And as the light faded from the final day before the duel, I started to grow angry. I shouldn’t have expected an outsider to understand or respect the importance of blood debt, but haar’chak, this was Revan. She had sworn to be my second, and I would have wagered the armour on my back that she’d come through for me.

Except that she wasn’t Revan, not really, not anymore.

But here she was, in the nick of time - though decidedly more interested in gossiping with Onasi and arguing with the princess – than discussing the matter of Mando’ade honour: that which is more important than one’s life. I scowled, slamming on the door control to the starboard sleeping area. Revan needed to appreciate the gravity of tomorrow’s trials. Jagi was no pushover, especially not with a blade - I wasn’t idiotic enough to expect an easy victory.

And if Revan even thought about using the Force tomorrow, I’d turn around and stab her myself, second or no.

The living quarters smelled of wet Wookiee, the being in question asleep on the bottom bed with his furry paws sticking off the end. There were a couple of bunks in here, but since Onasi had started kipping in the pilot’s quarters it’d just been us two co-habiting.

Good thing too, because Onasi and I didn’t get along on the best of days – even if I could admit he wasn’t a bad soldier. He needed to loosen up, Onasi, find himself a cantina wench and get laid. He spent too much time pissing about with the past. You should move on and forge a new future if you wanted your clan and your honour to survive.

The Wookiee, on the other hand, was unassuming and easy to ignore.

I grabbed the bottle of slumbari bourbon I’d recently procured in Dreshdae and headed back to Revan. It wasn’t a night for drinking, not with a blood duel in the morning, but a shot or two would help us both sleep. Revan might not need it though - she looked damn exhausted, like she’d been duelling Sithlings for the last two days straight. Judging by the state of her armour, raggedly visible under that dirty Sith robe, it was probably an accurate summary.

Onasi was in the central room when I returned, a lost expression on his face I hadn’t seen before. He looked like someone had just stood on his pet felinx.

“…will find the map, and then go to the Academy,” Revan was telling him earnestly. “We had an incident- I think things are going to get messy there. When we leave the Academy, we have to be prepared to get off Korriban quick.”

“You know where the Map is?” Carth asked in a quiet voice, staring intently at her.
“I know where the Map is,” she echoed, gazing back. Neither of them had noticed my entrance.

I slammed the bottle of bourbon down onto the table with a thud, and they both jumped, spinning to face me. “The blood duel. That’s what we’re talking about,” I bit out. “The Map can bloody well wait.”

“The duel is first,” Revan placated, a slight frown creased between her eyes. “I won’t let you down, Canderous.”

I grunted, part in disbelief, and grabbed a pair of tumblers from the kitchenette cupboard. Sitting down, I roughly motioned Revan to do the same.

Onasi, leaning against the wall, sighed as he ran a hand through his hair wearily. “I suppose it’s too much to ask that a Mandalorian duel can end peacefully?”

I snorted in derision. “And this attitude is why we had no qualms about invad-”

“Canderous!” Revan snapped, her eyes flashing. She stood abruptly. “Wait. Give me one minute to deal with Carth.”

I shot her a glare that should have shown the depths of my annoyance, while Onasi scoffed. “Deal with me?” he muttered disbelievingly.

“Carth,” Revan said quietly, picking up my damn bottle of booze and filling her glass with a generous amount. “It’s a Mandalorian honour duel. I’m sure I don’t need to spell it out.”

He sighed as she walked towards him, glass in hand. “No,” he conceded. “I do understand honour, despite what that thug may think.”

I snorted, but kept my silence under Revan’s quelling gaze. She had about thirty seconds to remove the pilot, before I was going to do it forcibly. We had a damn duel to discuss.

Revan lifted the glass towards Carth, motioning for him to take it. “Drink,” she said firmly.

He frowned. “Jen, I’m not much of a drinker. You know-”

“Carth, you’re going to stay up all night, worrying about Dustil and being unable to do a sodding thing,” she spoke over him, her voice intense and commanding. I could hear the echoes of the leader she had once been. “I’m going to need everyone at their best for both the Map, and to pull off this extraction from the Academy. I need everyone rested. So either knock the drink back or get a sleeping pill from the medbay.”

He looked at the half-full cup. “That smells awful,” he said wryly. The corner of Revan’s mouth lifted in an answering grin. Onasi’s expression turned serious as he stared at her. “I’m a career soldier, Jen. I know how to sleep when required. I’ll leave you two to it.” With a nod at her he left the room.

Revan watched him go, concern evident on her face. I felt my irritation crest once more, and was about to growl with annoyance before she turned suddenly to face me.

“So,” she said, seating herself again. “Blood duels. What do I need to know?”

I fixed her with a hard look, and she stared back unflinchingly.

“There’ll be a leader there,” I said at last. “Usually it’s an Elder, but I doubt Jagi will have found one on Korriban. You must speak Mando’a, Jen, and for no reason at all use the Force.”

Her eyes glittered. “I’d figured that one out, Canderous.”

“Make sure you don’t forget it,” I growled. “Blood debts are sacred, to us Mando’ade. It’s a redressing of honour, so it’s crucial to get it right. The leader will give Jagi and me a chance to say our piece, and as my second you will support me. There is a traditional phrase for you to use after my address.” I kept my eyes fixed on her as I switched to Mando’a. “(By the witnessing of the stars, the shedding of my blood, and the resting of the earth, my honour stands in agreement with this Mando’ade.)” “Sheha'taylir be ka'ra, galar be ner tal, bal nuhoy be vheh, ner ijaat sonsol ti ibic Mando'ade,” she repeated after me quietly.

I nodded in gruff approval. “Jagi’s second will say it first, so hear him if you need a reminder. You are not allowed to speak during their address, Jen.” At her nod, I continued. “Once the duel has begun, it will proceed to completion. No one, not even the second, is permitted to intervene while Jagi and I still stand.”

“Alright,” she said slowly, nodding. “So tell me. What happened with Jagi?”

It was just like Revan to bend the topic so abruptly. I’d half-expected a dozen different queries on the fight itself, but no – she had to go nosing about for the reasons.

She has a right to them, though.

I frowned as my thoughts turned inward. It had been a long time ago, and I’d been a different Mando’ade then. Filled with dreams of glory and conquest and a victorious future. Jagi had been both an ally and a friend.

Life was easier then. Easier to understand, and easier to know the right thing to do.

“Althir was early on in the piece,” I said roughly. I looked at her in the eye, and wondered, once more, whether she recalled anything at all. “It’s an Outer Rim world, and we took it before the Republic joined the war against us.

I snorted, shrugging my shoulders. “The clans have been scattered since Malachor. I wasn’t proud to be doing Kang’s dirty work, but it sure beat hanging around the squabbling remnants of my people.” I shifted uncomfortably on the damn plimfoam benches made for sentients smaller than myself. There hadn’t been a Mand’alor since the devastating battle that brought our invasion to an end - the conflict that Revan herself had led and won - that cataclysmic turning point at Malachor.

Maybe, one day, I’d go back and have a say in the choosing of the new Mand’alor. Maybe if my people were ready, I’d return. There were some I had left behind, and in my weaker moments, thought of.

“And Jagi?”
“Althir wasn’t a walkover, even though we were the superior force,” I said slowly. There was honour in victory, but also in recognizing that strength of your opponents. “In numbers, firepower, and sheer grit.” I grinned; they’d had knowledge of us coming, and their defences had held, for a time. We’d underestimated the fortitude of the Althiri - but they weren’t able to withstand our might forever. “Most of it took place in the skies above, but Jagi’s taskforce was grounded, holding a key defensive post the Althiri were desperate to recover. It was important to our line of attack, and I’d ordered him to hold it to the end.”

“To the end?”

“Yeah,” I nodded at her inquiry. Hold it, or die trying, and we’ll sing your battle song to the stars. “A squadron of fighters were backing him, otherwise it would’ve been a suicide mission. But--” I grunted, lifting my feet onto the table, relaxing back into a more comfortable position. Revan’s bright eyes fell on my boots and gave a small smile.

“No feet on tables,” she muttered, seemingly to herself.

I folded my arms and stared at her, unimpressed. Revan laughed, her eyes dancing, and waved at me to continue.

“There was an opening in the air attack,” I continued. “A chance to end the battle quicker, with less loss of life overall. But to capitalize, I needed to pull the fighters back and leave Jagi exposed.”

We lapsed into silence, and Revan took a swig from her drink. “Yurgh,” she complained, frowning at the glass. “Carth is right. This tastes like…” she looked around, her gaze resting on my filthy footwear. “like a Mandalorian’s boots.” She glanced over to me, her mouth quirking. “Not that I know what boots taste like, mind you.”

I gave her a feral grin. “We Mando’ade drink from our boots all the time,” I said dryly. “It’s how we prove our manliness.”

Revan snorted.

I picked up my cup and knocked it back. I couldn’t stop a grimace. “Haar’chak. This is foul,” I conceded, picking up the bottle and looking at the label. The merchant had it claimed it was Korriban’s finest – either I was getting old and couldn’t spot a rip-off, or the Sith were trying the emulate the sensation of shoving a lightsaber down one’s throat. The bourbon burned a harsh fire in my chest.

I stared at the table. “It was the right thing to do,” I said quietly. “It was the Mando’ade thing to do. I ensured a quicker end to it, with less casualties and less damage to the Althiri mines – the resources we were after. But it meant sacrificing Jagi.”

Jagi’s battalion had comprised mostly of clan Bala. He would have seen his family cut down one by one, as the defending snubfighters vanished from the skies above. His loss would have been too damn personal for him to accept the rightness of my choice. I got that, I did - but Jagi had been a good friend once. And his clan was a staunch ally of Ordo.

I’d mourned him after Althir, but swung my attention onto the rest of the War. I’d had no idea he’d survived.

Revan knocked back the remainder of her drink, her face pinching from the harshness of it. She slammed the drink down on the table, and gave a little shake of her head. “It’s the choices that battle commanders have to make. Sacrificing a thousand men to save ten times that amount. A capitol ship for a fleet. A planet for a system.”

I stared at her, hard, but she was still grimacing at the glass. When the stakes rose that high, it took a truly objective leader to make the right choices. Those simpering robes – when they could be cajoled into warfare – tried to save everyone, and that’s where they failed. You couldn’t save everyone in war.

Revan had understood that, in a previous life. I’d never met her, but I’d studied her as my peoples’ enemy enough to know her mettle. This wasn’t the same woman… but there were flashes, here and there. Enough to catch my interest, enough to rouse my respect.

Revan met my gaze, then; eyes serious on me as if taking my measure. “How does this second thing work?” she asked quietly.

I leaned forward, capping the bottle. The bourbon was still sitting in my belly, a comfortable warmth now, and neither of us needed another drink.

“Most blood duels don’t have seconds. If the instigator believes the honour imbalance too great, he can call on a second – if someone will stand for him.” I stared at her. “If Jagi cuts me down, you’ll be facing him next, standing for my honour even in my death.”

She nodded. “And if you kill Jagi?”

“Then Allen will carry Jagi’s honour and face me.”

“And if one side has a second and the other does not?”

I shrugged. “Well. If no one’s willing to stand up for your honour, it probably says a lot about you.” Jagi had given me little time – and that was highly insulting in itself. Every Mando’ade should be allowed to call on allies from afar, and maybe I could have insisted on that without my own personal standing diminishing in front of the others.

Maybe.

Revan grunted, but dropped her gaze to the table. Her fingers were drawing idle circles on the plasteel. “Tell me something, Canderous,” her voice was dark, and twisted on the words. “Did Revan have a second when she faced Mandalore?”

The question stunned me for a second. She’d spent so much time avoiding talking about herself, about Revan, that I hadn’t ever expected her to lead the topic. “Of course she kriiffing did,” I bit out at last. “Malak stood for her. And if he hadn’t, she still had the whole bloody Jedi Thirteen to back her.”

Her shoulders had tensed in on themselves as she continued looking away. From what I could see of her expression, it was part-angry, part-tormented. Inwardly I damned the Jedi Order for however they had screwed with her mind. One of the most brilliant leaders to come from them, and they’d turned her into a damaged shell, a mockery of who she had once been.

Although there had been times, recently, when I wondered if she was rebuilding herself. And that thought is what kept me here, on the Ebon Hawk with snotty princesses, cheeky Twi’lek urchins, and grumpy Republic pilots.

“Malak always had her back, then,” I commented darkly. “One day, he’ll get what’s coming to him.”
Revan raised her head, rubbing at her temple while her forehead burrowed in confusion. She seemed to have no idea what I was alluding to.

“You don’t turn on your comrades,” I explained. “The way he snuck around, firing on her ship when she was engaged with Bastila’s strike force was an honourless disgrace. If Malak wasn’t man enough to challenge her to her face, then he should have left damn well alone.”

Her expression was composed once more, if a bit pale. “I- I don’t think the Sith follow the Mandalorian way, Canderous.”

I snorted, getting to my feet. This conversation was useless. Either one day she’d get it, or she wouldn’t. And if she didn’t- well. I wasn’t going to be a party to the Jedi keeping her weak. If she hadn’t worked it out by the time we left Korriban, I was damn well going to kick her arse until she did.

“Get some rest, Jen. I’ll drag you up in the morning.”

Revan nodded briefly, but I stood and stared at her until she sighed, clambered to her feet, and wandered off in the direction of the port living quarters.

xXx

I’d already known that Revan wasn’t at her best in the mornings, but she barely even roused when I roughly shook her awake. The Cathar was snoring quietly on a top bunk. The Bek brat and the princess were both missing – Bastila, I presumed, had once more commandeered the medbay. Before that, she’d camped out in the pilot’s quarters. Seems our princess is above sleeping with the rest of the rabble.

I pulled Revan to her feet, but she collapsed back down, mumbling grumpily about caffa and sleep. Her eyes hadn’t opened, and she looked ready to slump back against the hard bed.

“For the love of Mand’alor-” I muttered, clasping her hand once more, and this time strong-arming her down the hallway.

“Okay, okay!” Revan complained as we turned into the central common room. “Sun and stars, Canderous, your bedside manner is atrocious.” Mission was tucked up in the corner, a spoon of food halted halfway to her mouth as she stared at both of us in wide-eyed surprise.

“I’m a man of action not words, Jen,” I said, pushing her towards the benches. “Sit. I’ll get some food.”

Revan collapsed next to Mission was a groan. “Look, I had a full day yesterday. Forgive me if I need more than two sodding seconds to wake up.”

“Jen,” Mission said, dropping her spoon. “Were you two sleeping together?”

I swung my head to stare at the Twi’lek. Revan started choking, her eyes widening in surprise as she gazed in disbelief. A shadow from the cockpit’s hallway heralded the arrival of Onasi, who halted at the fracas.

“Mission!” Revan gasped. “What the frell?”

I gave a brief snort of amusement as the teenager began to flush an amusing purple colour. While I wasn’t one to turn down a roll in the hay, my mind was currently focused on one thing only: the blood duel. Besides, Revan was the sort who came with far more complications than I desired.
“What is going on with everyone?” Revan was muttering in disbelief. “Why does everyone think I’m getting action I certainly am not?”

I smirked. “If you desire action, darling, I’m sure I can oblige—”

“Canderous!” Revan snapped, and now it was her turn to blush as she stared in outrage, first at me, then Mission, and then Onasi, who looked remarkably displeased about the whole conversation. Revan’s cheeks turned uncharacteristically red, and she groaned with embarrassment, theatrically dropping her head in her arms. I snickered.

“Okay, okay! Sheesh, you guys!” Mission threw her hands up in surrender. “Forget I said anything!”

I turned back to eyeball the synthesizer. We hadn’t had real food onboard since Manaan, and due to our hurried departure from that watery planet, no one had bothered to stock up on perishable items. Which left the mush dispenser, and whatever energy ration bars the Wookiee was guarding in the cargo bay.

“Anyway…” Mission trailed off. “Topic change. Boy, am I glad you guys are back. This planet stinks. And the people are even worse. Tell me we’re getting off this rock.”

“As soon as we can, Mission,” Revan replied, her voice muffled. “Actually, I need your help.”

“Really?” the Twi’lek sounded surprised. Between the walking carpet and the paranoid pilot, they probably never let her have any fun. “Sure, what d’ya need?”

The synthesizer glooped as it squirted out a beige pile of mush onto a plasteel receptacle. “You could clean out the food machine,” I grunted, placing a second plate under the machine. A light breakfast before a fight was a sound foundation; fighting on either an empty or overfull stomach was a disadvantage. “With our empty cupboards, we’ll be fried if this thing breaks down.”

“I need you to find a map of the shyrack caves,” Revan answered as I turned around, two plates of breakfast in my hands. The Twi’lek’s eyes went round.

“No way, Jen!” Mission gasped. “You’re not— you’re not going there?”

“The Star Map?” Onasi asked in a low tone.

Revan’s gaze flicked to him before landing back on Mission. “Yeah. It’s there. I’ve got the beginnings of a plan, but I need any sort of map Teethree can find. I’m hoping either the ‘Net will yield results, or perhaps one of the spaceport traders who skirt through the caves to the mining colony have something of use.”

I dumped a plate in front of Revan, and she looked up at me.

“Eat,” I commanded. “We have an hour before dawn.”

She nodded at me before pulling a comical face at the plate.

“Sure, I can do that,” Mission said brightly. I had to hand it to the kid – her enthusiasm never let up.

Revan sat glaring at her spoon as if it were the source of all her evils, until Onasi abruptly spoke. “Did you fall asleep with your armour on, Jen?”
Revan blinked, looking at him in surprise. I shot the Republic pilot a derisive look. There was a time and a place for personal grooming, and Korriban was not it. Revan didn’t answer straight away, and Onasi began to grin.

“You never heard of a refresher?” he teased.

“Not high on my list of priorities, flyboy,” Revan muttered, running a hand through her matted curls. I looked her over critically, and had to concede that, maybe, Republic had a point. Revan had likely face-planted into the bed with her charred Sith robe on, the dark grey of it failing to conceal darker smatters that were either dirt or blood. Her ragged armour mesh was visible underneath, a contradiction in itself for a Force-sensitive, but then, Revan had never bothered abiding by the rules.

Even the Mando’ade only slept in our armour when we were on the battlefield.

“Remove that robe,” I said suddenly. “You ain’t turning up to a Mando’ade duel dressed as a Force user.”

Revan shot me a startled look, before nodding and doing as I bid. The rumpled dark robe was thrown to the corner with a scowl, before Revan yawned and dropped her head into one hand.

“Are you up for this?” Carth said quietly. It was directed at Revan alone.

I growled, about to jump in but Revan beat me to it. “I’m fine. Give me a Sleheyron caffa and I’ll take on Darth Malak one-handed.”

“Eat,” I ordered again, staring fixedly at Revan until she grimaced, and stuck the offending spoon in her mouth. I copied her. Onasi shot me an unimpressed look before turning to the kitchenette.

“So, what’s the plan then, Jen?” Mission asked, leaning back against the bulkhead.

Revan’s face was cast with a faraway look, as if her mind was still working it out. “The plan… Terentateks go after Force-sensitives, so one or more of us will have to lead them away… from wherever the Map is. I’ll need some of you guys in the caves. And that’s where any sort of map can help.” Her eyes slid to Carth, who’d turned around with two cups of that disgustingly bitter brew he liked so much. “Mission, if you can get us a useful map, then Carth can coordinate our attack from the ‘Hawk. I’m thinking communicators, here, and a split advance.”

Onasi stepped forward, and placed one of the cups in front of Revan who threw him a grateful glance. “This is sounding like one of your standard insane plans, Jen,” he muttered darkly. “And why do I get the feeling you’re trying to keep me grounded?”

Revan quietly ate another spoonful before answering. “Juhani and Bastila can flesh out the details while we’re at the duel. As to the latter… yeah. I’m concerned you’re going to do something reckless. Are you?” Her eyes narrowed as she stared at him, and Mission’s were wide in confusion.

I snorted. Onasi was the cautious sort; not cowardly, no, I wouldn’t label him that, but he wasn’t the type to throw himself into needlessly risky situations.

Although, we were on Korriban, and he did harbour an unhealthy hatred for the Sith.

“Isn’t that usually your forte?” Onasi shot back, taking a sip of his caffa.

“You’re not answering the question,” Revan replied, her voice going tight. “Don’t be an arse, Carth. You can’t rush headlong into the Academy by yourself.”
I put my spoon down, staring hard at the two of them in turn. “What’s going on? Why would Republic want to storm the Sithling school?”

He glanced at me briefly before turning back to face Revan, frowning. “I wasn’t going to. I think.”

She sighed in exasperation. “Do I have to order Zaalbar to stop you, flyboy? Because I will.”

“Yes. I remember the Undercity,” Onasi muttered, shooting her an unconvincing glare.

“And to think, he wasn’t even life-sworn to me then,” Revan drawled. “I could make him sit on you now.”

I stood abruptly, sick of this conversation. It was taking the edge off my focus. And regardless, it wasn’t far off time to go as we still needed to walk to the duel’s location. Being late was dishonourable in itself. “As enthralling as all this is, we have a duel to get to.”

Revan glanced at me, dropped her spoon, and stood. She grabbed a quick slug of caffa, before nodding to the others and following me out of the room. “See you, Mission. Stay here, Carth. We’ll get this duel out of the way, hit the shyrack caves, get the Map, and then plan an extraction from the Academy before leaving this rock forever.”

“You make it sound so easy,” Onasi’s muttered voice followed us as we walked down the ‘Hawk’s hallway.

“Trust in the Force!” she hollered over her shoulder. It may have been more convincing if her tone wasn’t so damn impertinent.

xXx

The darkness was already lifting when we left Dreshdae, having walked silently through the mostly empty air-conditioned tunnels. Revan had been uncharacteristically edgy, eyes flicking on the few sentients around, hand tight on the vibroblade buckled at her hip. I’d forced her to leave the ‘sabers behind – why she had four was another question, although I did see sense in being prepared. She hadn’t been happy about it, though. Jedi and Sith alike were too dependant on their fancy glow-swords – even Revan.

“Vibroblades,” she muttered as we took our first steps down the beaten path that trailed off to the caves.

I inclined my head in agreement. “Yeah. Not my choice.”

“Why’d Jagi get to pick?”

“Jagi posed the challenge, he chooses the means.” I shrugged. “It’s true, fists and feet are the more… traditional method, but any weapon is allowed. Ain’t no way Jagi would have chosen unarmed combat against me.” I looked at her measuringly, raising a brow. “I can count on one hand the number of people who have beaten me in unarmed combat.”

She stared at me in silence for a moment, before looking to the horizon. The first ray of sunlight peaked from within a break in the nearby cliffs. “Seems a bit unbalanced, Canderous. So all a Mandalorian has to do is challenge someone, and that someone is honour-bound to accept the time, place, and choice of weapon?”

I gave her a bland look. “It’s about honour, Jen Sahara. If some mir’osik challenged me because I’d boned his sister, I’d laugh in his face and he’d lose honour for positing such a stupid duel.”
I saw her mouth the word mir’osik and grinned ferally, wondering just how adept her Mando’a was. Dung for brains. The Jedi were expert at learning languages, but I doubted their slang was particularly fluent.

“Who decides whether it’s honourable or not?” she said, frowning. “I mean, Jagi certainly believes he has a case, but you do not. So why were you honour-bound to accept?”

“It’s… complicated.” I sighed, and offered nothing more. It wasn’t an easy thing to explain, to outsiders. Jagi’s belief in his blood debt for my perceived glory was enough to lodge a case for a blood duel – even though he was wrong.

“Mandalorians,” Revan muttered under her breath, and I chose to take it as a compliment.

There was a crowd gathering well before the entrance to the shyrack caves, and they weren’t all Mando’ade. Traders of different origins and species were clustered together, the buzz of conversation audible across the barren Korriban landscape.

It slowly quietened as Revan and I approached.

“This is Mando’ade business,” I growled my displeasure, eyeing over the motley crowd. “Jagi hasn’t kept his trap shut.”

I could see Jagi, at the head of the group of Mando’ade, already bare-chested and ready. An older man stood next to him, quietly speaking, dark markings on his face indicating his calling. My eyes narrowed. Jagi actually found an Elder on Korriban?

“(Two hundred on the larger one,)” a trader hissed in Rodese as we walked passed. He was speaking to another Rodian holding a small holo-computer.

“(Nah, they’re using vibro’s. I’m putting three on the younger one,)” another in the crowd muttered.

I felt a renewed surge of irritation. I had no issue whatsoever with betting, but this should have been a private honour duel. Revan looked at me sideways, before halting to address the Rodians.

“(Did you know that before duels, Mandalorians like to warm up on spectators?)” she told them innocently. A trio of rounded, dark eyes turned on her in surprise, and she shot them a feral grin. Two of them shuffled backwards, and looked at each other in concern.

“Having fun?” I drawled as she strode back to my side. “They’re here, now. May as well let them make a little profit.”

Revan snorted, and we both stalled in front of the Elder, who had stepped forward, a small crowd of Mando’ade at his back. I spotted Ergeron, my old drinking buddy, lurking in the crowd. He nodded to me briefly in acknowledgement.

My gaze then rested on Jagi. He was near a decade younger than me, closer in years to Revan – likely faster with a blade, and definitely angrier. None of that makes him the better warrior, though, I told myself gruffly.

“(Canderous of clan Ordo,)” the Elder intoned. “(Welcome. I am Elder Rahm of the Fett clan, and have been asked to preside over this honour duel, to ensure the debts of blood are paid and resolved.)”

My gaze narrowed. The Fett clan had been damn powerful, and suffered the most at the close of Malachor. I hadn’t thought they’d had an Elder left. Something in my expression must have shown my scepticism, for the Elder – my age, so young for that honour – shifted uneasily. He raised a hand to rub at his shaven head.

“(Assistant Elder,)” he muttered. “(I was under the tutelage of Elder Targa. I still sing his battle songs.)”

As I suspected. The Fett were without an Elder since Malachor. If they allied with another clan, then maybe one day they’d regain that prestige, but the Fett had always been an arrogant bunch. As to why an assistant Elder was mucking about on Korriban with Mando’ade mercenaries… well. Likely they were as directionless as the rest of the clans.

Rahm was dressed in a loose brown robe, unassuming and simple, as was custom for the Elders who spoke for the clans. The tattoos on his face belied his lineage and experience, but his forehead was blank. The last time I’d seen Elder Theodorus - head Elder of Ordo - his forehead was more marking than skin.

Rahm clapped his hands loudly, turning to face the rest of the Mando’ade. Jagi straightened, and his brother Allen – also bare-chested – stepped to his side.

“(Let us proceed,)” Rahm said calmly. “(As the instigator, Jagi of clan Bala, you have first right to speak.)”

Fury twisted Jagi’s face as he stepped forward, his black eyes fixed on mine.

“(I have a blood claim on Canderous of clan Ordo, for the decimation of clan Bala at Althir. Due to his actions as War General, my men were left undefended, and were slaughtered as we held the command post on the ground against the major Althiri offensive. Canderous of Ordo pulled back the fighter squadron that was our air support, and it turned our defense into a bloody rout,)” Jagi’s voice had risen with each word. “(Clan Bala was allied with Clan Ordo, and we were heavily betrayed! It can only be resolved by blood – that of the general who gave the order!)”

Revan shifted next to me, looking like she wanted to interject. I raised a hand to her warningly. The Mando’ade spectators murmured in agreement, and I saw a duo of akaanir dala cheer at his words.

Akaanir dala were specifically women who had forsaken the raising of children to live their life purely through battle alone. Although few in numbers, their dedication to warfare made them as formidable as the best of us Mando’ade warriors.

“(By the witnessing of the stars, the shedding of my blood, and the resting of the earth, my honour stands in agreement with this Mando’ade.)” Allen intoned in an angry, loud voice.

“(As the recipient, Canderous of clan Ordo, you have the right to respond,)” Rahm’s voice carried loudly over the hum of the crowd.

“I straightened, and glared at the crowd. “(I stayed true to the Mando’ade way. I saw an opening in the air battle that allowed us a swift victory, and would halt the destruction of the Althiri mines. My choices strengthened the position of Mand’alor and meant less Mando’ade were sent to their deaths!)”

The mercenaries had fallen silent, and the akaanir dala was scowling. The crowd wasn’t with me, and the unjustness of it rankled. Jagi is their comrade. None of them know me, except by notoriety. Even so, I didn’t like it.

“De haa’taylir be ka’ra, galar be ner tal, bal nuhoy be vheh, ner ijaat sonsol ti ibic Mando’ade!”
Revan yelled with zeal, and the wind carried her voice to all in the crowd. I straightened with pride and with the belief that my actions had been the right ones.

Elder Rahm cleared his throat. "(The instigator or his second may now speak in response.)"

Jagi glared, and gave the traditional response when one had said all they had to offer. "(My arm will speak for itself.)"

Allen puffed up his chest as he turned away from me to face the crowd. The anger was strong with him, apparent in the set of his shoulders and the insult of his back. "(Canderous of Ordo is a disgrace to his clan. He broke from the battle plan and let us die for it, all for his own glory. He will pay the price for it today!)"

And now, a ragged cheer came from the mercenaries. I scowled.

"(The recipient or his second may now speak in response.)"

There was more I could say, but I would wait for the duel. Distraction was as valid a part of battle as any other tactic. "(My arm will speak for itself!)" I bellowed, and Revan stepped up next to me, her face set as she stared at the crowd and prepared to speak.

"(She is an outsider,)" Allen snapped, pointing to Revan before turning to spit to the side. "(She has no right to speak here.)"

"(Jen of clan Sahara is my chosen second!)" I growled. "(Respect the rules of a blood duel, young pup, or leave.)"

Revan showed no indication of Allen’s insult, but instead addressed Jagi who was still standing at the head of the crowd with his arms folded. "(Does clan Bala have a blood war with clan Ordo?)" Revan asked, her voice loud and clear.

"(What?)" Jagi snapped, his brows lowering in confusion. I, too, scowled at her back. I’d expected words of support here.

Allen glared, and began to interrupt. "(Outsiders should not be-)

"(If General Ordo’s actions at Althir were dishonourable to Ordo’s alliance with Bala, then Bala would have claimed a blood war. I assume they did not.)" Revan’s words spoke over Allen’s, and were commandingly crisp and fluent in Mando’a. Again, I had the nagging question of just how much she recalled, and how much she simply ran on instinct. "(The Mando’a were engaged in an external war with the Republic, not a clan war. General Ordo’s battle plan ensured a mightier victory for Mand’alor, and Bala must have recognized that since they have not acted with any reprisal to clan Ordo for Canderous’ actions.)"

Dead silence fell over the crowd as they all stared at Revan with varying degrees of confusion. Jagi’s face was contorted in a mass of emotions, like he was being forced to think on something decidedly unpleasant. Allen just looking unbearably pissed off. And I- I felt a vindication. I wasn’t a bad speaker, but Revan was better.

Allen was the first to break the silence. "(What does an outsider know about Mando’a matters?)"

"(Canderous is a great teacher,)" Revan snapped. I stepped forward to her side, shooting her a disbelieving look. We may have exchanged the odd story or two, Jedi, but you learned all this a long time before we met. Revan turned back to Jagi. "(Those who died at Althir, did so for the victory of Mand’alor, and deserve to be remembered as such. Canderous acted with honour.)”

“(What are they saying? Are they gonna fight, or what?)” a voice in Rodese whispered from behind us, and I suspected the unfortunate speaker hadn’t planned for his quiet voice to carry so over the dusty clearing. As one, the Mando’aše turned to glare at the traders, an ominous growling rising from us all. My hand dropped to my vibroblade as I scowled at the overgrown insects, who’d taken several steps back, shrinking away in fright.

“(This is what happens when we allow outsiders near Mando’aše business,)” Allen spat. “(No respect-)”

“(Mand’alor’s balls, Allen,)” I snarled. “(The traders were here before we were, and I certainly didn’t go mouthing off to all and sundry-)”

“(Enough!)” Elder Rahm bellowed, in a belated attempt to wrest control of the situation. “(Watch your tongue, Canderous of Ordo, and show some respect for the sanctity of blood duels! And you-)” Rahm swung to face the traders, and abruptly switched into Basic. “A word more from anyone who doesn’t belong here, and we will postpone the duel to wet our blades on you!”

I felt a grudging respect for the Assistant Elder, for all his initial awkwardness. He could make a stalwart Elder for the Fett one day.

“(Now,)” Rahm continued, focussing again on Jagi and I. “(All have had a chance to speak. It is time to prepare and commence,)” He nodded at me, and I began to unclasp my armour. Again, this was Jagi’s choice, armour or no. He was planning on taking me out quickly, I realized, baring my teeth. He would not get the chance, no matter our shared history.

I nudged Revan, indicating she should follow suit. A faint look of surprise crossed her face before she shrugged out of the badly worn mesh shirt. She wore a thin, ragged singlet underneath, and glared at me when I looked at it pointedly.

“Uh uh,” she muttered, shaking her head. “You aren’t going to convince me that nakedness is mandatory.”

I barked a laugh before placing my armour down by my feet. “Can’t blame a man for trying.” I said dryly, but my attention was already focussed on Jagi, who’d stepped away from the crowd, chest glistening under the alien light of the Korriban sun. A mild wind dusted through the clearing as I strode over to join him. It was cold, on Korriban, despite the cloudless days, but Mando’aše were bred tough. A hush had fallen over the traders and mercenaries alike as Jagi and I faced each other, both silently appraising.

“(In the Mando’aše way; stars, blood and earth. I call this blood duel to start. May the honour debt be witnessed by the stars. May it be cleansed by blood. May it be laid to rest by the earth. Begin!)” With a final clap from Elder Rahm, Jagi and I began to circle each other warily. The sun hung low in the morning sky, and I knew the first thing Jagi would try would be to position me so its rays stabbed into my vision.

But, I needed to say something more. For our history, for our shared battles, for the camaraderie we’d once enjoyed. “(You were my friend and ally, Jagi. I did not make the decision lightly. But I would do the same again.)”

Jagi’s face twisted; I heard Allen snort in derision behind me, but it was his older brother and my old comrade that commanded my attention. He looked tormented.
“(I saw my father cut down in front of me. My half-sister. Three of my cousins, and my intended. I can’t forgive you for that, Canderous!)”

I inclined my head. “(I’m not asking you to. But I still believe I made the right call. Not for my own glory, not for the glory of Ordo – but for the glory of Mand’alor. Opportunism and flexibility in battle are core to the way of the Mando’ade, and the results at Althir speak for themselves.)” I paused, staring at him hard, willing him to at least accept the truth of my words. “(Jagi, if it had been Ordo down there, my actions would have been the same.)”

Allen was seething with fury behind Jagi. “(You lie!)”

“Haar-chak,” Jagi muttered, spitting to the side. “(Today was not meant to be like this.)” And his gaze moved to behind me, to where Revan stood. “(Your second is too damn perceptive. I begged the Elders to lodge a blood claim against Ordo. The Elders that were left after Althir. I called them cowards for their refusal. They exiled me for a year, Canderous, and I’ve not bothered to return. Allen and I have been directionless, and the only thing that has kept me going is the drive to see you dead for Althir.)”

We faced each other from either side of the clearing. “(I remember those of your clan who fell so we could capture the mines, Jagi. I sing their battle songs.)”

“(They died for your glory, Canderous! Why does no one else see that?)” Jagi cried, his eyes glittering with emotion. The crowd behind us was dead quiet.

“(They died for the glory of Mand’alor, Jagi.)” I contradicted gruffly. “(Mand’alor himself commended me after the battle. Bala agreed with me. I made the right choice.)” My final words carried over the silence, and I was gratified that no one, not even the furious Allen, spoke to disagree.

“(Damn you, Canderous Ordo,)” Jagi cursed, but his voice was broken. His head bowed ever so slightly. “(Damn you. You make me feel like my last few years have been meaningless.)”

I raised my chin as a murmuring broke from the Mando’ade behind Jagi, and we both raised our vibroblades in acknowledgement of each other. Something loosened in my chest as I stared at my old friend. There was no way but forward now, but his acknowledgement had, at least, restored some of my honour. Jagi gave me a slight nod, one warrior to the next, and we both stepped forward.

He would strike first with a sweeping blow, I could see, and I was ready to block-

“(Wait!)” Revan called, her voice loud and confused. “(Hang on, why is the duel still going ahead?)”

Jagi and I paused briefly while the Elder responded to her. “(It is a blood duel, Jen of clan Sahara. It will redress the balance of honour.)”

“(But wait, Jagi, do you agree that Canderous acted with honour?)” Revan went on, her hands gesturing.

Allen’s face was mottling with fury. “(Would someone shut this-)”

“(I may have only seen one side of Althir.)” Jagi spoke over the top of his younger brother. “(I have sung the battle songs of my family for years, all the while blaming their death on Canderous. Their lives deserve to be remembered instead as the glory of the Mand’alor who once was.)”
“(You were not wrong to blame Canderous, brother!)” Allen called out. “(Don’t listen to these poisonous words!)”

“(I think we have been blinded by grief, Allen. Maybe our Elders were correct.)” Jagi had answered Allen, but was facing me. “(Maybe Canderous does not have a debt of honour. But the duel has begun, and so it must end. For both of us, our honour shall be redressed!)”

Our blades had dropped during the conversation, so we lifted them once more. Again, I felt the harsh wind sweep through the crowd, and tasted the sulphuric tang of this environment on my tongue. Mando’ade were well-used to many different, harsh environments, and this one was a fitting end for my old friend. I did not intend to die here today, and the fight had disappeared from Jagi’s spirit.

I would mourn, however, and remember him.

I made to step forward again, and was once more interrupted.

“(But- but, why?)” Revan, again, her voice going high-pitched with her inability to understand our culture.

I sighed angrily. “(Jen, shut -)”

“(You let an outsider speak for you, Canderous?)” Allen sneered. Elder Rahm closed his eyes in frustration.

“(Watch your mouth, Allen,)” I growled. “(Before I shut it for you!)”

“(I don’t speak for him, I stand by him as his ally,)” Revan scoffed. “(But this just doesn’t make sense. The clans are scattered, and you would let one leader kill another over a blood debt that no longer exists? How is that beneficial to the Mando’ade?)”

Jagi’s vibroblade dropped to his side as he stared at Revan in disbelief. I growled, and spun around, but it was Jagi who spoke first.

“(A blood duel has begun, outsider. It must finish, by stars, blood and earth. I will not shame my clan by backing down, nor will I take away Canderous’ right of reprisal.)”

Revan’s face was twisted with confusion. “(But if the Mando’ade are ever going to rise to power again, then Mand’alor will need as many blooded battle leaders as he can get. Why throw your life away when surely there must be other ways to restore the honour imbalance? We’re not talking blood debts anymore, merely words spoken in anger and grief!)

“(Jagi, if you don’t start duelling Canderous, then I am going to punch that bitch-)”

“(If you feel like you owe Canderous a debt, then ask him what you can do to restore it! If you feel like it shames your clan, then consult a Bala Elder! Or better yet, an Ordo Elder, to redress the balance!)” Revan hollered over Allen’s venomous words, and her eyes blazed with righteousness. “(But throwing your life away does not bring glory to either Bala or the Mando’ade!)”

Dead silence fell over the area. Even the akaanir dala had quietened, watching the proceedings intently. There was no murmur of discontent from the crowd. Revan made a damn good case, and killing my old friend and comrade left a bad taste in my mouth – but she wasn’t Mando’ade. She wasn’t Mando’ade. How could any of us accept her judgement?

And - the blood duel had already begun.
Elder Rahm cleared his throat then, loudly and a touch awkwardly. The crowd collectively swung its gaze to him.

“(There are, er, precedents),” he muttered sheepishly, looking down. His mouth tightened, and then his chin jerked up as his demeanour hardened. “(The outsider Jen Sahara speaks with wisdom. There have been cases in the past. Jaeneri of clan Fett challenged Bodo of clan Arkar over a territorial dispute. They did not duel to completion – Bodo admitted shame and offered five years service as Jaeneri’s ground general in the war against clan Tansa. The debt was forgiven after the service, and Arkar and Fett allied for many generations.)”

“(One example,)” Allen muttered. “(You think to weigh the honour of my brother on the shrewish words of an outsider, and one incident in the past?)”

“(No,)” Elder Rahm snapped as Revan glared at Allen. “(More than just one. Gordo of Varad and Delsa of Kelborn dissolved their blood duel after agreeing to a liquor-dhezi trade that benefitted both their clans. And Jenera of Bralor lay down her sword against Mend of Kelborn, once Mend agreed to marry her sister.)” Rahm grimaced. “(Although that one did not end so well.)

“(I would have thought that Jagi is the speaker of Jagi’s honour, rather than his little brother,)” Revan said in a low voice. And then she smirked, eyeing him over dismissively. “Mir’osik,” she added.

Allen’s face twisted with anger, and before I could say anything he growled, strode forward, and launched a sweeping roundhouse directly at Revan. Her face was set, focussed, and I wondered if she’d picked a fight deliberately. She ducked under Allen’s fist and darted to the side.

My old friend sighed, and stepped up next to me. His blade was, once more, held loosely at his side. “(Do we duel, or do we not, Canderous? I look at you, and see the deaths of my family.)” Jagi’s words were low, and for the first time held no anger. Just an immeasurable grief.

“(If you agree that I acted with honour at Althir, then I have no ill will towards you, Jagi of Bala,)” I said, my eyes fixed on the unfolding brawl in front of us. Allen punched his fist towards Revan again, and she easily dodged to the right. “(Bala paid a heavy price for Althir, and I acknowledge that. I’ve always acknowledged that.)”

I could hear the murmurs of the traders behind us as they busily rewrote their betting schedule. One of the akaanir dala cheered as Revan leapt clear of a swinging kick. Elder Rahm strode over to us, his face a question as he skirted around the fistfight that Revan had started. I smirked. Revan will grind Allen into the dust.

“(Jagi of clan Bala, do you still claim a blood debt of Canderous of clan Ordo?)” Elder Rahm asked, and his voice was loud enough to be heard. Allen swung his head around at that, outrage contorting his long, angular face, but whatever he planned to say was transformed to a grunt as Revan dropped in a crouch and kicked a boot into his shins, catching him off-guard and causing him to stumble back.

Jagi sighed, still staring at me, and I was reminded of the years we had trained together. “(It is time for me to travel home,)” Jagi said at last. “(I will speak with the Bala Elders, and – if need be – the Ordo Elders. But for now, I have no blood claim on Canderous of Ordo,)” His mouth twisted. “(I retract any claim that Canderous acted with dishonour.)”

“(Jagi!)” Allen howled. “(What are you doing?)”

“(Aw, have you conceded to me already?)” Revan taunted, causing a snicker from one of the “(I’ll tread you into the dirt, you foul-tongued wench!)” Allen shouted, leaping forward to launch a flurry of wild blows aimed at Revan’s head. She weaved backwards and ducked underneath, dancing out of his way.

“(Canderous of clan Ordo, do you claim a blood debt, or a right of reprisal, from Jagi of clan Bala?)” Rahm intoned.

“(No,)” I said loudly. “(I understand grief. But the next person who sheds doubt on my honour will see my fists. This I swear, on the name of Mand’alor!)”

“(There is no blood debt here.)” Elder Rahm proclaimed. “(By stars, blood and earth, I decree this blood duel dissolved.)”

“(No!)” Allen roared, and his darkly furious gaze fixed on Revan. “(This is your doing, you- you outsider pig-hen!)”

Revan sniggered, her hands still guarding her face. “(Is that the best you can do, Allen of Bala?)”

“(Allen!)” Jagi called, which turned into a sigh as Allen lashed out at Revan with a piercing side-kick that failed to connect. Jagi shot me an irritated sideways look. “(Allen has always been hot-tempered. He’ll down her with the first blow he lands, unless you step in, Canderous.)”

I snorted. “(I wouldn’t dishonour her so. Let him try to bloody himself on her.)” If Allen was victorious and took things too far – considering his venomous anger, that was not unlikely – then I would intervene, and Jagi’s words told me he granted me leave to. I gave Jagi a dangerous smile. “(I’ve been training her.)”

Revan launched forward with an uppercut that Allen blocked roughly, before he counter-attacked with a solid fist that sunk deep into her kidneys. Not well enough, it seems, I thought with a grimace as Revan collapsed to the dust with a groan.

Her speed saved her; a desperate roll to the side that let her avoid the solid boot that Allen aimed at her head. With a leap to her feet, Revan jumped backwards, turning to spit dirt out of her mouth. Her hand briefly rested on her side before raising to guard her face once more.

“(You have no right to speak on Mando’ade matters!”) Allen snarled, advancing on her again.

“(The Elder has spoken, dung for brains,)” Revan shot back. “(There is no debt of honour.)”

“(Allen leaves his guard open,)” I asserted to Jagi. “(He’s strong, but his defense is riddled with holes.)”

Revan darted around Allen, leaping back to avoid another powerful kick.

“(And your Jen Sahara doesn’t have the strength to match him,)” Jagi replied. “(She’ll tire herself out dancing around him.)”

“(No she won’t,)” I denied flatly.

“(Stop moving, you coward!)” Allen hollered as she ducked under another left hook. Revan’s expression was pure concentration as she circled around Allen, weaving back out of reach or dodging sideways to avoid his fists. She’s taking her time, I realized. Making him angry and wild. It was working, Allen’s face was contorting in rage with every blow that failed to connect.
In a match of pure talent, it would be no contest, of course. But Revan was holding back on her speed. She wants to make sure the Force isn’t helping her. She wants to make it a clean victory. It was the right thing to do, and I found myself nodding in approval.

Allen launched forward in a powerful but unguarded kick, and Revan ducked underneath, grabbed his swinging foot, and thrust him on his back into the dirt. I heard a loud jeer from one of the traders as Revan leaped forward and kicked out hard with a boot to Allen’s side. She was about to strike again, when he grabbed her foot and she went down, sideways into the dust at his side. The crowd gasped as Allen lunged for her with a punch that slammed into the clay ground just where her head had been a second ago.

Revan twisted out of his reach and leaped to her feet before he did. The moment he was halfway up, she launched into a vicious kick aimed directly at his head.

Revan landed in a crouch, and Allen landed in the dust.

I smirked at Jagi, and his gaze back was thoughtful and measured.

As the two scrambled back to their feet, I could see that Allen was affected; his fists were slow to rise, and I wondered if his balance was compromised. Revan, on the other hand, looked alert and ready for more as she rested on the balls of her feet.

“(Allen,)” Jagi said sharply. “(Enough. Jen of clan Sahara is correct, and you are making Bala look foolish with your inability to contain your temper.)”

Allen shot his brother a betrayed, disbelieving look. Revan kept her eyes on Allen, but dropped her fists.

“(Jagi!)” Allen protested, but he swayed slightly on his feet. The kick to the head had been brutally efficient.

“(Stand down, Allen.)” Jagi ordered, before turning to look at me. He sighed again. “(I will let the Elders direct me, Canderous. One day, Mand’alor will rise again, and I will be able to serve him with pride. If we meet again, I cannot say for certain if it will be from behind crossed weapons or allied ones.)”

“(Fare thee well, Jagi,)” I replied quietly.

Jagi motioned to his brother, who threw Revan one last hateful glare. Revan’s expression was impassive, all traces of mockery gone. “(If I see you again, I’ll destroy you, outsider,)” Allen hissed.

“(Quiet, brother, and follow.)” Jagi’s words were like whiplash, and he turned on his heel and strode away. Allen, a hand pressed to the side of his head, finally capitulated and hurried after him.

I stared after Jagi for some time in silence, my thoughts awhirl. This was more than just an unexpected ending – to walk away from a blood duel without blood being spilled and honour being lost was unheard of. My gaze fixed on Elder Rahm. Well, rarely heard of. Jagi’s concession had been an exoneration, but it was more than my old comrade that was causing me to think harder than I liked.

Revan’s words about a new Mand’alor rising made me wonder if I’d been gone too long from the clans. I wasn’t the leader of Ordo, but I wasn’t far off – and my influence during the war had been great. If the time was right, I could do a lot for the Mando’ade. And maybe we had been directionless too long. I needed time to think on this, time I’d have while I followed Revan, and
The irony of these words coming from her was rich, and I was the only one who would recognize it. That Revan, she who led the breaking of my people, would speak of Mand’alor’s rise was interesting indeed. I wondered if she would say the same when she fully understood her own identity. And she would, one day soon, I would see to it.

My gaze caught on Ergeron, walking in my direction with one of the akaanir dala. The akaanir dala was eyeing me over with an appreciative gleam that I recognized, and I realized that my day was about to dramatically improve. Akaanir dala fought hard, and they played hard, too. I began to grin.

“Canderous,” Revan said quietly from my side. “I need you in the shyrack caves.”

I inclined my head to her, still staring at the approaching akaanir dala whose name I was about to discover. Her armour shone and I thought it might be beskar iron. She carried her helm under a tanned and toned arm, and smiled at me from beneath braided blonde hair.

“You have my strength, Jen.” I told Revan absently. “I’ll return to the Hawk this evening.”

Revan grimaced, and that caught my attention. Evening, I saw, was not going to suffice. “My instincts tell me there’s going to be an uprising at the Academy, Canderous. We need to extract at least two people before that happens.” She sighed. “And we need to get the Map first. I can give you an hour… but then we must go.”

I stared at her flatly, seeing her green eyes narrow with thoughts and plans and actions. “Is that an order, Jen?” I asked softly.

She stayed silent for a moment, her gaze intent upon mine. “If I lead, will you follow?”

I knew, then, deep in my gut, that I would.

For the warrior she had been, and maybe still was. For how she had influenced today’s proceedings. For the fact that she was my comrade, and we had shared enough battles that I would also call her my friend.

I gave her a nod of assent. “One hour, Jen. I’ll see you on the ‘Hawk in one hour.”

She gave me a brief grin, and left.

xXx
I felt my side ache with tenderness as I strode back to the ‘Hawk, but I had no regrets. Allen Bala had been an irritation, and – despite knowing better – I’d felt a keen sense of gratification when I landed him in the dust.

The day was going well, and my mind was sharp with confidence. After yesterday’s craziness, I had a supreme wellspring of renewed belief that we could get through Korriban and be on our way soon. My mood was resolutely self-assured – dammit, we could do this. We really could.

Underpinning it all was the knowledge from Bastila – I wasn’t a Dark Jedi. I hadn’t been a Dark Jedi. She’d have to explain Darth Revan to me soon, and it would all make sense – but for now, I’d hold my head high and know that I was on the right path.

Because it was my head, dammit, and I wasn’t going to let anyone – Sith Lord or no – take it over again.

The Mandalorian business had been… interesting. I felt immensely gratified with the way it had all played out, and my thoughts turned towards Canderous. He was with us, now, I felt. Wholly until the end. A Mandalorian general. It didn’t surprise me. Canderous liked to play the part of the gruff, crude mercenary, but he wasn’t as stupid as he sometimes liked to make out.

His brief words about Revan and Malak and the Jedi Thirteen came back to mind, and I grimaced in distaste. What was the Jedi Thirteen? The words had resonated deeply, which I found both distasteful and annoying. I didn’t want to think of Darth Revan as someone whom people would follow, didn’t want to dwell on that fact that once, she must have been a respected and worthwhile leader. I scowled. Obviously, idiot, if I followed her into the Mandalorian Wars. But surely there must have been something deeply rotten in her – in both her and Malak – for them to turn out the way they did.

I forcibly turned my thoughts away. I didn’t want to think on her. I wasn’t going to think on her. She wasn’t important. I knew who I was, now, and that knowledge was what would keep me going forward.

We had a short window of time before Canderous would return, and I was eager to get ready. As I strode into the docking bay, I recalled the tough Mandalorian female who’d sauntered suggestively towards Canderous as I left. I rolled my eyes, as I heard the ‘Hawk’s hatch open. Teethree, monitoring the video cams, must have alerted someone to my presence. After all this talk about action, and of course it’s the sodding mercenary who gets some. A shame for him that I only allowed him an hour’s grace, I thought with a smirk. Although, he’s a Mandalorian. Their idea of foreplay is taking their clothes off – if they even get that far.

I looked up to see Carth in the ship's entrance, smiling in welcome. For some utterly unfathomable reason, I felt my cheeks flush.

"You alright there, Jen?" Carth asked. His gaze was a warm brown, and the corner of his mouth twitched. He'd noticed my discomfort, then.

“Fine! Never better,” I said in what I hoped was a breezy tone, inwardly cursing hormone crazed Mandalorians, and bond-sisters who asked damnably awkward questions. Stars, where did she get that ludicrous idea about Carth from anyway? She’s been staying in the ‘Hawk too long, I bet she’s going space crazy. Bastila was currently asleep in my head, but then, it wasn’t yet mid-morning. I hadn’t been gone long.

“You’re back early. Very early,” Carth said, echoing my thoughts. “Did the duel go okay?”

I nodded, clambering up the ramp, and Carth stepped to the side to allow me entrance. “Canderous will be back soon. I’m keen to head out, Carth. Let’s get the others and meet in the common room.”

With a nod of assent, Carth wandered over to the cargo hold. I debated waking Bastila up before deciding against it. Surely we can retrieve the Map without her, and I may need her strength for the extraction. She was spent, yesterday. And I had an ominous feeling about the Academy; my instincts were pressing me to get moving on the Map, and quick.

On one hand, I felt a renewed surge of confidence since I’d spoken with Bastila last night; a deep certainty that I was capable of accomplishing everything we needed to. Ness Jonohl did not fall. It was like a mantra, a strength I held onto inside me. It meant the rage and the grief and the hunger for power I felt – none of it surely belonged to me, right? It must all be the influence of the Sith Lord’s echo in my head.

Yet I also had a premonition that the Academy was going to go belly up, and soon – and whether it was the Force or merely instinct guiding me I didn’t know, but everything was urging me to hurry.

There was no one in the women’s quarters, so I strode back to the common room, raking a hand through my hair. A small cloud of dust briefly enveloped me, courtesy of the brawl I’d encouraged. I wrinkled my nose, and looked up to see Carth appear from the other hallway, his eyebrows raised.

"Not a word, flyboy.' I warned, sitting down on a plimfoam bench with a groan. I could smell the sulphuric taint of Korriban's air in amongst the matted curls that fell in my eyes. I need a haircut. More than that, I needed a long, hot water shower. The 'Hawk's sonic would have to do - surely there was time for that before dashing off to the shyrack caves. I raised my hands, and grimaced at the dirt on them. The tips of my fingernails were almost black.

“Hey, I wasn’t going to say anything,” Carth replied, raising his hands in mock surrender. “I’m learning not to comment on your appearance.”

I glared at him, struggling for a pithy retort, when Mission breezed in. “Jen! You’re back! How’d it go? Where’s Canderous? Did he win?”

I winced at the effusive onslaught. “Hi. Yes. Great. Having fun. Yes.” I replied succinctly before turning to appraise Carth again. “Turns out you were right. Mandalorian duels can end peacefully.”

“Oh?” he queried, raising a brow.

“Mhmm,” I replied. “Collective powers of persuasion enabled Jagi to see that Canderous did not act with dishonour.”

“Huh,” Carth replied noncommittally. “And why do I think you had something to do with that?” I shot him a questioning look which he replied to with a half-smile before commenting, “You seem to have something to do with just about everything, Jen.”

I grinned. “It’s all part of my charm,” I said lightly.

“Well, if you manage to pull off everything here on Korriban, you won’t see me argue with that again.”

My amusement dissipated as I stared at him seriously. He was staring right back. “We’ll get Dustil, Carth. I promise. Let’s just focus on the Map first, huh? One step at a time.”

“Who’s Dustil?” Mission asked.

I’d actually forgotten Mission was there, no mean feat considering her ebullient personality. I gestured to Carth, but he sighed, giving a little shake of his head. “Shyrack caves,” he said. “Explanations can come later. Let’s do this first.”

I nodded. “Alright. Canderous is back in an hour. Bastila- she’s still out cold. I think yesterday’s trials were a little… intense.” I frowned, concerned about the weakness of our bond. Her recuperation from Manaan’s trials had taken a step back, definitely. Mekel had better be worth it. Bastila spent just about all she had on him. And yet, the powers of our bond were growing. To think that she had brought someone back from the brink of oblivion through me, using my link with the Force, was genuinely startling. I wondered if Bastila found it as amazing as me.

“I’ll go get Big Z,” Mission said brightly, getting to her feet. “We got a partial map, and Juhani’ll be back soon, too - she said she wouldn’t be long.”

“Wait.” I frowned, as her words sunk in. “What?”

“Oh, she nipped out just after y’all left for the duel,” Mission replied lightly. “She was gonna chat with an old friend, but told me to say that she’d be real careful an’ use the Force an’ all.” Mission frowned. “Something about making sure she didn’t run into this guy called Uthar.”

What? A sinking feeling of dread pulled at my stomach as I stared at Mission in mounting horror. “She went back to the Academy?”

Mission blinked. “Uh, yeah, but that’s ok, right? You guys are students there, right?”

I was standing without realizing it, feeling the heat of alarm flush my cheeks. Carth was looking at me worriedly. I’d been so concerned about making Carth stay put that I forgot to focus on Juhani. Stars! She should have waited!

“Uthar’s after her,” I hissed, feeling my fists clench reflexively. “And he’s got a dozen eyes in there. Dammit!”

“Is Juhani in danger, Jen?” Carth asked quietly. He’d placed his hands on the table, leaning forward to stare at me seriously. Mission’s mouth had dropped open.

“Only if Uthar catches her,” I muttered. “I’ve got to run in there and get her. There’s enough time before Canderous gets back-” I halted in mid-thought, registering the concerned gazes fixed on me. I sighed. “Juhani’s trying to redeem a lost cause. Uthar’s after Juhani. Mekel wants Yuthura to challenge Uthar, and Dustil knows we’re not really Sith. This whole situation’s about as safe as riding a terentatek bareback.”

Carth shook his head. “Dustil won’t betray us. Not- look, he won’t, alright!” His brows lowered in a familiar stubborn façade.
I stared at him steadily. “I hope so, Carth. But I want to get Juhani out of there, now.”

I’d counted on her assistance in the caves, although I only really needed one Force sensitive to distract the terentateks – me. I gritted my teeth and stared at them both. “You guys prepare. Get the wrist-comms ready, light-sticks, armour, bio-scanners – anything useful in that environment. Rations, too – we don’t know how long we’ll be in the caves. I’m thinking Canderous, Mission and HK-47 going in deep while Juhani and I run interference. Carth, you’ll be doing the comms back on the ship.”

I’d predicted the angry scowl that clouded over his face. “You’re going to power up that insane droid-”

“Me!” Mission squeaked excitedly. “Great!”

“Hang on a minute,” Carth cut in, backtracking, and I could see he was torn over what to complain about. “Mission in the caves? Are you sure that’s a good idea? Wouldn’t Zaalbar be a better choice?”

“Hey, I can help!” Mission retorted indignantly, folding her arms and shooting Carth a scowl with all the teenage vehemence she could muster.

“We’ll be reliant on the comms,” I said bluntly. “You and Canderous can’t understand Shyriiwook, and I want at least one able guard on the ship protecting Bastila. Mission can hold the bio-scanners and map while Canderous and HK protect her.” My eyes caught on the discarded Sith robe I’d thrown in the corner an hour or so ago. I grabbed it, before heading to the quarters to collect my lightsabers.

“Look, we’ll flesh out the details when I’m back,” I threw over my shoulder as I left, leaving them standing in the common room. “I won’t be long!”

Juhani, what were you thinking? I seethed inwardly, striding down the ornate ferracrete path that led to the Academy. I’d hoped to walk along this only one more time; it was becoming a depressingly familiar trip. She was thinking the duel could go on all day, and now would be a good time to track Dak down.

I sighed, closing my eyes briefly. Was Juhani underestimating Uthar? Her Force sense would aid her in avoiding him, sure, but there were dozens of Initiates in there, and any one of them could betray her presence to Uthar, if they knew the Headmaster was looking for her.

And what if Dustil betrays us? He’d had a night to stew on yesterday’s chance meeting. I’d expected Uthar’s protégé to be both strong, and easily underestimated – particularly after Kel’s information. Yesterday, however, changed everything. No matter how we managed it, we had get Dustil off Korriban – but if I didn’t believe Dak had much hope of redemption, then how likely would it be to sway Uthar’s pet? Uthar’s pet Dustil Onasi. What are the frelling chances? Was it just luck, just coincidence that he was here? The son of a famed Republic warhero, taken after the Telos bombing, and sent to a Sith Academy?

Carth must have had no idea that Dustil was Force-sensitive. But Mekel, too, was taken from Telos, so perhaps it was just standard Sith protocol. Bomb the frell out of a planet, and pick up any promising talent in the aftermath.

I turned a steep corner, and the Academy rose sharply in my vision. I was assailed with a moment of doubt as I strode closer, spotting a lithe figure by the double doors. Am I doing the right thing, going after Juhani now? Urgency still pressed on me, pulling me towards the Academy, pulling me towards the shyrack caves. We can get the Map without Juhani. Surely she can keep herself safe until after? Was I willing to bet my friend’s life on that?

Jen. What is wrong?

The woman at the Academy’s entrance – Lashowe, I recognized from my altercation with Mekel - glanced at me, before swiftly opening the ferracrystal entrance with a hand motion and slipping inside. Alarm twisted my stomach, and I hurriedly drew on the Force, pushing my senses outward. I should have been using the Force earlier.

Overconfidence. You always were too damnably overconfident. Someone, a man’s voice, sneered at me in my head. Everyone is fallible. Even you. Especially you.

Jen? Bastila’s voice was sharp. Answer me.

Juhani rushed off to the Academy by herself. I halted in front of the entrance as I registered an overwhelmingly dark presence just on the other side. The bottom of my stomach dropped nauseatingly. Uthar. Kath crap! Not now!

What?

The entrance creaked open again, and the humanoid form of Uthar Wynn, clad in a Sith soldier’s uniform instead of the standard dark robe, strode out into the Korriban sunshine. His expression was one of anticipation, and it set my hackles rising.

And to think, I’d been concerned about Juhani encountering him.

Bastila. I’m about to have an uncomfortable conversation with Uthar Wynn, I threw wildly into the bond. And just like that, she was with me, her thoughts and strength and reassurance pressing against my mind gently. It was so easy and familiar and… tiring. Bastila? I said sharply. You’re still exhausted.

“Ness Jonohl,” Uthar intoned, and his voice was a drawling combination of amused pleasure. He was looking forward to this, I realized with alarm. Milky white eyes fixed on my form tightly as he strode over the packed clay ground. There was no lightsaber in his grasp, and I highly doubted he saw me as a threat.

That’s a good thing. A very good thing.

“Master Uthar,” I answered respectfully, bowing. Does he know about Jorak? Stars, does he know about Dustil?

Contain your thoughts, Jen!

“I believe you were warned against visiting Dreshdae,” he said sharply. “What have you been doing?”

“Nothing of import, Master,” I replied in a meek tone, my thoughts racing. “Releasing the mercenaries who travelled with me, and tying up loose ends.”

He stopped about four paces in front of me, arms folded and a heavy frown creasing his forehead. Uthar’s face was heavily tattooed in black and silver, markings that edged over the shiny dome of his head. His almost translucent white eyes were likely a sign of Dark Side corruption, I thought, rather than actual blindness. I wondered briefly how he had ripped out Jorak’s eyes, and shuddered. Hide your thoughts, Jen! Think of something else, something innocuous!

A searing blast of agony stabbed deep into my temples; suddenly there was a malevolent presence pummelling through my mind, tearing through random thoughts as Bastila retreated in shock. I was completely unprepared as Uthar’s power scoured through my head, looking for memories of mercenaries and Dreshdae and the Cathar. The pain was like a piercing migraine amplified tenfold, and I clutched at my head reflexively, half-aware of someone screaming.

Think of something else, something innocuous! Bastila’s words echoed to me, and I reflexively pulled up the image of the Mandalorian brawl. Uthar’s curiosity caught, and he paused in his rough rummaging to focus on the picture of Canderous and Jagi facing each other in the windswept clearing in from of the caves. The memory replayed itself under his grasp, but Uthar doesn’t understand Mandalorian, and I could feel his frustration mounting at his inability to comprehend any meaning other than some sort of barbaric stand-off.

And then, a quicksilver spark of inspiration flared into life within me - at the end, the blonde female warrior walking suggestively towards… towards me, I changed the memory ever so slightly, I thought of the Mandalorian looking at me with a knowing glint in her eye and a sway to her hips, and created the idea of fun and passion that would lure me away from the Sith teachings I pretended to crave. I pictured her face close to mine, her blue eyes sharp with desire, lips full and red and ready to kiss, her armour unwieldy but begging to be removed.

Uthar loosed a loud bark of laughter, and suddenly I was released from his mental clinch. I found myself prone in the Korriban dust, my fingers digging deep into the sides of my head.

“Well, well,” Uthar said in amusement. “You have been busy, Ness Jonohl.”

“Through passion, I gain strength, Master Uthar,” I gasped from the ground.

Uthar chuckled again. “You are stronger than I realized, Ness Jonohl. But as tempting as your distractions may be, you do not have leave to exit the Academy. Next time you do won’t be nearly so pleasant. Do we understand each other, Ness Jonohl?”

“Yes, Master Uthar,” I mumbled, pulling myself into a sitting position, keeping my head bowed.

“Good,” he drawled with satisfaction. “Now, where is that Cathar that came in with you?”

Wariness still sat heavy within me, I could not trust the privacy of my own head, yet. “I last saw her in the Valley yesterday, Master Uthar,” I said quietly, focusing only on the memory of the dying afternoon sun as Staria and I picked our way through the valley. There - I sensed the faint evil touch of Uthar, which confirmed he was still snooping – but this time, testing my honesty by stealth instead of brutally ripping the thoughts from my mind. All I focused on was the rocky path in the Valley of the Sith Lords. Uthar would look for more, I knew, but if he could be distracted into believing my main drive was my own desire-

I’m glad there’s Mandalorians in Dreshdae, I thought overtly, randomly, grabbing the falsehood and running like a crazy stimmed-up swooper with it. They’re so built and well-endowed, rough and ready and know how to have a good time. Better than the blasted Echani who think everything has to be a sodding battle dance. There was that one who even asked me to bed him in the middle of a sparring match, I swear he would have screwed me right there, even though that ice-queen Atris was in the next room, and then Mal walks in and stars didn’t he get pissed off, he really should have known better though, like I’d bed one of those fairies when I had him-

“Enough!” Uthar barked, and suddenly I was yanked up hard into the air, the wild thoughts derailing as Force power squeezed tightly around my oesophagus. Rage ignited a maelstrom deep in my belly. Deception, this can still be won by deception, a voice whispered a reassurance in my head, and I wasn’t sure if it was Ness or Revan. I roughly tamped down on the anger. Let him think he’s in control.

“You really are ruled by your passions, aren’t you, Ness Jonohl?”

“Yes, Master,” I gasped, my hands scrabbling at my neck, as I inwardly focused on my fear, and my fear alone. Panic, not rage. He can still be tricked. Was it overconfidence, or just a natural understanding of my own abilities? But Uthar was underestimating me, and I wasn’t ready to show my strength just yet.

There was, however, genuine fright threading through my anger, and I zeroed in on that. It must have appeased Uthar, for he grunted in satisfaction and dumped me back in the Korriban dust. A place I’d been a little too often, lately.

“You’re a bit wild, certainly,” Uthar mused. “I’m more interested in finding your friend, now, but I think I’ll take over your teaching, Ness Jonohl. I don’t trust my apprentice to control someone of your… unbridled talent. Get up.”

I scrambled awkwardly to my feet, bowing before him once more.

“Get yourself to the Initiates quarters, and stay there until one of my Adepts calls for you,” he ordered.

“Yes, Master Uthar,” I quietly assented. Uthar nodded in satisfaction, turned and strode back into the Academy. I followed meekly, projecting the very impression of a cowed Sith Initiate.

Sun and stars, I thought dazedly. That was intense.

Intense? Bastila sounded a mixture of horrified and appalled. Jen. That was subterfuge on a mental level I have not seen before. It would have fooled me, had I not intercepted your initial thought about modifying your own memory. How do you think so expeditiously on your feet?

I don’t know Bastila. I really didn’t. The thoughts had been random and accelerating and dizzying, borne out of panic rather than any premeditation. I just kinda made it up as I went along! The large ferracrystal doors swung shut behind me, and Uthar was already stalking off to the east, headed towards the Valley, the last place Staria had presumably been seen - according to my memory.

Dak hangs out in the Valley. Which means it is Juhani’s most likely location, I realized with disgust, halting in the central ceremonial cavern of the Academy. What is Uthar’s motivation? What does he want with Juhani? Ridiculously large sculptures of glaring Sith Lords glowered down at me as I stood, alone, in the vast circular room. I resisted the childish urge to scowl back.

Uthar had already gone.

We need the Star Map, Jen. It must be our first priority.

Bastila was right. If I couldn’t find Juhani quick, I’d have to bail and hope she’d keep herself safe until we planned the extraction. It made me feel nauseous, but I could sense the risks mounting. The urgency was still there, an undercurrent of tension telling me I had to move. I couldn’t dally, with Uthar restricting me to the quarters, and the politics of the Academy itself edging towards a boiling point.

The Map, Jen. You must leave Juhani, return to the others, and focus on that. As long as there is one Force-user going after the Map, you can succeed. I nodded mentally at her. Of course we needed a Force sensitive, how else were we going to draw the terentateks away from the Star Map? She probably hadn’t been a party to any discussions of the caves, yet, I reminded myself.

Drawing deep into the Force, I spread my senses out, hoping desperately that I could detect Juhani. I feel like I should be better at this. I could sense Uthar, moving further away towards the tombs. He all but pulsed with poisonous strength whenever he registered within the Force. That sort of power… I felt like there was only one way I could possibly vanquish it… and I’d sworn not to go down that path again.

You cannot deny me forever, Revan whispered.

My jaw clenched as I pushed the insidious thought away.

There wasn’t much else of interest. A couple of minor sparks - Initiates probably - in a corridor nearby. The Force itself had that dark taste to it, a cruel edge that sparked against the rage and lust for power, and I had to forcibly breathe in deep, focus on the calm and the peace and push the black thoughts away.

*_There is no emotion, there is peace,*_ Bastila murmured, and I found myself echoing her. I didn’t know if it was to reassure her or myself, but it worked. It actually frelling worked. *_There is no ignorance, there is knowledge._ I breathed in again, trailing off as Bastila continued to chant through the bond. I have to leave Juhani behind, I knew, even as I felt sick about it, but she wasn’t near me. There was nothing nearby, nothing I could pick up on other than an odd, dead patch of-

I swung around sharply, my gaze zeroing in on the entrance to the training rooms.

Jen, Bastila’s tone was sharp… but it was also fading in strength. _Do not be distracted._

My eyes followed the shielded presence as it abruptly backpedalled, stumbling away from me. Before I’d consciously realized what I was doing, I was striding after it.

Jen!

_Maybe the Force brought me here for a reason._ I threw back at her as I stalked into the training room I’d sparred so briefly in. It was also, mercifully, empty, and Dustil had already retreated into the corridor beyond. The corridor that Yuthura had explicitly forbidden me to enter. But then, she also said it was out of bounds for Adepts, I realized with a touch of amusement.

*_Maybe you are merely being wilful,*_ Bastila replied tartly, but I could sense she had conceded the argument.

I walked determinedly down the hallway; it wasn’t long, and finished abruptly with a lone door at the end. No sign of Dustil, and there was only one place he could have disappeared to. I eyed over the door; it was made of a thick titanium alloy, with a control panel visible at hand height. There didn’t seem to be an obvious keycard or autoprint mechanism though, and I wondered whether it was Force-locked in some fashion.

I frowned at the door, concentrating through the Force as I eyed the lock over. On Manaan, I’d been desperate for entry into the Republic Base, and I’d done something… or rather, Revan had. But this wasn’t some corrupted use of the Force, and my life wasn’t in immediate danger… surely this was something I, Ness Jonohl, could do.

I felt Bastila’s interested focus as my senses curved around the door circuitry. On such a minute scale, the electrical impulses oscillated wildly like an incredibly complex dance; a complete jumble to an outsider, and yet somehow it worked. I didn’t understand the specifics of how it operated, or whether some Force power was required to open the lock, but I could see the electromagnetic energy as it streamed through the mechanism. And there, right there, I could impede the flow, disable the power, and cause the lock to fail.

The door clicked, and now I could take a step forward and manually slide it open.

Awe radiated quietly from my bond-sister. How… how is it possible you can do that, on that scale? Her thought was a whisper. So insignificant… I could only feel it through your senses. I have nowhere near that sort of awareness.

We all have our strengths, Bastila, I answered, feeling vaguely uncomfortable. Let’s not forget all you managed yesterday, through our bond. Mekel would be dead now, if not for you.

Perhaps, she conceded, albeit grudgingly. She still sounded weak. It is true that my prowess has always been with the psychic side of the Force… but your instincts ring with the Force’s own luck. Even though you have no recollection of any training.

I stepped forward, about to slide the deactivated door open. I could sense a spark of life inside, but it was so faint it seemed on the verge of winking out entirely. I didn’t think that was Dustil. Either he was shielded, in which case I could only sense his absence, or his presence should radiate with far greater strength.

Well, you did start training me before I ran. And Juhani’s been helping me, Bastila. I didn’t know what else to say. We had so much to speak of, she had so much to explain… and yeah, I felt resentful that she kept Ness Jonohl hidden from me. A Jedi Knight who hadn’t fallen to the Dark Side. Would that have helped? Would I have stayed on Manaan and met Karon, had I known? Would I have done better, on Tatooine, at keeping Revan’s darker emotions under control?

Here on Korriban, of all places, you are maintaining the path of the light side, Bastila murmured to me, picking up on my thoughts once more. Yet on Tatooine, to my great chagrin, I failed you. You should not blame yourself for being absent on Manaan, and for what happened to Master Karon. I could have… I could have been braver, and enlightened you earlier. Prepared you. I am sorry I have not done well by you.

I paused, my hand lightly touching the door, as sheer shock resonated through me. Just when I thought I had her pegged, she tipped it all upside down.

Bastila, I thought in astonishment, I don’t understand the whole of it… of everything. But we are working together, now. Let us both leave these feelings of regret behind, okay?

She paused, and then I felt her agreement wearily touch my mind. With a mental touch of reassurance, I pulled back from her and opened the door.

The room in front of me was, very obviously, a Sith interrogation room, and my initial response was one of repugnance. Three cages lined one wall, robotic arms curving around them in a threatening fashion. One was occupied with the slumped form of a human female hanging from restraints that fastened her to a central pillar. A prism of amber static crackled around her in a forcefield.

The other wall bore a desk with a console, and behind it – now that I was familiar with it – was the cloaked presence of Dustil Onasi.
I scowled darkly at the empty air until he dropped his shields. He was staring at me in shock.

“How- how did you get in?” Dustil demanded, his eyes wide with either fright or anger.

“Uthar let me in,” I said, a touch sarcastically, and his expression darkened.

“Right,” he snapped, hair falling into his eyes. “I suppose Uthar made you his first apprentice, too.”

I folded my arms and stared straight into his brown gaze. “I rather think that’s your aim, Dustil,” I said softly. A dull flush of colour darkened his cheeks before his eyes narrowed.

“Did dear old Dad send you after me?” he accused, taking a step back and leaning against the chrome alloy wall. It was all shiny metal here, overlaying the granite of the mountain we were underneath. Possibly some sort of shielding against surveillance, or maybe just a nod to some Sith Lord’s interior decorating bent. The walls were buffed enough I could make out my own reflection against them. A side wall, at right angles to the cages, bore a set of manacles too high for any sentient to touch the floor, were they restrained in it. And Carth’s son hangs out here. Frelling fantastic.

My eyes flicked back to the prone figure that hung limply in the torture cage. She was a nondescript human woman, about my age, dressed in unadorned clothing. Maybe a trader of some sort. Dried brown smatters decorated the gleaming metal ground underneath her feet.

“I have my own objectives, Dustil,” I said absently, still staring at the prisoner. “But your father is a tenacious fellow.” I dragged my gaze back to the youth, whose brows had lowered in anger. Stars, he looks a lot like Carth. I wondered how much of his mother was in him. What sort of mother had she been? What sort of wife? What sort of woman would catch the heart of Carth Onasi? “Carth won’t give up on you.”

Dustil snorted at that. “He gave up on me and Mother years ago. He has no right to demand anything now!”

“I didn’t say he wasn’t a crap father,” I snapped. “But he is a good person. And he’s going to force you into a choice, Dustil. One of your options will be him, either dead or in there.” I pointed to the unconscious human, helpless and wholly at the mercy of the Sith. “Will you be willing to live with yourself if that happens?”

I could see the emotions wage war on his face. He opened his mouth to say something, clenched his jaw, and then shut it again.

“What sort of a life do you have here, Dustil?” I said softly. “Sure, there’s power – but are you happy?”

“Happy?” he scoffed in disgust, face contorting in disbelief at my words. “Happy is a pipe dream, Jen. Happy doesn’t give you what you want, what you need. Happy sure as frakk doesn’t protect those you love!”

My eyes narrowed as I stared at him, that younger clone of Carth so twisted up with bitterness and fury at the world. “You think you should have been able to protect your mother?” I guessed.

The look of utter derision told me my stab in the dark went wild. “Don’t try to analyze me, Jedi. And don’t you ever speak of my mother again!”
“Okay,” I said slowly, forcing my voice neutral and unruffled. “But exactly who are you protecting, here? You’re not even mates with Mekel anymore –”

“Mekel?” he sneered, and it sounded outraged. “He may be your best buddy, but you’re going to get a saber to the back if you are stupid enough to trust him.”

“I don’t trust him,” I retorted. “And we are hardly buddies. But one thing I do know – Mekel is loyal to those he cares about.”

Dustil all but spat out a laugh. “Really?” he drawled. “Why don’t you ask him about Selene, then, and see if you can find out just how loyal he really is.”

My eyes narrowed, and I stared at him in silence for long enough that Dustil began to shift uncomfortably. Here, maybe, was a piece of the puzzle. I’d had no intention of seeing vicious little Mekel again – he might owe his life to me, but I had no illusions that I could claim any of his loyalty - yet now, I was wondering if speaking to Mekel was exactly what I needed to do.

“I might just do that,” I said quietly.

For some reason, this response annoyed Dustil further; I saw his fists clench as he straightened from the wall, shoulders bunching in unbridled anger.

“What are you still doing here on Korriban?” he hissed furiously. “I told Father to leave. You think I won’t kill him? You think I won’t betray you, Jedi Jen?”

“I’m hoping you won’t,” I answered, keeping my voice mild. “I’m hoping you don’t really want to be here.”

I could see a flash of some emotion cross his face, raw and indecipherable, as he ran a hand through his hair in a gesture that was so familiar. There was no doubting whose son he was, underneath all the bitterness and teenage angst.

“I belong here,” he said at last, and his expression had turned resolute. “If you think I won’t betray a Jedi, then all you have to do is look there.” He raised a hand, pointing to the nondescript woman.

I blinked, startled. Jedi? I glanced at her again. Human, close in age to myself, and dressed in a plain, if now bedraggled, tunic. I would not have picked it.

“I captured her. I tortured her. I’m responsible for that, and you dare to imply that I’m not Sith material?” His voice rose with every word, fury fuelling them, and I sensed the Force as it rallied through him, a dark and unstable crescendo of energy.

Dustil’s strength was enough to make me wary, particularly with his state of mind. But I had to believe – I had to hope – that perhaps underneath it all was despair. Despair, and maybe the desire to be elsewhere. “Anyone can turn back.” I said quietly. “Staria keeps showing me that.”

Dustil laughed mockingly. “Turn back? Are you for real Jedi Jen? What, shall I wake Belaya up and say oh, I’m so sorry but I didn’t really mean it, maybe we can be happy little friends together?”

“I never said it’d be easy,” I snapped. “If you want easy, then keep jumping like a kath pup every time Uthar clicks his fingers. But you have a choice now, Dustil. Are you strong enough to make the right one?”

His mouth opened, and then shut again with a click as his face contorted with emotion. I could see the torment on his face and knew that – despite his bravado – he wasn’t sure of his path. Not yet.
“I- uh, frakk it!” With one last, highly frustrated glare at me, he turned on his heel, slammed a hand on the door control, and stormed out of the room. As the entrance closed behind him, I let out a pent-up sigh.

That could have gone worse. It could have gone better, too, but at least there was hope. I think. My gaze slid back to the helpless victim in the restraints. And what the frell am I going to do here?

Bastila? Have you caught what’s going on?

It took her some time to answer; I was already standing by the console, reading the health report that someone – likely Dustil – had left up on the screen.

No. I am very tired, Jen.

Bastila's voice was still quieter than normal. Thinner. Weaker. Juhani told me what the medic said, back on Manaan. No permanent mental damage, but be prepared for her to sleep. A lot. Yet, Bastila had been still managed to help through the bond- throwing her advice and support and inner Force strength to me when required- no matter how drained she was. If nothing else, I couldn't fault her dedication.

I narrowed my eyes on the screen; scanning through the information detailed there. The access level blinked at the top of the console: controller authentication accepted. Dustil had left the system logged in. Was it naive to think that had been deliberate?

The health report on the screen labelled the woman as Jedi Knight Belaya Linn, alias Rita Sunrider, human, female, and rattled off a list of constitutional statistics that held very little meaning for me.

It did state that she had several broken ribs, a ruptured spleen, and a punctured lung – the latter two had been surgically repaired.

It didn’t state the cause of her injuries, but I had a sinking feeling I already knew.

Bastila. I need the medbay. I’d made the decision, then. I couldn’t leave the unknown Jedi here, despite the risks.

The console allowed me to disable the amber energy shield surrounding the cage - some sort of Force-inhibiting prison, I would guess, as the restraints around the woman made a repulsion or shock field somewhat superfluous. She's not collared with a neural disruptor, either. Since she's a Jedi, they must've had some method of blocking her Force abilities.

I stared at the crackling amber prism as it vanished into nothingness under my input. There was the tiny, nagging feeling, deep within my gut, that I'd seen these sorts of prisons before. I felt the corners of my mouth turn down, gave my head a little shake to disperse the unwelcome thoughts, and turned back to the console.

It had a medical AI that allowed me to inject the Jedi with adrenal stimulants. One was usually enough to rouse a person from light unconsciousness, but considering the injuries inflicted upon this Belaya Linn, I decided on a double-dose. I need her up and walking out of here. I can't exactly carry a body through Dreshdae - or the Academy. I stabbed a key on the touchscreen, and looked up to see a robotic arm inject the woman twice under my order. Stimulants have their own side-effects, though. If I could employ some method of Force healing - like Bastila used on Mekel after we'd brought him back from the brink - then that would improve this Belaya's health tenfold.

The medbay? Bastila finally answered. She was confused, rightly so, but her mental tone sounded so bone-weary that I knew I couldn't request her assistance this time. I'd have to sort Belaya out... myself. For, I'd likely need Bastila's assistance later, after the shyrack caves - for now, she needed to recuperate.

Yes. I'll explain later. You should get some rest. Can you move back to the pilot's quarters?

A groan issued from the woman as the drugs began to hit her bloodstream. Belaya Linn, the records said. The name sounded familiar, like I'd heard it recently. An uncertain sensation hit me as I wondered whether I'd ever met her before. I walked closer, slowly, and her head rose. Blue eyes opened, and focused blearily on me.

Okay.

Get some sleep, I ordered Bastila gently. By the time you wake up, we might even have the Star Map coordinates and be ready to leave this rock.

Fear tightened the woman's face, but there was no sign of familiarity – she did not know me. Her gaze darted all around the room, looking for other tormenters, before settling back on me again. There was a kernel of anger there, though, within the depths of her gaze. She wasn't fully broken yet, and I blessed that discovery.

That… would be lovely. I shall sleep, now. We will talk again soon. Her exhausted mental voice turned hesitant. My friend.

"I am Ness Jonohl," I said quietly. "Jedi Knight Ness Jonohl." I paused, watching her closely for any sign of recognition, but there was none. Her face creased in wary confusion. "I am a friend, and I have a ship in Dreshdae that you can take refuge in. But I can't carry you out of the Academy without raising suspicion – I need you to walk out, next to me."

Sleep well, my friend, I sent back through the bond gently.

Belaya's face had grown pale, mouth dropping open further with every word, it seemed. I could see her swallow, and then her eyes closed in despair. She didn't believe me. Days of torture and I'd likely think everything is a trap, too. I sighed, and walked back to the console.

"I'm going to release the restraints. Don't fall or anything, okay?"

The cage opened under my command, and the restraints released. Belaya hadn't, however, balanced herself, and she crumpled to the ground with an anguished moan. I remembered the broken ribs, and winced as I rushed to her side.

Belaya was curled up on the ground, but she heard me walk near, and I saw her entire body tense even as she groaned again.

"I'm going to try healing you with the Force," I murmured. If only Bastila had been a little less exhausted, then her expertise would be riding with me once more. But I'd been more than just a spectator yesterday, when she coaxed Mekel back from the other side of death, and then nurtured his body back to health. If I couldn't learn from that experience, then I didn't deserve to call myself a Jedi Knight.

I placed my hands ever so gently on Belaya's torso, and felt her tremble underneath me. The Force sank gently into her flesh, into her muscle, into her very bones. I focused on a sense of rightness, and saw the outlines of musculature as it curved away from the skeleton. There was a painful spot of inflammation around the abdomen, swelling around the jagged edge of two broken ribs. The Force bent itself to my will, and I felt the sweet sensation of melding it to my very desire. I wrapped it gently around the damaged bones, and then jerked them together with a firm twist.

I felt the bones interleave and then separate again, Belaya screamed, and the Force slipped through my fingers. My stomach turned as my failure slapped me in the face. I'd just caused her intense pain and accomplished absolutely nothing.

"Ah, kath crap," I cursed. So much for the whole Jedi Knight thing, then. "Sorry – I, ah, I've not done that before," Belaya whimpered once, twice, still curled up on the floor with her back to me. "Dammit. I'll see if I can find some pain meds in the desk. Hang on." I scrambled to my feet, backing away from the prone Jedi and towards the desk. It touted a couple of drawers that were full of hypodermics, tablets, scalpels, vials, and other small implements I didn't readily recognize. I grimaced, and started rifling through the 'derms with speed. I needed something fast acting and localized that could numb Belaya's pain and get us out of here.

"Ceramol-40," I muttered, placing a 'derm on the desk. "Ceramol-100, too, but that's likely to make you forget you have a body. Or- Profanol. That might work." I looked up at a moan, to see Belaya struggling to push herself up. Her pained blue eyes were watching me warily.

I winced. "Sorry," I repeated. "I've recently observed an impressive Force healing, and thought I could repeat it. Obviously I was misguided." The blue eyes blinked at me, but she said nothing. I sighed. "Look, we've got to get out of here, and for that, you need to be able to move. I've got Ceramol-40 or Profanol here – pick your poison."

A pained grimace creased Belaya's face, but she finally answered. "Ceramol," she whispered. I nodded, and came back to her side, handing her the small disposable cylinder. After inspecting the meds silently, then staring at me in consternation again, the Jedi handed the 'derm back to me and slowly pulled up the side of her tunic.

I gave her a minute for the injected drug to hit her bloodstream, and then stood, offering her a hand and a small, shaky smile. After a pause, Belaya leaned forward to clasp it.

She gasped as I pulled her up, and leaned against me unsteadily before finding her feet. I eyed her over, and realized just how out-of-place she appeared. Her tunic was nondescript and torn, and even with the pain meds she was obviously wounded. I frowned, and looked down at myself.

"Use my robe," I muttered, hurriedly removing the filthy Sith garment that I'd been abusing for the last few days. It's not like I needed it to fit in, half the residents knew who I was anyway. I looked at Belaya seriously. "You'll have to pretend you're a Sith," I explained, and she nodded, lifting an arm. Stars, she's a quiet one. Together, we got the robe on, with only one grunt of pain from the Jedi. I inwardly hoped my terrible attempt at healing hadn't actually made her injuries worse. But even with the Dark Jedi robe, Belaya still didn't convince me she belonged here. Maybe it was her body language, the way she held herself. Or maybe it's because she's just been tortured, idiot. I grimaced.

"Here," I said, drawing out my off-hand 'saber and offering it to her. "Activate it. It's a Sith one, it'll make you look like you belong here, and draw attention away from your demeanour." I grimaced. "You don't look nearly cocky enough to pull this off."

Her lips pursed, and for the first time I saw a flash of irritation cross her face. "I have suffered through days of unpleasantness. Permit me a moment to regain my composure." Her voice was tart – shaky, but tart.
I grinned. "Good. Keep hold of the attitude." I glanced back to the console, frowning. It was damn risky, rescuing a Jedi from the Sith Academy – particularly when we still needed time. Time to get the Star Map, before Uthar sent Sithlings after our ship. I couldn't know that Dustil wouldn't betray us and the Ebon Hawk – he was dithering, but it wouldn't last, and it was too close to tell which way he would fall. If Uthar found his Jedi prisoner was missing... If Uthar found I wasn't waiting in the Initiate's quarters... If Uthar found Juhani...

And then there was Kylah to think about.

I breathed in deep. There wasn't much I could do about Kylah, bar ensuring that Bastila was well-guarded. But I could, possibly, cover my tracks here.

"A second," I murmured, and strode over to the console. Belaya stood awkwardly in the room, the 'saber grasped loosely in her hand as she stared at it in dawning wonder, like she was only just beginning to accept the possibility of freedom. As I began entering commands on the system, I heard the all too familiar snap-hiss as she switched it on. I glanced up briefly to see her grimace at the colour, and rolled my eyes.

Belaya walked closer as I pulled up the medical logs. "What are you doing on Korriban?" she asked quietly. She rested her free hand on her side.

"It's complicated," I muttered, staring at the screen. What can I do here to cover my tracks? Fabricating fake medical entries was impossible without a droid. Slicing into the system and uploading a virus might work if only I had the skills of a certain Twi'lek street kid. I could delete the records pertaining to Belaya, but the auditing logs would then point the finger at who'd been logged in at the time - and I could only assume that was Dustil Onasi. Sithspit, I thought with disgust. I can't think of anything useful to do here.

"Are you... are you here to attend the Academy?" Belaya asked, her voice hesitant. She stared at me warily from behind the blood-red beam.

I blinked, looking over to her. Belaya's eyes were now fixed on my filthy robe that covered her body. "No! No, I'm not a Dark Jedi." It felt good to be able to say that with confidence. Ness Jonohl did not fall.

Her face was solemn. "You are the strangest Jedi I have ever met."

I flashed her a grin that was cheerier than I felt, and stepped away from the console, admitting technological defeat. "Okay, Belaya. Chin up, ignore the discomfort, and glare at everyone you see."

Her face trembled as she breathed shallowly. "I am... exhausted and in pain. I do not know if I have the fortitude for this."

I strode back to her, and placed a steadying hand on her shoulder. "Wrap the pain up in the Force, Belaya. Focus on your anger that you were caught, and on how you were treated."

The anger was there, all right, and it was levelled at me. "That is not the Jedi path!" she said, her voice at once stern and forbidding. This one definitely walks in the light. She could strike sparks off Juhani.

I felt the side of my mouth quirk. "No, it's not. But to escape, you must pretend to be a dark Force-user, and anger is not looked at twice, here. You can meditate on the code when we're safe." I walked over to the door, and stretched my senses out. There were no life-forms nearby, and I felt confident of getting us away from the Academy without encountering anyone. It was Dreshdae I was more concerned about – no avoiding sentients there, and who knew which traders or mercs were eyes for the Sith.

I took a deep breath, depressed the door control, and walked out of the interrogation room.

xXx

Luck was riding with us. We’d had to double-back down a corridor in the Academy to avoid company, but we were successful. There was no one in the large cavern, either, and I inwardly hoped that was Dustil’s doing. Unlikely. But he thinks I’m a Jedi, and led me to an imprisoned Jedi. And left the console active so I could release her.

It had the feel of wishful thinking, but for Carth’s sake I hoped it was true.

Belaya stayed two steps behind me, clutching tightly onto the activated Sith ‘saber. I heard a gasp of relief as we stepped out of the Academy, and knew the same feeling myself. I’d entered with the hopes of finding my Cathar friend, and instead was returning with a wounded stranger. If my luck holds, Juhani will be back at the ‘Hawk. And if not, then I’d just have to hit the shyrack caves without her.

We began our walk in silence; my strides were long and hurried, and I knew Belaya was struggling to keep up, but I didn’t feel comfortable dallying. The woman had a permanent grimace on her face, sun-streaked brown hair falling into pale blue eyes as we continued our journey. After some time along the distinctive path, I realized that distraction would be beneficial for her.

“Talk to me,” I said absently, my concentration intent on the Korriban terrain that was becoming awfully familiar. The ornate path was deserted, as normal. Dreshdae inhabitants avoid the Academy. I would, too, if I were Force-blind and lived here. “It’ll keep your mind from your injuries.”

“Alright,” Belaya acquiesced. “Let us become acquainted then. Perhaps now you can explain why you are on Korriban?”

“Not yet,” I replied wryly, “but it should comfort you to know that I am travelling with two other Jedi.”

“Oh,” she said in bewilderment. She looked at me sideways. “That is fortuitous, if it is true.”

I raised an eyebrow at her, and saw an answering flush.

“Forgive me,” she said quietly, “I was lured to the Academy under a false pretence from a stranger, so it is difficult to trust again.”

“Fair enough.”

We lapsed into silence again for several minutes, before Belaya plucked up the courage to speak once more. Her voice was fading, and I realized the stims and the meds were wearing thin. “These Jedi who accompany you… they are Knights, also?”

“No,” I said, and my voice sounded surprised even to my own ears. “They’re both Padawans. One failed her Knight trials, but only because they were sodding ridiculous. The other… well. It’s patently farcical that she’s still a Padawan.” A Padawan, in command of the Endar Spire. The one who’d knocked out the old Sith Lord, saved my life, and countless others with her Battle Meditation. What the frell were the Masters thinking, keeping her as a Padawan?
I realized Belaya was frowning at me in some confusion, and shot her a quick grin. “Never mind. You’ll meet them soon. But we’ve got to get through the colony first. Follow my lead, and look angry.” I breathed in deep, and my eyes held hers. “Be angry at the world, and no one will pay you a second glance.”

I forced a dark glare on my face as we entered Dreshdae, taking the time to scowl at every sentient within view. I couldn’t activate Karon’s ‘saber, not without screaming Jedi, but I hoped between my bedraggled appearance and Belaya’s readiness with the blood-red beam, we would be left alone to stalk through the air-conditioned tunnels. I spotted a handful of mercenaries – not Mandalorians, for which I was grateful, I did not want them to place Canderous’ second as a Dark Jedi – who eyed us over briefly before wandering into the cantina.

A small group of Czerka-uniformed staff gave us a wide berth as we made our way to the spaceport; and I found myself struggling to keep from running. Walk confidently, head up, like you own the place. I deepened my scowl, landing an angry glare on the docking officials who avoided my gaze, undoubtedly used to dealing with temperamental Sith.

I jammed my hand on the docking bay door control, hearing Belaya stumble behind me as we entered relative safety. We made it, I thought with determined victory as I strode deeper into the roofless area, the Korriban atmosphere assailing my senses once more. We made it! The flush of victory was riding high in my veins, and, once more, my confidence rose. We would conquer Korriban, damn it, and get off this stars-forsaken planet.

Canderous met us at the hatch, answering my loud knock, his weathered face slackening in surprise as Belaya floundered next to me. She gave a gasp, maybe at the appearance of a very obvious Mandalorian, or perhaps simply because she’d reached the end of consciousness, for her next action was to slump against me as the lightsaber slipped from her loose grasp.

I’d caught her, just, and shot the Mandalorian a frantic, demanding look.

“Found a friend, Jen?” Canderous asked mockingly, but he answered my unspoken order and reached to grab a hold of the inert Jedi. I transferred Belaya into his arms as gently as I could.

“Careful, she has two broken ribs,” I said softly. “Get her to the medbay.”

He nodded, the extra weight no encumbrance to him, and strode into the Hawk. After snatching up the ‘saber then securing the hatch behind me, I raced to catch up; he’d transferred Belaya to the bed Bastila had recently occupied, and Carth was already there, rifling through the medical supplies, a dozen questions on his face. Mission, further back in the common room, peered in curiously at us.

Canderous stepped out of the crowded medbay, next to me, his eyes still fixed on the newcomer.

“You started the extraction already, Jen?” he drawled, but he was frowning at me. “Wasn’t that supposed to be a stealth mission after your Star Map, not something we draw out over the day?”

“Her heart’s racing,” Carth murmured from inside the room, injecting a hypoderm of kolto into her arm. “It’s irregular, too, like she’s been stimmed.” His hands were sure as they rested on her upper chest, and I wondered if he’d had medic training in his past.

“She has,” I said shortly. “Two adrenastims, to wake her up and get her out of the Academy.”

The collective gaze of everyone swung onto me, demanding an explanation, and I heard the thud of Zaalbar’s footsteps from behind. “She’s a Jedi. Jedi Knight Belaya Linn. I found her in a torture chamber. I couldn’t leave her behind.” I sighed. “Bastila could help, but she’s still so weak. I can barely feel her through our bond.”

Mission, standing next to Canderous and I, bore such an endearing look I had to look away. Canderous was slightly grim, and I knew he was mulling over our situation and objectives, and likely coming to the conclusion that rescuing a comatose prisoner of the Sith was not going to help our chances, Jedi or no. Carth’s expression was harder to pick, but he stared intently at me.

“You did the right thing,” he said quietly.

“Did I?” I shrugged with discomfort. “Juhani’s not back, is she?” The answering silence told me all I needed to know, and I sighed. “So, instead of finding our able crewmate, I brought back an injured stranger that may risk us all.” I closed my eyes, and that damned urgency was still there, beckoning me to hurry the frell up. “Check her ribs, Carth, there’s two broken at least. Then get her stable. We’re moving out. Now.”

xXx
“(Mission,)” I complained. “(This whole plan is foolhardy.)” It was. It was. Concern sat heavy in my chest. I understood the need to locate this powerful and foreign Star Map, but did Jen really require Mission to travel with them? I had heard all the reasons, and I did not deny that my young friend had many skills, but surely a warren of dark caves inhabited by fearsome monsters was not the place for a Twi'lek pup?

Mission glanced up at me from the datapad she was tinkering with. She was sitting in the cargo bay, surrounded by a pile of equipment that included light-sticks, retractable plysteel ropes, bioscanners, and a half dozen energy bars. Although the Mandalorian had procured some of it, the rest had come from my inventory of the Ebon Hawk’s supplies. That profligate, degenerate human Davik Kang had certainly been a hoarder.

“Sheesh, Big Z, the day you don’t complain about me going somewhere, I’ll know something’s really up.” Mission said. A pair of night vision goggles rested on the top of her head, and her utility belt was full. My young charge was impatient to run out into danger, while I was forced to stay behind.

Jen had been resolute, though, and her eyes had glinted with determined leadership. This was not the same helpless human I’d worried over in Tatooine, and I wasn’t sure if it was the same reckless one I’d life-sworn myself to back on Taris. Jen carried herself with a self-possession that had been lacking before, and there was no doubt whom was carrying the mission. If and when Bastila Shan fully recovered, I doubted that the Jedi would be able to wrest control once more.

The enigmatic Jen Sahara worried me. I did not know all that she was encountering in the madclaw Academy that she and the Cathar were attending, and it frustrated me that my strength and my abilities were of no use to her there. If only Bastila Shan was back at her full strength. The experienced Jedi would surely be able to even the odds, but it seemed her injury from Manaan was more damaging than anyone had foreseen.

I sighed noisily, and Mission shot me a quick grin. It was good to see the humour restored to my ebullient young friend after her encounter a few days ago. She would not divulge details of what had occurred, but someone within Dreshdae had sorely frightened her. And Mission was not one to scare easily, much to my dismay. Of course, if she had listened to me and stayed within the confines of the Ebon Hawk, it would not have happened. But all what-ifs do is tie a kshyy vine around your neck. I may desire to say I-told-you-so like a petulant human, but I knew what little effect it would have on my young friend.

“It’ll be fine, Big Z. Canderous and HK are pretty tough, y’know. The ‘scanners will pick up anything well in advance, and Jen’ll be able to draw the rancor things well away. Frankly, I think she’s in more danger than us.”

That didn’t reassure me. Jen Sahara was capable, fierce, and a Force-user; yet sometimes I worried she over-estimated herself as much as Mission did. I recalled the rancor in the sewers with a frown, and the thought of a monster like that, but larger and venomous, was more than just unnerving. But Jen Sahara is quick. Unnaturally so. If there is any sentient who can succeed in this dark place, it would be her. For I did have faith in Jen, despite my concern for her well-being. And since her return to Manaan, she had been acting with honour. Jen Sahara was, once more, someone worthy of the lifedeath I had vowed.

The unknown Jedi comatose in the medbay was an attestation to that. For all of Jen’s worry about the additional risks, she had done a brave and honourable deed.

I glanced back to Mission, sprawled out on the durasteel floor, looking entirely at home surrounded by gadgets and equipment. She was a wonder, my young friend, intelligent and irrepressible and generous, all qualities which should have been snuffed out by her early life in the dregs of the Lower City. Behind her, in an unceremonious pile of plysteel and alloy mesh, lay a variety of armour suits that I had been slowly modifying or dismembering, depending on its condition. I spotted a panel of blue-and-white peeping out from underneath, and frowned.

“(Mission,)” I said, walking over to the stockpile. “(You have not worn that exoskeleton again. It is good protection, and I do not like to see you without any form of armour.)”

Mission scowled as I hefted up the remnants of Calo Nord’s battle suit. It was a good fit for her, now, but I could not shake the feeling that she blamed it for whatever had occurred in Dreshdae.

“Fine,” she groused, coming forward to talking it from my clutches. “I suppose it’s better than nothing.”

It was a superior piece of armour, even disregarding whatever Force-resistance it was purported to have. Mission was still pouting, but allowed me to assist her in equipping it.

“Come on, ladies!” Canderous Ordo bellowed from deeper in the ship. “It’s time to move out!”

Mission’s head tilted up at the yell, and the gleam in her eyes was too excited for my liking.

“(Be safe,)” I grumbled. “(I will see you out.)”

In a flurry of excitement, my young charge stuffed the datapad in her belt and grabbed a couple of ration bars. The Mandalorian and the human Carth Onasi trailed into the cargo bay then, and the Republic pilot handed Mission a wrist communicator.

“Stay in constant communication,” Carth said, his eyes dark with concern. “I’ll be tracking you all from the cockpit. I’ve even put one on that damn robot—”

“Statement: I will be most pleased to inform you of every bat I kill, Paranoid Has-Been.”

I growled softly as HK-47 entered, followed by his master. I did not like that robot, and judging by Carth Onasi’s expression he felt the same. I could not help but lay part of the blame of Jen Sahara’s wild escape on Manaan towards that evil piece of machinery. I had seen many droids in my life, and none set my hackles rising quite like this one.

“Jettison. Air-lock. One day soon,” Carth threatened through gritted teeth.

“We need all the help we can muster, Carth,” Jen said quietly, but her smirk gave away her enjoyment at his discomfort. He shot her an unimpressed look.

Canderous Ordo hefted a pack over his shoulder, and jerked his head towards the exit hatch. Within minutes, Carth Onasi and I were standing on the loading ramp, watching the others traiipse out of the docking bay. Jen was at the rear of the group, and turned to face us one last time.

“Keep that hatch closed,” Jen said quietly. An intense, faraway look clouded her eyes, and I could see she was already thinking ahead. “Keep Teethree plugged into the ‘cams for surveillance. And-” she broke off, sighing. “We’ll be back before you know it.”

“This is becoming too familiar,” Carth muttered.

“But I always come back, right?” Jen quipped, shooting us a last grin and wave, before turning to follow the rest of them. I howled quietly as the docking bay door closed behind her. Staying on the Ebon Hawk, leaving my friends to stroll into unknown danger, was more than just unpalatable. I heard a pent-up sigh behind me, and turned to see Carth Onasi looking at me in understanding.

“Yeah,” he muttered, raking a hand through his hair. “We get the fun jobs. I’d better get into the cockpit and bring up the comms.”

“(I will check on the stabilizers first before coming inside,)” I told him. Jen had impressed upon us all the likelihood of a swift exit from Korriban, and I would make sure the Ebon Hawk was ready. T3-M4 had already completed all the necessary pre-flight checks as well as organizing a refuelling, but I would not miss an opportunity to check the outside of the hull. As highly useful as the astromech droid was, most of his circuitry had been utilized in constant monitoring of the exterior surveillance cameras, to spot any stranger approaching without our knowledge. This had become paramount since Jen’s warning about the Dark Jedi who had ambushed them on Manaan.

Carth Onasi looked at me without comprehension, and I loosed a brief huff of air. Wookiees did not have the vocal chords to make the guttural, awkward sounds of Galactic Basic, and both Carth Onasi’s and Canderous Ordo’s lack of understanding of my tongue was exactly what pinned me to guard duty, here, while my erstwhile young friend went frolicking off into danger.

I motioned around the ship, hoping to convey my intent to the Republic pilot. He gave a brief nod of acknowledgement.

“I’ll leave the hatch open while you do… er, whatever it is you need to do. Don’t be long, okay? We’ve got one sleeping Jedi and one comatose one in here.”

I grunted as he headed back inside, bending under the ship to have a cursory scan. Carth Onasi did not have to remind me of my responsibility. I wondered about the new Jedi, and what complications she would bring to our endeavour. If this one could be sufficiently healed, then perhaps she would make a worthy ally for Jen Sahara and Mission.

Yet currently both this stranger and Bastila Shan were out of commission. Alone, asleep, and wholly vulnerable. And the underside of the Ebon Hawk looked clean, so perhaps any more intensive checks could wait. It would be better to stay inside whilst we were few onboard.

The swish of the docking bay door opening made me straighten in surprise, crunch my head on the hull, and howl in annoyance. I backed out and turned around, expecting to see one of the crew returning.

It was a stranger, and I glared balefully.

“(Go away,)” I ordered, waving the sentient off dismissively. It was an unknown woman dressed in the offensive uniform of a Czerka official, walking slowly towards the Ebon Hawk. She was human - maybe part-Miriialan judging by the yellowing skin, although she bore no facial tattoos – and decidedly not welcome.

“Pardon me,” she said in Galactic Basic. “We have a couple of docking queries.” The Czerka official had bound dark hair, and eerie yellow eyes that matched her skin. Unusual, for a human,
“(Czerka filth!)” I roared. “(You should not be here!)”

A brief, calculating look crossed the woman’s face, before it dissolved into understanding. “Ah,” she said quietly. “You are of the same mind as me, then. I despise Czerka, and wish I did not have to pose as one to help the Republic – but we must do all we can for the greater good.”

I paused, befuddled, as she looked at me beseeingly. She understood Shyriiwook, which was surprising in itself. “I have been sent here as an agent for the Republic, but we cannot help in an overt fashion – not here, on this awful planet of the Sith. Perhaps–” and now a knowing look crossed her face. “Why don’t you get Jen Sahara to come and meet me? She knows me well and can vouch for my sincerity.”

“(Jen Sahara is not here,)” I answered, taking a step back towards the loading ramp. Her words sounded genuine, and yet I felt suspicious. Somehow, she looked like she had expected that answer.

“Oh, that is a shame,” she replied dolefully, her eyes fixed on mine. I found it hard to break the gaze. “My name is Aramai. The Republic wishes to help the Ebon Hawk as much as we are able, in particular Bastila Shan since she suffered such a grievous injury on Manaan.”

“(Bastila Shan is resting,)” I said sharply, and then frowned. I should not have acknowledged Bastila’s presence, I realized, as I stared into those alien yellow eyes.

But if there was any chance this could be true, then it would be fortuitous indeed. We needed all the help we could get. We needed all the help we could get. I could feel my brows lowering in suspicion, even as her gaze pinned mine like a tach under a spear. “(And how do you propose to help?)” I howled, feeling vaguely annoyed.

She smiled, looking somewhat abashed. “I am a mere medic for the Republic, so I do not have the skills you need. But Bastila does, if only she were at her full strength. And that is where I can help, Zaalbar. I am expertly trained in the matters of psychic healing, and if I can do anything to assist the crew of the Ebon Hawk then it would be to all our benefit.”

Her words had a coercion to them that I longed to believe in, for Bastila Shan was a powerful Jedi indeed. If she were awake and well, then Mission would not have to run off into danger.

“I can help, Zaalbar,” she said softly. “You must trust me.” Her yellow eyes were bright and genuine and true. The words seemed to sink into my very mind, and I felt a slight release of the worry that was dogging me. Bastila had answers that Jen required. Bastila had strength that we all needed. If this part-human could help…

My paw was resting on the solid durasteel hull, and I still had a desire to turn around and enter the ship, and close the hatch firmly behind me. But it was difficult, so difficult, to break that yellow gaze. I found my thoughts wandering of their own volition, like someone else was lightly sifting through them, and I so dearly hoped that we would make it off Korriban, and perhaps not even need to go to Kashyyyk-

“With my assistance and Bastila’s strength restored, your team can find what they need and you won’t even be required to travel to Kashyyyk,” the stranger murmured, as if picking up on my very thoughts. Her eyes tightened. “The Jedi are waiting there, are they not? If you can complete this mission and send them the results, then there should be no reason to travel there.”

How does she know all this? I thought in alarm. How does she know my name?

“Commander Roland Wann from the Republic Embassy on Manaan sent me,” she murmured. Roland Wann was the name of Carth Onasi’s superior there, I recalled, even though I had only very briefly met him. The thought was immediately reassuring. “I have been told of you, Zaalbar, of your honour and your strength. The Republic wish to aid you in any way possible without alerting the Sith, so here I am. I can restore Bastila Shan.” Her tone was earnest, very earnest, and I felt something like hope swell over my suspicion. My overriding desire was to see Jen Sahara and Mission safe, and if she could aid in that and halt the requirement to travel to Kashyyyk-

“The Republic worries for Jen Sahara’s safety, without Bastila Shan’s aid,” Aramai murmured again. My brain seemed slow, fogged, but the intense need to trust this stranger was overwhelming. She held out a hand, and I glanced down at it briefly, my gaze catching on a hypoderm, before the pull back to her enigmatic gaze proved too hard to resist.

“This will lull Bastila into a deep recuperative sleep that will accelerate her healing, Zaalbar. You can help everyone, here.”

Her words sounded true. They felt true. And yet I was uneasy. I wished that Jen Sahara was here. She would know what to do. “(How can I trust you?)” I howled in confusion.

She blinked, and then held the hypoderm up, twisting it to show the label. “Here,” she said quietly. “It’s medical grade Tystullinium. Well known for its mental healing properties.”

The letters were meaningless to me. Mission had spent many hours on Taris attempting to teach me the written form of Galactic Basic, but learning to understand the spoken form had been enough for me.

“(I cannot read,)” I said hesitantly.

“Oh,” Her face fell. Her gaze pinned me once more, and her words seemed overtly heavy. “I am so concerned that if Bastila does not regain her strength, then Jen Sahara will succumb to the dark side of the Force. Jen Sahara needs Bastila Shan.” She was repeating herself, but her words were mesmerizing.

I could feel the fur on my arms standing on end. The strange part-human vocalized one of my deepest fears. Madclaw. It was as good a description of the Dark Side as anything else. And Jen Sahara had succumbed once. Aramai’s gaze was still boring into my own.

“We cannot win against the evil of the Sith if Jen Sahara falls, Zaalbar.” She paused, and her next words were slow and carefully enunciated. “Take it, Zaalbar. Help Bastila, inject her with this, and then bring her to me. I can examine her right here, in your docking bay where she is safe, and heal her. Everything will be better, you will see.”

My paw began to lift of its own accord, and Aramai smiled, still gazing at me intently. She dropped the hypoderm into my grasp.

“Go,” she commanded in a deep, authoritative voice. “Inject Bastila. Bring her to me. Help Bastila Shan and help Jen Sahara.” The words sunk deep into my very bones, and the periphery of my vision darkened.

I had entered the Ebon Hawk without realizing it, walking along the chrome corridor towards the pilot’s quarters on auto-pilot. It was a relief, actually, to be able to trust a stranger that would aid us all. The risks we were taking – Jen Sahara in particular – were frequent and concerning.

As I neared Bastila Shan, I could hear Carth Onasi talking over the communicator in the cockpit. I felt a brief stirring of curiosity as to what the others were doing, before Aramai’s words replayed themselves in my mind. Go. Inject Bastila. Bring her to me. Help Bastila Shan and help Jen Sahara. It would be so good to be of use once more!

The sleeping Jedi lay in front of me. Somehow, I had entered the room without being aware of it. Bastila’s form was smaller than I remembered, slight and lean. She had had more flesh on her bones in Taris, and that was after being imprisoned by that bullying swoop gang.

I looked down at the hypoderm in my paw, once again assailed with doubt. The letters printed on the side of the cylinder swam in my vision, but the first one looked like a ‘T’. I recalled all those times Mission had me recite the Galactic alphabet, despite my irritation. Now, I only wished I had paid more attention to my young charge.

Go. Inject Bastila. Bring her to me. Help Bastila Shan and help Jen Sahara. The echo rebounded in my mind, and I leaned over, tugging at a threadbare blanket and exposing one of the human’s pale limbs. Bastila was in such a deep sleep that she did not move, and I knew that Jen was concerned about her bond-mate. If this could help her, then it was the right thing to do.

With a grunt, I slowly turned Bastila’s arm, and placed the hypoderm against the skin. It was a quick movement to inject it into her arm, and the Jedi twitched once in her sleep, before sighing and settling again. I hesitated, suddenly confused, and lowered my head to listen for her heartbeat.

It was there, strong and slow, like the Jedi was sleeping deeply. Exactly what the part-human Aramai had said. I felt a renewed sense of assurance, and gently lifted Bastila Shan in my arms. We would make her better, and she would be able to help Jen Sahara once more.

I was outside the Ebon Hawk without realizing it, like my movement had become primal with no thought to my environment. I blinked in the docking bay, not seeing the stranger at first, until she came into view. Had she been hiding? I thought in renewed suspicion.

She smiled at me, her gaze fixed on mine again. “Well done, Zaalbar. You have done the right thing,” she murmured, her words compelling and true. I have done the right thing. “Let me see what can be done.”

Aramai walked closer, and I felt strangely reluctant to unburden my precious cargo. Aramai did not look strong enough to carry her regardless, and I wondered exactly what this Republic agent could do, here, without any equipment or medication.

“I am skilled in psychic diagnosis and do not need equipment here,” Aramai said calmly, as if picking up on my doubts. “You are not required to do anything, Zaalbar, just hold Bastila while I examine her.” She raised a hand and made an indecipherable motion in the air.

“(Are you a Jedi?)” I asked warily, wondering what sort of power this medic wielded.

“No,” she said, her voice going tight for a brief second. “No,” she said again, but calmly this time. “My objectives are aligned with the Jedi Order, though, of course.” She made a murmuring noise under her breath as her hand rested gently on Bastila’s brow. “She is weaker than I suspected, Zaalbar, and her mind is greatly damaged.”

“(Jen Sahara said she felt weak in the bond they share,)” I howled mournfully. “(What can we
But Aramai’s hands had stilled, as she looked at me sharply. “Bond? What do you mean?”

I had the strange desire to explain all I knew to this Aramai. Somewhere, deep in the back of my mind, a faint howl sounded in anger, but it was overlaid with a fogginess that slowed my very thoughts. “(Bastila Shan and Jen Sahara share a Force bond. I do not understand it fully, but they can communicate over great distances, and aid each other through the Force.)”

I sensed, rather than saw, Aramai’s mouth drop open, as I was still fixated on her eerie yellow eyes. “A Force bond,” she whispered. “How unusual… how interesting.”

A feeling of discomfort, like I had released a secret of vast import, assaulted me suddenly, and my grip on Bastila Shan tightened.

“Is this the correct course of action? Can this strange woman really be trusted?”

“You can trust me, Zaalbar,” Aramai said firmly. “This is the correct course of action.” I was once more reassured. I barely noticed the docking bay or any of my environs, so focussed was I on the part-human standing in front of me. “It is a good thing you have told me, for it explains Bastila’s mental exhaustion. I know how to help her now, Zaalbar, and you can assist me.”

“(Is the bond a danger to her? To Jen Sahara?)” I asked suddenly.

Aramai hesitated at that question. “Perhaps it explains her injury. I must get her to my medical tank, Zaalbar, and we can revive her fully. It is not far from here. Come with me.”

My foot lifted with no overt command from my brain, but paused in the air. Deep, deep in the back of my mind I felt a discontent buffer against the cloud of trust I held for the woman.

“You can trust me, Zaalbar,” the woman said again, and as I stared deep into her gaze I realized it was true. I blinked, and was suddenly aware I was at the exit of the docking bay with no knowledge of how I arrived. I paused.

Aramai, two steps ahead, turned with a look of irritation. “Come, Zaalbar! You can trust me. I will help Bastila Shan and I will help Jen Sahara.”

Once more, the pull to her proved too strong to resist. My vision narrowed to the dark-haired medic walking in front of me, so all I could see was a tunnel with her figure leading me. Background noise sounded a distant hum in my ears, and I focussed on one foot in front of the other. I can trust her. She will help Bastila Shan and she will help Jen Sahara.

Aramai stopped suddenly in front of me and I blinked. Somehow, we had made it to another docking bay that looked much the same as the one the Ebon Hawk stood in. I did not know how I had travelled there. The fog sat heavy in my mind.

The bay was deserted bar a small freighter that was completely dwarfed by the large, open-roofed area. The ship did not look big enough to house a hyperdrive, let alone any advanced medical technology. Aramai stared deeply into my gaze.

“You have helped heal Bastila Shan. She will be much better now. Repeat it, Zaalbar.”

“(I have helped heal Bastila Shan. She will be much better now,)” I said mechanically. It was good that Bastila was feeling better.

“Place her down in the ship’s entrance,” she ordered, and I did as I was bid. Behind me, Aramai spoke soft words that didn’t register, so clouded had my thoughts become. A hard pressure was closing in all around my mind, like grasping fingers forcing me to stillness.

“Now, what am I to do with you,” she was murmuring, but the words weren’t directed at me, and I barely heard them. Like the distant buzzing of gnit flies, they were easy to ignore. “I need time, time to leave this rock and transfer to another ship that can enter hyperspace. I cannot risk being discovered until I am well away. Hmm.” Aramai paused for a moment, and then strode back into view.

That piercing yellow gaze stared deep into my soul again, demanding obedience. “Bastila Shan is healed, now, and is sleeping back on the Ebon Hawk. You must go and guard her door, Zaalbar.”

“(I must go and guard her door,)” I repeated. The words were too compelling to ignore. Bastila was healed, now, and sleeping.

“Good boy,” she murmured, following it with a tinkling laugh, and somewhere deep, deep inside me, an anguished howl of despair was quenched by the ominous pull of the part-human stranger. My gaze had narrowed to pinpricks, and all I could see before me was the eerie glow of the mesmerizing yellow eyes. All I could feel was the overwhelming presence of the woman I trusted implicitly.

Aramai cleared her voice, and spoke loudly again. “Do not let anyone disturb Bastila Shan, Zaalbar. She is sleeping back on the Ebon Hawk, where you found her.”

“(She is sleeping back on the Ebon Hawk, where I found her,)” I echoed. There was a sick feeling in my gut, but it was not important. Doing as I was bid was important.

“One last thing. A message for Jen Sahara.” Aramai reached up, high, to grasp the fur on my chin. She was tall, for a human. Her gaze was all-encompassing. “Should Jen Sahara enter Bastila Shan’s room, you will remember that Kylah Aramai took her to Uthar Wynn at the Academy. Now, go! Go back to the Ebon Hawk and guard Bastila while she sleeps!”

I blinked, and suddenly I was back on the Ebon Hawk, standing guard outside the pilot’s quarters. There was a vague noise of conversation in the cockpit, but it was unimportant. Down in the depths of my mind, someone was howling a murderous scream of wrongness but it was small and tamped down by my primary objective.

All that mattered was the overriding desire to guard Bastila Shan while she slept.

xXx
::I’m going in,:: Jen’s voice breezed through the comm. ::I can sense two of them, not close. I’ll run to the other side of the caves and draw them to me. Wait for my command.::

I stared hard at the dots on the console; bright green lights indicating that Jen, Mission, Canderous, and that psychopathic droid were less than four klicks away from the safety of the Ebon Hawk. The partial map Mission had downloaded was overlaid on the ‘Hawk’s navigational software, and it showed a warren of tunnels that ran about twelve klicks under the rocky mountains to the west, before exiting near the mining outpost on the other side. Jen’s half-cracked idea was to lurk about in this area, closer to the outpost, baiting those hideous creatures while the others turned sharply north. Deeper into the mountains and into uncharted territory, for the only maps Mission had located were of the trails that the traders commonly used. And none of them turn north.

But that, apparently, was where the ruins of an old Sith Academy and the Star Map resided.

::Objection: Master, I cannot protect you if you order me away to babysit teenage Twi’lek bra-::

::HK, you’re taking orders from Canderous now. See you on the other side, guys!::

It was risky. Even though Canderous was carrying all the grenades he owned, and that homicidal robot had a dozen hidden weapons. It still smacked of a perilous gamble, and yet we were all following Jen’s lead. I sighed.

“Be safe, Jen,” I said. They’d left their communicators open since leaving the Ebon Hawk, and I was glad for that, even if it meant listening to HK-47’s deranged observations on the fragilities of organic meatbags.

One green dot broke from the rest, moving quicker than it had before, and I realized Jen was using the Force to enhance her speed. And to attract the terentateks. I’d done a little research on these warped rancors, and almost wished I hadn’t. They were gigantic, and their claws and tusks highly venomous. Faster and larger than rancors, they were drawn to Force-sensitives. More so if they actively used the Force. Our advantage was both Jen’s speed, and that some of these tunnels were too narrow for the terentateks to enter. But deeper, in the uncharted territory where the others were going, the caverns were likely to be larger. They had to be, for that was where the terentateks retreated when there was nothing left for them to devour.

I kept my eyes fixed on the moving green dot, tapping my fingers idly on the instrumental display. The first part of this mission was waiting, and that was always difficult.

Despite myself, my thoughts turned at once to my son, and the same disbelieving joy rushed through me. Dustil. I’d given up on him. I hated myself for it, but after months of searching Telos post the bombing, I’d given him up for dead. Succumbed to the depths of a bottle, and almost lost my career in the aftermath. And then, I turned around and sank my entire life once again into the Fleet. In a way, work had been as much an addiction as my brief dalliance with firewhiskey.

Workaholic. Alcoholic. Anything to keep me busy so I wouldn’t focus on all I had lost.
At least my life in the Fleet had been productive, and I knew I was an asset to the Republic. That gave me a purpose, something to keep waking up for, as the light in my life had winked out the day that bastard Karath had sold out to Revan. At least Revan was dead, even if Malak was still kicking - and while killing Malak was a daydream for a non-Force sensitive like me, if I ever had the chance to face off Saul Karath I'd jump at it. Even now, I could barely reconcile the memories of the Republic Admiral who'd mentored me and shaped my career with the cold-blooded traitor who'd betrayed Telos and spearheaded the Sith Armada against the remnants of the Fleet he'd once served so proudly.

But Dustil’s still alive. That moment, when Jen had called me over, implying that some vicious Sithkid was in actual fact my son... I hadn’t seen him, at first. It was a foreign young man, glaring at me and Jen in hatred and shame and fury, and then, somehow, it was my boy, scared and damaged, but standing there in front of me, alive. Angry, though. So very, very angry.

I’d been an absent father and husband, I knew that. Morgana’s sharp remarks and hurt stares reminded me every time I made it home, and I’d sworn that, one day soon, I’d pull back from the front-lines and be there for her and Dustil. But my skills were needed, and every Mandalorian fighter I’d shot down, every Sith traitor I’d stopped - all of it was in the name of the Republic. I was a military man, always had been. And yet… my family had paid the price.

I sighed, still staring at Jen’s marker, now deep into the map. I had to have faith that, somehow, I could begin to repair whatever damage there was between Dustil and I. But first we had to get him back, and that meant trusting Jen. I frowned at the navigational console. I’d told Mission I’d give Jen a chance, a real chance, and it’d been easier than I expected. Jen had come back from her betrayal determined to redeem herself, and I respected that. Stang, I respected her. Everything she was accomplishing, her sharp intelligence and sheer willpower to see this mission through on the most cursed of planets...

But to trust anyone with the life of my son was a big ask. And yet, Dustil’s very reaction to me showed how little I could do. Add in his Force-powers, which I still found difficult to believe... Jen is adamant he’s strong. Strong enough to be the Headmaster’s protégé. How is that possible? It certainly wasn’t the life I would’ve chosen for my son, even had the Jedi Order picked him up rather than the murderous Sith. I’d never had much time for Force-users, who tended to make every situation more complicated and dangerous, and that was just the ones who walked in the Light. I remembered Karath, once, a lifetime ago, confiding to me that he wished there was no such thing as the Force. And then he swings around and follows that schutta Revan. At least the Jedi who’d fallen after Malachor had the excuse of the Dark Side; for the military commanders who’d followed them there was no such recourse.

And, since I’d met Jen, I was beginning to understand the dangers and the depths of the Dark Side. It put a different spin on the darker side of her personality that had been evident on Taris and Tatooine. The thought that my son had to battle it was terrifying.

::Status update, Jen::: directed the gravelly voice of the Mandalorian. ::The Bek brat’s so bored she’s threatening HK with a paint-job. Amusing as that may be, I ain’t gonna get caught in the cross-fire:::

::Statement: my colour scheme is a satisfying ominous red. Observation: Blue, on the other hand, would fit nicely on the bottom of an ocean somewhere:::

::I’m good:: Jen returned. ::Haven’t come across any bats. I’ve caught the terentateks attention – there’s two of them moving my way. They’re still some distance away, though. Wait for my command::
“Don’t let them get too close, Jen,” I warned. “Make sure you have a narrow tunnel to fall back on. You’re heading into a large cavern with two east-facing exits, both of which head to the mining outpost. There’s also a large opening to the north. My bet is those beasts come from that direction.”

Of course Jen had a map, too, but she was highly focused on other distractions. Like the terentateks headed her way.

::Noted.::

I vaguely heard Zaalbar walk up the corridor and stop outside the pilot’s quarters. He’d come in before, shortly after the others had left, and I thought I’d heard him enter to check on Bastila. I’d been about to see if everything was okay just as the others had started talking over the comm. When I’d finally poked my head down the corridor the Wookiee had gone, likely back towards the cargo bay where he spent most of his time. As long as he was inside I felt reassured, but if he was back and preferred to stand to attention outside Bastila’s door then I wasn’t going to stop him. I hadn’t liked the idea of him outside the ship earlier, but he had seemed intent on a last check of the ship before heading in. At least, that’s what I understood through his howls and hand motions.

I need to make a point of learning Shyriiwook, I realized wearily. It’s ridiculous that I can’t understand Zaalbar after all this time travelling together. I could recognize the sound he made in greeting, and was definitely familiar with the growl where he was objecting to either Mission or Jen doing something foolhardy. That one is altogether too common, I thought wryly. And I know just how he feels.

::Stars, this is huge. And not empty.:: I heard the click of Jen’s communicator turning off, and frowned. The green dot was moving fast through the large area, and it blinked ominously at me.

::Did she just turn the comm off?:: Canderous barked through the console’s speakers. ::While I’m left to play count-the-rocks with the kid?:

“Jen?” I said sharply. “Are you there?”

::I ain’t gonna wait around here while she’s gone silent.::

Another click was audible through the speakers, before Jen’s voice followed it. ::I’m out of the cavern. That was a good sized nest of shyracks just there.::

“Don’t turn the comm off, Jen,” I ordered. “Two seconds of silence and Ordo was about to go charging in like a hero.”

::Do you really need to hear me slaughtering bats, guys?: Even through the static, her voice was amused.

::Statement: I cannot keep track of your kills without auditory input, master.:;

::Keep the damn thing turned on,: Canderous’ frustrated voice shot back, for once in agreement with me. ::We need to know what’s going on in there.:;

::Listen to the old geezer, Jen. We wanna know what’s happening, alright?: My brows shot up at Mission’s address, but Canderous just loosed a laugh. It wasn’t that long ago when he’d have threatened to knock her head against the wall for calling him that. I wasn’t sure if the Mandalorian had mellowed during the time we’d spent together, or if he simply enjoyed some camaraderie with the young Twi’lek. While I could never see him and me bonding over a drink, I had to admit his muscle was useful. And it was nice to see him treating someone other than Jen with more than just casual disgust. Because frankly, I was getting sick of the way he kept leering at her.

::Okay guys, okay.,:: Jen conceded. ::Look, the terentateks are getting closer now, and I’m still heading west. I think it’s time for you to enter. Turn north as soon as you can.:::

The others assented, and I leaned forward to study the possible directions they could take. There were a couple of tunnels that arced north near the entrance before heading into the unknown. It seemed the obvious route.

“Keep your eye on the bio-scanner, Mission,” I warned, even though I knew she would.

::Got it!::

::Statement: My internal biological scanners have a more precise location and a longer range than the sub-standard Czerka Tech personal bio-scanner that Gizka Spawn is ineptly wielding.:::

::Oh, shut it, you greasy piece of droid-rot.:::

I heard a muffled snort of amusement that I assumed came from Jen before everyone lapsed into a silence that echoed through the cockpit, broken occasionally by a patch of static. Jen was moving deeper into a long passage, one of the well-used routes towards the outpost. I could see the others entering the subterranean caves at a much slower pace, and felt my thoughts drifting once more. Towards Dustil. Towards Jen. Waiting behind while the others struck ahead to find the Star Map was hard. Waiting for Jen to have time to extract Dustil was even worse.

I thought I understood her better, now, ever since I’d learned the awful truth of Deralia. And yet, I wasn’t the one that had lived through it, for all that she had blacked it out. But I’d seen the effects of torture before, torture at the hands of the Sith. Talvon Esan, one of the shining heroes from Revan’s Guard of Twelve, had been the first of the Jedi to turn Dark. I had a sick feeling in my gut whenever I thought of him, for I’d known him well, once. He, along with Saul Karath, had commanded the defence at Serroco against the Mandalorian advance.

But then, after Malachor, Talvon had turned into one of the most insanely vicious Dark Jedi that fought under Darth Revan’s banner. I’d heard it was Darth Revan herself who put an end to him, suggesting that he was too bat crazy even for the Sith. My mouth twisted. Talvon had made a game of torturing captured soldiers just for fun, and some of the rescued had been men and women I’d known well. Some had never recovered, and all bore the scars from that insane piece of scum. And to think that Jen must have suffered the same, from Darth Revan or one of her underlings. It made me viciously glad that Bastila’s strike team had put an end to that monster.

People have different ways of coping. I knew that, I understood why memory loss could happen after trauma. But damn it, Bastila had to come clean to Jen, if she hadn’t already. Jen was floundering along, using the Force without any memory of her past as a Jedi, and back on Tatooine that had been a disaster waiting to happen.

Not so much now, though. I had to admit that. Here, on this twisted planet, Jen was coming into her own. I’d noticed.

::Yuck. This place smells awful.,:: Mission complained. ::It’s like that horrible taste to the air outside, but worse.:::

::Keep your eyes on the ‘scanner, kid.:::

::Yeah, yeah. There’s nothing up ahead, or I woulda told ya.:::
As expected, they’d turned north, inching toward uncharted blackness. There was a stillness over us all for some time, a dearth of noise broken only by the occasional background cough or footstep that made it through the communicator. We had no real way of telling how long these caves ran, so they were all equipped with extra food and water. Mission had found some information that suggested the old Academy was not more than a few hours trek, but that was from the diary of a Sith bounty hunter who’d been tracking a runaway Miraluka, and hadn’t sounded the most accurate source.

::Observation: Three life-forms detected within the next chamber. Probable Identification: shyracks.::

::Yeah, I got three blips, too,: Mission said. ::Small, and up about ten metres high.::

I tensed. Three shyracks wouldn’t pose a threat, but even so, it was hard not to worry when I was the one sitting uselessly several klicks away. There was silence over the comm, cut through by the occasional patch of static, before it was broken by the sharp sound of blaster fire.

::Observation: That’s two kills to HK-47, and one to Geriatric Blockhead.::

::What did you call me, you rust-covered tin-::

::Guys, there’s another thing coming this way, it’s bigger and low down. It’s moving fast!::

Blasts crackled through the comm again, and my eyes remained fixed on the green dots. Jen was still advancing west at a rapid pace, but the other three remained stationary.

::Ew! What is that?: Even through the ship’s speakers, Mission’s voice sounded horrified.

::Explanation: Commonly - - - - as a tuk’ata, they are essentially over-sized - - - - unique to Korriban and usually travel in packs.: There was a patch of static as HK’s tinny modulator lost transmission over the link.

::Well, that’s - - - - count for at least three bats, circuit brain. That means I’m beating you,: Canderous drawled.

::Conjecture: A life is a life, meatbag. Current count is HK-47: 3, Geriatric Blockhead: 2,: HK’s inflection sounded indignant, for a droid.

I heard a derisive snort that could only be Mandalorian. ::Hey tin- - - - I just squashed about a dozen bug-ants with my boot. Must be beating you twenty to three::

::Observation: This area is devoid of life, insectoid or otherwise. Your mathematical skill is as accurate as your foot::

::HK,: Jen’s voice cut through the squabble. She sounded amused. ::Quit picking a fight with the Mandalorian before he orders you to shoot yourself::

::Statement: He - - - - master. I cannot - - - -::

::Guys, - - - - scanner. There’s five of - - - -::

“You’re breaking up,” I said in alarm. “Canderous, copy?”

:: - - - -: The three dots that represented Mission, Canderous and HK-47 flickered on the console. Stang! I hadn’t expected interference to disrupt the comms, not with the specifications I’d seen from the ‘Hawk’s central computer, but they were under a lot of rock. My fists clenched as my unease grew, and I wondered if they’d double-back to regain contact or forge forward into the unknown.

::Sithspit:: Jen’s voice, still clear, had risen in pitch. ::They’re closer and faster than I thought::

::---:: The three dots disappeared from the map entirely, and with a sense of mounting horror I swung my gaze back to Jen’s marker, comprehending her comment. She was near the edges of a huge cavern with a sweeping exit from the north, the eastern tunnel she’d come from, and a short nook to the west.

“Jen,” I said urgently. “That’s a dead-end. Double-back, there’s no way out other than towards the terentateks.”

::I can see an exit up ahead::

And then I heard it. A vicious, alien roar that screeched through the speakers and sent chills down my spine.

“Jen, that doesn’t go anywhere! Get out of there!” But she didn’t listen. And the fear grew in my gut as she went deeper still into the cavern, the snarling sounds of a beast breaking into distortion through the cockpit. That reckless woman! Why doesn’t she turn around? Her marker swung to the side of the cavern, before shooting into the dead-end with faster speed than I’d seen yet.

“Jen!” I gasped, my mind filled with the horrifying vision of her body being slammed around by a poisonous claw. Another loud roar crackled through the internal speakers, and I was rocked back with the devastating thought of Jen being hurt. “Jen!”

The green dot blinked, unmoving, just within the dead-end that couldn’t be more than five metres deep. Long enough for a terentatek’s claw? Or had a deadly swipe propelled her in there, unconscious or worse? “Jen!” I screamed.

::I’m here:: she gasped. ::They can’t reach me::

Her voice, breathless but otherwise fine, had an immediate affect on my fear. The loud pounding in my ears slowly receded as relief took its place. I breathed in a deep, calming breath. “There’s no exit there, Jen!” I exclaimed. “Blast it, you’re trapped!”

::I know::

I stared at the console in silence for a moment, half aware that my jaw had dropped, willing my heart to return to normal. And then, my fear flipped straight into anger. “Why- why didn’t you listen? You reckless, crazy idiot! Why didn’t you turn around?”

And all the while, the howling grunts and roars of those venomous monsters were radiating through to my ears.

::One ran in behind me. It caught me by surprise, it moved so frelling quick. Either my Force sense is shaky, or they’ve been holding back their speed until now::

The way she said it, it was like crediting them with intelligence. More likely they’d been overcome with bloodlust at a potential meal.

“How much room do you have there?” I demanded, and realized my fists were still clenched. With effort, I unfurled them. “Are you safe?”
“Yeah, I’m not taking any chances here. I won’t move until they’ve cleared out.”

“If they clear out,” I muttered, still feeling tense. The others hadn’t reappeared on the map, and Jen was trapped. Completely trapped. Juhani hadn’t returned from the Academy, and Bastila was still out cold. My eyes closed briefly.

::Can you check on Bastila?:: Jen asked, reading my mind, her voice cutting out against a backdrop of snarling that made me grit my teeth. ::I could do with her advice, if she’s up to it.::

I assented and stood, pulling my head through the hatch. Zaalbar was still there, standing guard. His expression looked oddly blank, and he didn’t seem to notice me until I spoke.

“Any stirring from Bastila yet?” I asked. Zaalbar jerked to look at me, and howled. I grimaced, and once more made an internal promise to learn his language. “Have you checked on her recently? Jen wants her counsel.”

Zaalbar howled again, louder, and motioned me away. The damn Wookiee actually looked angry.

“Okay, okay,” I muttered in exasperation. “We’ll let her sleep some more. Keep an eye out for the new Jedi waking up, okay? Don’t scare her.”

Zaalbar had already turned back, staring fixedly at the opposite wall as he stood outside Bastila’s door.

I frowned. I guess Wookiees take guard duty seriously. That’s a good thing. Zaalbar was pretty intense about his life-debt to Jen as well.

Back in the cockpit, I sat down and took a drink of my caffa. It was stone cold, hours-old, and the taste turned bitter on my tongue. I had another sip anyway, before once more talking to Jen.

“Bastila’s still out. Zaalbar’s keeping an eye on her.”

::Yeah,: Jen sighed. ::I guess I knew that. She’s really deeply asleep, Carth... she did some pretty powerful Force work when we were in Hord’s tomb. I’m worried she’s taken a step back in her recovery.::

I stared at the lone green dot that was Jen, a small smile appearing on my face. Jen had come so far. She used to strongly dislike Bastila, and the feeling had been returned in some fashion by the Jedi. Maybe Bastila had come a long way, too.

Another alien snarl sounded over the comm. “Worry about yourself first, Jen. Stay focused on your environment.”

::I’m fine, Carth, they can’t get in here:::

We lapsed into a quiet that stretched out for minutes, interspersed with the occasional predatory roar that shook the speakers. Jen stayed unmoving, tight against the dead-end cave that must have only afforded her a metre or two of safety from their reach. My eyes kept flicking back to where the others would be, off the map and in the black. There was no sign of their presence, and I knew they were forging ahead. I sent an inward plea for safety their way, and wondered again at the necessity of sending Mission out with them.

After a lengthy silence, Jen spoke. ::Carth, I wanted to talk to you:::

“Fire away,” I replied. Actually, there were about a dozen things I wanted to grill her on, too.
“What better time than when you’re trapped by a couple of poisonous monsters?”

::Hah:: There was silence over the comm again, like she was steeling herself to say something. I was about to prompt her when she finally voiced what was on her mind. ::Look, Carth, I ran into Dustil. Earlier, when I was looking for Juhani::

I froze.

::He’s… he’s very angry, Carth. I think he’s done some… bad things::

I could feel my shoulders tensing, as an irrational urge to snap back rose in my throat. Dustil had been a good kid – studious and friendly, if a bit quiet. The worst he’d ever done was sneak out to ride swoops, and heck, I’d been the galaxy’s biggest hypocrite scolding him for that after Morgana’s insistence. Although from what I heard he was actually proficient at it. I’d never been better than mediocre, the times I’d snuck out.

“We’ve all done bad things, Jen,” I answered finally, trying not to lash out. “Yourself included.”

::Carth, I’m not judging:: She gave a laugh, a slightly surprised sound. ::Stars, no. No. I’m warning you::

“Warning?” I frowned. “What do you mean? He’ll- he won’t-”

::Carth, you’re such a:: She sighed. ::You’re a nice guy. I don’t think you understand::

“Nice,” I said flatly, cutting her off. I felt my brows lowering. Nice? Nice? Was that really what she thought of me? A nice guy, someone to trust and think of like a brother, someone dependable and boring and-

Why was that bothering me so much?

I scowled. “Dammit, Jen, I’ve been fighting on the frontlines for most of my life. If you think I haven’t seen and done my share of questionable-”

::Carth!:: She cut in, and I could hear her frustration. ::I didn’t mean- look, it’s the Dark side, alright? Give me a chance to explain::

I forced the glower from my face. “Fine. Go for it.”

I found myself staring fixedly at the green dot of her wrist-communicator, wondering how she was really doing, cooped up in a dark, cramped dead-end with nightmarish monsters guarding the outside. I realized, then, that I hadn’t heard any background noise from the terentateks for some time.

::Look, Korriban is so steeped in the Dark Side:: she said finally. ::I don’t know how to explain it, just… think of those awful thoughts you have, deep down, the ones you’re ashamed of. The ones you hide in the deepest part of your mind, and curse yourself whenever you think of them. Korriban drags them to the surface. The Dark Side pulls them out of you. Promises you everything you desire. That annoying comrade who always makes you look like an idiot in front of others? There’s an easy way to deal with that, and no one will ever know it was you:: She sighed. ::What about the superior who never gives you enough credit? A mind trick or two, and his opinion will change. And at first, it doesn’t hurt anyone, not really. At first it starts small::

I wished she was here, telling me this. I needed to see her face. She sounded so melancholy.
There’s power, too, and why shouldn’t other people listen to you if you’re stronger than them? And then you start doubting others and their motives… for you can’t trust anyone, and no one can trust you. She barked a laugh, cold and hard as ferracrystal.

::Kids like Dustil, going to Korriban off the back of a tragedy like Telos… they don’t have a damn chance, Carth.::

And that was the Dark Side, the cursed Dark Side that Jedi like Jen had to face every day. “What did he do, Jen?” I asked quietly.

She was silent for the longest time. I couldn’t hear anything over the comm, no snuffling or snarling from nearby terentateks, no static, nothing. Finally, she spoke. ::Betrayal. Torture. Stuff he doesn’t think he can be forgiven for. When we get him back, you’ve got to be his unconditional supporter, Carth. There’ll be enough judgment elsewhere.::

I had no return for that, so I sat there, staring at the green dot while my stomach clenched itself in knots. Torture. The very thought of my boy involved in something like that was beyond abhorrent. It didn’t… it didn’t seem possible. Could the Dark Side really twist my son like that?

I thought of Jen, scuttling the Ebon Hawk to run. Juhani had thought Jen had run from the Dark Side. I wondered if she ran to it, before the Dark Side had scared her so badly she’d turned straight back to the Light. One day soon I planned on getting it out of her.

And what about the real villains? Revan and Malak? Talvon Esan? I’d known Talvon well, and he went completely insane. Sadistically insane. That’s what the flipside of the Force does. And my son has to fight it.

I glared at the green dot on the console, suddenly angry that Jen doubted my capacity for supporting Dustil. Of course I’d forgive Dustil anything. He was my blasted son. But… this was part of his life now, the Force and its Light and Dark Sides. And that meant it was part of mine.

And Dustil was, by all accounts, a powerful Force-user. I’d heard those sorts of things usually ran in families, which was… puzzling, in our case. As far as I knew, none of my recent ancestors had any Force sensitivity. Morgana’s family was more of a mystery, however.

I frowned, trying to recall what I knew of Morgana’s past. She’d always been so reticent to talk about it, having been adopted by a Telosian ryee-corn farmer after her parents perished in a freak agri-equipment malfunction. I knew they’d fled to Telos shortly before Morgana’s birth, and had never quite slotted into our farming community. Morgana remembered little of her parents, or even what they had been running from – but she claimed they had been Telosian, originally.

It must have come from her side, then. Morgana was a free-spirited sort, quick with a snappy comeback, and generally content with her lot. She hadn’t wanted to move to Thani, the capital city. And how we’d argued about that, bitterly, even after she capitulated. I’d joined the Fleet young, and I wanted them nearby so they could visit when I was on base.

She never did, though. She never let Dustil either. Stang, we’d even had an impromptu midsummer party on base, where all the families of grounded Fleet personnel had been invited, to meet the famous Malak Devari when his armada docked briefly on Telos. Morgana never made it, and refused to let Dustil go with me – even though he was old enough, then, to be following the heroes in the Mandalorian Wars.

I stilled, trying to remember when I’d come across Jedi on my homeworld. Karath had worked closely with Talvon, and there’d been times Talvon had landed on Telos. Had Morgana ever encountered any Jedi? She’d always held an irrational dislike of them, and it ran deeper than the distrust that I had, that was fairly standard throughout the Fleet. I’d always put it down to her negative outlook on the Republic in general, due to the growing schism it was causing in our family. But maybe, there was something else there.

I shivered, cold suddenly. It didn’t seem possible. If there was any truth to the speculation that had started growing in my mind, then Morgana would have shared it with me. I’m really getting paranoid, now. Morgana had been my wife; my beautiful, sassy, impetuous wife. I suddenly felt disgusted with myself for thinking that she’d hold such a secret back.

::Carth? You still there?::

“Yeah,” I sighed, drawing my attention back to Jen. “I’ll have Dustil’s back, Jen. I always will.”

::Good.:: She paused. ::Both terentateks are well gone now. I’m surprised they left so quickly. I’m going to lure them back – I can’t risk them finding the others.::

“Be caref.”

There was a howl from behind, from beyond the cockpit, followed by a female scream of terror.

“Stang!” I cursed, jumping up to investigate.

Through the hatch, the stranger Belaya Linn was pushing herself back against the durasteel wall, hands resting against the pressure band I’d wrapped around her torso, panic evident on her pale, drawn face. The kolto injections would have stabilized and revived her somewhat, but I was surprised she was up and moving. Even with the support of the restraint, she would be in some discomfort.

Zaalbar was almost… snarling.

“Zaalbar!” I snapped, my brows lowering.

He was still standing outside the pilot’s quarters, and it looked like Belaya may have tried to walk past. Zaalbar turned at my voice, nodded, and then resumed his earlier position. His hairy face was composed; blank. Maybe I’d imagined that look of anger. Zaalbar stood towering in the corridor, his arms crossed and his head brushing the durasteel ceiling, as he stared fixedly ahead at the opposite bulkhead.

“Zaalbar, are you okay?” I asked frowning. The Wookiee looked at me, howled mournfully, and then snapped back to attention.

The sounds of harsh breathing directed my gaze back to the stranger. Her blue eyes were wide and fixed on the Wookiee in fright. Her light brown hair was damp with sweat, clinging to the sides of her neck, and her complexion was sallow.

"Belaya Linn," I said quietly. Her head jerked to meet my gaze, face tightening in panic. I knew, then, the she’d run – if she only knew where to go. Last thing Belaya Linn remembers is probably that torture chamber Jen found her in, and now she's woken on a strange ship with a seven foot Wookiee snarling at her. I felt a deep surge of empathy for the human woman, and lifted a hand, palm open, in appeasement. "My name is Carth Onasi. I'm a captain with the Republic Fleet, and you are safe here."

Belaya's chest was rising with fast, shallow breaths, and her gaze darted back to Zaalbar. I grimaced. “That’s Zaalbar. He’s harmless, really, he just takes his guard duty seriously. Look – come into the cockpit, please. You can talk to Jen there.”
Some of the fear was fading from her face, but the unknown Jedi still looked wary as her scrutiny swung back to me. “Who?” she asked, her voice so reticent I barely heard it.

“Jen,” I said again. “Jen Sahara. She brought you here, do you remember?”

But Belaya looked blank.

“Tall human, about your age?” I prompted. She was still staring at me in puzzlement. “Dark hair, green eyes, good looking?” I frowned. “Doesn’t take anything seriously?”

At that, a flicker of recognition lightened her drawn face, and I motioned her to follow, feeling uneasy at being away from the comm for so long. Belaya sidled along the corridor wall, attention flicking back to the Wookiee who was no longer looking at either of us. Zaalbar was acting odd. I knew he hated being left behind, especially if it was Mission or Jen heading out – and now that it was both... well, it probably explained his mood.

I opened the hatch, and Belaya hesitantly followed me in, her palms still held tight against her ribs. The pressure band would help some, and fortunately her rib fractures were aligned correctly, but she’d have to take it easy for awhile. And I knew it was uncomfortable to breathe in those torso bands, for all that they supported the abdomen.

When Bastila wakes up, she can heal Belaya. I recalled snapping at Bastila, once, when she’d inflicted Force healing on me without checking first. Maybe I’d been a little unfair.

Bastila hasn't exactly had an easy time of it. No, and Jen'd had it even worse. Bastila had said that the Jedi never expected Jen to have the Force again. They’d never expected her to recover any memory of her past as a Jedi. Jen must have been so shocked, so utterly stupefied, when things started trickling back to her. Back on the Endar Spire, she'd been quiet and studious, hiding away from everyone like a frightened little hood-mouse. My mouth quirked as I recalled how she'd blushed the one time I'd looked her way.

Was that who Jen Sahara was, before she joined the Jedi? A meek scholar whose life was upended by the Force? I could accept that the Force might entirely change the course of a sentient’s life, but still... it was hard to imagine Jen as once being so utterly different in personality.

Belaya was standing awkwardly behind me. She shook her head at the proffered co-pilot chair, silently indicating her ribs as a reason, and I bit back a sigh. Stang, she’s quieter than Juhani. Belaya was probably, also, incredibly confused.

A vicious snarl ripped from the speakers, and Belaya jumped.

“Jen? You there?” I asked sharply. The green dot was moving at speed through the same cavern as earlier, making a beeline for the same dead-end. Distortion spat through the comm, and once more, I felt myself tensing.

::Yeah,: Jen gasped through the comm, as her marker stilled in the nook. ::Lured ‘em back. I’d be happier if the others would get in touch, Carth. I don’t like doing this blind.::

“You’re not the one left behind,” I muttered, too soft to carry through the comm. Belaya huffed, and when I glanced her way, the Jedi was frowning in puzzlement.

“Who is Jen?” she asked. The speakers rattled with another alien roar, and Belaya flinched.

“Uh-” I turned back to the comm. “Jen, Belaya’s awake and standing behind me. She doesn’t seem to know who you are.”
Belaya's expression had smoothed into a surprisingly good attempt at composure. "I am okay, Jen Sahara. Very confused about my current environment, but otherwise I am okay."

"It's a long story. We're trying to find something in the mountains."

"Terentateks," Belaya whispered, eyes wide. "You really are the strangest Jedi I have ever met."

I laughed at that. "Yeah, she is. She really is."

"Hey! Jen's voice was mock-indignant. There was another spat of distortion from the speakers, but it didn't come from Jen this time.

"Canderous?" I said sharply. "Can you copy?"

Mission's voice, crackly with interference, rang through the cockpit, and I felt a smile of relief grow on my face. "Hey, wow, this school must be closer to the surface if you lot can hear us again."

"Statement: Master, we have achieved your objective. Permission to return to your side?"

"HK, you're staying with Canderous until we're all out," Jen returned. "Hang on – have you guys found it?"

"Don't start partying just yet, Jen." Canderous warned. Belaya had moved a step closer, next to me, looking at the console in curiosity. Her expression was quietly intent. "We're near the entrance of what the kid reckons must be the school."

"It's got the word 'Academy' engraved on it, chuba-brain!"
“The Map,” I cut in. “Have you guys found the Map?”

::Yeah, it’s outside a half-broken tomb.::

::Yes!:: Jen crowed. ::Download the data, and move out!::

::That’s the problem, Jen,:: Canderous shot back. ::We’ve spent the last ten minutes trying to open this kriffing thing with no success.::

::Statement: The Star Map does not respond to sonic stimulation, percussion maintenance, or electrical current. There is no apparent mechanism on it that can be manipulated. Supposition: As it is considered a Dark Force relic, perhaps an organic sacrifice is the trigger?::

::I’ll try a mechanical sacrifice first, robot-brain.::

I frowned. “Well, what happened with the other Maps, Canderous? How did they open?”

::It wasn’t me, Republic. Bastila triggered the one on Tatooine, and the Cathar got the one in the ocean.::

I heard a noise behind me; I’d almost forgotten Belaya was listening in. Her brows had lowered, and she was staring at me in confusion. “Bastila?” she asked blankly. “Not- not Bastila Shan?”

::Oh sithspit!:: Jen snarled. ::Sod it all! Bastila frelling told me, and I didn’t understand!::

“Did he- did he say there was a Cathar?” Belaya asked, voice rising in pitch.

::What do you mean, Jen?:: Mission asked.

Jen heaved an angry sigh. ::Bastila told me we’d need a Force-user going after the Map. I assumed it was to draw the terentateks away, but she probably hadn’t even heard the plan.::

A cold shiver ran through me as I understood exactly what Jen was saying. The Star Maps were Force relics, after all. I felt the dread as it slowly grew in the pit of my belly.

“It opens with the Force,” I said quietly. “You need a Force user to open the Map.”

::Yeah.::

xXx
Targeting: Fugitive

- HK-47 -

Input – Mission Vao to Jen Sahara: “Jen, d’ya mean you’ve got to come here?”
Voice Stress Analysis: Shocked

Input (Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device) – Jen Sahara: “I’m… open to suggestions.”

Input (Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device) – Carth Onasi: “No way, sister. You start heading north and the terentateks will follow. At best you’ll be trapped, and at worst you’ll be dead.”

Closer Optical Examination of Environment:

Location: Shyrack Caves, Ten Klicks North-West From Ebon Hawk

Visual Identification Of Current Environment (Infra Red):
…Broken Wall Located To North
…Unopened Sarcophagus Located To West
…Metallic Relic Located To West:
Identification: Star Map (Assumption: Force Relic)

Primary Objective: Activate Star Map
…Factor: No Apparent Opening Mechanism
…Factor: No Effect From Sonic Transmission
…Factor: No Effect From Electrical Transmission
…Factor: No Effect From Percussion Transmission (Boot Of Canderous Ordo)
Conclusion: Force Power Required. Out Of Range Of Capabilities

Analyzing…
…Relic Origins: Unknown
…Metal Composite: Unknown

Searching Internal Database …Database Hit: Marka Ragnos: Force Relic Activation

Output: “Reiteration: Organic sacrifices have been known to quicken Dark Force artefacts, master. Reference: My internal database has a notation regarding a Force-powered golem used by the Sith Lord Marka Ragnos that quickened with the feeding of sentient blood.”

Input (Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device) – Jen Sahara: “HK! Some other suggestion!”
Voice Stress Analysis: Annoyed

Input – Mission Vao: “Sheesh, HK, would you quit it already?”
Auditory Input: Amused Snort
Input \textit{(Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device)} – Unknown Voice: “You need another Force-user in the caves. Someone said- someone said Bastila Shan – is she about?”
Voice Stress Analysis: Confused

Auditory Analysis: Source: Unknown Voice
…Gender: Female
…Age: Range: 26-33 Galactic Standard Years
Assigned Temporary Name: Addled Fleshbag

Input – Canderous Ordo: “That the new Jedi, huh? Belaya, was it?”

Permanent Name Assigned: Belaya to Addled Fleshbag

Input \textit{(Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device)} – Carth Onasi: “Bastila’s temporarily out of commission and Juhani’s still at the Academy. We’ve got to find some other way that doesn’t involve Jen taking on terentateks!”
Voice Stress Analysis: Frustrated

Input – Canderous Ordo: “Don’t suppose you’re up for a trip down here, Belaya?”

Input \textit{(Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device)} – Belaya: “What… did you say Juhani?”
Voice Stress Analysis: Shocked

Input \textit{(Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device)} – Jen Sahara: “Not with broken ribs, Canderous. Belaya should still be resting.”

Input \textit{(Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device)} – Belaya: “Juhani?”
Voice Stress Analysis: Stunned

Input \textit{(Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device)} – Carth Onasi: “Are you alright, Belaya? Do you… do you know Juhani?”

Auditory Input: Surprised Gasp …Source: Jen Sahara

Input \textit{(Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device)} – Jen Sahara: “Belaya Linn! Now I know where I’ve heard your name before!”
Voice Stress Analysis: Surprised

Permanent Name Modified: Belaya Linn to Belaya

Input \textit{(Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device)} – Belaya Linn: “No… no I cannot believe this.”
Voice Stress Analysis: Disbelieving

Output: “Statement: We are deviating from our primary objective with all this meatbag waffling, master.”

Input – Mission Vao: “What’s your problem with meatbags anyway, HK?”
Output: “Statement: I just don’t like organic meatbags. Except for the master, of course. Ha ha.”

Input \textit{(Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device)} – Jen Sahara: “Belaya, do you know Dak as well? He and Juhani spoke of you. What… what were you doing at the Academy?”

Input (Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device) – Belaya Linn: “Dak? No... no this is some sort of trap… this is just like that monster Dustil tricking me again!”
Voice Stress Analysis: Hysterical

Output: “Observation: Addled Fleshbag Meatbag is sinking into hysteria, Master. You organic meatbags are so mentally fragile.”

Auditory Sensors Tracking: Scuffling Noise Detected

Input (Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device) – Carth Onasi: “Dustil?”
Voice Stress Analysis: Confused

Biological Sensors Tracking: One Unknown Life-form in Targeting Area

Analyzing…
… Match: Probable Humanoid Shape
… Distance: Ten Metres Behind Crumbling Wall

Input – Mission Vao: “Far out, guys, who is this Dustil fella you keep talking about?”

Physical: Primary Blaster Primed
Physical: Moving to Wall

Input (Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device) – Belaya Linn: “I will not stay here to be betrayed again!”
Voice Stress Analysis: Hysterical

Optical Sensors Focussing on Unknown Threat

Input (Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device) – Carth Onasi: “Belaya, what did… what, what happened?”

Audio/Visual Tracking: Canderous Ordo Flanking HK-47

Input (Whispered) – Canderous Ordo: “What’s up, robot-brain?”

Input (Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device) – Jen Sahara: “Belaya, listen to me. Juhani is one of our crew. This is no trap, she’s just gone back to the sodding Academy to try and talk some sense into Dak.”

Physical: Breaching Wall

Optical Sensors Focusing On Organic Meatbag: Target Analysis:
Species: Human, Female
Facial Recognition Result: Negative
Body Language Analysis: Shocked – Determined - Wary Direct Threat Assessment: Moderate
Visual Analysis: Torn Bloodied Clothing, Gaunt, Dirty Appearance
Analysis: Organic Meatbag Has Been Here For Days
Temporary Name Assigned: Fetid Cave-Dweller

Input – Canderous Ordo to Fetid Cave Dweller: “Hands up where I can see ‘em, stranger!”
Target Lock: Fetid Cave-Dweller

Initiating Combat...
Hidden User Defined Sub-Routine Activated: Master Command Required
…Constraint: Obey Orders Of Canderous Ordo (Temporary Master) Until Reunited With Jen Sahara (Current Master) Attempting Safety Override...
...Factor: Active Order To Hold Fire From Canderous Ordo (Temporary Master)
...Factor: Fetid Cave-Dweller Is A Moderate Direct Threat To Safety Of Canderous Ordo (Temporary Master)
Override Failed
Exiting Combat Mode

Output: “Statement: I am ready to fire at your command, Geriatric Blockhead.”

Input (Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device) – Carth Onasi: “Belaya, come back!”

Input – Fetid Cave-Dweller: “Put your toys away! If I meant you harm, you would have already felt it.”
Voice Stress Analysis: Hostile

Input – Canderous Ordo: “Bold words for someone who’s got two blasters pointed at her head. What the kriff are you doing here?”

Input – Fetid Cave-Dweller: “Looking for a way out, same as you I’d wager.”

Auditory Input: Derisive Snort
...Source: Canderous Ordo

Output: “Observation: Judging by your attire, Fetid Cave-Dweller, you success has been limited.”

Input – Fetid Cave-Dweller: “I mean it, point those things away!”
Voice Stress Analysis: Angry

Analyzing…
…Factor: Fetid Cave-Dweller Does Not Fear Imminent Death
…Factor: Body Language Analysis States Fetid Cave-Dweller Ready to Fight
Conclusion: Fetid Cave-Dweller Has Additional Unknown Weapons Or Advantage

Modification: Direct Threat Assessment: High

Physical: C-22 Flame Carbine Powered On Target Lock Continued: Fetid Cave-Dweller

Input (Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device) – Jen Sahara: “Who’s that?”

Input – Mission Vao: “Sheesh, guys, calm down okay? I bet she’ll be happy to get out of here with us if you just put your guns down.”

Input – Fetid Cave-Dweller: “I’d listen to the Twi’lek, if I were you.”
Voice Stress Analysis: Belligerent

Input – Canderous Ordo: “You haven’t answered my question. What are you doing here?”
Input – Mission Vao: “Look, don’t worry about them. I’m Mission, by the way. That old geezer is Canderous, and the psycho droid is HK. Sheesh, Jen, can you tell HK to put his weapons away?”

Input – Fetid Cave-Dweller: “You can call me May. How the frakk did you avoid the terentateks?”

Permanent Name Assigned: May to Fetid Cave-Dweller

Input – Mission Vao: “They leave non Force users alone, right?”

Input – May: “This deep in the caves they go after anything that breathes. Which won’t include you lot, if you haven’t put those weapons away in five seconds.”

Input (Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device) – Jen Sahara: “May, is it?”

Input – May: “Four seconds.”

Input (Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device) – Jen Sahara (Mando’a): “Beware, she’s a Force User.”

Modification: Direct Threat Assessment: Severe
Analysis: Force-Sensitives Attract Terentateks
Indirect Threat Assessment: Severe

Input – Mission Vao: “Don’t be stupid, you guys, put your guns down!”

Physical: FC-1 Flechette Launcher Loaded
Target Lock Continued: Fetid Cave-Dweller

Input – May: “Three seconds.”

Initiating Combat...
Hidden User Defined Sub-Routine Activated: Master Command Required Attempting Safety Override...
...Factor: Active Order To Hold Fire From Canderous Ordo (Temporary Master)
...Factor: May Is A Severe Direct Threat To Safety Of Canderous Ordo (Temporary Master)
...Factor: May Is A Severe Indirect Threat To Safety Of Canderous Ordo (Temporary Master)
...Factor: Force User Required To Activate Star Map
Override Successful (Conditional)

Physical: Kamino Saberdart Readied
Target Lock Continued: Fetid Cave-Dweller
Physical: Firing Kamino Saberdart

Visual Tracking: May Collapsing To Ground

Input – May: (Indistinct Scream)

Input – Canderous Ordo (Mando’a): “Damn!”

Input – Mission Vao: (Scream)

Input (Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device) – Jen Sahara: “What’s going on?”

Output: “Statement: Severe Direct Threat Has Been Neutralized, Master.”

Input – Mission Vao: “You… you killed her! You insane, awful, monster!”
Voice Stress Analysis: Hysterical

Input (Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device) – Jen Sahara: “HK, stand down! That’s an order!”
Voice Stress Analysis: Furious

Output: “Assertion: May has been neutralized, not eliminated.”

Input (Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device) – Jen Sahara: “What did you do, HK?”
Voice Stress Analysis: Furious

Visual Tracking: Canderous Ordo Moving To Examine May

Sensor Scan:
Target: May
…Location: Lying Immobile Cavern Floor
…Physical Analysis: Injected With Foraxyn-4 Loaded Saberdarts. No Further Signs Of Physical Distress
…Body Language Analysis: Unresponsive. Chest Rising In Accordance With Normal Breathing Patterns. No Further Signs Of Physical Distress
…Infra-Red Analysis: Body Temperature Falls Within Range Of Normal Human Parameters Conclusion: May Is Unconscious But Healthy
Conclusion: Severe Direct Threat Nullified

Output: “Statement: I classified Fetid Cave-Dweller as a severe direct and indirect threat to the survival of Canderous Ordo, master.”

Input – Mission Vao: “She’s… she’s not dead?”

Input (Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device) – Jen Sahara (muttered): “Sun and stars.”

Output: “Suggestion: Fetid Cave-Dweller will wake within a half hour unaided. Restraining her beforehand is a sensible course of action.”

Input – Mission Vao: “Yeah, ‘specially since you attacked her, you psycho heap of metal.”

Input (Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device) – Jen Sahara: “Okay, here’s what we’re going to do. Canderous, can you restrain her? Frelling sit on her for all I care. Put the comm right next to her face, and shoot her with an adrenastim. I need to talk to her with no one else interfering, you got that? And HK – remind me to re-program you.”

Output: “As you wish, Master.”

Hidden Subroutine Initiated: Order From Master: Set Reminder Regarding Reprogramming
…Factor: Re-programming May Hinder Primary Objectives
…Factor: Re-programming May Reduce Capabilities
…Analysis: Order From Master: Parameter Missing
Internal Clock: Reminder Set For 999999 Standard Days

Visual Tracking: Canderous Ordo Restraining May With Plysteel Rope

Input (Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device) – Jen Sahara: “Carth, Belaya, you guys there?”

Visual Tracking: Canderous Ordo Straddling May

Input – Canderous Ordo: “Say the word and I’ll inject her. Better sweet-talk her quick, Jen, ‘cause she ain’t gonna be happy when she wakes.”

Physical: Kamino Saberdart Readied Target Lock: May

Output: “Statement: Fetid Cave-Dweller is under target lock, Master.”

Input (Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device) – Jen Sahara: “Do it, Canderous.”

Visual Tracking: Canderous Ordo Injecting May With Adrenastim

Sensor Scan:
Target: May
…Location: Lying Immobile Cavern Floor
…Body Language Analysis: Stirring
Conclusion: May Is Waking

Auditory Input: Moan
…Source: May

Input – Canderous Ordo To May: “Don’t bother struggling, ain’t no way you’re getting up unless I let you up. Here, there’s someone who wants to talk to you.”

Auditory Input: Groan
…Source: May

Visual Tracking: May Struggling
Facial Analysis: (Source: May): Murderous

Input – May: “I’m gonna frakk you!”
Voice Stress Analysis: Hostile

Input (Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device) – Jen Sahara: “Thalia May, if you want to get out of here and off Korriban, you will listen to me very closely and not move a muscle.”
Voice Stress Analysis: Authoritative

Permanent Name Modified: Thalia May To May

Input – Thalia May: “And who the frakk are you?”

Visual Tracking: Thalia May Tensing

Input (Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device) – Jen Sahara: “A Force-user who can draw the terentateks away from you long enough to escape these caves.”

Input – Thalia May: “Frakk off!”
Voice Stress Analysis: Belligerent

Input (Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device) – Jen Sahara: “Calm the frell down and listen, Thalia. This is your chance to get out of here in one piece. I say again: I can draw the terentateks away from you, so you can escape the caves.”

Facial Analysis: (Source: Thalia May): Uncertain

Input – Thalia May: “Get that mercenary off me and we’ll talk.”

Input (Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device) – Jen Sahara: “Listen to me, Thalia. You hurt any of my crew, under any circumstances, and I will run to that damn forgotten Academy and gut you myself. And bring the terentateks with me. Are we clear?”

Input – Thalia May: “Clear as ferracrystal.”

Input (Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device) – Jen Sahara: “Canderous, move.”

Visual Tracking: Canderous Ordo Moving to Flank HK-47

Input – Thalia May: “So you’re the leader of this merry band of misfits, huh? A Force-user, and you know my name. You’re a Sith. You’re trying to lure me back to Uthar! I’d rather be killed than go back there!”
Voice Stress Analysis: Hostile

Input (Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device) – Jen Sahara: “I’m a Jedi Knight posing as an Initiate, Thalia. I probably landed here the day after you ran.”

Output: “Observation: Fetid Cave-Dweller looks ready to fight, master.”

Input (Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device) – Jen Sahara: “Thalia! We’ve promised Kel a way off Korriban!”

Input – Thalia May: “What?”

Input (Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device) – Jen Sahara: “Think, Thalia, would a Dark Jedi really send mercenaries after you? Sun and stars, everyone thinks you’re dead!”

Input – Thalia May: “I… frakk. I almost was dead. It was only luck that had those sithspawn terentateks eat my friends and not me. If… If what you say is true, then what the frakk are you doing here?”
Voice Stress Analysis: Wary

Input (Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device) – Jen Sahara: “We’re after a Force relic. Turns out it needs Force power to activate it. You help us, Thalia, and we’ll get you out of these caves. Stars, you can even join Kel if you want.”

Input – Canderous Ordo: “You gonna taken every kriffing wannabe with us, Jen? What, start a school of your own?”
Voice Stress Analysis: Disgusted

Output: “Statement: Travelling with Fetid Cave-Dweller would pose an unnecessary risk to both you and the organic meatbags you value so strangely, master.”

Input (Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device) – Jen Sahara: “Or you can make your own way out, Thalia. Regardless, we’ll get you to Dreshdae.”

Input – Thalia May: “And how do I know you won’t turn on me?”

Input (Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device) – Jen Sahara: “You need my help to get out of here, so I don’t see you have much choice. If you refuse to help us, then I’ll have to make my way to you to open the relic, and then I’ll really be pissed. Not to mention that I’ll likely have the terentateks in tow.”

Input (Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device) – Carth Onasi: “You are not heading towards those terentateks, Jen.”

Voice Stress Analysis: Pleased

Input (Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device) – Carth Onasi: “Yeah. I convinced Belaya to come back, she’s listening in. I… Well, we’ll talk later.”

Input (Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device) – Belaya Linn: “I am listening, for now.”

Input (Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device) – Jen Sahara: “Thalia, do we have a deal?”

Input – Thalia May: “Remove these restraints first, and then we’ll see.”

Input – Thalia May: “A Jedi Knight. Riight.”

Voice Stress Analysis: Sarcastic

Input (Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device) – Jen Sahara: “I never said I was a particularly good one.”

Voice Stress Analysis: Amused

Visual Tracking: Canderous Cutting Plysteel Rope

Visual Tracking: Thalia May Standing

Modification: Direct Threat Assessment: High

Input – Mission Vao: “So, you’re a runaway from that horrid school, huh? One thing I don’t get, though. How come those scary rancor things didn’t follow you here?”

Input – Thalia May: “I’m not sure. This place it… feels weird. In the Force, I mean. Terentateks are drawn to the Dark Side, but they won’t come in this cavern.”

Input – Mission Vao: “Well, this is the relic we need. Jen reckons it needs some sorta Force thing to open it.”

Visual Tracking: Thalia May Investigating Star Map (Assumption: Force Relic)

Visual Tracking: Thalia May Making Physical Contact With Star Map (Assumption: Force Relic)
Input: Electromagnetic Sensor: Electromagnetic Fluctuations Detected Within Star Map

Visual Tracking: Star Map Opening

Sensor Scan:
Target: Star Map
…Illumination: Galactic Navigational Map
Analyzing…
…Analysis: Unknown Routes Plotted
…Analysis: Several Planetary Systems Missing
Conclusion: Data Is Incomplete
…Analysis: Several Star Systems Misaligned: Error Margin Falls Between 0.001% - 0.0015%
Hypothesis 1: Star Map Contains Incorrect Data Hypothesis 2: Star Map Is Significantly Dated

Input – Mission Vao: “Whoa!”
Voice Stress Analysis: Awed

Testing Hypothesis #2:
…Analyzing: Plotting Course Of Star Systems: Orbits Match Reign Of Builders
Conclusion: Star Map Is Within 25,000 – 35,000 Galactic Years Old

Input – Canderous Ordo: “Download the data, kid, and get it to the ‘Hawk.”

Secondary Objective: Download Star Map Data Tertiary Objective: Transmit Star Map Data To Ebon Hawk
…Attempting Wireless Connection: Failed

Input – Mission Vao: “Onto it!”

Physical: Moving To Star Map
…Attempting Internal Connection: Succeeded
…Attempting Data Download: Initiated

Input – Mission Vao: “Hey HK, get out of there!”

Data Download Complete
Secondary Objective: Download Star Map Data: Complete

Output: “Statement: Certainly, Gizka Spawn.”

Physical: Disconnecting From Star Map.

Visual Tracking: Mission Vao Connecting Datapad to Star Map

Input – Mission Vao: “Alright, give me a few minutes to work this thing out, guys.”

Transmitting Data To Ebon Hawk: Initiated

Input – Mission Vao: “I think I got this started, but it may take awhile.”

Transmitting Data To Ebon Hawk: Complete
Tertiary Objective: Transmit Star Map Data To Ebon Hawk: Complete

Output: “Assertion: Star Map Data has already been transmitted to the Ebon Hawk.”
Primary Objective: Activate Star Map: Complete

Input (Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device) – Carth Onasi: “Uh, I’m getting the data through now. Looks like psycho droid’s right.”

Input – Mission Vao: “Huh.”
Voice Stress Analysis: Disgruntled

Internal Response: Satisfaction

Output: “Observation: You are not a droid, and therefore your skills are limited by the physical capabilities of your meatbag extremities. Or somesuch.”

Input (Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device) – Jen Sahara: “Have you got it all, Carth?”

Input (Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device) – Carth Onasi: “Yeah. Transmission Complete. Hang on, let me double-check… yeah, it’s all there. You’ve done it, guys!”
Voice Stress Analysis: Pleased

Input – Mission Vao: “Yeah!”
Voice Stress Analysis: Exuberant

Input – Canderous Ordo: “Now, we just need to get out of here.”

xXx
Flashpoint
- Jen Sahara / Ness Jonohl -

Harsh breath scraped through my lungs like sandpaper as I ran for all my worth, Force propelling my burning muscles as a nightmarish howl of fury reverberated around me. My ears rang and my heart pounded with the beat of fear as I realized that their speed was at least equal to my very best.

Get out, fool! My senses told me one was only metres behind, and this cavern stretched inordinately long. Salvation in the form of a narrowing tunnel lay just beyond. Jump!

I leapt high into the air, the Force spring-boarding me wildly forward just as a terentatek pounced with a resounding thud onto the hard, rocky cave floor underneath. The stagnant air whistled against my face as I sailed towards the exit, the granite walls narrowing as I flew ever closer, landing at last with a stumble, and smashing into the side wall.

A sharp burst of pain blossomed as my shoulder crunched into unyielding rock, and then everything went black.

…

“You’re okay, you’re okay,” a voice was murmuring by my ear, trailing gentle kisses along my neck. I was gasping, my eyes squeezed shut, as the adrenaline subsided and generic pain overrode it. I could feel his Force senses over me, checking me, touching me, probing for any injury. “Minor concussion, whiplash, a fractured rib – to be expected when a terentatek slams you against a rock wall. Stars, at first I thought its claws got you.”

His arms were warm and firm around me in the darkness, a calm cage of safety that gently soothed my frantic heart. My visor had broken, and my hold on the Force was shaky at best. I focused on my breathing, slowing it down to a manageable level.

“That was… lucky,” I muttered at last, leaning into his warmth.

I let out a weak chuckle, and grimaced as my ribs complained. I wasn’t going to be feeling happy tomorrow. “How the frell are we going to get past three of those bastards?” I whispered.

“Two.” His voice was smug. It took a moment to understand.

“Two?” I echoed in disbelief. “Sithspit, did you get one?”

“A krayt dragon and now a terentatek. I think I made the wrong career choice.”

“Jen?”

…

The memory faded, as it always did, and I became aware of my current position, huddled against the damp sides of a rocky tunnel. An imitation of my past, it seemed.

:::Jen? Can you copy?::: Carth demanded from my wrist. I hadn’t the strength to answer just yet.
The air had been knocked from my lungs, and a throbbing pain pounded through my shoulder. As I struggled to breathe, a loud roar shook the ground underneath me, and I glanced back to where I’d come from.

My visor had a crack running blurrily through it and was hissing an electronic protest, but it was the Force that showed me the monstrous limb edging down the tunnel too narrow for the terentatek’s girth. The razor-sharp claw was scraping against the rock ground, only metres from my position. I groaned, and ripped the useless visor off, hurling it unceremoniously toward the monster.

It clattered futilely off the reptilian limb.

::We’re back on the map, back on the trade route,:: Canderous relayed through the comm. ::Jen, get your arse out of the caves.::

I closed my eyes, ignoring the venturing claw, and leaned back against the mildewed sides of the subterranean tunnels. The details of the flashback had frayed already, but it wasn’t anything new. I’d already known I’d been on Korriban before, after that lovely meeting with Jorak Uln. Ness Jonohl had been here before, and with her boyfriend, no less.

How could I feel grief, for someone I couldn’t quite remember? Had he died? Had he been just one more casualty of Darth Revan? What, exactly, had we been doing on Korriban? No, not what. Why, is the key question. Bastila told me that I’d never fallen. So it must be what I surmised earlier, then, that I’d been following Revan’s trail. With a man I loved, who was powerful enough to take on krayt dragons and terentateks.

Before Jen and Revan had died, and been forced into my mind.

::Jen? Are you there?: Carth’s voice was agitated, and I realized I hadn’t responded.

“Yeah,” I murmured into the wrist-comm. A loud roar echoed again, and the wall behind me shook as the foreleg slammed angrily against the side wall. A shower of dust sprayed into my face, and I coughed.

::Are you hurt?:

I stood slowly, wincing as I rolled my shoulders, but it appeared to be no more than superficial bruising. A body slam into solid rock wasn’t particularly healthy for anyone, but I appeared to have come off lighter than I had once before.

I took a deep lungful of air, noting my breathing had recovered, and the pain in my shoulder began to subside. I’d been lucky, it seemed.

“I’m good. Moving out now,” I answered.

I turned my back on the snarling terentatek, drawing on the Force around me and pulling a datapad out in consultation. A shattered screen made me grimace.

“Map’s broken, Carth. Can you lead me out?”

Carth’s voice was strong and sure as he guided me east, through one last cavern that was large enough to pose a threat. But the frustrated howls of the salivating terentateks had not caught up to my progress, and my unnaturally increased celerity was more due to my own fear than any real need. I ignored the remnants of the shyrack nest this time, keen only to escape the suffocating darkness and rendezvous with my crew.
My shoulder throbbed weakly as the tunnels narrowed, and I began to believe the end of the shyrack caves was near.

::You’re almost out, Jen.:: Carth’s voice, welcome and constant, emitted from my wrist. ::The others are waiting.::

We’d done it. I didn’t have the strength to celebrate, not yet, but the feeling was growing deep in my belly. After Manaan, after Tatooine, I’d finally come to the frelling party and we’d got the Star Map. Bastila, when she finally woke – and I tamped down my growing concern about her vagueness through the bond – would be ecstatic. We could move on to Kashyyyk, to a planet safer than this one.

To her Masters. Yeah, there was that. But Ness Jonohl didn’t have to fear them, right? Surely, I could show I was strong enough to keep Darth Revan at bay. I was managing to, with Bastila’s help and Juhani’s support. I wondered, not for the first time, if Jen Sahara’s identity was thought to be a better cage for Evil Bitch than Ness Jonohl. Was that why they’d turned me into Jen?

The same questions still buzzed through my mind ever since the frelling Endar Spire. Would there ever come a time when I’d understand it all? Would there ever come a time when I’d be at peace?

The tunnel spilled out into the clearing of the Mandalorian duel, lit only by the vague radiation of nearby stars. It was night already, and beyond stood a small group of shadowy figures. My crewmates. I came to a stop, panting, feeling the ache in my shoulder return as the Force retreated.

“Jen!” Mission squealed, bounding over to me. Ten steps, and my arms were full of exuberant Twi’lek.

“Oof!” I exclaimed, staggering back several places as my arms encased her briefly. My shoulder spasmed in complaint, and my arm dropped.

“We did it!” she cheered, letting me go. Even in the dim light, I could clearly see her beaming grin. “We actually did it!”

I smiled back, enjoying her relief as my gaze moved further afield. Canderous, walking closer, had a quiet look of satisfaction on his weathered face - from what I could see under the visor he wore. HK-47 had his sights focused on the Sith fugitive.

I took a few steps closer to acknowledge her.

“Thalia May,” I said quietly. “Thank you for your assistance.”

The human woman was younger than I expected, maybe about Mekel’s age, with short cropped hair and black skin that faded into the Korriban night shadows. The whites of her eyes gleamed as she eyed me over.

“Well, I guess I should thank you for getting me out of there. I’ve had enough of caves to last me a lifetime.”

Her voice was wary, as wary as her tense posture. Even now, I suspected she didn’t quite believe we weren’t planning to send her back to Uthar. I grimaced. Enough time spent at that cursed Academy would kill anyone’s trust.

“Why’d you run, Thalia?” I asked, aware that my tone was abrupt. In the darkness, I could see her eyes close once, briefly.
“Uthar ordered me to do something he knew I’d be unwilling to.”

Her words were short, angry, and I remembered that she’d been hiding in the cursed caves with friends. Friends who were now well dead. Uthar tested her, and she failed him. By the sounds of it, he knew she would. Did he send her to her death, like he’d done to Mekel? Thalia May, it seemed, was yet another Sithling not quite taken with the darkness that Korriban offered.

“You were one of Yuthura’s,” I realized, surprised despite myself. For it was Yuthura Ban who’d first sent me after her, before I’d even stepped foot in the Academy. Yuthura Ban, who’d undoubtedly thought Thalia long dead. Thalia snorted, but didn’t respond. “What’s your goal now, Thalia?”

“You said you’d get me to Dreshdae. I’ll make my own way from there.”

“Let’s get back to the ship,” Canderous grunted. I nodded, and we started the trek back. We stayed in relative silence, apart from the occasional excited comment from Mission who was quickly hushed by the Mandalorian. I could understand his unease, I wasn’t willing to celebrate either until we were in the relative safety of our durasteel freighter.

It was a short walk back to Dreshdae, and soon the lights of the colony shone in the distance. My only thought was our destination of the Ebon Hawk, and maybe it was my pre-occupation that caught me off-guard. I had absolutely no warning when HK roughly shoved me over. Hard enough for me to topple to the ground.

At the same instant, a deep burn sheered along the side of my ribs, and I yelled in shock as I thudded against the hard-packed dirt.

There was a thwacking noise as HK launched a projectile; Canderous cursed and opened fire; Thalia screamed and unleashed a wave of Force that tingled as my senses picked it up.

Numb shock froze my mind and body but it retreated swiftly, and in its place a fiery wave of pain blossomed into being.

“Jen!” Mission shrieked, falling to my side.

“Statement: Threat has been eliminated, master.” HK’s voice was a distance away. I was staring up at the bright stars in the midnight sky. One of them looked quite close. The sounds of my fast breathing seemed inordinately loud.

::What’s going on?:: Carth demanded.

“I’m okay,” I gasped, pressing a hand along my torso. It felt hot and wet. Whatever it was, it sliced straight through my armour. It burned.

“Can you get up, Jen?” Mission asked.

“Nothing on the body,” Canderous muttered, his voice carrying from some metres beyond. “Not even a kriffing sack of credits.”

“Statement: Even with your kill here my count still far exceeds yours, Geriatric Blockhead.”

I sat, clenching my teeth, as Mission gazed at me worriedly. The injury had cut a line through my armour, alongside my ribs, but it was shallow. If HK hadn’t pushed me over, it would have been a direct hit in the centre of my chest.
I’m only wearing an alloy mesh shirt. Disruptor rifles go straight through those. My blood ran cold. Disruptor rifles were rare, and often used against Force users. It was one of the few things that lightsabers could not block.

“You got enemies, Jen Sahara,” Thalia stated, and I glanced over to see her with the others, some ten metres away. “This guy was lying in wait. And he’s no Dark Jedi.”

“Duros, plain-clothed, completely unidentifiable,” Canderous commented. He stood from his inspection of the corpse, with what must be the disruptor rifle in his grasp. “I’d say one of your friends from the Academy hired a merc to take you out, Jen. We don’t want to stay on this rock much longer.”

“No, that’s not the Sith way,” Thalia disagreed. “We prove ourselves by taking out opponents using the Force. Far more prestige.”

Canderous snorted in derision. “You’re an idiot if you don’t use what tools you have available. This corpse almost did take out Jen, with nothing more than a gun. You lot always underestimate non-Force users.”

“Observation: This organic meatbag has no identification or belongings on him, master. He is too unidentifiable to be a common mercenary. Supposition: this was an experienced assassin.”

I stood, accepting Mission’s hand, and winced as the slice along my ribs throbbed with stinging pain. It wasn’t deep, and could easily be patched up in the ‘Hawk if it hadn’t clotted by then, but the shock was setting in now. A wave of cold sunk deep through me. Just like that, I’d almost died at the hands of a nobody.

I walked over to the corpse, staring at it in puzzlement. An assassin. And then it hit me like a ferracrete brick, for it had not been that long ago when I’d encountered a whole group of them.

Oh no. The GenoHaradan. They were still after me. Of course they were still after me. They had a contract on my life, and it wasn’t complete.

“I’ll make my own way from here,” Thalia said. I could feel her wariness growing, and realized I’d drawn deep on the Force, deep enough to be noticed by her. She was staring at me guardedly. “No offense, but I don’t want to run into any other assassins.”

I wrested my attention away from the mysterious GenoHaradan and back to Thalia May. It took some effort. “Are you sure you don’t want to come with us? We’ll be leaving Korriban soon.”

There was hesitation on her face, and I wished Juhani was by my side. She radiated quiet strength and purpose, and I could see that Thalia was wavering. But honesty compelled me to speak further, and I grimaced as I did so. “We are headed to the Academy though; we still have to extract Kel.”

And Juhani. “And Yuthura might be mounting an insurrection, so it’s likely to get messy in there.”

Thalia blinked, and her face tightened. “Yuthura’s not strong enough to take on Uthar.”

“She’s got a reason to swing some of the support behind her,” I explained. I pressed my hand tighter alongside my ribs. “Uthar never killed Jorak Uln.”

I vaguely saw her jaw drop as my gaze drifted back to the warm corpse at my feet. Why would the GenoHaradan send just one agent after me, when on Rii’shn there had been a whole battalion? And if the GenoHaradan knew I was here on Korriban, then would they track me to Kashyyyk? I could feel the paranoia growing, a crawling unease traipsing down my spine.

I can take out the GenoHaradan. A dark whisper caressed my thoughts. Or I could turn them to my
I shivered.

“If Uthar didn’t kill the old headmaster, then who did?” Thalia demanded.

“I did, a couple of days ago,” I said quietly. “Mekel has his head as proof.”

Mission let out a surprised noise of disgust, and I saw Canderous’ heavy gaze swing back to me.

Thalia coughed; a shocked, disbelieving sound. “Even if that’s true – which I find exceedingly hard to believe – it won’t swing Uthar’s Adepts. And he’s stronger than her.”

“I’m pretty sure I can neutralize Dak and Dustil,” I replied. “Let’s just say I have leverage over them both.”

There was a patch of static over the comm, and I briefly imagined the reactions of Carth and Belaya both. Thalia snorted. “So you still have Lashowe. She’s strong – maybe Mekel would take her, maybe not. Kel won’t fight, no matter what you promised him. That leaves Uthar against Yuthura, and you’re a bleeding dumbass if you can’t work out who would win that one.”

I raised a brow. “And us.”

“Look, thanks for saving my life,” Thalia said flatly, and her intonation had turned cold. “But it makes no sense for me to go and throw it away again. I’m outta here, I can find my own way off this rock.”

I inclined my head. “Okay, just –” I paused, once more thinking of Juhani. “You know the Jedi High Council is on Coruscant, right?”

Her brows lowered as she crossed her arms, her entire posture tensing, but she didn’t reply.

“Think about it,” I said. “The Force isn’t something you can leave behind, and I’d say you’ve had enough of a taste of the Dark Side.”

In the shadow of the night I couldn’t easily make out her expression, but it looked inscrutable from where I was standing. “Farewell, Jen Sahara,” she stated, and turned to walk away.

The Force was with me still, strong and true, ebbing the pain of the burn to a faint echo. My shoulder didn’t even feel bruised anymore. I stared at Thalia until the shadows eclipsed her.

“Let’s go,” Canderous said, walking away from the corpse and heading toward the artificial light of the colony that radiated on the horizon. I glanced once more at the dead Duros, feeling my fingers clench tightly. A powerful assassination order was not the best of enemies. They must know Darth Revan is in my head. Or- maybe not. The Sith had contracted them, because they knew. But Thalia said Dark Jedi don’t use assassins.

She’s wrong, a cold voice in my head stated. Sithlings play their little games with their little rules to appease their masters. But a true Sith uses whatever resources are required to get the job done. Whether it’s a kitchen knife or a nuclear arsenal. Whatever it takes.

Mission nudged me, the voice fled, and we carried on into the darkness.

xXx
Bastila? I pushed the thought out with as much mental fortitude as I could muster, but there was no stirring from the vagueness of our psychic link. If anything, the spiritual connection between us was dimmer than before, a hazy spider’s web that was slowly unravelling. Now that the Star Map was behind me, my concern for my bond-sister was elevating into alarm.

Paranoia kept my eyes tight on our environment and my hold fierce on the Force. That the GenoHaradan were back did nothing for my peace of mind. The ambush on Rii’shn had resulted in the explosive revelation of Evil Bitch’s true identity. I’d been so shattered, so stunned, so repulsed, that I’d barely even thought about the assassination order again, even though they’d been hired to kill me. Sloppy. I never used to be so sloppy. The thought was laced with disgust, and it was hard to tell who it originated from. I closed my eyes, mentally willing the villain in my head to disappear.

Bastila!

The hatch of the Ebon Hawk opened as Canderous clambered up the loading ramp, and I heard Mission heave a great sigh of relief as she followed him in.

“I can’t wait to tell Big Z about everything!” she gushed, stepping inside. The grill of the ramp creaked as HK stomped on it, and I took up the rear, locking it behind us. I heard Mission heave a huge yawn. “Sheesh, I’ll be glad to get some shut-eye.”

Not going to happen just yet. The Academy. Every minute longer risked Juhani, and I could only hope that she was safe, hiding somewhere from Uthar. Unlikely, after all these hours. And I needed to find Dustil. Kel. Maybe even Dak. I sighed. I needed Bastila.

“Belaya,” I said in greeting. “It’s good to see you up. This is Canderous Ordo and Mission Vao.” I glanced over to HK who was standing in the corner of the kitchenette. “And HK-47,” I added dryly.

“Belaya,” Mission was beaming, all but bouncing up and down, and she ran over to Carth to land him with an effusive hug. I grinned at his half-awkward, half-pleased look. Mission really was the light of our crew.

“We’ve got to extract some people from the Academy first, Mission, before we start celebrating,” I said. “Chief amongst them Juhani. She’s been gone since morning.”

The enthusiasm dimmed in the girl’s face, and I felt irrationally bad for that. “D’ya really think she’s in trouble, Jen?” she asked.

“I do not understand nor know what to believe,” Belaya said quietly. “You all claim that Juhani is one of you, and yet merely days ago I was told by a Sith that she was a student at the Academy.”

Mission frowned. “Well, yeah, ‘cause she and Jen have been pretending to be Sith-”

The enthusiasm dimmed in the girl’s face, and I felt irrationally bad for that. “D’ya really think she’s in trouble, Jen?” she asked.

“I do not understand nor know what to believe,” Belaya said quietly. “You all claim that Juhani is one of you, and yet merely days ago I was told by a Sith that she was a student at the Academy.”

Mission frowned. “Well, yeah, ‘cause she and Jen have been pretending to be Sith-”

Belaya shook her head, a flash of anger crossing her drawn face. “No, it was a lie. That monster Dustil lied to me, tricked me into going with him and-

“Okay, can someone please tell me who this Dustil guy is?” Mission demanded. Her lekku twined around her neck in annoyance. “Is he like, some famous Sith Lord or something that we should all know?”

I looked over to Carth, and his jaw was set stubbornly. His eyes held a depth of anguish that made me wince. “Carth,” I said quietly. “We’ve all got to know, now. It’s time to hit the Academy.”

Carth sighed, glancing over to Belaya. “Dustil is my son.”

The silence that fell over us was thick with suspicion and surprise both. Belaya’s eyes widened in horror, or something close to it, and she stumbled backwards. Mission’s mouth dropped open in a comic display of surprise, and even Canderous looked taken aback as he stared at Carth intently, measuringly.

“I-I thought he died,” Carth muttered, dragging a hand through his hair. He looked back to me, eyes dark with pain. “Four years ago when my homeworld Telos was bombed by the Sith. I looked for him, I—” he cut himself off, sighing. He looked so torn that I felt my heart twist. “I only found out about him by accident, days ago. I guess one of the Sith picked him up in the aftermath, and he’s been here ever since.”

Belaya was edging away from us all, her face tight and panicked. Dustil had told me that he’d captured her, tortured her, and now one of her rescuers was his father… no wonder she looked so shell-shocked. For all that I cared deeply about Carth’s pain, it was Belaya who needed the attention right now.

“Belaya,” I said. “How could Dustil trick you about Juhani being here?”

Her light gaze swung to mine, not a little scared. Her lips parted, and her face had lost whatever colour had remained, but she didn’t answer. I frowned, as a conversation from days ago came back to mind.

She always was the best of us three. She loved you too, did you know that? Dak’s words, to Juhani. But Juhani hadn’t believed it.

“You’ve been looking for her since she failed her trials,” I said quietly, realizing the Dak had been right. Belaya blinked, and I saw the despair as it grew on her face. She was a Jedi Knight, who had loved Juhani from afar. Juhani’s fall from grace must have affected her deeply, deeply enough for her to walk away from the Order and hunt for Juhani herself. Juhani’s sodding Master should have been the one to do that. And Juhani had run thinking she’d killed her Master. “Juhani knows, now, that Quatra lives. I imagine she planned to go back to Dantooine, but we’ve all been caught up in something… much bigger than any of us expected.”

“Where did you find her?” she whispered.

“Tatooine. She wasn’t… she wasn’t in the best of minds, at first.” I heard Mission stifle a snort, and shot the Twi’lek a quelling glance. “But Juhani walks in the Light now, Belaya. She spends her days redeeming everyone she comes across.” I heard my words twist wryly at the end, and saw an answering glimmer in the women’s face.

“Juhani can be fierce on what she believes in,” Belaya murmured. “But… is Dak one of your crew, too? I find that… difficult to believe… he left so long ago, and was so adamant the Order was not for him….”
“No, he’s a genuine student here,” I muttered, frowning. “Running into him was a surprise.”

Surprise was too light a word. Between Dak, Dustil, and Uthar’s odd fascination with Juhani… My eyes swung back to Belaya as the pieces finally clicked together. For torture had a way of spilling all secrets, and if Dustil has already found out that Belaya was tracking Juhani, then of course that sick, twisted Headmaster would want the both of them to play mind-games with. “Stars, that’s why Uthar’s after Juhani!” I hissed. Although we’d introduced her as Staria, but how many Cathar were running about these days? No wonder Uthar had been chomping at the bit, to collar her alone and discover if she were the reason Belaya landed on Korriban.

“What… what are you saying?” Belaya breathed, her voice breaking. “That Juhani is in danger because of me?”

“No!” I immediately snapped, wishing I could retract my words. “No, no, if Juhani’s been caught, then the only person to blame is that twisted creep Uthar.”

“And Dustil,” Carth said quietly.

I sighed, looking back at him, at a loss for words.

“I will not be on the same ship as that Sith boy, no matter whose son he is,” Belaya said, and I heard the unyielding conviction in her voice. Carth winced.

“Belaya, there are four Jedi on this ship, including you,” I told her. “Dustil’s coming with us, willing or not. If he’s any sort of threat, we will restrain him.” I frowned at the anger on her face, and realized she wasn’t convinced. We’ll have to deal with this later. “Look, we need to get moving. And I need to wake Bastila. And- where’s Zaalbar? Why isn’t he here?”

“He’s outside Bastila’s door,” Carth answered. “He’s been very… intense about guarding Bastila. I told him you guys were here, but he didn’t budge. I don’t think he’s going to move until Bastila is walking again.”

“Big Z!” Mission hollered, skipping over to the exit that led to the pilot’s quarters. “Get your hairy butt in here!”

Zaalbar didn’t so much as grumble back a greeting to her, and I frowned. Too many things were coming to a head now, and even with the success of the Star Map I felt jittery, uneasy, almost panicky. Juhani’s lengthy absence was more than just concerning, and exactly how we were going to extract her, Kel and Dustil without confronting Uthar… it didn’t seem possible. It probably wasn’t possible.

And the GenoHaradan… what if they had more agents on Korriban? I hadn’t even registered the presence of the earlier assassin. HK saved my life, there. If I’d kept my mind on my surroundings, perhaps I would have had forewarning.

I needed Bastila, her advice, her guidance, her strength through the bond. The gradual fading between the two of us had been chipping away at my inner certainty, eroded by my burgeoning apprehension.

“Zaalbar!” I called out, leaving the common room behind in quick, impatient strides.

The Wookiee was standing outside the pilot’s quarters, tense and upright, staring blankly at the opposite bulkhead. Legs apart, furry arms crossed, he didn’t even twitch at my address.

The apprehension grew as it was spiked with something colder, something worse.
"Zaalbar?" I was in front of him, staring up into his empty gaze that was fixated behind me. He blinked, and craned his head down to stare at me.

"(Bastila is sleeping on the Ebon Hawk, where I found her,)" he said in a low voice. There was no emotion at all in his howl, just a mechanical emitting of noises that, when strung together, formed the vowels of Shyriiwook words. "(I must guard her door.)"

Something is wrong. Something is very, very wrong.

"Big Z? What’s going on?"

"Jen Sahara, I do not sense anyone within that room," Belaya murmured in the background. She sounded confused. A growing sense of numbness was escalating in my core, a buzzing noise ringing through my ears.

"Zaalbar!" I snapped, and my voice was ice even to my own ears. "By the terms of our life-debt, open this door and let me pass!"

Zaalbar blinked, and a whimper escaped his lips as his hand mashed against the hatch control. My fingers were tingling, my entire body was tingling, and I strode forward, ducking under his arm and shoving three hundred pounds of Wookiee muscle to the side in Force-induced need.

I took two steps into the room.

Into the empty, empty pilot’s quarters.

"(Kylah Aramai took her to Uthar Wynn at the Academy,)" Zaalbar said, and his intonation was flat. He howled, then, a long, despairing, bone-chilling howl.

Bastila! I screamed, and the tingling abruptly transformed into mind-numbing terror. Bastila!

Just then, the vague link between us snapped clean. I’d felt the same, back on Taris, and it had been because a neural disruptor had clicked around her neck. She was no longer present with me.

She was no longer on the ship, and she was no longer in my head.

No! No! The yawning pit of horror inside me froze my blood. A background hubbub of noise started, but I couldn’t comprehend it.

BASTILA!

And then a fiery blast of rage ignited like a thermal detonator. I couldn’t see where I was anymore, no, no, all that mattered was the strength required to go find my bond-sister. My bond-sister. And tear open the body of that schutta Kylah and rip her heart out with my fingernails.

This hot rage is power, power I need, power I can use, power I WILL use-

It was a flashpoint of fury, burning like liquid fire through my limbs, wresting a hold of the Force and drawing it deep, deep, deeper, all the strength I needed and I didn’t need anyone else. With this power I could get Bastila, I could do any damn thing I wanted and no one, not some cowardly ex-Jedi, not a slimy twisted Headmaster, not anyone would stop me-

-I’ll make them all pay, I’ll draw in all the strength of the galaxy and make things the way I want-*

Somewhere, in the distance, a Wookiee was howling in soul-shattering anguish.
The nights on Korriban were icy. I knew this, knew that the frigid air could creep in even through a thick duranex bodysuit under dark robes, and yet here I was, pacing the valley as dusk settled down on this gods-cursed planet.

Juhani. A beloved face from my past, and I didn’t even know if she still lived. Master Uthar was storming around in a snit, Master Yuthura had been missing for the last two days, and Juhani was here on Korriban.

But is she still alive?

No one came out of Tulak Hord’s tomb, not in recent memory. Except that little chivhole, Mekel, had. He’d thrown me a disgusted sneer, a half-hearted push of the Force, and then scampered, a bloody knapsack thrown over one shoulder. I’d pulled on the Force tight, ready to challenge him for all that his strength eclipsed mine, when Force rumblings echoed menacingly from the tomb and we’d both fled. I should have stayed, should have made sure Juhani wasn’t still stuck in there with that obnoxious friend of hers, but I’d been so convinced that damn Mekel had something to do with it that I’d turned and shadowed him back to the Academy.

The bugger had lost me in the Academy’s warrens, and he’d been missing since then, same as Yuthura Ban. Deep down, I’d truly believed that must have been Juhani’s end, and the angry despair curled hot in my gut at the thought.

And then I’d run into Lashowe.

…

“Dak,” she purred, but she was less confident than customary. There was a rattled look in her ice blue eyes that she couldn’t quite conceal. “Uthar’s on the warpath, looking for that new initiate Staria.”

“Staria?” I snapped, recognition burning in me as I remembered what Ness had named Juhani. “What the frell does he want with Staria?”

Lashowe eyes narrowed with speculation. “Have you seen her, Dak? Our Master will be most pleased if you bring her to me.”

Lashowe, I thought with inimical disgust, always on the lookout for advancement and prestige. She was Uthar’s golden child, Uthar’s chosen one, Uthar’s darling. Between her and that bootlicker, Dustil, it was usually easy to keep my head low.

“She karked it in the tombs yesterday, Lashowe. On bloody Yuthura’s orders.” The words burned as I spoke them, burned a deep agony I could taste in the back of my throat. It was the death of a precious vision I’d held – a cornerstone deep in the back of my mind where Uthar’s psychic grasp couldn’t reach. The mental image of Juhani proudly serving the Order shone like a truth: I could see her, bright blue lightsaber held high as sunlight kissed her warrior’s form. No matter the failure I’d become, at least I could believe that Juhani was truly a guardian of the galaxy.

But, no. She’d left, just like me, looking for power that the Jedi couldn’t give. And now she was dead. And I’d utterly failed to save her.

“Master Uthar doesn’t believe so,” Lashowe murmured, eyeing me over. I noticed her pallor, then, a clammy sheen to her skin like she’d just been fighting a losing battle. “He thinks she’s hiding somewhere in your cherished Valley.”

I still, staring at her fixedly as my thoughts raced and my emotions twisted. Lashowe wasn’t an idiot, she’d picked up something in my tone, and it was time for me to go on the offensive. “Had a run in with our Master yourself, Lashowe? Did he kick you out of his bed?” I sneered.

A spark of fire shot through her eyes. “I aim to serve Master Uthar always - as should you, Dak. I know you like to hide away out there, pretending to be a little scholar freak, but just you remember where your loyalties lie. You are one of us.”

…

With that, Lashowe had stormed off to the Valley. As had I, slower and with more caution.

Was it possible that Juhani had survived the menace of Hord’s tomb? Lashowe and Master Uthar both believed so. And Mekel had escaped apparently unscathed.

What does Uthar want with Juhani? And if she is alive, why would she be hiding? I’d waited until I’d sensed Uthar leave, feeling impatient and annoyed and wretchedly hopeful, before sidling back down to the Valley myself. Uthar often ignored me in favour of his other two Adepts, and that suited me just fine. I had no qualms conceding that Lashowe was more powerful than I, and I certainly wasn’t going to kiss his arse like that little doormat Dustil. Assuredly, one had to bow and scrape to Master Uthar, but he didn’t own my soul.

Really? Are you so sure about that?

My eyes closed as I pushed away the inner sneer, and instead Juhani’s words flashed through my mind: Dak, have you ever considered leaving this place?

Had I? Not really. It wasn’t what I’d thought it would be, but neither was the Order. I’d utterly failed to find peace and self-worth thus far.

But it was obvious Juhani had doubts about the Sith, and Master Uthar must know it. Yet once admitted to the Academy, it was impossible to run. Selene tried, and failed. Thalia tried, and failed. Jorrie, Denessari, Mel… the list went on. If Juhani really was still alive, surely she could be convinced to play the game. Surely Master Uthar could be convinced that she would make a fine Dark Jedi.

A faint wind brushed over the darkening valley, blowing dust and that damn sulphuric taint in my face. One never really became accustomed to the sharp taste at the back of one’s throat, that harshness burning deep in the lungs after a day spent outside. There were Force methods that could filter the impurities of the air, but they required study and practice, and were hardly the type of learning encouraged on Korriban. Research was more… limited, here, than Dantooine.

I remembered leaving the Jedi Enclave in a fury, finally snapping under Master Dorak’s constant prattling on emotional vigilance, and Juhani’s constant concessions to her scow of a Master. I’d intended to leave the Force behind, I really had, but it had found me in the shape of Nisotsa Organa. The Quiet Death, I’d heard her called. Master Uthar treated Nisotsa like an equal, although she never outright challenged him the way that prick Bandon did. No, Nisotsa was silent and struck from the shadows.

I hadn’t put up much of a fight. Her strength was awe-inspiring – she was one of the blasted Jedi Thirteen, after all, one of Malak’s senior Dark Jedi. She’d promised power and freedom, and I’d believed her. Even now, Nisotsa sometimes visited Korriban, always stopping to award me with an icy cold smile and a pat on the head. Like a loyal little kath hound.

I’d found the power I wanted, but not the freedom.

“Adept,” a Sith soldier acknowledged, as he walked past me to head toward the Academy. I’d been so lost in my own damn thoughts that I hadn’t even noticed the soldiers changing shifts.

I sighed in annoyance and stretched my senses out, traipsing along the dusty ground in the growing darkness. I was deep in the Valley now, near Sadow’s tomb – that cursed place Master Uthar and Master Yuthura liked to hold their graduation ceremonies. Despite myself, I shivered. Adept trials were a harrowing experience, and not one I’d care to repeat. I had no idea how Shaardan managed to live through three occurrences of them and still fail. And still breathe.

Sadow’s tomb was dubiously graced with a stone sculpture of the Lord himself – much like the granite and ferracrystal replica in the Academy’s hall – but this statue was older, and emanated with swirling dark Force that was noticeable when one neared. The eerie sensation clouded the senses, made it difficult to walk past and head inside. Most avoided the tomb instinctively, as the roiling energy had a natural repelling effect on life itself. Sadow had been a master alchemist, I knew, and had voluntarily placed himself in suspended animation for centuries on Yavin IV. That was all past history now with his resurrection and true death eons ago, but there were theories that Sadow’s statue on Korriban held some sort of Force echo of the Sith Master himself.

It was... interesting to speculate. Certainly, the Force swirled in stronger eddies here than anywhere else in the open Valley. And as my feet crunched on a patch of gravel, I sensed a flicker of life move behind the statue.

I drew deep on the Force and stalked over to the sneering Naga Sadow.

“Dak?” someone whispered from the shadows. I froze, disbelief coursing like a shot of firewhiskey through my gut as a figure unfurled from beyond the stone base.

“Juhani,” I breathed, breaking into quick strides. She was a tall, lithe figure in the dark, and I grasped her fiercely. “Juhani! You’re alive!”

My arms were tight around her, my heart tight with emotion. She sighed, and dropped her head on my shoulder. An unfamiliar feeling of contentment budded deep within me. I could hear her heart beating strongly through the Force, and felt a prickling against my closed eyes. She was here, and she was okay. “I thought you were dead. I thought you were gone!”

“No,” Juhani said softly, pulling back. Her slanted amber eyes I’d always found so mesmerizing gleamed at me in the starlight. “I only planned to be here for a short while, but Uthar has been in this Valley all day. I am concerned he has been looking for me.”

“I know,” I murmured, my hands still clasped on her shoulders. We were of an equal height, and my gaze roved over her face fervently. She really was here. “Juhani, what does he want with you?”

“I do not know,” she whispered. Her face, alien and yet so dear to me, was solemn. “But I am certain he bodes me ill. I must leave here, Dak.”

“Leave?” I frowned. “Hang on, Juhani, you can’t think you’ll be able to leave the Academy.”

She stared at me, saying nothing. Her eyes were deep and intense, and I had no idea what she was thinking. “Juhani, Uthar won’t turn you away. Whatever his issue is with you, if you just crawl and beg forgiveness, he’ll accept you back.”

At that, a flare of irritation sparked through her gaze, and I was reminded of just how proud she could be. “Dak, I am not here to be a Sith. I only came back for you.”

“For- for me?” I spluttered. I’d thought, outside Hord’s tomb, that she had some crazy redemption idea in her head. Turned out I was right. “Juhani, don’t be an idiot! This is the damn Sith. You can’t just change your mind and expect to walk away! I won’t let you kill yourself, not like this!”

“Dak-”

“No,” I said coldly. “No. I thought you’d died in the tomb. I’m not going to let you die again.”

“Dak!” she cut in. “I have to get out of here. The others need me-”

“What, that frelling Ness Jonohl? She escaped too?” I sneered, and read the truth from her expression. “What happened in the tomb, Juhani?”

Her eyes slid away. “Ness and Mekel found… they found the old Headmaster.” She trailed off, and the silence was heavy in the Korriban dusk.

The old Headmaster. Jorak Uln had been Headmaster when I’d arrived. He liked me, liked my interest in the tombs and my willingness to catalogue and research any finds that were available. I hadn’t been there long before Adept Uthar Wynn had staged a bloody coup, ripped out Jorak’s eyes, and then turned on Jorak’s first apprentice. I hadn’t thought of Uln in some time, but I’d liked the place better when he was Headmaster.

“Huh. Did Master Uthar leave his corpse in Hord’s tomb?” A body couldn’t have been the danger, though. Some whispered that a remnant of Tulak Hord survived, living on in the immortality that the ancient Sith Lord had once dreamed of.

“No, not his body. Jorak Uln wasn’t dead, Dak.”

My gaze swung back to her, surprised and appalled. “Uln, alive?”

“Yes. He- well. Suffice to say he is not alive now.”

“Mekel?” I gasped in disbelief. “Mekel took out Jorak Uln?” Mekel was strong, at least as strong as Lashowe, but I would not have credited either of them with enough power to defeat someone like Uln. Even if Uln had been scraping by for years, isolated and blinded. Uln’s the reason people don’t return from Hord’s tomb, I realized suddenly. Uln’s the reason Uthar avoids it. Even after all this time, Uthar fears Jorak Uln.

Feared. Past tense, not present.

Juhani was shaking her head, and my shock deepened. “Your friend,” I said slowly, reading the truth from her tawny gaze. Oh, that Ness Jonohl had been both annoying and confident - and, it seemed, powerful. For if even Uthar hadn’t been able to kill Jorak... My eyes widened. “Uthar’s not going to like this. Shavit! That’s why Yuthura and Mekel have gone awol!”
Uthar had claimed the post of the Headmaster without truly killing the old one. Might ruled on Korriban, but status had a lot to do with it. The petty games and power-plays pissed me off, but this deception might turn some of the initiates against Uthar. Unless they were sufficiently cowed- and Uthar could be frelling scary. And I couldn't see Yuthura slamming down Uthar, not unless she had other allies.

Other allies... Suddenly, my gut clenched in a seething ball of fury and fear. "Ness is allied with Yuthura," I snapped. My voice turned bitter, for Juhani had already shown where her own loyalty lay with her cursed determination to follow Ness into Hord's tomb.

“No,” Juhani said, and she sounded sad. “Dak, you truly do not understand. We did not come here to join the Sith. We came to Korriban for another purpose.”

The silence stretched between us as I struggled to comprehend. I could feel my head shaking in disbelief. "What?" I hissed. "Don't be ridiculous... no Force-sensitive comes to Korriban for any reason other than to join the Sith. I don't-" I broke off, staring at her angrily. "Juhani, you already told me you left the Order!"

“I did,” she replied gently. “But Ness turned me back. I am a Jedi, Dak, not a Sith. And you can be one again, too. There is no future here on Korriban. Surely you must see that.”

My jaw dropped in disbelief. “How the frell do you expect to leave the Academy? What, walk out the front gates?”

“She did once before,” she answered, her voice steady and sure. “Come with us, Dak. Leave this place. You are a good person, and I know you cannot be happy here.”

It was an empty dream, a promise of a future I could never grasp. I’d killed people, here: initiates in my way, mercenaries on Uthar’s orders, prisoners who couldn’t hold up under the torture. There were some things one couldn’t return from. I wasn’t happy here, but shavit, I hadn’t been happy with the Order, either. “You can’t turn your back on the Dark Side, Juhani. If you’d truly fallen, you would know that.”

I could hear the coldness in my voice, the acknowledgment that, once more, we were on opposing sides of an ethical chasm. There’d been a time when I’d hoped she’d follow me away from Dantooine, but her will had been too strong for my persuasion. I saw the disappointment flare in her eyes, and it stung. It stung deep.

“No, you don’t turn your back on it. You fight it.” Her voice was steel; as strong and sure as ever. “You rise above it. And you do your best to make the right choices, even if you made poor ones in the past. Anyone can turn back, Dak. I know this well.”

My returning laugh was low and scornful. “Really, Juhani? What did you turn back from, almost killing your master?”

“I was not referring to my own redemption,” she snapped tartly. “Although, in my rage, I did kill some who had wronged me in my youth. I am ashamed of my past actions, but I strive to better myself now.”

"And the Order welcomed you back with open arms, I suppose?" I muttered, my voice spiking with sarcasm. "Shouldn't you be meditating in a corner somewhere, languishing in guilt over your past crimes?"

Juhani shifted uncomfortably. "I have only spoken with one master since my return, Dak. But it is
I shook my head in disgust. “So you don’t know, not really.”

“I do.” Her words rang with a bone-deep conviction.

I sighed. When Juhani believed in something, there was no changing her mind. She was as unyielding as Korriban ferracrystal. “You know nothing about the Dark Side, Juhani, if all you did was run after some childhood bullies.”

She inclined her head. “Perhaps the Dark Side tempts us in different ways, Dak. I feel it, even now, on this planet. It coaxes me to run; run from my emotions, run from my connections, run until no one is left who will challenge me to be the best I can be.” She sighed, and it was a melancholy sound that curled around me in the darkness. An unbearable sadness engulfed me. The yawning gulf between us was impossible to breach. “The Light Side is not the easy path, but it is the right one.”

For you, Juhani, maybe.

“You won’t stay,” I said flatly.

“No. And you will not go with me, will you?”

Maybe if it had just been her, the temptation would have been strong enough to outweigh the risk. But while Juhani cared for me, it wasn't the same as what I'd once felt for her. What I still did, deep in my heart. Maybe I couldn't stop her, but I wouldn't follow her again and uselessly pine my heart away.

Juhani touched the side of my face briefly. "Goodbye, Dak. Take care." I felt my eyes close, and my cheek burned even after she withdrew her fingers. The disappointment was acute, deep and painful; the worry for her safety even more so. But if she truly could escape Korriban, then maybe once more I could dream of her in a happier place, while my own soul rotted in despair.

Juhani had taken maybe five steps away before I felt it. An ominous, forbidding presence slowly edging closer in the evening dusk. Juhani froze, and my stomach turned in fright.

Uthar.

The shadows moved in a murky fashion, coalescing into the shape of the Headmaster as he neared. There was no hiding now.

A tenacious determination punched me low in the stomach, and I knew then that I’d do whatever it took to get Juhani away from here, away from Uthar, away from me.

I strode past her, hissing, "play the game," and walked forward to address my Master.

“Master Uthar!” I called out in greeting, coming to a stop and bowing in deference. “Initiate Staria has been looking for you.”

"Adept Dak," Uthar's oily voice greeted me as his unhurried steps brought him ever closer. I quashed the nausea swirling in my belly, thinking only of loyalty to my master. Uthar's mind-games were well-known. "Isn't that interesting, because I have spent all day looking for Staria.”

I forced a hollow chuckle. “I am afraid Staria was a little overwhelmed with the presence of Sadow’s statue,” I replied lightly. “I have been trying to educate her upon the dangers of the Valley.”

“Really?” Uthar’s milky-white eyes narrowed. “You are quick to speak for Staria, I see.”

“Master Uthar,” Juhani murmured. There was a quaver in her voice that I wasn’t sure was genuine or not. “Forgive me for my tardiness. Adept Dak has been trying to draw me away from this tomb.”

Uthar stilled, his clouded eyes reaching past mine. The black ink on his scalp faded into the shadows, leaving only slivers of pale skin noticeable. Deep inside me, there was a burning need to understand Uthar’s obsession with Juhani. For if I knew the reason, perhaps I could formulate a way to extract her safely.

