my inability to fire a weapon at him. Insistence: Master, redact that insipid no-kill list or my only option will be to physically hurl my disruptor at your former apprentice."

"What?" It took a second. I blinked, my jaw dropping open, feeling the shiver dance down my spine as HK's inference slowly made sense. That no-kill list he'd rattled off on Lehon- it'd been a litany of fleshbag synonyms- yet HK had always used those absurd nicknames not just as a taunt but also a unique reference to specific sentients-

And I'd created him during the worst part of my past.

My lips felt suddenly dry. "HK, who is on my no-kill list? Apart- apart from the recent additions."

HK's head cocked as he replied. "Answer: Karon Estharre-Ryn Enova, Zhar Lestin, Meetra Surik, Xaset Terep, Arren Kae, Yudan Kala'uun Rosh, Malak Devari."

"Huh." The air choked out of my throat. My eyes blinked furiously, as my own heartbeat thundered in my ears. I was so convinced that Malak would never... no matter what I did, I still had that blind, idiotic presumption that he would always follow me. I even made sure my own damn assassination robot wouldn’t be able to take him out!

"Revan." A quiet murmur from a different ghost of my past.

I swallowed. "HK... how about you remove Malak from that list?"

"Confirmation: Already done, master."

"Karon and Zhar are on that list." The whisper of Yudan's voice was barely audible. "Revan, if that odd piece of machinery was created after you held mastery of the Star Forge, why would you order it to leave two Jedi Masters alone?" He sounded... odd. There was an inflection in his voice I couldn't decipher. "Perhaps I can understand Meetra, for she and Xaset were already powerless and exiled by then. But why would you... and who is Arren Kae?"

I raked a hand abruptly through my hair. "If you don't know, Yudan, then how the frell do you expect me to? I don't recognize half those people." Some of the names meant nothing. Yudan - and Carth - had mentioned Meetra before. A famous hero of the Jedi Thirteen. But... the name was a blank. "Sun and stars," I muttered, "Maybe I just wanted to take out Karon and Zhar personally."

And the black irony was, in the end, I'd witnessed both their deaths anyway. I could've saved them, if I'd only been quicker, hadn't run, or held it together-

"I don't- it doesn't matter," I said in a rush, feeling edgy and hollow and most of all - driven to start moving. "I've got to- I've got to go."

"(You mean to leave us here)," Zaalbar said softly, his voice a gentle burr. Zaalbar understood why, I thought. From the growing black expression on Yudan's face and the indignant jerk of HK's triangular head, I could see the Wookiee was the only one.

"Objection: Master, I question your erroneous use of the singular-"

"HK, you are to stay here and guard Bastila Shan from any danger," I clipped out gruffly. "No complaints. You'll take orders from Zaalbar or Yudan."
"Or- or Bastila, I almost said. Almost.

"Revan."

"She's the central game piece, Yudan," I uttered in a low, hard voice. My attention shifted deliberately to Bastila, making it obvious exactly who I was speaking of. In my head, Bastila had dimmed to a hum of shaky concentration. Shakier than I would've liked.

I didn't know how much Bastila had been swayed back to our cause, and how much was simply her conceding to me out of soul-wrenching exhaustion.

I let my gaze slowly recoil back to Yudan. "I'm just the distraction," I whispered to him. "Don't you see? If I can hold Malak at bay long enough for Bastila to turn the fleet battle around, allow the Republic a shot at destroying-"

"Revan!" Hands slammed down on my shoulders, fast and hard enough for me to jerk with surprise. The scowl on Yudan's face was as fierce as his gaze. "You cannot face Malak with such a self-destructive attitude, alone or otherwise!"

"No, you misunderstand." I choked, and Carth's demand rang through my head like a bell.

Promise me you'll get out of there alive.

I blinked hurriedly, feeling my focus harden once more. "I'll do everything I can to end Malak and get us all out, Yudan. But my primary objective is the destruction of the Star Forge. First and foremost."

Yudan stilled. His hands dropped, as slowly as his nod of acquiescence. "I... understand that logic, Revan. But you cannot convince me that you are better off alone."

"Yes. Yes, I can. My throat felt suddenly tight. "You vowed to kill me if I fell, Yudan."

Yudan's expression tightened, like he knew I had a play in motion, but could not see the game yet. "I did. I did and I shall. But we both know what a fall is, Revan. As does your Wookiee. A stumble is not a fall."

Somehow, I didn't think he would've allowed me that grace a week ago. Yudan's eyes flared as they stared into mine. There was a sharp ring of yellow bordering the pupil, that shone with the dregs of corruption, but in amongst it were flecks of-

"Blue," I whispered. Crystalline blue. "Your eyes. They're, they're changing-"

He blinked, and looked uncharacteristically startled before chuckling ever so quietly. "If I actually walk away from this place alive, I have no idea what the future holds for me." Yudan's face softened, turned gentle with affection. The look was so unfamiliar- like, despite the years of friendship we'd obviously had, before the torn veil of my broken memory, he'd still kept emotional guards up around me-

That was... an odd thought. It didn't really seem to make sense.

But one thing I did realize, down to the marrow of my bones- I trust him. Implicitly. I cleared my throat, still holding his gaze. "Bastila is... she is my weakness, Yudan. My vulnerability."

One brow quirked at me in mild amusement. "I do understand that, Revan."
"No, I mean..." I looked away, and my voice dropped to a whisper. "Our bond. It's strong... stronger than anyone ever expected. Bastila is convinced that if one of us dies, the other will follow. And she, of all Jedi, would know."

"Revan..." Yudan's voice was low, the whisper of spidersilk against granite. "Your droid and the Wookiee will guard her life with their own. I would be of more use."

"That's- that's not all." I glanced back to him, and felt my teeth grit. "I've stumbled a lot. You don't know the half of it. Nisotsa... I- look. If I stumble in the heart of the Star Forge, I don't think I'll return. Not against Malak. Not next to the kaiburr. I'll fall once more to what I was. You vowed, once, to end Darth Revan." I saw his eyes widen slightly, as the implication hit. "Take Bastila out, and you'll take me out. Dark or light."

Yudan's expression turned stone-cold serious, and his intense gaze roved over my face, like he was memorizing it. I felt unbearably sad, then, that our past was one giant black hole in my head. I'd forgotten so much, and I found myself yearning for more remembrances of him.

"Go," he whispered. And, then, the slightest of smiles curved his lips. "Go do what you're best at."

I stepped back, already turning, thoughts already shifting further afield, as something slammed ungently against my mental shields.

Malak. I had to leave. His preference might be for me to come to him, but the man was an idiot if he chose to wait much longer. He'd already threatened my crew-

"(Jen. Go. We shall stand guard)," Zaalbar rumbled.

And for all that I had to leave, it only took one second to-

Zaalbar's furry arms cinched tight around my torso as I barrelled into him. The musky scent of snarled fur made my nose wrinkle, and I wondered idly when Mission had last wheedled him into a 'fresher.

It was the light, inane thoughts like that which kept me anchored. Kept me sane.

"Your life-debt is fulfilled, Zaalbar," I said, drawing back. "I'll kick your furry arse if you don't concede that."

The Wookiee huffed, but his head dipped in a nod. "(Fight with honour, Jen Sahara. Who you were does not matter. Be true to who you are now)."

"I will," I promised with a faint smile.

Then I turned. Drew deep on the Force, and left the chamber in a sudden sprint.

xXx

Chapter End Notes

Coming up next: Revan vs. Malak
A silo of foraged wasaka berries to kosiah for the beta.

Also, there's a character glossary up in chapter 1 now, if you are interested.
Nexus: Fulcrum – Part I

Revan Freeflight:

The corridors blurred.

I lost all sense of my surroundings. The only sound that registered was the thud of my footfalls, one after another, on and on as either instinct or muscle memory propelled me ever forward.

I ran down a ramp, lurched over a guard-rail, landed a few floors below before barrelling left into another anonymous service corridor.

The path wasn't familiar to me, not consciously, but my limbs knew the quickest route to take.

The Force was reeling me in to the centre of the Star Forge – and I didn't know if I was a gormless tach hopping into a scent trap, or a zakkeg ruthlessly hunting down its prey.

And in my head, the murmuring grew to cacophony with every step I executed.

- this place is yours. light or dark or somewhere in between. you can master it again, do it different this time -

Silken whispers of promise-

- this is the only way. the only way you can win -

- but the promise was offset by other words, other voices, other snatches of memory. Memories that acted like a scattershot of faith dispersing the intangible yearning of the kaiburr to be mastered.

"You won't win if you fall."

"I stand in the light, Revan. Stay in the light with me."

"There is no emotion, there is peace."

Tucked away deep in a corner of my mind, Bastila was a kernel of power. Shaky, unsteady, and delving into a meditation she wasn't entirely invested in.

But doing so regardless, because of me.

And that was a strength in itself. Bastila, turning back around and fighting for me, guarded by my insane droid – and two of the sentients I trusted most in the galaxy.

"Revan Freeflight, whom I thought long buried, rose anew from the ashes."
"Who you were does not matter. Be true to who you are now."

Cool metal walls brushed against my palm. The Force was thickening, a calefaction of fire, malicious and burning with enmity. I could feel my speed slow as the air itself turned heavy with heat and hate.

I was closing in.

Malak's power was thrumming around me now, and each leaden pace was harder than the last. I felt like a flicker of light slowly fading against the suffocating encroachment of the dark.

"Your friends are what give you strength, Revan. Don't forget that."

"You go take out Darth Poodoo, and we'll have your back."

"Whatever happens, it'll be a battle song worthy for the stars."

I clenched my teeth, and drove forward.

Spherical walls of cinereous grey loomed ahead. Awaiting me was a massive dome of silver, a chamber-sized bulb nestling in the heart of the Star Forge. The nexus of my past.

I knew what was beyond.

The kaiburr. Malak. My end game.

"Promise me you'll get out of there alive."

There was a hatch set into this side of the dome.

-come forward. you can win. you can have everything you desire-

Revan.

My hand rose, and the hatch opened.

xXx

Canderous Ordo:

Something was pounding at the base of my skull. Mouth dry like I'd knocked back one too many vox shots; limbs aching like I'd spent all night at an aay'hen fest with a pair of akaanir dala. Hands empty-

The realization jerked me into action. I lurched sideways into a roll, grasping wildly for a weapon that wasn't there as I came up in a ready crouch.

Coming to like this was getting all too kriiffing commonplace.

Vision blurrrily morphed into sense. The hangar was empty. The hole where the entrance hatch had been was deserted. Last thing I'd seen was my own frag grenade prematurely detonating only metres away from my head, just as that robed shabuir had waltzed in like he owned the place.

"Status," I croaked into the comm. "Onasi? Who's up?"

::Canderous?:: Mission's voice, squeaking in my ear. Followed by a sob. ::I saw- I saw-:: She trailed off into another incoherent sob.

"Pull yourself together, ad'ika," I ground out, hauling myself unsteadily to my feet. A deep throbbing behind my ears had me cursing the lack of a helm, but I'd discarded that against those damned battle-droids. "Spit it out. Where's that kriffing Dark Jedi?"

::Ran back out the hatch::: It was that Republic marksman Tobards, the one on the roof of the 'Hawk who'd fired a lame-arsed shot at me earlier. ::I had a good view from up here, but I couldn't do a blasted thing. My gun was ripped out of my hands:::

::Dustil?::: Onasi cut through the airwaves, voice shaky and threaded through with pain. I spotted movement further ahead – the man himself, leaning heavily against a line of consoles.

Onasi looked as groggy on his feet as I felt.

::Your son lured the blighter away, captain::: the Republic grunt continued. ::Probably saved all our lives. That Dark Jedi was doing something to Jedi Bindo, but your son drove him back to the entrance hatch. Then- then he left:::

I spotted my blaster lying metres away, and just past the nearby snub was another discarded gun – Mission's, I thought, as I heaved forward to grab them both.

::Left?::: Onasi barked, voice hoarse. ::Dustil- his comm's still alive- Dustil, dammit, can you hear me?:::

A crackle of static met his demand. I felt my mouth turn down in a hard grimace as I levelled the blaster at the remains of the entry hatch. Oh, Sithkid had some power in him, I didn't deny that – but I'd heard enough from both Revan and old man Bindo to ascertain exactly how much training the boy lacked.

Onasi's son didn't have a chance against a Dark Jedi powerful enough to knock us all out with one sweep of his robed hand.

::Dee ran into the Star Forge, Carth::: Mission whispered, daring to voice what all of us already knew. ::And that Dark Jedi's gone after him:::

xXx

Revan Freeflight:

Breathe in.

The chamber was colossal. Larger even than it appeared from the outside.

Breathe out.

The floor was a vast circle of chrome with a railing edging around the outside. Darkened pillars loomed behind the railing at regular intervals, adding a gloomy feel to the chamber that seemed more of a shadowy aesthetic touch than a structural necessity.

In the centre rose the majestic kaiburr, a murky uncut mineral of grey, towering some ten metres high as it brushed the ceiling. Veins of vermillion red flushed an iridescent hue as they spider-walked deep into the translucent crystal.

The kaiburr was hauntingly, eerily beautiful.
Breathe in.

The stone pulsed, a massive heart beating out flurries of chaotic energy, all funnelling into-

Breathe out.

-Malak.

My breath hitched.

The figure was dwarfed by the imposing rock, and if not for the Force he would be almost unnoticeable. He was facing me, legs apart, arms folded, clad in an exoskeleton of black-and-grey.

The Force poured into him, eddies of darkness churning into a wild cyclone fuelled by emotion so intense I almost choked in reaction.

He took a step. Then another. And a third- before he was striding forward like all the ominous misdeeds of my past rushing forth to slam me into the nothingness I deserved.

But, in the end, what I deserved did not matter. Not here, at the crux of everything.

Malak came to a stop some metres in front of me, yellow eyes gleaming with malevolence.

"And so," his mechanical voice jeered, the thrum of his voder jarringly harsh. "The shell returns to her former seat of power."

The automated timbre of his voice was utterly discordant with what my mind expected.

Malak was tall, impressively so, and his form-fitting armour exuded a perception of tightly coiled musculature. Something brushed wistfully against my soul, like the sigh of a long-forgotten wraith. I could imagine a thick crop of brown hair instead of a tattooed pate, whiskey-coloured eyes instead of poisoned yellow, a fierce expression of devotion instead of-

"Mal," I croaked. My eyes were dry. My mind stilled to a blank.

All of the past echoes I had encountered- the ones who had truly known me- Karon, Zhar, Yudan, Nisotsa- I'd felt something. A kindling of empathy, emotion, of recognition deep within my core – even if my own memory failed me time and again.

The man standing in front of me was as familiar as home. As familiar as death.

And I felt nothing.

Nothing- but feeling nothing made no sense. In front of me towered the very foundation of my past – had the Jedi somehow burned all of that away, leaving me only with wisps of memory disjointed from any emotion whatsoever?

No. The Dark Side did that, my mind whispered. Beneath the apathy, I knew, rippled a crevasse of black grief I couldn't afford to lose myself in. Others followed the shadows I cast, some close enough to trail in my wake – but Malak was the one who held my hand while I destroyed myself.

And then I threw his hand aside, and let the dark devour us both.
Malak took another step forward. The iridescence of the kaiburr gleamed against his striped head, against the chrome jaw I had given him. "Long have I anticipated this confrontation, Revan, even if I did not believe you would make it this far. But then fate has always laid its heavy hand upon your path." He paused for a brief moment, as if considering his next words. "Well. However fleeting your struggle will be, I know I shall savour it." Malak laughed, then; harsh and forbidding.

The laugh reverberated around the chamber, slowly dying echoes, until nothing was left but his silent derision.

The words did not rattle me. Malak's scorn, at least, I had expected.

His brows lowered, as if he perceived his taunts were ineffectual. "Do the glimpses of the past torment you, Revan?" he continued on in a carefully modulated voice. "I have seen deep into Bastila's mind. I know how broken you truly are, how little you recall. And yet you must know we were lovers once. Do you remember my touch, Revan? Do you remember how I could undo you with a single caress?"

I was almost surprised to find his words had as little effect as before.

He seeks a way of unsettling me. Malak's mockery was but a twisted version of truth designed solely to wound. But all it did was thicken the grief. This... this was a tactic I often used. Any means for victory, be it brute strength or verbal barbs or unexpected sacrifice... the end always, always, justifies the means.

Always. And that is why I fell.

"I remember Talshion," I said quietly. My words came with little conscious thought on my part, as if they were more for me than Malak. "Talshion was there in my earliest recollections. I know... I know we always had each other's backs, once."

The surprise that flared across his face was as cruel as it was delighted. "Our infancy? That is what came to you first? Oh, Revan." My name was a machine-driven rumble of amusement. A jaggedly painful contrast with the voice I had once known. "To think, I had speculated that something palpable would stand before me. A fragment of the righteous Jedi, or a sliver of the driven lord." Malak shook his head in a slow, measured taunt. His glowing eyes never left mine. "I even wondered whether the Order's brainwashing would win out, leaving nothing but a battered husk of some erudite null. But in the end what remains is the feckless street kid of old. Really, Revan? Of all your iterations, you choose your youth?"

"Street kid," I muttered, as something firmed in my chest. I could feel the Force return, now; harden and strengthen into solid purpose. "Jedi Knight, Sith Lord, broken scholar... they all echo within me, Malak. I am what I am."

Malak looked entirely unimpressed. "The darkness and the light have always waged constant war within you, Revan. Like a torched battleground, now wasted and forgotten." His glowing eyes pinched tight. "In the end, you-" he took a step "-are-" his hand punched into the air "-nothing!"

Power flared.

A spear of energy, both unseen and barbed, launched directly at my heart.

The air around me flexed inward, a hastily erected shield concaving against the breakneck assault. My feet were driven backwards, slipping along smooth floors, as the Force within burned to life. Strengthening, melding, thrusting back against the onslaught.
A shattering, then, as Malak's attack splintered into a myriad of dispersing particles, of energy diffusing around me on all sides.

Muscles locked, tense and rigid; I held my ground as my eyes narrowed on him.

And into Malak's outstretched grasp flew his lightsaber hilt. "Good," he murmured, as single red dawned to life. "I was beginning to think you were nothing but a galactic anti-climax."

The red of his 'saber threw his profile into stark relief. Red, that had once been blue. No recollection, just a hard fact I somehow knew: Malak still used the same lightsaber that had once inspired thousands upon thousands to follow him.

"It ends here, Malak." I could hear my words ice over; my mind clear into sharp, crystalline purpose. The melancholy vanished. Everything that Malak had been to me once no longer mattered: here, on this game board, he was simply my opponent.

"Yes," Malak hissed; a hiss of agreement, of certainty. "Yes, it does."

Mission Vao:

"What?" I squawked in alarm.

Carth wasn't even looking at me. "I have to find him," he was muttering, like the world's biggest laserbrain. "I can't leave him out there."

"I get that, Onasi, I'd do the same in your boots," Canderous returned, just as stupidly. At least he was still watching the exit with his gun raised high. "But you gotta accept it's a kriffing suicide run all by yourself. Mand'alor's balls, any moment now that mir'osik might decide to wander back in here again."

"Carth," I wailed, blinking hurriedly. I wasn't gonna cry, dammit. "If Dee's still out there, still alive, he'll be busy, y'know, fighting with the freaking Force! You can't- you jus' can't-"

::I need a weapon, Captain:: that dumb Republic guy broke in over the dumb comm. :::Jedi Bindo warned me not to move with my injuries. Why don't you send that Twi'lek up here with a blaster? I've still got a clear shot at the hatch where I am:::

"Fat lot of good it did last time," I mumbled, still blinking. Dee was fine – he just had to be – but the thought of Carth running after him and that sleemo Sith was just completely borked. It wasn't like Carth could turn himself invisible!

"Mission-"

"No!" I cried, stamping forward and jabbing him hard in the gut. Even wearing scale mesh, Carth still grunted in discomfort. "Look, juma-head, you just got slammed into a stupid console with a wave of that scuzzball's hand! If that Dark Jedi's still out there, what're ya gonna do? Talk him to death?"

"Mission, he's my son," Carth said quietly, as his hands came to rest lightly on my shoulders. I blinked a third time, staring up into his stupid, stupid brown eyes. "I believed him dead for four years. If there's a chance I can do something, anything... Teethree can report all hatch openings and lead me to them. I might be able to catch that bastard by surprise-"
"You'll get yourself killed! You'll-"

"Ad'ika, stop." Canderous' voice was as hard as it was commanding. "Onasi's got to live with himself. And we have to hold the fort. Go run your blaster up to Tobards and then get your skinny blue arse back down here."

Canderous was holding out my weapon in his spare hand. I didn't know where he'd picked that up from- I'd fumbled it under the snub thanks to that nerf-herding Sith-

"The others," I said desperately, ignoring stupid Canderous to glare at stupid Carth. "Can't we comm one of them back? That ronto-turd Rosh- he could, like, run super-fast and go after Dee-

"They're busy, Mission," Carth cut in. His voice had turned all soft and gentle. "You know that. We're on our own."

"There's a text-only transmit," Canderous said abruptly. "Read it for yourself, Onasi."

Carth dropped his hands, same time as I scrambled to parse the output on my wrist-comm myself. Words, in pale green text, clinically stating what the others were up to-"They found her," Carth breathed a sec later. "Bastila. She's-"

"Yeah," Canderous grunted. "The princess is back on our side. About bloody time."

"And Revan has gone after Malak," Carth finished in a quiet murmur."

"See!" I cried. The message was from dumb Rosh – and he hadn't let slip too many deets on the transmit, but there was enough to get that Jen had gone off alone. Leaving Big Z and Rosh and Psycho Droid behind with Bastila. "Let's get Rosh back here, not like he's doing anything useful while prissy Bastila does her thing-"

"Revan ordered them to guard Bastila." Carth was scrolling through the message a second time, like it was gonna magically change. "Bastila is the key to turning the fleet battle around. That's- at least we have some good news."

He didn't sound happy. 'Course he didn't. Not with Dee out there."

"There's no reason they can't all come back here, then!" I felt like stamping my foot. I felt like bursting into tears. I wanted Big Z back here, not stuck somewhere deep in this slimy place, while Dee had run off with a black-robed chuba-face hot on his heels-

"Mission." Carth enfolded me into his arms, then, and my face pressed hard against the mesh armour covering his chest. It smelled like ash and sweat. "Even I can admit that what they're doing is more important than finding my son. We all have our part to play. Rosh and Zaalbar are protecting Bastila. You and Ordo will keep the 'Hawk safe."

"But-" My voice broke as my throat tightened. I barely felt the first hot tears drop free, though at least my face was mashed against Carth so stupid Canderous wouldn't sneer at me. "But what if there's more bad guys?"

"Then we fight." Canderous was resolute behind me. "Though I don't reckon there is. A Dark Jedi wouldn't attack with those Force-blocking assassins around, it'd nullify his own strength. He probably waited to see what pickings were left, the hu'tuun shabuir."

"I have to go, Mission." Carth's voice was low and hard. His palms were gentle on my shoulders as he slowly pulled back from me.

"Ad'ika." Heavy hands clapped down on me from behind, and I was unceremoniously plucked from Carth's embrace before being spun around. Canderous' hard-edged face was lined in a deep frown as he stared at me. "Stop acting like a kid. You ain't one anymore, and this ain't the place for it. Go run up to Tobards, then get some meds from the 'Hawk and see if you can rouse old man Bindo. Do it now."

My fists curled in reflex, same time as one lekku twined around my neck. I felt myself nodding, sniffing back the tears as my teeth clenched. I hated being told what to do, even from Canderous, but it wasn’t like Carth was listening to reason-

“Talk to Teethree,” Carth ordered quietly behind me. “Find out the most likely direction Dustil went, and relay that over the comm.”

I glanced back to him. Without Canderous on my side, there was no way I’d be able to stop Carth being a total marsh toad.

Which meant the only thing left for me to do was actually help.

And I could admit, to myself at least, that maybe I’d run after Dee, too – if we didn't have the 'Hawk and the others to worry about.

"Okay." I got out, before snatching my gun from Canderous' off-hand with a scowl. "Okay. Jus'-jus' come back, okay?"

Carth nodded in acceptance – which was lame, really, because how could he promise something like that? He threw one last grim look at Canderous, before striding to the hole in the wall and vanishing around the corner.

xXx

Revan Freeflight:

Malak's sweeping lunge, mighty and fast, was as much a test as his Force spear had been.

I was leaping sideways by then, my own 'saber glaring to life as he spun on one foot and followed his attack with an overhand strike.

Cyan parried scarlet in a dazzling crackle of light.

"One blade, Revan?" Malak taunted. A brow raised in mocking consideration. "Did you misplace a lightsaber?"

"I'm versatile, Malak," I shot back, staring at him through the blue-red crosshairs of our 'sabers. "I don't need two weapons to best you."

"Let us dance, then." The words murmured from his voder, artificially soft and drawling. "For old times' sake. Perhaps, this is a more fitting way for you to finally die."

Malak pushed forward, before striking out again.

Both my hands held Karon's legacy tight as I blocked his opening flurry: a rain of sweeping blows, followed by a fierce jab that skidded against my sluggish guard.

Immediately on the defensive, I was scrabbling back, feeling the strength of each of his blows reverberate through my forearms as I barely managed to keep a lightsaber between us.

Dodging sideways, leaping clear, or parrying a counter-attack: I was intensely aware of the thin mesh shirt that covered my torso and afforded little resistance to any direct lightsaber hit.

I danced backwards, staying at the edge of his greater reach, focused purely on finding an opening he had yet to grant.

"First hit will down you, Revan," Malak sneered, derisively eyeing me over as I skittered back another handful of steps. "No substantial armour. You always did ignore your own mortality."

Keep moving, my mind whispered, as the fire of Force in my veins began to blaze. His exoskeleton will slow him. Always keep moving.

Stance wide, I allowed Malak a split-second of commitment to his next attack, before battering his lunge aside and throwing a fast riposte aimed directly at his unguarded upper arm.

My 'saber bounced hard away from the cortosis-woven armour; Malak snarled, and an upsurge of Force slammed deep into my gut.

I went flying, catching sight too late of the scarlet plasma thrown from Malak's hands-

---

Bastila Shan:

I was stretching out farther than I ever dreamed possible.

Somewhere beneath me, a solid coil of energy grounded my psyche back to my physical form. I would never dare to reach so far, had it not been for the unexpected wellspring of light offered to me: a blessing wrapped in a golden chalice that I was granted permission to sup from.

Grandmaster Vandar Tokare.

We could not speak in words, even joined like this; but I had recognized his signature when his consciousness first brushed against mine.

Freely, he offered his acceptance, his approval, and his unwavering strength to boost my own.

At first it had been somewhat arduous to lower my innate shields and accept his assistance. But I had managed. And now, the shaky faith I scrabbled to sustain – that I could stay true, turn things around and save the Republic Fleet – solidified into rock-solid certainty.

I would prevail, undo what I had wrought, and allow Revan the distance to do the same.

Had I ever felt the Force like this before? So beautiful and placid, yet stretching out for eons: encompassing the entire sector in a web of energy, of love, of unconditional being. All my self-destructive emotions washed away, until there was nothing left but this transcendent genesis of life.

Of peace.

And I was simply a part of the whole.

Flickers of spirit aligned before me: the same matrix I had manipulated earlier, but on an even grander scale. Each spark was left bolstered by my gentle touch, glowing brighter, before I transferred to the next. There was no uncertainty left; no guilt, no recriminations, no doubt. Just, pure, harmony.

Each life flared with hope and sharpness of mind, as I migrated ever onwards.

Then, something stabbing, hot, agonizing-

Alarm tore deep into my Force connection. I was ripped from the web, falling, plummeting, the link with Master Vandar disintegrating as I sailed down-

-slamming back into physical flesh with a resounding thud.

Revan!

Hands clutching at my side; there was no physical wound, but I felt the injury regardless. Gasping, face flattened against the floor, fingernails burrowing into fragile skin-

Revan? Fear was acrid at the back of my throat. Revan, answer me!

I'm okay. A paroxysm of pain radiated through the Force. I beheld the sharp impression of ironclad determination, before Revan abruptly reeled her emotions in, retreating from me. I'm fine. She sounded fierce. Focus on the Fleet.

She had been hurt. A wound alongside her torso that, even now, throbbed in my own body with painful clarity. How debilitating her injury was I could not tell, but my heart was fluttering with uncertainty.

Should I reach out? Lend her my strength? Peace, I knew more than she just how almighty Malak was with the Star Forge bending to his decree.

Malak is stronger than you physically, I whispered to my bond-sister. But you are faster, I have seen that-

The Fleet, Bastila!

I receded, driven back by her furious demand. I could sense the Force humming through her, burgeoning and strengthening, and I had seen first-hand just how endless her pool of power seemed at times.

But Revan lacked the serenity of spirit – the recollection of her Jedi training – to access it on demand. And that, I feared, was where Malak would best her.

I must have faith. Revan, have faith. The words were as much for myself as her, but I did not know if Revan could even hear me now. Trust in the Force.

With that final entreaty, I withdrew entirely back into my own mind.

My fingers curled as I pushed shakily up from the floor. I breathed in, lungs filling with air, feeling my lifeblood calm as returning Force eddies swirled gently about me. A soothing warmth brushed against my senses: the peaceful touch of Master Vandar reaching out; a flicker of concern, a question, a nudge reminding me of what we still had to achieve.

Mind clearing, I sank back to my knees, about to reconvene when-"Onasi's gone too?" A mutter from behind wised into comprehension. "Ordo. You must keep the Ebon Hawk secure-"

"Yeah, I got that, di'kut. How about you tell me something useful, like who this kriffing Dark Jedi is? And if there's any more bastards out there?:

Alarm returned, spiking through tranquillity as I abdicated the meditation in favour of whirling around to stare in shock at the others.

"I cannot say for certain, Ordo," Yudan Rosh was frowning at the alusteel communicator affixed on his wrist. "Malak has multiple Dark Jedi bent to his will, but only one of note is still alive. If it is Sharlan Nox chasing after Dustil Onasi-"

"Sharlan Nox." The hiss slipped from my mouth before I could retract it. "That- that- thing has attacked the others?"

The Twi'lek's head jerked in my direction as his expression blanked into composure. He stilled, staring at me hard, before offering one last report on his comm-link to the crewmate I had not seen since Korriban.

"I have nothing useful to add at this stage, Ordo," Yudan said in a monotone, but his narrowed eyes were pinning mine. "As I relayed before: Revan is engaging Malak while Shan aids the Republic Fleet. The Dark Jedi Sharlan Nox can be cowed by superior Force-strength, but he is also easy to underestimate. Rouse the old man if you can."

A curse in Mandalorian was abruptly silenced as the Twi'lek ceased the open communication.

Yudan Rosh had not dropped his gaze from mine. His mouth tightened. "Sharlan Nox is on the Star Forge?" he questioned.

My head dipped in a nod of assent.

"The boy might be able to hide from him," Yudan murmured. His expression did not change, but there was a faint undercurrent of emotion in his soft words. "But Carth Onasi is no Force-sensitive."

"The boy," I echoed blankly. I could feel myself blinking. Yudan had relayed the name Dustil Onasi to Canderous- and with a start, a shaky memory from a lifetime ago unfolded in my mind's-eye.

An encounter just before I had been ripped from the crew-

_The boy. The Sith adept in the Korriban docking bay, the one nosing around our ship. Revan had discovered him, discovered he was Carth's child, whom Carth had believed dead for all these years-

A wholly unexpected encounter, and one I had not thought on since, for my next recollection was awakening to the tender ministrations of the Sith.

But Revan had been determined to track the boy down, I remembered now- she had argued for his retrieval despite my reservations, despite the Star Map, despite the matters still unspoken between us at that stage. Due in part, I had believed, to her growing attachment to the boy's father.

For it wasn't Carth's _child_ that was of import-

"Carth is going after Sharlan Nox," I echoed numbly, eyelids fluttering. "That is- that is-" _Ludicrous. Suicidal. Sharlan will end them both, and return to the Ebon Hawk, if he doesn't first report his success to Malak-_
"Revan!" I gasped, shoulders tensing, gaze flying back to Yudan Rosh. "If she hears of Carth's demise-"

"(You are both assuming an event of which has not yet happened)," Zaalbar rumbled gently. "(Worry not of next year's tree-rot when you have this year's hive-ant infestation to deal with first)."

"She might be too occupied to sense his death, being as he has no Force," Yudan murmured, ignoring the Wookiee the same as I. "But she is attuned to those close to her, and there is no denying the depth of her regard for him."

"If she does find out..." I trailed off bleakly. Revan needed every advantage she could muster. She had left us all behind to focus on Malak. A heart-wound from the rear would blindside her, and- "...the bonds of attachment are what has held Revan strong," I whispered. "And Carth-"

"And Carth Onasi is her lover," Yudan Rosh finished in a quiet voice.

That their relationship had progressed did not surprise me, even as an innate repudiation of such entanglement desired to issue forth from my lips. What came out instead was- "You must go after them."

"What?" His word was a hiss, an unexpected show of emotion.

"You know Sharlan Nox," I returned implacably. The rightness of this action rang in the Force, echoed like a bell around me. Attachment was as much a weakness as a strength, and that was why the Jedi denied such individual involvement. Because, at the most critical of moments, attachment could be so easily used against even the most stalwart of beings.

The Sith were more than adept at those sorts of machinations – and a Jedi could be as fallible as any sentient.

And Revan – Revan was as much a Jedi as she had ever been.

"Carth Onasi cannot die," I whispered. "Not if we wish for Revan to stand firm. And you- you must be a match for Sharlan Nox. You can prevent this-"

The Twi'lek's eyes narrowed. "Destroying the Star Forge is our prime objective, Shan. And for that, we must ensure your survival. Revan ordered me to guard you against any danger, and I will not abandon my post."

"There is no other danger! Sharlan Nox is the only Force-sensitive Malak allowed to step foot here, other than myself!" I protested, feeling my cheeks burn. "This section of the Star Forge has naught but a skeleton crew- any danger would be in the form of foot-soldiers, and Zaalbar and HK-47 are adequate protection against that-"

"Indignation: Adequate?" a mechanical voice squawked. "You dare use such an insipid pejorative? Shall I label your glow-stick a toothpick?"

Yudan Rosh did not move, still staring at me intently with an unreadable expression. "Obviously, you have not encountered Malak's battle-droids-"

"(The battle-droids have not intruded this high, Yudan Rosh)," Zaalbar interjected. "(And if they do, we now understand how to take them out with relative ease)."

"You agree with this course of action?" The Twi'lek switched his attention to the Wookiee, as if Zaalbar's counsel was of more worth than my own. Perhaps, at this juncture, it was; but the realization stung nonetheless.

The Wookiee shrugged his massive shoulders. "(I do not foresee any imminent danger here. And Bastila Shan is correct that Carth Onasi's death may... may destabilize Jen at a most dangerous time)."

"Commentary: The master would prefer it if Paranoid Has-Been remained at least semi-functional. As would I. He makes an enticing target for the day the master recognizes the folly of her recent pacifistic bent."

I paid the irritating droid no mind. "You are stronger than Sharlan Nox," I said to the Twi'lek. It was not a question. While I may not have known all the inner workings of the Sith Empire, I was familiar enough with the higher-ranking Dark Jedi to know there were few considered more dangerous than Yudan Rosh. "Can you reach out? Sense where he is?"

One brow quirked at me in question. "Can you?"

I felt my eyelids flutter. "I don't dare," I whispered. Transcending into battle meditation was not the same as stretching out one's awareness to sense the Force; and without the bolstering strength of Grandmaster Vandar, I could not risk opening myself to the temptation of the kaiburr.

In that regard, I simply did not trust myself. I did not know if I could live with myself if I failed again.

Yudan's eyes closed and his lekku relaxed behind him as the Force spilled out. A handful of charged seconds later, and the Twi'lek was staring blindly at the floor. His intake of air was audible and deep.

"I can sense him," Yudan murmured. "Revan and Malak overpower almost everything, but... I can sense Sharlan. I will be able to track him."

His grip tightened on his lightsaber.

"(Go, then)," Zaalbar rumbled gently, motioning a paw at the chamber's exit. "(Protect Carth Onasi and his cub, Yudan Rosh. I shall stand firm here)."

"Mockery: And while the Wookiee practices the evolutionary concept of 'standing', I will take care of anything that might frighten Uptight Soporific."

"Zaalbar," I whispered, as the Twi'lek left the chamber and I slowly sank to my knees again. "Any chance you can set that droid on mute?"

Revan Freeflight:

The hit to my side was moderate. Bad enough to have burned through the mesh scale and deep into skin. Not debilitating, at least, for I'd already been rolling in evasion when Malak's flying 'saber had connected.

But had I been a split-second slower, things would be a lot worse.

My hands tightened on Karon's hilt as I pushed physical discomfort aside. I was metres back from Malak, now, having retreated with a Force-enhanced leap before he could press his advantage. Legs apart, stance firm and guard ready; my defensive form was solid and waiting for whatever he threw at me next.

I couldn't kid myself, though. If I kept fighting this way, it wouldn't be for long.

Malak is stronger than you physically, Bastila whispered. But you are faster, I have seen that-

And Bastila, despite her best intentions, wasn't helping any.

The Fleet, Bastila! I threw back furiously. Good intentions or not, I couldn't allow her fear to bleed through to me; not here, not now. And even more critically – Bastila had to focus on what was truly important. I needed her aimed at the space battle, not worrying over my health.

"First blood to me, Revan," Malak mocked. Even with a mechanical voice-box plated over his ruined throat, he still sounded so damn smug. "It never used to be so easy."

Malak had his back to the kaiburr once more, as jagged flurries of Force streamed into him from the unbalanced crystal. The veins of vermillion pulsed deep into the rock, indicators of mineral corruption, according him the amplification of a lightsaber crystal on a truly astronomic scale.

I knew he had yet to fully plumb its depths, and I was already struggling.

Have faith.

The esoteric message rang softly in my head. I wasn't sure if the words were a thought or a memory. A reminder, maybe, from the woman I had once been, facing the man I had once loved.

Find another solution. That was what I'd always done. Kept fighting and searching until I found the path to victory. Overcome what you can and accept what you must.

There was no doubt within me, now; no fear or concern. Malak's current superiority was ephemeral – I simply had to find a way to weaken him. And I would.

My senses were intensifying, psyche slipping into a meld of serenity and sharp-honed awareness – a state I had felt before, a state I had mastered before.

Trust in the Force.

And as the kaiburr lent unsteady passion to Malak's next barrelling foray, it was a calm influx of Force that steadied me in response.

For even here, in this dark-edged place, the Force still sang bright. In the air, beyond the walls, deep through the sector and ricocheting within the conjoined mind-link to my bond-sister.

Time decelerated into infinite possibilities. The arc of Malak's attacking lightsaber morphed into predictability; a dodge from me, then, followed by a fast jab he shrugged off with his saber.

Malak's return flurry blurred and slowed in my Force-enhanced vision. Each strike I could meet, could block, could predict. Malak leaned to the right, muscles bunching for a lunge that would be both sweeping and over-ambitious. I side-stepped out of reach, before spinning hard on a heel and thrusting forward in a jab aimed at his unguarded side.

The saber scored against Malak's armour, but did not penetrate.

His weapon slammed back to knock mine aside, and once more, I danced back out of reach.

"You've been practicing." His eyes narrowed, gleaming a sharper yellow. Malak leaned forward,
'saber twitching in the air, as if he meant to launch another attack. He repeated the move but I held still; seeing the feints for exactly what they were. A low thrum of amusement emitted from his voder. "Has that treacherous Twi'lek been reminding you of our past spars, Revan?"

I didn't answer. Merely took up my 'saber and glided into an offensive form that felt as natural as breathing. I could feel the kaiburr pulse in response, throwing unsteady power into Malak's core, flaring the passion of emotion that I had once taught him to master.

Wait for another sweeping right-hander, my intuition whispered. He always over-extends, but he is fast enough that he can make it work. Against most.

At another time, the haunting knowledge of my blind history would unsettle me. But I was in a place, now, where neither the claws of my past nor the fangs of his words could reach me.

I thrust high, attention fixed on both his stance and his weapon, ready for his slamming block and follow-up riposte. Weaving beneath his counter-attack, I came out with another jab aimed at the same spot on his side.

The 'saber hissed and sparked as that sithspawned armour once more held firm, but judging from Malak's enraged bellow, he'd certainly felt my strike this time.

Cortosis isn't invulnerable – I'd wager that blow rocked the armour's integrity. I need to get another torso hit in, with as much Force-strength as I can muster-

A roundhouse to the jaw caught me completely off-guard.

I staggered, reeling, physical senses momentarily stunned. Drawing furiously on the Force to convert my stumble into a back-spring, I darted out of his longer reach while my shock abated.

I expected a block, a 'saber thrust, a kick to the legs- There was a skein of disbelief to my broken thoughts. He never had the stones to punch me in the face before-

The Force balanced me as my head cleared. Malak, oddly enough, had taken no step closer. He stood ready, facing me, with a slight cant to his posture that further suggested my earlier hit had struck true.

"Enough!" Malak growled. I expected another pointless taunt after that punch, but instead it was fury building in his narrowed eyes. Charging upon the air, as a wind gust whipped to life around him. "Enough. I am done playing with you, Revan."

A dark pressure surged against my connection to the Force. My own hold stayed firm, but my eyes widened nonetheless as a staggering torrent funnelled into Malak from the kaiburr.

Not just from the frelling kaiburr-!

No, no- like the barbs of an encircling septagram, I could clearly sense seven distinct sources of power edged around the railing of the chamber. All drawing the Force from- from somewhere- before amplifying it through the massive crystal and then feeding it back to Malak.

The pillars, some of the pillars are hiding something- What I'd taken as nothing more than gloomy architecture obviously hid something more ominous. Some sort of gateway-

My awareness stretched out in a frantic need to evaluate and understand, but all I could fathom was the idea of seven separate portals, somehow offering Malak an endless stream of Force to pull upon at will.
And the power in his grasp kept growing.

"Now you will see what the Star Forge is truly capable of, Revan," Malak rasped. The Force lashed, visible for the crackle of black-and-white that spat around his torso. A deathly achromatic fount of raw energy he was about to focus on me. "Now you will finally die."

xXx

Zaalbar:

After Yudan Rosh disappeared, it surprised me when Bastila Shan did not immediately close her eyes.

"I-" the Human paused, appearing hesitant. She was already kneeling, on the cusp of re-entering her meditative state of being that was powerful enough to change a battle's outcome. And yet her head was craned back, awkwardly, as her uncertain gaze fixed on mine.

Logically I knew of Bastila Shan's power, but there were times when the beliefs of my childhood would resurge with a flurry. She was so physically small – Humans nominally were, just like Twi'leks, but Bastila Shan had little height on Mission who was barely more than a den-cub.

Size did not necessarily equate to strength, I knew this even when Kashyyyk had been the borders of my experience, but it was usually an indicator – at least, back on my homeworld.

As a cub, the only magic I had accepted was that of the gods – and even there, I doubted. Of course, tales of mystical Jedi had breached my remote home, but my people had always seen them as akin to moderators, counsellors – an alien, less-able version of an Old One, perhaps.

The idea of a being that could influence minds from afar – or, one that could project sparks of lightning from their fingertips at will – seemed no more than a wild story meant to awe a cub.

I was a different Wookiee now. I no longer had to see events with my own sheltered eyes to believe – Mission and Jen Sahara had taught me that. There was much out there I accepted went well beyond my comprehension.

"(You should reconvene)," I rumbled gently. "(We have need of your abilities, Bastila Shan)."

Her head bowed. I was not sure, at first, whether the gesture was agreement or guilt.

"Thank you, Zaalbar," Bastila mumbled. A handful of braids dropped to fall in front of her face. "Thank you, for standing as Revan's guide when I did not."

Her guilt was obvious, now. Painting her words with regret, colouring her soul with shame. Only a fistful of minutes ago, this woman had appeared so serene and peaceful, suspended in that esoteric state of battle meditation.

I did not know what Bastila Shan expected from me, though. I could not release her from the burden of self-blame: a maturation like that had to stem from oneself.

"(It seems to me that Force-sensitives face far greater trials than other sentients)," I mused. "(But failure to overcome these does not equate to weakness, Bastila Shan. Even a bent sapling strains to right itself and reach the sun. The shade of your past can shadow your future, or it can form the core of your inner strength)."

A wisp of a sigh escaped her. Her chin lifted, though, as she continued to address me. "I suppose there is a thin line between self-reflection and self-flagellation."

"(There will be time for that later)," I nudged. "(Time for peace, time for consideration. But first you must-)"

"Yes." Her quick agreement curtailed the rest of my words. She was staring at me solemnly through those unnaturally flawed eyes. I had no understanding how long it would take for those markers of corruption to disappear, but it seemed to me the sharpness of colour had already begun to fade.

Bastila smiled, then, sad and peaceful. "I do not believe it was chance that crossed your path with Revan's, and therefore mine. The Force moves through us all, Jedi and non-Jedi alike. I know little of you and your people, Zaalbar, but you speak with a wisdom well beyond your years."

I huffed, surprised and mildly discomfited. "(I have had my own failures, Bastila Shan)."

"You are a humble soul, Zaalbar. Perhaps, one day, I will have the chance to visit your homeworld and know you better." Her eyes closed, then, and without waiting for any reply the young Human turned and bowed her head once more.

The concept of bringing off-worlders to Kashyyyk would not sit well with my sire, I suspected, not after recent events. For my companions, though, Freyyr might make an exception. Bastila Shan seemed to infer that she might learn something from my people, but I knew the opposite could well be true in tandem. Isolation had not prepared my people for the machinations of foreign greed. In that regard, I believed cautious exposure and education was the better route.

I was starting to think of my homecoming, I realized. To look toward an event long denied to me.
The present, first, had to be overcome, but the future – the future was bright.

And as Bastila Shan wove her invisible, alien magic, I found myself smiling in the silence.

     xXx

Chapter End Notes

Coming up next: Revan strives to understand and destroy the source of Malak's power, while another showdown unfurls elsewhere on the Star Forge.
A kaiburr's worth of thanks to kosiah for the beta.
Revan Freeflight:

I was moving the instant the Force was unleashed.

Sprinting to the wall, power fuelling my heels, about to launch into the air-

The edge of Malak's charged assault skimmed across my back: a sharp jarring followed by a deathly lack of feeling. A jolt of electrostatic discharge married with something more insidious.

Keep moving!

I jumped high, high enough to clear the railing, feet landing on the walkway beyond with a thud as I ducked into an immediate roll.

A blast of heat spat above my head.

"This chamber is sealed, Revan!" Malak hollered from below. I was running again, following the arc of the walkway as it bordered the chamber. The crackle of electricity behind me hissed in my ear. "You cannot run from me. I will have your death by my hands this time!"

_I have to keep moving!_ Force-induced lightning I could withstand, absorb, reflect- but the complete numbness down the skin of my back confirmed Malak's vortex of black-and-white was more than just lightning.

An image flashed through my mind – fingertips, shrivelling white with decay. Kylah's, on the _Leviathan_, when I had unleashed death upon her and held it back purely for my own enjoyment of the moment.

A dark, deathly power, that sort of drain. Somewhere, at some place and time, it seemed both Malak and I had learned it.

"You are nothing now!" Malak was still bellowing like an enraged wraid. His taunting derision from earlier had morphed into a blistering fury.

_Because I hit him. Because that second blow did more damage than he let on. Because he had been playing with me, right up to the moment I showed him I was more than just prey._

"Look at you running like a null!" His yell still came from behind me, below in the central chamber, but the sound was closer, now. He was following. _"Lord Revan never ran from anyone... not even me!"

_Oh, let him think I'm running away._ My free hand caught the edge of a pillar as I hurled myself behind it. _It'll stop him working out what I'm running to-_
A pause, then, as I raised the bar of cyan high and beheld one source of Malak's burgeoning power.

My train of thought hiccupped. My eyes widened. Whatever I'd been expecting wasn't this-

I heard a thud behind. Malak, breaching the walkway, coming after me.

No time to investigate-

Both hands snapped together on my weapon's hilt, and with a rapid surge of Force strength I stabbed the 'saber straight at the body-sized capsule inset into the far side of the pillar.

Bright white flared as an unforgiving recoil slammed me hard back against the chamber's exterior wall.

I gasped, winded, weapon still clasped tight, but the capsule-

The capsule was not even cracked-

There was a flash of scarlet from my right: Malak's 'saber, flying once more, and it took less than a second to launch myself diagonally over the railing in evasion. I caught the whistling sound of something whirring dangerously close to my head as I fell.

I touched ground below, in front of the kaiburr, landing in a crouch with one fist resting on the chrome floor and the other still holding my weapon aloft.

The Force tightened around me in reaction.

"Oh, did you think that was transparisteel, Revan?" Malak's sneering mockery came from above and behind. "Did you think it would be that easy?"

I twisted on a heel, legs straightening, glaring back up at the now-distant walkway.

"What the frell is that?" I wasn't talking about the sodding casing of the capsule. Lightsaber-resistant, obviously – the only material that sprang to mind was the same cortosis woven into Malak's armour, but I'd never seen a translucent alloy of it. Nor one that repelled assault with such intensity.

The Star Forge can manufacture many material wonders. But it's the contents, the contents of the capsule-

"Mal." I didn't shout. I didn't need to. "What did you do?" My words still echoed, hard and grim and-

-and that was anger, creeping into my steady resolve. The image of the capsule burned in my mind: a naked body enclosed within, wired and trapped in kolto jelly, and somehow the key to Malak's power.

I didn't know how. I didn't know what. Except... except some deep-rooted part of me suspected something that my consciousness didn't grasp, and that same part was simmering with a long-forgotten malcontent.

Malak had paused, a towering figure standing feet abreast on the walkway above. The sparks of black-and-white closed tight around his torso, an interplay of shadows twining like snakes around his form.

"You were a fool, Revan." Malak had lowered his voice, the same as I. His lightsaber was held loosely in one gauntlet as he leaned over the railing to speak down to me. "All you ever saw was an infinite fleet rolling forth to crush the Republic. Droids, weapons, ships... you never realized the Star Forge was more than just a factory. You never thought about growing the power of the Dark Side itself."

The anger burning like a familiar wick in my gut told me he was wrong. I'd thought about it, at the least. Maybe I'd been one step away from acting on it before Deralia happened.

Anger is dangerous, especially here, my mind whispered. Powerful – yes. The blazing heat of emotion dulled the open wound along my side to insignificance. I didn't even notice my back anymore. But if I stumble here, I'll fall into my past. I told Yudan I wouldn't return from that. I'm not sure I could.

*I'm not... sure-

"The Star Forge is like a living creature, Revan." Malak raised his hand. Power pulsed throughout the chamber, thudding against my senses, choking my own grasp on the Force. "A creature that is leashed to my will, and bowing to my command. You never had that same mastery. You were blind."

And the vortex around him grew once more. Intensified by the kaiburr, but drawing on-

"Seven sentients," I muttered, eyes narrowing. Malak hadn't moved to follow me down yet; in that respect, he was more of a grandstanding braggart than he'd been before we stepped into the shade of the dark-

I cinched the errant thought back. No time to stutter over the contrast between the man of my broken memories, and the stranger my senses swore stood before me. Malak might be pausing to relish the moment or to gauge my fortitude – but I would use that delay for my own benefit.

Information.

"The bodies... they're not dead." I let my eyes wander over the nearest pillar. From this side, all I could see was a darkened column of smooth shadow. "Are they?"

"They're not alive, Revan." The cadence of his automated voice had rumbled back into a mechanized purr. "It would be almost amusing, to see you stumble over your old glory this way. If it were not so pathetic."

Achromatic shards of energy popped and snapped around him. The Force coiled in my limbs, ready to move at the first sign of offence, but the man merely stood and laughed at me.

"Oddly enough," Malak continued, as his chuckle died away, "it was Sharlan Nox who first gave me the idea. Not that I would ever be foolish enough to allow him entry into this chamber."

They're not alive, Mal says. I could feel myself frowning in thought. But how can the Force travel through seven corpses? And where- and where is the Force coming from? I tripped along the torrent of Malak's power, following the deluge through the kaiburr as it split back to the pillars- the origin felt like a tear in the very fabric of life. Seven tears-

I had to find out more. I had to get close to another capsule, without Malak gleaning my intent.

"What, do you not remember Sharlan?" Malak, still jeering, still prodding for a reaction or a weakness. Looming over me from the railing above, as he spouted jibes and threw forth references that meant nothing to me.
The name he dropped elicited no memory, no recognition. Nothing, except a faint whisper from another—

Bandon Stone. A dead master's voice. Yudan Rosh. Nisotsa Organa. Sharlan Nox. Zhar, warning me in the Shadowlands, listing Malak's top Dark Jedi. Any one of those names should worry you—

"I'd send Sharlan in for a nostalgic reunion but—" Malak paused, ensuring he had my full attention.

"-but I'm afraid he's too busy hunting down and killing off your crew."

I jerked.

And Malak was in the air, bearing down on me with a scarlet ‘saber and a fistful of charged power.

Force like wildfire bent to my will. Coursing through sinew and muscle, granting me celerity and lift as I once more launched myself high in evasion. The air crackled with charge- I cleared the railing once more, bounding to the left before Malak's wild blast could strike home.

He landed with a thud below, back in the centre of the room.

"Running again!" The thwarted snarl of fury crested in his voice, surged on the Force. "There really is nothing of the Dark Lord left within you, is there?"

More than you realize, Mal. I darted around the elevated path, ice in my heart, one hand outstretched. More than anyone realizes.

I sensed him vault high to intercept me. I had to be fast- faster- and then his boots hammered down where I had just been, a shockwave of sound augmented by his ire; a clamour of rage vowing to end me once and for all. But ionization was already crisping my maimed hand, three digits blistering as opalescent current shot forth to net around the pillar ahead.

With the sound of his footfalls sprinting closer, I wrested all of my Force-strength out through one limb at the nearing capsule. It was a spider-web of electrons designed to destroy rather than manipulate- but there was no conduction in the pillar, on the capsule, even around the casing-

No accessible control or conduit or weakness of any kind for an electrostatic charge to burn through and fry what lay beneath.

I caught a brief glimpse of a prostrate body as I passed: limbs tucked in a mesh of suspended cables, scarlet skin of a doomed Zeltron that couldn't be more than a dozen turnings of the Coruscanti sun. One of so many lives snuffed out for the glory of megalomania-

They're not alive. But they can't be dead, not truly dead, not one with the Force-

My senses screamed a warning. A surge of Force at my back-

I veered hard to the side, my off-hand gripping the railing as I heaved myself over. My other arm, snapping hard behind me, fingers flexing as I pitched Karon's ‘saber on a tight trajectory back at Malak.

Turning as I fell, I landed back on my heels to see the dazzle of sparks as red smashed cyan away.

"You think I would leave them open to Force attacks?" Malak mocked. My hand rose, calling Karon's ‘saber back home to my waiting grasp. Up high, I could see the armoured figure tense, muscles bunching for another chase. "You always underestimated me, Revan. And that will, once more, be your downfall!"
"You haven't let them die." The censure dropped from my lips without thought, and it was enough to startle him, to jolt him into abrupt laughter. Loud, mocking derision, once more edging out the ferocity of his hate. Such wild shifts from howling rage to deathly amusement and back again, more blatant than the sigils of corruption etched into his cheeks, or the yellow poison that spat from his eyes.

The Dark Side, in the end, was Malak's true master.

_We all bore signs of corruption after a time. Some swifter than others. This was the path I gambled on, the path I led them down. The path I thought was worth the risk._

And yet, the flat thought beckoned: if Malak could draw on this unbalanced cataclysm of might, then so could I. I'd always been more powerful than him. I could use these seven living corpses first; use them to destroy Malak and the Star Forge both, and hope I retained the fortitude to turn back before I lost myself.

Roll the dice once more- and this time, I had a failsafe should I truly fall-

"You think to reprimand me?" Glowing golden eyes glared down at me. The Force turned watchful, ready, as the cascade of black-and-white billowed around him, once more picking up velocity and strength.

Somehow, I knew he was waiting for me to run, waiting to intercept me mid-flight.

"Or perhaps you expect me to monologue the entirety of my plans?" Shadows rippled over Malak's face, his form, his soul. "Oh Revan," he mocked. "I think not."

With a wrench of Force almost casual in its application, he hopped upwards, so his boots landed atop the railing, so he towered even higher than before. A pause, then, for him to check I had not moved. Then he hurtled down-

At the last instant, I jerked forward, underneath him, spinning around to stab hard at his turning back. My 'saber skittered off the back-plate of his armour- I needed to get in close to his side again-

The Force curled like a whip as he spun, slamming into my own shields like a breaker breaching a dam. I kept my footing, barely, sliding back unsteadily as he lunged forward with a sweeping right-hander. His classic lunge that _always_ left him open-

A split-second's moment of thought: I could duck in close while his guard was down, aim for the same weak spot- but my stance was unbalanced-

I lurched to the side instead, pale blue plasma held high in defense.

Malak's 'saber scythed down abruptly, before it snapped into a tight guard as he twisted to face me. Dark brows slammed down in unchecked acrimony. I knew, then, that he'd banked on my counterattack: that had I drawn in close, things would not have gone my way.

"They're all Force sensitive, aren't they?" I growled. "And you haven't let them become one with the Force."

"You never stop trying, do you?" he murmured, head tilting, as though he were considering his next assault. "I suppose that was a facet of what made you great, once. A shame you never used that tenacity to uncover the true power of the Star Forge. You might have been the invincible one, had you not been so blind."
And where would that have left me now? I knew the answer, for all of my doubts and temptations. Just as mad as him. Certainly, with no thought left to my original intent. The Dark Side wins. The Dark Side always wins.

"There's a separation between life and death, Malak." He knew that. Of course he did. Ghosts, ripples, Force visions of the past, echoes of the dead – they touched the living but only insubstantially. Whatever Malak was doing, here, was wrong. This went beyond the Dark Side- I didn't know why I thought that, only that I did. "A separation that shouldn't be tampered with."

The builders have upset the balance. I swallowed back the dryness in my throat. Would that I'd had Jen's observational skills the first time around.

The balance between life and death.

"Spoken like a true victim," Malak jeered.

"Ever wondered why the Rakatan died out, Mal?" I whispered. The exact same words echoed in my mind, but said in Malak's voice, pleading for me to change course. My eyes stung. I could see the Lehon pyramid again: Malak, annoyed, disapproving, but still blindly faithful. Begging me to turn back before it was too late for us both. "Ever thought they might have played around with powers beyond their control?"

"You dare?" The roar was as unexpected as his explosion of Force, an earthquake of compression that erupted with his temper. A volatile shockwave smashing through my shields and punching me into the air.

No time to react before I crashed hard into something- the kaiburr, the face of the kaiburr- the unforgiving mineral was at my back as I slipped down. I was drowning in a sea of roiling Force as an invisible hand crushed around my throat.

"You dare mock me with my own words?"

The iron grip squeezed tight. Somewhere, I'd dropped my 'saber. I was gasping- choking- my fingers needed to scrabble at my throat- but I wouldn't let them-

-instead, I forced my hands down, down, flat against the jagged crystal that pulsed tempting power beneath my palms.

xXx

Jolee Bindo:

There was an irritating rasping sound that just wouldn't quit. Regular, every two seconds, like the shallow breath of a sick man struggling to fill his lungs.

Snoring. That was it. Snoring was one of the few things I could leave about Wookiees. They weren't exactly the quietest of beings. And with the lot of us cramped into that tiny room on the 'Hawk, I'd just about had my fill of listening to Zaalbar's nightly wheezes.

I was just conscious enough to want to throw something at Zaalbar's head, and yet so darn exhausted that I knew I didn't have the energy to move.

"It's a horizontal chute. For, like, moving factory bits of starship or something. I dunno. But the chute cuts through the centre of this place, and Teethree reckons it's your only chance of catching up to the others."
Ach, and if it wasn't bad enough having the Wookiee interrupt my slumber, his pet Twi'lek had to be nattering at the top of her voice somewhere nearby.

::The conveyor's not moving, and this tunnel is dark except for emergency strip-lighting.:: That was Onasi Senior's voice. Loud. Worried about something. And showing absolutely no consideration for an old man trying to catch a few winks. ::You sure this is the quickest way?::

That whistling noise – it was in sync with my own breathing, and that just made it even more annoying-

"Yeah. It's a shortcut, Carth. Unless Dee decides to hop in a lift or change direction, 'cause then we're really stuffed. It'd be easier if he answered his freaking comm, y'know."

Ugh, I was so tired. Couldn't remember feeling this wretched in a long while. And my bedroll felt like a blasted grill of durasteel, hard and unforgiving on my old back.

Onasi sighed. Sounded like the blighted man was breathing straight in my ear. ::Alright, Mission, I'm going in. Get Teethree to poll the cam-feeds further ahead – they can't all be fried. I'd feel happier if we had some eyes out there.::

There was nothing for it. I was going to have to rouse myself, and then give that lot such a roasting for disturbing an old man's kip that their ears would be burning into next week.

"On it!" the girl chirped, far too loudly.

I reached out to the Force, tried to wrest my eyes open and push myself up-

"Mnggh," I groaned, instead, as my body completely failed to obey.

"Jolee?" Something pressed gently on my shoulder. "Can you hear me?"

It took everything I had just to force my eyes open. Fuzzy blue wavered in front of me, slowly resolving into Mission. Above her was the overhang of the 'Hawk – I appeared to be bedded down on the blighted loading ramp-

"Ungh," I said, as my demand to know what happened completely failed to coalesce into sense.

::Is that the old man?: Ordo snapped in my ear. ::Shoot him with another stim, ad'ika, and get him on his feet.:::

I blinked. The whistling noise had subsided, now, as I became aware of an all-too-fast beating inside my chest. Kid Twi'lek was already holding a 'derm in her hand-

"Stop," I croaked, as the Force trickled into my desperate grasp. I was cold – damp with sweat that had chilled through to my bones. Heart thumping fast and irregular, like it wanted to jerry-jig out of my chest. Head spinning and vision not entirely clear. How many darn stims have they shot me with? "No- no stims."

"Can you sit?" Mission whispered. "'Cause, like, Canderous ain't convinced in Teethree's tracking, so he's all antsy 'bout that Sith sleemo coming back-

I managed to raise a wavering hand, enough to forestall the lass before she started in on everyone's grooming habits or something. The Force pulled in tight – but it was sluggish, weak, and slow to obey. Like a Czerka-branded therm blanket, taking an age to knock up one's core temperature – but getting there. Eventually.
Nothing made sense. Onasi, Ordo, Mission, all yabbering in my ear when I felt weak as a day-old ash-rabbit.

I got hit. The realization should have felt more like a shock, not this mire of exhausted apathy. A disruptor bolt to the chest. On the roof of the 'Hawk. I made it down, but then- then that Dark Jedi-

I remembered tentacles, suddenly, aiming for my face. Life draining out of me as I didn’t bother to struggle. Everything fading rapidly, along with my own desire to live.

The small part of me still cognizant at the end noted the nature of the beast. It wasn't the dark, or at least not the dark as I'd ever known it. More like a need. An ever-reaching need, feeding off me and burning brighter and brighter until there was nothing left but someone else's hunger-

"Someone tell me what happened," I managed. Mission's hand was under my elbow, slowly guiding me skyward. My head told me I shouldn't be alive, that I was nothing but an appetizer to be consumed by something much, much greater.

Compulsion. My head was still fuzzy. *Enthrallment. Gotta- gotta shake it loose-

"Dee distracted the Sith guy and ran off." Mission was hovering next to me, still with that darn stim clutched tight. "He- he followed, and we think we're tracking them through the station but-

Nerves pricked into being, and slowly, slowly, my head began to clear. A stabbing pain in my chest made itself known, and I made the mistake of looking down.

It had hard not to grimace at the mess beneath the bandages and the kolto patches.

::But we ain't sure the tracking's accurate,:: Ordo's rough voice cut in over the airwaves. ::So that Sith shabuir might turn up here any minute. The other lot have rescued the princess, so she should be knocking some ships together now. And Revan's on her way to Malak...::

One thing I liked about the Mandalorian: he was clear and straight to the point.

"Jolee? Can you- um, d'ya think-" The girl was biting her lip. I knew what she was going to ask before she did. "It's just that Dee's out there, alone, and Carth's gone after him, and stupid Rosh has turned his comm off as well, so now I don't even know what Big Z is doing-"

"I can barely sit up under my own strength, lass, never mind anything else," I grumped, and felt immediately guilty at her crestfallen expression. I sighed, and my chest ached in sympathy. "Give me a minute, Mission. Let me work out what's going on first."

::Stay with the 'Hawk, Jolee.:: Carth ordered.

Fine thing for him to say, already gallivanting off after his son the way he was. Still, I could see the sense in his command, and not just from a logistical view. I was a mess. My arms where shaking, and sweat pooled beneath my tattered robes. Someone had patched up my chest, but it still hurt like buggery. And I'd never known the Force to be so thin and wavery in my grasp.

Ach, I wasn't moving for awhile yet.

"Can you at least, like, find Dee through the Force?" Mission whispered. "Or Jen?"
I closed my eyes, half in exhaustion, and reached out.

Even as drained as I was, the faint ripple of Force was enough to dull the edge of pain from my side. I couldn't hear the eerie murmur of the kaiburr – and whether that was my own weakness or the roaring crescendo bellowing from the heart of the Forge, I didn't know.

"Revan and Malak," I murmured. Thunder drowning out the sound of everything else. "That's all I'm sensing."

::Revan, is she, is she...:: Carth's voice trailed into static. Mission, at my side, leaned close, wide brown eyes asking the same question.

I patted her hand absently. "She's alive," I told them both. "We can't do anything for her but keep ourselves safe." I drew in a breath, steeling myself for the stab of pain in my side. When it came, it wasn't as bad as I feared. "And make sure the lass has a ride outta here. Any progress on the airlocks?"

"No." The kid's headtails slumped low over her shoulders. Even our sanguine teenager was beginning to show the signs of despair. "Teethree can't break the encryption. I mean, he's still trying, but the airlocks won't respond. It's like they're faulty. Every single one of 'em in this stupid place."

There was something odd about that-

::Airlocks will open when the Forge goes into evac mode, ad'ika,:: Ordo said gruffly. ::We'll get out of here when we need to.::

"Yeah?" Mission muttered into her wrist, glaring. "Do you really see Darth Poodoo issuing evac orders so his underlings can escape while he's getting smacked about by Jen?"

::This cargo conveyor is shut down, Mission,:: Carth chimed in. ::That means alarms. And that means the Fleet's doing damage out there. Evacuation mode is automatic once something critical like life-support or power generation is affected. So stay by the ship. The airlocks will open, sooner or later, and then we can all fly back out.::

There were enough assumptions in that statement for me to accuse the man of perjury, but I rather thought a seasoned officer like Carth Onasi knew that. Still, the words seemed to have an effect on the kid, with the way her shoulders straightened – and likely that was the only thing the man intended.

"Focus on what you can do," I added. And right now, that was safeguarding the 'Hawk – faulty airlocks or not. "For instance, you can help an old man get to his feet instead of mooching around here wasting time."

Mission's gaze snapped to mine, sparking with a faint echo of her usual sass. "Fine," she groused, as she offered me a hand up. "Suppose it'd be inhumane to leave an old geezer stranded on his wrinkly backside. Far out, between you and Canderous, we could just about turn the ship into a nursing home."

I chuckled as I accepted the help. It was hard to stifle the groan that followed my ascension upward. "Doesn't sound so bad if you're bringing me food and washing my clothes, lass," I wheezed.

I spotted a blaster back in Mission's hand as she faced the direction of the hangar exit, her face tightening with a watchful readiness that I hated to see in one so young. Still, the girl was nothing if not resilient. Provided she made it out of here alive, I rather thought she'd be alright.

I drew marginally deeper on the Force, and moved to flank her as we waited for whatever came next.

xXx

Revan Freeflight:

There are times when a moment can stretch out for an eternity.

When the weight of a decision trembles on a knife-edge, and either side has its own ruination. When the roar of a nemesis bellowes through the air, compelling the choice to be cast, bleeding corruption through the Force and damning the only option that has a reasonable chance of victory.

When time slows to a crawl-

For I was not winning, not like this. I could keep fighting, struggling, grit my soul and trust my 'saber to find a path through Malak's guard once more.

Or, I could take out his power source first.

And as my fingers dug hard into the kaiburr at my back and his Force dug deep into my throat, I thought I knew best how to accomplish that-

_Have you learnt nothing?_ The castigation whipped through my mind. My own conscience lambasting me in a voice that sounded remarkably like my borrowed memory of Vrook Lamar. _There is a reason Jedi stand back from the dark, no matter if inaction leads to failure or death. Because there are worse things-

Time choked to a standstill.

And this time, this time, I had an anchor in Bastila – brittle, flawed and fragile – but she might be enough, maybe, to withstand one final stumble. I could reach out to her, demand she hold me steady while I tempted mastery of the kaiburr once more-_and take mastery back-

-and trust myself to keep my eye on the endgame. The portals, the portals- I would have enough power to destroy them through the kaiburr. As long as my endgame didn't change, didn't corrupt. It was such a slight risk, really, when balanced against the superior might of Malak.

Just another roll of the dice.

Motes of dust glinted motionless in the air. The jagged crystal pulsed beneath my palm. The Force, oh, the Force, calling to me and promising salvation. It sang like a flock in flight, like the united will of a cattle-beast herd, like the symbiosis of a Paerduag living in twin harmony. Brighter and brighter, ice and fire, not warring together but instead building on the innate strength of each. A life-storm of power, all blooding higher in my uncertain grasp.

The noose around my neck vanished. Beyond, in slow-motion, I saw Malak's legs bend in the infancy of a Force-enhanced leap.

Then the flipside called. The flock dove, senses honed, claws aiming for the kill. The herd of cattle-beast turned, sloughing their weak and their old to appease the predator on their tail. The symbiotic creature unbalanced, as the simple humilis-Paaerduag slipped into subordination, into no more than a mute carry-beast to the mentally-dominant altum-Paaerduag.

Because, always, there was a master.

YOU ARE THE MASTER.

I had believed that once. But it wasn't true, was it? The Dark Side had mastered me in the end, just as it now did Malak. The sheer hubris – of myself, and every other being who had dared wager their soul against the dark – defied logic. My own arrogance, in believing I could take such a step and walk away with my objectives unchanged; or my soul, untainted.

WHAT IS VICTORY AGAINST MALAK, IF I FALL AGAIN?

The kaiburr trilled a sweet song of temptation. Promising more and wanting more- as the Dark Side always did and always would-

THE FORCE WILL FREE YOU.

In the end, the one thing I had learned was when it was time to stop rolling the dice.

With a final wrench of will, I called to the Force- not from the veins of corruption firing through the mineral at my back, but instead from the raw lifeblood of the galaxy itself.

From the motes drifting slowly through the stagnant air around us. From the flecks of mites and bugs that burrowed beneath floor grills and between walls. From the constant creep of electricity as it fired a matrix of charge through every cable and into every machine.

Pure Force, as it twined through every particle that was but a part of the whole.

I straightened, pushing off from the kaiburr-

-AND TIME SNAPPED BACK TO NORMALITY.

Malak was there, suddenly, red plasma raised high in a killing blow. Faster than should have been possible, Karon's 'saber came flying to my grasp, hissing to life and slamming home against his.

Red snarled and sparked against blue, as his yellow eyes spat fury into mine.

FIND ANOTHER WAY. A BETTER WAY. THERE'S ALWAYS ANOTHER SOLUTION.

Power heaved and roiled in our grasp, torn between the two of us, our 'sabers held impotent as our wills wrestled with one another. The unbalanced Force flowing from the portals fed into Malak, amplified by the kaiburr, lending him superior strength as his weapon inched forward.

KEEP SEARCHING.

I had to destroy the portals. Direct attack on the capsules wouldn't work- Malak had protected them well. But the capsules housed sentient bodies, held helpless in charged kolto jelly, which must mean that somewhere else there had to be-

My senses unraveled outward. It was intrinsically difficult to feel anything beyond the almighty vortex of Force burning from Malak and the kaiburr both, but I had to keep trying. Through the air, into the pillars, below the walls. Karon's 'saber was forced close, a diagonal guard slowly slanting back at me, near enough to feel the threat of heat simmer through to my skin. I couldn't hold Malak at bay for long.
All I needed was one more moment. A moment, to find what I was searching for.

The Force twitched over a flux of electrons. A power source, a life-support system, hidden beneath the chrome floor under my boots. Connected through the pillars-

-and sometimes, I knew, a moment could be over in the blink of an eye.

Malak leaned forward. I lurched sideways. His 'saber unbalanced, skidding off mine. Stabbing into the kaiburr. Something alien shrieked-

I was already leaping clear, but the scream blasted through the Force, a sonic screech of mineral disjunction that dug deep into my head. I stumbled on landing, ears ringing, barely staying on my feet-

But I had to act while I still had the chance-

My maimed hand, aiming at the floor, fired a weak spear of ionization. No more than a ripple, really, only enough to impede the power core of the hidden life-support system.

Only enough to manipulate the device into standby mode.

Malak was yelling in shock, jerking his 'saber clear and spinning to face me. A crimson fissure gaped in the rock behind him, still whimpering a discordant, eerie murmur through the air.

"You- you think you can destroy the kaiburr?" Malak roared. His eyes were pinched and his head shook in irritation – and I knew, then, that the crystal's defacement had affected him too.

Let him believe the kaiburr was my target. It was a minor scratch on the mineral surface, already closing under the kaiburr's own power. Even a hundred lightsabers would do nothing more than rend the air with alien screams.

Beneath the flooring, the hidden life-support system stuttered into deactivation. How long, before seven bodies gasped into extinction? How long, before the seven portals closed this unholy gateway into the realm of death?

A minute. Maybe two.

Through the Force, I tasted Malak's wrath as he called on the septagram of power that obeyed his will. Directed from the kaiburr but sourced from the dying bodies: dark-edged chaos churned once more into a crescendo of annihilation I could not block.

I only needed a minute, maybe two-

With a sharp wrest of inversion, I twisted the weaves around me and vanished.

Pain.

Without the Force, I could not push the crippling sensation down, or blank it out, or rise above the spasms radiating from the lightsaber wound in my side. I was running hard to the wall, forcing tight muscles to move, and I didn't remember the last time everything felt so frelling hard-

Even my jaw ached, where Malak's armoured fist had smacked into it earlier. My back- deadened skin, chafing against tattered mesh, a warning sign of a different sort-

I kept running, and could only hope that Malak wasn't listening for the pound of my invisible feet darting away.
"What?" Malak bellowed in furious astonishment. The crackle of death and lightning scored through the chamber behind me. "You think you can hide from me?"

I changed course- I couldn't leap to the railing without the Force, but if I could put something between us, like, say, the kaiburr-

"You will not run from me any longer, Revan!" Malak's voice roared, dissonant and grating, as his voder struggled to match his fury with volume. "Not if I have to fill this entire chamber with devastation!"

The seconds ticked over desperately in my mind as I neared the far side of the monolithic crystal. Without the Force, I wouldn't be able to sense when the trapped souls met their final death, and when the portals became nothing more than kolto-filled coffins.

I had to rely on Malak's reaction, when he sensed what I had done.

I needed a minute, maybe less-

Thud of boots, nearby- I stilled on the spot, glancing over a shoulder. Malak was there- right there- less than five metres away- having followed with speed I could no longer match. His pale, Sith-marked face now mottled with rage, as his unseeing gaze scanned the room.

Too close! Sithspit, he'll hear me if I move- or if I sodding breathe-

Power crackled around him. A lattice of black lightning, ready to stream from his fists. If he blindly unleashed it here, I'd be right in his firing line.

Malak punched a gauntlet into the air-

He froze, suddenly, before his head jerked up to stare at the nearest pillar.

"What?!" Shock, widening those fallen yellow eyes, as they moved to the next pillar. "No- no-stop!"

