Identities of a lost soul

by ether_fanfic

Summary

Originally posted on fanfiction.net. Moving to a03 in 2017.

KotOR: A quiet scholar onboard the Endar Spire suffers a head injury that changes everything. Dragged unwillingly into a battle for the fate of the galaxy, the real struggle is a three-way conflict of emerging identities struggling for dominance, and fragments of the past that cloud the present.

[Knights of the Old Republic re-telling with deviations and twists.]
The Force is sentient. Some believe it's the subconsciousness of all living beings combined.

Yes, yes, I know what the masters say these days: that attributing a sentience to the energy that binds us all is misleading, but pshaw! I've been around a lot longer than those young bucks who think they rule the galaxy. I have my own ideas and experiences that aren't going to buckle to some fancy talking robe with a glow stick, who believes that a mere half-century of breathing equates them the right to inform others what to think.

I was like that, once. Centuries ago, when I still held the position of Chronicler.

These days, I spend my time talking to ghosts and any padawan like you that comes searching for the crazy old coot haunting the back of the Enclave.

I suppose you've come looking for wisdom, or maybe a story? Well, if it's the former, you must know that's better drawn through experience than advice. Who'd want to do what a wrinkly old man tells them? But if you want to hear a yarn or two... I can help there. I'm a geriatric, now, but I still retain a gift unique even amongst the Jedi.

The masters may have advised you to avoid me and my tales. I can guess at their disapproving words: don't listen to the kooky fossil whose mind wanders off on tangents as tangled as a spiced-up spacer. His accounts are inaccurate and unbelievable; they contradict the archives and embellish the mundane.

But I tell what I see. And you can see, too, through my eyes - if you have the patience and the inclination.

For people leave echoes in the Force. Like psychic little footprints, I've always thought. And the more attuned to the Force, the greater the imprint. Well, I can see those memories, those reverberations, those ripples from souls who breathed long, long ago. 'Tis a rare gift, and one not understood by many, even from within the ranks of the Jedi.

I can show you a story, if you like. For that is what I do - I share the visions I pull from the eddies of the Force. And as I haven't come across you before, I shall choose one of my favourites. The Force has its favourites too, you know, and one of its greatest was Revan.

I suppose you will have heard of Revan. For what scholar of the Force hasn't, be they light, dark, or tiptoe along the middle-ground. Even millennia later, and Revan's story still fascinates.

But the transcripts and archives do not tell the whole tale, and some of the absolute fundamentals are just plain wrong.

What, you don't believe me? You think holo-footage and secure-linked archives are infallible, and cannot be edited by technology? But history is changed all the time: by conquerors, by agendas, even by simple translation errors. Events may be exaggerated, transformed, or hidden, due to someone's desire to change the past. And while the essence of Revan's story has travelled through the ages, it has not come through exact.

But where to start, ahhh... for Revan's story is a long one, with many facets. Hero, saviour, conqueror, villain… perhaps the very contradictions of Revan's life is the reason it is such a venerated fable.

I like to start at Revan's second beginning.

For how many people really get a second chance? If you had one, would you do things differently? Or would you choose the same path?

The echoes I see… they are snatches of Revan's life. And when you are dealing with someone as powerful as Revan, those swept into the same orbit leave ripples in the Force as well. So this is not just Revan's story, but also those who were betrayed, saved, transformed and destroyed by Revan.

So sit back, young padawan, and share these visions with me. Witness Revan's rebirth, and see what wisdom you can glean from living someone else's second chance.

xXx

Author's Note:

Things you need to know about IOALS (Identities of a lost soul):

1\(IOALS\) began as a tribute to the game I loved so much in 2004, before blowing out of proportion and turning into a full blown saga. I had a ten-year break between chapters 45-46, which is partly why it's taken me so long to write. You could call this a multi-novel series, if you will, with each arc bridging to the next by the Hyperspace chapters. IOALS deviates from canon in both minor and major ways as the story progresses - because it wasn't canon when I first began the story, or for greater realism - or sometimes simply to make a well-trodden story more interesting. If you have any questions of why I have done something, drop me a line! I do always try to swing the plot back to canon - to stay true to the underlying story.

2\(I\) have not played SWtoR. This saga is a precursor to KotOR 2, and has ties-ins, nods, and some K2 characters making brief appearances, but it is not compliant with the Revan novel, nor with SWtoR. If I write the sequel, that won't be either.

3\(I\)OALS is an experiment at switching first person POV's. Character list is below, followed by Mando'a Glossary, followed by the list of POV's per chapter.

4\(I\) love reviews. I think every writer does. Encouragement, comments, constructive criticism, makes our writing feel more worthwhile - to know there are people out there reading it. I'd love to hear from you! Even if you having nothing to say other than that you are reading it. Honestly, a ping in my inbox from a review can make my day :-)
Character Glossary:

Each character will have the suffix [species, gender, OC] - 'OC' is only there if they are a non-canonical character. Species and gender are there if known. Characters are listed either by their current location when they first appear in this saga, or their affiliation, depending on is the most relevant. Some important historical characters follow afterwards. Very minor characters are omitted.

Endar Spire:
Bastila Shan [Human, female]: Jedi Padawan with overall commanding privileges on the Endar Spire. Known for her famous battle meditation used in the current war, and her role in the downfall of Darth Revan.
Carth Onasi [Human, male]: Republic Captain and commanding navi-advisor to the Endar Spire. Veteran of the Mandalorian Wars, and commended multiple times for valour.
Galdea [Cerean, male, OC]: Jedi Master in charge of the Jedi squad aboard the Endar Spire. Member of the Dantooine Council. Known as a master of the psychic side of the Force.
Jen Sahara [Human, female, OC]: Civilian scholar in ancient archaeology, attached to the Jedi squad.
Kylah Aramai [Mirialan/Human, female, OC]: Jedi Knight, part of the Jedi squad, close friend to Padawan Bastila Shan.
Neann Dallash [Zabrak/Human, male, OC]: Republic Lieutenant, senior navi-pilot and intelligence operative.
Trask Ulgo [Human, male]: Republic Ensign attached to the Jedi squad.

Taris:
Brejik [Human, male]: Leader of the Vulkars.
Calo Nord [Human, male]: Bounty-hunter with ties to the Exchange and the Sith Empire, and Davik Kang's second-in-command.
Canderous Ordo [Human, male]: Mandalorian mercenary working for Davik Kang. War General of Clan Ordo during the Mandalorian Wars.
Davik Kang [Human, male]: Exchange Head on Taris.
Gadon Thek [Human, male]: Leader of the Hidden Beks.
Gurney [Human, male]: Assistant to Dr Zelka Forn, has links to the Exchange.
Lina [Zabrak, female, OC]: Friend of Mission Vao.
Mission Vao [Twile'lek, female]: Member of the Hidden Beks.
Rukil [Human, male]: Old man in the Undercity encampment.
Sancha [male, OC]: Barman in Javyar's Cantina.
T3-M4 [astromech droid]: Custom-built droid ordered by Davik Kang.
Zaalbar [Wookiee, male]: Best friend of Mission Vao.
Zelka Forn [Human, male]: Doctor in the Upper City who mans the Free Clinic.

Jedi Order - Dantooine Enclave:
Belaya Linn [Human, female]: Jedi Knight who disappeared to find Juhani after her failed Knight trials.
Dorak [Human, male]: Jedi Master who trained Dak Vesser amongst others. Chronicler of the Dantooine Enclave.
Jai'lal [male, OC]: Powerful Jedi Master of Dantooine, who accompanied Padawan Bastila Shan in the stealth strike on Darth Revan, and fell in the ensuing battle.
Juhani [Cathar, female]: Jedi Padawan who disappeared after believing she killed Master Quatra during her Knight trials.

Karon Enova [Zabrack, female, OC]: Jedi Master who initially trained Revan Freeflight. Most of Jedi life spent attached to the Coruscant High Temple. Member of the Dantooine Council.

Kester [male, OC]: Powerful Jedi Master of Dantooine, who accompanied Padawan Bastila Shan in the stealth strike on Darth Revan, and fell in the ensuing battle.

Lars Thorstan [Twilek, male, OC]: New padawan to Master Karon Enova.

Nemo [Human, male]: Jedi Master to Belaya Linn.

Quatra [Zabrack, female]: Jedi Master who trained Juhani.

Vandar Tokare [male]: Jedi Grandmaster who trained Yudan Rosh amongst others. Regarded as a master duellist. Leader of the Dantooine Enclave, member of the Dantooine Council, and absentee member of the Coruscant High Council.

Vima Sunrider [Human, female]: Jedi Knight with near-master status and a powerful command of the psychic side of the Force. Known for her nomadic lifestyle.

Vrook Lamar [Human, male]: Jedi Master to Padawan Bastila Shan. Some of Jedi life spent attached to the Coruscant High Temple. Member of the Dantooine Council.

Zhar Lestin [Twilek, male]: Jedi Master who initially trained Malak Devari. Most of Jedi life spent attached to the Coruscant High Temple.

Dark Jedi of the Sith Order (excluding Korriban Academy):

Bandon Stone [Human, male]: Shadow Hand to Darth Malak, stylizes himself as Darth Bandon, upper-ranked Dark Jedi.

Darth Malak [Human, male]: Formerly Malak Devari, now Dark Lord of the Sith Empire. Originally apprenticed to Darth Revan, before betraying the Sith Lord above Deralia and claiming the title of Dark Lord of the Sith for himself. Also see entry under The Jedi Thirteen.

Nisotsa Organa [Human, female]: Recruitment Officer and former Intelligence Head, upper-ranked Dark Jedi, recruited Dak Vesser. Also see entry under The Jedi Thirteen.

Sharlan Nox [Anzati, male, OC]: Recruitment Officer, upper-ranked Dark Jedi. Recruited Dustil Onasi and Mekel Kadoni.

Yudan Rosh [Twilek, male, OC]: Supreme Fleet Commander of the Sith Empire, upper-ranked Dark Jedi, leader of the Sith Front in the Rodian Corridor. Also see entry under The Jedi Thirteen.

Tatooine:

Griff Vao [Twilek, male]: Brother to Mission Vao, travelled to Tatooine (amongst other planets) to make his fortune. Currently employed by Czerka Corporation.

Lena Torand [Twilek, female]: Ex-girlfriend of Griff Vao and current partner to Komad Fortuna. Followed Griff to Tatooine.

Komad Fortuna [Twilek, male]: Hunter on Tatooine.

HK-47 [protocol and combat droid]: Custom-specced droid in Yuka Laka's shop.

Yuka Laka [Ithorian, male]: Runs a droid shop.

GenoHaradan:

Ajax Zarr [Zabrack, male, OC]: Senior data analyst in the GenoHaradan, reports to Spymaster Gaalin.

Eridius Talav [male, OC]: Overseer in the GenoHaradan.

Gaalin [male, OC]: Spymaster of the GenoHaradan who reports to Overseer Eridius.

Hulas [Rodian, male]: GenoHaradan recruiter based in Ahto City, Manaan.

Jeebra Noob [Rodian, male, OC]: Senior data analyst in the GenoHaradan, reports to Spymaster Gaalin.

Rulan Prolik [male]: Shapeshifter and retired Overseer, predecessor to Eridius. Currently based on Kashyykk.
Tealia [Zabrak, female, OC]: Personal assistant to Overseer Eridius.

Mana'an:
Gerith [male, OC]: Senate liaison stationed at the Republic embassy in Ahto City.
Kono Nolan [Human, male]: Lead research scientist for the Republic. Stationed on secret underwater kolto-harvesting base.
Laconi [Human, male, OC]: Republic Ensign stationed at the Republic embassy in Ahto City.
Roland Wann [Human, male]: Commander on the Republic Embassy in Ahto City.
Waltzar [male, OC]: Republic Lieutenant attached to the Embassy, mans the Salvage Craft Oceanic Bounty.

Korriban:
Allen Bala [Human, male, OC]: Mandalorian mercenary based in Dreshdae, younger brother to Jagi.
Dak Vesser [Human, male]: Adept of the Sith Academy. Originally from the Dantooine Jedi Enclave and a good friend to Belaya Linn and Juhani, before leaving the Jedi in dissatisfaction. Part of Uthar Wynn's faction.
Dustil Onasi [Human, male]: Adept of the Sith Academy, son of Carth Onasi, survivor of the Telos bombing. Affiliated with Uthar Wynn's faction, and secret protege of Uthar.
Ergeron Jangar [male]: Mandalorian mercenary based in Dreshdae, old friend of Canderous Ordo.
Jagi Bala [Human, male]: Mandalorian mercenary based in Dreshdae.
Jorak Uln [male]: Original Headmaster of the Sith Academy when opened by Darth Revan. Was defeated by Uthar Wynn in a coup and believed to have been killed by him.
Kel Algwinn [Human, male]: Adept of the Sith Academy, part of Yuthura Ban's faction.
Mekel Kadoni [Human, male]: Adept of the Sith Academy, survivor of the Telos bombing, part of Yuthura Ban's faction and favourite of Yuthura. Was once good friends with Dustil Onasi.
Selene [Human, female]: Initiate of the Sith Academy, disappeared two years ago, close friend to Mekel Kadoni and Dustil Onasi.
Shaardan [Human, male]: Initiate of the Sith Academy.
Thalia May [Human, female]: Adept of the Sith Academy, recently disappeared, part of Yuthura Ban's faction.
Lashowe [Human, female]: Adept of the Sith Academy, part of Uthar Wynn's faction and favourite of Uthar.
Uthar Wynn [Human, male]: Headmaster of the Sith Academy, upper-ranked Dark Jedi of the Sith Empire.
Yuthura Ban [Twilek, female]: Second to Headmaster Uthar Wynn of the Sith Academy.

Republic officers - Mid Rim and Outer Rim:
Adashan [Mon Calamari, male, OC]: General of the Republic Army, veteran of the Mandalorian Wars, and commander of the dreadnought Lightstar.
Forn Dodonna [Human, female]: Admiral of the Republic Navy, veteran of the Mandalorian Wars, and commander of the heavy cruiser Meridus.
Fulmosh [Rodian, male, OC]: Gunner to Jordo Merrix, and Republic Ensign.
Jordo Merrix [Human, male]: Republic Captain and Wing Commander. Telosian native whose wife and daughter died in the Telos bombing. Old friend of Carth Onasi.
Davis Tar'coya [Sullustan, male, OC]: Commodore of the Republic Navy, veteran of the Mandalorian Wars, and second to Admiral Dodonna.
Kashyyyk:
Boda [male, OC]: Mandalorian mercenary working for Czerka.
Chorrawl [Wookiee, male]: Young passionate Wookiee sold into slavery.
Chuundar [Wookiee, male]: Current chieftain of Rwookrrorro, older brother of Zaalbar, and first son of former chieftain Freyyr.
Da'thok Kelborn [male, OC]: Mandalorian mercenary hired by Czerka that Canderous Ordo meets.
Dan Fett [male, OC]: Mandalorian mercenary hired by Czerka that Canderous Ordo meets.
Drawwlog [Wookiee, male, OC]: Aide to chieftain Chuundar. Years ago, Drawwlog and Ruubarg confided in Zaalbar what they knew of Chuundar's secret tach trade. After Ruubarg died of illness and Zaalbar went public with Chuundar's dealings, Drawwlog denied all knowledge.
Freyyr [Wookiee, male]: Zaalbar's father and chieftain of Rwookrrorro before Chuundar exiled him to the Shadowlands.
Growwhul [Wookiee, male, OC]: Old One of Rwookrrorro, life-mate to Tasharr.
Jabakka [Wookiee, male, OC]: Oldest of the Old Ones of Rwookrrorro.
Jacen Ordo [Human, male, OC]: Mandalorian mercenary hired by Czerka. Cousin to Canderous Ordo, and regarded as an up-and-coming Ordo leader during the Mandalorian Wars.
Jernnin Lok [Besalisk, male, OC]: Mandalorian mercenary hired by Czerka that Canderous Ordo meets, Third of the Lok Clan during the Mandalorian Wars.
Ruubarg [Wookiee, male, OC]: Years ago, Ruubarg and Drawwlog confided in Zaalbar that Chuundar was involved with the Czerka tach trade. Ruubarg became very ill and died shortly afterward.
Tasharr [Wookiee, female, OC]: Old One secretly sold into slavery by Chuundar, and life-mate to Growwhul.
Trallia Kelborn [female, OC]: Mandalorian mercenary hired by Czerka that Canderous Ordo meets. Known for risky basilisk manoeuvres during the Mandalorian Wars.

Sith Officers - Mid Rim and Outer Rim:
Delia [Sullustan, female, OC]: Lieutenant of the Sith Empire, and second to Admiral Karath.
Sara [Sullustan, female, OC]: Admiral of the Sith Empire, and veteran Republic officer from the Mandalorian Wars who followed Darth Revan to join the newly-created Sith Empire. Second-in-charge of the Sith Front in the Rodian Corridor, reports to Dark Jedi Yudan Rosh.
Saul Karath [Human, male]: Admiral of the Sith Empire, and veteran Republic officer from the Mandalorian Wars who followed Darth Revan to join the newly-created Sith Empire. Commander of the Leviathan. Telosian native and original mentor of Carth Onasi.

Jedi Order - Coruscant High Council:
Atris Surik [Human, female]: Jedi Master on the High Council, half-sister to Meetra Surik.
Kavar Kira [Human, male]: Jedi Master on the High Council, known as a master duellist, and originally master to Meetra Surik. Has links to the royal family of Onderon.
Lonna Vash [Human, female]: Jedi Master on the High Council.
Zez-Kai Ell [Human, male]: Jedi Master on the High Council, originally master to Nisotsa Organa.

Other:
Dillan Starsson [male, OC]: PR Agent to the Outer Rim worlds for the Exchange.
Marlani Gerrant [female, OC]: Senior Marketing Overseer and PR spokesperson for Czerka Corporation - Intergalactic news.
Seriina Star [Human, female, OC]: Intergalactic actress who shot to fame due to her notorious holo-flicks loosely based on the life of Revan Freeflight. OC from kosiah's fic 'Memory'.
Suvam Tan [Rodian, male]: Sole operative of an abandoned space station orbiting Yavin IV, that runs a trade in illegal goods and ship repair, predominantly for the Exchange but also with some Sith contacts.

Ularic Gren [Human, male, OC]: The Republic Senate's official correspondent to the Intergalactic HoloNet news.

Sith Officers/crew of the Star Forge:
- Atton Rand [Human, male]: Sith strikefighter pilot.
- Beso [male, OC]: Commodore of the Sith Empire, head of Internal Defence.
- Carly [Rodian, female, OC]: Ensign of the Sith Empire, maintenance tech. Reports to Corporal Kampton. Impersonated by the shapeshifter Rulan Prolik.
- Inon Daelidar [Zabrak, male, OC]: General of the Sith Empire, Commander of the Star Forge, and veteran Republic officer from the Mandalorian Wars who followed Darth Revan to join the newly-created Sith Empire.
- Jha'hasi [Human, male, OC]: Lieutenant of the Sith Empire, communications technician and liaison to Commodore Beso / General Daelidar.
- Kampton [Rodian, male, OC]: Corporal of the Sith Empire, and second-in-command of Maintenance. Reports to Commodore Beso.
- Slayers [multiple]: A Force-blind shadowy group of assassins created by Dark Jedi Jonn Dan to hunt down and either kill or turn Jedi with the aid of Force-suppressing technology. Members include: Jaq, Min, Ran, Ros, Tor.
- Troystar [Human, male, OC]: ID of a Sith captain and starpilot from a stealth-capable Aurek-class snubfighter. Both ship and captain were captured by Admiral Dodonna's forces at the culmination of the battle above Kashyyyk.

Republic officers/crew - Unknown Regions:
- Rickard Gant [male, OC]: Admiral of the Republic Navy, veteran of the Mandalorian Wars, and commander of the dreadnought Astral Pride.
- Joss [male, OC]: Republic Ensign and starpilot.
- Lilani [female, OC]: Republic gunner to Ensign Joss.
- Sammy Tobards [male, OC]: Republic Ensign, gunner to Corporal Tensey, and expert marksman.
- Tensey [female, OC]: Republic Corporal and starpilot.

Historical Figures - The Mandalorian Wars - The Jedi Thirteen (also known as Revan's Guard of Twelve):
- Alaki Vash [male, OC]: Turned to the Dark Side under Revan's leadership. Killed by Bandon Stone shortly after Arran and Bandon's betrayal at Deralia.
- Arran Da'klor [Zeltron, male, OC]: Worked closely with Nisota Organa and her younger cousin Neiza Organa. Turned to the Dark Side under Revan's leadership. Arran Da'klor was killed by Darth Revan on Deralia due to his betrayal.
- Cariaga Sin [Human, female]: Died during the Mandalorian Wars.
- Jexer Te'reda [male, OC]: Turned to the Dark Side under Revan's leadership. Died sometime during Revan's war against the Republic.
- Jonn Dan [male, OC]: Turned to the Dark Side under Revan's leadership. Original creator of the Slayers. Killed by Yudan Rosh.
- Malak Devari [Human, male]: Grew up in poverty on Talshion, little-known planet along the Outer Rim. Reputed to be the most powerful Force-user found in centuries together with Revan Freeflight. Recruited to the Jedi Order six years beyond the usually accepted guideline of ten Standard years. Shot to galactic fame during the Mandalorian Wars as one of the most pivotal members of the Jedi Thirteen. Turned to the Dark Side under Revan's leadership. Betrayed Darth Revan above Deralia, and claimed the mantle of Dark Lord of the Sith.
Meetra Surik [Human, female]: Along with Revan Freeflight, Malak Devari and Yudan Rosh, Meetra Surik was one of the four most famous knights in the Jedi Thirteen. A Force-empath that was well-regarded by all, Meetra was known as a competent ground general during the Mandalorian Wars who worked closely with Revan, Yudan, and Xaset Terep. Meetra and Xaset were pivotal to the destruction of Malachor V that ended the Mandalorian Wars. Having not been sighted publicly since then, both Jedi are presumed dead by the galaxy at large, but still hailed as heroes of the Republic due to their actions and leadership during the Mandalorian Wars.

Nisotsa Organa [Human, female]: Intelligence Expert who worked closely with Revan Freeflight, Malak Devari and Arran Da'klor. Turned to the Dark Side under Revan's leadership. Known as 'The Quiet Death' as a Dark Jedi, due to her cautious nature and inclination to strike from the shadows. Agreed to betray Darth Revan in the Deralian trap with Arran Da'klor, Malak Devari and Bandon Stone.

Rab Vooktari [male, OC]: Turned to the Dark Side under Revan's leadership. Died sometime during Revan's war against the Republic.

Revan Freeflight [Human, female]: Grew up in poverty on Talshion, little-known planet along the Outer Rim. Reputed to be the most powerful Force-user found in centuries together with Malak Devari. Recruited to the Jedi Order six years beyond the usually accepted guideline of ten Standard years. Although already notorious within the Jedi Order, Revan Freeflight shot to galactic fame when she thwarted the Jedi High Council and joined the Republic war effort against the Mandalorian invasion, bringing twelve experienced Jedi Knights who followed her - and, later, many more. Revan was promoted to the position of Supreme Commander of the Republic Forces, and was considered to be instrumental in turning the tide of war around to culminate in a Republic victory at Malachor V. Revan, along with a fair swathe of the Republic Fleet and near-all of her Jedi allies, disappeared for months after the final battle. It was widely believed the missing forces were engaged in mopping up the remnants of the Mandalorian Clans along the Outer Rim, right up until a surprise attack shocked the Republic and the galaxy alike - and hailed the birth of Darth Revan, a self-proclaimed Sith Lord set on conquering the Republic. Darth Revan then launched a war of attrition against a stunned and battle-weary Republic. Revan is believed to have died above Deralia, either due to her Shadow Hand Darth Malak firing on her ship, or the actions of Jedi Padawan Bastila Shan who was duelling her at the time.

Talvon Esan [Human, male]: Half-Telosian, half-Onderonite, Talvon Esan became a formidable Fleet Commander. Turned to the Dark Side under Revan's leadership. Regarded as an expert duellist. Executed by Darth Revan due to rumours of insanity, after the botch-up on Telos.

Yudan Rosh [Twilek, male, OC]: Royal native of Kala'uun, Ryloth. Recruited to the Jedi Order two years beyond the usually accepted guideline of ten Standard years. Informally trained Revan Freeflight and later Malak Devari in lightsaber combat during their padawan years. Along with Revan, Malak and Meetra, Yudan was one of the four most famous knights in the Jedi Thirteen. Regarded as a master duellist and one of Revan's best Fleet Commanders, particularly against the Mandalorian Fett advances. Turned to the Dark Side under Revan's leadership.

Xaset Terep [Human, male]: Regarded as a formidable ground general during the Mandalorian Wars. Xaset Terep and Meetra Surik were pivotal to the destruction of Malachor V that ended the Mandalorian Wars. Having not been sighted publicly since then, both Jedi are presumed dead by the galaxy at large, but still hailed as heroes of the Republic due to their actions and leadership during the Mandalorian Wars.

Historical figures - The Mandalorian Wars - Other:

Arren Kae [Human, female]: Jedi Master and member of the Coruscant High Temple who engaged in a forbidden love affair with the Echani General Yusanis. Gave up her daughter to remain with the Jedi, but was later thrown out when she changed her mind.

Cassus Fett [male]: Head of the Fett Clan, and second-in-charge to Mandalore the Ultimate, Cassus led a number of decisive victories against the Republic. Died during Malachor V.
Dereck [male, OC]: Mandalorian commander who was second to Mandalore the Ultimate in his duel against Revan Freeflight.

Kreia [Human, female]: Master of the Force who swore allegiance to Supreme Commander Revan Freeflight during the Republic-Mandalorian battle at Duros. Advised both Supreme Commander Revan and Darth Revan, before later disappearing of her own free will.

Mandalore the Ultimate [Taung, male]: Mandalore of the Mandalorians, died in an honour duel against Revan Freeflight on Malachor V.

Morgana Onasi nee Balon [Human, female]: Wife of Carth Onasi who died during the bombing of Telos.

Historical figures - Revan Freeflight's youth:

Devari [Human, male, OC]: Older half-brother to Malak, only guardian of Malak when he was young. Presumed dead after he was captured by the Enforcers on Talshion. Revan gave Malak his brother's name as a surname when they left Talshion.

Freeflight [Human, male, OC]: A blind middle-aged man who was the only guardian to Revan when she was young, and taught her meditation, history, politics and most of all - to dream. Died of septa-lung disease a few years before Revan was found by travelling Force-users. Revan took his name as her surname when she left Talshion.

Jonohl [Twi'lek, male, OC]: Childhood friend of Revan and Malak. Oldest friend of Revan, who also taught her Ryl.

Ness [female, OC]: Childhood friend of Revan and Malak.

Staria [female, OC]: Childhood friend of Revan and Malak.

Historical figures - Exar Kun's War:

Andur Sunrider [Human, male]: Jedi Knight who trained under Master Thon. Went against tradition by marrying, a custom that was being more and more frowned upon in the Jedi Order. Died during a Jedi mission, leaving his wife Nomi Sunrider alone with their baby Vima. The Force awoke in Nomi during this time, and she was then trained by Master Thon.

Exar Kun [Human, male]: Powerful Jedi Knight who later led a war against the Jedi and the Republic as a self-proclaimed Sith Lord. The first to use the name Sith in centuries. Killed at the close of his own war.

Nayama Bindo nee Da-Boda [Human, female]: Sister to Nomi Sunrider. Married Jolee Bindo and the Force bloomed in her unusually late. Was tempted by the teachings of Exar Kun when the Jedi High Council refused to teach her, and later fell to the Dark Side. Her fate remains unknown after the fall of Exar Kun.

Nomi Sunrider nee Da-Boda [Human, female]: Married the Jedi Knight Andur Sunrider. The Force bloomed in her late, despite her adult age, upon her husband's death when she was protecting her newborn daughter Vima. Rediscovered the lost art of battle meditation, and was instrumental to the Republic's success against Exar Kun. Stripped Ulic Qel-Droma of the Force after he killed his twin brother. Died many years later of septa-lung disease.

Thon [male]: Jedi Master of Dantooine who decided to train Nomi Sunrider against Jedi convention (due to Nomi's adult age). The Coruscanti High Council, in contrast, refused to train Nomi's sister Nayama who also awoke late in the Force. Some saw this as hypocritical; while others saw Master Thon's actions as bordering on seditious. When Nomi Sunrider rediscovered battle meditation and became a rallying point and galactic heroine, the Coruscanti High Council's disapproval of her training died down. By that stage, Nayama Bindo had already disappeared.

Ulic Qel-Droma [Human, male]: Powerful Jedi Knight and twin brother to Cay Qel-Droma. Lover of Nomi Sunrider. Later fell to the Dark Side when attempting to infiltrate Exar Kun's forces and was captured. Stripped of the Force by Nomi and exiled by the Jedi Order despite the Republic Senate's demands for him to be put on trial.
Historical figures - Ancient Sith Lords:

Ludo Kressh [male]: Powerful Sith Lord who was at loggerheads with Naga Sadow, and seen as the more cautious of the two with an interest in relics.

Naga Sadow [male]: Powerful Sith Lord who was at loggerheads with Ludo Kressh.

Tulak Hord [male]: Known as the 'Master of Hate', he discovered the ability to drain life from sentients and increase his own life-span.

xXx

Starships of note:

Astral Pride - a Dreadnought-class heavy cruiser often referred to simply as a 'dreadnought'. One of the Republic's most prominent command ships, and helmed by Admiral Rickard Gant.

Ebon Hawk – a Dynamic-class freighter owned by the Exchange crime lord on Taris, Davik Kang. With an upgraded sublight drive and hyperdrive, a customised navicomputer and reinforced hull, this smuggling vessel can outperform near-all freighters of similar size and core specifications.

Endar Spire – a Hammerhead-class cruiser serving with the Republic Navy, and helmed by commanding navi-advisor Captain Carth Onasi - although full commanding privileges rest with the squad of Jedi stationed onboard.

Invictus – a Destroyer-class warship that was regaled as Darth Malak's flagship, and outfitted with experimental stealth technology.

Leviathan – an Interdictor-class heavy cruiser noted for its defensive clout, planetary-range turbo-lasers, and hyperspace-interdicting capability. One of Darth Malak's prominent command ships, and helmed by Admiral Saul Karath.

Lightstar – a Dreadnought-class heavy cruiser often referred to simply as a 'dreadnought'. One of the Republic's most prominent command ships. Commanding privileges currently rest with General Adashan.

Meridus – a Dreadnought-class heavy cruiser often referred to simply as a 'dreadnought'. The Meridus has been customised to include hyperspace-interdicting capability. One of the Republic's most prominent command ships, and helmed by Admiral Forn Dodonna.

Nexus – a Destroyer-class warship that was regaled as Darth Revan's flagship. Destroyed above Deralia by a sneak attack from the Invictus.

Ruby's Claw – a medium-sized Hyperion-class troop carrier. This model of carrier was seen as a hybrid between a frigate and a freighter, and often used to transport small squads of ground troops into and out of warzones. Helmed by Republic Captain Jordo Merrix.

xXx

Mando'a Glossary:

aay'hen - bittersweet remembrance - of joy, celebration and mourning

* aay'hen fest - festival of remembrance, of feasting and toasting to ones lost in combat, and singing their battle songs ad'ika - kid, boy/girl, darling, pet name for child of one's clan * akaanir dala - a matriarchal, quasi-clan of warrior women who have left their clan and eschew the raising of children. (lit. fight woman)

aruetii - outsider

beskar – Mandalorian iron, or sometimes short for beskar'gam beskar'gam – Mandalorian armour suit made from beskar chakaar - corpse robber

dar'jetii - Forsworn or Dark Jedi

* de haa'taylir be ka'ra, galar be ner tal, bal nuhoy be vheh, ner ijaat sonsol ti ibic Mando'ade - by the witnessing of the stars, the shedding of my blood, and the resting of the earth, my honour stands in agreement with this Mando'ade. (traditional phrase for a second to use in a blood duel) di'kut - idiot ge'hutuu - bandit, petty thief, low criminal haar'chak - damn it!

hu'tuun - coward, cowardly ib'tuur jatne tuur ash'ad kyr'amur - today is a good day for someone else to die ik'aad - toddler, young child jetii - Jedi
*kar'tayl gar aru'e - Understand your enemy (lit. know/awareness, you/your, enemy) *kar’taylir sah ad – I/To hold in the heart like a daughter laandur - weak, fragile
Mand'alor - Title of the overall leader of all Mandalorians
Mando’a - Mandalorian language
Mando'ad draar digu - a Mandalorian never forgets Mando'ade - sentient vowed to the Mandalorian way mir'osik - dung for brains ne’johaa - shut up olarom - welcome, greeting ori'vod - big brother, older brother, someone you look up to osik - dung rangir - to hell with it ret'urcye mhi – goodbye (lit. maybe we’ll meet again) shabuir - jerk su'cuy - hello
su cuy'gar - hello, after a separation (lit. I see you're not dead.)
utreekov - fool, idiot (lit. empty head) vod - brother, clan-brother, someone you see as a brother vor’e - thanks, thank you

* phrases created solely for this fic, although they contain words from canonical Mando'a.
Everything else is taken directly from canonical Mando’a online.

xXx

Chapter POV listing:

Chap No: Title: POV:
Chapter 001 Prologue & Author's Notes, Character Glossary, Mando’a Glossary, Chapter Listing n/a Chapter 002 Hyperspace: I Neann Dallash, Carth Onasi, Neann Dallash, Bastila Shan, Neann Dallash, Jen Sahara, Neann Dallash
Chapter 003 Broken Recollections Jen Sahara
Chapter 004 The art of convincing Carth Onasi
Chapter 005 Battling one's thoughts Jen Sahara
Chapter 006 Blaster Boy Carth Onasi
Chapter 007 Tricks of the mind Jen Sahara
Chapter 008 Restless Mission Vao
Chapter 051 Conversations with the crew Bastila Shan
Chapter 052 Dark Side doubts Dustil Onasi
Chapter 053 A fractured mind Jen Sahara
Chapter 054 An old friend Juhani
Chapter 055 Brushes with death Jen Sahara
Chapter 056 Blood duel Canderous Ordo
Chapter 057 Torture's victim Jen Sahara / Ness Jonohl
Chapter 058 A trustworthy stranger Zaalbar
Chapter 059 Tracking the crew Carth Onasi
Chapter 060 Targeting: Fetid Cave-Dweller HK-47
Chapter 061 Flashpoint Jen Sahara / Ness Jonohl
Chapter 062 A master's betrayal Dak Vesser
Chapter 063 Showdown Jen Sahara / Ness Jonohl
Chapter 064 Hyperspace: V - part one Juhani, Belaya Linn, Yuthura Ban, Mekel Kadoni, Data analyst Ajax Zarr, Carth Onasi, Canderous Ordo, Kel Algwinn, Yudan Rosh
Chapter 065 Hyperspace: V - part two Dustil Onasi, Zhar Lestin, Zaalbar, Dak Vesser, Jen Sahara / Ness Jonohl, Nisotsa Organa, Mission Vao, Atris Surik, Bastila Shan
Chapter 066 A false name Jen Sahara / Ness Jonohl
Chapter 067 Apologies Dustil Onasi
Chapter 068 To be a Jedi Juhani
Chapter 069 Secrets and small talk Jen Sahara
Chapter 070 Brotherhood Zaalbar
Chapter 071 A shifting in the shadows Jen Sahara
Chapter 072 Analysing: Holo-Map HK-47
Chapter 073 The merge Jen Sahara
Chapter 074 Exodus Mission Vao
Chapter 075 For what is real Revan Freeflight
Chapter 076 A second encounter Jolee Bindo
Chapter 077 Conviction Revan Freeflight
Chapter 078 Clan and honour Canderous Ordo
Chapter 079 Breaking Chains Bastila Shan
Chapter 080 Homecoming Zaalbar
Chapter 081 Flight Carth Onasi
Chapter 082 Hyperspace: VI - part one Nisotsa Organa, Forn Dodonna, Revan Freeflight, Rulan Prolik, Canderous Ordo, Bastila Shan
Chapter 083 Hyperspace: VI - part two Saul Karath, Dustil Onasi, Revan Freeflight, HK-47, Kylah Aramai, Mission Vao
Chapter 084 Hyperspace: VI - part three Carth Onasi, Kavar Kira, Vrook Lamar, Revan Freeflight
Chapter 085 Hyperspace: VI - part four Revan Freeflight
Chapter 086 Hyperspace: VI - part five Jolee Bindo, Davis Tar’coya, Juhani, Revan Freeflight, Suvam Tan
Chapter 087 Hyperspace: VI - part six Zaalbar, Yudan Rosh, Revan Freeflight
Chapter 088 Hyperspace: VI - part seven Mekel Kadoni, Malak Devari, Revan Freeflight
Chapter 089 Friendships Mission Vao
Chapter 090 Overlay Revan Freeflight
Chapter 091 Faith Carth Onasi
Chapter 092 Shadows of history Juhani
Chapter 093 An abrupt awakening Jolee Bindo
Chapter 094 Intermesh Revan Freeflight
Chapter 095 The greater good Bastila Shan
Chapter 096 Intersect Revan Freeflight
Chapter 097 Chase Canderous Ordo
Chapter 098 Precipice Revan Freeflight
Chapter 099 Primary Objective: Locate And Defend Master HK-47
Chapter 100 Aftermath Revan Freeflight
Chapter 101 Sunrise Yudan Rosh
Chapter 102 Reckless Vrook Lamar
Chapter 103 Nexus: Convergence Bastila Shan, Zez-Kai Ell, Malak Devari, Jordo Merrix, Revan Freeflight
Chapter 104 Nexus: Advent Sharlan Nox, Jolee Bindo, Rulan Prolik, Revan Freeflight, Vrook Lamar
Chapter 105 Nexus: Furtherance Revan Freeflight, Mission Vao, Canderous Ordo, Jaq, HK-47
Chapter 106 Nexus: Shatterpoint Carth Onasi, Inon Daelidar, Sammy Tobards, Revan Freeflight, Dustil Onasi, Bastila Shan.
Chapter 107 Nexus: Catharsis Zaalbar, Yudan Rosh, Bastila Shan, Forn Dodonna, Revan Freeflight
Chapter 108 Nexus: Fulcrum - part one Revan Freeflight, Canderous Ordo, Revan Freeflight, Mission Vao, Revan Freeflight, Zaalbar
Chapter 109 Nexus: Fulcrum - part two Revan Freeflight, Jolee Bindo, Revan Freeflight, Dustil Onasi, Revan Freeflight, Carth Onasi, Revan Freeflight, Yudan Rosh, Revan Freeflight
Chapter 110 Nexus: Bonds Revan Freeflight
Chapter 111 Nexus: Dissonance Sharlan Nox, Dustil Onasi, Inon Daelidar, Mission Vao, Davis Tar’coya, Jolee Bindo, Rulan Prolik, Carth Onasi, Yudan Rosh, Revan Freeflight
Chapter 112 Nightfall Revan Freeflight
Chapter 113 Hyperspace: VII - part one Canderous Ordo, Forn Dodonna, Eridius Talav, Carth Onasi, Yuthura Ban, Kavar Kira, Yudan Rosh, Meetra Surik, Atton Rand
Chapter 114 Hyperspace: VII - part two Vima Sunrider, Dustil Onasi, Selene, Sharlan Nox, HK-47, Lena Torand, Zaerdra Leno, Mission Vao, Revan Freeflight
Chapter 115 Hyperspace: VII - part three (Multi-POV) tbc Chapter 116 Epilogue & Author's Notes n/a

xxx

Disclaimer: Based on the computer game - Star Wars: Knights of the Old Republic. World/characters belong to Bioware / LucasArts, as does the game dialog I have incorporated throughout the saga. I lay claim to my own OC's, dialog and sub-plots that have come from the depths of my own murky imagination, although certainly some are inspired by the wealth of the Star Wars: KotOR fandom.

xxx
Neann Dallash:

"Ten points!" one of the soldiers crowed, his shiv-blade vibrating as it dug into a massive holo-poster pasted on the far wall. The tip of the shiv wedged into the torso of a smiling robed figure. "I got that bastard dead centre!"

I smirked, leaning back against a bulkhead as I surveyed the off-duty common room. A dozen or so Republic soldiers milled about, non-alcoholic beverages in hand, as they enjoyed a few hours respite before their next shift onboard the Hammerhead-class cruiser, the Endar Spire. Some hapless twit had tacked up an unauthorised poster of the Jedi Thirteen - the Jedi crusaders who'd been our heroes against the Mandalorians, back when our enemy was a horde of barbarians in beskar.

Back when we could still trust the Jedi.

"You wanna play, Neann?" the Rodian lounging next to me asked in passable Basic, one antenna twitching.

His name's Tal Jonson, my mind supplied. Ensign, two years' service, ground trooper. Recruited after his homeworld was bombed and his family killed. No black marks on his record.

In my line of work, it paid to remember the details.

"I'm happy to watch," I replied, taking a sip of the fruity fizz-pop the Endar Spire supplied in lieu of alcohol. "I'm still trying to work out the point-scoring system."

The soldier next to the holo-poster retrieved his shiv, handing it hilt-first to his neighbour. Frankly, I was surprised to see any of those bootleg posters still around. The Jedi Order had been pretty adamant in their decreed blackout of what they referred to as 'illegal glorification of renegades not condoned by or associated with the Jedi Order in any way.'

Ah, but the Republic worlds had loved their renegade Jedi heroes, once. Without them, we'd likely all be speaking Mandalorian.

Without them, we wouldn't now be fighting a losing war against Darth Malak.

"It's not difficult," Tal burbled, large black eyes blinking at me. "Ten points for any torso hit, twenty for a head-shot. Double if it's one still alive, triple if it's Malak himself."

My gaze skimmed over the grandiose poster. Not like there's many of them left alive, thank the stars. Each figure stood tall and proud, most clad in the beige robes of the Order they'd spurned when they joined the Fleet.

"I'm gonna win this round," a nearby soldier boasted, shooting us a jaunty wink as he took a step closer. A second man followed more slowly in his wake. "Hey, Neann. Is Tal roping you in for a game?"

I eyed over the newcomers, a perfunctory smile pasted on my face as the first one slumped inelegantly against the durasteel wall. Dakkos Ballal, my mind whispered. Ensign, three years’ service, snubfighter co-pilot. Comes from a military family in the Core, and has a propensity to indulge in gree-spice when on leave. Easier to ingratiate myself with the grunts, when I already had some inkling of their background.

"Yeah," I offered. "Seems like harmless enough fun."

The other Human in his shadow gave us a brief smile, tipping his head in silent greeting. Trask Ulgo. Ensign, seven years' service, ground trooper. Classified records, but the crypt-keys hide nothing of note other than a commendation for bravery. Odd he's still languishing as an ensign.
Also, of note: Ulgo is one of the select signed onto the Jedi detail.

Someone groaned, loudly, and my attention was drawn back to the far wall. A spattering of sniggers resounded through the room, and my gaze narrowed on the shiv-blade. It had caught on the shoulder of a holo-painted woman near the centre of the poster.

"Oh, that's right," Tal added, nudging me conspiratorially. "Minus ten if you get one who died against the Mandos. They never turned into traitorous bastards, eh?"

"Meetra Surik," I murmured, staring at the image of the blonde Human. She wore a beatific smile, having been stylized with an almost ethereal golden hue around her proud figure. I let my lips curve with fond nostalgia that wasn't feigned. "I used to have a crush on her, back during the Mando Wars."

There was a stifled grunt from the quiet Trask â€“ "I couldn't tell if it was from surprise or agreement â€“ while Dakkos snorted in dismissal. "Nah, Nisotsa was the hottest of the Thirteen.
Meetra didn't have anything on her."

"Ah, but you never saw them in the flesh. I'd met Meetra Surik, once. Holo-stills didn't encapsulate the gentle grace and calm confidence the older woman had exuded.

"Never seen the appeal in Human flesh myself," Tal muttered. "So big and beefy. I mean-" He cut himself short, shooting Dakkos an embarrassed glance as he rubbed a hand through the bristling hairs on his green scalp. "Er, no offense Dak-"

Dakkos sniggered over his words good-naturedly. "The day I see a Rodian and a Human together is the day I dig my own eyeballs out with a spork." His gaze slid to mine. "Zabraks and Humans are almost as weird, Neann."

I shrugged. A half-breed myself, I didn't see the point in quibbling over the delineation of species.
Having held down a career as a silent operative most of my working life, I'd never had the inclination or opportunity for any relationship beyond the most primitive. Far as I was concerned, as long as all parties were willing, it was nobody's business but theirs.

"Dakkos!" someone called. "You're up!"

"Watch this," Dakkos bragged. "I'm gonna get that chivhole Malak dead-centre." He shot us all an easy grin, before swaggering back towards the centre of the room.

"He's never won yet," Tal muttered in an aside. "Good thing he's not a gunner, with his crap aim.
Mark my words, he'll flub his throw somehow."
"I'm gonna take down Darth Malak!" Dakkos yelled, before wrenching his arm back to throw the shiv-blade. I watched the arc of the weapon with a half-smile, tracing its trajectory towards the centre of the poster.

The shiv quivered as it missed Malak by mere inches. Instead, its point dug deep into the faceless mask of the central figure.

A loud cheer resounded throughout the room.

"And right into the brain," Trask muttered. I glanced sideways, to see an odd grimace twisting his broad face. He was staring fixedly at the poster, eyes narrowed.

Tal, on the other hand, was cackling gleefully. "Forgot to mention what happens when you land on Revan. Get that piece of betraying scum, and you owe everyone in the room a beer. Well, a fizz-pop, but we can pretend, right?"

Revan Freeflight. Darth Revan. Revan Freeflight had directed the Republic forces as Supreme Commander, against the Mandalorians. Darth Revan had started the current war by leading the vanguard against the Republic. Now Revan was dead, and Malak was the evil bastard out there burning our worlds in the name of the misbegotten Sith.

"Hah! That makes it your round, Dakkos!" someone gloated. "Pay up!"

My eyes narrowed on the flamboyant poster as Dakkos pulled out his shiv with a rueful shrug. The artist had taken definite liberties. Every figure, no matter the species or gender, stared righteously into the room. In the middle of the fallen heroes stood the now-defaced form of Revan, a spectre of mystery the other rogue Jedi cloistered around. Cloaked and masked, Revan was brandishing a single lightsaber that flared golden above all their heads. Not accurate, for I knew the dead Sith Lord had always used two.

Still, the sweeping brushstrokes of holo-paint represented how the galaxy had once seen the Jedi Thirteen. They really had been larger-than-life heroes: saviours of the Republic, defenders of the innocent, guardians of the peace. Revan's Guard of Twelve, the Fleet used to call them, honouring Revan above all.

If only they'd all died at Malachor V.

The hatch behind me opened with a pneumatic hiss.

"Oh, you've got to be kidding me-" a voice grumbled. I turned, to see an exasperated expression on the face of Captain Carth Onasi, Republic leader of the Endar Spire.

He was staring hard at the offending holo-poster. A muscle twitched in his jaw.

Ah, crap. Can't think he's going to approve of this type of off-duty entertainment.

The hum of genial conversation slowly stuttered into silence. A Bothan standing next to Dakkos gave him a rough nudge, before jerking his head in the direction of the hatch. Dakkos turned, his swarthy Human face twisting in sudden embarrassment.

"Get that poster down," Onasi ordered, striding into the room. "Have you lot forgotten who's in command of this ship?"

"Er-" Dakkos muttered, his gaze sliding away from the irate captain. The sheepish silence of a dozen grunts mulling over their actions hung thick in the air.
The Endar Spire was a Republic cruiser, but Captain Onasi didn't hold true command. One of the reasons I was here was to find out exactly why the Jedi Order had appropriated jurisdiction of this starship. And exactly what manner of ruins they planned investigating once we reached the desert world of Tatooine.

Mystics and their damn secrets. The Jedi Order were heavily embroiled in our war against Darth Malak's Sith Empire. Flipside of the previous war, when the Order had refused any sort of direct involvement, leaving it up to Revan and the rest of the Jedi Thirteen to aid the Republic against the Mandalorian threat.

The brass hadn't forgotten. Revan Freeflight's name might be black as tar-mud now, but once Revan had been the first to join us, to lead us, to throw the mighty power of the Force behind the Republic front.

Once, the Jedi Thirteen had been heroes.

"If one of the Jedi onboard walk in here and see that blasted poster, your ears will be ringing into next week." Captain Onasi folded his arms as he levelled a stern expression at Dakkos, who was artlessly trying to conceal the shiv-blade behind his back.

"Sorry, sir," Dakkos muttered, free hand reaching up to pull at the holo-poster. It crackled as he unceremoniously ripped a large segment of it clear from the wall.

I couldn't deny a flare of inner satisfaction as I saw Malak's holo-form torn haphazardly in half.

"Easy, soldier," Captain Onasi grumbled, his voice calming as his gaze roamed the room. "I won't begrudge you downtime. Just be mindful that we report to the Jedi. Revan's Guard used to be their people. No one likes a reminder of traitors, even in harmless fun."

There was a general murmur of agreement around the room. Captain Onasi was seen as a fair sort around the Endar Spire, sharp under pressure and well-liked by most. This was an odd posting for the likes of him, but I hadn't heard any of the grunts remark on it.

The man himself turned to face me, brown eyes shadowed with the heaviness of war.

"Lieutenant? I'd like a word."

I nodded in compliance, and slipped out of the room behind him.

---

Carth Onasi:

Lieutenant Neann Dallash stood at ease, an expression of mild deference pasted on his lightly ridged face. Dallash was my senior navi-pilot; a man both competent and experienced. He was the type of officer sharp enough to do his job, benign enough to stay out of trouble, and genial enough that every soldier underneath him agreed he was a good sort.

If only he didn't turn into a love-struck imbecile in front of Jedi Bastila Shan-

I reached over my private desk to disable the room's surveillance. Holding back a sigh, I suddenly felt every parsec of my thirty-eight Core-standard years.

"We're exiting hyperspace in four hours, Lieutenant," I said, getting straight to the point. "It's time
This blasted mission had been a covert one from the start. The squad of robes onboard let slip nothing I hadn't already been briefed on, but it was their jittery behaviour that put me on edge. Sure, Jedi were well-known for being cryptic and mysterious, but this lot had ramped it up a notch, with the way they kept jumping at shadows and snapping at anyone who dared linger in their proximity.

Dallash wasn't the sort to dig for reasons why I'd kept our docking point classified; I was glad of that, at least. The Jedi had put so much emphasis on secrecy that I was starting to doubt everyone. "We're docking at Mavis III."

"Mavis III," the half-Zabrak echoed, brow ridges lowering in thought. I wondered how long it would take him- "Taris," he breathed. "That's- that's a tad on the risky side?"

Yeah. Yeah, it was.

"Not my call," I bit out, trying to edge my tone into impartiality. Mavis III was a neutral docking station run by the Exchange, but its proximity to Taris hardly made me leap for joy. Still, orders were orders, and we simply had to make the best of them. "Mavis III is the most direct route to Tatooine. Yes, Taris is Sith-controlled, but more in name than any meaningful force, these days. Our signature's forged, we should be in and out of the sector before any alarm is raised. The Exchange might sell our docking info later, but we'll be long gone by then."

Lieutenant Dallash hummed, his dark gaze clouding in thought.

The Endar Spire was flagged as a support and supply cruiser; even should the Sith learn our identity and location, the 'Spire wouldn't be seen as a particularly tantalizing prize. Not unless they found out who was really onboard.

The Jedi may have concealed their presence for the first few days of hypertravel, but hiding a famous war figure like Jedi Padawan Bastila Shan was always going to be a losing game against time.

Near-on three hundred souls onboard with a fistful of Jedi. Who thought this was a good idea again?

The Jedi. The blasted Jedi. Couldn't they actually disclose their objectives and work with us in good faith for once?

Admiral Dodonna believed whatever they were up to might be instrumental in the war we were slowly losing. I doubted the greying Admiral had little more to go on than the faith of the Jedi Masters - and sure, the Jedi often had a trick or two up their robed sleeves, but they also had a tendency to get blindsided by the more practical and visceral elements of war.

Or, fall, and turn into murdering Sith bastards.

"Who else knows our refuelling point, sir?"

"The Jedi. Myself. Now, you." I sighed. "Report to the bridge in two hours, Lieutenant. I need the sharpest dock and refuel you can manage. Frankly, I won't be resting easy until we're enroute to Tatoooine."
"Yes, sir." Lieutenant Dallash snapped out a tight salute. "Is that all, sir?"

I felt my mouth twitch. Neann Dallash was a likeable sort, but he'd rather embarrassed himself last time the Jedi had infiltrated the main bridge. "Don't talk to the Jedi, Lieutenant. Commander Shan already believes you're a blundering idiot. I'd rather not be forced to list your credentials again."

"Sir." Dallash bowed his head in overt contrition, his chagrin stark enough that I regretted my words. But he'd made a right fool of himself over the uptight young Jedi, clumsily stumbling into her and stuttering like an awed greenhorn. Out of character, for an experienced officer like him. Ah, well. I've seen enough soldiers turn into halfwits over a pretty face. I expect Dallash will keep his head down, now.

"Wait a minute." The lieutenant shot me a sharp look, all traces of discomfort gone. "Sir. Did you just say commander?"

"I did." I felt my mouth tighten, and leaned over to toss a datapad across the table. "Read this."

Dallash's frowning countenance focused on the utilitarian datapad. I gave him a minute to digest the official command order - the order that'd been signed off by the Jedi Master leading the six-man squad of robes on board.

"Sir." Dallash's head lifted, fixing me with an intent look. "This is dated four days ago."

"Yes." The word was almost a growl. I'd been giving the Jedi a chance to redact the damn order, but, just like with everything else, they were intractable.

The Jedi here consisted of one master, a quartet of seasoned knights, and a lone padawan who was as gifted as she was inexperienced and socially awkward. And now, inexplicably, she was also in possession of full commanding privileges over a cruiser from the Republic Navy.

Again, I fought hard against showing my distaste of the whole mission. Too many things just weren't adding up. Even Commander Shan had looked like she'd swallowed a sour-plum when that master informed me of the change in manifest command.

Dallash placed the datapad back on the hardened plasticel table-top. "Is she going to be snapping out orders on the bridge, sir?"

"From what I've been told, Lieutenant, Jedi Master Galdea will retain command in actuality." Which made the directive nonsensical - it had the feeling of a technicality, but for the life of me I couldn't figure out why. Maybe it's a sop to Shan's famous battle meditation. But, then, why had the Jedi Order sent Bastila Shan out on a clandestine operation, when her talents would be far better put to use on the frontlines?

I had no idea, and the Jedi certainly weren't enlightening me. Admiral Dodonna was going to be highly unimpressed at my next grilling, and for the umpteenth time I wished she hadn't pulled me out of a snubfighter to place me here.

"That will be all, Lieutenant." I gave the man a perfunctory nod. "I'll see you on the bridge in two hours."

Lieutenant Dallash cracked out another efficient salute, before turning on his heel and departing silently.

xXx
Neann Dallash:

Two hours to do some much-needed digging.

I stepped out of my private quarters; mind clear, an automatic smile on my face, and one hand slipping a modified datapad into a pocket.

Stars, but I wished Onasi had briefed me earlier. It'd been an irritation, not knowing our refuelling point until now, but I'd held back from running my own routines in the 'Spire's navi-system. My portfolio didn't require those details, and I'd been ordered to follow Onasi's lead.

The inane command order from the Jedi, however- that would have been useful to learn four days ago. If only Onasi knew we reported to the same person, then he might've been more forthcoming.

"As far as everyone onboard is concerned, you are simply the Endar Spire's senior navi-pilot." Admiral Forn Dodonna's expression had been stern, the last time we'd spoken in person. "Captain Onasi is a good man, and a good front. The Jedi will see him exactly as what he believes he is: my agent to find out what they are up to."

Captain Onasi was a good man. I'd read his dossier numerous times before boarding the 'Spire, and already had his personality pegged. Commended for valour during the Mandalorian Wars, he was a staunch Republic loyalist with a strong moral code and a streak of honesty that would hinder him climbing much further up the officer ranks.

Onasi had adapted well to his assumed role of advising the 'Spire's navi-pilots and leading the troops onboard, while failing spectacularly at drawing any information from the closed-mouthed Jedi. He'd be highly pissed if he knew the truth: he was no more than a feint, a distraction for the Jedi to dodge, while I did the discreet digging.

Which I have little time to do before we spit out next to Mavis III.

I glanced down at the chronometer on my wrist, a shiny alusteel replica of a famous Coruscanti brand. The latest model from Republic Intelligence, it housed a hidden processor that could interface with my ocular implants, and send intel directly to my retina.

With a tap on the pretend chron, a set of tracking coordinates flared briefly in my vision.

::Starboard training sector, blue corridor, floor 4E.::

I began walking.

It was my batch-routine in the 'Spire's surveillance system throwing Shan's last known public location to me. No audio, though. With the lack of holo-cams in the Jedi quarters, and the fact that my discretely placed comm-tracker had shorted out with Shan's last sonic ablution, I was blinder than I was comfortable with.

Hadin't harvested much before the comm-tracker bit the dust, either. Padawan Shan recited the Jedi Code a pinch too obsessively, Knight Seris had a disturbing interest in parasitic diseases, and Master Galdea's pep talks were about as riveting as a holo-doc on bantha farming.

Still, there'd been two words of note. Two words I'd caught in an uttered aside from Shan, before Galdea had shushed her. Star Map. It sounded like a kid's astrological project, but it was Galdea's immediate censure that piqued my interest.

It'd be going into my next wire to Dodonna - and I had to hope the lead made up for Shan now viewing me as a stumbling oaf enraptured by her presence. Her vexation at my clumsiness served its purpose, though: Shan had been too busy sticking her nose in the air to notice the bug I'd slipped into her ornamental hair-braids.

I couldn't chance playing the same trick twice, and especially not around that chubby master. Dry and dusty Galdea might be, but I hadn't missed the sharp glance he'd thrown my way the last time we met. If I could just catch Shan alone-

My thoughts flat-lined into nothing as a pair of brown-clad Jedi slowly cleared the corner ahead and strolled in my direction. Two women; both young, attractive and wearing identical expressions of serenity. The one leading the pair looked up at my approach, red lips pursing in recognition.

Jedi Knight Kylah Aramai. The name rose in my mind, but I kept it small. Always paid to keep the thoughts hidden, around Force-users. Human, suspected mix of Mirialan ancestry given the yellowing skin and tawny eyes. Well-known spokesperson and confidant of Bastila Shan.

My eyes slid to her companion: the battle meditation champion herself.

I ducked my head, stumbling to a stop within arms-reach.

"Master Jedi," I squeaked. "Er, it is good to see you." I let my gaze rise to Shan's, before dropping it deliberately back to the grilled flooring. "Can I- can I help you in any way?"

"I am a knight, soldier," Kylah Aramai drawled. Her tone lilted with amusement. "And I am certain you must be aware that Bastila is a padawan."

"Lieutenant," Bastila Shan acknowledged. Her enunciation was crisp, cold and stiff. "We do not require any assistance."

"I, ah, I was looking for you," I admitted, running one hand briefly over my fore-horns, while the other fingered the datapad in my pocket. "Captain Onasi has informed me of your change in rank. I have a set of operating protocols for you to peruse - at your leisure, of course."

The ice on Shan's face hardened further as I pulled out the standard-issue datapad, now loaded with all manner of Republic Navy procedures and policies. Let her take the implication this was Onasi's doing - if he called me on it, I would merely bluff it out as the initiative of the hopelessly enamoured.

"This is hardly necessary, Lieutenant." The frost in her voice could've frozen a Zeltron in heat.

"Er, sorry, it's just that it's standard operating procedure, Master Jedi- or, or should I call you ma'am, now?"

"No!" she snapped, before her eyes closed briefly in defeat. A thin hand rose to snatch the proffered datapad. "Fine," she managed in a carefully modulated voice. I had the distinct feeling she was biting back curses. "I shall review it when I have time. Thank you."

Somehow, I doubted Shan would get past the first twenty pages of dry discourse, but so long as the datapad made its way to the Jedi quarters I'd have one more set of ears to scan. The bug nestled in the 'pad's processor emitted on a low frequency that wouldn't be picked up by any orthodox scanner.

"I, er, understand we'll be briefed on the main bridge shortly," I continued, allowing a hopeful smile to emerge. "I can offer you an escort?"
A caustic snigger from Aramai rang down the corridor, one sec before Shan's porcelain skin flushed an embarrassed red. "I do not require anything from you, Lieutenant," she bit out, lips thinning. "In future, I would prefer it if you kept your distance and focused on your job."

"Yes, yes, of course," I mumbled, rubbing a hand over my face. "I- ah, I am sorry to have taken your time, Master Jedi."

Aramai snorted. "Come, Bastila. Let us move on before you completely short-circuit this one's brain."

I bowed my head in fake contrition as the Jedi departed. But, rather than following the amber sidings that eventually led to the command deck, I saw them turn sharply into a side corridor. That leads to the crew quarters. I allowed a frown to form after the Jedi had disappeared from sight. It was an interesting destination, this close to a hyperspace exit.

Might be worth following up - although this time I'd wait until Shan had left the area. Somehow, I didn't think she'd appreciate yet another encounter with me.

xXx

Bastila Shan:

"It is hardly amusing, Kylah." My shoulders stiffened uncomfortably. Certainly, I had been acquainted with my fair share of Republic soldiers during my tenure, but most stayed a respectable distance away.

There was a barely repressed giggle from my oldest friend. Peace, but sometimes she behaved like five years my junior, rather than the opposite.

"That poor half-breed is completely smitten. I'm starting to think he's stalking you around the Endar Spire."

"Perish the thought," I muttered, earning another giggle from my erstwhile friend. At least the behaviour of that incompetent lieutenant halted any further tirades from Kylah. Master Vrook always admonished me to search for the silver linings, so to speak, and Kylah's terse enquiries into the true nature of our mission were becoming both tedious and awkward to deflect.

"He's right about one thing, though," Kylah continued, and already I felt myself tensing in apprehension. "You should be heading to the bridge. Honestly, you don't need to micromanage our support staff. Leave the underlings to Galdea."

"Master Galdea," I murmured. Avoiding Kylah's no-doubt exasperated eye-roll, I focused on placing one leaden foot ahead of the other. I had a duty, an obligation, a shackel on my soul that I dearly desired to share with my oldest friend- but I could not. "Are you certain you do not wish to accompany me on the bridge?"

Kylah snorted. It was odd, but her character had certainly devolved into something more irreverent of late. We are all tense, I scolded myself. No doubt Kylah would espouse that I am more uptight than usual.

"I'm sure Galdea will look after you adequately, Bastila." Her tone edged into frostiness. "That is, unless you plan to take charge."

My lips pursed. It had not escaped me that Kylah felt belittled, perhaps even thwarted, by the token rank of commander bestowed upon me. After all, she was the knight, the Jedi who had shielded me from the holo-press when Master Vrook could not, the friend who had always kept a watchful eye over me-

Kylah is a true Jedi, and will know to accept even what she cannot understand.

For the first time, I felt something akin to relief as I closed in on my destination. At least the upcoming conversation would distract Kylah from her ill-feeling.

I knocked firmly upon the entry hatch to one of the standard crew bedding quarters. A utilitarian, durasteel door that was commonplace throughout the starcruiser, and yet this one always seemed so ominous.

The hatch opened, and a hesitant, plainly clothed woman blinked in the entrance.

"Jedi Shan," she murmured in greeting, before devolving into a poorly executed bow that was as unnecessary as it was patently ridiculous. "What- what can I do for you?"

I bestowed her with what I hoped was a benevolent smile. "I have come to remind you that we exit hyperspace in little more than three hours, Jen. I know you are ill-used to hypertravel; as long as you remain safely secured during the transition you shall be fine."

Jen Sahara's bright green gaze darted to Kylah. "I- I'm sure I'll be okay. Thank you."

She looked so young, freshly scrubbed and ill-at-ease as she hid behind a short mop of dark brown curls. Sometimes, I found it hard to remind myself that Jen Sahara had a couple of years even on Kylah, that she was-

I reined my dangerous thoughts back in with habitual precision, and kept my attention firmly fixed upon her. "You have everything you need?" I asked, searching around for a conversation starter that would not discomfit the shy scholar.

She glanced back to me, holding my gaze for only the briefest of moments. "Yes, Jedi Shan," she answered quietly. "Everyone has - has been kind."

"I notice you have downloaded many archaeological journals in the last few days," I continued doggedly. Force, but she was difficult to befriend. Even like this. "If you have need for more information, do not hesitate to ask me."

She nodded, her expression downcast and demure. She sees me as someone she can trust. Jen Sahara has never left her homeworld before. I must remember that, and be the soul of empathy. With a step forward, I rested my hand gently upon her shoulder.

"Do not be afraid to talk to me, Jen Sahara. I promise I will not bite."

Kylah, in my shadow, did a poor job of stifling her snort of disparagement. I saw the answering burn of embarrassment on the scholar's wan face, but her glance back to me was grateful.

"Thank you, Jedi Shan. I shall."

I allowed the forced smile on my face to grow, and counted our interaction as a minor victory. Next time I seek Jen Sahara out, I shall ensure Kylah is not with me.

With a nod of farewell, I retreated from the room, motioning Kylah to follow.

"Honestly, Bastila, she is just a simple scholar," Kylah drawled in a quiet murmur. "Why you feel the urge to check up on such a quiet little mouse, I do not know."

The hiss of the hatch closing behind me was audible, and incriminating. I pinned Kylah with a stern frown, even as I doubted it would have any effect on my somewhat cavalier friend. "Kylah, she likely heard that," I admonished. "Jen Sahara is one of our crew, and we have an-"

"obligation, I know," she huffed. "I am little concerned with the opinions of Force-blind academics, Bastila, and this constant hovering of yours distracts you from your studies." She loosed a pent-up sigh, before patting me on the shoulder. I was not sure if the gesture was meant to be apologetic or commiserating. "Perhaps hypertravel is wearing me down somewhat. I shall retreat to our meditation chamber - you'd better head to Master Galdea and the bridge. You'll want to be there early, if you're going to lead the hyperspace descent."

"I am not," I replied, somewhat tartly. I had certainly taken note of the disbelief in Captain Onasi's countenance when he perused the official command missive, and had no desire to tread on the toes of either the experienced Fleet officer or Master Galdea. "But I shall seek Master Galdea out, now. Have a restful meditation, my friend. May the Force embrace you."

Sometimes, even in conversation with Kylah, I still had the impression that my words came across as pious instead of supporting. Sometimes, I dearly wished for my earlier days on Dantooine, before- before everything.

"The Force is with us all, Bastila," Kylah murmured, her face breaking into a warm smile of camaraderie. "I'll catch up with you during the refuelling."

xXx

Neann Dallash:

::Crew quarters Red-7A. Designated occupants: Republic Ensign Trask Ulgo and civilian Jen Sahara.::

Maybe Shan's brief detour wasn't that odd, considering Ulgo and Sahara were both part of the Jedi support staff. While Ensign Ulgo had sworn his oaths to the Republic Navy, he'd been inserted as one of the soldiers who reported directly to Shan and that Jedi Master, Galdea.

Frustratingly, I hadn't found anything of use on the dozen soldiers attached to the Jedi. All were experienced, loyal Republic grunts with impeccable service records. They'd undertaken a stint of active duty on Dantooine, before swearing into Jedi service for the duration of the mission.

The civilian academic, also, seemed to hold no mystery other than a tragic past. Her dossier was brief: a childhood in some religious Outer Rim commune followed by years of archaeological study at a backwater academia. A refugee from the Sith bombing of Deralia, and stars knew that mess had been almost as ugly as the decimation of Telos, even if the holo-press had barely picked it up.

The only point of interest I could garner about the bint was her expertise in the Massassi era. Surely, that was a tip-off regarding the nature of the ruins on Tatooine - why else would the Jedi drag a wide-eyed civvie along on a covert mission?

Ah, well. It was another jot of intel to pass along to Dodonna. Might as well see if I can glean anything else from the recalcitrant scholar, while I'm here.

I knocked firmly on the entrance hatch. It was almost a full minute until she answered.
"Hi there," I said, keeping my voice non-assuming and friendly. "My name's Neann. I hear you're a civvie stuck onboard with all us troopers?"

The woman called Jen Sahara blinked at me owlishly, before biting her lip. It was an insecure expression echoed in the hunched set of her shoulders, more at home on a pimply teen than a twenty-something scholar.

"Um, hi. I'm Jen. Do you need something?" Her voice was hesitant, and her gaze dropped from mine. It gave me time to appraise the woman properly. She was tall, but not unusually so. Her skin was pale and wan, with the dusky look of too much time spent indoors. Give her a season or two in true sunlight, and I'd wager Jen Sahara would bear a natural olive tone. Cropped dark curls framed a face that looked older than her service records - which was an incongruous observation when contrasted with her behaviour.

"I understand you know something of the Massassi era?" I asked, immediately ditching my first instinct to ask the woman out for a drink. Somehow, I didn't think the overly timid Jen Sahara would reciprocate well to a friendly gesture from a stranger.

"Er, a little bit. I mean- yes, yes I do. It's my area of study." The woman looked up again, and a genuine spark of interest deepened the moss-green of her eyes. "Why do you ask?"

"Oh, I've always been interested in pre-Republic times," I lied. "The Massassi - fascinating creatures. Connected to the Sith, weren't they?"

"Well, there's records suggesting they were a sub-species of the Sith." Her nose wrinkled in thought. "It's all a bit muddled in fragments of records, though, because the Sith are seen as a religion or doctrine, not an actual species. We know the Massassi built temples and effigies on Yavin IV and Korriban, but those planets are notoriously difficult to fund expeditions to."

"That's... very interesting," I said faintly. Far as I was concerned, the Sith were a bunch of murdering bastards, same as the Mandalorians - both consisting of a vast cross-section of species all united under the same banner of inhumane bloodlust. The only difference being the former filled their upper ranks with Dark Jedi. Frankly, the idea of a Sith species seemed slightly on the absurd side. "Did the Massassi ever inhabit Tatooine?"

"Tatooine?" Jen Sahara blinked, visibly startled. "Oh, no. The Massassi didn't expand very far, even at the height of their empire. And Tatooine- that's always been a remote location. Other than the indigenous Tusken Raiders, the only sentients who have settled there are the recent colonists and trade conglomerates."

I faked a smile. Diffident and overly shy Jen Sahara might be, but it seemed I'd discovered the way to reach her. "Well, the upcoming expedition will certainly be fascinating," I offered. "Guess you'll be one of the lucky ones shuttling down to Tatooine's sandy surface?"

"No." Jen shook her head, eyes widening in alarm. "No, I'm an academic. I don't ever plan on leaving Deralia- I mean, um, I didn't plan on it." She blushed, then, and looked even more uneasy than earlier. "I'm sorry, Neann, but I have research to attend to. It was, um, nice to meet you."

She took a step back, gave me an awkward wave of farewell, and swished the hatch shut in my face.

It was my turn to blink, at the grey durasteel staring me in the face. Smooth, Neann. Real smooth. Looked like even the mere thought of stepping outside the Endar Spire had shy Jen Sahara scurrying back to her bunk.
With a rueful sigh, I turned on my heel and made to depart. If I wanted to befriend the introvert, I'd have to brush up on my ancient history. I was still debating the merits of that when a muted beep echoed from my chron.

A ping, detecting a captured transmission outside the parameters I'd set in my tracking software.

Over an hour before I'm due on the bridge. I concealed a frown at the unusual source of the alert. I should have enough time to check this out, send that report to Dodonna, and get to the bridge before Onasi frowns at my tardiness.

It'd been a busy day. After the dock and refuel, once the Endar Spire was safely tucked in hyperspace towards Tatooine, I might actually let myself have a nap.

xXx

Jen Sahara:

I leaned back against the closed hatch, feeling the comforting press of hard metal at my back. The Zabrak, no doubt, was walking away and leaving me in desired solitude. I wonder if his horns ever catch on his clothing? It seemed a bizarre thought. He'd been friendly enough, but I'd never met a Zabrak before in my life. Deralia was populated almost entirely with Humans, descended from the Godsworn missionaries who'd travelled there some centuries back.

It had been hard not to stare at the dark ridges on the man's face, and I'd felt like a stumbling teenager navigating the throes of conversation with the opposite sex.

Opposite... species. If there is such a thing. I'd spent years researching different cultures and peoples, but meeting them face-to-face was something entirely different. My whole experience onboard this intergalactic starcruiser had been, so far, overwhelming.

It's good for me; good for my career. I knew that, and the compliment of the Jedi Order seeking out my services still stunned. But I couldn't deny the yearning to be safely ensconced back home, away from this melting pot of sentients, away from dangerous desert planets that were a lot more interesting reading about from a holonet screen than actually setting foot upon.

Jedi Shan has assured me I will remain on the Endar Spire. I have nothing to be alarmed about. World-wise people like that friendly Zabrak might jump at the chance to visit Tatooine, but I knew enough about that planet to ascertain it was hardly safe.

Deralia was a peaceful, remote world, and the Godsworn commune even more so. There was no overt crime, no violence, never had been until-

My mind blanked.

Until... what? The sting of nausea assailed me, and I laid a shaky hand against the durasteel walling. Metals were scarce, back home; most of our dwellings were made from a patchwork of native timber and hardened clay. Until nothing. I have nothing to be alarmed about. There's never been war on Deralia. I'm fortunate to hail from a planet far removed from the ugly violence so rampant elsewhere.

The dizziness subsided, leaving only a residual exhaustion in its wake. My gaze darted to the utilitarian bunk as a deep lassitude settled achingly into my bones. I was so often tired these days.

It's the onboard food. I'm simply not accustomed to the synthesizers here. Mass-produced food like that, it's probably deficient in half a dozen vitamins.
The dreamless safety of my bedding called me, and before I knew it I was already seated on the hard mattress. There was a second bunk on the opposite wall; Trask Ulgo's, the soldier who'd been assigned to look after me. Between him and Jedi Shan, I knew I was well taken care of. As long as I followed their lead I'd be just fine.

I lay back, resting my heavy head on the flat pillow. Trask had been called out for the hyperspace exit, but he'd assured me he'd be back as soon as it was over.

"...as long as you remain safely secured..."

Jedi Shan's words rose in my mind. Hyperspace exit was meant to be as disconcerting as the initial jump, and I'd slept through that. With the way my head was starting to pound, sleep was becoming more and more desirable.

My hands fumbled for the safety harnesses attached to the underside of the bunk. The clips were some sort of electronic mechanism; back home, we just used simple hooks and eye-loops for fasteners. I grimaced as the enclosures refused to affix, and another wave of exhaustion submerged me.

I'll just lie back for a minute. So tired. Jedi Shan had said... what, three hours? I had slept so much recently that surely all I needed was a quick moment of shut-eye.

The restraints fell from my limp hands. I'd sort them out in a minute. Just, first...

My eyelids dropped closed, and I allowed the headiness of slumber to embrace me.

xXx

Neann Dallash:

The report of the captured transmit was unusual. It came from the Jedi communication quarter, having been sent over half a day ago - but my routines only did a sweep there every twenty hours, hidden in the sub-function of a maintenance backup. Caution balanced with risk - I didn't want the Jedi finding out I was tracking their communications if I could help it.

So far all their transmits had been encrypted with Jedi protocols I'd been unable to crack, and sent directly to the Dantooine Enclave. This one... went somewhere else. And the encryption matrix used was simpler, as if it'd been hastily done.

I was required on the bridge within an hour. The Jedi had a habit of settling there early; this seemed a fortuitous time to sleuth in their comm room. I made sure to seal the hatch locked behind me.

I twisted an upgraded spike into the central console, and input the batch routines that would grant administrative access. The comm records were quick to pull up, and it only took a minute to run the decoding program alongside the offending transmit.

With bated breath, I launched the execute command.

The transmit was text only. A set of coordinates. My gaze narrowed. That's... that's the jump point for Mavis III. An icy shiver coursed through me as the implication hit with the force of a ferracrete brick. Someone's sent our refuelling location out... somewhere. More than half a standard day ago. Well before Onasi briefed me, before anyone else knew-

Why? Why would they do that, unless-

I had to tell Onasi. Frakk it, I had to move, quick, before he pulled the Endar Spire out of hyperspace.

With a mash of fingers on the keyboard, I erased the screen and logged out, jumped to my feet and-

The locked hatch opened behind me. A robed figure stood in the doorway.

"My my, what do we have here?"

Instinct warred with the hot adrenaline that fired through my bloodstream. I'm an engineer, I thought wildly, ducking my head and dropping my gaze. Years of intel training had taught me exactly what to do in cases like this, and exactly how to think fake thoughts around any Force-user that might employ mind-reading. There's a logged fault with the computer, but I can't find it, and I've given up and just want a quiet cup of caffè-

"Excuse me, Master Jedi," I mumbled, hunching my shoulders in an attempt to emulate that meek Jen Sahara. Internally, my thoughts still whirled. A quiet cup of caffè with the other grunts, before my superior tells me what a crap engineer I am. "I was called in to investigate a fault, but I'm afraid-"

In the periphery of my vision, I saw a hand raise. Immediately, my words stopped of their own volition.

"This is the Jedi's personal communication bunker," the woman drawled. "What are you doing, snooping in here?"

"Um, is it?" I squeaked. I don't want to upset the Jedi. I forced the thoughts to the forefront of my mind, ignoring the hot rush of fright that spiked in my gut. Maybe I got the room wrong? My superior's gonna fry my arse! "I was sent to comm-room A3, Master Jedi. If I've offend-"

Another swish of the hand, and my words died again. I had to do better-

"Why, I do believe it's Bastila's little stalker."

Oh, frakk! The expletive shattered my internal monologue, and my mind raced like a stimmed-up junkie, trying desperately to formulate a plausible excuse-

There was a clacking noise as the Jedi strode deeper into the room. Clacking, as if she wore damn heels under those brown robes, and wasn't that the most absurd thought?

"I despise loose ends," she murmured. "And with so little time left, I can afford to take a risk."

The snap-hiss that echoed through the room froze my mind with a real, genuine terror. I wrenched my head up, to see tawny eyes glinting at me from behind an amber beam of plasma. Painted red lips curved in malicious pleasure. "You chose the wrong room to snoop in, Lieutenant."

I jerked to the side, one hand wrenching futilely for the blaster at my hip- but my limbs were suddenly frozen, as frozen as my mind, as damned as the entire ship was about to be-

The Jedi's- the Sith's- eyes creased in satisfaction, and somehow, I knew the bitch had picked that last thought straight from my mind.

xXx
Many thanks to kosiah for the beta, and suggestions as to what works and what doesn't.
Pain.

A dull throbbing emanated like a gong bashing inside my head, shattering my peaceful oblivion. Faint voices, whispering in tense and urgent tones, filtered in from distant shadows of my semi-conscious mind.

…

"Do not be alarmed. It is done, now. The rebuild is complete," someone said in a low, tired voice.

"What if she... what if she remembers something? Anything?" The reply was clipped, uptight and very feminine.

"She will not. And you will be there to ensure she does not. Have faith, Padawan. It will work out. It has to."

…

I prised open eyelids to see nothing but darkness. The voices fled, as if fearing the onslaught of consciousness. Just a bad dream. That's all. I have nothing to be alarmed about.

A lance of red hot pain seized the side of my head with cruel fingers, biting deep before slowly fading away. I became aware of the cool press of metal against my cheek, and realized I was lying prone on the ground. Wait. Where am I?

A faint booming in the distance roused my awareness to the eerie wailing of sirens. The darkness was cut through by a flickering orange light, indicating an emergency system kicking in. I stayed still for a moment, processing what my vision could make out in the flashes of amber. There were two raised stretchers and a handful of lockers lining a vented, durasteel wall. I'm on a starship, I realized slowly. What am I doing here?

With a groan, I pushed myself up on shaky arms, and dizziness threatened to overwhelm me. The ground shook violently beneath my hands; it took me a moment to realize that it wasn't my own unsteadiness – the ship was being fired upon.

"All hands to the bridge!" a crackly voice emanated over the ship’s intercom. "We're under attack!"

No kidding, dumbass. The thought was sarcastic and grouchy - even if unwarranted - and more a reflex reaction to my own situation. And yet, it felt wrong, or at least, not what I should be thinking. That was uncharitable of me, a voice whispered. I winced, dragging myself to a seated position and leaning back against a wall, clutching at the side of my head.

It was wet and sticky.

I must have fallen against something, I realized. Cracked my head open. I pulled back a shaky hand, and under the luminescence of the warning lights realized it was covered in blood. Blood on my hands. Somehow, it seemed a familiar sight.

A door swished open, and I heard someone rush in, panting.

"Jen, there you are! We've been ambushed by a Sith battle fleet – you need to get up!" The voice was young, strong-sounding and very earnest. I tilted my head slowly to face him.

Jen. Jen Sahara. That's who I am. Until he'd said my name, I hadn't realized I hadn't known it. Head injury. Sithspit, this is bad.

Father would tan me if he heard such language, I thought, appalled.

"Jen?"

Like I give a ronto's arse what some misogynistic old coot thinks.

"Jen!" The man was crouching in front of me now, wholesome blue eyes staring at me worriedly. With a concerted effort of will, I forced my concentration back to him. Human, muscle-bound and handsome, he was obviously a soldier of some description. I picked him to be in his late twenties somewhere, younger than me and in optimum condition.

Wait. Younger? I'm only twenty-six galactic years. I was raised in a peaceful commune on Deralia, working on my father's farm before spending the last eight years studying at the local academia. The job contract from the Jedi Order had come out of nowhere, and still seemed like an impossible dream.

But… none of that felt right. I wasn't a scholar. And I sodding well did not work for the Jedi.

Sweat broke out on my neck and head, and I heard the harsh pants of my own breath. A feeling of vertigo threatened to overcome me and I struggled anew to force myself back to the present.

"You're hurt," the man said softly, placing a hand against my head. "Can you stand? We have to get moving."

I pushed his arm away instinctively. "Who are you?" I snapped, glaring at him.

The man's eyes flared briefly, a shadow of some dark emotion skimming over his otherwise intent expression. "That knock's done some damage to your head. I'm Trask, a soldier for the Republic and your roommate." He withdrew his hand, his entire posture tensing in readiness as he crouched over me. "Do you... do you know who you are?"

The surreality of the question mirrored the dizziness of my own thoughts; still, there was something about the line of inquiry that had my hackles rising. "I'm Jen Sahara," I muttered. "I'm Jen Sahara. The words echoed, a hollow sound in my mind, a reverberation that felt off-key. The man in front of me seemed to relax, even as my own confusion peaked once more. "And you're Trask Ulgo."

Trask. Ensign Ulgo. Blurred memories slowly emerged as he leaned forward to help me stand. Trask has been helping me adjust to life onboard this overwhelming starcruiser. My thoughts stilled for a moment, as my gaze narrowed on him. Trask was good at running my life, informing me where to go, and what to do, and saving me from making gizka eyes at the captain. Wait... what sort of simpering coward am I?

Trask was a soldier for the Republic. And yet, he'd been assigned to bunk in with me – a nobody
I hadn’t thought to question it before, which was strange in itself.

Things were coming back to me now; the hurried departure from Deralia – odd, that my father let me go – the week of dazed orientation on the awe-inspiring Hammerhead-class cruiser – not like it's that sodding spectacular – the studying of classified archaeological extracts that had certainly never passed clearance back at the Deralian Academia. I hadn't understood exactly what the Jedi were looking for, but I’d been quietly content to do their bidding whilst onboard the Endar Spire, en route to Tatooine.

Quietly content. To follow some Jedi to a smuggling destination.

What the frell is going on?

I winced as pain stabbed deep into the side of my head yet again, my thoughts unraveling in desperate confusion.

Trask had turned back to my sleeping quarters, locating a pair of track shoes which he threw unceremoniously in my direction. "Here. Put those on quick and we'll head out."

They tightened to fit my feet with a barely audible hiss. I was vaguely aware of my attire; plain clothes I'd been resting in while the cruiser had been attacked. Nothing protective in the least. Trask had the right idea though; the ship quaked beneath another barrage and I barely kept my balance. We had to move.

Trask unbuckled a blaster which he promptly handed to me, handle first. "The Sith have already boarded. Have you ever used one of these before, Jen?"

I stared down at the Echani M4 bolt blaster; Trask had kept the standard Republic issue gun and handed me a lighter weight, yet infinitely more accurate model. Definitely my preference. I powered it on, checked the thermal batteries and charging light before raising it experimentally to test the weight.

"Yep."

"Okay," he replied slowly. He looked a bit taken aback. "Well, let's move out. Stay behind me, and we'll make our way to the bridge. Our first priority is to find Bastila."

Bastila. I should know that name. I must have appeared blank, as Trask's frown deepened.

"Jedi Shan. The commanding officer here on the Endar Spire!" he said urgently. Recollection unfolded, like access into a secure databank suddenly being released. *Jedi Shan. She's in charge of our mission.*Funny, I'd thought the commander had been a guy. And wasn't this a Republic ship?

Trask was waiting by the door, tapping his foot impatiently like a petulant child while I struggled with the cobwebs of my hazy mind.

"Jedi Shan can take care of herself," I answered finally, leveling a serious look at him. "We should be heading to the escape pods."

The crackly voice from the earlier broadcast spat out another ship-wide message. "The Sith have overrun our position! Evacuate immediately!"
I raised my hands to indicate that even Mr. Crackly agreed with me, but Trask was shaking his head urgently. "You signed a contract with the Jedi, and Bastila will be able to look after you, Jen. I must get you to her!"

There's something else going on here, I realized with mounting suspicion. He may be a Republic soldier, but he's been assigned to me. I bet he reports to Jedi Shan, not the Republic. Why would an anonymous scholar like Jen Sahara warrant a guard? I stared at him intently. There are ways of making a soldier talk. And scream.

That was a different inner voice. Dark and malicious, shocking me with it's implied cruelty.

Focus. Focus! I pushed down the venomous thought with an internal wrench. I needed to do the smart thing, and concentrate on escaping. I can find out why my mind is a spice-addled mess later. I've got to get out of here first, especially with the Sith crawling around.

Sith… and the Republic. Why did I feel like I couldn't trust either side?

With an effort almost beyond me, I slid a mask of calm competence over my frantic, derailing thoughts. "Alright, let's go soldier," I said briskly.

Concern momentarily creased Trask's strong face. "I know you're not used to fighting, Jen, but I promise you we'll get out of here alive. Stay behind me, and aim that blaster at any Sith we meet."

I followed him quietly out of the door – and straight into the enemy.

Two black-clad soldiers turned shiny visors in our direction. Trask was already charging, a vibrosword brandished in both hands, halfway to the nearest one before a weapon was even pointed in his direction. The armoured Sith yelled in pain as Trask smashed his blade hard on an upraised limb, following it with a powerful swing into the Sith's side.

My hands held the Echani pistol steady, sighting the second soldier as I was vaguely aware of the first collapsing to the ground. Always aim for the centre of mass. Hot on the trigger, I unleashed a flurry of bolts directly at the man's upper chest.

He'd been focused on Trask, right up until my shots hit home.

The Sith grunted, wildly swinging his blaster to sight me. He's got one of those frelling energy shields, if he's still standing! I fired again, holding my position, as a foreign voice squeaked through my mind-

I've never shot at anyone in my life! Suddenly, I was drenched in an appalled sense of horror, as the barrel of the enemy's blaster flared at me. This is-

An agonizing burn stabbing into my shoulder punched me to the ground; black spots invaded my vision as I stared up at the vented ceiling, stunned.

The hiss of blaster fire sounded fuzzy, distant... Kath crap, two Sith mooks should be child's play. If this is my end then... it is really quite embarrassing. My tenuous control over my thoughts was fading, and the sensation of sinking deep into an abyss began to overcome me. Those pathetic gravel maggots aren't fit to lick my boots.

"Jen, you have to get up," Trask panted, his face appearing above me. "They're dead. We have to go. Just- just stay behind me. I'll protect you the best I can." He pulled me up roughly, and vertigo danced a dangerous samba through me once more.
Nausea reared. Trask's face was shinningly earnest, and all I could think was that I was one step away from puking all over him.

We have to keep moving. Trask's grip was firm on my upper arm as my head began to clear. "Right," I rasped, before clearing my throat. "Right. Lead on." My shoulder burned and throbbed. I yanked my arm back, sending Trask a firm nod as I strove to ignore the blaze of pain.

Use your pain, a voice taunted. Use your anger.

A second after that insidiously dark thought, there was something else. Something else in my mind, some sort of presence or consciousness beyond the conflicting thoughts that had been tormenting me.

Something that didn't belong to me at all-

Trask was already striding away, stepping over bloodied corpses without a second look as he turned into an unoccupied service corridor.

I followed in a daze.

Now that I'd noticed this... thing – and it was sentient, I knew it was – I could sense flashes of panic emanating from it. Not my own panic.... no, this was separate to my own maelstrom of emotions, I was certain. But then a cloud of calm and lucidity enveloped the... person... and their attention was abruptly swung on me.

It felt like a halogen light was shining directly inside my head.

Ice froze in my spine, and self-preservation took over; I pointedly thought and felt absolutely nothing.

Nothing.

Nothing.

It appeased the presence; how I knew, I couldn't explain, but a sense of relief emanated from it briefly before it slowly faded away.

"...hurt, but conscious. I'll take her directly to the escape pods. May the Force protect you."

I was biting my lip so hard the coppery taint of blood filled my mouth. Vaguely, awareness returned: Trask had been busy speaking into a personal communicator, and now he was turning back to face me.

"We're going to the nearest escape pods, it's not far from here – just past the bridge."

Well, that's a change of heart. "Given up on Bastila, huh?" I said, with a flippancy I didn't feel.

"She'll wait for us there as long as she can," he informed me, briefly looking down at the communicator inset on his Republic armour. That was her he was just speaking to, I realized with a cold clarity.

That was her in my mind.

...and I bet she expects me to act like meek little Jen Sahara. I was thinking about myself in the third person. Wasn't that a sign of insanity?
I have to stop freaking out. But it felt more… natural… to consider Jen as someone… someone who was not me.

Whether I’m Jen or not-Jen, it’s in everyone’s best interest if I pretend to be her. A cool shaft of logic cleared the tumultuous confusion of my spiraling thoughts. Sweetness and light. I’ll play this out until I have a better handle on everything.

I took a deep breath. Control. Rise above the emotions. No, that’s not Jen, I realized. Panic, trust in the big tough guy. I looked up at Trask, practicing my best hero-worship expression. I’d better keep this up. I’ve a funny feeling my life may depend on it.

Trask motioned me once more to follow him, and we cut through an empty conference room. Datapads littered the chrome-top plastic-tile tables, and a body slumped lifelessly over an office chair. Without comment, we moved briskly into the adjacent hallway. Red and amber sidings indicated this as a restricted area - we were nearing the bridge. Through the next door and…

…my minds eye was overcome with a vision of a Jedi battling a Dark Jedi, lightsabers whirling and crashing. Bright green hissed and sparked against blood red like a display of electro-lights in the night's sky. Focus! I’ve no time to wallow in dreams right now!

"It's a Dark Jedi!" Trask hissed, pushing me backwards. Dizziness surged through me. "This fight is too much for us – we'd better stay back. All we'd do is get in the way."

With a startled jolt I realized this was reality. The two feinted, dodged and parried – faster than normal sentients, their reactions obviously aided by the mystical power that only the very few could wield.

And I could sense it. Or… something… crackling between the two of them. The female Twi'lek, a brown-clad Jedi, raised her arm and I felt a torrent of energy pushing out from her and striking the Dark Jedi Human, who fell and rolled to the side. He counter-attacked by deftly manipulating the power buzzing around the two of them, wrapping it about her neck and squeezing.

This is a dream, this isn't real. I want to go home! the meek voice I was beginning to associate as Jen blubbered. Yet part of me was eyeing the fight critically as the Twi'lek flung aside the psychic power and advanced once more on her opponent. The 'sabers clashed again and again, and the man's technique had a fumbling edge to it that indicated he was the inferior.

She'll finish him soon.

The female struck a killing blow, and the Sith staggered to his knees, coughing up blood in his dying throes. I felt terrified, revolted... and simultaneously detached from the whole spectacle. The ship rocked again and a power conduit exploded behind the woman. Arcs of lightning spat from the electronics, catching the Jedi off-guard and electrocuting her instantly.

Even the Jedi were mortal.

She crumpled to the ground, an anguished moan expelling the last of the air from her lungs.

Trask cursed audibly. "That was one of the Jedi accompanying Bastila! Stang, we could have used her help!"

Acting on instinct, I scurried forward and quickly rifled through the still-warm corpses, eager the grab one of the lightsabers.

"Jen, we don't have time!" Trask grabbed my arm and dragged me toward the exit. Blood pounded through my head, a jagged slice of pain cutting through any instinctive resistance, strong enough to keep me momentarily pliant. "We need to get out of here – if there's one Dark Jedi, there's going to be others!"

Rage exploded from within, surging through my veins like a maelstrom. No one grabs me like that. I was hyperaware of the blaster in my hand, and how easy it would be to raise it and shoot Trask point-blank in the face.

At once, the entity… or was it Bastila? honed in on my mind again with a razor-sharp awareness that had me freezing in surprise. My anger drew her attention, I realized with a chill. This is some sort of mind-link.

Sweetness and light, I thought numbly. Control the rage… for now. I quashed my anger with a controlled ease I didn't dare dwell on, and let Jen's feelings come to the fore. Panicked… but safe in the presence of big strong Trask. Ugh.

The focus of the presence turned away from me imperceptibly. Then, in a sudden rush, it disappeared from my awareness altogether.

"Lead on Trask," I said in a sweet voice. "I'm right behind you." With a blaster pointed at your head.

The ship rumbled ominously, and we picked up our pace. The cruiser didn't seem like it would hold together much longer, and it was with relief that I noticed we finally made it to the bridge.

It was deserted now; two corpses hung over bucket chairs, and I saw Trask grimace as if in pain. The flight control computers were dim, and one was charred and cracked. A lightsaber did that. Outside the ferracrystal window, a nearby blue planet rolled alarmingly past our visage; the Endar Spire was no longer under any steady flight pattern.

"Escape pods," I muttered, as my shoulder throbbed a painful rhythm in sync with my heartbeat. The side of my head replied in a lacerating echo. "Where are they, Trask?"

"This way," he answered, and we left the bridge via the starboard exit. The next hallway had a side door. As we neared to pass, we both heard a sound from behind – an ominous snap-hiss some part of me recognized all too well, accompanied with a malicious laugh.

"There's something behind here," Trask warned in a low tone.

"Well, duh," I muttered. Trask shot me a surprised look. Oh, That's not really a Jen response. I schooled my face, and clenched the blaster tight in my hand.

The door opened and from deep within the room beyond a man faced us arrogantly, fitted in a sturdy exoskeleton that well exceeded Republic issue armour. He held a lightsaber which radiated blood-red, reflecting sparks of colour across chrome walls. I felt the same power surging from him, but eons more potent that the Jedi fight we witnessed earlier. It almost made me stagger back in its intensity.

Fear struck hard in my gut. I was in no state to face anyone half as powerful as this guy.

"Damn – another Dark Jedi! I'll try to hold him off; you get to the escape pods! Go!" Trask shoved me backwards and ran through the opening, slamming his hand on the door controls as he crossed the threshold. The last I saw was the Dark Jedi sauntering toward him, a cruel smile playing across bloodless, amused lips.
Was he frelling crazy? He just committed suicide! To say I was startled was an understatement. We may have been bunkmates for awhile, but to give his life for me…

Stupid idiot. Unless... He's been ordered to get me out of here alive, at any cost.

Preferably to Jedi Bastila Shan.

"Well, let's not waste that," I muttered, and broke into as fast a sprint as my head injury would allow. Another door on my left, hopefully leading to the escape pods. I heard the clanking of a Sith group marching in that awful armour just beyond the wall.

Sounds like about four of them. No way I can take them all on.

There was a computer terminal mounted on the side of the room, which was next to useless for me. A broken assault droid that might have been helpful had someone not smashed both its arms off. A Sith body behind it clutched a vibrosword in a dead hand.

Adrenaline pumped an urgent tempo in my veins. I had to keep moving away from the Dark Jedi, yet the next room meant certain death. I glanced erratically around the area, but no salvation was forthcoming.

Irrational fury was growing, hot and heavy in my gut. I will not go down like this. It was slicing though the fear, surging through me and revitalizing aching muscles. The pain of my injuries dimmed as anger overrode everything, demanding an immediate outlet. I will not go down like this!

I snatched the vibrosword up with a snarl, stuffing the blaster in my belt before slamming my hand on the door control. There was barely time to register four armoured Sith before I charged in, vibrosword primed. The nearest one hadn't even turned when the blade of my weapon smashed down on that weak join of their shiny armour, that place where shoulder plate and neck brace met. He crumpled beneath a shower of red droplets.

Feral instinct took control. I stabbed sideways, blade piercing through the visor of the next Sith. Leaping back, I dodged behind the side of the door as blaster fire pinged past. I pressed myself hard against the wall, dropping one hand from the vibrosword and pulling out the Echani blaster.

Two figures side-stepped into view, firing even as my finger was hot on the trigger. The first fell from my barrage, just as a deep burn seared into my already mangled shoulder.

The pain was intense. It scythed through the berserker rage, dissipating it like smoke on the wind. Weapons fell from my suddenly limp grasp. Kath crap, I thought inanely.

But luck was on my side – I heard a couple of blasts and the last soldier collapsed. Looking at me from beyond the corpses with something like shock was a Republic officer, if his uniform was anything to go by.

"You've made it just in time!" he said in a commanding voice. "There's only one escape pod left. Come on, we can hide out on the planet below!"

I recognized him, I realized numbly as he advanced. Captain Onasi, some hotshot flyboy in charge of the ship. Although Trask had said this Bastila had been. Either way, the captain seemed competent on first glance; probably the sort who didn't leave people behind. Belatedly, I remembered sweet little Jen had a crush on him.

Oh great. Well, whether I'm Jen or someone else, I'm certainly not going to act that one out. I remembered blushing and scurrying away the one time he had spoken to me. You have got to be kidding me, I thought in vague irritation.
I nodded at him, took a few steps and dropped to my knees. Blood pounded through my head, and I heard a loud rushing noise.

"Stang!" someone cursed, and I felt myself being lifted. My grasp on consciousness, and sanity for that matter, was slipping away. Faces and images sparked through my mind like chaotic shards of lightning shearing through the gloom and destroying all in its path.

A robed Zabrak wielding a cyan blade. A handsome man with eyes the ecru shade of Corellian whiskey- no, no, they were a poisoned yellow. A wry grin from a blind guardian. Yellow eyes burning with passion. Blood. Terror. Darkness. Yellow eyes burning with hate. A yellow Twi'lek offering his hand in unbending loyalty.

Yellow eyes and black death. So much death.

There was a sharp prick in my arm, and I was vaguely aware of being placed on a seat.

"A shot of kolto. We'll get you more when we land," a voice said. Something tightened around my waist like a belt, but all I could feel was this sense of nightmarish horror.

It wasn't meant to end like this! I could see light above, but it would be too much of a struggle to reach, and I would only bring the shadows with me.

I let myself drop, sinking into a welcome darkness.

Then sweet, sweet oblivion claimed me.

xXx
The art of convincing

-Carth Onasi-

The apartment was pretty beat-up, considering it was located on the upper echelons of Tarisian society. Murky crimson blotches marred the drab plasteel walls, marks that told me this environment was not as safe as I would have liked. But it's in the alien quarter. The Sith don't come here much, and that's the important factor. I sighed. I was sick of sitting here like a blind target, and there were only so many times I could play pazaak by myself. With an imaginary deck.

Damn the Jedi. Damn them for getting me into this mess. And damn myself for not being able to walk away.

And what a mess it was. The ambush of the Endar Spire happened so quickly we'd barely had time to react. We'd stopped to refuel at Mavis III, a neutral space station near the Taris system. A cruiser the size of the Endar Spire had significant logistical needs; for all that our mission had been done in stealth, it wasn't so easy to sneak around hyperspace with that much manpower to support.

Even so, the officer in me pointed out that only the Jedi team - and myself - had been cognizant of our intermediary destination. I'd only informed my senior navi-pilot a handful of hours before hyperspace exit - and he'd never even made it to the bridge.

Yet a fair portion of the Sith armada had been lying in wait when we entered realspace. That had to be the work of a traitor - a Jedi traitor.

I closed my eyes when I considered how many had been slaughtered onboard. All the escape pods had launched towards the Sith-controlled planet of Taris, but we hadn't been close; not all of them would have survived. And only one Jedi even made it to the pods. The rest had perished, vanquished along with so many of my comrades by those Sith monsters.

To think that once we'd thought the Mandalorians had been the real threat.

So here I was, hiding as a fugitive on Taris with an injured academic, my only hope that Jedi Bastila Shan might have survived and I could mount a rescue before the Sith found her. For whatever her mission had been, it was considered highly critical to the Republic war effort.

And how the blazes was I, a star-pilot and fleet captain, to achieve a feat better left to scouts I had no idea.

Yet.

I'd blundered into this apartment complex surprisingly quick after the landing – if one could call smashing into several buildings before grinding to an explosive halt outside the local cantina a landing. Still, the resulting smoke and gawking drunks allowed me to hightail it without attracting notice. I'd been lucky it was night, and that somehow the Sith patrols had missed me vanishing into the crowd.

There’d been a poorly dressed Ithorian who’d seen me slip away from the escape pod, and for some unknown reason taken pity on our predicament. Despite the language barrier – he spoke no Basic and I didn’t understand his home tongue – he’d led me to this complex, indicating this very room – mercifully empty - before disappearing. If I’d been a Jedi, I would have considered it the will of the Force. As it was, I’d been both gratified and surprised at my fortuitous good luck.

I'd carried the injured scholar with me, who'd been out stone cold, but a traitorous voice in my head suggested things would be a lot easier if I was on my own.

My eyes slid to the comatose figure on the ratty bunk, as I mentally berated myself for that unwelcome thought. I'd never left anyone behind in all my years of service, and I wasn't about to start now... but I'd seen her onboard. A shy academic who blushes if someone so much as looks at her. But she had, at least, some fighting ability. I'd seen the tail-end of her brawl with that group of Sith near the escape pods. Her fighting ability had been wild, unhinged, and surprisingly accurate given her service records.

A berserker, I'd thought in surprise; either with some experience or an amazing amount of luck to survive that encounter. I wasn't sure how helpful that would be, though - berserkers weren't necessarily the best at keeping a low profile.

The woman was moaning quietly in her sleep. She'd had a shot of kolto back on the 'Spire, and the standard medical kit from the escape pod had been useful in patching her up, but... more kolto is what I really need. The wound on her head looked serious. I cursed under my breath.

I'd had a bit of a scout around last night, attempting to orientate myself with this foreign world. The urbanized planet consisted of multiple levels of sprawling buildings, integrated into vertical suburbs. Having crashed on the topside "surface", I was currently hiding out in what was known as Upper Taris, the relatively high-class governmental district. It seemed travel to the lower levels was strictly controlled. I'd been quite surprised at the lack of air traffic until I'd heard about the planet-wide quarantine.

It makes sense. The Sith will be searching for any survivors. I'd followed the war as much as any soldier fighting for the Republic, and I'd known about the Sith presence on this planet. Not quite an invasion – Taris had been decimated in the Mandalorian wars, so was first a willing economic partner with the Sith, and over time a not-so-willing base for their forces. Apparently the Tarisian government was neutral in the ongoing conflict, but as I oh-so-casually checked out my immediate surroundings, I'd realized that the Sith were really the ones in control here.

The place was crawling with them. Men garbed in shiny black armour haunted the entrance to any accessible turbo-lifts and patrolled the vast courtyards that graced the commercial sectors of Upper Taris. I could only hope that they had not found Bastila Shan.

For Bastila's Jedi gifts were one of the few advantages we had left in this monstrous war. To think that the Sith leader, Darth Malak – and his master before him, Darth Revan – had once been the shining heroes of the Republic. I, like so many others, had admired them and followed them to victory, before they viciously turned on the people they had saved. They weren't the only traitors, a bitter voice reminded me.

But I wasn't going to dwell on my resentment about betrayal; I had a mission to complete. I'd managed to find a medical centre, headed by a doctor I'd wager had Republic sympathies, considering the grim way he scowled whenever I'd mentioned the Sith. He wasn't very forthcoming with information, but he'd promised to get me some kolto by morning, for what amounted to candy money – which was frankly all I had. I don't like trusting strangers – especially when they offer salvation for cracklenuts. But what other choice do I have? I doubted my injured companion would last long without kolto, and I didn't exactly see any spare bacta tanks lying about, either.

I glanced around the tiny apartment. A hard bunk lined the dank room on one side, and a grimy, minimalist kitchenette on the other. The place had been stripped of any items, other than a few fraying blankets and a handful of dirty clothes. The latter was actually a shining piece of luck; although musty and ill-fitting, the clothes were certainly more appropriate than either the commander's uniform I'd been wearing, or my lucky old flight jacket I'd grabbed while fleeing the Endar Spire.

But I was starting to feel edgy and claustrophobic; worn out from anxiety over my comatose comrade, and aggravated at the lack of action. I hated to be sitting around doing nothing, waiting for that damn scholar to wake up. Well, there's no reason I can't go out for a bit. I need to see Zelka anyway, and I may as well get my bearings.

I figured it was heading on to early dawn on Taris, and the chances of the woman waking in the next few hours were slim to none. I jammed my well-used blaster underneath the cast-off shirt I'd pulled from the apartment's cupboard, and cautiously headed out. The resident aliens threw me curious looks as I walked past, but didn't approach. They are just as wary as me.

I strode past a merchant Twi'lek who'd set up a kiosk in the building, and avoided his gaze. He had that eager salesman look, completely at odds with the locals who lived here.

"Well, I don't see too many of your kind around here," the fellow boomed at me as I tried to edge surreptitiously past. "Most of the residents in this old rundown apartment are illegal aliens. My name is Larrim, by the way."

"Uh, hi," I said dismissively in response, and continued walking.

"I know it's really none of my business, but you look like someone who might need to purchase one of these new energy shields. They're the latest thing, you know. Very high tech."

I sighed inwardly as I stopped to face him. "Maybe later."

"Come on, at a price of one hundred credits almost anyone can afford them! They'll absorb at least four direct blaster hits before depletion – this could save your life in a fight!"

"Unless you're up against vibroswords," I said dryly. As if I had the credits, anyway. The Twi'lek looked ready to burst into another enthusiastic spiel. The technology behind energy shields had revolutionized ground combat during the Mandalorian wars – and brought back an almost extinct form of engagement: melee fighting. Vibroswords - swords that emitted ultrasonic vibrations to increase their cutting edge - sliced straight through energy shields.

"Look, I don't have any credits, sorry!" I told him quickly as I strode off. His extroverted zeal was an anomaly – most of the aliens kept to themselves here and I couldn't blame them, considering the rampant xenophobia on Taris. I'd already heard several comments about those 'filthy non-Humans littering our streets' when I'd been out scouting earlier.

I walked outside into the morning sun, a public courtyard stretching magnificently before me. Other than a handful of rundown, disused buildings, Upper Taris gleamed and glistened with wealth. A few early-risers dotted the pathways, and their attire was a far cry from grubby clothes I was sporting.

I grimaced, feeling more out of place here than on Coruscant itself. Though at least here I'm not forced to wear that hideous ceremonial uniform the Republic is so keen on. Coruscant had never been my favourite destination.

As I strolled towards the medical centre, I started mulling over my predicament. I knew Jedi Shan had escaped, and I also knew that she was the only Jedi who'd managed to. My duty demanded that I do everything possible to rescue her, but it wasn't going to be easy.

If only I knew what this mission had really been about. We'd been en route to Tatooine, and all I'd managed to squeeze out of the Jedi onboard was that it had something to do with ruins. Admiral Dodonna herself had organized my transfer as an advisory captain to the starcruiser's navi-pilots.

It was not my usual role.

...

"I need someone I can trust onboard the Endar Spire, Captain." Her dark eyes were serious and intent on me. Admiral Dodonna was a superior I had a vast amount of respect for. She was not my usual reporting line, though - she'd bumped me to her staff for reasons she was now expounding upon: mysterious and irritating ones, it was beginning to seem.

"I want to be on the frontlines, Admiral, where I can be useful!" I protested. This all sounded about as pleasant as paperwork groundside. "I don't see how carting around a bunch of Jedi from planet to planet is going to help the war."

"The Jedi are not particularly forthcoming with information, but I do understand this stealth mission is critical." She sighed, as a look of grim - almost bleak - determination added another ten years to her already lined face. "Technically this is a mission from the Jedi Order, so you'll be accountable to them even though you will report to me whenever possible. Carth, you've spent your lifetime fighting and have more experience at adapting to changing situations than most. I know you, and I trust you." She paused for a moment before her voice returned, quieter than before. "We are not winning the war, Carth. You know this."

I felt the corners of my mouth turn down as I was forced to acknowledge that statement with a brisk nod. Darth Malak's armada was expanding with foreign ships that seemingly came from nowhere. The Republic was losing... and losing hard.

Admiral Dodonna sighed again. "Whatever the Jedi have up their sleeve may be our only chance."

I could understand her reasoning, but my skills would be wasted on this trip. I was a snubfighter pilot, a Wing Leader; stang, there'd even been times I'd fought on the ground. Captaining large starcruisers was not something in my resume, and it being an advisory role made me feel all the more useless. "Yes, but surely there is someone better suited for this position, Admiral? I can help on the-"

"You have your orders, Captain." Her voice rang with the steel of authority, and I subsided, feeling both frustrated and thwarted. It was Dodonna's trust and high opinion that hogtied me here: implied was the need for both a listening ear and a persuasive voice that could wring details from the Jedi and squirrel those details back to Republic HQ.

I revised my earlier thought: paperwork on base sounded infinitely more appealing than dealing with secretive Jedi.

Dodonna's grey eyes softened an infinitesimal amount. "Find out what they're up to, Carth. And good luck."

...

So there I was, a decorated war hero bowing to every Jedi whim. And there had been enough of them, though that Bastila one was the worst. And the most important, unfortunately. I grimaced.
Her battle meditation alone had made her a vital asset to the Republic war effort, but her snooty attitude I could have lived without.

Then there was this Jen Sahara; a meek scholar who'd hid behind one of the ensigns onboard for the most part. And yet, she was able to put down three Sith soldiers in an angry rage, despite the injuries I'd later discovered she'd been sporting.

I don't get why she was on the ship. I'd checked out her service records, and they were disappointingly brief. Jen Sahara had grown up in a commune on Deralia. Studied ancient archaeology and anthropology at the Academia there. Apparently, the Jedi had requested her services to check out some mysterious ruins on Tatooine. That doesn't gel, though. Most of the Jedi on the Endar Spire would know more about ancient ruins than some unknown scholar. They spend all their life farting around with historical texts and old artefacts. And if they wanted scholars, surely they'd hire more than just one? According to Jen's records, she'd never even left her home planet before. Something doesn't fit, and I'm going to find out what.

xXx

A few hours later I was on my way back to the apartment. Zelka Forn had loosened up a bit, downloaded a Tarisian informational package to my datapad, and informed me that a couple of escape pods had crashed into the Undercity. Which was happily populated with diseased infectious mutants. I'll worry about that when we get there, I told myself firmly. One step at a time, Onasi.

My biggest problem was credits – or lack thereof. I was hoping Jen Sahara would be intelligent enough to bounce ideas off, as getting down to the lower levels was starting to look incredibly tricky.

I became aware of a slight commotion as I drew close to the hideout. A Duros was hurriedly dragging what looked like a Sith corpse into the apartment next to mine, and judging by the blood on the floor there had been more than one. Blast it, the Sith are here already?

"What happened here?" I asked the Duros quickly, stepping in front of him. He jabbered back in his own language, and tried to drag the corpse around me. I wasn't falling for that, however; most aliens understood Galactic Basic even if they could not speak it. Maybe aid is the way to loosen his tongue. I grabbed the other end of the Sith corpse, and nodded to the apartment when the Duros gave me a surprised look.

"So, what happened? If you can speak Basic, I'd like to know. I'm just as keen to keep a low profile as you are," I said, once we were inside. This apartment was identical to the place I'd claimed, apart from obvious pile of corpses.

The Duros stared at me unblinkingly, and then sighed in defeat. "This isn't the first time the Sith have come in here to cause trouble for us, but hopefully it will be the last," the Duros answered, his voice halting and tripping over the words. He lowered his head sadly. "Poor Ixgil. He should never have talked back to that Sith."

"What were the Sith looking for?" I asked cautiously.

"Anything. They like to bully," the alien responded. "It would have meant my death, too, if not for that crazy Human."

I blinked. Crazy... Human? I thought there were only aliens around here? A sinking feeling in my gut made itself known. Stang, it couldn't be, could it? "I- uh, Human?"
"This Human female walked into the middle of it and killed them all. I am astounded a Human would come to the aid of a Duros, but she ran away before I could thank her."

"I, uh, I've gotta go," I mumbled as I ran out. I sprinted down the battered corridor to my apartment, hurriedly switched the door open and... nothing.

The room was empty.

_I swear, some omnipotent force is watching me, and having a good ole laugh._

"Damn!" I cursed in frustration, slamming my hand against the wall. _I shouldn't have left her. She must have woken up with no idea where she was and panicked. But to run out and attack Sith..."

"What now, Onasi?" I sighed to myself. "Find the crazy chit, or leave her as dead?"

I couldn't do that, but my priority had to be Bastila. I forced myself to think rationally._I have to get some leads on Bastila... find out more about this Undercity. There's a cantina nearby, and I can ask around if anyone's seen Jen. If the Sith haven't captured her yet._

I opened the apartment's only closet to grab my lucky orange flight jacket, but it was missing. Shock assailed me for a moment.

_She stole my jacket? Oh, this is personal now._

_xXx_

The Upper City cantina was overrun with pazaak players – a common way to make easy credits – but I didn't have a deck. Although with the way the Alpha Squad boys back at base kept kicking my arse, this might have been a blessing in disguise.

My mood was steadily declining. Being forced to rescue two females, both of whom I disliked, was enough to drive any sane man up the wall.

_Calm down, Onasi. Cantinas are always a good place for easy credits and information. Best place to start._ I could admit I was seriously annoyed that Jen had run off. Annoyed at myself, too. _I shouldn't have left a severely injured comrade alone, with no idea where they were. But I didn't expect her to run off as soon as she woke!_

I grabbed a chair and sat down, surveying the area cautiously. The cantina seemed out of place in Upper Taris, as it was mired in drunks, card sharks and disreputable spacers. _I wonder how many of them are trapped due to the quarantine._ Still, while I'd expected a classier joint, this was just the sort of place liable to provide information – for the right price.

A drunken male laugh caught my attention from the opposite corner.

"You're shure pretty! Yer shirt's gotta go, but you can shtay!"

Some seedy guy hitting on an unsuspecting girl, no doubt. _Though she'd have to be pretty simple to fall for that one._

"An' fer an' off-worlder, you can shure handle Tarisian ale!" The guy was slurring so much he could almost pass for a Selkath.

"It's not bad," came the response; a woman’s voice. _"Helps to drown out thoughts."_

I narrowed my eyes suspiciously, trying to spot its source, but the inebriated fellow was in the way.
The man moved around her then, and I had a clear glimpse at the woman's face, shadowed under a mop of curly dark hair. I can't believe it, I thought in stunned disbelief as my mouth dropped open. That's Jen. She ran off to get drunk?

I was by her side before I knew it, staring down into surprised green eyes as I tapped her on the shoulder. "Are you drinking, Jen Sahara?" I hissed at her.

"Hey, leave her alone!" the fool blustered at me. "She's mine!"

I turned to glare at him. "Get out of here, this doesn't concern you," I said in a low voice, hoping the idiot would do the smart thing and leave.

Jen squinted at me, a blurry expression of confusion twisting her face. Her eyes were glassy and unfocused.

She is drunk. Great. That's just great.

"I'm getting you out of here, Jen," I said in warning, and then pulled her to her feet. I was once again surprised at just how little she weighed, despite her years. Looking at her I realized she had to be deep into her thirties. No, wait, her records said she was twenty-six galactic years. Well, health professionals had always lectured me on the aging properties of alcohol before I'd given it up for good.

"Hey, she's my date," the guy burbled at me, shoving my shoulder hard enough that I stumbled, losing my grip on Jen's arm. "You're spoiling my fun!" He had an ugly scowl on his face, and I didn't need to hear exactly what his fun would have been.

This could turn ugly. I need to get Jen out now. My blaster was in my free hand before I realized it. "Back off."

The man raised his hands in surprise, and tripped backwards. "I don't wan' any trouble!"

So much for keeping a low profile. I inwardly cursed myself. That was stupid. Starting a firefight in the local cantina is not the best way to hide from the authorities. Fortunately for me, the drunk was stumbling away, muttering under his breath. I turned back to Jen, nudging her towards the exit, but she pulled away from me in protest.

"I can walk! Don't touch me!" she hissed, and I realized that dragging a drunken woman through the streets of Upper Taris was about as conspicuous as pulling a gun on a drunk. I raised my hands in appeasement, and she lost her balance, abruptly stumbling against me.

Steadying her with a hand, the thought of her inebriated state once more flared my irritation. "I can't believe you ran off to get drunk!" I condemned, glancing around to make sure no one was in earshot. There were definitely enough spectators watching our little scene, but fortunately all of them were viewing from a distance.

"I said don't touch me!" Jen snarled viciously, and slammed the palms of her hands into my gut. The air left my lungs in a whoosh and I fell backwards, hard on my arse, shock assailing me at her physical outburst.

The ugly look of violence on her face was enough to keep me sprawled there, silent, in the middle of the cantina. I heard a few sniggers from the nearby patrons, and my face warmed in angry humiliation.

As quick as lightening, Jen's expression changed to remorse, and then embarrassment. She looked around hurriedly.

"Are you alright, Miss?" A nearby patron came up beside her, shooting me a filthy glare. "Is this man giving you trouble?"

"No!" she said suddenly. "I overreacted. Sorry." She turned, fixing apologetic green eyes on me. "I'm sorry about that. I don't know what came over me." She offered me a slim hand to get up, and I stared at it as if it were a diseased gizka.

This woman is completely crazy. She's going to get us both killed.

And now, she was acting stone cold sober.

I pushed myself to my feet and eyed her suspiciously. She still had that contrite expression pasted on her face, but the sheer venom of her earlier attack made me wary.

"I, uh-" I began, not entirely sure how to start.

"I guess we should talk," Jen muttered. "You're Onasi, right? Sit down, and I'll grab us some drinks."

"What?" I stared at her. More alcohol? My anger slowly burned back to life.

"Drinks as in caffa." She grinned suddenly, impishly. "But I almost got you going again, huh?"

I could only blink at her. First she's as violent and temperamental as a Sith, then she's all apologetic, and now she's cracking jokes?

Somehow, I was left gaping at crazy woman’s back while she strolled nonchalantly towards the bar. When Jen promptly returned with two steaming cups of caffa, I realized with a jolt I was still staring.

Jen glanced at me curiously. "Shall we have a seat?"

"Uh, sure," I muttered awkwardly, following her to an empty table. The noise in the cantina had resumed to its earlier hubbub of normality. While I would have preferred our initial conversation to have taken place in the hideout, it seemed relatively anonymous in here. And I'm not sure I could get her back to the apartment. I hate not being able to read people. What happened to the shy scholar back on the Endar Spire?

"I guess I should also apologize for running out," Jen muttered, staring into her mug.

"What, as well as for getting drunk, and causing a scene that could have brought the Sith down on us?" I grumbled.

She scowled at me, and I could see her struggling to remain calm. Despite myself, I actually felt a vague stirring of amusement as I watched her scrunch her face in a clumsy attempt to rein in her temper. It seemed to work.

"I've only had one drink. I'm not drunk, although I'm planning to be." Jen sighed, her eyes dropping back to the plasteel table. It was scuffed with beer rings and smears of grime. "I guess I owe you my life. Thanks."

I inclined my head, but wasn't prepared to let it go just yet. "Exactly why did you run out anyway? You're still injured. That knock to your head looked pretty serious." It did. Her hair was matted on one side of her head. The darkness of it hid the dried blood, but I'd seen the wound earlier. I wouldn't have expected her to be so mobile. I frowned. "I didn't think you'd wake up so soon. I, uh-I wouldn't have left, otherwise."

Jen grimaced. "Well, I'm definitely not feeling the best. As to why-" She lowered her head. "I woke up and heard shots outside. I thought people were coming after me."

Something in her voice didn't ring true. And she was avoiding my gaze.

"Before I knew it, I was in the middle of a firefight," she said in a soft, placating voice. "I just... panicked, and ran - and ended up here. I was planning to go back to the apartment."

*Right. About as plausible as her sugar-sweet tone. "When? Before or after you got drunk?"

"After, I guess. I really am sorry, I just haven't been thinking straight." She caught my gaze then, big luminous eyes as if appealing to my better nature. Oh, that's not going to work on me, sister. I shifted uncomfortably in my seat, lowering my gaze to the cracked cup of caffa nestled between my hands.

Jen continued quietly. "All I remember is waking up and grabbing this jacket and vibrosword, and running."

"No kidding," I muttered, but for the first time she really did sound genuine. I glanced back up at her. "And it looks like you've got ale all over my lucky jacket, thank you very much."

She spluttered on her caffa. "This orange monstrosity is a lucky ja-"

I cut her off. "So, injured and panicked, you decided to rush madly into some firefight, with no idea who or how many possible enemies there were?"

Jen actually blushed at that, a sign that my statement was accurate to some degree. "Yes, not the brightest thought, I'll admit."

"And then you decided to go down some Tarisian ale for the heck of it?"

She looked away once more. "It seemed like a good idea at the time," she muttered sulkily.

"You're not just reckless, you're insane," I said flatly. "Well, from now on, we'd better do things my way."

I regretted the words as soon as they came out of my mouth, but there was no taking them back. Well done Onasi, lets just fire her up again shall we?

"We? Since when is there a 'we', Republic?" Jen demanded, her meek act vanishing like juma juice in a merc bar.

Republic? That almost sounded like an insult.

Jen's eyes flashed green daggers under her short mop of dark brown curls. Her face was pale beneath a natural olive tone, a handful of freckles across the bridge of her nose standing out in stark relief. Her sharp jaw was set stubbornly, and I reminded myself that she'd only just woken up. Dumb luck had kept her alive, but Jen probably had no idea what was going on.

"Taris is under Sith control," I explained. "This planet is locked up tight; I've heard the Sith are even arresting citizens carrying weapons without an approved permit. There's no way the Republic will be able to get anyone through the Sith blockade to help us. If we're going to find Bastila and get off this planet, we can't rely on anybody but ourselves."

Jen frowned at me, looking as if she was trying to figure something out. Her fingers tapped softly against the plasteel table. "You don't like the Sith, you want to rescue this Jedi girl, and you need to get off the planet. Fair enough, I get that. But where does this we come into it?"

My mouth dropped open in shock. She was one of the crew, dammit! "You swore an oath to the Republic, and to defend Bastila!"

"I never swore an oath!" Jen hissed. She breathed in deeply, and seemed to wrest control of herself once more. Her eyes squeezed tight, and the next words were forced out, hard and cold as ferracrystal. "I was hired by the Jedi Council to go to Tatooine on the Endar Spire. The ship's destroyed, so I consider that job complete. Besides, I'd just as soon get away from any Jedi."

"Your job isn't over – Bastila is still alive," I informed her coldly.

"I was never paid," she retorted, eyes open once more as she leaned back on the stool and folded her arms defensively. "As far as I'm concerned it's over."

She really would walk out, I realized, as I took in the obstinate expression on her face. Just another traitor to the Republic... but the Jedi Council requested her specifically. For some reason they need her, and I will not fail in my duty if at all possible.

"I saved your life, Jen." I hate emotional blackmail... but I don't really have a choice here. I need all the allies I can get, and so do the Jedi. "Even if you have no honour or decency, you still owe me a debt for that."

She visibly cringed, and for the first time genuinely looked like the unassuming academic I'd originally pegged her as.

"Help me rescue Bastila, and we'll call it even," I finished. This unpredictable loose cannon could then be the Jedi's problem, not mine.

She bowed her head, refusing to look at me. "Fine. I guess I owe you that much."

Relieved, I slouched back and had a gulp of the caffa. Terribly weak, I was surprised they could get away with selling it.

Well, at least Jen's agreed. I hope that's the end of that conversation.

"How do you even know Bastila's alive?"

So much for that. "I don't. But Bastila's young, and she has a powerful command of the Force. We survived the crash landing, so I'm willing to bet that she may have, too."

Jen had raised her head once more, frowning at me. "Did other Jedi escape the Endar Spire then?"

"Some Republic soldiers did, but no other Jedi made it to the escape pods. Bastila was the only one." My shoulders slumped as I recalled the battle. I hadn't wanted to captain the Endar Spire, I'd wanted to pilot and lead snubfighters on the frontlines, going head-to-head with the enemy directly. And now, the Endar Spire was in bits, and near all the soldiers onboard dead.

"So it is her then," Jen whispered, seemingly to herself.

"What is her?" I asked suspiciously. She had a vague look on her face, but it disappeared as her attention snapped back to me.
"Uh, nothing," she mumbled.

Yeah right. Just who are you, Jen Sahara?

xXx
Battling one’s thoughts

- Jen Sahara -

I felt like a spectator watching a duel. The pacifist versus the evil punk. Ten credits as to who would win, I thought sourly, but neither identity actually seemed to resonate with who I thought I was.

The only history I had – the past of meek Jen Sahara – was real. It had to be. I could almost taste the kakasi trees in bloom, and I remembered hero-worshipping my- no her- oppressive father. But in all those thoughts and memories, the way I interacted was so wrong. I couldn't imagine cowering and bowing to every whim of my family, and trying to please anybody but myself. Running from confrontations, and always trying to hide in the shadows like a helpless little tach. It was as if I'd been inside someone else's head, watching them as they lived out their life, but having no say in what they did.

And not even aware I’d had no say, until now. That was a terrifying realization that I was only beginning to grasp – the idea that I might not actually be who my brain was saying I was.

My recollection of the last year was where it all disintegrated. I could vaguely recall some Jedi contacting me and organizing a study expedition onboard a Republic cruiser. I struggled to remember what I’d been doing for the past six months; it felt like a dream – numb and almost forgotten. In between a history I didn’t want to claim as mine, and a present as hazy as a spice trip, it didn’t seem feasible that I could be Jen Sahara.

It wasn’t just the knock to the head on the Endar Spire, was it? A head injury couldn’t… change what you thought your personality was, could it?

Earlier, I'd had the instinct that it had liberated me - the real me. But what would that mean? That I was actually some sort of sadistic freak who wished to torture countless people for sheer enjoyment and power? I'd only felt brief flashes of this persona, but they'd been so sharp. Visceral, intense. Insane and inhumanely cruel. That identity wasn't me, it simply couldn't be.

And this isn't even counting in that Bastila woman, I mused bitterly. So who was I really? The only explanation I wanted to consider was that I was a third person, who'd somehow lost her entire memory and had two others programmed in instead. Hmm, that sounds really plausible. I’m not sure I could even get the drunks at the cantina to believe that one. Not to mention that if I did entertain an idea so ludicrous – then the implications were shattering.

For it meant my mind had been royally messed up. By some very powerful people.

That heightened my terror further.

If there was any truth to it – and I then added in the additional factors of my Jedi guard and Jen’s mission to look at ruins – then it all had something to do with the sodding Jedi Order. But, could the Jedi do this sort of thing? Change someone’s history, someone’s personality, so thoroughly that they didn’t even realize it?

Isn’t that against their ethos, or something?
Jen Sahara knew nothing about the Jedi, other than that they were an almost mythical organization with fantastical powers who helped those in need. The least likely sort of people to deliberately do this to someone. It just didn’t seem plausible.

But I'm already involved with the Jedi. And I bet they don't want me remembering anything other than Jen Sahara, the pushover. I shivered.

The thoughts spun around and twisted in on themselves, a dark spiral of fear and anger and overwhelming confusion that battered against my psyche. I needed to act, to focus on the present, and leave this mental quagmire under wraps until a better time for reflection. A time when I wasn’t a fugitive on a Sith-controlled planet, hunting for a Jedi I had no desire to see.

Why did I agree with Captain Flyboy anyway? Part of me still logically reasoned how easy it would be to slip away and disappear, but my own code of honour wouldn’t allow me. He did save my life after all. Hah! If I have a code of honour, then I can’t be the sadistic evil bitch.

I couldn’t be. It was worse than being Jen Sahara. I utterly rejected the idea that might be me, except…

…that power. It was another thing I was desperately trying to ignore. I’d sensed something back on the Endar Spire, something that Jen had never felt in her life. And I was certain – dead certain – that I could bend it to my will, if only I remembered how.

Instinct had me reaching for it earlier when Onasi grabbed me in the cantina, but my metaphorical grasp had closed on metaphorical empty air.

Is it the Force? The idea was fanciful, frankly unbelievable. But what else swirled liked electric energy around Force users? And if it is the Force, do I really want to wield it? If it was, then that linked me straight back to the Jedi, pointing another accusatory finger at their involvement in my current situation.

And once more, the horror reared up inside - accompanied with an anger vicious enough that all I felt was the desire for bloody vengeance.

Onasi was watching me now, his face clouded with suspicion. I’d pick him in his late thirties somewhere, with a strong handsome face and eyes the same rich colour as his chestnut hair. He had a guarded, combat-ready look about him, and I had the feeling he’d seen more than his fair share of action.

I took a deep breath in, filling my lungs with the re-circulated air of the cantina, and focused on him. I’d figure this all out later - for now, it was time to appease Onasi and start on this frelling Jedi hunt.

He was saying something about Bastila Shan, and despite my conviction to listen, the Jedi's name had my thoughts derailing once more. For I remembered being told about Bastila Shan back on the Endar Spire - a capable young Jedi who was one of the leading figures in the war against the Sith. I could even recall, somewhat hazily, talking with her on a few occasions. Each time, cowering in front of her like an awe-struck Jawa.

Yet I had been convinced, during the mad exit from the Endar Spire, that we were mind-linked. I didn’t even understand what that meant, not really, but the thought had come unbidden – stark and resolute and shining with certainty. I’d sensed her psychic emotions. She’d been alarmed at my fury.
Again, another conclusion that seemed wildly preposterous.

But it’s still there! She’s still there! In my head. Flashing with anger and fright and desperation. Emotions coming from someone else, being felt by someone else. It was confusing enough that I genuinely had panicked when I’d woken up in the apartment and heard a commotion outside.

My head throbbed, reminding me of the injury at the root of these revelations. Brain damage, a dark voice mocked. Was that why I was hearing voices? Was that why I thought I was three people?

Carth was still frowning; if I couldn’t win him over, I doubted I could make a powerful Jedi believe all was well. And the last thing I wanted was her noticing the fractures in my mind.

For if I was aware of her... then surely, that meant, she was aware of me.

But suddenly the presence, Bastila’s presence, in my head froze. Like all emotion had been abruptly halted. What happened now? Some Rodian hit on her? I blinked. No... it's like she's fallen asleep suddenly... or been knocked unconscious.

The mind-link was real. I was convinced of it, now.

"Hello?" Carth said. "Are you even listening to what I'm saying?" He was frowning at me again from across the cantina table, arms folded. At least none of the patrons were staring at us anymore, although earlier I'd wondered if the uptight bartender was going to refuse me caffa.

"Uh, sorry," I muttered.

"Yeah, I know, your favourite word," he grumbled. "Are you sure you only had one drink?"

"Yes." Calm. Stay calm. "But my head's been hurting a lot since I injured it. I've just been feeling really confused." That, at least, is the truth.

He didn't seem to buy it, judging by the wary look in his eyes.

"Look, I know I've been acting quite..." I sighed, trailing off in defeat. "Is there any chance we could just start over? My head is killing me, and I'm not sure how much more I can take. I haven’t felt... normal since I hit my head.” Even now it was throbbing with a dull ache. It had been reckless to run off, but I’d woken up in a strange place, bombarded by someone else’s feelings, and I’d bolted.

I hadn’t even realized what planet I was on until I'd started sweet-talking the sloshed local for information and a complimentary drink.

A look of concern crossed over Carth's face. Hah, I will get you eating out of my hand, I swear.

"Ah, I forgot," Carth said suddenly, and grabbed something out of his pocket. "I managed to get a shot of kolto. You'd better take it now; you still look pretty wretched."

I eyed it over suspiciously; the disposable hypoderm with the automatic needle could contain any manner of substitute disguised as a life-saving healing medication. For kolto was superior to bacta in strength, swiftness and shelf-life, and its synthesization was still in its infancy. The Selkath had only started mass-producing it during the Exar Kun conflict, and they held onto their monopoly tightly with their fishy little tentacles.

I froze. Jen Sahara knew nothing of this. Although kolto was heard-of on Deralia, it certainly wasn’t a topic of interest for the meek scholar of ancient civilizations. I’m not Jen Sahara. That was starting to become abundantly clear.

I’d taken too long; Onasi had sighed, dropping the tiny cylinder of doubt on the plasteel table, close to my hands. “It is kolto, I purchased it from a medical centre. I don’t blame you for being wary, but the doctor seemed reputable. I was lucky he managed to source any at all with the Sith quarantine starting to hurt trade.”

Seemed reputable. It wasn’t exactly a shining endorsement, but then again I had the feeling that Onasi wasn’t an overly effusive sort of guy. And reckless had been working for me thus far… I shrugged, picked up the hypoderm, and injected it into my exposed forearm.

A warm sensation hit my bloodstream, rippling slowly through my limbs. It felt familiar; my muscles loosened and the pounding in my head dulled almost instantly. While I doubted I’d be up to anything too intense - like, say, jumping into one of those betting duels next door that I’d heard cantina patrons gossiping about - at least I was starting to feel vaguely normal again. Kolto wasn’t miraculous, but it wasn't far off: it had an amazing ability to vastly increase wound healing. I'd always compared it to a full-body bacta suit on adrenastims.

Again, my hands stilled. Definitely not a Jen thought. Again, another indication that I was living in someone else’s body with someone else’s past. If I needed any more.

"So," I began, pushing the maelstrom of thoughts to the back of my mind. "Any idea where we should start looking for Bastila?" I took another sip of my caffa, but it was now cold. I grimaced in disgust.

"There are reports of a couple of escape pods crashing down into the Undercity," Carth commented quietly. "That's probably a good place to start. But the Undercity is a dangerous place; we don't want to go there unprepared."

The Undercity… Carth gave me a brief rundown, which was essentially the same information I’d drawn out of my inebriated admirer earlier. Taris was an ecumenopolis, a planet-sized city that had squandered its resources centuries ago and started building upwards. The Undercity Carth referred to were the dark, polluted depths tens of klicks below us – beneath even the gangs and crime that ruled over most of the subterranean levels.

Once, the Undercity had been the surface. A very, very long time ago. The drunk I’d spoken to said it was pitch dark down there, and the only inhabitants were mutant zombies that feasted on the homeless.

Although he’d also said he was the Tarisian swoop champion three years running.

I took a deep breath, and focused on Carth again. "Okay, so time to make some credits, buy some armour, avoid the Sith and find the girl?" I tried hard to come across as positive rather than derisive, but the entire quest sounded a bit suicidal. I’m Jen, remember? Play nice.

"Nobody will be looking for a couple of common grunts like us," Carth retorted defensively. He’d caught the sarcasm then. "And if we’re careful, we can move about the planet without attracting notice – a luxury Bastila won't have."

Bastila was still frozen in my head, and I was beginning to doubt she’d be able to move at all. Carth was right, though, it should be fairly easy to stay inconspicuous provided I stopped acting like a stimmed-up thug with too much testosterone. Although I hadn’t been the one to pull out a blaster in the middle of a busy cantina.
On the other hand, all the patrons were now leaving us alone.

I shrugged off my internal monologue. “So, the Undercity. How do we get there?”

Carth hesitated before answering. "It's a long way down, and there's not a straight route. Because air traffic has been restricted by the Sith quarantine, we'll have to use the patchwork of turbo-lifts to descend. But... the Sith control the ones I've seen on the Upper City. They won't let anyone past without authorisation - and they'll be on the lookout for Republic fugitives. We'll have to find a way to get around them."

“Okay,” I said slowly. “I get the feeling we may need some more resources. I have absolutely no credits, Flyboy. You?”

“Very little.” He looked at me seriously. “And even if we do get past the Sith, we’ll have to go through the Lower City. From what I’ve heard, the swoop gangs and the Exchange rule the tunnels down there – and there’s been a lot of unrest since the blockade. I don’t fancy going there without a bit more equipment – food, a medical kit or two, a spare weapon.”

I nodded in agreement. And some cash reserves, I thought silently. In case we need to buy intel or bribe someone. Never hurts to have a little extra on hand. "So, we need to find an easy way to make some creds. There's a dueling ring next door I wouldn't mind trying when I'm feeling a little more alive."

Carth raised an eyebrow. "Yes, uh, I was pretty impressed with the way you took out those Sith soldiers back on the Endar Spire."

I could feel myself blushing. Stop it, already! Act like Jen, don't be her. "I think I get a little crazy in battle," I mumbled. My only evidence to back that up was the desperate fight on the Endar Spire, and yet... yet it felt true. Jen doesn't get crazy in battle. Stars, Jen doesn't even watch holo-flicks about battles.

"Really? I hadn't noticed." Carth's tone was dry. Very dry. I glanced at him sharply, but his face was an inscrutable mask.

"Anyway," I continued, "got any other ideas for credits? Or should we think about looting what we need?" I immediately wished the words back, groaning inwardly. I shouldn't have said that. Judging by first impressions, Carth was a pretty straight-up sort of guy. Standard Fleet military - not accustomed to imaginative solutions.

A look of distaste crossed his face. "I'd rather not, but we may not have a choice. Unless you're any good at pazaak?"

I had a vague recollection of the gambling game. Mostly revolving around luck and psychology. "I'll give it a bash, but I need some cards."

Carth nodded in assent, and we left our table for the pazaak den. An old fellow named Garouk sold us his deck for fifty credits, which had Carth grumbling. When I took his last forty for wagering, he almost expired on the spot.

"Hey, it was your idea," I snapped, as he glowered at me.

"Okay, okay, you're right," he conceded. "Just- you better make that back. We're totally broke now."

"Just watch me, Flyboy." I winked, and walked off. I didn't feel the confidence I was portraying, but the game couldn't be too hard, surely? Garouk had explained the rules, and I was certain some part of me had played it before. If only I could remember. Somehow, muscle memory had kept me going since I’d awoken on the Endar Spire, and thrust into circumstances well beyond Jen’s capabilities. As long as I didn’t stop to think, luck seemed to be riding with me.

Pazaak was a simple card game that required players to get as close as possible to a score of twenty, without exceeding it. But it was by using the sidedeck – cards that added bonuses and specials – that the game became interesting.

I did not yet have a sidedeck.

There was small change to be had in the junior group of players who clustered around a circular table near the front of the room. Garouk had pointed me there as a starter, and I calmly introduced myself and watched for the first round before being challenged by a wide-eyed Rodian.

There were more non-Humans in the cantina than outside, that was obvious. I wondered how many of them were planet-stranded by the quarantine.

I was cautious with my play, inwardly trying to calculate the odds even as I found myself irritated by the simplicity of the game. None of the juniors had a side-deck, so we were all evenly matched. There was a Twi’lek in the group doing the best, crowing over a pile of tokens that seemed to be about a hundred credits’ worth. Soon, I found myself up forty or so – due to no more than dumb luck - while some of the others began to look distinctly crestfallen.

A large figure approached the table.

“Allright, pissants. Who’s game enough to wager against me?” the stranger taunted, crossing his arms and smirking at all in turn. The Twi’lek scooped up his pile silently and scuttled away; I blinked in surprise as the rest followed suit. Even the Rodian who’d played me at first - the only other one to be up a significant amount – was quick to disappear.

“Wow. You sure know how to clear a room,” I said dryly, shooting him an unimpressed look.

“You were playing against a bunch of pathetic aliens. Of course they run when they see their superior coming.” He smiled and sat down across from me. I felt a surge of intense dislike towards the xenophobic idiot. “My name’s Niklos. Let’s play a game or two, huh?”

I’d almost made back the initial deposit on the cards. We still needed credits. And yet, this patronizing Human was obviously well-versed in pazaak if the juniors were so reluctant to play against him.

“Don’t be a coward,” the man cajoled, the corner of his mouth twitching in a sneer. “Since you’re new here, I’ll even double my bet to sweeten the game. You’re not going to scurry away like the rest of those sewer rats, are you?”

My eyes narrowed. That was a good deal, and yet I felt suspicious. Let’s try one game only. I won’t do anything stupid. “Ten credits,” I said briskly, slipping two 5-cred grey tokens out from my pile to the centre of the table. “Let’s play.”

He laughed, a sound as irritating as a slag grinder, and nudged four greys to meet mine. “Alright,” he acquiesced, eyeing over my small pile of credits as if working out how much I had. Niklos began the match by turning a card face over, and after a few deals was up to a score of 13.

He held, flipping no more cards.
That’s overly cautious, I realized in surprise, and the next deal saw me up to 16. With a barely restrained smirk, I gathered in the tokens.

“Let’s play another,” Niklos offered, and he didn’t sound upset at the loss. “I’ll put in forty to your twenty, this time.”

My eyes narrowed on him. If I win, that’ll net me a neat one hundred creds, I realized. If I lose, I’ll be back down to forty. The odds were good, and I inclined my head in agreement.

He played the same as before, standing on a low 14. It was curious, considering the way the others had left so prematurely. He’s a jerk who verbally abuses aliens. Maybe they just don’t like him. My 15 trumped his, and I couldn’t contain the smile as I surveyed my growing pile of credits. Maybe this would do something to improve Onasi’s opinion of me. I glanced over to the far corner of the room where he sat nursing another cup of caffa, throwing the odd inscrutable glance in my direction.

“Thanks for the games, Niklos,” I said mildly, standing.

“Don’t run away like that spineless tailhead,” Nikos said, his voice oily and condescending. There was a twisted look of derision on his face, and I felt my jaw clenching in irritation. “I took you for someone with a little courage. Sit down, and play one more deal with me.”

“I’m smart enough to call it a good day, Niklos,” I said, my eyes narrowing.

Niklos spat to the side. “Pathetic. You’re as pathetic and cowardly as those disgusting non-Humans you hang around with.”

I could feel the anger stemming up inside. He’s a worm that I should grind beneath my boots. My hand twitched in a desire for violence that was insidiously dark and ugly in its intent. I am not Evil Bitch. I will not lash out at such obvious provocation.

Not to mention that we were trying to remain inconspicuous. I took a deep breath inward, and pushed the rage back down.

“I’ll triple my deal,” Niklos offered, pulling out three hundred-cred tokens. “One last match – your winnings versus mine.”

It was too good a deal to refuse, and I found myself seated once more. As the game started, though, Niklos’ posture changed from guarded watchfulness to overt confidence. And as he pulled out his side-deck, I realized with a humiliating wave of emotion that I’d been played.

This was his plan all along, to clear out my winnings. Sithspit! My vibrosword was still at my side. It would take one motion to slice him open from throat to navel, and pull out his intestines in front of his horror-filled eyes.

No, no that’s awful! Jen whispered in shock. No, no that’s suicidal, I countered. The Sith, remember? The stars-cursed Sith. But the fury didn’t dissipate. There was a buzzing in my ears, and I felt almost detached from the situation as an electric sensation began to resonate within me.

It sharpened as Niklos used a special card to bring his total to 18. He smirked in victory.

The hairs on my exposed forearms lifted, as if a static cloud had engulfed me in raw energy. Words tumbled out of my mouth, unbidden and instinctive and laden with meaning. "You should try for twenty. I bet the next card's a two."
"I – I think I'll try for twenty," he told me, in his thick accent. His eyes were round and slightly glazed. “I believe the next card is a two.”

It was a 7. The charge I felt in the air vanished, and I suddenly felt less alive.

And afraid. Surprised, and a little afraid.

“Thanks Niklos, I’m out,” I said hurriedly, grabbing his tokens and standing. Goosebumps rose on my spine. Niklos was staring at his pazaak cards in utter confusion. I brushed past an Aqualish who’d been watching, and ignored his startled glance as I rushed back to Onasi.

My heart was thundering. That's not normal. I did something, there. My fists were clenching, fingernails biting deep into the flesh. Niklos would likely trail after me soon, trying to bait me into another game. I wanted to get out of the cantina, now.

I jerked my head towards the entrance, and Onasi followed me as I cashed in my credits, his brows raising in surprise.

“Whoa, sister, that’s a fair haul,” he murmured, looking vaguely impressed. “I, uh, I was worried when you started playing Niklos. One of the patrons told me he liked to prey on the new players.”

I didn’t respond, heading silently out of the pazaak den and towards the cantina proper. Did I use the Force without realizing? I wondered in bewilderment. Is that sort of thing possible?

“You didn’t tell me you were a card shark,” Onasi prompted, a question in his voice.

"I- well, I was lucky," I muttered. He shot me a disbelieving look.

Parlour tricks and diversion, a voice sneered. That was child's play, you moron.

I flinched, and accidentally bumped into a seated Human dining near the front of the cantina. She turned to glare at me, surrounded by a handful of well-dressed friends.

"Hey, watch where you're going, cantina rat!" she snapped. Coloured ferracrystal gleamed from her lobes and around her neck. “I thought the help here was supposed to be in uniform, not dressed as gutter trash! Where are my drinks, you useless waiter?”

Heat pounded through my veins, surging from before, an electric darkness that all too easily overwhelmed rational thought. “Shut up, you spoiled brat!” I hissed. My fists clenched as I glared. Her gaze dropped to the visible vibrosword at my side, and she stood, backing away.

“How dare you speak to me like that!” She took another step back, face whitening in outrage. Her friends gathered to their feet, soft and rich and all edging away alongside her. “You will regret this, you low-born schutta!”

"You know, when I said nobody would be looking for us-" Carth's voice in the background slowly dispelled the red rage consuming me- "it went with the assumption that we'd be acting inconspicuous. Silly of me to assume that about you, I know." He sounded- well, more irritated than anything else. As the anger fled, it irked me that he was right yet again.

"I'd apologise, but you'd probably just complain again," I muttered. To my surprise, he actually chuckled.

"At least things don't get dull around you," he commented. "But in all seriousness, you- we- need to look and act like common Tarisian citizens. Yelling at aristocrats is not the way to go."
"I'll get better control of my temper." The annoying part was that he was right – these flashes of irrational anger were dangerous. To our mission, to our survival, and maybe even to my own mental health. And I’d prefer not to receive another lecture from him. But the noblewoman had taken me by surprise – the pazaak game had taken me by surprise – nothing made any frelling sense.

"For someone who's fairly shy, you sure do have one heck of a short fuse." He said it like a question. I knew he was wary of me, with good reason. He didn’t know the half of it.

I just stared at him in mute response, and he raised his hands in entreaty. "Okay, okay! I’ll drop it – for now."

_Hah, that almost sounded like a threat. Bring it on, Republic._

_xXx_

…

"Keep your eyes closed. And sit still!" the man admonished as I wriggled my toes. With effort, I stilled once more, attempting to block out the discomfort of sitting in one position for too long.

"Focus on what you can hear. Only your hearing. Stretch your senses out," he continued. He’d have me reciting all the various noises I could pick out, and then chastise me for missing half again as much. But with my eyes closed, it was hard to ignore the stench: the refuse and the rot and the unwashed stink that permeated every corner of Altizir's Western Underground. My sense of smell overpowered my hearing no matter how I practiced.

My best friend didn’t understand why I stayed with the man. Everyone thought blind old Freeflight was just another crazy – mind gone to rot under the shackles of poverty and desperation. We were all trapped in this miserable slum, penned in like bantha behind automated turrets that cut down any Uncitizen who dared dream of escape. It wasn’t uncommon for a sentient’s mind to break – and crazies didn’t usually last long, after that.

But Freeflight was different. He wasn’t crazy. Just… fascinating. His strange stories, his odd exercises, his dreams of a galaxy far, far away from this miserable place that drove desolation into everyone’s soul.

Sometimes, I felt like I was breathing his dreams in, tasting them in my mind, visualizing myself out there in the stars, somewhere.

My best friend thought hope was dangerous, but I didn’t care. And I didn’t care if it was me supporting Freeflight these days – scavenging for scraps that couldn’t really be called food, or dragging him to safety during another Enforcer raid. I didn’t care.

It hadn’t always been this way.

If not for Freeflight, I would’ve died a toddler, squalling over my mother’s corpse. He was the only family I had, and I loved him as fiercely as a true daughter could.

“Good,” he murmured, giving my shoulder an affectionate squeeze. “Now list at least another six.”
I woke with a start, breathing in audibly as I sat bolt upright in bed. What was that? I wondered in shock. A dream? It was the most vivid dream I could ever recall having, sharp and intense with both emotion and clarity... and yet, as I struggled to focus on the details, they were already slipping through the cracks. Something about hearing an old man? An old man I cared for? In a slum? The dream blurred, fading into the soft forgetfulness that was common with consciousness.

But... the feeling of caring- of wanting to make someone proud- lingered, even as I scrubbed tiredly at my face and urged myself to focus on the present.

My shoulder ached and my head throbbed, demanding my attention away from the fragments of the dream. I groaned softly, rolling my shoulder. Ahhh, what I'd give for an adrenastim. A drink would be almost as good.

Carth was asleep on the floor, after insisting that I take the bed. He's one of those traditional heroes, probably likes to open doors for ladies and rescue helpless victims. If only I could reliably act like one, I smirked to myself, then I might have a better chance of getting him onside.

I glanced down at the chronometer – Jen’s personal one, attached firmly to my wrist and now adjusted for Tarisian time. There were hours until dawn, and I highly doubted I’d be able to fall back into restful slumber. Moving about might loosen my muscles. With a nod to myself, I slipped out of bed quietly, so as not to wake the Republic pilot.

Silently, I changed into a set of drab clothes Carth had given me after sulkily grabbing his flight jacket back. I rolled my eyes at the memory. Republic pilots and their lucky charms.

Thoughts like that still struck me by surprise. Jen had never met a pilot before, other than the odd crop-duster. Until the Jedi came, of course. But if my head injury had caused some sort of mental delusion, then why did all my reactions scream of a life completely at odds with Jen Sahara’s?

Because I’m not Jen Sahara. I knew that now, but it seemed I needed constant reminding. Because the knock to my head freed me, or at least cracked the prison wall enough to let the light shine in.

Bastila was still out cold in the back of my head, like a frozen ice-pop, occasionally reminding me of her existence. I wondered briefly what this Jedi was like. She seemed snooty, all high and mighty, from what I heard of her. And very young, to have been given command of a Republic cruiser. I sighed, and turned my thoughts to other things. Bastila was one of the many topics I had no plausible answer to.

Well, time to scope out this building, I told myself as I stealthily walked to the door. There was no way I was going to wake Onasi up for this one, as I fully intended to loot whatever I found. I'd filched a low-grade tech spike from the inebriated lout who'd bought me a drink, and I was starting to wonder if I'd been a thief or street kid of some description. I feel like I know how to break into places. I can't remember it though. Jen wouldn't dream of breaking in anywhere, and I can't imagine Evil Bitch fiddling around with a lockpick. It'd probably be beneath her, I thought sourly.

The dark circular hallway was abandoned, and I walked up to the nearest door, listening intently for any sounds. Nothing. Either nobody's home, or someone's asleep. It didn't bother me greatly either way, and some dim part of me realized I was acting rather reckless. But hey, we need the credits. Ever since I'd woken up with a head injury and contradictory personalities on the Endar Spire, I'd been taking the crazy road. It seemed like the best way to stop thinking.

With a practiced hand, I automatically keyed into the tech lock and bypassed the security. The

xXx

An hour or so later, and my mind was disintegrating once more. I leaned against a corridor wall, shaking, sweat beading down my forehead. I can't go on like this. I keep hounding myself for control, and I keep failing miserably.

It had been fine - the first three apartments. I hadn’t really expected to find much, and other than a small stash of credit chits and a long, concealing coat I fancied, I’d walked away from the first two places empty-handed. The third, however, was the jackpot. Obviously some shady dealings took place in this grimy excuse for a building, as I was fortunate enough to stumble on somebody’s rather impressive stash of weaponry. I’d noticed a small pile of stims on the table first – those I’d be keeping secret from Onasi. From there, pilfering a pair of blasters, a vibrosword, and a handful of grenades was automatic; I’d hesitated on what looked like some sort of modified Mandalorian assault rifle. Honestly, it was amazing what some people left lying about.

But the next apartment...

The findings had left me careless; I’d waltzed in without checking the place was empty. Reckless. I’d woken a couple of Bith who’d mistaken me for an Exchange thug, and immediately started begging for their lives. The sense of superiority and rightness that had swamped me overwhelmed any other thought. One of the Bith had cowered from his small bunk, pleading in a high-pitched tone for more time. Whatever their problem with the Exchange was – I hadn’t cared; all that mattered was that they feared me. From somewhere came the conviction that this was how the galaxy should be. I am to be feared, and obeyed.

“Don’t hurt us!” one of them had begged. And as quick as a kath hound, my feelings had changed. How could I do this? Break into some poor creature's apartment, and terrify them so? I should be begging their forgiveness, offering to somehow make up for this slight!

I’d settled for running out of there.

Anger, hate, and self-loathing swirled through my mind in an explosive mix. I was losing control; my mind was waging war with itself and no matter how it turned out – I’d lose. I shuddered against the wall. Staying here – not far from the Bith’s apartment – possibly wasn’t in my best interests, either.

I closed my eyes and swallowed. I need to put more effort into this. I need to be Jen, until I'm in a safer place and have time to work it all out. I can do it, if I just try a little harder.

With shaky new resolve I took a deep breath, and opened my eyes again. Time to head back and drop off this loot.

I lifted my chin, and began the trek back.

It was second-nature to avoid the gazes of others, while remaining aware of their presence. In the alien quarter of Upper Taris, sents were treated like scum, and wariness was inbuilt into every resident. Being Human, I stood out.

So did the sobbing woman who sprinted past me before mashing her hand against an apartment door-control.

Guess I’m not the only one with issues. Still, there was something about her tearful state and desperate posture that pulled at me. Maybe… maybe, I wanted to prove to myself that I was one of the good guys. That I wasn’t Evil Bitch.

“Are you okay?” I called out, as the apartment door swished open under the woman’s trembling hand. “Do you need help?”

She shot me a wild look over her shoulder. Attractive and well-attired, she seemed a strange prospect to be roughing it in this rundown complex. She’s hiding. Running from something. Just like me.

“Do you want to talk?” I asked, lowering my voice.

“I-” She closed her eyes, shoulders sagging as she leaned against the open doorway. “All I want is my life back.”

Her voice was crisp and well-enunciated. Core accent. Chandrilan, maybe Coruscanti. I’d guess well-educated, too. Probably stranded on Taris because of the quarantine. I felt my fist curl tightly against my side, recognizing yet again another observation that Jen Sahara would never formulate. Like she could recognize Core accents.

“Well, the offer’s genuine,” I said, suddenly aware of exactly how I appeared when the woman’s eyes re-opened and appraised me. A cagey expression crossed her face as her gaze lingered on the vibrosword strapped at my waist. Not even the long coat fully concealed it. “Or, I could just leave-”

“You’re a merc,” she guessed, blinking. “Trapped on Taris, just like me. I- would you like a job?”

“I-” I halted, my eyes narrowing. “A job?”

Immediately, my mind sharpened on the thought. We need the credits. Doesn’t hurt to hear the woman out. She was nodding at me, a sudden eagerness brightening her dark eyes, even as she was still sniffing back tears.

“Yes. You- you can stop people for credits, right? I- I wouldn’t ask… and I’ve only got fifty-four credits left… I mean, I wouldn’t dream of asking this… but he said- the bastard said-”

“Whoa.” I held up a hand, forestalling any further explanation. She wants me to kill someone for creds. A bounty. A murder. For creds. The thought should have rattled me more than it did.

We need the credits. Fifty-four isn’t a lot, but we need everything we can get. And- she’ll just ask someone else if I refuse.

With a wary glance down the empty corridor, I motioned her inside. “Let’s take this somewhere a little more private, alright?” I couldn’t forget the Sith I’d run into, minutes after waking up on this planet.

“O-okay.” She walked inside, stumbling a little, while leaving the door open for me to follow.

The apartment beyond looked similar to mine and Onasi’s – small, brown, and bereft of furnishings other than a bedroll and a torn cushion in the corner. The kitchenette was streaked with dried stains of caffè grinds, and the only visible crockery was a sole plasteel plate on the bench.

She hadn’t been here long.

I glanced back to the woman; she’d dropped down on the battered cushion, hugging her legs to her chest.

“A fighter like you, you probably think I’m pathetic,” she muttered. “It’s just- I was only on Taris for a brief academic flyover- then the quarantine forced me to stay and… I thought he was so charming! Interested in my mind! And then- then the bastard wouldn’t stop pawing at me and…” she trailed off, dropping her head onto her knees.

“You want me to kill a man who took advantage of you,” I said flatly, laying out the specifics. We need the creds, my mind repeated coldly. Besides, last thing this galaxy needs is another creep who won’t keep his hands to himself.

“I want you to kill him because he put a four-hundred credit bounty on my head!” she burst out, her head jerking up and her dark eyes blazing fiercely at me.

My mind froze over. My muscles clenched. Four hundred credits. That would double what we have now.

“He wouldn’t keep his hands to himself, even when I asked him to stop!” she raged. “I pulled out his shiv from his belt- I didn’t mean to cut him, just make him back off. But Holdan’s a spiteful little Hutt-slug! And now I have every wannabe bounty-hunter after my head, and I just want to get off this cursed planet!”

Dark thoughts raged like wildfire. Four hundred is a lot more than what she’s offering… and she’s standing here right in front of me! There was a trembling in my limbs, a tearing in my head. No! She’s an innocent woman! The drab apartment blurred in front of me. I felt my hands hit the floor. But I need the credits, and if I don’t kill her someone else will, so what’s the problem? Cool plasteel pressed against my face. I should be helping her get out of this, the poor lady! How can I even contemplate something like that?

I could feel someone shaking me. "Are you alright? Wake up! What's wrong?" I opened eyes to see the woman I’d been talking to shake me gently. Her face was taut with concern.

Conscious for someone who is thinking about killing her. That really puts me in my place.

"I'm sorry," I mumbled, and pushed myself up. "I really am – forgive me. I've been sick recently, and obviously not recovered."

"What are you doing up and about then?"

"Overdoing things, I guess." With her help, I scrambled to my feet, and my head cleared. The voices fled, leaving only a residual nausea. I sucked in a shaky gasp of air. "I'm sorry about your plight. I wish I could help, but I'm not the merc you took me for."

"Oh." She swallowed, unmoving. An easy target. The look in her large eyes was unbearably sad. "Well, thank you for listening at least. My- my name's Dia, by the way."

I stared at Dia for a frozen moment, before a hand moved to my belt on automatic reflex. I’d hooked one of the blasters there, back in the apartment that’d yielded so much weaponry.

Her eyes widened as she caught my movement. She scrabbled back, horror tightening her face-

“Have this,” I said, my voice coming out cold and calm. I strode towards her, offering the blaster grip-first to the cowering woman.

Dia blinked, before tentatively clasping her fingers around the weapon.
"Bounty rules," I said flatly. "If the victim kills the one who placed the bounty, the deal's off. Bounty-office keeps the creds, but at least you get your life."

Where were these words coming from? Cold and calculating, even as the burn of emotion raged through me. I didn’t want any part of this. Not even to help Dia. I didn’t trust myself not to turn on this academic from a Core world, this soft woman who was a lot more like Jen Sahara than I seemed to be.

“I- thanks,” she said, swallowing again. The blaster hung limply in her grasp, and although I found myself wishing for her survival – I didn’t believe in it. Not truly.

She’s got a better chance by herself than with me. There was a sour taste in my mouth.

“Go- go see a doctor, okay?” Dia suggested, throwing me a weak smile.

I gave her a short nod, turned, and left the apartment.

xXx

It wasn’t a bad idea.

Dia’s last words kept repeating in my head as I dumped the loot back in the apartment. Fortunately, Carth was still soundly asleep, snoring gently in the corner. I certainly wasn’t up to any sort of grilling about my whereabouts; not yet.

Go see a doctor, okay?

But what the frell would I say? Hi, I think I'm three people, and I'm going crazy? Yeah. That’d go down well.

No, I can't tell anyone about this. If I have to keep it from a Jedi then I'd be stupid to let a doctor know.

I was wide awake still, and far too edgy to stay lurking around a sleeping Carth Onasi. A walk. A walk outside might clear my head. Before I knew it, I’d completely cleared the apartment complex, and was striding out into the Tarisian courtyards.

Other than the odd patrolling Sith and a couple of drunks harmlessly singing off-key, Upper Taris was pretty empty. Dawn was just starting to pink the horizon.

I need to control this, I thought determinedly. I can fight these thoughts. I know I can. I had an intuitive belief that I could do whatever I set my mind to, provided I was determined enough. I'll beat this. And I'll convince everyone that I'm still sweet Jen.

I felt a little more at peace. A little. I'd better head back before Onasi wakes. With a deep breath, I turned, and started heading back to the hideout.

I can do this. No problem. I'll be fine.

A voice from the dark depths of my mind whispered something. Overconfidence. You were always too.... but I couldn’t recall the rest.

xXx
The endless black of space was scythed through by the sparking of blaster turrets; I banked the snubfighter sharply, and a Sith starship materialized within torpedo range. My eyes narrowed, and my grip steadied on the controls.

I depressed the firing button, and a second later the enemy ship detonated in a bright flare of victory.

Consciousness slowly trickled in. I stretched drowsily, eyes still closed, feeling a yawn split my face as the image of the frontlines receded. It'd been a restless night. My sleep was normally the dreamless slumber of those who'd spent their life in the military: bodies and minds trained to draw in as much rest from whatever hours of downtime one could snatch. I was accustomed to waking instantly, alert and ready for action.

Taris, I'm on Taris. My mind slowly kicked into gear. Chasing down a Jedi with a Coruscant-sized ego, and babysitting a lunatic whose personality changes more often than her clothes. Thank you, Admiral Dodonna. I opened my eyes and stretched, loosening the kinks from my spine. The floor was hard and cold beneath the ratty blanket I lay upon - but I'd insisted on Jen having the bed. I wouldn't dream of forcing an injured comrade to kip on the ground - although her look of sardonic disbelief when I said as much almost made me consider it.

I turned my head at the thought of her. Empty, rumpled sheets met my gaze. "No way," I groaned hoarsely. Something lurched in my gut. "You've got to be kidding me!" I should've anticipated this- dammit! Maybe part of me did. The disappointment gritting my teeth didn't exactly feel unexpected.

I heaved a great sigh as I sat, running a hand through my hair in irritation. I had no idea if Jen would return- if she was off drinking again or simply done a runner- but I had to focus on finding Bastila. I couldn't afford to waste precious time scouting around for a firebrand who could very well endanger any rescue attempt with her unpredictability. Right. I'll check the cantina, and if she's not there, then I'll have to move on. The thought made me sick to my stomach.

I stood in grim determination, kicking the blankets to one side. After splashing some water on my face and grabbing my jacket from the locker, I noticed a pile of gear on the floor. I frowned - that hadn't been there last night. What's this?

A backpack, about half full with 'frag and flash grenades. A spare blaster and a vibrosword sticking out of it. A dark sort of resignation settled in my heart. Is this Jen's way of apologizing for disappearing? Sorry I'm running out on the Republic, but here, have a grenade?
I sighed. I knew she wasn't trustworthy, I thought sourly. Damn you, Jen Sahara.

Suddenly the door opened, and the very scourge of my thoughts walked in.

I stared at Jen in surprise. Her short dark hair was a mess, sticking outwards as if she'd never heard of a hairbrush, and the tatty beige shirt she wore hung untucked over loose-fitting trousers. "I thought you'd run off!" I blurted out.

Jen shot me a smile, small and peaceful.

"I just went for a walk," she answered. The intonation of her voice was serene and subdued, but her face was pale. She had the dusky skin tone of someone whose natural dark tan had faded from months spent indoors.

Just a walk. Right. Are you okay? I asked suspiciously. I didn't believe her when she was acting meek, angry, or peaceful.

"Yeah. Had a stroll around Upper Taris."

The explanation was vague, and I didn't buy it for a second.

"Picked these up on your stroll, did you?" I muttered, pointing accusingly at the backpack.

"I- well," Jen hedged, evading my gaze. A faint colour flushed high on her cheeks. "It's amazing what you can find lying around."

Uh huh. A thief to top it off. Although – let's face it – we could use the gear. I was unsure whether I should lecture her or inventory her loot.

"I know what you're thinking," she told me flatly, green eyes meeting mine. "But the sooner we're equipped, the sooner we can find Bastila, and surely that's what you want?"

"I guess," I grumbled, trying not to frown. "Not sure I really approve, though."

Jen rolled her eyes, one shoulder lifting up in a dismissive shrug. "Fine. I'll stop stealing then."

Yeah, right. I'm not buying that either, sister. "Okay," I said slowly, remembering the old adage to pick one's battles. At the end of it, Jen had obtained what looked like a useful amount of gear. I could only hope the acquisition of it would not bring us any unwanted attention. "How about we start the day with breakfast?"

There was a sudden growl from her stomach, and the side of her mouth twitched. "Guess I'm with you on that one, Flyboy."

Jen was ready to go after pulling on a concealing dark coat I didn’t recognize. I took a few minutes to make myself presentable, and then we left, avoiding the food synthesizer in the public corridor by mutual consent. As an almost-free source of nutrients it was likely something we’d become familiar with – after all, a mere one-cred fee for a meal couldn’t be ignored by those tight on cash. But the grey slop from the machines was highly unpalatable, and the cantina had boasted in-house fare for five credits the previous day.

We had Jen’s pazaak winnings, so a hot meal at the cantina was definitely on the cards.

As we wandered outside, Upper Taris still impressed with its grandeur and sweeping architecture. Modern buildings stretched deep into the morning sky, which was strangely bare with the lack of air traffic. But below… below was the real Taris. We couldn’t see it, protected as we were by the corrupt trappings of wealth and privilege that cloaked the Upper City - but it was there.

We'd almost reached the cantina when a shout rang out over the courtyard. I turned, my gaze immediately honing in on a lavishly dressed Human gesturing at us. A Rodian and an Aqualish flanked her. The latter appeared to be cracking his knuckles.

Stang! I recognized the woman - the noblewoman Jen had threatened yesterday. I suppose it's too much to hope they'll leave us in peace.

Next to me, Jen stiffened, like a kath hound bristling to attention.

"That's the cantina scow!" the woman cried, still pointing. The thugs advanced, the Rodian smirking in crude anticipation. I couldn't see any weapons on them, but this was Upper Taris, after all. The Sith were liable to arrest anybody waltzing around with a visible blaster – even the supposed bodyguards of whoever this noblewoman was. My own weapon was concealed, strapped to my side, hidden under the trusty jacket Jen had been pulling faces at.

"I don't want any trouble," I warned, in a tone I hoped would convince them that I was the real trouble. The Rodian laughed, a mocking trill of disbelief. I'd been in enough brawls to recognize the inevitability of this one. Here's hoping we scare them off quickly – before we attract any attention.

"You should be more polite to your betters, gutter scum," the Aqualish hissed in passable Basic, directing his comment to both me and Jen.

Jen tensed at my side; I had an irrational moment of worry for her safety before reminding myself of the fight I saw on the Endar Spire. Two thugs won't be an issue for us. It's catching the eye of the Sith that's the real danger here. At least we were round the side of the cantina in a small cul-de-sac, partially hidden from view of the open courtyard.

I glanced at Jen; by unspoken agreement I took a step forward to face the stockier Aqualish. He launched himself forwards, closing the distance in five strides, and I held my ground right up until the moment his fist punched out in a roundhouse. I side-stepped, grabbing his arm and using his own momentum to hurl him to the ground. As I jumped forward to straddle him, his legs kicked up deep into my midsection. The air burst from my lungs as I staggered back, momentarily winded.

There was a gurgled scream to my right; jerking my head sideways, my eyes widened as they fixed on Jen. She was snarling. And- and- wielding a vibrosword stuck in the Rodian's side. In a Sith-controlled area!

The Aqualish, struggling to his feet, gasped audibly as he, too, turned to look.

Snatching the opportunity, I jumped forward and crashed my fist into the Aqualish's jaw.

There was another shriek from the Rodian. My guard was raised, my eyes on the Aqualish- but, to my surprise, he retreated swiftly to his friend's side, who was now clutching at a bloody wound along his ribs.

"Aww, what's the matter?" Jen taunted. "Two ickle Humans too tough for you?"

"Jen!" I snapped. First she pulls out a vibrosword in broad daylight, and now she's egging them on? The Aqualish growled, his face contorting in anger, but he stayed still as the other thug leaned heavily on him.
"If we see you again, you won't be so lucky," the Aqualish spat, supporting his friend with one hand and cradling his bruised face with the other. For all that I was trying to avoid this sort of scene, I couldn't deny a twinge of smug satisfaction at the reddening visible on the Aqualish's face.

Jen laughed; a cold, malicious sound. “Go on, run like the little cowards you are.” She gave a dismissive, insulting wave with one hand.

“Jen, stop it!” I stormed over to her, ready to shake some sense into the crazy woman. “They're leaving! We don't want the atten-”

My words died as her gaze snapped to mine. The look in her eyes...rage. Senseless rage. I took a step back at the insane glow of bright green. She's a berserker. Don't charge a berserker in full swing, idiot!

In my periphery, I was aware of the Aqualish retreating, dragging his wounded friend along with him. The aristocracy had run off a long time ago. But my attention remained fixed on Jen. The battle lust storming through her face was enough to - if not scare me, then at least make me very wary.

Jen shuddered, and the rage fled. Shock, followed by something akin to anguish, crossed her face. Her gaze dropped, to stare numbly at the bloodied weapon still clutched in her hand.

“Put that away – it’s broad daylight!” I hissed, deciding it was safe to berate her again. The thugs had now disappeared, but already I could see two gaping Tarisians eyeing us from a distance.

She didn't reply, still staring unblinkingly at her weapon. A small spark of concern inched through my anger.

"Jen, what is it?" I asked sharply.

"I could have sworn..." She looked up at me, brow furrowing in confusion. "I could have sworn my blade glowed red there for a minute."

"With the way you go berserk, I wouldn't be surprised if everything you saw was red," I muttered, striding down the cul-de-sac. “Let’s get out of here. Now.”

"Well, at least we managed to scare them off." She laughed weakly as she followed me around the cantina building.

"You're lucky the Sith weren't around," I grumped at her. "That was inordinately thick of you. All those idiots wanted to do was rough us up a bit – all we needed to do was get the first blow in. But no, you had to shove a vibrosword – how in the blazes did you manage to hide that, anyway? We're not in the Lower City yet-"

"Onasi-"

"-stang, the Sith rule up here Jen, so much for being blasted inconspicuous-"

“Onasi!”

“What?” I snapped, stopping to unleash a furious glare at her. To my further annoyance – and perhaps even mortification – she looked amused. Amused.

“You’ve walked right past the cantina entrance,” she said mildly.
I opened my mouth, processed her words, and snapped it shut again. She nodded to the door – which I had indeed strode right past – a smirk curving her lips.

“Anyone ever tell you that you curse more when you’re angry?” she teased.

My brows lowered further. In some alternate universe - if things hadn’t been so dire - maybe I would have laughed with her. Maybe. “This isn’t some sort of game,” I made out between clenched teeth. “This is serious. Dead serious.”