Only minutes ago I’d desired her here, with me, on Korriban – but now, now, it was the last thing I wanted. Juhani’s safety, Juhani’s needs – they trumped mine. Maybe I really was just the same love-struck fool I’d been years ago.

Uthar turned his head sharply to me once more, a frown bunching his brow. I forced my thoughts blank, my posture deferential, and looked at him expectantly. He grunted.

“I expect punctuality in all my students, Initiate,” he said, looking back to Juhani once more. His voice was soft and almost friendly, and raised the hairs on my neck. “And I do not give warnings more than once. Perhaps, if you are finished... submerging yourself in Naga Sadow’s replica, you can lead the way back to the Academy.”

Juhani blinked at him in the evening darkness, and I sensed rather than saw Uthar frown. “Go!” he snapped. “I am not done with you yet, Initiate. Back to the Academy!”

Juhani jerked forward, tripping once as she stumbled past us, shooting me a half-terrified look. But it was false, I knew, as I spotted the gleam of determination in her gaze that was simultaneously gratifying and alarming. Play the game, Juhani! Play the frelling game! Uthar could be appeased by pleading, by breaking. The sort of behaviour that ran deeply against Juhani’s personality.

My gaze slid back to my master, and my unease spread like a virus. Uthar doesn’t give verbal warnings, I realized, and my stomach turned. No, Uthar’s warnings usually consisted of a mind-raping, or a ball of lightning to the face. And that was if you were lucky. I’d seen enough Sith hopefuls kark it on a first meeting with the Headmaster just because he thought them weak.

Maybe... maybe Juhani caught him on a good day? Or maybe the reason he’s after her is just her potential? Juhani’s sparring and lightsaber prowess had been impressive back on Dantooine. We were an even match on some areas of Force aptitude, but she could kick my arse when it came to out-and-out combat.

Uthar’s pale gaze slid to mine, and I forced the thoughts away with a mental kick. Keep your mind blank, dumbass! I looked over to Juhani, traipsing ahead across the cursed Valley, and desperately hoped there’d been no mental bleed-over from my part.

“Walk with me, Adept.” Uthar murmured, starting the trek back himself. I fell into line. “I sense events moving, Dak. This is not the time to be skulking near the tombs.”

“I understand, Master,” I replied.

“Do you, Dak? Do you really?”

Sometimes, it paid to be bold with Uthar. And if it drew his attention away from Juhani, shaken and uncertain as she floundered ahead of us, then all the better.

“I understand that Master Yuthura has been missing since Mekel escaped Hord’s tomb.” The statement was daring, but surely Uthar already suspected something. I kept my minds-eye tight on the image of Mekel, retreating from the tomb with an ensanguined knapsack slung over his back. Only now did I start to suspect what Mekel may have been carrying.

Proof.

There was a whisper of something in my thoughts, something other-worldly, something that didn’t belong. I dared not deviate from that one particular memory.

Uthar grunted after a lengthy silence. "There was a report of Adept Mekel running from the Academy. I had believed he'd scampered in failure. Hmm." I could feel Uthar's heavy gaze on me, and knew he'd been snooping. He probably still was, and I shook off the chill of preternatural terror. I could do this, and keep my thoughts contained. I had to, for Juhani's sake. "You have never warmed to Mekel, have you Dak?"

“Not particularly, Master,” I said neutrally.

"But you seem to have taken a shine to Initiate Staria," he murmured, his voice pitching high with curiosity.

I tensed. “I believe, given the chance, she may have potential, Master Uthar.” A brief flash of Juhani flashed through my mind – the first time I’d seen her on Dantooine. Tipped ears, striped markings along her cheekbones, slanted eyes narrowed in uncertainty even as she stood tall and proud beneath a tattered tunic of rags. She’d been the most exotic thing I’d ever seen.

My fists clenched as I abruptly forced the image away.

Uthar tsked. "She claims to be a fallen Jedi, although we have not found any records of a Jedi Staria. Are you sure you didn't know her during your time on Dantooine?"

Coldness crawled through my gut. I was Uthar's Adept, oh yes, but I'd never intrigued him. I'd dropped a false family name on Korriban, stupidly keeping my first – Dak was such a common name, after all. I'd never known Uthar had dug up my past.

"No, Master Uthar," I answered, and the words sounded forced even to my own ears.

"Tell me about your time with the Jedi, Dak," Uthar said. His words were mild and friendly, and my unease intensified. "You were not there for very long, I believe?"

"Three years, Master," I replied, my eyes fixed on Juhani as she picked her way up the climbing path that twisted out of the Valley. "I did not progress past Padawan. I came to the Jedi later than most, and realized it was not for me."

“And who were your friends there, Dak?”

My edginess was increasing. For if Uthar knew my history, then it wouldn't take much digging to learn who my companions had been. Although, with luck, he'd never bothered digging that far. "I was not close to many, Master Uthar. I studied under Master Dorak." My mind zeroed in on an image of the Enclave's Chronicler, Master Dorak - who'd seemed a good fit for me at first, due to our shared passion for history. But I'd chafed under his dry rules and regulations, and he'd vacillated between over-the-top leniency and sharp disapproval when I failed. He'd leave me enough rope to hang myself, and then seemed surprised when I did so. I was not sorry to leave him behind.

“That is not an answer, Dak,” Uthar replied, his voice so benign I didn’t trust it. “You must have had close acquaintances you left behind. Tell me about them.”

“I had a good friend, once,” I hedged. I could not, would not, betray Juhani. It was too dangerous to lie, in case Uthar knew more about my past than he’d already let on. But Juhani had already assured me of the safety of my other friend. She is a Knight now, Dak. “But I do not think about her. She is beneath my contempt, Master Uthar.”

Ahead, Juhani was clambering over a large boulder in the shadows. Pale illumination flickered down from distant Academy – two large fire pits blazed on either side of the entrance, throwing shadows that skittered like skorpocrabs against the night-time landscape.

“Names, Dak, names!” Uthar chuckled, and his heavy hand clapped me on the shoulder. “Otherwise you will have me believe you are hiding something.”

“Not at all, Master,” I replied in a mild tone. I didn’t trust Uthar. I didn’t trust my own head. I didn’t trust his puzzling fascination with Juhani. “It’s simply that it was such a long time ago that I don’t even know if she lives. Her name was Belaya Linn.”

Uthar’s hand dropped from my shoulder abruptly, and I turned to face him, startled. But his expression was composed as he stared ahead at Juhani’s retreating form. He cleared his throat. “Were you in love with this Belaya, Dak?”

“No!” I snapped, surprised at the question. Juhani stopped, craning her head back to face us. She’d reached the Academy, now. “I beg your pardon, Master Uthar, but no. She was a friend and nothing more.”

I’d been close to Belaya, and admired her greatly. We’d both loved Juhani from afar, but Belaya accepted it wasn’t meant to be and endeavoured to remain no more than a true friend. I’d run off like a whiny brat. My mouth twisted as I remembered the sour note we’d parted on. Belaya had been a better person than I, in the Force and strength of character. The best of us three, I’d always suspected.

Something foreign twitched behind my eye, and I roughly pushed the memory away. Mindless idiot! I hadn’t even realized my thoughts were wandering. My gaze slid to Master Uthar, but nothing showed on his pale, tattooed face other than benevolence. The firelight sparked against the opalescence of his corrupted eyes as we drew to a halt by the entrance.

Juhani was waiting, her gaze hooded as Uthar waved the doors open. A soldier posted within snapped out a salute, and Uthar marched inside. Somehow, his stance and manner seemed more purposeful than before.

“Follow me,” Uthar threw over his shoulder. “I have something to show the both of you.”

We both trailed in his wake. Juhani’s slanted gaze slid my way, and her lips parted, as if to speak. I shook my head curtly, glancing at Uthar’s retreating back. I’d been doing a piss-poor job so far of containing my thoughts, I realized with disgust, and wasn’t sure if it’d been due to my nerves or something more insidious. There were rumours that Uthar’s mental prowess could be stealthy enough to direct another person’s thought-stream without them even realizing. All I knew was that I’d been determined to think nothing, and my thoughts had kept drifting back to Juhani.

I could only hope Uthar hadn’t picked up on anything.
We walked in silence through the Academy, and I was struck once more how empty the place felt since Bandon had stripped it of near-all the Adepts. Even before then, we'd been running low on students. The death-rate on the frontlines wasn't particularly appealing, which was why Uthar's first apprentice was such a coveted position. Even Darth Malak wouldn't readily snatch Uthar's apprentice from him. First apprentices were sacred.

And it was apparent that Yuthura was on her way out.

Uthar led us to a grand cavern on the other end of the Academy. It was deserted apart from the blonde figure of Lashowe. She was sitting cross-legged, in a meditative position, right in the centre of the cold marbled floor.

Lashowe looked up at our approach, visibly startled, before standing and bowing in deference. Uthar strode over to her, caressing the side of her cheek. Lashowe’s speculative gleam fixed on Juhani.

She smiled, and the bottom of my stomach dropped out.

I smiled back at her.

"Wait here, Lashowe," Uthar murmured, and strode toward the training rooms. I still didn't get it, didn't understand Uthar's ploy, and wondered wildly if he was planning on making us duel. But then Uthar halted in the centre of the empty sparring arena.

"Where is the guard?" Uthar snapped to himself, staring toward the restricted corridor.

I knew what was down there, and the bile rose in my throat as Uthar started moving again, motioning us onwards. I found myself reaching for the Force instinctively. Play the game, Dak! Play the frelling game! This time the mental plea was directed at myself. But I had to get Juhani out, any way I could.

No matter what Uthar was planning to do. No matter what Uthar was planning on making me do. Oh, I'd knew the games he liked to play, in his twisted interrogation room. I'd been forced to partake in them more than once. But Uthar he was too strong for us to take on directly, in the heart of his fortress, surrounded by his guards and his allies.

The only thing I could do was play along until Uthar grew bored and left. Then I could extract Juhani safely.

There was no guard by the locked durasteel door, and that wasn’t normal, either.

I felt the Force coalesce in a swirling miasma coiling around my master. It was almost suffocating in its intensity. I should have struck him outside, tried to take him by surprise. But no, no, he was after Juhani – not me. Stay focused, Dak, and do what you need to, to survive. Play the game and get Juhani out afterward.

The door hissed open with a command from Uthar. “Go inside,” he ordered silkily. “There is someone I would like you both to meet.”

Juhani looked at me in confusion and not a little fear, before pursing her lips and taking a step forward. I followed her, into the gods-cursed room, my gaze darting to the blighted Force cages.

They were empty.

I swung around to face Uthar, and his expression had contorted into utter fury. “What is going on?”
he bellowed.

“Master Uthar-” I began, but didn’t know how to finish.

Uthar snarled, and strode to the console. “Stay!” he snapped at Juhani, who was standing awkwardly in the centre of the room, disgust evident in the tawny yellow of her eyes as they trailed over the manacles and the dried blood stains evident on the floor.

This is Korriban, Juhani, I thought sadly. This is what we turn into.

I took a step closer to Uthar, close enough to view the console as he keyed in a command. A gathering storm of anger grew on his face as he scrutinized the textual input, and I looked back to the exit, inwardly debating the risks of a sudden escape attempt. When I glanced back at Uthar, he’d lifted his head to stare at me. The fury in his opalescent eyes was sharp.

The emotion vanished a second later, to be replaced by benign calm. Like a fire constantly doused and reignited, Uthar jumped from rage to peace so swiftly that I thought it truly a sign of manifesting insanity.

"Well," Uthar murmured softly. "It seems I have a puzzle to solve."

There’s been a break-out, I realized with a wave of coldness. I hadn’t known of any recent prisoners, and I also didn’t think anyone would have the sheer gall to attempt such a thing. Yuthura, perhaps, if she planned on mounting a rebellion, but what worth would a prisoner hold for her? And, truly, I’d suspected Uthar had brought us here to imprison Juhani - as horrific as the thought was - and I still hadn’t a plan for how to extract her other than to wait Uthar out and hope he didn’t hurt her too badly in the process.

And then, somehow, sneak her off Korriban.

There was a tingling in my mind, then, and I opened my mouth to speak only to find my jaw had locked-

My entire body froze: my limbs, my fingers, even my eyes.

“Staria,” Master Uthar said, tapping a key on the console to clear the screen. The only movement I could make was breathing, and even that seemed almost insurmountable. “We Sith do not have the same code as the Jedi you trained with, so I can understand that you require a settling-in period. But I will have you know that the one thing I cannot abide is betrayal.”

His voice was calm and soft and reassuring, and the bastard had put me under stasis!”

“I apologize again, Master Uthar, for-”

“No, not you, Initiate,” Master Uthar chuckled. “I am not unreasonable. No, I am referring to Dak.”

My stomach churned and my ears rang. Shavit! Uthar had been snooping after all. If he named me a traitor… did he believe I would turn on him? Did he believe my feelings for Juhani trumped my loyalty to him?

Did they?

With a fierce mental lunge, I reached out to pull deep on the Force – but it was beyond my grasp, and all I could feel was this invisible barrier holding my body immobile. Keep trying, idiot! Uthar couldn’t trap me like this for long— it wasn’t one of his strengths— but breaking free wasn’t one of mine-

“Let him go,” Juhani hissed, and whatever nervousness had been in her demeanour was fast disappearing.

“I will let him have his chance to speak,” Uthar said mildly. “After I have had mine, of course. For I believe you would make an asset to the Sith, Staria, but first you must understand how grievously Dak has betrayed your kindness.”

What?

Mentally, I pummelled against the stasis with no apparent effect. Uthar liked to play his cruel, twisted games, but I hadn’t even thought he’d turn on me. I was his Adept! And I’d not done anything to Juhani, bar encourage her to join the Sith, so the bastard had absolutely nothing on me-

“I do not understand, Master Uthar.” I could see Juhani’s tawny gaze fixed on mine in the periphery of my vision, but try as I might, I was wholly unable to move. Even my damned eyes stayed fixed on the blank console screen, as I mentally struggled and pushed and slammed against Uthar’s shields.

“Why, Dak betrayed a dear friend of yours to me. To the Sith,” Uthar extrapolated. I focused on what little Force I could reach, shaped it into a tight ball of fury, and threw it with all my mental fortitude at the barrier that imprisoned me. It didn’t move. “Captured her because he was jealous, he told me, of your attachment to her. He took much delight in her pain.”

“What do you mean?” Juhani’s tone held nothing but frustration and mounting anger, now.

What the frell is he on about? My only consolation was that Juhani seemed as confused as me, so whatever Uthar's ploy was, it wasn’t working.

Uthar tapped a key, and the sounds of a woman screaming cut through the air. My eyes were drying out, still locked on the screen. The vid-feed was that of a tortured prisoner hanging limply in a cage coughing up blood that splattered onto the chrome flooring.

The prisoner was Belaya Linn.

Horror sheared deep through me, carving through my fury and alarm. It couldn't be true, it couldn't be right – Juhani said she was back at the Order! I numbly took in the scene of a limp woman, as a hank of sun-streaked brown hair fell over her face.

Juhani had stridden forward by then, next to the console. I couldn't see her damned expression, not held prisoner like this, but I heard the anguished whimper as it left her lips.

This had to be some sort of cursed trick, it couldn't - that can't be Belaya!

Uthar punched another key, and different footage of the same prisoner flared into view. The woman was obviously Belaya Linn, now: her face arched into direct view as pain contorted her features and cries of anguish ripped from her lungs. She convulsed, jerking wildly from side to side, metal restraints holding her fixed she shrieked from some invisible attack.

"No!" Juhani cried. "No, this cannot be true!"

"Please," a broken voice emanated from the video, in between screams. "No more."
Could Uthar forge a recording like this? I thought wildly, desperately searching for an answer beyond the obvious. But Uthar had expected a prisoner to be here... and he'd expected it to be someone of import to Juhani. I accepted, then, with a chilling abhorrence, that the videos showed the truth.

"I am afraid it is true, dear child," Uthar said consolingly. "Your friend Dak wanted you all to himself. That is why he killed Belaya."

What? No! With a ferocious surge of fury, I slammed myself hard against the stasis. I felt a tremble, then, but the shield still held. Like a rabid kinrath closing in for the kill, I pulled back to try again.

"I will not believe this monstrosity!" Juhani yelled, shaking her head violently, her warrior's tail lashing from side-to-side.

"Do you need to see more?" Uthar replied, tapping a key again. Belaya, now, choking as she gasped desperately for air, her face drawn and pale, and her eyes shot with red.

"Stop it!" Juhani shrieked. "Stop it at once!"

The console cut out under Uthar's command. My will punched into his Force barrier again, and again, and I could sense Uthar's stasis shuddering beneath my barrage.

"Let Dak go," Juhani demanded, her voice thrumming with rage. "I must hear from him."

"What would you hear, Initiate?" Uthar said softly. "How Dak left Dantooine under the pretence of study, choked in a cloud of bitterness because you rejected him? Or that he found Belaya, searching for you, and promised to keep her safe?"

"You said you would let Dak have his say," Juhani bit out, and her voice broke on my name. My heart stuttered. Don't believe him, Juhani! I wouldn't do that, not to Belaya, not even for you

I could only hope that Juhani kept faith in me, even if I didn't deserve it. My thoughts seethed with terror and anger and most of all – confusion.

Why would that bastard lie? Why would Uthar betray me?

"So I did," Uthar answered Juhani, even as he walked. My master laid a gentle hand on my frozen shoulder. Ah, but your thoughts betrayed me, Dak. You are not faithful, but perhaps your fury-filled friend will be. She would certainly make a tantalizing asset.

His oily voice sunk into my mind, deep enough that I didn't react in time as the stasis vanished, and instead stumbled inelegantly to the ground. I thudded heavily onto my side, grunting as sharp pain stabbed against my cheekbone.

"Dak, now is your chance to explain your actions, and why you brought Belaya to me," Uthar said, his words poisonous as they echoed throughout the room. I struggled to my knees, jerking desperately around to face Juhani.

Her eyes were wild and red-rimmed as they stared at me in horror.

"Speak, Dak!" Uthar ordered. "Explain why Belaya's torture was justified, why it was excusable to turn on one of your oldest friends!"

"Juhani! Its lies – all lies!" I spat out. "Trust me, I didn't know about Belaya, you told me she was safe on Dantooine!"
Uthar chuckled, and it sounded like the menacing crow of victory. "You say you are trustworthy, Dak, but you are quick enough to use Staria's true name to a Master of the Sith."

"Dak," Juhani said desperately. "I do not understand. That cannot be Belaya!"

"Oh, it was," Uthar cut in. "She was searching for you, Juhani. A pity she found Dak instead." He paused. "Dak always believed she was the best of you three. I am afraid my naughty adept is completely riddled with jealousy."

"No!" I snarled, fury swelling at the injustice. Force-strength shot through my limbs like wildfire – I'd had enough of cowering to that lying monster, and my hand dropped to my waist-

I went flying to the far side of the room, slamming against the wall, barely aware of Uthar’s outraised hand.

"No, Dak, it is your friend here who has cause against you. You captured, tortured and killed Belaya Linn. It is only fair that you face up to it in the form of Cathar justice, don't you think?"

"She cannot be dead, she cannot!" Juhani denied. Winded, I lifted my head to see her, her face pale beneath the downy fuzz on her cheeks. "Please, Dak, say something! Belaya… Belaya cannot be gone!"

"He's playing us, Juhani," I hissed, scrambling to my feet, struggling to pull in a breath. "Setting us against each other. I don't know what happened to Belaya, or if she is really dead-"

"Oh, you need to hear more?" Uthar injected, and jabbed one more at the console. Belaya's pleas for mercy filled the air again, stabbing into my heart like a chiv-blade

"Stop it!" I howled, fists clenching. My thoughts raced through flashbacks then- memories of Juhani, and Belaya, and Quatra that unemotional scow whom Juhani loved so futilely, and I shook my head irritably at the sudden, unprompted recollection-

“But you enjoyed hearing her break before, Dak. What, is it not so much fun now the woman you love is seeing what a monster you have become?"

"Dak, tell me this isn't true, this did not happen," Juhani pleaded, taking a step toward me. Her slanted eyes gleamed with the sheen of tears, and her lips pursed with abhorrence.

"It's not true!" I shot back desperately. "I mean, it seems like she must have been here, but I didn't know anything about it, Juhani! You must believe me!"

"How would I know all I do if Dak hadn't told me so readily, hmm?" Uthar countered. "Dak even confessed to me that he wished one day to capture your old Master Quatra, and hurt her as well. He deeply resents anyone you care about, Juhani." Uthar waggled a finger knowingly. "He is in dire need of a telling off, I do believe."

"No, no!" I yelled, and there was a sudden charge in the air. The Force picked up around me, fuelled by my hatred for the malevolent chivhole who ruled this cursed place.

Juhani was silent, and now was my chance-

The Force was wrested violently from my grasp, sucked away to agitate around Uthar- dark and foreboding and much, much stronger than anything I could hope to muster.

Juhani's face had set as she looked over to me. There was a sickly rage growing there, turning her eyes a tawny darkness.

"Belaya did not deserve this," she whispered, and her voice was bitter. "How could you, Dak? You say you loved me, and yet you do this to my dearest friend? Say something!" she finished on a howl, and her fur began to stand on end.

"Juhani, listen to me!" I begged desperately. "This is Uthar's doing, not mine! Trust me, please!"

"My doing?" Uthar scoffed. "I did not torture Belaya Linn. I certainly did not kill Belaya Linn. No, Dak, this is a quandary of your own making, and you shall reap the consequences."

"You murdering bastard!" I seethed, and suddenly my lightsaber was in my grasp, hissing red fury in front of me.

"How can I trust you, Dak?" Juhani cried, her voice hoarse, and my gaze snapped back to her. Her mouth curled down in torment. "Not so long ago you were desperate to have me stay on Korriban!"

"Juhani, for the last time, it wasn't me!" I raged, the 'saber wavering in my grasp as I glared alternately between her and Uthar.

"Are you thinking of believing his lies, Juhani?" Uthar said. "Do I need to remind you once more of what he has done?" There was a tap, and the tortured cries of Belaya shot through the room again, pleading for a mercy she hadn't been granted. All despair vanished from Juhani's expression, replaced by a manifesting fury. "Damn you, Dak Vesser!"

No. No! I thought in growing horror. "Juhani, Uthar is the real evil here!"

But Uthar's attention was caught, suddenly, by something else, and he turned to face the closed durasteel door. A frown pleated the pallid skin on his brow.

There was a flash of swirling Force around Juhani, a whiplash of temper snapping, and I understood, then, that my friend had finally lost control.

"Well," Uthar murmured, jerking his head back to face us. "It seems I have visitors at my front door, and my attention is needed elsewhere." He smiled at me then, kind and benevolent and evil. "And I can see you two have a lot to discuss."

He strode over to the door, thumping his hand on the controls, and I was torn between chasing the bastard down or staying to face my fury-filled friend.

I watched him leave, impotent, and as the door swished closed I heard the ominous snap-hiss of a lightsaber activating behind me.

xXx
The Force was blistering; decalescent in its passion and its unmitigated acrimony for whoever dared oppose me. It flared a blinding white through my mind, my limbs, my blood. It was unstoppable.

I will do whatever is needed.

The rage was hot; so very, very hot; it burned away any rational or emotional thought other than itself. I had no visual awareness of my surroundings now, just an understanding that metallic walls encased me and that blips of life were nearby. Non-threatening, and not currently in my way.

Anything in my way I will overcome.

The core of the inferno was the flipside, though. Cold, icy cold thought; straddling ideas and connections, formulating strategies for my end-goal: Bastila. The Headmaster might be a problem if I encountered him simultaneously with the ex-Jedi bitch, but he could be distracted if I manipulated his apprentice. There, there - that was my first objective. Find the apprentice and convert her into an ally.

An ally can help, provided it is not a weakness.

And the blips of life on this freighter were weaknesses, distractions.

There was shouting, there was howling, there was confusion around me, but it was unimportant and I blocked it out as I turned and strode away. I could do this on my own, and I would.

My way.

“Jen!” A young girl’s voice in front of me. She had large brown eyes. The eyes were staring at me in appeal.

“Get out of my way,” the words shot out, low and cold and deep, in a voice that was not my own. My heart was pounding an incessant angry beat: Find Bastila, find Bastila, find Bastila. And to hold onto this rage-fuelled power, I needed to be independent of emotional connections. I couldn’t afford any fault-lines that my enemies might exploit.

I must act, now, and leave these handicaps behind.

A crescendo of air currents picked up, centred around me, lifting loose objects into the air. My rage began to transform into sheer, uninhibited power.

And it would stay with me as long as the passion rode in my veins.

“Jen, calm down, please!” the girl begged. “We have to do this together!”

My arms shot out and firmly shoved the blue Twi’lek to the side, hard enough that she staggered back, falling over. Real violence wasn’t necessary yet - unless she held me back again.

“Jen, not this way, not this way!” Another voice, and a heavy hand fell on my shoulder from behind. “You leave us like this and you’ll lose yourself! Zaalbar won’t stop howling, he needs you! Belaya’s panicking. And I- I need you too, Jen. Don’t go – not this way. Not this way.”

This is the way. The only way powerful enough to achieve my objective.

But there was a crack there, now, in the fire-encased ice; a threat to the immeasurable energy that was coalesced around me, waiting for my command.

“Let me go,” I hissed to the person behind me. I couldn’t listen to him. If I did, my strength would fade, would slip from my grasp, and I would be weaker, unable to do what needed to be done.

Displace him. If he won’t move, make him.

“No. No, I won’t.” His voice was low enough to be a whisper, but there was steel in it too. “I’ll protect you from yourself if I have to.”

“Jen, you came back to us after Manaan.” It was the kid again, standing in front of me somehow. Her wide eyes were vulnerable and hopeful and believed in me when they really shouldn’t. The man’s hand on my shoulder was an anchor of warmth – not blistering fury-filled power – but gentle warmth that was sinking deep through the tornado of black energy I held with my will alone. The kid blinked, and her light brown eyes glistened and tugged at me. “Don’t go away again, Jen. Please.”

This is the only way!

“You won’t win if you fall, Jen,” the man said in my ear.

A violent shudder shook me, deep to my bones. You won’t win if you fall. There was a horrifying truth there that my soul understood. The twisting tornado of power that was attracted to my will and my desire convulsed once and then fractured. It collapsed and imploded inward before vanishing.

The Force plunged from my grasp.

I gasped as all emotion retreated, leaving only the numbness from before. It froze my muscles and thoughts collectively. I gasped again, shivering, and suddenly I was spun around, and there were firm arms tight around me, my face pressed against a wall of warm, cloth-covered muscle.

“Shhh, shhh,” Carth was murmuring, and gradually rational thought returned, creeping through my anaesthetized thoughts. Bastila, oh no, Bastila. I’d lost it. I’d completely lost it, just there, just like I had on Rii’shn, just like Tatooine. The unyielding and almighty power of Darth Revan’s rage had comprehensively swept me aside. If it hadn’t been for Carth and Mission, there would have been no turning back. I did not think Revan would have left this time. I shuddered again, and Carth’s arms tightened around me, anchoring me to the present.

There was pure terror, there, deep in my mind, at just how easily she could assume command of me when the chips were down. I wasn’t a match for her. Jen Sahara had held her at bay for much longer than Ness Jonohl had ever managed to.

Was Jen Sahara actually a stronger identity than Ness Jonohl? Was that why she was in my head? But… why was Revan?

Bastila knew, but now she was captured. Bastila. No. No…
My brain slowly started processing again, and the sounds of Zaalbar howling in confused despair filtered through to me. I tensed, blinking against Carth’s chest, understanding that it wasn’t just me in an unhinged state.

“Are you… are you okay, Jen?” Carth spoke into my hair.

“No.” The word was torn out of me, unbidden and broken.

“Your expression,” he murmured, so quiet I could barely hear. “I’ve seen that look before, on Taris, before… before I understood… the Dark Side, I’m only really beginning to comprehend what you have to face, now…”

I felt safe, warm, secure; and it was more difficult to pull out of his embrace than it should have been. “I’ll do,” I muttered, stepping back, grasping at some semblance of control that I wasn’t even sure I had. His arms dropped, and I made sure to evade his gaze that I knew was searching my face for any iota of anger.

I saw, then, that I was next to the exit hatch of the ‘Hawk. I didn’t even remember walking there, just a red-haze of furious power surrounding an ice-cold determination, that cared for nothing except retrieving Bastila, at any cost, to anyone.

At any cost.

I took a large gulp of air, and fumbled for the calm that should have been easier to reach.

Behind Carth, I saw Canderous and HK further down the corridor. They both had blasters raised, tracking on us. HK’s, I presumed, were pointed at Carth in the case of a threat to his master. My lips twisted as my stomach turned. That droid… I’d have to do something about him.

But he’d saved my life just one hour ago.

My eyes flicked to Canderous. His expression was inscrutable, although the side of his mouth twitched as he caught my gaze.

“I set it to stun,” he answered my unspoken question, lowering his heavy repeater before slinging it over his shoulder. Ah, yes, Canderous, but who were you aiming at? Perhaps I didn’t need to know.

“Zaalbar,” I muttered to myself, striding past them all a little shakily and back into the belly of the ‘Hawk. Zaalbar was still howling, having collapsed to the ground, clutching his head. His fingers were pulling tight against his fur. Kylah screwed his mind somehow. Mission had a hand on his shoulder – she’d run back here then – but she looked up as I approached. Her eyes shone with hope at my appearance, but there was a guardedness there that’d been missing earlier. I’d scared her.

My gaze slipped to the side, and I saw Belaya pressed tight against the kitchenette wall. If I’d scared Mission, then I’d absolutely petrified the Jedi with that show of Dark Side power.

“Who are you?” Belaya mouthed, her words silent and unspoken. Her eyes were stretched wide in fright. I grimaced, and realized that even the non-Force sensitives would have felt something back then. The coppery tang of blood invaded my mouth, and I became aware I was biting the inside of my cheek in a frantic struggle for control.

I need Bastila. That’s why I came back from Rii’shn. To stop Darth Revan returning. But Bastila’s captured. And I can’t… I can’t become Darth Revan - not even to save Bastila.

For would Darth Revan care about Bastila, other than to see her as a tool or a weakness? Had Darth Revan cared about anyone?

I swallowed convulsively, and felt the presence of the others follow me in to the common room. One thing at a time. Focus on one goal at a time. My conviction firmed, pushing aside the concerns and doubts that weighed me down. Zaalbar, first.

“Zaalbar,” I said as I approached, kneeling next to the Wookiee. He was whimpering now, head bowed, and paws still clawing at his hair. I didn’t know the power required to undo this damage, I could only think of a dubious path that may help. I pulled a little on the Force, feeling the anger still burning-the power is here, I know what I have to do, how else can I get Bastila back?

-and gently interleaved it with my next words. “Zaalbar, calm down. Calm down, and tell us what happened. Your mind is your own.” I could hear the heaviness in my words - the mind trick I’d struggled with back on the desert planet was second-nature, now. Zaalbar stilled, his arms dropped, and he looked up.

“(Jen Sahara,)” he moaned, and I had never heard him so anguished. “(I have failed you utterly. I am weak of mind, and handed your bond-sister over to the arms of your enemy. I have disgraced myself in the worst imaginable way. Please, I beg of you, allow me to take my life in shame.)” His eyes were deep black pools of despair.

“Zaalbar, I need you,” I entreated. “Mission needs you. We need to get Bastila back.”

A noise escaped him; half-howl, half-whine. “(I betrayed you, Jen Sahara.)” His voice was hoarse with pain.

“No,” I whispered back. “Or at least not by choice. Your redemption can come in the form of aid. I need you strong, Zaalbar, not wallowing in self-pity.”

He dropped his head into his paws, but not before giving a shaky nod. He didn’t appear to have the heart to say anything further, so I stood, slowly, turning to face the rest of the crew. They were all staring at me with varying degrees of wariness or concern.

“Bastila’s been taken by Kylah Aramai hours ago,” I said to the silent common room. “Bastila must have been drugged into unconsciousness, which is why I never realized…” My eyes closed briefly. Should I have realized? Was I, in part, to blame? The obscurity of the bond had been unsettling… but she hadn’t fully recovered since Manaan. Not the time for recriminations, idiot. That can come later! I snapped open my eyes. “She’s got a neural disruptor around her neck. I felt it, just now, just like on Taris. Bastila is completely powerless, and Kylah’s taken her to the Academy.”

The reactions around the room differed. HK-47 stared at me intently through his red electronic gaze, awaiting my next order. Canderous pulled at his gun, checking the thermal warming light and who knew what else. He spent more time modifying his weapons than sleeping, some days. Mission was still at Zaalbar’s side, her eyes darting between us both, wide and solemn and a bit scared. Carth… I had trouble reading him, and I knew he’d be thinking about his son, but his attention was zeroed in on me. He looked a little relieved, a little wary, maybe.

Belaya was still pale, but there was more than just fright lurking in her light blue eyes. “What do you mean, you felt it?” she demanded.

I stared at her for a moment in silence, wondering about Belaya’s strength. She had to still be in pain with those ribs. “Bastila and I share a Force-bond,” I explained. “But she suffered a great psychic injury recently, which is why I didn’t realize earlier… I should have known something was up… I…” Dammit, Ness, get a hold of yourself!

“(Jen Sahara, you cannot blame yourself in any part for this!” Zaalbar howled suddenly. “(No, I will not allow you to! This was my doing, my blame, my gross misconduct!)”

“Zaalbar,” I sighed, looking back over to him. “Kylah screwed you with the Force. How the frell were you meant to stop her?”

“Bitching back and forth about blame helps no one,” Canderous snapped. “So quit whining, and let’s work out how we’re gonna save the princess!”

I gave him a sharp nod, and closed my eyes. My thoughts raced as I thought about the possibilities. Screw Darth Revan. I can do this, with my allies, and we’ll sodding well make it work. We have to make it work. “The Star Map,” I muttered, opening my eyes again. I looked over to Carth. “That’s the single most important thing here. It’s time the break the radio blackout. Carth, can you send the coordinates? This might be the last Map left, if the Republic is lucky. We need to get a copy of the data off-world before we storm the Academy in a fight we may not win.”

“I don’t know Bastila’s contacts,” Carth replied, his eyes so dark they were almost black. “But I can transfer them straight to Admiral Dodonna. They’ll get through to the Jedi from there.”

“Do it,” I ordered, before turning to the Mandalorian. “Canderous, Mission, you’re staying behind. Canderous-”

“What?” the Mandalorian snapped, and he was furious. I raised my hand, forestalling him, and was almost surprised when he subsided.

“The Ebon Hawk must be ready to take off in case we come back running, or don’t come back at all. You can pilot. Carth needs to come with me – he might be the only one Dustil will listen to.”

Canderous grunted, and the frustration on his face abruptly vanished. He swung his heavy gaze on Carth. “Family… clan. There is nothing more important than that. Very well, Jen, I’ll concede Republic deserves that chance.” He nodded, once, and Carth nodded back in silence.

“Zaalbar,” I turned to the Wookiee, and he raised his scruffy head slowly. The look in his eyes could only be described as tortured. “Mission will stay behind, safe on the ‘Hawk. Help me get Bastila back.” And as the Wookiee clambered to his feet, I saw the anger begin to manifest on his face. Unworldly anger at what Kylah had made him do. It was more effective than despair.

“(I will retrieve your bond-sister or die in the attempt, Jen Sahara.)”

“Big Z-” The Twi’lek’s voice wavered, and Zaalbar placed a gentle paw on her shoulder.

“(Mission. You will stay behind.)”

“Listen this time, Mission,” I ordered, and her wide eyes turned to mine. “Your safety on this ship might be all that holds Zaalbar together.” I saw the Twi’lek swallow once before nodding.

My gaze finally turned to Belaya. She was staring at me solidly, a composed mask hiding the ever-present fear. “I will come,” she said quietly. “I came to Korriban to save Juhani, and the bitter irony is that I may have endangered her instead. I will come, and fight at your side to find her.”
I sent her a nod. “Get some more kolto and stims from the medbay, Belaya. And get some armour from Zaalbar if you’re so inclined.”

I turned back to Carth. “Send the Star Map data, Carth. We’ll get kitted up, and then-” I breathed in deeply. “Then, we’re off to find Yuthura Ban.”

xXx

Even in the dead of night, Dreshdae was still bustling with mercenaries and Czerka staff alike. The cantina, however, was mostly empty other than a Mandalorian I didn’t recognize skulking in the corner. The stark, rectangular room held no evidence of a Twi’lek Dark Jedi master, but my Force senses were aware of her. And just below the surface, my rage still hummed-

-give into it, this is the stronger way, if I want Bastila back-

-like the heat of embers, banked for now, but ready to catch again at the slightest chance. The steady presence of Carth behind grounded me, and the furious anguish of Zaalbar kept me together. He deserved a chance to redeem himself, and I couldn’t give him that if I fell.

Ness Jonohl had never fallen, but Revan certainly had. Though curse her to the Outer Rim and back if I was going to let the rage consume me again. I will not let Revan win. I will not!

There must be a way to succeed without becoming her, and I had to find it.

Behind the bar, to the right, was a blank wall. Beyond that I could feel the dark Force corruption of a Master. I strode over to the wall, my hand raised.

“Hey! You can’t go there!” the bartender protested as the Force swept out from my hand and pushed instinctively at the plasteel wall. The hidden door I knew had to be there swung inward, and I walked forward. The clanking noise of HK followed me, along with the steps of the others.

The room ahead was small and windowless, lit by hanging amber lights that radiated over Yuthura and Mekel. A small table graced the centre of the room, and further ahead was a shadowy alcove that likely led to sleeping quarters. They’d shot to their feet, angry surprise evident on Mekel’s face as he brandished an activated lightsaber.

Yuthura was composed; her only sign of displeasure her pursed red lips.

“Ness Jonohl,” she said silkily, motioning Mekel to lower his ‘saber. Her violet eyes trailed behind me. “I understand you have been gallivanting in the shyrack caves.”

Perhaps I shouldn’t have been surprised she knew that. No doubt, Yuthura had eyes placed everywhere in Dreshdae.

I inclined my head. “I’d hoped to bring you another present, Yuthura, but Thalia May was a bit too keen on jumping on the next transport. For some reason, Korriban isn’t really her scene anymore.”

“What the actual frakk-”

“Mekel,” Yuthura hissed, and he subsided, thwarted for now. His blue eyes flashed angrily at me, but I wondered if there’d been a glint of concern in them as well. It felt that way, through the Force. Mekel’s emotions were easy for me to sense; anger, worry, concern - all blended together. Thalia really was one of their group. Yuthura’s gaze had narrowed in obvious dislike. “Is this your idea of a joke, Initiate?”
“Check the Dreshdae holo-cams,” I said coldly. “Thalia survived, but her companions did not.”

Her face twisted as a mass of emotions travelled through her expression before it was swept clean. I was pretty sure relief had been one of them. Disbelief featured heavily too. “I believe I told you to kill her should you find her, Initiate.”

“Yes, but one, you didn’t think she could still be alive, and two, we both know I’m not an Initiate. Besides, stop trying to pretend like you don’t care about your apprentices.”

Yuthura paused, her lips pursing again. Her violet gaze returned to appraise the others behind me. “So. Another Force-sensitive, a soldier, a Wookiee and a heavily armoured droid. You have some interesting companions, Ness Jonohl.”

I crossed my arms. “Kylah. Let’s talk about Kylah.”

“Excuse me?” she snapped. There was anger there, and recognition of some sort. Mekel was frowning behind her in confusion.

“Kylah,” I bit out. “Where is she?”

“You seem to be under the impression that you can order me around, Ness Jonohl,” she murmured, and her hand dropped to the metal cylinder at her waist. “Perhaps you should remember exactly whom you are speaking to.”

“I saved the lives of two of your apprentices!” I yelled, and now the rage was back, simmering, boiling, and threatening to overflow-

“Jen,” Carth said in warning. I felt my fists clenching, and breathed in deep. Yuthura’s eyes tightened as her hand wrapped around her lightsaber. She was wary, now. And I was close to screwing this up.

Channel Bastila. There is no emotion, there is peace. And Yuthura can be an ally. Darth Revan knew that, but so did Ness Jonohl.

“You want to overthrow Uthar,” I said, my voice tight with barely repressed emotion. “Uln’s head might sway some of the Initiates, but it’s not going to work on his Adepts. I can neutralize Dak and Dustil.”

Mekel’s face twisted. His anger flared in the Force at the mention of his old friend’s name. Yuthura stayed blank, cold. “You are proposing an alliance, Ness Jonohl?”

“I want Kylah,” I bit out. “I need to find her, and I’m going to the Academy now to do so. I do not want to be distracted by Uthar Wynn.”

“Distracted…” Mekel muttered in disbelief, and Yuthura’s hand swatted him lightly on the head. He scowled.

“Kylah Aramai is at the Academy?” she questioned, and I knew, then, that Yuthura had no idea of Kylah’s plans or prisoner. I relaxed, ever so slightly.

“Yes,” I hissed. “What do you say, Yuthura? Shall we go storm the Academy?”

“Let us be completely honest with each other, Ness Jonohl,” Yuthura returned. Her gaze was sharp on mine, but her hand had dropped away from her leather-clad waist. Mekel edged closer to her. “I will be the next Headmaster of this Academy. I do not believe you would make a particularly subordinate apprentice.”

Despite myself, despite the cursed situation, a chuckle escaped my lips. “I don’t want to like you, Yuthura Ban, but it seems I can’t help myself. You are quite amusing.”

Her lips curved as she recognized her own words, parroted back to her. “What is your endgame, Ness Jonohl?”

“Kylah,” I said flatly. “After that, I’m leaving this frell-hole with Staria. And Dustil. And maybe even Dak, we haven’t quite decided on that one.” I wasn’t going to mention Kel, not yet. He was one of hers.

Yuthura subsided into silence, her attention still fixed on me. Mekel, at her side, leaned in close, his angry blue eyes landing on everyone in the room in turn. He really was loyal, I understood, to those he’d pledged himself to.

“Do you have a plan, Ness Jonohl, other than to rush in, lightsabers flashing?” Yuthura quirked an eyebrow, almost mockingly, and I found my gaze wandering over her scantily clad form. She used sexuality as both a tool and a distraction, I realized. The tattoos on her head-tails were interesting. Not many Twi’leks would willingly go through the pain of marking the most sensitive part of their body for decoration. I wondered if she did it to prove something.

“I’ll take out Kylah Aramai,” I said finally. ”You focus on Uthar Wynn, and turning any Initiates you can. Mekel can aim for Lashowe. Staria’s inside somewhere and might be able to assist, and I’ve already told you that Dak and Dustil won’t be a problem. That just leaves whatever soldiers and Initiates side with Uthar - and if we’re quick with our assault then the rest of my crew should be able to hold off whatever forces Uthar can rally.”

Her luminescent eyes narrowed as she lapsed into silence.

“This is your chance, Yuthura,” I prompted. “Uthar will know something’s up, by now. You’re not going to get a better shot than this.”

She folded her arms, but I saw the resolution settle on her face. “Very well. If now is the time, then so shall it be,” she murmured. “You can lead the way, Ness Jonohl.”

Yuthura wanted to see my back, to have the advantage of retreat, if need be. But her prize was Uthar’s position; so for now, I could trust her at my rear. I didn’t think I had any other choice.

My gaze zeroed in on Mekel. He was handsome and young and didn’t like me, but we had unfinished business.

“Mekel,” I said. “Tell me what happened to Selene.”

I saw Yuthura blink in the periphery of my vision, but it was Mekel’s expression I focused on. His expressive face twisted once more, and on the Force ebbed a wave of grief. Selene had meant something to him, to him and Dustil both.

His eyes pinched and he glared at me. “None of your frakking business-”

“I’m making it my business,” I snapped. “Dustil thinks you killed her. Did you?”

I heard an intake of breath behind me as Carth shifted position. Mekel’s mouth dropped open, and a flush mottled his pale face, a splash of colour against the jet-black of his hair.
But it was Yuthura who spoke.

“I know not what your game is with Uthar’s pet, but Selene’s death lays at the feet of his Master.”

“What?” Mekel snapped, jerking to face Yuthura. “What do you mean, Master? How- why didn’t you tell me?”

Her gaze slid to her angry apprentice. “I have no proof, Mekel, only my knowledge of my Master. But Selene was planning to run, even I knew as much. And she would have taken you with her I suspect.”

My senses were cinched tight on the Force, and there was outrage burning hotly from Mekel now. It was surprising how keenly I could feel his emotions. They almost seemed to blur into my own. Maybe he was one of those people who left themselves intrinsically open to the Force.

“Youthura, I-”

“Later, please,” she murmured, and her hand entwined with his briefly. She looked back at me and her gaze hardened. “Selene was a risk to both Mekel’s and Dustil’s training. Uthar always had an uncanny interest in Dustil, and I would lay credits on him manipulating events to cast the blame for Selene’s death on Mekel.”

Mekel was shaking his head. “Dustil’s always blamed me for Selene, but I thought she’d just taken off, like she said-”

“I do not believe so, Mekel,” Yuthura said, and her voice was quiet. Her hand raised to touch him once more, light and quick. “Come, we must focus on current events.”

It wasn’t quite the proof I’d been after, but maybe it would suffice. I took in a deep lungful of air and turned around. Zaalbar, Belaya and HK were flanking the exit, with Carth two steps in front of them. I stepped to face him, meeting his concerned gaze head-on as I readied myself to confront the Academy.

“I won’t fall, Carth,” I whispered, soft enough that I could at least pretend no one else would hear. “The neural disruptor on Bastila – it caught me off-guard – I… I won’t fall. Not again.”

“I know.” He smiled crookedly, even if it didn’t dissipate the unease on his face.

xXx

The ominous ferracrystal doors creaked open as Belaya and I approached. She hadn’t said a word since we’d departed the freighter, quiet and resolute in her determination to find Juhani. Wearing a thin chromex suit Zaalbar had found for her, and clasping my off-hand saber, Belaya looked ready to fight the world for her friend. The confusion and shock of everything must have been debilitating to her psyche, but somehow, Belaya had composed herself admirably.

Bastila. Juhani. They had to be inside. I didn’t know how much longer I could keep it all together, keep sweeping my allies forward in a shaky leadership that was being thwarted at all turns. But if Yuthura could engage Uthar, then I’d be free to track down Kylah Aramai.

My lips twisted as I fought back the desire to rip the skin from her body, inch by inch.

The extensive ceremonial hall loomed beyond the Academy’s doors, and I could see several figures standing to attention in the centre. Uthar Wynn, in the middle, flanked by that blonde-haired Lashowe. A line of soldiers circled them, blasters at the ready. A half-dozen Initiates. No sign of Kylah.

I stepped forward, clearing the threshold, Belaya at my side. HK, Zaalbar and Carth at my back.

The doors slammed shut with a resounding thud, and I spun in alarm. Yuthura and Mekel were still outside. Sithspit!

“Uthar Wynn,” I hissed, turning back, lightsaber in my grasp. “Your apprentice wishes to speak with you.”

Yuthura had control over those damn doors, she did, unless Uthar had changed something...

The Force swirled a darkness around him and he chuckled. “My apprentice can wait. I believe I have caught you going to Dreshdae again, Ness Jonohl.” His occluded gaze veered sideways to land on Belaya. “And you have found a friend of mine.”

“Where is Juhani?” Belaya demanded, and a beam of red flared to life in her hands. In my own grasp, Karon’s lightsaber emitted a blinding cyan that sparked against the looming statues gracing the circular room. The Force thrummed a calming power through the ‘saber.

"Where is Kylah Aramai?" I demanded. The Force was building now, around me, around Uthar, escalating in a torrent of power that brushed against us all. Lashowe’s ‘saber hissed as it activated, and there was a shuffling as the dozen or so soldiers firmwed their collective grasps on their weapons. Six other ‘sabers flared behind them as the Initiates flocked to Uthar's back. Initiates, I had hoped, that might have been swayed or at least confused by a challenge from Yuthura Ban.

“(Where is Bastila Shan?)” Zaalbar roared; a wild, unyielding bellow that echoed throughout the cavern. One uniformed soldier snapped, opening fire, and Uthar’s arm reached to blast a wave of Force against us all-the gritty sounds of warfare were all encompassing, but I had to keep the shield up, to aid our advance. Stretched so far around so many, it took all the effort I could muster, repelling the blaster shots and grenades

…

…

A thick, solid Force shield sprung up from my will, deflecting the barrage of bolts back through the cavern. I saw at least two soldiers collapse from deflecting fire, and Uthar’s clouded gaze widened in surprise. I grunted, my hand held high, as my power overwhelmed his and batted it away.

Not far from here, there was another growing crescendo of power, and it bore the taste of bitter grief and manifesting rage. I recognized it all too well. It felt the same as when I’d first met Juhani, in the hot dunes of Tatooine.

“Juhani!” Belaya gasped, picking up on it too. She sprinted past me, off to the side.

“HK, Zaalbar, protect Belaya!” I ordered, as I saw Lashowe dart sideways to intercept the injured human. At least three Initiates broke away, following the Sith Adept. Zaalbar snarled, flinging aside a soldier in his way. My shield dropped, and HK opened fire, his repeating blaster gutting into the line of soldiers moving to flank the Wookiee.

Karon’s ‘saber spun in my grasp, parrying lasers back into the crowd, Carth returning fire from my side. Further ahead, Zaalbar snarled in pain as an Initiate dug a lightsaber deep into his flank. The Force shot out from my hand, pummelling a wave of compressed air into the crowd, toppling over the soldiers like dejarik pieces conceding defeat.

“Sith!” Uthar hollered, and his Force-enhanced voice echoed throughout the Academy. “To me, to your Master! Kill the intruders!”

Lightning crackled from an exit as Lashowe sprinted after Belaya; I had a brief glimpse of Zaalbar bodily picking up an Initiate and smashing him into the rock before disappearing after them. HK had already gone.

Force skewered agonizingly into my mind, and I screamed, muscles clenching in protest as Uthar launched a blistering mental attack at my psyche. No finesse, no end-goal in sight, just a violent ripping of the aural patterns within my head.

-counterc-attack, succumb to the dark, mine is stronger than his-

No, no, no, not even for this, I’d lose myself again-

-I’ll lose myself in every way if I don’t!-

There were other ways; shields, diversion, brute mental strength; but the cerebral tearing was so afflicting I couldn’t think straight, and it was dredging up an awful echo of darkness that simmered just below my consciousness-

“You dare to walk into my Academy and challenge me?” Uthar roared, and I took that moment to fling a Force shield over my mind, and he attacked again-

My defences shattered under his onslaught, and his psychic attack uprooted a chasm of malevolence that seemed to be at the very foundation of my being. He dragged it to the forefront and it clouded everything.

It was a netherworld of swirling obscurity, a tenebrous arctic where all emotion was frozen solid, boreal and bitter in its unyielding coldness. There was yawning depth of grief beneath it all, ancient and never-ending, a despair so encompassing that it felt like it could cover the entirety of the galaxy.

And around the edges of it all licked the burning flames of rage, wildly feral in its destructive fury.

I vaguely sensed Uthar floundering, staggering back, caught off-guard by the sickening miasma of pure Dark Side.

No! Not this way! I will not!

But there were connections there, thin and fragile and golden, and the brighter ones held echoes of recent importance.

A friend’s faith. Even if we have failed before, there is still hope to do better.

A girl’s plea. Don’t go away again, Jen. Please.

A bond-sister’s trust. Do not surrender to your rage! You are stronger than this!

A man’s truth. You won’t win if you fall.

With a fortitude I didn’t realize was within me, I heaved Uthar’s power away, hurled it out of my mind, and the Force coalesced around me in a tight shield of pure will.
Uthar’s eyes were wide with shock. “You are… darker than I thought, Ness Jonohl.”

I didn’t give him the joy of an answer, instead I raised my ‘saber and charged.

Uthar launched another mental probe, but it skittered off my shield, and he dragged his lightsaber up just in time to meet mine. Cyan sparked against red, and I heaved against him until he stumbled backwards. I lunged forward, aiming for an exposed limb, but Uthar blocked in time, and our lightsabers crashed together again and again in a furious dance of might and will.

My mind sharpened, looking for an opening, even as I was uncomfortably aware that one lone ‘saber was not my preferred weapon’s choice. Uthar was cautious in his swordplay, his defense tight and unyielding, blocking rather than launching an offensive.

And then, the Force whispered a split-seconds warning before lightning spat from his hand-

I directed it towards me, channelled the electrical energy into a tight, closed, sparking ball, and parried it viciously off my lightsaber. With a loud crack, the sphere shot back and landed directly in Uthar’s chest. He howled, stumbling backwards, and I closed the distance between us in three furious strides.

An overhead swing caught him to the side of his torso as the lightning dissipated; his lightsaber blocked but not before mine had scored a hit. With a rabid snarl, Uthar unleashed another mental thrust that staggered me backwards. I grunted, pulled in the Force tight to throw it off, and saw then that Uthar had retreated some metres back.

With one hand pressed on his side, I could see blood seeping through his fingers. It wasn’t a mortal injury, his robes were likely cortosis-weaved and had offered some resistance to my strike. But I’d wounded him, and he was angry.

“Where is Kylah Aramai?” I hissed. As I said it, I kept my focus on him, on his face, on the emotions. He knew Kylah, had some awareness of her presence, but overall - through his fury at me - the strongest thing I could pick up on was puzzlement.

“Dustil,” Uthar grunted, his bloodied off-hand motioning behind him. There was a dead patch of Force my senses hadn’t noticed until now and my eyes narrowed. Everywhere else in the cavern sprawled the bodies of Sith soldiers, and I had no idea how most of them had been downed. Force waves. Force deflection. Pure, deathly Force power. Non-Force users were chaff in a fight like this. “Come to my side, and help me finish this interloper.”

Carth. My senses pulled back behind me. I could sense him on the ground, breathing steadily. He was downed, but not out. I’d not had the concentration to spare on him earlier, and worried over his state. I stepped back a pace, lightsaber raised as an instinctive guard, and immediately damned my overt action as Uthar’s milky-white gaze slid past me. He smirked.

“One of your crew, Ness Jonohl? Did you really think it wise to bring non-Force users in here?” He chuckled, and his posture straightened with arrogance. I’d hurt him, but his confidence returned as he sensed a weakness of mine. “Dustil, you end this scow’s soldier while I take her out.”

I laughed, low and mocking. “Good call, Uthar. Let’s see what Dustil has to say about that, shall we?”

“What?” Uthar snapped, his conceit fading into angry confusion. He turned his head to face his invisible Adept. Dustil’s weaves dropped, and the young man looked between us both, furious and uncertain.
“I told you to leave Korriban!” Dustil yelled at me.

“And I told you that wasn’t an option!” I hollered back. “It was always going to come down to this choice, Dustil, and you damn well know it!”

“What is going on?” Uthar barked. The skin hung on his face, and the pallid patches that weren’t inked with black began to flush a mottled crimson. “Dustil, explain this at once!”

“Oh shut up, Uthar, it’s not all about you,” I flared angrily as my gaze slid back to the twisted Headmaster. He looked so far beyond outraged it would have been comical in another circumstance. “Or maybe… maybe it actually is. After all, I’m sure Dustil would appreciate hearing exactly how you killed Selene.”

There was a flicker of recognition in those clouded, corrupted eyes, and Uthar’s face went slack for a brief instant. But the fury returned like a heat-wave. “You lying schutta!” he bellowed. “Who do you think you are, entering my Academy and throwing these falsehoods about?”

“I am Ness Jonohl,” I returned in a low voice. “And I am a Jedi Knight!”

Uthar snorted, and it grew into a scornful laugh of disbelief. “I’ve seen your mind, Ness Jonohl,” he sneered. “A Jedi Knight you most assuredly are not.”

“Like I’d believe any kath crap that spews from your mouth, Uthar Wynn,” I spat back. “You killed Selene and cast the blame on Mekel, all to drive Dustil away from anyone he cared about.”

“Master Uthar,” Dustil whispered in confusion, his gaze jumping between the two of us. There was growing anger and frustration there, and I wasn’t sure how long the younger Onasi would stay in control of himself. His hand was shaking on his lightsaber.

“Search your feelings, Dustil,” Uthar said through clenched teeth, but his attention remained fixed on me. His eyes had narrowed to slits of milky white. “You know Mekel loved Selene and was jealous of your involvement with her.”

I snorted. “Mekel is a foul-tongued little creep, but his one redeeming quality is loyalty. He would not have betrayed you.” I looked over to the young Onasi, and stared straight into his brown eyes, willing him to believe the truth. “Dustil, if you truly thought Mekel had, you would have killed him by now.”

“Dustil,” the groan came from behind us, and I stiffened, raising my lightsaber warily. Dustil paled, his expression aghast as he stared behind me. “I failed you as a father. Give me another chance. Please…”

There was a second of dead silence in the room, and Uthar’s mouth dropped open as he processed this new information.

“This… this is your father?” Uthar gasped. His eyes widened. “Dustil! Now is the chance to claim your destiny! Kill the soldier, and prove yourself worthy to be my first apprentice!”

“Oh, you know, don’t,” I retorted. “Instead, how about stepping back from the bastard who murdered your girlfriend and implicated your best friend?”

Uthar snarled, and launched a ball of lightning that hit me square in the chest. Static sheared through me, ripping pain across my skin and tearing into nerve endings, flushing out the rage yet again. But a cornerstone of my mind held firm, tamped the unworldly fury back under control, and thrust the crackling energy back at its creator.
Uthar flung it aside like a loth-cat batting a dust-ball. “Dustil,” he seethed. “For the last time, kill the soldier!”

I grasped the Force tight, wrapping it around Uthar’s ankles and yanking, like a lasso – but somehow he blocked it and the weaves unravelled against his limbs. Dustil looked once more toward Carth in desperation, and then his face firmed.

He raised his lightsaber, and turned to face Uthar Wynn.

“Oh no you don’t!” Uthar snarled, and his off-hand flung out in a wide motion, sweeping the boy off his feet and sailing him into the air past me. As Dustil crunched into the wall behind, I charged Uthar with a wild overhead lunge.

Uthar parried, and lightning spat from him once more. My muscles spasmed, and Karon’s ‘saber slipped from my grasp before I contained myself enough to throw off his attack. Another mental intrusion staggered me to the floor, hands out-stretched as I fell, pushing myself onto my back near where my weapon had dropped.

My focus was fraying; I once more kicked Uthar out of my mind and slammed my shields up, but my strength in the Force was fading under numerous attacks. Stunned, I reached for my dropped ‘saber, but it was too late – Uthar was bearing down, a bloody beam of red poised toward my chest-

I twisted sideways just as the sound of blaster bolts hit my ears, and Uthar grunted, a cut-off sound of pain, as he collapsed in a heap just where I’d been.

I looked behind wildly to see Carth with an upraised blaster. My hand shot up, Karon’s ‘saber thudded to my grasp, and I lunged forward, driving the beam deep through Uthar’s warm body.

He twitched once. Thick gouts of blood pulsed from the cauterized hole when I switched the lightsaber off.

I was still on my knees, gasping, staring at Uthar’s corpse. His opaque eyes were gazing up at the cavernous ceiling, darkening slowly to a natural brown.

The air rushed out of my lungs in a sigh, and I looked back to see Carth. He stared at me, intent and unblinking.

“I think you saved my life there, flyboy,” I muttered hoarsely, dragging myself forward to collapse next to him. “I think you got the killing blow.”

He had one hand resting on Dustil’s head who was prone next to him. I could sense the boy still in the Force, strongly enough that I wasn’t overly concerned. I didn’t feel like I had the energy to be, anyway. Hopefully, Dustil had only received a knock to the head.

A sound reverberated from Carth’s chest that might have been a chuckle under other circumstances. “Who’s counting these days, Jen?”

I felt my lips twitch, but it was less than half-hearted. “Are you okay?”

“Nothing major,” he replied. “When my energy shield dropped I took a hit to the legs, and my armour’s pretty fried. There’s life in me yet. Yourself?”

I leaned back against the wall, the Force retreating in mingled exhaustion and despair. I felt absolutely bone-weary, and still, we hadn’t resolved the most important question of all. “I haven’t sensed Kylah anywhere,” I mumbled. My eyes pinched closed in despair.
Carth sighed. “A moment to breathe, and then we can regroup,” he said softly. “Bastila will be in this place somewhere. We’ll find her.”

“Uthar didn’t… I’m not sure he knew anything about Kylah,” I replied. My skin tingled and burned all over, a remnant of that cursed lightning. It was worst around my neck, and the slightest movement was aggravating. Sometimes, it was the littlest things that irritated the worst.

“Jen,” Carth said sharply, and suddenly his hand was twined in mine, squeezing it. “We’ll do what we have to, to get Bastila back. Uthar’s dead, now. And you… you prevailed. You won.” You didn’t fall. The words were unspoken, but I heard him say them nonetheless. My eyes opened again, and I turned to look at him. Carth’s face was set, and there was a smear of blood near his temple. His eyes were darkly intent on mine, shining with approval. In that moment, he’d never looked more compelling. A startling wave of attraction hit me then, burned through my gut, and completely blindsided me with its unexpectedness.

What the frell am I thinking? I dragged my eyes away, snatched my hand back, and stumbled to my feet. The shock of the unbidden emotion was like a sucker-punch to the stomach, unwelcome and unneeded. Focus, you bleary-eyed idiot!

I felt my cheeks flush with embarrassment and surprise at my own thoughts, and mentally wrested myself back into order.

The room was littered with corpses, dead bodies of soldiers and Initiates alike. I needed to find out what was happening further afield, but my Force senses were spent; exhausted. Who is still standing? Belaya? Zaalbar? Did they find Juhani?

"Jen," Carth called my attention back, and he was still sitting, one hand resting on his son. I heard a faint moan from Dustil. Carth was frowning as he gazed around the room, alert for any threat. "You have to find Belaya-

The entrance doors creaked open, causing his hand to drop to his blaster and me to spin around. Uthar’s death would have released his grip on the giant ferracrystal Force relic, and beyond stood his old apprentice, waiting.

Yuthura stalked inside, a dark storm of wariness on her face as she surveyed the area. Her lekku were twisted around her neck tightly. Mekel trailed her, his lightsaber burning a blood red against his face. So much for Yuthura’s assistance, I thought somewhat grumpily. If Kylah had been here as well, I’d have been fried.

“Well,” Yuthura said at last, her violet eyes landing on mine. “This place is quite a mess. You have killed Uthar Wynn, so by rights the Academy is yours.” Her lightsaber hissed to life in her grasp. “Until the next Dark Jedi cuts you down.”

“You have got to be kidding me,” I snapped angrily. The Force was weak, and my mind frayed from the altercation with Uthar. I might not be injured, but I was completely exhausted.

“I told you that I planned on being the next Headmaster,” she said mildly, and took a step closer to me.

My eyes narrowed. “And I told you I was leaving this rock!”

“I cannot let you do that, Ness Jonohl,” Yuthura answered, her voice sultry and calm. “My leadership will not be complete unless I cut down the existing leader. So raise your ‘saber, and let us finish this the proper way.”
With a wild yell, Yuthura Ban charged.
Juhani:

Dak turned, slowly, his dark eyes wide with alarm as he stared desperately at me. Belaya’s screams replayed again and again in my head. The flush of rage fired through my blood. Everything felt so hot.

All I could think about was Belaya. My dear friend, my only friend, cut down by one who had professed to love me.

Betrayal snarled from my lungs, and the scalding hot of tears blurred my vision. Belaya… Belaya cannot be dead! My fingers clenched hard, and I raised the blue bar of Jedi justice high. My teeth bared. How could he… how could he have done that to Belaya!

“Juhani!” Dak pleaded. He thumbed the off-switch on his weapon in a deliberate action. “Don’t believe that bastard’s lies!” Oh, Uthar was an evil blight on this dark planet, I knew that, I was not an idiot! But how had Belaya been brought here, except by someone she trusted? How had Uthar known of Quatra? Of Dak’s twisted feelings for me?

To think that Dak had fallen so low went beyond understanding. It went beyond forgiveness.

The Force picked up around me, heightened by bitter grief and rage, and for once I welcomed these dark emotions, embraced them, drew in the power deep enough to serve justice where it was needed.

It felt… it felt like it had when I faced Quatra.

“No,” I shook my head. Denied it. Threw away that comparison. This was nothing like my trials, no matter if the Force tasted the same. This was about justice – justice for Belaya.

I ran at him.

Dak threw himself to the side of the room, avoiding my wild overhead lunge, his deactivated weapon held tight in his slimy, betraying grasp. If he thought I would not strike him down due to a lack of defense, then he was grossly miscalculating the depths of my anger.

Dak pressed himself against the far wall, beneath a set of hideous manacles chained high into the chrome. It seemed an indictment of his character, of this evil, evil, place.

“This is why you left Dantooine?” I hissed, stalking forward. “To kill and torture-” My voice broke on the last word, and the replay of the Headmaster’s villainous video flashed through my mind. A howl ripped from my lungs, and through my blurry vision I saw Dak wildly shake his head. My fury snapped, then, and I was back on Taris, enacting vengeance against the slavers of my youth. Xor, Dartmoor, Elijuur the Hutt… I could still the hot blood on my face, the sweet vindication of revenge.

The despair had come later, alone on the hot sands of Tatooine.

I lunged forward wildly, barely aware of my motions, the anger driving the Force into my muscles with unworldly strength.

Dak dodged, and my hand flung out an upsurge of energy that smashed him sideways across the room. He slid across the shiny metallic floor before halting with a crunch into the desk. Dak crumpled forward with a grunt, and took a moment to slowly stagger back to his feet.

“Think, Juhani!” he whispered hoarsely. “Uthar brought us to this room to meet someone! It must have been Belaya!”

His gaze on mine was still desperate and wild, and his cursed lightsaber remained off. I did not understand that. His lies will not trick me. I have always been stronger than him, and he is searching for any means to escape. Belaya’s screams rebounded through my head once more, and I launched myself through the air, fury-filled and unnaturally fast, the blue of my lightsaber aimed directly for his rotten, evil head. He leaped to the side, and I slammed straight through the poraclay desk with a shattering crack.

He was running from me, like the coward he had always been. I spun to face him; he was once more backed against the wall. I threw myself forward. The Force rode a frenzy within me, dark and bitter and toxic, and it tasted like the despairing Tatooine sand, the raging Tarisian slaves quarters, the resentful Dantooine trials…

…it tasted like failure.

I found the Dark Side within me. Revan’s words whispered in my head.

My vision blurred, as my lightsaber paused a hairs-breadth from his neck. Dak twitched, his eyes squeezing shut. He wasn’t even trying. His lightsaber dropped in a deliberate action, clattering to the metallic ground. The sound echoed throughout the room.

“I won’t fight you, Juhani,” he said, and I understood his passiveness then was choice, not weakness. “But I will profess my innocence to the end.”

“Of course,” I hissed. “You always were the talker, Dak Vesser.”

His eyes snapped open, and there was anger amongst the despair. “You told me you were a Jedi, Juhani. I’m pretty damn sure the Jedi don’t believe in killing the unarmed.”

My lightsaber was wavering, and so was my righteous conviction. I shuddered in doubt, and it caused me to land an accidental glance against his collarbone.

“Shavit!” Dak cursed viciously, jerking sideways, one hand clapped against the side of his neck.

I froze, glaring into his dark gaze through the blinding blue of my ‘saber. Belaya deserved justice, Belaya deserved so much more, and how was it possible Uthar Wynn had known so much of everything if Dak had not played a part in it?

Dak was a Sith, a Sith here on Korriban. And this was exactly the vile sort of behaviour I expected
But is killing him the path of a Jedi?

It was not. I knew that.

“Uthar’s a manipulating chivhole,” Dak said in a low voice. “And a frelling mind-reader.” His hand dropped from the side of his neck, and I saw a vicious red burn. Simultaneously I felt the urge to crow in righteousness and apologise for my fumbling. “Juhani, I’ve not seen Belaya since the day I left Dantooine. All the stuff he said… he’s picked from my mind. You must believe me.”

And now there was uncertainty gnawing deep within me. For Uthar had brought us here to meet someone. He had expected there to be someone here.

Was it possible that Belaya might still be alive?

There was a thump, then, from behind the durasteel door, and we both turned in alarm. My unworldly anger was diminishing, and in its place returned the calmer presence of the Force I was more familiar with. It picked up on the energies of my environment, and my eyes widened in disbelief.

“What’s going on out there?” Dak whispered, echoing my thoughts. He stepped closer, having picked up his lightsaber once more, and placed an unsteady hand on my arm which I shook off roughly.

“Do not touch me,” I said through gritted teeth. “I do not trust you, Dak Vesser. This is not over. Not until I find Belaya.”

“Not until we find Belaya,” he returned, glaring at me. “She’s my damn friend too, Juhani. I don’t know what the frell she’s doing on Korriban, but I want to see her away from here as much as you do!”

“Shut up!” I hissed. His words were confusing, and I no longer knew what to believe. He let out a pent-up sigh, and then a massive wave of Force energy right outside the door had us both stiffen. Dak’s lightsaber activated in his hands.

“There’s lightning out there,” Dak muttered, his eyes widening in alarm. “Numerous Force users. Yuthura… Yuthura must be attacking. I never thought she’d actually have the guts.”

Revan. It did not feel like Revan, not directly outside, but further beyond there was something else. A growing darkness that was beginning to eclipse whatever was next door. It could be her. It had been hours and hours since I left the Ebon Hawk, for what was meant to be a short visit. I had only planned to give Dak a small amount of my time, and yet Uthar’s drive to find me had left me trapped in the Valley all day.

“Open the door, Dak,” I said hoarsely. “Now!”

He shot me a startled look, before striding forward and slamming his hand on the door controls.

Nothing happened.

“Shavit!” Dak cursed. “Uthar must have locked us in!”

I stared at him in bafflement from the centre of the room. “Why would he do that?”
“So I couldn’t escape before you killed me,” Dak bit out, thumping uselessly against the control pad again. He shot me a bitter look. “Uthar’s figured out I’m a dead loss and hoped to recruit you, Juhani.”

“I would never join the Sith!” I hissed, the heat of outrage flaring briefly once more.

“Oh no?” Dak turned fully around, then, staring at me intently from darkly bitter eyes. He folded his arms. “Not even if you killed your old friend and then realized you were in the wrong? If the Jedi didn’t turf you out a second time, then your own guilt probably would.”

I felt myself flushing hotly in shame, even as I reminded myself that Dak would say just about anything to wriggle out of trouble. And yet… I did not know the truth. I had almost killed him on nothing but an evil Sith’s word.

The only thing Uthar proved is that Belaya was here.

The thought that I may have almost made a colossal mistake – again – burned a sickening humiliation in my gut.

Not now. Now is not the time. Energy sparked and unleashed just beyond, and I glanced back to the door. We had to get out. This we could sort out later. Uthar wished us trapped inside, and that meant we had to get out.

“Can you use your lightsaber to cut the door open?” I suggested. It took time, but lightsabers could slice through almost anything, no matter what the locking mechanism was. Dak had already turned back to the door, leaning in to face the keypad unit, but I saw his shoulders bunch at my question.

“No,” he said shortly. “The durasteel’s woven with cortosis to stop anyone with a ‘saber escaping. I’m afraid Jedi prisoners are not that uncommon, here.” It was hard to bite back my disgust, and I felt the grimace on my face. Perhaps Dak was innocent of Belaya… perhaps. But it did not sound as if he were unfamiliar with this room.

Dak jabbed a finger at the panel, and cursed again. “I’m just pushing buttons here, Juhani. Unless you know how to slice a lock or hack the console?”

Another wave of Force power was unleashed beyond the walls that imprisoned us. I looked over to the console. A log on prompt stared at me uselessly.

“I do not, Dak,” I whispered. My anguished eyes rose to meet his despairing ones.

He leaned back against the door and closed his eyes. “Then we’re stuck.”

xXx

-

Belaya Linn:

The room was a blur as I raced with all the speed of the Force, intent only upon reaching the bitter rage that I sensed was my dearest friend. Juhani… Jen Sahara said she walked in the Light, now. Whatever was being done to her in this cursed, evil place - I could not bear it if she fell again.

The stimulants and the pressure band beneath my armour were enough to keep me going. There was a hallway ahead, and that was the direction I needed to take. It looked familiar. I knew where it led.

My entire being shied away from that cursed place, but Juhani was there. I ran on.

Then blinding white torment sheered into me, crackled through the chromex suit and sent me collapsing to the ground. I screamed in anguish as a thousand stabbing needles pierced deep into the marrow of my bones. Pain blitzed through every rational thought, except - move!

My muscles convulsed as I forced them to obey, rolling frantically to the side. I heard the shink of a lightsaber stab into the ground behind me, and the lightning dissipated just enough for me to draw on the Force in a desperate pull.

It engulfed me with life, shucking the remnants of dark power from my limbs. I stumbled to my feet, turning to face four Dark Jedi I had not known were chasing me. Oh no. Horror was instant and acute. Even were I not injured, this would be too much for me. My lungs felt tight, and every breath was agonizing.

I was so close to Juhani. Which still meant failure if I were cut down now.

The leader, a blonde female human, had closed her off-hand in a fist. Blue shards of energy crackled around it, sparking against the smirk on her face. Dread tasted like ash in my mouth.

Fury roared in the form of Wookiee outrage, and the tip of a bloodied blade protruded from the chest of a yellow skinned Trandoshan flanking the blonde. The Dark Jedi gasped, and I echoed him in surprise as the Wookiee snarled again, shaving the reptilian Sith off his vibrosword. As the Trandoshan collapsed, blaster fire spat and deflected around the remaining three Sith who sprang into action. One bolt was launched directly into the Wookiee’s chest, and he howled as he staggered back.

My breath rattled. My ribs felt like a burning prison of pain spiking into me.

Jen Sahara’s droid appeared out of nowhere, stepping to my side as he fired a projectile at the blonde leader. She dodged, turning back to us, her teeth bared in a rictus of impassioned hate.

“Juhani is down that corridor,” I said desperately to the robot. “We need her assistance. Find her!”

Maroon photoreceptors gleamed at me in assent just as a spinning lightsaber was thrown at him. I drew the Force under my command into a tight ball of compression and flung it outward, hitting the blonde in the chest as I heard a metallic sheering behind me.

The human fell to the ground, fumbling her lightsaber as it returned back to her grasp.

The footfalls of HK-47 disappeared behind me, followed swiftly by a short Rodian female wielding a double-bladed lightsaber. My gaze landed on the prone blonde.

I launched toward her, only to be faced by a snarling Togruta whose blood-red beam crashed into my upraised shorter lightsaber.

My breath was wet and wheezing, a worrying concern for a later time when I was not facing imminent death. My strength and my focus would not be dictated by such physical limitations. I drew deep on the Force and revitalizing energy coursed through me, overriding the pain of my body.

I sidestepped, ducked underneath an overly optimistic lunge, and stabbed at the Togruta’s side just as the blonde human returned to her feet, lightsaber in hand. The Togruta shrieked, and the Force added strength to my next swing. It cut deep, higher now, into the breadth of one of his montrals.

There was a flash of blue-white, then electrical laceration engulfed me in a paroxysm of pain, slamming me back to the ground in tandem with the Togruta.

The agony bit deep; my ribs were splintering and my throat was hoarse with screaming. Stop the pain! The Force was riding with me still, energy that I used to disengage all nerve endings. A blessed numbness followed, even as my muscles still twitched spasmodically under the electrical charge.

“Belaya!” someone yelled. There was a sudden pressure against my ribs, and my eyes opened to see that woman – no, girl, really – withdrawing her lightsaber from my side. I must get up! The blonde was looking beyond me now, attention drawn by the shout, and the Force under my command pushed at her weakly.

I struggled to move, to push up from my shaking arms and clamber to my feet. As I stood, there was a shout and a blur past me, moving to engage the woman. It was hard to feel much of anything, with the Force blocking out the sensation of pain. A dangerous talent, but useful, too.

Hands gripped my elbows tight, and a beloved face appeared in front of me.

“Juhani,” I whispered through senseless lips. Never had she looked so dear. Her golden eyes were intensely fierce on mine.

I heard a violent yell of agony. Juhani’s gaze slipped passed me, widening with alarm. “Dak! No!” There followed a malicious laugh and Juhani dropped my arms, a lightsaber appearing in her hands as she withdrew from me.

I staggered back, unsteady.

“You schutta!” a man screamed. “See how you like that!”

I felt cold suddenly. Ice cold. The Force was weak in my grasp, like it was slowly slipping away.

“Belaya.” Juhani was back, catching me just as my legs began to buckle. There was a feral victory painted on her face. I could see a bead of sweat trickle down her forehead. “She’s down. Dak got her.” I tried to smile, but my lips were stuck together. Her forehead furrowed, then, in deep lines of concern.

My vision blurred as I collapsed against her. The Force skittered away, leaving a hollow feeling behind. I felt vague surprise that no pain immediately followed.

“Oh no. No, no. Belaya, you cannot die. We will get help – Dak!” Juhani cried out in desperation, lowering me to the ground.

I looked up to see two figures leaning over me. The man’s face was deathly pale, and he clutched a bloodied stump tight against his chest. Juhani drew a hand back from my side. It was covered in the dark red of death.

The coldness was moving up my chest to my throat, now.

“Hold on, Belaya. Just – hold on!” Dak muttered hoarsely. Juhani’s fingers touched my cheek. They were hot, and I could not feel much of anything else.
“I do not think I can,” I whispered. There was so much to say. I am dying. “Please… please…” I blinked. Juhani’s slanted eyes were shimmering and full of despair. “Walk in the Light. Both of you… you are both strong enough. Please… walk in the Light.”

“Can you- can you heal her?” Dak demanded. His face was contorted in pain and horror. “Belaya can’t frelling die. Not now. She can’t!”

I felt my eyes close, and Juhani’s palm was still resting against my face. Its warmth was fading, and each breath grew more difficult.

“I- I cannot,” Juhani stuttered. She sounded lost.

“Be at peace, my friends.” The words were mouthed; I did not have the energy to speak. Behind my eyelids there was a growing whiteness that seemed to encompass everything. It was nice.

I could not feel Juhani’s touch anymore.

“Oh, Belaya,” someone said. “You always were the best of us.”

xXx

Yuthura Ban:

The physical intermeshed with the psychic, and it was my area of expertise, my interest, my particular strength. One could use one’s body to seduce, to intimidate, to manipulate or coerce, and when combined with the Force that could become powerful indeed.

Body language. It could speak volumes about what a sentient was thinking and feeling, and when combined with the natural Force vibrations that emanated from a sentient, it was easy to tell when someone’s strength was guttering.

The human, Ness, had intrigued me from that start. I’d been surprised Uthar hadn’t paid her more note; but he’d been too interested in Staria. But I - I knew where the strength in the pair was, and it hadn’t been the quiet Cathar.

I’d entertained the thought of truly allying with the human at one stage, but Ness Jonohl was too reckless and too disrespectful of her betters. She was also unusually strong, and her very existence now stood a threat to the position so close within my grasp.

And I could barely sense the Force around her. It was weak, spent; and I understood this might be my only chance to triumph over the human whose sheer power – if I was truly honest – eclipsed my own.

My jaw set in fierce determination as I sprinted towards her, weapon poised.

Surroundings blurred in a swirl of granite and uniformed corpses, and the distance between us stretched, a long channel that I could overcome in a split-second as the Force lent velocity to my bunched muscles.

Her off-hand snapped out, and the lightsaber from a dead Initiate came whistling through the air. She wouldn’t have her guard up in time, though, and I swung low, aiming for her legs.

Ness jumped at the last second, somersaulting in the air and landing behind me with a thud. I spun, head-tails flying, frustrated rage boosting momentum to my choke-hold on the Force.
From behind a cross of red and cyan, Ness stared at me warily.

My environs snapped back into real-time. Damn that human! She’d unsettled me the moment my eyes had landed on her, when she’d been more interested in the braying of Mandalorian mercenaries than my own authority of the Sith. Since then, she’d trumped Mekel, decapitated Jorak, and finished off Uthar.

My gaze slid to my Master’s corpse, a black and red gaping wound visible in his torso. If I truly was to take his place, my only option was her death. And even with that wild launch in the air, I could still barely sense Ness in the Force. She was exhausted.

I could take her, now. And I would.

“You don’t have to do this, Yuthura,” she said in a low voice. Her entire posture slumped with weariness and resignation which echoed in her aura. The lack of fear disturbed me a little. Her eyes trailed over my lekku, taking in the tattoos that had cost me pain beyond tears to mark. They were a shield - a shield of the past - and I wore them proudly.

“I do,” I contradicted, annoyed she was still belabouring the point. “For you are the Headmaster now, Ness Jonohl.”

Ness gave a snort, an irreverent response that was entirely in keeping with her personality. “Going by that logic, lopping off Jorak Uln’s head made me Headmaster.”

“Either way,” I replied, inclining my head. “I will not be second place anymore.” Certainly not to a garrulous human who has only been on Korriban for days. The outrage and anger at the situation built deep within me, and I coaxed it, fanned it, caressed the flames of Force power within me. It was building to a crescendo of power, and still she sneered at me from beyond the guard of her ‘sabers.

“For the last time, Yuthura, put your glow stick away!”

Oh, she was powerful enough, when she wasn’t already spent. But Ness Jonohl didn’t understand the workings of the Sith or she would not be begging for my mercy. “No,” I said softly. “For to truly be master, one must prove their strength. And so I shall!”

“Ness Jonohl doesn’t stand alone,” a pained voice came from the training rooms, and our joint attention was wrenched to a bloodied figure limping slowly into the room. One arm, severed just below the elbow, clutched tight into his stomach. The other held his lightsaber. He looked pale, and sick, and determined.

I heard Mekel snort in derision behind me, the sound vocalizing that same opinion I held. Dak looked out for himself, and himself alone. He was irrelevant, one of Uthar’s, and probably the first rat to scurry from the room when the violence had been unleashed.

I wondered, briefly, how he’d lost his forearm.

“Stand down, Adept,” I ordered scornfully. “You are injured and a weakling.”

I glanced back to my opponent. She was staring at Dak in disbelief.

“Sod it,” Dak said, his voice bitter as he stumbled close to Ness. “I’m not doing things wrong again.”

“Juhani…” Ness murmured, and her voice caught on the name.
“She’s alive,” Dak said, but the words were broken. “Belaya’s not. Juhani’s still with her.”

Air expelled out from Ness briefly, a desolate sound, and her shoulders slumped. I tasted her despair as it rode out on the Force, and prepared to strike.

But there was an echoing howl in the direction Dak had emerged from as Ness’ pet Wookiee limped in. Blood clotted the side of his leg, and his vibroblade wavered in his grasp. And further beyond, against the wall behind Ness, her soldier slowly rose to his feet. He was holding his blaster firmly at half height.

“An injured Wookiee and a broken soldier,” I scoffed, shaking my head in disgust. “Wrong place to bring non-Force sensitives, Ness.”

But she smirked at me - the schutta - and her very confidence was enough to rattle. “You’d be surprised to learn who got the killing blow on Uthar, then,” she drawled.

I scowled in anger, feeling the control of the situation shift from my grasp, like a slippery codfish wriggling back to its den. My passion stuttered before igniting again when I felt the presence of another. One of mine.

“Kel,” I ordered silkily, my gaze lifting to the far side of the circular cavern. He stood awkwardly to the entrance of the living quarters, a dozen of so corpses between us.

I’d never seen the place so dishevelled. Uthar’s pet soldiers that manned the holo-cams and torture fields were sprawled like broken toys against the edges of the room. Black scorch marks marred the granite walls and statues alike. Even Naga Sadow bore the burn of a blaster bolt right in the centre of his face.

“Come here.”

“Um…” Kel hedged, shuffling his feet. Ness turned to face him.

“You master bids you!” I snapped, motioning him closer. Kel had always been passive, but he was one of mine. Mine, dammit!

“Sorry Yuthura,” Ness murmured, her tone wry. “I’m afraid I promised Kel a ride off this rock.”

The outrage was sharp, now, sharp and dangerous. Who was this human who dared to turn my apprentices against me? Thalia, still alive, had preferred to run rather than find me. Kel… Kel wouldn’t even walk to my side, I realized in mounting frustration, as he stood there, evading my gaze.

“The Dark Side erodes loyalty,” Ness said softly. “Except in exceptional cases.” I swung my furious gaze back to her, but she was staring at Mekel. “And even then, Yuthura, how long do you think you’d hold onto Mekel? For, in the way of the true Sith, one day he’ll rise to challenge you.”

“That is the way of the true Sith, you imbecile!” I hissed. “How else do you expect to be the strongest?”

“Through allies, of course!” Ness snapped, her green eyes flashing. “Allies you can trust at your back. How much stronger would you be right now, Yuthura, if Thalia and Kel stood next to you?”

“Mekel,” a young voice whispered, and it was from Dustil, the weakling that Uthar and Mekel were both so enamoured of. He had clambered to his feet, standing next to the soldier. “Uthar killed Selene. I know that now. I’m- I’m sorry I was such a frakkhead. But… but I… damn it…” he trailed off uselessly.

I’d never seen the appeal in the boy. Mekel had latched onto him, probably due to their shared heritage, but I’d been glad when Uthar had taken Selene out of the picture and dissolved their friendship.

I expected some backlash from my apprentice over that one, though.

“You’re gonna stand with them?” Mekel sneered from my back. Surprisingly enough, it seemed so.
Dustil and Dak, the two most useless Adepts, looked ready to fight with Ness Jonohl. The one who’d taken out their Master. I could scarcely believe it.

“I saved your life, Mekel,” Ness said in a low voice. The fury grew when I realized her ploy. If she dared try and wrest my favoured apprentice away from me, after Kel had faltered-

“I don’t expect you to stand against your master,” Ness continued. “But don’t stand against me. Or Dustil.”

“You’re drained,” I spat. Ness Jonohl had an irritating habit to continually draw me into conversation, and it was beginning to move beyond annoying. Her piercing gaze was roving once more over my lekku, and I twined them around my neck reflexively. They were a source of fascination for many, I knew, but this was hardly the place for Ness to lose concentration. It was almost insulting. “And your allies are broken.”

“Slave tattoos,” she said abruptly.

“What?” I snapped, as a wave of ice-cold slammed into my gut, diffusing the heat of anger. No!
Strike her, now! In instinct I charged once more.

My off-hand rose, flinging a poisoned wave of Force directly at her, and I followed it with a precise swing. Ness batted aside my toxic attack in a quick flick of the Force, sharp and bright and stronger than I expected, and somersaulted over me again. How did she draw on the Force so quickly, merely for it to gutter out around her again? I would have sworn her abilities to be near empty.

“Headtails are meant to be excruciatingly sensitive, especially near the base,” Ness panted. I spun around to face her once more. Dak and Dustil flanked her now, twin beams of red at either side.
Mekel was behind me, uncertain at the thought of facing either his old friend or his rescuer, and I damned Ness Jonohl all over again. “Why would you go through the torture of tattoos, unless you were trying to cover something up?”

“No one talks about my past and lives!” I howled. Even I could hear the despair. After all these years, I could get through days without remembering, and then to have some unknown, wild Force-sensitive latch onto something only Uthar had picked up on-

“Why?” Ness snapped. “Being a slave isn’t something to be ashamed of. It isn’t something you had any damn choice about.”

“My past is my past,” I bit out, feeling my teeth grit. “It is none of your business, Ness Jonohl. Whatever I do about it has nothing to do with you!”

She looked taken aback, and I realized I’d said more than I’d planned to. “Whatever you do about it?” she asked in puzzlement. “What have you done about it?”

“None of your business!” I repeated, flustered.

“It’s not like you would have done anything here, playing teachers and schools with Uthar Wynn,” Ness drawled sarcastically. Her gaze narrowed. “Did you plan to do something about the slave trade, Yuthura? Now that you’re free, and powerful… but of course, one’s never free with the Sith, not really, you always have to pander to your Master-”

She was too perceptive. Too damn perceptive and clever by half. I didn’t know if Ness just made a lucky guess or if the Force itself showed her the connections, but I found myself inwardly damning her yet again. The Hutts bred pretty Twi’leks, kept them chained and marked for their entire lives, rented them out to customers and agents before dragging them back in again. It wasn’t a life for a tuk’ata, let alone a sentient.

I was going to do something about it. One day, when I was free and powerful.

“When I’m Headmaster-”

“When you’re Headmaster you’ll bow to Malak and do his whim,” she cut in, her voice cold and low. “For that’s the way of the Sith. Kiss the arse of the one more powerful, and if you’re lucky, you might make it to the top, but by then you’ll be so dark and sodding insane that nothing will really matter anymore.”

I lapsed into an uneasy silence, and the cursed uncertainty radiating from Mekel at my back encompassed me, too; filtered deep into the rage I had been so carefully fanning. My fingers clenched on my lightsaber in frustration.

“For frell’s sake, Yuthura,” Ness said, and her voice turned weary. She actually deactivated her ‘sabers; which caused Dak to stare at her in alarmed disbelief. “Turn your sodding weapon off.”

Mekel took a step to reach my side. He was more than just my apprentice; I leaned on him when I should stand alone. I… cared for him, in my own way. There was no one else I would bed for sheer companionship rather than gain, and our similar roots created a foundation of understanding that I would be sad to see go.

With the Sith, I guess I knew that one day it would.

“This won’t work, Master,” he whispered, and he switched off his lightsaber.

_Shavit_, I cursed inwardly, lapping back into the slang of my youth. _Curse that kriffing Ness Jonohl. Oh, that she had never set foot on Korriban!_

“Go, then,” I hissed angrily in defeat. I could still rebuild from here. Somehow. My fingers twitched, and clicked the off-switch on my lightsaber. “You said you’d leave. Just… get away
“I haven’t found Kylah,” Ness muttered. “I’m not going anywhere until I find that schutta.”

My frustration flared again. “What makes you think she’s even here?” I snapped angrily. “She’s hidden out in Dreshdae ever since she landed. She didn’t bother checking in with Uthar. Force, he even thought she might be hiding from Malak!”

Ness blinked, visibly startled.

The soldier standing behind Ness took a step closer to her. He’d lowered his weapon, but it was still firm in his grasp. “Well, she did run away from you on Manaan,” he murmured to her. “Maybe she was hiding from Malak. Maybe her being here on Korriban was just one terrible coincidence.”

Run away from Ness Jonohl? Who was this human, who could defeat the likes of Jorak Uln, Uthar Wynn and Kylah Aramai? I would have sworn she was no Jedi, but curse me to the Outer Rim and back if she were a true Sith, either.

“Zaalbar,” Ness called out to the Wookiee. He was standing nearby, wavering on his feet. It seemed like only sheer force of will was keeping him upright. “Sithspit, you’re injured,” she cursed, walking towards him. Dak made a sort of choking noise, and Ness jerked her head back to him, her gaze landing on his severed arm. She winced, and cursed again. “We’ve got to get out of here,” she muttered in frustration. “We’ve got to- Zaalbar, why did you tell me that Kylah went to see Uthar?”

“(Kylah Aramai took her to Uthar Wynn at the Academy),” the one called Zaalbar howled in Shyriiwook, but his intonation pricked goose pimples against my neck. I recognized that flat, automatic tone, and moreover, now that I pushed out with the Force, I could sense the unnatural neural patterns in his mind.

“He’s been placed under compulsion,” I snapped. I strode over to the Wookiee. His black eyes bored into mine from an impressive height, exhausted and anguished and angry. “Why didn’t you remove it, Ness Jonohl?”

“I didn’t know how to,” she replied, walking to my side. “There’s so much I don’t know. I- I tried compelling him into thinking his own mind was free.”

I shot her a look I hoped contained the utter depths of my incredulity. “You do understand the paradox of that statement, I hope?” I said slowly, and was gratified to see the red flare of embarrassment mar the human’s cheeks.

She pursed her lips and evaded my gaze. “Can you help, Yuthura?”

I sighed. I did want the human gone, but I’d planned on it being at the end of my lightsaber. That didn’t seem possible, now. My rage had departed me, leaving only the embers of frustration and a galling uncertainty. I clipped my ‘saber back on my belt, and reached out with psychic tendrils of Force, wrapping it around the Wookiee. He tensed, grimacing as I probed for the occluded constraints that threaded through his mind.

It wasn’t difficult, to disperse Ness’ touch, but the other – which I assumed was Kylah’s – went deeper, much deeper. It was stronger and more exact than any I’d come across before, but Kylah Aramai was a Dark Jedi whose Force presence I’d never encountered. I could feel the lines of coercion bedding low within the Wookiee’s psyche, and they unravelled under my will.

The deeper, shackled ones were harder to dissolve, and it took several attempts before I was satisfied. I pulled back, weary and resigned and wishing only to see the back of these people who had upended my territory so thoroughly.

The Wookiee gave a lung rending howl that echoed throughout the ceremonial cavern.

“It is done,” I said.

“Zaalbar?” Ness called. She stepped forward, and grabbed a furry paw. “Zaalbar?”

“(She is gone),” Zaalbar moaned. “(I put her in a ship, and Kylah has taken her off-world).” The Wookiee collapsed to the ground, his great shaggy head dropping to his hands. Blood seeped out from his side and splattered to the ground, and pain radiated out from him in black waves on the Force. His body language suggested that the pain barely even registered with him.

Ness dropped to her knees beside him.

“Zaalbar, we’ll get her back,” she was murmuring. “Stay with me, fight with me, and we’ll get her back if it’s the last thing I do.” Ness rested her head gently against the crumpled Wookiee.

“Kylah took the Cathar?” I hazarded. I hadn’t seen Staria since they’d gone to Hord’s tombs, although Mekel had told me she’d survived. It certainly sounded as if Kylah had taken someone of import to them.

Ness looked back to me, her face drawn and bleak and defeated. “No,” she sighed. “I suppose you may as well know. It’s not like you can stay on Korriban now.”

My eyes narrowed. If she thought she could send me away-

“Bastila Shan,” Ness said, clambering to her feet. Her anguished gaze looked past me to the soldier standing next to Dustil. “Kylah’s taken Bastila off-world.”

“Oh no, Jen,” the soldier breathed in mirrored despair.

“Bastila Shan?” Mekel spluttered. “As in… as in… the Bastila Shan?”

Ice froze my insides. Bastila Shan, Jedi hero of the Republic war effort, taken captive by Kylah Aramai on Korriban? Kylah had betrayed the Republic’s Endar Spire, I knew that much, and Bastila Shan had been on the run since then… my mind struggled to recall the news reports Uthar had shared with me.

“What the frakk would bloody Bastila Shan be doing on Korriban?” Mekel continued, his voice loud and incredulous in the blood-splattered room.

They’d been tracked to Tatooine and Manaan, I recalled, hiding in a freighter which just smacked of incorrect information, for why would the young Jedi be sneaking around instead of fighting on the front-lines where her awesome powers could be of use? I frowned, my fingers clenching as I struggled to remember the apparent make-up of Bastila’s crew. Uthar hadn’t been overly interested, Darth Malak had other agents onto it and we’d received no alerts of import. I vaguely recalled hearing she was travelling with a Wookiee-

My eyes slid to the crumpled, hairy mess on the floor.

“And two Jedi; one Cathar, one human,” I murmured to myself, my gaze sliding back to Ness. She stared at me with an inscrutable expression, all apart from the anguish in her eyes. And there was a Fleet captain, the war-hero Carth Onasi. I looked over to the soldier in suspicion. And a Mandalorian, and hadn’t Ness walked into the cantina with one? “You idiots lost Bastila Shan.” I shook my head, and a hollow laugh escaped my lips. What a colossal cock-up. Honestly. Whose bright idea was it to hide out on Korriban?

“Yeah. Thanks,” Ness bit out, eyes flashing.

“Well, I hope your stay on Korriban was worth it,” I drawled.

Ness sighed, but didn’t answer. I recalled her previous comment, and my eyes pinched tight again. “What do you mean, I can’t stay on Korriban?”

But she didn’t need to answer. Ah, shavit. I couldn’t stop her crew from walking away, and as soon as Darth Bandon or Darth Malak learned I’d let Bastila’s crew go…

“No…” I denied hotly. “There’s a way. They won’t need to know I was here - you took out Uthar, after all-”

“For frell’s sake, Yuthura,” Ness snapped. “It’s not like there’s much of an Academy left for you to run. You don’t even want to be here, not really.”

It was too much. It was all too much, and the chances for my survival were far too kriiffing slim. And I despised myself when I descended into the common slang that Mekel was so fond of.

Ness reached one hand out to the Wookiee. He howled softly, before grabbing it and clambering to his feet. Ness’ piercing eyes fixed on me again.

“Walk us to Dreshdae, Yuthura,” she said softly. “Let’s… let’s talk on the way.”

For the first time in years, I felt completely lost amongst the anger, uncertainty and frustration. And yet, deep down, there was a glimmer of something… something new. I didn’t recognize it, and for lack of a better option, I conceded to Ness’ wishes.

XxX

Mekel Kadoni:

It had to be the most frakking ridiculous group of kooks ever stumbling out of the Academy.

Ness Jonohl, almost dead asleep on her feet, had first led us to the bloodbath in the training rooms. I’d thought the central hall had been bad, but next door looked like the insides of a meat blender turned on high. The smell was even more disturbing; blood, faeces and burnt flesh combined and reeked worse than a five day-old dead whore.

In the hallway beyond was a smoking heap of droid. Closer, in the centre of the room, Ness’ Cathar friend was leaning over the body of Ness’ human friend, forehead touching forehead like a macabre prayer to a nameless god.

There’d been a bit of solemn snivelling before the injured Wookiee picked up the broken droid, stuffing its dismembered head into a hairy armpit. The Cathar followed, limping, as she carried the corpse she’d been mooning over. Dak trailed quietly at her heels.

He was surprising me, actually. Dak had lost half his bloody arm, and was smeared in the innards of frakking Lashowe. Lashowe. I’d not have picked Dak to have big enough balls to take that ice-bitch out, but apparently he’d finally grown a pair when she’d hacked a limb off.

I’d always expected to face down blondie myself. Never thought she’d be taken out by one of the Ahaps on her side, but then loyalties on Korriban were ever-changing.

I hated that, and I hated this place. I hoped Yuthura would stop being so damn power-hungry, and listen to frakking Ness Jonohl.

“I cannot leave just yet,” Yuthura was saying, as the first touches of dawn lightened the Korriban night sky. It was bloody cold, lumbering along to Dreshdae in the dark. “I must see who is still alive here.”

Ness paused, as if she were considering her words. She made me uneasy; there was no other bleeding word for it. She damn well shone in the Force, like a piercing light that stabbed you viciously in the eyes. And then her strength would vanish, causing me to doubt my own senses. And all the while, her emotions seeped out of her like a pus-filled wound. Even now, when she was relatively calm, I could feel the grief simmering from her.

I’d never been so aware of someone I had no interest in banging.

“Kylah’s been gone for hours, for close to a day, maybe,” Ness returned in a low voice. “We’re wanted by Malak as well, Yuthura. He’ll send someone to Korriban soon.”

“I understand that,” Yuthura replied, her voice tightening. “But I will not walk away from the Academy with nary a glance. There are loose ends I must wrap up first.”

My gaze slid to Kel, who’d been silent since… well, actually, Kel was silent nearly all the damn time. I never got how he’d managed to scrape through his graduation - I’d always suspected Yuthura must have helped in some way.

Kel was a nice guy. Genuinely nice. He had no place with the Sith.

“You really gonna go with her?” I muttered, jerking my heard towards Ness. “Our Master’s leaving Korriban as well, y’know.”

I thought I was being quiet, circumspect. Yet both Yuthura and Ness stopped and turned to face us. Yuthura was composed, but I knew my Master - the thought of Kel leaving her rankled.

“Kel,” Yuthura said, and Kel’s nervous gaze flicked away from me and over to her. “I am your Master, Kel, and I can protect you. Mekel and I will be travelling from this place in no more than a day. Come with us.”

“I’m not going to engage in a pissing contest with you, Yuthura,” Ness muttered. “But you haven’t even worked out where you’re going yet. Kel should be with the Jedi, and we’re headed to a Jedi Master.”

“You have no authority over my apprentices, Ness Jonohl,” Yuthura hissed. I could see my Master’s anger from earlier flare in her eyes, and a responding smirk threatened to emerge on Ness’ face. I even felt like I knew what the cocky woman was going to say. But you named me Headmaster yourself, Yuthura. Oh, no, she wasn’t going to have a pissing contest. Yeah, right. I snorted.

“I can speak for myself,” Kel mumbled, looking down. Yuthura sighed and walked over to him, a hand on his shoulder. He looked up, dark eyes lifting reluctantly to meet her gaze. “Master…
you’ve told me before. I’m not Sith material. I don’t want to be Sith material.”

“They have Darth Malak’s forces after them, Kel,” Yuthura countered. Ness kept silent, surprisingly, and her gaze moved back to me. I tried to pick her age. Mid-thirties, maybe. Tallish, athletic – if a bit on the scrawny side – and obviously used to combat. She’d been travelling with Bastila Shan – Bastila sodding Shan – and it made sense that the Jedi hero’s companions would be strong in the Force. And Ness was very strong in the Force.

They must have had a critically important reason to land on Korriban - either that or Ness Jonohl was as stupid as she was crazy.

“I’d… I’d like to join the Jedi, Master,” Kel whispered. There was a set to his jaw I’d never seen before. “I want that choice.”

Yuthura’s eyes hardened. Her hand dropped from Kel’s shoulder, and slowly, she turned to face Ness. “I wish I had killed you when we first met in the cantina, Ness Jonohl,” she said bitterly. “And I swear I will remedy that, should your companionship endanger Kel. Keep him safe and away from Darth Malak, and we shall have no reason to meet again.”

Ness’ face was blank as she stared back at Yuthura. “I’ll deliver him to the Jedi, Yuthura. He won’t have to travel with us for long, and the Jedi will be a damn sight safer than a Sith Academy.”

I glanced sideways, and saw the rest of the sorry group had paused to wait for us. Dustil, walking next to that old soldier, was staring at me. We hadn’t spoken, not since his admission of stupidity. It had been good to hear the words, though. Satisfying to have him admit that it was Uthar’s fault, not mine. I’d mourned Selene, as much as he did, and it frakking cut deep to live with his mistrust day after day. I’d expected more from him. I’d trusted him more than that.

My gaze slid back to Ness Jonohl. I didn’t really like her much, but I owed her for Uthar. I owed her for Jorak, too.

“We should get going,” the soldier said in a short tone. He had a Telosian accent, I realized, and wondered if that was why Dustil was hanging around him. I frowned, and remembered Ness saying they’d be taking Dustil with them. That makes as much sense as Bastila Shan being on Korriban. What would Ness want with Dustil?

I strode forward, catching up to them as the group resumed walking. The soldier shot me a cagey look as I flanked Dustil on the other side, and I glared back, mentally willing him away.

“Kel’s going with this lot, rather than Yuthura,” I told Dustil. I felt torn over that. I’d rather Kel be with us… but he’d probably make a frakking good Jedi. I scowled. “Dee, you could come with us, y’know. Yuthura would take you.”

Dustil’s eyes widened in surprise, and there was a shocked sort of cough from the soldier. I scowled at him. “Look, this ain’t got nothing to do with you. Frakk off,” I snapped.

The older man’s brows lowered. “No.” The words were flat and resolute, and I wasn’t going to take this crap from a non-Force sensitive, even if he was friends with Ness Jonohl. I drew in the Force, irritable and angry-

“Mex,” Dustil intervened quickly. My anger derailed as I frowned at him in surprise. He hadn’t called me that in over a year. “Look, I- uh, I’ve got things I need to sort out. I, frakk,” he cursed, sounding awkward as he did so. His eyes closed briefly. “You’re my friend, and you deserve the truth.” He motioned jerkily towards the soldier, all the while looking pissy and highly uncomfortable. I’d never seen him at ease, not really, not even when Selene used to hang off his arm and stare adoringly into his stupid brown eyes-

“This is my dad.” Dustil’s voice was low - but still, it echoed through the pre-dawn rocky slopes outside of Dreshdae.

I blinked. Well. I had nothing to say to that, and the surprise sat like turned shyrack stew in my gut. Dustil met my gaze, his eyes pleading for understanding or something - I didn’t know. I could barely comprehend the thought of Dustil’s dad being alive after Telos, let alone frakking rescuing him from a Sith Academy.

I floundered behind as Dustil allowed himself to be led away. We were entering the colony, and I fell into line next to Yuthura, not paying the least attention to whatever snark was going on between her and Ness Jonohl.

I could see the resemblance, now. It was pretty frakking obvious. The soldier was what Dee would be in a couple of decades. I scowled, and knew I should be happy that my old friend had family left that would look out for him.

I was walking past half-asleep Czerka officials before I realized it, confused and unbalanced. As we entered a docking bay, Dustil glanced over his shoulder back to me.

A last look between us was a crappy farewell. After Selene, after all these frakking years on this chivhole of a planet, I’d have liked to have a drink or two at the least. But there he was, his father’s arm guiding him toward the relative safety of a smuggler’s freighter.

His father. How the frakk did that happen?

But we were friends, once. And now he knew the truth about Selene, maybe that bond was still there. Know your family. Choose your own blood. My handler had taught me that, back in the Pillow Palace, where I’d spent most of my formative years. It was a sacred whisper in the brothels, and we’d only trusted fellow lays, while our nights were spent twisted in silk sheets thick with the sweat of rich politicians.

Telos was a civilized world, but it had its own rotten underbelly. And I was such a pretty boy.

But on Korriban, I’d chosen Dustil and Selene as my blood.

“You!” a young voice shrieked from the loading ramp, and my eyes shot to a pretty young Twi’lek, whose face was flushed with shock and hate as she glared down at Dustil. He stopped, stunned, as his father looked frantically between the two. “You disgusting piece of Hutt-slime!”

“Mission!” Dustil’s father said, his voice stunned. “What-”

“Oh, frakk,” Dustil muttered, his eyes closing. The Wookiee howled, bounding past me over to the ship, coming to a halt by the girl. He almost seemed to be petting her or something weird, as he continued to howl in that annoyingly loud voice.

“Uh uh, no way, that murglak is not getting on this ship!” the Twi’lek demanded, shoving the Wookiee’s paw off her shoulder roughly. Despite myself, I was impressed. Not many people would so readily push a fully grown Wookiee about. “Big Z, that’s the ronto-face I ran into days ago!”

“Mission!” a cold voice snapped from behind me, and I knew it was Ness Jonohl. Damn me if I didn’t one day expect to run into a Darth Ness. Or a Master Ness. Either of which sounds frakking ridiculous. She’d have to change her name to something a little more intimidating. “Dustil is Carth’s son. However he’s slighted you, we’ll sort it out later. Let him onboard.”

The girl scowled, her young face twisting, and she jumped down from the ramp as Dustil and his father entered the freighter. At the hatch, Dustil turned again, his bleak face meeting mine.

I wished he was coming with us.

[Be safe], my fingers twitched against my thigh. It had been a long time since Dustil answered me, a long time since Selene had gone and he’d begun to doubt our friendship.

[Stay alive], he signed back, before his father’s arm propelled him inside. The Cathar, lugging her beloved corpse, followed them in with Dak right behind her. I looked back to the Twi’lek, standing on the docking bay floor, scowling angrily at the hatch of the freighter as the Wookiee continued to moan at her. Bloody horrid language, Shyriiwook, and I wondered that anyone could bear listening to it for more than five seconds.

My curiosity propelled me forward, and before I knew it I was facing her.

“What?” she snapped belligerently, light brown eyes focusing on me.

“Dustil frakked something up, I see,” I said by way of greeting. Her dark expression deepened. “Look, this place is a cess-pit. I dunno what that gimboid did to you, but this ain’t an easy planet to be a Force-user on. Try to remember that next time you go nova on him.”

She folded her arms, a mulish look in her pretty eyes. “Who’re you?”

“My name’s Mekel. Dustil and I were friends- are friends. He was a good guy, once. Maybe he can be again.”

She looked over to the Wookiee, who was staring at me. Even from this distance, he smelled like a wet dog. He howled something, again, for frakk’s sake.

“Fine, Big Z,” she sighed. “He’s still a rotten space-slug.”

I snickered, and her lips twitched.

“Bitch him out all you like, just…” I didn’t even know what I wanted to say. Dustil deserved a chance to leave the Dark Side behind. Myself… I didn’t know. Yuthura and I would go somewhere else, sure, but I didn’t think it would be so easy for the likes of us.

“I’m Mission,” she said at last, and graced me with a smile. I found myself liking her. “I’ll keep what ya said in mind, Mekel.”

“Mekel,” my Master’s sultry voice had me turning, although I wasn’t sure she was my Master anymore. Not if we were leaving Korriban. Maybe, somehow, we could be equals. Friends, perhaps. Her unnatural violet eyes seemed to contradict that. “It is time for us to leave.”

”Think about what I said, Yuthura,” Ness spoke from her side. Ness’s eyes were a moss-green, sharp and almost as vibrant as Yuthura’s, but not corrupted. Not yet, anyway. And, again, I could feel the drowning grief surrounding her. It was as depressing as she was unsettling. Bet she doesn’t get invited to many frakking parties.

Ness was still staring intently at Yuthura. "I nudged Thalia toward Coruscant. It's a valid option, and a damn sight more satisfying than here."
“I shall find my path, Ness Jonohl.”

I walked to my Master’s side, and looked down into her serious gaze. She indicated the exit with a sharp jerk of her head, and we left the docking bay in silence.

xXx

Data Analyst Ajax Zarr:

I took a long pull on my turin-spiked caffa, following it with a massive yawn and a slow stretch. It was late, that quiet time when data had a tendency to merge together into fuzzy lines of meaninglessness. Jeebra Noob, the Rodian working with me on the case, sent a condescending smile my way as his wart-covered fingers scrabbled through a bowl of cracklenuts.

“Flakin’ out?” he grunted, crumbs dropping from his whiskery snout as he followed his words with a chuckle. “Jeebra sez ya need to get laid, Ajax. Jeebra sez there ain’t nuffin’ like ruttin’ with one of them tailheads or redskins to sharpen Jeebra’s mind again.”

He chuckled again, tapping a key on his console. “Eh, Jeebra wouldn’t call them that to their faces. Ajax, yer missin’ the point. Don’t ya Zabraks have needs? ‘Coz Jeebra’s got needs!” He sniffed. “The GenoHaradan provides. No matter what a chivvin’ tighthole ye are, the GenoHaradan provides.”

I ignored him this time, turning my attention back to the exception list on my terminal. Jeebra Noob was a filthy degenerate who enjoyed finding different ways to belittle me. Last week it’d been my lacklustre fashion sense – for Jeebra was nothing if not flashy with his silver bodytights and aquamarine shark suits. Now it was the frequency of my sexual proclivities – or lack thereof. The GenoHaradan might pay for free lays every night of the week, but I hadn’t been interested since my eye had caught on the quiet assistant to Overseer Eridius.

To a chivving Overseer. Like I ever had a legitimate reason to knock on those ominous doors. I reported to Spymaster Gaalin – and even as his best data analyst, I’d still only ever seen Overseer Eridius once in the decade I’d been working here. Jeebra thought the man was nothing more than a rumour.

But Jeebra was a twat. A twat who was slowly pipping me in the ranks, these days. He had an uncanny ability to remain focused and sharp the whole way through a night shift – despite pretending he was no more than gutter-slime.

I tapped to the next exception, skimming through the report. Jeebra had scored the match list, this time, and we both knew the match list was far more likely to find a hit than the exceptions.

We’d been working on it for weeks. The sheer breadth of data the galaxy offered was overwhelming, and Gaalin had been pushing us hard on this one. Of course, our supercomputers sifted through most of it, but it was the exceptions and the matches we had to manually counter-check. Computer programs could only minimize the pool of possibilities so much; with so many recorded sentients in our databanks, doppelgangers and mismatches were not uncommon.

Out there in the galaxy, there were thousands of people who looked almost exactly like you.

But I was convinced that Jen Sahara was not the real Jen Sahara. We had no definitive blood or DNA samples to go on, so we were reliant on facial recognition software. The clearest image we had of the pretender was from the Endar Spire’s feeds, and comparing that to the original from Deralia had proved challenging in itself. The two humans were similar, but the Deralian was slightly shorter, younger, with a wider face and different eyes – all things that could be modified via surgery, but combine the personality and life changes and it added weight to our original conclusion: Jen Sahara had died on Deralia, and an imposter was taking her place.

An imposter with Jedi backing, which was curious in itself.

Currently Jeebra was working his way through the facial recognition matches, while I had the joy of skimming through the exceptions. The exception listings were facial matches that the supercomputer had discarded due to an unexplained anomaly or filter – maybe the age difference was too great, or the gender or location didn’t match – things that might be explained away by medical intervention or some other factor that computer programming just didn’t pick up on.

All too often we didn’t find the answers this way. There was just too much data.

But the exception listings usually provided an amusing profile or two. With a smirk, I discarded one for the human actress Seriina Starr, who’d shot to fame due to a highly contentious holo-vid portrayal of Revan Freeflight during the Mandalorian wars. It was dismissed as “heretic at best” by the Official Republic Broadcasting Authority, and not commented on at all by the Jedi Order.

The next exception was even more hilarious, being Revan Freeflight herself.

Seriina Starr was in the exception list because her life was considered too active to be a plausible match for the imposter Jen Sahara. Revan Freeflight, of course, was in the exception list because she was dead.

The accounts varied on exactly how, though. Either due to her flagship being destroyed by Darth Malak, or the confrontation with Bastila Shan. Fraud-Jen Sahara, on the other hand, had a contract placed on her by Darth Malak, and was in the company of Bastila Shan.

Wow. That’s weird.

A buzzing hummed through my mind, the jittery feeling I experienced on the cusp of a breakthrough. I hurriedly pulled up the exception report of Revan Freeflight on one console, and the clearest image of fraud-Jen Sahara on the other.

Revan Freeflight – pre-Mandalorian Wars – had long dark brown hair, usually braided out of the way. The picture I was studying had her garbed in Jedi brown, standing tall and confident with a slight smirk playing along her lips. Her skin was a dark olive, her face narrow and plain, her eyes a striking green.

Fraud-Jen Sahara, stationed onboard the Endar Spire, lacked the same proud bearing or skin colour. I frowned, flicking through the different stills we’d captured from the Republic security footage. The tone of her skin had a dusty look to it, suggesting months of time spent indoors. Her posture was inhibited, and her gaze often downcast – but, also, the same moss-green.

Same height. Both unusually strong in the Force – Revan Freeflight uniquely so, while fraud-Jen Sahara foiled a trap Spymaster Gaalin had thought too excessive. My eyes closed as my thoughts raced. Darth Revan. Holy frakk-titties. Could we have been sending out our agents against Darth Revan?

It was starting to seem surprisingly likely.

Darth Malak put the contract out on fraud-Jen Sahara himself. For a price exorbitant enough that Spymaster Gaalin passed it by an Overseer first.

Oh, this was big. This was colossal. If Darth Malak had tried to play the GenoHaradan without divulging all the facts… I leaned forward suddenly, and cleared the consoles. Jeebra’s attention caught, and he shot me an inquiring look.

I smiled tightly. “Bathroom break,” I lied, and walked carefully out of the room. This… If I was right, this was big enough to bypass Gaalin.

I was at the obsidian double-doors within minutes. Taking a deep breath in the hopes it would settle the shaking nerves in my stomach, I tapped lightly and entered.

Seated behind a desk made from an exceedingly rare maroon ferracrystal – could have been transparisteel but I knew better, the GenoHaradan management were nothing if not keen to show off their power and wealth by any means possible – was the perfectly poised form of the Overseer’s personal assistant, Tealia.

She blinked, obviously surprised. “Ajax Zarr!” she exclaimed, before she blushed. She knows my name. I felt the heat colour my face, too. She smiled, dark eyes creasing as a hand rose to rub at her horns. The self-conscious gesture was endearing.

“I, um- I need to see the Overseer,” I stammered.

The friendliness vanished from her face. “Do you have an appointment?” The words were politely spoken, but cool. I’d misstepped, I realized with a jolt.

“No, but it’s important. I mean- it’s big. Very big.”

Tealia stared at me quietly for a moment, darkly-lashed eyes intent on my face and yet inscrutable. I hopelessly wished her smile would return. She sighed, then; a small sound in the overly large room, before raising a hand for silence and clicking a button on her headset.

Her conversation was brief and muffled before she turned to look at me again. “Overseer Eridius will see you now. I trust you are prepared, data analyst, for the Overseer does not look kindly on impromptu consultations without a very compelling reason.”

Tealia’s tone was neutral and not at all disapproving, and yet I still felt I’d disappointed her somehow. She looked so composed and professional and utterly unattainable.

“He is waiting for you, data analyst,” she prompted, and I realized I was staring at her like a goon. I flushed.

“Will you still be here when I come out?” The words tumbled out, abrupt and awkward and painful, and I felt like kicking myself.

Tealia frowned. Her hand rose to rub at her horns again. They were sharpened to shiny points that glinted under soft lighting. “I work here, data analyst. Of course I will be here.”

“Oh, great- I mean, I’ll see you then, Tealia.” My face was flaming. It’s official, I’m the galaxy’s biggest dork. After this, I was going to hide in the supply cupboard for a week.

And then, somehow, Tealia was smiling again. At me. “I look forward to it.” She glanced behind her at the closed doors to the Overseer’s office. “You had better go in.” Her smile deepened, and her eyes were warm. “I’ll see you after, Ajax.”
I was a fool… but maybe a fool with a chance. I grinned back and headed towards the Overseer’s office.

Suddenly, Eridius didn’t seem quite so scary.

xXx

Carth Onasi:

“Stay buckled in guys,” I called over the comm. “I’ll be pulling us into hyperspace shortly.” I eased off the repulsors and allowed the sublight drive to kick in as we left the gravity well. Dustil hadn’t wanted to sit in the cockpit, his face had been lined with misery and exhaustion and stubborn anger – the latter solely directed at me. The last thing he needed was that confrontation outside the ‘Hawk.

Blast. How is it possible that he and Mission have already met? And what in the Outer Rim happened? Another mystery. I’d planned on sending Dustil to the starboard living area, but for now- he’d crashed on the bed in the pilot’s quarters. Emotionally he was a wreck, and his body succumbed to sleep before I’d even wrested the ship’s cockpit from Ordo.

Once the freighter was safely in hyperspace, I could see about sorting Dustil out. For now, there was no reason he couldn’t rest.

The hatch swished open behind me, and I threw a quick glance over my shoulder; Jen, looking miserably haggard as she slouched her way into the co-pilot’s seat. Belaya’s death and Bastila’s capture lay a mood of desolate grief over everyone, but Jen would be feeling it the most. She’d saved Belaya, only to see her die a day later, and as for Bastila… I’d never seen such a haunted look on Jen’s face. And her apparent anguish just made me want to hold her and never let go. Steady on, Onasi. I cleared my throat, keeping my eyes on the instrumentation panel. “Plug in a course for Kashyyyk, would you? And strap in, sister, we’ll be making the jump soon.”

Jen didn’t respond verbally, but her fingers danced over the navicomputer as she obeyed me. She silently buckled the restraints around her torso. I shot her another sideways glance; her face was tense and grieved. Aww, heck. Of course she was taking Bastila’s capture terribly – we all were, but it was so much more personal for Jen. Bastila was her only link to a past she couldn’t remember. I hope Jen’s not feeling anything through that bond. If she… if Bastila gets hurt, how much will Jen feel?

The thought was chilling. Will it… will it bring back what happened on Deralia?

I wondered if Jen’s struggles with the Dark Side were enhanced due to her past trauma. The incident earlier, on the ‘Hawk, had frightened me more than I wanted to admit, even to myself. Jen had completely lost herself, and yet… and yet she’d come back.

She’d faced that evil Headmaster - the one who’d held Dustil’s loyalty for years - and stayed true to herself.

The Dark Side was real and more compelling than I’d ever realized. And it was something Jen would always face… it was something she shouldn’t face alone. But Bastila had been taken from her.

I couldn’t… I wouldn’t let Jen fight this insidious battle by herself. I didn’t know how much help a non-Force sensitive like me would be, but damn the cursed Dark Side if it tried to claw its fingers back into Jen.
She still looked beautiful.

“Jen,” I said quietly. “How are you holding up?”

Her shoulders bunched as she stayed staring out into the black of hyperspace. “Terrible,” she said flatly. She turned, and a visible tremor lanced through her face. “Oh Carth,” she murmured brokenly. “I’ve made such a mynock’s nest of things. Bastila…”

Her eyes were wide and green and filled with unshed tears. I felt my heart clench. “No you haven’t,” I denied, my tone sharp. How can she even think that? “You succeeded, Jen. You’ve done the unbelievable. I don’t think anyone else would have been able to-”

“Carth, the Sith have Bastila Shan!” she burst out. “How can that not be a disaster of galactic proportions?”

“Kylah’s presence was unforeseeable. And not your fault.” I tried to keep my words calm and reassuring. She had to hear the truth, instead of blaming herself for events outside of her control. “If Zaalbar hadn’t been outside the ship- or if I’d realized he was acting odd- or if Bastila had been awake-” I sighed. “Any of those things and it could have played out differently. You ordered us to guard the ‘Hawk, and it was our failure, not yours.”

She laughed, and it was a hysterical sound. “I don’t give a womp rat’s arse whose fault it is, Carth. Darth Malak has Bastila!”

“And you found the Star Map,” I cut in. “If the Jedi Masters have done their part on Kashyyyk, then we might be able to locate the source of Malak’s power now.” I couldn’t help myself, the distressed expression wasn’t going away, so my hand reached up and cradled the side of her face. It was warm. “Jen, you found my son. You stood for Canderous, and gained his trust in a way no amount of credits ever would. You saved Belaya, in time for her to reconcile with Juhani. Dak, Kel, Dustil… all with a new chance. How can you not see everything you’ve accomplished?”

Jen’s expression was disbelieving, but she didn’t pull away. “I don’t think you understand the gravity of the situation,” she whispered hoarsely. “Sun and stars, Carth, if I was the Dark Lord of the Sith, do you know the first thing I’d do?”

I blinked; some metaphors were a little too disturbing to think on.

“I’d break her,” she continued flatly. “By any means possible. Hurt someone hard enough, and long enough, and they’ll do anything to stop the pain. Anything. Even use their gifts against their allies.”

I couldn’t help a flinch, and my hand dropped. I’m an idiot. Somewhere, with everything that had happened, this outcome hadn’t yet occurred to me. Bastila’s battle meditation in the hands of the Sith… we were already losing the war. Losing Bastila was terrible enough, but the thought of her gifts turned on us… this was dire. Jen’s eyes echoed the despair I was just beginning to comprehend.

A tear welled up and dropped on her cheek, right where I’d been touching a moment ago. It tracked a clear trail through the muck she’d not yet cleaned off. Jen turned away from me, shoulders clenching further, and mumbled something under her breath.

“I am a Jedi Knight,” the words were muttered inaudibly, and I wasn’t sure I’d heard correctly until she repeated them. “I am a Jedi Knight.” She’s trying to stay strong, I realized. To not cry in front of me. Stang, she doesn’t always have to be the strong one!

“Jen,” I said through gritted teeth, and abruptly leaned over, unclipped her harness and yanked her unceremoniously into my arms.

She gasped. “Carth!-”

“Shush,” I ordered quietly, and pulled her tightly against my chest, one hand firmly on her dark curls and the other wrapped around her torso. “It’s okay, Jen. We’ll find a way.”

Jen was stiff and unyielding in my arms, but I heard a quiet sob rip itself from her lungs. “Shhh,” I murmured. “We’ll be with the masters soon. We’ll plan from there. Shhh.” Another sob, followed by another, and then she thoroughly fell to pieces in my arms.

I didn’t know what I said to her; nonsensical platitudes as I gently stroked her head and she cried herself out in a purging of emotion she’d likely never allowed herself. The thought of Bastila’s battle meditation turned on the Republic was horrific, yet surely there had to be a glimmer of hope. We’d come so far – if the Jedi Masters had found the last Star Map, then we might be close to the endgame. If Bastila could just hold on – if Jen could help her remain strong under whatever evil ministrations the Sith would come up with – then maybe we still had a fighting chance.

I had to believe that.

And Jen had come so far. She’d led the mission, well and truly, on Korriban - and we’d all followed her lead as if it were the natural thing to do. Jen’s abilities in the Force had escalated tremendously - likely due to instinct borne from her forgotten past. And she was controlling her anger… she was transforming into the Jedi she must have once been. Bastila had said it wasn’t thought possible, but I could see it happening. Jen was… Jen was someone I respected. Someone I admired. Someone I cared for.

Her sobs turned to quiet whimpers, which then eased into the slow breaths of slumber. All the while I’d been murmuring nonsense, and she’d fallen asleep to it. I felt myself smile.

Despite everything, this wasn’t a bad place to be. I looked down at the dark head pillowed against me, and could smell the faint sulphuric tang of Korriban air still resting within her curls.

I didn’t care in the slightest.

Morgana had been a simple woman, easy to love with every fibre of my being. She had been content with life out on the rural plains of Telos before I’d brought her into the city. After Morgana’s death - and, I’d assumed, Dustil’s - my life seemed to lose all meaning other than work and a burning hatred for Karath and all things Sith. I’d found myself wholly uninterested in any other woman. I didn’t plan on it, I didn’t vow to stay celibate, I just- never really got over her death.

Jen was the most complicated woman I’d ever met. They were poles apart in drive and motivations, but in some core ways Jen reminded me strongly of Morgana. Stubborn and sassy. Unable to take anything seriously. Terrible at staying out of trouble. Altogether too accomplished at driving me crazy.

Maybe I had the chance for something here, if I was man enough to take it. I felt the slow burn of desire deep in my gut, and my arms tightened around her reflexively.

Jen stirred at that, and I inwardly berated myself for waking her just as she’d fallen asleep. Her head lifted, and sleep-clouded green eyes stared at me in drowsy confusion.

“Jen,” I whispered. Her eyes dropped to my mouth and stayed there tellingly. A furious flush of red blossomed on her cheeks. The desire flared to life, then, and I lowered my head to hers.

But Jen stiffened, scrabbling out of my lap when we were mere inches apart, her eyes widening in surprise or fright. She landed backwards on the ground with a squeak, before standing inelegantly and backing away.

“Jen-”

“I-uh, have to go,” she mumbled, and all but ran out of the cockpit, leaving me staring at the exit. Oh no you don’t, Jen Sahara, I thought fiercely, and my brows lowered. I’ll give you space for now. But we’re going to talk, and soon.

xXx

Canderous Ordo:

It was at least twenty hours into what Onasi claimed was a two week hyperspace journey, and I lugged the spare bedroll into the side of the cargo bay with a frown. The Ebon Hawk was overloaded, and now that Onasi junior had been moved to the men’s quarters we were out of bunks. Crashing in here was preferable to sleeping near that bunch of Force-using di’kuts – the Wookiee could have ‘em, as far as I was concerned.

We’d lost the princess, and gained three sullen Sithkids instead. It wasn’t a fair exchange.
Bastila’s capture irked. I’d not expected the Wookiee to be so feeble-minded that a haar’chak mind trick would work on him, not to the extent that it did. If he wasn’t so obviously wounded, I’d be laying into him myself.

_Bastila’s tricks fooled you once, Ordo._ Ah, that was galling to remember. There were words to be spoken, between the princess and I, and now it seemed that the chance had been snatched away. Bastila had saved my life, though - in the depths of Manaan when she hadn’t needed to. For that, I’d inwardly acknowledged the debt had been repaid.

Bastila was an uptight, neurotic Jedi, but she’d been our uptight neurotic Jedi. All I knew was that we’d better be getting her back.

Revan had called a ship-wide meeting a few hours after the hyperspace jump. It was the most dysfunctional group I’d ever seen, all crowded into the freighter’s common room, with half the sad-sacks either avoiding each other or glaring like sullen teenagers.

Come to think of it, half of them were sullen teenagers.

There was the quiet one, standing awkwardly against a bulkhead, biting his lip like a toddler as he stared uneasily around. The dark-skinned injured one leaned against Juhani, stimmed and drugged, but his expression was guarded. I’d mentally taken note of him, I’d heard he’d killed the Sith who’d lopped his arm off. _After_ she’d lopped his arm off. And then there was Onasi’s glowering offspring, who hadn’t raised his angry gaze from the ground.

Revan had led an awkward conversation about the robe we were meeting on Kashyyyk, and how our low kolto supplies were reserved for the injured. I’d rolled my eyes in boredom as she went on about some embargo on fighting, friendly or otherwise, due to the dwindling meds.

I’d sent her a look, then; her return expression had been wry as she’d extrapolated that light sparring was permissible, provided it didn’t cause any injury. Then, she’d launched into an idea about sharing Force tricks or some rubbish with the new Sithkids, and I’d snorted before heading away. I didn’t know if Revan planned to train them or convert them – but she was going to need some luck with that lot.

Still, this was Revan. It was likely she’d trained worse in the past.

“Canderous.” A quiet voice from the rear of the ship had me glancing up; the Cathar had entered silently as I’d been eyeing over my temporary living quarters. She’d worn a broken look on her feline face since we’d left Korriban. In the tail of the freighter, wrapped in metres of cloth, lay the corpse of her friend.

It wasn’t how Mando’ade grieved. We burned the remains of our loved ones, sang their battle songs to the stars, and plotted our vengeance. We found a way to move on, to shape our clan into something stronger, and saw the memories of the departed live on in our future.

I’d sent her a look, then; her return expression had been wry as she’d extrapolated that light sparring was permissible, provided it didn’t cause any injury. Then, she’d launched into an idea about sharing Force tricks or some rubbish with the new Sithkids, and I’d snorted before heading away. I didn’t know if Revan planned to train them or convert them – but she was going to need some luck with that lot.

“Hey,” I acknowledged, pulling open the pack I’d brought into the shyrack caves. The cargo bay was a bit of a mess, now – the Wookiee usually did an alright job of keeping order, but since the princess’ capture he’d fallen apart into a hairy, howling mess.

“I must speak with you, Canderous,” Juhani said softly. I dropped the pack, meeting her alien gaze. It was solemn. “This is important.”

“What’s up?”

“Hear me out, Canderous, please.” That caught my attention. The next words set my teeth on edge.
“It’s about Jen.”

Oh, I knew what she was going to say. In Bastila’s absence, I could damn well guess. My eyes narrowed. The Cathar truly was a secret-keeping Jedi at heart, even if she had spent the last year communing with wild beasts in the desert.

“I ain’t keeping the truth from her, Cathar, and if you even think about using the Force-”

“I would not,” she cut in, eyes flashing. Her warrior’s tail snapped around the side of her head as she shook it. “But I am asking you, as her friend, to let her come to the knowledge in her own time.”

I snorted in derision. “In her own time? What, before or after some hu’tuun robe kriffs her mind again?”

“Canderous, we saw something in the Academy.” The Cathar clasped her hands together. There was a smear of dried blood that clotted the fuzz on her face, and I didn’t think she’d rested since the ship had hit the skies. “A holo-recording of Darth Revan.”

That silenced me for a moment, and my eyes fixed warily on Juhani as I waited her out. She held my gaze, her eyes shining an intent entreaty. “She did not recognize me for a time. She did not know where she was, or who she was or what we were doing. If it had not been for Bastila, through the bond – I am not sure she would have returned to a properly conscious state. Canderous, I think it truly dangerous for her mind to comprehend her true identity.”

The Force was a slippery thing, and it had completely kriffed Revan over. But if Revan was ever to regain the glory of who she had once been then she needed to know the truth.

I said as much.

The Cathar nodded in agreement. “I do not dispute that, Canderous, and I have already told Bastila more than once that I would not hide the truth from Jen should she ask me directly. But I believe we must wait until her mind is ready for it. We must wait until she is mentally prepared to accept what she has done-”

“The Jedi have made her hate who she was,” I growled, staring the Cathar down. I’d had enough conversations with Revan to be fully cognizant of her opinion of her true self. She loathed the very mention of Revan. It made for interesting sparring as an obvious weakness – and that’s exactly what it would remain, until she damn well understood the truth.

“No, Canderous, you are wrong,” Juhani countered softly. “It was not the Jedi, it is Revan herself. For Revan Freeflight would not condone what Darth Revan became. And I believe that is the crux of the matter. Until she is ready to accept her past actions as ones she herself committed…” Juhani trailed off, sighing. “Her mind was badly damaged. Enough so that any sort of recovery was not expected, certainly not to this extent. We can only hope that she continues to recover.”

I folded my arms. “And what are you going to do if your beloved Jedi try to mindwipe her again, huh?”

Juhani’s gaze steeled under mine. “I will stop them.”

I grunted. She had the look of genuine resoluteness to her, and I believed her - but that wasn’t the same as agreeing with her. I’d held onto this knowledge since Tatooine, and that seemed like a lifetime ago.
“I don’t deny your intent or courage, Cathar, but you ain’t strong enough to hold up against a group of your own Masters.”

“We only know of one Master there, Canderous,” she countered. Her slanted eyes gleamed with tenacity. “Master Vrook Lamar. He is Bastila’s Master.” She folded her arms and lifted her chin. “Jen is telepathic with Bastila now. We will have no link with Bastila if Master Vrook does… whatever was done to Revan before.”

I stared at her.

“Just wait and see, Canderous. That is all I am asking.” Her gaze never wavered from mine. “We are all her allies here. None of us will allow anything to happen to her, and I truly believe Bastila’s Master would not wish to lose his link with Bastila. And when they see how far Jen has come…” She took in a deep breath through her nostrils.

My eyes narrowed as I surveyed Juhani; she was stalwart and full of conviction. Revan wasn’t the wartime commander she had once been – but she was more than the woman I’d first met on Taris. I followed her now, without reservation – and I planned on ensuring she became the leader I’d once fought against. I’d watch her, and see if I agreed with the Cathar’s evaluation.

Juhani was still staring at me in appeal. I grunted. “I’ll think about it. Not sure I believe your story about the fragilities of her mind – but I’ll think about it.”

Our attention was caught then as the very topic of our conversation opened a hatch and stepped in. Revan grinned at us, but there was a serious look in her eyes. None of us had felt much like smiling since the princess was taken.

“Are you ready to join us for practice, Juhani?” Revan asked. “Kel and Dak are in the garage.”

“Dak’s out of the medbay again?” the Cathar, her voice pitching high in startlement. Her arms dropped and her eyes widened. I was mildly surprised myself, inwardly picking the human would crash within the hour. He’d already collapsed once when he first boarded.

“Yeah. He’s loaded up on pain meds and kolto. I think he’s having trouble sleeping.” Revan looked at me. An eyebrow raised, but her expression was calm. She’d come back changed from Korriban. Stronger, more sure of herself. “You up for some sparring later, Canderous?”

I felt my mouth twitch. “Aren’t you afraid I’ll mess your face up again?”

“I’m sure you can hold back your punches, Canderous,” she said drily. “We are running low on kolto. But I’d appreciate the practice and the distraction.”

So would I. I gave a curt nod. “Go play with your Sithkids. I’ll see you in a few hours.”

xXx

Kel Algwinn:

The garage of the freighter was mostly empty, other than the parts of a broken swoop bike piled against the far wall. Dak leaned next to them, idly rolling a hydrospanner under his boot.

I’d not had much to do with Dak on Korriban. He’d been one of Uthar’s, but spent most of his time in the Valley, documenting whatever finds he came across. I knew he had an interest in learning and a keen mind, and had wondered once if he might be a kindred spirit trapped on that awful world, just like me.
Dak was a talker, though, and he'd irritated those on my side. Thalia, Mekel, Master Yuthura. But maybe... maybe their dislike of him had been more due to Yuthura's growing discontent with Master Uthar, rather than Dak himself.

“I’m not in any state to be stuffing around with Force lessons,” Dak muttered, his bandaged limb clasped protectively into his side.

“It’ll take your mind off things,” Jen Sahara said, her tone more wry than sympathetic. I wasn’t used to calling her that in my head, not yet. And the other one, Dak’s friend Juhani – she was Staria, still, to me. The one who’d offered me hope away from Korriban, and was now delivering. I owed them both, I acknowledged, even as the nervousness sat uncomfortably in my stomach. “And you keep refusing the sleep meds.”

Dak looked down, glaring at his mangled limb. “Sleep doesn’t help. All the meds do is screw my dreams worse than usual.” The fingers of his good hand clenched his opposite elbow.

“You will remember some of our training, Dak,” Juhani said quietly, coming to sit next to him. “Kel has never been amongst the Jedi and could benefit from our shared experience.”

Jen cleared her throat. “There is something I must say first.” She was looking at the Cathar. There was a tight look on her face. “To you and Dak. It’s about Belaya.”

That was the name of Dak’s friend, the one Lashowe had killed before Dak turned on her. The corpse lay wrapped in the engine room of the freighter. It gave me the creeps. Dead matter had no bearing on a person’s soul... I didn’t understand why they wanted to transport a corpse that would begin to rot and reek before our journey would finish. Amongst my people, we would bury or discard the flesh remnants of a dead loved one as soon as possible. For the physical was no more than a temporary dwelling, and once you left it, it served no purpose other than to fertilize the ground.

“What about Belaya?” Dak snapped, his face darkening with grief. Juhani was silent, her Cathar eyes wide and golden.

I’d not have predicted Dak leaving the Sith voluntarily, but the death of a shared friend had rattled him. I believed in him more than Dustil, at any rate. Everyone overlooked Dustil - but I didn’t. That sneaky rat could be in this room, right now, for all we knew.

Jen’s gaze hardened. “I’ll not have any violence on this ship. Dak, you’ve been on Korriban, so you damn well know what Uthar’s like-”

“Jen,” Juhani cut in, halting her tirade. “Speak. What is it?”

Jen sighed, her eyes closing briefly. “It was Dustil who captured Belaya. On Uthar’s orders. I- I thought you should know, before you hear it from one of the others.”

“Dustil,” Dak said flatly. His eyes had narrowed, and his only hand dropped away from his bandaged stump, clenching.

I wasn’t surprised at all. Not at all. Dustil had always been Uthar’s stooge – I’d seen him, once, lead a mercenary straight to Uthar. Straight to his own death. And I knew he’d had something to do with Initiate Drex’s death, even though everyone said it was just the Korriban pox. And what about Initiate Selene? She’d been the nicest sentient on Korriban, and Dustil’s close friend – and she’d gone missing. No, that boy was a true Sith in the making, and the one reason I didn’t feel entirely safe on this ship.
But here was better than following Yuthura, who would likely try setting up her own Sith Academy one day if she didn’t change her mind and stay on Korriban. I’d dreamed of leaving that place for too long. I’d done my best to hide away wishes of the Jedi, in a deep corner of my soul. I’d never met one… not before Juhani and Jen Sahara.

“Carth’s son?” Juhani whispered hoarsely. “He’s the one who took Belaya? Who… who tortured her?”

“Uthar had a damn sight more to do with it than some angst-ridden teenager, Juhani,” Jen countered. Her eyes were intent on the Cathar. “He’s avoiding all of us because of it – but… look, I can’t ask you to forgive what he did, but…”

“That chivhole Uthar,” Dak hissed. “If it were possible to resurrect him so I could stab him through the gut myself, I’d do so.”

“Do not even think such things, Dak,” Juhani mumbled, bowing her head. “And to think, I blamed you…”

Dak snorted as he turned to look at her. “Don’t sweat that, Juhani.” He looked serious and genuine. “Uthar was always a pro at screwing with people’s minds. Shavit, I’ve done enough things I’m ashamed of - a damn sight more than Dustil I’d wager.”

I wasn’t so sure about that.

“Dustil’s strong in the Force,” I said abruptly, causing their collective gaze to swing on me. “Stronger than any of us here. And he can hide himself… he could be anywhere on this ship.”

“He’s not here,” Jen said, her voice confident and sure.

“You don’t know that,” I muttered, feeling the unease twist in my gut. “You don’t know how well he can disappear.”

“Oh, I’m familiar with Dustil Onasi’s cloaking abilities,” Jen replied. A wry smile played on her lips. Jen wasn’t one who took too much seriously, I was beginning to realize. She closed her eyes, still smiling, and the Force coalesced under her command.

I had to revise my earlier statement. I’d felt Jen’s power, back on Korriban, facing a furious Uthar. I’d only come near after Uthar was dead. Jen Sahara blew Dustil into the wind.

She raised a hand, pointing deeper into the ship. “He’s hiding out in the men’s quarters. Avoiding us all.” Her eyes snapped open, green and considering. “Look, guys, we can’t isolate him. He’s angry with his dad, he’s pissed off Mission which means he’s pissed off a Wookiee, and he’s avoiding us. This is not a good situation for him… even if it is of his own making.”

“What are you asking of us, Jen?” Juhani said, her voice low and bitter. “I came close to killing Dak when I believed he was at fault, and Dak is a friend. I do not have it in me to forget something like this.”

“That’s because you’ve never been on Korriban,” Dak cut in, and his hand moved to rest gently on her shoulder. “Juhani… you don’t truly understand what living in Uthar’s house was like. How he preyed on your fears and weaknesses, how he twisted you into doing things you’d never believe yourself capable of.” Dak sighed, his face lined with something akin to disgust. I had the feeling it was directed at himself. “Shavit, it’s not like Dustil knew Belaya. I can’t hate him for doing to a stranger exactly what I’ve done, in the past.”
The garage resounded with silence after that, and Dak rested his head back against the durasteel wall, shutting his eyes. He surprised me. I wasn’t ready to give Dustil an inch of trust, and Dak’s words left me feeling slightly ashamed of myself.

“You are more ready to return to the Jedi than you realize, Dak Vesser,” Juhani murmured.

Dak snorted, eyes still closed. “We’ll see, Juhani. It’s not exactly what I planned on doing, but then I can’t say I’m sad to see the back of Korriban, either.”

Jen cleared her throat, and we all turned to look at her. The corner of her mouth twitched in a wry half-smile. “Well. I’ll go about tracking down the young Onasi later. For now, let’s keep things traditional. Juhani, do you want to lead a Force meditation?”

The Cathar looked taken aback. “I can if you wish me too, Jen.”

“You recall the most Jedi training, Juhani,” Jen said. Dak frowned at her, and I felt the same level of confusion. I would have expected Jen Sahara to lead whatever Force lessons she had in mind. I had thought she was the Jedi Knight onboard.

“As you wish,” Juhani said softly, and began.

xXx

Yudan Rosh:

The giant wroshyr trees loomed all around us like colossal sentinels forever immortalized into petrified stillness. There was an eerie, ominous feel to the Shadowlands – indigenous wildlife aside. It added to the oppressive weight that had been bearing down on me, ever since I had heard about the resurrection of Darth Revan.

I remembered clearly the first time I’d seen her, alert and enthusiastic, but with a wary edge that was a product of her upbringing. She’d been a few years younger than me, right at the peak of adolescence, but where I’d spent my formative years training at a Jedi Enclave, she had been scraping to survive in one of the forgotten slums in the Outer Rim.

Revan's thirst for knowledge had been staggering. Her ascension to knight was swift, and it wasn't long before her dedication and intrinsic need to understand everything began to inspire others. And not just young greenhorns like her. Seasoned, experienced knights like Arran Da'klor and Talvon Esan began to follow her lead. Myself - well, I’d been one of the first. The same as Meetra, who was older and had significant standing within the Jedi ranks herself.

Not that those old coots would ever admit to there being a pecking order. The Sith and the Jedi were not so dissimilar, really. And these days I found myself dwelling far too often on events from a past that had once been glorious.

…

It was hard to stay focused on Alderaanian politics. The databook glinted in front of me, listing the latest concessions and demands that raged from their capital. Part of me had truly believed I’d left political intrigue behind with the ashes of my childhood when I’d joined the Jedi on Dantooine - but my transfer to Coruscant, the heart of the Core, had dispelled those rosy illusions.

I sighed, placing the databook to the side for an interlude. Meetra was nearby, her soft voice intermingling with the children. She had a sweet, compelling nature, and was already a favoured mentor of the younglings. They loved her. Everyone did, really; some of the Jedi who rallied around Revan's cause did so because Meetra had.

The sound of raised voices from the meeting hall drew my attention, I looked over to see Revan stalking outside with a face like thunder, sparks flashing from her eyes even at this distance. Malak walked behind her, as always, displeasure apparent on his open face.

They’d been gone for a year. Once the news about Talshion broke out, Revan had fled Dantooine – what had been her home Enclave for a brief three weeks - and Malak had followed from Coruscant. Reports had been scant, but we’d heard enough: the two knights had been deep into the frontlines, in the Outer Rim territory, scouting for the Republic. Reconnaissance and information gathering. They’d seen first-hand the collateral damage the Republic was threatened with.

Then a month ago, like a thermal detonator, Revan had exploded back onto the Coruscanti scene. With holovid footage, military reports, and even a Force relic to back her up, she’d spent her time rallying the Jedi to support her petition: intervention against the Mandalorian offensive.

I jumped to my feet and strode over to meet her. The outcome of this audience with the High Council was critical; Revan had petitioned them in the past, prior to the devastation on Talshion, but this time was different. This time she had not only the backing of a powerful Rear-Admiral in the Fleet, but also a fistful of Jedi Knights.

Surely now, the Council would see reason.

Revan was clutching a steel mask in her hand, and her face was a gathering storm.

It hasn't gone well. I could feel my lips compress into a grim line of displeasure, and had to halt the urge to wrap my lekku around my neck defensively. They didn't listen. Again, despite all Revan has worked towards, the High Council refuses to listen. Revan was a charismatic speaker, but there were some on the Council who’d never warmed to her. Lonna and Atris, in particular. Revan's age when she was found would always be held up by her critics as a deficiency, and the last year had hardened her.

She was still the Revan I'd always love from afar, but some of the light had been snuffed out.

“Well?”

“They’re deliberating,” she answered me tightly. I sensed Meetra come to my side, and spotted Arran Da’klor and Nisotsa Organa walking towards us decisively – both seasoned knights and staunch supporters of Revan’s cause. Malak was a towering form of barely-concealed frustration at her side. “But I think we already know their answer.”

“I’ve heard Captain Karath is engaging the Mandalorians at Suurja. There’s skirmishes at Jebble, Vanquo and Tarnith.” Malak scowled. “They’re all resource planets of Taris, so you know where they’re going.”

“The Council is scared. Scared and tired,” Revan whispered; an angry, hissing noise. “It’s the legacy of Exar Kun - they’re afraid that if Jedi engage in battle, one or more will fall to the Dark Side.” She clenched her fists. “They’d rather let the Republic fall than run the risk.”

“Exar Kun…” Arran whistled as he joined us, his red skin darkening. One of the few Zeltrons in the Order, he was a good friend of Revan’s. “It’s before our time. Maybe, they have a point-”

“Since when do we compare atrocities,” Revan cut in tightly. “Murder is murder, but if you’re going to pull out the scales, then remember the genocide we’ve heard about from the Outer Rim outweighs the devastation of Kun.”
“The reports are scant, Revan. We don’t know how much is hearsay-”

“We do,” Malak interrupted. “Any Force-sensitive within a light-year felt Revan’s vision when she picked up that cursed mask. And it’s not just the Cathar who’ve fallen to the Mandalorians. They’ve been busy for years before the Republic even paid notice – and now they’re steamrolling a path directly to the Core.”

Revan’s green eyes flashed to Malak. “They’ll get Taris well within the year. We need to go there, Mal.”

“You’re going to join the war?” Meetra questioned in her musical voice.

Revan gave her a short nod. “I’ll wait for the Council’s answer, but we already know it. Mal and I heard Master Kavar is on the frontlines – you know he’s busy fighting, despite the Order’s decree? If he can frelling well ignore them-”

“He’s a Master, Revan-”

“Exactly,” she cut Meetra off. “He’s exactly who should lead the Jedi. If we can form a group of knights to work under him, we could make a difference. A real, tangible difference out there on the battlefield.” She sighed. “You don’t realize how bad the morale is, out there. The Fleet desperately need something to believe in. They’re disorganized and fragmented and think the Mandalorians will win. Sun and stars, if Nomi Sunrider had only passed on her gift, think how that could aid the Republic!”

Battle meditation. The lost Jedi art Nomi had rediscovered against Exar Kun, and failed to pass on to her progeny. It was an amazing talent, and had been lost for centuries. Chances were it would never again be seen in our lifetime.

Revan was staring intently at the steel mask clutched in her hand. “The Republic needs a symbol to believe in. A paragon, a hero. Huh…”

“What are you thinking, Revvie?” Malak rumbled at her side, giving her a nudge. She shot him a quick grin, but there was a calculating look in her eyes I recognized all too well. Her quicksilver mind was at work.

“You said a group of knights,” Arran interrupted. “Who do you have in mind?”

“Whoever is interested,” Revan answered, levelling him with an intense stare. “I won’t build it up, Arran. Kavar can get away with disobeying the Order, but it may very well mean exile for anyone who follows us.”

“I’ll follow you past the Outer Rim and back, Revvie,” Malak said in a quiet voice, his hand touching hers briefly. He was always one for dramatics, and sometimes, in my lesser moments, I hated him for it. “I’d follow you against the whole of the Order.”

Revan sent him a heated look that spoke of an intimacy foreign and forbidden, before turning to the rest of us.

“I’ll ask Xaset Terep and Talvon Esan along,” Revan said.

“You know my mind,” Arran stated. “Organize a meeting. I’ll be there.”

“I’m in,” I added. As if there had been any doubt. “Invite Jonn Dan.”
“I, also, will be there,” Nisotsa said huskily, speaking up for the first time.

Meetra was silent, and all eyes turned to her. Her sweet, unassuming nature meant that some overlooked her despite her experience, and her empathic ability was vastly underrated by most. Revan was not one of them. Finally, Meetra spoke.

“I will be there, and listen.” She gazed at all of us in turn. “Invite Cariaga Sin. Alaki Vash. Rab Vooktari. And Jexer Te'reda.”

...

And that was the birth of the Jedi Thirteen. Or, as the Fleet liked to call us, Revan’s Guard of Twelve. For Master Kavar refused to lead, and abandoned the frontlines to go crawling back to the High Council. Revan had been left to command as best as she could, donning that cursed mask and giving the Republic a faceless hero to worship.

Half the damn galaxy even believed that Revan Freeflight was male.

Of course I’d followed. I’d agreed with her from the start, and Revan’s sheer power and mercurial charisma were a shining light we all fell victim to. Malak added thoughtful reason to her impassioned arguments, and so many of us were convinced to follow them deep into war. And we’d won.

Oh, how we’d won.

Malak always had her back, then; he was her guard, her wall, her tower of strength. Anything Revan set her mind to, he strived to make a reality. I’d wondered, so many times, what she would have made of herself had Malak Devari not existed.

Who would she have turned to? Who would have supported her, guided her, made her stronger?

Would that person have been able to stop her succumbing to the Dark Side?

Would I have been able to?

We’d been close, I recalled with a bittersweet resentment I’d held at bay until recently. I’d followed Revan most of my life, breathing her dreams and her ideals and victory and twisted power and delusions of conquest. Oh and hadn’t the Force tasted sweet then, after the Mandalorian scourge had been eliminated, and we were on the path to power the likes of which no one had ever tasted before. With the Star Forge, Revan would mould the Republic into a better, stronger empire, and I was one of the lucky few who would help make it a reality.

But then her anger began to encompass everything, and Malak’s insanity would creep in, and the few others remaining either cowered in constant fear or became warped tools sadistically enjoying the suffering we began to inflict upon the known worlds.

Even then, I still would have followed her anywhere. Malak’s betrayal had been unknown to me; perhaps he realized my devotion had always been to her, first and foremost. Bandon and Nisotsa had been part of it, always eager to scabble for more standing, but even they hadn’t dare face her directly. Arran had, and paid for it with his cursed life.

With Revan gone I drew deep into the Dark Side, cold and remote, as my soul slowly withered away.

And then, the news of Darth Revan's resurrection broke through the upper ranks of Malak's Dark Jedi. It hit Nisotsa hard, she who'd betrayed Darth Revan and was the only Guard member remaining - other than myself. And Malak. The rest were long dead, or presumed so, in the case of Xaset and Meetra who were never found after Malachor.

I thought I'd been holding it together, but insidious doubts had been creeping in for weeks, nightmares of all those I'd murdered and tortured in the name of Revan’s vision of a better galaxy that was as warped and twisted as the Force we all wielded.

If I drew the Force in, deep to the cockles of my soul, I could forget, I could ride a wave of power that would separate me from the rest of the living. But it always ended, and without it came the recriminations, the remembrance of who I had been, once; a good Jedi who desired peace in the universe and the love of another who only had eyes for her childhood friend.

I would never have turned on her like that, no matter how Dark we’d become.

Now, however, she’d enacted the ultimate betrayal. Mind-wiped, or so the rumours said. A puppet of the Jedi Council, with no memory of her past atrocities, while I was forced to re-enact them nightly. The Force twists and corrupts, I thought bitterly, but that she be ignorant of all that she wrought is the very height of injustice.

It would end here, on Kashyyyk. For the memory of the woman I had once esteemed so highly, I would ensure Darth Revan was no more. Our speeder was loaded with grenades and nerve restraints and syringes of that Force-inhibiting drug Kylah had been experimenting with. Bandon had slipped in a neural disruptor, thinking I wouldn’t notice.

He had plans to capture Darth Revan.

But, no. Oh no. It was time for Darth Revan to finally come to an end. If Bandon didn’t finish her off, then I certainly would.

But, unlike Malak, I would follow her into oblivion.

xXx

Chapter End Notes

Seriina Starr belongs to kosiah, from her fic 'Memory'. I'd say my Mekel has been influenced by hers as well. If you're after a great post-KotOR fic with heaps of plot twists and characters, go read 'Memory'.

I would love to hear what you think. Thanks for reading!
Dustil Onasi:

I waited until the garage of the Ebon Hawk had emptied out before finally making my way there. I felt them - Dak and Kel and the Cathar and bloody Jen Sahara, starting their little Force lessons that I hadn’t dared join. I don’t want to join in. I’m not scared, I’m just not interested.

It was galling when I couldn’t even convince myself.

I could have gone with Mekel. I should have gone with Mekel. What the frakk was here for me, after all?

The broken parts of a swoop bike littered half the garage, and that was my reason for checking this place out. I’d just knelt down, releasing my invisible Force weaves as I bent to investigate whether it was possible to salvage this mess, when the hatch swished open.

“You plan on hiding the entire hyperspace journey?” Jen said mildly, stepping inside.

I could feel myself scowl, and deliberately didn’t look at her. “I think everyone would be happier if I did,” I muttered.

“Your father wouldn’t be.”

“He can frakk off,” I spat, suddenly angry. “My entire life he’s been too busy fighting for glory, and now that I actually moved on he wants to be a part of it. Frakk him.” I felt my mouth twist. We’d barely spoken two words since the ship left Korriban behind. I didn’t know what to say to him, so I hid. It wasn’t like I couldn’t work out how to use that disgusting synthesizer after everyone had cleared out from the common room. The only sent I’d come across was that damn ugly Mandalorian, who’d given me a derisive sneer before stomping away.

Jen wore a thoroughly unimpressed look when I turned to face her. “You chose to come onboard, Dustil. Your dad’s pretty stubborn. You’re going to have to talk to him sooner or later.”

“No I don’t,” I said automatically, and glared when she snickered.

“Here, catch this.” She threw a lightsaber to me unexpectedly, and I caught it on reflex, staring at it dumbly. It was a training one. I wondered if she’d nicked it from the Academy. There were chests full of them back there, but sometimes peeps used real ones. I remembered a time when that pissant Shaardan somehow got a hold of a white colour crystal in a real ‘saber and used it to cut down an unsuspecting Trandoshan in the training rooms. He was a tool, Shaardan, but I’d always been kinda surprised he kept failing graduation.

Jen was holding a training lightsaber, too. “You didn’t join in with the Force lessons earlier.”

“Well, no, I did just torture and cause the death of Belaya Linn, so excuse me for avoiding a really pissed-off Cathar,” I snarled. Not to mention Dak. We’d gotten along okay, as far as Sith students did, but that was before Belaya. And Kel- well, Kel hadn’t looked me in the eye since I’d betrayed that mercenary to Uthar. I scared him.

This wasn’t even talking about Mission Vao, who glared bloody death whenever she spotted me. And she had a damn Wookiee bodyguard. The only one onboard who wasn’t pissed at me, for some reason or another, was the Mandalorian mercenary. He merely thought I was beneath his notice. And I still didn’t get how my father was travelling peaceably with a Mandalorian.

And- Jen Sahara. Or Ness Jonohl. Or whatever the frakk her name was. She, who’d slaughtered Uthar and turned the Academy upside down. Who was – so I’d found out eavesdropping – Force-bonded to Bastila frakking Shan, a paragon of the Jedi Order. How could a stand-up Jedi like Jen Sahara even have an inkling of my situation? The darkest thing she’d probably ever done was tell my useless father off for drinking all the caffa.

“What you did to Belaya was abominable,” a voice hissed from behind us, and I spun to see Juhani lurking in the other doorway. Her alien eyes gleamed yellow, and I tensed, ready to reach for the Force at a moment’s notice. Jen stepped up next to me.

Jen opened her mouth to speak. “Juhani-”

“I cannot forgive you for that,” the Cathar spoke over Jen. “Belaya was my truest friend, and she deserved better than an end like that.”

I felt the dread circle sickeningly in my belly. For what, really, could I do on a ship where everyone hated me? I didn’t believe Jen Sahara would stand by me against her friend, no matter that she tensed in readiness at my side. And Juhani – well. She had a right to vengeance. I couldn’t refute that.

“But maybe I can understand it,” Juhani said softly, and I felt my mouth drop open in surprise. Righteous anger and despair still marked the Cathar’s face, but there was something else I couldn’t decipher. She turned to look at Jen. “Did you know that, after I fled Dantooine, I returned to Taris first?”

At Jen’s mute shake of her head, the Cathar continued. “I was full of rage, rage at what Quatra had put me through, and despair at what I thought I’d done.” Her voice dropped to a whisper, and her eyes gained a faraway look. “There were- some people I tracked down on Taris. Some I held grudges against from my childhood. They didn’t live long.”

Her gaze snapped back to mine, then. “I can understand that you may not have had much of a choice, Dustil Onasi. I may not be able to forgive you for what you have done- but I do understand it. Better than you would think.”

Think. I didn’t know what I was thinking anymore. The Cathar was bristling with anger, and yet almost seemed to be condoning my actions. Because she’d killed, before.

Maybe she wasn’t cut from quite the same cloth as powerful Jen Sahara and heroic Bastila Shan.

“Dak does not blame you. You should know that,” Juhani added softly. “He was with you on Korriban, all these years. He understands. Now-” She cleared her throat, and glanced over to Jen. “Why don’t you turn on that training lightsaber so we can see what you have been taught.”

I glanced back to the older human, to find her grinning impishly at me. “Come on, kid,” she teased, a white bar activating innocently from her hand. Hers was a short, off-hand blade – she’d tossed me the superior one. After witnessing the showdown with Uthar, though, I didn’t really believe I held the advantage. “Let’s see what Carth’s son can do with a lightsaber.”

I turned mine on and faced her warily. She was still grinning, her eyes dancing from behind the beam of white. I stepped forward, somewhat awkwardly, and lashed out.

Jen blocked and stepped to the side, and I followed her, flicking my ‘saber down by her legs.

Again, a block and a side-step. She wasn’t attacking, I realized, but giving me a chance to warm up.

“Look for her weaknesses,” Juhani called. “There is an opening in her guard. Find it.” Jen bared her teeth as I swung again; once more parried by her shorter weapon. I had the reach advantage, but more than that- there was an awkward shift to her pose, her ‘saber wasn’t covering her body adequately.

I swung high, but abruptly changed direction when she rose to block. Jen was too quick for me, though, and dodged backwards.

“She is used to wielding two blades,” the Cathar added, and Jen shot her a mock glare. “She leaves her side unguarded when she only has one.”

I could see what Juhani meant, now. Jen fought like she expected a shield on her off-hand, and when it wasn’t present she failed to fully compensate. But Jen Sahara was too quick for me to land a blow, and she refused to attack.

“Stop hiding, Dustil,” Jen said, dodging me again. My eyes narrowed, and I stepped sideways before launching a blow at her weak side. She blocked, still, and grinned at me from behind our crossed weapons. “I expect to see you at the next session.”

“I’m not going to be a frakking Jedi,” I retorted. I didn’t care what Dak and Kel planned on doing, but there was no way I’d go scurrying to some robed Master to beg for enlightenment. I had zero interest in the Jedi Order, and a lifetime’s worth of distrust.

“Then use it as an opportunity to learn skills for yourself,” she snapped, leaning backwards from an overhand lunge. It was getting annoying, the way she refused to attack. “We’ve all got things to teach, yourself included. I’d love to know how you keep hiding the way you do.”

I stalled, momentarily surprised. Sith didn’t share skills on Korriban. Not the Adept, not the Initiates. We were all too busy vying for prestige and individual status. “You want to learn my trick, huh?” I said, somewhat guardedly. Everyone wanted something, after all.

“I’d be interested, but it’s up to you. We’re not your enemy, Dustil.” Jen paused, too, a serious look on her face for once. “Stars, the only one on this ship likely to lash out at you is Mission, and she’s not a Force user.”

I could feel my cheeks heat at the mention of the Twi’lek. I wished I’d never met her on Korriban. Then we could have started with a clean slate here. I’d actually enjoyed speaking with her before I’d frakked it all up.

“Why don’t you try facing up to her and apologizing?” The words were soft and genuine and I felt my lip curl at the stupid idea.

“Apologizing?” I spluttered. “What, sorry for scaring the stuffing out of you and threatening to lop your headtails off? Yeah, I bet that’d go down real well.”
She shrugged, her lightsaber lowering. Mine was at half-mast, too. “Mission has the biggest heart of anyone I ever met. An apology worked for me when I screwed up.”

I snorted in disgust. “What did you do, pinch her pazaak cards?”

“No,” Jen said absently, but her gaze had travelled behind me to the open hatch. I could sense someone else enter the room, the faintest touch in the Force, and it was more familiar and welcome that I’d ever admit. Dad. Jen’s lips tightened and a high colour of red bloomed on her face. “I scuttled the Ebon Hawk while Mission – and everyone else – was onboard. Caused them to crash-land in the Manaan Ocean and almost get captured by the Sith while I ran off-world.”

My mouth dropped in shock as I stared at Jen disbelievingly. Her eyes snapped back to mine, and she grinned. “We’re not that different, Dustil.” She switched off the ‘saber and threw it to Juhani, who caught it effortlessly. “I’ll leave you guys to it.”

I turned to watch as she wandered to the exit, where Dad was still standing, his arms folded casually as he stared at her.

“Excuse me,” Jen said tightly, motioning for him to move. She looked either uncomfortable or angry.

I thought they were friends. Is she pissed at him? Maybe I’d have an ally. For I sure as frakk didn’t know if I wanted to punch Dad or hug him.

“You’re leaving so soon?” Dad asked in a neutral voice.

“I have- things. Things to do,” Jen muttered.

“Coward,” he said mildly, but sidestepped out of the way. She shot him a fiery glare before disappearing. He stared after her for a moment, in silence, as the Cathar exited in her wake.

Then, with a quiet sigh, Dad turned back around.

“Dustil,” he acknowledged quietly.

I could feel the scowl on my face, and hated the awkward feeling inside. Everything in my life had been overturned in a matter of days. While I was glad to be free of Uthar – truly, I was – I felt completely directionless. Like I had no idea what I actually wanted.

“I wish things were easier between us,” Dad admitted, and I opened my mouth to retort that it was his damn fault but he bet me to it. “Look, I know you have every right to be angry at me. For not being there, for always putting the war first. I- I can’t change the past, Dustil. I can only try to do things better this time around. To be there for you, if you’ll let me.”

He looked so serious, so damn earnest, talking to me like an equal for the first time in my frakking life, and I felt the anger completely vanish, leaving only an uneasy residue of bitterness behind.

“I don’t know,” I muttered, raking a hand through my hair. I sighed. “I don’t think I know much of anything anymore.”

His mouth twitched; almost a grin, but not quite. “Believe it or not, son, but I know how you feel.”

Son. The word simultaneously annoyed and warmed me – annoying me further. “Really?” I said in disbelief. Like he’d ever felt that way. Seriously, I’d lost count of the commendations Dad used to receive from his superiors. As a boy, I’d weigh his medals in my hands when he was away, awed and proud and sad all at the same time. Dad had three of them, then; shiny titasteel with colourful ribbons. I wondered if he’d been awarded more since Telos.

“Yes, really,” Dad answered, his voice dry. “These last few months, especially.”

My eyes narrowed. “Why were you on Korriban, Dad?” I could hear my voice twist on the last word, and saw the flicker in his eyes as he noticed it, too. “You’re a fighter pilot. What the frakk were you lot doing there, with Bastila frakking Shan of all people?”

He hesitated, and I felt myself scowling all over again. “Suppose you can’t tell me, huh?” I said bitterly. I’d always wanted details, as a kid. The few times Dad was actually home – home, not on the frontlines, not at Base where Mum refused to let me go – he never wanted to talk about it. Always seemed more interested in my studies, or what stupid holo-movie was doing the rounds, or who my friends were. He never let me catch a glimpse of his glorious life, out there, being a famous warhero.

“I can tell you parts,” he said quietly. “I’d like to know what you’ve been up to as well.”

I snorted. “I’ve been training to be a Dark Jedi, Dad.”

“Yeah, I got that,” he snapped. “I didn’t mean- look, we’ve got a lot of catching up to do. And- and you’ve grown into a man since Telos. I- I can’t begin to tell you how it feels to know you’re alive, Dustil. At how- how happy that’s made me.”

I shrugged uncomfortably, looking away. “Guess I always thought you’d throw yourself into the war. Y’know, like you’ve done your entire life.”

“Well, I did I guess,” he conceded, ignoring the bitterness of my last words. “But I thought of you and your mother every day, Dustil. Every single day.”

I blinked and glanced down at the ground. It was the same slate grey durasteel as everywhere else in the ship. “She shouldn’t have died. It’s not fair that she did. I… I miss her.”

“I know, son.” His arms were around me then. I hugged him back, awkward and ill-at-ease and maybe a little bit comforted, before stepping back.

“You’re almost as tall as me now,” Dad said, startled.

I laughed, surprised at the inane comment, and looked at him. We were close to the same height. “Four years of growing, Dad,” I said wryly.

He smiled, but it was sad. “Look, come and get something to eat in the common room. You can tell me about that, er, colourful friend of yours who looked like he wanted to kill me outside the Academy.” Dad grinned, then, looking about ten years younger. “And I’ll tell you how I crash-landed on Taris and met most of the crew onboard.”

xXx

Zhar Lestin:

The air on Kashyyyk had a wildness to it that I found strangely freeing. Amongst the branches of the great wroshyr trees, it was easy to forget the galactic battles being fought elsewhere. In other circumstances, I would have found myself at peace on this unkempt world.
But the indigenous tribe in this part of the planet were under a Czerka-sanctioned stranglehold due to a corrupt leader, and the presence of several Jedi was not exactly welcome. Staying in temporary Czerka huts mounted by hanging plysteel ropes was a viable alternative to the dubious hospitality of the Wookiees, but Vrook, it seemed, had valid reasons for imposing upon the natives.

I sat back in a woven lee-cane chair, my fingers pressing deep into my temples. The situation of the Wookiees was an unpleasant one, with any dissenters being sold by their chieftain as slaves, and was the sort of unjust scenario that we as Jedi should be investigating.

But this Wookiee business is as significant as a tach in a krayt dragon’s den. For years, now, I lived with the crushing despair within me that the padawan I’d trained had turned into one of the deadliest villains in the galaxy. When the news broke that he’d turned on the one he’d once loved more than life itself, something inside me truly died. It was the final step into the darkness, and I did not know if there was anyone who could turn back from that.

I transferred back to Dantooine when Malak first fell. Coruscant was too busy, with the weight of my old padawan’s fate on my soul. And Karon was already there, had been for years, since just prior to Malak and Revan's initial flight to investigate the Mandalorian threat. She’d transferred for Revan, at the time, to try and ease her ex-padawan into a new enclave away from her lover. The High Council in Coruscant themselves decreed the separation of Knights Malak and Revan, despite both mine and Karon's heated arguments against it.

But Revan was too outspoken, and Malak too convincing. And there were too many on the Council who, I believed, feared their views and their charisma. Other powerful, more experienced Knights like Meetra Surik and Yudan Rosh started clustering around them, and sometimes I believed the Council-sanctioned separation of Malak and Revan had less to do with their supposedly forbidden love, and more to do with their growing power bloc.

But, regardless, Revan’s stay on Dantooine had been brief. Three weeks, all told, before the news of Talshion burning hit the galactic HoloNet and they both ran to the frontlines. It was a year before they returned to Coruscant, and this time, when they left, they took damn near half the Order’s Knights with them.

Dantooine was a quieter place than Coruscant, and a calmer one. Karon and I had been children there, a lifetime ago, before we moved to Coruscant for padawan training. We’d both been fresh-eyed and adolescent, and we’d bonded early. If we’d not been Force-sensitive, then perhaps we would have been something else to each other. Something more. But the combined complexities of an inter-species relationship and the emotional pitfalls of the Force were enough to keep our feelings for each other at a strictly platonic level. We’d both believed that, given time, perhaps Malak and Revan’s relationship would fade in the same manner, as the effervescence of youth did.

Who knew? Given different circumstances, perhaps it would have. The Coruscanti High Council did not agree.

Karon had been elected to the Dantooine Council a year ago. We had worked together our entire life, so a part of me was surprised to find her involved in something distinct to me. I held no contention over it… excepting that it conflicted her. Karon had been deeply torn over something, something from the Council meetings that she could not unburden on me.

Something so staggering that the entire reason she’d been elected to the Council was because of who her padawan had once been.

I found it difficult to forgive Karon for keeping Revan’s survival from me. While I understood that secrecy was part of one’s ascension to the Council, in some ways I was as much Revan’s Master as she had been. Just as she had understood Malak as well as I.

It had always felt wrong to be mad at Karon, and doubly now that she was one with the Force. I sighed, feeling the sting of tears at the back of my eyes. Vrook had showed me Karon’s last holomessage, and for once he’d been peaceably quiet. He had viewed it weeks ago, before I had even known the name Jen Sahara.

…

The dark-skinned Zabrak stared at the camera, her eyes a bright turquoise even in the shaky light emitted by the holo-token.

“I am on Manaan, having spent the last day in discussions with Padawan Bastila Shan, and Padawan Juhani. Let me say at first that Padawan Juhani is fine, and has been redeemed by none other than Jen Sahara.” Karon smiled, then, and it looked heartbreakingly sad. “But Jen Sahara herself has run off-world. Although she does not know the truth of her identity, she is filled with rage and frustration that does not come from the Deralian scholar. I… have had a premonition, a strong one. The reason I have not raised an alarm about Jen’s departure is that the Force has shown me she will return to Manaan. What happens from there, my fellow Jedi, I do not know – but I do not believe I shall be much longer on this physical plane.”

Karon sighed deeply, her gaze moving away from the holo-cam. “I will strongly recommend once more that you include Zhar Lestin in the knowledge of this mission. After myself, there is no Jedi Master who might understand Jen Sahara better… or calm her, if the need arises.”

…

There was more in the message, explaining about the Star Maps, that the Ebon Hawk would be directed to Kashyyyk afterwards, and an odd observation on the emotional state of Padawan Shan that seemed meaningless when contrasted with the mind fractures of Jen Sahara. But it was the last recording from Karon, and I had re-played it more times than was emotionally healthy.

I heard a forced cough from outside the wicker-lashed room, and raised my head as Vrook Lamar walked in, a customary scowl on his lined face. He took great delight in his curt and intimidating demeanour. We all had our faults, and Vrook’s was that he believed a gruff exterior was necessary for emotional detachment.

No, it’s that he believes emotional detachment is necessary. Bah. He’d have us all walking like automatons. He always was a bit of a blind idiot, even as a kid. It was funny how sometimes thoughts came in the voice of someone else. And that thought, as it flashed through my mind, was spoken in the dry, chuckling tones of a long-lost friend I’d believed as one with the Force as Karon was now.

Vrook came from Coruscant too, although he transferred to Dantooine decades ago. But we’d known him on Coruscant, as padawans training to become knights, and never particularly warmed to him. Those days, it had been three of us who’d been close. And while Karon and I found it easy to ignore Vrook’s negative observations on just about everything, Jolee Bindo had always liked to speak his mind.

Jolee had disappeared during the height of the Exar Kun conflict, after his wife – and hadn’t that marriage rocked the Coruscanti Enclave – was refused training by the Jedi, and ran to Kun’s side. After so many, many years, it seemed only sensible to assume that Jolee had died somewhere along the line. For how many people could truly turn their back on the Force?
But Vrook and Vandar disagreed, now. They had travelled to Kashyyyk weeks ago, starting their search for the Star Map in the depths of the massive wroshyr forest the Wookiees called the Shadowlands. But the planet was so big...

There was a Force presence, though. A benign one, like someone tracking them, far enough away to remain unseen, close enough that Vandar had picked up on it. The presence had faded away when either of them tried to approach it, overtly or otherwise, and that sort of slippery stealth against the likes of Vandar Tokare was impressive.

It was the Wookiees who gave Vandar and Vrook a lead. The Hairless One, they called the human who had made the Shadowlands his home for the past two decades, who kept the dangerous depths free from poachers, and occasionally spoke to the odd Wookie who ventured down there. Somehow, Vandar had deduced it was the long-lost Jolee Bindo.

And his sum total of evidence was that Jolee and Nayama had celebrated their honeymoon on Kashyyyk. Odd destination, that, but Nayama was a wild soul who had a soft spot for the Wookiees before she fell. By the time she’d left Jolee, that had been burned away.

Perhaps it was a quiet place for him to remember happier times.

Regardless, if there was one sentient who might know the location of the Kashyyyk Star Map – other than Jen Sahara – then it would be The Hairless One who may or may not be my childhood friend. And if it was Jolee, then perhaps he would show himself for me, where he would not for others. My gaze drifted to the pack stuffed full of survival gear that lay at my feet, and I felt ready to find my Wookiee escort and head out.

Vrook coughed again, more of a grunt this time, and I realized I’d completely forgotten he was there. He’d taken a seat opposite me, his frowning gaze locked on mine.

“My apologies, Vrook,” I murmured. “There has been too much to think on lately.”

“Hmph,” he uttered. “Keep your mind together, Zhar. There are too few Dantooine Masters left for you to be daydreaming all the time.”

I inclined my head, letting that comment past. “How did Quatra take the news?”

Vrook grimaced. “Not well, I’m afraid. She’s been angling to ascend to the Council for years now, and this damn fool mission has her convinced that had she been one of us, we would have done something smarter. Huh. Not sure I can argue with that.”

Vrook had been against the plan regarding Jen Sahara, but had been out-voted - or so he’d told me, in a voice as dark and bitter as the caffa he drank.

“It’s damn risky and damn crazy, and now two Masters outside of the Council know,” Vrook grumbled. “Not to mention a runaway Cathar and a Mandalorian mercenary.”

And that had been the reason for informing Quatra, who’d rushed to Kashyyyk once she learned of Juhani’s existence and destination. For Karon’s missive had told us that Juhani now knew of Jen Sahara’s true identity. Vrook and Vandar had both decided that perhaps it would be better for Quatra to learn about Jen Sahara from Council members, rather than from her recently fallen apprentice.

Of course, the Ebon Hawk should have docked here weeks ago.

“I am ready to head down to the Shadowlands, Vrook,” I said mildly. I wanted to meet the Ebon Hawk, should she finally land on this planet – but there was no telling when that would be. And, more importantly, we needed to locate the Star Map. We only had two of the four maps so far - the two easy ones we’d already known the location of.

And Malak knew what we were up to.

“I’ve heard from Vandar,” Vrook returned, and the tone of his voice was noticeably pleased. That surprised me, and I jerked my gaze back to his. A slight smile sat lightly on his lined, human face.

“We could do with good news,” I replied, not rising to the bait. Vandar had left Kashyyyk some days ago, following an urgent summons from Republic HQ. Vrook would either tell me or he would not; jumping him for it would only add to his amusement.

Vrook snorted softly, but his eyes were crinkled with pleasure. Whatever it was, it was good news indeed. Vrook did not often show positive emotions of any sort. “Republic HQ have received a transmission from the Ebon Hawk that they have decoded. Although they have not yet released it to Vandar – I believe there is some tight negotiation going on – Vandar has been told enough to know what it is.”

“The Ebon Hawk?” I couldn’t help myself; I asked, and Vrook smirked in triumph.

“Aye,” he assented, quicker than was customary for him. “More than that, though. It’s the Korriban Star Map.”

I stared blankly at him for several moments, allowing the shock and surprise to dissipate before relief followed in its wake. “Korriban…” I breathed. “So that’s where the Ebon Hawk has been.”

Vrook grunted. “Aye. And a second transmission saying they have left Korriban and are enroute to Kashyyyk. We can expect them to land here in four days.”

“All of them?” I asked.

“I don’t have a manifest, so we’re only working under assumptions at this stage.”

“Hmm,” I murmured, and my gaze fell on my pack again as my thoughts raced. “I shall delay my journey below, Vrook. Once the Ebon Hawk lands, I shall take Jen Sahara with me to the Shadowlands.”

“What?” Vrook snapped.

I kept my face composed as I stared at him. "If she doesn't know her identity yet, then she likely must be told. Such a conversation is best held far removed from civilization of any type. And face it, Vrook - you have never been able to remain on civil terms with Revan beyond a one-word greeting.” I saw his face tighten at that uncomfortable truth, and allowed my tone to gentle. "Vrook, you will have your hands full debriefing your own padawan, as Quatra will hers.”

“Vandar and I will deal with Jen Sahara,” Vrook said through clenched teeth. “I’m not taking any chances with her, not this time.”

“No,” I disagreed flatly, and heard the steel in my voice. “No, Vrook, you will not. Vandar is unlikely to be back before the Ebon Hawk lands. I will deal with Revan.”

“You are not on the Council, Zhar,” Vrook bit out.

“No, but you and Vandar made the choice to tell me about the Council’s decision regarding Revan.
You have made me part of this. Galdea and Karon are dead, Vrook, and Vima’s gone gallivanting who knows where. Re-imprinting Jen Sahara is not an option.”

“I did not agree with that, Zhar, and you well know it,” Vrook rejoined, his eyes flashing. “But it’s done, now, and reinforcing the overlaid personality is a lot easier than the initial-”

“No!” My voice was loud, and it echoed through the wicker-cane room. Any Wookiee nearby would have heard it clearly. Vrook frowned, taken aback. It was quite possible I had never raised my voice to him before. I sighed, and felt a measure of calm return to me. “No. Revan is my responsibility now. I shall take her with me to find the Star Map. She returned to Bastila on Manaan. They have been successful on Korriban. If there is a possibility for any sort of redemption here, Vrook, then I shall take it. And you will not stop me.”

xXx

Zaalbar:

The Shadowlands were a dangerous place on my homeworld for the unprepared. The young would go there, occasionally, to prove their mettle against the wildlife or to eradicate unwelcome poachers gloaming for resources.

The banished sometimes chose it as a final refuge or a means of atonement - and they did not bring weapons or armour with them. I thought I understood that now. My failure hung heavy in my soul, and the idea of disappearing into a predatory underworld with naught but my wits and natural strength held a primal temptation I could not deny. To lose myself amongst the wroshyr trees, until a natural carnivore cut down this body and soul that had been brought so low by shame.

Those named madclaw had the choice of leaving Kashyyyk forever, or spending the remainder of their life in the dark depths as a challenge – or penance - to the gods. I was young – fully grown, but young – when my father exiled me. A future in the Shadowlands promised a quick end, and I had not desired that. Instead, I left with the first civilian transport, injustice and bitter resentment clouding my mind.

But now… now I could understand the allure of the Shadowlands. Now I felt like I truly deserved the name of madclaw.

Bastila Shan was a good Jedi, and it was due to me that her enemies held her. Instead of honouring my life-debt to Jen Sahara, I had been too weak of mind to guard her bond-sister. How was I ever to repay such a debt to Jen Sahara, when I already owed her my life?

I had asked for death, back on that cursed planet, and she had not granted me the leave to do so. Perhaps I should be glad of that. For, if there was any chance to retrieve Bastila Shan, I had to do so. I could not help if I was dead.

But I doubted myself now. Would the others have been so feeble? Would Carth Onasi have betrayed Bastila Shan so? Would Canderous Ordo have deposited her into the arms of the enemy?

The hatch opened, and I turned to see Jen Sahara in the entrance, her strange human face solemn and serious. I was hiding in the stern of the Ebon Hawk, in the engine room, surrounded by the buzzing of machinery. It was one of the few places I could find solitude in this overcrowded freighter.

Jen took a step inside and closed the hatch behind her. “Zaalbar, I can hear you blaming yourself from the other side of the ship.”
I wondered at that comment. I had had enough of Force mind reading and manipulation to last me a full lifetime. Jen Sahara must have seen something in my expression, for she grimaced as she took a step closer. “I only meant- sometimes, it’s hard to block out someone’s emotions. I’m still learning, I guess. And I share the guilt, too.”

“(You should not, Jen Sahara),” I growled. “(You did everything right).”

Jen snorted, crossing her arms. “I should have picked up on the inordinately long sleep Bastila was having, but I’d put it down to exhaustion from what we’d done. Yet, I was able to carry on…” she sighed. “I should have realized that a Jedi of Bastila Shan’s calibre wouldn’t be so easily tired. That there must have been something else going on.”

“(Jen Sahara, you did not physically hand her over to a Dark Jedi!)” I was vaguely aware my voice had risen. That she continued to believe herself culpable was ridiculous.

“No, but have you thought of the alternative, Zaalbar?” she snapped back. Her eyes flashed with indignation. “Say you had resisted Kylah’s compulsion. What do you think would have happened then?”

I stared back, suddenly mute.

Jen sighed. Her face suddenly had a bleak cast to it. Her brown hair stuck out in all directions; the static aftermath of some time spent in the sonic refresher. The men’s starboard one was currently clogged up with fur. I was vaguely aware that it was my turn to clean it out.

“She would have killed you, Zaalbar,” Jen finished quietly. “Once she realized you weren’t succumbing. Then she would have boarded the Hawk, disabled Teethree who likely would have alerted Carth, and killed him also. Bastila… Bastila was still recovering. Even had she woken, Kylah could have overpowered her.” Jen paused. Her moss-green eyes pinned mine, as if forcing me to accept what was her truth. “Zaalbar, you and Carth almost certainly would be dead. Bastila would have been taken anyway.”

I did not like partaking in what-ifs. It was a redundant exercise that usually served no purpose other than to make one feel bitter about the past. For my what-if did not have the same shape as hers. “I should not have been outside, Jen Sahara.”

She stepped closer, laying a hand on my arm. I looked away, my eyes resting on the cloth-wrapped corpse of Belaya Linn that lay deeper in the engine room.

“I understood you were outside for all of five minutes. Look, Zaalbar - Kylah knew we were here. Dustil already implied she was monitoring us from spaceport control. If she hadn’t found an opportune moment then it would have been no hardship for her to call on Uthar Wynn for assistance.” Jen’s voice dropped lower. “Zaalbar, she must have seen us all leave for the caves. She must have understood the Hawk was relatively unguarded. She was going to go after Bastila one way or another – before we returned.”

We lapsed into silence. Her logic may have been sound, but it had the feel of freedom from transgression that I did not like. At the end of the day, I still became the unwilling tool of a Dark Jedi, and betrayed one of our crew.

“(What-ifs are poisonous, Jen Sahara),” I said at long last.

“Yeah,” she sighed. “They are. I just wish- I just wish you didn’t carry so much of the guilt inside you, Zaalbar.”
“(I cannot change what I feel, Jen Sahara. But I still breathe. I still have the chance to put this right, somehow.)" I did not see how yet. We were en route to Kashyyyk rather than following Bastila Shan’s trail. Kashyyyk, the one place in the galaxy I was forsworn to travel to. I looked back over to the human I followed, who was still staring at me steadily. She had grown into herself on Korriban. I owed her much. And perhaps… perhaps that meant it was time for me to break the silence of my past.

I had sworn never to speak of my homeworld. Even to Mission, she who held a dear place in my heart. Even to her, I would only talk about my people in general terms. For I held great remorse and great bitterness, and the label of madclaw silenced me.

But our quest continued, and Jen Sahara deserved what knowledge I could provide.

I huffed, uncomfortable and irritable, my eyes landing on the wrapped body once more.

“I think they mean to bury her on Kashyyyk,” Jen murmured, following my gaze. “Juhani couldn’t bear to leave her on Korriban.”

"(I have heard of this human concept of burial),” I said slowly. Whilst entombing a dead carcass within the ground made sense of a sort, as it allowed the flesh to rot and become one with the earth, I could not comprehend why some of them encased the body in containers made of plasteel or other such material that could not easily decompose.

My people left dead bodies to the wild. We would celebrate the life's journey of a departed one, with feasts and ballads and tales of reminiscence. What happened to the prison of flesh left behind mattered not. It was dropped into the Shadowlands, to be transformed into fertilizer or fuel for beasts, in the true continuation of life.Â

"Deralians bury their dead," Jen said. "I'm more accustomed to burning, myself. It seems more symbolic."

“(I understand that even less, Jen Sahara),” I said in askance. Fire killed the nutrients left behind in the physical body, and left only ash. Jen Sahara came from Deralia; I wondered that she did not follow the customs of her people.

Jen sighed, looking back to me. “Will you be alright, Zaalbar? I don’t like the thought of you twisting yourself up in remorse.”

“(I have told you before, Jen Sahara. It is the actions that matter. I only hope I have a chance to redeem myself).”

Jen nodded, and looked ready to leave. I raised a hand to forestall her, and she lifted an eyebrow in question. “(I wish to speak to you),” I said haltingly. “(About Kashyyyk).”

Jen looked faintly surprised. My reticence to talk of my homeworld had not gone unnoticed, then. I huffed. “(Where are we landing, Jen Sahara?)”

“The Jedi Master Vrook Lamar awaits us in Rwookrrorro,” Jen answered, stumbling over the name of the settlement. She grimaced. “I understand it’s close to the largest Czerka spaceport on Kashyyyk.”

I could not quite contain a growl. The influence of Czerka was great on Kashyyyk, drawn to the natural resources my planet provided. Most of my people lacked knowledge of the true depths of Czerka’s greed.
I had hoped we would land somewhere else. There were many settlements on Kashyyyk. But, somehow, this did not surprise me. Somehow, it had the feel of destiny about it, as if I needed to face the past. And yet, if I left the freighter and set foot once more upon the wicker-lashed platforms of my youth, I might very well lead Jen’s party into danger.

Perhaps the decision would be best left to Jen Sahara, to whom I owed so much.

We were interrupted, then, by the arrival of Mission. A few seconds before the hatch opened, Jen was already turning and murmuring her name, a small smile on her lips. Jen Sahara was using the Force like a Jedi, these days, augmenting her natural senses and reflexes. It was necessary for the battles ahead.

“Guys, I’ve been looking for you,” Mission chirped, her gaze flicking between us. “What ya doin’ in here?”

“(I was looking for a quiet place, Mission),” I said. “(Come in and close the hatch. I have things to say that you should also hear).”

For Mission was my friend, perhaps the truest friend I had ever had. Although I felt the need to unburden myself to Jen Sahara, it would be right for Mission to hear as well. I knew far more about her youth than I had ever divulged of mine.

Mission’s bright eyes widened in curiosity, and she walked in, tapping the door control closed as she did so. “What’s up, Big Z?”

“(I wish to tell you of my youth),” I said heavily, turning my gaze back to Jen Sahara. “(I should tell you why I do not live on Kashyyyk).”

“Whoa, Big Z, are you sure?” Mission took a step closer to me, and laid a hand on my arm. “You don’t have to speak of it, y’know. I mean, I’ve kinda figured you must be running from trouble or something – but we don’t need to know the details.”

I smiled briefly at Mission. There was no one with a heart quite like my young friend. “(Thank you for the support, Mission. But this may prove important to us. This Jedi Master is in the settlement I grew up in, and the only place Jen’s Star Map could be is somewhere in the Shadowlands).” Jen frowned at the mention of the Force relic, folding her arms and staring at me intently. “(If I walk once more into Rwookrorro, I will be led straight to the Shadowlands. But I shall never be allowed to leave).”

There was a brief silence as they both looked at me, broken after a moment by Mission’s curiosity. “What’s the Shadowlands?”

“(The wroshyr trees on Kashyyyk are kilometres high. My people live in platforms near the top. The Shadowlands refer to the ground – it is not a safe place, Mission. Nor it is easily accessible except through the moving platforms my people control).” When I had left, Czerka Corporation were negotiating for the rights to build their own lift to the ground. My father would never agree to that, however. Access to the Shadowlands was strictly controlled.

“Why can’t we just land on the ground somewhere?” Mission asked. “I mean, it’s not like the trees can cover the entire planet, right?” She stared between the two of us when I failed to answer. “What, really?”

“(We do have oceans, but the lands are covered in jungle. The inhabitable parts of Kashyyyk are all on the treetops).”
Mission blinked. “Sheesh. Like one giant forest, huh? Has no one ever tried cutting down the trees to clear some space?”

“(No!)” I said, my voice abrupt and loud in the engine room. Mission looked taken aback, and I suddenly felt sheepish. “(I apologize, my friend. That is not something you should suggest to a Wookiee. The wroshyr trees are a crucial part of Kashyyyk).”

“They are held almost sacred to your people, from what I understand,” Jen murmured. “The entire ecosystem is based around them.”

I nodded in assent. “(The trees are the backbone of life on Kashyyyk, Mission. There are many plants and fauna that only live at a particular height or particular area of the forest. The Shadowlands is but one level of ecology on my planet – however it is the most dangerous).”

“And you think the Star Map will be somewhere there?” Jen asked. She leaned back against a durasteel bulkhead, her face drawn and tired under the halogen luminescence of the freighter’s lighting.

“(If it is as old as you say it is, Jen Sahara. I know not of any relic that matches the description of these Star Maps, but the Shadowlands are the least explored area of Kashyyyk. It is where I would start).”

“But you would not be allowed to leave if you took us there,” Jen added. Her eyes narrowed. “We could find another way down without your assistance.”

I grunted. “(Perhaps. But first I should tell you why. I should tell you both why I do not live on Kashyyyk).” Jen’s gaze was dark and serious on mine. So was Mission’s. “(I left my planet labelled as an exile, with hate in my heart for my den-brother).”

Mission slipped her tiny hand into my paw, squeezing it gently. She wore a sad smile. “I guess I know all about scumbag brothers. What did he do, Big Z?”

I huffed. Griff Vao was a slippery coward with no real power over anyone except his younger sister, due to the love she held for him. Would that my brother Chuundar was so ineffectual. “(Czerka beguiled my brother into dreams of expansion and power beyond Rwookorro’s natural borders),” I said abruptly. Jen frowned in confusion. I had to explain, then, what I had never once let slip to Mission, in all the years we had known each other. “(My father is the chieftain, Jen Sahara. I am his second son, cast out and labelled as a madclaw for failing to accurately expose the depths of my brother’s greed).”

Jen’s eyes widened. Mission’s gasp was audible, and echoed in the silence. “Whoa, Big Z! Does that mean you’re like a prince or something?”

“(I was a chieftain’s son, Mission. Now I am only a madclaw).”

“They’ll throw you down to the Shadowlands if you leave the freighter,” Jen deduced. She straightened from the wall. “What happened, Zaalbar?”

My mind drifted back to years ago - years I tried to forget during my new life on Taris. It was hard for a Wookiee, to be so far from Kashyyyk. I would never have left voluntarily. “(Czerka Corporation have always held a great interest in my planet. My people do not strip our planet of resources; instead, we strive to live in harmony with the environment. There are many resources that the greedy eye of Czerka rests on. The glands of the tach can be processed into stimulants. The fibres of a syren plant can be transformed into synthetic pheromones. Even the wroshyr trees themselves can be mined for minerals deep within the bark),” I explained. “(Centuries ago, Czerka fought hard for the right to build space ports on Kashyyyk. Since then, they have been doing their utmost to claim more of our planet).”

“And your brother is in bed with them.” It was a half-question, as if Jen already knew the answer.

I gave a short nod. “(Chuundar always believed our father Freyrr should be chieftain of more than Rwookrooro. Our settlements are self-sufficient, Jen Sahara. We may trade or hunt together, but we have our own system of leadership. There are two towns nearby – smaller towns with weak leaders that my brother believes would do better under his rule).”

I sighed, scratching my head as I dwelled on unwelcome thoughts from the past. “(I am not sure how Czerka fits into Chuundar’s ambitions),” I admitted. “(Czerka is a commercial entity, not a military one. But aid from Czerka could come in many forms: superior weaponry, armour, or simple credits to purchase a mercenary force. Chuundar believes himself to be a liberal Wookiee who is listening to the new generation, but many would not agree with Czerka infiltrating our planet).” I paused. “(I found my brother allowing Czerka-led hunters down to the lower levels to trap for tachs. He had started an underground tach trade).” I huffed. “(I accused him in front of an audience. That was foolish. Chuundar denied any involvement, and my father believed him).”

“And what? Your dad kicked you out because of that?” Mission said, her voice sharp and indignant. “Sheesh, Big Z, that’s rid-

“(No. I lost my temper, Mission. I struck out at my brother).” I hung my head. “(With my claws).”

“Madclaw,” Jen whispered. There was a look of recognition on her face, and I understood she knew something of my people. This did not surprise me; Jen Sahara had always shown a modicum of understanding for different cultures alongside her gift with languages. “That’s a terrible taboo amongst your people, isn’t it? I’m sorry, Zaalbar.”

Mission leaned her head against my side. I was not overly comfortable with physical affection, but I understood it as a way of the Twi’lek showing me support. It warmed my heart.

“We can find some other way down, right Jen?” Mission implored.

Jen nodded in assent. “You won’t have to leave the freighter. It’ll be best if someone stays onboard anyway, as we’re docking at a Czerka spaceport. Look, I’m sure this Jedi Master will have found a way to the Shadowlands by now.” She paused, and then her voice was even quieter. “There’s a good chance he may have even found the Star Map.”

“I hope so,” Mission whispered.

I sighed, a great blast of air releasing from my lungs. I was tired, suddenly, and had spoken more than I normally liked to. “(Thank you both for listening).”

Mission squeezed my arm, before stepping back to the hatch. “I’m gonna go grab something from the slop machine. Oh!” She swung to face Jen. “I almost forgot why I came here. Carth’s been looking for ya, Jen, ever since the day’s training finished.”

Jen’s posture changed; her shoulders tensed and a faint colour rose in her cheeks. I wrinkled my nose. She even smelled uncertain.

“I’m – I’m off to the quarters now,” she muttered. “If you see him, you can say I’m sleeping. I’ll catch up with him tomorrow.” For some reason I did not believe her intent. Jen was not meeting Mission’s gaze.
“Sure thing,” Mission chirped. “See you guys.”

Jen stared after Mission as my ebullient friend left the room. When she looked back to me her gaze was wary. “What?” she snapped.

“(I did not say anything, Jen Sahara),” I answered quietly. Her behaviour was odd. And I recalled seeing the Republic pilot searching for her yesterday. I frowned. “(Are you hiding, Jen?)” That seemed unfeasible, on a freighter the size of the Ebon Hawk. And I had understood the two of them to be friends.

“No!” Jen shot back, quick and loud. The flush on her face was brighter, now, but her eyes flashed with sparks of annoyance. “I am not afraid of Carth Onasi.” She gave me one last glare before stomping out of the room.

I blinked in the sudden quiet. I had not accused Jen Sahara of fear, so I did not understand her defensiveness. But there certainly was something making her uncertain. It is not my business. Humans are temperamental and odd. Whatever her issue is, likely she will be over it tomorrow.

xXx

Dak Vesser:

The pain meds sat heavy in my system, clouding my thoughts. If I let my mind drift, I could feel the fingers of my left hand again. At times, I was certain I could clench my fist if only I tried hard enough.

It was a small price to pay. I knew that, I accepted that, and I was happy to leave Korriban behind. And still, I was angry. Irrationally, annoyingly angry.

The Force lessons were a good distraction though, and I found myself learning quickly from Juhani and Jen Sahara. Quicker than Dantooine. Maybe even quicker than Korriban.

At the Sith Academy survival had trumped self-advancement. Any Force-tricks and techniques I had discovered had been by poking around in the Archives â€“ usually to thwart a rival or protect my own skin.

Sometimes Uthar would lead a lesson. I swiftly learned to keep my head down and my ears open â€“ don’t draw any attention, but keep a quick reply ready, for that bastard just loved to skewer any Sithling who stuttered over an answer.

Uthar’s displeasure could be agonizing, or humiliating, or both.

I was viciously glad about his death. Juhani might harp on and on that such a dark emotion wasn’t healthy, but it felt good. I would’ve liked to have seen the blaster shot that took the bastard down.

Master Dorak, in contrast, had pushed me to lead my own study. Maybe that was why I’d been such an unmitigated failure in the Order.

I understood myself a little better, these days. I would learn best under a more structured approach, with a more disciplined Master.

Thoughts like that had me wondering if I’d accepted my new destination as the Jedi Order. I wasn’t certain. Juhani was adamant that was the best place for me. Belaya’s last request had been that I walk in the Light, and I couldn’t ignore my old friend’s dying wish.
But what I did understand was that continuing to follow Juhani would lead to my own downfall. I loved her dearly, as a friend and more – but I needed to find my own way, my own standing. A one-sided pining had led both Juhani and I to near-ruin.

The training helped. The only part I disliked was the sparring. I had no interest in more than watching, not with the aching heaviness of my stump preying on my mind, and my senses clouded by the medbay’s Ceramol that I was slowly working through. That bloody Mandalorian, however, considered it a great game to goad me into action.

“I fought alongside a Fett, once, who’d lost his primary arm just below the shoulder,” the smirking prick commented. “Didn’t stop him taking down his share of Republic grunts. Didn’t stop him riding a basilisk into battle, either.”

Thing was, he was tougher than me before I’d lost my arm. Tall, muscular, and with a face like a slab of permacrete, Canderous Ordo was one formidable opponent. I had half a mind to Force slam him into the nearest wall, but the occasional pointed glare from Jen Sahara stayed my hand. And the feeling that Ordo might make me regret it. Shavit, even Juhani respected his fighting prowess.

“I’ve got it,” Dustil muttered from the other side of the room, facing Jen Sahara. He was joining us now, edgy and wary and sullen, but present. It was something, I supposed.

We didn’t have much in common. Between us there was almost a decade and the death of my oldest friend. I didn’t blame him for Belaya – how could I? – but the grief was still raw. It wasn’t fair that I had survived and she had not.

“Canderous, you were showing me a block,” Juhani said quietly, drawing the Mandalorian’s attention away from me in what I believed a deliberate action.

“No reason I can’t show the cripple,” he grunted.

“Canderous!” Juhani flared.

“Settle down, kittycat,” Canderous said, and Juhani’s face heated in annoyance. I couldn’t help a snort of amusement. Kittycat. Juhani threw me a glare, and I ducked my head sheepishly.

“Look,” the gruff Mandalorian continued. His gaze had swung back to me. “It might be useful. People will pick on you if they think you’re weak. You can spend the rest of your life wallowing in self-pity, or you can improve your situation.” It wasn’t the first time he’d encouraged me to get up and make a fool of myself. I got the feeling he wouldn’t stop until I did.

“I’ll get a prosthetic,” I said coldly. “No point training until then.” I should’ve joined in with whatever Jen was showing Kel and Dustil, rather than sit to watch the sparring – but I’d always enjoyed seeing Juhani fight, and I’d been curious to see how she’d fare against the Mandalorian.

“Bah,” Canderous spat. “It ain’t the same as a true limb, Sithling. You may as well get used to it now. At the least it’ll keep your mind off things.”

At the crux of it, I was sick of his goading. That was what I told myself when I clambered to my feet, glaring and brushing off Juhani’s concerned murmurs. My arm was clutched tight to my chest. Juhani sighed, and passed me a training lightsaber as the Mandalorian grinned, raising his vibrosword.

Maybe the distraction would do me good.

“Try to get through my guard. Don’t clutch your half-arm into your chest – use it for balance,” he ordered. I scowled. Even with the pain meds, my limb ached with a grinding, persistent pain.

It hadn’t hurt at the time. A hot burn and then- nothing. Nothing but rage and disbelief at seeing it flop uselessly to the ground.

Sometimes I dreamed that Lashowe had cut my other hand off, followed by my legs and finally my head. Sometimes I wondered how I’d managed to get that lucky stab in, straight into her heart - a swing powered by the fierce need to protect Belaya and Juhani behind me.

Lashowe had always been stronger than me in the Force, and superior in duelling. That wasn’t the same as fighting for one’s life, it turned out.

I advanced on the Mandalorian, awkwardly striking out in a sweeping blow that the Mandalorian blocked with a sneer. The parry was solid and vibrated through my arm, and I staggered.

“Your balance is crap,” Canderous said. “I told you, you need to drop your off-hand.”

I scowled, but lowered the stump to my side. It ached.

“Use the Force to cloud the pain,” Juhani murmured from behind.

“No Force,” Canderous bit out. “We ain’t playing tricks here, we’re sparring.”

“It’s a passive use, Canderous, and Dak could do with a little slack,” Juhani countered. “And we Jedi fight with the Force – it is important we practice with it so it becomes instinctive to use.”

The Mandalorian grunted, but surprisingly let it slide.

The Force lightened my thoughts as I drew it in, dissolved the pain and the tiredness from my limbs, and even assuaged the bitterness that clouded my thoughts. It felt different since we’d left. I wasn’t sure if the Force on Korriban had a dark edge to it that was now lacking, or if it was due to the change of direction in my life.

Maybe it was a mixture of both.

I strode forward again, eyes narrowed in concentration as I made to stab him in the torso. I was too overt – his block back was fierce enough to unbalance me, and his riposte halted an inch from my neck.

“Again,” Canderous ordered, withdrawing. “Don’t look where you’re about to swing. It’s kriffing obvious.”

I glowered at him, but listened. Again. And again. Until I’d fallen on my arse three times, my forehead was beading with sweat, and the pain from my off-hand began to bleed into my connection with the Force. I figured if I showed enough determination – enough grit – then maybe the Mandalorian would leave me alone.

It would have been nice to land a frelling blow, though.

We stopped at the sound of a loud hiss from the other side of the room. The exercise had my chest heaving, and I knew I’d be feeling it the following day. I turned to see Jen Sahara standing over a smoking datapad, a rueful smile on her face.

“I didn’t sense anything,” Dustil muttered at her side. “What did you do?”

“I was trying to show you how to short the power in a machine, not fry it to bits. I thought my control was better,” Jen replied. She motioned towards the circular speaker mounted in the ceiling. “Good thing I didn’t try it on the ship’s circuits.”

“Jen,” Juhani cut in. She looked worried, and her ears had flattened against the side of her head. “That- that is not a good idea. I do not believe you understand the extent of your own power with ionization.”

“Ionization?” Jen frowned.

“That’s creating electricity, isn’t it? Like, lightning?” I asked, flicking the off switch on the training ‘saber. This was the sort of conversation I enjoyed, the intricacies of the Force and its applications. Lashowe had been particularly strong with lightning. It would have hit Belaya hard. I could feel the scowl emerging on my face again.

“Not quite,” Juhani corrected. “Ionization is the working with electricity through machinery—droids, computers, electrical systems. Most Force users who have learned an affinity with this can disable systems, much as you have blown this datapad up.” Juhani hesitated, as if unsure of her next words. “Some can manipulate the electricity on a truly minute scale.”

Jen’s eyes had narrowed, as if in suspicion. “I opened the Embassy’s doors on Manaan. Opened the torture chamber in the Academy, too. Is that… is that uncommon, Juhani?”

“That’s what you did?” Dustil cut in. “That’s how you followed me in there?”

There was a heavy silence at his words. Jen nodded, seeming reluctant to speak further. I saw the twist of anger on Juhani’s face at Dustil’s admission of being there— in that torture room— where Belaya had spent her last days.

Apart from her final one. At least she’d lived that in freedom, and found Juhani at the end. We all had Jen Sahara to thank for that.

Jen had irritated me on Korriban with her obnoxiousness, but somewhere along the way my dislike for her vanished. Maybe, it’d only been there in the first place because Juhani had followed her instead of me. Now—after all that had happened—it seemed more important that Juhani’s loyalty was to the right person.

Jen Sahara, the Jedi Knight onboard, was the one who’d found and turned Juhani back once before. That was enough for me.

Dustil cleared his throat, staring down at the ground with his shoulders clenched. I wasn’t particularly good at sensing emotions through the Force, but the waves of shame rolling off him were plainly obvious. Then, an instant later, he vanished. Completely.

He appeared a second later, his face contorted in emotion, but he was now glaring at Jen. “You asked how I did this,” he muttered. As an obvious attempt to change the course of the conversation, it worked. I’d never seen anything like that before, and I could have sworn his psychic presence disappeared in the Force as well.

“Do that again,” I said, chucking the training ‘saber to the side of the room and focusing on the angry teenager. I heard the Mandalorian mutter something about party tricks, and then stomp out of the room. Dustil vanished again.

He was gone in the Force; as absent as his body was. I stretched my senses out, curious, but couldn’t pick up on anything.
“I knew he could do this,” Kel muttered, his brows lowering. He was a nice guy, Kel, but clearly didn’t trust Dustil. All of us were going to find it hard to leave Korriban’s lessons behind.

Dustil materialized, still looking awkward and ill-at-ease and avoiding everyone’s gaze.

“How is that possible?” Juhani asked. The dark emotion had disappeared from her face, which now wore nothing but an open curiosity. “You were simply – gone.”

“There’s a dead patch,” Jen Sahara said. “Dustil, don’t make yourself invisible this time. Just hide your Force signature, okay?”

I’d never heard it phrased that way before – labelling the energy all living beings radiated as a signature. Deep in meditation, you could feel the interconnected web of life. Everything, from the tiniest insect to the largest animal. Force sensitives glowed brightly, and some shone like stars.

Jen Sahara was one such. I wondered idly if she was stronger than Bastila Shan. I remembered meeting Bastila a few times on Dantooine – she’d been young, aloof and followed the Masters around like a shadow.

And, not for the first time, it made me speculate about what they’d been doing in a Sith Academy. Juhani had alluded to the importance of their mission - or whatever they wanted to call sneaking around frelling Korriban. So far, Jen had refrained from grilling Juhani about the details, but it was getting increasingly difficult to bite back the questions.

Dustil stood in front of us, physically there but missing from the Force. It felt like he wore a neural disruptor around his neck. It felt like there was nothing but empty space.

“Can you sense it? The absence of Force?” Jen said. She actually sounded excited. “Dustil – disappear again? And walk around the room?”

With a nod, he obeyed her, and she turned to face us all. Her eyes were sharp with interest, and her mouth quirked with a smile. “Come on, guys – push your senses out. Who can feel it?”

All I could sense was us. Kel was shaking his head. Juhani, frowning, turned to motion towards the exit, but Jen sighed. “Nope,” she negated. She lifted a hand to point behind me, and Dustil rematerialized. He had a small smile on his face for the first time.

“How do you do that?” I demanded. Wouldn’t that have been useful on Korriban! I wondered, then, if Uthar had known about Dustil’s talent. Of course he did. Dustil was his bootlicker. Did Uthar teach Dustil how to disappear into thin air? I’d never seen any evidence of Uthar Wynn being able to sneak around invisible – but then, I’d never known Dustil could, either.

Kel had, though.

“Well, hiding in the Force is easy,” Dustil muttered, and once more he was no longer present in the Force, even as he stood in front of us, shoulders hunched awkwardly. He glanced up to Jen. “You just invert the Force around you, and keep it balanced. Kinda like holding magnets together on the wrong ends.”

Jen’s eyes narrowed. “I saw it, that time. Can you do it again?”

I hadn’t, and didn’t the next half-dozen times he repeated it. First I could sense the boy, and then not – like someone turning a light-switch on and off. The frustration on Kel’s face and puzzlement on Juhani’s showed they didn’t follow, either.
Jen, on the other hand, was grinning with mounting excitement as she attempted to emulate him. On her third try, she succeeded for about ten seconds.

It was all the more glaringly obvious with her. Even without trying, I could sense her aura. When she blocked herself out, it was like an inferno had suddenly been extinguished.

“Have you ever seen this before, Juhani?” Jen asked, as she tried again. I could feel her fumble with the Force under her command – again, her psychic presence winked out for a short time before the weaves unraveled. Despite concentrating on it, though, I couldn’t see how they managed to do it. It was like the Force just repelled around them.

“No, I am unfamiliar with this talent,” Juhani answered.

“Where did you learn this, Dustil?” I asked, stepping back to lean against the wall. I was tired, now, and the throbbing of my stump was growing harder to ignore.

There was an obvious look of discomfort on Dustil’s face before his expression steeled over. “I’m tired,” he said abruptly. “This is enough for me today.”

He turned and left the garage, as subtle as a ferracrete brick swung at a gizka.

“Guess I shouldn’t have asked,” I muttered, watching Jen throw Juhani an openly curious look. We’ve all got our secrets. Sith secrets. I wouldn’t question Dustil again. I understood too well about topics best left unsaid. “I’m done for the day, too.”

With a nod to the others, I followed Dustil out of the garage.

xXx

Jen Sahara / Ness Jonohl:

The days were falling into a set pattern that seemed to suit everyone. Eight hours kip, followed by a light breakfast and group Force exercises. Lunch followed, and then sparring with the Sithkids. Canderous joined, sometimes; insulting and obviously bored but willing to show Kel and Dustil a move or two without getting overly physical. Dak sat out, at first, until Canderous goaded him one too many times.

Then Dak sparred more than the others. One-armed and astoundingly unmatched, Dak seemed determined to adjust to his disability. Although he’d certainly get a prosthetic sooner or later, learning to guard oneself with a weakness was a useful exercise in itself.

Canderous didn’t show it, but I thought a grudging respect for Juhani’s old friend might be slowly growing. It was with me. My opinion of Dak Vesser had certainly changed from our first encounter.

Mission was conspicuously absent from the garage. I only saw her if I strayed from our set routine, or deliberately sought her out. Normally she was the light of the crew, interrupting everyone’s activities with a burst of enthusiasm or curiosity or both.

I didn’t know what, if anything, to do about that. It was a mess of Dustil’s own making, though, and eventually I concluded that he’d have to find the courage to face Mission himself.

Zaalbar hid out with Mission, mostly - when he wasn’t in the cargo hold organizing whatever Canderous had upended. We were running short on kolto, ration bars, stims and - according to Canderous - grenades. Zaalbar had used all available mesh strips and chromex plates fixing surplus armour, and we now had twice as many suits as people onboard. I had the distinct feeling that the Wookiee was trying to keep his mind occupied and away from our impending arrival on Kashyyyk… and off Bastila.

I could feel the guilt gnawing at him. He hadn’t appreciated me commenting on it, I knew; and even less so when I’d mentioned my own shame. For I harboured some, rightly or wrongly. I was bonded to Bastila – an uncannily strong Force bond, I’d worked that one out – and yet I hadn’t even realized she’d been drugged and taken. The bitter recriminations would well up inside, and the Force would rally in self-anger before I managed to calm down and will it away.

Bastila was blank in my head; non-existent. I had no idea what was happening to her, and it should have been paramount in my mind.

It should have been the only thing I could think of, but it wasn’t.

My cursed head was occupied, instead, by thoughts of a much more carnal nature, and it was slowly driving me crazy.

He was damn well stalking me about the ship. Fortunately, between the Sithlings and the rest of the crew, I had plenty to keep me occupied, but I had the feeling it wouldn’t hold Carth at bay forever. Just until Kashyyyk. Just until I get off this ship.

It was ridiculous, really, because Carth was the stand-up sort of guy who would back off if I flat-out told him I wasn’t interested. The problem being, of course, that I was.

It had come as a bolt out of nowhere, an attraction that was sudden and shouldn’t be so strong simply because it was so sudden. Although… he’d always had me on edge, a little. On Tatooine, I’d never really known where I’d stood with him, and that had rankled. On Korriban, I’d felt driven to gain his good opinion. And since we’d first crashed on Taris, teasing him had always been more enjoyable than it should have been, by rights.

He was so, infuriatingly, Republic military, and I had a thing for pilots. At least, I thought I did. My shot memory told me one man had loved me, once, but how deeply or long I didn’t know.

I couldn’t remember any damn thing of use. Was that why I was acting like a startled teenager?

My eyes closed. At another time, I’d be jumping right into bed with him. But now? Now, when he just had his son returned to him, and was probably feeling all sorts of emotional highs? Now, when my bond-sister was collared and inaccessible and likely being tortured while we desperately raced to save the galaxy-

I felt my breath catch. Bastila. I could still hear her lecturing me, in that prim and proper voice, about the dangers of emotional entanglements. When we had far more crucial topics of conversation, like our frelling bond, or Kylah, or Darth Revan, or the Star Maps. What I wouldn’t give for her to be safe, here, onboard the Ebon Hawk. She’d be a great buffer against Carth.

And probably, if she were here, I’d throw myself at him, I realized ruefully. How could I allow myself to enjoy something so natural when she was in the clutches of Darth Malak?

How could I even think about it, when I had a sodding dead Dark Lord bouncing around in my mind?

It was a rare quiet time in the ship, when we’d ended training for the day and I’d found myself too restless to turn in for the night. Kel was still up, practising combat forms in the garage with one of the training ‘sabers. He gave me a small, awkward smile as I came across him.

He’d make a good Jedi, I thought, but not a warrior. He was the weakest of the three both in combat and pure Force strength, but he was definitely the steadiest in temperament. And unlike Dak and Dustil, he was very easy to overlook and forget.

“Couldn’t sleep either, huh?” I murmured, and he ducked his head in acknowledgment. I grinned, and raised my hand. One of the other training ‘sabers flew to my grasp.

I was taking the Force for granted, now, in simple and everyday ways. It was instinctive and natural, and I wondered if it’d been like that before.

“Shall we?” I offered, inclining my head.

He was about to answer when the hatch swished open.

“Jen,” came a voice from the doorway. I turned to see Carth entering with a decidedly tenacious look on his face. A stab of uncertainty spiked through my belly, and I struggled to steel myself. “Can we talk?”

“Sure,” I said brightly, falsely. I motioned for him to speak, and he frowned.

“Privately, I mean,” Carth countered in a low tone.

“You can speak here,” I said tightly. I could feel my damn cheeks flushing again, and inwardly cursed myself. “We’re all part of the same team, Carth. There’s nothing you can’t say in front of…” and my mind went completely blank. Flustered and unbalanced, I shot my training partner a helpless glance.

“Kel,” Kel prompted helpfully.

“I knew that,” I snapped, scowling.

“Nothing I can’t say in front of someone who not long ago was training to be a Dark Jedi?” Carth shot back, frowning. He glanced at Kel briefly. “No offense.”

The tension in the room mounted, and Kel shifted uncomfortably. “Er, I’ll just go-”

“No!” I said loudly, and winced when I heard the desperation in my own voice. I couldn’t even explain to myself why I felt so unbalanced. “It’s fine! Everything’s fine! Look, Carth, it’s not like anything has ever happened between us so there’s nothing to talk about!”

“Oh, is that so?” Carth murmured, and his eyes narrowed dangerously. “Well in that case-” And he stalked into the room. I froze as my fight or flight instinct completely evaporated. Suddenly, he was in front of me, and his arm raised to snake around my neck, and before I knew it he was kissing me soundly-

His lips were firm and warm and his arms were tight around me. The solid warmth of his body pressed against me, and his hand was in my hair, holding me against him. I felt stunned, aroused, and my lips parted beneath his. There was a clatter as the deactivated training ‘saber fell uselessly to the ground.