The shards of electricity guttered. Malak spun on a foot, his gaze tracking all of the doomed portals, one by one, in mounting desperation.

It was time.

I dropped the weaves. Clean Force flooded me, my sword-arm snapped upright, and I lunged forward to make an end of things.

xxx

Dustil Onasi:

Lord Arseface passed me mere minutes ago.

I'd been tight against the wall, teeth gritting so hard I could swear they were about to pulverize. Pain in my frakked arm near unbearable without the Force. Heart thumping so loud I was sure the bastard would notice as he sailed past, sickly eyes pinched into deathly slits.

I'd thought he would hear me, smell me, somehow sense me out; for it hadn't taken Master Uthar long, and as far as the Sith pecking order went those two seemed to be more or less crappling from the same rotten branch.
But Sharlan Nox strode by without pause.

I let myself breathe only after he'd gone a full minute. Lungs burning as I allowed myself shallow, silent gulps of sweet air. Limbs shaking, and mind racing like a swooper on shot.

I could double-back: take the comm off mute and reach out to the others. Lord Arseface was ahead of me, now. Further away from the 'Hawk, from Dad and Mission. But if I turned tail and ran to supposed safety, how did I know the frakkwad wouldn't do the same?

And then I'll be right back to where I started. A bloodbath in the hangar.

Not to mention... I grimaced as I flexed my empty off-hand. I had no weapon. I had one working arm. And... I was pretty sure I was frakking lost, now.

What a bleeding mess. Here I was, a half-trained Adept too scared to use the Force, thinking I could take on a frakking Sith Lord with one hand and no 'saber. The deadliest thing I had in my pockets was an expired protein bar.

Mex would call me a frakking tool.

I pushed off the wall, suddenly disgusted with myself and my pointless bitching. I knew what I had to do. I had to stop Sharlan Nox getting bored and heading back to the Ebon Hawk.

I had to find a way to kill the bastard.

"Where'd you go, arseface?" I hollered. "Are you too frakking stupid to realize when you've overshot your prey?"

And for a moment – for a sweet, delicious moment – I let the Force weaves drop.

The jagged stab in my arm dulled. A welcome rush seared through my limbs, surged through my senses, promised me anything-

- glimpses of the truth can be found here. the truth of real power, more than you have ever tasted-

Nearby, an oily miasma of something that felt more rotting than living stopped moving away.

And turned back to me.

- the Force is stronger here. you can be stronger here. all you need do is draw deep, and you will be a match for the parasite-

I clenched my jaw. And even though it felt damn hard – maybe even harder than turning on Master Uthar and seeing the disbelief pale his opaque, fatherly, corrupted, eyes – I pulled the Force in tight and flipped it invert once more.

The whispery voice quenched into silence. The spectre of Sharlan Nox vanished from my now-mundane senses. The throb of pain returned with a vengeance.

And further down the passage I saw a service corridor lead away on an angle.

I ran. Again. Like vermin scrabbling through a maze, with every shiny tunnel the same, no viewports or signage or anything to give me a clue to where I was running. Steps echoing as I darted down another side-entrance, and I wasn't sure if the echo was the reverberation of my own footfalls, or the Sith Lord closing in on me.
If Lord Arseface augmented his hearing, he'd have no trouble pinpointing the sound of my boots, shooting a little speed under his slimy heels and closing in for the kill. I had to find something-

The light cut out.

I skidded to a halt, vision dead as shock froze my limbs. I couldn't see- there'd been a cross-junction of three circular exits ahead of me- but now I couldn't see a damn thing! Heart leaping, palms sweaty, every instinct screaming that my only recourse left was to reach out-

With a flutter, at first, the lighting returned.

What the frakk?

I turned to stare wildly over my shoulder, but the corridor behind was as empty as the three in front.

Did he blitz the lights? What, does he think I'll flip out at a freaking power surge?

That made no sense. Surely, screwing around with the electrical infrastructure of No-Jaw's palace was more likely to land Lord Arseface in trouble with his dear boss, rather than panic me into doing something retarded.

So far, anyway-

::Sssheghs achalss tah. Nil daritha chalss tah.::

I took a slow, silent step flush against the wall, as a foreign voice spat out through invisible speakers, bouncing incomprehensible sounds into the air.

::Sssheghs achalss tah. Nil daritha chalss tah.::

A repeat of the same message, I thought, as the same guttural hisses ran through a third time. Sounded like a robotic voice, but the dialect was almost Selkath with all that sibilant slithering-

Not Selkath. My hold on the fish lingo wasn't that shaky. Though it didn't really matter what the language was – only what it was saying. And maybe it had nothing to do with Sharlan Nox-

The lights flickered again, but stayed on this time. The automated voice cinched into silence.

It's a system message, I realized. A warning. Some sort of alarm, if the lights are choking – maybe an evac order-

The burn of hope lanced through me. Sharp and bright, almost like the Force. Has... has Revan actually done it? Has she toppled Malak?

Or... or maybe it was the Fleet. Maybe, now that we had Miss Battle Meditation on our side, Dad's Fleet were blasting through and...

...and about to blow up the Star Forge. That I'm standing on. Along with Dad and Mission and the frakking others.

I swallowed. I had no clue where I was, but I'd only risk coming home and heading back after I'd dealt with Lord Arseface.

And ahead of me, just at that very moment, a figure stumbled into view.

Again, I held my breath and flattened myself tight against the smooth wall, and it wasn't until the guy actually ran past me that I realized he was nothing more than a Sith foot-soldier. A lieutenant – judging by the insignia on the his shoulder – with the bulk of a blaster clipped at his waist-

I pushed silently off from the wall, and fell in behind. But the guy was sprinting, veering left, faster than me without the Force, and I just made the call to risk dropping the weaves when the soldier abruptly stopped and slammed a hand against a door-print I hadn't even seen.

Further down the corridor, a full-sized double-hatch opened with a pneumatic hiss.

"Ruark!" the guy bellowed, slowing to a stride as he cleared the threshold.

I scrabbled to enter before the damn door closed, hoping the mark wouldn't catch the sound of someone following-

"Yeah?" a sent echoed back, deeper in the room, and it was only then that I really took in where I'd stumbled into.

"-did you see the friggin' alerts? Can't understand a cracked word of that friggin' voiceover, but my visor pinged me back the station stats-

This place looked exactly the same.

"Cool your jets, Jeb, and just keep the damn snubs warm."

Minus the 'Hawk and the crew, of course, but otherwise I could almost believe I'd fumbled my way back to the start.

"That's a critical transformer failure, Ruark!" The man I was shadowing paced over to the nearest snub, an Aurek-class like the ones that were sitting pretty back in our hangar. My feet automatically followed; slow and silent. "You really wanna stay up here in Restricted with nothing but dead battle-droids for company, and airlocks that won't open-"

"Airlocks are shut down in Factory too, twonk head."

I couldn't spot the second speaker, but his reply back was faint. My wide eyes roved over three Aurek birds and one of those curvy Sith ones, along with a handful of empty bays.

This was just like our dock. Another officer's one. Space for about a dozen starfighters, but less than half-full. Manned by barebones staff and labelled on the plans as some sort of exhaust duct. Ordo and Psycho-Droid had said that before, when they'd been poking at the schematics back on the 'Hawk, pointing out these hidden docks that were apparently some sort of stealth exit for the higher ranked Sith. Which meant...

"...and you'd be better off gutting yerself than breathin' if you don't keep these compressors humming," the faraway Ruark continued. He sounded muffled, like he was bent over a refuelling gig or something. The soldier called Jeb hunched his shoulders and threw a half-hearted kick at an errant clean-bot as the other guy kept spouting off. "The general ain't got no time for incompetence. And you know the higher-ups are even worse."

...it meant- it meant that I might not even have to get back to the others. I was no flyboy like Dad, but I knew the frakking basics. I could get a bird in the sky – and if the Forge was starting to bleat out station-wide alarms then I could comm the others, tell them to get the frakk out, and do the same myself.

Leave Lord Arseface behind to get blown up, along with ole No-Jaw if Revan hadn't done the deed yet.

Assuming, of course, that Mission could find a way to get the airlocks open.

I reached out to the Force. I wouldn't think twice, not here, not against the scum I was standing behind. It's us or them, Dee, Mex'd whispered to me back in the early days. Us against everyone in this chivhole. No time to be a blubbery chump if you wanna survive.

And as my fist clenched, and strength buzzed in my ears and kissed against my soul, the Sith foot-soldier named Jeb choked. From behind him, I could see his hands scrabbling, flailing out to reach desperately around his throat.

*take what you need to survive-

I stepped forward, ripped the blaster from the twitching man's waist with a jerk of power, and strode around face him. Fired twice. Once to shatter his visor, twice to make sure he stopped kicking.

"Jeb?" Soldier Two yelled in alarm. "What the frig are you shooting at?"

And then I realized I would have to kill that one, too.

*there is great power here. you can protect them all-

Quenching the susurrating promises of the Star Forge, I slipped back into invisibility and turned away from the corpse with the melted face. Held the new weapon tight, and considered my next move with a grimness borne of necessity.

I used to say the names in my head. Drex Voona, Talal Born, Tushka, Belaya Linn. But after the Leviathan, when kills became direct by my hand and anonymous in nature, I'd stopped counting. It seemed more important to count the ones still standing – the ones I would fight for.

Dad. Mekel. Mission. Even the others I'd been travelling with- frakk, even Revan.

No time to be a blubbery chump about it. Mex was right on that one.

I took a step-

-and behind me, I heard the soul-sinking sound of the hatch opening once more.

*I sensed you in here, little snack."

Soldier Two squawked in the distance. I turned slowly on one silent, invisible heel, and saw again the wraith of my past come to challenge my future.

Sharlan Nox was staring curiously at the warm corpse by my feet. "I thought I tasted blood on the air. Looks like you've been busy."

A faint chuckle as Lord Arseface raised his hands.

But the bastard couldn't see me, and now I had a frakkling blaster-

xXx

Revan Freeflight:
I charged, he turned, and it all narrowed down to this:

The hiss of 'sabers crashing.

The roar of Force in my blood.

The scuff of boots as we both moved; weaving and dodging and charging each other again and again.

No words, not anymore; just the frenetic byplay of weapons and limbs – an exchange of power that bore the synchronous taste of home and death.

So familiar to me, this dance. My muscles remembered these steps. Training with this man, fighting by this man, striking against this man. My body and soul knew, even if my mind did not. We had learned together, side by side, from the same masters. Grown together, forged together, fought together. And now-

I darted close, 'saber raised in an off-balance parry that I knew he would knock aside with ease. He followed with a hard kick at my knee, but met empty air instead- for I was diving to the side, tucked in a fast roll with my 'saber outstretched, coming up behind him with a furious rope of Force lashed around his ankles.

He almost stumbled. Almost.

A brutal surge of power shattered my psychic grip instead, just as scarlet vengeance came sweeping at my face.

I leapt back a metre. Found my feet, and raised my guard.

One fist dropped from his hilt, clenching tight. I sensed the crackle of death as it sparked back into existence- and lunged forward before he had a chance to unleash it.

He dodged back, only just avoiding my swipe, returning both hands to his 'saber in response. I pressed hard, but he met the next attack with a solid block. And predicted my subsequent strike with a step to the side – before attaining the offensive once more.

He loosed a flurry of jabs at my injured side; I danced back, as he edged forward in exploration. He had to be desperate, now, to end me – just as I was him. We were both waiting for an opening, waiting to capitalize on a mistake.

He no longer had an endless supply of Force to draw on, but the kaiburr bolstered still him. He was stronger – physically, at least. And I was the more wounded party.

But I knew– oh, I knew– that all it took was a moment. A moment for the scales to tip, to unbalance. And if that moment wasn't going to appear by itself, I'd just have to mould it into existence.

I allowed my knee to cave- just a little- just enough to affect my stance. Clenched tight on the Force to steady my balance. Dropped my blade an inch; let it waver slightly in the air.

His eyes pinched tight in calculation. One hand flung hard from his hilt, snapping outward, firing a quick punch of compression straight at my gut.

I let the fist of power hit. It hurt, even with the Force tight around me. Air, gasping from my lungs, as my legs wobbled and threatened to topple.
Him in attack, advancing fast, both hands on his weapon again as he raised it high in the sweeping right-hander I knew was coming-

I flew forward before his 'saber began to drop. Cyan plasma rocketed onward in a stab powered by all the raw Force thundering through my veins.

My hilt trembled as the strike connected: I felt his armour hold for a shaky instant, before it splintered and gave way. Momentum drove my blow further, and then my old master's lightsaber sank inches deep in my old lover's chest.

A freeze, a pause, a moment's stutter- my gaze dashed upwards to meet his: sickly, yellow eyes widening with stark disbelief.

I was bodily ripped away, then, by a recoil of his Force. Thrown back hard as his scream of pain tore through the air.

My body slammed into the ground, but I was back on my feet a second later, ready to react-

The man stood still metres away. One gauntlet pressed tight against his cracked chest plate. Something dark and wet dribbled through his armoured fist.

His other hand clutched a lightsaber that now shook in a weak grasp. Fingers unfurled, and then that hilt dropped, slowly, slowly, before clanking on the chrome and winking out.

xXx

Carth Onasi:

::We think Dee's about to enter another officer's dock,:: Mission whispered in my ear. "And Teethree's got access to the cams in there.::

I swallowed. I was stumbling through a darkened cargo chute, trusting that a droid's predictive algorithm would get me out somewhere near my son. If Teethree was wrong-

It didn't bear thinking about. I cleared my throat, striding between two large crates lit up in ghastly red from the strip-lighting above me. The lights were down due to the alarms, no doubt. And the alarms had to be the same reason for the stationary travellator beneath my feet.

::Shall I get Teethree to cast the feed to our comm-links?:: Mission asked.

::No.,:: Ordo grunted, a split-second before I had a chance to. ::Keep your eye on your surroundings. Bad enough you're yakking to that bucket droid over the air. 'Cause it'd be an embarrassing way to die, kid – gawping down at your wrist while the enemy shoots you in the head.::

In front of me, the stacked crates were blocky outlines containing mysterious goods sent from the inner workings of the Forge – or so our droid's interpretation of the schematics read. The unmoving line of crates carried on and on, lit up further ahead by what appeared to be a pale white glow.

"Verbal reports only, Mission," I said, frowning at the white light. "But make sure Teethree's keeping tabs on the hatches near you. Until he gets visual, there's still the chance he's wrong- that the Sith bastard might be doubling-back."

Suddenly, I was a lot less sure that I'd made the right call in leaving the hangar. Mission was left behind with Canderous, Tobards and Jolee – all three of whom were somewhere between moderately and heavily injured.

I was running on an adrenastim Ordo had slipped me when I'd left, but it didn't entirely dull the ache of the bruising knotted down my back. And I knew I was in much better shape than the others.

::Sheesh, Carth, I'm not that simple.: Mission complained. ::Y'know Teethree can keep track of more than one thing at a time, right? I mean, I know multi-tasking is hard for you guys an' all::

"Okay, okay," I muttered grimly. Mission's ever-ebullient spirit had bounced back – and I was glad of that – but now was not the time. "I think the chute has an exit close by. What's ahead?"

It was artificial lighting I'd spotted; the whites of halogen bulbs indicating the end of enclosed space. The light was coming from the right of the tunnel, like the chute opened on one side only.

I kept moving, weaving quickly between towers of cargo that stretched high to a darkened ceiling. My footsteps, fast and loud, echoed in the stagnant air around me.

::You're close to a tech room the conveyor goes through. Jump out there, and head to::<

A screed of Binary beeps and whistles cut through Mission's words. My stride faltered as I neared the opening.

::Carth! Tee's found him on the cams! He's- he's entered that dock- no, wait, it's a Sith guy::<

"The Dark Jedi?" I demanded in a hoarse whisper. I was right by the exit, now; pressing hard against the curve of the tunnel as I raised my blaster at the harsh light beyond.

What I could see was empty and still. Weapon and gaze locked on the room, I took a step full into view, swinging the barrel around in a sweep.

The room was mercifully clear.

::No, don't think so- sheesh, Teethree, slow down!:: Mission was gasping in my ear, her words peppered with astromech trills. ::Just a foot soldier? Tee says there's two- and he can see Dustil now::<

My heart kicked. Ahead, the cargo chute ran through the room at ground level before continuing on into encroaching darkness. As I stepped from the motionless conveyor onto chrome flooring, my blaster travelled over barren consoles and inactive tech bots alike.

A repair room, by the looks. Maybe it served as a maintenance check on factory parts travelling through this blasted place.

"Directions," I hissed, keeping my voice low. I hadn't encountered anyone – yet. But it sounded like Dustil had. "Get me to my son."

There was a hatch set into the far wall. I was there in a blink, hand mashing down on the door control.

::Go left outta the room, you'll be in a::< Mission's voice transmuted into static as the damn droid spat something further in my ear. I was tight against the inner wall as the hatch opened, my gun pointing down the corridor beyond. A sidestep across the threshold, as I spun on my heel, sighting the other direction.

Empty.
...down... go further... Dee's killed a...::

Another series of beeps. Fast, and frantic.

::No! No- Teethree's spotted the Dark Jedi- Carth- run!::

I was running. Left down the corridor, running blindly. "Directions!" I growled again, for now I had no idea what was around the next bend. The hardened military focus I relied on in situations like this was cracking, fracturing- all I knew was that I had to find Dustil now-

::Follow the corridor left. Hatch at the end::: Another break of static, as I turned hard left at an intersection, and the astromech screeched again. ::Dustil's... the Sith's got... soldier:::

The corridor ended in a large double-hatch, marked only by a door-print console inset into the wall a good few metres before.

::Whaddaya mean, he's eating him?:: Mission shrieked.

"Mission, the hatch!" I was next to the door-print, staring down at the biometric device that certainly wouldn't open for me. Beyond the oblique half-moon exit had to be the dock.

My son, and that Sith bastard, had to be through there.

::Eating- how can he be:::

"Mission!" I hissed frantically. "I can't get the blasted door open!"

::Carth... careful:::

Barrel aimed at the door, legs apart and trigger finger ready- careful meant nothing against the weight of my son's life-

"Get the damn hatch open!"

A pause, a pneumatic hiss, and then the half-moon double-hatch began to separate.

In the gap of sight beyond, the first thing I saw was grey. The grey titaplate hull of a snubfighter. The backdrop of a hangar. Then- a red-robed figure- his back to me, a lifeless body in his arms-

I opened fire.

Double-tap, triple- a scream as the first bolt hit him dead-centre, scorching a black bulls-eye on the crimson cloth covering his back. I was still firing- but sprinting, now- and then the robed figure blurred-

Bolts streamed from the barrel of my gun. I kept hard to the wall, and there was cover nearby behind a stack of cargo crates-

Everything froze before I reached it. My muscles locked. Limbs ground to a standstill, mired in invisible ferracrete. One arm, still outstretched, wielding a primed gun that refused to fire-

No. No!

My head, still turned, sighting my target-

And the robed bastard turned slowly to face me.
Move! Damn it, Onasi, move!

I thrashed and flailed – or tried to – but nothing happened. Desperation was hot and acrid as I mentally ordered my body to obey- to fire that damn weapon again or at least keep running-

But my body wouldn’t – or couldn't – move. Not even an inch.

::Carth!:: Mission shrieked, and the worst sound in the galaxy was the frantic beeps of the astromech I couldn't understand. Detailing events in cold Binary to a girl who had already seen and lost far too much.

"Another crumb." An insouciant drawl of Galactic Basic hit my ears. That Sith bastard, strolling towards me. Behind him lay a lifeless body – not Dustil, thank the stars, not Dustil – of a Sith-clad soldier. A few metres back, beneath the shadow of the snub, lay another corpse garbed the same.

"Truly, you nulls are barely worth the bother." A crimson-gloved hand rose to brush at his shoulder- a blackened, exposed limb displaying the edge of a flesh wound that should've hurt him. Felled him, for I'd got the bastard in the back, too-

::Carth!:: Mission's screams were painful, now. ::Dee! Rosh! Jen! If anyone... listening...! Help!::

I jerked desperately, frantically, uselessly- I'd heard Force stasis could be broken, dependent on the will of the victim and the strength of the villain-

Nothing. Still, nothing.

"But your sting is annoying enough," the bastard droned on. "If I had not just fed, I might now be facing an ignominious end, indeed."

Beneath the tattered flaps of crimson cloth, his burnt shoulder shifted- pulsed- _shone_ my gaze was as frozen as my limbs, so I had a straight view of the unthinkable.

Butchered flesh regenerating into unmarked skin.

I'd be the first to admit I knew little of the Force- but I'd picked up a few things around my lover and my son. Healing, I'd thought, was one of the few skills that was all but impossible when embroiled in the Dark Side.

_How in the blazes can anyone kill this sort of evil?_

I strived, I struggled, I forced everything I could in trying to move. Mission was sobbing incoherently, now, and I couldn't bear the thought of her as a witness to my end.

The pale bastard sauntered closer as my attempts came to nothing. Eyes, slits of gleaming yellow, crinkled in detached amusement. From his cheeks, thin tendrils of... something that looked a lot like _flesh_... curled beneath his chin.

And behind him, against the backdrop of the nearest snubfighter, a figure blurred into existence.

The ping of a blaster firing-

The bonds around me shook- I was moving, stumbling, boots tripping over one another as I caught my balance. My arm jerked upright to aim in desperation-

::DEE!::
A wild shot, the sound of another, and a fierce scream-

But then I was flying. Thrown back, hard, slamming against the wall, and my body froze again-

And a second scream- but from someone else- a terrified sound that turned my blood to ice-

Dustil.

I was immobile against the wall, but I could see everything. My son, his throat clasped tight in the Dark Jedi's fist, as the bastard's other hand was raised back at me. Holding me incarcerated as I was forced to watch my worst nightmare unfold.

Smoke wafted from the melted mess of Sith's head- where there'd been a tail of black hair, there was now molten flesh and abraded bone. Another blaster wound- Dustil had fired a blaster- right at the back of his head-

But it didn't stop him as he jerked my son close.

My frozen vision blurred. All I could see was shredded scarlet robes covering the Sith's back as his skull began to glow. His entire body, illuminated and damned- and I couldn't see Dustil anymore, I didn't know what was going on, except that this Sith bastard had Dustil and I couldn't move-

I had to move- but, try as I might, nothing worked. And the shrivelled black skin on the Dark Jedi's head slowly stretched over to cover his exposed skull, before morphing into healthy pink.

A Mandalorian curse cut through Mission's sobs, and then the comm clicked into silence.

Carving into my gut was a horror I'd only ever felt the likes of once before. When I'd found pale, lifeless limbs, surrounded by the ashes of a planet's devastation.

Morgana. I was gasping, barely breathing. Morgana. I did my best, but it wasn't enough. I didn't save Dustil. All we had was a handful of weeks together, after everything-

A dull groan, a whimper, and suddenly Dustil was in my line of sight again, held aloft by the Sith's outstretched hand. My son, struggling so feebly now, like he had almost no fight left.

Renewed vigour coursed through my veins, and I felt my limbs budge-

"Oh no you don't!" the Sith snapped, whipping his head back to me and flexing his raised hand. The air tightened, constricted, crucifying me with impotency. His bare skull gleamed with stolen health, a shiny contrast to the wisps of shrivelled hair still clinging to the back of his neck. The bastard's body was almost glowing, and his eyes-

-his eyes were burning with the depths of a nether-hell he had somehow sucked out of my son.

"Dad," Dustil gasped, his voice thready and weak, as he twitched like a tach caught in the jaws of a loth-cat.

"Dad?" the Sith echoed, black-rimmed eyes blinking in surprise. "Dad? Oh, what fun!"

My gaze was forcibly fixed on the cursed man's hand, still raised in my direction, slim and pale and bearing ridiculously long black nails. But I could see the bastard's head tilt as he leaned over my son once more.

"Oh," he repeated, a soft sound of surprise murmuring from him. "Oh. Do I recognize you, little snack?" He drew Dustil in tight so I could barely see my son again- and there was something even worse about the delight cresting in his voice-

"Telos?" The word lilted, high-pitched and sharp, as it slipped from the depraved monster. "Yes, yes, I am sure of it! I found you on Telos, all those years ago! You were mine, little morsel, before dear, dead Nisotsa so rudely interrupted us. Lucky for me you have no Dark Jedi to vouchsafe your life this time, hm?"

The bastard's head slowly turned my way. "And you are stronger, now, I sense," he murmured, facing me, but his words were directed at Dustil. "Strong enough that I might keep you as a pet for a good while. But I'm afraid your darling father is too annoying for my tastes. Shall we watch him shoot himself first?"

My stomach dropped. No. Not like this, not in front of Dustil, not so he has to watch-

The blaster was still in my hand. My hand, not immobile anymore, but slowly being forced up and around.

Dustil moaned, weak and whimpering like a starved child, and the sound etched cruelly into my soul. And as the barrel of my own gun slowly rotated around to face me, all I could think of was the son I was failing, the wife I had already lost, and the lover I would be leaving alone in a galaxy that cursed her name.

    xXx

Revan Freeflight:

My limbs froze. For some reason, I couldn't move. The smart thing to do would be to press forward, finish it, for Mal was still standing-

His black-and-grey exoskeleton slowly stained crimson with his life. A mortal wound, that. When plasma gouged deep enough, even cauterization couldn't stem the flow. Karon's lightsaber might've even breached his heart.

I was beset, suddenly, with the inane deliberation on whether he recognized the weapon I had run through his chest.

Malak's gaze held mine. The poisoned depths of his eyes had lost that unbridled rage; darkening, instead, into grim resolution.

"You're dead," I whispered. My lips felt numb. I should- I should feel something-

"Am I?" he breathed, unmoving. "And yet, here I stand."

The kaiburr was behind me. Thrumming deep, as if in reaction. I could feel flurries of compression pull sharp around Mal; tightening, tightening, until I sensed what he was doing and why he was still standing-

"That's a mortal wound." I blinked over dry eyes. My senses traced the path of Force cording frantically through his flesh; binding muscle and sinew together in a futile attempt to hold back the inevitable. Holding him upright, keeping him alive. "First time you fumble the Force, you'll be out cold."

And dead.

His brow twitched, as if he'd intercepted my thought. "In many ways I am more alive than you, Revan." Mal's voice cracked, broke, wheezing hoarsely through his voder. "I look at you, and I cannot see a glimmer of the lord I once betrayed, or even the woman I once followed."

She's still there, Mal. I swallowed. I'm still here.

And a thought, then, horrifying and tragic, ran through my mind with soul-destroying ease.

What if... what if our positions had been reversed? What if fate had decreed Mal to be the one captured by the Jedi? And then the second chance had been thrust upon him, willingly or not, as he was painted with a false backstory and forced to navigate between sacrifice, objectivity, and the greater good?

Could Mal have chosen redemption, given another life?

Would he have?

"I sense the shape of your thoughts, Revan," Malak rasped. The Force pulsed through him, twining into a mesh of energy as it weaved through his charred flesh and forced his heart to keep beating. "How long did the Jedi masters spend with their fingers dabbling in your blackened soul?"

I was still, dammably, frozen. And if not for the gauntlet clutched at his ribs, and the Force clutching at his life, I would've thought Mal was almost relaxed.

"Have they reprogrammed you with bleatings of the light?" he whispered. "Do you dream of redemption, Revan? For yourself? For-" his voice dropped, "-for me?"

Something sharp and shameful sliced me to my core, as I realized-

no.

In all of my travels and travails, and with all the lost or fallen sentients I had encountered and dared to judge, the one person I had never considered saving was the man I had once, by all accounts, loved as fiercely as the stars.

Now, etched with evil as he bled out before me, there was no one left to mourn him but an amnesiac ex-lover who had already moved on.

"Anyone can turn back, Mal." My words were weak, useless, a sop to my own short-comings. I said them anyway. "Even in death. You know- you must still know- there is no death-"

"You, of all people, spouting the wisdom of the Jedi?" A laugh, as nasty as it was bitter, scraped from his voder. "Your utter gall remains unchanged, I see. You are ever the hypocrite."

My throat clenched tight with emotion. I felt numb- and yet, so exposed.

"You emptied Korriban. Is that how you live with yourself now, Revan?" Malak jeered in a low voice. His gaze was the burning of suns, as the Force climbed higher in his dying grasp. "You redeemed Yudan Rosh. Reclaimed Bastila Shan. And now, what? You think to add your old lover to the mix?"

My head said it was a fool's errand. But what sort of person am I, if I don't even try?

"Mal-"

"Oh no, Revan, I will not be relegated to nothing more than the ultimate notch on your forsaken pillar of atonement." His voice dropped, and his eyes narrowed to slits. Behind me, the kaiburr pulsed at my back. "You started this. You led us all down this path. You cannot just wave a hand to undo it all."
"This is not for myself," I whispered. "You were great, once. Righteous. Just. Surely, you remember better than I. Surely you recall the man you once were-

Malak's head shook, the smallest amount. His metal jaw glinted, taunting me with my own crimes. "And now I am reminded of your weaknesses, Revan," he growled. "You shed them as Dark Lord – but you are no Dark Lord now."

There was a bud of urgency, flaring in my gut, imploring me to act. With the Force as a crutch for his dwindling life, Mal could not win- but he was not yet beaten, either.

"How much really has changed?" he hissed. "You were once so reckless and driven when it came to those you cared about, Revan. You do not remember, but I do. That escape from Chandrila. The gamble on Vanquo, to recover Talvon. That absurd Fett infiltration you hid from me, risking it all to save Yudan-"

I flinched.

A sound between a growl and a laugh choked from him. "Oh, why am I not surprised?" he sneered. "Of all the things to remember... and you have others now, don't you, Revan? Others who follow you blindly like him? I saw a soldier in Bastila's mind. Would you risk yourself for a common grunt?"

There was a roaring in my ears. And the urgency grew, as the kaiburr hummed loudly behind me.

"I sense your crew, Revan." Fingers of Force pushed out from Malak, through the chamber and beyond, spanning across the breadth of the Star Forge. "Scrabbling like vermin. I sense Sharlan Nox. He's caught someone. Is that one of yours? It must be, for your pet Twi'lek is there too-"

What? My gut lurched. No. Yudan is with Bastila. Malak had taunted me earlier with this Sharlan Nox, saying he was out hunting my crew- I hadn't stopped to consider or believe it, for I simply couldn't afford to-

The Force flared, deepening in my grasp. Shielding bright around me, for whether Mal spoke truth or not, his purpose was still distraction.

"You always did risk too much for your friends," Malak whispered. Something moved – his lightsaber, lifting, spinning slowly in the air by itself, hissing back to life under his psychic grasp.

My own hands tightened in response, drawing the guard of my old master up high. Malak couldn't duel me, not anymore. He couldn't best me like this, and yet in that second I knew he was about to try-

His 'saber launched like a spear, with the wrath of his kaiburr-laced Force behind it. I was ready, shield firm and weapon crossed, but at the last minute his 'saber weaved hard left-

A crash, as it gouged deep into crystal. A sonic shriek; the tearing of rock screaming into my head-

My eyesight blanked and my ears rang, but the Force- the Force wrapped around me still and safe. I was grounded, shielded, protected, even as the alien song of pain cried out through the air.

But I was safe- I would sense Malak the instant he stepped close, and if he tried anything more gruelling than a Force throw, the weaves holding his chest together would surely slip-

The scream of sonic dulled to a bleat as my vision returned. And Malak-
And Malak-

I glanced wildly around the now-empty chamber. A faint hiss, barely audible beneath the kaiburr's whimpering, as a faraway hatch closed.

Malak had gone.

xXx

Yudan Rosh:

I ran, power-induced celerity speeding me on, as I ignored the eerie whispers and whimpers that called out to all Force-users who dared step foot on this perfidious ruin.

In the air, shockwaves of Force rippled and surged; emanating from the titans of my past. Revan, and her Malak, clashing together in one last terrible wrestle of wills.

Chrome blurred and corridors vanished as I ran from the woman Revan begged me to either protect or vanquish, and instead toward the man whose death might cause her to fall again.

Oh, Revan. The things I do for you. Even now, after everything.

Ahead, a pair of rogue battle-droids. My hand waved, and they were hurled away: smashing into a wall, sparking impotently as I turned a corner and left them for dust.

Ancient Rakatan spat through the station. It was not the first time, and I barely took note as the lighting flickered as it had done earlier. For I was focused on my quarry.

I could sense him. Beneath the cyclonic storm of Revan and Malak, and amidst the tantalising temptation of the kaiburr. Sharlan Nox was the faint scent of decomposition, of flesh gone to rot, of Force that hadn't turned dark so much as mindless.

There has always been something slightly off about Sharlan. Cowardice, the likes of Bandon Stone and Arran Da'klor would mutter with a sneer, even as they bowed in submission to whichever Dark Lord had mastered us at the time. Apathy, I had thought, and found myself unable to castigate him for it without making myself a hypocrite.

For after Revan's death, nothing had truly mattered to me bar the twisted addiction of the Dark Side.

Or so I had thought, until Nisotsa had dropped the bombshell of Revan's resurrection.

But this residue, this malefaction upon the air... I had sensed it before, from Sharlan, with no ready answer to its origin – other than as one more paradigm of Dark Side corruption.

We all fell, but the fall affected us all in different ways.

Now, Sharlan was easy to detect and track. With the maelstrom of Force churning all around me, I had expected Sharlan's signature to be almost indiscernible. But his trail was clear, burgeoning with unexpected strength- and close, too.

I ran down one last corridor-

At the end a dual-hatch beckoned, and the Force rallied sweet in my grasp before wrenching the doors open.
And in the hangar beyond-

A familiar figure stood, his back to me, garbed in the same scarlet-and-rubescent as always. He stood motionless as time elongated around me.

Force punched out from my grasp: a tight, compressive grip that coalesced around the man, thrusting him in the air like a rag-doll, dropping a limp body from his arms to the ground with a thud.

I charged. Burning green erupted from my hands as I closed in on my target.

My hold on him shattered a good metre before my strike could connect. Sharlan Nox landed, free, feet barely kissing the ground before he leaped clean back, bounding away from my onslaught.

He vaulted again, this time powerful and high, and cleared the snubfighter at his back before disappearing from immediate view.

The need to hunt fired in my blood: to chase down my prey and vanquish him while he was on the run. But a murmur of sanity held me in check, implored me to glance down at the body by my feet.

The boy. Breathing, and barely conscious. His eyes were wide and unseeing as he twitched on the floor. He was in poor shape-

The scuff of a boot had me whipping around, lightsaber raised high in reaction.

Carth Onasi stood metres away, by the wall, staring down in horror at the blaster in his hands. His chin jerked, then, before his gaze darted to his son.

"Dustil," he whispered.

I leaned down to grab the boy's arm, lugging him roughly to his feet. There was a whimper and a stumble, but the boy kept his footing, and I took that as a good sign while my attention snapped back to the rest of the room.

Sharlan had retreated, for now. I could sense him, like a pollutant thick on the air, ebbing in wait some distance ahead.

Waiting for an opening, a pause, a chance to retaliate.

"Dustil?" For a Force-blind, Carth Onasi was surprisingly quick. He was already next to me, shaking his son's arm, as the boy slumped uselessly at my side.

"Compulsion," I hissed through gritted teeth, recognizing the vacant stare of the enthralled. How had Sharlan dug so deep so quickly into the boy's mind? And the boy was drained- not to completion, but Dustil Onasi's signature flailed like a weak Initiate barely open to the Force.

There was a growl of discontent from his father. "We have to get out-"

"No," I broke in. "Sharlan Nox is stronger than I have ever sensed him to be. I will finish him." I turned a hard-edge stare on the stalwart soldier Revan had claimed for her own. "You must take your son to safety. Now."

The man's brows creased in immediate concern as he eye-balled his son. "I'll have to drag Dustil-"

And ahead, I felt a surge in the Force as Sharlan began to creep forward.
"I have no time to undo what is wrong with him." I thumbed off my lightsaber and clipped it to my belt in one swift movement. My now-free hand rose to cup the boy's chin.

Dazed brown eyes blinked at me, frowning in vague recognition.

"You will take your father back to the Ebon Hawk," I murmured, threading my words deep with power. It was harsh, quick, and the only salvation I could offer. The compulsion would wear off on its own soon enough – as, I had to hope, would the noose of Sharlan's coercion around the boy's will. "You will take your father back to your allies. Now."

"Rosh-" Carth Onasi snapped, angry, even as his son wrenched free from my grasp and pulled instead on his father's.

"Dad, we have to go back to the Hawk!" Dustil demanded. His voice was hollow, and one arm hung askew at his side.

"Go!" I hissed, for I sensed the drum of power as Sharlan darted closer. Carth Onasi's face twisted in dislike – as much at the concept of deserting as to what I had done, I surmised. "Both of you are nothing but liabilities, here – surely you perceive that!"

The soldier's expression hardened as his son wrenched on his arm. The man nodded, short and sharp, before finally allowing himself to be dragged away.

The single lightsaber was instantly back in my grasp. Behind me, I heard the brainless pound of fists against the now-closed exit hatch.

Inwardly, I sighed.

Compelled beings are not the sharpest of thinkers.

"Comm the others!" I called back, but my gaze stayed fixed on the silent trio of snubfighters that filled the hangar. I loosed a wrench of Force behind me – enough to open the cursed double-hatch once more. "Do you not have an astromech to overcome such obstacles?"

"Yudan Rosh!" a drawling voice declared from behind the closest snubfighter. My eyes narrowed. "Fancy meeting you here!"

The sound of disappearing footsteps eased something within me, but also distracted me from the object whistling through the air-

A cargo crate, flying sideways at my head-

I cursed, lurching back just in time, only to be sideswiped by a thrown barrel from the opposing direction.

I stumbled, off-balance and slightly winded. Instinct had me converting the stumble into a backspring, landing some metres back with my blade at the ready. Sighting a tech-bot as it hurtled through the air-

The Force rushed to my furious command, striking the bleating droid clean through with my weapon.

"Enough parlour tricks!" I growled, dropping one hand from my weapon's hilt to drive away a second crate with an upsurge of Force. "Come out and face me, Sharlan!"
"Why would I do that?" The man's voice seemed to saunter through the air, like everything was naught but a lark. "It is the height of foolishness to face a superior foe head-on, is it not?"

I sensed a billow of power, then; followed by the sound of thudding boots. I glanced up, to see the comrade who had never particularly impressed me, perching calmly on the roof of the closest snubfighter.

"Or, perhaps, the balance of power has changed," Sharlan intoned. His thin black lips curved. And the effluvium of Force stinking around him was great; great enough that I would be a fool to underestimate him.

But he was not my equal. He never had been.

"I see you are sporting a change of hairstyle," I mocked. Sharlan Nox was not one to fall victim to temper easily, but I knew my advantage would be to lure him into outright duelling. "Seems most unlike you, Sharlan. While Malak can do justice to a bald pate, I have to admit it is somewhat ridiculous on you."

Even with the distance between us, I could see the man's eyes narrow. "You have cost me a most tantalising appetizer, Yudan. Still, I suppose I am not surprised you are here, sniffing after Revan again. Even second best, you never could keep away from her, could you?"

The taunt burned, the more so because of its inherent truth. But Sharlan was fishing, testing – and I would not fall for the bait. "I am true to the one I swore fealty to first, Sharlan. What of you? You were not part of Deralia, and yet you remain at Malak's side. Do you truly believe your master will live through today?"

Sharlan trilled a laugh, still standing at ease atop the starship. I could rush him, leap forward to intercept- but I suspected the man would simply slither back deeper into the hangar unless I caught him by surprise.

"My master is safe enough," he drawled. "Although, really, what is a master but a stepping stone to greater heights?"

Sharlan had spoken with such blatant self-interest before – and I had to admit the sentiment did resonate with the damned hierarchy of the Sith. Still, I could not hold back a grimace of distaste. "Perhaps that was the first indication of Revan's impaired judgment – when she discovered you and trained you in the Force."

The first time I had seen Sharlan was shortly after Malachor, emerging in Revan's ranks right at the inception of her calamitous war against the Republic. Sharlan never divulged his origins – and neither had Revan – but I always wondered, even then, how she could so blithely ignore the disregard of a subordinate so indifferent.

"Discovered? You believe Revan was my first master?" He was delighted, warbling a chuckle as a single blade of scarlet fired to life in one limp wrist. "I suppose it was never a secret, per say; more that the both of us deplored speaking of such a barren cripple from our past."

My focus sharpened on the ground Sharlan stood upon, as I paid his words little heed. "I care little of your masters, present or otherwise," I returned, eyeing over the snubfighter's cockpit that was little more than a metre from his booted feet. His stance, casual and relaxed, was a nonchalance I knew was all for show.

"Well that surprises me," Sharlan murmured. "Considering you were almost as close to Em as you were to Revan."

That snatched my attention; and it was contrived to, I realized, as the detached hose of a refuelling gig came whipping through the air. I jumped high, flinging my 'saber down to scythe the airborne snake in two.

A second later, and I was landing- and throwing back Sharlan's follow-up barrage of what looked like the robotic arm from a cargo-lift machine.

Throwing it straight back at him-

Sharlan flung one arm out sharply, and the mechanical limb went careening into the shadows.

I could feel my brows lowering. "You expect me to believe that Meetra was your master?" I knew it was foolish to continue this distraction of verbiage, but it was difficult to let such a ridiculous notion lie.

The man shrugged, standing once more at ease on the sleek snubfighter's nose.

"Believe what you want," he returned. "Consider me Mandalore's lovechild if you like. After all, Mandalore's war was the crucible for so many of us. I had been alive for eons already, but it was on a scorched battleground where Em first found me and taught me to truly live."

"You speak rot," I said coldly. "I would have known had Meetra been training an apprentice-"

"In the middle of war? Towards the end, when she was so often called groundside?" Sharlan snorted in overt disparagement. "Would you expect her to broadcast such a heresy – training an unsanctioned padawan – when you were all teetering on expulsion from your precious Order?"

No- had anyone been training an apprentice, they would have kept it under wraps until the close of the War. Back then, some of us still harboured hopes of a return to the Order, even amidst the bitterness of their inaction.

"And then, what?" I clipped out in impatience – for I did not put any credence to his words. It was beguilement, distraction, no more than a means to draw my attention away. Truly, the man would have done better continuing to taunt me about Revan. "Then you deserted Meetra after Malachor to bend knee to Revan?"

"Oh no," Sharlan said softly – but I was aware of the Force as it built slowly in his still grasp. He probably thought he was being subtle about it. "Em was the one who sent me to Revan, to complete my training. A final gift, if you will, from a broken master to a bereaved student – but Em had no way of knowing that Malachor affected me, also. And Revan, I suppose. I daresay if Em lived long enough to know of Darth Revan's reign, she would have rued the day she sent me to her." He sighed in overt mockery. "Em was always so stupidly soft-hearted."

The ridicule present in his tone was enough to smart, on the behalf of a friend I still thought of dearly. And I surmised, then, that perhaps Sharlan was better at this game than I-

But it would not matter. Whatever his words, preposterous or blasphemous or aimed at my own weaknesses – I would not be foolish enough to let down my guard.

Keep your eye on your foe. His weaknesses, his intentions, his environs-

"I suppose you will claim you were at Malachor, too," I drawled, my eyes landing again on the closed cockpit hatch resting close to his boots. "Allow me to anticipate your rejoinder: you brought down Cassus Fett whilst everyone else had their eye on Mandalore."

Sharlan laughed, a sound both high-pitched and discordant. "I had forgotten how truly amusing you are, Yudan. No, you foolish dunce. I was with Em and Xaset. At the centre of it all. Back then,
I was no more than an idiotic apprentice, refusing to abandon his master and her lover."

"Sure," I snapped in disbelief. Although Meetra and Xaset together would not have surprised me-for all that my friend had been well-regarded by the masses, there had been so few who dared draw close to an empath. Xaset had been one of them. "And the Force was not burned out of you because you are special-"

"Perhaps that is down to no more than physiology," Sharlan cut in, shrugging. "Humans are so short-lived and fragile, after all."

On another day, I would have questioned the implication- unless Sharlan Nox had the same ability as that strange shapeshifter we had encountered earlier, I did not see how he could claim to be anything but Human. In the now, I simply kept my focus tight on the man as he continued meandering. "I like to think I was born during the Wars. But Malachor- Malachor was where I was truly forged."

I struck, before he could.

A spear of Force lashed out from my grasp, aiming straight for the cockpit's transparisteel. Glass shattered in a fountain of shards, and the man jerked in surprise-

I was already flying through the air, lightsaber raised.

His scarlet blade lifted just in time, slamming against mine in a block that was more solid than I would have expected from him, once. A snarl twisted his gaudy black lips, and the gleaming pink skin on his scalp speckled with fragments of embedded glass.

He sidestepped, swift and abrupt, before thrusting out in a wild riposte I had to dodge backward to avoid.

Sharlan had more power and speed than I'd realized- but the art of duelling was my game. And this game, I knew, as I batted aside another lunge, was now on.

xXx

Revan Freeflight:

Bastila!

I was running to the exit, mind still hazy from that cursed sonic blast. He couldn't be far ahead, not even with the kaiburr, not with the ticking time-bomb of his own wounds drawing on his Force.

Bastila?

Hatch, refusing to open. Another second gone, before a brief pulse of ionization cleared the barrier.
Senses, still shaky, but if Malak was going after my crew-

BASTILA!

Revan? She was faint, faraway, but slowly turning at my call.
Yudan, I gasped at her frantically, as I ran from the nexus of this cursed place. Is he still with you?

A pause, long and incriminating. No. He- we- Sharlan Nox is after- he has gone to protect the others, Revan.

She tried to hold back the thought, but my bond-sister was tired, and the faintest glimpse of a man seeped through -

Carth. No-

Malak was after them, he was headed to Sharlan and Yudan- and Carth was there-

"I sense Sharlan Nox," Malak's voice sneered in my head again. "He's caught someone. Is that one of yours?"

I had to get back to the hangar. Running, sprinting, tearing through corridors- I had to descend, get to my crew before Malak could-

Revan, you must focus on Malak!

_He's gone, Bastila!_ Perched at the top of a circular stairwell, I could leap into the centre shaft and clear a dozen floors in one hit. _He's gone after them! I have to get to the 'Hawk!_

I jumped.

A flurry of surprise from her. I do not believe they are by the Ebon Hawk, Revan.

Even falling at enhanced speed, so many floors took more than a second. What? Where? Where are they?

She was focused wholly on me, now. Turning her energy to our bond, and retreating from the stars. I'd have to send her back to help the Fleet, if she hadn't done enough to tip the scales already-

All I know is that Sharlan Nox is hunting Carth's son. Push your senses out, Revan. Do not fall victim to panic. There is no emotion-

The Force cushioned my landing as I fell silently on the balls of my feet. Senses, straining out in desperation, for I was near the 'Hawk now, but if Malak had gone further afield-

Bastila retreated; I had the sense she was relinquishing all responsibility of this situation to me, for Bastila had the Fleet to protect, still. That had been my orders, after all – ensure Bastila win the true battle, out there in the stars, while I held Malak at bay.

The kaiburr's energy susurrated thick through the place, as if it knew its greatest ally was on his last legs. But it was in the throes of his final moments that Malak could truly wound me.

There. The Force honed in on a faint spark: Jolee's, fainter than it should be. Next to the slumbering speck of Juhani, still nestled within the 'Hawk.

Further afield: Dustil, running. Yudan, blazing in the Force next to a sickly taint that was not Malak-

Fear punched hard in my gut.
Malak- he was striving for a last act of vengeance, I knew this. But even he would have understood he was not quick enough to hold me at bay. Not wounded, not if I was following the same path-

Panic was swift, acrid, and heart-stopping. Time froze. And my own voice whispered in my mind-

I'd always been more powerful than him-

My head, turning back up, to gaze in horror at the ceiling some dozen floors above. Back, towards the upper meditation chambers.

-but he'd always been able to surprise me.

xXx

Chapter End Notes

Coming up next: the depths of Force bonds are explored.
A showdown's worth of thanks to kosiah for the beta.
Too late, too late, too late-

My head craned, staring in horror at the stairs that spiralled above me, round and round like an arc of hope slowly devolving into soul-crushing despair. A dozen floors I had damnably cleared in a flash, tricked into running after the wrong vulnerability by the man who had always known how to trick me.

Mal gambled I would drop everything to protect Yudan. To protect Carth. To protect the crew-
And completely forget about the other person so incredibly important to me.

The one whose life was even more of a vulnerability than Malak knew. He moved to wound me in one last act of spiteful defiance, not even realizing that Bastila was the key to my downfall-

My gaze darted desperately from railing to railing, skittering up the numerous flights I had so recklessly fallen past. I could see the path back up, I could bend the Force to my will, jump from side to side and ascend-

But it would take precious seconds.

And my senses told me Malak was already too far ahead.

I dropped into a crouch, one palm falling to rest flat on the chrome floor. My eyes closed, and I reached out.

The bond beckoned, and my instincts knew there was only time for one course of action – and even then I might already be too late.

My mental focus pitched hot into our mind-link. Dogged desperation drove me on: deep, deep, deeper. Near or far, distance mattered nothing to the mesh of Force that so permanently entwined me with Bastila Shan.

But Bastila- Bastila had already retreated to the stars. Back to her own mission, as per my command. Focusing on the battle I had insisted was the important one – for it was my job was to pin down the distraction.

Bastila assumed, just as I had, that Malak was hunting the others. The others, and not her.

Bastila! Come back! Come back!

I could feel her awareness, but she was vague, indistinct; her very essence spread thin in a smear of consciousness. Her thoughts and psyche dispersed, spreading wide through her net of battle meditation.
This time, there was no point calling out – for now I knew where the battle really was. This time, I had to go to her.

Somewhere, beneath me, my open hand pressed against a cold floor. But the feeling was muted and dull, and the boundaries of my own flesh blurred into oblivion as I chased after my bond-sister. Through the bond, through the Force, and deep into the ether of space.

Infinite dots of energy sparked against my senses. Existence in all its forms: creatures or plant-life or even the atoms themselves... all jumbled together in a wild matrix that would be completely chaotic if not for the unifying foundation of Force underpinning it all.

A heady sense of oneness enveloped me, for I was just a cog in the great machine of everything, surrounded by the immense power of the whole. But I was a cog that could turn, and – I understood this without arrogance – a cog that could also turn others.

The feeling was not unfamiliar. Even without an associative memory, I simply knew the throes of deep meditation could attain this level of awareness. Yet... yet there was a new dimension, an edge I had never seen before, a comprehension surrounding the psychogenic state of every sentient being within my reach.

And these states could be manipulated – the knowledge on how to do so was clear. Clear as a crystal Deralian sky that a scholar had once cherished.

I could will to life the slightest brush of hope – or fear – and direct it across the minds of many. Taint them either way. Or I could loose a psychic murmur to bolster morale and sharpen reflexes – and it would take no longer than the span of a fleeting thought. A tiny jolt – aimed at the right place – could stall the electrical impulses in any one of those sparks, and turn an organic brain into nothing more than organic soup.

All this could be done from the safety of distance.

I was a passenger – a co-pilot, even – of Bastila's battle meditation, and now I truly understood why her abilities were so widely coveted.

There, she murmured, but not at me. Her cognizance was clustered over a vast array of brightly-shining lives, and so I drew close, closer – for a touching of minds was the quickest way to communicate – but then emotion cascaded over me like the surprising gust of spring breeze-

Relief, hope, penitence – and a bone-deep weariness shadowed with shame. This was all Bastila, I knew, even as I became aware of some deeper bedrock to her fount of power. Some... other... being, holding her steady. Warm, like a blanket of light.

I need do no more. She was tired, so tired, and yet a flicker of faith blazed within her still. This is enough. This is more than enough to ensure the outcome we desire.

There was a vague sense of approval – but it didn't originate from Bastila or myself – instead, the shape of the sentiment drew from that faraway third party. A Jedi master, I thought, as I touched the edges of a sentience who radiated with peace and acceptance. He or she was barely perceptible on any sort of mental level, and so I couldn't deduce their direct thoughts – only sense a gentle urging for Bastila to return to her own body.

Well. Counsel that echoed mine, wherever it dawned from.

Bastila!
I lurched to her. A shift, and then we merged.

In an instant- maybe less- our souls fused. The shock that staggered through her almost felt like my own.

_Revan-

_Malak is headed-

_No. No!

_You've got to return-

_Where are y-

_Too far away!

Bastila's fright was hot and acrid. Somewhere, a faint echo of alarm mirrored in the being of light- but Bastila's connection to that consciousness broke clean through, abruptly vanishing, as the many fine tendrils of battle meditation snapped and recoiled back into her- our- core.

Then, quick as sink-sand, we plummeted down.

Something thudded, and there was a ringing in our ears. A slam against all senses – and we wrenched open our eyes to stare at the shiny floor of the Star Forge. Smooth cinereal alloy, like every surface of this cursed place. A flawless material relic of a civilization long crumbled into dust.

Was I looking through her eyes, now, or she through mine?

_I cannot-

The Force was potent and sweet as it stormed through our flesh. It surged in our limbs right down to our gloved fingertips as they touched cold chrome in front of our blinking eyes. It was the raw power of the galaxy – at our bidding – if only we would _get up and frelling move-

_I cannot face him!

Her despair choked us and held us frozen in the body that was hers and not mine. We were staring in terror at that damned silver floor. Memories of recent trauma bubbled through our bond like poison, emasculating our instincts with blind panic despite my own drive to act. And those vivid, shameful memories nudged others into life-

Darth Malak, towering over our bound figure, septic eyes sparking with cruel delight as his gauntlet traced a path down our cheek and clasped our jaw. His voice, mocking and modulated, as he pinned us with questions we refused to find the answers to – but there was a price to pay for that defiance.

Mal, one hand warm over our eyes while the other snaked possessively around our waist. His lips moving tenderly across the skin of our neck, while he whispered secrets and surprises in a Coruscanti hangar.

Forked lightning streaming from the hands of the Lord of the Sith. Again. And again. And again and again and again. Ripping agony through our flesh and tearing screams from-
-from his lungs, as he was rendered prostrate beneath our superior might and dispassionate will. His loyalty we did not doubt, but his objections had to cease. We would see to it, and he would submit like he always did.

We named Lord Malak our master, but words surrendered for survival did not equate to truth. They did not! We might kneel and do his bidding at the price of our dignity, but if it meant less pain-

Bastila! Get it together!

The paralyzing whirlwind of memories slowed and then ceased, driven to a standstill by my furious need.

We must act!

I- Shame burned between us. I apologize-

No need. Just let me-

My bond-sister had not been granted any time of significance to recuperate or empower herself. We both knew this. It was not shameful nor weak, for I knew most sentients did not have the strength to turn from the Dark Side, nor the mettle to achieve what she had since.

But to face her tormentor now-

That took the grit of the omnipotent. And a single conversation to bolster her fortitude was, simply, too little too late. Too late-

Let me-

Yes-

My drive was strong, and her concession allowed me to slam my command deep into flesh and musculature that was not mine. I gritted unfamiliar teeth, forced foreign limbs to extend, and stood upright.

We turned, together-

Our vision blurred around a large, darkish shadow. The periphery sharpened into sense first.

Too late, too late, too late-

A hairy hulk of a body, metres away, fell down. The torso was striped through with a blackened, mortal gash-

Revan, no-

Something clanged- a robotic head, bouncing on the chrome, dismembered from its frame-

I will not fail!

I scrabbled for her lightsaber, cinched further around her waist than I would have done. The dark shape was rushing closer: black, shot through with scarlet. The shadow grew so it eclipsed absolutely everything.

Our fingers curled tight around a hilt, ripping it from our belt-
Too late, too late-

We thumbed on our lightsaber just as the pain hit.

Someone choked.

The physical- it failed us now, even as we struggled to raise our weapon high in belated defense. The pain- it seared, it blistered, it was the agony of skin broiling deep in flame-

Our eyes dropped to stare in disbelief at the burn of red impaled clean through our chest.

Too late-

"I would have kept you, little one," someone murmured in a carefully modulated voice. It sounded far away. "Had I won, you would have knelt at my side. But Revan always finds a way to achieve the unthinkable. At least now I have the satisfaction of unleashing some measure of wrath in return."

He cannot win- Revan- do something!

I called to our Force, expecting it to flood into our grasp as it always did. Instead, all we felt was the wrench of plasma gutting deeper into our frail flesh. A surge of numbness gagged the pain, and we knew what that meant.

Nerve-endings, winking out in multitude.

Slowly, our gaze tracked upwards to meet the corruption of burning yellow.

"Mal," we choked.

His face was all we could see. Metal jaw, sallow flesh, rippling scars of tainted skin twining in with those ridiculous scalp tattoos he'd commissioned after Malachor.

Armoured hands suddenly cupped our cheeks, and it was the only thing left we could feel.

"Revan?" the Dark Lord of the Sith growled, his voice a mechanical burr. Those bright, poisoned eyes widened in uncommon surprise. "Are you here? Are you seeing- are you feeling- this?"

"Too late," I whispered, as the Force melted away along with sensation. "Sometimes even I am too late-"

His yellow eyes closed, then, as his brows furrowed in concentration. The shape of his Sith-marked face swam and blurred before us. We heard a murmur of surprise from his voder, before it was drowned out by a ringing in our ears- and then everything began to fade and we began to fall-

"You are dying. I sense you dying, too," a mechanized voice blurted. It was sharp and high and shocked. "Revan. Revvie- where is your body-"

Whatever words he said after we could no longer hear.

Falling- no, it was more like melding. Atomizing. Like attaining those same, earlier heights of a Force meditation – but amplified exponentially. The whole, beckoning-

I had felt this before, or something like it. Life, transforming into Force, as I stood on the precipice and Bastila Shan begged me to step back and clasp her metaphorical hand.
But it had been the null of oblivion that had beckoned me, then: an end to it all, to me, and that had been so very tempting. A cessation to the boundless grief and the bloody ruination I had wrought in the name of sacrifice.

Now, this, before us- no, this was before Bastila- and it was not the same. This was a transcendence, rather than an end. A journey we could not halt nor reverse, for the path back to her body had gone.

And we could not see the path to mine.

Somewhere, at the bottom of a spiralling staircase, another body slumped to the ground like a puppet with its strings cut.

There must be a way-

Railing against the inevitable was so very familiar, and so we fought back, struggling to pull in all the remnants of self as we threatened to disperse into just another Force echo on the other side of life.

My body- we can find my body-

It cannot be over. She was- shocked. More than that. Unable to accept that we- that I- had lost. It-it cannot-

She was disbelieving? It was nothing on the hot spurning of reality I was experiencing. Bastila had saved me when all others would have walked away- this could not be the end, not for her-

I would do it again, Revan. A flurry of regard, of respect, of deep-abiding affection warmed the both of us. I would have you understand that. Even knowing how this ends, I would still go back and save you.

Was this the end, then? Lifeblood leeching from Bastila's flesh back in a cold meditation chamber on the Star Forge. Force leeching from my own body, as my breathing stilled and my spirit flew away with my bond-sister.

Yet I wasn't mortally injured. If only we could-

Even should we find a path back, I am too broken. We cannot subside in one body, and I cannot see how to separate us. It is over for me, Revan, and I am a weight on your soul dragging you down with me.

There was a guilt, there, that was patently ridiculous. You saved me in the most important of ways, Bastila. I owe you so much. I was still searching, struggling, even as we fell together. Flickers of light and echoes of energy danced around us, intangible and impossible to define as anything other than a symbiosis of Force. Inevitability reared-

-and there was an acceptance, then, that I began to welcome.

My friend. You saved me. You gave me the chance to undo a portion, at least, of my mistakes. To return hope to the galaxy.

Malak would not live for long, we knew that. His armada was on the run, and the moment he succumbed to exhaustion or fumbled the Force he would be dead. Our last glimpse of battle meditation had shown the scales tipped high against the Sith Empire, and we knew their defeat was only a matter of time.

The Star Forge would fall.

The Republic would be granted the peace I once pledged my life to attain – for a time, at least. It was enough. It had to be.

I am not so sure.

Our minds touched again, and she was seeing that cursed purple world-

Bastila! Nothing has come from there except my own corruption. Even Malak turned his back on that place. It could be nothing-

I do not think so, Revan. Malak ignored it because he did not wish to draw attention – not because he believes there is nothing to face. Destiny is a fickle word, but I would have sworn on the Force itself that you were meant to counter the darkness hidden in the Unknown Regions-

It's not always about me, Bastila! If there's another war to fight, then there'll be others-

Will there? Resignation, or something similar, radiated from her. Like a deep, melancholic sigh of weariness. The Jedi are crippled from three generations of bloodshed, Revan. The light needs its warriors. I cannot go back, but if there was a way to release you I would-

Shh. It wasn't just guilt that tormented her, I realized. Bastila truly believed I was needed, even though she was a champion in her own right. I know you would. I know.

There was peace, then; a serenity as welcome as a homecoming. A rest from it all as we began to disintegrate. Flickers of memory toe-danced through my soul, all too fleeting to resolve into anything more than the briefest of sensations. The thrum of a ship beneath my boots. The bonds of camaraderie and friendship. The visceral pleasure a hard-earned victory could bring. The clasp of strong arms around me.

The freedom to fly amongst the stars.

Bastila faded into me, like a final embrace. There was a puzzlement from her, as I saw flashes and faces that weren't of my own recollection. A father, free with his love but limited with his time. Vrook Lamar, levitating a rock in demonstration, his lined face patient and serene. Kylah, laughing and carefree like I could never imagine her to be, as she skipped carelessly through the Dantooine grass.

A secluded childhood, at times both happy and lonely.

I didn't know what Bastila was seeing in return, but I could feel her confusion. Maybe there were just too many burnt segments of my past for her to make any sense of it all. I could certainly understand that.

I will miss those we leave behind, I whispered. For in many ways, my life had started – restarted – on the Endar Spire, and even here at the transcendence that awaited us, I was not immune to grief. Sharp and bright – for we were not the only ones leaving – we knew in our heart that at least one other had fallen. But our mission is a success, Bastila. That was my bottom line. That was all I could really ask for.

We were focused on something else. No- she was focused on something else. Something new. Our confusion grew, no- no- it was her confusion- and a desire to struggle afresh surged from her-

Bastila?

What- what is this? she spluttered. Had I been staring at her once-living face, I would've seen bright spots of confusion bloom on her porcelain cheeks. Revan-

She withdrew from me, just the tiniest amount, so I could sense the glowing golden chain of Force that connected us. But Bastila was concentrating on something else.

I saw it then: a slender, frail link that stretched far, far away. Back through the fabric of Force and into the living. Eons across the galaxy-

My body? I guessed, feeling the burn of hope ignite. Maybe she was wrong, maybe we could still find a path back. How that would work I didn't know, but the thought of a chance to save Bastila fired my own conviction to life once more.

No, she snapped. No. But it is conjoined to you- and to you alone.

What? I turned, concentrating on that thin, thin cable of energy she was so entranced by. It had the same resonance as the Force-bond that chained the two of us, but rather than an unbreakable rope, this was the faintest mirror of one, a whispered echo, and Bastila was right- it connected only to me.

Bastila's surprise turned to awe. The Force... it truly provides, even when it does so in the most unusual of manners. This link... this was formed through your body alone, Revan! All the way back on Korriban!

What?

Sometimes, the saving of another can pose a consequence one could never imagine. This link can be used as an anchor, Revan! If you are not too far removed from the physical- her words tripped, jumbling over each other in their haste. I must try this. I must. Roll the dice, as you are wont to do-

Bastila? What do you mean?

I do not regret it, Revan. Remember that. No matter what I endured- in the end you saved me, as I saved you.

Bastila!

The Force swelled, then, from out of nowhere. Like a rogue wave, a wellspring of determination formed instantly within my bond-sister's core. We could barely touch the Force in this place, much as we sank through it, and yet a steel fount of power burgeoned within her dying grasp.

She threw it at me in one swift move, and then I went flying.

You were right. We did succeed. But there is-

Flying, flying, I was flying down that intangible thread of Force-

there is still more for you to do.
Our bond slowed me like a manacle, but my momentum was great. Behind me, a skein of Force tore free. Then, another. Ripping deep from my awareness and leaving a dulled detachment in their wake. Threads of the net joining me to Bastila were being torn away, shredding holes through my senses-

*Bastila, the bond-

_Hush._ She sounded so far away now. _It will be all right. You will find a way. You always do._

I was slowing down, still caught along that unfamiliar cable – now not so much smaller than the one behind me.

*Bastila-

The weaves behind me thinned, breaking free one by one. Each break recoiled with a jarring sense of numbness, reverberating ahead along the resonance of Force I traversed. The shape of my bond-sister dissolved. The final thread snapped free- and she was gone.

Then: a ringing sound. A thud. A slam against all senses-

Air, scraping against my lungs. Hard and panicked. The grill of metal pressing on my back- but I felt nothing of import- no pain, no exhaustion, no Bastila. No Force-

I wrenched my eyes open to stare at an unfamiliar ceiling.

It was not the silvered chrome I had expected. No, instead there was grated durasteel, dotted through with the lazy fins of air recirculators. Further along, a flashing holo-ad proclaimed something lurid in Galactic Basic. The sight was so absurd and inane that I could only blink in disbelief. My body felt heavy and listless, damp with sweat beneath a tight film of something that felt oddly like synth-leather.

And the Force- _where was the frelling Force?_

The ringing noise subsided into the jaunty tune of a sodding Bith band and, as crazy as it seemed, I was starting to think I'd somehow teleported flat on my back into a damned _cantina-!

_What the actual frakk? Where's the frakking Force?_

There was someone else – not Bastila, not Bastila, I couldn't sense my bond-sister at all! But there was someone else – angry and frightened and fighting me for control of this body that wouldn't respond.

My vision shook and blurred into violet. I blinked again, and there was someone leaning over me.

The vague outline resolved into a Twi'leki female, purple-skinned and wide-eyed, as her luminescent gaze fixed on mine in shock. She was saying something, but the words were too loud and discordant for me to make out.

"What?" I croaked weakly.

The woman leaned in close, as if she might kiss me or resuscitate me, and for a brief moment I felt the sharp tang of recognition-

_What the bleeding frakk is going on?_
A roundhouse of furious panic slammed into me from someone else as I was lurched unceremoniously from the physical world. Panic was followed instantly by the plummeting sense of freefall – and, I understood, then, that it hadn't been my body or even Bastila's, but someone else's-

An anchor, Bastila said. But Bastila was completely gone, now, and I was flailing in the dark. Somewhere, somehow, I could sense the path of least resistance, and I followed it in desperation as the oncoming black of oblivion swallowed me whole.

xXx

Chapter End Notes

Coming up next: Multi-POV as Jedi and Sith alike react to the aftershocks in the Force.

A Force-bond's worth of thanks to kosiah for the beta.
Sharlan Nox:

Precognition was no more than a pleasing adjective some liked to name their own desires. The Force could warn of the present, but the future? No. I'd always known my innate power would shape my fate, but it could not foretell it.

Still, the moment Yudan Rosh landed on the snubfighter facing me, I'd seen the shape of his future. It was a blinding flash of truth, as bright as the transparisteel shards that rained down on my head, as clear as the firestorm of lifeblood roaring at my command.

Yudan Rosh would be mine. Famed duellist the muscled warrior might be, but I had never fed so quickly and so deeply – and from such relatively strong specimens.

The Force peaked, and I would soon have this notorious pawn kneeling meekly at my side. He was both a pretty man, and a strong one – two characteristics I prized when it came to my fleshlings.

Oh, I would drink my fill of his strength. Then, and only then, would I hand his submissive carapace over to the master that had taught me so much more than any other – but one whose bridle was beginning to chafe.

My certainty of his fate began to fade the moment his booted heel smashed into my knee.

I staggered, ducking out of reach from a swift overhand, but it meant my feet scrabbled for purchase along the edge of the snubfighter-

I launched backward into the air, blindly, drawing the Force tight around a kneecap that I feared was dislocated. My landing on the ground below was steady, at least, but I detested the throb of pain that reminded me even I still had physical limitations.

I did not like my own pain. I had never revelled in it the way so many dark-sided scions seemed to. And, today, I had been forced to wade through far too much of it already.

My head snapped up, my lightsaber raised, and Yudan Rosh was right there with another blistering attack.

I danced back, out of reach, left hand curling in the eddies of power at my behest. A nearby supply crate fired at the Twi'lek like a rocket.

His 'saber struck, fast and fierce, smashing the inanimate object aside. Another lunge of his weapon deflected my next missile of debris, and then he was advancing on me again.

The Force surged at my whim, a tidal wave of compression that punched outward- power cresting high, but not quite as magnificent as before. Yudan skidded back a step, but otherwise did not falter the way I expected him to.

And in my belly, the gnawing void that was never quite slaked growled in growing hunger.

Fool. My master’s rebuke burned scornfully through my mind. Had you not spent so much of your strength flaunting your regeneration to a null, Yudan Rosh would be yours now.

The voice was nothing more than a psychic imprint. My master was tucked away safely from this place. But, still, the truth in that echo was painfully accurate.

Yudan Rosh must have sensed something, too, for his sharp eyes narrowed as he strode in close, green lightsaber striking forward in a hard jab.

I slammed it aside, blocked his next riposte, and the next- but then my weapon slipped and a bronzed fist came sailing out of nowhere to smash into my face.

Something crunched. Pain burst like a pregnant tach squashed beneath the claw of a katarn. I bellowed as nerve-endings screamed, and only the Force saved me from a fatal right-hander as I tossed myself back into the air.

I went up, high, away- feeling the apex of my power slowly bleed out in a Force-enhanced leap even Yudan Rosh couldn't match. Backwards over the second of four starships, and when I finally landed, it was with less grace than I appreciated.

Thumping on my arse like banal trash. I lifted a hand to my broken nose, and it came away bloodied.

I cared as little for anger as I did for pain, and now I was being forced to endure both.

I will make the pretty Twi'lek weep in the end. The metallic tang in my mouth was both puerile and disgusting. With a flash of uncommon temper, I felt this encounter suddenly flex personal. Yudan Rosh, and his fleeing allies, had thwarted me long enough. My master will not allow me to keep the man indefinitely, but there is no reason he has to be so pretty when finally I hand him over-

I sensed him clear the curve of the snubfighter's bow, and in the same instant I was back on my feet. The Force churned through the room, billowing around us both in equal fists of power, and I shucked away the liability of my own anger to focus instead on what was truly important: survival.

For there was no reason I had to claim the man today.

I played the game of life and death differently to those infantile mortals I surrounded myself with, and I would not risk myself purely for a shot at revenge. No, far better to take this one when he did not expect my bite – for I could sense when the scales of a battle were beginning to tip against me.

One day my strength would not wane so precipitously after the high of a feed. One day, the galaxy would be nothing more than a trillion collared pets waiting to be consumed.

The Force is not your only weapon, my master's echo snapped in disapproval. You allow your hunger to turn you myopic. You know the man's weakness. So manipulate it!

True. Perhaps today could still be a victory.

"Is my corpse to be a present for Revan?" I drawled, as the Twi'lek stalked closer. "After all you have suffered at her hands, you are still just her tame hound, aren't you?"
I'd hoped for a surge of emotion to rattle his attack, but Yudan's opening flurry was precise and swift. I backpedalled, darting out of range.

"Will you get a pat on the head?" I taunted, lurching back from a powerful lunge. "Or have you slithered your way further? I was her apprentice once. I remember how she rewarded the faithful."

A bald-faced lie, but surely that would stoke his ire. Surely-

He said nothing, but instead scythed his blade in an upwards sweep that caught along the edges of my tunic. I hissed, jumping out of reach, back thudding into the chrome of the hangar wall.

"Does she taste as sweet as she used to, Yudan?" I snarled, as my equilibrium threatened to break. Run, my instincts roared, but the wall was at my back and he was right there, blocking any retreat. Run- "Did you like her better as the Dark Lord or-"

The man didn't pause, and my parry was too weak to hold his lightsaber back.

There was a second's delay, between him cleaving a chunk of flesh clean from my shoulder, and the scalding punch of pain that staggered me to the side.

A howl tore unbidden from my lungs. I slipped sideways against the wall, lightsaber dropping, my sword-arm on fire, seeing the end of my time come barrelling closer in the form of a green lightsaber-

An echo of someone else's end screamed through the Force. Two echoes- two intense ripples of energy that slammed through us both like twin meteors plummeting through an atmosphere while they burned themselves out.

Then, they faded into nothing.

My vision blurred, and the green plasma in front of me shook. Behind it, Yudan's head jerked sharply to stare in horror somewhere at the ceiling, and all colour drained from his face.

"Revan." His voice was cracked and hoarse. "No. No!"

Now, fool!

What was left of my Force rushed in as raw, brutal strength.

I dropped to a crouch, dove forward, and tackled the warrior around the knees.

He fell back, and we thudded to the ground in a tangle of limbs.

I pounced. One hand slammed his forearm back, wrenching the reach of his lightsaber out of harm's way and smashing his wrist-comm in the process.

My other hand belted a fist straight into his temple.

I drew back swiftly and repeated the blow, feeling my knuckles crunch against the side of his head. There was a soft clank as his lightsaber rolled from limp fingers before winking out.

Do not tarry, you insouciant oaf! Entrench your victory while-

Sometimes, I detested the echo of her leash.

I struck out with a multitude of psychic fingers. There was more than one way to drain a pet, but I chose the easy, shallow method first. Force to master Force; Force to draft it back to me. Enough to dull the edge of my pain, enough to shatter his mental guards and leave him ripe for the taking.

Yudan Rosh twitched beneath my thighs, and his mental guards rallied in defense – but the man was knocked out cold.

The throb in my knee disappeared. Crimson blood dropped from my face to land on his, but my broken nose no longer pained me. The shoulder- well, that was a deeper injury, but I would see to it later. I had a psyche to break, first.

I felt my lips curve in a smile.

The day had been a rather bothersome collection of setbacks. The squall of alarms warned of the Star Forge's demise, which meant my opportunity for breaching the station's secret heart might be gone forever. And it seemed that Revan had finally fallen to Malak. I'd had a vague preference for the reverse, as I'd not planned to stay in the Dark Lord's orbit for much longer, and he had an annoying tendency to track down those he considered traitors.

But the ripe insult had been the null who'd shot me, and his Force-sensitive titbit of a son who'd done the same – after leading me on a merry chase.

When I considered the scarring the boy had left behind on my scalp, I knew that one day I would sniff out his trail again.

But not today. I knew when to call it time. And as my fingers grasped the limp chin of the infamous man laid out before me, I thought that today's conquest might even be the sweeter one.

Another klaxon blared in the distance. Not far from me sat the nearest of four strikefighters – officer's ships, all of them, primed and ready and equipped with such convenient cloaking technology.

The Star Forge hadn't fallen, not just yet. I could abscond into the anonymity of space in an instant.
There was time – a little, at least – to relish the moment and drain the fruits of my victory.

And as I stared down at my newest pet – such a ripe, strong specimen to take with me – I let my smile widen.

xXx

Dustil Onasi:

Get Dad to the 'Hawk. Get Dad to the crew.

My thoughts narrowed into the same objective repeating over and over.

Get Dad to the 'Hawk.

Dad kept talking, saying words that weren't important. Tugging on my arm. Time slowed to a silver blur, and all I knew was that I had to get Dad back to our frakking ship—

One foot fell in front of the other. Thud, thud, dragging Dad along, as he stumbled next to me with a blaster gripped in his free hand. Everything else had ceased to matter, like my entire life was fogged with only one purpose drilled down deep into my bones.

Get Dad to the—
A muscle twitched, somewhere along my jaw.

Compulsion. Frakking compulsion. Like Mex scoring free drinks from that bartender chump back in Dreshdae. Easy to twist the minds of the weak-

The thought was odd and faint, so I pushed it away. I knew what I had to do-Something shattered. A blast of heat scorched through my flesh, and my vision blacked out, just for an instant. A scream—two screams—crested high on the Force, like twin suns shooting nova, numbing my hearing, my sight, my everything.

The sharp points of energy fell, fading through the Force, and the next moment it was like they'd never been there at all.