She stared at me mutely for a minute, before an exasperated look crossed her face. “Okay, so flashing around a weapon outside is probably worse than pulling out a blaster in a cant-”

She at least had the sense to refrain from completing that sentence. I stood glaring at her silently until at last her expression eased into something approaching resignation. She sighed softly. “You’re right. I’m sor-”

"Don't!" I bit out. Not another apology! Peace, I think I like her better when she's angry. "Look," I sighed, my hand on the cantina door. "Let's just go eat something, alright? And then I might take part in some of those duels."

"You?"

"Well, who else?" I said sharply. "I happen to be pretty accurate with a blaster. And if you think I'm going to let you partake in those duels when you'd probably kill everyone in sight, then think again."

Her brows slammed down. There was an intense look about her narrowed eyes, as if she was struggling between anger and compliance. She really doesn't like to be told what to do, does she?

"Fine, you do the duels," Jen muttered, after a drawn-out pause She almost sounded- sulky.

I couldn't help a small, victorious smirk.

We both calmed down over the bland cantina meal; a plate full of root vegetables smeared in a hot brown sauce, but infinitely preferable to synthesizer slop. I kept an eye warily on the exits, not quite forgetting the Tarisian citizens who’d noticed our stand-off with the thugs. I assumed Jen was making an effort to behave, what with the sickeningly meek act she kept up as we ate. The shy, polite comments she issued were both forced and annoying.

Better than the rage, Onasi, I reminded myself. I'd known a berserker, once. A Bothan trooper I’d fought alongside when my squad had been grounded on Rodia, holding back a Sith advance. The Bothan went completely crazy in battle, his strength and speed impressive even by his species’ standard. His commander later told me that they all stood clear of him during combat – but outside of it, he was the quietest and most polite person she’d ever known.

Jen was quiet… sometimes. But I didn’t buy it. Her sassy, irreverent comments were more genuine than the shy ones. And distinctly less annoying.

We lapsed into silence as we finished our meal, and then headed next door.

The organizer of the duel ring was a Hutt named Ajuur, and he seemed pretty eager for fresh meat in the ring. Of course he is - more credits for him. Sithspawn Hutts, the lot of them. But if I was cautious and played it right, it should be good money for us, too.

Ajuur was busy laying down the law of dueling in Basic, with a thick, garbled accent. According to him, there hadn’t been a fatality since death-matches were outlawed some years back. Permanent disfigurements and disabilities, on the other hand, he glossed over, and instead diverted the conversation to weapon selection.

"We like to encourage variety, but most duelists prefer melee combat as the ring's small," Ajuur slurred. "There's some who stick to ranged. The best fighters, ahhh- the best ones are flexible.
Anything goes, really, as long as it passes our health and safety regulations. We even allow grenades - only the non-fatal ones, of course."

"Grenades," I said flatly. "Are you sure no one ever dies? Why do I get the feeling you're trying to take us for a ride?"

The Hutt laughed. The fleshy rolls of his gut shuddered with each booming chuckle. "Ho ho ho! The duel ring has energy suppressors. Your choice of weapons will be examined and limited before you enter the duel, but we keep a medic droid on hand in case of serious injuries." He paused, leaning over to grab a juice lizard from a nearby pail. The glooping noise as he slurped it into his wide mouth made me grimace. "So, Human. Are you interested?"

Jen nudged me from the side. "Here," she muttered, waving a blaster at me grip-first. "Want to use two?"

I stared incredulously at her. "You had a blaster hidden on you as well?" I ignored the mental voice that pointed out the gun strapped underneath my jacket; I wasn’t hiding a vibrosword, ready to whirl it around outside where the Sith could spot us as soon as we waltzed into the first hint of trouble.

She shrugged, not answering as she looked down at her coat. It was then that I realized just how concealing it was. She's probably hidden a whole arsenal underneath that, I thought sourly. If I didn't know better, I'd swear she was Mandalorian.

I took the proffered blaster. "Thanks," I muttered, before turning back to face Ajuur. "I'll do it."

"Good – new blood for the ring!" he rumbled. "But you need a nickname, like Ice or Deadeye or Twitch. Good nicknames make sentients bet more. Hmmm... what’s a good nickname for you?"

"Anything will do."

"Well, you're new here. People won't recognize you." Ajuur shrugged, looking over me dispassionately. "Sents like a handle that has a certain mystique to it. How about 'Mysterious Stranger'?"

Jen snickered.

Cliché. But I suppose it could be worse. "It'll do."

"No, call him Blaster Boy," Jen suggested. There was a teasing glint in her eyes as Ajuur swung his beady gaze on her. "If he's going to use two guns it's perfect."

"Really?" I countered, raising an eyebrow in disbelief. That sounds like some cheap action holo-vid star. “I think I’d prefer Mysterious Stranger.”

Jen was holding back a snigger, her face cut with a wide smile of glee. Ajuur grunted in what sounded suspiciously like consideration. “We'vee used ‘Mysterious Stranger’ on the last two offworlders, it's losing its appeal." Ajuur nodded to Jen. "And 'Blaster Boy' does have a certain ring to it."
I groaned, rolling my eyes at Jen. “Honestly. Could you think of a tackier name?”

"Stop arguing, Blaster Boy." Jen was still grinning. I mock-glared at her. "Time to get ready for your first duel!"

xXx

Well, I suppose I could call it a productive day, I thought, as I limped slowly out of the arena. I hadn't expected the last duel to be so tough, though.

I'd taken out the first two duellists with no real problem, but that Ice had been a rough challenge. Best to quit while I'm ahead... and between these six hundred credits and Jen's pazaak winnings, we should be set for the Undercity.

The day was almost over, and I felt like crawling back to the apartment and closing my eyes. You're getting soft, Onasi. The medical droid was quick to heal any deep damage, but I was left with some superficial bruising and burns. The tiredness was the real kicker though. I felt exhausted.

Jen was having a drink by the bar as I walked slowly over to her.

"You're not trying to get drunk again, are you?" I asked in suspicion.

"Why not?" she countered. "We're set for credits now - tomorrow we can buy our gear and find a way down to the lower levels." She took a long swallow. "Seems like a perfectly good reason to have a few drinks."

"No way, sister," I said coldly. "You lose your temper easily enough when sober. Getting drunk is just begging for Sith attention."

"You're pretty obsessed with the Sith, you know that?" Jen drawled, raising her eyebrows in what appeared to be disparagement.

"What, because I'm trying not to get caught?" I snapped. With an inward sigh, I lowered my voice. "We're fugitives, remember? Attracting notice is not a good idea."

She shrugged. I wasn't sure if her apparent unconcern was genuine - but it was definitely dangerous.

"They've left us alone so far."

"Out of sheer luck more than anything else," I returned, trying to hold her gaze and impart the seriousness of our situation onto her. Blast if she isn't the most frustrating woman-! "Look, Jen, that fight with the woman's thugs earlier? That's the sort of thing we need to avoid. That's the sort of thing the Sith will notice."

Jen's gaze dropped to her hands, resting on top of the stained bar. An introspective expression crossed her face as we both dwindled into silence. Let her actually take me seriously for once, I thought. I can't deny she's useful in a fight, but I can't help but think she's more of a liability than an asset.

A quiet sigh escaped her lips. "Onasi, what... what made you decide to join the Fleet?"

The unexpectedness of her query had me stiffening. I looked away, uncomfortable. "I've always been a military man. My homeworld's a member of the Republic – but even if they weren't, I'd still have joined. It doesn't take a genius to figure out which side is the right one."
"You think it's all that black and white?" Her voice was surprisingly neutral, for such a question.

"Oh come on," I said, exasperated. _Where is she going with this? _"It's obvious that Darth Malak's a ruthless tyrant who'll crush anyone who gets in his way... just like his master Revan had been. Experience has shown that the Sith won't stop until the Republic lies in ruins. Malak and his forces don't respect anything except raw, brutal power."

"Sounds like Malak and the Sith have the right idea," she muttered.

My jaw dropped of its own volition, and I stared at Jen in shock - which quickly gave way to blistering incredulity. "How can you even say that?" _She can't be serious, surely? Not even someone as crazy as her could really mean that? _All the colour drained from her face, and I dimly recognized it as something she clearly hadn't meant to say. Didn't stop my tirade, however. "The Sith are butchers! Soldiers, civilians, I mean they don't care who they kill! Even... even children!"

"I didn't mean to say that!"

"Then why did you?" I snapped. _I can't believe she would even think it! Maybe things would be better – and safer – if I was just by myself._

"I don't know," she sighed. "I guess I was just trying to hassle you again."

"Yeah, well, sometimes you go too far," I said coldly.

She started to apologise, then thought better of it and stared silently at her empty glass.

We didn't talk for the remainder of the day.

xXx
We’re getting nowhere, I thought resentfully as we trudged through Upper Taris. I really annoyed Onasi last night, and we still don’t have any clue how to get down to the lower levels. I scowled at Carth’s back as he stalked ahead of me. We’d spent most of the morning investigating any turbo-lift within reasonable distance – all, without exception, were guarded by black-clad, unmoving guards.

Carth had been at a loss on how to get past the Sith, but hadn’t appreciated the idea of knocking the guards out. Spoilsport, part of me muttered. Okay, so attacking the Sith in broad daylight was a fairly dim-witted suggestion, but the angry side of me was just clamouring for some action – besides, I thought to myself, it wasn’t like Blaster Boy over there had any better ideas.

We’d taken a detour earlier to visit the nearby ‘Adventurer’s Emporium’ – which, considering the empty shelves, had once seen better days. The owner, a Kebla Yurt, spoke to us at length regarding the Sith quarantine on Upper Taris. As we already knew, public inter-level movement was currently prohibited, be it by air traffic or turbo-lift. And the Sith were offering hefty rewards for information regarding any Republic fugitives, which caused Carth to tense, and me to smile politely.

The lower levels, however, had erupted into gang fighting, and the Sith presence down there was all but overwhelmed. Kebla informed us that the two largest gangs – the Hidden Beks and the Vulkars – were engaged in a messy war for supremacy. Even the Exchange was involved, acting as hired thugs or bounty hunters for both sides, depending on which offered the most credits that particular day.

But perhaps that wasn’t surprising. The recesses of my brain that definitely did not come from Jen Sahara knew about the Exchange. As the largest spice smuggling, slave trading and bounty hunting criminal organization in the galaxy, they had either political or economic clout in most systems. Before the Sith had gained prominence, the Exchange had been the true rulers of Taris, hiding behind puppet politicians and corrupt aristocracy.

But the gang war… that changed things, and could, perhaps, present opportunities. When coupled with the lack of Sith presence in Lower Taris, I wondered whether it would be safer to permanently move our hideout downwards.

If we could actually find a way to get there.

We’d stocked up at Kebla’s, and now both carried rucksacks full of ration bars, medpacs, and utility tools such as light-rods and spare datapads. Unfortunately she didn’t have anything really useful – like a decent tech spike or bio-scanner – as the Sith came in every now and then to audit her stock. From the way the woman’s mouth had curled when she explained that, I assumed they did more than just audit.

It was my third day conscious on Taris, and today – with luck – things would start happening. Carth and I were both determined to find a way down to the Lower City and start our mission proper. No matter that Kebla warned us the place was overrun with warring gang members - if anything, it would only make things more interesting.

Interesting? A meek voice squeaked in my head, both alarmed and appalled. I felt my mouth tighten. It wasn't like any pathetic gang minion would pose a threat to me. Reckless, a thought whispered. Maybe it's the direction we have to go, but there's no point being a frelling idiot about it.

An abrupt surge of dizziness slammed into me like a vibro-ax. I've always been labelled reckless, haven't I? Speckles of darkness clouded by vision, and I could hear my heartbeat, fast and furious, in my ears. Someone said something rudely; I was vaguely aware of stumbling, of being shoved, of falling from a great distance...

...

“This is reckless,” a man muttered behind me, as I stared at the large doors inset deep within the cave. The blue light radiating from his lightsaber illuminated the barrier in front of us; my eyes were fixed on the unfamiliar sigils inscribed around the edges of the door. “Stars, you’ve always been reckless, but we’ve no idea what’s beyond this other than some ancient technology we don’t understand. Are you sure the threat-”

“Yes,” I cut in, mildly exasperated at the same conversation replaying once more. “What I found suggests this leads to something powerful enough to aid us.” My concentration remained anchored on the door. There would be some mechanism that would let us through. I had but to find it. “This is the perfect time, when those scared fools believe we are merely here to gloat about our success.”

He sighed, and rested a hand on my shoulder. “I know. They’re angry with us, all of them. They won’t even stop to listen, to consider how badly things could have gone, had we sat back and done nothing-”

I huffed, my focus temporarily broken, and took the moment to lean back against him. “I’m still furious at them. Years of blood and tears and sacrifice and finally the Mandalorian Wars are over – and yet they treat us like errant children. Like - like we did the wrong thing! How can they even think it?”

I felt his lips press into my hair. “Because we disobeyed them. You knew this might happen; we both did. Should they let us stay, we’ll be separated for sure. I won’t let that happen. Not again.”

"We won't be staying," I murmured, stepping away from him to concentrate once more. My hands pressed lightly against the cold door; it was made of some metallic substance I didn't recognize. My companion moved to flank me, the dark blue of his 'saber our sole light source. "This place is my one objective for coming to this planet. I only need to figure out how to open the door."

"Jen?" A voice called distantly.

"Have you tried just giving it a push?" he asked. There was an obvious smirk in his voice, a teasing tone I hadn't heard in far too long. The sound was welcome, but deep down inside, an insidious voice told me not to get used to it. For the dark paths we had already walked were about to get darker.

In the end, we would do what we had to do.

...
"Jen? Wake up!"

"Oh," I groaned. "Of course I tried that, jackal-brain."

"Say what?" Onasi's puzzled voice shot through my sluggish thoughts. "What's wrong with you?"

I blinked as Carth’s features slowly swam into view. The faint glare of the Tarisian sun stabbed into my eyes. Somehow, I was lying on the ground. "Uh, where am I?"

"In the middle of Upper Taris, giving me quite a scare," he said wryly. His eyes were warm with concern as they stared down at me. "What happened?"

"I – I fainted," I muttered, sitting up and clutching at my head. It was pounding with renewed force, as waves of nausea washed through me. What was that? That wasn't Jen, and it couldn't be Evil Bitch... was that the real me? Sun and stars, I don't understand any of it.

"That was quite a faint, then." Carth’s expression warped to suspicion. Again. "You were muttering something about a door."

"I think I was dreaming," I replied woozily. A dream? A vision? A... glimpse of the real me? But the details... so stark and crisp and clear at first, had begun to unravel with mounting speed. Something about the Mandalorian Wars? Had I... had I fought in them? It might go some way to explaining my reflexes back on the 'Spire. There was a man in the... memory, too. He had a lightsaber....

The specifics of the memory-dream were fuzzing at the edges, blurring rapidly the longer I tried to clutch onto them. But if I could just hold on to the core details-

"Give me a hand up, would you?" I snapped as Onasi continued to eyeball me in frowning concern. He reluctantly helped me to my feet. I noticed people staring, and glared at the crowd defensively.

"Let's get some lunch first," I muttered. "I probably didn't have enough to eat. Then we can work out what to do next."

He nodded briskly at me, and thankfully dropped the subject.

xXx

We sat eating in the cantina, another bland meal of colourful vegetables I didn’t recognize. The sauce was white this time, and tasted faintly of socks. I grimaced, and vowed to try the public synthesizer next.

"So," I began, "there's got to be entrances to the Lower City not guarded by the Sith."

Onasi had been watching me like a Roonish hawk since I'd fainted. I couldn't work out what was stronger – his concern or his mistrust. I was grudgingly aware that my behaviour warranted both.

"I doubt it," he responded slowly. "They've locked this planet up tight; they're taking no chances with Bastila getting away. We need to somehow get past the Sith."

Bastila was still unconscious inside my head. It unnerved me, the thought of her waking, the idea she might be able to sense me... to sense the conflicting emotions I was failing to master. She might know what's wrong with my mind, Jen whispered. I scowled. She might be the root cause of it.
Carth noticed my glowering face and quirked an eyebrow in question. I hastily schooled my expression, shrugged, and muttered sarcastically, "we could always jump off one of the platforms."

"Oh yes, you're such great help," Carth snapped.

I really should stop saying things like that to him. He's such a nice guy. I scowled again. Shut up, Jen.

"Well, I don't know," I grumped. "We could try buying our way past."

Carth actually seemed to mull that one over, which surprised me. I’d picked him as being too straight-laced to consider bribery, but obviously he was adjusting to the environmental parameters – which was a good thing, too, if we were to have any chance of extracting Bastila successfully.

"That would possibly work," he said at last. "But I don’t think we can afford the time required to build up a big enough sum. Small change won’t be enough. Not to countermand orders from high up."

I rolled my eyes in exasperation. Maybe that's true for the soldiers you've fought with, Onasi. But corruption is rife anywhere if you just look hard enough. "Alright, let’s just steal some Sith armour, and pretend we're on their side then." It was a jest, mostly. That Sith full-body armour was very concealing.

Carth frowned at me. "Lunatic ideas I could do without."

"Got any better suggestions?" I shot back tartly. Because so far, I haven’t heard much from you, Republic.

He raised an eyebrow at me. "Why don't we try talking to one of guards?"

I sat back, considering. We'd only spot-checked the turbo-lifts from a distance, unwilling to come close enough to engage in conversation. I hadn't seen any Tarisian citizens lurking next to the formidabley armoured guards, so they likely didn't welcome idle chitchat. But that didn't mean it wasn't worth a shot - who knew what information we could garner if we were clever about it. "Good idea. Let me do the talking though – you're too conspicuous."

Carth blinked at me. "Say what?" He sounded genuinely befuddled.

"Everything about you screams military, Flyboy," I drawled, eyeing him over. "I suppose you could pass for an Exchange thug with a soldiering background, but it’s risky, considering that the Sith are on the hunt for Republic soldiers." I allowed that logic to sink in for a moment, before adding, "let me find a guard to sweet talk."

A highly disbelieving look crossed his eyes which set my hackles rising. "Sweet talk? You?"

"What did you think I was doing when you tracked me down in the cantina?" I snapped.

"Getting drunk." The reply back was quick, succinct, and pretty darn truthful, actually. But I had been gathering intel about a strange planet under the guise of drinking, with a head injury to boot. My instincts took over. It certainly wasn’t the behaviour of a meek scholar.

I pushed my plate away, and stood. "Watch me at work, Onasi, and learn."

I turned and stalked away, trusting the Republic pilot would catch up to me. By the time I’d entered the outside sunshine, he was once more walking at my side. My stomach full and my head... clear for the first time since the Endar Spire, I had a good feeling about the rest of the day. Hopefully that would be enough to stop me having another spell. Faints and visions I can do without, I thought grimly. It's just confusing me all the more.

The sunlight reflecting off the marbled buildings and ferracrystal windows showcased the city's urbanized soul, and hid its true depths beneath. The people strolling quietly along the grand courtyards gave the place a peaceful feel.

But cracks were evident, if one looked close enough. Sith patrols skirted the edges of the commercial plazas, causing nearby Tarisian citizens to scurry away in caution. Multiple soldiers guarded every turbo-lift we came across - anywhere from three to six of them - which made me wonder if the Sith had any sort of standard operating procedure, or were still scrabbling to tighten their hold on the Tarisian transport network.

Instinct propelled me to keep moving, to keep searching. Somewhere, I hoped, would be an exit to the lower levels with a smaller guard. A sole soldier we might be able to find a way around, but three or more was getting beyond tricky.

Our path took us through a maze of towering apartment buildings that were emblazoned with the insignia Czerka Condominiums. Tinted windows rose up majestically on all sides, but also blocked out a fair amount of natural light as we silently cut between them. Carth rested his hand on his hip warily, above where his blaster was concealed.

It was effectively a small maze of alleys, and with surprise we found them to be deserted. Turning a corner, I could see the sunlight ahead that signified the end of the high-rise buildings.

A few metres into the bright light, a pair of armoured Humans loomed menacingly over an old man. My muscles tensed in reflex, halting any further movement, keeping me safely concealed in the shadows while I took in the unfolding confrontation.

Carth stilled at my side, the briefest puff of air his only indication of surprise. I sensed rather than saw his finger slowly unclip the gun at his belt.

To my astonishment, one of the Humans up ahead raised a blaster. In full daylight- in an obvious, overt motion. Their audacity was surprising - there might not be any Sith around right now but that didn't mean they weren't lurking beyond the next corner. Yet these thugs – both wearing heavy combat suits that were jarringly out of place in the Upper City – hardly seemed concerned about starting a firefight in broad daylight.

They're Exchange thugs. Garbed for combat the way they are, they've probably come up from the lower levels. Which immediately posed the question - how are they getting around the Sith quarantine?

"But I don't have that much!" I heard the old man cry. "How can I give you credits I don't have?"

I moved to evade the incident, giving them as wide a berth as possible to get past – more because of Onasi’s continued hounding at staying inconspicuous than any real desire to. Part of me wanted to barge up to the creeps and tell them to sod off and leave the harassed man alone, while another part just wanted to join in what looked like an oncoming fight. I thought I was rather restrained in ignoring both desires.

"That's too bad," one of the thugs responded in a sinister voice. "You brought this on yourself, you know. Davik can’t afford to let you run free for no cash return. But don’t worry, I promise it’ll be quick."
Ah, Davik, the Exchange boss Kebla warned me about. These guys probably paid the Sith to turn a blind eye to their operations. That’s how they get around. If they were Exchange agents, then it made sense to ignore the confrontation altogether. To my surprise, Carth nudged me surreptitiously.

I quirked an eyebrow at him, and he nodded sharply towards the old man.

"Look, I know we have to be careful about drawing attention to ourselves," Carth hissed, "but are we just going to let them drag this guy off?"

Well, he doesn’t need to convince me.

"No – help! Somebody help!" the man yelled, glancing around frantically. “They’re going to kill me!” He spotted us further back in the shadow of the apartments, and his eyes gained the fervent glint of the desperately hopeful. The armoured goons followed his gaze just as Carth’s hand inched underneath that ghastly jacket.

I really had to dispose of that orange eyesore soon.

"Well, well," one of them drawled, as he eyed us over. "Looks like we got ourselves a witness here."

The second guy sneered. “Davik doesn’t like witnesses.”

I could feel a smirk forming on my face, and reckless took over with swift ease, dominating any caution or reason. "I don't like your attitude," I mocked. "I'd better teach you a lesson!" With the words flowing from my mouth, my hand shot underneath the dark coat and withdrew my vibrosword.

"Guess we have to teach you to mind your own business!" the first man yelled, swinging his blaster away from the merchant to point to me. Hazily I was aware of Carth edging over to the right to get a clear shot, but my mind was mostly focused on one thought: I need more time. The distance between me and the thugs was about twenty metres, and they were already aiming ranged weapons at me.

I need more time.

My muscles tensed as I began to sprint towards them, and suddenly everything around me seemed to slow down and stretch. The first Human had already loosed a blaster shot in my direction, and I saw the laser beam coalesce toward me like a slow-motion holovid replay. I dodged to the right, just in time. It seemed an eternity until I reached the thug. He was halfway to drawing out a stun baton when I stabbed my blade into his throat. His scream ended in a drawn out gurgle. Music to my ears. I turned to face the other guy. No! Killing is wrong! He was already falling to the ground, shot fatally by Carth.

My surroundings snapped back into place instantly, and I staggered as time took on its normal speed.

What... what the frell just happened? Carth walked over to me, shoving his blaster back underneath his jacket. He doesn't look alarmed. That speed... that eerie feeling... it happened to me alone.

"Wow, you're fast," Carth said in amazement. Something close to respect passed over his face. "Crazy, but fast!"

I forced a fake smile on my face, struggling to contain how unsettled I felt. Better not mention it to...
Onasi. He already thinks I'm nuts as it is. It had possibly saved my life, though. I couldn't ignore that.

"Thank you – I owe you my life!" the old man gushed in disbelief. "Those bounty hunters were going to take me away and kill me! My wife warned me not to take a loan from Davik."

My eyes shot to the man; he was positively shining with awe and gratitude. You should have listened to her, then. What kind of idiot borrows credits from the Exchange and then can't pay them back?

"Now I can't pay him back. It's not good to owe a crime lord money." Well, duh. "He'll just keep sending more bounty hunters after me until I'm dead!"

I shouldn't judge him, Jen commented piously. Maybe I can help.

"You already helped me by saving me from those bounty hunters!" the man continued. I blinked. Sithspit, did I say that out loud? "So unless you have a spare hundred credits to give me so I can pay off Davik, there's nothing else you can do."

We do have spare credits, now. My hand was delving in my pockets automatically, coming out with a handful of plastic, disposable chits. “Here’s a hundred credits, take them.”

No! I’m a brainless space slug! What am I doing?

The man lifted his hands up, a look of stunned awe creasing his worried face. I stalled as I made to release the chits into his grasp.

He needs them more than we do, Jen whispered.

He needs a blaster shot to the head. The best use for a moron like this one is fertilizer! Evil Bitch sneered.

That’s… that’s simply despicable!

I shuddered, and dropped the plasteel tokens into his grimy paws. Shut up. Just shut up – both of you! There was a faint easing in my mind, as if the conflicting voices backed away a few steps. My breath released in a rush, and I forced a friendly, fake expression on my face.

"You're giving me a hundred credits? Just like that?" the man spluttered. "I- I don't know what to say! Thank you! Thank you!"

“Generous,” Carth murmured at my side, and the old man smiled tremulously at us both before slipping the credits into a pocket. He bowed and left, muttering something about paying Davik. My gaze slid to Carth, who was looking at me in vague surprise. Maybe this will assist at convincing Flyboy I’m one of the good guys. Maybe that’s a silver lining, at least.

For we might be kitted up for the Undercity, but we certainly weren’t in a position to be throwing away credits on any needy passerby we crossed paths with.

I nodded at Carth, not willing to let myself talk. My mind was in turmoil. I’d given that money away without thinking. It seemed I needed to control Jen as well as Evil Bitch. I'm going mad. I need to get out of Taris, off this planet. Carth began striding away, and I followed him in a daze. He was keen to leave the area - and the corpses - well behind. I will. I will get out of here - just as soon as I rescue Onasi's girlfriend.
Would it be that simple, though? Would a Jedi let me go? Maybe killing her would be the better option. No, that'd be suicide. That'd be wrong!

My mouth twisted and I rubbed at the side of my head, overcome by a sudden surge of dizziness. I said, shut up! I had to stop thinking. I had to stop my mind warring with itself.

And I wasn't going to kill anyone unless I had to.

"Jen?" Carth's low voice caught my attention, and I belatedly realized I'd halted in the middle of a smallish retail courtyard. "You okay?"

I smiled, half-aware it likely looked like a pained grimace, and nodded abruptly. "Just a headache. I'll do."

He was frowning, eyes dark with worry. "Maybe we need a rest day, Jen. Maybe we should head to the Free Clinic instead." His gaze trailed up to the side of my head.

No, I didn't want to think. I wanted to act. And not just for my sake- "Every day risks Bastila, Onasi. I'll be fine." I looked away from him, surveying the boutique stores that lined this open area. In the middle stood a carved statue of a grim-looking Human, either made from ferracrystal or a cheaper variant of transparisteel. It sparkled in the golden Tarisian sunlight. And beyond, across the other side of the plaza, wound a small cul-de-sac that ended in the familiar durasteel shaft of a turbo-lift.

I saw the shape of one, sole, black-clad Sith soldier.

I felt a genuine grin curve my lips, and nudged Carth. "There," I murmured. "It's time our luck changed." He glanced in the direction I indicated, and his tight expression eased. When he glanced back to me, he was almost smiling. "Leave this to me, Onasi."

The conflicting emotions vanished like quicksilver as a sharp focus rose to cut through my mental turmoil. I strode forward, mind clear now apart from a thrumming confidence. I could do this. Chin up and shoulders back, I walked through the narrow cul-de-sac and approached the guard with a friendly expression.

The Sith spoke before I had a chance.

"Move along, citizen." The words were monotonous and bored. His tinted visor turned to face me.

"I just wanted to talk to one of our heroes," I gushed, stepping closer. I beamed at him. "How are you finding Taris? The streets are so much safer now you're here!"

There was a lengthy pause, and I felt a prickle of foreboding. He's not interested in flirting. And I'm too old to be playing the part of a worshipful teenager. The confidence dove-tailed into a flare of anger.

"This elevator is off-limits," he told me stonily. "And you need to learn the art of subtlety. Only Sith patrols and those with the proper authorisation are allowed into the Lower City."

I could just imagine Carth's knowing expression further behind me. My failure was embarrassing, but even more so- I felt angry. It shouldn't be so hard to just talk to the guy. In fact, getting past him should be a frelling cake-walk. The anger flushed heat into my cheeks, and I was suddenly aware of a charged prickling in the air. I hurriedly pasted on what I hoped was my most beguiling smile. "Where can I get authorisation?"
"If you were supposed to have it, you'd know where to get it!" he snapped. My frustration peaked and the static sensation intensified - almost as if I'd zap the first thing I touched.

"Now quit wasting my time and move along." The Sith flicked his hand in a dismissive wave.

Use the power at your command, you blind idiot. Instinct eclipsed my consciousness, and then I was speaking without any forethought at all.

"We wouldn't cause any trouble down there," I said, my words slow and deep.

"I – I guess you wouldn't cause any trouble down there," the guard returned, this time in a hesitant voice.

The hairs raised on my exposed forearms, and still the dark instinct prevailed. “So you can let me and my friend through.” The words dropped in the air like invisible ferracrete bricks, each one solid and powerful and commanding.

"I can let you through," the guard echoed in a dull tone, and stepped aside.

A hot rush of confusion swamped me, clouding my thoughts and emotions. I felt beads of sweat break out on the back of my neck, and yet somehow I was cognizant enough to just keep moving, Sun and stars. This is the Force. What else could it be? I glanced over my shoulder to see Carth, jaw dropped, staring at me as my hand pressed on the elevator control and the doors opened. Carth would have been too far away to hear the actual words spoken, but I’d still need to explain my success. Somehow.

I threw Carth a tight smile and motioned him into the lift. He strode forward, and we were silent until the doors closed and the lift began a slow, creaking descent.

He cleared his throat. I raised an eyebrow at the brown eyes staring guardedly at me. “What in the blazes did you say to him?” he asked, his voice a blend of suspicion and confusion.

“I told him we wouldn’t be any trouble,” I replied, inwardly wincing. Somehow, I had the feeling I was usually better at cover stories. Although, it was the truth. I forced a grin that I hoped was impish rather than false. “I dunno. Guess he thought I was cute or something.”

There was a loud grinding noise from above, and we paused, staring warily at the elevator’s ceiling. As the lift continued to decline without any difference in its velocity, we both relaxed.

Carrt turned to face me again. “Seriously. Even the Sith have standards.” But his mouth was twitching, and I threw him a pretend glare. “What exactly did you say?”

It wasn't what I said, Captain Flyboy. It was how I said it. It had to be the Force. The speed earlier, against those thugs. The final pazaak game. I had no idea what I was doing, and it was overwhelming.

"I already told you, Onasi." I shifted uncomfortably. "I don't know why he let me past. But it's a good thing he did."

We lapsed back into silence, and I was aware of Carth taking my measure, staring at me from behind those damn wary eyes of his.

"Do you know," he said slowly, "I've seen Jedi talk their way past people in a similar fashion. And you were onboard the Endar Spire due to a specific request by the Jedi." Carth drew in a breath and looked away before continuing. "I learnt a long time ago that something which looks like a coincidence probably isn't. Especially when the Jedi are involved."

I snorted. “What, you think Jedi Shan took me aside to teach me Force tricks every rest day?”

“I, uh, no—”

“I saw her a handful of times, Onasi,” I said flatly, speaking over him. The memory was fuzzy and indistinct, much like the rest of my time onboard the Endar Spire. “The only other Jedi I saw was that hefty Cerean who kept throwing archaeological extracts my way. Stars, all I did there was read the sodding archives.”

I couldn’t remember the Cerean’s name, other than he was old and a Jedi, like Bastila Shan. But I wasn’t interested in recalling details right now – I was interested at throwing Carth off-balance enough that he’d stop questioning matters. For, I knew, he had every right to be suspicious.

His eyes narrowed. “Look, it’s just a lot of things about you don’t add up, okay?”

“Like what?” I snapped defensively. He certainly wasn’t prepared to believe I could sweet-talk my way past a Sith guard. That actually rankled a bit.

“Well, uh- I don’t know, how about the fact you survived the crash?” His words were low and irritated, and I could sense he was slowly getting wound up.

I stared at him blankly, confused. Isn't that just as odd as him surviving? "You'd rather I hadn't?" "Don't be ridiculous," he shot back. "It just seems odd that someone Bastila's party specifically requested to transfer aboard happened to survive."

What is he saying? My brow twisted in annoyance. Carth’s suspicion was warranted, but I couldn’t follow his logic here. Why was it less trustworthy that the survivor had been contracted by the Jedi? I looked away, stonily refusing to respond.

The turbo-lift descended further and further in the bowels of Taris, and I realized I had no idea where this one would end. I hoped Carth did.

I kept hold of my anger, though. It made me feel alive and whole, like my senses were peaked by a glitterstim high. And honestly, Onasi was being unreasonable.

As the lift’s descent began to decelerate, I turned to glare at him.

"Are you implying I had something to do with the crash?"

“No!” he answered quickly, and the lift stopped with a shudder.

The doors opened, and I walked out. We'd exited into a warren of artificially-lit corridors, decorated with tattered holo-posters advertising various goods. Graffiti was scrawled haphazardly along the walls; gang slogans or general profanities in varying shades of colour. The place was filthy – rubble and waste littered the ground, and the posters were grimy and damaged in places.

And behind me, Carth mumbled, “Well, maybe.”

"Oh thanks!" I yelled, turning back to glare at him. My muscles clenched, and I could feel the all too familiar fury taking hold again. Must calm down. I gritted my teeth, and forced in a deep breath. "It doesn't make any difference. Go ahead and be paranoid."

"I'm not trying to be paranoid!" he snapped, and I could see the anger crease his face also. *He's getting just as pissy as me. Faint shouts drifted from around the corner, but the noise barely registered.

Carth was glowering, dark eyes flashing with irritation. With a concerted effort to restrain himself, he opened his mouth once more. "Look," he finished softly, "I'm probably wrong, and this is probably nothing, I know. But I learned a long time ago not to take anything at face value. And I hate surprises."

The shouts became louder, and my annoyance with Onasi vanished as I looked ahead. Sounds like blaster fire. If we're running into gang fights already, then Kebla wasn't exaggerating. Carth whipped around in the direction of the noise, then turned back to glance at me. We nodded briskly at each other, argument forgotten, and both drew weapons before slowly edging down the corridor. As we rounded the corner, I spotted three aliens standing over a pile of corpses.

One of them looked up. "(More strangers!)" he hissed in a foreign dialect. All three were garbed in similarly coloured armour - red slashed with black - and as one they began to raise their weapons.

But I was taken aback. I understood that. I have no idea what language he just spoke, but I understood that.

Carth opened fire, and I raced towards them, vibrosword raised. The same battle rage once more consumed me, expanding through my body in a blazing heat as I lost control of my senses and any rational thought. The gang members surrounded me, each with stun sticks and blades, and I could dimly hear Carth shouting at me to get out of the fray. I dodged the first swipe, and swung my blade towards a neck, but the guy stepped backwards. The alien on my left snarled, jabbing a blade towards me. I jumped forward just in time, knocking the first gang member down with my sword. I felt a piercing pain glance my shoulder, and numbly realized the third creep had pulled a blaster on me.

"Jen, get out of there!" Carth yelled.

"I'm not going down to this scum!" Thoughts raged through my head. These imbeciles should be afraid of me! An unbidden sense of power surged through me, uncontrolled. Two of the gang members instantly gave out synchronized yelps, dropped their weapons, and ran. A sense of shock assailed my fury, but battle sense prevailed and I turned to face the third guy. He looks as confused as me. Nonplussed, he stood stock still as Onasi shot him in the side. He crumpled.

"How odd," Carth said as he walked closer. "Why did they just run off like that?"

"Beats me," I said distantly, wondering myself. I'm using the Force without realizing it. Without any understanding of what I'm doing. There was a crawling sensation under my skin. I guess I can't let this power worry me too much, it seems to save my neck, the rational side of me pointed out. And it's so much fun, a darker side added. Not if I can't control it!

Carth shook his head in guarded disbelief. "Your luck is amazing, Jen. I was certain that was your end. Look, your battle sense is non-existent, and it's driving me crazy with worry every time we get into trouble. Could you please not run into the middle of fights like that?"

"I'll try," I muttered, kneeling down next to the gang member and searching him efficiently. The corpse held nothing of use – I didn’t need a stun stick and the blaster was one of those five hundred cred Czerka models that were guaranteed to overheat in the middle of a firefight. I stood up in disgust.
"Frankly, I don't understand why you're still standing." Carth was still frowning at me.

Because I'm good, you idiot. But was I, really? I'd raced into the fray, there, when we could have fired from a distance. I'd allowed myself to be surrounded, rather than taking out the first one I approached. It was as if some dark, sick side of me relished the challenge - and believed in my own immortality.

I shuddered, and Carth's frown deepened. Once more, his concern seemed to war with his mistrust, and he sighed, before dusting himself off. "Well, we're not hurt, so let's get our bearings and find out what to do next."

I nodded, and we proceeded further down the large walkway. We passed boarded-in openings that once, eons ago, were windows. Halogen lighting framed the ceiling, but in many places the lights were off – some smashed, some blacked out due to a likely electrical fault. Somehow, I didn’t think building maintenance was a lucrative career choice in the Lower City.

As we walked in silence, both listening intently for any sounds of further battle, I became aware of a foreign consciousness returning to my thoughts. Bastila, I realized with mingled irritation and unease. Great. She’s waking. There was a sense of drowsy frustration.

I will not be silenced again!

I stumbled in surprise. That wasn't my thought, was it? A sense of shock echoed mine, and Bastila's presence focused on me, like it had done back on the Endar Spire. I felt the familiar taste of fear and confusion, and tried to back off mentally. Obviously something else caught the Jedi's attention, as the focus seemed to dissipate somewhat. But she's awake now. A chill prickled down my spine. I can't afford to lose my temper again.

Carth was looking at me expectantly, and I realized he'd said something.

"Sorry – what?"

"I said, do you want to try this cantina for some info, first?"

I glanced up ahead, and spotted a lurid neon sign brightly proclaiming ‘Javyar's Cantina’ to all and sundry. It looked somehow out of place in this dark corridor. "Sure."

"Good, you can try your hand at pazaak again." He grinned at me.

I felt a little uneasy at the thought. I've got to practice this, though. Each time I'm reacting on instinct – whether it’s in combat or conversation. I need to learn how to control this. It was pragmatic and true, and I gave Carth a nod of assent.

The bouncer outside the cantina gave us a quick once-over before allowing us entry.

It was a far cry from the Upper City cantina. The entrance room split into a dance area at the back and a pazaak den to the left. Thick cigarra smoke mingled with giggledust steam, and I guessed the air recirculators here weren’t the most efficient. Soulful music from a trio of Bith brass players undercut the murmured conversation of busy patrons, most of whom wore some variant of armour.

The Upper City cantina had been scruffier and more low-brow than the rest of the Upper City, but Javyar's cantina was a step down further. Nothing too overtly illicit – most of the people here seemed at ease and jovial with one another. I found myself liking the place.

Carth nudged me expectantly, indicating the pazaak den.
"A drink, first." I replied.

He frowned at me. "No drinkin-"

"Just one, I promise," I laughed at him, and turned back to the bar that graced the centre of the cantina. Behind the bar I spotted three gang members walking towards a mercenary, in that forced casual stroll that just screamed violence to any experienced eye. They wore scuffed red armour slashed with black, the same colours as the aliens we encountered earlier. My, the action is certainly thick and fast down here, isn't it? The bartender, a thickset older Duros, looked on in alarm, his dark red eyes widening.

"Go away," the mercenary said loudly. His armour, a customized blue-and-white exoskeleton, looked formidable, and I could spot three different blasters on his person. The man unusually short, but his ready stance coupled with his equipment immediately showcased him as an experienced fighter. Inwardly, I pegged him as the superior to the three thugs who were spoiling for a fight.

"Hey, you not talk like that!" one of the gang members – a Rodian - said jovially, in broken Basic. "We just want say hi to big, bad bounty hunter Calo Nord!"

"Nah, this can't be Calo Nord," a Human piped up from behind the Rodian. "He's supposed to be tough. This guy's nothing but a runt!"

I kept my eye on the ensuing confrontation. They're just asking for trouble. I could sense Carth tensing as he recognized danger. This is not the sort of guy I would taunt lightly. Even if he is short.

"One," Calo Nord said ominously. He had a hand tucked into a bulky utility belt, I noted with suspicion.

"One? What that mean? You be funny, tough guy?"

Oh, so they're stupid as well.

"Two."

"Me no understand." The Rodian shrugged. "One? Two? Why he count? He trying to count how many of us against him?"

"It's three against one, Calo," the Human sneered. "What do you think about those odds?"

"Three," Calo finished, and his hand whipped out from his utility belt. I instinctively pulled myself back into the pazaak den as a bright flash sheered through the place, followed by the sound of three blaster bolts.

By the time I poked my head back into the cantina, I saw Calo Nord re-hook his blaster to his hip, kick the casing of the flash grenade to the side of the room, and nonchalantly step over the corpses on his way out. I couldn’t help an involuntarily snigger as I eyed over the remains of the three brainless thugs.

Carth shot me a disgusted look. He’d ducked back into the pazaak den also, unlike some of the cantina patrons deeper in the main room who were rubbing their eyes and cursing in a variety of languages. The barman was scowling at the mess on the floor. "Did you just find that funny?"

"No." Yes.
"Really? I heard you laugh," he said in a sarcastic tone.

"I didn't laugh!" I sniggered.

"It sounded like a laugh to me."

"I had something in my throat, okay?" I snapped.

"Right," he said coldly.

Suddenly I didn't feel like a drink anymore. "Let me just go and play some pazaak. Give me your credits."

"You sound like one of Davik's thugs when you say that," he groused, but handed over his money anyway. In total, we had just over two hundred credits left. I did well enough against the juniors in the Upper City, before I faced Niklos. Now, if I could just figure out how to replicate that mind trick, I'd be one step closer to understanding my own abilities - and I'd be able to make us a small fortune.

xXx

I couldn't believe it. I simply couldn't understand. Why didn't that work? Why couldn't I feel anything? My mind was screaming with frustration.

"You- you lost all our credits?" Carth looked flabbergasted. "How? You won everything in Upper Taris!"

"I guess luck just wasn't with me!" I snapped back.

"Then why didn't you cut your losses? You threw away over two hundred credits!"

"I tried, alright?" I scowled. Gelrood just laughed at me when I suggested he stand with 13. Why? Why? The second player I tried just told me to stop acting like a juiced-up spacer! That energy, that charge all around me – it simply wasn’t there anymore. Have I been using the Force, or not? If so, why has it suddenly failed me?

"So we're totally broke, great going Jen." Carth obviously felt he needed to make me feel even worse.

"Not totally," I shot back at him sweetly. "I have just enough left for a whiskey, so excuse me."

I stormed off in the direction of the bartender.

xXx
I was getting restless again; I could feel it in my bones. The desire to go out and explore, to meet new people, to have an adventure - it was beginning to consume me. It didn't help that Gadon refused to let me join in on any of the Hidden Bek assignments. I could help them, I really could! Why do they always treat me like a kid?

Big Z would say it's 'cause I was a kid, but he was the only one who could get away with that. Although I did throw my dinner at him last time.

"(Mission, you're fidgeting like a lice-ridden cub)," he suddenly complained.

I looked up from the spare utility belt I'd been tweaking. It didn’t carry as many tech spikes as my usual one, but was totally more comfortable to wear.

"Let's go explore the Undercity again!" The thought had only just crossed my mind as it erupted out of my mouth.

"(No!)" he exploded in a fierce growl. "(It's too dangerous. Listen to Gadon!)

I had to laugh. How many times have we been down there with no trouble? “Come on, it's not like we can't avoid the rakghouls! 'Sides, I wanna check out those escape pods!” I grinned hopefully at him. “There could be some really cool stuff down there!”

Just thinking about it stirred excitement in my belly. We might find some Republic gear! Think of the creds that would bring us! The Undercity wasn’t a place I went to often – it was dark, depressing, and the rakghouls were actually pretty scary. But they stayed outdoors and were slow and lumbering. As long as we kept our wits about us, they were pretty easy to avoid. Big Z and I had explored the sewer tunnels down there a couple of times, and my bio-scanner had never picked one up in there.

Though I didn’t like the strange, faraway roars I heard sometimes. They were downright creepy. Big Z said it was the sound of the planet’s soul slowly dying, but he could be poetically dramatic like that.

"(There are Sith patrols down there, Mission!)" he was scolding sternly. I’d always found it surprising how strongly he could convey disapproval when howling in his native tongue.

"Bah, they won't bother us," I waved a hand dismissively. Our ‘scanners would pick up the rakghouls and the Sith before they came too close. And worst case scenario: Zaalbar would just grab me and run. It was amazing how fast a seven foot Wookiee could sprint.

"(No, I'm not going)," he said firmly, shaking his shaggy head.

I gave him an affectionate look. "Yes, you are!"
"(Mission)," he whined, "(you are too impulsive for your own good. Let us just stay here)."

"No way!" I retorted, shaking my head in denial. "Live a little, Big Z! Come on, it’s boring round here!"

Besides, this would be a way for the Beks to take me seriously. If we found something important, maybe something that the Sith up top wanted, then it could really give the Beks some leverage. And maybe Gadon would finally let me compete in the swoop races.

"(What are you up to now, Mission?)" A female voice said in Ryl. I glanced up to see Zaerdra, Gadon's second-in-command, enter the Bek storeroom we were seated in. Zaerdra insisted in speaking purely Ryl to me - as if I was gonna lose my heritage or something if I didn’t hear it daily. I enjoyed ribbing her by always answering back in Basic.

Okay, okay, I knew my Ryl wasn’t fluent, and I only understood the rudimentary basics of the lekku sign-language, but I’d been born on Taris or close to. I was a Tarisian, first and foremost. It wasn't like I was going to immigrate to Ryloth anytime soon… it wasn't like I’d ever have the chance.

"Nothing, just talking ‘bout our next adventure,” I answered chirpily, hoping she'd drop it.

Zaerdra pinned me with a glare. "(What adventure? Really, Mission, there’s a gang war going on at the moment. You need to stay put, grow up and have a little more care).”

"Grow up?" the cry was ripped from my lungs as I jumped to my feet. She’s always mothering me – as if I need it! While gang fighting had erupted into the tunnels and alleyways of the Lower City, it didn’t mean I couldn’t evade all the action if need be. I knew all the secret shortcuts, and had all the gear to warn me of any incoming danger. And worst case scenario: no one was tougher than Zaalbar. "I take care of myself perfectly fine, and always have! Why do you always treat me like a little girl?"

"(Because you-)” Zaerdra pursed her lips, sighed, and then began again. "(You are still young and spontaneous, and I worry you put yourself in danger. Especially with all the Vulkars out there right now)."

"(Mission can take care of herself)," Big Z growled in Shyriiwook. Good old Zaalbar. He may lecture me to death when we’re alone, but he'll always stick up for me. Sometimes I reckon I can't count on anyone else.

"Well don't worry," I said firmly, crossing my arms. "I know the Undercity better than any Bek alive!"

"(The Undercity? Oh Mission, you're not going there again?)" Zaerdra frowned, her brightly waxed lekku twitching in disapproval. She sniffed. "(Gadon will talk some sense into you)."

"Look, Zaerdra, if Gadon doesn't want me along on Bek jobs, then that’s fine. I'll just keep myself busy." I tried to say that in a snooty voice, but considering Zaerdra's scowl I didn’t think it worked. "Let’s go, Big Z."

The Wookiee faithfully followed me out of the Hidden Bek base. I grinned and waved merrily to Dane and Lizza who were standing guard at the base entrance, but I was still annoyed inside. I could help the Beks – I’m the best splicer they’ve got - why does Gadon still coddle me? Big Z tried to tell me it was ‘cause they cared, and ‘cause Zaerdra thought she was looking out for me, but I didn't buy that. No one's looked out for me since Griff left, and I've been fine!
But I wasn't gonna think on my brother. Better to contemplate finding all sorts of exotic Republic gear we could flog off to the rest of the Beks.

"(Can we get something to eat first, Mission?)" Zaalbar complained as we wandered down a shadowy back alley. There was a convenient shortcut between the Bek base and the cantina, and sometimes I wondered at how those brainless Vulkar oafs had never found Gadon’s hideout. Or maybe they know it, and just don’t dare a full out attack. The Beks had more men, it was true, although those nasty Vulkars had been recruiting an awful lot lately.

"You and your stomach!" I poked Zaalbar in his furry side, and made a mental note to nag Zaalbar into having a bath. "It's a good thing I can bring in the creds, Big Z, with the way you eat!"

He growled at my teasing, and I laughed again. "Alright, let’s go get some cantina grub. I might play a bit of pazaak, too."

I recalled the Rodians who'd been there last night, eager to play me – but I'd had to dash. Newcomers that want to challenge the pazaak queen of the Lower City – I'm going to have some fun kicking their scrawny green butts! It'd taken me years to build up this deck, and I was rather proud of it. Some of the cards I’d collected were worth drukloads on the open market.

I skipped along the corridor in anticipation with Zaalbar trudging behind me. A flickering neon light announced the cantina, and I stopped to chat briefly to the bouncer, who all but ignored Zaalbar. Big Z tended to be quiet in other company, and it always amazed me how easily people could forget he was even there. Except when he gets angry. Hard to ignore a seven-foot growling shag carpet!

I waltzed into the cantina and waved cheerily at Sancha, the barman. Glancing around the place, my eyes lit up on a napping patron. A Twi’lek dressed in Vulkar colours, slumped unconscious on the beer-stained bar. Someone's had a few too many drinks... ooh, this could be fun. I heard a slumbering snore escape him, and grinned.

The Black Vulkar was alone, head resting on limp arms. Sancha gave me a warning look as I approached, but turned to hide a grin. He knew me well, and wasn’t the biggest fan of the Vulkars, anyway. They’d trashed his place three times in the last month – despite the unwritten code of the Lower City. Leave the gang war on the streets.

Zaalbar nudged me. "(Mission, what are you doing?)"

"Big Z, shush!" I whispered. "Go eat something. Your breath stinks."

"(You are getting into trouble again. I cannot let you walk into danger)."

I rolled my eyes at him, pushed him softly away, and hopped onto the stool next to the Black Vulkar. The thug didn’t move; still head-planted on the bar. What sort of trouble could an unconscious punk bring anyway? I leaned nonchalantly against the Twi’lek – he gave a soft snort, but other than that stayed motionless. My wandering hand strayed into his pocket. My, I wonder what this plasteel chit could be. If my luck held, it’d be loaded with creds I could download before the drunk Vulkar woke and cancelled it.

I congratulated myself and jumped off the stool, wandering around the other side of the bar. Zaalbar was shooting me worried looks. "Sancha, dinner for my friend please," I asked cheerily.

"(Mission...)

"Easy money." I beamed, grabbing out my datapad to insert the chit ready for download. But there was something stuck to the side of the chit; I peeled it off, considering. It was a crumpled piece of paper.

"Bit odd to have something on paper. It looks like codes of some sort," I commented, tracing a finger down it. "What do you make of it, Big Z?"

"(I don't!)" he wailed when I showed him the writing.

I shot him an exasperated look, and glanced at the paper again. There was a Vulkar insignia hastily scribbled on the top, with the phrase ‘BlackAccess01’ written underneath it in scrawling Basic. Some sort of password? I mused, wondering. Further down the page were the hexadecimal codes I’d first noticed. Weird. Why wouldn’t he have this recorded electronically?

An idea hit me – only last week I’d stumbled across a system I couldn’t crack. And Gadon’d said he thought the Vulkars had hidden their base in the same place. “Hey! Big Z, d’ya reckon this could have something to do with that security system in the sewers?”

Zaalbar groaned audibly as I felt excitement swell once more through my stomach. My gaze roved hungrily over the page again, but I had the sense to lower my voice. “I reckon it is. I bet ‘blackaccess01’ is the passphrase to login, which means the codes could be...” I trailed off, my eyes widening. “The deactivation sequence to that forcefield we saw! Stuff the escape pods, let’s go check it out! If this-” I shook the bit of paper to stress my point, “-is the key to breaking into the Vulkars’ base, then we should make sure it works!”

And if it did, then I could just imagine what Gadon would think. Maybe, after all these years, he might finally relent and admit me as a full Bek member.

I’d been lucky, in a way, that the Beks had taken me in so young. I knew how hard it was to live out on the streets of Lower Taris. But the downside was that Gadon still saw me as no more than the kid he’d rescued years ago – despite all the slicing I did on his behalf.

"(No! Too dangerous! No! I will not allow you to run into a heavily guarded base if I have to tie you up myself!)") Zaalbar yelled angrily.

Well, it's a good thing no one round here can understand Shyriiwook. "Geez, Big Z, calm down would ya? You sound like a wampa in heat! 'Sides," I whispered, "I'm not crazy enough to break into their base. I just want to see if I'm right before I give it to Gadon."

"(No! We will not go!)

"Calm your friend down, would you? He's scaring the customers," Sancha warned as he strolled over, Zaalbar's dinner resting on a tray clasped in his hand.

I grinned apologetically at him. "He's just hungry, is all. Saying how he can’t wait for your food!"

Sancha gave me a disbelieving look as he handed Zaalbar his food – typical Lower City cuisine of rehydrated gima beans and cast-off meat from the Upper City – but strolled away without further comment.

"(Mission, I will go with you to the escape pods, if you promise we will not go near that forcefield)," Zaalbar offered hopefully.

Now that was a surprise. Last time, we’d come a teensy bit close to a rogue rakghoul, and Zaalbar had sworn he wouldn’t let me near the Outside again. I beamed at him. Once I've got him down there, it'll be easy enough to drag him into the sewers. 'Sides, it's safer in the sewers than the
"It's a deal!" I said cheerfully, quickly downloading the Vulkar’s creds before standing. There was only slightly more than one hundred unencrypted, and I was of a mind to make a bit more than that this evening. "I'm gonna hit the card tables, Big Z." I patted his shoulder reassuringly and waltzed off to the card room, cred tokens from last week’s winnings still secure in my belt. I discarded the Vulkar’s empty chit in a disposal bin along the way.

The pazaak den was adjoined to the main bar under a large archway, and occupied with the usual assortment of drunks, lowlifes, and anyone looking to make a quick buck. Which pretty much included every inhabitant in the Lower City. I liked it here though; most people were too busy looking out for themselves to hassle me for being so young.

Lina, a Zabrak female who frequented the pazaak den more often than me, spotted my entrance and wandered over to embrace me affectionately. She was a spice junkie, and more often than not I’d see that awful glazed look on her face as she rode out another glitterstim high. Today she appeared crisp and coherent, and smelled only of watered-down beer.

"Mission, come to wipe the floor with those Rodian jerks?" she grinned, still hugging me warmly.

I nodded enthusiastically as I stepped back, glancing around the room. Gelrood was holed up in his standard corner, a smug look creasing his face, and the Rodians were playing at the end table.

"You just missed out on an easy catch," Lina told me.

My gaze shot back to her. "Lemme guess, Gelrood thrashed someone? He's looking happier than normal... did he cheat, d'ya think?"

Lina let out a tinkle of laughter. "Not this time. Some crazy new woman lost a whole bunch to him. She kept telling him to stand, or keep going when he was on nineteen."

"Threats?" I raised both eyebrows. It happened, but not often - and usually from the Vulkars or the Sandsnakes, a smaller gang who was just about as nasty. That was the reason most of us refused to play them.

"No, no," Lina giggled, her dull eyes twinkling with mirth. "I was listening to most of it. She didn't understand how to play the game properly. It sounded like she was making suggestions. Gelrood’s certainly richer, though!"

I grinned, wishing I’d been there. All sorts of sents ended up in Javyar’s cantina, and I personally bet it was some Upper City brat who’d been forced out by the Sith. "Shame I missed out! Anyways, I'm off to try the new guys."

Lina nodded in farewell, and I made my way over to the end table. One of the Rodians looked up as I approached, his large black eyes narrowing in recognition.

"(Hey look, a little girl wants to try a grown up game)," he sneered in Rodese. The other two spotted me next, stopping their game to eye me over.

"Hey, I'm not a little girl, ronto breath!" I glared at them. "Are you afraid to play me? You said last night you wanted to play the champion."

"(This place is easy credits if the champion's just a little girl)," a second one chimed in, nudging the first. I was starting to get annoyed - but I knew just how much psychology factored in with pazaak. Besides, if my deck didn't treat me well tonight, I'd just cheat to win.
"Maybe you should stop talking, and start playing. Or are you scared?" I challenged, a hand on my hip.

"(Let's see how many credits you have to lose)."

xXx

A short time later, and I walked out of the card room smugly, my purse full of tokens just waiting to be cashed in. I'd lost a few games to those smart mouths, but won more. My lucky deck never fails me. Well, it usually didn't, and certainly hadn't tonight.

"(Little girl cheats! Little girl’s asking for trouble!)" the slurring voice of the Rodian I’d just thrashed drifted after me into the main bar.

I whirled around, glaring through the archway back into the pazaak den. "I do not cheat, gizka brain! Face it, I won fair and square, you sore loser! Now, beat it."

I stalked over to the bar, my eyes narrowed in annoyance. Would people stop with the age thing already? I wondered briefly where Big Z was, he must have had four dinners by now.

"(Hey, little girl! You better give our money back. We don’t like cheats),” another one of the mouthy runts taunted, dogging my heels. I glanced back to see two of the Rodians had followed me out, their beady eyes intent on me.

"I told you to leave me alone – so give me some space, bug-eye!” I retorted. These guys just can't handle losing. "Your breath smells like bantha poo-doo!” It did, actually, and I’d struggled to concentrate on the game at times. They’d give Big Z a run for his money. Far out. Haven’t these guys ever heard of personal hygiene?

"(This ain’t no place for a little girl like you. If you’re smart, you’ll run away home).” The closest Rodian pointed a finger at me.

Do they think they can scare me? Hah! I’ve seen scarier Twi’lek dancers. "Who you calling a little girl, chuba-face?” I countered, folding my arms and staring daggers at them.

"(Looks like someone needs a lesson in manners!)" the second Rodian threatened, stepping up level with his friend.

I saw a large shadow loom behind the Rodians, and stifled a satisfied smirk. "And I suppose you creeps are going to give me one? Gimme a break!” I goaded.

Both of them took a challenging step closer. As if I'm going to back down! “What?” I struck a pose. "You want to beat up on little ole me?"

"(You asked for it!)" The first exclaimed angrily, flexing his arm. At once they were both lifted three feet into the air, and I watched happily as their expression turned from rage, to shock, and then finally fear.

"(You want a fight? Then have one with me!)" Zaalbar roared, and shook them both by the scruff of their necks.

What a sight! Two annoying insects totally outclassed! The Rodians yelped in surprise, and Zaalbar growled a second time before throwing them savagely. One of them let out a high pitched squeal as he thudded against the cantina wall.

"Had enough yet?" I taunted.

"(Little girl's lucky she has a big friend)," the larger of the two muttered as he got to his feet. Zaalbar snarled, and the two Rodians all but sprinted out of the cantina. I poked my tongue out as they passed. Worst case scenario: I always had Big Z to back me up.

When I glanced back to the bar, I saw Sancha was scowling at us. I winked gleefully, and my eyes caught on a Human female laughing at the exchange. I wondered if she spoke Rodese – an’ it wasn't like she needed to know Shyriiwook to understand a snarling Wookiee meant. I grinned impishly at her and sidled closer, curious.

Another stranger. First the Rodians, now this Human and her sidekick. For another Human was standing a bit behind her, scowling at her back. Her grumpy sidekick, by the looks. Huh, I wonder what they're doing in here.

"Say, I don't recognize you and I know pretty much everyone in this part of the Lower City. You must be new down here," I said brightly, smiling at them. "I guess that makes me and Big Z your official welcoming committee!"

The woman grinned in response, and inclined her head. Her green eyes seemed to sparkle with mischief, and I took an immediate liking to her. In the corner of my eye, I spotted Zaalbar losing interest as he turned back to his food.

"Hi, my name's Jen," the Human told me. She had a mop of curly dark hair and wore tattered armour. A vibrosword was strapped to her side, and the other guy was resting his hand on his hip, where I’d bet fifty creds a blaster was concealed. I found it hard to tell age with Humans, but they were much older than me, and had a sort of battle-ready look about them.

I pointed to the man; he had a highly irritated look on his face. "Is that guy with you, or does he just like glaring at the world?"

The woman laughed. "That's Carth. I seem to have a habit of annoying him."

The man named Carth hissed something I didn't hear, his face a picture of heightened frustration.

"What?" She shot him a puzzled look. "You're paranoid, you know that?"

"Anyway," I chimed in, not wanting to witness an argument between the two. "My name's Mission Vao and that big Wookiee over there is my best friend, Zaalbar. I'd offer to give you a tour, but the streets down here aren't safe - what with the gangs and the Sith these days."

"You showed a lot of guts dealing with those bullies, kid," the older man commented. He was probably trying to be polite, but I bristled at the word. Jen looked at me – I wondered if she sensed my irritation, for she quickly spoke again.

"How do a Wookiee and a Twi’lek end up as best friends?" she asked curiously.

I relaxed, warming up to the subject. "We just kind of fell in together. It ain't easy on your own here in the Lower City - everyone's always looking to get the best of you."

"We’ve noticed that," Carth commented in a droll voice. “Still, you seem like an odd pair."

"When I met up with Zaalbar it seemed like a good match," I volunteered. "I knew we could look out for each other. With my street smarts and his muscle, we make a great team." I couldn't ask for a better friend.

The Humans nodded at me, and I wondered again what they were doing at Javyar’s Cantina. Not many of their type came here. I suddenly recalled Lina’s earlier comments, and wondered.

"Say, you don't want to play a game of pazaak, do ya?" I asked brightly.

"No she does not," Carth said quickly through clenched teeth. Jen's face flushed red, and I had to suppress a giggle. So it was her!

"I'd like to ask you some questions," Jen said in a rush.

_I suppose I could let her change the subject. _"Well, you came to the right person!" I told her. "If you want info on Lower Taris, I'm the one to talk to! Davik, the Lower City gangs... I've even got the scoop on that bounty hunter Calo Nord!"

She gave me a considering look. "Calo Nord? He's the fellow I saw earlier. What do you know about him?"

"Calo Nord's one of the most famous bounty hunters in the galaxy!" I enthused. "He's killed more people than the Iridian Plague! I've seen him kill people just for looking sideways at him!" He was pretty scary; I sure as heck didn't try talking to him. He didn't usually turn up here unless he was hunting down a bounty. Bad for business, Sancha would grumble. "Calo hangs around Zax's bounty office, but I don't think he's looking for work there. I reckon Calo's been hired by Davik to do a special job for the Exchange. I'd wager a thousand creds that as soon as the quarantine ends, he'll be getting off this rock."

"A thousand big ones – that's some amount," Jen murmured. Carth scowled at the mention of credits, and I grinned. _I reckon they're flat broke now. You gotta be some sort of head-case to lose that much to Gelrood._

"Well," Jen continued. "I'm mostly interested in finding a way down to the Undercity."

_Ooh, I bet she's going down there because of the escape pods! I'm almost tempted to join up with them... but I work better alone. Alone with Zaalbar, anyway. _"You'll have a tough time getting past the Sith guard," I warned. "They don’t have the manpower to control the streets down here, but they’ve set up an outpost next to the Undercity entrance." I knew a few other ways around the guards, but they were my secrets alone. "Why d'ya want to go to the Undercity, anyway? The rakghouls attack anything on sight!"

"Just want to check out a few things," she said lightly.

I let out a grin. _Yep, definitely going after the escape pods. _"Well, good luck getting there. If you need help, have a chat to Gadon Thek – he's the leader of the Hidden Beks."

"I don't know if we want to get involved with the gang wars," Carth murmured.

"Gadon's a good guy!" I jumped in quickly. "And a great leader! This gang war is totally the Vulkars fault! They're the ones who started killing everything on the streets – just ‘cause of the Sith trying to wrest control. Between those two, everyone’s gone insane out there."

"Sounds a good reason to stay out of it then," Jen commented drily.

"Well, maybe," I said, shrugging. "But I don't reckon you'll be able to get to the Undercity without Gadon's help."

Gadon always liked to check out strangers himself, and he usually helped the good ones... if they helped him, of course. He'd want to meet these two. Both of them looked pretty tough and, despite their wish to stay away from the gangs, I knew that was easier said then done. The Vulkars would even harass me on sight these days.

Except in the cantina, of course - that's off-limits. Usually. The Vulkar I'd looted earlier was still passed out on the bar. Well, he was asking for it. Sheesh... who passes out drunk with their pockets loaded?

"This dive is boring," I complained. "I'm gonna go find some action. Nice to meet you, Jen."

"And you," she smiled at me. I grinned back. I've got some creds, Big Z's been fed - it's time to hit the streets.

"Come on, Big Z!" I called out to the corner where Zaalbar was probably onto his fifth meal already. "Let's get going."

He complained, but followed me loyally to the door.

Time for an adventure!

xXx
The Twi’lek girl was right; the Sith were vigilantly guarding the Undercity entrance. In a snide tone, Carth suggested I should talk them into letting us past, but I put that down to bad temper and ignored him. I'm not trying that again, not after my spectacular failure in the pazaak den. Maybe we should try talking to Gadon first - Mission was fairly insistent.

She seemed like a sweet kid, although I wouldn’t call her that out loud. Unlike Flyboy - great tact there. Bright, impulsive, good-natured... she reminds me of someone. I don't know who... maybe she reminds me of what I'd like to be. I blinked, surprised at my own train of thought. No, there was something a bit naïve and enthusiastic about her. She'd probably stick her neck out to save gizka, I thought sourly, just like Jen.

"So, not interested in chatting up the Sith?" Carth muttered. He was still pissed at our lack of credits, and his mood was becoming more than a little tiresome. But – loathe as I was to admit it – Carth had a valid reason to be angry. Our dire money situation was an issue. I’d probably have to sell the stims I’d been hiding so we could actually eat for the next few days.

"I think we should speak to Gadon," I said in a measured tone. "I haven't got any other ideas, and Mission strikes me as a genuine sort. If she suggested going to the Beks, then it's likely a good start."

Carth muttered something under his breath, but followed my lead - back to the cantina. Fortunately, getting directions to the gang base from there wasn’t difficult – obviously the Beks were used to visitors. A quick walk from the cantina on one of the main pipelines through the Lower City brought us to the guarded entrance of the Hidden Bek base. I briefly wondered what genius had given the gang their name.

The guard was poorly armed, but quick to protest as I tried the door – an old-fashioned, swinging door made of a thick plasteel compound, and likely bolted from the inside seeing as I couldn't budge it at all.

"Hey, you can't just walk in here!" the guard yelled indignantly, shoving me away from the resistant door. A flash of fury fired in my gut; part of me knew that anger so quick to flare was both dangerous and unhealthy. I clenched my teeth and pushed it away. Calm down, she's just doing her job. I swear I could feel Carth smirk behind me.

"I want to talk to Gadon Thek," I said, struggling to keep my tone pleasant and non-threatening.

"And how do I know you're not a Vulkar spy sent to kill him?" the guard sneered, her face twisting in dislike as she eyed me over.

"Uh, well, you don't?" I offered without thinking. Her expression darkened.

"Look," I appeased quickly, inwardly kicking myself. "I'm not a Vulkar. I just want to get into the Undercity. Mission suggested I talk to Gadon."
She was still glaring at me in distrust. "Mission Vao? Well, I suppose it's not like you can do anything to harm Gadon in the heart of his own base. Not with Zaerdra watching his back." She paused for a minute, her lips twisting as she thought it over. "Go in and speak to Gadon if you want. Just remember to be on your best behavior... the Hidden Beks are watching you."

She has no right to talk down to me like that! My thoughts tumbled over one another, rage and logic vying for dominance. No, I need their help. Anger will do no good here. I felt my fingernails dig into my palms as I struggled for calm, struggled to push aside the unreasonable anger.

The guard knocked loudly on the door, and a small panel slid open in the centre. I could just make out a shadowy face stare at us from behind a pane of grimy transparisteel.

"Strangers," the guard called. "Claim they want to see Gadon about the Undercity."

A grating noise indicated the bolting mechanism was being dismantled, and a minute later the door opened. Considering the lax security – we hadn’t even been searched! – I was becoming more and more surprised that the Sith hadn’t conquered these Lower City gangs. Carth shot me a disbelieving glance; he was thinking along the same lines then. I guess the Sith are just as incompetent on Taris as everywhere else in the known galaxy. These gangs are ripe for the taking. The Sith? Incompetent? Why would I think that? I tried to chase down the origin of the thought, but it slipped away into the shadows, another secret locked in the recesses of my unstable mind.

Don’t just stand there like you’ve swallowed a Bothan stunner, idiot. The guard was getting suspicious at my pause; her brows had lowered into a full-fledged glare as I stalled in the entrance, wearing a glazed look like a stim junkie. Carth nudged me towards the open door, shooting me a concerned look.

I shook my head to clear out the cobwebs, nodded curtly to the glowering guard, and strode into the Bek base.

The main hall of the base was rather large, and armoured gang members lurked against the walls, staring at me as I walked through. A few of them stroked their displayed weapons overtly as I caught their eye. Gang members and their egos. As if a bunch of poorly dressed thugs with vibroswords could intimidate me. But most of them were content to size us up from a distance – apart from a Twi'lek female stalking toward us, her eyes shooting daggers and her stride purposeful and that of a competent fighter.

"Hold it right there - who are you and what is your business with Gadon?" she demanded, hands on hips as she blocked my way. My hand twitched towards my vibrosword instinctively. The woman's eyes widened as she caught my move and she snarled, drawing out her weapon in a flash. Damn my gut reactions!

"Spies!" she yelled, and a chorus of gang members bellowed in response. The noise of multiple blades being drawn rang through the hall, and fleetingly I hoped none would pull out blasters. Stop this, before I get hurt! My hand held the hilt of my vibrosword tightly, but sense stopped me from lifting it. Before I get hurt? This ragtag mob is no match for me!

"We're not here to fight!" Carth called out desperately next to me.

"Everybody stop!" an authoritative voice shouted above the din. All around us Hidden Beks stood watching warily, blades – and blasters, I noted – aimed directly at us. All because of my gut reaction to that Twi’lek’s hostility. I hope Carth didn’t see that – or I’ll never hear the end of it. If we get out of here alive, that is. My eyes flicked around the large hall; perhaps forty gang members surrounding us, and at least ten had blasters.
I really need to work on my instincts.

The man who’d called a temporary halt to the proceedings was strolling towards us. He was Human, I noted in surprise – the only Human Bek in the room. I wondered if he was their illustrious leader; his authority coupled with his nonchalant stance seemed to suggest so.

"They're spies, Gadon, sent by the Vulkars!" the Twi’lek insisted, eyes glaring into mine. Say something, before this Gadon loses control of his troops!

"No, Mission suggested we come talk to Gadon," I said in a rush.

"Lies!" the woman hissed. She raised her vibrosword higher, pointing it threateningly at me. I swallowed down the urge to fight back against her challenge; to slash open her throat and end her defiance. I will not lose control. Not here, otherwise I may as well just sodding shoot myself!

"Calm down, Zaerdra," Gadon said in a soothing voice. "If Mission sent them here, I doubt very much they'd be looking to attack me. It would be a suicide attempt, at any rate."

"Gadon, you're too trusting! I saw that sneak-"

"Zaerdra," he cut in, his voice a warning.

She glared hatefully at me and stood down, but did not sheathe her weapon. I felt the eyes of everyone on us, ready for one false move. If I ever needed to control Evil Bitch, it is right now. Carth stood in a defensive pose next to me, his eyes flicking from person to person.

"Now, what did you two want?" Gadon asked in a friendly tone, as if I didn't have forty weapons primed at my head.

"We're looking for a way to get into the Undercity," I replied blandly. His eyes bored into mine in inquiry, the strange violet colour of ocular implants. They were an expensive way to restore eyesight, which made me wonder, idly, just how profitable the Hidden Bek's operations were.

"And Mission sent you to see us?" he questioned. "Why do you want to go there?"

I hesitated. May as well tell the truth - I can't think of anything believable to invent. "I want to check out the escape pods."

Gadon took my measure, eyeing me over in consideration. "Well," he said in a lower tone, too soft for anyone bar us and Zaerdra to hear. "You're not Vulkars or Sith. If you were working for Davik, I'd expect you to find your own way to the Undercity. You're with the Republic, aren't you?"

No. Carth's face tightened in discomfort. "We're looking for someone," I hedged. Carth turned to glower at me, and I realized belatedly that perhaps I wasn't being as evasive as I'd hoped. Gadon had a little smile on his face.

"I don't mind telling you what I've learnt. The Vulkars stripped the pods clean some time ago, and I know for a fact they took a Republic Officer captive."

"Who?" Carth demanded, his voice loud in the now-quiet room. Gadon shot him a startled look.

"Relax, Flyboy." I scowled at him. I'd only just drawn myself back under control, I didn’t need him jumping the gun too.

"What's the name of this person you're looking for?" Gadon replied. Thinks he's got the upper
"A woman called Bastila," I muttered.

"Jen!" Carth hissed. His face turned red with anger. "What are you doing?"

"Calm down, Flyboy." I shot him a quelling look, but from his expression I knew there would be words later.

Gadon chuckled, his strange eyes glinting. "I had to see some trust before I went further."

"I don't trust anyone," Carth said, but he was glaring at me.

Gadon's eyebrows lowered.

And here I thought I was the one who made things worse. "Don't pay any attention to him; he's just my version of Zaerdra." I appeased. I heard a low noise from Carth. Be quiet, Flyboy! Zaerdra hissed, a new level of malice crossing her face. Somehow, I didn't think Zaerdra would ever be a friend of mine.

Sod it all. I turned back to face the leader of the Hidden Beks. "So, Gadon, can you help us?"

"Perhaps we can help each other," Gadon offered. I inclined my head in curiosity, and he continued. "Ever ridden a swoop before?"

I blinked. Have I? "Uh, once or twice," I bluffed. "Why?"

"Bastila is the officer Brejik – and his Vulkars – captured. He's offered her up as prize for the annual swoop race in a week's time," Gadon continued.

"Prize?" Carth said in a sort of squeak. Heh, no wonder she's always unconscious. Sedated, probably. I can't imagine an uptight Jedi standing for any of that. Though she had been awake the last few hours, and very, very angry. Her presence radiated heat in the back of my head.

"The only chance you have of getting Bastila back is at the annual swoop race. But you need a gang sponsor to enter." Gadon smiled at me. "I could be persuaded to sponsor your entry."

I raised an eyebrow. "All of this is sounding like a bit of a long shot. And exactly what sort of persuasion are you after, Gadon Thek?"

His smile broadened, like he'd caught a fish wriggling on a line. I wasn't particularly impressed with the thought of myself as a harmless aquatic, and felt a scowl forming.

"The Vulkars stole an accelerator prototype from our swoop bikes. Get it back for me, and I'll get you in the race," he said. My eyes bugged out with disbelief. That's a little something? Well, this will be interesting... and I wonder if it really was theirs to begin with.

Zaerdra snorted in derision. I saw Carth's mouth drop open in the periphery of my vision.

"Think they'll just let two strangers waltz on in and nick it?" I said, hearing the sarcasm in my voice. "This doesn't really sound like help."

"You're in no position to bargain here!" Zaerdra growled. One of her lekku twitched and my eyes followed automatically. What did she just call me? Confusion followed – maybe I really was losing it if I thought a Twi'lek’s headtails were insulting me.
"The Vulkars will win the swoop race hands down with that prototype," Gadon added.

"Why is that so important to you?" Carth asked. He was frowning in suspicion.

Gadon shrugged, but seemed content to answer our questions. "Prestige and power goes along with winning. If the Vulkars win again this year, more of the smaller gangs will flock to them."

Well, breaking into their base does sound like fun, a dark voice commented. No - without a sound plan and appropriate gear, it sounds flat-out insane. I gritted my teeth, pushing the thoughts away. "All right, Gadon, say we do this. Where is it?"

"The Vulkars have a nearby base whose entrance is very heavily guarded. The thieves were spotted absconding into that stronghold, but it’d be suicide to retrace their footsteps – especially since there’s reports of a back entrance in the sewers." Gadon paused, staring at us. "I know of one person who might be able to find that entrance: Mission Vao."

"Mission? Gadon, you can't be serious!" Zaerdra burst out in a horrified tone. "She's just a kid - how is she supposed to help them with this? I thought you agreed to keep her out of the Undercity!"

Gadon tensed, but kept his eyes on me and Carth. "Zaerdra, the Vulkars are making gains with all this fighting. You know this. We need to win the swoop race."

"But you've never involved Mission before, and."

"Zaerdra, I don't have a choice!" Gadon said, his voice rising with heat. "And she’s not just a kid anymore!" He sighed, briefly closing his eyes before continuing his instructions. "You should find Mission in the Undercity, according to the latest rumours. Do not let her enter the Vulkar base, or you will become an enemy of the Beks. This I vow."

I felt my expression freeze. Is that a threat, little man? I took a deep breath. No! He's a good man, don't get angry! Please! I settled for nodding slowly at Gadon, not trusting myself to speak.

"Wait a minute," Carth whispered to me. "If we’re breaking into a Vulkar base, and they have Bastila, then why go through the rigmarole of a swoop race at all?"

That was a valid point. Gadon’s hearing was better than I – or Carth – expected, for the leader chortled. “If you think that’s the only Vulkars’ base – or this, the only Beks’ one – then you are misinformed about the size of Taris. Your officer Bastila will be imprisoned deep into their territory across the other side of the Lower City. The only reason they haven’t moved the swoop part there is the Beks.”

"We live up to our motto," Zaerdra added in a cold voice before elaborating: "The Hidden Beks are watching you."

As far as gang catchphrases went, it was pretty meek. I held back a smirk.

Gadon was nodding in agreement. "Either bring the accelerator back, or destroy it. Our riders will beat the Vulkars without it."

"You're forgetting one thing," Carth interrupted. "Just how are we supposed to get past the Sith guard down to the Undercity?"

Gadon grinned wickedly and held out his hand towards me. Clasped in it, he offered a large electronic data-chit. "Sith authorisation papers, access to the upper, lower and bottom levels of Taris. That's my sign of trust."

Zaerdra still wore a stony expression. I nodded my thanks. If nothing else, he's an honourable man. "I'll be back once I've dealt with the accelerator."

I turned and headed out of the base, staring aggressively at every Bek that met my eye. I also made sure to slam that archaic door on my way out.

"Thanks, Jen," Carth muttered, opening the door to let himself out as well. Oops.

It was late, and we started the walk back to the hideout in silence. Inwardly, I blessed Mission Vao, as I clutched our ticket to Tarisian freedom. If nothing else, we now had a way to roam the levels freely. Gadon must pay a pretty cred to the Sith to have papers like these readily available. Or maybe it was a mutual arrangement - tentative cooperation between the gangs and the Sith. It was the lower levels where the vast majority of the population lived, after all. If the gangs didn't keep the masses in check, they actually could overrun the surface.

"How could you just come right out and say Bastila's name?" Carth condemned a minute later. "You think they won't sell us out to the Sith for a few credits?"

"I think we had no other option," I replied.

He sighed noisily. It sounded like he wanted to lambast me further, but knew, perhaps, that I had a point. "Maybe you're right, Jen. After all, it's our first genuine lead for Bastila."

The concession surprised me, and I turned to stare at him. Carth was still frowning in thought, but his anger seemed to have disappeared. He caught me looking, and the corner of his mouth twitched. "We're a step closer due to your instincts. For a moment there, I thought that insane Twi'lek was about to start a firefight."

My instincts… He hadn't noticed my pre-emptive move towards the vibrosword, then. Good thing, too, otherwise he'd be damning my instincts rather than praising them. I felt slightly uncomfortable.

"Still, I wish we didn't have to trust a gang leader," he continued as we walked along.

"He won't sell us out to the Sith," I muttered. Well, not until we've dealt with the accelerator, my cynical mind added.

xXx

Darkness reigned, and I prowled through an empty apartment; for once feeling unwatched and alone. My connection with Bastila had vanished an hour ago, just as I'd given up on the idea of sleep. All evening I'd been swamped with her anger, her frustration - and at times a smug sense of satisfaction - which had all the more aroused my curiosity. What has she been up to? I swear I can tell when she's using the Force, and it seemed like she was making an escape attempt. The last emotions I'd sensed had been rage and denial, before her presence seemed to fade into drowsiness. Obviously she'd been sedated once more, I'd thought, but then her presence vanished completely from my mind an instant later. Like she'd been cut off from the Force. Like she’d never been linked to me. Or- killed?

But no, I didn't believe that. I would have felt her life-force draining away if she had died. Would I? How would I know what I’d feel? While I was still curious about the Jedi’s predicament, I'd decided to stop thinking and enjoy my new found freedom from her mental presence.
I'd left Carth snoring back at the hideout to go on a looting mission. I may have promised not to steal again, but he clings to his mistrust so fiercely that I'd hate to disappoint him. I'd sold those stims to buy dinner, which had only annoyed Carth further. Would he rather starve? He was irritated - presumably because I hadn't told him about my hidden stash.

I was deeper in the alien quarter, a remote apartment block that was as rundown as ours. I was interested in credits, to once more fill my depleted purse. That's not the only reason. I'm trying to chase down a memory.

Picking locks, and sneaking through people's homes... felt familiar. Was I a street kid? A street kid with morals, perhaps, it didn't feel right to clean out a place out entirely. Just take a little bit, only what I need.

A street kid who'd fought in the Mandalorian Wars, and whose close friend wielded a lightsaber.

I needed to know... to know more. I wasn't Jen Sahara, and I couldn't be Evil Bitch. Maybe here, by doing what felt natural, I would uncover some further details.

The grubby apartment I was looting was deserted for the night, and I flicked on a bedside lamp. The place was stark and empty, with living quarters deeper in the room and a refresher to the right. I saw a stack of holovids in the corner, and a handful of plasteel chits. Silly sents leaving these here for the taking. I palmed them, turned towards the exit, and froze as the door swished open-

"Who are you? Thief!" an armoured Trandoshan yelled in Basic. He charged into the room, drawing a pair of vibroblades, and I only just had my 'sword raised in time. Behind him, two other thugs in combat armour were framed in the doorway.

Kath crap! I've been looting some Exchange jerk's hideout!

Knocking the man's knives to the side, I feinted left and sidestepped right, lunging towards his torso as I did so. He twisted back, and my blow glanced against his armour. One of his allies was flanking him, now, wielding a vicious-looking vibro-staff.

An icy sliver of desperation shuddered down my spine. Use the Force, you moron! I ducked and rolled to the right of them both, jabbing the second one in the leg. I felt his armour give as my blade cut deep. I don't know how! The thug screamed, wilding swinging the staff at me. It caught on my wounded shoulder, and I let out an involuntarily shriek, scrambling backwards.

Use the pain! I gritted my teeth, dropped a hand from the vibrosword to pull out a blaster, and shot the man in the face. Twice.

Another scream from him, this time his last.

A glancing pain scored against my hand, and my gun dropped to the floor in reaction. The third bastard shot me in the hand!

"You die now!" he yelled, pointing the gun at my head. The Trandoshan was still on my left, advancing with a fierce gleam of ferocity.

I'm not going down to this scum! Thoughts raged into a blistering storm, and something strong surged through me, uncontrolled. I could suddenly sense the environment around me as power, particles to be manipulated – and, once more, muscle memory reigned supreme. I snarled, and raised my wounded hand towards the first thug, and clenched it despite the pain.
I could feel him as he was raised off the floor, propelled into the air... right in front of the next blaster shot fired at me from the third man. These bugs dare to hurt me?

The Trandoshan gurgled in midair, and I mentally shoved. He was thrown backwards into the other man, so they both crashed to the floor, one on top of the other. I will not be stopped! No one can challenge me! The sheer power of ultimate rage tasted so sweet.

End it! I stalked up to the two bodies in the doorway, and viciously stabbed my blade into both. A cut-off scream from the body underneath. A sweet melody.

I looked up, and another shadow flickered across my consciousness, further down the public corridor. No one can escape me. The residential spectator was backpedaling away, futilely trying to escape. I ripped my vibrosword out of the prone corpses, and threw it down the hallway with inhuman speed. It hit the bystander with a thud, sinking deep into an unarmoured chest. He slowly crumpled.

An icy rush as the blazing power deserted me in a flash.

I ran to the body, fell to my knees, and clutched at his shoulders. He was a Rodian, clad in the tattered rags of an alien trying to survive the xenophobia of Upper Taris. Oh no, no, no... what have I done? His body convulsed once before stilling. Blank eyes stared up at me, accusing. Bright red blossomed against the blade that stuck out awkwardly from his chest. I've just murdered an innocent! Someone who was no threat! A noise in my throat. What have I become?

Numbness enveloped me. Distantly, I could feel a wet trail of shame edging down one cheek. There was anguish, lodged hard in my chest... but a thick cloud of detachment, too. What's another to my tally?

The empty eyes of the stranger still blamed me as burning bile rose in my throat. I fell backwards against the wall, dry-retching. What sort of monster am I?

I can't control this. I'm turning into something... repulsive, loathsome. I can't keep doing this. Funny how quiet Evil Bitch was all of a sudden. I didn't feel any glee at all, from any side of me.

I need help; I've got to turn somewhere. Before I slaughter anyone else.

I could use the Force again. Why this time, and not before?

I need help.

Dia told me to see a doctor.

Maybe the doctor who gave Onasi that kolto could help me.

I left my vibrosword where it was and scrabbled to my feet. Horror still pounded through my head. I was walking, stumbling, running... I didn't notice my surroundings, my thoughts were too rampant. Death. Do I bring death wherever I go?

xXx

Somehow, I stumbled into the medical facility a few hours before dawn, just as it was opening. A shifty looking individual stood by the entrance, waving me in with barely a second glance. Inside was a stark foyer lined with chairs, and a handful of closed doors that likely led to treatment rooms. A dark-skinned Human dressed in tidy white clothes was bent over a console. He looked up as I approached.

"Welcome. My name is Zelka Forn, and this is the Central Free Clinic," he greeted. "What can I do for you?"

The man was middle aged and greying. His face was lined, his gaze steady, and he somehow exuded a calming presence with his expression alone.

"Hi," I began.

"What do you need? Healing? Medical Supplies?" Zelka asked.

"Well, advice more than anything," I said.

"Of course," he murmured, tilting his head in acknowledgment. "What seems to be the problem?"

I'd tried to rehearse this in my head during the last hour. It hadn't helped. "I hit my head severely a few days ago, and ever since then I haven't been thinking straight."

Zelka peered at me through wizened eyes. "You may have concussion. Would you like me to examine you?"

"I don't think that's it," I replied. "I've been having some strong thoughts that are totally out of character, and I can't seem to control them."

"Can you elaborate on these thoughts?" he questioned. His bushy eyebrows raised as he continued to stare at me searchingly.

"Well, I'm usually a shy person," I lied. "But lately I've been having violent… urges. Like, someone's been rude to me, and I've had to restrain myself from pushing them." Pushing them. Yeah… nice euphemism. Let's not tell him about my murder pangs.

"I see," Zelka answered, and then looked at my hand. "Pushed someone recently, have you?"

I flushed. "Uh, a fight I couldn't get out of." A fight where I killed an innocent.

"Hmm." Zelka picked up a pot of salve and started seeing to my hand as he continued the conversation. "And you've been having these thoughts ever since you hit your head?"

"Yes," I replied, "and I really need to concentrate on what I'm doing right now, but my emotions keep making this difficult."

A frown creased the older man’s face as he cleaned my hand. I tried not to wince. "Can you recall the events leading up to your injury?"

"Well, not really. It's all hazy." Like the last year. "I woke up on the ground with my head split open. Everything’s been crazy since then."

Zelka was silent for a long time. "It could be your conscious self has forgotten something," he said slowly. Hah! And the prize goes to the good doctor! "Strong emotional outbursts after a head injury can be indicative of short-term amnesia. If some incident occurred that your conscious mind finds too traumatic to recall, your sub-conscious may have protected it as a defense mechanism. That could perhaps explain the emotional outbursts – your inner emotions manifesting in other ways. Are you sure your head injury was an accident?"

"Um, yeah." How would I know, if I can't remember it?

"Hmm." He didn't look convinced. "Well, I'm not a psychoanalyst. My advice would be to go to your family or loved ones, and spend some time recuperating there."

"I-I can't," I hedged, "not for awhile, anyway. I just need some advice on how to deal with this. I've tried controlling my emotions, but that doesn't seem to work."

"That's probably because you are battling rather than resolving them," he countered. "I would also suggest meditation as a method for calming your mind. There are many tutorials on the holonets that can help as a starting point if you do not know how."

I nodded. "Anything else?"

"If it's getting out of control I can prescribe you some medication, but the side effects are strong. Drowsiness, passivity, and reduced brain activity. I would not suggest taking it unless absolutely necessary."

No, I'd rather not. That sounds too much like the last half-year has been, scurrying around silently on the Endar Spire like a scared tach.

Zelka tapped his fingers on his desk. "Is there anything that brings you serenity? An activity that grants you peace of mind? Something you can focus on?"

I thought for awhile, struggling to remember what hobbies Jen liked. But would Jen's hobbies work for me? I sat down on the chair opposite Zelka, and closed my eyes.

Peace, serenity... what would make me feel like that? I took in a deep breath, and tried concentrating inwardly.

Focus on your breathing, a voice whispered. Focus on the Force all around you. A mild vertigo that was becoming all too familiar swept up from my gut and engulfed me.

…

I could see a wooden board in front of me, with figures of carved stone on different squares. They each had a different rune engraved on them, all indicating different tactics and specials that applied to each piece. It was a favourite pastime of mine, and certainly beat meditation. We’d brought the game from our homeworld, eschewing the more traditional dejarik in favour of it. Years ago, Freeflight had carved me a rudimentary set, back in the desolate alleys of the Western Underground.

The focus the game required forced all emotion from my head as I concentrated on pure on tactics.

I moved the Chandrilan Peace rune forward. It was seen as one of the weaker pieces, which was why so many often underestimated it.

"Match," I murmured, a smile curving on my face. A restlessness claimed me once more as my mind released the focus required to win the game.

"Nice move. You won’t catch me out that way again," a handsome young man sitting across from me said.
The scene faded, and the last thing I saw was the rueful grin lighting up the man's face as he stared at me affectionately.

...

I opened my eyes as the present flooded back in.

"And'zhai runes," I answered Zelka slowly. I remembered the name, but not the rules. I hoped I hadn't been sitting there too long. "It's a strategy game, similar to dejarik."

"I know neither game," Zelka said, "but strategy is a good focus for calming the mind. It is like a beast, you know. The mind can be trained. If such exercises bring you serenity, then I suggest focusing on them whenever you feel your emotions going out of control."

I nodded, but my mind was still whirling from the flashback. That was another glimpse of who I really am... and it's certainly not Jen or Evil Bitch. But the clues seemed contradictory in themselves... a street kid, who played tactical games and fought in wars, and whose best friend carried a lightsaber. How can any of that make sense?

"Got another rakghoul case," a different voice interrupted my reverie, and I glanced up to see the man from the entrance. "Some woman outside is begging you to look at her daughter in the Lower City. I don't know how she got past the Sith patrol."

"Rakghoul case? What's that?" I asked.

"It is a terrible affliction that has plagued Taris for many generations," Zelka replied. His voice was heavy. "It is spread by bites or scratches from rakghouls - beings who were once sentient, before the disease rotted most of their brain away. They live in the polluted Undercity, the open surface of Taris far beneath the great skyscrapers you see in the Upper City. We do not know how the disease first originated, but those infected mutate into rakghouls themselves, becoming no more than a wild beast attacking anything on sight."

Sounds like me, a forlorn voice whispered. "Is there no cure?" I whispered.

"Not a widely accessible one. I heard that a group of local scientists base here on Taris had perfected a vaccine, one that would stop the disease from taking root - and even halt its progression if caught in the early stages." A scowl formed on the Human's face. "Then the Sith imposed their quarantine. We have had a Sith presence on Taris for some years, but they had left academic institutions alone. Not any longer. They overran the laboratories, and now refuse access to anyone but their own forces. The Sith have copies of the prototype serum, but will not to distribute it. If I could just get my hands on a sample then the rakghoul disease could be wiped from the face of Taris forever!" Zelka declared in obvious passion. He sighed, then, the fierce emotion draining from his lined face. "But I don't see how that's going to happen."

I wanted to help this man. "Maybe I could find a way to get that serum for you." Jen, go away.

"I don't see how anyone could get their hands on it," he concluded, and his manner had returned to the brisk clinician of earlier. "The labs are crawling with Sith guards. Breaking in there would be tantamount to suicide. And now, I'd best see this lady waiting outside."

"Thank you for your advice, Zelka," I responded. "I appreciate it."

"I hope it helps. You can always come back if you are still having problems. There are a few hypnotic techniques we can try, but there are risks involved."
ypnosis? No thanks. I've already had someone screw with my mind.

Zelkalooked at me steadily. "I can sell you that medication if you think you may need it."

"It couldn't hurt. How much?" Always good to be prepared, I guess. The passive side-effects are slightly worrying... but you never know when drugs could come in handy. Zelka gave me a small bottle of meds, plus a few sedation hypoderms, for about half the credits I'd lifted that night.

Zelka nodded farewell to me, and walked away to greet his next patient.

I stood up, and stretched. Onasi's probably scared silly I've run off again. I should head back. But as I passed the assistant, he nudged me. It was about as subtle as a ferracrete brick.

"Psst! You there," he whispered loudly. "Wait a minute. I need to talk to you about the rakghoul serum. I've got an offer you might want to hear."

"An offer?" I quirked an eyebrow in question. There was a greasy sort of look about the man I didn't quite trust.

"Zelka isn't the only one who wants to get his hands on the rakghoul serum. The Exchange will pay you ten times what Zelka can afford if you get the cure."

"Um, no thanks," I mumbled, edging away. I don't want to start my raging thoughts going again!

"Don't be stupid!" He followed me, his voice insistent and grating. "We're talking a thousand creds here! Just remember, if you get your hands on that serum, take it to Zax at the Lower City bounty office. He can get you in touch with an Exchange agent."

I fled outside. But... a thousand credits? That'll be enough to get me a trip outta here after we rescue Flyboy's Jedi girlfriend. I recoiled. No! I know what the Exchange will do... they'll start selling it. To desperate people, for exorbitant prices. Zelka's the sort who'll do it for no profit. But I needed the creds... there was no denying that. What about the people suffering from the disease? Most of them will be screwed by the Exchange, unless they're rich! My thoughts swirled dangerously... rage and need and empathy crashing together in a nauseating vortex.

I swallowed as Zelka's advice came to mind. With a wrench, I strained to concentrate on a single And'zhai piece. All those rune stones in different places. I couldn't remember how to play, but I could sense the tactical possibilities, the calm concentration needed.

The anger and the fear slowly dissipated, like smoke dispersing into the wind. Serenity.

Wow, that actually worked.

Yet, as I walked away, I realized that a thousand credits had its' own allure.

xXx
She's gone again. I frowned, and tried to concentrate on blaster I was repairing. The thermal battery was completely shot, so I was busy pulling apart our spare to get a replacement.

I wasn’t sure if I should worry or not. Jen was obviously still affected by her head injury; there were enough times I’d caught a blank, almost dizzy look on her face. And she’d fainted in the middle of Taris with no warning at all. Part of me felt like she needed to be tucked up in a medical bed, recuperating – and yet, it was due to her that we now knew where Bastila was.

It was due to her that we’d even made it to the Lower City.

I wished I'd heard that conversation. Jen had sweet-talked her way past the turbo-lift guard quicker than she'd lost the credits in Javyar's cantina. It'd been verging on the ridiculous for me to suggest it had anything to do with the Force… but I found it hard to believe Jen could be charismatic enough to make a Sith soldier look the other way. These guys were meant to stop unauthorised traffic – traffic, that might be Republic fugitives in disguise. Maybe I’m not giving Jen’s charm enough credit. Or maybe she has a secret stash of money put aside, earmarked especially for bribing corrupt enemy soldiers. After all, she’d kept those extra stims quiet from me. But… surely, the amount required to make a Sith look the other way had to be obscene, considering they’d be court-martialed for that sort of infringement.

The Republic Navy didn’t look too kindly on bribery and corruption – I highly doubted the Sith Military was any more lenient.

Our situation was about as capricious as Jen’s temperament. We were flat broke, but with unrestricted access to all of Taris. We knew where Bastila was – but first we had to break into a heavily guarded gang base. And follow that up with winning a local swoop contest.

As a boy, I used to race swoops on an underground track. I’d been particularly mediocre at it. Turns out that swoop skills aren’t quite the same as piloting, thank the stars.

The door swished open, and my hand tightened on the disassembled blaster.

"Oh, you're awake," Jen commented as she swept into the room. The relief that hit me was mingled with annoyance.

"Yes," I responded bitingly. "I take it you don't believe in sleep?"

"Are you getting testy again?" A small smile curved her lips, but it didn't look genuine. She walked in further and sat down on the unmade bed. I strongly doubted just how invested she was in our mission. Stop thinking about it, Onasi. She’s here and we have an objective. Things aren’t hopeless.

"I don't get testy, I get angry," I returned, "and if I was angry, you wouldn't need to ask me."
"Fine!" She threw her hands up in mock defeat, and I noticed one was bandaged. My eyes narrowed.

"Have you been in another fight?" I demanded. A dull red colour suffused her face. Let me guess, she’s been out 'acquiring' things again.

"I don't want to talk about it," Jen answered in a cool voice.

"Fine!" I parroted her sarcastically. Why am I so grumpy? Maybe I was being unreasonable, too. We only had each other to rely on, and despite her recklessness and unreasonably short temper, we had made a surprising amount of progress. And a lot of it was due to her.

I sighed, and Jen echoed me. She looked tired. “Shall we just get on with things?” she asked.

I nodded and reassembled my gun. “Okay, so let’s aim to get down to the Undercity today. The lift we’ve been using down to the lower levels goes quite deep; hopefully we won’t need to descend much further. I downloaded a public map when we first landed – it’s incomplete, but I’ve found a couple of routes I think go all the way down.”

I sat down next to her after retrieving my personal datapad. It wasn’t easy making sense of the warrens of turbo-lifts that interconnected Taris, particularly not on a small, two-dimensional screen. If only we had a holo-map reader. It didn’t seem to be an issue for Jen, though, who’d nabbed the datapad five minutes in, and was scrolling through it like a navigational expert.

She shot me a frown. “Why didn’t you show this to me earlier? Y’know, when we were hunting for turbo-lifts the other day?”

“I- uh, well, our main purpose was to find an unguarded lift, if you recall.” I hadn’t actually noticed the holo-map until this morning, when I trawled through the informational package Zelka had downloaded for me days ago. It was an embarrassing oversight.

Jen had a disbelieving look on her face, but turned back to the map for several minutes of silence. Finally she sighed, looking up at me once more. Her green eyes were serious.

“There’s lots of black spots riddled through the lower levels. Some are marked as condemned buildings – usually filled with permacrete to grant additional support to the higher levels. But there’s other places the maps don’t cover. And there’s almost nothing on the surface. The true surface, I mean.”

“They call it the Outside,” I said quietly. “Vast areas of polluted space underneath all of Taris. That’s where the rakghouls are.” I’d never heard of a disease both so debilitating and quick to infect others. I had a hard time believing every horror accredited to these rakghouls, but it was obvious we’d be best to avoid them.

“I heard about them,” she whispered.

“We only need to find a way to the sewers,” I reminded her. “Can we get there without encountering these rakghouls?”

She traced a finger over the datapad. Looking over, I saw her turning various filters on and off the map. “Effluent tubes all travel down to the sewers, but they’re too small for sentients our size. I don’t think the ducting’s connected in any meaningful way – well, if it is, it’s not charted. According to this map – which is incomplete in many areas – the only way is via the Outside. There is a small outpost next to a turbo-lift though - check this out.”
A habitation marker on the Undercity level blinked at me. I looked over to Jen, and saw resolution fire in her eyes. The side of her mouth quirked.

“That’s where we start, Flyboy. See if they’ve encountered Mission.”

Finding our way to the Undercity habitat and questioning the locals made sense. It was entirely possible that Mission Vao had gone back to the Bek base or elsewhere by now, but scoping out the area down below was a good starting point. I felt a renewed purpose, and stood, ready to get going.

Jen didn't follow. I looked back, remembering she'd been out for at least part of the night, and felt a mingled sense of irritation and concern. There were deep lines of exhaustion on her face.

"Are you ready to go?" I prompted. "Is... is something wrong?"

“It’s just-” she sighed, before turning a scowl on me. “You said a lot of things about me didn’t add up. But I know next to nothing about you – or even about Bastila. You know, the Jedi we’re risking our necks for daily.”

“She’s our commanding officer, Jen,” I said warningly.

Jen was the last person I'd call cowardly, after seeing her in battle – yet here she was, once more talking herself out of her debt to me.

“Exactly!” she exclaimed. “And she’s young, right? How is it a young Jedi Knight was in command of a Republic cruiser? Does that make any sense?”

“Padawan,” I corrected, and then kicked myself for it.

Jen choked. “Excuse me? You've got to be frelling joking…”

I winced, and shook my head. “Afraid not. Look, I don’t have all the answers. Republic HQ and the Jedi Order work together sometimes, particularly on the more sensitive missions. Bastila was in the company of several knights and one master. I think her command was a token gesture rather than a real one, but regardless – we were there to obey the directive of the Jedi.”

She looked at me like I'd grown two heads, still muttering padawan under her breath. I sighed. "Look, Jen, even you can't deny how significant her battle meditation is to the war effort. Combine that with her fame since her strike team killed Darth Revan a year ago, and you can see why she was the popular choice to lead the Endar Spire.”

In truth, Jen's reaction had been similar to mine, when I'd first heard about the insane directive that put the young Jedi hero in command. Bastila Shan – for all her reputation – was inexperienced at leading troops. And while it'd been the Cerean Jedi Master accompanying her who'd made the decisions, just the fact that Bastila held the authority on a technicality was enough ridiculous and dangerous.

It just made no blasted sense.

Jen was grimacing, clutching at the side of her head. The head injury had been a severe one, for all that it was no longer noticeable through her dark curly mop. It must be healing well. At least, Jen's barely made a peep about it. I couldn't deny that Jen Sahara was one tough customer - especially for an academic.

There was a dazed look on her face. “Battle meditation?” Jen asked weakly.

At once I felt a surge of anger at her obvious deception. There was no one alive who worked for the Jedi Order and didn’t know about Bastila’s rare Force gift that boosted morale and improved the reflexes of entire armies. They said it’d been a lost Jedi art, forgotten through the ages until Nomi Sunrider had manifested the ability. Nomi Sunrider was a hero of the previous generation and long gone now – and Bastila was, apparently, even stronger. Her remarkable psychic prowess had helped the Republic score a few key victories in the devastating war we were slowly losing.

Jen was staring at me, an uneasy look on her face. Suddenly, I wondered if she truly didn’t know, even though that didn’t seem remotely possible.

She stood before I could say anything, her expression dropping once more a composed mask. “Let’s get some breakfast first,” she murmured.

I nodded, retrieving my two working blasters, and eyed her over. “Where’s your vibrosword?”

Jen paled. "I lost it," she muttered. I immediately felt suspicious. How can you lose a vibrosword? I sighed. I probably don’t want to know.

"Grab the spare one." I pointed at the blade she had lifted from her first looting mission. The grenades were still sitting in a spare satchel. "And Jen-" I paused, as her wary eyes met mine. "Uh, the rakghouls are pretty dangerous in the Undercity, you know."

Her expression was derisive. "Yes. I know."

"What I mean, uh, is that you should, well, be a little more careful." I felt awkward, stammering like an idiot – but her penchant for running head-first into battle bordered on the suicidal.

"I'll try." She smiled falsely at me, and I felt my ire returning.

"Look, all I'm trying to say is, use a blaster would you?" I snapped. She's going to get bitten, I know it. And if what they say is true, then it only takes one bite and you're infected. It was hard to separate fact from fiction, but I did have faith in what the doctor had told me. There was no readily available cure. Stang, if only I could check out the Undercity by myself!

Jen had closed her eyes, and was taking in a deep, audible breath.

"Are you trying to control your temper?" I asked, my irritation warping into something close to amusement.

"Yes, actually. I thought you wouldn't appreciate me cutting your head off, but do let me know if I'm wrong," she snapped.

*Well, there went my sense of humour. *Look, let’s just get going, alright?”

After a pointedly silent breakfast we headed back down to Lower Taris. I certainly wasn't in the mood to converse, and so far Jen was following suit. Of course, the chances of Jen staying silent longer than ten minutes were considerably lower than that of winning a Hutt’s lottery, but one could always hope.

"Carth, can I ask you some questions?" she asked as we walked down the Lower City corridors.

I struggled not to groan. "Oh? You want to argue some more, is that it?"

"I'm always up for a good fight," she quipped.

I laughed despite myself. Damn woman. I actually couldn’t remember the last time I’d laughed. I glanced at her, and saw that mischievous twist to her mouth I was almost becoming fond of. Her eyes still had a bleak cast to them, despite the humour dancing there. I wondered what had happened to her last night. "I suppose a few questions can't hurt. What is it?"

"Well," she began, "I was just wondering if you knew about the ruins that the Jedi onboard the Endar Spire were investigating."

She was the one hired by the Jedi Order, not me! I frowned at her. "I'm sure you'd know more about their quest than I."

She avoided my gaze. "I know they were looking at ruins, which was why they hired me. But they refused to tell me anything about them in advance. Confidentiality clauses, and all that."

"Jen, I was onboard as an advisor to the navi-pilots. The Jedi certainly didn't tell me anything I didn't need to know. They like to be mysterious." I couldn't quite stop the bitterness from reaching my voice.

She arched an eyebrow at me. "You really don't like the Jedi much, do you?"

I shrugged, in what I hoped was dismissal of the subject. What self-respecting Republic soldier does like the Jedi? For all that they're on our side, they have this nasty habit of sweeping in where they're not wanted, and up-ending everybody's carefully worked-out battle plans. Oh, and keeping you in the dark. "I don't dislike them. I just don't particularly trust them much."

"You don't trust anyone much," she muttered.

"I have my reasons." I frowned at her from under lowered brows. "Look, I'm not overly fond of the Jedi because I've seen firsthand just what damage they can do."

"Damage? Jedi?" She sounded incredulous.

"Have you never heard of the Dark Side?" I said impatiently.

"Oh, you mean the Sith."

"Yes, and most of them used to be Jedi." I sighed. "I fought in the Mandalorian wars, under Revan and Malak. They were heroes. No one expected them to turn on us the way they did. Think about it... if you can't even trust the best of the Jedi, who can you trust?"

Her bright green eyes clouded with a faraway look, and once more we lapsed into silence.

xXx

The trip to the Undercity was fairly uneventful, and quicker than I’d expected. Other than two gang brawls – both of which we’d heard in advance, and managed to deftly avoid – we were able to navigate the maze of dilapidated tunnels and grinding turbo-lifts with surprising ease. Jen’s chosen route was both efficient and successful, despite her misgivings about the accuracy of the map.

The Sith guards we encountered let us pass without any comment, validating the authorisation papers Gadon had granted us. I’d wondered about their authenticity, until Jen had pointed out - with a political astuteness unusual for a scholar - that behind the scenes, the Sith and the gangs probably worked together to control the population flow. If that was true, then it explained how Gadon Thek could so readily gift strangers with the ability to traverse the full depth of Taris. Jen also commented that the Exchange likely had the same freedom.
I really did not like Taris.

The lower we descended, the less guarded the lifts were. Some were deserted, some no longer operational, and one was surrounded by a handful of Vulkars. It hadn't taken Jen long to backtrack and find another route. She seemed at ease in this environment, which led me to wonder if her service records were missing part of her history. Reconciling this operation with her years spent in an academic institution was difficult at best.

The map only showed one lift that hit the Undercity – right next to the small community Jen had pointed out. The lights in the elevator had long gone, and I was thankful for the small light rods we’d obtained from Kebla’s shop the previous day.

When we finally hit rock bottom and the buckled durasteel doors grated open, the smell hit my senses before anything else. Ugh, people live in this stench? I supposed they had no choice, I’d heard that the gangs forced the homeless down here permanently.

The scene was frankly dismal. Small shacks made out of rubble – mostly broken bits of plasteel and durasteel – lined the open courtyard. A few shuffling sentients lumbered about, the denizens of this bleak world. Everything was bathed in a grimy brown light, which was probably the only version of sunshine that reached this shadowy corner of Taris.

"You there! Upworlder!" A man dressed in filthy rags stumbled towards us. "Anyone using this elevator has to pay the toll!"

"I don't believe this planet!" I muttered incredulously, deactivating my light rod. I heard Jen stifle a laugh. "Look, we don't have any credits." Unless, of course, Jen lifted some during the night.

A second drifter joined the first. "You're lying, you're an upworlder! It's our elevator, if you use it you've got to give us something!" They didn't look at all threatening, being empty-handed, gaunt and obviously desperate. And yet, I wondered at their bravado, knowing that the Sith would have already been down here to search for escape pods. I bet they didn’t tell the Sith it was their elevator.

Jen stepped up beside me, lifted her blaster, and declared loudly, "get out of here you filthy beggars, or I’ll use my blaster to end your suffering permanently!"

The beggars squawked, clutched at each other, and ran.

I stared at Jen in shock. "What, picking on the homeless now?" Is she angry again? But no, she seemed to be composed. I felt my mood coalesce into disbelief – though frankly, nothing Jen could do these days should surprise me anymore.

"Hey, I was using the blaster, isn't that what you wanted?" She quirked a brow at me, but her expression turned sheepish under my glare. "To be honest, we don't really have credits to give them. They would have stuck around harassing us if I hadn't threatened them."

"Uh huh," I responded suspiciously. Sometimes, when it came to Jen, it was really hard to know what to believe.

I turned my attention back to the Undercity. Most of the inhabitants were content to leave us be, staring warily from a distance - possibly after witnessing two beggars flee from us as if their lives depended on it. One young woman was bold enough to approach, and let slip a little about the area.

We were far from the only visitors here, she informed us. In fact, the Undercity seemed a meeting place for all the sorts of people I wanted to avoid. Exchange mercenaries. Vulkars on a looting mission. Oh, and let’s not forget the Sith. But as for an adolescent Twi’lek and an overgrown Wookiee, no. The young woman knew them, though - which at least spoke of Mission’s notoriety if nothing else.

I thanked the girl absently, and wandered through the ramshackle village with Jen at my heels. The place was surrounded by titasteel gates to keep the rakghouls out and grant the hopeless dwellers some semblance of safety. Presumably there were other camps scattered around the place, and the idea of being forced to live in such filth and darkness made me pity all the dwellers down here.

We were stopped briefly by a shaky old man, who latched onto Jen with a crazed expression on his wrinkled face, proclaiming her loudly to be the encampment's saviour. I bit back a chuckle at Jen's embarrassment. The nearby residents were watching the proceedings with a knowing look – obviously, this colourful character made a habit of gushing over outsiders.

Jen scowled at me when she finally managed to shake the old coot loose – I did my best to hide a grin, but judging by her glare I wasn't successful. She stomped off in the direction of the outpost's leader.

After a brief conversation, we found that he had seen Mission Vao. Late last night, but she hadn't yet returned through the locked gates. Jen and I looked at each other, both silently wondering the same thing: was the young Twi'lek stuck out there somewhere? Or did she know of another way out of the Undercity?

Considering the kid’s apparent resourcefulness, I suspected the latter.

Jen started stalking towards the high barricade that encircled the habitation, making a beeline for the guard. The gate had to be at least ten feet high, made of a resilient looking mesh that connected to titasteel pillars spaced no more than two metres apart. The gate was reinforced with additional durasteel beams, but we could see through the mesh. Beyond lay a murky, desolate nothingness. Jen can't seriously be thinking of going out there yet, can she? I strode to catch up.

"What are you doing, Jen?” I asked. “We’re not going out there, not until we find Mission-"

A scream from beyond the gates caught our attention - and that of the guard.

“Let me in! Please, there’s no ‘ghouls around!” a young girl’s voice came from the darkness beyond. The ambient brownish light didn’t extend far, and through the gates we saw a figure emerge at breakneck speed, running directly towards the gate guard.

He held up a blaster, scanning the area competently before quickly opening the gates.

My mouth dropped open as I recognized the form of Mission Vao herself. How coincidentally fortuitous. The girl was frantic; even as the gates closed behind her, she’d turned, scanning hopelessly back into the depths of the Outside.

Her hands were empty, clenched tight at her sides. Her headtails were flicking around her shoulders in distress, and a utility belt hung askew from her waist. Where’s her Wookiee friend?

“Mission!” Jen called, and the Twi’lek spun around, her eyes lighting on us in desperation.

“Jen! I remember you two!” she gasped, and ran towards us. This close I could see the fear in her eyes. “Please, say you’ll help me!”

“What happened?” I asked in concern. Her face crumpled.
“They took him!” she sobbed. “They took us, but I managed to escape. I can’t leave him there, but the Bek’s won’t come to the Undercity. Not even for me. Please – you two know how to fight – please help me!”

A loaded look passed between me and Jen, before we both turned back to face Mission.

"Whoa, slow down, Mission," Jen said in a calming voice. "What’s wrong?"

The Twi’lek hiccupped, and her bright eyes filled with tears. "It’s Zaalbar. It’s all my fault. I hassled him to go into the sewers again – we’ve been fine there before, but my ‘scanner was playing up and we didn’t spot them. Please – I’ll pay you – we’ve got to go back for him. Those ronto-turds will sell him into slavery – or worse!"

"Mission," I said slowly. "Deep breaths. We need detail here. Who took him?"

She sniffled. "Gamorreans. I’ve seen them before in the lower levels, but never in the sewers. Maybe the stink reminds them of home – I dunno. They caught us both – they’re slave hunters, probably running a trade through the Vulkar base or something – but we have to hurry! Please!"

"Of course we’ll help you, Mission," Jen soothed. She glanced back at me. "We actually need your help in return."

I tensed; Gamorreans were tough and mean - tusked humanoid creatures that were often hired as brutes for the Exchange or anyone with enough credits. But they were also notoriously thick and slow. Our advantage would be to catch them from a distance. This could be exactly what we need. Luck or chance, this is a surefire way to win Mission’s aid.

"You’ll help me?" Mission’s eyes were now shining with hope. She sniffed, and turned back to the guard. "Great!" she called over her shoulder. "Thank you! Let’s go!"

Jen made to follow. Part of me didn't like how quick the two of them were ready to jump straight into danger - without a plan, without preparations, with barely a discussion of our destination. Although, if it was my friend, I'd be racing back too. And the longer we take, the more chance the Wookiee gets moved.

"Jen, wait a minute," I called. "Look, before we head out – I need to say something."

Jen turned back to me wearing a frown of impatience. Mission was all but tapping her foot, panic and hope vying for dominance on her young face.

"It's just, uh, what I said earlier today," I muttered. "The rakghouls sound pretty crazy. Almost as crazy as you, heh." I coughed as her frown deepened. "Look, I just get this feeling you're going to get bitten by one. Just- just try to be careful? For my sake?"

Her face smoothed before transforming into a saccharine smile. "Aw, Flyboy, I didn't know you felt that way." She stalked away, motioned to the guard, and strode out of the gates with Mission at her heels - leaving me staring at her departing back.

"Argh!" I groaned in frustration, and followed her out. "Damn fool woman!"

The gates squeaked as they shut behind us. Jen stopped, lifting her blaster while she canvassed the area. As I stepped to her side, she threw a grin at me, but it looked forced. Just like it had all day. Something’s been bothering her since last night.

I held my blaster defensively, visually searching the barren landscape. No rakghouls in sight, just darkness and rubble. "Where did you go last night, Jen?"

"I don't want to talk about it," she responded, an echo of this morning’s conversation. Mission was looking between the two of us apprehensively.

"Did you go on a looting mission again?" I persisted.

"Is this really the time?" she asked in a sardonic tone, her eyes still darting at the shadows that encompassed us.

"I-uh, well—" Probably not, I realized in embarrassment.

"Okay, yes," she said shortly. "Yes, I did. Yes, I broke my promise, and yes, we have more credits. Oh, and no, I don't want to talk about it."

I guess I deserved that. The Twi’lek looked uncomfortable, and I noticed she was still empty-handed. I turned my attention to her.

"Mission, do you have a weapon?" I asked quietly.

She shook her head, her lekku curling around her neck defensively. "The Gamorreans stripped us clean. They left my belt — although they emptied it first. But at least I still got that." She fiddled with it and I heard an unfamiliar click. Suddenly Mission’s figure blurred, encased by a reflective shield that almost hid her from sight.

Jen blinked in surprise. "Stealth fold generator," she said in awe, echoing my disbelief. "Those are rare, Mission. How’d you get your hands on one of those?"

A click and Mission reappeared in solid colour. She had a faint grin on her face as I turned my attention back to the surroundings. "It helps to be friends with a gang leader. There's not many of these around, but they're useful in the Undercity. The rakghouls can't see me when it's on."

Stealth fold technology was still emerging, and only useful in low light as it was glaringly easy to spot the blurry outline of a stealthed person. Possibly that was why stealth belts hadn’t really taken off on the open market – it’s benefits were limited, and the wearer had to move slowly to stop the field from being disrupted.

"The rakghouls must have poor visibility then," Jen was murmuring. "That’s good to know."

"Take a blaster, kid." I handed one to Mission. She was quick to grab it, even as her face contorted into a hot glare.

"I ain’t a kid!" Mission snapped.

"Sorry," I muttered, struggling not to roll my eyes. Note to self: don't call the kid a kid. Although, to be fair, she probably felt like I was talking down to her – something I'd detested as a kid, myself. "Do you know how to use a blaster?"

She nodded, the annoyance vanishing from her face. "Yeah, but we relied on our bio-scanners to stay out of trouble. You guys have ‘scanners, right?"

"Uh, no," Jen admitted. "So you need to lead us quickly to the sewers. Can you do that?"

At the girl’s nod we headed out, leaving the safety of the gates well behind us.

The Undercity smelled like burnt rubbish and rotting flesh, a rancid sort of stench that reminded me sharply of past battles. I'd fought in the Mandalorian Wars, but usually in the skies, behind the safety of a swift snubfighter's guns. I'd been good at it, damn good, but there'd been a few occasions when I'd been involved in ground battles.

They were nastier and bloodier. Deaths were more personal when one had to raise a gun and shoot the enemy in the face. And I found, as we walked along, that cauterized flesh and burning machinery smelled an awful lot like the Outside of Taris.

Jen and I flanked Mission, guns drawn as we strode through the desolate environment. The ground was a hard-packed clay, littered with broken slabs of permacrete and fallen titasteel cables. I'd heard that sometimes parts of Taris would collapse, creating sinkholes in amongst the mid-levels of the ecumenopolis, causing carnage for whatever inhabitants were in close proximity. The great Tarisian machine would plow on, rebuilding over the rubble in a piecemeal fashion.

"You said you wanted my help?" Mission whispered at one stage, leading us past a towering pile of plasticeel off-cuts. On her face was a fragile look of hope that was almost heartbreaking to see. She is just a kid, no matter that she hates the label. A kid who is racing into danger to rescue her friend.

If nothing else, this Mission had guts – but it would've been nice to acquire her help without charging down a bunch of slavers.

"Yeah," Jen responded. "Gadon said you'd help me get inside the Vulkar base."

"The Vulkar base?" Mission's lekku twitched. "You're going there? Cool! Sure, I can help. Big Z and me both, once you get him out of the sewers."

Cool? Cool?! I stared at the girl in dawning horror. She's going to get on well with Jen. Far too well, I suspect.

A shout up ahead had us all tensing in readiness; we stopped, blasters aimed, as a company of men slowly materialized from the brown gloom. As it became obvious they weren't rakghouls, Jen and I slowly lowered our weapons. Mission was still clutching hers awkwardly until I nudged her.

When the closest stranger came into range, he raised a rifle and called out to us in a nervous voice.

"Don't... don't move! I'm... I'm not afraid to use this blaster if I have to!"

An armoured man from further behind strode up next to him, laying a cautionary hand on his arm. "Settle down, kid," he said gruffly, in a thick accent I knew all too well. Mandalorian. An instinctive feeling of dislike wedged itself in my gut. I had to remind myself that that particular war was now over.

The Mandalorian turned to face us, eyed us up and down, and dismissed us with a glance. "By the looks of you I'd say you're down here for the same reason we are: to salvage something from those downed Republic space pods. Let me give you some advice: forget about it. Do yourself a favour and just head back the way you came." He issued it like a command. Heh, that's going to annoy Jen. But as I looked at her, a strange expression crossed over her face.

She said something back to the leader, something foreign and incomprehensible – but the sounds were all too familiar. She can speak Mandalorian? A sharp look of surprise crossed the weather-beaten face of the lead merc. He snapped something back at her in the same tongue.

They’re having a conversation. Jen’s having a blasted conversation in Mandalorian!

I’d caught enough phrases during the war to recognize a battle greeting of sorts, followed by the man introducing himself as Canderous – but the rest was an unintelligible garble. The man gave Jen an almost respectful nod which she returned, before calling the rest of the mercs to follow him as he strode briskly away.

"Wow, he looked pretty tough!" Mission whispered as the group disappeared from view. “Did he say anything interesting?"

"Hang on, sister," I said waringly as Jen started moving away. "You can speak Mandalorian?"

"Well, um, I learnt languages when I was studying," she muttered.

"I thought you studied archaeology," I countered. I could feel myself frowning.

"Cool, did ya go to a university or something?" Mission cut in. "Where you from, Jen?"

Jen looked at me blandly, and turned to answer Mission instead. "A planet called Deralia. I studied mostly archaeology, anthropology, and languages."

And languages? Now why does it sound like she tacked that on to the end for my benefit?

"But Mandalorian?" I muttered skeptically. I've had my doubts whether she's loyal to the Republic before. This just seems to confirm it.

"Hey, is that an escape pod?" Jen pointed further ahead. As a way to stop my questions, it was pretty effective. And true, too - a cone shape was embedded deep into the ground from the direction that Canderous' group had emerged. That caught my attention, and I mentally let the conversation go. Why Jen could speak Mandalorian was something I'd find out later – for now, I decided, I'd best just keep my mind on our surroundings.

"Let's go have a quick look," I said.

The cockpit of the escape pod was mostly intact, door included, but the remainder was a pile of twisted metal and scorch marks. We searched through the rubble only to find it had already been stripped clean.

Mission started poking about in it curiously, but Jen was keeping watch, eyes tight on the environment.

"There's something up ahead," Jen muttered, going rigid. My eyes snapped up, and I could see three lumbering figures heading towards us. Rakghouls. That must be rakghouls. My gut clenched, my muscles tensed, and my blaster raised into the air.

Mission squeaked and, with a click, transformed into a fuzzy blur. I stepped next to Jen, weapons primed and targets sighted, and fired when the first was in range.

Although slow and easily staggered by a blaster bolt, the mutants were resilient and required multiple shots before they fell. They're tough. Without armour, a single blaster hit to the torso would down most sentients. Tougher than I expected. Jen and I fired in unison, and the second one dropped about ten paces away from us. Damn, they must have a weakness. I squinted, and steadied my aim. This one's going down, I thought determinedly as it lurched closer.

The wind was knocked from my lungs as something slammed into my side, knocking me to the ground. Mission screamed. What the...? I struggled to move, but a heavy weight pinned me, snarling. A fourth rakghoul? I'd been concentrating so fiercely on my aim that I'd been caught unawares, I realized in self-disgust.
I grunted, twisted my arm free and shot it in the head, just as its teeth dug into my shoulder. Red hot pain lanced through my side, and I heard it shriek from the blaster wound. It swiped its claws through my armour, and bit down on my other arm. One shot in the head is not enough? I screamed as its jaw clamped down a third time on my arm, and the smell of rotting flesh invaded my senses. Blood filled my eyes, and with a desperate grunt I rammed my blaster into the growling mass of fur, firing again and again. What does it take for these things to die?

The weight was lifted off me and I gasped, opening eyes to see Jen. Her face was pinched was obvious fear. And worry. Hah. She’s worried — about me, of all people. Dull horror pounded through my head as I abruptly understood why she was so worried. I've got the rakghoul disease, I thought numbly. I’m a dead man.

"This is bad, Republic!" she muttered, trying to drag me up into a sitting position. A sudden pain sheared through my arm. I glanced down; the bites left ragged wounds that were bleeding hot red liquid over my limb.

My vision blurred and my shoulder throbbed. My fingertips prickled with numbness. "Don't call me that," I said through clenched teeth.

"Mission – how long does it take for someone to transform?" Jen demanded.

"Um, I dunno! A day, maybe. But he’s been bitten heaps, Jen! It'll be, like, way less time!" Mission’s voice was shaken, scared. "There's no way to stop the rakghoul disease!"

Poetic justice. I was so certain Jen would be the one to get into trouble.

"You've got to go," I rasped. This is the end. Horror curled in my stomach. Those rakghouls had been vicious, mindless beasts. Agony was burning in my shoulder, and I imagined the venom slowly circulating through my system, a ticking countdown until death. Worse than that. I could kill Jen and Mission. "I might transform. You need to go!"

"Sith patrols carry the serum," Jen told me. Serum? I haven't heard about any cure for the disease. Jen was crouching next to me, pulling apart one of Kebla’s medpacs before hurriedly dressing my arm and shoulder. I couldn’t hold back a grunt of pain. “This ‘pac only has that cheap gree-bacta salve,” she muttered. “We’ll get you more kolto in the Upper City.”

“Jen.” My good arm raised outward, stopping her ministrations. Serious green eyes met mine in the faint glow of Mission’s light rod. “We don’t know how long I have. I—” I shook my head, and pushed her away gently, clambering to my feet. A sudden surge of dizziness had me stumbling back to the ground.

Pain stabbed deep into my shoulder, and I groaned, vaguely aware that Jen was wrapping something against my arm again. The ground was rocky and uneven underneath me. “You should shoot me,” I mumbled. I'm going to transform into one of those monsters. No!

I felt my eyes closing, and my entire limb was throbbing a painful ache with every beat of my heart. Pushing the disease deeper and deeper into my body. I thought we’d been doing so well, too. Should have known it would go belly up. ”I'll kill you, if I transform. End it, before I kill you!”

Funny, I always thought my end would be on the frontlines. With enemy snubs in the viewport, firing on as many as I could, while some black-hearted bastard got a lucky shot on me—

“Onasi, get up,” Jen snapped, one arm underneath me and the other pulling on my good side. “Stop being such a baby.”
What? Outrage at her unjust name-calling had me glaring at her. "Baby?" I spluttered, struggling to my feet as she yanked me upright. My good arm tingled. My bad arm burned.

But Jen wasn't looking at me - she was staring at the escape pod, her jaw set with determination. She gave me a push forward, and pain blossomed down my side as I stumbled, only staying upright because most of my weight was leaning on her. I wasn't... I wasn't quite sure exactly how badly I'd been hurt, but I didn't think mere flesh wounds should be this debilitating.

_I've got the rakghoul disease. I'm a dead man._

“What are you doing?” Mission squeaked.

I half-walked, half-staggered as Jen continued to propel me forward. I only understood her intent when she motioned Mission to open the hatch.

“Can you get in by yourself?” Jen asked, gesturing to the escape pod with the hand that wasn't holding me upright.

It wasn't a bad idea... but the hatch door wouldn't keep me contained forever.

“If I turn, this won’t keep me,” I said quietly, my hands resting on the cool durasteel of the _Endar Spire’s_ escape pod. With a grunt and a grimace, I clambered inside. By the time I was seated, I’d broken into a sweat and was shaking from the throbbing of my shoulder. _Is that a fever setting in?_

No, surely that was paranoia. It couldn’t happen that fast.

“We’ve got some time, Flyboy,” Jen said seriously. “I’ll get that serum. Hold on, okay?”

"Just make sure you find Bastila,” I said weakly. My fingers felt numb and prickly. Fuzziness was drawing in around the edges of my vision. _Bastila's the only hope left for the Republic. I can't really trust Jen to go after her, but I have no other choice._

"I'll rescue her, I promise." Her voice was soft.

"Heh, like you promised not to steal again?" I joked feebly.

I closed my eyes again, and heard the door shut manually above me.

xXx
Panic was gnawing at the edges of my control. I strode away from the crash site, eyes searching dark corners and darker courtyards up ahead.

"You locked him in the escape pod?" Mission squeaked behind me. I was glad she'd joined us, somehow her presence made it easier for me to stay calm. She follows me for now; I must be strong. While the focusing trick Zelka suggested had helped, it only subdued my inner turmoil. The rogue emotions were still there, deep in a distant corner of my mind; a mingled fear and fury I could ignore but not entirely forget.

"Seemed like a good idea. He doesn't have time for us to move him to a safer place."

The entire Undercity felt like it had a presence all of its own. Dark, cloying, decaying. If I hadn't seen Zelka last night, I would be mad by now. I tried to shrug off that thought. I must stay rational. Onasi needs me, Mission needs me. When did I become the strong one? Jen was the very antithesis of strength, whereas Evil Bitch... well, it was obvious she used terror as her strength.

It's the real me again, isn't it? The flashback I'd had earlier was about more than just a game. I'd elevated my psyche to a detached state, where my entire focus was on the puzzle unfolding in front of me, allowing no peripheral thoughts or emotional distractions to filter through. That's a Force trick. Somehow, I was sure of that. Was I some sort of trainee Jedi? I'd thought I'd been a street kid. Maybe I had. Maybe that boy taught me how to use the Force.

But the last few times I'd touched it I'd lost control. It was hard to ignore the power out there, all around me. At times, it felt like it wanted to be used.

Jen's voice was quieter now. Ever since the ambush on the Endar Spire, it seemed like her core personality was no more than a fading whisper in my mind, a nexus of thoughts and feelings slowly dispersing into shadows. In her place, I had grown in strength and dominance. As had Evil Bitch.

And yet, Jen's childhood memories were still there. Daydreams of quietly teaching ancient archaeology to eager students, and living out a peaceful existence amongst rural farmland. Some of her studies had actually been fascinating, in particular her research on civilizations that pre-dated Republic times.

Yet... Jen wasn't an expert. There was no logical explanation for the Jedi to specifically request only her along for a secret expedition. Headed by Bastila Shan, a key Jedi involved in the Republic war effort. I'd forgotten those details about Bastila, until Carth had dropped them like a thermal detonator earlier. Battle meditation. Her defeat of Darth Revan. Sharp pain had stabbed deep into my temple when he'd said the words. I wondered if that'd always be the case, when recollections I'd once known slammed back into my consciousness.

My intuition flat out said these symptoms were due to Force damage – somehow. Due to my unwanted bond-sister – somehow.

Focus, Jen. I had no other name for myself. Fix Onasi, rescue Bastila, then split. Break it up into simple objectives, and get the job done.
Movement up ahead caught my attention. I stopped walking, and aimed both blasters in determination. I was glad I’d had the foresight to relieve Carth of his weaponry before shutting him inside the pod.

I heard a click beside me. Mission, stealthed again. Who’d have thought a stealth belt – rare, and generally not worth the credits – would be so useful in the Undercity?

We held our ground as the rakghoul lumbered towards us. At least there’s only one. I wasn’t sure if I could handle another group of four – and this time, without Carth’s help.

I waited tensely until the creature came within range, and then started firing. Mission followed suit, and the monster soon dropped with a piercing shriek.

"I normally just hide from them," Mission whispered. “The sewers aren’t far, and our ‘scanners show us where they are.”

She doesn't like killing despite growing up in a gang, I realized. Somehow, living on the streets had not yet eroded a naive innocence that was at the Twi'lek’s core.

"Hiding's good, in case something happens to me," I said calmly. Why am I so calm? So detached, so logical? Battle rage usually takes over by this point. Going berserk right now would kill me.
"But I really need your help.”

"You mean it, don't you?" The startled tone in Mission’s voice took me by surprise. “I don't know if anyone's ever said that to me before.”

I looked at the girl, reconsidering her abilities. Sure, she was young, and probably too impulsive, but her street skills alone made her a worthy ally. I gave her a quick smile, one I hoped would be taken as reassuring.

Walking closer to the rakghoul corpse, I checked it quickly for life signs. Dead. The mutated head was scorched with fatal blaster shots, and gluey white eyes stared back at me. I shivered, and then my gaze caught on another body nearby. Not a rakghoul. No, that’s a Human. I ran over to it, almost tripping in my haste. But searching the second corpse availed little.

"A medpac and a data-journal," I murmured, clicking on the datapad. It mentioned something about a Promised Land, and I remembered that crazy old geezer, Rukil, ranting after me in the Outcast Village. Just another chance for Onasi to bust a gut laughing at me, I thought sourly. Sod it all, I will find that serum!

"Before you ran back to the village, did you happen across any dead Sith?" I asked Mission as I stood, walking away from the corpses.

"Not today," she answered, hurrying to keep up. “But the bodies are usually stripped clean anyway. D'ya really think they'll have serum on them?"

"I-" I don't really want to answer that. "I have to try. Blaster Boy saved my life."

Mission blinked before giggling weakly at the pet name. I smiled at her, but my heart wasn't in it.

"We could look up north, I've seen patrols round there before," she offered. I nodded to her, and we set off again.

Corpses littered the area, mostly half-eaten. I forced myself to frisk all the bodies we came across, but with each fruitless search I was becoming more disheartened. The smell of the place curled like bile in my stomach. No time to be sick. No time to be angry!

We managed to avoid a number of nearby rakghoul groups by skirting alongside rubble or broken walls. I was starting to get a feel for predicting the mutated monsters - they stuck to open areas, and usually huddled in groups of three or four. Their primary long-range sense appeared to be visible movement, and by silently sneaking within the shadows of dilapidated framework, our progress remained unhindered.

I was dimly aware that Onasi’s time was running out. Part of me was panicking, scared and afraid he would die. Another side was demanding coldly that I return and kill him before he transformed. I scowled, and instead focused on the bleak landscape.

"There's some bodies up ahead, looks like Sith armour," Mission whispered, stealing back my attention.

"Good spotting," I murmured back, and she smiled brightly at me. She's not often encouraged, is she? I knew the girl was struggling to hold her own fear at bay; panic for her friend, anxiety for the environment we were in.

"We'll find the serum, Mission. And then we'll rescue Zaalbar," I said staunchly, heading over to the bodies. I could almost feel her spine stiffen in renewed resolve. Why bother with trite, meaningless words? Fear is a better motivator. I blocked the thought out, but could not dissipate my edginess. Realization of my own mortality was setting in – if Carth could go down so easily to the rakghouls, then so could I. Why am I wasting time helping a Republic pilot that could mutate into a threat? His true loyalty is not with me; his value as a tool is almost nothing. But he had saved me, and I could not – would not – leave him to die.

_Fool. Attachments lead to vulnerability, to a weakness that can be exploited._

The edges of my calm unraveled; I could feel my emotions starting to spiral out of control. Gritting my teeth, I closed my eyes briefly and recalled the vision I’d had yesterday. A board covered in rune stones; the Coruscanti Staff rune was in the front, vulnerable on it’s left flank, but the potential for offense was there. A gap in the opponent’s line of attack – if I moved the Corellian Dagger forward, I’d be able to break right through.

The voice dimmed to a barely audible whisper. I opened my eyes, pursed my lips, and strode forward.

Mission was right; the corpses were Sith, and hope flared in my belly. I ripped off the tattered armor quickly, checking the pockets as I did so.

"Cool, an energy shield!" Mission was searching the second corpse. I found a handful of credits, and a shot of kolto, but no serum. _Sithspit. I need this!_

Mission stood, indicating she was finished, and shot me a despairing look. We were thinking the same: _Carth's time is running out._

But ahead... ahead, was a sentient-sized lump resting motionless next to a darkened wall.

Walking closer, with my weapon gripped tight, the lump slowly morphed into the recognizable shape of a humanoid: seated, slumped, with armoured hands resting limply in its lap.

Rakghoul damage along the body's recognizable black armour became noticeable as I took another step closer.
"Another Sith corpse," I said in relief, crouching down next to the once-sentient.

A hand shot up towards me; quick, hard and fast. It slammed into my throat, armoured fingers grasping hard on my windpipe. "Not a corpse!" a voice rasped.

Shock sparked through me like wildfire. It was followed immediately by hot rage as the enemy hand tightened enough to cut off oxygen. Kill! With a gurgled snarl, I yanked my blaster up and shot the Sith twice in the face. His plasticeel visor shattered as he shrieked, flailing backwards, and the rancid scent of melted flesh and fresh blood hit the air.

The hand dropped, and the body shuddered once before stilling.

"Are you okay?" Mission gasped, voice high-pitched and panicked.

I drew in a series of deep, shuddering breaths. Imbecile! That was too close! My throat was tender, but otherwise undamaged. He's dead. I'm okay. I'm in control. I'm not angry. But the anger was sitting there, hot and heavy in my gut, demanding an outlet.

"I'm fine," I forced out through clenched teeth. The Sith corpse was bloodied and lifeless in front of me, and yet I'd assumed it was a corpse before. With a grimace, I lifted the blaster and shot the body twice more. Mission jumped. "He just took me by surprise."

Focus. I can't let my emotions control me. Not here! With an inward wrench of concentration, I forced myself to search the fresh body. There were deep gouges cracking through the leg armour of the Sith, obvious results of a rakghoul attack. With a despairing groan, I spotted an empty hypoderm lying on the ground next to him. Just my luck. He had the serum, and the bastard already used it.

With growing despondency, I continued to frisk the body as Mission moved closer to me.

"Imperial cred chits," she murmured, palming the plasteel tokens as I drew them out of the corpse's utility belt.

"A couple of stims," I muttered, squinting at a pair of hypoderms the Sith had also been carrying. "Hang on..." I jerked back to the empty needle I'd left on the ground, grabbing it swiftly and holding it next to the two unused ones. Slightly larger and more elongated than standard-issue stimulant, they all had an identical housing and plunger mechanism, with a matching barcode identification on the side.

These aren't stims. These aren't stims!

"Mission," I whispered in awe. "I think... I think this is the serum. The guy must have nabbed his friends' share. He used one; we have two left. Come on!" I scrabbled desperately to my feet. "This is it - let's go back to Captain Flyboy!"

Mission stood; her bright eyes shining with hope as she grinned at me. "Captain?"

"Yeah, he's a pilot," I answered, distracted, as I began to jog back the way we'd come.

"Pilot? Who are you guys?"

Sod it all. I've said too much again, haven't I? "Questions later, okay?"

The landscape passed in a blur. I broke into a sprint, stopping at corners to check what was up ahead. Mission stayed silent behind me, and the only noise I could hear was our footfalls and my own heavy breathing.

Luck or good fortune kept us from any encounters, and I found myself breathing a heavy sigh of relief as the escape pod once more came into view.

The sense of reprieve collapsed a second later.

"The door's open," Mission whispered.

Fear iced through my veins. No, we can't be too late! I ran to the escape pod. The seat was empty. No! I'm the one who does the disappearing act, dammit! I glanced around frantically. He can't be gone, not like this!

"Jen... We have to- he could be anywhere-"

My gaze snagged on a body close by. Without thinking, I ran towards it.

Onasi. Barely breathing.

I ruthlessly jabbed the first hypoderm into his arm, emptying it. No response from him. He looked bad; the skin around his lower neck mottled to a black that wasn't natural. There was a sweet, sickly smell of festering flesh in the air. I pulled out the kolto I'd looted, and injected that into his upper shoulder. Onasi hadn't so much as twitched with the prick of either hypoderm.

Mission stood a few feet away, eyes wide on the scene. I rolled Onasi on his side, ripping off the earlier dressings before tearing into a medpac and pulling it apart. More smelly gree-bacta salve to smear on his shoulder and arm, even though I knew it would do nothing if the actual disease wasn't being countered. Should I use the second 'derm? If one isn't enough, would two be?

"Flyboy, wake up, damn you!" I cursed, kneeling down and shaking him. "I'll kill you if you're dead!"

A sudden cough racked his frame, and a second later his eyes opened. "I won't ask how you're going to achieve that," he said weakly. "What happened? I feel like I've been put through a slag grinder."

Mission laughed breathlessly. My panic dissipated, chased away by a hot relief. "How'd you get out of the escape pod?"

He blinked and looked at me in a daze. "The pod? The rakghouls! I- What are you doing back here?" He gulped, brown eyes widening in desperation. "Jen, leave here at once! I might transform!"

The surge of relief was almost painful, now.

"You're sounding better already," I said dryly, "if you're bossing me around again. Relax, Onasi, I found some serum."

He stared at me in shocked disbelief. "I, uh," he coughed weakly. "I don't dare believe you. I feel awful. Are you serious?"

I grinned. My eyes trailed to his exposed neck. Were the edges of the black mottling already beginning to fade? Carth might bemoan his pain, but there was no denying the keen awareness returning to his gaze. It's working. The serum is really working. "Yep. I saved your arse, Flyboy. We're square."
"Oh, heh." He closed his eyes again.

"We need to get you outta here, Onasi. You can rest in the outcast village," I said briskly, motioning to Mission. She nodded at me, and together we dragged the protesting Republic soldier to his feet.

xXx

Mission was stretching her shoulder in grumbling complaint. Mine felt a bit stiff from lugging Onasi back to the village as well. We'd got him walking, but he leaned heavily on us most of the way. I'm just relieved we were so close to the village. We would have been defenseless had the rakghouls attacked.

While Carth was still badly injured, the remnants of the disease seemed to have left him. He was weak and grumpy, but no longer dizzy or delirious. His injuries had reverted to a painful red colour. Much better than black.

The outcasts had been too panicked to let us in until I'd shown them the Sith serum. Even then, they’d suggested locking him up with some infected villagers. I think I'd scared Mission by threatening to behead the healer. Either way, we'd come to a compromise. Carth hadn't appreciated being tied tightly to a pole, but at least the resident healer promised to see to his injuries.

We're even now. This means I don't have to rescue Bastila. I was trying to ignore that little voice. It was the same one suggesting I sell the extra serum to Davik. I sat down against a wall with a heavy sigh. Too many things to think about. Not to mention that encounter I'd had earlier with the mercenaries.

…

"(This is not our battlefield; now is not yet our fight)," the words came out unexpectedly, in a foreign language, and I had to resist clamping my hand over my mouth in surprise. A vague recollection from the twisted archives of my mind told me that it was a traditional Mandalorian warrior's greeting. Mandalorian?

"(I have no fight with you)," the heavyset man responded. That’s not the standard answer, I realized. But then, I'm not Mandalorian. "*(I am Canderous Ordo)."

"(As they die upon my blade, my adversaries know me as Jen of clan Sahara)," I returned. Again, in Mandalorian format. He glared at me quizzically.

"(You intrigue me. But not enough to stay here and chitchat – the rakghouls have picked off enough of my men. Again, I'll repeat my advice: get out of here)." With an almost respectful nod, he led his men away.

…

The earlier flash of memory, back in Upper Taris... I'd recalled a handsome man, talking about the Mandalorian Wars. Did I fight in the Wars? I seem to be able to hold my own in battle, true enough. But... whose side was I on?

"Jen?" Mission's voice, tremulous and soft, disrupted my reverie.

"What's up Mission?"

"I'm worried about Big Z." She was biting her lip, her shoulders tense with worry. "We need to go
"That'll take too long, Jen! Carth will probably still be too hurt tomorrow, even with kolto!"

"She's right. But just the two of us, heading into the sewers? "I don’t want to encounter another group of rakghouls, Mission, after what happened to Onasi. How did you and Zaalbar avoid them so easily?"

"Well-" She crouched down next to me. "The ‘scanners, as I said. And often I just hid. Big Z's pretty quiet when he wants to be, y'know. People often forget he's there. Of course we couldn't always avoid 'em, but he can rip them to shreds easily enough. He- he’s immune to the disease. Don’t ask how we figured that one out. Look, I can't just abandon him there!"

"Fair enough." Stealth did seem to be fairly effective, and if we headed straight for the sewer entrance we wouldn’t be Outside too long. If I was honest with myself, leaving now appealed to the bloodthirsty side of me. And the rational part added that it would be a good way to stop thinking. I didn't lose control with Mission out there. Well... I almost did, but I stopped myself. And surely going after Mission's friend is better than sitting here, arguing inside my own frelling head about whether I should rescue Bastila, sell the serum, or why I can speak Mandalorian.

"I know!" Mission said brightly, unclipping something from her belt. "I've got a spare stealth belt. Ever used one?" She handed it to me, and I climbed to my feet.

I felt my mouth drop open. “You have two?” I looked down at the device, and a blind sort of recognition dawned. Yes. Yes I have used these before. But stealth belts weren’t common, I knew that much. Nor were they particularly useful… except in the Undercity of Taris, it seemed.

“Good thinking,” I said at last. “Should be easy enough to avoid the rakghouls. Let's go, then.”

She beamed at me, and we strode towards the exit. I heard Carth shouting weakly in protest behind us, but did not turn.

xXx

We slowly and silently crept through the deserted landscape, Mission leading the way towards the sewer entrance. I could barely make her out in the low visibility, and my opinion of stealth fold technology rose a notch.

It was easier to avoid the rakghouls like this, and I surprised myself by making as little noise as Mission as we snuck along. I must have grown up on the streets; I'm used to sneaking around where I'm not allowed.

Mission walked up to an open entrance in the wall, and waited for me there.

"This is the entrance we normally use," she whispered. "It comes out into a room, and I always lock the door behind me so it's safe."

"Did you lock it last time?" It was currently wide open. And, after all, she'd been pretty panicked when she'd run from her captors.
"Uh, no." She sounded sheepish. I wondered briefly if Twi’lek’s could blush.

"Let me go first," I said softly, pulling a blaster from my belt.

The hole led into a small chute, and I gingerly held onto the sides to stop myself from slipping. I saw the room below; dark, dingy, but empty. I jumped the short distance down, and stood facing the exit with my blaster raised as Mission joined me.

I wrinkled my nose as my olfactory senses submerged in a stink of musty decay and rotting sewerage. "Ever get used to the smell down here?"

"Nope," she responded in the darkness. There was absolutely no light down here; I activated a light rod and passed it to Mission.

"I didn't think it could be worse than the Outside. Guess I was wrong."

She giggled softly.

We moved out, myself taking the lead as Mission gave directions. I didn’t bother with the datapad map – the sewers were full of uncharted areas, and Mission was an infinitely better guide.

"So," Mission whispered as we walked down a dark corridor. She was clutching the light rod in one hand and it threw up shadows along the paper thin walls. I wondered what they were made of; it certainly wasn’t plasteel. "Are you gonna tell me who you guys are? Or do I have to guess?"

Stars, I was hoping she’d forget. "Guess away, kid." I made sure to stress the last word. Let's take a leaf out of Onasi's databook, and see if this works.

"Hey, I ain't no kid!" she squawked indignantly. “Why does everyone keep calling me that?"

I grinned to myself. That's one point to Carth, I guess. "Well, you're pretty young to be on the streets by yourself, you know," I said mildly.

"I'm not that young! Far out, I've been looking out for myself for years!" she grumped, but my words had the desired effect - Mission wilted into a sulky silence, and the subject was happily dropped.

I slowed as we neared the end of the corridor, listening intently for any sounds. I could hear some grunts far in the distance, but nothing close by.

"Which direction from here?" I whispered.

"Into the big chamber up ahead, then the first door on the right. That leads down another corridor, and we were at the end of it when we got ambushed."

I nodded and took a few steps forward. The chamber looked empty as we entered it, and my eyes searched the corners. One was too dark to make anything out.

The rakghouls liked to stay outside – but Mission had left the door open when she’d escaped. I felt a sense of premonition stab in my belly, and once more let my gut instinct take over.

"Wait here," I hissed, and took a few quiet steps into the room. With the light source behind me, it took a few long seconds for my vision to adjust. This part of the sewers was obviously no longer in production otherwise we’d be wading through excrement or something equally unpleasant, but unknown rubble from previous times still littered the area. My eyes landed on the different shadows around the chamber, and one didn’t look benign.

I heard a vague snuffling, and froze.

There's something there, alright. Could be asleep, could be waiting. I holstered the blaster on my belt, and slowly drew my vibrosword out. As I gingerly moved closer, the shadows transformed into a sleeping rakghoul. It must have followed someone in here. Best to kill it silently, if possible. I took another step, raised my blade with both hands, and then threw it at the slumbering body.

A cut-off wheeze. I smiled as I retrieved the weapon.

We headed down the next corridor, alert for noise and movement. It was eerily empty, but I could still hear the grunts up ahead.

"That doesn't sound like rakghouls," I observed.

"No, it's the Gamorreans," Mission told me.

I nodded to myself. "How many were there?"

"Four, I think. I didn't really have time to count y'know," she replied tartly.

Four. I had a vague recollection of Gamorreans; semi-intelligent beasts that could speak and trade on a fairly basic level. Not something Jen would have encountered. "How were they armed?"

"Vibro-axes," she whispered.

Damn. Oh well, here's hoping we see them some distance away.

We reached the end of the corridor which tapered off into two closed plimsteel doors. I heard grunts coming from the left, and tensed. It's times like these I'm really glad I'm a thief. I smirked, grabbing a 'frag grenade from my pack.

"Ready?" I whispered softly. "I'm going to open the door and throw a grenade. After the blast, I'll charge in with my blade. Back me up with a blaster."

"Yep." Mission sounded like she was struggling to keep her confidence intact.

My shoulders knotted, and I forced myself to stay calm. Use the Force. No, I couldn't lose control in front of Mission. With a deep breath, I primed the grenade, and switched open the door. I mentally counted four hog-like faces as I lobbed the grenade in the centre of the room, before slamming my hand back against the controls.

The door slid shut. Snorts of surprised alarm echoed beyond the thin plimsteel just as the grenade detonated with a thundering cacophony.

The sound dug painfully into my eardrums. I winced, and fought against the desire to press my hands against the sides of my head. Listen, imbecile. What can you hear? A chorus of pained squeals, barely audible over the ringing in my ears. Now. Strike now!

I opened the door and charged.

Three Gamorreans lay on the ground, stunned, and I left them to Mission as I faced the last one. He growled, leaping forwards with a vibro-ax hefted in his grasp. My hand raised in reflex as static pricked the hairs on my arms. No. No! I will not use the Force!

With a wrench of self-control, I ducked and rolled as the Gamorrean’s axe lunged at me. Ending in a crouch at his side, my vibrosword struck out to the back of his leg, hacking deep into his calf.

He screamed as he fell forward. With a grunt, I pulled the blade upright before plunging it into his ill-armoured back.

His screams stopped.

I jerked back to the doorway. Mission was hovering there, three corpses at her feet. She was panting; her face pale and drawn, and her blaster shaking in her grasp.

The bodies at her feet all showed signs of frag damage – torn chunks of flesh that left a bloodied mess on the floor. The face of one had been ripped viciously open. Mission glanced up at me, shock evident in her eyes. She let out a small whimpering noise.

She’s not used to brawls at all, I realized. This might even be her first kill.

A loud roar from a neighboring room made us both jump. It came from beyond a closed door deeper in the room.

"That’s Big Z,” Mission whispered. Her expression cleared a little, and I could see the hope bloom. She gave me a tremulous smile.

“Let’s get him then,” I said, motioning towards the door. She rushed past me, and began fiddling with the lock.

I felt the grin grow on my face. Something eased in my chest. I wasn’t sure if it was hope, or relief, or just the sensation of a job well done.

Finally, I whispered to myself. Finally, I've done something right.

xXx
The metal clawed into my fur. Resolutely, I ignored the pain and tried once more to yank the thick chains apart. They would not yield, no matter how I struggled.

I will not be a slave; not if I have to fight until my last breath! Slavers deserved to die, all of them. Capturing those less fortunate and using them like dumb animals. I’d fight against these rabid kinrath with all of my will; I’d done so before. But that brought up painful memories.

No, thinking about what cannot now be changed is fruitless. I must be strong; I must escape. Who else will look out for Mission, if not me? I continued straining at the chains around my wrists. If ever I needed your skills, my rambunctious young friend, it is right now.

She was the only one who accepted me for what I was; the only one who looked past the appearance of a towering off-worlder that could not speak Basic. Such a bright, mischievous cub. Who else would keep her from the trouble she always sailed head-first into? Zaerdra would endeavour to, yet her efforts did naught but spur Mission on. Just tell me that she is safe; that she found a way to escape.

I gritted my teeth, and pushed such sentimental thoughts aside. Not the time to reflect upon such matters. I must find a way to break free first. The room was small, and smelt of rotting corpses. My feet could just reach the door when I kicked with all my might; I’d tried again and again, but the door held firm. Although, with my hands tightly shackled, breaking the door would do little more than appease my temper.

Hunger gnawed at my insides, and I realized that soon the Gamorreans would be back to sedate and then transport me. I shall not let them!

And yet already I heard the grunts of my captors - they were returning. It sounded like less of them this time. I did not understand their language, and was glad of it.

They stayed outside of my prison, snorting at each other for some time. Desperation crept insidiously into my furious resolve; I could feel myself turning despondent. No matter how hard I tried, I could not even bend the thick metal clamped around my wrists.

A rumbling blast from outside hammered at my ears; caught unawares, I staggered backward and crashed against the side of my cell. The walls were vibrating with aftershocks. What was that? I could hear pained squeals from the Gamorreans. They are under attack? A confused howl ripped itself from my lungs.

Deadly silence followed in its wake. I lurched off the wall and kept my eyes trained on the closed door – whatever had happened might still be to my detriment. I could no longer hear the Gamorreans.

A minute later the door swung open. Stunned relief flooded through me as Mission's happy face peeked into the room. Her eyes lit up as she spotted me.
"(Mission!)" I cried in utter shock. She is alive! I am free!

"Big Z!" She grinned happily and bounded inside, jumping up to hug me. Clumsily, I tried not to fall over. I was still not used to her effusive displays of affection. She is safe! And so was I.

"(Mission)," I complained, as she continued clutching at me tightly. "(My hands are bound. But you are a sight for sore eyes, as the Tarisians say)."

"You didn't think I'd forget about you – Mission and Zaalbar, together forever!" she replied emotionally. Her big blue eyes were blinking at me. She stepped backward and grabbed my paws, fiddling with the restraints. "Let me get those for you, Big Z. Phoaw, you smell!"

It was then that I noticed a Human female had followed her in.

"(Who's that with you?)" I asked warily, eyeing over the newcomer. I did not like Humans in general, and this one in particular raised the hackles on my neck. She was poorly dressed, but by stance alone I could tell she knew how to use the vibrosword she wielded. I wondered just how my young friend had managed to acquire her aid.

The stranger snapped her head up to look at me full on. "My name is Jen Sahara," she answered. Surprise swamped me and I did not take my eyes from the Human. "(You understand the language of my people? That is rare among your species; I am impressed)," I answered slowly. I had not met anyone on Taris who did; it had taken Mission months of dedicated practice to understand me on a basic level.

"Whoa!" Mission shot this Jen Sahara a speculative glance. "First Mandalorian and now Shyriiwook? You sure did learn a lot of weird languages!"

"(Weird?)" I grumbled.

Mission finished playing with the handcuffs, and they opened with a click. I rubbed my wrists thankfully.

"Well, y'know what I mean Big Z!"

"We should probably get out of here," the Human said, glancing back to the exit furtively. "There's still rakghouls crawling around."

"(I owe you a debt, Jen Sahara)," I said solemnly. "(You and Mission together have saved me from a life of servitude and slavery)."

"I didn't really do much," Mission chimed in. "I mean, I'd never have got this far without Jen."

"It's nothing; we made a deal," Jen said flatly.

"(A deal?)" I asked. A feeling of trepidation slowly uncurled in my stomach. Just what had Mission agreed to?

"Yeah, Jen needs my help to break into the Vulkar base," Mission added.

Alarm tensed my nerves; I felt my muscles bunching up in anger. "(No, Mission! We cannot go there, it's too dangerous!)" I demanded. Suddenly, I did not like the Human so much.

"I have to, Big Z, I promised! And besides, she rescued you!" Stubborn indignation was something Mission did all too well.
"I only need access to the entrance, Zaalbar," Jen added. "Mission won’t accompany me inside."

"Hey, I'm quick and plenty smart! I can help!" Mission protested.

Jen raised a hand to quell Mission’s impassioned plea. "I believe you Mission, but I don't wish Gadon for an enemy."

"Gadon? What's he got to do with this?" Mission demanded, folding her arms stubbornly.

The Human shrugged at her. "I talked to him, like you suggested. He also warned me not to let you inside the base if I cared for my life."

"He threatened you?" Mission gasped. Her eyes widened, although I wondered why Mission was so surprised. Gadon might not be as... enthusiastic as Zaerdra, but he had always tried to look out for the young Twi’lek. With all of us struggling to keep Mission from danger, it is a wonder how she always manages to elude safety. One day, I was going to lock her in one of those Upper City apartments and throw away the key.

It was unfortunate she knew how to pick locks.

"You could call it that." Jen was grinning impishly at Mission. Humans are odd, I reminded myself. Why would she find a life threat amusing?

"Gadon’s not running my life for me. I do what I want!" Mission declared hotly.

I groaned. Trying to talk reason to Mission was like taming a kinrath: dangerous and ultimately a waste of time. But I had to prevail. "(Mission, please, be sensible. I will help Jen inside the base, in return for her rescue)."

Jen looked at me in surprise. "Thank you, Zaalbar. We’d appreciate that."

"Oh, so you're going to take him along, and not me?" My young charge was getting angry. And stubborn. I would have a fight on my hands to talk her out of this.

"Mission, I do not want the Beks for enemies," Jen said wearily. "But we will need a lookout at the base entrance."

Mission sulked.

It's a compromise, but I do not have to like it.

"Please, Mission," Jen said softly.

"Fine," she muttered. "But only because Big Z would never let me hear the end of it!"

The Human smiled warmly at Mission. "Alright, let's head back."

xXx

The journey to the outcast village was fairly uneventful. We ran into a few solitary rakghouls that were killed by Jen's blasters before they came close. I was beginning to respect the fighting abilities of the Human; she was tough and capable. She also made sure no harm came to Mission during the rescue attempt. I would do my best to help her in whatever foolhardy plan she had inside the Vulkar base.

The villagers let us through the gates and I noticed they acted wary of Jen. Mission had told me Jen's Human friend was hurt; healing inside the camp. I followed the females to the centre of the dark courtyard.

"You're back. I'm surprised you're not both dead," a male voice directed at Jen and Mission. I saw an injured Human, tied up tightly to a pole. This was rather puzzling – I did not realize the Outcasts imprisoned people.

"No faith in me?" Jen asked. I could hear the humour in her voice.

"You should have waited until I could help!" the man responded in frustration.

"I would have asked you, but you seemed a little tied up."

Mission burst out laughing. He is tied up. What is so funny?

"Ha ha," the Human male answered, but he did not sound amused. "Care to get me out of this mess?"

"I dunno, Onasi. I kinda like you better this way." The merriment was obvious in the female's eyes, as obvious as the growing irritation in the male's. Finally, Jen Sahara threw her hands up in capitulation.

"Okay, okay!" she said, her voice still shaking with suppressed mirth as she started untying the ropes. "At least you sound a lot better, at any rate."

"Hey! You can't do that!" A female villager ran up to us. Jen whirled around to face the stranger, and the interloper took a few steps back hurriedly.

"Just watch me," Jen said menacingly. I could see rage on her face, and I tensed in wariness. Something about this Human was a little... off. Even Mission looked alarmed.

"I – well, I guess we can tell he doesn't have the rakghoul disease anymore," the healer stuttered, backing away.

"You have the social skills of a rancor," the tied up Human muttered. I saw amusement chase away the anger on Jen's face.

"Oh?" she responded, smiling mischievously. She gets the same contrary look as Mission. "You'd prefer me to leave you here?"

"No!"

Jen grinned, and finished untying the man. "Zaalbar, this is Carth." He nodded at me, and I returned the greeting. "Zaalbar's offered to help us break into the Vulkar base."

I grunted in confirmation. I may not trust her, but I owe her that much.

The man looked surprised. "Uh, that’s great. Thanks, we could do with the extra help."

"What do you guys want in there, anyway?" Mission piped up.

"Gadon's asked us to do something for him," Jen told her. I noticed the man named Carth frown at Jen. "What?" she snapped at him. "They're helping us, they deserve to know something."

"Lighten up, would ya Carth?" Mission said. "Jen’s refused to tell me anything at all, other than you're a pilot."
"What?" Carth spluttered. He was still leaning against the pole, flexing an injured arm. It looked painful.

Jen groaned. "Thanks Mission."

"Oh. Oops." Mission giggled sheepishly.

The male Human was frowning at Jen again. "I can't believe you, woman!"

"Right. I'm getting out of here," Jen stated baldly. "We can't go back to the Upper City with you in that state, Onasi, the Sith will get suspicious." I wondered briefly who Onasi was. Jen was still speaking, in a hurried monotone as if she wanted to get her piece out before anyone interrupted. "I think we should camp down here tonight, and hit the Vulkar base tomorrow if you're up to it. Zaalbar, do me a favour and make sure Carth doesn't leave? He really needs to rest and recuperate."

"Hey!" Carth objected, his brows lowering. "You’re not ordering me about, sister!"

Jen ignored his protests, facing me as she spoke. "He's hurt and grumpy. The last thing he needs is to be moving about."

I eyed the injuries I could see. Most had been bandaged, but judging by the way Carth was balanced against the wooden pole, he looked to be in a lot of pain. He was favouring his left side, and could not stand up straight. Kolto had some instantaneous effect, but injuries as severe as his would need at least a night’s rest to heal considerably. Jen Sahara speaks sense.

"(I will do as you ask, Jen Sahara)."

Carth turned to look at me, frowning. "What did you just say?"

Mission started laughing again. "He said that if you even think about moving, he’s gonna wallop ya one! And Big Z always says what he means, so you'd better get comfortable for the night, Carth!"

"(Mission, you are making my words sound stronger than they are)," I complained.

"(It's the only way he'll listen)," Mission responded in Ryl.

"I'll be back later," Jen muttered, and dashed off.

"Where are you going now, you reckless woman?" Carth called after her, and made to follow. I walked in front of him and barred the way. He scowled at me.

"(It is for your own health, Human)," I tried to explain.

"If I wasn't so hurt, I'd take you on, Wookiee," he muttered at me. It was a token protest, I felt, for the Human looked irritated rather than genuinely angry.

Mission guffawed in disbelief. "I'll go after her," she said brightly. "See you guys later!"

"(Mission!)" I lamented loudly. She had already run ten paces. "(Get back here!)"

She flashed me an impish grin. "No, you promised to look after Carth! I won't be long!" With that, my roguish young friend turned tail and ran after Jen.

I howled in frustration.
"Yeah," Carth commented next to me. "I know exactly how you feel."

xXx
Depression weighed down on my soul as I gulped another swig of Tarisian ale. Mission had disappeared into the pazaak room beyond, and I'd leapt at the opportunity to finally imbibe some much-needed alcohol. I'd like to see you try and stop me boozing now, Flyboy. Unfortunately, rather than relaxing my tense nerves, the alcohol seemed to be sinking me into introspection – what I'd been avoiding ever since I woke up with a splitting headache and multiple personalities.

I was almost convinced that neither Jen nor Evil Bitch were really me. But the detail with which I could recall studying - the days spent poring over electronic databases and archives - convinced me that Jen must be real, somehow. I could list specifics about the founding of the Republic, or posit a theory regarding the true origins of Coruscant's first colonists. Anything that hadn't happened in, oh, the last millennia or two. I can see my father's face so clearly. He scares me; he protects me. Not my father... hers.

Evil Bitch's identity, in contrast, was more just a mass of seething emotions; rage, a lust for power, hatred, and at times, an undercurrent of grief so immense I could barely fathom it. The feelings were so vibrant and overpowering that they must belong to me. Or to someone.

If a stranger asked me to describe myself, I'd say I was confident, cheeky at times; quick to anger, but quick to forgive. I wanted to understand people and their motivations, and the foreign intrigued me. Perhaps I had an inclination to be reckless and take chances, but overall, I felt like my heart was in the right place. That description is about as far off Jen or Evil Bitch as possible.

I sighed morosely, and took another swallow. My glance caught on the mirror behind the bar, and I latched onto my own reflection. It didn't look familiar. Curly dark hair, cropped short. Wide-set green eyes, tilted nose, plainish face. A fairly normal looking female Human, really. Was that face really mine?

I downed the remainder of the glass, and ordered another. A hopeful Twi’lek tried flirting with me, but disappeared after I threatened to tie him to the ceiling fan by his headtails. I just want to be with myself. Whoever that is.

I continued drinking, and my thoughts edged into wooziness. I wonder who this face belongs to... doesn't look freaky enough to be Evil Bitch. I giggled. I bet she's really ugly.

I finished the next glass, and rested my head on the damp bar. My eyelids drooped closed, but I was still dwelling on my appearance. I've never been vain; I've never obsessed over my looks. Have I? A comforting sense of tiredness conquered my wayward thoughts, and I let them slide away into oblivion.

...
gentle trickling of water. Even if it was a man-made canal, I still loved it.

My reflection smiled shyly back at me as I leaned over the bank. Wavy dark hair framing hazel eyes. I wish I didn't have freckles. I wish I was pretty. Although, Father told me to be glad I was plain, for beautiful girls attract the attention of troublesome boys. And I certainly didn't want that.

"Jen!" A masculine voice called out, irritated. I jumped to my feet, a little fearful. Better run, Father wants me.

…

The cold stars in the distance winked at me as I stared through the ship’s space-strengthened transparisteel. Almost back in known world. We'll build a better galaxy. A stronger one, that will withstand any threat. Amazing how the anger hadn’t left me. If anything, it had strengthened. They never taught us that, no; they wanted to control us. Didn't want us to realize the sheer power in embracing one's emotions.

I caught a glint of my own face on the window, and I stared at it absently. A white flaky complexion surrounded by greasy lank hair. Two eyes as black as space. Good thing I never cared for how I looked. I grinned and an evil rictus reflected back at me. And it always helps if you appear intimidating. With that thought, I reached for the steel mask that provided an even better front than my corrupted features.

…

I searched the edges of the cracked mirror. Gotta be a safe in here somewhere. My reflection frowned back in concentration as I ran my fingers behind it. I grinned as I felt the catch. Easy target, easy credits.

I paused, and stared into my own eyes before lifting the mirror. I don't look too bad. I wonder if he’ll ever see me differently? I'd never particularly cared how I looked; dark curly hair, green eyes, olive skin; the fact that I was healthy and had all four limbs was enough to keep me happy. But lately... I scowled at myself. Great time for vanity, in the middle of a heist. Stupid, get back to work! I clamped down my thoughts, and started dismantling the safe.

…

"Jen? Hey Jen!" A young voice cracked through my swirling dreams. "Wake up! Gee, never took you for a drinker!"

My cheek was glued to something. As I slowly prised open a sticky eye, I saw a blue grinning face tilted to one side. Oh. My face is stuck on the bar. I groaned as I slowly raised my head.

"Ugh," I moaned.

Mission laughed. "Wow, you musta' bin busy while I was pulling in the credits! Heh, I bet your grumpy friend isn't going to be too happy with you."

Reality sank slowly into consciousness. "He doesn't need to know," I mumbled. "I need some sleep."

"We should head back to the others," Mission agreed. "But can you walk? You're as drunk as a spacer on lockdown!"

Well, I am from space. And this planet is locked down. "I can walk, just watch me," I grumped determinedly, sliding to my feet. I squeezed my eyes shut as dizziness set in, and heard a giggle from the teenage Twi'lek.

"Laugh at me, would you?" I murmured. "Bet I could drink you under the table."

She sniggered loudly. "Says you now, when you're already sloshed."

"Mmmm," I replied, with my eyes still firmly shut. "Lead on."

"We'll go a different way, though," she said brightly. "I don't wanna run into any Vulkars, not with you in such a state." She giggled again. I opened my eyes to shoot her a filthy glare, but followed her in silence.

As we wandered through the grimy corridors of the Lower City, my head began to clear. I hazily recalled the dreams I'd had, and it brought on another case of contemplation. I look most like the street kid. My skin's not as tanned, but then, I've been indoors. I'm also a lot older. That'd make sense though, my vision of both Jen and Street Kid seemed to be when they were young teenagers. It was a lot harder to tell with Evil Bitch, whose dreams of power and grandeur seemed so far-fetched and delusional they were almost amusing. If they weren't so violent, at any rate.

I sighed to myself, and shadowed Mission around the next bend. That's it, then, isn't it? I must be Street Kid. Right?

Theories swirled hazily through my head. I still don't know why I have three identities, other than it has something to do with Bastila. I seemed to know a little of the Force; perhaps I'd fought Evil Bitch. Doesn't explain Jen, though. Maybe I'd been a Jedi apprentice who'd got dragged into a duel, and somehow Evil Bitch's memories, or soul, got trapped inside my own. Bastila... or someone... must have done something. Something with the Force. Perhaps Jen had also been involved. Maybe she'd been caught in the middle of a Jedi duel.

This is getting me nowhere.

Bastila would have the answers, but did I really want to hear them? The bond had not yet returned, but somehow I was certain it would.

Should I really continue with this rescue... should I really let her anywhere near me?

And yet... if I didn’t find out the truth, would I ever learn how to safely navigate the minefield that was my head?

With a sigh of drunken irritation, I quelled my thoughts and silently followed Mission back into the depths of Taris.

xXx

I woke up the next morning, groggy and nauseous. It took a moment to re-orient myself; I vaguely remembered stumbling after Mission into the outcast village. Our makeshift camp was really just shelter under a rat-infested building, but it was enough for me to sleep. Thus far, I seemed to find it easy to sleep just about anywhere.

As I crawled to my feet, I noticed the others eating some sort of stew by the entrance. I wondered briefly where the food had come from; Onasi must have sweet-talked some of the villagers. I don’t see many supplies around here. And the only animals are vermin. I shrugged when I realized that might very well be a viable food source. If it wasn’t killing the outcasts with food poisoning, then I should be alright.

Somehow, I had the feeling Jen Sahara would be feeling substantially more squeamish.

Mission saw me first as I slowly approached the group.

"Bet you’re feeling awful today!" Mission exclaimed brightly, grinning. Carth shot me a small, disappointed frown before turning away, and the Wookiee grunted in acknowledgement.

"Mm, I’ve been better," I said noncommittally, ignoring the thumping in my head.

"Want some?" the Twi’lek offered. My stomach rumbled loudly, and I eagerly took a portion. Chunks of unidentifiable brown cubes floated into an equally brown sauce. Well, it certainly matches the Undercity. I slowly ate a spoonful; it was warm, filling, and about as bland as the Upper City cantina fare. So far, my opinion of Tarisian cuisine was decidedly average.

Carth was still injured, and by mutual consent we decided to wait another day before infiltrating the Vulkar base. Mutual, all apart from Flyboy himself, who wanted to get it over and done with. We have six days before the swoop race; five if we get the accelerator tomorrow. To my surprise, Carth didn’t argue too loudly. In fact, he seemed to be ignoring me. I saved his life, and he’s pissy with me?

I spent the day hanging around the Lower City. Mission tried to cajole me into a game of pazaak, and by the look on her face I surmised someone had told her about my awful last performance. Thank you, Flyboy. I was vaguely aware that we were driving each other crazy. It's a good thing Mission and Zaalbar are here to diffuse the tension, even if not for long. I expected we’d part company after the Vulkar base raid.