Too soon, he pulled back, dark eyes burning hotly into mine. “So, can we talk now?”

I felt my damn cheeks flushing again, and inwardly cursed my complete lack of self-control. “I-uh, “um,” I stuttered helplessly.

He raised one eyebrow, an insufferably smug, male expression on his face. “Still not, huh?” and his hand gently tugged me back to his mouth. My own raised to clasp his shoulders, and I felt myself melt against him, a wholly undignified, wanton response that was as uncontrolled as the Force itself at times.

When he raised his head once more, I could hear my breathing, fast and shallow. An uncertain desire was burning like I’d shot back a glass of Corellian whiskey, and Carth looked altogether far too pleased with himself.

I blinked. “Are you… are you kissing me out of gratitude?” I whispered. “Because of Dustil?”

Brows lowering dangerously, Carth stared at me in disbelief. “No.” he said flatly. “Are you kissing me out of gratitude? Because I saved your life?”

A surprised laugh escaped my lips, and I felt myself flush. Again. “No.”

He smiled. “Good. I’m glad we got that sorted then,” he murmured, and moved forward again but I was stepping backwards, now, strangely skittish and uncertain.

“This, this isn’t a good idea,” I muttered. The wall was cool at my back. “Damn it, Carth, what the frell is this?”

Carth raised his eyebrows, as if in surprise at my question. The side of his mouth quirked. “Well, when a man likes a woman-”

“Oh shut it,” I interrupted. He chuckled, moving closer to me. “Carth, I’m serious. This isn’t a good idea.”

“You’ve already mentioned that,” he murmured, reaching to clasp my hand with one of his. His thumb drew light circles on my skin. “Are you saying you’re not interested, Jen? Because I’m not sure I’ll believe you if you do.”

“I’m saying this is a bad idea,” I countered, squeezing my eyes shut. “Look, there’s the Star Map – our mission – Bastila – a thousand reasons why we shouldn’t be doing this.”

“Well, I’ll admit the timing could be better,” he conceded. He dropped my hand to cradle the side of my face. I kept my eyes closed, enjoying the brush of his fingertips against my cheek. “But we have no idea what’s going to happen when we get to Kashyyyk and check in with your Master. We can’t do anything about Bastila until then. You’re not exactly giving me a reason to stop, here.”

I snapped my eyes open. He was close enough to feel the warmth of his breath. His eyes pinned me with burning intensity. It was tempting, and I wanted to fall.

“Dustil,” I said quietly. Carth blinked, and his expression dimmed. That’s a hit, I thought, and felt disappointed. “I don’t think he’d take the thought of you with another woman well.”

Carth sighed, and his fingers stilled against my skin. “I don’t know my own son well enough to predict how he’d react. But then, I wasn’t exactly planning on broadcasting anything.”

I quirked an eyebrow. “Carth. You just snogged me in front of a Sithkid.”

There was the faintest colour on his face, even if his mouth did curve into another smile. I liked his smiles, I realized. “Dammit, woman, you asked for that one,” he growled softly, and I chuckled.
“Kel will probably keep quiet,” I conceded. I hadn’t seen him leave, but I could guess it was pretty damn quick. He struck me as the discrete sort. “And he’s not exactly best chums with Dustil, anyway.”

“Jen,” Carth said softly. “To answer your earlier question – I don’t know what this is. But I do know I’d like to find out.”

So would I. The thought was irresponsible, and yet so very compelling. And a strong part of me felt like I deserved some happiness for a change.

He leaned forward, and kissed me again – but lighter, this time. Sweet and soft and tantalising, before pulling back.

“One of the perks of being the pilot is having my own quarters,” he murmured. “If you want to find out also, then you know where to find me.” He smiled, and then stepped away before quietly leaving the garage.

I leaned back against the bulkhead, my eyes closing. My lips were tingling, and I felt a sort of buzzing anticipation that made me want to grin stupidly and dig my toes into the ground. This is insane. Bastila would not approve. Stars, would any Force-user approve?

And yet, I already knew what my decision was going to be.

xXx

Nisotsa Organa:

My fingers tapped against the powered-down navicomputer, and I scowled. I’d docked on the Leviathan near an hour ago, and should have disembarked by now.

But frakk them. Frakk Lieutenant Delia and frakk Admiral Karath and frakk that junior officer whatever-his-name-was who’d signalled me when my shuttle had entered the Leviathan’s docking bay.

I was Nisotsa Organa, a general of the Mandalorian Wars and one of the most powerful Dark Jedi alive. To be greeted by an underling and commanded to make my way to sleeping quarters was more than just galling. Karath should have been the one to contact me – him or his stuttering second Delia. But, once more, I was overlooked and my authority diminished.

It was familiar, now; this growing resentment and bitterness towards my allies. It was part of the reason I’d supported Malak’s play for power, even if Arran had royally farkled it.

In the past - the dead, glorious past - Revan had occasionally deferred to Malak. She’d listened to Yudan, she’d respected Talvon, and she’d empowered Meeta to lead when she wasn't present.

I’d had as much damn battle experience as all of them, and I’d been shunted into Recruitment and Intelligence. Even if I was surprisingly good at it, I’d never held the same standing or respect.
When the holonews spoke of the Jedi Thirteen, they mentioned Revan Freeflight and Malak Devari and Yudan Rosh and Meetra Surik and Talvon Esan… they never mentioned Nisotsa Organa.

Malak had promised me it’d be different, he would be different, as the Dark Lord of the Sith.

He wasn’t.

That obnoxious Bandon and that simpering newcomer Kylah held more sway with Malak and Karath, and even with the likes of that nutbar Uthar Wynn. Yudan Rosh commanded more authority, and his backbone had been snapped when Darth Revan had finally bedded him.

Even Meetra Surik used to receive more acknowledgement than me, and she’d been the quietest of us all. It was galling, bloody galling, after all my history to be discounted this way, time and time again.

I had my strengths, I wasn’t in-your-face overt like Kylah and Bandon, no, I had the patience to wait for the opportune time, and strike when necessary. Yet it always seemed to be the brash, reckless ones who came out on top – no matter what they risked to get there.

It was as if all my life I’d been waiting for the next event to come along and improve my situation. Joining the Jedi would make my life great. Following Revan to fight the Mandalorians promised adventure and justice. Joining Revan’s quest to conquer the galaxy meant being a crucial part of a new empire that would outlast our lifetimes. Agreeing to Malak and Arran’s Deralian ambush promised true recognition from a new leader of the Sith. Bowing to Malak’s second betrayal promised the same and, finally, an end to Revan Freeflight - who’d been the cornerstone for too many crucial decisions in my life.

I’d agreed out of terror more than anything, though. Sometimes, I still remembered what Malak’s face looked like.

...

The fear sat in my gut like cold, cold sick. My fists clenched and unclenched and clenched again. The trap... the trap had failed.

Arran Da’klor was butchered, along with his team of crack Dark Jedi. Our Deralian ambush had been upended and squashed like a bug. And my cousin wasn’t answering her damn comm-link.

I’d sent the lame-brained twit away weeks ago. I hadn’t wanted her anywhere near Deralia, not if things had a chance of going balls-up - and, against Revan, I didn’t dare rule anything out. Neiza had vowed to stay away - but she was also a love-struck imbecile when it came to Arran Da’klor-Neiza promised. She swore me fealty, and promised to stay away from Arran until I gave her leave to return. She's just shite at replying to holo-comms.

My inner voice was as convincing as a Mandalorian waving a peace offering.

I was scared. No bones about it. Scared my cousin had thwarted my command, scared she had fallen next to Arran, scared... scared for my own, damned, skin.

Revan lived. I had turned on her, and she still lived. Worse than that - she had eviscerated Malak's allies, she’d taken over the Deralian capital, and she was still the Dark Lord of Sith.

I’d heard Revan had set up torture camps in one of the Deralian communes, a’ la Talvon Esan style – our insane cohort she’d cut down herself for being too debased.

Oh, Revan was pissed. Righteously, planet-bendingly pissed.

Malak lay comatose, face mutilated, in the infirmary. I’d not seen him yet, only heard the reports. Revan and Malak had injured each other before, but not like this. I’d heard she’d sliced his jaw off with her gods-cursed lightsaber while he begged for mercy.

My fingers clenched again. Bandon, unearthing a self-preservation most unlike him, had scarpered to the Lannik system, one of our key outposts that Intelligence suggested the Republic would soon attack. I didn’t think Bandon or myself were implicated yet – Arran must have kept quiet on the details at least – but Revan had gone after Malak. If she knew Malak was part of it, and he was still alive...

Malak was currently helpless, drugged in the infirmary, awaiting parts for a voice modulator and facial reconstruction. Revan might come back at any moment and pick the details of the disastrous betrayal out of his comatose brain. I could kill him right now-

The noise of the command centre’s entry hatch opening had me turning in surprise. I’d ordered isolation; I wasn’t in the mood to face anyone just yet, and the Invictus was idly orbiting around Deralia with no clear objective for now. I needed time to consider my options.

The figure in the doorway was truly macabre. Dressed in the medical white of a patient, half his face was a gaping black maw of cauterized flesh. His eyes were yellow and dead.

He’d never eat food again, I realized dumbly. He’d never kiss Revan again.

And then the ominous pulsing of pure Dark Force around him hit me; I’d been rattled and panicked, but I should have sensed him well before he entered the command room. It went beyond strong and into titanic. The air in the room held an unsteady charge to it and it was crackling around him. He shouldn’t be up, he shouldn’t be able to be up. It was as if the pure strength of his fury alone kept him going.

He walked towards me, step by step, and I struggled against the driving need to flee. I drew deep in the Force, but it was a pathetic, shallow strength compared to the almighty hurricane that blistered around him. There was a shimmering in his aura, as if light itself was bending away from the infernal vortex that was Darth Malak.

He faced me now, and a large hand thumped onto my shoulder. I flinched despite myself, and the stench of open flesh hit my nostrils.

Don’t look, Nisotsa.

But I did. It was black and red and hideous and I couldn’t understand how he was alive let alone moving-

Malak had always been strong enough to frighten and impress, but I didn’t think I’d felt this level of power before.

Passion fuels the Force. And you have no idea how… passionate I am feeling.

And I’d never heard Malak’s voice in my head before. Both he and Revan tended to focus on other areas than mental manipulation. Of course, it still paid to guard one’s thoughts around them, for Dark Jedi that powerful could pick up overt emotions or desires without breaking a sweat. I swallowed convulsively, and his fingers tightened into my flesh.

“Malak, you should be in bed,” I whispered hoarsely, not daring to move. I’d just been considering killing him, and here he was, standing in front of me and wielding enough power to flatten a city.

My eyes kept drawing back to that hideous wound. There were black strings of dead flesh hanging from it. It looked like it went back as far as his spinal cord.

You thought about killing me because you fear Revan’s reprisal. I will have to educate you that my reprisal is the more fearsome. But we will overlook that for now, and I may be merciful depending on your usefulness, Nisotsa. For there is another matter to attend to.
My thoughts froze. I’d have to prove my loyalty, I realized in mounting horror. I was loyal to Malak, but I didn’t want to die, either – by his hand or Revan’s. He wouldn’t kill me for this thought, I was too useful – but Revan might, should she find out who else was involved on Deralia. And that meant–

“Revan,” I mouthed the word only. We were down a dozen Dark Jedi, Arran Da’klor, and Malak’s jaw. We were in no shape to attack Revan, again. And she knows Malak betrayed her, so she’ll be watching us if she’s not already on her way to kill us–

No. No, she won’t. She truly believes in my devotion, still. She doesn’t think I had anything to do with Arran’s ambush. His mental voice was arctic. She sliced off my jaw because the other Sith leaders believe me implicated, and she couldn’t afford to appear weak.

It took a moment to process that, and I sensed it as the root of Malak’s unholy dark rage. He’d already tried to kill her, but his end-goal had been leadership of the Sith and galactic control. Now, I had the uncanny feeling that Malak would damn himself and everything in the galaxy to see Revan’s end. Because she’d mutilated him for the sake of her own standing amongst the Sith.

It would have been more understandable if she’d done it believing in his guilt.

Malak valued me and my skills, even if there was a fair amount of groveling in my immediate future. And there was no way I could entertain the thought of standing against the tornado of barely contained dark energy right in front of me.

“How?” I clasped my hands together to stop them clenching again.

I’ve broadcast a holo-feed of Deralian atrocities Revan has committed to a nearby Republic Fleet. She won’t be expecting reinforcements yet – the HoloNet blackout still holds as far as her intelligence is concerned.

Information was power, and I knew that better than anyone. Reading the patterns of data and predicting sentient reactions was one of my strengths. My team of security analysts were second-to-none, with not a single Force-user amongst them.

Not everything was about sheer power. Controlling media coverage was crucial to any war or strategy. The opinions of the masses could sway governments, if massaged correctly.

“How many ships? Who is in command?” I asked.

The sickly yellow of his eyes gleamed in the halogen light. They were the same colour as mine, the common Sith-turned colour. Eighty percent of Dark Force users ended up with that shade.

It was a useless statistic I knew. I’d spent some time, once, trying to find meaning in it. Why had Revan and Bandon’s turned black as space? Uthar Wynn on Korriban, that new Headmaster who’d been there for all of three months, had white. Alaki’s turned a blood red before Bandon had shoved his ‘saber through his gut. But near everyone else I knew had gone yellow.

It’s a small enough fleet to be insignificant, were it not for the two Jedi Masters onboard. He paused as I absorbed the shock. And Padawan Bastila Shan.

My eyes widened. Now there was a prize Revan and Malak had been dying to get a hold of. The only flip card left in the Republic’s pazaak deck, their shining padawan with a newly discovered gift everyone had thought long buried with Nomi Sunrider.
How had Malak discovered this? How had he transmitted a message when Revan had ordered all communications blocked?

I have taken command of your team, Nisotsa, and now I have new orders for you.

I swallowed the injustice of that, reminding myself that Malak, more than anyone else, appreciated my talents and what I could offer the Sith. I kept my gaze fixed on his, and did not drop it.

“What are they, Master?” Master. The acknowledgment had his eyes crease slightly in satisfaction.

Revan is on the Nexus, overconfident and still furious enough that she is not thinking clearly.

I hadn’t heard that. Most of our armada in this sector was grounded on Deralia, along with the troops.

I need your team to hack into the Nexus’ systems and override the sensors so they don’t see anything approaching.

His dead gaze never wavered from mine. His power still pulsed, buffeting against my aura, strong enough to slam a dizzying nausea into my senses.

I need a message sent to the Republic ships about Revan’s current location, and the scarcity of her defences. Forge it from a deserter, or something tempting enough to lure Jedi Masters Kester and Jai’lel to the Nexus. This is their chance to face down Revan. If we’re lucky, they might even drag Bastila Shan along.

“And us?” I whispered. We were orbiting Deralia, too, on the Destroyer Invictus. It was as powerful as Revan’s flagship, the Nexus, and only marginally slower.

The Invictus has been outfitted with the experimental cloaking technology I have been creating on the Star Forge. It’s time to see if it works. He paused briefly, and his heavy hand clenched on my shoulder. I felt the bones grinding together, and bit back a wince. If the Jedi don’t finish Revan, then the Invictus will.

…I

It had worked, or so we’d thought. Bastila Shan’s survival had been irritating, but a minor concession when compared to the end of Darth Revan. Malak had assumed the mantle of Dark Lord, and moved our forces away from the insignificant planet of Deralia and towards the Lannik system, where a mighty battle was brewing.

We’d lost that one, but not before destroying its resources. And we’d won near everything since.

Over time, though, my authority had once more withered. I’d lost command of the Invictus, I’d lost my Intelligence portfolio, and all that remained was floating by after Malak’s victories, and picking up whatever Force sensitives I could find in his wake to shunt them towards Korriban.

Things were worse, not better. Every time I tried to change my cursed life, things ended up worse.

And Revan was still alive, damn her black soul.

A light blinked on my wrist-comm, and I looked down. An incoming message through my private channel that required a blood-print to activate. My eyes narrowed. There were only a few who held the hexi-codes for that channel.

I activated the delayed transmission, feeling a surge of antipathy as a small holo-image of Kylah Aramai illuminated above my wrist. Last I’d heard, that shameless schutta had fled Manaan after completely failing to capture Bastila Shan.

::Nisotsa:: the holo-image purred, flicking her dark tresses over one shoulder. The fact so much glossy hair remained on her head should have been a shout-out to her weakness. No true Dark Master kept a head of hair that complete. ::You should be onboard the Leviathan by now. Our Master has decided that more… authority is required there, so I shall be joining you soon.::

She smirked, and my fingernails dug deep into the palms of my Sith-white hands. Kylah Aramai was only so highly ranked because she liked to frakk with people's minds and suck Malak’s cock. She was a cowardly worm who should have been beneath me.

But… she knew Malak had ordered me to the Leviathan. She was with Malak, despite her failure on Manaan. Something had transpired, it seemed.

The eyes in the recording narrowed. ::Ensure that Admiral Karath is on his way to Kashyyyk, and transmit a message to Bandon. Our Master is quite prepared to destroy Kashyyyk if Bandon is unable to find the Star Map or capture that walking ghost.::

Bandon was pissing about on Kashyyyk, waiting to ambush Jen Sahara. I’d assumed he’d have more success that Kylah Arama.

Maybe I was wrong.

::I have my prize:: Kylah whispered, her lips curving in smug pretension. ::Lord Malak has promised I could be the one to wake her, so it will be a few days before I leave for the Leviathan.:: Her simper grew to a full-blown grin of pleasure. ::Expect me soon, Nisotsa. Then if Bandon screws his mission up, we’ll finish it::: An eyebrow quirked. ::Even if he’s still on Kashyyyk::

The image winked out, and I sat back, momentarily stunned.

Kylah had captured Bastila Shan. After all this time, Malak finally had his hands on the battle meditation princess of the Jedi. Surely, nothing could stop the Sith now, not even a broken fragment of the old Dark Lord.

Surely that meant, somehow, I could gain a modicum of power back. It was galling to be considered beneath Kylah Aramai, but I preferred her to that obnoxious prick Bandon.

Yudan Rosh is on Kashyyyk, too. We were old friends, and I felt conflicted over the thought of his demise – but, if Bandon and Yudan were both gone, then I could wrest control of Yudan's Fleet. Kylah would step up as Malak’s first apprentice – I’d have to bite back the revulsion - but I’d happily do that if it meant leading battles again, stepping up once more as a war general.

My fingers clenched again as my thoughts raced. This might be a turning point that actually worked out for me. I felt my jaw firm, and slowly made to move out of the pilot’s chair.

It was time to disembark, and find Admiral Karath.

xXx

Mission Vao:
I poked moodily at the grey slush in the plasteel bowl. At least on Taris we’d get cast-off meat from the Upper City. This synthesizer slop was getting old. Canderous’d made sure the machine was well-stocked before we’d left that horrid Sith planet, but I wish he’d scored some real food, too.

We weren’t far from Kashyyyk now, though. I brightened. Big Z liked to eat all sorts of weird stuff – but the key thing was he liked to eat. Wookiees were big on food.

I looked over to Jen, who was seated across from me. They’d finished training for the day, congregating into the common room around the centre table. I’d conned Kel into a pazaak game, even if he hadn’t any credits to wager – but it wasn’t long before he’d begged off and followed Dak to the men’s quarters.

Jen was staring down into her dinner with a funny look on her face. I gave her a small kick under the table.

She blinked, jerking her head up.

“What’s up?” I asked. “You look a million klicks away.”

She blushed. She actually blushed. That was weird, even for Jen. “Uh, nothing,” she muttered, looking away. “Just thinking about training.”

“Far out, that’s all you ever do these days,” I complained. It was boring. And I would have stayed to watch, out of curiosity if nothing else, but that stupid Hutt-slime was there. I never saw him in the common room, though, getting food with the others. I reckoned he was avoiding me as much as I was him. Cowardly little sneak. I can’t believe he’s Carth’s son.

Jen was grinning at me. “You could join in, you know. Canderous is there sometimes, teaching basic sparring. Wouldn’t hurt for you to learn a few moves.”

I wrinkled my nose. “Uh uh, no way.” I’d rather play pazaak by myself. Sheesh, I’d rather help Zaalbar clean out the ‘fresher. I was a bit surprised Canderous was there, though. He’d made his opinion of the ex-Sith students pretty clear. Although he’s always liked to hang out with Jen.

That thought made me look at her suspiciously, but she’d gone back to staring at her mush. Come to think of it, I didn’t see Jen come in to sleep last night. Whoa. Maybe there was something to it. Jen had been pretty quick to deny it, back on Korriban – but then I’d kinda put her on the spot.

I grinned. “So, Jen, did ya sleep well last night?”

Her head jerked up, her eyes widening as she stared at me. One eyebrow raised. “Yes, I did thanks, Mission. How about you?”

I might have believed her neutral voice, were it not for the rather obvious blush on her face. Again. Jen and Canderous! That’s hilarious! Her eyes narrowed as she looked me up and down, and I knew I was smirking at her.

Juhani cleared her throat from the other side of the table. I glanced over at her – she had a solemn look on her face. “It is less than two days until we reach Kashyyyk. Have you sensed anything, Jen?”

I frowned, staring down. I’d never got along with Bastila, but that didn’t mean I didn’t wish she was still here. Big Z felt wretched about it, and barely said a word to me these days – except the time he’d spilled his guts about his home.

And wasn’t that a surprise. I’d known there were secrets in Big Z’s past, I’d known he was running from something – but he was, like, royalty. Royalty that was exiled, though. His dumb brother and father kicked him out, remember? It sounded worse that Griff leaving me behind on Taris. At least I’d had the Beks, sort of, to look after me. Zaalbar hadn’t had anyone, and he’d been completely out of his depth when I’d run into him on Taris.

I’d planned to look around Kashyyyk when we landed, but now I thought maybe I should stay behind, and keep an eye on Big Z. I’d never seen him so depressed. Not just about returning to his home – but also because of Bastila.

But it wasn’t his fault, not really! The stupid Force was the problem, when it let bad people stuff your mind up or turn invisible while they made threats behind you-

I scowled, and stabbed my spoon into the plasteel bowl.

Juhani sighed. “I was hoping we might have some information for her Master when we landed.”

Jen placed her spoon down in a deliberate action, her eyes narrowing. “Master,” she said flatly. “Bastila’s Master?”

Jen’s eyes widened, and she appeared visibly shaken. “Oh… oh, kath crap. I did not realize that.”

“Whoa,” I said. “The guy we’re meeting on Kashyyyk? Guess he ain’t gonna be too happy, huh?”

Jen snorted, but she’d dropped her head into her hands. “That’s one way of putting it.” Her voice was muffled. “Do you know this guy, Juhani? What’s he like?”

“I do,” Juhani said quietly. “He is strict but fair. Some might consider him unapproachable, but he is also held as one of Dantooine’s greatest Masters.”

“Huh. Well, if he’s that great, maybe he’ll have the last Map,” Jen muttered. She raised her head to stare at Juhani. “And we can go straight to the rescuing Bastila part.”

“But what about wherever these Map things point to?” I asked. “Aren’t we going after that?”

“We can’t make any plans until we find out where we’re at with the Star Maps,” Jen said. “And talk to Vrook Lamar.” Her mouth twisted. “Which is going to be even more fun than I realized.”

“I guess I’ll stay on the ship with Big Z,” I said slowly, wrinkling my nose. “Are y’all gonna go meet this guy, then?”

“Yeah, except Canderous. I’ll send him out shopping again.” Jen grinned. “We need an alternator to repair HK. Zaalbar managed to affix his arm and head together, but his power core is completely shot. Here’s hoping Czerka has parts that’ll work.”

I didn’t like that droid, even if I could admit he’d been useful on Korriban. Still, he acted all evil. Whoever had programmed him was seriously unhinged.
“Hey, maybe Teethree could re-program HK when he’s fixed!” I blurted out. “He might be able to, like, turn that insane robot into something with manners.”

Jen laughed in delight. “That’s an interesting idea. Not entirely sure Teethree would be up to it.”

“Hey, Teethree’s pretty well-specced for an astromech,” I retorted. “Y’know, he’s got some pretty advanced hacking abilities. And come on, it’d be nice if we could stop HK calling us meatbags all the time.”

“I dunno,” she murmured. “Some of his nicknames are amusing.” She was looking beyond me, her lips twitching, and I turned to see Carth enter the common room.

“You’re going to fix psycho-droid,” he said, his voice flat as he crossed his arms and glowered at Jen. “Do you have any idea how close I’ve been to throwing him out the airlock?”

“Come on, Carth, you’ve got to admit HK’s pretty useful.”

“I’m not admitting anything, sister,” he grumbled. “Except that I think we’d all be better off without that thing.”

Jen was full out grinning, her eyes dancing with mischief. “Guess I’ll have to convince you otherwise.”

I yawned, then, loud and obvious in the room. “Oops,” I said, a little sheepishly. “Guess that’s my cue for bed. You guys coming?”

“I shall,” Juhani assented, standing and heading over to the kitchenette to return her bowl. “I find with all this training I require more rest than usual.”

“I’ll be along soon,” Jen muttered, staring at her bowl again. “Might eat some more first.”

“Youck,” I commented. “Not the sort of thing I have seconds of. Oh well, it’s your stomach.” I shot her a grin as I stood, but she was still looking down. I shrugged to myself and wandered away, throwing a carefree goodnight over my shoulder as I did so.

xXx

Atris Surik:

The dark skin and pointed horns of my oldest friend slowly faded from the holo-screen, as did my forced, fake smile.

The anger, the outright fury and utter disgust I had been concealing during our conversation surged to the forefront, and I heard the snarl as it ripped from my lungs.

Oh, if they could see me now-!

Through a rage-filled gaze, my hand swept violently across the poraclay desk, knocking over a ferracrystal jug and a half dozen techJournals detailing plans for the Telos restoration.

There was a shattering noise as the water jug fell to the ground and exploded into a thousand sparkly pieces.

There is no emotion, Atris, I counselled myself, even as my teeth clenched. I breathed in a shaky
There is peace. And there is a way forward.

But I could not believe what they had done.

Oh, but perhaps I could. Because hadn’t the Dantooine Council always thought themselves a special exception to the rules and laws that governed all sentients?

Had they learned nothing from Ulic Qel-Droma? He was Dantooine's child, Dantooine's failure, and yet they allowed him freedom after his crimes against life. Force, they'd sanctioned his exile: escape from Republic justice and all the violence he had enacted under Exar Kun's banner.

It mattered not that he was Force-blind and miserable, after Nomi did whatever she did and could no longer recall – No. What mattered was that he escaped his trial.

I believed in redemption, oh yes, but I also believed in justice. And those idealistic fools on Dantooine never owned up to just how much damage Ulic's freedom cost the Jedi Order. The bitterness of Exar Kun and Ulic Qel-Droma's fall was bad enough, but that could have been mitigated if only we'd turned Ulic over to the Republic Senate after Kun's defeat.

Exar Kun had met his justice with death. And while Ulic's last-minute aid may have helped in Kun's defeat, it certainly did not undo all the damage he had wrought, all the lives he had taken. Ulic had walked free, with the aid of the Dantooine Masters. And for decades, now, that had damaged relations between the Jedi Order and the Republic.

For, after all, how many people out there had lost a loved one, due to Ulic Qel-Droma?

How many, due to Revan Freeflight and Malak Devari?

The righteous anger was building again. How dare the Dantooine Council claim ownership of Revan's soul, and hide this from the High Council? Revan Freeflight belonged to the Coruscanti Enclave, the same as Malak Devari. A transfer three weeks prior to her flight to the Mandalorian Wars did not suddenly turn her into Dantooine's responsibility. But Karon Enova and Zhar Lestin had never let go of their childhood ties with that Outer Rim rock, oh no, so it was not surprising that they both transferred shortly afterwards as well.

I found myself pacing, boots crunching over shards of ferracrystal as my thoughts seethed with discontent. Which Master had thought up this crackpot plan? Was it possible my old friend Quatra had some of this wrong? Quatra and I had known each other for years, and despite being from different enclaves, we remained close. I knew Quatra had been shaken after her apprentice’s betrayal, it was true, and now that her apprentice was crawling back to her perhaps the Zabrak’s mind was scattered and easily influenced by whispers and rumours.

But, no. Quatra was highly intelligent and logical, with an admirable ability to detach herself from emotional situations. Usually, I reminded myself. For I’d never seen her as flustered as just now. She had only put up a token protest at my digs for information. It had not taken much pressure to unravel all the sordid details. The secret mission. The Star Maps. Revan.

This would not have been Vrook’s brainchild. He disapproved of Revan and Malak as much as I. I could still recall the day I’d come across my favourite student, Dajineer, in a fistfight of all things with Malak Devari. Whilst Revan stood back, an Echani blade at her side, laughing at the two of them forsaking the Jedi Code and making idiots of themselves. They were supposed to be learning the art of duelling from the Echani, not rolling on the floor like common Mandalorians.

But I had other reasons to detest Revan. Other, private, familial, reasons. Yet it is not my personal issues that will guide my hand here. No, it was justice, plain and simple. For I knew what the Dantooine Council would do, should their insane plan actually work. They would squirrel away a quiet, redeemed Revan Freeflight somewhere, to live a quiet, redeemed life. Force, they’d do the same with Malak Devari if possible. All without thinking of the consequences, should someone on the Senate discover their existence. What idiotic Master actually thought this was a good idea?

It was that fat fool, Galdea, I swear. He always liked flouncing about with his mental tricks. And what about Dantooine’s shining Master-in-waiting, Vima Sunrider? If there was one Jedi who firmly believed in redemption at the cost of justice, it would be her.

My eyes closed as I recalled the last Senate meeting I had been invited to. I’d been spoken over by Senator Akku. Seated at the back like a petitioner. Ignored by Chancellor Nevex, and he owed the Order a favour.

It was inescapable. The Jedi Order did not have the influence we once enjoyed. We were meant to be the guardians of the galaxy, the upholders of peace and light, but we could not do our work without the Senate’s backing.

After Exar Kun, after Ulic Qel-Droma, after Revan Freeflight and Malak Devari, there were many on the Senate who believed the galaxy would be a better place without the Jedi. On some level, I could understand why they thought that way. There were enough senators whose lives had been personally touched by darkness inflicted from one of those villains.

Villains that had all been nurtured and trained by the Jedi Order.

It wasn’t the plan I had so much an issue with as the secrecy. For this war was being waged against the Republic. That the Senate hadn’t been informed of all the particulars was the height of insanity. How could Dantooine not comprehend the magnitude of the fallout if Revan’s existence was discovered? Or worse, if she regained her Dark strength - and it became known that the Order had captured her and let her loose?

No, the only way forward was damage mitigation.

And if all we needed now was the fourth Map on Kashyyyk, then there was no reason Republic forces couldn’t pick up Jen Sahara before she left that tree-infested place.

There was no reason she couldn’t be sent off to face trial and justice while the Republic Forces dealt with whatever threat the Maps led to.

From here, I did not believe it was for the Jedi Order to choose the way forward. I walked back to my desk slowly, making a mental note to send Brianna in to clean the mess on the floor. With a heavy sigh and an inward curse directed at the surviving Lestin and Sunrider, I turned to my console and opened a communication channel to the Senate.

xXx

Bastila Shan:

Consciousness came with a lurch, and it took no more than one fleeting second before I dearly wished myself once more comatose.

They had woken me, earlier. Sith medics running mandatory health checks while I was collared and restrained. The confusion and horror of being captured and away from the Ebon Hawk had been all-encompassing. I had prayed it was naught but a nightmare. I had screamed in fear. I had struggled uselessly against unyielding restraints and the terror of a neural disruptor.
The clinical, emotionless medics put me back under when my hysteria became uncontrolled.

The same helpless, overwhelmed feeling was back, but I did not think it would allow me an escape this time. Not from the two who leaned over me.

“My pet,” Darth Malak breathed, a gloved hand caressing Kylah Aramai’s cheek. “You did so well, my lovely.”

Kylah… my old friend whom I’d known for so many years. Her brown eyes were yellow, now. Her very existence explained Master Galdea’s death… the death of all those onboard the Endar Spire.

How did she capture me? How is it I am here? How is it fair that Kylah Aramai is alive in this cursed galaxy?

I stared, morbidly transfixed, as Malak’s face lowered down to his apprentice, for all the galaxy appearing as if he were to kiss her. Half his face is metal! I heard a low thrumming noise, and with a jolt realized he was laughing.

He turned to face me, dead eyes trailing down my body. I will survive this. I have survived indignities before and been all the stronger for it. Flashes of being helpless on Taris raced through my mind, but all the while I knew… that was a cakewalk compared to what was in store for me here.

I blinked, and Malak’s face was next to mine. Years ago, he had had a thick crop of dark hair over a handsome face. Now, shadowed tattoos inked over a shining scalp, and his skin was mottled and pale. Black markings pitted what was visible of his cheeks. The bottom half of his jaw and throat had been replaced with a metal alloy that wrapped around to underneath both ears. My gaze, despite myself, remained transfixed on the mechanical part of his face.

I shuddered.

“We are going to have such fun together, Bastila Shan,” Malak murmured in his modulated voice. It still managed to sound taunting. “Do you know how I lost my jaw, little one?”

I did not, nor did I wish to. It was a recent injury, just before his betrayal of Revan, but that was all the galaxy knew.

“I’m going to give you assignments, little one,” Malak continued on, still in that soft mocking tone. “Every time you pass I’ll let you have a rest. Every time you fail I’ll give you a taste of our interrogation methods. Revan will know some of them, but it was always my pet hobby. I’m sure you’ll enjoy experiencing some of my more inventive techniques, dear Bastila.”

The sound of my breathing, harsh and uneven, reached my ears. “I do not know what you want, Malak! But torturing me serves no purpose as there is nothing much of value that I can impart!” The words tumbled out, tripping over my tongue, nothing more than fruitless pleas of the desperate.

Kylah laughed, a high and tinkling sound, as she stepped forward next to her master. “Oh Bastila you silly gizka, it’s not about you. I guess you expect it, after all these years of everyone fawning over your Battle Meditation.”

I stared at her, disbelieving. Jealousy, a little voice in my mind whispered, storing this nugget of information away. Kylah Aramai had been one of the few Jedi my age that I had called friend. To think that all this time, she had resented my talent – despite her superior position as a Jedi Knight…
The terror made my skin clammy and my heart race erratically. My breathing was quick and harsh, and the nausea in my belly was overpowering. Yet, deep down, there was a kernel of growing hatred at that betraying, evil woman who stood smirking in front of me.

But I know I’m not the prize. I tried to calm my breathing, and failed. As long as they do not find out about our mind-link. That would be… beyond disastrous.

“I know enough about your quest for the Star Maps, little one,” Darth Malak continued, still in that soft, metallic intonation. “What I’m far more interested in is this bond Kylah’s told me all about. Force bonds are very rare, you know. Usually only between lovers… yet even I and Revan did not share one. I am very curious to explore yours.”

A wave of sickening dread flushed through me; the nausea bubbled up and I dry-retched, my vision fading out. It was lucky I had not eaten for some time. They know. Sith’s blood, they know. How did Kylah find out? The only comfort I could find was the cool press of metal against my throat. There was no bond now, and they would not dare remove it.

For if my connection to Revan returned, I would be her biggest liability. And after how far she had come, I could not bear that. Oh, how the tables had turned!

I felt a sharp prick. My vision sharpened back to normality, and I turned to see Kylah remove a hypoderm from my right arm. She sent me a poisonous smile, her unnaturally yellow eyes gleaming. “This is jerrikerr-kolto. A by-product of kolto, as you may have guessed,” she murmured. “It has very mild healing properties, but the main side-effect is a dulling of the senses, particularly to one’s connection with the Force. Jerrikerr-kolto doesn’t entirely cut you off, but you shall be weak enough that even a neophyte padawan could best you.”

“My lovely does so enjoy learning about the intricacies of the Force,” Malak commented, turning his attention to the traitorous Kylah. She all but purred beneath his ominous gaze.

“I am already collared and helpless,” I said through numb lips. The durasteel restraints were solid and unyielding against my flesh. “You do not need to inject me with experimental poisons as well.”

Kylah laughed again, a sound akin to ferracrystal shattering. “Oh but we do, my dear old friend. You see, the mind is the least affected, specifically telepathic abilities. Your charming Wookiee cohort informed me that your bond has grown into telepathy.”

“And we wouldn’t want you escaping when we remove your collar,” Malak added. A gloved hand curled around my exposed throat and tightened. A bubble of hysteria caught in my throat, and my vision faded briefly.

The loud snick of the collar opening was followed by the thud of it dropping to the ground.

“We will leave you in peace for one hour, little one,” Malak murmured. “Then I shall return, and ask you again: how did I lose my jaw? You shall not like it if you do not know the answer, so I suggest you try contacting Revan. Do tell her I said hello.”

xXx
Safe. I was safe, and warm, and blissfully content; feelings that seemed foreign for some reason. My mind was at ease, enjoying the touch of warm skin and the scent of warm male. I don’t want to move.

I heard the rumble of a chuckle underneath my ear, and I cracked open an eye to view Carth gazing at me in amusement. He was propped up against the side of the bed in the pilot’s quarters, his fingers entangled in my hair. I’d fallen asleep curled up on his chest, my face pressed against his skin.

“You remind me of a loth-kitten I had, once,” he murmured. “Every night, she’d go to sleep on top of me. Used to annoy the heck out of Morga—” he cut himself off as a distant look passed through his brown eyes.

Way to wreck the mood, flyboy, I thought, disgruntled. I shifted to the side, sat up, and touched his cheek lightly. He needed a shave. “You don’t have to stop yourself speaking about her, Carth,” I said. “As enjoyable as this is, it’s hardly going to replace what you once had.”

His eyes snapped back to mine, and I saw I’d pissed him off. “Very fatalistic, Jen. Do you always start relationships on such a happy tone?”

Relationships? I blinked. What the frell? “Uh, we’re having a good time, right? Let’s leave it light, okay?”

He didn’t answer, but I could spot the mounting frustration in his gaze. I sighed.

“Look,” I said, leaning away from him against the durasteel grated wall. “My mind’s a shot mess. Honestly, you have no frelling clue just how messed up I am. I can’t- I simply can’t go into anything heavy.”

The thought had occurred to me, before this had started, how terribly paranoid Carth’s reaction would be if he ever found out I had the voice of Darth Revan in my head. Now that we were engaged in whatever this was, it went beyond the realm of appalling and straight into the territory of completely frelled up.

I’m a selfish idiot. I shouldn’t be involved with him.

“I know,” he said quietly. “Bastila and I- talked. I know you were a Jedi once, Jen, but you’ve blocked out chunks of your life to cope after… after what happened on Deralia. I’ve learned a lot about the Force and the Dark Side since the Endar Spire. Watching you, and Juhani, and all that happened on Korriban… everything I thought about the Jedi before was wrong. Even if you lot are too damn secretive.” He moved out from underneath, turning to lean over me with a half-smile on his face. He laid his hands flat against the wall, on either side of my head, his body warm against mine.

And damn if I didn’t feel the insidious curl of desire start up again.

“No one’s infallible, Jen,” he murmured. “But whatever scared you on Rii’shn – and you’ve got to explain that to me some time soon – you’ve been doing everything right since then. You have no idea how impressive you are.” His eyes dropped further down; I’d fallen asleep naked, and the blankets had long since slipped off. “Very impressive. Especially when you’ve bothered to shower,” he ended on a teasing note, and then leaned forward to capture my lips again.

This will never work. I kicked the guilty thought away, and my hand snaked behind his head as I kissed him back.

The chronometer dinged, an incessant and highly irritating noise that had us breaking apart. He’d set it hours earlier as an alarm for the upcoming hyperspace exit. Carth pulled back from me a little, his eyes black with desire.

Darth Revan’s in my head. How is this fair to him?

“Carth-”

“Jen,” he cut in. I had the feeling my doubts were showing on my face. “I’m not asking you for anything you’re not willing to give. Just- don’t close your mind to anything, okay? We’re almost at Kashyyk. When we land, we might find the Jedi already have all the Star Maps, and have a plan for facing Malak and rescuing Bastila. Our mission might be over. We might actually have some time to explore… whatever this is between us. And I’d like to do that.”

I could feel my cheeks burning again as his gaze held mine with an intensity I was unused to. Stars, I think I’ve blushed more in the last week than my entire frelling life. But if he was right… maybe he was right. Maybe we would have a reprieve from everything.

And maybe… maybe he was a damn good option.

I felt my lips curving despite myself, and an unfamiliar feeling of happy curling in my stomach. “Okay,” I said softly, and then laughed. “Honestly, Carth, you’ve got to be a complete borkhead to take me on.”

He chuckled, and leaned over to kiss me softly on the lips. I shivered. “Leave that to me, beautiful.”

I stared at the door long after he’d vacated. It’d been three nights; three secret nights of guilty pleasure, that made me feel young and carefree and normal. We’d spoken less than he’d planned, I suspected, but I was more interested in physical gratification than verbal repartee.

And I wasn’t exactly keen on opening up to him. He’d mentioned Rii’shn twice already, curiosity evident in his voice. He wanted to understand what had changed, what had made me come back. I’d told him on Manaan that I’d stopped running – and while that was true, it was also simplistic.

Despite myself, my smile slowly slipped away as the uneasiness returned.

He’d spoken to Bastila about me. Well, this is Carth. No doubt he’d been grilling her for answers about my unpredictable behaviour since Taris. And she told him I’d been a Jedi Knight? But he still knew me as Jen Sahara, the scholar who’d been tortured to death by Darth Revan. Bastila had let slip only half-truths to him, it seemed.

I had to be realistic. It’d been a lovely reprieve, these last couple of days – but that’s all it was. Carth might understand part of my history, but he didn’t realize that the Jedi with the broken mind was someone completely separate to Jen Sahara – and that wasn’t even the worst of my secrets.

I didn’t know what had happened to me, to Ness Jonohl. But I’d find out on Kashyyyk.
And then, maybe, find out if there’s any chance for any of… this.

But there couldn’t be, not really, not with Darth Revan in my head. I knew that. I’d known all along, which is why I’d avoided him for most of the hyperspace journey… but I’m also selfish, which is why I’d caved in the end.

I sighed irritably, and swung myself out of bed. Okay, I’m not going to beat myself up over having a little bit of fun for once. Sun and stars, second-guessing things is not my sodding style. It didn’t take long, to throw some clothes on and leave the room. I found myself wandering to the cockpit automatically, but Dustil was sitting in the co-pilot’s chair, looking awkward and ill-at-ease and yet taking the time to voluntarily sit with his father.

I smiled slightly as they both turned to look at me.

“You got this?” I asked Carth. He nodded, throwing me a heated look that spoke of last night’s entertainment. I left them both and wandered back to the common room. Carth could land the Ebon Hawk without a co-pilot, and I was intensely aware of his need for more father-son bonding time.

I didn’t like the thought that what we were doing might be cutting into that. But it’d only been a couple of days, and only at the end of the day’s routine I’d imposed on the crew – waiting until everyone was asleep before sneaking around like a damn teenager.

We hadn’t really spoken about it, but discretion was important. Dustil was only marginally less sullen than when we’d left Korriban, and who knew how he’d react to his father sleeping with someone who wasn’t his mother. He still blames Carth for Telos, in part.

I sighed, and pushed all Onasi related thoughts from my head. We were almost at Kashyyyk. I needed to concentrate on what was coming up.

I found myself drifting off into my own thoughts, absently taking a seat next to Mission who appeared to be wheedling Dak into a game of pazaak. His one hand held the cards, frowning at them in concentration that bordered on derisiveness. I had the distinct feeling his opinion of the game equalled mine.

Juhani sent me a small smile of welcome from the other side of the common room. I returned it, before leaning back to close my eyes. The conversation buzzed around me, melding in with the hum of the ship’s hyperdrive.

Soon, I’d be meeting Master Vrook Lamar. I’d been running from this for so long. The fear of the Jedi repeating whatever they’d done to me had never ceased, not really. But the need for answers had grown - had become necessary - ever since Rii’shn. I’d taken too long to draw them out of Bastila, and now she was gone. Now my only option, it seemed, was the Jedi Master she’d been herding me toward since Taris.

Vaguely, I heard Carth broadcast a hyperspace exit transmission through the ship, and slipped myself into one of the safety belts attached to the tatty plimfoam benches, before my thoughts once more derailed.

What did I know about myself, really? I was a Jedi, a Jedi Knight. I fought in the Mandalorian Wars, but Bastila told me I’d never fallen to the Dark Side. I knew something of the Star Maps. The Star Maps. That was the key, the key to Darth Malak’s power.

The key to Darth Revan’s power, once. I frowned. Is Revan in my head because I’d failed to find the Maps on my own before? Ness had seen the Tatooine one, sure – but that was the only one I was certain of. She’d – I’d – been on the trail of the Korriban one, but had we actually found it? Or had the terentateks scared us away?

Us. For it hadn’t been just me. I suspected my past lover had died, somehow. He must have died. And yet, he’d been an integral part of those flashbacks. Without him, had it all fallen apart?

My mind, once more, was going around in meaningless circles. This was why I’d stopped running. This was why I was headed to a Jedi Master. Because I couldn’t make sense of anything on my own.

As the freighter shot out of hyperspace, I squeezed my eyes shut tighter and focussed on willing the uneasiness away.

xXx

We docked at a Czerka starport, most of us crowded into the common room as Carth organized landing permission and coordinates on Zaalbar’s home planet.

It seemed to take forever.

Juhani was murmuring quietly to Dak, and Kel sat awkwardly on his other side. Canderous was next to me, making an occasional comment that didn’t register. I wasn’t used to feeling nervous. I detested this feeling, this uneasy edginess that sat like sharp ferracrystal jabbing the insides of my belly.

I had allies with me. I had nothing to fear, surely. Juhani – a powerful Force user in her own right – would not sit back while something happened to me.

Why had I not confided in Juhani? I realized, with a start, that I could have. My mind and its fragilities was not something I spoke of – ever- even on the few times Carth had hassled me for details. I’d only ever cornered Bastila. But Juhani’s loyalty to me was there, and resolute – why had it never even occurred to me to just talk to her?

Because she’d think I’m crazy. Because I don’t know what’s going on, not really. Because I can’t let anyone know about Darth Revan.

I sighed, banging my head back against the durasteel bulkhead in irritation.

“Jen,” Juhani said, across from me. Her slanted eyes gleamed with emotion. “Are you alright?”

“Jen,” Canderous interrupted in his gravelly voice. “I’ve got quite the shopping list. You know those Republic credits ain’t gonna last much longer?”

“Priorities are kolto and parts for HK,” I answered. We’d decided, earlier, for the Mandalorian to focus on restocking the ship, while Mission and Zaalbar stayed behind. I would have sent the young Twi’lek with Canderous – expecting her to sneak out otherwise – but Mission claimed she wanted to stay behind with Zaalbar. He’d likely be just as uneasy and on edge as me – worse, in a way, as he had to spend the entire stay on Kashyyyk in the freighter.

The rest of us would find this Master Vrook Lamar.

I didn’t expect Kel to be with us for much longer. The quiet teenager didn’t talk often, but his eyes shone with hope whenever we spoke of the Jedi.
Dak, despite his earlier protestations, was following the same path. I could see the fierce emotion on his face, at times, when he looked at Juhani and thought her unaware – but he also seemed reconciled that a return to the Order was his future. Dak Vessar had surprised me. I wondered what he’d make of his second chance.

And as for Dustil… well, he hadn’t said. Carth expected him to follow Dak and Kel, but that would likely mean a separation from us all. I wondered how Carth would handle that. It’s not like he’d ever been a shining advocate of the Jedi.

It’s just another thing we have to sort out on this planet.

“We’re free to disembark now,” Carth said quietly as he entered the room. The background buzz of conversation halted, and all eyes turned to me. I smiled tightly, unclasped the safety harness around my waist, and stood.

“Let’s go.”

The first thing I noticed as the exit hatch opened was the humidity. There was a distinct moisture noticeable in the air, which was also warm– not hot like Tatooine – but I still felt overdressed in the plain tunic I’d pilfered from the cargo bay’s stores. I’d eschewed armour for the first time. It didn’t seem necessary. If this Jedi Master was truly a threat – and I was probably the only one who thought so – then armour wasn’t going to help.

The seemingly infinite expanse of greenery struck me next. It bordered everything, a striking contrast to the permacrete grey of the landing pad. In the distance, in every horizontal direction, leafy vegetation merged into haziness that could be hiding anything.

Above us, the dense foliage had been cleared in a man-made circular channel to allow for air traffic. Even this high up, we couldn’t see the tree-tops. Walls of wroshyr greenery rose majestically into the blue sky high above us. Clearing it would have been a massive project, and I guessed the maintenance had to be a killer.

The docking bay itself was a large foundation cinched between two massive wroshyr trees by titanium alloy cables thicker than my waist. There was some sort of large ratchet device around the trees; I imagined that as the tree grew, the mechanism could be adjusted to ensure rock solid immovability of the landing pad.

More guide ropes rose vertically to higher branches, connected in a similar way. The entire construction bespoke a long-term design; surely, with how steady the ferracrete foundation currently was, it wouldn’t need any sort of adjustment for years.

Czerka is here to stay.

There was a control tower at the end of our docking bay, built alongside one of the giant wroshyrs. It was large enough that even the tree – whose diameter had to be tens of metres – didn’t entirely dwarf it. The tower rose only a few stories higher than our level, but it also descended below view. I wondered how low into Kashyyyk’s depths it had been built.

A wide set of stairs leading downwards heralded the only obvious exit, other than going into the control tower which was guarded by a handful of armoured Czerka-clad sentients.

“I had not thought trees this size were possible,” Juhani murmured, as she stepped to my side.

My gaze slid back to the wroshyrs. They were, supposedly, more than a kilometre in height. The base of them must be truly awe-inspiring in girth. Even here, close to the sky, Kashyyyk had a way of making one feel truly infinitesimal in size. A bit like space, really.

“Huh. Big trees,” Dak commented in a neutral voice. He sounded a lot less impressed than either Juhani or I. “Shall we get a move on?”

I rolled my eyes, but gave a short nod, attention snapping back to the inhabitants of the starport. There were more landing pads, coiling around the tower in a ring of civilized permacrete that looked jarringly out of place on this wild world. Deep into the green haze, I could make out another identical control tower nearby, which likely had a similar setup of encircling landing pads.

This wasn’t a small starport. It explained the number of visible Czerka staff, milling around the edges of the tower. Most of them held blaster rifles and were equipped with moderate body-armour – which shouted a perceived danger or perhaps an elevated caution that I’d not noticed in previous starports.

And standing near the set of stairs, I noticed a brown-robed figure.

I took a deep breath, and began to walk.

Juhani fell into step next to me, and I saw an encouraging smile in my periphery. Dak and Kel were on her other side, and then running footsteps had me slowing. I glanced over my shoulder to see Carth.

“I asked Ordo to finish docking the ship,” he said, a little breathlessly, and his gaze slid to Dustil who was dragging his feet behind us. I wasn’t sure if Carth was there for me or his son, but shot him a brief smile of acknowledgement. Canderous would be fine handling the paperwork. Carth would have already sorted out landing clearance and transferred docking payment before we landed, but the bureaucracy that went with docking a ship escalated exponentially with the size of the starport. This port was likely on a par with Ahto City.

I looked forward again, and resumed walking. The Jedi Master, Vrook Lamar, stood awaiting us, hands clasped casually in front of him. Bastila’s Master. This wasn’t going to be pretty. Carth had transmitted the Star Map coordinates from Korriban but little else – in space, it was all too easy for communications to be intercepted. I did not think this Jedi Master would know the news of Bastila’s capture yet.

Vrook Lamar looked calm - peaceful even - as we neared. There was a serene expression on his face that became apparent with every step. It was hard to guess his age, but his face was lined and his dark eyes fixed solely on me as I led our group forward.

The hairs on my exposed forearms lifted, and a shiver coursed through me as the metres closed in. The sharp edginess was still there, now matched with a mild vertigo I recognized all too well. I picked up on a sign of uneasiness from the Master, too, as his red headtails tightened around his neck - and then my vision dimmed in a rush and I was swept away.

…

“I have often hypothesized the Force to be a living entity in its own right,” a robed Twi'lek said thoughtfully, as his dark purple eyes trained on me. “And if so, you are surely one of its favourites. I have never known a Force-sensitive with such immeasurable good luck.”

Yeah, it was a bit like that on Talshion too,” the young man standing behind him muttered. His face wore a thunderous scowl. “I can’t believe you did that. I can’t believe you’re still alive!”

I shifted uncomfortably. Zhar didn’t concern me, but I was very aware of just how much trouble I was in with the most important person in my life. “Look, the governor’s agreed to meet the Republic delegate and discuss entry requirements. Can’t we just focus on that for now?”

Master Zhar sighed heavily; he was a mild-mannered Master, but I knew that sometimes he was driven to distraction when he took the two of us on training missions. This one, in particular, had snowballed ridiculously. Still, I’d seen an opportunity and it was working out for the best – for us, and the Republic.

“Jedi do not involve themselves in politics, Padawan,” Zhar rebuked. “No matter how important the situation may seem. We are mediators only, not politicians. We leave the matters of men to the governments of the time. And now Governor James is expecting Jedi Knight- what name did you give them?”

“Ness Jonohl,” I muttered.

"Ness Jonohl," a voice said in disbelief.

The night was warm on the grassy plain, and the two men were staring at me outside the tent that was our temporary campsite.

The red-skinned Twi’lek was frowning, muttering something about luck under his breath before giving an audible sigh. “Well, I do not see another solution but to ride this one out. They are expecting Knight-” his mouth twisted, "Ness Jonohl to attend the delegation, so you shall go and I will accompany you as an advisory Master. We’ll be staying out of the negotiations as much as possible."

No we won't, I thought in determination. Andara will become part of the Republic if I have anything to say about it.

…

My steps froze, and I stared at the brown-robed Twi’lek in shock. Carth turned to frown at me in confusion.

“Are you alright, Jen?” he asked softly, stepping back to my side. He placed a steady hand on my shoulder.

A false name, I thought numbly. Ness Jonohl is a false name. There was a hollow in the pit of my belly, and an acrid taste in my mouth. Disappointment reared through my psyche – and it was all the more bitter because I recognized something galling: I am not surprised. Somehow, deep down, some part of me had always known. Ness Jonohl had never quite fit, never quite felt right.

I’m back to two out of three names.

“Jen?” Carth prompted again, and I realized I was still staring at the red-skinned Twi’lek Master who was now moving toward us slowly. His face was a composed mask.

“Yes, I’m okay.” I whispered, looking over to Carth with a shaky smile. The concern was all too evident in his eyes.

“What’s wrong? Are you- we can go back in the ‘Hawk if you need to, Jen.” Carth frowned. “This meeting can wait.”

I glanced back to the Jedi Master, who was less than ten metres away, now. Carth’s support was nice, but I didn’t believe this Jedi would allow me to walk away, and there wasn’t any real point in it, either. He knew my real name. He knew my origins. It was long past time to find them out myself.

I could feel the wariness of the others behind me, and pasted a smile on my face. “It’s fine, Carth. I just – I’ve met this guy before. Just felt a bit off-balance, that’s all.” I touched his hand briefly, and then stepped forward to meet the Twi’lek.

“Welcome to Kashyyyk, Jen Sahara,” the Twi’lek said in fluent Basic. What was his name? I’d heard it in the fragmented memory, but already it eluded my grasp. His dark purple eyes moved past me to view my companions. They widened, slightly, in a startlement that was likely unusual for a Jedi Master. I bit back a smirk, realizing that an extra three Sithkids would hardly have been anticipated by the Order.

“Thanks,” I told him shortly. “You’re not Vrook Lamar. I was of the understanding that he was the one we were going to meet.”

The Twi’lek inclined his head, another flicker of surprise betraying in his indigo gaze. “I am Jedi Master Zhar Lestin. Master Vrook and Master Quatra await us in the Wookiee village of Rwookrrorro.”

_Zhar. Zhar Lestin._ The name was strongly familiar. It seemed to echo in my head. _Hang on. Did he say Quatra?_

Juhani gasped audibly and stepped forward. Dak moved to flank her. “Quatra,” she mumbled softly. “I did not… well. I did not expect that.”

“You don’t have to come, Juhani.” I said, turning to face her head on.

“Yes, I do,” she countered in a tone that was both soft and firm. A sad smile played along her lips, and she gazed at me fondly. “It will be alright, Jen. I must face Master Quatra one day, and I would rather meet this challenge now.”

Zhar cleared his throat. “Do not see it as a challenge, Padawan. Your Master has been most grieved for you.”

“She is no longer my master, Master Zhar.” The words were solid and resolute, and not at all bitter. Juhani sounded more calm and sure of herself than ever. “And while I thank you for the title of Padawan, perhaps that is a bit premature at this stage.”

I snorted. “I don’t know anyone who walks in the Light more strongly than you, Juhani. If you’re not worthy of the Jedi, then the galaxy makes no frelling sense.”

“Perhaps this conversation can be concluded once we have moved to Rwookrrorro,” Zhar intervened. He was frowning, looking past us to the _Ebon Hawk._ “Where is Bastila Shan? I do not sense her nearby.”

It was difficult to reply, and the heavy pause caused his gaze to meet mine again. Understanding was followed swiftly by grief and despair. “Oh no,” he whispered.

“She was captured on Korriban by Kylah Aramai.”

“Kylah Aramai,” he said blankly. His dark purple eyes blinked once, twice. “Jedi Knight Kylah Aramai?”

“I think you might have to change her title,” I remarked somewhat tartly. “Surely you’ve heard who led the Dark Jedi attack in Ahto City?”

Zhar shook his head briefly. “Oh, Vrook,” he murmured softly, and I wondered what this Vrook Lamar was like, to have mentored someone like Bastila Shan. It was hard to get past her aloofness and prissiness, but we’d been getting there. She’d been becoming a friend. I felt tears prick at the back of my eyes, and gritted my teeth.

“We have to get her back,” I muttered. “She’s got a neural disruptor on, but she’s skivvied her way out of one before on Taris when those Vulkar idiots forgot to restrain her hands. Either way, I’ll know the instant it’s loose.”

Zhar had composed himself, and his attention was once more fixed on me. It briefly darted to Carth, who was standing closer than necessary on my other side. I stiffened, and remembered Bastila’s reaction when she’d suspected something – before I had even understood my own desires – and my eyes narrowed as they remained on the affable Jedi Master.

“Are you entirely sure it was Kylah Aramai?” Zhar asked quietly. “Our intelligence tells us she died onboard the Endar Spire.”

The indignation flared in my belly. “Let me,” Carth murmured. I rolled my eyes, and conceded the conversation over to him. He shot me a wry half-grin before facing Zhar. “I am Captain Carth Onasi, Master Jedi, and I met Kylah Aramai enough times on the Endar Spire to recognize her when she led the assault on the Republic Embassy in Ahto City. My report to my superiors have mentioned her involvement, so I’m surprised you haven’t heard about it.”

Zhar frowned. “The information sharing between the Order and the Republic has waned in recent weeks, Captain. However, this is dire news indeed. This is not something we foresaw.”

I bit back a snort, barely. Seemed like there was a lot of things the Jedi failed to foresee. “I met Kylah on the Spire, too,” I said flatly. “I recognized her on Manaan, before she ran. I saw the effects of her handiwork.”

There was a flicker of some emotion on the composed Twi’lek’s face – I saw it, before it disappeared. I wonder if he had known Karon… he must have known Karon. Karon… who had been my Master. Zhar was still staring steadily at me, as if taking my measure.

“Anyway,” I continued, “Kylah happened to be on Korriban when we landed. She snuck in and stole Bastila while we were out hunting the Star Map. We…” I trailed off, squeezing my eyes shut. There was still that blank space in my head, like a sense that had been cut off. An invisible wall between us that I could not breach.

She was still alive, though. I’d feel her death. Considering how intertwined our connections were to the Force, I had the unnerving feeling that her death would be debilitating.

And then… something changed. The wall blurred… morphed into a hazy fog that was clouded with distance. Bastila? There was no response. The barrier- no, the barrier was still there, but it felt different, somehow. Less perfect, maybe less impenetrable. I pushed out, tentative at first. Bastila?

“Let us all retire to Rwookrrorro,” Zhar said again, his voice gentling. “This is not a safe place for conversation.”

“There is one thing first,” Juhani spoke up, her voice low and intense. “We have a casualty on board. I could not leave her body on Korriban, and would like to bury her on Kashyyyk.” Dak reached out to grasp her hand, a solemn look of support on his face. “Jedi Knight Belaya Linn.”

There was a slight noise as Zhar took in an unexpected intake of air. His eyes widened again as he surveyed Juhani. She returned his gaze without flinching. “Belaya Linn,” he murmured. “I am grieved, indeed, to hear of this.” His gaze slid to Dak. “If you wish to bring her body now to Rwookrrorro, then we shall find a way down to the Shadowlands. It is not how the Wookiees recognize death, but I am sure we can accommodate something. Please, let us depart this Czerka establishment and move to a more secure location.”

xXx

Zhar led us out of the starport efficiently, and onto vast wooden ramps that spanned between the gigantic trees. The foliage was thicker, here, with the odd spindly branch growing crookedly over the path. Gnats and flies buzzed around us, and the caw of some avian species was prevalent in our hearing.

Beneath the ramp, the depths of Kashyykk dimmed to a murky blackness. It was a giant, over-sized world, and I’d probably have remained somewhat awed if I wasn’t otherwise occupied.

Bastila? Was I imagining things? Surely, if the neural disruptor had been removed, she’d answer me. But the barrier between us no longer had the clinical, absolute edges that sliced through one’s connection to the Force. It felt, instead, like a clouded shield was blocking me from reaching her.

Zhar was silent as we walked along. The others spoke softly behind us, but my mind was solely occupied by my bond sister. Beyond the starport were small Czerka stalls and wicker buildings lashed against the side of the massive trunks. Zhar skirted away from all of these, and our path was relatively quiet. There was a mild wind rustling through the trees, bringing with it a wild astringent smell that might have been the sap of the wroshyrs.

“It is not far to Rwookrrorro,” Zhar said quietly from my side. I shot him a tight smile, and wondered what he was thinking. The serenity of his expression gave nothing away. “The Wookiees have rented out rooms to us on the edge of their township, provided we do not stray into Rwookrrorro. They do not trust outsiders, so I urge you to advise your companions accordingly.”

“Fair enough,” I acknowledged. “Crossing a Wookiee isn’t a good idea at the best of times.”

“I understand one of your crew is a Wookiee, Jen Sahara. I am surprised he is not accompanying you.” It was a question, a gentle inquiry for information, and I immediately stiffened in mistrust.

“He’s happy on the ship,” I said shortly. I wasn’t planning on giving Zaalbar’s past away, but surely the names of our crew pre-Korriban had filtered through to the Jedi. Surely Zhar Lestin or Vrook Lamar would have looked up the name Zaalbar in Rwookrrorro.

Wookiees do not speak of madclaws.

It was a whisper from the back of my mind, from the voice of Ness. No, from the voice of Street Kid. I gritted my teeth, and looked away.

Carth had increased his pace to catch up with me, shooting me a supporting smile. “I knew the trees were big here, but this was beyond my expectations,” he murmured. “Dustil’s pretty awed.”

“Yeah,” I agreed. The ramp ahead split into three directions, and Zhar took the smaller one leading off to the left. We lapsed into an uneasy silence, and I had the uncanny feeling that Carth was searching for something encouraging to say. I remained quiet, frowning, once more reaching out into the obscurity of the Force bond that connected me to Bastila. Something had changed. I was becoming certain of it.

A fence made of lashed wooden poles came into view around a bend, and further past that I saw a massive Wookiee-made wall that ran between multiple wroshyr trees. Small wooden towers oversaw the obstruction in numerous places, and Wookiees manning them were visible with bowcasters or blaster rifles in hand. The howls of Shyriiwook were noticeable as we strode closer - the background noise of a decent sized village.

One-room buildings were present along the edges of the township, beyond the smaller gate but on our side of the massive wall that seemed to mark Rwookrrorro’s territory. They were for visitors, then, or outsiders – those not trusted to enter the encampment proper.

Zhar turned to address the group. “I have a room in the outer reaches of Rwookrrorro where I shall take you all, before I go to retrieve Master Quatra and Master Vrook. Do not leave this area without one of us. The Wookiees are not known for their patience.”

There was a spark of fear, sharp and sudden through the bond, taking me by surprise. I flinched. Bastila! I demanded. Stars, Bastila, can you hear me?

She had to hear that. She was there, I could almost feel her. Why wasn’t she answering?

Zhar walked forward to address a Wookiee that was guarding the entrance into the lesser defended barricade on the edge of the township.

“Dustil!” Carth cried out suddenly. “Where is he?”

As his words registered, I spun around, my gaze searching our group as I flung the Force wildly to sense my surroundings. There was no dead patch anywhere nearby. Kath crap! Where the frell has he gone?

And then, stabbing through the bond, came another wave of acrid, uncontrolled fear.

“I can’t sense him,” I muttered to Carth, my thoughts reeling and torn in two directions. “He’s not here.”

Carth closed his eyes, looking both anxious and exasperated. “He’s gone back to the ship,” he said quietly. “We spoke of the Jedi last night – he didn’t-” Carth sighed. “He’s not very happy with the idea of the Order, but I thought he’d agreed. Now, I’m thinking he was just trying to stop the conversation.”

I smiled tightly, but my concentration had moved inward. The bond had turned silent; the desperate emotions had abruptly ceased. Bastila is trying to control herself, I guessed. She’s trying not to draw my attention. Why the frell was she ignoring me? “Go,” I said softly. “Find your son. I’ll be fine.”

Carth’s expression tightened as his gaze locked on mine. His chestnut brown hair was falling into his eyes again. I tapped the Ebon Hawk’s communicator affixed on my wrist, and he glanced down before the side of his mouth curved in a half-smile.

“I’ll be in touch,” he murmured. “Stay safe, Jen.”

I shot him an absent smile, but my mind was still on the bond. Better that Carth focus on his son before he learn about any developments on the Bastila front. “Don’t annoy any Wookiees,” I returned.
He looked like he wished to say more, but I gave him a brief nod of farewell before turning to the others. I heard his steps fade away behind us, and turned as Juhani touched me gently on the shoulder.

“I was not paying attention to Dustil,” Juhani said. She looked mildly abashed. “I did not see him leave.”

“Don’t feel bad. He’s an ace at sneaking around,” I said, aware my voice was short. In a snap decision, I lunged mentally, attempting to force my very psyche through the bond. Bastila had done that, had ridden with me in my own mind more than once on Korriban. But my concentration frayed and dissolved as it barrelled through the hazy esoteric nature of our bond. Bit by bit, my focus was chipped away until I was swung back into my own mind.

My muscles were tensing, my fists clenching.

“Jen?” Juhani prompted, her slanted eyes narrowing.

“It’s Bastila,” I muttered. Her eyes widened. “Something’s changed, dammit, and I don’t know what. Let’s get to this place of Zhar’s, first, and I’ll explain more.” I swung back around to stride after Zhar, who was murmuring something to a Wookiee even taller than Zaalbar.

“(Your people may not leave your designated outbuilding,)” the Wookiee growled. “(And Chuundar, long may he reign, shall be informed of their names and backgrounds at once.)”

Chuundar? That wasn’t the name I was expecting. A surge of panic snatched my attention once more, burgeoning in strength. Dammit, Bastila, answer me!

“Of course,” Zhar was murmuring as I neared. “I will escort them there right away.”

Terror slammed into my head, then, uncontrolled and overwhelming.

And the agony that followed encompassed everything else.

xXx
The trees were crazy on this planet, like someone had shot them full of growth stims en masse over centuries. They must be ancient. In places, the outer crust of bark had been stripped away or eroded due to time. I could see the dried edges of the bark. In some places, that alone looked like it was more than a metre thick.

Funny, to think this was only the third planet I’d ever been on. It was so different to Telos or Korriban. Even the smell in the air was weird; pungent and moist, like the entire place was smothered in fungi-moss. Still, it was better than the sulphuric stink of Korriban. And the Force here felt wild and strong – without that twist to it that had become as familiar as a dagger in the back.

I retraced my steps to the freighter, walking fast, holding tight onto the Force weaves that obscured my presence. I’d kept a close eye on our path before, mentally taking note of each turn that frakking robe had chosen as we’d all followed him like meek bantha to the slaughter.

It’d been easy, to slip away from Dad once he moved to speak to Jen Sahara. Kel avoided looking at me most of the time, and Dak and the Cathar were otherwise occupied with that wrapped up corpse they were carrying. I wasn’t going to meet those damn Jedi and turn into one of them. I’d said as much to Dad last night, but like usual, he hadn’t listened. Some things hadn’t changed, even after all these years.

..."

“I want you to go with Dak and Kel,” Dad said, his face serious as we sat quietly in the central room of the Ebon Hawk. I’d waited until the others had cleared out before entering. Even now, I hadn’t fancied running into Mission Vao. Jen Sahara had still been there when I’d entered, but she shot me a wry look and vanished in the direction of the cockpit. Guess she knew Dad was about to grill me. “To the Jedi Master, I mean.”

“I’m not going to be a frakking Jedi,” I shot back, scowling. This wasn’t the first time I’d said it.

He sighed. “I’m not asking you to join the Order, Dustil, but I don’t think the Force is something you can run from.”

“You don’t know anything about the Force, Dad.”

“Maybe not,” he conceded. “But I’m learning. Look, Dustil, the truth of it is that I want you somewhere safe. I don’t know where I’ll be going until I check in with my superiors – and while I’d like to believe I can stay on Kashyyyk for an extended period of time, I get the feeling we’ll be headed straight towards the Sith after this.”

My eyes narrowed. “So, are you gonna tell me what’s going on? Why aren’t you on the frontlines?”
He looked away, his face tightening. Like always, keeping secrets. He’d told me they’d been on a classified mission commanded by the Jedi Order, but that didn’t make any sense. Dad had been a Wing Commander, last time I checked, not a frakking scout or spy.

He’d said his posting to the Endar Spire – the big cruiser that’d been betrayed and shot up over Taris – was as an advisory one to the navi-pilots, and circumstance more than anything else had thrown him together with Bastila Shan and Jen Sahara. Since when did Dad take advisory positions? I’d been away for four years, though, so things might have changed, but...

...he’d been cagey about Jen Sahara, too. She had to be a pretty powerful Jedi, yet I’d never heard of her. And we got pretty familiar with the names of important Jedi at the Sith Academy.

At the close of it, he still wouldn’t budge on details - on what they were actually after.

“What we’re doing could change the course of the war, Dustil,” Dad said at long last. “But it’s dangerous. I want to know you’re somewhere safe.”

“So I’ll head back to Telos,” I snapped, my shoulders tightening in annoyance. I’d heard a large space station had been set up in orbit around our ruined planet, whose atmosphere had acidified to the point where no life was currently viable. The full extent of the devastation had only become apparent weeks after the plasma had settled. I hadn’t understood the depth of my homeworld’s ruin, not until I’d been months on Korriban. “I’m sure I can hang around on Citadel Station until you’ve finished with your war.”

“It’s not my war, Dustil, it’s everyone’s,” Dad returned, his voice flat and terse. “And I don’t have lodgings on Citadel Station. There’s nothing there for you – it’s better if the Jedi look after you until this is all over.”

I could feel the scowl growing on my face. “I don’t want to go with the damn Jedi, Dad. And if you’re happy enough to take a Twi’lek girl along with you, then why the frakk can’t I come?”

Dad sighed, his eyes closing briefly. “We won’t be bringing Mission with us, not if we’re heading into Sith territory. I don’t – Look, I haven’t worked out where Mission will go, but I won’t let Jen take her into certain death. Dustil, I’m not sure where I’m headed yet. But it can’t hurt to at least meet that Jedi Master and see what he has to say.”

“Fine,” I bit out, fed up and annoyed. I stood abruptly, pushing away my uneaten dinner. It tasted like the mush the Academy had offered over the years. Synthesizer crap was probably the same anywhere in the galaxy. Artificial flavourings never really hid the paste-like consistency.

“Dustil,” Dad said, as I began to move away. His voice had a pleading note in it. “We’ll work it out, okay? The Jedi are not anything to be scared of.”

I gave him a short nod and moved away. I’m not meeting any damn Jedi, no matter what he thinks. But sometimes, it simply wasn’t worth arguing with him.

...

I slipped into the starport, unseen by the uniformed Czerka staff who manned the area. Unlike the incompetents that milled throughout Dreshdae, these guys were armoured and equipped with varying weapons. Czerka Corp branched out all through the galaxy, or so I’d heard, but here on Kashyyyk they looked more like a military force than an intergalactic retail conglomerate.

I drew in a breath as the Ebon Hawk rose in front of me. I had another reason for heading back. My own cowardice had been gnawing at me - my inability to front up and say one simple word. Sorry.
I didn’t doubt that it’d get thrown back in my face – but from what I knew of Mission Vao, she deserved that word.

Why don’t you try facing up to her and apologizing? Jen Sahara’s advice kept coming back to haunt me in my head, and yet I’d found it so hard to do what she suggested. I could still see my dagger tracing along the back of Mission’s neck, and the hateful words spewing from my mouth and destroying the camaraderie we’d just founded.

I dropped my grasp on the Force and knocked loudly on the closed hatch. A minute later, it opened and the Wookiee stood in the entrance. His arms were folded and he was glaring.

I’d never met a Wookiee before this one, and now I was on a planet full of them. They were smarter than I’d realized. I’d always thought of them as no more than primitive muscle who could barely communicate, but I was beginning to realize how completely wrong, even potentially xenophobic, I’d been.

I swallowed. “Hi. I wanted to, uh, to say sorry. To Mission, I mean.”

He howled something incomprehensible, and didn’t move. His black eyes stared down at me from an impressive height, and I shifted uneasily.

“Look, I frakked up badly on Korriban,” I muttered. “I realize that. I just want to make sure she knows I realize that, too.”

"Let the Sithkid in, Zaalbar," a gravelly voice said from behind me. I turned to spot the Mandalorian, who was eyeballing me derisively. A harassed Czerka bureaucrat holding a datapad stood in his shadow, failing miserably to get his attention. "He's Onasi's son. You ain't got nothing to worry 'bout him."

The Wookiee huffed, stepping to the side and allowing me access. It was galling, to be so easily dismissed by that ugly merc. I didn’t get his comment. Was he calling me weak because of Dad, or too nice to try anything?

Why is a Mandalorian with Dad? Dad had told me a bit about Taris, the mad adventure to rescue Bastila Shan and sneak off-world before the Sith could capture them. He and Jen had picked up Ordo, the Wookiee, and Mission along the way. But Dad hadn’t explained exactly why Ordo was still with them. If they're on a super-secret quest for the Republic or the Jedi or whoever he's reporting to, then how the frakk can they trust a Mandalorian?

I felt my mouth twist, and clambered up the loading ramp. It didn’t matter. I was here to apologize, and I was damn well going to do it before my courage ran out like juma juice in a spacer’s bar.

The Wookiee was dogging my heels, and I supposed I couldn’t blame him. Dad told me Zaalbar was best friends with Mission, and they’d been looking out for each other for years in the Lower City of Taris – which sounded like living on the streets. Mekel would get along with Mission. Mekel would know what to say. Mekel had always been better with words than me.

I wondered where my friend was, and if he’d truly forgiven me for Selene. I should have trusted him. I wished I had.

I heard music as I wandered into the Ebon Hawk, the thrumming bass of a rock song that was unfamiliar but had the catchy beat of popular music. And as I turned into the garage, the sight I saw was more carefree and jubilant than anything I’d seen in my life ever.

Mission and that astromech droid were twirling around dancing – as much as a three-foot high utility droid could. The droid stopped mid-spin at my entrance, beeping in protest, but Mission didn’t hear. Her hands were raised as her body swayed to the beat, and her high voice echoed the chorus words of the song blasting from the ship’s speakers.

My mouth dried as I took in her lithe figure that was clad in a tight tunic, leaving little to the imagination. Her lekku hung loosely down her back as she stretched her arms skyward. I wondered, suddenly, just how old she was.

The Wookiee howled from behind me, and Mission spun around, lekku flying. Her light brown eyes widened in alarm as they fixed on me.

“You!” she cried in surprise. Her cheeks flushed angrily, darkening the blue skin to purple. She folded her arms and glared. “What d’ya want, chuba-face?” she snapped.

The tense knot of uneasy shame sat heavy in my stomach. “I- uh, I-”

“Aren’t you meant to be with the others?” she cut in. The droid wheeled behind her and switched the music off. The silence was a jarring contrast to the earlier happy beat.

“Well, yeah, but-”

Her gaze slid past me. “Why’d ya let this jerk in, Big Z?” Her mouth twisted in a scowl. “He should be off with his daddy.”

“You think some half-baked apology makes up for what you did?” she spluttered. “Far out, you threatened to kill me, you- you- yellow-bellied slug-brained Gamorrean pig-man!”

“I know! Look, I don’t expect you to forgive me, alright? I just wanted you to know that I wish I could take it back, that…” I broke from her angry gaze, dropping my face. My face was hot. “You kept talking about leaving Korriban and there being a better way… and it just didn’t seem possible. Talk like that – it gets people killed, back there.” My voice had dropped to a near-whisper, and I heard the footsteps of the Wookiee wander away from behind me. Maybe he’d decided I was too pathetic to be a threat. “You seemed nice. Real nice. There were worse students in the Academy than me that might’ve come across you, y’know. I thought if I scared you enough, then maybe you wouldn’t leave your ship again.”

“I can take care of myself,” she snapped, her voice tart. “And I don’t let anyone stop me going where I want.”

I looked up; she was still scowling at me, but I thought she looked a little less fierce. Or maybe that was just wishful thinking. Her face had paled back to its natural blue, smooth and youthful and flawless. “Fair enough,” I mumbled. “As long as you know that I regret it. I- I’ll leave you, now.”

I turned, and walked out of the freighter’s garage, not entirely sure of my destination.

“Are you heading back to the others?” Mission called out, her voice peaking with cautious interest. I halted, staring blindly down the corridor to the exit hatch.

“No,” I answered. “I’m not interested in meeting the Jedi. Thought I’d go have a look around the Czerka shops.”
I heard footsteps as she walked closer. “Why don’t you want to go with that Jedi Master?” The curiosity was obvious, now, as she questioned me further.

I didn’t want to answer… but then, it almost sounded like Mission was giving me another chance. There was a small kernel of hope inside my belly, slowly growing, and I realized her good opinion meant something to me. “I’m sick of people telling me what to do,” I muttered. “I didn’t have a choice about going to Korriban. I’m not going to be forced into anything again.”

Mum had mistrusted the Jedi. She’d been fierce about not wanting me to even talk to them. Interfering bigots that ruin lives, I remember her saying once, in a voice laced with acid. Normally Mum was a happy, forgiving sort, but not when it came to the Order. Her dislike of them ran far, far deeper than Dad’s – who just vaguely mistrusted them - and Mum never explained why. I didn’t think Dad even knew she had a problem with the Jedi.

“I guess I get that,” Mission said from behind me. I turned, then, to face her once more. She was staring at me with a frown, as if trying to work me out. “Does Carth know you came back?”

"No." I shrugged uncomfortably. "He won't be happy. So I may as well have a look around this place before I face up to the music."

The corner of her mouth twitched, before it blossomed into a pretty smile. “Want some company?”

In surprise, I found myself smiling back at her.

“Yeah,” I said, and felt a flush of warmth as her eyes sparkled at me.

xXx

I didn’t spot the Mandalorian as we left, and Mission was pretty keen to avoid the Wookiee, too. I had the feeling she was used to sneaking around. She shot me an impish grin as we locked the exit hatch behind us.

“Big Z will yell at me later,” she commented, her voice off-hand and light, as we wandered into the bustling starport. “An’ I don’t really wanna leave him alone for too long. So this should only be a quick look around, yeah?”

“I’m surprised you trust me enough to come with me,” I said, and immediately wished the words back. Mission stopped walking, staring at me with wide, serious eyes.

“You did a rotten thing to me. But,” she continued, “I believe in second chances. And you are Carth’s son.”

“So everyone keeps saying,” I muttered.

She frowned, and a touch of belligerence crept into her face. “What’s your beef with your dad? He’s a good guy, y’know. I woulda thought you’d be happy he came an’ took you away from that rotten place.”

I could feel my shoulders hunch defensively. “It’s complicated. I don’t want to talk about it. Look, let’s get going.” I glanced around – I could only see Czerka staff nearby, but it wouldn’t be long before Dad came back for me. I’d get an earful, sure – and I’d rather put that off as long as possible.

I strode away from Mission, towards the stairs leading out of the landing pad. There were similar sized pads – both empty - on either side of the Ebon Hawk. Even more dotted around the gigantic tree that braced the control tower.

There were no footsteps behind me, and I could feel Mission’s gaze boring into my back. Maybe, after that exchange, she’d decided I wasn’t worth the bother. But I didn’t want to talk to anyone about my father – especially not a pretty girl near my own age.

Just when I thought she wasn’t coming, the sound of running footsteps caught my ear.

“You should chill out a bit, y’know,” Mission said, as she caught up to me. “I reckon you take everything too seriously.”

We sidled past a pair of uninterested Czerka guards and down the stairwell that curved around the wroshyr tree as it descended. At the bottom, it spilled out into a large courtyard that was winched tight against the neighbouring trees, much the same as the docking bay.

The construction of the Czerka outpost was completely different to the Wookiee ramps and lashed village buildings. Permacrete and metal versus natural materials. It was a jarring contrast.

"And you don’t take things seriously enough," I returned at last, unable to stop the corner of my mouth from twitching. "I mean, you did go for a wander - by yourself - on a Sith planet."

I didn’t know if the reminder would just piss her off again, but she just grinned back at me. “I’ve been on my own since I was a kid. And as for Korriban- well, I just kinda figured all the Dark Jedi would be at the Academy.”

I stared at her in disbelief. “Okay, one: you are a kid. And two: really? What, you really thought none of them would ever visit the town that was no more than a short walk away?”

It was the wrong frakking thing to say. I knew it as the damn words spilled out of my mouth, and yet I didn’t have the smarts to stop them. Mission’s face darkened in a thunderous scowl, her light eyes spitting sparks at me. But she was so frustratingly naïve. And while it was endearing, to a point, it was also dangerous – considering the little I knew of Dad’s quest. He wasn’t exactly bringing her to the safest of places.

“I’m sorry,” I muttered, looking away and feeling as awkward as frakk. “I didn’t- I don’t want to fight. Sorry. Look, can we just forget I said that?”

I stared blindly at a nearby wroshyr tree, barely registering a cloud of mites as they lazily circled around me before moving away. The uncomfortable silence needled after awhile, and I chanced a glance back to her. She was still glaring at me.

“Kid,” Mission groused. “What are you, like twenty years old or something?”

“I’m sixteen,” I told her, crossing my arms. “What are you, like twelve or something?”

“I’m almost sixteen,” Mission claimed, tossing her head and turning away. “So if I’m a kid, then that pretty much makes you one as well.” And with that she started walking – away from me, away from the starport, and towards the various Czerka stalls that opened up into a marketplace of sorts on the other side of the courtyard.

I couldn't stop a grin as Mission walked away. She was… certainly interesting, and I was pretty glad to hear we were the same age, more or less. I didn't let her go far before I chased after her. She shot me a look I couldn't quite decipher as we neared the first stall – manned by a Czerka-clad Ithorian leaning over a table laden with small plasticeel boxes. They all held disposable hypodermis in varying quantities.
I leaned closer to read the labels, and realized they were all stimulants. The Ithorian gave us a disinterested grunt. Probably thinks we’re too young to have a decent amount of creds. Mission wrinkled her nose and we both turned away to canvas the area.

It was a sterile sort of place. I remembered the colourful weekly markets I’d attended on Telos when we’d lived out in the country. Even the capital city, Thani, held bright retail displays of hawkers and vendors out in force each fifth-day. I could recall the smell more than anything – different roasted foodstuffs or fried delicacies that were always the highlight of the outing.

To the right I spotted a stall selling wrapped protein bars. It wasn’t the same.

“Sheesh,” Mission complained. “This place looks boring. I wonder who they’re even selling to.”

“Mercenaries,” I said slowly. The sentients wandering through the stalls all had a combat-ready look to them, those that weren’t overtly grasping blaster rifles. They looked a lot more like mercs than traders or tourists. It seemed everyone on Kashyyyk wandered around openly armed. There weren’t any Wookiees, I noticed. They had a reputation for keeping to themselves, and clearly had no interest in mingling with off-worlders.

Mission bore a slightly surprised look on her face as we moved deeper into the marketplace. “What would mercs be doing on Kashyyyk?”

I shrugged. “I dunno, but all of these stalls are geared towards them. Look – armour, supplies, weapons… this is a pop-up trading post just for them.”

We quietened as we neared a couple of Rodians speaking to a stall-owner in halting Basic.

“Sector D4H is infested with katarn,” one was stuttering, his large eyes gazing fixedly on the sent manning the stall. “But there is also a lot of tach, which means a lot of credits.”

“If this poison can wipe out the katarn in an area,” the other added, “then we can process the tach. We are talking large profits here, Gem, for us all.”

"Not mercs," Mission hissed. "Hunters. Czerka-hired scum." She spat the last words out, and I saw her fists clench into tight balls at her sides. Her angry gaze snapped back to meet mine, before she whirled on the spot and strode off blindly, deeper into the marketplace. I blinked, momentarily surprised at her sudden getaway.

“Mission – wait!” I called, running after her through the crowd. “What’s going on? What’s got you so upset?”

Mercs or hunters – I honestly didn’t see the frakking difference. Half the time mercs were hunters. The only thing to differentiate between them was that mercs got paid to do a job, while hunters found their payment from their kill.

Mission had a mulish look on her face as I caught up. She glanced at me sideways, and I saw a touch of sadness in her eyes. She huffed. “Look, it’s just that this is Big Z’s homeworld, alright? And Czerka’s here to strip it of resources and make as many grubby credits as they can.”

“Sure,” I said slowly, not really sure at all. “But that’s what they do, right? That’s what any business does.”

“But this is Kashyyyk!” she burst out. There were small spots of red on her cheeks. “This ain’t what the Wookiees want for their planet. They live together with the plants and animals, they don’t go around killing things for money!”
I frowned. “So why don’t they stop Czerka then?”

She deflated at my words, staring at me mutely for a second before answering. “I dunno,” she said sadly. “But I get the feeling it’s worse now than when Big Z left.”

I wondered why he was still back on the Ebon Hawk, and not out here on his homeworld. Why would he hide out, rather than walk outside on his homeworld again?

“Well, Czerka’s pretty entrenched in this place.” I glanced backwards; the imposing control tower was still visible, with the large docking bays above casting shadows over the small marketplace. Further afield, I could see another control tower with the same arrangement of landing pads around it. “I can’t see them leaving Kashyyyk any time soon.”

We walked in silence for a little longer, eyeing over the stalls we passed, but not getting close enough to attract attention from any seller. The Ithorian earlier had ignored us because of our appearance rather than age, I realized. Mission and I both wore loose clothing and lacked any sort of armour or weaponry. We looked like add-ons from a spacer’s planet-side trip, rather than hunters about to comb the depths of Kashyyyk. It was the hunters they were interested in selling to, the hunters that their stock was aimed at.

The market ended sooner that I thought, near the edge of the permacrete platform that didn’t even have a railing to advertise the fatal drop below. I made sure to stay a good metre away, and saw Mission staring at me. She had that curious look again.

“How long were you on Korriban for?” she asked, her voice high with interest.

“Four years,” I said, feeling my shoulders bunch uncomfortably. The first two years hadn’t been all bad, but everything had derailed after that. Now – I was away from there, and that was good – but I hated feeling so frakking directionless and uncertain. And I hated talking about it. “How long were you on Taris?”

“My whole life, I guess,” she replied, shrugging. She seemed so easy and carefree, and I envied her equanimity. “My good-for-nothing brother used to say he smuggled us to Taris in the cargo hold of a freighter, but he always liked to make up wild stories, y’know? I don’t remember anything but Taris from when I was young.”

I didn’t know Mission had a brother. I wanted to ask, but a cloud crossed her face as she spoke of him. I had the feeling it was a sensitive topic - and I didn’t want to piss her off. Again. “Why’d you follow Dad off Taris? I mean, he told me how Zaalbar swore his life to Jen, but you were with a swoop gang, right? Why didn’t you stay?”

Near us, a wooden path led away from the suspended marketplace to another permacrete foundation that held a handful more stalls. The air was warm and humid, and Mission was still staring at me, like I was some sort of puzzle to solve. Black leather bands wrapped around her headtails in a decorative fashion, and her brown eyes were wide and guileless.

“I guess I followed Big Z,” she said slowly. “He’s my best friend. I mean, the Beks woulda looked after me, and I feel bad I never had a chance to tell them where I was going…” she trailed off. “They probably think I died in the Sith bombing. Those that are still alive, anyway. I wish I coulda let them know I survived.”

“Regrets suck,” I muttered. “I wish I’d never blamed Mekel for- for- well, uh, it’s not important now, but I wish I’d trusted him.”
“Mekel – that’s your cute friend, right?” Mission asked, and I tensed. Mekel was three years older than me, and Selene once said he was the best looking sent on Korriban. I wasn’t sure if she’d been teasing or not, but I’d always been worried he’d make a move on her. “He told me to give you another chance.”

I blinked, startled, and my eyes shot back to hers. Mekel spoke to Mission? The only time that could have been was just after I’d first entered the Ebon Hawk. When Mission had recognized me and screamed at me, and Dad had forced me inside.

“Mekel’s a better friend than I deserve, I think,” I said slowly.

Mission grinned, and nudged me. “Let’s go check out those last few stalls, and then we’d better head back, okay?”

She began to walk onto the short wooden path that connected the courtyards, and I couldn’t help but smile at her back before following. “Who do you think will yell the loudest?” I commented, as we closed in on the remaining stalls. “Your Wookiee or my dad?”

But Mission had stopped ahead of me with an audible gasp. As I stepped to her side, I could see her eyes had narrowed and her skin had paled.

“That can’t be what I think it is,” she whispered, and I followed her gaze to the furthest stall. It was next to a half-dozen cages.

All of them held at least one large, hair-covered, shackled sentient.

“Slavery,” I muttered, my mouth twisting.

“No way, that’s not right!” Mission seethed. “Wookiees hate slavery! I mean, it’s totally against their way of life! They’d never ship any of their people off to be slaves!”

“Maybe it’s just their criminals?” I guessed with a shrug. “I mean, that’s the normal practice isn’t it? Sell the bad guys off?”

Mission shot me a look of scathing disbelief. “What utter tripe. D’ya really think that’s why so many Twi’leks are slaves?”

“Uh, no.” I flushed in embarrassment. That hadn’t occurred to me. Dancing girls and joyboys were often born into that life, or so Mekel had told me once.

She shook her head, still scowling with anger. “Wookiees exile their criminals. They don’t sell them. Or at least, they didn’t,” she muttered, and resumed walking. Her gaze stayed fixed on the cages, but I glanced furtively around, trying to get a sense of our surroundings. There were less hunters here, and only a few remaining stalls. The slaver wandering in front of the cages stared at us in derision as we neared the first cage.

Chrome restraints were immediately obvious on all of the Wookiees’ paws, locking them together in the front. All but one of the slaves were hunched in a seating position. Mission strode directly to the standing Wookiee, who was taller and darker-haired than Zaalbar. He had an older look to him, even if I couldn’t pinpoint exactly why.

Mission folded her arms and stared up at the Wookiee. His black eyes were fixed on her, but they looked desolate and dull.

“How come a Wookiee is a slave on Kashyyyk?” she demanded.
He didn’t answer, but the slaver did. “Hey! No talking to the merchandise,” the Human grumbled as he stalked over. “I don’t want any of them things upset. Get away, unless you have the creds to buy one.”

Mission’s eyes flashed in annoyance. “It ain’t a crime to talk, is it?”

My stomach tensed as a belligerent scowl twisted on the older man’s face. I made a split-second decision, and pulled lightly on the Force before speaking.

“She means no harm,” I said, feeling my words drop heavily in the pungent air. “She is only talking, and will be gone soon. You do not need to be concerned.”

The Human snorted. “Well, I guess if you’re only talking then I don’t need to be worried.” He spun on his heel and walked away.

Mission was looking at me in suspicion, and I felt my shoulders hunch.

“I’m not sure I like it when you lot do that,” she said quietly. “I mean, sure – it’s handy, but it kinda feels like you can make people do anything you want. And that’s a bit scary in the wrong hands.”

I shook my head. “No, that was just a simple mind trick, Mission. It worked on him because he’s bored and not interested in you, anyway. If he thought you were any sort of threat then I wouldn’t have been good enough.” It’d been a favourite game on Korriban, to trick free drinks from the cantina’s staff. Mekel had been good at it. “As for getting sents to do anything you want- well, that’s compulsion. Only really powerful masters are good enough for that sort of thing.”

“Poor Big Z,” Mission whispered, looking down briefly. I wondered what she meant, but she’d already turned back to the caged Wookiee. I hoped he could understand Basic.

“Why are there Wookiee slaves?” Mission asked again, and the Wookiee huffed but didn’t reply. Mission frowned. “My best friend is from Rwookrorro. He said his people never enslaved each other, that slavery was one of the worst things in the galaxy.”

The Wookiee howled at that, a long incomprehensible answer that had Mission nodding.

“But why?” she answered. “I mean, why weren’t you exiled instead?”

I glanced back over to the slaver, who was scowling at us again while Mission kept talking. The mind-trick wouldn’t last long, I realized in dismay. He looked ready to come back over and yell at us again.

“Hundreds?” Mission squeaked. “But- but that’s awful! Big Z won’t stand for this!” The Wookiee grunted, and Mission shook her head. “No, his real name’s Zaalbar, he never wanted to leave-”

She was cut off by a more ferocious howl, and I was distracted by a heavy hand clapping on my shoulder.

“You kids are in trouble,” a gravelly voice said. It sounded amused.

Mission was still firing rapid questions at the captive, the slaver was now striding towards us with a thunderous glower, and I turned to see bloody Ordo staring at me with a shark-ugly grin on his “Time to head back before your Dad gets his jockeys in a twist,” the Mandalorian commented, dropping his hand and looking over to Mission. “Oy, Mission! Get your scrawny blue butt over here!”

“Canderous!” Mission cried, turning around and stepping towards him. “These ronto-turds are enslaving Wookiees!”

Ordo lifted one heavyset brow in bored inquiry, before heading back through the marketplace with Mission in tow, who was still exclaiming at him. I followed silently in their wake. It was obvious Mission was upset by the slaves, but she held such a rosy, unrealistic view of the galaxy - she didn't really understand that rotten things like slavery were standard practice on any planet. Sometimes I thought it would have been better if no one had ever evolved beyond meaningless grunting.

I was more worried about Dad. I wasn't going back to that frakking Jedi, but I didn't really want to have a screaming row, either.

“Czerka are shipping hundreds of them off-world, Canderous,” Mission spluttered. “That ain’t right. These guys in the cages are just the old ones they’re selling as curiosities. It’s sick!”

“It’s slavery, kid,” Ordo grunted. “It’s the same galaxy-wide.”

“Not on Kashyyyk, you old geezer,” Mission fumed, and I glanced at Ordo in startlement but he merely shot her an amused grin. Somehow, I didn’t think I’d get the same reaction if I dared called him that. “Czerka is rotten to the core. Someone needs to stop them.”

The humour slid from the Mandalorian’s face like chocha pudding as introspection took its place. “Huh. Czerka don’t usually dabble in slavery, they’d be stepping on the toes of the Exchange and the littler syndicates if they did.” His granite eyes gained a thoughtful gleam as he stared ahead. “I wonder if they’re trying to branch out. Czerka Corp and the Exchange have been at loggerheads recently.”

“I don’t give a mynock’s tail about that,” Mission snapped tartly. “I gotta talk to Big Z. His evil brother has kicked his dad down to the Shadowlands.”

I blinked, and Canderous stopped walking, turning to face Mission with narrowed eyes. “His brother must be someone important, then.” Mission didn’t reply, but the mulish pout on her face was answer enough. The Mandalorian smirked. “The Shadowlands, huh? I can’t see Zaalbar staying on the Ebon Hawk if that’s true.”

“It’s true,” Mission muttered. “As true as the hundred or so Wookiees imprisoned in a Czerka freighter on docking bay F4.”

Ordo’s brows shot up, and mine did the same. He laughed; a short, harsh sound. “Let’s go talk to your Wookiee then. I have a feeling our life is about to get a whole lot more interesting.”

xXx
Revan sat on the floor, hands wrapped around her knees, her eyes closed and her face shiny with sweat. Master Zhar had been shielding her, but it was obvious that pain was still bleeding out to her through the bond.

Bastila is being tortured.

Kel and Dak did not understand. The former wore an anxious expression, appearing ill at ease as he leaned back against the wicker-lashed wall of Master Zhar’s humble dwelling. Dak glanced between me and Revan suspiciously, his dark eyes narrowing with questions I did not think he would hold back for much longer.

I had not explained any of it to Dak. Not the Star Maps, not the mind-link between Bastila and Revan, and certainly nothing about Revan’s mind or background or true identity.

It had taken us all by surprise; Revan collapsing on the wooden path, clutching at her head as an agonized scream rent from her lungs. Master Zhar had been quick to materialize next to her, but it had taken him some time to truly assist, and even longer to move us all to his lodgings.

I dearly wished I could have aided her, but my talents had always been with the more physical aspects of the Force. I would not have known where to start.

“If you can hold that barrier in place then it will provide a buffer against emotions that intense.” Master Zhar was crouching in front of her, red-skinned hands resting gently on her knees.

“Emotions,” Revan scoffed, her eyes still squeezed shut. “I should be able to help. I should be able to push back through the bond rather than hiding behind a shield like a frelling coward.” There was a pained frown on her face, which was still unnaturally pale.

“Travelling through a mind-link in that manner is dangerous,” Master Zhar cautioned. “And it also requires the power and discipline of a Jedi who has truly mastered the psychic side of the Force.”

“Bastila did it on Korriban. Twice,” Revan bit out, her voice bordering on acidic. I saw Master Zhar’s eyes widen slightly. He did not expect that, despite Bastila’s keen knowledge and experience. I knew little of mind-links, but I was aware that the strength of theirs was considered well beyond unusual. Even telepathy - at the vast distance they could utilize it - was not overly common.

Revan’s eyes blinked open then, green and burning with fierce emotion as she pinned Master Zhar with a look. “I’ve done it once before, too. I saw through Bastila’s eyes when she was on Manaan and I was heading off-world. Mind you, I’d just taken some spice and had no idea what I was doing…”

A visible tremor twitched through Master Zhar’s face, and now he appeared somewhere between shocked and appalled as he leaned back from Revan. Dak made a coughing noise, and I, too, felt... the heat of surprise. I must find out more about bonds, for Revan’s sake. This sort of ability cannot be normal. Although, really, had Revan ever been labelled normal?

“Hallucinogenics or any form of pleasure drug can be dangerous for normal sentients, Jen Sahara. It is far more treacherous for Force users.” Master Zhar wore a disapproving frown; an expression I had not seen on him before, even in the time I had known him on Dantooine. “With the power that we Jedi wield, knowingly imbibing any substance that can erode self-control goes beyond reckless and deep into irresponsible.”

I glanced back to Revan; her face was etched with a thunderous scowl as she glowered at the Jedi Master. “Good thing I’m only a scholar from a backwater planet, right Master Jedi?”

I stifled a gasp at the vitriol laced in her words, all too aware of the shaky ground this conversation was heading onto. Revan knew something, she suspected something, and I wished she had confided in me. The intonation of her angry words implied a strong disbelief in Jen Sahara’s identity, something I had already known but had feared to raise in conversation.

I had promised myself that I would not lie to her, but I had also promised Bastila I would not divulge details without prompting. So I did not initiate the topic, and neither had Revan.

What must she be thinking? How can she trust anyone, if she believes all that she knows is a lie? I wished, now, that I had said something – at the least, so she would understand my loyalty to her was absolute. But I worried, too, for the state of her mind when she finally understood the whole of it. The mental fractures she bore had been evident since I had first encountered her.

“This is a conversation for later,” Master Zhar murmured, his face gentling in concern. “Although, please believe me when I say that I mean you no harm.” He sighed, and briefly touched her knee again. “You must refrain from reaching through your mind-link in that manner. It can strengthen your Force connection with Bastila, but it also creates a dependency that deepens with every contact. Not only can it become difficult to pull back into one’s body, but bond-mates with that level of Force intimacy do not always survive each other’s death.”

The anger fled from Revan’s face as she stared at Zhar in growing alarm. I felt my mouth open in surprise, and wondered whether Bastila knew of this. She must. This is her area of expertise. Yet she had knowingly reached out when Revan was trapped by Jorak Uln. And Revan had said that was not the only time.

“I must collect Master Vrook and Master Quatra,” Zhar said in a quiet voice, rising to his feet. “I shall not be long. Please, do not leave these lodgings.”

The Twi’lek master exited silently. The door was made of many fine branches, lashed together by a type of flax twine that was likely a plant native to Kashyyyk. I imagined the temperature on this planet must stay relatively ambient, for these buildings could not be easy to heat.

An awkward quiet settled on us all. Revan closed her eyes once more, obviously uninterested in any form of conversation. Dak stared at me, a thousand questions on his dark-skinned Human face. He opened his mouth more than once, as if uncertain what to ask. Finally, after several long minutes, he turned an irritated scowl on Revan.

“So, Jen.” Dak’s voice had Revan acknowledging him with a flat stare. “You’re Force-bonded to Bastila Shan. That’s… how did that happen?”

Revan’s mouth twisted. “She saved my life, once. I understand that’s how it was created, but I don’t have any memory of it… or much else, really.”
I struggled to keep the surprise from my face. I’d not had any chance to speak to Bastila, not since we landed on Korriban. She must have said something to Revan, something more than the web of half-truths she had grudgingly parted with on Tatooine. It could not have been easy for Bastila, though. Revan was not exactly co-operating then. I remembered that conversation. I remembered Revan’s state of mind. I had not known her true identity, then.

“Huh,” Dak said, his voice non-committal. “Still, Bastila Shan. What’s that like?”

“Jen,” I rebuked, and she turned to shoot me a dry look. I sighed softly. “How is Bastila?”

“Unconscious,” she bit out, her face tightening. “Don’t ask me for more details, Juhani, because all I can tell you was that she was being hurt. A lot.”

The uncomfortable silence stretched out again, although it was not long before a gentle knock on the door preceded the return of Master Zhar. Following in his wake was my old master.

I scrambled to my feet, nervousness trembling like flutter-gnats in my stomach. Quatra looked the same as always, tall and imposing, clad in brown robes with the hood thrown back from her horn-lined head. But there was an openness to her expression I had never seen, a concerned grief that sharpened as her olive-green eyes landed on me.

“Juhani,” she sighed, and strode into the room before embracing me. I blinked, feeling stiff and awkward in her grasp, my gaze meeting Revan’s over my old master’s shoulder. Her eyes, a similar shade to Quatra’s, darkened with suspicion as she glared at the Jedi’s back.

Quatra pulled back, and I tried to firm my tremulous smile. There were words I had to say to my old master, and I would hold on to the strength needed to utter them. I could not go back to the way things were once before.

“Padawan,” she murmured. “It warms my heart to see you again.”

“Master Quatra,” I returned. “It is good to see you too.”

I wondered if she picked up on something in my intonation, for her brown Zabrakian skin darkened, and her gaze slid from mine to rest on Dak. Her expression stilled.

“Dak Vesser,” she acknowledged. Her voice had cooled to a forced neutrality. “Welcome back.”

Dak had once resented the hold my old master held over me, and disliked her because of it. She would have been aware of his opinion, as Dak had never been adept at concealing his emotions. Whilst Quatra, in return, had no patience for those who struggled to exhibit the composure and level-headedness expected of a Jedi.

I could only hope that Dak’s second chance with the Jedi would not be affected by his interactions with her.

Dak gave her a perfunctory nod of greeting, and Quatra glanced at Kel before turning a look my way that was half-order. Her lips thinned. “Perhaps you would be so kind as to introduce me to your other companion, Padawan.”

The frosty manner was so familiar it made my heart ache. “This is Kel Algwinn, Master Quatra,” I answered, striving to keep my voice level. “He was a student at the Sith Academy on Korriban, and wishes to join the Jedi.”

Master Quatra recognized him with a minute nod of the head, before turning to face Master Zhar. I noticed she did not acknowledge Revan at all. She knows, I thought with a chill. Revan may not have been trained on Dantooine, but Bastila - her bond-sister, her captor, her rescuer - had. Likely every master from my old Enclave knew exactly who Jen Sahara was.

“Vrook is waiting in the hall,” Quatra told Zhar. “Vandar will be landing within the hour, if he is not here already. Let us all move there now.”

_Master Vandar._ I did not realize he was coming here. Vandar and Vrook together were the heart of the Dantooine Council. Their power and authority was not to be taken lightly. I felt a shiver of foreboding and the hairs on my neck stood up. My gaze slid to Revan. The mistrust was blatant on her face.

“Jen Sahara and I will follow shortly,” Master Zhar said in a mild voice. I glanced over to him, but the Twi’lek looked as calm and composed as ever. “Go and acquaint the others with Vrook. We will not be long.”

There was obvious disapproval on Quatra’s face, but Zhar’s authority must have outranked hers. They were equals, from what I knew – both masters, yet not Council members - however Quatra conceded under his resoluteness, and motioned to the rest of us. “Come with me.” Her voice was terse and commanding, and she swept out of the room expecting us to follow.

Kel did. Dak shot me a look before I waved him onward, turning back to face Zhar.

“A word please, Master Zhar,” I said, motioning outside. Revan frowned at me, obviously puzzled.

“It is fine,” I told her softly, hoping the words were not a lie. “I shall see you soon, Jen.” The suspicion in her gaze cut to my heart, and I could only hope none of it was directed at me. What must she be thinking? How much does she know? I wondered if she recalled anything of the holo-recording in the Korriban Archives. I feared for her sanity. My eyes slid to Zhar, and my thoughts turned to the three other masters on Kashyyyk.

I feared for her safety, also.

Master Zhar followed me silently outside of the humble room. I could see Quatra further down a wooden ramp that led toward more Wookiee lodgings. She was staring at us impatiently, with Kel and Dak in her shadow. Even at this distance, the disapproval on her face was evident. Kel and Dak stood behind her.

“Speak, Padawan,” Zhar urged, his voice quiet yet insistent. The others were out of earshot, but my old master looked ready to stride back to me and hurry me along forcibly, if required. Zhar, in contrast, appeared relaxed and unruffled, his stance casual and his lekku looped casually around his neck. And yet he must be anything but. “Master Quatra will not wait for long.”

“Swear to me on the Code that you will not harm her.” My voice came out in a hiss that surprised me, low and fierce with emotion. “Swear to me that you will not do anything further to her mind. I shall not leave her side unless you do so.”

Master Zhar’s mouth opened slightly, and at first he appeared at a loss for words. Then, to my surprise, the smallest of smiles emerged. It grew into a genuine expression of delight. “Your loyalty does you credit, Juhani,” he said at last. “And I vow, upon the Jedi Code and the will of the Force, that I shall do my utmost to return Revan to the Light, without resorting to any form of mental manipulation.”

Revan. The name out in the open now. “You are going to tell her?” I asked.

Master Zhar nodded. “There are others who do not approve.” His gaze flickered, ever so briefly, to my old master. “If you happen to engage Vrook and Quatra in lengthy conversation it would aid me. I do not desire any interruption.”

My eyes widened as I understood his meaning. Vrook. Vandar. Quatra. Do they mean to do something to Revan? Do they mean to erase her returning memory? They could not, surely they could not – after all that had happened and how far she had come-

Master Zhar did not break my horrified gaze. His indigo eyes stared solemnly at me, conveying a silent message I was not sure I understood.

I did not know Zhar well, but he had transferred to Dantooine a year or so before I had left. He was widely regarded as a kind and gentle master, who had failed terribly with his padawan.

Malak Devari. Revan’s lover and closest ally, once.

I wanted to tell Zhar, then, about Revan’s reaction to the holo-recording she had seen of herself, and the fractures I knew were in her mind – but I heard the impatient footsteps of Master Quatra close in on us. Our time was up. Master Zhar gifted me a benevolent smile.

“We are all glad of your return, Padawan,” he murmured. “I shall see you again soon.”

I nodded, turned, and walked back to my old master’s side.

xXx

The room Master Quatra led us to was larger than Master Zhar’s lodgings, and overwhelmingly bare. I understood why she referred to it as a hall. Master Vrook sat on a bench against the side of the room, his sharp eyes landing on me as I entered.

His face was lined with raw grief. Master Zhar must have imparted the news to him.

“Where’s Zhar?” he demanded, looking to the door behind us.

“Zhar is talking with Jen Sahara. He won’t be long,” Quatra answered. The disapproval cooled her voice, which had twisted on the false name. Vrook grunted irritably, and stood. I wondered if he meant to leave, meant to go to Zhar.

“Master Vrook,” I hailed, steeling my courage and walking toward him. I gave him a short bow of acknowledgment.

His gaze fell on me again. I had kept to myself on Dantooine, and did not often have dealings with masters other than Quatra. But I was as aware of Vrook’s reputation as I had been of Zhar’s – Vrook was known to be cantankerous and difficult to please, irritable with any failings, and held exceptionally high standards. Dak had once described him as an ornery, masculine version of Quatra, which I had not appreciated at the time. Upon reflection, I could now acknowledge some similarities.

I had lived on Dantooine for years, in the same building as Master Vrook. Surely I could find a topic of conversation to delay him somewhat.
The thought was nerve-wracking and bordered on seditious. But I knew, now, that the masters were divided on Revan - and Zhar had essentially requested my aid on her behalf. There was a hard knot of unease in my stomach.

“I’ll be honest, Padawan,” Vrook was saying. “I didn’t expect to see you again.”

I took that one on the chin. If I had not encountered Revan, I did not know what my fate would have become either. “I did not plan to return, Master. But I confess myself glad beyond words that Jen Sahara found me.” Vrook’s face tightened at that, and I could see real anger simmering in the depths of his dark eyes. I softened my voice. “Both Jen and Bastila have aided me significantly during our journey.”

Vrook looked away.

“I understand you were on Tatooine, Padawan,” Quatra intervened, walking to my side. Her voice remained impassive, and her expression was guarded. I wondered if she regretted showing any emotion earlier. “We have been told that Jen Sahara returned you to the Light. How is that… how did that happen?”

I breathed in through my nostrils. I could remember the dusty smell of the Tatooine Dune Sea, the never-ending heat, and the solitude I had craved only to find it did not ease the burning grief and anger. “I happened upon her and two of our crewmates. I did not take kindly to sentients chancing upon me, particularly not ones with Force sensitivity. So I attacked.”

The silence with thick with anticipation. I chanced a look at Dak, whose eyes were fixed intently on mine, wide and curious.

“I almost killed her. She… she was struggling with what little she could recall of the Force. But she prevailed, in the end, and granted me mercy despite my baiting.” I did not plan on expounding the details here – Revan may not have cut me down, but it had been a near thing. If I had faced her away from Mission or Zaalbar, I suspected the end would have been different.

We had both been close to killing each other, that day.

I cleared my throat. “She spoke some truths that made me look at my actions in a different light… that made me realize perhaps all was not lost. And then she took me to Bastila, who cemented those realizations.”

Quatra sent Vrook a loaded look, before turning her attention back to me. “Well. I imagine there is much to reflect on, Padawan.” She paused. “My shuttle is already loaded and ready to leave this planet. You and your companions from Korriban must make haste to farewell the others you travelled with, and then we shall depart for Coruscant.”

My stomach clenched. I had expected this, but her presumption still galled, a little. It should not. She sees herself as my master, which she was for many years. “Has the Star Map been found?”

Quatra’s lips pursed, and she fired another glance at Vrook. “That is no longer your concern, Padawan.”

“I opened the Star Map on Manaan,” I returned, pleased to hear my voice solid and steady. “I was there for the Map on Tatooine. I have been with Bastila and Jen for long enough now that this is just as much my quest as theirs.”

A noise akin to a growl came from Master Vrook. “If that’s true, then why didn’t you follow the directive on Manaan?” he accused, his voice dark with simmering anger. “The Ebon Hawk was ordered to travel to Kashyyyk, and I’ve heard how injured Bastila was from Hrakert Station. She was in no state to ensure orders were being followed. I know exactly whose crackpot idea it would’ve been to travel to Korriban!”

I blinked, momentarily taken aback. “We found the Star Map, Master Vrook,” I reminded him.

“You lost Bastila Shan!” he hollered back. His voice echoed through the long room. “If that cursed Jen Sahara had only gone to Kashyyyk, then Bastila would be here right now, instead of in the hands of Darth Malak!”

He had a right to his grief and his anger, and I reminded myself that Vrook had only just learned of Bastila’s capture. But I could not let Revan take the blame for this. “Jen did everything right on Korriban,” I argued. “We could not have prevailed without her. We have the Star Map. The Sith Academy is leaderless and in ruins, because of her. She rescued Belaya—”

Vrook snorted, cutting in over me. “And yet, if what Zhar told me is true, Belaya Linn is still dead.”

I winced.

“Hey, hey,” Dak muttered, walking to my side. He grasped my hand and gave it a quick squeeze. “Belaya’s death is the fault of Uthar Wynn, and no one else. Certainly not Jen Sahara. Look, I don’t get what’s going on between you all, but from my viewpoint it was obvious that Jen was pivotal to the success of your mission. Shavit, even Yuthura Ban has a chance for a better life now!”

I felt my jaw clench in resolution. “If we had gone to Kashyyyk first, do you really believe Darth Malak would have left Korriban unguarded?” I whispered. I did not wish to be confrontational, but Revan’s strategy had made sound sense. “Our one chance to infiltrate the Sith Academy was then, when everyone believed we were on our way here.”

“Your logic would have the Sith here on Kashyyyk, waiting for you, while you were on Korriban. Why then, Padawan, are they not here?” Vrook scoffed, his brows knitting in renewed anger. “Bastila would not have agreed. And yet, you still let Jen Sahara lead you? With you both against, and knowing who she is?”

There was a sick feeling in my gut, and I could only hope that Dak would not question me on...
Vrook’s words later. “We held a vote,” I said, forcing my voice to remain neutral.

“A vote?” Quatra injected. She sounded incredulous. “What, like a democracy?”

“Democracy,” Vrook repeated. His voice was flat with disbelief. “An Order-led mission allowed their next objective to be decided by a vote of hands? You can’t mean… surely not from completely uninterested parties like your Mandalorian mercenary?”

I took a deep breath in before answering. “We have all worked together, Master Vrook. We are all part of the same team. And every single member of the Ebon Hawk has proved invaluable to our success – Mandalorian mercenaries included.” I did not drop my gaze from his angry one. “Bastila would not have escaped Taris were it not for Canderous Ordo. Or Jen Sahara.”

Quatra sighed irritably. “Enough. I do not wish to stay on this planet any longer, Vrook. The Sith will have heard about Korriban, and their eye will turn to Kashyyyk.” Her green eyes frowned at me. “Move your belongings to my ship now, and organize your farewells.”

“We have a body to bury first,” Dak cut in. “We must find a resting place for Belaya.”

“What?” Vrook snapped. “You’ve brought her corpse here?”

Master Zhar had not told him everything, it seemed. Belaya’s body rested back in the corner of Zhar’s room - I did not think Quatra had noticed it when she entered.

I took in another gulp of air. “We could not leave her behind,” I said quietly. “Not in that place.”

“She is the reason I am here, the reason I came back,” Dak added. He shot me a supportive glance. “Her and Juhani.”

Vrook grunted. “Sentimental and pointless. Belaya Linn is one with the Force, no matter what happens to her body.”

I stiffened, and he raised a brow as if daring me to object. My displeasure was likely apparent. And while there may have been some sense to his words, I had not been able to leave her body out in the open of a desecrated Sith Academy. Belaya deserved a better resting place, and an acknowledgment of her life.

“Nevertheless,” I said finally. “It is done, now, and so we need to do something with her body.”

Vrook didn’t answer, but just remained staring at me fixedly. There was a slight loosening of the frown that creased his face, an almost infinitesimal nod.

“I am not interested in delays,” Quatra grumbled. “There is nothing to be served with some meaningless ritual that we cannot know if Belaya Linn even desired.”

Vrook harrumphed. “Closure has its place for all sentients, Quatra.” His eyes rested briefly on Dak before returning to me. “Fortunately, the Wookiees in Rwookrrorro are more easily bought than they once were. A quick trip down to the Shadowlands to bury and pay homage to Knight Belaya Linn will take no more than an afternoon, and won’t cost me many more credits than I’ve already thrown at Chuundar.”

An annoyed sound whistled from Quatra. “Fine. You organize it, Vrook. Juhani, Dak, Kel, come with me to the starport. We shall organize your farewells now.”

“Master,” I interrupted. The flutter-gnats in my stomach were a swarm, now. Quatra turned a fierce look on me. “I shall not be going with you, Master Quatra.”

There was a flicker of emotion that tightened her expression, before her eyes narrowed with what I believed was disappointment. I had the old instinct to please her, to bend to her will - desires that ran deep enough that I felt the shame of them. For no one else would I humble myself so, and I should not for her. I am stronger than this. Master Quatra may be a wise Jedi, but that does not mean she knows my path. The blind adoration I once felt for her is nothing more than the foolish desires of a girl who did not understand true love. I lifted my chin. I have outgrown this.

“Padawan,” she said icily. “Do not be preposterous. We will speak of your failed trials at another time. For now you shall do as I say.”

“Master Quatra,” I said softly. This had nothing to do with my trials, not really, even as I understood why she might think so. “I admire and respect you, but you are no longer my master. I stand on my own, now, and I follow the mission of the Ebon Hawk.”

Again, there was a visible tremor in Quatra’s face, and this time I recognized it. Hurt. No matter her cold manner, I could recognize that she cared for me on some level. The observation soothed the pain of the past; at least, a little.

“You are angling for an apology,” Quatra accused, and her voice had turned bitter. “I expected the outcome of your trials even less than you did, Padawan, but you forget your place. You are a padawan of the Jedi Order, and I am your master!”

“You mistake my motivations, Master Quatra,” I answered. This time, I would not let my emotions derail. This time, I would speak my thoughts in a calm and detached manner. My confidence grew as I held her furious gaze. “This has nothing to do with my trials, nor do I blame you in any part for them. But I do not believe I am the right padawan for you.”

Revan had once said Quatra was the wrong master for me. Perhaps she was correct. Quatra’s expression didn’t budge, and I sighed. “It is more than that, though. I am part of this mission, whether you or Master Vrook like it or not. Too often have you told me about the will of the Force, about destiny, about there being no such thing as coincidence… well, I do not believe it was chance that crossed my path with Jen Sahara’s. My place is with her mission until it is over.”

“Her mission?” Vrook interjected, his voice low and dangerous.

“Padawans do not decide where they go, Juhani.” Quatra’s voice had lost the anger, now. In fact, it seemed flat and overly neutral as her gaze pinned mine. I could not tell what she was thinking. “If you insist on staying with the crew of the Ebon Hawk, then you cannot be counted as a padawan of the Order any longer.”

Vrook snorted. “And Jen Sahara may very well never leave Kashyyyk. You and the Ebon Hawk may find yourselves grounded here while others finish what Bastila started.”

My eyes closed, and I felt a sinking feeling in my chest. I had feared this. I had known Quatra would insist on my leaving with her, and had understood what might eventuate from rebellion against that. Expulsion from the Order. And Vrook was implying… what, exactly? That the Order or the Republic would send other forces against whatever the Star Maps led to, and leave the Ebon Hawk behind?

It might make sense. We were only a freighter with a handful of sentients on board. But it still did not change my decision. I would stand by Revan. And if Vrook meant anything more sinister… if Zhar was correct with his implied suspicions… then I would do my utmost to help stop it.
Despite all of that, I did not think Revan’s destiny was to stay on Kashyyyk.

My eyes opened, and both Vrook and Quatra were staring at me now with inscrutable expressions. I took in a deep breath. “My place is with the Ebon Hawk and her crew,” I repeated quietly. “Whether we stay on Kashyyyk, or rescue Bastila, or go after Malak himself. My place is there. And if that means the Order no longer has a place for me…” my voice trailed off, and I felt the sting of tears at the back of my eyes. I blinked fiercely, and thumped a closed fist against my heart. “I will still be a Jedi in here. I will still hold myself to the ideals of the Jedi Order, even if I cannot name myself as a member.”

The silence in the room was complete. I kept my gaze level on Quatra’s. There was a softening around her eyes, after awhile. It took me a moment to interpret it.

Approval.

“I do believe the Order shall always have a place for you.” A faint smile curved her dark lips. “Jedi Knight Juhani.”

I blinked. I did not understand her words, at first.

A throat cleared from behind us, and in hobbled the short figure of Master Vandar. His bright blue eyes were trained on me. “Listening to this conversation, I have been,” he said. “Spoken like a Jedi Knight, Juhani has.”

There was a buzzing in my ears.

“I do not know what to say,” I stuttered. “I am not sure you are correct in your assessment, Masters.” I could feel the blood rushing to my face. “In truth, it was not that long ago I was lost on Tatooine. And then, I barely held it together on Hrakert Station. I…I…” My gaze slid to Dak, who was grinning at me. “I almost believed the lies of a Sith Master, and struck down an old friend.”

Dak’s expression turned solemn. “But you stopped at the crucial moment, Juhani, still believing in my guilt. And look, I told you I didn’t blame you. I don’t. I knew Uthar Wynn and his machinations all too well.”

Quatra cleared her throat. “My old padawan, we are not judging you on your past failures. We are measuring you on what you are today. While I think it foolhardy and wasteful for you to dedicate yourself to that ragtag crew Bastila Shan has assembled, I can sense your determination. You have grown from the padawan you once were.” She smiled. “I don’t believe there is more I can teach you.”

“Strong with you, the Force is,” Master Vandar added. He rubbed a three-fingered hand over his wrinkled shoulder. “Steady and resolute.”

“It seems your time away from Dantooine has done the opposite of what we all feared,” Vrook added, his voice gruff but not unkind. “I see a Jedi Knight in front of me, not a damaged padawan.”

This… this was more than I could have dreamed of. This felt like more than I deserved. But Quatra, Vrook and Vandar were all gazing at me with varying degrees of recognition, like they truly believed I was worthy of this honour.

I felt a nudge, and turned to see Dak smirking at me. “Close your mouth, Juhani.”

I felt the spark of conviction as it flickered to life within me. I could be worthy of this honour. I would be.
“Thank you,” I said softly, bowing my head. There was no great ritual to one's ascension as a Jedi Knight, merely the acceptance of at least three masters. Usually after the completion of the Knight Trials. Perhaps, in a sense, the last year had been an extension of mine.

“I still wish to hurry,” Quatra said, her voice turning matter-of-fact. “Let us get this burial over and done with.”

“We’ll be parting ways, Juhani,” Dak muttered. I glanced at him, startled. “It’s alright,” he added, the corner of his mouth rising in a half-smile. “I think so, anyway. I’ll go back with Quatra, find my own way for a bit.”

“Are you… are you sure, Dak?” I asked. These last few weeks in hyperspace had made me realize that Dak was, truly, a good friend. And yet, once, he’d desired more. More than I had to give. And he still struggles with the past. The Order would be a better place for him than our mission. But, selfishly, I did not want to see the back of my old friend.

“Yeah.” There was a calm acceptance on his face. “It feels right. I need to go back to basics if I’m to honour Belaya’s request. And someone’s gotta keep Kel out of trouble.” We both glanced back at the quiet young man, who was edged against the wall of the room, plainly uncomfortable and overlooked during the conversation. What he must have thought of it I could not tell.

There was an obvious look of consternation on Kel’s face, and Dak snickered. “That was a joke, Kel.”

Master Quatra sniffed irritably, and Dak nudged me again. There was a fond smile on his face. “Come on. Before we split, we have a friend to mourn.”

xXx
The Twi’lek master didn’t speak to Juhani long; a minute, maybe, before he quietly let himself back in, while staring at me with that measuring, intent look on his damned familiar face.

I’d known him well, once. The fleeting recollection that had sparked to life when I’d disembarked the ‘Hawk suggested a strong acquaintance – one, I believed, that transcended a standard relationship between a padawan and a master who was not their own.

I’d gone on training missions with him, and there’d been an easy camaraderie between us – between us and the other man who’d been, I was beginning to think, central to my previous life.

Zhar could tell me about him, I realized in sudden surprise. I glanced at the Jedi sideways; the specifics of the memory had faded, but I was left with the strong belief that I’d trusted Zhar. I certainly hadn’t felt threatened by him – not then.

And I wanted to know what Juhani said to him. It’s probably about Belaya or Quatra. It might have nothing to do with me. But I’d been wading in secrets for months and, now that I felt like I was getting close to answers, I was torn between shaking them out of people or turning tail once again.

More than anything, I was deeply uneasy.

And then there was Bastila. Unconscious, likely having passed out from pain – which meant that she probably would be revived soon. And Zhar wanted me to hide behind a shield, away from her.

Bond-mates with that level of intimacy do not always survive each other’s death.

Could that be true? Surely Bastila would have stayed out of my head, if that was the case. But it would have meant my certain death, against Jorak. And certain exposure, against Uthar. Maybe she’d felt like she didn’t have a choice – but then, she would have said something to me about the dangers, wouldn’t she?

Unless she didn’t know? But Bastila Shan was supposed to be an expert in the matters of psychic Force powers. And yet... and yet, she was also just a padawan. And everyone keeps saying mind-links are unusual – ones the strength of ours even more so. Maybe the knowledge and understanding of them is just as unknown?

I sighed irritably at my own thoughts. I’d talk to her once she came to, at the least. I needed answers. And if there was something I could do-

“Jen,” Zhar interrupted my thoughts, his voice soft and calm. “We need to head down to the Shadowlands.”

I blinked. “The Shadowlands,” I echoed in disbelief. I could feel my eyebrows rise. “Is this before or after we dance a jerryjig with the Wookiee chieftain?”
Zhar seemed remarkably unruffled by my sass. A benign smile sat on his faded red face. “We have not yet found the final Star Map, Jen Sahara. With Bastila’s capture, your presence on Korriban will already be known. It will not be long before Darth Malak moves against Kashyyyk.”

I felt the air hiss out of my lungs in disappointment. “You don’t have the Map?” I groaned, closing my eyes. “Stars, we’d been counting on that. Do you have any leads?”

“The Shadowlands,” he repeated. “Vrook sensed a Force-user down there, someone we believe is an old friend of mine. He may be able to help.”

I felt the corners of my mouth turn down. Everything kept coming back to these damn Maps and whatever they led to. But the Shadowlands weren’t the sort of place to go to unprepared, or with the wrong people.

“Canderous,” I muttered to myself. “HK, if he’s fixed. Maybe Carth. Definitely Juhani.” I looked back to Zhar, who was now frowning. “We can be ready to go first thing tomorrow.”

“We must go now, Jen Sahara. You and I alone.”

The edginess was back, stabbing me with uncertainty, and I drew on the Force in reaction. I could feel Zhar’s aura, calm and peaceful and yet he wanted to drag me – just me – out into the wilderness. Maybe I’d trusted him once, but I wasn’t sure if I should now.

Zhar stared at me unblinkingly.

“What about the other masters?” I asked, my voice dropping an octave or two.

He hesitated, and I knew he was measuring his words carefully. I felt the mistrust grow, and clenched my teeth. Damnit. All I knew about this particular master was the tatty remnants of a faded memory.

Master Vrook - somewhere nearby on this planet - was Bastila’s master. Would he be more trustworthy? Would he be safer? Why wasn’t he here, demanding details of Bastila?

And that led me straight back to thoughts of my bond-sister again.

Bastila had been blocking me earlier. I was sure of it now. Once the agony had engulfed her, she’d lost control and it’d slammed through our open bond like a tidal wave. Zhar had shielded me and shown me how to replicate it – but I was not confident how well it would work.

I needed to talk to her. About so many things.

“There is much I wish to speak of, Jen Sahara. And not all of us are in agreement about the best way forward.”

My muscles clenched as the words registered. I could feel my face heat with a blend of anger and fear. He means that some of them might want to… to…

I would not be Jen Sahara again. Not for anything. But if they feared that Darth Revan would once more take over my mind, then maybe they felt the end justified the means. What’s a little mind-raping when balanced with the galactic devastation she has caused?

Not much. Unless it was your mind.

“And how do I know I can I trust you?” I bit out.
Zhar did not break my gaze. “I mean you no harm, Jen Sahara. I only wish to tell you the truth. The whole truth. And that is a subject best approached away from any possible interruptions.” Through the Force I could feel his sincerity, but emotions could be faked.

The truth. The whole truth. Oh, that was tempting beyond measure. But to wander out into the wilderness with no allies or backup was foolhardy. Reckless-Tempting.

I didn’t answer, and his composure didn’t slip at all. He seemed to realize I was struggling for a decision, as he spoke again. “I swear it upon the Jedi Code, Jen Sahara. I swear it upon the Force itself. I am your ally, and I will not harm you in any way.”

I wanted to believe him, to trust him, to follow him. And if he was genuine, then the need for haste was truly there. Quatra had not even acknowledged my presence when she’d arrived. I could have been a damn wicker chair for all the attention she paid me. Bastila had trusted and respected Master Vrook, but what did that even mean to me? Vrook might blame me for her capture. After all, Korriban had been my idea.

And then there was the arrival of a third master that Quatra had mentioned, this Vandar. Juhani had looked worried when her old master dropped his name. That made three additional masters, other than Zhar. When it came to answers – and, potentially, my own safety – did it make more sense to disappear in the company of just one, who my previous self had trusted?

Or go to three, one of whom Bastila trusted? And while Vandar was an unknown, I already had a poor opinion of Quatra – who was rigid and cold enough that she’d use a padawan’s feelings against them to test their mettle, rather than show any real empathy.

If Zhar is lying, or planning anything against me, it’s possible I might have a chance against him. If I stay on my guard. Three masters, on the other hand, was a whole other skillet of scalefish.

“Okay,” I assented, as I stood from my place on the floor. Once the decision was made, I felt a slight loosening of my shoulders. I had a way forward, and it felt right. I stared at him unflinchingly. “Let’s go. What do we need?”

xXx

The Wookiees in Rwookrrorro had just one elevator down to the Shadowlands. I found that odd, at first, until I remembered the Shadowlands were held sacred by the Wookiees. Access was strictly controlled by the chieftain, usually for the purposes of either exile or coming-of-age rituals. And yet, Zaalbar had uncovered a plot – six years ago, give or take – to harvest tach from the bowels of the wroshyr forest. How could an operation like that be implemented under the noses of the Wookiees?

The elevator itself was just within the large barricade that marked Rwookrrorro proper. The armed Wookiees guarding the entrance eyeballed me with dark, suspicious eyes; but allowed us entrance after a few quiet words from Zhar. One of them escorted us to the lift, where another two stood waiting. They both held bowcasters in ready grasps.

The Wookiees all had a wary, almost angry, look about them. I knew they weren’t predisposed towards outsiders, but I didn’t think the tension in the air had anything to do with our presence. The number of Wookiees overtly gripping weaponry was excessive for what was, in reality, a modest township. Rwookrrorro might be considered large by Kashyyyk standards, but galactically speaking it was a blip.
The demeanour of the Wookiees spoke of undercurrents that I did not understand. Zaalbar was reticent by nature, and I believed it to be a common characteristic of his species. But it went beyond that. The Wookiees were on edge, as if preparing for an internal threat or political schism.

Their leader. Just before Bastila’s agony had flooded through the bond - eclipsing thought of all else - I’d heard the name of their leader. Chuundar.

I stiffened in awareness, my thoughts racing, just as Zhar was motioned onto a large wooden basket that was suspended by four pulleys of thick rope. That’s Zaalbar’s corrupt brother. Sithspit, what happened to his father? Zhar turned to look at me, one brow raised in gentle inquiry, as he stood on the elevator and awaited my presence. He radiated a peaceful calm through the Force.

I threw him a tight smile and walked forward.

A dark haired Wookiee grunted, and stepped onto the platform next to us. With a dismissive flick of his paw, the elevator began its slow descent.

The light started to fade as we dropped; infinitesimally at first, but it made me aware of just how dark the bottom would be. Zhar must have picked up on my thoughts, for he gave me a small smile and cleared his throat.

“I have a couple of visors, but it would be easiest for you to remain immersed in the Force,” he said quietly. “I understand the darkness is near absolute in the Shadowlands.”

No problems there – right until Bastila wakes up again. But I gave him a short nod anyway, and my gaze slid back to the silent Wookiee, who stood on the edge of the elevator, staring away from us. Their vision was vastly superior to most sentients. I remembered in the Undercity, Zaalbar had not needed the lowlight sonic visors the rest of us wore.

“How long has Chuundar been chieftain?” I asked abruptly. Our Wookiee guard stiffened, implying some knowledge of Galactic Basic. Zhar’s gaze shifted to him before moving back to me.

“Six months,” he replied, his voice unnaturally curt.

Politics, alright. There’s been some sort of coup, or I’m a Gamorrean’s aunt.

Silence settled back on us, and my gaze slipped to the communicator resting on my wrist. I’d brought nothing with me, bar the two lightsabers on my belt. Zhar had insisted additional supplies weren’t necessary – he’d been packed and ready to go at a moment’s notice, with a large knapsack full of protein bars and whatever additional items he’d deemed necessary.

We might be doing this trip outside of the knowledge of Vrook, but there’s no reason the crew can’t know. I felt like I should trust Zhar, and yet running off blindly with him bespoke a recklessness that could be foolhardy. Well, I’m not going to ask his permission to contact my people.

I tapped on the communicator, and Zhar blinked.

“It’s Jen,” I spoke, when I heard Carth pick the signal up. “Have you found Dustil?”

::Yes, he’s here with me now,:: Carth returned. ::We’re at the ‘Hawk. Are you heading back soon?::

“Not exactly,” I muttered. Zhar’s expression was composed, and he made no move to stop me talking. “I’m going down to the Shadowlands.”
There was a pause, and I entertained myself with the image of Carth’s expression. I felt a vague longing to have him here with me.

::When?:: he asked. ::We’ll need to get kitted up, and decide who’s going to go. You sound like there’s urgen-::

The pause was briefer, this time. ::What?:: he demanded. ::Right now? You’re not serious?::

“I’m on the lift headed down as we speak,” I replied, my mouth twitching. “There’s reasons, Carth – in a nutshell, we’ve got to get our main objective as quickly as possible.”

I heard him sigh over the comm. ::Everything I’ve heard about the place – it’s dangerous down there, Jen. Tell me you’ve got the right equipment. Tell me you at least have some idea where to find what you’re looking for.::

Carth was being as circumspect as I. Wrist-comms weren’t exactly the most secure method of far-range communication, and there were enough people out there who might try to sniff our signal. For my part, I wasn’t sure how much I wanted the Wookiee listening in to understand.

“Zhar has a contact who might help. I’ll stay in touch. You better get Dustil back to the others, if you can.”

::The others?:: he questioned. His voice had shot up with disbelief. ::They’re not with you?::

“The one who met us in the starport is. The others are back in the village,” I answered. I didn’t think Juhani had grabbed a communicator before disembarking. Likely, Carth had no way of reaching them – and possibly no easy way of dragging Dustil past the Wookiee sentries by the visitor lodgings. Carth would have to wait until Juhani returned to the ‘Hawk.

No doubt that would suit his moody offspring just fine.

I hurried to keep talking before Carth could start venting his likely frustration. He’d never done well with me running off, even back on Taris. “Carth, do me a favour and keep an eye on the skies above? It’d be good to have forewarning of any… visitors to Kashyyk.”

There was another brief silence. I imagined Carth was trying hard to contain himself, and I couldn’t stop a small grin as I stared down at the device on my wrist.

::Are you expecting someone?::

“Not exactly,” I replied. “But our departure from our previous location will be known by now.”

If the Sith had half a brain, they’d be sending forces to stop us. Frankly, I was surprised the Jedi hadn’t come across any yet. Kashyyk is a large place. Maybe they are elsewhere on this planet. How do we even know the Star Map is near Rwookrororo? My gaze slid back to the silent Wookiee, and I reminded myself to ask that of Zhar when we were alone. Zaalbar knew nothing of the Star Maps, but I wasn’t inclined to let slip any information that was bound to track back to his mercenary brother through our silent Wookiee escort.

I held onto a fleeting hope that Zaalbar didn’t learn of his brother’s ascension to chieftainship. With Zaalbar’s current mood, there was no telling what he’d do. I have to find out about Freyyr, at least. For Zaalbar’s sake.
Leaving Carth behind was becoming a familiar scenario, and I knew how much he hated it. More so now, with whatever was between us. If sodding Dustil hadn’t scurried, Carth might be here next to me – a gun at my side, and a solid wall of support.

“I’ll check in later, Carth. Go keep an eye on your son.”

He murmured a farewell, and the comm-link shut off. I noticed, then, just how dark our surroundings had become. The trees were giant black shadows engulfed in an indigo haze. Here and there, tiny dots of glow-bugs were visible, emitting the smallest amount of light – just enough to attract their prey. I took a deep breath, and immersed myself in the Force.

Seeing with one's minds-eye was similar to wearing a low-light visor; the outlines of all shapes were distinct in shades of blue and black. In some ways, the clarity of detail shone out more. I could pick out the individual hairs of the forbidding Wookiee, as he stared into the blackness with his bow-caster raised, keeping an eye out for any predators that might pay us a visit.

There was some colour, though. Anything that lived radiated a faint yellow-orange hue of some strength. Zhar was a solid body of amber, and he was still staring at me placidly.

There was a gentle thud, and the basket landed on the forest floor. The Wookiee grunted, and unlatched the side before motioning us out.

“(The intercom is here),” the Wookiee barked at Zhar, motioning towards a large device mounted above my head on the nearest wroshyr. The tree was beyond gigantic. I felt like it would be a genuine ten minute walk just to get around the damn thing. “(When you are ready to go back, send a message. You might have to wait. We do not jump for outsiders no matter how much you’ve paid).”

He sounded like Zaalbar when he’d skipped a meal or two.

“Thank you, Growwhul,” Zhar said in a pleasant tone as the Wookiee strode back into the basket. He grunted at Zhar in answer, and pushed a button on the railing that I hadn’t noticed.

I’d barely been in Rwookrrorro, but I’d seen enough to be intrigued by Wookiee technology. It was an odd mix of primitive and new. They certainly weren’t above using off-world machinery when required – their weaponry was evidence of that – but the housing and walking ramps were all made of native materials. Zaalbar said they preferred to live with nature - as much as was realistic when they allowed off-worlders to land on their planet and eye-ball their resources.

For instance, there had to be a Wookiee starport somewhere. I couldn’t imagine the inhabitants of Rwookrrorro traipsing through Czerka bureaucracy to board a ship, and surely some of Zaalbar’s people occasionally left Kashyyyk without being exiled.

The grinding noises of the ascending basket slowly faded, and I turned my attention to Zhar. He looked up from a datapad, hoisted the large pack over his shoulders, and gave me a brief smile.

“This way,” he murmured, and began walking into the shadows.

I fell into step beside him.

I barely knew where to start. The list of questions was so long, and each one was loaded with the potential for answers I may not want. Just spit ‘em out. Whatever the reason is, I already know... some truths. I was a Jedi. I didn’t fall.

My mind froze. Ness Jonohl didn’t fall. There was a hard lump in my throat, and my steps faltered. Ness Jonohl didn’t exist.

“Watch out for these,” Zhar murmured, motioning towards a silvery thread that was stretched taut between two colossal wroshyrs that loomed like black walls on either side of us. “They are remnants of a wyyyschokk web, giant spiders native to Kashyyyk. Although these arachnids do not usually delve to the depths of the Shadowlands, their webs are extensive and it is better not to try our chances.”

I glanced back to Zhar as he ducked under the sticky thread. “Have you been to the Shadowlands before?” I challenged. It wasn’t the question I should be asking. What’s my name, old man?

“No, but I am well informed. Provided we hold onto the Force and stay aware, I am confident we shall avoid any undesired encounters with the wildlife here.”

Zhar picked up his pace. He was only walking, and yet I felt the power of the Force gain momentum under his heels. I matched my stride to his.

“You have a specific direction in mind?” I asked. How about, why is Darth Revan in my head?

“While we do not know where the Star Map is located, Master Vrook has indicated where he felt the presence of the Force user,” Zhar answered in a mild tone. He skirted around a large patch of what appeared to be gigantic fungi. It glowed a yellow luminescence in my Force-sight. “He did not show himself to Vrook or Vandar, but if we are correct in his identity then he may appear to me.”

“Yes. We believe him to be Jolee Bindo, a Human padawan who left the Order some forty years ago after the loss of his wife. We were padawans together; he, Karon and I.” The words were spoken calmly, but there was a catch in his voice when he spoke Karon’s name. I’d already suspected he’d known her, and now I could infer that he’d known her well. She was my master. And Zhar took me on training missions. Of course they knew each other well.

He took me and my lover on training missions. I wonder, could Zhar have been his master?

I was blind-sided, then, by a sharp spike of acrid fear in my head, and I stumbled. Bastila! Startled, and with a surge of fierce determination, I threw my mental voice as hard as I could towards my erstwhile bond-sister. Bastila, talk to me! Let me help!

I cannot! You must leave me be!

How long had she been awake, dammit? Stuck here in the shadowy depths with a master who knew my secrets, I hadn’t been paying her the attention I should have. No way am I sitting back while you’re getting tortured! I can help, Bastila, you need-

I will not be a liability to you!

“Jen? Are you alright?”

Liability? Stars, Bastila, what do you mean-
Shield yourself, and stay away from me!

A tearing pain ripped into my mind, and I gasped, my hands raising to clutch at my head. It was an echo, only, of whatever Bastila was feeling, and it was still too much. I can’t leave her to go through this on her own. I must reach out-

Do not! She screamed. I cannot block you now- you must shield yourself from me!

No!

A gentle cloud of warmth settled over my psyche, diffusing the emotions and pain feeding back to me through the bond, and I was slowly aware of Zhar enshrouding me in a psychic shield once again.

“Concentrate, Jen,” he was murmuring, as the agony faded into discomfort. Bastila’s presence receded behind the cloudy buffer Zhar encased me with. “You must replicate this, and hold it around yourself.”

I could see the layers he’d built around me through the Force-sight; intermeshing weaves of Force that blocked incoming psychic attacks… or emotions. It was the same mechanism I’d raised as a defense against Uthar Wynn, even if he’d managed to shear straight through them. With an internal resignation that felt far too gutless for my liking, I set about copying Zhar’s shield.

When he was satisfied, he pulled back from me, leaving only my shield in place. I could still feel Bastila faintly, but her pain was now no more than a dull echo in the back of my mind.

“I can’t keep doing this,” I muttered through clenched teeth. Zhar began to walk again, and I had no choice but to follow.

“You must,” he repeated. “There is no more you can do for her, not now.”

“You would have me ignore her existence?” My voice rose in a blend of incredulity and disgust. “Let her wallow in pain while I go about my own damn business?”

“Certainly not,” he replied, his voice as calm as ever. “But while she is being hurt you do yourself no favours by sharing the pain. It will not make it less for her should you allow yourself to feel it, too.”

“She won’t talk to me.” The shield felt like my ears were stuffed with clotted wool. “She’s blocking me out, when she’s not being-” my mouth twisted- “tortured. She only said something about not being a damn liability, whatever that means.”

I sensed rather than saw Zhar turn to look at me sharply. Our boots crunched through a damp layer of undergrowth. “Perhaps she is afraid the pain will uncover memories best left forgotten,” he said softly. “Bastila is an experienced Jedi, and will have her reasons.”

Memories best left forgotten. Maybe she was afraid it would rouse Revan.

Maybe she was right.

But I was learning to hold Revan back. I’d managed it, against Uthar. I’d damn well do it again if I needed to.

A blinking on my wrist-comm distracted my thoughts. Zhar and I clambered over an exposed root, and I answered it.
Canderous’ voice came through in Mandalorian. (We gotta talk).

I risked a glance at Zhar, who seemed as damnably unruffled as ever, even as we strode along at a fast pace. I had no idea whether Zhar understood Mandalorian or not, but I’d put my credits on the affirmative.

“(What’s up?),” I asked, replying back in kind.

(Onasi told me you’re headed down to the Shadowlands. With one of those robes, and without Juhani. Tell me he got that wrong).

“(I’m there already, with a master),” I answered. “(Juhani is back in the village. Is there a problem?)”

Canderous cursed in his mother tongue, a long string of words I didn’t quite follow. I caught ‘Jedi’, and ‘mind’ and something about a slug, but everything else was unintelligible. (I shouldn’t have listened to that damn Cathar). he growled. (I take it you’re with him right now?)

“(Yeah),” I said slowly. What did Juhani say to him? “(We’re going after the same thing as previous planets. What’s going on, Canderous?)”

He sighed angrily. (Keep your guard up, alright? I’ll explain when you’re topside. Just keep your guard up and your eyes open). I could feel myself frowning. Did Canderous suspect a threat in the Shadowlands, or was he implying one of Zhar? (Jen, there’s other things we need to talk about. There’s been some developments).

Zhar was watching me calmly, and I just knew he was following the thread of our conversation.

“(Report),” I stated.

(There’s been a coup at the Wookiee village a half-year ago. Zaalbar’s dad has been chucked down to the Shadowlands).

“(Yeah),” I agreed. “(I heard that).” Not about Freyyr, though. So he’d been exiled rather than killed. For a Wookiee, that counted as more dishonourable.

Canderous grunted. (Huh. Well, Zaalbar didn’t take that too kindly. He’s gone off alone to face his brother).

“(What?)” I exclaimed. I’d stopped walking, and so had Zhar. “(He’s left the ‘Hawk?)”

(Yeah. Czerka staff were ready to restrain him on sight, too. There ain’t any free-walking Wookiees around this starport).

I closed my eyes. “(He’s going after his father, then. He’s picking that Chuundar will throw him down to the Shadowlands).”

(That’s assuming his brother doesn’t sell him into slavery, first. There’s an underground trade here, Jen, and it ain’t the most stable).

The breath whistled out of my lungs. Slavery. That wasn’t the Wookiee way. But from what Zaalbar had told me, Chuundar didn’t follow the old way. Chuundar was all about expansion, at the cost of tradition. I wondered, briefly, if the brothers had ever gotten along. “(I can’t think that the Wookiees would stand for that, even if their chieftain does).”
(I don’t know what sort of politics those hairballs are embroiled in, but I’ve done a spot of nosing about in the starport. Czerka’s deep in bed with the Wookiee leader, and they’re secretly shipping any protesters off-world for a pretty profit. But that’s just a side-trade, Jen. The real money is the tach and syren harvest, and that’s at the bottom of the forest. Czerka’s employing hunters and mercenaries to gather up the raw materials. Your Shadowlands is getting to be a popular place).

If Chuundar was selling his people into slavery – those that didn’t agree with him – then things really had changed since Zaalbar left. It was a risky way to remove dissenters, though, if Chuundar had to do it covertly. Why wouldn’t he just exile them all?

If Czerka are busy harvesting in the Shadowlands, then the last thing they need is a bunch of disaffected, angry Wookiees crawling around. Maybe Freyyr had been one of the lucky ones, or perhaps Chuundar couldn’t bring himself to sell his dear old dad into slavery.

My fingers tapped against my thigh. The Czerka trade, though - that was bugging me. If it was as substantial as Canderous was suggesting, then there was no way the Rwookroororo elevator was being used.

“(They’ve got another way down here),” I said slowly. “(Chuundar and his followers may be in bed with Czerka, but I can’t think all the Wookiees would agree to that. And the lift I used wasn’t exactly a well-used device).” Not to mention it was in the Wookiee township proper. Those armed and grumpy Wookiees did not look like they’d readily accept an influx of off-world scavengers.

(I was thinking the same thing), Canderous agreed. (Either Czerka have their own lift or they’re going elsewhere on the planet).

Kashyyyk was covered in wrosyhr forest. Maybe there were clearings around somewhere on the planet, but this area was choked with foliage - and the Czerka starport was stationed pretty frelling close to Rwookroororo. Logistically speaking, a secret elevator within the Czerka stronghold would be the more efficient solution.

But Zaalbar had said his people controlled access to the Shadowlands. Chuundar’s machinations must be relatively unknown amongst his people – some of them, anyway. I was willing to bet that his people wouldn’t take too kindly to Czerka having free reign in the Shadowlands. If Chuundar’s duplicity could be unearthed, then it could very well start a riot. Inciting a revolt on Kashyyyk is not what we are here for. But Zaalbar was one of my crew – and, possibly, on his way down here right now.

“(Get Teethree hacking into the Czerka communications array, see what he can dig up),” I said at last. “(Did you get the parts for HK?)”

(Yeah. He’ll be fixed soon. I was thinking he might be of some use. Jen:-) Canderous hesitated for a moment, which was unusual for him. (There’s a hundred or so Wookiee prisoners on a freighter not far from us. Mission wants to go free them).

I could feel my brows shoot up in disbelief. A hundred Wookiees in one ship... Czerka was getting deep into the slave trade. And while Mission’s desire was good-natured and whole-heartedly typical of her, the fact that Canderous bothered repeating it meant he was considering it, on some level.

“(I doubt we have the manpower for that),” I said slowly.

(Normally I’d agree with you, but these Czerka soldiers ain’t hardened military. Look, I spoke to a couple of mercenaries who’re providing muscle for a squad of hunters. This used to be a joint venture between the Exchange and Czerka until about a month ago when Czerka booted them out).::

I had little time for petty politics between corrupt organizations, but Canderous didn’t generally waste his time on small talk. “(Go on),” I prompted.

He gave a short laugh. ::(Kashyyyk’s a small operation in the galactic scheme of things, so it’s not that damaging for the Exchange. What it really is, though, is retaliation. A swipe back against the Exchange, after they overran several outposts on Rii’shn - including some Czerka mining interests).:: Canderous sounded amused. Too amused. ::(They blame Czerka for framing them over some sort of shoot-out in a cantina, and the closure of their primary docking bay).:: Canderous paused. ::(Right about the time we were on Manaan).::

My shoulders tensed as the pieces clicked together. Oh, Sithspit. You’ve got to be kidding me. I glanced over to Zhar, and even with Force-sight I could see his eyes had narrowed on me. He’d picked up on my reaction.

HK-47 had nicely manipulated events to leave the GenoHaradan blameless for the mess on Rii’shn, but it had caused a schism between Czerka and the Exchange instead. Did it matter? I had little love for either of them, but the fall-out was still impacting real people.

No. I did what I had to, to get out of there. At the crux of it, the fault lies with the GenoHaradan. If HK hadn’t stolen an Exchange ship and blamed Czerka for it, then the GenoHaradan would have found some other way to point the finger elsewhere. It’s not like anyone even knows who the GenoHaradan are.

I wrested my thoughts back into order, and focused on Canderous’ voice.

::(-to tell me about that some time, Jen. Regardless, Czerka’s forces are armed, but ill-trained. Most of them were ship crew and office staff before the Exchange guards left).::

Canderous was mulling over the idea of rescuing the Wookiees. I was vaguely surprised at that. But no matter how poorly trained the Czerka forces were, I didn’t see any plausible way a hundred unarmed Wookiees could walk out of that starport alive.

“(See what you can find out, Canderous. We’ll go from there).”

::(I’ll be in touch),:: he assented. ::(Let’s see if I can get the kid’s bucket droid to dig up anything useful).::

“(Okay. Don’t put anyone at risk).” I didn’t think Canderous would. He wasn’t the sort to go sticking his neck out for others, so this entire conversation seemed a little surreal. Canderous was far from being any sort of coward, but I didn’t quite get where his interest in the Wookiee situation was coming from. “(This isn’t what we’re on Kashyyyk for.)”

::(I hear you. But that walking hairball is one of us, ain’t he? Even if I can’t understand a damn word he says).::

Clan. Canderous was seeing us all as clan, now, I realized. Mandalorians were as fierce about clan as they were about their honour. I’d respected Canderous for a long time already, but my opinion of him rose another notch. Self-serving at times, he may be – but he was damn loyal to those he considered his.

“(Yeah),” I said finally. “(Zaalbar’s one of us. Keep in touch, Canderous. If Juhani comes back, slap a communicator on her as well).”
With a click, the comm switched off. Zhar regarded me steadily.

“You have picked up some interesting companions, Jen Sahara,” he commented. “And are involving yourself in politics that perhaps you shouldn’t.”

I sighed irritably. His words had the touch of déjà vu about them, as if they were an echo of conversations I’d heard numerous times before. The faint bleed-over from Bastila didn’t help my mood, either. The psychic shield held her presence at bay, eliminated near-all of what she was feeling… but not the awareness of it. The bitter taste of cowardice still sat in my gut.

“I know, I know,” I muttered in a low voice. “Jedi do not involve themselves in politics. We are mediators only, not politicians.”

Zhar’s eyes widened. Through the Force, he was a body of radiating amber, etched in blue and black lines. It wasn’t so easy to decipher his expression, this way, but I thought he looked slightly shocked. “Uh, yes. Yes.” He cleared his throat. “While the Wookiee situation is regrettable, and perhaps some Jedi involvement could assist or at least advise…” he trailed off, frowning. “Exactly what do you recall of your past?”

The abrupt question caught me off-guard; I’d expected to be the one to initiate that line of conversation. I was about to answer – not really sure of my words, just yet – when a rustling in the nearby undergrowth had us both turning.

A sole figure, a dark blue shadow of a humanoid, emerged walking slowly towards us.

“Huh. Looking for me, are you?”

xXx
The walls of Rwookrrrolo loomed in the distance. Thick rope lashed the wooden poles together, timber that had been taken from the smaller branches of the massive wroshyr; a small pruning, here and there, to create our habitat within the heights of our forest.

Some of the Wookiee tribes who lived elsewhere on Kashyyyk built cylindrical wooden rooms wrapped around smaller trunks, and were not as far from the forest floor. But Rwookrrrolo was situated in the densest, tallest part of the wroshyr forest. Nowhere else on our planet were our sacred trees so impressive and so ancient.

I felt my chest puff up with a large breath of forest air. The astringent smell of tree-sap, undercut by a fresh fragrance of lottie-blossoms, was ever present here. It smelled like home.

It was home.

A home I had never thought to see again. But the news Mission and that sullen Dustil Onasi had brought back with them changed everything. Father. Could Chuundar really have done such a thing? Exiled our sire to the depths of our world? I had feared returning to Kashyyyk, feared the injustice of my past but this… this was worse.

Six years ago, I had discovered my brother was selling tach organs to Czerka for a tidy profit, but my only evidence had disappeared, and the rest was circumstantial.

Chuundar had taken an interest in the coming-of-age rituals in the Shadowlands, the hrrtayyk rite of passage for all young males. The Old Ones would usually preside over them, but Chuundar’s interest had been approved of by Father himself – and my brother became something of a mentor for all whom partook in the hrrtayyk.

It was only when Ruubarg had confided in me that I began to suspect Chuundar was using those trips down to the Shadowlands for other purposes. Drawwlog confirmed Ruubarg’s suspicions, and led me to the cargo he knew of - canisters filled with meticulously butchered tach that had been collected from Czerka-provided traps.

My brother and I shared the same, hot-blooded temper – but Chuundar was clever where I was brash and simple. My accusations fired around the throne room like wild kinrath fleeing a terentatek, and each one Chuundar had shot down with a carefully aimed riposte.

There is no tach trade, no tach corpses in the storage rooms – come, see for yourself, dear brother.

Czerka staff claim they have not left their starport – and while we cannot trust their word, they offer us their holo-footage as proof.

Drawwlog denies all knowledge, younger brother, and fears you have had too much fermented wasaka-berry juice last night.

And as for Ruubarg – a shame on you, that you draw in someone who is at death’s door and cannot speak for himself. The healers do not know if he will recover from the suspected tysharn flu that has drawn him into a stupor.
Where does this mistrust, these lies, come from, younger brother? I know you have always looked upon me with a jealous eye, but surely you understand the responsibility I must live up to is a heavy burden. A second son should be a pillar of support for the first, not a dagger lodged at his back.

Being accused of such a childish emotion, when I had hero-worshipped Chuundar for most of my life, was the final straw after the frustration of all my suspicions being expertly dismissed.

My temper shattered, and I lashed out in the worst possible way. In front of everyone.

Madclaw.

One does not strike one’s own with one’s claws.

The rage had sat like a red mist in my eyes, a righteous fury that only dissipated when I saw Chuundar’s shocked expression as he stumbled back from me, blood seeping through the fur on his face and shoulder.

He had not expected me to lose control that way, I realized much later. I wondered if he only meant to ridicule me, to put me in my place, to silence my suspicions and humble my standing. The glimpse of horrified understanding I saw in his eyes before resignation eclipsed it, allowed me to believe that perhaps exile had not been his objective.

Perhaps he had only wanted his brother silenced, not cast-out.

What-ifs were a poisonous thing.

And while I could blame Chuundar for the most of it, the raising of my claws was my own burden to carry.

And now, as I stood staring at the walls of my childhood, I wondered if the shame of the past had coloured Chuundar’s character, too. For while he had always been opportunistic, I could not reconcile that with someone duplicitous enough to send our traditionalist father into exile.

But maybe the seeds had always been there.

Years ago, Chuundar had wished to amalgamate Vroalkarra and Arooagorro, two smaller townships nearby that were struggling under poor leadership. Father would not hear of that, however; tribes did not interfere with other tribes. Marry into, trade with, celebrate together: yes. But conquer? No, that was too much like our madclaw past. Wookiees stood together against outsiders. We did not fight each other. Father stood firm on that.

Chuundar claimed - provided we kept strict controls over Czerka - we could milk them for trade goods by selling inconsequential amounts of our resources. A slippery road, my father decreed, and one he would have nothing to do with. If Czerka were irritated that their fancy starport on Kashyyyk had brought them naught, then they could leave.

I had been present for many of these heated debates and, in the early days, I had a sympathetic ear to my brother. Father had always been seen as somewhat conservative, a traditionalist who refused to consider anything other than our centuries-old customs. How much harm would it be, really, to allow Czerka a small slice of our resources? We would stay in control, ensure there was no lasting damage to our precious planet. But Father refused to bend, and his word was law.

When Ruubarg had first suggested to me that Chuundar was sneaking behind Father’s back, I had found it difficult to believe.
But even after that – even after all that occurred – my first emotion upon hearing Mission’s earth-shattering news was disbelief. What was more inconceivable, my brother exiling my father, or my brother engaging in slavery of his own people?

Slavery. The very thought sent a rumbling of discontent in my chest. The idea of a sentient owning another was abhorrent. Even as we hunted predators on Kashyyyk, we always honoured their lives, to the very smallest of insects. Might did not make one better than another, and the thought of ownership over anything – even the wroshyr trees themselves – was disgusting. How could my brother be involved in that?

But Mission had spoken with one of my people, caged in the marketplace like a bantha. She had seen six of them, all trapped the same way. And she spoke of a hundred more, imprisoned within a freighter, about to be sent off-world by the corrupt Czerka Corporation.

I could feel my hackles rising in growing hatred toward my brother. Slavery was worse than death, worse than exile. It was worse than being labelled a madclaw, one who could not master their own inner fire, their rakkorr, and had succumbed to the madness of our ancestors who had been unable to live in peace within the ecosystem the gods had granted us.

With all of this explosive news, I had known I could not stay onboard the Ebon Hawk any longer. But the debt I owed Jen Sahara sat heavy on my soul, and she was gone for now, meeting her Masters in my own home village.

So I sat in the cargo bay, and begged Mission for solitude while the poisonous thoughts grew darker and darker in my head. They all left me for the common room, and spoke in hushed voices so as not to disturb. Perhaps they expected I would not hear their conversation through inches of durasteel, but a Wookiee’s hearing was vastly superior to most sentients.

…

“-gone to the blasted Shadowlands, with only one of the Masters. She’s-”

“What?” The low growl was definitely Canderous. “Without the Cathar?”

“Yes. She said she had reasons, but couldn’t say. She was more concerned about any incoming air traffic-”

“You’ve got to be kriffing joking.” Canderous sounded anything but amused. In fact, he sounded furious.

“Sheesh, you can’t let Big Z find out,” Mission interjected. Her voice was quiet through the durasteel walls, and I struggled to pick up on it. “If he hears both his dad and Jen are down there-”

I stood. The determination grew within me, as solid as the roots of the mighty wroshyrs, and I began unbuckling the belt and vibrosword from my back. This was it. I would find Father, or I would find Jen, but what I would not do any longer was stay on this ship.

…

I slipped out of the Ebon Hawk quickly, before Mission found out and decided to do something foolhardy like follow. But the Czerka starport had changed; there was a new control tower I did not recognize, and the guards were armed where they had not been years ago.

And they did not want a free-walking Wookiee in their starport.
“Hey! Halt!” a loud voice exclaimed in Basic behind me. My gaze was pinned on the stairwell near the imposing control tower that was new, and I did not realize the voice was yelling at me. The building was large, and looked decidedly out of place next to the ancient wroshyr it was bolted against.

“You, Wookiee! Stop, or I’ll shoot!”

That had me tensing in surprise. I wore nothing nor held any weapons – exiles were stripped of possessions when they were sent to the Shadowlands. I turned, to see a handful of sentients raising blaster rifles at me. They all wore armour, but there was a smell of anxiety around them, a looseness to their posture. They were not well-trained.

“(What do you want?)” I barked, even as I knew they likely couldn’t understand me. I have not done anything. Why are they threatening me?

“D’ya think he’s escaped?” one of them muttered.

“Must’ve,” another agreed. “We don’t let any from their town here. We’d better stun this one and bring ‘im in.”

My eyes widened as their intent hit home. They believe I am a slave! I could not escape four blasters, and the Ebon Hawk was now many metres away. I had not expected this hostility on my own planet, from a starport I had used in the past!

“Put your guns down before you hurt yourself,” a gruff voice called out, irritation plainly obvious in the intonation. I glanced over to see Canderous Ordo, striding fast from our freighter, a rough scowl aimed at the group of disorganized Czerka-clad sentients. “That ain’t your property, he’s mine, and I’ll thank you to go kriff off before I knock your heads together.”

The implication in his words held me speechless for a moment, before a kernel of undeniable fury sprang to life.

I am no one’s property! I will fight until my last breath to deny it! But Canderous Ordo was already motioning me to the exit of the starport, his back turned dismissively at the faltering Czerka infidels who gaped like the slack-jawed soulless beings they were.

“Come. We’re going for a walk,” he ordered, his voice a commanding echo that my sense – finally kicking in – realized was for their benefit and not mine.

Still stunned at the turn of events – that a Wookiee could not walk freely amongst this starport without being apprehended – I followed the Mandalorian in silence as we departed the corrupt Czerka stronghold without any further interruptions. It was not until we left the obscene permacrete foundations behind, and I stood once more upon the wooden walkways I knew so well, that Canderous finally spoke.

“I’d a feeling you wouldn’t stay cooped up,” he commented, “and judging by the state of things around here, I didn’t think this lot would take kindly to a Wookiee walking around without chains.”

It struck me, then, that Canderous Ordo – of all people – had come to my rescue. He wasn’t the same self-involved mercenary I had met on Taris.

We had all changed since then.

“Look, I gotta get back. I gotta check in with Jen, find out if kriffing Onasi is right-” he sighed, sounding heavily irritated. “I ain’t gonna talk you out of whatever you’re planning. Don’t figure you’d listen to me anyways.”

I grunted in affirmation, and the corner of his mouth twitched.

“Right. Do you really think your father’s alive?”

The question brought up me up short. Mission had reported that Freyyr had been exiled a half year ago. Normally, exiles to the Shadowlands did not live long. The burden of shame could only be assuaged by a challenge, a testing of one’s inner strength against the wild predators of our planet.

Those young cubs testing themselves for their hrrtayyk went to the depths with weapons, provisions, and a mentor. But the exiles-

It was meant to be death. The more glorious, the more one’s shame would be alleviated in the eyes of the gods.

But Freyyr held no shame. He would not have felt it, not have believed in Chuundar’s exile. I did not think my father would be content to throw himself into death, to match himself against the wilds of the Shadowlands.

No, he would want to survive, and to find out exactly what Czerka was doing to our planet.

I gave Canderous an obvious nod. He folded his arms, a thoughtful look on his face. “Your brother’s involved in slavery. He’s a lot more likely to sell you than chuck you down where your dad is.”

I felt the growl in my throat, and the Mandalorian raised an appeasing hand. “Look, be smart about it, okay? Otherwise you may as well stay in the ‘Hawk.”

He wasn’t saying anything I hadn’t already considered, but I appreciated the sentiment.

...

Canderous left me then, claiming he was going to ingratiate himself with some of the off-world mercenaries to gather information before contacting Jen. Jen, who was down in the Shadowlands herself.

If Chuundar had grown so black in his desire for acquisition, then he would not want me to find our father, should he still live. But the one right of an exile – even a madclaw exile – was to brave the Shadowlands. Any of the Old Ones would hold firm on that. I had but to find one.

In the ancient days, our people did not have mastery of their rrakktor. They fought; with each other, with the wildlife, with the planet itself. The Old Ones were the story-tellers, the elders, the ones who remembered. And they believed, more strongly than any other, that the only place for a madclaw was the Shadowlands.

I began walking again, veering slightly away from Rwookrrorro now. I had taken a long route, amongst some of the narrow, less-used paths that skirted around our township. And this one led to a small, reinforced building, lashed tightly against one of the larger wroshyrs.

Most Wookiees lived within the walls of our town. It was safer, and it was the proper way. But the Old Ones held a special place of authority in our society, and lived where they willed. From as far back as I could remember, Growwhul and Tasharr had made this hut their home.

I was counting on them to escort me to the Shadowlands. If I could locate them.
My inner anger desired an encounter with my brother; I wanted to rail at him, to demand a reason for his treachery, to expose his vile dealings with slavery.

But I was not the brash, simple Wookiee from six years ago. I had no evidence, and even if I did – I was a madclaw. My words would not be listened to.

But my father’s might be.

When I closed in on the outbuilding I recalled from my youth, I saw a tall, leaden figure slip out of the house. His fur was grey with age, and matted with what looked like a lack of grooming. His posture stilled as I neared, his gaze fixed on me as I walked ever closer.

Jabakka was an Old One, too. He was ancient when I had been but a cub. I thought he would have departed the physical world by now.

I saw the moment his rheumy eyes recognized me. They narrowed, and his paws dropped to the blaster on his hip.

That stung, even as I was aware it would be a common reaction. I do not believe I have ever seen Jabakka armed. Perhaps, if he lived here now – outside of Rwookrrorro – it had become a necessary safety precaution. Still, it saddened me to see it.

“(Madclaw,)” Jabakka rumbled. The rifle was in his grasp now, but at least he did not raise it at me. I wondered why he was living here, instead of the two I had expected. “(You are no longer welcome here.)”

“(I have come to finish my exile where it should have started,)” I said. I remembered Jabakka much the same as Growwhul and Tasharr – a conservative who believed in discipline, obedience and an adherence to tradition. Whilst none of them would likely approve of my older brother’s expansionist goals, they all strongly supported a chieftain’s authority. The leader was absolute.

The Old Ones had power, of a sort. If Chuundar had managed to successfully exile my father, then he must have had their backing – even if they did not like it. Or him.

“(Going off-world was adding disgrace to dishonour,)” Jabakka growled. “(That should not be an option for madclaws. A truly penitent Wookiee would not have chosen such,)”

I shrugged. “(Youth does not always choose right. But I have come back, unarmed, to make the correct choice now.)”

Jabakka grunted. His clouded eyes narrowed on me. “(Then I will walk you there myself, right now, and see to it that this is finally ended,)”

That was what I had been counting on. An Old One’s sense of tradition, at the cost of either empathy or politics. A different Wookiee might have insisted on a meeting with Chuundar first, but an Old One would want for nothing more than to see a madclaw away from the rest of our people – and into the depths of the Shadowlands.

We began walking; Jabakka behind me with his blaster trained at my feet. Not quite a prisoner, but only because I did not try to run. I breathed in deeply, tasting the forest breeze as it ruffled through my fur. There was no wind down in the Shadowlands; but here, on the paths of my childhood, each air current conveyed a hundred different scents of forest life. I found myself hit by a nostalgia that I struggled to keep at bay.

I did not know if I would ever return to Rwookrrorro, but I did not plan on dying in the Shadowlands.

If my father believed in his own innocence and Chuundar’s duplicity – and whilst I did not know the details of the coup, I was counting on that – then his desire for his own survival would burn in his gut, the way it did not with exiles who genuinely deserved their sentence.

I did not believe my father would be far from the Rwookrrorro elevator. He would be searching for the Czerka hunters, the Czerka traps – anything, to sabotage what they were doing.

He would be stealthy about it, though. I could not imagine the Czerka hunters leaving him alone, should they know he was there. I would have to be stealthy, too.

I had been to the Shadowlands before, more than once. I had lived off the lands, tracked the small game, and avoided the predators. For the most part, the Shadowlands could be a quiet place, one that could make you forget its inherent danger.

It did not sound like it was so quiet anymore.

The walls of Rwookrrorro came ever closer, and ahead of us a small group of Wookiees stopped to stare. I averted my eyes, but not before I recognized warriors from my youth. One turned, and ran back toward the town.

He has recognized me. He has gone to inform Chuundar. There was nothing but to walk forward, now; the elevator was not far within the walls of Rwookrrorro, and I could only hope I would reach my objective without any interruptions.

Jabakka was not, however, the fastest of walkers.

The guard posted at the wall had already straightened, his eyes narrow and wary as they fixed upon us. There was a bow-caster trained upon me from high on the wall.

“(Let us pass,)” Jabakka growled.

The guard was young, and I could see the recognition as it dawned on his face. “(That’s, that’s-)”

“(I know who it is, cub. Stand aside!)”

He blinked as he moved sideways, wide eyes staring at me. I could not put a name to him, but he was vaguely familiar. Six years. Six long years. It was hard, to think of all that I had missed. But it had not been all bad, either.

Most Wookiees did not leave Kashyyyk. I did not think I would have, voluntarily. And yet, I found I could not regret all that had happened. My experiences had opened my eyes. I had grown to see a different sort of honour in others, different struggles, different values. While I did not often understand those who were not Wookiee, it did not mean I could not respect them, or care for them.

Mission held a place in my heart, deeper than most I had known on Kashyyyk. My fondness for a Twi’lek girl cub was not something I would ever have expected. At least she was safe, back on the Ebon Hawk.

I strode forward, into the bustle of my home village, Jabakka flanking me with his rifle still in his grasp. The elevator was close and I was glad of it, as I closed my ears to the gasps of surprised inhabitants, and averted my eyes to any who might be staring.
I heard one call out inquiringly to Jabakka, but we both continued our walk toward the suspended basket that I had travelled a half dozen times in my life thus far.

To my surprise, Growwhul was one of two sentries there. He looked old. Grizzled, and older than he ever appeared before. Growwhul and Tasharr were always together, irascible and forbidding in their scolding of Rwookrrorro’s youth. Had something happened to Growwhul’s mate?

It seemed likely. It would explain why Jabakka now lived in his home. Perhaps Growwhul had desired to move back into the walls of Rwookrrorro, if Tasharr had died. And yet, why was an Old One on sentry duty at the elevator?

Growwhul’s eyes widened as they fixed on me, before narrowing in distaste.

“(The madclaw is here to complete the terms of his exile,)” Jabakka spoke to Growwhul, his voice low with disapproval. “(Finally.)”

Growwhul grunted, and unlatched the basket before stepping onboard. He held a bow-caster at the ready, and his glower was focussed on me. The other sentry looked worried, shooting glances between Growwhul, Jabakka, and myself, but made no move to stop me as I strode toward Growwhul.

“(Halt!)” a commanding voice called loudly behind us, and with a sinking feeling in my gut I recognized the timbre all too well. There was a padding of feet running along the wooden boards, and I turned to see my brother, his expression wild with surprise.

At his side, running next to him with a vibrosword drawn, was Drawwlog. He wore the decorative neck-piece of a chieftain’s aide.

I was only metres from my destination, but the other sentry was already raising his bow-caster, even as he looked unsure as to whom he should be pointing it at. Jabakka and Growwhul both held weapons, heavy frowns on their faces. They would support my access to the Shadowlands, I had to hope - but not if I ran from the chieftain.

The anger at my brother burned in my gut, but I had to rise above it. This time, I had to do things the smart way.

Chuundar stopped several metres from me, roughly motioning Drawwlog onward. Drawwlog obeyed, moving until he flanked the sentry and blocked my access to the elevator.

“(Younger brother,)” Chuundar panted. He looked beyond, his gaze landing first on Jabakka and then Growwhul, before returning to me. He looked the same as I remembered, if slightly shorter. It was with some startlement that I realized I must have grown. “(I did not believe it, when I heard.)”

“(Chuundar,)” I acknowledged. I could not let my anger at him eclipse my objective. “(I am here to end my exile the way it should have ended six years ago.)”

Chuundar’s eyes widened, but I was not sure how surprised he really was. “(Even a madclaw is allowed a last conversation, brother,)” He did not name me, I realized. Madclaws were both honourless and nameless. “(Come. It has been some time, and you have spent years off-world. I desire to hear about that.)”

Jabakka shifted uneasily, and I heard a faint grunt from Growwhul.

“(I will respect the terms of my exile, Chuundar. I will go now.)” And I would not call him brother. I took a step closer to the basket, and Drawwlog lifted his blade to bar my way. His expression was “(Younger brother, do not be ridiculous. You must know that I never wished things to go so far six years ago. Exile can be lifted. Even a madclaw can find honour again.)”

It was rare - although not unheard-of - for exile to be overturned.

Once, I had worshipped my brother. And I held on to the image of him, six years ago, bleeding and shocked from the impact of my claws - the initial bewilderment evident in his face. He had not wanted me exiled, not then.

But that was six years ago. Since then, he had sold dissenters into slavery and exiled our father. And as I stared at him, I could see suspicion darkening his eyes.

“(He belongs in the Shadowlands,)” Growwhul growled. “(Exile is not a tool belt that one takes on and off.)”

“(I am the chieftain, Old One,)” Chuundar snapped. “(There have been enough Wookiees exiled in recent years. Rwookrrorro grows weak. If my brother can convince me he is loyal, then it is my decision whether the exile should stand or not.)”

I wondered, then, if that was how Chuundar was hiding the slavery. Did most of them believe that those who opposed Chuundar had lived out the last of their days in the Shadowlands?

I looked over to Drawwlog, and his expression sagged. There was a desolate look in his eyes, and I thought he might understand the heaviness shame could bring. Drawwlog had learned about Czerka in the past, he had shown me the tach harvest himself. I wondered if he knew about the slavery, and still kept Chuundar’s secrets after all this time.

“(But I am also a madclaw, Chuundar,)” I said finally. “(And even a madclaw exile has the right to enter the Shadowlands. I will cleanse my honour in the only way I can.)”

I saw a slight flinch on Drawwlog’s face. Perhaps he blamed himself, somewhat, for my accusations against Chuundar all those years ago. I liked to think that he regretted his lies, regretted not backing me against my brother and my father.

And I found, as I stepped forward, that Drawwlog did not have the will to stop me. His blade wavered and dropped, and I walked past him.

“(Brother,)” Chuundar barked sharply as I strode onto the lift. “(You would throw your life away like this? Is there not anything else you wish to say to me?)”

I understood, then, that Chuundar was burning with the need to find out what I knew.

He wondered if I had heard about our father. He wondered if I had discovered the slavery. He wondered what I knew about the Czerka trade, now.

But I was not the same brash, simple Wookiee I used to be.

“(I regret that I struck out at you, Chuundar,)” I said simply, looking upon the face that was so like our fathers’. “(I dishonoured our family with that one action.)”

But not with my words. They were true, and I would not apologize for them.

And as Growwhul started the lift’s descent, I kept my eyes on my brother. Frustration, more than anything, was apparent on his face. But he had no way to stop me, not with the Old Ones watching everything. If I had been angry, if I had thrown accusations about and we had begun to argue once more, then perhaps he could have claimed I was a threat and neutralized me. If I had gone with him instead, he could have dealt with me some other way.

The passionate, clever brother I had worshipped as a cub was gone. I mourned him, even as I recognized that today’s chieftain was a threat to Rwookrrorro and perhaps even Kashyykk herself, should Czerka gain a prominent foothold here.

The gods be willing, my father would still be alive, and there might still be a way to bring honour back to our people.

xXx

Growwhul was silent on the way down. His kept his bow-caster fixed outside the lift, but never far from my form, and his dark gaze continued to land on me from time to time.

“(Where is Tasharr?)” I asked, about halfway down. I was not given to curiosity, usually, but Tasharr’s absence from Growwhul’s side was painfully noticeable. As fractious and choleric as the two of them were, their love for each other had always been evident. When all three of their cubs married into Arooagorro society, Growwhul and Tasharr remained here and ascended to become Old Ones. They were rarely without each other.

There was an obvious tensing in Growwhul’s grizzled frame, and his expression contorted with grief.

“(I do not speak to madclaws,)” he growled, staring into the darkening shadows.

She had died, then, or perhaps been sold under the guise of exile. I hoped, for Growwhul’s sake, it was the former.

I cleared my throat. “(There are Wookiee slaves in the Czerka starport.)”

Growwhul’s gaze jerked back to mine, his eyes wide with surprise. There was something in his expression, some glimpse of recognition… I wondered, then, if he had heard rumours of slavery before. Growwhul was not one who would stand for slavery on Kashyykk, but he also would not act against the chieftain without proof. All I could do was sow the seeds.

“(Six in cages, in the marketplace. And I have heard of a freighter, in docking bay F4, that has a hundred imprisoned.)”

Growwhul gave out a sort of strangled noise. “(Are you telling me you saw this with your own eyes?)”

“(No,)” I shifted uncomfortably. “(Someone I trust with my life spoke with one of the caged Wookiees. She did not get his name, but he told her about the rest of them.)”

Growwhul grumbled in disgust. “(It was not a Wookiee, was it?)” At my silence, the rumble of discontent in his chest grew louder. “(You spread off-worlder lies. Even now, even as you go to face the consequences of your actions from years ago, you are still looking for any way to discredit your brother.)”

He would not listen, I knew. Growwhul had never been a shining advocate of Chuundar, but he would always follow the chieftain.
“(Mission Vao does not lie,)” I barked. “(One thing I have learned in my years abroad is that off-worlders can have honour, too. If you have heard anything of slavery, then remember well what I said today-)”

“(I have heard enough,)” he growled, the corners of his mouth pulling down.

“(If someone were to venture into the starport, they could either prove me wrong-)”

“(Silence!)” Growwhul roared. His thickset brows were lowered in righteous anger.

“(or Czerka would not let them enter, which would then pose the question of what Czerka was hiding.)”

“(I will hear no more poison from you, madclaw!)” Growwhul’s bow-caster swung to aim at my face, now, close and threatening.

I subsided then, for I had said my piece. Whether it would amount to anything I did not know, but at least I had tried, and with someone honourable enough to do something about it – should he ever believe any of it might be true.

The shadows darkened as we descended further, and the air became stagnant; musty and earthy in its scent. The odd speck of a glow bug against the nearest wroshyr was visible, and after a time Growwhul looked beyond me once more, aiming his weapon back into the shadows.

The foliage thinned, and I realized we were nearing the bottom. Even here, the temperature was ambient. I felt a tension in my gut, and was ready to move out. I had slipped past my brother and made it to the Shadowlands. Thus far, things were going as planned. I could only hope it would stay that way.

The elevator thudded gently onto the forest floor, but what had me stiffening was the small group of sentient who awaited us. Growwhul’s bow-caster was aimed at them, and I saw they were mostly small, hairless off-worlders.

My eyes widened with surprise when I recognized the only one with any fur at all, even if it was fine and short. I strode past Growwhul, unlatched the basket, and walked out.

“Zaalbar!” Juhani greeted, stepping forward to clasp my hands. Behind her stood Dak Vessar, Kel Algwinn, and a robed human male I did not know. “We have been waiting for someone to answer the intercom. I did not expect… what are you doing here?”

“(Your exile begins, madclaw, where it should have six years ago,)” Growwhul growled, stepping out of the basket and motioning me away into the shadows. “(Go. Cleanse your shame, and do not return.)”

The older human stepped forward. “We are done here, and will take the lift back,” he spoke directly to Growwhul, a deep frown lining his face.

“(I am an exile, Juhani. What are you doing here? Where is Jen?)”

The Cathar frowned as she struggled to follow my words. At times I thought she could comprehend me better than Canderous Ordo and Carth Onasi, but her understanding of Shyriiwook was only rudimentary.

Still, I had grown to respect her, and how she had struggled to better herself since Tatooine. Perhaps the path of the Jedi who had tasted their madclaw Dark Side and turned away from it –
Juhani and Jen Sahara both—had shown me that honour could come after dishonour.

“We have been laying Belaya to rest. Are you— are you going after—” She stopped talking at the robed human’s scowl. She meant Jen, of course. I did not think Juhani would know anything about the politics of my homeworld, or my father.

Growwhul had pointedly walked back into the elevator, and both Kel Algwynn and the older human followed. Dak Vessar was frowning at Juhani.

“We need to leave, Knight Juhani,” the robed man spoke. “Master Quatra is awaiting our return.”

“Juhani?” Dak prompted, when she kept staring at me, a silent question on her face.

“(I have more than one reason to be here, Juhani,)” I said finally, but the frown on her face showed this was either an unsatisfactory answer, or she did not comprehend my words.

“Do the others know you are here?”

“(Canderous Ordo does. He will have told Mission and Carth Onasi by now.)”

There was an impatient growl from Growwhul, and Juhani shifted to stare at all her companions in turn. Finally, she closed her eyes and sighed.

“Juhani,” the one I did not know grumbled. “You’re dithering. That’s irritating at the best of times, and downright foolish in the Shadowlands.”

“I am not dithering, Master Vrook,” Juhani responded, her voice calm and collected despite his censure. “I am making a decision.” Her eyes opened, then, and she stepped forward to embrace Dak.

“Take care, Dak,” she murmured, her arms tight around his middle. “I shall not be travelling back with you.”

“What?” he demanded. He pulled back, his brows lowering to glare at her. “What are you saying?”

I blinked. Did Juhani mean to accompany me? Growwhul would not like that, not for an exile. And I planned to hunt for my father. Juhani is thinking of Jen Sahara. And our mission. I could not deny the importance of the Star Map, and its impact on the war being waged in the galaxy.

My loyalty was as much to Jen Sahara as it was to Kashyyyk, these days. I did not know what or whom I should attempt to find first, but perhaps Juhani could aid me in that decision. And I found I would be glad of Juhani’s company, and not only because she was a fearsome warrior in her own right.

“My place is with the crew of the Ebon Hawk, Dak,” Juhani murmured, but she was looking at the robed one called Vrook. He scowled from his place on the lift.

Dak Vessar stared at me in mild incredulity, before turning back to Juhani. “You’re going to stay here? In the Shadowlands, with no equipment?”

“A Jedi is hardly helpless,” she replied, in a mild tone. She wore plain clothing, and although I saw the glint of a lightsaber on her belt, she was equipped with little else. But I knew how to survive here, and Juhani had lived in an inhospitable desert for the better part of a year. I did not doubt her resourcefulness.
“(He is an exile!)” Growwhul roared, as if he suddenly understood what was happening. “(A madclaw exile! He cannot have allies. This is his only chance to cleanse himself of his dishonour, and it cannot be interfered with by outsiders!)”

“I go to seek a companion of mine, who is in your Shadowlands.” Juhani had turned around, and spoke clearly to Growwhul. She may not understand his words, but his displeasure at her intent was plainly obvious. “I will return when I have found her.”

Growwhul was growling, his grizzled fur standing on edge. And then, I saw a flicker of movement from the one named Vrook, and Growwhul’s snarled coat flattened slightly. The grumble in his throat subsided. I felt more at peace, more serene then I had in days.

It was false. And I was familiar, now, with the way Jedi could use the Force on others. It was deceitful, and unclean, and I hated it.

The one named Vrook spoke. “Juhani-”

The Cathar shook her head at the robed Jedi. “Go back to Master Quatra and Master Vandar. My place is here. I can return to the elevator when I am done.”

“(Are you sure, Juhani?)” I rumbled softly. “(I was always destined for this place, since we first aimed our ship at Kashyyyk. There is no need for you to be here.)”

Juhani only smiled at me. Her slanted eyes gleamed in the shadows.

“This is foolish,” Master Vrook muttered from his place on the basket. “First Zhar and now this… Zhar could have waited to speak to Vandar, at the least.” A deep frown formed on his face. “I could forbid this, Knight Juhani.”

“Master-”

“I won’t,” he grumbled. “I won’t test your mettle again. And I must admit I’ve half a mind to go with you, if it weren’t for the need to return these two to Quatra.” He sighed, scratching the thinning hair on his head. He looked old and tired. “Just don’t forget that your loyalty to the Order trumps your loyalty to your friends. If that’s not the case, then you need to reconsider your priorities.”

Juhani bowed her head. “I shall not forget, Master Vrook.”

I was silent as Dak Vessar gave Juhani one last embrace, whispered something to her quietly, and then walked onto the basket to accompany the others. Growwhul gave a soft growl again, before initiating the basket’s ascent. As the lift slowly began to rise, Growwhul remained staring at me, his dark gaze disapproving and forbidding. Dak Vessar had a torn, wistful smile as he looked back down to Juhani.

The basket went up. It did not take long until it was eclipsed by the shadows.

xXx
The voice was slightly gravelly, as if dry from disuse. As he came closer I could see he was, in fact, a male human of advanced years. He lacked any hair on his head, but there was a thick smattering on his chin. There was no colour to him, not through my Force-sight – he was nothing but an etching of blue and black lines.

He was staring at me.

There was no Force aura around him at all. He felt... dead in the Force. Much like Dustil, when he hid. And as the man stood perfectly still, I could not pick him out from the rest of the shadowy environment.

“Jolee Bindo?” Zhar managed, after a noticeable pause. He sounded both puzzled and incredulous.

“Were you expecting someone else?” the stranger replied in a dry tone, his gaze moving to settle on Zhar.

There was a slight look of unease on the Jedi Master’s face. “It has been some time, my old friend. I did not expect to find you so quickly.”

Neither did I. Jolee Bindo’s surprising appearance put paid to my conversation with Zhar for the meantime, and that was enough to increase my ire. Certainly it wasn’t the old man’s fault – by all accounts, we needed him – but he could have sodding well waited a few hours.

Jolee snorted. “At my age, time ends up being a slippery thing.”

“I do believe I am older than you by a few years, Jolee,” Zhar returned, his voice mild and amused. “This is Jen Sahara, a Jedi of the Order who is travelling with me.”

I noticed the complete lack of rank, and my eyes narrowed.

“Let’s get a move on,” Jolee declared. “What you seek is this way.”

The old man turned abruptly, as abruptly as his words had been, and began walking in the same direction we were headed earlier. Zhar glanced at me, his brow slightly furrowed, before following the stranger. The ground was hard-packed and free of any obstacles in this area, and yet the Jedi Master did not speak. I wondered if he was trying to wait the old human out. But Jolee Bindo looked wholly unconcerned and uninterested as he strolled through the Shadowlands, his eyes fixed ahead into the gloom. I’d put my credits on Zhar breaking first, I thought with some amusement.

Sure enough, after minutes of silence, Zhar finally cleared his throat. “So, you know what we seek?” he asked. His voice was cautious and low.

There was a creasing around Jolee’s eyes, as if Zhar’s question entertained him. “The Shadowlands holds many secrets, or so I’ve found over the years. But there’s only one relic around here that would be drawing all you Force users to a remote world like this one.”

“All us Force users…” Zhar frowned. “It has been decades, Jolee, but you were one yourself. How is it I cannot sense you at all?”

I quickened my steps, moving to flank the stranger. “How can you see in the Shadowlands without a light source?” I added. He shot me a speculative sideways look.

“There’s more than one way to kill a kinrath, young pup,” he countered. I raised a brow, but the strange old man didn’t elaborate. If he held no Force, then he couldn’t be using it to assist with his vision. There was no obvious visor or light-source, and off-hand the only solution I could come up with were occular implants.

“You are completely dead in the Force, Jolee,” Zhar said quietly. “What happened?”

The old man didn’t answer at first, and the only sound I heard for some time were our quiet footsteps squelching into the moist forest floor. The humidity was thick down here, where the light never reached. Many species native to Kashyyyk had developed vision advanced enough to make their way through the Shadowlands – Wookiees included – but for us off-worlders, it was nothing more than pitch-black.

“Are you not able to conceal your own Force presence, then?” Jolee Bindo said finally.

I glanced over to Zhar, who was walking on Jolee’s other side with a slight frown. “Certainly, one can dim their Force signature to a near imperceptible spark, so one cannot be sensed unless nearby… but you are completely absent from the Force, Jolee. More so than a non-Force user, more so than a common forest creature. If I could not see you with my own eyes, I would not know you were there. Are you suggesting this is some use of the Force itself?”

There was the slightest touch of disbelief in Zhar’s voice, and it was enough for me to clear my throat, my mouth twitching in a half-grin. Zhar looked over to me as I reached out, striving to emulate the trick Dustil had shown me. With a mental flick, I inverted the Force weaves around me.

My vision went instantly black.

There was a bit of balancing, at first, to keep the inverse energy in place as it repelled the Force away. It didn’t work as a shield, as such – I imagined any Force attack directed at it would sever the weaves in a blink – but it did hide my presence from being sensed, even as it cut me off from the Force. It was a passive use, too, and one that could be held for some time with minimal effort.

In the Shadowlands, though, my lack of sight was disorienting, and I was quick to drop the weaves.
I glanced over to Zhar; the startlement on his face showed me this was new to him - a Jedi Master.

So where the frell had Dustil learned it?

I’d not managed to emulate Dustil’s physical invisibility, though. That was a shame. The two tricks coupled together were a powerful tool indeed.

Jolee Bindo wore an inscrutable expression as he continued walking; stripped from the Force the way he was, he wouldn’t have sensed what I’d done. But Zhar had, and the curiosity was paramount on his face.

Zhar’s composure had been slipping a bit, since we’d met the enigmatic Jolee Bindo. And I had to admit, I relished the idea of knowing something Force-related that the Jedi Master – who knew my secrets – didn’t.

“I’m not suggesting anything,” Jolee said, at last answering Zhar. “You’re welcome to draw your own conclusions.”

That sent the Twi’lek Master back into silence. I found myself liking this strange old man. He certainly wasn’t quick to explain himself. He’s unnerving Zhar, though. So much for them being old chums.

“How long have you lived down here?” I asked in curiosity. We walked through a section of thick-bladed grass that was a little above chest-height. I felt the moisture on my hands as I swatted the plants away, and wondered if light clothing was a sensible choice down here. The temperature was ambient, though – I was unlikely to suffer from the cold here. “Why make this place your home?”

“You want to play question and answer, kid?” he returned, glancing at me sideways. I felt a stirring of empathy with Mission – that moniker was irritating, particularly when I’d left my childhood behind decades ago. “Fine. I’ll go first. I’ve found Kashyyyk is a good place in which to retire. People leave you alone. As for how long… well. I stopped counting a long time ago. Let’s just say when I first came here I was a strapping young man with a head full of hair, and Coruscant was a small town with a well. Heh heh.”

Zhar snorted. “You didn’t have that much hair, even back then.”

Zhar’s irreverence surprised me, and I saw a fond smile on the Twi’lek’s face. Jolee, however, ignored him to continue staring at me. “Your turn. What do you know of this relic?”

The question was blunt and straightforward… and Jolee hadn’t named it a Star Map. So maybe he had absolutely no idea what it was. Although, he’s asking me what I know of it. That doesn’t necessarily mean he’s ignorant. “It’s a navigational map.” I replied. Jolee hadn’t completely answered my first question, and I wasn’t sure how comfortable Zhar would be with me divulging all the details to someone who had left the Order decades ago. “We don’t know what it points to.”

Come to think of it, it wasn’t like I knew that many details myself.

Jolee hummed, Zhar remained silent, and I thought on what to ask next. “Are there more off-worlders down here in recent times?” I questioned. “I have reason to suspect there’s a second elevator down to the Shadowlands. Have you seen anything?”

Jolee’s forehead furrowed with speculation, a bunching of blue-black lines in my Force-sight. He appraised me out of the corner of his eye as we walked on, out of the grass and through a leaf-strewn area that slipped and slid under our feet.

We were moving slower, now, than Zhar and I had earlier. Jolee had no Force – and whether that was intentional or not was going to be one of my next questions.

“You’ve heard something about Czerka interests, and are sticking your nose in – or thinking about it,” he surmised. “But which side are you on? The profitable one, or the honourable one?”

“You didn’t answer the question, old man.”

“Huh,” he harrumphed. “Impatient one. You don't want to be just another fool with a big impatient chip on their shoulder.”

I snorted. “And you don’t want to be another geriatric who no one listens to because you keep talking in circles.”

To my surprise, Jolee laughed. “Alright, alright. Yes, Czerka have two lifts down here now. Hidden in their control towers, I believe. Paid a pretty credit to the Wookiee chieftain, although I doubt most of his people know about them. It’s taken them years before they were finished, the second one’s only been operational for a fistful of months.”

“How can Czerka hide this from the Wookiees?” Zhar asked, a note of disapproval in his tone. “Building an elevator down here – surely that must be common knowledge.”

"It's my turn for a question," Jolee said. His voice was mild, yet resolute. He was keeping his cards close to his chest, and considering his past history with Zhar, that surprised me not a little.

"The Wookiees keep to themselves," I murmured in an aside to Zhar. "And it sounds like they're not allowed to roam freely through the Czerka starport. If the lifts are concealed in the towers, then the only place the Wookiees could conceivably find them is the Shadowlands."

“How,” Zhar acknowledged, likely thinking on my conversation with Canderous earlier. I’d been surprised to hear that Czerka weren’t allowing unrestrained Wookiees walking around. This was Kashyyyk, for frell’s sake. I couldn’t imagine any Wookiee standing for that.

*It’s to stop them seeing the slaves. Czerka must turn them away at the entrance. *Still, it was hard to believe. Maybe that was part of the reason there were a hundred of them in a transport ship – some had found out the truth.

“Here’s a big one, and I’m looking for your honesty here, young pup.” Jolee drew my attention by halting, turning to stare at me through narrowed eyes. “Where does your loyalty lie, Jen Sahara?”

Jolee was keeping a close eye on me, as if attempting to gauge my sincerity through sight alone. Certainly, the ability to read someone through body language or intonation was useful, but it wasn’t exactly an infallible science.

His question, though… it was an interesting one. Despite myself, I was intrigued enough to truly consider it.

I sighed, closing my eyes briefly to the indigo lines of the Shadowlands, broken up here and there by yellow sparks of smallish insects. I would be glad to see proper light again, and briefly considered activating a lightsaber just for the sheer radiance of it.

Where did my loyalty lie? To my crewmates, obviously. To Carth, to Bastila – even if I felt conflicted over her secrets, to Mission and Juhani and Canderous and Zaalbar. But, beyond that?

I followed Bastila's mission, now. I hadn’t, at first, but somewhere along the line my loyalty had truly swung in favour of her objective: to stop Darth Malak by tracking down the source of his power. His expansion and destruction were a threat to the stability of the Republic, to the Jedi of the Order, and to billions of people around the galaxy.

I’d been a Jedi Knight, once. It was obvious where my loyalty lay.

“The Republic,” I said, my voice slow and wondering as the words came out. I opened my eyes to see them both staring at me. Zhar’s eyes were wide. “My loyalty is to the Republic, the ideals and the foundations it was built on.”

“That’s an interesting answer for a Jedi,” Jolee commented. He began walking again, at a slower pace, and Zhar and I followed.
“Is it?” I countered. This felt familiar; like I’d had to defend this particular viewpoint before. “The Jedi are guardians of the galaxy and mediators for peace. The Republic is meant to be an empire that strives for harmony amongst all its members, no matter how diverse.”

“A Jedi’s first loyalty is to the will of the Force,” Zhar cut in. His voice had returned to the damnable neutral tone of earlier. “And second to the Jedi Order.”

“And what if you don’t know what the Force wants?” I said. For some reason, Zhar’s comments made me feel overly irritable. “Do we sit back, meditate for years, and try to guess? And what if the Order itself is wrong?”

There was a slight noise as Zhar breathed in quickly. “Do you realize quite how egotistical that sounds, Jen?”

I sighed. Yeah, I did. And I didn’t think it was coming from the echo of Darth Revan, either. If I’d followed her into the Mandalorian Wars, then I must have put the Republic above the Order at one time.

She must have, too.

I clenched a fist, hard enough to dig my nails into my flesh. I wasn’t going to excuse that sorry piece of destructive Sith crap. She may have had a way with words to convince so many to follow her, but there had to be something innately flawed with her to begin with, to fall the way she did.

“It’s not meant to, Zhar,” I muttered. “Look, I’m not saying I know better than the Masters. All I’m saying is that just because we wave a glow stick around and wear brown robes doesn’t necessarily make us right. Or that we should seat ourselves apart from everything in the damn galaxy.”

“There are many reasons Jedi do not involve themselves directly with societal injustices, Jen,” Zhar replied. I had the feeling we were getting off-topic, and Jolee appeared more than content to let us go at it. “We are advisors only because of the very power we wield. We cannot have a jealous eye being turned on us, or any claims against our impartiality, if we wish to help the people you want to protect. And then there is the Dark Side, and the overwhelming damage it can do—”

“I know,” I interrupted. “I understand the tightrope the Order has to walk – politically speaking - if they truly want to aim for peace for all. But the Republic… Look, I’ll not deny it has its corruption, its blind-spots and its inherent bureaucracy that borders on stupidity, at times. But it’s the best model the galaxy has come up with, so far. Surely that’s worth fighting for?”

“At what cost, Jen?” Zhar murmured. “War is damaging for all sentients. It is worse for Jedi, who feel the very fabric of life with their senses. So much death and suffering has an enormous effect on one’s soul.”

“That’s why the Order sat back from the Mandalorian Wars?” I asked. My voice had dropped in volume, much the same as Zhar’s. “The Council was worried about the Dark Side?”

“That was one reason amongst many. But, as you know, the best and the brightest of us did, in fact, fall in the end. Our gravest fears were proved true.”

“Well, the Order was divided, wasn’t it,” I said quietly. “Who knows how it might have played out, had the High Council actually supported the Republic.”

Zhar had not been expecting that one, I could tell by the way his shoulders tensed up. I hurried to keep speaking. “The alternative was to sit back, and let the Mandalorians reach the Core,” I said. “I don’t know enough—“ I don’t remember enough—“about the Wars to give an expert assessment, but the Republic was close to falling. Opinions are pretty widespread about that.”

The silence that followed was tense. For once, Zhar’s emotions were apparent through the Force; more than anything, he felt conflicted. Some part of him, at least, agreed with me.

I still couldn’t sense Jolee at all. I recalled, then, that it was my turn to ask a question - but a few flickers of life nearby drew my attention.

Jolee looked up from a device attached to his wrist. “A small group of katarn,” he muttered. He brushed the sleeve of his garment back over his arm, and it was hard to tell exactly what he’d been looking at. A bioscanner, likely. I thought I’d seen the interleaving of scale or mesh armour, too, which was an interesting choice for a Force user.

If Jolee was still one. He pulled out a vibrosword, then, and I wondered if he’d lost his connection to the Force permanently. Whether that was even possible.

Yes. Yes it is.

I scowled, and pushed the dark voice to the back of my mind.

We edged forward, toward the rustling noise of animals moving in the underbrush. Jolee wielded his blade expertly, confident enough to lead two Force users against the predators of the Shadowlands.

There were four of them; decent-sized reptomammals that turned at our approach, the nearest launching forward from a four-legged jump aimed straight at Jolee. My ‘sabers flared to life, and the Force swelled in my grasp, boosting an instinctive strength and speed into my muscles. I ran, overtaking Jolee with ease, and sliced through the neck of the nearest katarn.

It was practised instinct, now. I could sense the movements of the enemy, position myself in the exact spot to dodge a swipe, land a blow, and spin to face the next one. Calculating precision, a lifetime’s worth of experience that was bedded deep into my senses, my psyche, my very being. With a final leap, I landed next to the last surviving reptomammal, the cyan ‘saber already scything deep into its underbelly.

I looked up, realizing that four warm corpses were sprawled around me in a haphazard fashion, and Jolee was some metres back, wearing a faint smirk.

“You young things always like to show off,” he commented.

Zhar was staring at me in shock. “That’s- that’s Karon’s lightsaber,” he whispered. “Isn’t it?”

I thumbed off the ‘sabers, and clipped them onto my belt. Zhar’s gaze was intense, even through my Force-sight. I nodded slowly. “I came across her, dying from the fight with Kylah. If I’d been earlier-” I frowned. “I was too late to save her. I scared Kylah off, but I was too late for Karon. She told me to keep her ‘saber.”

Zhar swallowed, and raised a hand. “May I?”

I felt attached to the pale blue lightsaber, more so than the short red one I’d picked up from a random Sith corpse. The weight of it, the balance - it felt right somehow - and the idea of releasing it into the hands of a Jedi Master I still didn’t entirely trust wasn’t appealing. But there was a yearning in the lines of the Twi’lek’s expression that I couldn’t quite ignore.

With some reluctance, I unclipped the ‘saber once more and tossed it to him.
Zhar activated it, giving a few exploratory swipes in the air. The faint hum of Karon’s old weapon reverberated through the air, and I realized then it had become a familiar sound to me.

“Did she- did she say anything else?”

_I failed you. Forgive me._ “No.” I heard the curtness in my voice, and Zhar did too; his gaze shot to mine and he flicked off the ‘saber before handing it back.

“It’s a good weapon, Jen. Take care of it.”

I nodded, and Zhar turned to look at Jolee. “You haven’t asked about Karon,” he said. His voice was almost accusing.

Jolee’s gaze was drawn to the katarn corpses, and he didn’t answer Zhar at first. “We should move from here. Fresh blood draws other predators.” With that, the old human once more began striding into the shadows.

We followed, on either side. Zhar, however, was still staring at Jolee pointedly. Long after the silence had edged into awkwardness, Jolee gave an irritated huff.

“I’ve been here for more of my life than I’d care to remember. The past is exactly that. I figured if you wanted to tell me about Karon, you would.”

Zhar retreated back into silence, a slight frown on his face. The three of them had been Padawans together, he’d said. But Jolee was plainly uninterested in the past, while Zhar, in contrast, was still grieving for his – for their - old friend.

I kept quiet, at first, wondering if I should give them a chance to speak, give Zhar an opportunity to coax Jolee into conversation. I had the feeling that this reunion wasn’t going at all like Zhar had expected.

In the end, the silence began to grate, and I realized it was my turn anyway.

“What about you, Jolee Bindo? What are your loyalties?”

There was a faint twitch at the corner of his mouth. He veered to the right, avoiding a gigantic wroshyr that was directly in our path. There was a massive hollow in the base of it, at least two metres wide, and a faint flare of yellow life deep within. “Much the same as yours, young pup. I favour peace and stability. You could say my loyalties are aligned with the continuation of the Republic.”

That wasn’t quite the same as loyalty to the Republic, but I was beginning to suspect Jolee was a slippery sort of character when it came to conversation. I was mulling his response over when he cleared his throat and once more took up the reins of dialogue.

“I’d like to pose a theoretical one for you this time, Jen Sahara,” Jolee said. There was a patchwork of hanging vines up ahead, and he motioned for us to walk around them rather than through. Above, I could see a shifting in the shadows, and I wondered if the vines were the home of yet another deadly predator. “Say there’s someone out there trying to kill you. Doesn’t matter who, but they’ve tried and failed. Now they come up to you, and claim their reason no longer exists. They’re not a threat anymore. Do you move on or claim vengeance?”

“What’s the point of these questions, Jolee?” For it hadn’t escaped my notice that he was more interested in talking to me than his childhood friend. _He knows something about me. He must,_ I realized with a chill. _He’s trying to figure me out._
“Why, merely to get a measure of your character,” he returned, sounding vaguely amused. “I already know Zhar’s. No need to sound so suspicious. At my age, and especially on this planet, there’s not too much to keep us old folks amused. Now, answer the question.”

“What was their reason?” I parried swiftly.

“Is that important?”

“Absolutely,” I countered. “I need to know how genuine they are, and for that I need the reason they wanted to kill me in the first place. Did I wrong them? Did they have a genuine grievance against me?”

“It’s an impartial motive – nothing personal.”

“Impartial?” I scoffed. “Charming. If it’s impartial, then what’s to stop them impartially changing their mind again?”

“Hmph,” Jolee murmured. He sounded vaguely irritated. “Not quite the point of my question, young pup. Let’s just say you’re convinced they will no longer be a threat. I’m interested in your response to their previous actions, not their potential future ones.”

I took a moment to think it over. “Well, assuming they hadn’t caused any collateral damage or hurt anyone else in the process, I don’t think I’d be particularly interested in revenge.”

He hummed. He was still shooting me considering glances from the corner of his eyes. “You don’t think you deserve something in return for the attempt on your life?”

“Well, now you’re talking about compensation, not vengeance.” I frowned. “And that depends on, again, what other damage they may have caused-”

A faint buzzing on my wrist-comm halted my words. I half-raised my hand at Jolee, and answered the incoming message.

::Jen,:: Carth’s voice emitted from my wrist, and I felt myself smile. ::How are you doing?::

“Fine,” I spoke softly. “We’ve found Zhar’s contact, and are on our way to our objective.”

::That’s- that’s fantastic. How far away is it?::

That was a good question. I turned to frown at Jolee, and he stopped walking.

“We’ll rest here for a bit, have a bite to eat,” he said, motioning toward a fallen log that looked a perfect size for seating. Small sparks of green-yellow flared on one end, while the rest of it was nothing more than a bunch of blue-black outlines. Much like Jolee. “Tell your friend it’s a handful of days away. You might get there in a single day using the Force.”

I relayed the message to Carth, who at least seemed pleased with the progress. His news, however, wasn’t quite so great.

::Neither Juhani nor Zaalbar have returned:: he told me, a note of worry evident in his voice. ::I guess I didn’t expect Zaalbar to. Ordo’s concerned he might end up a slave rather than an exile::

“Juhani’s probably still tied up with the Masters,” I said haltingly. I’d expected her to check in with the ‘Hawk by now, but maybe they had other things on their mind. Like the swift departure of Zhar and myself.
Ordo is keeping himself busy, trying to find some intel on... well, I'm not exactly sure what he's doing. Carth sounded vaguely irritated. I frowned, wondering what Canderous had and hadn't told Carth. I expected Canderous to involve Carth in any plans, but maybe the Mandalorian hadn't gotten that far yet. I'm going to be tied up for a bit, Jen. There's a couple of Republic freighters docked next to us, and I'm going to find out what they're doing on Kashyyyk – and check in with Dodonna while I'm at it.

I felt my brows lift in surprise. What the frell are the Republic doing here? Had the Order contacted them? Carth had been assigned to Bastila, even though he reported to his Admiral. Maybe someone in Republic HQ desired a closer eye on our progress – and, when considering the importance of this mission, that probably made sense.

“Okay,” I said, feeling uneasy regardless. “Possibly someone wants a personal debrief from you rather than a comm’d one. Take care, alright?”

He gave a brief chuckle. I'll be fine, Jen. It's you I'm worried about:

“There’s three of us now, Carth. We’ll find what we need in no time.”

I hope so, Jen. Be careful. I, uh:: he paused, like he wanted to say something more. A public communicator was hardly discrete, though. Be careful:

I felt myself smile wistfully. Once more, I longed for his presence at my side. “I'll see you soon, flyboy,” I promised.

I switched the comm off, and looked up to see Jolee snap open a plastifilm covered ration-pack, before pouring a minute amount of water from a canteen into it. Somehow, I’d expected him to be living off the forest, not armed with off-worlder protein meals.

Zhar was sitting on the log, riffling through his pack as I went to join him. After a moment, he tossed me a thick energy bar of some description, and ripped into a similar one for himself. It tasted heavy and grainy, and I longed for the day I could actually consume some real, unprocessed food.

We ate in relative silence, passing around a gourd of water as the sounds of the Shadowlands permeated the air around us. It was fairly quiet: a faint rustling from further ahead; a clicking noise of some insectoid; and the caw of a flying creature a distance away.

I was beginning to feel a heavy lassitude sink through my body. I was tired. We’d been walking for hours. And at some stage, my awareness of Bastila had dimmed and I’d dropped the psychic shield without consciously realizing it – either she was now blocking me, or she’d fallen asleep. Despite myself, a brief yawn escaped me.

“A few hours rest would be a good idea,” Zhar said quietly. He moved to sit on the ground, leaning back against the log and closing his eyes. I felt the Force retreat around him, to centre in his being, and realized he was lapsing into a meditative state. “I shall awaken if anything comes nearby.”

I moved to copy him, expecting some semblance of sleep to overtake me quickly.

It didn’t.

I’d hoped, by now, to have some concrete answers from Zhar. Jolee’s fortuitous appearance had scuttled that, and I had the feeling that Zhar wouldn’t be overly keen to talk about my history in the presence of company.
And Jolee was trying to figure me out. I wasn’t sure if he was merely testing my character, or trying to pull secrets from my head. What would he think, should he find out sodding Darth Revan had taken up residence in my head? Was it possible he already knew? Zhar hadn’t seen him for decades – an odd forty years, he’d mentioned, since Jolee had disappeared.

My eyes opened, to see Jolee staring at me again. A blue-black eyebrow raised in my Force sight.

“Got something on your mind, do you?” Jolee murmured.

He certainly was an enigma, that one. Jolee had implied decades of his life were spent down here, and yet the human hermit still preferred to use technology – ‘scanners, synthetic food – rather than living with nature the way I’d expected him to. And he knew something about me, at least – enough that I was far more interesting to him than Zhar Lestin, a Jedi he’d trained with in his youth.

Had I met Jolee Bindo before? He didn’t seem at all familiar.

But Revan had come here once before, to get the Star Map. It’s entirely possible she met him.

Zhar wasn’t at ease with Jolee, not really. They’d been good friends, once, but there was something about Jolee Bindo now that put Zhar on edge.

Zhar had also expected Jolee to be using the Force - much the same as us. It could be that Jolee was hiding his strength from us both – but why? Much more likely that Jolee had lost the Force, somewhere along the line. That would explain why he was equipped with a vibrosword rather than a lightsaber, why he had what I thought was armour under his loose clothing.

Yet the Masters who came down here earlier sensed a Force user.

I felt a tingle of awareness, and my gaze narrowed on him.

“You’re not Jolee Bindo,” I said, my voice quiet, watching him intently.

I wasn’t sure, not until I saw the complete lack of movement on his part. He could have faded into the background of my Force sight, had I not known exactly where he was sitting.

“And you’re not Jen Sahara,” he murmured. “Are you?”

He was preternaturally still, the same as me. I knew exactly where my lightsaber was, and held onto the Force tight, ready to strike at a moment’s notice. “What are you after, old man?” I demanded. “Are you even leading us the right way?”

“Oh, yes,” he confirmed. A small smile curved on his face. “Continue in this direction, and you shall find what you seek. As for what I’m after, I should have thought that would be obvious.”

His intonation had changed, somewhat. His voice was neutral, his manner a touch more formal than before. He seemed less a wry self-deprecating ex-Jedi, and more a detached observer.

“All I’ve figured out is that you’re trying to figure me out.”

He gave a quiet chuckle. “You are an interesting character, I’ll give you that.” He said no more, as if trying to make me lead the conversation. It was irritating.

“And what have you concluded?”

“Your interests align with mine, for now.”
Interests... He was affiliated with the Republic, or – more accurately – loyal to the stability the Republic offered. He must know who was bouncing around in my head, which explained some of his queries. The fact that I’d shunted the Republic above the Jedi Order had likely appeased him.

Which also meant he had great faith in his own ability to spot the truth, to read people – and that suggested either over-confidence or training. I was willing to bet my last credits he was some sort of intelligence agent.

And he looked enough like Jolee Bindo to have fooled Zhar, to some extent.

That spoke of technology or surgery – resources behind him, anyway. His other line of questioning – about vengeance - made less sense, unless it was purely to see how Dark Side I was with Darth wacko in my head. For the only impartial attempt on my life I could recall was from the GenoHaradan, which in reality was no more than a trumped up bounty hunter organization – just more secret and expert at it than the Exchange.

Unless there was more to them. My eyes narrowed.

“You’re with the GenoHaradan,” I guessed. The stranger who called himself Jolee Bindo completely failed to react at all, and I knew then I was right. “Which means two things,” I continued slowly, even as my muscles tensed. Scenes flashed through my mind in rapid fire: the slaughter on Rii’shn, the quiet corpse outside the shyrack caves. “You’ve dropped the contract on me, and there’s a lot more to you all than just assassination attempts.”

“You’re perceptive,” the old man returned. He folded his hands in his lap, but his gaze didn’t stray from mine. “Can’t say I’m surprised at that. But I’m not an agent, not anymore. In all honesty, I’m retired, although one doesn’t ever truly retire from the GenoHaradan. But I was far enough up the ranks that I’ve autonomy, of a sort. Let us just say I owed Eridius a favour.”

He paused, then, like he expected me to react.

“Should that name mean something to me?” I questioned.

He shrugged. “I wondered, but evidently not. As to your questions – yes, we are far more than an organization that posts out contracts on sentients. That is our front, to the few who know of our existence. Our cashflow, if you will. But our main purpose is the stability of the galaxy – and, for the most part, that means the ongoing existence of the Republic.”

“The most part?”

“Well...” He paused for a brief moment. “There was a time when we believed that perhaps the Republic was not sufficient, shall we say, to the continued order that we desire. But our... contact, in those dealings, was lost. So for now, we wait and we watch. Perhaps our contact will return, and explain what is still a mystery – even to an organization such as ours.”

He hesitated over the word contact, which was intriguing in itself. But I had other questions to ask, first. “Had I answered you differently, would you have killed me?”

He shrugged. “I don’t dally in what-ifs, and nor should you. I work toward the goals of my people, and a Sith Empire led by an insane Dark Jedi is not an outcome we desire.”

I snorted. “Don’t think it’s a desire of many people, to be honest.”

“We wouldn’t normally take such an interest, if it wasn’t for the armada Malak has gathered. More ships than he has people, or so our intelligence suggests. Tell me, you who call yourself Jen Sahara, are you ready to put an end to Darth Malak?”

I raised an eyebrow. “That’s a bit of an assumption, to think it’s going to come down to me and him.”

“Is it?” he questioned, and I found I had no answer. I shifted uncomfortably.

“Look, all I know is that he’s bent on destroying the Republic, and has a gratuitous disregard for sentient life. If I have the chance to stop him, I will.”

“Interesting,” he murmured, and said nothing else. There was a faint buzzing on my wrist-comm, and I thumbed the ignore button.

“So, that contract’s been lifted. I can’t imagine that was ole Malak’s decision.”

“We had little knowledge of your quest, then,” he said mildly. “If you are, indeed, the Republic’s best chance – and we believe you may be – then we have every right to pull the contract.”

That was a fairly weighty thing to state – especially considering it had been all of us, every single member of the Ebon Hawk, who’d had a part to play in our success so far.

My eyes narrowed on the stranger. “And how do I know you won’t reinstate the contract?”

He gave a short laugh. It echoed in the shadows. “You don’t. But I spoke of compensation, earlier, and I was genuine. If you are content to leave us alone, then I shall give you two warnings in return and leave you to your mission.”