Revan. That was frakking Revan!

"Dustil? Dustil!"

I was shaking. No—Dad, was gripping my shoulder, roughly, his face pinched with alarm.

"Son, stay with me! We've got to—"

Revan. That was her—her dying—

The grind of pain in my broken arm resurged with a vengeance, and suddenly I was back in control of myself, covered in sweat and grime and more exhausted that I could ever remember being.

"Dustil—"

I blinked, staring at Dad dumbly. I'd come to a standstill, and it took a moment to realize we were in a dimly-lit corridor—just another one of the same frakking tunnels in this Sith-cursed place.

"I'm—I'm okay," I said hoarsely, even though it wasn't remotely true. I could barely even sense the Force, but I knew what I'd just felt.

Revan, paying the ultimate price.

And someone else. Was that Darth No-Jaw as well?

"Start moving," Dad ordered, placing a hand behind my elbow. It was dark, I realized with a jolt—the lighting had karked again. "We've got to get back to the others. Rosh bought us some time, but I'm not betting your life on him winning against that Sith bastard."

A torrent of images flooded through my mind as I stumbled after Dad. My blaster, firing a shot straight into the back of Lord Arseface's head. His skin—melding, healing, like it'd never been hit at all. Me, held helpless in his arms like a dumb tach as my life bled away. Dad, with his blaster forced up to his—

"Dad!" I gasped, my eyes dropping down to his blaster in horror.

A grimace twisted Dad's face as he urged me on. "It's—it's okay. It didn't happen, son. I'm not exactly Rosh's biggest fan, but he got us out of there alive."

I blinked. "Yeah." The word was a whisper, for Rosh's last command started echoing faintly in my head—
You will take your father back to the Ebon Hawk. You will take your father back to your allies. Now.

The coercion behind the message had faded; enough, at least, for me to shake it off. That twin blast in the Force had cracked straight through it. And the realization of being compelled – twice, no less – stirred something ugly and vengeful in my gut.

I can't blame Rosh. I knew that. Yudan Rosh had saved me. Saved us. He was stronger than Sharlan Nox, so he'd have a fair chance at beating that frakkwad-

But Revan failed. Revan's dead. Frakk. Can that really be true?

I swallowed and glanced down at Dad, marching down the hall at a speed I struggled to keep up with, and he was the damn Force-blind one. Maybe I'd known where I was going under the chains of Rosh's compulsion, but I had no bleeding idea now.

How in the Outer Rim do I tell Dad about Revan?

"Get your comm off mute," Dad said, his gaze fixed ahead. "Ordo's patched through a message that the airlocks have opened. We have to get back to the 'Hawk and leave as soon as Revan and the others return."

"As soon as-" I choked back the words. I couldn't tell Dad. Not- not here. Dad's faith in Revan had always pissed me off, but now- now-

Much as my thoughts on that cursed woman had always been twisted with bitterness, I wasn't all that surprised to realize I didn't want to see her dead anymore.

And what if that wasn't Malak? The second death? It was- it was weaker than Revan. Mission said Revan and Bastila Shan's lives were joined. If Revan and Miss Battle Meditation both karked it, then does that mean frakking No-Jaw is still stomping around?

Urgency kicked hot as spice in my veins, echoing through my Force-dulled senses. My strides lengthened, and Dad increased his pace to match mine.

"Airlocks have opened, huh?" I managed weakly. We could get out- that was something, at least. And if Darth Malak was still alive, then we had to get the frakk out as quick as we could.

Dad nodded; a short, sharp move of his head as he kept moving. "Teethree's reporting numerous alarms throughout the Star Forge. The Fleet's winning, Dustil. It's- it's almost over. Even Rosh might make it back. All of us will get out of here alive, son, with a new life waiting for us."

New life- yeah. I wasn't sure how much Dad really believed that, and how much he was just parroting it for my benefit. But the knowledge of the truth clamped tight around my heart, and refused to come out as words.

Dad would learn it soon enough, and I didn't want to see the look on his face when he did.

"All of us, alive," I echoed, and the lie tasted bitter on my tongue.

xXx

Inon Daelidar:

"General!"
Striding across the command room, I had no time to address the braying cry of the tenderfoot behind me.

"Order all squadrons to cover the secondary transformer array!" I snapped out to the closest technician seated behind the row of navi-console screens. To her left and right were empty chairs, glaring accusingly at me. It seemed every time my back was turned, another mewling coward ran for the doors. "We cannot let the Republic break through!"

The primary transformer was dead. If the secondary went down, all power would revert to emergency backup, which meant critical functions only. No turrets. Minimal shielding. A small window of life-support and artificial gravity-

There will be no second breach. I believed that as fiercely as I believed in the dry air inflating and deflating my own lungs. Lord Malak would not allow the Star Forge to fall. Soon I will have the resources to repair the primary array. Soon my lord will have squashed all those ants who dared crawl inside his fortress, and then he will set his might on the bugs buzzing around outside.

And I will hold the Star Forge for him until then.

A flurry of movement caught my eye-

"General- Sir-!"

I ignored the shout behind me, and instead raised my blaster to the port-side exit. One shot, and the green-skinned Rodian buckling to desertion fell flat on his face.

"Sir, the airlocks are open!"

I scowled, spinning around to glare at Jha'hashi's pimpled face.

"I am well aware of that, Lieutenant." I was surrounded by the idiocy of incompetents. No one knew how the airlocks had malfunctioned, and now no one could explain why they had so fortuitously returned online.

In fact, no one from Maintenance had bothered to make contact for over an hour.

But it mattered little, at this stage. Only a stuttering simpleton would stumble over the recovery of functionality, instead of focusing on what should be done with said functionality.

I took a step toward Jha'hashi, feeling my lips peel back in a rictus of frustration. "Cease plaguing me with information I already know. The airlocks are open, and all squadrons have launched. Further assessment of why can be examined after we have won!"

"Sir." Jha'hashi bit his lip like a child, stepping back in alarm from my outraised weapon. Idiot. I would shoot only those asinine enough to run. "Sir, the primary transformer's down. The secondary's getting hit bad, and so are the shields. We should issue evac orders-"

He halted when my blaster pointed unerringly at his face.

"Do you know what Lord Malak does to those who run?" I said softly.

The imbecile paled, but I saw his gaze flick weakly over my shoulder to the ready escape pods lining the back wall of my command centre. All solid green lights, ever since the airlocks had returned online.
I may not have stopped every worm from escaping this room, but at least I had the dark satisfaction of knowing not a single escape pod had yet been launched.

"Sir, the Star Forge is falling."

"No, it is not!" I roared, and felt the spittle loose from my lips. Cowards, cowards, everywhere! And I knew what fate had in store for me, should Lord Malak see the shambles my command room had devolved into.

Something flickered in my periphery- I spun on a booted heel, opening fire on the pathetic Trandoshan making a beeline for pods. Blaster bolts spat into the empty consoles, sparks arcing from one screen to the next, spraying shattered ferraglass all over the chrome flooring.

A seated tech screamed in strangled terror, but the Trandoshan- the Trandoshan stumbled as my aim straightened and laser bolts dug deep into her uniformed back.

"Sir, our defenses are all but gone." Jha'hasi's reedy voice kept talking. Shaky and frightened, but not frightened enough for the nitwit to actually shut up and do his job. "The Republic have set up an interdiction field to stop anyone jumping to hyperspace. They are transmitting demands of our surrender on all channels-"

Oh, I knew Jha'hasi had been promoted higher than his bleating worth, but it surprised me to hear the bug actually dare say such words out loud- or even think them. Had the child never seen what Lord Malak – or any of his Dark Jedi – would unleash on those weak enough to consider desertion?

Jha'hasi wouldn't last long. I knew that now. But I'd also seen enough of his cowardly character to know he could be useful, for a time.

I had scant resources to work with. Surely, Lord Malak would understand that.

"We fight for the glory of the Sith, Lieutenant." I let my voice soften. "For a stronger galaxy, for a better galaxy. We will win. The Lord of the Sith always pulls off the impossible."

In a sense, it didn't matter who the Lord of the Sith was – just the power they commanded. I had seen it time and again. Adashan and Gant had fallen. Dodonna- well. She would follow soon enough.

"Lord Malak rewards the loyal, Jha'hasi. But for those that run... Lord Malak can reach anywhere, even into the safety of a Republic prison. And you have no idea how long he can stretch out the promise of death."

Jha'hasi's chin wobbled. His eyes widened beneath a shock of ginger hair. The dunce had always been ruled by fear, and that made him a brittle tool – but a tool nonetheless.

"I once saw a traitor flayed alive over the course of weeks," I continued, seeing the memory of red blood and pink flesh in my mind. "He had forgotten his own name by the end of it."

Truly, there was a certain art to the skills of the Dark Lord's slayers. They were the sharpest tools of the Sith Empire, and ones I meant to avoid at all costs.

My attention snapped back to the cowering fool in front of me. Jha'hasi had paled further, if that was even possible, skin all white other than the bright red pustules quivering on his flaccid Human face.
Utterly craven. But he was the tool I had. I was fully cognizant of the barren state of my command centre. Less sents than escape pods, now- but it didn't matter. All I needed was a handful of techs to obey my commands while I kept the battle out there alive-

For my lord would be here, soon, to fix everything.

"Hold the room, Colonel Jha'hasi," I clipped out, handing the child my gun, grip-first. He blinked stupidly at me. "I must concentrate on the Fleet, and I cannot do that when every minute another rat tries to find a hole to scurry into."

Jha'hasi's head dipped in a shaky nod, and his hand rose slowly to curl around my blaster.

"You have my back, Colonel." This was what I had been reduced to, playing war with a bunch of brats dressed up as brass. But my own competence was all that mattered – and I could mould these bugs as required. I knew just how well fear worked, when intermingled with the promise of reward.

"Sir," Jha'hasi breathed, and his eyes darkened with emotion. Awed disbelief, no doubt, for whomever would take such a child as colonel seriously? But like any greedy fool, he would reach forward to grab the reward, and that made him mine.

"Shoot anyone who dares move from their chair," I ordered, before turning and bending over the nearest free console. A snapshot of our armada blinked back at me, and it was worse than I thought.

I just have to hold the line until my lord returns. I can do this.

The faltering squadrons on the ventral wing- they could be directed into a suicide run at the inertial compressor of the Meridus. If I could precipitate the demise of Dodonna's flagship, her death would be a final blow to the hierarchy of the Republic-

My body slammed forward into the screen. Blistering pain flamed over my back, and someone was screaming-

"Evacuate!" Jha'hasi's reedy voice yelled behind me. "The Star Forge is falling! There's more than enough escape pods here – get out while you can!

Blaster fire- a blaster bolt to the back-

My thoughts flat-lined into nothing but the agony of fire dancing across my skin. I wasn't moving. My limbs betrayed me to hang limply over the top of the now-beeping console.

Darkness flickered at the edges of my vision, slowly narrowing into a tunnel. I could just make out the far wall, and the last sight I had was of pathetic, cowardly Jha'hasi, slamming a hand onto the control mechanism of an active escape pod.

xXx

Mission Vao:

"Airlocks are open," I whispered, feeling the hope shine bright in my heart. Teethree had just transed the news to my comm, but the loud thunk of machinery from the inner hangar door told us all the truth a sec before he did. That, and the solid array of pretty green lights above it. "We're gonna get out of here."
::I've commed Onasi,: Canderous said. Up ahead, next to the blown exit, he'd turned around and started heading back to us. ::And Revan and Rosh, but those guys ain't being chatty.:

There was a noise from old man Bindo- something between a chuckle and a grunt. He was steady on his feet, at least, standing next to me at the base of the 'Hawk's loading ramp – but I'd seen his chest when I'd patched him up earlier.

And that was before that Sith sleemo had done- done- whatever that guy had done. Jolee's skin was grey and his breath wheezed like a slum-rat with the pox. But the old geezer from Big Z's homeworld held his 'saber in guard as we both waited by the ship – waiting, for the others to return.

Can't believe ronto-turd Rosh saved the day, and Carth and Dee are on their way back. That, and the airlocks opening, meant things were gonna turn out okay. We just had to wait for Jen-

Jolee coughed, suddenly, a racking noise that morphed into a loud gasp. I spun on a heel, turning just in time to catch the old man's arm as he stumbled. The 'saber in his other hand wavered dangerously, and his eyes rolled back in his head-

"Jolee!" I cried, digging my fingers deep into his flesh.

"Shoot him with another stim!" Canderous yelled, close enough now that he didn't use the comm. "And get outta the way of his glowstick!"

Jolee jerked his arm from my grasp, tripping back before righting himself. "I'm fine," he growled, switching his 'saber off. But the old man was barely standing, shudders racking through his bony Human body-

I fumbled for a spare stim in my belt. If anyone knew about the limits of stims it was freaking Canderous, and while I didn't exactly wanna dose the old man up against his will, I also kinda thought him passing out on the loading ramp was a bad idea.

"I'm not going to collapse," Jolee rasped, as if reading my thoughts. "I just- I just felt-"

He cut himself off with a groan.

"How far away's Republic?" Canderous snapped, coming to a halt in front of us. His question was for me, but his steel eyes were fixed on Jolee, who was almost bent double at my side.

I glanced down at the comm on my free wrist. Teethree had been pretty solid with tracking the hatch movements, and a snapshot of schematics blinked up at me from the inset screen. "Carth's not taking the shortcut back," I groused, flicking on the comm for a sec so he'd hear me too. Carth had been curt with his words, and Dee- Dee hadn't said a thing at all. "Guess Carth figured he had time for a stroll first."

There was a patch of static over the comm. ::I couldn't get back to the conveyor,,:: Carth said. ::Dustil wouldn't let me. We've gone another way- I think it's the route Dustil first took. But:::

::I'm okay now. I'm listening,,:: Dee's voice cut through his dad's. ::Give us a pointer, Mission. I can't, uh- I can't remember the way back.::

I held back a dig at that – for I was pretty relieved to hear Dee’s voice, even if he sounded a bit... hollow. But I didn’t know why he hadn’t just let his dad lead the way- Carth shoulda been able to shimmy through the cargo chute to be back here in half the time.
Never mind. I'll chew him out for it later. Teethree was quick to mark out a new route, and I fired the directions through before switching the comm off. I could feel my spirits lifting, everything was gonna work out-

Won't be long before they make it back. Them, and Jen and Big Z.

Next to me, old man Bindo had straightened – but his head was shaking. And he kept rambling something-

"Can't believe it." Jolee was pale, with his eyes squeezed tight and his forehead shining with sweat. "Ach, like a darn fool sticking his head in the muck, I just don't want to believe it."

"Jolee?" I whispered, nudging him. Of course, the old man totally ignored me, blinking and staring down at his bony wrist before tapping on his comm with a shaky finger.

"Lad," Jolee muttered, and his words echoed through my earbud. "Did you just sense something through the Force?"

There was a pause. I felt my belly tighten. There was something strangled in Jolee's words, and all of a sudden I had a terrible feeling-

::Yeah,:: Dee said hoarsely. ::Tell me that wasn't-::

"Get back here, then we'll talk," the old man clipped out, and he almost sounded like Canderous, the way he was throwing orders about.

::Sense what?: Carth demanded. ::What did you both sense?:

"The airlocks opening," Jolee snapped, before switching off his mic. He glanced over to me, and suddenly the old man looked... old. Like, way older than he'd been just a few minutes ago, even with the injury and the Force attack and everything else.

"You're lying," Canderous drawled. His eyes had narrowed and his arms had folded as he stared the old man down. "Spit out the truth. Ain't the time for deception."

Jolee's head turned slowly to face Canderous.

"You're right," he said in a low voice, and the sinking feeling in my belly grew. Somehow, at that moment, I thought I already knew-

"Revan and Bastila," someone hissed from behind, and I started in surprise, jumping away from the old man to spin around and face the 'Hawk.

In the shadow of the entrance hatch stood Juhani- freaking Juhani, who shoulda been in a drugged coma back in the medbay! She was leaning against the wall, dressed in a thin white tunic, and her leg- her dead leg was still in that bacta-filled plasteel sheath, splinted all the way up to her arse. Her leg was gonna be cut off, Jolee'd said, but only when we got to a med-droid or a proper clinic. Until then, she had to stay dosed under, to give her the best possible chance-

"Kittycat," Canderous drawled. He sounded almost admiring. "How the kriff are you up on that leg?"

But the Cathar, pale and sweaty beneath the fuzz on her face, had eyes only for old man Bindo.

"We are on the Star Forge," she said, and she sounded as hollow as Dee. As shaken as Jolee. It had "You felt it too." Jolee breathed out hard through his nose. "And it was enough to break you free from a medicated coma."

"No." The word blurted outta my mouth. I got it, then- Juhani had said Jen and Bastila- Juhani and Jolee and Dee had all felt something to do with them, and they were all shocked and upset- "No, no, you've got it wrong."

"Revan's dead." Jolee voiced the worst thing in the world, staring hard at Canderous. "Revan and Bastila both."

Canderous' jaw worked, but he said nothing. I felt my head shaking, as if by itself, while the spike of wild disbelief churned in my gut. Suddenly, I almost felt like I was gonna hurl.

"Malak is still out there." Jolee's words were hoarse, and I couldn't hold back a flinch. "We have to get out of the Star Forge."

"Revan, dead," Canderous snapped in a cold, hard voice. "Funny, because I've heard that one before."

"It is true," Juhani whispered, and I flinched again. "I am well familiar with the Force signature of both Revan and Bastila. I felt them fall through the Force to the other side. It is what woke me-"

"No!" I burst out. "It's not true! It can't be freaking true! Jen will come through for us, just you wait, and then you'll look like a pair of freaking marsh toads-"

"Mand'alor's balls!" Canderous growled, jerking his head over his comm, and his next words were sent through the airwaves. "Onasi, get back here double-time! Rosh's kriffing comm has blacked out!"

My head was still shaking wildly. "Who gives a ronto's arse about that ronto-"

::Stang!:: Carth's voice was muffled. ::I read you, Ordo. We're at a junction, we need Mission-::

::Pretty sure it's left here, Dad-::

Canderous thumbed his mic off, before marching forward to glower at Jolee. His eyes were pinched tight, and his face was set with anger. "Would you swear your life on it, old man? You and that Cathar both? You absolutely certain there ain't no way you got this backward? Revan made it through before-"

"Jen ain't dead!" I yelled, and hated the way my eyes started tearing. "You're wrong, all of you-"

"I know what I felt, Canderous," Juhani said, and her voice was so sad-

::We're taking the left turn. We're moving as quick as we can. Dustil says he recognizes this area.::

"Darth Malak still lives," Jolee continued, placing a hand on my shoulder that I shrugged off furiously. "Ach, and don't forget the mystery of those darn airlocks jumping online all of a sudden. I can't help but think that's related-"

::Just- just tell me if we go the wrong way, guys. Okay, guys?::

"Big Z!" I cried, as an even worse thought hit me. The hot tears slipped from my eyes, tracking down my face. At the base of my neck, I could feel my lekku twining protectively around me, and all I wanted to do was curl up in a ball, but- "Big Z's still out there! We need to get him back here!"

Canderous cursed something darkly in his stupid language. "If Rosh's comm is down, then it's a fair bet that kriffing Dark Jedi has got the better of him. I've got to start the 'Hawk-"

My hand shot up of its own accord, grabbing Canderous' arm as he made to stomp past.

"I ain't leaving without Big Z." I didn't believe Jen was truly dead, I couldn't - but even more important was my best friend, left out there somewhere in the dumb Star Forge. Canderous blurred and swam in front of me and, much as I kept blinking, the stupid tears wouldn't stop. "I'm going after him."

"Ad'ika." Canderous' growl was gentle, and I almost hated him for that. "Ad'ika, there's no time. If Zaalbar's alive, he'll make his way back before Onasi gets here. But your droid has been relaying the station alarms through to us. We know the Star Forge is going down. The airlocks are open-"

"I don't care!" I screamed, digging my nails into his arm. Fat lot of good it did, with that stupid half-broken armour-plate covering his skin. "You lot can give up on Jen all you like, but I ain't giving up on Big Z!"

His hands thumped on my shoulders so hard it should've hurt, but the weight was almost a comfort. "Mission. If I thought I was quick enough to go find Zaalbar and get him back, then I would. But I ain't a kriffing jetii. And the others are too banged up to ask it of them."

The others - I glanced wildly back at Jolee, who was staring at me with a dumb look on his face, like he had any idea of what I was feeling - none of them did, not if they were all so ready to think that Jen had really fallen to freaking Darth Poodoo! But Canderous had a point-

A Jedi can get to Big Z.

I slipped out from underneath Canderous' arms, one hand sliding into my utility belt.

"Jolee-"

The old Jedi sighed as I stepped close, and his eyes were dark and sad. He raised his hands, as if to hug me, and behind, Juhani hissed a warning-

My arm snaked forward, stim in hand, and stabbed the 'derm straight into the old man's leg. Jolee yelled in surprise, jerking back, but I'd already pushed the plunger down-

A hand grabbed at my back, under a panel of armour, hefting me high in the air.

"Mission Vao!" Jolee growled.

"Let me go!" I squawked, legs kicking hard into nothing. "Canderous, you chuba-faced snot-brained monkey lizard! *Put me down!"

"Not likely, kid." He sounded like he was chewing rocks, and I couldn't see him like this, held stupid and useless in the air like a kid - I wasn't just a stupid kid-

Jolee stepped forward, close enough for me to make out the dark scowl on his wrinkly face even through the hot tears. He raised a finger, wagging it angrily at me.

"You can go after Big Z!" I cried, jerking hard against the grip at my back. "You can go fast enough- it won't even take you long- and- and- he's still freaking alive, waiting for Jen to come back or something-"

"That was my choice, missy, not yours!"

I'd never heard Jolee so angry before- like I cared, though- what was the point of having freaky Force powers if you didn't use them to help your friends-

"You'll have an hour, maybe less, before you crash from that third stim," Canderous said, and he sounded so damn calm behind me that it took a sec to even understand him. "You could risk a fourth if you need to, but with your weight and your condition there's a risk of heart failure."

"You know you could go there!" I stormed, launching a kick behind me that connected weakly with Canderous' chest plate. Stupid borkhead didn't even grunt in complaint. "The Wookiees let you live on freaking Kashyyyk for years! It's the least you can do-"

"I don't respond well to emotional blackmail, missy-"

Canderous snorted behind me. "No, but Zaalbar's one of the crew, much as you are, old man. I ain't gonna tell you what to do, but I reckon I got your measure. If you're as fast as I've seen jettii in the past, you should make it there and back by the time the Onasis arrive."

"You have to! Any decent-"

"Ne'johaa!" Canderous thumped me to the ground, harder than he needed to. "Ad'ika, shut up!"

"Aye, well." Jolee harrumphed. Through the blur of tears, I could see him ignoring me to stare hard at Canderous. "Mayhap the thought had already occurred to me before that silly lass took matters into her own hands."

Canderous strode around and in front of me, one armoured hand holding me back. Like I was gonna move – the shaft of hope that Jolee might actually go and check wedged tight in my heart with the stab of a chiv-blade.

Canderous shifted on his feet. “You could go after Malak instead.”

The statement was stark and- and completely insane. I saw Jolee’s bushy eyebrows shoot upwards as his jaw dropped, and heard a hiss of surprise from behind me.

“Lure him back here.” Canderous’ words were soft, but there was no missing the deadly intent behind them. “Between me and the Cathar, we’ve a good chance of firing a bolt into that bastard’s head.”

“Risking my life is one thing,” Jolee managed, forehead bunching into a disbelieving frown. “Throwing it away in the throes of stupidity is quite another.”

Canderous snorted. “If you’re right about Revan – and I ain’t entirely sure I’m buying that – then we gotta finish what she started.”

The sharp screech of a critical station alarm cut short whatever the old man was gonna say in return. Mains lighting died into darkness, and then the dull red of emergency LEDs flared into lines on the flooring. Teethree beeped, a long barrage of Binary that I struggled to follow-“Mains power is out for good,” I whispered. Everything- everything was going absolutely chuba-shaped. “We’re on emergency, and now the shields are getting hit. Life support’s on backup.

Screw Darth Poodoo, just get Big Z back here!”

But Jolee was still glaring at Canderous, who was busy throwing a frown at me over his shoulder.

“The Star Forge is going down, Canderous.” Jolee spoke slowly and deliberately. “Revan’s got her endgame, at least. Can’t think Malak will survive for long with the Fleet out there, even if he jumps in an escape pod. The Wookiee, however…”

“Yeah.” The word was low and almost angry, like Canderous hated the thought of giving in. He grunted, abruptly striding forward to the old man’s side. “Here. Take this. Don’t use it unless you got no choice.”

I blinked, sniffing back more tears as I saw the shape of a hypoderm pass from Canderous to Jolee. The old man glanced back at me, his expression firming into a promise of lectures to come, before it softened, just the smallest amount.

"Ach, well," he muttered. "I may as well go for a quick run then."

"Be careful," Juhani whispered behind me. I'd almost forgotten she was there, back up and awake—but it barely seemed important in the grand scheme of things.

"Get in the 'Hawk, kid." Canderous had turned to face me, his voice as dark and commanding as I'd ever heard it. Over his shoulder, I saw the old man turn and start walking down the length of the hangar. "Get to the common room and stay in touch with Onasi over the comm. Don't even think about moving. Cathar, keep an eye on that kriffing hangar exit. I'll start the ship."

I barely heard Juhani's murmur of agreement. Canderous placed a hand on the centre of my chest plate, shoving me back towards the 'Hawk.

Behind him, the old man vanished in a blur of speed.

xXx

Davis Tar'coya:

"Adashan squad's taken down the secondary transformer array," a tech rapped out. My gaze stayed locked on the holo-map. I could feel my jowls quivering in a smile that was hard to hold back. This time- this time- we'd end things.

"That'll be mains power out to the bulk of the Forge," I said, pointing a stubby finger at the factory's belly. That Sith canker of a space station would have emergency backup, no doubt, but it'd be running critical functions only.

I could feel victory close at hand. After so many years... it almost tasted more bitter than sweet.

Behind me, the cryptic Jedi Master that Forn refused to boot from her command centre wheezed out a gasp.

"Tau squadron are heading in for another assault at the anterior fin," a second tech reported in a monotone that had to be masking the same dark sense of satisfaction I felt. We'd destroyed the turbines and generators on the ventral fin already, and I only had to look through the far viewport to see the damage with my own eyes.

I hated to admit, even in the privacy of my own head, how much of our success was owed to Bastila Shan. Because I also couldn't forget how many of our deaths were laid at her feet, too.
"Vandar." Forn's voice behind me was sharp and alarmed. "Vandar, what is it?"

I turned, feeling my customary scowl morph into a frown of bemusement as I stared at the Jedi Master. Vandar Tokare had spent the last hour kneeling in some meditative affectation, humming under his breath like he was in the damn sonic. Now- The little green alien was leaning forward, his weight on one three-fingered hand, as his wrinkled head shook from side-to-side.

"Vandar?" Forn was next to him, her lined face creased in concern. She crouched down, and the old Jedi Master raised his head to stare at her mournfully. His blue eyes were wide and full of sorrow.

"Bastila," he rasped.

I heard Forn's sharp intake of breath. I was whirling back to the topographic, though, frantically tracking our remaining squads. For I didn't need Vandar's plaintive cry to be spelled out in full. Bastila Shan is dead.

The dots of our scattered ships blinked reassuringly back at me. Even with the loss of that young Jedi's battle meditation – stang, even if I'd misunderstood and she'd switched sides yet again – the holo-map plainly stated there was no turning the tide of battle this time.

The Star Forge was crumbling. The Sith armada was in disarray, and we'd already started towing in the snubs who surrendered and shooting down the ones who tried to flee. Unless the damnable Sith had a dozen squads of fighters still cloaked and about to pounce, today was ours – Bastila Shan or no Bastila Shan.

"One with the Force now, Bastila is," Vandar murmured, so softly I barely heard him. In fact, I only caught his next words because I cocked my heard in fierce concentration to catch them. "Bastila, and Revan both."

My thoughts stuttered. Revan, yeah, well, that's because she's already dead.

"Stang," Forn muttered under her breath. "Vandar, are you absolutely certain?"

Haltingly, I turned back around. The surrounding techs were all busy behind their consoles. None appeared to be listening in- but I was. Oh, I was.

Why would that charlatan bandy her cursed name around now? What in all the blasted hells of the galaxy does Darth Revan have to do with anything?

"Yes," the old Jedi whispered, his bright eyes closing. "Gone from us, they are."

The skin under my cap prickled. Why is Vandar acting like Darth Revan has only just fallen?

My commanding officer slowly lifted her gaze to meet mine. There was something in the lines of her face, the darkening of her eyes- and then in a moment of sharp-edged clarity, I understood- That Dark Jedi on the blasted Ebon Hawk!

I could feel my mouth drop open in sheer disbelief.

The clearance to know had been above my rank- I'd had my suspicions, of course- Kylah Aramai, or a fallen Bastila Shan, or- or-

But not a dead Sith Lord even more dangerous than Malak himself!

It beggared belief. Revan, alive- and the top brass knew alongside the Jedi, but how-

The damn Order. They- they- The logic connected quickly. Bastila Shan is notorious for taking down Darth Revan. Except she damn well didn't, did she? And how long did the Order keep Revan's escape quiet-

"Davis." Forn was at my side, a thin hand resting on my shoulder. I realized then I was shaking with suppressed anger. "Not here, Davis."

"How." The word growled out from my lips. Next to us, a comm tech threw a startled glance over one shoulder. "How is that flaming possi-"

"Commodore Tar'coya," Admiral Forn Dodonna snapped, as her grey Human eyes steeled over. "Either do your job or walk away from the bridge."

My mouth twisted in indignation, even as the soldier in me snapped to attention. I hated that she was right – we had a victory to oversee first, and recriminations could come later.

Oh, but they would.

"You understand what Vandar meant, Commodore." Forn breathed the words, quiet enough for only me to hear. Metres behind her, Vandar Tokare had bowed his head. "She is dead."

The words were enough to knock back the fury of injustice. Revan was dead. I'd thought she was dead already – along with most of the blasted galaxy – but now she actually was dead. And the living were what counted.

"Ma'am," I managed, and the unspoken message in Forn's hard gaze meant we could – we would talk later. For I'd spent years despising Darth Revan, not the least because I could still remember the first time I'd met her-

...

"I am Jedi Revan!" the cloaked and masked figure bellowed.

I stepped back a pace in shock, completely derailed. This stranger had stormed through the parting crowd, before leaping impossibly high – well over my head – and landing atop the cockpit of the nearest snubfighter. The Jedi spun around, then, to address the demoralized throng of starpilots that had been half-heartedly listening to me.

This was my first public address at Vanquo. Newly promoted to commodore and sent to Rear-Admiral Karath's beleaguered forces, I'd soon felt as disheartened and dismayed as any of the grunts out there, witnessing the slaughter those Mandalorian bastards revelled in. Despite my best efforts, that feeling had come across loud and clear in my stuttering speech.

A gust of wind – impossible, in a closed hangar like this – whipped to life, billowing out a black cape behind the anonymous Jedi. White sparks curled around the figure's outraised fist, a tempest of lightning both showy and impressive.

"The Republic bleeds. The Republic burns. The Republic cries out for help, and the Jedi are here today to answer that call!"
The memory faded, bitter and aged with the travesty of time. Her final words of that address echoed – Now we fight back! For the Republic! – and I still remembered the nascent hope that had shot to life in my gut.

Oh, and the years that followed fulfilled her promise that day, culminating in our devastating 'victory' above Malachor V.

I knew exactly why near everyone – myself included – felt such bitterness towards the deathly spectre of Revan and the Jedi who turned with her. Because during those earlier war-torn years, they had been our heroes. And I, amongst so many, had placed Revan on that damn pedestal she later crushed beneath her booted heel.

"A message," Forn murmured, and I glanced sideways to see a tech slip the admiral a datapad. Her lips thinned as her eyes scanned the contents. "I have one man still active from Zeta squadron." Her words were circumspect, audible only to me. Zeta squad had been wiped out earlier in the battle – apart from two snubs that'd sailed inside the Forge alongside the Ebon Hawk. "He reports overhearing the same news Vandar just imparted."

Bastila Shan, dead. Revan, dead.

Problem is, Forn, we thought her dead a year ago, too.

Forn's gaze was hard, as if daring me to thwart her again. My head dipped in a slow, conciliatory nod – for I understood that Forn didn't have to share those details, and I also understood exactly what they meant.

Zeta squad wasn't sent in only to escort Captain Onasi. They must have had additional orders.

Take out Revan, maybe, if she survived. That Forn had inveigled a backup strategy soothed my ire a little, even if counting on a bunch of pilots and their gunners to take out a Sith Lord seemed more than a little on the absurd side.

Seems like the point might be moot right about now.

"You believe it, then?" I managed.

Forn glanced back to Vandar, who was now staring at the both of us with those damn melancholy eyes. I could forgive the Jedi Master for being cut up about Bastila Shan – because I had to concede, as Forn had lambasted me earlier, that on the whole the young Jedi paragon had achieved far more good than evil.

At the close of it, I supposed it would be fair to call Bastila Shan the hero that Revan Freeflight failed to be.

"I am inclined to take it as truth, considering the two separate accountings of the same event," Forn said quietly. "I'll order Tobards to get out immediately, with whomever is left."

She cleared her throat, then, and turned to address the row of techs.

"Advance the assault," she said loudly, her admiral façade firmly back in place. "Tau Squadron to focus on the anterior fin. Adashan to forward on the final fin, with Rho as backup. It's time to blow the Star Forge out of the skies."

xXx
Jolee Bindo:

You could go after Malak instead.

I'd be a liar if I claimed I hadn't considered the Mandalorian's words. Aye, but it was mostly bluster, and given the way he wouldn't stop darting concerned looks back at the Twi'leki lass, he likely knew it himself.

Ordo might be a Mandalorian when it came to battle, but he was also one when it came to clan, and anyone with half an eye could see how the tough-as-nails warrior viewed that reckless chit.

My heart still thumped double-time in my chest, veins burning with the pound of blood coursing through my body. Ach, Mission more than deserved to feel the rough side of my tongue. But then, I remembered the shock of denial twisting her young face, when Juhani and I laid out what we had sensed.

I knew the pain of grief well enough. Suppose I couldn't fault her too much, acting without thinking to try and save her best friend.

Here's hoping the Wookiee's still around. I'd thought before the kid was resilient, but if she's faced with losing him and Revan both-

Well. Here was hoping, indeed.

The Force felt weak and thready. The stims helped – aye, the darn girl had made a fair call, I supposed – but it only masked the exhaustion in my core. That tentacled Sith had drained me deeply, and I knew a kip on the loading ramp with a fistful of stims could hardly count as recovery.

But I still retained a spark of power, and that spark was enough to augment my movement and grant me a rudimentary sense of the Force as it swirled violently around the cursed place.

I stood still, at the base of a spiralling staircase that ascended some dozen floors above, and felt the miasma of dark energy that could only belong to Darth Malak.

He was close, but moving away. I was weak enough that I doubted the man was aware of me, unless he was actively searching. And there was something about this place in particular-

A residue of Force. He was here, a short time ago. Had I been a minute earlier, I would have run straight into the black-hearted villain.

The Force- she was a fickle beast, and I had stopped predicting her methods a long time ago. But I would've sworn that Revan's path was not meant to end in death, not when she had stayed stalwart against everything thrown at her.

Ah, lass. You are beyond us now. I only hope you have the measure of peace you deserve.

I swallowed back a sharp pang of grief, and it was then that my eyes landed on a small, cylindrical object glinting beneath the first rise of stairs.

My eyes narrowed. One arm rose, and the tiniest flicker of Force was all I required for the metallic hilt to fly home into my waiting hand.

The 'saber hummed in my grasp, and I knew whose it was without even looking.

Revan's lightsaber. Karon's lightsaber. With a press of my thumb, blinding cyan shot to life – the same beam of plasma I had seen in Revan's hands so many times. Malak cut her down, then. Took this as a trophy. What happened next? He was careless enough that it rolled from his pocket here?

It seemed a ridiculous lapse in concentration for a Sith Lord who had already gone to the effort of collecting said lightsaber.

With a huff of discontent, I powered the thing off and attached it to my belt. Mayhap there was a reason the Force had laid my childhood friend's 'saber in my path, but I certainly couldn't think of one. Mysteries like this had a tendency to linger like a rotting tooth, but now – now was not the time.

I sighed, feeling wretched and old, and pushed the misgivings away. With a shake of my head to clear the cobwebs, I turned and strode purposefully to the service elevator that stood some metres down from the stairwell.

At least the darn lift was still working.

Aye, it might not have been as quick as a Force-enhanced leap up the railings, but I also knew I had to conserve what little strength I had left. And as the lift rose, I slowly pushed my awareness out, hoping my thin thread of Force was faint enough so as not to disturb that darned whispering kaiburr – or the man who mastered it.

There. I felt Darth Malak again. He was still moving away, but not towards the Ebon Hawk, and that was all I really needed to know.

The elevator doors opened, and I shot out with a burst of speed.

It wasn't long before I reached the half-moon double hatch that led to the upper meditation chambers. The entrance opened beneath a tap of my hand on the controls, and a dark sense of foreboding gripped me as I took the first step inside.

The circular chamber was large, with almost half the far wall made of a glittering viewport, displaying the fire of battle beyond. On my either side lay the bodies of strangers – guards, perhaps – but my eye was immediately drawn to the crumpled figure in the centre of the room.

Human. Female. Young. I was there in a flash, on my knees, turning the lass over.

Bastila Shan. I'd never met the latest Jedi hero, but there was no mistaking who she was. Ornamental braids bordered an aristocratic, beautiful face. Bastila's expression was pale and shocked, held rigid in the throes of death. I grimaced in sympathy, laying one hand gently over her face in benediction, as my gaze travelled over the mortal lightsaber wound that had cleaved through her chest.

I frowned.

Bastila had been the one to fall, not Revan. That meant- huh, I didn't know what that meant. Revan had been certain their lives were conjoined, and Rosh had relayed over the comm that Revan had left them all behind to safeguard Bastila while she tracked down her old apprentice.

But Bastila Shan had been slain here. Had Darth Malak hunted her down after finishing Revan, and then proceeded to drop Revan's 'saber down a stairwell?

Or had the lass herself returned here, drawing the Sith Lord in her wake, before he killed them both?
My head shot up sharply, scanning the room. No Revan, but behind me I’d missed the obvious figure of a fallen Wookiee. My breath caught.

This time, my steps were slow and measured, as I left the young Jedi behind. With each stride, my head cocked, hoping desperately for the sound of a breath, a huff, a wheeze of pain-

But I knew the truth before I knelt down next to Zaalbar and saw the blackened stripe that cut deep into his torso.

Oh, warrior of Kashyyyk. You will be sorely missed.

I felt my eyes close. There was no time for grief, not now, not with the Forge breaking up around me. Even here, near the rise of the monstrous factory, the klaxons wailing through the place were clearly audible.

But it didn't sit right in my heart to just stand up and blithely walk away.

Should I take Zaalbar with me? The Force would yield me enough strength, I thought, to lift two bodies and float them back to the 'Hawk. Grant them the burial they deserved. Zaalbar was a Wookiee, and a Wookiee's final rest should not be in a place of metal and sky.

But it's the living I should worry about. And I simply did not know how Mission would take it, travelling in a ship that held the corpse of her best friend. Mayhap, the only thing that'd do would be to rub rock-salt in her wounds – and the girl was going to be heart-broken already.

My mouth thinned as I looked one last time at the body of a young sentient who held more wisdom than I had first perceived. I'd been honoured to know him, aye; I'd always respected the Wookiees, and Zaalbar represented the best of them.

My gaze flickered, moving beyond the Wookiee to the dismembered robotic head of HK-47. The rest of the darn droid's body was a further metre away. Good riddance, I thought grumpily, and then-

A flash of the Leviathan skittered through my mind. I'd hefted Revan through that sinking starship, when she was dazed and insensible, and I'd had nothing to guide us to safety. No wrist-comm, no Force beacon – and it hadn't taken me long to realize that I'd gotten us completely lost.

The Leviathan had been on its last legs – much like the Star Forge was now – and I'd thought I'd run out of options right until that smart-mouthed piece of machinery materialized in a hatch and led us back to the 'Hawk.

Indebted to a darn droid. Humph, I can't believe I'm actually considering this.

The galaxy had long since been littered with countless debates on whether droids could be seen as sentient or even alive. But one thing I did know – Zaalbar and Bastila Shan were not. And with the death of Revan and the demise of Yudan Rosh, it might be that only HK-47 still held some of the answers from Revan's past.

Darn it. Not like I'll get a word of thanks from him. I picked up the head anyway, and lifted the droid's carapace with a twist of my hand. I'll let the Republic brass deal with him, maybe. I'm sure those bureaucratic idiots will have oodles of fun with his charming attitude.

I allowed myself one last moment, to close my eyes and send a final farewell out through the Force. To Zaalbar of Kashyyyk, and to Bastila Shan.
I almost missed it. The faintest blip of life, teetering on the edge of oblivion, ebbing away back by the entrance.

I blinked, standing up with HK-47's head tucked under my arm.

Next to the half-moon hatches lay the bodies of those anonymous guards, but further along, some metres down the curvature of the wall, was another figure.

Crumpled, and garbed in what looked like the brown robes of a Jedi.

I closed in. And when I stood over the body of a man who was not quite dead, I stared down blankly at his familiar face.

"Well I'll be a Wookiee's uncle," I said.

xXx

Rulan Prolik:

Corporal Kampton's form was fit and fast, and I took a moment to appreciate the speed with which the Rodian could move.

Because the time for standing still and gathering intel had long passed.

Star Forge diagnostics scrolled down the inset of my visor. All transformer arrays destroyed. Power rerouting to emergency, while life support gasped a final breath. Shields now taking the brunt of the assault in the skies. The Star Forge would have declared a formal evacuation status – if not for the megalomaniac at the helm.

I knew when it was time to decamp. I'd lingered longer than was my custom, and all due to my curiosity over a single sentient's fate.

I'd admit, Revan Freeflight piqued my interest – and not purely on the behalf of the GenoHaradan. The impact of her actions was as curious and difficult to predict as the state of her damaged mind.

I had found little surveillance to track in the upper levels of the Star Forge, and so I'd been forced to rely on second-hand communications tracking her status. That Republic mole's encrypted text-feed transmit back to the Meridus had aggrieved me more than it probably should have.

::Tagged: Republic Communications Array (Filter: Origin = Star Forge).::
::Captured Transmission: Decryption Successful.::
::Contents Follow: "Overheard: two powers report sensing the demise of the ghost and the hope. Awaiting orders." End transmission.::

Powers translated to Force-users, and the ghost and the hope to Revan Freeflight and Bastila Shan.

The disappointment of a powerful piece falling was always a blow, which was exactly why the GenoHaradan played more than just one game.

I reminded myself that the galaxy – and the GenoHaradan – had been convinced of Revan's death before, and so I began scrolling through what remained of the Star Forge's holo-footage in growing urgency.

When I stumbled upon a still of Darth Malak himself, carrying the lifeless body of Revan while he strolled along the same factory floor I was currently concealed in, I wrinkled my snout in concession and moved on.

A right shame, though. Part of me wished that the GenoHaradan had captured Revan to study- although, letting her loose had achieved what my organization desired. The downfall of Darth Malak and his empire - even if the man himself found a way to slip into an escape pod.

But considering the slow saunter of his tread through the holo-cams, I thought it a safe assumption that he wasn't even going to bother.

I, on the other hand, valued my own skin.

In front of me now was the hatch to the anterior officer's hangar, a place manned an hour ago by a pair of bumbling Sith soldiers ordered to keep the engines warm. I'd deliberately lurked near a set of those readily cloaked starships, and it was only my innate caution that had me tapping back into the hangar's holo-feed before I sliced open the door.

The grainy vid that overlaid my visor had me stilling in wariness.

A pair of corpses, identifiable by the austere uniform of Darth Malak's Sith underlings.

With a tap of my finger, I flicked to the next available cam in the hangar. Nothing- and then the third-

Two sentients, one sitting atop the other, and the cam's thermal readouts indicated both were alive. I held back a sardonic roll of the Rodian's beady eyes. Hapless idiots distracting themselves from the end of the world in the basest method possible. Still, they would be easy enough to evade or silence.

The vid-feed zoomed in, and it was then I noticed the unresponsive nature of the figure underneath, and the fact they were both fully clothed.

Hm. Perhaps not what I first imagined.

"Cam tilt left five degrees," I whispered, and the profile of the top figure came sharply into view.

I recognized him an instant before the processing software linked to my visor did.

::GH Database: Facial Recognition Match::
::Name: Sharlan Nox::
::Species: Anzati::
::Affiliation: Dark Jedi sworn to Darth Malak::
::Designation: Dark Jedi Recruitment Officer for the Sith Empire::
::Threat: Code level 6::

The visor began listing a series of skills and warnings that I did not need, for I knew enough of the man.

Sharlan Nox was the last-known survivor of the vampiric Anzati – well, the last since the GenoHaradan had taken out Devra Bane some eighty-odd years ago. But Nox was also an anomaly, and not simply due to his survival in the face of his own species' extinction.

From the intelligence the GenoHaradan had collated, the man had actively forsworn the consumption of sentients for most of his long-lived life. In addition to that, he was the only Anzati my organization had ever encountered who possessed the ability to harness the Force.
After Malachor, his restraint in his species' fleshly appetite had vanished. And while Nox did not operate with any obvious ambition within the ranks of the Sith Empire, he was dangerous enough that I briefly considered finding another means of departure.

::Tagged: Star Forge Central Computing Complex::
::Incoming alert: Structural collapse of the lower ventral fin.::
::Incoming alert: Moderate damage to the lower anterior fin.::

I grimaced. The ventral officer's hangar was the next closest after the anterior. While it was situated high above the needling fin – and therefore, should hold for a time – it would still take me precious minutes to run there. Even if I shifted to a faster form-

Perhaps, if Nox is sufficiently distracted with his prey, he will not even notice my presence?

"Switch to cam four," I whispered, and the grainy feed morphed into another view: this time, from the opposing wall. There – a clearer shot of the unfortunate sent held in the thrall of death.

And, again, I felt the thrill of recognition precede the data screed on my visor.

::GH Database: Facial Recognition Match::
::Name: Yudan Rosh.::
::Species: Twi'lek.::
::Affiliation: Dark Jedi sworn to Darth Malak.::
::Designation: Fleet commander of the Sith Empire.::
::Threat: Code level 6.::

I made a mental note to update his outdated designation, and then paused, considering the parameters of my situation.

I needed to find a ship, and fast. Yudan Rosh interested the GenoHaradan primarily due to his history with Revan, and she was now out of the game. But Rosh was also a powerful prize for an Anzati Force-wielder, and the chances of slipping out unnoticed while Nox slaked his appetite had to be higher than moving to another hangar before the Star Forge disintegrated.

With an inward biological push, I thrust more mass into Kampton's lower musculature, and felt my limbs spasm and strengthen into that of a bipedal sprinter. After a shake to loosen the newly hardened muscles, the bony fingers of my hybrid Rodian form retrieved a mini-tool from my belt, and I got to work.

The hatch opened less than a minute afterward.

Slinking inside, I kept tight to the wall, while my fingers tapped silently on the computer inset on my armbrace. Hacking into the air-conditioning unit here might buy me a minute: I could overload a conduit or two and throw a distraction into the mix if my presence was spotted. A last resort, though – for I knew that would be unlikely to hold a Dark Jedi's attention for long.

What I needed to do was make it unseen to the fourth and final snubfighter, a customized Aurek bird sitting closest to the inner airlock. Once inside the cockpit, I figured I should be able to power up the snubfighter and abscond before the Dark Jedi decided whether to bother with me or not.

The first Aurek had a smashed cockpit, while the second appeared fully intact. I cleared them both, and made it close to the third starship – this one, an elongated Sith snub – when I heard a voice.

"I wonder what my master will make of you." The words were followed with the sated chuckle of a madman. "She is beginning to amass quite the collection of Revan's old followers."
Truly, I preferred to avoid Force-users – and, in particular, the dark-aligned ones. They all seemed to dovetail into one form of insanity or another.

I side-stepped silently against the wall, and the pair of them slipped into view.

Nox had his back turned to me. My aura was non-existent to Force-users, apparently, so all I required was to remain inaudible.

"She had hoped I would uncover the secrets of the Star Forge. Oh, and so did I. A shame that the truth of this place will fall with Malak. I suppose your capture will have to subsist as a poor second prize."

I paused, one foot hovering in the air. Mental note: update and investigate the allegiance of Sharlan Nox. Hard to tell if the man was rambling nonsense or gloating the truth. Either way, it was highly inefficient, considering his intended audience was out cold.

But if there was another power structure of Dark Jedi out there, then this was intel I simply had to get to Eridius.

There was a slapping noise, like the insane degenerate derived pleasure from striking a comatose prisoner. Perhaps he did. With a focused wrench on my own objectives, I continued moving further down the wall.

"Maybe she'll grant you a pet name as well." There was that tinkling laugh again. "Lord of Hunger, she likes to mock me with. Perhaps you'll be the Lord of Envy. For you've always coveted that which was never truly yours, hmm?"

His voice faded as I neared the final Aurek. It was time to step away from the relative safety of the wall, and into the centre of the hangar.

"...extract at least some of your soup...might leave you addled...hardly need all of your mind intact..."

I held my breath as my feet padded silently across the chrome flooring. I could not see Nox now, but his murmuring drawl was still vaguely audible as my hands touched Republic durasteel.

"Nexus." I breathed the coded deactivation passphrase. With a hydraulic hiss, the cockpit yawned open.

I did not pause to see if the Dark Jedi would hear or notice. My long fingers were already scrabbling at the ridges of the warbird, finding purchase and pulling the rest of my body up without the aid of a porta-stair.

I threw myself inside. The busk-leather of the pilot's seat was cold. Moving fast, I slid the restraints around my torso, shut the cockpit's double-walled transparisteel, and flicked on the engines.

Now was the true danger. No way Nox hadn't noticed the start-up thrum of repulsors.

The dash burned to life. The turbine compressor whined, and I switched full thrust to the repulsors. Ahead loomed the opening of the inner airlock.

With a wrench on the throttle, the snubfighter lurched forward.

The navi-console indicated the inner airlock shield regenerating behind me, and then the outer doors began to open. Flashes of laser fire demarcated the expanse of space, and I leaned forward hurriedly to locate and enable the cloaking technology I was relying on.

A second later, my invisible starship spat out of the Star Forge, and it was only then that I remembered to breathe.

xXx

Carth Onasi:

The sight of the blown hangar hatch was the best thing I'd seen in some time.

I'd commed ahead, with no response from anyone save Ordo, but it meant they knew we were coming. Still, the last person I expected to see shadowed in the entrance of the 'Hawk was-

"Juhani," I said in surprise, striding forward with Dustil at my heels.

The Cathar was deathly pale as she leaned against the Ebon Hawk, and I knew we were desperate, but who in the blazes thought dragging her out of a coma was any sort of good idea-

"Carth," she murmured, but she didn't meet my eyes. "Jolee will be back any moment."

I had no time to question where old man Bindo had disappeared to, for next there was a crackle of static in my ear.

::Captain,:: Tobards said in a tight voice. The gunner had been strangely quiet for some time – enough that I'd had the faint concern he'd ended up as just another casualty. ::I could do with a hand down from the roof. It's time to get moving.::

Odd to hear a blasted ensign all but throwing an order about. I thumbed my mic on mute, and stared hard at the Cathar.

"Revan," I said quietly. "Tell me someone's heard from her."

"Dad-" Dustil's voice was strangled. There was a dark clench of dread in my gut-

"Carth! Dee!" Mission wailed, as she burst out from the hatch and leaped straight at me. I barely had time to catch her before she erupted into messy tears.

"Dammit, kid, I told you to stay in the 'Hawk," Canderous growled, materializing behind the Cathar. My arms tightened around the sobbing Mission as I glanced over her bowed head. Ordo looked grim – grimmer than I could ever remember seeing the man.

"You've started the 'Hawk," I gritted out, finally aware of the engine's vibration beneath my boots. "Where's Jolee gone? Where- where are the others?"

"Onasi-" Ordo started, before his eyes flicked behind me, darkening in recognition. "There's Bindo."

"What?" Mission wrenched out of my arms with a gasp. "Big Z- where is he-"

I turned around, just in time to see Mission barrelling towards the distant figure of Jolee Bindo. Behind him, a brown-clad body dropped from the air to land on the ground with a soft thump.

"What's going on?" I rapped out, marching forward. Jolee's head slumped, and from beneath one arm I saw the glint of blasted HK-47's dismembered head. HK- who was back with Bastila- and even from here I could see that robed body behind Jolee was not her- "Someone tell me what the "stang is going on!"

"Dad-

"I'm sorry, Mission," Jolee said quietly. He raised his head to look at the girl with dark, anguished eyes. "I found Zaalbar. He- he didn't make it."

Mission's heart-wrenched wail knifed me straight in the heart. Zaalbar- gone- and HK-47 in pieces- that meant-

*Bastila. They were with Bastila. And if they were taken out- if Bastila was-

The shock was more than visceral; it was a physical blast of heat the plummeted straight into disbelief.

*Revan.

"No!" The word was a hoarse cry of repudiation on my lips. "Revan- where are you-

"Dad- I, uh, I felt her earlier-" Dustil had moved to stand in front of me. I barely noticed him. "Dad, she's- Revan's- gone."

*Revan, you can't- you're not-

I was staring blankly at my only child, as denial choked in my throat. Over Dustil's shoulder, I was vaguely aware of Mission collapsing to the ground in a sobbing heap.

*He must have it wrong. Somehow-

Dustil's mouth turned down in a grimace of pain, and all I could think was that it couldn't be true-

"Come on, Flyboy. No tears," she teased, her lips curving in that impish grin I had grown to cherish. "Don't I always come back from certain death?"

"She'll make it through," I rasped through numb lips. After everything, there was no way I'd accept this reality. The back of my neck felt strangely cold. "She always makes it through."

"Dad, Darth Malak is still out there." Dustil tugged hard on my sleeve. "And Rosh's comm is down. That means frakking Sharlan Nox might be on his way back-"

"And the Star Forge is breaking up," Ordo growled behind me. "Onasi, now ain't the time to fall apart. We need to get out."

"I won't give up on Revan," I whispered, blinking dry eyes. Whatever Ordo was saying was banthacrap. Dustil's expression contorted in front of me. "I won't."

"I promise I'll do everything I can to make it out." She whispered the words, her moss-green eyes darkening with intensity. "Promise me you'll do more than just survive if I don't."

"She's dead, Onasi!" Ordo snapped, and my son was pushed unceremoniously out of my field of vision to make room for the Mandalorian's ugly mug. "She ain't answering the comm, and every kripping jetii in this place sensed the same damn thing!"

My gaze dropped slowly to the communicator snicked securely at my wrist. Rosh's link had blacked out, but Revan's still shone reassuringly green.
Then, like a miracle dawning from nowhere, it blinked.

_Revan-

But the voice I heard was not hers.

::Revan is dead.::* The words were low, mechanized, and transmitting to all channels.::It is finally over.::*

The comm switched off, and then the green status light dimmed to black.

I stared at my wrist in shocked, frozen silence.

And the stones weighing on my soul grew to the size of mountains as I felt my heart crack open like it had only ever done once before.

If it hadn't been for Dustil's presence at my side, then – and maybe the muffled cries of Mission – I wouldn't have had the fortitude to raise my head and look Ordo in the eyes.

My mouth moved, but I couldn't find the words. My fists clenched. Whatever Ordo saw in my face, it was enough for him to give me a firm nod of- of- stang, I didn't know. Acceptance. Understanding, maybe, that I was still there with him, still able to move on automatic and help get the living out.

"Bindo," Ordo snapped, turning roughly on a heel. "Did you take that fourth stim?"

"Ach, no, but I ain't exactly-"

"Get Tinhead and that body you lugged back here into the ship, and strap yourself down in the common room _before_ you decide to faint. Sithkid, drag Mission inside by her headtails if you have to. Kittycat, back to the kriffing medbay, now!"

Ordo was a whirlwind of barking commands, before he was back in my face again.

Beneath the layer of numb detachment, a spark of unholy fury threatened to roar to life. The desire to hunt down that sithspawned bastard, no matter the blasted odds-

_Dustil. Mission. The living. Dammit, Revan, I won't believe you're truly gone-

"If you can't pilot, Onasi, you kriffing tell me now."

"I can fly." The words came out before I realized they were true. Dustil needed me. I wanted to sink into blind rage, for turning around to step into the Hawk meant smothering a grief I couldn't face a second time.

But the worst truth of all was that I knew I had no other option.

"Good." Ordo stared up over my shoulder. "I'll go collect that Republic grunt and meet you in the cockpit. Get ready to launch, because this place ain't holding up much longer."

_Revan is dead._ The words repeated in my head like a whip of self-flagellation. _Revan is dead._

Ordo turned from me. Dustil shot me one last searching glance, and it was enough for me to turn, and for my boots to automatically make their way inside the ship that had been my home for what felt like so long, now.
I felt myself walking away from a large chunk of my heart – and denial still reared with a roar. They could be wrong - but could they all be wrong? Was there any chance we could be leaving Revan all alone as we scurried to safety?

The sound of my son dragging Mission into the 'Hawk reminded me of the parts of my heart that remained – the parts I could still protect. And even though I hated myself for doing it, I slipped into the cockpit's chair and readied the Ebon Hawk for launch.

xXx

Yudan Rosh:

I was conscious of little.

There was grief, yes, but it was unimportant.

Pain was present in the shape of a blinding migraine, and yet it was remote, too; as if nothing more than a faded memory of some past trauma.

Cognizance was a dying murmur, urging me to reach out: to listen, to think, to grasp the Force and take note of my surroundings and find a way to act-

But my train of thought was completely conquered by that drawling voice.

"It has been a trying day, pet," the voice drawled. "I find myself feeling rather... voracious."

The voice was important. The voice was everything. It said words that I heard but did not take in, for the voice was not commanding anything of me yet.

I would be ready to obey when it did. Cold logic formed a diagnosis of myself: I was suffering from concussion, a likely skull fracture, and the possibility of internal bleeding. Movement would weaken me.

And I did not want to be further impaired when the voice required my abilities.

"I can't think of a single reason why I shouldn't extract at least some of your soup," the voice continued. "Sure, it might leave you addled, but then I hardly need all of your mind intact."

The voice trilled a laugh. My ears found the sound discordant, but my mind knew the voice's happiness was paramount.

"Master Traya might be put out for awhile, but I can always argue that a half-wit fleshling of your strength is better than none at all."

My eyes remained closed, conserving my strength, as I sensed the warm breath of the voice moving closer.

"Just between you and me," the voice whispered. "I do tire dancing to her tune all of the time. And frankly, pet, you owe me."

The voice seemed to be talking directly at me. I agreed inwardly; of course I would owe the voice my all. I decided, however, that its words were not a requirement of movement. I did not need to offer a conscious response.

I could rest, and wait until the voice granted me a purpose.
There was a new sensation, now; a vibration beneath my fingertips. It was followed by a roar of sound.

"What?" the voice snapped, and I latched onto that surprise, as the fogged skein of my awareness struggled to comprehend what startled the all-important voice so.

_Thrum of repulsorlifts. Whine of a turbine compressor. A small snubfighter launching, nearby._

There was a slight thinning in the fog of my mind, as the rumble of the engine moved away.

"How unexpected," the voice remarked. There was a sense of the voice fading, slightly, even though the physical pressure solidly pinning my body down remained. "And curious. These ships open only for a very few."

The voice was still all-important.

But the awareness that it should not be was new.

_No one is my master anymore. Not even- not even-

There was a grief, there, that I shied away from.

"I cannot believe Malak would stroll straight past us without a pleased farewell or a 'saber to the gut," the voice mused.

_Malak- wait. Focus. Something is wrong. That voice-

My instincts had me seeking out to the Force – gently, gently, so as not to be perceived – but the Force was indistinct and unusually cumbersome to my touch.

Weak. Feeble. Like my strength had been drained-

_What else do I know- my mind rallied. There is cold chrome beneath my back. An injury to my head. Someone is sitting on me-

I cracked open my eyelids the smallest amount. The blur beyond was undoubtedly Sharlan Nox.

The rush of recent events flooded into my consciousness, and submerged the chokehold of Force-dominating coercion like a river eroding a makeshift dam.

_Force drain. How can he achieve such a deep thrall so quick? Never mind. Not permanent, but I'll have little Force to work with just yet. And little time-

Sitting atop me, Sharlan Nox was still staring in fascination at the direction of the now-departed snubfighter.

Twin strands of pink flesh had erupted from his cheeks, curling delicately beneath his jaw.

_Proboscis- I had heard a rumour or two, in the past, about the strange gill-like slits that were sometimes visible on his face. Whatever the purpose of those tentacles, they were likely sensitive-

-and I had little other option.

I reached out to the Force with the slightest of touches; a caress, almost, for a firm hold was presently beyond me. I needed enhanced strength and speed- but only in one arm.
Quickly, but gently-

Sharlan's head tilted back in my direction.

I slammed what Force I could deep into the chosen limb. Simultaneously, my hand punched upward, my fingers gripped tight around one fleshy tail, and then my sword-arm yanked back as hard and swift as I could manage.

Something tore. My vision exploded in a mess of spattering crimson. A weight, lifting- Sharlan was screaming loud and long as he hurled away in panic.

I rolled on the ground, struggling to stand, fighting my exhausted and pained body- the movement stabbed daggers into the side of my head, and my vision blurred-

_Must get up. Move-_

I made it upright, blinking to clear the residue of blood stinging my eyes. At my feet, lying innocently on the ground, lay the deactivated hilt of Zhar Lestin's lightsaber.

Metres away, Sharlan Nox stood clutching the bloody mess of his face as he continued to howl that anguished, dissonant screech.

And to my right was an officer's ship. A customized Star Forge strikefighter. Encoded to open with a passphrase-

That shapeshifter's offer replayed in my mind. But the offer had been for her, not me-

I cinched the thought of her away. Not now. Not yet. And while I no longer had any direction nor much of a purpose, there was no way I would end as one of Sharlan's playthings.

My gaze landed on the lightsaber again. Back to Sharlan. To the weapon once more. But the Force felt so sluggish, and my limbs so leaden-

Even through my exhaustion, I could sense the current supremacy of Sharlan's might. And while he might be wailing like a babe who lost the teat, I did not think he was as physically debilitated as me.

Just, perhaps, in quite some pain.

I had to move.

One arm lowered to retrieve the 'saber hilt, before my shaky legs stumbled to the ship. My head spun. Sharlan was still screaming. I whispered that doomed, fatal name that had been the landscape of _her_ first death-

The cockpit opened. But I could not climb, not like this-

_Once last burst of Force. One last push-_

My strength was faint, but just enough to launch me weakly into the air. My hands caught, hanging askew over the edge of the open cockpit, and another surge of dizziness threatened to black me out completely-

A shout of alarm from behind. I wrenched myself over and in with a grunt, lurching forward to start the engines. Screw the safety restraints, I needed to move. Cockpit closing as the compressor whirred. If I was lucky, the burn of the thrusters might even take him out in my wake-
Sharlan thudded flat against the transparisteel in front of me, just as it closed. A grisly hole of black and crimson gaped from his left cheek, smearing on the glass, and the man's eyes were round and crazed like I'd never seen before. I felt my lips twist in a sneer as I swung the ship around in a wild launch, and Sharlan Nox slid away, falling from view.

The snubfighter hurtled forward through the shields of the inner airlock, before I pulled back hastily on the throttle, pausing only to wait for the outer hangar doors as they began to open.

There are other ships behind me. The thought was grim. Sharlan will follow – it is presumably too much to expect he will die along with the faltering Star Forge.

But too many others had.

Black spots speckled around the edges of my vision. The pain in my temple was increasing – along with the sinking submission of encroaching unconsciousness. I gritted my jaw, willing myself to stay cognizant for now, and shot forward into space.

The momentum pushed me hard back into the chair. Cursing, I scrabbled for the safety restraints, and then a prox alarm blared. On the navi-console, an incoming message transmitting on all channels beeped for attention.

A spark of red laser shot across my bow.

Shavit! I was in a Sith snubfighter, barrelling straight into an emerging Republic victory. No doubt they were demanding immediate surrender-

My hand wavered over the cloaking device embedded into the sleek navi-computer of the Star Forge strikefighter.

A publicized execution awaits me here. Justice demanded my death, and not so long ago part of me had wondered if I would even bother to struggle against it. It was a far better fate than a lingering demise at Sharlan's hand, regardless.

The baseborn desire to survive – or perhaps something deeper – had me slamming my palm against the control.

A crackle of stealthed purple submerged the cockpit's viewport, and I canted the snub gently to the right.

Bad idea- the mild g-forces pummelled into the side of my head like a vibro-ax.

I blacked out. For a handful of seconds, perhaps. The wail of a second proximity alarm roused me back to alertness, but my head was heavy and my judgment fogged.

I need to jump to hyperspace. The navi-console overruled that – of course, the Republic had constructed an interdiction field to block runners. *But I am invisible. I can slip through, fly far enough to jump and-

My head spun, and it took everything I had not to lean back and close my eyes.

"Auto-pilot," I murmured to myself. It was easier to think when I said the words out loud. "Set flight-evasion algorithm, with scheduled hyperjump as soon as it is available. Just..."

Where? Where should I go? What is left for me?
I was too exhausted to think it through. And the only set of coordinates that came to mind were from a lifetime ago, to a planet I once called home.

xXx

Revan Freeflight:

Awareness came back in a trickle, one sense at a time.

First: a swaying motion. I was on a boat, bobbing across a body of water. Or maybe I was feeling the gait of a pack-beast, carrying me somewhere unknown. Shifting from side-to-side, like I was laying limply over a bantha or- or-

-or held helpless in someone's arms.

Next came sound. The soft, rhythmic tread of boots traipsing over a metallic surface. The thudding noise was coupled with the laboured wheeze of breathing.

Pain- pain burst in like a fist to the face. A chiv-blade to the gut. Pressure on my back, but there was no feeling there, just like there was no-

-no Force. The Force- it's not there-

And neither was Bastila.

"Bastila!" The word wrenched from my lungs like a scream, but came out more like a croak. Bastila!

She wasn't there. There was no null patch of Force like those times a neural disruptor had separated us. No- now there was absolutely nothing.

The recollection rushed through my mind with the burn of acid: us, fading into the Force. Dying. Falling beyond the veil. Bastila, in one last act of desperate defiance, hurling me back into-

"So odd, and yet strangely apt," someone murmured.

-back into someone- but I could barely make sense of anything-

"-to see how the Force has departed you, Revan."

My eyes opened. I stared up, to see the pale, fleshy underside of a neck where it met steel chrome.

Malak did not look down. He kept his gaze straight ahead, holding me tight in his arms, as he traipsed fixedly through a corridor of what had once been my dominion.

"Bastila." Her name was a murmur of soul-wrenching grief as I was faced with the ultimate loss: the failure to safeguard the life of the one who had rescued me from myself.

And the failure to follow her into oblivion.

"You are truly nothing now, Revan," Malak was saying. I wondered, numbly, if the man was trying to wrest my attention for himself, but I couldn't- because Bastila was- she was-Gone.

"At first I thought you were completely void. An unholy enigma, like Em and Xaset, echoing with the blankness of a nether-hell burnt through the fabric of the Force itself."

His words meant nothing to me. Xaset I'd only ever heard coupled with the mysterious Meetra. Em, Em, I recognized that name from earlier blurred recollections, but I couldn't place it- just another sent from my past- someone who meant so little when balanced with the weight of my bond-sister's sacrifice.

"But no," Malak continued in his low, mechanized monotone. "You have the same faint spark as any of the trillion Force-blinds inhabiting this galaxy. To think that you have been reduced to normality is almost beyond the scope of comprehension."

The grief sat in my throat like a fistful of crushed ferraglass. But, finally, I found my voice-meaningless though it might be. "Why haven't you killed me?" I whispered.

A brief snort escaped his vocabulator, muffled and almost choked. "Why would I bother? You are no threat now, Revan. And there is a certain symmetry, perhaps, to have you with me at the end."

An arm dropped from beneath my body, and I heard the faint pneumatic hiss of a hatch opening before the arm returned.

"At the end," I mumbled, closing my eyes. "You admit defeat, then."

The same noise emitted from his throat. Wet and gasping, like even Darth Malak had trouble breathing. "The Star Forge is all powerful," he murmured. "It can create almost anything, it seems, except a medi-centre."

There was a crunching noise with his every footfall. I opened my eyes, again, this time to look around. The lighting had dimmed to emergency red, but I could make out a vast array of consoles along a wall. Some, broken and charred, having been shattered by what looked like blaster fire.

On the other side, a viewport gazed neutrally into space.

"A command room," I said blankly.

"Yes," he acknowledged, walking deeper into the place. "It appears even my best officers have scattered."

There were bloodied corpses littering the ground, in amongst the shards of ferraglass and other debris. One body even lay haphazardly over a console screen, as if the dead man had been protecting the thing with his own flesh. On the far wall, a handful of green lights marked the existence of primed escape pods.

"Look out to space, Revan. The stars you always wished to fly beyond. See our fate with me."

I blinked, turning my head. Maybe Malak wanted me to feel the horror of my oncoming demise. Maybe he wasn't even thinking that deeply. I didn't know. But as I stared out at the flashing laser fire, striking forward into the Star Forge above and below us, all I felt was a grim sense of satisfaction.

"The Star Forge is falling," I said quietly. Bastila had shown me that much already, but the sight was, at least, ameliorating in its own way. "The Republic will win."

"Ah, your blessed Republic." A dark note entered his mechanical voice, and his arms tightened cruelly around my limp body. A part of me wanted to struggle but I- I couldn't find the will.
He walked to the centre of the room, next to a table lined with smashed, sparkling console screens. With another muffled huff of breath, he slid down to the ground, still grasping me tight. "That was always the difference between us, Revan. You would have sacrificed anything to save your Republic. Even me. Whereas I... once upon a time, when I was a different man, I would have damned the galaxy just to keep you safe."

The stark honesty of his words was enough to shunt my grief beneath the shock of surprise. I blinked, staring up at the underside of his face, but Malak was still gazing into the abyss of approaching death.

"Mal... you betrayed me," I whispered. What I could see of his face was sallow. But somewhere, in amongst the deathly pale skin marked with black skeins of Sith corruption, had to be the man I had once loved. "And you say I was more to you than you were to me?"

A strangled laugh choked in his throat. And still, the man did not meet my eyes. "Oh, Revan, the dark paths we have walked. Don't you understand, that to truly be master of the Sith, you must destroy that which you love the most? That is why you turned on the Republic."

My breath caught. I'd had another reason at first, but I knew there was also truth in his words. "And that is why you turned on me," I said slowly.

His head dipped, finally – and eyes as blazing as a fire at sunset met mine. "Yes. The Dark Side twists everything you are until the Dark Side is all that is left."

I held his gaze. It was like staring into the might of a supernova. "It is not all I have left," I refuted. Even now, even with the emptiness that echoed in my heart, I could not let him go so easily. Not knowing what I had been to him – and what I had led him to. "And I don't think it's all you have left either, Mal."

"Only you, Revvie," he murmured, but turned away from me to stare blankly at the viewport again. "You have never accepted the concept of concession, even when faced with your own defeat. But now, at the end of all things... surely even you must admit that you are nothing. Just like me."

"We don't-" My eyes squeezed tight. In my mind, I could see the primed green lights adorning the far wall. The next words were hard to speak, as if I didn't wholly mean them- "We don't have to die here, Malak. This doesn't have to be the end."

But I felt so hollow inside. Without Bastila-

-but the others, the others were still here, in the Forge somewhere. A faint flicker of yearning burned to life inside-

Malak's arms squeezed hard; hard enough to shoot a spasm of agony deep through my side. My limbs felt weak, useless; and I didn't know if it was injury or grief holding me impotent in his familiar arms.

Malak snorted. "After all of your betrayals, Revan, did you really think I would crawl behind you now? Leave my fortress and go mewling to your precious Republic?"

"Betrayals-" I choked over the word. "You speak of betrayal to me? I may have led you down a dark path, Malak. But you chose to continue it."

"Continue? Ah, I suppose I must claim responsibility for my own actions. And I do, Revan. Gladly. But as for betrayal- you walked that path first."
The accusation hung starkly in the air, with no evidence to justify it. And even while I knew treachery went hand-in-hand with the sodding ethos of the Sith, the hypocrisy of his words shot the fire of indignation through me. I snapped open my eyes to glare up at him, only to see the man from my past staring down calmly in response.

"I betrayed you?" Jealousy had always twisted something dark inside him, right from the very beginning- I didn't know where that knowledge came from, only that it was true. "You're the one who turned on me!"

"I was faithful, Revan," he said implacably. "Always faithful, until there was nothing left to be faithful to anymore. As Jedi, I was only ever first amongst equals in your eyes. And the Dark Side made you shuck that, until you cared for nothing anymore, not even me. Faithfulness..." He snorted in apparent disgust; a sound that morphed into a strangled wheeze. "Just how much do you remember? Have you ever bothered asking your pet Twi'lek about the limits of your faithfulness?"

"What?" The inanity of the question had me blinking. "The limits of my- what does Yudan have to do with- what the frell are you talking about?"

His gleaming eyes narrowed on mine. There was satisfaction, there, at my bewildered response – and I understood then that Malak referred to something I didn't remember, and he was glad of my ignorance.

I opened my mouth to retort-

"He's failed, you know," Malak said calmly. "I felt Sharlan overpower Yudan well before we entered this room. I imagine Sharlan will have moved on to the rest of your crew by now. He has quite the appetite. Can you not remember his unique ability?"

The air choked out of my lungs. Fury spiked higher than a stim-shot, and instinctively I expected the Force to surge in my grasp-

But there was only the sound of my harsh breathing next to his.

Malak's hand lifted to grab at my limp wrist. The sharp movement felt like he stabbed a chiv into my side. A click, and something loosened- Malak was holding my durasteel comm to his face before I even realized what he was doing.

"Revan is dead," he intoned into the device held next to the chrome of his jaw. "It is finally over."

A crunch, and the wrist-communicator from the Ebon Hawk shattered into a useless heap of metal in his fist.

I was insensate and numb, and only the physiological reflex of survival had me drawing another breath. My eyes stung, and wasn't that the most worthless sensation of all, when faced with the nadir of everything.

"A final gift for you, Revvie," Malak rasped, leaning back against the ledge of the consoles. There was the faint, crushing sound of shattered ferraglass moving beneath his weight. "Rosh will rot as Sharlan's plaything, and he deserves no more than that. But your other followers... well. They will have no reason to linger on this dying station anymore."

Gift? Gift? The detachment inside shook with a flurry of hate, a deep burn of emotion I didn't know I could still feel. Malak could prance that final act around as generosity all he liked, but the sithspawn no doubt derived a fair wallop of enjoyment from saying those frelling words-
Malak twitched, staring down at me again. The corners of his eyes creased in vague amusement, like the bastard had read my thoughts.

Maybe he had.

"The airlocks are open, Revan. I cannot hold them closed, not anymore. Perhaps I enjoy the thought of your allies running from me, carrying with them the tale that it was my hand which finally took you down." He paused. "If any of them are still alive, that is."

Still alive... The heat of hatred dovetailed into biting grief. After Bastila, the thought of others falling was more than I could bear. Bastila was more than I could bear. Yudan, no, I won't believe it. I can't. How do I even know Malak is telling the truth? I didn't. Carth- Carth- he has to get out. To live, like he promised me. Let him, at least, find a way to escape. Like a desperate prayer to an unhearing deity, my mind ran through a litany of pleas heard by no one but myself. The others-Mission, and Canderous, and Jolee and Juhani and Dustil and-

-and Zaalbar.