I had a quick trip back to the apartment, picking up the few grenades I’d left behind. Hopefully I wouldn’t be back; all going according to plan we’d acquire the accelerator, rescue Bastila, and then I’d be off. I don’t want to be around her. Just fulfil my deal with Onasi, and then disappear. I wondered if it would be that easy. I quenched the traitorous voice that pointed out I’d already done enough by saving his life.

We were all kitted up and ready to go the next day; even Zaalbar emerged with a vibrosword strapped to his back. Mission had disappeared briefly on a shopping expedition, whether she actually paid credits for her equipment I wasn’t sure. Regardless, she’d come back with a couple of bio-scanners and lowlight sonic visors for us all, excluding Zaalbar whose night vision, it turned out, was as incredible as the rest of his species.

Bio-scanners and sonic visors. Stars, I realized ruefully, we were terribly equipped last time.

I’d dallied with the idea of delaying matters one more day – we had the time to spare, and Carth was still in pain despite his protestations to the contrary. Somehow, I doubted he’d listen to reason. Besides, I want to finish this as much as he does.

Heading to the Outside, we kept Mission between us as she scouted on the ‘scanner, her other hand grasping the sole light-rod we’d need in the sewers. Even sonic lowlight visors wouldn’t help in the absence of all light, but the faint glow from just one rod would be enough for technology to grant us full vision.

There were two small groups of rakghouls it was difficult to avoid; I stuck with my blaster, while Zaalbar charged in and dispatched them. He’d assured us that Wookiees could not get the rakghoul disease, and I was glad he didn’t have to prove it, as we made swift progress towards the sewers. After Onasi’s close brush with death, I was particularly appreciative of the extra muscle. Wookiees were tough.

The decomposing, fetid stench of the sewers swamped me as we entered, and I struggled not to gag. Our light-rods illuminated a similar expression on Carth’s face; we shared a silent look of disgust at the smell, and then followed Zaalbar into the bowels of the Undercity.

"So guys," Mission whispered as we journeyed through a long, dank corridor. The light-rod threw up shadows along the walls; I could see what looked like green slime oozing down one side. "What are we doing inside in the Vulkar base?"

"(You are not doing anything inside the Vulkar base, Mission)," Zaalbar growled, prompting a sulky pout from the Twi’lek.

_They deserve to know, no matter what Onasi thinks._ "Gadon’s asked us to retrieve or destroy a prototype accelerator," I told her, my eyes searching the sewers for any hint of danger. I sensed Carth stiffen in annoyance next to me.

"Really?" Mission squeaked. "I thought he was going to send some Beks after it!"

"I daresay we’re more dispensable," Carth said. His voice was very dry.

"(That is a dangerous task),” Zaalbar commented. “(Gadon is doing something for you in return?)"

"Yes he is," I confirmed. "But I shall say no more, in fear of Flyboy’s blasters."

“Jen,” Carth said sharply. “Do you- are you answering the Wookiee? There’s no way you can understand those howls-"

“(Shyriiwook is as much a language as your Galactic Basic!)” Zaalbar growled in annoyance. “(What is it with Humans and their self-absorption?)”

Carth glanced back at Zaalbar, chagrined as he realized the noise was directed at him. “Er, sorry Zaalbar. I didn’t mean to offend- it’s just that, Jen? Can you really understand him?"

“Gee, Carth, don’t be such a dumb nerf-herder,” Mission cut in. “I can understand Shyriiwook.”

In the dim light of glow-sticks, I was sure I could see the faint red of embarrassment flush on his neck. I grinned, refused to answer, and walked on.

We journeyed further into the sewers without incident, skirting to the east of the rooms Zaalbar had been kept captive in. He looked that way numerous times, and I wondered if it was nervousness, or a desire for vengeance should any Gamorrean slavers make an appearance. As long as there weren’t too many, I was fairly confident we could handle them. _The four of us make a great team._

Eventually we reached the forcefield Mission had told us about. It glowed a faint, shimmering blue, and halted access to a solitary tunnel. A terminal was bolted on the wall, looking decidedly out of place.

Mission skipped ahead, retrieving a datapad out of her utility belt. By the time I’d walked closer, she was already running commands through the system with practised ease. Either she was the fastest splicer on Taris, or she’d somehow gained access through another method.

Regardless, the Twi’lek obviously knew what she was doing with computers. A minute later, a slithering hiss sounded as the azure forcefield deactivated.

“Easy as kassi-loaf,” Mission chortled. “I’ve been wanting to get past here for ages. Lucky I lifted those codes when I did.”

She’s only just acquired the deactivation sequence, I realized. How coincidental is that? I shivered, and felt a familiar faintness creep in around the edges of my sanity.

…

A robed Zabrak woman was staring at me intently through intelligent turquoise eyes. “The Force is the energy of all living things, padawan. It surrounds us, it binds us. It is life in its purest form,” she said. Her voice was quiet, yet strangely compelling. “And it works through us all, Jedi and non-Jedi alike. In the end, there is no such thing as coincidence.”

…

Something nudged me and I gasped. A sharp pain stabbed deep into my head from where I’d banged it on the ‘Spire, before fading into a dull throb.

“Jen, are you okay?” Carth asked in a low voice. I realized that Mission and Zaalbar were some steps ahead, looking back at us in confusion.

“I’m okay,” I muttered. “Just my head playing up.”

He was frowning at me, his eyes dark with concern, when a roar in the distance grabbed everyone’s attention. I noticed warily that the walls shook slightly with the vibration.

“What in the blazes was that?” Carth asked. He’d raised his blaster, pointing it down the shadowed corridor that was now accessible. He was standing in an alert, military stance, feet apart and hands steadily aiming his weapon. He certainly is the archetype Republic soldier, I thought in half-irritation, half-admiration. He made it look good.

"I dunno,” Mission replied in a quieter voice. “You hear the roars down here sometimes, but I’ve never known what creates it.”

"Maybe it's the Vulkar door chime,” I muttered. Mission giggled.

"(It is the planet slowly dying),” Zaalbar howled mournfully. "(Of death and disease and decay)."

While I didn’t doubt that Taris was a chivhole of a planet, I didn’t think Zaalbar had the right of it. Regardless, we had to move on – and if the Vulkars came this way, then they must have a path that didn’t encounter whatever made that noise. I hoped.

Gripping tight my blaster, I followed Zaalbar into the unknown. We reached a large chamber that was eerily empty.

My boots crunched on something, and I looked down. A pile of old bones, the final resting place of some poor sod. I crouched, and moved the rubble aside. Huh, a journal of some description. The words 'Promised Land' caught my eye. That's the second one I've found. Well, I suppose I could make a loony old man happy.

There were two exits, and we veered off to another long, empty, dark corridor. The creepy atmosphere seemed to affect us all; no one had spoken a word in quite some time. I wondered if I could hear faint munching noises in the distance, or if the atmosphere was beginning to fray my focus.

The passageway emptied out into a vast cavern, half of it in lightless shadow. The room was huge, far bigger than any we had come across so far. I peered suspiciously at the far end of the catacomb - anything could be hiding there.

"There's something wrong with the ‘scanner,” Mission murmured, following Zaalbar into the room. Carth and I were some steps behind as Mission picked a path through piles of rubble that littered the area. “Again. Sheesh, there ain’t nothing that big. This ‘scanner is scrap. Who’s got the other one?"

It was an enormous room with large heaps of debris dotted throughout it. Deeper in the bowels of the place we could see the outline of a door on the left, and an open entrance on the right. But further still, there was nothing but shadow. The meagre glow from the light-rod would only travel so far, it seemed.

Movement caught my eye; I turned to see a gigantic shadow enlarge from the darkened end. I froze. Nothing could be that big. Nothing!

A deafening roar slammed into my eardrums, and the obscure shape lumbered towards us in a sudden move. Mission shrieked in panic and ran to the side of the catacomb. I caught a glimpse of her struggling with a door that did not budge. Zaalbar sprinted after her, skirting past the monster. It hadn’t seen them, and instead was heading straight for me.

It roared a second time.

I stared at the oncoming mass in a sense of bewilderment and growing determination. I will not flee! Nothing frightens me! My throat clenched. Flee!

I was yanked unceremoniously backwards as Carth grabbed my arm.

"Run!” he bellowed. That broke my trance, and the two of us turned and bolted to the only other exit. Adrenaline spiked a fire through my veins as the beast howled. An eerie, bone-shaking noise of death. I could almost feel its hot, sticky breath brushing my neck.

Carth reached the doorway, turning his head to yell something at me. Another roar, and something whisked along my back, barely making contact. I stumbled. I won’t make it! Hot desperation lurched me forwards. I need to move faster!

I screamed, and jumped the last few metres.

The air around me stretched. I was suspended forever as time telescoped into nothing. A faint buzzing tickled my ears. I hadn't thought my leap would carry me to the doorway, but now it seemed like I was going to crash into the wall beyond. I raised my hands belatedly.

As my limbs collapsed against the hard surface of freedom, there was a loud crash from behind. It took a dazed second before I realized the monster had barrelled straight into the doorway. Pellets of rubble spat fierce arrows into my back as my hands steadied against the wall.

I threw a frantic look over my shoulder to behold a horrifying sight. That's a rancor, a voice muttered. The monster snarled, thrusting a giant head against a doorway too small to fit through. A chunk of torn panelling ripped free from the side of the doorway.

Sun and stars! This is too frelling close! My horrified gaze slid sideways, catching on the prone figure of Carth. Crumpled and lifeless, in a heap on the ground. Sithspit!
Another piercing howl had me jerking back to the rancor; it had retreated just far enough to drive a claw through the damaged opening. Sharp talons scrabbled at the sides, tearing through framework that wouldn't hold it back for long.

Fright vanished out of necessity. I jumped into action, grabbed Carth's unresisting arms, and yanked him fiercely down the corridor. With the heat of need adding strength to my grip, Carth didn't even feel heavy. My skin prickled as I focused on only one objective: get further down the narrow corridor where the monster cannot follow.

The illusion of safety slowly, slowly calmed my thundering heart. I stared back at the distant entrance - a gaping hole that had been a door-sized aperture moments ago. It's still far too small for a rancor to get through. And it can't follow down us down here. The rancor seemed to agree, for it retreated again, this time disappearing entirely.

Muffled grunts and growls of annoyance reverberated through the ancient stonework as the rancor moved back into its prison of a chamber. I expelled a shaky sign, and knelt down to check on Carth.

I just hope Mission made it through the other exit. Carth groaned as I searched for a pulse, mumbling something incoherently. If they didn't make it out-

The high-pierced shriek of a girl iced my heart. The familiar sound of a Wookiee howling immediately followed. Oh no. My stomach lurched. They're still there.

I stood. I ran. I was back at the damaged doorway-

The rancor roared from further back in the cavern. My mind had frozen over, but my legs were sprinting forwards. I was metres deep in the cavern when I saw them. Trapped in a corner, Zaalbar standing protectively in front of Mission.

They're going to die. This is their end.

…unless I did something.

"Come back here, you filthy beast!" I shrieked, running into the room.

I can't let them die.

If they can't take care of themselves, they deserve to die for their weakness.

I must get out of here! This is too terrifying!

I can't let them die.

"Turn around, you flea-bitten kath pup! Are you too scared to face me?" I had no idea where the words were coming from. The rancor ignored me as it advanced on the others. Zaalbar stepped back, growling, pushing Mission deep into the corner behind him.

My eyes caught on a fist-sized rock, and I scrabbled to pick it up. I hurled it with all my might, and watched numbly as the rock bounced harmlessly off the rancor's naturally armoured back. The monster lurched within swiping distance of the Wookiee.

"(Run, Mission!)") Zaalbar roared in desperation.

"I can't!" she sobbed.
Desperation laced my steps as I sprinted towards the creature, drawing my blade as I ran. Everything around me lengthened. Each step took an eternity, but the others appeared frozen in time. The rancor had a claw upwards, the start of a killing blow aimed at the Wookiee. A long, deep scream erupted viciously from my lungs as I hurled my vibrosword at the rancor's leg.

With a soundless snap, my surroundings clicked back into place. Reality shortened.

The rancor stumbled as the blade dug into its lower limb. It screeched and turned around to face me.

"Run!" I bellowed at the others.

They gathered their wits, and made a dash for the exit I had come from. The beast shook his leg in annoyance, and my vibrosword went whirling into the dark. I resisted the insane urge to go collect it.

The creature drew itself up to its full height, the top of its head brushing the ceiling of the extensive cavern. It roared in anger, huge red eyes glinting with madness. Focused solely on me. Terror tightened my limbs, as I stared in stunned shock at the monster. A small voice whispered, bring it on!

I could vaguely hear screaming from the recesses of my fragmented mind. The rancor crouched back onto its massive limbs, preparing for the kill. Get out of here! I twisted on the spot, and sprinted for my life.

The beast lumbered after me, bellowing in anger. My muscles pulsed and burned. Use the Force again! I saw Mission and Zaalbar sprint into the broken doorway, and out of sight. I reached out mentally and clutched at the power I was beginning to recognize, and once more everything took on that surreal, stretched look as events were frozen in time for an instant or two.

The rancor smashed head first into the broken doorway, as the Force propelled me around the corner. The foundations of the sewers rumbled in discontent as the monster howled and tore through ancient stonework. My vision was speckled and mottled, my lungs burned as I panted, and as I stumbled into relative safety from the rancor's claws, I could feel the shaky weakness of my limbs.

Well, that was fun. I tried desperately to control my breathing as I caught up to the others. I could have killed it, no pathetic rancor frightens me! I closed my eyes as the panic slowly ebbed. I was pretty frightened, alright.

"Jen!" Mission sobbed, and clutched onto me. Adrenaline still burned fire through me, along with a simmering senseless rage, and I was quick to disentangle myself. I gave her a cursory pat on the shoulder. "I thought it got you!" she wailed.

"I think it almost did," I muttered.

"Whatever possessed you to run back in there?" Carth was awake, and speaking in a very quiet voice.

"Just my daily dose of lunacy," I quipped, somewhat breathlessly. My vision had cleared now, and normality was slowly seeping back into my bones. I sucked in a deep, calming breath of air.

"(You have saved my life again, Jen Sahara)," Zaalbar rumbled, walking over to me. "(And now Mission's, as well)."

I shrugged uncomfortably. Gratitude was not something I particularly wanted. "Forget it," I mumbled.
"(I cannot. You put your own life in jeopardy twice to save mine. There is only one way I can repay such an act: I will swear a lifedebt to you)."

I froze; my muscles clenched in surprise. A lifedebt? I felt like the rancor really had walloped me. It was still roaring furiously back in the chamber. A Wookiee slave, that could be useful. I swallowed. I don't want anyone around; just finish the quest and get out of here. I heard Mission squeak in surprise. But Zaalbar is such a nice guy. What's a lifedebt?

"A lifedebt?" Mission whispered. "Are you sure about that, Big Z?"

"A what?" Carth sounded puzzled.

"(This is an issue of great importance to me, Mission)," Zaalbar rumbled. "(Jen Sahara has twice now saved my life; once from slavery which I consider worse than death. She has also rescued you, when I could not)."

"Wow – this is major." Mission turned to face me. "Do you realize what this means?"

"I don't need this, Zaalbar," I told him seriously.

"What are you all talking about?" Carth asked. "And Jen, I suppose you learnt Shyriiwook during your study as well?" he ended sarcastically.

Zaalbar bellowed at Carth, who glared in response.

"(Nevertheless, Jen Sahara, it is my decision. You have kept Mission from harm, and saved me twice from death)."

"But I don't know where I'm going! I don't know what my future holds." I didn't mean for my voice to sound so desperate. And Carth was looking at me strangely. I bit back a scowl.

"(Then I shall follow, and endeavour to help you)." Zaalbar took a deep breath. "(In the presence of you all I swear my lifedebt. Forever after I will be by your side, Jen Sahara. My honour and my strength are yours. May my vow be as strong as the roots of the great wroshyr trees of Kashyyyk)."

My head had bowed during Zaalbar's speech, whether out of dismay or respect I could no longer tell. The vow is done now; Zaalbar cannot take it back. I should at least accept it graciously.

"I am honoured to accept your vow, Zaalbar."

"You know this is a sacred, irreversible vow?" Mission interrupted. I nodded at her, and she continued. "I guess this means you're stuck with me, too. Wherever Big Z goes, I'm going. I almost lost him once - it's not gonna happen again."

I blinked. Well, if I get the walking rug, I may as well take the snot-nosed kid too, I thought sourly. Stars, Onasi is going to have a fit.

"Stuck with....? Just what's going on?" Carth had folded his arms, frowning at us all.

"Geez, Carth, you're so slow!" Mission rolled her eyes. "Big Z's just sworn a lifedebt to Jen. So I guess we're all one big happy family now!" She beamed.

I felt slightly nauseous.

"Family?" he echoed weakly. He blinked at me. "Lifedebt? Why?"
"While you were snoozing, Jen ran back in and saved our lives!" Mission enlightened him. "We'd have been Mr Rancor's dinner if not for her!"

Carth's mouth dropped open, and he stared in confusion at me. Heh, I think I worry him when I do the right thing. "Oh," he said quietly, his dark eyes searching mine.

I turned away. "Let's go find that Vulkar base, it can't be far. I want to find out which gang member had the bright idea of using a rancor as a guard."

And then I'm going to castrate him.

xXx
It seemed like I'd been waiting there forever. I couldn't even hear blaster shots or screams anymore. I could go in, I thought suddenly, see if they're okay. Problem was, I'd promised to stay put. 'Sides, I liked Jen, and didn't wanna to get her in any jip.

Though it ain't like Gadon would kill her or anything. Not if I talked to him.

I was waiting outside the base, tucked in the shadows behind a crumbling sewer wall. The back entrance to the Vulkar base was totally unguarded, and our only snag had been a terminal-locked durasteel door that a novice could slice. So, after rocking my skills, the rest of the gang'd sent me away to hide like a little kid while they went and got the job done. I could feel myself pouting. I still thought I'd be safer with them.

A Vulkar had run past me earlier, back into the sewers. I'd stayed hidden, but even if I'd been smack bang in the centre of the corridor I didn't think he'd've seen me. He'd looked like he'd peed in his pants or something. Funny thing was, he'd headed straight towards Mr Rancor.

The rancor made me think of Big Z's lifedebt. That was big. It had me excited, too, because I had a funny feeling Carth and Jen weren't gonna be sticking round on Taris forever. Carth's gotta tell us what's going on now- we're part of it! Honestly, I never thought I'd find a way off this place. Since Griff'd gone, I'd felt chained to Taris with the rest of the Lower City. I'd dream that maybe one day, when I lifted enough creds, I could buy a ticket off-world for me and Big Z.

Dreams to make me smile, but I never really knew how good my chances were.

But now.... They were off-worlders, and they were doing something important. I couldn't help but wonder if they had something to do with the Republic escape pods, too. Jen said Carth was a pilot....

I figured since we were all on the same team now, I should be with them. I'd been out here long enough. Sure, Zaalbar would howl at me for a bit, but he'd get over it - he always did. And earlier, when they'd all disappeared into the Vulkar base, my gaze had landed on a terminal inside just before the door had closed.

I could slice into that, an' access the vid-feeds. I'll be able to find them and spot a clear path to catch up.

I grinned to myself, and took a silent step forwards. A couple of halogens shone bright on the durasteel entrance, lighting up the door against the shadows of the sewers. It was unlocked, now - all I had to do was depress the controls.

I pulled out my bio-scanner and ran a quick check. It was usually reliable through a door's thickness of durasteel, and the malfunction I'd thought from earlier was actually just a clear reading of that freakish rancor. I shivered. I'd never seen anything like that thing. Not unless I counted those horror vids Griff used to like, the ones he'd trick me into watching just to snigger at me when I screamed. I'd always thought the monsters from those dumb holo-vids were just special effects of... some producer high on gree-spice or something. Now, I wondered if they'd gotten their inspiration from real-life creatures.

The scanner was beeping back at me in reassurance: No sentient life detected. Its accuracy range was well beyond the door before it started to plummet, so I bit my lip, darted forward, and slammed my hand on the door control before I lost my nerve.

The entrance to the Vulkar base was empty.

I ran forward to the terminal, hurriedly inserting a tech spike from my belt. The OS was IntelSec, an earlier variant of the IntelliSecurity system the Beks used, and I'd sliced that enough times I could do it blind-folded. Okay, so usually I bullied one of Gadon’s utility droids into helping, but even so – it was child’s play to hack into the back end, disable the holo-interface, and go straight to command input. Inserting my datapad, I ran a couple of quick batches that soon gave me master control.

First things first – schematics. With a couple of taps, I found and launched a holo-map of the base. It was smaller than I expected, with a couple of vertical shafts that rose deep into the Lower City. The bulk of the base was closer to the Undercity, though, which explained why the Beks could never place this base on their sonic mapping devices.

The Lower City was a mess of corridors, tunnels, and collapsed sinkholes. Any schematic that was near to accurate soon become less so – certain parts of Taris were just plain dangerous to exist in, and that wasn’t even counting in the gangs or the Exchange. I’d had a bit to do with the sonic mapping - me and Big Z were wizard at modifying comm gadgets to include sonic transmitters that sent data back to a mapping program. But even with all that info, we’d never been able to place the nearby Vulkar residence. Oh, the Beks knew about some of their other heavily guarded strongholds further away, but this one… it’d bugged me for months, ever since one of the Beks had come across the guarded front entrance in the centre of Lower Taris.

Our sonic tech had thrown contradictions when we'd tried to map it from a distance - there just didn't seem to be enough sheer space to house a stronghold of Vulkar scum. And that's why I’d wondered about the sewers – if their base went deep down into the depths, it’d make sense. Tarisians shied away from the Undercity, for good reason. Looked like the Vulkars had capitalized on that real estate.

I was changing the output to the holo-cam network when a bright red error flashed across the top of the screen. A second later, a piercing siren cut through the air. I squeaked at the ominous words blinking at me.

Alarm activated by unauthorised access.

Bantha poodoo! Was that me? My fingers flew over the keyboard as I desperately hacked into the security functions.

The back of my neck felt suddenly hot. The stupid warning wasn't disappearing from the console. Unauthorised access? Far out, I'm not the one charging in with guns blazing! Wasn't that just the luck, though- the others could barge in, somehow without tripping a single alarm- I do the teensiest bit of slicing and suddenly every dumb siren in the place starts ringing-

The wailing noise cut out with a strangled whine. I blinked, tapped one more key, and the flashing red message vanished from the screen.

My breath caught in my throat. Please, let any nearby peeps think that was just a false alarm. I turned the door, listening for any sounds. Maybe there was a faint yell in the distance, but definitely nothing close by. Huffing in relief, I bent back over the screen and hooked into the vid-feeds again.

There were no sents anywhere near me, but I spotted a couple of patrol droids in nearby rooms. With a wrinkle of my nose, I shut down the access doors and locked them in. If they had security specs they might be able to slice through the doors, but it'd give me some time at least.

I had no idea where the others had gone. I'd heard blaster shots when they'd first left me, which had petered away into silence after a few minutes. Scrolling through the feeds, I spotted a maintenance room that housed a backup generator and server system by the looks. Piles of broken blasters and swoop bike parts littered the floor. On the far end, there was a workbench with a slumped Vulkar corpse laying over it. Jackpot! They went this way!

From there, it wasn't too hard to follow their trail. I was briefly side-tracked by unlocking the armoury, idly wishing I had time to explore it, and then continued to track the gang through the cams. I switched the feed to a large training room, and the cam threw up a scene of havoc to my surprised eyes.

Turrets were firing at three figures stuck between the guns and a mob of sentients. One of the three looked distinctly tall and hairy. Poodoo! They're trapped! How the Vulkars had caught them in front of the guns I didn't know, but it looked nasty.

I gotta do something. They'll die otherwise! Turrets.... I quickly switched to the gun access control.

Turrets deactivated.

I watched the screen tensely.

Half a minute later, and they ran around the corner. A blinding flash of light exploded right in the middle of the mob running after them. Grenades. Good one, Jen!

I searched the terminal intently for any survivors, and saw only one Vulkar struggling to get back on his feet. Jen's head reappeared through the doorway. She quickly scanned the room, shot the sole remaining survivor, and then vanished.

She scares me like that. I know it's better to be safe, but sometimes Jen can act so bloodthirsty. I guessed battle rage must get to her; she was really nice otherwise.

I decided it was time to catch up with them, so quickly tied up loose ends by hemming in a couple more patrol droids, and unlocking the doors directly in Jen’s path.

With a deep breath, I checked my path once more on the vid-feed, and then darted deeper into the base. I grasped a light, but accurate, Senturi blaster, and stayed tight behind each corner before stepping out to clear it. When I ran into the maintenance room, I took a moment to quickly rifle through the corpses' pockets, slipping the loaded chits into my belt. There was no point turning down easy credits, after all.

I made it to the training room, stepping over Vulkar bodies as I passed. I wonder just how close the others were to dying. I shivered. It had looked pretty grim, from the terminal.

The thought of that incident made me realize they might still be in trouble. They might need my help. I raced down to the lower level of the Vulkar Base. Broken droids and smoke greeted me.

Sheesh, what happened now? I walked through the clouds of smoke, scouting around for any movement. Nothing here. Where are they? I crept onward, further into Vulkar offices. Dead gang members met my eye. I heard voices, followed by a howl that was distinctly familiar. Big Z!

I dashed into the next office, and saw all three of them, standing over a pile of corpses. Carth was clutching his side, and blood was splattered gruesomely over Jen’s armour. I grinned stupidly, and ducked back behind the entrance, keeping an eye out for any unwanted arrivals.

"Crazy reckless woman," I heard Carth mutter back in the room.

"(You continue to surprise me, Jen Sahara)."

"Do you think this is it, guys?" Jen asked in a muffled voice. It sounded like she was bending over.

“That’s a swoop accelerator,” Carth confirmed, in a confident voice that said he knew what he was talking about. “Here’s hoping it’s the right one. Grab it, and let’s get out of here.”

Wow, they actually found it!

I could hear Jen grunt, before Zaalbar interrupted her. "(Let me carry it. It will not be a burden to me, Jen Sahara)."

In my spare hand, I pulled out my datapad and flicked to the base schematics. We weren’t far from the shaft to the Lower City, here, just down a hallway and through the only exit. The base was eerily quiet, and it made sense to extract quick, before Vulkar reinforcements arrived. I put the ‘pad back and retrieved my ‘scanner: still no nearby life-forms.

"It was pretty lucky how the turrets turned off like that, don't you think?" Jen was saying in a considering tone.

"Luck follows you around like fleas on a bantha,” Carth muttered. “How you manage to survive daily is beyond me.”

Far out, he's as grumpy as Big Z on a diet.

Jen laughed in response. "Lighten up, Onasi," she said mildly.

"Lighten up? You just stormed a whole room of Vulkars in a crazy rage!" He sighed. “Look, I know you’re good, Jen. You have the skills of an elite commando, and your speed in battle is more than impressive. But luck, and luck only, has stopped you from dying multiple times since I’ve met you! It's driving me crazy."

"(Carth Onasi is right)," Zaalbar agreed. I blinked in surprise. Sheesh, she must have done something nuts for Big Z to speak up. "(You should have waited for us. I cannot protect you if you run off)."

"I've survived this long without anyone protecting me!" Jen flared. I know what she means. Though I never thought I'd see the day when Zaalbar tried to coddle her! Usually, he reserved that just for me.

"(You have said that we are on a quest together. That means we should help each other. If you run off, you endanger the whole mission)." Zaalbar paused for a minute. "(I am sorry, Jen Sahara. I should not lecture you so. But you are headstrong, and I worry you will get into danger where I cannot be of assistance)."

"I don't know what the Wookiee just said, but I'm with him," Carth cut in.
Jen laughed suddenly. I was surprised at the quick change from anger to humour. "Okay, okay, guys. You're right, and I'm wrong."

I heard their footsteps and bit back a grin. Boy, was I going to surprise them! I laid myself flat against the cool alloy wall, holding my breath.

Carth stepped out first; I was totally unprepared for his military instincts to kick in – his arm swung out, blaster aimed precisely at my head.

"Eep," I squeaked, staring cross-eyed at the laser barrel that was altogether too close to my head. "Mission!" Carth cried, aghast. "Stang, do you have any idea how close I was to shooting you?"

Embarrassment chased away the fright lurking in my belly when I realized how potentially stupid sneaking up on allies in enemy territory was. I could feel my cheeks burn.

"Mission?" Jen exclaimed, stepping out next to Carth. Her eyes closed in exasperation.

"(Mission!)" Zaalbar roared, pushing past Jen to confront me. "(You should not be here!)

Jen sighed, "Stars, if Gadon finds out you were in the Vulkar ba-"

"He won't!" I insisted. "Cause none of us are stupid enough to tell him, right?"

"(Mission)," Zaalbar howled mournfully. "(You promised me)."

"I know, I know, okay? It's just- I was scared out there. And I knew I could hack into the Vulkars' system and use the vids to find a clear path to you guys." I put my hands on my hips in what I hoped was a confident pose, and stared all three of them in the eye, one by one. "Look, I know what I'm doing, okay? And my 'scanner says it's all clear to the Lower City lift. Which is that way."

I pointed a finger smugly, and their heads all swiveled to face down the corridor. Jen turned back to shot me a stare that, I hoped, held some respect amidst the amusement.

"Okay, let's get out of here then," Jen murmured, taking the lead and drawing a vibrosword she must have picked up from a Vulkar corpse.

Carth made to follow her, but first glanced at me, and his expression still bordered on horrified. "Don't- don't ever do that again," he said quietly. "Between you and Jen, it's surprising I haven't turned grey."

Jen snickered. "I'm sure I can see some white hairs, old man," she teased as Carth stepped next to her.

Carth threw her a half-hearted glare. "I need a vacation," he muttered to himself.

I glanced up at my old buddy Big Z to see him staring solemnly at me. It had taken me years to decipher the expressions of my Wookiee friend, but I knew that one. Disappointment. I sighed.

"Come on, admit it, Onasi. You'd be bored if Mission and I weren't around," Jen said in a light voice, ahead of us.

"I'm sorry, Big Z," I said quietly. "It's the truth, though. I was scared. And I don't do well being left behind."
“Bored?” Carth replied in a mock-outraged voice. “Bored? Listen, sister, I get more welcome attention from a blaster rifle!”

Zaalbar sighed, and then nodded at me. He almost seemed understanding, then, and my heart lifted a little.

We’d neared the only exit of the hallway; an opening that, according to my schematics, should lead into a spacious room that housed the lifts out of here. Jen halted just before the entrance, her weapon raised and her off-hand sending a shushing motion to Carth. “I named you well, Blaster Boy,” she whispered, “Though I seriously think you need to get out more.”

With a wicked grin, she leapt into the open doorway, Carth hot on her heels with his guns raised. We heard no audible sound of battle, indicating that this part of the base was still, thankfully, unoccupied.

“I get out plenty!” I heard Carth protest feebly.

“(Those two bicker like a mated pair),” Zaalbar grumbled as we turned into the room. He gave me a quick look. “(Although, do not tell Jen Sahara I said that).”

I giggled. “No way, Big Z. Boy, do you get funny ideas sometimes.”

xXx

The trip back was uneventful. The Vulkar lift had groaned and squeaked while we ascended, and we’d all been set to fight battle when the doors opened. Zaalbar even put the swoop part down in readiness. But either the alarm had sent the Vulkars running, or they’d had some other warning. My guess was that the Vulkars had all retreated into one of their other, more fortified, strongholds.

We’d come out near Gadon’s base of operations, and as we crossed into familiar ground I felt the tenseness leave my shoulders. Carth had even put his blaster away, although he did keep his hand glued to his hip.

We were an odd bunch – a Twi’lek teenager, two Humans, and a Wookiee carrying a machine part – but no passerby gave us a second glance. It was the Lower City after all. We got all sorts down here.

"So, you guys gonna spill before we see Gadon, or what?” I demanded, as we crossed behind Javyar’s Cantina. In my head, this marked my own territory. I always felt a bit uneasy at the Vulkar end of the Lower City, but Central was home.

"We're all a team now, right?” Jen posed that to Carth, more as a demand than anything else.

He stared at her for a moment, before nodding agreement.

"Gadon's offered to sponsor us in the swoop race, in return for the accelerator," Jen said. I felt my eyes widen with wonder. Whoa!

"Swoop racing? Awesome!” I cried. “Whoa, Jen, you're a swooper?”"

"Um, I-"

"I always wanted to enter, but Zaerdra will never let me!” I gushed. “Too young, she says, but hah! I can beat nearly all the Bek's on the practice track!”
Jen stopped walking, and turned to face me. "I-

"I love swoop racing!" I burst out- even talking about it made me grin. My favourite daydream was, one day, being a famous swoop racer for the Beks. I should be out there this year. Other gangs had put forward riders younger than me. "Y'know, there never used to be an age limit until I took an interest in swooping. Zaerdra convinced Gadon to put one in place for the Beks last year just to stop me entering any of the races."

"(She worries, Mission)," Zaalbar rumbled. "(People die from swoop racing)."

"So?" I challenged. "There's only about one death a year!" I fell silent. If only I could race! I had a natural skill for swooping, I knew that much. Gadon would happily sponsor me, if not for Zaerdra!

It suddenly struck me as odd that Jen and Carth were entering the competition. And Gadon made them go to an awful lot of effort just to race. Doesn't seem like him.

"Why do you guys want to enter, anyways?" I asked.

"We want the prize," Jen said simply.

I wrinkled my nose. "Ew, a slave? You're gonna set that person free, aren't you?" Why would they want a Republic officer, anyway? I remembered Jen's slip about Carth being a pilot. Everything fell into place, and I couldn't believe how stupid I'd been. My mouth dropped.

"Whoa, you guys are with the Republic, aren't you?" I whispered in awe.

Carth was looking ahead stonily; I guess he'd reconciled himself to Jen spilling the beans, but wasn't taking any part himself.

"I guess," Jen said weakly.

"(You are making a habit of rescuing people, Jen Sahara. You have a lot of honour)."

"It's not something I want to do regularly, Zaalbar. After Bastila, I'm heading off this rock."

My head twitched up. Bastila? Is that the name of the Republic Officer? I was certain I'd heard it elsewhere. The Sith! "She's that Jedi the Sith are after!" the words burst out. Jen nodded at me. Wow! What a quest! I loved hearing stories about Jedi and Dark Jedi, although I'd never really been sure how much of their mystical power was true and how much was hearsay. Sometimes I wondered if all that mind-tricking and Force talk was just that: talk to make the Sith scarier and the Jedi more impressive.

Regardless, our future now seemed full of possibilities, and I almost didn't notice when we reached the Bek base.

Jen and Carth hurried to meet with Gadon, and I lurked behind to catch up on the news. Zaalbar had disappeared in the direction of the Beks' kitchen, which didn't surprise me considering the ominous rumblings I'd heard from his stomach earlier.

When I strolled over to Gadon, I saw Zaerdra wielding her blade and glaring furiously at Jen.

"Sheesh, where's the fire, Zaerdra?" I called. "You look ready to kill someone."

"I am not cheating you," Gadon was saying mildly to Jen, but his expression was tense. "At least grant me the bare courtesy of finishing before you yell at me. In my own base." Gadon inclined his head towards a group of armed Beks. Alarm jangled through me. What did Jen say?
Zaerdra turned towards me, her violet eyes boring into mine angrily. "(This human has no respect. If she threatens Gadon again, I will kill her.)" Her headtails were twitching with furious threats of bodily harm.

"No! She saved my life!" I burst out. Zaerdra’s glare deepened.

Jen had a look of black rage on her face, but it seemed to settle down when she glanced my way. She took a few deep breaths, and started talking in a controlled voice. "Gadon, I was under the impression I’d be using the accelerator in the race in return for obtaining it. If I use one of your standard bikes I’ll have no chance of winning. I thought that was the deal."

"The deal was that I’d sponsor you in the race," Gadon told her flatly.

"So you get what you want, but I don’t get anything." Jen had crossed her arms, and her tone turned low and ominously quiet. Carth tensed, his eyes pinned on Zaerdra.

"(She is asking for trouble. I am quite happy to give it to her)," Zaerdra growled at me. I saw Jen's eyes flick briefly over the Twi'lek.

"I have no use for a Republic officer," Gadon responded. "I had thought to turn her over to you, in return for what you have done for us, after the Beks win the swoop race. That was before you started threatening me." His expression was hard, unyielding. I don't think I've ever seen Gadon this angry. Well, not since Brejik turned traitor, anyways.

"Jen." I decided it was time for everyone to chill out. "Don't get so tense – we're all friends here, right? Gadon's a good man, you can trust him. And Gadon, Jen may act a little grouchy, but she's really nice – she saved both my life and Big Z's!"

Everyone turned to stare at me in surprise. "What?" I said, a little defensively.

The corner of Jen's mouth twitched, right before she let out a peal of laughter. "You're right, Mission. I'm sorry Gadon, I guess I'm not used to trusting people."

Gadon nodded at her. "Apology accepted." He said no more.

"So," Jen prompted. "Is this our deal then? If a Bek wins, we get the prize?"

Gadon stared at her hard for a moment, his eyes narrowing, before he finally seemed to relent. "Yes."

"Okay," Jen said slowly. "Then why sponsor me at all?"

"For your sake, rather than mine," Gadon explained. "I don't trust Brejik to give his prize away quietly. The Beks are only there to win the race, and hence the loyalty of the undecided smaller gangs. If Brejik pulls something with your Republic officer – and I doubt he'll give up such a prize easily – then it's up to you whether you act on the scene. The Beks will not help. We do not wish to start a bloodbath."

Jen had crossed her arms and pursed her lips, obviously deep in thought. "Fair enough. If all four of us are there then we could be ready for any stunts."

A look of unease crossed Gadon's lined face. "Only riders and mechanics are allowed on the swoop track. I'm afraid you'll be on your own."

Jen's eyes widened in disbelief. "Oh, this will be fun," she muttered.
Gadon smiled; honestly, I couldn't really see why, but at least he didn't look like he wanted to kill her or boot her out the door anymore. "I hope it will all go as planned. But I'm not fool enough to expect it. Now, you are welcome to stay at the Bek base for the next few days if you wish. But a warning - threaten anyone again and not only is the deal off, but you will be considered an intruder."

Shutters fell over Jen's face. She said nothing, but instead threw Gadon a short, sharp nod of agreement.

"(I still do not trust her)," Zaerdra muttered.

Jen turned to leave, and I pointed her towards the Bek kitchen. As we reached the doorway, Jen paused, just long enough to throw an impish grin back at Zaerdra.

"(The feeling's mutual, sweetheart!)" Jen fired the words with a cheeky wave, before slipping ahead of me into the next room. I stayed only long enough to see Zaerdra blush dark indigo in outrage, and then ran outta there before she heard me laughing. Far out! Jen knows Ryl as well?

"You sound like a gizka, your accent is so bad," I giggled as I caught up to Jen. She threw me a jaunty wink.

Over a free meal in the kitchen, the four of us decided to take up Gadon's offer and camp out at the Base for the next few days. I was pretty excited to be watching my friend in the race, but I couldn't help a traitorous feeling of envy. I could be good.

I caught Jen alone later that day in the same kitchenette.

“So, Jen, you going to do some practice runs on the swoop track?” I asked, jumping up to sit on the plasteel table that carried a dozen dirty eating receptacles. It creaked under my weight.

Jen’s face scrunched up in annoyance. “I asked around, but the track’s been shut down in preparation for the race. Guess I’m going to have to wing it.” She shot me a sidelong glance. “If only I knew how to swoop... or knew someone who did.”

And, once more, Jen stunned me into wonder. “Jen!” I hissed, swinging my legs. “Are you saying what I think you’re saying?”

A mischievous smile curved her lips. “What do you say, Mission? You up for a prank?”

I paused, thinking it over. “I dunno, Jen. It’ll annoy the snot out of Gadon and Zaerdra – which I don’t mind, but she’s shot people for less, y’know?”

Jen snorted. “She doesn’t scare me, Mission. Besides, I wasn’t planning on telling them.”

Holding back a grin of excitement was hard. “How would this work? ‘Cause, don’t you have to be there on the track, for that Jedi woman?”

“Yes – and I want to concentrate purely on rescuing her. It makes senses to have a more seasoned rider racing.” She looked at me slyly. “I need a mechanic, you know. If you can sort that out, then we’ll switch outfits on the day.”

Exhilaration punched hard into my stomach as I started believing that we, really, could pull this off. “And Big Z, Carth? We gonna hide it from them?”

“No,” she said. “Leave them to me. I’ll make them understand I need your skills.”
The nod to my abilities made me blush slightly in pleasure. Jen really, truly, thought I was a useful member of our group. Everyone else just treated me like a wayward kid. She must had read something in my expression, for hers softened with a small smile.

“They don’t realize yet who turned the turrets off,” she murmured. “You saved our butts in there, Mission.”

“Oh. Yeah! I guess I did,” I grinned at her, and then jumped off the table, grabbing her hand impulsively in a handshake. “Before you change your mind,” I said, shaking her hand vigorously.

“Okay,” she replied, laughing, and extracted her limb. “It’s a deal.”

xXx
The days before the swoop race passed slowly, and the sinking feeling of trepidation sat like a lead ball in my stomach. The idle time was messing with my head, and I found myself snapping irritably at everyone while I second-guessed both my objectives and my own emotions.

What I wanted desperately was to be on my way – finished with the mission and everything to do with the Republic.

The Republic… my feelings were mixed, now. Earlier, I’d been certain I detested the lumbering galactic empire as much as the cruel Sith, but these days having been forced into companionship with Carth – quintessential Republic military, if there was such a thing – had me doubting my feelings. A core part of me believed in the ideals of the Republic, the galactic conglomeration of all different cultures and species working together, doing their best to strive for peace.

A dictatorship is stronger, more efficient, and less corrupt than the Republic Senate.

But it was also crueler. And just plain wrong. The drive for collective harmony – even if it was unrealistic to believe the end-point would ever be reached – was an admirable one.

But an empire with one leader – like, say, the Sith, is more powerful against any threat. The Republic has grown weak. Look how easily the Mandalorians almost conquered the Core.

My thoughts twisted in on themselves, Street Kid versus Evil Bitch, with the occasional cower from Jen Sahara in the shadows. My thoughts jumped around, landing on topics that I couldn’t recall, dredging up facts that I couldn’t back-up. What did I know about the Mandalorian Wars? It had been a precursor to Malak’s rise to power, him and his master both – they’d led a shaky, vulnerable Republic to victory against the invaders that had come perilously close to the vanquishing the largest government in the galaxy. And then- the heroes and half their fleet viciously turned on the Republic.

My mind hurt when I tried to dwell on it, sharp pains digging into the side of my temple where I’d injured it back on the ‘Spire. So I’d flinch away, and think about something else.

Bastila. I wasn’t scared of her. I kept trying to remind myself of that, but a confrontation with the very Jedi bonded to me, and who likely had something to do with my identity crisis, left me in a state where fear and anger constantly battled for supremacy.

The bond hadn’t yet returned. For all I knew, Bastila may have already died. No. I would have felt it. And it would not have been pretty. It was a dark, confident part of me that somehow knew Force bonds weren’t so easy to wiggle out of. Which made me consider, again, whether I should just run.

But where would I go? Back to… Deralia? The very thought of Jen’s homeworld made me scoff. I need to rescue Bastila, and then I can slip away. Disappear somewhere in space. I’m self-sufficient, I’ll survive. But she might be able to help me. Explain things. Jedi were meant to be good, right, so surely I could trust her?
Definitely, she’s a Jedi! Jen thought in quiet awe before I harshly quenched it. No. It’s safer to run once she’s rescued.

But the sinking thought kept returning: Bastila is bonded to me. If she knows something about the fractures in my mind, then will she really be willing to let me just leave? My fists clenched. I will not let some trumped up Jedi brat tell me what to do. I closed my eyes. Some trumped up Jedi brat who has a very powerful control over the mental side of the Force. Why am I rescuing her again?

At least I was starting to get some sort of handle on using the Force. I’d drawn on it to increase my speed a number of times in the sewers, and could almost control it. It was the almost part that had me edging away from experimenting. I slaughtered an innocent when both my fury and the Force pummeling through my body combined.

A deadly combination.

I decided it was time to do something before my emotions transformed into a killing rage. I snuck out the back entrance of the Bek base that Mission had pointed out earlier. Both Carth and the Wookiee seemed averse to letting me venture out by myself. Fortunately, Mission was used to evading overprotective guards, and had for some reason taken a shine to me. I don’t know why. But I can’t help liking that little street punk myself.

I headed down to the Undercity, using a datapad holo-map that Mission had slipped me as a guide. She’d annotated a couple of her shortcuts, and they were proving to be very useful. It seemed that Mission and Zaalbar had been instrumental in the sonic mapping technology the Beks used, and her maps were second to none in regards to accuracy. Apparently, she made a little profit on the side from selling copies of them – although she complained to me that most of it went straight to Gadon. Considering the maps changed frequently due to ongoing construction in the Lower City and the odd sinkhole, the income was steady. Somehow, I felt that should Mission remain on Taris she’d end up doing just fine.

But Zaalbar was sworn to me now, as incredible as that still seemed. And Mission would follow him. The weight of their lives sat heavy on my soul when I stopped to think about it.

As I neared the dwelling in the Undercity, the villagers spotted me with wide-eyed glances of alarm, scurrying off like insects. For some reason, this increased my irritation. My objective was easy to complete – the half-sane milky-eyed old man, Rukil, who squinted at me as I approached.

"Ahh! Our saviour returns! Have you found success upon your quest for the Promised Land?"

Nice. I will be nice. "I have something of interest to you, old man." I pulled out the two data journals I’d discovered, and dropped them at his feet. Rukil gasped, scrabbling around in the dirt to pick them up. There was a moment’s silence as he peered closely at the first journal, and I turned to walk away.

"It is as I feared, then," he mumbled. "Malya is dead. But although I am saddened, there is yet hope in this discovery," he trailed off, and switched on the second datapad. I’d taken three steps by this time, shoulders tensing.

"You have found my father's journal also! It is a miracle!" His voice turned rapturous. "You are truly marked as our saviour!"

I stopped, turned and glared. "I am nobody's saviour," I growled, my voice low and harsh.

He shook his head in disbelief. "You are marked, up-worlder - even my dim old eyes can see the mantle of destiny that cloaks you. There is but one more journal left."

No. No, damn everything to the Outer Rim and back. I will not play at being a hero anymore than I have to. “I've got you two. Get some other champion to find the third. I am leaving and will not be coming back.” I snarled the last words and stalked away.

The rage simmered like a fire in my gut, and I could find no explanation for it. Idealistic words like destiny and saviour sat like sick in my stomach and my sleep that night was restless. I’d made my decision and I wouldn’t retract it – but thoughts of the loony old geezer and his missing third journal kept me awake all night.

xXx

The day of the swoop race dawned. All thoughts of the Undercity had cleared from my mind, which sharpened in concentration to the day's upcoming events. Finally, action to keep me engaged and focused, and away from the insidious, contradictory maelstrom of thoughts.

The wrist-comm Carth had forced upon me sat heavy on my arm. I had yet to discover exactly how Mission was planning to exchange places with the mechanic Gadon had assigned to me, but I expected she wouldn't let me down.

"(May fortune shine upon you today, Jen Sahara)," Zaalbar farewelled me as I followed the other Bek riders to the swoop track.

"Good luck," Carth said a trifle hesitantly. "I, uh, well. Good luck."

I raised my eyebrows at him. "Got a speech impediment there, Flyboy?"

He shot me an unimpressed look from behind the chestnut hair that kept falling in his eyes. He needed a haircut. "No. Look, I just wanted to say - thank you. For what happened in the Undercity. I- uh, I never acknowledged what you did. I guess I got a bit too- well, annoyed. But you saved my life, Jen. Thank you."

His words came out genuine and heartfelt, even if the man stuttered uncomfortably over them. I didn't need his gratitude, though. I didn't want it. For some reason, the idea of anyone feeling indebted to me felt bitterly unwelcome.

"Forget it," I said in a cold tone.

He frowned at me. "I can't. I'd be dead, if it wasn't for you."

"Yeah, well, you saved my life first. We're even. Let me get you Bastila, and then I'll be out of your life permanently." I strode off.

"Dammit, Jen!" he cursed after me, but I continued walking.

The group of Bek riders reached the mechanic bay, and Anglu lead me to the swoop I was going to race. Anglu was the Beks’ prime swoop racer; a tiny Twi'lek whose slight frame concealed a wiry strength. She was the one chosen to ride the experimental bike.

"Gadon will not be here on the track today," she told me quietly in Basic. "He does not wish a slaughter, and his presence may cause one."

I nodded at her, and eyed over the bike.
"So, where's my mechanic?"

"Jaz should be along any minute."

"Thanks, Anglu. And good luck."

She smiled at me, and walked away. A minute later, a short figure in lime green fire-retardant synthetics with a customized matching helmet scampered up to me.

"I'm here, Jen!" the figure hissed. I turned to face Mission, and could not quite still the impish grin that crawled over my face.

"Nice helmet," I said, aware my voice had turned sardonic.

"It's the only way I could sneak in! Quick, let's duck into the workroom so you can change."

"I hope my clothes aren't that hideous colour," I muttered as I followed her.

Mission had acquired me a set of drab, grimy overalls, with a hood to shadow my face. I changed quickly, grimacing at the pungent smell of the worn clothing as I tugged it over my combat armour. Oil stains and burn marks decorated the drab material.

"I thought you were coming as my mechanic?" I asked.

"Nah, too tricky as Jaz was with some of the others. I jus' slipped a lil sedative into his caffa, and then faked a racing entry pass for one of the small gangs."

My brows shot up. I couldn't help but respect the crazy girl. She may be impulsive, but she sure can get results.

"So, where did you get this lovely pair of overalls?" I questioned, as I fastened the front.

"I just found them lying about," she answered innocently. Lying about, eh? I pulled the hood over my face, and my vision dimmed. I had a faint, dizzy sensation, almost like a half-remembered dream, before it dissipated like cigarra smoke in a stiff breeze.

"Let's go, Jen! Oooh, I can't wait!" Mission was practically hopping with excitement. I had to grin at her exuberance. Sometimes she seemed so, delightfully, young.

We headed back out to the swoops, and the minute we were within arm's reach of my competing bike, sitting on standby in the pits, Mission placed reverent hands on the chassis and started gushing over it.

"This is one of those R4 souped-up lithium speeders!" she said in awe. "Did you know, an earlier model of this raced by the Spider Furies won last year's championship?"

I blinked. No, funnily enough I did not. I knew Mission wanted to race, but I hadn't picked her for a fan. She was nodding eagerly.

"Yeah, and the Beks came second the year before on one of these – the debut of the technology! Okay, the Ravager series is considered more superior now but."

Her effusive display halted at my upraised hand. I smirked. "Okay, okay, it's a good bike. I get it. Even if Anglu got the prototype accelerator."

"Well, yeah, but you can't blame Gadon." Mission shrugged. "He needs to win this year."
The Bek racers were moving out to the front of the track, and we joined them. No one paid us a second glance. As we approached the scene, my eyes flicked over the motley crowd. Vulkars outnumbered everyone, including the Beks, and a wary disquiet filled me. I spotted a number of other smaller gangs, but none were as prominent as the Beks or the Vulkars. Far in the distance, I could make out a large silvery arch that heralded the start of the track.

At the side of the hangar near the podium, a cage gleamed under artificial lighting.

"Whoa, that's the Jedi?" Mission whispered quietly.

I stared at the prone form. Chrome glinted around her throat. Neural disruptor. Blocks the Force. That's why I can't sense her. Even from this distance, I could see porcelain skin, a voluptuous form, and delicately braided dark hair. Tight, scanty scraps of black leather clothed her.

Darkness challenged me, and I was transported.

...

A door opened, and I stood waiting, expectant. Three Jedi entered the room cautiously, and even from a distance I could recognize the centre figure: Bastila Shan.

...

"Jen, you okay?"

I blinked rapidly, shaking away the vision. "Yeah. Fine."

So Bastila and I have met before. But as friends, or foes?

Mission had turned back, scanning the crowd. But inside my head, the dark thoughts still spun, tripping over themselves in confusion and anger. Of course I've met her before, bonehead. How else would the bond be created?

My gaze dragged unerringly back to the trapped woman. She looked so powerless, slumped inside the cage, hands bound in metallic shackles that crossed at her front. She should be dead, a voice growled softly. She will be dead!

The heat of anger returned in a surge, threatening to shatter through the calm concentration I wanted- I needed- to get through the damn day. I swallowed, squeezed my eyes shut, and forcibly turned my thoughts back to that old tactical game a part of me had once played.

I will rescue her, and then I will leave. The game board rose like a mirage in my minds-eye, like a focus for calm. I will rescue her, and then I will leave.

"I can't believe a Jedi could be so helpless, though," Mission whispered at my side. "Like, makes you wonder how true all those stories about them really are."

There was something... something foreign edging around the sides of my consciousness. Something I was beginning to recognize all too well.

"She's not helpless," I mumbled through cold lips. The calm in my head shook, but this time with alarm. "Not anymore."

The bond was returning. I snapped open my eyes, staring frantically at the prisoner again. Her hands - which had been restrained, or seemingly so - were fiddling at her exposed neck. Fiddling with the Force-blocking device that kept her helpless - and out of my mind.

I've got to stay calm and collected. I pushed back the anger. The despair. Shoved it all away. I can't let myself lose control, not here, not with Mission next to me. If the kath crap is about to hit the fan, I have to make sure Mission gets away safe.

The Jedi's limbs had dropped back to her front, clasped like they were still constrained by the metallic bands around her wrists. The neural disruptor rested innocently against her creamy skin.

I should have been glad the Jedi had found a way to initiate her own escape. I could have understood if my brief, blazing anger from earlier had returned. But my thoughts were cooling, instead; transposing into a hard-edged wariness, as I dragged my attention away from the semi-bound prisoner and began to survey the area.

"What do you mean?" Mission hissed.

"Stay close," I said curtly. "And wait-"

"Jen Sahara," a gravelly voice at my back interrupted. I tensed, turning in a quick movement to catch sight of a large, armoured mercenary. "We meet again."

"Canderous Ordo," I acknowledged in mild surprise. He recognized me through this disguise? I was impressed. Either he'd been watching me since I entered the pit lane, or he'd had inside knowledge of the Beks racing list. As a merc, I'd lay credits on him working for the Exchange, but I couldn't be sure.

Whatever the Mandalorian was doing, here, I could only hope his objective didn't interfere with mine.

I felt my eyebrow quirk as I eyed him over in obvious appraisal. He was wielding a formidable repeating blaster slung over his shoulder, with blaster pistols holstered on either side of his waist. His helm was raised to reveal a chiselled, weathered face staring hard at me in consideration.

The rest of his large and, no doubt, heavily muscled body was encased in a full set of heavy armour. Not the beskar'gam his clans had prided themselves on, maybe; but the man was formidably attired nonetheless.

Here was one merc I didn't underestimate.

"I didn't pick you for a swoop fan," I said lightly.

As a dig for information, it worked.

"I'm not." His lips curled at the thought. "My employer has an interest in Brejik's little toy." He indicated the caged Jedi.

Oh great, I thought sourly. I'm going to piss off a Mandalorian.

A controlled flow of anger bubbled at the edges of my thoughts - but it wasn't mine. Not this time. Bastila, rousing, and invading my senses over our stars-cursed bond. She was going to act, sooner or later - I could only hope she had the sense to wait for the opportune time.

::The annual Taris swoop race shall now began!:: An amplified broadcast from the race announcer echoed over the hum of the crowd.::Please collect your tickets from the race controller,
"Wait!" a loud, aggressive voice sliced through the cheers. I looked up towards the control deck, where the winners podium had been erected on a dais in preparation for the race's completion. An armoured man strode belligerently in front of the control deck, clad in shining black and red armour. His pose was cocky and sure as he scanned the crowd.

Brejik. The disgusted thought scythed through my mind, and it wasn't- it wasn't mine.

I blinked, stunned. Was that Bastila? Was our close proximity making the bond so frelling powerful? Did I really justâ€¦ hear her thoughts?

"Before this starts, there is one gang here that has illegal equipment, and therefore should be disqualified!" The speaker exuded a combative air of authority, and considering his garb it had to be Brejik. The leader of the Vulkars.

Angry voices muttered from the clusters of swoop racers, loudest from those dressed in Bek colours. They'd been warned by Gadon to expect trouble, but I had the feeling that everyone thought they might actually get a race or two in first.

The armoured Mandalorian next to me looked amused, but his grip was sure on his weapon. He was used to action, and could sense it coming. So could I.

I leaned over to Mission. "Things are about to get violent. You need to get ready to run out of here on my command."

"The Bek racers are cheating!" Brejik hollered over the dissenting crowd. "Investigate that bike, and you will find an illegal accelerator!" An armoured hand raised, and pointed directly at Anglu's bike.

"What? You mean the prototype you tried to steal from us?" a Bek yelled out angrily.

"See!" Brejik demanded. "They admit their guilt!"

Several of the smaller gangs backed away to the edges of the track. Canderous hefted his repeating blaster into a ready position, surveying the scene with interest. My eyes were pinned to the Jedi. Patience. Wait for the right time. Was that my thought, or hers? I couldn’t tell.

"You're a liar, Brejik!" A Sullustan in Bek colours was shaking his fist angrily at the Vulkar leader. That decided me.

"Mission, scram. Now," I ordered into her ear.

"But-"

"Get. Out." My voice was low, dangerous, demanding. She backpedalled before turning and dashing out of the pit lane and towards the Lower City exit.

"You lead your people well," Canderous remarked. My hand crept under the overalls to clutch a blaster. I mentally cursed the fact that I hadn't snuck a vibrosword in – but at the time I'd thought that smuggling in two blasters posed enough of a risk, considering the race controllers took perverse delight in searching those who hadn't bribed them enough. The Beks, on the whole, were heavily equipped, but as an independent racing for them I wasn't given quite the same status. Canderous – with whoever his employer was and I'd be putting my credits on the Exchange - had obviously been granted leave to carry in whatever weaponry he desired.
"You dare to question me?" Brejik's face was livid. "You festering scum! Vulkars, attack! Kill the Beks!"

"Everyone, to me! Show no mercy!" one of the more aggressive Beks yelled. I pulled out both blasters, and stood ready. Canderous stood at my side, legs apart and repeating blaster aimed in front. That's been heavily modified. Look at size of the barrel, and that recharge therm sure as stars ain't factory made. I idly wondered which part of me could recognize weapons so readily.

The battle broke out, and many of the smaller gangs on the edge of the pit lane melted away. Some joined in on either side. A Vulkar charged at me with a blade. I sidestepped and shot him twice in the chest. The faint blue of a poor energy shield wearing thin was momentarily visible as he launched a wide swinging blow at me. Jumping backwards, I fired again and again, finger numbing on the trigger as he stumbled and collapsed under the onslaught. The heat of battle pounded through me - an urgent, dark desire for more - and with a snarl I ran forward, shot him in the face, and made a grab for his vibrosword as it toppled from lifeless fingers.

Spinning it slightly in my sword-arm - my off-hand still grasping the second blaster - I only just spotted the grenade as it rolled towards me. I leapt backward as a percussion wave slammed into me, knocking me flat. Rolling with a gasp, mildly stunned, I scrambled to my feet and spotted the Mandalorian, also, recovering. He'd been closer than me to the blast.

"Guess I'm on the Beks side then." Canderous barked a harsh laugh, and it was a dangerous sound. His grey eyes glinted as he rejoined me. "(Today is a good day for someone else to die!)
" he yelled in Mandalorian.

"Ib'tuur jatne tuur ash'ad kyr'amur!" I echoed him, and we charged together into a group of three snarling Vulkars. His repeating blaster took two down; the last was still firing at Canderous as my vibrosword slammed into his side. Brittle armour gave way as the blade sank satisfyingly into flesh; the Vulkar gurgled as I pulled the vibrosword back and shot him with the blaster. The Vulkar gurgled as he fell.

Canderous was staring at me intently as I looked up, feeling the battle euphoria humming in my veins. I could feel the red mist descending, and my smile back was feral. Our attention was caught by two gang members charging at us, and it was instinctive to reach out to the Force... only to find it missing. What? The beginnings of the berserker rage fled as if a bucket of ice-cold water had been dumped on my head. What's going on? I thought I'd figured out how to use the Force

My vibrosword was up just in time to parry a blow, and shakily I pushed back, only to have the offending Vulkar crumble in front of me due to some other injury. Looking up, I saw the angry Sullustan Bek from earlier shoot me a grin above his blaster. Canderous was standing over a second corpse.

A renewed sense of purpose flooded my brain, and it took a second to realize it was originating from Bastila. I jerked my head up to see her stagger out of her cage, and face the closest Vulkar. The determination was there, but she felt woozy, disorientated. I became aware of her scrabbling to hold onto the Force, and somehow I knew it was a feeble attempt.

"No! The prize– get her!" Brejik screamed through the onslaught.

"Sithspit," I cursed.

Canderous' gaze followed mine. "You are after her as well," he said in a low voice.

I scanned the room frantically, and my eyes rested on Anglu's swoop bike. For lack of a better option... I darted away from the Mandalorian, sprinting through the chaos with only the target of the swoop bike in my vision. I ducked to the side of two gang members brawling, dodged under a swinging vibrosword, and ran directly through a blaster fight, trusting on sheer luck to stop me getting hit in the cross-fire.

My hands rested on the solid chrome of the swoop bike.

At least I was bright enough to let Mission show me how to start these fool things, I thought grimly as I swung my legs over the bike, and carelessly threw both the vibrosword and the secondary blaster away. I turned momentarily to pinpoint Bastila. Five Vulkars surrounded her. I could feel her fumble to do something through the bond, and the scowl on her face said it all. She's still weak. Her Force powers are not fully back yet.

I heard Anglu yell in protest as I started the bike. It thrummed a loud vibration under my legs, and I quickly yanked it into gear and squeezed the throttle. The back end threatened to skid out, and my hands gripped the steering column tightly as I aimed the bike directly into the crowded mob, loosing a wild yell that was half-warning, half-crazy.

Sentients jumped out of the way; one was knocked sideways by the bike, and it shuddered in response. A bright flash of a grenade to my right may or may not have been directed at me; I accelerated further and was on the Vulkar mob within seconds.

Braking and pulling the steering column to one side, the swoop bike skidded sideways and knocked two of the thugs momentarily prone to the ground.

"Get on!" I screamed in the direction of the Jedi.

Bastila whirled to face me. Defiant anger melted into shocked horror. I supposed she'd never expected to see me again, but her reaction was hardly complimentary. "You!" she gasped, her cheeks fading to a pasty white. With an admirable amount of self-control, her emotions and expression turned impassive. Her eyes flicked over the scene, and then she ran towards me, leaping onto the bike.

"Go!" she hissed into my ear, her fingers wrapping tightly around my waist and digging in with desperation.

"She's escaping!" The red-and-black clad figure of Brejik was no longer on the dais, but directly in my path, howling. "Stop them!"

I snarled and accelerated. Brejik stood his ground, legs apart, and began to raise his blaster to fire. I opened the throttle as wide as it could go, and pointed the nose of the swoop directly at him. I saw the shocked realization on his scarred face when he understood I wasn't planning on dodging; his expression twisted comically and he lurched to the side at the last possible moment.

Accelerate, an inner voice ordered. I responded, and the engine roared underneath my calves. Up ahead, I saw the glittering arch that touted the beginning of the swoop track proper, and the exit from the mayhem behind us. I heard Bastila stifle a scream, and saw the energy pulse of blaster shots fire past in my periphery.

Dodge. My fingers tightened on the column, and I began to steer from side to side, weaving the bike jerkily as it erupted onto the swoop track. Instinctively, I crouched lower on the swoop, my body leaning in time with the swerving. Up ahead, a flashing yellow light indicated an energy-propelled launch pad.
The blackened tunnel of the Taris swoop track enveloped us, and I aimed directly for the launch pad. Bastila's arms tightened, and my ribs creaked in reply.

Sun and stars, this was supposed to be Mission's task!

The bike sailed over the jump, and the air whipped through my dark curls. I could feel Bastila pressing her face tight against my back. As the bike descended, the visage of a large obstacle came into view. I jerked the bike to the right in avoidance, and it shuddered under my inelegant control.

How many people did Mission say die in swoop accidents again? The impact-suppression system could only do so much; at full speed against a solid wall, both bike and rider would surely be written off.

"There are bikes after us!" Bastila screamed over the wind. "Go faster!"

I don't know how to ride this stupid thing, and she wants me to speed up? I saw the flashes of blaster fire spin past me from behind, and realized that heeding Bastila was paramount. We had a head-start, but with the weight of two riders we were at a sore disadvantage. I switched gears again, and the bike lurched forwards. My gloved hands felt unwieldy as I strained to retain my grip, and the high-pitch of the swoop engine increased as I left the throttle wide open.

The track turned into a sweeping right bender, and I aimed for the inside line, weaving slightly to avoid a thick metal plate the protruded from the ground. The corner continued, tightening, and the bike leaned into it, almost kissing against the darkened wall.

The track straightened out and us with it, before we flew over a launch pad that thumped us into the air, boosting velocity with an upward thrust. I heard a squeak from behind. A large, dark wall loomed ahead, blocking most of the track's width other than a narrow gap on either side. Red laser bolts spat against it, and I realized with horror that our pursuers were closing in.

I need to find a way out of here. I wrenched the bike to the left, aiming for the slight opening at near-full speed, and slightly misjudged the angle required. As we shot past the barrier, the swoop ground against the outer wall in a shower of electronic sparks before the impact knocked us back onto the track and our velocity dipped. Not good! Sithspit, not good at all! Gasping, I straightened the steering column and accelerated again, but too quickly; the bike jerked and threatened to spin, skidding sideways across the track. I looked up desperately and my gaze rested on an innocent ladder bolted to the opposite wall.

That's a service exit! I slammed on the brakes and pulled hard to the left; our momentum plummeted and the swoop screeched to a stop, gently thudding against the ferracrete wall right next to the ladder. Blood pounded a deafening echo in my head, telling me to move, move, move.

"Quick!" I howled, dismounting the bike in a leap and turning back to face the Jedi. She'd understood my intent, for she was one step ahead - jumping in an impressive Force-induced surge and catching herself hard against the bolted rungs of the service ladder. She swung to the side, and then clambered up inelegantly towards a dark shaft near the ceiling.

A loud, hot thrum whistled piercingly close to my ear, and with a horrified realization I recognized a pursuing swoop racer, having cleared the obstacle wall and sailed right past us. Get a move on, bantha-brain! I lunged for the ladder, and scrabbled up quickly behind the Jedi, feeling the loud swoosh of another bike rocket by. As I pulled myself through the hatch, a deafening explosion rocked the ferracrete foundations and a whirling piece of carnage sailed dangerously close to where my legs had just been.
We were in a dimly-lit tunnel above the track, and Bastila's pale face stared into mine.

"A moment," she murmured, raising her hand beyond me. I heard the ominous creak of metal, and craned my neck to see the roof of the service tunnel fracture and twist before collapsing in on itself and blocking the path behind us.

For a moment, I felt the weaves of the Force as they bent under Bastila's will.

J jerking my head back to face her, I saw her dark eyes fixed on mine.

"I suppose you call this a rescue?" she muttered.

Incredulity swamped any irritation that may have surfaced at such arrogance; I merely gaped at her in shocked surprise.

She shook her head, delicate braids tossing. "No time to argue. Come, we must go." She turned, and moved deeper into the service tunnel.

Stunned at her audacity, I could only follow.

xXx
The blaster wound warmed my side with pulses of agony. I wrapped the pain up in detachment, and continued running. I could hear her footsteps echoing close behind, and my mind screamed at me in fear.

There is no emotion; there is peace.

The service tunnel exited into the back maintenance corridors of the swoop track. I halted, glancing wildly about as I tried to judge which direction to take. Sentients were sprinting past, most garbed in oil-stained coveralls that proclaimed them as mechanics. A few exclaimed loudly, jabbering in dialects too furious or foreign for me to decipher.

The panic made it clear, though: the gang fighting still raged, and I had to assume the hunt for me was on.

My companion nudged me, then; pointing silently to an emergency exit from the swoop complex, outlined in a galactically recognizable red and white. I ran straight for the door, hands grasping tight to yank the chrome bolt upwards, before shoving my weight against the heavy metallic barricade that stood between us and ephemeral freedom.

The exit groaned open as my supposed rescuer barreled into it, adding her strength to mine. An alarm wailed in immediate complaint; I darted through the opening and turned, already raising my hand as my accomplice followed.

The Force surged to my call. Comforting, familiar, powerful. A presence that, when denied to me, had been a more frightening experience than I would have foreseen.

The door slammed shut beneath my desire. Even through inches of whatever substandard metal composite was used on this dissolute planet, we could still hear a loud clang as the bolt dropped into place on the other side.

Followed shortly thereafter by the echoes of coarse yells and blaster fire. We had to move.

My limbs sped forth once more; I barely took in my surroundings as we both dashed forward blindly. Uneven, cracked walling formed the tunnels of habitation. Intermittent lighting threw shadowed ghosts that chased us as we ran into darker alleys. I strained to see, even to regulate my own breathing - and behind me came the hoarse pants of the woman who followed. The sound sent a staccato reminder of what was truly at stake.

You cannot make a person out of a beast. My father's sage advice, after my miserable attempt at raising a kath pup.

Let serenity dictate your actions; emotions simply blur logical judgments. That was from Master Vrook.

I fervently wished I still had my lightsaber.
Three exits beckoned at the end of the narrow tunnel. I choose the left one; a dark, twisting alleyway, and continued running.

My plan had been simple. Wait until some egregious lowlife won that childish competition. Wait until I was led away, submissive and apparently impotent. And then, make my move. All that, ruined by gang members and their precipitous tempers.

The tunnel split in two; again, I choose the left.

"Stop!" the woman hissed behind me. My legs jerked; halting suddenly, almost tumbling over one another. I spun around to see my companion slither into a side exit I had not even noticed.

The spike of alarm was hard to swallow down. Steeling myself, I darted after her.

Blackened walls closeted me on both sides. The artificial lighting of the Lower City had fled in terror from this place, and I could feel the acrid taste of panic rising to gnaw at the edges of my control.

It was a struggle merely to harness the Force, even just to sense the woman.

_I am not prepared_. The truth was more than simply a blow to my ego; it was a damning indictment of my competency - or lack thereof. _I am not prepared to face Revan. Not like this._

_Faith, child._ Master Vrook may have been sparing with his praise, but his encouragement was always steadfast. _You must have faith._

I had faced Revan before, in far more alarming circumstances. I had triumphed; surprisingly, amazingly, against overwhelming odds. I would not falter, not here.

The Force drew in deep; steady, assiduous and calming. I breathed in, and allowed it to settle into my core.

"We should be safe here for a few minutes," Revan- Jen whispered to me. Her face was a spectre in the shadows. "We have a lead on the Vulkars now, and I doubt they'd spot this alley if you didn't."

"Why are we stopping?" I demanded, and cursed the waver I heard in my voice.

She uttered no response, and a second later I heard an electronic beep.

"Are you guys there?" Jen hissed. There was a crackle of static, and it took a second to comprehend she was no longer addressing me.

_I am indebted to her. I may have formulated my own escape from the restraints, but it is Revan who extracted me from the swoop track._ The thought was sobering. Yet her own debts to humanity itself were beyond the region of appalling; truly, I owed her nothing.

_But, why? Why has she rescued me?_

::Jen! Dammit, I saw that fight on the holo-screens! We feared the worst - what in the blazes happened?:: a male voice snapped out from what must be her comm-link.

To my utter astonishment, I heard her laugh. A response, in a situation like this, so unlike the shy scholar that an icy horror crawled through my veins. _How much of what remains is Revan?_ My mind touched on the ever-present bond that linked us; amusement wafted from her like smoke from a campfire. The emotion was more potent than her fear.

And I wasn't sure - but I thought I had felt her reach out to the Force earlier.

That alone made me want to run away, gibbering. Jen Sahara should not be able to remember such a thing. It was fortunate the bond allowed me to block her access, which had become instinctual - but the very idea she might be actively seeking the Force was, simply, frightening.

There is no passion; there is serenity.

"No time for lectures, Flyboy! We need help, and we need it now," Revan- Jen said in a low voice. Jen Sahara, I reminded myself. I must think of her as such.

::Zaalbar and I are already scouring the alleyways. Where are you?:: the voice demanded.

"No idea, Mission might know. Can I speak to her?"

::Uh, she's been missing since you left:: A crackling howl of some description followed the response.

"Balls of a rancor!" Revan swore, and I winced instinctively.

Oh, who am I fooling? The realization was as irritating as it was perilous. Jen Sahara would never blurt such an epithet.

"Never mind," Revan continued, voice deep and intent. "We'll head to the Upper City - see you in the hideout."

::Don't do anything stup:: A click, and the comm-link turned off. I sensed Revan turn to face me. I resisted the urge to shrink back from what I knew to be her piercing green gaze. You cannot make a person out of a beast. Why had I even tried?

Because she had been a person, once.

"We need to get to the Upper City. There may be some old maintenance shafts around here - I don't think we can risk going through the main entrance," she was saying, as she shuffled something over her head.

I could not quite tell, but she almost appeared to be removing her clothes.

"What are you doing?" My voice, firm and resolved. The Force echoed a deep thrum of reassurance in my grasp.

"Shedding my overalls," she drawled, and the lilt of mirth in her voice was evident. "I don't think you really want to wander around Taris half-naked."

My cheeks burned as I realized the state of my undress. That- that Brejik. That slimy, good-for-nothing- I forced the bright anger back under control with some effort. I could not entirely quell the desire to see that degenerate dead, for all that I had endured.

Revan threw me the crumpled clothing. As I hastily searched for the fasteners, it struck me that the leadership role had shifted. I must take charge. I must postpone the mission, and get her to the masters. I lifted a leg awkwardly in the darkness, struggling to pull the musty overalls up around my waist. I must get myself to the masters.

"Good idea," I offered, as I shrugged the clothing over my shoulders. "Now. What is your plan of
There was an odd blast of incredulity from within the bond. I somehow had the sense she was staring at me in disbelief. "To get away from the guys trying to kill us!"

She moved back to the opening of the narrow alley as I affixed the final fastener. "Who were you talking to?" I demanded, one step behind her.

"Your boyfriend," Revan murmured. Her voice was wry, and once more thrumming with amusement.

"I beg your pardon?" I snapped. Even the mere thought of such set my cheeks burning.

She stifled a chuckle. "Carth Onasi."

The sense of relief was all-encompassing. Captain Onasi! Now this rescue makes sense! If Revan was following his orders, then that confirmed the situation was salvageable. She did not know who she truly was. But I do not believe she is entirely Jen Sahara anymore. Still, there was hope. Everything could still be on track.

"Captain Onasi is alive!" I enthused, allowing myself a small sigh of relief. "That is good news. But we're not out of danger, yet. You must tell me what kind of resources we can draw on, if I am going to figure out a way to extract us from here."

Talk about your all-time spoilt Jedi brats!

I stiffened in hot indignation as her thought crested sharply between us. Revan might have no awareness of our bond, but the Force-link was a constant curse in my mind. Her uppermost thoughts fed through to me with startling ease.

"Look, lady, I'm taking you back to Flyboy, and then I'm off." Her voice was cold.

"Oh, no, you are certainly not. My determination swelled, banking down the fear that battled for supremacy. "My name is Bastila Shan, if you do not recall from the Endar Spire," I said archly. "But we shall discuss it later. For now, we should get a move on."

"Sun and stars, you brought it up!" she exclaimed petulantly. She huffed, before spinning around, and darting deep into the bowels of alley. "Just- just sodding well follow me so we can get out of here!"

There is no chaos; there is harmony.

I would not allow my fists to clench in fruitless anger. For all of her irreverence, Revan's approach was likely the wisest - we should keep moving, and fast.

"Jen!" a kid's voice squeaked deeper in the darkness, and halted our stride.

"Mission?" Revan gasped, her voice laced with surprise. I'm going to kill that reckless girl!

Fright struck hard; the Force responded, swelling in my grasp, ready to stun Revan at my will. I could not- I would not allow her to react with such flagrant and cavalier disregard for life.

"That was so intense!" the voice gushed. The form of a young girl slowly coalesced from the shadows ahead.
"You're in so much trouble," Revan muttered. I was on the precipice of throwing her into a Force-induced stasis when she laughed.

Laughed. Again.

The surprise alone held me back.

The girl called Mission huffed. And at that moment, I fully interpreted Revan's chaotic mess of emotions that echoed through our bond. Fear. Fear, rather than anger. Fear for the girl's safety?

It seemed... incongruous. Hard to believe. But the relief that surged from my bond-mate was now mirrored by my own. For a brief moment there, I had been afraid myself. Afraid of witnessing the return of Revan. Darth Revan.

"Trouble? Look, I did what you asked, okay?" the girl retorted. "I stayed out of the fighting. But, sheesh, I freaked when I saw the race!" She took a step closer. The shadows clung to the girl, but I could pick out a visor strapped around a young face. A set of Twi'leki lekku curled tight around her neck. "So, I hacked into one of the control computers, and tracked you on the holo-cams. I had to switch to the Bek grid when you went out the service tunnel - that was wizard by the way! The swoops behind you were about to-

"Mission!" Revan spoke over the girl's onslaught, but her voice was warm and amused. "You're the amazing one. But we need to move. Know of a back way to the Upper City from here?"

"The Upper City? But I thought-

"The Bek base won't be safe, after that slaughter," Revan muttered, cutting the Twi'lek off. Not entirely sure I'll be welcome, after pinching Anglu's swoop.

Her rash thought made me realize just how ill-planned and spontaneous this rescue had been. Either Revan's plan had completely imploded, or she hadn't had one in the first place.

Although, I could have been more tactful with my first words to her, I realized with some chagrin.

"Alright!" the kid agreed brightly. "Follow me!"

The girl led us further down the dark tunnel, and we followed her silently. Revan's emotions had settled down, and all I could sense from her now was an icy determination. I cannot let her get away. I realized I needed to use all my persuasive powers to convince Revan to journey with me. But that could wait, until we were in a safe place.

Mission led us to an abandoned elevator shaft. There was still no light whatsoever, and I wondered how Revan could find her way around. The Twi'lek had a visor, but Revan did not. Her ability to move through darkness disturbed me. She may not be who she once was, but she is not behaving how she should be, either.

"This hasn't been used in years. We can climb up the service ladders - they exit in a junkyard on the bad side of Upper Taris," Mission informed us as she twisted inside the hole. I wondered briefly what had happened to the elevator itself.

"There's a bad side of Upper Taris?" Revan muttered. It almost sounded sarcastic.

"Well, not bad like the Lower City. But generally where the aliens hang out. And some of the gangs."
"I think we had best avoid them, then." I said primly.

"That's the idea," Mission said brightly. I was glad to hear no sarcasm in her voice.

The agility of the girl surprised me, as I sensed her climb up the supporting railings in the shaft. Revan followed more slowly, occasionally muttering to herself. I did not have too much trouble, with the Force as my ally. The pain in my side had dulled to a distant throbbing. Soon I will take care of that.

As we ascended, a thin ray of weak light slowly pervaded our surroundings. My muscles ached despite my own strength. I cannot wait for some time in a refresher unit. I had been feeling dirty for far too long. I could still feel demanding, violent hands upon my skin, and I inwardly cursed Brejik to the darkest corner of the Outer Rim.

Yet I had to feel grateful that it had been a swoop gang who captured me, rather than the Sith. For all the indignities I had suffered under Brejik, he could have done worse.

He almost did. That time I escaped from his grasp. That time he realized he was dealing with a Jedi, not a fugitive Republic officer.

It must have been days ago, now. I had run free from a winded Brejik, and it had only been due to a lucky stun bolt from one of his men that I did not make it far enough. When I woke again, it was to a pounding headache and a disruptor cinched tightly around my neck.

A neural inhibitor could be overcome by Force-strength or inner will, but those kaiburr-based disruptors... they were rare, difficult to procure or purchase, and impossible to disable with the Force. In that moment, I had felt the taste of despair more bitter and bleak than I had ever known. There was no way to stop Brejik from enacting his most monstrous desires, no way to stop him from gifting me to the Sith...

But I soon came to realize that everything had changed with my calamitous escape attempt.

Brejik still continued his preposterous campaign of a swoop championship, but his manner toward me now held a reserve that had been lacking before. Perhaps it was because he feared the reprisal of a Jedi, or maybe he enjoyed drawing out the anticipation, but he did not subject me to any further violations - and certainly not the worst one of all.

I am lucky. The Force is with me.

Brejik decided a local swoop competition was of greater benefit to him than selling me out to the Sith.

I managed to free my hands and disable that cursed disruptor enroute to the swoop track.

All I have suffered is rough manhandling and lewd remarks.

I still felt unclean, and abused.

I gritted my teeth, pushed the tumultuous thoughts away, and followed the others.

The climb felt long. Each step was an arduous feat done in silence, broken only by the occasional grunt of effort from one of us. As the environs lightened, I allowed my attention to fix upon the others, while my feet climbed ever upward.

The girl Twi'lek was garbed in vivid green synthetics; a figure-hugging outfit the easily displayed her agility as she scurried up the ladders with the grace of youth. Revan, in contrast, had donned what looked like scale mesh beneath the overalls I now wore. The weight of her armour seemed to hamper her little; either that, or it was a sheer force of will urging her forward, matching pace with the speedy girl in front.

Once, Revan's physical form had been nothing but tightly packed muscle over a skeleton. She certainly did not have the same physique now, and nor was it the Force lending her strength. And yet... and yet it was not the bodily weak and emotionally fragile Jen Sahara I now had to control.

"We're here!" Mission hissed, and I looked up in surprise to see the youth scramble out of sight. Both Revan and I were quick to follow.

As I scrambled over the ledge of the empty elevator shaft, my first impression was one of enclosure. We were surrounded on all sides by dull high-rise buildings that looked both utilitarian and drab in appearance. Littered on the ground were various heaps of metallic rubble and broken machinery. In the distance, a group of Ithorians were bending over something I could not make out.

A beep cut through our silence; I turned, to see Revan tapping at the device on her wrist.

::Jen, where are you? Zaalbar's getting desperate, if his howls are anything to go by,:: a voice rapped out, accompanied by a roar from someone else. That must be Carth. I wonder who Zaalbar is. Could that be a Wookiee, here on Taris? As preposterous as the idea was, the howl sounded suspiciously like one.

"We're fine, in the Upper City. Mission's with us. Meet you at the apartment," Revan replied succinctly, before switching off the communicator.

"Big Z's gonna yell at me," the Twi'lek muttered sulkily.

I saw Revan grin at her. "Mission, can you get us to an apartment building? It's near a cantina."

Mission groaned at Revan. "How many cantinas do you think are in Upper Taris? Sheesh, and how many apartment buildings?"

"Well, the cantina hosts a dueling ring run by a Hutt called Ajuur, if that's any help."

"Well, the cantina hosts a dueling ring run by a Hutt called Ajuur, if that's any help."

The girl brightened. "We're close by! That's in the alien quarter, where we are. Follow me!"

We managed to avoid any Sith, but I saw some in the distance. It made me suddenly glad for the nondescript overalls I wore; appreciative for the foresight of the one who dogged my every thought.

Revan took over the lead as we entered a run-down building. She strode over to a door, pulled out a tech spike and started slicing the locking mechanism with practiced ease. That's not a skill Jen Sahara knows. A cold chill danced down my spine. Revan looked up at me suddenly, green eyes intent. Can she sense the bond? Fear pricked pimples along my arms. I hurriedly detached myself from it, and attempted to throw her a benevolent smile. She blinked warily at me, and turned back to the electronic lock.

"Hey, you're not bad," Mission commented as the door opened beneath Revan's ministrations. "Not as good as me, though." The Twi'lek grinned cheekily, drawing a laugh from Revan as we entered the room.

Revan's self-proclaimed hideout was no more than a one-room apartment, with dingy, stained walls and a cracked plasticeel floor. The sole bunk bore a rumpled blanket, with a knapsack of gear littered near the foot. The other wall boasted a tiny kitchenette that had obviously seen better days.

"Is this where you have been camping out?" I asked.

"Uh, more or less," Revan muttered.

"So," Mission interrupted brightly, turning to face me. "I'm Mission by the way!"

The girl was beaming at me. I tried to answer her welcoming smile with my own. "It is nice to meet you, Mission." I wasn't sure if I should offer to shake her hand. How did Tarisians act upon first introductions? "I thank you for your assistance," I told her. My sentiment was genuine, but I had the sinking feeling that my words came across as stilted. "My name is Bastila."

I was saved from any further social awkwardness by the door opening.

Carth Onasi strode in, followed by the towering form of a Wookiee. My eyes widened in surprise, despite the fact I had already wondered at the species of the one named Zaalbar.

"Bastila!" Carth greeted. His warm brown eyes creased in relief. "Finally, things are looking up."

"Captain Onasi, it is good to see you again."

Carth crooked a smile at me. "Under the circumstances, Bastila, I think we can dispense with formalities. Call me Carth."

My unease dissipated. I had not much to do with Captain Onasi on the Endar Spire, but I trusted his loyalty to the Republic. A famous war-hero, Carth Onasi had been stationed onboard the Endar Spire in an advisory capacity, commanding the pilots who navigated the Hammerhead-class cruiser in the name of our quest.

Our quest, which had so disastrously failed before we had come anywhere near our destination. My eyes closed briefly, and I once more struggled to detach myself from the despair that had loomed within me since the first alarm on the Endar Spire had sounded.

"(Mission!)" The Wookiee had loped over to the Twi'lek girl, before picking her up bodily.

I felt the tang of apprehension flare to life in my belly. The Wookiee fair towered over the girl. I could not trust Revan's strange companions-

"(You should not have been there! I should not have let Jen talk me into it!)"

The Twi'lek struggled in his furry arms. "Let me down, Big Z!" she squealed.

The apprehension grew as I wildly considered intervening. Why were the others not saying anything-

"(No!)" the menacing Wookiee howled. "(You keep running into danger, and scaring me witless!)"

I blinked. The meaning of his words registered, and abruptly I could sense the source of the Wookiee's distress. Concern, pure and simple - which immediately assuaged my doubts.

I felt the soft puff of a relieved sigh escape my lips.

"Zaalbar, you should blame me," Revan said quietly to the Wookiee. "I needed her skills, her ability to sneak onto the track. I did my best to keep her from danger."
"I ain’t a kid!" Mission protested hotly.

"-but if it wasn't for her, I wouldn't have been free to rescue Bastila." Her eyes slid to mine, then, guarded and wary, and I recalled my earlier words. Embarrassment flushed through me; I had never felt at ease in social situations with normal people, let alone mind-wiped former Sith Lords.

I swallowed, and forced my mind to focus on the intangible mind-link between us. It was resonating with the maelstrom of her chaotic emotions.

Suspicion. Fear. Fear of... me?

Could she be just as scared of me as I am of her?

I was not certain, but the thought alone was enough to calm me.

"Thank you. All of you," I said quietly, keeping my eyes intent on Revan's green gaze.

Zaalbar put Mission down gently.

"(Jen)," the Wookiee wailed. "(I cannot-)

And then, I realized, Revan had been following their conversation intently. She can understand Shyriiwook. Jen Sahara had known only a smattering of languages, half of them dead for millennia and of interest only to academics. She certainly had not the knowledge of the Wookiee language.

But perhaps this is a skill that would stay with her regardless? Perhaps the knowledge of a language is not something that would disappear, even under massive head trauma and a personality implant?

I had to believe that, for the thought of Revan relearning some of her old talents was horrifying.

"Big Z, calm down, okay?" the Twi'lek was saying. "Jen needed some help, and I was the only one who could do it. You'd put yourself in danger to help as well, if you could! Let me do my part, alright?" She finished on a scowl.

Carth sighed suddenly. "Whatever you guys are arguing about, you may as well drop it. Jen's determined to be insanely reckless, and for some odd reason it seems to pay off. Bastila's here, and alive."

Insanely reckless. Carth's words, exasperated and weary, were not an accurate description of the Jen Sahara that had been on the Endar Spire. As if I did not need yet another reminder that the personality implant was shaking loose. The Force healers said the chances of her recalling anything did not fall within a plausible range of probability. That the identity of Jen Sahara was firmly enmeshed. What has changed since then?

I would think on it later. For now, it was time to steer the conversation back on track.

"Well, enough of this. We should be talking about the plan to get off Taris," I intervened, hoping to end the discussion.

"I knew it!" Mission said. She threw an exuberant grin at the Wookiee. "Big Z, we're going on an adventure!"

I blinked in surprise. My gaze slid sideways, to purvey a strange grimace dominating Revan's countenance.
"Um, Mission," Revan began. She dragged one hand roughly through her short mop. "I'm not going with them." The Twi'lek jerked around to stare at her in bemusement. I felt the same sense of determination from earlier, a steely resolve swell from within, but before I could utter a word Carth jumped straight in.

"That's right," he said, his words low and angry. "Just leave - walk out on the Republic and your promises to the Jedi Council."

"I'm not walking out on anybody." Revan clenched her teeth. Between us I could feel her dark emotions building. In a way, it was less surprising than Captain Onasi's anger. He was a professional and experienced Republic officer, and yet obviously felt the taint of betrayal at the thought of her desertion.

They have been together for some time. Perhaps it is not all that startling.

I cleared my throat. "You cannot walk out, Jen," I said smoothly. "You signed a contract with the Jedi Council, do you remember?"

She should, that was one of the artificial ones. That memory should bind her well and truly to the Council.

Revan's face drained of all colour, as her wide eyes gazed at me helplessly. The stink of nausea and fear stormed from her, but was replaced immediately with a white hot anger that overpowered everything else.

"That contract!" she spat suddenly. "I wouldn't sign anything like that! It's- it's effective slavery!"

"Do not be preposterous. It is an employment contract, Jen, no more and no less. You have agreed to work with us for three years in return for an ample salary and the start of your career." I sent her a steady look, inwardly clutching onto my serenity. I had to stay calm. "The Jedi do not look kindly upon people who walk out on such contracts."

She dares to threaten me? Her thought, undercut with a vicious fury, shattered my calm. It was quickly followed by another. No, I will not get angry, dammit! Maybe I should go with them. Just to get off Taris. And then do a bunk, since Mission wants to leave so much. I wonder if that's feasible? I saw Revan's face twist with suppressed emotions. That logic should so quickly follow rage scared me. Her last thought ran through my mind - No, it's too risky. I cannot go with them.

I could feel my panic rise up again, the turgid sense of losing control. My only ally was a Republic captain ignorant of all the pertinent details, and somehow I did not think Carth Onasi would sit back while I Force-compelled Revan to follow me.

I must ensure she returns with me to Dantooine.

But what if some part of her recalled the importance of that planet? I had to get her to the masters, before the persona of Jen Sahara truly vanished and the worst threat to the galaxy reemerged. Perhaps... perhaps if I could persuade her to travel somewhere neutral, somewhere that wouldn't pose any sort of perceived threat-

"Jen, perhaps you can accompany us to Alderaan to begin with. I am sure we could do with your skills, and those of your friends," I suggested, keeping my voice mild and unassuming. Including her new... friends seemed an assumption, were it not for the loyalty they seemed to exhibit toward her. Considering who she had once been, that loyalty was not altogether surprising, and their company might make her easier to convince. One way or another, I simple had to entice the shell of Revan to follow me. "If you still feel the need to run, then I cannot stop you. But let us work together, at least, to escape from Taris."

Revan's lips thinned as her face blanked of all perceivable emotion. She was staring hard at me, and I could not decipher any emotion through the bond.

"Alderaan?" Carth threw me a frown. "That's an interesting destination. Why Alderaan?"

"It is not far from Taris," I answered, my thoughts racing in sudden need. I had not anticipated his rejoinder, although I should have. "Alderaan hosts a Republic base, Carth, and it should be a safe enough haven for the others. I can contact who I need to when we arrive, and Jen can... Jen can go her own way."

A true Jedi does not lie. I forced the calm to stay on my face, and stared back at Revan. Slowly, slowly, her head dipped in a nod of acquiescence. Success.

"Okay," Revan said softly. Her eyes narrowed. "I'll join you until Alderaan."

xXx

I spent time later in the refresher, trying to erase the stink of the Vulkars. I could feel invisible marks imprinted on my body, and flashes of Brejik's treatment tormented my mind. I shuddered, and forced back tears.

I am a Jedi, I am at peace. Trials and tribulations only make me stronger.

Oh, how I wished that I had been in full control of the Force back on the swoop track! Brejik would have been dead. No, Jedi do not kill. I would not have killed him. I am better than that. I could not quite convince myself. The neural disruptor and the sedatives had left me helpless, like a child.

He could have... he did not, in the end, but he could have-

I vowed, in that moment, that I would never be helpless again.

The others were talking softly in the main room; I had left them to clean myself and change into a spare set of clothes Carth had dashed out to procure for me. In my head, Revan felt more at peace than before. Or perhaps the word was resolved. I closed my eyes wearily.

I did not expect to deal with her alone. Back on the Endar Spire, there had been a Jedi Master and a squad of knights accompanying me. While I had been called Commander, it was only a technicality. A safeguard, should I ever have need of immediate compliance from all allies should the worst happen. Hidden as a token gesture due to my battle meditation, the change in manifest command had been accepted - even if grudgingly so.

In truth, Master Galdea had led the group. He had been one of three who had completed the personality transplant, and Jen Sahara was under his watchful eye as much as mine. We spoke many times of the brief glimpses I managed to pull from Revan's fractured mind when she dreamed. We had no reason to be alarmed then. And now Master Galdea is gone. All of those onboard the Endar Spire, gone. Carth had told me I was the only Jedi to make it to out - the others, all, had fallen while standing their ground against the Sith.

Master Galdea had ordered me to the escape pods, to wait until the last minute for Ensign Ulgo to bring Jen Sahara. To bring Revan. So I had been useless, my battle meditation unable to help, while all my comrades were cut down like renni grass. My old friend Kylah, gone. I will never see her face again. I will never scold her for her irreverence again, nor shelter behind her protection-Grief can come later. I swallowed, forcing the bleak emotions at bay. I did not have the luxury of breaking down.

I must focus on the task at hand.

We had been heading toward Tatooine, the first of the Star Maps. Although my battle meditation had elevated my public persona in the eyes of the Republic, it had been my vision of Revan and Malak that granted me at last some status within the Order. Enough that, at long last, even Master Vrook started dropping the occasional comment regarding my oft-delayed Knight Trials.

The vision still struck fear into me, even now. It had been months after I had captured Revan; months in which the former Sith Lord had been kept comatose and helpless within the enclave's walls. Months in which the masters debated fiercely what to do with her; redemption, certainly, was a hotly contested topic, but our experts had decried that her mind was too damaged, too broken, too unstable to even bring back a coherent shell-

I had not been cognizant of the deep Force bond which linked us, had not understood why my sleep was so riddled with shadows of darkness and ever-present grief. Not until the vivid memory shot clear through my mind, that fateful day.

Revan and Malak, entering a tomb on Dantooine. Back when they were still Jedi, but in name only, for the shadows of the Dark Side were already eroding their souls.

Back when they visited Dantooine, flushed with victory from the Mandalorian Wars and determined to antagonize a council that had had little to do with them - for they had been Coruscanti Jedi.

The Dantooine Council had believed the short stayover was merely a childish act, a chance for Revan and Malak to spout I-told-you-so to the nearest Jedi Masters, for the Jedi Thirteen were now galactic heroes, famous savours of the Republic-

But their visit had been a ruse. Not even the wisest of masters had realized then it was merely a ploy; an opportunity for the two erstwhile lovers to discover the master Star Map.

An ancient relic of the Dark Side, located not far from the Jedi stronghold, that no one knew about. We still had no idea exactly what the Star Maps pointed to, but the master one on Dantooine gave us the location of the other four planets. The Council were convinced that it held the key to the might of the Sith armada, the massive fleet that kept expanding and was slowly, surely, winning the war.

Malak was now leading the Sith, after turning on his old master when she faced me. Malak didn't have her finesse - the Dark Side had warped his reason, and he appeared to be blindly attacking any target within range. But his forces were superior. And Revan had, already, wrecked great damage upon the Republic front.

Yet I could still remember them both as they were when I had first met them. Malak, inordinately handsome and charming. Revan, cheeky, likeable, and fun. Both of them seemed so good.

It was as Master Vrook said, never underestimate the lure of the Dark Side. But there must have been something innately venal in them both to begin with, surely?

Even when I had first met them, their emotions had been apparent and uncontrolled. I closed my eyes, and remembered...
I followed Kylah into the courtyard. Dust swirling upward from a gentle summer's breeze swept into my eyes. I winced, squinting them shut. In the distance, I could hear the audible shink shink of a lightsaber duel.

"That's Revan Freeflight and Malak Devari!" Kylah whispered in awe. "They must be visiting from Coruscant!"

I snapped my eyes back open. Across the vast expanse of the courtyard fought two figures; one fast and fierce, the other fast and strong.

Revan and Malak? I thought in wonderment. I'd heard about them; after all, who hadn't? Two Jedi taken by the Order very late in life, and already both Jedi Knights after five brief years. And I have been here over ten. I quenched that envious thought, and reminded myself of the humility needed by all Jedi alike.

I watched as Revan ducked and dodged Malak's more powerful attacks. In return she flurried a few quick blows, which he parried easily. I couldn't take my eyes off the fight. Revan's two sabers were evenly matched by Malak's double-bladed weapon. Their speed was incredible - but it was becoming clear that Malak's strength was superior.

I cannot duel with anywhere near their prowess, despite my extensive training.

But my talents lay with the mental side of the Force, I admonished myself. I would not envy others for their gifts.

"It's like a dance, isn't it?" Kylah commented. I nodded agreement whilst keeping my focus on the duel. Inwardly, I pegged Malak as the better, but they were both talented. Very talented.

With a powerful thrust of Force that seemingly came from nowhere, Malak was thrown backwards into the dust. Revan was on him in the blink of an eye, landing a pseudo fatal blow before he had a chance to recover.

"End game!" she crowed.

"Hey, that's not fair!" Malak complained, scrambling to his feet. "You said no Force powers!"

"Fair? Come on, never expect your enemy to be fair!" Revan was grinning, green eyes dancing with merriment. Malak scowled, before glancing our way. His expression stilled as his gaze met mine. I was abruptly aware of just how handsome the young, strong, powerful Jedi Knight was. His skin gleamed in the sunlight, sparking deep brown highlights in his tousled hair.

Shirtless and muscular, the man was every inch a warrior. The day suddenly felt unseasonably warm.

Malak threw me a warm smile, and began walking closer.

"I don't believe I have met you before?" the man asked as he neared. His light brown eyes were intent on mine, and I inwardly damned the flush that scoured my cheeks. I was not used to such attention from a stranger, and I did not desire it.

He may be seven years older than me, but I have as much training as him. I am not a foolish girl to collapse into incoherence. There is no emotion; there is peace.

"I- I am Bastila Shan," I stammered, and my gaze dropped despite myself.
“Pleased to meet you, beautiful Bastila. I am Malak Devari.” He caught my flailing hand, and raised it to his mouth. His lips were warm, almost hot. I looked back into his eyes nervously; they seemed to shine just for me. He winked, and then looked back to Revan. I followed his gaze, and saw the Jedi Knight glaring at us.

“Really, Mal?” she scoffed. “This is about that spacer on Chandrila, isn’t it? I told you why. I told you it was a misunderstanding. I don’t play these sorts of games, and frankly—” she shot me a pitying look. “—it should be beneath you, too. I thought we’d sorted these trust issues out years ago.”

Her words dropped in the air like barbs, lingering even after the tempestuous knight turned on her heel and strode away. Ice formed hard and cold in my stomach, replacing the earlier glow. My gaze shot back to Malak, but he was frowning in consternation at her retreating back.

The deep emotion in his eyes gave the game away.

He loves her. And he is toying with me.

I snatched my hand away in outraged confusion. Malak glanced back at me and grimaced, perhaps in apology. Then he whirled around to chase after Revan.

“Revvie! Wait!” he groaned as he dashed off.

Kylah laid a hand on my shoulder. “He should not play with other people’s emotions like that,” she said softly. “A Jedi should not act so.”

...

I sighed, and reopened my eyes.

I could have dealt with my present situation in a collected fashion, had Revan been assuming the identity of Jen Sahara fully. Like she had been on the Endar Spire. Back then, she had acted exactly like the real Jen Sahara would have; meek, shy and obedient. I felt a passing sense of sadness for the scholar, but there was nothing more we could have done. She simply did not want to live after what happened to her on Deralia.

But Revan is not Jen Sahara. Not anymore. The thought was terrifying, except that... there is light within her. Light that does not come from the shell of a dead scholar. I sense empathy when she looks at Mission. She risked herself to come to my aid on the swoop track.

I could not understand this enigma; either she was Jen or she was the Dark Lord. Yet she seemed to be acting like neither.

The only thing I knew for certain was that the planted personality was beginning to shake loose. I had to get her back to the masters.

Also, there was the ambush of the Endar Spire to think on, beyond the bitter loss of all those lives. How did Darth Malak deduce our location? Is it possible he knows we are tracking down the Star Maps... or even that Revan still lives? Our drop from hyperspace, near the Taris system, had been a refueling one. How had the Sith known we would be there?

I need guidance. And help. I shook my head in irritation, and stepped out of the unit. I am calm, I am serene. I am resolute.

Stress and tension had built up to a boiling point since I had first pulled Darth Revan from the burning wreckage of her flagship. Rationally, I forced myself to review the situation I was now in. I must lead this party to Dantooine as readily as possible. Revan aside, I knew that I myself needed time, guidance and recuperation.

I refused to let my fear overcome my judgment. I had to return to the others, calm and in control of the mission.

Somehow, I will get Revan to the masters.

xXx
Our one-room apartment was starting to feel ridiculously cramped.

After pulling a face at the only bed, Mission had bluntly stated her desire to crash with the Beks for the night, flat-out ignored Zaalbar's howl of protest, and flounced outside with a flippant promise to return in the morning.

I couldn't help but feel a small measure of concern, even as I waved the upset Wookiee away to chase after her. I wasn't entirely sure how strictly his life-debt entailed him sticking to my side like a bad smell, but the Twi'lek kid surely needed his protection more than me right now.

Quit stressing. Mission's been scampering between the Upper and Lower City her entire life. She's savvy enough to avoid the gang fighting on her way to the Beks, and their stronghold should be well-guarded against any repercussions.

Besides, I had a different person to concern myself with.

Bastila. In many ways, she was everything I expected: uptight, snooty, and... and powerful. The way she'd caved in that tunnel above the swoop track- no doubt about it, Bastila Shan was quick to act when required. It was hard to believe she'd be held prisoner by a swoop gang of all things.

She was taking an inordinately long time in the tiny refresher. I supposed I couldn't blame her. No doubt, the Jedi was savouring her freedom, even if she was going to run us all out of hot water. The plumbing in the rundown apartment complex was notoriously short-lived even at the best of times.

Better than the sonics on most starships at any rate. I winced, rubbing my head as the side of it throbbed. The Endar Spire was the only starship I could recall, although with my riddled memory I had no idea what was in my past. Street Kid might have done her share of interstellar travel, and Evil Bitch was probably insane enough to believe she owned an entire armada.

I frowned, annoyed with myself, and deliberately forced my attention back to Bastila. Flashes of what felt suspiciously like grief cut through by hot anger kept throwing themselves into my head, and I knew the emotions were stemming from her.

It hadn't escaped me that Bastila would be able to sense my own state of mind in return. She'd wrangled a promise out of me to travel to Alderaan, just when I'd convinced myself to leave her and Flyboy to their own devices. If I travel to Alderaan, will Bastila really allow me to go my own way? She'd said she would. And Jedi did not lie - right?

But something told me not to trust her.

On the other hand, staying behind on Taris had little appeal. Brejik will know who I am by now. I'll have the Vulkars after me before too long. I can't be insane enough to want that. Leaving Taris is the smart choice.

And, despite everything, part of me wanted to have faith in Bastila Shan. She is a Jedi. She might be able to help me. Yet her very proximity with the mind-link suggested otherwise. On the outside, she seemed so poised, so composed - but our cursed bond told me different.

Fear. She'd been scared, earlier. I wasn't sure - but I thought it'd been when she'd looked at me. Though didn't that seem the most far-fetched thought of all? To think, a Jedi of Bastila Shan's ilk, afraid of me? Bastila sodding Shan! Hero of the frelling Jedi Order and Republic war effort!

Whatever was in my past, it couldn't scare a Jedi of her calibre.

Even if she is, apparently, still a padawan.

If I really was going to travel with her and Carth, I'd either have to come clean with my identity issues or do better with the façade. Maybe... maybe I should see that doc again. Zelka seemed to think he could help. At the close of everything, I wanted answers from Bastila - but I didn't want her to grasp the true nature of my fractured mind, either. I hadn't even been able to fool Onasi into believing I was no more than a shy scholar from Deralia, and we shared neither a history nor a bond.

The man in question looked up from the datapad he was perusing, likely scanning the news-feeds for any pertinent info. He eyed me over as I stretched aching limbs and threw him a tired smirk.

We had our black moments, but for some reason teasing Carth usually made me feel better.

He quirked an eyebrow at me. "Jen," he said in a low tone. "I- uh, thanks. I might not, well, care for your ethics, but I'm not blind to everything you've accomplished. Without you, I daresay Bastila would still be a prisoner, and I- uh, I guess I'd probably still be bumbling around the Upper City."

There was so much I could do with that stuttering statement. "Ethics?" I settled for, letting my smirk widen. "What have I done now?"

His brows lowered. "Let's not turn this into an argument, alright?"

"Hey!" I raised my hands in mock surrender, even though I knew my grin gave the game away. "What did I say?"

Carth glared at me, but I wondered if I saw the edge of his mouth quirk. I smiled at him sweetly. "Come on, Flyboy, you can't make a dig at my moral character and get away with it."

"Want to wager on that?" He'd folded his arms, staring at me steadily. "Five creds?"

"Spill, Flyboy. I won't let up, you know."

Carth sighed, looking vaguely uncomfortable. "Look, I-I didn't mean anything by it, really. Just-" and here he stopped to shoot me a glare. "You're the one walking out on an employment contract, sister."

My amusement vanished like free spice shots at a spacer's joint. I could feel myself glaring back. "Oh. That," I snapped. The frelling contract. It didn't sit right. It didn't seem right. My head was telling me the Jedi contract was watertight - a guardianship of sorts despite my age - and I'd meekly auto-printed my own autonomy away without a second thought.

My amusement vanished like free spice shots at a spacer's joint. I could feel myself glaring back. "Oh. That," I snapped. The frelling contract. It didn't sit right. It didn't seem right. My head was telling me the Jedi contract was watertight - a guardianship of sorts despite my age - and I'd meekly auto-printed my own autonomy away without a second thought.

No, Jen did that, not me. The burn of anger was familiar, and all too enticing. "Three years," I hissed. "Let me ask you, Onasi, would you willingly serve the Jedi for three years?"

"No," he shot back shortly. "But I wouldn't be stupid enough to sign it in the first place."
Carth turned away from me, pointedly bending back over his datapad as a means of ending the conversation. I felt the dull flush of emotion heat my cheeks, and wasn't sure if it was from anger or embarrassment.

Beholden to the damn Order for three years. But the entire memory of signing that contract felt discordant - wrong. I hadn't even thought on it since I'd left the 'Spire, and wasn't that strange in itself? When Bastila had thrown it in my face like a barbed nitro-dart, the recollection of the job offer had slammed into my consciousness with the precise detail of a holo-recording. The cold blast of the air-con, the hard-edged chair biting into my back, the foreign sense of awe at what was an amazing career opportunity-

But didn't Jen want to be a history teacher on Deralia? An occupation far beneath her skills, but Jen had never desired to leave her homeworld. I might've assumed some form of compulsion at work, had it not been for her nascent excitement-

I swallowed. Maybe it was a deeper compulsion that I knew. Or maybe, the fractures of my mind were devolving into paranoia at absolutely everything.

But- but I could sharply remember saying a soft farewell to my proud father. He'd never willingly let me leave, he'd barely even let me leave the commune to study at the Academia every rest day-

Not my father. My teeth clenched suddenly. Jen's father.

Still, everything about Jen's life from that moment on seemed almost... artificial. I didn't even know how I'd travelled to the conference room to meet with the Order - but then, suddenly, I was on the Endar Spire, meekly reading through any ancient archives that hefty Cerean master had thrown at me.

It was all so - fragmented. Like the rest of my memory? Maybe. Maybe it was the missing pieces that made my history so nonsensical, to the point where I simply didn't know what was real anymore.

Zelka mentioned hypnotic techniques might aid me. Last thing I wanted was someone else messing up my mind - but maybe he could help. Maybe he could make some sense out of everything. Maybe, what I needed was a neutral, third-party professional-

Yeah, because a doc playing shop in a frelling Free Clinic is really going to be a professional. Ten creds say he dropped out of Med School, and a poorly paid governmental hack-job is the only thing he could find-

The thin plimsi hatch to the refresher swished open, then, billowing out a cloud of steam and Bastila Shan herself. My thoughts ceased with abrupt wariness.

She threw me a tentative smile. Bastila was clad in a ragged tunic Carth had picked up from a stall earlier, which looked about three sizes too big for her, and didn't nothing but emphasize her youth. Her damp hair clung to her neck, and her expression showed nothing but a struggling attempt at friendliness.

I couldn't make her out. Was she a Jedi who could help me, or a guard?

"Perhaps it is time to discuss where we are at with leaving Taris," Bastila said, her voice prim as she stepped over to the sole bunk and hesitantly lowered herself to sit down. She looked so out-of-place, posture stiff and back ram-rod straight, flawless skin like she'd never spent a day in the sun, face with the fine bones of an aristocrat-
She is out-of-place, here, a fugitive hiding out in the arse-end of the Upper City. Bastila Shan has probably never been anywhere without a Jedi entourage and a high-end suite of rooms to fall back on.

Carth had slowly lowered his datapad to face her. "Uh, well, we don't really have a plan as of yet," he conceded, mouth quirking in a self-deprecating smile.

Bastila's slanted eyes widened in surprise. "What have you been doing all this time then?" she demanded.

I had to stifle a chuckle. Whoever said the Jedi were reasonable? "We were rescuing you, Bastila," I told her dryly.

"I would have expected one of you to have the sense to think ahead," she snapped, throwing me a slight frown.

With mounting amusement, I watched the dark clouds of irritation coalesce on Carth's face. For once, it wasn't me annoying the frell out of him. I inwardly wagered he mentally stuffed us both in a box labeled Difficult Women, and had to bite back a snicker at the thought.

"Bastila, don't you think you're being a little unfair?" Carth said firmly, levelling her with the hard stare of a superior confident of his own position. I could hear the faint echoes of command in his voice - disapproval, edged with an expectation that she would back down. He wasn't bad at that sort of thing, actually - even if it did normally tempt me into yanking his chain.

Outrage pinked high on the porcelain cheeks of the Jedi. She wasn't used to being questioned, at least not in front of others. No. Not the battle meditation princess of the Order.

"Unfair?" Bastila gasped. "Force, you two have been here for weeks, free and able to traverse around Taris at will, and you have not yet even begun to formulate an escape strategy?"

Again, I had to bite back a choked laugh. Seeing the young, uptight Jedi on the verge of throwing a hissy fit at a war-seasoned veteran bordered on the hilarious.

A stony look settled deep into Carth's brown gaze. "We have been spending all our time and resources in formulating a plan to extract you, Bastila. Or you have conveniently forgotten that the very reason you are here, free, is because of that?"

Bastila stood, her chin lifting as she stared stubbornly back at Carth. "Do not be preposterous. I was in the process of freeing myself at that ridiculous event. Captain Onasi, do not forget that I am your commander, and if I believe there is need for a discussion on your lack of progress, then I shall certainly say so!"

"We're not on the Endar Spire anymore, Bastila!" Carth's voice had risen with heat, too. "We're stuck deep in enemy territory, and quibbling about who is in charge hardly makes you a good leader. Particularly when you act like a spoiled child!"

I took in the scene: Carth, arms folded, glowering dangerously from underneath that ridiculous mop of rich chestnut hair. Bastila, affronted, hands propped up on hips in bristling anger.

I burst out laughing. I clapped my hand over my mouth instinctively, but it was too late. Bastila's mouth dropped open in outrage; Carth stared at me in disbelief.

"Better than a holo-soap, you two," I guffawed. "And here I thought Carth and I were bad!"
Bastila's mouth snapped shut with a click. "This is no laughing matter-" she began through clenched teeth.

Carth snorted. The corner of his mouth was twitching. "Jen's right. Maybe Taris will spin off its axis at the event, but Jen is actually right for once. We're both behaving like children." He shot me a rueful grin. "I blame your influence."

I fired a smirk back at him. "Thanks. I try to keep things interesting around here, Flyboy."

"Well, I-" Bastila looked at both of us, blinking, as if the sudden turn to amusement completely caught her off-guard. She sighed heavily, her eyes dropping closed. "Perhaps- perhaps I am not quite myself," she said, in a much quieter voice. "And perhaps I should not be so quick to judge. I apologize, Carth."

A heavy knock at the door halted any response from the Republic pilot.

In a lightning quick move, Carth had his blasters aimed while I catapulted towards our growing stash of vibroswords in the corner.

"Who could that be?" Bastila whispered. "Who knows where are here?"

The heavy weight of the common blade felt reassuring in my grip. I strode closer to the door, mind racing.

"No one," Carth replied in a low voice. "Other than Mission and Zaalbar, who would not knock."

"No, she'd slice her way in," I muttered. The knock, loud and heavy, sounded again.

I looked back at the others, only to find them both staring at me. I shrugged, turning back to the door. "Who's there?" I called out.

"(I am looking for Jen Sahara)," a gruff, deep voice called out in Mandalorian.

My eyes narrowed. Canderous Ordo, or I'm a frelling Mon Calamari. He's come for Bastila.

I held my vibrosword at the ready, aware of the other two edging close behind me. What are the chances he's come alone?

"A Mandalorian merc," I hissed. I had a quick look through the peephole, and my suspicions were founded; it was Canderous, although I didn't see any signs of backup - unless he had a couple of grunts hidden further down the corridor. "I think he's after Bastila. I doubt he's alone, so be prepared."

I heard Bastila gasp as I activated the entry switch.

Canderous stood in front of me, arms folded, a speculative look on his weathered face. He smirked as his gaze landed on my vibrosword, before it drifted behind to Bastila. His smirk deepened, and the look in his granite eyes changed to something I could only label as suggestive. "(Well done. I didn't think you'd get out of the Lower City alive)."

"Su'cuy," I muttered, keeping my vibrosword at half-mast. Something twitched in my head- no, through the bond. "(I'll take that as a compliment)."

"(You can put those away)," Canderous drawled, snapping his gaze back to me and motioning at my weapon. "(I've come with a proposition, not to cause a fight)."
"(She's not for sale)," I said shortly. In my mind, I felt the sharp tang of Bastila's indignant fury. Heh. Guess she understands Mandalorian. Carth, on the other hand, was probably seething with irritation at his inability to follow the conversation.

Canderous laughed heartily. "(If I was here on Davik's behalf, I wouldn't be offering credits, let me assure you)."

I dropped my blade, but didn't sheathe it. Whatever the merc wanted, I wasn't going to let him catch me off-guard. "(Fair point. So why are you here, Canderous?)"

His grey eyes bored into mine steadily; I returned his stare in equal measure. "(I'll be frank. I have been looking for an... ally, shall we say, to help me leave Taris. Your fighting skills have impressed me. You are also just a little bit crazy, which is exactly what I'm looking for)."

I felt my eyebrows lift in surprise, and tasted wariness from Bastila.

"(Why do you think I want to leave Taris?)" I asked mildly.

He snorted, and gave Bastila another obvious once-over. "(You don't really expect me to bother with a reply, do you?)"

I inclined my head in acquiescence. "(Why do you want to leave Taris, then?)"

It could be a trap. Sun and stars, it probably is a trap. I already know Davik wants to get his claws on Bastila, and Canderous is his henchman. I kept my face blank as another thought occurred to me. But is that really my problem?

"(My employer hasn't been paying me what he promised)," Canderous explained. "(You've probably figured out I work for Davik Kang and the Exchange. It's beneath me, but the pay kept me around for awhile. Now, though...)"

He trailed off as I grinned in response. That sounds plausible - if it's true. What kind of idiot cheats a Mandalorian and then doesn't kill him?

Canderous' lip curled. "(I figure it's time for me to break the Sith quarantine and get off this backwater planet. I've got a plan to escape Taris, but I can't do it alone)."

Well. This may have come at the best possible time. How fortuitous - if he's sincere.

"What's your plan, then?" I said, switching to Basic. This was important enough that Carth needed to follow the conversation - even if frustrating the flyboy was a temptation all on its own.

Canderous looked vaguely surprised at the change in language, but followed my lead. "I can get access to Davik's flagship - the Ebon Hawk. However, any ship leaving the atmosphere without launch codes will be disintegrated by the Sith fleet's automated defense guns. That's where you come in."

Launch codes. That can only mean one thing-

Carth snorted. "You want us to infiltrate the Sith base?" he asked in palpable incredulity. "How crazy do you think we are?"

"I ain't talking to you." Canderous turned heavy-lidded eyes on Carth. "I'm talking to your friend, ain't I?"
"He has a point, though," I interjected. "Breaking into the Sith base is tantamount to suicide. Add the fact that I don't know you enough to trust you, and I don't really see why I should help you out here."

"It would be simply preposterous to attempt an assault on the Sith base!" Bastila gasped, weighing in.

"I ain't yapping to you either, princess." Canderous threw her a contemptuous glare before turning back to me. "Can't say I think much of your friends. Look, I'm not big on working with strangers, either, but we both want to get off this rock." He paused, his eyes narrowing. "I can give you some help with the Sith base."

"You want to join us?" I asked, turning speculative.

Canderous grinned at me, and it was a feral sight. "Normally nothing would stop me from a good, clean fight, but I'm too well recognized, even around the Sith. Word would get back to Davik. I can, however, point you towards a top of the line astromech droid that can get you inside the base."

I raised an eyebrow at him. "Don't suppose you can acquire me a droid that will also get us out?"

Canderous barked a laugh. "You'll have to accomplish that on your own. If you want the droid, go to Janice Nall and ask for Davik's special project. Tell her Canderous sent you, and she'll be as sweet as mola-syrup." He eyed me over again. "Either we work together, or we both stay stuck here on Taris. I'll give you two days to act on this. If you don't, then consider the offer withdrawn. I'll be at Javyar's cantina in the evenings." He turned to leave, throwing one last comment over his armoured shoulder. "A word of caution. Make this a stealth op, or at least cover your tracks. Maybe you can bluff your way in under the pretense of seeing the governor, if you can't find an alternate form of entry. Just make sure those hu'tuun Sith don't realize the codes are compromised, or else they'll change them quicker than you can say 'escape from Taris'."

He left, as abruptly as he'd arrived.

I switched the door closed, my thoughts racing. I wasn't sure whether I wanted to follow the Mandalorian's plan. I can't trust him... but stars, I can't trust anyone.

_Might be a useful bit of exercise, slaughtering a few random Sith._ I swallowed, forcing the callous thought away. Any soldiers in the base were just sents doing a job. People, just like anyone else. Grunts. _Fodder._

"I do not sense any deception from him, which is surprising," Bastila said quietly. Her cool voice sliced through my dark-edged thoughts, and I clung to the sound like a life-line. "If he can procure us access to a ship, then this may be precisely the lead we require."

I drew in a shaky breath, feeling my mind clear, and nodded at her slowly in agreement.

Carth, however, was shaking his head. "I've got a bad feeling about this. You can't trust mercenaries, and you certainly can't trust Mandalorians." Carth grimaced. "This isn't a good idea."

_But it's our only plan to leave Taris so far._ "It can't hurt to check out that droid," I said slowly. "Unless either of you have a better plan?"

Carth frowned. "I wish I did. Jen, why did you think he was after Bastila?"

"Good question," Bastila threw in.
I grimaced, glancing away from them both. "I saw Canderous at the swoop track. He let slip that Davik was interested in acquiring her."

Bastila's face remained blank, even composed. But the lightning-quick thrust of fury that blasted through our mind-link surprised me. Her anger... her anger feels as hot as mine. A nanosec later, and all I could sense was serenity.

Bastila's ability to switch her emotions on and off like a tap was impressive. And probably emotionally unhealthy, a voice in my head muttered.

"And we're really going to go along with his plan, then?" Carth asked heatedly. "If he was after Bastila before, what makes you think he's suddenly changed his colours?"

"I am not sure we have the luxury of caution, Carth," Bastila said, a trifle hesitantly. "I believe Jen is right. We should at least investigate the droid tomorrow."

Carth sighed, running a hand through his hair. "Fine. I suppose seeing what the droid can do won't hurt, at least."

xXx

It was already close to evening, by Tarisian time, when the Mandalorian had left.

Carth was quick to rustle up a meagre meal of flatbread and protein paste, of which Bastila wolfed down in three minutes flat before openly eyeing up the only bed.

"Take it," I said quickly. Her gaze was guarded as it met mine, and I threw her a tight smile in response. "I'm fine with sleeping on the floor."

Not that I'm going to sleep. I had things to do, and places to be - but she didn't need to know that.

"Thank you." Her voice was soft, but I could hear the relief in it. It made me, once again, yearn to talk to her properly, to ask for her guidance, to trust her-

I turned away, gritting my teeth. I couldn't trust her. Not until I knew more about- about- everything.

We bedded down for the night, Carth and I both curling up on the floor under threadbare blankets that were more for comfort than warmth. I was tired, though, and the aching lassitude present in my limbs reminded me that rest was something I'd been running well-short on.

I don't seem to need much sleep. It was a surprising realization; when I looked back on the time I'd spent on Taris, a few hours kip seemed to be all I required to keep functioning for a full day's cycle.

Still, I'd fall into slumber easy enough if I let my mind drift. Which I was not going to do.

Carth's breathing patterns dropped into slow, steady respirations quickly enough - military grunts were well-versed in catching a few winks whenever they could. Bastila, however, stayed awake longer than I expected.

I could feel the edges of her presence, now, through the bond I was slowly becoming accustomed to sensing. She was tense, wary, and I wasn't about to chance letting her catch me slip away. It took a great deal of concentration to keep my thoughts blanked and my breathing regular, but slowly, slowly, she drifted off into the realm of the semi-conscious.
As quietly as I could, I rose to my feet.

A vibrosword and my small pack is all I need. I left the apartment, my primary destination being that of the Free Clinic. Zelka better be able to help me out, here. Help me figure out what I should do. Who I am. How to control my own frelling state of mind.

Jedi contract or not, I had no qualms about disappearing if I thought it in my best interests.

I had another reason for visiting Zelka, though. That serum was burning a hole in my pocket - I hadn't forgotten about that. A thousand creds. That'd certainly help me out, whether I stay on Taris or slip away on Alderaan.

It'd help a whole lot of sents out, too, if I gave it to Zelka. I had no idea, yet, which way I was going to turn on the matter of the rakghoul disease.

Oh well. Guess I'll play it by ear. That approach has worked for me so far, after all.

xXx
The woman was lying on the medical bed, eyes closed and face slack. I could feel perspiration dripping down the sides of my face; it had been gruelling getting her into a suggestible trance. I'd abandoned using solely centralizing techniques, and had resorted to the aid of calming synthetics to get her this far.

It goes against my medical instincts to use drugs. But she had been desperate for help. Desperate enough to get me out of bed, in the middle of the night. And the trust simply wasn't there; she did not or could not subsume into a semi-conscious state, so the depressant had been required simply to allow her mind to relax.

None of this would be so damnably rushed, if Taris had a decent healthcare system. But the corrupt xenophobic planet only catered to the rich and the Exchange. To think there’d been a time when things were worse than now - once, before the dawn of the Mandalorian Wars, we didn’t even have free clinics. I’d been training as an orthopaed then, and still recalled the flock of renegade Jedi who briefly transformed the health and education systems within Taris.

Now, the four remaining Free Clinics were about the only surviving remnant their visit.

We had no damn specialists for the masses. I was lucky, coming from a wealthy background, my zeal and resources enabled me to study snatches of various other medical fields. Even psychoanalysis garnered a minor interest from me, primarily since mental health services were one of the least available to Tarisians with no credits. But in all honesty, I muddled along and merely did the best I was able to. For most citizens, that meant just getting them on their feet to face another day.

I looked back down to Jen Sahara, and hoped I would be able to find the origin of her anger, as she had explained it to me. She desired the ability to control her unwanted rage; that, however, was plainly impossible without exploring the root cause and reason for it in the first place. Hence we attempt regressive hypnotism. It wasn’t something I had a wealth of experience of; only a snippet of study and three prior patients filled my repertoire on this area of medical knowledge.

But I shall try my best to help her.

My attention caught on the console’s chrono next to the bed, and I realized how little time it was before sunrise.

“Alright, Jen. You are sitting alone in the middle of a field, next to a gently trickling river. The sun is beating down on your head, and you feel totally at peace. Nothing can hurt you here.” I took in a deep breath. It was time to begin. “I am going to ask you some questions, Jen, and I want you to answer as truthfully as you are able. Anytime you are feeling too scared or angry, you will retreat to this place. Any time I call out 'Stop', you will immediately arrive back here as well, calm and emotionless. Do you understand?”

“Yes,” she responded quietly, almost mechanically.

“Okay Jen, I want you to think about the head injury you sustained. Take your mind back to five minutes before it occurred. What were you doing?"

“I was sleeping, dreaming,” Jen replied in a soft voice.

“Move forward five minutes, Jen. Were you conscious at the time of your accident?”

“Darkness,” she murmured. “Bad dreams. I can see people dying!” Her voice rose in panic.

“It’s just a dream, Jen, it’s not really happening,” I said soothingly. The accident occurred whilst she was asleep, then. Perhaps it brought on a nightmare.

“No, it’s not a dream! I died! The Sith killed me! They, they tortured me until I-”

"Stop,” I said abruptly, and the woman paused, panic melting away from her face. The Sith? I did wonder who she was running from. If they tortured her, perhaps they broke her mind as well. But she seems fairly coherent when awake. I frowned.

“I want you to now recall when you first woke up after your injury. Where are you?”

“I don’t know.” Her voice had changed. I blinked. Instead of a high-pitched, panicked tone, it was now lower, sultry, and eons more confident. My frown deepened. Why would her voice change?

She continued speaking- “some sort of cruiser. A Hammerhead-class. But I haven’t been conscious for a long time.”

She drifted off into silence and I wondered if she’d been convalescing after a long injury. After moments had passed, I prompted, “Jen?”

“No, no wait, I’m a scholar, onboard a Republic starship,” she mumbled, her voice shaking. “Yes, that’s right, I’ve been hired to look at some ruins.” Her voice had lilted again, back to the higher-pitch from earlier.

I breathed in deep, partly in shock. First the Sith, now the Republic? She was one of the Republic fugitives, I realized with some wonder. I must help her as best as I am able. The local news-feeds were littered with offers of compensation for information leading to the capture of any Republic personnel, and descriptions of high-ranking officers still made the headlines. If she’s just a scholar, though, then she’ll have a little more anonymity.

My gaze slid over to the entrance of the clinic. A good thing she’d arrived out of hours, when Gurney wasn’t here. I was well aware of my assistant’s slippery nature, and knew he’d have no qualms about turning a Republic citizen over to the Sith.

Again, I cursed the corrupt organization who ruled Taris. The Sith or the Exchange - it wasn't like either quasi-government ever did anything of note for the people. I'd been one of many who'd hoped, after the Mandalorian bombardment years ago, that Taris might actually be offered a place in the Republic. Pull out from beneath the yoke of the corrupt elite who were no more than puppets, really- doing whatever the controlling power told them to, under the pretense of their dubious station as elected politicians.

Of course, only citizens could vote - and only Humans with wealth could become citizens.

A place in the Republic seemed little more than a pipe-dream, these days.

"That can't be right!" Jen murmured, pulling my attention back to her. "That's not me."

I stared at the woman. "What do you mean?" I asked cautiously.
“I’m no scholar,” she whispered. “I don’t know who I am, but I’m no scholar.”

I stayed quiet for some moments, gazing at the prone woman in front of me, and wondered what clues I could derive from her appearance. She was in her early- to mid-thirties, perhaps, with short dark curls cropped close to her head, and a pale olive skin tone with no obvious tan. I recalled her piercing green gaze from earlier, and she’d struck me as confident and quick-witted in our short encounters thus far.

She was moderately tall, and her form was lithe, bordering on skinny – either she was not the physical type, or she’d been sorely out of practice for one reason or another. My gut told me it was the latter. Her stance, her alertness, and not to mention her injuries – it all adds up to a life of action, not study.

But that wasn’t conclusive by any means – plenty of scholars were athletes or soldiers as well.

“Alright, Jen, I do not want you to relive this, but simply answer the question. Can you tell me whether the Sith have ever captured you before?”

“Y-yes. They destroyed my h-home, everything...” Her voice had switched again, back to the trembling, high tone, and trailed off into shaky silence.

“You are in a green paddock, next to a river. The sun is shining on your head, and nothing can hurt you here,” I reminded her gently. “You are not reliving your memories; you are simply answering my questions. Can you remember what happened when the Sith captured you?”

“No, Jen has a mindblock,” the confident tone answered. Surprise lurched through me, and I stared blankly at the prone woman.

A mindblock? Why would the Sith block the mind of a prisoner they were torturing? That doesn't make any sense! I frowned. Perhaps the mindblock is something she created herself, to block out the trauma?

But why did she answer in the third person?

“Did the Sith create the mindblock?” I asked.

A deep snarl ripped out of her throat, and I jumped backwards in surprise. “No, it was those interfering robes who think they can leash me to that trumped-up scow! I will rip their entrails-”

“Stop!” I called desperately, feeling fearful for the first time. That was a third voice! And one I certainly didn't want to hear again. Full of loathing, hate, anger.... what's going on here? I had a duty to help this woman to the best of my abilities, but.... Peace, if this isn't going to be difficult! I was more and more uncertain of how to proceed. I need to know more of her history, to understand where this rage is coming from.

“You are back in the summer field. You are safe. Can you tell me when your home was attacked?”

“Eight years ago.” Assertive voice was back. “The Mandalorians slaughtered everyone on Talshion. We could have stopped them. We should have been there!” Grief and resentment darkened her tone.

Mandalorians? I frowned, growing more confused. Talshion was unfamiliar to me, whether it was a city or port or planet. But I, like all Tarisians, had had as much exposure to Mandalorian brutality as the Sith. “I thought you said it was the Sith, Jen?”

“The Sith killed everyone!” Scared girl cried. “My father! They're going to kill me, too!”
"Stop!" I commanded, my brow furrowing. Dissociative identity disorder? It was a possibility, particularly given the different timbre of voices she used. This situation was getting worrisome; if only Taris had a psychoanalyst attached to the Free Clinics then I’d stop right now. But Jen was a Republic fugitive, and I could only do my best to help her stay sane enough to either leave Taris or find a safer hiding place. For that, I needed to understand her better. “You are safe; no one can hurt you.” I took in a deep breath. “Can you tell me a bit about your childhood?”

“I was a street kid,” the woman replied, and I heard echoes of amusement in her tone. “We were lucky, far too many times, really. We’d sneak into places, and steal creds and food. I had no one, you see, and Mal only had his brother. Sometimes I’d go hungry, and eat grubs with old man Freeflight. He was my first teacher, really, only thing I had close to a parent. But I always dreamed of leaving Talshion, to fly amongst the stars.” She sounded wistful. I knew too many people like that, born in poverty and starved for life. Starved for more things than just food.

“You mentioned you were a scholar? What did you study?”

“Everything,” she said. I looked down to see a faint smirk on her face. “Politics, history, sparring, meditation. Anything I could find in the archives, any training I could wrestle out of Yudan. Mal even tricked Zhar into acquiring him starpilot lessons, and I never knew how he got away with that one. But we were so old when they took us away from our home. They said we were too powerful to ignore. We never saw our friends again.”

Who are they?

Whoever took her away probably had something to do with her current issues. “How old were you when you were taken away from your friends, Jen?”

“I wasn’t, they k-killed my friends! M-my family! They hurt me, and k-kept hur-”

“Stop!” I interrupted sharply, and then the air in my lungs rushed out as I came to a startling conclusion: everything time I call her Jen, she responds as the scared girl. I closed my eyes, and rubbed my balding head tiredly.

I’m not qualified for this.

“You are safe,” I said gravely. “You can smell the fresh grasses around you. No one is around; no one will harm you.” I sighed. “What is your name?”

She paused for a long moment, her forehead etched in deep furrows. “I’m not sure,” she whispered finally, so quiet that I couldn’t pick which voice she was responding with. “I think it might be Jen Sahara.”

She hasn’t given herself a fake name, then. That was promising, at least. I’d read of some cases where sentients with split-personality disorders fabricated a whole other life in such detail that it may as well have been a real person. She will believe they are both real. I cannot lose sight of that. It was up to me to figure out the truth. Which persona was legitimate: the shy scholar who responded to her name, or the confident street kid who apparently studied everything?

That made me realize I hadn’t asked about Jen’s field of expertise yet.

“What did you study, Jen?”

“Ancient archaeology and anthropology,” came the quiet response.

“Can you tell me a bit about your study, Jen?”
"I-I, okay. I completed a thesis on the founding and early days of the Republic, when it only encompassed Core worlds. My special interest is the extinction of ancient civilizations, though... I've started a second thesis on the reign of the latter Massassi, with the intention of exploring the theories surrounding the collapse of their people."

While little of that meant anything to me, it was not overly difficult to prod more details from the woman. There was enough depth and discourse, there, to convince me that she definitely was an academic. Her shy voice began to take on a slight enthusiastic lilt to it. But Jen Sahara readily admitted that she had never partaken in any field trip, never travelled to an excavation site - although I was no archaeologist, I would have expected some practical element to her study.

It seemed like Jen Sahara's entire life had been one of isolated learning from within the commune she had been born into.

“Can you tell me what your childhood was like, Jen?”

“It was quiet. My father raised me. I lived in a small community, and wanted to be a history teacher when I grew up.”

Jen's life sounded- well, normal. A bit mundane, and perhaps that was why she’d created the exciting street kid with the fantastical study habits. Don’t assume too much, Zelka, I admonished myself. I cannot rule out the validity of the street kid, yet.

But I was beginning to doubt.

“Did you have a happy childhood, Jen?”

“No. I was very lonely. My father was quite protective, and didn’t let me meet many people.”

Perhaps she was so lonely and shy, that she created a more confident alter ego? It was time to find out more about that one, then.

“How old were you when you were taken away from your friends?” I asked, an echo of my earlier question, but this time omitting her name.

“I was sixteen,” Street Kid replied.

“Were you kidnapped?”

“Well, in a sense, really. They were nice about it, I mean, but it's not like we had a choice. Mal saw that, even if I only saw the opportunity.”

“Who is Mal?”

“My best friend.” Her voice turned unbearably sad, and then I heard it contort with dark fury. “My betrayer. He’s ruined everything. He dares to backstab—”

“Stop!” I called out sharply. “You are back amongst the grass and flowers again, one hand dipping in the trickling water of the peaceful stream. You are safe.”

Street Kid is unstable, I understood then. Jen’s made up a fake, confident persona, and funneled all her rage into it. Perhaps it’s anger or resentment at being shy and overlooked, or maybe it’s from the trauma of whatever the Sith did to her. I couldn’t know in one session, but as I looked up through the plasticeel windows and saw the pink flush of dawn, I knew I had to give Jen some assistance in dealing with the present.
“When were you first aware of the anger and rage inside you, Jen?”

“When I woke up with a head injury, on the Endar Spire.”

And I still have to work out how the Republic fit into her life.

“And you didn't have these outbursts at all before this time?” I asked Street Kid.

“I wasn't aware. I thought I was Jen. She's not real; they'd programmed her into my head to make me more biddable.”

She yearns for confidence. She wants to feel important, so she's created a more exciting identity - and a reason for why Jen doesn't exist.

I had a friend, a neuroscientist, Engar Droone, who'd studied more psychology and psychiatry than I. Of course, he sold his wares to the upper crust, and I found it hard to disguise my disapproval. It had created a wedge between us, where once professional camaraderie has existed. But maybe, maybe I could still reach out. Ask him for a favour. Engar's expertise certainly exceeded mine in this area.

The woman snarled, then, and I realized she was still in the throes of answering my query. “I was trapped. They dared to cage me!” Her voice had lowered further, into that dangerous tone I'd heard once before.

"Stop," I commanded. I need to find out who she resents so much. "Who caged you?"

“Why did they cage me?” Street Kid was back, but she wasn't answering. “Why did they save me? I... I can’t handle this. It’s all been such an unmitigated failure, everything I strived to do! It would be easier to, to…”

“To what?” I whispered, unable to stop the question from slipping out.

“To reclaim my heritage, you weak-minded moron!” she yelled furiously. Her face twisted in an evil sneer, abruptly slackening when I yelled out: “Stop!”

And then, her face crumpled, and without me saying anything I heard her whisper: “No, it's easier to just play along with them. To be the shy girl they want.”

She should not still be talking! But maybe, just maybe, we were nearing the core of the issue.

“Who wants?” I asked softly.

“My captor. My rescuer. Don't they realize, they should have just killed me?” the voice broke, and her shoulders sagged. “Death would be a release.”

I am in way over my head.

"Stop," I whispered, and she was quiet once more.

So much for finding the root of her problems. I am more lost than before. Sweat beaded my forehead, and I felt directionless. How do I proceed from here?

The door opened quietly, and Gurney popped his head around the corner. Taris certainly didn't offer me a grand selection of trainee medics; I had to make do with what was available.

Gurney's curious gaze landed on Jen. I stiffened. He can’t find out she came from the escape pods, or I may as well hand her over to the blasted Sith myself.
"Yes?" I asked sharply. And why didn't he knock?

"You got a patient at the door, doc," Gurney drawled. One eyebrow raised, like he'd noticed my short tone.

I nodded, forcing myself to relax, forcing myself to smile at the man. "I'll be out in a minute."

Gurney disappeared, and I turned back to survey Jen Sahara once more.

The way her street kid persona had stopped responding to my guidance... the unstable rage that seemed a part of this presumably artificial character... it would do Jen no favours, not while hiding as a fugitive from the Sith. I shall need to see her many times. This will not be a quick treatment. If I can convince Engar to advise... Perhaps he would be prevailed upon. But for the time being, I had to help Jen Sahara remain safe. And in control of who she really was.

"Are you staying with friends, Jen?"

"I- yes."

My curiosity was burning, despite my training. Were her friends also fugitives? Were the Sith, also, after them? But such knowledge was dangerous. The Sith had audited the Free Clinic more than once. Demanding details of patients, of clients, of call-outs... I did not log all the work I did. But with an assistant as untrustworthy as Gurney, some days I felt like it was only a matter of time before the Sith closed me down.

Or worse.

The sound of chatter filtered in from the outer room: Gurney, welcoming the next patient. With a heavy heart, I acknowledged that we were out of time. For today.

"You are Jen Sahara," I stated. "The other thoughts and personality are not real, and they are not you."

"I cannot be Jen," she whispered, confused.

"This is who you are, you must accept it and not let your anger control you, Jen. You must stay safe, and hidden, and we will work this through together. Stay safe as Jen Sahara."

"Stay as Jen Sahara?" the response was so quiet, I barely heard.

"Yes. You are Jen Sahara."

"I am Jen Sahara," she mumbled.

"Yes, you are. I want you to wake up out of this trance, and feel relaxed and refreshed after a count of three. You will consciously recall nothing of our conversation, but you will wake knowing yourself as Jen Sahara." I counted, and the woman opened dazed, confused eyes. I laid a comforting hand on her shoulder, and she cringed.

"How are you feeling, Jen?"

"Wh- what's going on?" Her green eyes were fearful.

Worry coursed through me. "You are in a medical facility on Taris, Jen. Do you remember?"

“Do you remember coming in here for hypnotism?” I asked softly. Concern punched deep into my gut. I’d been convinced that the shy scholar was the real person, but she’d come in as the street kid, I saw now. Which persona would help her hide from the Sith?

Had I done the right thing here? Doubt assailed me, and I frowned as I gazed at her.

“Oh! Yes, I do,” she said quickly. “Am I all better now, doctor?”

A small wave of relief mitigated my worry, but it didn’t disappear. “Not quite, Jen, but we’ll get there. I need you to come back tonight, okay? In the evening, like you did this time. We have a lot of work to do to help you.”

She nodded, still not meeting my eyes.

“Promise me, Jen?” I prompted.

“I promise.” She looked up, and her innocent, nervous eyes struck me as strange. She was wary, desperate even, when she came in. But not shy.

“Oh! Is it daylight already?” She was looking at the chrono. “The others will be worried. I need to go.” She sat up, and slipped off the bed.

“Jen,” I forestalled her as she began walking away. “Come back today, if you can? I’m worried about you.”

She swallowed, and nodded once more. “Okay.” She frowned in concentration, and dragged a hand through her pockets. “Um, I think you might like this,” she offered, and thrust something into my hands. It felt like a hypoderm.

I stared after her in concern as she disappeared, without examining what she had given me. I need to access the medical databases, and read up on this disorder. I am scared I may have just made things a whole lot worse.

xXx
My head was spinning.

I scurried back to the apartments, stumbling over my own feet, nervously avoiding the gaze of any passing sentient as I rushed across the Tarisian courtyards. The Upper City of Taris gleamed with the trappings of wealth and civilization. There were no trees. Just durasteel and chrome and transparisteel everywhere, stretching forever into a faraway sky that was more washed-out and muted than any I had seen on Deralia.

This place was as foreign as the Endar Spire, and I hadn't been comfortable there.

What's been going on? The voice was a high-pitched whine in my head. My thoughts were a frightened jumble of fragments, tripping over themselves and spinning into a dizzying maelstrom. I hadn't been acting... normal since that horrifying attack on the Endar Spire.

I swallowed convulsively. Flashes of hair-raising adventures and crazy battles ran through my head like a horde of spooked Deralian hessi-calves. How did any of- of- of everything that has happened come to pass? I don't know how to fight!

I'd never seen a vibrosword before in my life. But I'd been wielding one, using it to stab into- into-

Sweat broke out on my forehead. My breath came in short, sharp gasps, thundering along with my heartbeat. The doctor. The doctor will help-

He was a trained professional. Doctor Forn had urged me to return, later today, and I rather thought I needed to. For my own peace of mind.

I have nothing to be alarmed about. All these strange thoughts I've been having, the frightening way I've been behaving- he'll help me. I just need to get back to safety, first, and then the doc will see me later.

I slunk back into the apartment building, evading the gaze of the resident aliens. Just being alone on this strange world was alarming. All I yearned for was to be back home, safely ensconced in the academia, or even back with Father-

He'll be desperately worried about me. At least I could count on him not hearing about the Endar Spire. Wide-band HoloNet coverage was severely discouraged in the Godsworn Commune, and only grudgingly allowed for scholarly purposes. And as for a commune inhabitant actually travelling off-world-

Sometimes, I couldn't believe Father had actually let me leave.

My thoughts were so awhirl, that I didn't even notice the body until I tripped over it.

I caught myself on the palms of my hands, rolling back into a ready crouch on instinct. Turned sideways, to see-
Dead eyes staring at me blankly. Round, dark eyes of a Duros who bore a blaster burn melting half his chest.

Victim of an Exchange take-out, a voice muttered calmly in my head. Idiots should've at least cleaned up their mess.

Horror turned in my gut. A desperate cry fell from my lips. Bodies, death, everywhere! This isn't real- none of this can be true-

I ran.

Everything was so surreal, so strange, so wrong. My eyes blurred as my feet padded desperately down the empty hallway. There'd been other deaths, deaths at my hand-

Innocent deaths-

That passerby I'd ruthlessly attacked. And- before- I'd somehow... lifted that Vulkar into the air. Fantasies. Nightmares. I can't use the Force!

Jen? Where are you?

Strange voices in my head. I'd had some delusion about sharing a mind-link with a Jedi, and what did that even mean?

Jen?

I was even hearing her voice in my mind! Jedi Shan, that powerful Force-user from the Endar Spire, the one who'd been taken prisoner-

And wasn't that a lark, someone gibed. Precious princess of the Order, held captive by a lowly swoop gang of all things-

I flinched. The dark voice fled, and I glanced up to see the apartment door in front of me. The hide-out we'd been taking refuge in. For we were Republic fugitives - Captain Onasi and Jedi Shan and myself - all striving desperately to avoid the notice of the Sith in a rundown living complex.

My entire life sounded like a poorly planned-out plot from one of those trashy holo-books that Father had always decried. I didn't think we were even paying anybody rent. Wasn't that illegal, not to mention immoral?

Jen!

The hatch control beeped in reassuring confirmation beneath my palm. Captain Onasi had programmed it with our autoprint, I knew that much - but I was at once assailed with the memory of slicing the thing open. That was nothing but pure insanity- I didn't know how to pick locks-

The entrance swished open.

Jedi Shan was sitting on the sole bed, head bowed, rich hair unbraided and pulled back into two tails. Her head jerked up at my entrance, and her expression contorted in fear.

"Jen!" she gasped, jumping to her feet.

Fear? Why would a Jedi be afraid?

I felt my shoulders shake as I stumbled inside. At least, around Jedi Shan, I would be safe.
"Where have you been?" she demanded, and whatever emotion I had seen on her face transformed back into poise. "Are you alright?"

"No," I whispered, looking down as the door closed behind me. My shoe scuffed against the tattered plyfoam floor. "Um, not really."

"What happened?" Jedi Shan breathed as she walked towards me. Her steps were cautious and slow.

"Nothing," I mumbled. The room was empty apart from us two. A heap of equipment was stacked in the corner, next to two folded blankets. My head throbbed; the echo of that injury back on the Endar Spire, the incident that had somehow turned me into- into someone else. I blinked, glancing up at the Jedi. "Where are the others?"

Jedi Shan's gaze was heavy; questioning, and pulling for answers I could not give. "Mission has ventured out to purchase the astromech droid. We are fortunate she can afford it. Carth accompanied her, although he was somewhat aggrieved that you had disappeared." Her voice was composed, apart from the slightest hint of reproach. "I understood from him that this is not the first time."

I blushed in furious embarrassment. I've been so rude to the captain. Why? What's wrong with me? He's a Republic officer, for Godsworn sake!

"Jen, where did you go?" Jedi Shan asked, and her voice was strangely compelling. I felt the strongest urge to tell her everything. She is a Jedi. I can trust her, and she can help me.

"I went to, uh, to see Doctor Forn," I answered quickly. "He works at the Central Free Clinic. He's been helping me."

Jedi Shan's almond-shaped eyes widened. "Helping you with what?" she demanded. The sharpness of her tone cut through the stagnant air.

"Um, to- um, control my anger," I mumbled. Jedi Shan was someone I could trust, I knew that much. "He was trying some hypnosis techniques, and said we made progress. I- er, I do feel more like myself, Jedi Shan."

If I believed in this fantastical mind-link, then the stunned astonishment I felt swirling through me would surely be coming from Jedi Shan. But it's not real. It is a fake construction of mine. Head injuries can do all sorts of things to a brain. I am Jen Sahara, nothing more and nothing less.

I have nothing to be alarmed about.

"Jedi Shan?" Bastila Shan replied with a touch of asperity, her face composed. "You can call me Bastila, you have certainly done so before."

I- had. And I certainly hadn't afforded her the respect someone like her deserved. "Okay," I said hesitantly.

"Jen, you must explain exactly what occurred at the medical facility." Bastila seemed to hesitate, a frown pleating on her pale brow. "You are my charge, and I sense a great change in you. You can trust me, Jen."

I did trust her. Jedi Shan would keep me safe.

Weak minded fool! A voice sneered inside my head. Bastila stumbled back a pace. No! You're not
I won't listen to you!

The hatch behind us opened, and other voices shattered my internal chaos.

"I don't see why I can't tag along, it's my droid after all!" a girl complained. I spun around, to see a young blue Twi'lek glaring at a towering Wookiee. My eyes widened. Mission Vao. Zaalbar.

I'd met only a few Twi'leks in my life, and all onboard the Endar Spire. I'd certainly never even seen a Wookiee before. He appeared uncommonly fierce, tall and muscular and covered in snarled fur.

"(It's too dangerous!)" Zaalbar whined as he followed the teenage Twi'lek inside, ducking under the door's entrance. A small astromech droid wheeled in behind them, whistling at the girl.

I stumbled backwards, away from them. How can I understand Shyriiwook? I thought in anxious fright. Tremors wracked down my spine as other memories assailed me. And Mandalorian? And Ryl? A head injury can't do that! What's going on?

A warm hand pressed comfortingly into my arm; at my side, Bastila was staring at me steadily.

"It will be alright, Jen," she murmured, and her voice was reassurance itself. "I will help you, I promise. You will be just fine with me here."

I will be just fine with Jedi Bastila Shan, I realized.

"Blithering idiot!" The taunt was quieter now. I thought I caught a twitch on Jedi Shan's face, but when I turned to look, she was gifting me with a serene smile.

"It will be okay," she said softly.

It will be okay.

"Another midnight escapade, Jen?" The question was as disapproving as it was rhetorical. I glanced back, to spot the commanding presence of Captain Carth Onasi. He was levelling a heavy frown at me, raking a hand through his rich brown hair.

I flushed. "I, uh, I'm sorry." I mumbled, looking away.

"Oh great, back to the apologies," I heard him mutter. Humiliation writhed inside me; that I could disappoint a man I respected so much shamed me. Bastila's hand on my arm was an anchor through my awkward chagrin.

"Jen, tell Big Z that I'm coming along as well!" Mission complained, coming to stand in front of me. Her hands were clenched, and her face was set in an expression of pure teenage pique.

I blinked in surprise at her effusive demand. Who am I to tell a Wookiee anything? I glanced helplessly at Bastila. Oh my, did he really swear a lifedebt to me?

"You are too noticeable, Mission," Bastila said smoothly. "Your skills are useful, but non-Humans garner attention in the Upper City. The same rationale applies to Zaalbar. I will infiltrate the Sith base, along with Carth and Jen."

Infiltrate... infiltrate a Sith base? I stared fearfully at Bastila, but the Jedi's expression was resolute. But I can't- I can't fight!

Her fingers pressed into my upper arm as she leaned close. "Do not be alarmed, Jen," she "whispered. "I will protect you."

"(I must go)," Zaalbar rumbled in discontent. "(I must guard Jen Sahara's back)." The Wookiee's black eyes were fierce underneath his shaggy brown fur. I was reminded, at once, of all those monstrous rakghouls down in the Undercity. He'd scythed through them- dispatched them as easily as a group of harmless tach.

The memories were fresh and raw and wholly unbelievable.

"It will be only us three, Zaalbar," Bastila repeated firmly. But Zaalbar was shaking his furry head in the face of her command. He was ready to protest further, and I realized - somewhat uncomfortably - that he was looking to me for guidance.

Lifedebt. He swore a lifedebt. How can brain damage transform me into the sort of violent warrior that produces a Wookiee lifedebt?

"We should do what Jedi Sh- uh, Bastila says," I stuttered.

"Jen," Mission squawked in alarm. "What's wrong with you?" The Twi'lek strode closer, frowning. One hand rose to push a set of tech-goggles higher back on her lekku. "Are you okay?"

"Nothing is wrong with her," Bastila countered, stepping in front of me. Her intonation brimmed with authority. "But I must speak with Jen alone, now, before we begin preparations for our forthcoming mission. Please excuse us."

And with that, Bastila motioned me imperiously into the tiny bathroom adjoining the apartment. It housed the refresher and a floor space of about three foot square. I blinked in surprise, dodged Carth's stare of consternation, and meekly followed her in.

xXx

The new droid that followed Mission about seemed very high-tech. When Bastila and I returned to the others - after an uncomfortable conversation where the Jedi became highly frustrated at my inability to recall much of my conversation with Doctor Forn - Mission had cornered me to espouse jubilantly about all of T3-M4's capabilities. We had droids back at the Godsworn Commune, but only medical and utility bots. I couldn't help but feel uncomfortable at all the slicing and security functions this highly modified class-two astromech boasted.

Mission's enthusiastic spiel was interrupted eventually by Bastila, who was keen to get moving. I wasn't. The prospect of entering a Sith base was simply, frightening - for all that the Jedi's presence reassured me. Why, I wondered, couldn't we just stay on Taris, hiding in the apartment where it was safe?

Yeah, why not. It's not like the Sith are looking for us or anything. I shook my head, dispelling the strangely sarcastic voice.

Bastila was poking through the ominous pile of weapons on the apartment floor. She retrieved a double-bladed implement and hefted it thoughtfully. It was obvious the Jedi was at home wielding a melee weapon.

Just as it was obvious that I was not. The Godsworn commune was a pacifistic society; other than shiv-blades and standard kitchen utensils, I'd never held an edged blade before.

Except recently. Against the rakghouls. Against all manner of opponents.
Bastila was looking at me again, a steadying gaze of concern.

_Maybe I'm possessed._ I thought frantically. _Maybe I'm having a mental breakdown._

Relax, Jen. Her voice rang in my mind. _It will be okay. Trust in the Force._ Her expression, her very sense of being, seemed to embodiment a state of serenity... and it did comfort me. Bastila smiled, before handing me a light blaster. I swallowed, and clipped it to my belt hurriedly.

"No blades," the captain broke in. "No unconcealed weaponry. Bastila, I heard the Sith are arresting citizens on sight that don't have permits. I'm not sure about the validity of that intel, but striding through the courtyards brandishing vibroswords isn't exactly keeping a low profile. We shouldn't risk it."

Captain Onasi was right - but I'd taken to hiding one underneath that bulky coat. Like some sort of ridiculous criminal-

"Jen," Mission began, stomping over and placing herself in front of me. "I helped in the Vulkar base. You know I did. I'm the one that bought Teethree-"

"Only blasters then," Bastila murmured in disappointment, before placing the double-blade back on the ground. "The Force is with us. Perhaps we shall not even need those."

"Mission, Bastila has a point about the Upper City," Carth said wearily. "And being a Tarisian, I rather think you know that already."

"(I don't like this any more than you, Mission)," Zaalbar added in a low voice. "(But this is not the place for us. Allow the others to do what they must)."

Mission's alien blue face twisted in a scowl, but she was looking at me as if I made all the decisions. I gave a tiny shake of my head, before dropping her gaze to glance back at Bastila.

"Fine!" the girl snapped petulantly. "Well, if I'm not needed, I'm gonna go skive back down-level, find someone who actually _wants_ me around. Teethree, stay here and listen to Jen. _She's_ the one who's been leading us all this time, after all."

Carth sighed. "Mission, don't go, we'll be back soon-"

With an irritated huff, the Twi'lek spun on her heel and stormed out.

"(I better follow her)," Zaalbar rumbled disconsolately. "(Even our path to the Lower City can be sighted by upworlders if Mission is not careful. I will ensure she returns)."

An uneasy silence descended on us after the large Wookiee left, and I felt strangely uneasy. I wasn't sure exactly what I'd done to earn the Twi'lek's ire, but I could only hope she wouldn't stay angry for long. My shoulders hunched as I noticed the captain staring at me in confusion.

"Come," Bastila commanded, standing protectively at my side. "I am beginning to feel a certain urgency to start moving." She was frowning, her gaze growing oddly distant. "I am uncertain if this is premonition or purely..."

She trailed off as the astromech wheeled closer, beeping jauntily at me. It's shiny dome swiveled, blue led lights twinkling as it tooted something in Binary.

"You need to do what Bastila asks," I told the droid hesitantly. "Bastila or Captain Onasi."
Bastila's smile at me was approving, but still—there was something watchful in her expression. "Let us depart," she said softly, before shooing Teethree out ahead of us. "I only hope we can accomplish this mission in stealth. I am not entirely sure we could handle a squadron of Sith guards."

"You'd be surprised what Jen can do," Carth commented, but his eyes on me were... worried. I glanced away.

"Regardless," Bastila continued. "I have faith that T3-M4's computer skills and my persuasion techniques will keep us out of any unnecessary bloodshed."

"Unnecessary bloodshed?" Carth scoffed, as I followed them out the door. "I'd like to think you're right, but we're breaking into a heavily guarded Sith base." His tone rose slightly with derision. "We'd better all be prepared to kill, if required."

"T3-M4 should be able to access the Sith mainframe from any terminal," Bastila replied quietly. "With the Force by our side, we may only have to reach one computer to achieve our goal."

"And you think it'll be unguarded?" Carth muttered under his breath.

I trudged behind them reluctantly as we made our way through the Upper City, and found myself walking beside the new droid. Despite it's rather... unethical list of capabilities, the little astromech appeared an innocuous sort. Teethree was a better name, I thought, than that mouthful of a model number Bastila insisted on using.

"Hi there, Teethree," I murmured. I'd always liked the utility droids back on Deralia.

"Beep! Beep-bop whoop," T3-M4 whistled at me. Aww, I wish I could understand the little fellow.

We lapsed into watchful silence as we crossed through the commercial sector. The place didn't seem so scary, now. Peaceful Tarisians strolled along the gleaming courtyards, as a weak sun beat down on our heads. It was hard to believe how different this world was, just metres below our feet.

I noticed one small squad of patrolling Sith guards, bedecked in anonymous black armour as they marched along the fringes of the thinning residents. I kept my gaze down after that.

"There it is," Carth broke the silence some time later, his steps slowing. Up ahead, in a relatively deserted cul-de-sac, loomed the entrance to a large complex bordered by obsidian pillars. "The Sith base. Used to be some noble's home before the Sith repurposed it." He let out a disgruntled sort of noise. "Are you sure about this, Bastila? The whole plan seems... riskier than I would like."

Bastila halted next to him, frowning into the distance. "It is the only way, Carth. And, in truth, I feel a sense of certainty about this. Sometimes, a trained Jedi can sense possibilities upon the Force. Have faith. It will work out."

"Jedi feelings," Carth muttered. I had the distinct impression he didn't think much of her answer, but maybe the captain didn't understand just how powerful a Jedi could be. "We call that gut instinct, Bastila. Half the time it's nothing more than adrenaline spurring you on."

I closed my eyes. I want to go home. The spare blaster dug into my hip. I can't use a weapon! My breath was shaky. A foreign feeling of irritated fury swelled inside me, and that sneering voice snarled once more. This is bantha crap. I'm going to disembowel someone... anyone!

"Jen!" Bastila snapped suddenly. I jerked my eyes opened, startled. She had a fierce expression that dissolved once my gaze met hers. She walked closer, placing a gentle hand on my arm. "Relax," she said softly. "Trust in me, trust in the Force."

I nodded slowly, and the dark thoughts disappeared. I glanced sideways to see a frown of suspicion etched into the countenance of the Republic captain. His gaze was darting between the both of us.

"I shall proceed to have a polite conversation with the Sith guard," Bastila said smoothly. Further afield, I could see the lone figure Bastila referred to, standing at attention near the base's entrance. My stomach clenched. "As soon as he permits me inside, follow. And please, act nonchalant. There is little foot-traffic here, but we cannot be too careful."

Bastila breathed in, surveying the area. The bustling courtyard behind us had a steady stream of sentients, but the cul-de-sac was quiet. Which made sense, as who would want to attract the notice of the Sith?

With a nod to us both, Bastila motioned for the astromech to follow her, and began striding confidently towards the guard. The little droid whistled once, and then followed her obediently.

Carth took a step to my side. I glanced at him sideways; a lock of hair had fallen into his eyes, which were dark with confusion.

"Okay, want to tell me what's going on?" he said in a low tone.

"N-nothing," I muttered, my shoulders hunching.

"Nothing?" he countered sharply. "Jenâ€¦ are you alright? You- you're acting like a different person."

I blinked, staring at him. His frown was slowly transforming into a scowl.

"S-shouldn't we, uh, be keeping an eye on Jedi Sh- I mean, Bastila?" I stuttered, looking back to Bastila. She'd reached the guard, now, and was deep in conversation.

"Jedi Shan?" Carth echoed in disbelief. "What are you playing at, Jen? Are you trying to toy with Bastila? Or is it me?"

My eyes flew to his; his brows had lowered, and he was glaring furiously at me. "No!" I said in horror. "I'm not playing at anything! I don't understand what you mean!"

A stony shutter fell over his face, and he stared at me coldly. "Fine. Have it your way." Carth turned to face the Sith base entrance once more, folding his arms. My face heated with humiliation, and I felt slightly nauseous. I don't understand, what have I done to offend him?

I don't give a ronto's arse. A dark sneer.

This is frelling ridiculous. An annoyed retort.

No, I am Jen Sahara! A desperate plea.

Jen! Stop it! Focus! Again, I seemed to be hearing Bastila. I gulped, and stared down at the ground. It was made of a sort of poraclay, up here on Upper Taris. Parts of it sparkled in the sunlight. Back in the commune, only our best dinnerware had been made of poraclay.

I must trust Bastila, I reminded myself. These voices are not real. They are merely some sort of residual trauma from the head injury. Later, I would go back to the medical facility. Doctor Forn would know how to help me.
"She's in," Carth whispered. He began to stride towards the Sith base as I glanced around nervously. I saw a handful of citizens walking away from us, back towards the bustling courtyard, but there was no foot traffic in between us and the ominous building. The Sith guard had escorted Bastila inside, and Carth was halfway there already. I blinked, and raced after him.

We slipped into the double doors that heralded the entrance of the base, entering a large foyer. It appeared to be a reception area of some description. The same black obsidian pillars as outside also adorned the corners of this room, with a silver filigree pattern inlaid upon them. The ceiling itself was incredibly high, perhaps even the full height of the building. This place would be terribly expensive to heat in winter, I thought inanely.

Two auto-hatches exited the foyer on both sides. A green-skinned Twi'leki stood behind a large desk made out of the same black stone as the pillars. Her face was heavily plastered in cosmetics, and she was flanked by two Sith guards in the same full-body armour as the outside sentry.

That one was still chaperoning Bastila, as they approached the receptionist together.

The Twi'lek turned heavily outlined eyes on Bastila, pursing her bright red lips in annoyance. Her lekku were freshly waxed, and shone beneath the artificial lighting of the place. I noticed with trepidation that the two Sith guards had straightened to wary attention.

"What?" the Twi'lek drawled. She sounded utterly bored.

"I am here to see the governor," Bastila said firmly. "He is expecting me."

"Where is your identification?" one of the guards snapped out.

Bastila's head turned to appraise the Sith guards. "You are not needed here. Your superior wishes to see you now." Her words were weighty and strangely compelling, and one of her hands twitched slightly at her side. It seemed a benign and almost abstract gesture, and yet I somehow knew I was seeing Bastila Shan's mystical power at work.

I felt a sense of awe awake within me.

"Uh, I think the captain wants to see us," the guard on the left said mechanically.

"Yes, he requests to see all three of you now," Bastila intoned again, turning to eye over the sentry who had ushered her in.

"We had better see him," the second guard echoed.

"Uh, yes," the sentry stuttered. I stared in stunned astonishment as all three guards turned, and left through one of the doors. Wow! That is amazing!

The receptionist, however, was frowning in confusion. "Just who are you?" she demanded, tapping a lacquered fingernail impatiently next to an inlaid console on the desk.

"You need to go powder your nose," Bastila snapped.

The Twi'lek blinked dazedly, stepping backwards. "I'll be right back," she muttered, and fled out the other door.

Carth snickered. "Nice one. A little disconcerting how easy that is for you, though."

That was so powerful! No wonder people admired the Jedi so. No wonder Bastila knew she could
I had never met a Jedi, before my contract onboard the Endar Spire, but I'd read my share of transcripts and accountings of their fantastical deeds.

"It was not easy." Bastila sounded weary. "Nor does it always work. T3-M4, see if you can slice into the main system from here." Her gaze had moved to the exits. Carth had already unclipped his blasters in readiness as Bastila continued snapping out commands. "Search for the latest launch codes, and retrieve them."

The droid whistled in acknowledgement, and wheeled over to the reception terminal. A small probe extended from the astromech's chassis, before inserting into the bypass slot of the console.

"Jen, guard the other door," Carth hissed, and his voice sounded angry. I whirled around to see him leaning to the side of an exit, his dual blasters held firmly upright.

I'm no guard! With difficulty, I swallowed my fear and rushed to the other exit, fumbling to unclip the foreign weapon. I could only hope, desperately, that no one would enter.

"Bastila, this place will have surveillance," Carth clipped out. "If you don't want the Sith to know we're here, get Teethree to disable that first. Here's hoping no one's watching right now."

Bastila nodded. "Good thinking," she murmured, leaning down to relay the orders to Teethree.

I stood nervously by the hatch as the minutes ticked by. Silence lay thick like mola-syrup on the air, broken only by the clicks and whirrs of Teethree. My palms were sticky with nervous sweat, and the blaster felt unwieldy in my grasp.

I gasped as I heard footsteps in the distance.

"Someone's approaching my door," Carth muttered. "How far is Teethree?"

The droid whistled something encouraging.

"He's decrypting the codes," Bastila murmured. "Almost there, but we need more time."

"Well, you don't have it," Carth said curtly. "Get the droid to disable the hatch, or we'll end up with a fight on our hands."

"T3-M4, can you disable the right access door into this foyer?" Bastila fired at the droid.

"Quickly?"

The droid beeped, whirred and then whistled. I heard a thunk from the wall behind Carth.

"The door's not opening, sergeant," someone snapped out from beyond the thick durasteel door.

"Damn. Why does everything break on this gods-cursed planet? These Tarisians can't do anything right. Davis, call maintenance," another voice commanded, and the sound of soldiers walking away met my ears with profound relief.

Carth grinned at Bastila; a hard, roguish sort of grin. "That'll buy us ten minutes while the tech finishes his caffa and donut."

"That was close," Bastila said softly. Her eyes looked tired. "T3-M4, download those codes and let us depart."

A minute later, and the droid whistled victoriously. A smug smile curved Bastila's face, dispersing the weariness, and she strode away from the desk. Her manner was confident and victorious.
"Mission accomplished." She smiled at Carth, and motioned us to join her. Part of me found it impossible to believe everything had fallen into place so easily - yet, that was the power of the Jedi, wasn't it? I'd certainly studied enough history to know just how amazing the Force could be.

"Let's get out of here," Carth muttered, striding along with Bastila to the exit. "Next up, we've got a blasted Mandalorian to meet."

xXx
The ale in here reminded me of my clan's homebrew stout: thick, hoppy, and with a kick like a rancor. Not that I allowed myself to be drawn into nostalgia; the past was better buried, just like my enemies. There was a time and a place for remembrance – be it honouring the battle songs of the fallen or reliving the glory of battles once fought – and here on Taris, doing small-time work for the likes of Davik Kang, was not it.

But the Tarisian ale wasn't bad, and it afforded me some amusement as I wiled the hours away. There were many here who could not handle liquor of this potency; in particular, the spacers and traders penned down on this planet by the Sith blockade. Between off-worlders getting themselves smashed on the local brew, and the gang altercations spilling into the cantina, I had enough to keep me entertained.

Which was a good thing, as I didn't like waiting. I'd always been a Mando'ade of action, and if I had to have downtime, I preferred it to be between the sheets with a willing partner. Not waiting to see if some crazy bint pulled off a plan risky enough that even I hadn't been sure would work.

Still, she was fast, skilled, and got results. I'd gambled on less and, frankly, it was time to leave this planet. I didn't trust the Sith not to retaliate with excess – not when it was the Republic's Jedi princess on the loose. Malak had already shown he was more than ready to inflict massive civilian casualties in a fit of temper.

And let's be honest, Ordo. Even if Davik was paying you fair, you're itching to move on. It was true, I was feeling restless. Like many other Mando'ade, I'd been directionless since Malachor, and turned to mercenary work. It was… not entirely satisfying. A far cry from the days of glory I'd once been so proud of.

I snorted, dismissing the depressing thoughts, and took another swig of the ale. My thoughts turned back to Jen Sahara and her crew. I'd considered turning Bastila Shan in, I'd considered it hard. She was worth a shiny fistful of credits, and I didn't owe any loyalty to the Republic – or the Sith, for that matter. And the other one, the soldier… well, the moment I'd seen his mug I'd picked it as a Republic survivor from the same crash as Shan. It hadn't taken me long to peruse the newsfeeds and recognize him. Captain Carth Onasi, Republic warhero and top-notch fighter pilot. Also worth a fair amount to the Sith.

Which left Jen Sahara. I hadn't found anything on her. Given her proximity to Onasi and involvement in rescuing Shan, she was obviously Republic too. I could have turned them in, gathered a small fortune, and disappeared to another planet. But there was something about Jen Sahara that intrigued me, and I found myself wanting to follow her lead. Credits weren't everything. I had a gut feeling that life around her would get interesting and, that was just the sort of shake-up I was looking for.

"Uh, Canderous, sir?" a soft voice asked. I looked up to see a Twi'lek waitress, her outlined eyes blinking tremulously at me. "Would you like another drink?"
I gave her a brief nod, baring my teeth, and she scurried away. I couldn't help but chuckle to myself. This place is a cesspool of weaklings. Even the gangs didn't overly impress - half the members were no more than homeless runts banding together over their favourite swoop team.

Still, since the blow-out at the race, the streets of the Lower City had been busy. Gun-fights had always been a common sight on the main trunks, but altercations had moved into other pipelines once considered safe to travel. There'd been stories of newly-laid mines, triggered by unsuspecting sent, creating new sinkholes along the fringes of gang-held territory.

I'd heard the Vulkars were winning, and part of me longed to join in, to knock some Vulkar heads together. Brejik should have done better at teaching his troops who to shoot at. Rumour on the street was that the Vulkars, cocky with the scent of victory, had started firing on some of the neutral, smaller gangs.

If the other gangs collectively join the Beks, then the tide may yet turn. I pulled out a cherze cigarra, lighting it, and breathed the woody smoke in. The gang war was an amusing interlude. But, really, it was nothing more than fire-ants scrabbling in the dirt. A scrap over the dingy corridors of a corrupt, resource-less planet.

Such a step down from the battles I had once lived and breathed in.

My gaze caught on a Rodian entering the bar, and I recognized my contact, Jerrin. His round eyes darted about the room before landing on me. As he strode towards me, I stubbed my cigarra out and pulled two prepaid cred chits from my pocket. My other hand rested on a blaster concealed beneath the plasticeel table. Jerrin was a useful tool, but I'd be stupid to trust him.

"Jerrin." I indicated he should sit as he came to a stop in front of me. "Status?"

"I saw three Humans and a droid enter the Sith base about half an hour ago," he said, his words quick and furtive. "Two women, one man. I didn't get close enough to recognize any of them."

"Then what am I paying you for?" I snapped. Mir'osik.

"Hey, they would have seen me if I'd snuck up on them!" he protested.

My eyes flicked to the cantina's entrance, and at that moment I saw Onasi walk in, followed by the Jedi princess and Jen Sahara herself. Ah, the timing of the gods. I smiled humourlessly. Did they succeed? They wouldn't be stupid enough to meet me otherwise, I hope. I flicked Jerrin one of the chits under the table.

"Get lost."

He glanced down at the prepaid plasteel card. The chip on the front proclaimed how much currency was loaded. "Canderous, this isn't what you prom-"

"And you didn't deliver what you said, either. Be grateful I'm feeling generous. Now kriff off before I get angry."

The Rodian swallowed before leaving. I turned my gaze to appraise the oncoming group. Onasi was scowling. Heh, Republic doesn't like me. I'd skimmed a brief overview of his record from the 'Net. He'd served the whole way through the Wars; and like any other staid, sad Republic grunt, he probably still had a chip on his shoulder regarding my people. Somehow, I didn't think we'd be drinking together and swapping war stories anytime soon.

"Canderous," Shan said smoothly as she neared. She was a bit of a looker, really; creamy porcelain skin, shapely figure, fine arse. Shame about her snooty attitude.