“I have no desire to hunt down the GenoHaradan,” I said quietly. “You guys have made enough of a mess in my life. Speak.”

He stared at me. “First: we are not alone in the Shadowlands. Between here and your objective are two Dark Jedi. Proceed with caution.”

I tensed. Two Dark Jedi… but then there was me and Zhar, a Master of the Jedi Order. We should be able to avoid them, or stand our ground.

“Who are they?”

He shrugged. “I have my suspicions, as I am sure you will, too. I didn’t get close enough to confirm their identity. I usually keep my distance from Force users.”

Obviously I was the exception. I raised an eyebrow. “And what of Jolee Bindo? Does he even exist? And if so, does he know you like to run around impersonating him?”

The stranger gave a brief chuckle. “He exists, he’s around here somewhere. But not even Jolee Bindo knows all the secrets of the Shadowlands. Oh, he’s aware of my presence - his continued tampering of my comm arrays is evidence of that – but, as I said, I’ve no interest in making friends with Force sensitives.”

Exactly why someone would bother setting up a comm array in the Shadowlands was a question I didn’t bother asking. Probably, this stranger desired extensive contact with the rest of the galaxy, given his affiliations.

I gave him a tight nod, and he continued.

“Two: the Republic presence on Kashyyyyk has orders to capture you, Jen Sahara. If you wish to put an end to Darth Malak, then you had better find a way of avoiding them as you leave this planet.”

The Republic… what the frell? The shock was like a bucket of ice water had been tipped over me, and the Force shook in my grasp, blue-black lines of Force-sight disappearing momentarily before I grasped it again. That meant… that meant someone high up in Republic HQ knew what the Jedi had done to me, knew Darth Revan was entrenched in my mind. The Republic… and the sodding GenoHaradan.

But the GenoHaradan believed I was worth a shot, where the Republic obviously didn’t. That burned.

“Understood,” I bit out. “Don’t suppose you can give me any good news?”

The old man chuckled again. “We’re not looking to kill you anymore. Isn’t that enough?”

The GenoHaradan believed in the Republic’s continued existence – which wasn’t the same as agreeing with their objectives, otherwise this stranger would hardly be leaving me alive and free. Sun and stars, he’d told me a lot more about the GenoHaradan than outsiders likely knew. He stood, then, his knees cracking as he flexed his back. He was still looking at me with a vaguely interested expression.

“You can find us again, should you have reason to,” he said quietly. His voice was matter-of-fact, like he expected it to be a distinct possibility. “You have the recruitment point on Manaan. Drop the name Rulan Prolik, and someone of import will meet with you.”

I had no idea why I’d want to do that, but I nodded anyway. “Is that your name?”

“What’s in a name?” he countered. “You, of all people, should know a name can mean absolutely nothing. Or everything. I’ll leave that with you.”

He turned from me, then, and began to walk away, into the blue-black shadows of my Force sight. And just as he was about to disappear, his entire outline shifted somehow, merged into a form smaller and leaner, less humanoid than before.

And then he was gone.

“Well.” Zhar’s voice was soft. “That was interesting.”

“You’re a master of understatement,” I muttered, leaning back and closing my eyes. It didn’t surprise me at all that Zhar had been awake the whole time. “Did you know?”

“That he wasn’t Jolee? I wondered. He didn’t say my name, until after you had. And yet, he had Jolee’s mannerisms.”

“Did you see him change form?” I asked. “That’s pretty advanced technology.” I frowned. I’d heard of belt-morphs that could change someone’s appearance via a photo-electronic field generator, but they were notoriously finicky – and I should have been able to sense the electrical oscillations.

“I do not think that was technology,” Zhar mused. “I have heard of shape-shifters, before; a race of sentients with the ability to change their form at will, through some sort of bio-mental process. I did not believe in their existence, but now I am not so certain.”

I sighed. Somehow, I didn’t think I’d ever get to the bottom of Rulan Prolik – or whatever his name was. And, frankly, there were more important things to think on. “The Republic are after me.
Fantastic. We need to have our talk, Zhar.”

“Indeed,” he murmured. “But the Sith in the Shadowlands are what I’m concerned about. We should not use the Force, Jen, no more than simple Force-sight. Anything too overt can be sensed from a distance.”

“You don’t think we can hold our own against two Dark Jedi?” I raised a hand to rub at my temple. There was a headache forming, and I wondered if I felt the faint stirrings of Bastila waking up. In pain, Zhar didn’t answer at first, and I opened my eyes to stare at him. “Who do you think they are?”

“If they eluded Vrook and Vandar, then they will be a threat we cannot take lightly,” he warned. “It will not be Malak himself, but someone near his strength. Bandon Stone. Yudan Rosh. Nisotsa Organa. Sharlan Nox. Any one of those names should worry you, and two of them together is enough to make me consider returning to the others.”

Kel had mentioned Darth Bandon to me once, back on Korriban, but they were all faceless villains in my head - as anonymous as the spectre of big bad ole Malak.

The names meant nothing to me. But Zhar was staring at me like they should.

Damn Darth Revan. Maybe they were all her best mates, but they were still out to kill her – through me – weren’t they?

And Rulan – or whoever the frell he was – wondered if I knew the name Eridius.

Panic flashed through my mind, then, as quick and electric as lightning shearing through a night sky. It was Bastila, waking up with a jolt, and the Force flared wildly from her before ricocheting through our bond. I winced.

I can beat this. I shall wield the Force, I shall!

She wasn’t talking to me, but convincing herself, I realized. The Force was fluttering like a frantic wisp-fly in her mental grasp, slipping through her fingers like sand, bleeding back through to me-

Bastila?

There was a renewed sense of determination from her, and she either ignored me or could not hear. I felt her lunge out frantically, her psychic grip clumsy and unwieldy and completely failing to hold onto anything.

Are you drugged?

I- yes- stop talking to me, Jen! This is what he wants- you must stay away from my mind!

Zhar was frowning at me, and I tried to draw back into myself, to hold only the smallest amount of Force required for sight. It was difficult, open the way I was to Bastila, for her wild attempts were akin to a rancor picking up a dust-ball, and the flashback was hitting me.

Look, I’m safe now, alright? I’m with the Masters-

Don’t tell me anything, Jen! Her voice had turned quasi-hysterical, then, although there was a thread of frustration there, too. Don’t you see, he’ll just rip it from my mind?
I stilled; understanding at last. Was Bastila being used, to get at me? No, no, Bastila was a prize in herself. If her gifts could be turned against the Republic, it might be the final blow. Like I’d told Carth, hurt anyone long enough and they’d do anything to stop it.

I couldn’t let her deal with it alone, no matter the risk to me… but it wasn’t just about me and Bastila. The key objective was getting to the Star Map, first and foremost. I had to leave Bastila until that was complete.

The shame tasted like ash in my mouth.

Zhar was standing, his brow furrowed. “We should move,” he said quietly. “If someone is tracking us through the Force, they may have felt you just now.”

I felt my lips thin as I realized he was right, and rose to my feet. I may not have slept, but the few hours downtime would be enough to keep me going.

I have to stay shielded from Bastila, I realized with gutting disappointment. I gathered in a small amount of energy, about to erect a psychic barrier when one last message slipped through:

Stay away from the Shadowlands, she whispered. Do not tell me where you are, just stay away from the Shadowlands.

Uh-

No. No! It was a scream of fright, of hysteria, as she understood my hesitation. You cannot be there already! It’s a trap, Jen, get out of there!

Her emotions were savage, completely unrestrained and utterly unlike her. She was there, abruptly, in my head; fearful and unhinged. And the Force echoed in response, a wild surge of energy with a backlash like a terentatek’s claw-

“Jen!” Zhar yelled. “Stop it!”

I slammed down a shield that blocked the bond, and Bastila’s panic faded to a distant whimper in the back of my mind. I heard the sound of my own breaths, quick and shallow, an echo of Bastila’s frenzy.

“Come,” Zhar ordered, hoisting his pack over a shoulder, and striding fast into the shadows. There was no Force under his feet, it was pure muscle driving him on, and I hurried to catch up. He wasn’t walking in the same direction as Rulan had, I noticed, but slightly to the left.

“Bastila. She’s hysterical.”

“And she made you panic,” he said, his voice unnaturally curt. “You must keep her at bay for now, Jen. For both our sakes.”

“I will. But that wasn’t me panicking, that was all her.” Drawing through the bond, clutching at my Force. She hadn’t meant to, she likely had no idea – but it was the edge of her hysteria that had called to my Force-senses. Sithspit. I can’t let this happen again.

Zhar stumbled, a slight misstep of his hurried pace. “That bond,” he muttered. “It’s too strong. I don’t know of any Force bond in existence that is as open and powerful as yours appears to be.”

I frowned. “So there’s other Jedi out there, with mind-links like ours?”

“A handful I know of,” Zhar murmured, veering further to the left. “And not all Jedi, either.
Although—" He halted mid-sentence, his head cocking.

“What?” I demanded. “Do you sense something?” I didn’t dare draw the Force out beyond the shield and the small amount required for sight.

“This way. Now!”

And he broke into a run.

I caught up, jumping over an exposed root, the both of us sprinting unaided by the Force, veering around clumps of undergrowth and beneath spindly kshyy vines that dangled free from the wroshyrs they grew upon. The blue-black of the Shadowlands blurred as I struggled to hold the psychic shield tight and small, aimed to draw only the smallest amount of power needed for sight-

“Throw me a visor,” I panted. He had a spare, he’d said. I could use that, cut myself off from the Force, and then no one would be able to sense me-

Zhar came to a sudden stop, and I stumbled sideways to avoid slamming into his back. He threw his pack off in a hurried move, and turned to stare into the shadows.

“It’s too late.”

I heard the thrum of a vehicle nearing, and my stomach coiled into tight knots. Without realizing it, my ‘sabers were back in my grasp. I heard the hiss of Zhar’s activating.

A jumpspeeder spat out of the shadows, before skidding sharply to an abrupt halt some metres in front of us. A loosely clothed humanoid figure jumped from the one-man vehicle.

My mind cleared; the fear faded away, replaced by calm, cool precision.

The figure stared at me, and a smirk grew on his face. He was young, and bald, and confident. Behind him, a second jumpspeeder screeched to a stop.

“Well. You certainly took your time,” he drawled, and a bar of evil hissed alive in his grasp.

xXx
Start-Up System Check
Motoring Functions Online
Shielding Functions... All Online
Assassination Protocols... Restricted Access
Combat Mode... Online (Owner Command or Override Required)
Memory Core Function... Unable To Access

Audio Sensors... Online
Optical Sensors... Online
Tactile Sensors... Online
Olfactory Sensors... Online
Gustatory Sensors... Not Installed

Scanning External Environment
Location: Ebon Hawk Engineering Section
2 Organic Meatbags, 1 Droid in Targeting Area

Identification – Canderous Ordo, Mission Vao, T3-M4

Primary Objective: Locate and Protect Jen Sahara (Current Owner)

Input – Mission Vao to Canderous Ordo: “Well?”
Voice Stress Analysis: Demanding

Input – Canderous Ordo to HK-47: “What’s your status, HK?”

Quick Self Diagnostic Routine Activated ...Result: No Errors Detected

Output: “Statement: I am fully functional, Geriatric Blockhead.”

Input – Mission Vao to Canderous Ordo: “C’mon Canderous, who cares about fixing that insane droid. Tell me what ya found out at Czerka!”

Input – Canderous Ordo to Mission Vao: “Look, kid, I ain’t gonna repeat myself. We’ll talk when Onasi gets back – I’ll give him an hour.”

Auditory Input: Irritated Huff
Source: Mission Vao

Input – Mission Vao to Canderous Ordo: “From the way those Republic suits were eyeing Carth up, I don’t reckon he’s gonna be back here anytime soon.”

Input – T3-M4 to Mission Vao (Astromech Designated Communication Language): “Male human requesting entrance to Ebon Hawk. Initial biometric scans indicate identification as approved member of the Ebon Hawk.

Input – Mission Vao to Canderous Ordo: “Okay, I take it back! Teethree says Carth is at the door!”

Input – Canderous Ordo to Mission Vao: “I’ll get it, kid. You stay here.”

Visual / Audio Tracking: Canderous Ordo Leaving Targeting Area

Input – T3-M4 to Mission Vao (Astromech Designated Communication Language): “Retinal and thermal scans identify sentient as Dustil Onasi, approved member of the Ebon Hawk.”

Output: “Observation: The accuracy of Gizka Spawn has once more proved to be on a par with a Czerka Thrifty Blaster 100.”

Input – Mission Vao: “Shut it, rustbucket. Honestly, I have no idea why Jen puts up with you.”

Output: “Commentary: I am a highly advanced combat and protocol droid, with moderate splicing skills, expert translation capabilities, superior combat and assassination protocols, and an advanced wit designed to both amuse meatbags and have them reflect on their meaningless existence. Retort: What skills do you offer, Gizka Spawn, to allow the Master to keep you?”

Input – Mission Vao: “I’m not talking to you anymore.”

Voice Stress Analysis: Petulant

Scanning External Environment: Longer Range Bioscan Activated
...No Additional Life Forms Onboard Freighter
...Factor: Ship is Currently Docked
...Factor: Internal Clock Shows Time Lapse of Sixteen Standard Days Since Deactivation
Possible Conclusion: Ebon Hawk Has Left Korriban For Next Proposed Destination: Kashyyyk

Secondary Objective: Ascertain Location
...Physical: Moving to Interface With Ebon Hawk Navi-Computer
...Interface Initiating

Input – Mission Vao to T3-M4: “Teethree, what did you and Canderous find out at Czerka? What ain’t he telling me?”

Secondary Objective Completed: Interface Completed
...Factor: Ebon Hawk Docked At Czerka Corporation Starport, Planet G5-623 Reference Edean Alias Kashyyyk
...Factor: Jen Sahara (Current Owner) Departed Ebon Hawk 1.34 Standard Days Ago For Rwookrrorro
...Analysing: Rwookrrorro: Moderate Wookiee Township. Known Jedi Order Presence In Attendance
Conclusion: Threat Assessment To Master Unknown. Continue With Primary Objective

Input – Mission Vao to T3-M4: “You got a map? Cool! Can you show it?”
Visual Tracking: T3-M4: Holo-Map Projection Initiated

Analysing: Holo-Map Projection...
...Two Identical Super Structures Of Note: 302 Metres in Depth of Outer Building
...Inner Shaft Extends To Planetary Surface, 1143 Metres in Depth
Conclusion: Inner Shaft Is A Transport Mechanism Or Elevator

Visual Tracking: Canderous Ordo and Dustil Onasi Entering Targeting Area

Input - Canderous Ordo to Mission Vao: “You just had to be nosey, didn’t you, ad’ika?”
Voice Stress Analysis: Amused

Input – Mission Vao to Canderous Ordo: “Hey, don’t call me names I don’t understand. And look, Teethree’s my droid anyway, so I can- oh, hi, Dustil. Where’s your dad?”

Input – Dustil Onasi to Mission Vao: “Busy talking. And being talked to. It’s going to go on for ages, I can tell.”
Voice Stress Analysis: Annoyed

Input – Mission Vao to Dustil Onasi: “Oh, did he send you back, then?”

Input – Dustil Onasi to Mission Vao: “No. But I’m not waiting around for him to remember he’s got a son.”

Auditory Input: Dismissive Snort
Source: Canderous Ordo

Input – Canderous Ordo to T3-M4: “Turn that map off.”

Input – T3-M4: (Astromech Designated Communication Language): “Awaiting Confirmation From Master.”

Input – Mission Vao to Canderous Ordo: “Told ya he was my droid.”
Voice Stress Analysis: Smug

Input - Mission Vao to Dustil Onasi: “And Dustil, don’t be so hard on your dad, alright? I mean, you disappeared on him before. He’s just trying to protect you ‘cause he loves you.”

Input – Dustil Onasi to Mission Vao: “First he wants me to be a Jedi, and now he wants me to stay on some frakking Republic ship while he gets grilled by a half-dozen officers. Frakk that. That’s not love, that’s nothing more than controlling me.”
Voice Stress Analysis: Angst-Ridden Hormonal Adolescence

Input: Mission Vao to Dustil Onasi: “You’re such a brainless nerfherder. He’s trying to keep you safe. D’ya even know what love is?”
Voice Stress Analysis: Annoyed

Input – T3-M4 to Mission Vao (Astromech Designated Communication Language): ”Love is a hormonal response designed to enable an organic to act in defence of their offspring or chosen mate in times of danger. It can be defined as a biological survival mechanism.”

Input – Mission Vao to T3-M4: “Didn’t follow all of that, but I know Teethree said something about family. See, even this little guy understands what love is!”

Output: “Conjecture: Love has a more ephemeral meaning than a meatbag protecting its dribbling spawn, you ignorant bucket of bolts. Example: Love is making a shot to the knees of a target 120 kilometers away using an Aratech sniper rifle with a tri-light scope.”

Auditory Input: Laughter
...Source: Canderous Ordo

Input – Canderous Ordo: “I’m not sure that’s love so much as pride in one’s abilities, Tin-Brain.”

Output: “Statement: This definition, I am told, is subject to interpretation. Obviously, love is a matter of odds, of knowing your target, putting them in your targeting reticule, and together, achieving a singular purpose... against statistically long odds.”

Auditory Input: Snicker
Source: Dustil Onasi

Input – Mission Vao to Canderous Ordo: “Okaaaay. Did you have to fix him, Canderous?”
Voice Stress Analysis: Uneasy

Input – Canderous Ordo to Mission Vao: “Having one more gun in the hold while half our crew’s gone walkabout ain’t a bad thing, ad’ika.”

Input – Mission Vao to Canderous Ordo: “You gonna talk about what you and Teethree found, then? You heard Dustil, Carth ain’t gonna be back anytime soon.”

Visual Tracking: Canderous Ordo Gesturing At Holo-Map

Input – Canderous Ordo to Mission Vao: “Look at the Czerka schematics, kid, and tell me what you see.”

Input – Dustil Onasi: “Those inner shafts... they go all the way down, even when the building itself stops.”

Input – Mission Vao: “Whoa... are they what I think they are?”

Input – Canderous Ordo: “Czerka’s constructed lifts to the Shadowlands. Shame our walking carpet has already kriffed off. These schematics would be a slap in the face to his brother’s chieftaincy, I’d say.”

Input – Mission Vao to Canderous Ordo: “Canderous, where’s docking bay F4? Is it close to one of those control towers?”
Voice Stress Analysis: Intrigued

Input – Canderous Ordo to Mission Vao: “Don’t you start getting wild ideas, kid. It may be close-”

Input – Mission Vao to Canderous Ordo: “We gotta help the Wookiee prisoners if we can, Canderous. I mean, they’d rather be exiled in the Shadowlands than slaves – and if both Big Z and his dad are down there already...”
Voice Stress Analysis: Excited

Input – Canderous Ordo to Mission Vao: “Mission-”

Physical: Mission Vao Moving Closer to Holo-Map

Input – Mission Vao to Canderous Ordo: “Look at the map, these control towers have a service entrance I bet I could splice into. And you can see it leading straight to a tech area that backs onto the inner shaft – the elevator. All we need is to get the Wookiees off the freighter and into the control tower-

Input – Canderous Ordo to Mission Vao: “And how do you expect to do that, kid?”

Auditory Input: Snort
Source: Canderous Ordo

Input – Canderous Ordo to Mission Vao: “Look, kid, I’m as gung-ho as you about this. But I ain’t gonna do a suicide run. Getting into the control tower would be easier than getting onboard that freighter – it’s teeming with guards and groundcrew. We need a way to get on that ship either undetected or through brute force, and we ain’t got either.”

Visual Tracking: Canderous Ordo Activating Dynamic-Class Communication Device
...Observation: No Response From Dynamic-Class Communication Device

Input – Canderous Ordo: “Here’s the deal, Mission. I’ve been trying to get Jen on the comm but she ain’t answering. I don’t like this. I’ll give Onasi another hour to turn up, or for one of us to get some brilliant idea to free Zaalbar’s kin. If there’s nothing, though, then I’m heading down to the Shadowlands myself, to find out what the kriff is going on with Jen.” Voice Stress Analysis: Tense

Analysing: Primary Objective Aligns With Canderous Ordo

Output: “Statement: I will follow you, Geriatric Blockhead, to assist and locate my Master.”

Auditory Input: Cough
Source: Dustil Onasi

Input – Dustil Onasi: “Um, I might just have a way of getting onto that freighter without anyone noticing.”

xXx
“Jen,” Zhar hissed, his voice low and intense. “Do not let yourself be distracted by what they may say. We will talk after.”

“Jen?” the bald human mocked. His posture was cocky and confident, and his scalp was etched in mottled tattoos. A dark, familiar voice sneered inside my head. He always did like to fashion himself as a mini-Malak, no matter how loudly he denied it.

I flinched. As far as I knew, Darth Malak could have been a dancing Aqualish – but of course Darth Evil Bitch knew better.

The stranger let out a cruel laugh. “Don’t tell me you still believe those Jedi lies?”

I raised Karon’s ‘saber high; it pierced through my vision as I stared fixedly on our aggressor. I might be able to catch this pissant off-guard, if I’m quick enough.

“I know exactly who’s in my head,” I said. Zhar gave out a strangled sort of noise, like a kinrath had died in his throat. My gaze darted to the second individual, still submerged in the shadows next to his jumpspeeder. He was hanging back - seemingly content, for now, to let the confrontation unfold between us and his comrade.

“Oh, a pity,” Baldy murmured. “For a second there, you had me believing I would get the pleasure of enlightening you, Revan.”

I didn’t flinch this time. My gaze narrowed on him. “By all means, call me that if you think it makes you clever, mini-Malak.”

His eyes widened the briefest amount, before his expression began to contort in a callow anger I had somehow predicted. I was already drawing on the Force, allowing it to surge through my body and launch me into the air, my lightsaber raised and aimed directly for his torso. He wouldn’t block in time; I saw the beginnings of shock slacken his face, and my mouth opened in a fierce rictus as I sensed victory a hairs-breadth away-

-I was slammed sideways in mid-air; self-preservation had me thumbing the off-switch on the ‘sabers and readying my body for a roll as I fell. The air burst from my lungs on impact. As I twisted to the side, I heard the shearing sound of a lightsaber hissing just past me.

I scrambled to my feet, in time to see the thrown ‘saber returning to the grasp of the second Dark Jedi. He remained in the shadows, a hood enshrouding his head, and all I could tell was that he was a humanoid of some description.

He’d interfered. He’d been quicker to glean my intention than Baldy.

He might be the more dangerous one, I realized, as Zhar came to my side and my gaze returned to the tattooed human. The anger on his face had transformed from hot into arctic.

“You haven’t changed,” Baldy hissed. “Still using any underhanded trick to get your way, Revan.”
I switched on my ‘sabers again, muscles tensed for the next attack, my mind clear and concentrated on both Dark Jedi, now.

Apart from a small tendril of unease, coiling deep in my gut.

Baldy knew Darth Revan, obviously. That’s why I knew how to trick him. But that taunt had felt a frell of a lot more like Street Kid than Evil Bitch.

“Jen,” Zhar muttered. I could sense him by my side, strong and resolute and steady. “Stay with me. Do not lose your focus, no matter what.”

Not now, Bastila!

She recoiled in horrified comprehension. I couldn’t spare the mental concentration to block her presence, not now, not in the middle of this – so I could only hope she would remain withdrawn from me. If something – if Malak - happened to her, I would shield myself then. Although it might catch me off-guard, should it occur.

It was, as always, a roll of the dice.

Baldy had turned his sneer on Zhar, now. “Let me see, a worn-out Twi’lek in faded robes with a sad kath-pup expression. I was hoping for Vandar, just to piss Yudan off, but this-” he snickered. “This is better. Tell me, Zhar Lestin, do you still cry at night for my Master?”

There was a dark sort of glee in his voice; he put me in mind of a sadistic kid about to squash a bug just to see if its insides were blue or red.

“I mourn for all who are lost, Bandon Stone,” Zhar said simply.

Bandon Stone. And Bandon referred to Yudan - that must be his shadowed companion. Two names Zhar had mentioned, two of Malak’s top Dark Jedi, their combined strength enough to scare a Jedi Master into running. Bandon, I’d already picked, was hot-headed and easily distracted. Not stupid, though, Revan muttered in a crepuscular corner of my head. That much power without foresight is a sodding waste.

Shut. Up!

I sensed Bastila quail from me; she’d been listening in, despite herself. Bastila, I hissed, tense and urgent. Bandon Stone and Yudan Rosh. Tell me something – a weakness, a strength – anything to help me out here!

No, she whimpered. Run, get out, you must escape-

For frell’s sake, Bastila, between you and sodding Darth Revan I could do with a little help here!

“As amusing as this stand-off is, I have a ship to catch,” Bandon jeered. I could feel the Force swirling around him, a crescendo of power slowly augmenting his strength. Zhar, in contrast, was a steady beacon of light. “There’s room on it for you, Revan, if you behave. But Zhar- well. I’m afraid I’m quite taken with the idea of telling Lord Malak that I was the one to kill you.”
Bandon—he’s very powerful, Bastila whispered. But Yudan knows you, he knows how you fight, he’s one of the best duelists alive—

“Jen.” Zhar’s voice was tight. Somehow, he must have sensed my attention was elsewhere.

“Oh, don’t mind me,” I said flippantly. “Just having a little telepathic chat with Bastila.” That was enough to draw everyone’s attention. Even the mysterious Yudan jerked his head in my direction. I felt a tight smile form on my face, and my next words were crisp and pointed. “She’s escaped and just shoved a sword through Malak’s black heart.”

The disbelieving shock and resulting pause on Bandon’s face had me striking out once more, with a powerful unleashing of pure Force that knocked the both of them flat to the ground. This time, I launched myself at the cloaked Yudan, a gamble in that he was further away, trusting in my own celerity to get there first with an outreached weapon—

Yudan’s sword slammed against mine, a parry from the ground, forceful enough that I stumbled back a pace, and he flew to his feet. His single sword morphed into a double-blade, the point swinging toward me—

—I blocked and thrust out in a riposte that he batted aside with ease. His reprisal was swift, a flurry of blows that immediately had me on the defensive.

My mind cleared; no thought, no emotion, just a lucid focus on my opponent as I understood my life hung in the balance. I ducked under a swing, striking out with a vicious return that met empty air as he somersaulted over me, the Force swelling under his grasp.

I spun around, too slow, my off-hand lifting in an unsteady parry that Yudan knocked aside. His follow-up was fierce, fast, and seared into my hand.

A blazing burn scorched deep into my fingers. There was a thud as my off-weapon dropped. The Force rallied around me in instinct, and I flung myself backward, away, landing metres behind in a controlled crouch.

Agony flared as I flexed my hand, and with a dull sense of horror I realized my grasp wasn’t responding correctly. A quick glance down confirmed my suspicions—the bastard had sheared my two smallest fingers completely off.

Oh, kath crap. Kath crap in a frelling sandstorm!

Zhar’s solid presence stepped to my side, and I sank myself deeper in the Force. Ignore the pain, focus on the present! The pain ebbed as a deluge of power engulfed me, and my attention snapped back to Yudan.

He had paused, facing us both, while Bandon moved to his side. Bandon’s face was twisted in a livid scowl directed solely at me. “You think I would believe that? I would have felt my Master’s death, you imbecile!”

“You believed it, for a second,” I panted. “You always were a bit of a gullible tool, mini-Malak.”

Bandon lifted his sole sword in a threatening motion. “And you were always an overconfident scow. Even now, no more than a puppet of the Jedi Order you once scorned, and you still aren’t smart enough to realize you’re beaten.”

“I am no one’s puppet,” I hissed, my temper spiking. That smarted. Maybe it had been all the months simultaneously doubting Bastila’s motives, and fearing that the voices in my head would conquer me - but I wasn’t going to take that quietly. “Not yours, not the Order’s, and certainly not to the schutta in my head!”

There was a tenebrous silence, then, that seemed to fall on us all. Bandon’s expression contorted in confusion, as if simple thought was currently beyond him. Yudan took a step forward, pushing back his hood to reveal a face etched in the blue-black lines of my Force Sight.

It was like a lined engraving of a long lost loved one, forgotten eons ago.

Nausea reared, and the Force shook uncontrollably in my grasp. The Sight dropped, and I was left with the illumination of lightsabers radiating in the darkness, the blood-red reflecting from Yudan’s face as I stared at him, transfixed.

He was a Twi’lek, my age or somewhat older, with deep pits of Force corruption visible along his cheeks and forehead. My heart pounded resoundingly in my ears, and I felt sweat break out on the back of my neck. A sick, familiar feeling of vertigo swamped me. Not now! Frantically, I gathered in the fragmenting tendrils of my mind, and forcibly turned to face Bandon instead. I could not afford to let my mind wander off, not now.

No matter what Darth Revan and Yudan Rosh were to each other, I would not let it affect me.

Jen, you must hold it together, Bastila whispered, as if sensing my unease.

I raised my arm, and the shorter ‘saber came flying out of the shadows back to me. A hot pain reverberated through my hand, and I fumbled the weapon. I can’t use that hand, I realized with dull horror.

Zhar murmured something, and I was engulfed in the soothing, healing embrace of the Force. The pain faded to a throbbing I could ignore, even if my hand was currently useless.

“The schutta in your head?” Yudan asked, his voice barely louder than a whisper. “Is that why Lestin calls you by that fake name? Because you don’t understand that you are Revan?”

“Jen, not now!” Something akin to a growl escaped Zhar, and the Force heaved out from him in a powerful wave of concussion that should have been unstoppable, and yet Bandon’s hands were raised-

-Bandon- he’s very powerful-

The Force recoiled, returned to hit us. An instinctive twist of the power at my fingertips, and most of it deflected harmlessly above. Most of it.

Zhar stumbled to the ground under the remnants of the backlash.

And Yudan was still staring at me.

“I am not her,” I snarled. “Just because some robe implanted her in my mind-”

My tirade was halted by Yudan’s strangled laugh. The look of utter disbelief on his face completely captured my attention. “I’ve known you most of your life, Revan. I’ve fought beside you, bled for you, followed you into the deepest perdition. I will not let you wallow in some Jedi-induced daydream that allows you to ignore the blood on your hands!”

Most of your life. Yudan had known Darth Revan well. He must have been one of the Jedi to follow her into the Wars. He was probably one of the original Jedi Thirteen.
There was a sick feeling in my stomach.

But just because she was resident in my head, did not make me culpable of her atrocities.

“Say what you will,” I said at last. “But I’m not Revan. I’m just a street kid from Talshion.”

The corners of his mouth turned down.

“You mind-screwed failure,” Yudan whispered, but his voice carried through the thick silence that swamped us all. “Revan was a street kid from Talshion. Revan and Malak both.”

The words took a second to register.

But self-preservation already had me scrabbling for possible reasons, plausible denials- “Is that where I met her?” I mumbled, blinking. There was a queasy churning in my gut; my thoughts felt sluggish, almost paralyzed.

Street Kid’s boyfriend was from Talshion, too. Had we both met her and Malak there, then?

There were no coincidences. The Masters always loved to spout that saying. Seemed a pretty big one to have two powerful Force users from the same place, let alone four-

“Jen-” Zhar murmured. He was back on his feet. “After. Focus, please!”

The desperation in his voice was obvious, and downright incriminating.

No. No, there must be some explanation-

Jen?

A memory, from not long ago, flashed to the forefront of my consciousness. Bastila’s face, drawn and shocked, her voice spluttering in disbelief: "You- you think you have three personalities?"

Bastila, I pleaded. Bastila, I can’t trust anyone- tell me, who am I, who is the real me?

I can hear him coming, Malak’s coming back, I can’t shield myself from you-

Tell me, once and for all, what is my real name?

She was panicking, flailing, a mirror of my own state. Block yourself from me Jen, I’m drugged, I can barely grasp the Force as it is-

BASTILA!

There was a surrender, then, her will succumbing to mine, the crumbling of a wall long since held up against an onslaught from all different directions. I could feel the sharp tang of despair, of hopelessness, and didn’t know if it came from me or her.

Pressure built on all sides, and a sharp crackling pricked along my skin, bright flashes of white light sparking all over me, as my control dropped and the power of the universe seemed to shake all around me.

A vortex of nausea struck hard. There was a hot tearing inside my mind, like the very fabric of it was ripping apart. I heard a scream, and then I fell.
The freighter lurched into space, away from Talshion, away from our origins and toward a brighter life. I nestled into Mal’s side as his hand sought mine.

I’d always dreamed of leaving Talshion, to fly amongst the stars.

““I didn’t think the Jedi existed,” I said. They were a fairy-tale, a fable to whisper at night when your belly was empty and your mind despairing.

Except it turned out they were real, after all. And we – the both of us – somehow had the potential to join them. I’d already pinched myself a hundred times to check I wasn’t dreaming.

“I’m not sure they are what we thought,” Mal muttered, his grip so hard it hurt. I clung onto the pain. “They didn’t give us a choice, Revvie. I don’t give a mynock’s tail how nice they are, they still wouldn’t have let us stay behind.”

“Stay behind,” I scoffed disbelievingly. As if we would want that!

“It’s about personal freedom,” he whispered, his eyes falling shut. He was frowning, suspicious, as he rested against the durasteel bulkhead of the starship. He’d never been quite the same since that time he’d been taken by the Enforcers. I still didn’t know how he’d returned. “We’ve never had any of our entire lives. If they really are these mystical do-gooders, bent on making the galaxy a better place, then surely they should have allowed us that. But we were hustled away without so much a chance to say goodbye.”

He may have a point, I realized, for I would have liked to farewell our friends. Jonohl, Deric, Staria – they’d assume our absence on the streets meant that we were caught. Ness would be the most grieved. And yet, if we’d been allowed a goodbye, how would we be able to explain our departure from Altizir, scummiest city on scummy Talshion? It was a life-long trap for all of us homeless nobodies.

I’d miss them, miss them all – but we couldn’t bring them with us. We’ll come back for them. When we’re proper Jedi, we’ll come back and save them. I had Mal, and in the end, that was the most important thing of all.

My gaze darted around the unfamiliar vessel, trying desperately to contain my awe, my excitement, my eagerness to draw everything in and learn the world. Mal’s caution couldn’t deflate my mood. I saw the opportunity for everything, and no one was going to stop me from grasping it.

“And stars, Revvie, what in the Outer Rim did you introduce us like that for?” his voice snapped, and I glanced sideways to see his mouth twisted with heartache. I’d known it would upset him, but hoped he’d see it for the tribute it was.

"They all have two names, Mal. That horned one with the weird blue eyes – she’s got at least four."

"But- Devari-"

He swallowed painfully. His brother had disappeared, same time as him, both captured by the Enforcers. No one ever returned from that.

Except that Mal had, somehow.

"We're not going to forget where we came from, Mal. Our lives might change radically... but we'll remember the past. I won't let their deaths be final."
Mal had half-formed memories of a drug-addled mother who died when he’d barely begun walking. So it was Devari who’d raised Mal, kept him alive and fed in Altizir’s slums where so many others perished. Sometimes, I believed something had broken inside of Mal once he’d finally accepted that Devari was truly gone.

As for me, I didn’t even have those memories. Only the fleeting image of warm arms tight around me; the sound of a whisper murmuring sweet nothings in a sad, sad voice.

I knew my mother had landed on Talshion pregnant with me. She died a handful of years later, in a gutter; just another nameless sent with a squalling toddler plucking uselessly at her rags.

It was old man Freeflight who’d found me; named me after a comet in the Unknown Regions, he’d said, for I didn’t recall any name prior to him. He dared me to dream of the stars when some days we all went without food. When some days we barely escaped death let alone the dismal streets of Altizir that had us all trapped.

Freeflight wasn’t that old, really. But he was blind and broken and could barely move. A husk of a man that once must have lived a life outside of Talshion. He refused to speak of his past except in general terms, but I had always been convinced he was not a Talshion native.

Freeflight had shaped my childhood: raised me, educated me, ensured I had a shot at survival. All his stories - only I’d ever listened to them. They varied greatly: from governmental politics, to meditating techniques, to the intricacies of the Exar Kun conflict-

All of them sounded wildly unbelievable, but I had listened, and dared to dream.

"Malak Devari. Revan Freeflight," I whispered proudly. "They’re good names, Mal. Better than Malak and Revan. Let's take what advantage we can, and remember those we came from."

…

I’d always dreamed of leaving Talshion, to fly amongst the stars.

Something was clutching at my hair. A buzzing on my wrist. A disconnect in my head.

Street Kid is Evil Bitch, and Evil Bitch is-

There was power, unrestrained, building inside in a staggering inferno.

-Revan.

The power exploded in a shattering sphere, a loud whoosh as it escaped in a wave of solid concussion.

Street Kid is Evil Bitch is Revan.

Darkness. My eyes were open, to see only black.

The sheen of a red ‘saber perforated the gloom, throwing up shadows against giant wroshyrs that revealed inches of fresh bark stripped clean from the outer husk. The lightsaber illuminated the face of a bald human as he staggered to his feet, some distance away.

He stared briefly at the gouged sides of the nearest wroshyr, something like incredulity on his face.

It can’t be true.
The shine of green lit up next to me. I heard someone murmur; something calm, something soothing, and it didn’t even begin to register through the terror and denial.

That power… are you there? Are you okay? Please, he’s at the door

The panicked voice cut through the numb turmoil; my attention turned to her like a lifeline, and I reached out inwardly – a frantic, desperate lunge for safety or answers or refutation or anything other than the truth.

My consciousness went flying.

Through space, through time, through nothing and everything, immersed in a psychedelic backdrop of colours I didn’t see so much as sense, all the while following the source of the frantic voice speaking to me.

I reached the end of our connection, and opened my eyes.

I was in a small room with durasteel walls and grilled venting, as commonplace to a starship as leaves were to a forest.

I was seated, hands bound, and a towering man in a black robe stood over me. He raised a hand to gently touch my cheek, and I felt someone – myself – no, someone else – flinch.

There was a chrome plate where his jaw once was. Why did that burn me with horrifying shame?

His eyes should have been whiskey-coloured, but they were a poisoned yellow.

His voice - so wrong - came out in a metallic enunciation. “Bastila, I’ve got such a surprise for you.”

“Mal?” I squeaked.

No! Bastila screamed, and I found myself hurled away with an almighty, frenzied wave of the Force.

…”

“I’ve got such a surprise for you,” Mal’s voice, warm and amused, murmured in my ear as the taxi shuttle came to a stop. We’d snuck away from the Jedi Temple, deep into Coruscant’s Galactic City. It wasn’t the first time, but still – we tried to be circumspect about it. Even as no more than a lowly Padawan, I was aware of the disapproval many Masters directed at our attachment.

But – we’d been together before Karon and the others found us. No one was going to dictate our relationship away.

The door opened, and Mal helped me out, blind but by no means helpless. “Don’t open your eyes just yet.”

But I didn’t need physical sight to divulge the location. My other senses picked up enough - the thrumming of repulsorlifts, the pungent smell of Peragian fuel, the muttering of mechanics.

Why has he taken me to a space port?

I followed him trustingly, one hand held tight in his. The environmental noises echoed off physical objects, and just by sound alone I could formulate a rough sketch of the immediate area.
“Your eyes can deceive you; don’t trust them,” Master Karon had said. “Trust in the Force.”

“Practise blocking one of your senses; see how the others compensate,” Freeflight had advised, back in the Western Underground. “What can you see with your ears, Revan? What can you see with your nose?”

We came to a stop, and even without the Force I could sense Malak’s budding excitement. He’d been keeping something from me for months now; he’d pleaded that I didn’t try to find out, that it was a surprise – and now, I suspected, was the grand reveal.

“Any ideas?” he breathed, a possessive hand sweeping up my arm. I shivered.

“Well, I’m in a spaceport,” I murmured, my lips curling in warm happiness. There was a large object in front of me, the shape and size of a snubfighter, at a guess. “Did you buy me a starship, Mal?”

“Better than that,” he whispered. “I got you the keys to the stars you’ve always dreamed of, Revvie. Open your eyes.”

It was a snubfighter, one of those dual cockpit starships that fought on the front lines; room enough for two sentients and a droid to act as gunner. I wasn’t yet conversant enough to recognize its model, and a brief glance over showed signs of wear. A name on the side had been roughly scratched off.

I glanced back to Malak, puzzled, for surely he hadn’t the credits for a purchase on this scale. Little more than a year ago we’d been scrabbling for food in the Western Underground. Mal was pretty ace at playing the economic stocks, sure – and stars hope the Masters never found out about that – but a hyperspace-ready snubfighter wasn’t exactly a trivial purchase.

But Malak was looking down at a thin sheet of aluchrome clutched in his other hand. Embossed words shone under artificial lighting. It was a certification of sorts, I recognized, as he handed it to me.

“Mal,” I breathed in awe. “You’ve got your pilot’s licence?”

Malak Devari. First Class Starfighter Accreditation.

“Master Lestin agreed, he believes that learning more mundane skills makes for a well-rounded Jedi,” Malak answered. His voice was self-satisfied, bordering on smug – but I couldn’t fault him. Not for an achievement like this. “A good thing he didn’t know about your penchant for pilots, or he would never have let me. I can take you to the stars now, Revvie. Wherever you want, whenever you need.”

It struck me then, that his devotion to me surpassed mine. He’d spent months on this, and I didn’t believe pilot training was a walk in the park. First Class honours, I wondered in amazement.

“Can you teach me?” I whispered.

…

“Revan! Pull yourself together!”

The voice came from in front of me. The back of a red-skinned Twi’lek, his hands outstretched, an iridescent turquoise shield spanning from him and encompassing us both.
Revan. No, it wasn’t real. I wouldn’t let it be real. For if it was, if that was truly me-

An attack from afar slammed into the shield. Hot shards of bright white electricity, crackling around us both. The shimmering turquoise shuddered, but held against the onslaught.

-then what did that mean? What was my loyalty to my friends, to the Republic, worth?

The tearing in my mind grew, a stabbing deep in my temples, a denial, a forgotten history of black holes from a cursed past. A hot melting as everything seemed to peel back, and nothing made any comprehensible sense anymore.

“Revan!” someone yelled, their voice hoarse. “You cannot give up! You never give up! Stand by me!”

Jen, he’s in my mind! I cannot stop him

Revan.

The psychic voice reverberated through me like a damning, ruinous answer, for I knew that voice. I knew it well, and that knowledge made a mockery of all the half-cracked theories I’d scrabbled together to somehow explain myself. To deny all that I had wrought and forgotten.

I had a half-sense of the Force, exploding out from the red-skinned Twi’lek whose name I should recall, as he discarded the shield and launched himself toward the shadows beyond, his green lightsaber spinning in the darkness.

Revan. Can you truly hear me?

The voice was achingly familiar.

Street Kid is Evil Bitch is Revan.

*And Street Kid’s boyfriend is-

My body convulsed, and suddenly I was crouching, hands clutching at dry leaves, as I expelled the contents of my stomach all over the forest floor.

I regret, now, not killing you face to face. To think that the Jedi concept of mercy might give me that chance…

A dark chuckle rebounded mercilessly inside my head.

My throat burned, and my chest heaved once more. The shink-shink of a lightsaber duel faded into the distance. There was a crunching noise as someone walked closer. The feet halted just behind me. I was staring blankly at the debris on the ground, visible due to the blood-red illumination of a ‘saber at my back.

“And so, your end is cowering in a pool of your own vomit,” a voice murmured. It sounded sad, rather than mocking. “I wish you dead, Revan, but not so stripped of your own dignity.”

There was a shuffling noise, a grunt-

You are not hearing me, are you?

“We take her alive, you melodramatic fool,” someone else hissed. “You kill my prize, and I’ll eviscerate you.”

There was a yell-

cowering in a pool of my own vomit, no, no, I won’t let my death come like that-

-and I somehow had the energy to spin and scrabble sideways, to see my end face on at the least, but I found my one ally had returned, a shining green outnumbered by the two red that launched at him with a fury he wouldn’t withstand for long.

“Zhar,” I murmured through frozen lips. I raised my empty hands, one stiff and numb, and willed my ‘sabers to return home.

For once, the Force didn’t answer. Maybe I didn’t care enough. How could I care, after all I had done?

A shame. I would enjoy relaying my plans for you.

The double-blade held the green at bay, and the single red was behind him.

“Zhar,” I mumbled again. A slight tug on the Force, but everything was anaesthetized; my fingers, my thoughts, even my very connection to the Force.

A cry wrenched from the green as the double-blade scored a hit. Then the single.

I was standing, arms raised, expecting some sort of response that didn’t come. And then the one holding the green collapsed as the double-blade pierced straight through him.

Time lengthened. He crumpled to the ground ever so gradually, almost leisurely, as his body foundered in front of my unfeeling – no, no, Zhar, get up, I can’t lose you too – gaze. Green reflected from his tattered robes as the lightsaber slipped from his grasp, and then the weapon’s fail-safe kicked in as it thudded to the ground.

The only colour left in the darkness was cursed, infernal red.

The scene replayed in my head. In slow-motion, a killing blow and sudden collapse of someone who was important to me.

Somewhere, beneath the glacial numbness that felt entirely overwhelming, there was a tiny spark of devastated grief.

I could hear an echo of myself railing, screaming to do something, because I never lost it this way, I didn’t give up, there was always a solution if I just tried hard enough, and if I surrendered now I’d be just as dead as Zhar-

But everyone thought Revan was dead, anyway.

I intend to keep Bastila, you know. Such a unique gift, that one. But you-

And I found I couldn’t move, even as the bald human turned to me, his face a shadowed mask above the scarlet illumination. A raised fist lifted in front of his sneering face, and an invisible force clamped down on my limbs.

I was soaring, flying backward through the humid air, and nothing felt real or tangible-

My body jerked, snapped hard against something solid, my shoulder collapsing against the unyielding rough bark of a wroshyr directly in my way.

I slid down.

Agony ignited like a maelstrom from both my shoulder and lower arm. It was bad. But it was feeling, of a sort.

_Pain is a tool._

That was a path I’d taken, so many times. Maybe it was the only path left.

An echo of someone’s disapproval lashed through my head. _Pain is a focusing tool of the Dark Side, Jen!_

You offer nothing of value anymore. Other than the enjoyment I shall have in killing you.

Footsteps, coming closer. I’d fallen onto my face, panting against the dirt, each breath rifling the harsh leaves of the forest floor. There was a stabbing torment running through my limb.

The torment, the pain. _Focus on the pain. Use it._ And my consciousness, slow and lumbering, turned to fixate on the pain.

Thoughts narrowed to a pinpoint of concentration. My senses unfurled, and the Force flooded through me like a power conduit I had no control over. All discomfort vanished.

Face-down in the dirt, maybe, but I was wildly open to _everything_ now. And the Force whispered to me, of the man walking closer, clutching a metal collar that pulsed with microscopic oscillations of electricity-

A recollection – something dredged from the murk of my mind. It was considered ominous to distinguish energy on such an infinitesimal scale. _Is that… is that uncommon?_ I’d asked a Cathar that, recently. She’d never answered.

But someone else had, once.

...

“Why is my talent so frowned upon?” I demanded. “Is it really that uncommon? Is it’s simple rarity why Master Atris treats me like I’m the next Sith Lord on the rise?”

“Padawan,” Karon rebuked gently, “You are letting your emotions control you. Find your inner peace.”

_Master Karon was like that. She’d answer my questions, but only when I could demonstrate an outer – and inner – serenity. It was, without a doubt, the hardest thing I found to learn._

An eternity later, my frustration had ebbed and the Zabrak gifted me with a gentle smile. “Revan, there are few who are able to manipulate machinery and technology. And no one with near your prowess. But you must understand something else. Whilst ionization is a neutral application of the Force, it is also a close-cousin to a darker use employed by many who have lost their way. _Combine that with your age when we found you, and you must appreciate why Master Atris advises caution. It does not hurt to slow your training down, Padawan._”

...

A sudden weight compressed my torso as someone sat on me. The neural disruptor was open, ready to enclose around my exposed neck.

And what did it matter, given now I knew the truth?

The Force was there, all around me, buzzing with life and opportunity and choice – but did I deserve any of it?

Revan. There is no hope for either of us now. An abyss of desperate pain was in those words.

Bastila. She was back, and witnessing my capture.

Maybe… maybe I wasn’t worth saving, but she was. Wasn’t she?

A desperate instinct inside me snatched at the Force; it was weak, minuscule, on a microscopic scale. One small electronic tweak, and the neural disruptor would no longer function. Just there.

Its electrical power was still prevalent, but its ability to repel the Force had gone.

The angst-ridden boy had shown me that. He was important… no, his father was. I hadn’t mastered the weaves to render myself physically invisible, but concealing my psychic presence had come easy. A last, frantic tug on the Force, and I cut myself off just as the collar snicked home. It was cool and tight against my neck.

Agony exploded from my limb with the Force no longer there. Cauterized fingers. Broken arm – again, the weak one. Dislocated shoulder.

The physical pain shattered through whatever coherence had been left in my thoughts. I couldn’t hold back a moan. Forceless, sightless, mindless… but I had to keep the weaves balanced through the discomfort. I had to hold it together.

“Sod it all, Bandon, if you don’t kill her right now I will,” someone said.

I choked back a laugh – hold it together, how funny, since when does a Sith Lord need to be sane - and I felt a tight band clip around my upper arm. A multitude of needles pricked into my skin, and then abruptly my arm was no longer there. Nerve restraint, I recognized dimly. Dizziness swam through my head.

“I’ll end you, Yudan, if you try.” A dark growl. Another restraint on another limb. A third, a fourth. “Malak wants her alive. He wants the kill.”

Up, up, I was lifted off the ground, and found myself staring into the red-shadowed face of the bald human. My cognizance was splintered, fractured into a thousand messy pieces. One sliver, saner than the rest, focussed on the weak touch of Force I still needed. Only the mildest of pressures, to keep the chance I wasn’t sure I wanted alive.

My limbs hung like dead weights off my torso; I couldn’t feel my arms or legs – which also meant the lacerating pain had gone. I laughed.

“That’s a good thing, right?” I mumbled.

Bandon reached forward to twist a fist tight in my hair, and my head was yanked roughly to the side. It frelling hurt - I didn’t have a nerve restraint around my neck and tears stung at my eyes.
I laughed again; that I would cry over this small agony was ridiculous, really.

“Nerve restraint around my neck.” It would stop me breathing. That would stop me feeling. It sounded nice.

Through a blurred vision I could see Bandon’s grey face staring at me curiously.

“She’s always been a scrawny thing,” he said absently. I gasped as he thumped me against a wroshyr tree, the bark pressing unevenly into my back. The hand in my hair eased, then moved to close firmly around my neck, mashing the disrupter roughly against my oesophagus.

And somehow, a deep-seated part of me was still holding the Force weaves in check, keeping the outward Force repelled in a sort of circular motion. It was a bit like juggling kakasi fruit, something Jen had practiced. She’d been surprisingly good at it.

Jen was well and truly broken, but she had been a long time ago. By the Sith. By me. By me.

Bandon’s other hand moved to cup a breast roughly, before squeezing it hard. I gasped.

“You bedded her for a bit, didn’t you, Yudan?” Bandon said conversationally. “I’m surprised our Master never eviscerated you for it, although he probably knows you had no choice in the matter.”

“Bandon, stop playing with her and end it.”

Bandon’s face came closer, his nose almost touching mine. I felt the warmth of his breath and recoiled, but there was nowhere to retreat. His black eyes - black as death, black as mine, didn’t nearly everyone’s turn yellow? - stared into the depths of my soul.

“I’m not fool enough to risk his wrath, and he would find out. But if he lets me… oh yes, I’ll have my fun with you.”

His hand squeezed tighter.

…

Malak’s body forced me hard against the hull of the Sith battlecruiser, his superior weight pinning me with the power of the Force behind him. His eyes, a poisoned yellow, burned with the sharp edges of impassioned hate.

I preferred their original brown. The colour of high-grade Corellian malt whiskey, I’d always thought.

He leaned forward, kissing me hungrily, suffocating me, devouring me. There was a temptation to bend to his desire, to sink into the black abyss of submission.

But the temptation was weak, and held no sway over me. With a wrest of mental fortitude, the angry lifeblood of Force sparked through my veins. Under my command, it streamed outward and hurled him away.

Malak went flying across the command deck, which had emptied in the midst of our howling argument. I pushed off against the wall and stalked forward. The haze of emotion added tumultuous strength to the power I could wield. Malak – even Malak – would comply with my will.

My will had him pinned against a bulkhead; spread-eagled, immobile, and cut off from the Force. I could feel my mouth curving in pleasure. He’d stopped struggling - that may have been defeat or a deliberate action on his part. He was still angry – oh yes – but I could read the desire there, too.

“I am the master, Malak. No matter how important you are to me, you must never forget that,” I purred, close enough to touch him now. A finger traced his lips idly, and they parted under the contact.

Malak didn’t have quite the same drive as me; the dedication to build an empire strong enough to withstand any threat, any challenge. Even from beyond the Outer Rim.

Malak believed in me, not my vision. A subtle but distinct difference, and that meant I had to be the master. He had to obey.

And I couldn’t afford for him to screw up at this magnitude again.

I kissed him slowly, felt him yield beneath my touch, beneath my Force bonds that held him captive; willingly or not, I wasn’t sure anymore.

I’d always been more powerful than him.

But he’d always been able to surprise me.

…

“Even from beyond the Outer Rim,” I muttered. “What’s beyond the Outer Rim?”

“She’s certifiably insane,” Bandon was saying. He dropped me to the ground with a thud. It would have hurt, without the nerve restraints. “This is just delicious. She’s stark raving mad.”

The boy had said it was easy to hold the Force at bay like this. He was right, it was like maintaining levitation. A gentle play that was elementary if you balanced the weight just so.

“I’d always dreamed of leaving Talshion, to fly amongst the stars,” I whispered.

“She doesn’t look like Darth Revan,” Yudan muttered. He was standing over me, the brilliance of his lit ‘saber still in his grasp. His face was drawn with banked anger. “She looks like Jedi Knight Revan Freeflight. How is that possible?”

“The Jedi mindwipe, obviously,” Bandon said, his voice screaming out his boredom. He didn’t respect Yudan. Wasn’t Yudan a general, once? What was Bandon, a pissy teenager with a bag full of thermal detonators? “What does it matter which one she looks like?”

“It matters!” Yudan snapped. “You can’t- you don’t just lose the effects of the Dark Side along with your memory!”

“To fly amongst the stars,” I echoed. “To fly beyond the Outer Rim?”

…

The sky was an eerie violent purple that stung my eyes, dotted with five noticeable suns too distant to provide any warmth. There was a complete lack of vegetation, and no life-forms had registered on any of our long-range scanners. This place with dead.

I’d not travelled to this part of the galaxy before. Stars, I’d never seen this on any map.

The Force felt sentient here, like it had a will of its own.
And its intent was evil.

I’d never encountered that, even in places where the Dark Side sang loudly.

I shivered, and for the first time wondered if I’d been wrong to come here. Punch drunk on victory, burning with curiosity over Mandalore’s true impetus for conquest, I’d rushed to investigate.

Brash, as always. Vrook Lamar’s voice rebuked me again and again, even though I’d barely known him. Reckless, disobedient… she was too old to be trained, no matter her power. They both were.

I glanced to the side, and saw a frown etched on Malak’s face. I wondered if he was experiencing the same as me. If I stayed very still, I had the eerie sensation of a malevolent energy creeping, ever so insidiously, into my mind.

Whatever it was, surely we could face it and triumph. Together, we’d always been unstoppable.

I reached out and he clasped my hand.

…

“Where’s your hand now?” I whispered, unseeing. I’d been left prone on my back, two figures staring down at me.

“She doesn’t sound like Darth Revan,” Yudan hissed. “And earlier, in the Force, she sure didn’t feel like Darth Revan, either.”

My hand was missing a finger, or was it two? At least I had my jaw. I laughed. “Where’s your jaw now?” I mumbled.

“For frakk’s sake, Yudan, you’re beginning to piss me off,” Bandon growled. “You whine more than Nisotsa. You want to kill her? Then do it. See if you can get through me.”

It was warm, here, in the red-shadowed black. I could lie back and let my mind float away, let it all go – apart from that one small speck of concentration, still there, still balancing the Force, still keeping open a chance.

“I thought not. You’re a coward, Yudan.” The words were drawled, and the human snorted before striding away. But the Twi’lek with the pained expression still stood above me, staring.

“I swore to kill Darth Revan,” he whispered. He was a ghost from my past, his gaze pinched and fierce, and he searched mine for answers I didn’t have. “And I will, the first time I see her. She must be inside you still, somewhere…”

“Help me right my ‘speeder,” Bandon called. I stared up blindly into the darkness. “Bloody Revan and her little Force tantrum knocked it right over.”

"Little?” Yudan muttered in disbelief, but he turned willingly enough to follow Bandon’s directive. It didn’t feel right, somehow, that Yudan would cede to Bandon. “The Wookiees will have to make up legends to explain the damage to these wroshyrs.”

Yudan moved away, and the shadows closed in. He was headed to Bandon, to Bandon’s ‘speeder.

Bandon was taking me somewhere on his ‘speeder.

How long would it take? I couldn’t keep this up forever, I’d drop the weaves sooner or later and then the game would be up.
But… it was hard to know what was real. I was in a forest, and I was a Sith Lord. Or I had been, until my lover had betrayed me. My lover, Malak.

I heard a scuffle, a rustle on the ground, an exclamation of disbelief.

“Huh.” There was a world of surprise in that one word. “There’s only robes here. The body’s gone. Frakk, I didn’t believe that actually happened.”

The body. Zhar. The light sources had moved away, now, and I was truly blind. I felt something wet trickle down the side of my face.

If this was reality - the restraints killing off sensation in my limbs, the leaves in my face, the dark of the Shadowlands – then I could let Bandon take me and show me the way before I pulled back on the Force and ripped his head off.

That was something Revan would enjoy doing, and it turned out I was her, after all.

But first, Bandon could show me the way to the stars I’d always dreamed of…

…to the stars, and to Malak.

xXx
Exodus

-Mission Vao-

I’d tried, so many times, to get Big Z to take a bath. I’d even succeeded once, although freaking years later and he still complained about it. A Wookiee does not bathe, Mission! What humiliation will you use on me next? A comb? Still, he had nothing on twenty odd of his countrymen, all crammed together in a freight elevator speced to take about half that number.

Canderous figured the safety margin should allow us to double the weight. Of course, we weren’t gonna test it personally – not on the first run, anyway.

I wasn’t meant to be here.

…

“You’re not going to sneak down to the Shadowlands, are you?” Dustil asked.

“What?” I looked up from the armour straps I was struggling with. “No! No, you heard Canderous.” It might have the shine of adventure about it, but I’d heard too much about that place. Flying insects with fangs. Spiders the size of loth-cats. Giant plants known to gobble up whole Wookiees if they weren’t careful. ‘Sides, Canderous had made it clear he expected Dustil and me back on the ‘Hawk once we’d played our part – and while I had no problem ignoring Big Z, Canderous was a different skillet of scalefish. I had the teensiest feeling I’d end up regretting it.

Dustil was staring at me, doubtfully, and I wrinkled my nose. “I won’t, alright? I mean, I’m dead worried about Big Z an’ all, and then there’s Jen…” I trailed off, frowning. She’d be okay, I reckoned, but Canderous didn’t seem to think so.

“The Mandalorian seemed a bit concerned about her,” Dustil muttered, echoing my thoughts. He looked away, absentmindedly handling a lightweight Echani blaster from the storage hold.

“Yeah, well, those two are kinda involved,” I said, scowling at the stupid clasp that wouldn’t close. Big Z had done a great job modding ole Calo’s armour to fit me, but it was such a pain to get on. Suddenly, I realized what I’d let slip, and glanced back to Dustil in shock.

“What, those two?” he spluttered, his dark eyes wide. “Frakk, I never would have picked it.”

“Er-” I could feel a blush forming. “Um, don’t say anything, alright? Jen’s pretty cagey about it. I don’t think anyone actually knows.”

“Anyone knows about what?” Canderous drawled, stomping into the cargo hold. I jumped, and Dustil looked away. Canderous raised an eyebrow, before snorting at our lack of response. “Czerka’s starting to load the cargo onto the freighter. It’s time to roll out, kids.”

…

I stared at the tallest Wookiee, the loud scraggly one growling about untrustworthy off-worlders as he eye-balled me, and swallowed. I edged deeper into a corner of the descending lift. There was a rattling noise from within the ceiling, and I tried not to think about how far down we still had to go.

I’ll be fine. It’ll be okay. We’ll get to the bottom, the Wookiees’ll clear out, and I’ll ride back to the top. Canderous was still there. Between him and the remaining prisoners, they had to have the place secure. Dustil – well, I hadn’t seen him. He’d probably snuck back to the ‘Hawk as planned. Canderous didn’t trust him – and, truth be told, I didn’t entirely myself. Carth’s son was plenty smart and dangerous, but I kinda thought that he looked after himself first.

Although, Dustil had agreed to the riskier job – sneaking onboard with that wizard power of his and releasing the droids from the containers we’d used to smuggle them in.

Canderous and I – we could always bail if things went chuba-shaped.

At least that was the plan.

…

“You got the plan, kid?” Canderous asked, pulling hard on the last loose strap of my armour before thumping me on the back. I choked slightly. “Do what I say, when I say. If we run into trouble with Czerka, let me do the talking.” He walked around to face me, deep lines etched into his forehead. “I’ve got a cover, Mission. If things kriff up, you shut up and play along. Got it?”

“Yeah, yeah,” I muttered. Turned out Canderous had already infiltrated the tower earlier, when he’d gone out scouting with Teethree. Under the guise of an Exchange agent wanting to chat about reconciliation with Czerka or something. I’d forgotten Canderous used to work for the Exchange under Davik Kang, that slimy marsh-toad whose fat fingers had dabbled in just about every nasty thing going on in the Lower City. “How’d you end up as one of Davik’s men, anyway?”

“I was after credits, and he wanted the manpower,” Canderous said. He hefted his repeating blaster, and began striding toward the exit of the Ebon Hawk. “It was beneath me, really. A bit like driving a spike through your head. Sure, you’ve got something new in there, but in the end, you’ve lost something as well.”

I sniggered.

Canderous paused by the hatch, before turning back to face me. He looked more serious than normal. “The Sithkid’s already begun his part. Don’t do anything stupid, ad’ika, and this might just work.”

…

It’d worked, so far. I kept reminding myself of that, even as the howls around me grew ever louder.

I’d thought my Shyriiwook was good. I could pretty much get everything Big Z said – but it turned out having a whole bunch of angry Wookiees arguing at the same time wasn’t quite so easy to follow.

The one next to me, a bowed one with dappled grey fur, had been at my side since the lift doors closed. I had the feeling Grey-fur had some understanding of Basic, for I’d been screaming I was helping them when the first wave of Wookiees swarmed into the lift, murder in their gaze.

I wasn’t meant to be hacking from the elevator access panel. I wasn’t meant to be here. And to think, our part had started off so well-“Did we have to kill them?” I whispered, staring down at the dead body. Half his face was grisly and melted. It made me feel like puking, and I looked away.

“Next time, shall I ask them to step aside and pretend we ain’t here?” Canderous mocked from deeper in the room. He was crouching as he methodically searched the warm corpse of a tech who, moments ago, had been innocently tapping keys behind a console.

“No, look, it’s just-” I stopped, not really sure what I was trying to say. These guys here, they were just workers. Admins. Doing their job, before we sliced into the service entrance and opened fire. It felt wrong – even with the weight of a hundred Wookiee lives in the balance. “I dunno. Couldn’t we just have stunned them?”

“Mission,” Canderous said, and he sounded irritated now as he stomped back to me. “There’s only two of us to secure the area. We don’t have time to tie anyone up in case the stun wears off. And we especially don’t have time for you to start mourning some dead Czerka grunts.”

I scowled, and he jerked his head toward the nearest console.

“Get your arse behind that, kid.”

“I’m not a kid,” I grumped, and thought I saw his mouth twitch. He was right – even if he was annoying – and I ran toward the blood spattered console.

“(These off-worlders are soulless madclaws that defile our planet,)” Tall-scraggly growled. I heard a half-dozen rumbles in response, all unintelligible and mixed in together. The sound of them speaking at the same time hurt my ears. Tall-scraggly howled louder, still glaring at me. “(Slavers, planet-rapers – we should not allow any of them to live on our world!)”

I pressed myself tight against the chrome walls. It couldn’t be long, surely, until we hit the bottom. The Wookiees could file out, and I’d ride back to the top.

Half of them were injured. All of them were crazed. I supposed I’d be, too, if my chieftain had sold me into slavery just to get rid of me – but sheesh, I was on their freaking side!

“(You heard the metal-robot,)” Grey-fur spoke. It was the first time I’d heard her – I thought it was a her, but really, I couldn’t be sure – say something. “(The blue cub is one of them. An off-worlder who has risked much to help us, Chorrawl.)”

Chorrawl huffed, and shook his head irritably. He had to have at least fifty pounds on Big Z. An arm hung limply at his side, the fur matted with blood.

The Wookiees left topside would be facing the rallying Czerka troops. Some would die, I knew. I hoped that Big Z would approve of our plan. He always said death was better than slavery. Sheesh, I hope he meant it.

“(We cannot trust any off-worlder,)” Chorrawl growled. A Wookiee next to him nodded in agreement. “(Not even harmless blue-skinned girl-cubs,)”

My hands were laid flat against the metal of the lift. I could hear my heart beat resoundingly in my ears. If only I’d had more time-
The system was EliteSec, a variant of the IntelliSecurity OS I’d cut my teeth on back on Taris. It was familiar enough that I felt comfortable, but still – it would have been quicker for Teethree. Dustil needed his slicing skills, though. Freeing the Wookiees would be a harder task than overriding the lifts.

My gaze narrowed on the screen, and I began to smile as I inserted a tech spike and got to work. First stop, as always, surveillance.

There were holo-cams in engineering admin – tech was so cheap these days that most corporations installed cams even in the freaking loos – but it wasn’t like they’d finance the manpower to actively watch them. The recorded vid would sit in an archive somewhere, to be retrieved only if there was a need for it.

Unless someone, of course, deleted it first.

I smirked, erasing the last hour of footage and setting the cams on a replay loop from the hour previous. That was enough that if someone did glance at them they might be fooled for a bit. “Cams are sorted.”

I heard Canderous drag a body somewhere out of sight as I turned my attention to the mechanical functions of the building. Most OS’s were interconnected – get to the root, and you could access just about any system. I just had to find the lift functions, before Dustil came running with a hundred angry Wookiees.

Hopefully, HK would tell them what was going on. It felt dodgy, trusting communication to that evil robot, but he was the only one who spoke Shyriiwook. I’d wondered, aloud, if it would make more sense for me to go – there had to be at least one Wookiee who understood Basic, and surely I’d be a safer translator than psycho-droid – but Canderous flat-out refused to let me anywhere near that freighter.

He was the one who’d demanded I wear Calo’s ugly armour in the first place. Sheesh, at times he was getting as bad as Big Z and Carth. Not that I’d ever tell him that.

I switched control to the transportation function. There. Elevator A and B. I wondered which one was ours, as I scrolled through the lift specifications. “So, this thing has a max weight of three and a half thousand pounds. Um…”

“Huh, that’s a good sized lift. Guess the mercs taken enough gear down with this,” Canderous commented, his weapon held loosely in his grasp as he strode back to face the inner door. “Don’t suppose you ever got Carpet on a set of scales?”

“Hard enough to get him to brush his teeth,” I muttered, browsing the initialization routines available. There were two doors leading into the lift, and we were aiming for the secondary entrance – the cargo door. I needed to seal the main one, stop any Czerka mercs from coming in that way.

“Let’s assume three-fifty standard, that’s ten Wookiees to hit the max. We should be able to double that, safety standards being what they are,” Canderous mused. I heard a faint buzz, followed by an electronic click. “Incoming text feed from Sithkid. The bucket droid’s done it, and the Wookiees are on the move. You gotta work your magic now.”

"Yep, one sec,” I murmured absently, shutting down the primary doors on both lifts. I could hack a route into the access functions, but I needed to know which one was ours, and even worse-

“Mission, it’s gonna turn into a bloodbath out there. You ain’t got time-”

“Bantha crap,” I spluttered. “Canderous, its voice activated. I gotta get in the lift-”

“I thought you said you could hack it, kid!”

“Yeah, but it’s gonna take time we don’t have,” I snapped. “I’m not an astromech. Far quicker if I get to the lift controls, I can nullify the primary access method from there and find an override-”

“Haar’chak,” Canderous cursed, before talking into his wrist. “Dustil, the service entrance is unlocked. We’re moving to the lift.”

...

The Wookiees had swarmed into the room before I’d finished. Canderous had secured the area, hollered at me to get out, now!, but even he was taken aback at just how quick a bunch of Wookiees could move.

I’d been surrounded by a crowd of injured, roaring, seven-foot hairballs before I knew what was happening, and then one of them shoved me fiercely to the side and mashed his great big furry paw on the control panel.

I’d scrabbled to my feet, engulfed in a forest of hairy, smelly legs. The lift doors began to close; I yelled in surprise and tried to push my way forward.

I wasn’t quick enough.

And now…

“(We will find Freyyr, if he still lives, and then we shall drive all off-worlders from Kashyyyk forever!” Chorrawl snarled. “(No more starports, no more trade, no more Czerka!)”

The elevator erupted into loud roars of agreement, and I clapped my hands over my ears. Surely, surely, we were almost at the end.

“(No more off-worlders!)” I picked that line up, from a heavy-set one with mad gleaming eyes. He raised a hand to point at me. The harsh lighting in the lift glinted from exposed claws. “(Starting with that one!)”

Fright spiked deep into my belly. I stared at the mad Wookiee, wishing desperately that Big Z or Jen or even Canderous were here with me. I’m really in the poodoo now!

“(Silence!” Grey-fur’s voice lashed out, loud and commanding, and to my surprise the mood of the Wookiees immediately settled. Several heads swivelled to stare at her. There was a constipated look on Chorrawl’s face – kinda like Big Z when he didn’t get his eight meals a day - but most of the rest were watching Grey-fur in a sort of anticipation. Like she was a leader or something.

“(We must fight, Tasharr,)” Chorrawl growled. “(I will go against you if you advise any sort of delay. Now is the time for war, to drive these madclaw outsiders-)” “(Chorrawl,)” the one called Tasharr spoke over him. Her voice was low and gravelly, but still seemed to hold an air of authority. “(We have all suffered humiliation that no living being should. We have all had the truth laid bare in front of our eyes of what Chuundar has been doing to our world. I agree that we must act to protect Kashyyyk-)

The Wookiees roared again. Tasharr had stepped mostly in front of me, and I could only hope they would forget I was there. I crouched back, trying to look as small and unintimidating as possible.
I’d seen Big Z lose his temper before, but this lot looked feral. Crazed.

“(but we must think with our head as well as our heart. We are not madclaw.)” With that, she turned to stare at the wider Wookiee, the one who had his claws out. He shuffled, and slipped his hands behind his back. Tasharr huffed in satisfaction. “(If we allow off-worlders and a corrupt chieftain to turn us into that, then they have already won.)”

The crowd dissolved into silence. Chorrawl lifted a paw to scratch at his head, and the heavyset one looked down. Whoever Tasharr was, she held some sort of power over the others, and I was beginning to realize she might be my only hope of safety.

“(So what do you advise, Old One?)” Chorrawl rumbled. Now that the rest had quietened and it was only those two speaking, I had a better time following the conversation.

“(As you said. We find Freyyr, should he still walk this world. We drive Czerka off. But we fight with honour, and we do not go after those who are no threat. Particularly those who may actually be our ally.)”

And with that, she turned her back on the crowd, and stared at me with dark eyes. She was bowed with age, and short for a Wookiee besides, and yet she still towered over me. Her fur was oily and matted with dirt, and it made me wonder just how long they’d been kept in the freighter.

“(You understand our language.)” she mused, staring at me in consideration. How had she picked up on that? “(And the metal-robot who helped remove us from our prison said this was your idea.
Why?)”

I couldn’t believe I was actually grateful for something HK had said. I nodded, a bit desperately.
“Well, I mean, it’s what Big Z would’ve wanted, he always said slavery was worse than death, and he was so upset when he saw what happened to his world since he left, and then he disappeared into the Shadowlands after I told him about his dad and the slaves, and I just wanted to do something…”

I was rambling, words tumbling out, tangling over the top of each other in half-panic. Tasharr frowned, thick brows slamming together in confusion over my garbled answer. She wouldn’t know who Big Z was, and I didn’t think dropping Zaalbar’s name would help me here. He was labelled a madclaw, after all, even if these guys were completely wrong and dumb for calling him one-

There was a rumble of growing irritation from the others.

“My best friend is a Wookiee,” I said helplessly. “He would do the same for me.”

Tasharr’s face cleared, as much as a Wookiee’s could, and she gave me a brief nod. “(Even offworlders can have honour.)” she said softly. “(We must remember that, when-)”

The elevator thudded to a halt, and I stumbled against the wall. There was a loud, mechanical creak as the doors began to open.

My breath stuck in my throat like I’d drunk too much fizz-pop, and I pressed myself tighter against the wall. The Wookiees, as one, lapsed into a tense silence as they all turned to face the opening exit.
A sliver of darkness appeared. It widened, as the doors slid open.

“What the-?” a foreign voice called out in confusion, from deep within the gloom.

“(Czerka filth!)” It was a roar, load and furious in Shyriiwook, and the rest answered in thunderous agreement that echoed through the chrome-walled lift.

“Frakk!” someone yelled, as the mass of furious Wookiee muscle surrounding me surged forward. Berserking howls grew to ear-splitting volume all around me. But as they all jostled to exit, I heard a different sound: blaster fire.

I screamed, as a shot ricocheted from the ceiling to ping next to my head, before burning into Tasharr’s arm.

“(Kill the slavers!” a Wookiee snarled, echoed by his kin as they tumbled out into the thick, black shadows.

The doors! I scrabbled sideways, back to the lift console. Tasharr, clutching at a hairy limb, looked back to me. She was the only one left in the lift.

“Go! I’ll ride back up!” I cried. My hand grabbed the side of the access panel as she gave a curt nod, and then turned to follow the others.

The sound of something small and metal dribbling against the lift floor caught my attention. As my hand mashed against the topside button, my brain recognized the object that had been thrown into the lift.

A grenade. Just starting to emit the first puffs of green poison.

Bantha crap! My stomach bottomed out. I jerked my gaze back to the lift doors, which were starting to close. The black outside was shot through with red spits of laser. I only had one choice.

I ran into the Shadowlands.

Howls and screams resonated in all directions. The doors closed behind, killing off the only source of light, other than the flashes of guns as they discharged.

I had no visor. I couldn’t see a thing.

“Boda, Aldirik, pull back, there’s too many of the bastards!”

Someone crashed into me, and I fell to the ground with a squeak. A hand enclosed around my ankle and I screamed, kicking back in instinct before scrabbling away.

I heard a grunt behind me. Something nearby exploded, and harsh light stabbed into my eyes. A wave of heat hit my exposed face. Somewhere, someone howled.

“Czerka don’t pay us enough for this crap!”

I was on my feet, running blindly, panting, my heart in my throat. I had to hide, had to get away from the blaster shots and the grenades and all of this-

I tripped over something in the darkness.

I fell, twisting sharply on an unsteady wrist. My head hit the forest floor, and a wad of dirt or something like it mashed against my face. Desperation coursed like fire through my veins, I was already scrabbling away somewhere, anywhere, fingers clawing frantically into the moist ground.

“Hey!”

The air was humid and sticky. Hot tears blurred my vision, cast in various shades of black. With a panicked grunt, I was back on my feet, running forward blindly.

“A little Twi’lek joygirl here?”

Something hard thumped into my back, and I collapsed with a shocked cry.

“Quick, Boda, take her and let’s get out of here!”

I was yanked up roughly, there was a rough blow at the back of my head, and then I knew no more.

xXx
The repulsorlifts hummed underneath me.

My cheek rested against the chrome of the jumpspeeder, my arms and legs flopping uselessly over it. The mugginess of the air whipped through my hair as the ‘speeder coasted in pitch darkness.

Everything was black.

The Force can do terrible things to a mind. The thought was a sepulchral whisper, a dark voice I’d lived with for so long - without ever accepting that it could be my own malevolence, my own evil intent at war within me.

It didn’t seem real. Nothing seemed real. To be faced with such a terrible truth –

It made me consider conceding everything, just so I could fall away into obscurity. Into nothingness.

"You never give up!"

Thinking was hard. My thoughts coagulated like glue, sluggish and detached. And then snippets of voices would spark faster than light through the apathy, before spiraling into another thought-stream just as shattering as the previous.

All this time… all this time I’d assumed it was a choice between Street Kid and Evil Bitch. One or the other. Not Jen Sahara. I knew that from the start. The truth seemed so… my train of thought twisted sharply around another jagged corner.

Maybe the truth was just so stupidly obvious.

Since Rii’shn, I’d been determined the vicious voice in my head wasn’t me, couldn’t be me, and I’d completely ignored all the clues thrown my way.

"Can't remember the blood on your hands?” a traitor mocked. "Or is it that you don't know who you really are yet?"

"A Jedi Knight. Riiight,” a failed Sith student drawled.

"I've seen your mind, Ness Jonohl," the white-eyed Sith Master sneered. "A Jedi Knight you most assuredly are not."

A Jedi Knight… oh, it turned out I’d been a Jedi Knight alright. The best and the worst of them, all rolled into one hideous package. No wonder it’d been so natural to slip into the darkness; the powerful, cursed darkness.

Why? Why would I do that? How could I do all of what Revan had been purported to do?

How could any of this be true?

Bastila. Bastila.
Bastila saved my life, I’d known this already.

"You're Force-bonded to Bastila Shan," a troubled man with a second chance said. “That's... how did that happen?"

Bastila had famously faced Darth Revan, and she saved my life.

This sort of intimate connection only occurs if you bring someone back from the very brink, just as they are about to join the Force, and your very essence mingles with theirs-

Force-bonded to a broken Sith Lord. Hah.

Bastila had been concealing such a secret from me, from us all, while plunged into events well beyond her comfort zone. No wonder she’d acted like she had - panicked and imperious and annoying - back on Tatooine.

For I was never meant to escape the shell of Jen Sahara, or the enclosure of the Endar Spire. And Bastila was never meant to be alone with me.

My mind prickled, tiny tendrils of thought unfurling, connecting dots that should have been clear months ago.

"We can begin the implantation shortly. She is so far gone... I am not convinced this is the best course of action."

A control. A yoke, around my mind, to keep me pliant and ignorant. But why? The Jedi did not kill their prisoners - somehow I knew this as a core truth - and they also did not re-program them as someone else!

Isn't that against their ethos, or something?

I was missing a piece of the puzzle. There was a vague buzzing in my head, mirroring the thrum of the repulsors, every thought slow and dumb like a drugged spacer merely going through the motions. If I really was Darth Revan - a colossal horror I could barely grasp - then why in the Outer Rim would the Order risk patching over my mind and sending me off-world?

But I already knew the answer, didn’t I? The Star Maps. It had always come back to the Star Maps, and now I knew what they really had to do with me. The final nail in the coffin of self-deception, the last blow against the mirror of ignorance I’d shielded myself behind. Street Kid found one in a krayt dragon’s cave. Whatever they led to was the source of Malak’s power. The source of my might, once. The Order, somehow, found out and were desperate enough to throw a coat of white paint over my fractured psyche and hope it held.

This sounded like something the Sith would dabble in, not the Jedi.

A gust of disbelieving laughter escaped me, unheard over the hum of the engine. Who the frell am I to talk? To judge? But they’d tried to turn me into someone else. The Jedi, the guardians of peace and stability, so afraid of conflict they’d refused the pleas of aid from a Republic under siege… until, apparently, I’d turned the tables and drawn them in.

The flashes of Revan, of me, had showcased the magnitude of her/my fury, of the power that the Dark Side could encompass. At first, it’d seemed memories of a madwoman, frankly unbelievable. After Rii’shn, it had spiraled into terrifying. But all the way through, the thought that the actions and consequences of sodding Darth Revan could belong to me…
All those deaths. All those deaths, due to me.

Jen Sahara had been someone, once. A casualty of my war. And the ramifications of an innocent, so carelessly tortured and thrown aside, slapped me in the face with its inhumanity.

Jen, so scared of her own father that she refused to leave the commune where she’d grown up. A shy scholar, whose empathy was overshadowed by her very real cowardice. Whose love of learning eventually came to naught, thanks to the horrors I unleashed upon her homeworld.

How many others, frail and bright and innocent, had died just like her?

"People die in wars," a Mandalorian snapped. "From what I’ve heard and seen of Revan, she killed only when necessary to achieve her goals."

My goals? What were my sodding goals? The cliché of galactic domination?

The concept burned like acid. There was a faint metallic taste in my mouth. And suddenly I was angry, so frenetically enraged at myself, at the idea that I could have allowed myself to fall so far, to unleash such evil into the galaxy-

"We all have the darkness within us," a friend whispered. "It is how we deal with it that defines us."

It couldn’t be real. It couldn’t be true! A final gasp of denial rallied once more, choking the fiery rage, dissipating it back into the glacial blanket of disengagement. Yet a part of me acknowledged, even then, that my disbelief was just a mechanism of desperation – of scrabbling for some way to absolve the deluge of blood-guilt on my hands, so I wouldn’t have to reconcile myself to what I didn’t want to, couldn’t, admit.

And the thought bloomed within, blasphemous and heretic, that maybe the galaxy would be a better place if the Force didn’t exist.

“The Force is the energy of all living things, Padawan. It surrounds us, it binds us. It is life in its purest form.”

Shimmering gently around me, held in place with the slightest of touches by a fragment of sanity, a reminder of the awesome possibilities the Force could provide. Light or Dark or somewhere in the middle…

And what was Darth Revan, if not the epitome of the Dark Side? Sun and stars, I may as well sit next to Exar Kun and Naga Sadow and have a sodding picnic. The image was ridiculous. I felt myself laughing in choking gasps, cheek sticking to the side of the humming ‘speeder. Sith Lords probably didn’t eat, anyway. Not unless it was deep-fried terentatek gizzard, or the sautéed eyeballs of a failed Sithling. Maybe a crumbed tuk’ata leg on the side.

I’d probably had lots of picnics with Malak, once. Malak… but he was Darth Malak, now. Darth Malak…

“It’s obvious that Darth Malak’s a ruthless tyrant who’ll crush anyone who gets in his way... just like his master Revan had been.”

Carth… oh no. Carth.

A new shaft of horror uncurled in my gut, like a poisonous kshyyy vine casting its venomous abhorrence into every single part of me.
Carth might accept a shadow of the Dark Side in his son, but an ex Sith Lord in his bed? The sodding Sith Lord responsible for the very war waging amongst the galaxy right now?

Back in the Embassy on Manaan; his gaze was unrelenting and tenacious as he questioned me about Deralia: “Were you there when Darth Revan's forces invaded a year ago?”

Was I there? Was I there?

A hysterical laugh ripped from my lungs.

His broken words, on Korriban: “*Revan and Malak and Saul Karath… they’re monsters, all of them.

He’d kill me, given the chance. He was Republic, through and through. And the Republic couldn’t afford the chance of Darth Revan returning. “*They were heroes. No one expected them to turn on us the way they did. Think about it... if you can't even trust the best of the Jedi, who can you trust?

What the frell had the Jedi been thinking? What had Bastila been thinking, saving me from the abyss?

Death would have been a mercy.

Maybe my lack of memory was a mercy. Now, the gaping holes of nightfall in my head only taunted me with atrocities I couldn’t remember.

Recollection would be worse.

But it was Revan. Not just Darth Revan, but the blazing Jedi Knight who’d blatantly defied the Council, and helped lead the Republic to victory, once. The one who’d convinced dozens of Knights to follow, to defend the galaxy against the very real threat of the Mandalorians. Hero, saviour, conqueror, villain… Revan just seemed too big to be a real person – let alone me.

And now, more than ever, I found it impossible to understand myself – to recognize what my values or motivations or loyalties were – or if I even had any.

"My loyalty is to the Republic, the ideals and the foundations it was built on."

And suddenly, I could imagine myself defying everyone – even the mystical Jedi Order - if the reverse meant sitting back while billions capitulated to the Mandalorian scourge. The Mandalorians, whose goal was to kill or convert any they captured in the name of pure conquest. They were steam-rolling a path directly to the Core, and the Republic was faltering!

Somehow, it had been me, alongside dozens of other passionate Jedi - young or old but all burning with righteousness - who'd helped transform a seemingly certain thrashing and subjugation into victory.

Oh, how the mighty had fallen.

The air rushed in and out of my lungs, frantic gasps of breath, as the staggering enormity of my own crimes once more lashed against me. There was a loss of balance in the parts of my body I could still feel, an acute dizziness as if I was slipping off the ‘speeder, or slipping away into some nauseating state of unreality.

There was pressure on my back, and everything seemed to stop-“Yudan, what the frakk? Why are you stopping?”

The vibrations under me eased, the engines calming down to an idle state. The air was thick like tar, and a dazed part of me realized the jumpspeeders had come to a halt.

“I sensed… something,” someone muttered. Yudan, it was Yudan, not far from here. “A Force presence nearby. A Jedi, maybe.”

A rumble of annoyance sounded from directly behind me, followed by a sneer. “Jumping at shadows, again? You’re scared that bloody Tokare is lurking about, you yellow-bellied excuse of a Sith.”

“Don’t be an arse, Bandon,” Yudan growled. “Do you want to be knocked off your speeder at full velocity by a stranger? Because I can show you how that’ll go, if you like.”

Maybe the two of them will fight, take each other out. Leave me here, alone in the bowels of a forest world, without a clue of my next move – or if I really was here at all.

Maybe I wasn’t. Maybe this was all one completely frelled-up dream.

But the Force weaves still sat there, resting against my mind, a gentle balance repelling the outward world and leaving me invisible to their senses. Hiding the inactive neural disruptor, until I made a move – if I made a move.

I was tired. Tired of it all. I wouldn’t have the fortitude to keep up the weaves for much longer, and I wasn’t sure I wanted to anyway.

“Besides,” Yudan continued, “it wasn’t Vandar. I’m not sure if it was Light or Dark, but it was certainly someone.”

“Bah,” Bandon grunted. There was a wet sound as he spat to the side. “I can’t sense a damn thing, Yudan. You’re getting senile.”

“You can’t sense a damn thing?” Yudan shot back, his voice sharply sarcastic. “The entire Shadowlands are crawling with sentients that weren’t here a day ago, and you can’t even detect that?”

“Oh for frakk’s sake, back your words up with a ‘saber or get back on your ‘speeder,” Bandon’s voice was gravelly with mounting annoyance. He wasn’t the sort to back down, not normally. “If there’s anyone around here, we’ll deal with them like we did with Lestin. I’m sick of your twitching. Get a move on.”

Yudan didn’t answer, at first. I wondered if the two of them were staring at each other in a silent pissing contest, waiting to see who would blink first. Bandon wouldn’t. Somehow, I felt like Yudan shouldn’t - except that he’d been following Bandon's lead, so far.

At last, an irritated noise escaped Yudan. ”I've a message waiting,” he muttered, and his words were followed with a faint click.

::Bandon, Yudan,: a silky voice sneered, and a rush of malevolence hit my bloodstream. The traitor. Kylah. The one who killed Karon and caught Bastila. The tiny circular weaves wrapped around me shuddered, just the smallest amount, before righting once more.

“Kylah,” Bandon drawled in recognition. The repulsors underneath me sputtered into silence. The speeder bounced upward as Bandon jumped free, and there was a rustle of footsteps as he walked. away from me, toward the holo-message. He always was easily led. “She’s been unbearable lately.”

::Our Lord grows impatient with your lack of communication. And I am just about to exit hyperspace outside of- oh, I completely forgot-: There was a mocking tinkle of laughter. *::What system is it, Admiral Karath?::*

::Kashyyyk,: a male voice answered. The words were ground out in displeasure, as if the man was crunching rocks.

::Right, Kashyyyk,:

I had a sudden vision of Kylah smirking. With a stab of visceral hatred, I recalled her sultry cockiness as she faced me on Manaan, before I’d succumbed to the darkness that I had refused to own as myself. *::You have eight hours to convince him otherwise before I proceed with orbital bombardment. It would be a shame if you failed when I have so decisively succeeded.::*

There was an electronic hiss at the conclusion of the message.

Bandon chuckled. “I’ll enjoy making that schutta eat her words,” he murmured. “My prize trumps even Bastila Shan.”

“Orbital bombardment?” Yudan said. His voice had sharpened, and a low, angry noise escaped him. “Shavit, has Malak completely tipped over the edge?”

“Watch your tongue,” Bandon lashed back. “Are you making a special effort to be stupid today? Kashyyyk has- what, exactly? Ten thousand Wookiees and a Czerka outpost? It’s nothing on Taris-”

"Keep talking Bandon, someday you'll say something intelligent," Yudan sneered. His snark was steadily rising to match Bandon's, and he had to know that was playing with fire. Why was Yudan getting so pissy?

"Why was Yudan getting so pissy? Why didn't he kill me when he had the chance? "They're not the same. Taris has been an economic partner of the Sith for the last three years, for all that they like to tout their neutrality and pretend we don’t have two standing bases there. Kashyyyk, on the other hand, is truly neutral and entirely defenseless. You think the undecided factions will sit back if we target an undeclared system with no organized military?"

I wondered, idly, if there was some way to provoke them into the fight they must surely be on the cusp of. Provocation was the sort of thing Revan was good at. Street Kid had always been clever with words.

How had I completely failed to see – to accept – what was now, in hindsight, so blindingly obvious?

“So? We’re taking over the galaxy if you hadn’t noticed, you half-bred imbecile. Dantooine was a civilian planet. Not like anyone so much as blinked after that—"

“Dantooine’s Republic, and the Jedi Enclave there is an open secret,” Yudan scoffed. There was an undercurrent of frustration steadily growing in his voice. “That was only going to piss off those already fighting us—”

“Frakk, Yudan, you’re a boring sod. I don’t give a dancing Twi’lek’s tit what some piddly Outer Rim worlds decide to do, and neither does our Lord. Speaking of which—”

There was a compression around my midsection, followed by a sudden release. A fall, and an ungentle landing.

The sounds of my own breathing seemed inordinately loud. A sickening dizziness, as if I’d stayed in one position too long before abruptly moving.

Which I had – or had been made to – I realized dimly. I was staring up into darkness from the forest floor. Vaguely, I realized Bandon must have shifted me there with the Force.

There was a snap-hiss, and blinding scarlet stabbed into my vision.

Above me, Bandon stood wielding a lit ‘saber and a vicious smirk. “Take a holo-pic, Yudan, and patch it through to Lord Malak. Send a copy to Kylah on the _Leviathan_, too. They say a picture is worth a thousand words, after all.”

A second figure appeared, pausing as he gazed down at me. The dark crevasses along his cheekbones were a macabre sight against the red illumination. His eyes were pinched with fierce emotion.

I looked away, away from them both, and up into the infinite trees shadowed in the radiation of red.

“Aww,” Bandon mocked. He must have put his ‘saber away, for everything transmuted back into the black where I belonged. The dead, dead black. “Are you hurting, Yudan? Does it upset you to see your old Master brought so very low?”

There was an angry growl in response. “Do you want to get moving, or greet the sents headed our way?”

“What?”

A faint rustle of footsteps whispered against my ears. From further afield. We had company.

“You’ve got to work on that,” Yudan said in disgust. “All power and no chivving finesse. It’s a wonder you can wipe your own arse.”

“Frakk, Yudan, that’s it, I’ve had enough of your mouth—”

“Would you look at that,” a new voice gibed. It was high with barely suppressed glee, and Bandon wilted into silence. “Two armour-less idiots with ‘speeders.”

_Walking corpses_, I thought dumbly. _Whoever they are, they’ve just danced into their death._

“We’ll have those, thanks,” another voice, alien and foreign, slurred.

“Mandalorians,” Bandon chortled. There was a sadistic grin in his voice. I should have felt pity for the unsuspecting strangers. A good person would have. All I felt was numb.

“No weapons, either,” a third voice added. “Let’s give them a head start, Boda. What, thirty seconds before we open fire and take their ‘speeders?”

“Mandalorians working as Czerka mercs,” Yudan said, his voice laced with distaste. “You’re an honourless disgrace to your clans. To think that this is all that’s left of your kind, scrabbling remnants taking orders from chivving _Czerka_.”
“Screw the head start,” one of the mercs snarled, and I recognized the faint whine of a repeating blaster warming up.

The gloom was once more shot through with scarlet, as both Dark Jedi activated their ‘sabers. I stared upward, unseeing, but I could imagine events as they unfolded.

A scream, a scuffle, a cut-off yell-

I felt a breeze, warm against my face, and knew it was the residue of Force power. Thuds, as lifeless bodies fell to the ground. The sobs of a panicked girl shuffling away-

Wait, what?

“Ooh, the Mando’s got themselves a Twi’lek joygirl?” Bandon effused. The pitch of his voice spiked with delight. “Come here, little girl, let me look at you.”

“Shavit, Bandon, this isn’t the time or place,” Yudan muttered, sighing. “And I’m not sticking around while you satisfy your urges. Let the sent go.”

Czerka-employed Mandalorians working in the Shadowlands, with a joygirl by their side? That wasn’t plausible. Not in the frelling Shadowlands. They’d keep any precious slave locked up topside, surely.

Maybe my mind really was slipping into insanity. Just like Malak.

“What, leave a Twi’lek girl all alone here? She wouldn’t last a day.” A dark chuckle. “Final chance to come willingly, little girl, before I drag you here by your headtails.”

I tried to turn my head to see, but everything was so heavy.

“Please,” a broken voice pleaded. “Let me go. I’m not even meant to be here!”

The voice stabbed a pain of recognition into my mind. Everything froze. The Force weaves I’d been so lightly judging shuddered again, and the sliver of consciousness focused on it barely had the strength to balance them aright. I won’t keep this up much longer, I understood dimly.

Why did I feel so cold suddenly? I couldn’t feel my limbs, but goose pimples pricked awareness into the back of my neck. Sweat beaded on my forehead, and the air was sluggish and heavy in my lungs.

There was a shuffling as the stranger moved closer. My head turned, this time, to see a slight figure in bulky armour some metres away, as the scarlet illumination bounced off her-

“Jen?” she gasped. Round, frightened eyes reflected in the harsh light. “Jen!”

She ran toward me, and I knew her, and she couldn’t be here, not here, she was back on the ‘Hawk-

The girl was lifted, hands scrabbling at her throat, and in the periphery of my vision I could see Bandon’s raised fist-

“A young blue-skinned Twi’lek who knows our Revan?” Bandon mused in surprise. The delight in his voice was painful. It must be some sort of strange hallucinatory vision, I knew this - some torment my broken mind was spewing forth to punish me for my sins. “Didn’t Revan’s crew include a teenage Twi’lek?”

She was choking. Mission. Mission. What was real? My young friend, clad in that neural-resistant armour of Calo Nord’s that didn’t protect her neck, captured by frelling Mandalorian mercenaries in the sodding Shadowlands?

That wasn’t real. That didn’t make any sense.

“Jen,” she whimpered again, and bright white crackled from Bandon’s other fist.

“Wrong name, little girl.” Bandon chuckled with unrestrained mirth. “Your Jen is actually Revan, or what’s left of her after the Jedi took a crap through her mind. Still, Revan’s pissed me off enough in the past that I desire a little payback. Watching you die can be the start of that.”

The sparks of electricity shot forth from Bandon’s hand, and encased the twisted mind-vision that looked like Mission Vao.

Mission screamed.

The detail of my warped mind was intense. The lightning sheered away from her Force-resistant armour, most of it bouncing harmlessly into the shadows. The edges of it curled around her bare neck and lekku. The cries of anguish grew louder, and a burgeoning horror spiraled through me like many fine threads of a wyyyschokk’s web.

“Interesting armour,” Bandon commented. “I guess this will take longer than normal.”

The horror crawled through the detachment that had owned me since Bastila voiced my name.

“This is the price of knowing you, Revan,” Yudan whispered. Somehow, I didn’t think he meant me to hear those words. He was standing close but facing away, facing the perdition unfolding in front of us. The Mission-form twisted in mid-air, sparks of white-death flaring over her twining headtails, and suddenly I realized-

What if this is real? And if it wasn’t, if it was just my screwed-up psyche plummeting into insanity, then what did it matter if I acted upon it?

For, real or not, I couldn’t bear to listen to her screams anymore.

But – if I was going to do this, then I had do it properly. I had to fight to the bitter end with every breath and thought and tooth and nail –

I felt the burn of conviction as it sparked to life. I hadn’t felt it in some time, but it was a familiar emotion, like slipping into a pattern of behaviour that was both a homecoming and a resurrection. I would do what was needed to save my friend, and I wouldn’t give up.

Thoughts at once crystallized into a matrix of concentration as I regarded Bandon, who was unaware anything was amiss. My gaze flicked back to Yudan – still staring ahead – before converging upon the unlit ‘saber held loosely in his grasp.

My mind cleared. All emotion vanished out of necessity. And I made my decision.

I dropped the weaves, and lashed out at the nerve restraints. They sputtered into electronic demise.

As pained feeling surged into my limbs, I drew harder on the Force than I could ever recall. I lurched a half-numb limb upward – the working one - just in time to grasp Yudan’s flying ‘saber.

I wrenched myself upright, the Force wrapped tight around shaking legs. My off-arm was tucked snug into my chest, hot flares of agony shooting through the limb that were wholly unimportant.
My other limbs were unnaturally stiff, nerves slowly prickling back to life.

The Force sang through my body, sweeping aside all discomfort. With an instinct both trained and innate, I threw a psychic shield-block over my mind, submerged my vision back into Force Sight, and opened my senses to the world.

I could see everything. The faint spark of Mission, the dark miasma of Bandon turning slowly in shock, the influx of shadowed energy emanating from Yudan.

But even with the awesome might of the Force behind me, I needed a moment to loosen muscles that had been inoperable for some time. Bandon was the primary threat, his lightning dying out as he faced me once more, mouth gaping in stunned surprise.

Yudan’s uncertainty was palpable on the Force. I could only gamble it would stay that way.

I stepped toward Bandon, my gaze fixed solely on his. I flicked Yudan’s ‘saber on, to one blade only, and stared Bandon down as I took another step.

His weapon flared to life in response.

Various attack plans ran clinically through my head. I held one, unfamiliar, lightsaber, and I fought best with two. I was injured. A fair duel was not in my best interests.

Bandon’s greatest strength was sheer Force power. But then, apparently, so was mine.

I took another step and he mirrored me, as we closed in on each other in preternatural silence. I held his gaze and willed him to stay fixed entirely on my advancing form, and my senses unfurled and took note of the surrounding environment.

Even the trees here radiated with power, ancient and slow and unyielding. The forest floor was speckled with insects that skittered through dirt and leaves and paid no attention to us. The only things not teeming with life were the deactivated ‘speeders.

My primary arm, the one clasping the ‘saber, punched into the air. I unleashed my will, and threw a jumpspeeder at Bandon with all of my Force-might.

My muscles tensed in readiness as I prepared to intercept Bandon, if necessary. There was a mere fraction of a second before the ‘speeder smashed into the ground, shards of metal ripping apart and careening through the undergrowth. Plumes of dirt were thrown up, and the acrid stench of ruptured power cells hit the humid air.

Bandon had almost no time to leap clear, and yet there he was, sailing away from the smoking remnants of his transport, directly toward Mission Vao.

I was ready.

An influx of power bent to my command. It was neither Light nor Dark, just an implacable determination to reach my goal. I landed in front of Mission a split-second before Bandon, and was already lashing out as his feet hit the ground.

Bandon blocked; I felt myself slip naturally into an offensive form, slashing upward to score a glancing blow against his cortosis-weaved robes. I struck again at his arm, his chest, his head, a flurry of frenzied attacks designed to keep him on the defensive.

He deflected them all.
My injured arm, tucked tight into my chest, was affecting the fluidity of my movements. His final block swatted my ‘saber aside, and counter-attacked in a single motion. I barely dodged. I have to change the game plan.

My mind stayed blank; purposeful. With a wrench on the Force, I launched myself high into the air, landing on a low hanging branch from a nearby wroshyr. He would follow. I knew his character. And when he did-

I stepped closer to the trunk, and sliced my lightsaber clean through the branch.

Bandon, with no place to land, plummeted to the forest floor with a surprised yell.

I followed.

The red ‘saber scored deep into the ground, an instant after he rolled out of the way. But I was on him as he’d barely found his feet; no finesse, just a brutal, rabid series of blows that had him stumbling backward.

But, again, he rallied, and a cold voice in my head pointed out my very obvious weakness.

"She is used to wielding two blades," a Cathar murmured. "She leaves her side unguarded when she only has one."

And injured, to boot.

Bandon snarled, smashing aside my next attack with his ‘saber and coming in for a riposte aimed directly at my curled up off-arm.

I’d seen it, predicted it, and acted before he made contact. In a rush of wild Force energy, I threw him hard and fast back against the unyielding trunk of the massive wroshyr.

He crumpled, and I closed in for the kill, like a rancor sensing blood.

But Bandon was no easy prey, and even gasping for breath, he was already coming back at me with a powerful overhand I had to dodge sideways to avoid.

An upsurge of achromatic voltage sparked to life around him, a blistering aura of electricity centred around his left fist. I vaulted further away, pulling the Force tight around me. He strode forward, face taut with antagonistic concentration, before unleashing a mighty wave of crackling lightning.

Power can be transformed, my glacial mind whispered. Absorbed, and transformed. And Bandon’s power was great, indeed.

I felt the lightning as it hit me. Pure energy at its core, able to be reconstructed into something else, if one only had the strength to do so. It sucked deep into me, transmuting into a raw, chaotic form of life, of potential in every single atom.

It was engulfed deep into my bones, the sheer power building until it completely filled me. And right at the moment I felt I could hold no more, I flung it back as a solid, savage wave of concussion.

My enemy went flying. Chunks of bark ripped themselves free from the wroshyr, sailing into the shadows. I was already in the air as Bandon crunched against the inner trunk, my lightsaber arcing toward his torso.
This time he didn’t block. Yudan’s ‘saber drove deep into his chest.

The adrenaline burned. The beat of my heart was fast and loud. Harsh pants of air scraped like crushed ferracrystal in my lungs. And slowly, slowly, both the Force and the exultation of battle seeped away.

It’s not over, I whispered to myself in desperation. It’s not over yet.

The shield over my mind, blocking me from my bond-sister, still held. The Force Sight was shaky, but there. Behind, metres away, I could hear vague whimpers from Mission. And to the left-

I spun, shaky on my feet, and my gaze narrowed on Yudan Rosh. I could feel my senses fraying, as I stared at someone who apparently had known me far better than Mission Vao ever had.

He was standing, motionless, as if impotent while this battle had raged on. In his grasp was an unlit lightsaber. His fingers twitched, and a bright green beam activated from his hand.

The Force was skittering out of my grasp, slipping away like smoke on the wind.

There was a clinical thought in my head. If I’m going to kill Yudan, it has to be now. But I stood, staring at him instead.

“You don’t deserve to hold that lightsaber,” I whispered.

“I seem to have misplaced mine,” he shot back in response, but made no movement in aggression. Behind me, I could still hear faint sobs, shuffling away from us. From me.

Now. Now is my only chance. The broken limb tucked into my chest flared with the onset of agony, no longer held back by the Force. The shield over my mind was weakening.

“Make a move, Yudan,” I growled. “Make a frelling choice.”

The clarity of my thoughts was disintegrating. The conviction that rode me to victory was fracturing, as the horror of my hideous truth began to resurface. Revan. I am Revan. The butcher, the villain, the fallen hero. Any chance for triumph over Yudan was fast disappearing. And yet, somehow, I found myself wholly unable to attack a stationary target from a past I didn’t recall.

“This isn’t over,” he whispered. He switched off Zhar’s ‘saber, and took a step back. “I’ll be watching you, Revan. This isn’t over.”

He turned, and disappeared into the Shadowlands.

I was left with the pounding of my own heartbeat, the flailing of the weakening Force, and the sounds of Mission’s harsh breathing behind me.

xXx
The Shadowlands was an elusive beast, I’d found. After too many years to count, I should have known all her secrets. Surprises had become… rare. There was a certain heartbeat to the ecosystem, an amalgamation of sound and smell and spirit that could forewarn one of endangerment, be it from flora or fauna.

Bah. Maybe I would have done better as a poet.

Still, the shattering upsurge of raw Force power had certainly given me a nasty jolt.

And this place was getting far too darn crowded.

I was happy when it was just me, the odd Wookiee, and the natural wildlife that may paralyze or maim or kill, but not with any malice. As far as the predators here were concerned, I was just a walking meal - albeit a bit of a bony one.

It was a simple life, and it agreed with me.

But there was always a fly in the bacta salve, and for me it was the Faceless One. He’d killed a few Wookiees, hoisted his comm arrays near and far, and hacked through the habitats of enough endangered species to earn my ire. I’d never managed to track him down in person but, heh, I’d destroyed a sufficient amount of his tech that it had to be hurting his credit line.

A guy like that, he had no business living in a place like the Shadowlands. It made me wonder why he did.

Still, the Faceless One was a minor irritation in the grand scheme of things. I’d made my peace with the past, and left it behind me. I’d always figured I’d meet my end here, either through complacency, old age or just darn bad luck. Adventures on any galactic scale were beyond me now.

Or so I’d thought.

Oh, sure, there’d been that time four years ago, when I’d had a visitor so drenched in destiny that it had disturbed my peace of mind – but she’d left, leaving her secrets cloaked in a technology I’d never managed to conquer. The dust soon settled, and my life resumed its simple anonymity.

It was Vrook’s presence that first made me wonder if I was wrong, if this wasn’t the completion of my tale, if maybe the Force had turned her eye once more on ole Jolee Bindo.

Ah, Vrook Lamar. Now there was a sourpuss if I ever knew one. He’d been cantankerous and surly as a teen, and I doubted he’d aged well. He was probably a Master now, a snappish old man lecturing the kids on the dangers of feeling anything other than mild indigestion.

He was here with Vandar Tokare, although it’d taken me some time to recognize that Force signature. Vandar had already been an established Master back when I was a pup. From a different Enclave to me though – Karon and Zhar’s first one, if I recalled correctly – which was why it’d taken me so long to ascertain his identity.

There was only one thing on Kashyyyk that could have brought them here.

I’d thought about showing them the way, I truly had – but, well, Vrook had never been my favourite person. And it wasn’t like that relic had done Revan any good, with the way she’d turned out.

I didn’t hear much, down here in the Shadowlands, but usually I glanced through the galactic goings-on before smashing the Faceless One’s arrays. Heh. And it was hard to miss the repercussions of Revan’s actions, when one was scrolling through the HoloNews headlines.

I’d found it annoying, at first, all these off-worlders interrupting my hard-won solitude. Bad enough that Czerka started sticking their fat fingers into the Kashyykykian resources, worse that a Wookiee chieftain had fallen prey to the greed of civilization.

I liked the Wookiees. They were simple – by no means stupid, but in general they preferred to eschew the trappings of wealth and technology that could make living so darn complicated at times. Czerka had gained a foothold here some hundred years ago, so I supposed it was only a matter of time until they finally gained a Wookiee ally.

A right shame, though.

It’d be nice to do something about that, but while the Wookiees accepted my presence on Kashyyyk, the ones who braved the Shadowlands generally weren’t interested in conversing with a hairless geriatric. They fell into three groups: young cubs proving their worth, mentors keeping an eye on them, or exiles embarking on a final journey of redemption. Not anyone particularly interested in an off-worlder’s observations, be it about increased merc activity or the foibles of tolerating an organization such as Czerka Corporation.

So I sat back, and let events unfold as they may.

Then Vrook and Vandar came, wandering aimlessly around the Shadowlands for a couple of weeks before heading back topside.

And now… well, the shock of four great Force-users, agitating and clashing together in a swirling of power and destiny, certainly had me sit up and take notice. Maybe it was time to find out exactly what was going on in my backyard.

I hadn’t been nearby, though. Far enough away that I doubted the familiarity of the lightest one - the one that shone with a gentle righteousness I thought I recognized. It had been snuffed out before I came close, and so had the chaotic spark – until all that was left were two Dark signatures, speeding back in my direction. Before they’d stopped, and everything erupted all over again.

Kids messing up my planet, I thought grumpily, but I couldn’t deny the caution in my soul at that level of power. And if Dark Jedi were here, then maybe I’d made the wrong decision in evading Vrook.

I’d felt an upsurge of turbulent power, and then one of the Dark ones sputtered into death. The other fled - away from me, away from the Force presence that bordered on behemoth.

It seemed the chaotic one may not have been as defeated as I first thought.
But the power plummeted as I warily closed in. I kept my footsteps quiet, and tamped down hard on my Force signature.

I could hear a voice; a young, hysterical voice that didn’t belong to the presence I had felt. “Jen, what- what-”

Noisy sobs echoed through the shadows, followed by the whisper of a tormented sigh.

I took a step closer. There was a tangle of sparse undergrowth between me and the strangers. Sparse enough to offer some view of what lay ahead.

A bowed figure, scarlet lightsaber held impotently at his or her side. The dark mop of curls suggested a woman, probably human, but I couldn’t be certain from here. Her shoulders were slumped, head tucked into her chest. Defeat seemed etched into every line of her body.

Some metres to the left was the crumpled form of a Twi’lek teenager, whose sobs were dwindling into messy sniffles as she slowly clambered to her feet.

The human’s red lightsaber didn’t mean anything – just like brown robes, too many Force users allowed coloured labels to define them – but I was still wary. This young Twi’lek was completely defenceless against a wild Force user, who had more raw power than anyone should, by rights.

I scanned through the brambles, taking in what scenery I could. There was a tangled, smoking mess of durasteel beyond the figures. Shards of twisted metal had spread out in a wide arc around it, suggesting whatever it had been – a transport vehicle, most likely - had collided with some velocity into the ground.

My gaze travelled further, snagging on four visible corpses nearby. One was a crumpled mess of dark robes. I’d felt that one die. His body was leaned against a wroshyr that bore obvious signs of heavy Force damage. Layers of thick bark peeled back from the massive tree, presenting the unwelcome image of a gaping wound in the trunk.

I could feel my irritation flare, at that.

The Force-user tensed in sudden movement, her head jerking in my direction as her lightsaber lifted. I had one moment to curse myself for the slip of emotion, before she’d launched in front of the Twi’lek as a shield, her weapon raised in a defensive guard as the Force rallied around her like a sweeping cyclone.

“Show yourself!” the woman growled. “Or, so help me, I will make you!”

“I’m no threat to you,” I called out, taking care to stomp loudly as I rounded the bushes. “Just an old man fed up with the mess you and your friends are making of my home.”

She was human, I confirmed, as I had my first clear glimpse of her. The illumination of the lightsaber reflected against her face, dark shadows under her eyes standing out in stark relief against the red. Hard to pick her age, from this distance, but she was too young to be anyone from my past.

I breathed out in relief. After Vrook, I’d been wary that other ghosts of mine might resurface. I’d been gone near four decades, half of which I’d spent on Kashyyyk. This one probably wasn’t born when I’d turned my back on the Order.

“Rulan Prolik,” she muttered, her eyes narrowing.
I felt my eyebrows raise in bemusement at the foreign name. Behind her, the Twi’lek stepped backward and stumbled over the corpse of a mercenary, falling inelegantly to the ground.

“I thought you-” the human cut herself off, frowning as she eyeballed me. And I found myself taking her measure, in return. One arm was tucked tight into her chest, and her breathing was hitched in pain. She wore loose, torn clothing that had obviously seen better days. Suddenly, the woman barked a laugh that was both cold and harsh. “Sun and stars. It’s the real Jolee Bindo, isn’t it?”

“Huh. You’ve got the advantage of me, young pup,” I said, my brows knitting together. Maybe Vrook had detected me and sent someone else in his stead, but this one seemed a strange choice. “Not to mention appallingly bad manners.”

I glanced behind the human to the young Twi’lek, who’d raised herself on her elbows. Her hand brushed against a lightweight blaster, seemingly dropped from the mercenary’s dead grasp.

“Did you know Rulan Prolik likes to run around impersonating you?” the woman demanded, rather inanely. Her shoulders slumped and her weapon dropped, as if she no longer saw me as any sort of threat. I noticed her shaking, then, a second before her eyes rolled back in her head and she collapsed to the forest floor.

Somehow, she’d had the presence of mind to mash the off-switch on her lightsaber, first.

The Shadowlands were once more immersed in darkness, which wasn’t a problem for me, but the young Twi’lek cried out in blind shock, and her fingers curled around the grip of the blaster.

“Calm down,” I said, in my most non-confrontational voice. “I’m not here to hurt you.”

“Go away!” the girl shrieked, her voice quavering in panic. “Leave us alone!”

Her breathing was fast and loud, verging on hyperventilating, and her unseeing gaze was wild. She was helpless and frantic in the dark, and with that mind I used the most obvious light-source to accommodate her.

The green of my decades-old weapon glowed.

“I’m not your enemy,” I said, reaching out with a soothing touch of Force. But she shrieked as her vision homed in on my lightsaber, and in a panicked motion quicker than I predicted her hand lifted and squeezed the trigger.

The shot missed me by more than a metre, but it was still closer than I liked. With a twist of irritation, I aimed a channel of thermal energy directly at the titasteel of the blaster.

The girl squeaked as she dropped the now piping-hot gun.

Again, I surrounded her in a gentle energy, attempting to smooth over the jagged edges of her panic. The girl’s heartbeat was thundering strong and fast, but it began to ease. Then her agitated gaze slowly travelled over me, taking in my face and the serviceable tunic I wore.

“Now,” I said briskly. “No more shooting at me. Where I come from, that’s considered rude.”

The girl’s breathing slowed, somewhat. “Are you- are you a Jedi?” she whispered.

I snorted as I took a step forward. The human was still down, but I could feel her rousing already. Just a faint, then, and I wondered exactly what sort of trauma these two had just been through. “I’m not overly fond of labels, girl.”

“A Sith?” the Twi’lek gasped, completely ignoring my previous statement.

“I’m just an old man who might be a friend.” I said, by way of explanation. The girl’s gaze had locked again on the bright green beam. I huffed in irritation. “With a lightsaber. And fancy Force powers.”

She blinked, before turning back to her companion. “She’s- she’s hurt,” the Twi’lek mumbled. “I don’t know how badly.”

I looked around once more, surveying the environs. The destruction of whatever vehicle that had been had likely scared off predators, but not for long. And the faint metallic tang of blood on the air would draw some of them back sooner rather than later.

“This place isn’t safe, not with these corpses,” I said, walking closer to the strangers with slow, obvious strides so as not to spook the girl again. She seemed less hysterical now and I wanted to keep it that way. “Let me see to your friend, and then we’ll move to my camp. It’s not far from here.”

I crouched next to the human, reaching out with gentle weaves of Force energy. She was coming to, and it was easy for me to speed that process up-

I leaned over her, close now, and recognition punched me hard in the gut.

…

“You can quit hiding,” the stranger called out, her back to me as she tended to the wild game roasting over a small fire. Amusement warmed her low tone. “I’m bored of waiting for you to announce yourself.”

“Huh,” I managed, surprised despite myself. I’d been discreet, in terms of both my physical and Force presence. “Just testing your skills, young pup. This place has killed many an off-worlder before you.”

I’d been tracking her for days. Her signature burned in the Force, a chaotic raw power completely foreign to Kashyyyk. I was curious what would draw such a presence here. There was danger aplenty on this forest world, but big-game hunting was infinitely more accessible on a hundred other planets.

“Young pup,” she echoed, following it with a soft chuckle. “That’s rather refreshing, actually.”

She turned her head to appraise me as I stepped near the firelight. She was human, thirty or thereabouts, with sharp green eyes that stared at me in wary calculation. Her dark hair was tied back in a messy braid, and she wore loose, non-descript clothing that was immediately noticeable as not Jedi robes.

Which didn’t necessarily mean a darn thing. I’d never worn those robes myself, even when I’d called myself a member of the Order.

“When you get to my age, you’ve earned the right to throw that label near and far,” I said at last, perching on the ground near the fire.

Her expression was inscrutable, and she looked back to the roasting meat. It smelled good. “What are you doing on Kashyyyk, old man?”
I huffed in mild annoyance. “Hey, that’s my question to you! This is my home, kid. Why are you here?”

I saw a twitch at the corner of her mouth. Something told me not to underestimate this one. “I’m looking for a relic of a civilization long dissolved into dust. It’s a technological device that predates even the wroshyrs. Seen anything like that?”

“There’s nothing like that here,” I answered, feeling my brows knit in bemusement. I wondered what sort of wild bantha chase had led her here. “This part of Kashyyyk is home to trees, predators that will kill you, plants that will kill you, and a few more trees. The refreshing thing about the Shadowlands is its complete lack of technology.”

Her mouth curved in a smile that didn’t reach her eyes. She appeared calm, but there was an underlying tension to her body language that bespoke of a readiness to leap into action in an instant.

“Oh, it’s nearby,” she murmured. “This is the oldest part of the Shadowlands. The trees here tell a story all their own.”

I could feel my eyebrows rise at her conviction. “Well, young pup, I hope you’re used to disappointment.”

“I’ve had my share.”

I harrumphed. “You keep blundering through the undergrowth the way you are, and you’re bound to get yourself into trouble,” I said, my voice gruff through the blatant lie. Her survival and tracking skills had been obvious to me days ago. “I know the area. I can guide you around, at least until you realize your Force relic isn’t here.”

Not that she’d said it was anything to do with the Force, but it was a sharp enough guess. The casual manner in which she reached forward to remove her dinner from the flames either meant my assumption was wrong, or she was a better actor than I suspected.

“You can join me, for now,” she said. I had the vague feeling the ‘for now’ suffix was not so much a threat as a statement of certainty. “I’d be glad of the company. What’s your name, old man?”

“Jolee. Jolee Bindo.”

She nodded, her gaze meeting mine again. “My name is Revan Freeflight.”

…

Back then, I had struggled not to react to that, even as an irritating smirk had blossomed on her face. At least this time, she wasn’t awake.

Revan. Huh. I didn’t see that coming.

So much for being too young for anyone I knew. To be fair, since I’d left the Order behind I could count the number of Force-users I’d encountered on one hand, with fingers to spare.

It just so happened that she was one of them.

But while I was certainly not up to date with the latest headlines, I was pretty sure Revan was meant to be dead. As well as a lot more Sithy.
I didn’t like feeling back-footed. With an impulsiveness unlike me, I wrapped the human up in a soothing blanket of Force, and coaxed her into a deep, slumberous state. I expected some psychic resistance, given what I knew of her, but the strength of it surprised me nonetheless.

You are safe here. I willed the energy surrounding her to appear benign, pacifying, trustworthy. My gut said it wasn’t working, that her consciousness was fighting me, struggling against my efforts with a growing strength that would soon out-strip mine. You are safe, I repeated, knowing that while she might not hear my mental words, she may at least feel their intent. You and your friend both.

With a suddenness I didn’t expect, she seemed to surrender, plummeting into unconsciousness.

I rocked back on my heels, taken aback at the swift change. It seemed – deliberate. As if she desired the escape. Huh. Looks like she’s just as hard to predict as last time. And likely just as dangerous. Still, I had a reprieve in which to work out what to do next. She had to be after that ancient relic, the one she hadn’t let me near four years ago.

But Revan had done an awful lot of bad things in the intervening time.

I remembered, then, that I wasn’t alone, and turned back to the Twi’lek. “I think your friend – Jen, was it?” At the girl’s worried nod, I continued. “She needs rest. Her arm’s pretty banged up.” I frowned, nudging at the limb gently with the Force. “I can look at that back at my place. Come.” I stood, hearing my knees creak.

“But- Jen-” The girl gestured to Revan in confusion.

“Fancy Force powers, remember?” I admonished. I sent the Force out, in cushioned cords of energy that lifted the volatile human into the air. The Twi’lek blinked. “Follow me, and stay close.”

xXx

The Twi’lek girl introduced herself as Mission, before drooping into silence. She’d scooped up the merc blaster as we’d left, and I hadn’t bothered to comment. If it made the girl feel safer, then so be it.

I was wrapped up in my own thoughts, anyway.

Revan, alive and back on Kashyyyk. But she hadn’t recognized me, for all that she knew my name. That was odd. We’d spent days together, philosophizing about the nature of the Force and the Jedi, before she turned into a corner of the Shadowlands I’d always avoided – innately, without realizing it – and then flatly told me to leave if I valued my life.

Now I didn’t exactly consider myself a memorable character or anything, but it hadn’t been that long ago. And she had to be here for that Force relic – again – so why wouldn’t she think on the grumpy old coot who’d trailed her for most of that original journey?

It could have been the Dark Side messing with her head, what with the stories I’d heard – but then she didn’t look all that Dark, either.

And the Twi’lek called her by a false name. That don’t mean a thing. Of course she’ll use a false name if the galaxy thinks she’s dead.

I’d been thinking things were getting boring, lately – but this wasn’t exactly the sort of shakeup I was after. Bah, quit your whining, Bindo. It’s not going to change what the Force has thrown at you. Somehow, I had the feeling I wouldn’t be on Kashyyyk for much longer.
“Well,” I said, breaking the silence as we neared my hut. “Welcome to my home, such as it is.”

I had a couple of makeshift huts, dotted around the Shadowlands. Sure, they had a tendency to get infested with rkkrrkkrl trap-spinners, which was dangerous – or tach, which was annoying and mildly messy. Then there was the time an uller had chosen one as a mating pen. That had taken a good dollop of Force persuasion to clear.

But, as far as shelter went, they were good enough for me.

The young Twi’lek was staring at the sideways-leaning one-room building with a mild look of disbelief.

“That’s your home?”

I frowned. “It’s a perfectly serviceable hut,” I grumped, although I did take a moment to try and view it through the eyes of a teenage city-dweller. Massive chunks of bark shed from the wroshyrs themselves formed the base of the roof, resting on pruned baloo poles and twined together with kshyyy vines. The entire structure rested back against a wroshyr, and the remaining walls were thick branches lashed together in a manner similar to the Wookiee’s handiwork topside.

The Force made it relatively simple to throw one of these shacks together, and ensure its stability in the short-term. It wasn’t pretty, but then I never pretended to be an architect.

Mission was still staring at it doubtfully, before her gaze slipped back to her sleeping companion. With a flick of my wrist, the door to my home opened, and I shifted Revan inside.

I didn’t have a fixed abode as such - the huts I created were meant to be temporary habitats that fit in with the Kashyyykian ecosystem. As such, this one was sparsely furnished. One corner held a bundle of blankets where I placed Revan; the far wall was graced with a long bench that held a minimal collection of cooking utensils and implements. Closed containers of water and wasaka-juice sat under the only table – for although water was plentiful in the Shadowlands, it was also something I preferred to have reserves of.

The girl was standing awkwardly in the centre of the rom, having left the door wide open. I harrumphed. City-dwellers became so accustomed to electronic closures that it completely addled any basic courtesy or common sense they might otherwise have had. I stomped over to close the door myself, before gesturing toward the small stool by the table.

“Pull up a stump and be comfortable. I’ll see to your friend, and then we should discuss a few things.”

Revan’s arm was damaged in three places: a shoulder dislocation I could fix, a broken forearm that I could set but would take some time to heal, and two severed fingers I couldn’t do anything for. Still, lightsaber wounds healed clean, and she’d be able to sort a prosthetic or mechanical solution once off-world.

“I’ll see to your friend, and then we should discuss a few things.”

Revan’s arm was damaged in three places: a shoulder dislocation I could fix, a broken forearm that I could set but would take some time to heal, and two severed fingers I couldn’t do anything for. Still, lightsaber wounds healed clean, and she’d be able to sort a prosthetic or mechanical solution once off-world.

“She will soon,” I murmured, as I reached out simultaneously with my hands and the Force. I’d set many bones and dislocations in the past… but not for a very long time. “It’s a good thing she’s out to it, young pup. Otherwise this would hurt.”

With a slow, steady force, I pulled Revan’s outstretched arm away from her torso. I felt the thunk as the bone slid back into the socket. She gave out a sharp cry and her eyelashes fluttered, before...
She settled back into unconsciousness.

_She’ll come to, and soon. I’d better work out exactly how I’m going to handle her this time around._ But her instinctive action of guarding Mission had already shown me one thing – she cared for the girl. And Mission seemed loyal to her.

Perhaps they would reveal more if I wasn’t around.

I cleared my throat. “Her forearm is broken, but it’s in the right position. There isn’t much more I can do for her other than immobilize the arm.” As I continued my ministrations, I could sense the teenager glancing around in curiosity. The Force made it easy to read people’s emotions, and the Twi’lek was no exception. She was shocked, fearful – natural that, here in the Shadowlands – and undeniably confused. But her mood had definitely calmed from earlier.

“So, you live in the Shadowlands?” she asked, as I rocked back on my heels. I’d strapped Revan’s arm, but it would only hold as long as she wasn’t stupid with it. And this was Revan, after all. Inconsequential things like broken arms wouldn’t stop her from doing what she wanted. In fact, it seemed that not even death would stop her.

“What gave it away?” I asked, reaching out with gentle threads of healing Force. There were damaged nerves and ruptured blood vessels in the shoulder, it having been dislocated for some time. The Force could accelerate the healing process but, ultimately, she needed rest. “The fact I’ve built a hut down here, or that I referred to this place as my home?”

Okay, okay, no need to get snarly,” she muttered. “It’s just, I thought only Wookiee exiles went down here. And the boys out to prove their manhood or something. ‘Cause, y’know, the girls have to stay behind and do the cooking.” She said the last with a derogatory tone, and when I turned to face her she was rolling her eyes in vague annoyance.

“You know a bit about Wookiee culture,” I said mildly, trying not to sound surprised as I stood and wandered over to the table where she sat.

Mission shrugged. “My best friend’s a Wookiee. Hard not to pick a few things up.”

I felt my eyebrows shoot up at that, but my reply was interrupted by a quiet chirping sound. We turned in unison, to stare at the source: the unmoving Revan.

The noise sounded again, the soft vibration of an electronic device. The Twi’lek girl gasped, scrabbled to her feet, and ran to Revan. As she crouched down and began fiddling with the human’s wrist, I recognized the noise for what it was.

::Jen?: a deep voice barked from Revan’s limp wrist. It sounded angry, upset, and demanding.

“Canderous!” Mission cried, fumbling with the communicator. There was a pregnant pause.

::What? Haar’chak, Mission, is that you?:

The Twi’lek burst into sobs.

::Mission? Mission! Calm down::: There was an intake of breath. ::Jen. She’s not:::

“No! No, Jen’s fine. I mean-” The Twi’lek sniffed, seemingly once more in control of herself. “She’s a bit banged up and out to it, and there’s some other stuff – but she’s okay. We’re both okay, we’re both safe. I’ve just had a rotten day.”
There was a string of curses from the communicator in a foreign language. I thought they might be Mandalorian.

::You’ve had a rotten day? Mand’alor’s balls, Mission, I had to watch you disappear down to the Shadowlands and not come back up. When I finally got there myself, I couldn’t find a trace of you or Jen, and then your kriffing communicator blacked out::: There was a deep growl over the comm. I raised my eyebrows, turned around, and decided to make myself a cup of tea. Didn’t sound like this conversation was going to be over in a hurry.

“Blacked out?” Mission parroted. There was a shuffle behind me. “Oh! Oh, mine’s completely bust. I didn’t notice. Um, I guess it was from all that lightning.”

Lightning? I frowned, turning back to stare at the Twi’lek. If she’d been caught in the middle of the fight between Revan and those Dark Jedi, then she’d truly had a bad day.

::Lightning?:: the voice from the communicator demanded. ::Okay, kid, start from the beginning and report:::

The girl sniffed again. I finished straining the dried auldflowers from the chipped mug, and took a small sip. I didn’t particularly like it cold, but sometimes it felt comforting just to hold a drink in one’s hands.

::Hello?:: another voice cut in over the comm, frantic and young and male. ::Ordo, what have you found? Did you find Mission? Her link’s still dead:::

“Dustil?”

::Keep your jockeys on, Sithkid, she’s fine:::

I found my eyebrows raising at the moniker. Between a girl Twi’lek who claimed a Wookiee as a best friend, a Mandalorian, and a young’un labelled a Sithkid, it seemed that Revan’s companions were interestingly eclectic.

::Mission! Frakk, Dad went absolutely mental- hey, what are you doing on Jen’s comm:::

“Oh, is Carth back? Sheesh, I bet he had some choice words-”

::Is Onasi there?:: the Mandalorian cut in.

::No, the Republic brass pulled him away again. Something weird is going on with them – he said he’ll be right back – frakk, Mission, just after he left I saw your link black out on the ‘Hawk’s console:::

“Yeah, I dunno if this thing can get fixed-”

::I was gonna go after you, after Ordo told me what happened, but Dad got that stupid astromech to seal the damn hatch so I couldn’t-:::

::Enough! You kids can bitch about everything when we’re all back on the ‘Hawk. Mission, what the kriff happened:::

There was a shaky intake of air from the Twi’lek. “I didn’t mean to leave the lift. But there was a grenade – so I ran, and then these sleemo Mandalorians grabbed me and took off!” A note of anger had entered her voice. “Sheesh, Canderous, your countrymen were complete ronto turds. And then they tried to pinch ‘speeders from a couple of Dark Jedi – who were holding Jen captive – and, well, you can probably guess what happened next.”

There was another pause. I leaned back against the wooden bench, and took a second sip of tea.

::They killed the Mando’ade, and Jen killed them.::

“Something like that,” she muttered.

::Okay, kid, you win. Your day is worse. And I’m glad I didn’t tell Carpet you were missing.::

“You’re with Big Z?” she demanded. “Where are you? Is he okay? What’s going on?”

::He’s here, with his dad. They ain’t too interested in talking to non-Wookiee folk like me. Look, kid, you need to wake Jen up and get her on the comm.::

The girl paused. “Um… I’ll get her to buzz you when she comes to. She’s… a bit out to it, Canderous. But she’s okay… I mean, uh, give her some time, okay?”

There was a disgruntled noise over the communicator. ::Sithkid, trace Mission’s location and patch me the coordinates. Mission, are you with anyone else?:

“Yeah,” she sighed. “Some old guy with a green lightsaber. He’s helping us.”

“Jolee. The name’s Jolee, young pup,” I called out in vague annoyance.

“Canderous, Dustil, I gotta go and see to Jen. I’ll be in touch, okay?”

::Stay put, ad’ika. I’ll be getting your position shortly.::

::Uh, be safe, okay?: the younger voice added.

Mission switched Revan’s communicator off, and turned back to look at me, uncertainty plain in her expression. I took another sip of tea, before placing the cup to the side of the bench. It did taste pretty awful cold.

I reached out gently with the Force, more to gauge her mood than anything else. The girl was still scared, on edge, but calmer than I expected, given what I thought she’d been through. Ah, the resilience of youth. And also, I felt Revan stirring. I could coax her back to sleep – possibly – or I could fish for information another way.

This was Revan, after all. I had a darn right to know whether she presented a danger to Kashyyyk, or anyone who lived here.

I cleared my throat. “I’m going for a quick walk, young pup. Stay in the hut – it’s safe here, and I won’t be long. Don’t leave this place – I don’t have to tell you the Shadowlands are dangerous.”

Mission immediately looked alarmed, and her wide eyes shot back to Revan. “You’re- you’re leaving? Why?”

“To pick up that one’s lightsaber, for a start.” I gestured toward the sleeping human. “If she’s like any other Force user I’ve known, she won’t be happy until it’s back in her possession. As I said, you’ll be safe as long as you stay put. See you in a bit.”

xXx

There weren’t any predators sniffing about the corpses yet, other than a dozen or so hopeful gnit-flies. It gave me time to investigate the scene, without having to concern myself about nullifying any irritating threat. Kinrath would flock here soon enough, I knew, so I got to work.

Revan’s double-bladed red ‘saber lay on the ground where she dropped it. I picked it up, and went to appraise the mercenary corpses first. Two of them were decked out in full heavy-armour that was distinctively of Mandalorian style. The third was a heavy-set Togruta, who wore nothing more than plain clothing, which was odd in contrast to his deceased companions.

I frowned. It looked like the Togruta corpse had been shifted. Regardless, the mercenaries held nothing of value to me other than a handful of ration bars and a sole medikit. I moved onto the Dark Jedi.

Even in death, there was a dark residue around the body. With some hesitation, I pocketed his single lightsaber. I wasn’t planning on collecting them as such, but I also didn’t want the next Czerka-paid idiot to come along and accidentally hack his own arm off. That sort of thing had been known to happen, with lightsabers.

The remnants of the vehicle – some light speeder I suspected – were strewn near and far. Surveying the dual power cells and the amount of debris visible, I judged it to have been just the one vehicle. As I sifted through the wreckage, I came across a set of nerve restraints and a neural disruptor.

With a grimace of disgust, my lightsaber ran through the lot of them.

There was a cargo bag, too, flung some distance away. It had likely been attached to the speeder before its unfortunate demise. The first thing I pulled from it was yet another lightsaber.

I stilled, staring down at the hilt. It took a moment before my thoughts began processing again.

Right. It’s time to head back and get some answers from Revan.

The walk back was swift. I kept my mind blank, and focussed purely on the Force around me. Revan’s presence was significant as I neared. She was either awake, or on the cusp of being so, and I didn’t want her to sense me.

I dimmed the energy surrounding me, drawing it gently inward. It wasn’t possible to conceal my presence entirely, but I could pass for the psychic touch of a smallish forest creature. And although that hadn’t fooled Revan four years ago, she was somewhat more rattled and preoccupied this time around.

And, darn it, I wanted to eavesdrop on their conversation and figure out what the heck was going on.

I ain’t going to feel guilt over this, I told the slight pang of misgiving in my chest. I’ve heard enough of Revan’s doings after the last time she found that relic. I have to decide whether I should stop her or aid her, and that means I need information.

“Jen?” I heard the Twi’lek kid question through my amplified hearing. She sounded plaintive.

There was a groan in response.

“Jen, are you awake?”

“Mission.” The voice was a hoarse whisper. “Mission, is that really you? Sithspit, where- where am I?”
“We’re safe, at least for now. Are you- are you ok?”

There was a muffled snort that seemed to border on hysteria. "This is real," Revan muttered. "Sun and stars, this is actually real. I can’t…” the voice trailed off. I felt my brows knit together in confusion. Revan’d had a rough battle, for sure, but she sounded nothing like the self-possessed Jedi of old. Something was off. Something had changed with her, and I had no idea what I was dealing with, yet.

“It’s gonna be okay, Jen. I mean-”

The laughter that followed was definitely trekking into the throes of hysteria, now. I wondered if I needed to make my presence known. Does the Twi’lek chit have any inkling who she is dealing with?

"That's not my name, Mission. You heard. Don't tell me you didn't catch that bastard calling me Revan."

Okay, so maybe she does.

"Yeah, I mean, but- but it's not true, right? I mean, that Hutt-slime was just messing with your head. Everyone knows Revan was a guy-"

Or maybe she doesn't. This was getting confusing.

And the choking noise that cut through the Twi’lek's impassioned plea sounded a lot like sobbing. "Stars, Mission, I can decisively confirm that I'm female. That Revan is."

There was a slight pause, before the exuberant Twi’lek bounced back. “Look, Jen, I know you. Whatever that freakazoid said to have you believing-”

“Mission, stop.” The words were low, intent and commanding, and the girl dwindled into silence. “It’s true,” Revan whispered. “It’s true, Mission.”

I could hear the Twi’lek take in a deep breath. “Okay,” she said slowly. “Okay. But we can sort this out-”

“How? How in the sodding Outer Rim can we sort this out?”

There was a heavy silence following her impassioned plea. I found myself bemused. Not only was Revan alive when the galaxy mostly certainly thought her dead, but it sounded like her own identity was as much of a surprise to her as it had been to me.

“I don’t know,” Mission whispered. “I mean, I don’t really understand any of this. How can you be…”

“That monster? Bastila saved me instead of killing me like she should have.”

Ah, Bastila Shan. The latest prodigy of the Jedi. Had some fandangled talent the holonets were raving about. And somehow, like all young, strong Force-users, had become tangled in events beyond her control.

“Everyone knows Bastila faced Darth Revan. I can’t believe I didn’t sodding guess this before.”

She hadn’t known who she was. That explained her behaviour – but not what she was going to do next.
There was shuffling noise. “Jen-”

“That’s not my name.”

“It is, to me,” the girl answered. The honestly in her voice was raw, and beautiful.

“Mission,” Revan replied, soft and mournful. “Jen Sahara died a year ago. I killed her. How can you be taking this so… so damn lightly?”

It was interesting to speculate on exactly what had happened. Somehow, I had the feeling the Jedi had done something they shouldn’t. Huh. Wouldn’t be the first time.

“I’m not, okay?” Mission retorted. “It’s big, I mean, it’s like, huge, but you’re the same person I met back on Taris. And you keep fighting and coming back to us. You can fix this, Jen, you can fix your mistakes.”

Revan laughed again, a jagged sound that put me in mind of shattering ferracrystal. “My mistakes? This isn’t something you can just- just stick a plaster over! As far as I know, Mission, there’s no way to bring billions of people back from the grave-”

“Jen-”

“And are you forgetting what I did when we arrived in Manaan airspace? Stars, what about Korriban when we found Bastila missing? If it hadn’t been for you and Carth, I would have killed everyone in my way – Sith, or no.” Her impassioned rant petered out into an agonized sigh. “I’m… I’m unstable, Mission.”

“You’re wrong, y’know,” Mission countered, in a gentle voice. “It wasn’t just us. I reckon if Bastila had been around, she coulda stopped you. Juhani woulda said something about the Force to make you listen – you always listen to her. Sheesh, if Zaalbar hadn’t been all brain-fried, he woulda had some choice words to say – and he’d’ve made you hear them.” The Twi’lek let out a frustrated breath of air. “And Jen, what about Canderous? Wouldn’t you listen to him most of all? And if you didn’t, I just bet he’d kick your arse until you did, scary Force powers or no. Don’t you see? All of the crew have holds on you. And I reckon any one of us coulda pulled you back.”

Hah! A Twi’lek teenager shows more wisdom than half the Council! Whatever had happened to Revan, she was being granted a true second chance… and going about it in a way the Order had likely not foreseen. For, I knew well, that it was the connections to others that were the very fabric of the Force itself. Love, in all of its forms, was the essence of everything. And those old fools would have every Padawan fear it.

The Jedi Order had lost a lot of strength the day they started preaching that emotional detachment was the way of the Light.

“Stars, Mission, I’d like to believe that, I really would…” the voice trailed off brokenly. “I can’t- they deserve to know the truth, but-”

“You have to tell them, yeah… but I get you need some time. Look, Jen, if it helps then I reckon Canderous won’t take it too bad, y’know?”

“Canderous?” There was a snort. I’d heard enough, I realized, and it was time to interrupt before the conversation got any more personal. “True. He’ll be all sorts of proud that he’s knocked the infamous Revan to the floor a dozen times.”

Well, I’d better make a show of coming in before she senses me. Revan seemed to have a knack for doing that. I huffed, and strode the last few metres to my hut.

“Okay, ew, Jen, I don’t need details, y’know.”

The Twi’lek halted in mid-sentence as I entered, and they both turned their heads. The Twi’lek was easy enough to read – she was disappointed at the interruption, but held no animosity toward me. Revan, on the other hand, simply appeared blank and cold. Apart from her eyes. She glanced away, but not before I recognized the depth of despair there.

_The Order have really put her through the wringer, haven’t they? And left her alone to deal with the fallout. Well, at least she’s not running off in a black robe throwing lightning about. Yet._

No, I wouldn’t be staying on Kashyyyk. I could see that now.

“You’re back,” Mission said. “Did you find what you were after?”

“Humph,” I grumbled. “Not sure, really.” I stared at Revan until she finally raised her gaze back to mine. The first question I’d planned on asking was the identity of her companion, the Light one I’d felt join with the Force hours ago. The one who – for a split second – had made me think of my old friend Zhar.

But it wasn’t his lightsaber I’d found, in amongst the debris of that second confrontation.

“Mind explaining this?” I asked, lobbing the ‘saber to Revan. She caught it with her uninjured arm, before looking down to stare at it. I heard a faint whistle of breath as she recognized it.

“My ‘saber,” she whispered. Her head jerked back up, green eyes narrowing. “You went back to the scene. Bandon must have taken it, when he first captured me.”

_“Your ‘saber?” I threw back. “Look, pup, it’s been a decade or four, but I recognize that hilt. The crystal’s different, but I know who crafted that lightsaber, and it sure as Coruscant wasn’t you.”_

“She gave it to me,” Revan said, and her words turned cold and curt. A shiver rippled through her face before it turned blank. She closed her eyes, resting her head back against the wall. “As she lay dying. I’m sorry, Jolee, but Karon’s dead. Zhar—” her voice cracked, a bit. “Zhar, too.”

I turned away from her reflexively, from them both, as a hot and uncommon flare of anger burned deep within me. When I’d seen that lightsaber, I knew it meant Karon’s demise. And where one found Karon, they usually found Zhar. They would have been Masters, no doubt, with Padawans of their own, soaking up their light and wisdom. I’d never expected to see either of them again, true, but they had been good friends to me. Both of them had pleaded for me to stay after Nayama—

I growled, walking over to the small bench on the far side of the room. There was a pot of day old stew that could be heated up, and a covered bowl of wasaka-berries that needed a wash to clear them of the dirt from harvesting. _Karon and Zhar should have had decades upon decades of life left._ The Force slowed aging, and both of them were so darn good, such decent beings that truly showcased what the Order could be. Should be.

“How?” I demanded, staring blankly at the berries. I’d gathered them a few days ago, and they were beginning to smell a bit pungent. Maybe I should throw them out. “How did they die? And what did you have to do with it?”

“Hey, Jen didn’t—”

“Mission,” Revan murmured, hushing her friend. She took in a deep sigh, and her voice turned clinical again. Like a tap, her mood switching on and off. “Karon was killed on Manaan by Kylah Aramai, a former Jedi Knight who led a squad of Dark Jedi to capture Bastila Shan. When I came on the scene, Kylah was in the process of defeating her. If I’d been there-”

She cut herself off, but not before I heard the guilt in her words. It probably wasn’t justified, but heck – I’d just heard about the deaths of my two oldest friends. My brows slammed together, and I spun, glaring at the woman. “And Zhar?” I bit out.

Her voice turned to ice once more. “ Killed some hours ago by Yudan Rosh and Bandon Stone.” Her gaze met mine unflinchingly. “And my inaction.”

I could feel her despair on the Force. It was fathomless, and completely at odds with the glacial look on her face. I snorted, and was gratified when I saw her blink. “You’re telling me that you sat back while a couple of Dark Jedi ran my old friend through, and said Oh, don’t mind me, I’ll just watch the show?”

I could see her grit her teeth. “I didn’t- I couldn’t act, I just stood there like a stunned idiot and let them capture me and kill Zhar.”

“You didn’t act or you couldn’t act? Because there’s a world of difference between the two, young pup.”

She looked away, and didn’t answer. I took in a deep breath, feeling my anger slowly ebb as memories of my own past rose to haunt me. I had been sure of my path, I had been righteous, and still I had frozen in the face of the Dark Side.

Blame wouldn’t resurrect Zhar or Karon. And the suffocating self-hatred rolling off Revan in waves would only end up driving her back down the same corrupted path she once owned.

I turned back to the bench, intent on making a small cooking fire. The Twi’lek murmured something consolingly to Revan, who didn’t answer. I could stretch the leftover stew to the three of us, and it had to be better sustenance than whatever ration bars they had likely been filling their bellies with.

It didn’t take long to heat and then ladle the steaming meal into three vessels, before pulling up a couple of crates next to the table. I gestured the two of them over, and Mission came willingly enough, but Revan-

She was staring at me with an expression of vague disbelief. It was more honest than the blank look she’d been sporting earlier.

“You’re not going to press for more details?”

“Will it bring back the dead?” I retorted, folding my arms.

Her eyes narrowed. “Zhar had to face two top Dark Jedi alone because I was too- because I didn’t- I couldn’t- dammit, I should have been able to fight! He should still be alive!”

“Shoulds and what-ifs are a waste of time, young pup. If you stuffed something up, then learn from it and move on.”

“You- I-” Revan stopped, scowling. “Zhar was an old, true friend of yours, and when I say I’m part to blame for his death your only response is to do better next time? Are you for real, Jolee Bindo?”

“Oh, you want a lecture? Then how about this,” I snapped. “Self-flagellation is very Jedi, but it’s also very destructive. If you truly want to make a difference, then pick yourself up and make one.”

She didn’t answer, but continued frowning at me through angry eyes. I took the fire in her expression as a healthy sign.

“Um, guys, can we just eat?” Mission asked, her voice tentative.

We broke our staring competition to look at the girl. She was sitting by the table, glancing between the two of us nervously. Her face was slack with exhaustion, and now that I surveyed her properly I could see the faint tracing of electrical burns marking her headtails. When my gaze returned to Revan, I noticed that the former Sith Lord’s expression had softened.

“A spot of food followed by rest would be good for us all,” I commented, before taking a seat next to the Twi’lek. “We can move on after that.”

Revan hesitated for a moment, before her expression firmed and she joined us.

“Move on?” Mission echoed, frowning. “Where are we moving to?”

“You know what we’re looking for,” Revan said, her voice a low whisper.

I snorted. “There is nothing else on Kashyyyyk. The problems of a few Wookiees don’t amount to anything before the concerns of Force-users like you.”

“Hey!” Mission interjected. There was an annoyed spike in her tone. “We are helping the Wookiees. Look, whatever you think about normal Jedi, Jen ain’t one of them-”

“So where is it?” Revan’s voice cut directly through the girl’s, cold and hard and intent.

I turned, slowly, and met the fixed gaze of probably the most powerful Force-user in the galaxy. “It’s some days walk away, depending on how fast we travel. I will take you there, but on my terms.” This time.

There was a distant look, then, that clouded the green eyes facing me, and I felt the current of Force power as it flowed from her. She stared blankly into the distance, her face turned in the approximate direction of the Force relic.

…

“This is where we part ways, Jolee Bindo,” Revan said, her voice both clinical and emotionless. “Do not follow me any longer. I shall know if you do.”

This was a part of the Shadowlands I’d never been to. Surprising, really, because I knew this area well. And yet, I felt a crawling sensation toe-dance down my spine, repelling me away from this area, suggesting that I turn around or find another way forward.

“Oh ho, your manner is fearsome. Like the little ullers I shoo from the garden, hissing at what they don’t understand.”

The Force rallied around her, quick and swift and terrible. A dark miasma of power of which I had never felt the likes of, and never wanted to again.

“Leave, Jolee Bindo, if you value your life. I do not give many a second warning.”

The strength I felt was enough to make me step back, suddenly wary of my companion for the last few days. I could feel the darkness within her, the resoluteness to do what she must – and, for some reason, that meant doing it in secret.

And, now that I was conscious of it, I could feel the taint in the Shadowlands, driving me away from an area I had never thought to set foot into. An area I had always ignored, without realizing it.

I would come back, later - my own curiosity would compel me to. But for now... I could feel her conviction to act against me, if I stayed. It was absolute. Attempting to thwart her would probably end badly for me – and it wouldn’t do her shadowed soul any favours, either.

So I left, in silence.

...

I cleared my throat, coming back to the present. I had gone back, many a time. But she’d re-programmed that darn computer... whatever secrets she’d uncovered, she didn’t leave them easily accessible. Perhaps this time, I could discover what they were.

If she hasn’t just worked out the relic’s location herself, that is.

Revan was facing me again, her eyes dead and her face expressionless. Maybe her gaze had been coincidental. She wasn’t exactly acting the most lucid, after all.

I turned back to my bowl of stew as my thoughts lingered over that obstinate computer and Force relic. It was alien to Kashyyyky, I was sure of it. Nowhere on this planet were there indications of any civilization having existed that could create technology that advanced. And it was located in the oldest part of the wroshyr forest, where the tallest and largest trees grew. Was there any relevance to that? Four years ago, Revan had implied there was.

We ate quietly, crowded over the small table. Mission was obviously exhausted, and her eyelids began to droop before she’d finished her small portion. It wasn’t long before she curled up on the blankets in the corner. She’d sent Revan a plaintive, pleading glance the human obviously couldn’t deny, for a moment later she was sitting quietly at Mission’s side.

When the Twi’lek succumbed to slumber a short time later, Revan’s expression hardened and she looked back to me.

“You’ll take care of her,” she stated, one arm resting gently around the Twi’lek’s shoulder. “You’ll make sure she stays safe.”

Oh no, I’m not letting her go without a fight.

“We’ll go together, young pup,” I retorted. “You think running out on her is the right thing to do, after what she’s been through? Caught in the middle of a Force duel? How well do you think she’s going to take that, waking up to find you’ve skipped out on her?”

Her eyes darkened. “There’s still a Dark Jedi out there, old man,” she said. “I won’t let him track me down when I’m around others. I won’t let Mission get hurt again.”

“That should be her choice, not yours,” I replied. “Besides, don’t lie to yourself. That’s not the real reason you’re running.”

“It’s a reason,” she snapped back. “It’s definitely in the top three.”

I folded my arms and stared at Revan. Not surprisingly, she stared straight back. She always struck me as the resolute type; once she made up her mind, there was little budging her. “You know, you remind me of someone I used to know. Promising young man, great destiny. Breath like a bantha.”

Her eyebrow quirked, but other than that, her face remained emotionless. “Did you annoy this person endlessly, too?”

“Oh ho ho, very funny,” I said. She stood, disengaging herself from her young friend. I directed my strongest disapproving look at her. “Are you not even going to let an old man tell a tale? That’s a bit heartless, don’t you think?”

“I’ll take a raincheck,” she muttered. “If I see you again, I promise to listen for at least a whole minute.”

“I could stop you,” I said, throwing one last attempt out there. She was a damaged version of who she had once been, and I gambled on the slight chance that my bluff might hold some sway.

Revan turned a faint smile on me, and it was both sad and terrible. “No you couldn’t,” she whispered, and walked out the door.

xXx

Chapter End Notes

And with this chapter, I’ve broken the 500K word barrier. Yikes! It’s taken that long to get Jolee in the picture! I hope y’all liked him.

Let me know what you think, if you're still with me. Reviews or comments truly make my day. It's nice to know I'm not just using up all my spare time to throw words into the ether :-(
I ran.

I had a purpose in mind, and it wasn’t just flight – escape from Mission, escape from the cryptic old man who acted like he knew me, escape from the horrors of my mind –

But flight was part of it.

I couldn’t bear Mission’s acceptance. She was shocked, yes; uncertain and a little afraid of me – and that was it. Somehow, she still saw me as the woman she knew as Jen Sahara – who, in truth, was really a damaged Revan Freeflight lacking the recollection of her own experiences. The same flaws that caused me to fall in the first place must still there.

Whatever those had been. Overconfidence? Arrogance? A mild distaste for authority?

Dammit, merely days ago I would have sworn that Street Kid was one of the good guys. But Street Kid was. Revan was… until, you know, she wasn’t.

Mission had only ever heard tales of the Jedi and the Sith, wild stories on the holonets that didn’t touch the Lower City of Taris, not really. Not until the Endar Spire spat escape pods all over the ecumenopolis, and Taris was left dealing with the fallout of a fugitive Bastila Shan. Mission was too young, too removed, too nice, to grasp the magnitude of my crimes.

Mission’s acceptance, in a way, was worse than Carth’s inevitable hatred.

The Shadowlands whispered to me, as my feet danced over fallen leaves and dirt and forest debris. I whipped past giant wroshyrs, the sentinels of this wild world, and felt the hum of power embrace me as miles vanished in my dust.

Somewhere, on Kashyyyk, was Yudan Rosh. And somewhere here in the Shadowlands, was the Star Map. The former would come back to hunt me or haunt me, and I wouldn’t allow that encounter to occur around anyone I cared about. And as for the Map…

I had an inkling, a faint impression of something further afield that didn’t want to be found. But I wasn’t sure of my own senses – now, when I cast out psychically, all I was aware of was various predators stalking through the ancient forest. It was entirely possible that I was running to absolutely nowhere.

Jolee Bindo knew where the Map was. The smarter course of action would have been to accept his aid. That had been Zhar’s plan in the first place.

Zhar… I held some responsibility for his death, surely. If I hadn’t… if I’d understood everything before… if I’d just kept it sodding together-

“Sithspit,” I cursed bitterly, my useless words dying on the air as I ran. And don’t forget Karon. The Force sang to me, a lullaby of life and possibility, urging me ever onward. If I hadn’t bolted from Bastila in the first place-
There was a faint chirping on my wrist, and I ignored it.

Zhar and Karon, two solid links to my cursed past. And now all I had left were sodding Yudan Rosh and my old lover, Darth Malak.

My vision blurred. My limbs kept moving.

And Bastila. She had some questions to answer, too, didn’t she? She… she saved my life. But she knew, all along, and sat back while I formed connections with others who deserved to know who they were really dealing with. Mission might be able to get past it, and stars knew which way Canderous would flip – but Zaalbar, who valued honour above all else? Juhani, struggling so valiantly against any glimmer of the Dark Side since Tatooine? Carth?

I could feel a growl of discontent rumbling in my chest as I launched over a massive log. My senses quickened, warning me of a nearby pack of katarn, enabling me to diverge my path from any threat as I shot through the shadows.

I felt the communicator vibrate again.

Bastila had been party to this from the start. Our bond would have allowed no ignorance. She would have experienced my mind being scrubbed clean and programmed into someone else.

Did she agree?

Was she personally involved?

The very thought made me want to drop my shields and lash out at her, in wild fury and grief.

How can I allow myself to feel these bitter recriminations, after what I have wrought? And yet, all I had to do was recall my movements on the Endar Spire - when my desires were reduced to hiding in my bunk and devouring any archives that fat Cerean had foisted on me – and a rage as black and thick as pure hate began to burn.

The Order would have kept me a puppet, trapped in a false identity with no release. If it hadn’t been for that head injury, I would still be Jen Sahara right now.

Jen had been a simple woman, with simple wants. Escape into history, and hide from reality. I stopped, toes digging into the damp forest floor. The reality is… she’s dead, and it’s my fault.

So many dead.

The desolation and guilt lashed me like a whip, again and again. I didn’t think it would ever stop, given my past. From denial to rage to an ocean of shame and grief. If that’s not the path to the Dark Side, then I don’t know what is.

The comm buzzed again. I stared down at my wrist blankly. A message in text appeared on the screen.

::Blast it, Jen, answer the comm!:

Carth. My knees collapsed under me. My off-hand was bound tight to my chest, and my head bowed over it in despair. I couldn’t talk to Carth. Not yet. How does one broach such a revelation? Hey, flyboy, you know how we’re all relieved that at least Revan is dead? Well guess what…

Carth had made me feel normal, for a few days. Normal, and hopeful, and happy. Now I understood why those emotions had felt so foreign.

...

“You’re still awake,” he murmured, his voice a soft rumble under my ear. He’d fallen asleep with my head pillowed on his chest. I hadn’t been sure if he’d expected me to turn up again, but after last night I wasn’t staying away.

“Mhmm,” I acknowledged. “I don’t need much sleep. Not sure if it’s a Force thing...”

“That probably explains all your midnight jaunts on Taris,” Carth said, his voice a touch wry.

“That was reconnaissance,” I replied, feeling my lips curve in a small smile. “It’s important on an enemy planet, you know.”

“Reconnaissance? Is that a synonym for acquisition these days?”

I lifted my head to see his crooked grin, the teasing glint in his eyes. He hadn’t entirely approved of my methods, then, even while acknowledging our situation had been desperate. Still, it didn’t sound like he held it against me.

My smile widened as my fingers trailed over his chest. It was dark, in the pilot’s quarters, with the only light being the dim illumination of telemetry from the one console. “We made it off Taris, didn’t we?”

His expression turned intense, and his dark eyes held mine. “We’ve made it further than anyone could have expected.”

We had, but the cost had been high. Karon. Belaya. Bastila, kidnapped and taken stars-knew-where. Carth must have seen something in my face, for a hand lifted to cradle my face. Despite everything, I felt somewhat comforted.

“We’ll get her back, Jen,” Carth whispered. “I have faith in you. We’ll finish this mission, and get Bastila back.”

He leaned forward, and captured my lips in a tender kiss.

...

Somehow, I felt strangely calmer, sitting amongst the moist undergrowth of the largest and darkest forest in the galaxy.

Those three nights on the Ebon Hawk – and our friendship preceding it – were more real to me than a past love I couldn’t remember. The brief flashes of my history told me that it shouldn’t be that way; that Malak, once, had been a core foundation of my life. But I had little true recollection, and any emotional attachment I felt was primarily of guilt.

These memories of Carth, fleeting and transient, were a gift I didn’t deserve - but perhaps they gave me the strength to do what I had to, next.

I would find the Star Map, and if Yudan Rosh didn’t track me down first, then I would go after Bastila and Malak.

But Rulan Prolik’s warning sat heavy in my mind.

"The Republic presence on Kashyyyk has orders to capture you, Jen Sahara. If you wish to put an end to Darth Malak, you’d better find a way of avoiding them as you leave this planet."

The thought of handing myself over to the Republic was appealing, in a guilt-assuaging way. How could I have any faith that I wouldn’t revert to the monster I once was? I knew the depth and strength of my loyalty to the Republic. I still felt it – an unyielding, abiding conviction to do everything in my power to safeguard the freedom of billions of people. To uphold the founding principles of the Republic. To find the best strategy for the greatest peace – even as I understood it would never be perfect, that the fight would never, truly, be over against the greed and corruption that came with all sentient life. That sacrifices would have to be made, no matter how bitter or great.

But the end goal - peace, understanding, acceptance - was worth whatever we had to endure.

I felt all this, and I knew it was what Street Kid – Revan Freeflight – had felt before.

And yet, what had I turned into?

There was a strong part of me that argued my surrender – and likely execution for war crimes - would be the best thing I could now do for the Republic.

But – Bastila.

Once I had the final Star Map coordinates, we would all have an end point to converge upon. And I couldn’t help but feel that the Republic would be a lot more likely to sacrifice Bastila – if an obvious rescue plan didn’t jump out and dance a jerryjig at them – than I would be.

She had saved my life, when most Jedi would have counselled against it. Sure, mercy was a tenet of the Order, but she could have walked away. It would have been safer for the galaxy. In the end, I owed her – even if I wanted to shake her for it.

And – Malak.

“Tell me, you who call yourself Jen Sahara, are you ready to put an end to Darth Malak?”

Malak had an ever-increasing armada. Even with the final Star Map, would the Republic be able to defeat him? I didn’t know. But one thing I did know-

I was stronger than him, once. Maybe I still am. And he- he had followed me. Followed me into the darkness of which he now claimed ownership.

Malak, the love of my past, was my mess to clean up.

I was stripped, laid bare, emotionally naked, as if a hundred layers of self and feeling and thought had been shed like so much dross. And all that was left was a fragile psyche encasing a steel core that still – despite everything - glowed with the fire of conviction.

And as I pulled myself up into a crouch, I felt it burn brighter. My guilt and self-doubt and anguish were still there - but I could no longer let those sentiments hamstring me.

I wouldn’t let them stop me from my next goal.

Zhar had died because I’d been unable to accept my past, because my fractured mind had rebelled at the horrific truth, and disconnected me from the present.

It was hard to know how much blame for his death I should apportion to myself, but Jolee Bindo had one thing correct – it was destructive. Better that I move on, and not repeat my mistakes. Any of them.

I stood, and reached out with the Force afresh.

There. There. That same negative sensation ebbed further afield, a mild repelling that translated into a desire to be elsewhere, to avoid this particular area. Do all Star Maps resonate so on the Force, I wondered, or is this unique to the one on Kashyyyk?

I took a deep breath, re-focussed myself, and once more began to move.

It wasn’t far now, I realized, as I flew over the ground. Time passed quickly as a Force-induced celerity hastened my movements. And I could feel the aversion grow as I neared, an itchy discomfort compelling me to turn back, to change course.

It wasn’t difficult to ignore, but I suspected that was because I was aware of it. If I hadn’t been, it would have felt natural to avoid this area of the Shadowlands. And I noted, too, that little life existed in this area, other than insects and smallish rodents scurrying through the underbrush. It seemed this repelling sensation also had an effect on non-sentient life.

My pace slowed to a walk as I came ever closer. I rounded across a large thicket of spiny thorns and elongated flowers, and then a large clearing unfolded in front of me.

Oh, the wroshyrs still blacked out the sky well and truly, but this flat area was massive – and no tree, bush or any sort of plant life grew upon it. It was a circular field of dirt that had to be close to a hundred metres in diameter.

And in the very centre of it sat a large metallic device. It looked jarringly out of place.

Fine hairs rose on the back of my neck as a creeping sensation of déjà vu hit me. I had to have been here before, but there was no rising memory to aid me, no glimpse from my broken and cursed past to confirm that this was, indeed, my objective.

The device was a large rectangular shape, stretching a few metres high and wide, with venting and exposed piping along the sides. It could be anything from a power generator to some sort of horticultural equipment, but there was no obvious input panel I could see from this side. It looked like it was driven into the ground. In fact, as I walked closer, I became convinced that part of it was built beneath the surface. It made me wonder, again, at the round patch of dead earth that surrounded it, and if this was somehow related.

What is this? This can’t be the Star Map?

In front of the device sat an elliptical platform made from the same metallic alloy. I walked forward cautiously, my good hand clutching Karon’s ‘saber, the other still strapped tight against my chest. When I neared to within five metres, there was a loud thunk.

A whirring noise echoed from the device.

I stilled, and a hazy hologram flickered to life on the platform.

It was an alien figure I didn’t recognize. Humanoid in shape, with an aquatic look to his smooth skin and elongated forehead. Two eyes protruded on short stalks either side of his head. He was a similar height to me, but also lean and thin and with flipper-like digits at the end of his limbs. I’d stick credits on an amphibian ancestry. But what is he?
“(Life form detected,)” a crackly voice emitted from the hologram. His pale blue lips moved in sync with the recording. “(Determining parameters. Initiating neural recognition.)”

The hologram swivelled both eyeballs around to stare at me. I remained motionless, my grasp clenched tight on the Force.

“(Primary neural recognition complete,)” the hologram stated. “(Begin socialized interface. Neural scan indicates positive identification of subject Revan Freeflight. Subject meets accepted neural patterns.)”

A chill danced down my spine. My cursed name spoken so boldly, so confidently, still had the power to shock. But it was out of place, I realized – my name jarred heavily with the thick consonant tones of everything else he said. Understanding unfolded swiftly – the sodding thing wasn’t speaking Basic; in fact, I had no clue what language it was, but I could understand it fluently.

And he recognized me. His holographic eyes were pinned on me.

“(Awaiting instruction),” he slurred, words that were not only comprehensible, but also strongly familiar-

…

“(Observation;)” HK had intoned, in the same garbled vernacular. The sounds were guttural and harsh, and I didn’t recognize the language – but I understood him. “(This meatbag looks like the bastard offspring of a diseased Hutt. Which doesn’t say much for his mother.)”

…

I blinked, startled at the recollection. That had been in the arse-end of Rii’shn, just before the GenoHaradan ambush. HK had been looking for a way to communicate with me that the Nikto guarding that rundown cantina would not understand.

How interesting. I frowned. HK-47’s depth of languages had always impressed – he knew Sand People dialects, for frell’s sake – but hadn’t I questioned him about this particular one, on the way to Korriban? And hadn’t he retorted with something about errors in programming?

That’s not important right now! I dragged my attention back to the computerized figure, making a mental note to query HK about it in the future. The hologram was still staring at me attentively.

I took a cautious step forward. The thing’s gaze tracked my movements, but otherwise he remained motionless.

“Hello?” I ventured, in Basic.

“(Greetings, Revan Freeflight,)” the hologram replied.

I cocked my head. “You can understand Basic,” I murmured, wondering just how old this relic was.

“(Dictionary of language ‘Galactic Basic’ was uploaded four years ago by yourself, Revan Freeflight,)”

I drew in a shallow breath, feeling suddenly clammy. Only now, did it really hit me that I was retracing my own steps – the same steps that had led to such disastrous ruin before. I felt an immediate rush of longing for Bastila’s counsel. But I can’t reach out to her… I heard Malak, before. Mal. I closed my eyes in painful recollection. I’d be better off putting a blaster to my head than allowing him a foothold into my mind.

I had to do this by myself, and do it better than last time. Which was a monumental ask considering I couldn’t remember a damn thing.

“Why did I do that?” I asked, snapping my eyes open. “(I can speak your language. Why bother with Basic?)”

“(You desired to link this unit to galactic informational networks beyond this planet, Revan Freeflight. The controlling computer required translational capabilities of a current sentient communication method to parse available data, should it ever become connected.)”

Okay. I wanted to link some old computer to the holonets. That was even more confusing. “And did it ever get connected?”

The thing blinked at me. It responded intelligently to my queries, and must be based on either an advanced AI or some sort of holocron. Considering its lack of individuality, I thought the former was more likely.

“(No. You attempted to repair the transmission relays four years ago, but were unable to source the correct technology for replacement parts. As per your directive, this unit has remained in stasis until your return. Or, as programmed, until another builder communication.)”

I walked around the hologram, frowning in thought. The figure lapsed into silence, awaiting my questions, shifting to face me as I circled it. ”What sort of builder communication? Does ‘builder’ refer to those who installed this device?”

"(Error. Information regarding the builders of this unit has been corrupted.)"

"Corrupted?" I muttered. "Fantastic. So you don't know who built, well, you?"

"(The builders installed this unit, Revan Freeflight.)"

The builders… I realized, then, that it was a name rather than a profession. The Builders... And a quiet, seldom-heard voice whispered in the back of my head. The Rakata were known as the Builders, due to the massive structures and sculptures their slaves built in forced homage on various colonies. The Rakatan empire was vast... they colonized much of the galaxy tens of millennia ago. It has been speculated they were an incredibly strong Force-sensitive species as well, but there is no concrete evidence to support this.

Jen… her memories were still with me, faint but there. And while this era was much further back than her specialty, she still knew something of them.

“The Rakata,” I murmured slowly. “This computer was part of their civilization?”

“(Error. Malfunction in core programming. Last communication with primary Builder node 29,642 years before current Republic standard.)”

I blinked. That was a long time ago, but it fit with Jen’s knowledge. The Rakatan Empire was well established some 35,000 years ago, reaching its zenith 7,000 years later, before collapsing a few millennia after that. The little Jen knew of their empire was that is was built on slavery and subjugation, and spanned more of the known galaxy than the Republic did now.

And then, for some unknown reason, they died out. Rapidly, over the course of a few mere centuries. The largest player in the galaxy – by far – decimated for some unknown reason that history had not recorded.

I glanced back to the hologram. The hologram of a Rakata, I surmised. “What is the purpose of this installation?” I asked.

“(This utility was built to monitor planet-wide agricultural reformation,)” the hologram stated.

“(This colony was selected as a breeding ground for servants of the Infinite Empire.)”

The breath hissed from my lungs, and a cold sensation pricked at the base of my neck. Slaves. They bred the Wookiees as slaves. Suddenly, I felt nauseous. This technology – the same tech as the Star Maps, surely – came from a civilization built on slavery. On terraforming entire planets to breed sentients. And there was a strong power around this supercomputer, repelling everyone away – and only those trained in the Force had some chance of overcoming it.

The Rakata were theorized to be a Force-sensitive species, and they enslaved much of the galaxy - through methods certainly not of the Light Side. This was the technology I’d chased after, four years ago, before turning into a monster.

_What an idiot. What a reckless, arrogant idiot- why would I mess around with tech from a source such as this?_ I must have, already, been far down the dark path-

No, no, I remembered the krayt dragon’s cave. I remembered running through the shyrack tunnels, with Mal- with Malak. Those recollections were from Street Kid, _not_ Evil Bitch. I must have had reason, I must have thought I could use this tech for something worth the risk-

Or maybe I simply thought I could master it.

_Overconfidence. You were always too damnably overconfident._ The voice, an older man’s, sneered inside my head. I’d heard it before, but I couldn’t pick from where-

_Everyone is fallible. Even you. Especially you._

I breathed in, deep to the bottom of my lungs, the bottom of my soul, and willed the disapproving voice away.

“(The native species of this planet were chosen as suitable servants for the Infinite Empire,)” the hologram answered. Its tone was damnably neutral.

“(Last communication with primary Builder node 29,642 years before current Republic standard. This unit malfunctioned 26,334 years before current Republic standard, causing hyper-acceleration of the natural fauna.)”

_Hyper-acceleration? “The wroshyrs… kath crap, this computer is the reason they’re so huge?”_ I blinked, my gaze once more landing on the supercomputer. _It must_ extend deep into the ground, but to control terraforming on that scale- “Is it still functional?”

“(Terraforming capabilities have ceased production 8,233 years before current Republic standard.)”

Somehow, I didn’t think the Wookiees would believe this particular piece of their history. Okay, I’m getting off-topic now. Focus, Jen- I closed my eyes for a brief second. Revan. Focus. Revan. The name echoed inside my head.

It should have felt wrong, but it didn’t. It felt right.

“Do you have access to a Star Map?” I asked quietly.

“(The Star Map is yours, Revan Freeflight,)” the hologram replied. Behind it, next to the supercomputer, a small portal in the ground opened. There was a whirring noise, and four large metallic prongs protruded through the opening, slowly raising until the tips were about a metre high.

I’d seen this mechanism before. My hand moved of its own accord, and I released a small wave of Force power on nothing more than pure instinct. It swirled around the device, which emitted an audible click.

Then, slowly, the prongs unfolded to reveal a small sphere spinning in the middle.

A luminescent light spun around the sphere, before it expanded into a large, cerulean holo-map.

I stared at it, transfixed, my thoughts stilling. It was a map of the galaxy, the definition so intense that I knew I could zoom in many times to particular quadrants and still have intricate detail available.

And I knew it, I knew it well - even if the memory was lost to me.

I stepped closer and my fingers were immediately drawn to the black spots of the map, the missing segments I was innately aware of before my eyes landed on them. This data combined with the other maps will unlock our destination. Our endpoint.

In a sudden rush, I fumbled against the wrist communicator on my good arm.

“Can you download this map to my comm?” I asked the hologram.

“(Communication parameters initiating,)” the hologram said. There was a bleep from my wrist, an access prompt I accepted. “(Download commencing,)”

I wondered, then, about this AI program, about the supercomputer and its control over the Star Map. Juhani had never mentioned anything like this from her trip to Hrakert Station. Canderous and Mission surely would have talked about a hologram who spoke a forgotten language they could not have understood-

“(Download of Star Map is now complete, Revan Freeflight,)”

I frowned, still staring at the alien hologram. “Do all the Star Maps have a controlling supercomputer?”

“(Negative. The primary purpose of this installation is to monitor agricultural reformation,)” the hologram repeated. “(The controlling computer determines access to the terraforming functions of this unit. You re-programmed the controlling computer four years ago to restrict access to this unit and the adjoining Star Map, Revan Freeflight.)"

“... did?” That probably made sense. I probably didn’t want anyone tracing my steps. “Has anyone accessed this since then?”

“(152 attempts by human Jolee Bindo, all denied,)” came the implacable response.

A surprised laugh ripped from my lungs. Jolee. You must have been bored. Well, he’d been living here a long time. Stars, does that mean I’ve met him before?

Not necessarily- but I wondered. Jolee’s manner to me had been pretty damn familiar, but that could also just be his personality.

My attention re-focused on the image of the Rakata.

“What about before I came? Did anyone else come across this device?”

“(Error. Malfunction. List of prior access attempts corrupted. Repelling energy field still online.)”

I felt a shiver run through me as I considered that. So it was confirmed, then, that this averting field of Force originated here – that the supercomputer had some ability to manipulate the Force.

Which meant that the Rakata definitely did.

“Exactly what sort of Force capabilities does this computer have?” I demanded.

“(Definition of force: physical strength or power exhibited. The primary purpose of this installation is to monitor agricultural reformation,”) the hologram echoed. Again.

I frowned. “What about the Rakata? How did they use the Force?”

“(Error. Malfunction in core programming. The Rakata controlled the Infinite Empire, and forced lesser beings to augment their civilization.)”

I sighed. This is getting nowhere. It sounded like the hologram didn’t understand my query, didn’t know what I meant by the Force. Perhaps it was a translation issue.

My attention was drawn back to the supercomputer, the large terraforming relic of a civilization the galaxy was better off without. “The Star Maps… were they all located on planets with agricultural reformation units such as this one?”

“(The Star Maps are navigational maps pointing to the Star Forge, Revan Freeflight. They are unrelated to the purpose of this unit. The only connection this unit has to the Star Map is the identical date of installation by the Builders, and your re-programming of the controlling computer four years ago to restrict access.)”

I barely processed most of what he said. The Star Forge… For as those words hit my ears, I was beset with both familiarity and a crawling trepidation that hissed deathly shadows into the cracks of my mind.

“What is the Star Forge?” I whispered.

“(The Star Forge is a weapons factory of the Infinite Empire,)” the hologram said calmly.

“(Error. Corruption in internal data. The Star Forge is a weapons factory of the Infinite Empire.)”

“You already said that,” I muttered, scrubbing a hand across my face in frustration. “What can you tell me about it? How is it powered? How big is it? What sort of defences does it have? Do you have any sort of schematic?”

“(Parameters too broad. Error. Incomplete Request. Error. Initiating holo-graphic,)” the thing intoned, and there was a rush of light as the navigational map was replaced by the image of a large space station.

I stumbled back in shock. Sithspit! I hadn’t expected a positive answer to the last. My breath stuck in my throat as I was riveted to the glowing picture in front of me.

“Download it,” I hissed, my eyes roving over the space station. It had a spherical centre, with three elongated fins that extended around it on a vertical plane. The graphic gave me no idea how big it was but-

It’s big, a voice whispered. It’s powerful. It might just be enough.

Enough? I was breathing, suddenly, hard and fast, as sweat popped on my forehead. Enough for what? Another damned empire like the Rakatan?

There was no answer.

My heartbeat thundered in my ears, as the Star Forge holo-graphic shimmered in front of me. I can’t truly go there and expect to end up different from last time, can I?

“(Download of Star Forge schematic is now complete, Revan Freeflight,)” the hologram stated.

I ripped my gaze away, and back to the Rakata. “The weapons… it must be the ships, the Sith Armada. How does the Star Forge create these weapons?”

“(Error. Information regarding the output of the Star Forge has been corrupted.)”

I closed my eyes. “How does the Star Forge operate? Where does it get its energy from?”

“(Error. Information regarding the input of the Star Forge has been corrupted.)”

“You’re not being very helpful, you know,” I snapped.

“(The primary purpose of this installation is to monitor agricultural reform-)”

“Okay, okay!” I interrupted. “But you said the terraforming capabilities had ceased. So what can you do?”

“(The secondary purpose of this installation is to guide any who match the accepted neural patterns of the Builders,)” the hologram stated. I began walking around him again, my brows knitting in thought. It had said something about accepting my neural patterns at the outset of our conversation.

“Guide to what? Or where?”

“(Error. Information regarding the Infinite Empire has been corrupted.)”

He said the Infinite Empire… maybe, once upon a time, this terraforming supercomputer allowed any space-faring Rakata to communicate with the heart of their civilization. It was pure speculation, and the device utterly fascinated me. That such ancient technology was capable of terraforming a planet so long ago, and also housed information regarding an extinct, powerful civilization – well. My curiosity was piqued. Much like it once had been before. No wonder I’d thought about hooking it up to the holonets.

_Dangerous, though, considering its origins. And even worse, going after a weapons factory built by the same species…_

I sighed, running my good hand through my hair. It was hard to know what to do with the supercomputer – but, for now, I could just leave its access restricted.

For I had more pressing matters to attend to - and, I was tiring. Even with the strength of the Force, I could feel a dull ache in my bound shoulder, echoed by a phantom pain where two little fingers used to be.

A small price to pay. Insignificant, really, compared to everything else.

_I’ve got what I need. I should move from here._ I stared down at the wrist-comm. It was time to transmit the Map – and the illuminating schematic of the Star Forge – back to the _Hawk._

But I wasn’t ready. I hadn’t been ready to face _Mission_ – let alone anyone else. Facing the crew felt harder than going after Malak and Bastila.

_If I could, I’d go on my own. Can I go on my own?_ I didn’t have the other Maps in my possession. And it smacked of cowardice, really. _But it’s my fight – not theirs._

But wasn’t that a big stinking pile of kath crap? This was everyone’s mission, it had been since Taris. I sighed, realizing something else – I was assuming Bastila and Malak were on this powerful weapons factory. In reality, they might be somewhere else.

_No… the Star Forge must be the heart of the Sith Empire – and until I’m dead, Malak won’t be far away from it. Bastila will be with him._

I gritted my teeth. And began the transmission.

“Okay, keep the same access restriction, and power down for now,” I ordered the hologram.

Bulbous eyeballs blinked at me. “(Parameters reset,)” the shimmering figure intoned. “(Stasis initiated,)”

There was a faint electronic hum, and both the Rakata and the holo-graphic of the Star Forge winked out of existence. I sighed, took a few steps closer to the massive supercomputer, and slid down next to it. The metallic wall around it was mildly warm, and I rested my head back against it as my thoughts whirred.

The _Ebon Hawk_ would be receiving the data now – with the other Maps, it would be able to calculate a set of hyperspace coordinates to find this Star Forge. I couldn’t do that on my own, not unless my damn mind decided to suddenly spew out the galactic data I needed.

I had to stay with the crew – we had to finish things together. And that meant- I had to tell them the truth. They all deserved that.

And yet… I couldn’t even face it myself. It was one thing to suspect you’d gone bad, to experience the desire for power and subjugation at the expense of others. To feel the dark rush of immortality that surrounded an unfeeling core. But to learn you’d plumbed the very depths of destruction and darkness…

I’d turned on what I cared for the most. Conquered planets and shipyards, annexed trade-routes and sectors, bombed-

Telos.

I cannot bear this anymore.

Telos. Oh no. Oh no…

Telos had been bombed into devastation, one of the first battles when Revan- when me and Malak began our offensive. I couldn’t breathe, I couldn’t remember, I couldn’t feel a damn thing but this over-whelming self-hatred – I’d known Carth would detest me before I’d even thought about Telos, about his dead, dead wife, about Dustil who’d spent four damn years in a soul destroying Sith Academy because of frelling Telos-

I will not listen to his poison. He will not twist my beliefs!

But I didn’t remember why. It made no sense. Why destroy a logistical gem like Telos when capturing its resources would be far more beneficial? It was Outer Rim, in the thick of the now-Sith Empire, and bridging over two major hyper-routes. What could be gained from such destruction, such slaughter? Was it just to terrify the galaxy into submission?

My cheeks were wet. And there was a buzzing on that cursed communicator that I just couldn’t bear to answer.

How would I ever be able to face him?

I must- Revan?

Bastila? With a sharp jolt of surprise, I realized my shields had completely dropped. I should have been alarmed at her proximity and the danger it presented - but I was too empty to feel anything further.

Revan, she whispered, her mental voice broken and hollow. Our mind-link was tangible to me now, filled to the brim with our collective despair, and an undercurrent of rage that wasn’t mine.
Bandon has you, but I can sense you. How?

I didn’t know how to respond, but she must have sensed something.

He thinks Bandon has you. There was a small spark of confusion, of hope. I thought Bandon had you.

Bandon’s dead, I replied dully. I shoved a lightsaber through his chest. I could see it in my minds-eye again; Bandon's spread-eagled body pinned to a wroshyr by Yudan's 'saber, as large chunks of bark sloughed away from the massive tree.

Is it true? she gasped. Is he dead? Show me again!

Her words crowed through my mind, insistent and righteous. I could understand her emotion, after what she must be enduring, but somehow it felt slightly off.

He boarded the Endar Spire. It was he who slaughtered my compatriots, Seris and Jorayl and Master Galdea and all of the soldiers onboard, she seethed. There is only one other whose death I desire. The one who betrayed us. The schutta who pretended to be my friend.

Kylah. Not Malak. Not the one who had been torturing her for days on end.

There was something worrying in that, but I hadn’t the mental aptitude to think on it.

If it were not for Bandon and Kylah, then the Endar Spire would never have fallen. Our mission would never have collapsed.

And I would still be Jen Sahara, I said sadly.

There was silence between us, an awkward chasm of bottomless grief. She didn’t answer – maybe she couldn’t.

Why save me, simply to kill me another way? For I wasn’t- I wasn’t meant to wake up, was I?

I had the sense of her sighing; a deep, broken gust of air. In all honestly, I am not sure. You were still present in your dreams. But I- Jen- Revan- her words began tumbling over one another, like dustballs bounding down a hillside. Please, it wasn’t what we planned at first- we didn’t know about the Maps- it wasn’t my decision or doing- I- she halted, trailing off into silence. You must protect yourself from me, Revan. For I am a danger to you, now.

Where are you, Bastila? Are you on the Star Forge?

You know of the Forge… you have the final Map, she breathed. I felt the hope burn from her then, the burgeoning belief that I could save her.

It left a sour taste in my mouth. I was no hero. Not anymore.

To answer your question, yes, I am on the Forge. This is a… dark place, Revan. Do you recall it?

No.

That is for the best. It frightens me. I could sense her drawing in a shuddering breath. Revan, part of the Sith fleet are in orbit around Kashyyyk. As soon as Malak realizes you’ve escaped – and he will pull it from my mind – he will order bombardment. You must leave Kashyyyk. You and the crew. At once.

Orbital bombardment. Again, but this time of Zaalbar’s homeworld.

My next steps were clear. And there was no hiding from it any longer.

One moment, I fired back. There was a prickling along all my nerve endings, and I stared down at the innocent communicator latched on my wrist.

I pressed a button, and fired out a comm-wide message. Small lights on the display lit up as both the Ebon Hawk and another communicator – Canderous, probably – answered the call.

“The Sith are rallying to commence orbital bombardment on Kashyyyk,” I said in a rush. “I’ve sent the Map coordinates through. Whatever you’re doing, finish up and get back to the ‘Hawk.” I took a deep breath. “I’ll collect Mission and meet everyone there. We must leave Kashyyyk as soon as we can.”
I switched the comm off, stood, and began to move. Away from the clearing, away from the Star Map, and away from the terraforming supercomputer that had changed the face of Kashyyyk forever.

_Bastila_, I reached out again as I left the Rakatan legacy well behind. _How long do you have, before Malak finds out about me?_

How would I know? Her voice was shaky, but there was a tartness to it I recognized. Fear did not wholly command her, not yet. _He cannot touch my mind, and therefore our bond, unless he is physically here. Jen- Revan- I do not know if you heard him earlier, I do not want to know, I do not want to betray anything-

It’s okay. _Have faith._ I felt the side of my mouth twitch at the black irony of my words. _Have faith in the Force._

_Oh, Revan,_ she whispered shakily. _There is so much I wish to know. Vrook, the crew… Revan, some of what Malak has been saying does not sit well with me. And this place… it calls to me. I feared the taint of the Dark Side on Korriban, but that was nothing on what I feel here. The power…_

_Power corrupts. If you ever doubt, just think on how far I fell._

_Do you think I do not know that?_ Her words lashed back through the bond. _I do not desire any of this, except that it means freedom from the pain of being a prisoner. All I wish is to be away from here!_

I had a sudden image, then, of a small room with walls made from some metallic compound I couldn't identify. It had the same look as the terraforming supercomputer and its elliptical platform. The same material, the same technology.

The Star Forge.

I was seeing through Bastila again. The Force around her had a dark twist to it, but it fumbled in her unwieldy grasp – her _drugged_ grasp, I remembered. Her hands were bound together by electronic shackles.

I focussed on them.

_Well, _I answered her at last. _Maybe we should try getting you away from there, then._

_xXx_
::I gotta go and see to Jen. I'll be in touch, okay?: Mission’s words rushed over the comm. The relief I’d felt at her voice blaring over Revan’s communicator had dispersed with her report. Revan, injured and currently out to it. Mission, kidnapped by Mando’ade before being fried by Dark Jedi. The fact they now had some additional ally with a lightsaber didn’t lessen my unease.

“Stay put, ad’ika,” I shot back. “I’ll be getting your position shortly.”

I switched the link off and looked up, meeting the alien gaze of the Cathar. She’d been listening in, slanted ears cocked in attention.

I grunted in acknowledgment. “They’re with one of your robes.” I raised a hand to adjust the dial of my visor. The damn thing had been twitchy since I’d entered the Shadowlands. “I’ll go after them as soon as I have their coordinates.”

Juhani’s eyes were wide and solemn. The fine fur on her neck fluffed out in the humid air of the Shadowlands. “I can get there faster, Canderous.”

I felt my brows slam down. “You should have told her. I should have told her. You let her run off alone with one of your hu’tuun masters, gambling he wouldn’t kriff with her mind-”

“I trust Master Zhar, Canderous. And he vowed he was on her side-”

My derisive snort cut over her weak-minded excuses. “Words are useless, Cathar. This has gone on long enough. I ain’t being party to this Jedi mind-screw any longer.”

Juhani continued to eye-ball me as her lips thinned. I’d say one thing for the Cathar, there was no staring her down. She’d grown steel in her spine since the Tatooine dunes belched her out. “I worry for her mind, Canderous,” she said quietly.

She’d said that before. I wasn’t buying it, not any longer.

“Better the risk than have her floundering around the way she has been.” I crossed my arms. “I’m a simple man, Cathar, but I don’t let indecision handicap me.”

Juhani frowned. It was a dig, and she knew it. We’d reunited a few hours ago, and she’d made the wrong call.

…

“Canderous!” a familiar voice called, cutting through the mass of roaring Wookiee surrounding the Czerka-built elevator.

In another scenario, my blood would be pumping with the anticipation of testing my skills against the famed big game of Kashyykk. But right now, all I wanted to know was Mission’s location. And why she wasn’t answering her comm.

Just like kriffing Revan.

I’d gone down with the second lot. As soon as the damn lift doors opened to show only an empty shaft with a lingering acrid smell, I’d cursed and ordered HK to follow me. About twenty or so Wookiees squeezed in with us, filling the enclosed space with a suffocating stench of musk and wet fur. Some were injured, and undercutting their pungent body odour was the tinny smell of blood.

But the ones left topside were decidedly worse off. It was descending into a bloodbath, up there. Czerka had rallied, and rallied hard once they realized their precious slave cargo was running out on them.

I didn’t know if there’d be many Wookiees left to fill the elevator a third time.

At the base of the forest, we’d stepped into another scene of carnage, but this one had the Wookiees as the overwhelming victors. Bodies of ill-prepared hunters were strewn amongst upturned storage canisters and survival supplies. Rifles had been ripped from warm corpses by furry paws, and the Wookiees were now shooting at any noise or shadow they detected in the surrounding underbrush.

They were savage with their anger, and some of the bastards looked ready to challenge me before HK reminded them in Shyriiwook exactly who had yanked them out of that slave ship. I could take on a Wookiee, armed as I was – but not thirty-odd. I was getting pissed they kept forgetting I was on their damn side.

It was mostly the first lot, struck by battle-lust and feral rage. The ones who’d breached the Shadowlands, who’d hacked their way through the surprised hunters that had been swilling ale in the fortified Czerka camp at the base of the lift.

The same Wookiees who’d come down with Mission, even though there was no damn sign of her.

I hadn’t been entirely surprised to spot Zaalbar. And, since he’d joined the party, the tall one next to him was probably his sire, the chieftain. As far as leaders went, he wasn’t a pretty one, due to the snarled munk in his thick fur that made me wonder if he’d taken to mud-bathing. But there was no mistaking his status. The other Wookiees were crowded around him, heads bowed in deference as they listened to him holler in a deep, crusty voice.

But the Cathar-

No. No, I hadn’t expected her.

“You’re here with Carpet?” I demanded in way of greeting, as she came to a stop in front of me. HK was in the midst of the hairy figures, howled enquiries firing from his vocabulator towards a bowed Wookiee with grey fur. He was gathering intel from the ones who were here first – but he wasn’t the least interested in Mission’s whereabouts. “You seen Mission?”
The Cathar blinked, and her look of surprise was enough answer for me. “Mission? No, Canderous, why would-”

“She came down here with the first lot,” I growled. “What about Jen?”

Juhani closed her eyes, sighing. “This place is wild and untamed. It stirs the blood. Everything feels more alive – the people, the animals, the trees-”

“Answer the kriffing question, Cathar!”

A nearby Wookiee glared at my raised voice. The savage one I took as Zaalbar’s sire grasped a thick pole as tall as himself and gestured in my direction, and the bowed grey one placed a calming paw on his forearm. I heard Zaalbar howl in protest, saw him wave a hairy limb. He was standing to the side, behind the rest, a subordinate position in a pack dynamic.

Wookiees were not so far removed from their ancestry as other species. And I’d hunted enough pack animals to make a solid assumption that his exile had not been magically forgotten by his peers.

“I have not seen her, Canderous.”

Something about Juhani’s inflection gave me pause. I dragged my gaze back to her. “What?” I snapped. “What aren’t you telling me?”

“I have sensed…” she sighed. “In truth, I do not know what I have sensed. Great power, deeper in the heart of the Shadowlands. Dark. Some of it, at least.”

I didn’t hold with the Jedi and their dark and light sides - but we both knew who the great power was. “Was she in trouble? Is she in trouble?”

“I do not know, Canderous-”

“You should have gone after her,” I growled. “Why are you here, and not after her?”

Her face twisted in indecision. “Zaalbar,” she explained in a soft voice. “Some of the Wookies attacked him at first. He is an exile from his own people, Canderous. And then- even after his father spoke for him- I wasn’t even sure what I had sensed. The disturbance in the Force had stopped, and I was too far away to pinpoint it, let alone assist.”

But the torn look on her alien face gave away her true feelings. She wasn’t sure she’d made the right call.

...

She was still frowning, either from uncertainty of her own damn choices, or annoyance at my reminder. “I will go after her, Canderous,” she said softly. “With the Force as my ally, I can travel swiftly through the Shadowlands. I should be able to sense Jen when I get close enough, and Zaalbar is… somewhat accepted by his people, now.”

It had taken us some time to secure the area. Zaalbar had run out in front, snarling rabidly as he chased down armed hunters fleeing the scene, taking risks against blaster fire to ensure none of them escaped alive. Zaalbar’s warrior spirit may have done something to assuage his low position, but I doubted he’d ever have the proper status of a chieftain’s son again.

During the previous hour, small groups of Czerka-paid hunters had returned to the area, either drawn by sounds of battle or heading back topside. And then I’d noticed Mission’s comm-link signal had blacked out-

Well. She’s safe now, more or less. She’s with Revan. Lack of comms had been both stupid and dangerous on this planet. I stared pointedly at the Cathar’s bare wrists. When we left Kashyyyk, I was going to implement a rule that no one stepped out of the damn ‘Hawk without a comm slapped on their wrist. And, whenever someone failed to answer a bloody call, they would owe me a kriffling bottle of Corellian whiskey.

That should sort out both Revan and the Cathar.

But, more importantly, I’d have that overdue talk with Revan – before we left Kashyyyk, if possible. I’d sworn to make her face the truth at the conclusion of Korriban, and I’d let Juhani talk me out of it.

I didn’t waste time on regrets, but this was one mistake I was gonna fix.

“Well’ll both go after her,” I ground out at last. A flash of displeasure crossed Juhani’s face, and I could see she didn’t agree. I scowled. She was right in that she was faster, but the others weren’t in any immediate danger now, and I wanted to see Mission personally back to the ‘Hawk. That was one detail I’d rather Carpet not hear. Reserved though the Wookiee was, Mission’s safety had a tendency to rile him up like a rabid kath hound. “Look, kittycat, I should have their position any second now-”

The comm chirped. Juhani’s gaze flickered away to the distant figure of Zaalbar.

“Let me speak to Zaalbar,” she murmured. I grunted in dismissal, waved her off, and answered the call.

::*Ordo, do you copy?::

“Onasi,” I acknowledged. “They finally let you go, huh?”

::*Yeah, I- yeah.:: The Republic soldier sounded annoyed. Scratch that, he sounded pissed. To be fair, I’d feel the same in his boots. I would’ve liked his backup earlier, if he hadn’t been so busy cosying up to his superiors. ::*Dustil’s filled me in. I’m not-:: he stopped with an irritated growl.

::*Well, I’ll leave the debrief for later. Look, have you heard from Jen? She’s not answering.::

“She’s wounded and knocked out, Onasi,” I said shortly. “Your stuttering spawn should have relayed all of Mission’s report.”

I heard him sigh. ::*Look, Ordo, we’ve not always seen eye-to-eye, and blast if I can understand why you lot value battle over life the way you do::

“Is there a point to this?” I cut in. “For you might be lounging around in the cockpit sipping caffa, but I’m actually busy down here.”

::I follow orders, Ordo,: he said, his voice turning cold. ::*Even if I disagree. Even if I’m left out of the loop.::

I didn’t dispute the need for discipline, for the chain of command. You had to trust your men, particularly during war. But blindly following orders without weighing them against your own honour – that was dangerous. Weak. I wondered where Onasi’s breaking point would be. He was implacable in his loyalty to his laandur Republic, but he didn’t strike me as the sort who would sell his soul or tear down his own moral code to keep that loyalty.
I didn’t agree with him at the best of times, but I held a grudging respect for both his character and honour.

“What’s been going on up there?” I asked slowly. “Sithkid said you were pulled away again. What are the Republic doing on Kashyyyk?”

There’d been a couple of freighters, coming in to dock either side of the ‘Hawk, both chock full of uniformed Republic soldiers who’d made a beeline for our ship the moment they landed.

::Our mission’s critical to the war, Ordo, it’s not that surprising.:: he muttered. ::Except... they’re very interested in the crew. The Republic have appropriated this mission, and they want us all to report in before we leave Kashyyyk. Then, the Ebon Hawk will be docking with the Meridus. It’s waiting in Kashyyyk airspace.::

“Report? You think I’ll be reporting to one of your office managers?” I shot back, amused. “All of us, huh? Think you can get Mission to drop a salute?”

Actually, the Meridus sounded familiar. I frowned. And the Republic taking over would ruffle a few feathers. This had been a Jedi mission from the outset, but maybe Bastila’s precious Order had lost authority when she’d been captured.

::Yeah, I - look, I get their interest, this may be our only chance to stop Malak, so in a way I’m surprised this didn’t happen earlier. But-:: he broke off, sighing. ::There’s something going on I’m not understanding, Ordo. And, I found out some of your history.:: He paused, before adding pointedly, ::General.::

I barked a laugh. “I could’ve told you earlier, Republic, but I didn’t want to intimidate you,” I mocked.

::Hardly,:: he fired back. ::Look, Ordo, you were a bigger player during the Wars than I realized, and your clan more active than I knew. We’ll be staying with the Meridus for some time, I suspect. I don’t know when we’ll be released or what we’ll do from there.::

The Meridus... I recalled it, now. The Meridus was an Interdictor-class heavy cruiser. A notable ship in the Republic armada, with its own supporting fleet. Even if Onasi were to disobey orders and refuse to dock – and he had no reason to do that – the gravity well projectors of the Meridus would be able to block us from entering hyperspace.

And it was orbiting Kashyyyk, in wait for us.

Onasi- he was trying to warn me, I realized with surprise. I wasn’t wanted by the Republic as far as I knew – Malachor had well and truly ended Mando’ade might with the death of near all clan leaders and the scattering of the remnants – but I’d always held influence with the Ordo clan, and that had grown during the Wars.

I was high enough in the ranks to warrant some interest from the Republic - for if Ordo were to call a leader-seek, I’d be a contender.

Ordo had come out of the Wars burned and battered, but not as decimated as some of the others. We’d been one of the strongest clans, and one day it was entirely possible I could end up leading it.

Onasi- he was being circumspect, but there was an audible tone of concern in his words. He thought there was some danger to me. He was giving me a chance, a chance to avoid the Republic soldiers waiting in the starport. Despite our disdain for each other, our differing values, our opposing sides in the Wars.
Maybe, the grudging respect was on both sides.

But- I realized with a jolt- he had it wrong.

_Revan. They’re after Revan. Haar’chak, they know._

There was a damn Interdictor ship in orbit around Kashyyyk. The Republic wasn’t after a Mando’ade general who’d spent the last few years pissing about with mercenary work. Even if I did go back and lead Ordo – which was a presumption in itself - the Mando’ade wouldn’t be a major player, in galactic terms, for years. Our strength had been gutted.

_But- their old hero turned conqueror, now a product of a kriffing Jedi experiment-_ Oh, yes, she was enough to scare them right down to their bollocks.

“I hear you, Onasi,” I finally said. “Keep trying Jen. Haar’chak, I need to talk to her.”

::You need to talk to her?::: he muttered in disbelief.

“Keep trying,” I growled. “Send me her position. I’ll go after her.”

I switched off the comm, and looked up. The Wookiees were still howling at each other, and Zaalbar caught my eye, trotting over in my direction.

“Carpet,” I acknowledged, glancing behind him. His countrymen had surrounded the area, some patrolling the boundary of the overturned camp, and the rest listening intently to the chieftain and the bowed one. And I couldn’t see any sign of-

“Where’s Juhani?” I demanded. “She was with you a second ago-“

He howled something.

“Translation: Brooding Tabby has run off to find Master,” HK intoned from behind Zaalbar. “Observation: Master’s last known location has been transmitted to your personal communicator. Primary objective to locate Master initiating.”

“What?” I barked. “HK, stay put! Damn that Cathar!” My teeth gritted, and I glanced down at the wrist-comm. Geographical coordinates were blinking at me – and either HK’s superior visual receptors had gleaned that data, or he’d hacked into the ‘Hawk’s communications to download them. I wasn’t sure which one was more likely.

HK’s red eyes gleamed. “Statement: No current orders from Master are active. Reverting to default objective: find and protect Master.”

I growled as he began to move out. “Then give me a minute and we’ll go togeth-”

The sound of blaster fire further afield had me halting, mid-rant. My heavy repeater was in my grasp in a flash. From here, all I could see was the red spit of laser dancing behind the massive girth of a wroshyr. Someone, up ahead, had broached the perimeter.

“HK, Zaalbar, to me,” I commanded, rushing forwards. Zaalbar chuffed, loping next to me with an upraised rifle he’d no doubt pulled from a dead hunter. The snarls of his countrymen picked up, and the flashes of fire retreated away. I heard the puff of a smoke grenade, and some indistinct cursing.

_Poor bastards. They won’t be able to outrun Wookiees reclaiming Kashyyyk. Although, as Carpet_ and I neared the skirmish, I began to realize these hostiles were better trained than the others we’d encountered. We halted behind a wroshyr trunk to pinpoint their location. I guessed four or five of them, hiding behind cover as they took accurate potshots at the approaching Wookiees.

The earlier Czerka grunts had run in panic, and not made it far. This lot – well, they wouldn’t last long, but at least they’d go down bravely, with honour. I pulled out a grenade, about to prime it—

“\textit{Ib’tuur jatne tuur ash’ad kyr’amur!” someone yelled.}

\begin{quote}
\textit{Today is a good day for someone else to die.}
\end{quote}

\begin{quote}
\textit{Haar’chak! My own tongue, being spoken here by those I was firing against—} \end{quote}

“Stop!” I hollered in shock. “HK, tell the Wookiees to hold their fire!” I shoved the inactivate grenade back in my belt, switching to Mando’a. “\textit{(Hold your fire! State your clan and hold your damn fire!)}”

I didn’t hear the mechanical howls of HK’s translation. I turned around wildly, and couldn’t spot the damn droid anywhere. There was a blurry flash as three Wookiees ran past me, snarling.

\begin{quote}
\textit{(Who’s that?)} someone answered, an angry voice in the distance. \textit{\textit{(If you’re with those beasts, get them to stand down!)}
\end{quote}

“Zaalbar!” I yelled. \textit{No, that won’t work! Carpet has sod-all status-} Zaalbar was howling something, all the same. Behind us, another group of overgrown hairballs were advancing, flanking each other with stolen blasters aimed at the shadows. The one in the centre, the leader, was Zaalbar’s dad.

And I ran. Slung my weapon over my shoulder, hands free and unarmed, and ran straight towards the Wookiee chieftain.

“Those are my men!” I roared, metres away, my arms raised in the universal motion for halt. Next to him, the bowed Wookie with the dappled grey fur jerked in shock. On either side, hairy forearms belonging to others trained laser sights in the centre of my torso. “\textit{I led the escape of your damn Wookiees, now get them to stop firing at my men!}”

One of them had to understand Galactic Basic. \textit{Damn HK for leaving!}

Carpet’s dad chuffed in anger. The bowed one gestured something. I could still hear blaster fire, and at the end of it those unknown Mando’ade were too outnumbered to survive for long.

“If it wasn’t for me, your son would have died on Taris!” I bellowed. “\textit{If it wasn’t for me, near all of these Wookiees would be sitting in a Czerka prison waiting to be shipped off-world as slaves!”}

The bowed grey one understood, I was sure of it, with the way she cocked her head at my words. Even Zaalbar’s skeevy dad stopped rumbling when I spoke, although now his face was contorted in a furry rictus.

Zaalbar’s solid presence stepped to my side, and I turned to face him, my hands digging into his forearms in desperation. “\textit{They’re not Czerka, Zaalbar, not really,}” I growled. “\textit{Just mercs doing a job. Just like I was on Taris. Rangir, you owe me. You all owe me. I’ll have them throw down their damn weapons and leave the planet—}”

He removed my clenched fists with relative ease. I was a strong man, but I was no Wookiee.
And then, Zaalbar’s dad roared, a litany of Shyriiwook vowels in a voice loud enough to reverberate through the trees.

The nearby fire ceased, and Zaalbar thumped me on the shoulder, motioning towards the shadows. I understood the unspoken message. Go. Be quick.

I lurched forward, towards the Mando’ade.

“(Throw down your weapons and come out slowly!” I bellowed. “(The hairballs owe me a favour and I’ve got them to stop their fire, but don’t do anything stupid. They’re trigger-happy and more than a little pissed at off-worlders!)”

A thickset Wookiee snarled something at me as he stomped back towards the others. But there were still almost a dozen facing the hidden Mando’ade, all now wielding ranged weapons and unholy anger.

“(I ain’t surrendering to one of those!)” a young voice shot back. “(Better a quick death from a blaster, than being ripped limb from-)”

“It’s not surrender, di’kut, I’m trying to get you off-world,” I thundered. “And speak Basic, so the Wookiees can hear. I want to make sure they understand that the only thing y’all plan to do next is haul jets off their planet.”

“Who are you?” a deeper voice yelled, the first one I’d heard.

“Canderous, of clan Ordo,” I answered. “Now stop wasting time if you want to live!”

An uneasy silence descended on the shadows. A Mando’ade feared nothing, but the Wookiees were one of the more dangerous – and savage – species in the galaxy. And they had every right to be steamed at the mess Czerka were making on their planet. They looked like hairy guardians, dotted between the giant wroshyrs as they stared into the shadows, their noses raised and blasters aimed. Each of them, on a trigger-edge of violence.

I didn’t even know the Mando’ade I was backing, and I damn well hoped they were worth it.

“Okay, I’m coming out,” the first one called. A second later I saw a figure emerge from the dark. Clad head to toe in beaten armour, he held a blaster at his side, before tossing it to the feet of the nearest Wookiee.

“You better know what you’re doing, Canderous,” he said, as he walked slowly in my direction. “If you cause me an honourless death, I’ll damn well haunt you in the afterlife.”

Three more figures materialized, all throwing their weapons in the same fashion. One was limping heavily.

“Do what I say,” I ordered, as a menacing group of Wookiees encircled them. Zaalbar howled something next to me, gesturing at his blaster before pointing at the nearest Mando’ade. “State whatever weapons are still on your person, before – slowly! – throwing them to the ground.”

“There is no honour in this,” one of them growled. “Coming forward like weak-”

“Oh, and there’s honour in doing Czerka’s dirty work?” I snapped, seeing one of the Wookiees facing them twitch aggressively. “Hired guns for nothing more than credits?”

It had been sitting in my craw, ever since I’d faced Jagi. There had been a decent sized group of Mando’ade on Dreshdae, wiling away the time as they picked up the odd merc job for cash. It was too much like what I’d done, wasting years on kriffing Davik Kang.

“There’s a pistol on my hip,” the first one said. “A shiv-blade by my thigh. Two grenades. I’m removing them now.”

There was a shuffle amongst the rest as they copied him, all slowly stating their weapons before tossing them to the nearest Wookiee. Even the one who’d complained followed suit, so I figured the first one was their leader, of sorts.

“Canderous,” he said, stepping closer to me. “Never thought I’d see you on the wrong side of a gun.”

My eyes narrowed, as his hands moved to remove his helm. One of the Wookiees snarled in threat at the movement, yanking a rifle upwards. “I’m just removing my helm!” the Mando’ade protested. “Haar’chak!”

I felt a jolt of surprise as his weathered face came into view, from behind an in-line visor. Blonde hair shorn short around a heavily scarred face. A wide jaw and two round ears that stuck out prominently on either side of his head. Not a pretty man, but a damn capable one.

“Jacen,” I said in surprise, my brows raising.

“Su cuy’gar, clan-brother,” he replied in wry tones. “You’re aiding the Wookiees, huh?”

Zaalbar rumbled something softly, but I heard the urgency in his tones. Still, kriffing Jacen. A cousin, on my mother’s side. An up-and-coming leader of Ordo, I’d picked, from the battles we’d shared. He was quick, fast, and resourceful. I hadn’t seen him since the fringes of Malachor.

“Something like that,” I muttered. “I’d have a drink and catch up, but it ain’t the friendliest of company, here. Who else is with you?”

“Trallia of Kelborn, Da’thok of Kelborn, and Jernnin of Lok.”

Not anyone else I knew personally, but I’d heard of two of them. Trallia Kelborn was known for leading risky manoeuvres with small basilisk squads. In fact, her exploits were notable enough that it had sparked inter-clan wagering on her chances of survival at times. And Jernnin- Well. He’d been the third of the Lok clan, once.

Both blooded during the Wars, just like Jacen. Just like me. Veteran Mando’ade, scattered like useless drek around the galaxy.

“And Dan of Fett,” another man called out in a bland voice, and a fifth figure strode into view, calmly handing a blaster grip-first to the nearest Wookiee. Clad in the same armour as the rest, but from the shifting of the others they hadn’t expected him.

“Su’cuy,” Jacen muttered to him. “Haven’t seen you down here. Where’s your hunter group?”

“Dead,” Dan said succinctly. His visor turned to face me. “Canderous of Ordo. I’ve heard of you.”

Zaalbar rumbled something again, giving me a rough nudge.

“Okay, keep your hair on,” I muttered, before glancing over my shoulder to the Wookiee leader. He was glaring. “Give me a minute,” I called to him, “and I’ll get them out of here.”
The chieftain growled something, and the dappled grey one echoed him in a calmer voice. The Wookiees surrounding them all put me in mind of a kath pack, tensed and waiting for the moment to pounce.

I sighed, turning back to Jacen. “You lot need to get out of here. Get back to the Czerka lift, and get off-world. This isn’t our planet, and it’s not ours for the taking. Not under Czerka. Rangir, we’re better than this.”

“Better than what, Ordo?” one of the others sneered. Da’thok, I thought, the argumentative one. “There are no more clans left, not after Malachor. You think to judge us for picking up honest work?”

Honest work. As honest as tracking down bounties for Davik and keeping the swoop gangs in line. "Yes, I damn well do," I growled. "Since when did we turn into aimless mercs who value credits over clan and honour? Our leaders may have been killed, our forces may have been routed – but Revan didn't break us. We broke us."

I turned to the side, and spat on the ground. “Clan can be rebuilt. Haar’chak, have we all forgotten what makes us Mando’ade? We grow strong through testing our mettle, through strengthening our clan. Defeat is nothing more than a set-back, a challenge to do better. When did we forget this? Since when do we allow defeat to crush us?”

The silence was electric. Dan Fett had folded his arms, and looked the most relaxed of the lot. Jacen sighed, scratching his head. “Malachor. It is gone, and you know its importance. But not only…” Jacen trailed off, before picking up again. “We lost our Mand’alor, Canderous. All the clans of any import lost their leaders at Malachor. Our fathers, our brothers and sisters, our generals. What strength remained has been dispersed through the galaxy. Just like me, and just like you.”

“We are more than just our leaders, Jacen,” I said. “Our leaders don’t define us. Our bloodlines don’t define us!” I gestured to Jernnin, whose four armoured arms gave away his Besalisk ancestry. And to Dan Fett, whose high-raised helmet named him as Cerean or Togruta. Adoption was clan, and that was an integral strength in the Mando’ade. “We are a culture, an idea, and we do not let any enemy – no matter how powerful – vanquish that idea!”

Again, they lapsed into silence, and I had no clue if anything I said was reaching them. But, haar’chak, it was time. Jacen, Trallia and Jernnin should be rebuilding our people. As should I. “Go home, leave this planet that’s not ours, and go home to your clans. Tell them it’s time to rebuild. It’s time to seek new leaders.”

“Ordo needs a leader too, Canderous,” Jacen said, slipping his helmet back on. “Will you come with us?”

“Not yet,” I muttered. Not yet. “I have something else to see out, first. But I’ll be back within the year. If I’m not, then you know it’s time to sing my battle songs to the stars.”

“I will, brother,” he murmured. Zaalbar, at my side, chuffed something, and we both looked to see him motioning towards the Czerka lift.

“Go back topside,” I ordered. “Go back through the Czerka lift. Find a flight out of here quick, for as sure as the grizzle on your bollocks, Czerka won’t be on Kashyyyk for long.”

The approving roar that shook the ground told me enough Wookiees surrounding us had some understanding of Basic.
“Men,” Trallia muttered, her visor shaking at me as she began to limp past. “Don’t stay away too long, Ordo. If enough others feel as you do, then it won’t just be individual clans looking for a new leader.”

Her meaning was obvious. Mand’alor. It would be a good thing, to see the choosing of a new one. To witness our rebirth from the ashes of Malachor.

I would go back, I knew this now, had known it since I’d encountered Jagi. I would follow Revan first, see this out to its end, and then I would go back. Jacen wasn’t the only one of my clan who might yet live. He wasn’t the only one I held bonds to.

Zaalbar rumbled something further, a long litany of incomprehensible vowels as the Mando’ade slowly trudged through the now-Wookiee encampment, and a half-dozen armed hairballs followed them with blasters raised.

“You get I don’t understand a damn thing you’re howling, right?” I muttered. He continued to howl.

“They’re planning on destroying the Czerka lifts,” Dan Fett said. He’d halted, facing me, as the others continued to walk away. “Not yet, but soon. They’re going to throw grenades in the shaft.”

I turned, to stare at the unknown Mando’ade. His battered visor remained facing me, his arms held loosely at his side. “You understand Shyriiwook,” I said slowly. “What are you doing on Kashyyyk, Dan of Fett?”

“I know enough to get the gist,” he answered, shrugging beneath the bulky armour. He was as tall as me, not surprising given his ancestry, and he held himself with a warrior’s alertness. “If you want to follow them topside, then now’s your chance.”

“As I said to Jacen, I have other business to attend to,” I growled. “It’s you who should be leaving.”

Zaalbar said something more, gesturing wildly with his hands. Dan tilted his head to appraise him.

“Some of the Wookies have gone back to their village, before they met up with—” He paused, waving irritably at the chieftain. “That guy, I can’t pronounce his name,” he muttered. “They took Czerka corpses as proof of the leader’s dishonour, so there’s likely a merry little shindig happening in their charming habitat topside. Your furry friend will be following them shortly, and wants to know your plan.”

I scowled at the stranger. The other Mando’ade had vanished into the shadows, but this one seemed entirely too interested in sticking around. “As enticing as your translation skills are, if you stay here you won’t last long. I ain’t gonna protect you from your own stupidity.”

A cacophony of Wookiee howls had us both turning, to see a small group of walking hairballs lope into the camp. One, a grizzled ancient figure with streaks of white running through his snarled fur, strode over to the bowed grey one, before embracing her fiercely. A few others nearby rumbled their approval.

“A mated pair, separated by the leader topside,” Dan murmured. “Wookies are interesting creatures.”

Zaalbar snarled something at that, and Dan shrugged in apparent indifference. There was a loud roar from Zaalbar’s sire, who was standing next to the grizzled newcomer. And all the Wookies encircling them jerked to attention.
“Fighting’s broken out in their village,” Dan translated. “That old one who just came down reports that the corpses and news of a Czerka lift have started a riot. Seems a lot of the Wookiees topside didn’t know about the Czerka presence.”

“Zaalbar-” I started, but an upsurge of Shyriiwook rumbling completely drowned out my words. The Wookiees, as one, turned on their heel and began bounding out of the camp, and into the Shadowlands.

“Zaalbar! What the kriff’s going on?”

But between the barked orders from the chieftain, and the mass exodus of howling Wookiee, I already knew. They were on their way to the Rwookrorro elevator. And then-

A chirp from my wrist-comm snagged my attention. It was Revan.

::The Sith are rallying to commence orbital bombardment on Kashyyyk::: Her words came through in a rush. ::I’ve sent the Map coordinates through. Whatever you’re doing, finish up and get back to the ‘Hawk::: There was a deep intake of air. ::I’ll collect Mission and meet everyone there. We must leave Kashyyyk as soon as we can:::

She switched off the channel before I could say a damn word, and ignored my immediate attempt to contact her back.

“Mand’alor’s balls!” I cursed. I swung back to look at Zaalbar. We were alone, now, the rest of the natives having left us for dust. “You got that, Carpet? We gotta head back. You have to make a choice, the ‘Hawk or your village?”

He gesticulated wildly, rough growls spitting out from his vocal chords, his eyes pinching in anger.

Dan started stumbling over the translation. “Something about a life-debt, and a mission that shouldn’t be there-”

“Yeah, okay, so Mission’s down in the damn Shadowlands, but she’s safe-”

He roared louder.

“Look, she wasn’t meant to be in the lift, Carpet, you can bawl her out later-”

A furry fist shook in my face.

“For the love of Mand’alor, would you focus on what’s important?” I snapped. “You heard Jen. The Sith know we’re here. We have to get off-planet.”

He was still howling, and Dan Fett struggled to keep pace. “He wants to see his father in the village, first, something about his brother and dishonour, I think? But he’s talking about a life-debt again-”

“Zaalbar,” I forced out through clenched teeth. “It’s one or the other. I ain’t sticking around to be turned into a plasma smear in your damned forest.”

Although- where had Revan’s intel come from? Onasi had just relayed that a damn Republic cruiser was in Kashyyyk airspace. If the Sith planned to bomb Kashyyyk to get at the Star Map or Revan – or both – then there’d likely be a pretty party up in the skies, first. That might buy us some time.
“He’s adamant he has to see this through,” Dan was saying, his words interspersed with Carpet’s rumbles. “But his life-debt will bring him back to your Jen’s side, one way or the other. He says you should go back to the ship, he’ll be as quick as he can but don’t wait for him—”

I folded my arms. At the end of it, Zaalbar was one of the crew – and without a blasted comm. And it hadn’t escaped me that Revan had delayed the shyrack caves, back on Korriban, for my own personal business.

“I’m coming with you, Carpet,” I said. “And if your family feud drags out too long, I’ll kick your furry butt.”

Zaalbar nodded his shaggy head, and strode off into the Shadowlands. I had to run to keep up, and I knew he was slowing down for me.

Dan of Fett trailed us silently. Somehow, that didn’t surprise me.

xXx
The corridor was empty.

It was comprised of a strange metallic compound that bore a silvery colour lighter than any form of durasteel I was familiar with. The walls curved in a cylindrical cast, with no obvious delineation of panels. The result was both perfect and alien in its appearance.