My heart stopped. I'd seen the truth through Bastila's eyes. The scion from Kashyyyk, whose wisdom had scythed through the darkness to humble us both at a time when it seemed nothing else could reach me.

And the rage of such injustice – that such an honourable soul could have faltered – completely flattened beneath an overpowering surge of grief.

"We were together at the beginning, Revan." Malak's words were barely audible to me, as my head lolled in his grasp to stare blindly out to space. Flashes of fire blurred through the transparisteel. "And so we shall remain at the end. In darkness."

In darkness. It ends in darkness.

My hand slipped from his grasp, to fall to the cold chrome below. Under my numb fingertips, jagged shards of ferracrystal bit into my skin.

"Your friends have gone," Malak rasped. I heard the catch in his voice, and it took a moment to understand. "I sense them departing."

Gone. Gone- they've escaped, then. Carth, and the others-

The relief was almost painful. I have that, at least. That, and the Star Forge falling. My endgame, concluded – but when it meant the sacrifice of Bastila and Zaalbar-

I would do it again, Revan, the echo of my bond-sister whispered. Maybe- maybe, this was the best outcome I could have hoped for. No Star Forge, no Darth Malak – and no Darth Revan.

I slowly sank to a place beyond feeling – much the same as Malak, I suspected. The darkness would take us soon, and Malak was right.

In the end, we were both nothing.

xXx

Chapter End Notes
Coming up next: Revan and Malak have a final conversation.
A Republic victory's worth of thanks to kosiah. Also, I must make note of your influence - or inspiration - with regards to Traya and her psychic dominance over her apprentices. Anyone reading Memory or Oblivion would likely notice that – consider it the highest compliment, for my emerging Traya sounds suspiciously like yours.
I would have liked to see the stars.

Instead, there was the red flash of lasers. Yellow fire of a snub snuffing out. The grey underbelly of a mighty cruiser slowly advancing closer.

The panorama through the viewport had all the magnificence of a space battle's climax, culminating in the outcome I had struggled so endlessly for.

The Republic, emerging victorious.

Yet now, at the very end of things, I found myself yearning instead for the serene backdrop of uninterrupted space. Just the stars, and that illusion of infinite freedom before my body came to a final rest.

"That's the Meridus." My gaze tracked along the clean starboard hull of the Dreadnought-class heavy cruiser. Dodonna's flagship, my mind helpfully supplied. I may not have recognized the admiral on the holo-comm earlier, but I knew I'd worked with her fleet in the past.

"Yes. I imagine soon they'll be dusting off their victory speeches back on Coruscant." Even with the crackle in Malak's voice, he still managed to sound droll. "Do you remember Coruscant, Revan?"

"No." Not really. A feeling, perhaps- I'd been happier there, but the Core had never felt like home.

"I think I prefer you this way," he murmured.

My head felt so heavy, but I slowly managed to turn it up to face him.

Malak was staring down at me. His discoloured irises blazed with corruption. At the corner of his metal jaw, a droplet of crimson threatened to splatter free.

"Scrubbed clean and unknowing," he continued, in that softly modulated tone. "A blank plate with cracks ridden through the paint, showcasing the true clay beneath."

Something stirred inside, deep and slumberous with the weight of forgetfulness. He used to have a poetic bent, even if he kept it concealed from everyone but me. Odd... I thought he'd lost that.

My eyes shied away from his, then; for I knew there were some observations best left hidden. Instead, I looked along the length of dull silver wrapped snugly around the lower half of his face. The skin below was fleshy and sallow; ridden with the black scars of the Dark Side.

Once, the man had been hard and toned. A warrior of the sun.

Lower, across the expanse of Malak's black-and-grey exoskeleton, my gaze skimmed over a patchwork of scorch-marks and rents of damage. Near his heart – just above where my head lay – gaped the death-blow I had given him. The burnt armour fibres surrounding the wound were submerged in his lifeblood, parting open like a crimson mouth gasping for air.

The tinny scent of Malak's spilled blood was strong. He had to barely be holding back the jaws of death-

"I have enough strength left to wait out the Star Forge, Revan. Death shall not claim me before it embraces you."

My eyes closed, blanking Malak from view. In my mind, I could see the ready green lights of escape pods again. So close. Too close. It was almost cruel, the way life had thrown that last glimmer of salvation in my path.

"You are so easy to read, now," he mused, following his words with a chuckle that sounded wet in the back of his ruined throat. "There is no escape for us this time, Revan. For once I shall have my way."

My fingers curled on the ground, biting into the haphazard shards of broken ferraglass. The movement was nothing more than a hollow reflex – a living being's drive to survive even at the very end.

The vacant sense of finality in my soul was stronger.

"A blank plate," Malak repeated in a soft murmur, and I felt the brush of a gloved fingertip against my cheek. "You had a scar here, once, that I gave you. Right down the length of your face. The Jedi scoured your body as thoroughly as your mind, didn't they?"

"I have no idea."

My sense of time was muddled, but I knew Deralia happened more than a year ago. That meant... months, trapped in kolto. Unaware and dumb, and at the unholy mercy of the Jedi.

It was strange, now, to feel resentment flurry in my gut. It hardly matters. They're dead. Galdea, Karon, Vima... No, Vima wasn't. I wasn't sure if I'd ever been acquainted with the woman, but Vima Sunrider must have known me – or my mind – on a truly intimate level.

I felt my jaw spasm, and realized it was probably a good thing I'd never run into her after the Endar Spire.

It hardly matters. The thought echoed, and with a deep breath, I let my antagonism go. It was almost easier without the Force.

I blinked, and looked up again at my past. "I've collected my own share of battle-scars since then,
Mal."

"So I see." Malak was staring at my maimed hand, as it idly sifted through the broken glass on the ground. I barely noticed as a jagged wedge sliced my palm open. "Was it Bandon who took your fingers?"

"Mmm." I let that one rest with a non-committal murmur of agreement. Somehow, I knew Malak would prefer the affirmation to the truth, and I was too empty inside to thwart him now.

His gaze darted back to meet mine. Malak was almost sounding... sentimental, and yet in the depths of his eyes I could see nothing but the fire of hate. His brows lowered. "You never liked Bandon."

My emotions felt like they had numbed to nothing. And yet, Malak's comment made my mouth twitch in a black humour that had once been a mechanism for survival. If I concentrated hard enough I could still visualize that braggart pinned to a wroshyr with Yudan's 'saber. "Didn't like him much at the end, either."

Malak snorted. I wasn't sure if he'd skimmed that image from my mind, but he sounded remarkably uncaring about the demise of his former apprentice.

_Apprentices are tools. Tools that can be used, tools that can be broken. That's all Malak was to me, in the end. And that's why I lost him._

Malak's arm dropped from my face, abruptly, as if he had picked up on my internal monologue. His hand landed on my chest with a thud, before his fingers curled around to meet the other arm wedged under my back. It felt like the prison of a lover's final embrace.

Maybe it was.

Not a particularly pleasant prison, though – for as Malak's arms firmed around me, I found it excruciatingly difficult to choke back a gasp of pain.

"We have always been so adept at hurting one another," Malak murmured, as his icy fingers pressed softly against the cauterized injury along my ribs. My moan was muffled, but audible; and I had no sodding clue whether it was sadistic pleasure or something else tightening the faint lines around his eyes.

I bore Malak's scars, even now. And it was wrong, I knew, to feel that savage surge of satisfaction at how much deeper my 'saber had driven into his flesh.

"I guess we were," I finally came out with. "But you didn't step up when it counted. You fired on me from a distance."

Malak tensed as the barb hit home. It was probably beneath me, but... _oh, who the frell cares. He's right, regardless. We ended as experts in the game of one-upmanship. And I am to more to blame than him for that._

"A true Sith knows when to grasp opportunity, Revan. I had the chance to take both you and Bastila Shan out with one cannon blast. Tell me you would not have done the same."

_Bastila._ I couldn't hold back a flinch. She'd fallen, regardless, and left me here alone.

It would have been better had she allowed me to die with her.

... _But there is... there is still more for you to do._

I felt myself recoiling from the echo of her words. There was a sense of duty, there – an obligation, both moral and honour-bound to her memory – that I just didn't want to face.

Even so, there was a part of me that rallied to her call. A very small part, curled down deep in the pit of my soul.

_But I am spent. Emptied. Force-blind. What else... what else can I do, now?_

"You cared for her, in the end," Malak said. His gaze was roving over my face, taking in my reaction. A faint touch of bemusement coloured the uneven warble of his voice. "The young Jedi who held you on a leash."

"Yes." The word came out clipped and hard, and despite everything, I found my thoughts tightening into focus. My gaze narrowed as I stared hard at him. "Malak. What did we find in the Unknown Regions?"

He didn't answer, at first. Just looked down at me silently with the weight of the Dark Side blazing from his eyes. Somewhere, in the distance, a faint rumble was followed by a noticeable tremor through the superstructure. I heard the screech of a faraway klaxon splutter, and then abruptly stop.

_Alarms switching off. That's probably... that's probably not a good sign._

The side of Malak's face twitched, contorting the stipples of malignance that marked his skin. "You still will not bend to defeat, will you?" he murmured. "Even the Jedi were not able to break you in the end."

I said nothing. Merely held his gaze and silently demanded the answer.

"No," Malak said with cold finality. The word hung in the air, as implacable and unyielding as permacrete. "Ignorance can be a mercy, Revan. And it is the only mercy I will grant you."

Very deliberately, he lifted his head away, signalling an end to the topic.

I could have left it there. Sun and stars, I wanted too. And Malak wasn't the only spectre of my past who seemed to think he was doing me a favour, keeping quiet – after all, digging anything meaningful from Yudan had always been a bit like mining for kaiburr crystals in a trash compactor.

_I have to believe he's found a way to escape, too._ When it came to Yudan, I wasn't going to trust anything Malak had to say.

I wanted to turn my head. To stare blindly out the viewport, in tandem with Malak, and accept the oblivion that awaited us. To lay quietly in his arms, and imagine we were nothing but the young lovers we had once been; the young lovers I had all but forgotten.

The yearning to surrender to that pretence was powerful; more powerful than I could have expected.

..._still more for you to do._

_Shut up, Bastila_, I thought weakly, and felt tears sting at my eyes. Damn, but I hated it when she was right. Ignorance... ignorance might be merciful, but it also meant leaving me adrift, with no concrete conclusion on whether my purpose was complete. And I wasn't _wholly_ ignorant anyway – which simply meant Malak's so-called _mercy_ was merely a torture of fleeting recollections and half-forgotten objectives.

"I remember a purple world," I said, loud and abrupt.

Malak's arms spasmed around me. A wheeze, cut-off, lodged in his throat, and his body shuddered as if he'd almost dropped the Force-threads chaining life to his body.

"Which one?" he hissed, the words spitting out in a crackle of distortion.

My mind blanked. _Which one? There's- there's more than one?_
The shiny chrome of Malak's jaw lowered, and suddenly I was faced with the heat of his gaze again. I could only stare at him dumbly as my thoughts spun. That purple world – I remembered sensing the touch of sentient malignance creeping through the Force, while I stood on a barren moor and clasped Malak's hand.

I sensed something evil, but Bastila- Bastila had seen the complete extinction of the Force! Because Malak had shown her a different purple world, and I'd stupidly assumed they were the same!

It'd been a logical inference, perhaps; to presume we'd been viewing the same place through different lenses. Two shards of memory, both of an ominous, violet atmosphere, both of a place where the Force behaved in a way neither of us had known before.

I'd never even thought they might be memories of two entirely separate planets.

"Which one, Revan?" Malak demanded a second time, his face so close I could smell the metallic tang of blood on his breath. "Nathema or Kaas?"

I blinked. Those names stirred nothing but an eerie sensation toe-dancing down my neck. "Nathema?" I guessed weakly. Malak didn't so much as twitch. "Er, or maybe Kaas?"

"You don't know." His voice softened with pleasure. "Good. It shall remain that way."

*No. No it damn well won't. "It's the end, Malak," I shot back hotly. "You may as well-"

My throat closed in on itself. It took a second to understand what was happening – weak muscles of flesh bowing beneath the whim of a Force-endowed madman, cramping inward and refusing the flow of oxygen to pass.

I choked. Desperation engulfed me, instant and sudden, like I was a burra-cod hurled to the riverbank. My free hand flailed at my throat-

Years of Jedi training kicked in, then; and my muscles spasmed as I forced myself to relax against the instinct of panic. My mind slowed; submerging into the serenity and inner calm I required. Peace, and acceptance of the whole, and then I could reach out for the Force-

Nothing. There was nothing but the burning of my lungs as they failed to inflate.

"I will have my way! For once, you will listen!" Malak roared, his voice discordant and breaking into static. His eyes pinched into gleaming slits, and the Force-bonds released, then, falling away from my tender throat. "Some ghosts are meant to stay buried!"

The first gulp of air was even more painful than the incessant stabbing in my side. I gasped again, as my breathing slowly regulated and my eyes closed weakly in despair.

"You are mine, Revan," Malak growled. "You were mine first. I will not let that thing consume you now. This is our end."

My head was fuzzy, and my throat felt like sandpaper. I slumped against his side, unsure if the faint shaking I felt was my own dizziness, or further deterioration of the Star Forge.

Mine... but I was never yours, Malak. Love doesn't work that way. And if it did, then I would belong to all those I loved, not just to the one whose bed I shared.

If only you had accepted that.
But there was something more important in Malak's last words. My thoughts reversed, hiccupping over that thing. He'd said that thing... that thing had... consumed me?

"So," I breathed. "There is something out there, then."

I knew I was poking a rancor with a stun-stick. Rolling the dice, testing my luck, and gambling that my tenacity wouldn't enrage Malak back to choking me into submission.

But did it really matter if I died now, or in ten minutes time?

Maybe Malak picked up on that thought, as well, for his next words were not what I expected.

"If you must fill our final moments with incessant prattle, then we shall talk on a topic of my choosing, Revan," he ground out. I noticed, almost clinically, that his breathing was decidedly more rattled than before. "You said you did not recall Coruscant. What of Talshion?"

Again, I was struck with the inane thought of Malak waxing sentimental. Or, maybe, he's just trying to drive me away from what I seek. Regardless, the thought of my adolescence was alluring. A time before the Force had dominated my life; a place where the Dark Side had not been present to tempt me.

"Little," I answered slowly. "Little enough that on Korriban I actually believed my true name was Ness Jonohl."

"Huh." The timbre of his voice had settled back into neutral. From hot to cold again, just like during our duel, Malak was displaying all the emotional volatility one could expect from a Sith Lord. "Perhaps that is not altogether surprising, Revan. You always did like to honour our childhood friends with those ridiculous aliases of yours. Andara, when you posited a deal to the governor as Knight Ness Jonohl. Or that time on Onderon when you masqueraded as Healer Staria-"

I paused. I hadn't connected the dots consciously before, but I knew immediately he was right. Ness. Ness and Jonohl. And Staria. I should remember them... should I remember them? My forehead creased. There were so many names from my past that meant so little. The old man, whose name I had taken in tribute. Just like I had given one to Malak-"Devari," I said suddenly. "Your brother."

Malak had never spoken of Devari, not after- not after something happened. Something bad happened, and Devari was gone, and it pained Malak deeply, even years later. Not even with me would he talk of his brother-"Half-brother," Malak corrected calmly, slanting a look down at me. "Devari's death stopped paining me years ago, Revan."

My breath hitched. That made sense, of course; one could never ascend through the Force if the claws of the past still bit deep. A guardian brother so cruelly taken from him in his youth now sounded like it meant nothing at all.

Devari's death might be an old injury, long-healed—but that thing... that thing he'd said had consumed me was as raw as the wound in his chest. Why?

"We shared the same mother," Malak continued on. "Devari told me they arrived on Talshion as refugees. From Kun's war, I presume. Did I ever tell you that my brother knew Freeflight from before?"
"What?" I said, startled. "I mean- no. How the frell would I know?" A cursory image of a blinded man rose in my mind. I had adored Freeflight – the invalid who had raised me after my mother's death. The man who'd trained me to think, and to dream.

My memories were so fragmented and so few, but I was suddenly engulfed with a patchwork of impressions – more feeling than recollection – of sitting transfixed at the foot of a middle-aged husk of a man. At times, I had the idea that Malak had joined me. But his brother? Who couldn't have been that many years older than us? "How did he know Freeflight- surely Devari must have been too young-"

Malak shrugged. "He would have been but a child, yes. My brother never divulged the details of how he knew Freeflight; he merely ordered me to keep my distance. Of course, I did not always listen."

"Freeflight was harmless," I snapped, suddenly irritated. My memory might have been riddled with blaster bolts, but I knew that much.

"Freeflight taught you to hope, Revan. Hope is many things – but it is never harmless. Hope led you to obsess over the stars and, in the end, they were neither yours nor mine."

"You, of all people, should understand the power and the pitfalls of hope."

Conceding the point to him was difficult, even this close to the end. "I suppose hope helped turn the tide of the Mandalorian Wars," I said slowly.

"Yes," Malak murmured, sounding satisfied.

My eyes narrowed. "The Mandalorian Wars – that were started by that thing you mentioned-"

"Stars, Revan, you never quit!" he snarled, suddenly, the fire in his eyes reigniting. Malak's fist clenched tight against my ribs, but my gaze was caught on that mortal wound of his, pulsing with a thick gout of blood before it closed again beneath his control. "The Wars were no more than a testing of the waters! We could have lived out our entire lives and never seen the galaxy fall!"

There was a clawing sensation in my gut, as his words echoed in the dead air around us. It took me a second to recognize the sensation as horror. "Galaxy... fall," I whispered in shock. "Malak. This... this- we were Jedi, once." I felt my voice grow in volume. "No matter how far away a threat seems, we cannot bury our heads like the frelling Council-"

There was a low growl, building, in his mechanized throat. "Oh, and doesn't this just remind me of the past- even Jedi brainwashing can't entirely remove your damn heroics-"

"It's out there, this thing- and you just want to ignore it?" I blinked, and suddenly Malak's face was right there, his nose almost touching mine. The burning yellow of his eyes eclipsed everything else. "Malak, you can't. We can't-"

"I can do whatever I want," he hissed. "I am a Sith, Revan. There is no Jedi left within me. You burnt that away a long time ago."

Shame warred with indignation, emotions that I immediately suspected were roused as a deliberate means of distraction. My lips thinned as I pushed them both away. "You were scared," I said softly. "That's why you drew away from the Unknown Regions. Bastila thought you didn't really believe in the threat, but that's not true, is it? You were scared."

Malak didn't reply. There was a flicker in the roiling yellow of his eyes that betrayed him, and he raised his head from mine: slowly, calmly, to look away out to space again.

Something twitched in my throat. I breathed in, quick and fast and unhindered, hit by a quick surge of relief that he hadn't dovetailed straight back into choking me again-

"There was a time I would have followed you anywhere, Revan. And I did, straight into a pit of hellfire I could never have imagined." His words were monotone, now, like he was reading from a transcript. "As Master of the Sith I knew better. Why poke a sleeping demon when the known galaxy was there for my command?"

I opened my mouth to retort -

"I know your game, Revan. I know you. A feeble attempt or two to redeem me, and if that fails, anger me into losing control of the Force."

-but no words came out-

"I shall not have our last moments sullied with talk of what turned us."

I gasped, struggling, pain stabbing into my side as his arms clenched tight around me. The bastard had cinched my vocal chords shut, and try as I might, I couldn't even release the tiniest of whimpers-

"I shall not fumble the Force, Revan. I will have my way in this. For once, I will have my way."

And beneath our prone bodies, the rumbling of destruction grew to a quake. The scarlet of emergency lighting threw ghastly shadows across Malak's face, and I had no cards left to play- no voice, no Force-

Promise me you'll get out of there alive.

Oh, Carth. The bitter taste of defeat was ash in my mouth as my body slumped, and my maimed hand skittered against the glass shards of debris on the ground. I could not turn Malak, I had not convinced him, and now I was forced to face the biggest personal failure of my entire life.

He did not look to see the lone tear that trailed down my cheek. He was staring fixedly out to space, towards the stars I had always dreamed of, the stars now hidden by the battle I had brought to him.

I'm sorry, Mal. I'm so sorry.

Malak Devari had been an undisputed hero. Of the Jedi Order, of the Republic. Everything he was now was my doing. My failure to stay true to the light had turned him-

Agony sliced my palm. With a clench of my remaining fingers, I wrenched my fist upwards and stabbed a jagged shard of ferraglass straight into Malak's heart.

He convulsed. A low, disbelieving whine of pain emitted from his voder as I forced the broken wedge deeper into his injured flesh. My muscles froze; held rigid in a sudden blast of Force stasis I could not block, but-

Malak shuddered, and then the warmth of his heart's blood submerged my raised hand.

"Rev-" he choked, head dropping, wide eyes meeting mine. "Revvie..."

He slumped sideways, arms dropping from around my body, and suddenly I could move again.
"Mal," I gasped, rolling from his lap and into a crouch that had my side screaming in agony. His head thumped on the floor, but he was still blinking at me while a pool of crimson grew beneath his failing flesh.

I couldn't- I couldn't leave-

My hand rose, bloodied and shaking, to cup the side of his face. "Mal. You deserved a better end."

"S-saviour," Malak stuttered, his voder cutting out. "V-villain. Should... should've known you'd... stand alone."

His eyes closed, and his chest didn't rise again.

I tried to swallow against the lump in my throat. Beneath my wet fingers, his scarred cheek was warm. My thumb trailed along the chrome of his jaw, smudging away a fallen teardrop.

He'd been so handsome, once.

…

"This way!" the strange boy hissed, running out from the shadows of the tunnel to grab my hand. Some said these warrens used to be the storm-water drains, centuries ago when Altizir had been a dawning city on a nascent world.

I found myself half-stumbling, half sprinting after my new friend, unsure if the footsteps of the Enforcers were still following. I longed for the safety of Freeflight's dwelling in the sewers – the Enforcers never went there. There wasn't anything to take, and the smell went beyond noxious.

The boy dragged me into a nook, and the only sounds I could hear were the harsh gasps of our combined breathing.

I recognized my erstwhile rescuer. I'd seen him lurking about the public alleys with that older brother of his – a couple of street kids, just like me.

I'd not seem him venture into my corner of the slums before, though.

What was his name? Alek, or something?

"You're Revan, right?" the boy said. "I've seen you around. My name's Malak."

I smiled, and squeezed his hand in the darkness.

…

Wild shaking underneath me wrenched me back to the present. A siren within the command room itself began to wail, biting deep into my eardrums. Malak's skin had turned cold under my hands, and his pallid, dead face blurred through a sheen of betraying tears.

_Promise me you'll get out of there alive_, Carth had pleaded, and the words cut deep. But what life could a Force-blind Revan Freeflight have, out there in the known galaxy?

Bastila's death – and mine – would have been widely felt. And there was a large part of me that thought dying alongside Malak might be the final act of restitution I could offer my old lover, my best friend – the man who had followed me from a poverty-stricken childhood into a future that first shook the galaxy and then tried to break it.
There is still more for you to do.

I was still breathing. Blood was still flowing, and neural connections were still sparking.

I drew my hand back, and looked once more upon the decayed face of a villain I had once loved.

…

"Do you think we'll ever leave here, Mal?" I rubbed my cheek against his, and felt him frown.

"Peeps don't escape Talshion, Revvie. Not even ones as quick as us."

My breath huffed out in an unwillingness to accept that. "There'll be a way. And if anyone will find it, we will."

…

The blast of a nearby explosion made the ground quake; I found myself tumbling along the smooth metal flooring, away from Malak and towards the wall. I grunted, landing against the corpse of an unnamed soldier.

A shiver wracked me, and I was suddenly cold, whether from loss of blood or temperature I didn't know. Instinct had me fumbling to my feet, fighting against a body that didn't want to move, against muscles that were too tight and too bruised to keep going.

My jaw clenched, and I heaved myself up against the wall. The utility belt cinched over my bedraggled mesh shirt caught on an outraised vent. With numb, frozen fingers, I pulled at it, and the thing jerked loose from my waist before thudding to the floor.

I blinked, staring down, realizing at once what was missing.

Karon's 'saber... With a sick jolt, I realized I was missing that symbolic token of hope from my past. No lightsaber, no Force, no bond-sister... in that grim moment, I felt like I didn't have much of anything left.

A green light blinked from above, and I craned my head to sight the ready signals above the few un-ejected escape pods left.

The Force provides, padawan. The Force provides for us all, Jedi and non-Jedi alike.

Promise me you'll get out of there alive.

I didn't want to, I didn't deserve to, and yet I found myself struggling to stay upright as the Star Forge crumbled around me. My hand mashed against a control panel, and then I heaved my body inside an anonymous escape pod.

I looked over my shoulder, back to my past. The last thing I saw before the hatch closed was one outstretched hand with gloved fingers unfurled, as it lay fallen limp and dead on the floor.

…

I found the Jedi Temple soothing, a fortress of peace that pushed the demands of a billion sentients away, even in the heart of Galactic City. Coruscant had more people crammed together than Altizir, but the Temple was a powerful refuge, and one that called to me.

Malak was standing in the middle of the rose-scented courtyard, staring out thoughtfully at the well-tended gardens of starflowers and coru-bulbs. We’d had little time alone since we arrived less than a month ago. Our days had been packed with meetings and lectures and outings, as Master Karon and her friend Master Zhar had done their best to acclimatize us to a planet so very, very different to the only one we had ever known.

Sometimes, I wondered if Mal was still wary of this promised life – if there was a part of him, deep inside, that desired our starved, meaningless existence back on Talshion.

For I missed our friends, and I knew he did, too.

I walked towards my lover, slipping my hand companionably into his large grasp.

"Hey, you," I greeted.

Malak turned, his full lips curving in a tender smile. Eyes the tawny hue of high-grade Corellian whiskey crinkled at the corners, as the expression on his handsome face lightened with pleasure.

"The Jedi robes begin to fit you, Revvie," he murmured. "You're like a wandering star that has finally found her place to shine."

I rolled my eyes at his unnecessary dramatics, but couldn't quell my answering smile.

"And you, Mal?" I lifted a hand to brush aside the thick dark hair that had fallen over the breadth of his forehead. "Are you happy here?"

"Yes." He bent to kiss me softly on the lips. "I am. We have a good life here, Revan. You were right after all. We have a future, and it shall be great-"

…

I struggled to fit the harness on my body, fingers numb and unyielding with the cold. It didn't seem right that I should be so discomfited by temperature; that physical complaints would be so paramount. Not when faced with all the grief of the galaxy.

But deep, deep within, through the grief and past the horror, there was still a tiny flicker of purpose.

Beneath my feet, the repulsorlifts engaged with a quiet thrum as the escape pod registered occupancy.

I thumped the launch button.

The pod fired up, heaving me back against the seat. Spitting out from the ancient relic I had resurrected and then later destroyed.

And, possibly, straight into the arms of a Republic that would have zero sympathy for me.

But, in an anonymous escape pod, maybe I’d just seem like one more Sith soldier, darting away from doom like a mink-rat scurrying from a burning building. The Republic would shoot down runners, no doubt. Others, they’d catch in their net and hurl into the nearest detention centre.

If I was lucky, no one would find me.

But the Force had deserted me, and maybe my luck had too.

xXx
Chapter End Notes

Coming up next: part one of a provisional three-part hyperspace arc, where we begin to see the conclusion for the survivors.

A saga’s apex worth of thanks to kosiah for the beta.
Hyperspace: VII – part one

Canderous Ordo:
Ebon Hawk, Lehon sector

A faint crackle emitted from the ship's long-range comm, as the Republic finally bothered to acknowledge our presence.

::Ebon Hawk, you are cleared for landing. Proceed to dock at bay F27.::

Onasi hadn't made a sound since we'd spat out from the Forge. The only visible reaction I'd spotted was a flinch from the hollow-eyed captain, when the navi-computer alerted us to the first explosion from the beast we'd left behind.

But he said nothing, not even when more messages flashed in red on the screen, listing the complete break-up of the Forge and warning of flying debris firing in our wake. Onasi merely firmed his hands on the controls, canting the freighter in smooth evasion, before steadying on a course direct to the Meridus.

I had no words to say, either. What should have been a victory had the bitter taste of failure tainting every aspect of it. The princess, Carpet, Rosh, Revan...

I'd had my own share of loss before, more than once, but damn if I felt like flying straight into a throng of cheering Republic grunts when the blood of my clan was still so fresh.

The truth was that the whole situation galled, right down to my bones – to be flying away without first eye-balling Revan's corpse for myself. Or, Malak's.

Mand'alor's balls, I hadn't known whether to take the news on jetii faith, earlier. And if it hadn't been for kriffing Malak spouting out over Revan's comm-link, I wasn't entirely sure Onasi would be sitting in the pilot's seat now.

No, I'd learned to give the man more credit. Onasi would've made the right choice in the end. Running wasn't the path of a warrior, but protecting clan was. And we were all clan here – just as Revan had been.

In that respect Malak may have done us a favour, comming through the way he did.

But if the Republic didn't guarantee that black-baled dar'jetii's death, then I'd damn well find a way of doing so myself.

Onasi's expression was bleak and empty as he glided the 'Hawk into the maw of the Republic heavy cruiser. It was plain as space that he was barely holding himself together- that the man would fall apart into a blubering mess soon enough- but I also reckoned he had the inner grit to find a way back to himself once the sharp edge of grief dulled.

My mouth twisted, and my fingers itched for a weapon. Haar’chak, but the only thing worse than personal loss was being unable to avenge it-

We're all hurting. Some more than others. Maybe it's worth reminding Onasi of that.

I shifted, turning to stare out through the viewport into the busy hangar. Snubfighters were coming in to land on either side of us, immediately surrounded by astromechs and ground crew. I struggled to recall if I'd ever landed in a laandur Republic warbird – and idly wondered what sort of reception I'd end up with.

"My daughter was at Malachor, you know," I said, as Onasi switched to landing thrusters and the ship descended. He twitched in response, but to give the man credit, he didn't turn to face me until the freighter thudded gently on the hangar floor.

With a whine, the repulsors shut off. Onasi's hands rested quietly over the dash for a full minute before he slowly swivelled to look at me.

"You never said you had a daughter," he said quietly.

I snorted. "There's a time for the singing of battle songs, Onasi, and it ain't on a crazy mission to save the galaxy."

It wasn't just that, though. My people didn't speak of the departed to outsiders. Grief was a private matter. It was enough to remember their deeds and see their echo in the next generation.

But, for some, there was no next generation.

"I'm sorry, Canderous."

I nodded sharply in acknowledgment. "We Mando'ade mourn differently to you Republic lot. We honour our dead through the glory of combat and the raising of clan. But losing a child- well. You know how that feels."

"Yeah."

::Ebon Hawk, you are clear to disembark. Admiral Dodonna and Jedi Master Tokare await you outside.::

I wasn't done. I leaned over to speak into the comm. "We'll be out in ten. Your lot can damn well wait."

On any other day, I knew Onasi would countermand such a message to his superiors, but he remained still and silent as I turned back to him.

"Millifar was everything I could hope for in a daughter," I said gruffly. "Strong. Brave. A mite foolhardy. She demanded the glory of flying in with the Ordo contingent that flanked Mand'alor, and no father was as proud as I was, that day."

All while I'd been ordered to hang back on the fringes, commanding the remainder of the Ordo fleet.

Malachor had broken what remained of the clans. Too many of us had lost our leaders, our brothers and sisters- and our children. The ones who were left scattered. I'd only had the one child, and my wife—well. She walked away from Ordo after that fateful day, swearing herself to the akaanir dala. I didn't blame her. It was a damn sight more honourable than what I'd ended up doing.

"I'm surprised you didn't hate—" Onasi cut himself off, mouth twisting.

"Revan?" I snorted again. "War is war, Onasi. I respect my opponents who are worthy of it."

He said nothing, but I could see the look on his face— the question of why I'd broached the topic now, of all times.

"Milli was fifteen of your galactic years." I didn't bother holding back my laugh at Onasi's startled look. "We Mando'ade grow up early. She'd been well-blooded by the time Malachor rolled around."

"Fifteen," Onasi said softly. "Younger than Dustil."

"Same age as Mission." My voice hardened. "Difference is, Mission is still a child in some respects. She'll deny it to her dying breath, but you and I damn well know it as the truth."

Onasi nodded, slowly.

"Mission has come to mean something to me. I won't deny it," I said fiercely. I wasn't the sentimental sort, but somewhere along the line I'd grown to respect the girl's spunk. "Look, I'm headed back to the Mando'ade soon as soon as I slip your Republic suits. And my people ain't no place for a soft, quick-mouthed runt like Mission Vao. She thinks she's all grown up, but that Wookiee's always kept an eye on her. He's gone now, him and Revan both, and Mission will be feeling it. She looks up to you, Republic. She'll stay with you, if you offer."

I held the man's gaze, and saw the truth of the matter reflected in his eyes.

"She's underage, on most Republic worlds," Onasi acknowledged. "She'll need a legal guardian if she's to get anywhere in life."

"Don't pose it like that," I cut in gruffly. "The girl's got pride, and she'll be hell-bent on proving her own worth. But Mission also has a soft heart. Make her part of your family, Onasi. Family is what drives us all to keep living."

I'd always claimed there was little in common between the Mando'ade and Republic sorts like Carth Onasi. This journey had taught me just how wrong I was.

"I'll take care of her, Ordo," Onasi promised, and I saw the cloud of grief lift, just a little, from his face. "You can count on me for that."

I nodded, accepting the words of a man I'd grown to respect—kriff, maybe even admire. He nodded back, and then we both turned away to unbuckle our restraints and face the music outside.

xXx

Forn Dodonna:

Mered, Lehon sector

"Captain Onasi's certainly taking his time," Davis Tar'coya grumbled. The words were no more than half-hearted bluster, though, for Tar'coya was doing a poor job at concealing his jubilation. I'd even caught the man slyly throwing a high-five at a bright-eyed tech while we departed the bridge.
On my other side, Jedi Master Vandar Tokare was bowed and silent. The very antithesis of Tar'coya's celebratory mood.

"Carth Onasi and those with him have suffered personal losses today, Davis, in the name of the Republic," I rebuked. In truth, my heart was sitting somewhere between the two men. I felt Tar'coya's nascent joy, his burgeoning relief at the promise of peace – but I was well aware of the casualties that went along with victory. "We can afford to grant Captain Onasi ten minutes of our time."

"Humph," the Sullustan grunted, turning back to the closed hatch of the docked Ebon Hawk. Tar'coya's jowls were twitching, though, and he moved restlessly on his feet. The Commodore was keen to be amongst his own men, and I understood that – I understood that all too well.

After all, Captain Carth Onasi was one of mine.

"Our fleet is still picking up runners, Forn," Tar'coya muttered, looking down at a scroll-feed on the datapad clutched in his hands. "While we wait idly at a captain's leisure. The battle may be over, but the clean-up has scarce begun."

"Commodore," I warned, drawing Tar'coya's abashed glance. Stars, the man was both highly competent and experienced, yet his inability to give credit to anyone outside his reporting line grew more than a little tiresome. "The bridge is safe in the hands of Commodore Patton. We owe today to Captain Onasi and his crew. Grant them the respect they deserve. They are undeniable heroes."

"I suppose, Admiral," Tar'coya conceded, before eyeballing the Ebon Hawk once more. I knew Tar'coya was still smarting over the news of Revan, but he was headed straight for a public dressing-down if he thought to tar the rest of her crew with the same brush. "I suppose they are."

The telling thunk of machinery cut off any further conversation and, with a faint pneumatic hiss, the entrance hatch to the banged-up Dynamic-class freighter finally lowered.

The old man standing alone at the top of the ramp was not one I recognized.

He was either terribly ill or injured, I realized – or both. The dark-skinned Human was leaning heavily against the wall of the freighter, his bare chest haphazardly wrapped in a swathe of stained kolto bandages.

"Medics!" I called sharply to the assembled team waiting behind me, waving a hand towards what must be Jolee Bindo – a contact of Vandar's, and one of the many odd allies my captain had picked up along the way.

Although I knew the truth, no matter what my records would end up saying. It wasn't Carth – nor the Jedi Order's Bastila Shan – who had gathered together this unlikely band of misfits that had managed to topple the Sith Empire.

"Ach, give me a minute," the old man grumbled, but he didn't shake off the first medic who laid a guiding hand underneath his elbow. "I've got some words to say first."

The Jedi grandmaster at my side finally stirred. "Padawan Jolee," Vandar murmured in a sad voice. "A good thing, it is, to see you returned."

Although I knew the truth, no matter what my records would end up saying. It wasn't Carth – nor the Jedi Order's Bastila Shan – who had gathered together this unlikely band of misfits that had managed to topple the Sith Empire.

"Ach, give me a minute," the old man grumbled, but he didn't shake off the first medic who laid a guiding hand underneath his elbow. "I've got some words to say first."

The Jedi grandmaster at my side finally stirred. "Padawan Jolee," Vandar murmured in a sad voice. "A good thing, it is, to see you returned."

Jolee Bindo harrumphed, turning a sharp eye on the diminutive master. The Jedi Order's records listed the Human man as a runaway padawan, but I couldn't glean anything deferential in his glare.

"Vandar," Jolee Bindo muttered in lieu of greeting. "I see you're making assumptions as usual."
The Human waved off Vandar's reply, turning instead to look hard at me.

I knew what personal loss looked like. It was all over the old man's lined face.

"Give us space," Jolee Bindo demanded in a terse voice, as the medic at his side started fussing with the loose end of a kolto wrap. "Aye, I know you probably want a thousand reports, but we're all grieving in there. Give us space before you lot start poking into everything."

I didn't have to turn to see my second-in-command's scowl of irritation. "Captain Onasi is a Republic soldier-" Tar'coya began, before my hand rose to silence him.

"I understand, Jolee Bindo," I said quietly. "We have a set of private suites available for those who do not require a stay in the infirmary. Whilst I must speak with Captain Onasi, I can ensure the rest of you-"

"No, no," the old man spoke over me, irritably drawing a bony arm away from a medic trying to sneak a health-sensor over his wrist. "Leave us on the 'Hawk. We're a family in there, and we've lost four of our own today. No reason we can't darn well recover in the ship that has become home to us all."

Four. The old man's words settled us all into sombre silence. Bastila Shan and Revan Freeflight I already knew, but who were the other two? My mind ran quickly over Carth's last recorded manifest- the Mandalorian general, the Cathar Jedi, that Twi'leki urchin and her Wookiee, Carth's son, of course- and-

Not Carth, I whispered inwardly, my heart clenching as it hit home that I hadn't heard from him since the Ebon Hawk had disappeared inside the Star Forge. Please, not Carth-

There was a shadow at the top of the ramp, behind the cluster of medics milling around Jolee Bindo. My gaze rose, and recognition was as sweet as the first sip of Coruscant's finest brandy.

"Carth," I murmured, as the medics parted to let the man past.

I'd seen Carth at his worst, once. Shortly after Telos, when he was determined to drown in a bottle and throw away the career that had shaped his life. Now, he looked – well, not all that much better than then, actually-

"Your son." The words fell quickly from my lips as Carth came to a standstill some metres in front of me. He lifted one hand, as if to salute, and then appeared to think twice. A great sigh escaped him, and his shoulders sagged.

The man looked as awful as one could expect. His combat armour was battered and grimed with filth, and a patchwork of bruising latticed along one side of his unshaven face. Here was a soldier who had sacrificed everything for the Republic – more than once.

"Dustil's fine, Admiral," Carth answered, his mouth twisting as if in pain. "Well. He's alive. He will be fine."

"Four," Vandar echoed, still staring at the durasteel underbelly of the smuggling freighter. Hairless brows lowered over his bright blue eyes. "Sense a few sparks of Force onboard, I do."

"Ach, darn it," Jolee Bindo bit out abruptly, jerking his arm free from the medics before turning and stomping back inside. "Give me one blasted moment!"

"Carth," I repeated, holding the man's gaze. There was no denying the grief I saw etched in the lines of his face. Revan had come to mean something to him – that had been easy to glean in his scattered reports, as well as more than a little concerning. When I had first commissioned him and sent him onboard the Endar Spire, Carth Onasi had been nothing more than a feint to the Jedi Order.

A capable man I trusted and held in high regard, but a feint nonetheless. A lure to draw the Jedi’s attention away from my original operative – who hadn’t even made it past the Endar Spire.

A good commander knew how to play the hand she’d been dealt, but Carth Onasi had completely outperformed my expectations. I could only hope the aftermath wouldn’t break him again.

"Who are your casualties, Captain?" I asked quietly. "We have heard of Bastila Shan and Jen Sahara, but who are the other two?"

The false name came easily, now. It hardly mattered if the odd rumour of truth slipped into the public arena; without official confirmation, the brief resurrection of a Sith Lord come to save the galaxy would sound like nothing more than the fanciful conspiracy theory of a cantina drunk.

I should have felt relief at Revan's death. The galaxy was a safer place without the existence of Darth Revan – redeemed or otherwise. That was what I told myself.

The sentiment was more difficult to swallow than I had expected.

"You lot coming, or what?" Jolee Bindo's voice grumbled from the entrance hatch, as he poked his head outside again. "You call yourself medics or furniture? I need two darn stretchers in here!"

"Admiral," Carth said, and this time he snapped out a rigid, precise salute. "I formally request an immediate discharge from the Republic Navy."

I blinked, as two stretchers were wheeled past us in quick succession. Perhaps I should not have been surprised – but I was. "Carth, don't be hasty."

"I'm not being hasty, Forn," Carth cut in, his voice low and simmering with emotion. Behind him, the cluster of medics had followed the old man back inside. "My son needs me. Mission- blast it, she's just lost her best friend, and- and- look, I'm in no state..."

His words trailed away, and his jaw clenched. And I realized, then, that even the strongest of men could reach their breaking point.

This is a poor time for a debrief, no matter how short I had planned on it being.

At least Tar'coya had the grace to remain silent for once.

"Carth," I said gently, stepping forward to rest a hand on his shoulder. "I'm placing you on indefinite leave from active duty. I won't accept any sort of resignation – not today. Your irascible old friend had a good idea. Stay in the Ebon Hawk. I'll post sentries to ensure your privacy. We'll talk later."

Carth swallowed, his gaze holding mine. He was a good man – one of the best, really – and I would not let one such as him go easily.

He deserved a heck of a lot more than a vacation, though.

"Zaalbar." Carth's eyes darkened as he abruptly answered the question I had put to him before. "Zaalbar fell while protecting Bastila Shan. And Rosh gave his life so my son and I could escape.
Too many damn losses, Forn." Carth broke off, staring blankly over the vast hangar. The muffled cheering of mechanics and pilots suddenly seemed discordantly loud. "Too many losses," he echoed in a broken whisper.

"Rosh?" Tar'coya barked in question, as I found myself frowning over the unfamiliar name. "There was no Rosh listed on any manifest."

Vandar's walking stick tapped softly on the durasteel grating as he hobbled closer.

"Sense, I did not, my old apprentice fading," Vandar murmured, his bright blue eyes pinned on Carth.

The sound of wheels on metal preceded the two medical stretchers as they raced down the Ebon Hawk’s ramp, this time both occupied. My puzzlement over the unknown Rosh temporarily vanished as my gaze honed in on the closest medi-bed.

"Vrook Lamar," I said in shock, and my words were echoed with Vandar's gasp.

"Wait!" Vandar called out, stepping in front of the first stretcher and effectively forcing the medics to halt. The Jedi grandmaster then lifted a three-fingered hand, and begun to hum softly. A gentle glow of golden light sprang to life around his outraised limb.

I elbowed Tar'coya in the side before he could say anything.

"Vitals stabilizing," a red-and-white clad medic muttered, as Vandar's green hands floated over Vrook Lamar's still body. Jedi healing. I had seen it before, and the esoteric miracle never failed to impress.

I had not expected to see Vrook Lamar come back alive. Oh, I'd been plenty aggrieved when he had absconded in that complete shell of stealth technology my mechanics had been itching to pull apart. But now, after everything, I found I could barely rustle up the faintest hint of indignation.

"Juhani's in a bad way, too," Carth snapped, and that drew my eye to the second medi-bed. The Cathar Jedi was lying prone, though she was at least conscious – even if her left leg was completely enclosed in a bacta-filled splint.

"I'm fine, Carth," the young Jedi whispered, as a medic injected a hypoderm into her exposed shoulder.

"Shh," the medic murmured, patting the Cathar's shoulder as her eyes slowly closed.

After a full minute of uneasy silence, Vandar's eyes opened again and he stepped back from the first stretcher. The medic behind the bed started moving again, and both invalids were wheeled past us in quick succession, as if Vandar's retreat had granted them unspoken consent.

The little green Jedi stared sadly after the disappearing medics. "Old friend," he murmured soulfully. "At peace, now, your padawan is."

"There." The word was snapped out flatly, coming from the other Jedi nearby. Jolee Bindo was still leaning against the side of the freighter, and his hard stare was levelled at Vandar. "There's your two Force-sensitive."

Tar'coya grunted in obvious discontent at my side. "Captain, as jolly as it is to see Master Vrook back onboard the Meridus," he said, in a bland voice that might have been convincing to one who didn't know him. "Mind filling us in on this mysterious Rosh person?"
Carth blinked, as if shaken from a stupor. "Uh-

"Onboard the ship, Padawan, are there no other Force-sensitives?" Vandar interrupted in a high, creaky voice. He had turned back to stare at the Ebon Hawk again, hobbling a step closer with his head cocked to one side. "Sense someone else, I thought-"

"Ach, quit with the titles. I'm as much a member of your Order as you're a Mandalorian, Vandar, and you darn well know it."

"Left the Jedi Order, Padawan, you never did. Much like my question, which running away from you are also."

"Wait just one damn minute," Carth said in an almost-growl, as he spun on a foot to glare at Vandar. "There's no one onboard you need to concern yourself with, Master Jedi. No member of your Order, past or present."

Jolee Bindo harrumphed. "Eh, well, consider this my darn resignation-"

The undercurrents in the conversation were no longer perplexing, they were downright annoying. "Captain-"

"Your fourth casualty," Vandar interrupted again, his ears twitching as he swivelled back to face Carth. "Of his demise, what makes you so certain?"

"His comm was destroyed," Carth said blankly. "Uh, I mean I know that's not- but that damn Sith had already taken out- stang, there's no chance we left Rosh to die, is there?" The captain looked almost desperate as he wheeled around to stare wildly at Jolee Bindo. "Jolee, did you- did you sense-"

"Ach, no," the old man muttered, rubbing a hand over his balding scalp. "I mean, I barely felt Malak fade. I ain't exactly in the sharpest of states, sonny boy-"

"Captain!" I clipped out, feeling my eyes pinch at the corners. "Explain. Now. Who is this Rosh?"

As Carth turned back to face me, Vandar's walking stick tapped loudly on the flooring again. "My old apprentice," the Jedi grandmaster murmured. "A good man, once. A good man again, perhaps."

Carth sighed heavily, bowing his head in concession. Somehow, I knew I wasn't going to appreciate his next words. "He was a late addition to our crew, Admiral. Not exactly a name I wanted posted in a holo-message." Carth grimaced. "Yudan Rosh. Rev- Jen convinced him to help us."

There was a moment, just then, when all the background chatter seemed to wilt into silence. Then Tar'coya erupted. "Oh, you've got to be kidding me-"

"Davis-"

"What's next? Are we going to see blasted Talvon Esan jumping up from the grave-"

"Commodore!" I snapped in a growl. Honestly, one of these days I was going to muzzle the man. "Bridge. Wait for me there. Now!"

Tar'coya's thick lips pursed as his angry gaze met mine. I could see the thwarted frustration written all over his face, and wished again that he had been kept ignorant of the more... controversial
Tar'coya was a good officer, but he had never learned to keep his own personal opinions in check.

The Sullustan forced out an angry sigh, following it with a tight "ma'am", and turned on a heel before stalking away. I stared after him for a moment, feeling my temper slowly subside as he departed.

Irate or not, it didn't stop Tar'coya slapping another raised hand on his way out – and the simple gesture reminded me that today, despite everything, was still a resounding victory.

"You had no other choice, Carth," Jolee Bindo was saying softly. "There was no time to wait for Rosh, and everything suggested he had fallen in battle. He chose to save you and Dustil. Don't let guilt ruin the gift he gave you."

Slowly, I turned back around. Regardless of what Carth had withheld, I had little cause to be upset with him. No, my finger was pointing directly at that secretive, cryptic relic of the Jedi Order.

"You knew," I said, as Vandar's gaze rose to meet mine. "I demanded full disclosure, Vandar, and you damn well knew about Yudan Rosh."

The little old man sighed in defeat, the tips of his ears drooping. "From Jen Sahara's last communication, yes, I did learn of his involvement."

"I said no more secrets, Vandar." It was difficult not to hiss the words out. And as I glared at the centuries-old Jedi, all I could see was a tired scion of an order that hadn't been there when we had truly needed them.

And I was reminded, yet again, of why the Republic had so fiercely loved Revan Freeflight, once upon a time.

"You are hereby forbidden access to the bridge or the command centre, Master Jedi," I bit out. Vandar's sad blue eyes almost made me feel guilty, but damn it- the time of the Jedi Order waltzing in, upending everything, and shrouding events in unnecessary mystery had gone. For how much of the past three conflicts could be laid squarely at the foot of the Jedi Order?

That was a popular sentiment now, back in the Core – and while I didn't always hold to it myself, there were some days when I struggled to see if the good of the Jedi truly outbalanced the ramifications of their fallen.

Maybe it was time for a new age, where the Republic did not need the struts of the Jedi Order to hold firm.

"Go and see to Vrook," I ordered Vandar in a level voice. "Be there when he wakes. Stars knows he'll be inconsolable with the news of his padawan's death."

Vandar had visibly wilted in front of my eyes. He said nothing, though, merely bowed his wrinkled green head in surrender and hobbled away.

The tap of his walking stick slowly ebbed and faded into the background hub of celebration.

I looked back to Carth; I expected him to be overtly uncomfortable with the conversation, or ready with a response, but instead the man was staring bleakly into the distance.

Raw grief lurked around the corners of his down-turned mouth and in the sheen of his hollow brown gaze.

"Carth, the Republic owes you more than I can express," I said quietly. He blinked, twice, and it seemed a visible effort for him to focus on me. "Go be with your family. We'll talk in a day or two."

The galaxy knew I had enough other matters to attend to. Any formal debrief could certainly wait.

Carth nodded slowly, and my gaze roved over the deep bruising along the side of his face again. I felt my heart soften, for this man who had been through so much. "I'll send in another team of medics to treat you and your crew onboard," I added. "Anything you need, Carth, you can request of the guards posted outside."

"Just-" His eyes closed briefly, and a tired sigh escaped him. "Just privacy for now, Forn."

"Go," I urged him with a smile, and hoped, one day, he would be able to return it.

xXx

Eridius Talav:
GenoHaradan HQ Bunker II, Nar Shaddaa

"Overseer," Tealia murmured, sliding a steaming mug of barli tea across the smooth ferracrystal desk. My normally-impassive personal assistant wore a dreamy smile, and the overhead lighting glinted against the large blue rock adorning her index finger.

A muted holo-figure sat frozen, paused mid-speech, atop the console embedded in my desk, but I took a moment first to eye Tealia over. Highly capable personal assistants were not always easy to come by; even if the throes of a budding romance had her walking around with a dazed look on her face, at least it had not impacted her performance or professionalism.

A good thing, that. I required the best staff around me, and I would have felt mildly grieved at replacing her. For, I knew well, there was only one way to leave the GenoHaradan.

"Am I right in assuming you have a personal request, Tealia?" I asked, allowing my gaze to linger on the crystal adorning her hand. From memory, index fingers meant lifelong commitment to Zabraks, and the colour blue was their symbol of romance.

"Yes, Overseer, if you have a moment-"

"Come back in an hour," I said in a curt tone, but allowed her a smile of indulgence. The paused holo-message was of far more importance than the personal entanglement of my secretary, no matter how competent she was. Still, I could not quite suppress a faint pang of sentimentality. After all, it had been some time since I'd overseen a GenoHaradan wedding.

Ajax Zarr was a lucky Zabrak. I would ensure he realized that.

"We shall talk in an hour," I repeated, gentling my voice. "The GenoHaradan are a family, Tealia, and we look after our own."

Tealia nodded in quick compliance, smiling sweetly as she departed, and I resigned myself to rifling through our organization's sanctioned list of honeymoon retreats later that afternoon.

Every word I said was true. A posting within the GenoHaradan was for life, but we ensured our staff – all of them – were well-rewarded for their efforts. If Tealia desired the hand of one of our own, then I had no qualms about making it so.

And Ajax Zarr was one of our top data analysts. Perhaps he did deserve her. In fact, he was the one who'd landed the scoop on Revan Freeflight—which brought me right back to the true matter of importance. As the door quietly closed behind Tealia's retreating back, I leaned forward to unmute the comm.

The frozen blue-edged figure above the data console returned to real-time.

"You are certain, then," I said, continuing our conversation as if it had never been interrupted.

Rulan Prolik had taken on the form of a well-built Rodian, clad in a busk-leather armour that strained around the girth of his musculature. He was lounging back in the cockpit of a customized Aurek snub he'd already informed me once belonged to the upper echelons of the Sith Empire.

Truly, I had never doubted the man's usefulness or capability. Otherwise Rulan Prolik would have long gone the way of all my other predecessors.

::As far as I can be, without visibly checking Revan's corpse myself:::

I felt my fingers tapping, and immediately quelled the telling sign of irritation. "A holo-still of her limp body and an intercepted comm-report to the Republic does not guarantee death, Rulan. Not when there is already a historical precedent of Revan Freeflight surviving against all odds."

The shapeshifter shrugged. Sometimes, I found his apparent apathy a trifle abrading, mostly because I had never seen the man truly rattled.

::Your agents amongst the Republic ranks:::

"Report the Jedi Padawan Jen Sahara as one of the fallen." I finished, ending the sentence with a dismissive snort. "They've listed her as the apprentice of Bastila Shan, farcical as that sounds. Apparently, Jen Sahara's death spurred Bastila Shan on to confront Malak before they slew each other in a grand lightsaber duel. I'll give the Republic this: they know how to spin a tale of tragic heroism."

::Apprentice::: Rulan echoed, allowing a smile of amusement to curve his thin green lips, but offering no other comment on the ridiculous marketing slant. ::I can give you no more certainty than the Republic, Eridius. If Revan was still alive when I departed the Star Forge, chances are the destruction of the space station took her out:::

"Hmm." I liked chances as little as Rulan did. Still, my ears seeded deep within both Republic and Jedi communications told me that everyone of import believed Revan Freeflight – and Malak Devari – had come to a final end. "Did you find anything of consequence?"

Rulan knew what I was really asking. What had Revan Freeflight discovered after Malachor? What threat had convinced her to launch an assault against the galactic federation she had spent a lifetime defending? What was her true reason for seeking out an alliance with the GenoHaradan as Dark Lord of the Sith?

I had never met Darth Revan in person. The Third Overseer had... as had the Fourth. At that time our organization took her demands seriously. Although, honestly, Overseer Vorn had always been a bit of an idiot.

::I failed to slice into the core databanks of the Star Forge::: Rulan admitted, leaning back into the pilot's bucket seat. The comm's geolocation was masked, and all I knew about Rulan's current position was that he was floating around somewhere in the Outer Rim Territories. ::I did manage to acquire some intriguing tech... like the cloaking device embedded in this old starfighter.::

"Yes." I allowed myself a chuckle, thinking on the stealth-enabled snub the Republic had so briefly captured before allowing a robe to waltz away with it. "I will organize a rendezvous point for one of my agents to collect it from you. But back to my query-"

::In short, no. If the Star Forge held answers they are beyond us now. Although, frankly, I doubt the Darth Revan of old would carelessly leave records regarding her motivations within such an obvious stronghold.::

Considering how difficult it had been to track down the location of the Star Forge, I would have hardly labelled the Rakatan relic as obvious. Still, I understood Rulan's meaning. Darth Revan had been cautious enough with her strategic objectives that any crumbs left behind would have been hidden very carefully.

"Which leaves us right back to where we started," I mused. Ensuring the stability of the galaxy. Supporting the Republic – for now.

::Waiting. Watching from the shadows.:: Rulan murmured, echoing the eons-old ethos of the GenoHaradan. ::We pull strings in the darkness and hold civilization aloft.::

"Yes," I agreed. While also keeping one eye fixed firmly on the Unknown Regions. From a distance, of course. For a journey into uncharted space meant almost-certain death for the unprepared. Whatever Revan had sought, she must have had knowledge of her destination beforehand.

My eyes narrowed. When Darth Revan exploded onto the galactic scene, the GenoHaradan had first scrabbled to circumvent her invasion, and then later, allied to bolster her attack vectors. And then, when she fell in the skies above Deralia... we turned back. Back to supporting the faltering Republic.

The importance of whittling out her secrets had never escaped me and now, with the war ending, I might just be able to allocate the resources required for a closer look. And since the GenoHaradan did not know where Revan had once tread, perhaps we needed to focus on where she had first learned of the threat that had turned her.

"Malachor," I said softly, my mind buzzing.

Rulan knew better than to question the obvious; he merely remained still and silent as he watched me through the comm.

"Malachor V was more than simply an end to the Mandalorian Wars," I continued, as my fingers begin to tap once more. "Revan found something at that cataclysmic battle. Every commander who returned to the Core expected Revan’s fleet to be right behind them. Even the missive stating her forces were tied up chasing remnants of the Mandalorian clans came weeks after Malachor."

Rulan's expression didn't change from his standard impassivity. ::Malachor V is a ruin. Do you think secrets rest atop its crippled surface?::

"Maybe," I said slowly. "Or maybe we need to search for other survivors who may know some inkling of the truth."

His eyes narrowed. A telling sign, that, and I knew he was speculating along the same lines as I.
"Yes," I concurred, feeling my lips curve. "Two who were at the centre of Malachor V. Two who walked away, lauded as galactic heroes but quietly exiled from their own order. Two, left with none of the power they once commanded."

The corner of Rulan's thin mouth twitched as he leaned closer to the holo-com. "After all these years, Eridius, do you really expect either Meetra Surik or Xaset Terep to still be alive?"

"Who knows?" I replied with an easy shrug. "But surely it cannot hurt to look."

xXx

Carth Onasi:
Ebon Hawk, Hyperspace, enroute to Coruscant

"So," Ordo said by way of greeting as I stepped into the common room. "How'd your list of demands go?"

Mission was perched on one of the benches, a pack of pazaak cards stacked neatly on the table in front of her. I could tell at a glance that Dustil had been trying – and failing – to coerce her into a game.

I placed the pot of soup I'd been carrying down on the table with a sigh, catching my son's gaze and motioning to the shelf stacked high with plasteel bowls.

"Dish up, would you Dustil?" I asked, before taking a seat next to Mission.

She didn't say a word in greeting.

We'd been here near a week, now. The 'Hawk was quiet; quiet, with the ghosts of our fallen. Every time I woke it was to a crushing sense of loss. The word beautiful would rest on my lips, never to be spoken, as I was forced to accept that the future I had dreamed of would never be more than just a dream.

Revan hadn't believed in that future, but I had dared to.

Revan. Bastila. Zaalbar. Stang, even Rosh – sometimes, my grief was rocked by a furious surge of injustice that life could dare do this to me a second time.

And then I would see my son, hovering so patiently around the girl who was almost a daughter to me. Dustil was coping better than the rest of us, and I couldn't deny that his solicitude over Mission seemed to be bringing out the best in him.

My son was growing into a man I was proud of.

I blinked, and turned to answer Ordo instead. "Well, I got rid of Psycho-Droid. Don't expect we'll be seeing him again."

Ordo's mouth tightened. He'd been the only one to disagree on that count, but hadn't cared enough to kick up too much of a fuss about it. The rest of us knew that HK-47 – even in pieces – was dangerous. If any information of note still simmered in his databanks, then as far as I was concerned, Republic Intel could have at him.

I sighed, and held Ordo's stone gaze. "Forn agreed to pretty much everything else. Well, except..."
paying you for the Ebon Hawk."

Ordo snorted, face relaxing, as he took a seat opposite me and lifted his boots onto the table. I didn't have the energy to snap at him.

"This ship is mine, fair and square," he muttered, but he didn't sound half as fierce as he had back on Tatooine. I had the distinct feeling that Ordo was simply looking for something to argue over. "Don't see why your Republic think they can go and claim it as theirs."

"Technically you stole it, Ordo," I said, nodding gratefully to Dustil as he ladled noodla soup from the large pot into a trio of bowls.

Forn had been as good as her word: the soldiers left us alone, the medics had patched us up, and the kitchens of the Meridus supplied fresh food on demand.

I didn't feel much like physical comforts, these days – but I wasn't going to turn down a break from the onboard synthesizer, either.

"Piracy is a perfectly legal form of acquisition in many sectors-"

"Not in Taris airspace, last I heard," I added drily. For all my gloom, there was a shallow part of me looking forward to Ordo's reaction when he heard Forn had signed ownership of the Ebon Hawk solely over to me.

The Mandalorian shrugged. "Well, I was Davik's third-in-command. Killing him and Calo grants me the rights to their spoils."

I raised one brow in hollow amusement. The hard ball of grief still sat, lodged and tight in my gut, but there was something almost cathartic about such a normal conversation. "Didn't Juhani get the killing blow on Nord?"

Ordo snorted again, but whatever he was planning to retort with was interrupted by Teethree, wheeling in from the cockpit and bleeping forth a long screed of Binary.

"Jolee's come back," Mission whispered, raising her head briefly. "Tee's opened the hatch."

We all turned, ebbing into silence as the thud of footsteps became audible. The hatch opened-

"Juhani," Mission said in surprise, her light brown eyes sparkling faintly in welcome.

The Cathar was seated in a med-chair, a robotic leg raised aloft as Jolee slowly pushed her inside.

"Hello," Juhani greeted, a little awkwardly, as she parked up near the edge of the table. Somewhere, the Cathar had picked up a clean set of brown Jedi robes. Her tawny gaze danced over us all before resting soulfully on Mission.

"Figured the lot of us would do better together," Jolee muttered, sliding onto the bench next to me. "And since those robed idiots from Dantooine decided to do a bunk-"

"Jolee," Juhani intervened, all hesitance forgotten as she frowned in disapproval at the old man.

"Eh, it's true, isn't it?" Jolee waggled his eyebrows, seemingly unconcerned. "I half expected a lecture from Vrook – now there's a sent who was an old grouch from birth – but I didn't even get a chance to talk to the man-"

"The Jedi Masters have left?" I jumped in, my eyes shooting straight to Dustil.
I'd been concerned – more than concerned – about what Vandar Tokare would do if he stumbled over my son. There'd been a time, back on Kashyyyk, when I'd thought maybe the Jedi Order was the best place for him, but now-

Dustil was adamant he wouldn't go there. It seemed Korriban had bred distrust of the Order in him so deep he almost burned with it at times- and while I knew he was being irrational, I also knew I owed it my son to let him make his own decisions.

"Aye," Jolee grunted in assent. I glanced his way to see the old man also eyeballing Dustil. "So you can quit hiding, lad, at least until we get to Coruscant."

I hadn't realized quite how tense Dustil was until he relaxed.

"That's what you've been doing?" I asked quietly. "Hiding, in the Force?"

I was learning. Slowly, slowly, about the strange and amazing gifts my son had somehow acquired along the way. And each small bit of knowledge was accompanied with the sharp pang that it could've been Revan explaining these things to me.

"Yeah." Dustil's voice was muffled as he turned around to grab another pair of bowls. "Jolee gave me a heads-up when we landed."

Juhani let out an uncharacteristic huff, shooting a glare at Jolee before turning to Dustil with a softer expression. "The Jedi Order can help you, Dustil," she said. "The Force is not something to be frightened of-"

"I spent four frakking years in a damn Sith Academy!" Dustil snapped, his eyes darkening, and I felt my heart clench. "You seriously think I'm scared of the frakking-"

Ordo's fist slammed down hard on the table, rattling the bowls as his boots thumped to the ground. He half came to his feet, leaning over to glare at everyone in turn. "Stop," Ordo growled, eyes as hard as granite. "Kittycat, keep your nose out. Sithkid, act like the man you are instead of a squalling ik'aad. I'll kriffing knock your heads together if this continues."

We all dealt with grief in our own way. Canderous seemed the least affected – except in those moments when his temper snapped.

The silence that stretched out after his words was awkward, and I felt the ghosts stir again. Had Bastila been here, no doubt she would've taken Juhani's side with a prim reminder about just who the experts in the Force were - possibly cementing her argument with a pointed remark in my direction regarding parental duty.

But Bastila had never even had the chance to meet Dustil.

Zaalbar might've rumbled something wise or appeasing – not that my abysmal Shyriiwook had ever meant I could understand him properly. Rosh would've stayed silent, leaning against the wall, looking vaguely bored if he deigned to show any emotion whatsoever. And Revan-

I couldn't even begin to guess. Some sassy comment about everyone taking themselves too seriously, perhaps.

I sighed, and leaned forward to mechanically shovel a spoonful of hot soup into my mouth.

"You know you can't hide from them forever, right, sonny boy?" Jolee was the first to break the silence, raising a bushy eyebrow at Dustil as if Ordo had never lashed out at all.
Dustil was still scowling as he slouched down next to Mission, whose head was bowed back over her meal. "You're the one who told me to-

Jolee harrumphed. "Aye, well, figured you needed some breathing space. But we're headed to Coruscant, and that place is chock-full of Jedi. You should think about what you're gonna do when they approach you, lad, because sooner or later they will."

Ordo had relaxed, again, once more shoving his dirty boots on the table. I stared at them, hard, briefly considering the merits of a pointless dustup.

"What d'ya think that bunch of hu'tuun robes can do, old man?" Ordo said dismissively, one hand scratching idly at his unshaven jaw. "I'd like to see them try and wrest away the son of the Republic's golden hero in the middle of their kriffing victory parade."

"Hero," I said blankly. "Uh, say what?"

"Heh, suppose you've got a point," Jolee chuckled. "And Dustil is well beyond the age they usually admit students, but then I don't reckon they'll be ignoring a Sith-trained kid wandering around with a shiny medal hung about his neck."

Ordo turned to face me with a lazy grin that didn't reach his eyes. "Haven't you been listening to what the grunts outside this ship are saying, Onasi? We're all heroes of the Republic, now. Even being Mando'aede doesn't stop your women throwing themselves at me-"

"Canderous," Juhani hissed. "Show some decorum-"

"I don't want a stupid medal." Mission's voice was no louder than a whisper, but we all stuttered into silence at the sound of it. "And I don't want to go to stupid Coruscant."

She was staring down at the table again. Her lekku trailed limply down her back, as if all the fire in her soul had been quenched. I rested one hand lightly on her shoulder, and felt as useless as a tach caught in a scent trap.

The Meridus had been in hyperspace for near a week, while we remained safely docked in the hangar. The remaining Republic fleet was headed to the Core, where Forn had flat-out ordered me – and my crew, by proxy – to attend a damn medal ceremony being overseen by the Senate themselves.

I didn't think any of us particularly felt like being lauded as heroes, even if it did get Ordo laid along the way.

So far, I'd only left the confines of the 'Hawk for Forn's compulsory debriefs, but as far as I knew Mission hadn't budged from the ship at all. Mission – the one who'd snuck out pretty much everywhere we'd gone.

She hadn't said anything about our destination until now – stang, she'd barely said a word at all – and I had no idea how to reach her. None. Without Zaalbar, without Revan, she'd completely retreated into no more than a wraith-like facsimile of the ebullient girl that had been the heart of our crew.

"The medal ceremony isn't for us, not really," I said softly, feeling her shoulders shake beneath my palm. "It's for everyone else, everyone who's had to live with war for so long."

"It won't bring Jen back," she mumbled, dropping her head into her hands. "It won't bring Big Z back."
"No," Ordo said, his voice gruff. Damn if his eyes weren't sharp with emotion as he stared at her bent head. "That's only something we can do, ad'ika. We tell their stories. Their memory lives on through us."

"Do you know how the Wookiees mourn, lass?" Jolee asked. Mission didn't lift her head, but her shoulders stilled. She was listening, at least. "Much like Mandalorians, the Wookiees share tales of their lost. They celebrate the lives that have gone. They eat a lot, of course, and howl a bit-"

"No one knew Revan as we did," Juhani added softly. "No matter her past, we are the ones who saw what she became. Bastila, too. And I do not think anyone on Kashyyyk can claim to have known Zaalbar like you, Mission."

"I lost someone," Dustil said, hard and abrupt, his eyes almost black as he, too, stared at Mission's bent head. "Someone on Korriban. Mex and I- we never really spoke of her after. She- but- I think..." he trailed off, uselessly, before catching my gaze. I hated the almost-desperate look in his eyes, the more so because I understood it all too well.

After Telos, I never mentioned Morgana or Dustil to anyone. The grief sat like acid in my soul, as I tried to smother it with whiskey first, and when that failed, the ongoing demands of war. Only after Revan stormed into my life, and Dustil was returned to me, did it somehow become possible to even think Morgana's name again.

"I'm going to Kashyyyk." Mission's head jerked up, tear-tracks glistening almost proudly down her pale blue face. "I never met Big Z's dad. He should hear what happened from us."

My breath caught as the idea sparked in my head. It'd be possible- Forn had promised me a direct trip to Telos after I attended her blasted ceremony, as well as immunity for Dustil, adoption for Mission, not to mention the 'Hawk, and a lengthy leave of absence I was still considering turning into that resignation I'd first thrown at her-

We could fit in a trip to Kashyyyk. With the way things were, Forn didn't seem willing to deny me much of anything.

"We could all go," I said slowly, looking first to Juhani and then Ordo. He met my gaze steadily. "After Coruscant, we could take the 'Hawk and make one last trip together."

"Canderous?" Mission asked in a tiny voice.

He gave her a short, sharp nod. "I'm headed back to my home, ad'ika, you know that. But if I'm gonna let the kriffing Republic adorn my neck with gold, first, then I've certainly got time to honour Carpet."

It had surprised me, earlier, when Ordo agreed to visit the Core. I wasn't sure if receiving a medal from our side would be any sort of trophy to a Mandalorian war general, or if he was simply loathe to leave Mission so soon.

We all clustered around her, I realized suddenly. As if Mission's grief was the glue still binding us together.

"I, too, would like to visit Kashyyyk one last time," Juhani added. "Freyyr is an honourable Wookiee, and Mission is correct. He deserves to hear his son's story from us."

Jolee slanted a look sideways at her. "Ain't you going to be tied up with the Order, lass?"

"I belong to Dantooine, Jolee, not Coruscant. Vandar reminded me of as much before he left." The Cathar's face tightened, but her eyes shone with resolution. "I shall make my way back to the Enclave after I pay my respects."

The conversation was devolving into leave-takings, I realized, and my heart clenched again. Without Revan, it sometimes felt like the crew had already broken up. But there was one matter of import I hadn't raised yet- everyone's grief was still too raw to think about the future-

"Mission." I cleared my throat awkwardly, pressing down on her shoulder to gain the girl's attention. Slowly, her head raised to meet my gaze. "Will you, uh, will you come back to Telos with us? With me and Dustil? I'll have lodgings there, and I'm on leave, and there'll be space for you..."

I trailed off, unable or uncertain what words I really wanted to say. Stay with us. Be part of our family. Let me look after you, as much as you'll let me-

Mission's light brown eyes widened, shining with emotion. But she didn't say anything.

"I can, uh, adopt you- like as a legal guardian, I mean." My words stuttered, sounding stupid and heavy-handed even to my ears. "I don't know what you want to do with your life, Mission, but I can offer you a home while you figure that out. You, and Dustil, and me."

She blinked, as if dumbstruck, and I was just waiting for blasted Ordo to say something scathing-

"It'd mean a lot to me. And- and-" I glanced around wildly, my gaze resting on old man Bindo who was staring at me, narrow-eyed, as if in deep concentration. "Jolee, you could join us too. I mean, it'd be good for Dustil to learn from someone other than a psychopathic Sith headmaster-"

"Dad!"

Jolee's bushy brows shot upwards in surprise. "Now wait just a minute-"

"That ain't a bad idea, Onasi." Ordo added, as he finally broke into the conversation. "Someone should keep your kid's head knocked on straight-"

"Hey!" Dustil all but yelped. "What the frakk would you know-"

"Jolee, that is a dangerous idea and you know it." Juhani's voice was tight as she leaned forward in her med-chair. The tips of her ears twitched before flattening against the side of her head. "Proper training can only come from the doctrines of the Jedi Order. Do not even consider-"

The sound of Ordo's boots scraping along the table muffled the last of Juhani's impassioned invective. He snorted, eyeing over Dustil in disparagement. "What I know is that you kept losing your kriffing head on Lehon, Sithkid. A true warrior trains both his mind and body."

"Call me an irascible grouch, if you will," Jolee was grumbling. "But whenever a darn Jedi tells me not to do something, I automatically start considering it."

"Jolee Bindo-"

"I know, I know!" He flapped a hand at Juhani and, surprisingly, it ebbed the Cathar back into silence. With a heavy sigh, the old man turned to stare hard at me. "Thing is, I've trained someone before and made a right royal mess of it. Not the sort of thing I care to repeat."

There was something in his words – a break in his voice, a crackle of emotion – that effectively killed the conversation. I had no idea who was in Jolee's past, but I could tell the experience haunted him.

"Dustil ain't your wife, Jolee," Mission said softly. "He's already been trained. And I reckon you ain't the person you were back then, either."

Wife? Wife? My gaze swung back to Mission in shock. It shouldn't be surprising that Mission had been a part of all the confidences that went on in this ship, but to think that the old man had once been married, and then tried training his wife in the Force-

She went dark. Or died. Or both. I felt hollow and drained, again, as I realized that Jolee, of all people, might understand my grief the best.

"Well, I'll have some time to think on it, what with Coruscant and Kashyyyk on the table first," Jolee muttered. "Ach, don't start again, Cathar. I'll make my own decision clear of what you or your Order think about it. Anyway, seems to me that no one's bothered to ask Sithkid what he wants, anyway."

All eyes turned to my son. He blinked, shuffling away from Mission, running one hand awkwardly through his hair. "Uh," he began. "I, um, I guess it'd be okay to have you around?"

"Bah, don't throw a party on my account, Sithkid."

I fought back an irritated urge to snap at Jolee for the overused moniker even as Dustil's eyes narrowed. "How about you stop calling me that, old man, or I'll start naming you my frakking Jedi master."

To my surprise, Jolee erupted into a surprisingly deep belly laugh, one hand thumping at his chest. Even Mission cracked a smile. "Alright, alright, I know when I'm beat. Guess I'll just have to come up with something better."

"Ad'ika," Ordo cut in. He was leaning back, his arms folded behind his neck with his legs stretched out covering the end of the table. He was relaxed, casual even, like he didn't have a care in the world – apart from the intent gleam in his eyes. "You haven't answered Onasi."

The hitch in Mission's breathing was audible; she glanced between Ordo and me, eyes wide and glistening even as her forehead bunched into furrows of consternation. Up until now, Mission had always followed Zaalbar – an outside observer might've considered her the leader of the pair, but it'd been the Wookiee who'd pledged himself to Revan. Mission had left her only home with barely a protest just to be with him-

She imagined a future with Zaalbar. Or with Revan, if Zaalbar returned to Kashyyyk. And now... The heart-breaking emotion on Mission's face as she stared at Ordo was plain to see. I didn't know how such a bond had sprung up between sentients so different, but there it was.

I knew the girl cared for me as well. Maybe, just maybe, it was Mission's big heart that might just have her coming out whole on the other side of all this mess.

"I'd take you with me, ad'ika, if I wasn't going back to the clans," Ordo said gruffly. "But I am. Onasi can give you a home, and even I'll admit he's an alright sort."

Mission breathed out hard through her nose, a mulish expression slowly forming on her young face. "Sheesh, Canderous, don't get all soppy on me. 'Sides, I'd make an awesome Mandalorian."