"Enjoy your little jaunt in the Sith base?" I mocked, not bothering to hold back a smirk. There was a tightening around her dark eyes, but she otherwise remained composed. Lurking in her shadow stood Jen Sahara.

"We have what you asked for," Bastila replied neutrally.

At her words, a heady sense of satisfaction filled me. I am one step closer to blowing this planet.

Bastila folded her arms, staring at me with an impassive expression I reckoned was a lot shakier than she thought it was.

"So, what is the rest of your plan?" she asked. Onasi stood tensed by her side, one hand on a hip that undoubtedly concealed a blaster. He was about as covert as the princess was relaxed.

"Perhaps I should be talking to your leader," I interrupted, sliding my gaze to Jen. I heard Jen's breath hitch, and my eyes narrowed as I looked at her properly for the first time since she'd walked in.

Her shoulders were hunched, her face averted, and one hand clutched tight on Bastila Shan's arm. Haar'chak, what is this?

"Bastila is our leader," Jen mumbled. My brows lowered as she moved deeper into Bastila's shadow. Who is she trying to fool? Does she take me for a moron? I'd seen Jen in action at the swoop track. Mand'alor's balls, I'd fought beside her and been impressed. There was no way I was buying this pathetic act.

Bastila patted Jen comfortingly on the arm. But Shan sure seems to be swallowing it, doesn't she? I scowled. This was hardly the Jen I wanted to see. We ain't got time for mind games, or whatever the kriff Jen is playing at.

My gaze swung back to Shan. Her lips had tightened, curving down into a sour expression of unpleasantness as she stared back. I almost expected her to stick her fine-boned nose in the air. Suddenly, I thought I could understand why Jen had started screwing with her. Back to business, Ordo. I shrugged to myself. If Jen wants to play the idiot, it ain't your business. Yet.

"So," I started. "You have the launch codes. It won't be long before the Sith find out they've been compromised. I can get us close to the hangar, but not without some bloodshed. We should move out. Now."

Bastila nodded at me. "I... feel a sense of urgency to keep moving. You make sense. But we must pick up Mission and Zaalbar first."

My brows raised in surprise. The Bek brat and her walking carpet are coming as well? A Wookiee would certainly improve our odds. And Mission Vao... well, a warrior she wasn't. But I'd heard about the slicing skills of the Bek's favourite child. It could be that she'd come in useful. Interesting companions. They must be following Jen Sahara. Following her off their homeworld. Bet the Beks won't be too happy about that.

"Lead the way, princess."

Her mouth tightened in annoyance, but she said nothing. I noticed then that the astromech droid had followed them into the cantina. It had been a special commission for Davik, complete with the highest slicing upgrades he could source through the Sith blockade. He'd ordered me to pick it up, without divulging his motivations for acquiring such a specced droid – but I wasn't stupid. Davik wanted the same as me. Escape from Taris. I was not the only one who mistrusted the Sith when a famous Jedi was hiding in our vicinity.

It wasn't like Malak's forces would obliterate Taris. The Sith already held the planet, already reaped the benefits of controlling a hyperpoint along one of the more popular intergalactic trade routes into the Outer Rim. And although this planet had been mined and overused to resource depletion, it did have a large population - which could be a resource in itself.

No, I didn't think Malak wouldn't do another Telos. But he might bomb the planet enough to scare the general populace - enough to crank up the search for Bastila Shan several notches. Enough to turn every sent on this place so desperate that they would lynch any brown-haired, snooty-nosed female Human they came across.

The fall-out from the swoop race had already hit the local news, and images of Bastila Shan escaping a swoop gang would no doubt be making their way up the Sith hierarchy. The fact that a gang had held her captive without informing the Sith would be enough to stoke their lord's infamous temper.

I wasn't planning to be around to get caught up in the cross-fire.

_Hadn't exactly planned to be rescuing the Jedi princess either, but life can throw interesting curve-balls, and a true Mando'ade knows how to roll with it._ My eyes slid back to Jen Sahara, still cowering behind Shan. _And she, definitely, is an interesting curve-ball._ Finding out exactly what Jen Sahara's game was would be an amusing diversion – so long as she didn't let it affect her capabilities.

We walked out of the smoky cantina in relative silence, and I held my repeating blaster ready. It was heavily modified; my preferred weapon of choice. I had three smaller handhelds concealed on my body, but the rest of my spare guns were back in my quarters. _No matter. It's time to leave. Anything there can be replaced._ Clan and honour were what was important, not material belongings.

Not that I had either, on Taris.

I chose a quick route to the Upper City, and as we walked I decided it was time to set things straight with Jen Sahara.

"I don't know what you're playing at, but I expect to see your true form in the oncoming battle," I spoke quietly at Jen's side as I walked up to her. She jumped backwards, her eyes round and fearful.

"Leave her alone," Bastila cut in. "We will be fine in any confrontations that may chance our way."

_Haar'chak, but she can certainly hear well._ I allowed my eyes to travel slowly over Bastila's form; the woman's face flushed with outrage and her eyes glittered. I noticed with some interest that a double-bladed vibrosword was strapped to her back.

"Nice choice of weapons, princess," I drawled. "I thought you Jedi only used lightsabers?"

"We use whatever suits the occasion, mercenary," she said, her voice tight, and she strode ahead of me as if to end the conversation.

Onasi, on her other side, turned to shoot her a questioning look. "Where is your lightsaber anyway, Bastila?"
Her shoulders stiffened in discomfort. "My lightsaber was... misplaced. I couldn't find it after the crash."

I guffawed at the same time as Onasi.

"Wait a minute, let me get this straight," Onasi spluttered, ending on a chuckle. "You lost your lightsaber? I mean, isn't that a violation of some kind of Jedi code or something?"

Shan stopped walking, and whirled around to face us. She put her hands on her hips, and affronted anger burned her normally pale face bright pink. "This is no laughing matter! During the crash my lightsaber must have... it must have fallen from my belt and rolled under my seat!"

I laughed loudly. Sure, I'd lost my share of weapons along the way, but that was why I always carried a handful. And didn't stay attached to just one – no matter if was a brightly coloured laser sword.

Onasi raised a placating hand, attempting belated damage control. "Hey, hey, hey, don't get mad. I'm sorry. It's just funny to think of a legendary Jedi losing her lightsaber. Take my advice: this is one detail you might want to keep quiet."

Shan gave him a quelling glare. "I hardly consider myself a legend, Carth." Her lips pursed. "Let us keep moving. This conversation is hardly beneficial in any respect."

I snickered, but began to walk once more. And as we turned into the last corridors of the Lower City, a small mob of eight gang members met my eyes. I stiffened as I recognized the aggressive stance and slashed armour of the leader. Brejik. And some of his little friends. It's time for some payback.

The Vulkars all turned to face us, clad in red-and-black armour and with weapons held ready. Onasi cursed, and I heard the sound of Bastila unsheathing her vibrosword.

"Well, well, well," Brejik called out over the distance that separated us. "What do we have here, hmm? My runaway slave, the swoop rescuer extraordinaire, and Canderous Ordo himself. You should have known better than to mess with me, mercenary," he sneered.

"What am I, chopped bantha spleen?" Onasi muttered.

I snorted. "You don't know how to keep your boys in line, Brejik. You turned me into your enemy by firing on me at the race. Hope you enjoy the outcome."

"You don't frighten me. Davik doesn't rule these streets, and word has it that he was less than impressed by your antics at the swoop track." Brejik laughed in mockery. "Poor little Canderous. You didn't realize that Davik doesn't wish the Vulkars for enemies, did you?"

My eyes narrowed. He thinks he can taunt me and get away with it? In a flash, I jerked my gun upwards and opened fire at him. This will be a worthy fight.

Brezik yelped; the cocky di'kut had expected me to stand there and monologue with him until he'd decided to open the fight. He jumped sideways, the blue-white of an energy shield sizzling as he activated it- but I'd pinged him dead centre. Sure, his armour would've absorbed some, but it'd been a hit.

My hand mashed against the power switch of my own shield, while the Vulkars roared and returned fire.
I ran forwards, hooking the blaster onto my belt while unsheathing an Echani foil I’d picked up from an earlier fight. A grenade flew over my head towards the others, and the bright flash of it hit the periphery of my vision. I heard a startled scream from behind.

Four of the men ran up to meet me; I smashed an elbow into the first, following it with a thrust of the blade into his guts. The thud of a stun stick crashing against my armour backplate forced me back a step; I side-stepped and turned; the foil in my hand coming around in a lunge.

But the man crumpled in front of me before I struck; smoke wafting from his head. A quick glance behind him showed Onasi in the distance, taking potshots at the Vulkars.

The discharge of another grenade, this one close, had me stumbling into a foe. We grappled with each other as we lost our footing and fell to the ground, rolling. A sharp pain stabbed into my side; the bastard had managed to wedge some sort of shiv-blade in between the joints of my armour. I rolled over, teeth gritting, and slammed an armoured fist underneath the jaw brace of his helm.

A second punch, and a third, all rocking his head backwards, as the bastard choked and his arms fell uselessly to the ground. The dagger he’d stuck me on was slipped between my ribs and hurt like a schutta. I lunged sideways for the Echani foil; it'd slipped from my grasp as we'd fallen, and now I grabbed it to stab the Vulkar in the throat and end him for good.

I looked up; another Vulkar stood over me, blaster pointed at my head and a victorious sneer on her un-helmed face.

A split-second’s thought, a moment of acceptance: There is no better way to die than in battle.

My vision blurred as a blade slammed hard on the gang member's hand; causing her to yelp and fire uselessly at the ground. It was Bastila, the double-bladed vibro spinning fast and sure in her grasp. Behind her, two other Vulkars were closing in with blades.

As I wrestled to my feet, I felt the impact of blaster bolts against my waning shield. There was a grunt from Onasi, followed by a thud; I looked over to see both him and Jen had fallen. Haar'chak, how’d she get beaten so fast? I'd already picked her as slightly crazy, but this must have been bad luck. I didn't believe she'd go so far as to act like a weakling in battle just to keep up whatever her game was.

The adrenaline pumped through my system, a welcome burn against the sharp pain in my chest. I heard the fizz as my energy shield winked out; I grasped the bladed weapon tight, and charged towards Brejik.

Brejik ducked behind the one gang member remaining next to him, firing over his shoulder. My chest tightened and burned as the armour took the brunt of the blaster bolt; I pushed on through the pain as blood thundered in my head. The other Vulkar stumbled back as my blade rammed through his abdomen.

He gurgled as he collapsed, and I swung to face Brejik, who'd already moved back several metres. Another bolt from him struck me dead centre, and I felt the heat sear and melt through a newly created gap in my armour.

Bastila screamed behind me. There was a thudding noise of her body thumping to the ground.

My breath was coming in short, sharp bursts; my side was bleeding out and another hit of laser fire might be enough to down me.

"Here it ends, Canderous," Brejik mocked, and I heard one set of footsteps behind me. The victor of Bastila's battle, no doubt. "A shame you picked the losing side."

I lurched desperately to the side, ditching the blade as I rolled, one hand scrabbling for another blaster. I fired blindly, feeling a hit to the legs, and another to the chest that seared through to skin and muscle. The red-mist descended in a cloud of rage and agony as my grip was hot on the trigger and all I could hear was the echo of a dozen blasters all firing-

Somehow I'd ended in a crouch, shaking wildly, gun aimed at Brejik who was-

- turning and running as a shower of blaster bolts fired back at him.

Beks behind me, I realized, stunned and dazed, as my vision darkened and my muscles turned to water. What timing. I got another shot off just as Brejik ran out of sight, but I had no idea if it hit him or not.

The ground rushed up to meet me.

xXx

Frigid numbness and raging hot pinpricks jerked me back to consciousness. I yelled in protest and opened my eyes, shivering and sweating with the contrasting physical discomfort.

Bastila Shan was leaning over me, her face a composed mask. "Relax. It is the Force flowing through you, healing your injuries."

I grunted, struggling to lurch myself into a seated position. My vision speckled and blurred as dizziness briefly reigned.

"Lie down for a minute," Shan advised. "The Force may be quick, but it is not miraculous."

My chest felt tight, but it lacked the agony of melted flesh that came with blaster burns. The armour had held up – barely – and we still had to charge through Davik's estate. The wound in my side dulled to a distant throb; either due to Shan's healing prowess or luck. Regardless, it wasn't debilitating.

I ignored the residual discomfort and dragged myself to my feet, only feeling slightly unsteady.

"Relax, princess," I said, flexing my shoulders. "I'm fine. What happened?"

Bastila stared at me under lowered brows, as if she wanted to argue the point but thought better of it. She sighed. "The Beks finished the fight and chased after Brejik. Fortunately for us all, one of them paused to revive me with a stimulant and a shot of kolto. I, in turn, have been able to assist the rest of you."

I raised an eyebrow at her. "Yes, I'm sure we couldn't live without your amazing Force powers," I drawled. "How did I survive for so long without you?"

The anger that crackled in her dark eyes made me laugh.

"You- !" she cut herself off abruptly, her nostrils flaring as she breathed in deep. I smirked, and turned around to see Onasi and Jen leaning against the grimy walls of the Lower City. The astromech droid was by Jen's feet, looking relatively undamaged. Someone's gotta put a weapon on that mobile trashcan. It could at least serve some purpose in a fight.

"They were both knocked out by grenades," Shan said quietly, following my gaze. Her temper was amusing, but her swiftness at controlling it was even more impressive. I was beginning to enjoy taunting the stuck-up Jedi. "Between the kolto the Bek left behind, and my Force abilities, I believe we are able to move on now." Shan's gaze lingered on my torso, and I glanced down to see streaks of blood drying on the outside of my battered armour suit. "At least take some kolto if you refuse any further of my assistance, Canderous. We still have a battle ahead at Davik's."

I snorted. "I'll relax when I'm off this chivhole of a planet. In the meantime, stims can keep me going."

"As you wish," she said in a taut voice, and then motioned to the others. "We should move on now."

Onasi nodded in response, but Jen just looked petrified. I narrowed my eyes, throwing her a mock glare until she glanced down in nervousness. I couldn't hold back an entertained chuckle.

"Don't be so childish," Shan snapped, catching my amusement. I shot her a derisive look in return. _Hah. She's the one who believes Jen's little act._

We headed back to the apartment building in the alien district. My muscles were beginning to tighten and ache uncomfortably; I grimaced and searched my pockets for a stamina stim as we trudged along. From the stiff, abrupt way Onasi was walking, I could tell he too was feeling the after-effects of our clash with the Vulkars. _My only regret is that Brejik escaped._ I wondered what the chances were of those Bek having caught up to the coward. If I wasn't on my way off Taris, my next goal would've been to hunt down Brejik personally.

Mission Vao and her Wookiee were yapping inside the apartment as we entered. The girl stared at me in awed surprise as I bared my teeth at her. It was her shag pile guard I kept note of, though. I'd heard stories about Vulkars stupid enough to threaten Mission Vao, and they always ended up regretting it.

At any rate, I had no problem with the kid, provided she kept her trap shut.

"Pack up," Shan commanded. "We are heading out."

"Cool!" the Twi'lek enthused, jumping to her feet. The Wookiee growled something, and the girl grinned at him before her gaze returned to rove over the rest of us. "Say, what happened to you guys? Sith base didn't go as planned?"

"We, uh, ran into a little trouble afterwards," Onasi said.

I snorted. "Vulkars who didn't like the look of us."

The kid cocked her head in curiosity, opening her mouth to question, but Shan shushed her. "We need to leave now," the Jedi said in a low, terse voice.

"Okay, sheesh, keep your clothes on," Mission muttered, throwing her a glare. The Wookiee howled as he began to strap blades onto his back; I eyed over the pile of random weapons on the apartment floor with mild admiration.

Onasi was crouching, filling up a pack with grenades, while Shan looked to be gathering a box of med supplies together. Jen Sahara, in contrast, stood awkwardly in front of the apartment's closed door, a vibrosword clutched inexpertly in one hand. I shot her another glare, just to see if it would disconcert her. She twitched, taking a step back, and I chuckled to myself. I was beginning to enjoy this game of hers, and I wondered if she was laughing on the inside as well.
Some minutes of silent and swift packing later, and I led our motley crew back out onto the Tarisian courtyards. The sunlight gleamed on the courtyards filled with soft Humans, all milling around with no apparent understanding of the dangers that a Sith fleet in orbit entailed. The Tarisians gave us a wide berth in general, the odd one pausing to glare or mutter at the Wookiee. In general, any sent on these platforms that wasn't Human was either mocked or mistreated.

The xenophobia was a damn stupid way to treat sentients, but from what I knew of Taris, it was an attitude that had prevailed for generations.

As we walked towards the more lavish side of the Upper City, personal guards replaced the Sith lining the street. Davik, along with the other rich businessmen of Taris, had paid the Sith an awful lot of creds for relative peace. The upper crust had bought the illusion of freedom, and most of them were stupid enough to believe in it.

Mission Vao skipped along next to us, but her eyes were on Bastila Shan. Curiosity was plainly evident on the Twi'lek kid's face.

"Hey, Bastila. You ever just use the Force for fun?" She tilted her head, an impish grin on her face. At once, I had a brief mental picture of Mission Vao, dressed in the dull clothing of the Jedi, clutching a lightsaber and wielding the Force. I snickered. I'd give a whole lot of creds to watch a stand off between the Bek brat and the princess. Imagine that. Was it exposure to the Force that turned Jedi into such boring uptight farts, or did the power only come to those with no personality? Not entirely true, Ordo. There'd been a handful of Jedi worthy of respect, once upon a time. One in particular. My eyes slid to the Jedi princess. Having met her, and gained a sense of both her youth and social awkwardness, I had no kripping idea how Bastila Shan had been the final end to a Jedi like Revan.

"Fun?" Shan sounded confused, almost affronted. Her brow creased in puzzlement as she stared at the Twi'lek, as if she were trying to understand her. The princess ain't used to dealing with people, that's for sure.

"You know, a little jolt of the Force to trip some jerk who's ticking you off?" Mission beamed. Her brown eyes were bright with enthusiasm. "All these stories 'bout the power you Jedi have... I never really believed it, y'know? But if you can do all that stuff, then surely you've wanted to get a few people back- like, nerf-herders who really deserve it."

Bastila Shan took in a deep breath, straightening her spine to look down at Mission Vao. Her expression closed in on itself, tightening in disapproval. Her lips thinned. "No. Certainly not. The Force is not a trivial plaything, Mission. One must always remain above such petty revenge."

I snorted. Uptight little princess. I bet your back is all knotted up with snooty kinks and you don't even realize it.

"Aw, come on," Mission wheedled, her lekku wrapping around her neck. "There's gotta be times when you've thought about it. Don't be so stuck up - you can tell me!"

I heard Onasi stifle a laugh. I didn't bother hiding mine.

"I am not stuck up," Shan stated in a forced, neutral tone. "I merely have the years of training to give me the wisdom and understanding to see how childish such an act would be."

"Childish?" Mission's voice rose in sharp indignation. "Is that a crack about my age? I'm not the one who got captured by a swoop gang, and I've been living here my whole life! Sheesh, just because you're a famous Jedi doesn't mean you have to be such a prissy know-it-all!"
Mission stumbled then, as if tripping into something invisible, and fell forward towards the ferracrete ground. Hands outstretched, the Twi'lek only just managed to brace herself with a squeak, taking the fall on her palms.

I looked over to Shan in surprise; the Human's face was flushed pink with irritation, her eyes dark with anger. Years of training ain't enough to control her temper it seems, I realized with amusement. Maybe the upright Bastila Shan wouldn't be quite so boring as I first thought.

Mission Vao was scrambling to her feet, her face purple with embarrassment. "Hey, that wasn't funny!" she squawked.

I was watching Shan, and saw the regret as it passed through her face. She'd take it back, if she could. She actually wants to be an ice queen, with no emotion or life in her. "I have no idea what you are talking about, Mission," she forced out through bloodless lips. Her tone turned neutral once more. "Come now, we have to get going."

Mission let out a high-pitched squeak of frustration, and actually started to leap towards Shan in retaliation, but the Wookiee grabbed her arm and hauled her back.

"Zaalbar!" Mission screeched. He howled something incomprehensible at the Twi'lek, and she shook her head furiously, still glaring at Bastila Shan.

I strode next to Shan; her gaze was fixed firmly ahead and the corners of her mouth had turned down. "How very Jedi-like of you, princess," I drawled. I saw her colour rise, and something akin to shame burn in her dark eyes. The haar'chak Jedi have it all backwards. To be ashamed of emotion is to be devoid of living. And then there were the Sith, who gloried in death and destruction and sadism. They got the job done, but they all seemed to wander down the path of true depravity.

Maybe it is just the Force then. It either snuffs the life out of you, or turns you into something rabid.

The Wookiee was still something softly at Mission Vao, and I idly wondered if the Twi'lek kid would think of a way to thwart Shan, or even get her own back. I could guess how annoying Mission Vao could be, if she put her street-smart mind to work, but I was willing to bet a hundred creds that Bastila Shan would underestimate her. My gaze, however, caught on the estate looming in the distance, and I shrugged off the idle thoughts.

It was time to issue some orders. I halted, turned around, and eyed the group dispassionately. While there were many sentients nearby, none were in obvious earshot. I kept my voice low regardless.

"Alright, troops." I didn't bother concealing my sneer. I'd had half-dead Mando'ade under my command more worthy than this lot. "Here's how the plan goes. Ladies, disarm and throw the lads your weapons. You three are going to act all scared and meek. Jen, it shouldn't be a problem for you." I tossed her a knowing grin, and she flinched rather realistically. "Republic, chuck that upright carpet one of your blasters. You two are gonna be guarding the three brand new slave girls."

Shan gasped in outrage. I raised an eyebrow, impatient and annoyed. "What? You think we can just waltz in, looking like an armoured gang ready for fighting? This cover story will get us into the base, provided you guys are convincing. That includes you, princess."

Shan had turned a mottled red once more. "If this is some sort of trap, mercenary."
"No trap, princess. I ain't collaring you, am I?" I met her eyes steadily, and I could see that she wanted to object.

Onasi opened his mouth to say something, but apparently thought better of it and threw Zaalbar a spare blaster. The Wookiee howled in obvious objection.

"It's not like we're going to tie the girls up!" I snapped, before muttering, "although that would be more convincing."

There was an immediate roar from the Wookiee, and Shan looked about ready to explode.

I laughed. "It won't be necessary, provided you play your part. Republic and Carpet, stand behind the girls with your blasters raised. Mission and Princess, act demure and frightened, for the love of Mand'alor!"

Mission Vao grinned impishly at me, winked, and then looked down with a forced expression of fear. Davik liked his Twi'lek slaves, and Mission's youth would make it an easy sell. Jen was older than Davik cared for, but her acting skills would be enough to hide that - at least until we got in.

Shan was gonna be the problem. She had the looks for a joygirl, but if she wasn't gonna play along then we were kriffed before we'd even started.

She sighed, an angry hissing noise, before breathing in deep and dropping her eyes to the ground.

I nodded in satisfaction.

"Let's move out," I ordered, and began to lead onwards. It wasn't long until we reached the ornate gates that bordered Davik's mansion. I nodded companionably to the guard.

"Back with some fresh slave girls Davik ordered," I said flatly.

The armoured Duros stared at me suspiciously through dull red eyes. "Order? I haven't heard nothin' 'bout any new girls."

"Oh? Privy to Davik's plans, are you?" I griped, turning to glare at him full on. He quailed.

"Uh, sorry Canderous, go right in." He activated the access console, and the large gates swung inwards. I walked onwards, underneath the line of visible laser turrets that pointed ominously at the building's entrance.

Another guard met us at the door and waved us in without any interference. I could feel my eyes narrow, my concentration focus, and my muscles tense in readiness as we walked into Davik's stronghold. The buzz of anticipation and adrenaline were beginning to hit; the markers of entering danger I was long familiar with.

The objectives may differ, but the challenges remained the same. Me and my allies against the galaxy.

Alright, Ordo. Let's do this.

xXx
Hyperspace: II [Zaalbar, Malak Devari, Mission Vao, Davik Kang, Jen Sahara, Carth Onasi, Canderous Ordo, Zelka Forn, Bastila Shan, Calo Nord]

Zaalbar:

The opulent estate rose up to encase me with strange marbled walls as I trailed at the rear of the pack.

With a blaster pointed fallaciously at Mission's back, my eyes should have been fixed on my young charge, trudging so submissively into the enemy's den like she truly was the captive she pretended to be.

That was not the case, though. I found myself unable to stop my gaze from darting down each exit we passed, as my shoulders tensed and my instincts told me this entire operation would soon crumble like tree-rot.

This plan is too risky.

That Mandalorian might be careless with his own life, but I did not understand why Mission and Jen Sahara had to be pulled into this hazardous escapade. Particularly the Human, considering the odd way she was behaving. Mission was worried about her; the way my young friend's lekku twitched whenever she glanced Jen Sahara's way made that plainly obvious.

The woman I owed my life to was quiet, confused, and scared. I could see the tremulous emotions in her cowed stance, and could track the fear in her scent. Something had happened to her – and while I might appreciate the thought of Jen Sahara curbing her own recklessness, I was also concerned that, in her current state, she might be more vulnerable in a fight than ever before.

I will guard her back, or die in the attempt. Hers, and Mission's both.

The gleaming ostentatiousness of the dwelling set my teeth on edge. Garish holo-pictures dotted the walls, and each corner was decorated with a purple urn containing a plasteel pretension of a plant. This veneer of synthetic prettiness was worse than the grime and poverty of the Lower City, and a pang of longing for my homeworld burned deep in my soul.

To be in a forest somewhere. To be amongst the wroshyr trees. Even after all these years, Taris had never felt like home. Too many strange aliens, all packed together like a teeming nest of fire ants lacking any sort of hive mind. It had been an accident, landing here; I'd been a young cub running from the past, and Taris had been a stop along the way to somewhere else. But traders on the freighter I had boarded betrayed me for the empty allure of alien credit chits. I did not understand, then, how many soulless sentients were out there; how some beings could look at a Wookiee and see no more than a prime specimen to be sold like a shank of meat.

A moment of inattention from an overweight slaver had led to my escape, and so I fled: half-enraged and half-petrified, ignorant of where I was or the dangers I was running into. Had it not been for Mission chancing upon me, I was not sure how long I would have lasted amongst the gangs and the Exchange and the corrupt way of life in the tunnels of Taris.

It was strange to think that we might soon be leaving. Assuming, of course, that this foolhardy plan came to fruition. We had thrown our lot in with off-world strangers – and while my life-debt shackled me to Jen's side, Mission was another story.

What sort of existence does the daughter of my heart have here, on this corrupt planet? I did not wish to think of her, growing up amongst the moral ambiguity of a swoop gang who were willing to sell spice for profit and loot foodstuffs from other gangs who were just as needy. Survival, they called it, but some days all I could see was dishonour in their actions. And while the Hidden Beks may have granted Mission the protection of a den, they had certainly been lacklustre in keeping her away danger, despite Zaerdra Leno's best efforts.

No – a better future awaited Mission Vao in the stars, and so I could see no solid reason to keep her from following me.

I huffed in irritation at my wandering thoughts, and tightened my grip on Carth Onasi’s blaster. A bow-caster it was not, but between this cheap gun, the vibroswords strapped on my back, and the strength of my own paws, I would be strong enough to face whatever awaited us.

The cloying scent of artificial perfume hung thick on the air, and up ahead the Mandalorian halted, before turning around to grace the lot of us with a leering grin. I did not trust this Human. He was dangerous, and worked for the Exchange – an organization both unscrupulous and offensive. While Canderous Ordo might now be rescinding his loyalty, it did not mean his values had increased in worthiness. I planned to keep my eye on him, for both Mission and Jen Sahara's safety.

"Welcome to the slave quarters, kids," Canderous drawled.

Bastila Shan's face was composed, but her posture belied her annoyance. I wondered if there was a trace of fear, also; I could not forget that the Jedi was young, and had suffered trials of her own. It was a shame that Mission seemed to have taken a dislike to the Jedi, for I could not help but feel sympathetic.

"Why are we stopping here, Canderous?" Bastila asked in a level voice.

"Good a place as any to talk before we hit trouble. Now, listen up. The hangar is located in the north-west side of this estate—"

Jen shrank back against me. Once more, she was behaving like a completely different sentient to the brash Human who had rescued me. Her shift in conduct was strange... beyond strange. Did Jen Sahara knock her head again? She suffered a grievous injury shortly before I first met her – perhaps her odd behaviour is connected?

I would ask Mission to speak with Jen later, I decided. I did not pretend to understand Humans, but I did know they were similar to Twi'leks in that they liked to talk a lot – and Mission was certainly good at that.

"-we're gonna get questions sooner or later," Canderous was saying. "And we have to break through Davik's security on the Ebon Hawk. This rust bucket better pull its weight there."

Canderous aimed a kick at the droid, who beeped in indignation while backing away.

"Hey!" Mission complained, her protest drowning out the Mandalorian's derisive chuckle. "Leave Teethree alone!"

The pad of footsteps ahead had us all wilting into silence. I looked afield, to see a heavily armoured Zabrak walking cautiously toward us. The stranger's helm was raised, and as he neared the heavy brow ridges on his alien face lowered.
"Uh, Canderous?" the Zabrak said. His gaze darted over the group. "Who's all this with you?"

"Just showing some slave girls their new quarters," Canderous replied with a shrug.

The Zabrak's frown deepened, as his shifty eyes settled over Carth Onasi and myself. "I thought you worked alone?"

"Not always, di'kut. Not when the situation calls for extra muscle," Canderous sneered. "Look, I need to find the boss. Seen him around?"

"Davik's in his quarters, last I looked," the other man said slowly. He was still eyeing me over, and I felt myself tense in readiness as the man's hand rested near a blaster strapped to his hip.

"Good." Canderous threw the man an abrupt nod of acknowledgment. "I'm headed that way, then. Come on, boys, let's move out."

The Zabrak stepped back to let us pass, and his gaze moved to fix on the Mandalorian's retreating back. His brow ridges were still tightly creased in what I thought might be suspicion.

This ploy will not work for long.

I did not like leaving a potential enemy at my back, yet I had no choice but to follow Canderous Ordo's lead. I huffed, and was glad when we turned a few corners, leaving the Zabrak behind.

The group settled into silence as we trudged deeper into the lavish estate. I heard the raucous sound of cheering well before the hallway turned and opened into a large room - a sprawling chamber that was thick with the scent of Tarisian ale and the sound of jeering catcalls.

A brawl, I thought at first, taking note of two Humans wrestling in the centre of the room. But the onlookers – ten sentients, most seated in plimfoam benches circling the spectacle – were making no moves to join in the fight nor stop it, and it was then I realized this must be some sort of organized event.

The two scantily clad Twi'leki cubs who slipped between the cluster of aliens offering trays of drinks seemed to suggest the same.

Mission sniffed in disgust.

I held back the growl that wanted to escape my throat. It was possible the Twi'leki younglings were here of their own free will, on a paid job – but I knew a little of this world, now, and I doubted that. I had been sold like a crate of goods in front of a crowd, and no one had blinked. It was a loathsome practice abundant on Taris – the worst symptom of the corruption that twisted this planet's soul.

In my heart, there was nothing more abominable than slavery.

"Daelin," Canderous said in a low voice. In front of him, a Human stranger had slipped away from the fight to intercept Canderous. In the man's shadow stood a heavily armoured Rodian.

"Ordo," the Human replied. The Rodian had a blaster in his hand, dangled idly by his side. "Quite a motley crew you've got here."

"New slave girls for Davik." Canderous tilted his head to the wrestlers, who were now grappling on the floor amidst the braying of the spectators. "Might come back and watch after I offload these girls."
Canderous took a step along the edges of the room, but the man called Daelin didn't budge from his position, right in the way of the nearest exit.

I edged toward Mission. The bad feeling in my gut was growing.

"Davik wants to see you, but he ain't expecting you to bring company." Daelin folded his arms. "And I ain't been told 'bout no slave girls."

"Are you questioning me, Daelin?" Canderous growled. "The last person who did that ended up picking his eyeballs out of his dinner."

"You don't scare me, Ordo," the man sneered. His gaze moved suggestively over Mission, before narrowing on me. "Davik said you'd been getting greedy, said you might be thinking of turning traitor. Do you really expect me to believe that the Bek's pet Wookiee would bring in Mission Vao? How stupid do you think I am?"

The hair on my neck rose in alarm. This was it- no escaping a battle now.

I shoved the foreign blaster in Mission's hand, before yanking a vibrosword free from my back harness. Canderous was even quicker – his large weapon snapped up instantly as he opened fire.

There was a yell from the Human as he was gunned down, and screams from the seated audience as the Mandalorian's firepower turned to sweep over them.

The armoured Rodian, though – that was my target, and I let loose the growl in my throat as I rushed forward.

His armour was no match for the strength of my vibrosword as it shattered into his side. With a roar, I threw my head forward to smash into the Rodian's un-helmed face, and the man crumpled to the ground.

After a final, fatal stab of my weapon deeper through the man’s broken armour, I spun around to view the carnage.

Carth Onasi and Mission were close to the wall, their blaster fire gutting into the room as the two Twi'leki girls cowered behind them. Relief shot through me, even at the sight of the helpless servants – for I knew that it was often the helpless to fall first in a fight like this.

Bastila Shan had reclaimed her weapon from Carth, a double-bladed vibro-staff that spun in her hands as she waded through the centre of the room. And Jen-

Jen Sahara was frozen. Her face was a mask of shock, and she made no effort to move or arm herself as blaster fire streamed around her.

"(Jen!)" I howled.

A piercing wail knifed through the air and, as I bounded toward Jen, I jabbed an elbow into the temple of a Duros, bent over a control panel inset on the wall.

"The kriifing alarms!" Canderous cursed behind me. "There goes our secrecy!"

Jen still wasn't moving, and I wasn't close enough. Behind her was the shadow of an enemy-

"(Jen!)" I howled again. "(Catch!)"

Too late- her attacker lunged forward with a chiv-blade, stabbing it deep into her thigh. Jen screamed, and the vibrosword I had hurled in her direction sailed uselessly past.

No! I roared in panic, still rushing forward. The mercenary pulled his arm back to strike again, and in his shadow another two stepped up to flank him. No – I will not fail my life-debt!

I saw Jen stumble, saw the smatter of dark red staining the ferracrete flooring at her feet. I'd left her unguarded, she had frozen in the face of terror, and I was too far away-

Jen ducked. It was a sharp move to the side that morphed into a roll, and somehow, she ended in a crouch with my blade in her grasp. Almost faster than my eye could track, Jen’s arms snapped forward in a powerful lunge. The vibrosword blurred, and struck the boots of the nearest thug.

The armour surrounding the man’s ankles shattered. He fell, shrieking.

By then, I had reached the first thug, the one who had stabbed Jen Sahara – but he didn’t notice my arrival until my paws closed tight around his neck. A wrench to the side, and then it was over for him.

"Pathetic weakling!" The words were a low sneer from Jen, but it did not sound at all like her. She stood over her enemy, having finished him with a stab clean through his neck-brace. Hot red spurted from the shuddering corpse as she yanked her weapon free. "You can't best me!"

"(Jen! Behind you!)") I wailed. A female mercenary had a blaster aimed at Jen's unarmoured back. Jen didn't pause: she spun, instead, faster than was possible – and then her outstretched vibrosword sliced through the thug's forearm.

The bloody limb flopped onto the floor. The mercenary howled in shock, a shriek that was abruptly cut off as Jen dropped a hand from the sword and crunched a fist into the woman's throat.

Choking, the woman staggered back before sinking to her knees. She collapsed a second later, when Jen's vibrosword stabbed deep past the thin layer of mesh protection covering her chest.

Jen snarled, both hands returning to the vibrosword's hilt as she pulled it free and raised it high.

She turned to face the room.

For an instant – only an instant – I froze at the look in her forest-green eyes. Soulless. Frenzied. Madclaw.

"Guess she's got her berserker rage back," Carth muttered somewhere behind me.

"Hah!" Canderous called out in exultation. It was then I realized that we were the only ones left standing. "Ib'tuur jatne tuur ash'ad kyr'amur!"

And then, Jen Sahara's expression shattered into fear. Her bloody leg buckled underneath her, and she collapsed.

I was there in a flash, catching her before she landed. Jen was shivering, sweating, her eyes rolling back in her head. "(Someone – help her! There is something wrong other than a leg wound!)

I looked up in panic, only to meet the horrified gaze of Bastila Shan.

"I am Jen Sahara," the Human woman I owed my life to mumbled softly. I did not think it was loud enough for anyone else to hear. "I am!"
"(Yes)," I rumbled, but my gaze did not drop from Bastila Shan's. There was no reason for the look of stark fear that painted the young woman's face and held her strange almond-shaped eyes open so wide.

"We ain't got time for this, princess," Canderous Ordo snapped, giving Bastila Shan a shove. "Use your magic tricks or some kriffing kolto and get Jen back on her feet. We're gonna need her sword."

Bastila swallowed, but then her face tightened into composure and she strode forward to kneel next to us.

But the stink of fear still wafted from her.

_Is Bastila Shan afraid for Jen, or of her?_ Jen Sahara's berserking rage was more than unsettling. The unmitigated fury that overtook the older woman was soulless in its depth and frightening in its strength. But to rattle a mystical _Jedi_ so... it was then that I wondered if there was something fundamentally wrong with the Human I was indebted to – something beyond the implications of a head injury.

And as Bastila Shan harnessed her fantastical powers, and colour began to bloom in Jen's cheeks, I vowed to myself the same words as before, but this time with an addendum:

_I will protect Jen Sahara from any threat – including herself._

_xXx_

Malak Devari:

::Our fleet is in position, my lord.:: The image of Admiral Karath flickered atop the holo-stand, his hands folded formally behind his back. ::The TNF have demanded an immediate expulsion of our forces under threat of retaliation, but that is nothing more than empty bluster. They are too weak to mount any sort of challenge against our might.::

"The Tarisian National Front all but welcomed our sovereignty years ago." I chuckled, dwelling on my two standing bases that the puppet government of Taris had long pretended did not exist. "Hold your position, Admiral, and await my next order."

Karath snapped out a quick salute, and vanished from the stand. A sense of ready satisfaction warmed in my gut. Truly, I had granted those Tarisians more time than they deserved.

"Put Rylun on," I clipped out to the nearest tech. He was quick, efficient, and sparse with his words. I did not tolerate the bugs in my home any other way.

The technician's fingers danced over the communication controls. Five seconds, perhaps, before another figure shimmered to existence on the holo-stand.

::My lord::

"Status update, Admiral," I ordered.

The holo-projection of Admiral Rylun bowed. ::We have exited hyperspace outside the Arillian asteroid belt, my lord, and our fleet is in the process of refuelling. Once complete, we shall plot a course for the Dantooine system. Our expected time of arrival is thirty standard hours.::

_Thirty hours._ It was longer than I preferred, but most of my forces were elsewhere – further away from this Outer Rim planet I had been content to ignore until now.

The Jedi Order was a bunch of cowardly hypocrites, but I had underestimated their meddling – and now they would pay the price.

My eyes narrowed. "Hit quick and hard, Rylun. The primary target must be eliminated. There is no room for failure. You understand that, don't you?"

Rylun was too much of a professional to show fear, but a tightening around his eyes indicated he was not as calm as his façade showed. After all, his predecessor had retreated from a risky offensive that I had ordered, after it had turned sour.

His predecessor had taken three days to die.

I'd brought Rylun to visit her, near the end. It was interesting how more loyal and efficient underlings could be with the right motivation. And Rylun, newly promoted, needed to understand that neither failure nor cowardice was an option.

Although, frankly, his chances of surviving the Dantooine offensive were slim.

_I can replace Rylun. Provided he destroys the master Star Map on Dantooine, then I don't care if I lose his entire fleet. If Rylun truly deserves those admiral pips on his shoulders, then he will find a way to achieve his target, weaken those meddling robes, and return with his life._

::::We will decimate the ruins, my lord.:::

"Good. Once eliminated, you will turn the attack to the Enclave. They will be scurrying to bolster the planetary protections once the plasma starts dropping, but that will take them time. Time enough for you to hurt them."

::::I shall not fail you, my lord.:::

"See that you don't." I waved my glove to the console technician, and Rylun vanished. "Put Karath back on."

Only two seconds, this time, for the holo-stand to fill.

::::My lord?::: Admiral Karath acknowledged.

"Begin the attack on Taris," I ordered, and it was a pleasure to say those words. "Those Tarisians shall know the price of failure, Karath. I will see that planet in ruins."

One live foot-soldier, and three corpses of unimportant Republic grunts. That was all that Taris had been able to offer me from the ruins of the Endar Spire. I could feel my anger rally once more, crackle over my skin in waves of pure Force energy. _No officer, no Jedi, and certainly no Bastila Shan._ I did not tolerate failure, be it from an admiral or a planet of Tarisians.

::::My lord, our men are still on the surface. I need time-:::

"The search for Bastila is taking too long, Admiral. I sense movement in the Force. We attack, now."

I would not risk Bastila Shan going to ground or worse – escaping the planet.

::::Of course, my lord.::: Karath bowed. He was experienced and strategically gifted, and had once been a man that _I_ had reported to – in my younger, less-evolved days.
Perhaps it was that – or merely the years of war behind him – for the reason I gave the man more leeway than most.

::Although, two hours would allow me to extract fifty percent of our-::

"Now, Karath!" I snarled, and felt the crackle of Force surge in white static over my fists. Leeway only went so far, and if Karath thought he was safe from a distance-

::At once, my lord!:: Karath gasped, bowing deeper, and the dark fury cresting on the Force around me ebbed in response. ::I will lead the charge myself, immediately!::

I allowed him the gift of my silence, and twitched my hand at the nearby tech.

Karath's figure winked out.

I turned, and strode from the command centre. Taris would soon feel the weight of my wrath. I cared little for the planet, truly; its natural resources had long been plundered to near depletion, and its strategic position along the galactic hyper-routes was vastly overrated when compared to the awesome power of the Star Forge.

If I closed my eyes, I could sense the dark miasma of power calling to me from the Forge, even from this distance. Nothing could stop me now – not the prehistoric shell of the Republic, not those cowering fools from the Order, and certainly not that battle meditation thorn in my side.

What a shame I could not have captured Bastila alive. It would have been sweet, so sweet, to break her – a barely grown woman with such an unusual gift, and one of the last defences of the antiquated Order. I had met Bastila Shan, once, a lifetime ago – and still remembered her as a lush girl blooming with innocence.

Of course, I'd only had eyes for another then.

Revan.

If there was one sight I would have liked to see, it would have been the expression on the face of my former master when my flagship opened fire on hers. The only thing sweeter would have been digging my own lightsaber into the black pit where her heart had once resided.

Well. Dead is dead. She is no more than space dust, now. The opportunity to wipe out both Bastila Shan and Darth Revan above Deralia had meant I was denied a face-to-face confrontation, but I had believed it worth the sacrifice of personal enjoyment.

Yet who would have predicted the young Jedi to escape, alive?

It matters not. Soon there will be no more loose ends. Bastila Shan would be vaporised in the Tarisian bombardment, if what remained of the populace didn't hunt her down and offer her up in return for mercy. And the master Star Map would be destroyed, removing any reference to the other four planets.

Oh, how I wished I knew how the Jedi had discovered that relic of Rakatan legacy! My little pet who betrayed the Endar Spire exposed their knowledge to me but not their reasoning: Galdea must have known of the Star Map, but why risk Shan, unless she was the one to stumble upon the Dantooine ruins in the first place?

Had I the young woman in my grasp, I would never have risked her so. Still, perhaps, in the grand scheme of galactic control, the reasoning of those fools on that backwater planet mattered little.
Galdea was dead, cut down by Bandon. Rylun's strike on Dantooine would take out the master Star Map. And with Bastila's upcoming demise on Taris, all knowledge leading to the Star Forge would be winked out.

Then there would be nothing left to truly oppose me. The Republic would fall, soon; weakened by generations of war. The Jedi were even more crippled, and while the Order might sanction involvement in war these days, their strength had been gutted by their refusal to do the same years ago.

And the Unknown Regions – I had turned my back on the Unknown Regions. What was out there could rot by itself.

xXx

Mission Vao:

We sprinted down hallways as the alarm wailed in all directions. My heart thumped, fast and hard, like someone had spiked my fizz-pop. And through my mind, images of mangled bodies we'd left behind kept flashing like a blitzed holo-sign, lurid and bright and hard to ignore.

Part of me wished I was back in the Bek headquarters. Back where things were safe; where killing might happen but somehow it wasn't real 'cause the Beks kept me away from it all.

Big Z's heavy paw thudded on my shoulder, holding me back as Canderous charged into another room. The moment we heard the sound of his massive gun starting up, Big Z bounded ahead with Carth at his side.

My blaster felt slippery in my sweaty grip. I looked down to see my hand shake.

Get it together! This was real. This was life or death. And if there was ever a time to show that I was more than just a kid, it was right now.

I ran through the doorway, blaster raised- but there was nothing left but corpses at Big Z's feet. My best friend huffed, his vibrosword glistening red under the artificial lighting.

For the first time ever, I suddenly got how others saw him. A towering, bristling mass of muscle that couldn't even speak Basic. I shivered- and then he was Big Z again, striding my way with his furry face all furrowed in concern.

"(Where's Jen?)" Big Z rumbled, and I spun around to check. But it was okay – they were behind me. Jen was pale, cowering at that stuck-up snot's side, and Bastila-

Bastila was next to her, staring at Jen's bowed head with the weirdest look on her face. She almost looked scared of Jen. Jen, who was going all borked and pathetic and was currently about as scary as a soap dispenser.

"Come on!" Canderous bellowed from the other side of the room, and Bastila's chin jerked up. She tugged on Jen's arm, and they both stumbled forward. Jen's eyes were wide and frightened, and whatever was going on with her was serious. Later, when this was over, I was going to have a long talk with her.

The room shook; sudden and jarring, and my feet buckled underneath me. I squawked in surprise, hands stretching out to break my fall.

There was a shattering noise as a holo-picture fell from a wall and smashed into a thousand shards of ferracrystal.

"(What was that?)" Zaalbar howled, getting to his feet. Sheesh – he'd also been knocked down. And Davik's stupid alarms hadn't stopped – if anything, it sounded like more of them had joined in. Further away.

"Earthquake?" My question came out in a squeak. Beneath my palms, the ground was still shaking. I'd heard about earthquakes, but the only ones on Taris were when bits of the Lower City crumbled into sinkholes. From what I'd heard, the Upper City was structured and strengthened enough that sinkholes and level collapses simply couldn't happen here.

There was a loud boom somewhere in the distance. It sounded a bit like an explosion.

"Orbital bombardment," someone said in a low, dark tone. I blinked, glancing over at Carth, not recognizing his voice at first. He was still standing – and the look on his face was bleak. Almost-almost like he'd seen a ghost. "That's the noise of plasma chewing into buildings."

"Haar'chak," Canderous spat, as the ground beneath us began to rattle. "Republic's right. This is coming from the skies."

"The Sith." Bastila's voice was a harsh whisper as she held two fingers to her pale brow. "I can sense it. They're bombing the planet!"

"Just to make things really challenging," Canderous ground out. "We're running out of time – we need to split up."

"Split up?" Bastila protested. "Are you mad? We should all be heading for that ship of yours!"

"Someone needs to disable the mechanical lock on the landing gear, princess, while the rest of us secure the ship," Canderous shot back. "Unless you want the Ebon Hawk to rip itself apart when we take off."

The walls shook again with another explosion. "C'mon guys, no time for arguments!" I yelled, getting to my feet. "How do we disable this thing, then?"

"There's a system mainframe near here that controls the ship's security," Canderous said, turning to face me. "Someone's gotta sneak in there with the droid to hack into the system. I'll lead a team to go kill anyone stupid enough to be guarding the Hawk."

I'm not just a kid. Here's a chance to prove it.

"Teethree's my droid, so I'll go," I offered. I felt my fingers curl against my palm. I could help, and I was going to show it. "My splicing's pretty wizard, too. Big Z, give us some backup?"

Zaalbar looked at me, then back at Jen. I knew what he was thinking, but Jen... Jen would be safer with the others, the way she was.

"Good idea, kid." Canderous threw me a nod. "Hop to it-

"I ain't a kid, you old geezer!"

"Careful, kid," he growled. "Watch your damn tongue and get to work. Take Carpet and Trashcan and head through the north doors. The security room is down the left hallway, the door at the end. No idea what the system is. Be quick!"
I waved Teethree forward, hurrying past that grumpy mercenary and poking my tongue out when he was looking away. Teethree whistled as he followed, and at the door I stopped, waiting for Big Z. He was howling in complaint.

"(Jen should come with us)," he wailed. He probably thought he was being subtle but sheesh, he was loud enough that I almost expected Jen to squawk in complaint.

"Big Z, she'll be safer with them," I hissed. "I need you!"

Zaalbar huffed in irritation, but strode over to me without any more moaning about it.

"I know," I muttered, as he took the lead. "I'm worried about her, too."

He nodded at me, lifted his blade, and then bashed open the door with a kick. It gave under his strength, and the hallway beyond was mercifully empty as we rushed through.

It didn't take long to reach the security room, which was tucked behind a five-inch durasteel door that took Teethree less than a min to slice. Far out, but he was ace, even for a specced-out astromech. Inside, the mainframe took up most of the space in the small room - there were two tall racks filled up with servers and controllers, and a long desk embedded with a row of console screens. At least I knew we were in the right place-

I ran to the desk. "Teethree, get your gears over here and slice in." I pointed to the central console, budging over to give the droid space. "Start looking for the Ebon Hawk's security system. You need to disable the mechanical lock that's keeping it grounded. I'm gonna do something else quickly."

"(Mission, some people are in the corridor!)" Zaalbar cut in. My gaze darted back to the second screen.

Bantha crap! It was insane, but I actually recognized them - and it was bad. Davik Kang and Calo Nord. They'll kill us if they find us here!

"Hide, guys!"
There was no exit... nothing, here, except to hide under the desk, and hope they were too frantic 'bout the bombardment to notice us. But Big Z wouldn't fit-

My panicked gaze snagged on the large equipment closet up against the side wall. "Big Z, go jump in there!" I gestured wildly. "Teethree, under the desk with me- and no one make a peep or we're fried!"

It was dark and dusty, and I banged my knee hard on a desk leg just as the hatch slid open and the large cupboard doors closed.

"Damn those Sith - they're bombing the whole city!" Davik cursed, stomping in and heading straight for the console I'd just been behind. "After the credits we've thrown at them, you'd think they'd give us advance warning!"

"Never trust the Sith, Davik," Calo drawled. I shivered. Please don't let them see us.

Calo Nord was one scary guy. He was almost as scary as Canderous. "Davik, we don't have the launch codes. You really think we can get past the Sith's automated defense guns?"

"No idea – but we can at least fly to another part of the planet! Just let me unlock the Eben Hawk, then we're getting outta here."

I could hear the tapping sound of his fingers on the console. His legs were right in front of me, encased in a grotesquely purple armour suit I'd seen from the cam feeds. It looked as ostentatious as the rest of his gross palace.

I was holding my breath, feeling the dust tickle my nose, and digging my nails into my palms. There was a tinkling sound of light metal clanging on something, followed by the mechanical grind of gears turning.

"A keylock's frakking crap security, Davik," Calo jeered. I saw his armoured legs step closer to the purple-clad ones of Davik. "No encryption, no biometrics... you're just begging for someone walk into this room and pinch your ship."

"That's where you're wrong, Calo," Davik replied. "Who knows how to pick a traditional lock these days? Hah, who would even notice it, in among the controls?"

Whoa. Davik had locked the security with a key? Like, an actual, metal, cut-out key? Maybe the purple crime lord was right. I hadn't even noticed any sort of archaic locking interface. Better hope the 'Hawk itself doesn't have the same lock-

Although, with Teethree humming quietly at my side, I realized that wouldn't be a problem. It'd take Teethree less than a millisec to pick a keylock, now that I knew to look for it. Maybe Calo was right, too.

"Hey Davik," Calo said slowly. His weight shifted from foot to foot. "What are the security cams doing up on the screen?"

Terror danced a jerryjig down my spine. My teeth bit deep into my lip, hard enough that the coppery tang of blood filled my mouth.

"No idea," Davik muttered. "And no time to worry about it. No one could've entered the Eben Hawk until now. Which means we need to haul jets. Let's go!"

The two men turned and strode from the room. I waited for about five seconds, and then crawled out and ran straight to the closet.
"Looks like they did the job for us, Big Z," I whispered, as he rumbled in concern at me. "We better hope Canderous is already at the 'Hawk."

Big Z nodded in assent, already loping to the exit. "(Stay behind me, Mission)."

I whistled sharply to Teethree, sent out a brief mental plea for the safety of the others, and followed my best friend out the door.

xXx

Davik Kang:

I ran down the hallway as my beautiful estate crumbled around me, damning the Sith with each step I took. Calo sprinted beside me, a trusted merc for now. For now. Calo was as dangerous as Canderous - and just as ambitious.

That's the problem with all these damn mercs. Sooner or later they start getting ideas. Thinking above their station. And that's when it's time to make sure something job knocks 'em down for good.

We turned into my hangar, and the first thing I noticed was a smoking, gaping hole where my blast doors should have stood. Beyond-

The acrid stench of molten durasteel blew in from outside. I gaped at the burning buildings I could see, bordered by the rubble of my own hangar. Most of one wall had been obliterated by an anonymous plasma drop, and there was no avoiding the sight of Upper Taris crumbling into ruination.

Those blasted Sith!

My gaze darted wildly back within the hangar. My baby... my baby, the Ebon Hawk, was still intact. Untouched. Sitting meek and pretty at the far end of the hangar, like a joygirl waiting for her master.

It was then that I noticed a group of stragglers clustered around her loading ramp.

"Well, look what we got here! Thieves in the hangar," I drawled, slipping a hand over the upgraded blaster on my hip. My focus immediately snapped to the largest figure – a damn Wookiee, of all things. Tough and preternaturally strong, but also simple.

And the Human next to him-

Shavit! Canderous bloody Ordo! I could feel my lips curling up over my teeth, but deliberately moved my hand away from the blaster. I should’ve had Calo take him out days ago. "Canderous. Fancy finding you here, sniffing around my baby. Suppose you thought you could pinch her and leave me high and dry with the Sith turn this planet into dust?”

Ordo barked a laugh. “Pretty much, Davik. Figured the ‘Hawk could cover the wages you owe me.”

“I can take care of Ordo,” Calo growled softly at my side. “Leave him to me.”

Oh, that was tempting – and I didn’t underestimate Calo – but there were a few allies standing ground behind that disloyal Mandalorian dog. Not just the Wookiee- a Human soldier, with a pair of blasters at the ready. Two females, both wielding vibroswords, and the younger one looked familiar-

Sithspit! That's the Jedi prisoner Brejik thought was just a damn officer-

We were outnumbered, and bloody Ordo had a Jedi on his side.

"Perhaps now isn't the time to fight," I intervened - quickly, before Canderous could start shooting. The dog could be as hot on the trigger as Calo, at times. "We both want to leave Taris, so why don't we work together?" If Canderous was this far, then he'd infiltrated my estate before the Sith started bombing. Which meant... the bastard got the launch codes! And then betrayed me!

But now wasn't the time for vengeance. I'd have to wait until Ordo got me off-planet before finding the opportunity.

But Canderous laughed, loud and mocking, and I understood then that he wasn't going to play nice. "You think I'd trust you again, Davik? Here's one lesson you shoulda' learnt long ago – never kriff with a Mando'ade."

He wrenched that massive gun up. The second I started running, the bastard opened fire.

xXx

Jen Sahara:

Fear and rage pummelled in tandem through my head; it was taking all my possible strength to stop from screaming as a nightmare unfolded all around. Death! Death everywhere! Who am I? I stared in shock at the two men talking to Canderous. I am Jen Sahara! I needed Bastila's support and strength, but she'd been shooting me worried, frightened looks ever since the earlier battle. How did I do that? What's wrong with my mind? I really, really wanted to see the doctor again, but it was just beginning to dawn on me that I probably never would.

Canderous opened fire on the two men facing him, and the one called Calo chucked a handful of grenades. I saw Carth retreat, blasters firing, and heard him yell in pain when one exploded. I clutched my vibrosword with trembling hands, staring at the fight ahead in numb disbelief. An insidious, foreign malevolence was creeping through my thoughts. A desire to rend, to vanquish, to destroy all in my path. No! That's not my feelings! That's just wrong! But a presence inside me, a part of me, had enjoyed killing those earlier men, and the acidic taste of smug satisfaction sat like poison in my mouth.

My vision turned blurry; green smoke was materializing throughout the hangar. I coughed, and covered my mouth with a hand. I heard a muffled puff, and somehow I recognized it as another gas grenade ejecting - despite never having encountered them before. The smokescreen all around me thickened ominously.

Canderous was cursing in Mandalorian, somewhere further ahead. And in front of me, a figure materialized. My eyes widened in horror as I recognized the bounty hunter, Calo Nord.

He swiftly flung an unknown projectile at my chest.

Without any conscious thought, the alien fury took control of my limbs once more, and saved my life as my body dodged sharply to the side. I felt the skin on my face contort and curl into a hideous sneer, and a dark laugh erupted from my lungs. This pathetic worm will die.

"Imbecile!" the sneer bubbled up from my throat. No! No! I am Jen Sahara! The empowering, evil sense of might vanished from my limbs, and I stumbled in mid leap.
But Calo had stopped, frozen; whatever his expression was, it was hidden behind an armoured face mask set with round transparisteel goggles. "Who in the Outer Rim are you? I know you!"

I gulped, and jumped backwards. I'd never seen him before. Had I?

"Never mind," he grunted, his voice resolved once more. "It's your end, Human!" He pulled out a blaster, but just at that moment Bastila jumped out of the smoke in front of me, vibro-staff raised. Calo was sufficiently surprised that she managed to slice into his shoulder. He screamed, stumbled backwards, and spat laser fire at her.

Bastila whirled her blade furiously, and Calo's bolts reflected off the staff and into the surroundings. She pressed her advantage, jumping forward to challenge the bounty hunter.

Calo cursed as he began stumbling backward.

"You'll not kill me, Jedi!" Calo spat, and dropped a grenade at his feet. It hissed, erupted gouts of thick white smoke. Bastila lunged forward a little too late; Calo had already retreated, vanishing into the concealment his grenades provided.

"Davik's dead!" Canderous hollered from somewhere in the room. "Quick! Into the 'Hawk!"

Bastila grabbed my arm, guiding me up the loading ramp of the ship, I stumbled after her, the air thinning as durasteel walls rose to surround us. The pulsing of my heart thundert through me, and my mind was frozen. Who am I? Who am I really? The ship's floors shuddered under my feet as another explosion rocked the surroundings. Bastila's hand came out of her pocket, in a fist that looked like it was concealing something. She pulled me towards her with a rough yank. I stumbled, and felt a sharp prick in my upper arm.

"Don't worry, you'll be safe soon. I promise," Bastila whispered into my ear. A sudden heaviness grew in my limbs, and the black of impending unconsciousness began to creep in around the edges of my vision. A flare of fury ignited in the depths of my psyche, but it was weak and ineffectual against a growing exhaustion. The schutta sedated me! No, no, that sneering voice was evil and wrong. She's a Jedi. She wouldn't do that!

I'm just... so tired.

xXx

Carth Onasi:

My leg throbbed as I stumbled through the gas fog, coughing and breathing shallowly so as not to succumb to the poisonous smoke. I'd heard Canderous crow over Davik's death from somewhere in the room, but I could see nothing bar thick, white smoke. My hand whacked sharply against a hard surface, followed by my head. Ouch. Underneath my fingers, I could feel the durasteel grating of a freighter. The ship! Get moving, Onasi!

I clenched my teeth and squinted through the haze, which was beginning to thin. There – I could just make out the loading ramp - and I stumbled closer, hands outstretched. The hot adrenaline still surged like fire through my veins; it had since the moment we'd entered this damn estate, and ramped up like a furnace once the bombardment started.

A stress reaction was useful, so long as the fight or flight instinct were kept under tight control. Sometimes, the only thing that could get one through a situation was sheer grit.

Time to go fly this rust bucket. I only hope Mission's disabled the locks on the landing gear. I clambered inside, coming across Bastila standing over a crumpled Jen, a resolved look on her face. Jen's fallen again. I didn't know what to make of her anymore. I didn't really want to try. Ever since we landed on Taris, my damn head has been screwed on backwards. I'd never met anyone as mercurial and changeable as blasted Jen Sahara.

Bastila looked up at me sharply, a flash of fright dancing in her eyes.

"S-she fainted!" Bastila exclaimed quickly.

I narrowed my eyes at Bastila's defensive tone. Jen fainting was nothing new to me, but Bastila's reaction didn't stack up, somehow.

"We're back, let's go!" Mission's bright voice from behind startled me.

"Everyone, get in the ship!" I yelled over my shoulder. "I'm heading straight to the cockpit!"

I heard a howl behind me as the Wookiee neared, and Bastila murmured something to him. The dull durasteel interior of the Ebon Hawk greeted me as I rushed deeper into the unfamiliar freighter. I'd have time to become familiar with her later, but she was a medium sized Dynamic-class that was favoured by smugglers, so I had high hopes for her manoeuvrability.

I found the cockpit and settled into the pilot's seat, switching on the controls and locating the onboard communicator. A faint humming permeated the air as the electrics dazzled into life, and I leaned forward to speak through the internal comm.

"Everyone get strapped in! I'm taking her out, and it's going to be rough!" Outside the ferracrystal cockpit window the hangar doors had been blasted open, and a scene of devastating carnage met my eyes. I didn't have time to dwell on the burning Tarisian landscape, but I knew what it would look like further afield. I knew the signs of war all the well. I hope Mission doesn't see this. Damn those murdering Sith!

As I began prepping the freighter for take-off, Bastila entered the cock-pit, breathless, and squeezed into the co-pilot's chair. I gave her a brief smile, and hoped the Jedi had had some navigational experience.

The ship's self-diagnostic beeped, and a ready status blinked on the console. I fired up the engines. The turbine compressor started with a high-pitched whirring, building up pressure for the fusion engines to kick into life. Bastila strapped herself in tightly, and I flicked open the comm again.

"I'm heading out," I said calmly as the engines roared to life beneath us. The ship lifted, and a sense of satisfaction filled me as we shot out of the burning estate.

Bastila gasped; fiery buildings were visible on all sides, and a scraper toppled precariously in front of us as I banked the 'Hawk sharply to the right and up, up into the sky. We left the ruins of civilization behind, but plasma fire still spat down from the heavens on all sides. I veered upwards, weaving beneath the bombardment that I saw, but clouds of smoke hung heavy in the sky and it would be luck that would get us out of here in one piece.

"Get the droid to transmit the launch codes on all external frequencies," I said through gritted teeth. "I've got my hands full."

Bastila nodded, and reached for the communicator, relaying my order. I didn't dare raise the 'Hawk too high until it was done; the Sith's automatic defense array activated in the upper atmosphere, and that was deadlier than playing chance with plasma fire.
The astromech droid beeped behind us, plugging into a bypass slot on the side of the cockpit wall. A moment later and the navigation console indicated the codes were being sent. I sighed in relief, raising the 'Hawk's nose high into space.

"Plug in the hyperspace co-ordinates for Alderaan," I told Bastila, my eyes still fixed through the window as blue slowly darkened into black. We'd eased away from the bombardment, and it looked like the codes had worked. "We need to reach hyperspace as soon as we're out of the gravity well."

"We will head to Dantooine," Bastila informed me as she leaned towards the navigational panel.

"What?" I snapped, and then ahead, I saw we had company. A group of snubfighters materialized into view, and laser fire shot out towards us. I twisted the ship sharply to the side, and heard Bastila gasp in protest at the jolt.

"There's a Jedi enclave there where we can find refuge!" Bastila replied as she started tapping in our destination.

"I thought you said – oh, nevermind," I veered in the other direction, and then the ship shuddered briefly. A warning light blinked on the console. That was a hit. Dammit. I accelerated to maximum, and flicked open the communicator.

"Incoming fighters!" I yelled. "Canderous, Mission, to the turrets! I need a few minutes before we can reach hyperspace!"

xXx

Canderous Ordo:

"Got ya!" I yelled in victory, as I twisted the gun controls around to find another easy target. "These Sith fighters are too puny!"

Mission Vao was seated in the turret control opposite mine, but so far had failed to shoot down a single enemy ship. And there were a lot out there.

"Hey, kid, would you start firing already?" I grunted at her. These fighters are the weak sentries of the Sith, but there's too many of them. She's gotta sharpen up!

"Look, I ain't never used one of these before!" she snapped back. "And I'm not a kid!"

"Just aim and shoot – it's kriffing child's play," I retorted derisively as another ship came into view. I let loose on the turrets, and fire danced from the enemy fighter.

"I'm trying, okay?" she screamed back. "Look, my home is getting bombed! Cut me some slack!"

"No time for snivelling, girl!" I rapped back. "The best way to honour your loved ones is to kill their enemies! So go shoot kriffing Sith!"

An answering fire from the Twi'lek's guns sounded through the turret room, and I hoped I'd finally gotten through to her. Until she sobbed.

"They're all dying down there!" she whined annoyingly, and dropped the controls.

_Haar'chak._ I kept my aim on the targeting area, but could feel my face creasing in annoyance. "I thought you were stronger than this. Maybe you are just a kid," I growled.
"Shut up, you old geezer!" she shrieked. "You don't care about anyone! You don't understand!"

I tried to remind myself that she was just a girl. Maybe, just this once, she can get away with that sort of comment. I understood grief, but it had its time and place. Not here, not now. "If you truly care about those weaklings on Taris, then you will kill as many of their murderers as you can, kid. These Sith fighters are busy destroying your planet, and all you can do is whine and moan about it?"

I heard her breathe in abruptly, and pressed my verbal attack. My fingers were getting slightly numb on the controls. "Look – we're gonna die if we don't give Republic the time he needs to enter hyperspace. Do me a favour and pull yourself together. Kill some of your friend's murderers while you're at it." I dragged my attention away from the kid's pathetic state, and focused purely on the incoming fighters.

"If you truly care about those weaklings on Taris, then you will kill as many of their murderers as you can, kid. These Sith fighters are busy destroying your planet, and all you can do is whine and moan about it?" I'll just have to do this myself.

A few seconds later, and I heard the barrage of Mission Vao's guns flare up once more. About time.

"I got one!" she yelled at me. Her tone had turned angry, and my responding grin was a feral one.

"Good. Now get another one of the bastards!" I commanded.

All at once, the ship shuddered with an explosion. I cursed, and the Twi'lek girl bit off a scream as we were both yanked to the side.

"If you truly care about those weaklings on Taris, then you will kill as many of their murderers as you can, kid. These Sith fighters are busy destroying your planet, and all you can do is whine and moan about it?" I dragged my attention away from the kid's pathetic state, and focused purely on the incoming fighters.

Onasi's voice flickered over the ships speakers. "No serious damage. Our external communications are down. Prepare for the hyperspace jump."

I braced myself; the dancing light of enemy fire dazzled fleetingly into bright white as the ship launched into hyperspace.

xXx

Zelka Forn:

A loud hammering on the inside door sounded again, threatening and insistent, drowned out only by the explosive quaking of yet another bombardment destroying a nearby part of Taris. I cursed, bracing myself against the chrome medical bench, as a bed behind me toppled over and spilled an injured citizen to the ground unceremoniously. He screamed.

The flickering lighting came back on fully as the bombing subsided, but it would start up again soon. I could only hope for survival, and help any as best I could.

"Doctor Forn!" a loud female voice yelled from outside the bolted door. I'd secured it after Gurney had showed up with half a dozen Exchange thugs, intent on looting all medical supplies in the wake of the Sith bombing. A nearby explosion had caved in the front entrance of the facility, smothering him with rubble, and giving me the chance to retreat to my inner sanctum. "Open up, or we shall blow this door wide open! We need the supplies, and the Upper City is not safe!"

"Go away, you wretched thieves!" I yelled back, falling to my knees to examine the patient who'd toppled to the ground. He was moaning, semi-conscious, blood bubbling from a corner of his mouth. I had to hope that was due to his facial bruising, rather than one of his broken ribs inflicting internal injuries. "Opportunistic scum!"

The man in front of me needed a bacta tank, but they were all full. And in the case of an explosion hitting the medical facility, immersion in bacta fluid while hooked up to the controlling computer would make one all the more vulnerable. I sighed.
"Zelka Forn, the door is lined with permacrete detonators, and we are exploding the charge in ten seconds. Stand back!"

I gasped, turning to stare in horror at the secured durasteel door. Were there no depths that some people would not sink to? In the midst of such planet-wide tragedy, how could sentients turn into such depraved, selfish monsters?

"Five seconds!" the female voice called commandingly. My feet scrabbled backwards of their own accord, away from the door, away from the injured patients that were too close to the oncoming blast-

The durasteel smashed open in a loud explosion of light and tearing metal, and I threw my arms up to cover my face, even as my ears rang from the cacophony and minor shards of debris slammed into me. I fell back, winded, and briefly passed out.

When my eyes opened, a heavily armoured pale blue Twi'lek woman was standing over me, a blaster pointed at my head. Her face was composed. Around her, I saw armoured sentients rifling through every drawer and cupboard, hastily stuffing all they could into pockets and rucksacks and utility belts. My face tightened in disgust.

"Zelka Forn," the Twi'lek said steadily. "Your reputation precedes you as a medical professional with both compassion and integrity. The Beks could do with someone like you, if you are inclined to overcome your distaste at our methods."

My mouth dropped open, in disbelief at her utter gall, perhaps. In the distance, the booming noise of more plasma smashing through parts of Taris could be heard.

"The Beks," I muttered in disgust. "First the Exchange, and now a swoop gang. Disaster brings out the scum of society, it seems."

The Twi'lek stared at me unblinkingly. "You're an idiot if you believe you can survive or help others up here, Zelka Forn. What's left of the Tarisian National Fleet is overwhelmed, if they haven't fled. Any aid from the Republic will be days away, maybe weeks. If you want to live your only chance is lower down, in some of the permacrete bunkers close to the Undercity. This is where the Beks will survive, and help any others who do, too."

Her gaze was hard, and devoid of any emotion. "Help?" I snorted in disbelief. I had no time for any of the Lower City gangs. All too often, I'd patched up the injuries caused by them, to innocents or to other gang members. "You lot help others?"

For the first time, the woman's face tightened in irritation. "I have shot people for less," she muttered, before sighing. "It's your choice, Zelka Forn. We will take the medical supplies for the people of the Lower City, those who are so often ignored by you Upper City snobs. Believe me when I say that you will not survive if you stay topside." She stepped backwards, allowing me room to stand. My gaze fell on an armoured gang member rummaging through a small basket on my desk.

"Hey," I protested, walking closer. "Drop that! Those are medical samples!" The Zeltron in question looked up and frowned as I strode closer. A handful of vials and hypodermics spilled onto the desk's surface, and I picked them up quickly. One 'derm was a mild violet colour; I recognized it as that strange sample the unstable Jen Sahara had given me. I pocketed it quickly into my medical kit.

"Boss, the southwest quadrant has collapsed," a Rodian spoke from the door, staring at the communicator on his wrist. "The main thrust of the bombardment is headed this way. We've gotta get down to the Undercity, before all routes are blocked."

"Finish up!" the Twi'lek woman in charge called. "Grab everything you can, we're leaving in two!" She stared at me again, striding forward to speak. "Last chance, Zelka Forn. Come with us, and you'll be free to help injured survivors in relative safety, as per the code you would have trained by. I can promise you the protection of the Bek's, and we have some medical equipment, if not what you're used to." Her lips thinned before she continued. "Or we shall leave you here to take your chances against the Sith bombs."

I stared at her in silence for a moment, as the sounds of destruction further afield were once more audible. I could feel the background vibration of explosions tearing up parts of Upper Taris and I knew, in my gut, that I would not survive here.

Lower down I might be able to help others, even if it meant throwing my lot in with a swoop gang of all things.

The gang members were finishing up, coming to surround the Twi'lek leader who was still waiting for my decision, impatience beginning to show upon her pale blue face. I gave her a brief nod, unwilling to speak, and she smiled a hard smile at me.

"Good," she said quietly. "I am Zaerdra. Now come! Follow me."

xXx

Bastila Shan:

I breathed a sigh of relief as the ship lurched forward, that minute-long pull of acceleration before it settled into the automatic thrum of hyperspace travel. Finally. Finally I can relax somewhat. My shoulders felt like knotted coils of stiffened rope, and my throat was dry and stiff.

Carth groaned in the pilot's chair, and slumped forward.

"Good work," I said softly. My eyes closed. "That did not look easy."

"Why, thank you," his response was dry, but not unfriendly, and I felt him move next to me. "I need some caffè. I hope Davik's fully supplied this ship."

"So do I," I replied, opening my gaze to look at him. Carth was busy undoing his harness. "Crime lords would usually plan for unexpected situations, so I believe our chances are good."

Carth gave me a nod of acknowledgement before standing. "I'll go see if you're right, because we have thirty-five hours before we hit Dantooine. Enough time for everyone to get hungry." He made to move around me, and then I spotted the blood on his leg. And his limp.

"Carth, you're injured!" I exclaimed in worry.

"Yes. Hanging around you and crazy Jen is getting more and more hazardous to my health," he muttered under his breath, combing a hand through his thick dark hair.

"Let me help," I offered, and it was automatic to reach out to the Force and submerge his limb. He winced and jumped backwards, eyes flashing irritation at me.

"Dammit, Bastila, you could at least ask first!" he protested, backing away.
I lifted an eyebrow at his objection, and his response was an angry scowl. Ever since Revan had started behaving... well, more and more like she should, Carth had been in a permanent black mood.

"I… apologize, Carth," I said in puzzlement. "I assumed you would desire my services."

"I'll be right back," he muttered as he walked out of the cockpit.

I sighed, and slouched back into the chair. I had not meant to earn Carth's ire, but I had thought anyone would appreciate Force healing. Canderous had not desired it earlier, either, and perhaps I needed to learn from that. I sighed a second time. Sometimes, it seemed like social niceties and customs were both foreign and nonsensical to me.

Now that immediate danger had passed, my mind curtailed back to the primary source of my fright. Greater than Davik's forces, greater than the Sith bombardment. Darth Revan. I'd felt it, I'd seen her face, I'd tasted it through the bond. There was no doubt about it, some spark of the former Sith Lord remained in the shell, and it was mind-linked to me.

Revan's scathing words hissed earlier to Davik's thugs came back to torment me cruelly. Pathetic weakling! You can't best me! Exactly what she had once said to me. Just after she had cut down Master Kester and Master Jai'lel.

My eyes closed wearily, and the taste of fear was sour in my mouth. Darth Revan is coming back.

Galdea and Vima had assured me it was nigh impossible, but something had changed. Something had gone awry. And without Master Galdea's supervision, or any of the Jedi Knights accompanying me on the Endar Spire, I was all alone with an amnesiac Sith Lord.

There is no emotion; there is peace. I breathed in deep, and forced myself to a calm state. While I would give anything to have one of my former companions back - my dear friend Kylah perhaps, or Master Galdea for his wisdom and knowledge - I was a member of the Jedi Order, and I would impart myself as such. We had made it from Taris, and that was a victory in itself. Whatever cracks were appearing in the façade of Jen Sahara could be fixed on Dantooine. As soon as they locate Knight Vima or Master Karon, an inner voice monologued irritably. For the two other Jedi involved in the personality implant were both famed for their wandering ways, and thus unlikely to be at the Enclave. But the personality of Jen Sahara is there, in Revan's mind. It just needs to be strengthened. That is something I can possibly do.

Perhaps, when we reached Dantooine, the masters would allow me a reprieve from babysitting Revan. They have surmised the rough location of the Star Maps on Tatooine and Manaan. Perhaps I will not be needed there. Wouldn't that be lovely. I wasn't foolish enough to pray that I might be able to step out permanently; I understood with hellish trepidation that the bond joining me to Revan meant it was impossible for me to totally avoid the Council's mission.

Would I have saved her, had I known the repercussion would be a Force bond? Would I have left her to die, alone on her flagship, rather than mind-link myself to someone as corrupted as she? I would like to think that I would still have chosen mercy, but in truth I did not know. I did not know.

Surely the Council would understand I needed some time to recuperate, to meditate and find my center, my calm. So much had happened; the deaths of those I cared for, Brejik's violations, and simply the mental trauma of being near Revan. Ever since she rescued me, I find myself acting less and less like a Jedi. Canderous' sarcastic words taunted me. "How very Jedi-like of you, princess." I snapped my eyes open angrily. Idetested that loathsome Mandalorian.

But in some ways, he may be correct. I lied to Revan about Alderaan, I tripped Mission using the Force, and now I've sedated Revan. I reminded myself that she was simply too dangerous for me alone to handle, but I could not quite swallow the excuse. She frightens me. That is the truth.

I am scared. I have faced Darth Revan before. I do not wish to do so again. It had been mere luck that Malak had fired upon the ship when he did; happenstance that I'd had warning and Revan had not. For I still did not know who would have won our encounter. Undoubtedly, Darth Revan was far more powerful than I, and my companions had already been killed, but we were duelling through the mental side of the Force… a place where my strength and even experience outweighed hers. Would she have kept challenging me so, had her old lover not intervened? For all that Darth Revan had to do was pull her mind back, activate her lightsaber and attack, and I would have been lost. Without Kester and Jai'lel, I would not have had a chance.

But it was a mystery I might never know the answer to. I pushed away the memory of how frightened I had been in that encounter, and told myself over and over that I was strong, I was confident, I was capable. I am weak, and scared, my mind echoed back. I wondered briefly if Revan had ever felt that way. She always seemed so sure of herself and what she was doing. I could never fathom why someone so bright and powerful would turn to the decaying road of the Dark Side. I had tried to understand, before she had regained consciousness as Jen Sahara. The old memory resurfaced, and I could still see Revan's broken body strapped down into the Enclave's life support system, tubes feeding kolto and nutrients and sedation into her body.

...

"Why do you think Revan and Malak turned to the Dark Side?" I asked softly over Revan's comatose body. I'd heard many theories, and formulated my own, but I was especially interested in Master Karon's viewpoint. After all, the Zabrak had been one of three involved in the rebuilding of Revan's mind, and was also the Sith Lord's first master.

Master Karon sighed softly, her turquoise eyes troubled. "It is not merely one thing, Padawan. It is a complex set of issues. Although certainly, your own master always argues that their age worked against them."

I nodded; Master Vrook was a vehement believer that Jedi needed to be brought to the Order young, while their emotions could still be moulded and their familial ties cut. Attachment was a danger to all Force users.

"They could count fifteen galactic years when you found them, is that right, Master Karon?"

"Sixteen," the Zabrak corrected quietly. "We have learned from the past, and normally would not train sentients at such an age. Or if we did, we would do so very slowly and warily."

"So why the exception?" The meteoric rise of Revan and Malak through the Order was well known. Their training, unlike my own, was the very opposite of slow.

"Their sheer power. It burned and glowed like a supernova." Master Karon looked at me steadily. "I was with the team that went to Talshion, where we first discovered them, and I have never sensed so much raw Force strength in an individual. In them both. Leaving them behind on the streets of a forgotten Outer Rim planet was not an option."

I turned back to face the prone figure, wrapped in a thin if discreet surgical robe. Revan's skin was still palloid from the length of time spent in the bacta tank.

"Do you think they were doomed to fall, then?" I asked. To fall from such heights of heroics… there must have been something innately flawed in them both. There must have.
"No. I do not believe anyone is, Padawan." Master Karon rested her hand gently over Revan's limp and pale one. The Sith markings had begun to fade with her disconnect from the Force. The bond allowed me that control - to separate her from the Force - once Master Galdea and Knight Vima had worked out how. Their tutelage had been enlightening, and I could now manipulate the Force that connected me to Revan.

Provided she did not know it was there, Revan – no, Jen Sahara - would have no reason to suspect she could access the Force, or that there was a barrier in the way.

"The War, too, played a part in their fall," Karon continued, her voice soft. "For no one can go through the horrors of battle and remain untouched. The decisions that Revan had to make as a general – that all the Jedi Thirteen were forced into as they led troops against the Mandalorians – would have caused scars on their souls. War is harder for Force sensitives, Padawan. The Order knows this. We feared what would happen if Jedi once more walked the battlefields of men."

I nodded. The Order had forbidden any Jedi to fight in the War, and Revan and Malak disobeyed that twice. Once, for a year-long reconnaissance mission. Twice, with dozens of Jedi Knights following them, the brightest forming the Jedi Thirteen - the Jedi leaders who worked with the Republic commanders against the Mandalorians.

"But my belief is their forbidden love was the primary factor." Karon's voice was so low now I struggled to hear it. "Passion clouds one's judgement. It is hard to remain logical and serene when in love. Perhaps if we had separated them from the outset, things may have been different, but Zhar and I feared what such separation may do to two so emotionally intertwined with one another. Perhaps we were wrong."

Master Zhar had been Malak's master once. Kind and affable, he and Karon were lifelong friends, so it was only natural that they would take on Revan and Malak together. Revan and Malak, who were childhood friends and teenage lovers before the Jedi found them. Perhaps Master Karon and Master Zhar expected Revan and Malak's passion to fade away to something like the camaraderie they themselves shared. But anyone who had ever met Revan or Malak before their fall would know what emotive characters they had been – they were nothing like the calm Karon Enova or the gentle Zhar Lestin. "It is a good lesson about the pitfalls of passion, is it not, Master Karon?"

She nodded. "Yes. But the consequences..." she sighed again. "Once, Revan Freeflight's ultimate goal was the stability and peace of the Republic. Yet she did her best to destroy it. Once, Malak Devari's overriding desire in life was Revan's happiness and safety. Yet he tried to kill her, and believes he has. That is the Dark Side for you, Padawan." Her turquoise eyes stared at me unblinkingly. "It grants you power quickly, promises you everything you desire, and then twists you and one day you find yourself destroying that which was once the most important to you."

I shivered.

"The personality rebuild is now complete, is it not?" I asked. After all this talk, some reassurance would be beneficial to my state of mind. Although Knight Vima had already told me of its success, and there was no denying Vima Sunrider's expertise, I was content to hear the results a second time.

"Yes. The persona of Jen Sahara has been successfully implanted, with some of the original Jen's memories repressed, of course," she told me. I winced. I had seen what the Sith had done to the scholar before she had died of her injuries in the Enclave.

"How have you linked Jen Sahara to the Order?"
"A few artificial memories intertwined with Jen's history." Karon took a step away from the body on the medical bed, smiling tiredly at me. She wished to leave, now, I could tell. "I do believe the Council will tell you more, Padawan, when they speak to you later this afternoon."

I nodded, and Karon left me there, staring at the empty shell of a monster. I spent more time in talks with the Council than sleeping, it seemed, since I came back from Deralia with a brain damaged Sith Lord mind-linked to me. While I desired more acknowledgement within the Order, being this close to the corrupted soul of Darth Revan seemed a heavy price to pay.

…

I opened my eyes again, and stared blankly out at the empty blackness of hyperspace, cut through with lines of white. Soon the masters will take care of Revan. I can strengthen Jen Sahara long enough for the personality to hold, and the masters will do more. Dantooine was less than two standard days away, and the sedation may last for as long as twenty hours of that, if I was lucky. And provided Jen Sahara's life was not in immediate danger, it did not seem like Darth Revan would resurface.

It will not be long until this trial is over. I could do this. I could.

And I would.

xXx

Calo Nord:

My damaged ship was slowly being pulled in by the Sith's trajectory beam, and I scowled at the wait. It had taken enough convincing to stop those diseased bastards from blowing me into space-dust to begin with. But I hadn't had the launch codes, and they were pretty trigger-happy up there, firing on anything that dared escape the mess they were making on Taris.

I had hoped to fly from Taris in Davik's baby, the Ebon Hawk. I'd co-piloted it with Davik before, and she was a sleek thing, the 'Hawk: quick, manoeuvrable, and with more shielding than a freighter her size should boast. I'd even packed the cargo hold full of kit in preparation: food, equipment, armour – all the essentials. The plan was to take some of Davik's top mercs and blast off Taris before the crime lord had even realized I'd gone. End him too, if I scored the chance. Davik had turned on Ordo quick enough, after all. I wasn't fool enough to think I was immune from his suspicion.

Seems like that Mandalorian scum had the same idea as me. Oh, Ordo would get what was coming to him, one day. No one walked away from Calo Nord and survived for long. I'd make him pay and take the 'Hawk back, make him burn or suffocate or drown in one of those ways his stupid people considered dishonourable.

Death is death, whether you're Mandalorian or Twi'leki or Zeltron. Idiot.

But first, I had to appease the Sith. It was the Leviathan pulling me in, an Interdictor-class heavy cruiser built back during the Mandalorian Wars, and probably the most famous ship in Darth Malak's fleet. The Leviathan meant Admiral Karath – a man I'd read a lot about even if I'd never met him. Strategically brilliant, he'd switched sides along with Jedi Knight Revan Freeflight, and was one of the reasons Darth Revan had been so successful. From what I knew, his loyalty had been to Revan rather than Malak, and I doubted whether Darth Revan's demise had made the admiral particularly happy.
Although, by then Darth Revan was getting trigger-happy and ice-cold. Just like Darth Malak was becoming unhinged, if not insane. I'd met Malak before. I'd completed a prep job for him on Deralia about a year ago, but his own idiot Dark Jedi had botched the implementation. Embroiling oneself in a squabble between Sith Lords went deep into the territory of suicidal - but, well. I hadn't known at the time his true target had been Revan. And the credits involved had been... more than alluring.

It all went belly-up, though. Deralia had been all but flattened, Darth Revan had walked away unscathed, and I vanished, deciding the risk of either Sith Lord's vengeance wasn't worth the missing credits. The Dark Jedi involved, I understood, had been cut down by Revan herself – even including Arran Da'klor, and he'd been one of the famed Jedi Thirteen.

It worked out to Malak's advantage in the end, though, for Bastila Shan's secret strike force were in the area and used the ensuing chaos to attack Darth Revan – and then Darth Malak fired on her ship simultaneously. So, Malak had the outcome he wanted anyway, but I wasn't willing to test the bounds of his forgiveness, and gave up the commission without a second glance despite the fact I'd successfully completed my part.

Now, I had a choice between dealing with an unknown – Admiral Karath – or asking him to hail Darth Malak and speak to the Sith Lord myself. The news that Bastila Shan escaped Taris would be worth something, surely. It wasn't my fault that Arran Da'klor kriffed things up so badly a year ago, and lost Malak a dozen or so of his stronger Dark Jedi. Surely the Dark Lord of the Sith would understand that. I'd recognized Captain Carth Onasi with Shan as well – another survivor from the Endar Spire, and a mildly famous one to boot, even if his significance paled when compared to Shan's. In my line of work it paid to remember faces, and the Republic captain was an easy one to recall.

Darth Malak might even be willing to send me on another mission, this time tailing the Ebon Hawk and killing or capturing her crew. I felt the beginnings of a smile. That meant going after Canderous Ordo, and I'd be willing to do that for no credits. I'd have to list the other crew members – that Bek brat, Mission Vao, no danger there. A Wookiee was strong, but easily dispatched by surprise. And then there was that crazy woman Bastila had saved...

I frowned as I tried to recollect her features. A strange sense of familiarity had clouded me when I faced her, when her features had contorted into that ugly, malevolent sneer. I knew her name – Jen Sahara – and that she had braved the Vulkars to rescue Bastila Shan. So there was a connection there, a strong one it seemed. They've saved each other's lives, but she's not a Jedi. So why did she seem so familiar? I frowned in concentration as I rifled through my memories. I prided myself on my photographic memory, and it was annoying that this stupid woman eluded my grasp.

It was that expression I have seen before, the hatred in the eyes. But green... the eyes weren't green.

A recollection from the dredges of my mind resurfaced...

... I followed Darth Malak out of the command centre, greed and unease clashing in my head. It was an impressive amount the Sith Lord was offering me but... Getting involved in Dark Jedi politics is liable to end ones life. I was beginning to doubt the ease with which Malak assured me this trap could be laid. If I had known the full extent of this job beforehand, I would never have agreed.

It was too late now. Malak was sure to kill me if I opted out. I'd just have to make sure I succeeded.
"Malak," a deep female voice called up ahead, and Darth Malak stopped in front of me, his black cloak swirling around him.

He bowed. "Master," he acknowledged gravely.

Just the person I didn't want to run into. I cursed inwardly, as the Dark Lord of the Sith herself walked around her apprentice and appraised me. She wore no mask, for once, just a midnight hood casting her face into obscure shadows.

Her black eyes were pits of soullessness in a marked face of depravity. Unfamiliar fright iced my spine as I suddenly felt pinned by that gaze, helpless as a tach beneath a spear, staring into the depths of perdition.

Kiribi is 099,099,011, I thought desperately. Saleucami is 08,05,29. Coruscant is 0,0,0. I continued on, forcing my mind to rattle off a litany of hyperspace coordinates, focusing on the numbers and nothing else.

There were certain mental tricks one could do to fly under the radar of a mental Force probe. It wouldn't stop an overt psychic attack, but it might be enough to convince her of my insignificance.

Maybe.

"And who is this?" she rapped out.

"His name is Calo Nord, Master," Malak said smoothly. "He is a renowned bounty hunter, and I have hired him to infiltrate the smuggling ring around Exinar."

The lies glided effortlessly out of Malak's mouth. I couldn't look away from those swirling lightless eyes, and I saw the birth of malevolence, of rage, darker than all the hells in the galaxy, burning in her black, black eyes.

"You're moving against Exinar without informing me?" Her voice had dropped to a raspy, dangerous tone. The hairs on my neck stood up, and I wouldn't have been able to speak even had she demanded it.

"Of course not, Master." Malak tilted his head in concession. "We are at the planning stage only. I would not take another step further without consulting you."

"Good." The word was a hiss. And then, like a flick of a switch, the fury in those eyes vanished. A smirk twisted her shadowed face. "Perhaps you can now. Come with me."

She turned and walked away, and Malak followed.

…

A feeling of shocked disbelief whirled inside my mind. No, it can't be! Can it? The eyes were different... but the look was the same. The same hideous, twisted, fury. I quickly recalled the structure of Jen Sahara's face, and tried to match it in my mind. Darth Revan's skin was sickly, pale white. But the cheekbones are the same. Identical slanting eyes, and standard forehead. Small nose, and pointed chin.

Bastila was protecting Jen Sahara. Bastila was the one who faced Darth Revan, and somehow escaped Lord Malak's attack. Was it possible that Bastila had also saved the life of Darth Revan herself? The Jedi are cowering fools. Is it conceivable that the Jedi somehow rescued Darth Revan, and now have her under their power?
The similarities in her face were too close. And that same look of rage...

Darth Malak needs to be told about this.

xXx
I sipped my caffa slowly as I stared blankly out the cockpit window. I found it almost hard to believe that we'd actually made it – recovered Bastila and escaped a Sith blockade – and were now on our way to safety. It seemed that everything had fallen perfectly together in one last rush. Even the hit to the Ebon Hawk was minor; the astromech droid had confirmed what was displaying on the navicomputer – other than our communications relay, the rest of the ship was sound.

It was the devastation we'd left behind that stopped me from feeling any joy. It didn't matter how many times I'd seen this sort of onslaught, it was always the damn same – innocent people being slaughtered under the banner of conquest. Every time I was confronted with the burning ruins of civilization, I only had to close my eyes and it would morph into the ruins of Telosian architecture.

Telos. My home planet. Bombed into oblivion by the Sith three years ago, so viciously that the atmosphere acidified and left it uninhabitable. I forcibly turned my thoughts away, unwilling to, yet again, dwell on the darkest part of my past.

But Taris… it'd been hit before, during the Mandalorian Wars, and had survived the economic aftermath only by negotiating an uneasy truce with the Sith. There'd been a push in the Senate to offer Taris Republic status some years back. Its geographic location near some of the primary hyperspace routes in the Outer Rim made it a logistical gem, but as I understood it, too much political wrangling on both sides had deadlocked that suggestion. I sighed. Republic citizenship may have alleviated this mess, or the Sith may have simply attacked earlier, when the escape pods of the Endar Spire had first rained down on Taris.

My eyes slid to Bastila, who was deep in thought, knees tucked up under her chin in the co-pilot's chair. She looked young, so young, even though I knew her to be in her mid-twenties. The Sith attacked to get at her. It was a grim thought, but I couldn't think of any other objective. Darth Malak had laid waste to the Endar Spire, all to capture Bastila. When she escaped to Taris, the Sith descended and quarantined the planet. Had Malak's patience worn thin enough that he'd fire on a neutral planet just in the hopes of killing one Jedi? But Bastila Shan wasn't just one Jedi. She was an emerging icon of Jedi heroism, whether she knew it or not. Her star was rising, much like Revan's and Malak's once had, and the galactic news loved nothing more than to speculate on the strength of her battle meditation.

I'd seen the effects of her talents before, and it was hard to explain. Every soldier affected felt braver, their focus sharper, and their reflexes honed. Somehow, risky manoeuvres paid off, while the defense of the Sith would blunder, seemingly stymied by relatively weak attacks. Battle meditation couldn't pull victory out from a lost cause, but it could tip the scales. And it had, more than once.

Which made it all the more questionable why the Jedi and the Republic would risk her on a secret mission. I'd had little success at gaining any information about why the Endar Spire had been travelling to Tatooine, other than the standard Jedi Business riposte. I'd been a figurehead there, ostensibly keeping an eye on the pilots, but in reality doing a terrible job at engaging the Jedi onboard in any sort of tactical discussion. I grimaced, glancing back to Bastila again. She had been conspicuous with her absence back then, avoiding most of the command discussions and leaving... them to Master Galdea, the senior Jedi who blandly stated on numerous occasions that Bastila was the effective commander of the mission. It seemed like he wanted to ensure Bastila had authority, in case she was ever required to make snap decisions without any consultation.

I frowned. That didn't really make sense, either, although I assumed it had something to do with her battle meditation again. I wondered if, now that we had idle time, it would be possible to draw her into conversation.

"So," I began, feeling slightly awkward. "Dantooine. You mentioned a Jedi enclave?"

Bastila blinked, as if coming out from deep thought, and turned to face me. "I- yes. It is not widely known. The home of the Order is located on Coruscant, of course, but we do have Enclaves and Academies further afield. Dantooine is my home Enclave."

I nodded. "It seems our communications are down, so we won't be able to give anyone foreknowledge of our arrival."

"Oh," she replied, and looked a little lost.

I grunted. I would have liked to contact Admiral Dodonna after these weeks of silence, but hyperspace communication wasn't the most reliable at the best of times. A warble from behind had us both turning to face the astromech, and a message illuminated briefly on a small display panel he was facing towards us.

"The relay's totally fried," I muttered, reading his second diagnostic. "No comms at all, no chance of repairing it onboard without replacement parts, even if we had a mechanic. Sourcing the parts shouldn't be a problem on Dantooine." The rest was the same as earlier; apart from some minor damage to the hull's main shields, the ship was fine. "As long as a lack of comms isn't a problem landing."

"Dantooine is a farming community. We may receive a fine and reprimand for not announcing our atmospheric entry, but that can be resolved once we dock," Bastila answered. I nodded in response. Some ports were overtly hostile to incoming traffic that didn't negotiate with spaceport control. Manaan tended to claim control of any unknown ships, while Nar Shaddaa just fired on everything that hadn't paid in advance.

"From there, what happens to the ship? The crew?"

"What do you mean, Carth?" Bastila replied, frowning. I sighed at her ignorance. She was either showing a remarkable lack of foresight, or she was too deep in whatever Jedi ruminations were running through her mind to adequately consider our situation.

"Look, the Mandalorian is liable to claim the ship is his and do a runner. Mission's just lost her home." That made me pause. She'd be taking it terribly, all her friends behind, with no knowledge if they survived the bombardment. I'd have to go check on her soon. "I- I guess she and Zaalbar are going to follow Jen, who's not exactly acting like herself in case you hadn't noticed."

Bastila's face had paled, and whether it was due to the thought of Ordo pinching the Hawk or Jen's erratic behaviour I didn't know. Jen was still out cold, I'd found out earlier when I'd brewed a quick cup of caffa in the kitchenette. It had been hours since the hyperspace jump, and her injuries from the mad dash through Davik Kang's stronghold had been minor – she should have been awake by now. Maybe her body needed a break from acting like different people. I scowled.

"Jen is one of my crew," Bastila said at last, and her voice was quiet and low. "Her employment contract is with the Jedi Order, and she is under our protection."

I could feel my brows lowering with irritation. Not so long ago, Jen had seemed determined to run; run from Bastila and the Jedi and the Republic. It had disappointed me… angered me, even, that she'd turn her back on a mission so obviously critical to the war effort, even if I didn't understand why her skill set would assist the likes of Bastila Shan. But now, this meek game she was playing… and, it had to be a game. The only other conclusion would be that Bastila was using the Force to manipulate Jen into submission. Bastila was uptight, inexperienced and occasionally snappish, but the thought of Bastila manipulating the Force like that on Jen seemed bordering on paranoia.

Even though I'd known Jedi in the past who'd turned into monsters they never would have dreamed of, it was a lot more likely that reckless Jen was the one at fault here. And that bugged me. Scratch that, Onasi, how about it straight out pisses you off. Our interactions had hardly been peaceful, but I owed Jen my life, as much as she owed me hers. She was amazingly competent, scholar or not, and would be an asset to the war effort. She'd be better off fighting as a soldier than helping the Jedi with research. It just didn't... fit with her character.

Except it did, back on the Endar Spire, I realized that with a cold clarity that had me straightening in my seat. I'd seen her only a few, brief times; only taken note of her really because her transfer onboard had been at the direct order of the Jedi team, and the lack of any other scholars made it stand out. I recalled her, once or twice, blushing in my direction before scurrying away, but all those impressions had disappeared since our explosive crash landing on Taris and the days that followed.

She was the epitome of a quiet, shy scholar from a backwater planet, then. And that is exactly how she has been acting since we rescued Bastila. No, no, it was the day after Bastila joined us, but the timing might still be significant. I frowned. Do the Jedi scare her for some reason? The thought of the Jen Sahara I knew running scared seemed ridiculous. But she wanted to run from Bastila. Is this some game to lull Bastila into complacency before she runs?

I didn't like thinking ill of Jen, which was stupid in itself, considering how reckless her words and actions sometimes were. My thoughts were turning full circle in on themselves, and the introspection was starting to irritate. But, just as I decided that it was time to leave the cockpit, Bastila spoke up.

"What do you think of Jen, Carth?"

I twitched slightly at the question, unnerved how accurate it was with my current thoughts, and bit out a blatant lie. "I generally try not to."

I turned to see Bastila raising an eyebrow at me. "Really, Carth. You've been working with her for what- weeks now? Surely you must have some idea of her character."

I sighed, raking a hand through my hair. It was getting long, I realized, and overdue for a cut. "I don't know. She's a loose cannon, Bastila. I mean..." I trailed off, still trying to figure the damn woman out in my head. "I just can't imagine her locked up in some learning institute, studying."

Bastila's voice turned tentative. "Has she been very angry?"

I frowned, turning to look at her. "Angry? Heh. Yeah. She seems to get angry at everything." But that wasn't really fair. Generally, Jen was sassy more than anything. Her inability to take things seriously was, at times, galling, even if it did occasionally lighten the mood. "Maybe that's not entirely true, Bastila. She's reckless more than anything. Brave, too." The rancor in the sewers sprang to mind. "She can be generous." The money she threw away on that harassed merchant was an indicator of that. "Annoying." She had an innate ability to hound and exasperate me. This current meek act was the worst, even if it was directed at Bastila. "Really annoying." Stang, I'm rambling. I sighed. "She's just crazy, Bastila. Recklessly crazy."

Bastila was staring at me with a peculiar expression on her face.

"What?" I snapped.

"Never mind," she replied, but her dark eyes still bored into mine questioningly.

"I'm going to check on Mission." I stood, realizing my departure was somewhat abrupt, but the conversation was beginning to feel uncomfortable. I hadn't yet walked around the freighter, either, although I was already familiar with the layout thanks to the ship's computers.

I left the cockpit and headed down the utilitarian durasteel corridor towards the centre of the ship. A small room, likely the pilot's quarters, was on my left, and further ahead the corridor spilled out into the central common room I'd gone into earlier. It was the largest area in the ship, excluding the cargo bay, and housed a kitchenette on one wall, tatty plimfoam benches around the exterior and a large plasteel table. It was obviously the hub of the freighter, and boasted five exits. One led to a small storage room, and the other four were the main corridors within the ship.

It was empty, although I spotted a dirty dish on the kitchenette bench, and the food synthesizer's heating light was still on. I hadn't thought of eating, yet, not while the destruction of Taris sat so heavy in my mind, but it was comforting to realize that at least we didn't have to worry about the bare necessities.

I briefly poked my head into the small supply room, and was surprised to see a hard bed in there and shelves stocked with medical supplies. At a pinch, this could easily double as a medbay. If this room was anything to go by, then the crime lord Davik Kang had kept his ship well equipped and was used to trouble.

I wandered further around the ship, curious about the cargo bay and it's contents, and stopped when I saw the large form of Canderous throwing what looked suspiciously like short knives at the far wall. What, he doesn't like the décor? After further inspection, I noticed the Mandalorian had hooked up a half-tattered combat suit on the wall that had obviously seen better days. Several knives stuck jaggedly out of it.

"Trying to improve your aim, Ordo?" I muttered.

Canderous turned around to appraise me, and grinned. Before I could blink, he had drawn another knife and thrown it in my direction. I couldn't quite hide a jump of surprise as the blade thwacked into the wall half a metre from my head. It quivered.

"Sithspit!" I growled, glaring at him. "Are you trying to start a fight, Mandalorian?"

He laughed. "If I was, you'd already be down on the floor, Republic."

I scowled at him, inwardly debating the merits of taking this further, before pulling the knife out of the wall with a grunt. It was well balanced and unadorned; a weapon rather than a decoration. I pocketed it and left the room, Canderous' mocking laughter following me down the ship's corridor.

There were two living quarters on either side of the freighter, and it was the port one where I heard the sounds of quiet sobbing. Mission. She was so young to have to deal with something like Taris. Another reason why those Sith bastards had to be stopped by any means possible.
I wasn't sure if my presence would help or make things worse, but I had to try. I opened the door and found Mission curled up in Zaalbar's arms, her face pressed tightly against the snarled fur of the Wookiee.

Zaalbar looked up as I approached, frowning. He rumbled something gently to the Twi'lek, who lifted her head to face me.

"Hi Carth," she sniffed, rubbing at red-rimmed eyes that stood out in stark contrast to her pale blue complexion.

"Hey," I said softly as I took a step closer. "Uh, you okay?" It was a stupid question, and I winced. I was useless in situations like this, but I felt terrible for the girl. I knew all too well the pain she would be feeling. In the corner of my eye, I noticed the prone form of Jen slumped on one of the two bottom bunks in the room.

"N-not really. I still can't believe it. All my friends… everything… I don't even know how bad it is. It looked like the whole place was going up in flames!" She dropped her face into her hands, and the old grief tore at my insides. Taris would be rebuilt over time, perhaps, but it would keep the scars. Just like it had in the past.

"I don't know what to say," I said helplessly. I suddenly didn't know why I had come here. Words had never helped me, either. But I hated to see the kid go through what I had once.

"I don't really think there's anything you can say. I just have to find some way to deal with it, I guess." Her voice was muffled against Zaalbar's chest. The Wookiee was glaring at me; I wondered whether my words were just upsetting the Twi'lek more. She muffled another sob against Zaalbar. "I don't know how people can move on from something like this."

"You- you do," I responded hesitantly. "But it takes a long time. And part of it always stays with you."

"How would you know?" she snapped angrily, her mood swinging abruptly as she twisted to glare at me. Zaalbar growled, less impressed with my presence than ever. I sighed in the face of her anger. Why did I say that? I don't want to talk about the past. All it does is rip open scabbed-over wounds.

"My home world was destroyed by the Sith," I said flatly. Don't ask anymore. Please.

Mission's face had turned even paler, if that was possible. Her mouth shaped into a circle; her eyes widened as she stared at me in shocked surprise. "Oh! I-I'm sorry. I guess you do understand then, don't you?"

The sudden sympathy that grew on the Twi'lek's face humbled me. I don't need pity. But... that she would feel bad for me when it's her own home busy burning... I understood then that Mission had a very big heart.

I looked around for a distraction – the quarters were stark, plain, and empty other than the blankets on the beds – and my eyes caught once more on Jen's sleeping figure.

"She's been out like a drunk since we boarded the Ebon Hawk," Mission said, and her voice had lowered in tone. "Bastila said she just fainted from exhaustion, but Jen ain't waking up. It's been hours now!"

Zaalbar rumbled something in his language, and Mission turned her tear-streaked face to nod at him in agreement. "Neither do I, Big Z."
"Well, I guess if Bastila thinks she's okay-" I began.

"I think Bastila's hiding something. Jen's been weird ever since the Jedi joined us," Mission muttered.

I frowned as I stared at the girl. It was the same conclusion I'd had, before tossing it out as ridiculous. I didn't trust Bastila, but I trusted the wild, reckless Jen even less. "Bastila's a Jedi, Mission. This meek act of Jen that's driving us all crazy must be some mind game Jen's playing with Bastila."

Mission scowled at me and shook her head, headtails twitching in irritation. "No way, Carth. I know Jen. She hasn't been herself. And Bastila has something to do with it."

"You've only known her for about a week, Mission," I answered, in what I hoped was a reasonable tone.

"Sometimes that's all you need! Geez, Carth, where's your loyalty? Jen saved your life!"

Don't start an argument, I warned myself as I stared back at the irate teenager. "I can't – you can't ignore someone's faults just because they did you a good turn." I struggled to keep my tone neutral. "There is nothing worse than blind trust, Mission."

"Blin- how dare you, you overgrown nerf-herder!" she spat. Zaalbar growled loudly at me. "Jen's been nothing but good to us all – saved both your life and Big Z's! And now she's having some sort of problem – and it's got to do with that snooty, sneaky Jedi – and you want to just walk away? What sort of friend are you?"

I backed out of the door before my own anger boiled over. Zaalbar looked like he was ready to jump to his feet. Obviously Jen had captured both their trust, well and truly. "I see I'm upsetting you, Mission. I'm sorry, I didn't mean to do that. I- I'll talk to you later."

I exited through the door, and Mission yelled out another curse as my back. I could hear the Wookiee rumble something to her as I walked quickly away. Nice one, Onasi, I thought, wishing I'd left well enough alone. Let's go upset the girl who's just seen her homeworld burn. But I hadn't quite predicted the depths of Mission's loyalty to someone as unpredictable and downright crazy as Jen. The Wookiee had that life-debt thing, and I knew Mission respected Jen, but it surprised me she was so willing to think badly of a Jedi. What if it isn't an act? What if Bastila really has done something to Jen? No... it just didn't seem plausible. I didn't trust the Jedi and their motives, but that was going too far.

Bastila has been totally protective of Jen as well. Which further enforced the theory that it was all a conscious act; for some reason Jen wanted Bastila's loyalty. As well as Mission's and Zaalbar's. Mission could be setting herself up for a betrayal.

I scowled angrily at myself, and headed back to the cockpit, resolving to put all thoughts of Jen Sahara firmly from my mind.

xXx

The Ebon Hawk was not a standard Dynamic-class freighter, I was beginning to realize, having spent some time poring over both the diagnostics Teetree had produced and the specifications from the ship's computer. It had been highly modified, particularly for manoeuvrability and speed, and boasted a reinforced hull and more shielding than was custom for a ship this size. It had two turbolaser turrets that Mission and the Mandalorian had commandeered during our escape from Taris, as well as the capability for firing proton torpedoes from the pilot's seat.

We were nearing Dantooine, and everyone had had a good chance to sleep. Bastila had been quick to claim the pilot's quarters, and frankly I wasn't up to the argument. Technically, she was my commanding officer still, and after her capture on Taris I could understand if the young woman required a little space.

Which left me bunking in with the Wookiee and the Mandalorian, and the quarters already had a faint pungent smell of wet fur. I wasn't looking forward to cleaning out the sonic refresher, although, all things considered, our stay on the 'Hawk should be brief. Dantooine was an Outer Rim world not that far from Taris, and I wondered just what my orders would be when we finally touched down and I made contact with Republic command.

I'd spotted Jen once earlier, eating a bowl of synthesizer mush in the common room next to Bastila on one of the benches. The Jedi had been quietly murmuring something to her, but stopped when I'd entered, so like an idiot I'd turned and headed back to the cockpit. Mission had been conspicuous with her absence, and I could only imagine that she was huddled in what had become the women's quarters, dealing with her grief in her own way.

I'd had a brief scout around in the cargo bay, this time encountering both the Mandalorian and the Wookiee inspecting the first of several crates roped against the inner hull. There would be time for a full inspection upon landing, and I wondered idly what surprises Davik Kang had left in store for us.

But now I was back in the cockpit, and we were nearing endgame. I felt a slight loosening in my shoulders with the realization that safety was not far away.

The hatch opened and Bastila strode in, giving me a small smile before skirting around Teethree and seating herself in the co-pilot's chair. A minute ago, I'd broadcast the message that everyone was waiting for: brace for hyperspace exit in five minutes.

"I am looking forward to some rest," Bastila murmured, as she strapped herself into the safety harness. "I only wish I had been able to forewarn the Masters of our impending arrival."

I inclined my head briefly. "We were lucky, though. The damage could have been worse. Much as I don't like to credit the Mandalorian, he was an ace on those turrets."

I heard an audible sniff as I kept my attention firmly on the navigational readouts. "I am sure he has seen a lot of bloodshed," came the rejoinder.

I felt the corner of my mouth turn up at her prim tone. Neither of us were particularly keen on Ordo, and I was sure the feeling was returned. In fact, he didn't seem to care for anyone, other than exhibit a vague fascination with Jen which irked for some reason.

"What will you do when we land on Dantooine?" Bastila asked, interrupting my train of thought.

"Patch a message through to Admiral Dodonna and await my orders," I said, surprised at the question. I would have expected that to be a fairly obvious course of action.

"You would not be willing to stay with the Jedi mission?" Bastila questioned. "I am sure the Council will send another group of Jedi knights to Tatooine. We must continue our quest, Carth."

"The Endar Spire was a heavy price to pay for that, Bastila. And the secrecy's obviously gone, so you have to ask yourself: are these old ruins you are hunting really worth it?" Too many people had died onboard. People I'd known well, strangers I'd only just met. What could be so important about Bastila paused, and I turned to look at her. Her face was ice. "Darth Malak awaited us at a refuelling point, Carth. He may not know that our destination was Tatooine. And as far as the old ruins go, the answer is a resounding yes. It may be our only hope of defeating Malak's armies."

Admiral Dodonna had imparted the importance of the Jedi mission beforehand, but it was good to hear it confirmed from Bastila. It had been frustrating, on the 'Spire, to be treated as an inferior grunt by the Jedi onboard, and told little other than what was already known. "What's so special about these ruins then, Bastila? What sort of Force power do they have?"

"I did not mention anything about the Force," she snapped.

I sighed in exasperation. "It's pretty obvious, Bastila. What else could stop Malak?"

She sniffed, and it was a haughty sound. I found myself rolling my eyes as I turned back to the instrumentation panel. Bastila had a habit of retreating into a supercilious prissy shell when questioned, and it was at those times I found myself disliking her.

"Very well, then. Yes. But I cannot say more."

I tried to shrug away my irritation, and remembered Dodonna's directive. The lack of clear information I'd found out about this mission was galling, to say the least."So why did you Jedi need Jen then?"

Bastila made some sort of high-pitched noise in her throat; I jerked my head to catch her expression, but it was bland and unforthcoming. "She is a talented scholar, Carth. She happens to know a lot about the archaeological period of these ruins."

"More than Jedi Masters?" I said in disbelief. "Come on, I know some of those old farts spend all their time researching the past."

"You should show more respect for the Masters, Carth!" she hissed. "How dare you malign-"

"Okay, okay!" I raised my hands in defeat. "Sorry! I- Look, I don't like being left in the dark. Not too mention that Jen doesn't seem to fit in with your whole mission, no matter how much you harp on about her education."

But the sensor on the cockpit terminal drew my attention away – our time in hyperspace had come to an end. I leaned over to open the ship-wide communicator.

"Brace for hyperspace exit in twenty seconds," I broadcasted. I heard Bastila lose a pent-up breath, and I echoed her before guiding the ship out of hyperspace.

The minute-long deceleration was briefly dizzying, but as every second ticked by I felt myself relax an inch more, until the ship entered realspace fully.

Then the sensors went berserk. Flashing lights blinked into existence on the consoles, and the sharp red of laser fire spat on either side of the cockpit window. A proximity alarm in the ship began wailing.

"Stang!" I cursed, steering the 'Hawk abruptly to the left as I spotted a squadron of smaller snubfighters. Ahead, the green planet of Dantooine was prominently visible, and in between us and her was the ominous sight of a half dozen Sith destroyers.
"Get on the turrets!" I yelled through the comm as three fighters ahead abruptly changed their trajectory towards us. "We have Sith fighters!"

"No!" Bastila half screamed, half gasped.

I tilted the freighter up and around, knowing at once that our only chance was to flee. Even as the 'Hawk twisted away, another small squadron of light fighter craft became visible, and the console was showing far too many for any hope of our survival.

"The Force," Bastila muttered numbly. "I can feel the Masters using the Force."

"Bastila, enter a hyperspace route. Anything. Just get us out of here!"

I vaguely heard the sound of turret fire start up. Ordo got to the turrets. It might buy us some time, but we were sitting gizka out here, defenceless against this sort of manpower.

"No!" Bastila protested, and her voice was anguished. "I must help – my battle meditation can help the Order!"

"There is no way we can survive out here in a freighter!" I yelled. "A hyperspace jump is our only option!"

"They are bombing the Enclave, Carth! I cannot- I will not run!" she cried. "I do not know where else to turn! I must see the Masters!"

The Ebon Hawk jolted heavily, and a warning alarm joined the proximity one. A hit, dammit. "Are you trying to kill us all, Bastila?" I snarled, and leaned over to the co-piloting navigation console, pushing her aside and ignoring her indignant gasp. The Ebon Hawk had a short list of pre-programmed hyperspace coordinates, and the third one proclaimed the smallest travel time. I stabbed that one in, and turned my attention back to steering as the computer calculated the route from our current location.

"Entering hyperspace in ten seconds!" I broadcasted through the comm. Dantooine was behind us, and I turned the sub-light drives to maximum, heading out into black space. In front of us dropped a squadron of hostiles, all firing. The console blinked a navigational completion code.

"Hold on!" I yelled over the comm and entered hyperspace.

"No! Carth – we're going to hit them!" Bastila screamed as the ship jumped forward. The enemy ships ahead seemed to stretch as our craft surged ahead. I tensed my shoulders as one fighter came closer and closer, and I swore I could almost see the elongated helmet of the pilot.

I pulled back tightly on the steering column, and the ship lurched upwards as it jumped fully into hyperspace. Bastila's shrieks rang through my ears as the enemy craft shot underneath the Ebon Hawk.

A minute later, our view snapped into the serene blackness of hyperspace.

xXx
Ice was curdling in my veins as I sat in stark horror. The Ebon Hawk was now flying meekly through hyperspace, and Carth was muttering over the consoles. All I could think of was Dantooine.

And Revan.

Who is still alive? What do I do? I'd only once felt as helpless as I did right now, and that was back on Taris. Collared and sedated.

Dantooine, under attack? I could barely believe what I had seen. Why? Why is this happening? My resolve and confidence were faltering; cracking. Master Vrook? Vandar? Nemo? I thought of all the Jedi I knew back in the Enclave, and a dark sickly grief surged through me.

Despair is one of many roads to the Dark Side, child. Nemo had said that to me, once. You must have faith in the Force.

I could not succumb; now, more than ever, I needed to be strong. Logically I knew that the Jedi masters would survive the attack on Dantooine, and possibly triumph. I felt numerous masters using the Force back there. If I could have helped... despite common sense telling me that Carth had been correct in his course of action, I could not stop the bitter anger at his quick jump into hyperspace. I feel like we betrayed the Enclave in their darkest hour.

It seemed Malak had split his fleet to attack both Dantooine and Taris jointly. But why? It is not a clever move. Dantooine is a civilian target, for all that it is a member of the Republic. Surely this will rally other Rim worlds to declare against the Sith. Malak may not have been the tactician Revan once was, but he certainly wasn’t a floundering idiot. He knows a direct assault on Dantooine would be unlikely to succeed, even by surprise. The Force is too strong there. Had the Dark Side twisted him so fully that he was content to destroy parts of his Fleet against a planet he would not be able to conquer?

Or was he after some other objective?

My blood ran cold. What if our mission really had been betrayed? What if he knows we have learnt about the Star Maps, and his target was the master Star Map? That made horrible sense. Without the Dantooine Star Map, there would be no markers to the other four worlds. We had, however, already downloaded the data from the ancient Rakatan relic, thanks to Master Nemo’s scouting team. Only a handful of Jedi knew about the Star Maps, and near all of them were masters. Could a Jedi have betrayed us? Turned to the Dark Side, without anyone knowing?

Was it possible for there to have been a spy in our midst?

What is done, is done. You can only make the best of what happens next. Funny how my father’s words still came back to counsel me, even though I had last seen him at the tender age of seven. I pushed my emotions away and struggled for a calm the seemed impossible against the well of horror and anger that was surfacing. There is no emotion, there is peace. I must find a way forward.

I felt my lips pinching in resolution, and turned to face Carth. His expression was dark with concern.

“Where are we headed?” I asked, and my words sounded cold even to my own ears. I must hold on to this calm.

“Tatooine,” he replied, and it was in a questioning, almost wondering tone.

Carth looked almost sheepish. “I picked the closest hyperspace route out of the pre-programmed list. They’re all smuggling destinations, so maybe it’s not too surprising. Tatooine is a short jump from Taris, and I daresay this ship was used as a smuggling vessel between the two.”

I leaned back, at a loss for words. The surprise was overwhelming, on top of the despair I was still struggling to tamp down. Is this not a large coincidence? Heading toward the original destination of the Endar Spire. And, thanks to the earlier research of the masters, I knew the rough location of the Star Map on that desert planet. How likely is it for this to occur by chance?

Master Vrook did not believe in coincidences, or luck. I knew well one of his favourite sayings. There are no coincidences. There is only the Force.

Perhaps the Force had led us here.

With that thought in mind, I hardened my resolve and turned back to Carth. “How long do you expect the hyperspace jump to last?”

Carth glanced at the central console. “Two days. Hopefully we can repair the Ebon Hawk when we land.”

I licked suddenly dry lips. “If we will be on Tatooine, then perhaps the mission is not totally over.” The Force had a will of its own. Perhaps… perhaps I was meant to carry on. Perhaps, in stealth and smaller numbers, it would be possible.

Ever since I had escaped from that Brejik’s slimy grasp, the desire for recuperation in safety had been growing. And now, with the shock of the Sith attack on Dantooine, so close after witnessing the destruction on Taris, I could feel an utter well of grief and despair deep within my core. But, I reminded myself, Taris and Dantooine are only two planets. So many more will suffer the same fate if we don’t stop Malak and his ever-growing armada. The Star Maps had to be the answer to defeating Malak, and it seemed like I was being given an opportunity to uncover the next part of the puzzle.

Carth had turned sharply to face me at my words, a frown darkening his face. “You want to complete a mission the Jedi Council had originally sent a dozen knights to accomplish?”

“Perhaps a covert approach would work,” I said absently, my thoughts racing. The Endar Spire had been a large taskforce in the case of Darth Revan returning, which had once seemed highly improbable. And only I and Galdea knew about her. Not even my old friend Kylah was informed, despite our long acquaintance. And now, with the danger of Revan’s re-emergence seeming like a distinct possibility, maybe the idea of striking out for the Star Map was as ludicrous as Carth’s tone seemed to be suggesting.
“A covert approach?” Carth retorted, and his voice was incredulous. “Isn’t that what the Endar Spire was meant to be?”

I didn’t answer; my thoughts were still whirling. But it would not take more than a few days, at most. The masters had derived the location of the Tatooine Star Map to be in one of the old caves in the Eastern Dune Sea, very close to the small settlement of Anchorhead. Force relics had been placed there in the past, and the presence of Revan and Malak had been sighted in Anchorhead shortly after their return from the Mandalorian Wars. Manaan’s Star Map, too, was known, thanks to the Republic Embassy who had so recently discovered an archaeological site near their secret kolto base. This is too much of an opportunity to cast away. Despite my fear... despite Revan... it seems like this must be my course of action.

The reminder that I was alone, with Darth Revan temporarily held at bay by the fracturing identity of a shy scholar, slammed the crawling fear back into my body. I had talked to her briefly some hours ago, and sensed no anger, no wildness, nothing but the meek shell of the scholar who had once existed. Yet that was merely a small reassurance - for when I thought upon the dark emotions that had flooded our bond back in Davik Kang’s stronghold, a very real horror gripped me.

I had the terrible feeling that if Revan embraced the Force again, the persona of Jen Sahara would vanish like a child’s ice cone under a desert sun.

I must be rational about this. How could one be rational about the Dark Lord of the Sith, Revan herself? I forcefully swallowed my fear, and reviewed the last day. The only times Revan had escaped the persona of Jen Sahara was when her life was threatened. Hence, I would have to make sure she did not become endangered. Perhaps I should persuade Revan to stay on the Ebon Hawk until I can get in contact with the Council?

At least she had not tried to use the Force. I could block her, I did so instinctively, but she no longer even seemed aware of the Force. Her earlier attempts on Taris had been clumsy, like someone fumbling for the light switch in the dark. Our mind-link gave me sufficient leverage to make sure she never found that switch. Her unbalanced emotional state is to my advantage. And ever since Jen has become her dominant personality, she has not even questioned her own ability. If I could keep her grounded on the Ebon Hawk, then we may very well find our objective, receive our new orders, and leave Tatooine to meet up with the Jedi wherever the closest masters may be.

I breathed in deeply, and turned to face Carth full on, projecting what I hoped was my most calm and commanding tone. I will be strong. The Force will be my ally, and I will be strong. “Carth. There will be a delay on Tatooine regardless, as we repair our communications and contact our superiors. There is a very real opportunity here, and it only takes one Jedi to find what the Council needs on Tatooine. I was your commander back on the Endar Spire. Will you follow me on Tatooine? Will you help with the war against Malak?”

Carth banged a fist down on the controls, hard and sudden. “How can you even ask that, Bastila? Of course I’ll help! But I’d like to know a little more, first!” He was scowling. “Not to mention that I think we should wait until we’ve talked to Republic HQ and the Jedi Council before forging our own way forward!”

“Of course, Carth,” I replied calmly. I could see he was irate, but I would not let it affect me. My emotions were pushed back, firmly under control. “But while we are waiting for the Ebon Hawk to be repaired, we may as well investigate any leads.”

“Look, I-” he broke off, sighing. “I suppose that's fair enough. What is it you're after, anyway?” He still sounded annoyed, and I bit back an exasperated huff. I thought he was military. Used to taking orders, and not questioning his superiors.
“It is a Force relic, as you deduced earlier.” I said no more, and despite a black expression, he seemed willing to let the matter drop for now.

“We should talk to the others,” he muttered. “They need to know where we are headed, and we have very real logistical issues to sort out.”

My thoughts had been whirling through black fear and blind panic, despite my attempts to stay in control. I needed some time alone to strengthen my resolve. But it made sense to hear Carth out.

“What issues?”

“Funding,” he said shortly. “Look – especially if you want to do this quickly and in stealth, how do you expect to repair the ship? Are we going to need any equipment for your mission? And what about Ordo? What’s the blasted Mandalorian planning on doing?”

I blinked; all valid questions I had not yet thought of. I gave Carth a quick nod, he switched to auto-pilot, and we both stood to leave the cockpit.

xXx

The answer to one of our immediate problems was right there, glistening in the form of innocent pre-paid plasteel credit chits. Zaalbar had called me in to the cargo bay as soon as he’d discovered it.

Has the Force so fortuitously offered me a solution? The Wookiee was standing to the side, idly holding a durasteel bar he had used to pry the crate open. The rest of the cargo bay was littered with equipment and open crates, mostly weaponry and armour, but this was the goldmine. I did not want to think on the origin of it, but the Ebon Hawk had been a smuggling freighter, and its profits were likely on the back of the slave trade or worse. Frankly, it was lucky we had not found glitterstim onboard.

“How much is there?” I asked quietly. “Enough to repair the ship?”

“Half of that is mine,” came a gravelly voice from behind, and I stiffened in outrage, turning to face Canderous with a glare.

We were halfway to Tatooine, and the mood of the crew had been somber. Zaalbar and Mission had not reacted strongly to our change of destination, and Revan was deeply bewildered by everything, and more than a little scared. Of herself. It had taken only the smallest amount of Force persuasion to convince her that a sleeping tablet would lull her into a recuperative sleep that would result in her feeling refreshed and calmer.

Ever since I had crashed on Taris, I found myself acting less and less like a Jedi should.

The Mandalorian had been, in a word, frustrating. He was unwilling to divulge his plans thus far, other than claiming he had a half-share in the freighter which Carth and I both hotly objected to. We had been in the process of yet another argument when Zaalbar had interrupted us with this discovery from his inventory of the cargo bay.

“Half? And what, pray, is your argument for this?” I protested.

He was smirking, even as his grey eyes bored into mine. “I got you lot access to this ship. If it wasn’t for me, you’d be lost on Taris amongst the Sith’s plasma.”

“And if it was not for us, so would you!” I retorted, feeling my cheeks flush with anger. It was the same argument we had had regarding the ownership of the Ebon Hawk, and Canderous was not giving ground. But despite his strength, Canderous could not win, not against me, and Carth, and the Wookiee. Perhaps I need to find another solution to this. My eyes slid back to the crate. And perhaps he does have a right to some of it, at least.

“We need to repair the ship, Canderous,” I stated, before he could argue further. “*We may need some basic supplies on Tatooine, as I have an objective to complete. And we do require the Ebon Hawk to leave Tatooine and meet up with the Order.

The Mandalorian folded him arms, and his expression could only be called impassive. “Are you proposing something here, princess?”

I could feel my lips pursing as I looked upon a man I seriously disliked. But his skills were useful, and antagonizing or alienating him would hardly be beneficial. “Assist me in my endeavour. I am on a mission from the Jedi Council, and I would like you to accompany Carth and I into Anchorhead when we land. Whatever chits remain after our purchases can be yours to do with as you will.”

“As I said before, half of those are mine regardless. If you’re offering me a job, then you need to pay me on top of that.”

Mercenaries, I thought with disgust. “I hardly have access to any additional currency here, Canderous. But when we met up with the Jedi Order, I will make sure you are reimbursed for your time.”

He snorted. “The Order pay well, does it?”

“Yes,” I said icily. “Once we have restored communications, I will ensure they know of your assistance – both with leaving Taris, and whatever occurs on Tatooine.”

Canderous was silent for some time, and his gaze rested on both me and Zaalbar before landing again on the open crate resting in the middle of the cargo bay. “There’s not as much there as you’re probably thinking, princess. Enough to repair the ship, if Republic’s right about it just being the relay that’s down. Maybe some supplies on top of that. I don’t see any harm in getting you out of whatever trouble you’re liable to put yourself in, at least until I can find some real work. But there’s still the matter of the ship to sort out between us.”

“I need this ship to leave Tatooine,” I said again. “But it will no longer be required once I meet up with the Order. I do concede you have a stake in this ship. If you accompany us to our final destination, then perhaps we can discuss what happens to the ship at that stage.”

“We will,” he stated, and his gaze was hard. “But… you’ve caught my interest, princess, you and that Jen Sahara both. What, exactly, do you need on Tatooine?”

I let out a small sigh I hadn’t realized I’d been holding in. “The repairs need to be underway first, so Carth and I can contact our superiors. We will land in a small settlement called Anchorhead, and we may require equipment to travel in the desert if there is nothing suitable onboard. Transport, too, although my destination is not far from Anchorhead.”

My eyes closed even as I continued talking. “It should not be difficult nor long.” Darth Malak, presumably, did not know about my escape. But the Endar Spire had been compromised. If Darth Malak was aware of the Endar Spire’s destination, then he will assume other Jedi will travel to Tatooine.
How likely was it he knew? Even if he did not, the attack on Dantooine indicated that he suspected the hunt for the Star Maps was on. Would he believe that taking out the Master Star Map would be enough?

There were too many questions. And the mantle of leadership sat uncomfortably on my shoulders.

I heard Canderous grunt. “All sounds fairly easy, princess. Let Republic organize the ship’s repairs when we land, and you and I can scout around Anchorhead.”

xXx

I was feeling relaxed and at peace when a presence slowly roused in the far reaches of my mind. Revan. She is waking. I breathed in deeply, and stood from my place on the floor. The room I occupied was a small office of some description, perhaps created as the personal quarters of the ship's captain. It seemed a good place for some privacy.

My determination was clear as I stretched, and left the room. We were close, now, to Tatooine, and I had to ensure that Revan stayed safe. Safe, and onboard the Ebon Hawk.

I must ensure Revan listens to me. At any cost.

I found her in the port quarters that the Twi’lek claimed as the women’s sleeproom. The room itself was bare, and cramped with two sets of bunks filling most of the available space. The floor was littered with the bright cards of some sort of game I did not recognize; I wondered if Mission had brought these along on our hasty departure from Taris, or if she had found them in the cargo bay.

I frowned, and made a mental note to check back on the contents of the crates. The Twi’lek had been both a gang member and a street kid, and likely was not above acquiring some of those chits to line her own pockets.

“No, no, that’s a nerf-herder move. I mean, the chances of winning on a score like that - sheesh. I see why you lost so much back on Taris,” Mission was saying as I entered the room. She was sitting cross-legged on the small sliver of floor-space with her back to the door, and opposite her crouched Revan, frowning, as her bright green eyes stared at the cards on the grated durasteel floor.

“I don’t really understand this game,” Revan agreed, looking up as she spotted me. A slight smile appeared on her face.

“C’mon, the basics aren’t exactly rocket science- Oh. Bastila.” The Twi’lek’s voice dropped several degrees as she turned to see what had caught Revan’s interest. Mission’s face was pale and wan, and I was reminded that she, too, had just seen a planet dear to her attacked most viciously. She scowled darkly at me.

We had not started off on the right foot, her and I, and I regretted tripping her with the Force – but I also did not understand why she was disposed to think of me so poorly. The expression on her face told me that my presence was decidedly unwelcome.

“Excuse me,” I said in my most neutral tone. “I require Jen’s attention for a short while.”

“Can’t you see we’re busy?” Mission snapped. Revan glanced uncertainly between us.

“It will not take long, Mission, but I am afraid I must insist.”
At that, Revan pushed herself up to her feet, and so did the Twi’lek. “Jen,” she spluttered. “You don’t have to do what she says, y’know-”

“Actually, she does,” I cut in, and I could hear my voice freezing as my ire rose. She is being unreasonable and immature. This is why we should not have children onboard. “Jen is employed by the Jedi Order, Mission, and therefore answers to me. I have already said that it will not take long. Come, Jen.” I turned briskly and exited, trusting that my words would be enough for Revan to follow.

I strode through the freighter in silence with Revan’s footsteps behind me, feeling vaguely irritated, and wondering how best to repair my relationship with Mission. Perhaps it is not even important. I should not have to waste energy in smoothing the ruffled feathers of a petulant teenager. The only factor that made Mission Vao important was her relationship to Revan, and that was stronger on the Twi’lek’s side than the Human’s, I believed.

I waited until Revan had followed me into the pilot’s quarters I had claimed, and closed the hatch firmly behind her. I motioned her to sit on the bed, and followed suit.

“Jen,” I began. “I wanted to have a talk before we landed on Tatooine. We will be there for a few days only, before leaving to rendezvous with the Order again. During this time I will be engaged in a scouting trip with Canderous Ordo and Carth Onasi. You must stay onboard at all times, Jen. We require someone to guard the ship, and it is my job to ensure you are safe.” Dared I use the Force to strengthen my commands? It was becoming a habit to keep her contained this way, and I knew, on some level, that it was not right. Stripped of her affinity with the Force, and attached to me via our bond, Revan was a great deal more susceptible to any Force suggestions I made. It was so very tempting to use that opportunity.

But was it necessary? Was it risky? Would she become aware of it? The questions made my stomach lurch.

Revan was staring at me with her bright green eyes, nodding. Jen Sahara’s expressions made her look younger, closer in age to myself or the original scholar. I took a deep breath.

“How are you coping, Jen?”

“I-I am so confused,” she whispered, and her words mirrored her emotions through the bond. “I feel like I don’t know who I am.” There was no anger I could sense, only a whirling puzzlement that was almost choking in its intensity. She could not understand her actions or behaviour, and was scared. I had bought myself some time with the sleeping tablet, but the real risk would be on Tatooine, when I left her onboard.

The Wookiee had already assured me he would not leave her side, and it made me grateful for the life-debt he had sworn.

“You are Jen Sahara, a scholar from Deralia who has been employed by the Jedi Order,” I said, looking at the woman sitting next to me. Her expression was downcast, and her posture hunched in on itself. If it were not for our battles on Taris, I would have believed she was the same meek academic she had been on the Endar Spire. Whatever that crackpot doctor had done to her on Taris seemed to have been a real blessing in disguise.

Revan glanced up at me again, a slight frown on her face. “I don’t understand everything that has happened. This- it all feels like a dream, somehow. Or a nightmare.”

I placed my hand on her knee gently. “It is the same for all of us, I suspect. We have all been through a lot. But do not despair, Jen, for we will not be long on Tatooine.” I paused, wondering if I needed to reassure her further. “The Jedi have mind healers also. They can help much as your doctor did, back on Taris.”

Revan’s expression froze, and I felt a sharp blast of emotion through the bond, so quick that I could not decipher it. I reached out to the Force in panic, and Revan moaned, her hands clutching at the side of her head.

Jen Sahara. I am Jen Sahara. The confusion was back, threaded through with fear. But the swift feeling I’d sensed earlier… I could not be sure, but it felt like rage. Black, furious rage.

The fear was deep in my gut, too.

“You will be safe, Jen,” I said shakily, and felt the compulsion twist through my words. “Stay onboard the Ebon Hawk whilst I am outside.”

“Of course,” she whispered, rubbing at her temple. “Of course I will, Bastila. I’ll stay onboard while you’re outside.”

There was a sickly churning in my gut as she parroted my words. This is not the right way. I am letting my fear dictate my behaviour.

I forced a smile on my face. “Good, that’s settled,” I said, a little shakily. I stood, and she followed, her hands dropping to her side. “I suggest you prepare for hyperspace exit, Jen. It will not be far away. I shall leave now to accompany Carth in the cockpit.”

She took a few steps towards the door before hesitating, and looking back at me. Her expression was both apprehensive and questioning.

“Is there something else, Jen?” I asked with a calm I did not quite feel. There were questions she hadn’t thought to ask yet; prime among them was Dantooine. I had convinced Revan - some form of her for it certainly hadn’t been the Jen Sahara that stood in front of me now – that we were headed to Alderaan, not Dantooine. And I cannot forget the sedation, even if she has. Would it occur to her to question her sudden collapse when we had first boarded? She had not questioned it yet.

Revan bit her lip. “Sorry, it’s just that- we’re on Tatooine, now. Where we were going originally.”
She frowned. “I am still unsure exactly what my purpose is to the Jedi, Bastila. Do you- do you need me for anything here?”

I tried to send her a gentle smile. “Not on Tatooine, no. As for your purpose, well, you have studied the era of the Massassi, and that is of interest to us. We are keen to increase your education, Jen. It is not uncommon for the Jedi Order to fund scholars. We look to the past for guidance.”

It was deflection, pure and simple. Jen Sahara’s studies of interest had been the extinction of the Massassi, as well as the formation of the Republic, neither of which had anything to do with the Star Maps. Master Galdea had kept Revan entertained with research onboard the Endar Spire; that was not possible while we were flying blind. Once our communications were repaired and access to the holonets restored, I would be able to divert her in the much same way.

“Oh, okay,” Revan said softly, her gaze dropping from mine. “I’ll leave you be then.”

xXx

Arriving in Anchorhead had not been a problem, and Carth had landed the freighter with ease before exiting to meet up with the docking officials. He had not been away long before returning, shooting me a brief smile as we all clustered in the central common room.

“Alright, let’s head out,” Canderous said, hefting a pack from the cargo bay over a shoulder.

My eyes rested on the young Twi’lek, who alternated between glaring at me, frowning at Carth, and staring worriedly at Revan. Mission’s face was an open book, and I wondered idly if she was cross with Carth for some reason. But the concern toward Revan explained the reason for her anger at me. She was worried about Revan, and believed I was to blame.

If she knew the entirety of the truth, it would blow her childish mind apart, I thought irritably. Mission Vao, I realized, would not take nicely to staying onboard the ship. I looked over to Zaalbar, and understood that the Wookiee was key to them all staying behind.

“We shall not be long,” I told them, standing in the middle of the room. Zaalbar had hunched over the end of one of the benches, plainly too large for the furniture. Mission was sitting next to him, one leg tucked under her chin and the other dangling. Revan sat on her other side. “This is a smuggling destination, and it is not safe even in the town. I will lock the hatch behind us. Mission, Zaalbar, it is best if you stay behind with Jen.”

“Sure thing, Bastila.” Mission replied, and her voice was light and sweet. I did not trust it.

“I am serious, Mission.”

“Sheesh, I said okay!” Mission snapped. “What d’ya want me to do, swear my life on it?”

“A promise would be nice,” I said tightly.

“Fine! I promise I’ll stay on the Ebon Hawk!” She crossed her arms and pouted, and I had to restrain an exasperated sigh. Canderous snorted as he headed towards the exit hatch. I looked over to Carth to see him frowning at Revan, his expression both puzzled and irritated, and I wondered again at the mixed reactions he had for her. His eyes rose to met mine, and he gave a nod of readiness.

I turned, and followed the Mandalorian out of the Ebon Hawk.

xXx
"I'm bored, Big Z. Ain't no way that stuck-up Jedi is telling me what to do." Mission had folded her arms, and her expression was contorted in the stubborn petulance of youth. Although I had expected this reaction from my young friend, I had hoped for more than a mere ten minutes peace. The others had only just departed.

“(Mission, we have been asked to stay on the Ebon Hawk),” I reminded her. I looked over to Jen, sitting on one of those soft brown benches that were not deep enough for my comfort. The human woman was engrossed in a datapad, reading an electronic journal from the Ebon Hawk’s meagre digital library. “(And you promised Bastila Shan that you would stay behind).”

“Only so she'd stop harping at me.” Mission looked disgruntled. “I had my lekku crossed.”

“(Mission!)” I growled. “(A promise is sacred).”

Jen looked up at that, startled, her eyes falling on me before dropping back to the datapad. She was not easy around me, despite our life-debt, and this behaviour was new along with her personality. I did not like it. I found myself wishing for the reckless Jen of old. This one smelled false, and I could not explain why I felt that way. I should be content that Jen was not willing to run blindly into danger anymore.

“Uh uh,” Mission disagreed. “Like that prissy ronto-face would’ve let me go. A promise ain’t worth nothing if it’s forced, Big Z.”

I stared at the Twi’lek cub and realized she was right. Sometimes, Mission came up with wisdom well beyond her years. While Bastila Shan may have had admirable reasons for wanting Mission to stay behind, my young friend would not see a promise made under duress as a worthy one to honour.

“‘Sides, Zaalbar, this is Tatooine! Sheesh, I didn’t really think much about where we were goin’ at first, y’know? Everything’s been so crazy and bad but… but, I’m actually on Tatooine!”

I frowned. I did not know anything about this place, other than what I had heard onboard. A smuggling destination covered in deserts. I did not think I would particularly like it. “(You know of this planet?)”

Mission smiled at me. It was the first smile I had seen since we entered Davik Kang’s stronghold, and it warmed my heart. Her light brown eyes were crinkled with excitement. “Griff used to talk about setting up a trade route between Taris and Tatooine all the time.” Her grin widened, and then she sniggered. “He had this insane idea ‘bout importing live chuba from Tatooine and deep-frying it as a delicacy to the Upper City snobs.”

Mission rarely spoke of her elder brother, and it surprised me that she would now. I had never met him, as Griff Vao had abandoned her on Taris shortly before we met. Although she did not think of it as abandonment, I recalled. She blames his mate instead.

Regardless of whose fault it had been, the end result was the same: a young Twi’lek girl left alone on the streets of the Lower City, with only the dubious protection of a swoop gang who thought her talents were useful.

We had both been fortunate to meet each other.

And now, our lives were tied to Jen Sahara. When I thought of the destruction left behind on Taris, I understood how very lucky Mission and I had been, to meet up with Jen and escape when we did. I glanced over to the human again, and wished I knew a little more about her.

During our brief hyperspace journey, Jen had assured Mission that she was fine, and that Bastila was helping her. I understood that Jen had a commitment of some kind to the Jedi, but my worry was not alleviated. Something has happened to her, and she is acting like someone else. Mission was convinced it had to do with Bastila Shan and the Force, but I was not so certain. My people knew much of the Jedi and the honourable way they acted. I found it hard to believe that the young Jedi would be responsible for Jen’s affliction.

I lowered my voice to a faint rumble. “(Mission, I do not wish to leave Jen).”

I saw Mission’s face set with determination as she, also, turned to look at the human. “Jen,” she said, catching her attention. “Come for a wander into Anchorhead with us?”

Jen pulled her attention away from the datapad briefly. “Uh, no, thank you. I am happy reading.”

There was a dark scowl on my young friend’s face. “Come on, Jen! Have you ever been to Tatooine before? Let's go have a look around!”

“I- I told Bastila I'd stay here.” Jen’s voice was quavering.

“Where's your sense of adventure?” Mission retorted. “You’re the one who conned me into going to the swoop race!”

"(What?)" I growled. Jen conned Mission?

A bewildered expression passed through the human's face. “I- I did? I did. It- it all seems a little hazy.”

“What's Bastila doing to you?”

Jen’s mouth dropped open. “S-she is helping me!”

“Helping you turn into someone with the brains of a Gamorrean and the backbone of a gizka!” Mission snapped, her headtails twitching in around her neck. Mission’s temper was a flashpoint, bright and fiery before dying away. I could tell it was still rising.

“No,” Jen said, shaking her head. “No.”

“(We are worried about you, Jen Sahara),” I rumbled quietly. “(I am sure Bastila is helping. But you have not been well, and you are acting like someone else).”

Jen had dropped her head into her hands, and was mumbling quietly. I did not think Mission could hear the words, but a Wookiee had more sensitive hearing than most sentients. “I am Jen Sahara. This bond isn’t real. I am not hearing her say anything in my head—”

“(Jen?)” I barked as my fur began to stand on end at her strange words. Her head jerked up, and a dark maelstrom of emotions had clouded her piercing green eyes. She stared at me, brows lowering, and for a moment I wasn’t sure if she recognized me at all.

“It’ll be fun,” Mission wheedled. “C’mon. We won’t be long, and Bastila doesn’t even need to know!”

Jen’s gaze flicked to the Twi’lek, and I recognized the roguish expression as it crossed the human’s face. “Okay,” she agreed, and I almost shouted in relief. To think I would be glad to see that reckless look again!

“Wizard!” Mission stood, hopping with delight. “I’ll just go grab some supplies – I’ll be right back!” She darted out of the common room towards the cargo bay, and I frowned, wondering exactly what my mischievous young friend was after. I would have followed her, had I not caught the worried look cross over Jen’s face.

“(You cannot back out now),” I warned her. I almost desired for Mission to drag Jen into trouble.
Anything to shake her out of this foreign identity encompassing her.

Jen nodded, and glanced away. Mission took longer than I expected - considering her enthusiasm - and I was close to leaving Jen again when the Twi’lek rushed back in. She had a smile on her face that I could only describe as wayward, a bag slung over one shoulder, and her arms full of vibroswords. She handed one to both of us, and Jen took hers hesitantly.

“(What did you do?)” I asked, frowning, still dwelling on the suspicious length of time she had taken.

Mission beamed. “Gave Teethree a couple of orders, that’s all.”

“(Orders? What orders?)”

“Just in case the others try to buzz the Ebon Hawk on their wrist-comms, Teethree's gonna patch ‘em a message that we're all having naps.”

“(We will not be long, Mission),” I told her severely. A walk outside would do Jen Sahara good, but I did not discount Bastila Shan’s warning about this area. And the thought of disregarding a Jedi’s orders did not sit well with me.

Innocent wide eyes appraised me. “Gee, Big Z, you sound like you don't trust me!”

She flounced out of the Ebon Hawk, and I could only follow.

Bright desert sunlight hit my vision as I exited the ship, along with a wall of suffocating heat. I had expected the high temperature, but it was still a sharp contrast to the air-conditioned Ebon Hawk. It took a moment for my vision to adjust to the harsh light.

“Teethree, lock the hatch behind us, okay?” Mission spoke through a device strapped on her wrist, and I realized she must have also visited the cockpit to retrieve a communicator. She shot me an impish grin. “Wouldn’t be smart to leave the ship open to anyone, right?”

No. It would have been foolish in the extreme. And neither I nor Jen Sahara had thought twice about leaving the ship empty apart from an astromech droid with no orders, I realized with chagrin.

I looked around as I stood on the loading ramp; the Ebon Hawk was docked in a large, walled off area that was open to the elements. There were a few market stalls set up around the perimeter, perhaps half a dozen clustered near a large archway in the wall that likely led to the township.
Several freighters were stationed on either side of the Ebon Hawk. Sentients dressed in the white and brown uniform of Czerka Corporation stood in the shade of the tall walls, and I found myself glaring. Czerka was a galactic spanning commercial entity with an underbelly as foul as the Exchange. I had no time for anyone affiliated with them.

“Here,” Mission said in a bright voice, having opened her pack to pull out two visors. I noticed one resting on top of her head. “I was having a look at what gear Canderous was taking before. I kinda figured he’d had a good idea of the place, y’know?” She was grinning at both of us.

The contents of the cargo bay had been a surprise, and I had not yet finished opening all the crates. It was mostly armour and weapons, all fairly standard, but it had been the quantity that had surprised me. I wondered if that crime lord had been planning a violent trip somewhere.

I struggled to fit the visor around my head, and eventually gave up, giving it back to Mission in disgust. My eyes had already adjusted, but it made me think about the requirements of our crew and what supplies we had onboard. If we ended up staying on the _Ebon Hawk_ longer than planned, I might be able to modify a combat suit to fit Mission. I had often spent time with the Hidden Beks, patching up broken armour, and seemed to have a talent for it.

Both Mission and Jen were looking around the sandy docking bay; the former with a delighted expression on her face. _This is her first time off-world_, I realized. I was glad we were going for a short explore. Perhaps Mission needed this as much as Jen.

Mission’s face brightened as she spotted the archway that led out of the docking bay. With a grin toward us both, she jumped off the _Ebon Hawk’s_ loading ramp and began walking. I felt a trickle of sweat down my neck, and grumbled softly. As I followed Mission, I noticed that the few sentients walking amongst the docked ships all wore loose clothing over their entire body, topped with head-cloths for protection. _It would not do for us to stay outside in the elements long. Not dressed as we are._

Mission was already at the spaceport exit, chatting to a local Paaerduag, those strange creatures with two heads. The larger head was saying something to Mission in a tongue I did not recognize, with one arm gesturing towards the entrance in the wall. I looked ahead, and could see a few buildings visible of what must be Anchorhead. From here, it did not look large.

“Okay, thanks!” Mission gave him a wave as we walked through the entranceway and into the unfamiliar town. We were on a sandy path lined with stalls that were made from crude tents – no more than thick sticks and pieces of cloth or hide. Above us draped large pieces of lightly-coloured tarpaulin, roped tight between the stalls on either side of us.

Although the heat was still intense, the shade provided by the cover did offer a respite. Not much further ahead were more permanent buildings made from some form of plaster or ferracrete. Overall, the entire place was much less technologically advanced than Taris and with far less people. If it had not been for the temperature, I would not have minded being here despite my earlier reservations.

“(What did the Paaerduag say?)” I asked.

“No idea,” Mission giggled, looking over to me. Her eyes were dancing with delight, and I was so glad to see my young friend happy. “I asked him where the cantina was. I think he understood me, but I guess he doesn’t speak Basic. Say,” and her voice turned speculative, “Jen, did you catch what he said?”

Jen had been walking behind us, and we both turned to look at her. Her face was pale, and her eyes wide. She raised an arm to point further down the path. “The cantina’s over there. First building on the left after the market stalls.”

“Great!” Mission turned back and started on her way again.

“(Are you alright, Jen?)” I asked. She gave me a shaky nod, but her expression said otherwise. I was not one for pushing, but perhaps I would have questioned her further had I not realized how fast Mission was walking. I huffed, and strode quickly after my young friend, with Jen’s stumbling steps following me.

We entered the cantina and I was immediately glad for the drop in temperature due to some form of air-conditioning. There was a faint haze of unpleasant cigarra smoke near the ceiling, and no windows at all. The walls had the odd holo-picture hung up, and the first one I saw was a Czerka advertisement for hunting equipment. Jaunty music played softly from suspended speakers, and in the centre of the room was a floating bar staffed by an Ithorian. I saw a look of despondency pass through my young ward’s face.

“(Mission?)” I questioned softly.

She smiled brightly; falsely. “I’m fine, Big Z. I just – ha! I just expected to see Sancha behind the bar, is all.”

“(I am sorry, Mission),” I said hopelessly. I was not good with words.

“Nah, I’m okay, really.” She sniffed. “Though if I ever get the chance, I’m gonna pay back those scummy Sith back for what they've done.”

“(Do not say that! You do not know who might hear),” I growled at her in warning.

Mission shrugged at me, and I almost had the feeling she didn't care. She turned back to survey the room, walking closer to the bartender who was serving a drink to an older, heavily equipped Twi’lek male. He wore combat armour, and had a vibro-staff strapped to his back, along with at least two visible blasters on his hip.

“Hi!” Mission greeted him, having already strode toward the bar and claimed an empty stool next to the Twi’lek. I kept a wary eye on him and followed cautiously. Whoever this Twi’lek was, he looked combat-ready.

There were very few other people in the cantina, and none of them seemed particularly interested in our arrival. Jen, standing next to me, bit her lip and walked over to Mission’s side.

“(Why, hello there),” the older Twi’lek replied in his native tongue. “(Can I help you?)”

“My name’s Mission. I’m new here, and was wondering if you could tell me a little about Anchorhead?”

The Twi’lek turned around to scan the room at that, his gaze only briefly touching on Jen before landing on me. I saw his eyes widen slightly in surprise, and then flick back to Mission.

“(Welcome to Anchorhead, Mission. My name is Komad Fortuna, and I am a hunter from Fazza’s Lodge. What is it you wish to know?)”

He seemed friendly enough, the old hunter with the golden skin; and his headtails were looped around his neck in a relaxed manner. Although I did not understand the full nuances of the Ryl language, I had spent years around Mission Vao and Zaerdra Leno and could glean the basics of their mood from their posture. Komad was not at all wary of us, and seemed disposed to friendliness. I found myself relaxing.
“Um,” Mission hesitated. “Don’t suppose anyone plays pazaak here?” She looked around the mostly empty room, crinkling her nose. “Guess not. Any swoop racing on Tatooine?”

“(Only illegal races. You would have to travel to Mos Eisley for the organized runs).”

“(Mission),” I grumbled. “(We are not swoop racing).”

Komed Fortuna turned to me as I spoke, but he did not look like he understood, and faced Mission once more. “(There will not be much in Anchorhead to engage someone of your age, I suspect. This town survives on hunting and mining. It is also not the safest place these days.)”

“What d’ya mean?”

“(The natives attack anyone who encroaches on what they perceive to be their territory, which – these days – is getting closer and closer to Anchorhead. They have recently dug another foothold into the dunes only five klicks away from Anchorhead, and the Czerka-hired mercenaries have been unable to shift them. I think it may be a new clan declaring their territory).”

“Sounds like a rough place,” Mission commented, and I growled softly in agreement.

“(It can be),” Komad agreed. “(I am sure you have a good reason for being here, but I would not dally if I were you).”

“What are these natives?” The question came, surprisingly, from Jen, sitting hunched up on Mission’s other side. Komad leaned forward to answer her.

“(They are called Sand People, or Tusken Raiders. They are vicious, mindless monsters).”

“Oh,” Jen replied, and at Mission’s enquiring look, mumbled softly, “I studied a little on them, being the indigenous people of Tatooine. They have lived here for millennia. What is surprising about them is their technology has never really progressed. Water is sacred to them.”

Komed snorted. “(Water is sacred to everyone on a desert planet. It is true that the Sand People target moisture farms first, but here in Anchorhead they seem to be more prolific. They are trying to drive us out).”

“Huh,” Mission replied. “Guess we won’t be heading out into the desert then.”

“(I would not recommend it, no).” Komad replied. “(You would need to purchase a hunting license from Czerka to exit the main gates regardless, and there is nothing out in the desert other than predators and Sand People, and the odd sandcrawler that gets attacked three times a day).”

“Hunting license?” Mission asked. “What, you mean we have to pay Czerka to leave?” Her voice rose in indignation, and I huffed in agreement. Mission was not fond of Czerka, although I could believe that may have been my influence over the years.

Komed chuckled. “(It is not as unfair as it sounds, my young friend. Czerka hire mercenaries to keep the nearby desert clear of predators and Sand People, and they run the hunting trade through Anchorhead. There is no effective government in this small town, and if it were not for Czerka this place would have disappeared years ago).”

“(Czerka Corporation is nothing but a greedy excuse for profit at any cost),” I rumbled in discontent. It pretended to be an affable commercial entity, exporting and importing goods from planet to planet, but I knew better. Czerka Corporation tried to get its evil fingers into every place they could, and strip the indigenous people of their culture, resources and rights.
“(I do not understand your furry friend, but allow me to elaborate),” Komad said, after nodding at me briefly. He seemed like a most unflappable person. “(Czerka run Anchorhead for profit, I do not deny that. And they have no respect or understanding for the honour of hunting. But they do allow us off-world goods, relative safety, and the ability to export the resources on Tatooine. Although I must admit, things have been turning for the worse, lately).” He sighed, and took a large drink from the glass the bartender had placed in front of him earlier.

“The Sand People?”

“(Amongst others. The hulak wraids – they are predators common to this area – are being slaughtered systematically and we cannot find the source. They are important to the ecosystem on Tatooine, so we always make sure to hunt them sustainably – yet I am finding numerous corpses very close to Anchorhead. The deaths are puzzling. Only krayt dragons hunt wraids, and this is not the work of a dragon).” Komad sighed. There was a discontented look on his face. “(And worse, one of the Czerka mining groups returned yesterday, having been soundly beaten by the Sand People. Two miners and a Czerka rep were captured).” Komad’s gaze travelled to the far corner of the cantina, then, where a Twi’lek woman sat hunched over a large drink. “(My partner grieves, for one of them was a man she used to care for dearly. The Sand People are known to kill those that they enslave if a ransom is not sent to them within days).”

“That’s- that’s awful,” Mission gasped, and Jen echoed her. “Why doesn’t Czerka send someone after them?”

“(They may yet, but they are not obliged to. I am afraid that all Czerka employees sign a waiver for cases like this. I would like to mount a rescue operation myself, for my dear Lena’s sake, but I cannot risk it by myself, and no one else is keen to take on the Sand People without remuneration).”

“(Horrible corrupt parasites),” I growled. “(Czerka Corporation cares for nothing but money).”

“Lena,” Mission muttered, and I turned to her in confusion. She was staring at the darkened corner of the room, where Komad Fortuna’s friend sat, head bowed. Mission stumbled backwards off the stool, barely catching herself against a nearby table. Her face had paled in shock. “Lena Torand?”

Mission’s voice had risen in volume enough that the few sentients in the place, including the disconsolate Twi’lek woman in the corner, all took note. I did not know the name Mission called out, but it was obvious by the way the woman was walking closer to us that it belonged to her.

The Twi’lek woman had pale golden skin, her face was heavily covered in cosmetics, and her headtails waxed and decorated in beads and leather braids. Her lips were a full red that was not natural, and her heavily lined eyes were red-rimmed with grief.

“Mission?” the Twi’lek whispered in Galactic Basic as she came within earshot. Komad Fortuna glanced between the two of them, as surprised as I was. “You- you made it to Tatooine, after all? I guess you’ve heard about-”

“Yeah, I made it here alright. Guess you thought you’d never see me again, huh?” Mission’s voice had changed, snarly like a bad-tempered cub’s, and I tensed in reaction. I did not know who this Lena was, but I had been enjoying seeing the enthusiasm back on my young friend’s face, and it was gone now.

“What- what do you mean? Griff always told me he would send for you- is that why you’re here? Did that good-for-nothing Hutt-spawn finally patch you some credits?” Lena folded her arms in irritation, but it did not look like it was directed at Mission. I straightened in surprise as I realized that this Lena Torand must be Griff Vao’s mate. Although it does not sound like this is still true. I had never understood that. On Kashyyyk, Wookiees would mate for life.

Mission gasped, and it was an angry sound. “Don’t you dare start trashing my brother, you slimy cantina rat! You’re the chuba-face who told Griff I couldn’t tag along!”

Lena took a step back before the clouds of anger descended on her face. “It’s moments like these that I remember why I am better off without Griff Vao.” Komad Fortuna had stood, also, and was resting a supportive hand on Lena Torand’s arm. I wondered if she had transferred her affections to him, and felt a soft growl begin in my chest. “Mission, I offered to pay for your ticket. I didn’t want to leave you alone on Taris, but Griff persuaded me that you refused to come. I see now that the dishonest coward duped us both.”

“You liar!” Mission yelled. “Keep it up and I’ll smack you so hard that your headtails will pop off!”

“(Please, this is not the time for angry words),” Komad intervened, his voice calm and low. “(We are all upset here, but this does no one any good).”

Lena sighed, rubbing her forehead with one hand and leaning against Komad. “I don’t wish to quarrel with you, Mission. Especially now. I’m sorry, I guess Griff must have told you we moved to Tatooine.”

“What?” Mission spat. “Griff only messaged me once from Corellia, years ago. He said you didn’t like his kid sister dragging him down.”

Lena stared at Mission in silence for several loaded seconds before closing her eyes. “Honestly, Komad, I don’t know why I’m even upset that he’s-” Her eyes snapped back open, and a frown creased the woman’s forehead. “So, wait, what are you doing in Anchorhead, then? Do you- do you even realize where he is?”

“Why would I know where he is? You’re the scow who’s kept me from him all these years!”

But Lena was looking back at Komad, and her expression was torn. I did not think that Mission’s anger affected her greatly in her current state. Komad had said she was grieving over the loss of one of the Czerka employees.

Oh no. My stomach turned as if I had consumed a week old wasaka-berry pudding.

“(Mission),” I said softly, but did not know how to say the words.

“I am sorry, Mission,” Komad Fortuna spoke haltingly in Galactic Basic. His arm had tightened around Lena, whose face was pressed against his chest. “Your brother was the Czerka employee taken by the Sand People yesterday.”

“What?” Mission snapped. “What?” Jen, who had remained silent through the exchange, gasped and took a step closer to her. “No. No, you can’t mean that!”

“Czerka won’t do anything,” Lena said, her voice muffled against Komad’s chest. “I begged them, but they claim it’s too dangerous. There’s not enough mercs in Anchorhead right now to mount a rescue mission. There’s nothing anyone can do.”

“No!” Mission cried. “What, you’re just going to leave him there? To- to be killed by some native monsters? No!”
I placed my paw on her shoulder and could not stop a mournful howl. Mission’s face was pale and tight as despair filled her light brown eyes. After Taris, this just seemed too cruel.

“The Sand People stronghold is new and not very large, it is true,” Komad said, his voice low and serious. His bright blue eyes were focused sadly on Mission. “They often leave their bases relatively unguarded, and I would consider a rescue attempt myself if I had the help of half a dozen seasoned mercenaries. But I do not.”

“Big Z,” Mission hissed, whirling around to face me. “We have to go after Griff. He’s my brother!”

“(Of course, Mission. Family is important. But we should talk to the others-)”

“Komad, would you strike out with us?” Mission turned again, speaking over me, her light brown eyes intent on the older Twi’lek. “I mean, Big Z is ace at fighting, and you should see Jen in action. I can fire a blaster, too. We’d be able to get Griff back if we all worked together!”

Komad was solemn, and Lena pulled back to shoot Mission an incredulous stare. Komad sighed. “I am sorry, young one. While I admire your bravery, and I do not doubt the abilities of a Wookiee, I will not rush into danger with the odds stacked so heavily against me. I am afraid your brother is on his own.”

Mission looked wildly between Komad and Lena, both of whom stared at her sadly. She sniffed once, twice, and then burst into loud sobs and ran from the cantina.

I groaned in despair and hurried after her.

xXx

“(Mission),” I complained for the tenth time, as she handed me a gourd of water she had just purchased. “(Would you please answer me?)”

Mission had always had a big heart. She was always prepared to do anything for those she cared about. And there was no one, it seemed, she cared for more than the older brother who had abandoned her in the Lower City.

“You ready, Jen?” Mission called, ignoring me yet again. We were in an equipment store, and Mission had spent the last hour ensuring we were all clothed appropriately for desert travel. If it had not been for the dire news of her brother, I would have dragged her back to the Ebon Hawk and spent the rest of the day scolding her. For I knew where those credits had come from, and I did not believe either the Jedi or the Mandalorian would be particularly happy when they discovered what was missing from the cargo bay.

But worse than Mission taking credits from the Ebon Hawk was the idea of Mission traipsing into the desert. Her first step had been to flounce into the Czerka office and purchase a hunting license. I had not even understood what she was doing until it was done.

“I guess,” Jen said, winding a head cloth around her head awkwardly. “Um. We’re not leaving the town, are we?”

“(Mission. I will not let you go into the desert alone. The others will aid us. We must go back).”

“Guys. Griff is my brother.” Mission said, and her jaw was set. “I ain’t leaving him.”

“Family is important,” Jen whispered. “But- the others- they are strong warriors-”
“Stronger than you, Jen?” Mission snapped. Jen flinched, her expression twisting with a confused helplessness that seemed more at home on a starved cub than the woman I had sworn my life to. Meanwhile, Mission’s scowl simply deepened. “Look, there’s no harm in having a scout around Anchorhead, and checking we got the right gear, okay? That’s all I plan to do today. Then we can go back and get the others to help. But it that snooty Jedi tries stopping me-”

Mission glared ferociously at me before storming out of the shop. I loosed a huff of breath, and followed her reluctantly. Family was important. As important as honour. I had forsaken mine, and Mission was the only family I had left.

I would do my best to reunite her with her brother, but we had to even the odds somehow.

We were closer to the exit of Anchorhead now, and food stalls were parked on either side of the main path through the town. My stomach grumbled, and I realized I had not eaten for some time. The food synthesizer onboard the Ebon Hawk was satisfying but not particularly tasty. I found myself eyeing over one stall that was selling burnt meat on a stick. It looked like a barbecued tree-frog.

“Hotsa chuba,” Mission whispered, looking in the same direction. Tears filled her big brown eyes. “That’s what Griff wanted to import, y’know. He showed me pics on the HoloNet. He gets the dumbest ideas.” She sniffed, and looked away.

“(We will go after him, Mission),” I said softly.

She gave a small nod, and then started walking. Two steps later, and Mission halted suddenly in front of me. “Oh, bantha crap!” she hissed. “That’s Bastila up ahead!”

I followed her gaze, and saw three figures in the distance talking to a guard by a set of large automatic gates. They were dressed differently from earlier but there was no mistaking them. Bastila Shan was in discussions with the gate guard, gesturing authoritatively. Three large packbeasts were standing calmly next to Carth Onasi.

“Quick! Go in here!” Mission whispered, motioning us towards a sandstone building whose entrance was visible between two market stalls.

“(They look like they are just leaving Anchorhead),” I said, having followed her inside. Much like the cantina, this store also had air-conditioning, and it was a relief to have a break from the sweltering heat. We had stumbled into a droid store; broken robots and parts littered the small room, and a line of identical protocol droids were stacked up against the back wall. There were a variety of utility droids in various states of disrepair, and one was wheeling through the centre of the shop to whistle at us in welcome.

“What is this? A customer Yuka Laka doesn’t recognize?” I heard a voice speak in halting Galactic Basic, and looked up to see an old Ithorian shopkeeper at the end of the store. “Ahhh, an off-worlder perhaps? Maybe you would like a utility droid to keep your starship repaired?”

“Not interested,” Mission replied, turning back to stare at the exit with a frown on her face.

“You must have a reason for entering Yuka Laka’s store,” the Ithorian continued. “Maybe you need a protocol droid? Yuka Laka has plenty of basic models that can translate in thousands of different dialects.”

“Sheesh, what would we need a translator for? Jen speaks every language we come across.” Mission rolled her eyes. Jen, who had also entered the store, looked highly uncomfortable.
“Oh,” the shopkeeper said dolefully. “Yuka Laka has a droid for every purpose, though. Yuka Laka wonders whether this Jen can speak Sand People dialects.”

“Look, I’m not interested, okay?” Mission snapped, and strode back toward the shop’s exit. I began to follow her, but she stopped, one step from the exit, and turned to face the Ithorian once more. A speculative look was dawning on her face. “Hang on, did you say Sand People dialects?”

“Yes,” the Ithorian confirmed, and rubbed his hands together. “This is not one of Yuka Laka’s normal droids, no, this is the special of the month! This is a one-of-a-kind protocol droid that is also combat ready. You have not seen any droid quite like that, Yuka Laka is sure of it!”

I stared at her silently while my mind was whirling. It was not a bad idea. “(Mission, we should talk to the others first. The Mandalorian is a tough warrior. Carth Onasi is a great shot. And Bastila is a Jedi. I will not let you do this without their aid.”

“Okay, okay, already! I said it before, Big Z, let’s just check out the desert so we know what we’re getting into. We can think about how we’re gonna get Griff later.” The despair had gone from her face by now, chased away by determination. Mission would not be left behind, I knew. “I’m gonna get this droid, Big Z.”

Reluctantly, I nodded. This shopkeeper has also said the droid is combat ready. That means we have another ally for any danger we meet. As Mission walked away to haggle with the shopkeeper, I looked around for Jen.

She was standing in a dim corner of the store.

Talking to a humanoid robot the colour of tarnished fire, whose red eyes glinted in the darkness.

xXx
Acquiring: Master

- HK-47 -

Entertainment Routine Initiated:

Target Analysis: Type: Organic Meatbag
Species: Ithorian, Male
Name: Yuka Laka
Occupation: Droid Salesman - Current Owner

Death Scenario: Blaster Shot to Head
Survival Chance: 0 percent
Survival Time: 3.42855 seconds
Analysis: Too Quick

.../Some time later/...

Death Scenario: Drop On Hoth
Estimated Survival Chance: 0.00129 percent ###
Estimated Survival Time: 9558.18116 ± 3109.28884 seconds
Analysis: Amusing. Limited Viewing Potential
Optional Scenario: Drop Naked On Hoth

Death Scenario: Drop On Korriban With "Give Peace A Chance" Sign Attached
Estimated Survival Chance: 0.09023 percent
Estimated Survival Time: 727441.00259 ± 727441.00259 seconds
Analysis: Survival Time Too Dependant On Finder. Limited Viewing Potential

Death Scenario: Removal of Skin
Survival Chance: 0 percent Estimated
Survival Time: 532771.38841 ± 94635.40081 seconds
Analysis: Highly Amusing, Satisfyingly Slow
Optional Variables: Weak Acids, Sodium Chloride

Entertainment Routine Interrupted

Three Organic Meatbags Entering Targeting Area

Analysis: First Meatbag
Species: Twi'lek, Female
Facial Recognition Result: Negative
Probable Personality: Irritating Young Thief
Personality Compatibility: 23.78567 percent
Assigned Temporary Name: Gizka Spawn

Analysis: Second Meatbag
Species: Wookiee, Male
Facial Recognition Result: Negative
Probable Personality: Quiet Warrior
Personality Compatibility: 18.37846 percent
Assigned Temporary Name: Mobile Carpet

Analysis: Third Meatbag Species: Human, Female
Facial Recognition Result: Error 1x0EEEFF. Attempted Access to Locked Memory Core Files...Sequence Failed Probable Personality: Unable to Compute - Conflicting Data. Closer Observation Required
Personality Compatibility: Unable to Compute. Calculation Aborted

Hidden User Defined Sub-Routine Activated: Personality Compatibility Set To 100 percent

Interrupt:
...Quick Self Diagnostic Routine Activated
...Result: No Errors Detected
...Self Diagnostic Scheduled
Return to New Target Analysis

Assigned Temporary Name: Enigmatic Meatbag

Conclusion: Preferred Owner: Enigmatic Meatbag

Auditory Sensors Set to Scan Targets Conversations

Input – Yuka Laka to Gizka Spawn: “What is this? A customer Yuka Laka doesn’t recognize? Ahhh, an off-worlder perhaps? Maybe you would like a utility droid to keep your starship repaired?”

Input – Gizka Spawn to Yuka Laka: “Not interested.”

Input – Yuka Laka to Gizka Spawn: “You must have a reason for entering Yuka Laka’s store? Maybe you need a protocol droid? Yuka Laka has plenty of basic models that can translate in thousands of different dialects.”
Voice Stress Analysis: Pleading

Visual Tracking: Enigmatic Meatbag Moving Closer

Preferred Owner in Effective Communication Range

Conversation Routines Activated:
Topic: Purchasing Me
Auditory Sensors Set to Focus on Enigmatic Meatbag

Output: “Greeting: Hello to you, prospective purchaser. I am referred to as HK-47, a fully functional Systech Corporation droid skilled in both combat and protocol functions. Query: Would you be so kind as to purchase this model from Yuka Laka?”

Input – Enigmatic Meatbag: “Er, I-I don't think I need... have I seen you before?”
Output: “Answer: I do not have access to your memory, prospective purchaser. Extrapolation: I cannot access my own core memory files, so I cannot say whether I have seen you.”

Observation – Muffled Conversation Occurring Between Gizka Spawn and Mobile Carpet

Input – Enigmatic Meatbag: “Why don’t you have access to your core memory?”

Output: “Explanation: I have been recently fitted with a restraining bolt. With it in place, access to much of my memory core is restricted.”

Conversation Analysis:
Current Topic: Inability to Access Memory Core Conclusion: Conversation Moving Away From Required Topic
Attempting to Refresh Topic

Output: “Request: Please consider purchasing me, prospective buyer.”

Input – Enigmatic Meatbag: “Uh, I don’t have any credits.”

Visual Tracking: Gizka Spawn and Mobile Carpet Moving Closer

Input – Gizka Spawn to Yuka Laka: “This is the droid I’m buying? Creepy looking thing.”

Input – Mobile Carpet to Enigmatic Meatbag (Shyriiwook): “(Jen? Are you okay?)”

Permanent Name Assigned: Jen to Enigmatic Meatbag

Input – Jen to Mobile Carpet: “I - yes. I just had the strangest feeling...”

Input – Gizka Spawn: “So, robot, what’s your name?”

Light Impact Detected:
Source: Gizka Spawn
Combat Mode Initiated:
Interrupt:
...External Pacifism Routines Activated ...Source: Restraining Bolt
Return to Main
Exiting Combat Mode

Quick Response Analysis:
Appropriate Verbal Responses Would Reduce Chance of Purchase
Conclusion: Ignore Gizka Spawn

Input – Gizka Spawn: “What sort of robot are you? Can ya even speak?”

Input – Mobile Carpet (Shyriiwook): “(Odd. It responded to Jen.)”