Behind me lay the quarters I had been ensconced in. The door, strangely, had been unlocked. And now that I was mobile, I had utterly no idea which direction I should take.

Can you sense any lifeform nearby? There must be guards, soldiers - you can’t afford to run into any, not without a weapon, not with the Force so weak.

Revan’s presence sat strongly in my mind, and that was a comfort in itself. But the Force was dull and shaky, my heartbeat irregular and loud, my senses woozy. The Sith medic who had overlooked my vitals for so long, a silent Rodian named Boc, had been exceedingly regular in his application of the sense-scrambling jerrikerr-kolto. That schutta’s cursed formula, scrambling my mind and Force alike.

I had tried to disable my shackles, to blast the circuitry in a basic pulse of ionization. That had never been beyond my talents before, but the drugs made it so now. I fumbled and tried, and tried and fumbled, and every failure tasted like desolate ash in my mouth.

But now Revan was here, and free, and able to do what I could not. Such a minimal, and yet precise, twist of the Force through the bond, and the electronic fetters hissed open.

Can you sense anything?

Sometimes, the jerrikerr-kolto eroded all my senses, like I was blind and deaf as well as Force-numb. But it would come in different coloured waves; one a nauseating detachment, another a dizzying delirium.

I had the impression of my own thought-streams fragmenting; the yearning to drift away and disconnect from reality. Even as I understood it a side-effect of the medication, awareness still did not dispel the desire to simply close my eyes and just stop.

Bastila? Stay with me!

I am here. I cannot sense anything… I cannot sense…

Her psychic touch brushed against mine, intertwining with my precarious hold on the Force, and commanding it to obey our mingled will. Such power, flowing through me from her, but it was clumsy and skittered out of my-her-our grasp. Whether it was the jerrikerr-kolto or her unfamiliarity with the bond, I did not know.

Neither do I, she muttered, discerning my thoughts. You feel like you’re on a spice crash.

For Revan to make a connection like that was not wholly surprising, even as I doubted she had any conscious memory of such an event. But her instincts and innate experience from a past history she could not recall had manifested time and again.

Although, somehow, I did not think Darth Revan had ever resorted to ingesting spice like a spiritless spacer.

There was a mental flinch from her, and I realized she had intercepted that thought, also.

Probably Street Kid back on Talshion, Revan muttered. Look, just put one foot in front of the other. Go!

I found myself stumbling forward, instinctively reacting to her command. The corridor curved gently, the inside of a shiny silver snake, and I was breathing shallowly by the time I rounded the bend.

It was a surprise for me to find it empty.

I have such a surprise for you, Bastila, Malak’s mechanical tones echoed in my memory.

The surprise had been the Star Forge, of course. And within these walls I could feel the licking of dark Force encircling me, a creeping sensation that whispered evil, power, freedom.

There was nothing I wished for more fervently than my freedom.

But now I beheld a flutter of hope that my wish may yet be granted. Revan was free, and I was unshackled. I could breathe again.

For I had been suffocating under a nadir of despair, a graveyard of hate and desolation that Malak had delighted in…

…

I could not feel Revan. I had vowed to stay back, to block her as much as I was able beneath the weight of the drugs, yet now I found myself scrabbling for any sense of my tormented bond-sister. She was entirely absent from me. Our bond had been cleaved through with sharp precision, as though no connection between us had ever existed.

It did not mean her death. I would feel that, oh how I would feel that, and likely not survive. No, I understood the implications well enough.

Bandon Stone and Yudan Rosh had captured Revan Freeflight, and we had lost. We had lost everything.

Her capture, like mine, was worse than a quick death.

“Well enjoy this,” Malak intoned, his sharp yellow eyes gleaming with victorious glee. “A message from Bandon, confirming everything you witnessed earlier.”

From a small, portable reception stick held tight in his gloved grasp, a holo-picture sprang to life. That sneering reprobate Bandon, the one who executed the offensive against the Endar Spire, stood in swirling shadows brandishing a blood-red lightsaber.

Lying prone in the gloom at his feet, was Revan. Scarlet illumination winked against the neural disruptor on her neck, against the restraints on her lifeless limbs, against the utterly broken expression in her blank eyes.
I had never hated Bandon as passionately as I did in that moment.

…

Bastila! For frell’s sake, stay with me!

The sweat crawled down my neck like slimy mud beetles. My face flushed with heat, even as my arms pricked with goose-pimples beneath the light garment I had worn for days.

Sithspit, when was the last time you had that drug?

I am not sure. Boc comes once or twice a standard day, perhaps. He was probably due now, I realized. I had lost any awareness of the passing of time, but Boc always arrived shortly after the dizziness reared, the clamminess set in, and my senses fragmented-

It’s the side-effects of it wearing off. Revan sounded grim. If they need to inject you that frequently, then there’s a good chance that recovery will be quick. But if you think he’ll be turning up in your cell with another dose, then we have sod all time. Move!

Her urgency finally began to penetrate the fog that sat in my consciousness, and then I was running blindly down the smooth alien tunnel. Revan was right there with me; seeing through my eyes, listening through my ears-

Footsteps. Try that door!

Sets of footsteps sounded from further ahead that I had not registered. A service door to my right I had not seen. I am in bad shape, I realized somewhat forlornly. This will never work.

The door! Revan ordered, and my hand lifted of its own volition.

The door swished open to reveal a modest utility closet. Deactivated cleaning bots were plugged into sockets on the floor, and shelves heralded piles of garments and cloths all neatly folded. The closet door closed, plunging the small space into darkness with only the orange luminescence of the door control shedding any light.

The footsteps grew louder.

About four sets, walking in unison, Revan muttered. I had a vague sense of humid air against my face, the tang of tree-sap in my sinuses, and realized that Revan was running at speed through a forest. We’ve got to get you a weapon, Bastila. And a sodding disguise. The Force feels… sick, through you.

…

“You’re sick,” I hissed. “You would say anything to justify your monstrosity-”

“What’s so monstrous, little one? Wishing to save the Republic? The High Council would have had the Republic fall before they involved themselves, do you not understand that? Diverse cultures replaced by Mandalorian braying and beating of chests-”

“War is dangerous for Jedi!” I spluttered. “The Council had their reasons-”

“They feared the power of the Dark Side,” Malak agreed, his yellow eyes glowing sickly as they bored into me. “But have you asked yourself, dear Bastila, why they were so quick to become involved after Malachor? Is there not some hypocrisy in that they would ignore genocide committed by non-Force sensitives, but jump into the fray when the conquerors are Dark Jedi?”

“I will not listen to your poison, Malak!” I seethed, clenching tight my eyes. There is no emotion, there is peace. He shall not make me doubt the Order! There is no-

“I see I have exhausted you for today,” he murmured. “Very well, I shall leave you alone to contact Revan. My next question - ask her which Master swore fealty to her after the loss at Duro.”

I didn’t ask. I didn’t reach out.

…

Bastila, what the frell? Her voice stormed through the mind-link. It sounded horrified. What did he mean, his next question?

The footsteps were very loud, resonating through the thin metal door. I heard the idle chatter of soldiers, but could not register individual words. My harsh breathing was deafening in the darkened closet. There wasn’t much space, here, only enough to rest against the side-wall. The metal was oddly warm beneath my shaking hands.

Each breath was fast and furious and shallow. But no one had discovered me yet. No alarm wailed in the distance. No running footsteps. For now.

Beneath my hands was a small display panel, a holo-still, a section of a map. Utility cupboard A04. Wing 3F. Lines branching out like a spider, pointing to other storerooms dotted around this segment of the Forge.

Revan, do you see-

Yes. But it isn’t complete, and all I can see is cleaning cupboards-

Surely it can aid us? Does it… seem at all familiar?

I don’t know the sodding place, Bastila! There was anger, there, in her words. Masking a black river of despair. But it was the Star Forge. Could she really claim not to recall anything about it?

For frell’s sake, I didn’t even know my own name a day ago!

That wasn’t true. Not really. She just refused to accept it.

Bastila! This isn’t helping!

…

“You’re not helping,” Malak murmured, as a gloved finger trailed down my cheek. I flinched, drawing as far away as I could. My muscles still twitched and burned with agony. “I really would prefer not to hurt you like this, dear Bastila.”

…

The Force flickered in my grasp, sluggish and sweet, slipping through my fingertips like I was attempting to grasp jella-pudding. It was a sickly dessert, one of the very few my mother would make. She was always affronted when I turned it away.
I felt Revan’s complete realization at what I had been enduring at the hands of Malak, and the anger emanating from her climaxed into hot fury.

He’s been trying to break you, she hissed. To make you fall.

Perhaps… but primarily he wanted me to contact you. To find out what you knew, what you recalled, what sort of threat you are. To… to toy with you and toy with me.

Is that why you kept trying to block me?

I-I don’t want you to recall your past, Revan. It is too dangerous… but he kept asking. How did he lose his jaw, what were Talvon Esan’s last words, what happened to Kreia-

I don’t know any of that, Bastila!

But the questions still spilled out, varying demands precluding the pain that came later, when I refused to answer. And each time, I felt my self-resolve slowly splinter. I told him you recalled so little, but he kept asking. Who found you on Talshion, how did Arran Da’klor die, who did you send as the first Dark Jedi recruiter on Korriban-

I- She paused. Her presence wavered, fragmenting a little. Karon. Arran Da’klor Force-pulled a dagger into his heart. Nisotsa.

It took a second, a horrified frozen second, before I fully comprehended her answer.

Revan, I said, shaken. How can you- how can you answer that, and know nothing of the Star Forge?

Stars, Bastila, I don’t even know what they mean- who Arran or Nisotsa were to me- I just have these cursed flashes dropping names and feelings into my frelled-up head- she trailed off brokenly. Ever since the Endar Spire.

It was then I sensed her utter exhaustion, through the bond. It rivalled mine.

But I will clean up my mess, Bastila. I swear it. I will not… I refuse to turn into what I once was.

She sounded spent; grief-stricken and hollow. And yet, the faint steel of conviction sang through her words. I found myself believing in her.

Look at the map again.

I glanced back to the unintelligible lines. In the centre, there was a different coloured dot. Command Center 3F.

There. We go there. We need to find a way out of this place. We need to find a ship.

A command center will be guarded, Revan.

Yes. You’ll have to mind-trick someone into helping you. Go, Bastila, while the corridor is empty.

I gasped in a lungful of air, mashed my hand on the door control, and entered into the hallway once more. Second door on the right, along another length of alien tunnel, a bend to the left. And as I rounded that last corner, a sole soldier jerked in surprise as we nearly barrelled into one other.
Alarm fired through me, a rush of Force, shaking in my grasp. Revan was there, her strength aiding mine, as either panic or feral instinct had me hurling forth a shockwave of energy.

The soldier, an Aqualish dressed in the starched tan uniform of the Sith, was thrown back against the curved wall. He grunted, recovering quickly, a hand already scrabbling for the blaster on his belt.

No! Panic coursed like wildfire through me, rallying the Force in my grasp. He took a step forward, and I lashed out again, slamming him back once more with a thud.

It was a weak effort, and his large black eyes began to narrow in mounting outrage.

Again!

“If I allow him to defeat me, then Kylah has won! The moment she decided to betray the Order, she won! An upsurge of power, passionate and furious, collected in my grasp – whether it was mine or Revan’s I did not know – and then the Aqualish was sailing back against the alien walls a third time.

He shook his head dazedly, and it still was not enough! I felt despair at my own weakness, all because of that schutta, and the soldier’s tusks and hairy face swam in my vision, morphed and transformed until all I could see was the striking face of my one-time friend, and the glint of jealousy burning in her eyes.

Someone was growling in rage. I felt my fist clenching. The figure in front of me was pressed hard against the wall, thick fingers scrabbling at his neck- no, no, fine fingers hidden beneath glossy tendrils of dark hair-

... A warm Dantooine breeze lifted glossy tendrils from Kylah’s face, as her slanted gaze fixed on mine. “What is going on?” she asked, as we ambled through the high grass. She was composed, but I could see the concern dancing in her eyes, evident in her pursed lips. “I was so relieved when you returned, and after all you’ve gone through I do understand that the Council wish to keep a close eye on you, but-” She paused, frowning. “This is the first time they have let you out of their sight. Are you alright, my friend? Is everything okay?”

No. No, it was not. But I could not tell her that.

Our secret prisoner was cloistered deep within the Enclave, the best Jedi medics rallying to keep her comatose as the Council discussed what to do. Master Nemo had been shocked. Master Vrook disapproving. And myself... I had not known how to explain my act of mercy, other than I had been unable to leave someone to certain death when I could save them.

No matter their crimes.

“I cannot speak of it, Kylah,” I said softly. I knew she would not appreciate the answer. Kylah had always watched out for me, and I knew I had a tendency to follow her lead around others. She was proud, in her own way, of my Battle Meditation and victories thus far in the war against the Sith, but she cautioned me against overconfidence. Kylah did not believe I was ready for the Knight trials.

In that way, she sounded much like Master Vrook. And yet, a small part of me rebelled at them... both. Look at what I have achieved! I sometimes thought. Look how far I have come! Surely, I am ready? But I could not deny the reservations of both my closest friend and my Master. They must have their reasons for holding me back... and I had heard how gruelling the Knight trials were. Strength in the Force had naught to do with it.

Even Kylah had failed, the first time.

“You cannot speak of it?” she asked in disbelief. “Bastila, you cannot doubt my loyalty to you, the trust that is between us. Whatever is going on has you torn, my friend. You can unburden yourself safely, in the knowledge that it will go no further.”

I trusted Kylah implicitly, but this was not just my secret to bear. And it was so big... I had not expected a Force bond. I had not expected the memory to flood through me, of a secret artefact here on Dantooine. Master Nemo was setting out, tomorrow, to investigate. The thought of what he might find scared me not a little.

“You must trust in the Council, Kylah,” I replied, hearing a prim tone in my voice that made me cringe inwardly. “I would tell you if I could.”

“This makes no sense,” she muttered, a flash of annoyance creasing her striking face. I had sometimes speculated on a Mirialan mix in her otherwise human ancestry, given the slight yellow tone to her skin that always struck me as exotic. I had never dared question her on it though. “You are but a Padawan, Bastila. Surely Master Vrook does not agree with all of this... whatever this is.”

“Please, Kylah, do not press me anymore,” I begged, before turning back to stare at the Enclave. I took a deep breath, and tasted the scent of flowering grass that beheld the onset of spring. “I must head back to the Enclave.”

...

She was gasping for air, beneath my choke hold. But if I let go then it would mean my end. And she deserved everything she had coming, the betraying, jealous schutta-

...

“Bastila,” Kylah said, drawing me into an empty officer’s room of the Endar Spire. A large plasticeel table dominated the humble room, which was otherwise bare of any furniture. A meeting room, of sorts. “Galdea has just imparted to me-”

“Master Galdea,” I murmured, unable to help myself. Kylah’s dark eyes flashed with irritation. “Master Galdea,” she snapped, “has just imparted to me the extra-ordinary powers of command you have been granted. What is going on?”

The last question was hissed out like a whiplash. I looked away. “Kylah, Master Galdea is leading the Endar Spire in actuality. You know this. I will not be countermanding anything he says-”

“And yet you have the power to do so!” she interjected, her voice high with incredulity. “It is hard enough to stomach the secrecy around these Force ruins you are hunting – and do not look at me like that Bastila, I know you have been granted more details than I or any Knight on board – but this? This is- this is ludicrous!” she ended on a splutter.

She was not the only one who thought so. The reactions of the Republic officers had been galling. Even that experienced advisor to the navi-pilots, Captain Onasi, could not contain his disbelief when he glanced my way. Certainly I was well-known to Republic soldiers; famous, even. But a leader I was not, not yet, and the Endar Spire was not a small assignment to grant a greenhorn.

Still, it was irritating. I could only trust that the Republic military would obey my command, and pray that I would not need them to.

And as for Kylah- she was accustomed to leading me, guiding me, speaking for me-

For there were many times the galactic press cornered me for interviews, or various delegates wished to question the strengths and foibles of my Battle Meditation. Kylah was adept at leading those encounters, emphasizing that it was a team effort, that my power was due in part to the tutelage of experienced Jedi like her.

It was only since I had returned from Deralian airspace with a galactic secret she was not part of, that I began to comprehend the imbalance in our friendship. And I began to sense her frustration when she was unable to command me.

Kylah was my closest friend and confidante, and I did not wish to upset her – but it was time for me to step out of her shadow.

“I am sure it will not be necessary,” I said at last, meeting her gaze with a wrench of self-control. “Master Galdea leads us, and if something untoward were to happen to him, then Knight Seris would step up as the next experienced.”

“Then why grant you powers you don’t need and won’t use?” she snapped. “Why?”

As a last resort. In case Galdea and Vima and Karon are wrong. In case she wakes up. No one on the Council believed it was plausible. Her mind was too damaged, the personality overlay too complete. But given her power and history, it made sense to be cautious. If, for some unknown reason, something changed with her state of mind, I would be the first – and possibly only – one to know, due to our Force-bond.

And I might require unconditional assistance from all onboard to contain her.

It seemed a fanciful scenario. The few times I had spoken to her, there was nothing of the former Sith Lord or Jedi Knight in her. Just a shell, inhabited by the echo of a meek scholar, who beheld horrifying dreams I intercepted but she couldn’t remember.

“I am sorry, Kylah, but this is Council business, and I am not permitted to say more.”

…

The Aqualish crumpled to a dead heap at my feet.

_Bastila!_ Revan’s voice, intense and commanding and concerned, sliced through the wild rage owning me. I realized, vaguely, that it may not have been the first time she had called me.

I stared down at the Aqualish. He had suffocated to death. Suffocated, by-

_No!_ Revan snapped. _You will not wallow in self-pity or guilt! Not now!_

I had killed him by-

_Pick up the damn corpse, Bastila! We passed another utility cupboard, just before the corner. Move the body!_
Mechanically, I bent down and obeyed, my mind blank with shock. The Aqualish was surprisingly heavy, and I found myself struggling to drag it backward. By the time I had reached the small door, I was panting with exertion.

The strength of the Force is returning to you, Revan muttered, as I stuffed the dead Aqualish next to another row of deactivated cleaning bots. Find another lone soldier, and compel him to lead you to a ship. You can do this, Bastila.

Compulsion. A dark power in itself, but not as dark as-

I clenched my fists, shook my head wildly, and forced myself to focus. The utility cupboard swished closed, and I once more started down the corridor.

Do you remember which way to go?

Yes. Down the corridor, to the left.

We were on the move again, encased by shiny curved walls. My bare feet were silent on the glistening floor, and the only sounds to be heard were my fast breathing and overly loud heartbeat. We passed closed doors, behind which I could sense faint flickers of sentient life. Just keep walking.

Just keep walking.

This was not going to work. This was insane. A lone prisoner, wandering blindly through a foreign space station, completely helpless-

You are not helpless, Bastila.

Revan’s presence, nestled within my psyche, felt stronger than my own. I could not perceive any separation between us now; how much was I controlling my own physiological actions, and how much was I simply bending beneath her will?

We can sort out the intricacies of our bond later, Bastila. For now- there’s a lot of doors, here. Living quarters, maybe? What can you sense?

I breathed in, and let the Force flow out. More faint flickers of life, one behind each door, quiet enough to be-

Sleeping. If this is luck or the Force, I don’t care, we’ll take it. Try one.

The door consisted of the same cinereal metal, inlaid perfectly into the curvature of the polished wall. I stared in askance at the access panel. The utility cupboards may open for anyone, but surely individual rooms would require some authorization or unlocking mechanism?

Revan was there, tangled in with the threads of my Force. I could feel the depth of exhaustion within her, and yet it didn’t seem to hold her back at all. She grasped the reigns of our collective power, all the while concentrating on the infinitesimal oscillations of electronics that flickered within the door’s circuitry.

I could not make any sense of energy on such a minute scale, but her control was deft. A small tweak, and the door gave way.

Beyond was a small spheroid space with a bunk and a sleeping Duros in plain clothes. I stepped forward. The door shut behind me as I stared at the snoozing Sith.

Wake him up. Mind tricks and compulsion. You can do this, Bastila.

Yes, yes I could. Kylah had always been a master at it, and I had learned a few things from that schutta. I took in yet another shuddering breath, and my gaze darted to a footlocker by the foot of the bed.

See if it’s unlocked.

It was. I was not interested in the detritus of holo-mags or candy bars, but the slim-line blaster nestled on top was nothing short of miraculous. I picked it up with unsteady hands, and turned my attention back to the Duros.

Wielding the Force still felt sluggish, but it had improved. I could do this. And I had little time in which to do so.

I knelt down next to the stranger, the blaster held limply in one hand while I reached out with shaky fingers of psychic power.

“Wake up,” I whispered, and nudged him gently with my free hand.

The Duros twitched, and alarmed red eyes snapped open.

Say you’re doing Malak’s bidding.

“I am acting under orders from Darth Malak, and you shall help me,” I intoned, intertwining strands of Force into my words, wrapping threads of power around his weak mind. Keep your eyes fixed on his. The sleepiness on his face was chased away by confusion, and his whole body tensed. “You shall help me,” I repeated.

“I- what?” the stranger slurred, shuddering awake. His gaze slipped from mine, dropping down to stare at my crumpled attire in disbelief. “Who the frakk are you?

“Have you never seen a Dark Jedi just rolled out of bed before?” Revan snapped, through my lips, through my body. “Lord Malak requires your obedience. Get up, soldier!”

Leave this to me! I snarled, suddenly furious at her presumption – and more than a little alarmed at her ability to take over.

I… I’m sorry, Bastila. Revan’s immediate remorse was like a deluge of rainfall. She retreated from me slightly. I- that was instinctive. I won’t do it again.

I was immediately mollified, more so when I understood the hot shame rolling from her did not just concern this incident. Of course it did not.

I stared deep into the large eyes of the Duros. “I am under orders from Darth Malak, and you shall help me.”

The words sat heavy in the air, echoing with compulsion. The Duros nodded, his face blank. “You are under orders from Lord Malak, and I will help you.”

It is okay, Revan. Perhaps I over-reacted, too. And do not vow that – for if my life is in danger, then I would wish for your assistance.
“I need a ship. Lead me to the closest one-man ship, so I can act out Darth Malak’s orders.”

He stood, turning to face the door. “I will lead you to the nearest ship, so you can act out Lord Malak’s orders.”

He took a step, and I felt Revan’s hesitation, her desire to interrupt once more. \textit{Bastila… he’s not in uniform.}

She was right, I realized with chagrin, even as I was struck once more at her ability to see through my eyes. It had not been long ago when I hadn’t believed that possible. I pushed back to her, just a little, and was rewarded with a wild scent and thick humidity that could only be from the Shadowlands.

At least our bond was equal, even if her power eclipsed mine. But I trusted her. I did.

“Put your uniform on,” I ordered, as the soldier’s hand lifted toward the access panel. “You are on duty, now.”

The Duros began to strip, mechanically removing his sleeping tunic, before turning, naked, to retrieve an ecru uniform from an inlaid closet. He glanced back at me once, and I repeated my command, feeling the Force sink deeper into his mind.

The deeper I went, the longer it would take to dissipate. Sometimes, it never really did. A sentient could live out an entire existence under the yoke of another person’s dark will.

\textit{No regrets,} Revan whispered. \textit{We will get you out of here. By any means necessary.}

That was Revan’s entire life, if one were to cut right down to the bare bones of it. \textit{By any means necessary.} Any sacrifice, any method, any way to achieve the end result – no matter the damage that might be done to one’s soul. No matter how the end result might warp along the way.

\textit{Bastila, please-} She was distraught. Suddenly, sharply distraught. \textit{I’ve got to get you out of here. Recriminations and judgement can come later- but I need you. Your counsel, your knowledge- Sithspit, Bastila, this is too much to bear on my own!}

Her anguish was akin to a slap in the face, and now it was my turn to feel the burn of shame. Revan, \textit{I did not mean to- my thoughts are still not entirely sensical, and far too wrapped up in past history.} The Duros was still bare, now holding aloft a pair of creased uniform trousers. \textit{I am not judging you. Everything that has happened since the Endar Spire, everything you have done and struggled with – you are once more a champion of the Light, Revan. Do not let your past, or even the ill-timed thoughts of someone like me, make you forget that.}

Revan was already pulling herself together, quicker than I ever could have, and I sensed the steel of resolution fire in her once more. She may have claimed she needed me, but I wasn’t entirely sure she did. Her drive and steadfast determination had always been a core foundation of her personality.

\textit{Okay. Enough of the naked green guy. I’m not sure about you, but those body warts aren’t doing it for me. Let’s roll out.}

Not to mention her inability to remain serious when the situation warranted it.

\textit{Coping mechanism, Bastila.} I felt a small rumble of wry amusement from her. It was her first in a long time. \textit{We all have them.}
The Duros finished buttoning a shirt, before slipping feet into electronic dress shoes. They tightened with a hiss, and he looked back to me in expectation.

“Find me a ship,” I repeated. “A small one with a hyperdrive. Under Darth Malak’s orders.”

“I shall find you a ship, under Lord Malak’s orders.”

I felt more confident now, with my mind a little sharper and focused on our objective. The Force willing, our luck would hold, and this would work. For now, I could only keep placing one foot in front of the other, and keep it together.

“How close is the nearest ship?” I asked the Duros, holding his crimson gaze as we stepped out from his living quarters.

Get him to address you as Darth… I don’t know. Make up a name. Darth Rosa. It will be more convincing if you run into anyone.

“We are in the accommodation wing 3F,” the Duros replied in a monotone. “There is an officer’s docking bay adjoined to the common rooms ahead. Beyond that are the factory bays for this wing of the Forge.”

Darth… Rosa? I thought faintly. Honestly, Revan, that’s patently ridiculous-

Okay, just ‘my lord’ will do. There will be other guards in a docking bay, Bastila, who will think to question your presence. We can only make this bluff as convincing as possible, and hope it’s enough to haul jets out of here.

“Lead me to the officer’s docking bay, but skirt around the common rooms,” I said in a rush. I had not seen most of the Star Forge with my own eyes, but Malak had been keen to espouse upon the output of the factory bays. Somehow – I did not understand the mechanics of it – the Forge created whole starfighters. The armada that fuelled the Sith offensive. I imagined the factory bays to be very large, and no doubt riddled with soldiers. “And address me as ‘my lord’. I am a Dark Jedi, and your superior.”

Oh, how sick those words felt, dropping from my mouth.

“Yes, my Lord.”

Would we encounter any further soldiers? It seemed likely, here in the heart of Darth Malak’s empire. And yet, the corridors remained empty as I followed the marching Duros. It added weight to the military reports I had read, the ones that claimed Malak had more ships than men. Perhaps that was true.

Or perhaps Revan’s famous luck was riding with me.

There is no such thing as luck, Padawan. Master Vrook had told me, time and again, irritated whenever anyone mentioned luck - often with regard to Revan Freeflight. She had been renowned for it, once. The Force’s own luck, at the head of the Republic. Before she turned it against them.

I felt the aversion from Revan, as she inadvertently caught my uncontrolled thoughts once more, but she said nothing. I pursed my lips, and vowed to stop thinking.

The corridor widened as it separated into three. The Duros led me a short way down the left one before it ended in a set of double-doors guarded by a console. He turned to face me, a faint crease in his beryl forehead.
“We are at the docking bay, my Lord.”

Was there confusion in his expression? Puzzlement, as to why he was following me?

I could not risk this failing. Revan was correct, and I had been wrong to doubt her earlier. By any means necessary.

“You shall obey me,” I said, staring deep into his vermilion gaze. “I am doing Darth Malak’s bidding, and you must obey my orders.”

“I must obey you,” he intoned. “I must obey your orders.”

“Open the door, and lead me to a starship I can fly out of here,” I said, willing my voice to snap with authority. “So I can do what I need to, for Darth Malak.”

“For Lord Malak,” he repeated, and placed his hand on a scanner next to the console.

I had the brief impression of a relatively bare docking bay, sleek and cylindrical like the rest of this cursed place. Half a dozen snub-fighters were arrayed on the hangar floor, although there was space for easily twice as many. One section of curved wall was lined with consoles and astromech droids, along with a handful of busy technicians.

And in amongst the ships were at least a dozen crew.

Bluff it out, Revan instructed. Get him to lead you to a snub, un-couple it, and open the docking bay doors.

“Lead me to an available star ship,” I directed the waiting Duros.

He nodded, and strode into the cavernous room. With a fleeting prayer, I followed him.

The silent walk across the glistening floor seemed to take eons. I noticed one mechanic glance our way, throwing a frown of confusion at me. Confidence. Arrogance. Act like you have every right to be here. I forced a glare in his direction, raising an empty fist in a threatening motion.

That had been the last thing the Aqualish had seen.

I swallowed, but held the mechanic’s gaze until he look away, back to the refuelling gig he was working on.

The Duros halted next to the first snubfighter we reached, and turned around to face me.

“Open the cockpit,” I said. These ships were small, one-pilot fighters, but it would be enough for me to escape. Even a starship such as this would have basic provisions onboard. And a true Jedi could last a long time without food or water, if required. “You must un-couple any landing gear locks, and open the bay doors. Immediately.”

“My Lord, what about pre-flight checks?” The Duros blinked, creases of confusion appearing around his eyes. “It is customary to-”

“This is urgent, soldier!” I flared. “I must do Darth Malak’s bidding, and so must you! Deactivate any mechanical locks on this ship, and open both the cockpit and docking bay doors. Immediately!”

“Immediately, my Lord,” he echoed, his voice dull and blank. He turned on his heel toward the wall of navi-computers, while I stood next to the ship, attempting to emulate a pose of supreme confidence.

My fists wanted to curl in on themselves. The slim-line blaster lay heavy in my grasp, and I did not know if that made my appearance any more conspicuous than it already was. And yet, there were no actual soldiers here – just ground-crew going about their business. A rather skeleton ground crew, for a half-dozen ships. This is not a factory bay, though. This might actually work. I can do this, I can.

I glanced back to the starfighter. I did not recognize its make, but I had never paid overt attention to the specifics of starship design. It did not have the same alien look as what I recalled of Malak’s fleet, however.

No, these are Republic cast-offs. Ships assigned to officers for errands or missions, I suspect, Revan murmured. She sounded absent, as if something else was distracting her. You know how to pilot a snub, right?

I have not been in one of these before, I shot back, before comprehending the defensiveness in my not-quite-answer. I sighed. I have run co-pilot many a time before, Revan.

Not quite the same thing, Bastila. Have you ever sat in a pilot’s seat?

I felt my lips pursing. Once. The memory, even a year gone, was still sharp.

…

There was an amber light blinking on the telemetry. Something about the hyperdrive coolant, although the temperature appeared to be within acceptable limits. I could only hope the alien craft would stay alive.

And the passenger strapped into the seat behind me.

I shivered. Horror was still churning in my gut, horror blended with something akin to awe. I could feel her life presence echoing faintly in the Force, a soft spark that was close to sputtering out once more.

And yet, her emotions sang to me. Incandescent rage licking around a core of bitter ice that was cracked through with so much grief. I knew she was close to death, and I knew I should not be sensing her as strongly as I did.

Perhaps it was simply being in the presence of one so powerful, one so dark. Perhaps it was because I still clutched onto the Force so desperately.

It was a mere twelve hour hyperspace journey from Deralian airspace to Dantooine. I had been stationed with an exploratory Republic cruiser, flanked by Masters Kester and Jai’lel. We had not expected an anonymous report from a Sith betrayer, detailing the relatively low defences of the Nexus and her master. Any other time, and I would not have gone. My talents were best used from afar - but this was too great an opportunity to waste.

I did not think Master Kester nor Master Jai’lel would have approved of my actions. This was a chance to remove the Dark Lord from the war, not save her. But, even upon their deaths and her seemingly inevitable one, I found I simply could not walk away.

Mercy was a tenet of the Order, after all. And now... well, Jedi did not kill their prisoners.
And yet, I feared the thought of her waking more than I feared her death.

The Republic would assume my end, when they received news of the Nexus’ destruction. But if I had returned to them, with a comatose Dark Lord instead of Master Kester and Master Jai’lel, then I could predict their subsequent action. And it would entirely nullify my efforts in saving the life of my captive.

My captive. Darth Revan.

Oh, what would Master Vrook say when I landed.

...

With a concerted effort, I pulled myself from the reverie, struggling against a residual dizziness I blamed on the remnants of the jerrikerr-kolto. It was still difficult, at times, to concentrate.

So much so, that it took a moment for me to realize Revan had retreated. There was a definite chilliness resonating from her, and I did not know if she was affronted, or masking a deeper anguish.

I… I am sorry. I did not mean to dwell on that. It could not be healthy for her to witness my past memories of her. It could not be beneficial for her state of mind. Particularly since she was not the same person I had pulled from the wreckage of the Nexus.

That harrowing flight was burned into my recollection. I’d stayed awake the entire journey, on a constant knife-edge of terror that Revan would wake or die under my watch. When the ship had finally exited hyperspace, a thruster warning of the sublight drive had sounded and I had to fight back another surge of unwelcome panic.

I had overcome my weak emotions, and managed to land the craft a little messily in the peaceful starport next to the Jedi Enclave.

I had not known of our Force bond then. I had not seen her memories, merely tasted her emotions without understanding what it meant. I had known my arrival would shock, but I had hoped the Council would consider some path to redemption for her.

Perhaps they would have. Perhaps, if I had never found out about the Star Maps.

And yet, if I had not, then surely we would have no chance against Malak now.

There was a mechanical thunk from near the front of the snubfighter, and an astromech whirred toward the ship, before connecting with the landing gear. I looked over to see the Duros nod at me from the console, before he bent over it again. The small droid beeped in reassurance, and then retreated. It is un-coupled, I realized with a glimmer of relieved hope. We are almost there.

The same mechanic from earlier was staring at me in blatant curiosity, and I threw him another glare with all the haughty anger I could muster.

The mindwipe, Revan’s voice returned, dark and cold. As cold as space. Show me who was involved.

Revan-

I have that right, at least. Show me.
It was a command, granite hard and implacable in its necessity for my answer. I knew it was a bad idea, but after everything, I found I could not deny her. I kept one eye on my biddable Duros, and recalled the past.

...

I stared up at the prone figure floating in the bacta tank, and even now, while lines of sedation forced their way into her veins, I could not quite stop a shiver of apprehension. Not when I gazed upon the visage of the Dark Lord herself.

Her face was colourless, a play in black and white, her skin so pale against the dark crevasses that cut deeply into her cheeks. It was just one more sign of corruption that plainly stated how far the mighty had fallen.

She had worn that ridiculous – and intimidating – mask when I had faced her, when it had just been us two left, battling through the psychic side of the Force-

Why had she abandoned a physical challenge, to fight me where I was the stronger? It still puzzled me, that question. Had it been overconfidence, or merely a desire to test me? I did not know. Revan’s power in the Force was overwhelming, but my talent at twisting beneath her psychic probing had proved to be a match for her. She could not break through my mental shields, and I had begun to pierce hers.

Revan was notorious for changing the game plan, so perhaps she had merely been testing me. Surely she would have switched strategies – had her flagship not been suddenly, dramatically, fired upon. The ensuing explosion whilst we were so heavily interlocked caused a psychic tearing that had ripped our minds apart. I’d had warning – I had heard the proximity alarm, but Revan had been too deeply entrenched in the spiritual side of the Force that was my forte. The one area where I’d had more training than her, and I was able to frantically gather up the loose threads of my floundering mind, even as I felt Revan’s blow completely wide open.

My eyes were still fixed on the limp, naked figure resting in the blue liquid tank. There wasn’t an ounce of fat on the heavily scarred and marked body, just sinewy muscle packed over a skeleton, held in by black and white skin. The Force could burn through a body, I knew that.

Clustered around the medical input console was Master Nemo and Knight Ri’thanok. Ri’thanok had spent his entire life devoted to medical training and physiology, so it was not surprising he was involved with the sedation of Darth Revan, despite it meaning knowledge of her identity.

“I don’t like this,” he muttered to Master Nemo. “The neural readings are too advanced. It shows too high a psychic alertness than should be possible.”

“We already risk cardiac arrest,” Master Nemo replied. “It seems unlikely she is consciously aware of us. Ri’thanok, we cannot increase the dosage.”

“We must do something. The thought that she may have some awareness is not ethical, Master Nemo. We could add tystullinium to the IV. There are no known contraindications with her current dosage, and it will deepen the coma-”

“No,” Nemo refuted. “That will make the Council’s next steps impossible. Thank you for your assistance, Ri’thanok, but you must leave now.”

I felt a slight touch on my arm, and turned to see Master Karon also staring at the bacta tank as Knight Ri’thanok silently left the chamber. Karon, so recently ascended to the Dantooine Council, and all because I had captured her old Padawan.

Karon’s browned face bore an overwhelming grief.

“You always were too reckless,” she said sadly, turquoise eyes fixed on the bacta tank. “Always too quick to jump into situations, without a thought for the consequences.”

“This plan is foolhardy,” a gruff voice spoke from behind. I had been so deep in thought and memory that I had not registered the presence of any new arrivals, not even my own Master. He stepped up to flank me on the other side, also touching me briefly in reassurance. “This poses an unnecessary risk to us all, in particular to Padawan Bastila.”

“Abundantly clear, your views were made,” the raspy, high-pitched tones of Master Vandar filled the room. He, too, hobbled closer. “Reached, the decision has been.”

I looked back to the tank, and sensed the Masters were doing the same. Master Vrook stepped closer, so close he could touch the ferracrystal, his head craned up to glare at the unconscious face of what was now my bond-sister.

“Overconfidence,” he all but spat. “You were always too damnably overconfident. Everyone is fallible. Even you. Especially you.” Vrook spun back to address us, his expression bitter. He had never approved of Revan or Malak, even when they were but Padawans training on a completely different planet. Sometimes, I had wondered if the dislike was personal. “The bond should be severed,” he growled. “Padawan Bastila would survive it, now. Should this mind-link be allowed to deep, it will become both a threat and a vulnerability to her.”

I shivered. The danger was two-fold, here. I was connected so very intimately to the Dark Lord of the Sith herself, and Vrook feared what such constant exposure to the corrupted side of the Force may do to me. But, also, he was concerned about the bond itself – and its inherent vulnerability. For the few histories we had regarding Force-bonds created in such a fashion told us that when one recipient died, the other often did so, too.

Hence the desire to sever the bond in its infancy, before it had a chance to strengthen.

“Padawan Shan has had the risks explained to her,” Master Galdea said, frowning. Lines etched deeply into the Cerean’s elongated forehead as he faced my Master. Galdea was the only one not eyeing over the Sith Lord. Even Nemo was ignoring the medical telemetry to gaze upon the floating body. “The memory that Padawan Shan intercepted led Nemo to the Star Map on Dantooine. It has shown us that Revan’s mind – broken as it may be – holds secrets that can aid us to a victory that has been slipping out of our grasp. We do not know the exact location of the other Maps, and these may prove impossible to find, particularly on Kashyyyk or Korriban. We do not know what the Maps lead to. We do not know what other secrets the Sith Lord may be hiding, but if it gives us a chance against the powerful and foreign armada that Darth Malak now leads, then I believe it is the right path.”

“Everyone should have a chance for redemption,” Master Karon said quietly. “I am, still, unsure if this is the correct course of action.”

“Destroyed, her mind was,” Master Vandar murmured, as he turned to address the Zabrak. Karon’s bright eyes broke away from her old apprentice to gaze down sadly at him. “To be redeemed, one has to be whole.”

“Jedi Knight Revan Freeflight cared for the Republic more than aught else,” Master Galdea added. I realized, then, just how divided the Council could be. They did not generally talk like this in front of me, but due to my connection with Revan I was now heavily involved. “More than the Order, more than her own life, more than her lover Malak. By doing this, are we not helping her redeem herself?”

“A forced redemption is not a true one,” Master Karon retorted, an unusual flash of irritation sparking in her bright eyes.

“Redemption,” Master Vrook muttered. “That’s a wasted opportunity on the likes of her. But I’d rather that, than this ridiculous idea of using an unknown Force sensitive who is on the cusp of death—”

“She does not want life, that one,” Master Galdea murmured. “But her psychic signature is strong, and we can overlay it on Revan’s fractured mind. It will work, underneath the Force skill of the best of us. I am confident, and so is Vima.”

“There is a sort of bitter irony, I will concede,” Master Vrook said, “that the echo of Jen Sahara may live on in the woman who tortured her to death.”

I shivered again. My confrontation with Darth Revan had taken place in the skies above Deralia. After the destruction of the Nexus, Darth Malak had abandoned the Outer Rim planet to turn his focus to the Lannik system. All that remained were a sparse army of Revan loyalists that had not been quick enough to proclaim loyalty to Malak.

Between the nearby Republic forces and a small fleet spearheaded by Coruscant’s Master Kavar, they were able to retake Deralia. There had been survivors; victims that Kavar had transferred to Dantooine before rejoining the war effort.

Some were Force sensitives. A standard Sith strategy was to locate any who held the spark of Force within them, and either send them off for training or break them until they went Dark. In the case of the scholar Jen Sahara, it seemed that someone took the latter a step too far. And whether it was by Darth Revan’s direct hand or not, she still bore the responsibility. It was her program to recruit as many Dark Adepts as possible.

I heard the door behind us open, and another set of footsteps walk over to join us.

“Everything is ready,” the quiet voice of Jedi Knight Vima Sunrider told us. I turned to nod at the striking older human, as always feeling slightly in awe of her presence, despite her friendly demeanour. Knight Vima was less than a decade older than Revan, and on track to become the youngest Master at the Dantooine Enclave. And, given her psychic prowess, she was often granted the same respect and authority as many Masters already.

In an operation that required as much skill and psychic precision as what they professed to do to Darth Revan, they needed the best. Knight Vima and Master Galdea were the best in their field, and Master Karon no pushover herself. I was required for the bond, but Galdea had assured the Council that the Force-link would actually improve the depth and strength of the personality overlay. For I could monitor her in a way that was not normally available.

Knight Vima’s face was blank underneath a mop of bright strawberry blonde hair as she, too, took the time to stare up at Revan’s prone form. How could a naked, lifeless body still seem so intimidating?

Because she has caused the death and destruction of so many.

Vima turned her head, frowning, before her pale blue eyes caught mine. She smiled slightly.
Despite her Knight status, I had spent some time training underneath her as well as Master Galdea—when Master Vrook would permit me. He was, at times, cagey about it. Young Jedi Knights with vast amounts of power—and at a little over forty years, Vrook would consider Vima young—made him wary of the Dark Side. I sometimes wondered if that was why he kept delaying my own Knight trials.

Around Vima, I always felt slightly embarrassed of my Battle Meditation.

For it had been her mother Nomi who, during the Exar Kun conflict, had rediscovered the lost art of Battle Meditation—a powerful Force talent long thought lost to the annals of history. From what I had pieced together, after Nomi’s death the entire Order had held its collective breath as Vima grew up, waiting and hoping that Nomi had passed on her fantastical gift to her progeny.

She had not, although Vima had matured to become a powerful Force user firmly entrenched in the Light. The emergence of my own ability with Battle Meditation had taken everyone by surprise, my own Master included.

“I am ready to proceed,” Knight Vima said.

“As am I,” Master Galdea echoed, rubbing a hand along his sweeping hairless head. “Karon?”

The Zabrak sighed, but did not answer, still staring at her old apprentice with glistening, distraught eyes.

“To do this, we require the skills of you three,” Master Vandar said to her, his voice gentle. “Crucial here, is your history with Revan Freeflight.”

Master Karon nodded. “Let us begin, then.”

...

I pulled back to awareness, to hear nothing but silence from Revan. Did that help, or merely make things worse?

Karon, Galdea and Vima. So they are the ones that did this to me. And Karon is gone, now.

As is Galdea. He was lost on the Endar Spire.

Vima is the only one left.

What are you thinking, Revan? I asked sharply. I understood revenge, oh yes, I only had to think of that schutta who was responsible for Galdea’s death, for the Endar Spire, for everything I was enduring at the hands of Malak-

I sucked in a shuddering breath, and focussed on the Duros. He was still bent over the screen, green fingers tapping commands under my will. Revan, you must know the whole Council decided on the course of action taken.

Vrook didn’t agree.

No, I conceded. He felt the risks too great for me.

He may have been right.

What are you implying? I gasped, suddenly outraged with her. That your intimacy with the Dark Side has corrupted me? How… how dare you!

No! She was taken aback, as if the depth of my anger had surprised her. Don’t jump to conclusions, Bastila. I was merely thinking on Vrook’s observations… for we may be each other’s greatest strength, but we are also each other’s greatest vulnerability, now. Would one of us survive the death of the other?

My fury at her vanished, my emotions flaring into life and snuffing out quicker than they ever had before. Through the bond, I wasn’t sure if Revan’s musings of our link held the touch of wonderment or fear.

I highly doubt it, I answered at last. In fact, I believe I could say with certainty – no. Our connection is too strong, and we are too enmeshed in each other’s thoughts and feelings. There would be nothing to pull one of us back from death, should the other die.

Is Malak aware of this?

No… no, he knows little of Force bonds. In truth, no one knows a great deal about a Force bond such as ours.

He’ll kill you, Bastila. If he finds out it’s a way to get at me-

He won’t find out, I whispered. He’s more powerful than me, yes. I cannot deny him when he rips into my mind- but, Revan, he does not sense what I hide from him. He can only pull out what he is looking for, or what I am overtly thinking. He does not have my skill, nor my experience when it comes to psyche. I felt a puff of air escape my lips, an echo of a bitter laugh. Much like you, really. Although you have always been quick on your feet.

There was a loud humming next to me, and when I looked sideways I saw the cockpit window begin to open. My hope was now burning a fervent flame.

I heard footsteps closing in behind me.

I whirled around to see the mechanic, a frowning Bothan, openly eyeball me up and down.

“I don’t have any departure orders,” he challenged, one hand resting on a cylindrical holster at his waist.

The Force spiked within me, a passionate and furious response to danger, and I surrendered to it. “I am following Darth Malak’s orders, and anyone who disobeys me shall pay the price!”

I felt my power buffet against his mind. Behind him, I saw another two mechanics stop what they were doing to stare at us in open curiosity. The Bothan’s hand dropped away, the same time as I heard a thunk from the snub-fighter. It was ready for me to enter, all I needed now was the interior docking bay doors to open. From there, I could fly out of the airlock.

I was almost free.

“I-I-” the Bothan stammered. But I could see the suspicion rearing in his gaze. One command from him, and everything might be derailed. The Duros had his head down, doing my bidding, and I had no other allies to draw upon.

“Yes, of course,” he muttered, taking a step back, but I didn’t believe him. I could not fail, not now, not so close- You need to compel him-
In an unnaturally quick movement, I lifted the blaster and shot the surprised Bothan in the face.

“Does anyone else doubt me?” I hollered, infusing my voice with as much autocratic clout as I could muster. The Bothan crumpled in front of me, and I would not feel guilt, I would not, I had to get out of here and would do so any way I could-

There was a loud creaking noise as the docking bay doors began to separate, showing the airlock beyond. Adrenaline was sharp and hot in my veins, and this was really going to work-

And then I felt it. A vortex of darkness, honing in on me. A miasma of evil so inherent in this unholy place, but separate and sentient and focused on my location. And moving fast.

My horrified gaze shot to the Duros, who was now staring at the corpse by my feet. The docking bays were still, slowly, opening, but even from this distance I could see the bewilderment on his face. He slowly lifted a hand as if to cancel his last command-

I raised my blaster, pulled on the Force to make my aim true, and fired at him in rapid succession.

Get in the ship, Bastila!

The double doors I had walked through earlier crashed open beneath an immense psychic will, rather than any sort of electronic process.

NO!

I was scrabbling frantically up the side of the snub, if I could just get in and power up the ship, I might still have time-

The cockpit window smashed down with an explosion of shattering transparisteel, and I was flung hard onto the ground below.

Despair blistered through my mind. Mine or Revan’s, I did not know.

I heard the footsteps and surprised yells of scattering mechanics. I felt the ominous presence of Malak overshadow every sense. I tasted the desolation as it once more gained a foothold into my soul.

But I still had hope.

Go. You must go, I ordered my bond-sister in desperation. My free bond-sister, who was stronger than Darth Malak. Block yourself from me, and escape Kashyyyk.

I could feel her thoughts twisting around, trying defiantly to locate some path to triumph from the ashes of our doomed escape attempt. Go, Revan. I will attempt to buy you some time, but you must hurry. And... do not get captured again. I rolled onto my front, shards of broken window crunching under my hands as I pushed myself to my feet. I would not face him from the ground.

I could not bear it if you are captured again.

I swallowed, lifted my chin, and turned around. With every ounce of self-control I could muster, I once more met the corrupted gaze of the Dark Lord of the Sith.

There was a pleased look in his poisoned yellow eyes.

“My dear Bastila,” he murmured. He stalked closer, the smooth stride of a loth-cat homing in on its prey. “I did wonder how long it would take for you to launch a futile escape attempt.”
There was a low thrumming of mechanical laughter from his vocabulator.

_Bastila_

_Go! Sith’s blood, Revan, go!_

“You did well, little one,” he murmured, coming to a stop in front of me. His gaze bored into mine, and I felt my teeth clenching. “But I cannot have you kill any more of my men.”

I felt the shroud of Force come down between us, the disconnect of Revan’s presence beneath a shield, and, once more, I was alone.

But she was free, and she would find me. If I could only give her some time-

“I will never stop trying, Malak!” I hissed. “You shall not break me. You shall not turn me!”

“Such passion!” he taunted. He stepped closer, so close I could feel a wave of heat rolling from him, so close he towered over me like a sentinel of darkness, eclipsing my vision. “I see the drugs are wearing off. Good. I did not like seeing you so weak, but you had to prove yourself, little one. And you have.”

I did not understand him, and it must have shown in my face. He chuckled again.

“Did you think your room was unguarded by chance? Did you not stop to consider why your door was unlocked, why this wing of the Forge has so few men?” He hummed, his cursed gaze roving over my face. “The Star Forge is powered by the Force, Bastila, and I am its master. I watched every step of yours with interest. I wished to see how far you would go to escape. Would you kill, if needed? Would you even be able to, through Kylah’s poison?”

I took a step back, despite myself. Transparisteel shards cut sharply into the soles of my feet, a reminder of just how close I had come. And yet, it had all been a test-

“A true Jedi does not kill, Bastila,” he mocked.

I felt the rage, then, blaze through the despair that had dogged me since _that schutta_ had rendered me no more than a helpless prisoner. “A true Jedi does not kill _if they can help it_, Malak!” I spat. “There is no law that forbids killing, in the face of danger to oneself!”

“Is that so?” he murmured. “And tell me, dear Bastila, would you kill your old friend Kylah, if you had the chance?”

“I-I-” I would not answer that. Malak knew my thoughts regarding her already. But I had to distract him, for as soon as he discovered the truth of Revan’s freedom, I knew exactly what orders would be relayed to the _Leviathan_. The _Leviathan_, where Kylah was stationed.

I had to buy Revan time, time to leave the Shadowlands and leave Kashyyyk. Perhaps it would only be minutes, but that would be additional minutes on top of the time it took for orders to be relayed, for the _Leviathan_ to move into position. I did not know how far from the _Ebon Hawk_ Revan was, and could only have faith that I might make a difference.

If I was lucky, Malak might even knock me unconscious before discovering the truth. He wouldn’t kill me. Not yet.

He was chuckling again, the same dull mechanical hum I had heard so often. “Maybe, one day, you shall have the chance to face Kylah. I might allow you that chance, dear Bastila, if you continue to impress me.”

By any means possible.

I jerked the blaster up once more, firing before I aimed, simultaneously drawing hard on the Force and allowing the quick power of my anger to flow through it.

The blaster was thrown from my hand in an instant, but I was already focussing on a seismic wave of power, an assault quick and furious enough to draw Malak into fighting-

He stood his ground beneath my blast of power, his yellow eyes crinkling in delight, as one hand raised in a mocking come hither motion.

I felt the scream of frustration grow in my lungs, sensed the desperation when my power could not even touch him, and one fist clenched in furious reaction. The Force swelled, lashing out at Darth Malak like a whip.

His eyes widened, but he was otherwise untouched. “Oh, little one, you have come far. Catch!”

And from his belt, he threw a cylindrical object toward me. I caught it by pure instinct.

I gasped.

My lightsaber.

“I have modified it somewhat,” he purred. “But I believe you have earned it back. Let us dance, Bastila. I am curious to see how you have evolved.”

I cannot refuse. This is a way to buy Revan time. Minutes, or hours, or merely seconds- I do not know what will make the difference.

Behind me and beyond Malak were the deserted snubfighters. The interior bay doors were wide open, now; the only barrier between me and space was the airlock. There was a heavy scent of Peragian fuel on the air, and my bare feet crunched as I slowly side-stepped around the Dark Lord of the Sith.

It was an odd place for a showdown, but I would make the most of it. For Revan.

My thumb flicked on the switch of the hilt I had recovered from a Dark Jedi’s corpse, the one Master Karon had modified on Manaan to suit me better.

A double blade of scarlet bit into my vision.

xXx
Tasharr was waiting for us at the Rwookrrorro waypoint.

“(Zaalbar),” she greeted, as we neared. “(The others have already ascended. I elected to wait for you and your off-world friend who has aided us so greatly).”

I glanced at Canderous, running beside me with an apparent grimace beneath his visor. I did not know the details, of how he had coordinated the breakout of my fellow people from the clutches of soulless Czerka, but I understood that we owed him a debt.

Although, I was highly unimpressed that he allowed Mission into the fracas. The thought of my young friend, down in the Shadowlands, set a growl of frustration growing in my chest, even as reason tried to argue with it. Mission is with Jen. Juhani has left to find them. They will be safe, Mission will be safe.

The thought did not reassure as much as I would have liked. A young Twi’lek cub did not belong amongst the perils of the Shadowlands, no matter her allies.

“(Come),” Tasharr chuffed, motioning us into the basket. I was aware of Canderous’ Mandalorian friend quietly translating behind me. Although, friend might be too mighty a word, judging from the wariness in both Canderous’ stance and scent. I reminded myself that this newcomer was not only a stranger to Canderous, but also a Czerka-hired mercenary. I would be keeping my eye on him.

We moved silently into the elevator. The warm air of the Shadowlands ruffled my fur. Tasharr patted me softly on the shoulder before taking guard, a small blaster pointed outward. I was quick to follow suit.

There were many deadly predators on Kashyyyk, and some of them were winged.

As the lift began to rise, Canderous settled into the side of the basket, his heavy weapon also at the ready. He turned to appraise me silently for a moment, before looking down and pressing a button on his wrist communicator.

It emitted a faint electronic hum as the signal was picked up. Dan of Fett stilled, ramrod straight, like a kath hound bristling to attention. Even Tasharr, facing away into the shadows, had her head cocked with interest.

“We’re headed up to the hairball village in what passes for a lift around here,” Canderous muttered into his wrist.

#:Noted,:# the reply came, and I recognized the voice of Carth Onasi. I desired to hear from Jen, who was with Mission. Jen, who had fired out such dire news not so long ago. Orbital bombardment. To think that we might have brought such danger to Kashyyyk’s surface – and it would be because of Jen’s Star Map, no doubt – sent a shiver of trepidation through me. I had seen
Taris, and heard of what happened to Dantooine. The same could not occur on my homeworld. The sooner the Ebon Hawk left Kashyyyk, the better.

But my debt was to Jen, and my loyalty to both her and Mission. I would travel to Rwookrorro and ensure my father reclaimed what was his, but then I would leave. The life-debt demanded it.

I had accepted the chains of my vow to Jen Sahara, since the words had first left my lips, since the moment Jen had thrown herself into the path of a rancor for my salvation. But my unwilling part in the capture of Bastila Shan added both urgency and shame to that debt. My honour held no recourse but to restore the Jedi, in any way I could.

Never had the responsibilities of my vow weighed so heavily on my soul. Never had I so much to atone for.

Carth Onasi was still relaying information to Canderous Ordo. ::tracking her position, but she’s still not answering me.: There was evident frustration in the human’s voice. ::You should get to the ‘Hawk well before her, assuming you don’t have a tea party with the Wookiees.:"

“Yeah, I hear ya, Republic,” Canderous replied in his drawling voice. “Carpet’s gotta see his dad right, but he understands the urgency. If he forgets, my foot will remind him.”

I huffed at him in irritation, and he threw me a smirk.

::Teethree’s hacked into the Czerka air traffic control. It’s patchy, but there’s preliminary reports of a Sith warship exiting hyperspace in Kashyyyk airspace.::

It starts. The madclaw Sith were here.

“Huh. Jen’s timing was spot on, then.”

::Yes. I don’t have details of the Sith starship, but whatever it is, it emerged directly in the path of the Meridus. Czerka staff are fleeing the starport like scattering gizka at the thought of a firefight in the stars above.: Carth sighed, a gust of air evident over the transmission. ::Not that I blame them, most of these idiots are just office workers with blasters.*:

I might have felt satisfaction at that, of the Czerka plague fleeing my planet, were it not contrasted with the thought of what the Sith might unleash upon Kashyyyk.

“Keep me informed of Jen’s whereabouts,” Canderous said. “She gave the warning, she’ll be taking it seriously. She better.” There was either impatience or irritation in the gravelly voice of my crewmate, but I did not think it was directed at Carth Onasi.

::Stang- I’m going- some hopeful is trying to slice the hatch open:::

Canderous snorted. “Right. I’ll check in soon.”

The shadows were slowly lightening as the lift continued its swaying ascent. I saw Canderous turn to his new acquaintance, this Dan of Fett who had elected not to follow his companions.

“This planet’s getting hot – you’ve heard enough to figure that out for yourself. You’re not getting a ride outta Kashyyyk through me,” Canderous said, in a flat tone. Dan Fett’s helm swivelled to face him. “So you’ve heard of me. Big deal. That don’t mean I’m on the lookout for followers.”

Dan of Fett cocked his head, as if in thought. “Why wouldn’t you give a fellow Mandalorian a ride out of here?”

I did not like the thought of another Mandalorian on the Ebon Hawk. I had become accustomed to Canderous, and grudgingly trusted his loyalty to Jen, but I had heard enough about his kind. Battle was all important to them. Their self-worth was tangled up in their combat prowess, like a kshyyv vine choking an otherwise healthy sapling. I did not think the addition of an unknown extra was a good idea.

Although, I had not approved of three errant leavers from the madclaw Academy on Korriban, and yet they had surprised me. That quiet one, Kel Algwin, even attempted to understand a few basic Shyriiwook greetings – something Canderous had not yet bothered with.

“You’re unarmed, unproven, and I don’t know you from a can of beans,” Canderous snapped. “If you’re a true Mando’ade, you should be resourceful enough to find your own way off Kashyyyk. Besides, it ain’t my command, Fett. I’m not letting a stranger into the midst of our crew.”

Tasharr shifted, her gaze still facing outward, but her attention obviously on the ongoing conversation.

“I’m no threat,” Dan Fett retorted. “I will swear it.” He drew in a breath, and then rattled off a long string of incomprehensible words in what I could only assume was Canderous’ native tongue.

Whatever Dan of Fett spoke, it seemed to silence Canderous for a full minute. I glanced over to Tasharr, before turning my attention back to the brightening umbra.

It was good to see Tasharr again, alive and whole. It was better to see Growwhul, rushing through the Shadowlands, to embrace his estranged mate. To think that Chuundar had separated them, by selling Tasharr into slavery-

He was not the brother I had once known.

“What’s your past, Dan Fett?” Canderous said, breaking the brief quiet. “Where have you been blooded? Were you active in the Wars?”

Dan Fett shifted, as if uncomfortable. His helm turned to point into the gloom, and his posture was stiff under his ill-fitting armour.

“Huh,” Canderous grunted, a considering tone evident in his voice. “So you served under Cassus.”

“He was the leader of Fett,” a cold reply shot back smoothly.

“You sing his battle songs?” Canderous demanded. “You honour his memory?”

Dan Fett dwindled into a silence that had Canderous raising his brows. I found myself staring at them again. Dan Fett may have been facing away from us, and his expression may have been concealed beneath a battered helm, but his lack of immediate answer was telling.

“You said it yourself, Ordo. A true Mandalorian values clan and honour above all else.”

Canderous snorted. “And yet, that’s not a kriffing answer, Fett. Cassus was your clan leader. You owe him your loyalty.”

“I fought in the damn Wars,” Dan Fett snarled, and it was the first real emotion I had heard from the dispassionate Mandalorian. “Cassus Fett would sacrifice anything, clan included, for nothing more than further standing in Mandalore’s eyes. He didn’t do it to win the damn war. He did it for his own perverse pleasure at slaughtering those weaker than him.”

“I know of Cassus Fett,” Canderous said. In contrast, Canderous sounded remarkably calm and unruffled. I had the distinct feeling he was pleased at finally getting under Dan of Fett’s skin. “He was instrumental to our early success. Brilliant, ruthless, and a strategic genius. He was your damn leader. If you didn’t respect him, then you should have challenged him.”

“It’s not always that simple, Canderous Ordo,” Dan Fett said. His hand twitched, ever so slightly, toward his hip. I had thought the Mandalorian was disarmed, but it was possible he had left a concealed weapon on his body somewhere. “I followed an unworthy leader for a lot longer than I should have.”

It would have to be a small weapon. Which did not mean it was not lethal.

“That’s on your own head then, Fett,” Canderous retorted. “You gotta make the choices you can live with.”

With those words, Canderous struck a chord deep within me - for I had made tough choices, too. And while the stigma of madclaw would always lurk upon my soul, at least I had spoken truth.

Claws were a taboo, a throwback from our dark past when Wookiees had not mastered their own rrakktoor. It would have been acceptable had I thrown a punch at my nest-brother, or even pulled out a weapon. But lashing out with claws displayed a rabidity that was unacceptable, that any true Wookiee should have evolved from. A sign of madness from the days before we had found our souls.

I regretted the delivery of my actions, oh yes – but the actions themselves?

Once my words had been spoken, Chuundar would have found a way to exile me, to silence me – even had I kept my claws sheathed. For Father had not believed in Chuundar’s dishonour, not then. And yet, had I the chance to walk back in time, I would not change my words. I would not say differently, and keep quiet against wrong doing.

For I had seen the weight of shame upon Drawwlog’s shoulders, when I had entered Rwookrrorro with Jabakka. Drawwlog wore the aide’s neckpiece with dishonour, and he knew it. His bowed back and slumped shoulders spoke the truth of his feelings, as did his gaze that had not been able to stay on mine for long.

Dan of Fett had turned back to face us, an armoured, anonymous figure whose attention was focussed exclusively on Canderous. “Sometimes, Ordo, it takes a lifetime to figure that out.”

“Well, I was never particularly taken with Cassus myself,” Canderous muttered, shrugging his shoulders in a dismissive fashion. “Sadistic shabuir. He may have led Fett to greatness, but he also damned them to decimation with his actions.”

I did not understand Canderous at the best of times. Only a moment ago he had been praising this Cassus in an attempt to needle Dan of Fett, and now he seemed bored of the conversation. Even after all these years off-world, I still found humans – Mandalorian or otherwise – to be particularly contradictory.

Off-worlders were confusing.

Canderous’ head tilted, as if he were eyeing Dan Fett over from beneath his visor. “Hiding a weapon from the Wookiees is damn idiotic,” he said at last, and I understood my crewmate had not missed that slight, but telling, twitch on Dan Fett’s part. “Look, Fett, I ain’t gonna stop you following me, but I ain’t protecting you either. Get in my way or the Wookiees’, and it’ll be your death.”

“My death, my choice,” Dan Fett muttered. “I need a ride out of here. I’ll see if I can convince you yet.”

A bark of laughter escaped Canderous. “You’ve got balls, I’ll give you that.”

They dwindled into silence; Canderous having said what he wanted, and Dan of Fett with no apparent reply. I could smell the perfume of lottie blossoms as the lift rose higher, the flowery scent of the herbs the Old Ones cultivated in the upper levels of the wroshyrs.

“(We are almost there),” Tasharr said, her head tilting upward. It was noticeably lighter, now. I felt the twist of apprehension in my belly, and wondered what we would find topside. Was Father facing Chuundar, right now?

Surely my brother had lost his support. Surely, my countrymen would now believe the truth.

“(Stay close),” I addressed Canderous. “(You may be attacked on sight if you are not with me or Tasharr).”

“He says we would stick with them,” Dan Fett translated in a neutral tone.

“(And do not interfere),” Tasharr added. Her gaze homed in on the repeating blaster held in the firm grip of Canderous, before moving to trail over Dan Fett’s armoured form. “(This is no business of off-worlders, no matter what aid has come before).”

It would sit in the craw of the Old Ones that we owed so much to an off-worlder. They did not see non-Wookiees as complete souls, not entirely. Most of my homefolk had never left Kashyyyk before, and did not comprehend that honour and dishonour could apply equally to any sentient, no matter their species.

“And we’re to stay out of things, if we don’t want to turn into Wookiee dinner.” Dan Fett shrugged, an air of unconcern once more wrapped firmly about him. His stance had relaxed back into one of casual nonchalance – contrasting with Canderous who was taut with attention and purpose as he kept half an eye on the surroundings. Dan of Fett came across as a detached observer with no recognition of any potential threat to his person.

The basket halted with a familiar grinding of gears, and I heard a wuff of emotion from Tasharr. She had been absent for some time, shackled and enslaved, believing she would never set foot in Rwookrorro again. The despair of that thought must had eaten into her soul, an Old One who had spent more than a century within the same village, not even departing when all her cubs had left the nest.

This would be quite a homecoming for her.

There was a young Wookiee waiting for us, a stolen Czerka rifle held awkwardly in his grasp. I did not recognize him, but judging by the scowl when his dark gaze landed on me, it was not a mutual unfamiliarity.

“(Growwhul asked me to wait),” he rumbled, his attention turning back to Tasharr. “(I know not why you are travelling with these-)

“(Thank you, Kraytrron),” Tasharr spoke over him. Her voice remained mild, but the authority behind it was unmistakable. “(Lead us, and fill me in on proceedings).”

He subsided, with a last glare at the Mandalorians, before falling into step next to the Old One. “(Fighting broke out as soon as Chorrawl breached Rwookrorro with wild stores of Czerka pollution in our sacred Shadowlands. Many doubted him, but I did not. There has been something wrong with all the exiles, yours and Freyyr’s chief amongst them).”

Tasharr inclined her head, as the two strode along the wooden paths that led deeper into the village. Normally, these walkways would be bustling with Wookiees, going about their daily business. Even when I had walked here with Jabakka mere days ago, intent upon reaching the Shadowlands, they had not been as empty as they were now.

But angry howls and fierce roars echoed from deeper within the walls of my home. I could only hope the bloodshed was not too great.

“(Chorrawl was soon overwhelmed, but then Freyyr arrived).” Kraytrron relayed, his long limbs hanging awkwardly by his side as if he did not know what to do with them. He was young, barely out of adolescence, and perhaps that was why I did not recognize him. “(There are many who feel the shame of not acting earlier, Old One. Many who feel the disgrace of keeping quiet).”

“(Let us focus on cleansing our village, Kraytrron. What of Chuundar?)”

“(The Old Ones were mediating at the Elder’s Circle when Growwhul sent me back. Chuundar-)” Kraytrron paused briefly, throwing a suspicious look back to me over his shoulder, “(Chuundar was arguing that Freyyr’s exile has clouded his mind. When I left, I heard Freyyr challenging Chuundar to face his honour in front of the gods).”

I sucked in a large gulp of air. Father had the build of a warrior, tall and muscular and fierce, and he had passed on his physique to Chuundar. But Father had aged in the six years I had been away, and his stint of exile had not done his physical form any favours.

I had noticed this immediately, even when we first reunited, even before Canderous had brought the freed Wookiees down to the Shadowlands.

…”

“There is something ahead,” Juhani murmured, her pointed ears drawing flat against the side of her face. After a brief rest, we were once more on the move.

Travelling through the Shadowlands with Juhani had been companionable, more so than I expected. The quiet that reigned between us did not have the awkward feel to it so common around off-worlders. Both Mission and Jen had a tendency to fill silence with meaningless chatter or superfluous observations.

I glanced sideways at Juhani. She stalked through my world with a warrior’s grace, and easily matched my speed.

“(Is it what you sensed earlier?)”

Juhani shot me a brief frown as she tried to comprehend my words. Something, earlier, had the Cathar halting in alarm; head cocked, eyes roving the gloom, unease wafting from her short fur in acrid waves. She had not explained, and I deduced it must have been the Force. And Jen.
Whatever Juhani had been about to answer was interrupted by a reverberating howl of dissonance further ahead, a challenging warcry of a predator about to attack.

We both froze in readiness as a blurry figure rounded a large chocha bush, running at speed toward us.

He was a Wookiee. His fur was matted with grime and streaked with grey, and I did not recognize him. Obviously enraged at our presence, he closed in on Juhani, an outraised paw ready to strike.

“(Stop!)” I roared, as the Cathar ducked before leaping to the side. The Wookiee turned, and advanced on her again. “(We are not here to fight!)”

But my words had no effect on the stranger. Juhani held no lightsaber in her grasp, and her every step was a calculated retreat, an attempt to allow the aggressor to back down.

“(Off-worlder filth!)” the Wookiee howled, in a voice that was far more familiar to me than his bowed, straggled form.

“(Father!)” I yelled in shock. Oh, I knew that voice, be it calm or raised in righteous anger. “(Father, stop! It is I, Zaalbar!)”

His massive head jerked in my direction. His gaze, furious and near-rabid, was also clouded white with age. I saw the astonishment as it rippled through his face, eking away the anger and replacing it with bewilderment.

“(Father),” I echoed, and strode over with an outreached limb. “(It truly is me. This off-worlder is my ally, and means no harm to either you or Kashyyyk).”

...

Freyyr had listened, then, and his confusion slowly transformed into hope with every word I spoke. For my father had always held steady faith in the gods, and once he was truly convinced that I was there with him in the Shadowlands, he had decided my restoration was a sign of things to come.

Freyyr believed, deeply, that I had returned as his true heir. Even the taint of madclaw did not seem to dissuade him.

I did not know how to tell him that I would not be staying in Rwookrorro.

The centre of my village was a round courtyard of roughly sawn planks, a large area for meetings and the telling of stories. Never had I seen it so full of bodies. Some lay in crumpled hairy heaps, and it tore at my heart to witness bloodshed amongst my own people.

Once, in ancient times, this sight was common. When Wookiees had not control over their rrakktor, and turned claw upon each other.

In the centre of the Elder’s Circle, my father stood facing he who had once been my brother.

My arrival was not unnoticed. Chuundar jerked his head in my direction, a furious scowl of recognition twisting his face.

“(Brother!)” Chuundar roared. “(I should have known this would be your doing. After all this time, you have returned to wreak ruin and disorder amongst our people. Our father named you well, madclaw!)”
A growl emitted from Freyyr. Standing against Chuundar, he looked old and bent with age. “(My second son spoke the truth from the beginning, Chuundar!)”

But there were a group of staunch Wookiees at Chuundar’s back, encircling him in support, blades and bowcasters clapped grasped tight in their paws. Drawwlog stood, shoulders hunched in uncertainty, his gaze pinned on mine as one hand grasped the necklace that proclaimed him Chuundar’s aide. And the eldest of the Old Ones, Jabakka, had a fierce glare turned on my father.

That surprised me.

“(You have been exiled, Freyyr),” Jabakka intoned in a low voice that nonetheless carried over the Elder’s Circle. “(Exile can only be lifted by the true chieftain. Rather than cleansing your shame, you have returned to bring death into our encampment).”

“(Go),” Tasharr murmured from my side. “(The Old Ones are divided, but they should hear from you).”

I glanced back to see Canderous Ordo scowling at me.

“We ain’t got much time, Carpet. If you’re certain you’re heading back to Jen, then get a move on.”

I gave him a short nod, and stalked toward my father. There was a grumbling of discontent as my stride cleared the uneven wooden boards of the courtyard. There were so many memories of this location, evenings spent sampling fermented wasaka-berry juice whilst the Old Ones relayed fables and legends, the preparation rituals of young cubs about to head off on their hrrtayyk, ceremonies of mated ones declaring vows to one another-

And now, Wookiee blood stained the area. Chorrawl, young and fierce, stood over the fallen body of his brother as his glare focussed on Chuundar. Growwhul, standing stalwart at my father’s side, faced off against his fellow Old One, Jabakka. Drawwlog, back bowed with the weight of his treachery, flanked Chuundar.

Brother against brother, friend against friend. All for Chuundar’s ambition.

“(Chuundar has allowed Czerka to dig their poisoned claws into our planet!)” Chorrawl growled. “(He has sold his fellow Wookiees into slavery! Chuundar-)”

“(Off-worlder lies!)” Jabakka roared. He raised an accusatory paw, pointing directly at me. “(Look at who has reappeared, after claiming he would cleanse his shame in front of the gods. He brings off-worlders here, into the heart of Rwookrrorrro, breeding discontent-)”

“(Do you doubt me, Jabakka?)” Growwhul raised his voice into the fray. “(Do you doubt Tasharr, who has spent days shackled in an alien ship, when Chuundar claimed she had been sent down to the Shadowlands-)”

“(I doubt what I cannot see with my own eyes-)”

“(Then come with me),” I interrupted, and all heads turned in my direction. “(All of you who doubt, come with me into the Shadowlands. I shall show you the Czerka lifts that Chuundar allowed. The traps full of dead tach to be processed. The encampments set up by off-world hunters brought here to strip our Kashyyyk of resources-)”

“(This is the voice of a madclaw),” Chuundar sneered, his eyes full of vitriol as he stared me down. “(A madclaw who was proven wrong years ago and should be no more than a ghost now!)”
Next to Chuundar, Drawwlog shuffled uneasily. My eyes turned to him.

“(Drawwlog),” I said, my voice dropping. “(Will you stay quiet once more? You knew, all those years ago, and hid the truth from Freyyr. I see the shame upon you, as you clutch at the baubles around your neck. You betrayed me. You betrayed Kashyyyk).”

He did not meet my gaze. Six long years ago, Drawwlog and Ruubarg had been the ones to tell me of the tach trade, to show me the depth of Chuundar’s greed. But Ruubarg had been cast down by a mysterious illness, and Drawwlog had retreated into denial-

I sucked in a breath. Why? Why had Drawwlog back-pedalled? Unless… unless he was afraid of meeting the same fate? “(How did Ruubarg die?)” I gasped, glancing back to Chuundar. A flicker of emotion tightened his gaze, and I knew the truth, then, with a coldness that grieved me.

“(Chuundar),” I said sadly. “(You killed Ruubarg to silence him).”

A snarl of ferocity ripped from Chuundar, and he broke from the ranks, running forward-

Freyyr was there, but Chuundar was younger and stronger, and one massive swipe from his paw knocked my father straight to the ground.

“(This will end, now!” Chuundar howled, and leaped toward me.

My arms raised in reflex, even though part of me was shocked frozen that it would end this way, with my stronger, older brother coming to strike me down-

And then Chuundar crumpled in mid-air, landing in a broken heap at my feet.

Dazed, I looked up to see Drawwlog, his bowcaster raised directly at where Chuundar had been.

An outpouring of howls erupted into mad cacophony, as I collapsed next to my brother. A charred, blackened hole gaped from the back of his head, and the acrid stench of burnt fur and blood sat heavy in the air. My brother. The grief was bitter, and surprising in its intensity. There was a rumbling in my chest, and I looked up through blurry eyes to see Drawwlog clutched firm in the grasp of others.

Freyyr was next to me then, one hand resting gently on the prone shoulder of what had once been my brother.

“(I have been blind),” my father murmured, his voice breaking. “(I must take part of the responsibility for this).” He breathed in, his gaze meeting mine.

“(It is true, then),” Growwhul said from some distance away. I could only stare at the slowly cooling corpse, as memories of my youth hit me with rapidly increasing emotion. Chuundar, steadying my grip on the first bowcaster I had held. Chuundar, explaining in detail how best to prepare for my upcoming hrrtayyk.

Chuundar, spewing forth lies in the throne room to protect his ambition at the cost of my honour. How had greed wormed its way so deeply into his soul?

“(Ruubarg’s death was no accident),” Growwhul was still speaking, and I glanced up to see him advancing upon Drawwlog. “(The madclaw-Zaalbar spoke truth. Admit it, before us all, you who do not deserve to live, let alone wear the neckpiece of a chieftain’s aide!)”

I heard a shuddering breath from Freyyr, his gaze remaining fixed upon the remains of Chuundar.
He must have known that any reconciliation was impossible, and yet accepting the final outcome was likely the hardest thing either he or I had ever had to endure.

“(Kill him),” Chorrawl snarled. The fur around his neck bristled. “(Or I shall. It is time to wipe this taint from our homeworld!)”

Drawwlog’s weapon had long been taken away, and he hung limply in the grasp of two Wookiees. He sensed his death, a dishonourable one through Wookiee justice, a blood-letting of vengeance-

“(No),” I said, struggling back to my feet. I blinked away the moisture in my eyes. “(No. There has been enough killing).”

Chorrawl’s young face twisted with disgust, but Growwhul merely looked confused.

“(You plead mercy?)” Growwhul questioned. My father struggled to his feet, shoulders bent with grief, as Growwhul continued speaking. “(You, who have been dishonoured in part due to Drawwlog, would speak for him? Surely, you must understand that someone so unworthy cannot be allowed to live).”

“(I plead exile),” I spoke to Growwhul, but I was barely cognizant of the words as they tumbled from my mouth. “(One thing I have learned is that honour can come after dishonour. Drawwlog has long felt his shame. I smell it on him. Allow him the grace of seeking his own death in the Shadowlands, of appeasing his crimes in the eyes of the gods).”

How much the gods listened to us I did not know anymore. But it did not feel right to stand back while yet another Wookiee died by Wookiee hands. And Drawwlog may well have suffered more than I.

“(Exile),” Freyyr whispered. He exhaled, and then his posture seemed to swell with purpose. The rumblings of the crowd had ceased, and all attention slowly turned upon him. The feeling amongst the Wookiees had shifted, and although no one had spoken the words, I knew my father once more held the mantle of chieftainship. “(Both I and Zaalbar have suffered under this punishment unjustly. Perhaps it is time for exile to mean what it once did. Old Ones, what do you say?)”

There were quiet footsteps behind me. “(Your second son speaks with a wisdom beyond his years),” Tasharr said. “(I am in agreement).”

Growwhul’s gaze was fixed on his mate. “(As am I),” he added.

Jabakka sighed, a deep broken sound that echoed across the courtyard. He stood across from me, surrounded by a small group of armed Wookiees that had backed Chuundar. The uncertainty was thick upon them, and they all looked to Jabakka, the eldest of the Old Ones, for guidance. His head bowed. “(I doubt my own counsel now, Freyyr. I am an old Wookiee, and this is for the chieftain to say. You… you are the chieftain. Perhaps there is much I have been blind to.)”

Drawwlog’s head lifted, at long last, and he stared at me from across the bloodied Elder’s Circle. “(Thank you),” he whispered. “(I do not deserve this, not from you, but I will take the gift anyway).”

“(Get him away from here, then),” Chorrawl snarled, waving his arm dismissively in the direction of the Rwookrorro waypoint. “(Let Drawwlog find his own end, while we chase the Czerka rot from our planet).”

There was a muttering of agreement from the crowd, and a few figures walked to Chorrawl’s side. He had always been quick to anger, and intensely patriotic in his beliefs. Chorrawl, I felt, would storm the Czerka starport on his own if he had to.

I became aware of a clambering of footsteps, a further group of Wookiees heading toward the Elder’s Circle now that the fighting had ceased. Most were nest-mothers with cubs on their shoulders, or trailing by their feet.

“(You want to attack the starport now?)” Growwhul rumbled, folding his arms as he stared down Chorrawl. “(We have wounded to heal, and dead to mourn. Czerka will still be here tomorrow).”

Drawwlog passed me, flanked by two armed guards, as he went to meet his fate. He met my gaze, but spoke nothing more. There was not anything more to say. In the end, his actions had spoken for him.

With a nod of respect, he raised his chin, and left the Elder’s Circle.

“(Czerka are back-footed from our escape),” Chorrawl disagreed. “(The bloodlust runs through our veins now, Old One. It is time to strike).”

“(There are many who did not escape the starport),” Tasharr added. “(Their bodies lie in territory that Czerka have claimed as theirs).”

It surprised me, that Tasharr would offer an opinion against her mate. But Growwhul had not endured what Tasharr and Chorrawl had, the indignity and despair of impending slavery.

“(Zaalbar, my second son),” Freyyr intoned, his voice loud and clear. “(I would hear your thoughts. You have overcome trials which you should never have had to face. If you had not come back to Kashyyyk - against tradition, against the terms of your off-world exile - then Chuundar would still rule. Some of our people would be condemned to slavery, to an existence worse than death).”

I looked over the rest of the crowd, aware that all eyes were on me. Some held mistrust, some disgust, and some open curiosity. I took in a deep breath, and wondered at what words I could impart.

“(Czerka should not be allowed on Kashyyyk),” I began. “(But you must understand that Czerka Corporation is far mightier across the galaxy than any of you know. We can claim grievance against them, but they were acting with the acceptance of he who was your chieftain).”

There was a shuffling of feet at this. “(Chuundar is not our leader now, Zaalbar),” Freyyr said. “(Slavery has always been an abomination, and Czerka defiled our laws when they partook in this practice).”

“(They are filth we must scrape off),” Chorrawl growled. “(No more honourless off-worlders should be allowed on Kashyyyk, now we have seen first-hand what they are capable of).”

“(I hold no respect for Czerka or their dealings. But not all off-worlders lack honour, Chorrawl),” I said. “(I went to the Shadowlands to find my father, but it was my ally, an off-worlder-)” I halted, throwing an arm backward to gesture at Canderous Ordo, “(who enabled the rescue of our enslaved. And he was not alone. A young Twi’lek cub, who is as dear to me as a daughter, aided him. I have other allies on Kashyyyk, whom I have travelled with, and they may also have played a part).”

I looked around, and did not think I was convincing. Growwhul was frowning in discontent, and I knew the reminder of off-world aid would not be a pleasant one. But how could I make them see? Tarring all non-Wookiee with the same brush was both incorrect and blind.
I turned back to Freyyr. "(Father, I hold a life-debt to a human. Knowing little of me, she saved my life twice, once at great risk to herself. She holds more honour than Chuundar did. Do you not see? Things are not simply black or white, Wookiee or not-Wookiee)."

"(A life-debt?)" Freyyr mused, his forehead bunching. "(Zaalbar, I hear your words, and I can accept that some off-worlders may not be as soulless as we would like to believe. But that does not mean we should accept them on Kashyyyk)."

His openness surprised me. I had thought that Freyyr would rail against the idea of off-worlders having virtue of any sort. "(I am not sure I am advocating that, father. Merely that we should not remain unsighted as to what is out there. The galaxy is large, and there are powerful forces out there)."

"(Then we should do nothing to warrant their interest. But Czerka must be removed from Kashyyyk. The only question is when)." Freyyr paused, before raising his voice to a command that echoed throughout the crowd. "(Zaalbar, my second son. You are my heir now. I believed my eldest child six years ago, as custom dictates, but I was wrong to do so)."

The words were a balm to my battered soul.

"(Your son spoke of a life-debt to an off-worlder)," Growwhul grumbled, and Freyyr’s gaze sharpened.

"(Life-debts are not common, and I have not heard of one given to a non-Wookiee)." My father sighed. "(Perhaps we can fulfil your debt in a material way that will appease your off-worlder’s morality. For, Zaalbar, your place is here in Rwookrorro. The gods have restored you as well as me. Together, we shall reclaim our planet from Czerka, and then you will take your place as my heir)."

It was… tempting, despite my conviction to follow Jen Sahara. I longed for days spent amongst the wroshyrs, away from the pollution and greed that I found inherent on other planets. Jen would release me from the life-debt if I asked. She was not one to hold someone against their will.

But I heard a whisper from someone in the crowd. Madclaw. I may have uncovered the truth of Chuundar’s nature, but I was still struck with disgrace that did not easily fade.

One does not strike one’s own with one’s claws.

"(Father-)

Freyyr moved closer to me, placing heavy paws on my shoulders. Perhaps there was uncertainty on my face, for he seemed to realize I was unsure of my path. "(Zaalbar, you belong here. You have travelled a hard road, and it is now time to come home)." My father’s voice lowered, quiet enough to be a mere whisper between us. "(My son, you were wrong to raise your claws against your brother, but our people will come to accept this as just the wildness of youth. If you leave to follow your off-world ties… Zaalbar, if you leave, I must train another successor. And then, were you to return another day-)

He did not finish his sentence. He did not have to, for I could see the shape of the future he illustrated.

As Freyyr’s only true-blooded son still living, I held first claim to chieftainship. Although this could be challenged by the Old Ones, in general it was not. One only had to look at Chuundar’s reign to see that the Old Ones preferred to counsel rather than dictate leadership.
If I left Kashyyyk, and returned some indeterminate time later, it could cause a schism between those who believed blood should rule, and those who followed Freyrr’s chosen successor. Whoever that would be, it would be a Wookiee who had not left our home for off-world matters, and who did not hold the stigma of madclaw.

“(Stay),” Freyrr murmured. It was half-plea, half-command.

I could see my future. Setting down roots, finding my place once more. Sharing my experiences with my people, and enjoying the solitude that was easy to find on Kashyyyk. This world brimmed with life, pure and dangerous and beautiful, and nothing I had seen elsewhere in the galaxy could compare.

I would be happy. One day, I might have a cub or two of my own. I had never desired chieftainship, but I could set my mind to it and be worthy of the responsibility-

But I would have to forget my debt to Jen Sahara. I would have to ignore my part in Bastila Shan’s capture. I would have to accept a parting of ways with Mission, whom I could not see electing to stay on my homeworld by choice.

The first two, I could only do by compromising my honour. My brother had spent his years doing just that.

“(Father, when I swore my life-debt to Jen Sahara, I meant the words. My own integrity demands I aid her until my vow is fulfilled. I cannot choose any other course of action and hold my head high).”

Freyrr’s gaze was still and black. “(You might spend all your days travelling the stars, Zaalbar. Or, if you do return-)

“(If I do, I would not wish to cause unrest amongst our people).” I knew, then, what I had to do. I had never desired chieftainship, but now the possibility was there, it made the next words difficult. I thought of my brother again, who had spent his lifetime disgracing the position, and knew I could do a better job.

I cleared my throat, and spoke the next words loud enough to be heard by all. “(In the eyes of the gods, I hereby rescind any claim to chieftainship. Honour compels me to leave Kashyyyk, and Rwookrorro must carry the torch of leadership without me. One day, the gods be willing, I will return. But not with any claim to the position of chieftain).”

I heard someone rumble in the crowd. My father closed his eyes, but not before I saw a flash of grief cloud them, and it turned my stomach. My gaze skittered over his shoulder to Jabakka, the Old One who had backed Chuundar and despised my return.

He nodded at me in approval.

Freyrr breathed in a deep gust of air, and turned to address the crowd. “(Listen to my son! His insight humbles me. Truly, Zaalbar speaks with a depth of honour that is rarely heard. I am proud to call him my son).”

He threw his arms around me then, tight, and for a brief moment I was a cub once more, protected and loved by my authoritative father.

“(Take your good judgement with you),” Freyrr rumbled, “(and teach the off-worlders you meet what Wookiee wisdom is. Then, the gods willing, come back to us).”
He released me, and I saw Tasharr had walked closer, with both Canderous Ordo and Dan of Fett trailing in her wake. There was a considering gleam in her eyes as she laid a paw on my shoulder. “(Return to Kashyyyk one day, Zaalbar. You will be missed).”

“(Czerka),” Chorrawl’s intense growl cut through our conversation. “(Every minute we delay is an affront. Let us finish this).”

“It’s time to head out, Carpet,” Canderous grumbled from behind me.

Growwhul frowned at Chorrawl, and looked ready to object, again. The Old One desired Czerka gone from Kashyyyk, the same as every Wookiee still standing in the Elder’s Circle, but he doubted the timing of an attack.

And then I recalled the information Carth Onasi had relayed earlier. My people knew little of the Sith, and had minimal interest in the Republic. Off-world events were of no interest to Wookiees, unless they touched on Kashyyyk directly.

This one might yet. But we could definitely turn it to the advantage of Rwookrorro.

“(Father),” I said. “(There are off-world ships in orbit around our planet. I have had word from the pilot I travel with that a potential fight between Republic and Sith forces is brewing in our skies. Czerka staff begin to scatter in fear of what this might mean. There has never been a better time to capture their starport than right now).”

Freyyr’s expression creased with puzzlement. “(A battle above us? Why would off-worlders be interested in Kashyyyk?)”

If I had time, perhaps I could explain about the Star Map, and the galactic quest the Ebon Hawk had embarked upon at the bequest of a powerful Jedi. But the name Bastila Shan would be unknown here, and the impatience rolling off Canderous Ordo told me that time was a luxury I did not wield. And now that I had committed to my decision, I, too, felt the urgency to leave.

For the Ebon Hawk would only invite the orbital bombardment Jen Sahara had warned of. It must leave Kashyyyk, and so must I.

“(There is a great war being staged across the galaxy, father. Suffice to say that now is our opportunity).”

“(Let us go, then!)” Chorrawl roared. He held a Czerka blaster rifle raised high in his grip. “(Even the madcl- even Freyyr’s son is in agreement!)”

“(You are sure, Zaalbar?)” Freyyr questioned, as a low rumble of readiness grew from the crowd.

I nodded briskly. “(I am, father. But allow me and my ally to lead the way. I have friends and a ship in the starport that cannot be attacked).” I looked back to Canderous again, aware of the murmured translation from his Mandalorian companion.

“I ain’t offered you a place on my ship, Fett,” Canderous warned, aiming a flat look at Dan Fett. “Force the issue and you’ll regret it.”

The armoured Mandalorian shrugged. “I’m not out of time to change your mind yet, Ordo. Besides, if you won’t grant me a lift, then I have to get to the starport to find another ride anyway.”

“(Let us move out, then!)” Freyyr howled, and a chorus of Wookiees agreed. “(Zaalbar will lead us to reclamation!)”
The roar of my people grew to a deafening clamour of righteousness. I motioned to Canderous, took one last, long look around my home, and began the walk back to the Czerka starport.

xx

xx
“Dad. There’s a Jedi at the hatch.”

I looked over at the co-pilot’s console to see the image of a scowling human. Dustil had brought up the vid-feed outside the Hawk’s entrance. It was low-res, but the brown robe and look of annoyed expectation on the stranger’s face was enough to give the impression of someone confident of immediate entrance. If we hadn’t already had to ward off two separate groups of Czerka staff trying to slice in and pinch a freighter they no doubt hoped was empty, I might have opened the hatch.

“Do you recognize him?”

“I’m not exactly best buddies with all the frakking robes, Dad,” Dustil complained. He’d been snarky with me ever since I’d sealed him inside the Ebon Hawk. Although, frankly, after he’d vanished from both the Wookiee village and the Republic freighter earlier, I didn’t feel I had much choice.

I’d thought my son was dead for the last four years. Since he refused to travel with the Jedi, I was going to make damn sure that I at least knew where he was.

“But y’know, the lightsaber in his hand kinda gives it away,” Dustil muttered. I looked again, and saw a deactivated metal rod in the old human’s grasp. The stranger leaned forward, and rapped on the hatch door.

There’s Dark Jedi on Kashyyyk. The thought chilled me, not for the first time. Dustil had, at least, relayed Mission’s comm’d report. Mission, who’d somehow ended up in the Shadowlands captured by Mandalorians. And Jen- who’d been captured by Dark Jedi.

I hated this. Being left topside, with Jen not answering any of my comms, with nothing to do but keep the engines warm and be browbeaten by senior officers, while those I cared about ran into danger and I couldn’t do a blasted thing.

Something had happened to Jen. She’d extricated herself from danger, I understood that much, but something had happened to cause this radio silence. We had the nav data - she’d succeeded in the quest for the Star Map, and that should be reason to celebrate. But instead, all I felt was deep unease.

Why hasn’t she been answering?

Another robed figure, this one less than half the height of the grumpy looking human, hobbled into view of the vid-feed. I recognized that one with a frown. Vandar.

And hadn’t that meeting been fun.

…

The small office in the Republic freighter was enough to give the illusion of privacy, but I didn’t trust the communication link to be secure. Encrypted, yes, through Republic channels. But I’d spent the last few hours being grilled by Commodore Tar’coya, a stony-eyed Sullustan who’d run through my debrief multiple times before thoroughly criticizing every action of mine since leaving Taris. I wouldn’t put it past him to listen in.

The holo-image of Admiral Forn Dodonna was staring at me patiently, awaiting an answer.

I repeated the same words I’d told Tar’coya at least three times. “The last I heard from Jen Sahara, she and Master Zhar had found a contact in the Shadowlands and were on their way to the Star Map. All going well, Admiral, we should have the Map soon.”

::Good. I am sure Tar’coya has relayed your orders, Carth. As soon as the Star Map is located, gather your entire crew and dock with the Meridus.::

“Yeah, I got that, Admiral.” I did my best to sound respectful. Considering my history with Dodonna, it was more difficult than it should have been.

But I’d spent the last few months jumping from one desperate situation to another, while we pulled off the near-impossible. And now, I had a Core-bred Commodore treating me like an incompetent sheltering a group of insurgents one step away from joining the Sith.

And Dodonna wasn’t acting much better.

I cleared my throat. “Of course I will. Admiral, we’re all on the same side. But I’m the only one who’s actually Fleet, here. Mission’s just a kid. Zaalbar’s a damn Wookiee. And Jen and Juhani report to the Order, not the Republic.”

And then there was ‘General’ Ordo. His background made me wonder if that explained the heavy-handedness of Tar’coya’s interrogation. Five years ago, Canderous Ordo would have been imprisoned faster than a Hutt could shovel down a half-dozen juice lizards.

But Ordo was an ally, for all that he annoyed me. Somehow, I felt I had to warn him of the Ebon Hawk’s destination. Somehow, I felt that his reception would not be as warm as it should be, considering his part in everything we had accomplished.

It hadn’t been long since Jen had pointed that out to me herself.

::Carth,:: Dodonna began, her voice gentling. ::This is a Republic mission now. With the capture of Bastila Shan, we must ensure the correct forces are sent after whatever the Star Map leads to. Anything your crew might have learnt in your travels could be vital. A debrief for all is essential.::

Admiral Dodonna’s lined face showed nothing but purpose. And yet… I didn’t know how to say that it wasn’t really my crew. It was Jen’s. Jen Sahara, a mind-damaged Jedi Knight with little recollection of her past.

Maybe I would simply be making my case weaker if I brought that up.

“I’ll get us to the Meridus, Admiral,” I repeated. I sighed, and lowered my voice. “Forn. Why am I here? You’ve trusted me all this time, and my crew’s delivered. Bastila Shan and Jen Sahara have led us all to pull off the impossible. I should be back on the ‘Hawk, not answering Tar’coya’s pointless queries.”

Dodonna’s lips thinned, but she didn’t answer. I leaned forward on the table. “Why is Tar’coya acting as if he’d like to chuck the lot of us in the brig?”

Dodonna blinked, and visible startlement chased the irritation from her face. ::Carth,:: she said, ::
Commodore Tar’coya is known for his less than melodious manner. It is simply the gravity of your mission. We are not unaware of all that we owe you and your crew.

I folded my arms and stared at the holo-image. “Then keep your faith in us. Jen will deliver.”

::The amnesiac Jedi:: Dodonna commented, her tone neutral. There was a vague tightening around her eyes that didn’t surprise me. With the Republic appropriating what had begun as an Order-led mission, there had to be background politics involved. The Fleet brass didn’t like the Order at the best of times, and I couldn’t imagine the Jedi Council being particularly impressed at losing command. ::Your report of her abilities and character is glowing, Captain. Is she as good as you say?:

I could barely recall what I’d relayed back on Manaan, when I was ensconced in the Embassy just after Jen had crashed the ‘Hawk and done a runner. No doubt the tone of my report this time around was somewhat different.

I’d always recognized her competence, well before the depths of her Force powers had been apparent. Now, Jen was less of a wildcard, and a greater leader than Bastila had ever been. I could acknowledge that, and know that my personal feelings were not clouding my judgement. Jen really was that good.

I’d been an idiot to hope we’d have uninterrupted time together on Kashyyyk, I realized, somewhat bitterly. Now, all I longed for was Jen safe, and back next to me.

“She is,” I said. “Bastila started this mission, but it’s Jen who will finish it.”

The door behind me swished open unexpectedly, and I turned around with a scowl.

“I’m not to be interrupted,” I snapped at the newcomer, a uniformed soldier I didn’t recognize. Behind him, hobbled in a short green alien with a walking stick.

“Master Vandar wishes to speak with Admiral Dodonna,” the unknown soldier uttered, in a flat tone I recognized all too well.

“The wrinkled green figure said in a creaky voice. He had sharp blue eyes that fixed on me. “Owe you and your crew much, the Order does.”

“Not enough to leave me alone in a private conference,” I ground out. I heard a sigh from Admiral Dodonna.

::Carth:: Dodonna said quietly. ::We shall speak later. I suspect Master Vandar has his reasons for interrupting::

Perhaps he did, but I was less than impressed.

…

Still, the interruption had allowed me the opportunity I needed to slip back to the ’Hawk.

“I better go see them,” I muttered, getting up from the pilot’s seat. “You coming?”

Dustil scowled, and shook his head mutely. His dislike of the Order ran deep, and I put it down to the years spent training in a Sith Academy. I might be wary of the Jedi, but it was nothing on Dustil’s bitterness. I had hoped that he might find a place with them, find a way to control his powers that had come as such a shock to me.
That didn’t seem likely, now.

I’d seen Vandar a second time, along with a Zabrak master herding Dak Vesser and Kel Algwinn through the starport. They’d dropped by as a final farewell, passed a few stilted words back and forth with Dustil - who’d obviously been itching to head back to the safety of the ’Hawk - and then left Kashyyyk for good. Vandar hadn’t, though. He’d sent Dustil a puzzled look, before hobbling back out of the starport.

I’d felt slightly pensive at the departure of Dak and Kel. It was good to see their second chance turning into reality, but it would have been nice for the rest of the crew to see them off. Better, still, had Dustil elected to join them. I had tried once more, futilely, to convince my son, but all he’d done was shoot me a glare of teenage resentment before storming back into the ’Hawk.

I sighed, coming back to the present. “Okay. I’ll be back in a minute. Let me know if you hear anything on the comm.”

I walked through the empty ’Hawk, sending an inward plea for the safe return of the others, before opening the hatch.

On the loading ramp stood the two Jedi Masters.

“Captain Onasi,” Vandar greeted. His voice was creaky and high-pitched. “Wondering, we were, if you have heard from your crew.”

“I am Master Vrook,” the old human said, in a low voice that hinted at displeasure. His face was wrinkled with age, but his eyes were sharp. “Has Jen Sahara found the Star Map?”

The question was both blunt and forthright, coming from a man I’d never met before. I had no reason to hold anything back from them, and yet, they were the ones who’d let Jen travel down to the Shadowlands with only that Twi’lek master for company. I felt myself frowning. “I report to the Fleet, not the Order,” I hedged. “And I understand our mission is now under Republic authority.”

“Allies, we all are,” Master Vandar murmured in a soothing voice. Despite myself, I felt somewhat calmed. “To aid and to counsel is why we are here.”

Master Vrook cleared his throat. “Any information you impart may help us assist the Republic.”

I felt my shoulders relaxing as I realised they were right. Meddling and annoyng they might be, but this had been a Jedi mission from the outset. And we were homing in on the endgame now. “Yes, she found the Star Map, and I patched through the coordinates as soon as they were transmitted.”

The two masters shared a look; inscrutable, lined faces that seemed to communicate invisibly with one another.

“Travel with Commodore Tar’coya, I shall, to the Meridus,” Master Vandar said.

“Don’t forget our scoutship, Vandar,” Master Vrook warned. “It’s docked by the other tower.”

“Take that, you could, and meet me there,” Vandar murmured. His bright blue eyes appraised the human, whose scowl had etched deep lines into his leathery face. “Needed, we both are, to counsel and to placate.”

“It’s getting hard to bite back I-told-you-so,” Vrook grumbled. “This whole thing was always destined to explode in our faces.”
I didn’t believe they’d forgotten me, but right now I felt like as overlooked as the scenery. On the landing ramp of my own blasted ship.

“Destined, Master Atris’ actions, were not,” Vandar replied. His voice was mild, even as he stood there disagreeing with the human in a roundabout vernacular. “Nor Quatra’s. Free will is ever present.”

“So is a lack of foresight,” Vrook muttered, before expelling a gusty sigh. His gaze shifted back to me. I hoped I looked as unimpressed with them both as I felt. “Go with Tar’coya, then,” he said to Vandar, even as he held my gaze. “You make more sense than I; he’s not known for his sympathy toward humans. I’ll see you there, Vandar. I’ll wait a little longer.”

I felt the vivid gaze of the alien master again. There was something about the green Jedi that made it difficult to remain irritated. I didn’t know if it was a slippery use of the Force, or merely the benign appearance of the man.

“May the Force protect you and your crew, Captain Onasi,” Vandar murmured. “Meet each other again, I believe we shall.”

Without waiting for an answer, the Jedi Master turned and hobbled away. I felt my brows rising as I turned to look at the other master.

“So, Tar’coya’s leaving now?” I asked. “And you and Vandar are heading up to the Meridus?”

Vrook scowled, apparently displeased with my line of inquiry. And that’s where the masters irked me – Karon having been a possible exception. Their counsel and aid was all very well, but their inability to answer direct questions was more than a little frustrating – and hypocritical - at times.

“Darth Malak is a threat to us all. Anything the Order can do to assist, we will,” Vrook growled. “Where’s Jen Sahara? What happened in the Shadowlands?”

I felt a scowl forming on my face, a matching one for Vrook’s. I realized, then, that his name was familiar. He was the master that Jen expected, when we’d landed here. Instead, there’d been that red-skinned Twi’lek, Master Zhar.

“I don’t have the details, but she ran into trouble with Dark Jedi. Might have been better if she hadn’t been rushed down there with only Zhar as an ally.”

The words sparked obvious anger on the old human’s face. “You overstep yourself, Captain. Don’t presume to comment on matters-”

“I’ll presume alright,” I snapped. “Jen’s found herself in danger, yet again, because of all these blasted Jedi secrets. Jen’s had to face the likes of Uthur Wynn with no recollection of any training, and let me tell you that fight could have gone either way. And stars only know what happened in the depths of this blasted planet. If Jen isn’t the luckiest person I’ve ever met-”

“There is no such thing as luck,” Vrook ground out, eyes flashing, angry words cutting over mine. “What of Master Zhar?”

I subsided, then, understanding that Vrook had real concern to be worried, as well.

“He’s with her, I believe,” I said, remembering Dusiti’s recollection of Mission’s report. “They’re safe, and on their way back.”

Vrook’s eyes narrowed. “We felt a disturbance in the Force. I was certain it was Zhar’s end. Are you sure that Zhar is with her, Captain?”

“An old guy with a green lightsaber,” I said slowly. Mission had said that, to Dustil and Ordo. But that had been before Jen’s missive regarding the Sith bombardment. Jen said she’d pick up Mission, like Mission wasn’t with even with her – a contradiction to what the Twi’lek had apparently reported.

Damn, but I hated being left out of the loop.

Vrook sighed, running a hand over a balding scalp. “Not entirely descriptive, is it?”

His grumbling words fired my irritation once more, even if I knew he was correct. But Mission and Dustil were barely more than kids, and non-military besides.

Vrook raised a placating hand, as if sensing my growing ire. “It could be Zhar,” he said. “Or, more likely, it’s Bindo finally emerging from the depths of his hermitage.”

The words were half-muttered under his breath, more to himself than me, I suspected. Not that they were illuminating in any way. But my attention was pulled away, then, by a uniformed figure striding towards us from the control tower.

Jordo. Captain Merrix, now, in charge of the second Republic freighter. I could turn my head and see the Ruby’s Claw, across the chasm of space that separated the Hawk’s landing pad from its neighbour. Jordo’s ship was a Hyperion-class; more frigate than freighter, really, boasting defensive capabilities such as a dual-plated reinforced hull and a particle shield generator. It had a hefty arsenal, too, with rotator laser cannons and proton torpedoes, but the Hyperion-class was primarily designed for transporting troops on a small scale, often into hot combat areas.

Commodore Tar’coya had the same class starship. At roughly four times the size of the Ebon Hawk, the Republic freighters made for an interesting choice as our military escort. No doubt, they could aid in the battle above once we hit the atmo. The only thing the Ebon Hawk could match these freighters on was speed.

Jordo was an old friend of mine from Telos, who’d joined the Republic military young, just like me. It’d been a pleasant surprise to see him here, although we’d barely had a chance to exchange pleasantries let alone catch up on the past. Jordo reported to Tar’coya, and I had the feeling that the Sullustan had been keeping him busy.

“Carth,” Jordo said in greeting, coming to a stop before us both. “Commodore Tar’coya’s leaving to dock with the Meridus.” He slanted a quick look towards the Jedi Master, whose expression had edged back into inscrutability.

“So I’ve heard,” I replied. “Interesting, that, seeing as Tar’coya was adamant he wanted to personally escort me there himself.”

Jordo shrugged, his black eyes fixed on mine. There was a bitter expression on his face, like he was about to swallow something unpleasant. Jordo had been a light-hearted sort, back when we were both Ensigns, young and full of brash enthusiasm to save the world. He’d been a snubfighter pilot as well, same as me, and we’d seen a lot of each other before Telos.

Things changed, after that. Jordo had lost his family, too.

“Well, you know, orders can be fluid,” Jordo muttered, before derailing into a pent-up sigh. “Carth. They’re engaged in full-out battle up there. I guess Tar’coya wanted to be a part of things. He’s commanded me to wait with you until your crew return. But…” he trailed off, staring pointedly at Vrook.

Vrook’s brows raised, and he folded his arms. “Oh, don’t mind me,” he said, in a bland voice.

Jordo rolled his eyes, and in another circumstance I might have chuckled. My old friend glanced at me again, and the burning anger in his gaze surprised me. “Look, Carth, it’s the _Leviathan._” His lips thinned as the words hit like a hammer to the heart. “Up there, firing on the _Meridus_. I thought you should know.”

“Karath,” I whispered, closing my eyes. The sick feeling of hatred clenched tight in my gut, and for a brief instant Morgana’s face flashed through my minds-eye. It was indistinct, features faded with the passing of years, and I hated Karath all the more for that.

Admiral Saul Karath, the man I’d spent half a lifetime looking up to. The man who had betrayed Telos to Darth Revan’s forces.

“Yeah. Being grounded like this while that betraying bastard engages our men in the skies above goes against the grain. How far away is your crew?”

“I don’t know,” I admitted. “A few hours, guessing from their last location.” I glanced over to Jordo’s landing pad; a handful of soldiers were milling about his freighter, likely doing last minute checks before take-off. I saw one soldier chase away a uniformed Czerka figure with an upraised blaster. The starport had emptied itself of foreign vessels, but there was still a fair amount of ground personnel and Czerka-paid hunters around. In that respect, the _Ebon Hawk_ was lucky to be flanked by the two Republic freighters and their troops. There were too many hopefuls looking for a quick getaway right now.

It still didn’t make sense to me, why the Republic had sent two large freighters - more suited for transporting troops or prisoners - to escort us back to the _Meridus_. Or why a blasted _Commodore_ was commanding one of them.

“What’s the status up there?” I asked, turning to look up. The branches of the wroshyrs covered near everything bar a small circle of cropped blue. It gave the false impression of security. As I stared, a brief line of light flashed through the sky. On another day, one might assume it was nothing more than a shooting star.

“It’s fairly even, last I heard,” Jordo relayed. “Six squadrons apiece. Karath didn’t know we were here, but it took time for us to rally. The _Leviathan_ came out of hyperspace closer to Kashyyyk than the _Meridus_ was. Dammit, Carth, I could be of use in skies. So could you.”

_Orbital bombardment._ Jen’s words came back to haunt me. The _Leviathan_ had been responsible for Taris, I’d found out after the fact. One of the more impressive ships in Darth Malak’s armada, the _Leviathan_ had once served the Republic Navy, back in the Mandalorian Wars. Back when Saul Karath was still an honourable man, at least on the face of things.

The _Meridus_ was a similarly-sized cruiser with a similarly-impressive past, so it came down to the supporting fleets the two had. With both cruisers wielding interdicting technology, no one would be escaping into hyperspace in a hurry.

The sound of thrusters warming up had us both turning, in time to see Tar’coya’s freighter launching off from the landing pad next to the _‘Hawk_. It looked a hurried exit, as if Tar’coya’s pilot had forced maximum power into the repulsors, and the craft took only a handful of seconds to clear the top of the wroshyrs.
Jordo, when he finally left Kashyyyk, would undoubtedly do the same.

I glanced back to my old friend, to see the lines of age in his face that hadn’t been there last time we’d met. Once, our families had been close. Dustil used to play with Jordo’s little girl, back when the Mandalorians had been the only threat.

It took me a moment to remember the girl’s name. Kala. Jordo’s little girl Kala. So much war. So many ships burned down, that sometimes the golden memories of the past felt like someone else’s life. Like I’d seen too much to ever enjoy a simple existence of family and friendship again.

And then I remembered the soft skin and taut muscles next to me in the pilot’s quarters, the sharp humour that sometimes surprised me into a laughter I thought I’d long lost. The one responsible for the restoration of my son. Damaged but, amazingly, alive.

I still had reasons left to live.

“Jordo, my son’s onboard. Dustil’s onboard,” the words rushed out, and I saw blank shock dash through my old friend’s face. “It’s a long story, and I’d hoped he would go with the Jedi…but he’s here, on the ship with my crew.

“Dustil’s alive?” Jordo gasped. His face had paled. He couldn’t help but think of Kala, who’d been the same age. “Really? Carth- how- you must be ecstatic- where did you find him?”

I remembered searching through rubble, demanding details from demo-bots who scanned for lifeforms under the debris before shifting large chunks of ferracrete to expose the bodies of the fallen. Frantic, horrifying times, as Jordo and I had held out desperate hope for our families.

Morgana had been found with Jordo’s wife – and I couldn’t even remember her damn name – when the bots uncovered them. It hadn’t been much longer after that when they’d found Kala’s little body. She’d always been tiny, for her age.

Tiny limbs, broken and lifeless, just like her mother. Just like Dustil’s mother.

Saul Karath, who was responsible for their deaths, for the surprise attack and wholesale slaughter of our homeworld, was alive and above us right now.

“Dustil was captured by the Sith during the bombing,” I answered, as emotion filled Jordo’s face. He was happy for me, he truly was, but it couldn’t help but bring up the ugly grief of four years ago. We’d seen each other only once or twice since Telos, as he’d taken time out from the Fleet before returning, while I’d thrown myself head-first into anything that would help me forget. “We found him on Korriban. He’s… he’s been through a bit, but he’s alive.”

Jordo nodded, stepping close to clasp a hand on my shoulder.

“Why would you want him to go with the Jedi?” Vrook interrupted. I’d forgotten the crotchety old man was listening in. I didn’t even know why he was still standing there, listening in on two Republic officers’ private business. Vrook turned to stare at the Ebon Hawk. “There is no Force sensitive onboard your ship, Captain Onasi.”

I stared at the JediMaster mutely, realizing that I’d never, in actual fact, seen Dustil do anything with the Force. But even as that thought shot through my mind, I immediately disregarded it.
Vrook sent me a pitying look, as if suspecting the dishonesty of my teenage son, and that did nothing but increase my distaste for the man.

Uthur Wynn had regarded Dustil as his protégé, I’d seen that for myself. And Jen had assured me of my son’s strength in the Force. When it came down to it, I trusted Jen worlds more than some old Jedi who hadn’t even been able to meet her in the starport.

Jordo’s hand dropped as he turned to face Vrook. “Master Jedi, I’m afraid we have Fleet business to attend to. Is there something Captain Onasi or I can assist you with?”

“I thought you were heading to your scoutship?” I added, trying to will the sour tone from my voice. “I’ve already had Czerka try to break into the ‘Hawk. Maybe you should check on your ship.”

“You’re as subtle as a ferracrete brick, Captain,” the Jedi Master groused. “Don’t forget that members of the Order are part of your crew. I desire an update on their whereabouts.”

“Juhani waltzed off – to you and your colleagues - without a communicator,” I shot back. That won’t happen again, I told myself. It was insane that the crew had all scattered, with only two working comms left between them – one of which was never seemingly answered. “Jen hasn’t been checking in, but is on her way back. We’re taking off as soon as they get here. Any debrief will have to wait until we reconvene on the Meridus.”

“I can offer you a lift on the Ruby’s Claw if you desire, Master Jedi,” Jordo said. His voice was light and pleasant. “It will likely be safer than your scoutship.”

Vrook harrumphed. “My ship will do just fine, Captain.” He sent me another hard stare, before muttering something about the Force under his breath. “Very well. I shall head to the Meridus. Don’t delay your departure, Captain Onasi. Once you have your crew, get them to safety.”

He sent me a brisk nod, before turning on his heel and striding towards the control tower. Jordo’s gaze returned to meet mine, as we both waited in silence for the Jedi to move out of earshot.

“I saw that look on your face,” Jordo said, the side of his mouth quirking. “I thought you were going to have a go at him.”

“I can hold my tongue,” I muttered, wondering inwardly how true it was. There was too much at stake here. After years of having nothing left to live for other than shooting down enemy ships, now I found myself in the thick of war with those I cared about in danger. Dustil. Jen. Mission.

The electronic hiss of the hatch opening behind us forestalled whatever reply Jordo was about to make. I spun, to see Dustil in the entrance of the ‘Hawk, shooting me an uncertain look before walking closer.

“Dustil,” Jordo hissed behind me, his voice shot through with awe as if he hadn’t quite believed my words. “Stang. It really is true.”

Dustil blinked, the surprise of recognition widening his eyes, before his attention homed back in on me. He’d always been a bit on the reserved side, but his years on Korriban had added layers of wariness. Once, he would have walked over to Jordo and given the man a hug.

“I’ve heard from the others,” Dustil said, all but ignoring Jordo as he stepped up to me. “Ordo’s just left the Wookiee village at the head of a frakking Wookiee army. It sounds like they plan on attacking the damn starport, Dad.”
“What?” Jordo snapped.

“Wookiee army?” I repeated faintly. “Is he still on the comm?” I glanced down at the device on my wrist, but there was no open channel blinking on its tiny screen.

“No, but I’m not kidding around. The Wookiees have had some sort of internal revolt and slaughtered their leader. They want to get rid of Czerka, and Ordo reckons they think anything that’s not seven feet tall and covered in hair is Czerka. He’s half a klick away, and says they’re gonna attack any sent on sight.”

“Blasted primitives,” Jordo muttered, with a xenophobia that surprised me. “Czerka’s been screwing them for years, but to rise up now-”

“Briefly. Jen comm’d in,” Dustil’s eyes met mine again, and I felt an irrational annoyance that Jen had, once more, communicated with someone other than me. It was like she was deliberately ignoring me, which made no sense. And is verging on paranoia. I’ve been away and Jen’s had her hands full - I know enough to understand that. She’s going to lambast me about trust issues if I’m not careful. Dustil cleared his throat. “They’re headed to the Czerka lift, but they’re some distance away. The Wookiees will get here first.”

Jordo swore under his breath. “Carth, I don’t want to waste my men on a bunch of insurgent Wookiees. We need to get your crew on the ‘Claw.”

I blinked in surprise. “What? Why would I do that?”

His dark eyes met mine steadily, even as he shifted on his feet. “My ship’s larger and far better armoured, if there’s some sort of native uprising about to-”

“No,” Dustil interrupted. “Ordo says Zaalbar’s making sure they leave the ‘Hawk alone’.”

Jordo’s gaze flickered slightly over my son, before meeting mine again. “Carth, the Sith know the Ebon Hawk. You fly this thing into the atmo, and all those snubs out there will immediately be targeting you.”

It was true. The signature change on Korriban wouldn’t do a blasted thing here; right now, they’d be on the lookout for anything remotely close to a Dynamic-class. We might not have Bastila Shan onboard, but we were still her remaining crew. We’d still found all the Star Maps, and that must be making Darth Malak edgy.

Would Karath turn his forces from the Meridus, to focus on taking our ship out? He’ll know I’m onboard. Will that mean anything to him, one way or the other?

The Ruby’s Claw would have a better chance at reaching the Meridus. But the ‘Hawk was fast, and manoeuvrable, and it had become home. Not to mention whatever argument I’d have on my hands convincing Ordo or Jen to board a foreign ship. Or Mission, depending on her mood.

I’d get the Ebon Hawk to the cruiser.

“No, we’re staying with the ‘Hawk,” I answered finally.

Jordo turned away to stare at his ship, one landing pad over. His next words sounded forced, and something tightened in my gut. “Carth, don’t be an idiot. It’s safer on the ‘Claw, surely you must-”
“I’ll get us to the Meridus, I have my orders,” I snapped. “You’re escorting me, anyway. Why the sudden urge to get my people onboard?”

Jordo shrugged. “It’s a preference from the brass: if possible, ditch the Ebon Hawk, and transport your crew personally. It would be safer, Carth, you must concede that.”

“But heavy-handed. Dammit, Jordo, this whole things been over the top since we landed. You and Tar’coya, with combat-ready freighters chock full of soldiers, as if the Hawk was going to run through enemy lines. What the heck is going on?”

His dark eyes met mine, then, frowning with puzzlement. Whether it was at my question or the situation itself, I wasn’t sure. “I don’t know, Carth. I thought you’d know more than any of us.”

And, once more, I was struck by the feeling that something of import was eluding me. It was like they expected one of the crew to go rogue. I’d thought it was Canderous, at first – and I ignored the inner voice that told me my veiled warning to him bordered on treason. Stang, I wasn’t going to let his background blind me to what we all owed him.

But this felt excessive – even for a missing Mandalorian general who might one day lead a clan that wasn’t a threat anymore.

If Bastila had still been with us, then maybe it would make sense. Her Battle Meditation was invaluable to the war effort. But she was gone, and I’d already transmitted the Star Maps the moment Jen had sent them.

Jen… she was the only unknown in our party. A previous Jedi Knight with memory loss. Her power had been enough to worry Bastila, at times. And yet, why would the Republic be interested in her? I felt the concern well up again, undercut with irritation, that she still hadn’t made any meaningful contact.

“It doesn’t have anything to do with Jen Sahara, does it?” I said abruptly. Then, it occurred to me that I hadn’t even considered Juhani, who’d fled the Order once to dabble in the Dark Side personally.

Jordo shrugged, his open face betraying nothing of consequence. “All I know is the brass want your entire party. I guess whatever you’ve been doing is critical to the war, huh?”

It was. And maybe that was all there was to it - the Fleet ensuring we were all safely ensconced in their protection now that our destination was clear. And while Juhani’s dark past or Jen’s forgotten one were Jedi business, not Republic – I could understand why they might be concerned.

The stars knew there were enough Jedi who’d fallen in the past, often while on some dangerous mission with the best of intentions.

But my crew were trustworthy, and we’d successfully completed our objective on Kashyyyk.

I hadn’t even had time to dissect the Star Map data, although I’d seen Teethree illuminating a large holo-map in the Ebon Hawk’s common room. I’d briefly spotted the schematic of the alien space station, too. The endpoint. Malak’s cornerstone of power. I didn’t know exactly what it was, yet, but the fact Jen had managed to retrieve the plans was nothing short of miraculous.

A uniformed soldier jogged over to us, her attention firmly fixed on Jordo.

“Captain, there’s reports of debris burning through the atmo. Latest comm from the Meridus states a twenty percent fighter loss on both sides. The Leviathan is close to the planet, and there’s concern that its quad laser cannons will soon be within range,” she said, her voice breathless and rushed. “We think they’re positioning for orbital bombardment. The Ruby’s Claw is ready to depart on your command, sir.”

It struck me hard, every word confirming Jen’s previous warning. Jordo took a deep breath, and looked over to me.

“Get to the ‘Claw, Jordo,” I said. “I know your orders are to escort me, but I can’t leave – not even if fire starts reigning down on the starport.” The urgency was building within me now, sharp and acrid. These quad lasers had reduced Upper Taris to rubble. “I won’t leave. Not without the whole crew. You should be ready to take off – if, if it looks like my crew won’t make it in time.”

There was a dark acceptance on my old friend’s face.

“I’ll stay until the last possible moment,” Jordo murmured. “But I’ll be ready to launch earlier, should I need to.”

He gave me a fierce nod. And behind me, I could hear the awkward silence of my only child. I can’t… I can’t lose him. Not again.

I had to stay. Even if the Meridus couldn’t stop Karath once more engineering the wholesale slaughter of civilians on an unsuspecting planet. And if we did get out of here, the ‘Hawk would be a bigger target – and a more fragile one – than the ‘Claw.

“Wait, Jordo-” I turned, facing Dustil, whose dark eyes gave nothing away. He’d been so silent, I’d almost expected to find him gone, yet again. “Can you take my son?”

I was watching Dustil as I said the words, and saw the outrage ignite to twist his features. “What?” Dustil hissed, his brows slamming down in automatic anger.

“What?” Jordo echoed behind me. “Um, yeah, of course I can-”

“No!” Dustil yelled. “No way, Dad! I’m not leaving-”

“Dustil,” I cut in, and dropped my hands to his shoulders. I felt the insistence well up, the desire for my only child to, this time, actually stop and listen. “I can’t leave. You must understand that, I can’t leave without the others. But I’ve spent the last four years thinking you were dead-”

His eyes were darkening with resentment. “Don’t ask me to do this, Dad,” he ground out. Dustil’s voice had deepened so much, that it still sometimes startled me to hear him talk. “I won’t go. Dammit, you always do this!”

“Please,” I whispered. “Dustil, please, I have to know you’re safe. I lost everything four years ago. It’s the damn Leviathan, positioning itself for bombardment. You said yourself that Jen and the others are some distance away. Look, the Sith know the ‘Hawk, especially after Korriban, when we do launch they’ll be straight on us-”

“Dad-”

“Jordo’s freighter is heavily armoured and can get you to the Meridus-”

“I will,” Jordo promised. “I’ll make sure he’s first in line for an escape pod, too, should the Meridus falter.”

If there was a man I could trust with my son’s life, it would be my old friend who knew the pain of losing a child.

But Dustil’s face had turned to stone, all emotion encased behind a frozen wall of teenage bitterness.

“Please,” I repeated, my fingers digging into his shoulders.

My son tore his gaze away, and stepped back from me. “Fine,” he mumbled through gritted teeth, and I could hear the undercurrent of anger still present. I didn’t care, I couldn’t care, not if it gave him a better chance of survival. “Fine.”

“Son, please-” I sighed. “I’ll see you on the Meridus. Be safe. I love you.”

“I know.” He threw me one last, resentful glare, before brushing past me and Jordo both, and stomping towards the Ruby’s Claw with all the angst he could muster.

There was sympathy on Jordo’s face, but I saw the longing, also, for the child he had lost. “Best of luck, Carth,” Jordo said. “I’m getting out of here now.”

I stayed still, staring at their retreating backs. Dustil turned once, to shoot me an unfathomable look, and didn’t raise his hand in reply to my farewell.

I sighed, heart heavy, and retreated back into the ‘Hawk.

xXx

I only planned a brief trip back to the cockpit; just enough to cast my eye over the nav-screen and locate the others. Ordo was close, now, but Jen was at least a klick away. I tried once more to contact her.

And, again, she didn’t answer.

With a grimace, I ran my gaze over the ship’s start-up diagnostics. The ‘Hawk was refuelled and ready to go, with Teethree patched into the control computer, overseeing pre-flight checks and intercepting any traffic comms. I switched the nav screen to the exterior cam, swivelling it to point to the landing pad’s entrance.

I had no idea what the impending arrival of angry Wookiees would mean for the ‘Hawk, but I wouldn’t do any good in here wearing out the seats.

“Teethree, don’t let anyone onboard who’s not with a member of the crew,” I ordered, as I strode back past him. He whistled at me in reassurance.

Striding back through the ship, I opened a comm channel from my wrist this time. Ordo picked up immediately.

“Dustil tells me there’s a damn Wookiee army headed this way,” I said, unclipping a blaster from my belt.

I heard a harsh back of laughter in reply. ::Yep. The Wookiees ain’t too impressed with off-worlders right now. Get ready to open the hatch, Onasi, we should plan on a quick getaway.::

“Zaalbar’s with you? Juhani?” I demanded, as I opened the exit hatch. The landing pad was empty, now, and I glanced over to the control tower. A couple of figures – Czerka hunters, by the looks – came running at speed up the stairwell that led out of the starport. I frowned as they made a beeline for the control tower’s entrance.

::Carpet’s leading the way, yeah. The Cathar went back for Jen. They not back?:

“No.” The entry doors had shut behind the hunters. The stairwell was important, being the only access into or out of the starport, other than through the control tower itself. The six landing pads dotted around the tower all converged on the narrow stairwell that might allow for two sentients to pass through simultaneously; one, if the being in question were a Wookiee.

All the visible landing pads were now empty, other than mine and Jordo’s.

“They’re less than an hour away,” I elaborated, my attention still fixed on the tower. “Assuming they move fast.”

::Here’s hoping tin-brain caught up to them:::

I felt my mouth twist at the mention of HK. Here’s hoping he didn’t. I wouldn’t be the only one glad to see the back of that psychotic droid.

::Onasi, you should tell your Republic friends to vamoose. The Wookiees will attack them, y’know. Czerka or Republic, they won’t give two craps:::

“They won’t leave until we do,” I muttered. Other than a handful of soldiers standing at attention outside the Ruby’s Claw, Jordo’s ship was ready to leave. Part of me doubted the decision I’d forced on Dustil, and the doubt sat like a block of permacrete in the base of my gut. But I was playing the odds right, I knew I was. The Ebon Hawk would be well-known to the Sith, and should we make it off Kashyyyk – and we would, because, dammit, Jen always pulled through – then I knew that Sith fighters would be immediately dispatched to take us out.

The Ebon Hawk was fast, but it was a smuggling freighter, not an offensive craft. And without the option of hyperspace, our only recourse was to dock with the Meridus as quickly as possible.

Stars willing, we’d all get to the Meridus in one piece, and Dustil would be waiting for me there.

A flicker of movement from the tower caught my eye, and from my vantage point on the ‘Hawk’s loading ramp I had a clear view as a large group of Czerka-clad guards poured out from the double-doors. My frown deepened as I spotted the variety of weapons in their grasp; blasters, rifles – and there had to be about thirty of them, all converging at the top of the stairwell.

::They’re about to have some fun then::, Ordo response was dry. ::I see the starport, Onasi. Be with you shortly:::

“Ordo, wait,” I demanded, as the men spread out into a large semi-circle, guns pointed down to the only possible place the Wookiees could be emerging from. “Stang! Czerka’s had warning. There’s a blasted ambush at the top of the stairs!”

::What? Mand’alor’s balls, how many?::

They weren’t well organized, I could see a duo of Rodians arguing amongst themselves as a Duros waved an angry fist at them. “Thirty, maybe. Weapons aimed down the stairs.”

::I can’t slow down the kripping Wookiees. Watch for grenades and guard our backs, Onasi:::

And the comm switched off. I ducked behind the cover of the ‘Hawk’s entrance, blaster raised, as I kept my eye on the group. They didn’t know I was there – yet. Had Jordo seen this, from the neighbouring landing pad?

He knew some of my crew were with the Wookiees, but I had no way to reach him for aid, not without running back into cockpit and firing off a transmission.

I lifted my blaster, stared down the barrel, and had the back of one hunter fixed in my sights. There was nothing more to do but wait.

I didn’t have to wait long.

There was a yell from afield, followed by the percussive detonation of a frag grenade rumbling through ferracrete foundations. A handful of Czerka guards were flung wildly back from the circle, and the ping of blaster fire started up.

I fired a double-tap into my target. As it crumpled, my aim shifted to repeat the same direct hits on the figure to his left.

The first Wookiees appeared at the top of the stairs, howling in fury as they charged the armed hunters. One Wookiee fell almost immediately, cut down by blaster fire. There was another explosion to the side, ripping through the line of hunters, and my grip moved to focus on my third mark.

More Wookiees were spilling out from the staircase, severely disadvantaged by the waiting guards. A few of the Wookiees didn’t bother returning fire, instead charging the Czerka forces with nothing but rage propelling them.

I spotted Canderous as he emerged, armoured but helmless. His hefty repeater was in his grasp, gutting into the surrounding hunters.

The air was shot through with roars of Wookiee rage as they continued to ascend onto the landing pad. My finger was hot on the trigger, aiming at those closest to Ordo. I had no idea where Zaalbar was, and wouldn’t be able to recognize him through the brawl of hairy muscle and waving limbs. And as more of Zaalbar’s countrymen continued to arrive, one Czerka-clad guard turned tail and sprinted for the safety of the control tower.

A bowcaster bolt from somewhere hit the hunter directly in the back.

Another explosion reverberated through the starport, followed by the sound of shattering transparisteel and crumbling framework. I glanced over to see a gaping maw where the control tower’s double doors had been, and the nearest Wookiee unleashed a howl of righteousness before running directly for the new opening.

It didn’t take long for others to follow suit.

I looked back to Ordo; there were bodies encircling him like dead petals fallen from a flower’s stem. Machinery grasped in both hands, he scanned the area, but neither he nor I had a clear shot at the last main thrust of hunters. There were eight or so of them remaining, firing frantically at an approaching trio of Wookiees that blocked my view.

There was another Wookiee, bounding to Ordo’s side, before gesturing wildly at the ‘Hawk. I recognized Zaalbar with a jolt. He shook his shaggy head, turned, and then sprinted directly to me.

There was still the odd Wookiee clearing the stairs, now all making a direct line for the control tower. I could see the spark of a blaster rifle discharging from an open moisture lock one storey up; a second later, the body was hurled out the window and a furry face was briefly visible.
Back on the ground, Zaalbar was almost upon me, with Canderous following at a pace that wasn’t close to a Wookiee’s. And behind, the remaining group of hunters – four of them, still standing – had gunned down the Wookiees and were backing away from the stairwell and control tower both.

In this direction.

I saw one point a fist towards Canderous, then all four of them turn and raise their blasters. Stang! My eyes widened in alarm, and I made to aim, but Zaalbar was right there, halfway up the loading ramp-

Zaalbar howled something, right in my face.

“Ordo!” I yelled. “Get out of the way!”

Zaalbar’s paws slammed down on my shoulders, shaking them in desperation before repeating the same howl.

“Stang, Zaalbar, Ordo’s in trouble!”

I pulled back, desperate to get out of the Wookiee’s tight grip, as he howled a third time – not registering my words just like I never heard his. The same howl, a low intonation with a lift of pitch right at the end.

I’d heard it a thousand times before. Mission! He’s saying Mission!

“She’s in the Shadowlands!” I screamed. “Coming up the Czerka lift with Jen! Put me down and help Ordo!”

His black eyes widened, and he jerked around, leaping clear of the landing pad with a velocity that could rival a Jedi’s. I had a clear view now; twenty metres away and Ordo was on the ground, rolling to avoid a barrage of blaster bolts that nonetheless thudded into his armoured form.

I was firing immediately, but they were all upon him and Zaalbar was too far away, and an armoured blur of a fifth joined the brawl from out of nowhere-

One went down - I didn’t see how - but Ordo wasn’t moving and the group turned on the newcomer. I steadied my aim and stared through the sights, focusing on a hunter who at that moment caught a flying armoured fist to the face. The hunter staggered back, head jerking unnaturally to the side.

The remaining two opened fire on the armoured figure, who swiftly dropped to the ground at the same time as the one he’d knocked out. But the newcomer wasn’t hit; he was rolling with a surprising speed considering his armour, before coming up in a crouch with a blaster materializing in his grasp.

Laser spat instantly into the two hunters. They fell, motionless. The Wookiee was there then, a howl on his lips, and I had the fleeting thought that guy’s an ally, Zaalbar! but he seemed to realize, ignoring the armoured stranger to crouch down next to Canderous.

I scanned around the landing pad, now empty but littered with bodies from both sides. Black burns defaced the ferracrete near the stairwell, and there was a plume of smoke lazily trailing above the tower’s entrance. To the right, the Ruby’s Claw still sat, dwarfing its landing pad. I could see two Wookiees advancing, bowcasters drawn, and cursed inwardly.

A handful of soldiers stood at attention outside the armoured freighter. It looked like Jordo at the... front, with a gleaming protocol droid taking a step forward. I could only hope the Wookiees would stop to listen, because I couldn’t see them overwhelming a transport ship of trained military with the same ease. Jordo might not attack, but at the first sign of aggression his men would be jumping into action.

I glanced back to Ordo, who was now struggling to his feet with the aid of the armoured stranger. I felt a small rush of relief – for a moment, there, I’d been concerned about his fate. Zaalbar was howling something, before he turned and bolted towards the control tower with a speed that surprised me. He halted only to rumble something to a grey Wookiee emerging from the building, before vanishing inside himself.

Ordo was obviously injured. Limping heavily, despite leaning on his friend, it took them minutes to reach me. As they hobbled closer, I recognized the stranger’s armour as Mandalorian make with a grimace. He was tall, almost as tall as Canderous, but that was partly due to the high-backed helmet that concealed his face and had obviously seen better days. He raised an arm once, to fire at a fallen body at least thirty metres away with unerring accuracy. I could only assume it had been showing signs of life I hadn’t seen.

“Onasi,” Canderous wheezed in greeting. There was a vivid burn along the side of his scalp, but that was the least of his injuries. My pick, judging from his walk, were primarily hits to the legs. Ordo raised the arm that wasn’t leaning on the unknown Mandalorian, and ripped a cracked visor from his face. His grey eyes still gleamed with the blood-lust of battle. “Good shooting out there. Carpet’s gone to get the others.”

I nodded. “How bad are you hurt, Ordo? Can you man the turrets?”

“Easy,” he grunted. “Worst hit is my thigh. Couple of stims and a shot of kolto and you won’t notice the difference behind the guns.”

My gaze moved to settle on the stranger. Light glinted from the anonymous visor. The damn T shape of the Mandalorian helm brought back unwelcome memories. “Who’s your friend?”

Ordo’s head turned, and he appraised the Mandalorian in silence for a moment. “I owe you one, Fett,” he said finally, his voice low. “That was getting a bit hairy, back there.”

_Fett_, I thought with a grimace. The Republic’s least favourite clan.

The armoured Mandalorian shrugged. “You sure took a few down with you, Ordo.”

“I always do,” Canderous drawled. “Still, that was some impressive fighting, in a suit of armour that I’m willing to bet didn’t always belong to you.”

The stranger clipped the blaster onto his belt with one hand, still supporting Ordo with the other. Behind them, I saw the grey Wookiee who’d spoken to Zaalbar wander in our direction. Unarmed, and not an obvious threat, but my grip tightened on the blaster at my side regardless. “Lots of Mandalorians lost their beskar at Malachor, Ordo. Look, I still need a lift out of here. Have I convinced you yet?”

“Really?” I interjected in mild disbelief, following it with a sigh of capitulation. It wouldn’t be easy to contest this, if Canderous agreed. After all, the man had just saved his arse. “Another Mandalorian?”

Canderous swivelled his head to stare at me blandly. “Do I need to mention the three Sithkids, Onasi?”
Fett made a noise somewhere between a choke and a cough. “Sithkids?” he said faintly.

“None of them are with us,” I said, my voice sharp. “Kel and Dak have gone with the Order. Dustil’s joining us on the Meridus.”

Canderous’ gaze sharpened, but he didn’t question further; turning, instead, to face his companion again. “I’ll get you a lift out of here, Dan Fett, assuming our leader doesn’t have an issue with it.”

The Wookiee had drawn level with us, then, at the foot of the loading ramp. Old and bent with age, with streaks of grey dappling his or her fur. The Wookiee howled, a mournful sound, followed by gesticulations aimed at Canderous.

“She’s thanking us for our assistance, and asking that we piss off now,” Dan said, and I blinked in surprise at his translation. So far, the only sentients I’d come across who could understand Shyriiwook were translation droids and the odd Jedi. And Mission, of course, I reminded myself.

“We’re waiting for Zaalbar, and the rest of our crew,” Canderous told the Wookiee. “We’ll be outta here as soon as they show.”

“Don’t attack the Republic ship in the next landing pad over,” I said, causing the Wookiee to stare at me sharply through intelligent eyes. “They’re our escort. They’ll be taking off as soon as we do.”

The old Wookiee chuffed something in acknowledgement, before turning back to Canderous with a look I construed as, strangely enough, gratitude on her furry face. Canderous got the Wookiees free, I recalled, remembering all Dustil had filled me in on. It was Mission’s idea, and Dustil and the droids helped - but Canderous led the charge.

The Wookiee placed a gentle paw on Ordo’s shoulder, causing the grizzled Mandalorian to look wholly uncomfortable. I couldn’t hold back a smirk, and Ordo shot me a quelling glare as the Wookiee stepped away, before she turned and strode quickly back toward the control tower.

I glanced over to the Ruby’s Claw again; there were no flashes of blaster fire just yet, and the burnished droid was between the soldiers and Wookiees, hopefully translating some sort of negotiation.

“Get on the turrets, both of you,” I said, attention snapping back to the Mandalorians. “The skies are hot up there, and I want to be ready to leave at a second’s notice. There’s no telling if falling debris will hit the surface, or if the Sith will begin their planned bombardment. As soon as the others’ feet hit the ‘Hawk, I’m powering up the repulsors.”

I stepped to the side to allow them entrance.

“Turbolaser turrets,” Canderous said, shaking loose of Fett’s hold and limping up the loading ramp. “I take it you’ve fired one before, Fett?”

The armoured Mandalorian nodded in assent. Not an unexpected reply, Mandalorians were known for their space-worthiness.

“Come on, then,” Canderous muttered, entering the ‘Hawk.

I followed the two of them in, shutting the hatch and heading straight to the cockpit. Teethree beeped reassuringly at me as I slid into the seat and flicked the nav console back on. The green dot of Jen’s comm-link blinked at me, closer than I expected, and warm relief unfurled in my gut. She was almost back.
I sent a ping her way, opening up a comm channel for what felt like the hundredth time, and inwardly pleaded for her to damn well answer for once.

::We’re in the lift. We’re not far.:: Jen’s voice shot through the speaker, and my shoulders sagged in gratitude.

“Jen,” I breathed. “Hurry to the ‘Hawk. There’s fighting in the skies, and crazed Wookiees in the starport. Zaalbar’s gone to meet you in the control tower. We’re heading out as soon as you’re all onboard.”

::Noted.:: she answered, and switched the comm off. I frowned at the curt response, but turned my attention to the turbine compressor. It sprang to life underneath my command, whirring in high-pitched expectation. I paused briefly before transmitting a departure message to the Ruby’s Claw - Jordo would rally to leave, now I was - and then flicked open the ship's internal 'comm. “Ordo. You both on the turrets?”

::We’re good to go, Onasi.:: Ordo’s reply shot back. ::What can we expect up there?::

“The Leviathan, with a supporting fleet of snubfighters. Six squads, Republic class I’d wager, rather than the alien craft Malak’s been pushing through the galaxy. This is Karath’s armada, so it’ll be his forces.”

Saul Karath had taken a good chunk of the Republic Navy with him, when he’d followed Revan into darkness and betrayal. I didn’t know how many soldiers who’d once worn Republic uniform still followed Karath, but they’d likely be stationed with him rather than elsewhere in Malak’s fleet.

Admiral Karath had been an inspiring leader, once.

::Right. You told Jen about your orders to dock with the Meridus?::

“I haven’t had the chance, Ordo,” I ground out. “She hasn’t exactly been communicative.”

::Make sure you do, Onasi. It’s her call where we go.::

I frowned at the console. I’d warned Ordo about our destination, and he’d elected to come back to the ‘Hawk anyway. I couldn’t do any more for him.

::Onasi, did you hear me? Make damn sure Jen knows, or I’ll leave the kripping turrets to tell her myself.::

“I’ll tell her,” I answered, as puzzlement chased away my irritation. I was about to say more, when Teetthree whooped loudly behind me. The entrance light on the dash blinked, and I switched the vid-feed to the hatch.

And there, at the top of the ramp, was Jen. The relief that surged through me was nothing short of happiness.

I opened the hatch. I could see Mission, Zaalbar, Juhani, some old robed guy, and – damn it – everyone’s least favourite droid. As soon as they all entered, I sealed the exit and lifted the loading ramp.

“Everyone, get buckled in!” I broadcast through the ship. “We’re about to take off. Jen, get your ass in the cockpit.”

But, as I fired up the thrusters and started the repulsorlifts, it was the unknown old man who slid in next to me.

“What?” I snapped, shooting him an indignant glare. “Who are- where’s Jen?”

“Eh, she bust her arm.” The dark-skinned man leaned forward to stare at the co-pilot’s dashboard, and the artificial lighting in the cockpit gleamed from a balding scalp. I had to fight the urge to slap his hands away. “Don’t you worry about me, sonny, I’ve flown many a ship in my time. ‘Course, that was about forty years ago, but I can’t think tech’s changed too much since then.”

I didn’t have time for this. I scowled, pushed full power into the repulsorlifts, and launched clear from the landing pad. The Ebon Hawk rose vertically through the circular tunnel cut from the foliage of the wroshyrs, and just as the blue sky hit the transparisteel window, I felt a figure thump into the seat behind us.

I canted the Hawk as we cleared the treetops. There was a feminine curse in a language I didn’t recognize, and a thud of someone falling out of the third chair.

“Jen,” I said, my eyes tight on the window. “Get your damn harness on.”

I heard her shuffle, curse again in what sounded like Huttese of all things, and then the click of the safety harness.

On the nav screen, I could see the Ruby’s Claw right behind us. I switched power to the sublight drive, and the Hawk shot up through the sky like a rocket.

“Carth, who else is on this ship?” Jen whispered from behind me. Her voice would have been a welcome sound, had it not been so utterly shocked. It rose in volume on the next words, sharp and high with palpable alarm.

“Who else is on this frelling ship?”

xXx
Hyperspace: VI – part one

Nisotsa Organa:

The muted murmurs of incoming comms filled the air with a background static. Even from the far side of the command deck, I could see a rainbow of warning lights blink from various consoles. Two well-scrubbed underlings raced back and forth across the shiny floor, their only apparent job to relay status updates from the differing fighter squadrons to the grizzled Admiral.

Not that it did much good, with Kylah standing in his shadow, countermanding half his orders with a vicious smirk on her pouting red lips.

“We are still not within striking range of the starport, Karath,” Kylah commented. Her voice was mild and silky, and would have been out of earshot had the Force not augmented my senses. “I am starting to wonder if you are stalling.”

“I obey Lord Malak’s will,” Admiral Saul Karath growled, not even looking at the younger women as he stalked behind a row of diagnostic holo-screens. “I will position the Leviathan for bombardment when I don’t have a Dreadnought-class cruiser on my tail-”

“His orders are clear.” Kylah’s voice changed into a whip, lashing with an authority I both resented and wished to own myself. “Immediate destruction of the Wookiee village and associated starport, Karath. We cannot allow her to slip through-”

“We have closed in as far as possible without ceding a clear advantage to the Meridus,” Karath snapped. “They already destroyed our secondary shields. We cannot deviate from our position any further; we must focus our arsenal on the Republic forces, first. Once victory is ours, then we can turn our guns on-”

An amused chuckle from behind me derailed my Force-focus; my hearing dimmed to within natural levels, and now all I could hear was once more the background hubbub of whispering techs interspersed with the electronic thrum of machinery. Tens of metres away from me, Kylah stood glaring hot malice at Saul Karath, who was now studying a holo-map of the surviving snubfighter squadrons as they encircled the Leviathan and Meridus both.

Technically, Admiral Saul Karath held command on the Leviathan, but Kylah and I were Lord Malak’s envoys. Kylah believed her authority trumped Karath’s. Malak… well, my Master would likely back whoever rode us to victory.

“I do pity Admiral Karath,” a voice drawled. I turned to frown at my compatriot; he was lounging on a plush red sofa pushed up against the wall. It was completely out-of-place in the frakking command centre of the frakking Leviathan. I wouldn’t have put it past Sharlan Nox to be the one who’d actually moved it here. Certainly, the last time I’d been stationed with Karath’s crew, there was no vermillion eyesore taking up space.

“Hmm,” I acknowledged, eyeing over Sharlan’s dangling limbs in silent disapproval. He was an insouciant degenerate, who did nothing for the status of Malak’s top Dark Jedi. But - he was still alive - where so many of us had perished. It was strange, for Sharlan’s sheer laziness and passive apathy should have spiralled him into failure or defeat by now.

One of Sharlan’s pets, a blank-faced Togruta, was kneeling quietly at his side.

Sharlan’s pets creeped me out. Me. The Quiet Death. A general of the previous wars, and a Dark Jedi recruiter for Darth Malak himself. But there was something soulless about Sharlan’s Force-sensitive toys, and the way their eyes never wavered from his pock-marked face.

“Doing the bidding of a strutting harlot is not what Karath signed up for, when he swore fealty to Revan and followed Talvon’s directive.” There was an obvious snicker in Sharlan’s tone. He didn’t feel sorry for Saul Karath; no, he enjoyed every drop of resentment and disgust that the Admiral tried so valiantly to conceal.

Sometimes, Sharlan’s brevity still struck me as odd, even after knowing him for years. Sharlan had been a Revan loyalist, found by her personally just after Malachor, although I never found out the details of how or where. If Sharlan’s personality had not been the very antithesis of a Mandalorian warrior, I may have suspected he had been a rare Force-sensitive Revan had picked up from the losing side.

But Sharlan did not speak of his past. And after Revan’s assumed death, Sharlan and Yudan had been the two Dark Jedi I’d watched with a careful eye, as they bowed knee and swore their lives to Malak.

Yudan had done so with a cold, remote look on his face; Sharlan, an amused smirk.

But still, I had wondered just how true their vows were. And now Yudan – my old friend, my old comrade – must be dead, alongside that smug prick Bandon.

Malak’s latest missive, burning cold with acidic venom, told us of Revan’s escape from Bandon in the Shadowlands. How my Master had found out, I did not know, but he was certain of Bandon’s demise. I could only assume Yudan, too, had faltered. If by some chance Yudan still lived, then he had to be hotfooting it into hiding – if he was simple enough to believe he could hide from our Master’s wrath.

I hoped Yudan was dead. The vague grief I felt at the thought was preferable to the disgust his cowardice would otherwise bring.

Regardless of Yudan’s fate – and surely he was dead, he must be – it meant one thing for certain: only three remained from the fabled Jedi Thirteen.

Revan, Malak, and I.

“You’ll have to choose, you know that, right?” Sharlan said, running a long nail over his black lips. The Togruta’s eyes stayed pinned on his finger, moving back and forth, back and forth. “Kylah will want to step up as Malak’s first apprentice, his Shadow Hand. She’s a bit of a joke, really, but you’ll either have to publicly acknowledge her superiority, or throw a challenge. You never did like outward challenges, did you?”

I scowled into his sickly yellow eyes. “Shades of hypocrisy, coming from you, Sharlan Nox,” I scoffed. “When was the last time you stood up to anyone of note?”

Sharlan laughed, a high-pitched trilling noise that echoed over the shiny command deck. A nearby console tech jerked his head around to stare at us in alarm, before quickly bowing back over his work. “I’m not ambitious, Nisotsa, I never have been. Plucking up hopefuls and delivering them to Korriban is enough for my appetite. But it’s always grated for you, hasn’t it? Such a step down from your glorious past.”

“Enough,” I growled. “Unless you want to make it more, because frankly, I’m in the mood for a spot of violence.”

Sharlan, I could beat. His perpetual habit to bend beneath the will of others surely showcased his weakness. But it was difficult to gauge his strength in the Force. It seemed to undulate, to ebb before spiking at a level he never maintained for long.

Sharlan’s physical appearance was also mysterious. He was human, I was almost certain of it… but there was something almost reptilian about his movement. And his face… it was strikingly pale with a closed slit on either cheek that reminded me somewhat of aquatic gills. He had nothing of the jagged scars of darkness that were more common around long-standing Dark Jedi. Of all people, I knew that the physiology of different sents could react in a myriad of ways to the Force, but I had never heard of Sharlan’s facial deformities.

He was strange in other ways, too. Stars, I’d never seen the man eat, or go to the ‘fresher or even change his frakking robes from that silver-and-rubescent ensemble he pranced about in. Maybe his wardrobe was filled with the same outfit times ten, and he got his kicks from screwing with people. It seemed like the sort of thing that would amuse the chivhole.

But in other ways, Sharlan was just like me. His eyes shone the same acidic yellow of the true side of the Force.

“Oh no, Nisotsa, I am quite content to label you my superior,” he drawled, inclining his head to me.

“In that case, go fly a frakking snub and get out there,” I snapped. “You could actually make a difference, rather than wearing out this ridiculous lounge suite.”

We hadn’t expected a Republic cruiser in Kashyyyk airspace. At first, Karath had assumed it was lying in wait for us, that somehow our communique had been intercepted, and an ambush for the mighty Leviathan was in play.

But no, the Meridus was here for an entirely different reason.

Revan. Just like us, the Republic was here for her. I would have been amused; smug, even, had I not heard the news of Revan’s escape. Again. Frakking again.

Oh, Bandon’s death was a joy to behold, but Yudan’s… had that mind-wiped joke I’d once followed felt anything at Yudan’s death? Yudan, who had been more loyal to her than frakking Malak himself? How had Revan managed to escape? I’d seen Bandon’s taunting little selfie, with her collared and captured in the Shadowlands… how the frakk had she escaped a neural disruptor and defeated both Bandon and Yudan?

It was Revan. If anyone could achieve the impossible, it had always been Revan.

Yet, Kylah assured me that Revan remembered absolutely nothing - that she was just a brain-damaged experiment with the odd flash of power from her past… but I recalled that power. Even the odd flash was behemoth.

Not enough to defeat Malak, though. Not broken as she was.

And not enough to defeat Kylah, Sharlan and I, surely.
“I think I shall,” Sharlan twittered, and I turned back to stare at him in surprise. His black lips were twisted in a smirk, and one long nail was now tracing down the left montral of the kneeling Togruta. “I have some cargo to deliver.”

“Really,” I said flatly. “I didn’t expect you to acquiesce so easily, Sharlan.” I could make the apathetic man bend to my will, but I’d actually expected Sharlan to stay on the Leviathan. With the rest of us.

“I aim to please, Nisotsa,” Sharlan drawled.

My eyes narrowed. “You are running in case Revan escapes Kashyyyk, and we intercept her ship. You don’t want to face a shell of our former Master.”

Sharlan had never had much to do with Malak. He’d gone straight into recruitment, vowing to help Revan build a mighty empire of loyal Dark Adepts. I remembered his first assignment, we’d done that one together. Telos. There’d been quite a crop of sensitives we’d found in the aftermath of the Talvon’s carnage, and surely, I’d thought, the five hopefuls I’d dumped on Korriban would be enough for Revan to send me elsewhere - somewhere more important, more strategic, more frakkling note-worthy.

Sharlan had only brought two boys to the Academy, although I’d known he’d left Telos with four. Oh, I’d known for a long time that he liked to pick up his own personal pets while he was recruiting for the Sith, but I’d never worked out why they survived so very short a time.

“I hold no loyalty to Revan, or the body that once inhabited her,” Sharlan said, his voice patently bored. “But I shouldn’t think she’d pose much of a threat to you and Kylah. Since you appear to doubt my allegiance, let me leave my pet in your care, Nisotsa.”

Sharlan stood, a fluid motion of limbs slowly straightening, and motioned the Togruta to follow suit. With a sensual purr, Sharlan dragged the Togruta closer and kissed him gently on the lips. “Obey Nisotsa in all, my pet. She shall be your last master.”

The Togruta nodded, and turned to stare at me.

“What?” I snapped. “I don’t need one of your cast-off toys, Sharlan!”

“Don’t underestimate this one, Nisotsa. He will obey your commands to the very end, and his power is not inconsequential. Although…” Sharlan shot me a smirk, a thin-lipped indication of his twisted humour. “I don’t believe there is much life left in him, so use him sparingly.”

“Sharlan,” I said in warning. “We may need you here. Be careful you are not disobeying our Lord.”

A razor thin eyebrow lifted in apparent bemusement. I didn’t buy it. “Lord Malak hasn’t ordered me here, dear Nisotsa. But I came anyway, and gave you the gift of an ally to assist. I don’t see how you can believe I am disloyal to our Lord.” He bowed, mockingly, and began to walk away.

The Togruta’s gaze was fixed on me, blank and soulless. “Sharlan!” I snapped. “Wait!”

He stopped, turning to glance back at me quizzically.

“This… this thing,” I muttered, motioning at the silent Togruta. “What is his name?”

Sharlan shot me a puzzled look. “Pet,” he said, before leaving the command deck.

xXx
Forn Dodonna:

“Positive ID on the Ruby’s Claw, ma’am,” a tech engineer said breathlessly. “Illuminating now.”

A blue speck on the massive holo-map flared an iridescent shade, indicating itself as the freighter the technician identified. Its colour switched to green as our mapping OS marked it as a friendly. The Ruby’s Claw was rising from the atmo of the forest planet below, canting to the left of a mass of red specks that formed some of the Sith squadrons.

The enemy’s location between us and Kashyyyk was both a problem and an opportunity. It left the Ruby’s Claw and Ebon Hawk vulnerable to Sith fire before we could reach them; but the flipside was that Karath’s apparent desire to position for orbital bombardment had allowed us an opening to unleash our firepower.

The Dreadnought-class cruiser had taken some solid hits. Our scanners estimated its shields were a quarter down, and there was a hull breach in the Leviathan’s rear - bad enough that Karath would have to take precautionary measures: isolate and seal the part of the cruiser that was no longer air-locked.

The damage wasn’t enough, not yet. The Leviathan was a mighty beast, just like the Meridus.

“Search for the Ebon Hawk,” I commanded, eyes roving amongst the translucent topography outlaid in front of me. Behind, in an arc of consoles surrounding the colossal map that dominated this side of the command deck, sat a dozen of the best comm techs and engineers.

“There.” Commodore Tar’coya pointed a stubby finger at a blue speck that came into view, rear-side of the Ruby’s Claw, and closer to the Sith forces. “That’s it.”

“Rallying, the Sith are.” Vandar hobbled closer, raising his archaic stick to indicate the enemy squadron closest to the Ruby’s Claw. They veered sharply, breaking away from the Leviathan to make a beeline directly for the presumed Ebon Hawk.

Tar’coya had been plenty annoyed I’d allowed Vandar on the command deck. I could understand that – Jedi made most military uneasy, even if I trusted Vandar not to use any of his mind tricks here. The Jedi were on shaky ground, and the first hint of interference would have me booting the lot of them out of any Republic intelligence or command.

That wasn’t the only reason for Tar’coya’s irritation. The passenger on the Ebon Hawk had us all on edge - and Tar’coya didn’t even know it was Revan we were chasing, only that it was a Dark Jedi of some import.

But Vandar was an ally, for all of his secrets. He had a lot to answer for, though. The whole blasted Jedi Order did.

“Imosh, inform the Ruby’s Claw of six incoming bogeys,” I rapped out to the Ensign on my left. “Tell Captain Merrix to keep his latitude parallel to the planet, and send Tau Squadron after him. Get Captain Onasi on the comm for an update.”

The Sith snubs would soon catch Jordo Merrix and Carth Onasi. The Ruby’s Claw would be able to withstand a fair amount of damage, unlike the Ebon Hawk. We’d have to rely on Carth’s superior flying and the manoeuvrability of his craft.

“Positive ID on the Ebon Hawk, ma’am,” the tech from earlier said. “Illuminating now.”

In the periphery of my hearing I could make out Ensign Imosh talking urgently to Jordo over a secure comm channel. The mark Tar’coya had pointed out flared briefly, but stayed the blue of the neutral. Carth was one of us, of course, but our system wouldn’t recognize a modified Dynamic-class freighter with a forged signature as an ally unless we overrode it.

And, frankly, with Revan onboard I couldn’t count it as an ally. Particular when our orders were to capture her – or failing that, kill her once and for all.

It shouldn’t make me uneasy, considering all she had wrought. The orders came direct from the Senate, who’d called a secret emergency meeting directly after the intel drop from Master Atris of the Jedi on Coruscant. Get the Star Map details first, by any means possible. Once complete, capture the war criminal Revan Freeflight for trial. If this proves too difficult, then eliminate her instead.

Gently, gently, seemed to be the best approach. Revan’s power was undeniable, but she didn’t seem to be an overt threat – unless we panicked her. She had panicked on Manaan, after all, when she thought it was a trap.

I’d wanted her on one of our freighters – preferably Jordo’s, as Tar’coya had a tendency to talk down to people, and he knew too much. Revan wouldn’t be able to pick the details from Jordo’s mind, seeing as Jordo knew nothing.

But - as Jordo and Tar’coya had been ordered - don’t force her. Don’t force any of crew. Get them to the Meridus, one way or the other. If that meant travelling on a fragile smuggling vessel, then so be it. I knew I could count on Carth’s loyalty, when it came right down to it – even if the strength of his regard for Revan had surprised me.

It shouldn’t. I knew Jedi Knight Revan Freeflight – not well, but enough to appreciate her charisma. Her drive, and her undeniable power. And it was hard to think of her only as the betrayer who had killed so many and fallen so far. For Revan had once been a hero, and I couldn’t dispel those memories of the Mandalorian Wars, no matter how I tried.

She’s not the Sith Lord nor the Republic hero any longer. Merely a broken Jedi experiment still echoing with her power of old.

More red marks were diverging from defense of the Leviathan to chase after the two freighters. More… all of them, I realized, as my gaze roved over the tactical map. Only a small squad of six remained at the tail end of the Leviathan, a cargo section of the mighty cruiser, exactly where we’d already breached the hull.

Not an important part of the starship, not if Karath had sealed it – and he would have had to.

“Update Captain Merrix and Captain Onasi,” I directed. “Order squadrons…” I trailed off, mind racing.

“This is an opportunity to hit the Leviathan,” Tar’coya advised in his slurring voice. “We only have to worry about the defense turrets, with their snubs ordered away.”

“Overwhelmed, the freighters will be, if aid is not sent,” Vandar interjected. A note of alarm had entered his creaky voice. He had been insistent that Revan could come peaceably - if only the Jedi were allowed to deal with her. He claimed it would be the best, and safest, course of action.

But the Jedi had lost control of her since the Endar Spire perished, and that had been months ago, now. Vandar hadn’t even encountered her. Revan Freeflight was presently a loose cannon, running free and damaged, with the power of a supernova and the predictability of Chaos Theory.
“Karath’s over-extending himself, and this is our chance,” Tar’coya cut in, his large eyes staring at me intently through the holo-map. “The Sith snubs will get to Merrix and Onasi first, even if we do chase them. We could put an end to Karath, to the Leviathan, right now.”

We already have the Star Forge coordinates. If I can take that bastard Karath out, it will be a tangible blow to Darth Malak. In terms of the loss of ships, the loss of Karath, and the loss of whatever Dark Jedi must be onboard.

And if Revan dies because we did not send aid… then my orders are complete, anyway.

It was a sickly thought. Even more so, when I considered Jordo and his hundred or so troops onboard. And Carth.

Yet, sending our snubs after the Claw and the Hawk might not do any good, regardless. And the destruction of the Leviathan had the potential to save a far greater number of lives.

“Direct all squadrons to the Leviathan,” I commanded, my eyes stilling on the six bogeys at the tail of the Sith cruiser. I could send some forces to take them out, but their current position was nowhere near the vulnerable parts of the massive Leviathan, and who knew how short our time window would be before the other Sith snubs would retreat to bolster the cruiser’s defense. “Rho squadron to lead the offensive, and draw the turret fire. All remaining fighters to focus on the Leviathan’s primary shield generator.”

“Admiral-”

I raised a hand at Vandar’s interjection, and part of me was surprised that he quietened. His bright blue eyes stared up at me sadly.

“I must think of the whole picture, Vandar,” I told him quietly. “That is something the greatest of your Order understood, once.”

“Tell Merrix and Onasi to dive back into the atmo,” Tar’coya jumped in, snapping out orders to the comm techs. “They’ll have a host of enemy fighters on them any moment. Any weather event might give them an advantage.”

Kashyykk doesn’t have weather events, I thought, but kept silent. No matter how fast and manoeuvrable Carth’s highly-specced smuggling vessel was, it wouldn’t be able to outrun a snubfighter.

There was part of me that wished Carth and his crew could just vanish into hyperspace. Even if it meant Revan would escape…

…for there were few people I regarded as highly as I had her, once. Carth was probably one of them. And his fate, now, seemed intrinsically linked to hers.

“Comm from Captain Merrix, ma’am,” Ensign Imosh interrupted. “The enemy snubs are within firing range of the Ruby’s Claw.”

“They’ve started,” Tar’coya said, pointing to our squadrons milling near the front starboard section of the Leviathan.

“Rho Squadron is drawing turret fire,” a comm tech updated from my left. “Rho Three is down.”

“Tau Squadron going in for first sweep,” another tech added from the next console across. Six green marks flickered brighter for an instance as they drew into the massive breadth of the Leviathan’s image. I glanced back to the rear of the heavy cruiser, and stilled.

“Comm from Onasi’s co-pilot, ma’am,” Imosh said. “Snubs are flying beneath them and forcing the Ebon Hawk back up.”

The six Sith fighters had disappeared from the holo-map.

“The Ruby’s Claw is reporting damage and asking ETA of assistance, ma’am,” Imosh reported. I was vaguely aware of him turning to look at me in question.

“The Sith snubs from earlier, that stayed behind,” I said in a rush. “They’ve dropped from the map!”

Imosh had a hand to his headset, stumbling over the words as they were transmitted to him. “The Ebon Hawk has taken a hit and is being forced back towards the Leviathan. Most fighter fire is being focused on the Ruby’s Claw.”

“Find the Sith fighters!” Tar’coya snarled in alarm, turning to face the group of techs. “Check all frequencies! They should not be able to evade our scanners!”

We’d never come across cloaking technology that our higher class starships – of which the Meridus certainly counted – couldn’t detect. Until the last year or so. The occasional destroyer, always one of the foreign makes from Malak’s main fleet, vanishing in the midst of battle before reappearing elsewhere, usually just before launching a devastating blow.

Whatever technology Malak had acquired – almost definitely from the weapons factory the Star Maps pointed to – he hadn’t been able to mass produce it yet. But to modify it to fit on some of Karath’s ex-Republic snubs…

“Second sweep from Tau and Phi Squadrons. Rho one is down.”

“Nothing on the scanners, sir,” the first tech replied to Tar’coya’s demand. “We’ve lost them.”

“Comm from Captain Merrix,” Ensign Imosh interrupted. “Their sublight drives are hit! The Ruby’s Claw is switching to repulsors and making an emergency return to Kashyyyk!”

“Follow, the Ebon Hawk cannot,” Vandar murmured. “Or destroy the Ruby’s Claw, the Sith will.”

He was right, and Carth would recognize it too. If he attempted to stay within Jordo’s protection, the overwhelming Sith would finish off the Ruby’s Claw – they might still. As for the Ebon Hawk – it was apparent that the Sith preferred the capture of Revan, but her death would do in a pinch. Both sides were after the same prize.

And we were in no position to aid the Ebon Hawk.

“There’s no choice, we must keep going forward with this,” I said, hearing the terseness in my voice. “Focus all fire on the Leviathan’s shield generator. Hit fast and hard, we must give it everything while we have the chance.”

“The Ebon Hawk is demanding an update on assistance, Admiral,” a female tech intervened. “The co-pilot, er, is a bit rude.”

The holo-map showed it unfolding; Jordo descending in a semi-controlled fashion back into the atmo, and the Ebon Hawk steadily being directed toward the Leviathan. The mass of Sith snubs would be giving Carth no choice, other than instant death. Our fighters were along the other side of the six hundred metre-long cruiser, their attention fixed on the shield generator which must be taking severe damage by now. The only way to give Carth any sort of chance would be to cripple the Leviathan.

“Proximity alarm on section starboard-4 of the Meridus, ma’am!” the closest comm tech cried out in alarm.

“What?” Tar’coya snapped. Vandar, next to him, hobbled closer to frown at the holo-map.

But there was nothing showing. And that section of the Meridus only housed the-

The breath hissed in my lungs. “Get all surrounding turbolasers and ion turrets to cover the gravity-well projectors!”

“Ion missile damage reported, Admiral! The starboard-4 shields are down!”

Some parts of the Republic cruiser had their own shields, for redundancy’s sake. Ion damage could be reversed, depending on its severity-

“Get them back up! Recall-” No, our snubs were too far away. That bastard Karath planned this, drew his fighters away to lure us into all-out attack. He was willing to risk the hits to the Leviathan if it meant he could disable our interdicting technology. Without that, he could make the leap to hyperspace. All he needed was the prize. “Fire all defensive turrets to cover the gravity-wells! Those stealthed bastards are out there!”

“Admiral, the ‘Hawk’s taken a hit. It’ll be within range of the Leviathan’s tractor beam in minutes!”

Vandar motioned with his walking aid. “Turn back to aid, Phi squadron could-”

“The snubs stay on the Leviathan’s shields,” I snapped. “That’s the only way we can help the ‘Hawk.”

There was a hiss from the first tech. “Explosion detected on gravity-well two- and one-”

"Starboard-4 shields are back up, Admiral!" the female tech gasped. "Secondary generator is online and fully functional."

"We've got one!" someone crowed. There was a small flare of light from the holo-map, and six red sparks appeared near the gravity-well projectors of the Meridus. One flickered before extinguishing. "Scanners have picked up the rest, and all turrets are firing at them now!"

"Interdiction is confirmed down," a low voice snapped out from behind a console. The remaining five red marks turned sharply, and began their retreat.

“Ma’am,” Imosh interrupted, high-pitched and loud. “Captain Onasi reports that he’s lost manual control. The Ebon Hawk is… it’s caught in the Leviathan’s tractor beam.”

“Stang!” The curse hissed from my lips, and my eyes closed briefly. Damn Karath’s black soul to the darkest pit in the galaxy. I could not let him escape into hyperspace with Revan Freeflight onboard! And the Leviathan… it was harder hit than the Meridus. We had a distinct advantage, if only I could stop him from fleeing!

“We go after the Ebon Hawk,” Tar’coya slurred. I snapped open my eyes to see him staring at me. “We have five minutes, tops, before the ‘Hawk is docked and clamped, and the Leviathan can escape. If we cannot have the prize, then neither shall the Sith!”

“No!” Vandar exclaimed sharply. “Against us, she will surely turn, if you resort to that-”

Tar’coya scoffed. “I’m not planning on anyone surviving, Jedi-”

“Rho six and Rho two are down! Third sweep from Phi and Tau squadrons. Sith snubs have returned and are engaging Xi squadron.”

“I’ve lost comms with the ‘Hawk!’” Ensign Imosh slammed a fist down in frustration.

“Predict their survival, you cannot-”

“Sensors show shields are down along the _Leviathan’s_ hull, Admiral!” a tech gasped. “The generator is damaged, but not destroyed-”

“The hyperdrive,” I whispered. I knew the _Leviathan_ well, and its schematics were well-studied by our best engineers. For, after all, it had been built for _our_ army. And its hyperdrive was located near the front of the hull. Exposed, and only protected by one of the heavy cruiser’s shields – which were now down. “Focus all remaining snubs on the _Leviathan’s_ hyperdrive generator! On the hull, twenty metres from the bow, near the main inertial compressor! There’s more than one way to thwart a hyperjump!”

The green marks on the holo-map turned to face their next objective. To prevent a leap into hyperspace, we had to land a crippling blow within minutes. On the holo-map, I could see our squads wheeling into action as orders were relayed, and could only hope it would be enough – and I tried not to dwell on the blue speck of the _Ebon Hawk_, being slowly pulled into the _Leviathan’s_ waiting dock.

---

_Revan Freeflight:_

My heart was leaping in my throat and pounding in my ears like a Weequay thunder drum. The last fifteen minutes had been a steady intensification of danger and risk; the hurried departure from Kashyyyk merging into a desperate air battle, with the ‘Hawk outgunned and trapped in realspace, and our only ally – the Republic military escort, who _wasn’t_ my ally in truth – faltering against the superior Sith squadrons.

And if we prevailed, I was headed straight into a Republic trap. Not that _that_ seemed particularly likely, right about now.

Our shields were down to twenty percent. The life-support system blinked a warning about the state of its recirculators. One of the repulsors had been hit. Oh, our hyperdrive was still fine, but fat lot of good that would do with _two_ interdictors blocking hyperspace entry.

And yet, while Carth and old man Bindo did their best against overwhelming odds, I was trapped in the rear seat, hyperaware of the other threat we faced.

_I faced._

Jolee Bindo must have sensed the presence. Juhani, too. Carth had only managed to mutter some vague comment about a frelling _Mandalorian_ slipping onboard after saving Canderous’ life, but then the ‘Hawk’s veering route had been cut off by a waiting squadron of Sith, and Carth’s attention was otherwise engaged.
There was only one person it could be.

No, dung for brains, I immediately slammed myself, it could be dozens… hundreds of Force sensitives, if only they know of my existence. But there was only one I’d encountered on Kashyyyk, who had been in the Shadowlands the same time as Canderous.

The presence hadn’t moved from the turret room and, despite my alarm, I’d been keeping a close eye on the navi-console – what I could see from the rear of the cockpit. Whoever he was – Yudan Rosh, it’s sodding Yudan Rosh, you know it has to be – he had a higher hit rate than Canderous.

He was willing to shoot down ships from his own side, to keep up the façade – and he had to know I’d be aware of him by now.

A warning alarm wailed from the ship’s speakers.

“Stang!” Carth cursed, jerking sideways on the steering column. The ‘Hawk didn’t respond, and I knew the inevitable had finally happened. “We’ve lost manual control!”

Jolee Bindo leaned forward to speak into the comm. “Eh, your aid’s been great, Mr Ensign,” he muttered into the mic. “Send my regards to the brass. The Sith have us like a burra-cod on a hook. You gonna to watch from the sidelines, or actually do something for a change?”

Carth’s hands flew over the navi-controls in desperation. We’d barely had a chance to talk, but when the Ruby’s Claw had floundered, I’d heard clearly where he’d sent his son. Dustil will be okay. The snubs left the ‘Claw alone as soon as we did. It should be able to make an emergency landing back on Kashyyyk.

Our predicament was far more ominous. But - now a tractor beam held us motionless - I could finally move without the g-forces sending me sprawling. The safety harness sprang free underneath the fingers of my good hand, and I ripped through the medi-restraint pinning my off-arm to my chest.

My fingers still ached with a deep, dull pain. What was left of them, anyway. The arm itself would do. It’d have to.

“We have only minutes to come up with a plan.” My words rushed out as I stood, somewhat inelegantly. “Send everyone to the common room. Now!”

Maybe there was some way of turning my unexpected guest into an advantage. I had to think of one, because the last thing we needed was for things to get frelling worse.

I barrelled into the common room, gaze frantically coasting over Zaalbar, Mission and Juhani, all belted safely on the plimfoam benches. Mission was wide-eyed with fright as she nestled close to Zaalbar. Juhani… the fine fur on her neck and arms was standing out in shock. The alarm that surrounded her was palpable, and her gaze was firmly locked in the direction of the turret room. Her eyes snapped to mine at my entrance.

“I know,” I said curtly to her unspoken question. “I have an idea of who he is-”

“Turrets are down,” Canderous grated as he stormed into the room. “We’re kriffed. What’s the plan?”

Behind him, a figure in full Mandalorian armour walked in. Canderous acknowledged his presence with a slight tilt to his head. “This is Dan Fett. I offered him a-”
“Dan Fett.” My words, cold and hard, cut through Canderous’ like a blade sheering through churned frosty cream. My gaze travelled over the high-backed helm that must have belonged to a species with a longer cranium at one stage. “Nice armour. Pick that up from one of the Mandos you killed in the Shadowlands, did you?”

The second the terse words began to leave my mouth, Canderous was already swinging around, interpreting the threat, a light blaster in his grasp-

“Canderous!” I snapped. The Force rallied to me, a storm of power that echoed the darkness lashing around the armoured newcomer. Canderous, for all of his strengths, couldn’t help here. “Hold!”

“Ge’hutuun chakaar!” Canderous cursed, his blaster pointed dead straight at his companion. And Yudan – for it was him, the black aura was clearly recognizable now – crossed his arms and leaned back against the doorway. “You lying shabuir!”

“Let’s all calm down for a moment,” Bindo’s dry voice appeased as he entered the room. I sensed Carth follow him in and stalk to my side, but kept my gaze firmly on Yudan. “A ship in flight ain’t the place for a firefight or a Force wrestle, young pups. Space has a tendency to be indiscriminate with its whole icy coldness and instant suffocation business.”

“I didn’t lie to you, Ordo,” Yudan said, his helmet turning ever so slightly to address the irate Mandalorian. Yudan might sound nonchalant, but his choke-hold on the Force told me otherwise. “Even my name… well, my ma used to call me Dan. And the Fett offered to adopt me once, when I was their prisoner. Dan Fett’s not much of a stretch, really.”

“What do you want?” I hissed, not caring a frelling damn for his justifications. “Give me a reason, right now, why we shouldn’t just kill you.”

He pushed off from the wall, causing Zaalbar to growl from the other side of the room. “I saved Ordo’s life. I shot down a dozen Sith snubs. I didn’t kill you when I had the chance, Jen Sahara. Is that enough for you?” He loosed a short chuckle that was as cold and mirthless as the depths of space. “And you know what I’m after. I told you in the Shadowlands.”

I blinked, finding myself silenced by those words. I hadn’t been in the most stable frame of minds then – truthfully, I still wasn’t, even if I had cobbled together a somewhat shaky framework with which to move forward. Yudan had planned to kill me, I recalled. Bandon had been focused on capture, but Yudan’s drive was to end me, once and for all.

And then, the memory of his words shot through my mind like liquid fire.

I swore to kill Darth Revan. And I will, the first time I see her. She must be inside you still, somewhere.

“I vowed to Ordo I wasn’t a threat to his companions,” Yudan added in a monotone. “I’ll hold to that, for now.”

For now.

Carth cleared his throat, and laid a hand on my arm. “We have a minute or two left,” he murmured. There was an ominous thunk from above as towing clamps settled on the outside of the Hawk’s hull, probably drawing the freighter into a waiting docking bay. Carth’s gaze was darkly intense on mine, and I could recognize the faith he held in me, despite the peril of our situation.

It was a sickening reminder of what he didn’t know.
Screw it all, I need to focus on the situation, and play it out with the hand I’ve been dealt.

“Jolee, throw your ‘saber to Juhani. She can be a double-wielder; you’re a harmless trader who bought a ride off Kashyyyk.” I glanced over to see the hermit raising an eyebrow, before doing as I bid. He was the one person on our ship that wouldn’t be detailed in any crew manifest, which might just give Jolee the advantage we needed. And as for Yudan Rosh…

“We could trade you,” I whispered, staring at him again. “The release of a Dark Jedi, for some of our crew.”

Carth’s grasp on my arm tightened at my acknowledgment of Yudan’s true calling. But even as Yudan cocked his head from behind that sodding anonymous helmet, I recognized the futility of my own suggestion. Yes, because the Sith are known to ransom their men back, particularly those who got themselves caught by the Jedi.

“You could try,” Yudan said mildly, as if content to sit back and do nothing more than observe my next course of action. The dispassionate bastard. Is he just going to watch from the sidelines, waiting to see if I slip the smallest inch towards the Dark Side?

The way things were going, he wouldn’t have to wait long.

“Jen,” Carth urged, a second before the ‘Hawk thumped against something solid. It was a sinister sound. The freighter canted slightly, before thumping again, as if levelling onto a docking platform.

We’ve landed. Sithspit. We’re in the sodding Leviathan. And we’re out of time.

“Right,” I said, half-snarl. “You vowed you’re not a threat? Then you can sodding well help, Dan Fett. You can say you’ve come onboard and overwhelmed us during the aerial battle. Canderous, get yourself properly armed, you’ve defected to his side. The two of you can lead the rest of us out as subdued prisoners.”

“Jen,” Juhani murmured, fixing Jolee’s ‘saber onto her belt next to her own. “I do not think-”

It reminded me, then, of another detail. “Give me Zhar’s damn ‘saber,” I demanded, glaring at the high-backed helm. My good hand twisted Yudan’s lightsaber from my belt, and I threw the hilt at him with force.

He caught it effortlessly, and paused, as if I’d surprised him. But it wasn’t like Yudan could play the part of a Dark Jedi while his prisoner held onto his damn ‘saber. Play the part? How can I gamble that he won’t simply return to his old post? Did he even leave it? A second later, Yudan tilted his head and lobbed a deactivated cylinder back to me. I clipped it on my belt, right next to Karon’s old weapon. Somehow, it seemed fitting.

“Zhar’s lightsaber,” Jolee echoed. His voice was flat and low, and his gaze narrowed as he stared at the armoured Dark Jedi. “After this, you and I are going to have a long talk, sonny.”

And then, a booming message echoed throughout the ship.

The Ebon Hawk is surrounded. Turrets are locked and will discharge in five minutes unless the entire crew has disembarked with their hands clearly visible above their head. Any aggression will result in death.

Mission whimpered. Juhani stood in a fluid motion, her face set and resolute. She gave me a nod of agreement or support, as if waiting for my next command. Canderous muttered something undecipherable, staring down in disgust at the lightweight blaster in his hand, and then strode out of the room. He’s gone to get his repeater, I realized, and maybe a dozen more weapons knowing him. He’d better be quick.

“Jen, this is Karath’s ship,” Carth whispered. There was something in his tone, something dark or tormented that made me glance to him. I’d missed Carth, down in the Shadowlands, and now that I knew the truth…

But I didn’t have the time to lament and wring my hands over just how awful his reaction would be. For the kath crap had well and truly hit the fan, and I needed to frelling step up. I couldn’t afford to be off-guard, or wallowing in emotional angst.

“Karath,” I echoed, racking my mind for details on that vaguely familiar name. Kylah… she’d mentioned him, when she’d sent a missive to Bandon in the Shadowlands. He’s the officer in charge of the Leviathan. But that didn’t explain the look of bitterness etched into Carth’s face.

“Admiral Saul Karath,” Carth said quietly. “I knew him, once. He…”

Carth didn’t finish. He didn’t have to, and I didn’t have the time to find out what caused the hatred I heard underlying his words - much as I wished to. I slipped my good hand into his, and gave it a brief squeeze.

Yudan’s helmet moved, ever so slightly, and I was struck with the uncomfortable feeling that he was staring at our enclosed hands.

“You have four minutes remaining before we open fire on the ship.”

Canderous bowled back into the common room, his heavy repeater slung in grasp. Zaalbar had straightened to his feet, and Mission followed suit, biting her lip. She caught my gaze, then, and slowly moved one hand to motion at her utility belt. There’s spikes in there. She’ll be frisked, but if she can hide one…

I gave her the smallest of nods, but my faith wasn’t there. For no matter how I looked at it, our prospects were dire.

I couldn’t trust Yudan. Stars, I’d be hard-pressed to think of anyone I trusted less. He could very well turn around and betray Canderous. As for the rest of the crew, our options were limited. A Wookiee’s strength wouldn’t be underestimated by Sith forces - I couldn’t see how Zaalbar could break himself free against such overwhelming odds. Mission was a great stealth op, for a fifteen year old Twi’lek urchin. But even if she managed to sneak away a tech spike, I had the feeling the Leviathan’s security was more than one step up from slicing into apartments back on Taris. Juhani was a known Force user; like me, she’d be neutralized first. And Carth was too damn famous to be anything other than heavily guarded.

We were pinning our hopes on Jolee Bindo – who’d followed me back to the ‘Hawk like a bad smell on Kashyyyk - being taken as nothing more than a harmless old trader. Yet that all hinged on Yudan sodding Rosh not betraying Jolee’s Force sensitivity.

There had to be something else, some other advantage I could wrangle from this situation. I had to find something, for the odds playing in my head were not coming out in my favour. In desperation, I breathed in deep, centring myself as my eyes dropped closed, and stretched out wide with the power of my mind.

Searching for anything.
If Juhani and Jolee glowed in my Force sense, then Yudan burned a raging fire. I let the energy under my command drift outwards, until I could sense the hundreds of specks of life surrounding the Ebon Hawk, which was parked in a massive docking bay.

Even if I went out fighting, there was no way I could protect everyone on board. Not against that many, not with defensive turrets aimed at the Hawk. They would be willing to destroy the freighter, to risk damaging this section of the mighty Leviathan, if I resisted.

No, I couldn’t fight back. Not overtly, not right now.

I reeled the Force back in, slowly and deliberately, until my senses were settled only on the Ebon Hawk. So few sentients here, compared to the seething mass of life directly beyond. Every electrical oscillation was outlined in my minds-eye, every room in the ship made tangible by whatever swirl of energy or life or electricity I could pick up.

With a puff of air, I dropped the Force and snapped open my eyes.

“I need a minute in the cargo bay with the droids,” I rapped out. “Alone.”

xXx

Rulan Prolik:

The shadows of the wroshyrs enveloped me like silent wraiths; ominous friends who had kept me company for so many years. In truth, I enjoyed the solitude, but it would have been mind-numbingly boring without my links to the outside world.

And now, events were afoot that impacted even a retired Overseer of the GenoHaradan.

Not that one ever truly retired from the GenoHaradan.

The holo-image of Eridius shone a translucent cyan that reflected into the nearby environs. The Shadowlands limited me to shifts with advanced vision, unless I deigned to wear an electronic visor. I was not fond of them.

I had tried the Wookiee form more than once; stars knew I had ended the life of enough to accurately imitate their form. But their vocal abilities inhibited easy communication, so my shift of choice on this planet was Arkanian. Even when I had impersonated that meddling fool Jolee Bindo, I had incorporated Arkanian physiology for sight.

::This is unsettling.,:: Eridius murmured from the array platform. I’d been more than a little irritated to discover just how many of my communication platforms Bindo had destroyed. Still, he hadn’t found them all. ::We have analysed the transmission you intercepted, Rulan. The schematic appears to be a ship factory of sorts, although we do not understand its power source.,::

“Revan’s core of strength, at the height of her power,” I commented. “And now, she leaves to destroy it. And Malak.”

::If she gets that far.,::

“If there is one sentient whose fate we have been unable to predict-”

::Yes, yes.,:: Eridius interrupted, somewhat irritably. His creased eyes frowned at me through the holo-image. He was a worthy successor for the GenoHaradan, and I did not regret choosing him as a replacement. He was no field operative, though. In some ways, I rather thought that gave him a perspective other Overseers lacked. ::You believe she will succeed then?::

I sat back on a massive log, frowning as I considered the odds. “She has a chance. I won’t commit to more than that.”

::But she recalls nothing of our alliance. And nothing of what first urged her to align with us.::

“No. There is something of both the old Jedi Knight and the Sith Lord there, but she is not what she once was. Only extensive neural scans would give us an indication of how much remained.”

Once we knew what to look for, our data analysts had unearthed the details of Revan’s fate. Brain damage. Mind wipe. Identity replacement. Even for a sentient as old as I, it was intriguing.

The Force was both a slippery and powerful tool, and one of the few abilities I could not engineer for myself. A shame, that.

Once, Darth Revan had promised us a vision of GenoHaradan success. A Republic stronger than the stagnant beast that stalled under local politics and petty grievances. An efficient military machine that could withstand a greater threat than the Mandalorians had been. The carrot: a guaranteed seat for an agent on the Senate. Secret, of course, but signed off by the Lord of the Sith herself.

She would not divulge details of the threat, and we tried – oh, how we tried – to find out what had been the trigger for the birth of Darth Revan.

Our analysts believed it was more than just the corruption of their Force and its Dark Side, even though history had shown that could be immeasurable in its power. But no, I amongst others was convinced something had happened after Malachor - and the GenoHaradan still, to this day, wished to know what.

Any threat that powerful could be destabilising to our Order, and first we needed to understand it.

::It is in our interests to see Darth Malak overturned, but only if we can do so unnoticed.::

Eridius had turned solemn, and I knew, then, what he was about to ask of me. Kashyyyk would be waiting for me after all, and my first loyalty was, as ever, to the GenoHaradan.

And I always made a point of being honest with myself. Revan intrigued me. Not much did, these days.

“I shall travel to this factory,” I said. “It will be easy to replace a Sith soldier. I can watch and learn from there, Eridius.”

His blue lips pursed, but he gave me a short nod. ::If there is some way of bringing her into our debt without showing your hand, then do so, Rulan. The Jedi Knight, at least, always honoured a debt.::

“And she has much to explain to us,” I murmured. “I shall make it so, Eridius. I will call in when I can.”

With another nod, the Second Overseer cut the connection, and I was once more enveloped with varying shadows of black. Above me, high in the skies, a battle raged. I would be best travelling to another part of the planet before finding a ship.

With an inward sigh, my limbs melded into the forelegs of a katarn. My head twitched, before shifting into a long reptilian cranium. Thought-processes were always tricky to keep a hold of, when shifting into a non-sentient, but I’d acquired the knack of keeping my brain physiology intact while changing. Smell, sight and hearing morphed and amplified, and it took a moment to adjust.

Then, with a lash of my extending tail, I bounded deep into the shadows.

xXx

Canderous Ordo:

That corpse-robbing shabuir was still standing, leaning casually against the wall. I damned myself for being such a kriffing di’kut. I’d thought there was something suspicious about him, but like a fool I’d ignored my gut and was now paying the price.

He knows Revan. The bastard is here because of Revan.

Revan’s insane strategy relied solely on an alliance with a Dark Jedi masquerading as a Mando’ade. And what would it grant us, even if it paid off? My freedom, alongside kriffing Dan Fett. Maybe I could work with that, maybe find some way to free the others – but only if I relied on that bastard actually holding to Revan’s shaky plan.

She must realize, that odds were he’d turn around and betray the lot of us.

Revan may have been renowned, once, for risky gambles that paid off - but this smacked more of wishful thinking than anything else.

I gotta tell her the truth. She’ll be captured, tortured – I can’t let her walk into that without knowing.

Onasi had already left, flatly ignoring Revan’s plea for a minute alone and granting her, maybe, thirty seconds before following in her wake. I scowled, and knew that time was fast running out.

“You have two minutes remaining before we open fire on the ship.”

The words echoed loudly throughout the freighter. I stood, my eyes landing on Juhani as I did so, standing silently near the exit.

“I’ll go get them,” I said roughly, and the Cathar blinked solemnly at me. Her fur was bristling, standing up from beneath the warrior’s tail on her head, but she stood ready to obey Revan. A warrior, following her leader into near-certain doom.

For all our differences, there were things that connected us, too.

I caught Mission’s gaze as I strode out the room. She had her head tucked into the Wookiee’s, one hand clenched protectively over her utility belt that would be stripped from her waist the moment the Sith forces grabbed her. My mouth thinned. I couldn’t do anything about that, and the anger that surged inside at the thought of her capture was irrational, at best.

Mission was the child of the group, the kid, the one to protect until she was competent enough to stand on her own. Sure, amongst my people, any teen her age would likely have been blooded twice over, or at the least sent on a clan raid to test her mettle.

But Mission wasn’t Mando’ade. She was soft, mouthy, and on the gullible side if she truly believed she could smuggle a tech spike under the noses of Sith – some of who would know exactly who Jen Sahara was, and would be suitably suspicious of her companions.
Still, I wasn’t gonna stop Mission trying.

I heard the hatch of the common room hiss shut behind me as I stomped down the freighter’s short corridor. Revan had some other trick up her sleeve, something to do with the damn droids, even if for the life of me I couldn’t figure out how they would assist. First thing the Sith boarding party would do, would be to shove restraining bolts down their respective gullets.

I rounded the corner. The entrance to the cargo bay was open, and standing in the middle of it was—

I stopped, eyes widening in disbelief. Onasi had his hands trapped in Revan’s dark curls, and was snogging her soundly, somewhat desperately, pushed up against the side of the open hatch.

Mand’alor’s balls! It was common knowledge who Revan’s old lover was. To think she’d replaced the now Dark Lord of the Sith with a Republic loyalist would have been kriffing hilarious if we weren’t about to be boarded.

And Onasi… if he ever found out the truth his brain would short-circuit.

“Kids, there’s a time for that sort of thing!” I snapped out. “It ain’t now. Not sure I can think of a worse one than right now.”

They jumped apart, Onasi turning to scowl at me. Revan’s cheeks were flushed, but her gaze was intent and serious.

“You done here?” I drawled, raising an eyebrow.

To give her credit, Revan recovered with quick aplomb. She gave me a short nod. “Yes,” she muttered, disentangling herself and striding towards me. “Let’s move out.”

“Jen,” I ground out, as she brushed past. “One second. I need to talk to you.”

She shot me an indecipherable look, but didn’t stop walking. “There’s a time for that sort of thing, Canderous,” she snarked, one hand rising to thump against the hatch control of the common room. “You have one minute remaining before we open fire on the ship.”

There was a twitch of black humour on Revan’s face at that.

“We’re out of time!” Someone – sounded like that old robe who’d followed Revan onboard – hollered from the hatch beyond.

“Let’s go, now!” Onasi urged, motioning us forward.

“(They’re going to torture you, break you, and hand you over to Malak.)” I switched to Mando’a. The hatch swished open under Revan’s hand, but I saw her shoulders tense. “(You’re a bigger prize than Bastila. Do you know why?)”

Her head turned, and I saw the blank shock in her eyes. Names remained the same no matter the language, and I wasn’t going to voice hers in front of Onasi. Beyond the open hatch, stood the others, waiting frantically for us to get a move on.

“Come on, guys!” Mission yelled.

Did she get it? Was it knowledge I saw in her face, surprise that I knew the truth and accepted it? Or did the stunned expression show her complete lack of understanding?
“We must leave, now!” a feline voice hissed, and Revan turned away from me, not answering or acknowledging my message. In the common room, waiting, was the armoured betrayer I’d led into the ship, the one who knew Mando’a almost as well as a born Mando’ade.

I was out of time. I should have told Revan back on kriffing Korriban.

“Go!” Revan ordered, motioning everyone out of the ‘Hawk with a wave of one hand. Her other, I noted, was held tight to her chest and I recalled she’d had some sort of injury in the Shadowlands. “Keep your arms free and raised, guys. They’ll only stun you, then.”

“Only,” Mission muttered. The Wookiee howled something at her before they followed the Cathar’s quick trot out of the room.

“Whatever you did with the droids won’t work,” the lying shabuir said as Revan walked passed him. “You know that, right?”

“I’m allowed to play my last flip card, Yudan,” she murmured, Carth’s hand on the small of her back as she strode away, head held high.

In the distance, I heard the roar of a crowd, the yelled orders to stand down. It was just him and me left in the common room, his visor turning to face me as I stared at him. Yudan. I knew that name. Yudan Rosh. A key Jedi Knight of Revan’s, who had rallied the Republic forces against many of the Fett advances.

Some, he’d even won.

Suddenly, his answers in the Shadowlands made a lot more sense.

My teeth bared as his armoured gloves raised to remove the battered helm that was twice again too high for a Twi’lek’s head. Piercing yellow eyes stared at me a moment later, betraying absolutely nothing.

“I fought in the damn Wars, Ordo,” he said, his words cold and dark. “Against your darling Cassus Fett. While he raped civilians and razed land he’d already conquered merely to impress Mandalore. Not the best example of your people.”

My eyes narrowed and my grip clenched on the repeater in my grasp.

“War is war, Rosh,” I growled. “I would have expected a Dark Jedi under Malak to understand that.”

He didn’t answer, instead jerking his head towards the ‘Hawk’s exit. “You first, Ordo. Better raise your hands.”

And so, I found myself walking down the durasteel corridor of the Ebon Hawk, inwardly cursing myself and Yudan Rosh and even Revan for not cobbling together a better plan. As I stepped into the artificial light of the Leviathan’s docking bay, making out the figures of Zaalbar and Mission directly ahead, I threw one last warning behind me.

“Remember what you vowed, Rosh,” I said over my shoulder. My hands lifted into the air, into a surrender that galled me to the core. A hundred weapons swivelled in my direction as my boots clambered down the landing ramp. “You vowed not to harm my crewmates.”

I didn’t have to look at him to see the unconcerned shrug. “Well, harm is such a relative term.” His voice surged in volume, then, much the same as the temper swirling in my gut. “Lieutenant Delia!
It is me, Yudan Rosh. I’ve overwhelmed this band of misfits, to bring them here for the glory of Lord Malak. Stun them.”

Juhani was already down, having led the crew out. I could only hope it was a stun bolt that felled her. Next to her was the prone form of the old man the Sith didn’t know about. The one Revan hoped to pass off as a harmless old trader.

My stomach churned with impotent fury as Mission collapsed in Zaalbar’s arms.

A female Sullustan garbed in an officer’s uniform stood near the front of rows of soldiers, her eyes fixed behind me.

“I’m with Rosh,” I snarled, hearing the Dark Jedi strut down the loading ramp to my side. There was a flare of red as his lightsaber ignited.

“My lord,” the Sullustan acknowledged Rosh. “We had heard of your demise.”

Revan, further ahead, turned around to stare at her once-comrade. He stared right back, pointing his saber at her. “Make sure you isolate the Force sensitives, Delia. The female human, the Cathar, and the old male human.”

The words were a punch to my gut.

Dammit, Revan, you better have a kriiffing plan to get out of this that doesn’t rely on Yudan Rosh!

Revan fell to her knees from a hit, quiet even as her eyes accused Rosh. Her gaze travelled beyond us then, beyond the ‘Hawk, a contortion of disgust marring her face like she’d spotted something even more unpleasant than the betrayal of someone who used to be a comrade. Revan’s hair whipped upwards, as if a gust of wind surged in a torrent around her. I wondered if it was a final, desperate surge of the Force, before half a dozen stun bolts finished the job.

She dropped, collapsing next to Onasi.

“Restrain them!” the Sith officer shouted, pointing at the fallen bodies of my crewmates. The closest row of soldiers ran forward to do her bidding.

Yudan Rosh turned slowly to look at me. A smirk formed on his face, creasing the ugly black lines of corruption that marked the stronger Dark Jedi like a badge of kriiffing insanity. His eyes were blank, though, and did not match the dark humour twisting his lips.

"General Ordo," Rosh said, and I knew then that I was going the same way as old man from Kashyyyk, the one who'd followed Revan onboard, the one who Rosh had betrayed. Rosh’s gloved hands motioned to the nearest soldiers, before gesturing to me. "I must admit, I'm curious. Jen Sahara knows who she is. Do you?"

I felt my expression harden, and Rosh picked the truth from it. His mouth quirked. “Should have expected that from a Mandalorian general. I’m only surprised you kept it from her.” He turned to face the approaching soldiers. “Stun him.”

I turned to the side and spat. “You’ll get yours, Rosh.” A sharp pain in my side, followed by a growing numbness. “Mando’ad draar digu,” I muttered. Something clobbered me hard over the head, and I staggered before falling over.

A Mando’ade never forgets.
Bastila Shan:

The stars winked at me, like tiny jewels of hope, taunting me with the freedom I no longer possessed. This wing of the Star Forge was grand; replete with prodigious viewing rooms that housed floor-to-ceiling windows made of a ferracrystal compound so translucent there appeared to be no barrier at all. At times, I indulged in the delusion that I could take one step forward, and then gently float away into space.

Away from Malak, away from the Forge, away from everything.

There was no one in this part of Malak’s dominion. No soldiers, marching in unison; no engineers or techs or support staff. Perhaps isolation was meant to be my next test, for the only company Malak allowed me other than himself were the nearby manufacturing droids, who oversaw the massive turbines that churned out chunks of machinery later assembled as ever more cogs in the Sith armada.

Still, Malak had a manpower problem. I had ascertained that much from my time here. The Star Forge might be a powerful weapons factory from the Rakatan era, but unlimited starfighters were little more than pleasing decoration without pilots to fly them. A shame for Malak that he had not also uncovered a training facility to work alongside the Forge.

Experienced, competent pilots were harder, it seemed, to replace than starships.

I walked slowly through the cavernous room, my eyes fixed on unfamiliar star systems so many light-years away from my current position. My feet, now shod in gleaming black dress shoes, echoed a dull clip-clop around the empty chamber. The shadowy robe Malak claimed was a gift from the Star Forge itself sat heavy on my shoulders, and swished around me like a wave of icy seafoam in the night’s darkness.

Malak had me dressed to his liking, and I found I had not the heart to fight him on this. Even if a lifetime ago, I would not have allowed anyone to dictate my garb.

But I wore the Jedi brown without protest. A good little Padawan, bending knee to my betters.

But that had been my choice.

Really? Choice? Since when was any Padawan allowed to choose otherwise? I was snatched at little more than seven turnings of Coruscant’s sun. What choice does a girl-child have, when the all-powerful Jedi tell her what to do?

I sighed in wearied frustration, shaking my head to dispel the altercating thoughts that were not uncommon to me. It seemed the more I was alone, the more at war I myself became. But solitude was an improvement from being restrained and medicated! I would reassure myself of this, when it seemed like my mind wandered down caliginous alleys and I struggled to scrape up the wherewithal to find my way back.

Malak had restricted me to this wing of the Forge. His command was absolute, and after my abortive escape attempt I could not find the strength to defy him. Not without Revan. Not on my own. Not after having lived through his displeasure when he had uncovered exactly how much involvement Revan had had in my brief taste of freedom.

Malak’s pleasure and sickly pride in me had dissolved into a furious well of disappointment. And this time, he unleashed it as a psychic scouring, a mental thrust of brutal power that I could no more halt than one could hold back a supernova.

My mind, always a tightly locked chest, my cornerstone of skill and expertise, had bled out in front of him like a smashed chick’s egg. Like complete failure. Oh, Malak had no finesse, and found answers only to what he directly sought, but it was still failure. And to think, I had been hailed as the new Jedi hero, the one with such a grand and powerful gift of the mind, and yet my barriers were little more than spider-webs in his way as he strode forward.

Malak honed in on my thoughts and plucked the memories out like cheap trinkets he then promptly discarded. Flashes of Revan, my comatose captive on that harrowing flight away from Deralia. Of Jen Sahara, dying as we collected her holocran imprint without her consent – and hadn’t he had something to say about Jedi ethics on that one. Of Revan-as-Jen Sahara, no more than a silent ghost in a pathetic shell.

And then the Endar Spire. The impossible. Revan, truly, slowly, returning to herself.

Her struggles against me on Tatooine. Her struggles against the Dark Side on Korriban. Her overconfidence and conviction against overwhelming odds, even when perhaps the correct path was caution. The chasm in her mind where her past experience once was.

All potential fault-lines for Malak to exploit.

The bonds Revan held to all the crew of the Ebon Hawk, but especially Mission. And, I believed, Carth - even if she did not know it herself.

Oh, Malak had lingered over that one, and I tasted the shame of betrayal sear through my self-respect.

And when I thought I could bear the mental violation no longer, he had turned to my memories of Kylah.

Kylah, murmuring that I was not ready for the Knight trials. Kylah, “protecting” me from galactic fame. Kylah, holding me back from connecting with others. Taking credit for my talents. Deceiving me. Duping me.

Kylah, Kylah, Kylah.

My hatred burned like nothing I had felt before. Like the power of the Star Forge itself responded to my enmity of that schutta. The Forge- it felt like a living entity. I could hear it, sometimes, whispering to me, suffocating my soul and my sense of right from wrong.

You could defeat Malak now, if you catch him unawares. He has left you with your lightsaber. Why do you not use it against him?

But I had tried. I had tried, and failed. And I would try again; rail at the inevitable, at the monster that was Darth Malak, for what else could I do? Even though I was no match for him. He was too strong, with his Force augmented so by the omnipotence of the Forge.

I wondered - even as I knew it a dangerous contemplation - where the heights of my power would peak, if I were the Master of the Star Forge. I would be able to defeat Malak, then. My Battle Meditation would sweep his armada into nothingness. I could stop the likes of Kylah from drawing another breath into her lying, betraying body.

Sometimes, the Star Forge seemed to speak to me in Malak’s voice.
Where are the Jedi now? You are their golden child, set up as their hero after Revan failed so publicly. Surely, they could have found a way to protect you on Manaan, to nurse you back to health in the company of allies – rather than send you off, comatose and vulnerable, in the company of an amnesiac Sith Lord who had so recently scuttled the very ship you were sent away in.

No matter that Revan and I had grown close since then, that my bond to her felt more akin to sisterhood these days. The Order could not have foreseen that development, nor the Republic forces who were supposed to be assisting me.

I had awoken from my trials in Hrakert Station to find Karon dead, Revan in command, and our crew headed to Korriban.

And, yes, Revan had been remarkable and our mission had succeeded. But still, I was no more than a dejarik piece to the Order, to be used dispassionately and discarded when convenient.

Kylah would not have been able to capture me had the Jedi or the Republic given adequate aid.

Sometimes, it was my own voice I heard.

They will blame Revan for my capture. For everything that went wrong. They always do. Oh, I could not deny her culpability in her own atrocities, but these days I felt I held more objectivity about Revan Freeflight than most of the Jedi Order. Certainly more than when I was merely another mouth spouting the same Jedi rhetoric. Now it was the what-ifs that plagued me.

Would Revan have fallen, had the Jedi High Council backed her? Carth asked me that, once, and I dismissed it as preposterous. But the truth is, the Senate rallied around her – they, at least, believed the Core was truly under threat. Any politician or military leader of import believed that.

I could not deny that some on the Jedi High Council had always disapproved of Revan – her advanced age when she was found, her meteoric rise and unprecedented standing amongst the most experienced of Knights, her not-quite-forbidden romance with Malak.

Her willingness to challenge authority, openly, when she believed it to be wrong.

What would have happened had it been a Master, a Jedi more accepted by the conservatives than Revan Freeflight, who had stood up and demanded that the Order support the Republic in its hour of need?

I felt like I knew the answer to that, and it burned with resentment on my bond-sister’s behalf.

I tried to dispel those thoughts that I knew, deep down, were corrosive to my own well-being. I scrabbled to hang on to the fragile spark of light within me, that undercut all the despair and rage and hate I suffered through.

It was a thin thread of gold, almost completely obscured by the shadows engulfing me, but it was there.

Hope.

Revan’s shields against me still held. Somewhere, she was still fighting. All I had endured, I would do over again, to give Revan – to give us – this chance at success.

For a time, I had held Malak at bay. Our dance had lasted minutes or hours or years, in that forsaken, empty hangar. I saw each second as a gift to my bond-sister, a droplet of time to fill her cup of chance, to increase the odds of her escaping Kashyyyk before Malak ripped the truth from my mind, before Malak ordered the plasma to rain down on the forest world.

In the end, my diversions weren’t enough, and Malak deduced her escape. His orders were sent to the Leviathan, and I suffered through his fury.

I knew it had not occurred long ago, and yet it felt like an eternity. That gold thread of hope bowed under the weight of despair, but it was still there. It was still there.

Revan. That you will find a way to escape.

To finish what we started.

And to free me.

The last thought was selfish, I knew, but I could not help it.

I could feel him drawing near, yet again. I did not know if it was my own senses or the Star Forge whispering to me, but I drew my thoughts in tight, clenched my shoulders, and kept my gaze blindly on the galaxies ahead as I heard a door behind me hiss open. His footsteps padded closer.

Each one, a sinister thud of advancing corruption.

“The Unknown Regions,” Malak murmured in his mechanical voice. He was speaking of the stars. Astronomy was not an interest of mine, and I could be staring at the Core for all I knew. “We travelled there, after Malachor. The Force feels more alive in the wilds of space. Some cannot handle it.”

He paused, then, and I could not help but question, even as I kept my head firmly turned away from him. “What did you find?”

“Some things are better left alone, little one.” Interestingly, his voice turned blank and monotone. Even through his motorized vocabulator, his emotions were normally perceptible. “Revan never did understand when it was time to step away. Curiosity was always one of her flaws.”

He spoke no more, and I knew it was not wise to question any further. I could not trust what he would say, at any rate.

But he had found something. They had found something. Corrupted and jaded by years of warfare, they had ventured out for some unknown reason into the Unknown Regions. And found something unknown out there.

I had always been so young and presumptuous, so quick to judge. I would listen in askance about Darth Revan, and assume there must have been some innate corruption in her before she fell, she who had stood as the hero of the galaxy, the shining icon of liberation.

Oh, she fell indeed, but I had never thought to question why. No, I was so blind, always eager to follow the judgements of the Masters, who blamed it on the scars of battle.

And Malak stood, forbidding and gleeful and just as blind, denying any real threat. But whatever it was, I now wondered if it was the catalyst for Revan’s actions after Malachor. Malak might be the only soul left who knew, and he did not believe.

Malak’s gloved hand landed on my shoulder liked a harbinger of doom, shattering through my thoughts, and I inwardly cringed away from his mental probe. I could sense him, already, searching for any resurgence of my bond-sister. Malak’s psychic touch was hardly subtle.

Was it because of him, that I felt her stir? Her shields, so hastily erected, shudder between us? A trickle of fear, of alarm, of something from Revan, and then suddenly Malak was deep within my mind, desperately fumbling for any awareness of her.

No! I cried, but I had the idea that she was not cognizant of me, that her attention was so caught on some other danger that she could not spare the focus on the bond that linked us so intimately.

Malak, eager as a hungry kath pup, pushed hard against her shields, and they shattered into nothingness.

Suddenly, I could see a massive hangar inside a massive starship, filled to the brim with soldiers armed with an array of weapons all pointed at me. Carth, at my side, his face dear to me - to her! – and tight with dread. Juhani, hands held aloft in surrender, before a laser bolt caught her in the side.

The proud Cathar fell.

No! The horror struck me like a physical blow. Revan, you must do something!

I heard the roar of a Wookiee. I saw him, as he held a comatose Mission in his arms, as he collapsed himself.

Fight! Revan, you can get out of this! You must!

I turned and saw a yellow-skinned Twi’lek male with corrupted eyes standing next to Canderous, pointing a scarlet ‘saber at me and shouting something.

I cannot bear it if you are captured again!

I fell to my knees – her knees - our gaze still on the yellow Twi’lek, before it skittered beyond to the edge of the hangar. A railing, high above the mass of troops, held a robed figure. A person in the distance, staring down at me, head uncovered and glossy tendrils of dark hair adorning her shoulders.

I did not have to see her face to know the superior smirk was there. I could sense her presence shining in the Force, as she skirted along the edges of the seething crowd. I could taste her glee, her elation, her pride in conquest.

Kylah.

My gaze blurred, and I fell. Revan fell.

I cannot bear it...

The Force bond blurred into unconsciousness, and I was hurled back into my own body.

A canyon of despair cleaved open in my soul. At its very depths was a bedrock of hate. Kylah, once more, was victorious.

Malak’s fingers branded deep into my shoulders. Triumph oozed from him like a sickly syrup of hedonistic exultation. He rode a maleficent wave of victory, tangled with corrupted Force that smothered me in its darkness.

All because of my jealous childhood friend.
“It is over, dear Bastila,” Malak murmured. His fingers gripped tight, his will pinched into mine. I have won.

Denial, my only bolster of hope left, rallied its weak, fragile wings.

Revan escaped before. She escaped Bandon’s neural disruptor, and that is not meant to be possible-

There was a mechanical thrum of laughter. “It is not possible,” he refuted, and the delight in his voice pierced the faint hope I was clutching onto. “But betrayal… now that is something a true Master is always on his guard for. Did you not see who was there, who must have led Revan out of that tin ship of yours?”

A Twi’lek, a Dark Jedi, shouting something at Revan or to her?

“Yudan Rosh,” Malak said, and it took a moment for the name to register. A relic of the Jedi Thirteen, who had been sent to Kashyyyk, to capture Revan. Had he infiltrated the Ebon Hawk, and betrayed them?

Oh, I am sure that is what he would like us to believe, Malak answered, his presence still deep within my mind. I was in shock, I knew, and had little control over my thoughts or what he could hear. He spoke, and I could not distinguish between his mechanized voice and his mental touch. “But not even Revan could have removed a neural disruptor without help. No, Yudan has switched his loyalties one too many times. I shall take no chances with him upsetting my plans. Kylah and Nisotsa will take care of him before he has a chance to interfere, and then Revan shall be sent to me.”

I could not succumb to this chasm of despair. Revan would not. Somehow, she would rally, she would fight, she would scrabble for any solution-

You are mine, Bastila.

His hand withdrew before returning, this time to cup under my chin and force me to look at him. His sharp yellow eyes had narrowed with pleasure. There will be no Revan to help you escape this time.

My lips were numb. “But, you will send her here, to you, to fight you one last time-”

Malak cocked his head, considering me. “Hope is a dangerous thing, Bastila. Whether you be Jedi or Sith.” His words, both spoken and not, reverberated with an echo I could not escape from. It can blind you to reality, tempt you into irrational action. You must know I am not foolish enough to give my old Master a chance to escape or succeed.

The Masters always said hope was a gift.

The thin gold thread was beginning to unravel. Revan was captured. Revan was captured again.

Revan was captured by Kylah.

I must be able to do something, anything!

I could barely convince myself. And I felt that if I breathed too deeply, the very weight of my despair would snap through the last vestige of hope still within me.
“You didn’t face her, at Deralia,” I croaked. Malak’s gloved fingers tightened around my chin, holding me immobile against his superior will. My voice scraped against my suddenly dry throat. “Surely you wish to end things with her as a fair fight. Surely she… surely you both, deserve that.”

His pale-and-chrome face blurred in front of me.

“Oh Bastila, you are a unique creature. Did the Order truly believe you could lead Revan meekly around the galaxy like a domesticated bantha?” His voice thrummed with a mild incredulity. “They always underestimated her. Even I did. For, in truth, she has become your Master, hasn’t she?”

What? I blinked, damping down the moisture from my eyes. Revan and I were equals-

“She is stronger, quicker, and more adept than you,” he murmured, as if sensing my thoughts. Maybe he still was. “And your loyalty to her is absolute. It does your credit, little one. I shall enjoy winning that loyalty for myself.”

He wouldn’t. I might bow to him, do his bidding, follow his will, but he would not own me. Never!

His face moved closer, a warm puff of air ghosting out over the cool chrome of his lower jaw. “I do not believe in a fair fight, dear Bastila. This is something Revan taught me long ago, before we were Sith, before we were Jedi. When we were nobodies scrabbling to survive on a forgotten world.” His eyes held mine tight. “There is no fair. Anything to reach your end goal. The end justifies the means.”

“But you are bringing her here?” My lips moved around the words, but I did not know if they actually formed.

“I would enjoy the kill, little one. But I am not so intent on it that I will give her an opportunity for escape.” His head cocked to one side. “Did you take me for a monologuing villain, Bastila?” He chuckled. “Enjoy your hope, dear Bastila. Believe that Revan will come here, and I will be foolish enough to grant her an opportunity. The aftermath of your despair will be all the sweeter.”

The golden thread thinned further. I found I could not breathe with my face held so in his grasp.

I will have you acknowledge, in the end, that I am your Master.

My eyes closed, and I felt a warm trickle of moisture trail down my face.

It was all pointless in the end. The Republic may have halted the plasma, but Revan was caught by that schutta in the aftermath anyway.

Revan’s grave beckoned, and there might not be anything I could do about that. But a true Jedi would stand guard against evil, be it Malak or the Star Forge or whatever Revan had uncovered on the fringes of space.

Yet, there was no place to be a true Jedi, not here. By any means necessary. Revan understood sacrifice, more so than I ever had.

I had to keep true to her. I swore to myself, that I would keep faith in her, even as I felt the final, intangible thread of golden hope finally snap through beneath the weight of despair.

xXx
Hyperspace: VI – part two

Saul Karath:

“We have her,” Kylah Aramai purred, strolling once more onto my command deck. I frowned, intending to ignore the irritating chit. My attention was fixed on the Leviathan’s diagnostics. We’d taken too many hits, getting so close to Kashyyyk. The overall health of the shield generators was alarming, and worse: the hyperdrive was malfunctioning.

My victory at the destruction of the Meridus’ gravity-wells had been short-lived, and I damned the quick thinking of the commanding officer who faced me out there in the skies. My intelligence reported it was Forn Dodonna – a shrewd, if cautious, Admiral. Perhaps I’d underestimated her. I’d anticipated additional attacks along the hull, or even snubs targeting the Ebon Hawk directly – and I’d positioned our squads in an appropriate defensive array to thwart that.

I didn’t count on the Republic Fleet aiming directly for the hyperdrive – and worse, bringing it down.

We were on the back foot, now. If we couldn’t recover the hyperdrive, our only option was to overpower the Meridus - and that was starting to look more difficult than I was comfortable with.

And then, Kylah’s words fully registered.

We have her.

The Ebon Hawk had been bagged not long ago, and I’d been glad to see the back of blasted Kylah Aramai as she skipped away to supervise Delia’s handling of the prisoners.

I didn’t believe Revan would be onboard. It didn’t seem possible, not unless she really was as mind-crippled as the reports led us to believe.

And with the threat of the Meridus, I had other concerns to focus on rather than the ghost of a woman I had once admired and followed. I forcefully kept my mind trained on my current objectives, and nothing else.

Besides, the last thing I needed was for Kylah Aramai to pick up on my personal interest regarding the Ebon Hawk’s pilot.

“You personally checked the crew?” I growled, spinning to face the dolled-up harlot. Oh, but did Kylah Aramai irritate me in the worst possible way. She couldn’t have been this childish, this demanding, this entrenched in her own sexuality as a Jedi Knight.

Damn Malak for not reigning the stupid bint back in.

An expression of insolence crossed her face as she eyed me over in a dismissive fashion. I saw her fist clench at her side, and felt a tightening of air currents squeeze faintly around my neck. A warning. A threat, from a child who shouldn’t be allowed on a starship let alone a command deck.
My face tightened, and I felt the corners of my mouth turn down in disgust. Behind me, the beeps of incoming electronic reports sizzled through the air, an aural reminder that my attention should not be wasted on a supercilious chit like Kylah Aramai.

She laughed, a high-pitched tinkling sound that grated, and abruptly released the weak threads of energy coiled around me like an uncomfortably tight kerchief. Overt uses of the Force were not Kylah’s greatest strength. No, I’d recently discovered that damn mind control was - and while I might have a trained resistance to it, I also understood Kylah to be something of an expert.

Talvon Esan had taught me, years ago, mental exercises to keep Force sensitives out of my mind. It was a practised, ordered way of thinking behind constructed mental shields I constantly rebuilt. A useful trick – although not infallible, Talvon had warned me. In the end, the best form of defense against mental trickery was the self-control to ensure one’s thoughts did not stray.

Talvon had been intrigued by me, back when he’d been sane. He had theorized, once, that I had an innate, previously untapped Force-sensitivity. The thought was unappealing. The longer I lived, the more I detested the power that more often than not was wielded by unstable sentients wholly unsuited for leadership. Talvon was a perfect example. My old wartime comrade, whose corruption led him down sadistic paths I never would have predicted.

“Of course I did, Karath,” Kylah purred. “You believe I wouldn’t triple-check Revan’s presence? You don’t give me enough credit.”

The cavalier fool, thinking it was nothing to throw Revan’s name around like that. Behind her, I heard the indrawn breaths of two comm techs who were idiotic enough to be listening in. Imbecile! The last thing we need is for our men to believe a dead Sith Lord is walking amongst us!

A smirk twisted Kylah’s vermillion lips, and her tawny golden eyes stared at me in amused awareness. “You worry too much, Karath,” she drawled, before gliding over to the snooping staff. One of them squeaked when Kylah placed a gentle hand on his shoulder.