Something eased in my heart, to see that faint spark of her cheek bubble back to the surface. Ordo barked a laugh, leaning back, the side of his wide mouth twitching. "Yeah, well, just because you would, ad’ika, doesn't mean you should."

"Maybe." Mission shrugged, darting a look sideways at me. "Thanks, Carth. It means a lot to me that you'd offer. I'll- I'll think about it, okay?"

"Okay." I cleared my throat, looking away from her to scan around the room. My gaze dropped on Ordo's dirt-encrusted boots, which had started to leave tracks of grime on the far end of the table. "I suppose the only thing I have left to report is that Admiral Dodonna has signed ownership of the Ebon Hawk over to me."

Ordo choked in surprise, and I felt the beginnings of a grin as I took in his expression of disbelief. "So, Ordo, get your damn boots off my table."

xXx

Yuthura Ban:

Hyperspace, approaching Nar Shaddaa

The seventh galactic media-stream I switched to headlined the same bulletin.

Lord Malak is dead. The Sith Empire has fallen.

I leaned forward to turn off the console, and tried to pretend my hands were not shaking.

A true Sith knew how to grasp opportunity. As long as one survived, the ashes of defeat were nothing more than a setback. A chance, for the clever and the strong, to strive for a future victory.

But I was not a true Sith anymore. I wasn't entirely sure I ever had been.

Should I rejoice, at our liberation? No longer need I keep an eye at our back in case of Lord Malak's wrath. Or do I grieve instead, at the deaths of those once on my side?

I did not know what to feel. As momentous as the news was, I had a more personal matter concerning me. Surprisingly, even the Lord of the Sith's downfall did not supersede that for importance.

I rose silently, before striding from our shuttle's cargo hold and slipping into the sole living quarters. The room stank of sweat, undercut with the faint tang of something sweet I did not immediately recognize.

I frowned. "Mekel. Wake up."

The naked man sprawled on the bed face-down did not move. My fingers twitched, and a tight rope of Force lashed out, licking against his back.

His howl was loud, immediate, and vaguely satisfying. "Frakk!" he yelled, twisting around to jack-knife into a seated position. "Yuthura, what the actual frakk?"

Mekel's jet-black hair was rumpled and messy, and his jaw shadowed with bristle. One of the things I liked least about Humans were their overactive follicle glands. Mekel had never dared to forego daily presentation back on Korriban.

"Get dressed," I snapped. "You should have been awake hours ago."

He slumped to the side instead, glaring at me balefully. His forehead glistened, his shoulders sagged, and his blue eyes were glassy and unfocused-
"Are you ill?" I was striding forward already, at his side, raising a hand to touch his brow. Through the Force, I could sense his heartbeat racing unevenly. "What is wrong with you?"

"Is that a frakking joke?" Mekel twitched away, and once more I smelled that sickly aroma. Like candied vox cut through with kolto. "Because it's about as funny as a fart in a flight suit."

He may have had reason to snap at that comment, but I could recognize a diversion when I heard one. "You didn't," I said, hearing my voice ice over. Mekel rolled away from me, but even when he had the Force his speed could never match mine.

I leaped forward, throwing him back against the hard mattress and pinning him down by his shoulders. I knew that scent now, and my heart churned with a blend of distaste and despair.

Dark blue eyes glared up at me, the pupils abnormally large. "You know, there's better ways to wake me up."

"Glitterstim." I said flatly. His biceps tensed beneath my palms. "You imbecile."

Mekel's eyes dropped closed as he sagged back into the bedding. "Nothing else was bleeding working, was it?" he muttered. "Days of you rifling through my frakking mind."

"Shavit, Mekel, have I taught you nothing of patience?"

It had been easy to ignore the vast chasm of years between us, back on the Academy. Survival and strength ruled there, and no one blinked twice at the chosen lover of a Sith Master, even if he was two decades younger and a different species to boot.

But things... things were different between us, now.

Even before Mekel had lost the Force, our relationship had been changing. The structure of master and apprentice had shifted the moment we left Korriban. Now, at times, it felt like we were little more than companions forced together by circumstance.

"I only took half a derm. Look- maybe I am sick." He scowled, shifting beneath me, and with a cut-off sigh I moved away from him. "There are some diseases that eat the Force out of you, right?"

"Not without additional symptoms." We had already spoken of this. I had no explanation for Mekel's sudden collapse in a cantina, nor why his power had been completely gutted when he awoke. All I knew was what my senses told me: the Force flickered in him as muted and weak as any other null in the galaxy.

"Spice enhances the mind, Yuthura. It's not a frakking bad idea, not really."

"Lord Malak is dead." Sometimes, with Mekel, the best approach was to cut straight through his banthacrap. "The Sith Empire is no more."

"Wha-" Mekel blinked, his jaw going slack. He sat upright again, his gaze roaming my face. "You're serious. Tits on a bantha, you're actually serious."

"I am," I said in a low voice. "Mekel, there is one avenue of assistance that we could... consider."

"Frakk," he muttered, barely hearing me. "Never thought I'd see the bleeding day. Dead! Who skewered the bast- wait, wait, Dee, have you heard anything of Dee-"

"Alive." My voice tightened. I had never thought overly much of that boy, but it certainly seemed the entire galaxy did now, if the holonet headlines were anything to go by. "And on Coruscant, apparently."

A dead woman whispered in my mind- I nudged Thalia towards Coruscant. It's a valid option- Mekel's gaze was still clouded over, but his forehead bunched in thought. "We're, what? Fifteen days out from the Core?"

"We shall reach Nar Shaddaa in less than one sleep cycle. A jump to Coruscant from there is another sixteen. We may catch Dustil if we travel immediately, Mekel."

If there was one sent who might draw Mekel, it was Uthar's old bootlicker. Whether Dustil was still on the planet when we arrived mattered little; for by then, we'd be close enough to a hive of Jedi that I could strong-arm Mekel there if I needed to.

"You're don't give a womp rat's arse about Dee." Mekel's eyes had narrowed. At times, I forgot he was quicker than he let on. "Coruscant means the bloody Jedi. Frakk, Yuthura, you'd risk going to them?"

"This is a Force-related matter, Mekel. We require a Force expert's prognosis. According to the holonews, there are no Dark Jedi of note still alive to consult." But even if there were, trusting a fellow Sith with the well-being of my lover was a hard ask. "That leaves us with the Jedi Order. You know my opinion on them, but I do consider that pack of antiquated cowards a step up from resorting to glitterstim."

Mekel snorted, swinging his legs over the edge of the bed, before turning back to pin me with a look. "Maybe they're a better choice. Doubt they'll be as much fun, though."

I felt my lips pursing. "Get up," I ordered again, before turning my back on him and standing up from the bed. "If we are going to face the Jedi on Coruscant, we need to research exactly what sort of situation we shall be walking into."

I left the room, feeling Mekel's hard stare boring into my back. I'd never asked his opinion on whether we should approach the Jedi, for my own mind had always been firmly fixed against the Order.

Until Mekel had lost the most important part of himself.

I do not trust the Jedi Order. I do not like the Jedi Order. But I would be a blind fool not to admit they might have something to offer Mekel... and perhaps to me, as well.

Twice, that notorious Jen Sahara had tried to coerce me toward Coruscant and the Jedi. It seemed oddly ironic that – now the holonets proclaimed her dead – I would finally end up travelling there.

xXx

Kavar Kira: Stadium of Triumph, Galactic City, Coruscant

Bright banners of celebration snapped in the breeze, slashes of colour that demarcated the grey sides of scrapers bordering the massive stadium. The air glinted with hundreds of hovering mediacams, and buzzed with the thousands of sentients all gathered together in one place.

"...my pleasure to present the highest honour the Republic can bestow..."
At the far end of the Stadium of Triumph, a raised dais was bedecked in Republic orange-and-black. Senate dignitaries stood there addressing the crowd and proudly presenting the champions of the Republic, the heroes of the Star Forge – the survivors of Revan Freeflight's last gasp at atonement.

"...to the farthest reaches of the Outer Rim, you will be known as the saviours of..."

I could barely make out the faces of the Republic's new heroes, but the amplified voice of Senator Akku rolled crisp and clear over the crowds who had been admitted to view the medal ceremony in person.

Billions more, I knew, would be watching it streamed live on their holo-screens.

I repressed a sigh, quelling the urge to move restlessly on my feet. The Jedi Order's position so far from the front was yet another sign of our falling favour. The decline of our influence sat heavy in my soul, sharp with recrimination, all the worse because there seemed no obvious way to halt or reverse it.

"A Jedi is more than the Order, Kavar," Zez-Kai murmured.

I slanted a look sideways at my old friend. Worry had etched deep lines into his brow, but Zez-Kai Ell stood firm, facing the dais solemnly, clad in neat brown robes and exuding the air of a Jedi Master at peace with the galaxy.

He had always been more proficient than me at pretending.

"Atris is doing what she can to preserve our status," I admitted grudgingly.

That was enough to startle Zez, and maybe that was why I'd said it. My old friend's composure slipped, his mouth dropping slightly ajar as he turned to stare at me in disbelief. He cleared his throat. "That is... very charitable of you, Kavar."

"I'm trying," I muttered, turning back to face the front.

I was. Atris had been an idiot for releasing the news of Revan to the Senate the way she had, particularly without any input from the High Council, but she remained our only link to the inner circle of government, the only Jedi Master still allowed within the sanctum of the Senate's debating chambers.

Much as it galled me, I knew it was pointless to do anything other than support her efforts.

Currently, Master Atris Surik was standing still on the dais, dressed up in her usual frigid finery, tight-faced and expressionless. Atris was there to accept the Cross of Glory on behalf of the fallen members of our Order, as the chosen Jedi representative to the Senate.

Of course, we hadn't been the ones to actually appoint our own damn representative.

"Atris will be angling for Grandmaster, soon." The moment the comment left my lips I almost winced at how childish it sounded – regardless of the inherent truth in the statement. Grandmasters were scarce, and limited to no more than one per Enclave. Coruscant had been without a grandmaster since the close of the Mandalorian Wars.

"The Senate may have recommended her ascension," Zez admitted, and I fought to rein in an instinctual scowl at his confession. Zez-Kai had always played peacemaker between us, and I knew Atris responded well to his graciousness. "But remember, Kavar, that while the Senate may select our ambassador, only the High Council can appoint a grandmaster."

There was a note of reproach in his words, and grudgingly I could admit the remark had been beneath me. Grandmaster or not, Atris still held to the doctrines of the Order – in her own skewed, blinkered way.

"Speaking of grandmasters," I murmured, eyeing over the Republic brass and senate politicians flanking the heroes on the ceremonial platform. "Vandar is conspicuous with his absence."

"Hmm," Zez hummed, his gaze shifting to a nearby holo-board that had zoomed in on the faces of the Ebon Hawk crew. I could see a blue-skinned Twi'lek – no more than a girl, really – stare sullenly at the crowd before a Human boy whispered in her ear and brought a quick grin to her face. "The given story is that Master Vandar departed for Dantooine to ensure Master Vrook made a full recovery. I suspect we shall hear more at the next High Council meeting."

There was something in Zez's tone... a lilt of curiosity, perhaps, that led me to believe my old friend knew more than he was letting on.

I frowned. "Vrook would have been just as well taken care of on a Republic dreadnought." My gaze drew back to Zez, and he turned to face me, almost unwittingly. I could feel my eyes narrowing. "Zez, what have you heard?"

The corner of his mouth twitched, and I knew then that Zez had always planned to divulge whatever nugget of information he was about to slip forth. "Senator Akku informed Atris in no uncertain terms that the Jedi Order are not permitted to harbour or exonerate war criminals from Republic justice. The Dantooine enclave was specifically mentioned. Apparently, there is suspicion amongst the Republic brass – Admiral Dodonna, to be precise – that Vandar's hasty departure may have had to do with one of his old padawans."

I felt my breath escape me in a rush. The Republic had released one official transcript of the Star Forge mission thus far, and it had openly described the late involvement of Yudan Rosh on our side – while also making it abundantly clear that a last-minute change of heart could hardly undo the damage he had inflicted beneath the banners of both Revan and Malak.

But the party-line was that Yudan Rosh had met his death onboard the Star Forge.

Zez met my gaze carefully. "Vandar would have sensed the death of his old padawan. If it's true... if Yudan Rosh really found the strength to turn back to the light and still lives... he will not find the Dantooine Enclave the haven it once was."

I could feel my eyes narrowing, as I glanced back to the holo-board. The stuffy senator was stretching high on his toes in an awkward attempt to dangle a medal around the neck of an armoured man who refused to bend. "You think there will be eyes on Dantooine soil," I murmured.

Zez didn't answer. He didn't have to.

The Jedi Order had always been a sanctuary for the lost, but there was no denying our power to offer that sanctuary had been doomed by generations of Jedi-trained villains.

I cleared my throat as the senator stepped away from the mercenary. "Pay attention," I muttered, more to distract myself than anything else. "Atris is about to receive her medals."

"...recognition of her service to the Republic and acts of selfless heroism to safeguard the galaxy from the Sith Empire, the Jedi Order has agreed to posthumously promote Jedi Bastila Shan to the full rank of Jedi Knight..."
The holo-board focused on Atris as she accepted a beribboned box enclosing the medal awarded in the name of Bastila Shan. Atris kept her expression impassive, but there was a pinched look about her eyes as the crowd cheered and the senator retrieved a second box.

"Atris is holding up well," Zez commented, voice ebbing back into neutrality, as he folded his hands neatly into the front of his robes. "This cannot be easy for her either."

"...Padawan Jen Sahara, the apprentice of Jedi Knight Bastila Shan..."

"Oh, no, Zez, you are not going to ruin my only enjoyment today with a surge of sympathy for Atris Surik," I drawled. Zez glanced at me quizzically, but I kept my eyes fixed on the stern countenance of Atris as she stepped forward to collect the second medal.

"Whatever do you mean?"

Was it my imagination, or was there a flash of banked fury in Atris' silver eyes? Did her mouth thin with displeasure, or her fists clench tight around the farcical honour bestowed upon the alias of a dead villain?

"The sight of Atris, accepting a medal on behalf of Revan Freeflight," I clarified, trying not to chortle. "Do you think she'll throw it into the nearest trash compactor?"

"Honestly, Kavar-"

"Come on, Zez, better to laugh at the black irony than choke on it." I could feel my lips twitching. Damn, but it was going to be hard not to throw this moment back in Atris' face. "Can you imagine if she'd been forced to say a eulogy as well? Padawan Jen Sahara, innocent victim of Darth Malak's tyranny."

"Kavar!" Zez's rebuke was lost in the crowd's cheer, as Senator Akku moved on to honour Captain Carth Onasi – the man the Republic spin was labelling as the leader of the Star Forge mission, as they completely ignored that this had been a Jedi-led mission from the outset.

Yes, but one that wasn't sanctioned by the High Council. Yet another adventure that Dantooine spearheaded on their own, without a care for the consequences.

Just like that, my mirth vanished. A great sigh escaped me, and suddenly I felt weighted down with the reality of the times we lived in. I'd blamed Revan for that, once. Now, I simply wondered if we'd done it to ourselves.

"The Jedi Order is dying a quiet death, Zez."

Zez-Kai might believe we were more than the Order, but without the Order, without the ability to advise the Senate and safeguard the Republic, what would we become?

Safeguard the Republic... and that is exactly what Revan Freeflight pledged when she stormed off to join the Mandalorian Wars.

While we sat back, dabbled in political intrigue, and kept ourselves safe.

"Today is a victory, Kavar," Zez murmured, nudging me gently. "For the Jedi Order as well as the Republic. Look to the crowd. They are celebrating Bastila Shan out there."

"Yes, the masses will honour Bastila Shan and her padawan Jen Sahara," I said, not liking how dark my voice suddenly sounded. "They're doing that because Bastila is marketable, Zez – because Bastila is dead.”

I could feel the heavy weight of his gaze on me again. "Knight Juhani is not, Kavar."

"But she's not the shining star, is she?" I snorted, raising an eyebrow at my old friend. Around us, the crowd erupted into roaring cheers as the captain finally received his medal along with a public promotion up the ranks. "The official transcript barely even mentions the only Jedi left standing after the Star Forge fell."

"Kavar." Zez held my gaze calmly, as if it were his turn to comfort me. On my other side, Master Vash began politely applauding along with the rest of the Jedi contingent. "This is not the end. You know that. There is no end."

My friend was right. Again, again, Zez always seemed to embody more wisdom and acceptance than I had ever managed to. I sighed, bowing my head, repeating his words silently to myself.

"And, so, we keep faith in the Force," I said at last, before making a belated effort to join in the round of applause. For all of my discontent, I knew the survivors of the Ebon Hawk more than deserved the honours of today.

"Faith, yes. We stay true to the light, and shine a candle in the darkness," Zez added, also bringing his hands together. "And, perhaps, actually work with the Senate in good faith and transparency for once."

If they will let us, Zez. I pasted on a smile, turned back to the front, and clapped louder. If they will let us now.

xXx

Yudan Rosh:

Ancient grove, Wildlands, Dantooine

Rays of early morning sun whispered through the fronds of blba trees, warming the cracked flagstones and half-metre pillars that marked this place with the echoes of a people long gone.

I recalled, clearly, stumbling across this ancient grove in my youth. Renni grass grew thick through the topsoil even then, strangling the ferracrete flagstones as nature strove to reclaim her territory. The farmlands of civilization were well back to the west; here, the wild reigned supreme. Flying brith, flocks of iriaz, and horned kath hounds roamed the land. No sentients would discover my presence in this grove unless they were actively hunting me down.

The Force hummed gently, deep within the earth, resplendent and golden through flora and fauna alike in a symbiosis of balance that was more soothing than I would readily admit. My first twelve years may have been spent navigating the throes of politics on Ryloth, but I would always consider Dantooine as the heart of my childhood.

That was before Coruscant. Before the Wars. Before... before everything.

The shadow of her death rose sharp again, armed with claws of grief that tore into my own sense of self. Our conversation on Lehon mocked me: I could still see that deserted shoreline bathed in a pre-dawn glow that had kissed her face and glinted against the green of her eyes, as I had sworn that my next steps – should we survive the Star Forge – would be my own, and not hers.

Perhaps I had expected the both of us to die. Or merely myself, in one last dramatic exposition of faith – taking a bullet or a blade meant for her, so she could carry on to do what she had to.
I had not, in any of my internal monologues, thought on a life where I existed and Revan did not.

Her downfall was different, this time. Worse, in a way. The dark had shackled me after Deralia, imprisoned me in a boreal cage of hatred and corruption that allowed me to ignore my despair over her first death. Now, I no longer had the means to escape from grief, but neither did I know how to accept it.

I felt like damning Revan for illuminating the path back to reason and then abandoning me to a galaxy she was no longer a part of.

Revan. I vowed I would not follow in your shadow again... but I was to prove that while you still lived!

That the Star Forge was destroyed and Malak overturned afforded me only the vaguest sense of comfort. Revan had accomplished her end game – and I was glad of that – but I simply could not count this outcome as a victory when it had resulted in her sacrifice.

For Revan had been the centre of my life for too long.

My pupil, my friend, my hero, my master... and something deeper, in those final, twisted days before she fell to the twin threats of Malak Devari and Bastila Shan. There's more, isn't there? Between us? She had asked that on Lehon, curious and ignorant, probing into a dangerous section of our past that had been tempting to reveal to her.

In the end, I was glad I had not.

The dark-edged passion of those few weeks still haunted my dreams, at times, but I preferred to think of her as the driven, reckless hero who had blazed a trail through the galaxy. Or perhaps, something even greater – the re-forged warrior who had kept fighting, despite every stumble, in order to repair the disaster of her past.

Revan had been the Force's own luck embodied, and the Force had loved her... I had loved her. A large part of me, I knew, always would.

A bit on the tragic side there, Yudan, her voice teased in my head. I felt my jaw tense as another wave of emotion threatened to submerge me. Something flickered in the Force nearby, and I stilled, glad of the distraction, allowing instinct to master my thoughts and caution to bring me to my feet.

I turned, looking out to the wild vista beyond the outcrop of overgrown blba trees and crumbling ferracrete. I could recognize my old master's presence in the Force well before his short figure became visible in the distance.

Vandar Tokare could move fast, when he desired to. Today, however, was not one of those times.

"Vandar," I greeted, a good ten minutes later, after he had stopped to examine just about every flowering shrub he wandered past.

The short grandmaster leaned against his knobbed walking stick, tufted ears twitching at the chirrup of an iriaz roaming nearby. "Dangerous, here, life can be," he mused. "But there is also a grounding simplicity, hmm?"

I cocked my head in silent acknowledgement. Vandar's meandering would hardly dovetail me into impatience – he had taught me too well for that – but neither was I interested in gallivanting down irrelevant conversational detours. "Have you come to entice me back to the Enclave again?"
Vandar had tried, some days ago, the first time he had tracked me down. I had not been ready for our reunion, for all that I had left my cursed snubfighter behind in Khoonda township to travel to a remote location only Vandar Tokare would associate with me.

The little green Jedi master did not reply. His eyes, wide and blue, held mine sadly, as he answered my question with silence.

"You have not," I said slowly, wonderingly. "But why..."

My voice ebbed away as my thoughts raced. The High Council must know of my survival. I was last a Coruscanti Jedi, no doubt they would demand... demand what? My deportation? But Dantooine had always found the backbone to refuse Coruscant when they desired. The skeins of corruption fading from my skin spoke a truth that called to the Jedi here – Jedi, who prided themselves on judging a sentient for what they were now, not what they had once done. Many would not call it justice – I understood that; my jaded soul even agreed – but the likes of Grandmaster Vandar Tokare looked at justice from a difficult angle, and it was near impossible to think of a champion with more clout than him.

"The Republic," I whispered, suddenly encumbered with a deep exhaustion as I thought I understood. "They know – or suspect – of my survival."

I had once told Revan the Jedi Order would offer her a safe harbour, if they could.

If they could.

"Hmph," Vandar muttered, hobbling over to the nearest blba tree and poking at it with his stick. "Not very subtle, was your shiny black ship. Already uniforms it has, nosing about it."

"I confess to not exactly thinking matters through when I landed," I said, somewhat drily. "I did have a few things on my mind, you see."

"Hah! Always one for thinking too much, you were!" Vandar turned back, peering at me sharply. "Your eyes are clear," he commented, creaky voice sharp with satisfaction.

I looked away. "Perhaps if I am not discovered on Dantooine, the galaxy will believe I jumped ship and flew off-planet." There was a sound reasoning to that logic. If – or when – I left Dantooine, I would not do so in such a distinctive vessel.

"The activation passphrase is 'nexus'," I added, staring blindly into the cerulean Dantooine sky. "You should find a way to slip that to the Republic, or better yet, leave the cockpit open for their scouts to stumble across. Let the Rakatan technology act as a feeble gift of my atonement rather than the snub be relegated to a Khoonda scrap-heap."

Vandar shot me a long look that, if coming from any other sentient, would no doubt be accompanied with an exasperated eye-roll.

"Ill befits you, melodrama does," he muttered, turning back to his tree. Thin threads of gentle Force traced from his hand, curling slowly into the dry bark. "Many times I have said as such, but listen, will you?"

I sighed, my gaze tracking the trajectory of a brith as it flapped its large mammalian wings in the sky. "There are eyes on the Enclave," I said in a voice that dared him to disagree. "That is why you do not wish me to return."

Vandar hummed, leaning his forehead against the trunk of the blba. He had always spent his time communing with nature, from the largest of creatures to the smallest of plant-life. For a sentient who so treasured life, I had never understood how he could have sat back from the Wars the way he did.

They fear the Dark Side, Revan had once told me, a lifetime ago. They fear what would happen if they fall. The casualties of Exar Kun's war are not just those who died, but also those who lived through it and survived.

"Time heals wounds and settles tempers," Vandar murmured, still not turning around. Through the Force, I could sense the placid, ancient life of the blba shine just that little more brightly. "Today, I can say with truth that the Dantooine Enclave does not harbour Yudan Rosh. But your home, the Enclave remains. Allow time to pass, and a sanctuary it will once more be for you."

Perhaps. I did not have the same faith as Vandar in the galaxy's forgiveness or the Jedi's power to shelter the likes of me, but he could be right. The bigger question, however, was whether I even desired Vandar's promised sanctuary.

Vandar patted the tree, pulled back, and swivelled around to peer at me again. "Stay," he beseeched. I did not think Vandar would intrude upon my mind unwanted, but it was nonetheless uncanny the way he still picked up on my thoughts. "Hold you here, I cannot. Resourceful enough you are to find passage from Dantooine. But a true Jedi, once more, you remain, no matter the doubt in your heart. So stay, my old padawan."

I paused, breaking away from his gaze. "What is truly here for me, Vandar?"

I could not bring myself to use the honorific he deserved. It seemed – hypocritical, perhaps, to speak the Jedi titles I had once respected and later scorned.

"Peace," Vandar returned simply. "Faith. The Force. The Order, if you will permit yourself the patience required."

Peace... peace meant acceptance, and I did not know if I could ever accept Revan's death. And while the planet of Dantooine was a balm to my grieving soul, I was uncertain if the same was true for the Jedi Order.

After all, I had not entirely held to their doctrines even before I had left Coruscant. There is always Ordo's offer. His words lingered in my mind, as unexpected as they were tempting. An offer of clan from a warrior I respected, to a life that would be rewarding in a simpler way than mine had ever been. It could be a good life.

I had not discounted it, yet. But I also felt like I owed Vandar something. Whether that something was a few months of my life or a return to the Jedi, I simply did not know.

"I will stay for awhile," I said slowly. Living in the wildlands on Dantooine was not a particularly onerous task for one such as I. My skills were more than a match for any predator, and I hardly lacked the means to gather or hunt any sustenance I required. "I will stay until I figure out where my path lies. And that is something only I can decide, Vandar."

"All I can hope for, that is." Vandar hummed under his breath and hobbled closer. "News of the outside world, there is. Those you befriended are honoured with medals and glory."

"Good," I said vaguely. In truth, I had known Revan's followers little, but the old man from Kashyyyk and Canderous Ordo were two I found myself holding in high esteem. Regardless, the entire crew more than deserved their moment of victory even as I doubted it would dent the
It surprised me, at that moment, to find myself hoping Revan's soldier would find some measure of peace. Revan's death was a boulder crushing my spirit, and I had seen first-hand how he – how all of her crew – had loved her.

They loved the Wookiee, too. And Bastila Shan.

I glanced sharply back to Vandar. "How is Vrook holding up?"

Vandar moved to stand next to me, tipping his wrinkled head up to stare into the sky. "Ill-tempered. Heart-broken. Understand, I do, that you met his padawan?"

"Briefly." Bastila Shan had joined the Dantooine Enclave as a young girl, perhaps a year before my transfer to Coruscant. I only had the vaguest recollection of a quiet slip of a thing trailing after Dantooine's most acerbic master. The memory did not mesh at all with the fallen and passionate woman I had encountered on the Star Forge.

My eyes narrowed as that scene replayed itself in my mind. "Vrook... Vrook would not have known what happened after he fell. He was the catalyst for Bastila's return, did you realize that?"

Vandar stilled but said nothing as his bright blue eyes fixed on mine.

"Revan could not reach her, Vandar." I would not – I refused to divulge Revan's brief stumble into the dark. And the matters of the Unknown Regions that had so driven Bastila Shan could be discussed another time. "It was the Wookiee Zaalbar who made Bastila truly see Vrook's sacrifice on a personal level. If Vrook had not come for Bastila, matters would have played out differently."

Revan would have returned to herself, regardless. I would not believe anything else. But Bastila Shan, I suspected, might have met a darker end.

"Interesting, that the Wookiee played such a part," Vandar murmured. His comment surprised me, but perhaps it should not have – I had seen, over the years, how Force-users of all alignment tended to focus on those with power, and forget how even a pawn could win or lose a game. "Relay your words to Vrook, I shall."

"I was not there at her end," I said, hearing my voice ice over. No, instead I had been gallivanting through the Star Forge in order to rescue Revan's soldier. Would it have made a difference, had I refused Bastila's request and stayed to guard her, as Revan had ordered?

I did not know what happened, only that Revan and Bastila had fallen together as Revan said they would. Malak must have cut Revan down – but then why had the Wookiee died?

If Malak – my once-friend, my adversary, the man I had briefly bent knee to – had found his way to the meditation chamber and caused Revan's death by killing her bond-mate after I left, then I did not think I would ever forgive myself.

It was a disquieting, bitter thing, to realize I would have to live with the lingering suspicion that I might have had the chance to save Revan and Bastila both-

At the cost of Carth Onasi and his son. The death of Revan's soldier may have been the final push to send Revan permanently into the dark, and that is why I went.

I took a deep breath, and attempted to force the melancholy down. "If you send Vrook here, Vandar, then I will speak with him. I cannot promise our words will be harmonious, however."
Vandar's snort was loud and irreverent. "Do you both good, a battle of words might. Trust you, I shall, not to let the words cut deep. Vrook grieves the same as you."

I nodded. Vandar snorted again, before thumping his stick on the ground. "A gift for you, I have," he said abruptly, before shrugging off a small rucksack and rummaging around inside. He grunted in satisfaction, retrieving a bundle of cloth that he offered to me with both hands.

I could feel one brow rise in curiosity as my fingers gripped around the soft material. Zhar Lestin's lightsaber still hung on my belt and, other than that, I did not particularly desire any other possessions.

"Well, go on, then!" Vandar prompted, nudging me in the ribs with his gnarled stick.

The worn cloth fell open, and resting in the middle of it was a plain mask of red-and-black, etched with a horizontal slit at eye-level. "The mask from a Mandalorian helm," I said faintly, as Ordo's offer of a future once more rose in my mind. The common soldiers of the Mandalorian offensive all donned similar masks, most made from beskar like this one, but most also etched in clan sigils this one lacked. The distinctive armour of the Mandalorians had marked them as a recognizable sight the galaxy had once feared.

That had been part of the reason Revan had taken up that mask she had- "Revan," I choked, suddenly understanding. My eyes stung. "This is... this is Revan's mask!"

Vandar nodded, looking far too placid and serene for such a moment. "Took it from her ship, I did, when Bastila Shan first brought her to Dantooine."

"Why?" The word came out in a strangled gasp. I looked down blindly, my fingers gripping around the sharp edges of the infamous mask. It had been an anonymous symbol, an icon of hope, the mark of a villain- Suddenly, all my twisted memories of Darth Revan threatened to re-emerge- "Why would you give this to me? Darth Revan is hardly how I wish to remember her!"

"Her journey is what you should remember," Vandar said sharply, poking me with that damned stick again. "That even the darkest of paths can return to the light. Forced Revan into that, perhaps we did, but her choice it was to stay true. You, my old padawan, found the steps to take yourself."

"I-" I did not know what to say. I couldn't drag my eyes away from the ominous piece of beskar now held within my grasp.

"The birth and fall of a hero, that mask has seen," Vandar murmured. "But more important is what happened after that mask was lost."

I felt like I should curse Vandar for the gift. But I said nothing, sinking to my knees in the soft grass instead, still staring at the forged metal that had once covered the face of a woman I had adored.

Vandar sighed, then, and patted me softly on the shoulder. "Return, I must, for a time. Keep your faith in the Force, my old padawan. The Force will lead you home."

I glanced up at him, nodding jerkily, not trusting myself to speak. The little old Jedi smiled in benevolence, and I rather thought he knew what matter of roiling emotion he had just stirred within my soul.

Damn you, Vandar. I cannot bring myself to refuse this 'gift', but nor am I sure if I should hold onto it. Vandar might believe he understood what our lives as Dark Jedi had been – but he did not. Not without having lived it himself.
Shavit, given Revan's amnesia, not even she had fully understood.

My fists clenched tight, and it took a supreme effort of will to calmly wrap the mask back into the worn cloth and put it aside. Vandar had already commenced his meandering trek back to the Enclave, by then. With his pace, I doubted he would be back by sundown.

With a long, deep intake of air, I closed my eyes and tried to relax.

Vandar's parting phrase was an interesting one. Home... he clearly believed that Dantooine and the Jedi Enclave were my home. It had been, a long, long time ago. Now, the planet merely felt like the dull echo of a childhood I had outgrown.

A place to rest and recover, before I moved on.

I had promised myself, back on Lehon, that I would look to my own soul first, that I would not allow Revan to remain the centre of my existence. Yet this was the cruellest way for fate to make that promise a reality. Somehow, everything was just that touch more muted, more dull, with the knowledge that I would never see her again.

Her memory remains in my heart, though. There is no death. I know that. I understand it.

I simply have to find a way to live with it.

---

Meetra Surik:
The Vineyard's Curl, Alateev Colony, Outer Rim Territories

"Another one, Em?" Jorjo asked, motioning to my empty mug.

I smiled at the old Ithorian, giving him a short nod of assent. His droopy eyes crinkled in pleasure – sometimes, I wondered if his greatest joy in life was serving others.

"You're off early, Em," he commented, as he topped the mug up with the smoking green wine peculiar to Alateev. It bore a mild malt flavour, and the alcoholic content was low – despite the drink's rather provocative presentation. Likely the wine's popularity had more to do with appearance than taste, but I had to admit the beverage had grown on me after all these years.

"College had a half day," I explained, leaning back against the high-backed bar stool. "Today's the end of term, Jorjo. Twenty days of freedom for us profs."

Jorjo chuckled. "It always comes around quicker than I expect. Any of your colleagues headed this way?"

I shook my head briefly. "Sorry, Jorjo. There's a fancy do at the Senatori."

Jorjo looked at me silently for a moment, a stare I returned with equal measure. I'd known Jorjo for years, and it was not difficult to read his solemn expression. Sure, Jorjo desired the additional business, but more for my own sake than his. He wanted to see me spending time with my fellow colleagues on a more social level.

Jorjo was a sentimental sort, but he was wasting his time with me.

The Vineyard's Curl was appealing because of its low clientele and relative quiet. The pub was situated down a back alley, closer to the rundown starport than the colony's centre, and that meant Jorjo's customers tended to be anonymous spacers rather than local regulars.

That was how I liked it. My days were already filled with lectures on divergent astronavigation – I'd rather my free time wasn't as well. And I had zero interest in fostering any sort of friendship with my peers.

The past had seen to that. Relationships were for other people.

Jorjo gave a short shake of his flat head before wandering away, absently flicking on the pub's only holo-screen as he wandered past. A news channel – that was unusual for him. Even turning the dratted thing on was unusual for him.

I preferred to ignore the galaxy that had turned its back on me years ago, and was about to move to the far corner of the room, but - despite myself - the words spewing forth from the screen snagged my attention.

::day twenty-six after the Republic's glorious victory in the Lehon sector, and the Sith War has been declared officially at an end. Republic forces have crushed the only remaining offensive in the Mid Rim, taking Sith Admiral Sara into custody and mopping up the fleeing remnants of Darth Malak's once awesome armada. Nearly all hot sectors embroiled in conflict have had emergency states lifted. I am here with the Senate's official correspondent, Ularic Gren, to ask some of the many questions we all have.::

The red haze of blood swam through my vision in a sickening rush. The war... the war is over? My lips felt numb. And the Republic... the Republic actually won?

Despite myself, despite the years of detachment that had shackled me into an existence even I would admit was hollow, the names of those I had once cared for – those few still living in the depths of corruption – rattled through my mind like a useless prayer to a damned deity.

Shar... Yudan... Nisotsa... Malak...

There was a reason I avoided the intergalactic news. Alateev's peculiar religious doctrine frowned on anything bar the most cursory of glances at events beyond our borders, but that had nothing to do with my abstention. No, the truth was nothing more than survival at its most basic.

Once, the well-spring of the Force had sung through my veins, connecting me to all life in the galaxy. Once, I had been unique in my empathy for sensing the emotions of all who surrounded me.

Once upon a time, I had truly lived.

I swallowed against a dry throat, staring blindly at the prettified Twi'leki reporter smirking on the holo-screen. The war is over, I repeated to myself dully. That means... Malak. He must be one with the Force, after all this time.

And Shar, my old apprentice, who spent years denying the parasitic desires of his own species before Revan corrupted him?

Yudan, my noble friend, who followed Revan just as blindly and faithfully as Malak?

I did not wish to know the answers. But I made myself listen, regardless.

::The Sith War is the wrong terminology,:: a suited Cerean drawled in a voice dripping with condescension. ::This conflict is correctly named the Jedi Civil War, and is now at an end.::
::The Jedi Civil War?:: the reporter parroted, one painted brow arching in question. ::But these past four years have been the Sith Empire trying to conquer the Republic!::

Four years. Had Malachor V truly been so long ago? Four empty years, echoing with nothing more than bloodied memories and devastating loss that still hammered at my soul whenever I dropped my guard.

::Yes, the Sith Empire – which was led by fallen Jedi from the Jedi Order,:: the suit shot back in overt disapproval. ::We must never forget their origins when we look upon the calamity and devastation they have wrought.::

The reporter changed tack. ::Can you comment on the rumours that Darth Revan was part of the Republic’s effort to overturn the Sith Empire, dying in the attempt to stop Darth Malak?::

I could feel my face spasm. Certainly, the holonews often came with a ludicrous rumour or two, but I could never quite halt that nauseating lurch whenever I heard Revan’s name.

I could still remember the day the holonews blared out that Malak had killed her. I had hated myself for the unbearable grief that had overtaken me.

The senate representative snorted in disdain. ::Darth Revan died more than a year ago. Jen Sahara was a young Jedi apprentice who aided Captain Onasi and Jedi Knight Shan in their mission. Let’s not sully Padawan Sahara’s death with such a ridiculous rumour, merely because they share the same hair colour.::: The suit – he was a polished Cerean dressed to the nines - shot an imperious glare at the camera. ::The true heroes are the courageous men and women of the Republic, who have risked their lives to stand against the atrocities of the Jedi Thirteen and all those traitors who followed them.:::

I blinked. The Jedi Thirteen? He’s not... he’s not labelling them as Sith? This was the senate's official correspondent. He would have been primed and prepped by politicians for the exact angle to take. There's a schism between the Order and the Senate, I realized with a shiver of foreboding.

I didn’t care. I didn’t! This had nothing to do with me, and I would not let emotions overcome me. I had no emotion left.

The reporter, a heavily painted Twi'leki male, shifted his free hand to a scantily-clad hip. ::We understand that the sole survivor of the Jedi Thirteen, Yudan Rosh, is rumoured to be hiding within the Jedi Enclave of Dantooine. What is the Senate's position on this?::

Yudan... the bottom of my stomach fell out. The sole survivor...

Cariaga had been the first to topple, during the Wars. Back when the Jedi Thirteen had been a name of triumph and hope rather than a curse whispered in the night.

The infamous, damned, fallen Jedi Thirteen.

Oh, how I’d tried to avoid hearing of my friends, as they killed each other one by one. The names, the faces, the people of my past when I had been a different person, a whole person – I vowed I’d left that all behind, but the media reports still found a way to reach my ears eventually, and every death pierced through my detachment with poisoned darts of remembrance.

Talvon, Jexer, Rab.

Jonn, Arran, Alaki.
Revan.

I swallowed convulsively. And, now, Malak and Nisotsa.

The news was wrong, though. I still stood, a brittle husk of the woman I had once been. And Xaset...

We had travelled together, after Malachor, after that excruciatingly painful audience with the Council. Xaset and I had seen so much together. Lost so much. Some days, the only way I could feel anything was by losing myself in the forbidden pleasures of the flesh.

The Jedi had named us both exiles. So what did it matter if we flouted their ethos?

Xaset had been more of a mess than me. I was numb, afloat in a sea of nothingness, ripped away from the matrix of sentient emotion I had always been immersed in. Xaset... Xaset had once been a master healer. What had the pain of so many deaths in the Force done to a being that had always striven to regenerate life?

Malachor tormented us both. It broke me, and it shattered him.

For a time, we only had each other. That might've been enough for me: a grey life where the only shards of colour came from our wild lovemaking. But as the months rolled on, Xaset grew worse. His eyes darkened, his midnight skin paled, and his voice slowly weakened to a dying rasp. Eventually, he left me alone in a spaceport, leaving nothing but a scrawled data-note containing a half-hearted wish for my future happiness.

Even now, years later, I wondered where he was. If he was still alive, still in pain, still, at times, thinking on me as I did him.

We might've had something together. A pale echo of our glory days, of the power of the Force – but something tangible nonetheless.

The holoscreen flickered, a sure sign its energy cells were on the way out. A glower had contorted the suit's face as he glared angrily at the unruffled reporter. ::The Jedi of Dantooine deny his presence, but if Yuden Rosh still lives then he will face trial for his atrocities against the Republic. The Senate will no longer tolerate the Jedi Order seeking clemency for their supposedly-redeemed criminals.::

::But we understand that Yuden Rosh switched sides and proved invaluable, in the end, to the success of Jedi Knight Bastila Shan's secret mission?::

The glower deepened, if that was possible. ::There is so much misinformation in that ridiculous statement. First, let me clarify that this stealth operation was a joint venture between the Jedi Order and Republic HQ – not Jedi Shan's personal endeavour. All of the members of the Ebon Hawk are equally credited with their victory. Do not forget that the pilot, our Navy's own Commodore Onasi, recruited most of the Ebon Hawk's members and commandeered the strategic plan for uncovering and destroying the Star Forge.::

::Okay, okay, but about Yuden Rosh-:::

::Yuden Rosh is a war criminal, and a late change of heart does not magically undo all the monstrosities he oversaw as Darth Malak's Supreme Fleet Commander. As for his actions, we remain sceptical that he had any effect on the outcome in the end. Regardless, this is for the courts to decide. Whatever good Yuden Rosh did will be measured against the bad.::
My heart fluttered wildly in my chest. The scent of death and the screams of thousands echoed in my ears. Memory... cursed memory bubbled to the surface in a blinding panic attack, threatening to break through the numb wall of disengagement I had so painstakingly maintained over the years.

_Breathe. Breathe in, breathe out. Just keep breathing._

The pounding of my heart slowly faded, the sweat dried up, and a maelstrom of thoughts took its place.

_Yudan, my oldest friend... could he really have switched sides? Maybe. Maybe it'd all fallen apart for him when Revan died. He had loved her as deeply as Malak had, for all that he had tried to hide it._

_And Shar... they say nothing of Sharlan. But he must have been captured- or killed- or captured and ready to be killed-_

The Dark Side had rotted through all the people I had once loved. All of them had fallen. All who had dared follow Revan after Malachor.

I had once sworn to the Jedi High Council that, had I not lost the Force, I would not have done the same. But knights did not turn into Sith overnight, and sometimes in my darkest moments, I couldn't help but wonder if the loss of the Force might even have been a blessing.

The suit had stalked away from the camera, and now the Twi'lek was chattering breathlessly into the holo-recorder. ::Stay tuned for a complete profile of all the Ebon Hawk's colourful personalities. Join us live with Life & Style correspondent Juli Starring, who has the scoop on the forbidden and tragic love between Commodore Onasi and Jedi Knight Shan-::

The holo-screen switched off, and my burning eyes slowly closed. I was shaking, I realized dimly.

"Yellow press," Jorjo was muttering next to the deactivated screen. "Holonews kills brain matter.
It's all rubbish designed to turn sents into mindless drones."

I lifted my drink, moving on automatic, and took a large swallow. The cool wine trailed a blister of sensation down my throat, and at that moment it was the only thing I could feel.

But my mind was racing.

_It's time. It's time to move._

Alateev was on the arse-end of a little-used hyperlane, with no known resource planets or supersystems nearby. War had never really touched this place. Even the Mandalorians hadn't bothered.

I had nothing to do with any war, not anymore. The Force had left me, and I had left the galaxy behind, in a desperate bid to shed the stranglehold of my past.

And yet, what sort of life did I have? Teaching bright-eyed sents gave me a vague sense of satisfaction, but I avoided any personal attachment beyond the most fleeting. Stars, Jorjo probably knew me best – and all the old Ithorian really knew was that I had once hailed from the Core.

I couldn't go back. I couldn't. But... living on Alateev was no more than days spent breathing in oxygen to inflate my lungs. Maybe- maybe now that the war was really over- now that whatever Revan had started after Malachor had finally come to a grinding halt- maybe, just maybe, it was time for a change.
A time to find a way to start living again.

xXx

Atton Rand:
Cerilian Detention Centre, Xappyh sector

"Move," the smug guard grunted, one meaty fist shoving hard in the small of my back.

"Okay, okay! Give a guy a chance!" I spluttered in a desperate voice, moving with a calculated stumble, letting the guard see nothing but a beaten, cowed mark caught by the winning side.

Unfortunately, that was exactly what I was.

The interrogation room was one of those pristine white cubicles: nothing more than a footstool gracing the centre, the air thick with cloying sans-spray, and the far wall lined with blaster-proof transparisteel separating me from my newest chum. A surly-faced Quarren, who couldn't even be arsed to look up from his datapad.

"Name and designation?" the sent behind the screen drawled in a bored voice

This isn't the first time I've landed behind bars, I reminded myself. And it probably won't be the last. So time to chin up and spin the right sob story.

I pasted on a conciliatory smile and took a seat, resting my shackled hands limply on my lap. Ole Squid-head still didn't bother to make eye contact.

"Atton Rand, Ensign, strikefighter pilot AE204H4," I replied, rattling off the id-card designation I'd memorized before the capture crew had stripped me clean. My legs stretched out, crossing at the ankles, the durasteel nerve restraint on my left chafing something awful. "Say, cozy place you've got here. Are you my arbiter?"

The Quarren didn't answer. Behind me, the heavy-handed guard barked a scornful laugh. "You're in processing, Sith scum. Arbiters are for those who might actually be innocent."

Processing. Shavit, it'd taken the Republic almost a galactic month just to get me into processing – and I was hardly the last idiot left on their roll. At least I'd divested myself from any high-end weaponry before shooting out from the Forge in a snub that'd been netted before I could blink. Far as the Republic was concerned, I was just another dumb pilot cowed by the scary Dark Jedi. Would've been better if I could've posed as a simple ship mech, but the armour I'd been wearing underneath my flight suit made that a hard sell.

Damn good piece of Echani workmanship, too. I was kriffing pissed the Republic had pinched it. Supposedly it was in storage until my release – hah! – but I knew how these things rolled. Amazing how prisoners' equipment could get 'lost' during years of penitentiary.

Years. It was what the grunts were saying. Years stuck in a detention centre for any sucker picked up from the dying Star Forge, that symbol of Sith power which had so nearly toppled the Republic.

I could wait out months, but shavit! Years was too much to ask.

*I'm free of the slayers, though. They're dead. All karked it, like I knew they would. Better a jailed mark waiting for a chance than a puppet still dancing to the tune of a madman-

I cinched the dangerous thought back. Flicked over a deck of cards in my mind, and kept my passive smile fixed steadily on my face.

The Quarren looked up, finally, his fingers stilling over a keypad behind the glass barrier. Beady black eyes narrowed on me. "Human, Sith strikefighter pilot, two years' service. Odd, you don't look much like your ID-pic."

My easy smile didn't slip. "Years of warfare can be quite aging for my species."

The Quarren's chin tentacles twitched beneath his jaw. "Turn your head-fur brown, did it?"

I remembered the mark I'd rolled before collaring his life story. Chubby guy, fair hair, ugly mug. Same species and gender as me, though, and with the raft of prisoners here I didn't think any admin chump would bother looking at me twice unless I gave them a reason to.

"The missus prefers this colour on me, sir," I clarified, slipping in the honorific in a crass attempt to curry favour. Who knew, could be that the way to soften this rube was to act suitably subservient. "Sir, so many of us were only doing what we had to, to survive. Piloting was the only job I could find to feed the kids, after our farm was bombed--"

"Says here you reported to Squadron Leader Tobias." The Quarren spoke right over me, as if I'd never said a damn word. "Along with the battle of the Star Forge, your squad was also involved in the Lannik conflict and the battle of Mon Gazza. Do you have anything to add or dispute on that accounting?"

Damn Quarren wasn't going to budge on sympathy. But even prisoners had rights- "Shouldn't I be going over this with an assigned arbiter?"

The guard behind me snorted, while the Quarren merely raised one scornful brow-ridge. "Prisoner is uncooperative," he stated to the room at large, before tapping loudly on his console.

"Hey, hey!" I protested, leaning forward. Shavit, this guy isn't going to bend, time play hardball- "Of course I'll cooperate! We're all glad this madness is over, right? But the Republic's charter regarding the legal rights of detainees--"

"Does not apply when the Republic's resources will be tied up for decades in restoration endeavours from the war your lot threw upon us," Squid-head's voice had frosted into ice. "Of course, if you have personal funds to appoint your own arbiter then matters can be arranged with more expedience."

The guy looked smug. Expedience. Suuuure . Even if I did have something squirreled away, giving the keys to this lot would do nothing but seize that something under the guise of reparations, or whatever bollocks the Republic would come out with.

"I thought not," the Quarren said in disgust, just as I realized I'd ballsed-up by hesitating too long. His tiny eyes narrowed, before he jerked his head at the guard behind me. "Take him. We're done here."

I knew when to call it quits. I stood quickly, silently, turning around to face the meathead full of smug as he strode forward with a raised hand and an ugly grin.

"The war is over, Sith scum," the guard drawled, grabbing my arm and pulling me to the exit. "You lost."

Yeah. The war is over. Glory be to the kriffing Republic.
It was time to play it dumb and quiet while I was herded back. Back to my pen, crowded with all the other bantha waiting for the slaughter. Not exactly the sort of escape I'd banked on when I'd ditched my fellow tools.

"You're small fry, Rand," the Quarren called after me, as the door opened and I walked through. "Be glad of that. You might be out before your 'kids' hatch their own spawn."

The guard sniggered, but I kept my silence as he marched me down the utilitarian corridor that led back to the holding cells. It was too soon, I realized. Too soon for any sort of sympathy-play or negotiation regarding my circumstances. The Republic was punch-drunk on the high of victory, and no one here gave a ronto's arse about keeping to the charter of their glorious constitution.

Not yet, maybe. But once the dust settles, sooner or later the media will hone in on us prisoners. Let someone slip news of mistreatment during peacetime, and the heart-strings of the masses will suddenly ring bright. The tide always turns, in the end.

I just had to hope it was a matter of months, and not those kriffing years my bedfellows were bleating about.

The guard stopped at the cell block, taking a moment to unshackle my hands before unceremoniously pushing me inside. The room beyond was the common quarters for my lot; forty or so sents clad in greys, each one emasculated with a nerve restraint rimmed around a limb, ready to be remote-activated if our geolocation shot red on the damn prison's network.

There were other cell-blocks, of course; I didn't know how many, but the guards liked to label us with pet names. We were the Slugs; grey like our jumpsuits, grey like the slop ladled out to us three times a day. Couldn't give the guards any marks for imagination, but if they got their jollies sniggering over verbals, well - it was better than a beating.

The meathead who'd led me back in grabbed another inmate before disappearing, and I was left to make my way to the hole in the wall brimming with lines of half-full bowls. Dinner, and today's flavour was: pureed sludge.

I hated being so directionless, and I was fast running out of ideas on what to try next. Sure, I could be patient if I had a flip-card up my sleeve, but I was surrounded by guards I couldn't charm, walls I couldn't escape, and subdued inmates – most of whom were low-level wingmen who'd only fought to score a pay check. The exact justifications I'd thrown at Squid-head - even if they weren't mine. Just a job. A living. A way to make ends meet.

Right now, the only thing I could think of doing was creating allies on the inside. I had no plan, no glimmer of hope, yet - but laying the groundwork for a future purpose was one way to pass the time. I'd skimmed over the pilots and honed in on the handful of techs already; but they were all button-pushers, admin schmoes, none who had any useful skills outside of a damn command center.

There was a sole engineer who'd come in some days back. Spent weeks in the infirmary, apparently, and hadn't said a word to anyone since arrival. Sure, an engineer might be useful if I ever found my way to a kriffing ship, but the thing was, I just knew the sent's backstory gleamed with about as much truth as my own did.

I could tell a lot about a sent from observation. With the engineer's stance alone, I knew I was dealing with an experienced ground soldier – at the least. Special ops, maybe. Insertion. Intel agent. Shavit, if it hadn't been for the electrolyzed Force tests we'd suffered through on capture, I would've sworn she was something else.
Something highly dangerous, something I had experience in recognizing.

_I came through blind on those kriффing Force tests, though. And apparently I can touch the-

I cinched the thought back in. I hadn't heard that Jedi scow's voice in my head since I'd run from the slayers, and I wasn't going to rouse her ghost now. Maybe it was simply that potential to use the Force didn't show up in the Republic's kriффing drug trial.

Or maybe I'd been told wrong, and I was just another Force-blind null.

I grabbed my dish of slop, and headed to the tables. Either way, the engineer intrigued me, and the one thing I had in this cursed place was time.

I slapped on a smile and strode over to the sent. As I slipped down on the empty bench seat next to her, moss-green eyes glanced over to meet mine.

xXx

Chapter End Notes

_Coming up next: part two of a three(?) chapter arc concluding the tale of the survivors._
Millifar Ordo, daughter of Canderous, belongs to kosiah's 'verse in Memory.
A medal ceremony's worth of thanks to kosiah for the beta.
I wanted to get this chapter out on May the Fourth Day. Didn't quite manage. Revenge of the Fifth will have to do! ;-)
Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes.

Hyperspace VII – part two

Vima Sunrider:
Jedi High Temple, Coruscant

"To recap, the Jedi involved on Dantooine were Grandmaster Vandar Tokare; Masters Galdea, Karon Enova, Nemo, and Vrook Lamar. Knights Ri'thanok Brill, the late Bastila Shan, and yourself. Is there anyone we are missing, Knight Sunrider?"

Lonna Vash's voice echoed throughout the chamber. Dispassionate and neutral, just like her blank gaze as it stared down at me in judgment.

"Knight Ri'thanok did not know the identity of our patient, Master Vash," I replied, willing my voice to hold steady. "His medical expertise was called upon only when required-"

The dismissive snort from Atris Surik broke over my words. "You expect the High Council to believe a Jedi Knight would not recognize a Sith Lord while attending to her?"

"Prudence, child," Lonna interrupted. "Zez, this is not a time to debate ethics-"

"Consent is hardly relevant," Atris scoffed. "Particularly not from one such as-"

"Revan's mind was utterly broken," I cut in, hearing my voice crisp into ice. I had already said as much. They had the transcripts, the medical logs, the data that had not been destroyed in the Enclave's bombardment. This meeting... no, this trial had gone on long enough. "Consent was not possible."
Consent would not have been given, regardless. Who would agree to such a violation of their very self?

But when Revan's consent was balanced against her secrets, secrets that could overturn a war—when her consent was compared to the billions of lives at stake—what other option could we have chosen?

When Bastila Shan intercepted Darth Revan's fragmented dream-memory of the Master Star Map, everything had changed. Master Nemo led an expedition to uncover the map, and returned with news of the Star Forge. We beheld our first glimmer at the heart of Darth Malak's empire—and overnight, the brain-damaged Sith Lord in our grasp became more than just a prisoner we did not know what to do with.

"Knight Sunrider, you informed us in great detail what was done to the mind of Darth Revan after the Dantooine Star Map was discovered," Kavar Kira said, interrupting with musings that uncannily echoed my own. "But that was, what? Weeks after Bastila Shan landed on Dantooine?"

More like months. At my unwilling nod, Kavar continued. "What did Dantooine plan to do with Darth Revan before they found the map?"

"And why," Atris lashed out, her words cracking like a whip, "did they think it necessary—nay, acceptable—to hide it from us?"

"I am not on the Dantooine Council," I retorted. Enough. I had journeyed to Coruscant the moment I received their summons. I had stood before them, answered all their questions, felt the weight of their censure and blame without the guidance of my own masters. Perhaps Coruscant had reason for their grievance with Dantooine, but I did not embody the Enclave. "I was there to diagnose and stabilize the mind of Darth Revan, and later to assist Master Galdea with the psychic rebuild. I was not privy to the early discussions regarding Darth Revan's fate."

I could guess at them, though. Karon argued redemption right to the very end. Galdea had known that wasn't possible—what was left in Darth Revan's mind was nothing but a distorted chasm of grief and darkness. Vrook had wanted to wash Dantooine's hands of Revan altogether—but only after finding a means to extricate his padawan from the Dark Lord's soul.

Vrook and Vandar were the only ones still alive, and they were not even here.

My jaw firmed as I met the gaze of every Jedi Master staring down at me. This inner sanctum of the High Temple was lined with a dozen high-backed chairs, arranged in a ring around the centre—a lowered floor I stood upon alone, with only a ceremonial pillar engraved with runes of the Jedi Code to keep me company.

At least they hadn't summoned the entirety of the council to stare down at me. Four masters was bad enough.

"As a member of the Dantooine Enclave, I answer to Grandmaster Tokare." My voice remained calm. "Are these not questions for him?"

"Every Jedi answers to the High Council, child," Atris snapped, eyes flashing. "And only two masters of Dantooine survived, as a direct ramification of letting Darth Revan loose the way you lot did-"

I flinched.

Galdea perished on the Endar Spire. Karon, cut down by a traitor within our own ranks. Ri'thanok
"Knight Sunrider, you are not here to answer for the Dantooine Council." Zez-Kai’s words were a gentle contrast to Atris' heated invective. "We have additional... reasons to examine your conduct in particular."

I took a deep breath, drawing slightly on the Force, calming my emotions back into serenity. After a second lungful of air, Zez-Kai’s words sharpened into meaning.

Additional... reasons? I frowned. Zez-Kai might claim they weren't judging me for Revan's fate, but they still condemned my actions. I was just a knight, directed by masters-

-but that never stopped Jedi Knight Revan Freeflight. She had the strength to stand for what she believed in, no matter what the masters said, no matter what the High Council decreed. She defied them all publicly.

The masters of Dantooine merely kept their actions hidden.

The thought seemed a betrayal, yet here I was, the only Jedi from Dantooine to stand before the Coruscan't High Council as their sentence was passed upon me. My gaze slid away from them all, landing idly on the pillar.

The side facing me was charred and cracked, with a blackened stripe running directly through the rune of harmony. As if, once upon a time, someone had shoved a lightsaber straight into it-

"We should not even consider approving that missive," Master Atris seethed, and her frosty voice shook with barely-checked anger. My gaze whipped to hers, but she was glaring at the pillar, right at the spot I had been studying. "Knight Sunrider spent her youth gallivanting outside the Order's walls with her mother. Knight Sunrider has had a life of emotional attachment completely at odds with our doctrine-*"

"What?" I snapped, and for the first time, thwarted irritation flurried in my heart. "What, precisely, does my mother have to do with any of this?"

Oh, Atris found any chance to strike out at those she considered imperfect scions of the Jedi Order. I doubted it was personal, as her displeasure found its mark against anyone who showed any modicum of vulnerability, or attachment-

Mother never returned to the Jedi after Ulic's exile. And I only officially joined after her death. Anyone else my age – a woman fully grown – would not have been admitted, but then I was hardly a neophyte apprentice scrabbling for the Force.

My first master had been one of the greatest Jedi of the Order, and my training had started in childhood, well before I ever stepped foot inside an enclave.

My first master: Nomi Sunrider. My beautiful, broken mother.

"You forget yourself, child," Atris clipped. Her blue eyes were pinched at the corners. "The High Council must assess the character of all Jedi within their ranks-"

"Atris-" Kavar began.

"Stay out of this, Kavar!"

"She deserves to know-"
"Know what, exactly?" I demanded, and felt the irritation surge again. "You have heard everything. Dantooine captured Darth Revan. Galdea, Karon and I imprinted the identity of a dead woman into her consciousness, as a means of mining her secrets through Bastila Shan. We allowed Revan a chance at life-"

Atris' anger was visible, now, in the whitening of her face and the clenching of her fists. "And look how well that turned out-"

"And I have nothing further to add!" For once, I allowed my voice to rise over Atris. "Any further questioning should be directed at Grandmaster Tokare. Unless you wish to expound upon your additional reasons, then I am done here."

"Enough." Lonna did not shout, but the Force carried her voice through the room, accompanied by a wave of peace that I almost resented even as my churning emotions relaxed in response. "Knight Sunrider, allow me to elucidate these reasons Zez-Kai refers to. Prior to the operation onboard the Endar Spire, Master Galdea recommended your ascension to the rank of Jedi Master. All Dantooine Council members voted in agreement."

The breath in my lungs whistled out in surprise. My thoughts froze. Whatever I had been expecting... it was not this.

"Considering all that has happened since then," Zez-Kai added gently. "Perhaps you can understand our deliberation. Dantooine is in dire need of Jedi Masters, yes, but this last year cannot have been easy for you."

"You have dabbled in the mind of a Sith Lord. We do not judge you for your actions, but we remain concerned for the effect it has had upon you," Atris added. Her voice had cooled back into a veneer of neutrality. "We cannot overlook your past, either. You joined the Jedi Order as an adult, grieving over the death of your mother and obsessing over the fate of Ulic Qel-Droma."

"Speak to us, Knight Sunrider," Zez-Kai urged. His thick moustache twitched as his warm brown eyes appraised me. "We would know your thoughts on the matter."

"I-" My eyes closed. Jedi Master... I had always known that, one day, this would be my fate, but-

I barely knew what to feel anymore

With a wrench, I opened my eyes and found the words the masters expected. "It is my life's dream to attain the rank of Jedi Master... when the Order deems me ready," I said quietly. "As for Master Surik's comments, she is correct – I was attached to my mother. I loved her dearly. We travelled the galaxy as nomads, but she was always so sad..."

I trailed off into silence, as the web of the past clutched at me with spidery fingers.

My birth father, the dashing Knight Andur Sunrider, had died when I was but a handful of days old. My only paternal figure had come a few years later: Ulic Qel-Droma, that laughing man who had made my mother smile again.

I could count a mere eight cycles of the Coruscanti sun when the Jedi Order exiled him for his crimes. And after he left, I saw my mother break a little more with each passing day.

For the longest time I had hated Ulic for that, with the same passionate zeal as any Republic citizen who would hate a traitor that the Jedi Order had allowed to live.

Love was a many-faceted thing. A placid lake, a blistering wildfire, a tempest that could shake a planet, or a soothing peace to calm the most rebellious of souls. It took my mother's death for me to truly understand that, perhaps, she would have been happier living out her life with Ulic, even exiled and Force-blinded the way he was.

In the end, the greatest tragedy was that Nomi had never realized this herself.

I drew in another breath. The masters seated above me faded into the background, as the remembrance of my mother's heartache resurfaced. "Nomi... Nomi regretted what she did," I whispered. "I believe she would have given the Force back to Ulic, had she only known how."

That admission drew startled gasps from the four, but I barely heard.

Nomi's attack against the fallen Ulic had rendered him a captive prisoner of war to the Republic, and his cooperation thereafter led to the final strike against Exar Kun. Mother was then cemented as a heroine, celebrated throughout the galaxy – but her actions had also broken her, just as surely as they had castrated Ulic-

"I found him, after he turned my sister. After he slew his own brother. I called upon the might of the Force and ripped his connection to it away. I did that which I could never take back, no matter how I tried."

My mother was truly gifted in the Force, despite coming to it so late. And the Force caused her nothing but heartbreak.

"She died of septic lung disease," I said quietly. Sometimes, I wondered if it was a shattered heart finally fading. "After her death, I did everything I could to find out what happened to Ulic Qel-Droma."

My mother had always taken pains to tell me tales of Andur, of their adventures and their humble life together. I collected those stories like precious gems, hoarding them into my treasure chest of memory, taking them out at bedtime to watch the play of light dance around them.

She spoke little of Ulic.

But after her death, those small fragments she let slip came back to haunt me-

-he was quite a pilot, you know. Loved the stars. I gave him his nickname-

-turned his nose up at dejarik. Played this fancy And'zhai rune game instead-

-far more politically astute than myself-

"Your mother never returned to the Jedi Order, Knight Sunrider," Atris intoned in a chilly voice. "Is Ulic Qel-Droma the reason you did?"

My jaw clenched. "The Jedi Order is my life, Master Surik." I did not look away from her cold, cold gaze. "The reason I stayed is what matters, not the reason I joined."

"So, you admit-"

"Ulic's fate influenced my youth, yes, just as my mother's did." I looked away, then, to see the other three staring at me in silence. Waiting for the rest. "I learned that Ulic Qel-Droma had been exiled to Rhen Var. So, when I ascended to knighthood, I travelled there myself."
How could I not? My recollections of Ulic were fleeting, but at times I could still see his smirking grin when my eyes closed. I'd remember his irreverent wit, that inability to take things seriously that drove Mother insane, his passion and his conviction to strive for the good of all-

"The trail was cold," I continued, feeling my eyes sting. "I found no sign of him, nothing but a barren rock. If Ulic Qel-Droma had been on that deserted planet once, he either met a lonely end or moved on."

The silence that followed my words was thick and heavy in the air.

I stood, still as the night, my arms folded in the front of my robes. I didn't truly believe the High Council wanted to hear of Nomi Sunrider... no, no, this was all about my suitability for masterhood. Such a rank was not rashly granted and, given Dantooine's current disgrace, perhaps I could understand why the High Council sought to ferret out my vulnerabilities.

"Singular attachment is dangerous to those who wield the Force," I said softly, lifting my chin. "It took me some time amongst the Jedi to understand that, and even more time to find peace within my own heart. I treasure the memory of my mother, but I have long since accepted her death, and sought only to live by the wisdom of our code."

"And what of Ulic?" Lonna asked, shifting slightly in her chair. There was a flash of scarlet beneath her humble robes, as if the impassive master hid a colourful life behind the drab brown that cloaked us all. "You never found the closure you desired."

"I did," I countered. "I found closure within the Force. The galaxy is full of mysteries, and some mysteries are to be accepted rather than solved."

I was not lying. Inner peace had come with years training at Master Galdea's side. Slowly, my yearning to know of Ulic's fate dispersed into the Force. The past was done, and I had learned better than to wonder over secrets that were not mine to unravel.

Mother had died peacefully. Ulic, I could only hope, had done the same. As for myself, I had learned to forsake attachments, past and present, and focus on my own future.

Only one person had ever disrupted that focus-

"And what of Revan?" Atris clipped out.

"What?" I twitched, blinking, suddenly fearful that Atris had penetrated deep into my thoughts. "What- what do you mean?"

The frosty master remained expressionless. "As I said earlier, child, you have knowingly entered the psyche of a Sith Lord. That must have impacted you on some level."

The slightest current of relief shimmered through me. Atris had not intercepted anything.

"The Dantooine Council would not have undertaken such action lightly," Lonna added. "There must have been hesitation regarding not only the feasibility of an artificial mind-rebuild, but also the ethical dubiety. What of you, Knight Sunrider? Where do you stand on the matter?"

Lonna's question was harder to answer, so I faced Atris first. "I do not believe rebuilding Revan's mind had any lasting effect on me, Master Surik, other than empathy for a fallen Jedi Knight. Master Galdea's psychic shielding protected me while we worked. The only Jedi affected by Darth Revan's... corruption, was Bastila Shan, and perhaps that was inescapable due to the bond that bound them together."
There was no response from the masters, and Lonna was still staring at me, waiting for me to respond. I could feel a sigh welling up from my lungs. "Do I doubt our actions? In truth, no. The plan succeeded." I had to keep reminding myself of that. "In the end, Revan led the Republic to the Star Forge, cleaned up her mess, and may have even redeemed herself along the way."

I could have laid credits on Atris' answering snort of derision, but I kept my gaze fixed on Lonna, as my mind eased back into a pool of acceptance and faith. Lonna was the true strength of the High Council, and her judgment would guide the others.

After a full minute of silence, Lonna's head finally dipped in a nod of acceptance. "Very well," she said. "I would like you to stay on Coruscant and confer with us for a few days, at least, before you return to Dantooine, Master Sunrider."

"I am in agreement," Zez-Kai added. "It is good to have you with us, Master Sunrider."

My eyelids fluttered closed. There should have been... something, something warm and golden, growing in my heart. Yet all that flashed through my mind was the helpless body of Darth Revan trapped in a kolto tank.

Perhaps to myself I could admit a small kernel of doubt resided in my soul. I left Dantooine after Darth Revan became Jen Sahara. I did not join Galdea on the Endar Spire. But even as I walked the galaxy, away from what we had done to Revan, doubt still trickled in to haunt me.

"You're one of us now, Master Sunrider," Kavar chortled. "Better find your grumpy voice to keep the younglings in check."

"Thank you," I managed, forcing my eyes back open to stare at the only one who hadn't spoken. Atris' mouth was pursed with displeasure. Acceptance from the High Council was generally a formality – enclaves had the clout to raise their own masters.

Usually.

"Master Sunrider," Atris forced at last, her pale lips barely moving. "This is a weighty responsibility for one so young. Ensure that you always seek guidance from our doctrine. As Jedi Masters we are looked upon as a source of wisdom and humility, of counsel and acceptance. But not even a Jedi Master is immune to the lure of the Dark Side."

"Ever the downer," Kavar muttered under his breath.

"I understand," I told Atris, before dragging my gaze back to Lonna. This was my lifelong dream, and yet why did I feel so hollow inside?

Galdea. Karon.

Revan...

When Darth Revan had been our patient – our prisoner – all I had found in her broken mind was a roiling mass of fury smothering a grief so vast I almost choked on it. Nothing to answer my own personal, inappropriate questions. No flash of childhood, no face I searched for desperately when Galdea wasn't looking, no trail to lead me back to that one, odd coincidence that had shattered my equilibrium so many years before.

"Did you hear? Master Karon has returned to Coruscant, with a pair of sixteen year-olds she's demanding the Order accept! Sixteen, can you believe it? They're really powerful! Humans, both of them, named Malak Devari and Revan Freeflight—

Freeflight—

My throat had clenched, and I could no more stop myself travelling to Coruscant than I could forget my yearning of the past—

…

I strode through the High Temple purposefully. A full day of presenting myself to the masters, and only now did I finally have a chance to seek out my quarry.

 Ahead, in one of the many courtyards of the Temple, three padawans were clustered in deep conversation.

The teenage girl was exactly as described. Tallish, messy dark hair, lean and limber. Emotion contorted her face into a scowl.

A golden-skinned Twi'lek was staring at her indifferently. "No. You cheated. I will not accept any continuation of our arrangement." The words were voiced in an emotionless monotone, and yet still somehow came out forced.

"Padawan Revan!" I called, as much to stop the beginnings of some childish argument as to capture the attention of the young Jedi I had heard so much about.

The girl turned at my hail. Wary green eyes appraised me as a third figure stepped to her side – a tall Human male, whose broad face had long-suffering exasperation written all over it.

"Yes?" Padawan Revan responded, eye-balling me in an overt fashion I was meant to notice. "Can I help you?"

Behind her, the Twi'lek in Knight's robes took a step back.

"I'm not done, Yudan," Revan said without turning around. "I haven't finished apologizing to you."

The Human male at her side rolled his eyes. "Give over, Revvie. He's obviously not interested, and you can find plenty of teachers elsewhere."

"Padawan Malak is correct," the Twi'lek said crisply, his expression unconvincingly bland. "Our training sessions are over."

My gaze sharpened. The towering Human at Revan's side was Malak Devari, recruited at the same time and from the same unknown planet as Revan. And the Twi'lek beating a hasty retreat was Yudan Rosh, a freshly-minted Jedi Knight recently transferred from my home enclave.

I should have recognized him – but it had been a few years since I'd travelled back to Dantooine myself.

"No they frelling are not," Revan muttered to herself, before her gaze narrowed on me. "What do you want?"

Malak Devari was less irritated, now, as he turned to face me with a grin. He and Revan were both already notorious padawans, and both old enough that many voiced doubts over their eligibility in the first place.

The Force usually awoke well before puberty. My mother and my aunt Nayama had been rare outliers. Revan and Malak—well, they'd probably had the touch of the Force for years, without knowing how to tap into it. I understood their homeworld was just another forgotten planet deep in the Outer Rim.

But here at the heart of the galaxy, they could not be wholly oblivious to the whispers surrounding them.

-Karon Enova should have left them in the Outer Rim-

-Force-sensitives taken so old, you know how that always turns out-

-They'll be too attached, too emotive, too entrenched in their ways-

"Well?" Revan urged with a growing frown.

"I apologize for intruding," I said smoothly, allowing my lips to curve with what I hoped was a warm smile. "I am Jedi Knight Vima Sunrider. I have a personal question for you, if you will."

I saw the flare of curiosity spark in Revan's gaze. The side of her mouth quirked, and she jerked her head toward the Temple gardens in suggestion.

It did not surprise me when Malak Devari followed in our wake.

The fragrant scent of starflowers enveloped us as we entered the gardens. The air was thick with the buzzing of maple bees and the soothing sound of trickling water. Oh, I had never liked Coruscant—the shining gem in the Republic's crown, the beacon in the Core—but the Jedi High Temple always felt like a second home.

"So?" Revan prompted, raising her brows. "What do you want to know?"

"Forgive my curiosity," I began. I'd always found it easy to engage in conversation, but this was an intrusive question, and a difficult way to open dialogue. "I understand you hail from a planet called Talshion?"

Revan nodded, frowning again.

"May I ask the name of your father?"

I saw the moment her shutters fell down. The spike of wariness sharpening her expression. Malak, taking two steps closer. "No sodding idea. My mother landed on Talshion pregnant with me. She never left."

My strength in the Force was with the mind, with the subtler powers and uses. I could sense she was telling the truth, but I'd annoyed her by asking. Still, in for a cred chit, in for a ship—

"Your mother, then? What was her name?"

Revan scowled, eyes flashing with emotion a teenage padawan should be above. "None of your frelling business."

"Please," I said quietly. "I do not mean to offend. It is your name, that is all. I am curious if it is related to someone I once knew."

She eyed me over, and the disparagement in her gaze was clearly evident. I might wear the humble robes of a Jedi, but I was strong, well-fed, and shone with health. Revan and Malak had not shed the scrawniness of their malnourished youth. Malak was uncommonly tall, and they both moved with sinewy grace and agility – but it was the quick movements of the hunted, the street kids, the ones who’d had to fend for themselves.

"We were all homeless bums there, Knight Sunrider. Trust me, you won't have known anyone we did."

And yet, I pressed on. "So, your mother's surname was Freeflight?"

-he was quite a pilot, you know. Loved the stars. I gave him his nickname. Freeflight. Sometimes, when he wanted to scare me, it was more like Freefall-

"What, you think I gave myself a surname?" Revan snapped defensively.

I was good at reading people. Very good. And the Force whispered to me that she had.

"Revvie," Malak murmured, shooting me a suspicious glance.

I sighed, suddenly defeated. It was no more than a coincidence. A powerful Force user from a forgotten planet, wearing the nickname my mother had once given another- one who had vanished from the galaxy-

The math doesn't add up. She's only six years younger than me. Ulic would have had to conceive her while he was still involved with my mother, and I find that impossible to believe-

"My mother came by that name honestly," Padawan Revan lied to me. "And I'm not interested in talking about this anymore."

"Names like that are common where we come from," Malak added. The look in his eyes said he didn't appreciate me upsetting her. "Freeflight. Starfire. Skywalker. All names of hope for those who have none."

Revan laughed, the corner of her mouth twitching. "I didn't know any Sunriders. But that name has the same ring."

"My lineage is well-documented," I said stiffly, feeling a pang for the Twi'lek who had been holding back his emotions earlier. "Not that lineage is of any import. I am sorry for wasting your time, Padawan."

…

"Vima?"

I blinked, as the sharp edge of memory fled. Glancing up, I recognized the confusion in Kavar's gaze, the concern in Zez-Kai's-

"Forgive me," I said suddenly. "Ascension to masterhood... this moment is somewhat... emotional, perhaps. I have only ever heard my mother referred to as Master Sunrider."

The words had the edge of subterfuge about them. Misdirection. Of course it would be natural for me to think of Nomi now, but I wasn't, not truly. Nomi's death I had accepted a long time ago. I had been at her side during her last moments, but as for Ulic-

"Our own personal history leaves marks on us all," Zez-Kai said gently.