Input – Gizka Spawn: “Sheesh, what sort of trash heap is this thing?”
Voice Stress Analysis: Annoyed

Input – Yuka Laka: “The unit has been a little uncooperative. They get that way when they go too long without a memory wipe.”

Input – Gizka Spawn: “It’s just ignoring me!”
Voice Stress Analysis: Petulant
Input – Jen: “Why did you want me to buy you, instead of Mission?”

Permanent Name Assigned: Mission to Gizka Spawn

Output: “Explanation: You have seen combat, and are no farmer or diplomat. The Twi'lek is a child. Extrapolation: Even as a droid, I am allowed a preference of owner.”

Input – Mission to Yuka Laka: “I'm beginning to think you ripped me off.”

Input – Yuka Laka to Mission: “You talked me down to two thousand credits! It will behave and treat you as its master as soon as I have removed the restraining bolt!”

Voice Stress Analysis: Protesting

Input – Mission (muttered): “Two thousand credits is almost all I had left.”

Output: “Objection! I have no desire to be owned by a childish blue meatbag!”

Input – Mission: “Yeah, well, I don't like you either! As far as I'm concerned, Jen can take care of you!”

Input – Jen: “Uh, say what?”

Input – Mission to Jen: “As long as it can talk to the Sand People, I don't care who it obeys. Let's just buy this stupid thing and hit the desert.”

Input – Yuka Laka: “If that is what you want. HK-47, your new master is this human.”

Output: “That is most satisfactory.”

External Sensors Registering Removal of Restraining Bolt

Quick Self Diagnostic Routine Activated

Result: Previously Restricted Routines Now Accessible

Removal of Restraining Bolt Confirmed

Output: “Statement: I see you have purchased me, master. I find this a satisfactory arrangement.”

Output: “Query: Am I to accompany you now? Query: Would you like me to kill something for you?”

Input – Jen: “Kill something for me?”

Voice Stress Analysis: Worried

Output: “Answer: Indeed. I am most eager to engage in some unadulterated violence.”

Targeting: Yuka Laka.

Hidden User Defined Sub-Routine Activated:
Owner Command Required. Interrupt:
...Quick Self Diagnostic Routine Activated
...Result: No Errors Detected
...Thorough System Diagnostic Scheduled

Return to Main.

Output: “At your command, of course, master.”

XXX
Chapter End Notes

Note: - this equates roughly to a 775-1 chance
Author's Note – Props to Curtis for his help with this.
The heat of the desert ruffled through my fur. It was sweltering in its intensity, even in the shade of the ridged cliffs that created a natural border between the Eastern Dune Sea and whatever lay on the other side.

I cared not. This place was like what I imagined my ancestral homeworld to be; a desolate, barren wasteland. A graveyard of nothingness. It was the perfect place to disappear in.

The predators here were fierce; large reptilian creatures that were no match for my lightsaber nor my power. Their deaths were a testament to my might. I would stand strong in the darkness. I would.

For I had failed the light, and there was no turning back.

The corpses of three wraids were laid bloody in front of me, jagged rents in their bellies spilling looped intestines over the yellow sand. The coppery tang of blood lay heavy in the hot air. I could leave these corpses behind, and scavengers would eventually pick the bones clean. I had already eaten.

I was closer to Anchorhead than I preferred, for sooner or later I knew people would be sent after me. There was legislation surrounding the kills of beasts, even on this remote planet. I felt a snarl form on my face. Twisted, greedy bureaucrats. I took delight in raiding their mining parties of food and water. But I had not killed more than wraids, not yet, no.

Apart from the slavers on Taris, but that was a vengeance long in the coming. Those who had treated me so abominably as a child met their end at the point of my lightsaber, and it was well deserved. Even had I not failed the Jedi Order so disastrously, I would have believed in the rightiness of my actions on Taris.

My eyes closed and I wrenched my thoughts away from the Order. Away from my only friend left, who was a good, strong Jedi Knight. Away from my Master, whom I had betrayed so horrendously. Quatra... There was no going back, not now. Had anyone failed their Knight trials so disastrously? Perhaps I would go down in the Jedi history books as the pathetic Cathar who struck down her Master in rage because she was too weak to face her own flaws.

A sob caught in my throat. I must move forward. If the darkness is the only path laid before me, then I shall travel it. For who could kill their own Master other than someone too corrupt for the Light?

The anger and the grief mingled within me, even after so long. It had been more than a year since I had run from Dantooine, run from my Master’s corpse, and just kept running from planet to planet as the sickly self-hatred transformed into fury at the galaxy. This planet, at least, allowed me a reprieve. I could disappear from civilization and test my strength against the wildlife.

But the darkness calls. It did. I could feel it, taunting me, a presence that flashed in the Force and then vanished. I felt it the previous day, too. Weak enough to make me doubt my own senses, strong enough to make me cry for what might have been.
Fallen to the darkness. I cannot turn back. This was the next step along my journey, then. I would accept it, I had no other choice. Whatever this presence was, whoever it may be, they would taste my wrath for the interruption of my solitude.

And either I would fall to them and be at peace, or I would be one step more powerful.

My lightsaber cut a red beam in front of me. Once, I thought myself worthy of the blue I had found in a Dantooine cave. After my miserable failure, I had cast that aside in favour of synthetic red.

The Force rode with me, invigorating my muscles, enhancing speed, and aiding against the harsh elements of the desert world. I was drawing closer to the township, not far from the gates themselves, and within the territory those Czerka clowns thought of as safe. My senses stretched out over the dunes and picked up on the sentients nearby. There were few.

Just over the crest of the next sandy hill were three faint sparks and the electromagnetic oscillations of a droid. In this environment, it would surely have combat specifications. The pulse of power came from one of them. I am certain of it. I would take care of the droid first, then work out which one taunted me with their Force abilities they were now hiding. That was my target, my path.

And I would show I was strong enough for the Dark Side. It was all I had left, and it would be enough.

It had to be.

My steps slowed and quietened as I drew closer, stealing up on the strangers from behind. They were moving away from me. I could hear a young voice; bright, hopeful, what I might have been once.

“See, it’s not so bad out here, Big Z. Komad wanted six mercs, well, I reckon you count for at least two. And Jen…”

“Statement: I have capabilities far beyond any fragile meatbag. Qualification: Once my shields are repaired, I estimate that my combat prowess will far exceed that of the Wookiee.”

I drew the Force in; deep, tight, and life-enhancing. With a howl, I launched after them, ‘saber held firm in one hand and ionizing energy crisping on the fingers of the other. Unnatural speed in my limbs closed the distance. As I cleared the hill, I saw them at last.

“Warning: Incoming hostile!” The droid was already firing despite my sneak attack, showcasing reflexes that far surpassed those of his companions. But it was no match for me; the bolts were cast aside effortlessly by my lightsaber. I snarled, unleashing my fury, and blue and white energy danced over the burnished red of the combat droid. My lightning had always been more effective against machinery than flesh, and with a hiss and a sizzle the droid deactivated.

I looked beyond the smoking scrap of metal.

A Wookiee, a Twi’lek and a Human. They all stared at me in dawning horror, and only the Wookiee had a weapon ready.

“I shall be your doom!” I howled. The Force blasted from my hand, a shock wave of power that tumbled them all off their feet.

There. There. A sharp flash of power so blinding it engulfed me in its fury, before vanishing once more. Like a mirage in the desert, taunting with its treasure before ruthlessly snatching it away. As the three of them scrambled to their feet, my eyes fixed on the human. She looked at me in terror, but it had come from her. It had come from her.

The Force built a wave of power inside, and I flung it at the other two with all my furious might. They froze, in stasis, that would hold for as long as I willed it. Incapacitated due to my strength.

"No!" the human cried in distress. Her green eyes were wide and uncertain under an askew headcloth, and she held a vibroblade limply at her side. That was a disappointment. Perhaps she wouldn’t be the challenge I yearned for. “Please, let them go!”

I laughed, a dark sound, and pointed my lightsaber at her. Her face paled, and it was right that she should be afraid. “Who are you?” she whispered, and stumbled backwards in fright.

“I am Juhani, and you have disturbed my peace!”

Peace… would that I could have some.

The Force thrummed through my veins, urged on by my emotions. Once, I used serenity and peace to strengthen my power. Now, I could only use rage.

“Please… we’ll leave you alone, just let them go!” Her voice was terrified and pleading, and I stepped closer. She raised the blade in a fumbling grip, and took another step backwards.

“Too late, human!” I snarled. It was too late for me, and too late for her. I strode forward, weapon raised high. The woman’s face had whitened, and she glanced frantically at her helpless companions, first the hairy one and then the blue.

Her pale, petrified expression shattered.

She snapped her head around to face me. Her grip on the vibroblade firmed, and her eyes narrowed in a resolve completely at odds with her earlier fright.

“Let. Them. Go!” she growled in a deep, dark voice. Her face had twisted in a building fury and her chest was heaving. But the blinding Force, the sheer power I had sensed, was still missing.

I took another step closer, watching the play of emotions battle on the human’s face. “Weak Jedi,” I mocked. “Where is your power? Without it, the Dark Side will cut you down!”

“I am not a Jedi,” the stranger said, eyes fixed on mine. Green eyes, spitting sparks at me. The colour of moss on a sodden tree.

The same colour as Quatra’s. Quatra…

I wailed in grief at the memory and charged, launching a swinging blow straight at the human’s torso. Her vibroblade came up to block, but I forced it down towards her body with unnatural strength. The red energy seared against her desert robes before she leaped backwards.

“You’re a Sith then?” the woman hissed, taking another cautious step back.

“I am with the darkness alone!” I howled, slashing at her legs. She darted to the side, a hair’s breadth from certain amputation.

“Who sent you?” she demanded, still edging away. “Are you after me? Or the Jedi brat?”

I bared my teeth, uninterested in her pointless questions. The Force reared up within my grasp again, begging to be unleashed, and I threw it at her. She tumbled backwards, like a flutter-gnat caught in a gale, and landed on her back with a grunt. I sprang forward with a stab towards her heart, but the human rolled to the side and my saber sank deep into the coarse, hot sand, turning it black. Black as my heart.

I spun around, ‘saber raised once more, and watched as the human clambered to her feet.

“If you want a challenge, then you've got one,” she told me, and her voice was cold. I could see the fiery hate building in her face. “But let the girl go. She is no threat.”

I glanced behind to the two sentients, still powerless within my grasp. A frozen expression of horror was painted on the young Twi'lek’s face. “You care for the girl? You are foolish.”

The human looked around, as if seeking aid or inspiration, but there was nothing bar the loneliness of sand and heat. Her eyes fixed back to mine, and then further down my body. She frowned.

“Juhani, was it? Looks like you've seen your fair share of action.” She was staring at my torso, and I glanced down. I had not paid attention to my state of clothing for a long time. Tattered rags covered in fresh and dried blood. I was missing a sleeve, but it worried me not. Vanity had never been a weakness of mine.

I smile an empty smile. “I hone my skills on the predators. And now, you. Time to die, human!” I ran at her again, and she held her ground until the last moment, before dodging to the side. I snarled, whirling to face her.

“Predators. You mean the wraids,” she panted. “You’re the one that’s killing them? Wow. That’s your big nod to the darkness?” Her voice had turned snide, twisted. She dares to mock me?

“I am more powerful than you could ever dream of being!” I roared. The heat of anger returned in a fierce wave, ruffling the fur on my neck. I ran at her again, ‘saber raised to strike. Her vibroblade blocked once, twice, but it slipped under the third blow which seared a cauterized stripe down her side. She screamed, jumping back, and her light clothes flapped in the stifling breeze, a burnt edge of cloth smouldering in the air.

It had been a glancing blow only, enough to burn, but not injure. Enough to anger, but not frighten. Not yet.

“You are no match for me,” I hissed. “I harnessed true power when I struck down my master! I revel in my darkness! I adore it!”

“Why are you trying to convince me?” she forced out through gritted teeth. “Unless you truly don’t?”

_How dare she question me?_ The uncertainty welled up, the grief, the fear; that this was the wrong way, that I had chosen poorly.

_No!_ I had no other choice, not now, not after what I had done. _I shall not be uncertain. I am steadfast!_

I melded the Force together in a ball and slammed it into her abdomen. She was thrown backwards several metres, slamming into soft sand littered with the debris of sharp rocks. Her vibroblade fell from her weak grasp. The human grunted, coming up in a crouch, and I saw a droplet of blood make a slow path down her cheek. One hand pressed against her burned side as she glared venom at me.

I smiled coldly as she scrambled for her dropped weapon.
“Use the Force, so I can prove I am the master!” I cried. I wanted the challenge, not an easy slaughter. “I will kill you far too easily this way.”

My eyes lingered on a trail of sweat that trickled down her face, mingling with the rivulet of blood. I lazily threw my lightsaber at her; she blocked it, but stumbled backward with the effort. It snapped back to my hand.

“Are you too weak to use the Force in battle?” I taunted.

“I – am – trying – to!” she snarled through gritted teeth.

I advanced again, two steps, and drew deep on the Force. It propelled me into a swift jump and, snarling, I raised my weapon to strike her down on landing. The human dodged to the left, and my lightsaber skimmed against her shoulder just as she backed out of reach.

_Time to stop playing with her. If she will not give me a challenge, I will kill her now._

The black power bubbled within me. I shaped it. Moulded it into something hideous, and threw it out to poison her body. She choked, stumbling back.

“No!” she shouted in denial. I felt it as the venomous Force struck deep inside her, dragging at her limbs, closing her throat and slowing her mind. The Force could be a very powerful ally, and the empty smile grew on my face again.

I could see her anger transform to hatred. “I will not go down like this!” she screamed. Like a thousand tiny needles flung out to pierce me, I felt the raw power pulse from her once more and paused in surprise. _What I sensed before. She is strong._ The human snarled, and before I had time to blink, she gathered my own tainted Force energy from within her system and hurled it back to me.

I gagged, and my muscles abruptly tightening in unnatural lethargy. _What? She threw it back at me!_ My guard had been down and… I had not thought that possible. I lurched as the dark taint dragged me backwards. Her sheer power shone, and it was greater that mine.

And then it was gone again.

The human growled, a vicious sound, and ran toward me. She lunged, her attack frenzied and wild, and I found myself dodging for the first time. The next swipe I blocked, before gathering my wits and striking out at her. Even with the corrupted Force slowing me, she was no match. Not without the power that kept eluding her grasp.

_I must finish her before it comes back._

“I will win this!” I yelled, and the Force flung out from my hand, pushing her away. She snarled inhumanely as a wall of energy buffeted against her, pushing her backwards, digging her feet deep into the sand. My fist clenched, and a weave of energy bent to my will, wrapping around her neck. Tightened, clenched, and she gasped in protest, her off-hand clutching at the invisible grip.

The stranger fell to her knees, growling and choking, her eyes emerald daggers of undiluted hate as she struggled against my superior power. I was skilled enough to hamper her breathing, but not to render her motionless.

And then a blast of pure energy had me sailing backward through the hot desert air as she threw off my constriction with ease. The power has returned, and it was blinding in its fury.
“You will bow to ME!” she shrieked in a voice that resonated with malevolent viciousness. I was back on my feet by then, and the human was rippling with energy. A sense of foreboding tiptoed eerily down my spine. I am in over my head.

But blank shock rocked through her green eyes, and the power vanished abruptly. She didn't mean to say that. She doesn't understand the darkness; she doesn't embrace it. I am the master here!

I growled, on the offensive again, and ran at her. She was snarling like a rabid kath hound as she blocked, her teeth bared as my ’saber sparked against the her cortosis-strengthened blade. The anger has her, but I am the stronger.

“The Force had failed you!”

She dodged the next blow, and struck out at my legs, but it was too easy to dodge backward. Without the Force aiding her movement, every attack could be predicted, every block could be overwhelmed, every opening could be used.

Now it is time to put her out of her misery. Now it is time to prove that the Dark Side is enough for me.

“If you will not use the Force, I will end it here!” I drew in the Force deeply, and focused on her blade. With a mental yank, it slipped out of her grasp and went sailing behind me.

The fear, the disbelief, the anger, battled for dominance on her face. But it was no match for my darkness.

I flung the Force out once more, a solid push of energy that slammed her to the sand. She fell with a thud.

“I am your doom!” I yelled in triumph and closed in.

I lowered my lightsaber ready to stab her through the heart.

xXx
“Are you too weak to use the Force in battle?” the Cathar mocked me, her slanted yellow eyes glinting in triumph. She was tall, my height or slightly more, with an athletic frame that rippled with muscle under her short, downy fur. Torn clothing hung from her wiry frame, smattered in dark markings that could have been dried mud or dried blood. Her face was angular and exotic, with fine stripes of soft fuzz tracing along her cheekbones. Her only hair hung from a warrior’s tail at the crown of her head.

She was strong and fast and had the backing of the Force. And she was winning, while I was fighting a battle on more than one front.

Jen?

The opaque window of Jen Sahara that clouded my psyche was cracking; and as shards of her clattered away, a sense of stark reality shone in like raw sunlight after a sense-numbing storm.

I had not felt this alive since Taris.

Fear and rage intertwined in my mind, and a strong desire to see this feline stranger dead at my hands followed in its wake.

Jen? Anger leads to the Dark Side! What is going on? Bastila’s voice was actually lecturing me in my head. In my own sodding head. Demanding and pleading and intruding where she had no sodding right.

“I – am – trying – to!” I snarled back at the crazy Dark Jedi, ignoring Bastila for the meantime. My side burned and my cheek throbbed, but both were minor injuries. So far, I had been lucky, but luck alone would not vouchsafe my survival for much longer.

I could sense the Force around me, fuelling everything with life and energy and begging to be used, but my attempts to clutch at it were rebuffed by some unseen hand. I’d grasped for it on Taris, instinctively reaching out when required, but sometimes it had failed me. Sometimes it had bent to my will. How could I have thought the bond wasn't real? And the Force? What's been going on – who am I?

What do you mean? You are Jen Sahara!

I am Jen Sahara. The meek voice echoed her faintly, but it was not compelling enough to convince me. Not anymore.

Shut up! I snarled back, to myself and Bastila both.

Juhani laughed low in her throat; a purr almost. She took a few running steps, and I somehow knew a Force-propelled jump was coming. I waited until the last moment before lurching to the side. Her ‘saber glanced past my shoulder, and I felt the searing heat come perilously close to another injury.

Where are you? Bastila demanded. Please, talk to me! Are you still on the Ebon Hawk?
Juhani raised a hand, and intuition turned my stomach. I couldn’t sense it, but that was Dark Force building within her grasp. No way to dodge that, I thought wildly as I leapt to the side regardless.

It engulfed me, searing deep into my limbs, closing my throat.

“No!” I screamed, as I felt the dark oozing of something wrong, something evil, taint my body inside. Sick poison swelled in my throat, and I swallowed convulsively. My limbs felt drugged, slowed. Drugged? A flicker of recollection hit me. Bastila, you backstabbing schutta! You drugged me!

I had no choice! Please, I can explain!

I stumbled backwards, gagging as the corruption dug poisonous fingers deep into my body. My vision clouded, and as the Cathar advanced very real fear coiled deep within me. I can’t win this, unless I use the Force! It was still there, surrounding me, taunting me with its inaccessibility. I growled, and grasped for it once more. My mental lunge landed against an invisible barrier, a shield, caging me away from the Force.

What is that? That isn’t normal!

But then, at once, it gave way under my pressure, and the sweet taste of power filled me in a rushing torrent.

Panic emanated from Bastila’s presence within my mind.

“I will not go down like this!” I snarled as the Force sang through my limbs, lifting the aching tiredness and invigorating me with life. Instinct mastered rational thought, and somehow I squeezed the tainted power running through my body, collecting it in a ball and flinging it straight back at the Cathar. Fury pummelled a glorious beat within me, strengthening the Force, and there was nothing that could withstand me, certainly not some pathetic animal-killing Cathar.

Get her, now!

I sprang forward, and as I did so the Force was cut from my grasp, like a knife through frostti cream, and it slithered beyond my reach once more. No!

My anger still held momentum through my limbs, and I sprang forward, attacking, vibrosword lunging at the Cathar’s torso. She dodged the first blow, her movements unnaturally slow as her own poison worked against her. I stabbed towards her heart but she parried, stronger now, and counter-attacked with a wild swing that had me leaping backwards yet again.

“I will win this!” Juhani shrieked, and her hand flung out, accompanied by a wall of invisible might that forced me backwards. I fought her Force attack with every muscle, every sinew, a growl of pure determination ripping from my throat; but it was useless without having access to the Force myself.

The Cathar’s hand raised and clenched in a fist. An invisible band tightened around my neck, clamping down hard, restricting breathing. I choked, spluttering, my free hand clutching at my throat in reflex. She calls this a Force grip? Pathetic! a dark voice sneered in my head, but I still sank to my knees under the weight of it. I will not go down to some cowering Force user who spends her days challenging desert beasts!

Jen? Where are you? Bastila was pleading now, a hysterical edge to her mental voice that grated even as I ignored it. Please, answer me!

The fury was blinding, overriding my fear, my despair, any form of rational thought. It was pure, unmitigated rage, and it blasted through me, shattering an invisible barrier with its sheer power. The Force hummed as it flooded through me once more, and I flung it out viciously towards the Cathar.

Pure unadulterated panic stormed through the mind-link from my unwanted bond-sister.

“You will bow to ME!” I snarled, and could feel nothing but this menacing, malevolent fury at all who opposed my will. She will bow, or she will die. The Cathar was back on her feet, then, and for the first time looked genuinely frightened. She should be afraid of me. All who defy me have reason to fear! I am the master! The power sailed unchecked through me, the power to rule planets, to bend minds, to make everything how it should be-

My mind stumbled, tripped over itself, twitched, as I at once comprehended the nature of my own deluded thoughts. The fury damped down, suffocated by confusion and not a small amount of fear. What am I thinking? That is… not right. It's not what I want-

The panic from Bastila was so fierce I could taste it. And yet again, I felt something snap cleanly through my attachment with the Force. Why does that keep happening? The Force shouldn’t work that way!

Bu-but you don't – you cannot know how the Force works!

Bastila? Suspicion reared like a rancor within me. Do you have something to do with this block?

The bond was silent.

I saw a mask of superiority fall back down on Juhani’s face. She growled, and lunged towards me again, a vicious swipe of the ‘saber that I blocked while snarling, muscles burning as blood-red sparked against the vibrosword. I held her at bay, but only for a moment. She had the Force on her side, and I did not.

“The Force has failed you!” the Cathar crowed triumphantly, staring at me from behind that blood-red beam. She would end me, and soon, if I did not find a way to reach my own power.

I need the Force. I need it now! We jumped apart, and I sprang forward, swiping at her legs in a move she dodged with ease.

Are you in danger? Please, let me come to you! There was a wavering hesitancy in the bond, as if Bastila was beginning to understand that I might actually be in mortal peril. Where are you, Jen?

I reached out to the Force again. Like I was opening my mind, stretching my senses, a psychic exercise that seemed inherently familiar... but, still, there was nothing there. I had the sense of an invisible net enclosing me on all sides, separating me from the salvation I required. There's something there, blocking me. I know it. And I know I've broken through it twice today. But how?

Sometimes, there'd been no barrier at all. The Force had simply been waiting for me, ready to bend to my will. Pazaak, in the Upper City, that was the first time. But it didn't work in Javyar's cantina. I'd slipped past the Sith guard to the turbolift. Enhanced my speed, more than once. Couldn't do a frelling thing but run away on the swoop track, though. So... why did it sometimes work for me, and sometimes not?

Like a lightning strike of clarity, I suddenly saw the connection. Every time the power had risen to my fingertips, Bastila had been absent from my head. Unconscious, or cut off by a neural disruptor. Unable to...
I lurched backwards from a hopeful swing of the rabid Cathar, my thoughts still racing.

Unable to shield me, due to incapacitation. The only time I've truly destroyed her shields is today, through brute strength. It is her. It is her!

"If you will not use the Force, I will end it here!" the Cathar yelled, and my vibrosword flew wildly out of my hand.

No. No! I stared at Juhani in a furious disbelief undercut with denial. It will not end here. It can't end here! Bastila! Give me the sodding Force before I die!

Juhani flung her hand out once more, and I was driven backwards, losing my balance and slamming onto the sand. The air gusted out of my lungs.

Jen! Please, I had to! For your own safety!

My own safety? The fury was black and thick and boiling tar, burning hot through my body. This deranged Cathar will kill me if you don't back off right now, and let me use the Force!

"I am your doom!" Juhani howled over me, and lunged to stab her lightsaber through my chest.

I reached out, enraged and panicked, and a sudden deluge of raw power flushed through my body. A snarl ripped from my lungs, and instinct moulded the Force into the tool I needed, I required, I deserved.

Juhani was frozen above me, her 'saber an inch from my heart.

I blinked, rolled away, and scrambled to my feet.

My vibrosword glinted at me from a distance, and my hand rose of its own volition. Instinctively I drew in on the Force, and the weapon came flying, snapping back to my hand.

I was completely unprepared for Juhani's lightsaber to come swinging back at me also. I dodged, yelping in surprise, and the weapon fell behind me. It deactivated as it landed with a soft thump and the fail-safe kicked in.

Juhani snarled and stumbled, breaking free of the stasis.

I have the Force now. She will die! A cold smile curved my lips as I eyed the angry Cathar over. I took a step backwards, and grabbed her 'saber. It hissed slowly as I turned it on.

The Force sang through it, strong and rich and twisted.

Jedi do not kill!

I am no Jedi, Bastila!

I held the red lightsaber in my primary hand, whirling it experimentally. It felt like an extension of my limb, like the power of the Force was focused and augmented through the plasma beam. Like anything was possible.

I could feel the burn of pain against my side, but it was meaningless. The Force riding through me was all that mattered. And with the vibrosword in my off-hand, I felt at ease. In truth, the melee vibro felt slightly unwieldy; heavy and cumbersome in comparison to the 'saber – but there was something about the form that held the familiarity of coming home. Two weapons. I fight with two
“You are strong,” The Cathar murmured, as her eerie golden gaze fixated on the ‘saber now within my grasp. I could see the disillusionment on her face. She knows this is her end. “Stronger than me, even in my darkness.”

A smile of triumph grew on my face as I advanced. The bitterness grew on the Cathar's face, but she lifted her head proudly, resolute, even at the end. It fit, with what I knew of her warrior race. They were no cowards. Even at the edge of defeat, they would fight back, and so she did – a hand lifted and a compressed shockwave rippled through the air.

I laughed as I deflected it. So easy, so weak, and the power of life vibrated an echo of my amusement. It danced through my veins, alive and electric. There was no rational thought, just some deep instinct that took control, warped the power, and radiated it outwards.

Bright hot sparks danced across my vision, and static streaks of charged bolts jumped from fingertips I hadn’t even realized I had raised.

Juhani screamed as the electricity embraced her lithe body. Cold raging victory curved my lips as I watched her dispassionately, as she writhed, grunting in pain. Sparks danced across her body as I stared in fascination.

This is not the way! Bastila was shrieking, a tiny voice of conscience in my head.

I blocked it out.

I heard a scream of fear from behind me. Mission! The Force fell from my grasp in shock as I whirled around, remembering my companions. They were no longer imprisoned, and Mission was on her knees, horror etched on her young face. The Wookiee held out his vibrosword in readiness, but did not budge from Mission’s side.

“End it!” Juhani demanded in a desolate voice, wresting back my attention. “End my torment!”

The reminder of my foe flared the rage back to prominence, and I spun around, resolve renewed, and strode back towards the Cathar. She was on the ground, faint smoke wafting from her fur. You don’t have to ask me twice! The dark superiority filled me again and I felt the sparks spring to life in my hand, ready to fly again towards my enemy, for I was in control here, I had the power of life or death-

Mission whimpered, and I faltered.

Can I kill someone in cold blood, in front of Mission? The Cathar stared at me through alien yellow eyes that were full of despair. I don’t answer to anyone! The voice sneered in my head, and I took another step forward.

“Jen,” Mission whispered behind me, and I heard a soft grunt from the Wookiee. My resolve teetered on the edge once more.

Juhani was standing defenceless in front of me, brave pride holding her head high as she faced her end. Scorch marks and blood darkened the short downy fur on her arms. I paused again. Mission and Zaalbar are watching.

So what? They are nothing to me! I lifted Juhani's lightsaber towards her neck, felt the dark power of the Force hum in tandem with the scarlet 'saber, and saw acceptance on the Cathar's face. There was a sob behind me.

No!

“Kill me now, while you still have the power,” Juhani mumbled, her face close to mine. I stared into those tormented yellow eyes, and the maelstrom of emotions there reflected my own. Against my volition, my fingers hit the power switch on the lightsaber. It deactivated, hissing as it retracted.

Her eyes widened. “What is it you want?”

I could smell the tinny scent of blood on the air. I wasn’t sure if it was hers or mine. To know who I am. To not have voices in my head. To be able to use the Force, consistently. Now there's a thought. “I'll let you live, Cathar, if you teach me how to use the Force properly,” I said softly.

Juhani took a step back in surprise, shocked laughter escaping her lips. One hand clutched at the opposite arm, and she wavered unsteadily on her feet. “You cannot be serious! I have fallen! I am too weak for the Jedi, and too weak for the Dark Side!”

“Such insecurity,” I mocked, and saw the resultant anger flash in her slanted eyes.

“Leave me to my torment, or kill me now!”

Why do I not just kill her? I felt a shield slam down over my senses as the Force was cut off yet again. Bastila. The thought was weary rather than angry, this time. Like a harping shrew, Bastila’s very presence was inordinately exasperating.

Maybe now you will listen to me and tell me what is going on! she demanded. I cannot allow you to use the Force that way! I could feel anger there, from her, but there was also fear. Fear of me? Of course. For my rage had been real enough, and so had my dark use of the Force.

But the Cathar was hobbled, for now, and I was in not in any immediate danger. More than anything, I felt tired and annoyed. And deeply confused at everything.

At Jen Sahara. At acting like someone I was not, under a cloud of fogginess and a personality more foreign to me than Evil Bitch.

Oh, my rage was real enough. It was still there, simmering, deep within my gut.

My attention snapped back to the Cathar. Without the Force, bone-aching tiredness and burning pain from my side swung back to life.

“Ever had voices in your head, Juhani?” I asked the Cathar dryly. She blinked at me, and I could tell she didn't know what to make of me. I don't know what to make of me. I’m sure Bastila doesn’t either.

I couldn't trust Bastila, but she held power over me. Juhani was the first Force-user I'd come across, barring Bastila. Maybe she could help me. Maybe she can teach me how to break through Bastila’s shields.

“In return for sparing your life, you can train me in the ways of the Force.”

“Training? You, who bested me?” The pitch of her voice was high; disbelieving and incredulous. Her slanted tawny eyes widened as she stared at me.
“I don’t know what I’m doing,” I told her flatly as I sheathed my vibrosword. I held onto her deactivated saber; I did not think she was a threat anymore, but I wasn’t stupid, either. “Tuition seems a sensible course, and you’ve obviously had some Jedi training.”

Juhani looked away. "When I slew my Master, Quatra, I knew I could never go back," she mumbled. "I embraced the Dark Side and fled Dantooine. The only path left to me was this one, but at least it would give me the power to crush any who dared cross my path. Or so I thought."

My eyes narrowed. “You embraced the Dark Side, yet you ran away to hide on some remote desert planet?” I scoffed. “I don’t think you're as far down the dark road as you believe, Juhani.”

“Why are you talking at me still?” she snarled, her voice rising in pitch. “I cannot help you – I will not help you! I am nothing!”

“Nothing?” I snapped in derision. “No, you only managed to incapacitate a Twi’lek, a Wookiee and an insane robot with a wave of your hand!” I turned back to look at HK-47; he was still out of action. I’d barely had time to think about his acquisition, and there he was, a heap of disabled metal. I frowned. “Speaking of which, you owe me for repair parts. That's going to be at least a hundred credits.” I folded my arms and stared back defiantly at the Cathar. Mission snorted behind me.

Juhani shook her head in apparent bafflement. “Who are you? Are you just going to hound me constantly until I agree to your incredible demands?”

“Sounds good to me.” I smirked. If I can get this Cathar to teach me the Force, then I'll-

WHAT? Bastila's resounding scream echoed through my head, and I winced, raising a hand to cradle my face. Instead of killing whomever you have encountered, you are using them as a teacher?

Talk about your permanent migraine. Every time I thought I sensed Bastila at her most demanding, panicked, fearful state; her emotions seemed to top a new level.

I had to get rid of this bond.

“How can you be so foolish as to ask this?” Juhani asked, and her gaze was as serious as her voice was soft. “I have fallen, and I can never go back. Yet you would trust me to teach you?”

“I don’t trust you, Juhani,” I said flatly. Fallen, hah. She didn’t fall. She ran away. “Make one wrong move and I will kill you without a thought. However, keep your anger under control and we might just have a working relationship.”

No. No! I will teach you! Bastila pleaded in my head. You have a lot to answer for, Bastila. I responded coldly.

I- yes. Perhaps I do. But I will not entrust your Force tutelage to some strange evil Force-user you have just met!

I laughed suddenly. “And now she wants to teach me,” I muttered to myself. “Damn you, Bastila Shan.” She was becoming as bad as Carth in keeping me off-balance. But Bastila was dangerous where he was not, and had a hold on me that I couldn’t deny.

But it was the doctor who screwed my mind on Taris, not Bastila. That was true. My thoughts raced, trying to pick through the haziness of the last few days. It was all a clouded dream.

“Who—what did you say?” Juhani whispered, blinking at me. “You know Bastila Shan?”

I stared at her warily. Should I let Bastila know who I had encountered? There didn’t seem to be any reason not to, other than pique. Pique felt rather tempting, though.

_Bastila, heard of a Cathar called Juhani before?_

Bastila was silent for a moment; a tense knot inside my head. _That is who you met?_ Her mental voice was calmer, now, more controlled. _She was a Padawan at the Dantooine Enclave. She disappeared more than a year ago, and her Master searched for her in vain._

I frowned at the Cathar staring back at me. _She said she killed her master._

_No, although I believe she came close. Please, bring her back to the ship and I shall meet you there. Juhani cannot have fallen far to the Dark Side. I can help her._ Bastila sounded genuine. I wondered idly if it was possible to fake emotions within this strange bond of ours, as Bastila seemed truly concerned. I was not particularly disposed to think anything positive of her. And part of me couldn’t believe we were having an ongoing conversation in my frelling head. And at how natural it felt.

“Yes, I know her,” I replied to Juhani finally. “Annoying stuck-up Jedi. Won’t stop yelling at me inside my own head.”

“Inside your head? What do you mean?”

“I- oh, I don’t know,” I grumped. _I need some time alone. Away from this angry Cathar, away from Bastila._ Mission had walked cautiously to my side and laid a gentle hand on my arm. _Away from anyone I care about._ Caring was a weakness. Wasn’t it?

Juhani looked at the others warily, and Mission was frowning in return. My cheek throbbed from earlier when I had slammed it into a rock, and the burn on my side was chafing against the clothes. I’d been lucky to escape without any real injury, I knew.

“Juhani, this is Mission and Zaalbar. Try not to kill them again.”

Juhani actually flinched at that, her golden gaze darting between them both. The fact that she was so uncertain now, devoid of the dark emotions that had gripped her earlier, strengthened my judgment of her. She wasn’t a true Dark-sider. Zaalbar growled, stepping up to flank Mission who was still standing close to me. The Wookiee was still holding his vibrosword, black eyes fixed on the Cathar who stood nervously before us all.

“Let’s go back to Anchorhead,” I said to everyone at large. “I want to go back to Yuka Laka’s. Turns out the Ithorian sold us a droid with bust shields. He’s going to remedy that.” HK-47 has lasted a stupidly short time, and I wondered if his shields had degraded in storage. Still, his reflexes had been good, and his warning would have been useful had I not been stumbling around in a stupor. My gaze wandered back to the Cathar. “We’ll go back to our freighter after the droid is fixed. Bastila is there, and wants to talk to you. You owe me some Force lessons too.” My grip tightened on the foreign lightsaber. “I’m holding onto your weapon, though.”

“Jen,” Mission said, and I turned, raising an eyebrow at the girl. She looked uncertain. “What about Griff? I mean, I know we’re not in any shape for it today, it’s just…” she trailed off. _That’s right. Her selfish brother._ There’d been that encounter in the Anchorhead cantina, when I’d cowered in the corner and barely make a single peep.

That can’t happen again. I was angry, oh was I angry, but there was genuine fear there, too. What if it does happen again? I’d be avoiding doctors from now on. Could I be certain that Bastila was uninvolved though?

She must have had something to do with Jen Sahara's origin - or she knew something, at the least. She owed me some damn answers. My eyes narrowed.

“It's just…” Mission said again, frowning. “What is Bastila tries to stop us going out again?”

“Oh, she won't.” I smiled coldly at the Twi'lek. “She can try, if she likes. In fact, I almost hope she does.”

xXx

Juhani stumbled in front of us as we made our way back to Anchorhead. I didn’t wish that crazy Cathar at my back, but the defiance had gone from her. She seemed calmer, resigned to whatever fate I was leading her to. Mission and Zaalbar threw me worried glances but said little as we trudged on the dunes.

I pondered over the strange sense of familiarity that struck me back in the droid shop. Back then, I still fully believed I was Jen. My last clear memory had been the exhilarating escape from the Taris swoop track, and the dash to safety afterwards. Everything that occurred after that was a hazy muddle of barely remembered events. Just like the Endar Spire. I won’t let this happen again. A surge of furious determination swelled throughout me.

“You're okay now, right Jen?” Mission asked, breaking through my angry thoughts.

“Yeah, I'm fine,” I lied.

“B-but we're heading back now to the others. To Bastila,” Mission stammered.

I looked sideways at the Twi'lek, and wondered what she was thinking. Did she blame Bastila for my behaviour? Did I? Zaalbar said nothing, other than an irritated huff as he walked on the other side of Mission.

The days after the swoop race were a muddle of barely remembered events. It was interesting that I could recall all of Jen’s history and early memories with relative clarity, but not since we had left Taris.

What are we doing on Tatooine? Weren’t we headed towards Alderaan? I frowned. There’d been some sort of attack from the Sith, though. No, that had been Taris. My eyes slid to Mission, and I recalled just how upset she had been, and likely still was.

But there’d been a second battle when we exited hyperspace. Mission had spoken about it, quietly, as she sat huddled in the port quarters we called our temporary home. The neutral planet of Dantooine had been under attack-

Dantooine. Bastila said that was Juhani’s home Enclave. A Jedi Enclave.

Bastila had persuaded me to travel to Alderaan, but we’d headed to a Jedi planet instead.
She lied. She lied, and she drugged me. Anger stirred again, fierce and fiery, in heat waves that pricked over my skin. Bastila had tried to herd me towards a trap.

Would she have done that? She claimed, on Taris, to only want to help me. Maybe she had good intentions? Then why hadn’t she just told me? Because I’d refused to follow her, back on Taris. No. No, I couldn’t trust anything that came out of the snot’s mouth. She’d proven her lack of trustworthiness. No matter what was wrong with my mind, no matter who I really was – Street Kid or Evil Bitch – I couldn’t trust her.

But, I could learn what I needed to use the Force from both Bastila and Juhani, and then I would disappear. Just enough to embrace it consistently. To ensure Bastila’s shields can be overpowered.

And then I would leave. Bastila would not betray me again.

The stone walls of Anchorhead rose up to meet us, and Juhani paused in front. Her head bowed, and one hand batted uselessly at her filthy and torn tunic. It flapped in the slight breeze, covered in blood, sweat and dirt.

“I bet you’ll be glad for a shower,” I muttered as I walked closer. Her slanted gaze turned to fix on me in confusion.

“I do not understand you,” she said softly. “I tried to kill you, and you act as if it never happened. I have fallen to the Dark Side, and yet you leave yourself open to attack.”

“Sun and stars, Juhani, give over already,” I said wearily. “You're a strong warrior, and you don't give yourself enough credit. If you were truly evil, you would have lashed out at me again.”

“You are trusting; foolish almost. A naïve attitude I once shared.”

“We all have our demons to fight, Juhani.” I shrugged. “I don't need you to be another one of mine.”

“You struggle with the Dark Side also,” she whispered, and her alien eyes glistened as they stared at me. “I have sensed the anger and hate within you.”

“Guess that makes us two of a kind then, huh?”

She shook her head, a mournful expression on her face. “No. You bested me, in my darkness.”

“Stop it! You're stronger than this whining,” I snapped.

“Strength.... I suppose there is strength in resisting anger. The Dark Side of the Force is not what I thought.” Her lilting voice had dropped to a mere whisper, and she had bowed her head once more. She was a bit of an enigma, I thought, as I eyed her over in interest. She seemed to think little of herself at times, and yet I would also call her proud. A bit of a contradiction; maybe we did have more in common than she would admit.

“You mentioned killing your master in rage earlier. I assume you fled immediately after. I don't think you fell to the Dark Side as much as used it as an excuse for your own failure,” I said flatly. Harsh words that resulted in the Cathar jerking her head up to meet mine, her eyes flashing with fury. I smirked as I saw her gaze drop to the deactivated lightsaber held loosely in my hand.

“You think to judge me? You-” Juhani breathed in deeply as my grip tightened. Her expression became cold, remote. “What would you presume to know of the Dark Side, human?”
I shrugged. Like I can remember. “I don’t presume to know anything, Cathar. It just strikes me that you were running, that’s all.”

“I failed my Master! I failed them all. What else could I do?” Desperation chased the lingering rage from her slanted yellow eyes, and once more she stood in front of me, miserable and despondent.

"Learn from your mistakes?” I said sarcastically.

She blinked at me, surprised and silent. I sighed. “Look, if there’s one organization that preaches forgiveness and overcoming one’s flaws, it’s the sodding Jedi. Did you even think about going back?”

I felt the solid presence of Zaalbar at my back, and Mission next to him. The large automatic gates were not far behind Juhani, who stood there, wild and unkempt, staring at me intently.

At long last she let out a pent up breath. “Maybe you are correct. Maybe if I had the strength to take responsibility for my actions... the strength to resist my dark emotions. You have given me much to think upon, despite the callous tone of your words.”

I scowled. “Callous or not, you will still teach me.”

The Cathar inclined her head, but no emotion showed on her dirt-streaked face.

“I will repeat that I doubt I have much to teach you.” She turned around to stared back at the looming walls of Anchorhead, and lowered her voice to a dusky whisper. “I do not wish to walk through crowds of strangers, looking like this. I never thought I would fall victim to vanity.”

I laughed in surprise. She didn’t strike me as the sort who would care for the opinion of strangers, but she also looked a right mess. I doubted her clothing could be restored. The light amber fur that covered her body likely kept any sunburn away; had either Mission or I been clothed the same, we would no doubt be feeling the effects of exposure. Even the warrior’s tail on the top of the Cathar’s head was congealed together with some dark matter. She’d been a sight before we’d run into her.

“You look like a tough Cathar warrior who's just seen and won a fight to the death.” I imagined the citizens of Anchorhead would give her a wide berth. “Hah, I don't look too hot myself.” My cheek was stiff with bruising and blood, and there was a blackened rent in the loose desert robes. “I doubt anyone will approach us. We’ll just challenge them if they try, and I’m sure they’ll back off.”

Mission snickered behind me, but Juhani looked surprised. “You make light of the situation. You baffle me.”

I grinned at the Cathar, and motioned her onwards. Zaalbar was walking next to me, gazing at me with serious eyes. His arms were full with the dismantled parts of HK.

“(Be careful, Jen. You may be a little too trusting of someone who almost succeeded in killing you.)”

“Don't worry, I'm not,” I told him flatly. I was ready to flick Juhani's lightsaber on at the first sign of betrayal. But somehow I doubted the Cathar would turn on me again. Despite her earlier bent towards gratuitous violence, she now struck me as an honourable sort. Either that or I was particularly terrible at reading people.

The large automatic gates were made of some sort of durasteel alloy, bolted into the stone walls on either side. There was a sliding hole on one side, behind which was a Czerka guard.

“Uh, guys?” Mission’s tentative voice had us stopping and turning. “Um, I can’t find the hunting license. Or my tech spikes. I think they fell from my belt when she pushed us over.” Mission’s uncertainty vanished as she scowled at Juhani, folding her arms.

“(Shall we turn back?)” Zaalbar rumbled, shifting the droid in his arms.

“I’d rather get to the droid shop before it closes,” I said, taking note of the low sun in the sky. The second one had already set. “Leave this to me.”

I struck out, walking decisively towards the gates, and knocking on them loudly. There was a grating noise as the small sliding window was opened, and the beady eyes of a Czerka-clad Rodian stared back at me.

“Who are you?” he demanded.

"Hunters,” I responded. “You know, the people who head out to the dunes and kill stuff?”

“I don't recognize you. I didn't let you out,” he said boldly.

“Guard here every waking hour, do you?” I snapped. “Let us in.”

“Where's your hunting license?” he asked suspiciously.

_The Force, Bastila. Stop blocking me, or I swear I'll..._ I trailed my mind thought off. I didn’t know what I was going to do. I hadn’t quite thought that far ahead. But the barrier was gone when I reached out, and it was effortless to draw it in, fill my mind and my senses with life. I stared at the Rodian guard on the other side of the gate who had not been there this morning.

“I don’t need a hunting license,” I told him, my voice firm and commanding, the Force flickering all around me.

He scowled. “Everyone needs a hunting license, you idiot! You think Czerka lets just anybody walk the dunes?”

_Well, that didn't frelling work._ I breathed the Force in further, deep into my body and mind, ready to try once more.

But then suddenly my senses went into overdrive. The Force extended outwards under my fumbling grasp, and I became aware of the beings of life all around me in a wide sweeping radius. Mission, Zaalbar, and the Czerka guard were very faint, while Juhani was a bright, moody knot of confusion. Further beyond, I could sense a morass of life throughout all of Anchorhead, made from a thousand tiny specks of life and all indistinguishable from each other. _Whoa._ Here and there a brighter spot flared. My minds-eye touched on three such beings, dark and strong. And further, beyond them, there was a pulsing of white light that blazed brighter than anything else. _Is that Bastila? What is this?_

My confusion caused my hold on the Force to fumble and drop, and at once I was back to myself, blinking at the gate guard in confusion.

“Look, are you going to rack off, or do you want things to turn ugly?” the Czerka thug sneered, and my concentration snapped back to him.

I felt my brows lower in irritation. “I said, I don't need a hunting license.” I forced out, trying to push power behind every word with deliberate thought.

“Trying to be funny, are you?” the guard snapped angrily.
“This is ludicrous,” Juhani said, her voice in impatient as she shot me a wary look. “Perhaps I understand why you need a teacher.” She turned her attention to the hole in the Anchorhead gate. “We do not need a hunting license.” There. I could feel it, the Force, as it hummed weakly with the reverberation of her words, interleaving with the noise and giving her message an extra weight it would otherwise not have.

“I guess you don't, uh, need, um...” the guard trailed off, and then his face twisted in confusion. “Uh, hang on!”

A faint blush was evident beneath the dirty fuzz on the Cathar’s face. She glanced at me sheepishly. “I am afraid this sort of Force use was never my strong point, and I have been out of practice for some time.”

Mission guffawed in outright laughter, while I struggled to hide a snigger. The guard, however, was less than impressed.

“Go away!” he snarled, and our attention was drawn to a grating noise from the top of the gates. Turrets were swinging to aim at us, and just like that, my amusement vanished. “No licence, no entry!”

“I think I know how this Force thing works,” Mission said, an impish note in her voice as she smirked at me. She stepped forward to address the guard. “Don’t worry about them, they’ve gone a bit la-la from too much time out in the desert.” She tapped the side of her head as she gave the guard a sympathetic smile. “I’ve gotta get them to a doc. Look, open the door and I’ll slip you two hundred credits? I need to get these two eggheads out of the sun.”

Mission grabbed a couple of prepaid chits from her belt - and where in the Outer Rim had she found those? – and slid them through the opening of the gate. A moment later, and the large doors creaked open.

We walked inside cautiously, as three Czerka guards stared at us from behind raised blasters. Nevertheless, I had seen Juhani’s attempt, and felt confident of reproducing it.

“(Jen,)” Zaalbar growled, a warning in his voice as I stepped over to the guard at the gate. “(We are inside. This is time to leave well enough alone.)”

He was right, I realized, as a blaster aimed straight at my head. But I could end that thug’s life in an instant. It was a bit galling to admit, but the purpose for trying a mind trick once more would only be to satisfy my own pride. Reckless idiot, a voice said affectionately in my head. Overconfidence, a different voice, this one old and sneering with disapproval. You were always too damnably overconfident.

I shivered, the voices fled, and I turned to nod at Zaalbar.

“Yuka Laka’s,” I said through numb lips. “Lead the way, Zaalbar.” The Wookiee nodded, concern evident on his face, but he turned to stride through the crowd, his arms still full of burnished red metal.

Juhani was one step ahead, shooting wary glances at the crowd. Long shadows were drawn on the dusty path that led under the shaded tarpaulins, and the first merchants were beginning to pack up their stalls. Some stared at us, in particular Juhani and myself, and then deliberately avoided our gaze.

Mission was walking next to me. “So,” she said softly, her light brown eyes looking at me sideways. “That was… that was really something, back in the dunes. You can use the Force, huh?”

Both the posture of the Wookiee and the Cathar tightened in front of me. They were listening in, their hearing eclipsing that of a human’s, I suspected. “Yeah,” I said, sighing.

“Does that mean you’re going to be a Jedi?”

The Cathar slowed until she was on my other side, looking over to Mission in askance. “She is strong in the Force. That does not make a Jedi, however.”

“Yeah, no thanks,” I muttered. “If it means being as uptight at Bastila, I think I’ll pass.” Mission snickered at that, whilst the Cathar shot me a reproving look. Disapproval from one who had just tried to murder me was somewhat surprising, and I scowled in response.

“What’s… what’s been going on, Jen?” Mission asked, and her voice was quiet. “It’s Bastila, isn’t it? She’s been making you act all funny?”

I heard a gasp of surprise or perhaps indignation from the Cathar, but it barely registered. “I don’t trust her…” I whispered, and my gaze travelled away from Mission to stare unfocused in the distance. “But, I don’t know. I’ve got black spots in my memory, Mission. Things that don’t make sense. Just before we left Taris, I went to see a doctor and that made it worse. Bastila’s lied to me, and I don’t trust her… but I’m not sure what she has to do with the last week or so.”

I stopped in the street, answering Mission, but my thoughts were far away, disjointed and confused and deeply worried. I couldn’t get a grasp on myself. In the quiet times, I knew I was Street Kid and couldn’t be anyone else. But then the anger caught hold, and with it the Evil Bitch’s power… and then Jen Sahara would eclipse everything else with her meekness and fright. I breathed in deeply, and felt myself shuddering.

Mission was frowning at me. “Bastila was sure happy that you didn’t have a backbone, y’know.”

That doesn’t mean she’s responsible. But I’d already decided she was to blame for Jen Sahara, weeks ago. To blame? Or maybe she just knows more than I do? There was a strong part of me, and I wasn’t sure if it was Jen or Street Kid, that desperately wanted to believe in Bastila.

But there was too much stacking up against her.

A light breeze caught, lifting my tattered robe, and bringing with it a dusty, dry smell. An orange-red sun hung low in the sky, slowly sinking below the Anchorhead buildings. The air had a shimmer of heat to it, although it was less intense than earlier in the day. Locals meandering down the paths were clothed in light, loose tunics appropriate for this environment, and I could smell the burnt meat of a food stall nearby.

I’ve been here before. It was a deep, unshakeable certainty, a feeling of strong reminiscence, even as no memory resurfaced. It should have confused me further, frightened me. Or stoked the anger that buffeted uselessly against the cage of uncertainty around my very identity. But I was tired, and the emotions were not helping.

“Jen,” Mission said again, and I glanced sideways at her. Juhani was staring at me, her eyes wide and perplexed. She’d probably heard all of our conversation, and was wondering just whom she’d agreed to train. I felt the side of my mouth quirk. Wonder if she wishes she was still out there, slaughtering the wraids. Probably prefers her darkness to my sort of crazy.

“What is it, Mission?” But as I looked at the young Twi’lek, I knew who she was thinking about. I gave her a reassuring smile.
“Let’s go, Mission. We’ll head out for your brother tomorrow. I promise.”

The vow slipped out before I could retract it.

xXx
I could not stop my pacing, despite the burn of new blisters and the dull ache of weariness in the soles of my feet.

Where is she?

Had the volatile woman reverted fully to Darth Revan? My insides clenched in nauseating terror at the thought. While I did not truly believe that to be the case - not with the contrary mix of emotions flaring from her - I did know one fact for certain: the persona of Jen Sahara had been swept away with the blowing Tatooine sands.

What do I do? What can I do, now?

Persuasion. Compulsion. Sedation. Anything to keep her compliant, until you find the masters, a little voice whispered. Anything to keep yourself - and everyone who travels with you - safe.

It was tempting. All the more tempting, for I had already trodden down that path, had I not? I simply needed to decide on the best mechanism to subdue Revan. Leash her, somehow, find the safest way to contain her...

The sick feeling in my belly grew.

Through the bond, our thrice-cursed bond, there was a brief surge of emotion. Something light, something that felt an awful lot like empathy. Compassion, undercutting the black rage that had returned to the core of her soul.

Perhaps part of Jen Sahara is still there? I found my feet stilling, as my eyes closed and my mind centred on that damnable woman. If the overlay of the dead scholar still held, even in part, then it would be within my capabilities to, to...

The masters would not blame me. Master Vrook- perhaps he did not agree with the Council's actions, but he always disliked Revan, he would understand she needs to be contained-

A flash of humour on the Force. I jumped like a scalded felinx, frightened that Revan had been stalking my own thoughts in turn. But no, no... she did not seem aware of me in this precise moment; her diversion was entirely due to her companions or environment.

She is not Jen Sahara. Jen Sahara would not find anything remotely amusing after almost losing her life. I swallowed past a lump in my throat. Jen Sahara would not bond so easily with a Tarisian orphan, a Fleet officer, a Wookiee, a blood-thirsty Mandalorian...

My thoughts trailed off as I resumed my automatic pacing. Around and around the Ebon Hawk, with my eyes closed and my Force out-stretched and my mind in chaos.

Perhaps... perhaps part of her never truly fell? That seemed like nothing more than a flight of fancy. She had been the Dark Lord of the Sith. Was redemption possible from the depths of such depravity?
But why else did I save her?

The thought rang through my mind, clear and pure and scything through the thick fear with a glow of righteousness. My feet stopped once more, toes digging into the hard dirt of the dockyard.

Why else did I save her but to give her a chance at redemption?

For I had not known of the Star Maps or our bond until later, much later. In the moment upon her flagship, all I had thought about was mercy.

The Force, Bastila. Stop blocking me, or I swear I'll...

I recoiled, feeling the Force snap back to me, pulling away from the woman who had upended my life. I could not cut through her connection to the Force. No point, not now, not when earlier my misguided interference had come close to endangering her life.

I did not understand she was in mortal peril. I did not realize she had left the freighter. I...

I had been blocking Revan from the Force, and now she completely discerned my hold over her.

If I did not plan to control Revan; but instead, somehow, extend her a second chance... the second chance that my retrieval of her fallen body had started all those months ago... then that meant I required her trust.

Trust. How would it even be possible to ignite the embers of trust between us? Between two individuals so entirely different, whose relationship was already fraught with irritation and dislike and, and... distrust.

And, frankly, how was one individual's redemption truly important, when we had the fate of the galaxy to consider?

Somehow, I had started pacing again.

Forget the absurd notion of turning Darth Revan back to the light. Whatever the Star Maps led to might be our only chance at toppling Darth Malak. That was what Master Galdea had argued, during all those Council meetings that a padawan like myself should not have been a part of, if it were not for the mind-link I had unwittingly created.

This is the Force at work. I could still recall Master Galdea's impassioned arguments. The Dantooine Council had taken a long time to decide upon action, and I heard the same debates cycle over and over. Padawan Bastila's vision shows us that the Sith Lord's mind, no matter how broken, may still yield the odd glimpse of information that can turn the tide of war.

Padawan Bastila's initial desire was mercy. A chance at redemption. Master Karon had always sounded so sad. A personality overlay is no redemption.

Her mind is too damaged for anything else. The only knight with an equal standing amongst the masters had her own opinions, and they often aligned with Master Galdea's. Vima Sunrider spoke with the confidence of an expert in the field. Regardless of what you decide, if we do not construct some artificial framework then there is no point allowing her to reach consciousness.

From the most unlikely of sources, can redemption arise. Master Vandar would add in his roundabout vernacular. Artificial or not, the journey will still be true.

This is dangerous. Master Vrook would grumble the same sentiment most days. His manner was gruff, but I knew his concern was for me. Dangerous and fool-hardy. We risk Bastila-

"Would you stop that infernal pacing?" Canderous growled.

I blinked, abruptly returning to myself as the faded memories of my home enclave whispered away into memory.

Canderous, garbed in a hideous purple suit of armour, was seated upon the Ebon Hawk's loading ramp as he rifled through a collection of what looked to be grenades.

My mouth tightened as I turned away from the simple mercenary. I certainly did not dispute the man's competence, but his unhealthy obsession with battle bordered on nothing more than blood-lust.

At the close of everything, I was not sure if I dared any further interference with Revan. I was no longer sure it was the right path.

Trust. Can I, somehow, implore the damaged shell of Revan to trust... to trust me?

She had saved Juhani, after all.

Only so she could trick Force lessons out of her!

The very idea petrified me to the bone. Revan, using the Force. Being taught by a fugitive padawan? I had not known Juhani well; she was a quiet, intense soul who largely kept to herself. I knew she had failed her knight trials and fled, after badly wounding her master.

And now, I did not know who was more dangerous: a runaway who had embraced the Dark Side, or the amnesiac Sith Lord who had defeated her.

I bit back a hysterical laugh. Whatever had happened with Juhani, I vowed to myself I would help the Cathar return to the Jedi fold. She had strayed, but surely if she was returning so readily then she had not been truly lost. The masters would be thankful for her return.

But to think that Revan played a part in it....

A flicker of movement caught my attention and derailed my internal monologue.

Carth, striding toward us from the other side of the vast open-air docking bay. The last dimming of daylight encased the area in a golden glow, as the second sun of Tatooine winked out beneath a line of haphazard buildings.

The day had been a success, at least. We had ventured out into the sands and survived our first altercation with the fierce natives that plagued this area. I would have travelled further, had I not sensed Revan's predicament and demanded we return to Anchorhead with all haste.

We are a step closer, I reminded myself. Our hired rontos were back at the merchant's stall, awaiting our return tomorrow. I had studied the maps of the Eastern Dune Sea, and located the caves Master Galdea believed Revan and Malak visited, approximately four years ago.

Tomorrow, we might actually find the Star Map.

If only I could placate an angry, amnesiac Sith Lord, first.

"Good news," Carth called out as he neared, throwing me a crooked smile. He had made a bee-line for the local mechanics the instant we returned to the docking bay. "The relay's a common part, and they've sourced one locally. It'll be fitted by the end of tomorrow." A slight frown appeared on Carth's face. "The mechanics aren't exactly the most professional, though. I'd be keen to have a look over their work before heading off."

I nodded, glad of some other matter to occupy my mind. "That is indeed good news, Carth."

The ship's repairs were reason for me to celebrate, at least. In one day, I might be able to contact Coruscant. Patch a message through to the Jedi High Council stationed in the Core, for after Dantooine-

My eyes closed briefly. I had to believe Dantooine had survived. But after such an assault they might not be in any position to assist, so I would-

But I do not even know if this mission is sanctioned by the High Council!

There had been too many vows of silence amongst the Dantooine Council. And now, Master Galdea was dead. Master Vrook- I had to have faith he survived, or my grief would overcome me, but he had been on Dantooine-

Master Karon? Knight Vima? They were known for their wandering ways. Neither had been on Dantooine when I left. Perhaps, if I could track down Master Karon or Knight Vima, it would save me any unpleasantness in requesting aid from a High Council that might, I suspected, be wholly ignorant of Darth Revan's survival.

I must find help somewhere.

For I was acting blind, trying to keep a brain-damaged Sith Lord on a leash, who was slowly breaking through the intangible barriers on her way to reinvention.

Revan and I shared what was colloquially referred to as a bond. But that term was misleading, as in essence it was a Force link. One created when Revan lay dying before me. As a Dark Jedi, her emotions had been irretrievably enmeshed with the Force. While her soul cried in anguish, starting to separate from her body, her pain had radiated strongly through the Force.

I had been unable to simply walk away and let her die in the face of the despairing grief that engulfed her so wholly.

A spark of life had remained; a broken, tormented spark, but it was there nonetheless. I had struggled to sustain it, to fan it back into existence; and as I did so her ripples of agonized Force energy had flooded my own mind. Our respective grasps upon the Force had mingled in the most intimate fashion, as had our minds and our very consciousness.

Eventually, I had pulled back into myself, lulling Revan into a healing coma. But by then, our connections to the Force had become irrevocably intertwined. I had not realized it until months later, but each of us was in a state of continual vulnerability to the other.

And it was strong, oh yes. Stronger than even Knight Vima or Master Galdea had expected.

I sighed, closing my eyes in fatigue. Never again could one of us open ourselves to the Force without also opening a window to the other.

When she was Jen Sahara that had not been a problem. She had not been aware of the Force or the bond. Now, I only held one slim advantage over her.

Revan does not recall her training. Revan's mind had been brutally damaged and Knight Vima had not believed any form of recovery was possible, and that was before the personality transplant.

I wonder what Knight Vima would say now.

Revan did not, at least, yet know how to reach through that metaphorical window. And unlike me, she did not know how to draw the shutters, so to speak. Whenever she pulled upon the power surrounding her, I was able to simply reach through that window and erect a mental barrier between her and the energy she was attempting to draw.

And she cannot decipher my thoughts. Not yet. My strength had always lain in the ability to interpret and manipulate emotions and mental patterns. To that end, I could understand the outer, stronger thoughts passing through Revan's mind, provided I was concentrating on the bond at the time. I could also push out my own mental voice to her, making us essentially telepathic.

I grimaced. Telepathic with a Sith Lord. This is one gift I could readily forgo. I could only hope that Revan would not learn how to decipher my own thoughts in return, or the cover would surely be blown.

"You've got that funny look on your face again." Carth was frowning at me. "What's going on, Bastila? And why did you insist on returning so suddenly?"

A movement up ahead caught my attention, and providentially gave me an excuse for not answering Carth's rather pointed question.

But the trio of dark flares in the Force shocked me into silence.

Imbecile! I am so wrapped up in my own plagued thoughts that I completely failed to take account of my surroundings!

Three robed figures had sauntered into the docking bay, all holding a telling metal cylinder in one hand.

The last merchant still out selling his wares - despite the oncoming of dusk - squeaked and scuttled away. The black cloaks and ready walk of the strangers gave their identity away to all and sundry.

Dark Jedi. Dread stabbed sickeningly in my belly. Here, on Tatooine?

"Looks like we've got company," Canderous drawled from the ramp, swiftly getting to his feet as he unhitched his weapon with one hand and grasped a grenade with the other. I heard a muffled grunt from Carth as he pulled out a blaster.

The robed sentient in the lead stopped ten metres from me. A dark hood shadowed over his face. In my periphery, I could see the nearest Czerka official sidle away.

The remaining two black-clad figures stopped, flanking the first, and the sound of three lightsabers hissing to life echoed in the stillness of dusk.

"Bastila Shan," the leader chuckled. "Lord Malak was most displeased when he learned you had escaped Taris alive. He has promised a great reward to whoever destroys or captures you, and I'm not about to let that bounty hunter claim you first."

He raised his lightsaber, an ominous double-beam of red, and his side-kicks followed suit with their singles.

Three Dark Jedi, and me without a lightsaber.
I unsheathed my vibro-staff, and pulled deep on the Force. The fear over Revan, the grief over Dantooine, all my roiling emotions faded into steady resolve. The Force was with me, and I would be steadfast.

"You shall not take me, Dark Jedi," I said softly. A stalling mechanism, for the words allowed me precious seconds to envelop myself and my companions in a Force-activated shield. It would not stop any sort of melee damage, but at least the shield would absorb any dark Force assault. For as long as I could hold it. "You are no match for the light side of the Force."

"Aw, no lightsaber?" one of the side-kicks sneered as the leader took a step closer. All the while, I kept drawing the Force in deep. "This is the fabled Bastila Shan, wielding a stick?"

"Use your vibroblades," I muttered over my shoulder. Peace, but I had to hope neither Carth nor Canderous would be foolish enough to fire a blaster at a Force-user.

"Don't scoff at the easy victories," the first one drawled, taking another step. And another-

The Force unleashed from my fingertips, a mighty wave of concussion that slammed into the trio of Dark Jedi.

They stumbled back, and I was already sailing toward them, vibro-staff sweeping through the air to slice straight into the unguarded torso of the nearest.

He fell with a cut-off gurgle, but I was sweeping around, just as a buffet of something truly dark assailed my Force-shields, seeping into the nascent protection-

The world exploded.

"Block that, miro'sik!" someone yelled.

Thrown backward, I landed in the dirt, vibro-staff dropping from my unfeeling hands.

Rolling frantically, scrabbling to my feet, ears ringing as I desperately called my weapon back to my hands-

Just in time to see Carth run one through with a vibroblade, while Canderous shot the other, fallen from the blast, straight through the head.

The explosion... the explosion had been a fragmentation grenade!

"You are lucky you are not dead!" I cried, even as my limbs sagged in relief at the sight of three still bodies. "A grenade... you foolhardy mercenary! The Dark Jedi could have simply thrown that back to you!"

"Settle down, sweet cheeks," Canderous panted, as he crouched over a warm corpse, industriously stripping the now-dead Dark Jedi. "I do what the situation calls for."

"What... what did you just call me?" I hissed.

Carth was frowning at the Mandalorian, but there almost seemed to be a measure of respect in the pilot's gaze. "That was a pretty short fuse, Ordo. Deliberate?"

Canderous grunted in assent, but did not pause from his corpse-robbing.

I fumed, unwilling to admit the Mandalorian may have had a measure of sense in his actions, may have caused the grenade to detonate prematurely- may have fought against Jedi in the past. His large hands grappled on the fallen Dark Jedi's lightsaber, and with an instinctive twist of power I abruptly pulled the cylinder into my waiting hands.

Canderous threw me an amused smirk, which I ignored as I strode forward to retrieve the other two lightsabers.

I pocketed the single blades, and reactivated the double-bladed lightsaber experimentally.

The blood-red hue was undeniably wrong, and I could feel the taint of the kaiburr housed within resonate discordantly on the Force. But the lightsaber was otherwise a well-designed weapon, nicely balanced and with a good weight. It would tide me over until I found myself a proper Jedi lightsaber.

Perhaps, if I locate another crystal, I might be able to reconstruct this weapon. It would be a shame to destroy a fine lightsaber such as this. It was light, sleek and smooth in its movements.

Carth stood in front of me, his frustration clearly visible through the whirling scarlet of the lightsaber. I snapped off the weapon, and raised an eyebrow in inquiry.

"Yes?"

"They were after you, Bastila. And, they mentioned a bounty hunter," Carth said, his tone serious. He even looked a little angry.

I blinked. Bounty hunter. That meant someone else on our tail, but a mere bounty hunter would not be as much danger as three Dark Jedi.

"I'm surprised they realized you escaped Taris, let alone that you made your way to Tatooine."

Carth's voice was heated, now. "Tatooine, the original destination of the Endar Spire. Malak knows what you're doing. Stang, I don't, but the Dark Lord of the Sith does! When are you going to explain what you're really after?"

Indignation rose in me at Carth's insubordinate tone. I felt my lips pursing. "Carth, I believe I have already explained it to you. We are searching for a Force relic that will aid the Republic in the war against Malak."

"Well, what does this relic do?" he asked in exasperation. "And why did you get so panicky earlier and insist we go back to the Ebon Hawk? I hate being left out of the loop, Bastila!"

"You were born out of the loop, Onasi." A voice, sardonically amused, cut through the stagnant air and had us both spinning in surprise. Revan stood some distance away, a smirk apparent under a layer of grime and blood that belied her day's activities.

I had not seen her coming. Force, I'd been so intent on my current surroundings, I had not even sensed her arrival.

Much like the three Dark Jedi.

I could not afford to be caught by surprise again.

"Cute, sister, but I-" Carth stopped mid-retort as he fully registered Revan's state and that of her companions.

I stifled a gasp despite myself. Revan and the young Twi'lek were garbed in desert clothes they had not worn earlier, right down to the desert-cloths wound around their heads. But Revan's clothing was charred in several places, and a deep bruise was purpling on her cheekbone. Her expression was one of mingled exhaustion and amusement.

My dazed eyes slid over to the Cathar Juhani, who looked in even worse condition, standing awkwardly in Revan's shadow.

Canderous barked a laugh. "Well, well, Jen. Looks like you had more fun than us."

My attention remained on the Cathar, and I pushed out gently with the Force to sense her emotions. Confusion and guilt were the strongest. If there was still anger, there, it was buried deep.

Revan, in contrast, simmered with rage.

"(A fine battle. A shame you weren't there)." Revan shot a grin at Canderous. An incongruous contrast with the dark emotions I could feel from her.

"(Sick of the act then, I take it?)" Canderous responded. I narrowed my eyes. Revan hasn't spoken Mandalorian since the time I first met Canderous.

"Okay, what's going on?" Carth demanded, his face a gathering thundercloud. "Why are you lot covered in blood? Who is that?" He added, pointing to Juhani who had taken a hesitant step backwards. "And why did you all leave the Ebon Hawk after promising not to, or shouldn't I even bother?"

"That is a valid point," I interjected smoothly, levelling a disapproving look both at Revan and Mission. "You swore to stay within the safe confines of the ship."

"Hey, you ain't my mother!" Mission protested, glaring at me. "Just 'cause you're a high and mighty Jedi, don't mean you get to tell me what to do!"

The Wookiee huffed from beside the upset Twi'lek, and laid a restraining hand on her arm.

"Query: Permission to blast these whining meatbags, master? They appear to be threatening you."

A strange, metallic voice from behind Revan yielded yet another unwelcome surprise. A smug smirk played along Revan's lips as a burnished red and decidedly evil looking robot strode to her side.

"What in the Outer Rim is that?" Carth snapped, his brows lowering.

"My latest toy," Revan purred. "HK-47, these are the rest of our crew. Threaten them if you will, but do not physically harm them."

I could feel my annoyance burgeoning alongside Revan's damnable amusement. I wondered, idly, if this was how Master Karon had felt, all those years as the wretched woman's master.

I must calm down. I must appease her, I must garner her trust. Somehow.

There is no emotion; there is peace.

Everything did not revolve around Revan, and I would not give her the satisfaction of losing my temper. For I could not forget Juhani. The Cathar had retreated behind the large form of Zaalbar, and looked ready to bolt. I took a few steps towards her.

"Juhani. It is good to see you again, sister," I said, keeping my voice soft as I walked towards her. Juhani's slanted amber eyes were tormented as they met mine.
"Bastila," she whispered. "It has been some time."

It had, indeed. I had once shared a difficult training mission with Juhani and her stand-offish master. My own master was seen as harsh and forbidding, but Juhani's I found downright rude. Master Vrook had always treated me with the utmost respect, even while limiting my responsibilities and influence.

Our fieldtrip had been interesting, and my respect for the intense Cathar had grown, even though I barely spoke to her afterward. I had been saddened to hear of her disappearance.

I wonder if the masters know Juhani fell to the Dark Side. She didn't seem evil or that lost, now, only confused.

But Revan had fought her earlier. It had taken me some time to understand the danger Revan had been in, but it had been real enough. That it is Revan who brought her is astonishing. That Revan did not kill her outright-

A sign from the Force, perhaps, that anyone could be saved from the path of evil. Even Revan herself. There is good in her. I can sense it. And I am not sensing the remnants of Jen Sahara.

I had to continue what I had started, all those months ago on the command deck of the Nexus, Darth Revan's flagship that burned above the skies of Deralia.

"Juhani, Jen, perhaps we should go inside? I believe you would both enjoy some time in the refresher to clean up, and then we should talk."

Juhani nodded slowly, and seemed content enough to follow me into the Ebon Hawk. Revan's expression was inscrutable but she, too, walked behind me. As we reached the central hub of the freighter, Revan ordered that odd droid into standby mode, and I felt a flare of irritation.

I do not know where she obtained that droid from, or how, but I believe we would be better off without it. I'd only heard it speak once, but it was enough to convince me that all this HK-47 could do was encourage the darker aspects of Revan's nature to emerge.

I had planned to bring Juhani to the women's quarters and associated sonic refresher, but Revan had other ideas, striding off toward the pilot's quarters I had claimed as my own. I breathed in deeply, and motioned Juhani to follow. I did not think the Cathar was ready to be by herself yet.

"So, care to explain to me why I should trust you?" Revan asked as the hatch swished closed behind us. Her voice was cold, and the room cramped with three sentients squeezed inside.

"Jen, I-"

"Hey, explain to me why I should even be here. I mean, you've drugged me, lied to me and blocked me from the Force. And that's only what I've figured out. My memory's all screwed up, so I could be forgetting all sorts of sins you've committed against me."

I closed my eyes. *"Please, do not be ridiculous." Deep in the back of my mind was a glimmer of relief. She had not noticed any of the compulsion. That would have turned her completely from me, I suspected. "If I wished to incapacitate you, I would have done so by now."

"Then why lie about Alderaan? Why the sedative?" she bit out. My eyes opened, to see Juhani backed up by the durasteel hatch, her ears laid flat against her head as her gaze darted between the two of us."
I sighed heavily. I need Revan's trust. "I admit I used rather unconventional methods to coerce you toward Dantooine. You are a strong Force-sensitive, Jen, and I felt you needed to talk to a Jedi Master as soon as possible."

Her jaw set. "So you were trying to trap me?"

"No!" I protested, even though it was, in a sense, true. "I was trying to get you to help, Jen. I have been worried about you. I can sense a lot of anger from you, and this combined with your strong Force ability is enough to unnerve any seasoned Jedi. Dark emotions such as anger, hate and passion are a sure road to the Dark Side."

"Passion is a dark emotion?" Her voice, her emotions, changed abruptly from anger to amusement. It was as unnerving as the grin curving her lips.

"Yes, if uncontrolled. Jedi use peace of mind, a calming of all emotion - serenity, if you will - to harness the Force. If your emotions are unbalanced, then your ability with the Force becomes flawed and unpredictable."

She had narrowed her piercing green eyes. "But my strongest moments with the Force have been when I am at my angriest."

"Well, that- that is due to a lack of training," I stuttered. This is a conversation a master should be leading, not me! "Emotions can be used to fuel the Force, as it were, but this is merely the quickest way to power and not necessarily the strongest. It is a path fraught with danger, as the Dark Side works insidiously through irrational and illogical emotions, until it ends up controlling you. This is why we teach Force-users to clear their mind, to work through situations with no emotion and no bias."

"Okay." She paused, and then abruptly switched topics. "So why is my memory screwed up then? Don't fob me off, Bastila. Don't you dare."

I had been dreading this line of questioning for the last hour, and had spent the time attempting to think of believable answers she would accept. Half-truths and part-lies... but I needed her trust. More than anything else, however, I needed to make her aware of just how potentially dangerous and harmful the Dark Side could be. "You were once a Jedi, Jen. A young, powerful Jedi with a bright future ahead of you."

Surprisingly, her eyes softened. Juhani was staring at her in a new light, and I wondered exactly what the Cathar thought of her.

"So what happened?" Revan asked softly.

"Your mind was destroyed, Jen." I responded quickly, evasively. "I fear to tell you too much in case I do more damage. This is why you need to speak with-"

"Do more damage?" The soft look vanished, to be replaced by a shaft of anger that echoed through our bond. "I told you not to fob me off!" she growled.

"I am not! Listen to yourself!" I hissed. Did she scare me or annoy me? It was becoming hard to tell. "Your emotions take control of you all too easily! Your rage, your lust for battle, even your inconvenient humour! You are so open to the Force, with no recollection of your training, and yet you let your passions guide you!"

She had folded her arms stubbornly, glaring at me in fury. Juhani chose that moment to speak up in her accented voice. "That is the path of the Dark Side, is it not? Allowing your feelings to overcome your better judgment..." The Cathar trailed off, looking away. I thought perhaps I caught a glint of tears in her eyes, but my attention was once more taken with Revan.

"So, what will you deign to tell me about myself, then?" she said sarcastically.

I breathed in deeply, overlooking her childish tone. I need to impress upon her the folly of the Dark Side. And what was the best way to do that?

The hero of the Republic, Revan Freeflight, would have prided herself on her strength. I imagined the Sith Lord would have done the same.

I had to keep the cover story as correct as possible, so it would ring true; but if I could make her believe the Dark Side made her weak...

I wished again Juhani was not listening. She perhaps knew more of the Dark Side than I did, or ever would. "As I said, Jen, you were a strong young Jedi." I paused, bracing myself. "When Malak and his master left to fight in the Mandalorian wars, against the Council's orders, you followed them."

Revan blinked. "I did? I recalled something about the Mandalorian wars..." she trailed off, and glared at me in suspicion again.

I continued. "Along with many other Jedi, you fell to the Dark Side after the war was over."

Juhani gasped, and her gaze shot to Revan in surprise. Revan's face, however, had turned to granite. Implacable, expressionless granite. I ventured mentally into the bond, but I couldn't sense anything. It was as if she refused to allow herself to feel at all.

But I had to finish my explanation, and hope it would be enough. "You became a tool, Jen, a tool of the Sith Lord." I could not bring myself to name Revan as her master. "You had once been a strong, capable Jedi, until you fell. You turned into a slave to the Dark Side, a slave to the Dark Lord. You lost your own free will and strength of mind. Your power diminished over time, and you became weaker in the Force. Eventually you were involved in a confrontation with some of the Jedi."

"And then what?" The words were hissed out, low and dangerous.

"Jedi do not kill, Jen. Your mind, however, was damaged beyond-"

"Jen Sahara," she spat, cutting into my explanation. "Who is Jen Sahara?"

I blinked, and felt my fingers clench. "Jen, you are Jen Sahara. What you know, what you remember, is your past before you found the Jedi and joined the Order. What happened to your mind... it destroyed your more recent memories, everything you once knew of the Force." It was a bald-faced lie, and I kept my face impassive as the words spewed forth. Guilt writhed like a sandsnake in my belly. Jedi do not lie. Would Revan even believe it?

But what was the alternative? I did not know her thoughts about Jen Sahara, but I dared not let her come to the conclusion that she was the victim of mind-altering Force powers. A personality transplant. Most Jedi would not believe it possible. Most would not consider it ethical. And even despite her gross transgressions, I was not sure I did. "You need the guidance and help of a master, and I am but a padawan. Although I am willing to help retrain both you and Juhani, if you will let me."

Her eyes were glacial as she stared into mine. I could still sense nothing, absolutely nothing from the bond. The thought that she might be learning to block me, consciously or not, scared me further.

Her eyes narrowed further. "Explain this mind-link we share."

I should have thought up a plausible story for the bond. But I had spent the time bracing myself for Revan's return, I could not conceive possible answers to all her queries in advance. More lies. I act less like a Jedi the longer I am around her.

I sucked in a breath. "It grew upon the Endar Spire, an unexpected event. You must understand that we did not believe you would recover from the brain damage you had sustained. We did not think you would ever reconnect with the Force." I took another, deeper, gulp of air. "You had studied in the past, and your area of research aligned with ours, so it made sense to have you onboard. We were there to look after you and ensure you were adjusting to a life without the Force. As for the bond... perhaps it was because I kept checking up on you from a distance. I do not know for sure. Perhaps a master can explain it better to you."

Revan folded her arms. Her face was belligerent, disbelieving. "Except that there is no master around, is there? And I have no wish to meet one."

You will. I shall ensure it. I merely had to contact one first. "Like it or not, we are linked. Our connection allows us glimpses into each other's mind. We can feel some of what the other feels." I paused, and laid a mental ear through the bond yet again. Revan's emotions had returned, now: frustration and anger and fear. "And what I feel within you troubles me. A Jedi must receive considerable training. They must learn to control their emotions and darker impulses. Often it takes years before utilizing the Force in the most basic of manners can be considered safe. The fact that you are so strong in the Force and have no recollection of any training-"

"Okay, I get it!" she said through gritted teeth. I breathed in again and recited the Jedi Code once more. Was any of what I said getting through to her? Did the fact that she had fallen to the Dark Side faze her at all? Patience. It will not be for much longer. Carth had said one more day until the communication system was back up; one more day in which we might be able to locate and examine the Star Map.

Then, provided the Force was with me, we could be on our way to Coruscant, or to rendezvous with Master Karon or Knight Vima.

Revan could become someone else's problem for a time.

If I could find the Star Map, and return Revan to a master, then surely- surely- I would show Master Vrook I was ready to become a Jedi Knight.

For he still lived. I would not believe otherwise.

"I think I'm going to get cleaned up," Revan muttered, wincing as she rolled her shoulders. She shot me one last frustrated glare, and then her emotions in the bond died down again to an imperceptible level. I wondered what effect my revelations had on her, if any. She was a frightening, unpredictable woman, and it was difficult to know how to gain her trust. Perhaps if I helped her?

"Wait," I commanded, and to my surprise she stopped mid-stride. "Let me help." I drew on the Force, and sank it deep into Revan's body. She was in better shape than I expected, with one large burn on her side, a lump on her cheek, and a few minor cuts and grazes. She gasped, stumbling backwards, shivering and flushing as the Force healing swamped her.
"Don't do that!" she snarled. "Not without asking!"

I blinked in surprise. "I am sorry," I said stiffly. "I was only trying to help."

"Ask first," she bit out, throwing me a furious glare before storming out. Juhani was standing motionless next to the door, an uncertain look on her face.

The familiar chagrin swept through me as I recalled Carth's hostile reaction to the same. I sighed, and motioned towards Juhani. "Would you like Force healing?"

She bowed her head. "It would make sense. Thank you, Bastila."

The Cathar said nothing as I laid a hand on her, and concentrated the Force through her damaged body. The electricity burns I had expected, but my teeth still gritted in reaction as I came across them. Revan, transforming Force energy into lightning. That is bad, indeed. I could cut Revan off from the Force still, yes, but I was unwilling to push her anger too far. She broke through my shields twice when she was fighting Juhani. It was simply frightening that the one edge I had over Revan - my ability to manipulate our mind-link - could be waning.

"Thank you," the Cathar gasped as I finished. She gave a slight shiver at the hot-cold reactions to the healing. Her gaze was locked on the closed hatch that Revan had walked out of.

"So she is like me, then," Juhani whispered. "A fallen Jedi."

I drooped, sagging against the wall. I looked at the Cathar, and did not know if I was up to dealing with her issues as well. Here I am, attempting to guide two who have fallen to the Dark Side. One of them used to be a Sith Lord. A bubble of hysteria threatened to fall from my lips, but I swallowed it back. "Juhani, you are ready to come back to the Jedi? Are you willing?"

Her strange, feline eyes escaped mine, skittering away to focus in the shadows of the dimly lit room. She hesitated for a moment before speaking. "I do not know, Bastila. I think- I think there is much I have to make up for. Jen forced me to look at myself; at my actions, and at my weaknesses."

I could not quite stop the small noise of surprise that erupted from my throat. Revan? A voice of wisdom? Obviously she had said something to turn the Cathar away from the darkness.

Revan was always known for her charisma, a little voice chided in my head. Both before and after her fall.

Juhani twitched at my reaction. A glitter of determination, or something similar, flashed through her amber eyes. "Perhaps she makes sense to me because she understands the Dark Side. Although she has no memory of it?"

"Yes," I said shortly. I did not want to talk about Revan's history with Juhani, and disliked the implication that Revan was better at handling this sort of situation because she had once fallen herself. That notion is simply preposterous. It is her fall which makes her weak, dangerous.

I focused again on the bond linking me to Revan, but could sense no emotion from her whatsoever. It was like she had detached herself from the situation, for all I could feel was an empty numbness.

But then, right at that moment, the wall crumbled, and a powerful surge of fear and heartbreaking misery cascaded through the mind-link. I staggered with the force of it, dazed.

Juhani’s head jerked upwards, her eyes alert. "I can feel something... someone's pain," she murmured. "Jen?"

The Cathar pressed against the hatch control, and ran from the room. That she had sensed Revan's distraught emotional state stunned me even further, and held me motionless for a moment.

"Wait!" I called out, following her speedily. I dashed down the empty grey corridor of the Ebon Hawk, but Juhani was already ahead of me.

Panting, I reached the port bunkroom. Rage and confusion were paramount now, seeping through the bond from Revan, and for the umpteenth time I wished I was not placed in this scenario.

But I am, and I will be strong and wise enough to deal with it.

It was not just about proving my worth. I could not quell the empathy that sparked within me at Revan's emotional turmoil. She scared me, she irritated me... and yet, and yet - I still bore a kernel of hope that within her was the great Jedi Knight of the past.

Revan was curled up on the small bed, her dark curls clutched in clenched fists, with Juhani kneeling in front of her.

"We both fight it, do we not?" Juhani murmured as I cleared the doorway. "The Dark Side, and all of its inviting power, and freedom from moral obligations."

"I don't even know who I am." Revan's voice was harsh, guttural. "Why should I even bother to fight it?"

"No!" I cried out, appalled, moving toward them in instinct. Both Juhani and Revan look up at my call, and the look on the latter's face was... twisted. Twisted with a vortex of dark emotions that echoed within our bond. "No," I said again, frightened, and knelt next to Juhani. Revan stared at me with startled green eyes, eyes that looked slightly darker than previously.

Was I imagining it? Were her eyes, her soul, already changing for the worse? Her gaze had been as black as space, once.

"Please, let me help you," I begged, reaching a hand out to her.

She blinked at me, and her pale face suddenly revealed a vulnerability I did not think I had seen before. I could sense her anger dimming, overshadowed by a growing uncertainty. I could almost convince myself that something like hope, too, was budding in her soul.

Almost.

Revan looked away, and then back to me, and her expression had composed itself. Her eyes deliberately trailed me up and down, as one eyebrow raised, and the bond flattened into emotional silence again.

"I guess it's time for our lessons then, huh?" she said flippantly, a forced smile pasted on her face. Juhani also glanced back to me, waiting. I nodded slowly, inwardly thinking their refresher stints could wait.

"Yes," I concurred. "Let us begin."

xXx
I sat down slowly on the bottom bunk, my muscles clenching in protest at the movement. The healing Bastila had forced on me certainly helped, no matter how intrusive it was. But the thought of kolto or even bacta patches was preferable to the unwelcome invasion of her Force. She meant well, Jen murmured and Street Kid echoed her, adding on: even if she is a rude snot.

Yet the thought of someone intruding into my body without my permission was infuriating. I'd reacted poorly to her- and I still felt like baring my teeth.

And then there were the revelations she'd dumped on my head. Some, made sense. Some didn't. And some had the taste of blatant lies.

Jen Sahara sure as stars ain't my past. The sheltered commune on Deralia had been Jen's childhood; quiet days of simple farm work and sheltered piety, broken only when I had- Jen had-scored that scholarship to the neighbouring Academia. It was her history, not mine.

Street Kid came from a poverty-stricken deprivation worse than Taris. As for Evil Bitch- well, she probably hailed from Hoth or some other place as cold and dark as her heart.

They were different people to Jen Sahara.

Was Bastila lying? Or is her claim of ignorance correct? Could it be that, despite our mind-link, she doesn't know the whole of my history? I refused, utterly, to even consider the possibility that Bastila might be correct. Jen wasn't me. It might be the only name I had for myself, but it wasn't mine.

Yet that wasn't everything. Bastila said I'd been a Jedi. Well, it seemed likely. Both Evil Bitch and Street Kid must have had training from somewhere. So which one had been the Jedi?

At least it didn't take a genius to work out which one had fallen to the Dark Side.

The Dark Side… it was scary just how compelling it was. It was scary how part of me truly believed it was the right way.

I sighed heavily, and forced those thoughts away. Dragging my knees up to rest my chin on them, I moved on to the latter part of the evening. Our little Force session earlier had annoyed rather than enlightened. Bastila, it seemed, wished to take things very slowly. Considering Juhani had until recently been a psychopathic murdering plague upon the dunes, I supposed I couldn't blame her- but it didn't quell my impatience. I understood that frelling code the first time she said it. Why Bastila thought repeating it a hundred times to Juhani and me both would help, I had no idea; but it certainly had not lulled me into a deeper meditative state as was her stated intention. There is no damn emotion, or there won't be after I throttle her.

Well, satisfaction was probably counted as an emotion.

I scowled. I needed time to examine all aspects of what Bastila had imparted to me.Can I trust what she said? To be sure, some of it made perfect sense. My thoughts tracked back to the earlier flashbacks I'd had on Taris. One mentioned coming back after the Mandalorian wars. I frowned, thinking on that recollection as best I could, but it had started to fade the moment I'd come to – and that had been weeks ago. And I still have no idea who that man was... He'd been important to Street Kid, though.

I didn't know why I had three different people in my head, either. Was it a sign of a mental disorder? I'd tried seeking help, the result of which landed me in a dazed stupor only a near-death experience could snap me out of.

It had turned me back into Jen. Just like back on the Endar Spire, before I'd cracked my head open. But after my head injury... once the alarms had started wailing on that doomed Hammerhead-class cruiser, I'd come to and it hadn't taken me long to know I wasn't Jen Sahara.

If only I could narrow it down further.

As for the bond... Somehow, I had to stop Bastila having the ability to cut off my Force power. As soon as I'd seen her outside the Ebon Hawk, I'd struggled and striven to feel absolutely nothing, to keep all my emotions under an imaginary shield of indifference. There'd been times I'd wondered if I was picking up on her emotions; which made me assume she could do the same in reverse. Even better than me, for Bastila had training where I did not, and I couldn't deny her strength in the Force.

So I'd tried my damnedest, as I walked away from her presence and her dubious revelations, to feel nothing but a detached numbness.

It'd been working... until I broke down. I closed my eyes in embarrassed recollection. Hey, it could have been worse. I could have started bawling in front of Canderous. I snickered as I imagined the derisive look that would have appeared on the veteran's rugged face.

Stop evading the issue. I lost control. That was weak. Pathetic. I dragged a blanket over myself half-heartedly. Weak and pathetic? Like the Dark Side is? That didn't fit, somehow. Bastila assured me I'd turned into a mindless tool of Darth Malak. Me? A cowering minion? I am no one's minion! What was the stronger, the Dark Side, or the resistance of such?

If only I knew Bastila's agenda, then I might have a better handle on her honesty. Jedi did not lie, except that Bastila already had. She is nothing. She tries to make me doubt my own self! Although I'd already been doing that before she came along.

I sighed in frustration, and gave up on inner reflection for the night. I was exhausted, mentally and physically, and thought it might be time to get some well-deserved rest. Let's try some of those simple meditative techniques Bastila was cramming down my throat.

I cleared my mind after a struggle, and slowly fell into an uneasy sleep.

…

An older Zabrakian woman stood before me, frowning. She was dressed in loose fitting tan robes, holding a cyan coloured lightsaber pointed at me.

Her stance was ready, waiting; but she did not appear in the least bit threatened or anxious.

…

The vision spiralled into nothingness as I clutched after it, in a drowsy state of semi-wakefulness. Who was the Zabrak? She looked like a Jedi? But the details fled, and slowly fatigue overcame me once more. I drifted off again into a restless sleep.

...

"It's in here somewhere. I can feel it," I whispered as I took another step into the darkness. The air smelled damp and rancid; probably a natural odour in a krayt dragon's habitat.

"Better be. Only for you would I traipse through this gods-forsaken desert." The words husked past my ears as I felt hands trail over my robed arms from behind. I could almost see him grin cockily as he pushed aside my hood to kiss my neck. "Only for you would I face dragons."

I turned in his arms, shivering despite myself. Our path had turned harder and bloodier than I could have ever expected, but at least we stood together. There were few left that I wholly trusted, and he stood at the forefront of them.

He ran a hand gently along the side of my face. His eyes, whiskey-brown and familiar, were burning with intensity. My lips curved as he lowered his face to mine.

"You smell of krayt blood," he murmured, before pressing forward in a gentle kiss.

"And you are distracting me." I pushed him away despite the welcome tightening in my stomach. There's a time and a place for distractions... not here. Physical satiation can wait.

"Fine," he grumbled. "Lead on then."

I turned from him, and walked further into the musty cave. Bones and rotting carcasses lined the cavern walls, but my goal was further ahead. A dark, cloying presence swirled in the Force. This is it, then. This is our next step. I could see some sort of metallic object up ahead, and I knew it was the Star Map.

"Well, well. Only our fourteenth cave, and finally we hit the jackpot." His sardonic tone couldn't swamp down my excitement as I investigated the old Rakata relic, crouching down and activating it with a brief pulse of Force power.

The Map opened, creaking from disuse, and a sharp blue light spiked into my vision. I squinted as the ancient navigational map unfolded in front of us.

...

The image blurred and faded; I could feel myself frowning, shifting uncomfortably in my bed; but a weary lassitude sat heavy in my limbs and my mind. There was a sense of watchfulness from somewhere or someone... a worried sort of fear... and it wasn't mine. I struggled to think more on it, but my body demanded more sleep. I sunk back into the realm of slumber.

...

"I am loyal! I swear it!"

The woman gasped as I lifted her in the Force, slamming her hard against the wall behind.

"Tell me who betrayed me," I snarled viciously, my rage fuelling the Force that thrummed and pulsed through my body.

"I do not know! I wasn't part of it!"

I could hear the sincerity in her tone. She was of no use to me then, and I was not in the mood to be sparing. I squeezed my fist, and her neck yanked to the side. And audible snap sounded through the room. Now that was a waste. That sort of carelessness is more often displayed by my apprentice, I berated myself ruefully as I exited the room, stepping over the twitching body. My apprentice... No, he couldn't be the one who betrayed me. Not him. It would be one of the other remnants of the blasted Jedi Thirteen.

I walked further, well aware a trap was waiting for me, but my pride would not allow for anything else but to show I was the strongest. No one can best me. No one ever has, and once again, it looks like I have to prove it.

A large chrome door opened ahead of me. Of course, they are expecting me. I had been lured onto this pathetic hovel of a planet merely to be led into an ambush, organized by Deralian troops and some of my own traitorous Dark Jedi. I will lay waste to this festering planet.

But first, the matter of this scum up ahead. I will show them what happens to those who dare to betray me!

I stood still in the doorway, aware that the light from the room behind was illuminating my presence like a homing beacon, but perversely I wanted them to make the first, futile move.

I could sense perhaps six or so Dark Jedi in the room. The blood of Deralian troops still splattered my robes; yet I was more than ready to add to it. Who organized this? Which pathetic minion dared to believe they could challenge me?

The one nearest snarled, and charged.

…

The vision dimmed and then disappeared, but I could still sense the figure. There was something shaking me, someone's hand, gripping against my shoulder-

My fist struck out the grabbed the offender's throat.

"Jen! Le-let go!" A high-pitched girl's scream.

What? I dropped my hand abruptly, opening my eyes. Someone was coughing, as an alarmed shot of adrenaline surged through me, and roused me fully to consciousness. Did I just try to kill Mission?

Harsh light from a halogen tubing flared through the room as she flicked the lights on.

"Sheesh, Jen, what were you trying to do? Murder me?" Mission spluttered.

"Are you okay?" I gasped. I was standing without realizing it. "Stars, I'm sorry. I was having some sort of nightmare." Vivid enough that I'd lunged out... that I'd almost choked Mission-

"No kidding." Her voice was dry, but she was grinning. I'd not really hurt her, then. Good. "Remind me not to wake you up again, Jen. Sheesh, I thought I was gonna be Jawa juice there for a minute."

"I'm sorry. Really sorry. I was dreaming someone was going to attack me," I said, relieved now that she seemed to be just fine. The vision still swirled in my head. I'd been surrounded by Force-using bastards about to kill me. What happened next?

Mission giggled, a sudden noise that surprised me. "You weren't dreaming about Bastila, where you? I bet she was pretty mad we left the ship, huh?"
"Well, you know Bastila," I muttered.

The Twi'lek rolled her eyes, her lekku flicking in annoyance. I'd never totally been able to speak the full depth of Twi'leki, which required a set of headtails to emphasize certain points and subtleties. I knew enough to pick up on some of the nuances, though, and Mission seemed to incorporate it instinctively as she spoke Basic.

"What are you doing awake now, anyway?" I asked. "It must be the middle of the night."

"It's almost dawn. And, y'know, I'm worried Bastila'll stop you helping me. You're okay to fight, now, right? Will you... will you help me?"

She wants to go after Griff. Well, that suited me. The fading remnants from my dream roused a lust for some healthy violence. There was an annoying part of me commenting that I should control that- that I'd almost injured Mission. And the Twi'lek does have her uses. It would be a waste to kill her.

No! I felt my fists clench in reflex at the cold thought. It's got nothing to do with sodding waste! She's my friend!

But the shadows in my mind knew that attachment was a weakness. Emotion is a useful tool, provided it doesn't become a deficiency. The girl is no one to me. She is merely a resource.

A sharp pain in my palms had me looking down; my fingernails were pressed deep into my palms. There was a harsh noise that I recognized as the sound of my own uneven breathing.

"Jen?" Mission prompted. "Are you... are you okay?"

I pasted a smile on my face and forced the dark, contradictory emotions deep down. With a mental wrench, I focused properly on the conversation.

"How do you plan to leave Anchorhead this time?" I asked.

We'd lost our hunting license, somewhere out in the sandy wild. I probed cautiously through the mind-link; from what I could tell, Bastila was still asleep. It made me wonder what sort of dreams she had- and as that occurred to me, the vague recollection of a worried, watchful presence surrounding me resurfaced-

I stiffened in outrage. No. It's impossible. That couldn't have been her. She can't be sharing my dreams. I'd rather jump into a sarlacc pit!

But if it was her – and the more I thought on it, the likelier it seemed – then it meant one thing for certain. This bond was getting far too powerful.

"What we did last time, I guess," the girl chirped. "Buy another one. Although I'm outta credits, and I'd better not pinch anymore." Her head drooped. "Big Z told me off for a long time last night."

"Huh," I said, my tone noncommittal. "Zaalbar's coming, right?"

She nodded. "He took a lot of convincing. Keeps harping on about wanting Bastila with us. But I reckon now you're back to normal, and that droid's got proper shields, then we've got a chance, right? I mean, I can't give up on my brother. And last night the Mandalorian geezer said the others were going after a ruin or something." Mission sniffed. "It's just, the longer my brother's held hostage, the less chance he has, y'know?"
"Yeah," I said, but my concentration had wandered. Ruins? Was it possible that Bastila was going after the original objective of the Endar Spire? All by herself?

"Jen?"

My gaze snapped back to the hopeful blue Twi'lek. We needed a way of acquiring more credits, or-

A cold smile curved my lips. "I have a better idea."

Mission's eyes brightened. "What?"

"Bastila has a hunting license. She also has three lightsabers." I'd seen them, last night, before she'd quickly hidden them. I hadn't drawn attention to Juhani's, clipped on my belt, but I desired a second. And it's not like Bastila has three hands. She can certainly spare one. "You're pretty good at sneaking into places, my friend."

It was callous, to put it on her, but somehow I had the feeling that Bastila would respond worse to discovering me in her quarters than the young Twi'lek. Not I thought she'd be particularly impressed with Mission, but-

"You want me to steal from a Jedi?" Mission hissed, covering her mouth with a hand.

I smirked. "Think you're up to it?"

Street Kid had done her fair share of sneaking, much like Mission. It was wrong to use my friend in such a fashion.

No, it isn't. One uses the resources one has at hand. And I was assisting her with her stupid brother. I'd be stronger, better to aid her, with two 'sabers instead of one. The moment I'd claimed Juhani's weapon, the Force had felt wickedly alive, and the vibrosword in my offhand a dead, primitive tool.

"Well, she's asleep now, right?" Mission giggled at my nod. "It's certainly a challenge. She'll have kath pups if she catches me!"

"So don't get caught."

"Okay. I'll see what I can do." The Twi'lek gave me a confident grin, and sauntered from the room. I shrugged the residual guilt away, and allowed my thoughts to dwell back to the flashbacks that had filtered through my dreams. The details were already disappearing, trickling through my fingers like Tatooine sand. But I could still remember the general detail of them.

Only Evil Bitch could be psychotic enough for the last one. But that odd vision about that brightly glowing artefact... it looked like some sort of navigational map. That was Street Kid. Her boyfriend was in it again. I cared for him. I could feel it. Street Kid had used the Force effortlessly to open that map. She was older, harder than before.

Not when compared to my other half, however. I thought on the fading details of that final vision again, and shuddered at the memory of the person I had killed. Why? Why murder someone who was no threat? And I'd been confident enough, or crazy enough, to walk straight into a trap I knew was coming.

It hit me then, fully. I was powerful. I had people following me. At least one, for the woman I had killed had sworn loyalty. Bastila told me I'd turned weak and spineless when I embraced the Dark Side. My eyes narrowed.
She lied.

Evil Bitch might be psychotic, unbalanced, and utterly deluded, but she wasn't weak.

It's time to split. Time to disappear. Any longer around that Jedi schutta and she'll either walk me straight into a trap- or I'll turn back into meek Jen Sahara.

I could feel the rage beginning to burn, deep in my gut. Bastila wanted to bring me towards some of her all-powerful masters. Maybe, one day when I have regained my full strength in the Force, I might just take her up on that. But, seeing as I promised to help Mission find her brother, I'd go there first. The desert is a wonderful place to vanish in. It would be a shame not to spend any time learning from Juhani, but it was more important to put some distance between me and Bastila. I'd been willing to overlook Bastila's lie about Alderaan, even the sedative when I'd boarded the Ebon Hawk, but now… I couldn't trust anything she said.

The hatch opened and Mission strode back in, grinning from ear to ear. She grasped a metallic rod in one hand. I smiled slowly.

"Easy as hessi-loaf!" She grinned, coming to flop on the bed next to me. She thrust the deactivated lightsaber into my possession, and flashed the plasteel card that once more, proclaimed our monetary donation to the Czerka coffers. I smirked. Bastila was going to be pissed once she found it missing.

"Let's go."

xXx

I belted on the used combat suit Mission had retrieved for me, followed by winding cloths around my head. The suit itself had a thermostat control that would aid in the desert, and was otherwise a standard issue, lightweight sort that would provide minimum protection. Mission had been acquiring more gear from the cargo bay, it seemed.

I noted that plating was missing from the left arm with a grimace. No problem. I'll just make sure I don't get hit there then.

Zaalbar was staring at me in evident worry.

"I'm fine, Zaalbar." He had spoken few words to me since we'd encountered the Cathar. His life-debt tied him to me tightly, but I didn't want him worrying. He needs to stay focused on any combat, not on my emotional state. The Wookiee merely shrugged his shoulders at me.

"I'm glad you're back to normal, Jen." Mission said, filling up a gourd with water from the kitchenette. "It's wizard you can use the Force! I mean, wow. That was something against Juhani, huh? What's it like?"

I blinked at her enthusiasm. "Overpowering, I guess. It can override your thoughts, and your emotions can start controlling everything." I guess that's why Bastila keeps harping on so much. I was so close to killing Juhani. I scowled. I do what I like. No snooty Padawan will tell me otherwise.

"Y'know, you have been a wee bit grumpy, though," Mission commented.

"I didn't exactly have the best of days yesterday," I pointed out.

Mission looked down. "You- you kinda looked like you were losing control. I mean, when you were playing with that lightning. I, uh, I thought you were gonna kill Juhani back then," she said, her voice uncharacteristically timid.

"I almost did. Don't forget, Mission, she tried to kill me," I said coldly.

"Yeah, I suppose," Mission replied, and I strode towards HK-47, sick of the conversation. The droid powered on, red eyes coming to life and focusing on me.

"Statement: I am ready to serve, Master. Permit me to blast some meatbags in your name!"

I smiled. "We're heading out into the desert, HK-47. Provided you don't fall over so quickly this time, there'll be plenty of blasting."

"Observation: My electrical shields are now at a hundred percent capability, since the repairs yesterday. Statement: I will be pleased to show you just how many meatbags I can kill!"

I looked back to Mission and Zaalbar, and jerked my head towards the exit of the ship. They both nodded, and we headed out.

The docking bay was dark still, and mostly empty. There was an ambient warmth to the air, and a dusty smell of desert and sand. As I jumped off the landing platform, a sarcastic voice rapped out from the side: "Going somewhere?"

"Onasi," I acknowledged, facing him with a smirk. "Guess you warheros don't bother with sleep."

The faint light of pre-dawn illuminated the scowl on his face. His chestnut hair was still falling in his eyes. He'd come from the direction of the mechanic bay, and I wondered if he'd been checking up on the ship's repairs. "Must be a trick I'm learning from you, Jen. I can't believe you're all sneaking off again! After what happened yesterday!"

Mission's lekku had fallen flat against her head as she stared down at him from the height of the loading ramp. "We're just going for a walk, that's all! Sheesh, why's everyone on my tail?"

"Statement: Paranoid Has-Been is in target range," HK-47 pointed out, clattering down the ramp.

"You're taking him, too?" Carth snapped, glaring at the robot. "What are you trying to do, give Bastila a heart attack?"

I sniggered despite myself. "Hey, if she wants to get all worked up, let her."

"Fine." He folded his arms, a stubborn look on his face. "If you lot are simply going for a walk, then I might just tag along."

"Y'know, Big Z's already bad enough with all this smothering. You don't have to bother," Mission objected.

"I don't see him stopping you," Carth said flatly.

"(This is a matter of family! Of honour!)" Zaalbar growled loudly behind us.

I rolled my eyes in exasperation. If we kept bickering, Bastila was certainly going to wake up, and then the fun would really begin. "Let's just go before the sun sets," I muttered sarcastically, striding towards the Anchorhead gates. I noticed the Dark Jedi corpses from the day before had been cleared away. I wondered idly what clean-up crew had done that. Probably the Jawas sold them as bantha fodder.
"(The sun has not yet risen, Jen Sahara. In fact, one could say it is still set)," Zaalbar informed me helpfully. He has to take everything so literally, doesn't he?

"So, Mission, I hope you know the way. Besides dead south, I mean," I commented as the girl dashed up next to me.

"More or less," she said brightly. "Komad said it was five klicks away. That's walking distance, or we could find some speeders to nab if you want to get there quicker."

"Say what? Five klicks south? Stealing speeders?" Carth's voice had risen to an almost convincing imitation of Bastila. He's not going to stop complaining until someone tells him what's going on, I realized with mounting frustration.

"Suggestion: Paranoid Has-Been could use a memory upgrade. Or a blaster shot to the head. Query: May I administer the latter to him, master?"

"Here's the deal, flyboy." I whirled around, facing him and ignoring HK. Carth was staring at me in incredulity, a mixture of alarm and suspicion on his face. I realized then that Carth had an ability to unnerve me. I don't know where I stand with him, and I don't like it. "Mission's brother is being held captive by the Sand People. We're the rescue team."

"I ain't looking for sympathy, okay? I just want to find my brother," she said, and her voice was quiet.

Carth nodded, the compassion clear on his face. "I- fair enough, Mission. I can understand. But surely we should get the others to help?"

I snorted. "Bastila doesn't want either me or Mission outside of the Ebon Hawk."

"That's because you're certifiably insane, Jen," Carth fired at me.

"I bet you say that to all the ladies," I purred, and smirked when I saw I had discomfited him.

"So, you in or not, Carth?" Mission asked. "'Cause Bastila's busy with her little quest today, and I'm going after Griff."

He sighed, looking between me and Mission. "I'll come. Bastila knows where she needs to go, now. She needs my help less than you lot."

"Such faith," I mocked. "Where's Bastila headed, anyway?"

I could feel Carth's frown on my back as I headed into Anchorhead, following Mission.

"The ruins. She's pretty tight-lipped about the whole thing. Isn't it what you were hired for in the first place, Jen?"

It is the original mission then. Curious. I wondered exactly what she was after. Had Jen's scholarly background been needed for it at all? Or was that just another ruse?

"So, want to nick some speeders Jen?" Mission asked.

"Nah, let's play it safe." After the harrowing swoop race back on Taris, I wasn't keen to drive anything remotely similar. "Besides, I don't think HK would be comfortable on one."
"Objection: Master, I am-

"Shut up, HK."

Mission snickered, and even Carth's mouth twitched at my obvious diversion. I carried on towards the large gates of Anchorhead in silence, where a sleepy Czerka guard snapped to attention as we neared. Mission flashed our license, and we strode out on the dunes.

A glint upon the horizon indicated that sunlight was about to break, and I could see a dark shimmer up ahead. Some sort of sandcrawler, no doubt. A Czerka mining mission?

We headed off in silence towards the distant sandcrawler until I felt a drowsy stirring within the bond. "Dammit, Bastila's waking," I muttered.

"Eh?" Mission had obviously caught that. "Why d'ya say that?"

I eyed over the eager Twi'lek as she walked next to me, and wondered whether I should explain things to her. "We have a mind-link, Mission. Don't ask me how it happened, for I have no idea and Bastila certainly hasn't enlightened me." No, that had been a fob-off if ever there was one. It just happened on the Endar Spire while she was looking out for me. I snorted. Yeah, right. I'd seen her all of three times.

"Huh?" Mission blinked at me in confusion. "A mind-link? What's that?"

"A Force bond. We can, sort of, sense each other's emotions. Oh, and she can lecture inside my head at times. Makes my life really enjoyable," I muttered darkly.

Mission wrinkled her nose at me. "I knew it! That must be how she made you act all stupid before!"

I frowned. I couldn't blame that on Bastila, but I wasn't particularly interested in improving the relationship between her and Mission, either.

"Come on, Jen, you can't seriously expected us to believe that," Carth interrupted, before conceding, "although Bastila was acting pretty weird yesterday, come to think of it."

"(This is some sort of honour bond you share with her?)" Zaalbar asked.

"Sheesh, Carth, why d'ya always believe the worst of Jen? Anyone with eyes could see that Bastila was doing some sort of Force thing on her." Mission looked at me in speculation as we continued traipsing through the sand. It was still cool, but the sun's rays were just starting to light upon the top of the dunes. "Though I guess now that you can use the Force, she won't be able to, right?"

"Use the Force? Jen?" Carth spluttered. "What have you been eating, Mission?"

If he doesn't believe me, I could always show him. My fingers twitched. No, it would alert Bastila. Play nice.

"You're such a brainless nerf-herder, Carth! How d'ya think Jen and that weird Dark Jedi got so beaten up, huh?"

"A cat-fight, I assumed-"

"Drop it," I ordered. "Trouble ahead."

Thick smoke was pouring from the sandcrawler, obvious now that we neared it. I could see flashes of blaster fire glint in the distance.

Mission fiddled with the visor she'd equipped, and I noticed it was a different one from yesterday. Definitely more high-tech, with buttons and dials along the side.

"Where did you get that?"

"I just found it lying around," she evaded.

"(I tried to stop her)," Zaalbar grumbled. More searching through Davik's cast-offs in the cargo bay, I suspect. I tried to stifle a grin.

"People being swamped by some sort of robed creature," Mission muttered, fingers on the controls of her visor. "I guess they're probably Sand People, right?"

"Statement: I am ready for action, master," HK said gleefully.

"I just bet you are," I muttered.

"(We should avoid that conflict)," Zaalbar rumbled. He dug his paws into the sand.

"Yeah, I'm with Big Z," Mission agreed. "It looks pretty nasty. Those people are Czerka miners, I reckon. They're losing."

"We can't just leave them to die, though. Not if we can help them," Carth objected.

Looks like I'm the deciding vote. I smirked. Bloodshed it is. "Let's go give them a hand, then. Zaalbar, you and me take the front lines? Just like old times in the sewers, eh?"

"(Do not remind me, Jen Sahara. I did not enjoy the sewers)." Zaalbar paused, unsheathing a vibrosword. He turned to look at me then. "(But you are a good fighter)."

I grinned at the Wookiee, and pulled out my lightsabers. "HK, don't kill any of the miners, alright? They might be grateful for the rescue." And who knows what I could pull from them. Credits, information.

"Where did you get those?" Carth hissed, grabbing my arm. I yanked it away from him, and activated one in sudden anger.

"What do you think Juhani was wielding yesterday, Onasi?" I snapped.

His eyes had turned cold as he stared at me. "You are not playing at being a Jedi. You really will get yourself killed."

My amusement sprang to life as my irritation disappeared. Like one fire flaring into existence while another was immediately doused. Quick and rapid-fire and not emotionally healthy. With a mental wrench, I pushed the nagging feeling away, and forced a grin. "That'll put a load off your mind and Bastila's, I'm sure. Tell you what, if you can catch me before I reach the Sand People, I'll give you the 'sabers." It was a reckless challenge, as he was right next to me. But the Force was there, ready to bend to my will, sparking along the scarlet blades. And I was hungry for some action. The blood called to me.

I broke away, running.

"Jen!" I heard him yell, as I opened myself to the Force. Speed. Come on, I know how to do this. The power flowed through me, familiar and natural.
Jen? Why are you using the Force?

Shut up, Bastila. Life in danger. Shush.

What? Where are you? You haven't gone again?

I'll be back in an hour! If she could lie, then so could I. I pushed the bond to the back of my mind, concentrating on the battle ahead. The world stretched around me, as for once the Force did what I wanted. My old instincts are returning. This is an old trick, I'm sure.

The group of hostile Sand People were decimating the ill equipped miners, and I ran straight towards the middle of the fray. I heard Zaalbar howl in objection behind me, but my momentum carried through me as my primary 'saber sliced through the first primitive.

Angry challenging hoots came from all directions as a group of four Sand People engulfed me. The power pulsed through my veins, my movements unnaturally fast as I dodged and hacked at the soft bodies within range. I threw my off-hand saber at one figure, who collapsed to the ground as the weapon snapped back to my hand. It was a dance of pure power, as my co-ordination and awareness peaked and I found myself predicting the move of every enemy.

Zaalbar, growling, impaled one of the natives on my flank. I heard the buzzing noise of blaster fire come from behind me as the others opened fire.

The heat of battle hummed through me, mingling with the Force. Sweat dripped down the sides of my face as I yelled in battle rage, dodging the primitive gaffi sticks the Sand People flung my way. Mission had thrown us each an energy shield earlier, but I deigned to activate it.

The last two Sand People turned their backs on the surviving miners and attacked me simultaneously. My hand rose and the Force flung out in a wave. They flew backwards onto the sand, and Zaalbar jumped forward to stab one through. The other scrambled to his feet, grunted in protest, and turned to flee. I threw my 'saber again, and he became one corpse of many as the weapon flew home.

I smiled as I surveyed the corpses littered amongst the warming sand. Many had been slain before my arrival, but I'd certainly added to the carnage.

"You should be locked in an institution," Carth muttered as he strode to my side. "Though I saw what you did. That's how you got past the Sith guard on Taris. And the rancor!" His eyes were dark with suspicion. "How- how is that suddenly possible? People don't just suddenly start using the Force like that! You- you're meant to be a damn scholar!"

I gave him a wide-eyed stare. "What, are scholars precluded from having Force powers, Onasi?"

His scowl deepened. "Don't try to evade the issue, Jen. Blast it! This makes no sense. You make no sense! If you could use the Force back on Taris-"

At that, I felt my expression mirror his. "I had no idea what I was doing then-"

"This has got to do with Bastila," he muttered. His brows had lowered, and suspicion sat heavy around him like a thick cloak of fog. "She kept you locked up all night; you and that deranged Cathar. What, is she teaching you the Force, now?"

I shrugged. "That's what she claimed. Myself, I just thought she was just trying to make my life miserable."
I thought I saw a twitch on the side of his mouth before he replaced it with a glare. "I thought it took years of study to even use the Force. How are you suddenly wielding it like an expert?"

"I'd hardly call myself an expert," I muttered. "As to how, why don't you ask Bastila? You might get more answers out of her than I do."

Carth folded his arms, puzzlement warring with his trademark mistrust. "You make it sound as if she's hiding something from you."

"Stars, flyboy, she's hiding things from everyone." I don't have time for this. But I supposed he deserved an explanation. Like he'd believe what I said anyway. Not that I care what he thinks.

"She- this is why you were stationed on the 'Spire," Carth said, his voice lowering. "She must have known you could- but you said you'd barely met her- dammit, Jen, help me out here! None of this stacks up!"

"Thanks for your help!" one of the miners gasped, interrupting Carth's pointed queries and dark looks, and I felt a rush of relief as I turned to face the stranger. He looked overcome with both weariness and gratitude. "I hope there's no more of those animals out there."

Four other miners were huddled in the shade of the smoking sandcrawler. Beyond them, a small group of Jawas tumbled out of the hulking machine, wandering about like a lazy platoon of fire-ants, poking at the damaged rents along the side of the massive transport. I turned my back on Carth, attached the sabers back to my belt, and addressed the miner.

"What are you lot doing here anyway?" I asked. He was a middle-aged Human, and his grey eyes with tight with desperation. There were several Czerka-clad corpses behind him, dots in the sand, his fellow workers now at permanent rest. "You're not fighters," I said bluntly, eyeing him over. He was wearing light armour and clutched a standard issue blaster in his hand.

"No," the man rapped out. "We're a group of miners, working for Czerka. I don't think we'll bother holding this position for much longer."

"No, not unless you get some backup," I said dryly.

"Hey, do you know a Twi'lek called Griff?" Mission piped up hopefully as she neared us. The Human eyed her over, and shook his head irritably.

"Never heard of him."

"Oh," Mission's lekku fell flat against her head, conveying disappointment. "He also works for Czerka, and was taken in a Sand People raid two days ago…" her voice trailed off in despair.

"They should all be wiped out. Every last one of them," the man snarled suddenly. "They attacked without any reason! Dozens of them! We're not soldiers, and we lost so many men."

"I'm surprised Czerka didn't outfit you better," Carth said. He was still shooting me dark glances even as he spoke to the miner. "It's a disgrace, if they knew about the threat of these Sand People."

"They tried," the Human said tersely. "The company did arm us, and even set up remote self-powered turrets on the mining route, but… but that just made things worse."

"Worse? How so?" I asked.

"The Sand People took all the Czerka weapons that were supposed to protect our sandcrawlers. I hear they've even set them up around their new enclave, directly to the south. That's why it's so hard to wipe this scum out. Their base is a fortress, a death trap."

My eyes narrowed. "Wonderful," I said dryly. "It's going to be fun getting in then."

"You're headed that way?" the miner asked in surprise. "Take my advice, and don't go there. You won't stand a chance. I- I suppose the only way to avoid the turrets is to sneak in somehow."

"Sneak in?" My eyes flicked to Mission, and she stared at me hopefully.

"The Sand People attack any outsiders they come across," the man told me. "You're crazy if you go ahead, but hey, it's your life. I'm getting out of here before they come back." He turned around to face the straggling remains of his men. "Come on, let's head back."

"What about the sandcrawler, Jimm?" one of the survivors questioned.

"There's no point repairing it just to get attacked again. May as well leave it for the Jawas to salvage."

The disheartened and injured miners left us, trudging wearily back to Anchorhead. Corpses of Sand People and Humans alike littered the desert floor, and I stared at them, an idea forming around in my mind.

"(I do not know if we should proceed. It sounds like certain death)," Zaalbar rumbled in discontent.

"I'm going!" Mission folder her arms stubbornly, glaring at Zaalbar. "You wouldn't leave me out here, would you Big Z?"

"(I would not forsake you Mission. But we need a better plan)."

"The only way to sneak in would be to dress up as Sand People," I murmured as I crouched down, undressing one of the corpses with a grimace. I straightened, picking up the blood stained desert robe. "It may get us inside the base. Mission can disable the turrets then." Though I doubt Zaalbar would fit one of these robes.

"Then that's what we'll do!" Mission piped up determinedly, and ran over to another corpse. "If it's the only way to rescue Griff, then let's do it."

"I have a bad feeling about this," Carth muttered.

I rolled my eyes. "You sound like a bad actor in an equally bad action holovid."

Carth shot me a dry look. "Come on, you want to dress up as these primitives to get inside their base? How crazy is that?"

I walked over to him, and lowered my voice. "If it's the only way to help Mission, then yes, I'll do it. No one's forcing you to tag along, flyboy."

His eyes, dark and intent, stared down at mine in frustration. "I'll help Mission," he said finally. "I suppose someone has to be there to drag you both out of trouble. but after this, Jen, you- or Bastila-have got to give me some answers."

I grinned, and stepped away, not granting that jibe with an answer. Time to get moving. Zaalbar was going to be mightily angry when I told him he couldn't accompany us all the way due to his height and distinctive build. We'll cross that hyperlane when we get to it.
xXx
A discovery

- Canderous Ordo -

The sun glinted annoyingly into my eyes, hampered by a sub-par visor. Sand was collecting underneath my battle armour. What am I doing here, following these idiots? My skin chafed underneath sweaty, stifling clothes, and it irritated me that Bastila was dealing better with the elements than I was. Maybe the Jedi had some sense in mind when designing those ugly robes, other than trying to look like a bunch of pansy old women. Haar’chak, but I need to see some action.

I should have followed Jen. Now what a sight she had been yesterday, liberally smeared in blood and utterly exhausted, but still with spirit in her eyes. About kriiffing time she started acting normal again.

Still, it was probably time for me to split. Take my share of the credits and find some work worthy of my skills. Onasi had already consumed significantly more than half of them, it seemed, simply for the freighter’s repairs.

Ah, but that was the rub. Half the ship belonged to me, by rights of acquisition. Yet this lot wasn’t going to part with the freighter on Tatooine, and I wasn’t sure I felt like tagging along to some Jedi rendezvous just to get my share.

Following the Jedi princess around was about as exciting as duelling with a Mimbanite; and while Jen had a pleasing propensity for violence, her unpredictability and that odd meek act lessened the chances of a worthy battle. I’d found her amusing at first, but whatever her game with Bastila was, it smacked of female politics I had no time for.

I should go talk to some of the spacers. There was bound to be one travelling out of Tatooine in the next few days. Might head for Corellia or Nar Shaddaa. Find some mercenary work to make use of my talents.

I missed the glory of the old days. When we fought for the clans, for the honour of Mand'alor and the challenge of a worthy foe. Before the clans had been crushed and scattered, and Mand'alor's helm discarded. While it wasn't strictly necessary for a new leader, it had been disheartening when Mand'alor's victor had taken it, and presumably cast it aside. Revan may have been an outsider, but it would have been interesting if she'd decided to lay a claim to the title. The clans likely wouldn't have backed her. Ordo might have, though, if she'd consented to an adoption into the clan.

“Bah,” I muttered to myself, disgusted at this lamenting of the past. The ronto underneath me squawked, and I held onto the leathery strap tighter.

Bastila had halted up ahead, busily dismounting. We were in the shade of a craggy range of cliffs to the east of Anchorhead, and the Jedi princess was busy consulting a datapad clutched in her grasp. A slight breeze wafted a film of sand against the ill-fitting visor, and I cursed again. That was idiotic, not bringing along adequate equipment. You are becoming careless, Ordo. I needed something to stir my battle instincts, and one incident a day with a bunch of poorly equipped primitives just didn't cut it.

A shame we are not further south, into the heart of the Sand People territory. They were reputedly fierce fighters in packs, but so far we had only encountered a few lone individuals.

“There is a cavern up ahead,” Bastila informed me, motioning for me to dismount.

“Dark and shady places your cup of caffa, huh, princess?” I replied as I slid from the ronto's back. We had already explored three small caves etched into the weathered cliffs, all exhibiting nothing bar nocturnal bats and their respective droppings.

Bastila refused to answer, looking towards Juhani as the Cathar walked closer.

Juhani had barely spoken two words to me, presumably because of the plain and simple nature of my heritage. A shame, really, I would have liked to hear why both she and Jen had been so beaten up yesterday. But no, the Cathar had to be predictable and despise me because my people had been victorious over hers.

“It is high noon,” Juhani murmured to Bastila, so quietly that I had to strain to hear. “Do you not wish to go after her now?”

Bastila’s eyes tightened with irritation. Earlier, she’d thrown a fit worthy of a teenager upon discovering both her hunting licence and a lightsaber had gone missing. As amusing as the ensuing confrontation between her and Jen was likely to be, I rather thought I’d prefer to leave them to it.

“As I said earlier, Juhani, I have no idea where she is,” Bastila replied, after a significant pause. Her voice was low, and I strained to hear it. “I may as well continue on with my quest until she deigns to return.”

“But surely that mind-link—”

“Does not work that way,” Bastila cut the Cathar off, glowering at me when she noticed I was still within hearing distance. I smirked, and she narrowed her eyes in annoyance.

“What?” I said innocently. All morning the two of them have been waffling on in secret. As if I give a mynock’s tail about their Jedi crap. The one and only reason I had for deliberately eavesdropping was purely to aggravate the Jedi princess. I took my sport where I could find it.

Bastila lifted her snooty nose in the air, and turned her back on me. “I can sense emotions and Force use, Juhani. But not location – well, not accurately enough to be of any help. She will return.” Bastila gave another angry sigh, and muttered under her breath. “She had better.”

I quirked an eyebrow in interest. Most of what Bastila was spouting didn't seem to make much sense, other than she was talking about Jen. Bastila had been in a black mood all day, and the only reason I'd agreed to tag along was out of sheer boredom.

“We should get on with things,” Bastila said briskly, walking towards the nearby cliff.

“Time to slaughter some more bats, then,” I commented as I slung my heavy blaster over a shoulder. Taking pot-shots in the earlier caves had been a way to kill some time and severely piss off Jedi princess in the process, but it was hardly stimulating.

“You should have a little more respect for life,” Bastila said softly.

I rolled my eyes. Curse you, Jen, for not asking me along today. And hadn’t Bastila been ready to spit daggers when she woke and found the entire party gone bar us three.

“And you should have a little more sleep, princess. You might wake up in a better mood then.”
“I had a... disturbing night,” she responded, thin-lipped.

“I can feel something. This place…” Juhani murmured distantly.

Bastila blinked, looking at the Cathar in surprise. She closed her eyes, and breathed in sharply.

“Yes... I feel it too.”

“Feel what? The blasted heat of the sun, or the annoying mites biting at your face?” I growled. It was unlike me to get so frustrated with my environment, but I usually wasn't so ill-prepared. The cloth wound around my head didn’t cover the entirety of my face. And for armour, all I have is a dented suit that looks to be a complete replica of the hideous one Davik liked to parade about in. It probably was, seeing as I’d found it on the Ebon Hawk. It was as ugly as it was tight-fitting. At least it is some protection. Davik wasn't a complete di'kut. I didn't want to explore the real reason for my aggravation. This planet reminded me too much of my homeworld, and too much of a glorious past that far overshadowed my present.

"No, you simple mercenary!" Bastila snapped. I swung to face her in surprise, my brows lowering in oncoming temper, when she sighed and then followed with a genuine apology. "Forgive me, Canderous. I am sorry." Her gaze was genuine on mine, even as her cheeks flushed with emotion. "I am afraid my emotions are getting the best of me."

I snorted, but nodded in acknowledgment, willing to let it go this time.

Bastila had turned to face Juhani. “Come, let us explore this cave. Be guarded, I fear the Dark Side may be strong here.”

I groaned audibly. All day Bastila had been harping on about the Force to Juhani, and had even gone as far as giving the Cathar a lightsaber, after discovering that Jen had taken both Juhani's and one of hers. Now that's ballsy. Stealing a 'saber from not one, but two Jedi. I had to assume the Cathar was a Jedi, though it appeared as if the warrior spirit of her race had departed her in defiance at such a weak role. Jedi. What am I doing, surrounded by mystical fools? Jedi were powerful enough, to be sure, but most of them preferred sitting on their fat behinds and talking to each other solemnly than actually taking any action. The Sith are just as bad, with their lust for pain and needless waste. I enjoyed victory as much as any Mando’ade, but did not see the point in creating suffering unless there was a reason for it. The Sith didn’t need a reason.

Bastila and Juhani had approached the mouth of the cave up ahead, and I walked briskly to catch up. The cavern itself appeared to be rather large from the outside, and my interest was piqued. Could be something in here, for a change. Maybe even Bastila's precious relic.

The two paused just inside.

“This is it. This is the cave she dreamed of,” Bastila murmured to herself, as she eyed over the cavern walls and rocks.

“Dreamed?” Juhani queried. “What do you mean?”

“Uh, nothing,” Bastila stammered, taking a few steps further into the dark, musty interior. There was an unpleasant odour in the air, like that of rotting flesh. The cavern rose high, perhaps five metres or so, and stretched deep into the cliff. The light from outside did not penetrate all the way in.

“It is that mind-link, is it not?” Juhani persisted.

“Please, I would rather not speak of it,” Bastila said stiffly, disappearing further into the shadows.
The rotting stench grew as I stepped deeper into the cave. “Mand’alor's balls, what is that kriffing smell?”

“I would appreciate it if you watched your language, Canderous,” Bastila retorted. “Particularly around Mission, she is impressionable enough without listening to that.”

She really is priceless. “I think the kid’s already got an impressive vocabulary, princess,” I drawled. My eyes were drawn to the sandy ground, relatively sheltered here near the opening of the cave. The light had dimmed, here, but there was still enough for me to take notice of the sand. There was something off about it.

“What is this creature? This must be the source of this smell, but I have never seen anything so large before,” Juhani called out from further inside.

In the centre of the cavern's opening, the sand made a repeating pattern which appeared a common effect of the incoming breeze. But around the edges parts of it looked smoothed over. I frowned, scanning around for any tracks as I walked closer to the cavern walls to investigate. There wasn't much to see.

“That is the remains of a krayt dragon,” Bastila's voice came from deeper in the cave; she had followed Juhani. “It was slain about four years ago.”

“Are you sure, Bastila? I would have thought there would be... less to see, as such. Natural predators and scavengers surely would have picked the bones clean, rather than leaving it to rot for so long.”

That roused my interest, so I followed them to investigate. The sand thinned as I walked further in, the ground hardening to rock under my feet. A monstrous corpse loomed before my vision as I approached, dim light from the outside world glinting on the discoloured bones. The flesh had rotted and decomposed, but Juhani was correct. Even had scavengers not found this beast, the flesh should have been completely gone by now.

“The Cathar’s right,” I stated. “I'd say this animal bit the dust maybe a year ago, at most.”

“I said before, the dark Force aura of this place will keep most creatures away, other than mites and flies,” Bastila replied. “It will slow down the decomposition, too.”

More Force crap. “If your dark Force keeps creatures away, then what was a krayt dragon doing here in the first place?” I challenged.

“Some animals have a natural resistance to the Force, while others are attracted to such an evil presence,” she answered. “Krayt dragons belong to the former category. Which makes it all the more impressive that this one was killed.”

“Well, if you two are so afraid of this scary Force presence, then your little relic better be here,” I grunted.

“It is,” Bastila said, and walked around the huge rotting corpse to further descend into the bowels of the cave. I amused myself by rifling through the various decaying humanoid bodies that surrounded the has-been dragon. Looks like many hunters tried to take this thing on. I found little of use; a few grenades that were probably past their use-by date, some poor fool’s holocron, and a bottle of Corellian whiskey. Now this is a find.

“Is this it, Bastila?” Juhani’s voice rang out from the shadows, and a second later I heard Bastila gasp.
“Yes. The first of the Star Maps. We have done it!” Her voice was wondrous, almost; a tone I’d never heard from her before.

I heard a faint click, and the whirring of something mechanical. A glaring blue-white light blinded my vision, and Juhani gasped in awe.

“This is the source of the evil taint we can feel? What is it, Bastila?”

“A navigational chart, of sorts.”

She was right, I discovered as I closed in on it. A large blue orb made of light hung in the dank air, depicting galaxies and planets of the known universe. I wonder where this map leads to, what its purpose is. I doubt Jedi princess will tell us. Bastila had taken out a datapad, and inserted it into a slot near the base of the relic. We spent several minutes in silence as Bastila tapped away on her datapad and I stared at the map of the galaxy. I could see several planets I knew, but there were some missing. I frowned. Where’s Dxun? Corellia, too, is not there. Lines etched through the map that weren’t hyper-lanes, but maybe directions of some sort.

“I have what I need. We should leave now.” Bastila deactivated the device, and the glowing chart vanished. Thin metal arms of the device closed in on themselves as my eyes readjusted to the darkness.

Bastila turned to head back to the desert with Juhani in tow. I stayed for a moment longer to eye over this relic with interest. What had she called it? A Star Map? Bastila had also informed Onasi earlier that this was the Republic’s only chance of gaining victory over Malak and his forces. Maybe if I stick with them, I’ll get to see some action.

I frowned, and decided against it. I’d kill Bastila within a week. And the Republic didn’t look too kindly at ex-Mandalorian heroes. Face it, Ordo, you’d have better chances with the Sith.

But there was greater honour in fighting for the side with weaker odds, and I wasn’t particularly impressed with the Sith. No. I don’t wish to see either the Republic or the Sith win this fight. I’m going my own way.

I noticed that the two Jedi had halted ahead, just within the entrance of the cave. The stiffness in their stance alerted me, and I pulled out my blaster, further back in the shadows. Someone or something had discovered our presence.

“How nice to see you again, Bastila Shan,” a deep-throated and very familiar voice yelled from the desert outside. I stiffened in surprise. Calo Nord? My muscles clenched in readiness as I stalked forward cautiously. Not bad, tracking us to Tatooine. I was impressed despite myself. It was too much to expect him to die back on Taris. Though it sounds as if he’s after Bastila, rather than me.

“Calo Nord, the bounty hunter,” Bastila acknowledged. I closed in behind her, and saw Calo’s shadowy figure standing outside, alone. He was also unarmed, though he appeared to be clutching some small object in one hand. That immediately raised my suspicions. “I urge you to walk away, Calo. I do not wish to indulge in any violence that is not necessary.”

Calo laughed mockingly.

“It’s your end, Jedi,” he sneered. I lifted my repeating blaster to aim. “You and that Mandalorian worm, I know he's cowering behind you somewhere. What a shame you didn't bring your little leashed Sith Lord along. She, at least, is worth more alive than dead.”

I realized Calo’s intention before he depressed the trigger on whatever he was holding. It's a detonator! The ground was disturbed near the walls – he's lined this place with mines!

A deafening blast ripped through the air, and the cave wall collapsed. I had already grabbed both Jedi by their robes, and was dragging them further into the cave as an explosive wave crested over us. The ground rumbled and roared, and rocks began to spit down on us from the sides of the cavern.

“Get deeper into the cave!” I yelled hoarsely, stumbling as a rock slammed into my shoulder, dislodging my grip on the Jedi. “It's our only chance!”

Mines were still being triggered; Calo had been meticulous in his work. But the cavern was large, and we had not even closed in on its depths. It would be more stable further in.

“The Force! Juhani, help me push these rocks!” Bastila screamed. The light from outside had already winked out as the cavern mouth collapsed in on itself.

“Don't be an idiot!” I growled. “Even if you do make it, Calo will kill you immediately!”

I ran further into the collapsing cave, blinded, with gravel and dirt raining down on me. Which is better than boulders, at any rate. I didn't bother with the Jedi any longer, they would either pick the smart choice or the fatal one.

One last huge explosion ripped through the remains of the cave, and I was catapulted forward. Headfirst into that odd Force device, as rocks rained down around me.

A sharp searing pain struck my head, and then nothing.

xXx

“He's alive.” Bastila's words hazily threaded through my awakening consciousness. Not the first sound I wished to hear upon waking, and with a grim sense of irony I realized this was the second time she had come to my aid when I had been knocked unconscious. “A superficial head-wound, and likely some associated concussion, but it’s not serious. How are your wounds, Juhani?”

“It is nothing,” the Cathar spoke softly. “Nothing compared to our current predicament.”

I flexed my shoulders and opened my eyes. Nothing met them.

“Canderous, you are awake,” Bastila acknowledged in the darkness.

My armoured hands felt dirt and stones on the ground. I heard a faint rumble of rocks settling somewhere above us. My head throbbed. “Ugh, I feel like I've just downed a whole bottle of Corellian whiskey. Speaking of which...” I trailed off, and struggled to sit up in search of my pack which contained said whiskey. It was no longer on my back. “Where's my pack? How long was I out for?”

“A few minutes, no more,” Bastila informed me. There was silence, and then a small orb of yellow light flickered into life, reflecting Bastila's strained face and Juhani’s form behind her. I winced, but took the time to look at our surroundings. We were trapped. Caved-in walls of rock surrounded us. Near all of the cavern had collapsed, barring a small section surrounding that Force relic of Bastila’s.
I laughed harshly. “Calo sure knows how to do his job, the bastard.” I saw my pack next to me, ripped from my back as I had fallen.

“Except that we are not dead,” Bastila replied.

“Not yet, until our air runs out,” I told her dryly, but she had a point. As long as breath fills my lungs, victory can still be had. I would track down that bounty-hunting slime, and disembowel him. Death by either suffocation or starvation was an insult, and I refused to give him that pleasure. “So, how’d Calo track you down here then, princess?”

Bastila stared at me in silence, her eyes widening in alarm. Her mouth opened to say something, and then closed again.

“He must have known,” Bastila whispered. “He must have escaped Taris and run to Malak. Dark Jedi in Anchorhead, Calo Nord by the Star Map. My worst fears are confirmed then. Malak knows of this quest.”

Now we’re attracting attention from Darth Malak. And I have yet to see any credits. The ones on the Ebon Hawk didn’t count, they were mine by right. “Let’s just focus on getting out of here,” I said grimly. What are you doing here, Ordo?

Bastila glanced around at the jagged rocks surrounding us, obviously searching for inspiration.

"Maybe- maybe you can use that mind-link to call for help?" Juhani asked softly.

"No. She has enough things to deal with, at the moment." Bastila's voice was tight with edginess. "And I am sure we can figure out a way to escape between the three of us."

“I am surprised I didn't recognize her,” Juhani’s voice was a whisper in the shadows. “I met her once, when I was young. She came to Taris, with- with some of her fol-"

“Please, please, do not talk of this!” Bastila cut in, her voice high and desperate.

The silence that followed was electric. And, suddenly, Calo’s parting shot slammed through my mind. What a shame you didn’t bring your leashed Sith Lord along. My muscles bunched, my thoughts raced.

The only Sith Lord that had any connection to Bastila Shan was-“Haar’chak,” I muttered, the dazed feeling of sheer surprise both unfamiliar and unwelcome. Calo was not the sort prone to exaggeration or misinformation. And Bastila’s reaction was not what I’d expect, had he been wrong.

Revan is meant to be dead.

Dead, by the hand of Bastila Shan herself.

Could this be? One of the few Jedi I actually hold any respect for, with me all this time? An incredulous bark of laughter escaped me. “I always thought you were too weak to be the end of Darth Revan.”

The little orb of lighted winked out, depriving me of my chance to see her reaction. The silence in the dark turned icy, but I couldn’t hold back the smirk on my lips. Or the renewed interest that sparked within me.
“Jedi do not kill if they do not have to, mercenary.” Bastila’s words lashed out in condemnation. “You will forget everything that Calo Nord has just said to us.”

Her words sounded heavier somehow, and were strangely compelling. “Not kriffing likely, princess,” I drawled. “Revan is the one who defeated Mand’alor, in hand to hand combat.” I sorely wished I’d seen that blood duel, done in true Mando’ade style. I’d heard the stories. Mand’alor had put aside his helm, the relic of his authority, and Revan Freeflight had wagered her mask against it. A simple Mando’ade mask that she had picked up from who knew where, and had become the symbol of the Republic’s resistance to our Mando’ade might.

_Hah, half the galaxy might think Revan was a man, but we Mando’ade know better._ The stories that came back from the few survivors at Malachor were worthy of telling. She’d removed her mask, handed it to Malak Devari, and faced our Mand’alor – a man almost half again her height and twice her weight – without a flinch. No Force, had been the set rule. And the battle had lasted hours.

_Oh, I would have liked to be there in person._

She’d won, and walked away with both her mask and Mand’alor’s helm.

Revan had honoured our traditions, and gained our respect. “There’s even a case for her to have a claim to that title, should she consent to a clan adoption,” I mused, my thoughts whirring with the possibilities.

“You will forget it! You will think of her as only Jen Sahara, and no more!”

Again, I had an irrational desire to listen to Bastila, to believe her. To believe that Jen was only…

I shook my head roughly. _Wait… is she using some Force crap on me?_ A surge of hot temper broke in my gut, and I struggled to stand in the darkness. “You looking for a fight, Jedi?” I spat. There was pain pounding through my head as I moved. “You think you can do your little tricks on me and get away with it?”

It was time Bastila Shan was taught a lesson or two.

“You do not understand what’s at stake!” Bastila cried in response, her voice unnaturally high-pitched. I cursed my inability to see in the darkness, and felt around the edges of the visor. It hung limply around my face, and I felt a jagged rent on the side-strap.

“She doesn’t know, does she?” I bit the words out, as the truth became obvious in my head. It would explain some of her puzzling behaviour. _And why Bastila wants to keep it a secret._ “She doesn’t know who she is. And you Jedi are hiding it from her. What did you do, lobotomize her?” I’d always assumed her little nervous act was exactly that – an act. Now I wasn't so sure.

“No! Her mind was almost totally destroyed – we did the only thing we could to save her!”

Another harsh laugh escaped me. “Well, maybe it's time she found out the truth about herself.”

"No. No!" Bastila was breathing heavily in the dark, her voice strained and panicked. “I will make you listen to reason, Canderous!”

“Use those tricks on me again, and I’ll kill you,” I told her flatly, and I was completely genuine.

“Then, please, just listen to me!”
I paused, my fists clenched. “I'm listening, princess,” I said in a low voice. I wondered if Bastila was considering using the Force again. I was by far stronger than her physically, but it was all too easy to underestimate Jedi and their powers, I knew that much.

I heard Bastila take in a deep, unsteady breath. “Canderous, her mind was almost destroyed when I captured her.”

“Destroyed?” I taunted derisively. “Is that your scary Dark Side you always harp on about?” Dark or Light, I cared not. I had respected and admired Revan, and right now I was thinking of Jen in a whole new light.

But she wasn’t what she once was. I had to admit that.

“No, not the Dark side. She was catatonic, Canderous. Comatose.”

I frowned in the darkness, trying out this new, bizarre idea. Revan, who made the galaxy tremble, catatonic? The one who defeated Mand'alor, a vegetable? “She's hardly a vegetable now, princess,” I grated out.

“But her mind is unstable, fractured! If she found out the truth, it could break under the strain.”

“This is rubbish,” I said flatly. “You are trying to keep her weak.”

“No!” she interrupted loudly, and I heard the rush of air at her wavering sigh. “Surely you have heard about the effects of amnesia. You seem to think highly of Revan.” Bastila's crisp inflection tightened. “Are you willing to take that chance?”

I stayed silent, my mouth twisted in a grimace. Jedi tricks. Can I really believe this trash she is spewing? Revan was the opposite of weak. But if the Jedi have really screwed with her mind... I wondered exactly how much of Jen Sahara was still Revan Freeflight, Darth Revan, scourge and hero of the Republic.

“For the time being, at least keep quiet,” Bastila's words were intense, heavy, and laden with meaning. “You will not let anyone know this knowledge.”

My head pulsed with a sudden pain, and I felt dazed. Mild concussion. I gotta get a shot of kolto or at least a stim to counteract it. A surge of dizziness made me stumble in the dark, and my hand pressed against the side of my scalp. It was wet and warm through the short hair. “I won't let anyone know about this,” I muttered, just to keep the princess quiet. I wasn't entirely sure what I was agreeing to anymore.

“Good.” Bastila sounded relieved. I rolled my eyes in the darkness. Why am I giving her the victory? I couldn't remember what we had just been talking about.

Revan, we were talking about Revan.

Oh yes. I would be very keen to see Jen again, and find out for myself exactly how much she recalled.

But no one needs to know who she is.

xXx
I dodged underneath a crudely designed gaffi stick, before impaling the offending primitive on one of my lightsabers. My face flushed with the heat of battle as I spun around, throwing the second "saber at the last remaining native. It scored fatally into his neck before returning to my outraised hand.

The room was now empty, other than HK and I. Perspiration itched underneath the constricting disguise I still wore, and my chest heaved with fast, uneven breaths. Broken bodies with cauterized battle wounds covered the area.

I could hear grunts of Sand People, further back in the perimeter of the base. I wondered if Zaalbar had followed us... if not, he'll be going mad. I'd left him behind in the desert, much to his howling protest. Stealth had been the plan, of course, so I'd informed the Wookiee he could accompany us if he fit into one of the Sand People garments.

As we departed, he was still soulfully staring at the offending robe.

I'd lost Carth and Mission upon entering the base - the natives had ambushed us after we'd slipped past the turrets, and in the ensuing carnage I'd simply hacked a way out.

HK and I had cut through them with devastating ease.

The Sand People should have listened to us, the primitive fools. I'd commanded HK to attempt communication, but as he began Sand People had recognized our disguises for what they were - and were not happy about it.

Their loss.

I eyed over my surroundings; I was in a long clay-walled corridor. The ceiling was no more than light-coloured tarpaulin strapped tight onto the plaster walls. While it might be shelter from the sun, it was hardly permanent - although I recalled this was a newly dug-out stronghold. The outer perimeter of the base was more fortified than this inner sanctum.

My heartbeat slowed to near-normal, and I became aware of the sting of bruising on my back where a few gaffi sticks had broken through my guard. The armour stopped it from being anything serious - good thing, too, for while I could easily best a handful of Sand People one-on-one, the earlier mob had been a challenge.

I'd tried to reach out to the Force, but it had danced tantalizingly out of reach. Somehow, I'd known it was due to my own incompetence rather than Bastila's interference.

She's been too busy lecturing me to bother blocking my Force use. Perhaps she'd gathered enough sense not to push my anger any further. Not that it would change things - I didn't plan on returning. Regardless, Bastila's attention had been drawn away from me. Something had her panicking. Now that there was no imminent danger, I felt my curiosity spark to life.

HK trod insensitively on a corpse as he neared me. "Observation: These organic meatbags are very poorly designed. All soft and squishy, infinitely easy to blast into a pile of rendered flesh." Was that a note of glee I heard in my droid's metallic voice? Probably. Whoever programmed this sarcastic robot is someone I'd like to meet. Where my lightsaber had failed to strike down one of those annoying hooting Sand People, HK dispatched them with expertise that seemed unusual even in a combat droid.

I turned, intending to go after Carth and Mission. HK and I made a solid team, but it never hurt to have more backup. I hope they're okay, a weak voice whispered in my mind.

Quiet! I didn't need the vulnerability of attachments. What I needed was their firepower, at least until I had mastered my Force ability and could truly stand on my own. When I acted on pure instinct and emotion the power flowed effortlessly through me, melding into a truly magnificent feat. But when I consciously try to use it, it's like rolling the dice.

I sighed, and focused on clearing my mind. The Force had evaded me since our altercation with those Czerka miners hours earlier, and I didn't comprehend why. Bastila said one's mind had to be clear and serene to access the Force. But she'd also said the Dark Side was weak. Why am I trusting her lies? My own experience tells me that I am strongest when the battle rage has consumed me. When I'm angry.

I could feel the fire of passion still warm in my gut. It had ignited with fury - with power and life - during the earlier battle. I seemed to move faster and strike harder, possess an awareness of where my enemy was going to move next. Even without any overt Force ability at my fingertips, my own rage fuelled my battle prowess.

And the irritating doubt that sat in a corner of my mind, questioning the rightness of these emotions, was nothing more than a weakness.

I will conquer any weakness, and I will master the Force. I took a determined step back toward the base entrance.

My attention was snatched by the sound of impending footfalls behind me. I twisted around as a barbaric roar echoed through the chamber, and saw a mob of Sand People spill into the room.

My rage flared.

HK lifted his rifle, and the natives raised their sticks high in challenge, honking a war cry as they charged.

"HK, take out the blasters at the back!" I yelled, holding my ground. The Force pulled at my senses, and I mentally floundered after it. Focus! I parried the swipe of the first one who reached me, knocking him down with my off-hand 'saber.

"Statement: With glee, master," HK chortled, firing into the midst. Two Sand People charged at me simultaneously, and a surprised snarl erupted from my throat as I lurched backwards just in time. Build on the anger, a dark voice sneered in my head, let it become one with the Force! A gaffi stick whirred past my ear, and I feinted to the left, stabbing someone clean through in passing. He shrieked, his arm lashing out in a dying attack that was easy to avoid. As he crumpled to his knees, my 'saber cleaved through his neck.

A masked head bounced onto the dirt floor.

I glanced up; deeper in the room one of the remaining mob was aiming something directly at me. My vision narrowed. Kath crap, that's a sodding rocket launcher! I snarled in reflex as the threat registered; my hand punched into the air and my mind pushed outward.
The rocket - pilfered Czerka technology, no doubt - had barely ejected before it slammed back into the Sand People.

The heat wave of pressure hit me as the entire back wall of the dwelling exploded, tossing bodies around like limp rag dolls. I stumbled back, barely keeping my footing. HK was still firing, his blasts tearing into the fallen. I saw one move; launching forward, it was all too easy to ensure he didn't move again.

I turned. It was just me and HK left standing, once more. My breath came in short bursts, and a mild satisfaction filled me as I eyed over the carnage. The Force came to me again. The more I practice, the easier it becomes. In a way, I was glad the others were not with me. I wasn't comfortable experimenting around them.

That's because I turn into a blood-thirsty psycho when I let the Force overpower me, Street Kid snarked.

And yet, how many times had it saved my life? How much more powerful was it making me?

We are trapped. Trapped under a mountain of rocks, with no way out! Bastila's thought hissed through the bond. With a start of surprise, I realized it wasn't directed at me. She hadn't meant for me to hear. I'm starting to pick up on her thoughts now. Maybe that made sense, for she had already shown her ability to read my mind, and surely it was a two-way hyperlane.

I wonder then, if it's possible for me to cut her off from the Force?

That was a very interesting idea, but I quickly shut it down before she could overhear. Keep the thoughts small, I berated myself. If nothing else, the close mental proximity I had with Bastila had to be good for my emotional control. I'd be damned if I'd allow that snot access to my mind.

I noticed, then, the large hole the rocket had torn through the clay walls of the base. There was another room beyond, occupied with more Sand People who were strangely quiet... and hadn't rushed us in a vain attempt at evisceration. That was... interesting.

We may as well finish this lot off. I need the practice, after all.

"Supposition: These meatbags appear to be guarding something, master. Maybe their leader?"

"Let's go find out." I could feel a smirk on my face. This felt natural, testing my mettle in battle, proving my superiority. I tamped down on the uncertainty wrestling with a corner of my mind, the feeble concern that this path led to ruin.

It didn't. This path led to victory. What were a bunch of Sand People worth, anyway?

I strode forward, ducking through the shattered wall. The sentients beyond hooted in protest, raising their weapons in a defensive guard. They were surrounding one figure, whose robes were decorated in colourful beads. HK was right. This is their chieftain.

I ripped the constricting mask from my face, and threw it to the ground.

The leader hooted loudly.

"Statement: The meatbag chieftain appears to have recognized us, master."

"Huh?" I blinked in confusion. "I've never been here before." I glanced around at the barbaric building. Wicker baskets and grass mats covered the dusty floor. Some odd sticks hung on the wall. No sense of déjà vu hit me. And this bas was new, that hunter in Anchorhead had said something about that, so it didn't seem possible any part of me could have been here before.

"Extrapolation: It appears the chieftain recognizes both of us, master. He is now demanding an explanation for our presence."

I looked at HK, who was staring unblinkingly at me with his eerie, red gaze. "Have you been here before, HK?"

"Answer: I have no recollection of such a visit, master. However the majority of my memory is still locked within my core. Extrapolation: It could be that I have been here before, or it could be that another similar droid has and these primitive meatbags cannot distinguish between us."

"Your memory is locked away?" I vaguely remembered HK saying something about that back in Yuka Laka's store, but picking out the details from the haze of my memory proved impossible at times. Thank you, Jen Sahara. And Bastila, and any other Jedi responsible for my screwed up mind. "HK, remind me to ask you about that later."

"Response: As you wish, master. Suggestion: Perhaps I should say something to the decorated meatbag before we blast them all?"

The Sand People were still protesting loudly in their guttural tongue. At any moment they were going to attack again, and I would never find out what they meant. "Ask them why I was here earlier. And who else was with me. And ask about Griff."

HK honked something in that ridiculous language. His vocabulator was surprisingly good, and when the leader responded I found it difficult to distinguish between their voices.

"Statement: He appears confused by your question, master. He has said that one other human meatbag was with us, and we met him in his old stronghold, deeper in the desert. He says you were searching for ruins in the Eastern Dune Sea. He also demands that you answer his earlier question, and explain why you have attacked his people when you did not last time. Observation: He appears unwilling to answer any more questions until we respond to his."

I almost stumbled in surprise at HK's response. Searching for ruins in the Eastern Dune Sea? That was precisely what Bastila was doing right now. That seems awfully coincidental. If I really was here before, then why did the Sand People not attack me then?

"HK, inform him that his people fired on me first, and would not respond to our attempts to talk or negotiate."

The droid did as instructed, and turned to face me once more. "Statement: Fortunately, it appears bloodshed cannot be avoided, master." At HK's ominous words my muscles clenched in readiness. "The chieftain has responded that he must slaughter us to avenge the death of his people. Commentary: I find this a satisfactory and most enjoyable conclusion."

So did I. Feel the rage, the passion, the power as it fires through my veins!

I raised my dual lightsabers, and stared through the red glow at the Sand People ahead. I smiled. Well, the voices in my head can't object. It was the chieftain's decision to fight, not mine. The Sand People cried out in challenge, and charged. There were only six of them in total, but these appeared to be more elite in their capabilities. Two of them flanked the chieftain, spraying blaster bolts from stolen Czerka rifles.

I lifted one of my hands high, feeling the Force coalesce around my fist. How had I created that lightning against Juhani? Every time I reached out, I felt like I was a blundering bantha in a cantina, struggling to find the exit but knocking into walls instead.

The power was there, though. It grew. And as the Sand People neared, I roared and abruptly loosed it.

There was a loud cry of protest as an invisible energy hit them. Two dropped their weapons, their hands wrapped around their neck as they made gagging noises. The Force rode in the air around them, an insidious taint twisting through their bodies. What the frell was that?

A gaffi stick shot close to my head, and I lurched back before counter-swiping in a blow that sliced deep into a chest. A second hit followed. Power and strength. The Force calls to me! I dodged another blow, coming back to stab the next one in the stomach. A cry of exaltation escaped me. No one can withstand this!

Then came another, snarling, lifting his pathetic stick high. I laughed, moulding the humming power in my grasp. As he launched into a wild swing, I hurled a charged ball of energy in the centre of his chest. He went flying.

My lightsaber followed, thrown from my grasp, slashing with precision into his neck. I heard the sentient's cry end in a gurgle, a moment before my weapon snapped back into my hand.

Satisfaction surged through me.

Both of the chieftain's aides had fallen to HK's blaster fire. I stalked forward, intent on the leader, but another primitive came running in from the sidelines. My lightsaber cut straight through him.

Two more followed. I laughed as my hand shot out, static crackling at my fingertips. Pathetic imbeciles! They think they can survive my onslaught? Their bodies convulsed and crumpled beneath the sharp white lightning. Their cries of pain dwindled into silence, and the bodies turned into corpses.

I sneered at the chieftain. The exultant power surged through me, the mastery of life and death. It was power to do anything I desired, and it swept away all logical thought or reason. The Force bent to my will, and clenched satisfyingly around the leader's neck.

Let's see... can I do this better than Juhani?

The chieftain rose into the air, frantically clutching at his neck as he wheezed and spluttered.

Why, yes. Yes I can.

I tried twisting it harder. His legs jerked, and his head flopped to the side. Just as I realized he was nearing the end, a heavy impact crunched into my upraised forearm.

Pain blossomed through my limb. I shrieked, stumbling backward to avoid a second blow from my assailant. But he fell, an instant later, two smoking patches of melted flesh in his back where HK had hit true.

My limb dangled uselessly at my side. The chieftain was on his knees, scrabbling to escape. With a snarl of anger, I strode forward and drove my lightsaber into his back.

Then the Force fled, and fresh waves of agony spiked through my arm. Sithspit, I think that's broken. It hurt like a schutta. I grimaced, and cast my eyes over the room.
The bent corpse of the leader was at my feet. Various body parts bloodied the area. The tinny smell of viscera was thick in the air, and as I looked around, the last remnants of my berserker rage vanished.

There was a sickening sense of dread curling like a sandsnake in my gut. I was clammy, suddenly cold, staring blanking at the dead Sand People. All this crowing pleasure I'd experienced during this massacre, was... was... wrong. The acrid taste of bile rose in my throat.

I do what I want. I prove my worth this way!

This is wrong! This is repulsive! This isn't me.

I closed my eyes, a rising wave of horror overwhelming the earlier satisfaction of victory. The conflicting emotions raged within my soul, and I wasn't sure what I felt anymore. Who I wanted to be.

A surge through the bond shattered my internal struggle, drawing my attention like a lifeline. What was that? I opened my mind once more to my bond-sister. Again, I felt another surge of energy. She's using the Force. I frowned, struggling to make sense of it.

This is not working! I need to make him understand!

Now this was curious. Bastila had not yet sensed my interest in her predicament, and I tried to make my concentration on our link subtle, unnoticeable. I could feel her panic, feel her struggle to overcome it with a dogged determination.

Then there was another surge of Force, even stronger than before. My breath hissed between my teeth. Compulsion, a sepulchral voice whispered in my mind. She's using compulsion.

Finally, it worked. And he has not realized this time. He will not mention this to anyone anymore. Through the bond, Bastila was a mass of pure relief. As if she had somehow avoided some sort of catastrophe.

My curiosity could no longer be contained. You seem to be having fun. I slammed the thought out hard.

Jen! Her response back was quick, and horrified. What are you doing?

Wondering what poor sap you are playing with.

I'm not- I am not playing! This sort of use of the Force is not to be taken lightly! How- how dare you spy upon me! The words were indignant, but her tone... her tone was straight back into panic.

Oh, that's rich, I returned with snark. Well, you don't need to worry about me anymore. We won't be seeing each other again, more's the pity.

A deadly silence echoed through my mind, before her thought-voice returned. What are you saying?

What do you think? I snapped back. I'm not coming back. The desert is a wonderful place to vanish in. I certainly don't trust you, and I'd be an idiot to blindly follow you.

No! No, you cannot be serious! You- you still have so much to learn! She was frantic, I sensed, scrabbling futilely for an argument that would touch me.
I can learn it myself. You forcing that stupid code down my throat is hardly what I'd call productive.

Do not do this, Jen! Please... you are still far too vulnerable to the Dark Side. And- and you are now a target, too!

A target? I felt myself sneering at her through the bond. Is that some sort of threat?

No! I am talking about the Sith! She paused, and I wondered if she was trying to reign in her tangled emotions. Jen. Please, let us talk about this back at the ship. Now is not a good time.

What, because you're trapped under a mountain of rocks?

She was shocked back into silence again. Briefly. That is in poor taste, Jen. How long have you been listening to my thoughts?

I'd hardly spy on you out of choice, I lied. I can't help it if your panic bleeds through to me.

There is no emotion, her mental chant whispered through the bond, there is peace.

I snickered. So you say. What's this about the Sith, anyway?

Something akin to a sigh emanated from her. Calo Nord has attempted to kill us, and is now after you. It appears that Malak wishes both you and I dead. We must stay together, Jen. You are too vulnerable by yourself.

No way. I told her coldly. Calo Nord was no threat to me. I'm on my own now.

"Query: Master, shouldn't we be moving now?"

"In a minute, HK," I forestalled.

You- you have an obligation to Juhani!

What? Disbelief swirled through me at her utter gall. In case you forgot, she tried to kill me!

Yes, and you redeemed her! She believes she owes you a debt. You owe it to her to ensure she follows the correct path.

I can't believe this kath crap you are feeding me. I am not returning, Bastila. You have your own little quest with those ruins, I'm sure you can keep yourself occupied without my presence.

Please, Jen, allow me to teach you! Why do you have to be so- so frustratingly difficult? She was still flailing, somewhere between panic and desperation.

I don't trust you. You tried to trick me onto Dantooine. Where will you lead me next? I will not see any of your so-called masters.

Bastila was silent for a long time after that. I dragged my attention back to my surroundings, and the throbbing agony of my arm came back to revisit my senses.

"Jen!" A high-pitched voice yelled in the distance.

"I wondered where they had gotten to," I muttered, and then returned the call.
A minute later and Mission popped her head around the corner. She appeared relatively unhurt, and squeaked in dismay when she saw my useless limb dangling to one side.

"Oh, Jen! That looks awful! What happened?" She rushed to my side, her light brown eyes wide in sympathy. "Sheesh, there are so many corpses here!"

There was a loud howl, preceding the entrance of Zaalbar. I shot him a brief smile as he ducked through the entrance to the inner chamber.

"I thought you were in the desert," I murmured.

"(I cannot guard your back if I am not at your side!)" he wailed. His eyes fixed on my arm, and he let out a distressed moan.

"When we lost you and HK in that huge battle, I decided it might be best to go get Big Z. I'd been forced into the turret room anyway, so I deactivated them while I was there and then ran back to find him. It looked like you could use the help, y'know?" Mission looked at me solemnly. I didn't doubt the Twi'lek was brave, and she obviously had been trying to do the right thing.

"Shame you didn't get here quicker." I grinned at her, trying to ignore the pulsating pain radiating from my forearm. "Where's the Paranoid Has-Been?"

"Oh, very funny," Carth's voice snapped for the adjoining room. "Any cuter and you could be a Gamorrean's sister."

"Better than being a Gamorrean's mother," I quipped as Carth appeared through the torn hole in the room, scowling at me.

Would you agree to accompany me to someplace neutral? Bastila's voice entered my mind once more. Some place where there are no Jedi?

I was beginning to feel tired. I sighed in weariness before answering. What are you suggesting now?

You need training, Jen. The Dark Side is ever prevalent. If you refuse to meet with any of the Masters, then I have no choice but to attempt to guide you myself. Please, I implore you to accept my aid.

I was silent, rolling her suggestions around in my mind. I was still fumbling with the Force, it was true. At times it didn't answer, and I couldn't always predict my actions. Then there was the matter of the bond, and Bastila's hold over me. And Juhani- I hadn't pinned her down for any teaching yet, either.

But I didn't want Bastila sensing any indecision on my part. With a forced show of indifference, I tried to mentally shift my focus away from her.

"Have you found out anything about Griff?" Mission demanded

"No," I said, snapping my 'saber onto my belt. I'd dropped the other earlier, when my arm was hit. With a grimace of pain, I bent over to retrieve it.

"You need some sort of brace. We should get back to Anchorhead," Carth said, eyeing me over in concern.

"Hmm," I murmured, not quite sure whether I'd be joining them or not. I can't fix this arm by myself. Not out in the desert. I frowned at the realization, and followed Mission back out into a longer corridor.

What sort of neutral place are you suggesting? I asked Bastila. I felt the spark of hope emanate from her, and gritted my teeth.

I am finished on Tatooine, and Manaan is a planet that I need to visit on my quest. It is also purely neutral in the war with Malak. There is a Republic base on Manaan, but no Jedi are stationed there. The Selkath do not condone any sort of violence.

I stepped over corpses of Sand People as we walked further along the base. It was a complete and utter bloodbath. Was this all my doing? Of course it had been; HK and I had ripped through this place. The Sand People were soft, armour-less and ill-equipped. They had plenty of rage and courage, but that could only get them so far.

No one can withstand me, I thought with satisfaction.

I'm turning into something abominable. Ah, that'd be Street Kid acting up again.

All this death! No, I cannot bear it! A quiet whisper from Jen.

My arm throbbed again, a reminder that I needed some sort of assistance. And I couldn't yet rely on the Force consistently. I couldn't trust Bastila, but I could use her - glean what I needed to improve my control over the Force. Juhani would help, too.

And Manaan... a neutral world sounded easy enough to disappear in. Better than a desert one, at any rate.

Manaan it is, then. I responded to Bastila.

"Well, troops, it looks like Manaan's our next destination," I told the group.

"Manaan? What are you talking about?" Carth asked, frowning, as we ventured further into the base.

"Manaan? What's that?" Mission chirped brightly ahead of us. Sometimes I wondered how she could always be so unfailingly cheerful.

"Some neutral planet," I told her. "Bastila's done with Tatooine, and has just agreed to go there next."

Carth stopped walking and turned to face me, his hands on his hips. His dark eyes flashed with frustration. "You're still referring to that supposed mind-link, aren't you?"

I shrugged irritably at him. "Ask Bastila if you don't believe me." Why did I even bother with the man? For some odd reason, I desired his trust, yet at the same time I wished he was anywhere but near me.

"Hey! Is someone there?" a young, male voice called from further ahead. Mission froze.

I strode past her and towards the rickety door it had come from, thrusting it open with my good hand.

A startled and frightened Twi'lek was crouched in the corner, flinching at my entrance. He blinked, and eyed me over, hopeful surprise entering his expression. His skin was pale blue and covered in desert grime. "Uh... you there! I'm... I'm a high ranking executive of the Czerka Corporation! Eh... there's a big reward if you take me back to Anchorhead!"

"Riiight," I drawled in disbelief.

"Griff!" Mission squeaked, running next to me and brushing past me. I groaned in pain, squeezing my eyes shut as fresh agony spiked through my forearm. "Sheesh, Jen, I'm sorry!"

"Mission?" Griff squawked in surprise, his eyes round. "Is it really you? I heard Taris was attacked! I thought you were dead!"

Mission beamed, running further in and throwing her arms around her brother.

"Joy of joys, my little sister is alive!" Griff gasped, and Mission squeezed him.

"(I always like a happy ending.)" Zaalbar growled softly behind me.

"Hmm," I said noncommittally. I wondered what Mission's plans would be now, and if they involved Griff Vao.

"Sheesh, Griff, you like smell like bantha poo-doo!" Mission complained, extricating herself. "Like Big Z on a really bad hair day!"

"(I do not have bad hair days!" Zaalbar howled in protest. I smirked as I saw Griff jump at the Wookiee's roar, his blue skin turning a few shades more pale.

"What — what was that?" he whispered, his voice weaker than before.

"Oh, that's just Big Z!" Mission explained in a bright tone.

"Hate to break this up, but we should probably head back before Sand People reinforcements arrive," Carth, the voice of wisdom, interrupted. "I hear there are plenty more bases deeper in the desert, and Jen's arm needs to be looked at."

"Your concern is touching, flyboy," I murmured. He eyed me over blandly.

"Alright, let's get going. We'll talk on the way!" Mission pulled on her brother's arm, and I stepped back to let them pass. Griff gasped audibly as he spotted the towering Wookiee.

"Zaalbar, this is my brother, Griff," Mission introduced. As she continued the introductions, I spotted another closed door and my curiosity was piqued. I could hear some sort of chattering behind it. I strode forward and kicked it open, the movement jolting a fresh surge of agony through my broken limb.

A small party of Jawas met my stunned eyes, and started jabbering at me in an odd dialect.

"(You are not giants made of sand!" one of them squeaked. To my astonishment, I understood the words, if not quite the meaning. "(Will you help us or enslave us? We are unwilling servants bowed under whip and gaffi!"

"What the-" Carth muttered incredulously, swinging around to see what the commotion was. "Jawas?"

"Query: Perm-"

"No, HK," I cut him off. These creatures seemed relatively harmless, and the thought of more pointless slaughter raised the bile in my throat.

No, I enjoy proving my worth. But killing these tiny creatures is no challenge.

"(You are free to go,)" I fumbled in their language, struggling with the sentence structure. "(There are no more people of the sand alive.)"

"(You speak the language trade!)") one of them responded gleefully. The other bunch jabbered in excitement, and quickly walked past me. "(We will remember you! Should you wish fair trade, find Iziz in the old city new!)")

I stood back in confusion as the Jawas bustled past me, scurrying swiftly down the corridor.

"Just how many languages can you speak?" Carth muttered in disbelief. "What sort of university teaches Mandalorian, Shyriwook translation, and Jawa dialects?"

I sighed, exhaustion and numbing pain overshadowing any quip I could throw at him. "I don't know, Onasi. My memory is all screwed up. I don't really remember my past, it's riddled with gaping holes. I told you before; if you want to know more, ask Bastila." My words had turned bitter, twisted. Carth stared at me, his brows knitting in either disbelief or confusion. I sighed, closed my eyes, and turned my back on him.

"(Let us go back. Jen is injured,)" Zaalbar growled. I opened my eyes again to see the large Wookiee staring down at me in concern.

"Yeah, no point sticking around here anymore," Mission agreed, pulling her dazed brother after her.

"Okay." I muttered. "Someone give Mission's brother a blaster, though. Just in case we run into anything else."

I vaguely saw Carth chuck the Twi'lek a weapon, before we trudged out. Our exit was a slow, cautious pace, back out the canvas-lined chambers of the inner base. Splatters of blood marked bright spots at various places. Closer to the perimeter, the walls were made of reinforced plaster and sandstone.

I struggled to keep my pain under control. Bastila's emotions were once more apparent to me. Concern and fright and uncertainty. It was interesting that her mental state was so volatile, so less composed than the outer mask she showcased to the world. Idle curiosity had me, once more, opening my concentration to discover what she was up to. If nothing else, it will take my mind off my arm. And away from everything else that is going on inside my head.

Her panic seemed to be getting the better of her.

What-what does he think he's doing? He will kill us all, the crazy barbarian!

Ah, barbarian. She must be cursing Canderous.

Jen? Bastila's startled mind voice homed in on my thoughts.

Damn.

You are listening into my thoughts, she gasped, again! Her panic was growing. It was hypocritical in the extreme for her to complain, and yet I couldn't help but wonder why the thought of me hearing her thoughts drove her into such a tailspin of fright.
I'm learning from the best, I snapped sarcastically. Besides, your ranting makes me forget my broken arm.

A brief silence. It sounds like you have journeyed into trouble. I suggest you head back to the Ebon Hawk. I will meet you there, as soon as I can.

Mission giggled uneasily as we stepped outside into the bright desert.

I'm in trouble? Sounds like you're having your fair share, I shot back. Stupid Jedi snot, I added quietly in the recesses of my own mind.

Yes, I admit I am not in the most desirable of situations, she responded in a forced tone. However, I – no! No! She cut herself off to concentrate on whatever mayhem Canderous was creating.

Are you alright? I asked, concerned despite myself. No, I thought. I'm only concerned because I'd rather have Canderous alive than dead. Nothing else.

I do believe his grenades worked. Bastila sounded stunned, disbelieving. Now I will never hear the end of it. She seemed to focus on me once more. Jen, do be careful out there. Calo Nord is hunting you in the desert. Please, head back to Anchorhead as quickly as possible.

I rolled my eyes, and refused to answer her.

xXx
Sweat dripped down the ends of my lekku, stuck against my neck under those sweltering headcloths. I trudged behind the others, feet dragging, as we climbed over yet another mound of stupid sand. This was nothing like Taris. Barren and bleak, the harsh desert stretched impossibly in every direction, and two suns beat down an exhausting heat that I was totally over.

On any other day, I'd be in a really grumpy mood.

I glanced sideways at Griff. His mouth was gaping open as he panted like a kath hound, and the heat flushed his face a purplish colour. I knew he'd be gunning for the 'Hawk's sonic as soon as we brought him to our ship, and I was glad there were two onboard so we wouldn't squabble over who got first turn.

My brother. We're back together. At last! It didn't feel real. After all, it'd been years since Griff had disappeared, leaving me nothing more than a data-note and an expired cred chit. We had so much to catch up on. Part of me had never really expected to see him again.

Griff turned to catch my eye, throwing me that cheeky grin I remembered so well.

"I can't believe you're here, sis!" he exclaimed, grabbing my hand and squeezing it. "Getting me out of tough scrapes as usual! Wow, I hate to think what would've happened if you hadn't come along when you did."