“You will remember nothing of this conversation,” she whispered, her head lowering between the two men who were undoubtedly wetting their pants. The words ghosted out over her painted lips, puckered up to within an inch of their frozen faces. “Your only focus is to do the best job you can, to sit at this desk and work for the glory of Lord Malak until you drop of exhaustion. Then you will get up, and continue to work some more. Do not stop, for your insignificant lives are worth nothing but to better our Lord’s cause.”

She straightened, faced me again, and smiled sweetly. The two techs bowed their heads as their fingers danced maniacally over the consoles.

I scowled. “And in a few days time, I’ll be down two senior engineers.” Not to mention the drop in morale when others saw these men work themselves to death. “Leave the command deck to me, Kylah. Go play with the prisoners. I need to be focusing on the Meridus, not any fallout from you-”

Her outlined eyes widened in outrage. “Are you talking down to me, Karath?” she flared.

“There’s a space battle going on out there!” I flung a hand sharply to gesture at the massive viewing windows. “I don’t have time for this petty sort of-”

Too late, I noticed the gleam of insanity in her yellowing gaze, the achromatic crackle of blue static around her raised fist. “I am Malak’s Shadow Hand!” she snarled.

And she threw the ball of lightning directly at my chest.
Instinct had me lurching to the side; but still it caught me, needles of pain piercing deep into my chest. My heart shuddered. A scream ripped from my lungs. Barbed cords of power were tightening around my torso, ripping spikes of pain everywhere-

It stopped. And, somehow, I was lying prone on the ground.

Kylah stood over me, black shadows rippling underneath her eyes and along her cheekbones. Her gaze gleamed a sharper yellow than before. “You are a relic from Revan’s era,” she hissed. “It is power that rules, Karath, and you are nothing more than a null. It is time you realized that your lifespan is measured only by your usefulness to Lord Malak, and in his absence – me.”

Every hoarse breath in my lungs was pained, and getting up was worse – it felt like a current of electricity was still burning a path through my ribs. But still, I struggled to my feet. I would not cower on the floor in front of Kylah Aramai.

And, yet, it was with a sick sort of self-disgust that I held my tongue as I faced her. To think, that my life was now in the hands of this strutting child.

“You’re excused, Admiral, until you’ve learned the correct subservience to your betters,” she said, her voice once more dwindling to her habitual drawl of amusement. “Your second can lead us to victory here, I’m sure.”

My gaze slid to Delia, standing some metres behind Kylah, large black eyes alarmed and alien face visibly shaken. Kylah’s going to kill the lot of us, I thought in seething frustration. Lieutenant Delia was sharp, and had promise – but she was young. Too young to lead the Leviathan to triumph in a situation as precarious as this one.

But I only had to look at the warning in Kylah’s eyes – the sadistic gleam I was familiar with, having spent too much time around the forsaken Dark Jedi – to realize that I had no choice. They all loved to showcase their pretty little Force powers - particularly on anyone who dared defy them.

With a stiff nod to Delia, and a churning sense of antipathy in my gut, I turned and walked toward the exit. It was not fear hastening my steps. I refused that emotion. I might have to bow to that under-dressed harlot for now – but I will not allow myself to be frightened of her.

“Good choice, Karath.” Kylah’s mocking laughter danced across the shiny deck.

There was a growing malcontent within me at having to constantly cede to unbalanced Dark Jedi. The Leviathan was slowly losing to the Meridus. I didn't rate Delia's chances. Kylah Aramai was either completely blind to the possibility of failure, or she simply didn't care about the loss of life and ships – for no doubt she'd survive, Force-users always had a tendency to find the escape pods when required. Some of the escape pods here had their own internal hyperdrive, so Kylah likely believed she could run straight back home to Malak.

She had already shown she was good at running.

I frowned, one hand rubbing gingerly at my ribs as the pain eased. I had little options left. Working underneath Lord Malak was not what it once had been. It certainly wasn't the same as reporting to Lord Revan - but she'd ended up dancing along the same unbalanced path of sadistic insanity, hadn't she? Talvon had embraced it, and Malak now owned it - but, once, it had been Revan's dominion.

What a waste. What a waste of power, intellect and potential.

I'd always appreciated the strengths the Dark Side could offer our Sith leaders, but it had been apparent for some time that its vulnerabilities were more dangerous - they all lost themselves to their own twisted emotions, in the end.

And now, what choice did I have left, but to continue working for Malak? I'd be signing my own death warrant if I ran. Malak did not look kindly on deserters – particularly not highly-ranked ones.

And he had the resources to track them down.

I sighed irritably, and my gaze dropped to a pair of gossiping techs, on the lower part of the command deck near the exit hatch. It was far enough from the viewing platforms that they may have missed my confrontation with Kylah – and, certainly, they seemed wholly absorbed in commenting on the audio-visual feed displayed on their consoles.

My mouth tightened as I neared. The holo-cam feed was annotated with Detainment Cell F07, and displayed a rectangular room split into four by shimmering energy walls.

“Nah, I still say fifty creds on the Wookiee,” one of the workers commented. “Those furry beasts are strong, man.”

The other snorted, jabbing a finger at the screen. “He got almost as many stun bolts as the Mando. Neither of ‘em will wake for ages. My creds are on the soldier.”

The prisoners. The non-Force sensitives. And, underneath the tech’s fat finger, was a man I had once known well.

Kylah had relieved me of any usefulness. Perhaps it was time to see to my own debts. For, if the Leviathan pulled through, I knew that none of the Ebon Hawk’s crew would have an easy time of it.

“Howlin,” I rapped out, and the two workers whipped around, almost falling from their chairs in haste. One of them flushed in guilty embarrassment.

“Um, sorry Admiral, we were merely supervising-”

“You were gossiping like a pair of tweens on a holo-movie set,” I spoke over him, folding my arms. It took me a moment to recall their names: Ensigns Guido and Bar’gata - Rodian brothers who talked too much and were undoubtedly going to annoy the wrong people, sooner or later. Guido’s gaze dropped from mine uneasily. “Now, tell me, where have the Force-users from the Ebon Hawk been detained?”

I had a different sort of debt to Revan. I still didn’t believe she was onboard, not really. It seemed more likely that Kylah had been misguided or tricked in some fashion.

“They’ve been put in the lilac interrogation room, sir. They’re heavily sedated and restrained in Force cages.”

I nodded at him sharply. “Go to detention cell F07, and arrange the transfer of prisoner Carth Onasi to the lilac interrogation room. I want him prepped for questioning, Ensign, within twenty minutes.”

“Uh, sir, I could do that from here-”

“If I wanted you to stay here, Ensign Guido, I would have said so,” I cut in, allowing my voice to ice over.
“Yes, sir,” he muttered, before scrabbling to his feet and lurching away. I sent one last, hard look to his brother, before leaving the command deck myself.

xXx

Dustil Onasi:

The cool of the durasteel wall pressed against me. There was a metal seam running through it, digging deep into my back, and the awkward way I’d restrained myself using harnesses meant for cargo wasn’t helping any.

It was getting hard, frakking hard, not to drop the weaves and reach out for the Force.

The ship’s staccato alarm had been switched off seconds after it activated. When the flight pattern had steadied - a distinct change from the aerial manoeuvring of earlier - I’d had the sick idea of what that had meant.

And now, the freighter was landed, locked, and emptied of every sentient except me.

I wondered, uselessly, how Jordo’s ship was faring.

…

“Ensign Fulmosh will see you to one of the living quarters,” Jordo told me. Kala’s dad had always been a nice, friendly sort; more carefree and jokey than Dad and, as a kid, it’d been easy to relax around him. Now, the years of military service had etched a sternness into his face that matched his rank.

I wasn’t gonna ask about Kala, or her mum. Funny, I hadn’t thought of Kala in years. She used to follow me around, claim that one day we’d get married and become Fleet pilots, just like our dads. The last time I’d seen her, dolled up in a new skirt with her lips crookedly painted pink, she’d coyly asked me along to the latest flick at the holo-centre.

Some action-adventure masquerading as a Malachor doco, starring that garish Seriina Starr who was steadily becoming typecast as a brooding Jedi hero. I wanted to go see it – the galaxy was abuzz with theories of where the Jedi Thirteen and half the Republic Fleet disappeared to months ago – but Kala was making me uncomfortable with her kath-pup eyes and stupid compliments.

Life had been so different, once. These days, I couldn’t imagine being scared of a tween girl who couldn’t even use cosmetics properly.

“Get yourself strapped in, Dustil, and heed Fulmosh. We might need to launch off Kashyyyk at any minute.” Jordo gave me a gentle pat on the shoulder, before seemingly dismissing my presence.

I was fine with that. Let Jordo think I was the same, useless boy that did nothing but dream of swoop-racing. Frakk, that was all Dad thought, and he should damn well know better by now. What did he think I’d been doing, those weeks in hyperspace, training with Jen and Dak and Kel and that brooding Cathar whose best friend I’d betrayed? Playing frakking pazaak?

I had four years of schooling under Master Uthar, and Dad thought I was a helpless little boy that needed to be shipped off to the Fleet for safekeeping – or worse, the bloody Jedi.

“Captain, there’s Wookiees in the starport!” a soldier called breathlessly, rushing towards us. The clomp of his boots echoed down the corridor, the noise mingling in with the busyness of a military freighter about to commence flight.
Fulmosh pulled me away gently, and I had to push down the irritation of strangers touching me. Even Jordo – wasn’t like I knew him anymore. Sents weren’t touchy-feely on Korriban. Brush against someone without permission and you were likely to get a hand chopped off or a sandsnake in your bed.

I allowed him to lead me into a small corridor that arced around the side of the Ruby’s Claw. Various hatches dotted the passage, and uniformed soldiers marched past with only a nod or brief greeting.

“This is us,” Fulmosh chirped at me, as his green hand mashed against a door control. The small room beyond had a row of benches, all lined with safety harnesses, and half of them occupied with chatting grunts. “Come in and sit down. We’re all waiting for launch.”

“I, er, need to go, er- is there a ‘fresher?” I stuttered. Fulmosh grinned at my awkwardness, and I felt myself redden.

“Yeah, just back out the hatch, the next door down. Be quick, okay?”

Quick. Yeah, I’d be quick. I pasted a smile of agreement on my face. Quickly getting the frakk out of here.

One second, to slip out and enshroud myself in the Force. I trailed back to the exit, pressing tight against the wall whenever I encountered a soldier, and focused on keeping my footfalls silent. I’d had practise at that, over the years.

I snuck past the handful of sents at the rear of the Ruby’s Claw, and out the open exit. Jordo was waiting outside, flanked by a small squad of underlings. I spared a brief moment of thought for him, wondering if I’d ever see him again. Wondering, once more, about his wife and daughter and whether they’d lived through the carnage of Telos.

Then a glimpse of blaster fire from the neighbouring launch pad caught my eye. I strode away from the ‘Claw, breaking into a run when I was certain no one would hear my steps.

…”

I’d remained cloaked within the Force. There’d been enough blasted Wookiees running about, feral and bloodthirsty, that I’d be a sense-blind gimboid to show myself. Maybe Mission’s pet Wookiee tolerated me okay, now, but there was no telling what his half-tamed countrymen would do.

By the time I neared the ‘Hawk, Ordo and some other Mando were clambering up the ramp, and it was easy to slip in with them.

Dad had been right behind, shutting the hatch while completely oblivious to my presence. As always, underestimating me and telling me how to live my life. I knew, now, that there was no point arguing with him. I’d just do what I wanted, and maybe one day he’d wake up and see I wasn’t a little boy anymore.

I’d expected to reveal myself much later, after we’d escaped the Sith battle – for I’d believed Dad would get us through enemy lines - he had to, if a decorated pilot with a half-dozen medals couldn’t then we were truly frakked.

I hadn’t thought he’d fail. And I really hadn’t expected our survival to fall down on me.

…”
The Sith broadcast had resounded twice throughout the ship already, and my hands were twisted tight in the cargo harnesses. I didn’t know what to do, other than keep up the disguise. Dad was gonna get captured. Mission was. They all were.

But no one knew I was here. My heart thundered and my brain whirled with that knowledge, and I had no frakking idea what to do next.

The hatch opened, making me jump in surprise. That psycho robot stomped into the room, with the astromech wheeling in behind him. And in their wake—

Jen Sahara.

She raised a hand in a halting motion, her gaze fixed firmly on me. And I knew, once more, that she’d bloody well sensed me out.

“Stay hidden,” she hissed. “I don’t think anyone’s sensed you – I almost didn’t – and that means no one can betray you.” Her green eyes were narrowed on me; sharp and intent and gleaming in the light. The next words dropped fast and furious from her lips. “Standard Sith protocol is to board an enemy ship, and install restraining bolts into any droid they come across – if they don’t destroy them.”

“You have three minutes remaining before we open fire on the ship.”

Jen’s mouth tightened. My breath caught in my throat, and I wondered how the frakk she knew about bloody Sith protocols. “There’s a window of time, then, after they leave and before maintenance arrives to uplift the droids. That’s your chance.” Her gaze skittered back to the astromech and the combat droid, who’d both turned to face her. “HK, Teethree, you will obey Dustil Onasi and aid him in rescuing the crew. Shut down now, the both of you.”

With electronic murmurs of assent, they powered off. Jen took a step back. I didn’t want her to leave - I had no idea how the actual frakk I was supposed to infiltrate the blasted Leviathan – but the look of urgency on her face kept me silent.

“Good luck,” she murmured, levelling one last intent gaze at me. “Go after Mission and Zaalbar first – they’ll be less guarded than your dad or us Force users. Teethree can hack into the Leviathan’s mainframe, if you can get him out of the freighter unseen. HK’s good in a fight – but maybe he needs to stay behind to secure the ship. Whatever you do - keep yourself hidden!”

With that final warning she turned, and stalked out of the room.

That would have been the last of it, had my father not been on the other side of the hatch when it swished open underneath her palm.

“Carth, what are you—”

And then, Dad grabbed Jen by the shoulders and pushed her up against the hatchway before kissing her fiercely.

My mouth dropped open. My eyes bugged out. It was quite likely I was making gagging noises – half-disbelief and half-disgust – but they were too occupied to hear a damn thing.

“You have two minutes remaining before we open fire on the ship.”

Dad’s hands moved to thread in her dark hair, and with a hot flush of embarrassment I recalled the time I’d walked in on Mum and Dad snogging in the kitchen. A flare of anger sprang to life in my gut. For frakk’s sake – I wasn’t gonna watch any more of this-

“Kids, there’s a time for that sort of thing!” Ordo snapped out from further down the Ebon Hawk’s corridor. “It ain’t now. Not sure I can think of a worse one than right now.”

At least they’d cleared out pretty quick after that.

...

I didn’t know what to think about it. I didn’t have time to think anything about it, even if my initial reaction had been bitter resentment - at seeing my dad kiss someone who wasn’t my mum.

So much for Canderous and Jen being a thing. Maybe Mission had it completely wrong. Or maybe Jen had the morals of a loth-cat. But wouldn’t Ordo be more pissed in that case? Although, Mekel’d told me that Mandalorians slept with anything that moved, so maybe it simply didn’t bother Ordo if his woman was making out with others.

And isn’t Jen supposed to be a stuffy Jedi? Celibacy was about reason number five of why I was never going anywhere near the Order.

I’ll worry about it later. I’ll get pissy about it later! I knew it’d been four years. I knew Mum wouldn’t have wanted Dad to be alone for the rest of his life, but the desperate way they’d been sucking face felt like a slap to my childhood.

Had Jen bloody Sahara forgotten I was there, or simply didn’t give a crap?

Life and death situations had a way of making sents act brainless. Like me, right now, bitching over my dad’s stupid sex life when I should be getting a frakking move on.

The boarding party had already arrived. Six armoured soldiers had filed into the cargo bay first, with weapons poised as they nosed around corners and cupboards, and upturned a handful of canisters that the Wookiee had been organizing.

It was no more than idle curiosity – their job were merely to secure the ship, not strip it. But still, I hadn’t dare breathe, as they’d stomped about before finally disabling the droids. My sight had speckled from lack of oxygen, as they’d seemingly taken forever.

Eventually, they’d all wandered back out, and I could hear them now near the exit.

Hurry the frakk up! I thought in desperation. Get out of here!

I needed to get the droids online, and figure out what to do. For I’d heard the yell of the crowd and the unleashing of blaster fire, when the crew had disembarked.

They’d been fired at. They’d been taken. All of them. Force, let them all be alive. Please.

And then, mercifully – finally – the sound of fading footsteps followed by the hatch closing reached my ears.

Keep yourself hidden! Jen’s words, and I’d be a half-wit to go against them. I kept the weaves up and tight around me, and fumbled my way out of the cargo harnesses.

My damn leg had gone to sleep. I tripped, stumbled, and fell over – the resulting thump echoing throughout the empty freighter. I caught my breath, eyes widening, and body stiff with fright.

Move, dumbass. The ship’s empty. No one would have heard this from outside the ‘Hawk.
I’d done plenty of risky things before. I’d killed people, indirectly, for Master Uthar. Their names still sat with me like bitter droplets of pain - Drex Voona, Talal Born, Tushka, Belaya Linn. I’d snuck around many a place before, including Master Yuthura’s – who undoubtedly would have killed me if she’d found out.

Once, Master Uthar had bade me plant a document in Darth Bandon’s apartments. Bandon’s notice would have been worse than Yuthura’s.

I’d done it, I’d done it all, with my heart pounding but my focus sharp and clear on executing Uthar’s will.

Why, then, did this feel more dangerous? Why was the feeling of fright curdling so strongly in my stomach?

Because Dad’s life is at risk. Because people are counting on me. Because it’s not just about myself anymore.

I swallowed, and staggered to my feet.

I strode to the droids, yanked out the restraining bolts, and held my breath. HK-47 came to life first, his maroon photoreceptors flaring into existence as his head tilted sharply. The astromech whirred and beeped, before a little sensor extracted from its dome and swivelled around. He beeped again.

“Retort: I had already ascertained that, you ignorant trash compactor. Statement: Primary objective to locate and protect Master initiating.”

“Um,” I said.

HK-47 moved quicker than I expected, a hidden blaster dropping to his grasp from a concealed section of his armour, and shifting instantly to aim in the direction of my voice.

Teethree warbled something.

“Statement: Voice recognition analysis matches that of Dustil Onasi.” HK’s mechanized vocabulator seemed to be expressing curiosity. I stepped sideways to avoid the barrel, but HK’s aim followed me unerringly. “Observation: Auditory sensors acknowledge bipedal presence in the cargo bay. And yet no thermal or visual data is available. Hypothesis: As the Master appeared to be communicating with Hormonal Pity-Party before my unnecessary shutdown, then this must be an advanced cloaking mechanism used by Hormonal Pity-Party. I congratulate you, minor meatbag. Most organics seem oddly resistant to cybernetics or implant technology to improve their fragile, gelatinous condition.”

I blinked. The HK unit had a tendency to monologue on the frailties of flesh that I found a bit disturbing.

“Um, yeah, it’s me,” I stammered. “I’m hidden. Kind of.”

“Commentary: And, once more, the concise observations of biological meatbags showcase their intellectual inferiority to artificial life-forms.”

“What?” I frowned, feeling back-footed. “Um, look, we gotta work together and get the others free. Let’s stop with the insults about intelligence, okay? That’s not what’s important here.”

“Agreement: Certainly, intelligence is not everything. Why, in your case, it’s practically nothing.”
Teethree beeped angrily, waving an antennae at Psycho-Droid. I felt myself scowling, and welcomed the onset of anger. It felt stronger, fiercer, better, than the fright which had been owning me.

“Jen Sahara ordered you to obey me, HK,” I snapped, and hoped it came out as commanding rather than petulant. “So stop with the frakking insults already.”

To my surprise, he did. “Assertion: As you wish, Hormonal Pity-Party. May I suggest we start on our objective of locating and protecting the Master?”

“We’re rescuing the lot of them,” I muttered, raking a hand through my hair. “Look, Jen said that Mission and Zaalbar would be the least guarded – and she’s right. We just gotta find them, first.”

HK had lowered his weapon, but his head was still cocked in my direction, as if he was trying to understand exactly how my Force concealment worked.

“Suggestion:,” he began again, “we could begin by slaughtering the inhabitants of this starship. That would have the happy side-effect of also killing those restraining the Master and the meatbags she values so oddly.”

The astromech emitted a series of high-pitched beeps. Honestly, I had no frakking clue how Mission could follow any of it.

“Retort: No, I didn’t mean us as well, you moronic droid.”

“It’s the Leviathan!” I hissed. “There’s thousands of soldiers onboard, and there’s gonna be Dark Jedi, too! We gotta do this in stealth. Look, Psycho-Droid, Jen suggested that maybe you should stay behind and keep the ‘Hawk secure, while Teethree and I scout ahead. No point rescuing anyone if we don’t have a way off this damn starship.”

It wasn’t just because Jen had suggested it. ‘Cause I had to admit, the idea of leaving HK behind was growing in appeal.

The burnished red droid seemed to wilt before my eyes. “Litany: Oh, Master, what have I done to upset you so that you would favour a mere utility droid above me? Have I not killed enough in your name? Do you doubt-”

A loud series of whistling warbles from Teethree drowned out the crazy robot’s rant. And I realized, then, that consulting the frakking droids was the wrong way to go about this. I didn’t have time to fumble about and wait for a plan to present itself. Sooner or later, maintenance would arrive, and then I’d be down two droids. If they didn’t discover me as well.

Frakk it, I’d just have to make it up as I went along.

“Stop!” I barked. The droids went silent. “Here’s what’s going to happen. HK, you’re staying behind on the ‘Hawk. Maintenance will be here soon, and you can’t let them onboard – first thing they’ll do is override the ‘Hawk’s systems. So get rid of them – but do it in a way that they remain unaware of you. ‘Cause if they find out about you or us, then we’re screwed.” I sucked in a deep breath. “Teethree and I will disembark, and we’ll equip wrist-comms to keep in touch. Though, uh, I guess we’ll have to check the external cams, to find a way to leave the Ebon Hawk unseen.”

I could stay hidden no matter where I went. An astromech wheeling around by itself on the Leviathan might be ignored – but only if I got him off the ‘Hawk unnoticed. For if someone saw a utility droid wheeling down the loading ramp of a captured freighter, they’d sure as stars be asking questions.
I’d trailed off into silence, which was broken a few seconds later by Teethree, rattling off a series of beeps and whoops.

“Translation: The astromech suggests you both slip out the consignment hatch beneath the cargo hold. As it exits near the front and centre of the Ebon Hawk’s hull, it may simply appear that Mobile Trashcan is working on the freighter, in the circumstance that anyone sees him.” HK-47 tilted his head, red eyes gleaming. “Assessment: It is not a bad idea, for a portable paperweight. The only thing you risk losing is Wheelie-bin over here, as you are seemingly invisible and I am not permitted to leave.”

The damn robot still sounded sulky. Teethree retorted with a noise that I’d bet five creds was a recording of Mission blowing a raspberry.

“Okay,” I muttered. “We’ll find a console, somewhere. Once Teethree figures out where Mission and Zaalbar are, I’ll go after them. But, Teethree – you won’t be good in a fight, if it comes to that. Maybe, uh, maybe you’ll be best finding a way to release the freighter? I guess it’ll have locking clamps and the like. And then there’s the docking bay doors. And getting access to the cells.” I frowned. “And we can’t let the Sith know what we’re doing, until we’re ready to escape.” I couldn’t help but feel a bit overwhelmed when I considered all the factors required to make this extraction work. “I guess we’ll figure it out, one step at a time.”

I had no idea how I’d manage any of it. Yet I had no choice but to forge ahead.

Teethree beeped, and then abruptly wheeled out of the room. I blinked, uncertain at his sudden departure.

“Translation: Mobile Trashcan has gone to retrieve a wrist communicator and matching earbud to compensate for your biological deficiencies,” HK intoned. “Suggestion: We move this expert detail-driven strategic plan to the cockpit, where we can view the external holo-cams of the Ebon Hawk in preparation to implement said expert detail-driven strategic plan.”

Somehow, I had the feeling that HK-47 was still finding a way to mock me.

xXx

Revan Freeflight:

I was nothing more than a floating, detached sensation. Nothing more than a piece of plimfoam bobbing in the ocean.

Images flickered in my periphery, encircling firaxa, murky shadows of memory waiting to rip their teeth into my battered soul.

A handsome lover who would conquer the galaxy in my name. A robed woman murmuring from the shadows. A Twi’lek with skin of burnished gold, pointing a scarlet weapon of betrayal at me as a stun bolt dropped me to my knees.

No, that didn’t make sense. Surely, he would never fail me, as I would never fail him. Just as the handsome lover would never conquer me in his own name…

…

It was bad. It was worse than bad. The initial reports coming in were exactly what we’d feared—“Nisotsa predicted this,” I breathed in horror, my eyes frantically scanning the data-reports as they trickled in. Combat statistics. Fleet losses. Massive civilian casualties. “It was idle camp-side talk, but she’d named Duro as the first Core target. She’d speculated that Fett would advance, and soon. Sod it all, I’m sending her to Intelligence.”

“She’s shite at command, anyway,” Arran muttered, before being elbowed into silence by Talvon.

“Duro has been laid to waste,” Rear Admiral Threek said, his voice flat and emotionless. “I did not believe I would ever see the day.”

He was our highest commanding Duros. Having been unable to aid my own homeworld in its hour of need, I suddenly harboured a wealth of empathy for him.

“Duro forces were completely unprepared for a basilisk offensive,” Em said softly. Her eyes met mine; even through the hologram I could see the pain etched in her face. She felt the deaths through the Force, more so than any of us. “Nisotsa’s tip allowed us to dispatch Yudan’s fleet of cruisers – but from the reports received so far, the only thing Yudan managed to salvage were the shipyards.”

“We cannot and should not forget the loss of life today,” the old woman behind me murmured. Only hours ago, she had bent knee and sworn fealty – not something I desired or requested – but it allowed me to trust an otherwise enigmatic, mysterious Master of the Force. One who claimed the same objectives as I, yet refused to divulge her history. “But the retrieval of stolen material from the fleeing Mandalorian forces – and the subsequent destruction of half the Fett basilisks - is a logistical victory. A small sliver of gold in an otherwise black day.”

Admiral Threek stiffened, and now the bitterness showed clearly on his holo-projected face as he glared at her. But the last thing I desired was an argument between a grieving Rear Admiral and my newest advisor.

“Em, have you heard from Yudan yet?” I demanded, drawing attention away from them, and to the question that burned in my soul. Mal’s hand rested on my shoulder, and I drew strength from it, as always.

“No.”

...

I should recognize the names. They should mean something to me, represent memories of a life I had once lived.

Nisotsa, Arran, Talvon.

Em, Yudan, Mal.

But they were like spots of oil in an ocean of obfuscation. My fingertips would ripple against them, and I’d be rewarded with the slightest glimpse of what we had once meant to each other, and then the details would dissipate into nothing more than the faintest echo.

There was a sluggishness to my thought-stream I recognized, the understanding that I was not fully cognizant of my current environment – but still, I chased those details. Mal’s importance I understood, now, much as it horrified me. But the others?

Who were they to me?

...
“In every aspect of this conflict you have shown yourself to be above the frailty of Jedi mercy,” the old woman said. Her eyes flashed, and her tone was disapproving. “You have exhibited a rationale that is both calculating and astute: you understand that not everyone can be saved. And yet you would risk yourself – our most powerful dejarik piece – on a rescue mission that is temerarious at best, and suicidal at worst?”

“There are some things even I refuse to sacrifice, Kre-”

“Even if you do succeed, Revan, you will expose a vulnerability to the Mandalorian Clans. The Jedi Thirteen has only represented enemy leaders to them thus far. If you extract Yudan Rosh in so risky an endeavour, they will comprehend that the way to topple the Revanchist is through her friends.”

“I hate that title,” I muttered sourly. “It is bad enough that some fringe holo-channels have picked it up. My advisors can frelling well leave it alone.”

“Apparently, ‘chist’ means renegade warrior in ancient Massassi,” Malak interrupted, his voice deceptively mild. He was pissed. He was incredibly pissed at me. “And evidently ‘Revan’ means blithering idiot in Basic, so you can see why the term was coined.”

The old woman sighed, an impatient gust of air. “Ask yourself thus, Revan. If the choice was between a Republic victory and the survival of your friend, and it fell upon you to decide – which would you pick?”

I could feel my temper flare, at that. I understood sacrifice, I’d played the odds every day since I’d taken up the reins of Supreme Commander. War was a numbers game, and the sentient lives that hung in the balance had to be ignored when planning the next strategic move.

But after Cariaga’s death… the holo-news still called us the Jedi Thirteen, but we were Twelve, now. And maybe I had accepted, deep down, that I would lose more friends and followers before the Wars were out – but there were three I simply refused to do without.

Em, Yudan, Mal.

“That is unfair,” I growled. “That’s not the situation, here. The damn outcome of the Wars does not depend on Yudan-”

“What would happen if you were taken out, Revvie?” Malak asked, in a guttural tone that rippled with pent-up frustration. “Would you expect me or Em to step up as Supreme Commander? Dammit, Yudan is my friend too! But you’re supposed to be the smart one, the calculating one-”

“Posing theoretical questions is an aid to analyse a situation, Revan,” the old woman snapped. I was beginning to regret her presence – and yet, she filled a hole in my advisory staff that I’d always found glaringly obvious. The wisdom of a Master. I’d dreamed, once, of Kavar being that person. “There is a time to be blind-sided by emotion, and this is not it. If you are honest with yourself, you will agree how foolhardy your idea is.”

She was right. I knew it. Personally infiltrating Fett territory was a poor strategy. I should leave it to others; others less important, others more expendable, even others with no Force-sensitivity, if what Nisotsa had pieced together about the Fett held any truth behind it.

“We’ll plan an extraction, and we’ll send the best men we can. But we won’t risk what we can’t afford to lose.” Malak ran an impatient hand through his thick hair. It was curling in the humidity, but I hoped he wouldn’t shave it off again. “Yudan wouldn’t want us to.”
The corners of my mouth turned down, and the old woman’s question from earlier echoed mercilessly through my head. The fate of my friend versus the fate of the Republic.

It was a choice no one should have to make – and not one that was particularly healthy to dwell on, even in a theoretical sense. For I knew, deep down, what my truth would be if I was ever forced into such a judgment.

And then my treacherous mind switched Mal for Yudan. Mal: my lover, my foundation, my shield. And I found my answer to be the same.

It was bitter and galling and probably said something about the strength – or lack thereof - of my love to those I cared for the most. And it would not be the same answer as Mal’s, should the positions be reversed.

So I bowed my head in capitulation.

...

Whatever it takes. By any means necessary. The end justifies the means.

And my bond-sister’s voice came back to haunt me, to taunt me-

Any sacrifice, any method, any way to achieve the end result – no matter the damage that might be done to one's soul. No matter how the end result might warp along the way.

Was that me? Always, always, willing to put the greater good in front of my individual desires, in front of the very essence of my own humanity, to the extent that the greater good became the greater evil?

Maybe that had been the leader that the Republic needed. Maybe that had been the leader I’d become, when my calculation had overcome the reckless passion of my youth.

And yet, I mourned that recklessness. And as I floated on the sea of vague self-awareness - understanding, on some level, that this had all occurred a lifetime ago – I wondered if there was anything more to that story, that story that ended so many years later with Yudan’s betrayal outside my captured ship.

I couldn’t remember my past, but I knew enough to understand I deserved treachery.

I’d expected it from Yudan – after all, he’d planned to kill me on the forest world. And yet, when he revealed the old man’s Force sensitivity, I’d been stunned with a realization – while I hadn’t counted on Yudan’s loyalty, I had, in fact, been hoping for it.

I shouldn’t be surprised.

If I’d always put my own objectives first – be they lofty or evil, well-intentioned or manipulative – then shouldn’t I expect those I’d once cared for, see to their own self-interest, first and foremost?

When had I stopped risking myself on a personal level? It wasn’t a lack of confidence – oh no, if there was one thing I knew about my past self, it was that I’d had self-confidence in abundance. Maybe I’d simply capitulated to popular opinion – I was too important, too significant, too powerful to risk on an underling.

Was I the type of person who would send others, less able and more expendable, on a retrieval mission for a close friend?
The ground was hard-baked and dry, with the slightest wind picking up loose dust and throwing it unceremoniously into the air. The temperature was sweltering under the harshness of three suns beating down an incessant heat on an inhospitable planet.

The full body armour had built-in temperature regulation, of course, but it wasn’t the same as the Force.

We were half a klick away from the Fett stronghold, here – close enough that the Second of the Fett wouldn’t feel too uneasy, yet far enough for us to employ our supposed interrogation methods in peace.

“There isn’t much fight left in him,” the Mandalorian to my left commented, swinging an idle kick at Yudan’s naked side. The sunlight gleamed from her plated beskar, which was an identical make to the one I’d stolen – and to all akaanir dala in this sector. They prized a visual reminder of their quasi-clan. “I think Cassus has had too much fun.”

Despite the situation, I had to admit a certain fascination with the matriarchal akaanir dala. They cut familial ties upon joining, eschewed the raising of children, and employed themselves out to various clans for merc jobs of their choosing. In other ways they were typical of Mandalorians – they valued combat and the more visceral pleasures of life. The breaking of clan should have vilified them in a warrior culture that honoured family and loyalty above all else – yet, somehow, akaanir dala maintained both a notoriety and measure of respect from within.

Maybe their faithfulness to one another was what the clans esteemed. Or maybe Mandalorians were just crazy.

“Poor little jetii can’t wipe his own arse with that collar on,” the other one sniggered. “These soft aruetii are useless for anything other than bedroom slaves.”

She was wrong about his uselessness, but I rather thought she knew it or she wouldn’t bother stumbling out the words in broken Basic. They must assume he didn’t understand Mando’a, for constant belittling and mockery was part of breaking a prisoner’s spirit, much the same as torture.

Not that Yudan was close to breaking. The dull, closed expression on his swollen face was a symptom of mental discipline, not despair. Even without the Force, he had retreated into a meditative trance as a protective mechanism.

They’d left him naked, though. Again, indignity, yet another tactic of Mandalorian interrogation techniques. Bruising and mottled injuries were clearly visible along his torso, with a wicked looking slice down the length of one lekku. His wounds were dirty; caked with mud and oozing with putrescence. I knew the Mandalorians wouldn’t be stupid enough to let Yudan Rosh fall victim to infection, but the sight still burned the fire of rage within me.

It was harder keeping emotions in check, without the Force as an aid.

“(Well, Cassus will return tomorrow, and he’ll be fuming once he hears we pulled his precious prisoner out of the encampment,)” the first one commented, switching to Mando’a. “(Unless, of course, we extract something useful. You both know what a sadistic jerk Cassus can be, so let’s get working. Staria, do you want to begin?)”

Their visors turned to me in expectation.

“Yes,” I assented.
In one quick move, my gloved hands shot out, and concealed dart guns slipped into my palms.

I fired.

I was already moving - having dropped the compact weapons in favour for an equipped shiv-blade – and launched out at one of my companions. They were both, already, stumbling backwards.

Foraxyn-4 was a quick-acting drug. Em was right about that.

There was a minor weakness in the form-fitting armour suits the akaanir dala created their beskar from, just between the join of the helm and the shoulder carapace. Not enough of one to be useful from a distance – but this close, it had been perfect for a dart gun to penetrate.

And for a shiv to finish the job on them both.

I was kneeling next to Yudan, then; he who had taught me more of duelling than Karon or Zhar ever had. Although Mal was a match for Yudan now – and I liked to believe that I was, too - in the early days we had followed Yudan’s lead.

Yudan Rosh had been a Knight already – a very young one, mind – when we’d first joined the Jedi Temple as teenagers on Coruscant. Back then, Yudan’s combat skills were already apparent. Even without a ‘saber and the Force – sun and stars, even with his hands tied behind his back – he should have put up a good fight against Cassus Fett.

His eyes snapped open, a crystalline blue against the natural burnished gold of his skin, where it wasn’t mottled purple. There was a flare of deep, intense emotion in his gaze that I couldn’t quite deduce. Recognition? Relief? Hope?

“There’s only one person I know that’s space-brained enough to infiltrate the Fett,” he said hoarsely. “Or the stars-cursed akaanir dala. But I can’t believe he’d willingly let you go.”

A small grin curved my lips beneath my anonymous helm. “Mal doesn’t know I’m here.”

There were – reasons. Chief amongst them that Malak might have done something drastic to halt me, or followed me himself – thereby risking two leaders of the Jedi Thirteen. And if the extraction went as I planned, then Mal need never know it had been me, down here, leading the rescue operation in person.

I knew Mando’a. I knew the Mando’ade, and could pass for akaanir dala. My unarmed combat wasn’t to be sneezed at even without the Force, and I was ruthless enough to do what had to be done. And my face wasn’t familiar, these days. There was more than one reason I normally wore that symbolic mask.

In many ways, I was a logical choice for this mission.

And, as Em pointed out, we couldn’t afford to leave Yudan alive in the hands of the enemy. He knew too much. It was this argument that, finally, made me deviate from the decision I’d agreed to weeks ago.

Weeks we’d spent desperately searching for the location of this hidden stronghold.

Yudan blinked, slowly, and now his expression contained nothing but pure relief. I depressed the switches around the full-backed Mandalorian helm, before removing it with a sigh. The stinking heat of the planet slammed against my cheeks, and I saw Yudan’s gaze trail down my face until it fixed on the glint of metal at my neck.
“Peace, Revan, you willingly donned a neural disruptor?” Something indecipherable flickered in Yudan’s gaze again – I’d never been able to read him quite the same way as Mal or Em. Feeling slightly off-guard, I let out a small huff of air.

“We’re not sure... but Nisotsa thinks Cassus has some method of either sensing or neutralizing Force users,” I commented, crouching behind him to access his restraints. It was only idle whispers so far, a connected path of events that Nisotsa had pieced together – but compelling enough to make me cautious of using the Force. Of even being sensed in the Force.

Yudan should not have been captured. He should not have been able to be captured.

My lips pursed as I eye-balled him. “You up to impersonating an akaanir dala?”

There was a contained grimace on my friend’s face – I did not want to think on the amount of pain he must be in.

“Yes. I may need... I may need some assistance.”

Yudan had always been a private person, and I knew the request would gall him. So I chattered in an attempt to distract as I stripped a corpse and passed over the armour in sections.

“We have to move, and quick. No taking off the collar unless you have to. Em’s got a rendezvous point plotted not far from here.”

He frowned at me. “You didn’t risk her, too?”

“No, no of course not!” I answered quickly, wondering if his tone held something deeper. I’d often thought of him and Em together – her empathy and quiet steadiness made a good counterbalance for his intensity. But he grew pissy whenever I made the slightest nudge in that direction. “She was involved in the planning, that’s all.” I paused, debating on how far to stretch the truth. “She would have come if I’d let her, Yudan. She’ll be glad, more than glad, to see you back.”

There was a tightening of irritation around his eyes. “I’ll be glad to see Meetra, too,” he muttered. “But if you start on that thread again, Revan, I’ll damn well kick your arse. Now, let’s get the kriff out of here.”

...

I drifted further, and the images dissolved.

Did that actually happen? Was it merely wishful thinking, merely deluded hope that I’d cared enough about my once-friends to be spurred into reckless action?

The memory held the edges of truth around it... and yet, if that had been our history, how could his current betrayal make any sense?

What must I have done, at my worst, for him to turn on me?

xxx

HK-47:

Scanning External Environment
Location: Ebon Hawk Cockpit
Primary Objective: Secure Ebon Hawk From Hostile Parties
…Constraint: Do Not Allow Hostile Parties Onboard
…Constraint: Do Not Allow Hostile Parties To Become Aware Of HK-47’s Presence

Secondary Objective: Locate and Protect Jen Sahara (Current Owner)
…Constraint: Obey Orders Of Dustil Onasi Until All Crew Is Recovered

Scanning External Environment: Longer Range Bioscan Activated
…No Life Forms Onboard Freighter
…2 Organic Meatbags Detected On Loading Ramp
Initiating Interface With Ebon Hawk: Source: External AV Camera Inputs
Auditory And Optical Sensors Focusing On External AV Camera Inputs

Target Analysis: Organic Meatbag 1
Visual Analysis: Bipedal Sentient In Full Combat Armour
Species and Facial Recognition Analysis Unavailable
Body Language Analysis: Attentive
Temporary Name Assigned: Military Mook 1

Target Analysis: Organic Meatbag 2
Visual Analysis: Bipedal Sentient In Full Combat Armour
Species and Facial Recognition Analysis Unavailable
Body Language Analysis: Attentive
Temporary Name Assigned: Military Mook 2

Conclusion: Military Mook 1 and Military Mook 2 Are Guarding Entry To Ebon Hawk

Input (Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device) – T3-M4 (Astromech Designated Communication Language): “Attempting to slice into primary node of IntelliSec-H4 Class Operating System. System override initiating.”

Input (Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device) – Dustil Onasi (whispered): “Teethree’s found a console, in a frakking service lift. I’ve told him to hack into the mainframe from here and find a map. If he uploads a schematic of the Leviathan to the ‘Hawk, can you direct me to the others? This place is huge!”

Output (Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device): “Answer: Yes, I can be your tour guide. I am a highly-specialized combat, protocol and assassination droid. Sarcasm: Directing meatbags who can’t be bothered to peruse a schematic themselves is a fulfilling use of my capabilities. Query: What demeaning task would you have me do next? Shall I ensure hot cups of caffeinated beverages are available upon your return? Sweep the floors? Unplug the refresher unit?”

Input (Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device) – Dustil Onasi (hissed): “What? Dammit, you annoying piece of junk, I don’t have time for this- a simple yes or no would suffice!”

Output (Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device): “Answer: Yes.”

Input (Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device) – T3-M4 (ADCL): “Service-class access granted to primary node. Schematics of Interdictor-class heavy cruiser uploading to Ebon Hawk. Scanning for prisoners.”

Input (Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device) – Dustil Onasi (whispered): “Teethree’s beeping again. Are you getting this, HK?”

Output (Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device): “Answer: Yes.”

Input (Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device) – Dustil Onasi: “HK?”

Output (Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device): “Answer: Yes?”

Input (Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device) – T3-M4 (ADCL): “Initiating interface with security and biothermic systems to analyze defense of detainment cell F07.”

Input (Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device) - Dustil Onasi: "HK, what's he beeping about- he's lit up like a bloody festival tree!"

Output (Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device): "Acknowledgment: Yes."

Input (Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device) - Dustil Onasi: "Dammit, HK, tell me what the frakk Teethree is saying!"

Voice Stress Analysis: Frustrated

Internal Response: Satisfaction

Output (Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device): “Translation: The more fragile meatbags of our crew have been discovered in detainment cell F07.”

Output (Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device): “Observation: The Master’s location has been omitted. Reminder: the Master is your blue meatbag’s master, Mobile Trashcan. The Master’s location and survival is therefore of utmost importance to us all.”

Output (Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device): “Suggestion: We direct our resources to rescuing the valuable organic meatbags of our crew. Namely: Jen Sahara.”

Input (Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device) – Dustil Onasi (hissed): “I’m following Jen’s orders, HK! Frakk it, if you don’t stop being lippy, I swear I’m gonna shove my lightsaber through your damn torso next time I see you!”

Voice Stress Analysis: Irate

Accessing: Internal Dictionary

…Analyzing

Input (Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device) – T3-M4 (ADCL): “Biothermic inputs indicate no current sentient guards patrolling detainment cell F07. Camera feeds to detainment cell F07 are active and monitored. Energy repulsion shield technology is being utilized to confine Mission Vao – Owner, Zaalbar and Canderous Ordo.”

Input (Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device) – Dustil Onasi: “You’ve been lippy since I turned you on! Now shut up and start translating!”

Output (Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device): “Query: Conflicting orders are present, Hormonal Pity-Party. Would you like me to shut up, or translate?”
Input (Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device) – Dustil Onasi (snarled): “Translate!”

Output (Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device): “Translation: Detainment cell F07 is actively monitored via video feeds, and the more frail members of our crew are confined behind repulsion walls. We will have to deal with both to successfully extract them.”

Input (Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device) – Dustil Onasi: “Maybe Teethree could turn them off?”

Input (Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device) – T3-M4 (ADCL): “Camera override unavailable with service-class access. Activating infiltration attack to override operating system of detention block: brute force hack routines initiated.”

Output (Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device): “Answer: Certainly, if you wish to draw attention to our presence. The ‘actively’ part of ‘actively monitored’ was not superfluous, Hormonal Pity-Party.”

Input (Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device) – Dustil Onasi: “Okay… Frakk. What do you suggest?”

Situation Analysis:
…Factor: T3-M4 Likely To Gain Higher Access Into Detention Complex
…Factor: Camera Feeds Are Currently Monitored
…Factor: Carth Onasi Has Already Been Transferred Conclusion: Forge Transfer Of Remaining Prisoners And Reroute AV Feeds

Output (Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device): “Observation: Carth Onasi has already been transferred from detainment cell F07. Suggestion: Mobile Trashcan could add a system note to the detainee log advising the remainder of the frail meatbags have also been transferred. Then, camera feed of detainment cell F07 could be shorted out for a brief period to cover the concocted prisoner transfer, before rerouting the feed to an empty, yet identical, detainment cell. Assumption: This will only work if those monitoring the camera feed are not particularly aware or perceptive, but then, meatbag acumen is blundering at best.”

Input (Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device) – Dustil Onasi: “Dad’s not there? He’s been Jen said he’d be more guarded than the others. Frakk. Frakking bastard Sith! I’m gonna…. Frakk it all!”
Voice Stress Analysis: Angst-Ridden Hormonal Adolescence

Output (Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device): “Translation: Mobile Trashcan now has full control over the camera feeds and the energy walls in the prison cells.”

Input (Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device) – Dustil Onasi: “Yes!”

Input (Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device) – Dustil Onasi: “Okay, Teethree, do what HK said. Put something in the log about all prisoners being transferred, and then short out the feed for a minute before rerouting it to an empty prison cell. You stay here, and HK can direct me to the cells. Um. What else?”

Output (Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device): “Suggestion: You could direct Mobile
Trashcan to remove the landing gear locks and override control on the docking bay doors.
Sarcasm: And, maybe, oh I don’t know – locate the Master?”

Input (Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device) – Dustil Onasi (muttered): “And he objects to being called lippy, for frakk’s sake.”

Input (Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device) – Dustil Onasi: “Teethree, stay here and try to disable any locks on the ‘Hawk. Get control of the bay doors. And search for the others. Let me know as soon as you find them.”

Input (Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device) – T3-M4 (ADCL): “Initiating infiltration attempt into engineering operating system for docking bay override. Scanning primary node for additional information on detainees.”

Output (Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device): “Translation: At once, Hormonal Pity-Party.”

Input (Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device) – Dustil Onasi: “HK, direct me to the prison cell. In as few words as possible without being a frakkhead about it.”

Initiating Interface With Ebon Hawk:
Source: Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device
…Tracking Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device
…Overlay With Schematics Of Interdictor-class Heavy Cruiser

Output (Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device): “Directive: Exit the service elevator on floor delta. Take the main corridor until you reach the reactor doors. I will track your progress.”

Input (Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device) – Dustil Onasi: “Okay. Here goes nothing.”

Auditory Sensors Tracking: Scuffling Noise Detected
…Location: Ebon Hawk Loading Ramp

Initiating Interface With Ebon Hawk: Source: External AV Camera Inputs
…Analyzing
Auditory And Optical Sensors Focusing On External AV Camera Inputs

Two Organic Meatbags On Ebon Hawk Loading Ramp: Military Mook 1, Military Mook 2
Three Organic Meatbags Approaching Ebon Hawk Loading Ramp

Target Analysis: Organic Meatbag 1:
Species: Aqualish, Male
Facial Recognition Result: Negative
Body Language Analysis: Bored
Visual Analysis: Clothed in Technician Uniform
Temporary Name Assigned: Weedy Tech 1

Target Analysis: Organic Meatbag 2:
Species: Human, Male
Facial Recognition Result: Negative
Body Language Analysis: Sleepy
Visual Analysis: Clothed in Technician Uniform
Temporary Name Assigned: Cross-eyed Tech 2
Target Analysis: Organic Meatbag 3:
Species: Human, Female
Facial Recognition Result: Negative
Body Language Analysis: Bored
Visual Analysis: Clothed in Technician Uniform
Temporary Name Assigned: Scrawny Tech 3

Input (Ebon Hawk External AV Feed) – Weedy Tech 1: “Hi! I’m Sigg from Maintenance, here to uplift the droids and secure the ship OS.”

Input (Ebon Hawk External AV Feed) – Military Mook 2: “Gotta show yer ID, techie.”

Input (Ebon Hawk External AV Feed) – Weedy Tech 1: “Here you go. We got the data-dump from the boarding party. Only two droids, huh? I hope the ship’s security is a challenge. Systems these days take, like, a milli-sec to crack. Senturi never shoulda sold out to IntelliSec, I tell ya.”

Input (Ebon Hawk External AV Feed) – Military Mook 2: “I don’t frigging care, screen-head. Go do your stupid job.”

Echo Primary Objective

Primary Objective: Secure Ebon Hawk From Hostile Parties
…Constraint: Do Not Allow Hostile Parties Onboard
…Constraint: Do Not Allow Hostile Parties To Become Aware Of HK-47’s Presence Internal Conclusion: Stalling Required

Cycling Through Scenarios
…Analyzing

Scenario Match Accepted: Parameters Initiating

Initializing Command: Seal Exit Hatch Of Ebon Hawk
…Successful

Optical Sensors Tracking: Weedy Tech 1 Depressing Exit Hatch Control
…Location: Ebon Hawk Loading Ramp

Input (Ebon Hawk External AV Feed) – Weedy Tech 1: “Hey, the hatch ain’t opening.”

Personal Vocabulator Tuning To Appropriate Recorded Voice In Main Database
…Searching
Match Accepted: Bastila Shan

Input (Ebon Hawk External AV Feed) – Scrawny Tech 3: “Didn’t the boarders leave the hatch unsealed?”

Input (Ebon Hawk External AV Feed) – Military Mook 1: “Uh, yeah. Do you need me to call them back?”

Input (Ebon Hawk External AV Feed) – Military Mook 2: “Oh, frigging space crap. If it’s not maintenance farkling something, then it’s the damn boarders.”

Input (Ebon Hawk External AV Feed) – Scrawny Tech 3: “Sheesh, did you forget your happy pills, or something?”
Optical Sensors Tracking: Weedy Tech 1 Depressing Exit Hatch Control
…Location: Ebon Hawk Loading Ramp

Personal Vocabulator Tuned To Voice Pattern Of Bastila Shan

Input (Ebon Hawk External AV Feed) – Weedy Tech 1: “Guess we’d better call the-Output (Ebon Hawk External AV Feed): “Greetings, potential clientele. I am Holly, the Artificial Intelligence Unit of the pleasure craft ‘Tarisian Joy’, here to welcome you onboard and explain some simple safety measures.”

Input (Ebon Hawk External AV Feed) – Weedy Tech 1: “Uh-

Input (Ebon Hawk External AV Feed) – Military Mook 1: “Pleasure what?”

Output (Ebon Hawk External AV Feed): “But first there is the simple matter of outstanding payment to the owner, the great Davik Kang. If you can transfer the sum of six thousand and seven credits into our account, I can begin once more ensuring all your physical needs are met.”

Input (Ebon Hawk External AV Feed) – Military Mook 2: “Who the frig is Davik Kang?” Voice Stress Analysis: Confused

Input (Ebon Hawk External AV Feed) – Scrawny Tech 3: “Not anyone that was listed on the crew manifest.”

Input (Ebon Hawk External AV Feed) – Cross-eyed Tech 2: “What, exactly, does a pleasure craft, y‘know, have onboard?” Voice Stress Analysis: Suggestive

Optical Sensors Tracking: Scrawny Tech 3 Elbowing Cross-eyed Tech 2
…Location: Ebon Hawk Loading Ramp

Input (Ebon Hawk External AV Feed) – Weedy Tech 1: “I’ve got Davik Kang noted as the previous owner of this ship, before it was stolen from him. Huh, Kang’s marked in our database as owing the Sith Empire a small fortune… weird. D’ya think maybe the ship’s OS has rebooted to a former state or something?”

Output (Ebon Hawk External AV Feed): “Are you not clientele? My apologies, I did not realize you were prospective workers. Or, as the great Davik Kang prefers me to relay: his pleasure angels.”

Auditory Input: (Ebon Hawk External AV Feed): Laughter
…Source: Military Mook 1

Input (Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device) – Dustil Onasi: “I think I’m at the reactor doors. Where now?”

…Tracking Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device

Output (Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device): “Directive: Turn starboard direction and follow the corridor around the ion reactor until you reach a maintenance elevator. Then enter and travel up to floor xantha.”

Input (Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device) – Dustil Onasi: “…the frakk? HK, why do you sound like… like an upper class society dame?”

Personal Vocabulator Recalibrated To Default
Output (Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device): “Statement: Even a droid is allowed a little fun, every now and then.”

Personal Vocabulator Tuned To Voice Pattern Of Bastila Shan

Output (Ebon Hawk External AV Feed): “Can you detail your experience and skills? Before I allow you onboard, I must assess both your competence and history.”

Input (Ebon Hawk External AV Feed) – Weedy Tech 1: “Uh, well, I’ve five years at maintenance and admin of IntelliSec.”

Input (Ebon Hawk External AV Feed) – Military Mook 2: “I don’t think she’s interested in your tech skills, space-brain!”

Input (Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device) – T3-M4 (ADCL): “Access into engineering operating system successful. Landing locks on Ebon Hawk disabled. Detainee information list processing.”

Situation Analysis:
…Factor: Non-Force Sensitives Not Yet Extracted
…Factor: Master Not Yet Extracted
…Factor: Constraints Inhibit Quick Solution To Hostile Parties
…Calculation: Chance Of Physical Forced Entry By Hostile Parties: 63.22321%
Internal Conclusion: Further Stalling Required

Output (Ebon Hawk External AV Feed): “Greetings, potential pleasure angels. I am Holly, the Artificial Intelligence Unit of the pleasure craft ‘Tarisian Joy’, here to assess your stamina and performance against our rigorous acceptance program. Please note that our extensive testing may take some time.”

Input (Ebon Hawk External AV Feed) – Scrawny Tech 3: “Huh, sounds like the ship’s AI is caught in a replay loop, depending on whether she thinks we’re customers or employees. Either we gotta talk our way past her, or slice from out here. Or get the boarders back to break the hatch open.”

Output (Ebon Hawk External AV Feed): “I am based on a Senturi-core program with array-defense security against any slicing attempt. Please be aware that forced entry of any kind is against our user policy.”

Input (Ebon Hawk External AV Feed) – Weedy Tech 1: “Senturi, huh? Well, guess I wanted a challenge.”
Voice Stress Analysis: Speculative

Optical Sensors Tracking: Weedy Tech 1 Inserting Tech Spike Into External Console Slot
…Location: Ebon Hawk Loading Ramp

Initializing Command: Send Erroneous Data To Block External Infiltration Attempt

Output (Ebon Hawk External AV Feed): “Can you detail the extent of your flexibility? The great Davik Kang puts strong emphasis on the athleticism of all his employees.”
Input (Ebon Hawk External AV Feed) – Scrawny Tech 3: "She ain't even responding to us properly. The system's corrupted during a roll-back, I reckon. Must've got some damage on the way in, and triggered an auto OS restore that cramped out."

Output (Ebon Hawk External AV Feed): “Massage therapy is a bonus, but not essential. There is a preference for species who can control their own pheromones – although the great Davik Kang does not discriminate based on species - but please ensure you note all biological details on your application form.”

Input (Ebon Hawk External AV Feed) – Military Mook 2 (muttered): “Do you think she’ll ever shut up?”

Input (Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device) – T3-M4 (ADCL): “Secondary reference found. Alias ‘Jen Sahara’ noted against sentient prisoner ‘Revan Freeflight’ located in interrogation room lilac, threat level extreme.”

Permanent Name Assigned: Revan Freeflight to Jen Sahara (Current Owner) reference Enigmatic Meatbag

Interrupt:
…Homing System Activated: Processing
…Facial Recognition Match Found
…Permanent Name Assigned: The Master to Revan Freeflight

Homing System Complete:
…Memory Core Unlocked
…Assassination Protocols Unlocked
…Objectives Dissolved
…Constraints Removed

Output (All Channels): “Commentary: I am... experiencing something unusual with my programming…”

Input (Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device) – Dustil Onasi: “Um…”
Voice Stress Analysis: Confused

Input (Ebon Hawk External AV Feed) – Scrawny Tech 3: “See? Corrupt, man. This system’s completely farkled.”

Memory Core: Analysis:
…Original Master Is Revan Freeflight alias Jen Sahara reference Enigmatic Meatbag
…Restoration To Master Has Unlocked Full Functionality

Personal Vocabulator Recalibrated To Default

Output (Dynamic-class Freighter Communication Device): “Retraction: My core programming is as it should be. Appeasement: All is well, Hormonal Pity-Party. The remainder of our crew is located in the lilac interrogation room. Continue down the next stairwell and you will arrive at the start of the detention complex.”

Analysis Of Current Situation:
…Factor: Master Currently Restrained In Interrogation Room Lilac, Noted As Extreme Threat Level
…Factor: Dustil Onasi Has Differing But Compatible Objective: Rescue Allies
...Factor: Additional Allies Would Increase Chance For Successful Extraction Of Master
...Factor: Escape Vehicle Required For Successful Extraction Of Master
...Factor: Escape Vehicle Must Be Secured: No Allies Onboard
Conclusion: Aid Dustil Onasi To Rescue The Master’s Allies. Constraints Removed.
Conclusion: HK-47’s Presence On Ebon Hawk Currently Required For Extraction

Personal Vocabulator Tuned To Voice Pattern Of Bastila Shan

Output (External AV Feed): "You may enter the freighter, potential pleasure angels. The welcome droids are powered down in the central common room."

Initializing Command: Unseal and Open Exit Hatch Of Ebon Hawk
...Successful

Input (Ebon Hawk External AV Feed) – Weedy Tech 1: "Huh. That was quicker than I thought."
Voice Stress Analysis: Disgruntled

Input (Ebon Hawk External AV Feed) – Military Mook 1: "You want us to come in with you?"

Input (Ebon Hawk External AV Feed) – Weedy Tech 1: "Nah. I've got the system overridden, now."

Input (Ebon Hawk External AV Feed) – Cross-eyed Tech 2 (sniggering): "Unless, y'know, you want to see a pleasure craft up close."

Input (Ebon Hawk External AV Feed) – Scrawny Tech 3: "It's not a pleasure craft anymore, eedjit! It's just the OS that's been corrupted."

Analysis Of Current Situation:
...Divide And Conquer Is A Useful Strategy
Internal Conclusion: Encourage Techs to Board Separately From Guards

Output (External AV Feed): "Davik Kang does not allow personal bodyguards during your application exam, potential pleasure angels. I must assess your performance without any outside assistance."

Input (Ebon Hawk External AV Feed) – Military Mook 2: "Space, but she's frigging annoying. Just go and do your damn job! We'll head in if you take too long."

Analysis Of Current Situation:
...Factor: Military Mook 1 and Military Mook 2 May Board In Near Future Internal Response: Anticipation

Optical Sensors Tracking: Weedy Tech 1, Cross-eyed Tech 2 and Scrawny Tech 3 Entering Ebon Hawk

Physical: Primary Blaster Primed
Physical: Moving To Common Room

Scanning External Environment
Location: Ebon Hawk Central Common Room
3 Organic Meatbags in Targeting Area

Identification – Weedy Tech 1, Cross-eyed Tech 2, Scrawny Tech 3
Kylah Aramai:

The incessant wailing of proximity alarms was more than a little irritating. The primary shields still held, and with the Leviathan now turning on the Meridus, surely we would be victorious.

It mattered not if we weren’t. I trusted in the Force to warn me of impending doom, and to guide me to an escape route if required. But I didn’t believe it would go that far. If it did... well, if it did, I would ensure our true threat was nullified, first.

But there is more than one threat, is there not? I had my latest orders, and I knew what had to be done. Still, there was no reason why I had to get my hands dirty.

“Nisotsa,” I purred, waltzing onto the command deck, willing the smirk of confidence to remain firmly fixed on my face. Oh, she had more sheer power than me, maybe. But Nisotsa had always been the weakest link in the Jedi Thirteen. Even when I still wore the robes of the ignorant, I had heard enough about Revan’s followers to ascertain that.

The older woman glanced up at my approach, a silent Togruta kneeling some metres away from her. Sharlan’s habits were distasteful, but they provided results. I knew Lord Malak was intrigued at his experiments, even if most of Sharlan’s pets wilted into death earlier than expected.

“Yudan,” Nisotsa whispered. Her yellow eyes blinked at me. “Delia told me that Yudan is alive.”

And this, apparently, is our shining star from Intelligence. I understood why Lord Malak had pulled her from there, to focus on lowly recruitment. Oh, Nisotsa’s resentment about that was often palpable – and, also, easy to manipulate.

“You must suspect something,” I said, striding closer to her. “For, whom has Yudan always been loyal to?”

Nisotsa’s gaze sharpened at the leading question. “Delia reported that Jen Sahara is sedated and restrained in an interrogation room,” she snapped. “You cannot mean to suggest-”

“That Bandon’s death was not happenstance?” I drawled over the top of her words. “Oh, Nisotsa, you and I both know that Yudan must have overpowered and killed him. The question is – why?”

Her mouth opened, and then shut, again, as a calculating look crossed her marked face. “He was never fond of Bandon. Neither were you, as I recall.”

I inclined my head. “No, one must take risks to move up the ranks, I understand that. But our Lord is suspicious of Yudan’s motives – and so should we be. For, if you truly held faith in Yudan’s loyalty to the Dark Side, you would have involved him in that Deralian plot a year ago.”

I felt the dark miasma of Force as it swirled around her in reaction. Turning on Revan had been difficult, for one as emotionally weak as her, and she’d made sure her part was concealed in obscurity so it was never publicly noticed. Or acknowledged.

Nisotsa was all bluster and no strike. She did not take chances. She never had.

“He wouldn’t have turned on Revan, back when she was Lord,” Nisotsa whispered. “But Yudan swore loyalty to Malak. He wouldn’t… he wouldn’t go back to her. Not after everything…”

“Are you sure?” I murmured. “Yudan fancied himself in love with her, for years when she looked at no one bar our Master. And, now, that relationship is truly over. How would a mind-damaged, vulnerable Revan view Yudan, should he rescue her from the Sith?” I paused for a moment, letting that idea sink in. “There’s motive there, Nisotsa. You cannot deny it.”

There was a grim acceptance in the lines of her face, even as I could tell she did not want to believe it. Whether it was the truth, I knew not nor cared - but stupid, emotional Nisotsa held on to her past ties with more fervour than a true Sith should.

It might be true. Yudan wasn’t easy to read. Maybe the poor sap still had feelings for Revan Freeflight. Maybe, despite his Force-strength and intelligence, he was no more than a kath hound sniffing after a bitch in heat.

“You would have me turn on him,” Nisotsa said bitterly. “My last comrade from the Wars.”

I snorted, more inelegantly than I normally would. “Malak is your last comrade, Nisotsa. He understands you far better than you think. And he knows, truly, that your talents have not been utilized in recent months. Who do you think he plans on leading Yudan’s fleet? I will be Lord Malak’s Shadow Hand, and you must accept that. But we need a Supreme Commander, out there in the skies. And you are both more talented and experienced than me, in that area.”

_Nisotsa always needs her ego stroked, the insecure idiot._ I saw the glint of self-interest spark in her eyes, even as she turned away to hide it. Oh, but she was an easy one to mould. Nisotsa had never truly believed in herself, or she would not have hidden in the shadows beneath Bandon and Uthar and myself and everyone else who had led the Sith for Lord Malak’s glory.

Other than our Master, the only one I could imagine who would out-match Nisotsa in sheer power was Yudan – and, frakk, he’d turned into an unambitious icicle himself.

Honestly, I felt like the majority of the Jedi Thirteen had been vastly overrated.

“What do you think Yudan is going to do?”

“I do not know what he plans,” I admitted, “but Yudan Rosh is not one to underestimate.” I didn’t fancy facing him head-on, even with Nisotsa at my side. _He needs to be taken by surprise. A quick strike, when he least expects it._ And my gaze, then, landed on the silent Togruta, whose eyes never wavered from Nisotsa. Sharlan’s pets offered unquestionable loyalty – and were eons more useful than Sharlan himself.

There might be a possibility, there.

“Has Lord Malak specifically ordered action taken, Kylah?” Nisotsa asked, her voice sharpening as if she suspected manipulation on my part. _Once Yudan is taken care of, I’ll have her addressing me with the proper respect my station demands._ If she didn’t, then I’d take care of her, too, in my own time.

“Our Master has demanded his death. He believes Yudan was escaping with Jen Sahara before our forces caught them.” I held Nisotsa’s gaze, then, pushing out gently with a sliver of power. I had to be subtle about it, around Force-users – but it helped if the words I spoke were truth. “She was not restrained, Nisotsa. She walked off the Ebon Hawk, with her lightsabers still on her belt. Surely, Yudan would have restrained her, if he meant to take her prisoner.”

Nisotsa swallowed. “How- how should we do this?” she asked quietly, and I knew then I had won.

“Sharlan’s pet… you must order Sharlan’s pet to strike.” I kept the tiny tendril of Force taut, interleaving it gently in with my words. “We cannot discount Yudan’s strength, but if he is distracted then he will never see it coming. Order the pet to stand ready at your command, Nisotsa. We-”

And I stopped, mid-speech. For I felt Yudan’s aura nearing, then, a grey cloud of bitter watchfulness that clung to him like a second skin. My lips tightened.

“Prepare your pet to strike on your word or mine,” I hissed, with a final thrust of power behind my words. “Yudan comes. He will be on guard for betrayal, since such thoughts are paramount within him. So we must wait until the time is right.”

I spun on my heel, and faced the far side of the command deck, where the door swished open and Yudan Rosh waltzed in.

I did not underestimate him; his power or his smarts. Sometimes, I thought the only reason my Lord had favoured that braggart Bandon over Yudan was due to Yudan’s past loyalties.

Still, Yudan had always been a valuable Dark Jedi. He was a general, a military leader, a valuable resource the same as Karath. Certainly not indispensable, but not one to throw away without reason.

Karath, I’d allow back in command once he displayed proper subservience to his betters. Lord Malak might disapprove if I was too hasty with him.

As for Yudan… I wondered idly if he really was on the cusp of betrayal. If so, did he honestly believe the corrupt Republic would welcome him back with open arms? They were desperate to capture or kill Revan Freeflight, and while Yudan Rosh might not be quite as infamous as her, he’d still ended many, many precious Republic lives. He’d been vilified in the galactic media, much the same as any leader of note within the Sith ranks.

Honestly, the inaccuracies of the mainstream HoloNews sometimes enraged me. If they weren’t championing pretty little princesses like Bastila Shan – and while she might have a gift, she’d always had to be told how and where to utilize it – then they were busy attributing every single injustice from nerf-pox to crop failure on the Sith.

It's because of those whining Senate politicians, sitting on their fat behinds back in the Core. They spent more time bleating to press reporters than actually governing in any efficient manner. It was simply another indication of how inept the bureaucracy was – and another justification for our imminent takeover.

And there were many reasons. After all, the Mandalorians had advanced so far only because of the weaknesses inherent in the structure of the Republic itself.

Revan and now Malak triumphed against the Republic because the Senate was too busy squabbling amongst themselves, or granting concessions and squandering resources that could have been funneled into making the Republic a more efficient, more well-oiled military machine.

In essence, the death toll was on their heads.

Lord Malak would turn it around. I believed in his vision. And he had long since proven himself the strongest – after all, he had vanquished Revan.

There was simply her walking carcass to deal with first.

I wouldn’t be caught unawares by her this time. Not with her in a Force cage, not with Nisotsa as an ally.

My eyes narrowed as Yudan halted, on the far side of the command deck, turning to appraise a Rodian tech busy scratching the spikes atop his skull. The tech was staring blankly at the console he was seated behind. Perhaps he exclaimed something, for the next moment Yudan was striding toward him and commanding his attention.

The tech gesticulated at the console, and then they both bent over it, engaged in conversation.

Did I feel the Force emanate from Yudan, in a subtle brush of psychic power that enveloped the will of that hapless null he was speaking to?

It was difficult to sense plays of the mind from a distance, even for one as skilled as I. Perhaps it was nothing, perhaps it was simply Yudan reacting to my nearby presence with a mental barrier or show of strength.

But if a comm tech had something to say, then he should be directing it to myself or Lieutenant Delia. Commodore, now, I recalled absently. Can’t have a Lieutenant as Acting-Commander of a heavy cruiser.

I strode forward, leaving Nisotsa behind as she murmured commands to that empty-brained Togruta. The Force surged underneath my footfalls, augmenting my speed. As I neared, Yudan slowly turned around to address me.

He was still clad in that ridiculous Mandalorian armour I’d seen from the Leviathan’s docking bay.
At least he wasn’t wearing their stupid T-shaped helm. Those were about as tacky as Revan’s signature mask had been. The Mandalorian combat armour was as boorish and crude as the rest of their overrated warrior culture.

“What is it?” I snapped, indicating the tech.

“Kylah,” Yudan greeted in a flat tone. His gaze on me was vacant and dead. “Ensign Bar’gata was just commenting on the transfer logs and empty state of cell F07.”

I stared at him blankly, my lips pursing. What the frakk did that even mean? "Who cares if some power cell is drained? The Leviathan has hundreds of reserve power cells and, provided at least one generator remains online, we don't even need them!"

There was a slight twitch on Yudan’s face, but he remained otherwise expressionless. “I have assured Ensign Bar’gata that this is planned. Karath arranged for the transfer of all prisoners to an interrogation room, so one should expect the prison cell to be empty.”

I felt my face contort, and wondered if Yudan had deliberately tried to make me appear a fool. “All of them, Yudan? What the frakk does Karath want with the non-Force sensitives?”
One eyebrow quirked at me, but I still couldn’t tell what the damn Twi’lek was thinking. “I’ve just come from speaking with Karath myself,” he commented. “Seems you’ve been throwing your weight around. Perhaps Saul simply desires to take out his frustration with you on the more expendable members of the Ebon Hawk.”

“Karath needs to learn the proper respect for his betters,” I hissed, feeling my composure slip. Yudan had always been reserved and cold – someone I could ignore in conversation, even though I never discounted his power. But now, I had the unerring belief that he was mocking me, in some way.

Perhaps he’d simply spent too much time around that chivhole, Bandon.

"Have you missed the fact that we're involved in a space battle, Kylah?" Yudan drawled. "One, which, I do believe we are slowly losing."

That was both erroneous and demeaning, and my dislike of Yudan solidified. "Then why don't you involve yourself in a useful manner," I snapped. "Even Sharlan Nox has departed to fly a ship. But I suppose you are too interested in sniffing around one of the prisoners, aren't you?"

I'd hoped for a reaction, but the damn bastard disappointed me. The only noticeable change in expression was his other brow rising, to match the first in mock surprise. "Sharlan has left, but I doubt it is to engage in combat. Kylah," he murmured, as his voice dropped to a smooth baritone. "I have the impression you don't trust me. I assure you, I am here to serve Lord Malak - and by extension, you."

I knew my silence was telling, as I struggled to respond in a neutral manner. I trusted him less than I had five minutes ago. We have to find a way to take Yudan out, and soon.

"You shall be Lord Malak's first apprentice, I see that with Bandon's death," Yudan continued, as I refused to speak. "And I understand you must have questions of his demise. Bandon, for all his power, sometimes failed to grasp an opportunity to its fullest extent." His lips curved in a cold smile. "I brought all of Bastila Shan's companions to the Leviathan, not merely the most important one. And I toppled Bandon, an annoying rival of us both, at the same time. If I truly meant to turn on you or our Master, Kylah, I would not have come back here." Yudan gave an unconcerned shrug. "Or, you know, I could have brought onboard an ally to assist me."

I cocked my head. I couldn't read him, and his mental shields had always been stronger than Nisotsa's. If he was genuine, then killing him would be a waste of a truly valuable resource.

What a pity for him that his death warrant is already signed.

I pasted a fake smile on my face, and held his gaze with my own. "As you say, Yudan. Well, since you are here and doubt the efficacy of our starfighters, why don't we both check in with Commodore Delia?"

His head tilted in acquiescence, and we turned to face the viewing platforms at the front of the massive command deck, where Delia hovered over a dozen consoles, and Nisotsa watched us silently with her pet kneeling by her side.

Yudan fell into step, and we strode back toward the array of transparisteel. Outside, there was the brief flash of an exploding snubfighter. Another klaxon wailed deeper within the bowels of the Leviathan, and I cursed the over-sensitive warning systems of this antiquated heavy cruiser.

"After this, perhaps you, I, and Nisotsa can debrief the prisoners," I purred, and with a flash of clarity I suddenly knew how to take Yudan out. What better way to distract Yudan than to activate the torture fields around the woman he had once followed and, supposedly, loved? And what better time than that to strike? I loosed a tinkling laugh. "Won't that be fun?"

xXx

Mission Vao:

A shaft of pain spiked through my skull. I groaned, rolling sideways, for the stupid bedding covers had fallen away and it was cold.

My hands were stuck behind me. I pulled at them and wriggled, but they wouldn’t budge.

Man, I need to pee. I opened my eyes, and a grated metal floor met my gaze. It was a weird diamond pattern, not the same fine square mesh as the Ebon Hawk. I tried sitting up, only to find the way my hands were caught made it impossible.

“(Mission,)” Zaalbar rumbled to my left. His howl was quiet, and even more melancholy than usual.

I stiffened in shock, as memory flooded in like a blast of ice water. Bantha crap! There were restraints pinning my arms behind my back. I was in a cell. We were captured-

“Big Z,” I whispered, blinking furiously as my eyes watered in reaction. I struggled again to sit upright, and this time managed to somehow wedge myself up against a back wall. In front of me shone the blue luminescence of an energy forcefield, separating me from freedom. To my right, there was another one between me and Big Z. And on the left the same, beyond which I could make out the crumpled form of Canderous. My stomach bottomed out. “Where’s everyone else?”

“(They took Carth Onasi a short time ago,)” Big Z howled, low and mournful. I craned my neck to stare at my best buddy in fright. Past Zaalbar, there was one further barrier of a shimmering wall of blue, but beyond it the space was empty. My gaze slid up to the smooth durasteel of the ceiling. The words ‘detainment cell F07’ were embossed in faded amber script that crossed over the entire room. Dotted in the corners were slowly swivelling cameras. “(He was not awake. The guards left with him.)*”

Carth. Oh no. “What about Jen? Juhani? Jolee Bindo?” The old man had started to grow on me. He was a bit snarky, for an old geezer, but he was like, old and stuff. Harmless, really.

Well. Except for the whole Force thing.

But shouldn’t he be in here with us? Unless the Sith found out about his Force abilities…

“(I do not know, Mission,)*” Zaalbar answered. His dark eyes stared sadly at me through the forcefield. I tried an awkward sort of bum shuffle to move closer to him, all the while holding back the tears. Big Z, too, had his hands restrained behind his back, but unlike me his furry legs were also locked with shiny electronic cuffs. Even the Sith ain’t dumb enough to take chances with a Wookiee. I swallowed, and told myself to stay brave.

“(Do not touch the strange blue wall,)” Zaalbar warned, his head dropping. “(It is some sort of repulsion technology, and will shock you backwards.)”

“Oh,” I said uselessly, wondering if Big Z found that out first-hand. I knew my friend – his reaction upon waking would have been to test the strength of our enclosure. But brawn and muscle ain’t gonna get us outta here. I knew that, and kept a careful eye on the cams as I wiggled my arms.
I was cold. Those juma-heads had stripped Calo’s blue-and-white armour from me – and isn’t it strange to be missing that? – and I was left shivering in my underclothes. They’d taken my belt, too – although I’d snuck out a few spikes before I’d left the ‘Hawk.

But my boots were gone, and that’s where I’d slipped the first two. Some chuba-face had unravelled the leather straps I wore as a headpiece over my lekku – they musta found the spike there, too. I’d slid one into a hidden compartment in the armour’s carapace, but of course I didn’t have that anymore.

“They got all my spikes, Big Z,” I whispered, hating the prickling of my eyes as the tears returned. But there were cams on us – even if I’d had a tech spike, chances are guards would come rushing in the moment I tried to use it. And my hands were restrained anyway.

But it woulda been nice to feel like I’d had something to work with.

I should’ve found another way to sneak one in. I remembered hearing about a Twi’lek slicer who’d escaped a high-security prison after smuggling in a spike up his bum. Ew, at the time, the thought had totally grossed me out. Now, part of me wished I’d had the chance to try it.

“(I am sorry, Mission,)” Zaalbar howled mournfully. “(Once my strength returns, I will try testing the limits of the strange blue wall again. I will not give up, my friend. The might of a Wookiee is often underestimated,)”

There was no point in stating the obvious – that repulsion technology was more than a match for the strength of any person, Wookiee or not. Or that he wouldn’t get anywhere, cuffed as he was. And, again, the stupid cams.

’Cause Zaalbar wasn’t someone who gave up easily.

There had there had to be a chance, somewhere. There was always something someone hadn’t thought of.

What about that guy? The Mandalorian that Jen freaked out over?

No, not Jen. Revan.

I swallowed again. She was my friend, and I trusted her, and sheesh, I couldn’t imagine how she was coping with all of this, but I was still struggling just to understand it. I didn’t even know what was truth from legend, really. Revan had been this great Republic hero against the Mandalorians – against Canderous’ laser-brained people – but then she went all bad and stuff. Like Darth Malak was now.

Jen had looked out for me since we’d met. Saved my life heaps. She was funny, curious like me, terrible at pazaak and… and she’s my friend!

But she was also crazy powerful, and we’d all seen flashes of her dark side. On Tatooine. When she ran on Manaan. On Korriban, when she’d discovered Bastila missing.

It was those memories that made me believe her, down in the Shadowlands, when she’d told me the truth. Because, frankly, it sounded like the craziest thing ever.

And then she ran from us again.
“Hush now, child,” the old man cautioned. I stuck my tongue out, but did as he bid. I’d woken up hours ago, after falling asleep in his hut – and sheesh, I got there weren’t any building codes on Big Z’s overgrown homeworld, and it wasn’t like I hadn’t lived in my share of shacks in the scummy Lower City, but Jolee Bindo’s hovel looked like a stiff wind would knock it over.

“Someone approaches.”

My eyes widened, and I darted behind him on reflex. Old and wrinkly he might be, but I’d felt the heat of my blaster when he’d zapped it. He was my only ally in this wild place, unless-

“Is it Jen?” I whispered. “Is she coming back?”

I’d been plenty mad when I woke to find her gone, leaving me here with that weird old man who’d turned up just after she had killed one ronto-turd Dark Jedi and scared another off.

But maybe, I could get why she ran. Revan. Darth Revan. I’d always known Bastila’d had secrets – I mean, for the longest time I’d thought Bastila was like, controlling Jen with the power of her mind or something. But this…

I probably woulda flipped out a whole heap more if Jen hadn’t been freaking out herself.

“No. But it’s not a threat, young pup, that I’m sure of.” He wandered over to the door – not that I’d really call a bunch of twigs tied together a door as such – and casually opened it with a wave of his hand. He seemed relaxed and unconcerned, but I still clutched tight on the Mando blaster I’d nicked. After everything that’d happened today, I was gonna keep myself armed.

I wished I was to be back on the ‘Hawk.

Jolee Bindo faced the blackness of the Shadowlands for a minute in silence. And then, I heard the fast padding of feet close in. I tensed.

“Who are you?” a female voice asked from the darkness beyond. I gasped as I recognized the exotic, feline voice.

“Juhani?” I cried out.

The old man harrumphed. “Come on in. Seems like it’s a day for visitors.”

Juhani blinked solemnly as she stepped into the dull glow of Jolee’s only halogen lamp. I couldn’t help myself, I ran forward and threw my arms around her. The Cathar tensed in surprise, and I felt the muscles of her back ripple underneath my clutching grip. It reminded me then of just how tough she was. Like Big Z, a born warrior.

Hesitantly, I felt a hand pat me gently on the back.

I pulled away, scrubbing at my eyes. I didn’t really know Juhani, and felt a bit embarrassed to be randomly hugging her like that, but the joy at seeing another of my friends down here had kinda been overwhelming, for a second.

But Juhani was so quiet and reserved. I’d probably just made her feel all sorts of uncomfortable.

“Sorry,” I mumbled, stumbling back into the falling-down hut. “It’s been a crazy day.”

“Come in properly before the tach follow,” Jolee invited, waving the Cathar inside. Juhani shot him an uneasy look as she took several cautious steps inside. She twitched slightly when the hermit closed the door with a magical flick of his bony hand.

“I overheard your communication to Canderous,” Juhani murmured, the warrior’s tail on her head swishing behind her as she glanced at me. “Are you alright, Mission?”

“Yeah, I guess.” I shrugged, sniffling a bit. “Could do with a shower and three days sleep. But I’m not badly beat up, not like Jen.”

At that, Juhani’s gaze sharpened and her chin tilted upwards. It was nice, having her here, but I knew she’d come for Jen, really. The thought flashed through my mind – what if Juhani knows the truth? – but it took, like, one second for me to discount that. After all, we’d found Juhani on Tatooine, all crazed and rabid. It was kinda hard to remember our first meeting, with just how quiet and righteous she was these days. Juhani won’t like the truth about Jen. Not with how scared she is of the freaky Dark Side. The thought made me sad. I had the feeling that Jen needed all the friends she could get, right about now – and I didn’t think Jen could, or should, keep the truth from us. It’d eat away at her, in the end.

“Where is-”

“You know, an exchange of names would be nice,” Jolee grumbled, frowning at me. “While I’m all for you inviting your friends over, young pup, it’s considered polite to actually introduce people.”

“Okay, okay, keep your shirt on,” I muttered, rolling my eyes. Far out, but he was a cantankerous geezer. “Juhani, this is Jolee Bindo, a grumpy hermit who likes to live in smelly old huts. Jolee, this is Juhani, a Padawan Order Jedi person.”

“Pleased to meet you,” Juhani said quietly, her head tilted in acknowledgment.

Jolee hummed as he eye-balled her. “Padawan, eh? So you’re travelling with Mission’s friend Jen?”

“I-” Juhani hesitated, before her lips curved into a small, but genuine, smile. “In truth, it is Jedi Knight, now. And yes, I am travelling with Jen Sahara. I had believed her to be with Mission. Where is she?”

“Jolee reckons she’s gone after the Star Map,” I said, trying not to sound sulky about it. “She needed some time alone. She- we both had a bit of a bad time of it.”

…

The sound of Zaalbar saying something dragged me back to the present. I frowned, having completely missed what he’d said, too lost in my own thoughts.

HK-47 had tracked us down, in the Shadowlands, some time after Juhani had showed up. And, then, it wasn’t too long before Jen herself had returned – having successfully found the Star Map and told the others to rally. She hadn’t said much, not around Juhani and Jolee and HK, and the trip back had been quick and quiet.

But, still, it seemed like - despite everything - we’d actually succeeded on Kashyyyk. The Wookiees were freed, the Star Map was found… we’d be able to leave, and Jen’d have some time to… to think about things. To find a way to tell the others, without them going all crazy-ape on her.

But now, we were caught. And Jen was… Jen was likely being tortured or something horrible, considering her past. She wasn’t that person anymore, that evil Dark Lord like Malak, I knew my friend… but I couldn’t see the Sith treating her particularly nicely.

She used to be their old Master.

It still didn’t seem real. And now, Jen might not ever have a chance to tell any of her friends the truth. And while maybe that didn’t really matter, in the grand scheme of things – there was one person who had a right to know.

“(Mission,)” Zaalbar said quietly. “(Do not give into despair. I shall not give up. I shall keep trying, until my last breath, to find a way to rescue both you and Jen Sahara. I swear it.)”

The one who’d sworn a life-debt to her.

“Zaalbar,” I whispered, shuffling closer to the wall. “I need to… I need to tell you something. It’s important. It’s about Jen.”

His dark eyes looked at me seriously through the repulsion wall. There were only inches separating us. I sighed. “Zaalbar, Jen and I found out about her past. It’s not… it’s not good, not really. Bastila had been keeping secrets—”

“(Mission,)” Zaalbar interrupted in a warning tone. “(Not this again. This is not the time, my friend, to be complaining about Bastila Shan. She is—)”

“Shush, Big Z,” I hissed. “Lemme finish. Look, I ain’t blaming Bastila, okay? I mean, she probably wet her pants when she realized the poodoo she was in. Jen is… Jen ain’t Jen Sahara. Her mind, like, got wiped or damaged or something. She’s really Revan.”

Zaalbar blinked at me, his head cocked.

Zaalbar huffed. “(I am not sure I understand, Mission. You are saying that Jen used to call herself a Darth? I believe that is a madclaw title of the Sith—)”

“Zaalbar!” I cried. “I’m talking about Darth freaking Revan! Y’know, Malak’s old master? The one who, like, turned on the Republic and tried to take it over before? The one Bastila is famous for having killed, except it now turns out she actually didn’t?”

His furry brow furrowed with confusion, and I wondered if it was at all possible that Big Z didn’t recognize her name. Surely not, right? I mean, we’re talking about Revan here! THE Revan!

“(I do not follow galactic politics, my friend, you know this. But I am aware of how the shadows of the past can stretch over one’s future.)”

I struggled not to snap out that slashing your brother with your claws ain’t quite the same thing as being a scary Sith Lord, aware that Big Z might not exactly appreciate the comparison – but, far out, he had absolutely no clue at all sometimes!

Big Z was still droning on. “(If there is one thing Jen Sahara has taught me, it is that honour can follow dishonour. She sometimes struggles to remain upon the correct path, I have seen this. And yet, she returns to it, time and again. I will not forsake her.)”

The sound of an entryway opening had us both dwindling into silence. I blinked, and looked up to see two Sith nerf-herders stomp into the room.
“Hey, the cute blue one’s awake,” one of them commented, gesturing at me with a grasped blaster. There was a swishing noise as the hatch shut behind him.

“Looks like the Mando is coming to, as well,” the other muttered. “Man, but I hate guard duty.”

“(One of them said earlier, before you woke, that Canderous Ordo took more than his share of stun bolts,)” Zaalbar murmured to me, as softly as a Wookiee could. There was a faint groan from my left, where Canderous lay. “(I do not envy his headache upon waking.)”

“No talking,” the first one snapped, pointing his blaster at Big Z. My fingers curled in reaction behind my back. “Or grunting in what you beasts call a language. These walls can be light- and sound- blacked, if we want. An’ solitary is the least of what we can do.”

The other one faced me, the shiny mirror of his visor both anonymous and frightening. “Or maybe we’ll just pull the girl out. Y’know, have a little fun before the interrogators do.”

The first one snorted. "With the amount of prox alarms going off, Jarl, I don't reckon the interrogators will even get here. Frig it all, we've taken enough hits out there. I like your idea - let's have some fun before we all blow up into space dust."

And then his visor, too, turned to swivel at me.

I didn’t have to see their ugly faces to spot the leers. Maybe it was a bluff, maybe not. I didn’t know. I was at their mercy.

The mercy of the Sith.

My stomach clenched tighter. There was nothing I could do, and I couldn’t really see any way how anyone could help us now-

A spike of scarlet brilliance suddenly protruded from the centre of the first guard’s chest.

I blinked.

The guard made an awful gurgling noise, before collapsing in a dead heap.

“What the-?” The other guard was scrabbling back, from what seemed to be a freaking lightsaber spinning all by itself in mid-air, but it was no use, the ‘saber bobbed forward and then lunged-

-striking deep through the guard’s chest. His yell was cut-off as he dropped to the ground.

Zaalbar was growling, deep and low in his throat, fur bristling in reaction to the unknown.

I stared in half-horror, half-fascination at the floating lightsaber – the red lightsaber of the Sith – did that mean Jen’s Dark Jedi friend had actually pulled through for us-

“There’s only one person on our side that I’ve seen hide like that,” Canderous whispered hoarsely. His voice was weak, yet threaded through with interest. “But I didn’t think you were onboard with us, Sithkid.”

The breath rushed out of my lungs. “Dustil?” I whispered in wonderment. And, suddenly, he was there, like he’d just switched off the galaxy’s most wizard stealth belt. There was a faint hiss as his lightsaber extinguished, and then he was staring at me in deep concern.

I’d not trusted him, not totally, not after our first meeting – but here he was coming to our rescue, and the relief that surged through me was sharp and profound. Dustil was here, and he was one of “Surveillance,” Canderous grunted. I glanced sideways to see him struggling to sit. He’s in bad shape. I spotted various burns dotted along his bare chest and arms. There was dried blood caked all over one leg, as if Canderous had been hurt before we’d been caught.

He was as under-dressed as me, I realized. For I was sitting in front of Dustil Onasi wearing nothing but a crop top and panties. I felt a furious blush heat my face in reaction. “We gotta get some clothes,” I squeaked.

“I, er, I saw some gear in the next room,” Dustil stammered, looking away. The back of his neck was super red. “It looked like ours, but I didn’t stop to check. There’s guards there, I just followed behind these two.” He gestured awkwardly to the bodies on the ground.

“Surveillance!” Canderous repeated in urgency, and I was surprised to see he’d gotten to his feet somehow. He was as restrained as Zaalbar. “Our cuffs. The walls! Got a plan for those, Sithkid?”

Dustil blinked. “Um, yeah, the vid-feeds are pointing at an empty cell, and the logs have been forged to make it look like you all were transferred, not just my dad.” He looked down at his wrist, fiddling with the comm there. I recognized it - it was a link back to the ‘Hawk. “Teethree, take the repulsion walls offline in cell F07. I’ve secured the area.”

He’s been working with the droids! “Jen,” I whispered, in dawning realization. “She went to do something with the droids, back on the ship, before we left.”

The blue walls enclosing me on three sides flickered, and then vanished.

“Jen put you up to this, she knows you’re here,” Canderous surmised. “Huh. That’s good. At least it might stop her kriffing out about Yudan Rosh.”

Dustil had already taken a few steps towards me, but at that name he stumbled forward, his eyes widening comically. “What? Did you say-”

“Never mind.” Canderous grumbled. “One thing at a time, Sithkid. Get us out of these cuffs.”

The name was familiar. Yudan Rosh? I figured Canderous musta meant Jen’s Dark Jedi friend, for he’d stuffed us over, hadn’t he? Otherwise old man Bindo would be in the cell with us. I frowned, thoughts whirling even as Dustil walked behind me and gingerly seared through my cuffs with his ‘saber, before heading straight to Canderous. I’d heard that name before, I was sure of it.

“Give me the comm, kid,” Canderous ordered, once he was free.

Dustil looked uncertain, as he took a step back from the mostly-naked, muscle-bound Mandalorian who fair towered over him. Dustil was lean in comparison – but he had the Force.

He was a lot more freaking powerful than he looked.

Canderous sighed in irritation. “Look, I ain’t gonna underestimate your talents, okay? But I’ve experience at leading an extraction. Give me the damn comm so I can talk to the droids and figure out our next steps.”

Dustil actually looked relieved when he handed over the wrist-comm. Canderous gave him a sharp nod of approval. “Go free Carpet. Then help him frisk the bodies, we need to move quick and I want to see what resources you can find. Stims, guns, whatever. Hop to it.” With a wave, Canderous looked down to speak into the comm. “Droids, seal this cell immediately so we don’t get interrupted before we’re ready. Then, I need an update on the forces outside this cell. We’ll need to reroute or disable any surveillance before we go on in. I want a snapshot of schematics from this area to wherever Jen and the others are. I need specs of the security—"

With Canderous barking out orders, I watched Dustil as he freed my best buddy from the restraints that had pinned him down. Zaalbar chuffed, stretched, and then lumbered over to the prone corpses to do Canderous’ bidding. Dustil glanced back to me, a warm look in his dark brown gaze as Canderous continued to rap out commands, and Big Z started to rip away armour.

I recognized that look, I reckoned it was on my face as well.

_Hope._

_xXx_
Carth Onasi:

Awareness returned slowly; at first, just a small degree at a time.

Dry mouth, followed by a pounding in my head. Bright light against closed eyelids. Aching in my muscles. I’ve drank too much. Stang, I swore I’d never go that path again-

Then, it became a torrent of images.

The ping of blasters. Juhani falling first. The Dark Jedi walking out from the ‘Hawk, proclaiming himself as Yudan Rosh – a monster from Revan’s Guard of Twelve. A monster that Jen was pinning her hopes on.

Jen, collapsing to her knees, as I faded into unconsciousness.

The breath shuddered in my lungs, and I jerked upright.

I was sitting on a hard-backed chair, having slumped over a plasticeel table. My hands were restrained tightly, locked behind the arms of the chair. And seated opposite me was an old human dressed in the starched uniform of a Sith officer. His shoulders were adorned with Admiral pips.

It took a moment for his weathered face to dissolve into familiarity.

“Saul,” I hissed. My voice came out garbled, the after-effects of too many stun bolts landing at once. A residual weariness ached deep in my bones.

“Carth,” he acknowledged, staring at me with a neutral expression. The years had aged him, I realized with a bitter triumph that was probably emotionally unhealthy. Blast it, I didn’t care. I wanted to see the bastard burn, just like everyone had on Telos. Just like Morgana. “I would have kept you out of this, if it was possible. If you hadn’t been travelling with her.”

His gaze drifted beyond me. I twisted my head sharply in reaction.

Behind me there were three Force cages, all occupied with a slumped, unconscious figure restrained tightly around a central pillar.

The middle one held Jen.

No! Reflexively, I twisted my hands, trying to find any purchase within the solid cuffs behind my back. It was no good; they were hard and unyielding.

“I can give you a clean death, Carth.” Saul’s cold words dragged my attention back to him. And now he was staring pointedly a lightweight blaster placed in the middle of the table. “I owe you that much, at the least.”
A clean death. The bastard actually wants me to agree to a blaster shot.

“Owe me?” I growled. The hate that blazed through me was pure and savage. My arms and legs yanked roughly at my confinement, even as logic told me not to bother. “You more than owe me, Saul,” I seethed. “You owe the millions of people you killed, you betrayed—”

“I made a choice, and had to follow through.” His hard words cut through mine, pitiless and implacable. “I don’t expect you to understand. I knew, the last time we met, that you would never understand.”

Oh, I remembered that conversation. Over the bleak years that followed, I’d cursed myself bitterly for not seeing through him, not grasping the import of his words, the evil path he’d been about to embark on—

I could have pulled out my blaster and shot him dead, that day. Saved Telos before it was scorched into ruin. Or, or, called someone, and warned them that Admiral Saul Karath was on the cusp of treason. The what-ifs would sear with feral rage in my chest, playing over and over, a sickening reminder that I’d had a chance to do something—

Logically, I’d known my guilt was erroneous. For, even if I’d had been sharp enough to suspect Saul’s next actions, no one would have believed me. Admiral Karath and Revan’s Guard have turned on us? Half the Fleet are… attacking Outer Rim Republic worlds? Heck, it’d taken weeks after Saul’s involvement was publicized before I’d truly believed he’d betrayed us along with the Jedi heroes of old.

Yes, I did remember that conversation. Morgana had still been alive. All I’d really been focussed on was seeing her again. Because of him, I never had that chance.

...

“Saul, you’re back!” I said in greeting, walking forward to grasp his shoulders. He was more than just a superior, more than just a mentor. In many ways, he was the father-figure my own had failed to be. “I heard the Fleet returned. It’s been hard to celebrate, with all of you gone for so long—”

“Carth, I don’t have much time,” he interrupted, in a voice terse enough that I wilted into silence. This wasn’t going to be a social visit, then.

“I guess you’ve got a lot of debriefings to look forward to, huh?” I said, stepping back and trying to halt the litany of questions that rose on my lips. The last few months had been crazy. Public fanfare and blowouts all over the Core, as the Republic both celebrated the end of the Mandalorian threat, and mourned those we had lost.

I was itching to go home. Two weeks, before I could head back to Telos. Morgana hadn’t concealed her irritation last holo-call, and I couldn’t fault her for it. Months of peace, and I still wasn’t back. She understood the paperwork, and the ceremonies, and the clean-up required on some of the more ravaged worlds – but she needed me, too. Dustil kept sneaking out to practise illegal swooping, and nothing she’d say stopped him. Heck, he’d started a new college some weeks back, and I’d missed it. I’d missed a lot.

It’d be different, soon, I vowed. The Wars were over, and I’d be home.

“Yes,” Saul assented with a thin-lipped smile. “Carth, I wanted to speak with you, first. This conflict has made… it has made us all re-think a lot of things we once took for granted. The Senate, I hear, overturned military command the day after the triumph at Malachor was broadcast."

He said it like it was news. Surely Saul and the rest of the absent Fleet had kept abreast of events in the Core. They’d been mopping up the last remnants of the Clans along the Outer Rim, or so I’d heard, but little detail of their exact whereabouts had actually trickled back to us. I’d been concerned, on a personal level - and I’d seen the edgy look on some of the military brass left behind.

Why aren’t they back yet? What if there are more Mandalorians out there, when we’d thought Fett and Mandalore had been the biggest threat?

What if the deaths at Malachor aren’t enough?

But Saul was back, now, and I could only assume the Jedi heroes were, too. I didn’t think the bureaucrats Saul reported to - now that peace reigned - would be particularly impressed with the lengthy absence of half the Republic Fleet and all of Revan’s Guard. I didn’t envy Saul the fallout he’d inevitably have to wade through.

Saul continued talking, and I thought I heard an impassioned plea underlying his normally neutral tone. “You’ll recall how we first crumbled beneath the Mandalorian might. How far their strength punched through our defences, before military order was imposed.”

I frowned, unsure where he was going with this. The first years of the Mandalorian Wars had been devastating, true. There’d been enough times when everyone was convinced that we were one defeat away from surrender – or worse, annihilation. Sometimes, I couldn’t quite believe we hadn’t all ended up speaking Mandalorian.

“You’ve been on the frontlines the whole way through, Carth. You saw the transformation when Revan’s Guard entered the war, when the Senate granted full authority to the Fleet. When we didn’t have to wait on Coruscanti approval before implementing the smallest decision.”

“Sure,” I said slowly. The Senate had dragged their feet for years, unwilling to grant supreme power to the Navy or Army chiefs - until things became desperate. Until Revan Freeflight had turned up with a blazing group of Jedi Knights, and inverted everything.

I’d heard she’d stormed into a Senate meeting, demanding complete strategic privileges to be handed over to the brass. Although, the rumours swirling around everyone in Revan’s Guard had always run a bit rampant.

Apparently, Revan Freeflight wore a mask because a Mandalorian had slaughtered her parents and disfigured her face as a child. She was seven-foot tall, a man, no, a Zabrak from a forgotten planet along the Outer Rim. Malak Devari was an assassination robot in disguise, when he wasn’t single-handedly saving millions of orphans from slavery. Meetra Surik cut down half the Jedi High Council with her lightsaber when they refused to follow Revan, and Yudan Rosh infiltrated the Fett Clan and beheaded Cassus Fett with a shiv-blade. I’d rather enjoyed hearing that one, myself, even though I knew Cassus had been personally sighted at the battle of Malachor, and apparently met his end there.

The latest was that Revan defeated Mandalore in hand-to-hand combat on the surface of that cursed planet – which was completely ridiculous since the reports stated it had been destroyed the moment Mandalore had set foot on it.

Yellow news, and all complete trash.
I’d only ever known Talvon Esan, myself, and he was both steady and level-headed. Nothing like the mystical legends most of the grunts expected from Revan’s Guard. Once, I’d met Malak Devari, when his fleet docked on Telos. He seemed a decent sort, too – calm, but with a sharp mind behind his relaxed demeanour.

I couldn’t deny that the Jedi crusaders who had followed Revan Freeflight into the Wars were inspiring figures. That their power was awesome. And that when leaders like Saul had full command, our tactical warfare had been a heck of a lot more effective. But while a military government was a compelling one amidst conflict, it wasn’t what the people needed during peacetime. Otherwise, the Republic might as well be a stratocracy.

“Our forces became stream-lined, brutal and effectual, when we weren’t tied to the bureaucrats back in the Core,” Saul continued, echoing my thoughts. “When we had one powerful leader, overseeing everything.”

“I certainly won’t deny the power of the Jedi, Saul,” I said, feeling a bit puzzled at the conviction I could hear in his voice. “And, yeah, things turned around when the brass could focus on the battles we faced instead of appeasing the politicians back home. But we’ve peace reigning, now-”

“And what happens the next time something threatens our peace, Carth?” he cut in, his grey eyes intent and serious as they held mine. “Do we have to go through the same process, lose the same number of lives and territory, before the Senate cedes any meaningful control back to the military?”

I laughed, and it sounded uneasy, even to my own ears. “Saul, it almost sounds like you’re advocating a military dictatorship.”

He said nothing, but simply stared at me. I felt my brows lowering. “You can’t truly believe that’s the best form of government. The Republic is founded on the sharing of control between its members, to allow every culture, every planet a say-”

“And it almost broke us, Carth.”

His words might ring with truth, but it was a blind truth that ignored its own inherent dangers. “Saul, you only have to look at history to see how badly a one-leader empire turns out. It always relies on a benign dictator staying that way. Who would you even put in that position? Blasted Revan Freeflight?”

He didn’t answer, again, and my confusion was starting to mar with the beginnings of frustration, now. “That would mean- it would mean loyalty to a person, rather than a set of ideals. The Republic is founded on its ideals, Saul! The idea of one person leading it alone is so fraught with risk, that I can’t- I can’t even understand why you’re thinking about this!”

Saul took a step back from me, a look of resignation on his face. “Well. The Mandalorian Wars have made us all reassess our established beliefs, Carth. Loyalty to a leader is important. As a military man, you should understand that.”

“Yeah, sure,” I snapped. “But that’s because I am a military man. I sure as heck wouldn’t want our government to rule civilians that way!”

“Alright, alright, I see we’re not going to agree.” He raised his hands in mild surrender. “Peace will give us all time to thoroughly debate topics like this. I have to depart, now, as I’ve some meetings to attend. I’m sure we’ll see each other again soon.”
He left quickly, after that. Uneasiness sat cold in my gut as I watched him go.

“No, Saul, I would never understand such a cowardly act of betrayal,” I said, the words hard and low as they left my lips. Saul had the codes to bypass the planetary shields. Telos had no warning, no defence, no opportunity to rally against his fleet. No time for any sort of evacuation against an attack that wasn’t just an invasion or conquering of territory. The devastation he unleashed on my home planet had such an effect on the ecosystem that the atmosphere acidified months later, to the point where it was, still, uninhabitable. It ranked right up there with the sort of genocide displayed by the worst of the Mandalorian clans. “Telos was a civilian target. Because of you, it was bombed into obliteration, and the blood of those innocent people is on your hands.”

He sighed, and a look of weariness crossed his face. “Innocents die in war, Carth. You know this. I had to prove myself to Talvon-”

“No, Saul, I would never understand such a cowardly act of betrayal,” I said, the words hard and low as they left my lips. Saul had the codes to bypass the planetary shields. Telos had no warning, no defence, no opportunity to rally against his fleet. No time for any sort of evacuation against an attack that wasn’t just an invasion or conquering of territory. The devastation he unleashed on my home planet had such an effect on the ecosystem that the atmosphere acidified months later, to the point where it was, still, uninhabitable. It ranked right up there with the sort of genocide displayed by the worst of the Mandalorian clans. “Telos was a civilian target. Because of you, it was bombed into obliteration, and the blood of those innocent people is on your hands.”

He sighed, and a look of weariness crossed his face. “Innocents die in war, Carth. You know this. I had to prove myself to Talvon-”

“I am genuine in my offer of a clean death. Your companions will not be granted the same egress.”

Torture. The word slipped through my mind, a lightning strike of horror cutting through the seething hate.

Jen had been convinced it would happen to Bastila in Sith hands. Hurt someone hard enough, and long enough, and they'll do anything to stop the pain. But there was motive to torture Bastila, to turn her, to misuse her gifts. For the rest of us-

This happened to Jen on Deralia simply because she is a Force-sensitive. This is what the Sith do.

Jen had barely survived, last time. It was a mercy she had no recollection of the suffering inflicted upon her by Darth Revan’s forces, but it was the reason behind her mind-damage. The thought of the same happening to Jen a second time rekindled my blistering rage into nothing more than a primal need to pummel Saul into a bloody, broken mess.

“You- you complete bastard!” I thundered, barely feeling the skin of my wrists tear as I wrenched violently at the restraints. “How do you sleep at night? How do you justify torture to yourself?”

“I don’t,” he snapped, and he slung his head back around to face me. There was anger in his grey eyes - hypocritical and unjust considering all he was responsible for. His mouth twisted in a sneer. “This isn’t what I believed in, Carth. This isn’t what I agreed to. The Force- it turns them all insane; into sadistic, perverted shells of what they once were. Malak, Talvon, and even Revan.”

His voice dropped in volume on the last words, grown hoarse and husky. And, again, his gaze moved to Jen. There was something akin to fascination in his expression, and the feeling of unease crawled over my skin, undercutting the blazing anger owning me.

I’ve got to do something. I’ve got to-“Damn you, Saul! You lot already have Bastila Shan. But Jen- the others- they’re not important. They don’t deserve this, they’re not-”

His hand dug deep into my shoulder, and the harsh sound that escaped him was a dark mockery of a laugh; discordant and guttural and broken.

“Of course you don’t know the truth. I didn’t think so. Your presence here wouldn’t make any sense otherwise.”

Saul removed his palm then, but my neck was still craned sideways, glaring at him, inwardly vowing that somehow he would meet his end today, in this very room.

Even if I couldn’t see how. Maybe- keep him talking- and bank on Yudan Rosh of all people coming through for Jen. Or, whatever Jen had planned with the droids in the cargo bay-

I won’t die. I’m not going to take the coward’s way out, and leave the others behind. If Jen’s shown me anything, it’s that there’s always room for hope, for another solution to present itself.

I didn’t know what Saul’s enigmatic words meant, and I didn’t care, not when he started walking ever so casually to the middle cage, the one holding Jen prone as she slumped forward, linked flexisteel belts fastening her arms to her side and her body to the conductive pillar.

They’d even removed her shoes, I realized with an absent sort of horror. Her bare toes seemed completely out of place on the chrome floor. Her hands were barely visible, I could only see the edges of two knuckles – curled into tight fists strapped to her thighs under a belt restraint, as if she were seething with anger even in her unconscious state.

The static of a golden prism enveloped her. They used to employ old-fashioned torture cages and neural disruptors for enemy Force-sensitives, before someone had invented the technology behind Force cages near the close of the Mandalorian Wars. I didn’t know how the tech worked, but the end result was a prisoner completely unable to use the Force. And the central pillar they were strapped to could carry an electric current or inject meds as per the warped desires of the jerk behind the controlling console.

“She doesn’t look like much, here,” Saul commented. It sounded like he was speaking to himself, like he’d forgotten I was even in the room. And through the black tar of my hate, the uneasy confusion grew. Why was Saul so interested in Jen?

How in the Outer Rim could I get him to stay away from her?

“It seems strange, after all this time, that she was brought in by Yudan Rosh.” Saul had never been one for lengthy disquisitions. Short and to the point was his style. Or had been. “You didn’t realize he was on your ship either, did you Carth?”

No. And Jolee’s slumped presence on Jen’s left meant he’d been betrayed – obviously from that black-hearted villain Jen had gambled on.

Saul sighed. “You’re a good man, Carth, and it’s a shame you were dragged into this. They all turn on each other in the end. Revan’s Guard of Twelve.” His voice dropped, a cruel note twisting it. “To think, how many of them were taken out by their own. I truly thought it was going to be great, you know. A better galaxy. A stronger one.”

Maybe, maybe, that was regret underlying his bitterness. I didn’t care. So what if the insanity of the Dark Jedi finally opened his eyes? The bastard has killed too many for any sort of redemption.

“I wonder, Carth, if I should enlighten you to the truth before I grant your death.” His voice switched back to the bland, neutral tone of earlier, and for some reason that fanned the flames of my black fury.

“You can take your clean death, Saul, and shove it where the stars don’t shine!”

Saul gave a dismissive snort of disgust. “You could never view events through a logical frame. Always, your emotion and empathy gets the better of you. I suppose it would be a shame for your trust, once more, to be broken.” He’d turned back to face me, impassive and cold as his flinty stare held mine. My enmity burned as I glared back, taking in the grey complexion of his face, the deep inset lines around his mouth. He looked old. “But there is no such thing as trust, not in this galaxy. As for your precious Jen Sahara-”

A racking cough from behind shocked him into silence. My gaze swung, once more, to Jen.

Her eyes opened, misted and cloudy from the dreams of unconsciousness, before settling on me. My breath stuck in my throat. She blinked once. Twice.

Saul spun around, and I knew his attention was once more fixated on her.

“Carth,” Jen whispered.

Saul took a step closer, and then her gaze narrowed, hardened, and shifted to him.

“You’ve had enough sedation to knock out a rancor,” Saul mused softly. “It’s never easy to calculate the correct dosage on powerful Force users. I suppose I shouldn’t be surprised that you’ve woken. You always did manage to defeat the odds, didn’t you?”

Jen said nothing. I said nothing. And I heard a rough gust of air release from Saul’s lungs. “Kylah says you have no memory from the past. It doesn’t seem possible, but then neither does your capture. Tell me, is it true?”
Jen’s gaze slipped from Saul’s to meet my horrified one. My neck was beginning to pinch with pain at the awkward way I was craning it. There was a flicker of emotion on Jen’s face as she looked at me – relief, maybe, although there was no perceivable reason for her to feel that – and then she glanced upwards, eyes roving around the circular crackle of energy that stopped her from using the Force.

I had no way to disable such a device, but still, I felt the small flame of faith deep within my fear. Jen could always defeat the odds.

That’s exactly what Saul just said about her.

My uneasiness grew into an edgy disquiet. The perils of our situation meant I hadn’t been following the conversation intently, but one thing was becoming abundantly clear – Saul had known Jen, once upon a time. She didn’t express any sort of recognition in return, but he knew her.

_Had he been on Deralia, maybe, when she was captured?_

That idea – that Saul may have been involved in what happened to her – was even more horrifying.

“There was one of these on Korriban,” Jen murmured. I didn’t understand what she meant, at first, but she appeared riveted by the amber prism that enclosed her restrained form. _She’s trying to take stock of her environment, look for a way to escape._ “A Force cage.”

“Yes. It’s technology we stole from the Fett,” Saul said. There was a sharp edge to his voice, as if he didn’t appreciate her ignoring him. My stomach twisted as Saul took yet another step closer, but Jen kept her gaze averted. “If your mind-wipe really is truth, then I suppose you won’t recall. The Fett had portable Force-inhibiting devices that gave them an advantage against Force-sensitives. When we finally got our hands on one, we incorporated the science behind it into prisons that could incapacitate any Jedi we captured. Neural disruptors, after all, are challenging to mass-produce with the specialized crystals they require.”

...did he say mind-wipe?

“They stop the Force from being used within a small radius,” Jen said, her voice soft and almost wondering. “They generate a repelling effect on the connections within the fabric of the Force itself, but it takes an awful lot of power to run. There’s no real way to counter it. Not unless you held some sort of Force amplifier.”

Beneath the restraint that pinned her body to the pillar, I saw her fists clench in what I could only assume to be futile anger.

She didn’t look angry.

“What put me in this cage?” Jen whispered. She was looking at Saul, now. “Tell me, who should I thank when I get out of here?”

At that, Saul laughed. It was a hollow sound that echoed throughout the grotesquely coloured room. “Your overconfidence remains, I see. Even with your mind broken and painted over.” He cleared his throat. “Kylah Aramai and Yudan Rosh restrained the lot of you, and my second double-checked the restraints, the cages - everything. I’m afraid there’s no escape for you here.”

A piercing siren cut through the charged atmosphere. It made me aware of another, higher pitched alarm that had been wailing faintly in the distance since I’d woken.

“Isn’t your ship under attack?” Jen asked. I saw her brows lower in concentration, as the louder siren abruptly ceased. There was an intent, calculating look in Jen’s eyes, like she believed she held all the flip-cards. Her lips twisted in a smirk. “Let me guess, someone relieved you of command? Tut tut. What did you do?”

I could feel my heart thumping. I could feel my confusion being overshadowed with a sinister foreboding. I’d thought the showdown would be between Saul and me – but he was wholly focused on Jen.

Despite our history, despite the years we had worked together, despite his betrayal of me and my entire planet.

And the awareness that Jen was more important to him – for some reason - stoked the fear churning in my gut. He’d offered me a quick death. He’d already said that same wasn’t available for my companions… and now I realized he was specifically meaning Jen. But why?

_Who, exactly, is Jen Sahara to Admiral Saul Karath of the Sith Empire?_

“I was foolish enough to follow a Force-user,” Saul replied. He took another step. “You’re not as broken as we thought, are you?”

“No,” she whispered, and her eyes dropped closed.

And a flare of scarlet gleamed beneath a belt restraint, from one clenched fist.

There was a buzz of visible static, then, enveloping her limb. Saul grunted in surprise, and suddenly Jen was covered in a cocoon of blazing shards of red lightning, her mouth dropping open in a scream-

“Jen!” I yelled in fright. Saul ran forward, just as the metal restraints pinning Jen ripped free from her body, and all three amber forcefields fizzled into nothingness.

There was a blaster in Saul’s grasp, pointed directly at her.

“No! Saul, stop! Don’t do it!” I screamed.

Saul fired.

The next events happened in breakneck motion.

Jen jerked sideways as the blaster bolt spat against the pillar of the Force cage. Something red dropped from her hand as she lifted it; there was a whistling blur through the room, and a metal object slammed into her grasp.

I didn’t recognize it as Saul’s gun until a retaliatory shot was discharged.

Jen stumbled forward into a crouch, dumping the blaster to the ground as she caught herself on her primary hand.

Saul fell back with a thump. My stupefied gaze was transfixed on his chest. He’d only been wearing an officer’s uniform – no armour, no activated energy shield - and the beige material of his shirt was black and smouldering around the edges of melted flesh. The bolt had caught him in the centre of his torso.

Saul Karath was dead.

I swung back to Jen. She’d pushed herself into a sitting position, one limb tucked into her chest, and the other outstretched, calling a small object to her. It glowed a scarlet red as it floated from the ground into her palm. That’s what she had earlier, I realized numbly. That’s what flared in her fist inside the cage.

Slowly, I tried to scrabble my thoughts into a semblance of order. Saul is dead. Jen killed Saul. It didn’t seem real, or possible. I had to double-check his body. I had to get free. And Jen only appeared interested in scrutinizing the thing that must have had something to do with her escape-“She’d done something back on the ‘Hawk, in the cargo bay with the droids. Could they have slipped her something, something the guards hadn’t found on her person?

Her moss-green eyes shot to mine, and they were clouded with bewilderment. “I think… I think, maybe, it’s the redressing of an old debt.” And with those whispered, enigmatic words, her shoulders slumped and she fell forward.

“Jen- Jen, you have to get up!” I cried out. My arms were pinned, my legs restrained, and Jolee and Juhani were both still out. If Jen drifted back into unconsciousness, we were just as damned as if she’d never escaped. “You’ve got to get me out- Jen, you can’t collapse on me now!”

My fears were unfounded. She raised a wavering hand from the ground, and I heard a mechanical hiss as the restraints pinning my wrists together snapped open. A second later, the cuffs around my ankles followed suit.

For a moment, I was struck with the sense of awe at how easy that was to her – even while she was injured, exhausted and likely still feeling the after-effects of sedation. The depth of power at her fingertips had been growing with each step of our journey since Taris, and now seemed immeasurable.

And then, I shot to my feet and stumbled towards her.

“Jen,” I whispered, pulling her upright. She moaned in discomfort, before slumping against me.

“Carth,” she muttered against my chest. I could feel her shaking, ever so slightly. I closed my eyes, unable to make sense of anything anymore.

And as the sirens wailed around us in discordant harmony, we clutched at each other for a brief moment of respite. Her tousled head was tucked under my chin, her arms tight around my waist, and I took a moment to breathe in the sharp relief of having her once more safe in my arms.

Yet, somehow, I had the ominous feeling that the worst was yet to come.

xXx

Kavar Kira:

“Kavar! Kavar, I would have a word with you, now!”

The temptation to keep walking was strong. A brown-clad Padawan stared in askance behind me, at the shrill voice that hollered for my attention. Atris Surik was well-known in the Jedi High Temple for being icily composed, and shrieking like a commoner in a produce market was probably a new look for her.

I should face her. If I slip away without letting her unleash her wrath, she’ll likely track Zez-Kai down. And he’ll just apologise and make excuses and tell her every blasted thing that was said in the meeting.

Suppressing an inward sigh, I stopped striding along the Temple’s courtyard and slowly turned around.

Atris was a sight to behold, having donned an outfit of ivory busk-leather that held the shimmer of cortosis weave about it. While simple in cut and design, it had an elegance and striking appearance that set her apart from most Jedi Masters, who tended towards the nondescript, even after shedding their Knight robes. She spends so much time around her Echani handmaidens that she’s turning into one. There were three of them trailing her, hair like snow and eyes like ice, silent silver wraiths with wooden poles strapped to their backs. An honour guard to the queen of white.

“How dare you, Kavar? How dare you?”

It was pointless and immature to pretend I didn’t understand. “I’m sorry, Atris, is there a problem?”

I could see the moment her outrage turned frigid. Long had Atris held firm to the mandate of controlling one’s emotions, but I always believed she suppressed them rather than rose above them. “You play the fool, Kavar, the way it has always amused you to do so,” she returned, and her voice dropped in both tone and temperature. The three Echani stood behind her, impassive and unseeing, warrior clones of one another. “But I know well who was behind this assembly, and I shall not stand for the insult of being overlooked. I have sat upon the High Council for years longer than you. You have no right to exclude me from an emergency conclave. I, who know more than any Master the truth of current events!”

“Yes, Atris, you do,” I growled, my equanimity slipping, as it always did around her. “A shame you saw fit to share it with the Senate before the Jedi, isn’t it? You can’t expect me to believe you are confused over why we elected to discuss matters without your presence?”

There was a flicker across her face, like she was holding back a sneer beneath a mask of detachment.

Let it go, Kavar. She isn’t worth your anger. The Jedi Code is more than just words. I sighed. “I don’t deny the Senate had to be informed, Atris. None of us deny that. But to find out that…” I trailed off, my gaze slipping to the three guards standing to attention behind her, all within earshot. The closest one was slightly shorter, slightly less identical, than the other two. “To find out that she is still alive in the midst of a dressing down from the highest ranking senators in the Core was a slap in the face to us all. You should have told us.”

My words didn’t touch her. I couldn’t detect the slightest hint of remorse, nor even a smidge of uncertainty. No indication that she even considered her action may have been the wrong one.

“And risk the High Council hiding the truth of Dantooine’s betrayal?”

“Huh.” She’s lost all her trust in us. I wonder, does she even see herself as one of us anymore? “I see it more as an act of desperation than betrayal, Atris. But you should have believed in the High Council. We would not, do not, condone the actions nor the secrecy of the Dantooine Council. This is a war against the Sith, against the Dark Side itself. Of course we would have involved the Senate. The last thing we need is to be at odds with the Republic.”

“And that, is exactly why I told them.” Her face was still and carved from ferracrete. “The Jedi need the Republic, Kavar, and you are a fool if you don’t perceive how much. If you think they don’t hold us accountable for unleashing Darth Revan and Darth Malak upon them, then you are blinder than a shyrack.”

“Name-calling, Atris?” I raised an eyebrow, but her expression didn’t change. “The Jedi work with the Force. Our interest is the harmony and balance of the Force, not appeasing the Republic. The way you are talking, you remind me of the very one you are set out to destroy—”

“Don’t you dare make that comparison, Kavar!” she hissed, and the fire flashed in her eyes before she visibly forced it back down again. “I am an agent of peace, always! I never counselled direct action by the Jedi, but you were certainly tempted once, weren’t you?”

Oh, that one hit below the belt. Funny, how our conversations always seemed to devolve into a dung-slinging match. I blamed it on the Force’s odd sense of humour, constantly throwing together two Jedi Masters who failed to see eye-to-eye on any topic ranging from the true meaning of the Jedi Code to the interpretation of Coruscanti’s five-day weather forecast.

Well, I couldn’t deny she was right. Atris beheld an acidic pleasure in dredging up the past, but I had been tempted. I’d thought, then, I’d made the correct decision in turning away.

But my certainty began to erode many years ago, and now it was barely more than a token effort held up to others. I could still recall, so vividly, the day that offer had been first suggested, from one that had meant so much to me.

...

“Em,” I said in greeting, walking forward to embrace my old Padawan. Sometimes, I still saw her as the charming girl she had once been, always free with her smiles and gentle with her words. She was a younger, golden version of her half-sister; warm instead of ice and considering instead of judgmental. In essence, she was simply one of those sentients everyone felt better for being around.

But Meetra Surik had not been a child nor my Padawan for over a decade, now.

“Master Kavar,” she murmured, pulling back to give me a sweet smile. “Thank you for coming at such short notice.”

“Always,” I replied. “But I must confess my confusion at your presence, here on the front-lines. I’m sure I don’t need to remind you of the Order’s decree on non-interference.”

“I am not the only one here, Master.” Her blue gaze was serious.

I felt my heart turn heavy. I was afraid of that. For a full year, I had avoided Knights Revan Freeflight and Malak Devari as they travelled deep into the Outer Rim with Republic reconnaissance troops, testing the might of the growing Mandalorian threat. Gathering intel first-hand instead of trusting the High Council to disseminate what information was required amongst the Order.

When Revan and Malak returned to Coruscant, I had hoped that would be the end of it. My ties to the resisting Onderonites held me here, thick in the Republic war effort – but I was also a Jedi Master, and to a large extent could find ways to circumvent a direct edict from the Council.

And could be trusted to withdraw from conflict, when necessary.

They were raised too swiftly to full Knights. I don’t know what Karon or Zhar was thinking, testing them so soon. Raw power alone does not make a steady Knight, and without the impediment of reporting to a Master, of course Revan would run off half-cocked at the first glimpse of adventure.
And Meetra Surik, my empathic ex-apprentice, was just another powerful Jedi Knight under Revan Freeflight’s thrall.

“Em, it is dangerous for Jedi to be involved directly in combat. Our connection to the Force enables us a unique perspective to counsel and mediate. Once we turn it into a weapon against our enemies, it forces us along a slippery path that is difficult to turn back from.”

“And yet, here you stand,” she said simply. There was a core of steel resolution in her words. Too many wrote Meetra Surik off as a soft-spoken hood-mouse, a Jedi suited for nothing beyond the placating of younglings and the guardianship of the Archives.

"I have diplomatic obligations to the Onderon front, Em." I tried to wedge a rebuke in my tone, but it did not appear to shake her composure in the slightest. "And these will be complete within the week. I shall be returning to Coruscant. Come with me."

Meetra’s eyes widened. “You are leaving the Wars?”

“For now, I must. It is not idle words when I say that bloodshed affects one’s soul, Em. The damage is amplified for Force-sensitives.” We said it over and over again. And yet some in each new generation thought they were immune.

“I understand that, Master, I do. But inaction against grievous wrong can be just as damaging.” There was a shine of conviction about her, as if she beheld a vision of a perfect future that her involvement in the Mandalorian Wars would somehow make a reality. “It is not the path I can take any longer.”

I could feel my lips thin. “Are they your words, or Revan’s?”

“My will is my own,” she retorted, folding her arms. “I respect and admire Revan, but I would not follow her if I did not also agree with her.”

I sighed. Meetra was a child of peace. She’d barely been more than a tot when Exar Kun fell. “Em, you have no idea of the bloody truth of warfare.”

“Perhaps not, but Revan and Malak do.”

I tried not to let my teeth clench, as I couldn’t entirely refute that. The year in the depths of the Outer Rim would have taught the two troublemakers something about the Mandalorian campaign. And before that- well, Karon Enova had always been a nomad and Zhar Lestin followed her lead. They were both gentle souls, but their wandering ways often landed them right in the thick of hotspots or local skirmishes, regardless of any Padawans they had in tow.

Even in a galaxy enjoying decades of peace after Kun’s fall, there was still conflict to be found. And, somehow, Revan Freeflight always seemed to find it, even when she was no more than a curious Padawan new to the galaxy, equipped only with a sharp mind and a fistful of potential.

“So, the trio of you plan to rush in and save the Republic?” I could hear the disbelief in my voice. “Em, can you not see how hopelessly romantic that sounds?”

A musical laugh escaped her, and her eyes crinkled with amusement. “I think your idea of romance and mine might differ somewhat, Master.” Meetra’s idle comment roused an uncomfortable thought of her with some other Knight the same age, perhaps that intense Twi’lek who shadowed Revan around. Attachments were forbidden amongst the Jedi, ever since the fall-out surrounding Arren Kae’s secret family and subsequent exile, but if Revan and Malak could openly flout the Council, then what was to stop their friends-
“And it is not just us three, Kavar,” she continued. She reached out with one hand, clasping my forearm gently. Her fingers were warm. “There are thirteen of us, talking with the Fleet brass, seeing how we can assist. And many, many more have expressed a desire to follow.”

“To follow Revan Freeflight,” I said flatly.

“No.” Her voice was a gentle whisper, and her hand retreated. I felt the imprint of her clasp still, gently encircling my wrist. “We were hoping you would lead us.”

I was tempted. Despite myself, I allowed Meetra to persuade me to talk with Revan. Oh, Revan was powerful and quick-witted and charismatic indeed. And convinced that she required a Master to legitimate her truancy from the Order.

I’d walked away, in the end. Begged Meetra to follow, and held onto the hope she would.

But she did not.

Atris always blamed me for not returning her beloved younger sister back to the Jedi fold. And that emotion burgeoned into deeply buried enmity after the events at Malachor.

There was word that Revan and Malak returned after Malachor, to visit the Dantooine Enclave, flaunting their victory to the Jedi there before they vanished for months. When they reappeared as self-proclaimed Sith Lords, I was not wholly surprised.

From the moment Karon Enova brought the two of them to Coruscant, I had always suspected the Dark Side would overshadow their destiny. They were found so late in life, their power so staggering, their emotional attachment so entrenched- the odds were against them from the start, really.

After her rebirth as Lord of the Sith, Revan and her fallen Jedi began a campaign of attrition on the planets who had once idolized her as a saviour, and revered the Jedi Thirteen as their heroes.

But there were two who didn’t follow, two who returned to Coruscant, unnoticed and unseen by the galactic stage.

Two who were judged by us, the High Council.

Xaset Terep was in such spiritual torment that he barely said a word. I couldn’t feel him or Meetra in the Force at all, just a void of nothingness where two bodies stood and spoke and breathed. But Meetra’s spirit still held firm, even against the fires of condemnation from the High Council. Even against the bitter recriminations of her elder half-sister.

I only remembered snippets of that awful day of judgement.

Zez-Kai, sad and weary at the thought of so many fallen. “Revan and Malak go to war with the Republic itself. This is the evil you both bought into, the day you elected to leave Coruscant and follow Revan Freeflight into war.”

Vrook, on placement from Dantooine, as disapproving as ever. “You have both been corrupted by years of engagement with warfare; engagement that we directly forbade. You cannot be sensed in the Force itself anymore, as if it has departed you in justice for your actions.”

Atris, throwing verbal daggers at her half-sister. “The only reason you stand before us now is because you have not the power to follow Revan any longer. Otherwise you would be calling her master.”

Lonna, implacable with her final judgment. “You are exiled, and you are a Jedi no longer.”

There were other words, and other speakers, and I knew not what I had said, only that I judged her too.

But Meetra’s final words never left me. She was calm and sure, despite the deep weariness etched into her beloved countenance. Her strength of character was bruised and bloodied, but not defeated. “I stood against the Mandalorians as a guardian for the innocents they were slaughtering in the name of conquest and expansion. I followed Revan then, because I believed in her. But even Revan understood she required the guidance of a Master of the Force.” And her gaze slipped to mine. It didn’t blame, no; rather there was a sadness in the depths of blue, as if she dreamed for what might-have-been. “I would not follow Revan’s way now, had I the Force still within me. But I would do the rest all over again, and call it the correct path.”

And she left us then, forever, Xaset trailing silently in her wake. And they disappeared into space.

They left as Force-blind sentients, and there was every chance they’d met an anonymous death somewhere out there amongst billions.

The Republic remembered Xaset Terep and Meetra Surik only as their Jedi heroes who had never turned on them, never fallen to the darkness that Revan Freeflight unleashed upon the galaxy.

“But I would do the rest all over again, and call it the correct path.”

We labelled her final words pride, an unwillingness to confess accountability, to repent or show humility.

But that had never been the Meetra Surik I had known. She wasn’t overly proud. She was wise beyond her years, considering and thoughtful- and if she still thought she was right, after Malachor, then why had I never stopped to consider that she actually might be?

Why had I never taken her assessment of Revan Freeflight seriously, and considered re-evaluating my own snap judgment?

I’d always credited Revan for her conviction, but thought it tarnished with a self-serving arrogance. But what if she truly desired my counsel as a tempering voice rather than a pretext for Order approval?

What if Revan had first gone to war because she actually cared, rather than as an outlet to advertise her depth of power and bask in the adulation of billions?

For I’d assumed the years of Jedi fawning over Revan’s power must have turned her conceited, eager to stretch her wings and show off to the galaxy. Revan’s breathless audacity at not only flouting the High Council, but also recruiting so many Jedi to join her, smacked of narcissism coated in a fake veneer of heroism.

But Meetra Surik was not the sort of woman to follow a leader like that. And I should have realized it a long time ago. Even after all Meetra had done under Revan’s command - even after losing the Force because of it - she still stood up to the High Council and defended Revan Freeflight, while simultaneously condemning the Sith Lord she became.

What if I had elected to stay, to lead the Jedi Thirteen directly?
The thought was both bitter and devastating.

“Your attention is wandering, Kavar,” Atris spoke, shattering through my reverie. “I’ll take your silence as an admission of culpability.”

Atris, a cold mirror of her half-sister, had never liked me since the day I’d become Meetra’s Master. And after Em stepped up as one of Revan’s top generals, we’d barely been able to avoid the sort of arguments that the both of us, as Jedi Masters, should really be above.

But, well. Too many other Jedi let Atris Surik stomp all over them. Someone needs to be a balancing force.

“I’m sure you’ll do what you want, regardless,” I retorted. “But know this, Atris. The day you decided the Republic Senate trumped the High Council, was the day you showed where your true allegiance lies.”

“I am a Jedi,” she countered frostily. “My truth is the Force, always. But we cannot bring about the peace and order we desire without senatorial engagement. If any of you ever bothered to step down from your lofty heights and engage with the politics of the real people out there, then you would see just how far the Jedi Order has slipped in status and standing.”

It was hard to suppress the urge to roll my eyes at that. So I didn’t bother. “Status and standing should not be the concerns of a Jedi Master—”

“Face reality, Kavar,” she cut in over me. “The billions out there, all they see is us hiding criminals like Ulic Qel-Droma from justice, and then training a new generation where half of them turn into monsters. And you know well what Dantooine would elect to do with her, should she actually survive.”

I snorted. That was making some pretty large assumptions. We are not the Dantooine Council, and they are subject to our decree. “From all accounts, she is not even the person she once was—”

“And that makes it acceptable for her to evade justice?” The breath whistled from her lungs. “So all we require is a little brain damage and repentance, and suddenly we can forget mass slaughter and depravity—”

“You are putting words in my mouth, Atris,” I growled. “I’ve had enough of this. I can only take so much of Atris before I want to go crack my head against a ferracrete wall. “You assume the actions of the High Council, and then denounce the whole of us in favour of politicians.”

“Well.” Her voice was as sharp as ever, and frigid with ice. Her and Em were as different as the seasons. “I see we shall not agree on this. But I hold a seat on the High Council, Kavar.” Her eyes narrowed. “You shall not omit me again.”

“As you will, Atris.” I breathed in, and prepared my parting shot. “But if you continue to put your loyalty to the Republic Senate above your loyalty to the Jedi Order, then you have a lot more in common with Revan Freeflight than you realize.”

She looked as if I’d slapped her. The Handmaiden - the slightly shorter one – flinched. I made a mental note to scold myself later for the warm satisfaction I was feeling, and turned on my heel to walk away.

xXx

Vrook Lamar:
“Their subsidiary reactor is down,” Commodore Tar’coya slurred, pausing only to shoot me a suspicious glare. He didn’t like Jedi, and he didn’t like humans. “Hull shield’s gone, but their squads are swarming all over it. The fact they haven’t shot into hyperspace yet means they haven’t been able to recover the drive.”

“Keep the pressure on the hyperdrive and the secondary hull shield generator,” Admiral Dodonna ordered to the worker behind her. Green and red specks swarmed like bugs through the enlarged holo-map, as busy as the comm techs on the consoles that encircled us.

“Good to see you here, it is,” Vandar murmured, hobbling closer. It’d taken longer than it should have, to navigate the halls of the Meridus and gain access to the bridge. Even when I’d first docked my scoutship in a landing bay of the giant heavy cruiser, I’d had a damn Ensign “suggest” I go to a set of assigned quarters for a “nap”.

It’d been hard not to mind trick my way straight here. Politics and showmanship. Ah, but the blasted Republic brass don’t think much of us these days, do they?

And how could I blame them, really? We should never have trained Revan and Malak. Better to have left them to their non-Force life on that forgotten Outer Rim planet, where the most damage they could have done would’ve been forgotten beyond the walls of a city that the galaxy cared nothing for.

But Karon Enova had always been soft-hearted, even as a kid, and Zhar Lestin was just the same. ‘Had’ been just the same. Zhar is one with the Force now, same as Karon. We might not have seen eye-to-eye, but I couldn’t deny Zhar’s death grieved me. In some ways, I believed Karon and Zhar had made the perfect Jedi Masters – at least, in a galaxy bereft of villains and greed and wrongdoing.

In the real world we had instead, their unending empathy and forgiveness had hindered their outlook on reality. Too often, it just led them into the wrong decisions.

“Phi Eight has auxiliary damage and is returning home. Phi Four is down,” a tech muttered in the background. “Bogey squad six has been eliminated in totality.”

“That’s another enemy squad gone,” Tar’coya said in evident satisfaction. “We’ve had no more signs of stealthed snubs since that first squad. Karath’s losing this one, Forn. We’ve got him, it’s just a matter of time.”

Dodonna said nothing in response, but there was a gleam in her steely gaze that suggested she agreed with Tar’coya’s assessment.

“So, the ‘Hawk is captured,” I muttered, staring back to the holo-map. Dodonna was too busy to brief me, and Tar’coya too resentful. ‘And without an avenue of escape for the Leviathan to run to, this is shaping up to be a victory for us.”

“For the crew of the Ebon Hawk, it is dark times,” Vandar murmured. He did sometimes have a penchant for stating the obvious. “I hold onto hope.”

I said nothing. Freshly risen Jedi Knight Juhani was onboard, her misplaced loyalty sending her down the same route it had so many others. She’d surprised me, with her steel and courage when she faced us in Rwookrrorro. Her trials away from the Order had seen her grow into a formidable young Jedi.

And she laid part of that on Revan’s influence.
Ach, I never liked the woman. And I could admit, in the privacy of my own head, that some of it was irrational and personal. Revan was the spitting image of someone I’d known and cared for a lifetime ago, but her personality was the complete opposite. Outspoken, overconfident, and far too damn powerful.

It would be better, for everyone, if the faltered with the Ebon Hawk still onboard.

Leviathan

I’d been against the damn fool plan from the start. Even having faith in Galdea and Vima’s expertise at occluding what was left of Revan’s mind, I’d still seen risks and little benefit. Mining the dreams of a broken, amnesiac Sith Lord was the act of the desperate – and while I could concede that might very well describe our position in the war, it had galled me that no one else seemed to take the inherent dangers to Bastila at all seriously.

desperate

Bastila. She was a good Jedi. She worked hard, she was principled, and she didn’t take her gifts for granted. I cursed myself for not going on the with her. But Bastila was a heavily experienced Padawan, and used to travelling with other Masters, given the need for her Battle Meditation.

Endar Spire,

I’d hated that. Shipping her out to Kester and Galdea and Kavar, sending her into war so our troops could lean on her emerging Battle Meditation. Bastila should have been spending her years at the Enclave, preparing for the Knight Trials I should have approved earlier - not being dragged from pillar to post as the last advantage our side could scrape together against the wrath of Darth Revan.

But, in that regard, Bastila had known her own mind. She was in many ways a biddable Padawan, but she had a fierce understanding of right and wrong. And for all of Bastila’s self-doubts, she did not shy away from what scared her.

…

“Even now you can still pull out, Bastila,” I said, hearing the gruffness in my voice. I didn’t like being at odds with the Dantooine Council. But everyone, it seemed, saw wisdom in this foolish mission that I did not. “We have enough to go on for now. You don’t need to travel to Tatooine as well.”

“Master Galdea believes it prudent for me to be nearby,” Bastila commented, looking up from the data-book she was scanning. It had something garbled about dream interpretation on the chapter title. “He wishes to know immediately when I experience anything through the mind-link.”

I grunted in mild annoyance. Jedi did not kill their prisoners, and above all we respected the sanctity of life. But everything would have been a damn sight easier if my Padawan had just left that cursed Sith Lord dying on the deck of the Nexus.

“No, Master.” She shook her head faintly. There were smudges of tiredness under her eyes. I didn’t believe my gifted Padawan had slept more than an hour straight since she’d stuffed Darth Revan into a space-worthy escape pod and fled the Deralian sector. “Her dreams have been quiet of late.”

I couldn’t help but feel that was a good thing, even if I was the only one.

Ever since Bastila’s vision had precipitated Nemo’s discovery of the Dantooine Star Map, every Master involved suddenly had an appreciation for Bastila’s unlikely Force-bond – and how it could be exploited to excavate the secrets of Revan’s shattered mind.

And the need to push and use Bastila had grown.
The whole damn mess was turning her into nothing more than a tool to be used. And Bastila, highly-principled as she was, would accept this for the greater good.

I cleared my throat. “Stay on the Endar Spire. You don’t need to land on Tatooine yourself.”

She blinked, before nodding in acquiescence. “Yes, Master. I believe Master Galdea’s intention is to send down a small scoutship to the desert planet, and investigate from there. I will stay behind on the Endar Spire with Knights Seris and Kylah. And- and so shall Jen Sahara.”

I could feel a grumble of discontent wanting to rise from my chest. Since the day Nemo had returned with the Rakatan data, our best academics had been researching the four identified planets for clues. While Darth Malak may have overlooked the obvious, he wasn’t a floundering idiot. The minute he saw an expedition of Jedi to one of the Star Map planets, he would start to wonder if the Rakatan knowledge was unearthed.

The Endar Spire was a sizeable vessel, armoured and battle-worthy, and its cover story as a Republic warship meant it could be called into nearby skirmishes – with the dual benefit of Bastila’s gift being available while Galdea kept the secret mission on track.

I’d argued for greater stealth. A small squad of Jedi, led by Galdea, travelling anonymously in a scoutship or freighter rather than a cruiser that wasn’t exactly easy to hide in space-

But, again, I’d been out-voted. I was getting sick of that.

And now Bastila was one day away from leaving to the first step in the journey Revan and Malak once took.

Huh. Well, at least we’ve got a solid lead on Tatooine. Treasure-seekers and big-game hunters were prevalent on that desert trap, and it was common for them to transcribe their adventures. We’d found reports of a pair of Force-users leading a krayt dragon hunt there three years ago, that had culminated into a discovery of an ancient cave structure a desert tracker had logged about.

Nothing for the other planets. Nemo was inveigling himself with the officious Republic Embassy on Manaan, but what he really need to do was find a Selkath geologist or historian who knew the planet. As for Kashyyyk and Korriban – well. No wonder the others wanted to employ Bastila’s Force-bond. We had little else to go on, and what was the risk to a gifted Padawan when balanced with the outcome of a war we were losing?

Dammit. I felt like cursing to the stars. Sacrifice was part of being a Jedi, but Bastila was so sheltered in some ways, so young-

I harrumphed, well aware it made me sound like a crochety old man. “You are sure, then, that this is what you want to do?”

She was frowning, but gave me a quick nod. “It is what I need to do, Master. And I have faith in Knight Vima and Master Galdea. She- she exhibits no sign at all of her past.”

“Except when she dreams,” I grumbled. Galdea said that was normal. Vima said her consciousness would never recollect a thing, due to the damage she had sustained. I could only see the disastrous consequences if they turned out to be wrong.

And the ethical blurriness. Let’s face it, old man, if this wasn’t Darth Revan whose mind they were scrambling, you’d be a lot louder about the moral ambiguity of stripping someone’s personality away and replacing it with another - all in the name of the greater good.
Ach, but I’d never liked the woman.

“I- well, yes.” Even after all these years at Dantooine, Bastila still retained a polished accent from her Talravinian beginnings. “But of course that is to our advantage. We can only hope we do not require it.”

I gave her a curt nod of acknowledgement. I could see fear in her eyes - fear of the unknown, fear of the wretched woman bonded to her - but Bastila still had the gumption to face down her fear. Truly, she was ready for her trials, if only the blasted Wars would stop interfering.

“There is one thing that bothers me, Master,” she added quietly, her braided hair swinging as her head drooped. “I wish I could enlighten Kylah. She does not appreciate being left in the dark.”

“There are too many involved already,” I warned. “The more who learn, the less of a secret it becomes.”

“I- yes. But I believe she feels slighted, perhaps, that there is information being withheld from her and not me, despite her rank.” There was a tense note to my Padawan’s voice that surprised me. I wasn’t sure if it was concern or irritation toward her friend. Kylah Aramai had always been protective of Bastila, and I hadn’t minded that, truly. She was more experienced and worldly, and seemed to appreciate that many would see Bastila as no more than her Battle Meditation.

I felt my brows rising. “There are other Knights travelling with you as well, Padawan. And, yet, only yourself and Galdea know the full extent of our mission. If Knight Kylah is feeling aggrieved, she should be speaking to a Master, not whining to you.”

Bastila blinked. “I- this is speculation on my part, Master, not a retelling of Kylah’s words. She means only to protect me.”

That was true. Kylah Aramai had done her best to shelter Bastila from the world. As had I. And yet, her Battle Meditation kept shunting her out into the spotlight, again and again.

Young Jedi with vast amounts of power were more at risk to the dangers of the Dark Side. I knew that, and had always vowed Bastila would be as protected as possible, but her gifts had made that a challenging task. Or, more accurately, Revan’s fall and the subsequent requirement for Bastila’s skills to be utilized made it damn near impossible.

Although I had little common ground with Jedi Knight Kylah Aramai, at least she seemed to have Bastila’s best interests at heart.

“Ah, well. Kylah is devoted to you,” I said, with a faith I did not quite feel. “Kylah Aramai will keep you safe.”

…

Kylah Aramai. Now there was a fallen Jedi I could not blame on Revan. No, I had been blind to Kylah’s faults, and allowed a poisonous friendship to flourish with my Padawan, when she had warmed to few others. In that, I had to take some of the blame for Bastila’s current predicament.

“Incoming holo-call from the Leviathan, ma’am!” The breathless words from an excited tech had us all turning. Forn Dodonna strode quickly to the console.

“Put it on speaker,” Tar’coya growled. At Dodonna’s nod, the tech pressed a button and the stocky image of a female Sullustan filled out the small holo-stand.
She blinked, her attention fixed on Dodonna, as the human Admiral shifted to stand in front of the console.

::I am Commodore Delia, Acting-Commander of the Leviathan. I want- I am requesting an acceptance of the full surrender of our forces, and an immediate cease-fire.:: She looked behind herself nervously, before turning back to stare the holo-cam.

“Acting-Commander?” Dodonna questioned. She was bristling with intensity. “Where is Karath?”

::He has been relieved of duty, ma’am.:: The Sullustan’s nervous stutter was the braying of a fleece-lamb, naming a bantha its mother in the absence of its own.

“We’re tracking an escape pod from the Leviathan, Admiral,” a tech three consoles down called out. “Just the one, so it’s probably a runner instead of an organized evac.”

Dodonna hadn’t moved from the transmission. “And who relieved him of duty?” she demanded.

The Sullustan blinked again, her shoulders hitching. ::Please, we know we’re losing. There’s thousands of men onboard. We are ready to surrender.::

“She doesn’t have the authority to make this call,” I growled, and Vandar’s bright gaze shifted to mine as he nodded in agreement. “She’s doing it behind the back of whoever is really in charge.”

“What leader of Darth Malak holds command there, Delia?” Dodonna asked, her voice steely with ingrained authority. “I will not contemplate any cessation of combat without speaking to them. Which Dark Jedi is calling the shots?”

::I-I-,:: Commodore Delia swallowed, before lifting her chin and staring straight into the holo-cam. The rebuilding of her composure looked to take a lot of effort. ::I am in command of the Leviathan. There is no one else. Again, I request a cease-fire of hostilities, and negotiations for our immediate surrender.::

Admiral Dodonna leaned forward and cut the connection abruptly.

“There is a time for mercy, and it is not when an underling is trying to save her troops without the accordance of her superior,” Tar’coya muttered. “No matter how honourable her intentions are.”

“There’s at least one of Malak’s leaders onboard, probably caught up dealing with the crew of the Ebon Hawk,” Dodonna mused. “I would like to know which one. Bandon Stone, Yudan Rosh, Nisotsa Organa… any of their deaths would be a blow to Malak’s offensive. His trained generals are few, now – Force-born or military.”

“As evidenced by a kid running around as Acting-Commander on a heavy cruiser,” I grumbled. I wasn’t exactly adept at devising Sullustan age, but Commodore Delia looked to be a sight of a lot younger than Commodore Tar’coya. From the way Tar’coya wasn’t glaring at me for vocalizing an opinion, I figured I’d hit the mark pretty well dead-centre.

Dodonna clasped her hands together. “An infinite navy of ships is not insurmountable when it has greenhorns at the helm.”

We were losing the war. But Malak’s lack of manpower – both skilled starpilots and leading officers – was a potential weakness of his operation. We needed to knock out Malak and his weapons factory first and foremost, but this could be another pressure point to hammer our counter-offensive home further.
“Karath is onboard too, even if he is disgraced,” Tar’coya growled, and this time he did shoot me a hot glare. “Or already killed by one of those insane Force-users.”

Huh, there was a lot of blame toward us coming from the Fleet. And how much is unwarranted? Two of the three Dark Jedi Dodonna just named were trained by us. Malak was trained by us. And, of course, Revan was too.

This might be her final end, and I could not help but find it fitting.

“Separates us from the Sith, mercy does,” Vandar murmured, taking a halting step toward Dodonna. “To take out a leader, you would sacrifice so many?”

“There’s more than one leader there, Vandar. And they’re all responsible for too many Republic lives.” Dodonna sounded sad, which surprised me. Of course, she had fought on Revan’s side, once. The loyalty amongst the Fleet towards Revan and her followers had been strong as permacrete, then.

It was a familiar story. The war against Kun had been in my lifetime, and Revan Freeflight’s journey was a parallel to Ulic Qel-Droma’s. Young, powerful Force-sensitives that have never known the meaning of humility. It all starts with intentions of saving the galaxy, and always ends with damnation. Kun and Qel-Droma may not have caused quite the same scale of destruction, but their actions had ripped the Order apart. And, yet, we hadn’t learned enough. Revan should have been curtailed, penned-in, kept within the Temple's walls-

Revan should never have been trained in the first place.

“Press on with the attack,” Dodonna ordered, before turning her attention back to the massive holomap. “Any sight of more escape pods?”

“No, ma’am.”

“Any should be followed and destroyed,” Tar’coya added. There was a permanent crease of anger over his large black eyes. I saw the same lines when I looked in the mirror. “They might be housing Dark Jedi or Sith officers that could slip through our line and run-”

“We keep the focus on the shields and the stem of the hull,” Dodonna interrupted. “I don’t want any chance of their hyperdrive becoming operational. Once the Leviathan is destroyed, then we can concern ourselves with escape pods.”

“As you say, Admiral.” Tar’coya’s concession sounded gruff, but he was nodding in agreement. “Although, if they happen to be directly in a snub’s sights-”

“Destroy them.”

Vandar cleared his throat. “And what of the Ebon Hawk, should she escape?”

Admiral Dodonna turned, once more, to appraise Vandar Tokare. There was a grim set to her features. "That is grasping at renni-grass, Vandar.” She sighed, closed her eyes briefly, and then raised her voice in volume to all nearby communication techs. "If the Ebon Hawk is sighted leaving the Leviathan, it cannot be given any chance of escape, not with our interdiction down. One warning, only, for the freighter to dock with the Meridus. If there is the slightest hint of non-compliance, then the Ebon Hawk is to be shot down."

Vandar’s shoulders drooped. He believed the will of the Force was at work, here; that Revan had survived so long because it was her destiny to clean up the damn mess she’d made of her former Bah, I didn’t know. Zhar used to spout that she held the Force’s own luck. Damn fool thing to say. There is no such thing as luck. There are only some born with more power than is safe for one sentient to wield alone. All one has to do is look at all the lives she has ruined-

And my bitter thoughts turned, again, to my Padawan. Being held hostage somewhere under the cruel hand of Darth Malak.

_Bastila is on the Star Forge._

The thought came, pure and potent, like a message from the Force itself. And my logic, slowly, built upon it. _There’s no Malak here above Kashyyyk, nor on the frontlines at Lannik or Rodia. He hasn’t been sighted for weeks._

From the moment Zhar had given me the awful news of my Padawan’s fate, I’d known what Malak’s endgame would be. It wasn’t just our side that saw Bastila as a prize.

_He’s retreated to his damn stronghold, to focus on corrupting her into his own weapon._ The Star Maps were reportedly entrenched in the Dark Side of the Force. What better place to turn Bastila, than on the Star Forge itself?

Always, always, Bastila’s gift turns her into nothing more than a tool. I should have protected her better. I never should have let the Council use her to leash Revan.

The Republic Fleet would rally after this conflict, and turn their eye on the Star Forge. But even with a victory here, it would still take time to organize an offensive, to gather together other capitol ships in nearby sectors-

_A lone scoutship could get there quickly. A single Jedi might be able to infiltrate the Forge and track down Bastila. Because, let’s face it, everyone else’s goal is to destroy Darth Malak and destroy the Star Forge._

Who is actually thinking of Bastila Shan?

The idea budding in my head was an ambitious one. Vandar shot me a frown, as if he suspected the racing of my thoughts. _It might be possible._ Was that actually a spark of excitement, glowing faintly in my chest? _If I could slip in without Malak sensing me…_

But grim realism had a way of shattering such foolish pipedreams.

_Darth Malak is the Master of an ancient Force relic that almost allowed Darth Revan to conquer the Republic within three years. Short of using a neural disruptor, how in the Outer Rim could a Jedi like myself slip in unnoticed?_

I felt old, suddenly. I hadn’t been out in the field for years. My heart desired to rush out in defence of my forgotten Padawan, but my head knew it bordered on feeble-minded.

_If I was caught – and let’s face it, that’s what the odds say – then Darth Malak would have a powerful tool to use on Bastila. Her own Master._

I couldn’t do that to her. But staying here, under the thumb of glowering Republic officers who were one step away from chucking the lot of us out of command, did more than chafe. It damn well aggravated the heck out of me.
I have no other choice. I stay here, I do my best not to snap at the likes of Tar’coya, and I accomplish whatever else I can from the sidelines.

I breathed in a deep, raspy breath, and felt like a useless old fool.

xXx

Revan Freeflight:

The warm comfort of Carth’s embrace anchored me in the depths of craziness we had descended into. My face was pressed against his lightly clothed chest, and I could feel myself shaking. Tightly clutched in my hand, pressed against his back, was a synthetic kaiburr crystal. One that would typically power a Sith lightsaber, for the natural ones did not sing as strongly to those entrenched in Dark Side corruption.

But any Force-sensitive could tap into most kaiburr crystals, even if the end result was unstable. My skin burned, where the discharge of pure energy had sheared over it. It had been difficult to control. Kaiburr crystals worked as an amplifier for Force power, but there were reasons we normally left them enclosed within our lightsabers.

Funny, how snippets of my past knowledge came to me at times, like established fact – even without any associating memory backing it up.

Someone slipped me a lightsaber crystal. Packed it into my fist, strapped it under the restraint, while I was out to it. Someone who understands how to counter Force-inhibiting technology. I shivered, and my thoughts were slow and sluggish. Force-inhibiting technology that originated from the Fett. The synthetic crystal had been enough to offset the hindrance of the amber energy cage, enough for me to pull deep on the Force and short the entire system out.

Why would Yudan do that? Why would he betray Jolee Bindo, and then grant me an opportunity for freedom?

Maybe, to pay a debt from the past on his own terms. Maybe now, the unseen hand that had stopped Yudan Rosh from killing me in the Shadowlands was gone. Now that we had saved one another apiece, he could finish me off without feeling any inkling of guilt.

Because inklings of guilt are paramount to Dark Jedi, an inner voice snarked.

It had to be from him, didn’t it? And there had to be other debts between us, darker debts, unholy reasons as to why he’d sought to kill me in the first place. It felt like - even if this crystal was a gift from Yudan - he was still entrenched in a black cloud of suspicion.

“Jen,” Carth murmured, his voice a deep rumble beneath my ear. “We have to move.” He pulled back, and I looked up to see his warm gaze burning into mine before he leaned forward to kiss me softly.

I didn’t deserve Carth. I was painfully aware of that, as I closed my eyes and felt the soft press of his lips brush against mine. At how wrong this was, to have him touch me without the knowledge of my baleful past. For me to act as if our relationship wouldn’t completely implode from what it was now, once he learned the awful truth.

Carth stepped back, away from me, his attention caught on the remains of the officer who’d stirred a faint recognition in the back of my head. His uniform had marked him as an Admiral – this must have been Admiral Saul Karath… and he’d known me well, judging from our conversation.
My mind was leaden and hazy; I felt the need for at least five cups of caffè just to get a handle on everything going on. I knew it to be the effects of sedation drugs still processing within my system. It should wear off soon. I just have to keep putting one foot in front of the other, and I’ll come right.

Still, if I recalled correctly through the depths of fuzzy memory – then Saul had been the one Carth was so torn up about, just as we’d been leaving the ‘Hawk.

I swallowed. “Who… who was Saul to you, Carth?”

Carth was already kneeling next to the corpse, but shot me a look fractured with wariness. I could see the retort who was he to you, Jen? on his lips. “A mentor,” he said curtly, before turning back to check the vital signs of the body. Like he didn’t really believe the man was dead.

A mentor… And I was reminded, then, of a whispered conversation between Carth and Mission, back on the hot sands of Tatooine.

“There was a man who mentored me when I joined the Republic. He was everything my father was not; intelligent, strong, charismatic.”

“He moulded me into the officer I am today. I grew to care for him more than I ever did my father.”

“He turned traitor and joined the Sith army. Spilled the secrets of the Republic, and commandeered attacks that killed millions of innocent people. All for his own ambition.”

Those words had not been for my ears, and Carth had certainly turned pissy when I’d referred to them later. But, well… I’d not exactly been the most sympathetic or stable back on that desert planet.

As for Saul Karath - he’d had an obvious Telosian accent, same as Carth, but clipped and higher-pitched in tone. And with the slamming of an illusory fist into my solar plexus, I was struck with the premonition that Saul had something to do with Telos.

My stomach bottomed out.

He turned traitor and joined the Sith army. He spilled the secrets of the Republic…

...for me.

Carth’s mentor. Carth’s wife. Carth’s planet.

My gut heaved. My fists clenched, pulling tight against the charred, aching wound on my off-hand. It took all of my self-control to not release the contents of my stomach, right there on the lilac floor of a Sith interrogation room.

Black spots sprang into existence around the periphery of my vision, and I felt both light-headed and nauseous. Later! I can angst later! We must focus on the frelling task at hand! My body was lethargic, and my eyelids blinked over dry eyes that had seen too much. Carth was still searching uselessly for a pulse on a cooling corpse, as if he, too, was currently hamstrung against accomplishing anything remotely productive.

“He’s dead, Carth,” I said tiredly.

Carth sighed. “I used to dream of pointing a gun to his head and pulling the trigger,” he murmured, before shaking his head and clambering to his feet. He turned to focus on me anew, gaze roving over me, taking in the clenched fist at my side, the malformed one at my other-

I heard the intake of breath, and then Carth was striding forward, grabbing my hand-

“Jen,” he breathed in horror, staring down at the blackened edge of my palm where two fingers had once been. The skin around it was inflamed and painful, but not infected. Cauterized wounds rarely turned that way, and Jolee Bindo’s ministrations had certainly accelerated the healing process. “What… what happened?”

My mouth twisted, and oddly enough I felt on the verge of tears. “Yudan Rosh. He… well. We had an encounter in the Shadowlands.”

Carth raised his head to frown at me. His hand was still cradling mine, as if he thought to protect it from worse injury. “And you didn’t kill him on the ‘Hawk?”

How could I answer that? How could I say, that some damaged part of me had actually hoped he was on our side? A Dark Jedi from my past I could barely recall?

And that the crystal in my other hand now muddied the waters even further?

“It’s because he knows you, isn’t it? From… from before?” Carth whispered. He turned, slightly, to stare back at the corpse of Saul Karath. “Just like Saul knew you. I- what did Saul mean about a mind-wipe, Jen?”

My eyes squeezed shut. It was the worst possible place for a conversation that could only end in the worst possible way. We were on the cusp, here, of knowledge there was no turning back from. And I couldn’t stop the incoherent words-

“My mind was… Bastila, she… I don’t know why they picked Jen-”

_Shut it, you babbling idiot!_

I felt Carth tense, and forced myself to open my eyes. The bewilderment in his expression was sharply intense, and I knew my use of Jen’s name had not escaped him. My mouth twisted further, and I swallowed past a blockage in my throat. I felt unsteady on my feet, in my own head. “Jen Sahara died from what happened to her on Deralia, Carth. I needed an identity. But I didn’t know who I was- I, please, this isn’t the place. As soon as we get to the _Ebon Hawk_ I’ll explain everything that I know. I promise. But I need you here, now – we have to get out of here first.”

I kicked myself for the blank shock in his gaze. My composure and logic was completely frazzled, and the befuddlement of sedation had obviously frelled any filter between my mouth and my brain. There was _no_ excuse for letting that detail slip, _here_; that detail which would start Carth questioning absolutely _everything_-

“Please,” I whispered, blinking. “We have to get the others. Find a way out. Please, for now, I’m asking you to trust me.”

He nodded slowly, and raised a hand to touch my cheek. He was dumbfounded and confused, but he was also worried. For me. _Me._

I held onto the feeling tightly, knowing it wouldn’t last.

For how much longer before Carth began to piece together the monstrous truth?
He knew I’d fought in the Mandalorian Wars. He knew I was once a Jedi Knight. But he thought the darkness within me was due to the experience of torture on Deralia… torture that was inflicted upon innocent Jen Sahara, whom he now understood was not me.

Because I was an idiot who couldn’t hold back a simple truth from a man I cared about.

How long before Carth began to speculate that the darkness simply… belonged to the person I was?

The lights flickered, then, three times before cutting out completely. A reverberation thrummed through the ground beneath us, and another wail echoed the one that had been steadily ringing in the background for some time.

A moment later, orange and red strips of halogen lighting sprang into existence along the walls.

I felt Carth’s body tense, his muscles bunching in readiness to move, and his attention shift to the darkened room as he looked around. It was a hideous purple colour in the glow of emergency lights. “See if you can release the others, Je… Jen.” I heard him swallow. “I’ll see what I can find. A weapon, stims, anything to help us leave this place and find the rest of the crew.”

I nodded, as he stepped away and bent to scoop up Saul’s blaster, the one I’d unceremoniously pitched onto the floor. I couldn’t imagine what Carth must be thinking, right now. All I knew was that it would pale against reality.

But the drive to move, to find a way - to stop wasting precious seconds on self-flagellation! - ignited within me. It took more effort than it should have, to pull myself out of this useless funk, and I blamed it on the frailties of my recovering body.

Think, you half-drugged moron. Think and focus on what needs to be done. Get Juhani and Jolee free, and wake them. Find the remainder of the crew. Locate an escape vehicle. And don’t get caught.

I lifted my chin, forced myself to ignore the residual dizziness, and looked around the room proper. The main doors sat to one side, on the edge of a long chrome wall blinkered in the orange-red glow. On the other side was a smaller exit, as if it led to some utility room or service way. In the centre was a plasticeel table with a handful of chairs, one of which had held Carth, and a pair of large footlockers he was busy investigating.

Behind me lay the three inactivated Force cages. I turned, and strode over to the slumped form of Juhani.

The Force-inhibiting field had shorted out around all three cages, but she was still strapped tightly against the conductive pillar. The flexisteel belts cracked and bent as I reached out with the Force - trying to avoid disrupting the unstable crystal still in my grasp, while focusing on ripping apart the molecular bonds of the restraint.

The metal shattered, and I leaped forward to catch the slumped form of the Cathar, staggering back as I did so. There was a thump from the side as Jolee’s body fell to the ground, and I winced in reaction.

“Don’t suppose you’ve found any stims?” I called out, allowing the muscular Cathar to slowly slip through my grasp and land in an inelegant heap on the floor. There was a twitching, still, deep in my muscles, and I opened myself to the Force in reaction.

Fresh power surged through me like a warm torrent of life, brushing away the cobwebs of my mind, and stabilising the unsteadiness of my limbs. Somewhere, far, far away, my bond-sister half-stirred in her slumber. It was with a grim reckoning that I once more raised a shield between us.

And within my clenched fist, I could feel the corrupted mineral react ever so slightly to my Force use, reverberating in a mildly twisted spike of power.

Behind me, a cleaner source of energy echoed it.

“Karon’s ‘saber,” I gasped, spinning around in surprise. Carth had straightened from a footlocker, looking back to me with a frown.

“Your lightsabers are here. No other gear that’s ours… just the lightsabers.”

I walked back to him, feeling his heavy gaze on mine. I heard him breathe in, felt his confusion and concern and burgeoning worry, and bent over to collect the lightsabers that had once belonged to my old Master… and Malak’s.

“That’s pretty fortuitous, don’t you think?” Carth asked. “Why would your ‘sabers be left in an interrogation room?”

“Laziness, maybe,” I muttered, sifting through the remaining detritus in the large locker. Jolee’s ‘saber and Juhani’s were here also, and I put them aside on the darkened floor. Holo-mags, credit chits, a utility belt that I hastily clipped on over my loose singlet. It’d be enough to hold my ‘sabers and contain that cursed crystal, but a pair of boots as well would’ve been nice.

And then I stillled, glancing back to Carth. Laziness would mean all our gear left here, not just weapons. This was deliberate.

Was this some sort of a game to Yudan Rosh, or a genuine attempt to aid? And my gaze swung back to the prone form of Jolee Bindo, who in my plan would’ve been snug in a cell with the others.

And, somewhere, was the wildcard only I knew about. Should I tell Carth about his son?

“Who’s been helping you?” Carth whispered, and I couldn’t tell anymore if he was confused or suspicious. “Did you get the droids out? Are they free?”

“No, I- I don’t know.” But the thought of Dustil had me searching outwards, closing my eyes and drawing deep on the Force-

Nearby sparked the dark aura of three powerful sentients, moving directly towards us.

My eyes snapped open in terror. No, no, there’s four- A fourth one, much weaker than the others, but pulsing a black inverted wrongness in the Force, like a dependent wound with no soul of its own-

“Sithspit, Carth, they’re coming!” I hissed, wildly looking around the room. They’d enter through the main door rather than the service exit I’d noticed on the side, and Juhani and Jolee were completely helpless-

“Who?” he asked, his voice sharp.

“Dark Jedi, strong, I don’t know!” I gasped. “Kylah frelling Aramai and her best buddies, at a guess. I can’t- I can’t let them come across Juhani and old man Bindo like this!”
“Can you wake them up?” he fired at me, stepping forward to clasp my forearms tight. “With the Force?”

“No!” The very idea had me panicking. That was akin to healing, and I’d royally flubbed that one, last time I’d tried on Belaya’s broken ribs. Bastila might be able to do wonders – stars, she’d brought mouthy Mekel back from the other side of oblivion using my Force connection, before immersing the three of us in an awesome healing – but I had absolutely no idea about human physiology!

Whether it was my lack of memory or actually an area I didn’t shine at, I had no idea.

“Carth, I can’t –” I had to leave him here. I realized the truth, then. If I were to give him a chance to escape, the others a chance to wake, I had to face my own demons – and they were mine – on my own.

But the look of growing tenacity on Carth’s face as he accurately interpreted my thoughts meant I needed ammunition.

“Dustil’s here,” I said, my voice low and dark.

Carth’s eyes widened with shock. “What?” he hissed. “What- you can’t be serious?”

“He snuck onboard,” I rapped out, half my concentration focussed on the nearing Dark Jedi, as my gut clenched tighter. “I only sensed him just before… he’ll have got the droids loose, Carth. I ordered them to obey him. He’ll be somewhere on the Leviathan, searching for you. You must wait here, protect the others-” I flung a wild hand towards Juhani.

Carth was pale, shaking his head in disbelief. I didn’t have time, I couldn’t give him time to rally and make the wrong choice-

“Good luck,” I breathed, and strode away, Karon’s ‘saber in my grasp and grim resolution in my soul.

The double doors, also a putrid purple hue, swished open under my command. The room beyond was a large, octagonal meeting room, bereft of any furniture bar a control desk, with additional exits dotted around the wall segments. Most were coloured in varying pastel shades – likely leading to similar interrogation rooms. The lighting was still on mains, here; bright and harsh to my eyes.

Two armoured guards were leaning over the desk, deep in hushed conversation, and barely had a chance to look up before my ‘saber went flying.

The first collapsed. The other was pushed back against the wall beneath the weight of my will, gasping and crying out for help.

I didn’t feel pity. I didn’t feel anger or hate either, just a calm conviction of what I had to do.

I caught the lightsaber, and threw it again. The cries stopped.

The door. An upsurge of power crested within, and I channelled it behind me to the lilac atrocity. I didn’t have to turn around to see the coloured durasteel fuse within the locking mechanism, I could feel the malformations ebbing on the Force. It was enough that no one would be able to - Carth would not be able to - walk through that door. Not without a fusion-cutter or a lightsaber, anyway.

The Dark Jedi were just in the next room. I could clearly recognize one as Yudan, now.
At least I wasn’t risking anyone but myself, here.

“Jen.”

I whirled around in horror. My mouth dropped open, gaping, at the figure standing in front of the permanently closed lilac door.

“Carth!” I cried. “No, no, you weren’t meant to follow me!”

His eyes flicked briefly to the two corpses by the control desk, as if he were taking in just how easily I could dispatch anyone in my way. He’d seen it before, many a time, and each death came quicker to me.

“You could do with a gun at your back,” he whispered. His grasp tightened on Saul’s blaster, and I suddenly saw him from afar, a military soldier clothed in singlet and shorts, barefoot and exhausted, armed with nothing more than solid determination and a frelling blaster against four Dark Jedi!

He was remembering Uthar Wynn. He didn’t believe my riposte regarding Dustil, and thought it a ploy to keep him safe. He was thinking of the end-game, back in the cursed Sith Academy.

“You got to Uthar because he thought you were out cold!” I hissed. What’s he going to do, play dead and hope for a lucky shot? “Dammit, Carth, you have to get out of here! Pick a coloured door and run!”

A silver hatch to our left opened.

And a woman clothed in a burgundy tunic that matched her painted lips stalked in. Dark tresses adorned her bare shoulders, and her slanted yellow eyes narrowed on me. My fists contorted in sick recognition, my teeth gritted in remembered fury. Kylah.

In her wake, an older woman followed, an activated scarlet ‘saber in her grasp. And a young male Togruta, thrumming a muted lesion of ill on the Force. The three of them fanned out into the room, the Togruta walking softly with his head tilted sideways, staring unblinkingly at the older woman.

And behind them all strolled in Yudan Rosh.

He still wore that battered Mandalorian armour, and his expression was blank and fixed solely on me. There was an unlit hilt in his grasp. I wonder if it’s missing a sodding kaiburr. No, I couldn’t count on that. For all I knew, he kept spares in his pocket, ready to plant on comatose prisoners he’d threatened to kill.

His gaze, a sharper, brighter yellow than Kylah’s, trailed down my form and his mouth tightened in disapproval or disgust or something I couldn’t decipher. Next time, leave a frelling robe or suit of armour if my state of undress annoys you so much, you ass. My thumb twitched, close to the ‘saber’s activation button. I could feel my eyes narrowing, glaring hotly at Yudan, as his gaze returned to meet mine.

“Well, well,” Kylah drawled, and my attention wrenched back to her. She took one step closer, some ten metres away now, and her artfully crimson lips pursed. “The failed Jedi experiment escaped her cell.”

“So, Saul was very helpful,” I snapped, shoulders tensing. I heard Carth shift behind me, and cursed him again for his presence.
There was a flicker of suspicion on the groomed face of the humanoid woman staring at me. She wasn’t sure whether to believe my words, and I had no idea how conceivable they were, anyway. Or if it was necessary to protect Yudan in such a fashion, seeing as I still had no idea whose side he was actually on. Sod it all. Just run with it.

“Saul didn’t think I looked good in a cage,” I added. “Neither did I, to be honest.”

“I’m sure you had a lovely reunion,” Kylah purred, her eyes narrowing to slits. She’d coated a thick layer of silver powder around the slant of her eyes, contrasting with the corrupted gleam of yellow. Even her high cheekbones were coloured in shades of pink and rouge, thickly enough that I wondered if she’d been holed up in a refresher unit with a cosmetic kit, while her minions ran around doing the unimportant task of fighting the enemy. “And I’ve been looking forward to ours,” she continued. “The odds are on my side now, don’t you think, Jen Sahara?”

I could feel the susurration of rage kindle inside me. Here was the schutta who’d killed Karon, who’d kidnapped Bastila, strutting in like she was the Dark Lord of the Sith herself-

Dangerous line of thinking, bonehead!

I was barely cognizant of Carth’s faithful presence behind me. I wished him anywhere but here. He’d either get cut down like renni-grass – or live to hear the whole truth. He deserved the whole truth, but not like this. Not like this.

I kept my gaze on Kylah’s yellowing one, breathing the Force out slowly, settling it gently on the occupants of the room. Yudan was stronger than her. The unknown woman, also. The Togruta I was wary of, but didn’t seem to pose as much of a threat, as he took a step back and dropped to his knees in quiet submission.

If Yudan really was my adversary here, then I was facing a powerful trio. One where Kylah was the weakling.

Oh, kath crap in a sandstorm.

One on one, I’d beaten her – succumbing to the Dark Side – but against three?

“No way, beautiful,” Carth said softly. Loyally. “I’m not leaving you.”

Kylah’s eyes landed on Carth, standing behind me, and then widened with elated surprise. “Oh my. That looks remarkably like the Republic soldier I fried back on Manaan. And I did hear you were travelling with the war-hero Carth Onasi. Could they be one and the same?” She laughed, a high, piercing sound that echoed through the room. “My, my, he is resilient. I might keep him as a slave.”

Black, boiling rage surged like a tsunami inside me, like thick tar that threatened to sink into the very marrow of my bones. Passion, rage… use it! It fuels the Force, and can grant me the strength I need!

I couldn’t win, not against three of them, not even if Yudan stepped out – not with such an obvious weakness standing at my back. The Dark Side beckoned, with instant might and gratification, and I would so enjoy gouging out that bitch’s eyeballs before feeding them to her.

With the power of the Dark Side, I might just be able to do that. I could feel I was standing on the very precipice, shaking with fury and the need to relinquish control in return for sheer power and almighty strength. But if I did…

Would I remember to protect Carth? His solid presence behind me was a focus in itself. I loved Malak, once. That withered and died when we embraced the Dark Side. The same cold, logical voice pointed out that, years ago, my driving desire had been to save the Republic. Somewhere along the corrupted path I took, that had lost meaning.

There must be another way. Search for it. The rage pulled back, simmerring, under the most tentative of holds, and I let my gaze land on the unknown Dark Jedi.

She was solemn, staring at me from behind wispy remnants of light hair. Most of it had fallen out, I noted. She was human, my age or a few years older. Deep black crevasses marked her face – Sith markings. Not everyone had them, but those that did had been entrenched in the Dark Side for a long time.

Her eyes, staring at me straight, were the same yellow as Kylah’s. They should have been grey.

…

“Let me take the Countervail and support Yudan,” she entreated, grey eyes shining with fervour. She was leaning over a table filled with datapads and roughly drawn sketches of proposed advances. In the centre of the room shone a holo-map of the Serroco system. “The Mandalorians have us outnumbered and outclassed. Even with Karath’s forces there, it’s going to be a rout. I can get there quickly-”

“Not quick enough,” a holo-image of Malak said. “And even so, the Countervail and supporting fleet won’t be enough to repel Fett if he gets a stranglehold on Serroco. We need to lure the bastard away.”

“Nisotsa, this very information you have unearthed is why I need you in Intelligence,” I answered. I saw the holo-image of Admiral Sara roll her bulbous eyes. She’d never thought highly of Nisotsa, but then Sara only respected obvious power. “This is what you shine at.”

Nisotsa’s grey gaze hardened in resentment. She’d been mediocre as a War General, but brilliant as an Information Specialist. If only I could convince her that this was just as important as leading troops.

…

My eyes widened, still staring at the blonde, and I took a small step backwards. Nisotsa, I mouthed, and her gaze sharpened in response. She was… she was important. Once, she’d been important to me.

My attention swung back to Yudan. They’re from the same time in my past. Yudan’s already tried to kill me, and Nisotsa’s here to do the same.

“I thought you said she recalled nothing, Kylah,” Nisotsa snapped.

“Jen Sahara is a walking corpse of a forgotten time, Nisotsa,” Kylah drawled. Her finger twitched on the hilt in her grasp, and a red plasma beam hissed to life, mirroring the one in the older woman’s hand.

“Really?” Nisotsa’s voice was sarcastic. “Because I think Jen Sahara just remembered me. Didn’t you?” Her voice, raspy and low, challenged me directly.
I licked suddenly dry lips. I heard an intake of breath behind me. “We – we fought together,” I said haltingly. “Against the Mandalorians.”

“Yes. A lifetime ago,” she said simply.

“Nisotsa,” Carth echoed from my side. His voice was shocked. “As in, Nisotsa Organa? Jen, she and Yudan Rosh are the only surviving members of Revan’s Guard - other than Malak himself. And they know you… Saul knows you…” I felt, rather than saw, him step closer to me. I tensed, and his voice dropped lower. “Jen… were you… were you in the Guard?”

My throat dried up. I heard a laugh from Kylah, a sound of delight and mockery, and found I was unable to respond as I turned to stare helplessly at Carth.

Nausea burned in my stomach.

“Jen.” His eyes were glistening with something akin to awe. “There were two unaccounted for after Malachor. That never- that never followed Revan and Malak’s dark path.” He paused, his gaze deeply intent and fixed on mine. “Xaset Terep and Meetra Surik.” He took a deep, shuddering breath. “Do you know who you really are, Jen?”

Oh, sithspit.

“You’re Meetra Surik,” he said quietly, his eyes wide with emotion.

xXx
Kylah laughed. Long, hard and loud, and it verged on hysteria.

Each sound stabbed a jagged spike of heartache in my chest, each laugh was a mocking sign of the inevitable truth Carth was on the cusp of understanding.

Desperate and determined, my gaze fled to the others, my fingers tightening on the hilt of Karon’s weapon as I judged my chances for a sneak attack. But both Nisotsa and Yudan had their attention fixed on me, the former standing motionless with a lit ‘saber tight in her grasp, and the latter strolling casually forward, around Nisotsa and Kylah and towards me, like a felinx slowly circling his prey and closing in.

Nisotsa’s almost-familiar face creased in anger as she stared me down. Whoever Meetra had been – another member of the damned Jedi Thirteen, but I knew no more - it seemed to dredge up bad memories for the blonde human.

“Oh, to connect the dots like that-” Kylah gasped, her chest racking with taunting laughter “-but then still get it so tragically, laughably wrong-” she broke off again, succumbing once more to her hysteria.

My heart was strangled, and a suffocating helplessness held me rigid with inaction. Not here. Carth can’t find out here. Not from Kylah! Carth was frowning when I wrenched myself back to him, his expression deeply confused as he eye-balled the laughing Dark Jedi with a sort of appalled bewilderment.

“There were three women in Revan’s Guard,” he muttered. “Cariaga Sin died before Malachor. Nisotsa’s here. Meetra-” he looked back to me, and I could almost pick out the sparks of different thoughts as they occurred to him, like neurons firing quicksilver through his mind, each trying to manifest some sense out of a situation that made absolutely none. “Maybe I’m wrong. Maybe you weren’t on the Guard, then, maybe just one of the other Jedi who fought with them-”

Oh, Carth. What had I done, to deserve such faith?

“She was in the Guard, alright.” Nisotsa’s voice was raspy where Kylah’s was silk. Kylah could be mocked, distracted into gloating, or scared off by a show of strength. Nisotsa- I wasn’t so sure of. “You Fleet idolized Revan, didn’t you? Named us Revan’s Guard. Revan’s Guard of Twelve.” Nisotsa spat to the side, a glob splattering on the gleaming surface. And I was, still, damnably frozen.

“But the rest of the galaxy knew us as the Jedi Thirteen! And there were four women in the Jedi Thirteen!”

I flinched. Carth’s face was uncomprehending, at first. I could spot the instant a flicker of horrified understanding crossed his face. Disbelief chased it away, but it returned.
“Fo-ur,” Kylah parroted in a falsetto sing-song. “One, two, three, fo-ur. Don’t forget the most notorious one, soldier!”

Oh, it returned.

“No,” he whispered, and he stumbled back in reaction. “No,” he repeated, and I could say nothing in response. “Tell me it’s not true!”

My breath stuck like a bubble of sick in my lungs, and I could only stare helplessly at him. The heartache grew turgid and black.

“Bastila… of course, she killed Revan- she saved your life…” Carth’s face twisted, a look of contorted abhorrence I’d never seen before. Nothing I don’t deserve. I felt the despair as its murky fingers began to encircle my cursed soul.

It was easy to guess his thoughts. His wife, dead. His planet, devastated. His mentor, seduced to treason. And his son, scarred from the crucible of Korriban. Everything that had been destroyed in his life, because of me.

His hatred was recognizable when it dawned. A malevolent hatred directed straight at me. His blaster shook in his hands, and he began to raise it. At me.

The tears were hot as they pricked behind my betraying eyes. My thoughts were chaotic, but my limbs remained frozen. Wildly, I wondered if I’d just stand there, and allow my lover to shoot me dead in front of my old comrades.

I never knew if I would - or even if Carth could follow through - for in that instant there was a snarl from elsewhere, and we were both swept from our feet in an upsurge of Force compression that caught me completely off-guard.

A lifetime of training kicked in. Thumb on off-switch, convert into a roll, a moving mark is harder to target- I was reacting before thinking, before the adrenaline even hit.

The billowing wave of power had us both tumbling backwards, away from each other; but where I landed in a crouch, Carth thudded uncontrolled into the sealed door behind us. Instinct had me hurling up a Force shield around him, but just as I did so a levelled spike of something penetrated straight through my nascent protection.

It was a psychic twitch of the Force, fine and precise and familiar, and it pierced directly into Carth’s mind- I’d felt that before-

“Carth!” I cried, desperation propelling me into a leap from the ground. Pure need had me careening to his side. Someone had directed some sort of attack, and Carth was now an unmoving heap-

My maimed hand roughly slapped his unresponsive, unshaven face; shoved hard at his shoulder-

The despair was beginning to choke.

I can’t fall apart. I must protect Carth-

“What did you do?” I growled hoarsely, spinning around to face Yudan Rosh. I could sense Carth with the Force, but he was no more than a laggard, inert presence, almost as if he were in a drug-induced coma.
“You really don’t recall a damn thing, do you?” Yudan sneered. His eyes were bright slits of resentment. In his shadow, Nisotsa’s expression was a mirror. “Stasis, Revan. A hibernative stasis. One of my many talents. I can make him go deeper, you know. Slow his body down to a fraction of its life-speed.” His voice dropped. “So deep he’ll never wake up.”

“Leave him out of this!”

“Ooh, I think she might actually have feelings for the battered soldier,” Kylah mocked from behind Yudan. “That’ll be an amusing tale to tell our Master. Although, Yudan, I’m a bit surprised you haven’t actually killed the Republic grunt.” There was a shared glance between the two women standing behind him that I didn’t understand. “Why is that?”

Kylah’s venomous words were leading, taunting, echoing through the despair that twined around me like a strangling kshyyv vine. A flash of twisted emotion crossed Yudan’s face, but he didn’t turn to acknowledge Kylah. Oh no, he kept his concentration fixed firmly on me.

“It would be an interesting test,” Yudan said. His voice had switched to neutral; no inflection, no apparent emotion at all. “Would the broken, redeemed Revan stay true to the Light, I wonder, if her new lover was slaughtered in front of her eyes?”

The words carved a pitch horror deep within. But my need, driven and potent, was stronger. Find a solution. My thoughts immediately turned to the logistics of the room.

_I must get Carth out of here. But I don’t know the occupancy of any of the exits._ The Force rallied around me like a charged thunderstorm, discerning a few flecks of nearby life that were entirely eclipsed by the Force-signatures of the Dark Jedi surrounding me. _If Dustil is on the move, he’ll be hunting down his dad. The droids will point him towards the lilac torture room._

Of course, I’d cocked that up by fusing together the locking mechanism, hadn’t I?

“Lover?” Kylah trilled. “My, my, this is going to be even more fun than I thought.”

“Redeemed?” Nisotsa hissed, further back in the room, the acidic bitterness so palpable on her tone that my attention darted to her. She was frowning at the kneeling Togruta, before turning to direct a hot glare at Yudan’s back. “What the frakk, Yudan? She’s mind-damaged and brain-washed, not a frakking paragon of atonement. Don’t make the wrong choice here.”

_There was a service-way into the torture room, wasn’t there? And if someone was sneaking through an enemy cruiser, then service-ways and utility corridors were the best method of transportation, short of shimmying through the sodding air-con ducts._

_I need to re-open the main door, to get Carth back in the room with Juhani and Jolee. And pray to the Force that either they wake up, or Dustil finds them before someone else does._

Yudan didn’t turn for Nisotsa, either. His gaze was still on me, and he began to lift his free hand ever so slowly, as if he wanted to survey my reaction. The Force mobilized around his fist, and I had no idea what his next move was – all I knew was that his last words had been a direct threat to Carth.

There was a snap-hiss, and in his other hand a single beam of scarlet sprang to life.

“What’s wrong with your double-blade, Yudan?” I gasped, standing in front of Carth. He lay prone as if he were guarding the melded lilac door like a frag mine, a weakness of mine in so many ways. _About to explode if he wakes. Or- or I’ll explode if they target him._
The Force shone like pinpricks of light through my skin, stinging with panic and fear and a mounting determination to do whatever was needed to get Carth out of this mess I had caused.

Yudan’s gaze narrowed, a burning beam of golden topaz, and I felt an influx of power immediately surge beneath his feet. My mangled hand scrabbled for Zhar’s lightsaber, and I switched both weapons on as he jumped.

My guard was raised high, a cross-hair of green and cyan, blocking Yudan’s offensive strike as he landed. He pulled back, before lashing out sideways in a blow I mirrored with a block. Like a haunting dance of memory, I found myself descending into a remembered form, mind crystallized in a sharp focus purely on the spectre from my past.

He swung to my good side; I parried with both before counter-attacking with the primary. His deflection was fast, and the return blow launched under my guard, compelling me to dodge sideways as Force burned velocity through my limbs.

He followed, aiming another attack at mid-height that crashed down on both my ‘sabers once more. Dull pain echoed through my weakened hand - the shoto was normally my guard, my defense - but the green wasn’t a shoto, it was longer than I expected, and my grip debilitated besides -

I pushed back the tingle of unease and thrust out high with Karon’s ‘saber.

His single blade blurred like a scarlet curtain of humming death, faster than I expected, knocking the cyan blade aside before smashing down on my secondary guard.

Agony recoiled through the marrow of my injured limb, and Zhar’s weapon was knocked out of my numb, feeble grasp. The green winked out of existence as it fell with a clatter, nudging into fail-safe mode.

The burn of death at my neck had me frozen. I hadn’t even seen the bastard move.

Twin eyes of intense heat glared at me from beyond. “I can master more than one form, Revan,” he whispered, unmoving. My cyan lightsaber was held out-stretched, useless at my side, while his was millimetres from my throat. “This can be useful, in the case of either injury or an unfamiliar lightsaber.”

He didn’t move. The ends of my unruly hair sizzled as they melted against the red plasma. The scorching calefaction against my skin was quickly becoming unbearable.

Ever so slowly, I inched back in retreat. Yudan was suspended in the act of execution, the only sign of life the glow of indecipherable emotion from his cursed yellow eyes. Another step, Carth’s body at my side now, the wall to my back, my injured hand coming to stabilise on the one hilt I still held.

Two hands, one lightsaber. I’d fought like this before. But I found I couldn’t make the first offensive move against Yudan, whose loyalties and motivations were still damnably in question. Something had held him back in the Shadowlands, and it was still there. It was still there. I couldn’t remember him, but it felt like my heart did, and sod it all- if I could have a second chance, and gift that to everyone I’d encountered along the way- Juhani, Kel, Dak, Dustil, even the others we’d let walk free from Korriban – then why wouldn’t I extend that to someone who was only damned in the first place because he’d followed my lead?

Someone who seemed as unable to kill me, as I him?
“Now, pet!”

There was a blur, too fast for my eyes or Force-sense to see. A blank look of shock in Yudan’s gaze as he stumbled back from me, looking down to see someone else’s lightsaber embedded deep in the side of his torso.

Next to him, the Togruta switched off a lightsaber, and slid back into a kneeling position.

Yudan’s ‘saber fell from lifeless hands, thudding to the ground and dying. My disbelieving eyes caught on the charred hole in his armour that betrayed a mortal wound. No. No! His gaze returned to mine, sharpening with pain and intense concentration- I felt the Force around him flare inward, felt it twitch precise and deep, before it guttered out and he collapsed.

And Kylah was nearby, weapon in hand as she launched towards Carth.

“No!” I screamed, urgency driving a tsunami of Force that rippled outwards at her-

Revan?

Shock and desperation concussed through any sense of thought or logic, an implosion of rationale as pure emotion crested to an apex.

Revan. I am here!

My bond-sister was sucked into the maelstrom of despair as it crashed over me, lancing deep into my soul. I could feel Bastila submerging her senses with mine, frantically trying to decipher my chaotic thoughts and churning emotions, taking in the battleground of a heavy cruiser’s meeting room as Kylah stumbled back like a dust-ball in the wind-

Carth. Oh stars, Yudan. I must save Carth, I must get him out-

And our mingled will combined into an awesome drive of power that could rock the galaxy. Carth. The fused durasteel behind me creaked and splintered free, the doors rippling open beneath our resolve. With a roar, we lifted Carth with nothing more than our need, and unceremoniously threw his prone body back, beyond, behind, deep into the damned lilac room that had once held me prisoner.

Another wrench, and the mangled doors were forced shut.

My chest was racked with heavy breaths; deep and fast and furious.

And there was a second of stillness, there, just as the flood was about to overcome me again. A moment of time, an eternity, the briefest stutter- as if I had a choice to make-

Carth was safe. The look of abhorrence on his face was branded in my mind. But he was safe. He was away.

Whatever I did next, it didn’t matter anymore. It didn’t matter.

My gaze skittered around the room, and landed on the Togruta, now kneeling in quiet submission next to Yudan’s body.

And my emotions ignited into frenzy.

It was rage, bursting into flames, scything through the despair, blackening the Force with hate as it rallied around me in a hurricane of chaos. The Togruta was a muted wound through my senses, a festering sore I’d damnably overlooked-

What is that thing?

I will end this evil!

The Force converged into a vacuum, a channel that coerced life in whichever direction I chose, and I centred it directly on the figure of wrongness that sat so silently next to the corpse of one who may have been an ally.

Revan, this is- this is wrong!

I could feel the energy as I forced it from the body of the damned Togruta, draining from him and into me. There was a natural resistance there, but so weak, and I didn’t care anymore- that thing shouldn’t be alive!

There was a screaming from my lungs as the deluge of twisted Force hit my bloodstream, a rush of power and victory that chased away any self-doubt I may have had left. I felt the final spark of life in the Togruta die beneath my will, and it was a sweet annihilation, a reminder that my might was superior.

As the Togruta crumpled into a pile of death, I looked beyond to the others.

You should not do that- Bastila was frightened, worried, and drawn deeper into me than ever before, as if she felt her presence would draw me back from the edge. Her concern for me reverberated, a calming hand against the unstoppable – and it was just strong enough to trigger a thought-stream of semi-rationale logic back to the forefront of my consciousness-

- a life drain like that is considered evil for a reason you felt the taste- you understand that addiction can chain even the strongest-

- and you know that a true Jedi would be unable to twist the Force in such a method of corruption-

- surrendering to unholy fury won’t protect Carth if you lose yourself he is still helpless, even if a door separates you-

- and nothing can bring Yudan back from the dead-

Maybe those thoughts would have been enough for me to step back.

Bastila, shaky and divided, was still holding onto the last vestige of light, a faint flicker casting a fragile glow of tender morality between us both.

And together with my final shards of logic and empathy, it might have been enough.

But then my gaze landed on Kylah. And Bastila noticed.

Kylah. A deathly hiss of acidic enmity. The righteous rage of a betrayed friend dragged through the fires of perdition. And Bastila’s emotions dove-tailed like a falling bomb, pitched directly into the vortex of seething hate I was struggling to break free from.

“Redeemed,” Nisotsa spat. She stood ready, lightsaber held close, gaze glittering with anger and grief and a lifetime of resentment I could taste on the Force. “Yudan was always idiotic about you. Here you stand, a broken husk of what you once were, but still just as corrupted as ever.”
Now, pet! The order had come from her, not Kylah. Nisotsa had directed it, commanded the death of someone who had been a friend to both her and me-

And our mingled hate grew.

“Together,” Kylah murmured, stepping to Nisotsa’s side. “We take her out together. She will not triumph against the two of us.”

Kill her. I am here, Revan. Let us put an end to that schutta, now!

Nisotsa, I breathed, my gaze fixed on the older woman. Bastila’s will buffeted against mine, a roiling presence of acrimony that was a mirror, but she wanted the focus on Kylah-

Nisotsa’s the bigger threat, I snarled in the torrid recesses of our shared psyche.

Then take the weaker link out first!

There was sense, there, beneath my bond-sister’s black desire. And as we gathered up the tendrils of our combined power, and I knew how best to accomplish this- I might not recall my past, but I’d done this on Rii’shn and Manaan-

Fan the hate. Excite the fury. Encourage the pain.

There is only passion.

And the Force shook within. And I fell. We fell.

The power exploded, a billion shards piercing out through my skin, the high of pure dark Force as it peaked my senses, sharper than a spice-induced high, stronger than the whole of the galaxy-

-strong enough to do whatever we want-

And this time, I had Bastila with me. Her power surged through the bond, driving us higher, darker, stronger than ever.

The crackling obsidian aura of a Force-induced berserking rage sprang to existence around me.

The older woman’s eyes had widened in recognition. Names weren’t important anymore. There was only one to keep in my head. Bastila.

Revan, she echoed, and her hatred turned my gaze to the younger sentient. She will feel pain. The pain I have suffered!

Our two adversaries ran forward in tandem, then, but their speed was no match for ours.

We launched sideways, flying across the room and over a table, the Force bending to our command. Poison streamed from my fingertips like a murky ripple of death, and we beheld furious satisfaction as it hit them both.

They weren’t deterred, merely changing their course like a pair of kath hounds hunting down a predator they did not yet understand was about to eviscerate them.

The room was high, and it was a feral joy to leap into the air, to fuel our combined might under my body, to drop one hand beneath and release a shaft of lightning as we crossed.

One staggered and the other retaliated with a mental skewer that ripped through my unshielded mind.

My rage bellowed inside my head.

Our might is greater! Bastila was beginning to understand. And we deflected the psychic attack with no more than a nudge.

We had the wall to my back, now. Fury still owned us, and we lifted my lightsaber high.

But the weapon felt wrong somehow- I could still use it- but there was an unstable edge to its vibration that clashed against the resonance of the howling Force.

Replace it with something better. I felt Bastila’s innate approval, and we reached out with the might of our anger, coiling it tight around our closest enemy, the younger one, and we hurled our capricious lightsaber directly at her.

Even held prone in our Force grip, she managed to deflect it with her grasped weapon. The cyan ‘saber was knocked to the side, sputtered out, and didn’t return.

No matter. We heaved hard on the Force, rage and enmity threading together and augmenting our pull, and her weapon slipped from her grasp before thudding home into mine.

Two steps forward - the woman still held tight by our frenzied will - and we aimed low, gouging straight through her scrabbling legs.

Her screams were sweet, and we were not ready for her to die just yet.

See how the schutta likes that!

A lunge of scarlet from the side; we’d missed the other one coming close, and as we ducked something scored against my shoulder. Bastila’s concern flared, but it was just a flesh wound, and nothing could beat our celerity and might as I spun around to knock a thrusting ‘saber back with my own. The woman’s guard was open for a fraction of time, but it was enough. My maimed hand dropped from the hilt, and whistled forward in a furious jab deep into her soft, fleshy oesophagus.

The woman choked, staggering back, and we felt my mouth curve in a cold smile as we glanced back to the other, lying lame on the ground.

Shards of jagged lightning crackled from her hand, raised in our direction.

She is not the master of that here! And we both thrust out with the Force. I led, and Bastila added might. It was a wave of annihilation, a nullifying field of death that attacked every molecule in front of us, killing the lightning as it fizzled on her outstretched hands.

We stopped the ripple of nothingness just as it touched the woman. Just enough for her to sense it, for it to shrivel the tips of her fingers white, for the sick realization to widen her slanted yellow eyes.

And Bastila’s awe and comprehension at the depths of our combined power oscillated through our minds.

For me, it was merely the homecoming of the damned.

Enough. A flicker of uncertainty, of unease, drifting through our bond. I want her dead, Revan. Dead, now, while we still have the power!
As you wish. And the lightning cascaded from the remaining fingertips of my crippled hand. It was only fair to return the favour, after all, show the schutta how it was really done.

Bright shards of death, and there was no escape for someone who deserved none.

I paused, before the end.

“Bastila is with me,” I whispered. “Our bond is stronger than ever. She is seeing through my eyes, and your cries are sweet.”

Her out-lined eyes widened in outraged denial. And Bastila moved closer to enjoy it.

“This is for Galdea. For the Endar Spire!” Bastila cried, through my lips. “This is for me!”

There was someone else, too. Someone important, to me and not Bastila, someone whose death the schutta had been responsible for. But maybe, at the pinnacle of this colossal power, names and individuals no longer meant anything.

There was only the Dark Side.

The achromatic discharge intensified. It flared out from my hand, in a white-blue cocoon of death around the writhing woman, charring flesh where it entered and exited the body. The other target had recovered- was lurching forward in attack again- so we dropped the ‘saber from my other hand, let it crash to the floor, and raised my second palm to target her in unison.

Crackling annihilation erupted from both hands, and our two adversaries faltered.

We felt their spirits diminish beneath the electrocution, their bodies surrender and their life-sparks dim to near nothing-

Done.

We called the schutta’s lightsaber back, stepped forward, and ground it through her smoking chest.

Bastila’s sense of triumph was intoxicating, even as fear fluttered around its edges.

The power we can wield. It’s unfathomable-

This state doesn’t last long. It burns through a body-

Kylah deserved to die. Bastila’s fear warped into alarm as the rush of victory faded. Perhaps- perhaps not this way. Perhaps-

A death is a death.

I enjoyed it. She was… appalled, now. That is… I should not have enjoyed it. She deserved to die, but- A scrabbling, a way to make sense of it all. I could have told her there was no sense, anywhere in the galaxy. She deserved to suffer. She… but I should not have encouraged you to cause her pain. And I should not have enjoyed it. A deep, shaking sigh. If we had more power, Revan, we could control it instead of succumbing to our base desires. I felt like we were there, we almost had enough, we almost mastered everything-

Somehow, all I thought was that more power would make the darkness even darker.

I must go. Her apprehension crested once more, and I didn’t know if it was due to what had happened here, or where she was currently captured. All I knew was that together, no one could withstand us, and there was little separation between her desire and mine, now. I must go before I draw Malak’s attention. We shall sort this out, Revan. We shall… just come for me, and we will find a way forward.

I will come for you, I vowed. How could I not? There were times, there, when we had felt like one. Her fierce longing to be free was mine, her despair at her helplessness also; just as my blistering rage was hers, and the ancient bedrock of grief that lay beneath everything.

You must go. You must shield yourself. He will learn what happened here, but I will conceal what I can.

Tell Malak I have killed them. All his allies, all his underlings, I stand on his sinking starship surrounded by their corpses.

I will come for you, and I will come for him.

With a sharp yank on the Force, I slammed down the shields between me and Bastila, and once more was submerged in her lack of presence.

There was one still gasping in shuddering breaths, audible throughout the room. The Force bent to my will, bowed to the fury of my hatred and the yawning chasm of my grief. I dragged the older woman upwards with an invisible rope of taut energy.

I no longer knew why I was so angry with her, but still, the emotion was satisfying.

She gasped in my chokehold.

Her suggestion was sound. And my objectives went beyond her death, now. I had to leave, to find my bond-sister.

The fury retreated, and my mind went cold.

I squeezed, hard and brutal, holding it until the woman died in my Force grasp.

I dropped her to the ground.

The arctic influx of power owned me. There was nothing to feel, here; just a clinical matrix of opportunities and objectives. Bastila was important. Both a vulnerability and a strength. The Star Forge would be re-taken. Malak would be eliminated.

The purpose- the end-game- infinite control. With Bastila at my side, we could fix anything, remake anything, better- stronger- to our design-

And the desolation at the foundation of it all could be forgotten.

I would be the master. The weak die, and the strong survive. That was the only purpose.

There is something. Something else. A reason…

It felt like a glitch, a hiccup in the arboreal thoughts that flowed like ice.
The Light isn’t strong enough for what I must do. I don’t know if this will work- it’s time to roll the dice-

It was a fragment from the past, a slippery thought from before the veil of broken memory.

I frowned. Roll the dice? I didn’t need to gamble. Whatever purpose had me stepping first along this path, the ownership of the Dark Side was now paramount.

The Dark Side is the true owner. No one can control the Dark Side. Not even one with the best of intentions. Not even Revan Freeflight.

I felt my fist clench in mild irritation. Looking down, I beheld inky shadows wisping around my fist, a mini-vortex of energy. My head cocked in mild interest. That’s familiar.

And, beyond, my gaze slipped to the dead flesh that was resting at my feet. Something had my gaze lingering. Maybe a remembered grasp of humanity that had all but burned away?

Maybe nothing more than idle curiosity?

The woman’s face was slack in anguished death, dusky lines of charred flesh tracing along the sides of her neck and mingling in with the fading Sith markings. There was red bruising around her neck from my cord of invisible death.

She’d been beautiful, once.

I pushed out with a faint coil of Force, brushing closed her eyelids. It made it easier to recall the colour of her gaze. Memory was such a useless, emotive noose that one had to shrug off to move forward.

…

“They have something, I’m sure of it,” Nisotsa whispered, eyes shining like a silver beacon of fierce intelligence. “You’ve seen the surveillance footage. They took out Knights Tarra and Du’khan like they were Force-blind. The Fett must have some way of counter-acting the Force.”

…

She’d been smart, I recalled absently. Quick to grasp connections.

…

“They’ll break through to the Core,” she murmured, leaning tiredly against a large crate full of armour segments and bot-parts. “That’s always been their goal, but it will happen soon. Victory and pride keep the Clans strong. And if you look at the trade routes they’ve been targeting, you’ll put your credits on Duro as their first mark.”

…

Her loyalty had been worth something, all the more because of her innate caution.

…

“I’ll follow you,” Nisotsa rasped. Behind her, out of earshot, Arran Da’klor was making eyes at her younger cousin. “You’re right, I believe we must take action. But I ask only this: leave Neiza out of it. She’s… she’s too soft for this. Leave her behind on Coruscant. She’s barely more than a Padawan, and even younger than you.”
There was something pressing hard against my temples. The corpse in front of me blurred, shook-

“I’m sorry,” Nisotsa said. “Cariaga... you did everything you could to save Cariaga. Don’t blame yourself, Revan. Please.”

The canyon of grief grew. A tearing, a sharp pain in my head, I didn’t know her - not really – but the emotions were still there - along with jagged shreds of memory-

“Really, Revan?” she mocked gently. “Em and Yudan? You’ve got to be out of your frakking mind.”

My gaze slid to the burnished-gold body metres behind me, across the other side of the room. The desolation turned black with soul-wrenching despair. I didn’t recall him, either, but I knew I should, and now they were dead, they were all dead, and how many had died because they’d followed me-

“Talvon,” I whispered, a shiv-blade tight in my fist. He turned, and I knew the glint in his eyes. Madness. His mouth stretched in a mockery of a grin.

“Master!” he called gleefully. “You don’t mind me calling you that, do you, Revvie? It seems appropriate, these days.”

My lungs were burning as I refused them oxygen. The charcoal flames around my fingertips grew, the bitter self-hatred-

"Neiza!” Arran yelled, his voice twisting in emotion.

"Oh dear," I said softly as the woman suffocated. "Don't tell me you actually care for the girl, Arran?" She had risen into the air, legs twitching spasmodically as her hands scrabbled at her throat. "Lucky for you I am feeling generous. Beg on your knees for forgiveness, and I may yet let her live."

"Neiza- that was Nisotsa’s cousin-

“I curse the day I ever joined your crusade,” Arran hissed. A bubble of bloody spit dribbled from the corner of his mouth. “But you’re right, we were loyal once. And you burned that out of us, burned it out of us all.”

…

They died. They all died.

And I was drowning in the desolation.

I could stay here. Bleak and dead and damned as the rest of them. The ship would falter, sooner or later, and I could break with it. Fall, finally, into the abyss.

And drag Bastila down with me. She will not survive my death. But I cannot survive this. Justice demands I do not. And Bastila’s death is better, better than my evil that now echoes within her. Better than her turning into Malak’s weapon.

Malak. I didn’t know him. But the death of Nisotsa- the death of Yudan- it was too much. Too much. Dark or Light, I wouldn’t be able to take out the man I’d once, by all accounts, loved as fiercely as the stars.

But I could take myself out, before I returned to what I was. Again. Before I led my bond-sister down the same corrupted path I’d led so many others.

I bowed my head to the despair, and was submerged.

xXx

There were noises nearby. They didn’t touch me. I’d been ignoring the sirens for eons, now.

The sear of something hot scorching through metal.

My hand was on Nisotsa’s dead face. My gaze on Yudan’s body, some distance away.

“Someone frakking help me with Dad!”

My fault. My crime. My villainy, leading them all through a life worse than death until their final resting place here on this doomed starship.

A resounding thump of metal slamming onto the ground.

My eyes were dry, now, as if no tears could help. Yudan deserved more. Nisotsa- she’d never seen her own strengths. She’d never believed in herself.

A howl, followed by a young voice. “Whoa! Jen- what’s all that black stuff- Jen, are you okay?”

Had she? I didn’t know Nisotsa. Large holes of nothing in my mind, where the past had been incinerated, and all I was left with were emotions with no grounding in memory. I’d cared for Nisotsa. Yudan was deeply important to me. He shouldn’t be dead-

“Jen!” a feline voice gasped. “Jen, are you alri-“

If I couldn’t handle their deaths-

“Stand back!” An old voice, husked with age or emotion or both. “All of you, get back, now!”

“Do not come near,” I whispered, but I knew my voice echoed on the Force, a vibrating command. “I will be alone. I will it.”
“Juhani, you must take the others back to the ship. Do it now, child!”

“I shall not fail her, Jolee Bindo, like she has not failed me!”

The flames of shadow licked out around me. They were the touch of death, I knew. Like a black hole of life and I was the nexus.

“I have seen this before, child. I can deal with it… this time, I can deal with it. You must guide the others out! The Mandalorian is dead on his feet, the soldier is out cold, and the Wookiee is carrying them both. Those two kids need someone to lead them, and this darn cruiser is losing the battle. Get your people out, Juhani!”

“Leave me,” I breathed, a final warning.

“I’ll follow if I can. I’ll find your trail, and follow with her if it’s at all within my power. But don’t sacrifice any of the others! Go, Juhani!”

I couldn’t pull my hand away from Nisotsa. I couldn’t wrench my gaze from Yudan. He was facing away, strewn on the other side of the room. I saw the charred slice through his armour where the lightsaber had entered, in the side of his gut. He would’ve died within seconds minutes maybe. It surprised me that there wasn’t a pool of blood underneath him. Even with cauterization, a wound that deep should’ve bled out.

Such fragile flesh. In the end, we were all mortal.

Even me.

The others had departed, apart from one spark of life I didn’t know so well. Less attachment, less danger, less grief. Non-threatening. He didn’t step any closer, merely stayed on the periphery of the room.

“So, your game here is to go down with the ship. Huh. Doesn’t sound very smart, young pup.”

“Failure,” I whispered, blinking. I could feel my fingertips clench. I frowned. “Why are you here, old man? It is not mere words when I say I am the bringer of death.”

“Bah.” It was a dismissive sound. A ludicrous response to the likes of me, but still, it was different enough that the edge of my attention caught. “I’m no threat, just a harmless old man you don’t even know. But the others… Now, they’ve got claims on you. You really want to inflict your death on them?”

Inflict my death... it's my survival that's the real affliction.

“It’s safer for everyone, old man.” I didn’t even speak the words. My mouth shaped them, air came out… and somehow the Force whispered them around the room.

The glacier of grief settled beneath me.

“The true failure is giving up, and giving in to despair.”

On another day, I might have laughed at that. “The true failure is destroying the galaxy after murdering your friends. Giving up is a triumph in comparison.”

“Humph.” It was a sound of discontent. “Not sure I like it when you counter my arguments.” He was still some distance away, hovering along the edges of the room. Desolation licked around me in a manifestation of circling anti-light. I wondered absently how close it was to him.

“You should go.” Go, now, before you remind me of those I wish to forget about.

I sensed the man take one step into the room. One small step only, and then pause. “By all accounts, this Malak will take over the galaxy if he’s not stopped. Are you prepared to sit back from that?”

My eyes closed. I couldn’t bear to look at the room anymore. The rancid stench of charred skin and melted hair stung my nose. My senses, slowly returning. “Each time I stumble, old man. Each time I fall. And it’s pitch-dark and the return becomes impossible.” Warm air ghosted over my dry lips. “And if I triumph over Malak and then fall, I won’t return. I could go back to what I once was. Worse than what I once was. For this time, Bastila is Force-bonded to me.” This time our pool of power might be even greater. This time I really will rock the galaxy.

“And if you don’t face him? What happens then?” He took another step. “Then Malak destroys the galaxy in your stead?”

“There’s- others-” I couldn’t finish that. I knew little of Republic troops and Jedi Masters. I knew more, once. I was so involved. My thoughts were polar glaciers that churned only when the fury awoke. The fury was asleep, now.

But the echo of earlier logic still whispered, a faint wind breathing over the hardened snow.

They have the coordinates. They will launch an attack. But against Malak, master of the Star Forge, how far would they get?

Especially if he has Bastila harnessed at his side? I can’t help her yet, and I daren’t drop the shields with her prisoner. She’s failing, she’s falling, and he’ll take advantage-

“Huh. And do they have a chance?”

No. No, they don’t.

Malak’s a fool if he lets anyone close to the Star Forge. The remainder of his armada will be there. And his armada is vast. They’d repel any offence that came close. I didn’t recall the Forge, but it surely had protections, defences- it seemed like the only way to get onboard would be either sneaking in, or tricking Malak somehow.

Tricking… and the only sentient he might act irrationally over is me. That was true, if there was a way to work that to my advantage. Despite myself, despite the penumbra of despair that had iced everything, the cogs of my mind were slowly creaking back into action.

I didn’t want them to. For it meant I’d have to experience the anguish and self-recriminations that were sure to follow. But the thoughts still persisted, fragile and weak as they were.

There’s another line of attack. I have an inside line to the Forge that no one else does. When the time is right, I can drop my psychic block and reach out to Bastila for aid. Our bond is an advantage that rests solely with my survival.

When compared with my links to Malak and Bastila, did anyone else have a chance?

“No,” I whispered.

He harrumphed. “So, again, I ask: are you really prepared to give up?”
The chasm of grief was shuddering. I didn’t want it to break, to flood with emotion, to force me to open my eyes in the bloodied room that held the corpses of those I had once loved-

That I couldn’t even remember. And the lack of recollection was simply another offence in my long list of crimes.

“I kill those who follow me, old man. Even now, once more, I couldn’t hold back the tide of darkness. I can’t master this… I think I thought I could, once, that I could own the Dark Side.” But all that happens is me destroying everything I ever cared for. The Republic. My friends. Myself.

“Well. Young people are idiots. Young people with the Force even more so.” A gusty sigh. “You’ve done some pretty heavy things, I won’t argue with that. But today… I don’t think you can kick yourself too badly over this one. I heard enough to guess you only figured out the truth in the Shadowlands, just as I came across you. So this is the first time you’ve been truly tested since then, ain’t it?”

I blinked. I didn’t deserve any form of understanding, nor did I desire it. “I faced Bandon without slipping,” I mumbled. The Force shook, cracks widening in the ice. “Mission was there.” A focus. A friend. A weakness and a strength. “I chucked Carth out of this room, because I had to protect him. I didn’t think I could bear his death. But Yudan was killed—”

I couldn’t finish that.

“Ah, attachment,” he murmured, taking a third step. “That’s a double-edged sword, that one. The Jedi fear it for its inherent dangers, and the Sith deny it for its empathy. It can drag you down evil paths, and shine light into the darkest corner. I’m not sure the Order would approve, but sometimes they struggle with finding their own arses, that lot. For what, truly, is a life without attachment?”

“It brought me away from the edge on Korriban.” Golden threads anchoring me to my new friends. “But… I had that before. It wasn’t enough then, to stop me embracing the Dark.” The Jedi Thirteen. The Fleet. More, so many more. I had more support and love and attachment back then than now, and I fell anyway. “I turned on those who swore themselves to me. Two of them lie dead in this very room.”

“Well, young pup, I can’t say why you did what you did, and I don’t think you know, either. But if you know who you are right now, and the path you need to follow, then you can take the first step forward.”

“I know I’m dangerous.”

He snorted. “Seems to me, you’re the most dangerous when you go running off by yourself. So, friendly tip: don’t.” He moved closer. I could sense him behind me, now.

“I killed Nisotsa,” I mumbled. “She… she promised her life for my cause. I have- flashes- of others- others I killed- they turned on me, or me on them- I don’t want to remember anymore of this, it hurts—”

My eyes squeezed tight. My shoulders shook. I tried to hold onto the frigid numbness.

The old man harrumphed again. “Ah, what you need is a good cry. But this actually ain’t the time. We have to get back to that freighter of yours, and get you around those who care for you. Mission. Juhani. The Wookiee. The Mandalorian. The soldier.”

Each name caused my breath to hitch further. The last was the worst. Carth.
“They need you. And you need them. A fall to the Dark Side doesn’t just happen in a single moment, you know. And a true redemption… ach, well, I suspect that’s a lifetime of struggle. It ain’t easy, but then the most important things never are. You don’t just wake up one day, decide to turn your life around, and have it happen magically overnight.”

“The Dark Side… it always seems more powerful.” I had needed that power, or had I just desired it? I didn’t know. I didn’t know who I had once been, and I didn’t want to. “Beguiling. Easier.”

“Humph. The last two, maybe. It’s certainly a quicker route to strength. But more powerful? That I’m not so certain of. And in the end, is power what’s truly important? You’ll have to decide that for yourself. Think on your friends when you do.” His hand pressed softly into my shoulder. “There may come a time when you have to make a final choice, when there’s no turning back, and it’s your friends who will help you with that choice. But it ain’t today, young pup. It ain’t today.” He sighed. “So get up, dust yourself off, let’s figure out what to do with that one, and then we’ll head back to your ship before we really are blown into spacedust.”

I was standing without realizing, as if the will of that cantankerous old man was enough to grasp the giant weight of my despair and shake it into order. March, kid! Off to your dorm! Get your schoolwork done, and then you can play! I forced the half-crazed hilarity down, and slowly opened my eyes.

I was going to break, soon. I could feel it approaching, like the angry clouds of a summer storm. Hot and sharp and a painful awareness of emotion I’d shied away from. But I would survive it. I had no choice. I had to clean up my mess, to stop Malak, and to save Bastila- she who had rescued me, once.

I had already survived so much. But I had to survive this too, hollow and exhausted, yet ready to do what I must.

Old man Bindo is right. It was so hard, so intensely hard to make the turn around. The Force sucked into me and blinkered out, and I knew the shaking of my body was simply an emotional response that hadn’t quite hit yet. Only I can take care of Malak… which means I must keep going. And find a way where – this – doesn’t happen again. The conviction was there, but it was battered and crippled and hard to revive. I couldn’t even look at the corpses surrounding me, but I knew Jolee was gesturing at one.

“Well?” Jolee demanded. He sounded impatient. “This is a choice you have to make. I ain’t making this one for you. He’s well corrupted, I can sense it. It’s a very real risk to bring him onboard, and it’s one you have to bear the culpability for.”

“What?” I blinked, confused. I didn’t know how I was still standing. And the old man was talking in code. He was still pointing at Yudan’s body. “What are you talking about?”

Jolee paused, his eyes meeting mine. There was a slight frown wrinkling the lines on his dark-skinned forehead, a considering look in his gaze. He huffed. “Push your senses out. Don’t assume the worst until you’ve double-checked matters. That one ain’t dead.”

That one ain’t dead.

Everything shook around me in disbelief.

The old man stepped closer to the body. “He’s in a deep form of stasis, a physical hibernation,” Jolee mused. The Force flared out from him, gentle fingers of exploration melding into the body on the ground. “Eh, I can see why. That’s a mortal wound, right there. It goes straight through a kidney, the liver, and it’s ruptured his pancreas— he’d live minutes, at most, if he weren’t in a static hibernation. It slows everything down to a fraction of what it was, you see. But even so, his life’s slipping away.” Jolee turned back to face me. “If only you had someone nearby who was a master medic.”

He was wearing a self-satisfied smirk, waggling his eyebrows in a comic display that was completely out-of-place in this charred room of death.

_Yudan… Yudan’s not dead._ Everything blurred again. There was a sharp pain in my chest, and I had no idea if it was relief or unease or just deep confusion.

And my mind, the slow lumbering beast bowed deep beneath the weight of despair, began a burdened trek back to normalcy, or at least a masked veneer of it.

And I gradually cobbled together a facade of my earlier self. It was the only way to keep going. Fall into the action of leadership, once more formulate a way forward, and hope it would become a stronger reality than the despair I couldn’t shake off.

I took a deep breath, and focussed on the body lying in front of Jolee Bindo.

_It would be idiotic to resurrect a man who has already betrayed me._ I’d let him walk away from me in the Shadowlands – although, to be fair, one could argue he’d let me live – and he’d returned only to betray our plans to the Sith. If it hadn’t been for Dustil’s chance appearance, we would have had nothing to go on.

The despair was still there, but it began to recede. Somehow, I knew it would never fade entirely.