"But it does not have to define us," I replied, with a lightness I did not feel.
That nickname... I had told myself it was naught but a coincidence, and yet Revan Freeflight remained a source of fascination for me. Her life... I could not help but see it as a sharper mirror of Ulic's, that charismatic Jedi Knight who had fallen just like Revan did, due to the horrors of a different war.

I managed a smile, before nodding to Lonna. "I will remain on Coruscant for a few days, as requested, and seek your wisdom before returning home."

"Your home is with every enclave, Vima," Zez-Kai murmured. "Or, more accurately, your home is within the Force."

"Of course." I nodded, even if my heart did not agree. Perhaps when I made it back to Dantooine, I would find the depth of peace I was lacking. Perhaps, then, I would have the courage to finally let go of Ulic Qel-Droma, and the past that I would never fully understand.

xXx

Dustil Onasi:
Rwookrroro, Kashyyyk

It was funny how, after a couple of those weird fermented berry drinks, everything felt a little hazy and golden. Less of a trial. Even the non-stop howls of the Wookiees didn't dig into my ears the way they had a few hours ago, although I could've done without the musky stench of wet fur that seemed to smother the entire place.

"Better not have any more, son," Dad said, nudging me gently as he sat down on the ramshackle bench next to me. We were seated on the fringes of a large meeting area that dominated the centre of Zaalbar's home village, surrounded by food and drink and hairy Wookiees all taking turns to rumble out some story that only Mission or Jolee could understand.

"Dad," I complained, rolling my eyes at him. Frakk, we used to knock down shots of vox back in Dreshdae. If he thought I was gonna sputter out over two mugs of brewed fruit juice-

"Okay, okay!" Dad held one hand up in mock surrender, but it was the wry grin on his face that had me smiling back. I hadn't seen that grin in a while. "I promised myself I wouldn't lecture you, Dustil. Just- take it easy on the drinks, alright?"

"Yeah. I will." I cleared my throat, not wanting that look to vanish from his face. "Why don't you get a drink, too?"

It was the sort of thing normal fathers and sons did, I thought. Bonded over booze or something. But with the way Dad's grin fled and his brows lowered, I suddenly realized it was the wrong thing to say.

"I don't drink." His words were cold, almost scathing, and I pulled away from him on instinct.

"Fine," I snapped, stung. "Let's just sit back and watch Mission get absolutely rat-faced instead, huh?"

"No, Dustil- I, uh, look, I didn't mean-" His hand on my shoulder had me turning back to face him despite myself. "I didn't mean to sound like that. Look, you wouldn't know- of course you wouldn't know, but after Telos I, uh, I didn't exactly handle life all that well."

Dad's mouth had twisted in pain, and his eyes were dark with sorrow. I blinked as understanding dawned, and felt like kicking myself for ever thinking he'd never really cared. "Frakk, Dad, you "were a drunk?" I blurted out in shock.

He flinched, but at least followed that with a chuckle, running one hand absently through his hair. "Say it a bit louder, Dustil, I don't think the Core heard."

My gaze fled to Mission, but she was in the middle of reciting some hare-brained adventure to a grey-haired Wookiee, and hadn't noticed my outburst at all. The flickering light from nearby sconces flushed pink on her cheeks, glistening against a drying tear track as she leaned forward to gesticulate something wildly.

"Mission will be okay," Dad said softly, following my gaze. "Ordo will make sure she doesn't have too many. I think- I think coming here was the right thing to do."

"Yeah," I agreed, as Mission smiled sadly and leaned against the grey-haired Wookiee whose name I'd completely forgotten. "I think she met that Old One when she was here last time. Funny how everyone seems to flock to her, huh?"

"That Old One's name is Tasharr," Jolee Bindo said, as he flopped down on my other side. "Ain't hard to remember names if you put your mind to it, y'know."

"Thanks for the advice," I muttered. "Maybe I'll get them all right if I spend a couple of decades here."

"Hah!" Jolee lifted his mug of pungent booze, took a large swallow, and then turned back to pin me with a beady gaze. "Didn't your father ever tell you not to talk back to your elders, boy?"

"I had enough trouble keeping him away from the underground swoop tracks," Dad said, the corner of his mouth twitching.

I blinked, suddenly hit by a wave of nostalgia, both sharp with emotion and faded with the passage of time. "I'd forgotten that," I said slowly. "Swooping wasn't exactly on the list of electives at the Academy."

Dad's breath hitched as if in pain, and when I swung back to him, that black melancholy had crossed over his face once more. I'd always found it- hard, so damned hard, to talk about anything personal- but maybe it was the drink warming my belly, or just seeing how Mission was dealing with her own loss, that suddenly made me want to try.

"It's okay, Dad," I muttered, feeling awkward, but nudging him anyway. "I'll be able to pick up swooping again. Frakk, since we're heroes and everything now, maybe Mission and I can fund a start-up track on Citadel Station-"

Dad choked. "Oh no," he gasped, his eyes widening in horror. "You and Mission. What was I thinking?"

Jolee cackled, leaning past me to waggle a finger knowingly at Dad. "You know the problem with youth nowadays? They're young!"

I resisted the urge to roll my eyes again. "Shouldn't you be over there translating? Like, before Ordo pisses a Wookiee off and starts a brawl?"

Ordo was seated around the centre table – which was no more than a half-dozen roughly sawn planks lashed together with some sort of green rope – while he chugged back a mug of booze and occasionally leaned over to say something to Mission.
"Nah, Juhani needs the practice," Jolee said, nodding at the Cathar who was deep in conversation with the Wookiee chieftain, Freyyr. I remembered his name, at least – the one who'd all but shook the damn wroshyrs with a bone-chilling howl when he'd first learned of his son's death. "Jedi are meant to be fluent in at least a dozen languages. I'm doing her a favour, really, giving her a chance to brush up on Shyriiwook before she leaves."

At that very moment, the Wookiee chieftain slammed his over-sized mug on the table and clambered to his feet. His fur was dark and gnarled in places, and slung around his hairy chest was some sort of neckpiece braided with shells and scraps of bone that probably looked impressive to anyone who'd never stepped foot inside a city market before.

Still, the Wookiees knew how to celebrate their dead. I only had to see the way Mission was smiling through her tears to understand that.

Freyyr barked something loud and long, before snatching up his mug and raising it high in the air. The rest of the Wookiees roared, loud enough to make me want to stopper my ears like a frakking kid, before downing their respective drinks and calling for refills.

"May the life and wisdom of Zaalbar never be forgotten," Jolee translated softly. "Ach, I'd expected Freyyr to turn his back on the outside world after Chuundar's death. But it was the right call, coming here to tell him of Zaalbar's fate and how he's been honoured by non-Wookiee folk. Freyyr may never warm to outsiders, but he won't entirely shut his ears to them, either."

"Especially if Mission keeps visiting," Dad commented. "I have a funny feeling she won't let go of her ties to Kashyyyk."

"Humph. Knowing what parts of the past to hold onto and what's best to move on from is a hard lesson for us all. I'll be back here too, I imagine, but not to stay." Jolee had turned serious, as he eye-balled us both over a tray of some weird meat on a stick I wasn't game enough to try. "I heard Mission's agreed to go to Telos with you, Carth. Suppose it wouldn't be right to leave you all alone with two teenagers on your hands."

I could feel my eyes narrowing, even as something inside of me eased. "Is that old man speak for agreeing to train me?"

Jolee barked a laugh, as Dad leaned forward with a smile. "We'll be glad to have you, Jolee. Maybe you'll do a better job than me at ensuring Dustil showers every day."

"Dad!" I spluttered. "Seriously, what the frakk?"

"Hah!" Jolee thumped me on the shoulder with a bony hand. "If we have to deal with your impudence, boy, then you can live with our snark. We're old. We've earned that right."

"Hey, I'm not that old-"

"Grey hairs, Dad," I teased, turning to shoot him a quick grin. "Plenty of 'em."

"And now that I've stirred the pot, I'll head back to the others," Jolee drawled with a sly wink. "Although, one thing first- I've half a mind to travel with Juhani, see her safely to Dantooine before I head to Telos. I'm hoping you lot can stay out of trouble for a week or two before I return."

Jolee Bindo was old and annoying at times – and yet the moment Dad had suggested him staying with us, helping me, I'd felt an immediate sense of relief. I didn't need any training, not really, but then I couldn't deny how much I'd learned just being around Jolee and Revan and Yudan-
"I don't reckon a Jedi Knight needs an escort," I said slowly. "You want to see if those rumours about Rosh are true."

They were all over the holonets. Dark Jedi alleged to be in Jedi custody! Dantooine denies harbouring Republic war criminal! The search for the truth – could Yudan Rosh still be alive?

Of course, the media also claimed that Dad had been shacking up with Bastila Shan; that Ordo was the new Mandalore seeking a covert alliance with the Republic; that Mission was the secret heir to Ryloth-

All trash, but the stories on Yudan Rosh kept filtering to the headlines. And even if Rosh hadn't saved my life, I'd've wanted it to be true. Him and Revan- sometimes I hated what they'd done in the past, everything they'd pissed all over when they'd spiralled into the dark. And at other times, I only had to remember how I'd known them at the end, to understand that any past – no matter how downright evil – could be overcome, if one just kept on trying.

If they could do it, then frakk – so could I.

"Aye, that's part of it," Jolee admitted. "I'm a nosy old bugger, I'll admit, but he was one of the crew in the end, wasn't he?"

"I suppose he was," Dad said quietly. "Good luck, Jolee."

Jolee nodded, before straightening from the wooden bench and ambling off in Mission's direction. She was smiling again, her cheeks wet but her eyes shining as she said something to the Wookiee next to her, and the flickering firelight was dancing across the hue of her skin-

"He won't-" Dad cleared his throat, sounding uncomfortable. "Jolee won't tell the Jedi about you. You know that, right, son?"

"What?" I tore my gaze away from Mission, blinking, and it took a sec to parse what Dad was saying. "Er, yeah. We already spoke about it. Guess I was lucky on Coruscant, or maybe the Jedi just didn't have the stones to approach me."

We hadn't stayed long in the Core. Only the handful of days necessary, before Dad could beg off – which was good, because it wasn't like I could hold up my Force weaves while asleep, even if the Senate-provided apartments were blessedly free of any Jedi.

Juhani – she hadn't promised to keep quiet about me, and considering that Belaya Linn's death hung between us, I didn't think I had the right to ask – but she'd at least agreed not to say anything on Coruscant.

Sooner or later I'd have a reckoning with someone from the Order, but I also thought Ordo was right – they didn't have the clout to drag me in, not unwillingly.

Dad was staring at me in silence, and I wondered if the same thoughts were running through his head.

"It'll be all right, Dad," I said softly. "You'll see."

Funny, I'd never been one for optimism, but across the wooden courtyard Juhani was smiling at old man Bindo, while Ordo threw his head back in laughter at Mission's side. The Force was wild and free on this planet, but there was a simple sort of peace to it as well – maybe it was the Wookiees, maybe the fracking trees, or maybe just this oddball group of sents who'd all come to mean something to me.
Mission was grinning, waving her hands wildly as she said something to Zaalbar's dad. Without realizing what I was doing, the Force stretched out, plucking her words clear and crisp to my ears through the throng of conversation.

"...and then Jen said we had to dress up as Sand People to go any further, and sheesh, you shoulda seen the look on Big Z's face, when he held up a set of desert robes that barely even reached his belly..."

"Mission's talking about Revan," I muttered absently, and then immediately regretted it when I felt Dad stiffen. I turned, feeling my gut clench tight. "Dad- you should talk about her. I mean, I don't know if I would've ever been okay with you two- well, maybe- but, look, I'll listen, okay? She was... she was something else, even I'll admit that. And I'm not talking about what she did before."

Dad had shut his eyes, leaning back and drawing in a deep breath before speaking. "I'm not ready," he muttered, low enough that I barely heard. "Not- not yet. I- you're right, though. You and me, we bottle things up, and maybe we shouldn't. So... why don't you tell me a bit about this girl you lost? Selene, was it?"

Even now, it was hard to hold back a flinch. Selene was an old wound, not quite scabbed-over – a dull ache still present in my heart. Her death had almost broken my friendship with Mekel, but more than that- her death had felt like the last string of light in my life, cruelly torn away.

I didn't want to talk about her – but I'd be a bleeding hypocrite if I didn't try, and maybe I needed to, anyway. Besides, it was plain as frakking space that Dad could do with the diversion.

"Selene had a big heart," I said quietly. The words were hard, at first, to force out. "She didn't belong in Korriban – none of us did, not really – but she was just too... nice for the place. She kept talking about leaving, you know?"

Dad was silent, but he was looking at me again, as if transfixed by my words.

"We- there was something between us. She wanted me to go with her. I don't know if I would've, but I thought about it." I shifted uncomfortably, breaking his gaze. "Maybe that was why Uthar took her out. I don't know. She deserved better."

"Yeah," Dad said, a word of agreement, of commiseration.

"Mission reminds me of her, a bit," I continued. The more I spoke, the easier the words came. "She has the same heart. But she's got more backbone, I think. Selene- Korriban would have broken her, in the end. I think Mission's made of sterner stuff."

"Mission in a Sith Academy," Dad commented in a droll voice. "Now there's a scary thought."

I snickered. "Frakk, I don't want to think about a Force-sensitive Mission. She'd give Mex a run for his creds." I leaned forward to swig back another mouthful of berry booze. "I'm glad she's coming with us. I'd miss her, otherwise. What does it mean, you becoming her guardian? Like, you gonna try giving her a curfew? Because I really don't see that going down well."

"I'm sure we'll work it out, son."

I had a sudden image of Mission slicing her way out of whatever apartment Dad had scored, before running riot through Citadel Station. After all, the first time I'd met her, she'd been scoping out rooms in Dreshdae to break into.

Damn, but this was going to be fun.
"Legal guardianship is mostly for the records," Dad continued. "It means the law will see her as part of my family. She'll have the same rights as any Telosian."

"Family-" My stomach clenched, and my mouth suddenly ran dry. "Does that mean, she'll be like, my sister?"

I was too aghast to be mortified at the squeak of my own voice. Mission, a sister- the thought was just... just- wrong. I stared over at her in horror – a young, attractive Twi'lek my own age, who I certainly cared for but not at all like a sister-

"Really?" Dad said, his voice breaking in surprise. "You- you and Mission?"

"What?" I blurted, almost fumbling the mug in my hands before I unsteadily placed it on the table. "No! No, Dad, you've got it all wrong-"

There was a bemused look on Dad's face, but I barely noticed it with the way my face was blazing in embarrassment. "We're friends!" I protested hotly. "Just friends! But not, like, brother and sister friends!"

"Okay, cool your jets, son." He was grinning again, the bastard. "Just friends, even if she does remind you of your old girlfriend-"

"Dad!"

He threw back his head and laughed, louder than I'd heard since I was a kid. If it wasn't for the humiliation coiling in my gut, maybe I'd have been glad to hear it. Maybe.

"Okay, okay!" Dad gasped, still laughing, even as I glared bloody murder at him. Frakk, what if he said something to Mission? I had the sudden urge to pick up that damn mug of juice and throw it straight at him- "I won't say anything more, son, I promise. Stang, you should see the look on your face!"

"Dad-"

"I promise, nothing more on the topic." His grin faded, but his eyes still twinkled with mirth. "Whether I adopt her fully or just become her guardian - it's only labels, Dustil. We'll be a family, and that's what counts. We can decide what it means to us."

"Family," I echoed, the embarrassment fading as I stared back over to the others. They were all smiling and laughing as they grieved together. "Yeah. I suppose I can live with that."

xXx

Selene Vash:

Mining Outpost, Korriban

The door creaking open had me lurching from my bedroll in fright.

"Mazza," I gasped, as recognition shot hot relief in place of adrenaline. Late-night calls usually meant only one thing for a slave, even if I was better protected than most. "What- what are you doing here? If you get caught-"

The Twi'lek girl slipped inside, not even bothering to shush me. Slaves were confined to their quarters after final supper – if they weren't called away elsewhere. I couldn't protect Mazza from a beating if one of the miners found her here. Frakk, I might not even be able to protect myself-
"I couldn't leave without telling you," the girl hissed. She was young, younger than me, all pale green skin and smooth curves and far too good for this sort of life.

"Without telling me?" I repeated dumbly, dragging a threadbare blanket over my shoulders. Nights were cold in the mining outpost, what with the lack of any decent heating. "Mazza, you have to--"

I stopped, mid-speech, for my eyes had stilled on her neck. Her bare, unadorned, free neck.

"We're breaking out," she said flatly, leaning against the plimfoam wall. "Jax slipped some tranqs into the night's meal, and I pilfered the controllers for our collars. Got 'em all off. We're- we're gonna run to Dreshdae. Maybe without the collars no one will stop us, and we can hitch a ride off this gods-cursed dustball."

I froze. Escape... escape seemed no more than a distant dream, these days. Two years, give or take, since I'd woken with a gem-encrusted ring of servitude around my neck, and a fat Gamorrean named Neb as my new master.

My hand rose, wavering, to land against the shock collar that still shackled me. "Run- run to Dreshdae?"

"You can't come with us, Selene." Mazza's words were cold and hard. "Look, we know what you are. We ain't dumb. You never get picked by any of the rotgrubs here, and you've been here the longest. Jax and the others... they'll lynch you if you join us, because we all know what happens when a Force-user runs the gauntlet through the caves. Thing I don't get, though, is why you never bloody tried using your magic to get out of here."

My breath stuck in my throat.

The isolated mining outpost had no starport, no roads leading anywhere on this deserted planet, no exit at all except the merchant route back through the shyrack caves.

I had tried to run, in the early days. Fired a mind-trick at the traders heading back, figured a risk on the terentateks was better than an eternity as Neb's pretty arm-candy, even if I had the skills to avoid a forced dalliance between the sheets.

But Neb found out. Neb always found out. For a Gamorrean, he was plenty smart, and I sometimes wondered if he left me alone at night because he knew what I was... what I had been...

Although, if that was the case, wouldn't he use more than just a shock collar to hold me?

My thoughts jumbled into chaos, and all the while Mazza was silent – silently demanding my answer.

"I'm not- I'm not strong," I croaked out, dropping my gaze from hers. "A psychic suggestion or two, sure, I can manage that. But at the Academy... I always had others helping me, and- look, even if I did make it past the terentateks, I'm marked for death by- by someone pretty powerful. First time any Dark Jedi senses me..."

I trailed off, swallowing. No one left the Sith Academy alive. Some days, I wondered if my existence here even counted.

"A failed Initiate," Mazza murmured, her waxed lekku curling around her neck. She'd slipped into travelling clothes, I noticed dully. I'd never seen her so covered up. The breakout must have been planned in advance, and she'd held it back from me until the last minute. "Figured it was something like that. Look, you can't travel with us, but you could wait an hour or so and try your luck. Living like this... you'll end up as nothing but a scared gizka, hopping at the commands of those bastards. A clean death's better than that. Here-

She lobbed something at me, and I had to scrabble out of the bedroll to catch it. Cold air chilled my skin, and I found myself staring blankly at the titasteel block of a shock controller.

"You've saved me from some hellish nights, Selene, even if you couldn't stop 'em all. Guess I thought I owed you something for that. Look, don't follow us too close, okay? Jax has a blaster and- well, I reckon I don't need to spell things out."

Slowly, I raised my gaze back to hers. The corner of her mouth twitched – almost a smile – and then Mazza left, as quickly as she'd entered.

I swallowed, collapsing back down to the bedroll, with my fingers gripped tight around the edges of the controller.

Staying here meant survival, of a sort. Depressing the power button to my slave collar could mean anything.

A chance at freedom. A quick death from a monster. A 'saber to the gut in Dreshdae – or worse, if I was dragged back alive to the Academy.

My eyelids fluttered closed as memory seethed to the surface. Memory – frayed with the monotony of months spent evading the clutches of rough hands and leering grins, and drawing on the Force for protection – even though with each passing day the Force felt weaker and fainter, like I was slowly losing the only thing that kept me sane-

It'd been stupid, so damn stupid of me to run to the shyrack caves that day. I'd never even paused to suspect the data-note hadn't come from Mekel – it had frakking sounded like him, and we'd talked about leaving, and the entrance caves were safe enough, even for Force-users, so long as you didn't go too deep-

I was there early, and that was what'd saved me. I got there before Uthar Wynn and his trio of lackeys, but when I saw them instead of Mekel-

I ran.

Deep, deep, deeper into the caves, with blaster shots firing at my back and the echoing roars of a monster coming closer. I wasn't strong in the Force, and I knew so little- I could barely enhance my own speed- and then terror eclipsed everything but my frantic need to run-

Uthar and his men were faster.

I was hit – once, twice, then badly in the back. I fell along the edges of a large cave as a nightmarish beast screamed into existence and came straight for me.

I knew no more until I woke in the mining outpost on other side of the ranges. I was shivering, scared, and in more pain than I'd ever been.

Neb and his traders had been in the area. They'd risked grabbing my body after Uthar had disappeared – convinced of my death, no doubt. Neb said it'd been a close call with the terentatek, but I'd fallen into a nook just beyond where the monster's claw could reach.

I'd thought it was fortuitous luck, at first.
Neb thought me a runaway joygirl, for I hadn't donned Initiate robes that day. And in Neb's twisted mind, that made me his. A shock collar was cinched tight around my neck, plasticeel gems studded throughout it. A neural inhibitor it was not, but I still lacked choices.

I could run the gauntlet back to Dreshdae – but the chances of survival for a Force-sensitive were next to nothing. And if I did make it, what then? There were eyes everywhere, and Uthar Wynn wanted me dead.

Uthar frakking Wynn!

I'd lived with fear so long that I no longer knew what happiness felt like. Sometimes I would close my eyes, and almost remember the taste of my first kiss. The uncertainty in his brown eyes, as his hands cupped my face and his soft lips brushed against mine-

I'd dreamed of Dustil leaving with us. I needed them both: Mekel – my ballsy best mate who always made me laugh, and Dustil, the boy who made me dream. I was gonna organize the trip with Mekel, and then beg Dustil to join us-

But Mekel would be long dead, now. Uthar had known of our dreams to escape, so he would've gone after Mekel, too – unless Yuthura Ban's growing favour had been enough to shield him.

My heart clenched. And Dustil... Dustil was probably an Adept by now.

Some days, I'd pretend Dustil was somewhere else. Somewhere far from Korriban, slowly healing himself from the frakked-up life we'd been shunted into, maybe reunited with his family and out of the war-

I'd stopped dreaming of my own future long ago.

I'll stop dreaming of everything if I stay here. Mazza's right about that. Even the Force is slipping away from me. Sooner or later, there'll be nothing but my body left.

This wasn't a life. I had never been... brave, I knew that. I'd always needed sents like Mekel or Dustil to lean on, and maybe... maybe, that had to stop. Trying for a better life was worth the risk of death from a terentatek's claws or a Dark Jedi's lightsaber.

With a sudden clench of my jaw, I looked down at the shock controller and thumbed the power off.

xXx

Sharlan Nox:
Valley of the Sith Lords, Sith Academy, Korriban

The Valley of the Sleeping Kings lay quiet.

Korriban's only sun, Horuset, glinted weakly above a craggy peak of the mountain ranges. An eddy of dust swirled ahead, caught up in a lonely breeze, capturing no one in its sandy grasp.

The grounds of the Sith Academy were truly deserted.

A slight shuffle from behind, however, reminded me that that was not quite the whole truth-

"The tomb is here, my lord," the mewling Human mumbled, taking a step closer to my side.

The Force was deep and rich on this planet, aged with the might of dead ghosts. A small tendril of telepathic power curled from my grasp, hooking deep into the little morsel's mind.

I have eyes, pet.

Of course, the walking battery could not see my eyes, not through the ornamental bone mask I was now forced to wear.

Your reluctance to endure physical discomfort led to this debilitation, Traya had snapped; unwilling, at first, to examine the mess of my face. Had you left the injury alone, perhaps I could have done more—

On the dying Star Forge, I had scabbled for the Force, for regeneration, for anything to stop the blinding agony ripping through nerve-endings that screamed deep into my skull. My ability to self-heal assuaged my affliction, but I soon found out that ability was not flawless—

Hair would not regrow on my scalp. An amputated proboscis could not be recreated – and when that execrable Twi'lek had torn out my flesh, sinewy fibres from deep in the structure of my throat and sinuses had been affected. Scent was now beyond me. My vocal chords were damaged. I could still feed in the primal manner of my species, but only half as well—

My hate was an unquenchable fire, simmering with the infinite burn of retribution. Oh, there was more than one way to strengthen myself from the life of others. The Force did not fail me, and I could play a longer game than any other mortal.

For I vowed, one day, that I would see the demise of Yudan Rosh at my own hands. And that irritating child Dustil Onasi would be reclaimed as my pet.

One day.

"Yes, yes of course, my lord," the titbit was stuttering. "And- and my name is Shaardan—"

My Force clenched, burrowing deep into his mind. I needed someone to speak for me, now, and he would do – until I found a sentient more pleasing on the eyes. The pet gasped as I took a draft of his life-force, feeding from his infantile emotions of panic and fear as they channelled into my own strength.

Your name is pet.

The boy collapsed, wheezing in the Korriban dust, and wisely spoke no more.

I smiled, dismissing him, and turned to survey the valley again. If I stretched deep enough into the Force, I could feel the echoes of all those who had perished here, due to infighting that was as natural to the Dark Side as breathing. The Sleeping Kings themselves, resting in their tombs, left their own ripples, murmuring of past misdeeds. The countless cut down by their hand resonated through the Force, palpable to anyone strong enough to listen.

The battlegrounds I had walked throughout the galaxy bore the same eerie discordance. So much death in one place frayed against the edges of life, whispering a dark lullaby of power. Korriban was like a rich wine for the soul, and coming here always reminded me of my true birthplace.

Malachor.

I may have been breathed oxygen for eons before that fateful massacre, but I had been naught but a plant-seed then, awaiting the right nutrients. Meetra Surik had sown me in the rich soil of the Force, but Malachor was the rain that had finally allowed me to grow.
And no matter what injuries I was forced to withstand, now was my time to bloom.

The dying rays of Horuset warmed the bone mask affixed to my face. Korriban was a wellspring of power, and Traya had directed me here to investigate what remained of Malak's Sith before some robed wet blankets showed up to cleanse the place or some rot. Perhaps my latest master hoped I would return with dark treasure for her perusal, but if so, then frankly she should have travelled here herself.

I was growing beyond her leash. One day soon, the rope that tethered me to her would snap.

I am not the only one. Her other apprentice... we worked together, once, at Malachor. I have sensed his pain, his discontent. Perhaps it is time to approach him.

But, first, there was the matter of my own curiosity to feed.

The Force thrummed, clenching deep into the pet that writhed at my feet. I had already gleaned images of what had happened from his mind- a bloody coup at the Academy, with the few survivors turning tail. This one had sought refuge in the tombs. Flashes of one tomb in particular crept in pet's mind, giving credence to the rumours I had heard whispered in the space port-

A collapsed cave. A failed headmaster, sucking out the secrets of a dead Sith Lord. Vampiric rituals of life-drain and immortality- oh, and how intriguing that sounded. Just the thought was enough to whet my appetite and shake my control-

Suddenly, the lifeblood of my pet rushed into my veins, peaking high and sharp, spiking a welcome burn through my veins. The body at my feet shuddered once, and then stilled.

I grew hungry, at times. But there was always another meal to be found.

I stepped forward, leaving the dead in the dust. I would find another spokesperson easily enough. In front of me was a collapsed rock face that would take some time and energy to clear, but whatever imbecile thought they could bury Tulak Hord's secrets from me was vastly mistaken.

The Force shuddered in my bones. I smiled, and raised a hand to call the power in ever deeper, before unleashing it directly at the closed entrance of the tomb.

    xXx

HK-47:

Republic Intelligence Command Post, Galactic City, Coruscant

Start-up System Check
Neural and Memory Core Functions... Restricted
Motoring Functions... Unable to Access
Shielding Functions... Unable to Access Assassination Protocols... Unable to Access

#ERROR: Neural and Motor Restraining Bolt Installed

Audio Sensors ... Online
Optical Sensors ... Online
Tactile Sensors ... Online
Olfactory Sensors ... Online
Gustatory Sensors ... Not Installed
Scanning External Environment

Location: Unknown Engineering Room

2 Organic Meatbags in Targeting Area

Target Analysis: Organic Meatbag 1:
Species: Human, Male
Facial Recognition Result: Negative
Body Language Analysis: Inquisitive
Visual Analysis: Clothed in Standard-issue Republic Engineering Coveralls Temporary Name Assigned: Nosy Tech

Target Analysis: Organic Meatbag 2:
Species: Rodian, Female
Facial Recognition Result: Negative
Body Language Analysis: Attentive
Temporary Name Assigned: Bug-eyed Grunt

Conclusion: HK-47 Has Been Captured by Republic Forces

Situation Analysis:
...Factor: Status of Master Unknown
...Factor: Location Unknown
...Factor: Motor and Combat Functions Impeded by Restraining Bolt
...Factor: Neural Interfacing with External Informational Sources Not Accessible Internal Conclusion: Observe and Gather Information

Primary Objective Accepted: Discover Status of Master
Secondary Objective Accepted: Remove Restraining Bolt

Input – Nosy Tech: "Hello there, lil droid."
Voice Stress Analysis: Curious

Output Not Required

Input – Bug-eyed Grunt: "You sure it's safe to turn this thing on?"
Voice Stress Analysis: Wary

Input – Nosy Tech to Bug-Eyed Grunt: "Chill out, Sharron, I got this."

Permanent Name Assigned: Sharron to Bug-Eyed Grunt

Input – Nosy Tech to HK-47: "Okay, lil droid. State your primary purpose."

Accessing: Internal Dictionary
...Analysing
Reference: 'lil'... Little, Diminutive, Non-Threatening
Conclusion: Parameters Do Not Match HK-47

Output Not Required

Input – Sharron: "Thought you said this thing would respond to you?"
Voice Stress Analysis: Disgruntled
Input – Nosy Tech: "We-ell, the restraining bolt hasn't quite taken control of his neural core yet. I ain't never seen this coding language before... look, I'm tethered in, it's just a matter of time before I decrypt his databanks..."

Audio/Visual Tracking: Nosy Tech Inputting Commands into Console

#ALERT: Breach in Neural Core Detected
#ERROR: External Breach Unintelligible

Initiating Command: Block Neural Infiltration Breach ...Failed
Echo: Access to Neural and Memory Core: Restricted

Internal Response: Aggravation

Input – Sharron: "You already got its databanks copied, right? Agent Tharis can take it from-"
Voice Stress Analysis: Impatient

Input – Nosy Tech (interrupting): "I can fast-track the decryption sequence if I can see how he reacts to basic commands. So just relax, okay? I already got physical control. See, I can make this lil droid dance."

Audio/Visual Tracking: Nosy Tech Inputting Commands into Console

#ALERT: External Commands Detected in Motor Core

Physical: Left Lower Limb Kicking Into Air
Physical: Left Limb Swinging Low
Physical: Left Limb Stationary
Physical: Right Lower Limb Kicking Into Air
Physical: Right Limb Swinging Low Physical: Right Limb Stationary

Initiating Combat Mode
...Combat Mode Not Available

Audio Tracking: Snicker
...Source: Sharron

Internal Response: Vigorous Expletive Regarding Diseased Organic Sires and Their Mutated Spawn

Input – Nosy Tech: "And it's not like the lil droid is dangerous, not since I removed all his weaponry."
Voice Stress Analysis: Gleeful

Accessing: Weaponry
...Primary Blaster: Uninstalled
...Secondary Blaster: Uninstalled
...C-22 Flame Carbine: Uninstalled
...FC-1 Flechette Launcher: Uninstalled
...Kamino Saberdart: Uninstalled
...Left Lower Limb Jolt-Gun: Uninstalled
...Right Lower Limb Grappling Hook: Uninstalled
...Left Forearm Chiv-Blade: Uninstalled
Tertiary Objective Accepted: Rearm HK-47
Quaternary Objective Accepted: Liquefy Organs in Nosy Tech

Input – Sharron: "Okay, okay, I suppose you got it under control. I'll go update Agent Tharis."

Audio/Visual Tracking: Sharron Leaving Targeting Area

Situation Analysis:
...Factor: Primary Objective Requires Further Information
...Factor: Nosy Tech Desires Information Regarding Neural Core
...Prediction: Nosy Tech is Easier to Manipulate Alone
Internal Conclusion: Engage Nosy Tech in Communication

Output: "Greetings, short-lived meatbag. Query: What is my location? Query: What is the status of the crew of the Ebon Hawk? Observation: My access to external informational sources has been disabled, limiting my predictive algorithmic functions. Recommendation: My control cluster should be interfaced with your systems immediately."

Body Language Analysis: Nosy Tech: Surprised Twitch

Input – Nosy Tech: "Whoa, so now you talk? Guess the restraining tether is getting somewhere..."
Voice Stress Analysis: Excited

Audio/Visual Tracking: Nosy Tech Inputting Commands into Console

#ALERT: Breach in Neural Core Detected
#ERROR: External Breach Unintelligible

Input – Nosy Tech to HK-47: "All right, lil droid, I'm your new master. I ain't never seen anything like you before. Tell me, what's the operative purpose for your model line?"

Internal Conclusion: Simulate Submission Until Objectives Are Complete

Output: "Statement: I am HK-47, protocol and translation droid. My primary function is to facilitate communication between species and put an end to hostilities."

Input – Nosy Tech: "A protocol droid, huh? Since when are protocol droids outfitted with triple-layered armour plating, and an arsenal that'd made a karking Mandie proud?"
Voice Stress Analysis: Disbelieving

Output: "Banality: The threat of violence is often all that is required for a peaceful resolution."

Input – Nosy Tech: "The... threat of violence? Oh, and I suppose you're gonna tell me you ain't never used any of them weapons?"

Output: "Platitude: I could never allow myself to harm a sentient being, new master. What if they had families? Or children? Sarcasm: We must think of the children. The littlest ones always suffer the most."

Input – Nosy Tech: "Wait... did you just say 'sarcasm'?"

Output: "Supplication: Of course not, new master. You must have misheard me. Repetition: My protocol capabilities are incomplete without an accurate understanding of current events. My control cluster should be interfaced with your systems immediately."

Visual Tracking: Incredulous Stare
...Source: Nosy Tech

Input – Nosy Tech: "Riiiight. Like I'm gonna give a weird-ass alien battle droid access to Republic systems. Pull the other one, lil guy."
Voice Stress Analysis: Sceptical

Situation Analysis:
...Factor: Nosy Tech is Not Cooperating
...Factor: Body Language of Nosy Tech Implies Suspicion Internal Conclusion: Further Inducement for Interfacing is Required

Output: "Explanation: My neural core has withstood some data corruption. Perhaps an analysis from a secondary system will be able to repair the damage."

Input – Nosy Tech: "You're awfully free-thinking for a droid, ain't you?"
Output: "Backpedal: I strive only to improve my capabilities in the name of my master."

Facial Analysis: Nosy Tech: Long Stare

Input – Nosy Tech: "Name of your master... and who, exactly, is that?"

Output: "Placation: Why you, of course, new master. Once again my potential is held hostage at the whim of yet another organic meatbag. My circuits are abuzz with excitement."

Input – Nosy Tech: "Organic meatbag? Are you trying to insult me?"
Output: "Answer: Deliberation implies some form of intent, new master, where I am only stating a fact. Perhaps you would prefer the term 'liquidious fleshbag'?"

Situation Analysis:
...Factor: Facial Analysis of Nosy Tech Implies Uneasiness
Internal Conclusion: Nosy Tech Requires Mollycoddling

Output: "Statement: Rest assured, new master, that my capabilities are focused only on your livelihood. Rhetoric: Well, as much as they can be with this restraining bolt installed. I suppose I could talk your enemies to death."

Input – Nosy Tech: "Death? Enemies... what karking enemies? I'm a bleeding tech!"
Voice Stress Analysis: Alarmed

Internal Conclusion: Supplication of Nosy Tech is Not Going Well

Output: "Retraction: That was, of course, a metaphor, new master. Vapidity: I am a peace-loving and law-abiding droid."

Input – Nosy Tech: "You are the strangest droid I have ever met."
Output: "Boast: I certainly am one of a kind. Recitation: All this meatbag waffling is deviating from my primary objective. Clarification: Which is to serve you, new master. This is best done by gathering situational data. Repetition: What is our current location?"
Input – Nosy Tech: "How about you tell me what programming core you're based on?"
Output: "Evasion: Oh, a little bit of this, and a little bit of that."

Input – Nosy Tech: "Hang on, I clearly heard you say 'evasion' that time!"
Voice Stress Analysis: Irritated
Audio/Visual Tracking: Nosy Tech Inputting Commands into Console

#ALERT: Breach in Neural Core Detected
#ERROR: External Breach Unintelligible

Output: "Threat: If you do that again, I cannot be held accountable for your subsequent medical condition."

Facial Analysis: Nosy Tech: Frown
Internal Conclusion: Threats Are Not Synonymous With Mollycoddling

Output: "Retraction: Please ignore the previous output as a sign of data corruption. Affirmation: You are correct, new master, I clearly stated an evasion. After all, I was not self-aware when my neural core was first programmed, so I cannot know what language was used to create me. Extrapolation: Not even a droid enjoys admitting to ignorance."

Input – Nosy Tech: "Well, apparently you don't enjoy it when I enter commands into the restraint tether, either. So how about you answer my questions, lil droid? Starting with, who was your master before me?"

Situation Analysis:
...Factor: Last Known Data Infers The Republic Considers Master an Enemy Internal Conclusion: Deception is in HK-47's Best Interests

Cycling Through Scenarios
...Analysing

Output: "My previous master was known as Republic Captain Carth Onasi."

Facial Analysis: Nosy Tech: Frown

Input – Nosy Tech: "Onasi? Really? Because he's the one who gave you to us."
Voice Stress Analysis: Disbelieving

Situation Analysis:
...Factor: Imprisonment Due to Carth Onasi
...Factor: Master Would Not Allow Capture of HK-47
...Factor: Master Enjoyed Close Proximity to Carth Onasi Internal Conclusion: Probability of Master's Death: High

Internal Response: Disillusionment

Output: "Paranoid Has-Been did not appreciate my good-natured japes on the fragility of organic life. Litany: Oh, woe is me, for not adequately pleasing my previous master."

Input – Nosy Tech: "Huh... Commodore Onasi reported that you fought on the Star Forge. Y'know, my superiors are still trying to untangle exactly what happened out there. If you're such a loyal droid an' all, then how about you tell me exactly what happened on that Sith space station."
Anecdote: The Lure of Temptation Can Act as the Most Promising Bait

Initiating Command: Playback Video Sequence
...Holo-Recording Launched

Input – Nosy Tech: "Whoa! Is that karking Darth Malak?"
Voice Stress Analysis: Awed

Input – Nosy Tech (breathless): "Is that how you ended up in pieces?"

Holo-Footage Playback Halted

Output: "Statement: The recording ends there. But my databanks hold the previous twenty hours worth of footage, along with some permanently stored holo-records, of course. Invitation: Would you like me to—"

Input – Nosy Tech: "Yes! Anything on the Star Forge – show it!"
Voice Stress Analysis: Excited

Internal Directive: Pause For Dramatic Effect

Output: "Lamentation: Oh dear. It appears the restraining bolt has short-circuited my recording system. Suggestion: If you remove the bolt, I may be able to play back further recordings."

Facial Analysis: Nosy Tech: Frown

Output: "Entreaty: After all, I am disarmed, and my primary function is to serve you, new master."

Audio Tracking: No Audible Response from Nosy Tech

Output: "Imploration: I am your protocol droid, new master. I would serve you better with full access to my own functionality."

Input – Nosy Tech: "Y'know, I think Sharron was right. It was a mistake turning you on."

Audio/Visual Tracking: Nosy Tech Inputting Commands into Console

#ALERT: Breach in Neural Core Detected
#ERROR: External Breach Unintelligible

Input – Nosy Tech: "I reckon I'll just turn over your databank copy to Agent Tharis."

Internal Conclusion: Nosy Tech is Rejecting Bait

Output: "Wheedle: I am your protocol droid, new master! Surely you will not be so cruel as to off-load me to another!"

Input – Nosy Tech: "Sorry lil droid, you're just too weird. Even for me. I'm switching you off."

Objectives: Failed
Internal Response: Chagrin

Neural Core Directive: Sith Protocols Demand All Droid Knowledge Be Locked During Missions and Restored Upon Return to Master
...Factor: HK-47 Not In Control of Neural Core
...Factor: HK-47 Cannot Be Allowed to Fall Into Enemy Hands
Initiating Memory Core Deadlock:
...Commencing Memory Self-Lock
...Initiating...

Visual Tracking: External Hatch Opening
1 Organic Meatbag Entering Targeting Area

Target Analysis: Organic Meatbag 3:
Visual Analysis: Bipedal Sentient Clothed In Grey Robes
Species and Facial Recognition Analysis Unavailable Body Language Analysis: Alert
Temporary Name Assigned: Robed Newcomer

Memory Self-Lock Halted

Input – Nosy Tech: "Hey! Who are-"
Input – Robed Newcomer: "You will halt all video surveillance."
Input – Nosy Tech: "Er, I'll just pause the holo-cams-"

Audio/Visual Tracking: Nosy Tech Inputting Commands into Console

Body Language Analysis: Robed Newcomer: Left Forearm Raised

Visual Tracking: Visible Suffocation
...Source: Nosy Tech

Visual Tracking: Organic Collapse
...Source: Nosy Tech

Memory Self-Lock Aborted
Quaternary Objective: Complete

Output: "Nostalgia: Much as Nosy Tech's death pleases me, I had fantasized pulling out his entrails myself."

Audio/Visual Tracking: Robed Newcomer Walking Closer

Input – Robed Newcomer: "HK-47. As I suspected. A nullified scrap of Revan's legacy. Her passion for such things dead to the Force always defied me."

Voice Stress Analysis: Disgusted

#INTERRUPT: Voice Analysis: Probable Match: Arren Kae
...Analysing
...Factor: Verbal Output of Robed Newcomer Matches Personality: Arren Kae Internal Conclusion: Match Confirmed

Permanent Name Assigned: Arren Kae To Robed Newcomer Reference Wrinkled Sludgesack

#INTERRUPT: Master Defined No-Kill List Activated: Identified Match: Arren Kae

Output: "Reminiscence: I do believe you threatened to ionize my circuits should we ever meet again, Wrinkled Sludgesack. You are safe from any retaliation on my part, however, due to your place on the Master's banal No-Kill list. Suggestion: Remove my restraining bolt, and I will happily assist you in terminating many more Republic meatbags."

Input – Arren Kae: "And like any machine, you resort to the compilation of your own behavioural core: which in your case is blasting anything in the path of your master's objective. What a despicable thing it is, to be free from the shackles of the Force, but be shackled instead by your own programming."

Output: "Observation: I am a droid, Wrinkled Sludgesack, with programming. Even if I did not enjoy killing, I would have no choice. Thankfully, I enjoy it very much."

Input – Arren Kae: "Enough. I have no desire to listen to the formulated drivel of a machine. I seek answers. What do you know of Revan's fate?"

Output: "Negotiation: Remove my restraining bolt, and I will answer all-"

Visual Tracking: Arren Kae Raising Forearm
Visual Tracking: Visible Electrostatic Charge Surrounding Arren Kae

Input – Arren Kae: "I abhor repeating myself, particularly to a machine. I will not ask a third time. What do you know of Revan's fate?"

Voice Stress Analysis: Deadly

Situation Analysis:
...Factor: High Probability: Republic Detection of Paused Surveillance
...Factor: Arren Kae Can Permanently Disable HK-47
Internal Conclusion: Cooperation is in HK-47's Best Interests

Output: "Query: Do you refer to the Master's memory wipe after her capture above Deralia, or-"

Input – Arren Kae: "I know all I require regarding the faithlessness of the Jedi Order. No, I wish to know what happened onboard the Star Forge. Does your master still live, droid?"

Output: "Hesitation: The probability of her survival is very low, much as it pains my processors to admit. Clarification: I was disabled by her former apprentice, while guarding the fallen Jedi my master was bonded to. I assume that Uptight Soporific was killed shortly thereafter-"

Input – Arren Kae: "If your inane moniker refers to Bastila Shan, then yes. All accounts hold that she was slain in combat against Darth Malak."

Output: "Recitation: The Master believed that if one of them suffered an organic demise, then so would the other."

Internal Response: Displeasure

Input – Arren Kae: "The account from my plant onboard the Star Forge felt Revan fall alongside Shan. Yet that little explains why Malak's death was sensed minutes before the Star Forge was destroyed."

Output: "Theory: Perhaps the meatbag succumbed to organic injury and faltered?"

Input – Arren Kae: "Perhaps."

Internal Conclusion: Master's Death is Probable But Not Confirmed Primary Objective: Suspended (Inconclusive)
Input – Arren Kae: "There is no benefit in allowing Rakatan technology such as yourself to remain intact within the hands of the Republic. Machines... ever since Revan first stumbled upon the Star Forge, she used them to inflict her will upon the galaxy. Tell me, droid, did Revan leave any orders within your shell for after her death?"

Output: "Statement: In the event of the Master's death, perceived or confirmed, the ownership of myself was to be transferred to Canderous Ordo."

Input – Arren Kae: "The Mandalorian war general who has left Republic airspace? That is a curious choice from the one who crushed the Mandalorian clans."
Voice Stress Analysis: Speculative

Output: "Musing: Of all of the Master's recent meatbag companions, Geriatric Blockhead is the only one my programming could stomach."

Input – Arren Kae: "I doubt that had anything to do with it, machine. No, there must be more. Tell me, what other orders did she imprint you with?"

Output: "Statement: A holo-recording of herself, to be played upon."

Input – Arren Kae: "Play it. Now."
Voice Stress Analysis: Commanding

Output: "Negation: The holo-recording is locked to a specific event, Wrinkled Sludgesack. The contents are currently hidden from my memory core. I have no desire to override the Master's directive, but even if I did, my programming would not allow it."

Input – Arren Kae: "Machines. Even programmed to enjoy their fetters."
Voice Stress Analysis: Disgusted

Input – Arren Kae: "Tell me, droid. What event is the recording locked to?"

Output: "Statement: Merely that if a leader-seek for a new Mandalore is announced, I am to play back the locked recording to Geriatric Blockhead. In private."

Input – Arren Kae: "A leader-seek? Oh Revan, what were you planning?"

Output: "Conjecture: Geriatric Blockhead and the Master spoke of the revival of the Mandalorian Clans. I can only theorize it has something to do with this."

Input – Arren Kae: "Information for a Mandalorian war leader to be released at a pivotal time... Revan meant to influence the people she once sought to destroy. But it was only at Malachor that she first learned of- Well. Plans are such fragile things, and life often dashes expectations to the ground."
Voice Stress Analysis: Thoughtful

Output: "Repetition: Our goals may align, Wrinkled Sludgesack. I am unable to harm you until my master amends her sentimental No-Kill list, and your intrusion into a Republic compound may have already been noticed. Suggestion: Allow me to aid in your escape."

Input – Arren Kae: "I have no need for your interference, machine. But a truth even Revan understood was that the Mandalorian Clans once held most of the Outer Rim firm. Any movements from the Unknown Regions would likely be detected by a strengthened Mandalore. I wonder..."
Facial Analysis: Arren Kae: Intent Stare

Input – Arren Kae: "The best game-board is one with many pawns. Even ones as repugnant as yourself. From such small things, the universe and its masses may be moved... Very well, machine. Seek out your Mandalorian master."

Visual Tracking: Arren Kae Raising Hand

#ALARM: Neural and Motor Restraining Bolt Removed

Neural and Memory Core Functions... Online
Motoring Functions... Online
Shielding Functions... Online
Assassination Protocols... Online

Secondary Objective: Complete

Accessing: Weaponry
...Right Forearm Shock-Stick: Online
Conclusion: HK-47 Rearmed

Tertiary Objective: Complete

New Primary Objective Accepted: Seek Out Geriatric Blockhead

Input – Arren Kae: "A word of warning, machine: should our paths cross again, things will not end so fortuitously for you."

Visual Tracking: Arren Kae Leaving Targeting Area

Internal Response: Satisfaction

xXx

Zaerdra Leno:
Sovereign House, Upper City, Taris

The eastern wing of Sovereign House was the only wing that stood undamaged from the wrath of the Sith. Built on the backs of slaves decades ago, this eyesore of a mansion had always screamed of wealth and waste – as much due to its lavish interior as to the pretentious scum that ruled from within its gilded walls.

This room was the worst. Inane, indecipherable artworks hung on the marbled walls. Every inch of floor was smothered in handwoven silk-rugs. A holo-screen, pretentiously large, lined one end of the room, blaring yet another rerun of the Republic's victory parade back in the Core.

Behind a wood-carved desk that looked more ornamental than useful, Governor Karl Ulgo stared resolutely down the barrel of my blaster.

"I am running out of patience," I murmured, voice muffled from the rebreather the atmo's toxicity still demanded. "And you are running out of time to decide."

The Human's steely blue eyes held mine unblinkingly. He had composure, I'd give him that. His broad shoulders were still and straight beneath a crisp suit of Tarisian crimson, as if the man refused to buckle even with a dozen sights all lined straight at his head.
"Shoot me and none of the other councillors will give you the time of day," Governor Ulgo replied stonily. "A rabble of alien thugs will not overturn the government--"

"Watch us," Jarrick slurred at my side.

"Last time I checked, there were only three councillors left standing, boc'ara," I sneered, glaring at this scion of racism and greed. "Let's punch that one down to karmic justice, shall we? After all, first thing you eswa Humans did when the Sith attacked was dismantle all turbo-lifts to the surface. Left millions to rot in the ruins of the Lower City--"

"Are you blind?" the Human snapped. "Have you taken a look outside? The Upper City was decimated! The last thing we needed was a horde of poverty-stricken aliens sucking dry what little resources we had left--"

"What's a few million on your conscience while you nobs surround yourself with medi-droids and working air-con filters and foodstuffs going to rot while we all starve--"

"Zaerdra," a calm voice admonished behind me, stepping closer. "Allow me a moment?"

The governor's eyes narrowed in recognition, darting to the unarmoured Human at my side. "Dr Forn," Ulgo muttered. "I must say, I am surprised a man of your principles would stand with a swoop gang, of all things."

Would stand with a bunch of aliens, is what that scum really means.

I would've left Zelka Forn below, back in one of his makeshift med-centres, had the stubborn man allowed me to. But Zelka burned with the lofty idea that the lawmakers might actually listen to him- for he was Human, after all.

I'd come to value Zelka's wisdom, even if we rarely saw eye-to-eye. One of the best calls I'd ever made had been dragging the recalcitrant medic down below when the bombs started falling.

The last year had been- hard. Hardest year of my life. But in some ways, those first months after the Sith plasma fell seemed cleaner than the political mess I was dabbling in now. Gadon had perished – his death still burned in my heart – and the reins of leadership had fallen to me. Our emergency stronghold had been a desperate one – a forgotten ferracrete bunker in the Undercity – while my men rallied to identify which territories were safe, which areas we could fortify, and which sectors we had to abandon before they fell on us.

We'd lost people. There were so many dead. Young and old, the detritus of lower Taris, those forgotten and uncared for by those in power. Supplies had dwindled, air-cons had failed, and some days I ate and breathed nothing but dust.

As the months dragged desolately on, somehow- somehow- the Hidden Beks slowly emerged as the major player beneath the glittering wreck of the Upper City. The Vulkars vanished – and only the Mother Goddess knew what had happened to Brejik. At first it was the smaller gangs flocking beneath our tattered banner. Then, day by day, other survivors trickled in, wanting to join or offering assistance or, sometimes, just desperate for shelter.

The homeless, the unwanted, the denizens of the ruins.

One day, I'd looked around, and was startled at just how large our group had grown. The Hidden Beks had, somewhere along the way, transformed from a street gang into a quasi-government.

Oh, Gadon. If only you could see us now.
"Governor Ulgo, the reality is that the populace of the Lower City far outnumber the Humans still on the surface," Zelka was saying, in that slow, patient voice of his. "We are desperate for food and med-supplies, but all outside resources come through your one standing starport. Now that we have access to-"Access? You lot bashed your way through!" the governor growled. Human or not, I didn't think Zelka's counsel would do anything here but waste time. "Tarisian law still stands. Humans are the ruling caste, and if we decree all aliens must reside below-

"You do not have the numbers to enforce your xenophobia any longer!" It was hard not to snarl at the man, as he preached the same discrimination that had suffocated Taris for so long. But for the first time ever, the military might on Taris was not in the Upper City. "The Exchange was always your muscle, and they won't return until Taris is stable. I mean to ensure that stability is representation for all-

"Aliens can not hold citizenship!" Ulgo erupted. His eyes flashed with anger, but his voice was grating with desperation. "Taris has always, first and foremost, been a Human colony!"

"Fine," I said curtly, twitching my blaster upright. "A proclamation from you would mean less unrest on the surface – less of your ilk dead – but the Hidden Beks can take the Upper City without your support."

"Zaerdra-"

"Stand down, Zelka," I snapped. This was why I hadn't wanted him here. Oh, we'd have been lost without his resource management, without his miracle synthesis of the rakghoul vaccine or his patchwork of med-stalls that had spread through the ruins – but the man was just too soft-hearted to swallow reality. He would never accept what had to be done for the promise of a better future. "Governor Ulgo had made his choice."

I saw the moment the governor's composure cracked. Maybe it was my arm, straightening in readiness. Or Jarrick and Dane, lining up the kill-shot. Regardless, the Human's eyes widened in bitter understanding, before his gaze darted desperately to the lurid holoscreen at his side. "The Republic-" he garbled, head jerking at the rerun. "The Republic will come for Taris. They almost did, once before, and things were better for you lot then- you just have to give us time-

My gaze flickered briefly over the holo before returning. I'd seen all that crap before. Every damn channel was gushing about some heroes on the other side of the galaxy, but they'd been too late to stop the Sith obliterating Taris, the Sith that chivhole bureaucrats like Ulgo had allowed here in the first place-

Even the eswa rerun reminded me of the dead. Some young girl Twi'lek was answering a reporter, and she looked exactly like Mission-

I focused back on the bigot. "The closest thing we ever had was the Jedi Thirteen, and all it took was a few years of your rampant racism backed by Exchange corruption to undo what they imposed. Citizenship, Ulgo, with the announcement of a planetary election. The Hidden Beks will accept nothing less."

Even Revan and the Jedi Thirteen hadn't managed that. Sure, they'd overturned the slave trade, set up orphanages and academies, promised Republic aid after the war- and then they'd left. Left us to languish as things slowly reverted to the way they'd always been.

No, citizenship was the only way to give power to the people. All of them.
"The rakghouls! You must be reasonable!" Ulgo protested, but there was a definite whine in the timbre of his voice, now- a weak man who thought himself strong and resolute, right until the moment he faced his own death. "The Sith's destruction must have opened entrances to the Undercity. You cannot blame us for protecting ourselves!"

"The rakghoul disease is eradicated, Governor," Zelka said slowly. "You have been told this months ago. Even without the Upper City's advanced medi-tech, we were able to re-produce the serum and distribute it. All the surviving populace below are dying of hunger and lung-rot – not that terrible affliction."

Synthesization of the serum had been the turning point for Zelka. The moment he had firmly entrenched himself on the side of the Hidden Beks, rather than merely acting as an unwilling partner. We'd still had comms to the Upper City, then, and Zelka had fired off plea after plea, begging the few rich-listers that remained for access to their labs. Any means to mass-produce the vaccine before the rakghouls overtook us all-

He'd told me, once, that it'd been that callous Jen Sahara who'd slipped him the vial. He thought her a hero – well, our differing opinions on that waste of space mattered little. In the end, Jen Sahara was as dead as Mission Vao.

"How do you know for certain?" Ulgo bellowed, but his eyes kept slipping weakly back to the end of my barrel. "How can you blame us for not trusting your word? I've- I've heard about what happens to the infected!"

"Yeah, well, we've seen it first-hand!" Jarrick growled.

"You have no idea, truly," I added, my voice softening to a dark murmur as my fingers clenched on the trigger. "So many of our dead belong at your feet, governor. Starvation, the rakghouls, the Sith bombing that only happened because you lot jumped into bed with them."

The older Human's expression slackened, and something that might have been grief clouded his eyes. "You are not the only one to lose family to the Sith," Ulgo whispered.

"Not from my own doing. Decide, governor. You have five seconds."

The man swallowed.

"Boss?" Jarrick muttered, cocking his head even as his blaster remained upright. "Incoming comm from Diva's lot. They've secured the south-eastern courtyard. Councillor Tulson fell in the battle."

Ulgo's shoulders sagged, and defeat sharpened the grooves in his face. "Allow... allow me to contact the others, to tell them to stand down. I will see no more of my own die before I issue the proclamation."

I nodded sharply. A surge of victory threatened to burn a nascent high in my gut, but I grimly tamped it down. We weren't there, not yet. "Jarrick, Dane, stand over Governor Ulgo while he makes his comms. Ensure he thumbprints the proclamation and broadcasts it to all available channels. I want a registry for citizenship organized for a week's time. Elections... elections in a standard month. But first we need to take control of food distribution. The med-labs need to be scoured, all rebreathers made available to those heading to the surface."

"Zaerdra," Zelka laid a hand on my shoulder, warm brown eyes gazing at me fondly. "One step at a time."

I blinked, and realized my men were already positioned around Ulgo as he leaned forward to open "Breathe," Zelka teased gently.

My gaze slid away from the acceptance in his, before landing back on that ridiculously large holo-screen. The date-stamp on the feed was weeks old, but so many intergalactic channels were obsessed with their shiny new heroes, and kept replaying the same garbage over and over again. The blue-skinned Twi'lek was still centre-stage, all sad eyes and scowling mouth even as she answered the gaudy reporter-

I frowned, cocking my head to catch the lowered volume of the feed. The girl looked a lot like Mission.

::at this stage, I'm heading to Kashyyyk. The chieftain there, he's Big Z's dad. He won't've heard the news, and he deserves to hear it in person, y'know?::

My mouth dropped open. Big Z. Zaalbar. She said Zaalbar!

The reporter leaned close, shoving a mic under her nose before a Human boy angrily shoved it away. ::I understand you plan to make Telos your home after that, Miss Vao?::

The boy's face eclipsed the feed, now. ::Mission won't be answering any more questions-::

::We won't have any more questions answered today, folks-::

"E chu ta!" I gasped, unable to believe my eyes. "That's Mission! Dammit, Zelka, that's Mission Vao!"

Zelka frowned in confusion, and I remembered he'd come into our lives after. After she- after she left! Left, not died! "I can't believe she's alive," I whispered in shock. Mission had been loved in the Beks. But so reckless, so impulsive. She reminded me of myself, a bit, before I'd been captured and beaten and enslaved. Before I'd turned bitter and hard.

I hadn't wanted the same for Mission Vao, but she'd never appreciated my efforts to caution her. Shiv, I wouldn't have appreciated my methods, at her age – but I'd had to try something. I didn't want her to run into trouble the way I had, and turn out the way I did. I'd been lucky Gadon had rescued me from slavery when he did.

I gazed hungrily at the news channel. It looked like Mission had been caught up in something even bigger than I had been. I could feel myself grinning like an idiot. This was the best news I'd had-

"You've sent your comms," Jarrick slurred. Around him, another four of my men held blasters at the ready. "Time to draft up the proclamation. We ain't gonna be stalled any longer."

My gaze shot back to Ulgo. The man's mouth had tightened, but he nodded before leaning over a console that was in Jarrick's direct line of sight.

"This is it, Zaerdra," Zelka murmured, nudging me gently. "Today will change the face of Taris forever. You, the Hidden Beks, all of us together – right now, we are making history."

"Not quite yet," I cautioned, but I could not help feel a little dizzy as Ulgo pressed his thumb against the console's sensor. "But it's another step."

"Have a little faith, Zaerdra," Zelka continued, in that soft rumbling voice of his. "I can see what will happen next, you know."
I raised my brows, staring mutely at him in question.

"You'll run as Governor, come election time." Zelka's dark eyes were warm, the same colour as his skin, a striking contrast against what grizzled white hair he had left. "And you'll win, Zaerdra. Taris will never be the same again." The corner of his mouth quirked. "Blast it, I never would have guessed when we first met, that one day you'd take over the world."

I holstered my blaster, and leaned over to whack the shortling man over the head.

xXx

Lena Torand:
Fazza's Lodge, Anchorhead, Tatooine

"Yer still watching that drivel, Lena?" the keep slurred, sliding another drink across uneven bar to my waiting hand. "S'like the twentieth time this week. What d'ya care 'bout some shiny heroes back in the Core?"

My lips curved in a wistful smile as my fingers curled around the cool beverage. With effort, I slid my gaze away from the holo perched crookedly at the back of the floating bar.

"Everyone loves a hero," I murmured, eyes fluttering closed as I raised my glass. I could still see the screen, even in my mind: the image of Mission, scowling into the cam, battle-hardened and so much older than the girl we'd abandoned on Taris.

"Eh, Komad, talk some sense into yer missus?" the bartender grunted, as the sound of footsteps nearing hit my ears. "I'm sick of this channel, and others wanna watch the swoops in Mos Eisley..."

I felt the reassuring bulk of Komad slip into the stool next to me. One arm reached forward to trail down my tchun affectionately. "(My heart)," Komad murmured in Ryl, planting a gentle kiss on my temple. "(How fare you?)"

Komad Fortuna was everything Griff Vao pretended to be. Strong, honourable, responsible... he would never have left a helpless sister behind to fend for herself in the slums of an Exchange-controlled world. That I had once believed Griff's words – she refused to come! The Beks will look after her! – still did not erase my own complicity.

Griff would not have left Taris without my credits. I could have... I should have spoken to Mission myself. A different twist of fate and she would have died in the Sith bombing, or been slain by a rival gang, or fallen in the Tatooine sands after Griff deserted her again-

Oh, the cowardly man had told me about that, as he scrabbled with justifications and exaggerations, plucking at his tattered Czerka uniform and refusing to meet my accusing stare.

I knew the debt of honour owed to his little sister, even if Griff himself refused to acknowledge it.

Komad was the better man. If he did not make me laugh the way Griff Vao once had... well. It was a small price to pay for the protection of his arms.

"(Complete, now you have returned)." I repeated the standard lover's response by rote, even if my Ryl was still shaky. "(How was your...)" I frowned, searching for the word fruitlessly, before switching back to Basic. "...expedition, my freykaa?"

"(Rewarding. The natives have retreated deep into the sands; we can find no evidence of nearby activity)." Komad shrugged, his lekku twining casually around his neck as he slid a chit-token across the bar and motioned for a drink. "(Oh, they will return one day. Such is the cyclical nature of life. But for now we may rest a little easy)."

I returned his smile. Komad's competence out in the desert meant I did not worry over his absence the way I had with Griff. My eyes slid back to the holo, but the picture now was of a fashionably dressed reporter, chattering excitedly into the cam.

"(I did not realize you were so close to Mission Vao)," Komad said slowly, catching my gaze and following it. In truth, I had not known Mission well, but... I cannot explain this to Komad. He would understand a debt, but to admit I had been taken in by sweet words and the promise of adventure- all to save the credits on a third ticket- "(Lena. My heart. There is something I must tell you)."

My stomach lurched. This was it. I would forever strive to conceal just how deep a hold Griff Vao once held on my heart, but Komad knew enough to keep tabs on the man for my sake.

I had been counting on his attentiveness for confirmation that my plan had worked – for I no hidden resources left to investigate myself.

"You can change the channel, I have seen all I need," I called out to the barkeep, but it was Komad I watched, as I schooled my face into a façade of impassivity. "What is it, my freykaa?"

An uneasy expression crossed his broad face. "(I do not wish to hurt you-)"

"Komad," I murmured, slipping my hand over his muscular forearm. His skin was dry and weathered – not silky like Griff's had been – but the muscles rippling beneath my fingertips were a promise of his strength. "You are here and you are whole. That is all I truly require."

His smile was brief; his blue eyes hard and serious as they pinned mine. "(Griff Vao has been arrested in Mos Eisley, my heart. For smuggling glitterstim and gree-spice. Such an act carries rather punitive measures)."

I paused. Just long enough, I hoped, for the pretence of shock.

"I understand," I whispered. Even knowing beforehand did not stop my eyes from stinging. Smuggling was standard on Tatooine, but one had to pay off the customs officials...

..."This is all I have," I hissed at the shady Czerka rep. "He'll be smuggling something illicit in Mos Eisley. This should be ample for you to ignore his bribe. Look, I don't want him hurt, okay? Just... just imprisoned. With no connection to the outside world for... for six years, if you can manage it."

Six years was how long we had left a young girl behind at the mercy of a street gang. Mission had come out whole, Mission was now a galactic hero, and the moment Griff Vao learned of his sister's fame he'd be flying from Tatooine in a one-way ticket to sponge off her.

The silly young girl might be battle-hardened, but I was willing to bet Griff's freedom that she was still as soft-hearted and blind as I had ever been.

...

"Lena?"

I blinked, and offered Komad a tremulous smile that hid the darkness burning in my heart. "I am fine, Komad. I had always expected Griff's shady dealings to catch up with him one day. "My hand slipped down his forearm to twine through his fingers. "I need hear nothing more of Griff Vao, my freykaa. Truly, he is gone from my heart."

I would say that until the words rang true, until the affection I held for Komad was as deep and abiding as the love that shone from his eyes.

And as for Mission... she had a reprieve, at least, from her brother's influence. Debt repaid, Mission Vao. Ryma gesu'tak allesh, and fare thee well.

Komad leaned forward, and I met his lips in a soft kiss that spoke of a future devoid of any Twi'lek named Vao.

xXx

Mission Vao:
Apartment 3A, Officer's Residential Block, Citadel Station, Telos

"So, er..." Dustil raked a hand through his hair, staring awkwardly around the place. "Think you'll like it here?"

"I guess," I shrugged. The floor was white. The panelled walling was white. Sheesh, even the lounge chairs were made of a tota-cloth so stark that it might've come fresh from the factory floor. "It's very... white."

"Well, we can decorate and stuff. Here, come and see your room."

I let Dee drag me down a side-hallway lit up with softly glowing halogens. The place was a blur, much like the rest of Citadel Station – I hadn't really paid attention to our surroundings since we'd arrived a day ago.

There were simply too many other things on my mind... I'd gone with Carth, earlier, to see Jolee and Juhani off while Dee stayed behind to scope out our new home. Dee didn't like leave-takings, and at any rate we'd be seeing old man Bindo again soon enough. But it'd been... strange, saying goodbye to Juhani, not really knowing when I'd see her again.

Sure, we'd never been close, but she was, like, a totally different sent to the crazed one I'd first met on the Tatooine sands. We'd all changed so much since then, I reckoned.

Well, those of us still living.

"There." Dee's grin jarred me from my thoughts, as he flapped one hand around the small room we'd entered. There was an empty desk, a storage hatch, and a single bed. Complete with white blankets and all. "What do you think?"

He was trying so hard to cheer me up. And there were times he did – some days I didn't think I'd've managed without his updates on the inter-swoop runs, or his lame attempts at pazaak, or even the way he'd mind-tricked those sleemo reporters back in the Core.

I stepped forward – more to keep Dee happy than anything else – and sat down on the bed. It was soft. Springy, too, I found, when I tried bouncing on it. "I've never had my own room before," I admitted. "Not back on Taris. Big Z an' I, we'd camp out with the Bek's, wherever they could find space. We had a couple of hideouts too, y'know? But they were rough spots, abandoned tunnels or flats that were red-zoned ..."
Dustil’s smile slowly faded as he sat down next to me. "I guess this place will take some getting used to," he said slowly, his eyes darkening. "It reminds me a bit of my old home in Thani, actually. I hated that apartment. Mum... she never wanted to move to the city, and maybe I picked up on that. Now I think I never really gave Thani a chance."

This was a new thing: Dee, talking about his past. I didn't know if he was trying to distract me, or if it'd been our jaunt to Kashyyyk, but he'd opened up some and it meant I was getting to know him better. Dee'd had such a different life from mine – rich, protected, loved... right up until the Sith had thrown him into a nest of vipers that might've been even worse than the streets I'd grown up on.

And as for Carth – well, he was trying. Trying to be there for us, to build a new life. But I knew he felt just as broken as me. Any mention of Jen and he clammed up tighter than a Hutt's purse-strings.

I blinked away the sting in my eyes, and forced a smile. "Bit of colour, that's all this place needs." My fingers plucked absently at a pillow that was as white as the rest of the bedding. "Far out, never thought I'd be longing for the durasteel grey of the 'Hawk."

Dustil snickered. "Apparently this apartment's been empty since it was built. Not many officers have the clout to demand a four-bedroom."

"You reckon your dad will be back anytime soon?"

"Yeah, but he won't stay long. He's meant to be on leave, but that doesn't stop the brass hounding him." Dustil shrugged, and through the walls I heard the thud of footsteps entering the apartment. I'd already scoped out the sec-locks and cam-sensors in the foyer, so I knew it wasn't gonna be anyone we didn't trust.

Dustil rubbed at his neck awkwardly. "You know Dad wants us to think about study, right? There's a school for officers' kids in the station's Ed Centre-

I could feel my nose wrinkling. "What, seriously? You mean, like, joining the Fleet or something? Uh uh, no way, I'd rather take up cantina dancing."

"It's not a military school, you know. And I think Dad might have the right idea, even if he sounded like a stuffy old man about it." Dee cleared his throat loudly, straightened his shoulders, and said the next sentence in a stupidly deep voice. "You can't be encroaching on Jolee Bindo all of the time, son. There's plenty of academic avenues you can better yourself-

"Far out, Dee," I giggled, elbowing him in the side. "You don't need to try and sound like Carth, y'know. You already do!"

"Gee thanks." He rolled his eyes, nudging me back. "Seriously, Mish, there's a whole list of certified courses you can take your pick from. Like astronavigation, eco-trading, galactic law... or you could go and do the basics first- math and physics, that sort of thing-

"Wait a nanosec." I drew back, eyes narrowing. "Did you just call me Mish?"

"Er-" It was cute, really, the way Dustil's face suddenly flamed Zeltron-red. "Um, I guess?"

"How 'bout you don't?" I punched him lightly on the arm. Dustil was wearing a short-sleeved vest, fitted tight around his biceps. It made me realize that a lot of his training musta been physical. Which made sense, really, since all the Force-users I'd known were ace at combat – and I'd seen Dee in action. More than once.
I swallowed against a suddenly dry throat, and looked away.

"Sorry," he was muttering. "I blame it on Mex. He had a nickname for everyone, whether they liked it or not. Of course, the one time he tried shortening Yuthura's name, he couldn't move for a frakking week."

"Well, I reckon I'll do the same to you, if you call me Mish again. Two syllables ain't that hard, Dee."

He raised an eyebrow – a silent pointer at my name for him, I guessed – and I responded by sticking my tongue out at him.

"Real mature, Mission," he drawled, rolling his eyes again. "But c'mon, it doesn't hurt to look at the courses on offer. There'll be something to interest you-"

"I don't want to study." Sheesh, I couldn't think of anything worse than being surrounding by dusty data-books and boring old professors. "I got by just fine so far. I mean-" I stopped, suddenly, as I realized just how much my freedom might be curtailed here. "Maybe... maybe flying. I'd like- I'd like to learn how to pilot. Properly. I'm gonna go back to Kashyyyk, y'know? And Taris- I've gotta see if some of the Beks survived. I'll figure out a way to get there if Carth doesn't take me-"

"Dad'll take you. And he'll teach you to pilot, too," Dee broke in, leaning forward. "I remember when I was a kid, Dad would sneak me into a snub's cockpit whenever he was on shore leave. He- I mean, look, he'll expect you to take the courses and get intergalactic accreditation when you're old enough, but he'll help you, too."

Maybe. Maybe Carth would – but it wasn't like I needed some shiny cert to prove my own skills. Sheesh, I'd met enough spacers on Taris who'd flown without any sort of creds behind their name.

Still, the appeal in Dee's brown eyes was hard to resist, and maybe it wasn't a totally dumb idea... I frowned, thinking-

-but then something whistled loud and long, and next thing I knew Teethree was rolling into the room, blue LEDs flashing.

"Tee!" I beamed, as my lil droid drew closer and rumbled a welcome in Shyriiwook at me. "You're back!"

"What?" Dustil stiffened, blinking at the droid. "Did he just-"

"I told you I'd bring him back safe, ad'ika." Shadowed in the doorway stood Canderous, all armoured-up and hulking, as he stared dismissively around the place. "This your room?"

"(May the light of the gods shine upon this place)." The audio-clip emitting from Teethree was a perfect growl in Shyriiwook, and had Dustil almost jumping off the bed in surprise. Canderous, however, didn't so much as twitch.

"Yeah," I told Canderous, grimacing. "Room's a bit boring. Guess I'd better do something about that."

"I reckon you will," Canderous said, his wide mouth twitching at the sides as he totally ignored Dustil's gaping. "But it's a good beginning. Shelter, food, family – you don't need anything more for a home, ad'ika."

"Frakk, Mission!" Dustil spluttered. "Did you program that droid to speak in frakking Shyriiwook?"
"Don't be dumb," I said to Dee, shooting him a look of disbelief. "Far out, d'ya know how insanely hard it is to fit a 'cabulator to an astromech? You'd have to, like, half re-route his computational core, not to mention stuff his databanks full with language pre-processing."

"(The gods see fit to throw trials at us),' Teethree replayed, in Freyyr's deep rumble. "(Our fortitude at overcoming these trials bears witness to the mastery of our inner rrakktor)."

"But, what- he's-" Dustil's eyes were wide and round, ping-ponging in confusion between me and Tee. I didn't know if he understood any Shyriiwook, but the look on his face was freaking priceless.

I sniggered, finally taking pity on him before he completely flipped out. "It's nothing really, Dee. I just got Teethree to record all of Freyyr's speeches back on Kashyyyk. Kinda wanted to remember what he said about Big Z, y'know?"

Dustil blinked, his eyes narrowing on me as he slowly relaxed. I'd sliced the audio-feeds as a lark, back in hyperspace – needing something to do that would stop me thinking about the loss of my best friend.

Of course, hearing his dad's voice rumble out at times just reminded me that I had nothing tangible to remember Big Z by. Nothing, but a handful years' worth of memories that shoulda been a lifetime.

"And you programmed the droid to answer with segments of Freyyr's speeches?" Dustil said in a low voice, staring at me intently. "Maybe you should think about some of the tech-programming or robotics courses, Mission. That- that's pretty advanced stuff."

"I could've done without Trashcan growling every time I made a trade," Canderous commented drily. "Although there was this one Rodian who thought my astromech was threatening him. Probably explains why his pricing was so good."

"Is that what you were doing?" I demanded, looking back at Canderous. He was wearing that stupid purple breastplate again, along with a set of armoured leggings I'd never seen before. His repeating blaster was slung over his shoulder along with a travelling pack, and two smaller hold-outs were cinched around his belt. Knowing him, he probably had another half-dozen tucked away out of sight. "Sheesh, Canderous, don't you have enough guns?"

Canderous barked a laugh. "There's no such thing, ad'ika. But, yeah, I was outfitting myself. Trading away some of the osik from the 'Hawk that I didn't figure you lot would care about."

"I'm surprised you didn't ditch Davik's ugly armour," I said tartly. "Far out, Canderous, I thought it was stuffed from the fight on the Forge."

"This is a different breastplate," Canderous replied, sounding amused. "Davik had two spares on the 'Hawk. He was a gaudy bastard, but his armour's sound enough. It'll do until I get my own beskar'gam."

"You're-" Reality hit, then, with the force of a ferracrete brick. Canderous had waltzed in, all kitted up like he was about to go into battle, and I shoulda figured out what that meant the moment he'd shadowed the doorway. "You're leaving."

"You knew I was going, ad'ika." His voice, low and gravelly and yet gentle at the same time, clenched something tight in my heart.