I grinned. "And Big Z always hassles me for getting into trouble! Wait 'til he gets to know you."

Griff appraised Zaalbar warily; I could tell he didn't know what to make of the huge hairball that was my most trusted friend. I lowered my voice. "He's absolutely wizard, Griff. He's always looking out for me. You'll like him when ya get to know him."

"Uh, does he actually talk?" Griff hissed in a tactless stage whisper, his eyes widening comically as if he didn't expect Zaalbar to actually hear or something.

I glared at my brother, snatching my hand away. "Sheesh, Griff, has the heat melted your brain? 'Course he talks. In Shyriiwook. Duh."

"Oh right!" Griff said. "That's what all the growling is then, huh?"

I rolled my eyes at him and walked on. "You always were a little slow."

"And you always were a little precocious!" Griff responded. I stuck my tongue out at him, and his blue eyes crinkled in good-natured humour.

It's like we've never been apart, I thought. It's just like old times. My brother even looked the same as I remembered; young and carefree, with his headtails looped fashionably around his neck. He was dirty, sure, and the Czerka uniform he'd been wearing was grimy and torn, but he'd clean up well. He'd always cut a dashing figure, back in the Lower City, dressed in fine clothes as he strutted about on Exchange business, wagering goods back and forth to the Beks.
The Beks had never warmed to him, not really. Gadon Thek had taken me under his wing from an early age, but Griff... well, Griff'd been grudgingly allowed in the Bek corridors, but only under supervision. He'd never been considered for membership, no matter how I railed at Gadon. I never understood why, not really. Griff had Exchange contacts, and sure, we couldn't trust the Exchange - but Gadon and Zaerdra acted like we couldn't trust Griff, either.

Griff had always been confident - cocky even, in the past. As I eyed him over once more, I noticed a nervousness in his bearing I was unfamiliar with. His eyes flicked over everybody in quick succession, but wouldn't stay in one place for too long. It has been six years, though. And he's just spent days as a prisoner. I'd be frightened witless as well.

We were back together. That was all that mattered.

But as I slogged on, my brother on one side and my best friend on the other, I couldn't help but contrast the two. Griff had always claimed he'd smuggled us to Taris onboard a freighter, although in truth I remembered nothing but the Lower City from an early age. Still, he'd made sure I was fed and clothed and safe. Mostly. There was that time he'd left me in Javyar's cantina, when a slaver had tried to snatch me.

I'd been young, then, only five years Galactic. It had been Zaerdra who'd rescued me, dumping me in front of Gadon like a present or something. I'd never liked the fact that I pretty much owed my life to Zaerdra.

But Griff tried, he tried to look out for me. I knew he did. He just had a bad run of stuffing things up.

Big Z was so different to my brother, and not just in looks. First time I'd met him, he'd been surrounded by half-drunk Vulkars trying to prove their manliness by taking down a Wookiee. Zaalbar was enraged and panicked and absolutely stank, but for some reason I hadn't been afraid. This was before Brejik, back when the Vulkars were no more than disorganized rabble, back when they feared Gadon enough that they wouldn't challenge me, Gadon's favourite child. I'd brandished a blaster I'd filched from Zaerdra's stock, and they scampered, leaving me staring at a howling Wookiee who didn't know the first thing about the Lower City.

It'd been tricky, learning each other's language. I'd found Zaalbar a place to hang low until he found his feet, and brought him food and equipment. Big Z only had a rudimentary understanding of Basic then, so I downloaded a Shyriiwook translation package that allowed us to communicate. Big Z began to trust me, and we looked out for each other time and again. The amount of times he'd saved my life... Big Z always had my back. We always stood for each other.

I've never trusted Griff quite the same way. Griff always looked out for Griff first. No, no that was mean, thinking that. I'd only just found Griff again - my poor brother, trapped for days by savages - and here I was, doubting him. But it ain't just Zaalbar who's more loyal. What about Jen, saving us from that rancor? If it had been Griff there, he would have run and left me as rancor dinner.

No! Griff meant well. It wasn't fair to compare him to the likes of Jen and Zaalbar, who were stronger and better at fighting than him.

I shook my head hard, as if to throw off the unwelcome thoughts. Directly in front of me was Jen, another hot topic of worry. She was acting normal again, yeah, but... Is it just me, or is she a bit angrier now? A bit crazier? Jen had run straight into that Sand People fight, and sheesh! That scared the stuffing outta me. But then, Jen had always done that sorta thing, even back in the Undercity on Taris. But there's something not quite right. It's like she enjoys the killing. Like she's itching for a fight. Big Z was worried, too. I could tell by the way his dark gaze kept wandering back to her.

And then there was the Force. The freaky, freaky Force. Jen could use it. No wonder Bastila had been so interested in her - the stupid Jedi snot had probably known about Jen back on Taris. At least Jen won't let her have her way now. At least Jen ain't all pathetic anymore. It was Bastila's fault, all of it, it had to be.

Big Z didn't believe it. Jedi were meant to be all honourable and stuff, and he claimed a powerful Jedi like Bastila Shan wouldn't control someone else that way. I kept telling him he was too naive, and it was obvious Bastila had secrets... but Jen had said her mind was all messed up. She'd said something about a doctor making things worse, about black spots and it maybe not being Bastila... I didn't know anymore. I'd been dead set on blaming the Jedi snot for it all, but maybe I was wrong.

For it kinda sounded like a brain injury, or something. And while I didn't like or trust Bastila, it was hard to think of her as someone evil enough to, like, mind-control Jen and make her forget her past. The worst thing I'd seen Bastila do was trip me with the Force back on Taris and act like a stuck up scow.

Maybe... maybe something had happened to Jen, and Bastila was just trying to help. Jen said Bastila knew more about her past than she did. Which wasn't the same as Bastila being the cause of it.

I'm gonna talk to Jen. I ran up to her, my boots digging into the coarse sand, and gave her a quick smile. Jen's visor turned to look at me, and I noticed her head-cloths were unwinding. Flecks of blood spattered a maroon pattern of death over her.

"Are things alright?" I blurted out.

"Uh, yeah." She sounded taken aback. "Why?"

I shrugged. "I dunno, Jen, you just seem, sort of, angry and stuff..." I trailed off.

She turned away, staring out at the distant horizon as we trudged, one foot after the other. It was late afternoon, still stifling with heat but somehow a little less intense than earlier. The two suns were close together in the sky, and I'd heard Carth say the days on Tatooine were currently at their shortest. Apparently, that was still longer than a standard Tarisian day, and with all the harsh sunlight it was no wonder this entire place was covered in stupid deserts. I grabbed a quick swig of water from the gourd at my side. I was glad, at least, that the Sand People stronghold had not been far away from Anchorhead.

"Lots of people trying to kill you has that effect," she responded finally, flatly.

Her duel with Juhani had been horrifying. I'd been paralysed, unable to do anything bar watch as the scene unfolded. Jen had been spectacularly out-classed at first, and I'd really believed it was her end. And then, it all turned around. Jen had been the one to walk away, and that crazed catwoman had lost her killing edge and followed us meekly back to the Hawk. All the fight had disappeared from Juhani, and whenever I'd looked her way she'd seemed downright miserable.

I still wasn't planning on going anywhere near her.

But I didn't know what else to say to Jen, so we edged into an uncomfortable silence. Finally she spoke again, her tone cheerful. It sounded forced.

"Well, we're off to Manaan next. Think you'll like it there?"
My thoughts brightened as I considered the possibilities. Big Z swearing a lifedebt to Jen certainly has its advantages. I'd never had the chance to leave Taris before. Griff had always talked about taking me to Tatooine or Corellia, but it'd never happened. Instead I'd found my own way here - unlike so many of my friends back on Taris.

Back on Taris. Who knew how many were still alive. I sniffed, and forced the thoughts away.

"I've never heard of it. What's it like?" I asked quickly.

Jen shrugged. "Bastila says it's a neutral world." Her voice had twisted on the Jedi's name. "Apparently it's a peaceful world, and violence is not tolerated."

"Sounds too good to be true," I whispered. No violence. Was such a place possible? I'd seen so much death lately that I found it hard to sleep at night. Having Big Z hold me while I cried might be comforting, but it was also dead embarrassing.

I look back to Jen, striding purposefully over the sand. Her lightsabers – lightsabers, like a real Jedi! – were clipped to her belt, and her stance was that of one who was used to combat. I recognized the sort. I'd spent most of my life around the Beks, after all. No violence would be good for Jen, too. Maybe help her mellow out. I liked Jen - we got along great, even though she was almost old enough to be my mother. She was funny, and interesting, and knew how to have a good time. But she was also far too good at freaking me – and everybody else – out.

Well, we're stuck following her lead. Big Z's pretty solemn with his vows, and I ain't leaving him.

The suns were drooping wearily on the horizon, and I realized with a jolt that dusk wasn't too far away. We'd get back to Anchorhead before dark, though, and I looked forward to the rest. The huge shape of the abandoned sandcrawler we'd passed early that morning loomed next to us, and I ducked into the shadows it cast for a brief respite. I looked around for any of those odd Jawa creatures, but didn't spot anything alive. Just loads of rubble. Overturned crates, and shards of metal, and other rubbish littering the sand near the massive 'crawler. Sheesh, it's a regular junkyard round here. It must have been debris from the aftermath of the Sand People raids.

"How's your arm, Jen?" I asked. It hung uselessly at her side. She'd barely complained about it, but it had to be hurting her. Well, Jen's always been tough. Except when Bastila - or maybe her own mind - was making her act like an idiot.

"It's okay, Mission."

"(We should hurry our steps, and ensure we are within Anchorhead before it gets dark. This place is dangerous,)" Zaalbar rumbled.

Jen shot a droll look my way, and I grinned. Zaalbar worrying about danger was standard operating procedure. SOP, I'd heard the Beks say, when they tried to act like real military.

"Don't let me die under here!" a female scream pierced the air. We all froze apart from Griff, who jumped back in fright. Carth pulled out a blaster and ran towards the source. I followed him, looking around wildly without spotting anything of note. Maybe it's a surviving miner from the earlier attack?

"Where are you?" Carth called out. I ran towards a large metal crate, half broken and lying on its side in the shadow of the sandcrawler. It was tall, and would give me a better view once I clambered on top of it. For whoever it was, they sounded desperate.
"Wait guys," Jen called. "Something's not right!"

"Please! Anyone! I'm trapped under here!" The pleading voice came from directly underneath me. Straight under the broken crate. I gasped, and leaped back down to the coarse sand.

"Get away, Mission! Bastila warned me there was someone out here hunting us!" Jen cried, running towards me. I glared at her. This was someone who needed help. There wasn't any danger. Like Bastila knows what she's talking about!

"We'll help you!" I answered the stranger's voice, bending over to inspect the edges of the crate. It was far too large for me to move, but I could dig a hole under it. Or Big Z could maybe drag it-

A loud explosion slammed into my body and I was flung backwards, ears ringing and vision blinded white. Sand spat pinpricks into the sides of my face under the cloths, and the air left my lungs in a whoosh as I thudded to the ground, stunned.

Something grabbed at my neck, rough and ready, and I was pulled upright in an unknown grip. Dazed and disoriented, I was barely aware of the thick arm clenching around my middle, or the whimper that escaped my lips.

My head was yanked backwards at someone ripped the sweaty headcloths away. Cool metal kissed against my temple, and the ringing in my ears subsided.

There was a loud grunt directly behind me.

"We gots you good now!" a voice squealed.

"(Mission!)" Zaalbar roared. My vision, speckled and spotty, slowly began to make order of the objects in front of me. Big Z was metres away, distressed and enraged. The metal crate had opened in sections along the ground, exposing a large, dug out hole beneath it.

The iron band around my waist tightened as Zaalbar took a step closer.

"Move and yous die!" another voice, thick and deep, barked into my ear. It was followed by a grunt and another snort. Gamorreans! The gun pressed harder into my face. I froze, and the heat of fear burned through me. I could die, right here in this barren desert. A Gamorran had me by the neck, with a blaster pressing into my head.

"Let. Her. Go." Jen's voice, low and dangerous. She was standing next to Zaalbar, a murderous expression twisting her face. I stared at her pleadingly. Jen, get me out of here! A blood-red saber, held tightly in her good arm, shone scarlet. Carth, flanking her, held a steady blaster at my captor.

My eyes slid to the side, and I could see another one of those piggy creatures scrabble out of the dug-out hole. That makes three, I think. No problem for us, if one didn't have a trigger finger of death pointed at me. Rolls of fat gaped over his substandard armour, and I shuddered.

"We did a good ambush and you better pay... uh... maybe five hundred credits now! She die otherwise!"

Oh bantha crap! The only creds I know of are back on the Ebon Hawk! My stomach clenched in terror, and my mouth dried up. My eyes flicked back to Zaalbar; his face was contorted in a snarl. I looked further and spotted Griff, beyond the others. The blaster Carth had given him hung limply at his side, and as I stared he took a step back away from me, away from the Gamorreans. And then another. He'd just leave me? Leave me here, in the hands of these stinky, ugly pig-faces?
A sob wrenched free from my throat, and my captor shook me in annoyance. My ears rang, my vision blurred, and my stomach heaved.

"Yous all pay up now!" the voice to my side squealed.

My gaze flicked desperately over my friends. Even that insane robot stood in Jen's shadow, a blaster ready and waiting. Jen twitched, meeting Carth's gaze as she jerked her head to the side.

"No tricks! We not thick!" my captor grunted. I tried to force my fear away, to be strong like Jen, but I was shaking in the tight grasp of the monster. Will these horrible pigs really kill me? Is my last sight going to be of my brother, scrambling away in fear?

Griff had a pleading look on his face, but he continued to backpedal, even with Jen and Big Z and Carth and freaking HK between him and any sort of danger.

Jen sucked in a large gulp of air, and deactivated her lightsaber before clipping it onto her belt. Her face was blank as she began walking slowly toward the Gamorreans, one hand outspread in a show of peace or surrender. My captor's hold tightened to a chokehold, and I gasped. Jen? What are you doing?

"Here, I will give you the credits," she said, pointing to the Gamorrean who held me. "You are the leader here."

"No!" There was a guttural protect to my left. "Gurke says me in charge!"

"I should be leader!" a low voice rumbled past my ear.

Jen looked past me, straight into the eyes of my captor. "Yes, you are the strongest. I will give you the money." She dug a into the pockets of her armour, as if fishing for the credits, and took a step closer. What's she doing? She doesn't have any creds!

My captor squealed in delight, and dropped me to lurch forward for Jen's non-existent offer. I gasped, stumbling, only to be knocked back with a thump as Jen barrelled into me, toppling us both to the ground.

The harsh noise of blaster fire started, almost drowning out a moan of pain from Jen as she landed. Her weight held me pinned, helpless, yet protected by the shield of her body.

"Jen!" I wailed in panic, in fright.

"Stay still!" she hissed into my ear. Zaalbar was roaring, a loud roar of pure Wookiee anger. The noise of blaster flurries were cut through by the sound of metal striking metal, but Jen completely blocked my view of what was happening. There was a thud next to me, followed by two more. I couldn't stop another whimper, even as I hated myself for it. What's going on?

"(Mission!)") Zaalbar roared again, Jen rolled away, and the sight of my furry friend looming over me had never been more welcome.

"Frelling bastard stars-cursed sodding arm!" Jen was swearing as Zaalbar lifted me up bodily into his grasp. Stunned, I burst into frantic sobs. His grip tightened, and he crooned softly in his own tongue. "(You are alright. They are gone. Everything is alright now.)" I pressed my face into his musky fur.

I'm crying in front of Jen! And Carth! I sniffed loudly, still dazed, and struggled to force back my tears. I pulled away from Zaalbar. "I'm okay, Big Z. Really," I mumbled.
Zaalbar still held onto my arms, but slid me gently to the sand. My feet were shaky as they took my weight.

"Mission, you're not hurt?" Jen was standing next to the Wookiee, frowning in concern. Or pain. Her arm hung limply, and her face was sweaty and pale. She looked a mess, with dark curls sticking up from underneath her dislodged headcloths, and her entire body canting to one side.

"Jen, your arm! Is it okay? You fell right on top of me!"

She frowned at me. "I'm okay, or I will be when I get some kolto. The explosion – it didn't hurt you?"

"I'm alright, guys," I said shakily. "Because of y'all, I'm alright."

"I'm glad, Mission," Carth added, his brown eyes dark with concern as he looked me over. I smiled at him weakly, and he turned to frown at Jen. "Why didn't you use the Force, Jen? Mission could have died!"

Jen grimaced and looked away. She seemed uneasy. Zaalbar dropped his paws from my arms, but still stood close, also intent upon Jen.

"I didn't want to risk it," she muttered. "Half the time I can't use it, and then when I can it doesn't always do what I want." She shook her head, and her expression turned baffled. "And then sometimes Bastila interferes, too. I just didn't want to risk it, Carth. Not with Mission's life."

Carth was still staring at Jen, but his expression had morphed to surprise. I wasn't sure if I'd ever heard her say his first name before.

"Sheesh, Jen, you saved my life!" I blurted. "Again! I have no problems with how you did it." I sniffed loudly, remembering the rough hands of my captor, and my eyes slid to the bloodied corpses on the ground.

"We all saved you," Jen responded in a dry voice. "Even HK."

"Statement: With pleasure, master. I gleefully await the next meatbag to dispatch."

And then, I noticed Griff, standing nervously on the fringes of our group. Everyone had a hand in rescuing me. Apart from my brother.

Zaalbar turned, and I heard a faint grumble of discontent fire in his chest. He glanced back to me, and the noise stopped. I felt my shoulders tense.

"I'm glad you're okay, sis!" Griff blurted out. He ran back to me, lekku flicking in distress; at least he was sincere in his fear. Fear for me, or for himself?

I took a step back, stumbling over some debris in the sand. Zaalbar caught me with a strong paw, and I righted myself again. "You were pretty quick to walk away, Griff," I mumbled. Griff halted some metres away, his eyes dark and worried. He swallowed.

"I'm no good in situations like this sis, you know that! I didn't want to get in the way!"

"You ran away, Griff!" I snapped. He flinched, and the hurt, desperate look on his face eroded my anger. He tries, I know he does, I thought guiltily. He's no fighter.

"I'm sorry, Mission! I would have helped if I could!" he pleaded. I wanted to believe him, to trust in my brother, and I reminded myself that he was tired and out of his element... but he'd had blaster training, back on Taris. Griff was a crack shot. Why had he run, from three Gamorreans holding his sister, when our allies were obviously the stronger side?

Because he's a coward. Because Griff looks out for Griff, first. Even Lena spoke poorly of him now. I frowned, remembering that dancing trash and her spiteful comments. I hadn't believed it at the time, but now I wondered.

I looked over at my friends, again. All of them had risked their lives for me. All of them had charged into a Sand People stronghold, because it had been my brother held hostage there. What would Griff have done, in a similar situation?

"Griff," I began. "I... I have to ask you something. It's important."

He blinked, his blue eyes staring soulfully at me. They were as pale and clear as the Tatooine sky above us. I'd always envied his eyes; I wasn't vain, but I would've preferred that colour to my own light brown.

"Fire away, sis. You know I'll tell you the truth."

"Will you? Will you really? He'd always been so good at lying to get his way. I bit my lip indecisively, and then the words tumbled out. "I ran into Lena. She said... she said it was your idea to leave me on Taris six years ago. It's not true, is it?"

"You left her behind?" Jen cut in sharply. The others had been silent during our confrontation, but no longer. Jen had ripped off her visor, glaring fiercely at Griff. Her face had tightened in disgust. I'd never spoken of my brother to her before. "A pretty Twi'lek girl, on the streets of Taris? Why didn't you just sell her to a Hutt while you were at it, you slime?"

Griff took a step away from her in wariness. "(What you did was wrong!)" Zaalbar growled. "(How could you leave your young sister behind? Have you no honour?)"

"Hey, hey!" Griff protested, alarmed at the Wookiee's rumbling. "Sis, keep your pet on a leash, would ya?" Zaalbar roared and advanced, causing Griff to stumble backwards, his headtails twitching in fear. "Come on!" he pleaded, his eyes flicking between us all. Even Carth was scowling at him, an obvious look of disapproval on his face. "Mission, you didn't need me to look after you anymore! You may have been young, but you knew how to take care of yourself! Look at you now! Everything turned out fine!"

Fury crested within me. He's always taken the easy way out. Always. I should have realized this and accepted it a long time ago. "That's it?" I challenged. "That's all you have to say to me after all these years of leaving me on Taris? If it weren't for Big Z and Jen, I'd be dead several times by now!"

"Look, I'm sorry! Could- could we just get back to Anchorhead? Uh, this isn't the best place for this sorta discussion." Griff back-pedalled, anxiously looking between as all.

Jen straightened, her expression alert as she scanned the surroundings. I caught her sudden movement and frowned, looking about myself. There was nothing but dunes and that destroyed 'crawler.

"I don't know, Griff," I said. I could feel my anger dissolving into something close to misery. "I'm not really sure I want you around right now."

"HK," Jen muttered. "Scan the area. I think-" her words were cut off by the sound of an electronic explosion. A sharp light pierced my vision, and I felt the burn of static warp through my tech goggles. I screamed, and pulled sharply at them.

"Targetting: Opening fiii..." HK's metallic voice was cut off by another powerful blast at his feet, blue-white and sizzling with electricity. Freaking ion grenades! There was a fizzing noise from his circuits, followed by a couple of poof sounds I recognized as smoke bombs.

"Damn, his shields!" Jen's voice yelled through chaos. I heard the snap-hiss of her lightsaber activate.

Griff shrieked, and I spotted him fleeing through the dissipating smoke. Zaalbar grabbed my arm, yanking me behind him as he raised his vibroblade at an unseen enemy. A sharp, stinging object pierced the back of one lekku, and I screamed, more in fright than anything else. Zaalbar growled, and slapped a hairy paw against his neck. My hand pulled back, and I was confused to see a small dart in my grasp. Huh? I blinked in confusion as my limbs became weary, leaden with weight. Poison? Or a fast acting sedative? Something burned through my muscles as they turned to mush.

"No!" Jen shouted. She's been hit too? My eyes were heavy with fatigue as I saw Carth firing wildly into the empty surroundings. Jen dropped to her knees, but her hand lifted up. I wondered if she was trying to use the Force.

Zaalbar roared, and fell down with a crash next to me. Must stay awake. I was down on my knees without realizing it. A figure emerged from absolutely nothing, standing in front of Jen. A stealth belt? I've never seen one so good! No way! I saw it stumble backwards as Jen's hand raised again.

"Ugh," I said, feebly falling to my side. Even my thoughts were sluggish, too slow to feel the panic I should. Dizziness pounded in my head. Jen fell, shrieking and twisting spasmodically as she landed on her arm.

The figure, the man, smirked in victory over Jen's prone form. Who is that? My lids closed despite my struggle to stop them.

"And people think Jedi are hard to capture," a deep voice drawled amidst the roar of impending unconsciousness. "All you have to do is catch them by surprise, and be armed with a neural disruptor. Malak will be most pleased."

Malak? As in, Darth Malak? My mind was screaming at me, and I struggled desperately to fight the paralysis. A giant metaphorical hole gaped underneath my consciousness, and despite my efforts, I could not stop from falling.

"Sweet dreams," a voice in the distance mocked, and I could no longer tell if it was speaking to me or Jen.

xXx
Hyperspace: III [Bastila Shan, Calo Nord, Canderous Ordo, Mission Vao, Eridius Talav, Zaalbar]

Hyperspace: III – part one

Bastila Shan:

The late afternoon sun beat down on my head with a vengeance as I walked between the others, an impenetrable silence cloaking us all. The rontos had gone once we cleared the cave. Either the explosion had scared them off, or that degenerate bounty hunter had claimed them. I struggled to show nothing but an outer mask of calm confidence, but inwardly my emotions seethed with frightening intensity.

We had almost reached Anchorhead; as we crested the next dune I saw the large durasteel Czerka gates rise up in my vision. A group of local hunters stood chatting outside them, no doubt passing along wild stories of even wilder hunts whilst they leaned nonchalantly on their respective speeders.

As our steps brought us closer to the settlement, I reached out once more through the cursed bond that linked me to Revan. Again, I met the barricade she had clouded over her thoughts and emotions. How had she learnt that so quickly? Revan had all but ignored my warning of Calo, and I feared what could happen out there in the inhospitable desert.

I glanced over at Canderous striding alongside me; after our escape from that bounty hunter's trap the Mandalorian had been both smug and determined, espousing a violent desire to track down Calo Nord. I only wished that Canderous would leave our party for good, but after today's revelations I no longer believed he would disappear of his own volition.

In fact, after today's revelations I was no longer certain that Revan would remain ignorant of whom she truly was.

At least the Force has given me a small reprieve. I had managed to sway the Mandalorian under my power, but I had my own reservations about whether that would last. If not for his head injury, I am not entirely sure that it would have worked. And then-

And then he may have carried out his threat of attack. He might still, should he ever realize I once more used the Force upon him.

Worries for another day. One step at a time. Yet everything around me seemed to be crumbling like a kassi cracker, bit by bit falling to the floor to break into yet more fragments. We were now heading to Manaan, not the refuge I had hoped to find on Coruscant. Revan grew more violent and careless with each passing hour. Canderous and Juhani appeared to hold loyalty to the former Sith Lord; whilst I could understand the bloodthirsty Mandalorian's regard, Juhani was another matter. I had not missed the wondrous, almost awed, expression in the Cathar's eyes when she had learned of Jen Sahara's true identity. Juhani had quietly agreed to say nothing of it, but her exotic face gave away her desire to follow Revan. I feared for her; she had so recently embraced the Dark Side, and surely an attachment to Revan could only lead her back to that grim, desolate place.

How does Revan do it? I thought sourly as the gates of Anchorhead loomed closer. Everyone in our party follows her lead. Carth, perhaps, was the only one who had sworn to help me in my mission, but even he had mixed feelings over Revan. Why else would he have left with them this morning?

My anger at Revan had been simmering all day long, ever since I had woken to find that she had gone out for yet another ill-advised, treacherous escapade. My fear, too, had expanded with each additional spark of cruelty that had slipped through Revan's emotional walls into the bond. Now that she was blocking me successfully, and showing an ability to pick up on my thoughts, my fear was in danger of blossoming out of control.

I sighed quietly, breath shuddering in my lungs. I ached for a future time when I could seek out the peaceful sanctuary of a Jedi enclave; when I could enjoy an existence that did not include Revan. I still had the power to easily cut Revan off from the Force, but I dared not use it. She shattered my shields when she was fighting Juhani. I need to save this power of mine for when I really need it. No matter how much she infuriated or terrified me in the interim.

Mission! No! Revan's anguished thought stabbed sharply into my mind, jolting me to a standstill. Canderous and Juhani turned and frowned at me in inquiry.

Jen? Are you alright? Is Calo there? I desperately thrust my thoughts through the bond, but received no immediate response.

“Bastila?” Juhani asked quietly. “What is it?”

Jen? “Jen. In trouble,” I said shortly, aware that my teeth were clenching as Revan continued to ignore my frantic queries. I opened my mind and tried to reach Revan's, pushing against my instincts which wanted nothing more than to build a thousand Force walls between us. My instincts which screamed with every further mental contact I had with that woman.

Those Gamorrean bastards! I can't use the Force, dammit, I can't risk Mission.

Gamorreans? Additional confusion swamped me; I could not visualize Calo Nord using Gamorreans as lackeys. Especially since he had appeared to be working alone when he confronted us earlier. What is going on, Jen?

Stop interfering! She all but snarled at me, and shoved me out of her mind so fast that I physically reeled.

Curse her. Curse that- that- I breathed in deeply, and forced the words of the Jedi Code to the forefront of my mind.

“Is she okay? Where is she?” Juhani asked again, and I turned to see a look of sharp concern on the Cathar's face. Canderous was looking intently at me also. How does that psychotic woman command such loyalty? How is it possible?

“I do not know where she is, Juhani. I told you, the bond does not work that way,” I snapped, my tone more curt than it should have been.

Her intense yellow eyes stared into mine, puzzled and maybe a little annoyed. I noticed then that the local hunters were staring at us avidly, curious at our conversation. I shot them an unimpressed glare, and they turned away to feign interest in their beaten-up speeders.

“Perhaps your bond does not, but the Force itself does,” Juhani responded in a soft voice. “If Jen is close enough, surely we should sense her presence through the Force.”

I gaped at the Cathar as she closed her eyes. Of course! Has my very proximity to Revan blindsided me to the very basic uses of the Force? Has it addled my wits? That Juhani could come to this conclusion rather than I shamed me somewhat. I closed my eyes hurriedly, and reached out to the tantalizing, living power that surrounded every being.

“I can sense her,” Juhani's husky voice lilted past my ears. “She is not far. In the direction of that sandcrawler.”

I, too, felt Revan's life force, pulsating and thrumming with the Force, spiking with rage. It was not as clear as detecting Revan's emotions through our mind-link, but that had become more and more difficult for me to achieve as she successfully blocked me out.

I opened my eyes to see Juhani pointing towards a metallic object in the distance that winked at us with the late afternoon sun. It was less than an hour's walk away, if I judged correctly. A movement from the corner of my eye made me aware of Canderous, striding purposefully towards the nearest hunter.

“Canderous?” I called sharply. Oh no. What is he doing?

“You,” Canderous stated in his deep gravelly voice, as he stopped in front of a local Duros who had been bantering with his fellow hunters. “I want your speeder.”

“What?” The Duros replied in surprise. “Are you kidding?”

“Let me rephrase that,” Canderous retorted, swinging up his large repeating blaster to point at the hunter threateningly. The Duros paled, and stepped away from his vehicle hurriedly.

“I must help her. I dislike him, but she spared my life,” Juhani muttered incoherently, and ran towards Canderous as he jumped onto the battered speeder.

“Hey!” one of the other hunters called out in sharp surprise. “Stop, you thieving bastard!”

“Wait a minute!” I cried, running after them as Canderous turned the ignition. I felt Juhani embrace the Force; its power lending strength to her almighty leap aimed at the speeder. She landed behind Canderous with a thud, twisting her arms around him as he roared the engine into life.

“Wait for me!” a desperate shriek rose from the depths of my lungs.

One of the locals shouted in surprised anger, and I saw blaster fire ricochet off the speeder as it tore away, Canderous and Juhani disappearing quickly from my sight.

“Get back here!” I yelled furiously, hopelessly, as they vanished over the dunes. How could they just run off without me? I can help!

All of a sudden I was aware of the heated looks thrown my way by the hunters, who were now short two enemies to pick on.

With sinking dread creating a pit in my anger, I turned around slowly to face them.

xXx

Calo Nord:

She lay before me, dead to the world as I knelt in the cooling sand. And this is what has come of the once all-powerful Darth Revan. I could feel a victorious smirk on my face. Not many could say they have successfully neutralized an ex-Sith Lord.
Certainly, it hadn't been easy. Of course I'd known of Bastila's quest from Darth Malak himself, and had ensured that cave was fully lined with explosives. Malak had preferred the Star Map obliterated, and it was a perfect ambush. What I hadn't expected was for their little group to split up.

It was more satisfying this way, I thought smugly to myself as I pulled out the neural disrupter Darth Malak had given me. Bastila and Canderous either died in the explosion, or are busy suffocating. In the case of my former colleague, I hoped for the latter. I knew how much his pathetic value enabled an honourable death, and I had no wish to give him one.

I snapped the collar around Revan's neck, and thought idly that she appeared much younger than she had as the Dark Lord. She's over thirty standard years. And yet unconscious, she could be an innocent young woman. I snorted. There was nothing innocent about Darth Revan.

Back to business. I stood up quickly, and surveyed her comatose companions. The sedative I'd used, Foraxyn-4, was fast-acting, but it did not linger in the system for long. The biggest threat appeared to be the Wookiee, and I strolled over to his body.

"Since I can't have you following me," I murmured, pulling out my Men'iki stealth pistol and aiming directly at his unmoving head.

A sharp burning pain stabbed into my arm, and I dropped my weapon in surprise. A loud challenging cry followed by a series of primitive honks slammed into my eardrums as I instinctively dived to the ground, rolling quickly as I drew another blaster.

Cursed Sand People! Just what I didn't need.

Four gaffi-wielding scum were charging right at me; presumably the blaster equipped ones were further behind. I held my weapon steady as I fired from the ground, while my other hand pulled out a thermal detonator from my belt.

I primed the grenade and lobbed it towards the oncoming mob. By the time it detonated, I was already on my feet, spraying blaster fire and sprinting for the nearest cover; one of the many twisted heaps of rubble that littered the desert around the unfortunate sandcrawler.

How did they get here? Were they following me, or Revan? No matter now; being the only outsider awake meant I was their immediate target.

The brief respite behind the twisted metal heap gave me time to pull out a second blaster. The natives were shouting angrily; I cocked my head and heard two survivors approaching.

Plus four behind with blasters. Time to party.

xXx

Canderous Ordo:

The wind stung my eyes as the speeder shot over the sun bleached dunes; I opened the throttle and willed the machine to go faster. The Cathar had surprised me by lurching onto the speeder and grabbing my waist fiercely; I had not expected her to willingly travel with me after the cool reception I'd been receiving all day. No matter. As long as she can fight, she's welcome. I had no idea of Juhani's skills; she came from a proud warrior race, yet she appeared to be one of Bastila's lackeys. Though she did arrive with Jen, gratuitously smeared in blood. No, not Jen. Revan.

"I don't see them!" I turned my head and yelled hoarsely back at her; the sandcrawler ahead appeared both damaged and entirely abandoned.

"Drive around it!" Juhani screamed directly into my ear, and in retaliation I swerved the speeder sharply to the left, causing the Cathar to squawk and grip me even tighter. The sandcrawler was a monstrous machine, looming about ten metres high and at least fifty long. The bodywork had broken off the oversized machine in several places, and as I sped along the length of it, I had to dodge and swerve of numerous piles of metallic rubble. There was a worthy battle here not too long ago.

We neared the end of the sandcrawler and turned to follow around it. I squinted into the environs, but saw nothing of interest until we passed the final bend. Then-

Sand People! Firing blasters at a closer figure lurking behind a twisted metal wall that had once belonged to the sandcrawler. I'd recognize that blue and white exoskeleton anywhere. Calo had his back to us as he concentrated on the threat of the natives; I didn't have long to make my move. I briefly noticed the bodies of Revan and the others, flung further away to the east.

Well, it ain't a basilisk, but it'll do the job. "Get ready to jump!" I yelled back at Juhani, and aimed the speeder directly at Calo's back. I dived off the hurtling speeder at the last minute, just in time to see Calo whirl around and jump aside in shock. The speeder crashed and exploded brightly into the broken metallic wall that Calo had been using as cover, but not before the bounty hunter had managed to leap from its path.

I cursed as I skidded backwards along the sand, yanking my repeating blaster up to my chest and firing rapidly in Calo's general direction. Bits of destroyed speeder flew through the stagnant air, smoke billowing from the wreck. Answering fire spat at me from several directions; I had attracted the attention of the natives.

"Take care of the Sand People!" I yelled at Juhani, who was further behind me, scrabbling to stand. "They're firing at us now!"

The Cathar ran off towards the Sand People as I leapt behind a mound of broken bodywork laying near the sandcrawler. I noted with grim approval that Juhani did not yet activate her glowing lightsaber – a sure homing beacon for anyone with a blaster on the other side of the smoke cloud.

I should get to the crawler. It's the best cover around here. Gaping black holes had been smashed into the side of the monstrous machine, by the looks of it somebody had fired multiple rockets at the Czerka vehicle.

"Mandalorian bastard!" Calo yelled from somewhere behind the burning wreck of the speeder. "You're old and stupid, Ordo, if you think a stunt like that would work on me!"

I leant around the bodywork briefly to fire another barrage of blasts through the explosion. I couldn't see Calo, and the smoky fire was blinding us both. I could hear shouts and challenging cries from the Sand People, entirely occupied now with the Cathar. There's a group of them, at least five. She probably won't last long.

I retreated back behind cover, alert for any noise. The jagged pile of bodywork wasn't quite large enough to hide me adequately, and I eyed up the nearby sandcrawler. "I wasn't the di’kut who lined a cave with mines and expected it to take out two Jedi and a Mando’ade," I growled back at him. "I would have given you an honourable death before, Nord, but not now."

"You weak idiots and your archaic honour code," Calo sneered. I cocked my head and tried to pinpoint his exact location, yanking out a frag grenade and priming it. "Your time is gone! There is no honour in battle!"

I leapt free from the rubble, running and hurling the grenade in the direction of Calo's voice. Just in time to see one hurled right back at my previous position as Calo, too, jumped sideways into view. Damn bastard thinks like me. I landed in a crouch, immediately buffeted by shock waves of Calo's fragmentation grenade, instinctively firing my heavy blaster that was slung conveniently around my shoulder. Calo, standing some distance away, yelped in surprise as the shots hit home.

It's gonna take more than that to drop him, I knew as I turned to sprint towards the sandcrawler, firing blindly over a shoulder as I ran. He's always been fond of energy shields.

The nearest entry into the sandcrawler was a jagged hole in the steel wall, caused by some sort of heavy weaponry. I leapt into the dark interior as I felt Calo return fire, shots landing on either side of me and one thudding into the small of my back. Garish as it is, Davik's armour does hold up well, I thought grimly as I lurched sideways inside. I could make out vague shapes from what little daylight permeated the interior; large box-like shadows suggested I had ventured into a storage area of the machine.

"Mandalorian coward!" Calo yelled from outside; as I leaned against the outer wall I saw his blasts fire into the make-do doorway. I'm gonna make you eat your words, honourless scum. In the relative safety of the crawler, I pushed a smaller crate near the opening and crouched behind it, staring directly out at the afternoon desert. The destroyed speeder was now nothing more than a faintly smoking wreck, and certainly wouldn't provide Calo with any more cover. He won't be able to see me in here. He's dead, he just doesn't know it yet. I couldn't spot him, but I was content to wait until he made a move. From here I calculated three particular places Calo could be hiding, still using broken parts of sandcrawler wreckage as cover.

I could spot Juhani in the distance, running towards two firing Sand People. She's still alive? I guess that Jedi is tougher than I gave her credit for.

I hit the trigger as soon as Calo made his move, firing at him as he jumped into view, hurling a grenade directly at me. Instinctively I leapt back inside fully, dragging the crate I had been using in front of me to take whatever impact was coming. Damn Calo and his grenades. No explosion was forthcoming; I waited tensely but nothing happened. Other than my lungs tightening and a dizziness washing through me.

Haar'chak! Poison grenade! The meagre light inside the crawler was turning smoky, hazy. I had to get back out, but Calo would be waiting. If I stay inside, I'm gonna be out cold. My head pounded, and I felt the beginnings of weakness enter my limbs.

With a snarl, I heaved the crate I'd been using back outside, diving recklessly after it into the sand. Blaster fire spat at me, most of it deflecting off the crate. I lay panting in the cooling desert, yanking my gun back up in preparation. I have to think of something. This is gonna last forever.

"I'm not going to spend all day on worthless scum like you!" Calo yelled. He's trying to bait me again. Nothing for it, I had to make a lunge. I sprang out from cover, my finger numb on the trigger as I opened fire once more. Calo had found refuge again, and I spotted another grenade thrown from behind the speeder I'd decorated the desert with.

"You always were fonder of grenades than women," I grated as I rolled back behind my ad-hoc shield.

"This one's for me, not you," Calo retorted. What's he up to? I heard the recognizable 'poof' noise of a smoke grenade, and jumped out in the open again. A thick, billowing white cloud rose ahead of me, and I fired blindly through it. Useful cover, but it's only temporary. Indeed, the smog was already drifting upwards in the almost non-existent breeze. Why did he need it?

"Seems to me I've got the prize, Ordo," Calo's thick voice drawled, and I began to make out a figure through the dissipating smoke cloud. I narrowed my eyes and trained my weapon, but something odd about the outline of Calo's figure made me hold fire. "Unless you don't mind killing the very one you're trying to save."

My spine stiffened as more remnants of fog floated away; Calo held the comatose Jen up with one hand, aiming a small blaster directly at me. No, not Jen. Revan. Calo was a short man, and Revan's limp body was adequate protection; unless I used a sniper rifle I couldn't be assured of hitting only Calo. And he uses shields. I'd need a disruptor rifle, and that ain't something conveniently lying around here.

"I came here to kill you," I said flatly. "And that's a promise."

Calo laughed, and fired at my feet. "Then why aren't you shooting?" he mocked. My eyes flicked on a lone figure some distance behind Calo, a red lightsaber glinting. I took a cautious step back towards the cover I had used.

"This is between you and me, Nord. Are you too weak to fight me head-on, so pathetic you need to resort to sentient shields?" I challenged. Calo laughed again and took a step backward, dragging Revan along. He fired a barrage of shots, and that decided me; I dived back behind the crate.

"I do whatever it takes to get the job done, Ordo! Something you never understood with your useless pride and narrow code. You can hardly call me weak – you're the one too pansy to shoot a woman," he sneered, and gave another low chuckle. I stayed silent, waiting to see what Juhani would do. "I never thought I'd see the day a Mandalorian steps down from a fight because of a hostage. You're a disgrace to your people, Ordo."

A cold, fierce anger burned low in my gut; only the Cathar's potential surprise attack kept me from charging straight out at Calo in a fury. He's trying to get another clear shot at me, trying to lure me out. Bastard.

I heard Calo grunt in surprise and open fire; I leaned around to see Juhani running towards the sandcrawler. "The Force doesn't work on me, does it, kitty-cat?" Calo mocked triumphantly, still firing after her. I now had a clear shot as Calo had turned to face Juhani; I fired quickly with a more precise mini-blaster I'd readied. Calo screamed as the bolts slammed into his back, but even as he fell he twisted Revan's body around to face me, returning fire and forcing me to resume my cover. His energy shield has worn off. About time.

"Try that again and she dies!"

I shot a quick glance around the side of my cover, and noticed Calo standing upright once more. Damn. I was hoping I'd hurt him more than that. He started to move slowly backwards, away from the scene as he held Revan's body firmly in front of him with one hand. He's using her as his ticket to get out of here. Like I'll let that happen. Calo fired at me, and I ducked back behind the crate.

"You can't kill her," I sneered. "You do, and then you're dead. She's the only reason I'm not gutting you right now, the only reason you don't have the Cathar's lightsaber through your brain."

"True, I don't want to kill her. But it doesn't matter how many pieces she is in."

I heard a blaster shot, and surprise slammed into me as I looked back out at Calo. Sure enough, he had just fired point-blank into Revan's left leg. Good thing she's out cold.

"You monster! That was unnecessary!" the Cathar's growl came from nearby; obviously she had been making her way towards me.

Calo laughed mockingly; his voice was fainter than before. The bastard is getting away. I can't let him take Revan. "It was completely necessary, kittycat," Calo drawled. "The more injured she is, the less trouble she'll be."

I heard a very feline hiss, and suddenly Juhani all but dived into my lap. I stared down at her in surprise as she rolled away. "And here I thought you disliked me," I commented, and sharp yellow eyes glared disgust at me. I looked Juhani over briefly; she appeared to have no injuries. Impressive, against six Sand People. She's not a total wet blanket after all.

"Kittycat!" she hissed again, and I made a mental note not to call her that. Unless I particularly want a fight. Her eyes flashed sparks of battle rage... and something else. "No. I will control this rage. It is not the way," she muttered.

"We need a plan," I said abruptly. "I won't let Calo just walk away. Not with- not with Jen."

Something stopped me saying Revan's name out loud; I pushed that odd thought away to think about later. Curious.

"I cannot use the Force on him! I do not understand why."

"Force resistant armour," I bit out. "Calo's exoskeleton, head-to-toe, has been interleaved with something that repels Force powers. He's never divulged details, but I know he paid a king's ransom for it, and it's saved his sorry arse on more than one occasion."

Juhani stared at me steadily, her lips pursed. "So the Force will not work on him. It will, however, work on Jen. Canderous, cover me." With an almost rabid snarl, Juhani lunged back out in the open.

"Mand'alor's balls!" I muttered savagely, and followed her. How am I supposed to cover her? I can't fire on Revan! Juhani had curled into a crouching position, her hands cupped and pointing towards Calo and his hostage. I ran in front of the Cathar as Calo opened fire, placing more faith in Davik's ugly armour than I would have liked. The first shot in the chest slammed me back a pace, and knocked the wind from my lungs. That's gonna bruise something bad.

Calo gave an abrupt yelp of startlement as Revan's limp body was suddenly yanked from his grip, to fall flat a few metres in front of him. So that's Juhani's plan, I thought grimly as I quickly reigned fire down on the surprised Calo, running towards him as my repeating blaster unleashed itself.

Calo fell backwards screaming as my shots tore into his chest armour. The pain must have been intense, but even intense pain didn't prevent him from pulling a second blaster and unleashing a volley of his own. How he keeps so much weaponry on his person is beyond even me.

I rolled to the side; evading his barrage of energy bolts temporarily. I've got to get to him before he grabs Revan again. Even as I began another sprint, opening fire wildly, I knew I was too far away. Calo, twisting to his feet, was already scrabbling back towards Revan.

A whirling, snarling blur shot past me at high speed, lurching into the air. Juhani, moving quicker than I would have thought possible, landed directly before Calo. He aimed both pistols in her direction, but fast as he was, Calo never pulled the trigger.
Her lightsaber cleaved cleanly through his head and into his chest.

I stopped my redundant sprint, and stood still, panting. The surroundings could now almost pass for the Tarisian Lower City, cluttered with multiple bodies and smoking wreckage. My eyes caught on a few Gamorrean corpses, and I frowned, before shrugging the curious sight off.

I noticed then that the light was fading quickly; the last sun a winking jewel on the horizon. Revan lay face-down a few metres away. Juhani was walking back towards me from Calo's bloody corpse. I felt a growing respect for the Cathar; she had surprised me with her warrior skills. We made a good team. I nodded at her in comradeship, and she stared back at me solemnly.

"What do you think knocked them out?" Juhani asked softly as we both knelt down by Revan. Blood trickled through the cracks of the armour sheathing her leg, and threadbare patches on her left arm revealing swollen bruised skin hinted at further damage.

"Some sort of sedative. Won't be life-threatening; Calo wanted her alive," I stated. "I'm gonna check out Calo's corpse."

A few minutes later, I had my answer. "Foraxyn-4," I told Juhani. "Expensive stuff, but Calo always had credits backing him. One of the quickest acting sedatives in the Core Worlds; the fact that it's not deadly means the demand isn't that high for it. It wears off in an hour or two, but adrenastims nicely speed up the recovery."

Now the fight was over, I was feeling rather angry at myself. I'd thrown my last grenade at Calo, and my meagre arsenal of weapons had left me at a disadvantage. Before we get off this rock, I'm gonna suit up.

Happily, stims I had in plentiful supply.

xXx

Mission Vao:

"(No. I absolutely forbid it!)" Zaerdra stormed at me, waggling an admonishing finger. I scowled, but for some reason my heart wasn't in it. I felt positively sad at seeing her again. The fact that she was wearing that dull brown robe Bastila had picked up from some merchant to look like a snooty Jedi was also puzzling.

"I do what I want!" I retorted.

Zaerdra's face flushed with anger, and she opened her mouth to yell once more. "Wakey wakey kid," she said in Basic, and in Canderous' deep, gravelly voice.

I blinked, and Gadon's hall dissolved around me.

"Hang on, this ain't real."

I sucked in a shuddering breath, realizing that I was lying prone on the warm ground. Hesitantly, I prised open my eyelids to see the fuzzy form of Canderous retreat from me, against the backdrop of a starry night's sky. The dunes… we were out in the dunes. My vision slowly sharpened on the silvery globe of a heavy moon on the horizon. It was early evening, the last whispers of sunset still being chased away.
And to the side was a dark shadow. The sandcrawler we had stopped by earlier.

"Ugh, what happened?" I moaned, struggling to sit up. Someone attacked us! My hand flew to my lekku where a dart had pierced earlier. There was a grunt of pain to my side, and I glanced over to see that crazy Cathar leaning over Jen, who appeared to be waking. Wait, Juhani and Canderous? What's going on? Canderous was crouched down on the sand, something sharp and shiny in his grasp as he reached towards Zaalbar.

"Stop!" I cried in pure reaction. "What are you doing?"

Canderous shot me an unimpressed look, his expression so annoyingly typical of him that I found my alarm dying away. "Waking him up."

"Sithspit," Jen muttered. "Tell me I've got a hangover, and that Calo Nord didn't just succeed in putting a neural disruptor around my neck."

Juhani murmured something from Jen's side. Wait, what? Calo freaking Nord? There was a shiny metal collar in Juhani's hand, and then I remembered how the Vulkars had kept the Jedi snot contained. And Jen can use the Force, too. Oh, sheesh! Suddenly, I understood the big pile of bantha poodoo that we had all almost fallen into. Calo Nord! He kills anyone in his way! How are we all still here? Are we all still here?

"What- what's been going on?" I demanded, desperate now for clear answers.

Jen turned to look at me. Pain was etched in the lines on her face, but worse was the dark look in her gaze. "Calo Nord ambushed us. Juhani and Canderous to the rescue."

"Is he, is he dead?"

"Yes." Jen's voice was black, black as how her eyes looked in the evening light. Her gaze shuttered as I struggled to come to terms with the latest bombshell. Calo Nord, dead. It was as strange as Davik Kang, or Bendak Starkiller, or Zax the Hutt being killed in the Sith bombardment. All of them had seemed undefeatable for so many years.

Juhani was staring at me with her weird golden eyes. She made me uneasy. Jen seemed to trust her, and by the sounds of it she had just saved our lives – but then, I wasn't exactly gonna forget the way she tried to murder us all the other day. With the Force. The freaky Force. Which Jen can now use. It felt like everything had changed, or shifted suddenly under my feet.

There was a loud roar. Big Z! Zaalbar, jerking to his feet with Wookiee-ish speed, and scattering plumes of sand in all directions. Canderous was pretty quick to back away, for all his gruff bluster about not being scared of anything.

"Big Z!" I called, and my best friend whirled around, bounding to my side in an instant.

"(Mission!)" he howled, giant paws grasping around my shoulders as he gently lifted me to my feet. "(Are you alright?)"

"Lemme go," I mumbled, disentangling myself. Big Z meant well, but after a day of hot sun and sand, he wasn't exactly the freshest smelling thing around. "I'm fine."

"Your arm is badly fractured," Juhani said in her soft lilting voice. She was speaking to Jen, and I remembered, then, about Jen's injury from earlier. My only problem was a minor stinging on my legs from the grenades of those piggy Gamorreans, and the stinky gree-bacta salve back in the 'Hawk would soon fix that. "The bone is well out of alignment," Juhani continued, "and there is a lot of swelling around the site. This occurred some hours ago, I suspect."

Jen didn't answer. In fact, she wasn't even looking at Juhani. Her face was closed, as she stared away from us all, and I was reminded of just how distant and angry she had been lately.

There was a faint sigh from Juhani. "The muscle on your leg is damaged from the blaster hit. The armour afforded some protection, but I do not think you will be able to walk on that. You need a doctor. Or- or Bastila."

Jen jerked her head to stare at Juhani. "Bastila. Where is Bastila?"

It was hard to tell in the fading light, but somehow the strange Cathar looked sheepish as her gaze skittered away from Jen's. "Outside the Anchorhead gates. I do hope we did not land her in difficulty."

There was a snort from Canderous, crouching next to Carth's body in the sand. "I'm sure the princess is more than capable of charming those shabuirs."

Well, I didn't particularly care where Bastila was, but... Griff! "Where is he?" I shrieked, spinning around to stare in every direction. "Where's Griff?"

"Who?" Canderous snapped.

"My brother!" I gasped. But the gloom was deepening, and it was hard to make out what any of the shadows on the sand were, now. Any of them could be Griff, he could have fallen, be hurt somewhere... "A Twi'lek, just like me! He was with us!"

"Kid, there's dead Sand People, dead Gamorreans, and a dead Human around here," Canderous drawled. "A regular meat market. But I ain't seen no Twi'lek, dead or otherwise."

"He ran," Jen said, her voice flat and emotionless. I whipped around to stare at her. She was hunched over on herself, her good arm clutching a leg, and her eyes pinched closed in pain. "He slipped away when Calo ambushed us. He probably made it to safety."

He ran. The truth of it hit me like a punch to the gut. Despite the blaster Carth'd given him, despite his sister being in danger, despite everyone else sticking together... he still ran.

I could feel my lower lip trembling, and bit down on it hard. "Just like before," I whispered. "He ran, to save himself."

"(I am sorry,)" Zaalbar rumbled softly, placing a furry paw on my arm. I jerked away, suddenly angry. The conversation with Lena ran through my head again, and Griff's weak evasion when I brought it up. Even as a kid, Griff had always been a 'lil self-serving, with the way he looked out for himself first and his own creds-

But I was his sister!

"He's no fighter," Jen stated. She was looking at me again, a frown of concern pinching her forehead. "He's a coward, sure, but that doesn't mean he doesn't care for you, Mission."

There was a faint groan, and I was vaguely aware of Carth jerking up in a seated position, hand resting immediately on the blaster lying next to him.

Yeah, sure, I knew Griff loved me... but in the end, what was that worth? Freaking Canderous had put himself in danger to rescue me, not to mention Juhani, who wasn't much past being a rabid...
"Don't start a fight unless you mean to end it," Canderous snapped, and I saw Carth freeze in response. His hand didn't move away, though.

"Canderous? What happened?"

"I'm getting sick of that question," Canderous growled, as he stood. "We should get out of here before more Sand People arrive."

Griff is a jerk. I've known this for years, haven't I? Sheesh, ever since Gadon refused him entry to the Beks... I'd just never accepted it. Even the times he'd deserted me in the Undercity for a meet or a job, or the time he'd borrowed all my creds to pay off a mark- well, that happened a couple of times. Maybe Griff really did mean to pay me back, in the heat of the moment – but I'd always accepted he'd never get round to it.

"Sand People?" Carth's query rapped out, echoing over the dunes.

"A group of them attacked the bounty hunter as we arrived on the scene," Juhani answered.

Maybe, I was better off without him. I loved my brother, but having Big Z at my side put things in perspective. Travelling with Jen and Carth, and even Bastila and Canderous, changed things. I'd had the vague hope that Griff could join us, but somehow I knew that would never happen, now. Not even if I found him waiting in Anchorhead for me.

He was a liability. It hurt to think it, but it was true.

"Huh," Carth said, in a considering voice. "They were probably following us after the mess we made of their base."

"All the more reason to get back to civilization," Canderous grumbled. "I don't think the rest of you are up to any more action." He was standing next to Jen now, staring down at her. But Jen was still hunched over, seemingly ignoring us all. I worried, then, at just how beaten up she was. "You were lucky those Sand People came when they did. If they hadn't halted Calo, he'd be long gone by now. With you."

"There is no luck," a crisp, annoyed voice floated through the semi-darkness. "There is only the Force."

"Oh great," I complained under my breath. Just about the last person I wanted to see, after my spineless brother.

"So nice of you to join us, princess."

Bastila walked towards us, quick strides over the shifting sand. Even in the dark, I could see the look on her face. It wasn't just cold- it was like she'd spent the last hour traipsing around Hoth. "How considerate of you to leave me there, Canderous."

The Mandalorian shrugged. "I figured you could get your own speeder if you wanted to."

"You figured wrong," she lashed back. "I walked here. It took all my efforts to stop the hunters from attacking me."

"Guys. Enough," Carth's weary voice cut over the two of them, but there was enough steel in it to have them both temporarily subside. "We need to focus on getting back to the ship."
Juhani cleared her throat awkwardly. "I do not think Jen will be able to walk."

There was a deep frown on Bastila's face, and she walked towards Jen – but even in the moonlight I could spot the mistrust tightening Jen's face. Sheesh, I didn't like or trust Bastila either, but she could help with Jen's leg.

I sighed, my thoughts turning away from them as I stared blindly up at the stars. They looked different on the planet. Clearer. I hadn't seen the night-sky often on Taris, but there were more stars here. Griff, how could you? Twice he had left me to die. I guess that proves he cares more about his own skin that looking out for his sister. Why did it hurt so much?

Zaalbar had come to sit next to me; offering no words but a steady, silent comfort. I leaned against him wearily and wondered if I would ever see my brother again. If I ever wanted to.

"Your leg should be alright to walk on now," Bastila's voice was tired as she spoke to Jen. "I shall be able to augment the healing later. I suggest you take some pain medication when we return to the freighter. I can look at resetting your arm then, too, but I shall need Juhani's help."

"Of course," Juhani murmured.

Jen stood with a groan she couldn't hold back, hobbled slightly, and then steadied herself. She nodded briefly at Bastila, before walking towards Calo's corpse, stopping to kick it hard right between the legs. Of course, being armoured, all it did was cause her to spew forth a litany of what sounded suspiciously like curse words in Huttese. Jen could've been a translator, with the languages she knew. Of course, that didn't pay too well, considering protocol droids could totally outperform sents any day of the week.

"Was that entirely necessary?" Carth snapped, and Jen turned, a faint smirk lifting the dark look that had been dogging her expression.

"Yes. Very." She went to fold her arms, and then moaned in discomfort at the movement.

"Wait a minute," Carth ordered, and walked over to kneel down by Calo's body. There was a moment of silence as Carth undid the side-clasps of Calo's armour, before rolling the limp corpse over to remove panels of the exoskeleton. When he began to rip away the shirt from beneath Calo's armour, I felt my curiosity pique.

"I'm not sure if I want to watch this," Jen quipped, her voice dry. Canderous had wandered over, nonchalantly picking up the blue and white sections of Calo's armour. I wasn't sure if Carth didn't notice, or was simply uninterested in the armour. " Didn't know your tastes ran that way, flyboy."

"Ha ha," Carth muttered. He held part of a loose tunic in his hands, which he deftly ripped into a smaller size. "Here. Hold still."

Jen actually held her tongue while Carth tied a makeshift sling around her neck. He did it quickly enough that I wondered if it was something he'd done before.

"Thanks," she muttered.

"Don't mention it."

"We should leave," Bastila interrupted. "It is a short walk to Anchorhead, and everyone is awake and restored now."

"HK," Jen stated. Her voice had turned low and dark again. "We need to fix HK first."
There was a whistle of air from Bastila. "Can you not just carry it? Or perhaps ask Zaalbar?"

"(I can carry him for you, Jen Sahara,)" Zaalbar rumbled.

"We should find Calo's speeder," Canderous said. "He'll have left one around for a quick getaway."

"It is too dark to find the speeder, and we could not fit everybody on it. We should depart on foot," Bastila said, her voice brisk, motioning us all to start moving. There may have been sense in her words, but it was annoying the way she and Canderous had to disagree on everything. And Bastila always sounded so uptight.

I stuck my tongue out at her.

Canderous laughed. "Y'know, princess, you're almost cute when you try to be leader."

"Very funny," Bastila snapped.

Carth, finally, called an end to the bickering by sighing and starting the journey back. Zaalbar picked up the dead robot with a grunt, and then waited for me to begin walking. The sand shifted under my feet, and I felt the temperature begin to drop as night truly set in.

We trudged slowly through the desert. In front, Canderous fired off a few verbal shots at Bastila, but she had retreated into silence. There was a quiet murmur of conversation between Juhani and Jen, but otherwise all I could hear was the chirping of Tatooine insects. The gloom of night felt eerie and a bit creepy. I've never been out in the wilderness at night before, that's why. It's different to the Undercity. More… open. Part of me hoped that Griff was wandering aimlessly somewhere, desperately wishing he'd remained, desperately praying for my survival.

No. No, I don't want him lost. I don't… when it came to Griff Vao, I didn't know what I wanted.

"I'm sorry," Carth said awkwardly; I hadn't noticed him slow down to walk abreast of me and Zaalbar. I scowled and bowed my head.

"It doesn't matter," I muttered. "I always knew he was slime."

"I-I guess he was just scared," Carth's response sounded weak, even to my ears.

"Yeah. Scared enough to leave his sister to die. Twice in one day." My mouth felt dry, like I'd just downed a glass of sour-pop. "What does it matter? I've still got Big Z. And- and Jen, I guess."

"It still does matter. Betrayal," Carth's voice was quiet, but there was a harsh tone in it I hadn't noticed before. "Stays with you for a lifetime." He gave a bitter chuckle, and I turned to look at him curiously.

He sounds like he's been burnt. "What happened?" I asked, frowning.

There was an uncomfortable look on his face, and I could tell he wished he hadn't started this conversation. "My father died when I was very young," he said flatly. "There was a man who mentored me when I joined the Republic. He was everything my father was not; intelligent, strong, charismatic. He moulded me into the officer I am today. I grew to care for him more than I ever did my father," Carth trailed off, as if that was the end of his story.

"And?" I asked, interested to know more. Carth didn't usually open up like this, but maybe he was trying to make me feel better. He'd done that earlier, back on the 'Hawk. I got so mad at him afterwards for his mistrust of Jen, but he meant well. And maybe he did understand.
"He turned traitor and joined the Sith army. Spilled the secrets of the Republic, and commandeered attacks that killed millions of innocent people. All for his own ambition." Carth's tone turned dark, and I knew, somehow, that this was the end of the conversation. I glanced over my shoulder, and saw Jen trailing us. Her eyes had been intent on Carth's back, but flickered to mine at the movement. She grimaced.

We walked the rest of the way without conversation. The quiet of night seemed to reach out with a many-fingered hand and grip us all with an ominous silence. By the time we reached the looming gates of Anchorhead, I was more than ready to get back to the Ebon Hawk.

I just want to curl up, and pretend today never happened.

Our only interruption was on the empty dirt road of Anchorhead, when a lone stranger approached Jen and slipped something into her hand. Carth, followed by Bastila, immediately demanded to know what it was, but Jen just shrugged them off and walked away.

I grinned slightly as she strode off. She'll tell me. I'll bug her tomorrow about it... for now I just want some sleep.

xXx

Overseer Eridius Talay:

Shadows flickered like fleeing ghosts across the walls as one candle spluttered its dying breath. I always preferred working in this archaic light; it somehow increased the mystery and darkness that my job entailed. Not one of my minions could enter this room - my master study - without feeling at a loss as I faced them behind an imposing mahogany desk littered with burning candles.

I wrenched my concentration back to the latest report; from a current agent high in the ranks of the Republic Navy. Soon I was consumed, but a brief knock interrupted my reverie.

"Enter," I intoned in as deep a voice as manageable. First impressions of any encounter were always crucial; I had learned long ago what a powerful tool intimidation could be.

Spymaster Gaalin, one of our most intelligent agents, entered silently. His skills were not of the ordinary assassin employed within our organization; rather his sharp mind and ability to interpret patterns of behaviour and make sense of seemingly irrational politics made him an invaluable asset.

He inclined his head slightly, a measure of respect. "We've had a job offer I think you should look over, Eridius," he said softly, his grey eyes meeting mine steadily in the dim light.

I raised my eyebrows; most assassination requests went no further than the spymasters. I had not personally approved one in almost half a year. I motioned for him to continue.

"This comes directly from Darth Malak," he stated.

My brow shot up further. That the Sith knew of our existence did not surprise me; that they knew how to approach us was not startling. That their lord contacted us directly was... unsettling. From the depths of the shadows was where the GenoHaradan worked best; direct communication from a person as powerful and destructive as Darth Malak was not in our best interests. Particularly seeing as our web of information and agents was more firmly planted in the Republic; it was in the GenoHaradan's best interest to see them win the war, not the Sith.

"And what is his... request?" From what I knew of Darth Malak, he preferred commands to requests.

"He wants us to hit two targets. With an additional bonus if we capture either of them. Eridius, the price… perhaps you should look for yourself."

I took the proffered datapad. The first sum of credits was enough for me to do a double-take, as I checked it out again. Surely this is incorrect... how can the Sith have this sort of money? Their fleet had expanded immeasurably in the last year; although we had not successfully concluded how their army had grown so strong, I could only assume that their pool of material resources must be wearing thin by now.

The name of the hit was unfamiliar; another surprise. I would have presumed that someone commanding this sort of price would be well known. I scrolled over to the next contract. The same gross figure glared at me baldly, but this time I recognized the name.

I stayed silent for a few minutes, possibilities whirring through my mind. Our coffers have been running emptier than usual lately. War was generally good for the GenoHaradan, but not when we had a vested interest in seeing the weaker side win. We are too well set up with the Republic to walk away without a fight. But we fight from the shadows - so if the Sith do win, we can still prevail.

Eventually I sighed, and placed the datapad down. "We cannot take the contract up on Bastila Shan, Gaalin. As tempting as it is, it would put our organization in jeopardy."

He tilted his head. "Targeting a Jedi hero is too risky."

I nodded. "It’s more than that, Gaalin. We have managed to stay relatively unknown from the Jedi Order, though I doubt they are unaware of our existence. If we showed our hand like this..."

"They would be forced to act," Gaalin finished. "Not to mention the reaction of the Senate, should the Republic’s rising star fall to our hand."

"Yes," I concluded. We were grudgingly tolerated by the few high-ranking Republic officials who knew of our existence. It was not unheard-of from them to engage our services. But should we move against their hero - the young Jedi involved in Darth Revan's downfall, and whose Battle Meditation was one of their few remaining advantages - then our place in the shadows might be compromised. If anyone suspected our involvement, then I doubt they would remain silent. And secrecy was our greatest weapon.

"If we could succeed while casting blame on the Sith..." I mused softly. "But even then, the continued life and freedom of Jedi Shan is to the Republic's advantage, and hence ours. No, despite the remuneration involved, I am afraid we must refuse. Politely, of course."

"As to the other?" Gaalin inquired.

I frowned, picking up the datapad to peruse it once more. "Who is this Jen Sahara?"

"She is a current companion of Jedi Shan, one of the few survivors from the Sith attack upon the Endar Spire. There are many strange things about her, though; many inconsistencies..."

"Such as?" I prompted impatiently. Gaalin had an irritating tendency to trail off into deep thought; a trait I shared but did not tolerate in others.

"We have traced her as a scholar from Deralia, taken captive when Darth Revan invaded the planet. You know of the trap there that Revan narrowly avoided; and the ensuing counter strike lead by Jedi and Deralian troops. Jen Sahara was rescued during that offensive, but our reports suggest she was too badly wounded to recover."

"Yet she obviously did. Jedi healing techniques are unarguably the most effective in the galaxy."

"True," Gaalin conceded, but he did not look entirely convinced.

"You believe Jen Sahara died then? That this is an impostor?" I had learnt to not doubt Gaalin's hunches; they were more often accurate than not.

Gaalin shifted uneasily. "I am uncertain, Eridius. Our intelligence informs us that Jen Sahara was employed by the Jedi Council to help investigate archaic Force ruins." He sighed. "If only we had a Jedi spy."

I smiled briefly at his annoyance; Gaalin's pet peeve was his inability to infiltrate the ranks of the Jedi. "One would think the Jedi would not need any help with Force-sensitive ruins."

"Exactly," Gaalin agreed. "I have also heard disturbing reports – not from our more reliable sources, mind you – that this Jen Sahara can use the Force herself."

"Another Jedi," I said flatly. I wasn't surprised; I doubted Darth Malak would offer such a sum for someone who wasn't powerful.

"No," he contradicted me. "She does not appear at all in any of the Jedi annals; she is not registered as a Jedi under that name. She is attached to the Jedi due to her scholarly background, so perhaps our information is incorrect. Or perhaps she is one of those who came late to the Force, and it has only been discovered now."

I pondered for a moment. Force sensitivity usually materialized before puberty, but there were notable exceptions. Nomi Sunrider, a powerful Jedi Knight who fought in the Exar Kun conflict, immediately sprang to mind. I tapped a finger, looking back to Gaalin. "If she was onboard the Endar Spire... do you think this Jen Sahara could have been involved with the Sith attack?"

"Nothing to suggest it, although I have looked. The only connection I have made with the Sith attack so far is the defection of Jedi Knight Kylah Aramai to the Sith."

I nodded briskly and handed the datapad back to Gaalin. "Well, we need the credits. If this Jen Sahara is not a well-known asset to the Republic, then take her out. I’d be inclined to go for the quick kill, rather than the capture, but I shall leave that to you."

I waved Gaalin out, but he hesitated at the door. "Yes?" I snapped, eager to get back to my original work.

"There is one more thing... which may work in our favour. Jen Sahara has recently been approached by one of our agents. To work for us."

I blinked in surprise. "Oh? Why?"

"She has been watched since Taris, and her abilities have been... admirable. She has also evaded assassination by Calo Nord twice, and either her or her companions have finally ended the bounty hunter's life."

I paused briefly. "That is impressive. Though if she is a Force-user, it may not be all too surprising. What is her point of contact?"
"Foxtrot-17."

I grimaced. Keeping track of the GenoHaradan recruitment point agents was not something required of me, but if memory served correct then that directive listed Corellia, Manaan and Sleheyron. Standard procedure was to offer a potential candidate three locations within a twelve day period, and if they were interested and found the agent in the required timeframe, then negotiations for an employment contract would begin. And once we hired an assassin, it became their lifelong occupation. People did not leave the GenoHaradan alive.

But we weren't looking to employ this Jen Sahara.

If she made it to Sleheyron or Corellia, then taking her out was be easy. Manaan was trickier at the best of times - which this wasn't. Our last two contracts there had been uncovered by the extensive network of surveillance the Selkath had implemented, both in their cities and their nearby resource planets. Cursed pacifistic planet. Ahto City was becoming a popular hideout for targets who knew they were being hunted - whether by us or some other, more amateurish organization.

But the place was too hot right now. Selkath politicians were probing for answers from some of their more puzzling court cases. If this Jen Sahara came to Manaan, it would be better to somehow lure her off-world. Or arrange matters so it looked like the handiwork of some other organization. Or both, if the lead agent was clever enough.

"Refresh my memory, Gaalin," I ordered. "Who are our pickup agents there?"

"Ja'taya on Corellia. Hulas on Manaan. Terrian on Sleheyron."

I nodded slowly. They were all established recruiters. Hulas was cleverer than the other two, but he had to be, in Ahto City. "Contact them so they are aware. Be prepared to organize an ambush on any of the three locations. If she lands on Manaan, get her away from that planet first if at all possible. Or make it look like a heavy-handed ambush by the Exchange or similar. We can't afford another failure there, Gaalin. The last one was too costly, and the Selkath surveillance is too damn extensive."

I wasn't sure we'd be able to bribe our way out of another mess on Manaan. Those walking fish weren’t the easiest to corrupt.

"I will see to it."

I waved him away in dismissal, and Gaalin left me to my reading.

xXx

Zaalbar:

I escaped the Ebon Hawk quickly, trying not to look eager. The tension between the Bastila Shan and Jen Sahara was making me uneasy; their arguments last night were only overshadowed by the heated conflict this morning. They are like two cubs vying for status, both trying to be the alpha. Bastila Shan attempted to lead the crew, but was constantly undermined by Jen's cheek, mistrust, or flat-out refusal to follow her.

Earlier this morning, Bastila Shan tried to depart Tatooine, but Jen had other ideas. And I follow her, worrisome though that may be. She limped ahead of me now, talking to that Mandalorian warrior, the early morning sun glinting off her dark curls. Her cries last night as Bastila and the Cathar Juhani fixed her arm had set my teeth on edge.
I sighed; I did not understand Humans. They act like cubs, the both of them. Bastila had informed Jen, in a tone dripping with disapproval and ice, that she needed to rest. That her arm needed the reprieve, and that kolto and Force healing could only do so much. Jen had promptly turned her back and strode off the ship. They act like ill-disciplined cubs. Not a thought I would dare say out loud.

Mission skipped next to me as I followed both Jen and Canderous Ordo to the Ithorian's droid repair shop. Jen wished to fix that ill-humoured robot of hers; I was hoping to find something a little more sustaining to eat than the comestible dispenser onboard the Ebon Hawk.

The sand sank underneath my feet as I walked through the small settlement; a merchant nearby was busily saddling his pack of rontos ready for the day's customers. To the right a group of swoop bike mechanics were tinkering with their bikes. Mission looked their way longingly.

"Aww, Komad said there were only illegal races here. I woulda liked to have a go. I wonder if there's a track on Manaan."

"Of course there is, kid," Canderous Ordo drawled, throwing the remark carelessly over his shoulder.

"Stop calling me a kid, you old geezer!" Mission snapped. Canderous stopped and turned around. I tensed, wary as I looked at him.

"You'd think you guys had enough fighting yesterday," Jen said dryly as she turned around. "Play nice, okay?"

"Play?" Canderous cocked an eyebrow at her, folding his arms.

"Look, you hurt Mission and you'll have a ten ton Wookiee after you." She paused, and then added, "and me, too. You both have names. Try using them?"

"Geez, you're a fine one to talk, Jen. I've lost count of different names you have for Carth," Mission interjected. "Flyboy, Onasi, Republic, that one HK uses, Blaster Boy-"

"Blaster Boy?" Canderous guffawed. "I'll have to remember that one."

"(Shall we get going?) I suggested impatiently, a growl of hunger echoing loudly from my stomach.

Mission laughed, nudging me in the side. "You just want us to hurry up so you can get something to eat."

"(I only had a small breakfast, Mission,)" I said plaintively.

"Yeah, yeah, I know. If you don't get your eight square meals a day you get grumpy." Mission poked me harder, and I let out a small growl. A local walking next to us jumped at the sound and walked away hurriedly; I felt somewhat abashed. There were not many people here, it was true, but still more than I was wholly comfortable with. And that was despite all my years on Taris and it's overpopulated, decaying ecumenopolis. Tatooine was not a bad sort of planet, but it was barren. I missed the living, comforting presence of century-old trees, and the array of life that lived around them. I supposed I always would.

"What was that thing you got last night, Jen?" Mission piped up.

"Thing? What thing?" Jen slowed down, and Mission skipped to catch up to her.
"Y'know, that man who stopped you last night. What did he give you?"

"Oh! A datapad. It was broken, though, and it wasn't mine. Guess the guy was confused," Jen said smoothly, but her posture tensed while answering. She smells uneasy. But why would she lie? Perhaps I was just being suspicious.

"Oh." Mission's headtails drooped in disappointment. "I was hoping it'd be something interesting, like- I dunno, some adventure or something."

"Adventure? Haven't you already had enough of that?" Jen asked, raising an eyebrow.

"No, I mean a real adventure. Where you get to go visit strange places..." Mission looked around herself, in a foreign land, and bit her lip suddenly. "Well, one where no one dies, anyway."

Jen grinned, and grabbed Mission's hand impulsively as we stopped outside a smaller clay building. "Well, here's Yuka Laka's shop. Let's see what adventure we can find in here."

"Don't make fun of me!" Mission snapped.

"Mission?"

The hesitant voice had us all turning. And walking toward us, surrounded by the smell of his own uncertainty, was the Czerka-clad figure of Mission's hapless brother.

His smile at her was both tentative and shaky.

The hum of a lightsaber powering on was preceded by a swift, whirring sound; I blinked, and Jen was two metres in front of me, that sickly red weapon of the Sith resting dead centre at the shaking Twi'lek's neck.

"One word from your sister-" Jen growled, voice low and raspy. There were murmurs and exclamations nearby; people stopped to watch, to step back, to get away. "-and this will be your last breath, Griff Vao."

Next to me, Canderous Ordo straightened to attention. His repeating blaster was held firm in his grasp, but his attention was as much on our surroundings as on the cowering blue Twi'lek.

"(Jen!)") I called out, a clench of unease tightening my gut. I could not see Jen's face from here, but I knew the expression that would be owning her. The rage. The madness. The evil. "(This is not the way. He is harmless!)"

"Harmless?" Jen mocked. Her voice had twisted to a scathing, derisive imitation of what it should be. "There are many types of harm, Wookiee. Cowardice is but one."

"I-I thought you'd all try to escape!" Griff blurted out, his eyes rounded and wild. The sickly smell of his fear was acrid and unpleasant. "And then- then- then I thought he'd kill you! What was I meant to do, die along with you all?"

"You left your sister, young and unguarded, alone on Taris. You left your sister to die out in the desert," Jen whispered.

"Jen." Mission's quiet voice was the strength of a wroshyr beneath Jen's wild hurricane of wrath. The Human turned to face Mission; narrowed, dark gaze staring down at my young friend who had placed a gentle hand on her upraised forearm.
I was holding my breath. Griff Vao's fate concerned me not, other than the impact it would have on Mission. And the scars it might place on her and Jen Sahara both.

And my worry for the soul of the Human I followed grew more every day.

Jen's head tilted in acceptance at Mission's unspoken plea. She stepped backward; her lightsaber deactivating with a hiss as she left the siblings to face each other.

My shoulders eased, just the smallest amount.

"Far out, Mission!" Griff exclaimed, blue eyes blinking at her in relief. "You could do with some more laid-back friends, y'know? Sheesh, here I am, overjoyed to find out y'all managed to escape-"

"Goodbye, Griff." Mission's words were quiet, but they scythed through the babble of her older brother nonetheless.

"What?" Griff was frowning, and I realized, then, that he had no comprehension of just how badly he had failed her. "What d'ya mean by that?"

"I'm leaving Tatooine, Griff. I don't reckon we'll ever see each other again."

Griff's blue headtails curved tight around his neck as he stared at his sister in askance. He'd had the time, since he had returned to Anchorhead, to clean himself up. The white Czerka uniform sat crisp upon his frame, making his appear a well-dressed, civilized contrast to his sister's tattered attire. Mission... with the mesh suit she adorned, and covered in the desert dust she hadn't bothered cleaning off, Mission looked like the rogue space explorer that circumstances were slowly turning her into.

"But we just- we only just reunited!" Griff spluttered. "You can't be serious, sis- look, we need to have a couple of drinks- I've got my old job back, but I'll be off shift in a few hours-"

"No. I have my own life to follow. Bit like Lena does, too. Maybe one day if you can figure how to stop failing sents, they'll stop leaving you."

The words were harsh, and wholly unlike the generous spirit I knew my friend to be.

Griff's eyes widened in shock. "Hey, that's not fair! I did all I could by you sis! I-I tried. I always planned to make it big and come back for you, y'know. I just needed- I just needed enough of a start up." His words were wheedling, pleading, but he trailed off as a speculative expression crossed his face. "Y'know, you've done better than I thought you would, sis. Ever thought-"

"Don't," Mission snapped. "Don't you dare ask me for creds or some stupid stake in another hotsa-chuba scheme. Or I really will let Jen go nuts with her glow-stick. Just- just go, Griff!" She expelled a pent-up sigh, and I saw the anger in her face transform into a grimness that saddened me. Her expression firmed. "I got nothing left to say to you."

Griff stepped back once, twice, but I could see the reluctance in his face. It wasn't just greed, I hoped – not just the thought of his sister having resources he could pilfer like the odious, selfish sentient he was. No- there was something deeper there. For all of his flaws, Griff Vao did care for his sister – but not enough.

Not enough to be a worthy brother.

"Stay in touch, alright?" Griff muttered, stepping back again, his gaze roving warily between the twin threats of Jen and Canderous. There was defeat in the lines of his shoulders, and I was glad to see him retreat. "I've still got the same holonet account-"

"Go back to your job, Griff," Mission cut in. She sounded older than she was. Serious and sad and strong all at the same time. "They'll be missing you."

"Okay." He swallowed. "Okay. Take care of yourself, sis. I- I love you, y'know?"

Griff Vao turned, and slowly walked away.

"I know." The whisper from my young friend was soft, so soft that her brother would not have heard it.

I loped to her side, placing a paw on her shoulder. "(Mission)," I said, trying to keep my voice gentle. "(Are you okay?)"

"No," she murmured, turning to me with a tremulous smile. "But I think I will be." She sniffed, loudly, before turning to stare at Jen with almost the same amount of sass she normally did. "Shall we go fix your stupid droid then, Jen?"

Jen raised an eyebrow, shot one look of scathing derision in the direction of Griff Vao, and then strode into the droid shop. The Mandalorian grunted before following.

"Come on, Big Z, don't dawdle," Mission teased, tugging on my arm. I could see her blinking back tears, and understood her desire to act like everything was normal.

"(Okay)," I rumbled my assent. "(Let's move on then)."

xXx
Hyperspace: III [Carth Onasi, Karon Enova, HK-47, Juhani, Saul Karath, Yudan Rosh, Jen Sahara]

Hyperspace: III – part two

Carth Onasi:

The Ebon Hawk sailed smoothly into the Tatooine sky, and I felt a perceptible loosening of my shoulders. I'd sent an encrypted message to the Republic base leader on Manaan before take-off, and I was confident of a warm reception there. I wonder if it's still Roland Wann in charge. A smarmy, officious man; he was not someone I had warmed to. He'd always been a little too quick to look out for his own interests. Doesn't matter. Soon we'll be back amongst allies.

Things had been tense for too long, and only here, in the cockpit seat, did I really feel at ease. I'd feel more comfortable if Jen would stop staring at me, though.

Just before we'd launched off, Jen had sailed into the room and deposited herself into the co-pilot's chair. I'd known what was going to happen and groaned inwardly; sure enough, Bastila arrived a minute later asking ever-so-politely if Jen would mind moving. May as well ask for it to snow in Anchorhead, Bastila. She'd ended up walking away in an icy snit.

"You could try being a bit nicer to Bastila, you know," I said mildly. Jen smirked at me, her eyes twinkling. At times like this, I wondered if I was dreaming about the changes in her. She was behaving just as sassy and mercurial as back on Taris. At other times... at other times she seems almost sadistic.

"Why would I do that?" she asked, still grinning at me.

"Because... because..." I floundered. I didn't particularly like Bastila myself, but I knew she meant well, despite all her blasted Jedi secrets. And with Jen playing that let's-switch-personality game, Bastila was kept off-balance and didn't present herself well to others.

For all of Bastila's Jedi experience, she struck me as someone who'd lived a sheltered life. I couldn't imagine her dealing well - or at all - with the galactic acclaim that must have been thrown her way. She was the Order's rising star... a young padawan too gifted and too socially awkward to be leading this mission on her own.

"Because she doesn't exactly have many friends on board," I said finally. While you have a Wookiee and a Twi'lek urchin following you blindly. Ever since the rescue yesterday, Canderous had barely left Jen alone. And Juhani - who barely spoke to anyone - could usually be found dogging Jen's heels. I sighed. Is everyone here crazy? What's so special about that damn woman? I frowned at her in frustration, but she was still aiming a delighted smile directly at me.

"So, who was the guy?" she asked, her voice light and candid.

"Huh?"

"I heard you, talking with Mission last night." Her smile looked a little fake now. "Who were you talking about?"
I could feel my brows lower in renewed irritation. I should have known Jen was listening in. "None of your business," I said tightly, turning my attention back to the controls. I hadn't meant to talk about my past, but I'd hated to see that miserable look on the Twi'lek kid's face, and the words had just stumbled out.

"I'll get it out of you, you know," she responded mildly.

"Drop it." My voice had turned flat and angry, and I fiddled with the readout dials for no reason other than to keep my hands busy and my eyes away from her. As the skies darkened into space, the silence stretched between us. I risked a glance back, certain she'd be staring at me with that exasperating look of curiosity.

But no. She was gazing wide-eyed at the controls, as if she'd never seen them before. Every time I think I'm beginning to peg her, she goes and acts weird on me. I suppressed a sigh, and turned to punch in the coordinates for our next destination.

"Prepare for hyperspace jump," I broadcast over the internal comm, and a second later we were away. The familiar dizziness clamped my stomach. Funny. You'd think after all this time I'd be used to it. Although a momentary nausea was nothing to worry about. I'd heard of people who spent hours afterwards hurling up the contents of their stomach.

Once the hyperjump was complete, my gaze slid back to Jen. She was, still, staring dazedly at the navigational controls.

"What is it?" I asked at last, my curiosity finally breaking.

"I... I've piloted before," she mumbled. "I'm sure of it."

"Piloted before?" I echoed. "Right." I didn't know what to believe anymore. "Just who are you? Supposedly a scholar who can use the Force, pick locks almost as well as Mission, speak more languages than your average Jedi, one of the – no, the craziest melee warrior I've ever had the misfortune to meet, and now you think you can pilot. Is there anything you can't do?"

Humour crinkled her bright eyes as she turned back to me, and damn if she wasn't laughing. "I can't ride a swoop bike well, or play pazaak without cheating. Pretty sure I'm pants at cooking, too." The corners of her mouth were twitching. "But I always knew you liked me underneath all those scowls, Onasi."

"You are so infuriating!" the words wrenched out of me in irritation, and I felt my brows slam down even further. Does she take anything seriously?

Jen's grin widened, and her eyes danced with mischief. "Alright, cool your engines, flyboy. I'd better leave you and your bad mood alone." She stood, chuckling to herself, and made her way out of the cockpit.

I sighed once the hatch swished closed behind her. For some reason, my annoyance didn't dissipate with her departure.

We'll be on Manaan soon, I told myself. Things will calm down. I'll be able to find out what's going on, and we'll all have a break from... from everything. The pleasing thing about Manaan was the forced lack of overt violence. I was sick of Jen rushing crazy into battle and slaughtering everything in her way.

Is that a fair judgment? I'd never seen Jen hurt an innocent. And I'd met other berserkers who were good, law-abiding people; they just erupted with senseless rage and adrenaline in battle - much the same as Jen. But I've never known a berserking Jedi. Aren't emotions like that meant to be dangerous for a Jedi?

But she wasn't a Jedi, was she? No, just someone who's suddenly using the Force and claiming that she can't remember her past.

I needed some answers. Bastila was still being as evasive as a spice smuggling spacer, and I no longer knew why I was following her so faithfully. Because I was assigned to this mission. This may be the most crucial task in the war; it could turn the tide for the Republic. If there is any way I can help with that, I will. But damn it, when was someone going to explain things to me?

At least, on Manaan, I had a few contacts at the Republic base. I'd be able to check in with HQ, and maybe get a little more info. Find out what my orders were now. And if the Jedi request my assistance any further, then I'll make Bastila give me some real answers. Like who Jen Sahara really was. And exactly what significance these mysterious Force ruins had. Why am I always left out of the loop?

Manaan. I'd get some answers on Manaan, damn it.

xXx

HK-47

Start-up System Check Motoring Functions Online Memory Core Function.... Unable To Access

Audio Sensors ... Online Optical Sensors ... Online Tactile Sensors ... Online Olfactory Sensors ...
Online Gustatory Sensors ... Not Installed

Shielding Function ... Error ... Energy Shields ... 20.38472 percent Capability ... Sonic Shields ...
19.34266 percent Capability ... Electrical Shields ... Offline

Scanning External Environment

Location: Ebon Hawk Engineering Section

3 Organic Meatbags, 1 Droid in Targeting Area

Identification – Jen Sahara (Current Owner), Mission Vao, Zaalbar

Optical Sensors Focusing on Droid

Analysis: Unknown Droid Model: T3 Series, Droid Model Recognition Result: Negative Threat Assessment: Minimal Assigned Temporary Name: Mobile Trash Can

Input – Jen Sahara: "What's your status, HK?"

Output: "Response: It appears that the damage to my primary motor functions has been corrected.
My electrical shields are completely destroyed, master. My sonic and energy shields are down to twenty percent capability."

Input – Jen Sahara: "Good. Zaalbar, help me back here? I want to take a look at the shield controls."

Intrusion Detected: Rear Panel Opening Threat Assessment: Negative

Input – Jen Sahara: "HK, think we could take a look at your memory core while we are at it?"
Output: "Response: You will need to access my central control cluster to do so, master. My own internal diagnostic checks have failed to discover the source of this error. Cautionary: This may take some skill. Please be careful with my circuits."

Input – Zaalbar (Shyriiwook): "The power supply to electrical shields is completely destroyed. See here? It is good we bought a new one. Shall I install it for you, Jen?"

Input – Jen Sahara: "Please."

Removal of Non Functional Electrical Shield Power Supply Detected Installation of Functional Electrical Shield Power Supply Detected

Input – Jen Sahara: "Alright, HK, I'm activating the electrical shields."

Electrical Shields Powering Up Shields Diagnostic Shielding Function.... Error ... Energy Shields... 20.38472 percent Capability ... Sonic Shields... 19.34266 percent Capability ... Electrical Shields.... 100 percent Capability

Output: "Statement: My electrical shields have been fully restored, master. That was a good effort for a hairy overgrown meatbag."

Input – Zaalbar: (Irritated Howl)

Input – Jen Sahara: "Why do you call everyone meatbags, HK?" Voice Stress Analysis: Amused

Output: "Explanation: It's just that... you have all these squishy meat parts, master. And all that water! How the constant sloshing doesn't drive you mad, I have no idea."

Input – Mission Vao: "Squishy meat parts? Sheesh, you could at least be polite, y'know."

Output: "Query: Perhaps you would prefer the term liquidious fleshbag?"

Input – Mission Vao: "Oh, shut up. Hey, I wonder what this does."

Input – Zaalbar to Mission Vao (Shyriiwook): "No! Mission, not that wire!"

Visual Input: Blue Optical Sensors Overload

Input – Mission Vao: "Uh, oops."

Activating Self Preservation Protocols... Adjusting Targeting System to Audio Triangulation Searching For Weapon... Motor Function Error Light Impact Detected – Location: Left Optical Socket Source: HK-47

Output: "Exclamation: Ow! I am poking my own eye sockets! Ow! What has she done to me?!?"

Input – Jen Sahara: "Zaalbar, quick, deactivate him!"

Power Lost

....some time later/...

Startup System Check Motoring Functions Online Memory Core Function.... Unable To Access Audio Sensors ... Online Optical Sensors ... Online Tactile Sensors ... Online Olfactory Sensors ... Online Gustatory Sensors ... Not Installed
Shielding Function ... Online ... Energy Shields ... 100 Capability ... Sonic Shields ... 100 Capability ... Electrical Shields ... 100 Capability

Scanning External Environment

Location: Ebon Hawk Engineering Section

3 Organic Meatbags in Targeting Area

Identification – Jen Sahara (Current Owner), Zaalbar, Canderous Ordo

Input – Jen Sahara: "HK? You alright now?"

Output: "Response: I am fully func...zzz"

Audio Transmission Error Motor Function Error Internal Diagnostic check: ... Limbs Non Functional

Input – Zaalbar: (Howl)

Moderate Impact Detected – Location: Rear Panel Source: Zaalbar Combat Mode Initiated: Interrupt: ...Motor Functions Powering Up... 100 Online ...Audio Transmission Powering Up... 100 Online Return to Main Exiting Combat Mode

Output: "Response: I seem to be back online, master."

Input – Jen Sahara: "Right. Uh, let's take a break before we install that mod you bought for him, Canderous." Voice Stress Analysis: Weary Input – Canderous Ordo: "Might be a good idea to keep the kid away from here."

Input – Jen Sahara: "Switch to standby, HK. We'll do the rest later."

Output: "As you desire, master. Signing off."

Entertainment Routine Initiated:

Target Analysis: Type: Organic Meatbag Species: Twi’lek, Female Name: Mission Vao Occupation: Insignificant Member of the Ebon Hawk Crew

Death Scenario: Blaster Shot to Head........

xXx

Karon Enova:

I sighed softly, staring out through the cockpit window at the blue skies of Rii'shn, a small planet I'd brought my apprentice along for a little adventure. Our business was now wrapped up, and my thoughts were drawn back to a conversation I'd had merely ten hours ago.

I'd known, one way or another, that the past would come back to haunt me once more, or to drag me back into its murky grip... I may have prepared for it, but I didn't feel ready. Here I am, a master for the last twenty or so years, having doubts and fears like a padawan.

"Master?" a young male voice asked behind me. I schooled my expression and turned around in the pilot's chair, smiling briefly at Lars. After my shattering failure with Revan, I'd vowed never to take an apprentice again. Look at me now.

Lars had been with the Jedi Order for eight years already, but in many ways was still a very green padawan. His original master, my old friend Tyrias, had been one of the many casualties of my former apprentice, and perhaps my guilt was the reason I had finally agreed to mentor Lars.

"Lars," I acknowledged. "Everything loaded onto the ship?"

"Yes. We're ready to leave. Are we heading back to Coruscant?" he asked brightly. There was something almost dreamy about Lars; at times I'd wondered whether he'd ever been touched by tragedy in his life. He hadn't held a particularly close relationship with Tyrias, and had not felt much pain when Tyrias joined the Force. That is what I see on the outside. I should not judge what goes on inside Lars' mind. And yet I worried for the day that Lars would finally feel the grief of losing a loved one, or the pain of betrayal. He had few true friends, despite his happy, ambivalent nature. Others do not warm to him because he's always dreaming, always lost inside his own head. He should have been an artist, not a Jedi.

I smiled at Lars, and motioned him forward. "No. We will rest first, and then we are headed to Manaan."

Juhani

"Juhani. We should talk," Revan said, her eyes piercing into mine as she slouched in the doorframe. Ever since I had learned the truth, I did not want to leave her side. I could sense a dark taint struggling to take root in her body, and her struggle was so familiar that I wanted to weep.

The Ebon Hawk had lifted into hyperspace hours earlier, and my place was in the women's sleeping quarters, much to my disappointment. It was not a good den for me, as I wished not to be around others. The Twi'lek kit was wary of me and I could not blame her. The men, also; Carth Onasi and Zaalbar looked at me with heavy suspicion, and Canderous Ordo was one of those genocidal murderers.

Although, I had been surprised how well we had fought together. While the thought of living in close quarters with a Mandalorian had at first stirred the rage in my soul, it was his very regard of Revan that forced me to rethink my opinion of him. For it had been Revan who had broken his people, and yet he looked upon his conqueror with respect and interest.

The Mandalorians had slaughtered the Cathar, whilst Revan had merely defeated the Mandalorians - but still, it had made me reflect. Surely, I could look at him in the same light as he did Revan: as an individual rather than a symbol of his people.

But it was not Canderous who was dominating my thoughts. How could it be, now that I knew Revan's true identity?

I motioned for her to walk inside the port living quarters and close the door. Bastila had warned me earlier against an affiliation with Revan, but I could not do what she wished. While I had promised not to initiate a conversation with Revan that might be... incriminating, I could not lie to her, should she ask. I am grateful to Bastila for her continued help with my inner struggle; she is an honourable Jedi. But she did not understand my feelings. Revan saved me; once from slavery, and now from the Dark Side. I cannot forsake her.

I had been barely more than a kit when Revan and her followers landed on Taris, vanquished the slave trade, and revolutionised the healthcare and education systems. I knew not how long her influence had lasted; when I had recently visited Taris, it seemed like little remained. But Revan freed me and many others, and it was one of her Jedi allies who had discovered my Force sensitivity and sent me on to Dantooine. I felt a small, wistful smile on my face as I thought of Jedi Knight Meetra Surik. She had been the very epitome of goodness and warmth, so different from my master, and yet in some ways our brief meeting had shaped me and my aspirations as much as my time spent with Master Quatra had.

Revan walked in cautiously; I could see the wary mistrust on her face. I knew I was not impervious to falling back into the clutches of the Dark Side, and I knew the same was true for her, even more so. Perhaps I could redeem myself by guiding Revan back to the light. I wished then, irrationally, that I was the one bonded to her. I can help her better than Bastila. I understand her. I could tell that all Bastila did was irritate the volatile woman.

"What is it you wish to talk about?" I asked softly.

"The Force," she smiled at me, but it did not reach her eyes. "What else? You still owe me Force lessons."

"Of course." She was so hard, so suspicious; but somewhere in her was the charismatic, good Jedi she had once been. "I vowed to you I would help you, and I shall. As much as I am able."

"No waffling on about that stupid code..." she warned in a deadly tone.

A smile flicked on my face. "I remember my trials with the code. I threw a rather childish tantrum because I could not recite it, and my master confined me to solitary meditation. I was not allowed to see anyone but her, nor eat anything bar gruel and water, until I could recall it fluently and prove my understanding was complete."

Revan's expression lifted, and her mouth curved into an amused grin. "That sounds a bit harsh for a kid."

"My master had harsh ways." I did not want to dwell on that topic. Bastila had told me the truth about Quatra, and my thoughts were still too tender and emotive on that subject to explore. I should have realized I could not kill a master. But that it was all a test, all the misery I'd gone through... Quatra had warned me I felt too strongly about her, too intensely. Is that why she used it against me?

It was hard to hold back my bitterness at her. I could not deny that there was still a part of me that wished to flee, to be independent and strong and alone from all sentient relationships, and Quatra had somewhat to do with that. But fleeing had not helped me any. At the end of it, I had been miserable on Tatooine. And while the Dark Side offered quick power through the fury of one's emotions, I no longer believed it was worth the inner torment.

"What do you know of Force bonds?" Revan asked as she sat down next to me on the hard bunk. A coarse, woven blanket covered the thin mattress, and she plucked at it absently.

"Like the one you share with Bastila?" I replied. "I do not know much of them. I know they are rare and vary in strength and intensity, and the gifts that are part of it differ with the strength of the link."

"Gifts," Revan muttered darkly. "Hah! See if you'd like Bastila inside your head permanently. I don't want to go to sleep. I-" She cut short her rambling, frowning as she mulled over something. "Could Bastila see my dreams? I wondered something the other night..."
"Yes," I answered truthfully. I would not lie to her. I owed her too much.

"How do I block her out of my mind, Juhani?" Revan asked, gritting her teeth. I could hear the frustrated anger in her voice.

"I thought you were already doing that?" I frowned.

"I- I suppose I have been, at times. I wasn't entirely certain how well I had succeeded though."

"I do know that one of the fundamental cornerstones of a Force bond is privacy. You have to be able to trust enough to allow each other privacy. Inside your head." I remembered hearing a talk from an older master who had formed a mind-link with an apprentice of his once. He had said the biggest challenge was giving each other space.

"Oh, sure, I can trust Bastila," Revan muttered sarcastically. "About as far as I'd trust a Hutt."

"I do not know what else to tell you, Jen."

"How do I stop her cutting me off from the Force?" She leaned closer, narrowing her eyes. I stiffened, and felt my eyes widen in surprise.

"She can cut you off from the Force? Are you certain, Jen?" Her face was serious, intent, and not a little bit angry. "I did not know that was possible."

"Hmm," Revan murmured, leaning away from me and stretching her good arm above her head. Her other forearm, newly set, was resting in her lap. Although Revan had started using it against Bastila's vehement protests, it appeared weak, thin and purple with mottled bruising. "Well, maybe you can explain how these bonds are created," Revan continued. "Bastila gave me some weak story, and it just didn't ring true. I'd barely seen her on the Endar Spire. I think. It's all a bit hazy."

I tensed; this was heading to unsteady ground. But it is Bastila's lies, not mine. "From what I recall, bonds can be created in three ways. The first is the most common; it can occur between two Jedi working together for a long time. They gradually become sensitive to each other through the Force, and over time a weak mind-link may grow. Even so, it happens rarely."

"And the other two ways?"

I hesitated briefly. "If two Jedi were – intimate, then it is possible for a mind-link to be created. Unlikely, as the very intimacy is frowned upon by the Jedi Council. The third way is-"

A knock on the door interrupted my dialogue, and I looked up as Bastila opened the automatic door. I wondered briefly why I wished she had not appeared. An emotion I couldn't identify smouldered in her grey eyes as she glanced between us both, huddled as we were on the bed and deep in conversation.

"Juhani, Jen," Bastila acknowledged, in a calm tone that betrayed nothing. "Perhaps it is time we talked more about the Force."

"Enough talk," Revan disagreed smoothly, getting to her feet. "Juhani, want to have a duel? There's space in that empty hangar. I'd qui-"

"Duel?" Bastila cut in, her voice rising. She took a deep breath, and visibly appeared to calm herself. "Your arm is too damaged, Jen. Also, there is much you should learn, before you start using the Force physically, and I-"
"That's too bad. Juhani?" Revan looked at me, and I saw an odd plea in her eyes. She does not wish to spend time with Bastila. Perhaps if we fought, I could help her control the darker side of her emotions, help contain her anger.

"Certainly," I agreed, and Bastila scowled. "Maybe you could watch us and point out our weaknesses, Bastila," I suggested, more to quiet the younger Jedi than anything else. This caused Revan to glare at me, and I wondered what I was doing. I feel sorry for Bastila. And yet I wish I was in her place. I do not understand myself at times.

"Fine," Bastila stated, folding her arms. Revan rolled her eyes and stalked out of the room.

xXx

Saul Karath:

I scowled at the incoming text transmission, skimming through the details as they appeared on my console. Lord Malak will not be pleased. To offer such a vast sum to a foreign society, and have it half-turned down... I did not wish to be the one who relayed such news. The commodore who'd informed Lord Malak about Calo's defeat did so with a smirk on her face, bumbling idiot that she was. It may have been merely amusement at the thought of a famous bounty hunter being taken out by unknowns – for Bastila Shan's presence was not common knowledge – but Malak had not appreciated such candid mirth.

The poor sap had to be scraped off the floor by the cleaning crew, in the end.

Malak never used to be so gratuitously violent. Causing pain for a purpose was fine, necessary at times - but Malak often took destruction to an absurd level. This was an experienced commodore – who'd required discipline, certainly – but we were not so flooded with officers that we could afford to splatter their innards all over the command deck at the first sign of impropriety.

It wasn't particularly good for morale, either.

Only after Malachor did Malak start to show his sadistic side. And only after he betrayed his master did it truly flourish.

I was glad I hadn't known of Malak's plans to fire on Revan's flagship the previous year, for surely I would have picked the losing side. But now, as a puppet of the incumbent Jedi, Revan herself was next to useless.

Those first years serving under Lord Revan had been all I'd dreamed of. I wasn't sure when my respect became laced with fear, but I'd never denied her competency. She'd been sharp, charismatic, and willing to listen to the experts she surrounded herself by.

I'd genuinely believed that one day we would see her vision of galactic efficiency come to life. Peace and order - imposed, if necessary, on those that did not know any better – while remaining steadfast and strong. An external threat like the Mandalorians – or worse – could not be allowed to shake the Core again.

Now, under Malak, the vision had slipped. It was not so much that I doubted his chances of success, no; more that I was uneasy where or how his victory would end.

I cannot deny he has edged into insanity. Or that Revan began to, also, near the end.

I heard the swish of the command doors opening behind me, and the noise of troopers standing hurriedly to attention. Contain your thoughts, I warned myself. For both Malak and Revan had shown signs of limited mind-reading. I'd been trained on how to shield against the psychic probes of Force-users, but it was not an infallible defense.

Personally, I believed the universe would be a far better place without the cursed Force.

"Ah, Admiral. Any news?" Malak's deep, metallic voice intoned. I turned around and bowed hurriedly.

"My lord, I have just received word from the GenoHaradan."

Malak folded his arms; his yellow, soulless eyes appraising me dispassionately. The ex-Jedi Kylah Aramai stood simpering at his side, and I took care to contain my grimace. For all intents and purposes, she was Malak's willing pet. The rest of Malak's top Dark Jedi had elements of intelligence or strategic brilliance about them – even if Bandon was an immature chivhole – but I hoped Lord Malak would soon see that the painted harlot strutting next to him had outlived her usefulness the day she'd betrayed the Endar Spire to Bandon's task force.

"Well?" Malak snapped.

"They have accepted only one of the contracts, my lord. The one on Jen Sahara."

Blind fury crested in his eyes. "I offered them enough to buy a planet!" His fists clenched, and I saw Kylah take a hesitant step backwards. I bowed my head quickly, and Malak took an advancing step towards me.

The silence crackled with palpable tension as I kept my eyes focused on the ground at Malak's feet. How I abhor this pathetic grovelling! Two years ago Malak had been prone to outbursts of violence, but never unnecessary slaughter. He'd been a sharp man, once. The Force and its light and dark sides. It makes them all go insane.

"Come on, Saul, I would not hurt you for this." Malak voice had turned soft with mockery. And yet, I did not feel reassured. "The GenoHaradan, however, have insulted me with this refusal. But we shall deal with them in due course."

He wants to take on the GenoHaradan? A chill stepped down my spine. Revan had always been reckless, impulsive; but these days Malak took that to new heights. To think that, years ago, he'd been the steadier of the two.

"I'll have to deal with the Battle Meditation brat myself. Sooner or later, she'll stop on one of the other planets. Manaan first, I'd wager. She's still on the run, she'll be desperate for a safe place. My forces can go after her there."

"Manaan? But the Selkath don't tolerate-"

The words died in my throat as I stared into his eyes. They seemed to glow with a fevered, crazed gleam of poisoned yellow. His voice dropped to a whisper. "Do you believe the Selkath are a match for my power, Saul?"

"No, my lord," I said. And still, I could not stop myself from saying more. I'd been valued for my advice, once. "Overt violence on Manaan could cause the Selkath to deny us access to the kolto, my lord."

He was silent for a long moment, still staring at me with those damned eyes. In my periphery, I could see Kylah scowling petulantly at me, and wondered, with a chill, if my years of experience and warfare were going to be replaced by a sneering child whose greatest strength appeared to be showcasing her sexuality.

"Your counsel has its uses, Saul. But you are better off leading our starships. Leave the politics to me." And with a patronising chuckle, Lord Malak clapped a heavy hand on my shoulder. "You do not see the grand design, Admiral, nor do you grasp that the power of the Star Forge far eclipses the kolto trade. Our biggest threat remains Bastila Shan – and my old master – and thus we go after them. On Manaan, those Republic weaklings believe Selkath neutrality will protect them, and that will lure Bastila Shan there first. That, and the Star Map. Neither she nor her allies will expect an attack there."

I took care to couch my next words neutrally. "My lord, if the Selkath allow the Republic sole access to the kolto, it will give them a great advantage." He would attack on Manaan, and endanger our kolto supply? Not even Revan would throw such a potential gift to the enemy, no matter how confident of victory she was!

Malak's fingers ground into my shoulder; a warning of his growing irritation. His grip bit deep, and I couldn't hold back a grunt of protest.

"Enough, Admiral!" His words lashed like a whip. "I value you, but not enough to tolerate insubordination."

Malak thrust me away sharply, and I staggered back a step. It took some effort to keep my expression blank. There was a painful ache in my shoulder that matched the discontent in my soul. I'd seen Malak do a lot worse to others, and knew that any more discussion on this topic would be nothing more than playing roulette with my life.

"Kylah." Malak turned to face his quiet pet.

"Yes, master?" she purred in response. I rolled my shoulder, and grimaced as pain spiked down my back.

"Pick out ten Dark Jedi. Do not interfere with the GenoHaradan's plans. You are to go after Bastila Shan. Capture her if you can, eliminate her if you can't. If it means infiltrating the Republic base and angering those pathetic Selkath – then so be it."

Kylah bowed low, her dark red robes touching the ground.

"This is your chance to prove your strength to me, my dear." Malak's mechanical voice deepened as it lowered, one gloved finger trailing down the fallen Jedi's cheek. Her red lips curved as it brushed against them. "Succeed, and you will stand equal with the best of my Dark Jedi."

"I will not fail you, my lord," she murmured, her cheek resting against his hand. My stomach tightened with distaste and I made sure to avert my gaze at the unwelcome intimacy of the moment.

"We shall see." There was a swish of cloth as Malak spun, abrupt and sudden, his words firing like frozen missiles as his voice iced over. "I shall be most displeased if I have to recall Bandon and Yudan to sort this out because you are not up to the task, Kylah."

Personally, I wondered whether Lord Malak should have sent Bandon Stone or Yudan Rosh when he'd first heard of Bastila's escape and Revan's flawed resurrection. Contain your thoughts, I reminded myself again. And, truly, there were reasons to keep the cleverer of Malak's top Dark Jedi away. Yudan's leadership is required on the frontlines. And Bandon has his hands full breaking the last set of prisoners. I grimaced in distaste. In many ways, Bandon Stone was a little too good at emulating his master.

When it came right down to it, a runaway Bastila Shan and a mind-broken ghost should have been an easy coup for a renowned bounty hunter – or the trio of Dark Jedi Malak had sent on his tail.

"No more mistakes," Malak commanded with finality as he strode away. "I want them both - dead or alive!"

There was trepidation on Kylah's heavily painted face, even beneath the smirking confidence. I once more had to drag my gaze away before she noticed - even as I hated myself for it.

In another galaxy- in a better galaxy- in a galaxy without the damned Force- simpering chits like Kylah Aramai would have been completely beneath my notice.

I turned, with effort, and forced my concentration back to the navi-panels of the heavy cruiser.

xXx

Yudan Rosh

“We’re losing our hold on Ando, my lord,” Admiral Sara said, her bulbous eyes blinking up at me. “With the rebellion at Bothawui, our stranglehold on the Rodian corridor is getting shaky.”

I should care. I should care more than I did. “Retreat from Ando,” I said, staring blankly at the holo-map of the adjoining sectors. “Send half the Nova fleet back to Bothawui. As for the remainder: position them a hundred klicks into the Gerrix asteroid belt.”

Sara stifled a gasp, but when I turned to look at her, the Sullustan’s face was blank. I did not appreciate emotion. I did not feel it, and did not wish to see it in others.

“My lord,” she began hesitantly. “There will be casualties-”

“Yes,” I said coldly. “Such is war. Lord Malak will send reinforcements. In the meantime, the asteroid belt is a perfect location to ambush any Republic fleet exiting hyperspace around Ando.”

We might lose Ando, for a time. It was more strategic to hold onto Bothawui, and so I would send what was needed. The rest might as well take out what Republic chaff they could with their own deaths.

Once, I’d cared about losses. Once, I cared about people. Now all I felt was the icy core of the Force; frozen and boreal and never-ending in its frigidity.

The sound of the bridge door swishing open and a half-dozen Sith guards snapping to attention had me turning.

The visitor should have been a welcome surprise, but detachment of the dark cloaked me like a second skin.

“Yudan,” she murmured, walking closer, yellow eyes sharp on me. My old friend. My old comrade. The last survivor of the damned Jedi Thirteen-

Other than myself. Other than Malak.

“Nisotsa,” I drawled. “I thought you were busy on Korriban presenting younglings to Uthar Wynn.”
Nisotsa Organa was wasted in recruitment. Sometimes, I idly believed that Malak only placed her there to elicit a reaction. But over the years, Nisotsa had retreated into caution at the bloody games we Sith played. She didn’t dare raise any objection these days. Whatever fire she’d once had was long snuffed out.

Whereas I- I no longer felt a thing.

Sometimes I wondered if I would even feel my own death.

“Leave us,” Nisotsa snapped at Sara, her tight gaze roving over the comm techs and Sith officers flanking us. Sara’s round eyes moved to mine, seeking permission, which I granted with a sharp nod.

Nisotsa remained silent as the bridge cleared of all personnel, Admiral Sara included.

“We were in the middle of a strat meeting, Nisotsa,” I said coldly. I wouldn’t tolerate this sort of interference from many- but we had known each other for too long. Fought together, bled together, sworn fealty together-

Yes, but she betrayed your true master, an inner voice mocked. Her and Arran Da’klor and that braggart Bandon Stone.

And Malak.

A flicker of rage struggled to ignite deep within the ice, but it soon winked out. I couldn’t fault Nisotsa. Treachery was part of a Sith’s life: the machinations we all devolved into, as our pointless existence served nothing but the corrupted will of the Force. Nisotsa, at least, had exhibited her intelligence by keeping me ignorant of the Deralian plot.

For I would have betrayed her, betrayed all of them in kind, had I known-

Had I known- The what-if’s were poisonous in their never-ending taunts. What if I had known? What if I had told Revan, what if she’d actually survived and taken Malak out instead?

And there was only me left, at her side-

But Revan had used me to keep her apprentice in line; leashed us both, in the end, to her will with twin bonds of jealousy and lust, until I could no longer separate the difference between love and hate-

It was second-nature, now, to force those wild thoughts down. I preferred the icy numbness of the dark. The cold, unfeeling dark.

“Have you heard from Malak?” Nisotsa asked, her voice sharp and short.

I had. A short message, direct and to the point. An order to hold station, hold the frontlines- no matter what wild rumours might catch my ears. A delayed comm, dripping with command and overt threats. It would mean my life, should I abandon my post.

Obviously something had rattled Malak. Whatever these supposed rumours were, I hardly cared. I would play out the game of war here, as ordered, in a cold echo of a glorious, golden past: where I had once taken pride in leading Republic Fleets against the Mandalorian scourge.

“Yes. Nothing more than a command to stay here,” I replied, eyeing over my old acquaintance. “Not that I had any other plans.”
She bit her lip, an uncommon gesture of uncertainty, even for her. “Bandon dropped by at the Academy, to cull another lot of Adepts,” she murmured. “He- you know he led the attack on the Endar Spire?”

I raised an eyebrow, waiting. Bandon Stone was an egotistical tool with a greater depth of Force power than perhaps any, save Malak. Between him and that strutting ex-Jedi harlot, Kylah Aramai, our Lord appeared to be surrounding himself with posturing children.

Sometimes I could still feel the harsh ferracrete bite into my knees as I pledged loyalty to Darth Malak, even as my heart had blindly refused to believe that she could really be dead-

“Bandon will be coming here, Yudan, to tell you himself. No doubt he’ll get a frakking kick out of it. I thought- we’ve known each other so long- I wanted to warn you-” Nisotsa was almost stuttering, uncertainty and fear warring in those flawed eyes that once shone with silver intelligence.

“Let me know what?”

“I don’t have it verified- rumours, only, from that chivhole’s big mouth- but Malak ordered me to stay away no matter what I heard-”

“What?” I bit out, suddenly impatient. This was it, then, whatever had prompted our master’s cryptic demands. And Nisotsa thought it important enough to warn me-

“It’s about Revan,” she whispered, yellow gaze fixed on mine with a distinct measure of reluctance.

I felt my jaw tighten, and clenched hard on the Force before it spiralled out of my control. Revan was dead. I would not allow her to have such a hold on me from beyond the grave. I would not.

“You mentioned the Endar Spire,” I forced the words out. Kept them cold, emotionless. “I take it this concerns Bastila Shan, then.”

Bastila Shan. That famous padawan the holonets claimed had been the end of Darth Revan, even as the Sith Empire attributed Revan’s demise to her old lover.

We had all loved her, in different ways. And, one by one, our loyalty had corroded into something darker.

There were times when I thought that perhaps if I had known, I would have thrown my lot in with Nisotsa and Arran- been one of the hapless idiots to challenge her on Deralia, died by her blade maybe, as a means of showing her that even the staunchest of followers, the most devoted of allies, could only take so much-

But I knew it for the falsehood it was. Malak had found the strength – or the rage – to betray her. I never had, much as I cursed myself for it.

“Yes,” Nisotsa admitted. Her eyes narrowed with displeasure. Whatever the news was, Nisotsa didn’t like it. “Bastila Shan didn’t kill her, Yudan.”

“Oh?” I raised a brow, finding myself suddenly bored of the whole debacle. Nisotsa was too easily rattled. She’d always been cautious, but these days it bordered on a twitchy fear that was hardly advantageous to her standing amongst the Sith. “I never expected that over-hyped padawan to have laid the death-blow on Revan.”
I would say her name without any emotion. Revan meant nothing to me anymore. Dead was dead.

“Yudan!” Nisotsa hissed, her eyes flashing with a passion I rarely felt these days. “Malak didn’t kill her either!”

My heart stopped. My thoughts froze. There was a roaring sound in my head.

“Who did, then?” I was barely aware of the words as they rasped from my lungs. Bastila Shan had boarded the Nexus with two masters who’d died by Revan’s hand, or so the stories said. Maybe one of them had-

She’s dead. She must be dead. She has to be-

Nisotsa’s face was grey. But resentment glittered in her eyes, and a very real fear. A fear of someone-

Revan had killed Arran Da’klor when he betrayed her on Deralia, but Nisotsa remained unscathed from her treachery-

She’s dead. She must be-

“She’s not dead. Bandon says Bastila Shan captur-”

Everything morphed into a haze of red and black. The glaciers shifted as cracks of searing fury sliced through them, a deep rage and passion so hot it was entirely overwhelming-

“Yudan! Yudan! Frakk it, let me go!” Nisotsa was screaming.

Slowly, slowly, my vision coalesced into a shaky sort of sense. The Force was a whipcord of rage, holding my old comrade tight against a durasteel bulkhead with nothing more than the black passion of my emotions.

I struggled to keep my chokehold on the Force tight, pressing Nisotsa hard against the wall, feeling the dark power lash out uncontrollably underneath my grasp.

“What do you mean?” I hissed through gritted teeth. My jaw was clenched so tight it felt like it could snap. “How in all the hells of the galaxy can she still be alive?”

“Bandon says-” she choked. “For frakk’s sake, Yudan, let me go!”

“Tell me!” I raged. The cold had vanished, and in its place burned a decalescent fury so hot it could be the fiery core of a sun.

“The Jedi have her! They’ve- they’ve brainwashed her or some rot! She thinks she’s some scholar, and Bastila Shan is leading her around like a frakking kath hound on a leash!”

It made no sense. My mind blanked, and I took a stumbling step backwards.

“Scholar,” I echoed. “Brainwashed. Start making sense, Nisotsa! How can Darth Revan both live and believe she is a simple scholar?”

At some stage, the dark Force weaves had loosened against her frame, and Nisotsa took a faltering step away from the bulkhead, her gaze suspicious and edgy as it remained pinned on me.

“I only know what that chivhole Bandon told me,” Nisotsa muttered. “Bastila Shan supposedly captured her above Deralia, and the Order wiped her mind. She doesn’t remember a damn thing, and is following Bastila Shan around like a meek little hood-mouse.”

Darth Revan... alive. And wholly ignorant of her crimes against humanity itself.

And the Order had dabbled in something that sounded an awful lot like what the Sith would do-

A falsehood? A pretence at redemption? There was no redemption for the likes of Darth Revan. There was none for any of us.

The fire died abruptly; snapping back into the frozen glacier of old.

I stared hard at Nisotsa. Sometimes, I could still see my friend as the Jedi Knight she once was. Golden-haired and simmering with intelligence and righteousness. The same as us all, before we had followed Revan into perdition.

Once, I had been a strong Jedi Knight, a warrior for peace and justice. That man was long dead and buried, incinerated in the ashes of evil. A bitter grief rose inside me, a hatred for Darth Revan, for that spectre who had destroyed everyone in her orbit- even Revan Freeflight herself.

And I found, at that moment, that maybe I did have the same strength as Malak.

It was long past time for Darth Revan to die.

“Malak’s ordered us to stay out of it,” Nisotsa muttered, rubbing at her throat, bitterness clouding her corrupted gaze as she glared at me. “Don’t do anything frakking stupid, Yudan. Malak’s dealing with this personally. Don’t give him a reason to kill you, too.”

“Understood,” I bit out. “Provided Malak actually succeeds, I’ll toe the line.”

If not... if not, then even the wrath of my gods-cursed master wouldn’t stop me from interfering.

xXx

Jen Sahara:

"What are you up to, Mission?” I asked, leaning against the durasteel wall of the Ebon Hawk's central room. The Twi'lek girl was all alone apart from her faithful astromech, and appeared to be tinkering with the ship's communication system. Somehow, I didn't think she was engaged in planned maintenance.

The others were all asleep. Although day and night were meaningless in hyperspace, we all tuned ourselves in to Galactic Standard Time, which was based on Coruscant's meander around its only sun. Currently it was the dead of night, but I'd woken from an uneasy sleep with a latent anger burning inside me. I couldn't recall my dreams, but I knew they hadn't been pleasant.

Mission jumped up, hiding the screen she'd been viewing with her back. A guilty blush rose in her cheeks. "Uh, nothing. Nothing really.” Teethree whistled something next to her, and the Twi’lek shot him a quick glare.

I grinned. "Don't let Onasi see you tinkering around with his baby," I warned.

Mission wrinkled her nose. "I'm just- I'm just trying to keep myself busy, y'know?” Her headtails twitched, and then her shoulders sagged in desolation. "After Taris, and all that death, and now Griff- well, I don't really want to think about it anymore. I can't sleep and- and, I, well...” She sighed hopelessly, looking at the little droid for encouragement. He beeped and whirled, sidling
I felt a sharp pang at the miserable look on her face. Despite my intentions, despite my firm will to care for no one, I could not help but worry for the girl. Innocence lost. I remember that feeling. Did I? From where? I racked my memories, but they shied away, vanishing into the murky realm of oblivion that was my past.

I shook my head irritably, and focused on the Twi'lek once more. "So, find anything interesting?" I drawled.

She shot me a return grin, and motioned me forwards. "Yeah, I've been looking at the comm log of the Ebon Hawk. Gee, Davik sure was slime! I never thought I'd say this about anyone, but I'm glad he's dead."

I walked forward, eyeing over the console. Mission had pulled up a list of video signals alongside a supply chart. I felt my lip curl in disgust when I saw purchase orders for several Twi'lek dancing girls.

"You were lucky, in a way, back on Taris," I mused. "It could have turned out so much worse for you, being a pretty young Twi'lek." The thought of Mission being enslaved to the likes of Davik stirred up my dormant anger. Why do I care? Why am I spouting this kath crap?

"Hey, I took care of myself plenty fine!" Mission retorted, her voice sharp and a mulish pout appearing on her face.

"I didn't mean it like that," I said, my eyes narrowing. "Just that-"

"Yeah, yeah I know." Mission sighed. "I just get enough of this 'you're too young' attitude from everyone. Sorry."

I snorted. "You've more than convinced me of your skills." I turned my attention back to the active console. "Anything interesting in the vid comms?"

"Nah," Mission replied. "Just scummy deals and the like. I'd gotten depressed watchin' them all before you came along, actually."

"Looks like he was quite busy in the spice trade before the Sith quarantine on Taris," I commented. The more recent entries were all matched with glitterstim and giggledust, and Davik no doubt made a pretty chit on that. My eyes travelled to the end, and then widened in surprise. "Hang on," I said softly.

"What?" Mission leaned in next to me, looking where I pointed. "That's gotta be Carth's transmission to his uppity officers, right? It's the date we left Tatooine."

"The one before that." My voice had dropped to a quiet whisper. It was an outgoing comm, but not tagged or categorized in any way. "Dated our last night on Tatooine."

Mission turned to frown at me. "I dunno who did that. Shall I play it?"

I nodded, and her hands flew over the controls. A few seconds later and an illuminated figure rose in front of us, a look of inquiry dissolving into surprise. My breath froze in my lungs. Icy fingers tap-danced down my spine. Who is that? The figure was an old female Zabrak, dressed in plain Jedi robes. Her turquoise eyes were a startling contrast to her darker skin, and were familiar to me. Very familiar. I've met this woman before. I'm sure of it!
"Padawan Shan!" the Zabrak exclaimed. Mission shot me an inquisitive look, curiosity sparkling in her eyes.

"Master Karon," Bastila's voice echoed from the video replay. My breath caught as I heard the words, and I felt sweat break out on my forehead. A slight shudder passed through me. I caught a brief glimpse of the woman in my mind, holding a light blue lightsaber as she waited for me. Not threatening, not threatened, just ready. What? Ready for what? Me?

"It is good to see you again, Padawan. We were unsure who survived the betrayal onboard the Endar Spire."

"Master," Bastila's voice cut in. The comm only showed the incoming video, so we couldn't see Bastila's expression, but she sounded almost... panicked. "I cannot be long. I need help."

"Help?" The one called Karon frowned, and her face turned intent. What is Bastila doing? I could feel the heat of rage as it uncurled in my gut. What has she done?

"Yes. I am heading toward Ahto City. I am glad you picked up on my signal, for I do not believe I will have time for the council on Coruscant to receive my message. Please, would you be able to rendezvous with me? Or perhaps organize another master? We will be there in two day's time."

The schutta. The betraying, lying schutta! Bastila had informed me there were no masters on Manaan. No masters until she contacted one. Why was I being such a blind idiot? Why was I still near Bastila? This was the same woman who had sedated me and tried to drag me to her masters on Dantooine. She's desperate to put me in their clutches. I will not go! I will not!

The Zabrak woman looked solemn, thoughtful, as she replied. "Who else survived the crash, Padawan?"

"The only other survivors were Carth Onasi and Jen Sahara."

"Ah." Her voice was neutral and betrayed nothing. But it was about me. It had to be, didn't it? "Well, I do not see how a delegate can arrive on Manaan within two days. I, however, am based on one of its resource planets. But tell me first, Bastila: why Manaan?"

"Please, I have to go. We are taking off now. Thank you, Master, I will explain everything when I see you!" The somewhat startled expression of the Jedi Master was cut off with an electronic hiss.

"Well, that was interesting. Y'think Bastila might be worried she's getting behind in her studies?" Mission giggled. I forced a smile on my face, and hoped it didn't look like a rictus of hate. Bastila will not get away with this! But the ship was already headed to Manaan. What in the Outer Rim could I do now?

Escape. I need to escape.

"Hey, it's not something to do with you, is it?" Mission asked, her bright voice cutting through my dark maelstrom of thoughts.

I faked an unconcerned shrug. "Possibly Juhani. Remember how we found her? And you know how highly-strung Bastila can get."

Mission rolled her eyes. "Yeah. Are we gonna ditch her, Jen? I mean, I know you're using the Force and all now, but..."

"Yeah, I don't want to put up with her either. We'll see, Mission. Get some sleep, okay?" I ended on... a forced teasing note as I stood, and the Twi'lek poked her tongue out at me. I send her a brief smile before turning around and leaving the room.

The smile dropped from my face like a ferracrete brick.

_How do I get out of this one?_ I seethed. _I will not be cornered!_ But this transmission was sent almost two days ago; the trap was already laid and waiting to be sprung. _Would it be so bad? A Jedi Master wouldn't hurt me, right?_ But if there was no harm involved, surely Bastila would have told me in advance.

_Damn her! Damn the lying bitch!_ I didn't know why I feared seeing any of Bastila's precious Jedi Masters, but the fear and hate were so strong, so tangible, that I'd be a fool not to listen to it.

_Alright, think. There's a way out of this._ It was long past time to be gone. Why had I stuck around Bastila anyway? I'd always planned to leave Taris by myself, but one thing or another had kept me with the group.

I'd walked to the rear of the ship without thinking, to the empty engineering hangar that housed Davik's custom-built swoop bike Mission had drooled over. She'd been begging Zaalbar to have a go at fixing it, and it was currently in about a dozen different parts. HK-47 was in standby mode near the corner, and jerked to life abruptly as his sensors detected me.

"Master, I am ready to serve."

"Good," I said smoothly. "You can help me out with a little problem."

Together, surely, we could work out a plan to escape Bastila and her little Jedi Master.

    xXx
What do you do, when you are surrounded by enemies? I couldn't trust anyone, that was sure. I can trust Mission. Well, maybe, but the last thing I wanted to do was drag the young girl into danger. And the Genoharadan are nasty people.

Had I had dealings with them in the past? When that stranger had confronted me on Tatooine, I'd put the datapad away until I was alone. The message itself was compelling, enigmatic:

The Genoharadan wish to offer you the opportunity of your life. You have twelve days to hear our offer. Prove your worth by finding one of the contacts below:

An instant after I’d read it, the message vanished.

I understood the format. Name, place, city, planet. The Genoharadan... I’d been on the verge of yet another flashback when I read the words, but my memories withered away; the more I’d pushed to recall my past, the more it evaded my grasp. One thought, however, struck me with blinding clarity. Ah, that shadowy assassination order. They might be useful. And after watching the rerun of Bastila's betrayal, some deep, subconscious thought sat up and begged for attention. The Genoharadan are powerful enough to get me off Manaan quickly. Maybe I had potential allies in other places. All I needed was a way to leave the Ebon Hawk before it landed in the thick of Carth's Republic contacts and Bastila's friendly master.

I’d known what HK’s first suggestion was going to be. I can easily dispose of everybody on board if you want to be alone, master. No, I didn't wish to kill anyone. Not even Bastila? No! I just needed to get away. But surely Canderous would be an asset? I could let him in on our plan, I'm sure the Mandalorian could make himself useful... No, I couldn't trust anyone. HK-47 was programmed to serve his master – me - but trusting a sentient was baring your back for the dagger to find its way home. If I don't trust anyone, then I'll never care for anyone.

I scowled, and stamped down on my chaotic thoughts. These days I couldn't always pick the difference between Street Kid and Evil Bitch, but I knew which one was the more powerful. Hatred and rage fuel the Force. One of these days, when I finally could use the Force predictably, I was going to track down whatever Jedi had screwed with my mind and have a few words. At the end of a lightsaber.

"Exiting hyperspace," Carth's voice rang over the ship's speakers. I felt the queer sensation ripple through my body as the ship slowed back into realspace. It's almost time. HK had assured me that he was skilled enough to make sure no one would be hurt in the upcoming explosion, though he had sounded disapproving.

I stood, and wandered through the Ebon Hawk's corridors, lounging just outside the cockpit. Bastila had re-taken her seat as co-pilot; I wasn’t interested in picking another fight. Between planning my escape and hiding my rage from Bastila, I'd had more than enough mental strain to cope with.

I watched as an incoming transmission bleeped on one of the consoles. Carth leaned over to activate it, and I wondered briefly what his reaction would be after I had successfully escaped; away from them all, at last. He'd never trust me again. Well, it's not like he ever trusted me in the first place.

"This is Manaan Spaceport Control. Identify yourself," a crackly voice streamed from the transmission, followed by an interpretation in a low, garbled language. I stiffened a little when I realized I could understand the words. That's Selkath! Is there any language I don't understand? Thus far, the Sand People dialect had been the only one.

"This is Captain Onasi of the Ebon Hawk, requesting clearance to land," Carth answered succinctly.

"State your reasons for entering Manaan airspace, Captain Onasi," the voice shot back.

"I thought you said we were expected, Carth," Bastila interrupted. Carth glanced at her in brief irritation, and then responded.

"We are rendezvousing with the Republic embassy in Ahto City."

A pause, and then the crackly voice responded, "you are expected, Captain Onasi. Transmitting your atmospheric entry code and landing coordinates. You have been assigned a Republic docking bay by the request of the Republic Commander Wann."

I slouched in the open doorway as Carth flicked off the communications channel. No doubt the hangar will be lined with Republic officers. And Bastila's little friend. But I kept the thought small; I was not going to let her have an inkling of my plans. Not yet.

She must have sensed something then, for she turned her head sharply. Her aristocratic face dissolved into a fake, forced smile. I sent one just as genuine back to her.

The large blue planet of Manaan dominated the view out of the cockpit, and I realized I'd better sit down. Things would be getting interesting very soon.

"Jen, sit down and buckle up, would you?" Carth said, echoing my thoughts.

I rolled my eyes and sat in the small, undersized chair behind Carth and Bastila. "As you wish, Captain flyboy," I said sweetly. He turned to shoot me a dry look, but his attention was taken again by the incoming transmission of landing coordinates.

Bastila sighed softly, her dark head resting back on the co-pilot's chair. Black space slowly dissolved into the dark blue of the outer atmosphere. "I will be glad to land," she murmured softly.

I just bet you will, you lying traitor.

Jen? She hadn't heard me, but she'd sensed something. I needed to keep control of myself.

I said, so will I, I answered within the confines of our bond.

I saw Carth reach over to flick to the repulsorlift engines as we entered the atmosphere, and I braced myself in readiness. A loud explosion boomed through the ship, and I was slung sideways as the Ebon Hawk shuddered at the impact. A myriad of blinking, glaring lights dotted the consoles, punctuated by the piercing wail of warning sirens. Bastila screamed in shock, and I felt my stomach rise as the ship began to plummet.

"Damn, the engines!" Carth yelled, his hands moving instinctively over various dials and warning lights.

I could hear Mission screaming in fright from the common room.

"What's going on?" Bastila gasped, leaning forward as Carth struggled to find the cause.

"Some sort of explosion! It's taken out two thirds of the repulsorlifts!" Carth frantically flicked over several of the dials. "I'm switching back to the sublight drive!"

I fervently hoped HK was as good as he'd assured me. He'd sworn he could disable the ship well enough to force a landing in water, but not too badly so anyone would get hurt in the process. You'd better be telling the truth, you psychotic bucket of bolts. Otherwise I'll pull you apart and smelt you piece by piece.

Carth hurriedly initiated the faster ion engines, and the whir of the Ebon Hawk's twin turbine compressors built steadily to a high-pitched scream, but did nothing to alleviate our rapid fall.

"What the-?" Carth shouted in surprise, "I've got no power!"

"Why? What's going on?!" Bastila gasped, terror colouring her tone.

"Sithspit! The particle accelerator's offline!"

The ship was shuddering under the outward pressure of our descent, and I clutched tightly onto the arms of my chair. What have I done? Am I truly insane? Carth swore further when he realized the backup accelerator was also down, rendering the engine useless. The small, perfectly placed explosives HK had organized had certainly done their job. He may not be an expert at slicing into computers, but he sure knows how to disable a ship.

The dark blue Manaan sky was slowly growing a lighter colour as we plummeted further into the depths of the atmosphere. I could hear Canderous calling Carth a few choice names from further back in the ship. Carth flicked back to the repulsorlifts, and the few engines still functional struggled against the Ebon Hawk's mass, as he desperately dragged upwards on the steering column. I did, however, notice a decrease in our rapid downwards acceleration.

"We'll have to make a forced landing in the ocean, Ahto City is too far away!" Carth immediately opened a communications channel to request help. It was time for me to get ready.

I unbuckled myself and stood up, stumbling against the wall as the ship shuddered. The persistent whine of overworking repulsorlifts thrummed weakly underneath my feet. HK had assured me there would be enough power to make a relatively safe crash landing in the ocean, but not enough for the Ebon Hawk to reach Ahto City.

"Jen?! Where are you going?" Bastila shrieked as I careened through the doorway.

"Going to get Teethree and see if he can figure out what's going on!" I yelled back, hoping Bastila wouldn't realize that T3 was probably already doing that. As quickly as I could, I exited the room.

"Hold tight!" Carth's voice shot over the ship's intercom, and the Ebon Hawk lurched to the side. I slammed my head into the corridor wall, and cursed the flyboy underneath my breath. No doubt he was trying to maneuver for the safest landing position, but it certainly made it hard to walk.
I deliberately avoided the common room, heading straight towards the back of the ship. HK was there, waiting for me.

"Statement: Everything is going according to plan, master. The Ebon Hawk should be landing some twenty miles outside Ahto City."

The ship rocked again, and Carth warned us over the speakers to brace for landing. Loose tools and gadgets were rolling on the dull durasteel floor, and I struggled to keep from tripping over them. It's time. HK had opened one of the tiny escape pods in preparation, and I clambered into it.

"You know what to do next, HK?" I reiterated as I buckled myself in tightly. Why do they have to make these things so small?

"Answer: Yes, master. This escape pod should eject directly towards Ahto City. I will fire off the other escape pods simultaneously, using the last one for myself. Suggestion: Please take care of your weak watery shell, master. I am beginning to like you." The intense red glare of HK's robotic eyes stared at me eerily, and he pulled the door closed.

Of course he likes me. I've just ordered him to sabotage a ship. He'd probably love me if I allowed him to kill someone in the process.

My insides threatened to slam into my throat as the Ebon Hawk crashed into the ocean, and my bones almost seemed to creak in the process. The ship lifted upwards, partly due to a rebound effect and partially to the power of the remaining engines, and I had a brief, vivid vision of a rock skimming across a lake. HK activated the escape pod, and the sudden sideways acceleration yanked my head to the side of the pod, slamming it fiercely into the metal. Not again....

... The wind lifted my hair, and brought the familiar smell of decaying, rotting rubbish to my nostrils. A muddy brown lake of what once may have been called water stretched out in front of me, and I idly stared as a small stone skimmed off the surface.

"Told ya I was better," I said smugly, clenching my fist full of flat stones and cylindrical credit chips that had been phased out years ago in favour of the plastic electronic type.

"No fair, I've only had three goes and you've had about five." A boy was standing next to me, scowling sulkily at his defeat. He was perhaps thirteen or fourteen years old, and grime matted his spiky dark hair to his skull.

"Sore loser." I stuck my tongue out at him. "You jus' can't admit that I'm better at everything."

"Man, how many times have I heard that tripe?"

"Oh yeah? Prove that it's tripe then! Bet you can't catch me!" I challenged, and turned to sprint away, dropping the stones in my haste. The lake, a rotten pool of sewerage, drained from the richer parts of the city behind the controlled walls that separated it from the Western Underground, the forgotten slam where the Uncitizens lived. Echoing footsteps chased me as I turned into an alley between crumbling, abandoned warehouses. I knew all the routes, gave them names in my head. Right into Sunrider's Way. Jump the ledge down to Exar's gutter. Shimmy my way down to Corellia's tunnel. Through there, and I'd have a bunch of choices as it opened up into a maze of alleys I called the Spider.

Gaunt faces stared as me as I sprinted through littered steets, where poverty trapped me within its confines. Altizir was one of many cities on Talshion, but I'd never left it. The homeless were herded and trapped within the confines of the Western Underground. I'd always dreamed of leaving Talshion, to fly amongst the stars. One day, I would. That was a promise I repeated on those nights when there was no food other than grubs to be found, and I lay listening to old man Freeflight's fantastical stories about battles long gone and dreams of the future.

Jen?

I turned into a lightless, murky tunnel, which Freeflight told me used to be a transport lane back when Altizir was a young city. I leaned against the wall, and contained my heaving breaths. I couldn't hear footsteps anymore, and a wry smile curved my lips in the darkness. I can still outrun him, even now. Outrun and out-steal him. Though we always worked better as a team.

I was yanked abruptly forward, and landed with a thud against someone's chest, gasping in surprise.

"Gotcha!" His tone was victorious, and he held me tightly. My gut burned in surprise, and I was sharply reminded of all the forbidden thoughts I'd been having lately. No. We are friends. That's all!

"You forget, little gal, that I know all your hiding places."

"Don't call me that, you know I hate it," I said automatically, struggling to escape. His arms tightened around me, and I wished desperately for some light in the abandoned tunnel. He's gonna tickle me, dammit! Something touched my mouth then, and I stiffened in shock when I realized it was his lips.

"Wha-what are you doing?" I gasped, pulling back slightly.

Jen? Wake up! Where are you?

"It's always been us against the world." His voice was low, soft. A finger was tracing my cheek gently. "This is only natural. We've always had each other's back. You and me - we fit together. Tell me you feel it too."

"Miss? Are you alright?"

"But-" I wanted this, didn't I?

"She's out cold. Help me out; we'll have to get her back to base before the blasted Selkath get here."

The finger trailed under my chin, and lifted it. My lips parted in surprise, before his gently covered mine.

Jen, curse you! How could you do this to us?

"She's moaning, sir. I think she might be waking."

…

Someone nudged against my torso, and agony blossomed throughout my skull. Where am I? My eyes flew open, and painful sunlight sparked into my vision, causing me to abruptly close them again.

"Miss?" a strong, male voice repeated, and full awareness slammed into me. Kath crap! I've got to get away from whoever these guys are! "It's alright Miss, we're Republic officers. You're safe Damn, I really don't have much luck with escape pods. I hesitantly opened my eyes again, and forced a nervous, scared look on my face. My vision slowly righted itself, and I noticed I was still strapped into the escape pod. The bright blue Manaan sky glared cheerfully from behind the wholesome Republic soldier who was leaning over me, checking me for injuries.

"Ugh, where am I?" I said in a groggy voice, keeping up the helpless act for now. The fierce pounding in my head receded marginally, but it still felt as though a fusioncutter was drilling a hole into my skull.

"You've landed on the shore outside the Ahto City dome, miss. We're going to bring you to safety now." Oh really? His voice was helpful yet slightly authoritative, and brooked no arguments – particularly from injured damsels in distress. I curbed a strong desire to Force push him into the depths of the Manaan Ocean.

Jen? Are you awake? What have you done?

I had to act quickly. My hands flew to unbuckle my body, and I jerked upwards, staring out around me. My escape pod had made it to the rocky shores that bordered Ahto City. The large dome City itself rose impressively near my landing, miles high into the sky. Various openings of the dome allowed interstellar traffic as well as local ocean explorers access to the rest of the planet, which was merely miles of fish-infested saltwater. Two Republic officers, who'd obviously tracked my landing and hastened to rescue me – or capture me? – were standing over me with concerned expressions.

I noticed their speeders parked nearby on the stony beach. No, these aren't normal landspeeders. I looked closely at the relatively small vehicles, and realized they had been designed to travel over vast distances of water. Rescue bikes of some description. Considering HK had fired off all the escape pods, Republic soldiers were probably using these contraptions to track them all down. I'm surprised the Selkath didn't get here first. Carth must have got an emergency transmission off to his base.

I looked the first officer straight in the eye. "This escape pod was empty when you found it," I said clearly, succinctly, wrapping the Force around my words tightly as I climbed out of the capsule. This, at least, was one trick I could now do consistently. I felt the power wrap around the second soldier also.

"The, uh, escape pod was empty," the man mumbled at me, and I turned to face the second soldier.

"Your speeder broke down, and is inoperable. You are forced to travel double on your comrade's speeder." I kept the Force tightly interleaved with my words, and Bastila's seething anger grew within the bond.

You are ignoring me! And using the Force! If you think I am going to let you just waltz away like that- curse you!

The soldier blinked at me like a stunned gizka, his mouth working slowly. "My, uh, speeder’s broken. I, uh, guess I'd better ride double on yours, Stirwin."

Quickly, I whirled around and grabbed items out of the escape pod. HK had done his best to store what he termed meatbag necessities into the tiny pod, and the backpack full of protein bars, credits, grenades and a spare blaster would definitely be useful. My two ex-Sith lightsabers still hung at my sides, reassuringly. I took a step towards the closest rescue bike, and then faced the soldiers once "You'd better go and report to – to whoever you need to report to. The pod was empty, and one of your speeders broke down." I slammed the Force harder into my words, pointing towards one of the rescue bikes.

"We should report back to Captain Gilies," one of them mumbled.

"Uh, yeah, he should know the escape pod was empty. Let's go."

I smirked to myself smugly as I mounted the closest speeder.

Answer me! Bastila's latest mental shriek rang through my head, and then my senses dulled. My vision lost sharpness, and the tang of salt from the sea became a touch more faint. The piercing throb from my bruised skull, however, increased in severity. With a sense of horror and mounting rage, I realized just what she had done.

You think you can cut me off from the Force, you traitorous, lying scow? I physically snarled as I punched the ignition, the roaring engine of the speeder as it hummed to life echoing the pounding in my head. The two soldiers were staring blankly, dazedly, at the escape pod, and I briefly wondered if I'd used too strong a dose on them.

You said you would not run! You- you endangered us all, you could have killed us with that crazy stunt! You cannot be trusted to wield the Force!

A fierce, burning fury grew deep inside me. I should have ordered HK to kill that schutta. I slammed defiantly against her mental walls, but they wouldn't budge. I wondered whether I could sense a faint sensation of satisfaction emanating from her mental presence, and my rage intensified. No time to try and break Bastila's hold. I don't need the Force now, I need to get away! I will not let her make me lose control, sod it all! Focus! I needed to get into Ahto City and meet Hulas before anyone else found me. In retaliation, I kicked her out of my mind and closed the metaphorical door. Maybe she can cut me off from the Force for now, but I refuse to listen to anymore of her incessant shrieking.

I sped away from the crash site, glad this bike was more solid and stable than a swoop. It wasn’t my favourite way of travelling, I knew, as I turned it towards the gleaming jewel of Ahto City. Gleaming jewel, hah. This place was a pacifistic slime pit the last time I came here. The last time? Salt stung my eyes as the bike whipped over sand and stone, and I wondered just which identity had travelled to Manaan.

Well, that dream I just had was definitely Street Kid. Had her favourite boyfriend in it yet again, and I was getting a little sick of the reruns. It's not like I have all day to reflect on the sentimental ramblings of Street Kid. I wondered if that part of me was getting as pathetic as Jen was. There's nothing pathetic about feeling for someone. It makes you stronger, it makes you a better person. I scowled, and wished I could push out all the voices in my head, along with Bastila's.

The translucent dome of Ahto City dominated my sight as I flew closer. Almost there. Now all I have to do is find this Hulas, and get off this hole of a planet.

xXx
I gripped tightly onto the edge of the long maroon benches that graced the Ebon Hawk's common room as the ship shot out of hyperspace. I was not yet accustomed to that queasy, nauseous sensation, and it did nothing to alleviate the gnawing hunger in my empty belly.

"Ugh," Mission muttered next to me. "Don't think I'll ever get used to that feeling. It's so weird."

I nodded in agreement with my young charge; she was curled up next to me, rifling through her pazaak deck. I was just glad we had finally reached Manaan, and soon I would be standing upon unmoving ground again.

Mission looked up at Canderous briefly. The Mandalorian was sitting opposite us, engrossed in what he was doing; which appeared to be pulling his heavy repeating blaster to bits. The leap from hyperspace into realspace hadn't affected his concentration at all; obviously Canderous had spent some time in space before.

"Canderous, want a game of pazaak?" Mission asked eagerly, waving her deck in what she probably thought was an enticing gesture. Canderous glanced up briefly, snorted once, and then looked down at the parts of his gun which were currently decorating the bare table in the centre of the room.

"No thanks, kid," he muttered, snapping a new power pack into his gun. "You probably cheat."

"Cheat?" Mission sniffed, glaring at him. "I do not! Well- only if I have to. And stop calling me a kid, you old geezer!"

I groaned inwardly as Mission shot her mouth off once more. Does she have to argue with Canderous? He is probably the only one here who will take offence. I did not wish to go up against the Mandalorian, but sometimes Mission acted as if it were a given. To my utter surprise, Canderous merely chuckled and then proceeded to ignore her.

Mission poked her tongue out, but when that achieved no response she sighed heavily. I knew the sheer boredom of the space journey had begun eating at her nerves, but I longed for the day when she would develop some patience. She then turned hopeful eyes on me.

"What about it, Big Z? Wanna play to pass the time?"

"(Mission, we are almost there.)" I reminded her. We were already in Manaan airspace, it would not be long before we landed. Already I could hear the winding down of the ion engines, to be replaced by the steady hum of the repulsorlifts. Soon I could get some food.

"Aww, come on! It's not- " Mission's words were cut off by a loud explosion that rocked the ship, tossing us wildly from side to side. Mission screamed in terror, and I landed on her forcibly. Wailing emergency sirens bit into my hearing. Mission!

"Get off me!" Mission shrieked, struggling underneath me in fear. I felt the sickening rush of descent, and realized in horror that the ship was falling. Frantically I clawed for the safety belts that lined the benches, yanking one tightly around the squirming Twi'lek and belting her in.
"Haar'chak! My kriffing gun!" Canderous yelled angrily over the sirens as the dismantled pieces of his gun clattered across the floor, and joined the other loose cargo that was rolling chaotically underneath our feet. Mission's pazaak cards flew from her hand across the room, and I saw a handful of them whack into the Mandalorian's face as he struggled to get up. He cursed again, and thumped noisily into the table. "What's that Republic idiot doing? Getting spiced up to land?"

A high-pitched whirring from the sublight engines initiating once more competed with the shrieking sirens for dominance, but if anything the plummeting of the ship increased. Mission screamed again, and I dragged myself off her, hurriedly searching the worn benches for another belt. My empty stomach heaved and protested, and I swallowed the acrid, sharp taste that had risen in my throat. Canderous had starting cursing in his own language; I could not understand a word, and was rather glad Mission could not as well.

The whirring noise dissipated, to be replaced with the struggling hum of the repulsorlifts that had failed earlier. The ship was still falling rapidly, but the descent seemed less severe. Whatever happened, it took out some of the repulsorlift engines, and disabled the sublight drive. Had someone sabotaged the ship? Carth Onasi had hired mechanics to fix it back on Tatooine – could something have happened there?

"Hold tight!" Carth's voice yelled from the intercom, although it was something I did not need to be told. Canderous had finally returned to his senses, and was settling himself on the opposite bench, bracing for whatever came next.

Mission shrieked as the ship thumped solidly into what I presumed was the ocean, and I felt the impact jar my very bones. The restraining belt bit deeply into my waist, and I was glad of the restriction; otherwise I would be rolling on the floor amongst the other cargo.

Canderous had managed to belt himself in also, but he made a frantic grab for a part of his gun as it rolled idly by his feet. He had stopped cursing, but I saw a hard, angry glint in his steel-grey eyes.

I could feel the Ebon Hawk slow down as it landed a second time into the ocean, and breathed out a sigh of relief. It could have been worse. Fortunately Mission is okay. If only I knew where Jen was.

"Rescue won't be far away," Carth Onasi's voice broadcasted throughout the ship. "I've contacted the Republic forces, so just hang tight guys- hey! What the-? The escape pods are ejecting!" The transmission cut off abruptly, just in time for me to hear a choice word from Bastila I did not expect.

Escape pods? Jen? No, it could not be her; she would not run like this. I knew of her desire to leave – particularly to break off contact with Bastila Shan – but she would not do so without my companionship. I had sworn a life-debt to her after all, and Mission was becoming rather attached to the slightly unbalanced human. I must make sure.

I turned to face Mission, who was pale and gasping, and laid an arm on her shoulder. The ship's movement had slowed considerably, and was now merely heaving from side to side. "(I will be right back, Mission.)"

She nodded, and gave me a weak smile. Sometimes I marveled at how brave the young girl was.

"Well I, for one, want to know exactly what happened, and why we've got a crazy idiot for a pilot," the Mandalorian growled from the other side of the room, as he rose to pick up the remaining pieces of his blaster. I ignored him as I stood, personally believing that Carth Onasi had done a respectable job of landing, considering the damage that explosion seemed to have inflicted on the Ebon Hawk's engines. The Mandalorian was smart enough to realize that, so perhaps he was merely looking for a target to curse.

I picked my way gingerly over datapads, blaster pieces and pazaak cards that were sprawled over the durasteel floor. The unsteady bobbing of the ship compromised my progress as I left the room, and further increased the gnawing sensation in my stomach. For all that I was hungry, the idea of a meal was beginning to lose its appeal.

I could feel the weak hum of the surviving engines underneath my feet, and surmised that the ship had just enough power to stay marginally above the water. As I neared the cockpit room, I heard raised voices.

"What do you mean, Jen's in one of the escape pods?" Carth's voice; unnaturally high and angry.
No! It could not be true, could it? Horror slammed into me. Mission will be heart-broken. She has only just lost Griff. And I had a life-debt to honour.

"She is running. She is also unconscious, I can feel it." Bastila Shan's voice was tightly clipped, but I could hear a blend of panic and anger in the aristocratic tones.

"Feel it? Is this that bond she was waffling about?"

"I-I am surprised she spoke of it. It is true, we share a mind-link of sorts." Bastila sounded as if she'd rather sleep in a sarlaac pit. My hackles rose at her tone. She was a Jedi – someone to be respected – but I did not like the antagonism between her and Jen. Jen ran! I have to find her!

"But if she's in the escape pods- do you mean to say that Jen caused the explosion?" Carth said in disbelief, his voice choking.

"Of course she did! Do you think it occurred all by itself?" Bastila snapped.

"No, but I- dammit! Damn that traitorous woman! I knew I couldn't trust her, I knew she was crazy, but how could she do something like this? We could have died!"

A howl wrenched itself from my lungs, born out of misery and anger combined. I owe a life-debt to you, Jen Sahara! How could you dishonour me by running? Bastila and Carth jumped in their seats at the sound, and turned to stare at me in surprise. Bastila opened her mouth to say something, but a piercing beep from the controls grabbed her attention.

"Good," Carth muttered, turning back to the consoles. "Looks like our rescue has arrived. There's a Class-A salvage craft above us; moving into position to pick us up." He frowned. "I'm surprised they didn't announce their presence first."

"(We have to get Jen!)" I howled in distress. Bastila turned to nod at me, and I could see the worry darkening her eyes.

"We will, Zaalbar. We will find her," she told me softly.

Carth flicked a few switches and opened a communication channel. "This is Captain Onasi of the Ebon Hawk. Might we know who our rescuers are?"

There was no response. Our quiet waiting was interrupted by an abrupt jarring of the entire ship, as something clunked loudly onto the hull. That must be the towing clamps. Bastila gave out a little gasp at the movement.

"Hello? This is the Ebon Hawk, can you respond?" Carth repeated, and the Ebon Hawk was jerked to the side as another magnetic towing clamp latched onto the ship. I was pushed against the chrome doorway at the movement.

"Alright, what's going on? I always knew the Republic were lousy fighters and worse pilots, but you really take the cake, Blaster Boy," Canderous drawled behind me. Carth stiffened, but to his credit did not even turn around.

"They're not answering. This isn't good, a rescue team should be checking on the survivors before towing the ship away," Carth muttered as he scanned over the readouts. Another two clunks sounded against the Ebon Hawk's hull; and as the ship was yanked upwards I stumbled back into the Mandalorian. Canderous grumbled as I straightened myself abruptly.

"It is either the Selkath or the Republic, surely," Bastila said. "Who else would be rescuing us? Perhaps they simply do not have adequate transmissions onboard."

"Yeah, now that sounds plausible," Canderous said sarcastically, and I wondered if the Mandalorian was trying to pick a fight.

"But he has a point. Even the lowliest vehicle has a transmission device.

I saw Carth tap something into the communications console, and lean forward to speak again. "Republic HQ, this is Captain Onasi of the Ebon Hawk. Can you acknowledge?"

The crackle of static filled the room, broken quickly by the response. "Captain Onasi, we have received your distress signal and are on our way."

The noise of engines directly above us was ominous, and the Ebon Hawk began to lift upwards. I stumbled again, and this time made a grab for the tiny seat directly behind Bastila. It did not adequately fit my frame, but it was better than continually falling into the Mandalorian's arms.

"Republic HQ, your salvage craft has already picked us up, but is not responding to our communications," Carth said flatly into the receiver. I heard a tone of worry enter his voice, and felt my hackles rise.

"Uh- Captain Onasi? Our salvage fleet is en route to your ship and the escape pods we detected. We are approximately ten minutes away from your destination," the response cut through the air, and Carth's shoulders tensed. The Ebon Hawk continued to be dragged upwards.

"Repeat – we have already been picked up," Carth stated. "If not by you, then who?"

"A moment, Captain Onasi," the response fired back. "We are scanning the area."

"It must be the Selkath," Bastila said softly. "If it's not the Republic, then it has to be the Selkath. Right?"

Carth shook his head angrily. "The Selkath would at least respond to our transmissions. I don't recognize the make of this ship, but it reminds me of -"

"Captain Onasi?" A different voice crackled over the speakers, and I peered worriedly at the consoles. Ship technology I was unfamiliar with, but the green dots seemed to blink a warning at me. "This is Lieutenant Waltzar of the Salvage Freighter Oceanic Bounty; we are on our way."

An angry sigh expelled from the Republic pilot, as he leaned forward to respond once more. "Lieutenant Waltzar, we are already being towed! By what appears to be a Sith freighter!"

"The Sith?" Bastila exclaimed in horror, and I felt my muscles tense. From everything I'd seen on Taris, the Sith were people to be avoided. And I doubted they would take a liking to either Bastila or Carth. Or Jen. Wherever she is. Why did you run, Jen? Why?

"Nice landing, Republic," Canderous drawled behind me. "Right into the laps of the Sith."

Lieutenant Waltzar's voice shot back from the console. "Captain Onasi, we are aware of the situation, and are dealing with it. Sit tight, we will be there soon." The transmission was abruptly cut off, and Carth cursed under his breath.

"Sit tight? While we're dragged away by the Sith?" Carth muttered angrily.

"The Sith," Bastila repeated. I caught a pale, shocked look on her face as she blinked rapidly. "No. Jen, what have you done?"

"Jen?" Canderous barked in confusion. "What's she got to do with anything?"

Bastila was holding a hand over her mouth, her face devoid of colour. "They will not take me," she said softly as a new sort of determination appeared in her eyes. "They will not."

"Now that's the sort of attitude I like to hear," Canderous said in approval. "If the Sith want us, we'll give them a worthy battle."

Bastila yanked off her safety harness, and stood upright in the crowded cockpit, removing her lightsaber from her belt. "I will not be captured again! Carth, open the top hatch."

"Are you crazy?" Carth stared in her in surprise. "Sit down! It's not like you can do anything."

"I will not just sit by and let the Sith capture me, Carth!" Bastila clenched her hand tightly over her deactivated lightsaber, and started to climb over my legs that were jutting into the middle of the cockpit. I looked at her apologetically as I tried to move out of the way. "If I have to climb outside and cut through those towing clamps myself, then so be it!"

"Bastila! There's no way you can hold on to the top of the ship! You'll fall into the ocean!" Carth protested, his voice rising in confused desperation.

"Republic's right," Canderous grated, but to my surprise he actually sounded a little admiring. "You ain't gonna do nothing up there bar feed the fishies."

A cold, determined look tightened the Jedi's face. "You both underestimate how the Force can aid me. I cannot let the Sith capture me. Carth – you of all people should understand that!"

"Bastila – wait!" Carth called desperately as the impassive Jedi moved passed Canderous in the doorway. "There's another salvage craft coming near! I think it's the Republic."

I saw Bastila tense, and turn back around.

"Well, don't just sit there," Canderous growled. "Find out what they're gonna do about this."

"Who's piloting this ship, Mandalorian?" Carth snapped. My shoulders drooped at the incessant bickering. Why is everyone fighting? If Jen was here, she'd probably laugh at them all. Why did you run, Jen?

Carth flicked on more of the communication channels, and static filled the room, followed quickly by angry voices.

"Halt!" came the voice of the Republic Lieutenant Carth had spoken to earlier. "This is Lieutenant Waltzar of the Republic. You are stealing Republic property. We demand that you release the Ebon Hawk at once."

A different, lower voice replied, "we are a salvage crew for the Sith empire. You know the rules of salvage – first in, first served."

"None of them will budge. And we're the prize," Carth muttered. I felt a strong desire to check on Mission, but considering my precarious place on the chair I decided to stay put.

"The rules of salvage do not apply to survivors, Sith scum! This is Manaan – theft is dealt with justly! Hand over the ship!" Waltzar's proper tone had turned angry over the transmission.

"This is not theft, you weak Republic idiot! The Ebon Hawk is the flagship of the late Davik Kang – an entrepreneur who owes the Sith Empire a sizeable amount of cash. We are taking his ship as compensation, and if you try to stop us we will consider it an act of hostility." The responder sounded smug, and I felt the growing of fear claw within me.

"You try to take our people hostage and we will be forced to fire on you!" Lieutenant Waltzer shrieked, all vestiges of control gone.

Carth winced. "Someone has to teach that boy the fine art of diplomacy."

"We ain't gonna get out of this without a fight," Canderous commented.

No more fighting. I just wanted a little bit of peace, time to relax and bring that cheeky smile back to Mission's face. And time to find Jen. I must find her.

"Hey!" Carth said in surprise. "There's another squad of ships heading this way. A host of them. One's a light starfighter. Heh, we're certainly attracting attention." For all that his tone was light, Carth did not really sound amused.

"Desist your hostilities at once!" a different voice sounded through the computers, and this one appeared to have as much trouble speaking Basic as I did understanding it. The voice was low and jumbled, like someone who understood that thrown-together language well, but could not quite reproduce all the sounds. I know exactly how that feels. "This is Leader Al'hini of the Ahto City Civil Authority. Violence will not be tolerated! Release the ship in question!"

"Well, ain't this turning into quite the tea party," Canderous drawled.

"What is going on?" the quiet voice of the Cathar emanated from further behind the Mandalorian, crowding out the doorway into the cockpit. Bastila crawled over me once more to resume her place in the co-pilot's chair.

"Leader Al'hini, this is Captain Jerome of the Sith Empire. We are towing this freighter against the debt that the late Davi-

"We heard your reasons, Captain, we have been listening," the Selkath cut in impatiently. "You will not violate the Manaan neutrality laws! This will be judged at the courts. For now, the Ebon Hawk will be impounded, and its occupants are free to stay where they wish."

"Impounded?" Carth burst out disbelievingly, and flicked on the transmission. "This is Captain Onasi of the Ebon Hawk, and this is my ship! The Sith can't just come-

"Captain Onasi, you're arguments can be heard in the Ahto City courts. You will be fully entitled to an arbiter when the time comes. For now, everybody disperse! We will tow the Ebon Hawk back to Ahto City."

"Bloody Sith," Canderous muttered behind me, but I wondered if I heard a faint tone of amused respect in the warrior's gravelly voice.

xXx

Carth angrily chased all of us out of the crowded cockpit, and we sat silently in the Ebon Hawk's circular common room, a gloomy quiet residing over everybody as the ship was slowly tugged to shore. Even Bastila, after failing to contact some person called Karon, had been yelled at to leave. The Republic pilot seemed to feel the effects of Jen's betrayal deeply, if his temper was anything to go by.

"I can't believe she'd do this," Mission whispered brokenly next to me. A fist clenched my heart at her voice. Why, Jen? You knew how awful Mission had been feeling. You must have known how she would react to this. How well did I really know this strange human I was indebted to?

"She is running." Juhani interrupted softly, and I stared at the Cathar warily. "Running from anything that will make her face herself." Juhani lowered her voice, and whispered under her breath, her shoulders tensing, "running from the Dark Side."

I stiffened as the words filtered through my ears. I doubted anyone else had caught the Cathar's sentence, but a Wookiee's hearing was naturally sensitive. Is this Juhani correct? Is this all about the Force? Jen Sahara had not been trained to be a Jedi, and yet suddenly she was wielding awesome power blindly, without control. And her rage... Is she running because she fears the Dark Side? Or worse....? I had to find her. I had a duty- I was obligated to help her. I will find you, Jen Sahara. I will stand by your side, and help you with your battles. But how much could a Wookiee do against the mystical, frightening power of the Force?

"But why? Why did she leave without me?" Mission's voice was pitifully weak. "I trusted her."

"That's the problem with trust. It always gets broken," Carth stated coldly from the doorway. Bastila stared up at him, and threw a pointed look back towards the cockpit. He shrugged. "I have no engines, and we're being towed. There's not much I can do in there other than wear out the seats." He barked a harsh laugh, but his eyes were bleak. "Well, at least we're still alive. I'm not sure if we were meant to live through that explosion."

"Don't add stupidity to your other faults, Republic," Canderous snapped angrily. Even the tough, unflappable Mandalorian seemed upset. "If she wanted to kill us, I'd say we'd be pretty dead by now. Well, you lot would be," he grunted, and threw aside the blaster he had been toying with. 'I'd like to punch her for this as much as the next guy, but she deliberately didn't kill us. HK's missing, ain't he? I'd bet my last cigarra that these explosives were precisely placed so as not to hurt us."

"I will find Jen," Bastila muttered, seemingly to herself. Again, another sentence that I doubted anyone else in the room heard. "She will not escape."

The hairs on my back stood up as I stared at the Jedi. Escape? Jen wished to leave Bastila Shan, I knew, but Bastila almost made it sound as if Jen were a prisoner. Mission always believed the Jedi had another agenda. I had wondered myself, particularly when Jen had been acting so strange back on Taris. What do the Jedi want with Jen? I understood that she was a Force user who needed tuition, but at times her circumstances seemed far more ominous.

Mission stuffed her hands in her pockets, and curled her legs up on the battered bench next to me.
I'd made her wear the safety belts once more, although considering the slow crawl with which we were being towed to safety, it didn't really matter. "Guess it's just you and me again, Big Z," she muttered, a distraught frown pleating her young face. "At least I know I can count on you."

"(We will find Jen,)" I rumbled softly, reassuringly.

Mission shrugged, and I saw a stubborn, mulish look pass over her face. "If she wants to be on her own, then let her. We would've followed if she asked. I don't need her."

Her words, although defiant, failed to cover up the misery in her tone. I did not often feel angry, but I was starting to. I wanted to shake Jen for the pain she was causing Mission, but part of me wondered at Jen's reasons for running. Maybe she had just cause. "(I must find her, Mission. I have a life-debt to honour.)" But if Jen was running from Bastila, then I couldn't trust the Jedi for help. I would have to find Jen by myself.

"If you can find her. I don't think she'll wanna be found," Mission shot back. I saw Bastila blanch at the words, and wondered myself. Where have you gone, Jen Sahara? How can I aid you if you run away? I would not leave Mission; could not leave the only person who believed in me. But the heavy weight of the life-debt dogged me with obligation.

How do you find someone who does not wish to be found? And what will I do if I cannot find her?

xXx
The clinical chrome walls of Ahto City surrounded me as I walked down one of the circular corridors that branched through the place like the spokes of a centrifugal space station. The entire city had a stark, utilitarian feel to it that reminded me gloomily of a med-clinic; albeit without the lingering tang of bacta. The utter lack of litter, graffiti - even so much as a speck of dirt - made me feel like a raggy trespasser roaming unwanted through a pristine dream. The dull pounding from my head dogged me with each step, merely adding to my detached, numb state of being.

The Selkath sure do like it clean and stark around here. There were no lurid neon signs, hopeful beggars, or dark strangers doing dark deals in corners. Considering the plain attire of the people walking cautiously past me, it wasn't because I was in the rich side of town. This entire city is one controlled, unreal place. I didn't like it.

But people were people; no doubt crimes were committed, information exchanged, spice sold – like on any other planet. In Ahto City, one just had to be a little more discreet.

Small flying service droids buzzed over the heads of sentients, ostensibly to keep an eye on things. My vision snagged on the cameras hung high into the gleaming silver walls, and I restrained the urge to tug my hood down lower. Good thing HK had the foresight to suggest I wear concealing clothing over my armour. I had no idea if the Selkath would be tracking me – would this Master Karon's influence extend that far? I fought down the rage brewing in my gut; the mere thought of her or Bastila was enough to tear at the edges of my fragile control. Priorities. Focus on getting off Manaan first.

But thoughts of the crew warred for prominence; a masochistic side of me kept imagining Mission's reaction when she found out I'd left. Stop it. It's not like I really betrayed them. The crash won't have hurt anyone. But I knew how Mission would see it, so soon after facing up to the scummy nature of her cowardly brother. I'd had half a mind to stay on Tatooine, find Griff, and beat him to a satisfyingly bloody pulp. Mission was a weakness. It is better that I left her behind. Weaknesses should be shed.

The corridor exited into a sweeping, open courtyard; sunlight pouring in from the heavens through the dome above. The atmosphere within the city's enclosure was both warm and overly humid; making it mildly unpleasant to wear clothes let alone armour. The Selkath are a reptilian creature. This city is probably climate-controlled for their comfort.

A sharp spike of pain stabbed at the side of my head; remnants from the recent knock in the escape pod. I rubbed a hand through my messy curls, grimacing. I'd had enough head injuries to last a lifetime, and while the latest was no more than a mild concussion and superficial bruising, I could've done without the residual dizziness.

It'd certainly made the speeder trip back to Ahto City a challenge.

I'd managed to dump the rescue bike quickly and hightail it out of the commercial port before being questioned by any of the authorities, but as soon as I'd made it into the Selkath City itself, I'd almost fainted.
Concussion is what I really don't need right now. A passing Aqualish glared at me in suspicion, and I realized I was still clutching my head. I slapped a more composed look on my face, dropped the hand, and moved on. I'm a mess. My arm ached, still weak from the fracture back on Tatooine, aggravated by the violent humming of the speeder's unstable steering. I've got to pull myself together and actually appear competent, or the GenoHaradan won't give me a chance.

I glanced around my surroundings. I was somewhere in the eastern part of Ahto City, walking through a large courtyard graced by a rather ugly statue of a toothy shark. I wandered towards it, making out the words 'Eastern Quadrant' inscribed in Basic on a small, bronze plaque. More was written below in Selkatha, but I couldn't make out all the words. Something about a god, and wrath. I stared back at the shark. Trust the Selkath to worship a fish.

I heard a snide laugh, and turned my head sharply- bringing on another wave of dizziness. A group of mostly Humans stood sniggering near the edge of the courtyard, eyeing me over. They were all clothed in a tan, tight-fitting uniform, and with a spark of awareness I recognized it as the casual attire of Sith troops. They didn't seem inclined to approach me, but it was obvious they were mocking me from afar.

I shivered as the hairs rose on my forearms. Dark spots speckled around the periphery of my vision, and the tang of nausea rose at the back of my throat. I steadied myself with one hand leaning against the fierce statue, but it was too late...

…

Frustrated rage simmered inside me; I knew I should work through my anger and control it, but it wasn't nearly as satisfying as ranting within my own head. Why is he questioning me? We've got this far, and now he's uncertain?

There was one more location after Manaan and now, I wondered, if it would be better to go alone. Send him back to the others, who had been waiting for some time on the edge of space, now.

He trusted me, I knew that as a core truth… but he didn’t fear what we'd discovered. Somehow, the danger had ebbed in his mind. He didn't grasp the totality of the threat we faced.

His doubts over that, and what I sought as a counter-measure, were beginning to grate. There were times when I felt it would be easier to command him to hold his tongue. I'd never had an issue with hearing viewpoints that opposed mine - stars, it made sense to look at all angles of any objective - but belabouring the point when I'd chosen the path forward was inefficient, wasteful and irritating.

There weren't many who would dare... and, at times, I wished he wouldn't either.

Striding blindly through the gleamingly perfect streets of Ahto City did nothing but raise my ire further. I hate this place. Frelling Selkath. The shining chrome walls of the corridor glided out into a large courtyard, marred by a hideous statue of a firaxan shark. Their mythical god. The Selkath should go back to the bottom of the ocean and stay there. Unfortunately, it sounded like I would be the one journeying to those murky depths. I grimaced.

"Hey!" a mocking voice called out, and I stiffened, whirling around. A group of four Sith were watching me, cocky condescension all over their faces. Sod the Manaan neutrality laws. It might be fun to pick a fight with those idiots.

"This street is for Sith only," the closest woman told me, nose in the air, her lips pursed in disdain as she eyed over my ragged clothing. "You got to pay a twenty credit toll to walk down this street."
My amusement warred with a growing anger, but these days my anger was winning more often than not. It hadn't always been that way...

... "You can have your credits when you take them from my cold, dead hand," I snarled, and blinked suddenly as I stared up into the grinning face of the shark. In the distance a Selkath was glaring at my hand; I jerked the offending limb away from the statue, but still his eyes bored into me. Just what I didn't need to do – draw attention to myself.

"Well, well," a smarmy voice called, and I turned to see the group of Sith soldiers walk closer. "Lookee, it's a drunk wanting to pick a fight."

I stiffened, and felt my face tighten as the Sith sauntered towards me. I felt disastrously light-headed, and although the feeling was dissipating, I wasn't sure if I was up to conflict. Up to it? I can't actually desire violence – not here on Manaan! Oh yeah. The neutrality laws.

The leader of the gang crossed her arms and smirked at me. Her fair hair and cold blue eyes appeared identical to the Sith I'd just seen in my mind. Could it be the same one? Or do all the pathetic Sith minions look so similar?

"What?" she drawled. "Got nothing to say now, gutter trash?" A man behind her sniggered, and two of the group surreptitiously moved to flank me. My latent anger stirred once more, firing adrenaline through my veins.

"I've got plenty to say," I said flatly. "I just doubt your ronto turd of a brain could comprehend it."

A look of surprise flashed sparks in the woman's eyes, and then she tilted her head back to laugh. "My, my," she purred. "Looks like the drunk rat has claws."

My mouth twitched in amusement; the Sith caught my expression and her smirk dropped like a stone in the Manaan ocean. An ugly scowl took its place.

"You want a fight, gutter scum?" she sneered, and took a threatening step closer. The woman's face was mere inches from mine; I could see the residue of cheap cosmetics padding her skin, smoothing it into the face of someone younger. Like she could challenge me. I can rip her head off in one second flat.

"Go on, I'll even give you the first shot," she taunted, spreading her arms open in invitation.

My gaze roved over her companions: four of them in total, standing passively as they watched our altercation. My fist curled. One quick jab to her throat, and she'll be down. The muscles in my weak arm ached as I tensed them. I stared back into the mocking blue eyes of my aggressor, and suddenly, something about the whole encounter seemed slightly off.

Why is she pushing for me to start the fight? I looked over her shoulder and had my answer.