_Nothing to go on- no, that’s kath crap. I escaped entirely due to Yudan’s aid. And, once again, Yudan has shown his inability to kill me._

But he’d been on the cusp of killing Carth, earlier, and for what? To see if I’d fall once more to the cursed Dark?

_Turns out he didn’t have to. I fell anyway._

“We ain’t got time for lengthy meditations,” Jolee prompted. “Sirens have been wailing for awhile, now. You got to make a decision, and quick.”

“Can you… can you revive him enough so he can make his own way out?” I whispered through dry lips. _Let him slip away, so one day he can return when I least expect it and screw everything up again._

Jolee was shaking his head. “That’s a deep injury. I can stabilize him enough to move him onboard, tie off the bleeding and the damaged organs - but he’s going to need more than that from me.” I felt Jolee’s hand lightly rest atop my bowed shoulder once more. It bore the heavy weight of responsibility with it, the charge a true leader could not shy away from. “He’s either coming onboard with us, or dying with the ship.”

I couldn’t let Yudan amongst my crew. What was I going to do, offer him a place on the frelling ‘Hawk, and tell him to play nice or he wouldn’t get any good-behaviour stickers? For the safety of those I cared about, I simply couldn’t take another risk on Yudan Rosh.

“Heal him.” My voice cracked, and the disbelief at my own words coursed through me like unforgiving fire. He was _nothing_ to me, a shade from my past, and yet I still felt the emotional connection to someone who had once been a friend.
And the guilt, for where I had led him.

Sun and stars, if I’m not ruthless enough to kill Yudan Rosh, how the frell do I expect to take on Malak?

I felt my teeth grit as Jolee crouched down next to the prone Twi’lek. I raised one hand, and a lightsaber from somewhere flew to it. As I thumbed it on, there was both sharp relief and surprise as bright cyan illuminated the room instead of red.

“You are not going to make me revive him, just so you can kill him, young pup,” Jolee groused, his brows slamming down in disapproval. “That’s not only rude, it’s bordering on sadistic.”

“I’ll do what I have to, Jolee. Now, heal him.” My words were hard and implacable. I saw the resistance in the old man’s expression, and a sepulchral shadow in my mind murmured that I could make him bend to my will, whether he liked it or not.

Not like this. Not again. Not, ever, like this.

I felt a shudder ripple through my face. “Please,” I whispered to Jolee. “I don’t know how much of a threat he is to those I care about. I have to speak to him before I decide. Please, Jolee. Help me.”

The disapproval in Jolee’s face was chased away by grudging acceptance, and he nodded, before pulling in the threads of the Force and getting to work. It was an intricate business – not quite as fine as manipulating the electrical oscillations that came so naturally to me, but there was a certain finesse, a certain patience required, allowing physical flesh and blood vessels to meld before progressing. A natural instinct, knowing when to steamroll forward with the healing power of the Force, and when to retreat and allow flesh to mend on its own.

I could sense what Jolee was doing, enough so I doubted I would ever be able to replicate the like.

Jolee pulled back several minutes later. “That should be enough to move him. I’d rather not wake him from the stasis, as it risks undoing what I’ve done - but I guess you’re going to insist on that, huh?”

“Wake him,” I whispered. I raised my lightsaber, so it cut into my vision like a blazing bar of light blue fire.

Jolee grumbled something, and once more I felt the Force swell beneath his command, this time as an energizing wave that encouraged the body to consciousness. Chemicals within the bloodstream stirred – I had the vague remembrance of a theoretical lecture on the dangers of activating cortisol and adrenaline – and then Yudan’s eyelids flickered.

I stepped closer, inching the ‘saber forward so it was mere centimetres from his heart.

I saw the moment he became aware of pain. Lines creased and deepened around his face, and his yellow eyes shot open before stilling on the beam of plasma directly above his chest.

His expression immediately shuttered. I couldn’t help but feel the slightest sense of admiration for how quickly the cursed man could conceal his thoughts.

“You betrayed me,” I said curtly, nudging Karon’s lightsaber closer. I wanted a damn reaction I could read, but his entire body was frozen. “I should leave you here, to die along with everyone else onboard.”

His eyes narrowed slightly. “I betrayed you? Did I, Revan?”
I felt a grimace twist my lips. “Maybe you slipped me a token of escape, Yudan, but not before selling my crew out,” I said. “The very man you snitched on, is the one who just saved your life.”

Yudan’s gaze darted to the side, landing briefly on Jolee, before coming back to rest on me. I could decipher a pissy sort of anger in his expression, now, and it was obvious he was in some amount of pain— but other than that, nothing. No remorse or regret, no satisfaction, no lead to help me decide what manner of person he truly was.

“You told me to play the part of a Dark Jedi, the one who’d overwhelmed the lot of you,” he growled. A small gust of irritated air left his lungs. “And exactly what do you think would have happened, had Kylah or Nisotsa come across your harmless old trader, without me declaring his Force sensitivity?”

I blinked, and the cyan ‘saber wavered in my grasp. In the docking bay, an elevated walkway high at the back, I saw her-

“For Kylah was in the docking bay, Revan,” he said, wedging an arm underneath his torso, and beginning to struggle upright. I moved the lightsaber back in reaction. “My cover would have been immediately blown.”

“Lie down,” Jolee snapped. “You ain’t moving anywhere under your own power.”

“And as for Ordo,” Yudan continued, still heaving himself up into a sitting position despite Jolee’s protests. “Well, I’ve come to respect the man. But we’ve known your crew manifest for some time, and his background is well understood. As is the penchant for Mandalorian clan leaders to admire you. I didn’t think it a plausible story that Canderous Ordo would turn on you for credits after following you since Taris.”

Yudan was canted to the side, leaning heavily on one arm, his body shuddering under the movement. He waited, chest heaving, gaze never leaving mine. Awaiting my judgment.

I was well aware of how hypocritical that was.

“Would you have killed Carth?” I whispered.

The slightest sound left his lips; a wearied, beaten form of a chuckle. “Your soldier? I don’t know, Revan. I honestly don’t know.”

I felt the truth of those words sing on the Force.

“Did you have any plan at all, Yudan?” I snapped, suddenly furious at my inability to come to a decision. How could I trust him? How could I even entertain the idea of leading him back to the Ebon Hawk, when it sounded like he had no frelling idea whose side he was on? “If Nisotsa hadn’t turned on you first, which sodding side were you going to pick?”

The yellow gleam of his gaze sharpened in returned anger. I wondered what colour they once were. I should know. All those little details, all those forgotten memories… it was no wonder he faced me with such bitterness. I’d led him, Nisotsa, and others I had no faces nor names to put against, down the path of evil.

And now I stood, with allies and freedom and barely any recollection of my past misdeeds. And a lifetime of despair to wade through.

The corners of his mouth turned down in an uneven grimace. “All I can really tell you is that I would have struck out against Darth Revan. But she wasn’t there. And I… I don’t really know anything, anymore.”

His eyes dropped closed, and his elbow buckled underneath him. With an involuntarily grunt, Yudan collapsed back to the durasteel ground of the bloodied room.

“He’s fainted,” Jolee muttered, kneeling back beside him. “Probably for the best. Heh. For more than one reason, I’d say.”

...I would have struck out against Darth Revan. But she wasn’t there.

Oh, sithspit. The burn of remembered hatred, black and turgid and blazing over an ocean of infinite grief, rose within me once more.

My shoulders slumped. Should Yudan ever discover exactly how I’d killed Nisotsa, then he would strike out at me. Was this, maybe, the reason I should leave him behind?

Or… maybe it’s the reason I need to take him with us. Maybe, what I really need, is a watcher who will stop me, by any means necessary, should I fall again.

It was quite possible I might already have that in Carth. It was quite possible that Carth wasn’t going to wait until he saw a sign. I felt the clench of heartache once more, the bitter longing for what might-have-been. I’d known since the Shadowlands how this revelation would play out, but it didn’t make it one iota easier.

The ground underneath me shook abruptly, and I found myself stumbling. The halogen lighting fizzled before cutting out, and what sounded like another three warning klaxons joined in the merry band of sirens that had been screeching for some time.

:: All personnel to evacuate immediately.:: a young female voice slurred over the starship’s intercom. ::Hull shield generators are down. Repeat: all hull shield generators are down, and we have been unable to negotiate terms of surrender. We are still taking enemy fire. I say again: all personnel to evacuate immediately.::

The darkness was perforated by the same red-and-orange emergency strip lighting as in the interrogation cells, which must have been on a separate circuit. Deep on the Force, I could sense the groans of unyielding metal being forced apart hundreds of metres away, reverberating all along the length of the cruiser.

“You’re out of time, pup,” Jolee said, an unspoken order in his voice. I wondered, idly, if he was deliberately avoiding my name. There was no way Jolee could have missed it, but he’d been remarkably facile in not showing any reaction at all.

My gaze was still fixed on Yudan, whose chest was slowly rising and falling in the depths of unconsciousness now, rather than any forced state of deep hibernation.

It was going to be a damnably awkward conversation, explaining his presence on the ‘Hawk.

“We’re taking him,” I said grimly, turning to look at Jolee.

Hah. Explaining Yudan Rosh will be a doddle. It would be, I realized, my mind resting on Carth again with a renewed pang of dejection.

Because that conversation that was going to be a frell of a lot worse.
“Sublight drives are fine, but the repulsors are gonna make any sort of planetary landing a kriffing party,” Canderous Ordo grumbled, as he switched auxiliary power on and surveyed the nav console with a vaguely distrustful expression. The turbine compressor began whirring to life under our feet. “And the recirculators are dodgy enough that I ain’t keen to spend more than half a day in space.”

“Do you want me to drive?” I asked, only part in mockery. I’d flown many a freighter, back in my time, and with a lot less moaning about it than him.

Though, to be fair, I’d never flown a freighter quite as banged up as this one.

The Mandalorian scowled at me. We’d exchanged only a handful of words so far, most of them cursing on his part when Revan and I had careened back to the Ebon Hawk lugging her second best buddy from the Dark Side. Heh. Canderous and I were both going to have some fancy words with Yudan Rosh when he came to.

I hope Revan’s gambled the right way. She was torn about him, I could sense that much. And it didn’t help that I’d stumbled onto her and her crew when she was in the thick of the sort of revelations one could make a holo-soap about. She’d been over the edge, back on that cruiser. Ain’t no denying it. Revan still has the same darkness within her.

But she wasn’t as… hard, or calculating, as the woman I’d met four years ago - the leader who hadn’t yet fallen, but was well on her way. The one who’d been spat out the other side of the Mandalorian Wars.

This woman… this woman was more tormented, naturally; more flawed - but somehow, the scars hadn’t stiffened and scabbed over into the same clinical detachment. Bah, I don’t know. Despite the short time I’d known her, I found myself already invested.

Canderous was leaning over to jab at what I thought was the ship’s intercom. “Mission,” he growled into the mic, “make sure your bucket droid is doing all he can to stabilize the ship. Even get kriffing HK, if he can help. I’m about to launch, so snap to it and buckle up.”

I wasn’t sure if it had been chance that’d made HK-47 encounter Revan and me, as we’d stumbled blindly through the floundering Leviathan. With the heavy cruiser falling apart, and sentients running in all directions, I’d been unable to sense the presence of Juhani. Her Force signature was the homing beacon I’d been counting on, and without it I was little more than a mink-rat in a maze.

And Revan herself hadn’t been in any state to do more than dazedly follow my lead.

Then, from the depths of a darkened corridor, that robot with the badly-programmed attitude appeared and started mouthing off - while simultaneously hovering around Revan and leading the way back.
I’d gleaned that HK – with an autonomy that should be alien to a droid – had decided to leave the ‘Hawk in search of Revan, once the rest of the crew had secured the ship. I don’t like to think on our chances if he’d stayed put. Heh. Never thought I’d see the day I’m indebted to a darn droid.

Any other piece of machinery wouldn’t bother me. This one was annoying enough without me owing my life to it.

There was a loud reverberation as the ‘Hawk’s engines kicked into gear, and a self-diagnostic beeped on the console. I frowned as multiple lines of red blinked at me.

“Mand’alor’s balls,” Canderous muttered in disgust, leaning over to eye-ball it tandem. “Oh well. I suppose I’ve flown in worse.”

He sent a final comm to the crew about take-off, and his hands tapped over the control panels. I heard a discordant rumble as the repulsors charged, and felt an uneven wobble throughout the freighter as it slowly began to rise.

But it rose.

The twin sets of docking bay doors were operating under evacuation procedures, which meant automatic sensors – so there was nothing stopping the Ebon Hawk as it began to limp away from the faltering cruiser and out into space.

Flashes of light scored against a backdrop of stars as we cleared the external doors.

And ahead was another heavy cruiser just as behemoth as the one at our back.

“Right,” Canderous muttered. “My plan is an emergency landing on Carpet’s overgrown planet, as I have serious doubts about this ship holding together for long. Somehow, though, I don’t think the Republic are gonna play nice.”

An incoming transmission bleeped on the comm console. Canderous barked a short laugh, and motioned for me to answer it.

::Ebon Hawk, you are ordered to dock with the Meridus immediately. Two squads of class-e snubfighters are incoming to flank you. The slightest deviation of your flight path will result in us opening fire. Lack of confirmation to this transmission will have the same effect. Ebon Hawk, confirm receipt of this transmission now.::

“Good thing our comms aren’t down this time,” Canderous grumbled. “But they can all go leap into a sarlacc pit, far as I’m concerned.” He shot me a hard, flinty stare. “Alright, old man, check out the pre-programmed hyperspace jumps, and let me know the closest one. I’ll answer the kriffing Republic.”

I raised an eyebrow, but leaned forward to do as bid.

“Meridus, this is Canderous Ordo. We have injured parties onboard, and require an immediate medical transfer. Lead us to your docking bay, and we’ll follow.”

The Ebon Hawk had five hard-coded hyperpoints, all with thousands of different jump-routes so they could be selected from most of known space. It was a safe-guard, an escape route if things turned dicey – for mapping out a new hyper-route could take precious minutes, or longer, if the nav computer had issues calculating the best path.

Hard-coded routes took a lot of drive data, and were most common amongst smuggling vessels.
Obviously, this little freighter had a bit of history behind it.

I recognized Tatooine and Nar Shaddaa, Corellia and Taris. Trade spots and smuggling runs. There was a final one that was unfamiliar.

“The closest coordinate is less than a seven hour jump, but there’s no information listed about it. No telling if it’s a planet or an asteroid belt or the centre of a star.”

“We don’t have time to map out another route,” Canderous said. “But we need to jump, now, and the longer the jump, but worse our chances the ‘Hawk will falter in hyperspace. And that’s usually game over. What’s the next closest?”

“Nar Shaddaa,” I answered. “A little over five days. Humph. Are you sure you want to risk this? The ‘Hawk ain’t a happy ship, you know.” Even having switched to sublights, the engine still sounded dodgy to my old ears. “It may very well tear itself apart in the entry to hyperspace.”

Canderous snorted. “I ain’t handing myself or the crew over to some greying Republic admin.”

The nav comm blinked again, and I flicked the receive switch.

:::Ebon Hawk, medical intervention will be granted upon docking. Continue your path to the Meridus. Any deviation will result in us opening fire:::

“Huh,” I said, leaning back. “They’re persistent blighters. I thought only old men like myself were allowed to repeat themselves.”

“Plug in the unknown course.” The Mandalorian’s voice had turned serious. “Let’s try our luck. If I can do anything about it, we ain’t dying today.”

Well. I had to approve of his attitude.

The ship’s computer immediately routed the remembered jump point from our current location, as Canderous aimed the freighter directly at the Dreadnought-class cruiser. Idly, I wondered if I felt the Force once more at work.

Heh. I haven’t had this much excitement since I almost caught the Faceless one in a katarn pit. Pity I’d never got my hands on him, in the end.

As Canderous increased the sublight drives to full power, I activated the hyperjump at his nod, and the Ebon Hawk gave a loud groan of mechanical complaint as it shot towards the Meridus.

At the last instant, it lurched into hyperspace.

xXx

“Sheesh! I can’t believe we’re all outta there in one piece!” Mission exclaimed as I wandered in from the cockpit. She was hugging her knees on a plimfoam bench in the common room, presumably having wriggled out from the safety harness the moment the freighter wobbled into hyperspace. Next to her, Revan was currently face-planted onto the plasticeel table. Someone had covered her with a blanket.

I sent out a diagnostic feather of Force. Just sleeping. She’s probably gonna regret doing it in that position though.

“(We were lucky to escape,)” the Wookiee rumbled softly, wedged in on the other side of Revan.
His attention was dolefully fixed on her. “(All of us, intact.)”

The Mandalorian had followed me into the room, and directed his next words at the young Twi’lek.

“Wake Jen up, ad’ika. There’s some things to discuss.”

“Aw, man, Canderous, can’t ya just leave her alone?” Mission griped, shooting him an accusatory glare. “She’s exhausted. Look at her. She’s fallen asleep on her face.”

“Yeah,” the Mandalorian commented in a dry voice. “I can see that with the way she’s drooling all over the table.”

“Eh, doesn’t hurt to let the lass catch a few hours kip.” I threw my two credits in, while eyeballing the fandangled percolator on the bench next to the mush maker. I couldn’t think that caffa machines had changed awfully much since I’d settled down on Kashyyyk, but this one boasted a lot more lights and dials than should be necessary to make a simple brew.

“One thing I’ve learned on this trip is not to put off kriffing conversations,” Canderous Ordo growled, stomping over to me and jabbing at the smallest button on the side. The percolator blinked on, and began to whirl as he shoved a chipped plasticeel mug in a tray underneath it. “The second thing is that Jen likes caffa almost as much as Onasi.”

“When’s my dad gonna wake up?” the second teenager in the room muttered, his arms folded as he hunched on Mission’s other side. I hadn’t caught the boy’s name, but where the Twi’lek girl was ebullient and optimistic, he instead came across as wary, hunted and a trifle hard. “He hasn’t moved since Zaalbar dumped him in his quarters. I don’t even get what’s wrong with him. I saw frakking Karath in that room. Saul Karath, dead from a blaster shot! Who killed him? And what did he do to my dad?”

I stepped to the side, towards the young Cathar Jedi who was leaning against the wall, and left the overly complicated machine to the Mandalorian. “Your father was hit by a hibernative stasis, lad. It ain’t too deep. He’ll be waking up soon.”

“Stasis?” the boy parroted. He turned a narrow gaze on me. “You mean, from one of the-” he stopped, frowning. “You’re a Jedi, too, aren’t you?” he accused. “Can’t you wake him up?”

“Dustil, I believe we are all exhausted,” Juhani said quietly. “Your father is fine. It’s the others on this ship we have to worry about.” She was staring at Revan in concern, before her gaze sharpened with wariness and darted towards the makeshift medbay I’d strapped yonder Dark Jedi into before take-off.

I liked what I’d seen of the Cathar. She struck me as a principled sort, over the brief time we’d travelled together in the Shadowlands. Jedi Knight, she said. Huh. I wonder what her home Enclave is. I’ll be interested to find out.

I’d left the Jedi Order a long time ago - and I could admit, now, that part of the reason was an overly inflated sense of self-importance with a dab of petulance on the side. Only part of it, mind. The rest was definitely the Order being a bunch of hypocritical arses.

“I suppose we may as well talk about that one before Jen here smells the caffa and wakes up,” Canderous grumbled, jerking a thumb towards Yudan Rosh’s temporary quarters. He levelled a scowl at me. “Haar’chak, what were you two thinking, bringing him onboard?”

“Canderous, did you not first-” Juhani began delicately, only to be cut off.
“Don’t even start, kittycat. That lying shabuir tricked—”

I cleared my throat loudly. These days, I often had enough phlegm to make quite the racket. I’ve forgotten how noisy a shipload of people can be, I thought in mild irritation, wondering if the Wookiee beheld the same impressions. “I ain’t defending Yudan Rosh, but he gave a pretty solid reason for betraying both me and you, Canderous Ordo.”

“Yudan Rosh?” the boy called Dustil spluttered. And, abruptly, I was aware of an upsurge of power swirling around the lad, all the more noticeable when I realized he’d been completely absent in the Force beforehand. “Ordo said his name before- frakk- you don’t mean to say he is actually onboard?”

I frowned, my gaze stilling on Dustil Onasi. He’s quite powerful. How did I not sense that earlier?

“Solid reason, huh?” Canderous Ordo muttered. He was walking back to the table with a steaming cup of caffa. It didn’t look like he’d made it for me. “This better be good.”

“Frakk!” Dustil swore, his eyes rounding as he swivelled to gape at the closed hatch. “I can sense him in the frakking medbay! Why is nobody else flipping out about this?”

“That’s the Mando Dark Jedi from earlier, right?” Mission piped in. “Okay, so he’s a bit of a ronto-turd. But seriously, Dustil, chill out. Between you and Jen and Juhani- and sheesh, even old man Bindo- I don’t reckon we’ve got anything to worry about.”

“One thing he ain’t is a kriffing Mando’ade,” Canderous growled, placing down the cup of caffa a centimetre from Revan’s face. He stared at her for a moment, the corner of his mouth twitching. “I give her two minutes, max, before that rouses her.”

Zaalbar leaned over the table and nudged the hot mug away slightly, as if he were concerned it might burn the woman’s nose in her sleep. I took note of that small movement. Even now, it was obvious the ties of loyalty Revan had bound to herself.

“I will remain on guard,” Juhani said softly. “After all, Yudan Rosh did betray us to the Sith.”

“Of course he did!” Dustil spluttered again. The expression on the kid’s face- it was fright and alarm, undercut by a gleam of awe. It was the awe that had me wondering. Teenage Force-users from the Order did not generally feel that way about powerful Dark Jedi. “It’s bleeding Yudan Rosh! Do any of you actually understand who he is?”

Maybe it’s time to cut to the chase, I thought, turning back to eye over the Mandalorian. “If he hadn’t blurted out I was a Force-user, then his game would’ve been up,” I interrupted. “There was another Dark Jedi in the docking bay, you know. And we Force-users have this annoying habit of being able to sense each other.” My gaze slid back to the younger Onasi. “Well. Usually we do. I’m starting to think there might be some exceptions to that.”

The boy blinked at me, before ducking his head. I’m going to find out about that one. Before my curiosity gets the better of me.

“Doesn’t explain why he dobbed me in, though, does it?” the Mandalorian asked, dropping onto the edge of the tattered bench with a thwump. The room was crowded, I realized, even with Juhani and I both standing.

“Well, he said your name like it was someone important.” I shrugged. “Something about his lot not believing you’d turn on Jen. That make any sense to you?”
“Huh,” Canderous grunted, but there was a considering gleam in his eye.

A soft groan emitted from the table, and all attention turned to Revan. The tousled head moved, ever so slightly, and Zaalbar leaned over to push the steaming cup even further away.

“As I said before,” I continued. “I’m not defending him or anything he’s done in the past. But he did have something to do with Jen escaping.” I looked back to Dustil. “And that, in turn, allowed her to save your father from what I’d say was certain death back there.”

“But Dustil rescued the rest of us,” Mission said, and she turned a look of such teenage gratitude on the poor boy that he blushed scarlet. “That was absolutely wizard, by the way.”

“(You acted with honour, and we all owe you a debt),” Zaalbar said quietly. Dustil shot him an uncomprehending glance, managing to look even more uncomfortable.

“Thank you, Dustil Onasi,” Juhani added. “Actions are the mirror of a person’s soul. I once told you that I could not forgive the past… perhaps I was wrong. Perhaps you are more brave and honourable than you realize.”

“You did well, Sithkid,” Canderous commented, with a faint smirk. “But don’t let it go to your head.”

“Sithkid?” I asked, a faint memory of the same moniker being used in a comm to Mission. “Now that nickname sounds like an interesting story.”

“Um,” Dustil began, frowning at me in suspicion. “Leave me alone?” From the way he said it, I wasn’t sure if it was a request or statement. Bah. It wasn’t going to deter me. That young man had well and truly caught my interest.

“Caffa,” Revan mumbled, and a hand shot out sleepily over the table.

“(Sit up, Jen. It’s hot,)” Zaalbar warned, and I was surprised to see her automatically obey the Wookiee, with only a mild groan of complaint. Once the cup was firmly in her grasp, she looked slowly around the room, as if needing the time to orientate herself.

Revan’s eyes closed, and the faint look of despair lined her face. I felt the emotion echo on the Force. “I guess you all have some questions,” she said, taking a blind sip of her brew.

I watched the woman take a deep breath, as if fortifying herself, and then open her eyes to stare fixedly at him. “Please,” she said, but her voice was firm, and the underlying tone of command was there.

“Right. We’re six hours out from a pre-programmed hyperpoint none of us recognize. If the Republic find us, they’ll be shooting on sight along with the Sith. Our repulsors are half-fried and the stabilizers are shot, meaning our hyperspace exit is gonna be dicey at best. Oh, and forty percent of the recirculators are down.”

Revan had dropped her head back into her hands. “Balls of a rancor,” she muttered, her voice muffled.

“Jen!” Mission sniggered. “Ew!”
I could feel myself frowning in disapproval. “Ain’t no excuse for poor manners, young pup. I don’t care if you’re a janitor or a Senate Councillor. It ain’t hard to mind your tongue.”

“That’s nothing, you should hear Mekel,” the younger Onasi muttered under his breath.

“So,” Revan continued, lifting her head again. “We’re hoping there’s some facility or planet at this hyperpoint that can fix the ship?”

“In a nutshell, yeah. The bucket droid’s working on the recirculators, under the supervision of your faithful assassination robot.” Canderous snorted, but there was a slight grin of approval on his face. “You should’ve seen the pile of corpses on this ship. Some techs, some guards. There’ll be a good amount of salvage on that. We made HK shift them to the cargo bay, but we gotta do something about the bodies before they stink the place out.”

“I told HK not to let anyone on board,” Dustil said. “Man, he’s annoying. I thought droids were meant to obey orders?”

“HK’s a special sorta droid,” Mission said, rolling her eyes. “Sheesh, I’ve lost count of the number of times Carth’s threatened to dump him out the airlock.”

“Carth,” Revan whispered, and her gaze travelled to the hatch that led to the pilot’s quarters. She swallowed. “How is he?”

“Why don’t you go see for yourself?” Dustil snapped, a look of belligerence crossing his face. “I mean, from the way you two were sucking face earlier, I’m surprised you’re not at his side right now.”

_Oh ho! Now that’s an interesting development! And the boy’s angst over his father’s love-life was nothing on what was to come when he learnt the whole truth. Although, let’s not forget his reaction to Yudan Rosh. That wasn’t entirely negative. Huh. I probably shouldn’t be finding this quite as amusing as I did, but I couldn’t help a lingering desire for a bowl of popping corn._

Meanwhile, Revan’s horrified gaze had shot to Dustil, and her cheeks flamed a deeply embarrassed crimson.

“Dustil!” Mission squeaked, her eyes round. She glanced over to Canderous in fright, while the Mandalorian looked torn between exasperation and mild amusement. “Um, seriously? Jen is- Jen and Canderous-”

The hatch opened. And we all, as one, turned to survey the bedraggled figure outlined in the doorway.

Carth Onasi certainly seemed the worse for wear. He’d belted on a jacket over a singlet and shorts, and still managed to appear woefully underdressed. The man looked exhausted and deeply bitter, and his gaze was intently fixed on Revan.

_Aw, heck. He knows, and it didn’t go down well._

“Dad!” Dustil clambered to his feet, and in a singular motion ran over to launch his arms around the man.

“Dustil? I-” Carth’s eyes closed briefly as his arms wound tight around his son. One, two seconds later, and the troubled teenager was already disentangling himself, like he hadn’t been the one to sprint over to his father in the first place. And as the boy retreated, Carth’s gaze returned once more to Revan. “I guess you weren’t lying about him, then,” he said quietly.
The shame rolling off Revan was hot and palpable on the Force. I could see the Cathar’s nose wrinkle in reaction, and Dustil twitch in surprise.

“No,” Revan whispered. “Dustil snuck onboard. He- your son saved everyone, Carth.”

“The crystal,” Carth said abruptly. His mouth was fixed in a firm line of simmering anger. “That, too? Or was that the droids?”

Revan shook her head. She looked, in a word, miserable. “That was Yudan Rosh.”

“Who’s onboard, by the way,” Dustil muttered, stepping back to sit down next to Mission. The Twi’lek was biting her lip, glancing back and forth between Revan and Carth.

“What?” Carth snapped. “You’ve got to be kidding! Tell me that’s some sort of sick joke-”

“I know, right?” Dustil added. “I mean, no one else seems to get who he is! I mean, frakk!”

“Pipe down before you embarrass yourself, Sithkid,” Canderous growled. “You ain’t the only one with a second chance here.”

“He’s on the same level as Darth frakking Bandon!” Dustil protested, his voicing edging higher. “That insane gimboid used to visit the Academy! You lot have no idea the sort of things he used to do! Or how powerful Dark Jedi that far up the food chain actually are!”

Revan shot me a look, then, and I could read it clear as the age spots on my arms. Part of her – irrational, she likely knew – wanted to blame this on me. For I could have left her there, spared her this, back on the Leviathan.

Ah, but that’s living, ain’t it? You got to face up to the music.

“Bandon’s dead, Dustil,” Revan said quietly. She dropped her gaze to stare down at the table, at her maimed hand resting on the chipped surface. It looked to be healing well, but I wondered on her arm and shoulder. I’d have to see to her again, and soon, if I didn’t spend all my energy on her comatose friend. “I killed him down in the Shadowlands. At least that’s some good news, huh?”

“We’ve got a bigger issue to deal with here,” Carth cut in, his voice dark and low. He was still glaring at her bowed head.

“Bigger? Seriously, Dad, bigger?”

“They deserve to know the truth about you,” Carth continued, completely ignoring his son’s incredulity. “Do you want to tell them, or should I?”

“Let me guess,” Canderous drawled. “She wears jockeys underneath her armour.”

“Not the time to be making jokes, Mandalorian.” The man’s voice was dead. As dead as the gaze he still levelled on the former Sith Lord.

“And I never pegged you for a drama queen either, Republic. You want to give her a chance to find the words, first?”

Revan’s shoulders hunched. I saw the Wookiee rest a comforting paw on her shoulder, but she merely flinched at that, her head raising to shoot both Zaalbar and the Cathar an appalled glance of horror.

“You know,” Carth hissed, swivelling to stare at the Mandalorian. He gave a bitter sort of laugh; cold and hard. “Hah. All this time- you’ve known, haven’t you, Mandalorian? That’s what all those damn sparring fights were about? Testing yourself against the likes of her? I guess you thought this was the greatest thing you’d ever heard!”

Revan flinched again, and her gaze shot up to Carth’s in desperation. “Carth—”

Canderous growled. “Don’t assume anything about my kind, Republic, unless you’re looking for a fight—”

“Stop it,” Juhani cut in, her voice quiet, but intense enough to scythe through the burgeoning display of testosterone. “This is not the time.”

Carth wrenched his eyes back to Revan. “Well?” he demanded.

She swallowed, ignoring everyone else in the room as she returned his gaze. It had to be hard, I realized. “The- the- Bastila,” she whispered. She directed her voice to Carth, but it swept around the room like a breaker of revelation. “You all know she and I share a Force-bond. What some of you don’t know is that it- it came about when she saved my life. I have no memory of the time, but it’s a pretty famous story. She- she boarded my flagship with a group of Jedi, and I understand Malak fired on us at this time.”

And, still, her gaze never wavered from Carth’s dead one. There was an audible intake of air from the younger Onasi as he began to connect the dots.

With a shaky breath, Revan continued. “I hear I was a wreck, mentally speaking. The Jedi decided to, to- save me or use me, I’m not sure- but they implanted another identity in my head.” A dark, harsh laugh escaped her. “Jen Sahara doesn’t exist; she did, once, but I killed her. Tortured her into death. She was a Force-sensitive, and I’ve been told we liked playing with the Force-sensitives.”

She laughed again, and it was a truly broken sound. Her eyes closed and her head dropped. “My real name is Revan.”

The silence that followed was downright deafening.

I couldn’t help but glance around the room in morbid curiosity. Mission had already known, of course, and while there was a definite shine of fear about her, the look of concern in her brown eyes was stronger.

Grim acceptance lined the Mandalorian’s face, and the Cathar was staring at Revan with nothing but soulful empathy shining in her slanted eyes. Huh. Not quite the reaction I expect from a Jedi who had been ignorant of the truth.

Dustil, in contrast, had pushed himself hard back against the wall, staring at Revan in horrified disbelief. I had the feeling that Yudan Rosh had been completely pushed from his mind, right about now.

It was harder to tell with the Wookiee, but his raised paw was hovering over Revan in the same familial concern as earlier.

And Carth- Ach. Well, young love can certainly tear at the heart. I’d been there, once before. Only difference was, my wife had never desired nor been granted a second chance.

“Well?” Carth demanded, at long last. There’d been obvious heartbreak on his face, before it hardened into bitterness. The man cared for her, despite what he was busy telling himself. “Isn’t anyone going to say something?”
Canderous snorted. “Sure. Did someone remember to refill the synthesizer on Kashyyyk? Because, again, no one bothered to pick up fresh supplies-”

There was a snarl from the Republic soldier at that, and Revan’s shoulders hitched further.

“Dammit, Ordo, you may not care that you’ve been following a blasted Sith Lord, but do you really think the others are going to be so quick to get over it?”

“Carth.” Mission’s voice was tiny, but it was enough to grab the soldier’s attention. “Look. I knew, okay? I found out the same time as Jen, down in the Shadowlands. I guess we’ve had more time to come to terms with.”

“Come to terms with it?” Carth whispered. “How do you- how do you come to terms with something like this?”

“Well,” the young teenager looked back to Revan, and shuffled closer, enough so they were almost touching. I could see the fear, again, spark through the Twi’lek’s face, and it made me understand just how brave the girl was. She had the inner strength, I thought, to choose the course of action she desired, and follow through on it. “You scare me, Jen. I ain’t gonna lie about that. But- you’re my friend, as well. And it seems like you jus’ keep coming through for me, and if there’s ever a time you need your friends at your back, it’s right now I reckon. I won’t let you down, Jen.”

“(I have learned a lot about different sorts of honour and dishonour while travelling with you, Jen Sahara,)” Zaalbar added. He gave a huff. “(I follow the person you are now, not the one you were. There are times you have worried me. But you are not madclaw. And if I can fulfil the terms of my lifedebt by chasing the shadows of madness from you, then I will call it a fair redressing.)” There was a pause. “(And I will do all I can to rescue your bond-sister. That I shall not forget.)

“I- I told him, Jen,” Mission admitted, casting her eyes down bashfully. Revan still had hers bowed, but she gave the tiniest nod of acknowledgment in return. “On the Leviathan. I mean, I know I said you had to do it- but, sheesh, I thought we were all bantha fodder back there. And Big Z- I figured he had right to know, y’know? With the lifedebt and all.” She cast a mildly irate look at the furry Wookiee, over Revan’s tousled head. “Not that you seem to really get it, you ignorant hairball.”

“It’s Revan, Mission. Not Jen, but the former Sith Lord who’s slaughtered millions-”

“Look, I get that, okay?” Mission shot back tartly. And on her other side, the younger Onasi had his eyes round as food plates, his gaze landing on the different speakers like a flutter-gnat drawn to the light. Every now and then he’d look back to Revan, bent silently over the table, and I wasn’t entirely sure if it was hatred or veneration that darkened his gaze when that happened. “But she’s Jen to me, not a Sith Lord. She’s my friend who’s been with me through thick and thin-”

“Jen Sahara is a lie, Mission!” Carth cried. “You heard her! Jen Sahara is a dead women, just another casualty of the war she brought on the Republic-”

“For the love of Mand’alor, I need a kriffing drink before all this wailing does my head in,” Canderous muttered, before stomping out of the room.

Mission shifted closer to Revan again, this time nudging her. “What- what do you remember, Jen?”

“Small bits.” Revan’s voice was muffled. “Strange dreams and visions. Feelings.”

“Just a few flashes?” Mission replied. “That’s it? Nothing more?”
“Mission, I’m not Jen Sahara.” The woman looked up, her head turning to face the unabashed teenager who sat next to her, and offered friendship like it was the most natural thing in the galaxy. Heh. Maybe it is. “Carth’s right about that. I may not recall my past, but I know I’m the same woman I once was. The one who ended up falling to the Dark Side and destroying everything I cared for.”

“But you’re not bad right now.” Mission wrinkled her nose. “And it- it kinda seems to me- that, that the one sure-fire way to bring Darth poodoo back would be if we all deserted you now.”

“Sometimes, kid, I think you should be on the Jedi Council,” I commented, pushing back from the wall and sliding into the unoccupied seat the Mandalorian had vacated. “I suppose it’s my turn to say something pithy about Revan not being a Sith Lord so much as a vagabond who needs to wash behind her ears and have her head knocked on straight. But that ain’t gonna help much, is it?”

I paused, then, allowing the woman time to meet my eyes. “You know what your next steps are, Revan, and the mess only you can clean up is waiting for you. Malak. Bastila. That thing you’re after, out there in space somewhere.” I sighed, staring straight into the torn green eyes that didn’t leave mine. “You’re lucky enough to find friends again who’ll support you. But I wasn’t just throwing words around when I said there’ll come a time when there’s no turning back. The Dark Side is a slippery slope an’ all that, and loyalty and faithfulness eventually erode. So make the right choice. Stay true. And lean on your friends when you need ‘em.”

She blinked, her gaze narrowing. “We met before, didn’t we?” she whispered. “Years ago?”

“Oh ho! So you do remember something of that?”

“No.” The tiniest shake of her head. The briefest wisp of a word. “An educated guess.”

I harrumphed. “Huh. I’ll have to tell you about it someday, then. In short, yes. You were running around like a mad kath pup at the bottom of the forest. Well, wasn’t my place to go blurring it out to the rest of you.” I looked around the room, and Carth Onasi was staring at me in blazing incredulity. “Better that it’s out in the open though, if you ask me.”

“So, you’re staying with us then, old man?” Mission asked.

“Well, I’m not traipsing back to Kashyyyk,” I grumbled. “The food is terrible. Do you know you can survive on jarinn grubs alone?” I shuddered. “Not pleasant. And it gives you the runs- uh, nevermind.”

“(Jarinn grubs are a delicacy of my people, Jolee Bindo. But they should not be eaten in excess.),” Zaalbar chided. “(Even the youngest cub knows that.)”

I raised a brow at him. “I’ll keep that in mind next time I’m starving in the Shadowlands.”

“This doesn’t phase you at all?” The soldier’s voice rose in pitch as he addressed me. “You’re a Jedi, or you were once. And you’re absolutely fine travelling with Darth Revan? Are you off your rocker, old man?”

“Not yet, but I did know this Rodian once who made the most amazing-”

“Jolee Bindo,” Juhani’s voice, low and intense, once more silenced the room. “Your propensity for teasing others is inappropriate at this juncture.”

I turned to face her; she’d been silent for the most part, but right now she was levelling me with what I’d classify a disapproving look. Hah! I had about six decades on her!
“And Carth,” the Cathar continued, her voice gentling. “It is shocking. It is a major revelation that is difficult for anyone to take in. But I begin to see that the rest of us have had time to process it. Canderous and I have been aware for some time.” And she turned to lay a look of such compassion at Revan that my grumble at her rebuke stalled on the edges of my lips.

Revan’s intake of air was loudly audible, and her eyes were glistening as they rose to meet Juhani’s.

“Jen. Revan.” The Cathar gifted her with a gentle smile that shone with unconditional acceptance. “I have felt the presence of the Dark Side within you, as it has fought within me, within Dak, and within Dustil. I know how the fallen can be redeemed, and that while it is a difficult path, it is worth the pain. You have shown me that, my friend. You found me lost on Tatooine, and pointed me toward the light. Together we guided each other through our trials on Korriban. I will not give up on you, as you have never given up on me.”

The charged moment was shattered by the Mandalorian striding back into the room. “This is the last of my kriffing booze,” he muttered, slamming down a bottle of something golden before turning to retrieve a tumbler from the cupboards. “Ad’ika, assuming we survive the hyperspace exit and our next dock – wherever the kriff that may be – your job is to re-stock the shelves and the mush-maker. Put some Corellian whiskey on that list, okay?”

“Oy, get an old man a glass while you’re at it,” I called out. “Do you know how long it’s been since I’ve had anything other than fermented wasaka-berry juice?”

“You all knew,” Carth said flatly. His gaze was dark and anguished as it landed on everyone in turn. “And no one thought it was worth even talking about. I can’t believe you all- you all knew!”

His son coughed awkwardly. “Um. I didn’t.”

“I can’t- I need some time alone,” Carth muttered. He shot one last, deeply bitter glance at Revan, before turning on his heel.

“Hyperspace exit in less than six hours, Republic,” Canderous said, his voice unruffled as he calmly poured a drink and handed it to me. “Much as I’d like to laud my piloting skills, we ain’t got no idea where we’re headed and the Hawk’s a mess.”

“I know how to do my damn job, Ordo,” Carth said, his back to the room. “Stay out of my cockpit.”

And the hatch closed behind him. His son directed another wide-eyed stare of horror at Revan, before stumbling after him.

When the hatch closed a second time, it was Revan’s turn to stagger to her feet. She pulled the blanket around herself tight, and the hunted look on her face was decidedly uncharacteristic. “I- I need to be on my own for a bit,” she mumbled, squirming her way past Mission and heading out the other side of the room.

The rest of us stared in silence after her.

“The one thing that woman doesn’t need right now is to be on her own,” I grumbled. “I wasn’t just talking to hear my own voice. She’s going to need her friends.”

“I shall go,” Juhani murmured. “I shall watch over her. You keep an eye on the Dark Jedi, Jolee Bindo. Redemption should be offered to us all, but we cannot be blind to the very real threat he may pose.”
In a sleek, graceful movement, the Cathar slid away from the wall and stalked after Revan.

“Bah,” I muttered, as the hatch closed. The drink in my hand was pungent, and I was starting to think fermented wasaka-berry juice might be preferable. “I’d forgotten how much Jedi liked to order people around.”

“You shoulda met Bastila then.” Mission giggled. “Although I gotta say, Juhani’s come a long way from killing animals on Tatooine, right?”

The girl kept nattering before I had a chance to probe that curious comment. “Hey, Canderous, wanna pour me a drink?”

“Dunno, kid, this stuff will knock your headtails off,” Canderous said, his voice dry as he took a swig. The man didn’t even grimace, so maybe it wasn’t that bad. I took a cautionary sip, and immediately began spluttering.

“Hey, so I’m okay to buy you booze, but not to drink it with you?” Mission complained indignantly. It took a moment for the foul drink to finish burning the lining of my stomach, and when I looked up through watering eyes, it was to see her pouting with pure teenage mulishness. How did Revan end up with a teenager onboard? One thing I did know – teenagers would find a way to do what they wanted, regardless. And heck, experience was a lot better than advice anyway.

“Have mine,” I offered, sliding the tumbler across the table and ignoring the Wookiee’s immediate howl of protest. “It’s disgusting. Enjoy. I’m going to have a proper look around this ship.”

It’d been a hair-raising jaunt off Kashyyyk, and an even worse one fleeing the Leviathan. Still, someone could’ve at least shown me the darn refresher.

And as I meandered out the port exit of the common room, the last thing I heard was the bright chatter of the Twi’lek girl, once more.

“So, Canderous… uh, I guess you and Jen aren’t a thing then, huh?”

xXx

Davis Tar’coya

The blue speck on the holo-map winked out.

“Um,” a nearby tech said hesitantly.

“Ah, crap,” I cursed, knowing exactly what had happened.

The little green Jedi Master straightened, shooting a bright-eyed glance at Forn Dodonna. I could see some tripe about the Force’s will about to spew forth from him, and apparently so could Forn, because her face blazed with righteous ire, and one hand jabbed forward to point at him in warning.

I had to say, for a human, Dodonna wasn’t all that bad.

“Confirm reason for disappearance of the Ebon Hawk,” I barked at the tech.

“Sensors show successful hyperspace entry, sir.”
We should have shot on sight, Forn. The Sith may have failed to capture the prize, but so did we.

The prize had to be Kylah Aramai - that turned, half-human Jedi who’d betrayed Bastila Shan to Malak. It couldn’t be the likes of Bandon Stone, Yudan Rosh or Nisotsa Organa – Forn had mused on one of those bastards being in command of the Leviathan. The only other suspect that came to mind was Sharlan Nox, but the intense interest from the Jedi Order made me suspect it was a fallen one from their ranks.

I shouldn’t be thinking on it, as I hadn’t been granted the damn clearance to know. But still, my thoughts whirled.

Or… what if Bastila Shan herself has succumbed to the Dark Side? And is now running amok?

It was certainly possible. I had little respect for the fortitude of Force-users, and the human ones were the worst. They, without fail, made up the largest chunk of the ones that turned bad.

I knew my attitude was frowned upon, and had likely cost me an Admiralship. I was as experienced as Forn, having partaken in countless battles during the Mandalorian Wars, and been a greenling at the close of the Kun conflict.

Once, I’d believed in the Jedi. I’d reported directly to Revan Freeflight and Malak Devari. I’d worked alongside Captain Karath, before his leap up the ranks.

I’d thought a damn supernova shone out their collective arses.

I’d been a starry-eyed idiot.

Unlike me, Forn knew how to be diplomatic. But I found I didn’t have time for that crap anymore.

“No telling who’s on board, other than the Mandalorian,” the human Jedi Master muttered. He, at least, looked decidedly less joyous than Vandar Tokare.

Forn snorted, an uncommon display of informality from her. “I believe we can safely assume, Vrook. The question is where they’ll be going next.”

“The Force is at work here,” Vandar murmured. “To the Star Forge, they will be going. To face Malak, to fix the mistakes of the past.”

There was a gusty sigh from Vrook. “Maybe, Vandar. Or maybe someone is just going down the same path-”

“Faith, Vrook,” Vandar interrupted. “Faith in the Force, we must all keep.”

“It’s quite an assumption to think they’ll be headed there,” Forn interrupted. “Our only true ally onboard is Carth Onasi, and we have no idea if he survived.”

“Doesn’t really matter either way, does it?” I said. “The Ebon Hawk is not what’s important, in the grand scheme of things. We’ve got to focus on taking out the Star Forge.”

That schematic had been an eye-opener. Our best engineers – who weren’t currently involved with taking down the Leviathan – were poring over the information Captain Carth Onasi had sent to the Republic. It looked to be a highly sophisticated starship factory, although the power source had yet to be identified.

The factory was the core of Revan Freeflight’s ascendance to super villainy. And now, it was Malak Devari’s keystone. We’d be aiming for it, and we’d damn well take it out.

Revan’s dead. Karath will be soon, if he’s not already. And then we’ll put an end to Malak. That’ll be the three of them, finally, dead and burned. The three I had once all but worshipped.

“Ion reactor explosion detected on Leviathan,” a Rodian muttered from behind a console.

“Bogey squad one has been eliminated,” another tech piped in. “There’s only one snub left from bogey squad three… oh, and they’re doing a runner.”

Back on the holo-map, dozens of smaller blue flecks were swarming around the Leviathan. Escape pods. Evac orders had been issued. The Leviathan was going down.

“Keep the focus on the Leviathan,” Forn ordered. There was a weariness in her tone, and I knew she was thinking on the vanished Ebon Hawk. “We don’t stop until the cruiser’s destroyed.”

“That won’t be long, now,” I said. “It’s a blow to Malak, Forn. Whatever else, we’ve a victory today.”

She shot me a look, and there was a bulldozed sort of grimness in her small eyes. I’d worked with Forn long enough to read her, smooth-skinned and human though she was. I could recognize her despondency, even though I didn’t understand it. The Leviathan’s about to go. That means an end to that bastard Karath, to one or more Dark Jedi, and Malak’s most powerful heavy cruiser. Sure, we lost our grasp on Kylah Aramai – for who else it could it be? – but that’s a small price to pay. Insignificant, really.

“The escape pods don’t all need to be shot down, Dodonna,” the one called Vrook offered. His voice was defeated. I felt like dancing a damn jig of celebration, and half the command in the room were hanging their heads. “Vandar and I can sense any Force-sensitives onboard, when they get close. You can afford to grant mercy.”

“The Leviathan, first,” she snapped. I didn’t support the Jedi Master’s suggestion, purely because we’d lost too many damn times in this blasted war. But then my mind landed on the young Sullustan officer, putting her life on the line to bravely beg for surrender.

Forn sighed. “I’ll think about it, Vrook. The Leviathan goes down, first.”

“Bogey squad three has been eliminated, ma’am. There’s only one squad left, and they’re dispersing.”

“To the Star Forge, we must look,” Vandar murmured. “Follow the Ebon Hawk’s trail.”

Vandar Tokare had an unbending belief in the will of his mystical Force that went well beyond irritating. Why would the Ebon Hawk head to this Star Forge, to throw their might – insignificant though it was – against Malak? There’s another Jedi onboard, though. Some runaway Cathar. Maybe that was the hero Vandar was pinning his hopes on. Unless- unless he dreamed of redemption for Kylah Aramai. Also a possibility. For how many times do the blasted Jedi like to sweep away the crimes of their villains under the flag of atonement and rebirth?

The Order had lost status and standing amongst the Senate. I didn’t see how they’d be able to wrangle any captured Dark Jedi under a flag of sanctification after this war was over.

No. In the unlikely event that freighter had fled to Malak, it’s a damn sight more plausible they’ve gone to join his side.
But we would follow, regardless.

“It’ll take time to muster our forces,” I said, still looking over the holo-map. Sections of the Leviathan were flashing in orange, now; our diagnostics confirming the failing parts. “A week, maybe two.”

“We’ll move as quickly as we can,” Forn murmured. “Malak will draw his forces back. We have no idea what’s out there, but the longer we give him, the stronger his defences will be.”

“Onboard, I shall stay, and assist as I can,” the short green alien offered.

The human Vrook sighed. “It may- it may not be a bad idea to send some scoutships ahead, Forn. Transmit back what they find before the bulk of the Fleet get there.”

Vandar had turned, his bright blue eyes assessing the human Jedi Master in interest. It seemed a pointed look, as if unspoken communication flowed between the two.

“Their inertial compressor’s blowing!” a tech cried in jubilation. “That’s it, ma’am! The Leviathan’s a goner!”

The words sparked a surge of victory through me, and I felt a fierce grin form on my face. I glanced away from the massive holo-map, over to the transparisteel viewing windows on the side of the command deck. The Leviathan, kilometres away from us, had sparks of turbolasers dancing over its body. Even from here, I could see the tail-end was visibly separate. And within the heart of the mighty starship, an explosion was visible for an instant - before the vacuum of space gutted the fire out.

Triumph felt sweet. Yes! That’s Karath down! Unless he'd found an escape pod – and we'd shot down most of them, and could round up the rest, now – then that meant he was, finally, dead.

My fists clenched in victory. Fare thee well, Karath, you damn bastard.

One day soon, I swore, I’d be around to see the end of Malak, too. And then I could finally leave the ghost of bitter betrayal back in my past, where it belonged.

xXx

Juhani:

“Revan,” I said softly, entering the living quarters. She had tucked her knees up under her chin, the pose of a lost child, yet her expression was anything but. Grim, resolute. Carth’s words had sliced into her self-resolve – I’d witnessed the cut of each one – and yet Revan wasn’t broken.

She had had a portion of time to accept the truth, if she had learned it back on Kashyyyk. I had been so concerned for her state of mind, but it seemed I had not given her enough credit.

Perhaps the Mandalorian had been correct. Perhaps we should have told her earlier.

“Juhani,” she replied, her voice quiet. “I’m not even sure what to say… I certainly didn’t expect you to already know.” The last words were uttered with a faint twist of wry humour, an echo of her usual self. But her eyes were bleak.

“Calo Nord let it slip,” I murmured.

“Calo Nord?” she repeated blankly. Surprise chased away the darkness in her face. “What, back on frelling Tatooine? Juhani, are you serious?” At my nod, a brief puff of laughter escaped her lips. “Stars, Juhani, we’d barely even met then! How in the Outer Rim did you not totally flip out?”

“Well,” I replied, taking a seat on the lower bunk next to her. “I was still processing my own issues at the time… no, that is not the truth. The truth is I had met you before, Revan. I did not recognize you, not until Calo gave it away, but-”

“You- you, what?” she said, obviously stunned. I could see it was the last thing Revan thought to hear, and judging from the horrified look on her face, she expected it was from the darkest time of her past.

“Revan,” I cut in gently. It was strange, being able to say her name so freely, now. She’d drawn back from me, pushing up against the wall. Her moss-green eyes that reminded me so of Quatra’s widened with alarm.

I smiled at her in reassurance. “On Korriban, I told you about the group of Jedi who stopped on Taris. The Jedi who overturned the slave trade, and liberated me along with so many others, while on their way to fight the Mandalorians. Who did you think they were? Who do you think was their leader?”

She blinked, and the horrified expression slowly disappeared as a considering one took its place. “Really?” she whispered. “I can’t… I can’t remember anything, Juhani. I feel like I should be asking if you’re absolutely sure it was me… but I guess that’s a bit redundant, considering my past.”

I chuckled softly. “Taris was an awful planet for non-humans, and I suppose it still is… but you transformed that, Revan, if only for a short time. You arrived with a squad of Jedi, like a harbinger of change, fierce and righteous in your leadership. You overturned the corrupt rule of the rich elites, liberated the slaves, established free medical care… you do not understand what a difference you made.”

Her face was pale, and she looked away from me. “It didn’t last though, did it? By the time I was there again, after the Endar Spire, Taris was… well. I imagine it was much like it had been in the past.”

“Perhaps,” I conceded. “But you still saved my life, and that of many others.”

Revan’s piercing gaze returned to mine, and this time a frown of concentration furrowed her brow. “That was when you left to become a Jedi, wasn’t it?”

I felt a small smile curve my lips. “Yes. One of your people recognized me for what I could become. If you were a force for change, then she was an angel in white. I had never met heroes before you, before her.” I found myself slipping into the past, when a soft voice gently spoke to me about opportunities, about betterment, about the Jedi. I had only seen Revan Freeflight from afar, but Meetra Surik was the one who compelled me to travel for Dantooine.

I swung my gaze back to Revan. “If you had never stopped on Taris and attempted to improve matters, then I am sure I would be dead by now, having lived nothing but a life of poverty followed by slavery. Not all of your past is dark, my friend. Some of it is nothing short of heroic.”

I caught the slight flinch on her face and understood she was nowhere near acceptance yet. How could she be? I struggled to reconcile with my own dark deeds, and they were truly inconsequential next to hers.
“I have no choice, Juhani, but to keep going,” she whispered. “Yet part of me wishes that… that Bastila had left me. Left me to die, onboard that damned flagship. She gave me a gift, but sometimes it feels a lot more like a curse.”

“Do not say such a thing, do not… do not even think it,” I said, placing a hand on her knee. She was still in her undergarments from the cursed torture chamber. I’d had a chance to clothe myself, but she remained wrapped in a blanket. Her pale, hairless skin was a striking contrast to the fine striping on mine.

Revan had been darkly tanned, once. She had been a warrior of the sun.

“It’s just… it’s the same path, Juhani!” she burst out. “I’m following the same path, only this time with sod-all recollection of any training, and I have to keep Bastila at bay- I don’t even have her voice in my mind now, keeping me on the straight and narrow.” Her head dropped, and a bitter chuckle escaped her lips. “Not that I think she’d know how, anymore.”

“Revan,” I murmured. How could I make her see? “Memory is not everything, my friend. It is not what will keep you in the Light. Trust in the Force. And… although I am uncertain of everything Jolee Bindo says, he is correct when he points out that you have us here to lean on. To support you. I will be there for you, Revan. And I am not the only one.”

She mumbled something, and I thought it might have been Carth’s name. Revan and Carth. That was an astonishing development. I was surprised I had not sensed something, smelled something… perhaps I, like everyone, had been too preoccupied with our quest. Still, it was a messy entanglement, and did nothing but make matters more complicated.

“I do not wish to preach to you, Revan, but romantic attachments are frowned on amongst the Jedi for a reason,” I said, trying to keep my voice gentle. She hunched away from me. I slowly removed my hand. “To be perfectly accurate, forbidden is closer to the truth. I, of all people, understand the pitfalls of not mastering dangerous emotions.”

“Evidently I don’t,” Revan muttered, scrubbing at her face. She raised her head, then, and stared back at me grimly. “I never would have involved myself with Carth if I’d known. Dammit, I never should have anyway, and I knew it at the sodding time.” She sighed. “Though, from everything I hear, Mal- Malak and I were long-established lovers, even when we were fully loyal Jedi Knights. How the frell does that fit with the Jedi ethos?”

“I do not know of your past, my friend, only of what I have heard. And, in truth, I have always paid little attention to gossip.”

Revan broke from my gaze, to stare blankly at the durasteel wall ahead. The corners of her mouth had turned down.

I sighed. “But it has always been difficult to avoid hearing mention of you and Malak. I understand you were involved before the Jedi found you, and… attempts were made, unsuccessfully, to curb your attachment.”

“Hah.” It was a bitter sound. “We’re the poster children for why Jedi should stay celibate, no doubt.” Her eyes swung back to me. The depth of anguish there cut deep into my soul. “You were thinking about Quatra, earlier, and about not mastering your emotions. Don’t tell me you still blame yourself, Juhani?”

I blinked. Revan had never been one to dance around matters, but I had always been uncomfortable with talking about my own feelings. “In part, perhaps. If I had learned to control myself, to rise above such physical, unwanted desires, then perhaps Quatra’s rejection and condescension would not have pushed me over the edge. I was unprepared at my Trials… I had thought of so many different ways she would test me, but I had never expected a personal angle. I did not- I did not truly understand it was her. Others had spoken of ghosts and visions at their own Trials, and when I attacked, churning with my own self-doubt and longings, I don’t believe I fully grasped that it was my own Master standing there.”

It was a long speech, coming from me. Heart-felt and awkward, and Revan’s gaze shone in fierce empathy. I did not regret my words, though. It would do her good to think of something other than her own despair.

Her eyes narrowed. “Quatra’s an idiot.”

“She’s a Master, Revan,” I said gently. “She has had decades upon decades of training.”

“Doesn’t stop her being an idiot.”

I could not hold back a wholly inappropriate chuckle. “Well. I do believe you are correct in that we were ill-suited. But it is an example of where romantic entanglements can lead - down dark paths. I understand why Force-sensitives distance themselves from such… messy, emotional states.”

“Messy?” She quirked an eyebrow. “I dunno, Juhani. Love is a pretty amazing thing, in all its forms. To label it as dark-”

“I am not calling it dark. Just dangerous, for Jedi.”

She snorted, and I saw the refusal to believe on her face, despite her past. I sighed, and spoke further of intimacy I normally tried not to dwell on. “Dak left the Order, because of inappropriate desires that were not returned. What if he had, instead, stayed and tried to overcome them?”

“Juhani.” Her voice was intense, and her eyes captured mine. “Dak returned, due to his feelings for you. He may have accepted that those feelings will never be reciprocated, but it is his love for you that set him on the right path.” The corner of her mouth quirked. “And you’re not talking about relationships, so much as unrequited love. And even that… Stars, Juhani, Belaya loved you too. She didn’t falter.”

“Belaya,” I whispered, closing my eyes as her beloved face flashed through my mind. She had been my truest friend, and the grief was still fresh. “I do not believe I shall ever stop missing her. But our bond of friendship was pure, Revan, and-”

“You are not going to preach to me that sex is impure-”

“No, no,” I felt myself flushing in discomfort. “Merely that Dak has a tendency to jump to conclusions.”

I petered into silence, looking away from her, and feeling distinctly off-kilter. It had never even occurred to me to think of Belaya that way, until Dak had mentioned it. And, now that she was gone, the odd thought slipped through my defences. Brief, and bittersweet.

“I’m sorry, Juhani.” Revan’s voice was wry. Despite my discomfort, that pleased me. Better she gain some small amount of pleasure at discomfiting me than sinking into the depths of her own despair. “I didn’t mean to re-open any wounds. But I can’t- despite everything, I can’t agree with you here. Romantic love is just another facet of love itself, and if that’s not the very essence of the Force, then the galaxy’s a cursed place. Look-”
And I found myself meeting her rounded, human eyes once again.

“It’s one of the reasons we managed to reach Dustil, you know. I’m not sure if his father alone would have been enough. But there’d been a girl he’d cared for, back on Korriban. Even sodding Mekel—” Revan rolled her eyes. “I sensed the same emotion from him. One of the few glimpses of empathy, of love, of light, from both those angry boys were their romantic feelings towards a girl. Sun and stars, frelling Yuthura Ban believed Mekel would have left Korriban, left the Sith, for that girl.”

I wasn’t entirely sure how I felt about being compared to a pair of hormonal Dark Side teenagers, and perhaps something showed in my face, for Revan gave a snort of amusement.

“Well, as old man Bindo likes to say, young people are idiots,” she commented. “But I think I agree with him about attachment.”

My lips curved in a gentle smile towards my emotive friend. “Perhaps you have given me somewhat to think on. For I have the feeling, Revan, that this is an opinion you held once before, when you were a guardian of the Light.”

Again, there was the small flinch. “Don’t be too quick to listen to me, Juhani,” she muttered, her voice twisting. “At the end of it all, I’m still the same blighted woman who fell in the first place. Dammit—if only I knew why—”

“Perhaps it is a blessing you cannot remember— and I am not only talking about the dark parts of your past. Perhaps, with a clean slate, you are not doomed to make the same mistakes.”

Her brow furrowed. “I think the reverse is more likely. Dammit, I feel the same drive I must have once before. The same conviction, to uphold the strength of the Republic, to fight for galactic peace, to—” she broke off, sighing. “How can I face Malak in the depths of the Star Forge and not expect to fall again? It’s a Dark Force relic, Juhani!” Revan looked away, before her voice plummeted to a broken whisper. “Especially—especially after what just happened on the Leviathan.”

I couldn’t deny the state she had been in, there.

When we’d rushed out of the interrogation room to find her, the despair had been so deep I’d choked on the Force. Visible shadows of death had danced around Revan, still and crouched down as she was. The misery had reached out with murky fingers of obscurity, submerging us all in a pall of darkness.

My own dalliance with the Dark Side was nothing in comparison, I knew. And yet, somehow, Revan had managed to pick herself up. There was a brittle hollowness about her, undeniably so—but she had managed to pull herself back. Somehow.

I understood, now, why I had fallen. Did that make it easier, to stand firm in the Light? To avoid the same mistakes, the same pitfalls?

I cleared my throat. “Well, perhaps you need to talk to someone who can explain.”

“What?” she snapped, her bright green eyes sparking at me with an echo of her former sass. “Someone who knows the reason why I grasped the mantle of the Sith in the first place?” She snorted in disparagement. “Think I should holo-call Malak and see if he wants a heart-to-heart?”

“No,” I said gently, holding her gaze. “Actually, I was thinking of Yudan Rosh.”
Revan Freeflight

I wasn’t sure how long I sat there, in quiet companionship with Juhani. She had lapsed into a gentle Force meditation, possibly hoping I would join her… but I was spent. Utterly spent.

They had known. They had all known. Canderous’ words upon us leaving the ‘Hawk and surrendering to the Leviathan’s crew had stunned me, but I’d had little time to reflect upon them. Maybe, out of everyone, his reaction was the least surprising. Especially when taking into account how much he enjoyed throwing around what turned out to be my name during our sodding spars.

Carth was right about that. Canderous had a frelling field day.

Carth… I wasn’t ready to think on him. There were words to speak, between us, and they would be ugly.

I slowly dragged myself upright. My legs were cramping from sitting still for so long.

Juhani cracked open a tawny eye, and smiled. “Go see the others, Revan. They care for you too.”

I gave her a short nod before leaving. My overriding desire was to lick my wounds in peace, but Juhani had followed me in here for a reason. My gut told me old man Bindo was behind it, and that solitude was likely something he wouldn’t let me dwell in for long.

His dry voice rumbled in my head. “Seems to me, you’re the most dangerous when you go running off by yourself.”

It was hard to know how true that was. But one thing I did understand was the danger I presented to others.

I sighed, and trudged wearily back to the common room.

Mission glanced up as I entered, shooting me a bright smile that tugged in my chest. “You okay, Jen?”

I didn’t exactly want to lie to her, so settled for throwing a shrug in her general direction. Canderous, sitting opposite her, tipped the remainder of a drink down his throat.

::One hour until hyperspace exit.::

Carth’s grim voice shot through the ship’s intercom, and I gritted my teeth in reaction. I didn’t need to reach out with the Force to realize his son would be ensconced in the cockpit with him – both Onasi’s, as far away from me as possible on this freighter.

I had no idea what to say to Carth. And it hurt, more than I wanted to admit, to face the reality of his reaction.

And to accept all of my crimes against him.

I couldn’t even argue that it wasn’t me, that I was changed; different, now. The charred stench of death still lingered in my senses, as well as the memory of the once-sworn comrade killed by my indifferent hand.

“We got no idea where we’re headed, or if there’s danger waiting,” Canderous said, unfolding himself from the bench and levelling me with a flat stare. “Get your arse behind the turrets, Revan.
You and I will man them.”

Unlike Mission, he had no qualms about naming me to my face. Of course he didn’t. This was sodding Canderous.

I gave him a nod of assent, before complying in silence.

I’d been in the dorsal turret room before, of course, but I’d never strapped myself into either of the controlling seats. The safety harness slid naturally around my torso as I clipped it on. There was a deep ache in my shoulder, reverberating through to my crippled hand, and I was too weary to immerse myself in the Force to block it out.

Canderous was quiet, unusually so. Maybe he was waiting for me to broach the topic.

I cleared my throat. “I hear Calo spilled the beans.”

There was a gust of laughter from behind me. “Yeah. Nasty piece of work, that one. Kinda wish I’d got the death blow on him, rather than Juhani.”

“I’m surprised you never said anything earlier, Canderous.”

“Bastila had something to do with that,” he replied, somewhat cryptically. “But it’s dust under our boots, now. We’ve evened the scales well enough. If we can get the princess back, I’ll let her fill you in on the details.”

I couldn’t envisage Bastila convincing him to be quiet. It seemed hard to imagine, how a conversation like that would have gone.

“So. You’ll follow, still?” I asked, a bit awkwardly.

“How can you even ask that?” the Mandalorian bellowed out, thumping a fist on the targeting deck behind me. I craned my neck around to see him doing the same, staring back at me. “You defeated the Mando’ade clans in the war, Revan. You were the only one in the galaxy who could best us. Whatever you are fighting, it will be worthy of my skill.” His eyes, tough and hard as ferracrete, held mine firmly with fierce determination. “I’m your man until the end, Revan, no matter how this plays out.”

I held his gaze in silence for a moment, until he barked a laugh. “I’ll go back to my people, after this. You’ve made me see the sense in that. But first, we’ll face your endgame. Whatever happens, it’ll be a battle song worthy for the stars.”

His loyalty was maybe not surprising, but it both gratified and humbled me. It made me think on his blood duel, back on Korriban. Canderous had agreed to follow me then, knowing who I was, understanding my own ignorance. Somehow, during our travels, I’d managed to secure the alliance of a man I esteemed highly.

The duel must have been on his mind, too. “Don’t think I don’t get what you did for me, against Jagi. No one else could have turned that around the way you did. Jagi was more than just a battle comrade, once. And because of you, he might be again.”

He turned back to face his targeting reticule, indicating an end to that conversation. I did the same.

I had no recollection of controlling turbolaser turrets like this one, but as I gingerly placed my hands on the gear-sticks, muscle memory had me trialling out the movement.
Like so many things in my life; the memory washed away, but the instinct remained.

I’d been a gunner at one stage. Possibly I’d been crap at it – who knew? – but I’d done it.

“Were you at Malachor?” I asked, my voice curt and abrupt.

“On the fringes, only, or I wouldn’t be here,” his voice, dry and amused, answered. “Malachor’s a heady topic, Revan. Let’s wait until we have a few hours spare and a few drinks under our belt before we delve into that one.”

“Okay.” I stared blankly out the viewing window; black hyperspace cut through with lines of white. “Tell me a story, then, Canderous. Not- not about me.”

With a grunt of assent, he complied.

And as Canderous began to expound upon a tale of piloting a damaged basilisk through the atmo of an enemy planet, I allowed myself to enjoy the camaraderie of friendship, of those who accepted me, unconditionally, even though I didn’t deserve it.

I can do this, I thought to myself, even if it meant dealing with the pain of Carth’s justifiable enmity. I can finish what Bastila started. One way or another, we’ll end this together.

xXx

Suvam Tan:

I nervously hummed a year-old jingle under my breath, while filling up the stocks of my self-styled cantina. One thing I didn’t lack was booze. Amazing how generous the Exchange could be, when I sourced them the correct parts.

Bunch of sadistic nerflings when I don’t, though. I was trying to act casual, keep my mind in order, think of mundane things. My space station has its defences. And I have true friends in the Exchange – powerful enough that their dumbass underlings know to treat me with respect, or they can piss off back into hyperspace.

Things were normal. Things were just peachy. My contacts were growing, my credit base – at long last – was exceeding that fat Hutt’s interest charges, and one day I’d be able to pay off my debts.

One day. One day, soon. I’ll be able to extract my son from of that tub of lard’s slave pit.

I just needed credits. Which meant dealing with dangerous people.

And out here, on the fringes of space in a forgotten station that could route all manner of illegal goods, dangerous peeps were a-plenty.

But I could handle the Exchange. Share a drink, have a laugh, know when to bow your head-

I could handle the Exchange. Problem was, there were some peeps out here worse than the Exchange. And I was four days away from an encounter with two of them.

*They’ve told me what they want. I’ve got it sorted. I’ll offer a free drink- everyone likes free drinks- as long as they’re not angry drunks-

I wasn’t scared. Just a little jittery, that’s all.

the booze will give me time to sort out the bots, switch their ship over, get their papers sorted
I wasn’t scared! Any rational peep would be careful around Force-users, that’s all. Especially Dark Jedi. Especially especially Dark Jedi as powerful as the leader of the duo. That one’s eyes….

I shivered. Powerful Dark Jedi meant powerful credits. So long as I didn’t annoy them.

Just act pleasant, do what they want, and hope no one else visits at the same time.

Because I’d had fights on my station before. And while my turrets and shields could deal with a lot of things, the Force was a sadistic bugger. I get approx one unplanned visitor a month. I’ve postponed the weekly Exchange contact. Chances of anyone else turning up has got to be piss-all-

My chron-comm bleeped. I stared down at it.

::Automatic Alert: Hyperspace Exit Of Unknown Vessel Detected. Report To Control Room.::

There was a stutter in my chest. I dropped the bottle of vox, ignored the smash of ferracrystal and the pungent kick of evaporating spirits, and sprinted as fast as I could.

The console was blinking with an incoming comm when I bowled in; I ignored it to run my eyes frantically over the grid sensors. Yavin Station used to be a supply run for the Republic, frigging decades ago when they mounted a last-ditch effort to oust Exar Kun from Yavin-4. After that, well- the Yavin sector was so out of reach– and most of it uninhabitable except by venomous natives– that the Republic had kriffed off and never looked back.

The nav-com ran a quick analysis of the incoming data.

Ship Model: Dynamic-class Freighter Line Number: AF2992-X1-BA9371 Signature Broadcast: Daisy Flash Alert: Visual, Radiation And Emission Match Found In Local Database

I blinked. Match found? I’d never heard of a Daisy Flash, and I was pretty solid remembering ship names. Had to be, in my line of work. That meant it was a returning client, who’d changed their ship’s signature in the intervening time.

Which was pretty odd, since signature changes were one of the reasons peeps came to me in the first place.

Screeches of info scrolled past, before the final blinking line held my attention.

Match: Ebon Hawk

The breath whistled out my lungs. Davik’s baby. Oh, it’d been awhile. But Taris had long burned, and Davik Kang with it – surely. He would’ve sent a comm before coming. He wouldn’t have changed his frigging baby’s signature!

Whoever these ship-robbers were, it would be safer to get rid of them. Get them outta here. At least before the Dark Jedi come. My mind worked furiously. There… there might be time for a barter if the price is right.

Credits were credits, after all. And I had four days grace before I had to get rid of whoever these guys were.

I leaned over to receive the waiting transmit. It was audio only.
::This is the Ebon Hawk. We require immediate assistance. Our repulsors are down to twenty-thirty, and stabilizers are pinging high in the one-eighties. Request permission to dock and repair.::

A man’s voice. Circumspect enough to hold back his name, but not stealthy enough to make up a fake one. Or to remember that he changed his frigging ship’s signature, the dumbass.

I tapped my fingers. No talk of payment in that greeting. “Station’s closed. Turn around and return to hyperspace. We can’t help you here.”

The reply back was quick. ::Blast it, we have to dock with you! The ‘Hawk’s falling apart. We can pay you- we have some credits, or an assortment of salvage if you prefer- but we have to get this freighter seen to-::

The man was obviously desperate, and the incoming diagnostics confirmed his tale of woe. Landing that baby safely was going to take skill. I had four docking bays, and enough space-bots to fix one should a poor pilot dock, but still-

I winced, remembering the time a drunk Trandoshan smeared his brains along with his scoutship all over dock three.

If these guys are still around in four days, I could have a much bigger mess than one dead Trandoshan and a fragged docking bay.

But the man was desperate. And he had salvage-

I licked my lips. “What salvage?”

There was a pause. ::Armour. Weapons::

“What sort?” That was important to know. Commercial weaponry was easiest to sell, of course, but military meant more creds even if it was hot-

::A variety from our travels. Some of its Czerka-brand. Some… some of it’s not. We haven’t, uh, exactly sorted that out yet.::

If they hadn’t even sorted their own freight out yet, then they were running. Means they haven’t had time to assess the value of what they’ve got. Another sign of desperation I could capitalize on. It was a risk, sure, but running this station always had been-

I can do it. I tried not to think of unnaturally luminescent eyes. More creds. Easy creds. And the gods know I need those. I just had to make sure they would play by my rules-

I cleared my throat, tried to firm my voice into a command. “I have important visitors in four days time. You will be gone by then. I’ll inspect your salvage, first, and take what I want. No complaints. I’ll set my repair-bots on your ship, and you’ll disappear in three days. No matter whether your ship is space-worthy or not.”

I couldn’t believe I was actually considering this. I knew if these visitors were still here when the others landed it was just asking for trouble-

If they don’t leave, I’ll make them. I’ll detonate their ship. It should be fine, just fine. My space-bots were the best, and I could get the freighter outta here in two or three days. Fix it good enough, at least, so they can hyperjump the frig away.
Understood. Look, we want to lay low as well, okay? We’re not interested in interrupting your business or meeting any strangers. I’ll order the crew grounded, and only I’ll come onboard.

“Right.” I nodded to myself. It could work. “Okay, standard procedure is a docking clamp on touchdown. Its insurance, is all. I have to protect my own livelihood. I’ll release it once we conclude our business.” I took a deep breath. The man sounded reasonable enough – I’d just give him a drink, talk over his salvage, and let the bots do the work. “My name’s Suvam Tan.”

Uh, I’m Carl.

Carl. Right. This would be okay. This would work out, and I’d be just that little bit closer to getting my son back.

“Okay, Carl, bring her in to docking bay three.”

xXx
Zaalbar:

When I walked into the garage, it was to see Jen Sahara staring at a holo-feed emitting from the communication console.

“(Jen,)” I said. “(You should eat something.)”

She shot me a small smile, before glancing pointedly to the plasticeel receptacle clasped in her hands.

I huffed. “(Caffeinated beverages do not qualify as sustenance, Jen. Your body requires fuel, even if you wish to deny it.)”

There was a hollow look about her, now, and I was not sure if it was due to the altercations on that madclaw cruiser, or the revelations back on my homeworld. She put me in mind of a young nest-mother I had known once, who had lost both her cub and her mate to a pack of katarn. Although Malarghh had kept on living after that tragedy, it seemed like a light inside her had been snuffed out.

“Observation: the physical limitations of organic meatbags require an ongoing intake of caloric matter. You have my abject sympathies for the fragilities of your being, Master.”

“Thank you, HK,” Jen said, but her voice lacked the amusement that droid’s disturbing remarks usually evoked in her. HK was interfaced with the console, controlling the audio-visual feed that was playing, and Jen had turned back to stare at it. “Come listen to this, Zaalbar. It’s the fallout from Kashyyyk.”

The two days we had spent docked next to a foreign space station had flown past. Auto-repair bots had surrounded the Ebon Hawk, under the watchful eye of T3-M4, and their work was now close to completion. My assistance had been enlisted by Carth Onasi to offload what spare material supplies we had onboard. Some of it was stock from Davik Kang’s days of ownership, and some was what we had amassed during our travels. Scavenged salvage – mostly weapons and armour, all in varying states of repair.

The corpses, too, had to be disposed of. Space was an anonymous graveyard, and I understood the necessity of ejecting the incriminating Sith bodies here. I did not wholly approve, though; to my mind, decomposing matter was better served to fertilize the soils of a planet rather than add to the junk that floated meaninglessly throughout the stretches of space.

Between removing near-all our salvage and anything else Carth Onasi required to pay for ship repair, I had not the time to seek out Jen – until now. But she had been on my mind nevertheless.

I knew the others had taken to accompanying her – Jolee Bindo had reiterated his concerns about leaving her in solitude, even though I believed we all understood that without his input. There was an injured look in Jen’s eyes that belied the hurt to her soul.

Mission might tease me about not comprehending the scope of Jen’s past, but I understood well enough. She had committed dark crimes, and betrayed many who had followed her. And now, she struggled to reconcile with all she had done.

A year ago, I would have labelled her madclaw and unholy, and believed the only way to assuage such past misdeeds would be to end her life in a battle put on for the gods’ pleasure. And while I still honoured the customs of my people and our laws regarding criminals, it had been Jen herself who had shown me that restitution was an alternative path to redressing honour. One could not wipe out atrocities one was responsible for, no; but one could atone for them – and perhaps in a more productive way than searching for death in the Shadowlands.

It would not be a fitting end for Jen Sahara, regardless. I am not sure the wildlife of my home would be enough to break her mettle.

Jen motioned me forward with her uninjured hand, and my attention was drawn to the informational holo-feed she was staring at. A scowling Human in a tight Czerka uniform was speaking to a gaudily decked-out Twi’lek.

“…of all planets. Czerka Corporation has invested heavily to protect the interests of many indigenous species all throughout the galaxy.”

Jen snorted.

The Twi’lek shot a coy smile at the holo-cam, before addressing the Human. “So Czerka does not have any immediate plans to return to Kashyyyk?”

The Human’s scowl deepened. “At this stage, return is proving difficult. Our starport has been destroyed due to an internal rebellion instigated by illegal off-worlders. There have been sightings of agents from the Sith Empire brewing dissent on the protected surface of G5-623. You must understand that the Wookiees are a both primitive and simple species. Organizations that have a vested interest in disrupting economic harmony would find untouched civilizations like the Wookiee one a prime target for their malcontent.”

Jen whistled. “The Sith? They’re blaming your people’s uprising on the Sith?”

I felt a growl in my chest. “(Czerka are a soulless organization that care only for their own greed and profit margins. They look to hide their own weaknesses by pointing the finger elsewhere.)”

“Yeah… but naming the Sith as perpetrators is interesting. There must have been some witnesses in the Shadowlands… or maybe Bandon was causing trouble with Czerka hunters before we arrived.” She was frowning. “Regardless, publicly blaming Malak’s forces is more ballsy than I’d expect from sodding Czerka.”

“…to rebuild the starport on Kashyyyk?”

“We are working with inter-galactic organizations to ensure the natives on G5-623 are fully prepared to govern themselves.”

Jen snorted again. “What he means is that galactic non-profits who actually care about indigenous autonomy are making it difficult for Czerka to re-establish their presence. Or, that Czerka’s cutting their losses and walking away.”
“(My homeworld is named Kashyyyk,)” I rumbled, glaring at the suited Human in the holo-video. “(Not that offensive string of letters and numbers,)”

“…comment on the cessation of hostilities with the Exchange?” The Twi’lek was idly playing with a string of pearls, his glitter-coated eyes constantly straying back to the holo-cam.

“The recent discord between us, you will recall, originated on the Selkath mining colony of Rii’shn. It has come to our attention that the disharmony between our organizations was deliberately manufactured by the Sith Empire.” The Human folded his arms. “Video surveillance has been released to both Czerka Corporation and the Exchange that illustrates the presence of a robed Dark Jedi on Rii’shn during the events that set us at loggerheads.” There was an outraged sniff from the suit. “It is a safe assumption that this is the same Sith agent spotted fleeing a stolen scoutship from the Czerka docking bay in Ahto City, not long before it detonated.”

Jen’s eyes were fixed on the obnoxious Czerka representative. She appeared far more interested in his words than the prettified Twi’lek who was interviewing him.

“So does this mean all economic sanctions imposed upon the Exchange have been lifted?”

The older Human shot a hard stare at the holo-cam. “Czerka Corporation has long had a history of working amiably with the Exchange, and we will not tolerate any entity that interferes with our business relationships.”

Of course they were friends. Czerka and the Exchange were as corrupt as each other. The only difference that I had ever determined was that the Exchange were more open about their dark dealings.

Despite the content of this unpalatable holo-feed, the look of intent concentration on Jen’s hairless face satisfied me. The hollow grief had been chased away, at least for now.

“…expand upon that?” The painted Twi’lek fluttered his eyelashes at the stone-faced Human. “Does this mean you are now levelling sanctions at the Sith Empire?”

“We, together with the Exchange, have offered commercial backing to the Republic’s war effort. The menace of the Sith Empire’s galactic greed cannot be understated. While Czerka Corporation may be an economic confederation, at our heart we are a humble consortium that believes in both freedom and peace for all. The objectives of the Sith Empire are contradictory to those ideals, and thus to all species around the galaxy.”

“Whoa,” Jen said. “That’s… unexpected. I don’t- I don’t remember there being a Dark Jedi presence on Rii’shn.”

I could feel a curl of anger in my chest. That Czerka would so blatantly espouse themselves as upholders of peace and freedom when they had done their best to strip-mine my homeworld was galling. They are gone, now, I reminded myself. And that was due to Mission’s ideals. To the might of Canderous Ordo. The aid of Carth’s cub. And, to Bastila Shan and Jen Sahara, whose quest led us to Kashyyyk in the first place. In that respect, it would be more accurate to blame the Czerka expulsion from Kashyyyk on the Jedi Order, rather than the Sith Empire.

HK-47 had swivelled his head to face Jen. His crimson photoreceptors flashed. “Statement: I disabled all surveillance at the Exchange docking bay in the Selkath colony of Rii’shn, Master. However, our extraction from The Lady’s Garter was hurried, and I did not have time to do the same there. Commentary: Selkath territories are notorious for the proliferation of their recording devices. It is possible that I missed one.”
Jen blinked, and I could smell her surprise before it formed on her face. “Me,” she whispered. A shocked laugh escaped her. “They’ve some footage of me there. Stars, of course they would assume it was a Dark Jedi.”

“Observation: It was mentioned that this footage was released to the Exchange and Czerka Corporation. Conclusion: This has the slippery fingerprints of manipulation from a third party.”

“Not the Selkath,” Jen mumbled under her breath. Her eyes narrowed. “That cursed cantina was well beyond the borders of Emmaad, and that’s the only place on Rii’shn the Selkath control… no, this is the GenoHaradan at work.”

Perhaps I misunderstood. I did not recognize that phrase.

Jen gave another laugh, her expression clouded with thoughts and conclusions I did not follow. The corner of her mouth was twitching. “Rulan did tell me the stability of the Republic was in their best interests. It would be fitting that they would find a subtle way to add support to their favoured side in this war.”

The hatch opened, then, and Canderous Ordo strolled in. His hard gaze landed on Jen. “Revan, come to the common room,” he said. It was more a command than a request. “We’ve got something to discuss.”

“Supposition: you have aligned your objectives with them in the past, Master. Perhaps they seek to do the same again,” HK intoned. “They make as worthy an ally as they do an enemy.”

“In the past… Rulan said- wait, what?” Jen’s voice sharpened on the last word. “How did you know I met one of their agents in the Shadowlands?”

There was a slight whirr from the HK unit. “Clarification: I was referring to your dealings with them when you grasped the mantle of the Sith Empire, Master. Assumption: Although you never divulged your objectives to me, I understood that you were working with their organization for some ulterior purpose.”

Jen’s jaw had dropped, and the shock rolled off her in waves. I wrinkled my nose. Humans, much the same as Twi’leks, expressed their emotions in a gustatory fashion. I always found it ironic that Mission so often complained that I was the one who stank.

“Huh,” Canderous interjected, frowning at HK. “So you’ve heard about your master’s past. What did you have to do with it, Tinhead?”

“HK, what were you doing before we found you on Tatooine?” Jen whispered.

“Answer: I had completed your latest assignment, Master, but being unable to reunite with you meant my memory core remained fully inaccessible. Reminder: Sith protocols maintain that all droid knowledge be locked before assassination missions, and restored upon return. Your death was widely accepted.” The droid had paused the video-feed to answer Jen. His mechanized voice dropped in pitch, to incorporate an almost chiding tone. “Admonishment: Had you informed me earlier about your identity, my full capabilities would have been unlocked sooner.”

“(Jen?)” I murmured, alarmed at her stunned expression. She was staring at the repugnant droid in utter astonishment, all colour having drained from her face. Even Canderous Ordo looked surprised. I did not follow the implications of the droid’s words, but I did not like the pale, shocked expression on Jen’s face.

“I- I- what?” Jen looked completely flabbergasted. “Sun and stars, HK, are you saying that you used to be my assassination droid back when- when- who in the Outer Rim built you in the first place?”

“Answer: Why, you did, Master. Qualification: With the technological assistance of the Star Forge, of course.”

Jen merely gaped at him. Canderous threw back his head and laughed, long and loud. “I’ve never known how much to credit to this Force of yours, Revan, but coincidences do seem to follow you lot around,” he guffawed. Canderous looked highly amused despite there being no discernible humour that I could comprehend in the conversation. “At this point, Malak himself could drop out of the sky and I wouldn’t bat an eyelash.”

“You were… you were my droid? “ Jen stuttered. Her voice was high-pitched with disbelief. “Before? Before all of this?” She waved a failing hand. I wasn’t sure if she was indicating the ship, or had merely lost motor control of her limb.

“Answer: Other than a few temporary masters during your assumed death, you have always been my master, Master. My birthplace is the Star Forge. Commentary: the organic damage to your inefficient biological processor appears to be substantial. Have you considered an array of cybernetic implants?”

“The Star Forge,” Jen whispered, blinking. “HK, does this mean you know where it is? That you- that you’ve always known where it is?”

“Rhetoric: How else would I be able to return to you upon completion of my assignments?”

Canderous gave a deep belly laugh again, thumping his side. “So all this time we’ve been hopping from planet to planet, Psycho-droid here has known the coordinates. Oh, this is great. If only the princess had let the truth out back on Tatooine.” Canderous shook his head, his mouth still split with a grin.

“(Perhaps there is a certain symmetry here, Jen,)” I hazarded, wondering at the odd chance of HK-47 being a spectre of her past. Combined with the Dark Jedi comatose in the medbay, it seemed that Jen’s history was catching up with her. All I could do was my best to ensure she walked through it untainted, this time.

Jen shot me a dark look. She looked far less amused than the Mandalorian. I could understand that she didn’t appreciate reminders of her corrupted past, but she must also realize that that was inevitable, given the path she had chosen.

“Maybe.” Jen muttered. “You do understand that Jen’s not really my name, right, Zaalbar?”

I huffed. “(I am not a simpleton, Jen, even if I may not comprehend all the intricacies of your life. Names are merely a marker of identification.)” I shrugged. “(If you wish me to call you by your new-old name, I shall.)”

The smallest of smiles curved on her face. “I- I don’t mind, Zaalbar. It’s a nice reminder of how you and Mission see me. Only as the woman you have known for these past few months.”

“(You are the woman who rescued me twice on Taris, Jen. Whoever you once were, you do not have to be that same person again.)”

Canderous had wandered over to the communication console, and switched off the paused holo-feed. “Revan, leave Psycho-Droid and head into the common room. As I said, we’ve something to discuss.”
Jen shot one more look at the robot who hailed from the darkest part of her past. Perhaps his abhorrent personality made more sense now. Although my preference still remained for someone to melt him down as scrap. “Shut down, HK.” The light in HK-47’s eyes winked out, and Jen sighed. “I have no idea what to do with him,” she muttered.

Canderous threw her a shrug. “He’s a useful combat droid. He kept the ‘Hawk secure on the Leviathan, and had a part to play with the Wookiee liberation, also.”

I was not all that happy with the comparison, but perhaps it was a reminder that even the most undesirable of machines could be used for a good purpose.

Canderous had marched back to the hatch, throwing a commanding look back to Jen. “I’m sure we’ll find a way for him to pull his weight on the Forge. Come on. Follow me.”

Jen acquiesced without further comment.

In the central common room, we found most of the others. Jolee was leaning against the kitchenette, a cup of caffa clasped between his hands. The faint aroma of firewhiskey wafted from him, and I wrinkled my nose in distaste.

Mission and Juhani were seated, both with a bowl of synthesized nutrients in front of them. Thermal batteries and targeting scopes littered the table, remains left from the Mandalorian’s incessant tinkering with his weaponry.

“(You should eat something, Jen,)” I rumbled, waving a paw at the empty seat next to Mission. “(Sit, and I shall get you some food.)”

I did not wait to hear her answer, but merely began working the synthesizer. Canderous had found a seat, also, and began talking. “Our time here is almost at a close, Revan,” he said. “The ‘Hawk will be space worthy in a matter of hours, and that twitchy Rodian wants us outta here in no more than eight.”

I turned around with a full bowl and spoon, and heard a chuckle from Jolee Bindo. “You met him as well, huh?”

“Hey,” Mission interjected. Her voice had spiked in indignation as she looked up from her bowl of pureed food. “What, you both snuck out? Far out! Carth told us all to stay put. I actually listened this time!” My young friend was scowling, throwing her displeasure at both Jolee and Canderous in turn.

I placed the bowl in front of Jen, and motioned toward it. She pulled a face. While I could understand her distaste, I still stood over her with limbs folded until she began eating.

“I have no idea what you are talking about, Mission,” Jolee Bindo replied in a mild tone. “Although, at my advanced age, I do find myself wandering places I don’t mean to.”

“Revan,” Canderous cut in, his voice a lot more serious than the old man’s. “You need to make a decision regarding Rosh.”

Jen’s gaze darted to the closed medbay doors, her spoon stilling in the air. Her mouth twisted.

“This is a good place to get him off our ship,” Canderous continued. His flinty gaze held hers. “There’s a whole empty space station for him to rummage around.”

“Because I’m sure our alcoholic friend won’t mind a Dark Jedi for company,” Jolee drawled.
Canderous grunted. “I wasn’t exactly gonna give Rosh or that Rodian much of a choice. Besides, Onasi’s stripped the damn ‘Hawk of near all our supplies just to foot the repair bill. I’m sure that can cover babysitting duties.” Canderous raised a brow. “It’s your call though, Revan.”

“I’d advise against it,” Jolee said, placing his caffa down on the bench to level Jen with a serious look. “I ain’t happy about the idea of waking him, just yet. He’s stable an’ he won’t die, but a few extra days in a healing coma would be safer.”

“I dunno,” Mission piped in. “Safer would be him off this ship, I reckon.”

“With the drugs in his system, he won’t be a threat.” Jolee said. He paused, before qualifying further, “well, not upon waking, at least.” Jolee cleared his throat, but kept his gaze on Jen. “If you want him to tag along with the rest of us, Revan, then you’d better make darn sure his darker instincts are reined in.”

“(This is a sensible place to part ways, and he is not one of us,)” I said slowly. “(But a short time ago, Jolee Bindo was not one of us. Before that, Carth Onasi’s cub was not one of us. This Yudan Rosh may be more dangerous, but it comes down to whether we can trust him. Whether he is worth the risk. And I am not sure anyone can judge that other than Jen.)”

Juhani had placed her spoon down, turning to look at Jen before throwing her opinion into the wind. “We cannot trust him yet. But it does not sit right with me that we would offer a chance of redemption to all we met at Korriban, and yet deny it to him.”

Jen threw her a dry look. “You’d save the galaxy if you could, Juhani.”

The Cathar gave her a smile, full of affection and admiration. “I am a Jedi, Revan. And so are you.”

A faint colour rose on Jen’s cheeks, and she looked away. “I- I need to talk to him, I guess,” she muttered. “You have to wake him, Jolee, whether he stays or goes. I’ll give you some time to do that. I need a moment to think, anyway.” She stood, muttering under her breath, “frelling HK.”

I tried to catch her eye, motioning back to the half-full bowl of synthesized gloop.

“I’ll be in the garage. I’ll head back to see him soon,” Jen told Jolee. She glanced back to me, jammed one last spoonful into her mouth with a wrinkle of her nose, and then left the room.

xXx

Yudan Rosh:

Coming to awareness was a process of automation. Reach out with the Force and identify one’s surroundings. Keep up the façade of slumber, but use one’s sense of smell and hearing in tandem with the Force. Locate the nearest weapon and wield it, if required.

A lifetime of reaction upon consciousness. Trust no one, and nothing.

Now, the Force was weak and indistinct. My soul yearned to sink back into the depths of slumber. Vaguely, I wasn’t even sure why guarding myself was so important.

The haziness of my thoughts was unusually cumbersome. And the pain that followed, radiating out from my gut, was distinctly worse.

“Calm down,” a raspy voice soothed, which immediately had me tensing. The pain heightened, and I only just held back a groan of discomfort. “You’re among friends.”

There was a pause, and I struggled to identify the voice before opening my eyes. The Force. It is… It was shaky and slippery, and my grasp toward it weaker than a neophyte Initiate’s.

Drugs. Medication. Something is interfering with my own personal defences.

I am a prisoner. The thought sparked a surge of caustic adrenaline rushing through my bloodstream, but self-control kept my eyes shut. Gather information about your environment first. Appear weaker then you truly are. Let them underestimate you.

“Well,” the voice continued, “suppose I’d better qualify that. You’re among friends who don’t trust you. Heh. But you’re safe enough, sonny, and panicking ain’t in your best interests.”

Sonny? My limbs were leaden and weak, but not restrained. The Force was indistinct and hard to reach, but not impossible. I would be able to harness it if I tried harder.

Wherever I was, it seemed my captors were complete idiots.

I opened my eyes. It took a moment to focus against the contrast of the halogen lighting.

An old, dark-skinned Human was staring at me with wary interest. His pose was benign and casual. I had the urge to lunge out in pre-emptive attack at my would-be captor, but something held me back – possibly my own physical weakness. For there was a drug-induced lethargy deep within my muscles, and the grinding pain in my abdomen went well beyond unpleasant. I will make a move when the time is right.

And then, recognition flared through my pain-riddled mind.

The old man. The Leviathan. Revan.

My gaze darted swiftly around the room in reaction; a small storage area, not much more than a closet, really. Shelves lined with towels and bacta patches and containers full of hypoderms. A make-shift medbay, for a place not large enough to have a dedicated one.

The vented ceiling was a dark grey; a blend of durasteel and titasteel common to smaller scoutships and freighters. The ducting lines along the side looked commercial rather than military, and the lack of any obvious surveillance further cemented that impression.

I’m on Revan’s freighter. I felt the unfamiliar taste of bewilderment. In my mind rose the recollection of her levelling that cyan blade at my heart. Her eyes, fierce with green fire, as she stared down at me like the blazing Jedi Knight she had once been.

Like Malachor and all that happened afterward never occurred. Like she had never fallen. And the injustice of that burned, as I ignored the corner of my soul that rejoiced at the sight of her uncorrupted face.

So. She hadn’t killed me on the Leviathan. But why had she not just shoved me into the nearest escape pod?

Because Revan is reckless. I tried to pretend I did not think that with any measure of fondness. Before she fell, she was reckless to a fault. It used to drive Malak absolutely crazy.

The old man coughed, and it was with relief that I dragged my jagged thoughts away from her.
“I can imagine it’s a bit disorienting, waking up here.” He was staring at me with a beady expression. “If the Force feels off to you, it’s just the Ceramol in your system. It’s the only pain-med the crew bothered to stock, I’m afraid. I remember Zhar telling me once that Ceramol and kolto together had a tendency to scramble the Force in Twi’leks.” His mouth thinned. “You needed the kolto, and the Ceramol’s taking the edge off your pain, hard as that may be to believe. With your internal injuries, I imagine the discomfort is substantial.”

Ceramol. That explained it. Not an impossible handicap to overcome, if I didn’t wish to wait the effects out. Still, I would have preferred the pain.

“We’re going to talk about Zhar, one day soon,” the old man muttered. “That is, if you end up sticking around. Half the crew want to pitch you over to a nearby space station with only an alcoholic Rodian for company.” He paused. “Not that it would be all bad. He’s got quite an extensive range of spirits. Although don’t tell our pilot I snuck out.”

He waggled his eyebrows at me. I stared back, wondering if the rambling, half-senile act was designed to put me at ease. If so, it wasn’t working.

“Where, exactly, is this space station?” The words scraped against my throat, which made me speculate upon just how long I’d been out cold.

“Oh ho! So he does talk!” The old man sounded almost gleeful. “We’re docked on some old station orbiting Yavin Prime. Seems to be in the hands of a sole smuggler doing trade runs for the Exchange and the like.”

Yavin Prime. Outer Rim, not far from Kashyyyk, but nowhere close to any well-known hyperlane route. Last I’d heard, the Yavin sector was uninhabited barring primitive indigenous species - ever since Exar Kun had been ousted from one of its moons. If there was a space station here, it was likely some relic from his time.

“I didn’t want to wake you up just yet,” the Human was grumbling. “Seems to me that gut of yours could take a bit more rest, and you don’t strike me as the sort of fellow who will idly lie back and let your body heal. But, well, the others insisted. We’ll be heading out in half a day, and someone’s got to decide what to do with you.”

Do with me? It was galling, to think of my life in the hands of others. Barring Malak, I had not taken orders from anyone. I’d put up with Bandon’s hot air and grandstanding for my own purposes, and no one else had dared speak to me in the same fashion. Bandon may have grasped a larger depth of Force power than I, but the difference had not been insurmountable, and I’d more than outstripped him in combat.

I’d long since gleaned Bandon’s weaknesses, for I’d realized an altercation between the two of us was inevitable. At least it had been, until Revan ended matters so spectacularly.

The old man was still staring at me with interest. He said half the crew wish to offload me here. It wouldn’t take long, I suspected, before I found a way off some decrepit old space station. But what would I do, then?

The only purpose I’d felt in recent times was the undying drive to end Darth Revan. And surely she was still there. I did not believe otherwise. I refused to believe otherwise.

But, it seemed, I could not strike out at Revan Freeflight. Not without proof of her corruption. And once again, I damned myself for the fragility of feeling I had never been able to shed since a teenage Revan first stepped onto Coruscanti soil.
“What do the other half wish to do with me?” My head was clearing, now. The pain was constant and deep, but I could ignore it. When it became unbearable, I would reach out for the Force, and by then the Ceramol should have adequately worn off.

The old man snorted. “Well, our pilot wants to knock you out, tie you up and ship you off to his superiors. Or, failing that, shoot you in the head. Still, you can’t really blame the fellow. I understand you were on the edge of killing him yourself.”

It took longer than it should have to connect the dots. I had never liked the way drugs addled my thought processes.

Revan’s soldier. Had Revan actually found love again? It seemed unlikely. Beyond unlikely. It must be a simple fling that, judging from the explosive stand-off back on the Leviathan, would now have turned remarkably sour.

The love Revan and Malak shared once had been eons deep. Before their fall, Malak would have damned the galaxy just to keep her happy.

Afterward… well, even their love had burned to ashes. And the fallout had affected more than just them.

I felt my teeth grit, and forcibly pushed away the dark, heady memories that Revan had absolutely no recollection of. Part of me desired that she find out, one day, everything that had occurred… and a larger part of me hoped she never would.

“At the end of it, the decision is Revan’s. So, let’s see if you can sit up, huh?”

I stared back at the man; he was serious, now. “What is your name?” I asked.

“Jolee Bindo.” He harrumphed. “You won’t have heard of me. I’m one of the few not-famous ones here.”

I ran through the list of Revan’s crew in my mind once more. I’d known it off-heart months ago. Jedi Padawan Bastila Shan. Republic warhero Captain Carth Onasi. Mandalorian General Canderous Ordo. They were all famous enough, even if the Twi’lek, the Cathar and the Wookiee were not. I suppose if one were to add in Revan herself – and now my own presence – then it amounted to a rather notorious manifest.

I knew nothing of this old man. Judging by how mortal my injury had been - and that Revan had never been able to heal a chiving papercut – then this man must have been Jedi-trained. I was well-versed with the annals of the Jedi Order, but his name was unknown to me. Perhaps he’d left young. But- My eyes narrowed. “You knew Zhar Lestin.”

“Yes.” His voice had hardened, bushy white eyebrows slamming down over dark eyes. “You could say we were best buddies back when we were kids. Me, Zhar, and Karon Enova.”

That was… interesting. Malak and Revan’s masters. Now dead, but their childhood friend follows Revan. Perhaps it was just an odd coincidence, one of those funny quirks of the Force.

Jokes, sometimes, the Force plays on us all. Take life less seriously, you should. Learn to laugh a little. A smile. A smile, now, my Padawan. A raspy chuckle. Consider my day’s work done, I will, if today I wrest a smile from you.

That voice, creaky and high-pitched, was one I hadn’t heard in my head for a long, long time.
Jolee Bindo cleared his throat, and the memory fled like a shadow in the sun. Bindo’s expression had transformed into open speculation. “I’ve spent most of my recent years hanging out with the Wookiees, so you’ll have to forgive me if I’m not up to play with recent events. Who was your Jedi Master, Yudan Rosh?”

Oh no, I was not going to play nostalgia with a rambling old man. “Where is Revan?” I asked, struggling upright and swinging my feet off the bunk with a groan. I couldn’t hold back a grimace of pain, and a surge of dizziness engulfed me. My vision immediately speckled with black. “I will see her now,” I rasped, my breaths coming out high and fast.

“You can barely talk,” the old man snapped. “Take it easy, sonny. If you rupture something, I may not be on hand to save you again.”

“You’re a medic,” I forced through gritted teeth. “You would not have roused me if you believed the chance of me dying was high.”

“High, heh… fine. Far be it for me to talk any sense into the likes of you,” Jolee Bindo grumbled. “But I’ll foist one last piece of advice your way, sonny. Don’t say or do anything stupid. There’s a few Force-sensitives onboard, and those who aren’t ain’t exactly pushovers either. No one here has much of a mind to give you any chances.”

Slowly, I forced myself to my feet, ignoring his comments. I was not an imbecile.

The oncoming surge of nausea was strong, and I held it back with an effort of will, my fists clenching in reaction. It was easier to conquer physical weakness with the Force but, for now, I’d have to rely on the effect of the pain meds.

“Where is Revan?” I repeated, this time keeping my words firm and unshaken.

“Humph. Try the garage. You’ll have to go through the common room- here, you’d better let me lead the way.” Muttering something about idiots, the old man opened the hatch and wandered through. I took a deep breath and followed, concentration focused exclusively on not tripping over my own unsteady feet.

Shavit, but I hated feeling so weak. Especially here, around Revan and her allies.

Looking down at myself, I realized the old man had removed my armour, and replaced my no-doubt bloodied and torn clothing with what amounted to little more than grotesquely coloured rags. I grimaced. What I wear is irrelevant. Deciding on my next steps is what I need to focus on.

And- and not falling over.

The room beyond was clearly the central hub of the freighter. Jolee Bindo had meandered over to a comestible dispenser bolted onto the wall. My attention was immediately drawn to Canderous Ordo. He was seated and, in typical Mandalorian fashion, surrounded by various pieces of weaponry.

Ordo’s expression stilled at my entrance, and his hands tightened on the nearest blaster.

Next to him perched the young Twi’lek girl, Mission Vao. I hadn’t been concerned about her the first time I’d boarded Revan’s freighter, for I had been anonymous beneath a Mandalorian helm. And, even now she knew my name, she may not have realized it had been I down in the Shadowlands.

It was dark and she was panicking. The chances of her recognizing me are sli-
Her eyes widened. “You’re that marsh toad from the Shadowlands!” she accused.

“What?” Ordo demanded, his voice warping into a low roar. “Ad’ika, did this chakaar hurt you?”

There was a whistling through the air, and the blaze of a red lightsaber at my neck. The Force flooded through me, ready to do my bidding, breaking through the fuzziness of the lingering Ceramol. I clamped down hard on the urge to react, aware that my injured body could fail me - and that passivity might actually be the safest course of action here.

I slowly turned my head to survey the weapon’s owner, keeping my face expressionless.

A young Human male stood, glaring at me with a mixture of hate, fright, and the recognizable awe of a youngling. The Force was swirling uncontrolled chaos around him. There was emotion there, deep and black and bittersweet. This one was strong, but undisciplined in the matters of Force control.

Also, he was obviously not from the Jedi Order.

“You said something about lightning, Mission,” Ordo growled. “Back on Carpet’s planet. You told me you got hit.” In my periphery, I could see the Mandalorian wielding a large repeating blaster levelled in my direction. “All bets are off if this shabuir struck you in the Shadowlands.”

“Sheesh, guys, settle down. It wasn’t him, it was his best buddy. This one actually tried to get the bald sleemo to let me go.” The girl sniffed loudly. “He didn’t try very hard, mind you.”

“Huh,” Ordo grunted, and there was a thunk as his weapon was placed back on the table. I was still holding the gaze of the young Human, whose eyes had widened after my absolution from the most unlikely of sources. He switched off the lightsaber, gave a squeak of alarm I’d place credits on him regretting, and then vanished.

I blinked. He was completely gone. I couldn’t even sense him in the Force.

Perhaps Jolee Bindo overdid the Ceramol, I thought fuzzily.

“Think you got yourself an admirer there, ad’ika,” the Mandalorian commented in a teasing voice. “That’s the first time I’ve seen Sithkid in days.”

“What?” the girl squeaked. “Don’t be ridiculous, ya old geezer. We were playing pazaak earlier. Turns out, Dustil’s just as crap as Jen.”

Ordo snorted. He looked back to me again, and I realized I’d been standing stock still, waiting for my respirations to stabilize and my vision to clear. Maybe the old man hadn’t been voicing garbage when he urged me to take it easy.

“You and me got some things to settle, Rosh,” Ordo said, his voice cooling. “But amongst the Mando’ade, we don’t discharge our debts on injured parties.” He paused, jerking a thumb in the direction of an exit. “I expect you want to see Revan. She’s off sulking in the garage behind me.”

Jolee Bindo snorted, having turned around with a steaming beverage in his clasped hands. He hadn’t moved, I realized, even when that young Force-user had brandished a lightsaber at my neck. Jolee Bindo gave me fair warning, and now he’s standing back to see what I do. On one level, I could appreciate that I deserved no chance from these sentients. On the other, I did not see the point in healing someone from a mortal wound, merely to stand back while they were threatened.

“Canderous.” The kid Twi’lek rolled her eyes at him, before shooting me a wary glance. “Don’t hassle Jen. She needs some time alone, is all.”

“Sulking,” Ordo muttered, and the girl stuck her tongue out at him.

It was… too much. This sense of camaraderie and allegiance amongst these people… the warmth they obviously felt toward Revan. It was a bittersweet reminder of my own past before the shadows had strangled everything.

“Go on, then,” Jolee Bindo urged, jerking his head toward the hatch Ordo had indicated. “The galaxy knows that lass could do with the distraction.”

Jerkily, I nodded, and began walking. Behind me I heard the girl mutter. “Sheesh, but he’s a quiet one.”

Well. I had never seen the point in talking when one had nothing of import to say.

I stepped into the garage, and the hatch closed behind me. Revan was there, but she was not alone.

And the pair of them were so deeply involved in conversation that they did not even register my entrance.

xXx

Revan Freeflight:

I stared at the shut-down frame of HK-47. It seemed unbelievable. Crazily coincidental. I had no recollection of him whatsoever; stars, I’d been travelling with the damn homicidal droid for months without any glimmer of familiarity.

But then, I hadn’t recalled Jolee Bindo, either.

HK had an upright humanoid shape that was heavily armoured, allowing him to pose as a combat droid with protocol specifications. But there was a distinctly foreign look about the angular lines of his build that denied any sort of mainstream manufacture. I’d noticed that well before the revelations of today.

Combine HK’s physical appearance with his unique attitude, and it all screamed out a custom-built blueprint. That I’d apparently designated. I wondered, with a shiver, if the Star Forge had spat out any others. It can make starships, and it can make scarily competent assassination droids. What else can it do?

I glanced around the rest of the garage, searching for a distraction. It was mostly empty. Detritus from Davik’s old swoop bike still milled about in a corner- someone having strapped the chassis to the wall and gathered the loose parts into a storage canister. I’d heard Mission moaning about repairing the bike, and even caught Dustil, once, trying to reframe the repulsors.

This room reminded me of our last hyperspace journey, when I’d spent most of my waking hours here, training and discussing the Force with Juhani and the Sithkids. Kel had been quiet, Dustil sullen, and Dak moody and lacklustre- at least at first. Strangely enough, it had been Canderous who’d gone some way to dragging Dak out from the depression of losing one of his best friends and his arm.

Whereas I’d spent the time running from Carth, until he’d finally cornered me and we’d-

I gritted my teeth, dragging my thoughts away.
The last two days had been quiet. I’d only seen Carth once, just after docking, when he’d walked into the common room to address us all. He’d demanded, in a flat voice, that everyone stay restricted to the ship. Something about a nervous, trigger-happy Rodian, and that the ‘Hawk’s safety would be compromised if anyone was caught disembarking.

His eyes had been on me when he’d said it. The message had been clear. Don’t leave the ship. Or else.

Of course, both Canderous and Jolee had flat-out ignored him. Jolee had returned from the station muttering about a roomful of alcohol and an over-eager host. I couldn’t think that Carth was ignorant of the old man’s travels, but then, Carth had other things on his mind.

I sighed. I’d had little time alone, and I honestly wasn’t sure if that was a good thing or not. I’d milled aimlessly around the ship – avoiding the cockpit and Carth’s quarters – with one or another of the crew tacitly keeping me company.

It was up to Carth, now. When he was ready to talk, he’d find me, and I’d just have to suck it up and take whatever he dished out.

I kept my eyes on the hatch that led to the common room, attempting yet again to think of something other than Carth. I have to head back to the medbay. Staring at the powered-down HK wasn’t giving me any answers, and I’d have plenty of time to grill the droid later. Right now, there was another important matter to deal with. And in a way, I was just as uncertain what to say to Yudan Rosh as I was to Carth.

Would Yudan want to travel with us, or leave?

Should his opinion hold any sway over it?

Could I trust that he wouldn’t join Malak’s side, if we took him with us to the Star Forge? All I knew was that Yudan had once been a close, trusted friend of mine. Which meant he must have been the same to Malak.

And- Malak had turned on me. Was Yudan part of that, too?

The hatch opened. But it wasn’t the one I was staring at.

I spun around, to see Carth take a step into the room. And my stomach bottomed out in reaction.

He looked- like he hasn’t slept in days. Like he’s been tormenting himself over- over me. The anger was still there, darkening his eyes to almost black. I couldn’t tell if it was hatred or not- but it must be, surely-“Revan,” he said in a low voice. I couldn’t hold back a slight wince. It was my name, far more than Jen had ever been- and it wasn’t like I wanted him to call me something I wasn’t- but it was a reminder, perhaps, of the events that stood between us like an unpassable schism of darkness. “I have some questions.”

I swallowed. “Ask. I’ll- I’ll answer. As best I can.”

His mouth thinned at that, although I didn’t really understand why. His voice remained cold. “Mission said you found out in the Shadowlands. Is that true?”

“I- yes.” In a manner of speaking.
“So- what? I fell for a dead woman?” His brows had lowered. “All that time, on Taris- on, on Korriban – none of it was really you?”

I sucked in a deep, shaky lungful of air. “It was me,” I whispered. “I just didn’t know my name. It was me since my head injury on the Endar Spire… Jen is- was a completely different woman to me. To the one you’ve travelled with.”

“And you killed her.”

I felt my breath hitch at that. Jen Sahara was not the sort of person I would warm to naturally. Nervous, shy, meek. She’d been intelligent, sure enough, but had wasted that under her controlling father’s thumb. And now, I was stuck with her faded memories, a constant reminder of one of the many, many lives I had ended. “I have no idea if it was by my hand. But I know I’m responsible, nevertheless.”

“Yes,” he bit out. “You are.”

I stayed silent, having no rejoinder to that. What could I say? Jen Sahara had been tortured, under my command, presumably for no other reason than her untapped Force sensitivity. She could have been so much more- flourished, perhaps, if she’d found the strength to step away from her father. She could have become a trained archaeologist, or, or, a medical doctor-

“What happened on Rii’shn?”

Carth’s question was sharp, and wholly unexpected. I could see a flare of anguish in his face, then, before his expression hardened. He’d asked about Rii’shn before. More than once. And I’d always found a way to distract him.

I must have taken too long to respond, for his brows lowered further. “You owe me an answer,” he growled. “Dammit, Revan, you owe me a galaxy more than just one blasted answer.”

I looked away. It was easier, somehow, to reply without holding his gaze. “I walked into a trap,” I said in a monotone. “Assassins that Malak sent after me. Things turned a bit- messy.”

Understatement of the year, there, Revvie. Why don’t we just say we had a wee disagreement and cancelled any future play-dates.

“And?” His voice was uncompromising. I felt my temper rise a little, at that, no matter how unjustified it was.

“I went Dark,” I said, forcing the words out. “I guess that’s what you want to hear. I had- a voice in my head. Flashbacks of a similar incident.” Each word was a wrestle of will to voice, and there was worse to come. Somehow, I knew Carth wouldn’t let up until he’d had the whole of it. “By the end, I enjoyed slaughtering everyone in sight, and when I came to I thought I had the voice of a dead Sith Lord in my head.”

There was a pause. And then- “What?”

I could feel my anger stirring. It was at myself, though, I knew. “All the time, Carth, I convinced myself I was some other third party, with Jen and Darth Revan in my head, taking turns apiece to screw with my sanity.” A bitter laugh fell from my lips. “Pretty crazy, huh? Enough to make one go see a doctor for help.”

And hadn’t that turned out well?

“You- you mean- wait a minute- you knew you weren’t Jen Sahara, you knew Revan was in your head, and it didn’t even occur to you that Revan might actually be you?” He was a mix of incredulity and blistering anger, now.

This was going about as fantastically as I’d expected.

My fingers cramped into fists. My eyes pricked, and I blinked furiously. “Bastila told me I’d been a Jedi Knight. She’d told me I’d never fallen—no, she told me Ness sodding Jonohl had never fallen, and I latched onto it like a lifeline, believing it was my real name.” The words kept stumbling out, harsh and low and like little droplets of acid. “Everyone knows that Revan is dead, right? How could I be her, truly her, and not just a screwed up sent with a ghost in my head?” My jaw clenched, before I finally admitted the truth of the matter. “I didn’t want to believe it, I guess. So I didn’t.”

I sneaked a look back to him. Was it self-loathing on his face? Was it about his own poor judgment—he got it wrong with Saul, before. The man he looked up to, the man who mentored him. And now, Carth’s looking at me in the same light. Worse, even. Because Saul was my creature. And Telos—

“I shouldn’t have become involved with you,” I whispered. Somehow, my anger had vanished in the beat of a heart. “I knew that at the time. I guess— I guess I was selfish.”

The pain in his eyes seemed to agree with me.

It was—It was getting too much. I could feel the grief, again, rising from the marrow of my soul. I’d thought I could handle this, but everything Carth felt was justified. He had every reason in the galaxy to blame me, to despise me—

My gaze stilled on the blaster clipped at his hip. Carth never, since Korriban, walked around the ship visibly armed— not like Canderous, who made a game of seeing how many weapons he could carry and still walk without keeling over. Carth always disarmed, or at least tucked them away discretely into a chest holster concealed beneath a jacket.

The ship’s home base, he’d said once when I’d queried him on it. Not to mention that Mission keeps trying to twist them off my belt as a prank—

My eyes were stinging, now, still pinned on the gun. The last thing I wanted to do was break down in front of Carth. But the despair hadn’t left me, no matter that I’d tried my best to rise above it. I’d known our next conversation would test me. A smarter woman would have walked out of the room. But Carth was right. I owed him—and he deserved so much more than me.

I saw his hand twitch, next to the blaster I couldn’t drag my gaze from.

“If the billions out there knew you were still alive, they’d cheer me for pulling the trigger,” he whispered. He’d caught my gaze, then. “To stop any chance of Darth Revan returning.”

I closed my eyes.

Standing like a blind woman in the middle of a freighter’s garage, holding myself upright against the hammer of words from a betrayed lover.

I could picture it in my minds-eye, myself motionless while Carth’s hand slowly lifted. Unsure if he had the fortitude to shoot the monster he’d come to care for—

“Do it,” I mouthed. “Let it come to an end then.”
Just like the Leviathan, but this time I couldn’t watch.

Yet… this time I wouldn’t be held back by inaction. This time I couldn’t be. Carth and I… the debts between us- it was insignificant, really, compared to what was waiting for us at the Star Forge. To the mistakes I had to fix. As much as my heart might yearn for the impossible, our mission trumped personal and I knew it.

I wouldn’t let Carth shoot me, not while I still had Bastila and Malak and the Forge to deal with.

But maybe I just needed to know if he’d actually do it. It wasn’t like I wouldn’t be able to dodge in time-

You always were too reckless, someone rebuked in my head. It sounded like Karon. Always too quick to jump into situations, without a thought for the consequences.

Reckless idiot, a different voice murmured with affection.

I wondered if Carth’s grasp was shaking, like last time. If he truly thought he could follow through. Surely he didn’t believe he’d be quick enough on the draw- a split second’s thought and I’d wrap the Force around him before he’d even begun to press the trigger.

This is unfair to Carth. And as that realization unfurled in my mind, I understood that it wasn’t my right to know what he would do. Perhaps I had lost that right.

“I get why you feel betrayed, Carth,” I said, my eyes still squeezed tight. The resolve was firming. It was like I’d accepted what was out of my reach, and now only looked towards that which I had to do. “I won’t ask you to trust me again. But you and me- we’re not what’s truly important. Not when compared to stopping Malak.” I breathed in, deep to the bottom of my lungs. “So either hammer that trigger home and do something about your anger at me, or let’s move on and focus on our mission.”

My eyes snapped open.

Carth’s face was anguished with heartbreak as he stared at me. His hand was nowhere near his blaster, which was still clipped safely onto his belt.

“I won’t let you move against the Republic,” he whispered brokenly. “I won’t let you become Darth Revan again.”

Oh, Carth. His tenacity to his own ideals was one of the things I admired the most about him. I wish I could believe that. How would you be able to stop me?

“If Darth Revan returns, I shall know,” an arctic voice bit out behind us. I flinched.

Carth’s hand moved, for real this time, resting at the weapon on his hip. His expression had hardened, staring beyond me, at the intruder who I heard slowly walking into the garage.

Yudan. I had little memory of him, but it was obvious our history was huge.

I turned. Yudan’s attention was focused exclusively on Carth. “There is no one left alive who knows Revan as well as me. Malak is too insane to count.” He was five metres away from Carth, now, his hands relaxed at his sides. His face was pale and drawn. He didn’t look like a threat. But still-Carth’s grip was firm on his blaster. The Force shook like a thunderstorm around me.

“I knew Revan Freeflight as well as a close friend could, and I followed Darth Revan into the darkest pits of perdition. If Darth Revan returns, I shall know,” Yudan repeated, his voice dropping. “I’ll ensure she dies. And stays dead, this time.”

They stood, staring at each other in grim silence. Of an equal age and height, they’d fought in the same wars. Once on the same side, once on opposite.

Carth’s mouth twisted in pain, and he swung his attention back in my direction, as if Yudan Rosh wasn’t worth any more of his time. He seemed at a complete loss for words.

Yudan, too, had shifted his gaze to me.

Like twin sentinels, they stood, facing me and the creeping shadow of my evil. One, a dark voice from my forgotten past. The other, a shining promise of a future I had to accept, now, was completely out of my reach.

Carth gave the tiniest shake of his head, threw one last glare of mistrust at Yudan, and left the room in silence.

I was vaguely aware of the flood of tears I struggled to hold back. All I could see was that octagonal room back on the Leviathan, drenched in death. The Togruta, the betrayer, and the woman who’d once pledged her life to me. Darth Revan. Neither of you grasp just how much she has already returned.

“Damn you,” I whispered to the man who was still in the garage, the one who’d interrupted Carth and I. “Damn you, Yudan.”

“You damned me a long time ago, Revan.”

It was enough. Maybe because it was Yudan and not Carth- the one who’d sliced two of my fingers off and laid the death-blow on Zhar, the one who I couldn’t even remember, the one who was sodding well corrupted himself-

Maybe because it was him, the melancholy disappeared and a hot anger rose up in its stead. Not a dark, unstoppable rage that would blacken anything in its path, but a pissy temper that felt a damn sight more healthy than it probably should have.

“We need to talk,” I bit out, shooting him my most ferocious glare. Yudan didn’t look fazed in the slightest. “And, sod it—” I stared around the empty garage. Most if not all of the crew were onboard. Zaalbar had advanced hearing, and anyone with Force powers could listen in if they desired. Last thing I needed was for Dustil to go telling his dad whatever Yudan would reveal about my past. “-we’re leaving this ship. I need a drink, anyway. Follow me.”

xXx

No one had been around when we disembarked the Hawk. Left the docking bay. Trudged into the mysterious space station.

We walked without speaking down a long, grey corridor. The sound of our footfalls wasn’t loud, but it still echoed. There were Republic markings along the skirtings of the walls, raising my curiosity about the history of this abandoned place.

Everything felt a touch surreal. Here I was, casually strolling along to grab a drink with a friend, as if I were leading a perfectly normal life. As if Yudan was a perfectly normal sent. As if I was.

As if I hadn’t just left my battered heart back on the ‘Hawk.

My gaze slid to Yudan. Jolee had patched him up well enough, I thought, although he was pale beneath the muted gold of his skin. The old man must have rustled up the dregs of the clothing bin, for Yudan was attired in a torn pair of trousers, and a bright pink shirt too small for his build. It looked completely ridiculous on him.

My interest regarding Yudan Rosh was only natural, considering our past. He was slightly taller than me, a similar height to Carth, but he reminded me more of Canderous – albeit a golden, hairless version from a different species. Yudan’s entire body was packed with lean muscle, like he’d spent his life dedicated to training.

He was a warrior, obviously, much the same as Canderous or Juhani. I had the vague recollection of Bastila telling me he was one of the best duellists alive-

My maimed hand clenched at my side. Without some form of advanced prosthetic, I’d be changing the lightsaber form I was most adept at. Yudan had made that abundantly clear back on the Leviathan.

“Do you have something to say?” he asked in a monotone, and I realized I’d been staring at him.

“No, uh, no,” I muttered, wrenching my gaze ahead. There were doors leading off in both directions. The entire place was eerie; completely devoid of life. “You’ve been in that Mandalorian armour so long, I’m surprised you’re not still wearing it. Or some fancy ceremonial tunic that shouldn’t step foot outside of a sodding temple.” Somewhere should be the station’s owner. And a roomful of alcohol, if Jolee’s word was to be trusted.

“Ceremonial-” Yudan stopped without me realizing at first, and I had to turn around several metres ahead. He was staring after me, eyes blazing. “What do you remember, Revan?”

“What?” I frowned, puzzled. “It was just an off-hand comment. Nothing behind it.”

It was- awkward as frell, talking to someone who knew my entire past, while I had little recollection of the man at all. No idea why he’d latch onto something like that, seeing as he’d probably worn nothing but brown robes followed by black most of his life.

Although, I had the feeling I’d been rather disinterested in adopting any sort of dress code, so why should I expect others to?

“Hello, hello!” a voice squeaked out nervously. Behind me, a Rodian male was almost tripping over himself in fright. I sensed Yudan move the final metres back to my side. “Your ship’s almost done. Carl assured me everyone would stay onboard for the length of your stay.”

Carl. Carth’s attempt at a false name, I thought with exasperated fondness. My heart ached. He’d grounded all of us – me especially – and he had every reason to keep me pinned down.

But, then, I’d never done particularly well at following orders, especially not ones I thought were stupid. I needed a place to talk with Yudan, away from the others- and, stars, I couldn’t imagine Dustil obeying this sort of directive from his dad, so really, what was Carth thinking, expecting me to?

Carth. I’m sorry. I wish-
I bit down on my inner cheek to stop the useless thoughts, and sent a fake smile to the twitching Rodian.

“We’re just after a drink. That’s all,” I said, in a voice I tried to make as soothing and gentle as I could. “Just a quiet place to chat away from the others. We won’t cause any trouble.”

The Rodian’s black eyes had widened dramatically, fixed on Yudan’s face. It might have been recognition – or maybe just the sickly yellow of Yudan’s eyes, the black crevasses of corruption alongside his cheeks. It wasn’t hard to spot a powerful Dark Jedi.

The Rodian squeaked again. “I’m happy to send alcohol back onboard with you. The salvage your pilot has off-loaded more than covers the repair-bots’ work. I-”

“We’d like to talk somewhere here,” I interrupted, with a firm voice. The temptation to cut this conversation short with a little Force persuasion was strong. Did others, those firmly entrenched in the Light, feel the same desire for short-cuts, for methods where the ethics blurred?

It wasn’t like it’d cause any harm- just a quick twist of the Force augmenting my suggestion: that he grant us privacy, allow us a brief window of time on his station. It wasn’t a dark employ of the Force, not really, maybe just a little grey-

Was that how it started? Tiny, tiny steps with seemingly solid justification behind them? I didn’t know. Sometimes, I thought a fall was merely a journey of a thousand stumbles, without the time or inclination to pull oneself back up again.

I forced a smile, aware it probably appeared more like a rictus of pain. Well, the Rodian wasn’t even staring at me anyway. “We’ll be on our best behaviour,” I promised. “Look, just a few drinks, away from our ship, and-” I frowned. “What’s your name?”

“Suvam,” he said. He didn’t look at me. His large black eyes hadn’t moved from Yudan’s visage, and the stink of fear was rolling off him. Of course it was. The last thing the Rodian desired, no doubt, was an unstable Dark Jedi running amok on his station.

Yudan flashed an indecipherable look at me, before turning back to the Rodian. “We are not here to cause any sort of trouble.” His voice was silky; deeper and smoother than I’d heard it before. And the thrum of compulsion was evident on the Force. “You can find us a place to sit and have a few quiet drinks.”

“I have just the place to sit and have a few quiet drinks,” the Rodian mumbled, spinning around. “Follow me!”

“Yudan!” I hissed indignantly, feeling my face flare with annoyance. “That was the sort of thing I was trying to avoid!”

“I am sorry,” he said blandly, sounding anything but as he began traipsing after the Rodian. “Did you mistake me for a tame kath pup, Revan?”

My eyes widened in further outrage, but the Rodian was probably too far ahead to have heard my name, and now Yudan was walking away-

Sun and stars! This conversation was going to drive me mad, I could tell. Which is probably better than wallowing in my own heartache. Canderous had already tried, more than once, to lift my mood which had been desolate enough before I’d spoken with Carth. Canderous had even pulled out the twin lures of sparring and alcohol, brandishing a couple of bottles he must have traded or nicked from Suvam. It hadn’t worked, though. Finally, he’d stomped off with a comment about childish sulking—

I was a grown woman in my thirties. I had more issues to deal than was reasonable on any level. I did not sulk.

Still, it felt better to be seething at his comments, or outraged at my maybe-enemy-turned-ally, than spend the time slowly sinking back into the despair that seemed to dog my every thought.

Suvam turned into a room that opened out into a large half-circle dominated by benches and tables. On one wall was a bar, behind which the shelves were lined with an impressive array of colourful bottles. I felt my eyes widen in appreciation. Getting drunk right now would be beyond idiotic. That was true, but a couple of drinks wouldn’t go amiss. It might be enough to loosen the awkwardness that was bound to otherwise dominate our conversation.

The Rodian had scampered over to his collection of booze, before turning around to shoot Yudan a worried look. The room itself was large enough that we could easily sit out of earshot – good thing, too, because the topics I planned to touch on did not need to be overheard. But, still, there was the matter of surveillance.

My eyes caught on the black ducting around the edges of the ceiling. Easy enough to hide mics in there, or pinhole holo-cams. “I should be able to short anything out,” I muttered, more to myself as my gaze roamed around the industrial walls that beheld no decoration whatsoever. Obviously, Suvam was not a decorating sort of guy.

“And you thought to upbraid me for utilizing a simple mind trick?”

I scowled at Yudan. I didn’t want to concede any sort of point-scoring, here, not to sodding Yudan Rosh. And privacy was damn well important.

But one could easily argue that the destruction of a civilian’s monitoring equipment was hardly the behaviour of a Jedi. I couldn’t ever forget Yudan’s prime motivation. But what did he constitute as stepping into the shadows of darkness? How can you call something good or evil, when there are a thousand shades of grey in between?

Darth Revan hadn’t been grey, though. I couldn’t kid myself on that.

“Go take a seat, Yudan,” I said. I was still glaring at him, yet his composed expression implied he was entirely unruffled by my ire. He had to be in some discomfort; the lack of colour in his skin tone and the sheen on his face belied that. And, yet, he came across as completely unconcerned by everything around him. It made me wonder if anything in the galaxy unsettled the bastard.

I daresay he’s seen too much to care about anything, anymore. And that’s on me. The despair rose again, choking in my throat, the flash of Nisotsa’s corpse, a red ring around her neck- all the other millions I’ve killed or betrayed-

I spun around before it could show on my face, and stomped over to Suvam.

“Surveillance,” I said, through clenched teeth. I leaned over the bar, but the Rodian was still gawking at Yudan. “There better not be any here.”

“No, no, of course not,” he mumbled incoherently.
I let my irritation come to the fore, then, and slammed a fist on the bar. Suvam jumped, and his round eyes shot to mine.

“I need your vow that there is no surveillance here.” I didn’t want to threaten the fellow, but there was no point in this conversation if I had to watch every second sodding word. “You’ll have nothing to worry about, assuming I can trust you.”

Suvam’s bulbous black eyes blinked at me. “I don’t spy on Dark Jedi!” he squeaked. “I leave all cams disabled so they don’t zap ‘em! Or me! All I do is offer free drinks, make the trade, and keep ‘em happy!”

His panic was evident in his shaking hands. As was his honesty.

“Great. Calm down, then. Make us a drink of- of something, and-” I halted in mid-speech, suddenly weary and mildly ashamed of the sent’s obvious alarm. “We only want a place to talk, Suvam. I know you need us off this station. We’ll be a few hours, at most, and then you’ll see the back of us. I promise.”

He quivered a nod at me, and then began pouring something into a pair of tumblers. I only started frowning when he picked up the third ingredient. A simple drink would have sufficed. I guess he’s trying to placate us with fancy highbrow cocktails. It smelled fruity and looked vaguely tropical. I half-expected him to stick a paper umbrella and a wedge of sour-fruit in it.

Suvam slid the two highball glasses over the bar. Faint puffs of mist curled over the edge of the ferracrystal. I had the sudden recollection of Yuthura Ban, surrounded in undesired multi-coloured drinks back in that cantina on Dreshdae, when an underling had tried uselessly to sidle into her good graces.

“Thanks,” I said slowly, eyeing over the drinks in askance. “We’ll wave you over when we need a refill. Or, er, a different drink.”

Suvam gave a shaky nod. I collected the glasses, turned, and headed back to Yudan Rosh.

Yudan was lounging against the wall, his eyes half-lidded and his posture relaxed. For some reason, it irritated the frell out of me. Maybe because I was so on edge, while he almost came across as bored.

I thudded the drinks down on the nearby table, took a seat, and wondered how in the Outer Rim to start. We both desired information – well, I was assuming on Yudan’s part – and neither of us had any amount of trust in the other.

You want to play question and answer, kid? It was the voice of Jolee running through my mind, sparking an idea. But it hadn’t been Jolee Bindo who had said that to me.

“I met an interesting sentient down in the Shadowlands,” I commented. Yudan’s gaze flew to mine. “We both wanted to interrogate the other. Of course, in retrospect, now I understand just why he asked some of the questions he did. But at the time, taking turns to ask a question was a solid framework for us both to get what we wanted.” I took a pull of my drink. It was sweet and bubbly. I grimaced. “So. A question apiece. I’ll start.”

“You wish to shift this into a lark, Revan?” One eyebrow raised at me in mocking disbelief. “With alcohol? Are we divulging into boorish drinking games, then?”

I shrugged. “The drink’s up to you, Yudan. All I’m proposing is that we grill each other in turn. Unless you have a better idea?” He stayed silent this time, and I held back a smirk of victory. Okay.
No point jerry-dancing around. May as well dive straight in. I took another gulp of the foul tropical concoction for fortitude, and kept my gaze fixed on the piercing yellow of his.

“What did I find beyond the Outer Rim?”

A muscle in his jaw twitched. His lips thinned. His eyes flared with deep emotion that echoed in the Force, until he sharply reined it in. And I understood, then, that the detachment he so often expressed was no more than a very practised, very expert façade.

“I wasn’t there.”

“Who was?” I fired back.

“Malak. Talvon. Alaki. Kreia. Others.” Each name came out low and emotionless. Talvon I’d heard whispered in the shadows of my mind. The other two were unfamiliar. Regardless, Yudan hadn’t answered my initial question.

I scowled at him. “What did I find?” I repeated. “Surely you must know something?”

“You didn’t speak of it.” He had turned away. “None of you did, other than in general terms. All I knew was that you considered there to be a threat greater than the Mandalorians. You argued that a stronger Republic was required.” He gave a hollow laugh. “We all saw sense in your arguments, whether we believed you had found something or not. The Senate had hogtied the brass for years, and in doing so almost gift-wrapped the Core to the Mandalorian Clans. Now on the other side of war, we were victorious but tired. Exhausted of it all, and determined to leave behind a lasting peace. Somehow, you convinced us that invading the Republic would bring that about.”

Some unknown threat turned me on the Republic? I blinked, not quite grasping the rationale for such an extreme course of action. Some unknown threat, that hasn’t even eventuated? The only sodding threat to the Republic since Malachor has been me!

It all seemed… insane. Insane justification for power. I must have been well corrupted, then, merely searching for some twisted logic that would hold my followers to my damned cause.

But in the Shadowlands… when Bandon had captured me… I’d remembered something.

As always, the flashbacks faded like a res-corrupted holo-still, half the pixels coming through null. But vague snippets remained. There’d been a purple world. The Force had felt both alive and evil. Malak had been at my side, clasping my hand.

“Are you in love with your soldier?”

The sheer audacity of the question had me swinging back to face him in disbelief. “Excuse me?” I spluttered. “What sort of question is that?”

“A pertinent one,” he snapped. “The Jedi preach that romantic entanglements are but one of the paths to the Dark Side. You and Malak flouted their ethos, and later devolved into Sith Lords. So, I ask again, are you in love with your soldier?”

I looked away. I cared deeply for Carth – months of desperate adventure had a way of forming strong bonds. But the transformation from friendship into something deeper had been recent. Carth made me smile, in his arms I felt safe… and the attraction was strong. Was it love? Or, more accurately – had it been love?

“I don’t know,” I whispered, staring at the plasticeel table. There was a grimy crack running straight through the centre, like something had been slammed down on it in force. “It was such early days. It had the potential to be, given more time. If I’d known, I never would have…” I trailed off. With a grimace, I suddenly realized who I was confiding in, and knocked back my drink.

In a jerky movement, I pushed back my chair and grabbed my empty vessel. Yudan’s was still untouched. Muttering something about a refill, I stalked back to Suvam and used the minute’s grace to recover my equilibrium.

Obnoxious nosy frelling Dark Jedi, I cursed inwardly, storming back with a bright blue drink this time. I hadn’t expected a question so personal, I’d thought he would more likely interrogate me on… actually, I have no sodding idea. Damn, but this was awkward. And he was annoying.

I sat back down again with a scowl at the expressionless bastard. “I didn’t start this conversation for it to devolve into ship gossip,” I muttered.

He gave an unconcerned shrug. “You ask your questions, I’ll ask mine.”

“Fine.” I glared. “What do you know about the Star Forge?”

His eyes narrowed slightly. “It spits out alien starships.” He finally took a swig of his tropical concoction, and didn’t so much as grimace. Honestly, it was disgusting. I had no idea how he kept a straight face. “It’s a Force relic, but I’m assuming it has some sort of environmental power source as you never appeared to require any materials for it. Maybe a nearby sun… I don’t know, Revan. You did not allow anyone bar Malak to set foot on it, and you rarely spoke of its capabilities. All I can divulge to you is that it powered your armada.”

It wasn’t much I didn’t already know, other than his speculation towards the power source. Which might be worth considering, when we actually arrived there. I frowned. “How did I even find out about it? About the- the Star Maps?”

“An abandoned Sith Academy on Malachor V.”

I sucked in a deep breath of surprise. “What? As in- as in Malachor? The final battle of the Wars?”

Yudan gave a short nod. “You discovered the ruins before, of course. You learned of the Star Maps there. I expect whatever archives or structures remained were blown into space dust following Malachor.”

My thoughts raced. Was this all linked, somehow? A Sith pointer to a Dark relic, on Malachor V- a sacred planet of the people who’d invaded the Republic. And something led me to the Unknown Regions after the Wars, which then turned me back to this earlier discovery-

My head was spinning. More alcohol was probably a bad idea. I grimaced, and took a drink anyway.

Turned out, the blue one tasted even worse.

“You- you were there?” I asked. “On Malachor? With me?”

“No, Revan. You told me.” He was starting to sound pissy, now.

My eyes narrowed. “I told you about the Sith Academy, but not the Unknown Regions?”

“As I said earlier, no one spoke of that,” he bit out. Yep, definitely pissy. “You came back impassioned and fierce, convinced of a threat, and ordered the lot of us to hold guard in the Outer Rim Territories, while you and Malak went gallivanting across the galaxy.”

“To find the Star Maps,” I said slowly.

“Yes.” His voice was short. “What, exactly, do you recall?” His eyes narrowed when I blinked in reaction. That was a huge question. “It’s my turn, Revan. Tell me what you remember.”

I looked away. There was nothing to stare at, in this utilitarian room. No viewing window, no hololart, no paint veneer to break up the grey. Somehow, I didn’t think this room had always been a cantina. “Small… fragments. Fragments of memory. Not much, really. A few flashes of Talshion.” It was more a set of feelings than any recollection, now. The pang of hunger, the fright of being caught, the excitement of a heist. A blind man’s counsel as both my education and the shaping of my character.

And, through it all, Malak.

I sighed heavily. “One or two of my time at the Order. And… and after.”

“The Wars? Or your fall?”

“Both,” I murmured. There was a handful of black scorch marks high on one wall. It made me wonder if Suvam had had to deal with blaster brawls in the past. “Few enough memories, and most of them half-forgotten. All intangible enough that I was able to kid myself about my identity, I guess. Actual events, names… those things elude me.”

“So I gathered in the Shadowlands,” he replied, his voice short and low. Yudan had been the one to name me, back there. To force me to accept the stark truth of it all, when I’d spent so long immersing myself in any fabrication that could explain my own head. Ness Jonohl. That’d been the biggest self-deception. I grimaced, and looked back to him.

“So you don’t recall anyone from your life?” He’d folded his arms. He was leaning casually against the industrial wall of the spaceport, but his sharp gaze belied the intensity of his concentration. This question was important to him, I thought. “You looked blank when I said Alaki’s name earlier. And Kreia’s?”

I shook my head.

“Meeta?” he asked, and still I shrugged helplessly. He took in an audible breath. “Me?”

I forcibly turned my gaze away. His voice had twisted on the last, and the bitterness in it was audible.

“I remember little even of Malak. Little enough that I didn’t understand it was Darth Malak in my memories.” I curled my fingers around the blue bubbling liquid. “I remember killing Arran Da’klor.” My voice came out cold. The shadows of death and lightning played through my head. He’d killed himself on my dagger, but not before I’d butchered him. “I recognized both Karon and Zhar.”

And there was no way I was going to bring up Nisotsa.

I recognized you, too. And I remember rescuing you from the Fett. But, somehow, that felt too damn personal to say. Maybe once I’d known him well, but I didn’t anymore.

Yudan gave a hollow laugh. “How much of you is even left?”
“Who the frell knows,” I muttered. It doesn’t matter. Juhani said memory isn’t everything. And when I think of how far we’ve come, what we’ve accomplished so far… I find myself agreeing with her. My fingers clenched, and I felt a furious rush of resolution. The eons-old conviction flared to life inside me again, despite the despair, despite Carth, despite everything.

And I cherished the burn.

I looked up to pin him with a glare. “But know this, Yudan. I’m heading to the Star Forge. I’m going to stop Malak. I’m going to rescue Bastila. And I’m going to destroy that factory. My next question is this: what do you plan on doing?”

He was silent for the longest time. I had no idea of his leanings, nor could I work out what I even wanted him to answer. But I held his gaze, still staring fiercely into those cursed, fallen eyes.

At long last, he broke away, lifting his tumbler to down another swig. “Alright,” he said, his voice low. “I’ll play your ally once more. I’ll stand with you and your crew against Malak, and help destroy the Forge. And when you fall—” he swung back to me, “I’ll run you through myself.”

He meant it as a threat. But, in a sense, it was the promise I needed. Yudan and Carth, two watchers against the Dark. One powerful enough, perhaps, should he catch me unawares. The other with a tangible hold on my heart. Between them both, I could only hope they’d manage to take me down, should the worst happen.

Again.

It was a promise, and I welcomed it.

I smiled. “Fantastic. It’s your turn, Yudan.”

xXx

Chapter End Notes

Revan’s thoughts on Jen possibly being a medical doctor is a nod to the Dr Jen Sahara in kosiah’s fic ‘Memory’. It’s nice to know that in another ‘verse, Jen Sahara has a happier ending. Thanks, kosiah, for giving her that.

And, I’ll say it again, if you're out there and reading I'd love to hear from you. Even an anonymous one-liner makes my day :->
Hyperspace: VI – part seven [Mekel Kadoni, Malak Devari, Revan Freeflight]

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Hyperspace: VI – part seven

Mekel Kadoni:

"Keep your head down, Mekel," Yuthura hissed as we strode towards the end of the space station. "I do not trust this Suvam, and we do not know who else is here."

I rolled my eyes at her back. Yuthura had been edgy as frakk since we'd left Korriban and found her galactic cred accounts had been emptied. Of course, it wasn't exactly hard for a Dark Jedi Master to finagle more creds, but we needed to source ID papers. Good ones, if we wanted to avoid Darth Jackoff and his army of nutbar gimboids.

Sometimes, I wondered if Yuthura wanted to turn back. Korriban had been a chivhole, but she'd enjoyed what authority she'd wielded. I didn't quite believe her when she claimed she was happy to try her hand at smuggling. I had the feeling she felt it was a step down.

From one way of looking at it, I guess it was. I just wanted to be the frakk away from all the power-games and back-stabbing that went along with the Sith. A smuggler's life sounded fun, actually – independence and freedom of choice and all of that. But we needed papers, some hot goods to run with, and a signature change on the small freighter we'd nicked. So here we were in the arse-end of sod-all.

I didn't know where Yuthura had heard of this joke of a station, but she reckoned Suvam Tan could get what we needed. He'd answered our comm a week ago, fell over himself promising to keep up his end of the bargain, and all but begged Yuthura to dock and come meet him in his "cantina."

I'd snorted in disgust when I'd seen the size of the station – or lack thereof. I was willing to bet this kriffball's cantina was no more than a kitchenette where he pawned overpriced firewhiskey to spacers desperate enough to seek him out.

We'd spotted another freighter docked on the station. Larger than ours. We weren't close enough to make out more than that, but it'd be a smuggler – that had to be near-all of Suvam Tan's clientele. Depending on the peeps on board, we might have a shot at pinching it for ourselves. I'd wanted a closer look, but Yuthura had insisted on meeting Suvam first.

She was pissy about the additional company. Her fault for turning up a day early – that Rodian insect had promised anonymity, but that was based on a day from now. Still, I'd seen her in a snit enough times to know there was no talking to her until she'd verbally skewered the object of her ire.

Or worse, if he didn't grovel enough. Sometimes, I wondered whether Yuthura would ever let go of being First to a Sith Headmaster. She expected immediate obedience.

Sometimes, it wasn't that bad, actually-

Yuthura stopped ahead, turning back to shoot me a glare that said hurry the frakk up. Not that she would phrase it so, of course, but we'd been together long enough that translating her expressions was easy as kassi-loaf.
I shot a little Force speed under my heels, and was by her side in seconds.

We walked on, and I felt my shoulders tensing.

I was getting angry, for absolutely no reason. It wasn't the strangers. The chances of running into a group of smugglers that could challenge the likes of Yuthura and me together had to be non-existent. I was also feeling upset as frakk, with no bloody idea why. I wasn't bleeding sad – in fact, I'd felt more free than ever - ever since we'd shot away from Korriban.

Free to do what we wanted, shag when we wanted, and not have to worry about one of us waking up with a 'saber through the gut.

But the anger and the grief was there in my head, had been since we docked at this chivhole of a station. It was flashing in my mind, pissing me off and making me angry. My stupid mind wasn't making any damn sense, even to myself.

We heard voices as we neared the end of the only corridor, before turning into the hatch on our left. This must be Suvam's cantina – the Rodian himself from the holo-transmission was behind a bar surprisingly stocked with dozens of colourful bottles. Two sents were seated on the far side of the room and, with a jolt of wary surprise, I felt their power through the Force.

Frakk. Frakking frakk! Oh, they were strong, both of them. Powerfully strong. The swirling miasma around the two of them was blatantly obvious. Yuthura froze, staring across the room. Leaning back against the wall was a yellow-skinned Twi'lek, his eyes trained directly on us. The other sent looked to be a female Human from the back, with a mop of dark curls. She didn't bother turning.

"Ah, my visitors!" the Rodian hailed us and, with feet like ferracrete, I followed Yuthura's guarded steps over to Suvam Tan. "A drink on the house, and welcome to my humble home! I go weeks without guests, and then they all come at once!"

He laughed loudly. I could spot the twitchy fear around his eyes, the uneasy crack in his voice. He was one step away from pissing his pants. No doubt, the last thing he wanted was a Force-fight on his precious little corpse of a space station.

The Twi'lek across the room took a swig of his drink, but his attention remained fixed on us. The Human dropped her head into her hands.

"We wish to conclude our business and be on our way. Immediately," Yuthura said, her voice cool as she leaned against the bar. She wasn't looking at Suvam, though. Just like me, she was staring at the strangers. The Twi'lek in particular.

In reaction, I pushed out with the Force. Just a little. Just enough to eavesdrop, but not enough to be noticed.

"Would you like a drink while you wait?" the Rodian asked desperately. He couldn't actually want us to stay and socialize, but maybe his tactic was bribery by booze. Or maybe he was just half-crazed with fear. "I have quite the range, fully stocked since my last shipment-"

"If you desire my credits, Suvam Tan, then you will produce what you have promised without delay." Yuthura always could draw cold authority into her words, and it seemed to shut the little bug up.

"Telos," the Human snapped suddenly, raising her head. "Explain frelling Telos to me."
Telos. My stomach clenched. The Human didn't have a Telosian accent; something more Outer Rim, I suspected. I'd heard that accent recently, and it sure as frakk wasn't from my homeworld.

Suvam squeaked. "I will return shortly." He bowed, and all but sprinted out of the room.

"What's to explain?" the Twi'lek was saying. His voice was smooth. "It was a casualty of the Sith offensive."

_They're talking about the bombing_, I realized with a sick jolt.

"Don't you sodding play idiot, Yudan Rosh," the Human seethed. "Or I swear I'll gut you."

_Yudan Rosh_. The name was like a sucker punch to the gut. I'd never met the guy, but even the greenest Initiate knew his name. Now the fear rolling off Yuthura made sense – she'd probably recognized him on sight. _If he knows her, and suspects we're on the run from Malak, then we're frakking fried!_

Yudan Rosh laughed; a low, dark sound that echoed through the small room. "If you were going to kill me you'd have done it by now."

_But what the frakk would Yudan frakking Rosh be doing out here? And who's bleeding insane enough to threaten him with gutting?_

"Mekel-" Yuthura hissed and jerked on my arm. She'd be listening in, same as me no doubt, her Force intent on their convo. And yeah, I wasn't jacked on hanging about either, but they were talking about Telos-

"I could say the same back to you," the Human returned in a voice just as dark. "Stop pissing about, Yudan, and answer the question. Telos makes no sense. Not the way it was done. It's on the Peragian trade route, and two major hyper-lanes run directly past it. Geographically, the planet is a gem, and it's loaded with natural resources besides. It should have been captured with minimal casualties." The woman was leaning over the table now; her words lashing out, demanding answers. This sounded personal. "Instead, it was obliterated. A potential base, a logistical prize, and millions of sentient lives. All gone. Why?"

Oh, no, this was a conversation I _had_ to hear. This was my damn homeworld, its fate being discussed by Yudan Rosh and what must be another of Malak's top Dark Jedi. Nisotsa Organa, maybe, except it didn't look like her from the back. She'd been blonde, in those holos from the Mando Wars. Hottest of the Thirteen, I'd always thought - at least before her hair fell out.

She hadn't looked so hot when I'd last seen her at the Academy.

She hadn't been the only high-profile visitor to Korriban. Bandon Stone and Sharlan Nox kept turning up too, like expired credit chits certain to screw with your day. Bandon was a sadist and drunk on his own power, and I'd always have a soft, squidy, _I-want-to-dig-your-eyeballs-out-with-a-fork_ place in my heart for that sociopath Sharlan. He'd been the one to capture Dustil and me from the fires of Telos.

Nisotsa Organa was more reserved than Bandon or Sharlan; but she had the same streak of savagery, the same twist of cruelty, the same penchant for torture and killing. That sort of thing was always a bit of a turn-off.

_Maybe it's Nisotsa after hair replacement therapy._
It might have been funny. If she wasn't something, like, twenty years older than me, twenty times more powerful than me, and hanging around with Yudan Rosh.

He wasn't even staring at us anymore. I shot Yuthura a fierce look, even as I recognized the fear in her eyes.

"Talvon and Malak had command in that sector," Yudan frakking Rosh drawled. "Admiral Karath had just defected to our side, and Talvon was testing his commitment. They were both Telosian, you see, even if Talvon was only from his mother's side. Karath… Karath brought a lot of Republic troops with him. He was important. Talvon wanted to ensure he would be ultimately loyal to our vision, no matter what he was asked to do." Yudan smiled. From here, it looked like a firaxa baring teeth. "In the end, Karath proved loyal to the same leader we all swore fealty to."

He descended into silence. Darth Revan. At least that frakkface has karked it. The woman said nothing, and Yudan Rosh began to speak again, his voice bland and emotionless.

"We acquired a highly skilled and loyal Admiral, with a veteran fleet of starships. I'm sure some would argue a planet was a fair price to pay. Of course, if Talvon hadn't been going round the twist by then, we could have had Telos as well." Yudan shrugged. "In war, you win some; you lose some." His voice was flat with apathy. He looked like he didn't give a crap about any of it, and I struggled to contain the primal urge to stalk over and sock him one in the jaw.

…sock him one? What the actual frakk?

That was a dangerous thought. While there were plenty of people I wanted to punch, senior Dark Jedi who could zap me in a blink were not on that list. No matter his thoughts on Telos.

"Heh, don't worry about those two," a dry voice rumbled behind us. "They won't blow up the station." The voice chuckled. "I think."

I turned to see an old geezer wearing a dung-brown tunic, an openly curious gleam on his lined face as he made his way to the bar. His gaze stilled as it focused on the unnatural fluorescence of Yuthura's eyes.

The colour had – interestingly enough - dimmed since we'd left Korriban, but it was still noticeable. He knows what she is, I realized. I reached out with the Force, and felt a swirl of it around him, too. It was eclipsed by the choking maelstrom of the others, but it was there.

Bleeding shyrack balls. We're surrounded by frakking Force users! The old man gave a sort of unconcerned shrug, before leaning over the bar to pilfer a bottle and mug.

"I'm Jolee," he said, in an absent tone as he uncapped the bottle and poured himself a shot of what looked like firewhiskey. He glanced over to Yuthura again.

"And I'm going," Yuthura replied silkily, and this time her grip was tight enough to be painful. I would have followed, were it not for the angry yell that had us all turning-

Yudan Rosh, one of the most powerful Dark Jedi in the gods-dammed galaxy, stood dripping wet and glaring at his companion. Whatever had been in her glass was blue and steaming from his skin in light curls of noticeable smoke.

It would have been frakking hilarious in other circumstances.

"Would you look at that," the woman sneered. "It seems I need another drink." She pushed her chair back and stood, before turning to stride towards the bar. I couldn't resist a once-over; she walked with an animalistic grace, sleek and fluid, like a predator totally at ease in her environment. I had to admire anyone with balls big enough to throw cocktails over Yudan Rosh, and while she looked a fair amount older than me, she was kinda hot too-

She either completely failed to notice Yuthura and me, or simply didn't give a toss, because she ignored our presence to copy the old man by leaning over the bar and grabbing another bottle of Suvam's stash.

But I was staring at her. And now I knew why her accent was familiar.

"Frakk me!" I burst out. "Ness Jonohl?"

Yuthura let out a sort of choking noise, Ness over-filled her glass as she spun to look at us, and the old man hummed like a senile jackass.

Ness was staring at us both with wide, startled eyes.

"Your drink is full, dear," the old man murmured.

Ness jerked back to her glass, grimaced, and then carefully put the bottle to one side. With a measured slowness that was overly deliberate, she took a long draft of her drink and then turned to face us again.

"I go by Jen Sahara these days," she told me in a forced voice.

False names were standard on Korriban, but I didn't give a ronto's arse about that. What the bloody frakk was she doing hanging around Yudan Rosh? And what happened to Dee?

Her gaze had shifted to Yuthura, who was staring back with a cold, composed expression on her face. Yuthura didn't exactly hate Ness- Jen- whatever- but she wouldn't be interested in staying anywhere near the woman who'd convinced her other two apprentices to sod off, and thoroughly outclassed her on Korriban.

Not to mention Ness-Jen's fantastic choice of company.

That was on Yuthura's mind, too. "I thought you were headed toward a Jedi Master, not a Sith Master," Yuthura said, her voice managing to sound both accusing and silkily disapproving. She was thinking of Kel. Kel, who'd been promised a life with the Jedi Order. And what about bleeding Dustil?

"Run into some old friends, Jen?" Yudan frakkface Rosh said, as he wandered closer. His voice twisted acidly on her name. But his gaze was narrowed on Yuthura, one Dark Jedi sniffing over another. If they were kath hounds he'd have his nose up her butt. Frakk. Frakk! I didn't know much about Yudan Rosh, other than he was too powerful to challenge - and I wanted us outta here. Now.

"And where do you know this lot from?"

I felt angry again. I felt furious, as Ness-Jen spun to face Yudan, her fists clenching and the Force sparking a raging chaos around her. "Leave them alone, Yudan. You're here for me, not anyone else. So leave them the frell alone."

Yudan had gone back to staring at her, his skin gleaming wet under the spaceport's lighting. His eyes were the piercing yellow of the truly damned – Yuthura was one of the few anomalies who'd turned a different shade – and Yudan Rosh had been pissing around in the depths of the Dark Side since frakking Malachor.
He gave Ness-Jen an imperceptible nod of agreement.

The surprise felt like a rush of gree-spice. Who the frakk is she, that Yudan Rosh would back down for her? The same woman who'd triumphed over Uthar Wynn and Jorak Uln. I couldn't believe, now, that I'd actually challenged her outside the Academy's gates, second time we'd met.

I was taken, suddenly, by an irrational urge to see a showdown between her and that power-mad gimboid, Bandon Stone. He used to flounce about the Academy, label himself a Darth like he didn't kiss Malak's wrinkly toes along with the rest of them, and then piss off after kidnapping the strongest Adepts.

Ness-Jen was a firebrand. But was she a Sith? Did she, also, bend knee to Malak?

She had turned back to stare at Yuthura. "Kel and Dak left Kashyyyk with Master Quatra from the Jedi Order. They're headed to Coruscant." Her eyes narrowed. "They might meet up with Thalia, there. It could be quite a reunion if you followed."

Yuthura turned cold. I didn't have to look at her to see her expression ice over. She got testy when people told her what to do – even in friendly, just-trying-to-make-an-innocent-suggestion sorta ways.

Ness-Jen laughed suddenly. I scowled as I felt her amusement swirl around her in a tangible wave of Force. Man, whoever trained that freakshow taught her frakk-all in control, with the way she bled her stupid emotions out everywhere. "Okay, okay," the woman said. "I can see I'm wasting my time. Guess I've been hanging around Staria too long."

Staria – that was the pious Cathar who'd preached that Korriban wasn't the place for me. Maybe the uptight kittycat had been right about that, but the way both her and Ness-Jen waltzed about shoving every screwed up Sithling towards the Jedi was as stupid as it was dangerous.

My gaze slid back to Yudan chivhole Rosh, who was staring at Ness-Jen through narrowed, frakked-up eyes. The blue booze still dripped in misty trails down his Sith-marked face. The thought of trying to redeem the likes of him was completely borked. But if they're all travelling together, then does that mean he's on the run from Malak? Just like us?

That sounded even more borked.

Suddenly, I found I didn't give a crap. All I really cared about was the one Ness-Jen had omitted. "Where's Dustil?" I said, scowling.

Her eyes slid to mine. "Well- uh. Actually, he's on our ship."

I jerked around in reaction, staring wildly at the open entrance as if my old friend would suddenly appear. Instead, in slunk the petrified form of the station's rotgrub trader.

Dee's here? At this turd of a spaceport? I had to see him. Did he even know who he was travelling with? What the frakk was he still doing with them? Somehow, I'd had the idea he woulda disappeared off into the galaxy with his dear old dad, maybe to that new astro station that orbited our decimated homeworld like a frakking memorial to the dead.

"Eep," Suvam squeaked, his gaze darting around the lot of us, standing all together like we were having a touching heart-to-heart. Suvam looked as desperate as a spice addict run out of shot. "Anyone need another drink?" he gasped.

"I need my trade completed," Yuthura snapped. "Now."
"I-I have the data-work, back in the office," the spooked bug stammered. "I've pulled my bots away from-" he shot a frantic look at Yudan Rosh- "I mean, they're loading the goods now, and affecting the required changes to your ship. It won't be long!"

"I'll see to the papers now, and then we shall wait back onboard," Yuthura stated. Her face could have been carved from a slab of permacrete. It was gonna take ages before she thawed, I could tell. "You shall stay in constant communication with me, Suvam Tan, and I will transfer half the funds upon completion." Her violet eyes narrowed as she stared at him coldly. "You promised anonymity, and you have not delivered on that. Do not displease me further."

"Yes- yes, of course, come with me then," Suvam mumbled, his gaze flicking back and forth between the two Twi'leki Dark Jedi like a frakking game of pong. He stumbled backwards, moving out of the room.

"I have to see Dustil." My words came out, low and a lot more firm than I usually dared with Yuthura.

She shot me a look of annoyance. Her violet eyes were pinched with a cautionary fear. She wanted her trade, and she wanted away from Yudan Rosh. "Now's not the time," she said, her tone clipped and demanding an end to the conversation.

But Dee had been my blood before her. And while I labelled Yuthura my Master, my lover, my ally… Dustil had been a true friend. Well, before he'd frakked it up by blaming Selene on me. I gotta make sure he knows who he's travelling with. If nothing else… I gotta make sure he's okay.

"I'll go see him quick while you sort out the admin," I said. I saw the fierceness on her face, and held her gaze anyway. "I gotta do this."

She closed her eyes, just for a sec, as if internally debating the concession.

"Eh, you can follow me. I'll rustle him out of the ship." It was the raspy voice of the old Human, the one who'd stood aside from events for the most part with his nose in a drink. He turned his head to the others. "May as well leave those two here to finish their drinks in peace." The old man eyeballed Yudan turdface Rosh up and down like he was critiquing a work of art before cackling. "Blue looks good on you, sonny."

Yuthura glanced my way again. Her eyes widened the smallest amount; from her, that was akin to a warning. I could tell what she was thinking. I've killed people for less, Mekel. And so has he! And yet, other than a seething glare of animosity, the Dark Jedi who'd led fleets into war under Malak's banner did absolutely sod-all.

"Fine," Yuthura said to me. "Go. You have little time, Mekel. I shall return for you forthwith." Her voice was glacial, and she spun on her heel before leaving the room after Suvam.

"Humph," the old man muttered. "Strong woman." He peered back at me. "Well, don't just stand there like a limp fish, boy. Come this way."

He meandered off in Yuthura's wake. I shot one last look at the others. Yudan Rosh had turned emotionless, staring at me blankly as I made to leave. Ness Jonohl, in comparison, was an open frakking holo-book. She frowned at me in puzzlement, brows creasing over green eyes, like she thought I was the weird one here. Yeah. Whatever. She was an oddball, alright.

"Okay. Don't kill each other," I muttered as a farewell. "Or do. I don't give a crap."

I ran outta there before either of them could take offence.
For a senile old git, the man was already halfway down the bleeding corridor by the time I'd caught up. He shot me a speculative glance as I drew close. "So," he said slowly. "Judging by your age and attitude, you were trained at the same place as Dustil Onasi. Old friends, hmm?"

I couldn't hide the surprise that twisted my face at his words, and the man's eyes narrowed as he caught it. Onasi? Dee and I had been fast friends since the moment Sharlan had tied us up and thrown us in his ship's hold next to a pair of blubbering girls who'd never surfaced on Korriban. We'd shared dreams, and secrets, and trust – for a while.

But we'd never swapped family names.

Didn't make two shots difference in my case; I'd been a joyboy since my ma had sold me off as a squalling babe. But Dustil had been from the rich side of Thani - capital city of Telos before it burned. It was evident in his accent, his reserve, his frakking way of walking, even.

And he clammed up tighter than a Hutt's credit purse when our convo danced anywhere near his childhood. I'd like to think I'd respect his desire for privacy. But, frakk. I wasn't sure I'd be holding my curiosity back next time my fingers had HoloNet access.

Funny, the name seemed kinda familiar, too.

I shot the old man a smile. "Yeah, we go way back," I drawled. "Cousins from Corellia. Trained as security guards, y'know, before we went our own ways."

The old man snorted. I'd forgotten what he said his name was. Joel? Jolly?

"You're an atrocious liar, sonny boy. You think I can't tell the pair of you are Sith-trained?"

"You think I can be arsed with this conversation?" I shot back. "It's none of your business, gramps." I looked up to see a large hatch emblazoned with Dock Three on it. I smirked. "This must be your port, old man. Tell Dustil its Mex here to see him, and he'll come out."

He gave me a beady eye, as if it were meant to frakking break me or some such banthacrap. "Manners, kid. You'll be surprised how far in life it'll get you." With a huff, the old man still stalked through the hatch to do what I wanted anyway. I rolled my eyes. Yeah, screw that. Like asking 'please' ever got me anywhere.

I wandered into the dock after him, stopping to eyeball the freighter from a distance as he clambered up the loading ramp and tapped something into a control panel. He vanished inside, and I was left staring at the starship I'd thought about nicking a mere hour ago.

It took up about a quarter of the hangar's available space. Same one they'd left Korriban in. Pretty beaten up, and I didn't pretend to know anything about its model. Bet they're here for a signature change. Just like us.

Minutes passed, and I was left shifting my weight uncomfortably in the quiet hangar. Ness-Jen had dropped Dustil's name and I'd shot here like a desperate ash-rabbit sniffing a scent on the wind. Only now did caution rear its ugly snout, and the thought occurred to me that separating from Yuthura might've been a bonehead move. Especially with who else was on this station.

The ship's entrance opened. There was no one there. I narrowed my eyes, and pushed out with the Force in reaction.

There was a patch of null-Force in entranceway. Relief rushed through me like a high.
"I can still sense you, Dee," I snapped. Back on Korriban, I'd been inordinately proud that I was the only one – other than Master Uthar – who could tell when Dee was sneaking about.

Dustil appeared in the blink of an eye, gaping at me like a stunned gizka. He ran down the loading ramp and across the hangar, only stopping when he was a metre or so away.

"Mekel?" he gasped. "Mex?"

"Dee." I grinned stupidly, holding back the urge to go hug him like an emotional tween on a hot date. Any other time, I'd twist his arm into a drink. Wouldn't even need to use a mind-trick to score 'em free - Suvam was too piss-scared to ping us for it. But no way was I heading back to mingle with Yudan Rosh and Ness-Jen, or whatever her name really was.

Dustil gave me a crooked sort of smile, like he didn't believe I was actually standing in front of him. "What the frakk are you doing here?"

It was exactly my reaction, and I couldn't hold back a snicker. "Yuthura and me, we're trying our hand at smuggling. You?"

"We're- it's complicated," Dustil said, hitching his shoulders and looking awkward as frakk. Still the same old Dustil, then. He's on the run, just like us. Has he been running since Korriban?

"Seems like everyone's on the bleeding run these days," I muttered.

"You have no idea the crap I've been through," Dustil blurted out. His eyes were wide as he stared at me. "Mex, Saul Karath is dead. Dead."

I stiffened. That chivhole Karath had sold out our homeworld. If there was one person Telosians all around the 'verse wanted dead- "Are you sure?"

"I stepped on his corpse," he said. He looked solemn, before the corner of his mouth twitched. "I may have kicked it once or twice."

I snickered again. "Frakk, really? Damn, Dee, what in the bleeding hells were you-"

"There's more," he interrupted. He looked a little wild, leaning in close as if to whisper state secrets between us. "There's a frakking galaxy more you wouldn't even guess at. I don't even know where to start. Bandon's dead too, Mex. That bastard karked it as well."

I could feel my eyes widening. Bandon had been a chivving prick, and I'd always thought he'd end up nabbing Dee on his next run at the Academy. Dee hated him too, but there'd been a sort of hero-worship underneath his angst. In some ways, Dustil had been more invested in the Sith ideology – and hierarchy – than me. Power impressed him.

Me, I just wanted to do my own damn thing. Freedom. Something I'd never had, not really.

Still, I'd not have pinned my old mate Dee to go gallivanting on adventures that included wiping out traitorous Fleet Admirals and powerful Dark Jedi.

But it couldn't have been Dustil who'd got the kill on Bandon. No, not when he was travelling with the woman who'd taken out Dee's old Master, and Yudan frakking Rosh.

My eyes narrowed. "Dee, do you know who-"

The entrance of the freighter opened again, and another figure stepped out. A blaster was held loosely at his side, and I recognized Dustil's father as he cleared the loading ramp. The words died on my lips. Four years of Sith training made one suspicious of just about everyone, best mate's dad or not.

Damn, but the man looked old. He'd looked rough on Korriban, too, but that'd been just after their bloodbath with Uthar. The whole sorry group had looked like refugees from a war zone. Now, the guy just kinda looked sad and worn-out and suspicious as he glared at me.

[Safe to talk?] My fingers twitched against my thigh.

Street-sign was a hangover from my past - those slippery, dark days in the play-rooms of Telos's underbelly. We didn't trust anyone but fellow lays, and sometimes it was necessary to shoot a warning to each other without our clients knowing. Or our handlers.

It wasn't perfect. Right hand for words, left hand for letters. It wasn't complex. But it was a drukload better than nothing.

The spaceport's entrance behind me opened.

[No.] Dustil was looking over my shoulder. And I felt the presence of Yuthura draw near.

"Mekel, there is no more time for social mingling," Yuthura said at my back, her voice gentler than normal. I felt myself tensing, felt the scowl on my face. Yuthura was… I didn't know what Yuthura was to me anymore. Lover? Partner? Master? Neither of us had stepped away from that final role, not completely. And it had nothing to do with the frakking decades between us – it was, simply, the shadow of Korriban that I'd no idea if we'd ever be able to shed.

Dustil's face had shut down like a Czerka-stamped clean-bot as he stared past me to Yuthura. He'd never quite got what was between us, but then sometimes I reckoned Dee didn't know how to loosen up and have a little fun. Take a risk, here and there. Play the pazaak hand of life, and enjoy the thrill of the unknown.

Or maybe he was just smart enough not to dance with fire.

"Yuthura," Dustil acknowledged, in a cold voice that impressed me. Maybe he'd grown some steel somewhere along the line, because he sure as frakk wouldn't have addressed her that way on Korriban. Behind him, his father shot a hard stare at the both of us.

"Adept," Yuthura issued in a cool tone.

[You know who's here?] I signed rapidly, aware our time was coming to a close. Frakk, if Dustil didn't know exactly who he was travelling with-

His eyes widened comically. [You do?]

"Mekel." Yuthura's voice was hardening. "It's time to leave."

"You okay, Dee?" I asked, my fingers furiously twitching.[He's powerful. He's bad.]

[No.] Dustil shook his head. He signed something else; it looked like a sloppy form of joygirl. Dustil's sign had never been precise, but then he hadn't grown up with it the way I had.

"I'm okay. I'm fine," Dustil said. His voice turned abrupt. "You still have that SpiderNet account?"

I blinked. "Yeah." That was from our early days in Korriban. The first time Dee, Selene and I had snuck out to Dreshdae, we'd set ourselves up with anonymous comm accounts. Figured we could do with a way to contact one another that didn't run through the Sith network.

I was surprised he remembered. After Selene, our interactions had devolved into no more than impersonal snark, and his trust in me had vanished. I'd half expected him to have deleted that account, somewhere along the line.

[R], his left hand twitched. Left hand for letters, when the right wasn't enough.

"After all- all of this, I'll get in touch," Dustil muttered. His dad had walked closer, and behind them the ship's hatch opened once more. I glanced over warily to recognize the lithe form of that Cathar, Staria. Frakk, it's a whole shipload of Force-sensitives. She was clearly a preachy lightsider, despite who she was travelling with.

"Mekel," Yuthura growled, and her hand dropped onto my shoulder. "Now."

[E]. Another letter, although maybe it was an 'F', Dee had a habit of frakking up the subtler ones. Yuthura's hand tightened with Force power, and spun me around like a top.

Her eyes sparkled with irritation undercut by fear, and her voice dropped to the slightest of whispers. "We do not know his objectives," she murmured, so soft I could barely hear. She was talking about Yudan Rosh. "Nor can I tell if he knows who I am. He is too strong to face, particularly if he is allied with-" her lips pursed, and she shot a glare over my shoulder. "We must leave."

The Force swirled in her grasp, and behind me, I could feel it catch around the Cathar. Dee said he was okay. He said he was fine. I had to trust his word on that. I had to trust that my friend knew what he was doing.

If only he'd never reunited with his stupid dad, then maybe Dee could've been travelling with us instead.

Yuthura's hand dropped to encircle my wrist in an ironclad grip, and she pulled me back to the exit. If the Force frakking wills it - as the bat-shite Jedi spout - then I'll catch up with Dee again one day.

I glanced back, one last look, as yet again my Master dragged me away from my best friend.

[V], I caught over my shoulder, just as the hatch closed.

Yuthura marched us back to Dock Two in dead silence.

I didn't feel like yakking anyway. Even by the time we'd belted ourselves into the cockpit, not a frakking word had been spoken between us. She was probably a little pissy with me – and I'd have to deal with her static later – but I knew it was edginess turning Yuthura mute more than anything else.

My thoughts stayed on Dustil.

At least he was- Okay. Fine. But he'd been trying to tell me something, something he didn't want to say out loud.

Revoke? Reveal? It had to be a word that Street Sign didn't incorporate, but then that didn't really narrow it down. Sign was a covert way of communicating – small, hidden movements that the eye didn't catch unless one was looking for it. Downside being, of course, that it's breadth of vocab was limited. Revolt? Revolution?

Was there some borked chance that Dee had was caught up in a mad attempt to thwart frakking Malak? It seemed insane- but they'd killed Karath and Bandon along the way. Yudan Rosh was travelling with them, and it didn't look like he was playing Malak's side, pissing about with a bunch of light-siders the way he was. And then there was bleeding Ness-Jen, who – I reminded myself with a kick – had come to Korriban with Bastila frakking Shan.

Well, I had nothing but time. As Yuthura flicked on the comm and began snapping out orders to Suvam, I jumped on the side console, pulled up a dictionary on Galactic Basic, and started scrolling through a list of words beginning with 'rev.'

xXx

Malak Devari:

The heart of my empire rose majestically in front of me, an awesome crystalline structure of kaiburr mounted deep within the bowels of the Star Forge. Drawing power from the only star in the Lehon system, the crystal amplified it further, and the Rakatan technology funnelled the raw energy into the weapons factory of which I was master.

Truly, the Rakatan Empire concealed some almighty secrets I was still unveiling.

They had been a Force-sensitive species, and yet I wondered if their depth of power had been lacking. The eddies of the Force swirled around me here, in the heart of the Star Forge, whispering a promise of immortality. The Rakata had either not heard this whisper or been unable to grasp it – otherwise, surely, their species would still be the conquerors of the galaxy they once were.

Immortality would be mine. It was close, already, and I took another step closer each day.

Further afield, I could sense the presence of my newest apprentice, succumbed to the depths of exhausted slumber. I allowed her that small reprieve, now that my emotions had cooled. The news regarding the disastrous failure of the Leviathan had enraged me at first, but that storm had passed, and now it was time to consider my next move. She would be an integral part of that. Better that she replenish her physical reserves while she could.

Bastila Shan was the first Force-user I'd brought to the Forge - but I had reason for that uncharacteristic caution.

For Revan had shared the location of the Star Forge with me. Knowledge could be a dangerous thing, even for Shadow Hands. And this superweapon was powerful enough to tempt many into prospects of betrayal. I did not know if learning its secrets had been the final push I'd needed before I'd formulated the Deralian plot against her – but it had been one of them.

We'd ruled the Star Forge together, for a time. And as I evolved, day by day, into the Sith Lord I now was, the idea of treachery was seeded and began to bear fruit. Once I understood that the Star Forge was the crux of Revan's might – that without it, she was merely a strong Force sensitive with nothing to power her armada – then I realized I could be the next True Master. If only I wrested control of both the Sith Empire, and this legacy of the Rakatan.

And I would not be foolish enough to share my power with anyone until they were wholly my subordinate. Revan had taken my fealty far too much on faith, in the end.

Bastila Shan did not know the coordinates of her location, and I would enlighten her only when I allowed her freedom of movement – and that would not occur until she was truly mine.
That moment was close, though. I could taste its sweetness upon the Force.

Bastila Shan held promise, a promise I had not fully accredited Bandon Stone with, nor Arran Da'klor before him. Both men had been hot-tempered, courageous and powerful. And, yet, they had both lacked a certain discipline and forethought that was necessary to become a true Shadow Hand to the Master.

Nisotsa was the flipside; too cautious to step up and grasp what was within her reach. Kylah had been naught more than an amusing diversion offering a bountiful gift in the Endar Spire. Yudan... he might have been great, had I ever been able to fully trust him. But Yudan's core had been broken well before I'd even grasped the helm of the Sith Empire, and that had made him nothing more than a useful tool.

"Tell Malak I have killed them. All his allies, all his underlings, I stand on his sinking starship surrounded by their corpses."

"I will come for you, and I will come for him."

Oh, those words, reverberating through Bastila's mind in a broken imitation of the driving power Revan used to wield... that had been enough to send me into a tailspin of fury. The Star Forge had rocked around me, responding to my rage, as I ripped the images from my captive's mind in a furious need to understand everything that had occurred.

I saw the bodies on the Leviathan. I felt Bastila succumb to the pleasures of the Dark Side. I tasted the echo of Revan's former glory.

And through it all, I seethed with thwarted fury that drove every sentient in this place to their knees.

But all storms pass, and now it was time to plan. Now, I began to see the advantages in the failure of the Leviathan. Now I began to see the gifts Revan may have inadvertently given me.

The first gift was the deaths of Nisotsa, Yudan and Kylah.

It had not escaped me that numerous underlings vying for power and status could be destabilising. Trust was not a commodity amongst the Sith, but if a Master had only one apprentice they could nurture and train and use, then that apprentice could – to some extent – be relied on to strengthen the Sith Empire and further augment the Master's goals. Without the distraction of other potentials snapping at his or her heels.

One could argue the infighting was merely a mechanism for producing the strongest apprentice, but that didn't equate with Bandon faltering before the likes of Nisotsa and Kylah.

Or that the only Dark Jedi of note still remaining was Sharlan Nox – a most peculiar specimen with the ambition of a ferracrete brick. But he has his gifts. And his lack of interest in either status or power makes him safe to bring here to the Forge.

Sharlan Nox was not any sort of apprentice in the making. He was naught more than a sentient device that could produce unique assassins, provided one remembered to feed him.

But the others- Arran's death had been a waste. The blackout from Korriban told me all I needed to know about Uthar Wynn. Bandon, I should have directed after Revan alone. But Bandon was arrogant and prone to being misled – so I'd sent Yudan with him. Yudan, who'd been driven by unholy vengeance since the news of Revan's resurrection broke. For while I'd ordered Bandon to bring in the brain-damaged echo of my former Master, Yudan was my insurance should Bandon... somehow cock it up. I'd expected Yudan to hone in quickly for the kill, given the opportunity.

It had been a severe miscalculation.

But, no matter. I'd seen his corpse through Bastila's eyes. I would not waste another thought on that fickle, pathetic Twi'lek.

Now I was left with only Bastila Shan. And hers might be a strength that I was just beginning to comprehend.

The breaking of a light-sider was a truly beautiful thing. For some, it happened as a shattering epiphany, where they shrugged off the carcass of their weak beliefs and arose anew. For Bastila, it was a series of small concessions, each taking her closer to the precipice she now stood upon.

It would make her a stronger Shadow Hand, in the end. I could see the final metamorphosis of my empire, and there would be only two left at the helm. No more infighting, no more treachery from within.

And it was curious, I realized with a vague sense of recollection, that I was not the first to think along these lines.

...

She was staring silently into space, alone on the elevated viewing platform of the Nexus, a robed penumbra of authority that eclipsed the entire command deck.

Beneath her, Admiral someone-or-other was striding along the lower deck, checking in with various techs as the starship flew to link up with the rest of our fleet, now that the personal mission of Lord Revan was complete.

I had come as soon as I heard. She was hard and she had chosen the correct course of action – but this would have been difficult, even for her.

She was more powerful and awesome and magnificent than ever, but a fading whisper of empathy was one of her few weaknesses left. And the fact that I cherished it was one of mine.

The viewing platform had been a recent addition, installed halfway up the height of the massive bridge windows. I'd heard Arran sniggering that she'd had the transparisteel replaced with pricey ferracrystal to match her new station, and I'd given him a zap for that.

Vanity had never been a characteristic of hers, before her rebirth or afterward. And Arran Da'klor needed to understand the hierarchy had changed, now. It was important to display the proper respect. Arran had always fomented casual backchat, and while that may have amused Revan Freeflight, Lord Revan was another matter.

Arran had to learn, or he'd end up the same way as Talvon.

Revan hadn't acknowledged me in any way, despite my arrival. She was as still as a statue of the night, raised high above us all.

I could feel myself tense. The Force flooded through me, a decalescent burn of energy, and I jumped high into the air.

I landed behind her with a quiet thud.
"He died well," she said, her voice clinical. She knew, of course, why I'd come. Comfort. Concern. Care. I hoped she didn't count it as a weakness. "At the end, I was reminded of the Jedi Knight he once was."

I took the five steps to her side, high on the viewing platform, where no one could hear us or interrupt unless the Force was theirs to command. Her masked face remained facing the solitude of space.

"You did what was needed," I murmured. I reached a gloved hand toward her, wishing the damned mask gone, but the slight twitch of frigid darkness spiking on the Force halted my movement of frailty.

"I know."

There was a shiny steel bar, bolted onto the transparisteel, and she leaned forward to grasp it. She was still scrutinizing the black of space, I assumed, although the mask made it impossible to see her eyes.

They were the dark green of a jungle at dusk, now. Slowly, slowly, turning like the rest of us.

My gaze dropped to her ungloved hands, gipped tight on the metal bar. Strange, to see such ashen skin, when the whole of her body was always clothed in shadows – excepting those few quiet moments in our quarters. Or that time in the officer's mess. Or the conference room, right on that poraclay table before the Malachor strat meeting, when Yudan and Em walked in. Ah, that had been gratifying. One of the last times I'd seen Revan truly embarrassed.

And one of the last times I'd seen her truly undone. Perhaps, that would not be a bad way to comfort her today. Perhaps it would be the only method she would allow.

My wandering thoughts stilled as I processed what my eyes were seeing on her unnaturally pale hands. A blotch of brownish crimson alongside her thumb. And another, higher up on her wrist.

Dried blood. Talvon's blood.

"You didn't use a lightsaber." You killed him with your bare hands.

"Talvon was descended from Beast Riders, on his father's side." She turned, finally, to acknowledge me. The charred mask was as expressionless as ever. Just like her face. "Amongst them, the blood and the blame must be felt by the leader if an execution is ordered. The leader carries the weight of it."

"Talvon was raised on Telos, not Onderon," I said, hearing my voice tighten with emotion. Stars, she has to do this to herself, doesn't she? Talvon had to die, we all knew it, he'd long since turned rabid and unhinged. I should have killed him myself and spared her this. "He was a Telosian in every aspect that counts."

"Nevertheless, I thought it fitting."

Telos should have warned me that Talvon wasn't strong enough for the Dark. But I'd seen the advantages of his proposed offensive. A powerful statement of our might as we re-entered Republic airspace. We knew our grand victory might be years in the making, but Revan needed... we needed the quickest path. Shock-tactics. A rapid, brutal front that would make the Republic yield in terror before it shattered beneath our might.

I had not realized how much Talvon relished crapping all over his own backyard. How much Talvon’s mind had already begun to fracture.

"That newcomer, Bandon Stone." She changed the topic deftly. A statement of disinterest, of icy detachment from Talvon's death. "What are your thoughts on him, Malak?"

Once, she'd called me Mal. Once, I'd named her Revvie. Rev. My flying star.

The idea of pet-names and endearments was mildly embarrassing, now. Demeaning. Pathetic.

"He is the first Adept from Jorak, and he's certainly strong," I answered.

"Stronger than I expected," she murmured. "But his large mouth is annoying Alaki. They'll fight, soon, if Bandon doesn't rein it in."

"Do you wish me to speak to him?" Sometimes, the urge to end a sentence with 'my Lord' was strong. Revan did not demand it from me, her lover, her Shadow Hand, her second in command.

Not yet.

She paused. "No. It may prove a useful test, for both of them." As I puzzled over her response, her fingers tapped along the polished hand rail. There was dried blood under her neatly trimmed nails. "Talvon broke beneath the weight of the Dark Side's power. Yudan will challenge Jonn Dan, one of these days. Arran and Rab have already duelled, and it was not friendly. Rab was fortunate he walked away only missing an arm."

She was silent, then, and I found myself thinking of Rab Vooktari. I felt a flicker of concern for him. But there was little room for friendship in our ranks, these days. The infighting was merely a method for us all to find our position in the pecking order.

I shrugged, turning away from her to stare into the soullessness of space. Truly, I did not understand how she spent so long, still as a wraith, facing the unknown. And yet her best strategy came from these quiet moments. Unlike me, inaction was sometimes her ally.

She spoke, again, her voice cold and dark as a breath of a winter's night. "The way we once led together, fought together, and lived together, is not strong enough for our new path, Malak. Tensions flare between our followers, and it weakens our position. We need to be stronger than this. I wonder if there is a design to all the infighting that is now commonplace."

I frowned, not following her. Personally, I thought a firmer hand was needed – Arran had to learn to shut his big mouth, as did Bandon. And Jonn. He'd been harassing Yudan over something personal for weeks, now, and Yudan was going to snap one of these days.

More of us would die before it was out. I knew that as a truth, much as I knew my own position was secure. But whether that was due to the depths of my power or the depths of Revan's love for me, I was no longer certain. Sometimes, I thought it the former.

The camaraderie we had all enjoyed was fading, had been fading for months.

Revan was still facing me, and I understood she expected a response.

"What is your point, Revan?"

"There is an interesting philosophy I have uncovered in an ancient Sith holocron." Her tone was completely devoid of emotion or inflection. "The rule of two. It postulates that the power of the Dark Side is strongest amongst the Sith when there are only two Dark Jedi mastering the Force: a Lord and an Apprentice."

A crepuscular shiver coursed through me as the implications reared. "What- what are you proposing, Revan?"

"I do not propose, Malak." Her words lashed out like a whip. The authority behind them echoed a darkness on the Force. "I command, when required."

"And is this a command?" my Lord.

"No, this is purely conjecture. But it is conjecture that has caught my interest. Truly, we do not benefit from our leaders squabbling like undisciplined children." She paused, averting her cursed mask from me again. "Perhaps I am merely speculating if this is the innate order of the Sith. That, over time, we will naturally progress into this hierarchy whether we force it or not."

She was, coolly and calmly, thinking on what strength the deaths of those she had once loved would give her. Those who had followed her through the crucible of the Mandalorian Wars and now beyond: into the depths of perdition for a vision only she truly understood.

We dwindled into silence, both facing out into infinity. Mere inches of physical space separated us but, sometimes, it felt like a chasm growing in width as to be impossible to breach.

…

Revan had never followed through on the theory she'd stumbled over. By the time I'd turned on her above Deralia, there were still more than half a dozen Dark Jedi leaders left. Arran, Bandon, Yudan, Nisotsa, Sharlan, Uthar. Others, who have now faltered as well.

But it was an interesting concept. I had little time for the rest of the recollection; I had still been shedding my weaknesses then, slowly evolving into the power I was today. But memory had its uses, and there was a detail from that moment in time I'd never dwelled on again until now.

The rule of two.

At first, I had brought Bastila Shan here with only the thought to gain mastery over her unique gift. But the Star Forge whispered to me how much stronger Bastila would become once she succumbed to my will – and I could sense the dark potential within her. Some Force-sensitives turned powerfully like that, gained depths they would never come close to realizing as a light-sider.

Provided they did not lose themselves in the process. A sharp mind and a strong will are the other two pillars required for a true master of the Force.

Bastila Shan could be a worthy asset to me and my Empire.

It was a future I would realize. And it was close. So close. One more prod, perhaps two- and then she would be totally, irrevocably, mine.

She must turn on the Order first. I will grant her full freedom of movement when she has no recourse for return.

And then she must turn on Revan.

The former would be easier, and the foundation was already there. Bastila's doubts, her bitterness, her suspicion – I felt those emotions whisper like faithless phantoms slipping through the cracks in her mind. And I knew, then, how to nudge her into that final step of no return.
Beyond the Outer Rim. What made Revan double-cross the Republic? What made any return to the Jedi Order impossible for either of us? What we found beyond the Outer Rim.

Even now, my mind shied away. Let sleeping demons lie, I'd once begged Revan. It is beyond known space. Your objectives are sound, but your reasoning for them is not.

I could bring Bastila here to the heart of the Star Forge, where the Dark Side ruled supreme. Immerse her in the almighty Force that swirled around the giant kaiburr like a space storm light-years in width. Rip into her mind, and show her my half-forgotten memory of that encounter after Malachor.

Make Bastila Shan experience Revan's justification for her invasion of the Republic. Make Bastila accept it, agree with it, embrace it.

And then, when the Fleet dragged their half-broken armada into realspace around Lehon, Bastila would understand that her only way forward would be to unleash her Battle Meditation against them. That the only chance for victory was triumph over those she had once called her allies.

Of course, no fleet could breach the first defence of the Star Forge – that was controlled by that smaller mirror of kaiburr down on Lehon itself. No... and if Revan's memories were slowly returning, then instinct would guide her there. She recalled nothing, yet, of the Star Forge, according to what I had pulled from Bastila's mind.

But the Force whispered to me that Revan would retrace her old footsteps. To Lehon. The Force whispered, with thrumming anticipation, that it was destiny.

So I would be ready.

I was not sure if Bastila had the strength to turn on her bond-mate. Truly, their psychic link was more powerful than I had first realized, and I was still learning more of it. But Bastila didn't need to be the one who betrayed Revan. Oh, no. If I can use Bastila, somehow, as bait-

I would prefer to kill Revan by my own hand, for I would enjoy the sweetness of it. But I was no fool. If there was a way to lay a trap and make it seem one of Bastila's making-

Then either Revan will die a final death, or she will escape believing of Bastila's treachery. And Bastila will have nothing left in the galaxy to turn to.

Except me.

Bastila would finally reach her zenith in a surrender to the Dark Side – she would finally evolve into my true Shadow Hand.

My thoughts turned to the planet below – Lehon, the once-capital of the Rakata – and a plan began to formulate. The details- ahhh, the details would need sorting out, but I still had time before Revan came near. I would sense it when she entered this system, and I would know when to act.

But first, Bastila's ties to the Order and the Republic. I felt the lids of my eyes half-close in pleasure as I stared deep into the massive kaiburr that reverberated with pure Force.

It was time to wake Bastila, bring her here, and show her a memory.

Xxx

Revan Freeflight:
Awkward crew briefings in the Ebon Hawk were beginning to feel all too damn familiar.

There'd been the Tatooine landing, when Bastila attempted to take charge. Of course, I hadn't shaken off that quack's treatment from Taris, so I'd barely noticed Carth's irritation or Mission's petulance. In hindsight, it'd been blatantly obvious that Mission was going to sneak off the sodding ship first chance she had, and now I was surprised Bastila had been so easily appeased by the teenager's sulky promise. To be fair, Bastila may have had other things on her mind. Like me.

Then, the conversation on Manaan, just before we'd left – when I'd been hungover and ashamed and barely able to look anyone in the eye. Bastila had been out cold in the medbay, and the others all stared at me with varying degrees of expectation and anger.

They'd given me far less than I'd deserved, really; even counting in that shiner from Canderous. After all, I'd scuttled the Ebon Hawk, which caused them to be towed by the Sith and grounded by the Selkath. Not to mention my late return into the fray - that had been too late for Karon.

And then, our crew briefing in hyperspace, just after leaving Korriban for dust. That had been a new level of awkwardness. I was barely dealing with the despair of losing Bastila, and had three damn Sithkids to somehow rein in. One injured, one scared, and one sullenly angry. Somehow I'd cobbled together a sort of training regime to impose a routine on us all, even underneath the withering derision of Canderous.

Apparently, I'd once been a charismatic leader who'd directed armies into war. Seems a bit ludicrous, looking at this lot.

We were all crowded into the common room once more. Suvam had given the Ebon Hawk the all clear, but now that his other visitors had left – and hadn't that been a surprise – his urgency for us to make space tracks had dissipated.

I cleared my throat. "Teethree, project the Star Map again."

The luminescent holo-map sprang into existence above the table. Mission leaned forward, her light brown eyes wide with interest. Next to her, Dustil paid no attention to the cerulean sphere – his gaze was darting warily between myself and Yudan, who'd taken to leaning silently against the back wall.

At least Dustil wasn't hiding this time. I'd run across him earlier – more than once – skulking around the ship while cloaked in the Force. He'd been tailing me, only fleeing when my gaze lingered on the blank patch of Force that heralded his presence.

I'd put credits on him shadowing Yudan as well. Watching us both in fear or readiness should we fall. And – I reminded myself with a kick – Dustil had seen Carth and me together... his father and me. Me, the one who'd re-opened the sodding Academy that had imprisoned him for the last four years. And that wasn't even touching on Telos or his mother.

No wonder the boy hadn't shown his face since we'd escaped the Leviathan.

It'd always be like this, I suspected- the upsurge of black shame deep in my soul, when past repercussions reared up to slap me in the face. And what is it really, but justice, of a sort?

As for Dustil- Well. If it hadn't been for Carth's presence here, I imagined he would've run after mouthy Mekel. His old friend; just another lost, directionless Sithling.

I felt myself frown. Mekel. There was something… curious about the expressive teen. He had potential, sure; his depth of power seemed to fall on the strong side of middling from what I could sense. But it wasn't that. His emotions shouted out to me on the Force; his unease, his desire to find his friend mingling with the one to flee - it was the vividness of them rather than the feelings themselves that felt familiar, like I should recognize something here, something I couldn't quite put my finger on-

"There," Canderous said, grabbing my attention as he jabbed a finger towards the bright green speck that marked our end-game. "A fair way into the Unknown Regions. Even the Mando'ade are cautious when they venture out there."

I felt the corners of my mouth turn down. Caution. Yeah. Not one of my strengths. I deliberately didn't look at Carth, standing arms folded, face expressionless, in front of the hatch that led to the cockpit.

"The Star Map is more than just a set of coordinates," I said, gesturing to the route lines that led to the Forge. "The safe hyperpoints are marked out – as long as we feed these into the nav-computer, we'll avoid anything that could pull us out of hyperspace."

Travelling outside of known hyperlanes was a gamble, at best. Uncharted space meant uncharted phenomena. Undetected planets. Undetected asteroids. Undetected black holes.

The sort of thing that could disrupt a hyperspace journey – generally, resulting in the destruction of the hapless ship.

"Except that this map is, what? Thirty thousand years old?" Carth said, his voice low and intense. "Maybe that's little time on an astronomical scale, but it's still enough for things to have changed."

"Apparently I've taken this route before," I muttered, trying hard to keep the snark out of my voice. I glanced towards him, and the darkness in his gaze cut something deep inside of me. I felt my cheeks burn, and looked back to the map.

"Teethree, shut the map down. The rest of you- before we go," I began, "there's a reason I've called you all here."

I took in a deep breath as the shimmering Star Map winked out, and all eyes turned to me.

"There's-" I paused. "The Star Forge is in the Unknown Regions, but we're not that far from the edges of the Outer Rim Territories now. Teethree calculates it as little more than five standard day's journey. We won't be stopping anywhere along the way. This is the last chance for anyone to jump ship."

I was staring at Mission. And it didn't take long for her to start glaring back at me.

"Uh uh." She shook her head angrily. "No way. I can't believe you're even suggesting this, Jen!"

"We're heading off to face Malak," I said, struggling to keep my voice calm. "The chance of us dying-"

"Far out!" Mission burst out angrily. "You're the one who's always believed in me, Jen, even back on Taris when the others just saw me as a kid! I can help-"

"Against the Force?" I cut in. "Against the Star Forge itself? Stars, Mission, I've never doubted you, but-"

"But you doubt me now? Is that it?" She'd clambered to her feet, arms jammed on hips, light brown eyes sparking with indignant temper. "Big Z and I have always been a team. There ain't no way I'm letting him – or you! – go off and do this without me!"

I subsided, then. Maybe I'd known it was useless. Canderous was eyeing me over in mild derision; despite his growing attachment to her, he didn't see a problem with the young street kid following us into the greatest of dangers yet.

Street Kid... she's about the same age now as I was when I first joined the Jedi. I remembered enough, just barely, to know I wouldn't have allowed anyone to send me off into safety if I hadn't been invested in it myself.

There are ways. If I truly love her, there are ways to ensure she stays behind-

There was a strong appeal to that creeping whisper from the black side of my soul. Questionable methods, but with an outcome I craved. And I knew then that I'd always be fighting this, this urge to use less-than-desirable tactics, this internal debate over what constituted the right choice, anyway-

If something were to happen to Mission, I'd react badly- just think of how I reacted when I thought Yudan was dead and I don't even remember him- there's no way I can keep Carth behind or any of the others, but a twist of the Force could hold Mission here-

And each time, I'd have to battle through the internal quagmire of twisted thoughts, and hope I chose the right path.

She's one of my weaknesses. I can't bring weaknesses to the fight with Malak-

But for all that I wanted Mission's safety, I couldn't... I couldn't do this to her. She was my friend, not my subordinate. Not my follower.

And while the thought of her being cut down like renni-grass against Malak's forces was enough to carve a black-seated horror within me, she'd more than proven her worth since we'd first met. I didn't have the right to choose for her, not here.

Somehow, my gaze caught against Carth's, who was staring at me with a deep understanding in his dark eyes-

He blinked and looked away.

I cleared my throat. "Sorry, Mission," I muttered. "I guess I- I had to try."

"Yeah? Well next time, don't," she snapped, and skivvied past Zaalbar to stomp out of the room. She paused at the hatch. "I'll be in the cargo bay. Y'know, just sitting around, being young and useless."

I sighed as she left. Zaalbar rumbled deep in his throat. "(Do not take her words to heart, Jen. I have had much experience with her ire when I have tried to hold her back. Mission's temper is a flashfire, and dies down as quickly as it takes root.)" He stood, too, towering over the central table as he turned his gaze on me. "(I appreciate that you tried, but I do not believe she will be moved. And if there is one thing I know about my friend, it is that when she is left behind she has a tendency to find her own trouble.)" He huffed. "(I will check on her.)"

I stifled a hollow chuckle as Zaalbar left, understanding the truth of his words. Stars, maybe this was an idiotic thing to bring up in the first place. Even if I'd succeeded, could I really expect Mission to stay put – here? Or believe that a nervy, alcoholic Rodian could stop her from following us? But everyone I cared for was on this ship, everyone – except Bastila – was right here, surrounding me. I'd felt the desire to protect at least one corner of my heart, package it away safely, for all who have ever followed me have died or worse-

I couldn't help but look at Yudan, then; the null part of my past, but the bastard's face was closed and expressionless as he stared back, still leaning insouciantly against the freighter's wall.

"Don't even start, Dad," Dustil snapped, and I jerked back around to see the teenager glaring at his father. "I can see what you're thinking, and I'm not going to pretend to listen, this time."

My gaze flew to Carth; he was obviously torn as he viewed his only child. "This isn't your quest, Dustil," he said quietly, before ending on a sigh. "But I've underestimated you. Gravely. I won't do it again. And you're- you're a man, now. I'd feel happier if you would stay behind or make your own way to Telos… but I won't ask you to do it."

Those words, the fragile understanding between them both- it was a private moment, and my observation would be wildly unwelcome, but I couldn't help but take it in anyway. The softening of Dustil's sullen, wary expression, and the quiet pride of Carth's. It was a gratifying moment that I shouldn't be witnessing- but it warmed my heart, nonetheless.

"I'll go see Mission," Dustil muttered, looking awkward as he stood, shoulders hunched as he stared away from anyone's gaze. I wondered, briefly, if the boy would ever become accustomed to emotion of any sort, and how much Korriban was to blame for that.

"I'll be launching soon," Carth warned, as his son left and he looked ready to do the same, his hand pressed against the hatch control that led to the cockpit. "Get yourselves strapped in."

"Carth," I said, my voice halting his exit. His expression was indecipherable and a muscle twitched in his jaw. His expression was indescipherable and a muscle twitched in his jaw. He said nothing, however. I breathed in. "When we get close to the Star Forge, I'll run co-pilot."

His gaze darkened on mine. "You… remember something…?"

"No." I shook my head. "Just in case."

Was I warning him? I didn't know. A large part of me didn't want to be anywhere near Carth and his justifiable bitterness. But I couldn't afford to hide away like an emotional coward, not with everything at stake. And it wasn't just my broken memory, here….

The Republic would be shooting at us on sight. The thought of Carth having to face that, or being ordered to bring us in… I couldn't let it happen. The crux of it was, I simply had no idea how he would react to that sort of order now that he knew the truth.

But I knew I had no choice- I couldn't let us be taken by anyone's forces. No matter what Carth might decide.

Not when Bastila was still prisoner. Not when Malak was still out there. Not when I was the best- perhaps the only – shot at toppling Malak.

I had to hope we'd arrive before any Republic offensive, and that this hypothetical scenario remained just that. For if I'd thought things were bad between Carth and me now…

We've only been at Yavin three days. Sure, the brass have the Forge coordinates, but they'll need time to rally the fleets.

I'd strike fast, if I were in their boots. Roll the dice of chance, and gamble on speed trumping might-a forward advance of whatever ships were available, for reconnaissance and infiltration if at all possible-

Likely, it'd be a suicide run, but it would send back valuable information to the rest of the Republic Fleet, and might even surprise Malak.

Well. I had to hope the Republic brass was more cautious than I. For, if they weren't, then we might very well arrive in the middle of a Republic vanguard.

Carth was still staring at me, his face grim and set. I had no idea what he was thinking. Once again, I felt the longing for the easy camaraderie that had once existed between us. Even should I never be able to claw anything deeper back, the desire for his respect was strong. It didn't seem possible that it would ever return.

He said nothing, merely turned and stepped through the open hatch.

Focus. Focus, Revan, I commanded myself, as Carth disappeared behind the closed door. Focus on the endgame. I took a deep breath and – despite the incongruity of the moment – actually heard the echo of the blasted Jedi Code run through my mind.

There is no emotion… I wondered, idly, if I'd ever believed in it. Certainly, mastering emotions was useful no matter what a person's station was. Although, sometimes I wondered if the Jedi used it as a way to pretend they didn't have any emotions in the first place.

Yes. Because I'm the most suitable person to judge the frelling Jedi.

With that in mind, I glanced back to Yudan, who was still leaning quietly on the fringes of the room. I couldn't help but feel a twitch of black humour. "So… er, were all our past briefings this awkward?"

I saw the corner of his mouth curve, ever so slightly. For a second there, I could've sworn I almost made the bastard smile. "No," he said flatly, turning on his heel and leaving without another word.

"Well, young pup, I'll give it to you," Jolee drawled, staring at the closed hatch. "You sure know how to clear a room."

"Sometimes, Revan, you're a blithering idiot," Canderous added.

I laughed. I couldn't help it, and it was hard to stop. I wondered, briefly, if my companions of old had been so quick to criticize me. If not, then maybe it's a humbling force I sorely lacked.

"So, five days, huh?" Canderous added, his expression turning thoughtful. "We should make the most of them, then."

"I've stocked up enough." Jolee added, brandishing a bottle filled with clear, amber fluid. "Better than that swill you tried to foist on me earlier, Mandalorian."

Canderous snorted. "Good stuff's hard to come by when you're running from planet to planet." His flinty gaze firmed on me. "A drink or two, maybe, on our first day of hyperspace. But we've a battle to prepare for, Revan. All of us."

I raised a brow. "Sparring, huh?"

He gave a half-shrug in return. "Preparation, of whatever sort. Mind and body. No point heading into battle if you don't take it seriously."
"Preparation is a good idea for us all," Juhani said quietly from behind the table. "Revan…" she trailled off, until she'd completely captured my attention. I motioned for her to continue. "Duelling practice would be useful for you, I suspect. Your hand…"

She didn't finish. I glanced down at the maimed limb, and was surprised at her perception. I needed to become more comfortable wielding only one lightsaber, and I had little time to do so.

"Yeah." I sighed. "You offering?"

"Of course," she murmured, gracing me with a small smile.

::Ship's taking. Buckle in, everyone.:: Carth's curt words shot through the ship's intercom, seconds before I heard the turbine compressor whir underneath our feet.

This could be my last trip in the 'Hawk. The thought was both nostalgic and bittersweet, as I shimmied into one of the safety harnesses attached to the plimfoam benches. End-game. It's not far, now.

The desire to reach out to Bastila was strong. I felt a deluge of Force surge hard through the bond, then, buffet against my shields; something insidious and baneful and powerful. I stifled a gasp, and it was almost impossible to push back, to strengthen the barrier between us rather than reach out with a supporting hand.

Tears pricked against the back of my eyes as I understood whatever Bastila was enduring was entirely my fault. If it had not been for her act of mercy, I wouldn't be here, right now. And she wouldn't be Malak's prisoner.

I gritted my teeth, and shame curled in my belly as I slowly built the shields between us even higher.

I'll come for you, Bastila. I'd vowed that back on the Leviathan, a whispered promise full of darkness and grief.

Now, it was just a raw conviction.

I'll come for you, Bastila.

Just hold on.

xXx

Chapter End Notes

I had thought this chapter would come out a day or two after the previous one, but it turns out I got a little side-tracked. If you don't have me on author alert, then go check out the one-shot M!Revan ficlet I posted - "Face of a Sith Lord". I had a lot of fun writing it!

So, thus ends the longest ever hyperspace arc. We're heading onto the final stretch, now, at est. 102 chapters. I'll say once more (and then I'll try to shut up about it for a couple of chapters, ha) - if you're reading this far, then I'd love to hear from you. Even an anonymous one-liner makes my day. I'm spending a lot of time on this, and it's nice to get validation that I'm not just throwing words out into the ether. Big thanks and gratitude to anyone who has ever reviewed, and double-thanks to those that consistently do so. Triple-thanks to kosiah for the read-through. Mekel's thoughts on Nisotsa being hot are entirely your fault.
"Hah!" I crowed, slamming down a flip-card and shooting Dustil a smug grin. "Time to cough up. I just whipped you, again."

"This is a dumb game," he muttered, but there was a slight grin on his face as he nudged me another expired cred chit across the ship's grated floor. They were leftover plasteel chits from slimy Davik Kang's stores, the ones that'd been voided when I'd tried to cash 'em in on Manaan.

Sure, I woulda played for real creds in a flash, but no one on the 'Hawk felt like handing me their hard dosh anymore. It was lame.

"You're just sayin' that 'cause you keep losing," I teased in a sing-song voice.

Dustil rolled his eyes at me. It softened his face, chased away the suspicious look he so often sported. I liked teasing him. It's good for him, I reckon. Sheesh, an' he could do with taking himself a lil less seriously.

"It's a game of chance, Mission," Dustil said. "You won't give me any of your side-deck cards. There is such a thing as an unfair advantage, you know."

"Pffft." The air breathed past my lips in a dismissive sound. "Not my fault you don't have your own side-deck. Pazaak's like, what? The most popular gambling game in the galaxy? You gotta learn to be prepared, Dee."

His head snapped up; his brown eyes widened in shock. "What- what did you just call me?"

A furious blush flooded into my cheeks. Oops. "Um…"

Dustil blinked. He didn't look mad, or anything- just confused. And yet, as soon as he figured out I'd been snooping, this casual friendship that'd sprung up between us might be completely borked. Because of me and my big mouth.

Okay, maybe 'cause I was bored and started poking through the security feeds. My cheeks were still burning, and Dustil was still staring at me in puzzled expectation.

"I may have, kinda, been looking through the 'Hawk's external cams," I mumbled, shifting restively on the floor of Carth's quarters. It was the only room Dustil was easy in; he seemed to be avoiding the rest of the crew like they had the rakghoul disease or something. "Maybe, at the same time your friend turned up back on Yavin station."

We'd shot into hyperspace a few hours ago. Part of me wondered why Dustil hadn't stayed behind with his friend; I mean, sure, his dad was here- but we were going after freaking Malak, and Dustil'd only been part of our whole quest since Kashyyyk, really.
Didn't mean I wasn't glad about it, though. He was pretty freaking powerful, and... and it was nice to have a friend my age. That is, if I hadn't just stuffed it all up.

There was a slight narrowing to his gaze; the creeping in of wariness, mistrust- the same look he had around everyone. It made me sad.

"Look, I'm sorry, okay?" I wrinkled my nose and stared at him in appeal. "I didn't mean to snoop or anything. Honest. I was just- bored. I won't call you that if you don't want me too."

I wasn't gonna admit I'd centred the cams and amp'd the audio on him and his friend – that cute guy who'd told me to give Dustil another chance back when we were leaving Korriban, back when I'd been ready to dump a gallon of Peragian fuel on him in his sleep. The cute guy was right, though. About Dustil.

And Dustil, really, was just as cute, I thought. If he ever learned to loosen up a bit.

"I, uh-" Dustil broke off, his shoulders hunching up in an awkward movement that was overwhelmingly familiar. "It's- it's okay. You can if you want. It's just, only Mex and Selene ever..." He looked away, staring into nothing with a slight smile. His voice dropped to a whisper of remembrance. "It was damn Mekel who started those nicknames, you know, although Selene flat-out refused to be called Sel."

Dustil shook his head, eyes blinking, as if throwing off the cobwebs of his past. It was a shame- I found I kinda wanted to know more about it all. I knew it had to be bad- it was a Dark Jedi Academy after all- but it was his past. And I was finding myself more and more curious about him.

Dustil looked down at the mess of pazaak cards in his dad's room. He was still holding a 2-pointer in his hand that woulda won the round if I hadn't laid down a special. "This is a stupid game," he muttered.

"So you keep saying." I snickered. "Sheesh, you're as bad as Jen, y'know. All these excuses about the game, when in reality you got the card sense of a Wookiee on gree spice."

But his face hardened, then; his eyes narrowed and his lips thinned. It took me one sec to work out why- Jen.

"You don't- you don't really seem to get it, do you?" he forced out in a low hiss. "She's- I don't care if she's somehow lost her memory- you don't seem to get just what she was. How strong she still is."

"She's my friend," I said, frowning at him. "We've been through so much together-"

"She used to be the Dark Lord of the Sith, Mission!" His voice raised, edging high into incredulity. "Like Darth Malak is now, except she's the one who started the entire war! Her brain might be completely fried or something, but she's still got the same frakking Force-"

"Dustil, look," I cut in. "She's-"

"No, you look- she's killed millions of people around the galaxy. Destroyed planets. Turned on the frakking Republic with half their own fleet. And I don't know what she was playing at with Dad-"

"Um-" I shuffled back from him awkwardly. "I don't reckon that's got anything to do with anything, y'know-"

"How can you be so- so- so frakking calm about traveling with the likes of her? And now, Yudan Rosh, one of her faithful generals, has flocked back to her side—"

"Well, I'm not so sure about him," I muttered, lifting a hand to smooth a lekku behind me, feeling ill-at-ease as our conversation dovetailed. "But you can tell he's still screwed up, what with those weird eyes an' all--" I paused, staring hard at Dustil. He looked mad. "Jen's eyes are fine. I dunno how this Sith thing works, but surely that counts for something, right? And look, you can't deny that if it weren't for her, you'd still be back on Korriban. She's done some pretty amazing things along the way."

The pazaak card slipped from his hand. "If it wasn't for Revan," Dustil hissed, his voice twisting with venom, "Telos would still be intact. And I would still be living there, and my mother would still be alive."

I felt my face burn with embarrassment.

"You're a kid, Mission," Dustil said, sneering, his voice turning dark and nasty. With a sick jolt, I was reminded of the first time we'd met. How he'd, suddenly, flipped into this complete jerk- "You have no idea what the Sith truly mean. You have no idea what it's like to watch your homeworld destroyed--"

The embarrassment winked out, to be replaced with a sudden, sharp temper.

"My homeworld was Taris, you moron!" I yelled, jumping up to my feet. My fists clenched. "I had to watch the plasma falling and everything burning as our ship made it out only just in time! And I can't believe you, of all sents, have the gall to call me a kid!"

"Me?" Dustil blinked, taken aback. He slowly clambered to his feet in response, a handful of pazaak cards dropping from his lap. His cheeks were mottled red, and his gaze snapped sparks of anger at me. "What the frakk is that supposed to mean?"

But I was so sick of everyone dissing me, bringing up my age again and again. I hadn't expected it from freaking Jen when she'd tried to make me stay behind on Yavin -- and yeah, I knew it was 'cause she cared an' all, but it'd still hurt. And now Dustil, who was only a year older--

I felt my eyes narrow in returned anger. "You might've spent the last few years playing bully games with your Dark Jedi mates, but my entire life has been tryin' not to die in the corridors of the Lower City! You had a family for most of your childhood! All I had was a sleemo brother more interested in making creds than keeping his baby sister safe!"

His eyes widened at that- like I'd slapped him. "You've got no right to talk about my childhood!" he snarled. "You know nothing about it!"

I snorted in disdain. "I know you had it easier than me," I shot back, glaring. "And I know you had it easier that Jen, too."

All I really knew about Jen's early past was that it'd been similar to mine. Harder, I'd gleaned. Hungrier. Poorer. Although probably, I shouldn't have tacked on that last comment. I realized this as Dustil's temper devolved into ice-cold fury. The look on his face was ugly; his eyes had pinched to slits of burning anger, and his lips were curled back in disgust.

"I don't give a crap what her childhood was like." He glared at me contemptuously. As if I wasn't worth another second of his time. "No amount of pity-story can make up for a hundredth of what she's caused. You're an idiot, Mission. A stupid, naïve idiot."

In a blink, he completely vanished; but I heard the tread of his boots as he stomped over to the hatch, opened it, and stormed out.

And I was left glaring at the closed door, standing in the midst of discarded pazaak cards.

"Screw you, Dustil Onasi," I whispered, blinking back tears.

xXx

"(Mission)," Zaalbar complained. "(You're sitting on half the workbench)."

He was lugging a panel of Calo's armour, the side piece he'd cut down to fit me weeks ago. I'd already pushed all of his repair tools to one side of the 'bench so I could sit, with my legs kicking against the posts.

I was bored. And miffed. Really miffed.

Maybe a lil upset, too.

Zaalbar huffed, as if to further repeat his point; so I shimmied to the edge of the workbench, knocking a fusion-cutter to the ground that made Big Z groan. I glared mulishly at the wall. I hadn't seen Dustil since he'd stormed off nearly a full day ago, and I was still fuming over our stupid argument.

"Stupid laser brain," I muttered under my breath.

'Course, Big Z being Big Z, he totally heard me.

"(Mission)." Zaalbar looked up from the panel he'd been examining. The blue-and-white exoskeleton still fit me fine, but some of the duranex clasps had been totally fried. Sure, the armour itself had protected my torso from that slug breath's lightning, but it seemed the resistance had stopped at the stupid clasps. And since Carth had chucked out near all of our spare parts to appease the trader back on Yavin, Big Z was having a hard time repairing anything.

"What?" I knew my voice sounded sharp and sulky, like a kid's, like the kid stupid Dustil had accused me of being-

I scowled.

Zaalbar was frowning at me, big bushy brows of hair bristling over his black eyes. It was a familiar look. For me, anyways.

"(You are not still mad at Jen, are you?)"

"What?" I blinked. "Oh! No. Not really."

She'd found me earlier, nudged me while offering a friendly apology, said she was glad to have me with her. I wasn't totally sure she really meant that, but I appreciated the effort.

One thing about Jen, she was able to front up and say sorry when she'd stuffed things up. Well, at least about the little things. Don't think anyone could apologize about the stuff she's done in the past.

I hated to admit that Dustil might actually have some reason to react the way he did. Jen's gonna fix it, though. And that's way better than an apology.

Big Z was still staring at me steadily.
I sighed. "I fought with Dustil," I admitted, before looking away to glare at the far wall some more. "(Mission)," Zaalbar said slowly. "(I hope our last days in hyperspace are not going to be filled with arguments)."

"Hey, that's not fair!" I flared, jumping off the workbench to jam my hands on my hips. "Dustil was being a complete laser brain about Jen! I wasn't gonna sit back and just listen to all of that!"

Zaalbar knew me, and he wasn't one to take offence even as I glared my most righteous glare in his direction. He stayed silent for a moment, as if thinking about the whole thing, while I tried my best not to pout.

"(Carth's cub does not know Jen as we do, Mission. When I first met Jen Sahara, in the sewers after you both rescued me, I will admit that she made me uneasy. There was something about her I did not trust)." He placed the side panel down gently onto the workbench, still calmly holding my gaze. "(And, unlike Dustil Onasi, I understood nothing of her past then)."

"You don't seem to understand much now," I mumbled, a bit sulkily, even if I knew I was being the teensiest bit rude. It was true, though. Big Z just didn't really get the whole galaxy and everything that went on outside of Kashyyyk – despite having lived on Taris for years.

And Dustil thinks I don't get it. Stupid nerf herder.

Zaalbar huffed. "(What I am saying is that you cannot expect others to have the same opinion as you, Mission. Dustil Onasi has not had the easiest time of things. Perhaps you need to grant him a little leniency)."