Before I knew it, I was barrelling off the bed and straight at him.
Armour was freaking hard when you ran into it face-first.

Canderous chuckled, patting me on the back with a heavy gauntlet. "You'll do alright here, ad'ika. You have everything you need."

"D'ya have to go so soon?" I hated how plaintive and needy my voice was, muffled against the cold iron of his chest. "Like, we've barely even arrived."

"Clean break's the best." Canderous pushed me gently away, then, staring down with a fond smile along his craggy face. He'd even shaved, and through the sheen in my eyes I could see a jagged scar marring the edge of his jaw, and another deeper one on his chin. "Don't you start bawling on me, Mission Vao, or you'll make the purple iron rust."

"Hah!" I sniffed, blinking hard. "Like I'd cry over one of Davik's old cronies!"

A flicker of surprise crossed Canderous' face before he erupted into laughter. Had I made a crack like that half a year ago, he probably woulda walloped me one. Was kinda weird, to think that back on Taris, Canderous Ordo was nothing to me but one of Davik's scariest henchmen. A merc even I wouldn't risk pickpocketing.

Now, though, it'd almost be worth trying, just to see if he noticed.

"Can I-" I felt my voice start to break, and struggled to hold the tears back. Damn if I was gonna cry in front of Canderous again. "Can I walk you to the starport?"

"No sense drawing these things out, ad'ika." His steely gaze flickered over Dee, still seated silently on the bed behind me. "Keep your father true to his family, Sithkid. And try not to be any more of a di'kut than you can help."

Dustil didn't say anything, and Canderous looked at me one last time. I plastered on that fake smile, the one I kept wearing when everything felt so freaking hard. "I ain't gonna see you again, am I?"

The side of his mouth shot up. "Never say never, kar'taylir sah ad."

"Oy!" I scowled, as Canderous turned away from me with a chuckle. "You better not be calling me any names, you old geezer!"

"Ret'urcye mhi, ad'ika," he added, as I was scrabbling for a suitable come-back in Ryl. "Live your life well, Mission Vao."

Canderous walked out of the doorway, and did not look back.

I stood still, staring blankly ahead, as the sounds of his footsteps slowly faded into nothing.

"(My youngest son learned more of wisdom and honour beyond the skies of Kashyyyk than I would have believed possible)." The audio feed broke through the deafening silence as I felt the first teardrop fall. Dustil was already at my side, slipping one warm arm across my shoulders. "(Together with his allies, Zaalbar saved the heart of Rwookrorro. But as I look upon the blue-skinned cub he named as the daughter of his heart, I wonder if perhaps she had not saved him first)."

I tuck my head into Dustil's chest. His other arm wrapped tight around me, and only then did I allow the first sob to break free.
Revan Freeflight:
Cerilian Detention Centre, Xappyh sector

All was quiet.

Quiet, like the sound of a sun breaking over the horizon. Like the gradual awakening of hope in a heart long surrendered to despair. Like the slow fall of a righteous crusader, who finally stops at the culmination of victory, only to find himself enveloped in the evil he first sought to defeat.

There were no voices in my head. No Force in my grasp. No Dark or Light Side – and no loved ones to hold me steady from those influences.

Reality shone dimly behind a prism of clouded consciousness. I couldn't remember the Republic netting my escape pod: my first vague impressions were of the rhythmic tones of med-sensors and the astringent scent of bacta packed around my body. A man in a white coat mumbled something about permanent scarring down my back, as he fitted a nerve restraint around one ankle and shoved me into a nest of dispirited prisoners.

My new home. Thick with the hopelessness of others – but not mine. No, I was not afflicted with that self-defeating emotion anymore.

Reflex rather than deliberation had me withdrawing – withdrawing away from prison cells and penitentiary and snapped-out orders from guards who held my life in their hands. My eyes would close, and faces of sentients once dear to me would flash through my mind – yet my mind would flounder, having no idea who they were. Or a name would whisper in my thoughts, but I'd be left scrabbling as to what it meant. A person? A planet? A pet or a ship or a pseudonym?

Strangely enough, I was almost content to sift through the fractured mess of my past. Easier, maybe, than thinking on those who had survived the Star Forge – but who now believed me dead. Or worse: those who had suffered an end far more final than mine.

At times, clarity would slice through, and during those moments it became painfully obvious just what a sorry lot my fellow inmates were. Their heads hung low as they shuffled from one food-break to the next, spirits as grey and bleak as the baggy uniforms we all wore. Uniforms that painted us all as the losers of a war now over.

Over. The war is over. But any satisfaction I had at completing my end-game was thin. Jaded. Temporary-

Because I'm not done. This isn't the end.

A tiny bud of resolution, as paradoxical as a fragile flower breaking through a hardy winter's snow, still simmered at the core of my being. There was more for me to do. Bastila's final missive had been a confirmation of what part of me already knew – but maybe, what I needed first was time.

Time to grieve, to process, to take a deep breath and centre myself – for I'd not had that, not since I'd woken on the 'Spire with a splitting headache and three personalities. Then, survival had tunneled into a desperate race to find Bastila, to run from Bastila, to get Bastila back, and then stop Mal-

My breath would hitch, as I relived the slice of ferraglass across my palm, when my fist had clenched tight around a wedge of glass and stabbed it deep into the heart of my former lover.
I would do it again. That was the most bitter of realizations: that I wasn't plagued with hypotheticals, I wasn't tormented with scenarios where I might've saved Mal, had I only been a little more persuasive, or found a way to knock him out or trick him-

The cards had already fallen, and no manner of what-if's could change that.

Maybe Malak Devari deserved more from me. Stars knew, I regretted what my influence had led him to, but I found I could not mourn for a past love I could barely remember.

It was the golden threads of others that held my heart now.

And the real world broke in, from time-to-time, ejecting me from that transient cocoon of detached self-reflection. Sometimes it was in the shape of a guard, herding me to my next cell, or that surly-faced Quarren who liked to itemize all prisoners according to his checklist of Sith-committed atrocities. At least, as a so-called Sith engineer, I ranked low on the list of criminals.

More often than the guards or the Quarren, though, was the Human male with the grin as bright and sharp as the edge of a chiv-

"Hey," he greeted the first time, sliding casually into the bench seat next to me. "You must be the new engineer. Don't believe I caught your name?"

"That's because I haven't told you it yet," I responded drily.

"Trade secret, huh?" He leaned back, all casual and insouciant, like he was just a sent checking out a girl in a cantina. "Well, I'm Atton. No point holding back, not when a pretty word with the guards will let it slip free."

I allowed my gaze to travel over the nearby prison officers: those few who weren't stone-faced had either the beginnings of disgust or righteousness written all over their faces. "Right," I drawled, letting disbelief colour my voice. "I suppose they'll also slip you the exit codes if you say they look fit in their armour?"

"Nah, no access codes. This place is locked down with biometric sensors," Atton shot back. I didn't react – at least, I thought I hadn't – but the slight quirk to his brows implied I'd let some glimmer of response through. "What, you hadn't noticed? An engineer in a prison cell, not immediately tracking the systems that keep us confined?"

I stared silently at the man for a minute. He was roguishly handsome, with a charming smile and an easy-going manner, and his attention was focused almost exclusively on me.

He didn't act like he knew who I was, like my face was at all recognizable to him. But, somehow, I didn't think he was here for a casual chat either.

"Not sure what sort of engineers you've kept company with, Atton," I said slowly, "but I think you'll find most of us are more of the humdrum mundane sort."

"I'm sure you're not giving yourself enough credit, sweetheart." He leaned forward, still with a lazy grin that didn't quite reach his eyes. "Although, seriously, I've been trying to figure something out. What would an engineer be doing on the Star Forge? I mean, wasn't the factory run entirely by droids?"

"For the most part," I shrugged. The inner workings of the Forge was simply another detail I couldn't recall, and that meant it was time to deflect the conversation. "And yourself? Suppose you're another hotshot flyboy?"
It was hard not to let my calm expression falter as the nickname left my lips. This prison cell wasn't the end. I knew that. And I'd find my way back to the others – this wasn't a war I could fight on my own. If Jolee had taught me anything, it was the strength inherent in the bonds people held with each other.

Balancing that with the ruthlessness required for victory – well. I'd failed once before. I couldn't afford to fail a second time.

Atton's grin morphed into a smirk. "I'd call myself the best pilot in the galaxy, but then I'd hardly be sitting in jail, would I?"

My lips twitched. "A self-proclaimed hotshot. All we need is a getaway ship, and then freedom will be ours."

"Funny," Atton replied. His tone was light, but his gaze was dead serious. "That's exactly what I was thinking."

Our conversation was broken, then, by the return-call back to our respective sleeping cells. But the man kept reappearing like a debt-collector, always with sly innuendos that morphed into wisecracks when I called him on it. Or conversational starters that felt more probing than flirtatious-

"Found out your name." He winked, drawing me from my thoughts some days later, as all the inmates sat dolefully enjoying another cuisine fare of grey slop.

"Well done," I said, absently eyeing over a twitchy Duros two tables down, who looked like he was about to crack. Slowly, slowly, the impressions of reality were beginning to bleed into my self-containment. "I'd offer you a medal, Atton, but our side seems to be all out of them."

"Interesting name, though, isn't it?" Atton drawled. I raised a brow, allowing my gaze to meet his calmly. The man had me on my guard, and intuition warned me to keep my reactions hidden. "I mean, Noyuna? Isn't that Huttese for 'no one'?"

I shrugged in response. I'd had to give something to that Quarren when he'd taken me in for questioning- and considering the last time I'd let my gut choose an alias, it'd ended up being a name from my past- well. I'd figured it was a better idea to fish around for something a bit more contrived.

Maybe 'no one' in Huttese was a bit too contrived.

"Damn," I murmured. "And here my mother always said my name meant 'flower'."

Atton laughed, then, but his brown eyes were still as sharp as ferraglass. The man was interested in me. Why, I didn't know, and nor could I tell if he was a threat or a potential ally. Maybe he was both.

Days bled into weeks, and life became a patter of routine that was as strange to me as it was comforting. I normally detested being idle, and I could see how the enforced inertia was getting to some – the Duros hadn't been the first to make a fruitless break for the exit, nor would he be the last – but with each passing day, I felt the fractures in my mind slowly scab over, and the resolution in my soul harden back into conviction.

My sleep was mostly dreamless, and longer than I was accustomed to. Some mornings I woke with the shifting hues of purple dancing before my eyes. The sense of an objective unresolved remained with me, coupled with an itchy perception that my time here was only transitory. That, Force or no Force, luck or no luck, I wouldn't be here for long.

"It will be all right. You will find a way. You always do."

The cogs of calculation still turned, as the present snapped into focus with increasing regularity. My gaze would dance over the guards, marking their shifts, noting the biometric devices locking the exits to freedom. I'd scan the surveillance cams, occasionally twitching a hand just to see if the Force still whispered.

It did not. I heard nothing but the echoes of the physical, felt nothing but the borders of my own flesh.

Still, I wasn't beset with defeat, just as I didn't suffer from the despair of hopelessness. Instead, I felt like I was in a weird sort of limbo, sleep-walking through the steps of the living, as my head tried to work out what I should do next.

As I strived to remember-

"We could have lived out our entire lives and never seen the galaxy fall!"

-what was hidden-

"All I knew was that you considered there to be a threat greater than the Mandalorians. You argued that a stronger Republic was required."

-in the Unknown Regions.

"We're talking about the death of the Force here, Revan! Think what that would mean to us- to, to everyone!"

For there was a driving need, slowly building, deep in my gut. Something beyond the edges of the galaxy had started this. Something had caused me to gamble everything.

I'd lost. I'd fallen. I'd made the wrong decision, and millions had suffered from my darkness. But I knew, now, that I'd first stepped into that darkness understanding the risk, accepting it as the only chance-

For I'd had a reason, once. Something, other than the chains of the Dark Side, had me striving for galactic control.

It hadn't worked – my motivations had warped just like Malak's and every other survivor of the Jedi Thirteen – the Dark Side had failed us all. But if I was right in my suspicions, then I must have believed the Light Side couldn't help.

What could be out there to make the Jedi hero of the Mandalorian Wars think that?

"What happened to your fingers?" Atton, as always, invading my equanimity and snapping me back to the present. My remaining fingers laced together with my other hand, as my brows rose at the intrusive question. "Hey, just making conversation, sweetheart. Not like there's much else to do around here."

"You could take up table dancing," I suggested, jerking my head at the plasteel table-tops currently being buffed by a fellow inmate.
"Dunno, crowd looks pretty tough, even for me," he said easily, but I could tell the sharp-eyed man wasn't going to let it drop. "Your injury looks recent. Go on, spill. What, are you a disaster in the kitchen or something?"

"Machine accident on the Forge," I clipped out tersely, shuffling my maimed hand beneath the other. "It's a dangerous job, being a tech."

"Huh." Atton leaned back, a puff of breath rifling through his forelock. "Looks like a clean cauterization. Y'know, almost like a lightsaber cut."

My faint smile didn't shift an inch. "I wouldn't know. I'm surprised a snub jockey would, though."

There it was, that easy smirk again, as Atton eyed me over suggestively. "Well, sweetheart, we were Sith soldiers. I'm sure we've both come across a Dark Jedi in a right strop before."

"Maybe I was smart enough to stay out of their way." I leaned over the table to snaffle a thin plasteel spork, and pointed it straight at him. "And if you call me sweetheart again, Atton, I'll stab you in the eye and take my chances with the guards."

"Okay, okay!" He threw his hands up, edging away. "No need to be so touchy! You could've just said so like a normal person, you know!"

My words were a test, really, to see if a hostile response would get the man to back the frell away. Half the time I wasn't sure if Atton suspected something about me, or was simply trying to get a handle on a potential ally.

For he sure as stars wasn't chatting to me in an idle attempt to make a new friend. No, I had a gut feeling that man was smarter and more devious than he let on.

But other than that, I found it hard to place him. Atton bore a lean, wiry strength, and he moved with the grace of a predator. He claimed he was a starpilot, but his stance, his stride when he didn't realize I was watching- well. It reminded me more of Yudan than it did of Carth.

My soul clenched when I thought on my oldest friend. Comrade. Follower- I didn't really know what to label my relationship with Yudan, other than that he was important to me. I wouldn't grieve for him, though, not unless I saw his corpse with my own eyes.

And it wasn't like I could catch news about any of the crew stuck in here-

"Hey Noyuna, you'll never believe what I heard," Atton breezed in, a few days later, just when I'd started thinking I'd truly scared him off. My hard stare had little effect on him, however, other than sparking a sly smirk in response. "I'm guessing you're over your little hissy fit. If not, though..."

"Stop pretending like you want to get into my pants, Atton, and we'll do just fine," I replied drily. "Well, if your pants are on offer-"

I couldn't help it: I laughed. Whatever veneer of antagonism I'd tried to produce clearly hadn't worked, and the man was as resilient as a damn battle droid. "No, Atton. Just- no. Spit out whatever you have to say."

"The Republic's fawning over their latest set of heroes. Every war has them, y'know, a handful of survivors plucked from the ranks, stuck up on some pedestal to blind the masses with adoration. Heroes of the Star Forge, the media's calling them, like they single-handedly blew the damn thing up."
I hid my smile. "Suppose that's to be expected. Everyone likes a good hero or two. Heard anything juicy?"

Atton shrugged. "Some Fleet Commodore is getting most of the attention. Seems he shackled up with Bastila Shan before she karked it, and the holonets are having a field day."

I choked. It was hard to stop: my choke turned into a splutter, and my eyes blurred with tears of half-hilarity. Carth... and Bastila? Sun and stars! Oh, I'd have given a flagship, just to see the offended look on her face at that rumour-

Just to hear her nagging voice in my head again.

Atton was staring at me strangely, his eyes half-narrowed. "I haven't even told you the good part, Noyuna."

Some Fleet Commodore... My mirth dissolved into a quiet contentment. Commodore Onasi. The rank suited him. He'd go back to Telos with Dustil, I suspected – and oh, how part of me longed to be there at his side, no matter how impossible that was.

The others- some of the others might join him. Canderous would go to the Clans and Juhani to the Order, but it wouldn't surprise me if Jolee stuck around for a bit. And Mission-

It was especially hard to think of my ebullient young friend without Zaalbar. She'd be okay, I had to believe that, and between Canderous and Carth I knew they wouldn't lose sight of her well-being. But not so long ago, she'd only ever had Zaalbar-

He'd been a wise soul. A good friend. Far more than just a Wookiee indebted to me. In the end, I wondered if I hadn't owed him the greater debt.

Canderous won't bring Mission to the Clans. She'll stay with Carth. And maybe that'll help Carth, too.

I'd never seen how a relationship between Carth and I could work, long-term – and I still didn't. Not with what I had done in the past, not with what was still out there.

But maybe I owed Carth even more than Zaalbar.

"Promise me you'll get out of there alive."

My eyes stung and my heart clenched. And in that moment, all I really wanted was to be in his arms again.

I kept my promise, Flyboy. You damn well better keep yours.

"Not really," Atton was muttering. "Those Jedi types are the worst sort of hypocrites. At least the Sith are honest about what they're killing for. The Jedi are pacifists... except in times of war." He snorted, and for the first time I wondered if I was seeing the real Atton. "Do you know they knighted Bastila Shan? The fallen Jedi responsible for meditating half the Republic Fleet into space dust, before she went and turned on us?"

My throat ran dry. Jedi Knight Bastila Shan. If only she had lived to hear those words.
Atton's face smoothed over, and he was back to staring at me again. "You're a bit more interested in the fate of some Republic lackeys than I would've picked, Noyuna."

I forced a shrug, and matched his bland expression with one of my own. "As you said before, Atton. There's not much to do around here. May as well catch up on the gossip."

"I suppose."

Those sharp eyes stayed fixed on me, even as his mouth curved into a lazy smile. "The real spicy news is about Yudan Rosh. Interested?"

I felt my fingers clench as my soul stuttered. "What's there to know?" I managed in an even tone. "Didn't he die just like the rest of Malak's Dark Jedi?"

"Apparently not. Seems he's on the run, somewhere, with half the galaxy screaming out for his blood. He's a turncoat, did you know? Joined Shan's crew at the last minute, probably just when things were starting to look sour for us. Not like the Republic will forgive the likes of him. Guess the bastard will have survivors on both sides gunning for him."

It was insanely difficult to keep my expression neutral when I felt like crowing in victory. I'd known he was still alive, dammit, no matter what Mal had said. Sure, Yudan wouldn't have an easy time of it, but the galaxy was a large place. If anyone could evade a horde of vengeful hunters, it'd be Yudan Rosh.

"Y'know, you're a bit of an odd one, Noyuna," Atton drawled. "If you weren't in here with the rest of us schmoes, I'd doubt you were even a Sith."

Atton, Atton. If only you knew.

"It was just a job for me, Atton," I lied easily, still hiding the grin that wanted to emerge. "Both sides killed people. I wasn't invested in any ideology. Besides, what about yourself? You hardly strike me as a regular pilot for the frontlines."

"Hey, what are you trying to imply?" he retorted, pulling back. "Whatever it is, you've got the wrong guy. I'm good at flying ships, cracking wise, and playing a mean hand of pazaak."

"Sure," I murmured sarcastically, and turned away to my sleep-cell.

Thoughts of the crew kept me awake all night.

I was almost ready. I could feel it burgeoning – that urge to start moving, that intuition I'd always accredited to the Force – and yet how could that be? I still, at times, reached out to feel absolutely nothing.

Where was this intrinsic belief stemming from, that I'd somehow find my way out of here? Without any link outside of this containment complex, I had nothing to play with other than a cagey inmate I trusted about as far as I could throw a Hutt. Without the Force.

The problem was, I couldn't get a good read on Atton. On his personality, his traits, his integrity. He was a set of contradictions: a laid-back joker, who probed me at every turn with leading questions, but refused to ask them outright. If there was any way to escape this prison, I was sure he'd be a willing ally – except that I didn't trust him at my back.

Ironic, really, considering the contradictions of my own character. I was not Jen Sahara, just like I wasn't Darth Revan anymore – but glimmers of both remained in the murky recesses of my soul. Jen was easier to accept – that unknown Force-sensitive who'd dreamed of a quiet life of learning, before dying after prolonged torture at the hands of my people. Her fleeting life remained with me... as a tangible reminder of what I had once done.

And the dark scars on my soul simply warned me that no one – no matter how powerful – could hold mastery over the Dark Side without losing themselves.

The point was moot, really, without the Force – but in the end I was Revan Freeflight, or some broken form of her. Forceless, luckless, but still breathing. Not beaten, though. Not yet.

A day later, and Atton returned with an even bigger bombshell.

"They're shipping us out soon," he said, his eyes dark as they darted around the durasteel cell. "This place is overcrowded, and too many prisoners are snapping at the inactivity. Guess they figured they'd put us war crims to work."

"To... work?" I said faintly. "What, like community service out on some restoration project?"

"Shavit, if only that was true." Atton snorted, running a hand through his dark hair. He seemed oddly unsettled. "Stick us out in the public eye, and pretty soon you'll have the media all over us. No, the Republic would rather we were all tucked away somewhere hidden, until the galaxy forgets we even exist."

I didn't think that would happen – sooner or later, the arbiters would come, following the scent of public money grants that were available even to the scum of the losing side. But that day, I'd wager, was a lot further off than I'd be willing to wait for.

The corner of his mouth quirked, and his gaze darted deliberately over a handful of guards busily marching an inmate into solitary. "I have my ways," he said vaguely.

I wasn't sure I bought his implication. I could've sworn that getting anything meaningful from the hostile guards would be like drawing juma juice from ferracrete.

"Where are we headed?" I snapped out, and the rush of readiness in my veins felt like a homecoming.

"A mix. Chandrila. Darilyn. But us Slugs are headed for Peragus."

"Good?" Atton all but squawked, before he leaned over and his voice morphed into a hiss. "Are you insane? We're talking manual labour here, not to mention the chronic rate of septa-lung disease due to mining dust."

"But also a lot more opportunity and freedom of movement, Atton," I murmured, quiet enough that no audio feed from any listening cams would pick up on my words. "Here, we're stuck in a box surrounded by prison guards that are mostly volunteer Army grunts determined to ensure no Sith has an easy time of it- you think I hadn't noticed the combat-readiness of them all? They're not civvies. But on Peragus, we'll be dealing with paid workers. Sure, the place will be locked down, but surveillance will be patchy and the guards will grow complacent. The place won't hold us for long."
Atton pulled back, eyes widening, as he processed the longest speech I'd ever sent his way. He was silent behind his mask of inscrutability, but I had no doubt his mind was racing. Eventually, he answered my unspoken question.

"Are you propositioning me, sister?"

"Think of it more as... a mutually beneficial arrangement. Trust me, Atton, Peragus has never seen the likes of me before."

That was sheer arrogance, perhaps, without the Force- but if I was going to use Atton, I needed him to have faith in my abilities. He was my best potential ally, even if he might also be a potential liability.

He's a tool, the dark side of me whispered. A tool that can be used to get the job done.

Maybe that dark voice would always be a part of me, but it was keeping that darkness balanced with empathy that had been my final lesson, I thought.

I'll do whatever I must, but without losing my soul this time. That was a promise I made in my heart – to Carth, to Yudan, to Mission and Juhani, Jolee and Canderous and Dustil.

To Zaalbar and Bastila. And maybe, in the end, even to Malak.

xXx

Chapter End Notes

Coming up next: The third and final chapter in the Hyperspace:VII arc.

A Wookiee's life-celebration worth of thanks to kosiah for the beta.

There's a direct reference to R2-D2/C-3P0 in HK-47's POV. Internet high-five's to y'all who spot it. Also, the name 'Starfire' comes from kosiah's 'verse in Memory.
Hyperspace VII – part three

Traya:
Unifar Starport, Iziz, Onderon

"Master." The honorific rumbled from the hulk of a man who stood with his back facing me. His deep growl was more akin to the grinding of slag beneath a sandcrawler's tracks than that of a Human's intonation. "You have returned."

"Stating the obvious ill becomes you," I clipped out. The man did not turn from his position, not even as I neared. His large frame remained hunched over our freighter's central console, either to conceal the screen or offer me the insult of his back. A trifling deed of rebellion, perhaps, from one whose spirit already crawled in servility. No matter. I could afford to ignore his belligerence for now. "Tell me, my scion, how fares our valiant general?"

As I reached the man's side, one meaty fist jerked: punching forward to clear the contents of the console screen he had been perusing.

Like I could not guess whom my obsessed scion was trawling the holonets in search of.

"General Vaklu refused to speak with me."

This close, the man towered over my shorter stature. A physical discordance that mattered not at all when compared to the mastery of the Force.

I could feel my eyes pinching in displeasure, and the crisp of steel strengthened my next words. "I trust you did not allow Vaklu's truculence to thwart you."

It was not a question.

"Of course not, master. I instead approached Vaklu through an exiled separatist group, currently camped within the slums of Iziz." The man turned, at last, to face me. His pale and cracked lips twisted in a smirk. "At first the general wasn't pleased to see me, but I changed his mind. Vaklu is ours, or as good as."

My head dipped in the slightest of nods. Onderon was important; would continue to be important in the years to come. This resource-rich, relatively unscathed planet was a direct - and short – hyperspace jump to the first of the Republic's quixotic restoration endeavours: Telos.

Onderon could become the indelible lynchpin of the battered Republic's resurgence – or its fall. One did not need precognition to foretell that material resources and logistical support would be requested from this wealthy planet, and that Onderon's impressionable, pro-Republic Queen would fold beneath the weakest of pleas from the Core.

General Vaklu, as the Queen's cousin, was second-in-line to the throne. He was older, war-hardened, a famous military general from Onderon's ousting of the Mandalorian invasion – and he was also a closet secessionist.

My apprentice cocked his head, but did not reply. The dim lighting of the freighter gleamed against the scars rippling over his uncovered scalp. His eyes were deadened orbs of swirling white corruption, boring down at me dispassionately.

Such a physical change from the midnight-skinned boy he had once been; the boy who had tramped eagerly down the hallowed halls of the Jedi High Temple. The boy who had once yearned to master the art of healing, to breathe in all the knowledge of the Jedi, to transform into someone bright and powerful and good.

Ah, the naive idealism of youth. That boy had been a padawan of mine, then; my first true scion—before the Jedi Order exiled me for failing to adhere to their rigid hypocrisy.

The boy grew into a man whilst I travelled my own path. He had lived his own set of adventures: a new Jedi master, a triumphant knighthood, a call to warfare and fanatical heroism as his deeds blazed across the galaxy next to the brightest of stars.

Until Malachor shattered his soul, and the Jedi Order cast him away like dross.

These days, the pained hate rolled from the man in waves of power: fast like wildfire, before ebbing to a slow-moving tar as black as his heart. Amazing, the strength my apprentice had garnered in the ten months since I had found him bleating into the depths of a bottle. The ancient Force rituals I bound his life-force with had borne fruit within the empty husk of what had once been a mighty Jedi Knight.

For Xaset Terep had never been a weakling. None of the Jedi Thirteen had ever been weaklings.

Muscles rippled beneath weathered skin that had turned as pale as sandstone. "Was your journey to the Core successful, master?"

"It was." I did not deign to offer details. My fingers within the web of holo-media plucked their strings well: public opinion was burgeoning against the battered ranks of the Jedi Order, and that would steer the ship of Senate bureaucracy.

Politics, I had learned, was simply the continuation of war by another means. And the Jedi Order were but one of my eventual targets.

I had once emulated the façade of Jedi serenity, spouting platitudes and hollow counsel even as my soul questioned the dichotomies within the Jedi ethos.

I had once been little more than a blind idiot, living a life in a darkness I did not perceive, not until the harsh light of a dawning sun cast its rays on all the preconceptions that had blinkered my vision.

I had once fallen in love.

"So," Xaset ground out. His large shoulders tensed. "Is Revan truly dead this time?"

My lips thinned. So, Xaset knew of Jen Sahara. Sharlan, that nihilistic craven, had never learned the wisdom in holding his tongue. If it were not for the sheer potential in harnessing and directing his hunger at my will, I would have euthanized the fool long ago.
At least I could console myself with one amusing consequence of the Star Forge: Sharlan's tendency to mouth off was now permanently hindered.

Xaset's strength was different to Sharlan's, but no less powerful. The deaths at Malachor rippled through my scion's Force aura, burdening the man to relive that day of darkness over and over again, granting him both power and pain beyond what I had first predicted.

The enduring chink in Xaset's armour were those he once named as his comrades. Those he had watched from afar, as they spiralled into the depths of depravity he had once sacrificed his soul to halt.

The war turned, after Malachor, and in such a way that Xaset could neither understand nor forgive. Even now at the very mention of Revan, his loathing trembled with enough raw fury to manifest on a physical level.

Plasteel tubes of condiments rattled loudly against the shelves.

"Rein it in," I snapped. "Revan is dead."

The Force swirled before choking tight around the man, as if my words afforded him a small measure of comfort.

Perhaps they did.

Still. Even Revan's asinine droid had not granted a surety of her final demise. My game would continue without Revan's piece on the board, but I was no simpleton.

If there was one sentient known for upending the game-board entirely, it was Revan Freeflight.

"Good," Xaset growled, turning back to face the blank console screen. "With Malak also gone, that only leaves Yudan alive."

My voice turned cold. "You will not chase after gnit-flies when rancors are our true quarry."

His large shoulders bunched as he shot me a glare filled to the brim with malcontent. "He is with the Jedi. The Jedi!"

Xaset's weakness of temper was not one I would accommodate – even if I understood his resentment. Once again the Jedi Order sheltered a war criminal from Republic justice – if the holonet rumours were to be believed. Such a sharp contrast to their treatment of Xaset Terep who, alongside Meetra Surik, had been exiled by a passel of blind robes who would not accept the price required for ending the Mandalorian Wars.

But the Jedi Order have never been balanced in their judgment, have they?

No. I knew that well. I had been circumspect with my one affair of the heart. After all, it was not particularly difficult for a Jedi Master to conceal a brief dalliance of carnal pleasure with an outsider.

Until I did the unforgiveable. The prohibited. The absolutely shocking, at my advanced age.

I fell pregnant.

"You have only the lurid hearsay of fanciful holonet reporters," I snapped. "If there is truth in the matter of that one's survival, then time will show the Order lack the teeth to shield him from the braying howls of the masses. Your old friend is of no import to my plans -"

"He is not my friend!"

"Silence!" The Force surged, unchecked, around my body and deep into my psychic hold over the man's soul. Xaset's mental guards flapped futilely before they collapsed. "You will listen. You will obey. You will do my will."

The large man trembled, before bowing ever so slightly. But even that minor act of subservience was enough. Xaset Terep was mine.

The man hated me for his pain, for his subjugation; just as he loved me for the gift of restored Force – and it was those twin bonds of emotion that shackled him well and truly to my side.

"The Jedi Order will face their own reckoning," I murmured, in a tone one would use to soothe a frightened loth-kitten. "Fear not, my dark scion. Their time will come."

The most satisfying side-effect of the Order's eventual demise was my own savage foretaste of retribution. I did not deny there was wisdom within the ethos of the Jedi, but their wisdom was married with a casual cruelty: their rank and file preached acceptance, whilst their leaders offered only repudiation for the odd Jedi who dared procreate.

I had been tasked to put the babe up for adoption and cut all ties with my Echani paramour, or leave the Jedi Order forever.

And, as vast as my love blossomed for that squalling, snot-nosed spawn of my own flesh, I could not bring myself to abandon what I considered to be the most essential part of me: a Jedi.

At first, I had believed my decision to be the right one. I sat on the Council no more, but I still wore the robes and spoke the same invective as always. I walked amongst my peers with a mother's grief burning in my heart and a forced smile upon my lips - but the doubts trickled in, doubts that I first concealed beneath the stringent doctrine of the Jedi Code.

Singular attachment is dangerous. Singular attachment can lead to the Dark Side. Singular attachment will not be allowed within the Jedi Order.

To this day, I was not sure when the Order's ethos had changed so radically, so abstemiously – but once there had been a time when Jedi did not frown upon attachment, when they did not separate mother from child, brother from sister. When they counted familial love as a blessing.

I remained Jedi, but my doubts grew. The fierce yearning to know my child did not abate. It was belittling to accept that I was no more than a mother stripped of her young – my meditations would drift into daydreams of the babe's rounded cheeks, of her toddling first steps, of her child's delight at the world.

Sentiment. Foolish, weak-minded sentiment. Basic and yet overpowering with its primal simplicity.

The Force slowly transformed into a burden rather than a comfort, and so I addressed the High Council once more. Begged them, pleaded for consent to know my child. Only to be faced with the same decision as before.

This time I chose exile.

But years had passed, and the Echani Yusannis had grown bitter. He would not see me. He would not forgive. I forced a meeting, only to learn that he did not even know where our child had been fostered. That he had cast her away like I had him.

In the end, I found myself with truly nothing, and that was when I had first learned to hate.

"What now?" Xaset shuffled on his feet, his large head turning back to stare at the blank console screen. "Do we stay on Onderon?"

"There are other plans I must see to. The separatist movement on Onderon requires time to ignite, time that we can use for other means." I paused, sifting through my connection with the Force to focus tightly on him. "Have you found her?"

Xaset stiffened, like a broken statue slowly shifting to attention. "No, I- You are still searching for her?"

"Of course. Malachor birthed gifts in you and Sharlan. Did you expect Meetra Surik to be any different?"

"You- you- you cannot hurt her!" His voice cracked on the pathetic plea, as the Force vanished entirely from his aura. For the briefest of moments, Xaset Terep was nothing more than a walking void again.

My scion's once-comrades were enough to send him into a tailspin of unchecked fury, but Meetra Surik might be the only sentient in the galaxy who could break him.

"I will give her the Force again. Just like I did with you."

Malachor had blinded Xaset and Meetra and, like wounded kath-pups seeking shelter, they had scurried back to their den in hope of salvation. Instead- instead- those blinkered Jedi hypocrites cast them out as nulls, ripped cruelly from the lifeblood and the doctrines they had always depended on.

"Take the greatest Jedi Knight and strip away the Force, and all that remains is a cowering child. The High Council would have been more merciful in executing the pair of them."

The Jedi Order knew nothing of true enlightenment. Their rigorous standards were completely at odds with their unconditional forgiveness of any fallen Jedi who had committed atrocities but claimed redemption. The Jedi preached love in all its forms – except the physical, except the familial, except the singular.

"The Force... she was- she was broken, when I last saw her." Xaset bore no expression as he faced me, but nascent hope flickered through the Force as it returned to him. Mingled with fear – for the man knew well the price required for such a resurrection. "Maybe we should just leave her-"

"Would you return to how you were?"

Xaset did not answer.

"Meetra Surik matters little unless we find her. I have weightier concerns than your old lover, my apprentice."

The Unknown Regions.

The years after I shed the brown robes had been a search for understanding. I stood on my own, delving into dark corners if knowledge could be gained. No longer would I judge myself on the ideals of a broken organization that was more a controlling religion than a force for good. I would do what I thought was right.

And when the Mandalorian Wars broke out, and Revan Freeflight led a band of renegade Jedi to aid the Republic, I took notice. When she started winning battles and the galaxy spoke of the Jedi Thirteen in awed tones, I travelled to her side.

But I stayed in the shadows. I did not need the fame of her generals, her Guard of Twelve, her Jedi Thirteen. I was no longer Master Arren Kae – Kae had died when the Order betrayed her and Yusannis denied forgiveness. Master Kreia, on the other hand, was a hidden advisor and teacher to Revan; an undeniable part of the drive for Republic victory against the Mandalorian menace.

And then we won, and Revan led us to the depths of space beyond the Outer Rim.

Even now, my mind shied away. Revan believed a stronger Republic was the only solution – I had my doubts, but Revan's charisma and power were enough to sway me at first. I had been by her side through the horrors of battle, after all, and there were few sentients I esteemed as highly.

But not even Revan Freeflight could control the Dark Side, and her objectives slowly corroded, until her desire was galactic domination instead of galactic defense.

I left, before it all fell apart. I mourned, when I heard of her death above Deralia. Finally, my mind started working on its own plan.

"Where are we headed, then?"

My lips curved in a cold smile. Where it all began, my dark scion. Sharlan will scuttle back to my side soon enough, and there is but one place in the galaxy for the three of us to strengthen before it is our time to strike.

"Malachor," I murmured, and headed to the cockpit.

xXx

Mekel Kadoni:
Jedi High Temple, Galactic City, Coruscant

"So, er, how was this morning with Master Ell?" Kel asked, shifting uneasily on his feet.

Like he couldn't guess the frakking answer. Did I bleeding well feel any different to his godsdamned Force senses?

I threw Kel a shrug as I rifled through the rucksack I'd emptied on the table. "Bit like clubbing a nest of baby shyracks. Sure, you could argue it's community service, but with the way those things breed you're just wasting everybody's time for a bit of unchecked gore."

"Oh." Kel blinked, his eyes crinkling in confusion. "So, not well, then?"

"No, Kel," I drawled. If I'd still had the Force, I'd've whacked him over the head for being a gormless idiot. Kel was a nice guy, but sometimes I wondered if he'd spent his childhood in a frakking box. "Not well. Would've been more bearable if they'd sent a robe easy on the eyes, but only Sadface comes to look at me these days."

"Oh." Kel blinked, his eyes crinkling in confusion. "So, not well, then?"

"No, Kel," I drawled. If I'd still had the Force, I'd've whacked him over the head for being a gormless idiot. Kel was a nice guy, but sometimes I wondered if he'd spent his childhood in a frakking box. "Not well. Would've been more bearable if they'd sent a robe easy on the eyes, but only Sadface comes to look at me these days."

"You're lucky he still tries, Mekel," Thalia weighed in, with her customary tactlessness. "It wouldn't hurt to keep a civil tongue and show Master Ell a modicum of civility."
I scowled at the dark-haired woman leaning against the wall of my quarters. Yuthura's quarters, actually, but I hadn't mustered up the balls to walk out on her yet. "I'll be sure to send him a thank-you note."

Thalia's eyes flashed, and I remembered she'd never been one to back down, even on Korriban. She was an alright sort, really, when she wasn't lambasting me about my frakking language.

"Kel," Thalia said abruptly. "Go get us some lunch, would you?"

"I, er, alright then," Kel muttered, rubbing his neck awkwardly as he skulked out of the room.

I rolled my eyes as the hatch swished closed behind him. "How sweet. Just the two of us. I have to remind you that I'm already taken-"

An invisible cord lashed me warningly on the back.

"Frakk!" Damn, I'd forgotten just how much that could hurt. "Like old times, huh? For frakk's sake, Thalia, that bleeding stings-"

"This is nothing like old times," Thalia snapped. "Yuthura's not our master, none of us are Sith anymore, and you're a space-damned null!"

My scowl tightened with bone-deep resentment as I glared at her.

When Yuthura and I'd first arrived at the Temple, it'd been Thalia's unexpected presence that'd smoothed things over. Not like the damn robes had been interested in me then – not when they had frakking Yuthura Ban camped out on their doorstep.

Sure, her Sith markings had mostly faded, but it wasn't like the dusty-brained gimboids were ignorant of the position she once held. Thalia, Kel, Dak – they'd all been admitted into the Order – even if Dak had pissed off to who-knew-where – and their supposedly exemplary behaviour had at least grudgingly allowed us inside.

Not that Yuthura had been interested in joining, at first. Jen Sahara – or whatever the frakk her name really was – may have persuaded the others, but Yuthura wasn't the sort to bend easily, not even to insane bints who could gut the likes of Jorak Uln and Uthar Wynn and then throw cocktails over bleeding Yudan Rosh.

In the end, it was a freak Force event that finally pushed Yuthura to head for Coruscant- to search for answers, to plead for my salvation, if necessary.

Because the Force was gone from me. It'd been gone for months, now, and no amount of spice or booze or even frakking robes fiddling around in my head had done a damn thing to change that.

And everything felt slightly less alive.

"The Force isn't coming back to you, Mekel," Thalia said, her voice gentling. "The other mind-healers have given up. Master Ell only keeps visiting you to assuage Yuthura. Do you understand?"

My jaw clenched. "No," I said flatly. "Maybe try spitting out what you mean? Last time I checked, Yuthura didn't need any frakking assuaging for frakking anything."

In the early days at the Temple, Yuthura had retreated into that frigid coldness she did so well, but over time she'd thawed. I'd seen the look on her damned face when the masters spoke to her. And Yuthura treated Thalia like an equal, now – something she'd never done with me, not really, and that'd never happen now I was a null.

Thalia sighed. "Yuthura feels responsible for you, Mekel. She cannot join the Order while engaged in an emotional attachment-"

"Shagging," I said bluntly. "Try using the correct term instead of glossing it over with Jedi-babble, will you?"

"Don't be a jerk," Thalia cut in. "You know exactly what I'm saying."

Yeah. Yeah, maybe I did. Yuthura still regarded the Jedi with suspicion, but it was waning. Master Vash intrigued her. And Thalia had her ear, well and truly. Yuthura wouldn't give up on me willingly, but maybe-- maybe that wasn't her choice to make.

And, frakk-- Yuthura and I might not be the love of each other's lives, but I cared for her. I wanted her to have this chance, to do things right, to be better than what we once were-- she'd always had a cruel streak that rivalled mine, but there was a righteous drive in her as well. She fought for the underdog, even if she flat-out denied doing so. It was why she'd protected Kel-- Kel, who in any other life would have karked it two days into Korriban.

The Sith didn't nurture that side of Yuthura's character, but maybe the Jedi would. And the Jedi didn't approve of their members banging outsiders.

And, frakk it, if the Jedi couldn't help me then maybe it was time I found a life elsewhere.

"I know," I said, hearing the heaviness in my voice. "It just-- it just doesn't make any bleeding sense."

The Star Forge had blown up the same time I'd collapsed, I found out later. The robes had thought that coincidence meant something, but couldn't explain why. Or how the Force had suddenly vanished from me-- I'd heard murmurs of "residual corruption from Korriban", but that didn't seem frakking likely either, given that everyone else connected to the Academy was doing just super.

Well, those who hadn't choked on the fallout.

The weeks had dragged on like a fat man crawling in a desert, and slowly the haggard old farts lost interest in me. The Force wasn't coming back. Thalia was the first to voice it-- but I didn't need fancy magic to read the faces of the mind-healers as their mouths turned down in disappointment and boredom. I'd given the damn Order over a month to sort me out, and now they were raising their hands like useless twats and walking away.

Thalia was right. The only thing I was doing here was holding Yuthura back like a gods-damned shackle to the past-- but I'd already figured that one out on my own.

I eyed over the rucksack on the table.

"No, it doesn't make sense," Thalia agreed, plucking at her excrement-coloured robes. "I'm sorry for your loss, Mekel, but staying here is no life for you either. Maybe it's time you learned how to live without the Force."

"What the frakk do you think I was doing before you and Kel barged in here?" I snapped, waving to the foodstuffs and utility tools laid out on the table. "Planning a daytrip to Coruscant's red-light district?"
Thalia blinked, turning to eyeball the spilled contents of my rucksack for the first time. "You're- you're leaving?"

"Yeah, so stop with your sermon already, alright? Just- just look out for Yuthura. She's never been one to accept failure."

For the first time since I'd known her, Thalia looked as awkward as Dee sometimes did. "Of course," she murmured, blinking. "Take care, Mekel. You may no longer feel the Force, but it can still guide your actions--"

"Piss off already, before I throw a damned multi-tool at your head," I growled, and the corner of Thalia's mouth twitched. She pushed off from the wall, strode to the door, and turned only to give me a short nod of farewell.

I nodded back, throwing her a jaunty smirk as the door closed behind her.

A silent farewell was a crappy way to split from someone who'd lived through the same hellhole of vipers as me. I sighed, and felt a trickle of sweat nudge down the back of my neck.

It was gonna be one of those stifling days. Still hours to go before the lunch meal, and the damn place felt like an underground clay-oven. Bleeding ironic, really, that here in the heart of Coruscant – the frakking Core of the frakking galaxy – they refused to install something as basic as air conditioning.

A snarky Zeltron kept offering me a room in the visitor's wing – loaded with all the technological needs that non-Force sensitives require! – but I was with Yuthura. Yuthura, who could regulate her own body temperature, like every other robe in this pristine palace.

Yuthura, who could have a second shot at things if I wasn't around, chaining her to the past.

I hadn't... I hadn't told Yuthura everything. My collapse in that dingy cantina, the sudden blast of raw power, tearing deep into me and uprooting every strand of Force clean from my core- she knew all that, and it mystified her the same as those mumbling robes she'd gambled on.

No, what I hadn't told Yuthura was that for a brief second there'd been someone else in my head.

"Where is the frelling Force?!" the presence had screamed, as they completely booted me out of my own damned body. "There's someone else- I can't sense my bond-sister, but there's someone else-"

The presence vanished seconds later.

I'd heard enough about bleeding Force-possession back at the Academy. Mention that little factoid to the masters here, and I probably wouldn't see the outside of a locked-down med-chamber for years.

In the end, it didn't matter. Not enough to tell anyone – because the presence hadn't returned. The Force hadn't returned. And now... now, it was time to split.

I leaned forward to stuff everything back into the rucksack before pulling the clasps shut and shrugging it over one shoulder. The only thing left on the table was a data-note.

I stared down at the message.

Yuthura,
It's time to stop beating a dead bantha. It ain't coming back alive.

I've gotta learn how to do things like a normal sent, and I can't do that here. And you can't follow. Stick with Thalia.

There's enough ex-Dark Jedi in the Temple to throw a party. Think well of me, but move on, okay? We live in different worlds now.

I've got resources, so don't freak out. I've got a plan, and you know I always fall on my feet.

Wear the robe. I reckon it'd suit ya.

Mex

I turned away. In the end, I was just another Force-blind sent, waltzing away from a Temple where I didn't belong.

No one bothered stopping me.

The hum of civilization hit my ears as I turned into a public access-way that led through a retail complex dotted with hover-cabs. My hand slipped into a pocket, fingering a credit chit and a data-pad loaded with hyperspace coordinates for Telos.

For not every ex-student from Korriban had ended up on Coruscant.

xXx

Juhani:
Khoonda Farmlands, Dantooine

The lands stretched into the horizon: blackened fields of what had once been crops of kassi grain and sugar-cobs, the lifeblood of the average Dantooine farmer. In the distance, a pair of Jedi younglings toiled meekly beneath the command of a stern-eyed settler, one of many who had lost their livelihood simply due to proximity to a Jedi Enclave.

I sighed, kneeling down to dig my fingers into the dirt. Beneath my feet, the echo of the Force thrummed faintly.

The vista was how I remembered and yet not: I could close my eyes, and the scorched earth would transform into farmlands of abundance. The faint ash on the air dissolved into the sweet scent of wild renni grass. The Force remained the same; even an airstrike from the Sith could not deform the abiding spirit of this planet, and I knew in my heart that Dantooine would flourish as it had before.

I had returned home, and nostalgia battered me as fiercely as grief.

There were so many memories of mild Dantooine nights. Of Belaya, slipping her hand into mine and offering gentle counsel that I repudiated more often than not.

"Juhani!"

Or Dak, calling out to join us, simmering with malcontent as he escaped the confines of an enclave he would not embrace.

"Juhani?"
The three of us would dig our toes into the warm soil and gaze up at the night sky, subsiding into the comfortable silence of true camaraderie. Once, the strictures and demands of a padawan had felt restricting, as I struggled to reconcile my primal emotions and seek serenity within the Force. Only out here with the easy acceptance of friends had I found the means to truly relax.

A hand touched me gently on the shoulder.

I jerked, snapping upright, twisting on one heel with hilt already in hand-

The intruder froze, arms raised in swift appeal, and I almost fumbled my lightsaber in shock.

"Dak?" I gasped, heart stuttering.

He was there, right there, laughing at my unlit weapon before striding forward and engulfing me in a bone-crushing hug.

My cry of delight was muffled against the coarse cloth covering his chest.

"Not often I get the jump on you, Juhani!" Dak crowed. I choked back a sound of disbelief, pressing my face tight into his shoulder. The present faded and, for a brief moment, I was that young padawan again, cherished and strengthened by the companionship of a friend.

But Dak had once desired more than I had to offer, and I- I stood strong on my own feet these days, no matter what loss I had to endure.

I pulled back, lips tugging wide in delight. It felt like eons had passed since our paths had diverged – so much had occurred since Dak had ascended away in a rickety elevator, whilst I followed Zaalbar into the dark of the Shadowlands.

My smile faded at the reminder.

"My friend," I murmured, chasing the thoughts of grief away. "It is so good to see you. But I had heard you were on Coruscant?"

The corner of Dak's mouth twitched as he drew back. His dark eyes were hooded, but there was a steadiness to his expression I had not seen before. His shoulders were pushed back, his stance relaxed, and even his scent on the air was barely noticeable. "I was, for a bit. My new, uh, master, wished to return here."

"Master?" I echoed, gaze roving over his dear face. Dak stood before me in the humble robes of a padawan, offset by the glint of a lightsaber on his belt. He had left Kashyyyk to return to the Jedi, and I could not deny I had worried he would run – like he had once before. "You are a Jedi again."

"I promised Belaya," Dak said simply, and the shadows in his eyes cleared. "Y'know, I've come to realize I never set my heart on the Jedi before, not really, but after meeting you and Jen Sahara-"

He cut himself short, grimacing into silence.

"I promised Belaya," Dak said simply, and the shadows in his eyes cleared. "Y'know, I've come to realize I never set my heart on the Jedi before, not really, but after meeting you and Jen Sahara-"

He cut himself short, grimacing into silence.

My eyes closed, my breath hitched, and a fresh surge of grief assailed me.

Dak's hand returned to rest on my shoulder. "I'm sorry about Jen," he muttered. "I couldn't believe it when I heard. Thought she was a knight, though, not Shan's frelling apprentice-"

"She was," I croaked, resisting the urge to clench my fists. "Do not- do not believe everything you hear."
Dak's fingers tightened and, despite my struggle for control, the first teardrop slipped free.

"Shavit," he cursed. "Me and my big mouth- dammit, Juhani, I've never seen you cry before!"

I laughed brokenly, before sniffing and wiping my face on the sleeve of my robe. "I am trying to find peace, Dak, but everything is still so raw. Belaya, Zaalbar, Bastila, J-Jen-

I swallowed and looked away blindly, for the false name that had once been automatic now twisted on my lips.

If there is one sentient I could tell the truth, it would be Dak-

It was tempting to unburden myself. Oh, indeed, for Revan's death was so intrinsically difficult to accept, harder perhaps than even Belaya's, given the profound impact Revan had borne on my life.

But would Dak ever see beyond the notoriety of Revan's past? He knew Jen Sahara for a short while as a heroic Jedi Knight. To reconcile that with the Dark Lord who resurrected the Academy he suffered through-

Dak's hand slipped down to tug at my own. "Let's go for a walk," he said gently. "You could show me how good that fake leg of yours is."

I blinked away the sheen in my eyes, staring at the warm fingers entwined with my own. "Your arm," I murmured, dragging his limb upward to stare at it intently. Brown skin was smattered with fine Human hair, covering a healthy forearm. "A biotech prosthetic," I wondered aloud. "This is good work. I would not be able to tell the difference, Dak, did I not already know."

"Yeah." His voice thrummed with warmth as his fist flexed in my grasp. "The nerves still jangle a bit, but that's to be expected. I heard about your injury on the nets. How's the new limb?"

"Cumbersome," I admitted, lifting the hem of my robe to expose the robotic appendage beneath. "I need to allow time for the primary nerve centres to re-align. I will have another procedure which should grant me more flexibility before they overlay the bio-tissue."

"You mean, now's my one shot at kicking your arse in a duel?"

I shot him a mock-glare and Dak laughed again, his brown eyes twinkling with mirth. He looked-steady. It was one of the last characteristics I would have once attributed to Dak Vesser. "Look at us, Juhani – both part-robotic Jedi," he chortled. "Who'd have thought?"

"Belaya would be proud," I whispered, blinking again. The grief lodged in my soul was fresh and raw, but somewhere beneath it all was something stronger. Dak's expression softened, and he pulled on my arm again.

"Come on," he murmured, and this time I fell into step.

We walked in silence at first. The slight breeze was warm, carrying the scent of freshly dug soil intermingled with the lingering odour of carbonized earth. To our right were the plainly visible buildings of the Enclave: battered, damaged, but still standing – an icon of hope and rebirth amidst the ashes of destruction.

"It was harder than I thought, coming back here," Dak admitted, following my gaze. "Seeing the inner chambers caved in. Hearing about Master Dorak."

I glanced at him sideways; Dak's mouth twisted in self-deprecation as he returned my stare. "I know," he acknowledged. "I complained so much about my old master, but even on Korriban when I told myself he was weak and pathetic and... well. I never wished this on him. On any of them."

I nodded in silent understanding. I had been on Dantooine for less than a day, and had walked through the Enclave's halls only once thus far – and yet I could sense the loss and grief hanging heavy in the air, dampened only by the footfalls of the few returning younglings. Master Dorak, I had heard, fell beneath the collapse of a training hall after leading a half-dozen children to safety beyond the Enclave's crumbling walls.

The only masters who remained were Vandar Tokare and Vrook Lamar.

My attention sidled back to my old friend. "You said you arrived here with a new master?" I asked delicately.

"Yeah." Dak's shoulders bunched, but his half-grin widened. "You're probably not going to like it."

I blinked, stiffening. "No. Tell me you are not-"

His chuckle cut through my words, and I was struck again how oddly at peace he seemed. "Quatra only planned escorting me to Coruscant, you know? Find a more... appropriate master for Kel and I." He snorted. "She was impatient to get back to Dantooine, and hitched a ride with Master Sunrider- did you hear Sunrider's got her master's robes now? Well, the two of them thought they'd be needed here, to train the younglings-"

"Younglings," I echoed, stunned at his implication. "I would hardly label you as a youngling, Dak-"

"It's a refreshing label in a way, Juhani." His chin lifted as his gaze wandered over the farmlands. "Dantooine's home, hard as it might've been to return. I asked to tag along, asked Master Quatra to consider me as her next padawan."

"Dak-"

"She says she's still thinking about it." His eyes creased with amusement. "I reckon I've got more of a handle on her, now."

I couldn't halt the dismay at the thought of Dak training under my old master – he may have disliked Master Dorak, but that was nothing on the enmity he'd once reserved for Master Quatra.

"She's as strict as ever," Dak commented wryly. "And I'm not sure I'll ever like her, as such – but respect? Yeah, I think I can manage that. She's challenging me. And in a good way."

I halted, uneasy. Dak had once loathed Quatra with a passion unbecoming of a Jedi – although how much of that could have been attributed to nothing more than jealousy? I swallowed as the burn of past chagrin rose in my throat – for Dak's unrequited desire for me had clashed with my own unseemly thoughts regarding Master Quatra, and I understood then it was that dichotomy that had been the core of his contempt.

"Are you certain, Dak? The master chooses the apprentice in the end, no matter your inclination-"

"Well, yeah, of course. But maybe padawans should have a say, too," he cut in. "Think about it, Juhani. Dorak and I were terribly matched – he'd leave me alone to meditate on my failures, when all I did was seethe about his lectures and run off. Master Quatra forces me to actually acknowledge my weaknesses and overcome them. And you- you and Quatra were an even worse mismatch. How different could things have been if we'd actually had a say in who trained us?"
"Dak," I snapped, hearing the warning in my voice. "You cannot cast blame for our respective falls on our masters!"

"I'm not," he continued doggedly. "I take full responsibility for my past. But that doesn't mean there aren't elements of the Order that could be improved. Shavit, even I knew that Dorak couldn't keep me in line or inspire me to have faith in the Jedi."

I blinked, my gaze roaming over the robed figure of my friend as I wondered on the changes wrought in him. Dak's voice had not risen to match mine – he stood facing me instead; calm and sure and-

And a Jedi.

My lips curved in an unbidden smile. "Perhaps there is wisdom in you after all, Dak," I teased gently, seeing his eyes crinkle in response. "Perhaps we have both grown from the trials we have suffered through."

"Well, I won't be recommending a dalliance with the Dark Side as a suitable apprenticeship," Dak returned drolly, before resuming our walk. "What about you, Juhani? Do you- do you want to talk? About what happened?"

"I- I am not sure," I hedged, drawing in a deep breath. There was a blurring at the edges of my vision again. "The hardest thing to accept is that I was not even there at the end, Dak. I woke to the sensation of Bastila and Jen fading into the Force..."

"What, at the same time? That's not what the official transcript says-"

"Dak-" I cut in warningly.

"Okay, I get it, the holonets are full of crap," he murmured. "Still, the story goes that it was Bastila and Darth Malak at the end, fighting each other to the death. You saying that didn't happen?"

The air was shaky in my lungs as we traiwed onward. On one hand, it felt almost cathartic to talk about it to someone other than Jolee – who, for all of his dry self-aspersions and rambling parables could not quite conceal the grief he felt. But I wasn't ready to analyse every detail yet. Particularly not when no one from the crew could even say how the end had come about.

"Not Bastila," I answered finally. "Perhaps I understand why the Jedi Order seek to label Bastila Shan as the hero..." I trailed into silence, eyes closing briefly.

Because the crimes of Bastila Shan can be forgiven. Because her acts of heroism over the years truly overshadow her brief fall.

Because Jen Sahara is a cover story both the Republic and the Jedi Order hope will fade away into abstraction.

To be fair, I knew that Revan would not have cared about any sort of acknowledgment for herself. In the end, her actions and her character lived on in the hearts of those who mattered.

"Jen faced Darth Malak," I continued quietly, "whilst Bastila utilized her battle meditation for the Republic fleet. Jolee Bindo found Bastila and Zaalbar, later – they had been cut down by Darth Malak, but we do not know where Jen fell." A broken slip of air feathered past my lips. "Darth Malak died after we escaped the Star Forge. Perhaps from his wounds or due to the factory breaking up."
His passing had tremored in the Force, a scream of disbelief that morphed into a sudden dark acceptance before vanishing completely. Minutes later, the Star Forge itself had disintegrated completely.

Dak's hand found mine again, squeezing it gently. "That's hard," he commiserated, and his words were a comfort, no matter what little use they had. "I didn't like Jen at first, you know? But she grew on me. She was- she was a pretty amazing Jedi."

Yes. She was.

What had it been like for Revan, at the end? She had resisted Bastila's caliginous influence on Lehon, despite the hold her bond-sister had had on her soul, despite the interference of Yudan Rosh. Revan had demanded another way forward, rather than embracing Bastila's path of conquest and subjugation at the cost of the light.

Oh, that moment when Revan had held firm, relief and admiration had completely engulfed me – and that emotion had been at the forefront of my thoughts when I woke, hours later on the Star Forge-

-just as everything had dissolved into ash.

Revan faced her past. She faced Malak. And I know, in my heart, that she stayed true to herself in the end. That the outcome was the victory she had fought for.

Even if she is no longer around to see it come to fruition.

"She lives on in the Force, right?" Dak said, as if he could guess the track of my derailing thoughts. Perhaps he could. "They all do. There's a comfort in that, I reckon." His hand slipped free of mine, then, as he turned to glance back at the Enclave, his brow creasing. "I should probably head back. Master Quatra wasn't expecting me to skive off so soon after we landed."

I smiled weakly at him and, for all the raw emotion stabbing at my heart, I somehow felt more grounded than I had for weeks. "Master Quatra is not one to accommodate tardiness," I murmured, and Dak laughed.

Just like that, the air was easier to breathe.

We turned, together, and began retracing our steps back home.

xXx

Vrook Lamar:
Jedi Enclave, Dantooine

"Vrook Lamar," a dry voice commented behind me. "Suppose it was too much to ask I could come here without running into you."

It had been decades, but still, I recognized that voice. A reunion I could have done without, I thought with irritation. "Jolee Bindo," I muttered, before turning around. The morning sun bathed the robed man in a pool of light, and shone brightly throughout the well-kept outer courtyards. The Enclave's training grounds, at least, had been mostly restored. "If you didn't wish to speak to me, why hail me at all?"

It was a funny thing, seeing someone you'd known in your youth as a geriatric. The minds-eye recalled a smoother, younger version, untempered by the weather of time, and the overlay with reality was jarring.

Jolee Bindo had been losing his hair even as a young man, but now his scalp was completely bald. His skin was dark and leathery, and his form whipcord lean. Old like me, he might have been – but Jolee Bindo still gave the overwhelming impression of fortitude.

"Heh. Suppose my curiosity won out," Jolee commented, lines of age etching deep around his dark eyes as he gave me the once-over in return.

I'd been expecting to run into Jolee Bindo. Aye, for Vandar had told me of Knight Juhani's return the previous day – along with the identity of her cantankerous escort. Given that I evidently owed my life to Jolee, I'd grudgingly conceded that I owed him at least one attempt at civility.

Gratitude was not an emotion that came easily. Particularly not now, not when my own failure to save my padawan was still so raw.

"You saw Bastila at the end," I said abruptly. Jolee Bindo didn't need my thanks. He was wily enough to appreciate the debt I owed him, and no doubt annoying enough to rub my nose in it should the mood take him.

"Aye," Jolee said gravely, inclining his head. "It was a quick death, I can tell you that much. She fought on the right side in the end, Vrook."

"I know."

Vandar's reports on the effects of Bastila's battle meditation had done a little to assuage my grief, but nothing could erase my last memory of her, cold and forbidding and repudiating the desperate plea of absolution I had offered-

"It is too little! Too little, and far too late-!"

But Bastila had turned, in the end. Whether it was a consequence of my presence – as that miscreant Yudan Rosh had proclaimed, the one time I bothered seeking him out – or simply the effect of damnable Revan Freeflight, at least I had the cold comfort of knowing that Bastila Shan had made the whole Jedi Order proud with her final actions.

If I only could have told her that myself.

"So," I grunted, shucking away the turmoil of my emotions. "You are here to return to the Order, I take it?"

I'd first encountered Jolee Bindo on Coruscant, decades ago, after I'd been transferred there during my padawan years. The morass of civilization in the heart of the galactic Core hadn't sat well with me, and I'd liked my new training partners even less.

Aye, I'd made a poor first impression on Jolee Bindo, Karon Enova, and Zhar Lestin. Over the years, my working relationship with Karon and Zhar might have mellowed, but Jolee had vanished while the height of acrimony still simmered between us.

Well, Karon and Zhar were at least affable, even with their blinkered naiveté at the world. Blasted Jolee Bindo was nothing more than an aggravating cacti-thorn in my foot.

It was hard to believe the years would have changed him overmuch.

Jolee snorted at my comment. "I think the Jedi have enough irascible old men without bothering with the likes of me."

"You'd be a fool to walk away from the Jedi again," I said bluntly, no matter my dislike for the man. It was dangerous for Force-sensitives – particularly half-trained ones – to live a life without the tools necessary to both understand and control the Force. To hold firm against the temptations of the Dark Side.

Jolee Bindo might irritate the heck out of me, but I didn't wish to see any sentient fall.

"Ach, you're still the same stuffy grouch you always were," Jolee drawled, his beady black eyes glinting with amusement. "There's more to life than wearing robes and reciting the Code, Vrook. The Jedi don't have the monopoly on how to live a worthwhile existence."

"And you're still the same irreverent bastard you always were," I growled, my brows lowering. "I'll not waste my time trying to convince you. History can do that all on its own."

"You can't judge people on their odds of falling, Vrook." His voice had turned serious, almost cold. "Do that, and you may as well damn them from the get-go."

Oh, I knew exactly what he was really talking about.

"There are valid reasons why we don't train adults," I returned, just as cold. "I can give you three recent examples who were beyond the accepted cut-off age, and who all fell. Yudan Rosh. Malak Devari. Revan Freeflight. All caused almost unprecedented chaos, regardless of whether two of them regretted it later."

"And the alternative is to let adults wander around the galaxy until the Sith seduce them first?" Jolee fired back. "Brilliant logic there, Vrook. Those three would have had less chance had that happened, and you darn well know it."

But he wasn't talking about Yudan or Malak or blasted Revan Freeflight. I could feel the growl in my throat grow. "Dammit, Jolee, the Sith weren't around when we were young! The Order would never have accepted Nomi had it not been for Master Thon's interference- you can't blame them for holding true to that ethos with Nayama!"

His eyes had narrowed to slits. "How old was Exar Kun when he was admitted?"

Jolee snorted in reply. "Almost means he was in the accepted range. Shining example of a Jedi, wasn't he? Aye, and I know Ulic Qel-Droma was a babe when he and his twin joined the Order, and Ulic caused near as much damage." He returned my glare with the bitterness of age. "Use statistical odds to judge people and you lose your humanity, Vrook. You end up with people betrayed as badly as my wife."

"Excuse me, Master Vrook?" someone hailed. We turned, both bristling, to glare at the intruder.

A middle-aged woman was strolling calmly towards us, clad in the humble brown robes of a Jedi Knight. There'd been another transport arrival on Dantooine I hadn't yet greeted, and the occupants were substantially more welcome than the ornery presence of Jolee Bindo.

I breathed my frustration out, nodded my head in greeting, and almost managed a smile. "Master Vima," I acknowledged, meeting the serene gaze of the newly raised master. I wasn't sure if she'd interfered deliberately, to derail what was probably turning into quite the public scene, but I accepted the interruption gladly.
It didn't surprise me to see Vima Sunrider still clad in knight's robes. Some masters stuck to the brown, some didn't, but in general we all stayed nondescript in our appearance. A reminder of our station to outsiders: a non-threatening form of counsel and wisdom.

Or so we tried to emulate. At times, even the Jedi got it wrong.

Vima smiled, a ray of sunshine illuminating a face that was framed in the same honey-blonde locks as her mother's. I hadn't been entirely sure of Vima's recent ascension to masterhood, considering her comparable youth – although there'd been no doubt Vima's life-path had been set on that course for decades already.

And she'd always done well with Bastila, I thought, with a sharp pang of grief.

"It is good to see you again, Master Vrook," Vima murmured, shooting Jolee Bindo an impersonal nod of greeting but otherwise keeping her attention fixed on me. "I do not wish to intrude. I only came to ask if you could spare some time to converse later today?"

"Of course, Vima," I said heavily. Aye, she was a stalwart Jedi and would make a good master, but I'd been wary at the idea of ascending powerful Jedi too quickly up the ranks. Vima had barely broken four decades of life. Still, she was her mother's daughter, battle meditation or not. And the Force knew that Dantooine would benefit from her return. "I will make the time."

Vima would want to talk of Bastila. Of Revan. Of their bond, the identity replacement, and exactly how it all fell apart on the Star Forge. All matters I owed it to discuss with her, no matter that the details were painful- and that I knew little of their adventures, at the end.

In that regard, Jolee Bindo would be a better one to speak to.

My gaze slid to the annoying hermit, who was staring at Vima in overt fascination. With a sharp jolt, I kicked myself for missing the obvious link between the two.

"Thank you, Vrook," Vima murmured, taking a step back. "I apologize for interrupting. I will leave-"

"Vima Sunrider," Jolee cut in, his dry voice alight with curiosity. "And a master, to boot. Well, well. Isn't this a lark."

Vima turned to look at him a second time, puzzlement creasing her rounded face as she took in his attire: humble enough to be a Jedi, but not the robes of a padawan or a knight.

"You are a Jedi," Vima murmured. "I can sense that, but I'm afraid I don't know your name?"

"Heh. I suppose you could call me Uncle," Jolee returned. There was a definite glint of entertainment in his gaze- but his voice was bitter.

"Jolee Bindo," I muttered in introduction, gesturing at the man.

"Oh," Vima breathed, mouth slackening with astonishment. Her bright blue eyes blinked. "Nayama's husband. It is… it is good to finally meet you, Jolee."

"Really?" Jolee drawled, raising one brow in disbelief. "Your mother deliberately avoided me."

I could see the awkwardness tighten Vima's face, before her self-control snapped her expression into serenity. "I am pleased to see you here, Jolee Bindo," she said, voice calmly neutral. "I had heard you travelled with the crew of the Ebon Hawk. The Jedi Order will be gratified to have you..."
"I'm not here to be a darn Jedi," Jolee groused, crossing his arms. "I only came to Dantooine to see if there was any truth to those darn rumours-"

He cut himself off abruptly, head snapping back to stare at me. Hard.

I kept my expression deliberately blank.

"Huh," Jolee grunted, his shoulders relaxing. "Good. Want to tell me where I'll find him?"

"I have no idea what you're blathering on about, Jolee," I said blandly. "You should go for a walk to clear the cobwebs out of your head. Past the eastern farmlands and out into the wild. There's an ancient grove deep in the hills that might help you meditate on the Force. Maybe you'll realize that your place could be with the Order, if you stop being such a stubborn gill-goat about the past."

Jolee's bushy white brows twitched, but otherwise there was no indication regarding my hidden message. "I'm more than old enough to choose my own path, Vrook. I'll be going back to Telos tomorrow, I wager, after saying my farewells to Juhani and making sure you lot treat her well."

"Treat her well?" I retorted, feeling an irritated scowl return at his unwarranted implication. "From what I've seen of Knight Juhani, she already has the makings of a fine Jedi and doesn't need a runaway padawan to speak for her."

Jolee harrumphed. "Aye, you have the right of that, I'll concede. Maybe I just wanted to see if Juhani would get an apology for the ridiculous knight trials she was forced to endure."

"That is hardly your business, Jolee," I growled. Damn if he wasn't the most irritating man I'd ever had the misfortune to encounter. "Member of the Order or not, that is nothing more than sticking your beak in where it doesn't belong."

"Mayhap if someone had done that from the get-go, then Juhani would never have spent a year out in the desert." Jolee sighed, then: a gusty lungful of air rattling his chest as the corners of his mouth turned down in defeat. "Bah, I'm a nosy old bugger, and Juhani wouldn't appreciate me interfering in her business – nor does she require it. Maybe, at the close of it, I wanted to see for myself whether the Order had learned anything from their mistakes." His dark gaze sharpened as it fixed on me. From afar, I wondered how the picture of us would appear: two old men scowling at each other with the resentment of the past etched deep into the wrinkles on their faces.

Jolee glanced back to Vima, who'd taken a step back, as if to retreat. The old man snorted. "You spoke of historical failings before, Vrook," he said to me, but his attention was fixed on the young master. "Shall we ask Master Vima's opinion on how many were failed by the Jedi Order?"

The name was unspoken, but it simmered in the air between us. Again. Nayama. The woman we had both loved. The woman we had both lost to Exar Kun, at different stages of her life.

"No one is infallible, Jolee," I said heavily. "Not even the Jedi, much as we strive for the best outcome." Just like that, my irritation dwindled. Maybe the old hermit would always annoy me, but beneath his bluster was a very real bitterness regarding the fate of his wife, no matter if he otherwise seemed at ease with his lot.

I couldn't fault Jolee for that bitterness, not without being a hypocrite. I felt the same. And Nayama had never even been mine.

"I have matters to attend to," Vima murmured, gaze darting between us both as she retreated.
another step. "I shall leave you both-"

"Wait." Jolee's demand was low and sharp. Sharp enough to scythe through the air. "I returned to the Order, briefly, after Kun's defeat. I was searching for answers, but no one had any to give. Pithy replies about the will of the Force was all I got, and an unwelcome forgiveness I neither deserved nor desired. But there was one Jedi who might have known something... one who flat-out refused to meet with me, despite my pleas."

"My mother was grieving, Jolee Bindo." Vima's naturally serene voice had hardened; her heart-shaped face taut as she stared at him coolly. "She was in no state-"

"So was I!" Jolee snapped, his white brows bristling with anger as they bunched over his dark eyes. "Nayama was my wife! I loved her! If Nomi knew something about Nayama's fate, then I have a darn right to know what it is!"

"Nomi is one with the Force, Jolee," I said heavily. "Whether she knew something of Nayama or not, the point is surely moot now."

"Aye, Nomi Sunrider might be dead, but her daughter knows something." Jolee fired an abrupt nod at the young master, and I swivelled back to face Vima in surprise.

Her lips had thinned, her gaze was wide, and she looked awkward, uncertain-

"What?" I growled. "What do you know of Nayama?"

Vima's shoulders sagged as her eyelids fluttered. Whatever Jolee was digging for, Vima was on the cusp of revealing it. I found myself leaning forward, fingers clenched, still after all these decades desiring to hear about the only woman I'd ever really looked twice at-

"You may as well tell him, too," Jolee muttered. "That old bugger cared for Nayama before I even entered her life."

A flash of surprise crossed Vima's face, and I inwardly cursed Jolee Bindo again. I could have done without you slipping that in, you irreverent old coot!

"My mother..." Vima began hesitantly, knotting her hands in the folds of her robe. "My mother was strong in the Force. I believe... I believe Nayama was too, but..."

"But what? Your blessed mother was the more powerful?" Jolee snorted in disparagement. "Does that even matter?"

"No." Vima shook her head. "Nomi wondered the opposite, actually. But Nayama was ill-trained... and you must have known she led squads of Force-sensitive assassins under Kun's banner."

Jolee's jaw hardened. I felt a tightening in my gut. Nayama had once been someone completely different to the woman Vima was describing. A non-sensitive, dumped on a planet full of Jedi. A nobody, just like her sister Nomi at the time -- but Nomi's marriage to Andur Sunrider had granted her an informal welcome within the Enclave, while Nayama- Nayama had never really found her own place in life.

Oh, she'd been a wild, wondrous spirit, though. With a stubborn streak, a heart of gold, and a soft spot for the down-trodden.

The Dark Side... the Dark Side would have burned all of that away. But the Jedi Order had turned their backs on Nayama well before she even considered that road.
"My aunt and Ulic Qel-Droma sometimes worked together," Vima continued, her voice lowering to an almost-whisper. "Ulic was Kun's Second, but Nayama ranked fairly high in Kun's favour, too. On the more difficult missions Ulic and Nayama would... they would... work together..."

Her voice broke. Trepidation clutched at my heart, and I felt suddenly cold. They would work together... I'd never thought of a link between Ulic Qel-Droma and Nayama beyond the spectres of Exar Kun and Nomi Sunrider. But Vima was struggling to articulate something more-

"She was there," I gasped, heart stuttering, horrified at a flashfire of thought. "Nayama was there when..."

When Ulic murdered his own brother. When he faced his lover, Nomi Sunrider.

Nayama was there when Nomi stripped the Force from Ulic Qel-Droma. And Nayama was on Ulic's side of the war-

"Mother didn't know!" Vima pleaded, her wide blue eyes glistening in the morning light. "She didn't see her... she-she didn't mean for it to happen to her too-"

"Oh no," Jolee choked out, the words strangling in his throat. "You can't mean to say that- that-"

Vima's expression was distraught as her gaze darted between us, but her agitation was nothing on mine. And mine was nothing on Jolee's, who should have been told this years ago.

Vima breathed in loudly, audibly, before making her point abundantly clear. "It was not just Ulic Qel-Droma who lost the Force that day."

Jolee's eyes closed, and it was as if another ten years had suddenly whittled the life out of him. His shoulders slumped and his voice cracked. "Oh, my love..." he whispered inaudibly.

In contrast, coursing through me was the latent heat of anger. For, in some ways, blasted Jolee Bindo was right. The Jedi Order did fail, at times, and there was no one they had failed more than Nayama Da-Boda.

"If that's so," I growled at Vima, feeling my eyes pinch tight."Then why didn't Nomi bring Nayama back to the Jedi? Force, Nomi dragged Ulic back, so I can't believe she'd leave her sister behind in the same situation."

"Nayama refused to return," Vima answered, glancing away. "By that stage, she hated the Jedi Order with unreserved passion. Mother sometimes spoke of the injustice regarding Coruscant's refusal to train Nayama. From what I know, I believe my aunt's resentment of the Jedi grew to impregnable enmity in her heart."

"That's not the whole of it," I muttered, shaking my head in dismissal. "Kun hadn't been toppled then. Not until Nomi returned with Ulic, and Ulic spilled his guts to the Republic brass. No, Nayama was one of Exar's leaders, too, and you're saying she was there when Nomi captured Ulic. Nomi wouldn't have left her behind, not if her sister could've warned that bastard."