A group of armoured Selkath were striding purposefully across the courtyard, directly past us. Sithspit! I'm a brainless Gamorrean! Is my desire for violence so strong that I overlook common sense? I flung my hands upwards, palms first, in the universal gesture for peace. "I don't want a fight," I said loudly, concisely, my voice ringing false over the flawless beauty of Selkath architecture. "I'm sorry if I caused offence, I did not mean to."

The woman dropped her arms, and I caught the flash of disappointment on her face. Pathetic. Is this how the Sith prove themselves on Manaan? Try to get an unsuspecting stranger to hit them first so they'll be jailed? And I thought the Sith on Taris had been weaklings. I smirked, but bowed low to the woman, aware of the close proximity of the Selkath. "I beg your pardon," I repeated my empty platitudes.

"Break it up!" one of the Selkath exclaimed in a slurring voice. "You Sith, always trying to cause trouble! Leave that Human alone!" The three Selkath marched around the Sith party, their armour gleaming a burnished bronze colour that was as stark and shiny as their architecture.

I bowed in overt deference to the Selkath, and stepped away from the crowd. The first Selkath nodded to me brusquely before turning to continue his tirade at the Sith leader. As I strode away from the courtyard, I could still hear the words 'trouble-maker' and 'no respect for the law'.

xXx

I walked out into a large courtyard that seemed to hold nothing bar a rather dismal view of the nearby ocean through massive panes of double-glazed transparisteel. Nearby, leaning unobtrusively under a hanging pillar, stood a dark red humanoid droid. A smile curved my lips as his eyes flared in recognition.

"Greeting: It is good to see you again and in one piece, master."

My smile broadened as I glanced around the area. HK had been ordered to meet me in the southeast quadrant, the same place mentioned in the GenoHaradan's mysterious message. The inner hub of Ahto City was organized into eight large quadrants, laid out like dinner plates surrounding a banquet. This had to be the place, but where would I find Hulas?

The courtyard itself looked identical to the earlier one I'd passed through, sans the grotesque statue. A waist-height ferracrete wall bordered the half of the enclosure that faced the sea, stopping sentients from physically reaching the transparisteel. The wall seemed a popular place to gather nonetheless; a group of Selkath were hissing something in Selkatha, a Rodian was idly shuffling what appeared to be pazaak cards, and a trio of merchants were disbanding a makeshift market stall under the disapproving eye of an armoured Selkath.

Pivoting on my heel, my gaze roved throughout the entire quadrant. Sents strolled in every direction, but I couldn't see anyone lurking about that appeared to be a secret agent for a cryptic organization.

I frowned. "HK, do you think any of the people around here could be contacts for an assassination order?"

HK gave me what could have been construed as a dubious look, in so far as a droid could, but dutifully scanned the area. "Observation: I highly doubt it, master."

"Yeah, me too," I muttered. What was I asking a droid for, anyway? My eyes snagged on a dark doorway set into the towering chrome walls, and I walked closer. A tiny plaque above the opening read "The Spacer's Break." A cantina. Of course. Where else would you go looking for disreputable sorts?

As I neared the entrance, I made out a large figure slouching against the wall within. It jerked upright at my approach and strode forward to meet me, one eye gleaming maliciously from the shadows.

"No droids," the Abyssin grunted, jabbing an accusatory finger at HK. I had a suddenly urge to override his will, to pull on the Force and demand his obedience- but I can't reach the Force. Not yet. And I need to focus on other objectives, first.
I smiled tightly. "No problem. HK, stand guard outside."

"Protest: But master, how can I protect you if I am not with you?" HK objected.

"HK, this is Manaan. Nothing ever happens here," I idly threw over my shoulder as the Abyssin moved aside and let me pass.

The interior of the cantina was dimly lit, and it took a few seconds for my eyes to adjust. Empty booths and pazaak tables lined the walls; the only sents in the place were talking in hushed whispers. I noticed the lack of Selkath around, and wondered absently if the reptilian species didn't appreciate frequenting such places. They may not come in here, but they're watching all the same. Cameras hung discretely from the ceiling and a buzzing surveillance droid circled the centre of the room. The Selkath authorities still kept an eye even on places such as this.

The bar itself was deeper into the cantina, and as I strode further inside, I heard the soft wailing of Bith musicians. A few halogen lamps dotted around the place offered only dismal illumination, and the ensuing shadows mated with thick cigarra smoke. A handful of people sat smoking near the band, but the rest of the cantina had an eerie, empty feeling to it.

The Ithorian behind the bar grunted as I walked up to him, and focused beady eyes on me.

"What'll you have?" he asked roughly.

I grabbed a handful of credit chits HK had obtained, and slapped them on the bar. It was well more than a mug of beer. "A Forvish ale," I stated. As the Ithorian moved to take the cash, I leaned forward. "I'm looking for Hulas," I murmured in a lowered tone, and then thrust the small pile at him.

The Ithorian blinked, looked down at the credits, and then back at me. "I don't know no Hulas," he said.

I scowled, and pulled out another handful. At this rate I'll be all out. "Maybe this will help," I commented, and slid the chits over the beer-stained bar.

The Ithorian pocketed the second lot of creds. "Thanks. But it doesn't," he threw over his shoulder as he turned to serve a green Twi'lek that had approached for a drink.

My spine stiffened. He thinks he can just take my credits for nothing? My jaw clenched as a wave of fiery anger surged through me. Abruptly, I felt pushing at me from Bastila through the bond, trying to communicate, trying to reach me... I pulled back, and turned my psyche away from her. My emotions... they attracted her notice, dammit. I had to resist a natural instinct to hammer at her Force block.

What do I do now? No Hulas, no way off Manaan? I felt my fingers twitch towards a hidden blaster. Remember the cameras. This entire place is monitored. I can't get violent!

The Ithorian bartender returned a moment later, and nodded towards the side of the room. "Someone has a message for you," he grunted.

My eyes narrowed, but I turned to stare in the direction he indicated. One of the shadowy booths embedded into the cantina wall held a solitary robed figure. Is that Hulas? How did the Ithorian communicate so quickly to him? I glanced back to the Twi'lek in suspicion, but the green-skinned sentient was already turning back to face the band, a newly purchased drink clasped in one hand.

I shrugged to myself. I've got a lead. Nothing for it but to play along.
The cloaked figure did not look up as I slid into a seat opposite him. He was a Rodian, decked out in an unobtrusive grey robe that covered his torso. His posture was deliberately casual as he leaned his elbows on the cracked and faded table, but he did not meet my eyes.

"Hello, Hulas," I said softly.

The Rodian finally looked at me, ducking his head to glance under my hood. I was glad of the disguise; I did not want him to see my face until I had sounded him out.

"A Human?" he said finally. "There are sentient everywhere, but you choose to speak with me. Am I so different? Do you think I have answers that others do not?"

"That's a rather strange greeting," I replied. "To someone who has been asked to meet the GenoHaradan."

Hulas paused, but to his credit his expression did not change. "You have the advantage of me, Human. There is power in names, yet in the end a name alone can mean nothing." he finished. I had the feeling he thought he was rather more enigmatic than I did.

He's a genuine agent, though. His poise, his stance... a lackey, maybe, but definitely GenoHaradan. How did I know that? What dark dealings had I had with them in the past? "My name is Jen Sahara," I said simply.

Again his expression did not change, but this time I noticed his jaw clenching. He's surprised. He wasn't expecting me to turn up. I wonder why?

"Ah, yes." His tone was light, neutral. And yet something struck me as being slightly off. "You may be wondering just what the GenoHaradan is."

I shrugged. "A secret assassination society who may be interested in my skills."

Again the slight pause. I was beginning to realize that minuscule delay was the only indication Hulas gave of astonishment. "And yet, we are so much more. But this is not the most appropriate place to speak of such things. Come, let us move a more private setting."

Hulas moved to stand, but I cut him off quickly. "I don't have time for that, Hulas," I said flatly.

He stared at me impassively, the only change in expression the slight rise of an eyebrow. "You do not have time for a walk, yet you had time to seek me out? That strikes me as strange, Jen Sahara."

I smirked. "It's very simple. Your organization is interested in hiring me. I, in turn, need to leave Manaan. Immediately." Hulas made no direct reply, so I continued. "I know you have the ability to get me off Manaan, Hulas. Do that, and I'll join the GenoHaradan."

Hulas crossed his arms, and again I inwardly damned the detached expression on his face. Does this guy ever show any emotion? He may as well have been a block of permacrete. I suppose the GenoHaradan choose their agents well. This Hulas must be a contact for all sorts of assassin wannabes. It make senses that he doesn't give anything away. Still, it was annoying.

"We don't make deals, Jen Sahara. You give yourself a lot of credit if you believe we will organize a free trip for you. Why is it that you are in such a rush to leave Manaan?"

I shrugged, and decided on the truth. "I have some rather powerful people after me."

Hulas paused, his eyes darkening in shock, or surprise, or something. I stiffened. Does Hulas know about Bastila and Karon? No, he couldn't, the GenoHaradan would have nothing to do with the Jedi. Surely.

"The GenoHaradan offers protection for its agents, Jen Sahara. But you are not one."

"I wish to be," I countered quickly.

"Even so, the wishing does not magically initiate you into our brethren. We have many trials, a long testing period-"

"Hulas," I hissed. "I am happy to do this sort of apprenticeship on another planet. But if you guys truly want me to be an agent, then get me off this planet within the next hour. If you can't achieve that, then I'm off – right now - to find someone who can."

Hulas sighed, and then to my surprise, capitulated. More easily than I expected him too. "Follow me. There are always civilian ships leaving to Rii'shn. I will organize something."

Huh, I was certain he was going to refuse. I guess the GenoHaradan are really impressed with me. I wonder what they've heard?

I followed Hulas out of the cantina, noticing the brief nod he gave the Ithorian bartender. There had been some unspoken communication between them then, I realized with a smirk.

As we walked outside into the bright sunshine, HK-47 fell in behind me.

"Yours?" Hulas asked me, indicating the droid.

I nodded. "Yes. These days you can't live without a protocol droid. He'll need to come with me too."

"A... protocol droid, you say?"

"Statement: I am well versed in verbal and cultural translation," HK intoned from behind us. "I attempt to serve my master's every need."

"Are protocol droids equipped with laser rifles these days?" Hulas questioned. His tone was mild, but there was a slight inflection of disbelief, there.

"One can never be too careful," I said, keeping my reply back just as mild.

"Well, you would not be our first agent with a personal droid," Hulas ventured after a short delay. "As long as he is kept under control, and doesn't break any laws-"

"Objection: I am a law-abiding droid!" HK cut in quickly. The robot seemed to think about this for a minute, and then further reiterated his point. "Yes, indeed, law-abiding, that's me."

I wished his tone had been a little more convincing.

I bit back a snigger, and hurriedly moved to change the subject. "You mentioned the world Rii'shn? Where is that?"

Hulas paused, glancing at me sideways. "I've surprised him again. "Rii'shn is the closest habitable planet in this system. It is a sister planet to Manaan; its capitol Emnaad is a domed Selkath township much like Ahto City, if smaller. I am astonished you have not heard of it. It is a mere four hour space flight away."

My spine stiffened, and I stopped abruptly. "Four hours away is not far enough, Hulas."
"I gathered as much," he answered, motioning for me to continue moving. "But it will do as a start. I will organize a pickup point outside the dome of Emnaad; a rendezvous with one of our agents. You will learn of your first assignment which shall, of course, be on a planet further away. Do not fear, Jen Sahara. The GenoHaradan look after their agents."

xXx

In the end, it had been as easy as I had suspected. Hulas had gifted me with a fake ID chip – enough to get me off this stars-forsaken planet. My new name – Alieya Djurr'yni – sounded a lot more exotic than Jen Sahara, but either way it was still a false name.

The civilian transport ship was packed with struggling merchants making the quick jaunt over to Rii'shn, the sister planet that Hulas had given me a brief summary of. Although less populous than Manaan, Rii'shn had smaller townships that were not Selkath controlled - which meant easier credits and more flexible laws, provided one could slip out of Emnaad which housed the planet's only starport under its Selkath dome.

The suffocating stench of organic sweat permeated my senses, and I struggled to keep from breathing through my nose. Crowded sents were squashed into tiny seats all around me, talking and gesticulating in a myriad of languages. The slurry tones of Selkatha were the dominant inflection in the hubbub of noise, and above everyone's heads was the overt presence of both mobile and stationary vid cams. The Selkath liked their surveillance as a means of enforcing pacifism. It dogged me with the ominous sensation of constantly being watched.

I resisted the urge to batter once more at Bastila's shields; strongly desiring the strength of the Force, if for nothing else than to drown out the senseless babble. As always, the power was dancing tantalizingly out of reach, teasing me with its inaccessibility. As soon as I was safely off Manaan, I fully intended to deal with the snot's blockade.

I sighed and stared out of the window. For all that Hulas had jacked me up with the lowest-class transport possible, at least I was seated with a view. I heard the engines power up as the starship readied to leave Ahto City, and through the grimy transparisteel panes I could see crowds of departed family waving their loved ones farewell.

The congregation was too far away for me to pick out individual faces, but my eyes caught on one robed figure as it slowly made its way to the front. The repulsors of the transport kicked in, humming loudly, cutting through the cacophony of noise; but my vision stayed fixed on the brown-clad figure. My skin prickled and my fists clenched.

That's Karon. I know it is. The ship began to rise, but still I gazed out the window, trying to distinguish features on a figure too far away to recognize.

Somehow, I knew, she was watching me too.

xXx
A heavy despair – mingled with a bitter relief upon which I did not wish to dwell – sat painfully on my shoulders as I watched the civilian transport lift and leave the ocean world. I could sense my former apprentice's Force presence within the ship, and wondered what she was thinking as she made good her escape.

The transport was headed to Rii’shn. What bitter irony, the planet I had just departed. Two choices lay before me, each one damning the other. Flights to Manaan's closest neighbour were abundantly frequent, and it would be an easy task to jump onto the next available passage and pursue Revan. But I had promised to complete a task for Roland Wann, and how could I leave Bastila Shan? The young Padawan had sounded desperate on the transmission I had received, despite the briefness of it. The remaining Dantooine Council members were unsure of her survival, although Vrook was adamant she still lived. Vrook Lamar was already on his way to Manaan, but he was on the other side of the galaxy. It would be weeks before he arrived.

I grimaced. The press of sentients around me began to disperse, as people slowly left the commercial landing pad. Loud talk hammered at me from all sides, but my thoughts were so chaotic that I did not need the Force to block the noise. My mind was active enough to drown out any surrounding conversation.

I must stay. Bastila needs my counsel. And I already know that Revan and I shall soon meet again. The premonition I'd received days ago haunted my every breath. There was no running from fate, but it seemed a cruel, wicked thing, to be taunted with the very nature of my downfall. And all I know is that it will happen soon. And that Revan will be involved...

... My skin ached and burned; the residue of a massive bout of Force induced lightening. The cool floor underneath my back was a blessing; yet it did not dull the agonizing pain pulsating from my ribs. My eyes were glued shut, and one hand rested protectively over my torso. Underneath my fingers, I could feel the cauterized edges of a fatal lightsaber wound.

I barely had the strength to draw another breath, and I did not need to wield the Force to realize I was dying.

I opened my eyes, and a bright red bar flared through my vision. A lightsaber; its owner swathed in a black cloak. A Dark Jedi has been my downfall? I couldn't see my surroundings; everything behind the figure was a fuzzy blur.

"It was you!" the stranger hissed in a tone wracked with emotion. I could not tell if it was horror, rage or grief, but I recognized the voice. Revan.

My eyes widened, and I made out her shadowy face under the hooded robe. Sharp green eyes glared down at me in accusation, and her hand tightened on her sickly red lightsaber. After everything that has happened, am I to die by the hand of my old apprentice?
...The vision had faded then, and I inwardly damned the lack of detail. I could not even tell where it would occur, but intuitively I knew it would be soon – if I waited here, Revan would come to me. Is this a destiny I cannot escape? Am I doomed to die?

Only on a few, brief occasions in the past had I been able to glance into the future, and never so vividly as this. Premonitions by nature were not infallible; but I knew beyond a shadow of a doubt that soon, I would be facing Revan.

The guilt still sat with me: the musings of what could have happened, what might have been. I thought I'd worked through my feelings of inadequacy over the past few years; thought I was stronger, whole once more. I'd even, finally, agreed to train another apprentice; but all it took was one desperate transmission from Bastila Shan to stir my doubts and worries back into a frenzy. Things might have been so different.

I allowed my thoughts to wander dangerously - it did no good to dwell on past mistakes, but sometimes one couldn't hold back the tide. If only Revan and Malak had been separated when we'd first found them on Talshion. She'd been so angry, so hurt, so desperate when we finally put an end to their forbidden romance. The High Council said it was for the best, and I'd agreed; we all knew how dangerous such strong emotions were to Jedi. And yet... And yet at times I wondered what would have happened, had the High Council let the young lovers be. Would Revan have angrily disappeared to join the Republic cause? Would Malak have followed her so blindly? That encounter was still so sharp and vivid in my mind, like it had occurred but yesterday...

"...so while I understand the wisdom of that part, I am unsure why I was tested on it," Jedi Knight Kylah Aramai droned on, still talking excitedly to me about her recent successful trials. I knew I should be patient with her, but I did not understand why the new Knight was singling me out for her questions and long-winded thoughts. Perhaps she does so to each Master she comes across. *I had more pressing concerns weighing me down. It had been three weeks since the Coruscanti High Council approved a plan of separating Knights Revan and Malak, and transferred Revan to the Dantooine Enclave to ensure little future contact between them. Thirteen days since Revan had thrown a tantrum that eclipsed any sort of emotional outburst I'd seen from her before. Eight days since I viewed the holo-streamed destruction of her homeworld by the Mandalorians, and ran desperately to Revan's quarters... to find her missing."

Surely she will come back. Why did she not seek me out? Where has she gone? Part of me thought I knew the answer. Her crusade over the last year had been against the High Council's inaction over the growing Mandalorian threat. Surely she would not be so reckless as to disobey the High Council?

Perhaps I no longer knew what my old Padawan was capable of.

"Looks like a ship is coming in to land," Bastila Shan, Vrook's prize Padawan and regular companion of Kylah, commented. I squinted up into the summer sky to see a small transport shuttle swoop down to land. I held my breath. Could it be her? Is she returning?

I restrained myself from running eagerly to the small landing pad adjoined to the Enclave, and made my way sedately there instead. Knight Kylah was still chatting in overt animation, with Bastila throwing in an occasional word. By the time I reached the ship, the exit hatch was already opening.
A figure in brown robes stepped out. Despair punched me in the solar plexus the moment I realized it was not Revan. In its wake followed a shaft of surprise when I recognized exactly who it was instead.

"Knight Malak!" I called in greeting, walking forward. Next to me, Bastila tensed.

I had heard many young Jedi exclaim that Malak was good-looking, for a Human, although being Zabrakian I was not a good judge of his species' attractiveness. He did have an engaging manner; always ready with a smile and a quip to set others at ease. Despite all his years at the Order, I knew, deep down, that his first loyalty always remained to the woman he had loved since well before we had stumbled upon them. He had always been Revan's shield, her strength, her calm.

Presently, his brows were lowered, and his gaze simmered with angry intent.

"Master Karon," he acknowledged grimly, not bothering to greet Kylah or Bastila. "Where's Revan?"

"Malak, you should not be here," I rebuked. "You have been assigned to a mission on Coruscant, your home Enclave. Why have you disobeyed the High Council in coming here?"

He scowled. "Some things are more important than the Order, Karon! I won't leave her alone after Talshion! Answer the question – where is she? In her quarters?"

Kylah gasped in affront. "Malak, you should not address a master so!"

"I'm not speaking to you, am I?" he bit out, before turning back to face me. "Look, Karon, the High Council can lecture me to death afterwards. But I must see her! If you won't tell me where she is, then I'll find her myself." With that said, he brushed past me into the Enclave. I saw a disapproving expression on Kylah's face, and a stiff, icy one on Bastila's.

I closed my eyes briefly, and wondered how best to handle this. "She's gone, Malak." I heard gasps from the others: Revan's disappearance was not yet common knowledge.

Malak stiffened at the Enclave entrance, before turning around very slowly. "Gone? What do you mean, gone?" His voice was low, and almost dangerous.

"She... vanished directly after the televised attack on Talshion. We do not know where she is."

All vestiges of colour disappeared from Malak's face. "You don't know where she is," he echoed. "What do you mean, you don't know where she is? If she's left Dantooine, there's only one place she will have gone!"

"Malak-"

"I can't believe this!" he burst out, running a hand angrily through his short, dark hair. "She's gone off to fight the Mandalorians, hasn't she? And you- and you all just let her?"

"Calm yourself!" Kylah intervened in a righteous tone, and inwardly I groaned.

"Kylah, Bastila, can you leave me alone with Knight Malak please?" I said quickly, shooing them away with one hand while keeping my focus on the enraged Knight. "Malak, she has not yet reported back to us, and we are still looking for her. Do not let your emotions cloud your judgment."
“Judgment?” He laughed bitterly. “You really think this would have happened, if you hadn’t forced us apart? Oh no, the High Council’s to blame for this, and I’m not going to sit around and wait until I hear she’s been killed by some primitive Mandalorian bastard!” he spat out as he strode back towards his ship.

“Malak!” I called desperately. “Please, do not do this! Calm down first, at least! The High Council-”

“The High Council can crucify me for all I care,” he said coldly as he re-entered his ship. “Revan’s always meant more to me than their backward judgment.” The hatch closed ominously behind him.

A sinking feeling overcame me as the shuttle slowly rose back into the sky. My eyes closed in bitter despair. Rash, just like Revan. Return home, my old Padawan. Please.

"I never did like that man," Kylah commented piously from behind me.

…

They did return – but back to Coruscant, after a year-long reconnaissance mission on behest of the Republic. And Revan petitioned the High Council once more, this time with the backing of dozens of Jedi, as well as some key members in the Republic top brass.

The High Council still vetoed it, and Revan left to join the War proper, bleeding the Order of Knights as she went, the brightest of them forming the Jedi Thirteen. Although the Fleet liked to name them Revan's Guard, I recalled with a sigh.

I always wondered – would the two of them have listened to our counsel, had they been together when Talshion's fate was broadcast? Maybe...

I forced such futile scenarios from my head. What was done, was done. In retrospect my decisions over Revan's tutelage and future may have been flawed, but hindsight was always such a bitter window from which to view the past. And yet, the pain of losing an apprentice sits with you always. The scars of Exar Kun sat heavy on many of the Jedi Masters. And others had disappeared - one example was my childhood friend Jolee, who had vanished entirely after the fall of his wife.

I had not wanted to tutor Lars, but caved under Vandar's insistence. I should have listened to my heart. I was not ready, and only now I realize how unfair it is to Lars. I had left him behind with our shuttle, busy unloading the few possessions we had brought with us.

I grimaced, suddenly disgusted with myself. Why am I standing here like a buffoon, lamenting a past I cannot change? Bastila surely needs my counsel. I sighed, and began striding in the direction of the Republic Base. When the distress signal and accompanying message from the Ebon Hawk had been received, I had known who was involved. Unexplained explosion, indeed. But why is she running? There could be only one reason – Revan thought I was her enemy. I pursed my lips, lost in thought as my feet strode over ferracrete foundations. She remembers. How much, perhaps only Bastila knows.

The mind rebuild should have been complete, lasting. Galdea and Vima had been adamant it was. But nothing is eternal. Perhaps it is the will of the Force. It had been the worst experience I'd ever had; stripping my apprentice's mind back and rebuilding it with the identity of a dying casualty from the wars she herself had started. I'd had no choice – not only had the Council themselves agreed on the action taken, but Galdea and Vandar has insisted my cooperation was vital.

If not for Bastila's vision of the Star Map on Dantooine, then Revan may have had a real chance at
The Dantooine Council had been divided, but I had hoped for the best outcome. The idea had been posed to heal the Sith Lord slowly, naturally, over months, and attempt to guide her back to the Light. Vima had not believed her mind would ever recover from the psychic injury, but we might have tried regardless.

No one had expected the young Bastila Shan to behold a vision of Revan and Malak entering Force tombs on Dantooine that we did not even know about. Suddenly, it became a lot more urgent to have a sane shell of the Sith Lord walking about, so we could mine that information if our team of Jedi did not find the Star Maps themselves.

I had done the Council's will, but a dark seed of doubt over the outcome sat with me always.

xXx

A short message from an officer on my comm-link informed me that the crew of the Ebon Hawk had already been escorted to the Republic Embassy, despite the Selkath impounding their ship. That puzzled me; I didn't understand why the Selkath would be involved in a Republic rescue mission, though surely I would find out soon.

The embassy itself was situated on the northern side of the city, close to the Selkath Supreme Court and High Command. Despite the Selkath's protestations of neutrality, I knew they at times had background dealings with the Republic they kept secret from the Sith. Even such a determinedly neutral species as the Selkath cannot blindly ignore the destructive nature of the Sith.

As I approached the complex, one Republic officer was berating two junior soldiers in a loud, irate voice.

"Your speeder was broken? Where is it? You can't mean to tell me you left it out there! Speak up, Ensign!" The officer had his hands resting angrily on his hips, his face mottled red in irritation.

"The escape pod was empty, sir. My speeder broke, and I thought I should report to you, sir," the soldier responded in a mechanical voice. I stiffened. There was something slightly wrong, even automated, about his voice.

"You already told me the pod was empty, man!" the officer yelled, and I wondered in distaste if I saw spittle fly from his lips. "But where is your speeder? You should know the protocol by now, you shameless excuse for a soldier! We don't have an unlimited supply of vehicles on Manaan – the Sith pinch everything – so all broken parts are to be supervised until they can get towed! Get out there right now, and don't report back until you've brought the wreckage home!" The officer finished his long-winded rant in a sort of snarl, before turning on his heel and exiting the Republic compound in a furious march.

My eyes narrowed as I interpreted the lost, bewildered expression on the two soldiers left behind. It couldn't be, could it?

I strode over to them, intercepting the men before they could leave.

Injecting just a small amount of Force into my words, I addressed them mildly. "Tell me what happened when you came across the escape pod."

The soldier blinked and swallowed convulsively. "I, uh, I- the escape pod was empty, Master Jedi," he stammered. "My bike broke, and I had to ride double on Stirwin's." The second soldier was nodding dazedly in confirmation.

It is as I suspected then. Revan's strengths may have been in other areas of the Force, but she had certainly picked up a few things under my tutelage. In the early days, I had often doubted whether my training would suit her; I was strong at mental manipulation, but I preferred to avoid outright conflict. She had a flair for the more physical manifestations of the Force, be it lightsaber forms or outright expositions of power like her fabled ionization. However Revan was as adaptable as she was brilliant. Not only did she become one of the strongest duellists in our Order, but she also gained an impressive knowledge – and ability – of the more passive, subtler uses of the Force.

I grimaced, and drew more power in. "Your will is your own. You will remember what occurred."

The soldier's expression became even more dazed, if that was possible. Then, abruptly, it twisted into a confused anger. "Wh-what happened? Th-there was a woman!" The second soldier stumbled slightly as a dawning awareness broke on his face, also.

I smiled gently. "It is alright now. The woman is a Jedi, who was lost." That, in a sense, was true. "I will talk to your superior and explain what happened. I would appreciate it if you could tell me everything that occurred first, however?"

The men quickly extrapolated on the encounter, and I wondered at how fortuitous it had been for Revan to find a speeder so easily. After assuring the soldiers that everything was under control, I turned to enter the embassy, subtly reaching out with the Force to scan the area. I sensed Bastila immediately: her presence shone from within the complex. What startled me was the aura of another Force-user next to her. Grief and guilt encompassed a compassionate heart, and I wondered in astonishment whom it could be. I lengthened my stride, and made quick time into the embassy proper.

"Master Jedi," a sentry greeted me in the foyer. Large, chrome pillars gave the place a classical style, akin to the rest of the Selkath architecture on the planet. An immense holo-picture of Coruscant dominated the east wall, adding colour to an otherwise utilitarian foyer.

I nodded briefly at the Republic guard. "Perhaps you can lead me to the crew of the Ebon Hawk?"

"Certainly," the man assented. "Follow me."

We walked down one of the hallways, and the sentry stopped at the first meeting room. After activating the door switch, he stepped back to allow me entrance.

Commander Wann, the current leader of the Republic Embassy whom had holo-commed me more than once, was deep in conversation with Bastila Shan and a man I recognized as the war hero Carth Onasi. They turned at my entrance, and I could not miss the flare of relief on the young Padawan's face as she recognized me.

But my attention was focused on the other inhabitants of the room, and my surprise intensified. A young Twi'lek girl sitting on a recliner was wearing a surly expression and being comforted by a Wookiee of all things. A small utility droid whirred at their feet. Behind them, a formidable Mandalorian wearing a garish purple suit of armour stood scowling, an unlit cigarra dangling from his lips. I blinked. How in the Force has Bastila managed to gather such an entourage?

Then it hit me, of course. People always flocked to Revan. Her leadership skills were perhaps only matched by her charisma. My last surprise was the unknown Force user; a silent Cathar was standing in one of the far corners. My eyes widened. That's Quatra's missing charge! Juhani!

"Master Karon!" Bastila addressed me effusively, and I realized I was still standing in the doorway. I smiled wryly, and knew that even now, Revan could still surprise me.

"Padawan," I acknowledged, and strode forward to take her hands in greeting. "It is good to see you again." I noted the tense set of Bastila's shoulders relax, and understood that her time had been far from easy.

"Master, allow me to introduce you to my companions," Bastila said as she quickly recovered her composure. "This is Captain Carth Onasi, whom I am sure you have heard of."

"Master Jedi," the man intoned, but his gaze was on Commander Wann.

I smiled briefly. "Captain. So nice to see you again." I saw surprise flash over the soldier's face as he turned back at me. I let out a small tinkle of laughter. "You perhaps do not remember me, Captain. We met but once, and I am sure most Jedi look the same to you."

A wry grin of agreement curved his lips as I glanced back toward Bastila. She nodded towards the young Twi'lek, but I noticed her expression tense. She does not like the girl, I wonder?

"This is Mission Vao, a refugee from Taris. Her companion is Zaalbar, also from Taris."

"Welcome to Ahto City," I murmured, but the girl merely nodded, her eyes trained on the floor. The Wookiee, however, was more courteous and rose to bow.

"(I greet you, Master Jedi)," he rumbled.

My smile grew, and I wished I could emulate Shyriiwook. Before I could address the Wookiee, Bastila moved on, obviously wishing to hurry the introductions.

"That is the mercenary Canderous Ordo," she said flatly, nodding towards the older warrior. "Yo," he acknowledged, looking away to light his cigarra. I raised an eyebrow, but smiled anyway. Mandalorians were not particularly known for their manners, and I knew it would gall Roland Wann just to have one in residence.

"And I believe you know Juhani already?" Bastila ended on a soft note.

I turned to look at the Cathar who did not meet my eyes. She was wearing a loose white tunic, one hand plucking at the overlong sleeve. My expression grew gentle as I approached her. "Padawan," I said softly. "It warms my heart to see you here."

Juhani looked up then, tormented golden eyes staring into mine. A maelstrom of emotions warred through the Cathar's face as I reached for her hands and squeezed them lightly.

A small, nervous smile flicked at her lips. "Master Karon." Her voice was a mere whisper.

I wondered what had happened. Quatra had sensed her Padawan embracing the Dark Side in her Knight trials, but the woman who stood opposite me merely felt confused; even grief-stricken. I did not approve of Quatra's methods. Even I had sensed the young Cathar had grown too attached to her master, but there are better ways to deal with an apprentice's love than to throw it in her face during her Knight trials. The bitter aftermath had been the disappearance of not one, but two Padawans as Tefain's charge had vanished after a biting argument with Quatra herself. I'd walked in on the end of that confrontation, as the young Human Padawan had stormed away after giving Quatra a piece of her mind. Tefain still hasn't managed to track Belaya down, but at least we have found Juhani.

"We will talk later," I promised Juhani. "For now, relax and have something to eat. I must convene with Bastila."

Juhani nodded, and I looked back at Roland Wann. "Commander, perhaps you could organize quarters and food for all of Padawan Shan's companions? For now I wish to talk with Bastila alone."

Roland Wann nodded, although I could tell he was not happy. Like many of the high-ranking military stationed on bases that saw little action, Roland had become used to being in command, and did not appreciate accommodating a Jedi. While I had no rank as far as the Republic was concerned, protocol demanded that they cooperate with us unless otherwise ordered. His narrowed eyes settled on the Mandalorian, who was leaning against the wall casually and flicking cigarra ash on the clean floor. I sighed inwardly.

"Of course," Roland muttered.

"(Maybe we could stay here for one night, Mission? At least for the meal?)" I heard the Wookiee say to his companion. I glanced at Bastila, who had pursed her lips.

Roland harrumphed. "But what about the escape pods? I thought there had been some survivor who had ejected from the Ebon Hawk?" he demanded.

"It's under control," I replied. "You can call the search off, Commander."

Six intent and shocked faces swivelled around to stare at me.

"Under control?" the young Twi'lek burst out. "What do you mean by that? Do you know where Jen is? Tell me!" She had leapt to her feet, an aura of intense determination around her.

Bastila shot a scandalized look at Mission, but turned to question me regardless. I noticed that even Carth Onasi had stopped haranguing Commander Wann to pay attention. Revan certainly made an impact on this lot.

"Do you know where Jen is?" Bastila asked quietly.

"Not yet," I answered, glancing seriously at everybody in turn. "But I will soon. Bastila, let us leave." I motioned Bastila out and followed before the impassioned Twi'lek could erupt once more.

\[xXx\]

"For all that I need the reprieve, Master Karon," Bastila started, as soon as we had entered a more private setting. "Shouldn't we be going after Jen?"

I noted that she still used Revan's false name, even in a secure room. Whether this room was devoid of sensors or not, my Force ability was currently soundproofing the room against any potential eavesdroppers, sentient or otherwise.

The meeting room itself was fairly large; a long, circular table stretched out from wall to poraclay wall, and I inferred Roland liked to hold many officious meetings here. Bastila herself appeared more comfortable to stand and pace across the fluffy grey carpet, but I sat down and picked up a piece of succulent kakasi fruit laid out in a tempting platter. I wondered just how to word the next bit of information.

"She has left the planet already Bastila," I said simply. Sometimes the bare truth was the best way to handle a situation.

Blank shock dulled the lustre of her eyes, and the colour drained her face. "Then we must go after her, immediately!" she burst out. "Where has she gone?"

For all that I felt the bitterness of Revan's escape myself, I could not hold back a chuckle. "Sit down, Bastila, and relax. Your dedication to duty does you credit, particularly since it must have been a thankless task indeed."

Bastila's mouth dropped open at what she probably considered a blasé attitude for a very serious matter. "But we cannot just let her roam free!"

I sighed. "I know. But this is something you must leave to me. I do not know where she has gone, but I will find her soon enough." I did not want to tell her of my vision; the young woman had enough resting on her shoulders as it was.

"If you do not know where she has gone, then how do you know she has left the planet?" Bastila questioned, sitting down reluctantly.

"I sensed her depart. She was my apprentice, Bastila. I have spent years in the past trying to track her and Malak down from their escapades." A wry smile curved my lips in remembrance; thoughts of Revan invariably granted me a wide range of emotions, encompassing everything from grief, anger, and even love.

I noticed Bastila glance around the room surreptitiously as I named the Sith Lord. "It is safe to talk here, Bastila. No one will hear."

She nodded her acquiescence, before staring down at the table. "What now, then?"

"Perhaps a chance to meditate and relax, Bastila," I suggested softly. While I venture to explore the mining facility, like I promised Roland? My premonition told me that Revan would return to Manaan soon, did I really want to be lurking on the bottom of the ocean when she arrived back on the planet? "Your master is on his way here also; he shall arrive in a few weeks."

At that, Bastila jerked her head up, a surprised smile lighting her face. "Master Vrook is alive? Coming to Manaan?"

My smile warmed further; it was good to see the Padawan held her Master in such high regard. Of course. She has not yet returned to Dantooine; she may not have known whether he made it through the attack. "Yes. He was delighted to hear of your survival – as were we all, Padawan. You have done well."

"Well?" Bastila's expression dropped in self-doubt. "I have failed. Revan is out there, unguided, alone, up to who knows-"

"Bastila," I cut her off gently. "You are too harsh on yourself. You should never have been placed in this position, and you were never meant to be alone. I, of all people, understand how hard to is to deal with Revan, and knowing somewhat of both your personalities I doubt you two would have warmed to each other. She cannot be commanded, and follows her own will. She-" I stopped short, and closed my eyes briefly as I halted my train of thought. "But that is not important. What I do need to know, however, is how much she remembers. How is she acting?"

Bastila tensed visibly as she answered. "She is unbalanced. A seething mass of emotions. When I first encountered her on Taris, she showed compassion and- and a rather annoying sense of humour. Then there was a time when I thought the identity of Jen Sahara had returned, but ever since Tatooine she has been behaving psychosis. She shrugged in helplessness. "I have no other word for it. All I can sense from her is rage and desperation, and now she knows how to shield me from her mind."

My eyes narrowed at that; I understood the power and limits of the mind-link Bastila shared with Revan, and it was not good that Revan was beginning to discover it for herself. No one expected Bastila Shan to form a bond with my erstwhile Padawan. It had been created when Bastila had preserved the spark of life within Revan's dying body, but she herself had not been aware of the consequences her act of mercy entailed until she glimpsed that first vision of the Dantooine Star Map.

Those types of Force bonds were exceedingly rare, with the potential to become exceedingly strong.

I motioned for Bastila to continue, and she did so haltingly. "She is starting to remember. Her dreams are awfully fragmented, but she is recalling flashes of her past."

"Before or after the fall?" I asked softly, but my tone was deadly serious. *If she is remembering her childhood, then perhaps there is hope for redemption. If, however, the stronger memories are of her time as the Sith Lord..."

Bastila looked like she did not understand why it was so important. "Both. I do not believe she has any idea of her true identity, but her Force abilities are increasing in power and intensity. She has little control over it, but her strength is returning." She closed her eyes as a small surge of fear emanated from her upon the Force. Bastila has stood up well as she could have, being made to babysit a volatile ex-Sith Lord. Again, I realized how unfair circumstances had been upon the young Padawan.

"That is worrying," I said heavily, more for the lack of a better response. *If Revan recalls her dark heritage, and is lashing out in violent darkness, then perhaps I already know my murderer. And perhaps redemption is long past her."

"Worrying?" Bastila countered sharply. "It is more than worrying. If she returns to her apprentice's side..."

"She will not," I interrupted. "You forget - Malak betrayed her. He was always her unwavering shield. She would not return to him, nor would he work with her. Even as the Dark Lord of the Sith, I still felt her grief at his betrayal during the mind rebuild. She had not believed he would ever turn on her." That had been the only sane emotion I had sensed from the fragments of her mind. That such a strong love could be destroyed so completely showed just how corrupting the Dark Side truly was. And yet the fact that she grieved flared my hope for her redemption.

"Why did the Council decide to rebuild her mind? Surely- it would have been safer- to, to-"

"To what, Bastila?" I rubbed a hand over my short horns wearily. "To imprison her with the Senate, and lead her to assured execution? To kill her ourselves? We value life, and you are the very one who saved her and made that choice. Like it or not, Revan owes her life to you alone." I paused briefly. "As for the mind rebuild- well, we needed the information on the Star Maps. We still do - we have no idea where on Kashyyyk or Korriban the maps could be, and the latter would be almost impossible to infiltrate even if we did know. No, we needed information that only Revan knew, and her mind was too fragmented to allow any other course of action."

Bastila sighed. "But then why is she recalling her past with such clarity? She knows she is not Jen Sahara - that façade had already crumbled away. It is only a matter of time before she finds out who she really is."
I felt my lips pursing, and knew that to be the truth. "Perhaps. But things are not always as hopeless as they seem. Trust in the Force, Bastila." I had to do that myself.

She nodded reluctantly as I glanced at the east wall. Behind it, I knew, was a pacing Cathar I still had to see. I smiled again at Bastila. "It is a good thing you have done, returning Juhani to the Order. I am keen to talk to her, although I must confess there are many who believed she would never be seen again. I can sense the turmoil within her, but she is not lost to the darkness. Not anymore. I commend you."

Bastila dropped her head, and I realized with a shock that the credit did not belong to her. She closed her eyes wearily. "I did not find her, Master Karon. Revan did," she said succinctly.

A sudden spark of hope shot through me. "Really? Revan redeemed Juhani?" Maybe all is not lost. Perhaps I am the one who should have more faith in the Force.

Bastila swallowed, but her next words were terse. "I would not quite say that. They fought on Tatooine – I believe Juhani challenged her – and Revan returned with Juhani in tow."

"But that is good news! If Revan could make someone-" I stopped myself, realizing just what Bastila had said. "Tatooine? What were you doing there?"

Bastila blinked. "I-I tried to go to Dantooine after leaving Taris, but we exited hyperspace in the middle of the Sith attack," she explained hurriedly. "We had to leave, our ship was damaged – Carth chose a pre-programmed hyperspace jump – we ended up on Tatooine."

"And?" I prompted. Tatooine? There is no such thing as coincidence.

"And I found the Star Map," she ended simply.

I could feel the joy blossoming on my face; the warmth of hope filling me once more. "Well done, Padawan. You have the coordinates?"

She nodded. "I sent them under encryption to the High Council. But I have them with me, also."

My smile grew. "It appears the Force led you there, then. And now to Manaan? Why did you choose this destination?"

A frown pleated her face as she chewed on her lip. "I-I do not really know, Master. Revan was planning to run on Tatooine – I convinced her to travel with me to a neutral place, one where there was no other Jedi. Manaan was the first one I thought of. I-I guess she somehow found out about your appearance here."

I nodded; obviously that had been the case. "And yet, you have journeyed to the location of another Star Map. It would appear that the Force is leading you, Bastila. This was always your mission, and now I wonder if you are destined to complete it." Perhaps this way Roland Wann's request could be satisfied, without me leaving the surface of Manaan. The situation in the mining colony sounded dire, and I understood the need for prompt investigation. Fortunately, the location of the Star Map is within the Hrakert Rift – right next to the station. If only we knew more about the whereabouts of the other two Star Maps.

Bastila's lips parted in mute astonishment. "I-I had thought to rest awhile, Master Karon."

I looked at the woman then, and for the first time noticed the drawn lines around her expressive eyes. She is not tired so much as exhausted. "Yes, I understand, Bastila. And while I do not deny you a few days of rest, this mission is important. I will take care of Revan when she returns, but your task will be to travel to the Hrakert Station." I would hear more of what had happened after she had slept, and then I would see to it that some of her companions accompanied her.

A determined look tightened her face and she nodded at me. "I will do my duty, Master Karon. I-wait, did you say when Revan returns?"

"Yes," I answered softly. "For she will, and perhaps it is time to give you a break from dealing with her, hmm?"

A small smile curved the woman's face, and I once more noted the look of relief flash through her eyes. "Master Karon, a few hours of sleep would be ample. I have slept recently, and would prefer to get started on this quest."

"Fair enough, Padawan, but please ensure you are rested. There are more details I need to impart to you about Hrakert Station, but for now I will let you relax while I talk to Juhani."

Bastila's smile turned compassionate, and I sensed that she felt for the Cathar. "Thank you," she said softly, and I inclined my head.

"Thank you, Bastila. You have done much already."

xXx
The passage seemed to drag. Hulas had told me it was only a four-hour flight, but it felt like I’d already spent half a day crammed in a transport ship that reeked worse than a Wookiee’s breath. I was pressed up against the window by a heavyset Duros, who had finally stopped initiating conversation after I’d threatened to gut him. That was real slick. I have the subtlety of a Gamorrean prostitute. I wrenched my thoughts away from that ludicrous image quickly, before it could stick.

I felt pressed in, claustrophobic. Children were squalling in a variety of languages, playing on my tense nerves and rising temper. My head was still pounding, and it was hard to stay focused. Flashes of people and places shot randomly through my mind. I closed my eyes in despair and breathed in deeply. Consciousness faded.

…

“Let’s get outta here!” he hissed from his vantage point by the doorway. “We’ve got what we need, so let’s go!”

Stars, it’s not like I’m gonna get caught. I never get caught. But he had, once. He’d never told me what the bastards did to him – they called themselves the Enforcers, but in reality their only job was to ensure no Uncitizen left the Western Underground. I’d seen them slaughter countless of the hungry, starving homeless in the name of their ‘duty’.

Still, to this day, he wouldn’t tell me how he escaped. Perhaps I didn’t really want to know.

“Got a cit ID chip,” I grinned, as I pocketed my tools and a stash of credits.

“It’s not like that’s much use to us,” he muttered. “We’re not registered on the NCD, remember?”

I closed the locker, and stood up. “Sod the National Citizen Database. It’s all a load of kath crap anyway. Telling us we don’t have the right to live because of where we’re born.” I could feel myself scowling. The injustice of my homeworld always stirred my anger, but not his. Not anymore. Somehow, he seemed to have grown resigned to it. Not quite acceptance, but a close cousin.

“It’s the way it works, little gal,” he quipped as I walked over to him. “You can’t change the system.”

“Don’t call me that,” I said automatically. “And that’s such a cop out. Just accepting things ‘cause they’ve always been like that.”

He shrugged, motioning me out as he closed the door. We were thieving in one of the poorer parts of Altizir, which meant less of a haul, but also a smaller chance of being caught. Considering the grim consequences of exposure, it really was our only option if we wanted to eat. It would have sat better with me if we’d looted some rich bastard’s joint instead, but I always made sure not to take everything. Only what we needed to survive.

“Well, maybe one day you can change the world,” he muttered, grinning wryly at me as we walked quickly through the abandoned apartment building.

“Well maybe I can!” I retorted. “Sun and stars! Why do you always make fun of my views?”

“Cause they’re dangerous views, I guess. That old man is always putting ideas in your head.” He grabbed my hand suddenly, stopping me in my tracks just before the back exit we’d come in through. “I couldn’t stand it if anything happened to you.” His eyes had darkened in intensity, and I felt desire stab deep through my belly. His other hand moved to cup the side of my face, its comforting warmth sending unbidden shivers down my back. Humour crinkled his young face, and I wondered if he could sense my uneasiness. He’d always been able to read my thoughts. Uncannily, at times.

A grinding noise startled me, and a lead weight plummeted through my stomach as I recognized it. The sound of that half-broken side door opening. Blank shock dulled his dark eyes, and he wrenched me behind him abruptly.

Be calm, my mind muttered swiftly. It’s probably just a normal cit’ who’ll ignore us.

“We have been looking for you,” a voice said mildly. My throat dried up, but I jumped out from behind the safety of his back regardless, brandishing a dull, chipped shiv that was my only weapon. I ain’t going down without a fight!

To my utter surprise, the figures standing before us weren’t clothed in the loose blue and silver uniform of the Talshion Enforcers. Instead, all three of them were draped in dull brown robes - like clerics or something - and their body language was relaxed. The leader, who had spoken, was a female of some race I’d never seen. Two small, sharp horns protruded from her forehead, and her eyes blazed a brilliant turquoise against her dark skin.

I blinked. “Who the frell are you?”

…

“Hey, wake up.”

Something prodded me in the side, and awareness flared, followed immediately by a heavy pounding in my head. I bit back a groan; the lingering headache seemed to be getting worse. I turned to glare at my neighbour, who retracted the offending arm from my side. “Sorry,” the Duros said mildly. “You were muttering in your sleep. Sounded like a nightmare.”

I nodded once, and winced. Damn this! My arm ached, my head throbbed, and my vision was fuzzy and unclear. The last thing I needed was to be inundated with flashbacks from one of my pasts. At least I know that Karon woman is from Street Kid’s past. Figures. Damn these riddles in my head.

The Force was still teasing me with possibilities, promising me with power. I couldn’t stop the longing to reach out, and as I did so I slammed straight into Bastila’s walls. Schutta!

Jen? Are you listening? Please, you have to come back!

“You okay miss?” the Duros repeated. His grating voice stabbed into my ears. “We’re almost there. Just an hour away.”
My head pounded, my vision blurred...

…”Only one hour until we reach the Genoas system, my Lord,” a man said. He was dressed in a formal military uniform, with Admiral pips on the shoulders. Funny, it looked like a Sith uniform.

“Excellent.” I strode across a large command deck, staring out at the flaring stars. “It starts, Admiral. Soon we shall create a new order. Never again shall we be at the mercy of any threat like the Mandalorian scum.”

The Admiral turned to look at me; an older man, lines of age pitting his face. His hair grew white under a ridiculous military hat. Honestly, I really need to change that ludicrous uniform. His eyes were serious and intelligent, and he opened his mouth to speak.

Something prodded me in the side. Man and starship dissolved.

…”Huh?” I mumbled.

“You gotta pull yourself together, lady,” someone was muttering. Belatedly, I recognized my annoying neighbour. I should silence him. No, a civilian ship was not a good place to start a fight. I don’t want to hurt him, he’s trying to help!

“The Selkath won’t let you into Emnaad if they think you’re stimmed up,” the Duros was saying. What is he jabbering about? “Here, have some of this.”

I stared at the Duros; really looked at him this time. Odd, he seemed to be sincere as he held out a small syringe.

My eyes narrowed. “What the frell is that?”

“Shhh!” he hissed. “It’s just an energy booster. Clears your mind, sorta thing. Looks like you could use it.” I could see the red veins in his big, bulbous black eyes. He’s a junkie. Stoned up to his ugly eyeballs. And yet, he was offering me a solution to my unstable dizziness.

“I’ll be fine,” I said shortly, and turned away. I wanted him to stop talking so I could think. I commanded an admiral? How crazy is that? Can I really believe all these memories? Well, it was obvious that I had been powerful. Really? And maybe next I’ll dream I’m the head of the Senate. I snickered, and the Duros looked marginally offended.

“Come on, it’s only Gree Spice! And you won’t get into Emnaad if you keep blacking out.”

I shrugged, annoyance winning out. Why not, it’ll make him shut up. And I won’t make it to the GenoHaradan if I keep fainting.

You always were too reckless, someone muttered. Always too quick to jump into situations, without a thought for the consequences.

“Emnaad?” I questioned as I took the proffered needle. “What’s that?”

A prick in my arm, the feeling of salvation.

“It’s the main Selkath colony on Rii’shn. Y’know, the Selkath have to live in domes, the planet’s too cold for them. The rest of the place is mostly Czerka mining colonies, all sorts of temporary towns where the Exchange hang out. People disappear, all the time.” The Duros was rambling, and I wondered that I hadn’t picked up on his state earlier. “The Selkath keep things pretty peaceful and controlled in Emnaad. Frakking hard to find any spice around.”

“So why are you going there?” I countered. My head cleared marginally, and my thoughts calmed down. Everything seemed less important. My fragmented memories and lost past reduced in importance; I’d made it this far without knowing who I was. Why did it really matter?

Jen?

Heh, Bastila was still talking to me. Funny, I wasn’t so angry at her anymore. But I wanted what she continued to deny me. The Force. Let’s think about this rationally. I can break through her shields, one step at a time.

No!

I’ve done it before, right?

Jen, I- I. Bastila sighed. I’ll let you have access to the Force, if you tell me where you are going.

I thought about that for a moment, clearly and logically. But if I tell you that, then you’ll find me. I don’t want that, right?

A sense of astonishment radiated from her. What’s wrong with you?

The Duros was grinning idiotically at me. I think I have concussion. I wonder if taking spice was such a good idea, after all.

Spice?

“How long does this last?” I asked curiously. It didn’t really matter. Things were so much clearer now. It didn’t matter whether I was Evil Bitch, or Street Kid, or Jen Sahara... no, I couldn’t possibly be Jen. Everything seemed to point to Evil Bitch. She was the strongest, right?

The Duros giggled. “It'll probably wear off by the time you’re in Emnaad. Doesn’t last long, shame. If you want more, I’ll need some credits.” He hiccupped, and a sane part of me realized he’d taken more than just an energy booster himself. He’s probably on glitterstim. It didn’t matter, he seemed to be happy. Of course it matters, you moron! Snap out of it! This guy could get us into trouble! No, it didn’t really matter.

Spice?! Bastila sounded outraged and incredulous. I giggled. She was funny like that. I-I cannot- I will not deal with this anymore. A sort of weary resignation emanated through the mind-link. You forge your own path, Jen.

The touch of her presence against mine faded, and part of me was surprised. She left? What happened to the overbearing, neurotic woman determined to manipulate and betray me to her masters?

Apathy and relaxation overcame me, and the feeling drifted away, superfluous. My thoughts cleared, and everything seemed so simple, so easy to understand. I’d spent so much time raging at the unknown without doing anything about it. So many days until I’d finally left the others. Of course, Bastila still had control over me. Time to do something about that.

I drew my mind back to my first encounter with Juhani. I’d confronted her as a meek, empty shell, and walked away alive, invigorated, and furious. Somehow during our duel I’d shattered Bastila’s shields in the midst of rage. My eyes closed, and I heard the faint giggle from my happy neighbour, overlaid with the heavy noise of too many people confined into a too small a ship.

Images danced through my mind, as clear as if they happened yesterday. Well, it wasn’t really that long ago, if you think about it. It felt like a lifetime. I could see Juhani, facing me, a feral snarl twisting her features. Despair lurked in the recesses of her amber eyes. Odd, I hadn’t noticed the despair before.

How did I break through Bastila to reach the Force? Rage had overcome me at Juhani’s attack. Fear for myself, fear for Mission. I tried to rekindle that anger, rekindle the fury that constantly blazed within me. For the first time, the fury wouldn’t rise. Maybe it was the ‘energy booster’, maybe my exhaustion. My eyelids drooped. A kaleidoscope of colours stretched outwards, encompassing me. Odd, I felt like I was floating. I couldn’t see the transport ship anymore, just small flickers of life dotted around me. A thick cord of bright white dazzled me, blinded me. It seemed to connect me to someone else. I followed.

…

I will not think of it anymore. I will not think of her. Master Karon had advised me to trust in the Force, and in a way it was a relief to let go of the incessant worry, the continuing darkness suffocating me through that cursed bond.

The glistening walls of the Republic Embassy engulfed me as I strode back towards my assigned room. Karon had gone to see Juhani; I dearly hoped the Cathar would find some peace. The end of the opulent corridor twisted back towards the exit of the embassy, and a flash of blue in a burnt orange flight jacket darted past. Mission? Followed by a lumbering Wookiee.

I sighed internally. So they are leaving. I didn’t really expect anything else; the duo certainly hadn’t tagged along because of my presence. For all that the impressionable Twi’lek seemed to do nothing but irritate, part of me worried what trouble she would run into out on the streets of Ahto City.

It is not like she would listen to me. If she wants to leave, I cannot do anything to stop her. It is better she does not get any more involved with my quest. I wondered briefly how much longer Canderous would stay around.

The door to my room swished open, and I walked inside with a feeling of relief. A small meditation mat adorned a polished chrome floor, next to a large bed that begged to be used. My eyes snagged on the comfortable mattress, and although I berated myself internally, I could not stop my feet from walking towards it. I should meditate first. The bed’s soft comfort engulfed me as I lay down, and a weary sigh escaped. Perhaps I need rest first. Karon wanted me to travel to Hrakert Station, and so I would. This time, I would not fail in my duty.

Whoa, this is surreal.

My body tensed as shock sparked through me.

…

I felt myself forcibly hurled from Bastila’s mind, and the Jedi faded. Were those actually her thoughts? Bastila’s angry indignation wafted after me, and then suddenly her presence vanished. Like she deliberately blocked it.
I was flying away from her mind, back along the thick cord. Is that the bond? I’d never seen it before; it looked so pretty. Stars. What sort of moron am I, taking spice like a crazed idiot? The voice was a familiar sneering whisper; quiet and less powerful than usual.

The Force sparkled around me, like viewing fireworks from a distance. I felt so lethargic, so, so... at peace. Everything was alright. And suddenly I saw it for the first time. Remnants of Bastila; a barrier between me and the Force. The shield I’d slammed into countless times, and shattered only twice. It was pure Force energy itself; humming thick with life. Fashioned into a net, cascading tightly around me, and hooked back through our bond. No matter how I try, I can’t draw on the Force with that thing in the way.

How ironic that a barrier of Force energy would keep me from accessing Force energy. Now that was a curious thought. What if I...?

I tugged gently at the barrier, drawing it in the way I usually pulled on the Force in my surroundings. It gave a little; crumbled. I tugged harder.

It shattered.

Without realizing it, I was holding my breath, waiting for a shrewish mental scream from Bastila. My eyes flew open, and I found myself back in the cramped ship. Noise and smell slammed into my senses, then muted as the Force flooded through me. Powerful, intoxicating, healing. A bigger rush than a syringe could offer. Is that it? Is that all I have to do, to break her shield? The passive way certainly was a lot easier.

Still no response from the snot. Maybe she had fallen asleep, at last. Now that’s a good idea. Maybe when I wake up, the effects of this drug will have worn off. I closed my eyes again, content for the first time in a long, long while.

xXx

I was rudely awoken later, by a Selkath jerking on my shoulders.

“Wake up!” he slurred. “We have landed. You need to leave.”

I prised open grimy eyelids as familiar aches surged back into existence. My weak arm, reminding me of its poor condition. My head, throbbing with a dizzy pain. I gasped in a breath, tentatively drawing on the Force. I called to it, and it answered. I couldn’t sense Bastila, but the Force swirled through me invitingly, begging to be used.

I smiled. Finally, something was going right. My Duros companion had already left, and I noted the transport was remarkably empty. The Selkath scowled, his amphibian features wrinkled in annoyance. It's time to get moving.

I disembarked, picking up HK from the droid storage unit. The datapad Hulas had given me lay heavy in my pocket, detailing where and who to meet. Interestingly, the meeting place wasn’t in the domed city. Hulas had given me a small purse of credits, enough to order a taxi-shuttle to a nearby mining village. There was no time to lose; even on Rii’shn I felt too close to Bastila and her little Master.

The commercial port was situated on the outskirts of Emnaad, outside the major dome. Surveillance drones were buzzing over the crowds of sentients wandering around the starport. Exits into the city itself were heavily guarded by Selkath authorities, and my eyes flicked over a stimmed Duros being searched and arrested. I restrained from sniggering, mentally berating myself for taking his offer in the first place. Part of me still felt woozy despite my grasp of the Force; whether it was due to the spice or the escape pod crashing, I didn't know.

Smirking to myself, I strode towards a nearby taxi.

xXx

It was freezing. An icy wind blew straight through my armour, chilling me to the bone. The hills behind the ramshackle town were dusted in white, and I began to understand why the Selkath did not set foot outside of Emnaad. They probably wouldn’t last longer than an hour out here. I might not either, if I didn’t find some shelter.

“Observation: The designated cantina is up ahead, master.” HK pointed out. I squinted, and made out a lurid pink sign stating 'The Lady’s Garter' in bright Basic. A human followed by a protocol droid were busily entering, and I wondered if it was the only popular place around here. The mining town was an odd mixture of old and new technology; half the buildings looked as if one gale would blow them over. In this weather, it would probably happen soon.

A few sentients were out in the elements, but it was a far cry from the bustling noise of Emnaad. My doomed flying companion had warned me the Exchange and Czerka controlled these areas, so in a way it wasn’t surprising the GenoHaradan wanted to meet here. Scumbags attract scumbags. And when you’ve got a whole bunch of them together... who knows what could happen.

I spotted a Rodian nearby who was backed up against a wall, surrounded by a Bothan and two Gamorreans. His desperate eyes fixed on mine, and I looked away quickly, focusing back on the cantina. I should help. No, I needed to stay out of trouble, and get to the cantina. Why should I help a pathetic weakling, anyway?

”(I didn’t know!)” the Rodian objected, his voice frantic and high-pitched.

“You expect me to believe that you were unaware your best friend and partner was going to betray Tasoan?” the Bothan sneered.

“No one betrays the Exchange,” one of the Gamorreans grunted.

No one should be cornered like that.

I gritted my teeth, and walked on.

”(He said he was loyal! He did!)” the Rodian gasped.

…

"I am loyal! I swear it!" The woman gasped as I lifted her in the Force, slamming her hard against the wall behind.

"Tell me who betrayed me," I snarled viciously, my rage fuelling the Force thrumming and pulsing through my body.

…

I shook my head, stumbling against HK as I strove to clear the fogginess from my mind. I’ve had that vision before. I pulled on the Force, for no reason other than to feel its glorious power surge through me.

“Are you looking for trouble?” a voice snarled from behind, and I turned to see the Bothan and his Gamorrean henchmen glaring at me.
“No trouble,” I said flatly. I heard a whirring of HK’s gears as he focused on the new potential threat.

The Bothan turned back to his captive, muttering something about drunks under his breath. The Rodian was still gazing at me with pleading eyes, and my fists clenched. No, dammit! I will not turn into some sort of simpering little Jedi, helping out everyone in need! This is beneath me!

I walked on, pushing away a dark, sinking feeling. The thugs had gone back to interrogating the Rodian, and the icy wind blew his words to my ears, torturing me with my decision.

“(I really don’t know!)” he pleaded. “(You have to believe me!)”

…I do not know! I wasn't part of it!

I could hear the sincerity in her tone. She was of no use to me then, and I was not in the mood to be sparing. I squeezed my fist, and her neck yanked to the side. And audible snap sounded through the room. Now that was a waste. That sort of carelessness is more often displayed by my apprentice, I berated myself ruefully as I exited the room, stepping over the twitching body.

My apprentice… No, he couldn't be the one who betrayed me. Not him. It would be one of the other remnants of the blasted Jedi Thirteen.

…

“I’ll be fine, HK,” I muttered. There was an ominous silence behind me, and I twisted around to look for the Exchange thugs. The street was deserted.

I grimaced. I guess they decided to do their little interrogation elsewhere. Sod it, maybe I should have helped him.

A thickset Nikto guarded the entrance of the cantina, casually grasping a large blaster rifle. Small, pointed horns lined the side of the bouncer’s leathery face, and the reddish tint to his skin belied the fact he belonged to the most common branch of Nikto; the Kajain’sa. That’s odd. Nikto usually work for the Hutts. I wouldn’t expect one to be a bouncer in a Czerka controlled village. His sharp eyes focused on me as I approached, and he smiled ferally. All I could see was the baring of teeth.

He grunted, pointing his gun in HK’s direction.

“No droids allowed inside,” he growled. My brows lowered. What is it with cantinas and this no droid policy? Anyone would think HK was planning to blow the place up. My eyes slid to the dark red combat droid, whose intent gaze was pinning the Nikto… hostilely. Heh. Maybe I can’t blame them.

“(Observation: This meatbag looks like the bastard offspring of a diseased Hutt,)” HK stated boldly, in a language I understood but could not identify. The menacing tones of the odd language struck me first, and then the insult registered. I stiffened, and my vision snapped back to the Nikto.

“(Which doesn’t say much for his mother,)” HK finished.

What the frell is he doing? The Nikto merely looked bored as he waited for me to send my droid away. HK stared back at me. “(Extrapolation: The guard doesn’t understand me. Master, I observed a droid entering this establishment as we walked down the street. Conclusion: He is trying to separate us. This might be a trap. Suggestion: I can easily blast this meatbag now, master.)”

HK’s words washed through me, and surprise was chased away by irrational anger. My muscles clenched, and I instantly grasped the Force. No one traps me! Somehow I had the common sense – or maybe self-preservation – to grin and nod agreeably at the guard. Calm down. HK’s psychotic – can I really trust his instincts?

“Go back to the hotel, HK,” I said mildly to the droid. “This time, make sure you find the back entrance.” We didn’t have a hotel. I hoped HK would pick up on my meaning. This is going to mean trouble if he’s wrong. A cynical part of me pointed out that the worse trouble was if he was correct. Oh yeah.

HK stared at me with his piercing red gaze. “(Affirmation: At once, master,)” he responded, and strode away. I smiled more confidently than I felt at the alien, who stared back, impassive, and moved aside to let me pass. The lurid pink of the tacky neon sign shone brightly over my face for a brief moment.

The bar inside was fairly deserted, and I was beginning to see that cantinas looked the same all over the galaxy. This particular place was occupied by the same type of ruffians who populated Javyar’s cantina back on Taris. My eyes sharpened on a human who was lurking in the corner, nursing a drink as his droid sat powered down next to him. Right. No droids allowed. I could feel my fingers curling into fists.

A wide door marked ‘Private’ at the back of the room was guarded by a type of alien I didn’t recognize. So much for being the cultural know-it-all. I hadn’t realized how reliant I’d become on this hidden knowledge of my past, this innate ability to speak languages and recognize cultures and technology, even though I had no idea where it came from.

Alright, time to plan. I drew further on the Force, and reached out with it. I can do this. Once before, unintentionally on Tatooine, I’d done it. I can use the Force to sense... My head cleared further, and I felt more alive than I had for days. Faint sparks of life registered around me, and with a sudden boost of confidence I realized I was sensing the drunken inhabitants of The Lady’s Garter through the Force.

The guard further ahead straightened, looking at me suspiciously. He was dark skinned, hairless, and the faint light glinted off sharp teeth. My eyes roved over his muscular frame, menacing claws and bulky armour. Confidence and fury raged, and I reached further out. Somehow, the Force didn’t register on the guard. What? Why can’t I sense his life essence? A latent anger stirred within, blazing heat through my body. What’s really going on here?

I took a step towards the shadowy guard. Never mind. I’ll find out. My fury encompassed an icy core. And if it is a trap, then..... then we’ll just see who walks away alive.

...

I walked further, well aware a trap was waiting for me, but my pride would not allow for anything but to show I was the strongest. No one can best me. No one ever has, and once again, it looks like I have to prove it.

A large chrome door opened. Of course, they are expecting me. I had been lured onto this pathetic hovel of a planet merely to be led into an ambush, organized by Deralian troops and some of my
I will lay waste to this festering planet. But first, the matter of this scum up ahead. I will show them what happens to those who dare to betray me!

I squeezed my eyes shut, and opened them again. Concentrate, dammit! I am stronger than this! The comforting presence of my lightsabers hung at my belt, concealed by the loose clothing I’d worn since I’d left the Ebon Hawk. Funny, I wasn’t cold anymore.

I strode forward towards the back door, and the alien stepped aside.

“Name?” he all but spat.

“Alieya.” I smiled tightly, offering the false one the GenoHaradan had given me. He snorted, and opened the door.

“Come with me,” he grunted, motioning me inwards.

“No, after you,” I offered in a pleasant voice, baring my teeth. He rolled his eyes, an exasperated expression lacing his dark face. Nonetheless, he stepped through the door first.

Questions buzzed insistently through my mind as I took the first step into danger. The door swung ominously shut behind me, but the warehouse itself was well lit, despite a lack of windows. Numerous bright, fluorescent lights hung low from the ceiling, creating a sheen of dazzling brilliance that all but blinded my eyes. Various storage crates lined the walls; probably brimming with alcoholic supplies for the cantina. A small desk graced the far end of the building, behind which a waiting human sat.

I paused, stretching out my Force senses as I did so. A straight path to the waiting human would take me directly between two small stacks of crates, oddly separated from the larger storage boxes that lined the shadowy walls. The alien guard walked nonchalantly between the crates, but something about their position raised my mistrust.

Pinpricks of life flared through the Force, alerting me to about twenty waiting sentients hidden behind the larger crates. Sithspit, it is an ambush! The guard had already passed the middle of the building, nearing the desk at the far wall.

Who am I that a group as powerful as the GenoHaradan would go to all this trouble of killing me? I barely had the self-control to restrain a feral snarl from erupting. The best way to foil an ambush is to trip it and charge.

The Force begged to be used; my anger begged to be unleashed. The snarl erupted unconsciously from my lungs, and my lightsabers jerked into my hands, the red haze of activation mirroring my burning fury. I could feel the Force all around me as primal power, twisting and reverberating through the sabers, surging a dark fury that overpowered any rationality. I wasn't even surprised to feel myself moving, running, sprinting, through the centre of the warehouse, my surroundings elongating in the manner that always accompanied Force induced speed. When you act, strike once and strike hard as if it were your last. Therein lies victory. A dark muttering from Evil Bitch, growing in power.

A large boom sounded behind me; the centre crates exploding as I sped past. Had it not been for my increased celerity, that probably would have been my end. They thought to kill me with a bunch of pathetic mines, a rabid voice growled in my head. They will all die for this!
The heat wave of the blast hit, shunting me closer to the guard who had turned around to look back at me in shock. The comical expression of stunned surprise didn’t leave his face even as my outstretched lightsaber seared through his neck. One moron down, many to follow.

The seated human jerked to his feet and bellowed something, as I leaped over the desk and drove my off-hand saber through his throat. The sheer feeling of supremacy swamped me, overloading my senses. I was vaguely aware of a primitive howl of victory exiting my lungs as I whirled around, utilizing the Force to leap onto the now-bloodied desk. Peace, this can’t be happening, a soft whisper, drowned out by raging, swirling emotions of hatred and fury. Peace is a lie! There is only passion!

The dim lights of the warehouse cut out, engulfing the storage warehouse into a pure blackness only broken by the eerie reddish glow of my ‘sabers. A cold, calculating part of me – the only portion still marginally sane – realized the rest of the GenoHaradan would no doubt be wearing visors. My brilliant weapons were merely showing them the bulls-eye.

...

I stood still in the doorway, aware that the light from the room behind was illuminating my presence like a homing beacon, but perversely I wanted them to make the first, futile move.

I could sense perhaps ten or so Dark Jedi in the room. The blood of Deralian troops still splattered my robes; yet I was more than ready to add to it. Who organized this? Which pathetic minion dared to believe they could challenge me?

The one nearest snarled, and charged. My lightsabers hissed - twin bands of blood-red. I threw one uncaringly at the oncoming traitor, following it with sparks of brilliant blue static from my fingertips.

The man screeched, stumbling backwards and clutching at his shoulder; now missing one arm. I deftly halted my spree of lightening to catch my off-hand ‘saber.

“Cowards!” My snarl ended in a dark, bitter laugh. “You weak fools! All too pathetic to challenge me one on one!”

“Let’s just see if you’re strong enough to survive us all, my lord!” another figure yelled, his last words mocking as he jumped forwards to challenge me.

Arran. Always brash and fiery, but he’s too stupid to organize something like this. I will find out who put them up to this.

The others followed in his wake cautiously, fanning out into a circle.

It started like a dance; an elegant movement of feints and ripostes and blood and lightening and laughter and slaughter... I lost track of everything as the Force bent itself to my will, as my lightsabers cleaved a path through flesh, and my body dodged and weaved around my enemies. My side burned and my leg cried in agony where a ‘saber had carved out a chunk of flesh, but pain was a useful tool. Pain and anger. Tools to unleash passion. And through passion, I gain strength!

...

Shots fired – pinpricks of light I dodged and reflected atop the slippery desk. Memories blurred into reality, and I wasn’t entirely sure who I was fighting anymore. Something slammed into my shoulder, with such force that I fell backwards, landing with a grunt onto the darkened floor. Agony resonated down my arm to the weakened bone still mending, and my teeth bared in the darkness. Pain can be used, Evil Bitch growled gleefully. I succumbed further; the Force welled up like a bursting water pipe about to explode. Used to release passion. Passion that can build strength, and increase power.

Something exploded inside of me; a thousand shards of broken ferracrystal pierced through my skin from the inside out, stabbing through in an oddly satisfying way. I screamed; whether in surprise or rage or glee I no longer knew. My senses peaked as sharply as a glitterstim high, and a darkly visible aura pulsed and radiated around me. The true berserker state, at last! Evil Bitch was crowing.

Numerous grenades were lobbed towards me; the Force hurled them back towards their owners as I leapt clear of the desk. Bright flashes of fragmentation danced against crates, and the blissful tones of agonized screaming filled my ears. This is true living! True power!

...

“Your time has come! Your power is draining, I can feel it!” Arran snarled. He had only two allies left, but all three raised their lightsabers threateningly.

“Surely you don’t think you’ve seen the limits of my power, little Sith pretender?” I mocked. “Let me show you just how mistaken you are. My power is my victory. You will beg for release at the end.”

I pulled on the Force, jerking the Zeltron’s feet out from underneath him.

"Tut tut," I mocked, leaping backwards to avoid the charge of the others. "You really should guard yourself better." Arran Da'klor was a hot-headed imbecile. He’d seen me use that trick in practise against Talvon, against Yudan, even against my loving apprentice. They’d learned to guard themselves against it - well, Talvon was long dead - but stupid Arran hadn’t learned a thing. The others wouldn’t have had anything to do with this. Not Yudan. Not Mal. Not Mal...

I unleashed a powerful Force-compressed blast of air that slammed into all of them as Arran was struggling to his feet. It knocked Arran and one of his lackeys back down, but the other, a human female, grunted with effort as she blocked it. I took the opportunity to jump towards Arran’s fallen comrade and sheathe my lightsaber home into his chest.

"There goes another one of your friends,” I taunted, turning to face the female. Fear and uncertainty rolled off her in tantalizingly sweet waves I could almost smell. I reached out and massaged that fear, encouraging it to take over. She may have strength, but she lacks conviction in her own abilities. The woman took a hesitant step backwards, and my smile grew as I squeezed my fist tight. She choked, dropping her weapon to clutch at her throat.

“No!” Arran shrieked, charging me like a rancor in heat. I laughed as I sent him flying with another Force wave. My hand clenched again, and the Dark Jedi gagged.

“Neiza!” Arran yelled, his voice twisting in emotion.

“Oh dear,” I said softly as the woman suffocated. “Don’t tell me you actually care for the girl, Arran?” She had risen into the air, legs twitching spasmodically as her hands scrabbled at her throat. “Lucky for you I am feeling generous. Beg on your knees for forgiveness, and I may yet let her live.”

“Never!” Arran snarled, lurching to his feet.

“A shame. I guess you didn’t really care for her then.”
The GenoHaradan were, however, professionals. A number of them fired modified slug throwers at me; impossible to see in the darkness... unless one could utilize the Force. My lips curved as I dodged the old-fashioned projectiles; some missing me entirely while others melted on my blades.

Four assassins leapt towards me with vibroblades; their movements appearing slow and clumsy to my heightened senses. Others were still firing; I lured the blade-wielders in between me and the cross-fire. The Force hummed through my flesh; the power of life of which I was master. I twisted it to do my bidding, piercing deep into nearby minds with a blast of intangible terror. All but one of the assassins dropped to their feet, clutching at their heads and screaming. The remaining one, an Aqualish, stepped forward with his blade raised. I admired his ability to resist the fear; this one had courage. I let the Force wrap around him, coil tightly over his limbs as I searched for a weak spot. Electrical impulses caught my attention; they emanated from his eye sockets. Curious. Occular implants? Well, that was easy enough to focus on. I tightened my focus, narrowing it on his eyes and finding my target. With a satisfied smirk, I yanked mentally.

The Aqualish screeched so loudly that even the drunken louts back in the cantina must have heard. His eyes landed with a wet plop behind me.

An explosion rocked the ceiling, the noise a slow growling boom in my ears. I looked up to see a blast of light shattering through the cheap plastifoam roof, followed by fragments of insulation floating like fragile snowflakes dusting the warehouse with winter’s kiss. A droid dropped down from the heavens, firing a blaster rapidly on his descent.

“Observation: I see you have started the fun without me, master,” HK commented as he landed with a thud, in a tone that somehow managed to convey disappointment.

Victory was near; I could almost taste it, despite the fact I was still outnumbered. HK started firing rapidly, his shots accurate and his movements nimble despite his mechanical build. One of the assassins turned to run, but did not make it to the door.

“Dashade. Recognition slammed through me; the force-resistant species thought to be extinct. How the frell had the GenoHaradan acquired two of the bastards?

“You won’t find me so easy, Jedi!” the alien spat.

“I’m no Jedi!” I snarled, drawing deeper into my faltering berserker state. The Force was sputtering in my grasp, slithering away. “And while the Force may not touch you, Dashade, it can certainly aid me!” I finished on a howl, and charged.
Speed was on my side, and his attack just wasn’t quick enough. His Echani blade whistled through the air, missing my neck as I dodged; sliding onto my knees and slicing through the tendons in his leg with a ‘saber. I rolled away as the Dashade howled, hopping onto his other foot instinctively to lurch at me again. One ‘saber rose to parry, while the other stabbed deep through his foot, into the permacrete floor. The smell of burning, cauterized flesh tickled my senses.

A scream of pure agony ripped from the Dashade as he stumbled, off-balance, his foot slicing cleaning through the ‘saber as he did so. His blade clattered uselessly, a small distance away from his hand.

I stood up, acting quickly as the Force threatened to desert me. My strength is fading. My lightsabers both poised at the alien’s neck, I bared my teeth.

“Why?” I yelled. “Why did the GenoHaradan double-cross me?”

“Why do you think?” the Dashade grunted, closing his eyes in pain.

_The GenoHaradan fight for money. Someone put a contract on my head._ “Who, then?” My voice had grown softer. “Tell me who, before I start randomly slicing your limbs off.”

“We have our own honour code, Jedi scum!” the Dashade spat. “Some information cannot be bought!”

“Everything can be bought.” I said coldly, dragging a ‘saber down towards his groin. “Everyone has a price, my friend. And you are just about finished.”

…

“You are finished, Arran,” I said softly, unleashing a bolt of white lightning into the Zeltron. His tortured screams wafted through the stagnant air. “But you know how long I can make you suffer. Weeks... months even. Tell me who commandeered this, and your end will be quick.”

He had lost his lightsaber, an arm, half a leg and his dignity. But he was not broken, yet. “I gave the orders! This was my mission!” he spat in between choking gasps of pain.

I laughed mockingly, firing another round of lightening through his living corpse. “Do not insult me! I have known you for too long, Arran Da’klor. You are a follower, and your temper is easily manipulated. If not for your depth of power and early loyalty, you would never have been one of the Jedi Thirteen.”

“I curse the day I ever joined your crusade,” Arran hissed. A bubble of bloody spit dribbled from the corner of his mouth. “But you’re right, we were loyal once. And you burned that out of us, burned it out of us all.”

“Who was it?” I snarled, as the achromatic crackle of electricity danced once more through his body. And all the while, my furious thoughts raged. Bandon, Bandon is the most likely. But he’s so new, he wouldn’t have the resources to pull this off alone. And Nisotsa’s too cautious, Yudan’s too loyal, and Mal would never… “Tell me! Was it Bandon? Yudan? Malak himself? I’ll rip it from your mind if I have to!”

Arran’s gasps of pain were broken and unsteady; the Force had long since left him. Or so I thought, and was completely unprepared for his next move.

A sudden, brief jerk on the Force, focused entirely on a small, ceremonial dagger strapped around my thigh. It flew into the air and embedded in his heart before I could act.
“You will never know,” he gasped. I flooded the Force through him instinctively, furiously trying to knit together muscle and flesh. I could not heal properly, but damage control was something I had grown adept at. His life ebbed away, despite my efforts. “You will always doubt your followers, my Lord Revan,” he choked, his head turning and I felt his spirit depart.

...

I froze; everything turned to ice, and the Force slipped away, out of my grasp. Agony returned in a flood; muscles complained and burned but nothing could override the growing sense of terror within my own head.

I stumbled backwards, vaguely aware my mouth had dropped open in horror. The Dashade took one look at me, and lurched towards his Echani duelling blade lying nearby.

What did Arran say?

My limbs failed me, my thoughts reeled in denial.

Who is Evil Bitch?

The Dashade grasped his weapon, and pulled it back to throw at me.

-my Lord-

No words could be more damning.

HK materialized behind the Dashade, firing point-blank into his head. The blade clanged to the ground, dropping from lifeless fingers. Just another corpse.

“Statement: All meatbags have now been terminated, master.” A smug, metallic voice.

I was lying down. I wasn’t sure how I’d made the transition from standing to lying, but I couldn’t move anymore. Couldn’t think. Couldn’t breathe.

xXx

Time passed. Seconds or hours; I wasn’t sure and I didn’t care. Time lost all meaning when compared to the horrifying revelation rebounding mercilessly within my own head. A logical voice was stating that it was time to move; time to get out before anyone discovered the piles of GenoHaradan corpses that lay within touching distance, surrounding me like a field of red daisies. The sharp tang of bloodied, mortal injuries assailed my senses, and it would not be long before I was discovered.

But that thought paled in comparison with the knowledge of who Evil Bitch truly was. No wonder she kept wresting control. It all makes nightmarish sense. Funny how much importance can be trapped into a name. Jen Sahara, on one hand, meant nothing. A common enough Deralian name, to suit a common enough scholar. But now I know another name. Two out of three.

Bubbles of hysteria trapped in my throat, sticking like cheap fizz-pop. Part of me had almost become resigned to a lack of knowledge about my past. To never knowing who I really was. Not Jen Sahara. I knew that from the start. Evil Bitch or Street Kid? I thought I’d worked that one out those first days on Taris, but everything since then had become... murky.

So what does that make me? Two out of three. Neither name could possibly be correct; one anonymous and sickeningly passive; the other a hideous, macabre monster from a horror vid.
Terrifying and utterly unbelievable.

A chill swept through me again.

I couldn’t feel. My entire body was disjointed, like I had somehow separated myself from the physical flesh. One thought alone kept repeating in my head, like the monotonous chant of monks praying to their un-noticing god. No rational analysis was possible, not with the numb, detached question spinning around and around, demanding an answer that I did not know. But still, I kept asking myself.

Why do I have the Dark Lord of the Sith in my head?

xXx

Chapter End Notes

Many thanks to kosiah for the beta.
Master Karon smiled warmly at me and patted my shoulder. I managed a weak shadow of a smile in response. I felt somewhat drained in spirit after the last few hours. Talking and meditating with Karon had brought a glimmer of peace to my soul, but I could not look at her without thinking of another. There had been only two Zabrak Masters in the Jedi Order - and although I had met Karon only once prior, she reminded me sharply of a past I desired to forget.

She looks so similar to Quatra. Perhaps I was not good at distinguishing differing features of the Zabrak race, but other than Master Karon’s startling eyes, they could have been sisters. They even talk the same. Both spoke with a soft intensity, as if every word had a deep meaning beyond the obvious. Both had a quiet charisma, that made others stop and listen. But there are differences. In all the years I spent with Quatra, I never heard her laugh.

Karon’s chuckle was a bright chime, and at times I could see a sort of wry self-deprecation in her eyes. And flashes of pain whenever we speak of Revan.

Karon seemed to be a gentle sort of person, and I found myself wondering how I would have fared under her tutelage. The last few hours of meditation had forced me to analyze my own character in ways that left me feeling uncomfortable with myself. I latched on to Quatra so intensely because I had no one left, and my childhood had taught me that love was meant to difficult, perhaps even unreachable. Quatra had always been stand-offish and sparing with her praise, which made me desire it all the more.

Bastila had, of course, told me of Quatra’s survival back on Tatooine, but with the revelation of Jen’s true identity – amongst other things – I’d managed to push away the knowledge to a dark, quiet corner of my troubled mind. The fact that Quatra still lived made a bitter mockery of the time I’d spent, in rage and despair and grief. A tiny, twisted part of me wished that she actually was dead. How can I think that? She was my Master! I loved her! And yet, she had betrayed me most cruelly.

Only now was Quatra’s image tarnished in my mind, although I recalled a time when someone else was none too impressed with my former master....

The dry, dusty fragrance of long grass tickled my senses, as the blades tickled my face. Dantooine’s clear night sky stretched infinitely above me, and as I lay quietly on the solitary plains, I wondered how similar the panorama above me was to my homeworld’s skies. I could no longer recall it: frantic, bitter memories of Tarisian streets and Tarisian nightmares had long since eroded any recollection of my early years. But I am fortunate, now. The Jedi have taken me in, and I can finally achieve my dream – if only I work harder.
Quatra’s latest lecture still rang in my ears and I was intently determined to win her approval. I would make her smile at me; I would make her proud. My other dreams of her were foolish whisperings that I ruthlessly pushed away and refused to indulge, except when the longing became too strong.

“She is too hard on you,” a voice spoke next to me, cracking through the night’s serenity.

The corners of my mouth turned down. Belaya was my closest friend, my only friend since Dak had run, but she did not understand Quatra. “She is a Master, Belaya, she knows what she is doing. And I will be a better Jedi for it.”

“Juhani, are you blind? She spends all day lecturing you, assigns you to trials and exercises that daunt most Knights, and then forces you to meditate upon your failures for days on end! No other master is so harsh!”

“You cannot seriously question a Master – we are only Padawans! We know nothing of the Order.” I struggled to stay calm – I did not wish to offend my friend, but how could she understand a Master’s methods? Particularly when Tefain – her Master - was such an affable, gentle character in comparison.

“That’s- that’s – that’s kath dung!” she burst out.

I blinked in the darkness. I had never heard Belaya curse; her speech was consistently formal – almost to a fault.

Belaya sighed. “Juhani, your admiration for her is too intense, and Quatra is determined to quash that feeling with everything she puts you through! But no matter how arduous the trial, you just admire her all the more!”

“Too intense?” the words ripped angrily from my lungs, and I jumped to my feet. “You know nothing, Belaya!” I spat. “Quatra is my Master, of course I care for her! Do not – ever – imply such a thing again!”

Somehow Belaya had risen as well, and she reached out an imploring hand. I jerked away, furious, and she sighed heavily. “I am sorry. I did not mean to offend. I just - I care for you too, Juhani, and I- I am worried.”

I turned my back, and faced the nearby Enclave. “Do not concern yourself on my behalf, Belaya. I have the utmost faith in Master Quatra, and she knows what she is doing,” I said coldly as I started striding away.

Belaya’s next words were soft and not meant for my ears, but the gentle Dantooine breeze taunted me with them. “I hope she does, Juhani. I hope she does.”

…

“Are you ready, Juhani?” Karon’s soft words cut through my reverie. I blinked, and nodded solemnly at her as she opened the door of the small meeting room we had occupied for the last four hours. Karon had declared it was time for a break from soul-searching, time to see Bastila and discuss our immediate plans. Both of us had been in a Force trance and sensed the young Jedi slowly come to consciousness.

But it’s the other presences we felt that worry me. Karon dismissed my fears openly, but the way her mouth tightened belied her casual attitude. It felt like eight, or perhaps ten, dark souls. In a place as populated as Ahto City, the seething mass of life made it difficult to pick out any single mind in particular. But when a group of Force users – dark Force users – were assembled together, one would have to be Force-blind not to sense them.

Too many things were pressing down on me. Not the least was Revan’s flight. My first feeling upon realizing that had been despair. She had once begged me to teach her – a request that had ballooned in importance with Calo Nord’s startling revelation. Part of me was convinced that only by saving Revan from the darkness could I prove myself worthy of once more wearing the mantle of the Jedi. Somehow, deep down, I felt like my redemption had escaped along with her. No. Master Karon has faith in me; as does Bastila. If only I shared it.

And then there’s the mission Karon wants us to accomplish. A secret Republic base on the bottom of the Manaan Ocean – conveniently near where the Council believed the Star Map to be located – had abruptly cut contact with the Republic and Selkath authorities alike. What was more worrying was that no rescue team had yet returned – and two had already been sent.

The thought of descending into those watery depths turned my stomach, but I could not let Master Karon or Bastila see that. I had enough to prove – I had to live up to the honour of being a Jedi once more – without falling victim to my own weaknesses. But all that water.... Oceans, in general, made most Cathar uneasy, but the phobia had always been more potent for me. Or perhaps it is because I am weak. Can I really expect to be strong enough to become a Jedi once more? After the last year?

I swallowed, and firmly pushed those doubts aside. I had to prove myself! If I could not do it by guiding Revan to the light, then I would by helping Bastila. Too long had I shirked my responsibilities, too long had I taken the easy way out.

“I don’t think you fell to the Dark Side as much as used it as an excuse for your own failure.”

Revan’s words, taunting and yet far too perceptive from one as tormented as she. It was mere minutes after our duel on Tatooine, and already she had cut to the core of my weakness.

…

“I failed my Master!” I burst out, despair coursing through me. The anger had gone, swallowed up by the endless pit of misery this strange human was evoking. Why was she tormenting me so? Why had she not killed me yet? “I failed them all! What else could I do?”

The clay walls of Anchorhead were nearing, mulling with sentient life I did not wish to face. Yet I could not go back to my violent, meaningless existence.... not anymore.

“Learn from your mistakes?” she snapped sarcastically, green eyes flashing. Despite the mocking nature of her tone, there was a grain of wisdom there I could not shy away from.

…

“Juhani?” Karon prompted again, frowning as she waited by the door. I gave myself a little shake, and followed her meekly down the corridor.

I felt bare, like my soul was ripped open for all to see. Merely compounding this was the empty space on my belt where my lightsaber previously hung. Karon had politely asked to hold onto mine for the time being, assuring me she would return it soon. While I trusted the Zabrak master and was not particularly attached to the Sith lightsaber Bastila had provided me with, I still felt oddly uncomfortable without it at the ready.

We reached Bastila’s quarters just as she stepped out, pale and shaking. Karon immediately went to her, resting hands upon the young Jedi’s shoulders.

“Bastila? What is it? The bond?”

“I-“ Bastila stammered, before quickly regaining her composure. Her face, while still lacking in colour, firmed into a brief smile of greeting. For all that she had been put in many trying situations, Bastila was still able to quickly summon a composure I envied. “I had a rather disturbing dream.”

“Yes?” Karon asked pointedly.

“I-I cannot really recall it, Master Karon,” Bastila said haltingly. “It was – strange. All I could feel was anger. Anger and death.”

“Jen?” Karon’s voice was low.

“Yes,” Bastila admitted reluctantly. “I do not know what has happened, but it is almost as if I cannot sense her anymore. I know she is there but-” She sighed. “My sense of her is numb. Like the stories of an amputee’s ghost limb. She broke through my shields earlier. Perhaps she has found a way of distancing herself from me.”

Karon pursed her lips. “And she is not answering you?”

“I do not believe she can hear me, Karon,” Bastila responded, an apprehensive frown edging into her controlled countenance.

A tired look invaded the Zabrak’s bright eyes. “We must have faith in the Force.” It almost sounded as if Karon was talking to herself. “Leave it to me, Bastila. She is my responsibility.” Karon’s voice dropped on the last word.

The young Jedi nodded, and turned to look me over. Sympathy warmed her face, an emotion I did not particularly want nor deserve. “How are you, Juhani?” Her voice was kind, and I shrugged my discomfort off.

“I am good,” I said softly. Bastila’s eyes pinned me with the lie, and I sighed. “Well, I am better than I was.”

She smiled, and I was surprised by the sadness of it. “I am glad to hear that.” She looked over at Karon again, and straightened her shoulders. “I am ready to investigate the base now.”

“Now?” Karon’s voice was sharp with concern. “Bastila, for all that I said this mission was important, I do really think that-”

“There you are!” an annoyed, smarmy voice broke through our conversation, and I looked up to see Roland Wann stride down the corridor. He was scowling in frustration, his attention focused on the Zabrak master. The Republic commander had already impressed upon me his dislike of having Jedi stationed in the Embassy, even though it was he who had requested Karon’s aid. The only person who seemed to irritate Roland more than one of us was the Mandalorian.

“Commander Wann,” Karon acknowledged, tipping her head in deference. She did not have to be so polite; although Roland Wann was a Fleet officer, the Embassy itself was technically controlled by the Senate, which meant that Karon had as much authority as the human himself.

Roland’s scowl deepened in response. He was middle-aged, for a human, with dark skin and thinning hair. His face was scarred in a few places, indicating that once upon a time, he had seen action of some sort. However his uniform fit him tightly, straining somewhat against his girth.
Posted on the relatively peaceful planet of Manaan, I doubted Roland Wann was as fit as he had once been.

“Karon,” he said flatly, omitting the customary title. I saw Bastila stiffen at his rudeness. “I thought you would have been on your way to Hrakert Station by now. You did promise aid.” His voice edged on accusatory.

“We have just been discussing it, Commander Wann.” Bastila interrupted, stressing his rank pointedly. Karon shot Bastila a small frown. I decided to stay quiet.

Roland Wann glanced at Bastila in annoyance, and then looked back to the Zabrak.

“Well?” he demanded.

Karon sighed audibly. “As Padawan Shan said,” she began, and I wondered if she was silently reminding Bastila of her own station, “we are talking about it right now.”

“What’s to talk about? I need a rescue team down there! I have men trapped in the station, men I haven’t heard from for days! And we haven’t had a shipment for over a week!” Roland’s face was flushed with anger.

Shipment? I wonder if he’s more concerned over lost credits than men. I berated myself; I could not know Roland’s motivation, and that sort of uncharitable thought was beneath me.

“Commander Wann,” Karon said tightly, in a clipped voice. “Jedi’s Bastila and Juhani will be travelling down there today. I will honour my word.”

The Republic officer looked affronted and almost incredulous as he once more eyed Bastila, and then turned to appraise me dismissively. The corners of his mouth turned down further. “I thought you were heading down, Karon.” He calmed his voice down, apparently trying to wrest back control of his temper.

“I promised aid; I did not say I would go myself. I have other responsibilities, Commander,” Karon said tightly. Her face was a cold mask, and I was reminded sharply of Quatra at that very moment. Icy disapproval. I shivered.

“This mission seems to call for a Jedi master, not a bunch of apprentices!” he lashed back. Considering Bastila’s reputation as a warhero, I did not understand why Roland was so angry. Perhaps he is looking for any reason to tear a strip off Karon.

Bastila interrupted once more, scowling. “I will do my duty,” she said in a low voice. I looked at her in surprise. Perhaps I am not the only one with something to prove.

“Commander, could you inform us of Captain Onasi’s whereabouts?” Karon enquired, cutting in before Roland could continue his tirade. “I believe his help would also be invaluable.”

“Captain Onasi is otherwise occupied with Republic business,” Roland shot back silkily, his voice almost... sanctimonious. Karon’s bright eyes bored into his, and the human stiffened in righteous determination. Bastila looked ready to join in the battle of wills once more.

“Having fun?” a mocking voice drawled. The four of us started, turning to see the bulky form of Canderous Ordo saunter down the hallway like he owned it. I struggled to stop a frown pleating my forehead. The way the man walked - like a predator casually loping through his territory - set my hackles rising. And yet, I could not help a grudging respect for him, ever since our stand-off against Calo Nord. We fought well together; I could not deny that the ruthless Mandalorian was a talented warrior. I also had the uncanny feeling he was more intelligent than he let on.

“Canderous. You wanted something?” Bastila interjected, turning to face him squarely. A smirk played on his face as he lazily appraised us all. I did not doubt he could feel the tension swirling between the four of us.

“Simply to say farewell, princess,” he said at last, his gaze coming to a rest on the young Jedi. “It’s been... interesting.”

“You’re leaving?” Bastila echoed sharply.

“Why, yes,” he drawled. “The party’s breaking up, or haven’t you noticed? First Jen and psychodroid make an explosive getaway, and then the Twi’lek brat and her overgrown carpet sod off. No doubt you’ll find those two in some seedy bar, lifting a few pockets. Figure I might as well head out now, find some work... actually get paid for risking my life,” he added pointedly.

“You are looking for mercenary work, Canderous Ordo?” Karon cut in smoothly.

“Well,” he replied in a sarcastic voice, “it’s generally what mercenaries do.”

Bastila’s eyes flashed at his tone, and Roland Wann looked ready to throw him out. Karon, however, let out a tinkle of amused laughter. “In that case, I have a proposition for you.”

Canderous’ grey eyes sharpened on the Zabrak. “Not interested, Jedi. Not unless you pay me upfront.”

Karon inclined her head. “That can be arranged.”

“Karon, we can handle the situation,” Bastila protested.

The Zabrak’s expression softened as she looked at Bastila. “Yes you can, Bastila. However, I would prefer you had additional help. We do not know exactly what happened at Hrakert Station, and seeing as Captain Onasi is otherwise indisposed—she threw a rueful look at Roland Wann, who scowled in return, “-then I will take help where I find it. Trust in the Force, Bastila.”

“I don’t like the idea of a Mandalorian mercenary interfering in Republic business,” Roland cut in, crossing his arms in belligerence.

“I’m sure you don’t,” Canderous drawled, his voice mocking. Roland Wann drew himself up to retort, but once more Karon intervened. I wondered at her seemingly endless patience. Canderous, in his own way, was as hard to deal with as Roland.

“Roland, your last rescue teams was comprised entirely of mercenaries, so you should have no problem with Canderous accompanying the others. I will pay his fee, so it will cost you nothing,” Karon interjected smoothly. “Canderous, if you would come with me, we can discuss the more material aspects of this mission. Juhani, Bastila, freshen up and meet us in the communications room. Commander Wann, I would be obliged if you could meet us there also.”

Roland looked like he was being forced to swallow something extremely unpleasant. Canderous rolled his eyes, but willingly followed Karon down the corridor. I guess he’s prepared to do anything for money.

I glanced at Bastila; she shot me a look of pure annoyance about the circumstances. I was merely glad I had stayed out of the bickering, but I wondered how well I would be taking things in an hour or so. Trapped with Bastila and Canderous sniping at each other, and surrounded by all that “I do not know who is worse,” Bastila muttered, exiting the refresher. I had been sitting on the small meditation mat, waiting for her to finish. “Roland Wann with his snide comments and dislike of Jedi, or Canderous’ bloodthirsty nature and superiority complex. Force, what was Karon thinking? We do not need his help, and he is hardly trustworthy.”

“An extra pair of hands cannot hurt,” I said softly, glancing around her quarters once more. I was unused to such luxury, and I wondered if Bastila was also. Although the enclave on Dantooine was far superior to any habitat I’d lived in prior, it was still sparse and small. The decadence of the Republic rooms made me itch. “Perhaps Karon believes there is a reason Canderous appeared when he did.”

Bastila threw me a sharp look, and then sighed. “You are correct, Juhani. Certainly, this continued quarrelling serves no one. I should have more patience.”

She smiled at me, patting me companionably on the arm. I wondered when Bastila had started to treat me like a friend. She was still concerned for me – I could see by the way she sometimes watched me worriedly when she thought I wasn’t paying attention – but overall, she treated me like an equal. Like a fellow Jedi. Despite my own insecurities and worries, it felt nice.

“Let us find the others then,” Bastila said on a cheery note that somehow rang false. I followed her silently through the glistening corridors of the Embassy, lost within my own thoughts. I would prove myself with this mission - I had to. It felt as if my whole future was riding on it.

No. I believed the same about Revan. I thought that only by teaching her would I be able to redeem myself, and she has taken that choice out of my hands. I must confront my future one step at a time. Nothing important was ever easy.

Karon smiled as we entered the main communications room. A number of Republic technicians were busy working at terminals along the far wall, but the main console was abandoned except for Wann’s presence. He gave us both a minuscule nod, saving his glare for Canderous who was slouching against a chrome wall behind Karon.

“Are you both sure you wish to start now?” Karon enquired. “You have time for a few more hours of rest.”

Roland began to interrupt hotly, but subsided when Bastila waved a placating hand. “I am ready, Master Karon.”

“As am I,” I echoed softly, striving to sound confident.

“Let’s just get on with it,” Canderous muttered.

“I take it you have been paid, Canderous?” Bastila said icily.

“Even a mercenary has to eat, princess,” he grated in response, folding his arms.

“Commander Wann,” Karon cut in. “If you would be so kind as to brief us on the mission?”

I thought I heard the older man sigh. “As you know, the Republic is fighting for its very existence against the evil of the Sith Empire,” Roland Wann began. Although I sympathized with the struggle, I could not help but feel the man sounded pompous. He flicked a suspicious glance at Canderous. “Hrakert Station is but one of our research bases across the galaxy. It is, however, of great importance.”

“What sort of ‘research’?” Canderous interrupted, dragging a cigarra to his lips.

“I’ll thank you not to smoke in here,” Roland said stiffly.

Canderous looked ready to object until Karon stared at him pointedly. He rolled his eyes, but pocketed the cigarra anyway.

Roland sniffed, and continued talking. “It’s a biological research station. That’s all you need to know.”

“It’s got something to do with this kolto you Republic love, isn’t it?” Canderous interrupted once more. “It’s gotta be the only thing here to get you so panicky.”

A bland expression crossed Karon’s face, and a muscle twitched under Roland’s eye as he opened his mouth to rant. “That would be a violation of the Selkath non-interference agreement. Mandalorian! It is merely a research base – we are worried because we care for all the workers of the Republic! Unlike you bloodthirsty barbarians, happy enough to slaughter any innocent—” “Calm!” Karon’s voice resonated through the room, causing even the unflappable Mandalorian to blink. The silence the followed her command was filled with a peaceful, relaxing sensation, and I marvelled at Karon’s ability to manipulate the Force so subtly. Both Roland and Canderous seemed to relax somewhat, their postures loosening.

“Now, Roland, perhaps you can tell us about the rescue parties you have already sent?” Karon’s voice was deceptively mild.

Roland coughed. “As you know, we lost contact with the base six days ago. We were nearing completion of the southern section when the digging teams reported some sort of obstruction... could be that artefact you mentioned earlier, Karon. After that, transmissions from the base were cut off abruptly. We sent a rescue party almost immediately, but they did not report back. Our second team contacted us only once.”

Roland leaned over the console, tapping a couple of keys. A few seconds later, and the static crackle of a voice filled the room.

“Republic HQ, this is Scarlett Five. We’ve just docked at Hrakert Station. The firaxan sharks were crazy on the way down! I’m glad for the sonics, otherwise we’d be a bloody mess on the bottom of the ocean. In fact, I’m surprised we aren’t anyway.” There was a slight pause in the message.

“Commander, this place is a mess. There’s no power to most of the base. I could see the southern side of the station was destroyed as we came in. There’s a pile of corpses here, too... Selkath, Human, and what looks like the last rescue party. Dammit, I’m starting to get the feeling you ain’t paying us enough, man. Will report once we’ve made some headway. Out.”

Canderous broke the ominous silence with a harsh bark of laughter. “Ain’t this gonna be a barrel of laughs.”

Bastila pointedly ignored his comment, turning to look at Roland. “This was the only message you received?”

Roland sighed heavily. Somehow, he looked older than before. “The only one, yes.”

“How many men in the rescue teams?” Canderous asked.
“Five in the first group. The last lot was four mercenaries, I guess I didn’t really expect them to make it, but I had to try something!” Roland ended in frustration.

“At this stage, we have no idea what could have caused the problem,” Karon intervened.

“Perhaps the Sith?” Bastila offered.

“Peace, I hope not,” Roland muttered. “I don’t think so. We would have heard from them – and the Selkath conservatives – if they had discovered-” Roland coughed abruptly, his dark skin flushing. “I think it has something to do with the unusual behaviour of the firaxan sharks. Our underwater sensors were going mad with aquatic activity, and that transmission you just listened to mentioned the same thing. I’m almost inclined to believe the damned sharks attacked the base, although that seems a little far-fetched.”

“I wonder if their behaviour is merely a symptom of the problem,” Karon said softly. “Firaxan sharks, in general, do not attack unless provoked.”

“Well, we ain’t gonna find out by yakking about it all day,” Canderous interrupted gruffly. “Let’s get our gear, and move out.”

We made our way to the submersible, following Roland Wann deeper into the Embassy. He briskly showed us the departure point and then strode off, muttering about more important things to do. Ironic, really, considering he was the one who had insisted this was so urgent.

The small submersible bobbed gently in the water. Sleek and black, I eyed it over dubiously as I wondered how the three of us would fit in there. We will be travelling down into the turbid depths. A coiling hand grasped my stomach. I will not let this get to me. I will be strong.

“Juhani?” Bastila enquired; I turned to see a concerned look on her pale face. She stood close to me, lowering her voice so the others could not hear. “Are you well? Perhaps you do not need to go with us; you could possibly help Karon up here.”

She doesn’t think I am up to it.

A sense of shame shot through me. “I will be fine, Bastila,” I said softly. “I will prove myself to you.”

She blinked in surprise. “You do not need to prove yourself, Juhani! You have already done enough. That Dark Side calls to us all; you are not alone. I think you should stay.”

Astonishment dawned into understanding. She believes it is the Dark Side that is troubling me. That was probably a good thing, I did not want anyone to know of my weakness. The sound of water lapping against the submersible grated in my ears.

I forced a smile. “Bastila, I will be fine. We all have our own challenges to face.”

Bastila hesitated. “I- yes, you are correct. I confess that I am also troubled. As much as I disliked my bond with Jen, I do not know how to react now that I can no longer sense her. I- I wish I had some inkling of what she is doing- or her state of mind-” Bastila smiled at me weakly. “But now I am rambling. Master Karon told me that Jen is now her concern, not mine.”

I smiled back at her, thoughtful. I had always thought of Bastila as strong in her Jedi serenity. Only now was I beginning to see that she had her own issues to deal with. Revan’s departure affected us all in various ways. Carth had been unapproachable in his foul temper, and disappeared immediately after we reached the Embassy. Mission was staggered – I’d been able to smell the hurt radiating from her back on the Ebon Hawk. And now, both she and her Wookiee friend had gone.

As for Canderous... well, no one really knew what the Mandalorian was thinking. He had seemed grumpier then normal, but perhaps that was just Bastila’s presence. I sighed.

“So this is the secret docking bay, huh? That little boat looks like it would sink with just one of us in there,” Canderous’ gravely voice cut through my inner musing. I turned to see him and Karon walk into the room.

“You know enough about vehicles, Canderous; I doubt you believe your own remarks,” Karon responded mildly. “You will find the submersible is quite reliable and sound. It is also fitted with sonic rays that will keep the firaxans at bay.”

The Mandalorian grunted as Karon turned to face us. She smiled briefly at Bastila and me, and indicated she had a gift for us both.

“Your lightsabers,” the intense master said, tossing a cylindrical object to us both. I caught mine reflexively. “I hope you do not mind that I modified them somewhat.”

I glanced at Karon in surprise, and activated it. The snap-hiss was music to my ears, but the bright blue colour drained the heat from my face.

Bastila was beaming, twirling a yellow double-bladed ‘saber. “Thank you! I was not quite accustomed to that sickly red colour.”

I had not held a blue lightsaber for years. The crystal I had found once, on Dantooine, had been blue. A peaceful, dark blue.

“I doubt it’s as modified as your original lightsaber, Bastila, but it will have to do for the meantime,” Karon said dryly. “What became of yours, anyway?”

Bastila flushed uncommonly. “It was – misplaced. A lot happened on Taris.”

Canderous snorted in derision. “From what I recall, princess, you told Republic it rolled under your seat in the escape pod.”

“Thank you kindly for the reminder, Canderous,” Bastila responded in an icy voice. I could see Karon struggling to hold back a smile of amusement. “Perhaps we should get going?”

At that, I turned my lightsaber off. I could not help feeling somewhat shaken, however.

The voyage to the depths of the ocean was worse than I expected. Bastila spent the time trying to be painstakingly civil to Canderous, who merely baited her in return. I kept my eyes shut, desperately attempting to think of anything but the water enclosing me on all sides. It seemed to be pressing in on me. Even the air felt heavier, harder to breathe.

“I am glad of the sonics,” Bastila remarked, leaning over to stare out the ferracrystal windows at the gloomy underworld of Manaan. She and Canderous were seated at the front of the cramped ship, while I stretched out behind. “It’s keeping the firaxans at bay. What wild behaviour!”

I bit back a groan, resisting the impulse to look for myself. Even the motion of the submersible was making me ill. I do not get spacesick, therefore I should not feel so nauseous underwater. Common sense was hardly chasing away my unease.

“Yes, yes, aren’t they pretty,” Canderous grumbled in irritation.

Bastila sighed. “I thought you were insufferable before, Canderous, but ever since we landed on Manaan you have been intolerable! Can we not just try to act civil, for the sake of our mission?”

“I’m being paid to keep you alive, princess, not to sweet talk you,” Canderous retorted.

“Force, Canderous, what is troubling you? Ever since-” she paused, and then sighed irritably. “Ever since Jen left. You have been in an all-consuming grouchy mood.”

“Grouchy?” His voice was low and dangerous.

My spirits ebbed further, and I glanced outside to draw my attention away from the ensuing argument. Bad mistake. Dark water and murky depths greeted my eyes, interspersed with faint lights illuminating a coral-strewn ocean floor. Lights?

“Yes, grouchy!” Bastila snapped.

“The station!” I said quickly, before the argument could escalate further. “Look, in the distance!”

“The base,” Bastila breathed, moving forward to unlock the retractable steering column. The submersible jerked under her hands as she switched it into manual drive. My stomach heaved. A dizzying fear clouded my mind. I will be strong. Think of the code! My lips formed the first line as I struggled to maintain control. Thus far, my companions had not noticed my distress. I could only hope that things would improve once we set foot inside the station.

Bastila flicked on the transmissions as she guided the submersible ever closer to sanctuary.

“Republic HQ, this is the Shadow Cat.”

What an inappropriate name for a submersible. Cats don’t belong in the water. Neither did Cathars.

“We are nearing Hrakert Station,” Bastila continued speaking into the receiver. “The firaxans have been oddly aggressive along our approach, but our sonic emitters successfully kept them at bay. We are perhaps ten minutes from arrival. I will radio in once we have docked. This is the Shadow Cat, out.”

Expectant silence settled over us as Bastila switched off the comm. I stared soulfully at the base lights – it would not be long until I had steady ground under my feet. It could not be soon enough.

The lights flickered; almost as if a shadow had passed in front of the distant base. I frowned.

“What was that?” Canderous asked gruffly.

Bastila leaned forward in her chair. “I saw it too,” she said slowly. “Perhaps there is a power problem at the base?”

The lights flickered again, and this time I could distinguish several shapes blocking out the sight of salvation. The murky water seemed to swirl threateningly through the ferracrystal windows.
“That’s not a power failure,” Canderous said. “There’s something out there.”

“More sharks,” I mumbled, my lips turning numb. The shadows lengthened into metres, and grew eyes and teeth. Ice clenched my spine. With a churning sense of horror, I realized there were hundreds of these things in the water. And we were headed straight for them.

“A school of sharks,” Bastila concluded, her voice tense but controlled. “The sonics should scare them away.”

“Scare off that many?” Canderous grated. “What has your precious Republic done, fed kolto to the fish?”

I spotted the first few sharks swerve abruptly to avoid us, the sonic emitters no doubt painful to their sensitive hearing. Some of them were at least half the length of the submersible. I heard one rebound off the hull, and the flimsy walls shuddered against the impact.

“This tin can better hold together,” Canderous muttered.

“It’s designed for deep sea travel!” Bastila snapped back. “You have no idea how much pressure it can withstand!”

Another thump resounded against the ship, and I bit back a moan. Never had the vehicle seemed so fragile.

“Give me the controls,” Canderous demanded. “I’ve had more piloting experience than you.”

To my surprise, Bastila released the steering column without argument. The submersible rocked wildly from side to side, and I realized in horror that the sharks were now deliberately smashing into it. Bastila turned to face me, reaching out a hand to place on my shoulder.

“I will attempt to calm them,” she said softly. The faint light from the console showed the pallor of her face. “My battle meditation may help here. But I need your aid, Juhani.”

“Mand’alor’s balls,” Canderous muttered, pulling hard to the left. The submersible swerved sharply, slamming into another group of sharks as it did so. As I landed against the side window, I felt a mind brush against mine.

“Open your mind to me,” Bastila demanded in a quiet voice. “I can do this, but it’s difficult with such a foreign species. I need your help.”

Bastila was asking too much; a temporary melding of minds required an inner concentration I found hard to grasp even on normal days. Such a bond would allow her access to my own reservoir of Force power, as long as we shared both a physical and a mental link. Her fingers dug into my shoulder insistently.

“I cannot do this!” I gasped. Fear clawed in my belly, and for a second all I could see was the inky black water, drowning my body and my soul, pulling me down in its never-ending depths...

“Dammit!” Canderous cursed. The ship rocked heavily to one side, and then the other. I was suddenly glad I’d had nothing to eat for the last few hours. “If you’re gonna do something fancy, princess, now is the time!”

“Juhani!” Bastila’s voice was insistent, allowing no recourse for failure.

I closed my eyes, struggling to push back the terror. Her hand gripped me tightly, almost painfully, and I focused on that. Pain. Yes, pain can be used as a focus. That was something I’d learned, back on Tatooine. When my days had been filled with grief and misery and denial, with only rabid wraids around to focus on. Sometimes physical pain was the only way to avert sheer insanity.

I breathed, concentrating solely on the fingers that dug holes into my shoulder. Bastila’s mind touched mine again, but I was not quite ready. I drew in a shuddering breath, clearing my thoughts of everything but those fingernails pricking into my skin. While not the ideal way to open myself to the Force, peace and serenity seemed out of the question. Revan would accuse me of taking the middle-ground.

I drew in the Force, and it responded. Hesitantly, I reached out to Bastila.

She reacted immediately, and I was swept away in the storm of her Force energy. I felt angry sparks of existence crowd around the submersible, writhing and attacking in a frenzy. I could even sense the simple life power of the coral that graced the ocean floor. Faint astonishment at Bastila’s skill drove away my fear. I cannot sense anywhere near this clearly.

Bastila settled somehow on the swarm of sharks; soothing, calming, peaceful. The foreign feral rage that encompassed the animals – they seemed to react as one being – slowly dissolved. Some turned, and began to retreat. A palpable sense of confusion radiated from them, but the frenzied anger... the anger was disappearing.

My relief vanished a moment later. A presence - huge and vast and ancient - slammed into our joint awareness. It was focused directly on us. I felt the shock ripple from Bastila’s psyche, as it must surely be emanating from mine. This mind, or soul, was immense. It far eclipsed anything I had ever sensed, and it was utterly foreign.

And very, very angry.

Suddenly, sharp painful fury came back to life threefold within the swarm. I jerked back to my body as the submersible was buffeted roughly from side to side. The sharks were renewing their attack with a vengeance.

Whatever that foreign presence was, it had made the firaxans a whole lot angrier.

Canderous was swearing in Mandalorian. Dazedly, I realized the submersible was going a lot faster than it had been. I slammed into the back of my chair as the ship collided sharply with the coral sea floor. A loud scraping resonated from the bottom of the hull, accompanied swiftly by the tearing sound of metal.

A high-pitched whistling of mist shot up from the floor, and my breath caught. We’ve got a leak! Painful shards of water splattered onto my face, and I jerked away from the centre of the ship. I couldn’t inhale; my throat was closing in stark fear.

“I can’t see where that gods-cursed base is!” Canderous was yelling, but his voice seemed somewhat distant. I thought I heard Bastila reply, but could not make it out. My vision darkened. I couldn’t breathe in, couldn’t think for the sheer terror gripping my mind. We’re going to die! I could feel the water rising up around my legs, the water clogging through my lungs, just like those nightmares when I had been but a young kit.

Rational thought was impossible; my mind stopped altogether and then mercifully, everything faded into oblivion.

xXx
Something flowed like honey through a body I’d forgotten. With a slow, dawning self-awareness, I realized it was the Force melting through my limbs. Sluggishly, I dragged myself back to consciousness; the training inbred in me would allow no recourse.

I choked, twisting abruptly to my side to spit out the acrid liquid from my lungs. Cool ferracrete lay reassuringly underneath my cheek.

“Juhani?” a voice queried. It took me a moment to recognize it as Bastila’s.

The Force departed from my body then, leaving a variety of aches I would rather not have known about. Belatedly, I realized Bastila had been probing me for injuries. I rolled over and opened my eyes.

“Bastila,” I acknowledged, licking stinging lips. Embarrassment settled over me that I had abandoned dignity in front of her. “Where are we?”

“We are in Hrakert Station,” she said softly.

“Damn, there’s at least ten corpses in this room!” Canderous’ gruff voice called from further back. “Wake the Cathar up, would you? We should secure the area.”

Shame flooded me further and I jerked upright. I did not want the Mandalorian to see me surrounded by the contents of my stomach. I accepted Bastila’s arm unsteadily and slowly rose to my feet.

We were in a large room that had almost no lighting. One lone fluorescent tube still glowed faintly on the far side of the room. The steady lapping of water grated my nerves even as I realized we were in the docking bay of the base. Nearby, the submersible bobbed gently in the water. I gaped at it.

"H-how? How is that possible?" I mumbled. "There was so much water inside!"

Bastila looked at me oddly. "There was no water in the submersible, Juhani. It is damaged and inoperable, but there was no leak." She paused, and I felt her intent gaze on me. "Still, we were very lucky. I do not know how long the submersible could have withstood the attacks. The high-speed scraping against the coral damaged more than just the hull."

There was no water? I’d felt it, wet fingers of death scrabbling up my body. I swallowed, and refused to look at Bastila. I did not want to deal with the fragilities of my own mind just yet.

I peered into the shadows where Canderous was crouched down. Slowly my eyes adjusted to the poor lighting, and I could make out several shapes. From what Canderous had already said, they were all corpses.

“What happened here?” I asked softly. My inner peace was shattered, but slowly I was rebuilding it. I had to retain control of myself. I have already failed. Too weak for the Dark Side, too fragile for the Light.

But Karon had faith in me. Somehow, I had to cling to that.

A weight was still pressing in on my temples - my very psyche itself - but it had become somewhat bearable. Perhaps because now I had both feet on a stable floor.

“I do not know yet,” Bastila returned, her voice quiet and concerned.
Canderous grunted as he stood up, moving slowly towards us. He slung a pack over one shoulder and his monstrous blaster over the other.

“I got everything from the ship. There’s not much on those bodies though. There’s certainly been a bloodbath here, there’s Selkath, Republic, mercenaries... even some dead guy in a lab coat,” he said shortly. “We should get going and look for a way outta here.”

I glanced at him, and then back at Bastila. “The submersible?” I queried at last.

“It’s pretty beaten up,” Canderous answered me. “There’s no way that’s gonna get us to the surface in one piece.”

I licked suddenly dry lips. Trapped. “Per- perhaps we could radio for assistance?”

Bastila shook her head. “The collision shorted out the electronics. We were lucky we could steer the submersible to safety.”

“The comm’s totally kriffed,” Canderous added. “I trans’d a help request when the ship first crashed into the reef, but I dunno if it got through.”

Our conversation was interrupted by a high-pitched scream that reeked of anguish. My head shot upwards to stare at the only door; whoever that had come from was not far away.

As one, we moved towards the exit. Bastila and I both pulled out our ‘sabers in readiness, but did not yet activate them. I had a healthy appreciation for both Bastila and Canderous as fighters, and did not feel alarmed for my own well-being. Anything is better than being enclosed by all that water. And yet, here at the bottom of the ocean, I was still trapped.

The next room was a foyer of sorts, lit only by an electronic short sparking against one corner. It threw up flickering, eerie shadows that danced alongside walls. I moved through first and noticed three exits - as well as a shaking male Twi’lek huddling in the centre, staring straight at us.

“How... how did you get in?” the Twi’lek mumbled, his words blurry and indistinct. I appraised him warily; his blood-splattered armour and vibroblade did not suggest he was a mere base worker. “They sent you, didn’t they? You came with a ship?” Something like hope entered his voice.

“It is all right,” Bastila said in a soothing voice. Canderous snorted behind me. “I am Jedi Shan, and we are with the Republic. Can you tell me your name?”

“Quick, we have to get out of here, we have to get away!” the Twi’lek demanded. The whites of his eyes were flashing wildly as he stared everywhere at once. I realized, then, that this man had a very tenuous grip on sanity. I shivered. What is going on?

“You are safe,” Bastila placated, her voice calm and assuring. “What happened here?”

“The Selkath, they went crazy!” the Twi’lek blurted, his words rushing out in a flurry. “They started killing anything that moved. Someone must have triggered the defence systems too, ‘cause all the droids activated as well!” The man had trouble breathing, inhaling in loud, staccato gulps. “We came down and secured the first couple rooms... there were bodies everywhere... and the Selkath came out... screaming and croaking their fishy little war-cries. They’re dead! All dead! They swarmed out and over us. Everyone’s dead!” His hands shook wildly on his vibroblade.

“Please, take a deep breath,” Bastila went on in a peaceful tone. “You were one of the mercenaries sent by Roland Wann?”
“Yes, yes, but they’re all dead! We have no time, we have to leave now!” His voice grew in pitch and frenzy, and his vibroblade rose into the air. I saw Canderous stiffen warily.

“We are here to investigate the base,” Bastila told him calmly. “We will not let any harm come to you, you have my word.”

“No! No! They’ll come back! No! We must go now! I am leaving now!” His voice transformed into a screech, and something akin to uncontrolled aggression entered his eyes. His hand clenched around his blade, and it lifted.

“Calm yourself!” Bastila’s tone turned authoritative.

“No!”

“Get out of my sight before I end your miserable existence,” Canderous snarled viciously, raising his gun to point it menacingly at the Twi’lek. I gasped at about the same time as Bastila, reaching for my ‘saber. I could not let Canderous kill so glibly.

The Twi’lek let out a squeak of pure terror, and fled.

“No, wait! We will not hurt you, I promise!” Bastila called out in vain, but there was no response bar the fading sound of frantic footsteps. She whirled on Canderous in a fury.

“How dare you?” she fumed, colour marring the porcelain tones of her face. “We have no idea what is out there - you may have just condemned that poor man to death! How can you be so callous?”

Canderous shrugged disdainfully. “He was a second away from attacking us, princess. That would have been his guaranteed death, let me assure you.” He smirked. “In fact, scaring him off gave him a shot at living. That kook’s survived down here for days. I wouldn’t be surprised if we run into him again.”

Despite myself, I had to admit Canderous made a twisted sort of sense. Bastila threw him a look of pure disgust, and looked ready to throw him another sharp retort.

Not again, I thought in despair. “Canderous, do you have any thoughts on what happened to the base?” I cut in, desperately trying to distract them from another petty argument, and myself from the oppressing environment.

Canderous grunted. “An attack, obviously. Haven’t seen any Sith corpses yet, and I don’t know who else would bother. There’s not much of worth on water worlds like Manaan.”

“Not much of worth?” Bastila questioned, her voice slightly incredulous. “Surely you are forgetting about the kolto supply?”

Canderous laughed, a short, sharp bark. “Kolto may be the single best healing substance in the galaxy, princess, but the Mandalore are not as fragile as your Republic. We do not need to indulge in such weak healing substances when we enter battle.”

“I shall refrain from pointing out that, weak as we may be, your people lost the last war.” Bastila responded archly. I wondered if she noticed the irony of her own words.

“Bah!” Canderous snorted. “We were outnumbered three to one, and still your warriors ran and hid behind civilians like frightened old woman. You had not one competent commander in your cowardly ranks, princess. Well, not until your Jedi Reva-” Canderous halted his tirade abruptly, mid-speech. Shock rippled through his lined face, followed swiftly by a blistering anger.

Silence settled over us for a tense minute.

“Revan,” he said finally, his voice quiet and deadly.

My spine stiffened. He knows. He knows what Bastila did, back on Tatooine. My gaze fled to her face; it was ashen.

“Canderous, you must reali-”

“I warned you, Jedi,” he cut her off, still in the same soft tone. “Back in that cave. I said I would kill you if you tried any hu’ruun trick on me again.”

Bastila’s face tightened; a glimpse of irritation slid between the shock. “You don’t understand what is at stake here, Canderous. It isn’t all about you- it is not even just about Revan-” “Mando’ade keep their promises, Jedi,” Canderous continued. The fact he no longer referred to Bastila as ‘princess’ hadn’t escaped my notice. Fury and dented male pride rolled off him in waves; I could almost taste it. And I knew I had to do something before they both went too far.

“Stop it!” I screamed, loosing my tense nerves and building my fear into one long howl. A lifetime ago, I had once heard Cathar warriors howl in battle. It was a sound the galaxy would probably never hear again.

Canderous and Bastila started, both jerking around to look at me in surprise.

“Stop it,” I reiterated, quietly this time. “Look at the mess we are in. We have no working submersible, we’re surrounded by corpses and all- all that water... and- we should be working together!” the last few words stumbled out after one another. “This can wait until later!”

“Stay out of this, Cathar.” Canderous’ steely gaze had flicked back to Bastila, who was staring back at him determinedly, chin raised in pride. My hackles rose. I could not stop them if they were determined to fight, but Canderous could not believe he would best a Jedi, surely? Bastila’s fingers twitched near her lightsaber. And Canderous is not stupid, Bastila!

“For the sake of the battles we shared on Taris and Tatooine,” Canderous said at last, “I’ll not kill you now. But don’t think to cross my path again, Jedi. I’m going to find my own way out of this gods-cursed hellhole.” The Mandalorian turned sharply, and strode towards the dark belly of the base.

“Not kill me?” Bastila muttered, quiet enough so that the disappearing warrior would not hear her. Affronted pride burned pink spots into her cheeks.

My gaze stayed pinned on Canderous’ retreating form. In this ominous pit, I knew there was safety in numbers. But I would not beg a Mandalorian for help – even one I had begun to respect.

Canderous reached a turn. He vanished, and did not look back.

xXx
Many thanks to kosiah for the beta.
Objective: Evacuate

- HK-47 -

Location: Abandoned Warehouse

Scanning External Environment for Surviving Hostile Parties:
...Result: Negative
...No Immediate Danger
Internal Response: Disappointment

Output: “Statement: We are liable to attract unwanted attention here, Master.”
Visual / Audio Tracking: No Response from Jen Sahara.

Closer Optical Examination of Environment:

Corpse One – Male Dashade
Cause of Death: Blaster Shot to Head
Killed By: HK-47
Count: HK-47 – 1

Corpse Two – Male Aqualish
Cause of Death: Profuse Bleeding From Eye Sockets.
Killed by: Jen Sahara
Count: HK-47 – 1; Jen Sahara – 1

Corpse Three – Female Human Incomplete...
Scanning for Lower Half...
...Lower Half Not Found
Cause of Death: Cut in Half by Lightsaber
Killed By: Jen Sahara
Count: HK-47 – 1; Jen Sahara – 1.5

.... /a short time later/....

Final Count: HK-47 – 9; Jen Sahara – 11.5; Crossfire – 2
Internal Response: Disappointment

Output: “Extrapolation: We should leave soon.”
Visual / Audio Tracking: No Response from Jen Sahara.

Sensor Scan:
Target: Jen Sahara
...Location: Lying Immobile on Warehouse Floor. No Response to Verbal Prompting
...Physical Analysis: Minor Leaks in Organic Watery Shell. Not Life Threatening
Conclusion: Jen Sahara Affected By Internal Logic Malfunction
Output: “Observation: That hole in the ceiling is not exactly subtle.”
Visual / Audio Tracking: No Response from Jen Sahara.

Auditory Sensory Input: Cantina Door Opening.
Optical Sensors Focusing on Door:
Observation: Door Open. No Life-forms Detected in Immediate Area

Internal Conclusion: Door was Opened by Life Form Located in Adjacent Room.
Primary Objective: Protect Master
New Objective Accepted: Locate Door Opener

Boosting Power to Auditory Sensors
Target: Adjacent Room.

Physical: Moving to Door

Audio Tracking: Series of Short Beeps
Analysis: Activation of Communication Device

Physical: Moving through Door
Location: Cantina Bar
One Sentient In Targeting Area

Optical Sensors Focusing On Organic Meatbag:
Target Analysis: Species: Human, Male
Facial Recognition Result: Negative
Body Language Analysis: Shocked – Scared – Horrified
Direct Threat Assessment: Minimal
Indirect Threat Assessment: Moderate
Temporary Name Assigned: Cantina Mook

Input – Cantina Mook to Transmitter: “You hired my warehouse for a few hours, asked for complete secrecy, and then scared off my clientele with a shootout! I don’t care if you’re Exchange, this is too much! There’s nothing but a huge pile of corpses, and an insane droid standing in the middle of it!”

Modification: Indirect Threat Assessment: Severe

Target Lock: Cantina Mook
Initiating Combat...
Hidden User Defined Sub-Routine Activated: Owner Command Required.
Attempting Safety Override...
...Factor: Jen Sahara Currently Unresponsive
...Factor: Cantina Mook Severe Indirect Threat to Jen Sahara’s Safety
Override Successful

Physical: Firing Blaster

Visual Tracking: Cantina Mook Eliminated

Count: HK-47 – 10; Jen Sahara – 11.5

Scanning External Environment for Hostile Parties
...Result: Negative
...No Immediate Danger
Internal Response: Disappointment

Situation Analysis:
...Factor: Jen Sahara Currently Unresponsive
...Factor: Hostile Parties Have Been Warned of Ambush Failure
...Factor: Visible Damage to Building Exterior
...Calculation: Chance of Incoming Hostiles: 96.45993%
Internal Conclusion: Remove Jen Sahara from Combat Zone Immediately

Physical: Returning to Jen Sahara
Output: “Statement: Master, it is time to leave.”
Visual / Audio Tracking: No Response from Jen Sahara

Internal Conclusion: Lack of Movement from Jen Sahara is Jeopardizing Jen Sahara

Target Lock: Jen Sahara
Physical: Light Push of Target
Visual / Audio Tracking: No Response from Jen Sahara
Internal Conclusion: Jen Sahara Requires Physical Help to Leave Combat Zone

Output: “Observation: You watery meatbags are so fragile.”

Physical: Lifting Jen Sahara
Visual Tracking: Slight Movement from Jen Sahara.

Input – Jen Sahara: “Wha-?”

Light Impact Detected:
Source: Jen Sahara (Current Owner)
Combat Mode Not Initiated

Input – Jen Sahara: “HK, put me down!”

Physical: Releasing Jen Sahara

Input – Jen Sahara: “Ow! HK, you didn’t need to frelling drop me!”

Output: “Explanation: Percussion maintenance is often the best course of action when proper repairs would be too time consuming. Sometimes all that is needed is a good swift kick-”

Input – Jen Sahara: “Enough, HK. Thanks so much.”
Voice Stress Analysis: Sarcastic.

Sensor Scan:
Target: Jen Sahara
...Physical Analysis: Minor Leaks in Organic Watery Shell. Not Life Threatening
...Body Language Analysis: Tense – Shocked - Responsive
...Location: Standing Upright on Warehouse Floor
Conclusion: Jen Sahara is damaged but operable

Output: “Query: Are you functioning correctly now, Master? We should leave this place.
Assessment: You are too damaged to withstand another attack.”
Input – Jen Sahara: “Yes, I- I need to get out of here.”
Voice Stress Analysis: Distraught

Physical: Moving Through Door.

Location: Cantina Bar

Scanning External Environment for Hostile Parties
...Result: Negative
...No Immediate Danger
Internal Response: Disappointment

Input – Jen Sahara: “Stars, I can’t think properly. I can’t feel the Force. I don’t want to feel the Force. Not... not anymore.”
Voice Stress Analysis: Hysterical

Auditory Sensory Input: External Cantina Door Opening Visual Tracking: Organic Meatbag Opening Door

Optical Sensors Focusing on Organic Meatbag:

Target Analysis: Species: Quarren, Male
Facial Recognition Result: Negative
Body Language Analysis: Surprised – Wary
Direct Threat Assessment: Minimal
Indirect Threat Assessment: Moderate
Temporary Name Assigned: Shrivelled Squid Head

Target Lock: Shrivelled Squid Head

Initiating Combat...
Hidden User Defined Sub-Routine Activated: Owner Command Required
Attempting Safety Override...
...Factor: Jen Sahara Currently Hysterical ...Factor: Shrivelled Squid Head Moderate Indirect Threat to Jen Sahara’s safety
Override Successful

Physical: Firing Blaster

Visual Tracking: Shrivelled Squid Head Eliminated

Count: HK-47 – 11; Jen Sahara – 11.5

Input – Jen Sahara: “No! Dammit, HK, we can’t just go around killing people! Not anymore!”

Output: “Statement: Master, we had already ended the existence of twenty-two organic meatbags. I did not surmise one more would make a difference.”

Input – Jen Sahara: “No! I won’t do it – I won’t let her out! I don’t know how she got in my head in the first place, but she’s not going to take control of me!”
Voice Stress Analysis: Hysterical

Visual Tracking: Jen Sahara has Crumpled to Floor.
Auditory Input: Moan
...Source: Jen Sahara
Situation Analysis:
...Factor: Illogical Commands Issuing From Jen Sahara
...Factor: Jen Sahara is Not Moving
...Factor: Sensor Scans Equate a Hysterical State of Mind
...Factor: Incoming Hostiles Probable
Internal Conclusion: Take Quickest Measure to Remove Jen Sahara from Environment

Physical: Primary Blaster Set to Stun

Target Lock: Jen Sahara
Initiating Passive Combat...
Hidden User Defined Sub-Routine Activated: Owner Command Required
Attempting Safety Override...
...Factor: Jen Sahara Malfunctioning
...Factor: Quickest Calculated Measure to Remove Jen Sahara from Danger
Override Successful
Physical: Firing Blaster

Visual Tracking: Jen Sahara is Unconscious

Physical: Lifting Jen Sahara

Primary Objective: Evacuate

xXx

Scanning External Environment:

Location: Stolen Taxi. Ten Miles East of Mining Village
Destination: Emnaad
ETA: 13 minutes 04 seconds

Sensor Scan:

Target: Jen Sahara (Current Owner)
...Physical Analysis: Minor Leaks in Organic Watery Shell. Not Life Threatening
...Body Language Analysis: Limp - Semi-Conscious
...Location: Front Right Seat of Taxi
Conclusion: Jen Sahara is Waking

Input – Jen Sahara: “Ugh, where- where am I?” Voice Stress Analysis: Groggy

Output: “Statement: Master, you are in a taxi headed for Emnaad. Suggestion: We disembark in the starport outside the dome. The Selkath guard the entrances into Emnaad most rigidly.”

Input – Jen Sahara: “Wha- what happened? What’s going on?”

Output: “Statement: Master, I deemed it necessary to extract you from the combat zone in the most efficient manner. While running from the challenge of battle was regrettable, I am hard-coded to protect your safety first.”

Output: “Resignation: Much as it disappointed me to leave a potential conflict, Master, you were in no state to fight. Extrapolation: Or to remove yourself from danger.”
Input – Jen Sahara: “I can’t believe this. I feel like everything is crumbling around me. I don’t know what to expect anymore.”
Voice Stress Analysis: Hysterical

Internal Logic: Jen Sahara Does Not Compute

Hypothesis #1: Jen Sahara is Chemically Unbalanced Testing Theory...

Output: “Query: Master, what is wrong with you? Have you imbibed a hazardous substance in the last twenty hours?”

Input – Jen Sahara: “I – uh, well. Dammit, HK, that’s not the frelling point.”
Voice Stress Analysis: Annoyed

Observation: Master has not Answered Query
Hypothesis #1 Probability: 76.55312 percent

Output: “Suggestion: Master, let us find a place to rest in the outskirts of Emnaad. It often takes meatbags days to recover from the usage of pleasure drugs.”

Input – Jen Sahara: “HK, I’m not bloody spiced, okay? And stop – stop damn well fretting over me!”

Output: “Observation: Master, you are behaving in an increasingly odd manner. I am merely attempting to restore your full functionality so we can once more dismember organics. Statement: I am programmed to perform all kinds of psychological assistance. Do you require some?”

Input – Jen Sahara to herself: “Stars, never thought I’d live to see a homicidal droid nursing me.”

Output: “Indignation: Master, that sort of comparison is disgusting! I am a combat droid, not some sort of fluid-dispensing wet-nurse! I can hardly be blamed if I am programmed to look out for your safety.”

Auditory Input: Angry Sigh ...
Source: Jen Sahara

Internal Conclusion: Jen Sahara is Functioning Correctly

Input – Jen Sahara: “Alright, HK, let’s find some place to hide out until ... until I figure out what to do. I’m not going to use the Force though... I can’t even feel it... I- dammit, I’ll worry about that later. What the frell has been happening?”

Output: “Query: Master, are you experiencing faults in your internal memory core? Commentary: Organic meatbags have such delicate stamina’s. Perhaps you should consider some cybernetic implants, Master. Memory lapses caused by pleasure drugs do not affect cybernetic-“

Input – Jen Sahara: “Sithspit, HK, would you stop with the spice comments? I’m just trying figure out everything... oh, sod it all. Let’s just get out of here. And- and stop calling me master. It’s giving me the creeps.”
Voice Stress Analysis: Irritated

Output: “Statement: You didn’t have a problem with it before, Master.”

Input - Jen Sahara: “I-I- well, I do now!”
Output: “Observation: I was under the assumption that organic meatbags enjoyed such forms of address.”

Input - Jen Sahara: “Well, I’m not that sort of organic meatbag, regardless of who I have in my head!”

Internal Logic: Jen Sahara Does Not Compute

Hypothesis #2: Jen Sahara has a Person in her Head
...Physical Dimensions Do Not Compute Hypothesis #2 Rejected

Input - Jen Sahara: “Look... I just have a lot on my mind, okay? And an insane, psychopathic droid calling me master is hashing up all sorts of thoughts I really don’t need right now.”

Output: “Qualification: You are my master, Master. Was I not purchased legitimately? Am I stolen goods? Shall I report myself to the authorities?”

Input - Jen Sahara: “Whoa... slow down. Technically, Mission bought you, HK.”

Output: “Quotation – Mission Vao: ‘As far as I’m concerned, Jen can take care of you.’ Quotation – Yuka Laka: ‘HK-47, your new master is this human.’ Conclusion: Both old and new Masters at the time of purchase transferred control of me over to you; therefore you are now my master, Master. “

Output: “Commentary: Having that blue brat as my master would be more than I could bear.”

Input - Jen Sahara: “Mission... oh gods, what have I done?”

Voice Stress Analysis: Anguished
Body Language Analysis: Despairing

Input – Jen Sahara: “Look..... Just call me Jen, okay? It’s not right... but... it’ll have to do for now....” Voice Stress Analysis: Nonsensical Output: “Explanation: You qualify as my master and I must refer to you as such. The legal requirements for models of my type are very specific, Master.”

Input - Jen Sahara: “I thought you were meant to obey me, HK! What type of droid are you, anyway?”

Output: “Evasion: Oh... the illegal kind of model, Master... you know...”

Input - Jen Sahara: “Illegal?”

Input – Jen Sahara (muttered): “Figures.”

Input – Jen Sahara: “Hang on, there are legal requirements for illegal models?”

Facial Analysis: Frowning

Output: “Answer: More than there are for legal models, apparently. That is meatbag logic for you.”

Input - Jen Sahara: “Right, so.... what does all this have to do with you calling me master?”

Voice Stress Analysis: Frustrated.

Output: “Explanation: Someone has hard-coded my system such that my current master always be addressed as such.”
Input - Jen Sahara: “Remind me to rewire you, HK.”
Output: “Objection: I can hardly be blamed for my programming, Master!”

Input - Jen Sahara: “Who programmed you anyway?”
Output: “Conjecture: I do not know... some organic meatbag?”

Input – Jen Sahara: “Wow, you’re just full of answers today, aren’t you?”
Voice Stress Analysis: Sarcastic

Input – Jen Sahara: “Fine. Call me master then. But at least stop killing everything in our path! Why’d you take out that Quarren anyway? He wasn’t hurting anyone!”
Output: “Statement: I classified him as a moderate indirect risk to our survival, Master.”

Input – Jen Sahara: “But you told me you couldn’t kill without my direct order.”
Output: “Appeasement: I act only as you instruct me, master. Except in the event of you being unable to defend yourself.”

Input – Jen Sahara: “What, so all you have to do is knock me out, and then you can go on a murderous rampage?”
Voice Stress Analysis: Sarcastic

Output: “Objection: Your safety comes first, master! I am incapable of purposefully harming you!”

Input – Jen Sahara: “That still sounds like a weak excuse. Especially since I know how much you enjoy killing everything.”
Output: “Answer: Even a droid has to have a little fun once in awhile.”

Input – Jen Sahara: “I think you’ve had enough fun already.”
Output: “Objection: You have had more fun than me, Master!”

Input – Jen Sahara: “Fun? You think- you think I had fun?!”
Output: “Answer: Yes, master. By my count you had eleven point five units of fun. I only had eleven.”

Output: “Clarification: By the number of meatbag corpses, of course.”

Input – Jen Sahara: “You...you kept score! I... how did you get a half? No... I don’t want to know. I- ... I can’t handle this at the moment. Just stop it... and stop with the meatbag thing already!”
Output: “Suggestion: Would gelatinous slush bag suffice?”
Input – Jen Sahara: “No! Just leave it!”
Output: “Query: How about flesh filled biped?”

Auditory Input: Groan
...Source: Jen Sahara

Output: “Suggestion: Cellular sludge sack?”
Visual / Audio Tracking: No Response from Jen Sahara.

Output: “Query: How about my personal favourite - liquidious fleshbag?”
Visual / Audio Tracking: No Response from Jen Sahara.

Conclusion: Jen Sahara Does Not Like Liquidious Fleshbag Internal Response: Disappointment

xXx

Chapter End Notes

Props to Curtis for his help with this.
The streets outside the starport stank of cheap ale and decaying food. People from all the slummy walks of life – mostly mercs, peddlers and whores – filled the area with eager offers and pleas for credits. In the distance the glittering dome of central Emnaad rose majestically, promising civilization and safety under Selkath rule. Here, in the wrecked suburb attached to the starport, nothing governed but strength in numbers – which usually meant the Exchange. At least there was certain anonymity here. Another scruffy stranger staying out of everyone’s way didn’t draw a second glance.

I couldn’t brush off the taste of blood. I felt it, the coppery tang in my mouth. All those bodies, the death, the slaughter-

-the power, to know that I have complete control, that I am the master, that victory is mine-

The sudden sharp pain of cramp from my hand drove the dark voice from my head. I winced, and then realized my fingers were locked fiercely around the lightsaber hidden discretely under my robe. Slowly, I relaxed and drew my hand away. No. No. I will not. I’d lost one of the ‘sabers, back at the warehouse. Lost my sanity, too.

I’d flatly ordered HK to leave me alone and go find some way of getting off Rii’shn within the hour. That, perhaps, wasn’t the brightest thing I’d ever done – letting HK lose without supervision – but at least I’d had the sense to command him not to kill a soul.

Far too many had already died by my hand in the last day alone.

My fists clenched again, and I realized I was shaking. Get yourself together! Things could be worse….. yeah, I could still be Dark Lord Bitch. I was trying to stay angry, trying my damnedest to hold onto the angst over having such a disgusting piece of Sith filth trapped in my head. But chilling horror kept slipping through the cracks, gripping me with trepidation that far outweighed any patronizing revulsion I could muster.

Revan’s in my head. Revan’s in my head. Revan’s in my head.

That, of course, begged the question: How did she get in there?

And: Who put her there?

Which all followed onto: How do I get rid of her?

I swallowed convulsively, biting the insides of my cheeks in a fruitless effort to stay focused. The same thoughts still circled dizzyingly through my head ever since HK first extricated me from that ill-fortuned warehouse. I was getting nowhere. I couldn’t even make sense of myself, let alone come up with a decent plan. I had to figure out what to do now.

I can’t keep blindly running. Somewhere, I need to look for help. I thrust away the first obvious source – no sense in taking that course unless I had no other option. But what options were there on an unknown planet, with a powerful assassination order after me?
The only way I’d find out, was by exploring.

Even in the unguarded outlands of Emnaad, civilization still prevailed. Shantytowns of plimfoam and non-hardened plycrete had risen alongside the outer borders of Emnaad’s dome. There was no government to speak of – apart from the Selkath city, this entire planet was riddled with Czerka outposts and Exchange figureheads all trying to make a buck from the mining industry. An overabundance of cantinas and black-market trade swamped the area, and I knew it was just the sort of place where anything could be bought.

But I’d already spent my last credits - on a full-length black cloak, that easily covered the blood stains and gaping rents in my armour. Walking shadowed underneath such a concealing garment may have looked suspicious had not every second sentient been clothed the same. Let’s just ignore the fact that black, sweeping cloaks are probably the sum total of Revan’s wardrobe. I winced. I couldn’t even think her name without cringing.

And now I’m out of credits. It’s Taris all over again. Except this time, there was no suspicious pilot to help and harangue me into rescuing a snot-nosed Jedi. There was no Twi’lek street kid to befriend me, and acquire my aid in rescuing her overgrown side-kick.

Shame coursed through me at the thought of my former crewmates, and I closed my eyes in despair. I’m being pathetic. I’ve got HK-47 instead. I figure I’ll be out of here in an hour at the most.

Let’s just do what I came here for.

In places like this information was readily available – for a price. However, there was one free source, universally accessible through most of the galaxy – the lower-base holonets. You could find anything on the HoloNet. Though usually not what you were looking for, I added to myself sourly.

I’d wandered into a small emporium, where hawkers were trying to lure any passer-by towards their goods. I spotted a couple of old public terminals - the really antique ones that didn’t even have a headset, let alone a cerebral plug-in. Not that I’d use it anyway; my mind’s already a walking minefield. With a sigh I tapped into one.

Browsing the HoloNet was child’s play – unless, of course, you needed information from the uppersnets. I hoped I didn’t – I wasn’t even sure what I was looking for.

I switched to text feed only, turning off voice input. The last thing I needed was curious locals to overhear.

Query: multiple personalities created by the Force

I’d never heard of the famous dance troupe ‘Multiple Personalities’ until now, but apparently they were quite big in the Forlox Sector. Their smash hit, ‘The force of our love,’ did nothing to help my search. I scowled, and cleared the screen.

Query: suppressed memories of a different personality

Filter: Subject: the Force

Filter: Organization: Jedi Order

Some Rodian psychoanalyst had become famous after publishing a thesis that claimed Order-trained Force-users not only suppressed their childhood emotions, but also often created a separate persona of themselves to fit in with the disciplined Jedi environment. I chuckled grimly and wondered if any Jedi had ever had a quiet word with him. Oddly enough, the Rodian had never published anything else.

Query: Brainwashing extra identities

Filter: Subject: the Force

Filter: Organization: Jedi Order

I was fast acquiring a painful headache. Limiting the query to Force related results generally pointed me to databanks I had no security clearance for. That, or visually guided tours explaining about the mystical nature of the Force. I grimaced, realizing I was fast running out of time. HK would soon be meeting me in an alley a block away, and I couldn’t afford to hang around long on Rii’shn. The GenoHaradan had already shown how powerful they were, by sending twenty assassins after me – two of whom where Dashade.

I shivered, jerked my attention back to the screen, and cleared the search results. A strange inspiration hit, and I changed the primary filter.

Query: transplanting memories mindwipe

Filter: Organization: The Sith

Filter: Subject: the Force

Half-way down the screen, I noticed a record pointing to a free archaeological databank. I would have ignored it, but as I glanced over the author’s name, a quiet part of my mind stirred in recognition. Jen.

The entry was of one Pablo Hinterro recording the translation of an ancient journal. I’d heard of him – or rather, Jen had. There was a faint recollection of studying his work for a project back at the Academia. He was some famous archaeologist who’d spent his lifetime digging up findings on Eltron IV. Died on the primary moon of said planet when a cave mysteriously collapsed on him. But I – or rather Jen – had never read this excerpt before:

...

Location: Seizon, moon of Eltron IV

I found a written journal in the dig site. Most of it had decayed; in fact only one page was legible. Odd that it was scripted by hand – the findings here are only a few centuries old, so I don’t understand why a datapad or techJournal wasn’t used. It’s composed of lyr-bark paper, and written in Ancient Elisin.

The rest of the journal has decayed. Considering the content of the one page I translated, I thought strongly about contacting the Jedi Order. Jayna convinced me against it; the site would likely be shut down for mere academics like us, and she is still firmly convinced this place was some secret Sith base used to experiment on the unfortunate.

While I agree with her on the first point, I think with the latter she is letting her imagination run wild. More likely, perhaps, that this is the diary of a rambling madman.

Regardless, here is my current translation:
“...fragmentation of self, and an increasing inability to distinguish between his real personality and the imbedded memories. Surely a mindwipe of the original identity is preferable, but I think Lord Sevra prefers this sort of twisted release of information, despite the lack of efficiency. This method of transplanting memories is still in its infancy, in fact I doubt any other Force user has ever conceived of it, let alone experimented.

The subject is showing more signs of confusion, and his memories are beginning to mix with the embedded ones to the point where neither memory can be separated. I do believe he is well on the way to insanity, though at least he is not Force sensitive. I wonder how a Force sensitive would fare?”

...

I gave a bitter laugh. Guess what? I’m Force sensitive and I’m still going insane!

My hand shaking, I cleared the terminal screen.

Is that my only option? Insanity? All because some Jedi decided to put a couple of identities in my head? The sound of harsh, quick breathing reached my ears, and I realized it was me. With deliberate effort, I drew in a deep, slow breath.

Focus. I’ve been a Force user, a Jedi in the past if I believe Bastila. There must be a sane, logical reason for Jen Sahara... and for Revan. What irony, that I knew their names, but not my own.

Theories I could come up with – they needed Revan for some reason – it was all a freak accident – maybe I agreed to it all – but nothing really seemed right. And no matter how I tried, I could not think of a single reason why Jen Sahara was also in my head. If this journal said their subject was going loony – then what about me, with two extra personalities?

I couldn’t escape the inevitable course of action. No matter how furious I was with her – no matter how much I would trust a Hutt before her – she was my only source of help. Insanity didn’t appeal.

And neither did letting Evil Bitch out. Can I keep Revan at bay forever? Can I?

I wasn’t ready to reach out through the bond – touch the Force – just yet. The sheer life of it was too overpowering for me to handle just now.

Find HK. Just keep moving, and stop thinking. I blanketed myself with a detached numbness, and forced my feet to walk.

xXx

The droid’s red eyes gleamed in the darkness of the alley as I walked towards him.

“Statement: Master, I have acquired us a shuttle. By my calculations, we have approximately twenty minutes to board and depart Rii’shn before members of the Exchange are alerted to the lockdown of their south-western landing bay.”

Something clenched in my chest. “HK, you - you didn’t – kill anyone!” It wasn’t a question.

“Affirmative: No meatbags have had their miserable existences ended by my hand in the last hour, master.” For some reason, his voice sounded oddly smug.

The plimfoam walls of the alley were cracked and stained with age and who knew what else. I drew in a deep breath. “HK, how the frell did you lockdown an Exchange landing bay without killing a single person?”

“Observation: It was a mindless oversight of those Exchange meatbags to leave all that Gelosian toxin lying around.”

I stiffened. Gelosian toxin? I had no idea what it did, but if it could knock out a group of Exchange guards- “I thought you said no one had died!”

HK’s eyes flashed. “Conjecture: My chemical database precisely states that Gelosian toxin is rarely lethal, provided medical assistance is sought within twenty-four hours! If there are any fatalities, then it is clearly due to a lack of proper medical attention.”

I choked. “What are you saying? That’s there’s a whole bunch of comatosed Exchange thugs littered around this shuttle, that will die within a day if no one finds them?”

“Answer: Why, yes, master.” Whoever created HK should have drawn a big, evil smirk on his blood red face.

More blood on my hands. This time, I can’t even blame Revan.

My teeth clenched; now was not the time for self-recriminations.

“Let’s go then,” I hissed. “And for future reference, HK, if someone dies as a cause of your actions, then it counts as killing them.”

I could almost hear the droid shrug as he stepped forward to lead the way.

“Objection: Master, that is too broad a parameter! Scenario: If I was to buy the last kassi loaf, causing a settlement to starve to death before the next import, then technically I would be the cause of their death. Summary: This does not compute as killing the inhabitants of the settlement firsthand. You cannot expect me to accurately predict the future, master; not without additional core upgrades.”

I bit back a frustrated growl as we turned the corner. “No, but even you can predict that people may die from Gelosian toxin!”

A Rodian garbed in combat armour glanced warily at me; belatedly I realized how loud my voice was and cursed myself inwardly.

“HK,” I hissed quietly, cutting off whatever objection he was about to put forward. “Just tell me we don’t now have the sodding Exchange after us as well?”

“Prediction: Provided we use the fake signature I acquired from the Czerka databanks, and depart this shuttle promptly at our destination, then the Exchange will have no source to lay the blame on but Czerka Corporation. Observation: the cantina mook at The Lady’s Garter believed the GenoHaradan ambush to be an Exchange operation. They will likely blame Czerka for that, also.” HK’s red gaze gleamed. “The GenoHaradan is a worthy opponent, Master, but not one we wish to draw attention to.”

Despite myself and my growing horror at the bloodthirsty nature of this droid, I couldn’t help but respect his abilities. And if I could slip away from the GenoHaradan, all the better.

We walked quickly and silently to the landing bay.
The shuttle was small, and not made for intergalactic travel. Its fuel tanks could withstand only a handful of days in space; fortunately, Manaan was not far away.

The repulsors hummed through the floor as I belted myself in, concentrating fiercely on the controls so as to forget the comatose Exchange guards I’d walked over just minutes ago. I was becoming sorely tempted to melt HK down for scrap — yet so far, everything he had done had been under my command, no matter how brutally efficient he had been.

But it all added up to more people dead.

_The GenoHaradan attacked me — I can’t feel guilty for that!_ The Exchange guards, however, had simply been in the way.

I shivered at how cold my thoughts were sounding, and they weren’t even coming from her. _No, not her — Revan. I will not be scared to name that schutta. Not if she’s taken up permanent residence in my own head._

The shuttle manoeuvred quickly out of the landing bay, and I was glad of one thing — Rii’shn had no centralized government to speak of, and hence no firm astrogation laws. No official would bother with our ship leaving Rii’shn space.

As I activated the sublight drives, it occurred to me — I was flying a spacecraft. Confusion swamped my mind and I fumbled the controls, causing the shuttle to bank.

_What am I doing? I’m flying a ship!_ An alarm sounded from the console, and a dormant instinct took over. I steadied the ship, raised thrust to seventy percent, and increased the craft’s attitude to match the computer’s suggested exit trajectory.

“HK.” My voice shook slightly as the vehicle stabilized. “You got me a ship like I asked. But how did you know I could pilot?”

There was only one other seat in the shuttle, which the droid was currently occupying. He was silent for a moment. “Answer: I had... assumed, master. Observation: This is highly unusual. My programming does not allow for assumptions of this type.”

_You’re not the only one who assumed. I ordered you to get me a shuttle, and didn’t even think twice about piloting it until I was already in the sodding air!_ I remembered the feeling I’d had, after we left Tatooine and I joined Carth in the cockpit — I was convinced I knew how to fly. It was a part of my past — _my_ past, not Jen’s or Revan’s — I was certain of that. _But how had a street kid learned how to pilot?_

“Statement: It is time to program in our destination, master. Where are we headed?”

I tore my thoughts away from questions only Bastila could answer. “Manaan,” I said flatly. “We’re going to Manaan.”

HK paused, as if taking the time to process this command. “Commentary: While this would certainly not be expected by our enemies, Master, it will be difficult to travel there without being detected—“

“We’re going to Manaan,” I repeated. “I need to see Bastila.”

His eyes flashed. “Statement: It will be a pleasure to combat a worthy opponent, Master!”
“HK.” My teeth were clenched. “No more killing. No. More. Killing. Understood?”

How a droid managed to deflate in despair was beyond me, but HK did it. His shoulders even seemed to droop.

“Objection: Our en-”

“Shut up, HK. In fact, power down for the remainder of the trip.”

HK dimmed as the sky transformed into space. Without the ongoing commentary from him, I was left with the sound of vibration coming from the small ship’s engines, and the whirlwind of my own thoughts. I was headed back to Bastila – yet the last time I’d spoken to her, she’d sounded as if our association had ended. What had she said?

_You forge your own path, Jen._

That had been over a day ago. There was nothing for it.

I opened myself to the Force, and reached for Bastila.

xXx
Admiral Dodonna’s serious face vanished from the holoscreen, and so did my forced smile. I had to bite back the curses welling up inside. After all these weeks of fruitlessly running from planet to planet, I’d thought I’d be able to wash my hands of the Jedi and their supposed mission. As well as being reprimanded, I’d also been thoroughly disabused of that particular notion.

With a muttered expletive, I clenched my fist and pounded it into the pristine table. Being white poraclay – some hardened alloy of ferracrete – I couldn’t quite hold back a wince of pain.

I need a drink. A Corellian firewhiskey would do the trick. But I’d kicked that habit a long time ago.

Days that blurred meaninglessly into one another followed by the sharp shock of an official warning from my superior, finally forced me to take charge of my life again. Alcohol may numb the pain for awhile, but it's only transitory. And all I woke up with afterwards was hollow grief, a pounding hangover, and fading memories of a beautiful woman and a studious boy.

No, drinking doesn’t help. As I’d tried to explain to Jen back on Taris, those first few days when she was determined to live permanently in a cantina. The one time she’d actually managed to get roaring drunk, Mission had to drag her back down to our camp in the Undercity. I felt an angry scowl chase away the reminiscing.

Damn you, Jen! Damn you to the Outer Rim, or wherever you've disappeared to! She could have killed us all by her sabotage on the Ebon Hawk. Canderous was adamant she'd planned it merely as a diversionary tactic so she could run, but how could she know no one could get hurt in the forced landing? How could she take that risk with our lives? I'd seen the stark hurt look on Mission's face afterwards, and wanted to slap Jen for it.

And now that Jen’s gone, I would have thought I’d be able to get back to my normal life. But no, Admiral Dodonna had other ideas. Watch the Jedi she says, I thought sourly. Like Bastila ever tells me what she’s up to.

The last ten hours – ever since I’d entered the Embassy – were tiresome, to say the least. Roland Wann had grabbed me first, under the guise of a ‘debrief’. In truth, he wanted to grill me for information about what the Jedi were up to. Two hours later, and I’d begged off to report to Dodonna. In reality, I’d gone to grab some lunch first. As much as I respected the Admiral, I wasn’t about to face one of her lengthy reporting sessions on an empty stomach.

Dodonna hadn’t been impressed.

..."You’ve been travelling with them all this time, and you do not know anything about the Jedi mission other than it involves mysterious Force ruins?” Her voice bordered on scathing.

“Admiral, you know how tight-lipped the Jedi can be,” I objected. Like I hadn’t tried! Retrieving information from Bastila when she wasn’t inclined to part from it was like taking spice from a stoner. Damn near impossible.

“For all that Bastila's a Jedi, Carth, she is also a pretty young woman.” The Admiral had raised an eyebrow at me, as if conveying some message I was obviously supposed to understand.

I blinked. “What does that have to do with anything?”

For once, a glint of amusement sparked in Dodonna’s steely eyes. “I don’t indulge in office gossip, but that doesn’t mean I’m unaware of your reputation with the ladies.”

“My- my- what? Ladies?” I managed to croak out. What in the Outer Rim is she talking about? What reputation? My personal life had been empty and soulless since Telos burned.

A slow burn of anger mingled with the frustration I’d been building up for weeks, and with a sense of something close to relief I felt my temper snap. “Admiral, I’ve been stuck with a Jedi brat who’s lightsaber is firmly wedged up her arse; a crazy psychotic warrior who – guess what – can also use the Force; and an ex-Dark Jedi who not so long ago was slaughtering rabid animals out in the desert! The only female around I can relate to is a Twi’lek pickpocket who hasn’t yet graduated from childhood!” My voice rose to near-yelling pitch; vaguely I saw Dodonna’s face pale slightly in surprise. “I haven’t met anyone who could classify as a real lady in months!”

The Admiral straightened, and as her eyes flashed I realized just what I had implied. She stared at me stonily before responding.

“Thank you for that colourful commentary, Captain. Your disillusionment with my sex has been duly noted.”

The heat of anger faded into the uncomfortable sensation of embarrassment; I swallowed, and belatedly tried to back-track. “Uh, sorry Admiral, um- obviously, I wasn’t referr-”

“Save it, Captain,” she snapped. “I’ll overlook your impertinence this time, but you might do well to remind yourself that you are reporting from an official mission, not swilling beer and whining about women at the local cantina!”

I could feel humiliation warming my cheeks, and drew myself up stiffly. “Yes, Admiral.”

She sighed in frustration. “Just find out something useful, will you?” Her tone had changed from angry to mildly annoyed, and I knew she’d let it go. I was lucky enough to enjoy a relatively amiable relationship with the Admiral; relaxed enough that at times – like today – I forgot entirely who I was dealing with.

“I don’t see why I should be spying on the Jedi,” I mumbled. “I thought they were meant to be our allies.”

“But be dense, Carth,” Dodonna snapped. “You are there to also help, and you know it. The Jedi need an experienced pilot, and your combat skills have already proven more than merely useful. But they can be as stiff-necked about ‘Jedi business’ as the Selkath are about neutrality. The Republic knows this mission is crucial to the war against Malak. We would, however, prefer to understand why – and that is where you come in.”

…

I sighed, rubbing my neck tiredly. The debrief had then shifted to my crewmates – and Dodonna was nothing if not thorough. She’d wanted to know every last detail from who Canderous had worked for back on Taris, to why a Wookiee would leave Kashyyyk voluntarily. I’d been about to interject sarcastically if she also wanted a run down on their eating habits, when she moved onto the one person I really didn’t want to talk about.
“Jen Sahara,” Dodonna started. “Quite an enigma, this one. The only other survivor of the Endar Spire – and from your report, she had quite a lot to do with you escaping Taris alive. A scholar who has signed a three year contract with the Jedi Order, and then sabotages your ship on entry to Manaan and does a runner? Who is she, Carth? There’s more than just a scholarly background here.”

“Well, she can use the Force, for a start,” I said. Oddly enough, this entire conversation was making me uneasy.

“I wondered that,” Dodonna mused. “Since you contacted the Republic when you left Tatooine, I’ve had men do thorough background checks on all your passengers. You have picked up some interesting crewmates, Carth, but this Jen Sahara is the most curious. Our reports indicate that she was severely wounded when Darth Revan’s forces invaded the planet Deralia. A medic’s report lists several broken ribs, massive head trauma, multiple fractures in her spine – to name but a few. Apparently this scholar was a victim of weeks worth of torture by the Sith before the Jedi rescued her. In short, Carth, her injuries should have killed her.”

Even now I couldn’t believe it. Jen, captured by the Sith? Tortured by them? The same woman who on Taris had professed – if only to wind me up – that maybe the Sith had the right idea? But then it could explain her mood swings... her violent outbursts... Once, on Taris, she’d fainted in the middle of the street. She was a mass of contradictions – she could wield the Force, yet she was scared enough of the Jedi to crash the Ebon Hawk and run. I’d seen her risk her life for Mission more than once – a street urchin she barely knew – and then she turned around and left us all in the lurch.

Oh, what does it matter. Jen’s well and truly gone. I should have been used to betrayal by now – and hashing it over in my mind accomplished nothing. The others were around somewhere; it was probably time I found them. Before I’d contacted Dodonna, I’d tried to meet up with the others with no success. Even Roland Wann had disappeared, and usually that smarmy commander was everywhere. Now, hours later, I couldn’t help but feel surprised at Bastila’s absence.

I left my private quarters after a brief nap, returning an amiable nod from one of the Army soldiers stationed at the Embassy. I didn’t hold the best opinion of Roland Wann – there was something almost obsequious about him – but the grunts here were friendly and open to conversation.

The Republic Embassy was a pretty swish joint. The shining opulence of furnishings – even the waxed floor that had not one jot of dirt on it - reminded me of the Republic apartments back on Coruscant. I’d never felt comfortable there – maybe it was something to do with growing up as a dirt-poor farmer back on Telos. I wasn’t ashamed of my background, but I’d met plenty of officers who seemed to think I should be. Generally officers who, like Wann, had been promoted due to their lineage rather than any real merit.

For all that I knew the Republic to be the right side in this war - for all that it stood for freedom and justice – sometimes I wondered just how rotten the core of it was. At the end of the day, I supposed that slime trickled to the top of all organizations, no matter what they stood for.

I turned left down the east wing, heading towards the barracks. Striding towards me was one of the Senate liaisons, an Ensign named Gerith I’d spoken to earlier. Upon spotting me, his merry face broadened into a grin.
“Carth,” he greeted. “All is well?”

I smiled briefly in response. “As good as can be expected, I guess. You haven’t seen any of the Jedi about recently, have you?”

Gerith rolled his eyes in disgust. “No. To be honest, I try to stay out of their way. Politics, y’understand. Jedi often want to know information I’m not obliged to impart.”

I nodded in understanding. The soldiers who filled the ranks of the Embassy on Manaan were either Republic Army or Senate bureaucrats. Gerith belonged to the latter group, and was one of the few of which I could stomach. Most of the civil servants had the same outlook on military that Gerith did on the Jedi.

“What about the Ebon Hawk?” I broached quietly. Gerith had been chasing up the red tape our ship was embroiled in.

His countenance lowered further. “No luck, I’m afraid. Some of the more conservative Selkath seem determined to use this as an example. Say that any ship used in a fight on Manaan territory will be seized.”

I clenched my teeth. “There was no fight,” I ground out.

“How can you be sure?” Gerith shot me a piteous look. “I’m sorry, man, but the Selkath are acting like kath hounds guarding a hoarde of iriaz bones.” He shrugged. “I’ll do what I can.”

Blast it. Not only did Jen almost kill us, but she lost us our ship.

But if what Admiral Dodonna had said was true – if she’d almost died at the hands of the Sith – then who knew what was going through her mind? She’d told me her memory was messed up, and I hadn’t known whether to believe her. But after hearing this, it made sense. Horrible sense.

I’d known survivors of torture before, and memory loss was not an uncommon way of the mind dealing with the trauma.

My thoughts turned to Bastila. Jen was running from her. She’d tried to, before, but each time Bastila had convinced her otherwise. Now, it seemed, Bastila’s powers of persuasion had finally waned. Maybe, after Deralia, the thought of anyone who could wield the Force had sent Jen running scared. Jen? Scared? The thought seemed laughable, but Jen was such a mercurial character... and damaged, it seemed. More than I’d realized.

Two figures turned the corner up ahead, and I straightened as I recognized the Jedi Master Karon. Gerith turned to follow my gaze, and grimaced.

“I’m outta here – paperwork to do.”

He flicked a hand in acknowledgement as I nodded farewell, moving to intercept Karon. The Zabrak had stopped in the middle of the corridor, her head cocked as if she was listening for something. A distracted frown lined her face, and I walked within five paces of her before she even noticed me.

“What is it, Master?” a timid voice behind her asked. A Twi’lek male stood nervously in her shadow, young eyes trained on her. He was an adolescent, and judging by the tan robes, Karon’s apprentice.

“I’m not sure, Lars,” Karon murmured, and then turned to greet me. “Hello again, Captain Onasi.”
“Master Jedi,” I greeted, trying to keep my voice respectful. A twinkle of amusement sparked in Karon’s bright eyes, and I wondered if she’d picked up on my irritation. It wasn't directed at her, not really. She seemed like a good sort - for a Jedi - and I had to admit my mood hadn't been the best recently. Maybe I’m just not good with authority, full stop. “Have you seen Mission – the Twi’lek girl? Or Bastila?

The Zabrak’s mood sobered. “Mission left during the night, Captain Onasi.”

“Left?” I blinked. “What do you mean, left?”

The Jedi sighed. “I believe she has gone to find her own way in life, Captain. Of course-” she cut herself off, turning her head abruptly to stare into the distance, eyes narrowed.

“Her own way in life?” I all but exploded as my mouth dropped open. “What’s that supposed to mean?”

Karon shook her head, as if shaking off sand flies. “That she is old enough to decide what she should be doing. Do not worry, Captain, her Wookiee friend is with her, and I imagine that useful little droid followed as well.”

Vaguely, I realized I was gaping. I hurriedly shut my mouth, and felt anger churn within me again. Dammit Jen, this is all your fault! Mission’s too young to be out here – by herself... “I have to find her,” I said abruptly. “She’s only sixteen! What does she think she’s doing?”

Karon’s wise eyes rested on me. “I was of the understanding that she had been on her own for the majority of her life, Captain. And do not underestimate her friend Zaalbar. I sensed true devotion from him.”

For all that I disliked the patronizing speeches Jedi often spouted – and Jedi Masters were the worst – Karon’s words did have a calming effect on me. And they were, I knew, true.

"I can't believe she'd just go without saying goodbye," I muttered, scowling. I couldn't help it; I had a soft spot for Mission. She was impetuous and sassy, a bit like Jen, really, but Mission had an endearing naivete that was at odds with her street smarts – look at the way she kept defending Jen – and, truly, a heart of gold.

The Twi’lek boy behind Karon was staring at me with interest. I transferred my scowl to him, and he glanced away, a faint blush colouring his cheeks.

“Where’s Bastila then?” I asked abruptly. Karon’s attention had transferred once more into the ether – I wondered briefly if the Jedi had any sleep last night – but at my query her head snapped back to face me again.

“Commander Wann has not informed you?” Her voice was sharp.

“Informed me of what?” I could hear the annoyance creeping back into my voice. I knew I was acting like an old grouch – but dammit, nothing had gone right ever since Dodonna had ordered me to pilot the Endar Spire.

“Bastila – along with Jedi Juhani and Canderous – left four hours ago to Hrakert Station.”

“Hrakert Station?” I snapped. “What- where is that?”

Abruptly, Karon’s attention was jerked away from me again, and this time I heard her gasp audibly.
“Master?” the young Twi’lek queried in a hesitant voice.

“Where have they gone? And why aren’t I with them?” I demanded, scowling at the Jedi. I can’t believe this! Why doesn’t anyone ever tell me anything?

“Master, I-I can feel something,” the boy stammered. I glanced back at the young Twi’lek, and with something close to surprise noticed he was trembling.

“Yes, Lars, I sense it too,” Karon murmured absently, but a dark frown lined her face. She whirled back to stare at me intently. “Captain, is there a back entrance into this Embassy?”

The stark alarm on her face dissipated my grouchy mood. “Not that I’m aware of,” I answered slowly. “But I don’t really know the layout of this place.”

“I must see Commander Wann,” she said urgently. “I sense—” she cut herself off mid-sentence, her body stiffening. The boy called Lars gasped.

“The Force,” he mumbled. Shock widened his eyes. “I can feel them using it. There’s so many of them!”

“Peace, Lars,” Karon said curtly.

“What’s going on?” I asked, aware that my hand was gripping the blaster hoisted on my belt. There was an old saying amongst the Fleet pilots I used to serve with. An unsettled Jedi stirs more than just a mynock’s nest.

“Dark Jedi,” Karon responded quickly. “Ten of them. Close. We must warn Roland!”

She whirled around, breaking into a run. The soldier in me responded to her barked order, and I sprinted after her automatically. The Twi’lek boy was gasping behind me.

I’d yanked out my blaster, racing down the gleaming hallway. Adrenalin pumped through my veins at the unseen threat. I didn’t hear any sounds of battle, no alarms warning of invaders were ringing, but Karon was running like her life depended on it.

As we passed the barracks, one of the grunts stepped out, his face a blank slate of shock as he took me in.

I ground to a halt, as Karon and Lars disappeared further up the hallway. “Where’s Wann?” I shot out.

He shrugged, inquisitive alarm sparking in his eyes. “No idea, captain. What’s happening?”

“A possible attack,” I answered curtly. “Be ready for action!”

His mouth dropped open in disbelieving surprise, but I didn’t have time for explanations. I ran, determination and fear forcing my legs. Worried faces of soldiers and civil servants alike blurred into the background as I sprinted down polished corridors. Some had been staring after the racing Jedi, only to see me running after her. I ignored various questions thrown in my wake.

Finally I lurched into the command room, panting with exertion. You’re getting soft, Onasi.

Roland Wann was scowling angrily at Karon, who was more flustered than I’d ever seen her. The Twi’lek boy was all but hopping on his feet in anxiety. Several techs had stopped working on their consoles to turn and stare at the ensuing confrontation. It didn’t take a second glance to see that Roland wasn’t interested in what Karon had to say.

“Not this nonsense again! I told you before, Karon, I have no time for Jedi foolishness!”

“You would ignore this threat, Commander?” The Zabrak’s voice had risen in intensity. “I assure you, I am not issuing warnings for the sake of my own health. You must evacuate. Now.”

Red blotches of frustration emerged on Wann’s face. “Come on, this is Ahto City! The Sith wouldn’t dare attack us here.”

“Then explain why there are two groups – two, Commander – of Dark Jedi, from opposite directions, heading directly towards this establishment?” Karon fixed her stare on Roland, who turned away to glare at the gob-smacked techs.