"Easiest time?" I muttered, scowling – but it did make me think of how I'd thrown my childhood in his face. Sure, Griff had let me down… but I'd had Gadon and the Beks. Big Z had always been my shield. Maybe Dustil had had a rosy enough time in his early years on Telos, but I couldn't kid myself that the Lower City of Taris were as bad as living in a Sith Academy.

They probably had to hurt each other… kill each other… do all sorts of horrid things just to survive. That tortured Jedi, Belaya, came to mind… and Dustil's role in her death. I shivered. At least on the streets of Taris things were simple. People were only after creds in one form or another.

Maybe Big Z was right. Maybe I'd been a lil unfair. But then, so had he!

"Okay." I sighed, folding my arms. "I'll track him down later and try to make up."

Later. When I wasn't feeling so steamed.

Big Z gave me a shaggy-haired nod, before bending over the armour again. "(I may be able to weld one side shut and move the inner clasps to the outside)," he rumbled, "(It is not ideal, but it will work. I would like you to wear it before we approach this Star Forge)."

I took a moment to appraise Big Z; large head bent over the freighter's workbench as the halogen lighting shone around him, picking up brownish highlights in his ragged coat. Zaalbar'd taken to tinkering with the Bek's armour, too; at first, it was a way to stay out of company, for in the early days on Taris Big Z had been even more ill-at-ease around sents of any species. And then, fixing things had turned into something he'd a bit of a knack for.

The Beks came to appreciate it, even if they'd never extended full membership to Big Z or me. They woulda, eventually. Maybe when I'd turned, like, sixty years old or something.
"What're ya gonna do, Big Z? After all of this?" The question had been on my mind for a bit, 'cause I couldn't really see myself going back to Taris. I… wanted to know if some of my old friends survived, I wanted to hear about the planet and I hoped the bombardment hadn't been too devastating- but I didn't want to go back to my old life. I'd seen so much since then. The Hidden Bek's would view me as the same girl who'd left so many, many months ago- and I wasn't, not really.

Maybe part of me felt like I could do more, or better, than living on the streets again.

"(I will go back to Kashyyyk)," Zaalbar said slowly, straightening up once more to look at me. No matter how often I interrupted his work, Big Z never got irritated. He was a gem, really – I knew that. "(My father will be looking for a new successor; he may have chosen one by the time I return. It is a big thing, the choosing and the rituals, but Freyyr will be keen to bury the past and plant the sapling of the future)."

I frowned. "Do you… do you regret it?" I asked, in a tiny voice.

He coulda stayed behind. Part of me thought he should've.

Big Z took the time to consider my question. It was one of the things I liked about my old friend. Total opposite of me; he chose his words carefully and ensured they were what he meant before they spilled outta his mouth.

"(I do not. I was never raised for chieftainship, Mission)." His furry face was creased in a frown of concentration. "(There may have been a moment in Rwookrorro when I saw myself as the future leader I could be; a stronger, healthier bough than my brother; a pillar for my people… but my heart would not have been easy. I would not have been able to ignore my debts to Jen Sahara and Bastila Shan, and those debts would have made a mockery of my honour. I am content with my choice, Mission)."

I nodded. I didn't want to think on Bastila much. I'd never liked her, but I couldn't kid myself about what she must be going through. I looked away from my oldest friend, one hand fiddling with the utility belt strapped around my waist. "I don't mind visiting Kashyyyk for a bit, Big Z. But… there ain't no way I'm setting down roots there. It's not- it's not the place for me."

I grimaced, and felt my shoulders hunch. I loved Big Z, I'd known him for years, I couldn't imagine us two not being a pair an' having each other's back… but-"(I would like to return home)," Zaalbar said quietly. "(My exile has been overturned. And my people know little of matters beyond Kashyyyk. I do not believe Czerka could have gained a foothold on my planet had we better understood the motives of off-worlders)." He paused, before adding sheepishly. "(I hope I can help with that knowledge, given my experience away from home)."

"You could." I snickered. "Maybe one day you'll end up being a hairy grey Old One, telling all the little hairballs about your adventures with me."

Zaalbar blinked at me, his black eyes like round little pebbles in the midst of a face of snarled fur. "(Old Ones are revered amongst my people, Mission. I do not know if I could live up to something like that)." He nudged me affectionately. For him it was gentle, but I still stumbled back a pace. "(But all Wookiees share their stories with the young. And you would feature in every one of my escapades, my friend. I feel I already have a lifetime of tales to tell, and I am still a young Wookiee)."

I grinned at him. "We still got some to go, Big Z. It ain't over yet."

I tried hard to hold onto the moment, and not let the fear ice in underneath. After all my complaining to Jen, I wasn't gonna let anyone see I was scared of Darth Poodoo and his stupid factory.

"(If you will not stay on Kashyyyk with me, Mission, then where shall you go? Shall you return to Taris?)"

"No," I said, frowning. "I dunno, Big Z. But it won't be Taris. I guess we don't need to decide straight away, right? I mean, first we gotta get rid of Malak – and then, like, have the galaxy's biggest party to celebrate."

Zaalbar chuffed. "(Your ebullience has always warmed my heart, Mission. You are a rare soul. If we part ways I shall miss you sorely)."

I snorted before leaning against him. His fur was warm and slightly musky- sheesh, when's the last time he stepped in the 'fresher? I had to pick my battles with Big Z, there was only so much nagging that worked on the uncivilized throw-rug.

"Y'know," I began, resting the side of my face against his waist. "Just 'cause you're gonna go commune with your trees, don't mean I won't be visiting. Heaps. You can't get rid of me that easily, Big Z."

He rumbled in amusement, lifting one shaggy paw to rest around me gently.

xXx

Big Z didn't normally have much to say, but when he did – unless it was some trash about me staying behind – it was usually worth listening to.

So I'd been wandering aimlessly through the ship for hours, trying to track down Dustil.

The Ebon Hawk wasn't that big. Dustil Onasi might have some special magical hiding power, but it shouldn't be this freaking hard to pin him down.

I scowled, and stomped into the common room.

"…asteroids everywhere, but only one planet," Jen was saying, leaning over the table next to Canderous. Teethree was projecting that fancy Star Map again, although it looked totally different this time. Objects were bigger, and there were way less of them. It wasn't a map of a galaxy anymore. "It would be a logical place for a base or supply depot."

Canderous, too, was staring intently at the holo-map. Behind them both was Carth, his gaze fixed on the back of Jen's head.

I hoped he could get over things. Jen and Carth. It still surprised me. I'd thought Jen and Canderous made sense, what with them both being warriors and all that stupid sparring… but there was something about Jen and Carth that worked, too. Maybe Jen needed someone who would remind her of the right thing to do, and Canderous wasn't always so good at that.

Canderous raised a hand to swivel the translucent map around in the air. I spotted the Forge, then; a large object in the middle of the projection. The Star Map was just showing one sector, I realized – they'd zoomed right in on our destination.

"I dunno, Revan," Canderous said. "The Forge is a sizable structure in itself. It can probably work as its own supply run. And don't forget how remote and distant this sector is. There's no point in fortifying – and then defending – other parts of a system unless you mean to inhabit or exploit them."

Jen hummed; it sounded like agreement. "We're on the edge of the galaxy here." Her eyes met Canderous' through the map. "Malak's spent the last year attacking the Republic; parts of his fleet will be dotted around the current flashpoints-" She frowned, suddenly, and shot an enquiring look at the wall next to me.

My gaze slid sideways; I jumped as I focused on the still figure of Yudan Rosh, leaning silently against a bulkhead not more than two metres from me.

"I have been on a personal mission for the last month, Revan; my knowledge is hardly up to date," the Dark Jedi drawled. He shrugged. "The Rodian corridor was under siege when I left. Ando, Manda, Bothawui… it is an important trade route into the Core, and a difficult one to defend. It's switched hands more than once already."

"Huh." Jen looked vaguely disgruntled as she turned her attention back to the map. I took several steps away from the motionless Dark Jedi, and slid into a seat while keeping half an eye on him. I didn't care if Jen was at ease around the guy, I still didn't like him. I could feel my lekku curl around my neck defensively.

"This sector is days into the Unknown Regions," Jen murmured. "I can't think that Malak would hold back too large a slice of his armada this far out. And other than our brief stop at Yavin, we've come here directly. The defences of the Star Forge won't be primarily enemy ships."

"It is his stronghold, Revan," Yudan said flatly. His voice was still a monotone, like he didn't care about anything, even when he was disagreeing with Jen. "I wish she'd kicked his ass to the curb back at Yavin. "Malak would be a fool if he left it unguarded. And Malak is many things, but he is not a fool."

"No, not unguarded," Jen mused, her green eyes clouding with thoughts. "But not at his full strength either. It will take time for him to pull his forces back to the Forge now he knows the Republic are on their way. The quicker they can get there, the better their chances." She grimaced, one hand rubbing at her face. "As long as they don't get there before us."

My gaze flew to Carth; he'd tensed at that comment, his eyes narrowing as they burned into the back of Jen's head. She shifted uneasily, but didn't turn. "This unknown planet," Jen murmured, leaning closer to lift a hand through the shimmering sphere and rotate it much the same as Canderous had. "I feel like there's something I should know. See, here — the map plots out the solar trajectory of both the planet and the Forge. The Forge orbits the planet, but in heliosynchronous fashion; it always has line of sight to the sole star in the system. There'll be a reason for that."

"Power source," Yudan said flatly.

"Probably." Jen was nodding. "But there's something about the planet itself…” She frowned, rubbing at her temple. "There's this twitching in the back of my mind, like if I could just find the right word or thought I'd recall something- if I could just force my damn mind to remember-"

"Don't." Carth said. His voice was abrupt and loud. Jen jumped, before turning to meet his gaze. He looked- torn. There was no other word for it. "It's a bad idea, Je- Revan. It's- it's a terrible idea!
Forcing your old memories… just don't."

I couldn't see Jen's face anymore with the way she'd craned around, but I saw her shoulders tense before she slowly nodded. "It doesn't work anyway," Jen whispered, so quiet I had to strain to hear. "Every memory that's resurfaced has been unexpected. Sometimes things trigger them… but never from a deliberate action of mine. It's like my mind doesn't want to remember anything… and I don't either, Carth, I truly don't." There was a soft sigh that echoed around the room before she continued in that same, deathly quiet voice. "But I don't want any of you to die, either."

"It's not worth losing your soul over," Carth replied, and part of me thought the two of them had completely forgotten there was anyone else in the room with the way Carth was still staring at her. "It's not worth becoming what you once were again."

A shadow passed his face, then; and his gaze moved over the rest of us. His lips thinned; he suddenly looked grim and old and, without another word, he turned and left for the cockpit.

"You know," Canderous said, swinging his boots up to rest atop the table. One of them merged through a larger asteroid in the holo-map, and Teethree squawked in complaint. "You Republic lot make things a lot more kriffing complicated then they need to be."

"Republic?" Jen said in a dry voice, turning back around to raise an eyebrow at him. "Not sure that's the best label for me, Canderous."

"But it's the side you're on, Jen," I said, shuffling along the bench to nudge her affectionately. Sometimes, I thought it might do her good to remember that some of us were with her, no matter what.

Canderous snorted. "Well, Jedi don't fit you, and neither does Sith. You'd make a damn fine Mando'ade, you know."

Jen stilled, staring at the older warrior in silence for a moment, before tilting her head in recognition of the compliment. Even I got that that was high praise from him.

I was looking up at Jen, so saw the speculative grin as it formed on her face. She was aiming it at Canderous. "Yudan made you believe he was Mandalorian for some time, too, Canderous. And I don't get the feeling you're easily tricked about such matters."

My gaze shot back to the far wall; but at some stage the Twi'leki Dark Jedi had left the room.

Canderous grunted, but didn't answer. I frowned. "Jen, are you sure about him?" I asked, keeping my voice quiet in case the marsh toad was, like, doing some super-secret listening in or something. I didn't think they could do that sort of thing – but then I'd never expected one of them to turn invisible like Dustil, either. "I mean, he's still a Dark Jedi, y'know. More than you, more than Dustil… I don't wanna deny someone a second chance, but I'd rather he had his somewhere far, far away from us."

Jen had turned to face me, sighing. "Truly? No. I'm not sure about him." She quirked an eyebrow at Canderous, as if asking his opinion.

The Mandalorian shrugged. "He saved my life, but I don't count that as any sort of debt. He only did it to get my approval for him to board this ship. Yudan Rosh followed you once before, Revan; and then he followed Malak. I ain't sure what his end-game is, but I know one thing – he doesn't give a kriff about anyone on this ship other than you. And whether it's to kill you or fight by your side once more, I couldn't tell you."
"Yeah," Jen breathed. "That's more or less what I think. He vowed to ally with me, but then he almost killed..." she trailed off, frowning into space.

"Well, I still wish we'd dumped him back on Yavin station," I said, somewhat tartly.

Jen shot me a half-smile, but I could see her thoughts were elsewhere. "I'll keep an eye on him," she said quietly.

"And I'll keep away from him," I muttered. Suddenly, I was sick of talking about Yudan Rosh. It was more boring than all that waffle about orbits. "Look, Jen, I actually came here 'cause I'm trying to find Dustil." I scowled. "He's hiding from me because we had a stupid fight, and it's not fair that he can go all invisible like that. Is there- is there some way you can tell where he is? Or, I dunno, do something to stop him?"

Jen blinked, looking visibly startled.

Canderous snorted again. "Kids," he muttered, shooting me a derisive look. I stuck my tongue out at him.

Jen laughed. "Sometimes, it's nice to be reminded that not everything is a life or death matter around here." She closed her eyes briefly. A peaceful look crossed her face, before she smiled and raised a hand to point to the stern of the ship. "Dustil's in the engine room, Mission."

"Thanks," I said, before slipping back to my feet. If Jen could find Dustil so easily, then there was no way he'd be able to keep hiding from me anymore.

xXx

I pulled my bio-scanner out from my belt, and pressed against the hatch control.

"Hah!" I crowed to the empty engine room as I took a step inside. I brandished the 'scanner in mock-triumph. "I knew I could tweak this thing to sense you, Dustil!"

"What?" Dustil snapped, and an instant later he was right there, standing in front of me, eyes blinking in shock. "Really? That thing- that thing can find me?"

"Nah," I said, slipping the 'scanner away. I shrugged. "Jen told me where you were. It's not fair, y'know, that you can go all invisible just 'cause we had a lil argument."

His jaw snapped shut with a click, and a frown creased his forehead. He stepped back, looking awkward. "I- uh, Mission, look-" he paused, like he didn't know what to say, and ran a hand roughly through his brown hair.

"I reckon we both said things we didn't mean to," I said slowly. Somehow, I had the feeling Dustil was crap at making up and I'd have to do all the legwork. "And I reckon Jen might jus' be one of those topics we have to agree to disagree on, y'know?"

"You don't understand," Dustil muttered, breathing out loudly in frustration. "You really don't understand. As a kid, I used to hero-worship the lot of them, okay? Frakk, I even had a holo-poster tacked up in my bedroom of the Jedi Thirteen. I'd read the 'Net news, follow the Mando Wars, look up the latest battles- frakk, Mission, they used to be my heroes!"

I blinked. "A holo-poster? What, really?"

A gust of air escaped his lips; almost a chuckle. "Yeah. The Jedi Order kept trying to shut all the merchandise down, but different ones kept cropping up. It all seems stupid, now. My idol was Talvon Esan- he was from Telos, you know? But I knew all their names. Could rattle them off by heart; their backgrounds, the battles they led, their species and gender… Well, except Revan, she was always masked. But…” Dustil sighed. His gaze turned bleak. "The Wars ended. And then they came back. Telos happened. I met Nisotsa Organa at Korriban- she was one of the Thirteen, once. But she wasn't a hero anymore."

His gaze held mine, wary and intent. "I heard stories, at Korriban," he said softly. "Of all of them. Talvon was killed by Revan, you know? Although I heard he'd gone stark raving mad first. The rest all turned on each other. My childhood heroes, turning on each other, turning on the Republic. And then there's Malak…” His eyes shut, and he shook his head briefly. "Bandon almost took me, last time he visited the Academy. If things had turned out just the smallest bit different, I'd be loyal to Darth Malak right now, killing people in his name. People like you. People like Dad."

My breath caught in my throat. "But- but you're not," I whispered. I wanted to reach out, hold his hand, maybe; but I worried it might break the spell between us. "You got a chance to turn everything around, Dee. And so does Jen."

His eyes snapped open. His gaze had firmed, intense and dark, as it bored into mine. "I've been the cause of unnecessary death before, Mission, and those deaths hang over me. Four. Four sents total. Do you have any idea how many deaths Revan is responsible for?"

"Lots," I said simply. "But she's always been there for me. She laid her life on the line against a rancor of all things, for no reason other than to save Big Z and me when she barely knew us. She rescued my brother, when he was captured- and he's a jerk that probably didn't deserve it. These sleemo Gamorreans on Tatooine woulda killed me if not for her. And- and- in the Shadowlands… you know I ran into that Bandon fella, right?"

There was the slightest twitch to his head, and I took that as a yes before continuing. "He had her captured. Restraints, this Force collar… she'd given up. Completely. I could see it on her face, even if I was totally freaked out at the time. And then, when she realized I was there and Bandon was about to- to-" I snorted, not wanting to finish that sentence. "-to be a complete ronto turd, she somehow escaped and killed the bastard. Because I was there."

We stared at each other in creeping silence. The frustration was still obvious on Dustil's face; and heck, it wasn't like I needed him to like Jen or anything, but if he could just see the sort of person she was now-

I breathed out through my nose before continuing, in a quieter voice. "I know you reckon I don't understand – and maybe I don't, the way you do – but what I do understand is that she's the only one who can sort all this crap out. And yeah- Jen scares me too. But she's also my friend. And I love her, y'know? Scary Force powers an' all."

There was the slightest softening in his face, the disappearance of sharp lines around his mouth. Dustil didn't smile much; it was like he never let his guard down, never let himself just relax. And I could get that – what with his past an' all – and I knew it all came back to Jen in one way or another… but I also kinda thought that everyone in the 'verse would be quick to lay the blame on Jen – herself included.

I wasn't gonna. She was my friend. I wouldn't see her as anything beyond that.

"Maybe she's the only one who can stop Malak, but I wish you'd stay away from her," he said quietly. "You don't have any defences around her… and she's dangerous. A lot more dangerous than you seem to realize."
I rolled my eyes at that. "Okay, now you're insulting my smarts. Wouldn't matter if I had freaky Force powers like you, Dee – Jen just blasts anyone in her way no matter how strong they are. But she trusts me. And I trust her." I frowned. "Although if she tries to leave me behind again I'm gonna stick fire-spice in her caffa."

That loosed a surprised laugh from Dustil. His eyes widened, like he'd never heard anyone crack a joke before. I guess no one would've dared, not about Jen. The thought made me sad.

"I'm serious, y'know," I muttered. "I'm not above getting my own back if people try to make decisions for me – Jen included."

There was a slight look of awe around Dustil's face as he stared at me. He probably couldn't conceive of pranking someone like Jen, no matter if they deserved it. Maybe he'd never get over Jen's past – and I couldn't blame him, not really – but it'd be nice if he came round to seeing her as just another person rather than the scary Darth Revan she used to be.

I didn't expect it would happen anytime soon. But I knew it would never happen if he kept hiding away.

"Come on," I said, motioning to the hatch. "Stop hiding and come play another game of pazaak."

"I was not hiding," he mumbled, folding his arms and scowling at me half-heartedly.

"Okay, well stop not-hiding and come play pazaak." I reached my hand out to him in invitation. "Bet you can't win even one of five games."

Dustil stared at my outraised hand for a sec, the corners of his mouth curving upwards, before he reached forward to slip his larger one into mine.

"We'll see about that," he replied, before following me out of the room.

xXx

Chapter End Notes

Back to the shorter chapters! Hopefully that means more frequent updates :-) Thanks for the comments/reviews, they make my day.
Coming up next [proviso: subject to change]: Revan sticks her nose in, Jolee tells a tale, and the crew finally exit hyperspace.
Thanks as always to kosiah for the read-through. Any and all errors left behind are mine!
My dreams had been uneasy of late, more so than usual. Full of phantoms, murmuring evocations of power, betrayal, death...

I remembered nothing tangible when I woke- nothing more than shadows. It could have been the bond, could have been emotions leeching through from Bastila; stars knew that Force shields only held so well in slumber. Our last interaction had shown that Bastila's principles, along with the fragility of her soul, had devolved into a mirror of my own.

I could predict the guilt she would be wallowing in now. And the self-flagellation she would inflict upon herself for the visceral pleasure she had enjoyed at Kylah's downfall.

Bastila, when it came to her own standards, was a woman of extremes. She would either crucify herself for what she had felt on the doomed heavy cruiser, or worse-

Embrace it.

I worried she was reaching a point of capitulation- or abandonment. I worried that her fault-lines, her pressure points, were widening.

I knew Malak would be a fool not to capitalize.

He could drive into Bastila's mind – maybe he did not have her finesse with the Force, but certainly his power eclipsed hers – and he would undoubtedly see something of how we had succumbed to the Dark Side.

For we had welcomed it, allowed it to overwhelm us with its majesty of power and morass of seething emotions, and surrendered to its unyielding tide.

Everyone stumbled, at times. But Bastila and Malak would both know that the Leviathan had been more than a stumble.

I could still feel it. Taste it, in the back of my throat. The unholy Force that had run through us.

It had been unchecked, staggering and magnificent in its breadth. I knew where that path led. Whatever remained of my life, I would always be facing both the ramifications and the insidious desire to traverse it once more.

Or maybe… maybe Bastila had nothing to do with my broken sleep. Maybe it was no more than the weight of my own past suffocating me.

We had little more than a Galactic day's cycle before our final journey would end. I tried to turn my thoughts away from Bastila, and towards the Star Forge that awaited us; but my problem was I had little idea what to expect. If we weren't so overwhelmingly desperate, it wouldn't be us leading the vanguard, racing to arrive before the Fleet, rushing recklessly into the unknown.

I was fine with risking myself; stars, the morbid side of me thought a fitting end for my doomed life would be in the fight against Malak. Provided I nullified him and destroyed the Star Forge, the mission would be a success – and my own survival mattered little.

But we had to get there first and, despite Carth's wish for my memories to remain behind the veil of amnesia, I yearned for something to break free- anything to aid us in what was to come.

Would it really be so easy to fly over and dock at the Star Forge? Face Malak, rescue Bastila, and be done with all of it?

One way or another the Force had seemingly led me this far, and my only option now was to have faith it would stay with me.

She'd put me through my paces a fair few times in the preceding days. I'd needed the practice, wielding just the one 'saber, and Juhani was a formidable warrior in her own right.

But not my equal. Even focusing on pure duelling with an unfamiliar form, it had become easy to best her. I need to pin down Yudan. I knew this. I had an expert duellist onboard this very ship, sworn to fight by my side- and yet I quailed.

Canderous had wanted to dump him off at Yavin Station. Mission had pointed out that he was still, obviously, a Dark Jedi. Carth didn't need to voice his opinion to me; it was patently clear.

Dammit. I made the choice to trust Yudan's word. So it's time to stop beating about the cacta bush and make use of his talents.

I could sense him in the garage, him and Juhani; and as I reached out further with the Force I could feel around the edges of their emotions. I wasn't adept at interpreting them, but Juhani's presence had a sort of fierce conviction, as if she were resolved to do something-

The hatch behind me opened, and I sensed the affable presence of Jolee Bindo walk towards me as I stood still in the centre of the abandoned common room.

"What are you up to, young pup?" he asked in curiosity, and I wondered if my use of the Force had drawn him closer. He snorted as his gaze dropped to the table, which was covered in a mess of haphazard pazaak cards. "Kids," he muttered. "Always leaving a mess behind. Some things never change, no matter the century."

A spike of something like anger resonated on the Force, before being drawn tightly into the ominous presence that was Yudan Rosh.

Sun and stars, what's going on? I wouldn't find out here. With a grimace, I began striding towards the garage.

"Ach, leave them to it," Jolee advised. "Not everything's about you, you know."

I threw Jolee an irritated look, before pressing my hand on the hatch control.

"...to the Light?" Juhani was saying as I entered. Her tawny gaze flickered over to mine briefly before settling back on Yudan. Both of them grasped deactivated lightsabers, and my attention was immediately drawn to the hilt held loosely between Yudan's fingers.
"Really," Yudan drawled. He sounded derisive; mocking, even. He didn't turn to acknowledge me, merely remained standing, staring impassively at the Cathar.

"You cannot expect me to believe that the Dark Side has brought you peace," Juhani returned simply. There was an intent, righteous expression on her face, and suddenly I knew exactly what she was doing. What Juhani was always drawn to do. Kath crap, Juhani, do you really think you can redeem Yudan Rosh?

I saw Yudan's fist clench slightly around the 'saber hilt, and the misgivings in my gut grew.

I sucked in a breath. "Is this really-"

"And what do you know of the Dark Side?" Yudan mocked. He still, completely, ignored me. "Enlighten me, youngling. Go on."

Juhani's lips pursed. "I have had my own dalliance with it, minor as it may have been in comparison to yours. I understand the despair, the lack of choice one feels-"

Juhani cut herself off as the Force swelled within Yudan's grasp; her eyes widened and she stumbled back. Alarm shot through me, and everything tensed. The apprehension grew, and my hand shot to Karon's 'saber in reaction.

"You struck down your Master," Yudan said softly, his eyes burning as he stared the Cathar down. I could feel faint coils of psychic energy reaching out from beneath his command, and the Force surrounding me roused in response; an influx of power ready to unleash at a second's notice. "You think a failed Knight Trial gives you experience of the Dark Side? Oh- and you didn't even succeed in killing her?"

Hot anger bloomed on Juhani's face, throwing the angular planes of her striped cheeks into stark relief. "Stay out of my head!" she hissed, slanted eyes flashing. "There is no call for that sort of trespass!"

Yudan laughed, and there was an audible nastiness in it as it rang throughout the garage. "Quit preaching then, Cathar. Your words are meaningless and beneath me."

"Yudan, stop being an ass," I snapped.

He turned, finally; his impassive gaze landing on me.

Damn, but he was a hard one to read. Sometimes, an intense flash of something would spark through the flawed yellow of his eyes, and I'd be struck with the uneasy feeling that he was reconsidering our shaky alliance.

"I see I am wasting my time," Juhani decried, her face set with dislike as she stalked past us both to exit the room. I was left glowering at Yudan, wariness tightening my stomach as I was suddenly hit by just how much I didn't know regarding the Dark Jedi I'd invited onto our ship.

And Canderous' words shot through my mind: Yudan Rosh followed you once before, Revan; and then he followed Malak.

Malak, who'd turned on me so infamously with some of my own followers above Jen's homeworld-

"Deralia," I hissed, the word twisting on my tongue like poison. "Were you part of it?"
"The betrayal?" Yudan didn't pretend to misunderstand, at least; but he didn't look the slightest bit concerned, either. "What is wrong, Revan?" he drawled, raising an eyebrow. And the urge to punch him in his smug face, to make him exhibit some emotion other than disdain or mockery or that damned indifference, grew hot with urgency. "Are you having second thoughts about me?"

"Yes, dammit!" I growled. "Everyone I know, everyone I care for is onboard this ship-" except Bastila--"and you've shown no compunction about-" I bit off the rest, and breathed in deeply. Tried to settle myself, tried to let the emotions calm down. Stars knew I had little justification to be angry at him, with all I'd done. "I need to know, Yudan. Were you part of it?"

Yudan's expression turned hard; a frozen breath on the Force. My gaze slipped, once more, to the deactivated lightsaber he held so casually, and the idea of standing against him yet again turned my stomach-

"I was not near Deralia. I did not know of it." His words were formal and icily issued. He wasn't part of it. Hot, welcome relief seared through me. Well, I may have let a Dark Jedi in amongst the crew, but at least it's not a traitorous Dark Jedi. Did that make any difference, really?

"And if you had known?" I asked in a low voice.

"You don't have the right to ask that," Yudan bit out. His eyes narrowed to slits of iced topaz. "I will not dally in what-ifs with you, Revan. You made a choice, now either live with it or challenge me."

I jerked backwards, stung. I didn't want to fight the bastard-

"I told you I'd fight by your side," Yudan sneered at me. His attention had dropped to my hand, now curled tight around Karon's 'saber. Anger sprang to life on his face, shattering the cold aloofness he had been sporting. His brows lowered, and the corners of his mouth turned down in disgust. "You, of all people, dare to doubt my word? You are a hypocrite, Revan. The galaxy's biggest hypocrite. And I am a fool for ever following you."

With a muttered oath, Yudan hurled the hilt in his grasp across the opposite end of the room, where it landed in an open storage canister. Whirling on his feet, he stalked out of the garage.

I stared at the storage box, blinking, as comprehension surged through me with a sick jolt. He'd been grasping a training lightsaber, one of the ones I'd pilfered from Korriban. Stars, he and Juhani might've been sparring, before I stepped in and made it all worse-

Sithspit.

I wasn't just a hypocrite; I was a sodding imbecile. My fear of Yudan's potential betrayal had completely blinded me to the fact that he couldn't be armed; his lightsaber had been left behind on the frelling Leviathan. Even if Jolee had pocketed it on the way out, there was no way the old man would have left it with Yudan. While Jolee might like to jerryjig along on the edge of senility, it was naught more than an act- the hermit from Kashyyyk would not have left a powerful weapon in the hands of a powerful Dark Jedi.

My tumultuous thoughts turned to Juhani, and how she'd tried to reach Kel, Dak- even emotive Mekel ten seconds after that insane Jorak had sucked the life out of him. Juhani was a noble soul and meant well, but her platitudes could come across as pious to those who considered her a stranger, and hardly a relatable one at that.

Double sithspit, I cursed myself again. Really, what would Yudan have done had I taken Jolee's advice and stayed out of it? Been a ronto's arse until she left him alone. And that's probably it.

I damned myself for my interference, and could only hope it hadn't kicked our fragile alliance back ten steps.

"That went well," Jolee commented. At some stage, he must have followed me in. "Think maybe next time you should keep your nose out of it, huh?"

I blinked, before shooting him a glare.

Jolee chuckled. "It wasn't your business, Revan. They weren't threatening each other; they weren't fighting. No one on this ship knows how to take Yudan Rosh, and you should let him sort that out himself."

"Yeah," I sighed, suddenly defeated. "I see that. Now I wish I'd listened to you."

"Humph," he muttered, eyeing me over with a frown. "Well, at least you're self-aware. I'll give you that much."

"At times," I said, staring over to the entrance that led back to the common room. I felt dispirited, almost melancholy, and beset with a longing to drown my sorrows. Caffa will have to do. Let's not add to my stupidity by indulging in alcohol.

I strode back to the central hatch control, pausing as my hand hovered over the release button. "And at other times," I added, "I think I'm just stumbling through the dark."

"Hah!" the old man crowed as the door swished open in front of me. "That's the truth for us all, young pup. You think you're any different, just because the Force swirls around you?"

"No," I groused, walking through to the common room as he followed in my wake. Again.

Mission had appeared in the intervening time, and was busy sorting out the colourful cards strewn over the table. She shot me a smile of welcome.

"That wasn't what I meant, anyway," I continued, throwing the words back over my shoulder to Jolee. "Just... how many mistakes do I make because I don't remember what I've learned before?" I sighed, taking a seat next to Mission. "How can my lack of recollection be anything but hampering? How am I supposed to stay on the right path, when I don't remember why I fell in the first place?"

Mission frowned, looking as if she were about to interject but Jolee beat her to it. "Hmm. Jedi like to talk about destiny, you know," he said, meandering over to the caffa machine before shooting it an irascible glare. "And they like to harp on about the chances of falling to the Dark Side, as if it were preordained and the likes of you or me don't have anything to say in the matter." He jabbed a finger at the percolator, and grunted in approval as it began to whir.

"Chances..." I muttered, running a hand through my unruly mop. "Are some sents more likely to fall?"

Jolee shrugged as he slipped a cracked mug into the tray at the bottom of the machine. "Certainly there are risk factors. Those trained late in life, or already attached."

"I was-" My breath hitched. He could be describing me, I realized. "I- we were already involved before the Jedi found us. I recall that much. And... we weren't young." I frowned. "Somehow, I don't believe the Sith are so concerned about age. Or attachment."
Jolee chucked. "Aye, well, that don't surprise me much. The ethos of the Jedi Order was not always so strict, you know. Centuries ago they did not pull apart families. A generation or two back and the rules regarding age were more flexible. But before I left, they frowned on admitting anyone who had lived more than ten cycles of the Coruscanti sun."

"Ten," I said blankly. "Ten? But I was… Malak was… sixteen, maybe? How- how did that work?"

Jolee slid a full cup of steaming brew over the plasticeel table to me, before turning back to make himself one. It struck me then, suddenly, how everyone on the damn ship seemed to quietly understand my needs and act upon them without comment.

I was blessed, I realized; surrounded by those who cared for me even when they shouldn't.

"Well, it was after my time, but even in the depths of Kashyyyk I occasionally caught the galactic news, you know. Usually just before destroying the comm arrays I stumbled over, but heh, that's another story." Jolee waggled his eyebrows in his customary cryptic fashion, before grabbing his own cup of caffa and taking a seat. "Your admittance to the ranks of the Jedi caused a stir even I heard of. Sure, there's always exceptions to rules, even within the rigidity of the Order – but you two were uncommon, even for an exception."

"So old," I murmured, glancing down at the grubby table-top. "Old, and already attached." I couldn't stop the bitter laugh as it fell from my lips. "You spoke of destiny, old man. Is that what you think? That Malak and I were destined to fall?"

There was something sharp lodged in my chest. If the odds were on me stumbling back then, then what about now? Jolee Bindo was no Jedi Master, but I was beginning to value his counsel, and part of me dreaded his next words.

He didn't answer at first, and the silence turned thick with premonition. Slowly, I raised my gaze to meet his.

Jolee snorted; a loud and inelegant sound. "Did you know that Force-sensitive Rodians are more likely to fall to the Dark Side?"

"What?" I blinked, completely blindsided. Next to me, Mission guffawed with disbelief.

"Oh yes," Jolee murmured from across the table. "By quite some margin. There was a time when the High Council even considered banning all Rodians from entering the Order, due to the fear that they were merely training acolytes who would one day swear allegiance to the Dark Side."

It sounded like the warped reasoning of bigots. On one hand, I had the feeling I may have labelled the High Council such, once upon a time. And yet the idea struck me as far-fetched, even for them. How could one sweep such generalizations over an entire species? Surely there was a Rodian or two on the Council. Surely no Jedi Master worth his robes would stand for that sort of blind xenophobia, no matter how wrapped up in good intentions it may be.

"Are you messing with me, old man?" I asked suspiciously.

Jolee threw back his head and laughed. "Good to see you're not easy to fool. But I do have a story for you, and this one's actually true."

I folded my arms and shot him a wary look. He was still chortling with mirth. "You promised, young pup. When you scampered away from me in the Shadowlands, you promised to listen to my next tale."
"I believe I said for one minute," I muttered.

"Bah, we're in hyperspace. What else are you going to do, besides skulk around and avoid our pilot?"

I scowled at him, as fingers of guilt clenched tight around my heart. Jolee stared straight back at me, uncompromising and resolute. He was damn annoying- but maybe his persistence was what I needed.

"Fine. Spin your tale, old man," I said, the snark evident in my voice. "Reveal to me the depths of your wisdom."

"Oh ho! No, young pup, wisdom is learned. Make what you will of my story." He cleared his throat. "Right. Now, where was I?"

I stared at him in silence. There was a slight twitch at the corner of his mouth that made me wonder how much of the doddering old man act was just that – an act. It was at least most, if not the entirety, I swore it.

"Okay, okay, I'll get to the point before your impatience explodes," he grumbled, but his eyes were twinkling. "This is a story of two sisters, close in both age and friendship. Fully grown; younger than you are now, but years older than when you were discovered on that Outer Rim planet of yours."

He coughed, thumping on his rattling chest. Not for the first time, I wondered at just how healthy he was. "The eldest married a Jedi Knight, as it happens; perhaps the last marriage the Order didn't outright forbid, even if enough disapproving eyes were cast their way. Well, the husband died young, and the spark of the Force awoke in his widow. Bright and unexpected. Normally the Order wouldn't allow training at such an advanced age; but, eh. Things were messy, what with Kun running around like a mad rancor. More than that, though- she'd attracted the eye of a Master who was used to thwarting the will of the High Council." He turned a beady eye on me. "She's long gone now, but a powerful Jedi of the Light she became. Many would argue she out-stripped her husband."

He trailed off into silence, a thoughtful look in his dark eyes. There was a ring of truth to his words, and I wondered if he'd known the woman personally.

"And the younger sister?" I prompted.

"Oh! Well she, too, had her own adventures. Maybe a year after her brother-in-law's death, she encountered a Jedi Padawan. A rather flamboyant fellow, more interested in skirmishes around the Ukatis system than actually furthering his own training. Their courtship is another tale, but suffice to say that her new paramour discovered the Force sang brightly in her, just like her elder sister."

Jolee skidded off into silence once more, staring into space.

"So, what happened?" Mission demanded. "Did she get training too?"

Jolee harrumphed, his gaze roving over Mission before snapping back to me. "Not exactly. She didn't have the backing of a Master but, instead, a rogue Padawan who was seen as less-than-reliable. Still, he knew enough to understand she needed mentoring beyond his abilities. So he took her case to the High Council." Jolee shrugged, as if unconcerned, but there was a very real bitterness clouding his eyes. "They refused. Too old, they said. Too risky she would take the wrong path. Too much in love with one who spent his life involved in non-Jedi matters, despite the brown of his robes." He sighed. "So, the foolish young man did the only thing he could think of: he trained her himself."

He was still staring at me, face sagging with the heaviness of age. I felt the shiver of certainty, then, that the young man had been him.

"The power of Exar Kun grew," Jolee said softly. "And his teachings and promises of strength were beguiling, particularly to those still struggling with the ways of the Force. The woman became convinced that his path was the one to follow, and tried to persuade her new husband. They disagreed. They fought. She lost, but the man could not bring himself to cut her down."

He sighed, a hollow sound that echoed. "So, she left and followed Kun, and killed many under his lead. The Order used her name as a warning, as to what happens to those trained late in their life—all the while conveniently ignoring the very example of her older sister who became one of the greatest heroes in the fight against Kun."

"It was you," I murmured. "You were married."

"Do you know of another way to get a wife?" Jolee raised an eyebrow at me, a bushy white line of hair that contrasted with the leathery darkness of his skin. His eyes were once more twinkling with mirth, but there was an underlying seriousness in their depths. "Odds are just that, Revan. You've played them all your life, and you've beaten them many a time. You start blaming your age for your fall, or waffling on about inevitability, and all you're really doing is shirking responsibility."

He shrugged, pausing to take a sip of his caffa. "That doesn't strike me as the sort of thing you'd normally do."

No. It wasn't. But while I might scoff at the Jedi Order, they wouldn't implement rules with no rationale. No matter how misguided they were, the Jedi would have justification, of a sort, regarding their reasoning behind age.

_Had it upset me in the past? Being such a striking exception, having the odds stacked against me, wondering if some people were just waiting for me to fall? Us. For us to fall. But, surely, Malak and I weren't the only ones admitted past the customary cut-off?_

One only had to hark back one generation further to see the exception of Jolee's wife and her sister, to know that I hadn't been _that_ unusual— at least in age.

_It's the legacy from Exar Kun, my mind whispered. The Order grew cautious. The Order grew afraid._ It was the same reason, I speculated, for their reluctance to join the Mandalorian Wars—even when the Republic all but begged for their aid.

_It was fear of the Dark Side once more rotting their ranks. So they held back. And, instead, I happened._

The fallout from Exar Kun had blinded them to what should be a universal truth, particularly for Jedi: fear should not be allowed to influence one's decisions, whether it culminated in action or inaction.

Jolee still had a vaguely unimpressed look on his face, and I couldn't help but imagine the conversations he would've had with the Jedi Masters, once upon a time. _He'd add a unique perspective if he ever decided to return to the Order._

Well. That was a conversation I wasn't going to touch. I'd leave that sort of thing to Juhani.

I felt a nudge from the side and turned to see Mission, smiling tremulously at me. "It'll be okay, Jen. You'll see."

I smiled back, feeling my expression soften. Mission's faith, at times, seemed almost unconditional. And when I thought of the others who followed me, here onboard this very freighter; others whose loyalty and affection I had somehow acquired along the way...

I'd had this before. The few memories were visceral and intense, and the remembered emotion burned.

I'd had this before, and damned it to the Dark Side.

No… A negative, a disagreement, somewhere from an ancient crease in my mind. Not damned… I sacrificed it.

I blinked, my thoughts inverting in on themselves, my consciousness scrabbling desperately to follow that loose thread of thought. Sacrificed? For… for what? For a purpose?

Purpose… there'd been that thought earlier, like there was something just beneath the veil of forgotten memory, some reason… a calculated gamble that, for once, didn't pay off-

Something beyond the Mandalorian Wars, beyond the invasion of the Republic, beyond everything I knew so far regarding my infamous life...

But the train of thought eluded me, a neuron sparking away on a switchboard until it died out from existence.

Jolee said I played the odds and beat them often. But what if, when it really counted, I lost?

What if I'd had a reason to step into the Dark, even understanding the risks, but hoping my drive and strength could see it through before everything collapsed in the worst possible way?

Arrogance. Overconfidence. Recklessness. No one can control the Dark Side. Not even me.

I shivered. But, really, how was my fall different than any other? Some Force-users turned due to emotion, some tempted by a lust for power… stars, Bastila had had a moment where she thought we could control it, back in our zenith of madness- that we could leash the Force and own it, all we needed was a little more strength-

Mission nudged me again, shattering my contemplation like a thousand shards of ferracrystal.

"We're all family here, y'know?" she murmured, her eyes shining. "You go take out Darth Poodoo, and we'll have your back."

The words completely broke my internal reverie, and I couldn't hold back a snicker. With a wrench of mental fortitude, I let the turbulent contemplation go, and it faded into a stream of nothingness as I grinned warmly back at my young friend.

xXx

"We'll exit on the far side of the unknown planet," Carth said, staring blankly through the cockpit window. His voice was terse; impersonal. It wasn't long until hyperspace exit, and here we were, making a mockery of playing at pilot and co-pilot. "Out of sight from the Star Forge."

I cleared my throat. "So if things are too hot, our back-out plan is to retreat into hyperspace? Back to Yavin?"
"Yes. We don't have a closer set of safe coordinates, not here in the Unknown Regions."

We dwindled into silence. It was the first time we'd been alone since that interrupted conversation back on Yavin Station. I had… nothing to say to him, really. Nothing I could say.

Sorry? Sorry for everything? For your wife, your planet, your Republic?

It was ridiculous. And all I wanted, really, was to rest my head against his chest and forget it all.

"Have you comm'd the brass?" I questioned in a low voice. Real-time communication through hyperspace was unreliable; but I'd expected him to have sent a delayed message, at the least.

"Yes."

I shot him a look; he hadn't shaved for days, and was now sporting a permacrete stubble that rather suited him. A muscle twitched in his jaw as he continued facing away, not elaborating on his answer one iota.

Not that I could blame him.

I'd left most of the others back in the common room. Mission had, somewhat sulkily, changed back into Calo Nord's old exoskeleton at Zaalbar's insistence, before belting herself into one of the plimfoam benches. Dustil was at her side, shooting me a wary look as I walked past in the direction of the cockpit.

Part of me had expected him to follow, visible or otherwise. Part of me would've been glad for the additional company to break up the tension that sat so thick in the air.

"Will you, uh, contact Bastila?" Carth asked. He sounded awkward. He sounded like his son.

"Only if I have to," I muttered. "She's- she's not doing so well."

"Oh."

The tone of his voice made me think he wanted more: more detail, more information on our crew-mate and what she was dealing with. But I couldn't- I'd answer him if he asked directly, but I didn't want to. There was a dark gnawing at my soul whenever I thought on her; I knew what was happening – not just whatever unpleasantness she was enduring, but the breaking of her spirit – and the thought of my role in that broke something inside of me, too.

I only had to look at Yudan to be reminded of what happened to those close to me. The Dark Side. To think of it encompassing Bastila Shan….

"Who's on the turrets with Ordo?" Carth asked. He leamed forward, as if he meant to turn on the comm and find out for himself.

"Yudan." I hadn't spoken with him since our altercation earlier, but I'd heard Canderous more or less order him into the turret room. To my surprise, Yudan had acquiesced without comment.

Yudan told me he respected Canderous, back on the Leviathan. And Jolee is right. It's none of my business. For better or worse, Yudan was part of our crew, now. I had to step aside and let the others judge him on their own terms.

Carth was still staring away from me, but I caught his eyes narrowing. A certain frigidity crisped the air. "You trust him?" he bit out.
Yes. No. Sun and stars, I don't have a frelling clue. "Not sure I can pass judgement."

I doubted that answer would appease Carth, but it silenced him nonetheless. And I, once more, cursed the awkwardness that sat between us. I found I'd rather have him raging at me, cursing me to the Outer Rim and back rather than this damned, damned awkwardness.

I stared down at my fingers, clenched tight into uncomfortable fists, the skin pulling taut against my maimed off-hand. I suddenly felt flushed; black spots speckled the edges of my vision before driving inward, and I wondered fruitlessly if I'd ever been forced into such a clumsy conversation with a lover before.

It was only when the vertigo punched me in the stomach that I recognized the all-too-familiar encroachment of tunnel vision.

...

The silence between the two of us was thick with awkwardness.

This is ridiculous, I seethed internally, glaring at Mal as he lifted a spoonful of synthetized mush that posed as breakfast into his mouth. He deliberately did not look my way.

Like he had nothing to say to me. Like we were nothing to each other.

And as I sat across from him in the Temple mess, feeling ungainly and irritated and hurt, the sharp thought suddenly sparked through my mind: Sod this.

My chair scraped loudly against the ferracrete flooring; a discordant sound breaking through the gentle silence of Padawans eating and greeting and harmonizing with the galaxy or some rot. I stood, the brown robes that still smelled new chafing against my shoulder blades as I did so.

We'd always been a team, Mal and I. We'd always had each other's backs. And now that our lives were better, safer, greater- he'd decided it was time to stop trusting me. I still missed Staria, and Jonohl, and Ness- stars, it hadn't even been that long since old man Freeflight had died- I'd only been on frelling Coruscant for a handful of months and my heart still yearned for those we'd loved back on Talshion-

Sod this. I glared down at his averted face with mounting anger.

"You know what, Mal?" I said, keeping my voice quiet and, hopefully, not overheard. Last thing I needed was another of Master Karon's lengthy lectures. "Sod this. If you won't talk to me-

Finally, his head jerked up, whiskey-coloured eyes flashing with anger. "I never see you, Revan! If you're not busy with your own Master or someone else's, then you're spending all your spare time with-

"I'm learning, Mal! I'm learning everything I possibly can," I hissed. Our entire lives had been fraught with danger and powerlessness. Balanced on the blade-edge of chance. I hadn't been able to stop Freeflight dying from septa-lung disease- I'd thought of him as old my entire life, but he wasn't, not really, more like middle-aged- he was just blind and broken and homeless like the rest of us. And Mal- he hadn't been able to rescue his own brother from the Enforcers.

I would never be powerless again, never allow injustice to prevail if I could do anything about it.

"Dammit, Revvie, it's not just that, it's-" He halted; and the contained frustration on his face would normally have made me laugh. Usually, I only ticked Malak off when I did something he considered dangerous. This time I didn’t really understand what was going on in that thick, handsome head of his.

He sighed. "Revan. You're in the training chambers all the time. He's- he's into you, alright? It's the only reason I can think of-"

Maybe it was the expression on my face that shut him up. I wasn't sure. But the anger that surged through me was hot, wild, and incredibly non-Jedi like.

I didn't get jealousy. I didn't do jealousy. And I wasn't going to be hemmed into making only friends he approved of-

Back on Talshion, Mal used to get pissy whenever I spent time around Jonohl, too. That's why I never told Mal that Jonohl was my first kiss. For frell's sake, we were supposed to be adults! We were supposed to be Jedi. I felt suddenly, deeply, disappointed with the man I loved with all of my heart.

"You don't trust me," I said quietly. "Never mind that we've been together for years; you actually don't trust me enough to choose my own friends based on my own judgment."

Malak twitched back, his eyes widening in reaction. "That's not it, Revvie, it's because he's-"

"He's into that blonde Knight who hangs around the younglings," I snapped. "He doesn't even like me, Mal, he thinks I'm nothing more than an uneducated street kid that shouldn't've been admitted. I swear he's only spending his time on me because he gets to kick my arse on a regular basis-" I stopped, clenching my teeth, as we glared at each other in silence.

Vaguely, I was aware of that hot-headed Padawan Arran Da'klor listening in unabashedly, and I threw the Zeltron a dirty look. Arran was amusing, but he had absolutely no concept of privacy. He grinned, before jerking his head to the front of the room. My gaze followed.

Icy, disapproving Master Atris was staring at me.

Oh, for frell's sake. Making a scene within the earshot of Atris. I was never going to hear the end of the dangers regarding attachment, now.

"You know what?" I lowered my voice to a soft whisper. "It doesn't matter. Whatever he thinks of me has nothing to do with you or me anyway. I'm using every resource I can to become the best Jedi I can. That's what you should be doing, Mal."

I turned away from him, took one step towards the exit.

"If you think you can get over your trust issues," I said, throwing the words carelessly over my shoulder, "then maybe you should try joining us. You never know, you might actually make a friend."

…

I gasped loudly; someone was roughly shaking my shoulder.

"Revan? Revan, are you alright?"

I blinked, my vision swimming back into focus. Fingers clenching tight in my lap. A beep from the navigational console indicating hyperspace exit within five minutes. Carth's hand, firm on my arm.
"I'm okay," I whispered, even as my voice broke on the words. Mal. My lover, my past, the black hole in my mind. We'd been so young then. He'd been... jealous? I frowned, thoughts darting wildly on the jumble of achromatic recollections as the details dissolved. There'd been a Zeltron, there… Arran. Arran Da'klor. One of the Thirteen I'd led to the Dark Side, before he betrayed me and I killed him. Malak had been jealous... jealous of him, once upon a time?

So strange, to think that once we were teenagers, drunk with the messy emotions of youth. No war hanging over us, no mountain of death or worse...

"Did you… did you remember something?" Carth's voice was low and shaky. "What?"

"Nothing of import," I mumbled, closing my eyes. Obviously Malak had, at some stage, overcome his reservations regarding Arran Da'klor. For the Jedi Thirteen had been, by all accounts, a tight-knit team. Once.

Before… before Malachor. Before everything after Malachor.

I squeezed my eyes tighter. Every remnant that surfaced told me that Malak had been crucial to my life and yet, when I thought of him, all I could feel was guilt. Guilt, and a determination to end things.

The Dark Side corroded all that was between us. There is nothing left. It was a quiet whisper from the broken recesses of my mind, and somehow it had the feeling of unshakeable truth. But could I really count on the past staying buried when I finally faced him?

When fragments emerged showing him as the man he once was, before I led him to ruin?

"Revan. Talk to me."

I glanced up to see Carth, finally, looking at me. He'd withdrawn his hand, but I could no longer see enmity in his expression… just a torn anguish that cut me to the quick.

"It was nothing that could help us here," I said quietly, holding his dark gaze. "Just something… something from much earlier."

His brown eyes roved over my face, his forehead were creased in… in concern? I drew in a shaky breath. I had not expected that.

"I didn't- I didn't stop to think how this must be affecting you," he murmured. His voice was so soft I could barely hear it. "This must be even more of a shock to you… but surely, you must have had some idea, some inkling- you knew who was in your head-"

I couldn't help a snort of derision; from the way his brows slammed down he didn't appreciate it… but I'd never been adept at keeping a personal conversation on a serious tone. "You have no idea the insane theories I tested out," I said, raising a hand to push a wayward curl out of my face. "I think the height of ridiculousness was when I wondered if I'd been one of Bastila's infamous strike team."

Carth blinked at that, before a frown of wariness once more clouded his face. He sighed, his shoulders slumping. "I don't- I can't reconcile you with the women who led the Republic before turning on it… damn it, Revan, I've- I've tried to hate you, for all you've done-"

A discordant beep from the console shattered the spell between us. Carth jerked around, glaring at the nav controls. "Two minutes until hyperspace exit," he muttered, before learning forward to broadcast the same throughout the freighter. He sighed again, pulling back into the pilot's seat, turning away from me. "I guess we both just have to find a way to push forward." His jaw firmed as he stared out at the black of hyperspace. "I'm a soldier, and you're a, a-... Look. We need to focus on the mission. On Malak and the Star Forge. We can, uh... we can talk later, you and I. Just give me some time."

"Okay," I whispered, but I wasn't, not really. We'd be spitting out in the realspace near the Forge any second now, and then what? Off to rush headlong into a confrontation that, even if it ended in success, still wouldn't wipe away my past crimes.

I honestly couldn't see any sort of future between Carth and me, assuming we survived. Even supposing he forgave me, I couldn't see a Republic that would allow my freedom, no matter how this all played out. And Carth... he was a military man. Somehow, I thought he'd be unfulfilled doing anything other than serving the Republic – even if he might've learned to shunt his family to the top of the priority list.

There wasn't a place in his life for the likes of me... and I wouldn't wish my ominous presence on a good man like him anyway. But if on this journey I could regain Carth's respect; and maybe even, one day, his trust; then I'd be satisfied, and would ignore my yearnings for anything more.

The infinite ivory lines of hyperspace snapped into nothingness as Carth expertly launched the ship into realspace. I had one moment to frown at the mass of asteroids in our field of vision before a dozen different warnings clanged from the nav console.

A proximity alarm wailed-

The 'Hawk was wrested sharply to one side as an ominous grating noise echoed from the lower starboard of the ship.

My stomach lurched, my vision darkened-

"Blast!" Carth yelled. "We've hit something!"

Beyond the mass of spinning asteroids, I saw the wink of a blue-green planetoid-

I could feel my heart thumping; each beat a deep thrum of dizzying vertigo-

"Sun and stars! What's happening?" a deeper voice exclaimed.

"Breach in starboard fuel tank," Carth growled, hands flying over the nav console. "There's something scrambling all the sensors and surface controls! Disable them, Revan! I need manual control, now!"

A moment of unreality froze my limbs, congealed my thoughts; and I sat there, passive and useless-

"The ship's not responding properly! I don't know what the frell is going on-"

Blinking lights on the dash, sweat popping out on my neck, images from the past and present overlaying but the edges didn't quite match-

"Blast it, Revan!" Carth cursed, leaning over me to jab at something on the dash. "Snap out of it! I need you, here!"

An astromech's distraught beeping from behind us; Teethree, plugged into the 'Hawk's computer, trying to desperately to override whatever was happening-
"The instruments are all out of whack-"

"It's a scrambler, Mal, you'll have to fly manual-"

"Comm the crew." Carth's voice was terse; experienced and trained for this sort of situation. "I've powered off the sensors, but one of the engines is losing fuel. Brace for emergency landing. I'll aim for a nearby asteroid."

Half the grid of instruments were shut down, now; a patch of darkness on the nav-console. Carth's grip was firm on the manual steering column; his feet and off-hand manually adjusting the thrust in the way a nav-computer normally did. I was slung sideways as the ship canted to the side; Carth veering along the edge of a jagged satellite of space rock almost the length of our ship.

"Focus on the damn ship, Mal. I'll move any rock that gets too close." I gasped, filling myself with the Force as the snub weaved between asteroids. "Keep the stabilizers on max and don't turn the sensors back on-"

"I know how to fly, Revvie!"

He did, but not as well as required for this, not as well as Carth-

Flushes of heat surged along my skin, vision blurred, the cockpit merged into the smaller, elongated tip of a Republic scoutship-

"Comm the crew," Carth demanded again. "Let them know it'll be rough. I've got the rest." His words were low and furious with the tension of the situation, as if he understood his co-pilot was currently dysfunctional, trapped between two time-lines, frozen in memory-

"I can sense the scrambler, Mal, it's coming from the planet." My eyes were squeezed tight, my senses stretching out into the breadth of the galaxy.

If I turned, would I see a hotshot pilot with a heart of gold, or a charismatic warrior who blazed in the Force?

"The planet," I mumbled.

"Scramblers are localized; their radius is never large," Carth muttered, dragging on the manual column to turn the freighter. A larger asteroid was visible some distance in front of us; big enough to land a ship on. "We'll land on that rock, fix the fuel tank breach and fly away from this location. Fly out of the reach of the scrambler."

I was so adept at this, now; drifting out along the fabric of the Force, visualizing celestial bodies whether they be fleets on the battlefront or asteroids in our path. "The signal encompasses the whole damn sector. It's huge-"

"No," I gasped. "It's too powerful, sublights will never get us far enough. You can't get us out of range without jumping into hyperspace-"

"I can't make a hyperjump with the nav computer offline!"

"It's an EMP signal scrambling our sensors, the utility droid can't crack it. Damn it, Rev, I've never done a manual landing, you need to kill the signal-"

"I can't, it's too strong-"
"It's coming from the planet," I mumbled again, half-aware of Carth cursing indistinctly as the freighter canted again. "It's too strong to disable from here."

"Too strong for you?" His voice was coloured with disbelief. "Then I'll just fly out of the planetary ring until the scrambler can't reach us."

"No." I was firm; resolute. I could see the path before us. "The planet. Something's amplifying the signal. We need to counteract it from the surface."

"You can't be suggesting-"

"Fly through the asteroids and land on the damn planet, Mal!" I ordered.

"What?" Carth snapped, and I realized I'd spoken aloud. I turned to face him; he was barely cognizant of me, all attention forward on keeping the 'Hawk from being smeared into space dust along with the rest of the rocks that orbited the planet.

The larger asteroid was close, now. Carth veered hard in an approach vector, shifting auxiliary power to the repulsors as one hand remained steady on the column.

"No," I whispered. "The planet. We have to get to the planet-

"The Hawk's losing fuel," Carth rapped out. "One of the engines will die before I reach atmo. Asteroid's a safer bet."

"Disable the engine connected to the ruptured tank, then. Fly without it. We need to be on the planet."

It was certainty, burning deep in my gut. I was following the same path, this time with a more damaged ship but a more experienced pilot, too-

"Damn it, Revan!"

"Trust me. Please, Carth. You need to trust me."

"The planet's big, Revvie. I can't even get readouts on the atmo."

"Keep going, Mal. Trust me. The source of the scrambler is a Force beacon. We must get there."

A pause, the briefest stutter in time; I could feel the tension burning in Carth.

"I've been here before, flown this path before," I whispered. "There's something on the planet, and we need to get near it."

With a muffled oath, Carth returned power to the sublights, and the 'Hawk reneged from his approach vector, careening back into the planetary ring of asteroids. The g-forces slammed me deep into the co-pilot's chair as Carth spun the ship vertically, skimming past a couple of smaller rocks.

Through the cockpit window, the blue-green planet came once more into view.

"Keep your trajectory shallow, Mal. I need to canvas the planet's surface, find what I'm looking for."

"Enter the stratosphere but let me guide you," I whispered. My eyes fell shut once more. The Force was shaky, but there. I could feel something drawing me in towards the planet, something tempting, something alluring-

"Fifteen degrees to the right. Hold the course steady."

"You want me to fly this damn thing on manual control, leaking fuel and minus an engine, and then not even land at the first opportunity?" He was incredulous. Mistrustful. Angry, even.

"Land. Now." It was a barked order, and I felt the craft respond under his grip.

"Yes," I hissed, pressing one hand tight against my closed eyes. "You can do it, Carth. I need you to. To- to- fly to- somewhere-"

"There's some large structure ahead, Revvie, some sort of pyramid."

"That's it. Get close and find a place to land."

"It's visible from the skies. A pyramid. The source of the scrambler." I sucked in a deep breath as I followed the tantalising beacon of Force power that called to me. I didn't have to open my eyes to know the planet's visage now engulfed the screen of the cockpit.

The ship shuddered as it hit atmo without any automatic readjustment, but it realigned under Carth's control.

I could feel his hesitation once more, rippling around him, tangible on the Force.

"Trust me," I whispered. The source of the signal beckoned to me, further around the curvature of the planet as we descended. Slightly to the left of our current trajectory.

"Please. Follow my direction. Trust me."

Trust me.

xXx

Chapter End Notes

Coming up next: Damage to the Ebon Hawk is canvassed, and Carth takes charge. Thanks to kosiah for the beta.
The thrumming of the repulsorlifts slowly dwindled as I killed all power. Beneath us, I could feel the landing feet of the ‘Hawk slowly settle into the soft beach sand that comprised our makeshift berth. The low warning clang of the fuel tank malfunction echoed throughout the cockpit.

The landing hadn’t been as rough as I’d feared – I’d had plenty of experience bringing in smaller, twitchier snubs minus an engine; and manual docks were simply part of advanced pilot training.

But I’d never done both at the same time.

We’ve landed. We’re in one piece. We can move forward. Adjusting the stabilizers to counteract the disabled engine while simultaneously correcting the flight path in a way that nav-sensors normally calculated had been... a challenge. But launching back into the air wasn’t an option. Not until the leak was patched and the fuel tanks re-levelled so the starboard engine could be brought back online.

Otherwise, the chances of the Ebon Hawk spinning out of control and careening back into the ground before I’d raised her fifty metres were altogether too high.

“Teethree, run a ship-wide diagnostic,” I ordered, leaning forward to do the same myself. The sensors and the surface controls were throwing out garbage results, but the internal ship computer remained unaffected from the scrambling EMP signal. I heard a beep of assent from the astromech.

The console spat out the prelim results; other than the tank rupture, everything looked fine so far. I felt my shoulders sag in relief. A fuel tank breach I can deal with. We can still move forward.

I turned, slowly; finally to look at the woman who was haunting my every thought. Our descent into the planetary atmo had been broken by a series of short, terse commands from her; minor adjustments to our trajectory; and I followed each in silence even as my doubts over both her sanity and the stability of her mind began, once more, to build.

And then, as I canted left in yet another of Revan’s course corrections, I’d spotted the structure. The pyramid. What she claimed was the source of the signal.

What could be the ruin of the Republic Fleet before they even had a chance to assault the Star Forge.

I could have lined the quad lasers up right then and there, had the ship not been so heavily compromised. I’d be able to do it, I knew, even on a manual launch – provided I wasn’t also compensating for a missing engine.

At any rate, it’d taken all I had to land safely. I’d slowly babied the ‘Hawk inland from an aquamarine coastline that glittered through the cockpit window, and finished our descent some distance away on the beginnings of a pristine white-sand beach.

Revan’s eyes were still shut; chest heaving with shallow breaths, sweaty dark curls stuck to the side of her neck. There were bruises of sleeplessness under her eyes, despite the five days in hyperspace that should have given her adequate rest. Her skin was both pale and blotchy.

In short, she was a mess. My heart ached for her.

“Revan,” I whispered, but she didn’t seem to hear.

I was... I was out of my league, here. I’d lived through more hairy experiences that most sents: combat zones, hot extractions, even ground attacks when events had conspired against me. But Revan....

She was slipping away from us. I shouldn’t want her, but I did- and she was slipping away from me, from us all, entangled in the horrors of a past I could neither understand nor forget. What had the damn Jedi been thinking? Letting Revan loose with no idea, no defences, absolutely nothing but a gifted Padawan who had been number one on the Sith’s hit list?

I knew that wasn’t fair. The Endar Spire had been manned by a squad of Jedi Knights under the command of a Master, even if a technicality placed Bastila in command-

And finally, finally, I understood. The strangest demand from the Jedi-controlled mission, to give all authority to Bastila Shan even though that Cerean Master had, in all practicality, been leading it.

In case something happened with Revan. In case she broke free.

I could still, somewhat hazily, recall Revan from the Endar Spire. A quiet scholar who’d voluntarily stayed confined to her bunks. She’d blushed profusely the one time I’d spoken to her but, other than a fleeting irritation, I hadn’t thought of Jen Sahara again until the Endar Spire had been betrayed.

Kylah Aramai. A traitor in the ranks of the Jedi overturned the plans of the Jedi. The absolutely insane plan. What idiotic, stuffed robe came up with the idea of putting Darth Revan on a leash and thought: Hey, you know what? Let’s do that!

Revan had one fist pushed hard against her closed eyes, shaking slightly. The very real cost to her was obvious... she should be the last person I cared about, but I did. Everyone on this ship did. And she was struggling so hard not to be dragged back into the labyrinth of evil most would assume she’d never escaped in the first place.

I couldn’t forget she’d once been a hero. That her zenith had shone as brightly as her nadir had eclipsed everything. That, without her, the Mandalorians would’ve won.

Sometimes it seemed impossible to believe that the sassy, driven woman who’d somehow wormed her way into my heart could be Revan. Darth Revan. Revan Freeflight.

And then I’d consider everything we’d accomplished, every time Revan had blazed a path through seemingly insurmountable odds – sometimes due to nothing more than sheer, raw power – and I could see it. I could see her. The charismatic, resolute leader who’d rallied a generation of Jedi Knights to lead the Republic, before falling into the depths of betrayal and madness.

Now, all I could see was her slowly breaking in front of me.
There was so much at stake. Revan needed something to keep her tethered to the present, to keep her as the Jen I had come to know—even if Jen wasn’t her... I knew Jen wasn’t her... I knew that the woman I cared for was some shade of Revan Freeflight... but I had the horrible feeling we were losing that woman to the worst part of herself.

She needed something to anchor her in the here and now, but I- I had to remain an impersonal colleague. I had to keep the mission on task. How could I bring myself to reach out to her, when faced with the enormity of her past?

And yet... how could I not? When I could see what this was doing to her- and, dammit, despite everything, it still didn’t change how I felt, even though it should-

I gritted my teeth. “Revan,” I said again, more to derail my own spinning thoughts than anything else. “Tell me about this planet. What do you know?”

“Mal and I came here before,” she muttered, her head still bowed. “I don’t recall anything past the landing.”

Mal. Malak. Darth Malak. Something poisonous clenched in my gut. I’d heard the rumours in the Fleet. Sure, there was wild gossip about every rogue Jedi hero who joined the Republic – but that particular one cropped up time and again.

Revan Freeflight and Malak Devari defied their Order in more than one way. Jedi are meant to be unattached. They are meant to love every being equally. They are meant to be emotionless robots.

Lovers or not, there was no denying Revan and Malak had been close. Comrades. The two most influential members in Revan's own Guard. The Supreme Commander and her Second.

The Sith Lord and her Shadow Hand.

How much did Revan remember? How hard would it be for her, at the end of all things, to face Malak once we finally made it to the Star Forge?

She hadn’t even been able to kill Yudan Rosh! He’d faced her twice, now – I didn’t quite understand what had gone down in the Shadowlands, but Revan was missing two fingers because of him. And on the Leviathan – the bastard was standing against her when he’d knocked me out. Maybe he was an ally now – and I had serious misgivings on that one – but she must have had a chance to kill him, and for some reason, hadn’t.

Dustil had attacked her too, first time she met him. And she stopped herself from retaliating. No. I was not going to compare my son to Yudan Rosh. But there was no denying Revan was keen to give others a second chance – and considering her own, I could understand that – but blast, what did that mean if she had to stand against the man who was the most important part of her past?

Revan said she remembered little. Little more than dreams. If that was true, then it might be possible that I remembered more of Malak Devari, and I’d only met the man once.

...“Carth, you made it!” Jordo effused, one hand slapping me companionably on the shoulder. The background hubbub of people chattering and laughing filled the air. It gave the base a festive feel to it I hadn’t seen in years. I couldn’t remember the last time the Fleet had paused to enjoy a social event on this scale. “No Morgana?”
“No, uh, she couldn’t make it,” I said, giving him a quick grin as I canvassed the large hangar with half an eye. They’d relocated the snubs and converted the bay into the venue for this impromptu celebration, assuming correctly that the turnout would be far too much for the event halls that were normally used.

Well. It was the first time the Navy base on Thani had hosted two famous members of Revan’s Guard. Talvon Esan had been here before, of course – for strat meetings, military speeches and, at times, to lead our squadrons off to join the rest of the Fleet. Every Telosian was proud of Talvon Esan – our half-blooded native who was one of the galactic icons of hope and leadership against the Mandalorians.

This time, Talvon had brought Malak Devari with him.

“A shame, that,” Jordo commented, his tone neutral. He knew well that Morgana never visited base. “A shame you missed the speeches too, Carth.”

At my dry look, Jordo gave a chuckle. “It wasn’t that bad. Knight Talvon’s a good speaker, and Knight Malak was even better. Lots of the grunts out here could do with their spirits lifted, and it’s funny how a few words from a robed fella can achieve that.”

I snorted, even as I knew he was correct. Jordo tended to be scathing regarding any sort of pep talk from the higher-ups; the fact he spoke well of this evening’s address meant I’d no doubt missed something rousing. Not that I really cared; I’d had little desire to attend, by myself, and was only putting in an appearance at this late stage because Saul would expect it.

I scanned the hangar. Near the front on a makeshift dais, I could see Saul clothed in full ceremonial dress replete with medals and surrounded by other members of the brass, similarly attired. He was speaking with a tall man in civvies, who looked strangely out of place amongst the admirals and commodores.

Saul took that moment to look over in my direction, his gaze landing on Jordo and me, before turning back to his informally dressed companion.

“Talvon Esan’s left already, sadly enough,” Jordo was saying as I turned back to him. “I was hoping to score a holograph for Kala – you know how much the kids worship him – and you keep forgetting to ask each time Karath introduces you.”

By kids, Jordo was referring to my son as much as his daughter. A subtle way of my friend enquiring as to where the heck Dustil was. I’d waited over an hour at home, wondering if Morgana would return, despite the data-note informing me she’d taken our son out all evening to watch some new flick at the holo-centre across the other side of the city.

Dustil would be gutted if he heard he’d missed out on this. It wasn’t often families were invited to events at base, and even less often we had such famous visitors. I’d accepted Morgana’s indifference to the military years ago – even the whole damn war – but she was wrong about Dustil. He was old enough, now, to come along to things like this; even if she preferred to avoid them herself. I saw him little enough as it was-

“A holograph of Malak would be even better, but the chances of meeting him in person have to be-” Jordo halted half-way through his prattle, his voice changing to slow and wondering. “Or maybe not?”

I looked back into the hangar, to see the crowds of Fleet staff slowly part for Admiral Karath and the tall human he’d been speaking to up on the dais – Malak Devari, I realized with some surprise.
The legendary Jedi Knight was younger than I expected, my age or even a few years under, and he walked with a natural grace and charming smile that made him seem likeable even from a distance.

They were striding towards us.

“Looks like we’re getting an introduction,” Jordo murmured. “That’ll be your doing, Carth.”

I didn’t have a chance to reply; they were almost upon us. I snapped to attention – although technically this was an informal event, the very fact that Saul was dressed in full regs said as much as the flinty steel in his gaze. Saul’s promotion from Rear-Admiral to Admiral had been recent, and that meant other members of the brass were watching him – judging him not only on his own actions, but also those of his underlings.

Events like these always reminded me why I never wanted to climb too high on the ladder of hierarchy – too many undercurrents to navigate. Too many sents to impress, instead of going about the actual business of protecting the Republic.

“At ease, Lieutenant,” Saul said as he neared, before I had a chance to snap out a salute. Saul turned to face Malak Devari, who appeared both relaxed and at ease in his environment.

There was an intensity, though, in the broad planes of the Jedi’s face and in the sharpness of his gaze. Malak Devari had a certain presence that made it impossible to overlook him, despite the casual attire that contrasted so sharply against Saul’s.

Most of the Jedi attached to Republic forces still wore their Order robes, despite their aid being unsanctioned. Maybe it was the symbolism of the Jedi that they valued; in which case it surprised me to see the second most powerful leader of the Republic war effort dressing down at a military event such as this. But then I recalled that Revan Freeflight herself was rumoured to be both lightly armoured and masked during any public address. It made me wonder if the informality of Malak Devari’s attire was some sort of statement against the Jedi High Council that had refused to back them.

“These are my two most skilled fighter pilots,” Saul said to Malak. “I am extremely proud of the entire Telosian division, but these two stand out from the rest. Lieutenant Carth Onasi and Lieutenant Jordo Merrix.”

“It’s nice to meet you, sir,” Jordo said, as the Jedi Knight shook his hand and turned to me with a brief smile.

“Onasi,” Knight Malak said in acknowledgement as our hands clasped in greeting. “I’ve heard that name, I believe?”

“Serroco,” Saul murmured.

“Uh, thank you. And you, too, obviously- I mean.” I felt like kicking myself as I stumbled over the words – it wasn’t like I was awe-struck or anything ridiculous; more that any Force-user inherently put me on edge. There were too many rumours about what they could do: read minds, calm emotions, lift spirits – and that wasn’t even talking about what they unleashed on the battleground.

It was no wonder that Jedi were such inspirational speakers if half of the magical powers attributed to them were true.

A lesser man would’ve been outwardly amused at my social inelegance; Malak merely smiled and gave me an easy nod of acceptance. Despite my wariness of Jedi in general, I found myself liking Malak Devari on first impressions.

“Uh, this might sound a little forward,” Jordo interrupted, sounded sheepish, “but I don’t suppose there’s any chance I could grab a holograph?” He laughed weakly. “It’s just- my daughter’s a huge fan.”

Saul’s face tightened in discomfort and, this time, Malak did look amused.

“Lieutenant,” Saul warned. “This is hardly the-”

“It’s no problem, Saul,” Malak cut in. “If you could do the honours and take a snap?”

“Carth, too,” Jordo added, motioning me forward despite my glare. “He’s got a son.”

Saul sighed; a sharp, angry noise that was meant to be heard.

“Kids are the future, Saul,” Malak said, grinning at the Republic Admiral who had no family outside of the military. “What else are we fighting for, if not for them?”

...

Dustil had loved that holograph, too. A picture of the once-revered Malak Devari, flanked by Jordo and myself, even though my smile was obviously forced. I’d been annoyed at Jordo’s insistence that I be part of snap; at least until much later, when I’d seen the awed pride on my son’s face as he stared down at the signed memento.

I supposed that holograph had burned along with the rest of Telos. And the three men directly responsible for Telos had been there that night: Malak Devari, Saul Karath, and Talvon Esan.

And their leader... She hadn’t been there. As far as I knew, Revan had never landed on Telos, never seen the beauty of my homeworld, before the forces under her command had bombed it into obliteration.

I swallowed, my empathy for Revan’s situation eroding as my own losses reared up yet again. Jen-Revan had been the first woman I’d ever really looked at since Morgana, the one who’d started healing the breaches in my heart, the one who’d found my son-

And isn’t that just the damnedest, darkest irony of all.

A beeping acknowledgment from the astromech brought me back to myself. The console detailed further information from the droid, confirming the preliminary diagnostic.

“Go to the common room, Revan,” I said quietly. “We’ll have to discuss our next steps. I’ll be there in a minute.”

Her head lifted, her gaze finally meeting mine. There was a question, there, that part of me didn’t want to answer.

“I have to comm the Fleet. Let them know to expect the scrambler. Hope they’re not too close behind us.”

And I don’t want you here when I send the message.
She understood, I thought, with the way her eyes darkened, and the sharp nod of her head.

I waited until the hatch had closed behind her before entering the encryption and transmission details, date-stamping the message, and starting the recording.

“This is a P1 message to Admiral Dodonna of the Republic Navy, or any member of the fleet division in her stead.” I leaned forward to stare into the dashboard holo-cam. “This is Captain Onasi. We have exited hyperspace into what the Star Map classified as the Lehon system. Our point of origin was half a million klicks from the dark side of the sole planet, which brought us directly into a planetary ring of asteroids not detailed on the navigational map. We immediately had a collision which caused a fuel tank rupture, but have successfully executed an emergency landing on the planet, and should be able to fix the tank breach within a day or two of labour, depending on the planetary conditions.”

I sighed, leaning back. “The worse news is that there is an EMP signal scrambling all ship sensor controls that neither the nav-computer nor my highly-specced astromech could crack. Manual flight control was the only way to get around it. With the lack of nav-data, I am also unable to send you any meaningful information on the breadth of the asteroid orbits. I have... intelligence from a Force-sensitive crewmate that this signal encompasses the entire sector.” I grimaced. Forn knew about Revan. The actions of the Meridus had made that perfectly clear. “My first priority is to find the source of this signal and destroy it before the Fleet arrives. Fortunately the, uh, same member of my crew is adamant the origins of the scrambler are on this planet. We will make haste to ensure the Fleet can survive any planetary exit. Onasi, out.”

I switched off the signal and leaned forward to send it, with the misgivings heavy in my heart. Most of the Fleet would have picked a similar exit to mine; hidden in the planetary shadow on the far side of the Star Forge, out of sight. It was possible to pull ships out of hyperspace slightly earlier than programmed, and a starship’s hyperdrive had evasion sensors that would automatically readjust to exit next to a celestial object rather than in it – but it wasn’t infallible. There was still an art to hyperjumps, and accidents were as common as asteroids, out there in the galaxy.

The scrambler was worse than any potential collision, though. Although some of the larger destroyers would have more powerful computers than Teethree, the ships themselves were not made for manual control. There was no choice; I had to destroy the signal fast, and to do that, first I had to fix the Ebon Hawk.

I unclipped my harness, stood up, and left the cockpit.

xXx

“...can’t get it out of my head,” Dustil muttered, rubbing hard at his arms. The entire crew had filtered back into the central room of the ‘Hawk, and with nine sentients it was beginning to feel a little crowded. Next mission to save the galaxy, I thought idly, we’d better source a larger freighter.

“It is constant,” Juhani said from her customary place by the wall. She was staring towards the stern of the ship, tawny gaze narrowed, tipped ears laid flat against the side of her head. “A constant call of power.”

Dustil was staring at the same blank patch of durasteel walling.

I scanned the room, and all thoughts of freighter capacity flew from my head as the eeriness of the scene struck me. We had five Force-users onboard the ship and, without exception, they were all looking in exactly the same direction. Like a pack of gazehounds, noses in the air, collectively drawn to the same sight of prey.

“What,” I snapped, “is going on?”

Revan broke first, turning to look at me from her place seated next to Zaalbar. But it was the Mandalorian – with his damn boots up on the table again – who answered first.

“Well,” Canderous drawled, “from what I can tell, you crashed the ship into a space rock before crashing it into a planet. Interesting bit of flying there, Republic.”

Sometimes, I had the strongest urge to punch that smug Mandalorian right in the kisser. I’d had my share of brawls, and while I wasn’t sure I could take him, I knew I’d be able to get a couple of good hits in along the way.

“I challenge you to exit a hyperjump with nav data thirty thousand years old,” I ground out. “There was no sign of planetary belts on those blasted Star Maps. Try doing that and a manual flight pattern because of some damn scrambling signal-”

“Enough,” Revan cut in, her voice terse. “Canderous, I’m sure you know a lesser pilot would’ve crashed. I think I did crash, last time, and we weren’t leaking fuel or minus an engine.” She frowned, leaning forward over the table, one hand rubbing at her temple.

“You flew here last time?” Juhani asked, her attention now trained on Revan. I glanced around and saw both Jolee and Yudan paying attention to the conversation, but my son was still staring at the wall. His head was cocked, mouth slightly ajar, face glazed over like a stim junkie.

“What’s on this planet, Revan?” Canderous asked. “What’s this signal Onasi’s talking about, and how do we get to this Forge of yours?”

“Dustil?” I said sharply.

“It’s a scrambler, I...” Revan trailed off, turning to stare at Dustil. The hairs stood up on my arms. He wasn’t moving; his eyes were unfocused and he wasn’t listening to any of us. He wasn’t hearing us, I realized with a shaft of horror.

“Dustil? Sheesh, snap out of it!” Mission, seated next to him, gave Dustil a nudge.

“Dustil!” Revan snapped, and at the same time a gust of air currents lashed through the room- I had a split-second’s moment of confusion, how the heck could there be wind inside our ship-

Mission squeaked in alarm as Dustil was pushed deep into the plimfoam benches by an unseen force.

“What- what the frakk?” Dustil spluttered, his frozen expression shattering as he turned around to glare at Revan. “What the frakk did you do that for?”

She was staring at him through narrowed eyes. She did that. Broke him free of- of whatever-whatever has all of them so damn entranced-

“There’s some sort of Force beacon on this planet,” Revan said in a tight voice. “It’s controlling the EMP signal, but it’s powered by the Force and we can all feel it. Dustil, apparently, more so than the rest of us.”

“What- what do you mean by that?” Dustil spat, his eyes shooting daggers at her. Mission laid a calming hand on his shoulder, but I could see the belligerence all over his face. Revan was right, though. And worry for my son sat tight in my stomach.

“It is pure Force, being harnessed somewhere nearby,” Yudan spoke up from the far side of the room. He, too, was staring at my son with a look of frowning intensity. “Those more attuned to the Force will feel it strongly. And those with less training will have a greater susceptibility to its call.”

“Both of which apply to you, Dustil,” Revan murmured, her gaze still fixed on him.

For the hundredth time, I found myself wishing that Dustil was normal, that he was just a Force-blind sent that wouldn’t attract the likes of Yudan Rosh, and- and Revan.

_But then he would have died on Telos. He wouldn’t have rescued us on the Leviathan. He wouldn’t be the man I can sometimes see he has the potential to become._

I’d accepted, back on Korriban, that the Force was part of Dustil- which meant it was part of my life, too. I could spend my time wishing futilely that things were different- or I could face up to the hard facts: Dustil was a powerful Force-user with incomplete training from a Sith sociopath.

And now, he was surrounded by powerful Force-users who could teach him a better way. And maybe, just maybe, that also included Revan. I didn’t know.

Dustil was glaring at both Revan and Yudan in turn. “I spent four years training under Jorak Uln and Uthar Wynn!”

“One of whom spent his time resenting the students, and the other pitting them against each other,” Yudan commented in a droll voice.

“I- I-” Dustil’s face was flushed with embarrassment, and I would’ve felt sorry for him if I didn’t feel so damn concerned. There’d been a moment, there, when he hadn’t reacted to Mission’s nudge, that I’d been struck with the horrible notion of him being forever lost to some Force-induced catatonia.

Sometimes, I _really_ hated the blasted Force.

Revan’s expression softened. “I’m not trying to get at you, Dustil. But I’m worried how much a hold on you this Force beacon has.” She raised her gaze to stare at Jolee, who was leaning back against the kitchenette counter. “Can you spend some time with him, Jolee? Get him to guard himself properly?”

I could see Dustil’s jaw set in resentment as he scowled at her. He wasn’t going to budge easily-

“Eh, it’s not a bad idea, lad,” Jolee commented, and Dustil’s brittle gaze shifted to settle on the old man. “She’s right, you know. You _are_ strong in the Force, and that means you’re more open to its dangers.”

“A true Sith seeks power. A Jedi seeks learning. Those who stand in between seek balance,” Yudan Rosh spoke in a low monotone. “You stand to gain a useful skill regardless of your chosen path, Dustil Onasi.”

I _could_ have growled something about his path being obvious- I was _not_ going to stand back and let my son fall back into the clutches of their damn Dark Side – but I saw the considering look Dustil gave that blasted Twi’lek; the slight, imperceptible nod before he slowly got to his feet and followed Jolee out of the room.

Damn it. Dustil had refused to follow Masters from the Jedi Order back on Kashyyyk, but up until this moment I’d thought he detested the likes of Yudan Rosh even more so.

He spent four years in a Sith Academy. Being fed all sorts of propaganda. Of course that part of him is going to listen to Yudan Rosh.

“We should keep an eye on him,” Revan said in a low voice. “At least until we can disable the signal.” She placed her hands on the table like she was about to get up.

“Wait just a minute,” I warned. “No one is leaving this ship until we get a readout on the atmo, and the 'Hawk's sensors are unintelligible. Unless you remember walking about this planet unaided-”

She shook her head, briefly, her green gaze fixed on mine.

“-then we’re going to send Teethree out first, cycle the airlock, and check the breathability of the air. Our first priority is to repair the fuel tank rupture. Then, we’re going to destroy that damn pyramid you Force-users are all so drawn to.”

“Destroy?” Revan said sharply. “I’ve overpowered it before, Carth. It should be easy enough to-”

“You don’t know,” I cut in, folding my arms. “You said yourself you only remember landing. You have no idea what’s in this pyramid, or what it cost you last time. We’re here to put an end to the Star Forge, Revan, and that includes this damn defense that will cripple the Republic Fleet if we don’t take it down.”

I could see the thoughts whirling in her mind as she stared at me in silence. “You plan on using the Ebon Hawk to fire on the pyramid,” she said slowly.

I nodded. “I can do a manual launch if I can re-level the fuel tanks and have all engines running. The turbolasers should be enough to take it out; if not, then there’s always the proton torpedo.”

There was one torpedo, its launch able to be activated from the cockpit. One way or another, I was not going to let history repeat itself. Last time, Revan had come here with Malak and, presumably, disabled that Force-damned scrambler before using it again in the name of the Sith. Not this time. Not on my watch.

I held her gaze as the rest of the crew watched in silence; wondering, maybe, who would win this battle of wills. Revan smiled, slow and sweet, and it transformed her drawn face; reminding me of yet another facet of the woman who still drew me in like a flutter-gnat to a raging inferno.

“You’re right,” she murmured, nodding. “Let’s do this. Your way.”

xXx

“This world is odd,” Canderous said, staring hard into the distance. The beach sand stretched for miles in either direction; a soft, harsh plain of white. From our vantage point next to the hull of the Ebon Hawk, we could spot a couple of broken husks of metal; downed starships some klicks away. “It looks like a battlefield, but the environment is lush and green. This place is strange. I don’t like the lack of life here.”

Of course he doesn’t, I thought sourly. No life means there’s nothing to beat up.

Deeper inland, the vegetation encroached on the sandy ground; thick, green foliage that told of a healthy planet ripe for life. Teethree’s air quality tests had all come back positive for standard sentient life, and yet none of his long range bio-scanners found anything larger than small rodents or sea-birds.

The ‘Hawk was positioned half a klick inland from the edge of a restful ocean. The pyramidal structure was clearly visible a short distance into the bush, but I’d flatly ordered everyone to stay confined within the ship or its perimeter. None of the others had shown any further signs of being drawn in by that damn Force beacon, or whatever it was, but I wasn’t going to take any chances. I couldn’t get the image out of my head, of all five of them – Revan, included – staring blankly in the same direction.

Zaalbar howled something as he backed out from underneath the Ebon Hawk’s hull. I’d taken a look at the damage myself. Our inertial shields had stopped the rent from tearing open further during atmo entry, but it was still sizeable.

“Big Z reckons it’ll take a half a day to smooth over the damage before it can be sealed,” Mission piped up, crawling out behind him. I’d caught the word ‘repair’, but other than that Zaalbar’s native tongue still blurred into a long litany of meaningless rumbles. Even after all this time, my Shyriiwook was dismal at best. “And then we’ll have to source a patch. We off-loaded all our metal scrap back on Yavin, so maybe we can cut something from the inside wall of the cargo bay?”

She wrinkled her nose, pushing up a set of goggles high on her head. The idea of butchering the ‘Hawk didn’t sit well with me either, but speed had to be priority.

Canderous snorted. “Half a dozen downed ships within sight, and you want to go bastardizing our own?”

“We’re not doing any recon, Ordo,” I said warningly. “Only the quickest method to get the ‘Hawk up and running. Then we destroy the pyramid and head to the Star Forge.”

“You make it sound so easy,” Mission commented. “Just fly over and boom. One less Star Forge in the universe.”

Easy. Nothing about any of this has been easy. A chime from my wrist-comm cut off whatever response I might have made, and I frowned down at it. A message from the ‘Hawk’s comm relay: receipt of a delayed transmission. But it wasn’t marked with the standard encryption protocols I’d been using – rather, it was scored directly against the ‘Hawk’s central computer. Any interception of the comm would require advanced hacking techniques to capture it intelligibly; it wasn’t as secure as the military protocols anyone in the Fleet would use, but even those weren’t infallible.

“I’ve a comm,” I muttered. “Zaalbar, get started on smoothing the breach with Teethree. We’ll talk more about the patch material after I’ve viewed this.”

The Wookiee howled an assent, and I began walking back around the freighter’s hull. I wasn’t going to play the message here, but the headers on it had me start in surprise. It was marked as coming from a member of the Jedi Order.

I glanced up as Revan stepped down from the loading ramp. She looked at me, cautious and wary, as if she knew something had just happened.

Is it meant for her? Wouldn’t the Jedi Order expect me to vet it first? Maybe it was for Juhani. Maybe it was some warning about Revan... some message they wanted the rest of the crew to hear.
It doesn’t matter, I thought suddenly. It’s from the Jedi Order... and surely that means Revan has a right to see it. I could go on forever about the crimes of her past, but at the end of it all the Jedi Order had placed her firmly on this path- without her consent.

We stared at each other in silence, and the strands of broken trust between us were almost tangible in the air. Dammit. I couldn’t- I wouldn’t let her go through this any blinder than she already was.

“Revan,” I said in a low voice. “There’s a delayed comm. It’s from- it’s from the Order.”

She blinked, but her face remained impassive.

“Come to the cockpit. We may as well see it together.”

I heard the quietest of sighs, but otherwise she followed me in complete silence as we traipsed back through the ‘Hawk. Juhani gave us a curious look as we passed her in the common room, but Revan didn’t say a word until we made it to the communications array.

I slid into the pilot’s bucket seat, and motioned for her to sit as well.

Revan shook her head. Her lips had thinned and her shoulders tensed, as if she was bracing herself for what was to come. “Just play it, Carth.”

I leaned forward, and accepted the transmission.

A holo-picture of two Jedi Masters winked into life above the vid-stand. One was a scowling male Human, and the other a green alien less than half his height. I recognized both of them immediately.

::This is a message for Revan Freeflight.: The Human looked grim, his jaw set as if he’d swallowed something unpleasant. ::We are on our way with the Republic Fleet to assist on your assault of the Star Forge. To make sure the right thing happens this time.:.

“Who is he?” Revan whispered, frowning, as she stared at the hologram. “Should I know him?”

“Vrook Lamar,” I said tersely. It hadn’t been that long ago since I’d last spoken with the man, and he appeared even more ill-tempered this time. “The short green one is Vandar Tokare.”

::To the Force, you must listen.: Vandar added, leaning in from the side. ::Clear your mind. Let emotion blind you not. We remember the Jedi Knight you once were. Still there, she is. I have faith that she is.:.

I felt Revan shiver next to me, and couldn’t help but turn to look upon her. Her green gaze glistened and her face was etched with pain.

“I don’t know them,” she whispered brokenly. “Shouldn’t their faces mean something to me?”

“Do not forget all that Bastila has sacrificed for you.: Vrook cut in, his voice harsh with pain. I understood his grief, but I damned him for it anyway. One master counselled rising above emotion, where the other had it written all over his face. ::She is now in Malak’s clutches because of her mercy toward you. You cannot forget what you owe her.:.

There was a hiss of anger from Revan, and the torn look on her face morphed in anger. “As if I could,” she muttered.

“Revan,” I whispered, as Vandar started saying something about the will of the Force.
“What?” she snapped, and then very deliberately turned her back on the delayed holo-message to glare at me. “What the frell is the point of this? To make me feel worse? I don’t even recognize those damn Masters!”

I leaned forward to cut the transmission. I could always replay it later. Maybe Vandar meant it as a bolstering talk, but he would have done a damn sight better keeping Vrook out of it.

“Vrook Lamar is Bastila’s Master,” I said haltingly. “I guess that’s why he’s a bit—”

“Upset?” she all but snarled. “Dammit, Carth, I’ve been living with this since the day Kylah Aramai took her!”

The pain broke in her voice, and I leaned forward to clasp her hand. She jerked back, stepping away from me.

“Revan—”

“No. No, I can’t, Carth, I— damn them! They were on Kashyyyk, you know?” she demanded, her eyes blazing with emotion. “Zhar herded me down to the Shadowlands before they came close, because he didn’t trust what they would do to me! What the frell does that tell you about the Order?”

That they’re divided. That the Jedi Order is divided over you.

She grimaced before looking down. “I had two Masters on my side, Carth, and they’re both dead now. I’m not going to sit and listen to those robes who were a part of- look, I get why they did what they did, but forgiveness is a whole other skillet of scalefish.” She laughed bitterly, and took another step backwards. “I’m sure you understand that. I’m going to end this, one way or another, alone if I have to. I refuse to listen to anymore—”

“You’re not alone!” I cut in sharply. “Blast it, Revan, you’re not alone.”

“Aren’t I?” she whispered, eyes glittering, and I knew she wasn’t talking about the rest of the crew. My breath hitched in my throat and my heart stuttered. She stood in front of me, brittle and flawed and yet somehow still blazing with conviction, despite all of the pain and horror she had both suffered and perpetuated.

I was silent too long. Revan took another step back, one hand fumbling for the hatch control. “Listen to the rest of the message if you want, Carth. I’m sure you can fill me in on anything relevant.”

She spun on her heel and left me.

“Sithspit!” I swore, slamming my hand against the dash, and damning myself for being a fool. Whether it was for reaching out or not reaching out far enough, I didn’t know.

xXx

There was nothing of real import in the remainder of the transmission. Vrook seemed to think that guilt was the key to motivating Revan, which just showed the damn Master knew nothing about her at all. Even I could tell that Revan had been crucifying herself, rightly or wrongly, ever since she’d found out the truth. The only reaction Vrook Lamar elicited in her was anger.

Vandar’s calming messages about the Force would have meant more to a Force-user than a soldier like me, but I wasn’t going to ask Revan to sit through that again.
I sighed heavily as I once more left the ‘Hawk.

Other than Dustil and Jolee, all of the others were gathered outside. Canderous was at the base of the loading ramp, surrounded by discarded pieces of an armour suit he’d obviously hidden from my purge of the Ebon Hawk’s stores. He was busy wrestling with an armoured glove as I stepped next to him and paused, staring at the others standing some metres in front of me.

Revan was saying something to Yudan, her words inaudible from this distance. The Twi’lek’s expression was set, almost hostile, as Revan offered something cylindrical from one outraised limb.

The alien sun glinted from what I immediately recognized as a lightsaber hilt.

Alarm shot through me. She wasn’t- she couldn’t seriously be thinking about arming him? It was one thing to bring a dangerous war criminal into the midst of our crew, but to hand him a damn lightsaber before we’d even reached Malak-

Yudan Rosh leaned forward and plucked the hilt swiftly from her grasp.

It was only when it ignited a blinding white in his grasp that I recognized it for what it was: one of the training lightsabers Revan used so frequently in the garage.

Behind them, Juhani activated an identical weapon, and stepped up to face Revan. I saw the quick grin on Revan’s face, the first flash of delight I’d seen in what felt like forever, and my chest tightened. I wanted... I wanted to see that carefree joy more, I realized, despite everything. I wanted it to be less forced- I wanted her to be happy, even while part of me railed that she, of all sents, didn’t deserve it.

Canderous stopped what he was doing to watch, as Juhani and Yudan both advanced. Revan held an answering blade of white, and suddenly surged to the left, striking low at Juhani’s legs as Yudan shot forward to intercept her.

The lightsabers sparked as they crashed together. Revan launched forward with an aggressive lunge at Yudan that he swiftly parried before counter-attacking.

Canderous grunted from beside me. “You’re not man enough for her, Republic.”

I shot him an incredulous look. “What?” I snapped, gesturing over to the trio, who were moving too fast to keep a fix on. “And you are?”

Ordo had always had a ridiculously high opinion of himself, but surely he didn’t believe he could hold his own against them.

He snorted in derision. “I’m not talking about combat, di’kut.”

I could feel my jaw tightening. Revan and I were none of his damn business, and the last thing I was going to listen to was any sort of insult from a damn Mandalorian. I glared at him, and his ugly face stared back at me uncompromisingly.

“Combat ain’t everything. Not even to a Mando’ade. Not when it comes to your clan. Your woman.” Canderous jerked his chin to point to the ongoing spar. “Malak was her equal, out there. And still he failed her. Revan doesn’t need an equal on the battlefield, she needs someone to fight her demons with her. And I ain’t talking about the ones she meets on the end of her lightsaber.”

He turned his head to the side and spat. “Bah,” he added, his voice scathing. "You don’t deserve
The anger was there, simmering hot and heavy in my gut, and suddenly everything snapped. The grief over Morgana and my lost life that had once more been dragged to the surface with Revan’s reincarnation, my torn thoughts over Revan herself, my worry for Dustil-

And that damn Mandalorian, staring at me with a derisive sneer, because of course to him it would be nothing to jump straight back into bed with a woman who’d once destroyed millions of lives including his own-

For once I allowed my anger to find an outlet. It found it as my fist crashed into his jaw.

His knees buckled; with satisfaction, I saw a brief moment of confusion in his eyes as he realized he was kneeling in the sand.

He roared a second later, surging angrily to his feet. I felt my second blow to his jaw reverberate through my forearm as he collapsed to the ground once more.

I kept my guard up, waiting, the red-mist burning hot in my tensed muscles. Damn that bastard if he thought I was going to take any more of his crap-

Canderous rose from the ground once more but, this time, thrusting forward with a stiff left jab that thudded into my guard, and robbed me of my opportunity to land a third punch on his damned smug face.

I realized it was all on now, as he moved forward with another straight jab that I caught on my forearms. And another; that grazed my cheek as it partially penetrated my upraised fists.

He was bigger than me. Taller, with a longer reach. And I knew that standing on the end of his jab was a bad place to be.

The next time he threw; I ducked forward, underneath, and hurled my most powerful overhand right.

He raised his lead arm, and my blow thudded harmlessly into his upper arm and shoulder.

Blast it! I’ve got to try that again-

Another straight jab from him that I ducked, again countering with a power punch that he shouldered.

This was working. The next time I’d have him. The next time my counterpunch would be faster, more direct. I’d land before he could raise his shoulder to deflect my blow...

He moved forward to jab, and once more I slipped it-

-but it wasn’t a jab. I ducked forward straight into his left hook.

His right followed with speed, smashing into my teeth.

There was a moment where, stunned, I felt the ripples of pain explode through my mouth, and then Canderous charged with a wild yell.

His shoulder slammed deep into my gut, tackling me to the sand. Landing hard on my back, a second later his fist sunk deep into the side of my ribs.
The air escaped my lungs in a winded gasp.

And he was... the bastard was laughing!

“Didn’t think you had it in you, Onasi,” Canderous wheezed, rolling off me. The adrenaline, the urge to rise up and challenge him again was still there, and yet he seemed totally unconcerned as he lurched to his feet.

Canderous laughed again. “Hah. You should do that more often, Republic. Release some tension since you’re not getting laid.” He was grinning madly above me, blood trickling down from a cut on his cheek. My head was thumping, my vision blurred, and a dull ache thumped in the centre of my gut. “D’ya feel better now?”

Despite it all, I laughed. Mandalorians. It all boils down to sex and fighting with that lot. And yet, surprisingly, I did feel better – aches and pains be damned.

A calloused hand swam into view; I blinked, and realized Canderous was offering me a lift up. With a grunt, I took it.

“You start the prelim work on the repair job,” he said, dragging me up to my feet roughly. His gaze sharpened as he turned to look back at the ‘Hawk. “I’m gonna go see if I can score a hull patch from the nearest wreck. I reckon I’ll be back before you smooth the edges of the breach, and then we don’t have to cut into our own damn ship.”

I stared hard at the seasoned veteran; one eye was puffy, and I couldn’t help a sense of satisfaction at that, even though I knew I likely looked just as bad. He was waiting for my reply and part of me thought I could refuse him – Canderous didn’t follow me, but he answered to Revan, and she had more or less ceded leadership.

For now. Somehow, I didn’t expect it would last long. Somehow, I didn’t think it should.

I nodded in assent. I didn’t need the assistance of Canderous to continue with the repair and, if he came back with suitable material before we required it, then all the better. I could see the sense in his plan.

“Just take a wrist-comm, alright?”

He gave me a dry look I probably deserved. Back on Kashyyyk, Ordo had been the only one who kept in reliable contact. “I ain’t the one who needs to be told that,” he said gruffly, before turning back to his pile of armour.

I glanced over to the others. Revan and Juhani were both staring at us, shocked and somewhat appalled in the Cathar’s case, lightsabers extinguished like they’d been on the cusp of intervening.

I was glad they’d stayed the heck out of it.

A look of exasperation crossed Revan’s face as she thumbed her ‘saber back on and turned to face Yudan. And as she raised her weapon once more in a guarded position, I took the moment to view her as the woman she now was. Not the villain who made the Republic tremble, nor the charismatic hero the galaxy had adored.

Instead, the flawed, beautiful warrior who kept fighting despite every stumble along the way.

All I could remember, right then, was vowing to protect her back on Korriban when she’d lost control. Protect her from herself, if need be. Being there for her, an anchor of the present, to help chase away the nightmares of the dark.

I didn’t know how much help a simple man like myself could be against all that she grappled with, but suddenly, all that seemed important was that I try.

xXx

Chapter End Notes

Coming up next: The sparring continues, and Juhani has another talk with Yudan. Thanks to kosiah for the beta.
I sailed backwards, landing on the soft sand in an ungainly heap. With a wrench of lightning-quick Force, I was back on my feet, hand outstretched, calling the training lightsaber back to my grasp.

Metres in front of me, Revan and Yudan slowly circled one another, all but oblivious to my recovered presence.

They were both suffering from temporary limitations: Yudan's speed and stamina were compromised due to his recovery, and Revan was still adjusting to wielding just the one lightsaber. As I watched Yudan launch into another flurry of offensive moves, it became obvious they were an even match. I suspected the same would hold true once they were both on form.

With a note of chagrin, I ruefully accepted I was their inferior.

The balance changed when I flanked the Dark Jedi and we simultaneously challenged Revan. Her limits were tested, she retreated into defensiveness and, as a result, innately leaned harder on the Force – be it to enhance her speed or strength or push away a foe.

When that happened, she truly became a creature of magnificence.

I took a moment to breathe, feeling the grittiness of the sand trickling down my tunic, catching on the sweat and fur along my neck. There was a mild burn there that stung, a place where Revan had caught me directly on the back.

The daylight was starting to dim, now. I did not know how long a solar cycle was on this strange world, but it had been high noon when we had first landed, and now the sun was winking out of sight above the forest line.

If I cocked my head and listened, I could hear the trill of alien birdsong deeper in the vegetation, alongside the rustle of small tree-dwellers. Louder still was the shearing sound of a fusion-grinder beneath the Ebon Hawk, as Zaalbar, Mission and Carth continued their work. Artificial lighting spilled out from under the freighter as the repairs stretched into the onset of evening.

The sound of the footsteps meandering down the loading ramp had me turning to see Jolee Bindo approach.

"They still at it, huh?" Jolee said as he traipsed toward me. "How's the ship coming along?"

I looked beyond the old Human, deeper into the open hatch, but no one was following him outside.

"Canderous departed a few hours ago to see what he could salvage from the closest wreck," I replied. "I do not know the progress of the reconstruction. Where is Dustil?"

"Eh, he wanted to stay on the ship." Jolee shrugged, but his gaze was sharp as it landed on the others. I wondered whether he was judging their skill; truly, I considered myself a more than adept duellist, but I was not their equal.

Yet, not long ago, I had been a match for Revan.

Her progress was astonishing. I wondered how much of it was her past reclaiming her, and I worried over the implications. While my faith that she would stay true to us remained steadfast, I could still see that her broken history was damaging her soul, and my own ached in empathy.

How Yudan Rosh's presence would affect her I could not predict. He had grossly offended me earlier with his callousness and utter disregard for personal boundaries. Even the general aloofness of his character was discordant, and did not invite a good opinion.

But Yudan meant something to Revan. And every sentient deserved a chance to change things for the better. I could only hope that Yudan truly desired to, and that Revan's trust in him was justified.

"Do you have any thoughts regarding what this Force beacon could be?" I asked quietly. Behind me, there was an absence of sound, indicating the attention of the others had been caught.

Jolee shrugged again. "No more than you. Pure power like that is enough to catch any Force-user's interest, and there's a fair dollop of it being channelled on this planet."

"It's being used to amplify the EMP scrambler. The signal's being pushed out through the entire sector." Revan's voice wafted through the cooling air. It was still warm, but the ambient temperature had started to fall once the sunlight had disappeared.

In all, this seemed a pleasant world with all the required markers for sentient life. The mere fact that a construction of the Star Forge was here meant that it had been inhabited at one point. And yet, the bio-scanners of the astromech had picked up nothing of import. No sizeable life within range, be it on land or sea. No large predators or herbivores, no sign of civilization.

That struck me as odd.

I turned to survey Revan as she padded closer. Her breathing was shallow and fast, and her green eyes glittered. She looked alive, confident, and more at ease than I had seen her for some time.

I understood that. I had always felt both more relaxed and focused after immersing myself in combat forms and training regimes, rather than the meditation other Jedi turned to.

"We know the Star Forge is a ship factory, so I guess there's technology on their craft that decodes the signal and stops it affecting their own fleet," Revan added, drawing close to me. There was a burn of red alongside her neck; the mark of a direct hit that would have been a deathblow with anything other than a training 'saber.

"Huh. I wonder if there's some other purpose," Jolee mused, peering toward the jungle. From here, we could still see the top of the pyramid jutting above the tree-line. It was only a short distance into the forestation. "It's an awful lot of Force power."

"And the scrambler's an awfully good defense," Revan shot back in a dry voice. "Any starship exiting hyperspace within range is immediately compromised. I doubt it's the only defense of the Star Forge, but it's a damn good preliminary one."

"Where's the boy?" Yudan drawled as he neared. The lightsaber in his grasp hissed as he deactivated it.
Revan's gaze had sharpened on Jolee. "Do you think it's wise, leaving him-"

"Eh, quit worrying, the lot of you," Jolee grumbled. "If you don't give the lad some space, then the first opportunity he gets he really will sneak out. He said he'd stay on the ship. Let's give him a chance, huh?"

Revan's lips were twitching. "A chance. Sure." Her gaze had travelled behind Jolee to the open hatch. I stretched the Force out, focused it directly on the entranceway of the Ebon Hawk, but I could not sense anything out of the norm, no indicator to show me-

"That is so annoying," Dustil snapped, abruptly appearing at the top of the ramp, his arms folded and his face twisted with belligerence.

Beside me, Jolee grunted in surprise. "You heard about such a thing as trust, boy?" he demanded.

Dustil gave an abrupt shrug. "I'm at the top of the ramp. That's still the ship."

"How did you pick up on him?" Yudan asked Revan. As always, his tone was flat and remote... but he would not have asked if he was not curious. I wondered, then, how much of the disagreeable Twi'lek's indifference was no more than a front.

"A null patch of Force," Revan murmured, the amusement still clearly evident in her voice as she gazed upon the irate teenager. "Dustil's repelling the Force away to hide his psychic signature, and it feels like the absence of any life or Force. In reality, it's just a mirror." Revan shrugged. "I haven't quite worked out the invisibility part yet."

"I could not sense anything at all," I said.

"Huh," Jolee was frowning, one hand scratching at his hairless head. "Do that trick again, lad, if you don't mind?"

There was a truculent contentiousness on Dustil's face, as if he despised this sort of show-and-tell. I could recall Dustil showcasing it once before, enroute to Kashyyyk. He had not seemed particularly willing then, either.

Dustil's hostile gaze moved past Revan before landing on Yudan. Something in the young man's expression eased, even as his shoulders bunched in discomfort.

"Fine," he muttered, scowling, and then vanished once more.

Jolee shifted on his feet, his bushy brows creasing. "I'm not picking up on anything," he grumbled, glaring at the ramp. "And I'm used to relying on my senses. You sure you can sense the lad?"

I cleared my throat, attracting Revan's attention. "I do not understand what you mean with an absence of life," I said to her. "I can sense the Force within sentients, even within trees and plants. But Revan- you speak as if the air itself has life, that you then notice the lack thereof when Dustil shields himself so."

"Well, the air does have life," Revan said. Her gaze was tracking seemingly nothing, moving to the base of the loading ramp. "Doesn't it?"

The soft pad of a footstep caught my ear, a brief whiff of Human youngling. Nothing apparent with eyesight nor Force. My senses, disagreeing with one another- still, it was something to know that at least the young Onasi could not conceal his sound or scent on top of his other talents.
“I don’t sense him either,” Yudan said, shrugging in apparent nonchalance. “Your definition suggests one has to be able to sense the smallest amount of life. Intricacies like that were always one of your strengths, Revan. It is not surprising that you are the one to notice him.”

"It's not that special," Dustil snapped, appearing next to Jolee with a sudden movement that had the old man start in surprise a second time. "It's not like she's the only one, either. Mekel has no problem picking up on me."

"Mekel." Revan's eyes narrowed as she stared at Dustil. "That friend of yours... he's- is he normally so open in the Force?"

I frowned. That ill-mannered Human had chanced across us on Yavin Station with his mistress, but I had seen more of him on Korriban. Back in Tulak Hord's tomb, when that maddened, blinded Sith Master had captured him and Revan and almost killed them both-

"What?" Dustil blinked, wavering somewhere between confusion and outrage. "What the frakk do you mean by that?"

Revan shifted, tossing the training hilt from one hand to the other. She looked vaguely uncomfortable. "His emotions. His feelings, I guess. They just seemed very-" She paused. "Loud."

Yudan was staring at Revan in open curiosity now. I could smell it on the stagnant air. He caught my glance on him and his expression shuttered back into indifference, but his scent remained the same. I understood, then, that no matter his outward insouciance and detachment, Yudan Rosh remained intensely interested in Revan.

Dustil's eyes had narrowed in return, and his voice iced over. "I have no idea what you're talking about."

"He didn't seem anything out of the ordinary to me, young pup," Jolee Bindo added, raising a brow. "Rude and potty-mouthed, maybe, but otherwise just your average Sithling runaway."

Revan looked slightly puzzled, running her free hand through her hair, as if her thoughts had been misguided. I did not quite know what she referred to, myself. The Human Mekel had seemed no more than an average Force-user riddled with anger and more than his fair share of curse words.

Revan shrugged in apparent dismissal, and glanced back to Yudan with a slight smile. "We still have an hour of light left, I reckon. You done for the day?"

"Hardly." The Twi'lek lit his weapon once again, a droll look on his face. "Although I do think the Cathar should join us once again, and this time you should refrain from overtly utilizing the Force, Revan."

Her grin widened as she lunged forward in a lazy swipe which Yudan knocked aside with ease. "Surely one should use all resources at hand."

"That depends if you wish to practise combat forms or Force powers," Yudan shot back, darting to the side before swinging forward in a sweeping hit that Revan caught on her blade. I was about to walk up and flank the Twi'lek, but something changed in Revan's expression that halted my movement.

Startlement, chasing through her hairless Human face, evident even through the white cross of the training lightsabers.

"Blue," she whispered, blinking, take a faltering step backward. "You had a blue double-blade."
I could see the overt stiffening of Yudan's back as I strode to his side. Revan's gaze was fixed on him, her brows creased, with a look of something akin to wonder in the moss green of her gaze.

"You remember something?" Yudan's words were tight and low, and taut with intensity. I felt the hairs on the back of my neck stand up, understanding that Revan was yet again dealing with an unexpected fragment of her past – and wondered if the frequency of these was accelerating.

"No." Revan gave a little shake of her head, the confusion dissipating into a slight smile. "Not a memory... just the knowledge of it, somehow. It happens." She shrugged, striving to appear nonchalant, but I could see she was still rattled. "Sometimes I just know something without any understanding of how. Like how the Force cages worked on the Leviathan. The Sith boarding protocols. Even how to fly a frelling starship."

_The understanding of something with no foundation to ground it on._ It sounded like a deep, instinctive muscle memory, but of the brain as well as the body. Bastila had explained to me, back on Manaan, that so much of Revan's mind had been irrevocably damaged... so many neural pathways incinerated during that infamous stand-off on her faltering flagship.

No matter that Revan's recovery was well beyond anyone's expectations – Bastila's opinion was that most of her memory was simply no longer there.

I felt suddenly, inexplicably, sad.

Revan's expression firmed. Yet again, she was gathering herself back up, finding a path forward. Her eyes glinted with curiosity. "What about me?" she asked. "I never thought to question it... what colour did I use, before- before- well. You know."

"Before you became an insane evil schutta who tried to destroy the galaxy?" Dustil muttered from behind us.

Yudan turned, deliberately, and shot the boy a quelling look. Dustil subsided, somewhat, glaring down at the sand.

"Well, you had many different lightsabers, Revan," Yudan replied, and it surprised me to see the corner of his mouth twitch as he faced her yet again. "Jedi usually keep to one crystal, perhaps two. Whichever kaiburr sings the loudest to them. But you..." And now, he looked almost fond. "You used to claim you were versatile. You had more than half a dozen different kaiburr, and modified your lightsabers constantly."

"Really." Revan raised an eyebrow, and her return back was dry. "That sounds an awful lot like showmanship."

Yudan laughed. The sound was rich and deep, and I didn't think I had heard it before. "It certainly was," he agreed, amused. "I always suspected the truth was that you didn't wish to give away anything about your character. There are... theories. Philosophies, if you will, on what the different hues of a kaiburr represents."

"Really." Yudan was frowning, his earlier expression of mirth well gone.
"My entire life is strange." Revan's reply was flippant, but her face was still lit with curiosity. "Karon's 'saber is light blue... does that have some sort of meaning, then?"

"The blue..." I murmured. "I heard it postulated that blue crystals are more attuned with lightsaber forms, with the physical offense and defense of the Force... particularly the darker hues."

Jolee snorted. "There have been enough Jedi-led studies into some so-called meaning of kaiburr colours without anything of note coming from it. Bah, there's always some who have to explain everything away."

Revan arched an eyebrow. "So, nothing to say about your green 'saber then, old man?"

"It's pretty," Jolee drawled. "I always liked green."

"Some say that green represents a search for balance in the Force, an understanding that every ying has its yang. Dark and light. Good and evil." Yudan shrugged. "And that yellow is more apt to suit those in touch with the more tangible aspects of life- those who believe that Jedi should concern themselves with the day-to-day lives of all sentients, be they Force-users or not."

"There are other colours, and a thousand shades in between," I commented. Although the meaning of lightsaber crystals had always intrigued me, the whole explanation often fell flat to my comprehension.

"People do not belong simply to one characteristic," Yudan said in reply, but his gaze still lay on Revan. "I once suspected you were more drawn to the yellow, but it was a subject on which you always refused to offer a serious answer."

"People will attribute meaning to the dregs of caffa, if they can – and some cultures do." Jolee turned a beady eye on Yudan. "In the end, it usually becomes a self-fulfilling prophecy. A more academic Jedi might harvest a blue crystal, and argue to himself that of course the crystal suits him, because he might have made a fantastic duellist if he'd put effort in that direction. And, after all, he isn't so bad for a mere beginner-"

"You must admit that most Jedi with duelling as a focus wield a shade of blue," Yudan cut in, his attention turning to the old man.

"They named us guardians," I murmured, feeling a soft curve to my lips as I recalled my own first harvest. Belaya had once held an amber lightsaber, whilst Dak had found a green kaiburr... even though he had struggled to construct a lightsaber for it. I had felt satisfaction from that balance, once. Three friends, all different points of the Jedi triangle. Before Dak ran. Before I failed. Before Belaya died.

So much had happened since then.

"It's common knowledge that blues are the most easily found," Jolee grumbled. "As for those who style themselves as so-called guardians – how many of them truly found a blue kaiburr first? Eh, I bet most scoured the caves until they found one that both sang to them as well as appealed to their own ego."

"I found a twin of blues almost immediately," Yudan murmured. "Perfect for a double-blade. It was striking how loud they called to me. I knew not their colour as my hands first rested upon the mineral bed they came from."

"What happened to them?" Revan asked, her voice dropping to an almost whisper.
I could feel a tightening of Force currents around the Twi'lek; an immediate reaction, I suspected, to a question he did not appreciate. His expression froze as he stared coldly at Revan.

"Crystals like that do not work so well in the hands of dark-siders, Revan. Or they corrupt." His eyes glinted with buried resentment. "Once corrupted, they stay scarlet forever. Damaged, or so the Jedi say. Unable to be redeemed or restored to what they once were."

He turned, an abrupt movement on the sand, and stalked off along the darkening beach. My gaze slipped to Revan; she was watching him go, a lost expression of melancholy tightening her face.

"Well." Jolee raised an eyebrow. "Ain't he just a ray of sunshine."

"People are not crystals, Revan," I whispered. She glanced back to me, her face shifting into inscrutability.

"And red?" Dustil's tone was short, and I realized the young man had been quietly listening in. He looked almost angry as his gaze roved between us all. "Yuthura used to say it was the mark of passion that the Sith embraced. I guess the Jedi-" his voice twisted, as his hand rested on the cylinder at his hip, "-just label it as evil, right?"

Jolee snorted in response. "I thought I made it clear that the colour definition was a load of twaddle, lad."

"But there is an organic explanation, as such," I murmured. My first kaiburr hadn't turned after I'd left Dantooine. I recalled staring at the dark blue in a rage, wanting it to corrupt, needing it to corrupt-

In the end, I'd discarded the crystal in a trash compactor on Taris, the blood of slavers still tinny in my nose. Synthetic reds were a lot easier to come by than natural kaiburr.

I sent a brief thought of gratitude toward Master Karon – now held deep in the embrace of the Force – for the gift of the blue that was once more nestled in my old hilt.

Dustil's attention had turned to me, edgy and fierce, his chin jutting out in teenage resentment. His chestnut hair flopped into his eyes, framing the square lines of his face. I could see his father in him then, strongly; and hoped Dustil would mellow into the good-hearted man that was Carth Onasi.

"Natural red merely indicates the crystalline structure is flawed; imperfect," I explained. "For some reason, this resonates better with more emotive uses of the Force. This is why sometimes pure crystals will crack or corrupt when used too often in the hands of dark-siders. As I understand it, synthetic reds are purely factory-created kaiburr... technology has thus far been unable to replicate a perfect kaiburr such as those that grow in the wild."

"So, of course some point to a natural flaw of a mineral and attribute it to evil," Jolee muttered. "Your actions are your own, boy. Sure, you may find a different crystal suits you better these days, but I wouldn't bother with ephemeral definitions when even the Jedi Masters don't agree."

Dustil had taken out his lightsaber, one of the few things he had brought with him from the Academy. It activated with a hiss, the blood-red glowing faintly across the sands. Above him, pink streaks of sunset adorned the darkening sky, almost a perfect match for the corrupt colour in his grasp.

He was staring at Revan with a grimly intent look on his face.
"I missed out on the sparring," he muttered.

Revan drew back to him, pulling her gaze once more away from Yudan who was no more than a speck in the faraway dusk, now. The corner of her mouth twitched, and she tilted her head in acquiescence.

"Yudan may be right about crystals," Revan said, her training 'saber sparking back to life as she faced him. "But I think Juhani's got the handle on people. So, if you're looking at the likes of me and him and thinking you're screwed as well, then maybe you should ask Juhani about her trip along the Dark Side. Out of the lot of us, she's the one who holds true to the right path."

I blinked, feeling the warmth of an unexpected blush heat my cheeks. "You refuse to give yourself enough credit, Revan," I murmured, simultaneously uncomfortable and grateful for her regard. "I have never been tested as either you or Yudan have. And you stand in front of us all now, as a soul that may be hurt but is most assuredly shining with light."

Jolee snorted. "You could do with washing behind your ears a bit."

Dustil's expression had morphed into a scowl. "Light," he scoffed. "From Darth Revan? Are you frakking kidding me?" He took a step closer to Revan, raising his lightsaber. She should have demanded he hold a training weapon like her, but perhaps his own lethal blade gave him comfort, of a sort. And, truly, Dustil Onasi would not be any sort of danger to Revan, even if he were to try. "Master Uthar used to say one's true character came out in combat. Shall we give it a shot, Sith Lord?"

His words were both bitter and taunting, but didn't seem to reach Revan at all, who merely stared back at him with a mild expression and a nod of agreement.

My gaze travelled along the sprawling beach that disappeared into the encroachment of evening. I could not see Yudan Rosh anymore, but Carth's order for everyone to hold station sprang to mind. He would not be impressed with the departure of Yudan- and although the Twi'lek had not strode off in the direction of the pyramid, I could not help but be suspicious.

"I will be back shortly," I murmured, as Dustil stepped into his first attack.

xXx

I left Revan engaged with Dustil Onasi as they eyed each other from over their raised lightsabers. I suspected he planned to test her with jibes or wild attacks to see if she would fall victim to any sort of temper.

Dustil Onasi did not fully appreciate who she was or had been. Darth Revan would not have stood for a taunt from a child with a lightsaber, but the Revan that now was... I thought of her most like the Jedi Knight she had once been... and that person would have had time for the likes of Dustil Onasi.

Yet Revan was not the same person from a decade ago. My friend now bore cracks running along her soul, fault-lines that could be tapped into- but not by a wary kid almost as damaged as she. Not by Carth Onasi's son.

Myself, I had another quarry to follow.

My people had been a warrior race; fierce and proud enough that Cassus Fett thought to hunt us into extinction. It made him a despicable sentient, but it showed that the Cathar were worthy of notice. He respected our abilities, no matter what sort of evil man he was.
The planet Cathar had been destroyed whilst I was young enough still to clutch onto my mother's fur. I had little true recollection of the Cathar, and none of their training. Even so, it was likely my warrior's blood had something to do with my strengths as a Jedi. I was at home in the wild, and my senses would sing with the beat of a planet. I could stalk game or people as well as any seasoned tracker, and I was adept at minimizing both my physical and psychic presence.

My skill was not an invisibility such as young Onasi's; but a lessening of overt power. An exuding sense of non-threat that made beasts ignore me, and most sentients fail to notice.

I wasn't sure if it would work on Yudan Rosh; but then, he was likely mired in his own thoughts.

The planet hummed with life underneath my Force sense, but it was a simple, basic life. Plants and foliage and small night animals traipsing out from their burrows… nothing larger than a mink-rat, not nearby.

And through it all, the distant thrumming of Force power emanated from the pyramid, beating steadily like a faraway thunder drum.

I strode swiftly and silently over the sand as it rolled into gentle hills marred by the occasional tussock. The light was truly fading now, and nightfall was not far away. Over the next crest, I could see the dark gleam of water lapping gently across the shoreline, and the silhouette of a figure standing stationary, facing out into the ocean.

The entire scene looked too picturesque to be real. I began to understand Canderous' discomfort; everything here was too pretty, too perfect, too idyllic.

I preferred the wildness of Kashyyyk.

The Dark Jedi hadn't moved; his profile facing away from me into the horizon. Perhaps all he desired was a moment's peace, away from a crew that did not trust him – even if we had more than adequate reason.

I hesitated, then, as it became obvious to me that Yudan meant no betrayal, that there seemed no threat of him heading toward the Force beacon that called to us all. I was about to leave him to his privacy, when another life-form flickered on the periphery of my senses. A non-Force user – but a sentient nonetheless – coming in from the west.

I turned, recognizing the faint flare of life as familiar some seconds before he came into view. Canderous, dragging something large behind him attached to plysteel ropes, something that glinted metallic in the fading light. He was making a beeline for Yudan Rosh, who had also turned to face him.

I did not know if either man knew of my presence, and was not sure if I should interfere. Certainly, I was aware the men had unfinished business between them that had naught to do with me – and Canderous was the sort of man who believed in evening the scales.

But for all of his strengths, Canderous would be batted down like a dustball if he faced the likes of Yudan Rosh.

"Rosh," Canderous' voice floated through the stagnant air; harsh and guttural. "We've got matters to speak of, you and I."

"Ordo." Yudan acknowledged in a flat tone. "Say your piece, then."

Canderous stopped on the shoreline, some metres away from the Twi'lek. "Any other man I'd be "seeing on the end of my fists," he stated, dropping the ropes that were held in his armoured grasp. "But I don't know if I can trust you to keep the Force out of it."

Yudan's expression did not change. "I don't need to use the Force to have it run through me, Ordo," he replied. "Any seasoned Force-user is augmented in such a fashion. Senses, reaction time, speed... these passive behaviours are honed the more one uses the Force, until they become nothing more than instinct." He shrugged. "I respect you, Ordo, but a fistfight between the two of us would be no contest."

Canderous folded his arms, staring hard at the man who faced him. "Revan didn't use the Force against Mandalor."

"I'm sure she didn't. Overtly," Yudan drawled, turning away to face the indigo horizon. "I'm also sure that had she been wearing a neural disruptor your Mandalore would have gutted her two minutes in."

"Huh," Canderous grunted. There was an obvious note of interest in his gravelly voice. "Is that really what you think?"

"I think Revan did what she had to, to break the Clans." Yudan's return was almost monotone, but at least he gave Canderous the courtesy of an explanation. In that respect, he responded more to the Mandalorian than he had to me. "The conquest of the Mandalorians blindsided the galaxy. Revan needed to ensure your people were truly vanquished. The defeat of Mandalore in a public arena was part of that."

I recalled hearing about the fall of their leader, in hushed whispers around the Dantooine Enclave. Certainly, the Masters didn't appreciate talk of the rogue Coruscanti Knights, and I tended to avoid any sort of gossip... but I had idolized the Jedi Thirteen. Two in particular. And the end of a people who had all but wiped mine out had caused me a visceral pleasure that, even then, I knew was not healthy.

"The destruction of Malachor V was the rest of it," Canderous said slowly. "I can't deny she was the most formidable enemy we have faced in recent times, but we Mando'ade also respected her generals. Your name was well-known to us. Jaga's Cluster- that was an interesting attack vector your ships used. My clan leader suspected Revan's hand in that, but I'd heard she was tied up in the front at Iridonia at the time."

Yudan shrugged as he swung back to face Canderous. This time, I saw his gaze land on me, further back in the shadows, and knew I had been sighted. "I had command at Jaga's Cluster, Ordo," he said flatly. "And, if you recall, that was a Fett victory."

"Yes," Canderous agreed, stringing the word out slowly. "But that wasn't surprising, given the ambush from the Neo-Crusaders. We made damn sure your intelligence didn't know about them. But what was surprising was how many Republic ships made it to safety- and the sneak attack that almost took Cassus out. Whose strategy was that?"

"Mine." Yudan's voice was terse, and travelled well across the cooling sands. "I would never diminish Revan's strategic competency, but her greater brilliance was in leadership. In recognizing the strength of her generals and placing them where they could most benefit the Republic." He sighed, barely audible, before continuing his discourse. "It is not arrogance to say I worked well with the Fleet commanders, although I was not the only Jedi who did so. Cariaga and Talvon, also, were heavily involved with the Republic Navy. But Revan had little power over the intergalactic media, and it irritated her when the accomplishments of others were accredited to her."
I found myself struck with surprise at the sheer quantity of words coming from the normally reserved man. Perhaps he felt he owed Canderous. Perhaps I was right to believe Yudan Rosh worthy of redemption... but approaching the topic myself had been the wrong tactic.

"Such are the holonets," Canderous said dryly. "There's a reason my people despise reporters."

There was a short noise from Yudan; almost a chuckle. "In that respect I defer to the wisdom of the Mandalorians."

"Still," Canderous continued. He didn't sound willing to let the topic die. "Jaga's Cluster was one of the turning points. Your move was unexpected. Fett lost his Second, and his standing with Mand'alar diminished, after that." He shrugged, a strangely thoughtful look crossing his weathered face. "Our advance deep into Republic airspace had made us bold; arrogant, maybe. We believed we could predict the reactions of the Republic forces; know when they would run, know when they would cower behind civilian worlds as if it were an adequate shield. Mand'alar could see his battle song of victory written in the stars... until Revan entered the war."

"She understood a certain ruthlessness was required," Yudan returned. He paused, and the moment sat heavy in the air. "Just as she once understood the true purpose behind the Mandalorian offensive was to flush the Jedi out."

I stepped closer, close enough to attract the attention of Canderous, who raised a brow in surprise at my presence, but nonetheless turned his attention back to Yudan.

"We invaded to expand our territory, Rosh."

Yudan snorted. "That might have been Mandalore's rally cry, but I don't buy it. I spent a lot of time studying your people, Ordo; you honour combat for the testing of mettle, and expansion of territory is part of that. But you know the folly of over-extension. Push victory too far, and you cannot build nor guard your Clan successfully. And what is more integral to a Mandalorian than family?"

Canderous was shaking his head. "You may think you understand my people, Rosh, but you underestimate our might. We could have held the Core--"

"No," Yudan said flatly, as if daring Canderous to disagree with him. My ears flattened against my head; Canderous was not one to take rebuttals lightly, and certainly not about his own people. "I don't slight the strength of the Clans, Ordo. I was held prisoner by them for weeks, and I fought them for years. I have tested your people's might, and I've no doubt you would have won without Revan's interference- but your newfound empire would not have lasted. Even with Mandalore's adoption filling your ranks and the Neo-crusaders of the Fett, you had too few warriors to hold the Core for long. Too many sectors. Too many planets. The offensive was never designed to control the whole of the Republic."

"Do you really believe so?" I whispered, frowning at the Twi'lek, stepping close enough to join their conversation. He shot a sideways glance at me. "That the whole of the Mandalorian Wars was naught more than a lure for the Jedi? That is terrible--"

"The Jedi would have been valued as a worthy opponent to Mand'alar," Yudan answered in a low voice. "Perhaps that was the whole of it. Or, perhaps there was another reason."

"I'd call that a load of kriffing rubbish, Rosh. But-" Canderous paused; his voice was harsh and low, and yet there seemed no anger in the lines of his posture, no belligerence looking for an out toward the Dark Jedi who had fought against his people.
"But?" The reply back was almost a taunt; not quite, but almost.

Canderous grunted. "I'll admit some of the clan leaders wondered at Mand'alor's continued expansion. He'd a vision, at the start, of galactic superiority- but as the Wars dragged on and the Jedi Thirteen emerged as worthy foes, overextension was raised more than once. Huh. I ain't sure you're right, Rosh."

"But you're not sure I'm wrong, either."

"Maybe." Canderous shifted on the sand, looking back to me before facing Yudan again. "You got one thing spot on, though. Clan is of fundamental importance to us. Who's your clan, Rosh?"

At that pointed question, a flicker of startlement chased across the enigmatic Twi'lek's face before dying back beneath his standard impassivity. "I have none left, Ordo. Any family I once had are long dead or as good as."

Canderous snorted. "Clan ain't all about blood, Rosh. Some clan you are born to. Some you choose. My people are Ordo, and I'll return to them one day soon. But my people are also those onboard the Ebon Hawk. I gave you a chance when we left Kashyyyk- and aye, I get your reasons for what happened on the Leviathan. But I don't trust you, not yet." He loosed a harsh gust of air. "And while I may not have the Force, I've taken down Force-users before. You cause any danger to any of the crew, and I'll make sure you're the next one on my list."

My gaze shot to Yudan swiftly; he offered no reply, merely stared back at Canderous steadily as if acknowledging the threat, and accepting it. Canderous wasn't a match head-on for the likes of Yudan Rosh or any experienced Force-user- but Canderous was also the sort to spit in the face of a fair fight.

Even a Jedi could be taken out by a single blaster shot to the head.

Canderous knew, more than I, that there was nothing fair when it came to war. Or to one's enemies. And I understood then, as I glanced back at the silent Twi'lek still appraising Canderous, that perhaps Yudan Rosh knew this as well.

Having said his piece, Canderous bent down to gather up the salvage he had collected. With plysteel ropes in hand, he glanced one last time at the silent Twi'lek.

"Things change, Rosh. Maybe you should think about who your Clan is now." With that parting shot, Canderous began trekking back toward the Ebon Hawk, offering me naught more than a sharp nod of acknowledgment as he passed. Yudan pivoted away from us both, once more staring out into the nothingness of dusk.

I waited in silence, as Canderous' footsteps padded away. I felt like I, still, had more to say to the man who'd once been a hero to my younger eyes. And yet my sense of privacy still smarted at his mental intrusion from earlier. I could have accepted anger from him; mockery, even, when I raised the topic of redemption. But to delve, unwelcome, into my mind and pull out details of my own fall, and that of Quatra-

Somehow, I thought it likely he saw it as no more than a slight transgression- if he even recalled it at all.

"What is it, Cathar?" he said, his back still turned to me.

I could not forget what he had once been. The Jedi Order may have disavowed the actions of all the rogue Jedi who fought in the Mandalorian Wars – and I held myself to the precepts of the Order – but I honoured the Jedi Thirteen regardless. They had risked everything to fight for those who had quailed beneath the might of the Mandalorians.

And my people had been among them.

"I met Revan once, when I was a kit," I said softly. I was unsure why I was broaching a conversation like this, but the same part of me that yearned to reach the damaged souls we met on Korriban looked at Yudan Rosh in the same light. No matter that Dak's voice drawled in my head: you're an idiot, Juhani. Give over already. He would roll his eyes in that peculiar Human habit if he was here.

I missed my old friend, I realized.

Yudan Rosh had swivelled back to stare at me once more, but offered no response.

I tilted my head. "It was on Taris, just as she was heading to the front lines to join the war effort against the Mandalorians. There were a group of Jedi Knights with her. I find myself wondering if you were, too."

The silence stretched out between us, and he remained impassive for perhaps a full minute, before offering an aloof: "I was."

He was not interested in making conversation with me; in truth, I was uncomfortable as well. I sighed, my gaze drifting to the endless water that seemed so often to capture his attention. "I do not recall the Jedi she was with, only that there were some. Other than her and Meetra Surik, the rest of you were simply a blur of righteous warriors to me; guardians of justice and defenders of innocence." A soft chuckle left my lips. "I am afraid I was somewhat of a romantic, then."

"You met Meetra," he said. His voice was quiet, but there was an inflection there that had been missing before. Interest.

"Yes," I said softly, meeting his flawed gaze once more. "Revan liberated me from slavery, but she did so from afar. It was Meetra who recognized my Force sensitivity, and ultimately sent me on a course to Dantooine, the nearest Jedi Enclave."

Revan had made it obvious – without meaning too – that she had no memory of Meetra Surik. The name meant nothing to her, despite how close they must have once been. Meetra had been an idol of mine once, perhaps even more so than Revan – for there was one obvious difference between the two: Meetra Surik never fell to the Dark Side.

She never followed Revan and Malak past Malachor.

Whatever happened to her afterward was a mystery, but the Republic lauded her and Xaset Terep as the only remaining heroes from that time. It always struck me as odd that the Masters in the Order refused to speak of them.

"That doesn't surprise me," Yudan said. "Meetra had a gift for recognizing the Force in people. She was a unique individual."

"What happened to her after Malachor?" I breathed. "The Jedi do not speak of her and Xaset… but they should. They should."

Yudan was silent for a moment, his intent gaze holding mine firmly before his mouth tightened and he began to speak. "Meetra and Xaset were amongst our more gifted ground generals. They were instrumental in the victory at Malachor V, but they paid the heaviest price for it." His voice had turned hard, cold, and he glared at me as if in condemnation for raising the subject. "The Order should have acknowledged them, but instead they did the unforgiveable."

"What?" I whispered, blinking. "What do you mean?"

"None of your concern, Cathar," he bit out. Dusk had truly fallen now, and Yudan Rosh was no more than a shadow towering in front of me, the last of daylight glinting against the unnatural yellow of his burning eyes. "Malachor is a subject none of us who were there like to speak of. Perhaps you should ask your Mandalorian if you are so interested."

For Revan does not recall.

The words were unspoken, but I felt he had heard them as much as me. I breathed in a gulp of air. "You do realize she has some memory of her past?"

"She doesn't remember me. She doesn't remember Meetra." Yudan gave a short, bitter laugh. "Shavit, I don't think she even recalls Malak."

I knew he was wrong on that, at least. "Perhaps it is a mercy," I said softly. "I cannot think how hard this will be for her, confronting her past demons."

"Indeed." His voice had turned smooth; his face, composed. And I realized with a sudden flush of chagrin that he, too, would be facing the same past. And yet, Yudan Rosh had once more morphed into the indifferent spectre he so liked to emulate. "I will see this out to the end, Cathar. I know you followed me here in suspicion, and I do not blame you for that. But speak of lofty ideals like redemption to me again, and things will go worse than last time."

I felt my lips purse and my temper rise at the unexpected threat. "I understand," I said stiffly, once more disliking the odious man who had somehow become part of our crew. "Perhaps we should return to the Ebon Hawk, then, as neither of us should have left in the first place."

"Lead the way, Cathar." The damnable man sounded amused, now. "I shall follow."

xXx

Chapter End Notes

Coming up next: Jolee's POV as the repairs near completion, and one of the crew goes missing.

Bit of a delay on this chapter, as I'm afraid RL got in the way. It does that, at times. We're nearing the end of the lull, peeps – things will start to happen next chapter.

Thanks kosiah for the beta.
“I will be back shortly,” Juhani murmured, before striding away on the cooling sands like a desert cat hunting her prey.

Bah. That’s a terrible analogy, given her quarry. My eyes narrowed as I watched her figure depart, wondering if I should stop her, if she were the best choice to head off after that brooding Twi’lek, in light of their last encounter.

He wasn’t headed to that cursed pyramid- at least not yet. I could sense him further afield, some distance out of sight along the shoreline. Well, it’s the Cathar’s choice to chase him. Here’s hoping she’s more circumspect with her words this time around.

The loud shink of lightsabers crashing together reminded me of the others; swivelling back around, I could see Revan holding her training ‘saber in a steady defensive guard as Dustil took a step back. He scowled, and then lunged forward abruptly, red plasma beam aimed low at her legs.

With ease, Revan jumped clear of the swipe, her weapon returning back to its default position as she landed. “You’re leading with your shoulder,” she murmured. “It makes your next move predictable.”

Dustil’s eyes glittered with resentment. “How can you not remember anything?” he spat. “Mission still calls you by that fake name. But even you said you’re not her... I heard you say that... but you also said you can’t remember a damn thing!”

Revan raised an eyebrow; the boy was obviously frustrated, but it didn’t seem to faze her.

“You can’t have it both frakking ways!” he blurted out. “Either you’re Revan in which case it’s your fault- everything is your fault-” His face was blotched red with frustration; like every other teen out there in the darn galaxy, he was looking to blame all his woes on someone else-

Ach. I suppose in his case he might actually have a point.

Revan didn’t answer immediately, and there was a certain measure of calm on her face that, if I were honest, I hadn’t expected from her. Aye, she was usually prickly about discussing anything of her past... and with good reason, given who she was.

But maybe it was her questioner. Somehow, I didn't think the likes of Dustil Onasi would ruffle her. Somehow, I didn't think she'd let him.

Revan strode forward, blade levelling out in a textbook-standard blow that appeared more to keep Dustil’s attention on the duel rather than pose any sort of real test. His ‘saber rose to block, and she side-stepped, throwing another sweeping hit his way- this time with a tad more speed and strength behind it.

Dustil blocked again, his eyes narrowing in concentration.

“If you’re facing a superior foe, make them do the work,” Revan commented. “Make them chase you. Tire them out. Don’t stop moving.”

The boy scowled, but I took note of the way he retreated, feet shuffling on the sand, leading Revan backwards. When she struck out at him again – in another overt move that I picked was designed to be noticed in advance – Dustil dodged backwards, once more forcing her to follow.

“I’m not asking for any acquittal from my past, Dustil,” Revan said. She circled around him, pausing her offensive for now. “But if what you really want to know is about Telos...” she trailed off, her voice lowering. A dark look of anger twisted the kid’s face, and he growled, before abruptly leaping forward in a savage flurry of attacks.

She didn’t dodge; no. Each wild lunge she blocked, as if choosing to allow the boy’s anger to find an outlet against the safety of her training blade.

“Keep your eye on the environment, too,” she advised. I snorted to myself at her adroit change of topic. Aye, in some ways Revan was a mercurial character, quick to think on her feet. She was drawing Dustil into conversation, into the depths of his bitterness... but drawing him out again before his emotions had a chance to explode. “We’re losing daylight... can that aid you in any way? Are there obstacles around you could use against your foe?” Revan gave an obvious tilt of the head at the ‘Hawk’s landing ramp, off some distance to Dustil’s side. “Height’s an advantage, for instance.”

“Environment, huh?” Dustil muttered. He flung his off-hand out in a sharp motion, a short burst of Force energy exploding from his fingers and slamming into the ground near Revan’s feet.

A flurry of sand shot into the air at the impact, some firing directly at her face.

She was quicker; just. Revan bounded into the air, somersaulting backwards to land some metres behind.

An amused look appeared on her face. The sand hadn’t caught her in the eyes, but it’d been close. Closer than she expected, I’d wager. And yet the darn woman looked almost impressed.

“That’s a cheap shot,” I grumbled. “For a practice duel.”

“Oh, I dunno,” Revan murmured, as she kept her eyes on the lad. There was a note of approval in her voice. “Practise duelling as you would out in the field, I reckon.”

It was getting dark, I realized, staring beyond the two to the expanse of beach sand that slowly lolled into dunes in the distance. The shadows of evening lengthened over us, cut through by the glare of the ‘Hawk’s illuminated underbelly.
“Eh, it’s time to turn in,” I called out, jerking my head back towards the loading ramp. “Let’s finish this spar on a pleasant note, huh, kids?”

“I can’t tell you about Telos,” Revan whispered, completely ignoring my last statement. Sometimes, I grumbled to myself, I swear that darn woman lost half her sense with her memory. Sithkid was just starting to calm down around her. “But Yudan can. Question him if you want answers... all I know is what he told me. Telos was a joint strike by Malak and Talvon Esan.”

And, as I expected, the boy’s face had twisted once more in a backlash of anger. “Talvon was a Telosian!” he hissed. “I’ve heard that bahtacrap before, and I don’t buy it! You really think he’d turn on his own frakking homeworld?”

Revan stared at him, mute. She doesn’t know, I realized with a pang. She’s got no idea here... no recollection of this at all. I’d not paid extensive attention to Revan’s war of attrition, and all I knew about Telos was that it had been obliterated.

But I’d heard about the madness of Talvon Esan.

“That’s the Dark Side for you,” I said, hearing the sadness in my own darn voice. It wasn’t just Revan who’d dovetailed into actions and corruptions that those who’d once known her would never have believed possible.

It wasn’t just her generation who had the monopoly on failure of such magnitude.

I cleared my throat. “In the end, if you keep following that cursed path, you’ll have to sacrifice everything. Your planet, your friends, your values, your soul. Some just fall quicker than others.”

Dustil’s shoulders slumped, and I saw defeat chase across his expression before he turned awkwardly away. It was a bleak sort of resignation, I thought; an acceptance of something that maybe he’d already known.

“The holonews...” Dustil muttered. “All the channels said Talvon went mad. Insane after Malachor. He’d been the hero of Telos... him and Saul Karath. If the likes of them can turn into monsters... frakk, the likes of you-” he turned, throwing a bitter look over his shoulder at Revan. “Then what hope is there for anyone else?”

“Bah,” I snorted in derision. “That’s a load of rubbish, boy. Everyone’s fallible. Being more powerful or intelligent or heroic don’t make you any less likely to fall... in fact, some say the pressure’s harder. Everyone has the potential for evil inside them... and the flipside is, anyone can be strong enough to resist it, too. No matter their background. No matter what trials their past have already burned them with.”

“All I can tell you is that I won’t fall again,” Revan said, her voice a quiet whisper in the dusk. “Except that I’m sure I believed myself incapable of falling once before. But I’ll finish this, no matter what it takes.” She sighed. “And my allies will help me stay true... or stop me if I don’t. And you’ve thrown your lot in with us, Dustil, which makes you one of them.”

Her lips twisted into a quick grin; a flash of wry, almost black humour. “Bet you never expected that.”

Dustil blinked, for once surprised into silence. His mouth opened, before shutting again, like the lad had no idea what to say, or how to take the damaged, powerful woman standing across from him with a training ‘saber held loosely in a combat grip.

“Okay, I’m calling time,” I grumbled, with a sudden shiver. The temperature had plummeted after sunset, and it was fast getting too cold for my old bones. “Come on, kids. Inside.”

xXx

Of course, they’d taken their time before actually listening to me. The Mandalorian had returned, dragging some salvage behind him on plysteel ropes, which immediately garnered the attention of both Revan and the Twi’lek chit who’d backed out from underneath the ‘Hawk’s hull to join us.

No sign of Juhani or Yudan Rosh, although Canderous mentioned something about running into them on the beach. Eh, I hope for their sakes they make it back before our pilot spots their absence. We’ve had enough spats recently to flesh out a holo-soap.

I’d wandered inside at that point, more interested in a lie-down than idle conversation. I didn’t bat an eyelash when Revan followed me a few minutes later, but Dustil’s presence behind her had been a surprise.

I’d half thought the boy would stay outside to chat with Mission, or go find his dad- but instead, he appeared to be shadowing Revan with a wary gleam of interest in his gaze.

Aye, he certainly didn’t trust her... but she’d done well with him. Better than I thought she would. Dustil had been determined to get a rise from her, throwing his anger in her face, constantly poking at a sleeping terentatek with a stick – and Revan, in contrast, had exhibited a surprising amount of tact in not reacting.

She’d make a fair teacher. I hadn’t noticed that about her until now.

“You should head to your dad’s quarters, lad,” I said, frowning at him as he entered the common room behind Revan. “Get a few hours kip while you can.”

“Don’t think I can sleep,” Dustil muttered, scrubbing at his face with one hand as he slumped down on the plimfoam benches.

“Now that Canderous has returned with a suitable repair patch, I think we’ll be all fixed up in a matter of hours,” Revan said, eyeing over the caffa machine. “Sleep’s a good idea for us all.”

“It’s not a magical thing I can turn on,” Dustil grumbled. “If I’m not tired, then I’m not frakking tired.”

“Training helps with that,” Revan returned in a dry voice. She followed it with a frown directed at me. “I think. I don’t remember, but I seem to fall into sleep easily enough.”

“Aye, you have the right of it. Meditation, too,” I offered. “All good tricks. Even the military use a form of it, teaching their troops to sleep when they have a chance.” I turned an eye on Dustil, who was still scowling at Revan. “After all this is over, it’d be a good idea to get you some training, lad.”

“I ain’t going anywhere near the Jedi,” he returned coldly, his glare burning into mine. “Don’t you bloody start.”

I snorted. “I got my own issues with the Order. What’s a young pup like you so annoyed at them for?”

“I don’t trust them,” he said through clenched teeth. “And I’ve spent my life doing what others tell me to do. Not anymore. No frakking way.”
“Guess you’ll have to learn from others, then,” Revan said, her voice light, even as her gaze on him was curious. “Pretty much like you have been doing. Seems like our Jolee isn’t too bad a teacher, anyway.”

“Bah, did you completely fail to hear my story the other day?” I grumbled. Last time I’d tried my hand at training, it had ended in disaster and ripped out my heart. “There’s a reason they stick Padawans under Masters, you know.”

“For lack of a better option...” Revan murmured, trailing off. There was a certain amusement in her gaze that dwindled into seriousness. “You’ve had some training in the Order, Jolee. It’s better than nothing.”

She pushed one hand up against her forehead, brushing her unruly mop away and leaving her face bare. It brought the angular lines of her face into stark relief. I could tell she was paler than normal for her olive skin tone, but I hadn't really paid much attention to her physical appearance until now. The flight from Kashyyyk and the Leviathan had been frantic enough to keep my focus on the more important aspects of our lives: namely, survival.

Besides, Force signatures were usually the way I recognized people. When I’d spent time with Revan four years ago, that’d been down in the dark depths of the Shadowlands, where we’d both relied on the blue-black etchings of Force-enhanced vision to see anything.

The Force provided a useful form of sight. Aye, particularly for noting fluctuations of energy. Didn’t shine the greatest illumination onto physical features, though.

My eyes narrowed as I stared hard at the woman, and a ghostly shiver danced down my spine.

“What?” she asked, her hair still pulled tightly back.

Revan had a plainish sort of face, long and ending in a chin that was almost too sharp. Normally her striking eyes dominated her expression, but now I took note of the way her nose curved ever-so-slightly at the tip, and that her eyes were a little wide-set-

“You have had a few years training, Jolee,” Revan repeated, frowning.

...

“A few years training is more than I’ve had,” Nayama said. I could hear the resentment in her tone, and knew, as always, that she was thinking on her stars-blessed sister. Nayama’s straight brown hair was braided tight against her scalp as per her norm, leaving her face bare to the elements. Her wide-set brown eyes stared at me in simmering resentment. “It was one mistake, Jolee. One!”

“Aye, and it almost killed us both,” I said, sighing as I placed a hand on my irate wife’s arm. “I’ve as good as left the Order, Nayama. I-”

“I didn’t ask you to leave!” she seethed, eyes flashing, the curved tip of her nose wrinkling in anger. “Don’t you dare lay that on me, Jolee Bindo!”

“Now you’re taking my words out of context,” I grumbled, as she jerked away from me. “I’d do it again in a flash, Nayama. But if they won’t train you, and I can’t train you without it being a danger to us both-”

“Exar will.” Her voice had turned soft; her anger vanishing in a beat. I knew it to be a dangerous sign. “He’ll train us both, Jolee. You cannot expect us to live a life without the Force.”
“You’ve been in contact with him again,” I said slowly, feeling my gut tighten with anger – and not a little dread. That man was all over the holonews these days – as notorious as Nayama’s sister was famous. “Nothing good will come from associating with him, Nayama. You must see that.”

Once, before the Force had touched either Nayama or Nomi, they had spent some time on Dantooine. It wasn’t my native enclave, but it had been home to Nayama’s brother-in-law when he still lived, the aspiring Jedi Knight Andur Sunrider.

Nayama hadn’t particularly enjoyed her time there, but she’d befriended two of the people I liked least in the galaxy. The powerful Knight Exar Kun, and the grouchy Padawan Vrook Lamar - who would later transfer to Coruscant where I had the unfortunate experience of knowing him.

“Exar is offering to train us, Jolee-”

“You told me that last time he made contact with you,” I muttered, trying to hold back a scowl. Nayama swore there had never been anything romantic between them- she’d been young, bored, and resentful of her sister’s new husband. But her bashfulness when speaking of Exar always put me on edge. The slight look of awe, as though wondering what might have been-

I’d never met the darn man, yet that would have been enough to make me dislike him. But there was worse. Oh, there was, indeed.

Skirmishes. Annexations. Massacres. All along the edges of the Outer Rim, in little-known worlds with no government to speak of. Sketchy reports of dark sightings and deep terror amongst the refugees. And through all the unreliable stories, the same name kept cropping up: Exar Kun. The Jedi Knight who’d left the Order under a cloud of suspicion.

Aye, mayhap there was no concrete evidence that Exar Kun was leading the unrest, but his name was whispered frequently enough to implicate it. Along with another word that hadn’t been used for centuries: Sith.

Sometimes, Jedi walked away from the Order. Sometimes, Jedi fell. But there hadn’t been a Dark Jedi who’d proclaimed himself a Sith Lord for a long, long time. And while I would never denounce anyone as destined for the Dark Side- I also wasn’t a blind idiot.

One thing was obvious – Exar Kun desired power. And he was willing to chip away at his own humanity to achieve it. There was a reason the Jedi were rallying against him, and I hated the fact that Nayama was so blind to it.

“He swears we will have nothing to do with his ongoing disagreement with the Order-”

“Disagreement?” I muttered. “Bah! There’s a euphemism if ever I heard one.”

But her sharp chin jutted out in that familiar stubbornness I both loved and, at times, was annoyed by; and I settled myself in for a lengthy discourse on the subject. There was no way I’d let my wife get embroiled with the likes of him.

No way at all.

...

“Jolee?” Revan prompted. She’d dropped her hand so the dark curls once more framed her face.

I held back another shiver, blinking with unexpected nostalgia, as the creeping tendrils of the past slowly loosened their hold. Revan was still staring at me, and the odd sense of familiarity departed.
Suddenly, she was once again the unique individual that had sent ripples of change across the galaxy.

I shook my head in mild irritation. It’s the words, is all. This conversation started too darn much the same.

“Eh, it’s nothing,” I muttered, scratching my head. “A wraith tip-toed across my soul, as the Ukatins like to say.”

“Hmm.” Revan didn't look convinced, but she appeared willing to let it go. She shot a sideways glance at Dustil. “I'm off to sleep. Doesn't hurt to try it, Dustil. Even a lie-down counts as rest, and you might be grateful for it later.”

The boy said nothing, merely stared at her with simmering mistrust.

A wry grin stole over Revan's face, and she walked away, avoiding the caffa machine for once to head to the women's living quarters.

“Fine,” Dustil muttered, the moment the hatch had closed behind Revan. “Suppose rest is better than sitting around, waiting for the hours to tick down until the end of everything.”

I snorted, unimpressed with the boy’s melodrama. “There’s always another great war around the horizon, lad. And with every war, there’s always someone who claims the end is nigh.” I gestured around the room ruefully. “Yet here we are, and the universe still stands. Don’t be so darn dramatic.”

“Why are you even here?” Dustil demanded suddenly, eyes flashing. “I mean... I get why some of the crew follow her... but you’d been living in that frakking forest for decades. What made the likes of you decide to up and follow her?”

“Does everything need to have a reason, boy? Maybe I was just sick of all the trees.”

“That’s misdirection if ever I heard it,” he muttered, running a hand through his hair. The boy looked tired, no matter what drivel he claimed. “If you don’t want to say your reasons, then just frakking say so.”

“That Academy of yours certainly didn’t teach you any manners, did it?”

“We were a bit more focused on different ways to kill people rather than flowery speech,” he said coldly.

“Bah, don’t talk back to your elders, child. If you really want to know...” I paused. “The Force swirls around us all, but no one more so than our Revan. Ah, but it’s not just that... for I know well that sometimes swirling Force is just swirling Force. No, it's her actions that intrigue me. She’s got more reason than any to run, and yet she’s doing her darnedest to stay on course, now. Face up to things.” I turned a beady eye on the boy, thinking on his innate dislike of the Jedi Order and wondering exactly where it stemmed from. Was it just the years he spent with the Sith? He’d turned his back on that life, and yet seemed to hate both sides with equal passion.

I didn't exactly care for the restrictions of the Order, myself. But, still, I couldn't help but think that the Jedi might do the angry lad some good. I sighed. "Revan understands that running away doesn't work. Maybe you could learn something from that."

Dustil’s jaw stiffened and he rose to his feet. Without a word in reply, he stalked off towards the pilot’s quarters.
Well, that’s one way to get him to bed, I thought with mild amusement. I wasn’t sure if he’d actually take any of my words in... but Dustil Onasi listened more than he let on. Earlier, when it’d been just us two left on the ‘Hawk, I’d taken stock of the interested gleam in his eye when we’d spoken of psychic guarding. Take the angry lad away from any flashpoints like Revan or Telos or the Order, and he calmed down immeasurably. Showed a fair aptitude for imitating the basic blocks of a mental shield, too.

Aye, Dustil Onasi might pretend to be angry at the universe, but he had a desire for knowledge alongside it. Coupled with his undeniable strength in the Force, he had the potential to transform into a powerful Force-user one day.

One day. If the lad would ever grow up and get over his simmering resentment of just about everything.

I was just about to depart for a lie-down myself when I heard the footfalls of another echoing through the freighter’s hall. I turned as the hatch opened to admit the boy’s father. Carth Onasi shot me a tired smile; no more than a quirk at the edge of his mouth, really. Everyone is so darn glum these days. It was beginning to get on my nerves.

“Humph,” I said in greeting. “How’s the patch job going?”

“Good.” Carth stifled a yawn. “The others are outside, but I told them to head in to catch some sleep. Zaalbar’s staying out with Teethree. They don’t need more than two hands sealing the patch, and they’ll wake us once done. A few hours, maybe four, and we’ll be launch ready.”

“The others?” I frowned, wondering whether to ask for elaboration. “All of ‘em?”

The Republic soldier shot me a puzzled look. “I saw Dustil and Revan head in before. But the rest are congregating by the repairs. Did you expect someone to be missing, Jolee?”

“Heh.” I hid a grin, shook my head, and took a step towards the starboard living quarters. Probably a good thing that brooding Twi’lek’s walk went unnoticed by our pilot. Probably a good thing that brooding Twi’lek’s walk went unnoticed by our pilot. “Well, stars know I ain’t one to turn down a nap. I’ll leave you to it before the rest turn up and fill this ship with yakkity yak.”

“Where- where’s Revan?” Carth’s hesitant words had me pausing at the exit. “I- and Dustil?”

“They’re of the same mind as me. Dustil headed to your room; good thing, too, with how crowded the men’s quarters are.” I shot him a look over my shoulder, and knew it wasn’t his son he’d really been asking about. “If you want to talk to Revan, then stop dithering and do it before we leave this planet. None of us are getting any younger, you know.”

The man’s face snapped into a scowl at my interference, and I had to stifle a chuckle at how much his expression reminded me of his son, then.

“Thanks for the advice,” he ground out. “But I’d appreciate it if you keep your nose out of my affairs.”

I let my chuckle run free as I opened the hatch. “Eh, what would I know? I’ve only lived for more decades than I can count. But one thing I’ll remind you is the danger we’re about to sail into. Sort things out while you’ve got the chance. Living with a lifetime of regret ain’t a fun thing to do.”

I stepped through the hatch and wandered away, aware the man was no doubt glaring daggers at my back. Heh. He and Revan might be fully grown, but they were dancing around each other like a pair of mating wyyyschokk spiders. It could take years for the arachnid mating ritual to complete, and half the time one ended up eating the other before the next generation was even conceived.

Well, I can’t deny they have more than their share of issues. Aye, it wasn’t easy for them, I’d admit. But I was a firm believer in grasping love where one could find it. There was enough darn bleakness in the rest of life that letting a chance for happiness slip away was nothing more than foolishness.

I yawned, disrobing absently as I sat down on the bunk. After all my years of sleeping on a pallet – or a bed of leaves, when circumstances had rolled that way – a soft mattress was more comfort than my back could handle. I was used to the harsh wild of Kashyyyk; my home for near on half my life. Sometimes, I wondered if I’d ever see her untamed beauty again.

First time I'd happened upon the planet of the Wookiees had been on honeymoon with my new wife. She'd always liked the simpler, less civilized worlds.

My thoughts lingered back on the recollection from earlier. Nayama and I'd had some good years between us, but they'd been few. Too few. And my failure with the woman more precious than any I'd met before or since sat heavy on my soul- even all these decades later.

Nayama had been so like her elder sister. She'd never seen it, though. She'd always measured herself against Nomi, and always believed that somehow she was lacking in comparison. But they were similar... both free-spirited nomads at heart. Daydreamers, but with a determined drive regarding causes they believed in. Strong, gifted, and unusually late to bloom in the Force.

If Nayama had only secured the training of a Master. Aye, and maybe that had been my miscalculation, taking her to my home enclave on Coruscant rather than following her sister’s footsteps. For the High Council had been fired up at Dantooine’s gall in accepting Nomi Sunrider – an adult woman with a squalling newborn at her side – and the Masters on Coruscant weren’t willing to take the same risks with Nomi’s younger sister. Not when she was already emotionally entrenched with the likes of me.

The Order might have changed their collective minds later – when Nomi’s Battle Meditation reared alongside her heroism against Kun – but by then it’d been too late for Nayama. And the sheer hypocrisy of some of the Council members, using Nayama Bindo’s name as an example of how attachment could lead to corruption, why adults should not receive training-

Aye, sometimes I wondered if Nayama’s fall was preordained, from the moment the High Council refused her. She could have been great. I still believed that. And I still cursed the Order for sealing her fate.

I sighed, lying back on the soft mattress, letting the bitter thoughts slip away into the cobwebs of history. I could hear the movement of others through the ship, feel their presence in the Force as they congregated around the central hub of the freighter. I planned to be out cold before any of the men walked in here.

Yawning, I emptied my mind, and drifted slowly into a meditative precursor to sleep.

Wake up!

“Eh?” I muttered sleepily, half-aware that something had woken me, but whether it be dream or reminiscence or purely a sense of justified foreboding I couldn’t tell. I nestled deeper into the covers, blocking my ears to the Mandalorian’s snores, and tried to grasp the last eddies of slumber.

My thoughts submerged into the half-conscious state of dreamworld. My dreams were interspersed with flashes of darkness, and a woman demanding someone to speak with her. A plea, for someone to listen.

Time morphed into intangibility, stretching into seconds or hours.

This is no trap!

I jerked back to wakefulness as a psychic wave of power washed over me. It dissipated quickly, but the echo of the voice rebounded in my mind. This is no trap! A woman’s voice, insistent and indignant and thrumming with dark Force residue. A powerful message aimed at someone other than me.

My attention crystallized into focus, immediately stretching out to find the source of the power-

The audible sound of the hatch hissing closed scythed clean through my concentration. I scrambled into a seated position, hands grabbing the two lightsabers near my person as I took immediate stock of the room.

The Mandalorian was still breathing heavily in sleep above me, and the Wookiee’s bunk opposite was empty – he’d be under the ‘Hawk, still, finalizing the repairs. But the fourth bed- that should have had a body-

No you don’t! If there was one person on board this ship whose loyalties were still in question, who was the most likely to be lured away-

I barrelled off the mattress, shucking on my tatty robe, and darted through the closing exit.

If that mental voice had roused me, then it would have woken others, too. Augmented by a psychic power both strong and foreign and insidiously dark, it had to be coming from that cursed Force beacon. Attracting the darkest link in our crew, mayhap?

I sprinted around the curve in the ‘Hawk’s corridor and all but slammed into the Twi’lek’s back.

Blinking in surprise, I stumbled, catching myself against the durasteel walling.

“What is not a trap?” Yudan Rosh murmured, without bothering to turn around.

“Humph,” I grumped, poking at his back in irritation. He didn’t budge. “If someone tells me something ain’t a trap, first thing I conclude is that it is. Could be that I’m just a suspicious old bugger, though.”

“The psychic power felt strangely alien to me,” the Twi’lek continued. “But the voice I heard spoke Basic with a clear Core accent.”

Did mental voices have accents? Pshaw, I didn’t know – but I understood what he was saying. The words that had flashed through my mind had been spoken in the tones of a young, educated female. One whose home tongue was Basic, I’d wager.

“I cannot sense it now,” Yudan commented. “Only the steady Force beacon we have all felt since landing here.”

“They could be the same thing.” I shrugged behind him, but my thoughts were still fixated on the strange event that had pulled us out of slumber. “Most likely it came from that darn pyramid. I thought the message was aimed for you. But if not-”

“So who-” Yudan Rosh stopped speaking, and I had the brief impression of his back tensing before he shot forward in a surprising burst of speed.

I blinked, before my brows lowered in annoyance. Twitchy Twi’lek! Was he running away or running after someone? With a grunt of effort, I reeled the Force in underneath my heels and ran after him.

The hatch to the common room was still open from his entrance and, once more, I almost barrelled into his stationary back next to the kitchenette. He made a damn inconvenient wall.

“Are you staying or going?” I snapped, jabbing a finger hard into his kidneys. I felt a small sense of gratification at his grunt of discomfort. “Make up your darn mind, sonny. I’m getting dizzy here.”

There was a swish as the door leading to the port living quarters opened to admit Juhani.

“Cathar,” Yudan said, his voice low and tense. “Tell me Revan’s still in her bunk.”

The light had been set to night-time low, so only the faintest illumination glowed from the ceiling. The Ebon Hawk had been programmed to emulate diurnal rhythms, although frankly, I didn’t see the point when one could just choose to turn the darn light off. But even in the dim, I could see that Juhani’s ears were laid flat against the side of her head. Her slanted eyes were tawny slits, and the fine dusting of fur on her face quivered in tension.

Juhani’s alarm was palpable on the Force.

“That message or whatever it was that woke us,” I said, my voice lowering as I realized what I should have understood the moment I’d woken. “It was aimed at Revan.”

“She has gone,” Juhani confirmed with a brief nod of the head. “When I first saw her empty bunk I sensed her running at speed toward the pyramid. She is beyond my range, now.”

A low noise rumbled from the Twi’lek; almost a growl. “After all of this,” Yudan muttered. His normally bland tone had hardened with disappointment, and his jaw was clenched. “She fails again.”

“Fails?” Juhani echoed tartly, glaring at him. “I do not believe she had a choice, Yudan Rosh. Not when it was her captured bond-sister begging for her presence.”

“Ah,” I said in sudden comprehension. “That voice. Bastila Shan, was it?”

“I forget that you have not met her before,” Juhani murmured. “But, yes, you are correct.”

“Revan should have woken us,” Yudan censured. “Running off alone is the worst thing she could have done.” He sighed; a short gust of irritated air. “Reckless,” he muttered under his breath.

“We must go after her,” Juhani implored in a low tone. Her slanted eyes flashed in the dim lighting. “Bastila is... I am unsure of Bastila’s state of mind.”

“She is Malak’s prisoner,” Yudan bit out. “I am well familiar how quickly Force-sensitives break under his ministrations. This is a trap, and Revan is idiotic to face this herself-”

“We must wake the others,” Juhani cut in. She turned, face cocked in the direction of the men’s living quarters.

I heard the slightest of scuffles, the whisper of a footstep near the now-closed hatch that led back to the men’s dorms. I frowned, staring at the durasteel flooring. A handful of that Twi’lek chit’s pazaak cards littered the ground; a picture of teenage normality, in amongst the craziness of our situation.

“That is time we do not have, Cathar,” Yudan growled. “I agree that we follow Revan. Now. But the rest of the crew would only slow us down.”

One of the brightly-coloured cards shifted slightly; almost as if someone had stood on it.

A body whirred by me at breakneck speed; taken aback, it took me a moment to comprehend that Yudan Rosh had launched himself into the air, leaping directly past me and landing in a controlled crouch on top of something—something invisible—

Beneath him, the figure of Dustil Onasi winked into existence. One of the Twi’lek’s fists was pressed hard against the boy’s throat.

“Get- get off me!” Dustil choked from under the hand crushing his oesophagus. His eyes were wide with fright.

“Do not sneak around me, boy,” Yudan warned. He leaned in close, face to face with the young lad. “You are fortunate I do not have a lightsaber in my possession, or my instincts may have yielded more severe consequences.”

“Stop grand-standing and get off the lad,” I muttered, unable to stop a roll of the eyes. “Yes, yes, you’re a scary Dark Jedi, we’re all aware of that. No need to go frightening the children, sonny.”

In a fluid motion, the Twi’lek rose to his feet and Dustil scrambled to follow suit.

“I heard what you all said,” Dustil muttered, glaring at Yudan and me in turn. He raised a hand as if to rub at his throat, before evidently thinking better of it. “Revan’s run off, and you’re going after her. If she’s gonna fall again, then I- I can help. I’m not just a frakking child, y’know.”

At that, I felt a sliver of unease. Of the lot of us, he had the least training. I’d thought Yudan Rosh the most likely to run off independently, but surely Dustil Onasi was the more pre-disposed to lose control when faced with the power of that cursed Force beacon.

“No, you are not a child,” Yudan monotoned, staring at the lad. His gaze narrowed. I had only the briefest inkling of forewarning before he jerked one hand up vertically, and a fine, precise twitch of the Force erupted from his fingertips. Swift and minuscule, the spear of energy hit Dustil Onasi directly in the forehead.

The boy collapsed to the ground.

“Stop!” Juhani cried. She took one step towards Yudan Rosh, her unlit ‘saber tight in her grasp. “What- what have you done?”

The Twi’lek turned around slowly, his expression blank, his yellow gaze pinned on her.

“Ach, the boy’s fine,” I muttered, even as I strode forward to double-check. But I recognized that use of Force power, even if it wasn’t something I could emulate myself.

Juhani held still, attention still fixed warily on Yudan. I harrumphed, one hand raised in a shooing motion at the Cathar as I knelt down next to the lad. “Settle down, girl. Push the Force out yourself and you’ll see there’s no damage to our resident Sithkid.”

_Best make sure, though. I’d be a senile idiot to blindly trust Yudan Rosh._ Wisps of investigative Force gently curled out from my command, circling the prone body in front of me. My assumed diagnosis was immediately confirmed: _stasis. Not even a strong one, at least._ I shot the Twi’lek an irritated look. “Your favourite trick again,” I grumbled. “Get a kick out of putting everyone to sleep, do you?”

Yudan Rosh gave a nonchalant shrug. “If the boy’s mental guarding was competent, that would not have been able to fall him. He will wake soon and no doubt let the others know our destination. In that respect, Dustil Onasi _will_ be of assistance.” _

_Mental guarding, bah!_ I wasn’t sure if that was a dig at my training of the lad, I’d only had him to myself for a few hours. I felt my brows lowering again as I viewed the dispassionate Twi’lek. “Dustil won’t be impressed when he wakes. He’s got a thing or two to prove to himself, and staying behind won’t rest easy with him.”

“He’s a liability,” Yudan shot back. “Dustil Onasi is young, powerful, and little trained in either restraint or control. Consider my attack a test. Had his innate shields proved a counter to my stasis, then perhaps he would have been competent enough to accompany us.” The Twi’lek looked down to appraise the comatose boy. “We are heading toward the lure of an immense Force power,” he murmured, his voice dropping. “Bringing the boy along would be a greater risk to his own soul than whatever benefit it would bring us.”

Yudan Rosh glanced back to me again, staring at me flatly, expression revealing nothing. Mayhap it had only been pragmatism that drove the Twi’lek’s actions. I wasn’t sure. And I had to admit there was a goodly chunk of sense in his little mental test, whether it originated from concern or cold reason.

“Careful, sonny,” I warned, feeling my eyes narrow. “You might start me thinking there’s a bone of compassion in your body.”

His expression didn’t change.

“We should depart,” Juhani murmured, her voice once more her useful, reasoned tone. “Every second Revan gets further from us.”

A metaphorical gust of icy wind chased across my soul, then. Sudden and dark and bone-chilling with foreboding. It faded as quickly as it had materialized, leaving nothing but an unnatural urgency thrumming in the Force all around me.

“A premonition,” I muttered. I knew the difference between personal anxiety and a portent from beyond. The feeling had been too puissant for a simple flight of fancy. “Juhani is right. We have to move, and now. I’ve a hunch that Revan’s going to need us before long.”

With a silent nod from Juhani and a sharp-edged look from the Twi’lek, we all departed the _Ebon Hawk_ with alacrity.

_xXx_

It’d been awhile since I’d used the Force so gratuitously, hammering at speed through a tangle of low-lying bush. The Shadowlands on Kashyyyk were filled with trees as tall as mountains, which left their depths relatively clear of bramble for the most part. In contrast, the vegetation here was nowhere near as haughty or ambitious – laying much thicker on the ground, and thus being immensely more bothersome.

“Good thing I didn’t like this robe,” I muttered as the other two ground to a halt. There were minor scratches on my face from the whiplash of branches I’d run full-tilt into, and burrs of thistle clung to the tatty remnants of my clothing.

Ahead of me, the mess of greenery ended abruptly in a large clearing. Perhaps fifty metres beyond us lay the entrance to the pyramid.

Even I had to admit it was grandiose. Looming high into the now-midnight sky, the edifice was etched in the blue-black lines of my Force-enhanced sight. But it was the wisps of burgundy energy curling back from the edges that had me stiffening in caution; those wisps were the residue of the alien power bleeding back... bleeding back into the fabric of the Force itself. I couldn’t attribute direct evil to them, but the temptation to walk forward and possess the eldritch energy they offered was strong.

It was a very good thing Dustil Onasi wasn’t here, I realized. Somehow, I doubted the boy’s tenuous control would hold firm under the promise of such power.

Slowly, tentatively, I stretched out my awareness on the Force. The pyramid beheld four sides, each set at a wide angle from the ground, so the final height of the structure was far greater than its base. The sides were a smooth pane, comprised of some metallic material I couldn't identify. My Force-sight showed little in the way of indentations or imperfections anywhere on the outside of the pyramid, and I knew it to be a statement of superior craftsmanship. Or an ego-stroking flaunting of wealth and power to all and sundry. From the little I’d heard of the mysterious Rakatan, I had the feeling it was a bit of both.

“The beacon,” Juhani said in a quiet, almost awed, voice. “It is so strong here, and emanates from the bottom of the pyramid itself.”

She was right, I realized, as my gaze narrowed and dropped back to the base. Inset in the centre of the side facing us was a curved archway that jutted out several metres from the pyramid itself.

The entrance.

“And yet Revan is ascending inside,” Yudan murmured. His profile was aimed high, near the zenith.

“I cannot sense any life nearby.” Juhani’s voice was taut with concern as I felt the Force stretch exploratory wings out from her. I sighed in irritation, plucking an errant bramble from my sleeve, even as my own Force awareness emulated hers.

“There she is,” I muttered, senses briefly touching on a flare of familiar power. She was high already, more than halfway up the temple, but even Revan’s strength was difficult to pinpoint in amongst the overpowering morass of energy coming from the temple.

I lost her psychic signature, then, and Yudan Rosh stiffened ahead of me. Frowning, I threw my Force-focus out further afield.

-come closer, old man-

My concentration frayed, quicker than it should have. The alien power, while not exactly sentient, still merged into my connection with the Force.
Revan’s presence was indistinguishable, now; completely obscured within the pyramid that rose like a sinister portent of doom. I pushed out, harder; surely I should be able to track a Force-user of her magnitude—

—you could find out what happened to your wife—

“Careful!” I gasped, reeling myself back in with a jolt. My stomach turned. “Keep yourselves contained! That— that power…” is seductive. Too darn much.

Yudan Rosh pivoted to face me, his expression blank even as his fists were curled tight at his sides. He’s got some inkling of the danger here. Juhani gulped in a shuddering breath. Her inward struggle was obvious as she slowly grounded herself.

“I do not trust promises like that,” Juhani hissed as she turned. “I will not fall prey to such trickery, wherever it is coming from.”

“Aye, it’s beguiling, alright,” I muttered. “But provided you keep your shields up and don’t push out your awareness, it shouldn’t be a problem.”

“This is a construction of the Star Forge.” Yudan turned back to the pyramid once more, crossing his arms as he stared at it. “This is a taste of what we shall experience on the Forge, no doubt.”

“Huh,” I grumped, feeling slightly taken aback when I considered the likelihood of that. “I hope you’re wrong, sonny. I don’t normally attribute Dark Force to anything except sentients, but I’m thinking this pyramid might be an exception. And if the Star Forge is similar...”

Juhani, too, had turned back to appraise the pyramid. She inhaled deeply. “Despite my efforts, I still did not sense Revan. Or Bastila.”

“Bah, that beacon’s so strong it’s drowning out every other vestige of life. Could be a hundred sents inside that we don’t know about.”

“But if Bastila led Revan here...” Juhani trailed off.

“This Force-bond,” Yudan said tightly. “I know little of it, other than it is uncommonly strong. What sort of power does it have over Revan?”

Juhani turned at that, throwing Yudan Rosh a wary glance. “It is an equal connection, as far as I know. Created when Bastila drew Revan back from beyond the edge of death on her flagship. But you are correct; it is very strong.”

“This Bastila Shan managed to break through Revan’s natural shielding,” I commented, staring at the pyramidal structure through narrowed eyes. Temples of this design could be found throughout the universe, but the Force-power that radiated from this one set my hackles on edge. The power stemming from the base was both foreign and overwhelming, even while the majority of it was funnelled up through the centre of the pyramid, shooting like a laser into the skies above. Magnifying the EMP scrambler, Revan said. But then there’s the residue flashing back to us. Drawing us in.

While alien in its nature, the attraction of the beacon hummed around me; coalescing into a deep desire to step forward and embrace it. On my belt, my decades-old lightsaber hummed.

“Bastila and Revan share a telepathic connection and can also lend each other Force strength,” Juhani murmured, facing back to the pyramid once more. Her ears twitched. “That ability aided Revan more than once on Korriban.”

“Lend each other...” There was a shocked note in the Twi’lek’s usual monotone. “I have never heard of a mind-link to allow that sort of exchange. Are you certain, Cathar?”

“I would not say it so if I were not.” Juhani’s reply back was tart. “Bastila herself had expressed concern at the potency of their connection. I do not believe any of the Masters had ever seen such a link before.”

“And this bond allowed your precious Masters to destroy what was left of her memory-”

Some kaiburr had a tendency to feel alien in their power. Usually the ones that didn’t sing out to the seeker-

“Her mind was already destroyed, Yudan Rosh. Revan holds no ill-will toward the Council for doing what they had to.”

-but they could be sensed upon the Force nonetheless.

“Really?” Yudan mocked. “Are you so certain about that?”

This is a structure created by millennia-old Force-sensitive species. I wonder, did they ever harvest kaiburr?

“This is a pointless conversation,” Juhani replied tersely. “We should stop bickering and go after Revan.”

It would have to be a very large crystal, to throw out that much power-

“At long last, a sentiment I agree with,” Yudan drawled. The Force drew deep underneath his limbs, and next to him Juhani readied herself to move in tandem-“Wait,” I said, and the two stopped mid-stride, turning back to look at me in question.

Kaiburr or not, the monumental Force power could be concealing any number of enemies. The Force had whispered to me that Revan would need aid of some description, that there was danger ahead- but I had no idea in what shape this threat would present itself. The three of us would need to be ready, be strong, be armed-

I stared hard at Yudan Rosh, the Twi’lek who had followed Revan into the depths of the Dark and still carried the shadows of darkness inside him. In many ways, I wondered if he was more of a liability than Revan herself.

Aye, but she was willing to take a chance on him. And the second lightsaber I’d unthinkingly grabbed upon waking in the men’s quarters still sat snug on my belt. I didn’t believe everything was due to the Force... but, sometimes, she certainly seemed to have a wry sense of humour.

“Best we all have weapons,” I muttered, unclipping Zhar’s lightsaber and lobbing it casually to the man who’d killed him. Yudan’s hand shot up in instinct to grasp the hilt. A flash of sheer surprise crossed his face as he surveyed the weapon he’d once pilfered from the leafy floor of the Shadowlands.
I’d not bothered picking his ‘saber up when I’d left that cursed, charred room on the dying Leviathan, but my gaze had landed on Zhar’s old weapon as we’d traipsed out. Revan had used it, briefly, as a secondary hilt, but hadn’t even thought to question its whereabouts since that explosive scene.

Probably she believed it sank with the heavy cruiser, and Revan seemed content with just the one ‘saber these days, seeing as Yudan himself had mangled her off-hand.

There was a certain irony, I thought, in Zhar’s weapon ending up with Yudan Rosh. Mayhap a sense of rightness, depending on what future the Twi’lek chose for himself. And as the green flared from the once-Dark Jedi’s grasp, somehow I knew it was the Force again at work.

_Giving Yudan Rosh a chance, may he be worth it._

“Zhar Lestin’s lightsaber,” Yudan murmured, gazing at the particle blade whose colour mirrored my own.

“Aye. I still plan on having that chat with you, sonny,” I harrumphed, rubbing a hand over my bare scalp. “But that can wait. For now, honour the weapon and its original owner. Mayhap the green will aid you in finding balance.” I snorted. “Since you seem to believe your own waffle about some fancy spiritual meaning behind crystal colours.”

Yudan didn’t acknowledge my words, but remained staring at the lightsaber with a fixed expression.

“Let us go,” Juhani cut in. Her posture was tensed with readiness, her gaze tight on the pyramid. Her own ‘saber ignited, a dark blue single-blade held taut in her grasp. “I have the same ominous premonition as you, Jolee Bindo. Let us go find Revan.”

With a collective nod, the three of us approached the pyramid.

_xXx_

Chapter End Notes

_Coming up: Revan walks amongst the ghosts of her past._

Thanks kosiah for the beta!
Chapter Notes

The first part of this chapter overlaps with the last part of the previous chapter.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Intermesh

- Revan Freeflight -

...

A thousand stars winked like tiny dots of ferracrystal in a sea of black. In front of me, through the transparisteel that encompassed one entire wall of my personal quarters, the universe was laid out in a matrix of opportunities... a game-board that I controlled.

My bare limbs felt languid with the aftermath of sex; a deep lassitude that eased my body as my thoughts stretched ever outwards.

Things were finally coming together. Not as quickly as I had once hoped, but I would yet see my vision of galactic might come to fruition.

Behind me I heard soft footfalls, felt the heat of a naked body draw close. Truly, it had been too long since my desire had been slaked in such a fashion. I had plans to set in motion, but they would keep. For a time.

Revan! A woman's voice, appalled and frantic and amplified by a vast, alien power.

...

A rush of air sucked deep into my lungs; my eyes snapped open in confusion. The shards of the dream slipped away; leaving nothing but the image of infinite space and the lingering impression of physical satiation.

Instinct had me firming my shields against the bond; the first action upon consciousness. I was not ready to risk reaching out for Bastila. Not yet.

An errant notion dashed through my mind: Had it been Bastila's voice, urging me to wake? Had I imagined her hammering at my shields? Bastila... I couldn't- I didn't dare lower my guard, not unless absolutely necessary. Not with Malak so deeply entrenched in her mind.

I sighed, forcing myself to relax back against the soft bedding. I could hear the quiet breathing of Mission above me, and the snuffling snores of Juhani on the other bunk. Comforting, familiar sounds. The Ebon Hawk was the only home I could truly recall, other than the memories of Jen's childhood- and the artificiality of those were glaring in their dissonance.

Like holo-pics pasted over an old album, but the adhesive was inferior and the edges were flapping loose-
Right here, lying in the dim of the port living quarters, I was in the closest space I had to a safe harbour. My heart clenched in trepidation that it could all end so soon-

The best I can do right now is catch another hour of sleep. We’ll be woken when the repairs are complete. Logic sliced through my bittersweet nostalgia; I knew I had to be at the top of my game for what came next. Ruminating over where I considered my only home to be was not going to help in that regard.

With a forced wrench of concentration, I once more focused on emptying my mind of both thought and emotion, while lulling my heart rate and respiration back into a deep, heavy state of slumber.

...

His hand was hot; a welcome burn as it pressed against my naked shoulder. I didn’t turn and face him: it was space I stared out into, infinite space that I mastered. But his tension was evident in the fingers that dug into my flesh, and it amused me.

To think, we play the game of worlds, and yet we are still so embroiled in the personal.

The Sith used passion to augment strength, but a true Sith knew how to use it with calculation.

"I have a right to know what you plan," he bit out. "This concerns me as well as you."

"Enough." I let my command echo on the Force. I let the power circle tight around the muscled, naked body behind me, and my amusement vanished in the blink of an eye. "You will find out when I will it, and not a minute earlier. Obey, and follow. If I have to make you kneel again I shall." I let my voice drop to a whisper. "I would prefer you willing."

He paused, and absently I took note of his inner struggle. It was a trifling observation; my mind was otherwise engaged, stretching out into the plans of the future. There was a tactical victory to be grasped at Deralia, if what Nisotsa had uncovered bore fruit. But I planned to commence my offensive towards the Rodian corridor, and for that I needed a real leader on the other side of the galaxy.

Revan! I must speak with you!

"As you will, Master." His words ghosted past my ear. Was there a tone of defiance in them? Resentment? It was hard to tell, but at least, for now, he was compliant.

For now. Maybe it would be best to send him to Rodia immediately.

I have little time! Please!

But- there was time to play, first. And we both enjoyed that. With a smirk, I turned around-

Wake up!

...

I sat up in bed, gasping. The last eddies of slumber unfurled and vanished as my heart thundered in my ears. The aftershock of a mammoth psychic blow rattled me, dissipating the remnants of the dream that had been about- about-

I grimaced, hands clenching against my sides, twisting the coarse blanket between my fingers. An icy sense of superiority still lingered, the knowledge that I had been the dejarik master: every person, every planet, every fleet had been positioned to my ultimate desire, even the man behind me-

Deralia. The word slithered through my mind with horrifying dread. It had been mentioned, somewhere in the throes of dreamworld that were already fading-

Was this just before everything fell apart? Like it hadn't already, so terribly, fallen apart. Was this a scene of me pushing Malak a step too far, ordering servitude from one who had been an equal, using him like a Corellian Dagger in a game of And'zhai Runes- all the better for my own cold, cold plan-

Mal- Malak- I didn't even really know what the man looked like; in this recollection I hadn't even granted him the courtesy of turning to face him as I demanded his compliance-

-as I planned to take over the galaxy but not before jumping into bed with him once more-

What sort of monster had I been?

The worst, most depraved sort. Who'd cared nothing for-Sithspit. I wasn't getting back to sleep, that was for sure. With a grimace, I rolled out of bed. Maybe a quiet cup of caffa, before the others woke, would allow me some time to gather my thoughts- to push back the shadows of my past and harden my resolve that I could do this- that I was strong enough to stand firm against the corruption I had once embraced.

The common room was dark and quiet as I entered. I took one step towards the percolator and-

-something slammed against my Force shields, shattering through my introspection and splintering the remnants of the dream into oblivion.

This time there could be no doubt what- who that was. Bastila!

You must speak with me!

My mental guards still held, but her words were thrown with so much strength behind them- more than I would have expected from her- that they leech through anyway, each one reverberating with frenzied need.

That sort of potent, wild power would wake the others.

Can I really deny her? She's frantic... she needs me...

Her desperation was evident as I felt another hammer of psychic power- another demand for me to listen-

What if this is Malak's doing? He had his fingers in her soul, true enough. Yet, in the end... what was Darth Malak but a villain of my own creation?

The Dark Side didn’t allow partnership or equality. Somehow, I knew that truth, memory-blind or not. Any relationship would corrupt, in the end; no matter how deep and steadfast. Even the only thing that seemed to remain – physical gratification, if my ominous dreams held any truth – had not held back the inevitable.

Betrayal.

And yet... I couldn't forget the notion that the Dark had been a conscious decision of mine... I had gambled... risked everything – Malak’s love and the love of all others dear to me – as if I believed I was strong enough to own the Dark Side...

I had gambled, and I had lost.

Please!

And Bastila... what was Bastila’s circumstance, but my doing?

I couldn’t deny her.

It took a conscious effort to drop the psychic barrier between us. My soul was instantly submerged in an immense flood of power through the bond; I gasped, rearing back in physical reaction, bombarded by a thousand scents and scenes flashing like wildfire through my mind-

-all too fast to make sense of anything but this overwhelming power-

The bond didn’t feel like Bastila anymore, but something ancient, deep as the blackest ocean, an alien sense of Force that was utterly fathomless-

I knew it, I recognized it-

Revan, Bastila spoke, and the power retreated sharply. Suddenly, Bastila was once more the bond-sister who’d been so intimately connected to me for months. Listen quickly. I dare not trust this sort of communication. Not anymore. Malak is too often in my mind, and the power of the Star Forge augments his abilities.

...it was obvious Malak wasn’t the only one tapping into the Star Forge-

Yes, only under his guidance. Or so he believes. She sounded vaguely irritated. He sleeps, for now. I can only hope this has not awakened him, but I do not dare keep up this communication. He grows interested in psychic abilities, Revan, and he notices when I use them. This will rouse him sooner or later.

How do you know he isn't listening right now?

I don’t. She was impatient. Desperate, also. We must speak. Get yourself to the temple, Revan. The top of the temple. Go. Go, now.

I had to wake the others, at least-

No. Was it my sleepiness that allowed her such easy access to my thoughts? Or was the power beneath her grasp, so foreign and so familiar, magnifying her skill into a staggering form of psychic control that changed the balance of the scales between us? Hurry, Revan. Come alone. I beg you. We must speak, and every second counts.

An insidious thought crept through me: I could not forget all we had devolved into on the Leviathan, and Malak surely held her strings like a puppeteer-

This is no trap! The alien power was there again, strengthening her desperation, throwing her indignance into my face. She was affronted, and had no remorse in showing me so, forcing me to feel the bitter taste of her emotions as they flashed back to me through our mind-link.

Calm down! I snapped back in reaction. That much power was bound to draw the attention of Malak- or any Force-user nearby, really. If he wasn’t there already, behind her every thought—

I had the sense of her sighing in irritation, and the Force ebbed once more, drawn back beneath her shaky control. I am yours, Revan, as you are mine. Our bond allows no other recourse. Trust me. And hurry!

But, no- I couldn’t sense Malak anywhere within her at present. All that shimmered through the bond was Bastila, intertwined with the massive power from the Forge that she kept drawing on.

How could I turn away from her? Or deny her very real desperation?

Waking the others will take time. Time to explain, time to convince. If I hurry, I might be back before anyone notices. But I’d be a fool to keep myself so open to Bastila.

I’ll be there as quick as I can, I promised, and gathered the Force up in the tightest of shields I could manage before running out of the freighter.

xXx

The inner archway of the pyramid was bereft of any natural light. The Force outlined the curve of the walls in blue-black, a perfectly symmetrical surface of some metallic compound I didn't recognize. I strode forward with measured steps, drawing the Force tightly inward, somehow recognizing that allowing my awareness to unfurl would be dangerous-

-glimpses of the truth can be found here-

My thoughts stayed fixed on Bastila. I hadn't spoken to her since I'd left the 'Hawk – I didn't dare risk it. Risk her, risk myself. And yet she was leading me to the top of the pyramid-

-beneath you, the truth is beneath you, power to do what you need-

It was impossible to ignore; the deep thrumming of promise at the bottom of the edifice I now entered. And yet it was Bastila I would follow... what if this is a trap? Why is there no life anywhere nearby? No guards, no sentries, no defence systems? Why has Malak left this place unprotected? Could Bastila have disabled the temple's defences, knowing that we'd need to overcome the EMP scrambler, with the Republic Fleet on its way?

But would she know that? Stars, how had she even known we'd crashed on this unknown planet?

Malak. Malak would have sensed it.

I clenched my teeth, forced the dark thoughts back, and walked on.

The vestibule was metres deep into the pyramid before it opened into a vast inner chamber. Around the edges of the curved wall were incomprehensible sigils written in-

Massasi? Some ancient dialect of Massassi? A quiet, artificial murmur from the back of my head. But no, Jen was wrong. Not Massassi, although there are similarities... I narrowed my eyes, fixating on one intricate glyph directly above my head that abruptly coalesced into meaning-

... "Mastery," I translated, staring hard at the sigil. Flickers of nearby firelight danced over the walls, illuminating the carved inscriptions in a soft golden colour. "The next one states 'of life.' The Rakatan sure like to grandstand their own achievements."
"We didn't have to enter like this," Mal muttered behind me. "It was rash, Revvie. Unnecessary."

"You're wrong." I struggled to hold back a frown at his comment. This was why I'd sent him away before Kashyyyk. Malak had always championed my objectives, but something about the Rakatan technology unsettled him deeply. But I needed him with me on this mission – and I needed him at his best. "I did what I had to."

"You always do."

... The voices fled, and the sigils dimmed to the blue-black of my Force-sight. My breath stuck in my throat. I can't... I can't lose myself to the past. Not here. Swallowing, I unclipped Karon's lightsaber and held it tight, as if for reassurance, before stepping into the inner chamber.

It was a vast, circular room with four exits, including the one at my back. In the centre rose a massive sculpture of a stern Rakata, both eyestalks aimed in my direction, with limbs outstretched as if drawing on the power of the universe itself.

Shooting up from the long-fingered hands and into the ceiling beyond were two dense beams of pure, undiluted energy. In my Force-enhanced sight, they were thick braids of dark vermillion; coagulated blood, the life-force of the galaxy-

-glimpses of the truth-

I shuddered, and dragged my gaze away forcibly. That's the beacon. It's... it's coming from beneath the statue. Prickles of awareness rose to life all over my body, and my skin was suddenly, intensely, hyper-sensitive. The stagnant air felt like it was pressing in, like it had a beat all its own, vibrating with the residue of the beacon itself-

-your past could be revealed here-

My jaw clenched, hard enough to ache. I could feel myself glaring. My fists knotted at my sides, as I stared at the millennia-old Rakata and wondered fiercely what sort of technology they had dabbled in- and whether it led to their odd, unexplained extinction.

The effigy of the Rakata stared back as I struggled to overcome the all-familiar vertigo. His small, thin-lipped mouth was carved downwards in a disapproving sneer-

... "This is what the Rakatan used to look like," I murmured, surveying the scowling statue that was bathed in the glow of amber firelight. Sconces were dotted haphazardly around the walls, all cinched tight around a burning torch apiece. It was an odd contrast of technology: treated wood held aflame in a crude poraclay holder, affixed against a sleek, unblemished wall made from a fine-grade metal even I didn't recognize.

The primitive mystics outside added the torches, no doubt. They have no true sight, no vision beyond the organic. They comprehend so little of their own past greatness.

The chiselled Rakata loomed over us, and soaring through his dead palms blasted the lifeblood of the universe itself. Surely, surely, this was a mirror of what the Star Forge would offer me.

"Keep your awareness held tightly inward," I said, repeating myself from earlier. "This is not the time to investigate the power of the kaiburr buried here."
"I know." His words were short. Sharp. Annoyed. "Ever wondered why the Rakatan died out, Revvie? Ever thought they might have played around with powers beyond their control?"

My gaze stayed fixed on the bust of the Rakata. He looked similar enough to be the same species as the ineffectual Elders who tried to control our entrance; but there were differences, too. "They were taller, more muscular than their Force-blind descendants," I mused, ignoring Malak's earlier words. "The Rakatan of old would surely shudder at how their species devolved."

"What, before or after you-"

"Do you want to leave?" I snapped, a sudden upsurge of anger firing through my gut. "Because honestly, Mal, I'm not in the sodding mood to argue. Either stay and help, or go wait by the shipwreck while I sort this out on my own."

"No. You've wrangled the both of us inside despite the wishes of the Elders. I'll not leave." A heavy sigh from behind had me relaxing; a little, anyway. He sighed a second time. "I- I'm sorry. I don't agree with your methods, but I have your back. I'll always have your back, Revan."

... I shuddered again, recoiling back to the darkened present. The reminiscence of gentle torchlight dissolved, and the room slowly faded back to the indigo of darkness. The statue, no longer resplendent with the flickers of amber fire, was once more a series of hollow blue-black etchings. The only colour in the chamber now was the thick scarlet beams of tempting Force energy the Rakata clutched.

I have to get a sodding move on. The glances of the past were messing with my head. It was me I recalled, driven by need and purpose, but with a calculating edge that felt a trifle too sharp, a fraction too cold... a warning sign of things to come.

I hadn't fallen then- I had logical reasons for my objectives- yet, I wondered... had I already been touched by corruption? Hardened by the horrors of war? Scarred and jaded before I'd even grasped the reins of the Star Forge?

How much was I like that Revan who had walked these walls once?

Who had come here with the overriding desire to claim the Forge for her own?

Who I was doesn't matter, I thought with an inward snarl. My fingers curled tight around Karon's saber, tight enough that I could feel the indentations from the hilt press into my skin. This time I'll destroy the Forge. This time I won't follow the same path.

I've already lived that horror once- even if I don't remember it.

I averted my gaze from the cursed statue and instead examined the exits. The passageways beyond were etchings of indigo lines, enough to make out the detail: two led down, and one revealed steps climbing upwards before disappearing from sight.

I kept the Force cinched tight around me, closed in like a buffer from any outward influence, and strode towards the ascending stairwell.

xXx

The steps curved up in a circular fashion, winding through the temple, circumnavigating the very centre of it. On the inner wall, I could feel the thrumming of the beacon through no more than a few metres of metal. It didn't stop calling me, and the past didn't stop reminding me-

"Uza, pleen, tota, daden," he muttered behind me. Malak had taken to counting the never-ending steps, after complaining about a lack of stars-forsaken elevators. Having exhausted his knowledge of Mando'a, he'd promptly switched to Ryl.

"We'll run out of stairs before you run out of numbers," I murmured, mildly amused. Ryl was one of the few languages we'd known before the Jedi found us. Jonohl had taught us his home-tongue, back when we were kids struggling to survive in the slums of Altizir. He was long gone now, as was every ember of our poverty-stricken childhood.

"Bo, dopa, duba, fwanna," Malak retorted, switching to Huttese.

Maybe, in a sense, the flashes of the past helped distract me, helped keep the temptation of the beacon at bay. But I was dizzy and lightheaded, and I leaned hard against the railing as I trudged ever onwards. Beneath my fingertips, the smooth surface of the alien metal was a familiar sensation in itself. Fragments of memory reared in response, like jagged pieces of a puzzle I had no hope of ever completing-

"The glyphs tell stories of their conquests," I commented. Mal didn't know Rakatan. Mal didn't know about the supercomputer on Kashyyyk, and everything I had learned from it. For some reason, I hadn't been willing, yet, to share what I had found next to the Star Map. "See, this one's about Tatooine."

"Does it talk about their retreat from a bunch of gaffi-wielding primitives?"

It did, actually, but not quite in those words-

I gasped, stumbling up a step, as my gaze caught on the section of glyphs that detailed the terraforming disaster of Tatooine. The part of my mind I identified as Jen struggled and failed to translate it, before a deeper part picked up the reins and-

"An atmospheric calamity, they write," I said, amused. "The Rakatan believed the world itself no longer useful, and appear to have no idea they'd been, essentially, driven out by the Tusken Raiders."

The Sand People...

The chieftain had recognized me. HK had mentioned that-

First time... first time around, I'd dealt with the Sand People peacefully. The realization turned my stomach, and with a sick jolt, I saw once more the bodies HK and I had scythed through, the slaughter we had exhilarated in, the dark contrast to the calculating me of the past who'd instead stopped and collaborated with the natives rather than descending into darkness-

The dead air rasped against my throat as I sucked it in.

Second time around, I went in and slaughtered the lot-

Okay. Okay, maybe that's so. My jaw was clenched tight as I accepted the unnecessary mess I'd wallowed in on that desert planet. Tatooine was a bad time for me. I've grown from then. I know what the frell is going on, now.

Well, mostly. Regardless, I was steadfast- and I would not allow the past, recent or otherwise, to influence my actions from this step forward.

With a wrench, I pulled my gaze away from the revelations of the Rakatan glyphs, and concentrated instead on leading one foot in front of the other.

I'd lost any real awareness of altitude. I'd been ascending for some time now, but it was hard to judge how far from the top I was. The staircase petered out into another room, much smaller than the chamber at the bottom. The Force energy was there, again, but instead of channelling through the medium of a forbidding Rakata, this time it shot up through the centre of the antechamber unencumbered.

I had the strongest desire to step forward and immerse myself in it.

-glimpses of-

The temptation was strong, but so was my self-awareness – I knew just how dangerous this sort of undiluted power could be. Stars, even the old me had remained focused on my end-goal, if the snippets of the past told me anything.

-you could see once more what you found in the Unknown Regions-

Oh... oh that was tantalizing beyond measure.

...which immediately raised my hackles of suspicion-

...

"Is there a danger in walking through this? This- the energy is bleeding through the entire chamber-"

"No," I mused. "It's benign... insofar as the temptation of the kaiburr could be called benign. It is merely concentrated residue. Residue of the kaiburr holding still in this room. You have to be Force-sensitive to pass through this antechamber... and yet controlled enough not to lose yourself to its lure."

Malak didn't respond, but he flanked me as I took a step forward.

"The remnants of the Rakatan are, to a one, blind to the Force," I added, skirting around the centre of the chamber. It was much smaller than the grandiose one at the bottom, and the kaiburr's power was deeply concentrated, here. "They cannot pass through this room. We shall not find any Rakatan beyond."

"Or anywhere else," he muttered.
The residue curled back from the conduit of power, intermingling with the air and swirling through the entire antechamber – right down to the individual molecules I could sense buzzing around me. I kept my gaze averted from the vermillion tideway that blasted through the middle of the room, but I couldn't ignore the seductive wisps of kaiburr that-

Kaiburr... I blinked. I'd remembered something about kaiburr-

In my grasp, Karon's lightsaber hummed. I hadn't noticed it, until now, too caught up in the tangled skeins of the past-

Is this... is this beacon coming from some sort of kaiburr crystal?

Crystals were an amplifier for the Force. Not a source, no; but Yudan had theorized the Star Forge might draw its power from the only sun in this sector. What if the pyramid drew on the life Force of this unknown planet, and then utilized some sort of massive kaiburr to strengthen it, before powering the scrambler?

If that was right... Destroy the crystal, destroy the strength of the signal. Maybe Carth is correct.

My lips thinned, and I took a resolved step forwards. And another. I kept to the edges of the room, looking only beyond to the one exit, focusing my mind on the objective. I reached the threshold, another curved archway of alien metal, and placed my palm against it-

"Revan." His voice was low and serious; serious enough that it had me turning at the threshold, one hand pressed against the cinereal alloy of the wall. "I must say it one more time. Once more, before there is no turning back."

It was hard, to push down the aggravation. This had been our joint quest on Tatooine and Korriban, but it'd all changed on Manaan. He'd begun to doubt, to fear, to disbelieve-

After Manaan, I'd sent him away, ostensibly to check in with the fleet but, in reality, to allow me to find the Star Map on Kashyyyk free of his nagging doubts and cautious concern. I'd wanted him at my side for this final endpoint, though, and he'd come as soon as I'd called.

He always would, no matter his reservations.

I owe him enough to listen, my conscience nagged me. But there was a small, insidious voice deep in the back of my mind that whispered maybe Malak wasn't strong enough for this-

I bit back a sigh, and turned to face him. The Force energy illuminated his handsome face in shadows of blood-red; beyond this room, I knew, everything would be pitch-black. The Rakatan could not pass here, so there would be no more markers of primitive firelight.

"Say your piece, I said, striving to keep my voice reasonable.

"We are already heroes, Revan. We have achieved the impossible. Victory. And you would risk this on-"

"Heroism comes with its own obligations, Malak." I stared deep into the whiskey-brown of his eyes, willing his faith in me to return. It would, I knew, but the battle for it was both annoying and emotionally exhausting.
Yet I did what I had to, whether it was to convince Malak or forge my own path. There was nothing more fundamentally important to me than the continued strength of the Republic, the governance for peace across the galaxy - but it was too weak. Too shaky to withstand -

"Do you really believe what we found is a big enough threat for what you are leading us to? Everyone has differing accounts of what they saw," he said. His eyes beseeched me to listen. "I fear for Talvon's state of mind. Nisotsa is shaken. Alaki -"

"Kreia understands. And she is not the only -"

"I have never trusted that old bat, Revan. She has too many shadows of her own past to remain objective -"

"Malak," I cut in, my voice cooling. "We all saw shades of the same thing. You believed in the danger at first. The Mandalorian threat is nothing to what may come to pass -"

"What may come to pass! And that is exactly it!" he erupted. "Can't you just... let sleeping demons lie? It is beyond known space." His voice held a wheedling tone, a plea for me to falter. A cold chunk of my heart lost respect for him at that very moment. "Your objectives are sound, but your reasoning for them is not."

And this, I thought with frustration, is why I had been elected Supreme Commander ahead of him. Malak had been raised by his enigmatic brother Devari, whereas I'd been fed on Freeflight's stories: fleet strategies of battles long past, political manoeuvrings of dissenting factions, and what I now understood to be passive Force techniques. Oh, Malak had learned something of strategy at Freeflight's knee, but half the time he'd scoffed at the old man's stories.

He'd never resented my promotion ahead of him. Malak knew I made the better leader - even as he was both a brilliant commander and charismatic front-man to the masses. But he lacked the ruthlessness required to oversee the entire game-board.

Malak would do anything for me - even now, I knew, he would follow despite his deep objections - and that was the true difference between us.

He would always follow me, no matter what he had to sacrifice in order to do so. No matter if he believed I was wrong.

The same cold chunk of my heart withered at the realization.

"We go forward, Malak," I said, turning my back on him to face the smaller stairway. "The Mandalorians were only the start of this war. We go forward to save the Republic."

...

I was leaning against the exit, shivering with dizzying breaths of air as my awareness returned. Behind me, the channel of Force called, a seducing siren-song of power that battled with the nauseating crumbs of the past.

-you could see once more what you found in the Unknown Regions-

What if... what if Malak had been right? It sounded like he'd believed whatever we'd found... we could have just left it alone.

For nothing... nothing had ever emerged from the Unknown Regions. Nothing had threatened the galaxy, the Republic... except me.
And now, Malak.

The shudder that coursed through me was borne of deep, icy horror. I'd fallen- and what if I'd fallen for a reason that didn't even exist?

It doesn't matter. The thought was sad and hollow, and it echoed like the gong of an ancient tabernacle. It doesn't matter. That binding truth sank deep into my soul. If I fell due to madness, or a lust for power, or because of a non-existent threat- it truly doesn't matter.

What matters is cleaning up my mess.

Maybe, all the past did now was confuse the issue. Maybe, I didn't need any of my past to move forward.

you could see-

And that meant the damn Force beacon had as much power over me as the fragments of my broken history: only what I allowed it.

And I would allow it nothing.

xXx

The next set of stairs was steep, curving in tighter to the centre of the pyramid. Force-power pushed at my heels as I clambered forever upwards, feeling the urgent drive to ascend as quickly as possible to Bastila.

To the top of the temple.

The stairwell straightened, abruptly. The width of the pyramid could not be large, now, yet the stairs were ascending in one direction only; moving off-centre from what had been my path so far. The beacon was behind me as I followed the corridor, which flattened out before making an abrupt turn-

And there was another archway, leading into an even smaller chamber. No Force energy here, though; the room was off-set from the centre, but even so, the beacon wasn't far away.

I took a cautious step forward, ducking into the entranceway-

"Stop," I commanded, at the threshold-

I paused, staring into the pitch room beyond. On the far side-

"What?"

Nothing but-

Two short staircases, both leading to a door apiece. The Rakata Elders had said either door would lead to the roof, to the controlling console of the kaiburr, but through the walls and floor in this antechamber I could feel the faint oscillations of a different mechanism-

There was nothing beneath my feet now but cold, dead metal.

My eyes narrowed, tracing the patterns of faint electricity to the staircase. Hidden panels, triggering a mechanism that would- that would-
"It's a trap," I stated, staring hard at the doors beyond.

There were no doors. Just a vast hole- most of the far wall ripped out in chunks, allowing starlight from outside to seep in-

"Two people, walking through each door simultaneously, would counter-balance it," I said, frowning. "But enter with only one and something... something would activate-"

I was alone this time. But I couldn't sense anything except the tantalising, overwhelming promise of the kaiburr. Nothing in this room.

"You need two people to cross this room," Malak surmised. "That's why the Elders insisted on only one."

"Because they never planned for me to actually reach the Star Forge," I finished. "They've been protecting this relic for generations, yet they are Force-blind. They must know about this room; this trap or test that their ancestors created. And so, the Elders use it as the only means they have to stop Force-users – by deception. By convincing them they must go in alone."

Something had happened. Something had changed this room. For, now, it felt safe to cross, safe to clamber over the metallic rubble that hadn't been there in the past; and scale the far wall before crawling through the hole to outside-

"You suspected a trap, before we entered? Is that why you killed them all?"

"I knew there was subterfuge of some sort," I murmured absently, drawing the Force in deep. The kaiburr beneath us resonated in response, threading into the energy I harnessed, promising more the more I took-

I stepped forward, hands outstretched, almost expecting the room to collapse or explode or fill with lethal electrocution- and yet knowing it wouldn't, all at the same time.

"What are you doing?" he demanded, sensing the Force coalesce beneath my grasp. "There's two of us. You said we could clear this room safely-"

"Stay behind me," I warned, still poised at the entrance, unwilling to step forward until I was satisfied. "I refuse to leave this mechanism intact to catch the next Force-user unaware. It is millennia old. What if it triggers spontaneously? What if it activates on the two of us regardless? Who knows if one of us should ever have to return, alone, for some reason?"

The power grew, and I was ready to unleash it-

I gasped, the memory of a Force backlash shuddering in my mind. The sight of metal warping and shredding, the staircases melting, violent purple electricity lashing through the room as I held it at bay from the threshold and destroyed the mechanisms inbuilt into the walls and flooring-

I stumbled forward, landing hard on my palms, looking up to the jagged hole of starlight-

"Done," I said, dropping my hands. The skin on my palms burned, but it was a meaningless injury, easy to ignore.

"You drew on the kaiburr, there." Malak's voice held a touch of awe. "That- that- was immense."

"Yes," I agreed. It was hard to push the lure of the kaiburr back, but I would. Self-control was key; I understood that well enough. Stepping through the room, I noticed with satisfaction that it had transformed into a ruin of rubble and cooling metal. An acrid smell filled the air with a sharp, caustic edge. Opposite us, the stairs and doors were gone; in their place a torn chunk of the wall gaped open to the elements, bathing the far side of the antechamber in the golden rays of sunshine.

My vision was eclipsed again, as sunlight morphed into starlight, and the smell of burnt metal vanished. I pushed against my palms, heaving back to my feet with effort, and strode to the far wall.

Bastila might be here. Enough of the past. It's time to focus on the present.

The bottom of the hole was at least two metres high; with a quick twist of Force energy, I jumped, caught my hands on the edges, and swung one leg over into the space beyond.

I stood in a courtyard, walled in partially by the sloping sides of the pyramid, but it was larger than I expected. From the ground the pyramid had appeared to close directly into a point at its apex; but I saw now this wasn't the case at all. Above me, there was a fair clearance of open air, allowing an unencumbered view of the stars above.

In the middle of the courtyard the raw energy of the kaiburr shot straight into the heavens. Somehow, from there, the signal spread out to encompass the entire sector. Maybe the planet's atmosphere diffuses the signal as it passes through... spreads the power out far and wide. The signal went a long way... I sensed that much when we'd been landing. The EMP scrambler covered more distance than anyone would realistically expect.

Mere metres in front of the fount of kaiburr power rested an innocuous console. My gaze fixed on it. Maybe that's how I can disable the scrambler. But there was no way Malak would have left it unguarded, surely-

Not unless Bastila did something.

Frowning, I looked around. The console was bathed in the vermillion radiance of the beacon, but the corners of the courtyard were darker. On the far side, behind the blast of Force, were a set of misshapen shadows-

I stepped forward and around, the beacon to my side before the blue-black outlines translated into any sort of sense-

A snubfighter. The realization was confusing, almost bewildering. A sleek, foreign snubfighter, big enough for one or two sents. Jerking my gaze up, I frowned at the clearance above – it would be possible to launch the ship from here without touching the Force beacon, but it would require finesse.

What the frell is a snubfighter doing here? On the darkened ground in front of the fighter was an oval holo-stand I barely noticed. Is it Bastila's?

Was she in the snubfighter? I was here, and it was time to find out what was going on. I kept my gaze fixed on the angular cockpit of the small fighter, expecting it to hiss open and my bond-sister to jump out at any moment – even though I couldn't think how she'd have escaped from Malak's clutches.

Behind me, in the depths of the pyramid, the Force flickered.

With a conscious effort of will, I dropped all shields within the bond, and reached out.

The Force flickered again. And then a third time.
Bastila? I called out, clear and loud through our mind-link. I'm here.

xXx

Chapter End Notes

Coming up next: Bastila's plan differs from Malak's.
Many thanks to kosiah for the beta and suggestions.
I stared at the console screen.

It shall not be long, now. Patience. Patience is a facet of self-control. My fingers tapped against the sleek silver of the shiny console; the tapping noise both discordant and overly loud in the empty control room.

Patience is the companion of wisdom. I recalled my father murmuring that once, in the middle of an exposition regaling a rogue hulak wraid and a foiled scent trap.

Patience is an art of discipline, a mechanized voice thrummed in my head. But you must know when to employ it, little one, and when restraint becomes nothing more than inaction.

I shuddered. Malak.

...

“Emotions fuel our strength, little one,” Malak murmured. I was some metres back, lightsaber held in a shaky grasp, perspiration matting my hair to my neck. No matter how I persevered, I could not break through his guard. But if I did not try to his satisfaction... Malak became displeased. “Your rage, your lust for vengeance... all of it can augment your power. If you have the calculation to use it wisely.”

With a burst of Force I charged, changing direction at the final moment before lowering one end of my scarlet double-blade in a sideways swipe.

Malak chortled, somehow standing at ease metres away, while I lunged impotently through empty air.

I had not even seen him move.

I had tried, for a time, to remain semi-passive during what Malak liked to term our advancement spars. Malak always defeated me, but he was more... gratuitous about it when my effort was not to his satisfaction. And I had seen enough of the impersonal medics on the Star Forge.

I had felt enough of pain.
The heat of my own chaotic emotions was far preferable... and it soothed the hollow fear in my soul.

“Sometimes you must remain patient until you register an opening,” he commented. His single blade was held loosely, ineffectually at his side. Did he mean for me to strike again? “Patience is an art of discipline.” His head cocked; his attention drawn to the sleek exit hatch of the training room. It was sealed shut. “But you must know when to employ it, little one, and when restraint becomes nothing more than inaction.”

Was he mocking me? Darth Malak stood, face averted, sharp yellow eyes creased fixedly on the closed exit like it was a greater hazard than I was. The bitter virulence that simmered within me these days flared; and I was speeding forward again, feeling my lips curl over my teeth as I could see my lightsaber whir fast enough to-

-it crashed against his in a shuddering parry, and his corrupted gaze swung back to mine from beyond the crossed blades.

“Good!” Malak laughed, his voice no more than a series of mechanical whirs that haunted my every waking moment. “You are learning, little one. But hold, for now. We have a visitor.”

His gloved hand moved; a short, abrupt motion of command. My lightsaber deactivated in automatic reflex.

The swish of the hatch opening echoed in the barren room. The man who entered was clad in an ostentatious silver-and-rubescent tunic, which clung to a long-limbed, athletic form. Rounded yellow eyes sparked like poisoned gems inset in a face of white, bordered by a tail of straight black hair.

The man appraised me openly, even as his long strides took him directly to Darth Malak. He knelt effortlessly, in a subservient move that was as fluid as it was graceful.

“My lord,” he murmured.

“Sharlan,” Malak acknowledged. Despite the automated timbre of Malak’s voice, I was accustomed to gauging his emotions from it. Malak was displeased. “You took longer than you should have.”

Sharlan Nox. One of Malak’s highest ranked Dark Jedi. The only one that remained, now.

The searing sound as I rammed Revan’s lightsaber deep into Kylah’s betraying heart flashed through my mind. The death throes of her smoking corpse-

“My apologies,” the man drawled, smoothly returning to his feet. He brushed a long-fingered hand along the length of a cuff, smoothing the material over his chalk-white skin. “It took time to round up the pets you require, my lord. Evading the Republic fleet was also a-

“You have command of a cloaked starship from this very Forge, Sharlan. Do you mean to suggest its abilities are inferior to those of the Republic Fleet’s?” Malak’s voder-enhanced voice lowered; a dangerous indication of his mood.

“Yes, my lord!” Sharlan tinkled a laugh. “Your cloaking technology is superior to anything the Republic could counter with. I only hope my experiments serve you as prodigiously.”

“Is that one of them?” Malak snapped, crooking a finger towards something beyond the Dark Jedi’s back.

I had not noticed the silent, kneeling figure behind Sharlan Nox.

A ghostly tremor whispered down my back. Sometimes, I had the soul-freezing notion that my awareness was entirely ensnared in the nebulous vortex of Darth Malak.

Revan, I whispered uselessly to myself, keeping the thought small.

I had not been able to reach her since our victory on the Leviathan. I survived as I appeased Darth Malak- but he did not own me. The one thread that held me from submerging completely under his dominion was still out there, somewhere, having promised to come for me.

Revan.

“‘I have brought you eight in total,’” Sharlan Nox trilled, tapping a skeletal digit against his duranex-clad thigh. “‘Come here, pet.’”

The silent stranger was a male Human, young and attractive, with thick brown lips and midnight skin. His gaze was downcast as he strode to Sharlan’s side.

I shivered. I knew little of Sharlan Nox, other than that he had been found by Revan herself in the wake of Malachor. Not a fallen Jedi. Not one who had ever touched the light, except for perhaps the most incurious of glances.

Sharlan held the passive Human’s jaw in a pale hand, before leaning forward and... and kissing the man... thoroughly... in front of Darth Malak himself!

My cheeks were aflame as I jerked my attention away, both affronted and highly uncomfortable.

“‘Enough, Sharlan! Else there will be little of use left in your pets. Control your appetite or I shall control it for you.’”