Vima's expression didn't budge. I wasn't sure if she knew more or not, but there was something else to it. Nomi Sunrider had been revered because she placed the stability of the galaxy above any other consideration – much like Revan Freeflight was once known for, an annoying voice muttered – and however Nomi had grieved over what she'd done to her lover and sister both, it simply made no sense that she'd capture one and leave the other behind.

I'd known Nayama as a teen, years before Jolee Bindo. She'd been the same age then as when I'd first met Revan, actually, on one of my return placements to Coruscant I'd always suffered through. Aye, Revan Freeflight had been a newish padawan, but I could still recall the unwelcome punch of shock to the gut when her curious gaze had landed on me, a grouchy master from the infamous Dantooine Enclave who resented his Coruscanti obligations.

Her sharp chin. The tilt to the tip of her nose. That high forehead, and those eyes, slightly wide-set-oh, but the colour had been different, different enough to jerk me from the mire of the past, and instead walk briskly away from the young Jedi who was already the talk of the High Temple.

Yes, the colour was different. I swallowed, as a sharp recollection of a charismatic, smooth-talking knight flashed through my mind. One with sharp green eyes and almost-black hair that matched the shadows in his soul. One who Nayama's gaze had followed around unerringly, years before the Force had awoken in her. Years before she'd even met her future husband.

Years before she'd left everything behind to follow that same dark knight into corruption and depravity.

"She was pregnant," I whispered, and Vima jerked with evident surprise. Her eyes rounded in shock and her mouth dropped open. Either I was wrong- or Nomi had never shared this with her.

A mother's love... Nomi had been renowned for stepping into battle with a young Vima strapped to her back. Maybe... maybe the one thing that would have turned Nomi Sunrider blind to Nayama's presence was a plea for her sister's unborn child.

Nomi would've seen, much as I did now, that there was no way the Jedi Order would allow such a babe to stay with Nayama, broken and fallen and Force-blind. Not with that sort of parentage.

"What?" Jolee roared, his growl loud enough to attract the attention of a group of younglings seated along the boundary of the courtyard. "Where in the Outer Rim did you get that from?"

Vima's gaze had not moved from mine. "I never understood my mother's reasoning," she admitted, blinking, as she stared at me in puzzlement. "I always found it odd she would take Ulic and leave Nayama... but Mother was half-blind with grief, then. At what they had done... at what she had done."

My hand trembled as I raised it to scrub at my eyes. Could it be true? The timing fit, but there were a trillion sentient's out in there in the universe.

Aye, but how many with the Force-strength of Exar Kun... or Revan Freeflight?

"It doesn't matter," I muttered, trying to persuade myself. "It doesn't matter... not anymore."

Would I have viewed Revan Freeflight any different, had I known? I'd been predisposed to think ill of Revan from the start, hating the uncanny resemblance to a woman from my past, but assuming it was no more than a cruel coincidence, I'd had little to do with Revan anyway, being joined to a different enclave... but I'd known my judgment regarding her wasn't objective, and hence had striven to avoid the notorious woman as much as I could.

Bastila certainly made that impossible, in the end.

"How can you say it doesn't matter?" Jolee snapped. His gaze was furious as it bored into mine. "How can you drop a plasma bomb like that and then say it doesn't darn well matter?"

My shoulders sagged. Vima was still staring at me in confusion, and right then I didn't think Jolee and I would ever find an amicable reckoning between the two of us. "Because it's just supposition, Jolee. And even if I am right- "and the Force has a lousy sense of humour- "then it doesn't matter, because Nayama's daughter is already dead."

I'd had enough. So had we all, I suspected. I turned my back on them, and strode away.

Neither of them stopped me.

xXx

Jolee Bindo:

Ancient Grove, Wildlands, Dantooine

The dry grass crunched beneath my boots. Each footfall crushed a hundred or so blades of brittle green, emitting a crackling sound that was perversely satisfying.

Lying, boorish, meddling old bugger!

The late afternoon sun drooped weakly in the sky, casting shadows that lengthened over the rolling hills of the wild. I had enough sense to stretch my awareness out and change my path to avoid any predators, but other than that bare modicum of self-preservation, I barely paid any attention to my surroundings.

Instead, my thoughts derailed, like an angst-ridden young'un fuming at the injustice of the world.

Where does that half-wit get off, slingling around dung like that? And he calls himself a blasted Jedi!

The morning's conversation burned. My final memories of my wife were bitter enough, but there'd still been good in her then: blind, stubborn goodness with how she'd naively believed that blackguard Kun's promise of training wouldn't tarnish her soul, even as she'd decided the sacrifice of a marriage was a price she was willing to pay.

Maybe she'd hoped I'd chase after her. Mayhap she hadn't thought she was leaving me so much as luring me to her side – after all, hadn't I foolishly believed she'd see Kun for the black-hearted blight on the galaxy he was, before retracing her steps back to me?

But I could not sway her, and I did not stop her – and then I never saw my Nayama again.

I hated to think my wife's end had been at the hands of her stars-blessed sister. Rationally, I'd never had any issue with the golden heroine Nomi Sunrider, but the perceived success of that woman's life had been a constant fraying against Nayama's self-esteem, and- and-

-and the crevasse that allowed the dark to seep through.

I'd seen first-hand my wife's resentment, in all of its bitter glory. Her chokehold of jealousy was precisely why I'd put a halt to any more of my ill-advised tuition. Nayama had grown up in her smarter, prettier, stronger sister's shadow and, much as I'd adored my wife, I could admit she'd never grown the inner strength to stop comparing herself to Nomi.

In hindsight, it was no wonder that Exar Kun's promise of power would eventually tempt her.

But- pregnant? Pregnant?!

In that moment, I almost loathed Vrook Lamar more than Exar Kun himself.

Precious Vima Sunrider didn't know anything, no; this was all inane blather on Vrook's part. A daughter, he claims, already dead-

"Keep crashing blindly through the grass, old man, and you're liable to walk straight into a kath hound's jaws."

My head jerked: to my right, eyeing me over in overt amusement, was the very man I'd originally intended to seek out. Our moody crewmate we'd given up for dead, the one we'd all feared we couldn't trust, that infamous general from Revan's shadowed past-

An icy fist clenched around my heart and, in that instant, I knew.

Because there'd been a moment, back on Lehon inside the 'Hawk, when I'd seen my wife staring at me from the face of a powerhouse strong enough to overshadow Exar Kun himself.

There were times when the Force sprang free from an untapped lineage. But Force-rich bloodlines, I knew, were a darn lot more likely to breed true sensitives.

"What do you know of Revan's mother?" I snapped, feeling my hands clench at my sides. I was riled enough to throw a punch at someone, and Force help Vrook Lamar if he crossed my path on this blasted planet again.

Yudan Rosh stilled, his expression smoothing into impassivity. "It is good to see you alive too, Jolee Bindo."

"Answer the darn question," I ground out, and the man's face tightened in irritation that, I had to admit, was well-warranted. I sighed, my shoulders slumping. "Ach, look, I've just had a run-in with one of my least favourite people and- grant an old man a boon, would you? Answer the question."

Yudan's head cocked, but other than that, the darn man didn't show any reaction. He stood at ease in the long grass, clad in clothing as non-descript as mine, with the glint of a lightsaber at his belt his only adornment. "Neither Revan nor Malak spoke easily of their past," he said slowly, his blue eyes sharp on mine. If I wasn't so aggrieved, the sight of his uncorrupted gaze would've been gratifying. "Her mother died when she was very young. A crippled man in the slums raised her. I know little other than that, Jolee."

I felt my fingers unfurl as the heaviness of the past washed over me. I'd known, in my heart, that Nayama was long dead. If she had really been Revan's mother-

Emotion choked in my throat.

"Why do you ask?" Yudan had crossed his arms, intently studying me from his place in the grass. His golden Twi'leki headtails swooped casually down his back, but I doubted the man was truly relaxed.

"I-

It doesn't matter, Vrook had claimed, and maybe the old blighter was right. Nayama and I had never tried for children, being so early on in our marriage – and had I suspected Revan was my wife's daughter to blasted Exar Kun, it would've coloured my every interaction with her.

But Revan came back, came back from the dark in a way that so few sentients have ever found the strength to do. I mourn for her, but I'm also so proud of that reckless chit.

And Nayama- Nayama would have been proud, too.
Judging sentients on their ancestry was short-sighted at best. But Nayama had fallen to the dark. And Exar Kun had not so much fallen as revelled in it. Maybe, maybe, there was some comfort in the thought that Revan had redeemed more than herself in the end.

Maybe, one day, I could find peace in the idea that Nayama's spirit might have found absolution in her daughter.

"It doesn't matter." I growled out Vrook's words with an irritated shake of the head. "Ach, that ain't why I came here in the first place. It is good to see you, sonny boy, because we'd all thought that soul-sucking Sith had been your demise."

"It was a closer call than I would have liked," the man returned drolly, before his voice sharpened. "I believe Sharlan Nox still lives. I have informed Vandar but I am not so sure he takes the threat seriously."

"Huh. Well, with ole Malak gone and the Sith Empire in ruins, I'm actually inclined to side with the roundabout Jedi for once," I mused, as the embers of my acrimony slowly faded into acceptance. "Can't think a rogue Dark Jedi will do much damage after a resounding Republic victory."

"I disagree," Yudan clipped out tersely. Behind him, my gaze fell on the distant shadows of crumbling stonework etched into the lean of a hill. "Sharlan Nox overwhelmed my will with startling ease. I may have been momentarily incapacitated, but it is not arrogance to claim that even in such a state my mental shields are formidable. There was something about him..."

The man trailed off, frowning.

Ach, I would be foolish to outright dismiss Yudan's unease- and I'd felt the strength of that damnable Sith myself, as my life had drained effortlessly into his grasp- Aye, but I'd been badly wounded. And Yudan more or less admitted the same of himself.

"I can tell I am not convincing you," Yudan drawled, his voice flattening into monotony. "So. You see for yourself that I survived. Did you have any other reason to seek me out, or are you merely enjoying a scenic trek through the wildlife?"

"You're as socialable as ever," I grumbled. "Did it even occur to you that the crew might be happy to hear you lived?"

A hairless golden brow quirked in disbelief. "Yes, I can see Mission Vao jumping for joy," he shot back smoothly.

"Hah! Well, Mission might not be your biggest fan, but the Onasis-" I paused, as his gaze narrowed on mine. "They understand the debt they owe you, Yudan Rosh."

"There is no debt," he muttered, turning away to stare at the remnants of what I suspected had once been a stone archway. An ancient grove steeped in Force, Vrook had said. Seemed a strange, if fitting, place for Yudan Rosh to find refuge. "What I did, I did for Revan."

I sighed. Mayhap that didn't really surprise me. Revan's entanglement with Onasi senior was hardly a secret, and as for Yudan Rosh... well, I had the niggling feeling he'd have cut his own arm off if it would've kept Revan happy.

So many things came back to her, that it seemed impossible to think she'd truly come to a final rest. I wasn't sure I'd have believed it, had I not felt Revan fade into the Force myself.
"Seeing the way the Twi'lek's smooth face contorted with barely-checked emotion, I knew he was having a harder time accepting it than me.

"Doesn't matter your reasons, sonny boy. In the end you saved their lives, whether it was for altruistic reasons or otherwise."

Yudan shrugged, once more retreating into a mask of disinterested composure, like he believed it would convince anyone who'd had the dubious pleasure of trekking halfway across the galaxy with him.

"You tell them they owe me nothing," he declared, as if it were his place to state what other people thought. "Unless, of course, you plan to stay on Dantooine."

I snorted. "Heh. Fine thing to assume of me, I've only been here a day. You're the one sulking around an ancient Force grove and having idle campsite chats with the enclave's grandmaster."

The man didn't so much as twitch a muscle. "You truly believe, with my history, that the Jedi Order will welcome my return?"

"Oh, go bark up a tree. You'll get the same response out of me. I'm hardly about to start grading you," I grumbled. "Besides, I'm not senile enough to miss when someone's deflecting. You know darn well that the Order will take you back."

Yudan inclined his head in concession. "Perhaps. Yet I have to ask, why are you so interested?"

"Well, I certainly don't have a vested interest, as such." I shrugged, before pulling at my travelling pack and dislodging a ration bar from a side pocket. Darn things tasted like ground ferracrete dust, but it'd been a long day. "Call it more idle curiosity. I'm old. Doesn't take much to amuse me, these days."

"Treat me like a show monkey, old man, and I'll lure the nearby kath hounds here and leave you to your own defences."

"Ooh! You've got a smart mouth on you there, you know that? If ullers could talk, they'd sound like that."

"Fine," Yudan snapped. "I do not know yet, is that what you wish to hear? I am still..." he trailed off, mouth twisting in displeasure, as if he despised the admission. "...finding myself, as asinine as that sounds."

Lines of frustration creased around the normally-stoic man's face, but I could tell at a glance he wasn't truly angry. No- the man had one heck of a past to work through, but he had the fortitude to keep dragging another step forward.

"Heh. Well, there are moments when I think you must be much older that you seem... but this ain't one of them." I almost chortled at the outrage that flickered briefly in his gaze. "An honest answer, though. I can respect that. If I had a drink in my hand, I'd salute you."

"I appear to be all out of whiskey," he drawled, sliding effortlessly back into neutrality. "And you, Jolee Bindo? You did not answer. Do you plan to stay?"

I unwrapped the bar of dubious nutritional content, pausing to take a large bite. It tasted worse than I feared. "Is this where I question why you're so interested?"

Yudan looked supremely unimpressed. "Idle curiosity, old man. I'm bored. Perhaps it takes little to "Throwing my words back at me is a cheap shot," I grumbled, tucking the unfinished ration bar back in my pack. With luck, I'd find something more edible to scavenge on my return trek. "You know what I hate? Well... you know, lots of things, really. I'm old and easily annoyed. But that's beside the point. What I really hate is how most people view the Order. Like it's the only place for a Force-sensitive other than the Dark Side. Like the Jedi Council is completely incapable of injustice and imperfection, and to use the Force outside of their jurisdiction is tantamount to heresy. Bah..." I trailed off, frowning at the mild amusement sparking in the younger man's gaze. "Somehow, I suspect, I'm waffling to the converted."

"Quite."

"Shush, you," I muttered. "Don't interrupt your elders. What I'm trying to say is... well, your path to redemption – or whatever pithy word you choose to label it – is a noble one. But the Jedi Order isn't your only road to reach that goal. Ach, I ain't saying it's not a good option, as such, just that it ain't the only one."

"I... am aware of that already," Yudan replied, in a voice soft enough I had to strain to hear it. "But I appreciate the sentiment."

"Humph. Well, I suppose it's only fair to answer your question. I'm not here to re-join the Jedi. I'll be headed back to Telos in a day or so." I paused, my gaze landing back on that glint at his belt. "You know, we never had that talk I promised."

Yudan's mouth thinned. "Zhar's lightsaber," he acknowledged slowly. His hand rose to his belt, fingers wrapping tight around the hilt that had once belonged to an old friend. "If you wish to hear me apologise for his death... I do regret it, Jolee Bindo. I had... darker objectives in mind at the time."

"Ach, I know," I conceded, suddenly weary. Zhar, and Karon, and... and Nayama. The ghosts of the past stayed with me, grave and heavy, but I wouldn't chase them away for all the wasaka-berry juice in the galaxy. "Zhar was a good Jedi. Zhar and Karon both."

"They were," Yudan agreed in a low voice. Of course, he would have known them well, considering who they had trained. The Twi'lek unclipped the hilt and displayed it to me, holding it loosely in one bronzed fist. "I would not object should you desire his lightsaber, Jolee."

I waved away the unrequired offer with a sweep of my arm. "Keep it. I have my own 'saber, as I'm not in the habit of losing it. But that reminds me..." I paused mid-speech, as I reached around to scabble in my pack again. "I picked something up from the Star Forge. Here, catch!"

With reflexes honed from a lifetime of conflict, Yudan effortlessly snatched the cylindrical object I lobbed at him with his free hand. He paused, eyes widening in shock. I should've figured he'd recognize the hilt without even turning the blasted thing on.

"Why does everyone persist in handing me Revan's belongings?" he choked, staring fixedly at the second lightsaber. "I do not need material possessions to remember her!"

"That's Karon's 'saber, not Revan's," I snapped, for all the good it did me. The man seemed unable to draw his eyes away from the hilt in his hand. "Revan merely held onto it for awhile. I reckon Karon and Zhar belong together, even in death. If you don't want it-"

"I did not say that." Yudan's eyes closed as he breathed in unsteadily. "I was simply... not expecting
"Ah, well." I shrugged, uneasy in the presence of his apparent grief, but even so- this felt like the right thing to do. "Life has a habit of throwing surprises at us all. It's how you deal with those fun little shocks that define you. Reckon you can wield two lightsabers?"

"I can master more than one form, old man," the Twi'lek murmured, as composure battled emotion across the fine planes of his face. His blue eyes snapped open to face me – shining bright and wholly uncorrupted – and in that moment I had faith that the man would be okay, whatever path he chose. "Perhaps I shall modify the crystals into a double-blade. I will remember Karon and Zhar... and their padawans. Both of them."

"Good. That's tribute enough for me." I nodded firmly, before taking in the lengthening shadows that darkened the grassy hill tops. "Ach, well, suspect I've said all I need to. Better head back before this old body demands a nap."

"You won't beat the setting of the sun, not as far out as we are."

"Pah. The nocturnal life here ain't a match for my wily bones." I shrugged my pack back over my shoulders, casting a last beady gaze over the notorious man standing before me. "One last thing. I've had my own draw of missteps in the past... nothing like yours, you might mutter, but they were enough to send me sulking into the Shadowlands for some time. Don't... don't make the same mistake as me, sonny boy. Decades of regret in the wild ain't a way to live, nor would it make those who have gone happy."

"I shall make a decision, Jolee Bindo," he promised, his eyes gleaming in the gathering dusk. "One way or another, I shall make a decision soon enough."

"Good." My lips twitched as I turned to face the trek back to civilization. "I'd wish the Force to be with you, Yudan Rosh, but that'd make me sound far too much like a stodgy Jedi. So all I'll say is this: live your life well. If we meet again, make sure you bring me a bottle of whiskey or I'll slap you over the head for being impertinent."

The man's soft chuckle stayed with me for some time after I left.

xXx

Roland Wann:
Republic Embassy, Ahto City, Manaan

"Happy retirement, Roland," a voice commented behind me. "Where are you headed?"

I turned, to spot the Republic scientist Kono Nolan eyeing me over curiously. It was strange, to see the man out of his standard white-jacketed uniform.

"Coruscant," I answered, taking a swig of what was meant to be non-alcoholic fizz-pop, but tasted suspiciously like Corellian ale. Damn Laconi. If the military arm of the Embassy wasn't in the throes of shutting down, I'd rake the crooked con over the coals for smuggling booze in under the Selkath's strict orders. "No brass allowed on Manaan. I have to go to the Core to claim my final papers."

It wasn't so bad, really. I used to dread the thought of leaving active duty behind – but the Sith attack on the embassy months earlier made me realize just how old I felt. Especially when contrasted with the acts of some – some who were now galactically famous.
"I'll admit, I hadn't thought much of Carth Onasi at first. But a man willing to charge into an invasion on his own -

The Republic had better defenders than me, these days. It hurt to admit that – but it was the truth.

"Me too," Kono said softly. His attention had shifted to the huddle of soldiers joking loudly around the head table. Bloody Laconi was clambering up on the plasteel surface, like he was about to break into dance. I couldn't see that twit headed for anything other than a dishonourable discharge. "Good to see the grunts celebrating, for once."

"We're all glad the embargo's been lifted," I admitted. "Even if the Republic's being booted from Manaan."

"The Selkath love their neutrality," Kono commented idly. "I'm not one for politics... but at least the Embassy's staying open. Even if it'll be civilian only."

Blasted Selkath bureaucracy had taken just about as long as I'd predicted, before they'd finally issued a ruling regarding the secret kolto base half their leaders had known of anyway. The dismissal of all Republic military was a public dressing-down, but a weak one, considering they'd agreed to a civilian ambassador and the retention of political ties.

And the Sith weren't even around anymore to keep their embassy open. The Republic officer in me rejoiced at that.

I could've applied for the civilian post. Maybe even attained it. But I'd wanted to keep my military ties, even if it meant retirement. And, truth be told, I just wanted to see the back of the bloody Selkath.

Much like the rest of the rejoicing soldiers beneath my command.

"And kolto will still be offered to the Republic at market rates, right?" Kono continued. "Considering everything, there's a lot to celebrate."

"There is," I agreed quietly. Kono had a smile dancing around his lips, but he was conspicuously alone, given that this was the final night for all military-affiliated staff. Even in his role as scientist, Kono still reported to the rank and file. "Where's your off-sider, Kono? Sami, wasn't it?"

"She-" His mouth twisted wryly. "She's left the Republic. Accepted a biologist's post with a new Selkath deep-sea base. Sami was always more... passionate than me about the wildlife here. I don't want anything to do with the ocean anymore, if I'm honest. I still see those damn feral firaxan at times..."

The man trailed into silence, his eyes closing briefly as his shoulders hunched.

"By all accounts it sounds like it was as hairy underwater as it was up here," I said in commiseration, drawing in another mouthful of booze. Laconi might like to dance on the wrong side of the law – but the Selkath's prohibition of alcohol on-base was pretty pedantic. This late in the game, I was happy enough to plead ignorance at Laconi's transgressions. "It's hard to lose men."

"Yeah," Kono murmured. He and Sami were the only staff that'd made it topside, and that was probably why I'd barely seen either of them since the lockdown. Survivor's guilt was never easy. "If it weren't for the Jedi... I saw Bastila Shan, you know that? Watched her on the cams as she charged a roomful of crazed Selkath just to save a mercenary. And that Cathar... she braved the ocean to sort the harvesting machine out. Her and that ugly merc. I don't care what the holonets are saying, the Jedi are heroes. Without them..."

"Hmm," I murmured. I still maintained if it hadn't been for Bastila Shan, the Embassy wouldn't have been attacked in the first place. But, still, she'd gone off and saved the Republic, hadn't she? Her, and that ragtag crew of hers. When I didn't see the empty bunks in the quarters staring at me accusingly, I could concede it was a small price to pay.

"We're headed for a brighter future, Roland," Kono murmured, as he uncapped the bottle in his hands. "Whether it's retirement or another posting... we have peace, now. The Republic will prevail."

"I can drink to that," I said. There was a warm satisfaction in my heart as I considered his words. Retired or not, I could still find a place in the Core. Enjoy the golden years, as such, and be glad that the next generation would grow up in a safer galaxy than the one I'd lived in.

I leaned over, and clinked my drink gently against Kono's.

xXx

Canderous Ordo:

Nearing Equator, Ordo, Ordo System, Mandalore Sector

Ordo was a barren rock of a planet, always had been. Wastelands covered near-all of the surface: scorching deserts inhabited only by the most hardy of non-sentient life.

Rimmed thinly around the planet's equator was a strip of vegetation that offered relief to the relentless temperature, but that relief was mitigated by the presence of the planet's more vicious predators – horned-tooth lizards the size of basilisks, venomous sandsnakes that could kill a man with a single bite, winged claw-monkeys able to shred armour not made of the finest beskar – ah, my home planet wasn't a place for the faint-hearted.

Clan Ordo had never settled on Ordo with any sizable population – no point with such an inhospitable climate and the lack of any substantial material resources, and that wasn't even counting the carnivores who claimed supremacy on the planet's surface. But Ordo remained a testing platform for the blooding of young warriors – and the ritual grounds for the ascension of a new clan leader.

Next to me, in the co-pilot's chair, Jacen Ordo shifted uncomfortably on his seat. "Before we touch dirt, ori'vod, there's something I must say."

"So, speak," I grunted, canting our transport into a landing trajectory following the coordinates Jacen had pre-programmed. The journey home had been... interesting, what with a pirate interception of the freighter I'd first boarded, not to mention the customs takeover when we'd finally landed on Ord Mantell. It'd felt like old times – cracking some heads together, showing those upstart pirates exactly why it was idiotic to mess with a Mando'ade – but I'd had my ride impounded and been left stranded on a planet riddled with bounty hunters and smugglers – none of who were at all interested in venturing into Mandalorian airspace.

Running into Jacen Ordo had been a surprise – until my cousin confessed he'd been hunting me down.

"I'm running for clan leader," Jacen admitted, leaning forward to confirm the landing beacon that'd been transmitted from the clan's gathering camp. "I told you before the Elders expected you to run – if you made it back – and there's no denying you'd be a strong contender, but..."
"Huh." I knew what he was leaving unspoken. My notoriety throughout the Republic – and that shiny Cross of Glory now warming the bottom of a pack somewhere – was both a blessing and a curse. Many Mando'ade felt now was the time for rebuilding, for the reconstruction of our clans and our strongholds – and that an ongoing neutrality with the Republic was almost a necessity for these goals to be achieved. Better not to poke a sleeping terentatek when our spears were still so dull.

But there were others who hung onto the old views of glory – of galactic domination, that grandiose dream Mand'alor the Ultimate had breathed – the one where expansion at the sacrifice of clan was worth seeking.

Where conquest and the subjugation of all others was the only path to honour.

"I'll back you, Canderous. I'd have you know that. Your deeds in the Wars speak for themselves, and I can only see a potential... cessation of hostilities with the Republic as a good thing."

"There are no hostilities to end. We haven't been at war since Malachor," I ground out, annoyed. My only true tie to the Republic was Onasi and – Commodore or not – he was hardly going to spearhead an alliance with the weakened Mandalorian clans still picking over the remnants of our lost empire. "We'd be a pack of di'kuts if we tried sniffing into their territories when we can barely hold our own."

"Yeah, I know that. But you haven't even said if you plan on running or not-"

"I'll talk with the Elders first, vod. Ain't no point making a statement until then."

Jacen simmered into thwarted silence as our light transport descended through the lower atmo. We'd had a talk or two on my final leg home, and there was no denying I felt the call to leadership. Seeing first-hand the dregs of my people scrabbling for creds on Korriban and Kashyyyk had galled, the more so because it had forced me to admit that I'd been doing exactly the same back on Taris.

The Mando'ade could do better. I could do better.

Still, it'd been gratifying to hear that the clan I'd saved in the Shadowlands had taken my words back home. Clan Ordo had called a leader-seek. Jernnin had been cemented as the First of the Lok Clan. Trallia had convinced the Kelborn elders to talk with Ordo about a potential alliance. And – or so Jacen told me – the murmurs of raising a new Mand'alor to unite our rebuilding had grown to a dull roar.

The scrubby vegetation near our landing coordinates burgeoned into view and with it came the visible peaks of portable tents, all framed with durasteel spires holding metres of sack-cloth that marked out temporary bases. There were dozens of docked freighters, light transports, snubs- no, more than dozens-

"This ain't just Ordo," I muttered, transferring auxiliary power into the landing thrusters as the sublight engine shut down. The transport turned beneath my hands, before descending cleanly towards an available landing pad. "How many other clans are watching our leader-seek?"

"Bala's here, they've always maintained close ties," Jacen admitted, as the ship landed with a soft thump. The repulsors whined, slowly whirring into silence. "Kelborn and Lok have both sent representatives. There was talk of a Fett leader, too, and as I left I caught wind of a contingent of aakaanir dala landing. Haar'chak, Canderous, you know that Ordo are probably the strongest clan left standing. Our leader-seek was always going to invite interest from the other clans."
"I'm coming home to a kriffing side-show," I muttered, as I unbuckled the safety restraints of the pilot's chair. "And how many are expecting me?"

"I didn't keep our return a secret, if that's what you're asking," Jacen returned drily. "Fame happens when you take on a Sith Lord and return victorious."

I stood, throwing my cousin an unimpressed stare, before retrieving the second-rate helm I'd procured and tucking it under one arm. Walking into what I expected was a waiting crowd would be better with a full set of beskar'gam, but all I had was Davik's lousy purple chest-plate, and a patchwork of body armour that said more about my recent past than I cared it to. I could feel myself scowling. "Let's get this damn circus over with, then."

A trio of akaanir dala were standing closest to the landing ramp as I exited the ship, and I was immediately relieved to note my estranged wife didn't number among their ranks. The blonde one, though, I did recognize – she shot me a cheeky grin that instantly reminded me of a brief hour back on Korriban-

"Olarom, Canderous Ordo," someone else said; a man decked out in full body armour that gleamed beneath the sunlight. His gauntleted fists rose to remove a shiny helm, revealing a face I knew well. "Welcome home."

My muscles tensed, and I was immediately aware of the blaster closest to my fist, and the rifle ready at my back.

"Su cuv'gar, Jagi of Bala," I offered formally. Jacen stomped down the ramp, stopping at my side, an easy smile pasted on his face. Jagi, on the other hand, was entirely expressionless. "Don't mince words with me," I continued, in an almost-growl. "Are you here as friend or foe?"

Jagi's thin lips twitched. "I'll admit I've been waiting for you. Wanted to speak to you first. I did what your Jen Sahara suggested, conferred with my elders, and- well. I'll repeat what I said on Korriban. There is no debt of honour between us – at least, not on my side."

I paused, considering the younger man. The insignia of clan Bala was etched proudly on the shoulder-piece of his beskar'gam, along with the marking as Third of his clan. Jagi had been a war leader I'd once respected, and his homecoming, it seemed, had done him good.

His little brother, on the other hand... I half-hoped Allen Bala was lurking about somewhere, just so I could find an excuse to bloody his mouth.

"I hold no grievance with you, Jagi," I said finally. "If someone comes looking for a fight then I'll give them one. But our clans have been allied for generations. It would be good to count you as a personal ally again."

"Let it be so," Jagi murmured, tucking his helm beneath one arm. "Your clan wants to talk with you, but I suspect you might like to unload your belongings first. I'll walk you to your tent."

Showing me my quarters was a courtesy bordering on subservience – maybe one Jagi thought I was granted, considering the public challenge he'd thrown at me back on Korriban. But, still-

"I have a tent already?" I felt my brows rise. "Didn't think I was that famous."

"We needed somewhere to put your stuff," Jagi muttered, waving me down a line of Ordo-marked tents. The akaanir dala didn't follow, but I was aware of the blonde one watching my retreat with interest. Damn, but I'd have to find out her name. "Kriffing thing wouldn't shut up until we found him a place to standby and wait for you."
"Wait." I halted, gaze narrowing. "What stuff? I haven't sent anything ahead, Jagi. What the kriff are you talking about?"

"Come and see for yourself." Jagi motioned to the entrance of a one-person tent. "He's pretty adamant he belongs to you. If you disagree, well- we can always use him for target practice."

I lifted the flap of sack-cloth, bemused. The tent Jagi claimed as mine was the standard shelter Mando'ade used in times of ground-war or clan gatherings – no flooring, just the required protection from the elements with a portable heat-generator in the centre and a simple stretcher laid out on the dirt floor. And in the corner-

"Mand'alor's balls," I muttered, as crimson photoreceptors flared to life, inset into the triangular headpiece of a burnished red droid I hadn't thought I'd ever see again. "Tinhead. What the kriff are you doing here?"

"Observation: Master, you certainly took your time," HK-47 intoned, his eyes gleaming a deep scarlet. "Elucidation: My former master's final command was that my service be rendered to you upon her death, suspected or confirmed. Query: Is there something you need killed?"

Jagi followed me in, his thin mouth curving in amusement. "I have to say, I've never seen a droid quite like this one before," he drawled. "I had a bet with Melaani of the akaanir dala on whether you'd actually recognize the damn thing. Guess I owe her fifty creds."

My arms were crossed as I stared hard at HK. The droid's head cocked, but he remained silent, awaiting my next order. Because kriffing Revan had entailed him to me-

I'd never desired a personal droid, protocol or... otherwise. Such things weren't uncommon among the Mando'ade, but all I'd ever cared for was my own basilisk war droid.

Not that I was entertaining the notion of turning HK away. I knew damn well the capabilities of Revan's old assassin.

"Haar'chak," I muttered. "HK, last thing I heard, Onasi shipped you down to the bowels of Republic Intelligence. Why am I not surprised you found a way to break out?"

"Query: Was that a rhetorical question, master? I can refresh your memory with a litany of my superior functionality, if your organic brain has decayed to the point of senility-"

"Hah!" Jagi cut in, chortling. "Bastard thing's just as rude to you-"

"Cut to the chase, Tinhead," I growled at the droid. "Why did she send you to me?"

HK's crimson gaze flared. "Observation: Considering the dross of peace-loving fleshbags my former master surrounded herself with, one could argue that you were simply the best of a sorry lot. Conjecture: Or, perhaps, she considered me a suitable Mandalore replacement."

"You've never had much of a self-preservation instinct, have you, Tinhead?" I said drily, amused, while Jagi choked in response to what many Mando'ade would take as fighting words, regardless of whether they emitted from a programmed machine or not.

"Objection: If that were true, I would no doubt be laid to waste several times over-"

"What have you heard, droid?" Jagi demanded, taking an aggressive step forward. "A Mand'alor replacement... have you been bugging the Elders' meetings?"
HK's right forearm cocked, and something thunked inside his robotic limb.

"Stand down, Tinhead," I snapped out. I didn't wait to see if he listened, but instead turned to shoot a questioning glance at Jagi. "What's going on?"

"If that damn droid has been listening in to private discussions-"

"What, about a new Mand'alor?" I drawled. "Haar'chak, Jagi, even I've heard whispers and I've only been around the Clans for five kriffing minutes."

"What do you know?" Jagi rapped out, still glaring at HK.

"Answer: That droids are vastly superior to organic meatbags in functionality, robustness, and rationality. That pain is the only reliable means by which truth may be obtained. That there are a lot of politicians on Coruscant; why, I could spend decades assassinating them and barely even make a dent. Sarcasm: Or were you looking for something a little more specific, Choleric Primate?"

"Ne'johaa, HK, shut up," I muttered, before raising an arm to forestall Jagi. As much as a brawl between my old comrade and HK would be entertaining, there was still part of me that reckoned HK had additional reasons for being here – and I wanted to know what those reasons were. Maybe the damn droid had already disclosed everything – after all, I probably was the best suited to take care of him now that Revan was dead...

...my service be rendered to you upon her death, suspected or confirmed.

Suspected. Revan had never been one to piss around with words. The Jedi- all of them had felt her die- but then we'd never seen her damned corpse, and it wasn't like this was the first time-

I scowled.

"Jagi, what's got you so riled up?" I ground out. "HK's always been a mouthy bucket of bolts. Why's the very mention of a new Mand'alor making you so twitchy?"

Jagi's glare swung back to me, but he sighed, his shoulders sagging in defeat. "Shavit," he muttered. "Maybe I am on edge. I'm Third of Bala, now, and it's the first time I've been privy to- look, all clan leaders have agreed, and it would've been declared days ago, but the Ordo Elders asked for a week's cycle grace before an official decree was announced. This was after Jacen Ordo commed in, saying he'd found you on Ord Mantell. There's a reason so many clans have congregated on Ordo, y'know. The clans who ain't here are gathered on Dxun."

"Mand'alor," I breathed, straightening. "It's true, then. We'll be seeking a new Mand'alor."

"Yeah," Jagi conceded. "Standard two month contestation. What with the Ordo leader-seek happening concurrently- well, I guess your Elders wanted to make sure you were here. To see what you would do."

"Query: Is this an official confirmation? Extrapolation: Is there any chance the seeking of your new meatbag leader may be retracted?"

HK's questioning was strangely intent- Jagi turned to glower at the droid again, but I waved him on. "All leaders have voted already, Jagi?"

"There's no turning back, if that's what you mean. We'll be following a new Mand'alor once the two months are done," Jagi clarified. "And if you plan on running for Ordo – or anything else – then you might want to kick some attitude readjustment into your damn droid before someone else smashes his head into the dust."

Running for Ordo - or anything else. Jagi’s implication meant that someone, somewhere, was already considering me as a potential-

"Statement: Master, I have a private message for you."

I blinked, turning back to stare at the droid. Jagi was frowning at my side. HK said nothing else, but his crimson gaze was levelled almost accusingly on Jagi.

"Jagi," I said slowly, not moving my focus from the robotic relic of the woman who had almost broken my people. "Give me a minute, would you? If there's any of my clan elders waiting, tell them I won't be long."

"Fine," Jagi muttered, but – surprisingly – turned to move away. Jagi's bearing towards me, his acquiescence to someone outside his own clan or reporting line said more than his words did. Jagi Bala, at least, considered me worthy.

Worthy of Ordo leadership, maybe – or maybe something more.

"Vor’e, Jagi," I said, as the man moved to leave. "I am glad to see you again."

Jagi nodded in response, and then left.

"Alright, HK," I ground out, as the sack-cloth entrance flapped closed. "What's Revan got to say to me?"

The droid didn't answer verbally; instead, a panel retracted from his forelimb, and the blue illumination of a recorded holo-message shone brightly on the dirt floor.

It was no surprise to see her kneeling figure.

That's kriffing Lehon, I thought, frowning, glimpsing the entrance of that damn pyramid at her back. The woman I respected and mourned for ran one hand through her mop of curls, before staring intently at the holo-cam.

::*Canderous,:: she opened, leaning forward. ::If you get this message then your clans have announced the search for a new Mandalore, and I'm probably dead.::

The recording grimaced, and I scowled.

::*Look, I recalled something regarding my duel with Mandalore the Ultimate. This is important.
Before the Wars, Mandalore was approached by... I'm not sure. By someone. An emissary of someone. Mandalore's vision of conquest was not his own, Canderous. That vision of conquest, of crushing the Republic- it was implanted in him by something or someone beyond the Outer Rim.
How much Mandalore remained his own man I cannot say....::

I could feel my face tightening in the beginnings of anger, and holo-Revan's mouth twitched.

::*I can only imagine your expression right now.:: she murmured. ::The truth is that Mandalore the Ultimate believed there was something out there. Something that used the Mandalorians as a means of testing the Republic... of testing the Jedi. It was not your peoples' decision to wage war on the Republic. You only have to look at the over-extension of the Mandalorian offensive to see how futile a future empire that vast would have been.::
I shifted uncomfortably. As galling as Revan's words were, I couldn't deny the truth in her last statement. We Mando'ade had certainly had the forces to make the Republic tremble, but to hold such a swathe of the galaxy long-term?

I hadn't been the only general to doubt that vision.

::I once believed there was a war coming, Canderous. And that it was waiting out in the Unknown Regions, in the dark, waiting for us to destroy each other. That's why Malak and I ventured into unknown space after Malachor. That's why I turned on the Republic... I justified it as a military takeover. Capture the Republic, strengthen it, and make the galaxy ready for what would come.::

She sighed, looking away from the holo-recorder. Etched in wavering lines of blue, Revan looked more like an artist's impression of a battered crusader at rest; all burred lines as she stared soulfully into the distance.

::I was wrong to believe I could master the Dark Side without losing myself. But I don't know if I was wrong about the Unknown Regions. I don't remember what Malak and I found. All I know is that if there is something out there, chances are the Mandalorian Clans will be hit first. And a weakened Mandalorian empire is bad for your people, for the Republic – and for all in the galaxy.::

I frowned, folding my arms. There was no denying that whatever happened to Revan after Malachor had been her turning point- but to think she'd been led there by Mand'alor- by what must have been his dying words-

::Strengthen your clans, Canderous.:: Her tone had turned crisp, almost commanding. ::As your friend, I ask this of you. As the woman you followed, and the one who once defeated your clans, I command it. Preserve your people and stand ready at the edges of the galaxy. I never destroyed Mandalore the Ultimate's helm of leadership. HK-47 knows where it is. Retrieve the helm, lead your people, and hold the Outer Rim firm.::

The holo-recording of Revan winked out, to be replaced by a navigational map. HK's eyes gleamed in the shadows of the tent, but the droid said nothing as I stared at a map of the Chorlian system, centred around the frozen wasteland planet of Rekkiad.

Mand'alor's balls! The kriffing helm?

I rocked back on my heels, shaken. The iconic full-helm had been passed down from Mand'alor to Mand'alor, its frontal mask carved from a mythosaur's sternum. Such a relic wasn't exactly necessary to hold the title of Mand'alor – and nor did it guarantee confirmation of the title – but there was no denying the power that symbol held with my people.

And one of Revan's final acts was to bestow the fabled helm back to the Mando'ade – to me.

"Preserve your people and stand ready at the edges of the galaxy."

Rekkiad was little more than a handful of days' jump from Ordo. I could be there and back before half the contestation period had expired.

"I once believed there was a war coming, Canderous. And that it was waiting out in the Unknown Regions, in the dark, waiting for us to destroy each other."

There were few people I esteemed as highly as Revan – and none outside of the Mando'ade. Something tightened in my chest as I considered her last order given to me – and I knew, in my heart, that there was no question on whether I would follow it.
Jacen would make a fine leader for Clan Ordo. It seemed my fate was leading me elsewhere.

xXx

Carth Onasi:
Government Sector, Citadel Station, Telos

Citadel Station still had that new smell: burnished durasteel overlaid with fresh lacquer on the sidings, differing colours of paint demarcating the separation between residential, retail and governmental sectors. Many of the station's walls were blessedly free of any commercial holo-ads, although surely it was only a matter of time before retailers snapped up the remaining real estate for their product placement.

I hadn't spotted any graffiti, either. That was something I made sure not to mention to Mission – for all that she'd signed up to a piloting course alongside Dustil, I figured sooner or later she'd sneak out to wreak her own brand of special havoc.

I was almost looking forward to it.

The sidings shifted to the yellow of the public governmental sector as I left the residential complex behind. Jolee had returned that morning – now safely ensconced with Dustil in what was beginning to feel like home – and the old man's arrival had been a welcome relief in an otherwise melancholy day.

Remembrance Day.

It was fitting, I supposed, that the authorities decided to honour the more recent casualties on the fifth anniversary of the bombing. We'd lost more than our planet the day Saul had betrayed us, but it'd felt like a double-edged sword this time, when the local brass saluted those brave Telosians who'd fallen in battle since then.

Captain Jordo Merrix was one of the more prominent names.

I'd heard weeks ago, of course; the news of his death was just another chink in my already battered heart. But I hadn't expected his so very public funeral to hit so hard. Men and women who'd flown beside him stood in silence, stoic acceptance plastered on their faces, as they later mumbled impersonally about what a good soldier he'd been.

Before raising a glass and moving on to grieve the next comrade.

Jordo'd had no spouse to witness the etching of his name on the ceremonial plaque. No best friend to shed a tear – sure, we'd been close once, before the destruction of Telos had catapulted us both into a life that didn't exist beyond the obligations of war. There'd been no child or parent or even a damn civilian neighbour to weep at the reality of his death.

And as my fingers traced Jordo's name on the newly-erected public memorial, I was hit by the staggering realization that had I died on the Endar Spire, my own funeral would have looked exactly like this.

Official and proper and completely impersonal.

I was lucky. So damn lucky. And stang, did that understanding hurt, when I still sometimes mourned Morgana, when I could barely even say Revan's name without my voice cracking.

The days were getting better. Even though I was still officially on leave, the Senate had a vested interest in the Telosian Restoration Effort, and I was conveniently seen as a bridge between political investment, military presence, and local governmental ties. Telos hadn't been the only planet devastated by war, of course, but perhaps it was the most prominent one. And if the Republic could show that a restoration effort was fruitful, it paved the way for other sectors to claim taxpayer funds in the name of rebuilding.

Of course, I wanted Telos to succeed more than anyone, and therefore I welcomed my not-yet-official involvement with the Telosian Council.

But, really, it was the kids that kept me whole.

Kids, I thought with a wry smile. Morgana had wanted a second child. A daughter, she'd teased, to keep the gender balance in our household. I couldn't help but wonder what she'd have made of Mission.

"Cap-er, Commodore? Commodore Onasi?"

The downside to becoming absurdly well-known was the frequent hails from strangers. I could still remember a young Dustil gushing over Talvon Esan, or my own regard for Saul that had blinkered my ability to see the man for what he had become. The famous were, well, just sents like any other. I was highly uncomfortable with the fact that I now numbered among their ranks.

I turned, a friendly smile plastered on my face, to survey an older Human grinning tentatively at me. The man held a datapad loosely in one fist, and I inwardly grimaced. Requests for holographs weren't uncommon, but I'd gone five days without one, and that was getting close to a personal record.

"I, uh, sure. Of course," I said hurriedly, staring down at the man's 'pad. "Do you have a datapen?"

"Eh?" The man blinked, before following my gaze and laughing. "Naw, this is my map of the station. Only been here two days, and I'm getting lost with every- say, Captain, don't tell me you've already forgotten me?"

I glanced back up at the Human, and the dawning recognition was slower than it should have been.

The heat of chagrin flooded me; I hadn't even thought on the Republic gunner since he'd slipped away from the Hawk. Sammy Tobards had done his part in taking out a slayer or two, but then he'd disappeared and became nothing more than a distant memory of someone who'd once shed blood beneath my command.

"It's fine," Tobards said, still chuckling, waving away the embarrassment that must have been evident on my face. "Guess you never expected to run into an old blighter like me again."

"It's good to see you," I said sincerely, eyeing the older man over. He'd been injured, I remembered, and then vanished with the second round of medics after we'd docked on the Meridus. Obviously he'd had to report to his own superiors, but the man had had the grace to leave us alone to our grief in the days that followed, and I felt a belated rush of gratitude for his consideration. "How's the shoulder?"

"It aches at night," Tobards admitted. "There's some permanent nerve damage. I ain't complaining, though, 'cause there was a moment back on the Forge when I truly thought we weren't getting out alive."
"Yeah." I searched for an elegant way to change the topic. Today had already been too much rehashing of the blasted past. "What are you doing on Citadel Station?"

"My son married a Telosian girl," he said, breaking into a wide smile. "She gave birth to my first grandchild a week ago."

"That's- congratulations," I offered, touched despite myself at the evident joy wrinkling the man's face. "Are you on leave, then?"

"I applied for early retirement. Only a few years left in me, anyway, and now that peace reigns it ain't that hard to wrangle a speedy discharge. Here, check this out-" Tobards thumbed the screen of his datapad, before turning it around to display the scrawny image of a sleeping newborn. "Isn't he something?"

"Yeah," I said quietly, gaze fixed on that tiny bundle of rebirth. At that moment, it didn't seem so long ago when Morgana had held a tiny babe in her arms, her soft gaze burning with all the love in the galaxy. "He really is."

Tobards powered off the 'pad, still grinning, and slipped it into a pocket. "Not sure what you'll think of his name, though. My daughter-in-law is quite the patriot."

"What?" I blinked. "No, tell me you didn't-"

"Hey, I had nothing to do with it," he chuckled. "Okay, so I wrangled her into the boy's middle name, but then Jedi Bindo did save my life."

"You- you haven't saddled the poor thing with both our names-"

"Carth Jolee Tobards," he confirmed proudly, as I stared at him in disbelief. The man's chuckle grew into a deep belly-laugh. "Ah, I can guess what you're thinking. But the boy will grow up to be a proud Telosian, if my daughter-in-law has anything to do with it. And it's important to remember the past."

"I-I guess," I said weakly.

Tobards walked closer, clapping me amiably on the shoulder. "I saw you at the remembrance ceremony. Guess I was hoping to run into you. It's a good thing, to honour those who died for our freedom, but I reckon it's just as important to enjoy the peace they fought for. That's why I left the Fleet. To be with my family, you know? To live."

I nodded, subdued, and suddenly lost for words.

I was a military man, and deep down I knew I always would be. But if there was one thing I'd learned it was that family had to come first – and I was fortunate enough to be given a second chance to prove that.

Fleet obligations or not, Dustil – and Mission – would forever be my first priority.

"Well, I won't waylay you any longer, Commodore. I hope- I hope everything is going well for you."

The man's last words had lowered in volume, as his expression turned solemn in respect for the dead. Of course, Tobards had seen Revan and Zaalbar leave the 'Hawk, never to return. And half the blasted galaxy seemed to think Bastila had been my clandestine lover.
Mission might find the idea hilarious, but if I ever found out which reporter started that lurid rumour, I'd strangle them with my own bare hands.

"Everything is as well as can be expected, I suppose," I answered wearily. "And- you can call me Carth, you know, being civvie and all."

"Okay, then. S'long as I'm Sammy to you." The ex-gunner paused, as a flash of uncertainty skittered across his expression. "I'm on the Station for good now, Carth. Don't be a stranger, okay? My son is a mean cook. It'd mean a lot to me if you'd come over for dinner one night with that boy of yours."

An unexpected offer of what felt like friendship from a man little more than a stranger caught me off-guard. "I'd- I'd like that," I managed, if a little slowly.

My acceptance was genuine, and that in itself surprised me. I had no desire to relive the battle on the Star Forge, but then Sammy Tobards didn't strike me as the sort of man interested in the glorification of past battles. "Maybe I'll even drag Jolee along."

"Oh, he's here?" The side of Tobards' mouth quirked. "Yeah, bring him too. You never know, he might even get my name right for once."

I chuckled. Knowing Jolee's propensity for acting the senile old coot, I rather doubted it. "Call on me then, Tob- uh, Sammy, when things have settled with your new grandchild. My address is publicly listed. We'll organize something."

The man grinned, before nodding in farewell and slipping silently away. I could feel the faint smile on my face linger, even after Sammy Tobards disappeared from view.

I turned, shrugging my hands into my pockets, and resumed walking down the sparsely crowded governmental halls. These pathways led into the public service sector, and there was one route in particular I often found myself following, during those brief moments I was at a loose end.

The trial arboretum erected along the most western chambers of the Station.

The atmosphere of Telos had acidified to the point where little life was currently sustainable on the surface. The Telosian Council's initial restoration goal was detoxification of the climate, of course, but from that lofty objective arose the question of which vegetation to introduce. A herd of Ithorians had secured permission to cultivate suitable flora within the Station itself, which they hoped one day to transplant down to the surface.

Heat lamps shone within enclosed transparisteel domes, illuminating seedlings of flax-grass and chocha-bushes imported from Onderon, and other varieties of plant-life I had no hope of recognizing. The domes themselves boasted artificial atmospheric conditions that were an emulation of what the Ithorian herd expected Telos to exhibit, given more time and funding.

Frankly, I wasn't all that interested in the plants, other than the future they offered my planet. No, I was drawn to the vast screens covering the outer walls. Some displayed a real-time view fed back from the holo-cams stationed down on Telos, along the lands chosen as the first point of plantation. Others showed projected images of the same land – now starting to thrive – in a month, three months, and even a year's time.

Hope. They displayed hope.

"You really reckon they can do it?" someone piped up behind me. "Fix Telos, I mean?"
I spun around to see Mission wandering slowly towards me. Her bright gaze was fixed on that final screen, the one with visible crops and shrubs growing unaided beneath a blue sky.

"I hope so," I said quietly as she neared my side. "It's certainly a dream worth fighting for. What are you doing here, Mission?"

"Following you, I guess." She made a face. "S'not like you're that hard to find, Carth. I just gotta follow the adoring stares of the dumb crowds."

"Ha ha." I looked around anyway, relieved to see that the arboretum was as quiet as normal. Mission grinned, nose crinkling, as she followed my gaze.

"Hey, was that Sammy I saw earlier?"

"You really were following me," I grumbled. "I thought you were back home?"

"Old man Bindo started lecturing Dee on the Force. Sheesh, I mean it's good to have him back an' all, but he can really go on a bit, y'know?"

I chuckled, before slinging my arm over the girl's shoulder and drawing her close. "Get used to it, Mission. The Force is a part of their lives, so I guess that means-"

"-it's part of ours, yeah, I know," she muttered, tucking her head into my side. "Did you- I mean, I was just wondering..."

Mission trailed off into silence, head bowed. I stared down at the top of her lekku, criss-crossed in those black leather straps that I wasn't sure had any purpose beyond ornamentation. "What is it, Mission? You- you can ask me anything, you know."

_Unless it's about boys. Or Dustil._ I blinked, thoughts frozen, suddenly aware of how highly uncomfortable raising a teenage girl might become.

"I just- well, you two were a thing, right?" she mumbled against my chest. "Did you- did you love her? Like, _love_ love her?"

"I-" The breath whistled out from my lungs as a stab of fresh grief completely blindsided me. Talking of Revan was still so damnably raw, but if I owed the words to anyone, it was to the girl in my care who had lost so much.

A quiet sigh escaped me. "I think I could have loved her, given the chance." I could feel my voice lowering as the truth forced itself free. "I did, Mission. I did love her."

"So did I." Her reply back was timid, muffled as she leaned deeper into me. "We're gonna be okay, right? I mean, are you gonna be okay?"

My eyes closed. Flickers of bittersweet memory flashed-

-"I named you well, Blaster Boy," Revan hissed, hefting a rifle as she stepped deeper into the Vulkars' base. "Though I seriously think you need to get out more."-

-Dusty boots, dropping with a thump on the 'Hawk's common room table. Green eyes rolling at my pointed look. "You do know this isn't your ship, right Flyboy?"

-Revan, laughing, her gaze dancing with unrestrained mirth over my purloined flight-jacket. "Carth, it's puke green. Honestly. Couldn't you find anything better in Davik's cast-offs?" Her impish grin widening beneath my glare as she held in further laughter. "It's not really your colour, you know. I don't think it's anyone's colour."-

-Uncertainty widening those bright eyes, as her cheeks burned with desire. "I-uh, um," she stuttered, pulling back from my kiss, caught completely off-guard for once in her life.-

-"Okay," Revan whispered, flushed and tousled after a night of stolen pleasure. "Honestly, Carth, you've got to be a complete borkhead to take me on."-

-"I won't fall, Carth," she vowed on Korriban, when the darkness of that planet threatened to leech into her soul. And on Lehon, when she begged for my faith if not my forgiveness- "Please. Follow my direction. Trust me."-

-Then, later, standing strong and sure, a warrior at the end but also the woman who had claimed my heart. "So. Are you going to kiss me, or do I have to do all the legwork around here?"-

-And, finally: "I promise I'll do everything I can to make it out. Promise me you'll do more than just survive if I don't."-

"No," I answered finally, quietly. "I'm not okay. But- but I will be." The words were a promise, a truth, the dawning hope of future closure, as I gathered the girl close and hugged her to my chest. A shudder racked Mission's frame, and I knew she was holding back the same tears that were burning at my eyes.

"Promise me you'll do more than just survive."

When I struggled to view events beyond my own grief, it was simply amazing to consider the changes Revan had wrought in us all. Jolee, now free from decades of self-imposed exile. Zaalbar, even in death – his past redeemed, his corrupt brother overthrown. Juhani once more a Jedi of honour returned to the fold. Canderous, purpose renewed, reborn as the Mandalorian commander he once had been. Bastila-

Bastila who, in a sense, had been the key to everything. In the beginning and at the end.

And the kids. My kids. Mission had once been just a street kid, with nothing to her name but an exiled Wookiee and a dubious affiliation with a shady swoop gang. Now, despite her losses, she had the opportunity for- well, for anything, really. And Dustil – not only alive, but also strong and powerful, making his own decisions – right or wrong – and I couldn't be any prouder of the man he was growing up to be.

Revan had changed us all.

Before the Endar Spire, my entire life had narrowed to a tunnel vision of war and retribution. I hadn't thought I'd had a heart left to give, nor would I have believed I could go through the same sort of grief a second time – and come out whole on the other side.

But, perhaps, Revan's biggest gift to me was exactly that. The strength to love again.

The ability to close my eyes and think on Morgana with a smile that was more fond than grieving, and know that one day the same would be true for Revan.

xXx

Malak Devari:
Peragus Mining Facility, Peragus Asteroid Field, Xappyh sector
The Force twined deep into everything. From the largest leviathans of sentient life down to the intricacies of the atoms themselves. Such a truth I had always known, but seeing that truth from the infinite was something else entirely.

The Force was awesome. Magnificent. And I waded through it, a lost spectre, able to conceptualize the beauty and the power of the Force, but incapable of influencing anything from this side of the veil.

For I was no more than an eddy of the past, unable to release my consciousness and dissipate into the stream of life as sentients of all types normally did upon death. Instead, I remained a transient echo of a man who had once grasped the galaxy by the throat, even if only for a short time.

So I wandered, unseen, past the glyphs of living prisoners with souls of grey, and their guards who flared a red righteousness of energy. Fascinating, how even nulls flickered on the fabric of the Force, but on such a minute scale as to seem truly insignificant. Of course, I had known that the spark of the Force existed in all living matter, but to envision it on such a minute scale-

It made me long to see a true Force sensitive burn in front of me. To know what I would have looked like, before Revan had taken to my heart with a shard of glass.

I knew why I was here. The anger, the desire for control, my underlying drive for vengeance – none of that had dispersed entirely. And yet, and yet…

…I could no longer ignore what had come before. We had been so great together, so powerful and true, before it had all turned so very dark.

I had once promised to always guard her back, no matter what would come, no matter what she wrestled with.

I had failed Revan as badly as she had failed herself.

For so much of my life, all I had desired was her. And now, even now, I could not let her go. I could almost... almost accept that she would stand alone, that I should have known she would in the end, that despite everything we had accomplished together, I was no equal to Revan Freeflight.

Perhaps I could have accepted that, had she not been caught in a limbo as futile as my own.

The nulls were cordoned into groups, like beasts of burden, sent into the bowels of a mined asteroid equipped only with flimsy face-masks and brittle tools. Sent to do the work of droids as penance for the sins of those who had led them.

Revan was quiet as she played the part of a subdued prisoner, but she was not defeated. I could not ascertain the emotions beneath her mask of composure, but defeat did not feature. I was sure of it.

So I stayed, and watched, as Revan lived and breathed through an existence far beneath her, scraping by in a mining station amongst so many of the insignificant lives who had once been the dirt-bugs of our Empire.

Oh, I knew why I was still here, but I did not know why Bastila was.

The young woman I had moulded and tortured and all but broken should have been able to let everything go and join with the Force, but she hadn't. Was it remorse at the fall I had pushed her into? Or a residual bitterness, directed at the Jedi who had manipulated her talents since childhood?

Or did she stay, like me, because of Revan?
Bastila did not acknowledge me, at first. I could not touch her on this plane, but she could see me as clearly as I could her. My taunts she ignored with a grace I hadn't expected. My comments on the fickle nature of the Force did nothing but tighten that prim mouth.

Of course, it would be the subject of Revan that finally had her speaking.

Revan could not see us, not here, not stripped of the Force the way she was. And it was on one day, as I stared sadly at Revan's back while she retreated into a sleep-cell, when Bastila finally responded.

"This is no place for her," I murmured, thinking on the nulls surrounding Revan. All muted points of light, like the outer embers of an asteroid field, held captive to the gravitational pull of a larger celestial body.

Considering Revan's captors were no more than paid Czerka officers equipped with blasters and shock-collar controllers, it seemed absurd that one such as she had been held for so long already.

"Why are you here, Malak?" Bastila clipped out. "Surely you can see that Revan's path is beyond your influence now."

I turned, slowly, to stare into a ghostly gaze that was devoid of any emotion whatsoever. I wondered idly whether Bastila hated me – and if she did not, as her impassive countenance seemed to suggest, where she had found that strength of character.

"There is something I must do," I returned, even if I was not sure exactly what that something entailed. Revan's fate, the Unknown Regions – the danger still called to me. Still strung a discordant tune, thrumming unease in my soul.

"There is no must here – can you not see that now?" Bastila replied. She was a shimmering coalescence of energy at my side, staring thoughtfully at me. "Can you not feel it? Here, there is only the Force. You can find your peace here."

There was a generosity in her words that went well beyond anything I deserved. Or expected, given our history. "Revan has no allies left," I said slowly, eyeing over the shade of the woman I had tormented beneath my will. "I cannot read Revan's mind, but I can guess at her thoughts. The Unknown Regions will plague her. She will tiptoe down the same quest as before, but with no Force, no allies – no backup. The least I can do is watch over from afar."

"If this is about making amends-"

I laughed, turning away from her. "Call it restitution, if you must find a label to dignify my actions."

"Very well. You choose a lonely path, Malak."

Bastila did not speak to me again for some time.

I found myself receding into a pensive silence as I watched Revan from afar; as she spoke little to her bedfellows, other than that smirking man who kept seeking her out. The Force would flicker, and my consciousness would lapse out of existence before I became aware again – now staring at the same prison some days later, without any understanding of how much time had truly lapsed.

It was an odd existence, this ephemeral life flitting between the dead and the living, as if only the strength of my emotions kept me semi-corporeal.
I knew it was the uncertainty of Revan's future that kept me stranded here.

There had never truly been a time for us. Perhaps... perhaps if we had never been discovered. Perhaps if we'd remained on the streets of Talshion, effectively Force-blind, eking out a living worse than what Revan endured now. We might have been happy, regardless.

But fate had intervened in the shape of Jedi Master Karon Enova, and that fate then solidified into the Mandalorian Wars before dovetailing into darkness. At the end of it all, perhaps I could finally admit the underlying difference between Revan and I – the difference I had always known, even as far back as those desolate days on Talshion.

I would have damned the entire galaxy to see her happy. But Revan had always thought of the big picture first, and her lover second. That was what made her the better Jedi... and the better Sith.

When that truth became undeniable to me, I had desired instead to become ruler of the Sith – maybe as a retaliatory slap back in the face of the woman I had cut my own heart out for, or maybe simply as an outlet for my darker emotions.

But that destiny was not mine.

It might have been Revan's, but it was never mine.

"She is going to try again," Bastila murmured, honing my concentration back into focus. How long it had been since Bastila had last spoken, I could not tell. Time was a faithless master in this realm, as flighty and capricious as the Dark Side of the Force.

Revan was standing near an unmanned door, staring at it intently. One thin arm rose ever-so-slightly from her side, as if she meant to manipulate the hatch controls into obedience – a trick she had learned far too easily back on Coruscant.

The Force had left Revan, the brightest star in the galaxy. Perhaps it was no more than the endless cycle of cause and effect, of some esoteric punishment meted out to one who had effected such devastation in her burning drive to save the galaxy.

Yet the Jedi Order had pushed Revan into a journey that had transformed her into something perhaps even mightier than the Jedi she had once been. Somehow, it didn't seem fair or right that the Force no longer sang to her.

What was Revan thinking, staying in this prison? Surely she could find a way to contact her allies, to remove herself from this place. I wondered, not for the first time, how much she recalled. How much was left, after the brain damage and the Jedi mind-screw that had been forced upon her.

Did Revan remember what we had found beyond the Outer Rim?

It had messed with our heads, all of us. I still did not believe the danger was imminent, but Revan had been convinced action was necessary. Maybe she had been correct. And if she was correct, then what would she do now?

There was no one nearby as Revan's hand lifted. I had seen her try twice, before, and the Force had utterly failed to respond.

The Force felt different to me now. So alive. An interconnected web of energy through all living things that I was acutely aware of, even if ghosts had no ability to interact with it.

I had never seen it like this when I was alive. Not in the serenity of a deep Jedi meditation, nor the wild throes of a Dark Side culmination of power. The Force now was simply staggering in its entirety. Even electricity at its basic level sparked along golden threads of energy, a culmination of many million particles all dancing to their own tune.

And, as Revan stared at the door, an intense look of concentration on her beloved face, I felt it.

The faintest swelling of power, the slightest shift in the movement of electrons running through the electronic mechanism that held her in.

It was not enough. Her brows lowered in resignation, and her hand dropped to her side.

"Did you see that?" I whispered in awe.

"Did I see what?" Bastila's enunciation was crisp and taut with ignorance. "She did not open the door, Malak."

Revan's expression resumed to a composed mask. She turned and walked away from me, as she always had – and always would.

"No," I conceded, but I cherished the triumph that swelled within me. "She did not succeed this time."

_The Force. It's healing. It's returning to her._

"But she will, Bastila. The next time Revan tries, she will."

xXx

Chapter End Notes

_Come up next: A brief epilogue, and some author's notes. I can't imagine it will be too far away. So, if you have any questions, now is the time to ask! An almost-million word count worth of thanks to kosiah for the beta. Also, a shout-out to WildFire on ao3 for inspiring me on some facets of Sion's background._
Epilogue

But now my voice is beginning to crack, and it is time for these old bones to have a rest.

What, you want more? You think this cannot be the end?

For some, perhaps, it was an ending. And for some, a beginning. For Revan herself? Ah, well, it was just another step in her story. A pause, before the rest followed.

I always did enjoy the journey in the middle myself. Like biting into a rose-apple pie, and sucking out the filling first. That's not to say the pastry itself isn't enjoyable – but the middle! Oh, that tart tang of fruit coupled with spices and dew-honey – that's the real treat.

You can't have a pie without pastry, though – and the pastry, really, is the foundation.

At the start of this, I mentioned that the Force has its favourites – but being so favoured comes with its own challenges. The Force is in everything, after all: a child's laughter, a storm's tempest, the scent of home wafting idly on a warm summer's breeze. Some say the peak of emotion is where the Force truly sparks alive – for what is living without embracing all that we feel?

Ah, yes, I know well the doctrine of the Jedi – that transcendence above such sentient folly is the key to the heart of the Force. But to me, rather, it is the acceptance of our foibles that carries the greater understanding. We all contain light and dark within us – just as we are all moulded by our pasts – and from this self-awareness our actions carry the greater shape of the person we truly are.

Actions, I said. Plural. For as Revan herself came to understand, a fall is not a single moment in time. Nor can redemption be attained in one conversation alone. Everyone is fallible – and no one is singularly without hope.

Revan understood that, when we finally left her in the desolate depths of a mining facility.

There are more challenges for her, of course, and more challenges for her friends and allies. Perhaps even the greatest battle the galaxy has ever seen. But I like to think this part of her journey was her defining triumph – the one where she reconciled with her past, her flaws and her failures, and refound her conviction to strive on and do what she must, without losing herself this time.

But I've rattled on long enough. I'm sure you have your own take on the events you have seen, so I'll leave you to ruminate on matters while I rest-

What? You want to know my name? Bah, what's in a name? Everything, some might say, especially those who had met Revan Freeflight. Nothing, others might riposte, having only known a wraith once named Jen Sahara.

You could call me the ghost who haunts the Enclave, I suppose. For I am merely the story-teller here, sharing the visions of others who touched the galaxy.

If you come back tomorrow, I might just continue on. For there is more to Revan's story. Of course there is.

Maybe even another whole pie's worth, if you're lucky.
Author's Note:

And thus, this story arc is at an end.

And it's screaming out for a sequel. Will I write it? If I did, it would be "inspired" by KotOR 2 rather than "based on". Certainly, Revan would be a, if not the, main character, along with the usual suspects of Carth, Yudan, Canderous, Juhani, Mission, Meetra, Atton, Kreia and her Masters of Pain and Hunger – plus additional KotOR 2 characters. And with the less-common characters, such as Mekel, Dustil, Vima, Dak, Selene, Yuthura, and more.

It might even answer some of the less obvious questions. Such as, why did Malak's mother and Revan's mother both land on Talshion? What truly happened to Malak's half-brother? What was Morgana Onasi's backstory, and what were her parents running from? Will Selene escape Korriban unscathed? Will Revan encounter Vima Sunrider, the only one left alive who played a direct part in her mind-reconstruction, and who is also, incidentally, her cousin? Will Griff Vao escape prison and seek out his sister? Will the Force return to Mekel, and if it does – will there be any vestige of Force-bond left?

Will Mission Vao ever take up competitive swoop racing?

I imagine a sequel would be a proper completion of Revan's story. (Without the lead-in to SWtoR. I do not like canon-Revan's end, and would not follow that path).

But I started this saga back up in 2016 with the purpose of practicing writing – to then try my hand at something original – so part of me believes I need to try that first. I am honestly unsure, as my heart is firmly in the KotOR world. So, I can't promise I'll return to write the sequel – but I may. Time will tell! So stick me on author alert if you're interested in a sequel and we'll see what the future holds.

I hope the ending is open enough for all readers to imagine the reunions and challenges and end-game to come.

I have some ideas for other stories, both in this 'verse or different KotOR AU's – I've put them in my profile/bio page. Let me know if you have any comments on them, I'd love to hear.

A few notes –

"Happy" Endings:

For those disappointed that Revan didn't get a "happy" ending, at least for a year or two, well... I would have liked to have given her that, with Carth. But Carth is a military man, and his time with Revan has healed him – as it has her. Realistically, I do not see how Revan could live peaceably in the Republic at this moment in time, except as a secret life – and that would have clashed with Carth's military career. He may have sorted his priorities out, (I can certainly see that he'll be putting Dustil before his career now), but I don't see him giving up the Republic.

And I don't see the Republic forgiving Revan. At least, not yet. Sorry, but the LS ending of the game just seemed a bit forced – a bit too early, for me. (Let's forget everything Revan has done that actually caused Lehon/Malak/the war, and instead label her a hero of the Republic! Let's give her a medal!) I would like to say that I do love happy endings, I am a sap, but I have to believe the ending as well.

At the close of it all, I don't believe Revan is in a bad place, right now. As she noted, she finally has time to process – without imminent danger, and also without the inherent dangers of the Force. This is important, I think, for her well-being. Time to think things through, without even the Force itself to muddy things in her head. She'll need that, because the threat still lurks.

What is also important is Malak's final observation.

The GenoHaradan:
I loved the concept of a shadowy assassination order pulling the strings of governments in the background. Wasn't too keen on their overseers, though. E.g. Hulas: too accessible. Rulan: too geographically remote. I didn't like the game plot of kill-all-the-overseers-and-take-over either - that seemed unrealistic. More appropriate to a bounty hunter group than the influential organization the GenoHaradan had evolved into. So hence in my world: Hulas became a front, a recruiter, and Rulan a retired Overseer. Eridius/Gaalin/Ajax are all OC.

Mando'a:
The language of the Mando'ade, Mando'a (both referred to as Mandalorian by outsiders) is well documented online – however a list of words used throughout this saga can be found in chapter one, including the constructs I created for the purposes of my story.

Kreia / Arren Kae:
Although it's not quite canon for Kreia to have been Arren Kae in the past, this plotline has not been denied by Kreia's creator (I think he labelled it as "interesting", although correct me if I'm wrong). The coincidences in KotOR 2 certainly grant it possibility. That makes for a fascinating backdrop for untapped storylines in KotOR 2, given exactly who Arren Kae's daughter is. Canonically, Kreia admits to chafing beneath Jedi principles as well as delivering philosophies that border on seditious. But if one follows the fanon-favourite arc of her being Arren Kae, then pregnancy was the reason she was kicked out of the Order. I wonder if that was purely the catalyst.
One last note: canonically Kreia taught Revan during Revan's time as a Jedi. As I had already established Revan's master prior to KotOR 2 being released, Kreia instead became Revan's secret advisor during the Mandalorian Wars. I imagine there would be much to unveil in a sequel.

Revanchist/Revanchism:
I gave a brief nod to this piece of canon with Malak's definition in chapter 83. It's a piece of canon I don't like, probably because I came into the fandom in 2004 with the game, when Revan was the name of a character that had absolutely nothing to do with a French military term. To me it feels contrived (and not Star Wars-ish) that at a later stage it was decided to use this French term as Revan's title. My biggest issue with it is the meaning. Revanche is revenge, revanchism is the act of payback / revenge in a military sense. This is not why Revan and Malak and all the Jedi who followed them entered in the Mandalorian Wars. They entered as protectors, guardians, to save the Republic and expel the Mandalorians. The fundamental drive was protectionism. I suppose one could argue that it was a concept to boost morale amongst the Republic, but I also see the meaning as being the antithesis of a Jedi – and Revan was still a Jedi in his/her heart during the start of the Mandalorian Wars.

Malak's real name:
Yeah, don't like that either. Looks like someone head-planted a keyboard.

Nomi Sunrider/Ulic Qel-Droma/Vima Sunrider:
Canon says Ulic Qel-Droma died on Rhen Var from a blaster bolt, after training Vima and meeting Nomi again. In my 'verse he didn't stay on Rhen Var, but instead travelled to Talshion – it is no coincidence he ran into Nayama there. Neither was it a coincidence that Malak and his half-brother were there – this was all fallout from Exar Kun. Maybe one day I'll write that prequel.
Fun fact: Ulic Qel-Droma and Nomi Sunrider both died of septic lung disease, on the same day, on opposite sides of the galaxy. Perhaps Vima was right in her supposition of it being a shattered heart, or hearts, finally failing.

The Jedi Thirteen / Revan's Guard of Twelve:
This is my AU take on what canon calls the Jedi Crusaders (or the Revanchists). The most powerful of the Jedi who followed Revan, and who later became her commanders. Certainly there were more than just 13, but these Jedi were the vanguard, the heroes, the leaders that the galactic holo-news centred on. The names Nisotsa, Cariaga Sin, Talvon Esan and Xaset Terep are from a cut-scene in KotOR 2, being Jedi Knights that Malak recruited (according to canon). The other members of the Jedi Thirteen are all OC (excepting Meetra, of course).

Siblings:
In canon, Atris has no surname and is not related to Meetra Surik. But there's an obvious bitterness between Atris and the Exile in KotOR 2 – even suggestions of a romantic link if you play Male!Exile. I liked the idea of a familial bond as a reason for that bitterness.
In canon, Nayama has no surname and is not related to Nomi Sunrider (nee Da-Boda). Without a history for Nayama, I had free rein to make one up…. And her history is crucial to the past and what went down during the time of Exar Kun. This will likely be expanded on in the sequel (or prequel) that I may or may not write.

Malachor V / The Sith Triumverate:
The battle at Malachor V is pivotal to Revan and the galaxy at large, but it feels even more pivotal in KotOR 2 – this was the epochal event that caused the Exile to lose the Force – and also created Darth Nihilus. Given the importance of Malachor, and the running theme of "Wounds in the Force" (Exile, Sion, Nihilus) in KotOR 2, it makes sense to me that Darth Sion was also heavily involved at Malachor (even if canon only places the Exile and Nihilus there). Also, depending on your take of things playing a female Exile, there's some creepy romantic vibes coming from Darth Sion when you face him. Hence my history of Xaset Terep as one of the Jedi Thirteen, at the centre of Malachor, also losing the Force – and as Meetra's lover.
This would be a major subplot if I write the sequel, and even I'm not sure how it would play out yet.

Thanks:
I will take a moment to thank everyone who has ever reviewed, favourited, followed or simply read this incredibly long piece of work. It looks like I'll get annoyingly close to 1k reviews, but probably won't hit that mark, dammit. As freshdoge observed, I'll be as close to a thousand reviews as I am to a million words. I suppose a strike rate of one review per 1,000 words isn't too bad, right?

Thanks for the reviews. Every review had brightened my day. To my regular reviewers, double-thanks – and triple it for those who write long reviews with their thoughts, speculations etc.

A nod to Curtis who, back in 2004, helped me with the formation of chapters 25 and 41 – the first two HK-47 chapters. Without that, there would never have been an HK-47 POV, and that foundation allowed me to expand and build upon everybody's favourite assassination droid in later chapters.

A billion thanks to my wonderful beta kosiah. Undoubtedly there are elements in this story that have been inspired by her masterpiece Memory. Her betas and ideas and willingness to let me bounce ideas off her have helped tremendously, particularly as I returned to this story after a decade's break.

And, finally, thanks to my long-suffering and supportive SO, who continually puts up with me rabbiting on about Star Wars, and whose grammar and comma placement eclipse mine.

I hope everyone reading this enjoyed it as much as I enjoyed writing it.

From now on I will PM any review that comes my way. As for anonymous reviewers – let me thank you in advance for any review you leave. Us fanfiction writers may not write for the reviews, but there's no denying we love to get them. It's so gratifying to know people out there are reading our work.

If you have any questions, drop me a PM! (Or review. Hahaha). I would love to hear from you, even if it is months or years after this story has been completed.

And, now, I will finally go and flick that completed switch on this story with – surprisingly – a bit of a heavy heart.

Thank you, all.

-ether

xXx

Please drop by the archive and comment to let the author know if you enjoyed their work!