“What are you doing – get back to work!” he ordered, waving his hand. His eyes caught on me as I joined them. “Captain, talk some sense into this Jedi, will you? Manaan is ruled by their forsaken neutrality laws!” With an angry sigh, he turned to lean over his console, his back to the Jedi.

I was taken aback, to say the least. I might not trust the Jedi, but I wasn’t blatantly stupid either. “Uh-”

“Roland.” Karon’s voice was low, deep, and almost frightening. I didn’t have to feel the Force to know that it was at work. Roland appeared to turn around against his own volition. “You refuse to evacuate? You refuse to call the Selkath for aid? You would ignore this threat, when the lives of all your men are in your hands?”

“I will not be made to look like a fool in front of the Selkath!” The words tumbled from him. “They already oppose us at every turn, and what with the mess down on Hrakert Station – I cannot afford to have the Republic’s position on Manaan weakened any further by a ridiculous call for Selkath aid from a non-existent threat! The Sith probably know you are here, Karon, and are trying to frighten you – that’s what they do best! If we have Jedi on Manaan, why shouldn’t they have Dark Jedi? They wouldn’t attack – I refuse to believe it.”

Her face was tight. “You refuse to believe it, Roland, because you do not wish to. That does not mean it will not come to pass.”

The tension between the two was more than palpable – the Republic officer, face chubby with good living and little exercise, beady eyes staring defiantly into Karon’s dark turquoise gaze. I could understand where Roland was coming from – politics are always more crucial than they should be – but how could he ignore the safety of his own men? From Dark Jedi?

“You mentioned two groups, Karon,” I cut in, my silence finally broken. “Where are the exits to this place?”

Roland looked relieved at my interruption. “There’s only the main one. Which is heavily guarded by Selkath security cameras – another reason why the Sith wouldn’t try anything. The Selkath would pick them up immediately, and there would go their share of the kolto supply.”

“And yet I sense six Dark Jedi outside in the quadrant,” Karon stated.

“So?” Roland growled. “You sensed ten of them yesterday, and the worst thing that happened is that it was Private Laconi’s turn to help the cook! Could it be your sense radar is a little faulty, Master Jedi?”

Lars gasped. Karon’s eyes narrowed, and I bit back a groan.
“Do not act foolishly, Roland, it does not become you. These are the same ones from yesterday, but now much closer and split into two groups. Attacking from both sides.”

Roland threw his hands up in disgust. Idly, I noticed all the techs had stopped working again. “Give me a motive, Karon – why would they attack us and risk everything? Not to mention there’s only one entrance – unless they want to cut through the roof or swim in from the docking bay!”

All expression fled from the Zabrak’s face. “The docking bay,” she breathed. “That would explain why I sense them beneath me.” Her eyes snapped back to Roland. “Risk the lives of your men if you wish, but at least keep your attention focused on the main entrance. I urge you again to evacuate, or at least call for aid. I shall move to the docking bay to pin them down.”

The Jedi whirled around and stalked out of the room. Lars almost stumbled in his haste to run after her. I jerked my attention back to Roland, who was glaring furiously at the exit.

“She refuses to listen to reason!” he seethed. “The Sith attacking makes no sense.”

And since when did the Sith make any sense? Karon’s reaction had certainly unsettled me, and going by the terrified expressions on the various civilians in the room, I wasn’t the only one. The safety of the men here had to come first. I bit back a sigh and tried to force a placating tone. “Still, it doesn’t hurt to evacuate, sir.”

Roland’s eyes snapped back to glower at me. “So not only would you have us lose face in front of the Selkath, but also leave this base unguarded for any man off the street to wander in? Don’t tell me you actually believe the Jedi, Captain?”

I felt myself scowling in return. “You think she’s just making this up, sir?”

He sighed angrily, and turned to glare at the techs who were now listening in to our conversation. Most of them turned quickly back to their consoles. “No, I don’t, captain. But I refuse to believe the Sith would dare attack us here. They are trying to provoke us into a fight with a show of strength – that is all. It is a common Sith tactic on Manaan streets. The gullible fall for it, only to find themselves in a Selkath jail.” At my disbelieving look he rolled his eyes. “Come on, Onasi! Why would they risk their kolto supply? And why would they bother infiltrating the Republic base? What? To get at Karon?”

A sobering thought struck me. Taris. Malak’s forces had laid waste to the city to kill one person. And the Sith probably thought she was safely housed inside the Republic base right now. “No, not Karon,” I breathed, horror striking into my gut. Karon is right. “Bastila. They’re after Bastila.”

Roland dropped his head into his hands and groaned. “Captain, I repeat, the Sith would be throwing away their kolto supply if they dared attack-“

“Do you think that would matter to them if they could finally kill Bastila? She’s central to our war effort, Wann! Where is she?”

“She’s central to our war effort, Wann! Where is she?”

“Far away from here! Jakobs – where do you think you’re going?”

One of the techs had been surreptitiously edging towards the door. His face blanched and he looked down at the floor sheepishly. “Er – bathroom break, sir.”

“Get back to work – now!” Roland screamed, his face mottling with fury. He looked about one step away from losing it completely, and must have realized this himself. The tech scampered back as Roland took in a few deep breaths.
“We need to get them out of here,” I demanded softly, lowering my voice to a whisper. I could hear pounding in my head. While Karon’s predictions had worried me before, only now did they seem like a plausible reality.

Intense dislike was aimed directly at me as Roland’s gaze bored into my own. “Have you forgotten your position? I’ve made my decision, captain. I will not have you countermanding my orders!”

Stiff-necked idiot! He would throw away the lives of his men rather than risk losing face? Whatever respect I may have had for the aging commander was fast disappearing. The base was full of civilians that would be cut down like renni grass by Dark Jedi. Somehow, I had to convince Roland the threat was real – this place had to be evacuated. I searched the room frantically before my gaze caught on the console next to Roland. An array of camera outputs stared back at me.

“Bring up the cameras for the docking bay,” I ordered. My tone was probably too commanding, as Roland shot me an incredulous look. I scowled. “Commander, we should at least be ready!”

He grunted, but leaned forward to switch the cameras. A view of Karon and her apprentice standing ready in an empty room greeted us.

“See? Nothing.” Roland’s voice was sanctimonious, and almost smug.

“The main entrance?”

Roland tapped another key, and a dual screen of an almost empty foyer appeared next to the docking bay. A bored receptionist was idly painting her nails at the desk. I could feel Roland’s irritated glance on me, but kept my gaze glued to the console.

“Where is Bastila?” I repeated quietly. “They’re after her, Roland, I’m certain of it.”

“She’s on a mission, captain – one I won’t talk about here. But there’s no way the Sith can find her.”

I jerked back to face him. I had almost forgotten my earlier anger at not being informed – I was part of Bastila’s crew, dammit – but now was not the time. Roland’s not far from chewing me out. Again. Still, I was fast reaching the point where I didn’t care. “We need to warn her.”

“Spread the panic far and wide, huh, captain?” Roland bit out sarcastically. He was staring at the screen, and a puzzled look slowly grew on his face. “That’s an incoming submersible. Odd, we're not expecting one for another hour.” He frowned. “That means someone opened the bay doors. That's not right.”

Trepidation crawled down my spine. I swung my gaze back once more to the console. Karon was standing near a surfacing submersible, her cyan lightsaber illuminating the screen. Behind her was the scared Twi’lek, clutching a short green ‘saber. “Do you recognize the ship?”

The horrified expression plastered over his chubby face was answer enough. The dual camera of the entrance foyer blinked at us as six black figures materialized.

The blood drained from Roland’s cheeks as terror uncurled in my stomach, but to give the blundering commander credit, he was fairly quick on the uptake. He all but shoved me away from the console, hurriedly switching to broadcast.

“Selkath Authority: this is Commander Wann from the Republic Embassy signalling a distress call. The Embassy is under attack from unknown forces. We request aid. I repeat: we request aid!”
One of the civilians in the room screamed and dashed for the door.

“Halt!” I yelled. “The entrance is blocked off – stay here!”

The tech shot me a terrified look but bolted from the room. The remaining occupants turned to stare at me.

“All soldiers to the command room! We are under attack!” Roland hollered through the intercom. I could see sweat glistening on his broad forehead. “All non-military personnel return to your rooms and lock your door until further notice! Do not attempt to engage the enemy!”

I quickly surveyed the room – a large half circle populated with consoles that had two direct exits. Ten people in here, most of them techs. They were no fighters; I didn’t need a second glance to see that. One sole soldier had staggered towards Wann, looking for direction. Her face was pale but set, and she held a small Echani pistol in readiness.

“Guard the south exit,” I ordered, pointing. “Any weapons here the techs can arm themselves with if need be?”

“Commander Wann, this is Selkath Authority,” a hissing voice came haltingly from the comm. “We have lodged your distress call and dispatched a peacekeeping corps. We do not tolerate violence on Manaan!”

“I didn’t exactly invite it,” Roland spat through gritted teeth. “Just get me some damn help before we’re slaughtered!”

The female soldier shook her head at me, then paused. “There might be a few blasters in the locker.”

“What is the nature of your attackers?”

I kept my blaster and eyesight aimed on the second door while motioning the closest tech towards me. “You. Go into the locker and distribute whatever weapons you can find amongst the techs. Stay in the far side of the room, away from the doors.”

The tech nodded, his eyes round in fright.

I turned back to Wann who was staring fixedly at the console. I had a brief glimpse of the once-bored receptionist being cut down by a glowing red blade before the camera shorted out.

“Sithspit!” Roland cursed. The other screen showed two figures advancing on Karon. Another two were climbing out from the now-docked submersible. Someone had engaged the defensive turrets that spat laser at the intruders, flashing sparks across the screen but otherwise being inherently useless against Force-users.

“Repeat: what is the nature of your attackers?”

“They’re bloody Sith!” Roland screamed into the console. “Who else would attack the damn Republic Embassy? Now get me some help!” He angrily cut the transmission with a punch to the desk.

Warning klaxons wailed loudly, and I had a sudden recollection of the Endar Spire. My jaw clenched. Curse those Sith! There’s too many people here... my one brief thought was gratitude that no one from the ‘Hawk was still in the Embassy.
I looked back towards the console in time to see one Dark Jedi push Karon out from the docking room, and out of view of the camera.

“Not even Karon can survive four of those bastards,” Roland breathed in horror. His face was white as he stared at the screen, terrified.

“She needs backup,” I muttered. One of the black robed figures had finally spotted the camera. He raised his arm, pointing towards us as lightning arced from his fingers, shooting straight in our direction. The screen went black.

“Check what other cameras are online,” I snapped out at Wann. “We need to track their movements.” I turned to face the techs – they were hurriedly passing blasters amongst themselves; not a one of them appeared comfortable holding a weapon. Roland's eyes were still glued to the console, but I noticed he’d finally pulled out his blaster.

“Stang, they’ve got to the control room! They’ve destroyed the communications array.” Roland swore, and slammed his fist down next to the screen. “Now we won’t know when the Selkath arrive.”

_How much help would they be, now?_ I looked up at Roland. “Dark Jedi in the foyer,” I reminded him. _Our call for aid has probably done nothing but send the Selkath to their deaths._

His eyes met mine, and then looked away. He didn’t say anything further.

“How many soldiers here, sir?”

“Thirty-three currently stationed on base.”

I blinked. “Only? In the main Republic base on Manaan?”

“This is an Embassy, first and foremost, captain!” Roland shot back. “We have other troops patrolling the seas. Some are stationed with the Selkath.”

The swishing noise of a door opening grabbed my attention, and I swung my blaster around to face the south door the female soldier was guarding. She gave out an audible sigh as two figures clothed in Republic uniform ran inside. I recognized one as a guard who’d escorted us into the base. Both were armed with stun sticks, and moved to flank the Commander.

“Karon’s hemmed down in the barracks. Holy stars-” Roland cut himself off, but motioned at the screen. I glanced down – the barracks were littered with corpses. Republic corpses. My gut clenched.

“Curse those black-hearted bastards!” Roland spat. “How are we to survive this?”

Someone whimpered from the far side of the room. Dammit. Likely there are few soldiers left. My attention sharpened on the screen. A dazzling display of red and light blue sparks shone from one of the remaining cameras. I had no idea where her apprentice was, but Karon was good – that much I could tell from the terminal.

“We should get the techs out,” I said abruptly. “They’re nothing but fodder here.”

Roland barked in disbelief. “Captain, these are Dark Jedi. We’re nothing but fodder.”

Internally I conceded the point, but now was not the time to show despair. “We should get ready, though. Blasters are all but useless against Dark Jedi. Any grenades here? Flamethrowers?”
Roland was shaking his head. “You’re lucky we had those blasters in the locker.”

I glanced down at mine, and bit back a curse. My one and only vibroblade – courtesy of Jen’s midnight jaunts back on Taris – lay back in my quarters. My only chance was to catch one of them unawares.

The Selkath are going to get ripped to pieces – we can’t rely on them, either. Our only hope was Karon, but she was alone – and I spotted another Dark Jedi entering the barracks to face her. Two against one. There were four earlier. Did she kill two of them, or are they elsewhere now?

“Can you see any soldiers?”

Roland leaned forward to cycle through the remaining cameras. “There’s six in the mess. That’s – that’s next to the barracks. They seem to be shooting at – something…”

I leaned closer; sure enough, a small group of soldiers were panicking, and firing blasters through the room. One of the soldiers fell down, clutching his leg. I grimaced; it looked like he’d been hit by friendly fire. Another arched up off the ground, mouth opened in a wordless scream.

“Where is the fiend?” Roland growled. “I can’t see any Dark Jedi on the screen!”

The soldier collapsed into a crumpled heap. Another threw a knife directly across the room. The knife jarred in mid-air; a sparkle of blue static heralded the appearance of a black robed figure yanking the short blade out of his shoulder.

"Stealth field generator," Roland spat. "The cam should've picked up more feed. Those things are crap, you wouldn't think the Sith would bother with them."

Roland was wrong. I’d seen one that good before, not so long ago. And Calo Nord likely been equipped by the Sith. Have the Sith discovered a superior stealth technology? It was certainly an effective way to create panic, I realized with mounting horror - throwing Force powers around while practically invisible.

Three of the soldiers retreated hastily from the room as the Dark Jedi hurled the knife back to its owner. I winced, closing my eyes reflexively as the Republic combatant buckled, hands scrabbling at his throat. When my eyes opened again, it was to appraise the unreal sight of the Dark Jedi lying comatose on the ground.

“What?” I exclaimed in disbelief.

“The injured man – the one who got a hit to the leg.” Roland fired me a stunned look. “He shot the sithspawn in the back.”

“Fancy that. Guess you don’t need to be a Jedi to kill those bastards.”

Back in the barracks, Karon was being pushed hard. One of the Sith parried her ‘saber as the other slashed at her leg. Karon jumped back, but it looked like a hit.

“I’m heading out,” I said flatly. “There were three soldiers who ran from the mess. I’ll find them, and go help Karon.”

Roland’s jaw dropped. “Are you crazy, Onasi? Those Dark Jedi will cut you to pieces!”

Determination flooded through me. “Maybe I can get a lucky shot in too. It’s better than waiting in here – Karon’s our only hope, Wann, and she looks like she needs all the backup she can get. We can’t count on the Selkath. Lock down the doors after me.”

I heard one of the techs whimper as I strode towards the door, my gun raised.

“Captain-”

I turned back to look at Wann, cloistered between the two soldiers. Their stun sticks looked about as effective as the twigs the Sand People had used on Tatooine, and the Commander had aged a year in a day. Dammit, the Republic should have been prepared for this. We allowed Manaan’s neutrality to lull us into complacency.

Roland stared steadily at me, one soldier to another. “Good luck out there.”

I nodded, smiled grimly, and walked out the door.

xXx

I slammed myself back against the wall, blood thumping so loud in my own ears that it was hard to hear anything above the pounding. I thought I’d heard soft footsteps around the corner; now all I could hear was my own quick breaths. It was a short walk from the command room to the mess, but with Dark Jedi on the loose, it seemed like an eternity.

It wasn’t the first time I’d been up against Force users. Apart from those idiots who’d attacked Bastila in Anchorhead – again, Malak’s forces after Bastila, I should have believed Karon earlier – I’d encountered Force sensitive Sith in the past few years when circumstances had taken me out of the skies. I’d seen firsthand what damage they could do.

The worst battle was on Rodia, where I’d been grounded when the hangar bays had been destroyed. Our squadron was attacked by a company of Sith led by the ex-Jedi Talvon Esan. I recognized him from the Mandalorian wars – I’d served under him directly.

Some of us had escaped. Some, he’d captured and played with. The Republic counter-attack had retrieved the prisoners and Talvon fled, but not until days had passed. I’d known some of those men who’d suffered under Talvon’s ministrations.

Bitterness flooded my mouth. It was all too easy to distrust and fear the Jedi. Too many of them fell to the other side.

The sudden cessation of wailing alarms caught my attention – someone had finally disabled them. If the Dark Jedi had been aiming for a stealthy approach, they’d done a pretty poor job – but stealth had hardly been needed.

The sound of harsh panting reached my ears; it took me a second to realize it wasn’t my own. I froze, and tried to still my breathing. The noise was close; I figured someone was leaning against the wall, just around the corner. I doubted it was a Dark Jedi, but couldn’t be certain.

With a leap, I cleared the corner and aimed my blaster directly down the corridor. A startled scream issued from a bloodied figure huddled against the wall – he scrambled backwards and slid to the ground before I recognized him.
“Gerith.” I lowered my gun and stepped forward to help the Senate Ensign up. “Are you badly hurt?”

His normally clear eyes were wide with panic, and blood soaked his right side. Streaks of black burns ran up his neck; a sign I recognized as the after-effects of Force lightning. He’s lucky to be alive, I realized grimly.

“C-carth,” he mumbled, clutching my hand as he stumbled to his feet. He didn’t let go of me once he stood. “Help. They-they’re after me. I’ve-I’ve got to get away!”

“The exits are blocked. Gerith, get to the command room. Wann’s got it sealed off – you’re best chance is to wait this out,” I spoke slowly, hoping my words would get through to him. Gerith had always struck me as a capable, intelligent man, but he was clerk, not a soldier. He’d probably never seen a Dark Jedi before, let alone had to fight one.

He was shaking his head at me, the whites of his eyes showing. “N-no. They’ll find me. I only j-just got out.”

I raised my other hand and gripped his shoulder firmly. “Gerith. Listen to me. They’re not after you, they’re after the Jedi. Get yourself to the command room, or find a place to hide. Do not try to leave the Base, there’s Dark Jedi in the entrance foyer.” My guess was that at least two Dark Jedi would have been placed to guard the main doors and resist any Selkath aid. Unless the Selkath tried blasting their way through the embassy with permacrete detonators, we were effectively pinned inside. And the Sith would search every room until they realized their quarry – Bastila – was not in residence.

A small measure of sanity seeped back into Gerith’s gaze, and he nodded shakily at me. As I stepped back from him, ready to move on, I heard the noise of clambering footsteps. Men, running towards us. Gerith let out a small scream, and stumbled into me.

“Command room. Now,” I ordered, hoping fervently that Wann would let the Ensign in. After all, I had told Wann to lock down the doors after me. Gerith took a step away and turned to run as I hoisted my blaster up again. The footfalls were louder, and judging by the frequency there was more than one man running towards me. I held my ground, blaster raised down the corridor as I heard Gerith retreat behind me.

Three soldiers breached the corridor up ahead, their rifles snapping to aim at me before they recognized I was no threat. I lowered my own pistol, taking in their state as they walked closer. They were the soldiers I’d spotted on the cameras, and one was limping slightly.

“Captain Onasi,” their leader said tersely as they approached. I noticed captain’s pips on the shoulder of his torn uniform. “We’re trying to get to Wann to protect him.”

“There’s Dark Jedi out there!” the injured man wheezed. His comrade elbowed him sharply.

“Wann’s as safe as can be,” I bit out. “He’s locked in the command room. I need your help to defend Jedi Karon.”

“What?” the limping soldier gasped. “No sodding way! We only just made it out of there!”

“Laconi, keep your flaming voice down,” the second soldier hissed, elbowing him once more. “Do you want to get us killed?”

“I saw one of your comrades kill a Dark Jedi by shooting him in the back. They aren’t immortal, and our only chance is to aid Karon.” I kept my voice low, intense. If I had to, I’d forge on ahead, but I’d vastly prefer a team. “She’s outnumbered, and won’t last long.”

The captain nodded seriously at me. “I’m with you. I’m Captain Gilies, this is Privates Darna and Laconi.”

“It’s damn suicide!” Laconi muttered.

“Either pull yourself together or get out of here, Laconi,” I ordered. I looked back at Gilies; he was waiting for my command. I quickly snapped out what I knew. “Ten Dark Jedi entered this embassy; six through the main entrance. We know at least one of them is dead. Karon went to the docking bay to cut off the other four – we need to move in that direction.”

Darna, a short, stocky Sullustan, moved to flank me. Laconi scowled, but followed suit as Captain Gilies took the lead.

“This way, we’ll cut through the maintenance corridor,” he whispered, turning to walk briskly onwards. The rest of us followed.

Around the corner we had to step over several civilian corpses. I heard a scream not far away, and Laconi jumped in fright. I cursed under my breath. He’s not far from cracking.

I looked over at him; perspiration dripped down the human’s sickly face.

“In here,” Gilies whispered, opening a chrome office door. Darna stepped through first, blaster raised. As the Sullustan waved me onwards, I heard footsteps trailing nearby. My eyes met the captain’s, and then trailed over Laconi. The door swept closed behind Laconi with a mechanical hiss, and I wondered how far the noise of a door shutting could be heard.

The footsteps paused, and started up again; closer.

We were in a workroom, with an exit on either end. I motioned the others to stand further back, and I pressed myself tightly against the wall by the door. If that’s a Dark Jedi, my only chance is surprise.

The footfalls stopped outside the door, and I held my breath, blaster raised at the entrance. I knew I would only get one shot – if that.

The door opened.

“Karon!” Gilies called out, and my grip slackened. The Zabrak master stepped through the entrance, and her head snapped to the side to face down my blaster. The corner of her mouth twitched in acknowledgement, and I truly wondered whether I would have got the shot off, had Karon been a Dark Jedi.

“We need to get everybody out,” Karon said in a clipped tone, her gaze sweeping the room. It was then that her condition fully registered – one arm sagged at her side, and blood soaked her beige robe from the knee down. She took a step further inside the room, and only because I was looking for it did I notice the limp. Of course she’s hurt, you numbskull. She just faced down four Dark Jedi. And there were five still out there.

“The entrance is guarded by Sith,” I replied tersely. “Wann’s in the command centre, with a bunch of techs and soldiers. How many Dark Jedi still out there?”

The Zabrak’s gaze tightened on me. I heard a whimper from Laconi. “I dispatched three of them, and injured a fourth.”
She’s some Jedi, all right. “I saw one get killed by one of ours. That’s five left, plus the injured one.”

Karon was shaking her head. “Too many for me, captain. I was not far from falling myself, and I have no idea where my apprentice is. I believe our—” She stopped mid-sentence, eyes widening a fraction. “Three coming down the hallway,” she whispered, spinning swiftly back to face the door. “Stand ready, they may not know we are here.”

Laconi moaned, dropped his gun, and sprinted for the exit at the south of the room.

“No-!” Gilies cursed as the door swished open, and Laconi disappeared from sight.

“They do now,” Karon muttered. I stood behind her to the left, gun pointing at the door. My chest felt tight with adrenalin and tension. I’m getting too old for this.

“Get ready to fire,” Gilies muttered.

I squinted at the door, readying my aim. Silence ominously pervaded the area. Karon was bathed in the pale glow of her lightsaber, holding station by the door. Gilies’ and I flanked her, further behind but still with a clear shot should the door open.

My grip tightened on the weapon; Darna’s breaths behind me seemed inordinately loud. Where are those black-hearted bastards? A trickle of perspiration slid down my temple, and the muscles in my forearm clenched.

Gilies’ shot me a tense, frantic look as the seconds ticked by. Darna shifted to the side, his weight balanced on his left foot. Only Karon seemed unaffected by the pressure of unbroken silence, standing serenely in front of us all. Have they walked straight past us? Are we safe, or-

A crash outside, and the door yawned wide once more.

As one, Gilies, Darna and I opened fire, a stream of bolts that was instantly deflected back into the room amidst the twirl of a red lightsaber. Karon leapt forward to attack two hooded Sith charging straight towards us.

A wave of Force power engulfed the room; the breath was smashed from my lungs as I was thrown backwards, my blaster ripped from my hands. Darna yelled in protest somewhere in the midst, and I heard Gilies thud into the wall with a grunt.

I scrabbled to my feet, spotted my gun and lunged for it as Karon stabbed her ‘saber clean through the neck of the first Dark Jedi. He crumpled with a bloodcurdling scream, and the Zabrak sprung backwards, dodging the violent swing of the second Sith by an infinitesimal margin. How does she move so flaming fast?

Adrenalin spiked through my veins like spice; I hoisted my gun to fire into the fray as Gilies struggled back to his feet. I pulled the trigger as a third Dark Jedi entered the room, hand outstretched in an sinister gesture that was becoming all too eerily familiar.

No-!

Then the Force was well and truly unleashed.

Bright white scorched the room, clawing at my skin, flinging my weapon away with ease, and driving nails deep into my flesh. Muscles convulsed; agony drove all rational thought from my head. My jaw was locked open in a wordless scream.
Abruptly, it stopped, and I found myself twitching on the floor. Stang! I jerked my head up, taking in the scene at a glance. Karon was facing off the only standing Dark Jedi, dodging a frenzied attack that pushed her deeper into the room. A second dark-robed figure was dragging himself to his feet—Dammit, there’s still two left!

My skin was burning from lightning residue as I dragged myself up, limbs tight and aching. Frantically, I searched for my blaster; tables and containers alike had been overturned, leaving an assorted mess of tools, implements and objects lying scattered. The only weapon I could spot was what looked like a nail gun, perched underneath an overturned canister.

Karon lurched unsteadily backwards, off-balance and on the defensive. Red met cyan again and again.

Darna was moaning softly, the odd blue spark still shooting brightly from his body. I dived for the nail gun as the second Sith turned to face me, a dark chuckle warning of his impending approach.

Nothing for it. I snatched the gun and rolled, aiming and firing blindly, the tool bucking desperately in my grasp. The first nail hissed as it melted on a red beam, before an invisible force wrenched the gun from my hand.

A berserker scream sounded from my left; the Dark Jedi whirled quickly to face a surprise attack from Gilies with a stun stick. I couldn’t stop a wince as a red beam cleaved the captain’s head from his body. Murdering bastards! There’s got to be a way to kill them! The Dark Jedi faced me yet again; defenceless, weaponless, I stood stock still as he loosed another mocking laugh.

Darna, crouched in a corner, opened fire and snatched his attention away yet again. I leapt towards Gilies’ still thrashing body and grabbed the useless stun stick. Who am I kidding? This, against a Dark Jedi?

Darna gurgled as the bolts were deflected back into his torso; the offender was still laughing, his back to me. I glanced down at the stun stick, grimaced, and threw.

It landed with a solid thud into his back.

Triumph was short-lived. As his legs buckled, I glanced back towards Karon. She had fallen to her knees in front of the sole remaining Dark Jedi. No! Sithspit, I have to help her!

The hooded figure raised a hand, and Karon’s lightsaber flew effortlessly out of her grip. I was completely out of weapons; my fists clenched, I’d fight bare-handed, if need be. The Dark Jedi wasn’t looking in my direction; so far, my survival hadn’t been noticed amongst their wild duel.

“Well, well,” the Dark Jedi gave out a low chuckle, and took a step closer to Karon. “And here I thought the Force user we sensed was Bastila. I guess it figures you’d be here. Babysitting your failure, are you?”

That made no sense to me, but considering the way Karon’s face tightened, it struck a nerve with her.

“Kylah,” she said softly. “I would like to offer my happiness at seeing you alive when we all believed you died upon the Endar Spire— but, considering your apparel, I do not believe your survival was chance.”

Horror punched into my gut, followed swiftly by boiling fury as I looked upon the face of the Dark Jedi. Even shadowed underneath a hood, I could recognize her, now. I looked hard enough. One of Bastila’s entourage onboard the doomed Endar Spire, who’d had the distinct ability to stick her nose even higher in the air than Bastila herself.

“Traitor,” the word slipped out in a hiss before I could think. “You backstabbing gutter slime! You sold out to Malak and betrayed hundreds to their deaths!”

Kylah’s attention snapped to me, her hand punched into the air and I felt my body lift violently. The breath was smashed from my lungs as I smacked into the far wall. Pain shot down my spine, and stars danced in my vision. Joints seemed to creak in anguished complaint.

Well, that was bright. I’d crashed into the far side of the room, next to the still warm body of Private Darna. His blaster was still clutched in his dead hand.

“So, where’s little Bastila then, hmm?” Kylah had focused her attention back on Karon; obviously I was far beneath her notice. I might be able to use that to my advantage. Get her, when she’s not expecting it. Survival instinct warred with exhaustion as lethargy swept through my limbs.

“You’re after Bastila,” Karon responded quietly. It wasn’t a query, but from the stiff set of her shoulders I didn’t think she’d been expecting that. Who else would they be after?

Kylah laughed deep in her throat. “What, you thought I was tracking your wayward apprentice?” A dark look passed her face. “We all have our missions, Master Karon.”

Karon mentioned her young apprentice had disappeared earlier. But why would Kylah be after Lars? That doesn’t make any sense. I edged my hand surreptitiously towards the blaster on the ground. Kylah had all but forgotten me.

“Now tell me,” Kylah’s voice dropped lower, and she took a step closer to the unarmed Zabrak. Karon was still on her knees. “Where is Bastila?”

The gun was too far away; I shifted my torso closer, holding my breath. Agony twisted through my back, and I knew I’d be a bruised mess tomorrow. Tomorrow? Hah, I’ll be stars lucky if I live through today. My palm brushed the cold arm of Private Darna.

“You will not find her, Kylah.” Karon’s voice was soft.

An ugly sneer contorted the Dark Jedi’s face, and she raised her lightsaber towards Karon. “I will kill you, Karon, don’t make the mistake of thinking I’d spare your pathetic life. Tell me where she is!” The blood red of the ‘saber flickered against Karon’s dark skin.

My fingers caught on the metal of Darna’s blaster as Karon jerked abruptly backwards, rolling to the side with her hand outstretched. I tugged at the gun, wrenching it up to aim. Kylah yelled in outrage and lunged; Karon’s ‘saber thudded into her hands a moment too late. As my blaster spat laser, Kylah’s weapon drove deep into the Zabrak’s side.

Karon gave an agonized wail as she crumpled to the floor.

My shot seared into Kylah’s shoulder; she screamed and spun to face me, flinging aside Darna’s blaster in fury. Dark rage deformed her features, and with a sick punch to my gut, I knew this was it.

Karon’s dead, or as near as. And so am I. I’d had so many close calls recently, that part of me was almost resigned to this.

“Worm!” Kylah hissed. “You just don’t know when to stay dead, do you?” She raised a fist once more, and I was dragged up against the bloodied wall, a band tightening around my throat. A fresh wave of panic struck blindly through me. No! I’m not ready to die, dammit! My hands scrabbled at my throat uselessly, and my vision dimmed.

The last thing I could make out was the bright sparks of electricity dancing from Kylah’s free hand.

xXx
Everything was falling apart. We were trapped on the bottom of the ocean, in a deserted base, with no vehicle back to safety. And no communication link back to Karon.

If that wasn’t bad enough, my worry for Juhani was beginning to supersede everything else. The intense Cathar had been strangely quiet, but I hadn’t failed to sense her burgeoning fear. Perhaps because my link with Revan was muted – small mercies, at least there is some peace – but I had realized all was far from well with Juhani. The Cathar insisted she was fine, but the tense set of her shoulders and the feral look in her eyes betrayed her.

And now we only had each other to rely upon. In the past, I had wished for that barbaric Mandalorian to leave – to allow me to continue my quest without his interference and snide temperament – but not like this. I could not quite forget the ugly look in his eyes.

Why did Canderous have to be so stiff-necked? His death-threats did not strike fear into me – I refused to let anything that uncouth simpleton said scare me – but I could not help but be cautious. Canderous was no match for the Force, but should he catch me unawares…

I pursed my lips in annoyance. If it hadn’t been for Roland Wann and his self-righteous interference, Carth would be accompanying us. While I trusted in the Force and my own abilities, the rabid Selkath set my teeth on edge and both Carth’s assured competence and his loyalty would be most welcome. We had been lucky so far, and had not encountered more than two of them together. But the cursed Base had been grotesque in its offerings – the last Selkath looked to have been feeding on a corpse when we interrupted him. Juhani had barely dodged a vicious bite to her leg.

“I wonder what could have occurred to warp these Selkath.” Juhani’s voice was jarringly loud as we picked our way through one of the endless meeting rooms that populated this part of the Base. The darkened chambers were now behind us, but the artificial light emitting from halogen bulbs cast an eerie glow over the plasteel walls.

Silence had enveloped us as we tentatively strode through the cursed Base. An hour earlier I hadn’t been able to ignore the faint, muted sounds that occasionally reached our ears – sounding suspiciously like human screams – but now, nothing. I was not sure what was worse.

“I do not believe I wish to know,” I finally replied. “These Selkath do not feel right.” They had been the only sentients we had encountered in the last hour. And their demeanour has been so crazed that I could not categorically call them sentient anymore.

The Force shone in all living beings, brighter in the more conscious ones. Somehow, it had been dulled, or twisted, in Selkath we had found. The only thing I could compare it to was a rabid kath hound.

“They do not smell right either,” Juhani muttered under her breath. “Like a caged reek.”

The incoherent, raving Selkath had dogged us through the twisted channels of the underwater base, and revulsion sat like sick in my stomach. They used to be researchers here. Logical sane people that have been contorted into something macabre. What could have happened to degenerate them so?

We exited into a hall that was dominated by a large, round table. Datapads and techJournals sprinkled the floor in a disjointed mosaic. Days ago, scientists met here to discuss their findings and research projects. A vast ferracrystal window gave us a view into the gloomy depths of the Manaan ocean. The water was too dark to make anything out, although I thought I caught a glimpse of a slithering shadow in the murky depths.

Juhani shuddered and moved on.

“You are safe inside, Juhani. The water cannot come in.”

“I know,” the Cathar replied tartly. “I am well aware that it is an irrational fear, and I apologize for it. But I can – no, I will deal with it. In silence.”

She stepped past me after that pointed remark, and did not look in my direction. I held in a sigh and followed her. I should not have brought that up, I rebuked myself. Surely reminding Juhani of her own fear achieves nothing. But I wanted to help her, and I needed her strong.

I silently followed her into one of the long corridors that sprawled like treekan tentacles throughout the base. Walls loomed on either side, closeting us in this claustrophobic place. I had never been so anxious to see blue sky again.

Our objective was to discover a working transmitter or console, but thus far we had been unlucky. The only computers we had found were either malfunctioning, or had been maliciously destroyed.

The corridor curved gently to the right, and the lights above flickered intermittently. Panels from the ceiling had fallen to leave rubble in our path, but beyond that I could make out a larger room. The door had been smashed open, and pale electronic light shimmered from within. Juhani straightened her shoulders, and stepped over the rubble on the floor.

As the Cathar strode into the room – a command centre of some sort, I could see that now – I noted a faint whirring noise. What is that? The Cathar froze, and my mind raced. I’d heard that sound before, but couldn’t place it.

A blast of bright laser fire spat back at us, aiming directly for Juhani. I gasped, instinctively reaching forward to pull her to safety, but the Cathar was quick enough. I sensed a vague hum of the Force swirl inside her as she leaped backwards, falling onto the broken ceiling tiles and scrambling back over them. Her wild eyes met mine.

“Turrets,” I muttered, edging away from the room. “They must be malfunctioning.”

“Why?” Juhani gasped.

“I am not sure,” I returned, but my eyes were on the room. I can destroy the turrets, but it may take out the computers also. Is it a better choice than turning around? We had to find a working console to request help, but moving onwards was even more important. We would achieve nothing if we kept backtracking at every obstacle.

“No, no, you misunderstand me. Why would a research base be armed with turrets?”

I looked back at Juhani; she was frowning in thought. "As a defence against the Sith, I imagine. Should they ever find out about this secret base, they would stop at nothing to destroy it." My first thought upon hearing about the problems down here had been that the Sith were somehow involved. Now, I wasn't so sure.

“You believe they would risk the neutrality agreement to attack here?” Juhani inquired.

“I do not think they would be jeopardizing it. This place is secret – even from some members of the Selkath government. The Sith could attack here and the Republic could not afford to cast the blame upon them – not without revealing their operations. The political ramifications of that could cost us the kolto agreement, rather than the Sith.”

Juhani had turned to face the room again, her body tense. Her ears lay flat against her head. I laid my hand on her arm to forestall her.

“Let me disable the turrets,” I murmured. She nodded, and I gathered the Force inside me. The life energy inundated through my veins and settled my nerves – some part of me understood just how addictive the Force could become. I closed my eyes and reached out my senses, feeling for the electrical impulses in the room beyond. It buzzed with the artificial energy of working machinery, and I knew a moment’s regret about the computers I was about to destroy. Though surely we would find more deeper in the base – we had to.

I stepped forward, flat against the north wall and out of line from the working turret. Why it was activated I did not know; I preferred to believe it was malfunctioning. The other reason – that someone had set it to fire at anything that moved – raised too many questions. I only knew of two beings alive in the base, and that hysterical Twi’lek we encountered earlier was in no frame of mind to be turning on defence systems. I did not want to consider that the Mandalorian might be angry enough to impede our progress – or worse, to actively attempt to kill us.

I stretched out my hand, letting forth a flood of ionizing Force power that streamed towards the electrical oscillations. Loud pops and bangs of systems shorting out issued from the room, and bright sparks danced against my eyelids. I let the flow continue for a moment longer and then stopped, panting slightly against the wall. While I was proficient at this use of the Force, it was tiring.

I opened my eyes to Juhani staring at me quizzically. “You transform the Force differently than I, more efficiently. That looked very similar to what Revan used against me, back on Tatooine.”

I stiffened, indignation spiking hot in my belly. Lightning – that is an abomination. Used to torture and kill. “It is not the same,” I said tartly, aware that my voice had turned stiff and insulted. “This use of the Force affects only electronic equipment, such as droids or computer systems. It is nothing like lightning.”

“I am sorry.” Juhani looked taken aback. “I did not mean to offend you.”

I realized I was glaring, and hurriedly schooled my features. Why am I so upset? Revan had once been one of the most powerful Jedi around. She was renowned for her ability with the ionization, far more so than me. Just because her skill had transferred to the electromagnetic side of the Force - what she had used on Juhani - did not mean I should be so offended. For, it was the way she had used her talents that made them so odious, not the talents themselves. Revan is certainly a touchy subject for me these days, I realized with some chagrin.

“And I should not be so quick to snap,” I apologized. “Master Zhar once told me that ionization was a close cousin to the lightning many Dark Jedi employ. Perhaps I am more like Revan than I care to admit.”

Juhani smiled at me in understanding, and her face filled with warmth.
We cautiously edged into the room again. Sparks shot from the turret mechanism up on the ceiling as it hung limply by a cable. Four consoles in the centre of the room showed nothing but static.

My shoulders drooped as Juhani laid a comforting hand on my arm.

“We will press on,” she whispered. “There must be some system – or person – left on this base that can help us.”

I nodded at the Cathar; she appeared steadier, calmer than she had been. Perhaps we both benefit from reassuring the other. With that thought, I followed her silently out into yet another corridor.

As we left the doomed command centre behind, a clattering noise reached my ears. I tensed, and once more activated my lightsaber. The corridor turned sharply to the right some twenty metres ahead, and beyond that came the sounds of incoherent muttering. We froze, as into sight loped the crazed Twi’lek Canderous had scared away earlier.

“You!” he garbled, breaking into a run. A hiss next to me indicated Juhani’s lightsaber; with a wary eye I spotted a blade in the flailing hand of the panicked Twi’lek.

“I want your ship! Give it to me!” His hand waved uncontrollably; his eyes were wide and dilated. Part of me marvelled that he had survived these last few hours – he was lucky to have avoided that bloodthirsty Mandalorian.

“Please, calm down,” I said slowly, carefully. “We can help you, but-”

“No! I’ll kill you if you stand in my way!” Saliva dripped from his open mouth.

“Bastila, let him past,” Juhani whispered.

“Our ship is damaged,” I spoke slowly, struggling to keep my voice low and non-threatening. “You must listen to reason-”

“I’m not afraid of you!” he shrieked, his fingers clenching on the blade.

“Let him past, Bastila!” Juhani’s voice was intense. “Let him to our ship.”

Surprise at the Cathar was what made me stand down; at the very second I stepped aside, the crazed Twi’lek was past us at a scream, almost cackling in glee.

“Juhani!” I hissed. “The hull of the submersible is cracked – allowing him through has condemned him to certain death!” Stunned disbelief choked me; that the Cathar would allow such an unbalanced person to their demise was not what I expected.

“He would have attacked us otherwise, and died in the effort,” she replied, her yellow eyes fierce and gleaming. The sound of the Twi’leks footfalls grew fainter before dying away completely.

“No, you cannot know that!” I protested. “We should have tried-”

“We did, earlier,” she countered. “You sensed his mind – he was as far gone as the Selkath, and you have not managed to get through to any of them, either.”

Defeat sat heavy in me; the Cathar was right. I had tried to communicate with all the Selkath we encountered. Nothing but insane war cries had met my desperate pleas.

“Besides,” a half smile sat oddly on Juhani’s face. “He does not have the access codes to start the submersible.”
I felt my mouth drop open as chagrin overwhelmed my sense of despair. Juhani was smiling openly now, not mocking, but merely conveying reassurance. I could feel my cheeks flushing in embarrassment. I detest it when I miss the obvious. Juhani turned to stare intently down the corridor, the warm expression sliding from her face.

“This place is a rotting cess-pit of evil,” Juhani muttered, switching off her lightsaber and hooking it to her belt. “Bastila, not everyone can be saved. And some—some must find their own path to salvation.”

I knew she was no longer talking of the Twi’lek. My thoughts shied away from Revan automatically, but I could not quite still a smile at Juhani’s words.

“And who taught you the wisdom of a Master?” I asked, a lilt in my voice.

Juhani smiled back, and assumed walking once more. “I had a good talk with Karon.”

We stayed quiet after that, walking silently down the eerily empty tunnels. Speaking with Karon had been a balm to my soul; but down here in the bowels of the ocean, I was no longer at peace. Tension returned to Juhani as we moved further; the Cathar’s movements became abrupt, jerky. Occasionally we could hear creaks as the base groaned under the weight of all the water. I could only hope that Juhani was not dwelling on it also.

“I would like to know more about these Star Maps,” the Cathar’s voice broke the ominous silence. I recognized she wished more for a distraction than an explanation. I, for once, appreciated the chance to share what had been my mission alone for so long. Juhani was a sister Jedi; returned recently to the fold, yes, but she could be trusted with some of the details. There were many I could not divulge.

“Karon explained the majority of what we already knew,” I began. “The Star Maps are relics of an ancient civilization— but more importantly, we believe they point towards some sort of powerful weapon. A weapon that Revan and Malak discovered.”

Juhani nodded. She had heard this before from Karon, less than a day ago. “There are four maps, yes?”

“Five if you include the one on Dantooine—the starting point. The Council found that it contained the coordinates to the four others.” I paused, wondering how to phrase the rest. “I— I shared some of Revan’s memories before her mind was rebuilt. One of which was her and Malak entering the tomb on Dantooine. That is how the Order found out about the Star Maps.”

Juhani lapsed into silence, and I wondered what she was thinking. We walked cautiously through an empty storage room; I grimaced at the sight of two Selkath corpses lying broken on the ground. Splintered metal fragments lay next to lockers that had been blown wide open. Scorch marks and grainy residue marked the ground, suggesting evidence of a grenade blast. Could this be the Mandalorian’s doing? It seemed likely, although I dearly hoped I would not encounter Canderous again.

Juhani’s voice cut through the dead air. “Do you not think the others deserve to know about our mission?”

I could not help a bitter laugh. “What others? Juhani, in case you haven’t noticed, our team has disintegrated. Mission and Zaalbar have disappeared; Canderous has deserted us. Carth is the only one to remain loyal, and he is not even here!”
Juhani did not reply as she opened the exit at the south of the room. Another vast hallway greeted us, this one splitting nearby into two closed doors. A sign dominated the wall next to us.

“It seems we have a choice,” Juhani murmured, her eyes skipping over the sign. “Research Administration or the Experimental Laboratory.”

“Let’s try the former. Perhaps we can find a working console there,” I suggested.

Juhani nodded, and stalked to the door. A camera mounted on the ceiling shifted to track her movements, and I froze in readiness, glancing around quickly for turrets. I could not spot any defence weaponry in sight.

“It will not open,” Juhani said, palm pressed on the door control. “Either the door has been locked, or the electronics are damaged.”

My eyes stayed fixed on the camera as I walked slowly next to Juhani. It moved slightly to point at me.

“Juhani,” I said softly. “I think that camera is tracking us.”

Juhani twitched, shooting me a look of surprise before affixing her gaze on the ceiling. She frowned, and raised a hand, palm open, in a universal greeting.

A faint noise permeated through solid ferracrete; I could not make it out, and Juhani shook her head in irritation.

“Hello?” I called out. “Is someone there?”

“Survivors?” Juhani murmured, her eyes lighting. Nothing but silence answered our call.

I knocked loudly on the large door. “We are part of a Republic rescue team! Can you hear me?”

“Go away!” a muffled voice reverberated through the thick ferracrete. “You’ll let the Selkath in! They’ll get us like they got all the others!”

Juhani’s face was solemn as she laid a palm on the door. “There are none out here,” the Cathar cried out. “You can see from your camera – there is but us two!”

“We will not hurt you!” I added, knocking again on the door. “Roland Wann sent us!”

The vague sounds of a stifled argument filtered through – there is more than one survivor then. I could not quite perceive what they were saying.

“We are here to help!” I appealed again. “Please, we will not harm you!”

Voices were raised once more in debate before I heard an answering call. “Okay- I’ll unlock the door, but you have to come in quickly!”

The door swished open as I sighed in relief. Two humans stood back from the entrance, staring at us, faces fraught with distress. The younger female was pointing a gun directly at me.

“Quick!” the elder, a male, said frantically, waving his hands. “Before the Selkath come!”

I had barely taken a step inside the room before the door snapped closed behind us.

“Who are you?” the woman cried, her eyes wide. The gun – a small blaster – wavered in her “Sami, calm down,” the man murmured, raising a placating hand to rest on her arm. “I don’t think they’re here to kill us.” The woman lowered the gun at his words, her shoulders sagging in fear and exhaustion. She muffled a sob, and I felt a surge of pity at what these poor people had gone through.

“My name is Bastila Shan, and this is Juhani,” I introduced. “Roland Wann sent us to rescue any survivors.”

“I am Kono Nolan,” the male responded, but his head had jerked to face me at my introduction. “This is Sami Touraide. I- are you Jedi?” His eyes had wandered over us, and were resting on the deactivated lightsaber in my grasp. “Did you say Bastila Shan?”

“Jedi?” the one called Sami murmured. Something that resembled hope lifted the weariness from her features.

I was surprised Kono recognized my name, though I should not have been. It seemed like years since I had been actively involved in the war, utilizing my prized Battle Meditation for the good of the Republic. Any person, be they scientist or merchant or clerk, would have heard my name if they followed the holofeed headlines. It was easier then, knowing where the enemy was, and what I needed to do to help our allies. Better than this sneaking about from planet to planet, unable to consult with the Masters and not knowing who to trust.

“Do you have a way out of here?” Sami demanded. She’d put her gun aside on a table, and took an expectant step towards us.

“Bastila Shan,” Kono muttered disbelievingly under his breath, staring at me the faintest glimpse of awe in his eyes. I shifted uncomfortably.

“Unfortunately, our submersible was damaged on the trip down here,” Juhani replied. “We will have to look for another way out.”

Sami was shaking her head as the hope fled from her face. “So you have no way of getting out of this pit either? Some rescue!”

“Sami!” Kono reprimanded her sharply, shooting me an apologetic look.

I pursed my lips, biting back indignation at the scowling woman. “Perhaps, rather than recriminations, you can tell us what happened and we can go from there.”

Sami glowered at me, but Kono was nodding in agreement. “It was... almost a week ago, now. Our work teams were outside in the rift near the vent. This... this monster-”

“Firaxan shark,” Sami interrupted, her eyes flashing.

“Larger than any shark I’ve ever seen!” Kono shot back incredulously. Juhani looked at them in askance; this sounded like the echo of an argument run ragged in the past.

“Kono, I know what I’m talking about-”

“What did this shark do?” Juhani interrupted in a steely voice. The two humans quietened, and Sami closed her eyes in despair.

“Our people outside- they, they were torn to shreds,” Kono answered finally, his voice low and quiet. “This shark or whatever it was– and I’ve never seen a creature so large– seemed to lead an attack. Swarms of firaxan followed it, our cannon defences were useless...” he trailed off, and I was appallingly reminded of the presence I had felt when approaching the Station. Some vast entity slammed into my Force walls and disintegrated them, I recalled with horror. Something that rekindled the frenzy of the firaxan swarm attacking us. Could it have been this monster they are talking about?

“Then our Selkath researchers went mad,” Sami continued. She was looking away from us, vacant gaze fixed on the wall behind. “They started screaming... and clawing at everything around them.”

“We barely made in here alive,” Kono added. He swallowed. “Sami and me... I... I thought we were the only ones left. We heard the Selkath outside at the doors every once in a while... and those strange noises echoing through the base. We... thought everyone was dead... dead or insane.
All we could see was the cameras... and we saw the Selkath slaughter everyone...”

A portentous silence pervaded the room; Juhani was looking down, a painful grimace twisting her mouth. Unease swept through me, heavier than before. I must find a way forward. Trust in the Force, Karon had told me. I struggled to take the words to heart.

“Can you contact the Republic from in here?” I asked quietly. “That must be our first objective. We need to let them know there are people alive down here-”

Sami snorted, and I halted my discourse to frown at her. “It’s not like they’d send another rescue team – the firaxans are attacking any vehicle that approaches the base!”

Annoyance wound its way through me; I could understand that they had experienced a horrific time, but the woman so far seemed to be objecting at every turn. “Regardless,” I went on smoothly.
“We need to communicate with them. Is it possible?”

Kono was shaking his head. “No, not yet. Our communications array went down days ago. We don’t know how – either the Selkath or those blasted malfunctioning turrets. Something happened, and caused the security systems to kick in and seal the room shut. I can’t connect to the mainframes from here, so I have to assume the damage is irreparable.”

I could feel myself frowning in thought. “You said not yet,” I replied slowly. “Do you believe there is a way, then?”

The older scientist hesitated, and then nodded slowly. “The systems in this room were used for communicating to our workers outside. Each envirosuit is kitted with a small transmitter, so from here we can keep track of our mining teams. Our computers aren’t equipped for long-range communication, but I’ve been trying to strengthen the signal using the amplification units from our spare envirosuits. If I can run it through enough amplification stages without too much signal degradation, it might just be strong enough to reach the surface.” Kono shrugged. “It’s a long shot, and it’s been slow going, but we haven’t had many other options.”

I had a good look around then – I had not paid much attention to our environment since Kono and Sami had so grudgingly granted us entrance. We were in what looked like a research station – terminals lined two walls, yielding what appeared to be scientific data on most of them. A full circle of even more consoles dominated the lower end of the room, and multiple camera outputs illustrated their screens, half of which showed static. I could see that the two humans had been able to track parts of the Base while staying safely locked inside this haven. Desks and benches laden with equipment I did not recognize furnished the north end of the room, underneath a wide window that showed a dark portal to the world outside.
“Well, that is good news,” Juhani said after we paused to digest it. “If you believe we can eventually contact Commander Wann-”

“We’ve got a bigger problem,” Sami cut in, looking intently at the both of us. “The air conditioning’s not working.”

“The air con’s not working,” she repeated indignantly. “The firaxans have attacked parts of the base, and we believe that’s what caused a leak in the pipes leading from the air turbines. The immediate countermeasure by the control cluster was to shut the pipes down, causing the air circulation process to feed back on itself.”

There was a heavy pause. “What, exactly, does that mean?” Juhani enquired in a tiny voice.

Sami sighed. “In short, the air’s not replenishing.”

I froze, and heard Juhani moan beside me. Sami, however, did not look so alarmed. Perhaps she’d had days to come to terms with the ghastly knowledge of her impending suffocation. “Now this base is pretty big, I’d say we’ve lots of air left – but I just don’t see the Republic sending another rescue vehicle when the last three haven’t made it back. We’ve gotta sort out the firaxan problem ourselves first, otherwise even if they do send another ship – it’s not going to make it down here intact,” the words tumbled in a rush from Sami, and she finished by inhaling deep and folding her arms defensively.

“We’re running out of air?” Juhani whispered, her eyes widening. I felt a churning in my stomach, and swallowed despite myself.

“We might have weeks left,” Kono amended. “I’ll only need a day or so and I should be able to send a delayed message through. The Republic will send another rescue team – they must-”

Sami snorted, and despite myself I was almost inclined to agree with her. “Kono, we’ve seen three submersibles arrive since this happened. We’ve tracked them on the cameras. All of them were assaulted by the sharks – one didn’t even make it inside! It’d be suicide for them to send any more-”

“You think they’d leave us to die?” Kono shot back heatedly. “You really think the-”

“What can we do about the sharks?” Juhani intervened.

Sami fixed her gaze on the Cathar. “We’ve powered down most of our harvesting machines. I believe that-“ “What’s that?” I cut in, my attention caught sharply by a blur of activity on the screen directly in front of Kono. In the periphery of my vision I vaguely noticed Sami shoot me an irritated frown, but I was more focussed on what looked like the onset of a fight. Kono and Juhani turned to study the console as I walked forward. I heard the Cathar gasp.

“It’s more psychotic Selkath,” Kono muttered. “Most are dead now – they even turn on each other – but there’s still some stragglers around.”

“Where is that room?” Juhani’s voice had a note of distress. I looked closer, and with mounting horror recognized the bulky figure standing in the centre of the room: Canderous Ordo.

“It’s our chemical storage room – just down the hallway from here actually,” Kono replied.
I couldn’t hold back a gasp of terror; my stomach clenched and my veins turned to ice as I processed the video starkly playing out in front of me. Bile churned in my stomach.

I could make out perhaps seven Selkath, charging at him in unison. The Mandalorian fired point blank into the chest of one, but two others leapt onto his back. Revulsion flooded me as I saw one of the crazed Selkath sink his teeth deep into Canderous’ neck. He’s going to die in there! The Mandalorian arched in pain, but retaliated by slamming his elbow into the stomach of the Selkath.

“We must help him,” I whispered, realizing at once that for all I disliked the callous barbarian - I did not wish him to die. Juhani swivelled to stare at me in surprise.

“We can’t!” Kono objected. “We’re safe in here – the Selkath attack anything that moves!”

One of them had wrested the Mandalorian’s blaster from his grip; another had taken a frantic swipe at his legs. Canderous twisted as he fell to the ground, fists snapping out in a wild attempt to fight back. The Selkath with his gun turned to fire, stumbling backwards as the repeating blaster coughed laser chaotically through the room.

“Open the door!” I demanded urgently. Without consciously realizing, the Force had swirled and interleaved through my verbal command. Kono stepped backwards, a dazed look on his face. “Open it, now!”

Sami’s mouth dropped, her hand snapped towards the console and I heard the door swish open. At once, I ran for it, harnessing the Force to lend me speed.

“Bastila-!” Juhani cried from behind. I paid her no mind, sprinting through the corridor. The walls blurred past as I ran, pausing only to slam my hand on the door control at the end.

The entrance opened, and a horrific sight met my eyes. Selkath corpses garnished the large room, but at least four were a writhing pile in the centre. I could not even make out the Mandalorian – it looked like a feeding frenzy. Feral shrieks and cries mingled with brutish Mandalorian howls – he was still alive.

An upsurge of Force power erupted from me, rippling through the room and thrusting the Selkath off Canderous, like petals plucked by a sharp winter’s breeze. My lightsaber glowed yellow in my hands; with a sharp cry I ran forwards, cutting down the first Selkath in my path. It hissed as it seared into blue-green flesh.

The Selkath howled in anguish, and two others scrabbled up to face me, leaping rabidly at me, snarling, hands outstretched in a frantic bid for my face. They are crazy! My lightsaber whirled in desperation, searing a limb off as warm blood spattered on my face, stabbing deep into a belly as I dodged the swipe of a claw. I could hear Canderous grunting as he struggled to remove himself from the fray; the thrumming noise of his blaster-

Wait, he was not holding his weapon!

Sharp pain blossomed in my lower back, and I screamed convulsively as my legs caved underneath me, my lightsaber slicing through a Selkath leg as I lost my footing-

There was a roaring noise in my ears as the agony overrode everything else; daggers of fierce torment biting deep into vertebrae-

“Bastila?” Canderous yelled, his voice shocked and incensed. I’d fallen on my front, my lightsaber slipping from my grasp. Alien growls dimmed under the torrent of pain as a heavy, snarling weight landed on my back – another Selkath, a dim part of me realized, as I sunk helplessly into black
A flaring of agony in my back brought me to jarring consciousness; my eyes stayed tightly closed as I struggled to contain my breathing. Painful warmth throbbed at my side and tailbone, overshadowing a murmured conversation I barely registered.

“I told you! There are no working submersibles left. Each one that fled the base was smashed to bits by the sharks – I don’t see any way out of here other than to hope for a rescue team.” The voice was desperate; it sounded like the scientist.

“Yeah, and we all know how successful that's been,” a gravelly voice fired back.

“Bastila? Are you awake?” a quiet murmur by my ear; I felt a faint pressure on my hand. Bastila? The query rippled faintly through my mind. I shied away in reflex.

“Or we could manually disable the last harvesting machine. No, Kono, listen to me! We have no choice-”

“You wanna go for a swim out there? What, you think the sharks haven’t been fed enough?” That was definitely Canderous, his deep voice mocking and sarcastic.

With effort, I pried open my eyelids. Harsh light blinded me and I gasped, squeezing my eyes shut involuntarily. The pain stabbed deeper in my back.

We need to talk. Are you there? The voice was dimmer now, so quiet I barely registered it.

“He’s right, Sami. We don’t stand a chance out there!”

“Bastila, can you hear me?”

Dizzying nausea pulsated through my senses, and with something akin to gratitude I let unconsciousness claim me once more.

xXx

Angry, raised voices pervaded my oblivion, but this time, awareness was quicker to emerge.

“I ain’t putting my life on the line for a pair of cowardly academics!”

“I’m needed here! I cannot afford to leave this room!”

The breath expelled from my lungs as my eyes opened. Blurry colours morphed into people; Canderous was sneering at Kono Nolan, whose face was red with indignant fury. The Mandalorian has stayed, then. Unease crawled through me.

“Canderous, this is our mission! One of us must brave outside, and I- I don’t...” Juhani’s voice trailed off, and her head bowed in what I guessed was shame.

“I’ll go,” a young female voice spoke out firmly.

“No, Sami, I need you here!”

“What’s going on?” I intended my voice to be firm; that the same argument was still raging seemed ludicrous. However, what emitted was a weak croak that transformed into a choke. My back flared with heat.

“Bastila,” Juhani’s face lit up as she turned to me, a smile curving her lips. Concerned relief warmed her voice.

“Welcome back, princess.” The Mandalorian’s tone was harder to pick.

I was lying on a bench at the end of Kono’s command room. The smell of kolto and bacta patches overpowered anything else, but I took a moment to realize my wounds weren’t as uncomfortable as they had been before.

Juhani moved closer, crouching next to me. “Sami’s patched you up. I do not think you will walk for a few days, but with luck there should be no lasting damage. You will need a proper scan when we get to the surface to make sure. I tried... I tried to heal you. I am afraid it has been too long... since...”

“Peace, Juhani,” the words slipped out, cutting softly through her diatribe. I had no wish to hear Juhani doubt herself again. “It will come with time.”

Canderous had stalked towards the bench, stopping to stare down at me. “It’s not the first time you’ve saved my neck, princess.” His eyes were unreadable; cold slats of grey. A bloodied rag was tied tightly around his neck, and his face lacked the ruddy colour it normally held. “This time, you had no reason to. We’ll talk about Jen later - but Mandalorians honour their debts. I’ll get you to the surface.”

I nodded slowly at him, not trusting myself to respond.

“We won’t get to the surface unless we power off the harvesting machine!” Sami burst out angrily.

“What harvesting machine?” I cut in. I felt exhausted, and my legs prickled with fatigue. I was straining just to follow the heated argument, wrestling against eyelids that were determined to close.

Kono and his assistant had moved towards me also; they glanced at each other briefly before Kono’s gaze returned to me. He smiled, but lines of tension cut deeply into his weathered face.

Sami was studying me appraisingly. “That was pretty brave what you did,” she said, in a musing tone. Indignation flooded me – I knew she had not liked me on sight, but any proper Jedi would not sit back while someone else was in danger!

“We didn’t have a chance to talk properly before,” she added before I could open my mouth to object. She dropped into a worn chair opposite me. “I’m a deep ocean biologist; I was sent to this base to investigate the recent upsurge of firaxan activity in these waters.”

“Now, the sharks have always been a problem,” Kono interrupted in a pious tone. “We use sonic blasters and projectile cannons as a defence, but they still got some of our workers from time to time.”

Sami threw a brief frown at her boss. “Yes, but only when our workers ventured past the safety markers! Firaxan sharks usually stay in their territory, and attack only when provoked. Since we discovered the new kolto vent, and subsequently opened our new harvesting machine, there has been a marked alteration in their behaviour. I’ve never seen oceanic animals attack machinery without provocation, yet this is precisely what they’ve been doing. Almost as if they believe our operations are a threat to their way of life, or an impingement on their territory—”
“Sami, you talk like these beasts are intelligent,” Kono scoffed. “They’re rabid sharks! To be respected, like any other predator, but—”

“They’re a pack animal, Kono!” Sami was scowling at him in anger. Canderous rolled his eyes, leaning against the wall with a contemptuous look fixed firmly on his face. “Just like kath hounds, they will attack something collectively if they’ve a reason to!”

“Perhaps you had best explain where the harvesting machine ties in,” Juhani broke in softly as Kono’s mouth opened once more.

The scientist huffed in frustration. “We’ve powered down all bar one of our harvesting machines, and yes, the sharks have mostly dispersed from our older kolto mines. Now they’ve all swarmed to the new mine, just past the docking bay.”

“They can’t power it off remotely,” Canderous cut in, his voice disgusted. “Seems the little fishies have damaged it somehow. Someone’s gotta get out there and flick the switch.”

I must have shown my incredulity, for Sami intervened quickly. “It’s not as crazy as it sounds! We’ve been working on ways to repel the sharks – poison, cannons – but our most successful experiments have been using sonics. Caal Jordan’s created a handheld sonic emitter that so far has aided all our workers immensely—”

“Have you looked outside lately and seen that swarm?” Canderous growled. “Ain’t no way some fancy little gun is gonna kill off that lot—”

“It’s not a gun.” Sami’s dark eyes flashed. “It’ll scare away the sharks – if they’re close enough, it’ll stun them—”

“Do we have any other options?” I intervened, flaring with irritation at the lot of them.

Silence hung in the air, and Kono sighed heavily. “I’m a few hours away from contacting HQ.”

“However, if they cannot safely send another vehicle, then we are effectively trapped here regardless.” Juhani’s voice was solemn. “And we do not have an endless supply of air to rely upon.”

“Is there any way of modifying this sonic emitter on a larger scale?” I queried. “A handheld device may not be powerful enough to repel all the sharks outside.”

Sami and Kono shook their heads in unison; the latter wearing a dark scowl. “All our techs are dead. Killed by those insane Selkath – most of them are dead, now, too. Seems like we’re the only ones left alive on this gods-forsaken base.”

I struggled to sit up on the bench, jolts of agony shooting down my legs as I did so. I squeezed my eyes shut, containing a grimace as I battled to withstand the pain. There is no emotion. I allowed myself a few seconds respite, then opened my eyes again. The pain dulled to a manageable level.

From my vantage point at the head of the room I could view the camera outputs. They showed nothing but glaringly empty rooms. Venturing out is our only option then. But I battled to sit, let alone walk – and I could not heal myself.

“It appears we must brave the sharks,” I said, my gaze fixed seriously on each of the others in turn. “I can use the Force to distract the swarm away from the harvesting machine. What other resources do we have? Sami, how many of these sonic devices are here?”
The dark-skinned human returned my gaze steadily. “Two. There’s more in our storage rooms.”

“You lot can’t be serious,” Canderous groused. “Only a laser-brain would think they could live through that swarm outside.”

“It’s possible!” Sami objected, swinging around to glare at Canderous. “Firaxans are attracted to vibrations and movements – as well as blood, of course. If you walk outside, very slowly, the sharks may not even notice you.”

“Right.” The Mandalorian’s voice dripped liberally with sarcasm. “So you want us to go outside, walk very slowly at the sharks, all the while firing noise-makers at them?”

Sami grimaced, glancing down. She appeared somewhat ashamed of her own suggestion. “The harvesting machine isn’t that far from Base, though. Only about a five minute walk – just at the edge of the rift, before the ruins.

"Ruins?" I interrupted, frowning. "What ruins?" A shaft of surprise ran through me. Could it be? What with the horror that lurked throughout this doomed station, I'd almost forgotten our original mission.

Sami shrugged. "We don't know. To be frank, the Republic has been more interested in harvesting the kolto in this new mine than investigating the ruins. Our workers have told us that it's a few broken structures, with some old machinery in the middle of it. None of them have looked closely – no one ever wants to stay outside any longer than necessary."

I’d frozen halfway through Sami’s address, my gaze fixed on Juhani’s shocked, reluctant one. The Star Map! It has to be! There was no choice now – one of us had to brave outside. But I cannot walk. Can I really request such a daunting task of Juhani? With her fear?

“What’s up with you?” Canderous barked. “Your face is all scrunched up like a kinrath pup.”

"You cannot walk," Juhani muttered in a stumbling whisper. "And we cannot delay this." She drew in a shaky breath, and I could see realization painted starkly on her face. She had surmised, then, that she must go. We cannot trust Canderous to get the coordinates, and it needs to be a Force-user to boot. Only Juhani and I understand the significance of this mission.

The Mandalorian was scowling at both of us.

Slowly the fear on the Cathar’s face was replaced with shaky determination; her mouth tensed, and I knew she was rallying her will power as steadfastly as possible. “I will go.” Her eyes met mine; resolved and terrified, all at once.

“Juhani-”

“No, Bastila, I see it now. If I am to be tested, then I will not run. Not this time.”

Grief echoed softly in her voice – I knew she was dwelling on her past. “No one is testing you, Juhani. And we do not need to investigate the Star Map now-” “Star Map?” Kono interrupted.

“The Force led us here,” Juhani countered. With every passing second, the fear slid from her eyes. A determined sort of resignation held station there instead. “It is time I faced my fear. I do not believe this is chance, Bastila.”
I wondered how she had found such unwavering faith in such a short time; sometimes, it seemed like mine was disintegrating slowly with each passing day.

Canderous spat on the ground; Kono shot him a repulsed glare. “Fine, guess I’ll join you then, Cathar.”

“But minutes before you were adamant you wouldn’t go outside!” Kono blustered indignantly.

“Bah, it’s better than sitting around here, listening to you lot whining,” the Mandalorian said derisively. “If it’s the only way to get to the surface,” his eyes held mine firmly, “then looks like I ain’t got no choice. Now give me one of those noise-makers.”

xXx

It had been a torturous hour as we all struggled to prepare for the dangers ahead. Sami had spent the time explaining at length about the behavioural characteristics of firaxans; Juhani remained anxiously intent on her words, but Canderous had all but ignored the younger woman, choosing to rifle through cupboards and canisters instead. What he had expected to find of use in a research station, I did not know.

They had left mere minutes ago, headed towards the airlock Kono had directed them to. My stomach was tied up in tense knots, and my mind fogged fraught with apprehension. I did not like staying behind and leaving them to brave the danger outside, even as I logically knew that my part to play was crucial to our success. If I could not calm or distract the sharks, Canderous and Juhani would not have a chance.

“They’ve reached the airlock, and are suiting up,” Kono informed us, standing in the circle of consoles at the end of the room. “We’ll be able to communicate with them once they have their envirosuits on.”

I was leaning uncomfortably against the wall, my weak limbs still spread out helplessly on the bench. Sami sat near me with a reassuring expression on her face. Since my frantic plight to aid Canderous, the woman had been more benevolently disposed towards me.

But worry stirred within, overshadowing all else. An unwelcome voice whispered that this was more than a fool’s errand; that we may be sending Canderous and Juhani to a watery grave. We seem to have no other choice, and I must have faith in the Force. There is a reason we were led here, and the Star Map is not far. Yet how could they withstand the frenzied fury of the sharks? Our submersible had barely emerged from the swarm intact, and I dared not dwell upon the Force presence that seemed to fuel the rage of the firaxans. For I may be facing that again. I had to help them, and utilizing the Force – in a passive paradigm of my Battle Meditation – seemed to be the only way I could.

“Yo,” a crackly voice emitted from Kono’s station.

“Canderous,” the scientist greeted him. “Hearing you loud and clear. Are you ready to leave?”

“I am. The Cathar’s standing around like a stimmed-up loon, though.”

Juhani, I thought desperately. Do not let your fear overcome you.
“Come on, kittycat. Let’s not lollygag all day,” the derisive taunt slid out into the room.

“Do not call me that, Mandalorian!” Juhani hissed. A raucous laugh echoed her.

“When you’re ready, go through the airlock,” Kono intervened. “I’ll track your movements from here. There’s no sharks near this side of the Base – you shouldn’t have a problem until you near the harvesting machine.”

I closed my eyes, pushing back despair and reaching out numbly for the Force. The affliction in my spine and legs had been dulled from painkillers, and disappeared into nothingness as I stretched out my senses. It always felt like this, this awed wonder, this reverence, as I half-departed my conscious body and enveloped my surroundings with awareness.

The Base itself was dead around me, a block of man-made structures that emitted no life. Further out, I could feel the frenetic sparks of the firaxans, heavily coalesced around something I surmised to be the harvesting machine. I could not sense that vast foreign being yet, but not far was a swirl of evil; a familiar taint in the Force – the Star Map! It feels just like the one on Tatooine!

“We’re out,” I barely registered Canderous’ statement. “Haar’chak, it’s hard to move in these kriffing suits.”

“You’re coming out past the kolto treatment rooms,” Kono informed them. “Not far, and you’ll see markers leading to the new harvesting machine.”

“It’s dark.” Juhani’s voice was a whisper. The water goes on forever here.

I gathered in the tendrils of Force, pulling back to focus on the two of them. I could stimulate a sense of serenity around Juhani if needed, but would I attract the attention of the firaxans? I did not dare utilize the Force for anything bar awareness, not yet.

“Bah, pull yourself together, Cathar,” Canderous jeered. “You fight well when you’re not whimpering.”

“Fight?” Sami spluttered nearby. “You can’t fight in an envirosuit!” I vaguely heard the woman stir, and stride away towards Kono.

“Thank you, Canderous. I shall be okay.”

“Let’s just do this before I die of boredom.”

My senses hovered over the two of them, and I could feel the sharp spike of fear recede from Juhani. She was not calm, but she was keeping her panic at bay. In relief, I extended the Force further, past the frenzied swarm and back around the Star Map. The evil aura both repulsed and fascinated me. Revan came here once. The base had not been here, then, and the rabid behaviour of the firaxans had only been a recent problem. I wondered briefly if the sharks were attracted to the dark Force that permeated this area.

“We’re by the markers,” Canderous said. “There’s a few fishies around, none close though.”

“If any are heading towards you, just stand still,” Sami advised them. Her voice came from further away; she was obviously working next to Kono. My eyes stayed closed as I struggled to stay in a partial meditative state. “Don’t use the sonic devices unless they get real close.”

“Yeah, yeah, I hear ya.”
“What—what is that? Up ahead?” Juhani’s voice was shaky.

“You can probably see the swarm from here,” Kono said. “These markers lead straight to it.”

“There’s one shark—it’s heading towards us!” Juhani was panicking now; I reeled back in to hover over her presence, her desperation and fright sending ripples through the Force. An angry spark of life was homing in on them rapidly.

“Stay still!” Sami cried. “The shark may not bother with you if you don’t move—”

A Mandalorian curse echoed from the console; I did not know enough of the language to comprehend it. Sami gasped, and I pulled desperately on the Force, ready to unleash it—

“Well, at least we know your little toys work,” Canderous barked out. “That’s one dead fishy, all right.”

Relief surged through me dizzyingly, and I held back—just in time.

“It’s not dead, merely stunned.” Sami’s voice was acerbic.

“I am sorry.” Juhani was barely audible. “I know what to expect, now. I will not move next time.”

“See that you don’t,” Canderous said shortly. “Let’s go.”

Shame wafted from the Cathar; using the Force like this, I could almost smell it. It was an extra sense—a blend of sight and smell that permeated through me. I touched Juhani with the Force briefly, reassuringly, before moving further out.

I lingered over the swarm of sharks, and could sense the harvesting machine now, small jots of electronic impulses scarcely noticeable in the Force. It was intermittent and unsteady, almost as if the machine was no longer stable. Some of the firaxans were hurling themselves at it in rabid fury.

“We’re about as close as we can be,” Canderous said. “Look, I don’t see how we’re gonna get any closer without being torn to shreds.”

“Bastila will help us,” Juhani responded.

It was time, then. I dropped deeper into my trance, breathed in, and suspended myself over the writhing mass of sharks. Pure energy flooded through me. I knew how to influence this species now, after using Juhani’s aid on our entrance to the station. I only hoped it would be enough.

I released a surge of peace, of passive calm, that settled around the swarm of sharks and infiltrated the aura of rage that surrounded them. Dazed confusion responded, but the crazed frenzy that had been there was dissipating. I felt some sparks of life turn tail and swim away.

In the periphery of my Force senses, something huge and ancient loomed. Trepidation broke my concentration—No, I knew this was likely. If I cannot calm them, then perhaps I can distract them—and then my hold on the Force was rocked by a vast righteous fury. I gasped, gathering myself desperately as I struggled to stay aware, to stay in a Force trance, all the while attempting to slip away from its focus and back to the swarm.

Wild ferocity shot back to life around me, and the mass of sharks turned as one, veering sharply towards the base. The dead electronic pulses of the harvesting machine were more noticeable, thrumming in an unsteady staccato beat as the sharks left it naked to my Force sight.
“The sharks are clearing out. Kriff, there’s a drukload of them. Let’s move, Cathar.”

I followed the swarm, deftly evading the sentient being who seemed to wield such great power, even if it was so incredibly foreign and primitive to my senses. The firaxans had reached a wall of the Station, and began to flail and thrash against it in rabid fury.

“What- what’s that, Kono? I can see something through the window!”

I discharged another passive torrent of Force power, only to find it blocked from even reaching the sharks below.

What? How can it do that?

“Kono, look! The sharks – I think they’re attacking the base!”

“Got it! Easier than the girls at Roxy’s cantina.”

“Canderous has turned the machine off. Should it be rumbling so?”

“I- Sami, it’s ferracrystal, it’ll hold. It has to!”

The vast entity smashed once more into my web of Force, and my senses reeled and staggered under the onslaught. I felt my grip on the Force unravel slightly.

“It’s just powering down. Taking awhile though. No, it- damn, it’s unstable- get out of here!”

“Canderous? What’s going on out there?”

“Cathar, you’re going the wrong bloody way! It’s going to blow!”

“I must find the Star Map, Mandalorian! I will not fail!”

“Kono, the window’s flexing – there’s hundreds of those sharks out there! We need to get out of this room!”

Horror seared through me as I desperately tried to hold myself together. Vaguely I was aware that everyone was in trouble, and the sharks were now attacking the Base itself. I wildly thrust my awareness out further, away from the Base in the desperate hope the swarm would follow. But all that came was the almighty force I could barely defend against.

Bastila, can you hear me?

The presence slammed into me again, and I felt a scream loose from my throat as I was taken unawares. I was holding too tightly onto the Force, my very mind enmeshed with the channels I was pushing out, and the vast being was tearing it to shreds, pulverizing my senses as I struggled frantically to evade it.

Look, I’m back on Manaan. What the frell is going on?

The raged being actively chased me – No! – I reeled my senses in hurriedly, but it slammed into me again and again, my very thoughts fraying and blurring until my awareness narrowed to nothing but pure unmitigated terror.

With a last sharp burst of colour, I felt my mind disintegrate into a thousand shards.

xXx
No more running

- Jen Sahara -

The cerulean sphere of Manaan loomed large through the cockpit window as the ship neared. It brought with it bitter recriminations; not long ago, I’d been in the Ebon Hawk, orchestrating a betrayal of the very crew that had guarded my back these past few weeks. I was not looking forward to the reunion.

It didn’t help that Bastila wasn’t answering. The bond felt faint and deadened, like a hazy, intangible mist – visible, and yet entirely elusive. I hoped it was merely the distance separating us that caused it to feel so; when I’d last been on Manaan, it had been impossible to ignore Bastila’s overbearing presence.

“This is Ahto City Spaceport Control. Identify yourself,” a crackly voice shot from the transmission, first in Basic, then Selkath. My view was painted by an endless blue panorama.

I knew my lines; HK was nothing if not thorough. The ship’s signature was Czerka, and somehow he’d procured Czerka security codes as well. I leaned forward. “This is Janna Terran from Czerka Corporation, requesting clearance to land. Transmitting my clearance codes now.”

I sent the data quickly, holding my breath for the reply. I trusted the droid’s impressive abilities, and yet if the Selkath were to turn us away, I’d likely run out of fuel before reaching a new destination, unless I returned to Rii’shn. That was not appealing, considering the mess I’d left behind.

Finally, after a pause of minutes, a sibilant reply echoed through the cockpit.

“You have clearance to land, Ms Terran. Transmitting your atmospheric entry code and coordinates for Czerka docking bay R13. A reminder that all trade goods must be passed by customs first.”

“Thank you.” I shut the comm off, and guided the ship closer, switching to repulsors as we entered the tranquil atmosphere. But on top of everything else, my possession of this very vehicle was weighing worryingly on my mind.

“We’ve just stolen an Exchange ship,” I muttered to myself as a console blinked with incoming landing coordinates. “Czerka’s not stupid; they’ll find out the signature’s been forged, and that we nicked their security clearance. I need to get rid of this ship. Somehow...”

“Statement: That is well within my capabilities, master,” HK-47’s monotone voice scythed through the air; an abrupt, foreboding reply. I’d almost forgotten he was there.

My eyes closed in a blend of exasperation and dread. HK was conveniently handy in a fight, but I found it hard to dismiss the chaos we’d left while departing Rii’shn. And exactly how would a droid ditch a ship anyway? Blow it up? I grimaced.

A pulse in the Force snagged my attention; at first, I thought it was the bond. But as Ahto City crested the endless azure horizon, I deduced it was something else. My eyes narrowed. I hadn’t even realized I’d been open to the Force; it was becoming instinctive to grasp onto it, ready for any complication or danger.
And that, in itself, is pretty scary with Sith Bitch in my head. I stretched my awareness out further; it felt clumsy and crude, but adequate for my purposes. The Force flared brightly then vanished, like a flame snuffed in the dark.

“Query: Master, do you wish me to take care of this problem for you?” HK echoed.

“Oh...” I trailed off vaguely. My sense of Bastila remained tenuous at best, but she had to be in Ahto City somewhere. The Force flickered once more – someone, somewhere, was wielding it. If it wasn’t Bastila, then it would be that master of hers. Pity I couldn’t think of a foreseeable reason for her to unleash the Force like that.

I needed to find Bastila, I wanted to avoid that Jedi Master, and the last thing I desired was the complication of Czerka suspicions and Selkath red-tape.

“Oh, fine. Just... don’t hurt anyone!”

HK’s eyes gleamed red with approval.

xXx

Bastila, can you hear me?

My boots left rubbery scuff marks on the gleaming Manaan floors. Despite my distraction, I couldn’t help but feel a perverse sort of pleasure at that.

It had been easy enough to land in the Czerka docking bay, instinctive to persuade the Selkath official that my fee was covered under the Czerka maintenance agreement. Protocol droids infested the area like a plague of mites; attaining directions to the Republic Embassy was hardly laborious.

I was back in Ahto City, anxiety and nervousness curdling in my stomach. I dreaded the reactions of my former crewmates, but it could not compare to the terror of having Revan in my head.

This revelation was too colossal – running was no longer an option.

I’d expected the bond to be palpable again, now that I was in Ahto City. It wasn’t. Bastila felt eons away; occasionally, faltering tremors of emotions slid through the mind-link, so faint and indistinct that I wondered if it was merely my overwrought imagination.

Doesn’t it just figure, I muttered darkly to myself. The one time I actually want to talk to her, she’s impossible to reach. It was ironically amusing, in a twisted why-does-this-happen-to-me sort of way. No matter what Bastila did, it seemed guaranteed to provoke my animosity.

Just what do I know of Bastila Shan anyway? Other than she was prissy, stuck-up, and prone to panicking. But perhaps that wasn’t fair... she’s been bonded all this time to Revan. I shuddered, presuming the only thing worse would be to have said Sith Lord hosting a tea party inside your actual mind.

But she’s young... years younger than me. Still a Padawan, and thrust into the middle of this war because of her Battle Meditation. I didn’t like her, I certainly didn’t trust her, and yet I couldn’t halt an unwanted modicum of sympathy.

I need to find her... and fast. My alternative was tracking down the Jedi Council themselves – and considering they were the ones who’d implanted Revan in my head... Well, they’d probably just reinforce Jen Sahara. But could I live with the knowledge that should my control drop – and stars knew how often that seemed to happen – then Revan would assume control once more? No! I can keep that schutta at bay. I have to!

I lengthened my strides, hurrying through a vast courtyard dappled with incoming rays of sunlight. The Force thrummed and coiled not far away. I was heading straight for it; it appeared to be coming from the Republic Embassy. And I can barely sense Bastila. An icy premonition shook me, dousing my proliferate thoughts. Kath crap. There can’t be an attack. Not on Manaan.

But something is happening.

I pushed out through the bond again, this time in desperation. Look, I’m back on Manaan. What the frell is going on? I frowned as once more, there was no reply. My concentration turned inward to the wavering link that connected us; if anything, it felt weaker than before.

I was completely unprepared for a powerful, alien surge of Force power to slam through the bond. I stumbled, gasping Bastila?! as the foreign energy immediately ceased, leaving behind a withering connection to the only source of help I dared approach.

Panic struck within – What’s going on? Are you there? – and the bond dimmed to a vague memory, a link fraying to near imperceptibility. Bastila was still there, but so faint I was starting to believe her life was in dire peril.

“Hey!” someone called in protest; I’d absently pushed past them while floundering through the milling throng. I turned, quickly gathering disseminated thoughts; a group of Sith solders in tan uniform were eyeing me over curiously. Oh great, I thought sourly. I swear these guys breed like gizka. The one who’d objected had a surprised look on his face as he nodded amiably at me.

Cordial Sith? What’s next, charitable Hutts? Clarity struck me, and I cursed my own stupidity. This cloak I picked up on Rii’shn could pass for a Dark Jedi’s garb. And my lightsaber isn’t exactly concealed. It was deactivated, but the flutterings in the Force left me uneasy, and I’d been clenching it tightly since I’d traipsed past the Selkath customs official. Once more, I regretted I’d lost the second ‘saber. The last time I’d fought with one weapon I’d had this itchy feeling that my guard was wide open.

I nodded back, containing a grimace, and resumed a quick pace to the Embassy. Another nudge through the mind link achieved nothing; my best course of action was to move. I strode past a pair of Rodians chatting in exuberant voices that cut through my internal preoccupations.

“(She’s worth betting on, Lagos! This girl Twi’lek has only been swooping for one day, and already she’s matched Queedle’s time!)”

I glanced at them briefly. The two Rodians looked deeply engrossed in their conversation, and both wore the fire retardant outfits of swoop racers.

“(She’s completed one race, and you think she’s the next great,)” the other scoffed. “(She’s got no commercial backer, and that angry walking hairball who shadows her will stop any from approaching. Anyway, how many times have you thrown credits on would-be champions, only to see them crumple before Hukta Jax?)”

Nah, it couldn’t be. “(Excuse me,)” I interrupted them in Rodese. They both turned to stare at me warily. “(I couldn’t help overhearing your conversation. What’s the name of this new swoop racer?)”

“(She calls herself ‘Bek from Taris’,)” the first Rodian said excitedly. “(A bit naff, really – everyone’s claiming to be a swooper from Taris these days, since the records were destroyed in the Sith bombardment.)"

My lips twitched. Mission, what are you doing? “(Ah. Doing well, is she?)”

“(Yeah! Did you see her?)” he replied happily. “(Not bad, for a first try, for someone so young!)”

Well, at least I know where she is. I nodded affably at the Rodians and bid them farewell, striding off toward the Embassy. Not sure if she’ll talk to me though.

I turned a corner, and emerged into a sweeping plaza that was even grander than the previous. Extravagant pools of crystalline water immediately drew the eye; fountains spat streams of liquid that sparkled in the light. The ground was highly polished marble, and beyond the pools loomed pillars that announced entrance into a majestic building.

But something was wrong. People huddled in small groups, some pointing anxiously toward the large doors nestled between the pillars. Security droids hovered in buzzing clusters.

Nearby, vibrations of Force pulsed a warning.

My stomach lurched as I realized I could no longer sense Bastila. That building’s got to be the Embassy, and someone inside is throwing the Force around like it’s the latest fashion. I felt cold. My rampant thoughts couldn’t help but merge into one conclusive deduction: the Republic was under attack.

But the Sith wouldn’t dare, not on Manaan! They’d be defying the neutrality agreement! Then again, the Sith were hardly a sterling example of adept strategy.

Sometimes, I wondered if a Twi’lek dancing girl would do a better job of leading the Sith Empire. But that was a dangerous line of thinking, considering who was lolling about in my head.

Dammit, I thought it was bad enough with the GenoHaradan. Why have they attacked? I thought their sodding kolto supply hinged on the neutrality laws! Which meant that the Sith were happy enough to throw away their share.

Everything fell into place. Of course. They’re after Bastila. They sent the GenoHaradan to kill me, and Dark Jedi to capture her. Fear coiled in my stomach, but I brushed it aside ruthlessly. I’m insulted, dammit. They must have considered me the easy option. But – that meant the Sith had contracted the GenoHaradan to come after me. Why would the Sith be after me?

Duh. I have Revan in my head. A glacial chill crept laggardly through my veins. How could they know about her? And if they know, who else does?

It all came back to Bastila – only she could answer my questions. But if the Embassy’s been attacked...

If they managed to capture Bastila, then there went my explanation – and possibly, my only chance at getting rid of this unwanted scow in my head. I’m not a coward, no matter who I am. I have to get inside.

I glanced around hurriedly; so far, no uniformed Selkath were in sight. But they wouldn’t be far away. I shook my head irritably, inhaled deep, and broke into a run.

Vaguely I was aware of the gasps of Ahto City residents as I careened past the superfluous pools of water and through the ceremonious pillars. A large door towered just beyond; I was willing to bet it was locked down from the inside.
“Halt!” a garbled shriek from behind had me spinning around, mere paces from the closed doors. A deluge of Selkath military was flowing into the courtyard; the leader of the closest squad had a gun aimed directly at me.

From this distance, a mere twenty metres, it looked like a disruptor rifle. My past memories were disjointed and vague, but I knew there were some things a lightsaber could not block. My weapon, gripped furtively in my right hand, was still deactivated.

“You are under arrest for violating the neutrality agreement! Lay down your weapon, Sith, or we shall open fire!”

_Sith?_ The tan-uniformed soldiers had acknowledged me earlier. With mounting horror, I inwardly cursed the black robe that cloaked my bloodstained armour, and announced me as an enemy to the Republic. _If the Selkath want to arrest me on sight, then the Sith are already inside._

_And there ain’t no way I’m surrendering to a bunch of walking fish._

My eyes flicked frantically around the courtyard as the Selkath squad took a step closer, guns trained on me. More armoured soldiers inundated the vast plaza, dispersing the huddled groups of civilians that had cloistered in the corners mere seconds ago.

I had to get inside; raw survival instinct overrode my growing panic, and I felt myself grasp out to the Force, stretching senses behind me into the Embassy. I could pick out two Force users, and a swirling of electrical impulses that coalesced into a mass of complex circuitry. A brief moment of surprise assailed me, even as I stared numbly at the advancing Selkath.

_What is this? I must be sensing... the door controls?_

But the tiny, dancing oscillations were far too complicated for me to manipulate – I could barely comprehend what I was sensing.

_You dumbstruck nerf-herder, it’s child’s play! _a derisive voice sneered. A surge of contempt swelled up inside, catching me off-guard and wresting the Force from my grasp. _Don’t let her take over! _I felt the Force meld into the electrical vibrations, into a quick surge of energy that tightened to a pulse and then vanished.

A grating noise sounded from behind.

The closest Selkath gasped, yanking his blaster up to aim past me, and before I was fully cognizant I had whirled around and leapt towards half-open door. My surroundings stretched in that all-too-familiar way as I dived forwards into a roll, laser fire stretching into long bright lines all around me.

A robed figure inside held a red lightsaber, but in my heightened speed, I saw the laser bolts jar slowly into his torso before he had a chance to deflect them. My environs lurched back into normal time as both the door hissed shut behind me and the Dark Jedi screamed, collapsing to the floor.

_Selkath one, Sith nil_, I thought humourlessly, my eyes snagging on a second figure, whose hand was pressed desperately against the door control. Unsteadily, I scrambled to my feet, furtively glancing around the entrance foyer. The body of a receptionist lay behind a poraclay desk, and near one of the exits sprawled three Republic corpses.

“Who are you?” the Dark Jedi growled, swinging his lightsaber up defensively.

_What, no immediate attack? _I felt my mouth twist as I appraised the robed figure. _Even Dark Jedi_
I saw the man twitch, heard him snarl, and activated my lightsaber just in time to counter a wild lunge.

“You’re not one of us!” he hissed, as sparks flew from our crossed ‘sabers.

“What gave me away?” I panted, leaping backwards as he pulled back to strike again. “My cloak not the right shade of black?”

I made out a vague shadow of a sneer underneath his dark hood. "You'll die for your interference, weakling!" His off-hand raised in a sinister motion; I flung out my arm in a honed reflex, 'saber leaving my grasp and heading straight for him. Pitiful little Sithling. He should be on his knees! A blossoming of rage warmed in my belly as spinning red gouged into the Dark Jedi’s arm. I felt an echo of the rage reverberate through the Force and twist through the 'saber as it snapped back into my grasp.

A severed hand landed on the ground with a splat, and my adversary shrieked.

“You – you bitch!” he gasped, doubling over as the lightsaber in his remaining hand wavered. His dismembered arm hugged tight against his torso.

I felt a cold smile curve my lips as the sweet surge of victory danced through me. “True Sith don’t let pain stop them,” I taunted. I took a step forward, lazily flinging my weapon out in a lunge. He parried ineffectively, groaning with the effort as he staggered back. I threw my weight behind the lightsaber, and the Dark Jedi stumbled, falling with a cry.

“You should have stuck to trooping,” I whispered, as I drove the ‘saber deep into his chest.

His scream was cut off as his flesh cauterized around my ‘saber; I yanked it out, staring fixedly as spurts of warm blood speckled over his thrashing corpse. The cadence of rage and smug superiority froze; reality crashed a cacophony in my mind and my very words replayed sickeningly over and over.

True Sith... My cognition splintered into stark fear. Damn you, Sith Bitch. Get out of my sodding head! I hadn’t even noticed the transition; she’d smoothly taken over as soon as there’d be an opening. I swallowed past a lump in my throat.

I knew, then, that Revan was stronger than whoever I was. Well, duh. She wasn’t the Dark Bitch of the Sith for nothing. Gaining entrance to the Embassy had been her work, as had searing off that Sith’s arm. I’d be a pile of guts back on Rii’shn if she hadn’t taken over. Every time my life was in mortal peril, Revan saved me in her rage and violence and gratuitous disregard for life. But she killed so many... what if she takes over for good? How many more will she slaughter?

Will I even realize it? The Force pulsed somewhere nearby, shattering my horrified thoughts. I need to stop whimpering and find Bastila. She’s the only one who can help me now.

I shook free of my frozen stance and strode out of the room, heading down a stark corridor that gleamed with wealth. Black burns speckled the walls, residue from blaster fire. I passed a door, and heard whispered voices within; soldiers, no doubt, hiding from the Dark Jedi that had infiltrated this place.

A shriek echoed through the halls, followed closely by a surge in the Force. The impassioned fury swelled once more inside, overriding my fear, my determination. I pushed back against it, desperate. I won’t become her! Never again! I’d rather die! The dark emotions ebbed somewhat, even as logic reminded me that death was a distinct possibility.

I cleared a corner, as someone sneered, “You’d better run, little boy.”

Two heads swivelled around to stare at my approach. One, a Dark Jedi; the other, a young Twi’lek who was cowering on the floor. He held a short green lightsaber, and despair was etched deeply into his face. Blood dripped from his lekku.

“Come to join the fun?” the Dark Jedi drawled, eyeing me over. My eyes snapped to the young Twi’lek; frantic tenacity sparked through his features and he lunged forward, stabbing his ‘saber deep into the Sith’s thigh.

The Dark Jedi let out an agonized scream, flinging his lightsaber round in retaliation. I gasped, running forward, but the Twi’lek dodged underneath the red blade and flicked his ‘saber towards the other’s torso. The black robe shrivelled and burnt as lightsaber met flesh.

The robed figure grunted, voice turning to a splutter as he collapsed to his knees. Bright red entrails gaped from within the folds of his cloak.

The Twi’lek scrambled fully to his feet, horror paling his cheeks as he gazed upon the dying Force user. His eyes flicked to me and he yelped, stumbling backwards before whirling around. He thinks I’m one of them.

“Wait!” I yelled, but the panicking boy paid me no heed, sprinting further down the corridor and out of sight. I followed in desperation, muscles straining as I forced them to work harder. Who was that? A young Jedi apprentice by the looks, but I hadn’t expected to see any other Force users on Manaan.

I slid around a corner, but the Twi’lek was nowhere in sight. Bursts of raw energy were still pulsing nearby; my grip on the Force was tenuous, and I did not dare draw anymore in. I should find out who else is wielding the Force. Was Bastila somewhere in the building? Knocked unconscious, and almost dead? If so, would I find her in time?

What about the others? I tasted relief at the knowledge Mission and Zaalbar had fled the Embassy. Carth? Canderous? Juhani? If I had not run from Manaan, would I have been able to help them?

I barely registered the opulence of the place; polished walls gleaming with wealth and pride, marred with the occasional smatter of blood. I stepped over bodies – unconscious or dead, I didn’t stop to check – the waves of Force power being melded and transformed in the distance were reeling me in, like a slave to its master.

I had not felt power like this for… a long time. But it was fading rapidly; whatever battle was ensuing, was almost over.

A tortured wail rung out through the Embassy’s lavish rooms, and I froze outside a door, clutching my lightsaber tightly.

“Worm!” someone hissed on the other side. “You just don’t know when to stay dead, do you?”

I thumped my hand on the door controls, and carnage burst into view. Two steps in front was a slain Dark Jedi, head and shoulders cleaved by what had to have been a lightsaber. Grisly cauterized chunks of flesh smattered the ground next to the corpse, and as I raised my gaze in horror, more broken bodies greeted me.
But deeper in the depths of this perdition, a black robed figure was throwing lightening that sparked and flashed over a body trapped against the wall.

A snarl ripped from my throat, and a flood of sweet tasting Force filled me with power, with life, with victory. I yanked it furiously towards me, and the perpetrator tumbled backwards like a dust-ball thrown into the wind.

I vaguely noticed the victim fall to a heap by the wall – my attention was solely focused on the Dark Jedi slowly rising to their feet. I stalked in, but blood was everywhere, fraying at the edges of my vision-

This is what Revan does, my conscience taunted. I can’t let her out… I can’t!

“Who are you?” the figure growled at me. “How dare you interrupt me – do you know who I am?” The Dark Jedi shot me a furious glare, and beneath the hood of the black robe I could make out slanting eyes discoloured an unnatural yellow. She brandished a red lightsaber threateningly at me.

“Yes, I have one of those too,” I snapped, raising mine higher in response. “And frankly, I’m more interested in the breeding habits of banthas than I am in your identity.”

“Interloper!” she snarled. “Whoever you are, you picked the wrong battle to join!”

I’m not afraid of her, I realized in surprise. Not in the least. Well, what was one Dark Jedi when compared to having the Sith Lord battle with you for control over your own mind?

“Wait,” the woman breathed, and actually took a stumbling step backwards. Sickly yellow eyes widened under her hood. “You! You’re supposed to be—”

“Yeah, yeah, dead, I know,” I drawled, feeling my lips twist in dry humour. She knows. She knows about the GenoHaradan ambush... and about Revan. “What can I say? I’m a talented individual.”

The Dark Jedi paused, and I could see the confidence steep back into her stance. She walked forward, slowly but assuredly, and I recognized she was not quite as worried about me as I had hoped.

“Well, well,” her voice turned low and silky. I stiffened. Have I met her before? She almost sounds... familiar. “It must be my lucky day. I only came here for Bastila, but now it looks as if I’ll capture two prizes instead of one.”

My eyes narrowed. “I know you,” I said slowly.

She laughed, and I heard the tones of an Alderaanian accent. “They really did a number on you, didn’t they? We met little more than two months ago, Jen Sahara.”

…

“You have everything you need?” the Jedi asked me quietly, her eyes seeming to pierce through to my soul. I looked down briefly, unused to such attention. Despite the plain brown robes the Jedi onboard the Endar Spire wore, I could not help but feel they appeared resplendent in their serenity.

“Yes, Jedi Shan,” I answered quietly. “Everyone has – has been kind.”

I looked up to see Jedi Bastila Shan smile benevolently at me. She was beautiful, this famous Jedi, with pale, flawless skin, high cheekbones, and long-lashed dark eyes. Her companion, the one I recognized as Knight Kylah Aramai nodded briskly. A bored look crossed her face, and I felt embarrassed that I had taken time of people so powerful.

“I notice you have downloaded many archaeological journals in the last few days,” Jedi Shan continued. “If you have need for more information, do not hesitate to ask me.”

I nodded, looking away shyly. A hand upon my shoulder caught my attention, and once more I glanced up into Bastila’s aristocratic face. Her expression was poised, peaceful... with the glimmer of some foreign emotion in her dark eyes I could not decipher.

“Do not be afraid to talk to me, Jen Sahara. I promise I will not bite.”

I heard a stifled snort from the other Jedi, and flushed.

“Th- thank you, Jedi Shan. I shall.”

Her smile blossomed in farewell, and she moved to the doorway of my quarters, Knight Kylah following on her heels. As the two Jedi walked away, I could not help but overhear Kylah’s parting comment.

“Honestly, Bastila, she is just a simple scholar,” she drawled in a silky voice. “Why you feel the urge to check up on such a quiet little mouse, I do not know.”

...

“Of course, I did not know who you were back then, otherwise events may have played out very differently,” Kylah’s voice dragged me back to the present. “I hope you enjoyed your freedom while it lasted.”

“You’re the traitor,” I said quietly. “You’re the reason the Endar Spire was attacked, and that everyone died.”

She scoffed disbelievingly. “That’s a little hard to take, from you. Can’t remember the blood on your hands? Or is it that you don’t know who you really are yet?” She loosed a surprised laugh. “Considering how appropriate your garb is, I find that a little hard to believe.”

“I know exactly who I am,” I bit out through clenched teeth. I just don’t know my own name. And I am not her. No two-bit little Jedi traitor was going to get the best of me! “Why’d you defect, Kylah? Getting a bit cold in Bastila’s shadow? Did it gall that you had to follow her around, even though you were the Knight and she merely a Padawan?” The taunts rolled off my tongue like honey; the ability to sense weakness and manipulate it... was this Street Kid’s gift, or hers?

Kylah stiffened, and I saw rage contort the sickly lines in her face. “Don’t you dare judge me, you pathetic worm! You’re nothing but the shell of a former time... and your time is up!”

I felt the Force crest within her, and before I had time to blink, the woman had leaped in front of me, lightsaber poised to cleave through my head. A surprised yelp released from my throat as I parried wildly, feeling the force of her blow resonate through my arms. The criss-cross of red burned into my vision as she pushed hard against me, the ‘sabers moving infinitesimally closer.

A wave of malice swept through me. The boiling rage tasted so sweet, it would be so easy to just surrender- I won’t let her take control, not again!

“You are truly nothing now,” Kylah whispered, sneering from beyond our blades. She grunted, straining against me, and I could sense the Force riding through her, enhancing her strength and reflexes. I couldn’t keep this up, not without relinquishing my sanity. No, there must be another way!

I yanked hard on the Force as desperate instinct took over. Grunting, I shoved fiercely against her saber, then leapt clear backwards, flipping in the air and landing on my feet. I won’t get mad, I won’t get mad, I won’t-

“Oh, very nice,” Kylah drawled, striding towards me. “Did dear little Bastila teach you that? Let’s see if you can block this!”

Before I could even gauge her intentions, the room was filled with bright sparks of agonized pain. I was flung to the back wall, having just enough sense left to clutch onto my lightsaber desperately, but-

The pain, the hot sparking torment burned through my flesh, my muscles, my head- No! No! I must stop this! I- I won’t- I’m sorry, Mal! How- how- Everything morphed into a world of torturous agony and grief.

Get up, you snivelling coward! The pain was receding now, slowly, but surely. Vaguely I was aware of Kylah laughing as my muscles creaked and twitched. Fight back! I should be able to block her!

“Oh my, you are weak!” Kylah crowed. “I cannot believe I was worried about facing you! The pathetic Council really failed with you, did they not? Lord Malak will be most pleased.” Her hand was still raised, blue sparks crackling between her long fingers.

I was gasping, harsh pants that rattled in my chest as I glared mutinously at Kylah. She’s too strong! No, no she wasn’t. That pitiful Sith wannabe is no challenge. I wouldn’t let her lick my boots!

The dark fury I associated with Revan bloomed in my head, in my very soul. I had just enough will left to obstruct it. I won’t give in to her! I won’t lose control again!

“Oh, you want some more?” Kylah mocked, and another jet of lightening spiked from her, engulfing me again with fierce, hot agony. I gritted my teeth, fighting against the harrowing torment, the burning that was burrowing deep into me- a scream issued from my lungs, despite myself. I can’t- I can’t-

Anger, hot and caustic, grew in my mind, fighting against the tearing pain that threatened to overwhelm everything. I could surrender to the dark hatred pummelling through me, but then, once more, Revan would win.

“My, this is fun,” Kylah murmured, in between bouts of lacerating torture. My vision slowly blurred to normality, as I recognized I was crumpled on the ground, wheezing and shaking. My weapon had already rolled out from cramped fingers. I’ll die, I realized numbly. I’ll die in this very room, if I don’t capitulate.

The barbed spikes of electricity seared into me again, and I could hear myself screaming. Flashes of nameless people sparked chaotically through my head, and I thrashed wildly as coherence dissolved. The anger, the roiling black rage, crested through me in a wave, offering a dark and ominous salvation.

My alternative, it seemed, was certain death.

I felt my resistance fray under the never-ending torture. I was poised on a precipice, forced to choose between two options, one that would damn my life, and the other, my soul.
With sinking trepidation, I surrendered to the malevolence that simmered in my mind. The antagonism, the fury, and the vengeance clawed through me, and this time I embraced it. I let the barriers drop against the dark turmoil of emotions that swept aside lucidity and took abrupt command of my senses.

My thoughts twisted cruelly – Kill her! Force her to beg for her pitiful existence, and then end it! – and I snapped my head up, rising to my feet. The lightening scalded my skin, but I cast it aside as just another pained memory.

“What?” Kylah spat, hand dropping in surprise as I took a casual step through her electric storm. The white hot sparks faded from her fingertips as she gaped at me with incredulity.

“Don’t count me out just yet, Kylah,” I breathed. I raised a hand, and called my weapon home. The Force flared as the ‘saber returned to my grasp with a satisfying snap. I took another stride forward, fighting against twitching muscles that were slow to respond – my body would list to my commands - I am the master here! “You have no idea what you have just unleashed.”

“You-” She shook her head angrily. “You are a pathetic failure! I am not scared of you!”

“You should be,” I murmured, my lips twisting. The Force rode deep within me, amplified by loathing and rage. That she had dared to unleash lightning on me; that I had fallen to my knees in front of that rankweed-sucking cantina rat galled me; and the righteous fury burst out in a flood of energy that lashed through the room.

Kylah stumbled back, once, twice, but held her ground. She’s strong. But not strong enough - I will see her crawl before the end! No more pissing about with lightsabers and petty Force powers, I had the ability to assume control over life and death, and I would unleash it here!

The rage exploded inside me, swelling out through me like a thousand piercing daggers, agonizing and yet oddly satisfying. A wail tore from my lungs as my vision darkened to red; a pulsing, crackling black aura sprung to life around me. Rage can be used to increase power tenfold. And I knew that, oh, how I knew that!

“What- no!” she yelled, stepping back involuntarily. “You can’t-”

“Oh yes I can!” I snarled, and my free hand flung out, unleashing a wave of poisoned energy that buffeted through the room. I could feel the sweet taste of it as it soaked into her skin, tainting her limbs with decaying corruption. I was supreme here, no one could withstand me!

“You-” she spluttered, stepping further back. Her hood had been pushed off her face, and her cheeks were pale with fear. Sickly yellow eyes widened in panicked realization, and I could taste the horror that began to permeate her mind. “Sith’s blood!” she swore, flinging a jet of electricity that blinded my vision and sparked white through the room.

Oh, she thinks that will work again? The Force was mine to control, and it slammed away her torrent of lightning like a cloud of moths, but-

Kylah had gone.

What? That was merely a diversion? That cowardly maggot! Pure, unadulterated anger suffused me and I snarled, reeling in the Force to bolster my speed as I prepared to pursue-

A pained moan – quiet, barely audible – tore through the fog of senseless power and fury that controlled my very senses. The berserking aura fractured and smashed, and the Force departed in a torrent, slipping out from my unwieldy grasp. I gasped as exhaustion and agony hit my senses, the lacerating pain that was etched into muscles weak from Kylah’s bombardment.

The fury, the hatred, the sheer contempt for everything, had dissolved and left me shattered.

I was bone tired and felt crippled, utterly spent. I had not the energy to race after that traitorous Sith, and I doubted I could survive the encounter.

Revan. I didn’t just let her take over, I handed her the sodding controls! Once more, Evil Bitch had saved me. But at what cost? I’m losing my mind to her! Chilling horror shuddered through me. I’d been determined to hold Revan at bay, yet this time, it had been a conscious decision to yield.

I heard the whimper once more, and allowed it to snatch my attention to a brown-clad body deeper in the room. Bastila’s Jedi Master... I took a step closer, dragging wearied limbs, as I felt the dread riding my system mount.

The Jedi Master stirred slightly. There were small horns framing a dark-skinned face. Zabrak, my mind issued helpfully. I stood over her, staring down motionlessly at the Master who could help me or damn me. Or both...

Her eyes opened, a flare of turquoise against a gaunt face, and I was swept away.

…

Nothing.

There was nothing but unworldly rage that inundated me, soaking into my very soul. I knew nothing, and could feel nothing but immense fury.

I welcomed it. Somehow, I knew it was better than the alternative.

“We can begin the implantation shortly. She is so far gone... I am not convinced this is the best course of action.”

What was that?

“You made your reservations clear at the meeting, Karon. This is the choice we all agreed upon.”

I battled against the thick fog clouding me; somehow, railing at the inevitable felt familiar. Something convulsed and jerked; with an absent sort of reflection I realized it was my body. I gasped, shuddered, and-

“Put her back under! Quick!”

-my eyes peeled open. Vague, out-of-focus images swam hazily in front of me. Someone was leaning over me. Dark skin, small horns protruding from a blurry face.

Karon? No. No!

“Two hypos – that’s more than enough.”

My vision, my confusion, and then finally my unswerving rage dissolved into nothing.

…

Horror crested within – what exactly was I remembering? Was that when they’d stuck Revan in my head? This so-called Jedi Master had been part of it?
“It was you!” I hissed, my face curling in vicious anger as I glared down at the dying Zabrak. My lightsaber cut a beam of red anger in front of me.

Her chest rattled with shallow breaths; blood drenched her austere robes and formed a sickly puddle underneath her.

“I failed you...” a whisper issued from the Zabrak; I strained to catch it.

“Failed?” My voice rose in disbelief. “You screwed with my mind! Why? Why is she in there?”

“Please...” Her bright turquoise eyes closed, and her arm twitched. A deactivated ‘saber rolled meekly from her grasp. “My lightsaber... keep it. Let it guide you.”

I stared at her, incredulous and stunned speechless. She thinks her lightsaber is sufficient recompense for tearing apart my mind? I stood still, frozen with confounded disbelief.

Her eyes stayed tightly closed, and her face had drained to a sickly grey. There were things I needed to ask, questions begging to be raised, but I found myself unable to formulate a reply as she lay there, dying in front of me.

I didn’t need to wield the Force to feel her life draining away.

“Forgive me,” she whispered, exhaling, and did not take another breath.

My limbs were rigid; all I could do was gaze down at the woman who had taken my sanity from me. And I still did not know why.

Forgive me...

The words swelled on the Force as I sensed the life dim from the Zabrak, dim until there was nothing left.

Forgive you? How can I? Because of you, my mind is a minefield! Because of you, I have Revan inside my head!

But I felt empty; the rage ebbed away as I stood, staring silently at the lifeless Zabrak. Karon had known the answers... and I’d been so scared I’d lost the chance to learn from her. And Bastila... where is she?

I heard a scuffle to my right; reflexes I barely acknowledged had me leaping backwards as laser bolts discharged through the room. Pain scored deep into my shoulder.

“Die, Sith schutta!” an angry, male voice bellowed. I faced my next danger – a beaten, bloody Republic officer wielding what looked like a kid’s toy in his hands-

“Carth?” I cried in stunned disbelief. A dull throbbing from my shoulder made me wince – it was superficial and shallow, but I’d had more wounds in the last few days than was objectively healthy. “You frelling shot me!”

His jaw dropped in a comic display of shock; if I hadn’t been so overwhelmed by everything, I probably would have laughed. “Jen?” he croaked weakly, his arm lowering as he stumbled back against the wall. I noticed he didn’t drop his gun, however.

Black lines latticed over his neck, and blood mottled his clothes like patchwork. The idiot hadn’t even been wearing armour. Kylah almost killed him, I realized as he continued to stare dumbly at me. He was the one trapped against the wall.

“What— are you with them?” he whispered, his eyes roving over me. “No... you can’t be... can you?”

I thought I’d had enough surprises already, but apparently not. “Oh, some thanks I get for saving your life,” I snapped, crouching down and pilfering the lightsaber that lay close to the recently departed master. I’d figure out why she wanted me to take it later. “You’ve called me some nasty names before, Onasi, but one of those core-slime Dark Jedi? Gee, thanks.”

His gaze was dubious, almost hesitant, as he looked me over again. As the wariness mounted in his eyes, I had to bite back the scowl determined to etch into my face. At least this was a healthy sort of anger, frustrated irritation at his familiar suspicion – nothing like the storm of fury that drowned me in its wake. That sometimes seemed impossible to control.

He opened his mouth to speak, closed it, sighed, and then tried again. “I suppose there’s no point in asking why you’re dressed like a Sith, then. Why are you here, Jen?”

How could I answer that? I’d never really explained anything to Carth – stars, I didn’t even know what was going on with myself most of the time. And Revan... now that was something I’d never let slip, no matter what. In the end, I answered simply, “I decided it was time to stop running.”

He sighed, weariness and exasperation churning through his features as he slumped back against the wall, eyes closed. The gun dropped from his lifeless fingers. “I really can’t believe you, Jen. You blow up our ship – stang, you almost kill us! Disappear off the planet, and then a day later your back!” His voice rose; despite myself, I flinched. At the time, the sabotage on the Ebon Hawk had been sensible, logical – but now, knowing who was in my head- “Barging into the middle of this invasion, and claiming to save my life?” His eyes snapped open, dark and flashing. “Wait— Kylah— where is that bitch?”

“She ran off,” I answered curtly.

“She—” He sighed again. “I guess you did save my life, then. I thought that was my end.” A bark of laughter issued from him; a desperate, humourless sound. “But you arrived in the nick of time, like usual.”

Not for Karon. My eyes slid back to the prone Zabrak, resting on the crumple of beige and dark red.

“Karon?” Carth gasped, following my gaze. “Is— is she dead?”

I nodded slowly. “I felt her die,” I murmured through cold lips. “She has... joined the Force, as they say.”

Carth’s attention had fixed on me once more, mistrustful and cagey. “We need to move from here. Kylah’s still out there, along with however many Dark Jedi are still alive. Did you— did you encounter any?”

I nodded briskly, wincing as I rolled my shoulder back. “The Selkath got one of the foyer guards, I killed the other. Some Twi’lek apprentice killed a third.” I pushed my senses out; a deliberate, tiring effort now that the battle adrenaline had departed me. The Force felt heavy, almost unnatural in my grasp, and I couldn’t feel anything approximating a Force user. “Kylah’s done a runner, flyboy. I can’t sense any Dark Jedi in the building anymore.”

Carth’s eyes closed as he breathed in deeply, leaning against the wall. “I hope you’re right. I doubt
I can survive another encounter anyway."

I attempted a weak smile. "Come on, Onasi, you’re not that badly beaten up. Nothing a few whiskeys won’t cure, at any rate."

His eyes snapped open as he scowled at me. "Your solution for everything, isn’t it, Jen? A few drinks- or, failing that, berserk and go on a rampage."

I flinched inwardly at his bitter tone, but couldn’t really blame him - I supposed I deserved that.
But there was something more urgent than appeasing Carth, no matter how right he was to be angry at me. "Where’s Bastila?” I queried in a low tone.

The scowl dropped as his expression turned serious once more. "Not here, that’s all I know. Wann told me she was on a mission somewhere, but wouldn’t divulge more. At least she’s been safely out of this massacre, though."

Shockwaves of dread slid through me; I could feel beads of sweat popping into existence on my forehead. If she’s not here, then where is she? What’s happened to her? It wasn’t inconceivable that the Sith had led a two-pronged attack. In fact, I couldn’t help but think it probable, considering the intangibility of the bond. If I hadn’t known about our mind link previously, I wouldn’t even have noticed the whisper of her soul in my mind.

“I need to find her,” I mumbled. “Who’s Wann?”

“You actually want to find Bastila now?” Carth muttered something inaudible under his breath.
“Roland Wann’s the Commander here. I’ll take you to him – we should find out who’s still alive.”
He locked eyes with me again, trailing over my clothes. "Though get rid of that blasted cloak, would you?”

He made to leave, and I hurriedly shucked the robe off and dumped it to the ground. As I followed him silently out of the cursed room, I spared one last glance back at the prone corpse of the Jedi Master.

But there was nothing left bar a pile of blood-smattered brown robes.

xXx

The Republic Commander was an older, chubby man; dark skinned and face etched with worry lines. Black shadows lurked under his eyes, and I had the feeling he’d been less than prepared for today’s attack. None too surprising, really, considering the enforced neutrality of Ahto City.

“Carth, thank the stars you’re alive,” Roland wheezed as we stepped into the command room. A couple of soldiers had waved us in after opening the door, but blasters had stayed ready in their grip. Two of them were looking at me warily. Well, I guess this torn, bloodied armour doesn’t exactly make a great first impression, but it’s gotta be better than a black cloak. “What happened out there? The last time I spotted a Dark Jedi was ten minutes ago, jumping into that submersible. I didn’t dare believe it – are they all dead?”

“Kylah,” I muttered angrily. So she did escape. Roland’s gaze was drawn to me, immediately suspicious. Must be a common trait of all Republic soldiers. Maybe they learn mistrust at cadet school.

Carth nodded at the Commander. “Nine deaths accounted for. The one you spotted must have been that traitor, Kylah, escaping.”
“They’re – they’re all dead?” a younger man squeaked from further in the room. He looked like a tech; about ten casually clothed workers were huddled against the far wall. “It’s over?”

A ragged cheer arose among the small crowd, all of whom appeared exhausted and petrified. One sank to his knees in relief, covering his face with shaky hands. Roland’s shoulders dropped as the tension slowly dissipated from his stance. He looked once more at me. “Who’s this?”

Carth glanced at me also, dark eyes imploring for my silence. “Jen. She’s one of Bastila’s crew,” he said finally.

Roland frowned. “Hang on – wasn’t that the name of the survivor who fled the Ebon Hawk?”

I shrugged uneasily. Carth shot me a disappointed frown, and I dropped my gaze. He must not have told Roland the whole truth, otherwise Wann would be labelling me a fugitive at the least.

Roland’s gaze moved to the lightsabers hooked on my belt, and a dark scowl wrapped itself on his weathered face. “Another Jedi?” he groused.

Irritation crested over my disquiet, and I shot him a filthy look. “Oh, I’m sorry,” I snapped sarcastically, “maybe I should have left you lot to fight the Sith alone!”

Carth sighed noisily as the Commander’s fierce look of annoyance intensified. “This attack happened because of you Jedi!” Roland snarled back. “They invaded to get at Bastila or, or Karon! If you Jedi hadn’t been here, all my men would still be alive!”

Fierce indignation swept through me as I opened my mouth to retort, but the Commander beat me to it with a hurried, “Karon – where is she? Did you find her, Captain?”

“She, uh,” Carth trailed off, shaking his head. “She didn’t make it.”

My gut clenched at the words. I hadn’t wanted to meet Karon, inwardly dreading any confrontation with a Jedi Master. But now I’d more or less obtained my wish, I bitterly regretted it. She knew the answers. Sithspit, she’s the one who shoved that schutta in my head! And yet, after witnessing the Zabrak’s death, I couldn’t help but feel remorse as well as anger. It wasn’t my fault! I had nothing to do with the Sith attacking here! But I couldn’t stem the tide of recriminations – if I hadn’t run from Manaan, what would have happened? Would Karon still be alive? Would Bastila be out of danger?

“Bastila,” I gasped suddenly. “Where is she?”

A loud explosion deafened any scathing response the Commander would have made, and rocked the walls around me. I stumbled backward, fumbling instinctively for a weapon as someone screamed in fright. It took a second before I registered that the blast – whatever it was – had occurred some rooms away.

Carth had whipped out his blaster, facing one of the exits intently. The techs were whimpering against the back wall.

“Dammit, Captain! I thought you said those sithspawn were all dead!” Roland cursed, having toppled against a row of consoles.

They are all dead! All, except that traitor Kylah – but she had fled. My muscles clenched in readiness, a painful tension against the exhaustion that lingered in my limbs. The Force skittered away from my clumsy grasp, and I knew a moment of real terror. If this was a second wave of Force users, then I sincerely doubted my chances. My shoulder throbbed from the GenoHaradan attack on Rii’shn, and even now, a hollow ache thrummed in my once-broken arm. In short, I was a “Uh, Commander?” a soldier interrupted, eyes fixed on a screen next to Wann. “There’s Selkath in the halls.”

“Selkath?” Roland queried flatly as he turned to look. Realization struck me – the foyer doors had been locked down after my entrance. If the Selkath were determined to enter and supposedly neutralize the Sith threat, then they’d probably detonated their way in.

Carth’s shoulders sagged in relief, even as he holstered his blaster. I stared down at my clenched fingers as the alarm abated. With an absent sort of curiosity I realized the lightsaber I was gripping was Karon’s. Huh. I bet it’s not red.

“Talk about blasted timing,” Roland muttered, his gaze roving over the consoles. From my vantage point, I could spot several camera outputs displayed on the screens he was leaning over. More than half showed naught but static. “They certainly took long enough.”

Slurring shouts emanated through the doors, and I recognized the Selkath accent with something approaching dread. I’d run from them earlier, but hopefully without that concealing black cloak they wouldn’t recognize me. Neither Roland nor Carth had so far questioned exactly how I’d ventured inside, and I hoped it’d stay that way. A gut instinct warned me that the Selkath were notoriously picky over their tyrannical laws; they wouldn’t hesitate to slam me for resisting arrest at the least.

“This is the Ahto City Civil Authority!” a thick voice yelled from outside the room. “Open the door and throw down your weapons immediately!”

“Oh, this is going to be fun,” Carth muttered, as I tucked my lightsaber away hurriedly. I heard Roland growl even as the durasteel doors opened to admit a dozen heavily armoured Selkath guards.

Oh, frelling fantastic, I thought sourly as the soldiers swarmed into the room and surrounded us. I need a sodding drink.

xXx

The chrome bench was cold underneath me as I stared vacantly into a glass of amber liquid. This room was the closest thing the Embassy had to a bar; a sparse cafeteria nestled within the barracks, ostensibly for the Republic soldiers. Considering the opulence of this place, I doubted if alcohol was meant to be served on the premises, but the shifty-eyed soldier who’d introduced himself as Laconi seemed more than happy to supply me with stronger substances than mere ale.

As the Embassy was currently locked-down by the Selkath while they interrogated Roland Wann and perused what camera feeds weren’t destroyed, I had little better place to reside.

I have to get out of here. My body was fiercely demanding rest, even as impatience warred within. Carth had found out earlier just where Bastila had disappeared to – a secret mission to the bottom of the damned ocean, to rescue a bunch of scientists. He’d known little else, other than that Juhani and Canderous had both accompanied her. I was relieved that neither had been caught in the bloodbath here, though I felt surprise at hearing Canderous had voluntarily followed Bastila.

The distance between Bastila and I couldn’t explain the obscurity of the bond. I could swear that she was critically injured or ill, and probably unconscious. I hesitated to mention any of this to Carth, however. Last time I’d talked of our bond, he’d been derisively disbelieving. I’d no idea what Bastila had said of our attachment during my absence, and frankly, I didn’t want to push my luck as far as Carth was concerned.
I need to find Bastila. Sun and stars, how long are the Selkath gonna keep us here? It’d been hours since they’d swarmed into Roland’s command room, quickly taking control over the whole Embassy. The red-faced Commander had been pretty unhappy about that, even more so when he’d heard the explosion had been a permacrete detonator that had torn through most of the entrance foyer to grant the Selkath access. The Selkath themselves had assumed command and swiftly blockaded the facility, and while I’d disliked obeying the pedantic bastards, I couldn’t stem the amusement that swelled over surveying the blustering Commander’s indignation.

But my thoughts turned once more, inevitably, to my bond sister. The idea of hunting down a submersible and traipsing after her had already occurred to me, although slipping out from underneath the Selkath’s lockdown wouldn’t be easy. I could always ask HK. With a jolt, I realized I had no idea where that bloodthirsty droid had disappeared to. Kath crap, I thought with alarm. If he decides to barge in here, the Selkath will likely fire on him. HK had occasionally shown subtlety, but it almost seemed to go against his programming.

“Jen,” a low voice sparked through my ruminations. I glanced up to see Carth hovering nearby – he’d been called away a few hours ago by Roland Wann. Black shadows smudged the skin under his eyes, and he was still wearing ripped, bloodied clothes. He looks like how I feel. His eyes flicked disparagingly over the stale beer cradled in my palms. I felt an easing of my shoulders, and realized that - despite his completely justified anger at me - his presence was a welcome one.

“They finally let you out?” I smirked as he took a step closer. He rolled his eyes at me, and eased himself onto the long bench.

“Anyone would think that we attacked the Sith, rather than the other way around,” he muttered. His gaze roved over the soldier-cum-bartender, and an annoyed scowl appeared on his lined face. I wondered absently what he had against Laconi. The twitchy soldier seemed relatively harmless to me.

“The Selkath are pretty pedantic over their non-violence laws,” I commented, and then immediately wished I hadn’t as Carth turned to glare fiercely at me.

“Yes,” he ground out. “So we found out, after you crashed the ship and the Sith tried to tow us.” Angry disappointment coloured his tone, and I looked away, staring deeply into the ale I was nursing. I could feel something akin to shame burning in my cheeks.

“Look,” he sighed heavily next to me. “I-I can’t forget what you did. You’re a loose cannon, Jen, and you damn near killed us. But believe it or not, I didn’t come here to argue.”

I could feel my jaw clenching, as the uncomfortable sensation of bitter anger mingled with contrition. On one hand, he was right, but then again I had just saved his sorry arse. I wondered if he even remembered that.

“So why did you come here?” I bit out, after a heavy pause.

“We’ve heard from the others.”

My head snapped up, startled, as I turned to face him once more. “Where are they? What’s going on?”

“It’s a big mess,” Carth muttered, shaking his head. “The Selkath have intercepted a delayed distress signal from the Republic Station. From what Roland told me, the message was brief. A couple of scientists and three Republic soldiers are alive down there – no names, however. They’ve requested immediate aid and life-support. One of the survivors is gravely wounded.”
Bastila. A shred of hope wound through me. If the Selkath were on their way, then it wouldn’t be too long until I could force some answers out of her. She had to tell me the truth, now that I knew just what evil lurked so insidiously inside my own cursed head.

Carth slumped back, sighing. “Apparently, the Selkath have also picked up on some sort of explosion down there. I don’t know what’s been going on, but it’s turned into a colossal predicament for the Republic.”

I frowned at him in query. His mouth twisted as he went on to elaborate. “The Republic base is a secret kolto mining facility. I’m sure I don’t have to spell out the ramifications of that becoming public.”

I could feel my eyes widen. “A secret kolto base?” I gasped. “Kath crap, what did the Republic think they were doing? The Selkath won’t bloody stand for that, they’re so fiercely proud of their blasted neutrality and their independent kolto trade that they’ll stop selling any to the Republic after this! Stars, what did the Republic think would happen?”

Carth was eyeing me over appraisingly. “You seem to have a good idea of Manaan politics,” he murmured in a low tone. I could feel my stomach lurch, and ran through quickly what I’d just said. I shrugged. It seemed like common sense to me. “Regardless,” he continued. “Some members of the Selkath government knew about this base previously. Stang, they more or less sanctioned it and kept it hidden from the rest of the bureaucrats.”

I snorted, shaking my head as I picked up the glass of beer and took a swig. Sounded like the Selkath government was about to embroil itself in an ugly civil war. With the Republic right in the middle of it.

“You know, in a way it’s a good thing for the Republic that the Sith attacked here when they did,” I murmured. A brief surge of outrage flitted over Carth’s face before shrewd introspection took its place.

“You mean, they might close down both Embassies rather than just ours?” he muttered.

I tilted my head. “Well, the Republic’s really screwed themselves over with this revelation, but coming at the same time as an unprovoked attack on them by the Sith Empire...” I trailed off, shrugging. “Probably will make them look a little better, yeah.”

We lapsed into silence after that, each lost in our own thoughts. I’d emptied my glass, and was considering another as thoughts of Bastila and Revan returned to plague me. I knew little of the former Sith Lord, other than that she had once been a Jedi, and had led the Republic to victory in the Mandalorian Wars before turning. But then again, I thought sourly, it’s not like I know a drukload about myself, either. My homeworld was Talshion, and I lived on the streets before becoming a Jedi. From the brief shards of memory that had drifted to my consciousness, I knew that I’d also been in the Mandalorian Wars. Did I follow Revan and Malak? I felt a slight tremor trickle through me. No. I’d never follow that Sith bitch. I wouldn’t. Bastila had once told me I’d fallen to the Dark Side. I’d been more inclined to believe it back then, when I hadn’t been sure which personality was really me. No. She was saying that to justify Revan’s thoughts in my head. I don’t know how I fit in – or how Jen Sahara does – but there’s no way I went Dark Side. No way at all.

Carth shifted uncomfortably near me, his eyes sliding to glance at me surreptitiously. I had the distinct feeling he wanted to broach a topic, but wasn’t sure how to start. I tried unsuccessfully to hold back a smirk.
“Yes?” I raised my eyebrows. “You want to say something?”

“I, uh, yeah,” he stuttered. “Uh, am I that obvious?”

I snorted. “If you were any more obvious, your eyes would fall out of your head.”

Said eyes narrowed. “I’m not that bad, am I? No, look, don’t answer that,” he sighed. “Seriously, I wanted to ask you something. You told me once that you didn’t really remember your past,” he said, his expression intent and fixed on me.

“Did I?” I looked away, shoulders tensing. I wanted to make peace with Carth, but this really wasn’t the sort of conversation I was interested in.

“Yes. On Tatooine, before Calo Nord attacked us.” His voice was short, almost suspicious, and the sheer familiarity of that ripped a laugh from me.

“Is that a crime these days?” I smirked, looking back at him.

He scowled. “No- look, I’m serious here!”

“Okay, okay, keep your flight jacket on.” I paused. “Where is that hideous thing anyway?”

“Mission took off with it- stop trying to change the subject!”

I fiddled with the flask of ale, eyes downcast as I struggled to contain myself. “Alright, what do you want to know?”

“What do you remember from Deralia?”

My eyes flew to his in surprise, but Carth’s countenance gave nothing away. I stayed silent for a full minute, searching his expression. His face was familiar, now, after weeks of working together. I usually found it easier to read him. Why does he want to know that? What interest would Jen’s past have for him?

“I’ve told you about my background before, Onasi. I grew up in a quiet settlement. When I was old enough, I studied at the Academia.” I shrugged uncomfortably. Nothing exciting about my past, I’m afraid.

His gaze held mine. “Were you there when Darth Revan’s forces invaded a year ago?”

I froze; ice slid down my spine. “What?” I hissed. Deralia was attacked? By- by Revan? Disbelief curled through my veins, I didn’t want to think about the implications of that. I was shaking my head wildly without realizing. “No, no, I don’t want to talk about that.”

Something akin to sympathy lurked in his face; I’d be damned if I’d allow him to pity me.

“Jen-”

“No! I wasn’t there, alright?” I demanded angrily. Was I, though? Was Jen on Deralia when Revan invaded? Is that how she’s caught up in all of this? With mounting horror, flashes of recollection caught up to me. Back on Rii’shn– facing off the GenoHaradan– Revan had cursed the traitorous Sith and Deralian troops alike-

No! Bastila faced Revan, on Revan’s flagship! That wasn’t on Deralia!

“I’m sorry,” Carth said abruptly. “Look, I shouldn’t have brought it up. Let’s- let’s talk about something else, okay?”
My jaw was clenched tight, and I could feel my hands shaking. “This conversation is over,” I muttered, standing up. Did Jen meet Revan? Horror soared within; I didn’t want imagine an encounter between the timid introvert and the insane Sith bitch. Not when they were both resident inside my own head.

I didn’t register Carth calling after me as I walked blindly out of the makeshift bar; my thoughts were too chaotically wild to listen to him. As the days had passed, I learnt flashes more about Revan, and about Jen, but my own history remained a shrouded conundrum, taunting me with what I didn’t know.

If Revan and Jen met on Deralia, I thought numbly, then what about me? Dammit, why are they in my head? How do I fit into this? If the Republic didn’t get Bastila back here soon, I swore I’d go find her myself. This has dragged on long enough. I need to get my head straight, and she’s going to give me some long overdue answers.

This time, half-lies and part-truths wouldn’t appease me.

xXx
The console of the Republic’s pet harvesting machine blinked ominously at me. First time I’d seen function keys larger than my palm; but then again, it wasn’t exactly easy to input commands in these bulky envirosuits. I stabbed a finger at the keyboard, and watched the output manifest on the screen with grim satisfaction.

Accessing Harvester Control:
Initiating Shutdown Sequence...

The Cathar flanked me, keeping a nervy watch on our watery surroundings. I’d thought the surface of Manaan had been bad enough, what with the tight-arsed Selkath and their blathering neutrality, but this pissing about underwater... Well, I’d been in worse spots. Still, Juhani wasn’t alone in her desire to get back to the surface. Being surrounded by toothy sharks that saw me as just another appetizer, with naught but one of those flimsy noise-makers to defend myself with, was more than enough to put me on edge.

Pressure Control Layer Shutting Down...

Yet the princess had somehow drawn the rabid fishies away. I personally scoffed at the marvels she and many of her stodgy counterparts attributed to the Force, but this time I was pleasantly surprised. I’d thought the chances of turning into shark chow before reaching this contraption had been altogether too damn high.

Container Pods Shutting Down...

Gratification brought a tight smile to my face. We might actually get out of here in one piece. A squawk in my ear cut cleanly through my satisfaction.

“Kono, look!” the female shark-geek gasped. “The sharks – I think they’re attacking the base!”

This infernal place had the same ghoulish feel to it as the Undercity back on Taris. Even relatively sane people started cracking and jumping at the slightest shadows. Yeah, I’d seen that impressive swarm of firaxans dart off in the direction of the Base. But why was the girlie scientist whimpering about it? What are the sharks going to do? Bite through six inches of durasteel?

Shutdown Sequence Complete.

“Got it!” I crowed. “Easier than the girls at Roxy’s cantina.”

The Cathar had taken a leaden step closer at my remark, envirosuit helmet pointing at the blinking console.

“Canderous has turned the machine off,” she murmured through the transmitter. “Should it be rumbling so?”

The contraption was echoing with a reverberating rattle. It hadn’t sounded steady since we’d neared it, but then again, neither had the Cathar. I was about to say so when the older academic whimpered over the communications.
“I- Sami, it’s ferracrystal, it’ll hold. It has to!”

I could feel myself scowling; those two had spent far too long staring at fish and plants if they truly believed a bunch of firaxan could harm them from within the Base. The Cathar pulled back as the harvesting machine loosed another resonating discharge. It sounded vaguely similar to the backfire of a basilisk.

“It’s just powering down,” I muttered, frowning at the console. “Taking awhile though.”

A warning flashed on the screen, and shock punched hard in my gut as I read it.

#ERROR: Container Pod #3 Unstable.
#CRITICAL FAULT: Fuel Tank Pressure Leak.

“No, it- damn, it’s unstable! Get out of here!” I growled, muscles clenching as I lurched around violently. Tits on a bantha! We need to haul ass back inside, now!

“Canderous?” Kono queried. “What’s going on out there?”

I took a sluggish step towards the lights of the Base, twisting slightly to keep one eye on the Cathar. But she- what does she think she’s doing?

“Cathar, you’re going the wrong way! It’s going to blow!”

Another rumble sounded ominously nearby. Maybe I was being paranoid – who knew how likely it was for Republic equipment to spontaneously explode – but there ain’t no way I’m sticking around to find out. I’d seen too many lightweight Republic ships shatter from the slightest hit to trust their machinery.

“I must find the Star Map, Mandalorian!” Juhani’s hiss echoed into my ear. “I will not fail!”

She’d taken another step away, further into the darkness past the inoperative harvester.

Mand’alor’s balls, what is she trying to prove? Now is not the time! I normally had no patience for this sort of stupidity, but the Cathar had been skittish since we’d left the surface. Oh, sod it all. I snarled, staggering determinedly back past the harvesting machine to follow her, even as I cursed myself for succumbing to this brainless sort of loyalty.

Juhani was still moving deeper into the shadows beyond.

The irregular roll of the machine was noticeably louder now, and my eyes slid to the console as I floundered past. The grim message spurred me on further; I could barely see the shape of the Cathar as the shadows ahead enveloped her whole.

#ALARM: Rupture In Containment Field
#ALARM: Evacuate Area Immediately!

Why am I following her? It was the Jedi Princess I felt a debt towards; yet I respected Juhani’s warrior spirit. And this Star Map business had been part of the mission. The cryptic Zabrak had refused to pay me until I’d vowed to follow their lead. I wasn’t going to renege on that again, not after Bastila had saved my hide the way she did.

Still, if they expected me to walk blindly into another hairy situation after this, then they needed their heads checked.

“Kono, the window’s flexing – there’s hundred of those sharks out there! We need to get out of this room!” The female’s shrieks pierced into my ear, I felt a sharp desire to shut the damn comm. off.

Blurry outlines materialized in the dark ahead, indicating some sort of structure nearby. The hazy outline of the Cathar merged into black as a blaring rumble resounded behind me. I yanked my feet onwards, feeling vibrations through the ground with every step. It’s about to blow! Ordo, get a move on! Ahead loomed an uneven wall that might just be the cover I needed. It wasn’t far, but I could feel my mouth opening in a snarl as I pushed my legs even harder.

My hand reached out to grab the side of the broken wall as the ground heaved under my feet. Just as I thought I had my balance, a crushing force of water slammed me off the ground, ripping my grip from the wall and sailing me headfirst into the black unknown.

I smashed against it, hard against my arms which collapsed under the pressure. I grunted as the air left my lungs, pushed prone against the structure as the water buffeted against me and the ringing in my ears grew.

I stayed prone for a few seconds, stunned, vaguely aware that someone was speaking to me. I slipped down, senses dazed, and my legs buckled against me as I hit the ocean floor.

“Canderous, are you okay?”

I was flat on my back; eyes blinking as coherent thought slowly emerged. Eddies of blackish dirt spun in the dark water above, and a throbbing ache resounded through leaden muscles. With a grunt, I positioned a weak arm underneath me, propping myself up to take a look around. Let there be no kriffing leaks in this suit, or I'm fried. My limb threatened to collapse from the weight, and an echoing pressure pulsed from my head.

I’d landed in the ruins the humans had talked about earlier. Broken, eroded slabs of ferracrete or similar rose into the ocean, moss and lichen literally smothering them. Whatever had been built here was ancient. I had no idea where the Cathar was hiding, though.

“Yeah, I'll do,” I muttered back, scrabbling to my feet inelegantly. I stumbled, falling against one of the ruined walls. The envirosuit seemed fine so far – no ruptures or tears – and oxygen was still flowing normally through it. What luck. Let's hope it holds.

Just when I thought the danger was gone, something flickered in my periphery, and I twisted sharply to catch the movement. A firaxan shark- no, loads of them, headed towards me, and I’d lost that toy sonic gun in the explosion.

“Force, they are headed directly for you! Do not move!” Juhani cried.

I found that a bit rich coming from her, but held my tongue, standing frozen against a decaying wall. Dozens of sharks milled above me, and one came within touching distance, but-

“They’re not attacking,” I muttered, frowning. Dumb luck seems to be with me today. The firaxan’s head twitched towards me, before flicking away to join the swarm above. “Did Bastila do something to them?”

I idly watched a shoal of smaller fish dart between cracks in the walls. One was swallowed whole by a firaxan as it swam past into the murky shadows beyond. I wasn’t going a move a wretched
I was completely defenceless.

“I do not know,” Juhani’s reply came at last. “I felt a powerful force before, but it was not from Bastila. The firaxans had damaged the harvesting machine earlier, if you recall; Sami believed that may have set off their territorial instincts. Perhaps, now that it’s been destroyed, they—”

“I dunno,” I grunted. I had a hard time thinking of those rabid sharks with that level of intelligence. I would’ve thought an explosion would just piss them off all the more. “Kono? You guys shark bait or what?”

There was no immediate reply. I felt a twinge of concern; if the scientists had run from the command room, they’d have left Bastila pretty much defenceless. But there ain’t no way those fishies could damage that Base. A harvesting machine, maybe, but a solid, underground Base? Even I couldn’t believe the Republic to engineer construction weak enough to be damaged by marine life, no matter how I might enjoy belittling their work.

“These must be the ruins,” Juhani murmured, and I saw her step into view from behind a jagged outcrop. A few brightly coloured fish darted past her, further into the deep. “And it appears the firaxans are leaving.”

I turned around, facing back towards where I thought the harvesting machine would lie. I had no idea in reality; and the ocean was turbid from the explosion. Even the lights from the Base wouldn’t show through this cloud of dirt. “Let’s just find this Star Map of yours and get back,” I grunted, hoping the Cathar knew the way. “I wanna know why that lot ain’t answering.”

“Yes,” Juhani agreed. “I must admit, I am worried for Bastila’s safety. What I felt earlier was that same foreign entity we encountered when approaching the station. But stronger.” She took a step further into the ruins, and I followed cautiously, keeping an eye out for any movement. Even here behind the irregular structures, eddies of dirt and soot were muddying the water.

A massive wall emerged out of the depths as we tramped closer, this structure dwarfing the ragged walls I’d landed next to. It raised high into the ocean, ten metres or so, and it struck me as particularly odd that the Republic had not bothered to investigate this area further, considering the academic weaklings their empire attracted. A dark hole caught my eye, evidence of an entrance through the monumental enclosure.

“This is it,” the Cathar breathed as I stepped through the hole after her. A disjointed contraption, about half my height with four solid spikes protruding outwards, lay on the ground just past Juhani. “The Star Map. We found it.”

It looked much the same as the one on Tatooine, I thought grimly as Juhani knelt on the ocean floor. She leaned forward, activating the mechanism in way I didn’t see, and the Star Map unfolded. A large globe of blue-white illuminated the area, looking distinctly out of place in this bleak environment.

“This thing is so close to the Base, and no one's found it before?” I asked in disbelief, as the Cathar started punching commands into the datapad hooked onto her suit. “Even with the fishies around, I'd have thought some idiot would go looking to make himself a hero.”

The Cathar took some time to answer, engrossed in creating a data connection with the Map. I frowned as I gazed over the navigational markers. There were more black spots in this map than the one on Tatooine. It had the same mysterious lines cut through the galaxy, although in different places. Somehow, the data of the maps added together must create some endpoint destination. Why the creators couldn't just leave a set of coordinates, I didn't know.
“Hrakert Station has been in this area for little more than a year. Karon told me the Republic deliberately chose a place to mine far away from the Selkath underwater bases.” Juhani stood, deactivating the Star Map as she did so. “And this vent has only been found very recently, so I do not think they have known about the ruins for long. But you are correct; the map had been discovered before.”

I squinted through the helmet as the light of the Star Map faded, morphing back into dark murkiness. The Jedi seemed to get their kicks from being mysterious; Juhani, for all her warrior spirit, was no different. I wasn’t a complete imbecile, I’d gathered whatever these Star Maps led to was critical to the war, otherwise the Jedi would hardly let their precious Bastila out alone.

“Right,” I drawled. “I take it the Sith have been here, huh?”

Juhani stepped towards me, and I turned to follow. Fortunately, she seemed to know where she was going.

“Let us discuss this later, Canderous, when our crew is back together.”

I’ve heard that before. I shrugged inside the bulky envirosuit. “I’m getting paid to fight, Cathar, and to save your sorry hide. All I need to know is anything that might stop me from doing so.”

“Canderous, Juhani!” Kono’s voice cut past any response Juhani may have given me. Hah, so they ain’t dead yet. Wonder what took them so kriffing long.

“Come back, quick!” Kono gasped, and I registered just how strained and panicked his voice was. “Bastila’s stopped breathing!”

xXx

The Cathar was one step ahead of me as we rushed into the command room. The two scientists were cloistered near the far end, next to the bench Bastila had been lying on. As we ran towards them, my eyes flicked over a pile of hypodermic needles resting on the table nearby.

“You’re back!” Sami cried in relief, straightening from the position she was crouched in. “I’ve got her breathing again – her heart stopped earlier – I don’t know what happened!”

Juhani was already kneeling next to Bastila, her hands resting gently on the prone Jedi’s chest. A breathing mask was strapped tightly around Bastila’s face, forcing oxygen into her lungs.

I glanced up towards the far window – it looked completely intact, and I had no idea what the scientists had been panicking about earlier.

I folded my arms, feeling my mouth twist with disgust as I looked the two humans over. “What happened to the princess then?”

“I don’t know!” the dark-skinned female gasped. “The sharks started attacking the window – I thought we were all going to die! Then- then they all disappeared-”

“I think when the harvesting machine exploded,” Kono cut in. His gaze was still resting worriedly on Bastila as the Cathar closed her eyes and breathed in deeply. “Maybe that distracted them. Then we saw Bastila was out cold. If we hadn’t had the emergency kits here, she’d be dead by now.”

Sami’s hands were shaking as she dropped another needle onto the pile. “How did the machine explode? I think maybe that’s what dispersed the firaxans; it’d fit with their behaviour. If they considered our mining an infringement on their territory, then perhaps-"

“I don’t give a damn about the firaxans!” I snarled, as my impatience with their pointless waffling reached breaking point. I’d seen those hungry firaxans out there, and I wasn’t about to credit them with intelligence. The girl’s eyes widened at my outburst, and she actually took a stumbling step backwards. “I want to know what’s wrong with Bastila!”

Sami stared at me in mute surprise, and it was the Cathar who answered. Her palms were still laid upon Bastila, and her anguished look of concern redoubled my worry. “I can barely feel her,” she whispered. “Her life force is so weak, it is almost extinguished.”

I felt my scowl deepen. “But she’ll be alright then? Her heart’s beating, she’s getting oxygen - all she needs is rest?” My gaze had fixed back on the Jedi Princess, watching her chest as it slowly rose and fell.

Juhani looked away, shaking her head slowly. “It is not mere exhaustion, Canderous. All living beings encompass the Force; it is part of them, as they are part of it. Bastila... she is so close to dying, that she does not even feel alive, let alone human. This sort of psychic damage... I am no healer, but it is possible she may not recover.”

I could feel the muscles in my face tighten. I’d vowed to get Bastila to the surface, but that would hardly help her if she died in the process. My eyes slid accusingly to the two humans. “What happened to her?”

Horror was etched on Kono’s face; Sami merely looked indignant. “I told you, we didn’t see! We were too busy-”

“Panicking because you thought a bunch of fish could get in here. Yeah. Right.”

“Canderous, she appears stable.” Juhani’s low voice cut through the room. “As long as she doesn’t relapse, I believe she will improve. Blaming the others will not help her.”

There were far too many conditions in that sentence, but the only way to increase her odds was to acquire medical care. The Cathar was right. Denouncing the scientists wouldn’t make the Jedi suddenly wake.

I felt the air in my lungs expel in a dissatisfied grunt. “You said yourself you’re no healer, Cathar. Whether you reckon she’ll recover ain’t worth a damn to me. We need to get her topside, get some real help. Kono, you sent that message yet?”

The scientist nodded at me wearily, a deep frown lining his face. “Yes. I’ve broadcast it on all available frequencies, though to be perfectly honest I’m unsure if the signal is strong enough to reach the surface. I will keep trying.”

“There’s not much else we can do, now,” Sami commented, gazing at me and the Cathar in turn. “We have enough food to last for months. The air... well, as long as someone surface-side gets Kono’s message, then we’ll be fine.”

I felt my lips twist in disgust. “I’m not inclined to bet my life on those sorts of odds. You ain’t got no way of knowing the distress signal’s strong enough, and we may just suffocate in the mean time.”

“We’ve been doing all we can,” Kono blustered heatedly. “By all means, if you have any suggestions, then please air them!”
“Where’s the communications array in this blasted hole?” I shot back. “Seems to me we should focus on getting that up and running. Make sure that someone hears our call.”

“The room’s sealed shut. You would need high grade explosives – permacrete or something similar – to open the blast doors.” Sami answered, looking intently at me.

I grunted. “Worth a shot. I’m gonna go see what I can do.” My eyes slid to the unmoving Jedi, and I felt determination twist in my gut. No way was I gonna sit about yapping, relying on shaky hope to get us out of here.

“We have weeks of air left,” the dark-skinned human cautioned. “You don’t have to go haring off again, Canderous. Frankly, you look like death.”

My eyes shot to the woman in quick anger, but the only emotion she showed was concern. With that, I was abruptly conscious of the aching lassitude that had sunk deep into my limbs. I knew I’d be feeling some hefty whiplash in a few hours when the adrenalin wore off. The Cathar was looking at me also, her face drawn and pale. I wondered briefly when we’d last slept.

“Rest and food is a good idea,” Kono added quietly. “There may still be Selkath around. We haven’t seen any on the cameras for awhile, but it doesn’t hurt to play it safe.”

I nodded abruptly. If there were still loopy fishmen around, then I’d much prefer to kill them on a full stomach.

“Alright. What you got to eat around here then?”

xXx

Quiet voices roused me from a deep slumber; I yawned, stretching uncomfortably tight limbs on the hard bench, as the conversation drifted to my ears. A band of pressure throbbed around my chest, warning against moving too quickly.

“Are you saying you think one of the firaxan’s could wield the Force?” Sami’s voice, quiet, but sharply incredulous.

“All I know is that a large entity attacked Bastila with the Force – and quite probably caused her current condition. I felt it. It had some sort of control, or authority, over the firaxan swarm,” Juhani’s soft voice replied.

I couldn’t stop the snort of derision that ripped from my lungs as I slowly sat, leaning back against the wall. The Cathar’s startled gaze landed on me in surprise. “And it didn’t occur to you that it might have been a Dark Jedi?” I interrupted, sarcasm audibly dripping from my voice. “You’d rather attribute Force powers to a fish?”

Juhani’s patience was admirable; she didn’t appear remotely offended. “It was a completely foreign power, Canderous. Primitive, and yet immensely powerful. It was not wielding the Force the way I, or any Jedi or Sith, know how to. Combine that with the presence of a shark vastly larger than any we have encountered before, and I believe it to be the only logical explanation.”

I laughed, shaking my head in disbelief. My neck felt irritatingly weak, and I could feel muscles creaking in painful objection. “Initiate a few sharks into the Order, and you’ll have the upper hand over the Sith in no time,” I drawled derisively.

A flash of impatience sparked through Juhani’s expression at last, but it was the frowning human who replied. “Actually, we have no idea why the Selkath researchers stationed here went insane. They seemed to lose all grasp of reality, and let’s not forget that Selkath have evolved from aquatic vertebrates…”

“You believe this power may have had an affect on them as well as the firaxans?” Juhani replied quietly, a note of curiosity sparking in her voice.

Sami shrugged. “We haven’t come up with any plausible explanation. And…” the scientist trailed off, deep furrows lining her forehead. “I believe the Selkath’s god is a large shark of some type. I wonder….”

I stopped for a moment, mulling the facts over in my head. A big shark had been spotted, supposedly using the Force. The other sharks had gone crazy. The Selkath are related to the sharks. The Selkath had all gone crazy.

Well, this all leads to one irrefutable conclusion.

“You’re both nuts,” I said bluntly, rolling my eyes. I could believe this tripe from the scientist, but Juhani’s input convinced me: the Jedi were a pack of rambling fools, whose common sense had long melted into space dust. Impatient, I glanced around the room, noting Kono’s sleeping figure on a bench near Bastila. “Enough of this useless conversation. How long have I been out? How’s Bastila?”

Sami scowled darkly at me, and even the Cathar was frowning in irritation. I raised my eyebrows sardonically at the both of them, until Juhani finally sighed in capitulation. “About eight hours. I have just woken myself. Bastila came to a few hours ago, and Sami tended to her.”

“She was unintelligible,” Sami replied curtly. “I don’t think she roused as much as her vocal chords spasmed. But at least-”

A piercing beep from a cluster of consoles cut through her spiel, and Sami quickly jumped to her feet.

“What is it?” Juhani asked in alarm as the woman strode towards the machines.

“I don’t believe it,” Sami muttered, tapping a few keys quickly. “Juhani, wake Kono!”

“What?” I ground out.

Sami turned back to face us, and her look of sheer amazement told me the news was good. “There’s a ship approaching.” A disbelieving grin lit the young woman’s face. “We’re saved!”

xXx

The trip back topside was annoyingly long, no matter how gratifying it was to be leaving that cursed Base. Our rescuers were, in fact, a squad of Selkath arriving in a ship much larger than the puny Republic submersibles, and their presence at Hrakert Station had been enough to send the older scientist into fits of fear.
Kono’s distress signal had worked, despite my own misgivings, but it had been the Selkath who had intercepted the message. While a small group of Republic soldiers had also made the trip down, it was obvious who was in charge. The uniformed fish had been interrogating the two scientists since we departed, and each probing question had left the pair of them looking more and more sickeningly uncomfortable.

I couldn’t help a snort of amused derision; the Republic had made this mess with their secret base, and now it was time to pay the price.

Even the Cathar had gone in for her fair share of questioning, but they’d mostly left me alone after a few non committal grunts and vacant stares in their direction. Sometimes it paid to act as stupid as most people assumed mercenaries were.

Now that Bastila was hooked into a partial bacta tank and declared medically stable, if not yet conscious, my own worry had ceased. The princess would recover; it was past time for me to make my own plans. As much as I owed Bastila, I didn’t relish the idea of following her any longer, nor did I particularly believe my skills would be desired.

I disliked being idle, and sitting for hours accompanied by suspicious Selkath and uptight Republic grunts wasn’t doing much for my temper. Or my thoughts, which, now that I was unoccupied, were trailing back to that explosive revelation of hours ago.

Revan. Or, more accurately, Jen Sahara. She wasn’t who she’d once been, the renegade Jedi who’d triumphed over the best of my kind. How much of Revan was left? I’d wager my last credits she didn’t know her true identity, but her craziness and battle-skill convinced me that some part remained.

If she hadn’t scuttled our ship and done a runner, I would’ve followed her. I was going to anyway, before I even knew who she was. Trouble sticks to her like flies on a bantha’s arse, and my life has been just a bit too dull lately. The last few years had gone against the grain, scraping around for mercenary work from the likes of Davik Kang, a small-time Exchange thug with delusions of political importance.

Even without our interference, his ingratiating manner and tendency to renege on trade agreements meant his time had been coming to a close, and I’d jumped at the chance to leave Taris. Jen Sahara had piqued my curiosity. Despite being drawn into a secret Jedi mission – or maybe because of it – I’d felt the complacency and idle restlessness that had dogged me for the past year start to dissipate. I’d thought that maybe, I might finally find something really worth fighting for again.

Waste of time thinking about this, Ordo. The crazy chit’s gone, and you’d better start worrying about your own future. All I was left with was a faint admiration for the Revan of old, and a desire to pay her back for blowing up the Ebon Hawk while I still on board.

I felt the transport ship start to decelerate, just as a hissing voice informed us of our impending arrival. We were surfacing in the Ahto City harbour, where we would be transferred into a submersible headed directly to the Republic Embassy. I wondered idly if the Selkath were planning to question us further, and just how difficult it would be to slip away, and off this planet. Mercenary work wasn’t exactly flourishing on Manaan.

Minutes later, and the ship was docked. Medical personnel had already boarded and began clustering around Bastila. I shot the Cathar a quick look; she jerked her head towards them, indicating she would try to stay with the Jedi.

I wasn’t needed anymore, and maybe it was time to leave. Take the cue from the Twi’lek brat, and... disappear. This party’s getting old at any rate. But first, I had to escape from this political nightmare.

It wasn’t possible in the intervening minutes. I, along with the two scientists, were efficiently herded towards a small submersible. The Republic soldiers had already dispersed; instead, four Selkath guards were escorting us back to the Embassy.

The Republic’s really screwed themselves here, I thought with grim amusement. Since when do armoured Selkath “escort” Republic researchers? All things considered, maybe it wasn’t that surprising. I was still impressed that the Republic actually had the balls to mine kolto right under the Selkaths’ nose.

It didn’t take long to reach the Embassy, and I was quick to unbuckle myself and exit into the docking station of the building. The first man I recognized was the aging Republic Commander; he looked taken aback as I stepped away from the transport, throwing a faint smirk his way and vaguely scanning the room. Damn, but it feels good to be topside again. My experience over the last day left me less than keen to travel underwater anytime soon. And to think I’d just been bagging Juhani for such reluctance.

Uniformed Selkath lined the docking room, making clear their hefty military presence wasn’t to be ignored. And the expression on Wann’s face couldn’t be called anything other than pissed.

I strode purposefully towards the exit, hoping cocky confidence would see me out but utterly unsurprised when a Selkath guard stopped me, informing me in broken Basic that the Embassy was blockaded until further notice. I nodded impatiently and moved away. I disliked being confined to the Embassy, but I wasn’t about to defy the Selkath – not since they’d already taken my blaster away.

Against an army of Selkath, there wasn’t much I could do but wait it out. They weren’t, however, likely to hold a paid mercenary here for long. Right, Ordo, if now ain’t the time for a drink, then I dunno when is. The Embassy’s mess hall – which had better damn well serve drinks – was back through the main antechamber. A huddle of Republic soldiers cloistered near the room’s centre, looking tired, outnumbered, and defeated. I wondered briefly how long the Selkath had been assuming control. I’d wager two minutes after finding out about the kolto base.

My gaze sharpened as I recognized Onasi, gingerly rubbing his shoulder. I glanced back at the other Republic grunts, and suddenly various injuries came to light; bruises, bandages, one man could barely stand up straight – did they actually fight the kriffing Selkath? That would’ve been suicide, in Ahto City.

I frowned, and walked closer. “Onasi,” I nodded at him. “Looks like you’ve had a bit of fun.”

The other man scowled, and somehow I doubted we’d ever see to eye to eye. His idea of fun probably consisted of reading the military archives while sipping barli tea.

“Ordo,” he muttered. “I see you didn’t drown. Where’s Bastila and Juhani?”

“With the medics, still on their way here. Bastila’s not faring so well, but they say she’s stable.” My gaze travelled over him; the Republic pilot stood awkwardly, as if in pain, and patches of dried blood discoloured his tattered clothes. But what caught my attention were the black lines tracing up his neck. I’d seen those before.

“What the kriff happened here, Onasi?” I frowned at him as he closed his eyes briefly.
“Dark Jedi,” he replied in a dark voice. “Ten of them infiltrated this place, looking for Bastila.”

My brows shot up in surprise. “I guess old Malak wants her pretty bad then, huh? Ten of them...” I whistled. “You’re lucky to be standing. That’s a fair army, when it comes to Force users.” I’d seen Jedi, light and dark, fight together before. Ten of them was a lot.

“I know.” His voice was low, his expression tight. “If Jen hadn’t...” he cut himself off, shaking his head in irritation.

“Jen?” I snapped as my attention was sharply wrested back. “She’s here?”

Carth sighed, an exasperated blast of air expelling from his lungs. “Last I saw, she was traipsing back to the bar to get drunk. Why don’t you join her?” he muttered, and stalked off towards Wann.

_Revan’s back._ I could feel the corners of my mouth turn up in expectation. Suddenly, I wasn’t quite so sure about leaving. Not until after I’d spoken with her, at any rate.

    xXx

Surrounded by empty glasses, I found her face planted onto a table. A messy tumble of dark curls proclaimed her identity, and as I strode closer she stirred, slowly raising her head to focus bleary eyes on me.

She squinted, and a vague grin of recognition grew on her face.

“Hey!” she called in greeting, stumbling to her feet. One hand shot out to lean on the cracked plasteel table, which wobbled alarmingly. I could feel myself smirking. _Damn, but she’s completely rat-faced._ “Candy! You’re back!” she gushed, in a semi-slurred voice.

I snorted in amusement. _It’s good to see her, but there’s no way she doesn’t deserve what’s coming to her._ I was unable to quell a wry half-grin as I looked her straight in the eyes. “This is for blowing up the Ebon Hawk while I was still on it,” I said softly. She frowned in drunken confusion, her gaze focused so intently on my face that she completely failed to spot my fist until it crashed into her face.

Revan gave a little scream as she crumpled to the floor. I loosed a bark of laughter, and turned on my heel with one parting shot:

“And don’t call me Candy.”

    xXx
Hyperspace: IV [Roland Wann, Juhani, Lars Thorstan, Kylah Aramai, Zaalbar, Spymaster Gaalin, Jen Sahara, Bastila Shan]

Roland Wann

This was, perhaps, the ultimate failure of my career. The Republic Embassy was on the cusp of being recalled entirely from Manaan, and any sentient on the street knew what that meant. No more kolto.

I could feel the disgust frowning its way onto my face. Those blasted Selkath and their alien ideals of peace! There could be no peace with those Sith bastards lurking around in the galaxy, but the Selkath turned a blind eye to full-scale murder and destruction when it wasn’t in their backyard. Frankly, I was all for leaving the Selkath to themselves, if it wasn’t for their thrice-damned kolto. Nowhere else in galaxy was there such a large, readily accessible source.

My career was done for if we were shut down. Oh, I’d be given my due; a redundancy package and a run-down condo on the lower terraces of Galactic City. The Republic thanks you for your many years of service, and wishes you a peaceful retirement. But their eyes would say different, the bureaucrats who would damn me to a life of nothingness. It’s your fault, Wann, yours alone for losing us the kolto. For letting the Selkath find out about our secret Base, and letting the Sith invade the Embassy.

If it hadn’t been for those frelling Jedi--!

Real fear had wormed itself deep into my gut during the Sith invasion, and even now – even now, when the enemy was vanquished – I could still feel it, sitting there like a black miasma of vertigo whenever I closed my eyes. A small, cowardly part of me actually desired the quiet, uneventful redundancy.

I’d hated the Sith as much as any Republic man did, but I’d never had to face them. I hadn’t wanted to – I knew my own strengths, and they weren’t in battle. Manaan was a neutral, peaceful station, and it suited me.

But the Jedi were still here; that strange, quiet cat-girl, the obnoxious human who had come in with Carth, Karon’s little Twi’lek apprentice, and the stuck-up Bastila Shan - comatose in one of our bacta tanks. I was sad Karon had died, but I’d lost dozens of men in the assault – and they would all still be alive if the Jedi hadn’t come here, flaunting their powers in front of the Sith. I had requested the aid of one master – one! – to investigate Hrakert Station, and ended up with a bleeding squad of apprentices. No wonder the Dark Jedi attacked, they probably couldn’t resist the temptation.

And they are still here. What if the Sith strike again? The Selkath can’t stop them; they’ll just arrest any survivors and blame us once again for provoking an attack!

A beep from my private console dispersed my unwelcome thoughts and, with a grunt, I leaned forward to accept the incoming message. I was in my private quarters; whoever would be contacting me here was bound to be important.
A hologram of General Adashan materialized; I had briefed him mere hours ago, and was surprised to hear from him yet again.

“Commander,” he greeted in slurring Basic. A Mon Calamari, and as straight and uptight as the rest of his species.

“Sir,” I replied, bowing deferentially. It paid to show respect to one’s betters, no matter whether they deserved it. “Has the lockdown been lifted?”

He shook his head solemnly. “No, the Selkath still refuse to allow any Republic ships to land or leave Manaan airspace. I am afraid you are on your own until the Selkath resolve this in their courts.”

Great, we’ll end up stuck with naught but a useless Selkath arbiter to argue the case for the Republic. Of course, agreements were being made behind the scenes, I had no doubt about that. External communications were probably buzzing with concessions and bribes and promises between the Selkath government and Senate officials. Meanwhile, I was quarantined in the Base, while my scientists had been taken into custody. The Embassy was still locked down – I’d been formally requested to stay put.

I grimaced. “What can I do for you, General?”

The black eyes of the Mon Calamari stared at me unblinkingly. “There is more than just our kolto supply at risk here, Commander. I need you to – promptly - escort the crew of the Ebon Hawk off Manaan.”

I stared as surprise assailed me. “I beg your pardon?” I spluttered, unable to contain my surprise. “You want me to what?”

“Get them off this planet, Commander, before they all get embroiled in this messy court case. This could drag on for months, and they are on a critical mission for the good of the Republic. While stationed here, Jedi Bastila Shan is too easy – and too tempting - a target.”

I could feel the burn of righteous outrage in my chest. Those Jedi had fuelled the situation here, and now they would get a free ride out? “General, I must protest! The Selkath have forbidden any Republic military or civilians to leave this planet, and their ship is impounded! If I aid them in leaving, it will only make our situation in the courts worse!” Not to mention that if I have to go through this damn farce of a quarantine, then so should they!

Adashan’s gaze seemed to bore into me. “Technically, Commander, they are employees of the Jedi Order at this time – even Captain Onasi. The Selkath have not yet placed an embargo on Jedi leaving, and it would be wise for them to disappear while they still can. The Sith Embassy is likely to be shut down and their share of the kolto supply cut off. They will sacrifice nothing should they attack again. We cannot lose Jedi Shan, Commander!”

Despite my mounting irritation, I could grudgingly see that the General made sense. After all, hadn’t I just been musing that it would be better for all concerned if those darned Jedi were off Manaan? But I highly doubted this missive originated from the Republic. Yes, the Jedi Order was useful, and their influence and power couldn’t be ignored. But I hated when they played the politics game within the ranks of the Fleet. Sometimes, I had the distinct feeling they merely saw us as pieces on a dejarik board.

“Whose orders are these, General?” I questioned, still irritated.
The Mon Calamari stared at me, his bulbous eyes bright and piercing. “Yours, Commander. Get to it at once.” He nodded sharply in farewell, and his visage dissipated from the screen. I released the scowl I’d been holding back, and leaned forward to flick on the internal comm.

“Corporal, get Onasi and any of those Jedi in here on the double. And that damn mercenary!”

With that barked order, I turned to my information console and started to see what I could do about the currently impounded Ebon Hawk.

---

Juhani

“Psychic exhaustion,” the Republic medic murmured next to me. “She is already healing, although I imagine she will be out of action for several weeks. I’ve seen the effects of Force attacks like this before, but never so severe.”

I nodded solemnly, staring at the prone Jedi as she floated in the bacta tank. The medic was a greying Bothan; competent, and quietly efficient. He cleared his throat to speak again, and this time I turned to look at him.

“We will move her out of the tank in an hour,” he continued in an apologetic tone. “Unfortunately we have other critical patients, and Jedi Shan is no longer in grave danger.”

“But surely the bacta tank will aid her recovery?” I replied, concerned at such an expeditious medical plan.

The man shrugged dismissively. “It is a device for force-feeding nutrients into the body, and accelerating the healing of physical injuries. The only help it will give her is increased rest, and she can do that in a bed, albeit slower.”

The door behind the medic swished open, and I swallowed back my reply as I recognized the visitor.

“Carth,” I said warmly, stepping forward to meet him. He looked awful; I could make no bones about that. Even for a human he looked sickly and exhausted, deep hollows under his eyes, and dirt and blood etched into his face. A faded webbing of black lines crept up his neck, and I knew he’d faced trials as harsh as ours had been.

“Juhani,” he replied in welcome, his eyes flicking over to rest on the bacta tank. “I came as soon as I heard you were here. How is she?”

“Jedi Shan is recovering well,” the medic answered for me. “No permanent mental trauma, but don’t expect her to be up and about anytime soon. She requires undisturbed rest for the next few weeks. She will sleep a lot, so be prepared.”

“I heard what happened,” I said quietly. “It is good to see you alive and well.”

“More or less,” he muttered, shoving his hands into his pockets. “I’m glad you made it back topside. But I don’t know how long we’ll be kept in the Embassy.” His gaze searched the room, a deep frown furrowing into his forehead. The medic had informed me earlier of the attack, and I suspected Carth had been in the thick of it. That the Republic soldiers had been able to withstand such an assault from so many Dark Jedi, even with the aid of Master Karon, impressed me.

Speaking of whom-

“I haven’t seen Master Karon about, Carth. Do you know where she is?”

He flinched at the name, and a dark spike of dread stabbed deep inside me. No, it cannot be!

“I’m sorry, Juhani,” he muttered, dark eyes moving back to hold mine solemnly. “She didn’t survive the assault.”

“No,” I whispered through numb lips, shaking my head. I was vaguely aware of the medic stepping away to give us some modicum of privacy. “How- how could that happen?”

Dismay and grief swelled within and burst, and I stumbled backwards, noting almost absently that my vision was now blurry. Karon, whose wise words and gentle spirit had given me hope once more, since Revan had left and taken what I’d thought was my only salvation. How was I to face the Jedi Order, now that Karon was gone? Would they all be as accepting as her? Would Quatra? Carth’s head was bowed, and I stared at him dumbly. “I do not understand,” I pleaded desperately. “How could she fall, when the soldiers survived? How?”

I heard the human breathe in deeply before answering. “We had many losses, Juhani. But the truth of the matter is, even with Karon’s help we were overwhelmed. If Jen had arrived a few minutes earlier...”

Shock slammed a wall of ice into me as I gasped. “Jen?” I cried. “She- she’s back? Here?”

Carth closed his eyes. “Why does that woman elicit such a reaction? First Canderous, now you... next I’ll see Bastila hopping out of the tank and dancing a jerryjig.”

I did not know what to feel. That Revan was back... but why? Did she regret her actions, and come to make amends? Was Carth implying that if not for Revan, they would all now be one with the Force? “Where is she, Carth?”

“Captain Onasi,” a voice cut into our conversation, a young Republic soldier who was entering the room. He nodded at me briefly. “Commander Wann requests your presence immediately and that of any Jedi with you.”

I raised my head to see Carth looking at me, a frown of puzzlement lining his forehead. “I can’t think why he’d want to see you. You, uh, okay to come now?”

A frantic feeling, something like hope, was clawing at my insides. It fought with the tearing grief over Karon. I needed to see Revan first, but the young soldier was staring at us impatiently. The Commander surely won’t need me for long, and I do not wish to land Carth into any trouble. I nodded at Carth. “I’ll accompany you, and then I shall find Jen.”

xXx

Lars Thorstan

My master is dead. I should have felt devastation, bleak misery at the loss of my mentor, a Jedi I both respected and admired. I should have felt something, other than this utter numbness crawling through my veins. My master is dead.

"-leave at once," the Republic Commander was demanding angrily of the Cathar Jedi who looked taken aback, ears flat against her head. I didn’t even think she was a fully fledged knight. “All you Jedi lot do is cause trouble – that Bastila in particular!”

I didn’t understand why I’d been summoned here. Everything had been a daze and the Selkath wouldn’t let me leave – all I wanted was to run back to Karon’s ship. She’s dead, though. Dead.

How had I survived the bloodbath, when Master Karon had not?

“How do you expect us to leave, Commander? Our ship’s both damaged and impounded. The Embassy’s blockaded. The Selkath aren’t really in the mood to listen to the Republic right now.”

This came from the other Republic officer in the room, Captain Carth Onasi, whose clothes were shredded and splattered with blood. Unlike the Commander, he’d joined in the fighting.

“Apparently, that’s been sorted,” Commander Wann snarled, and then turned to gesture at me and the other Jedi. “The Jedi don’t have any restrictions on them yet. “

He unceremoniously threw a datapad onto the table, and Carth stepped forward to retrieve it. I saw the Cathar Juhani edge closer to read over his shoulder. Her catlike eyes remained impassive, but the Captain’s widened with disbelief. “This is from the Jedi Council,” Carth said. “They’re sending us to Kashyyyk?”

The one named Juhani bit back a gasp but Carth Onasi heard it, turning to face her. “That makes sense to you?”

“I- yes,” she said softly. Her eyes gleamed yellow. “If this is an opportunity to leave, I believe we should take it – if it were not for Bastila’s condition.”

I shouldn’t be here. I don’t know these people. I took a quiet step closer to the exit, only to scramble backwards as it opened to admit a large warrior who strode in like he owned the place.

“This had better be good,” he grunted, flicking a disinterested glance towards Commander Wann. I recognized him - he was the Mandalorian mercenary who’d travelled with the other Jedi. “I have three drinks lined up, and I wasn’t quite finished teaching someone a lesson.”

He barked a laugh. “She’s fine. Incapacitated, but that’s mostly her own doing. Although I will admit she ain’t gonna look pretty for a few days.”

“Look,” Captain Onasi cut in, leaning forward over the central table to stare intently at Commander Wann. “This might get us out of the Embassy on a technicality, but there’s still the matter of the Ebon Hawk.”

“That won’t be a problem,” Commander Wann muttered angrily. “Your Jedi have friends in high places. A team of mechanics have been working on the damage for days; stang, they’ve even stripped two Republic freighters for replacement parts. As for the case, the Republic’s assigned their best arbiters onto it and managed to push it forward for tomorrow morning. The Sith Embassy’s been shut down. I highly doubt they’ll even realize they have to send a representative to squabble over your precious ship.” His voice was rising in tempo with each word; by the end, his jowls were quivering with banked anger. “Looks like you lot get a free ride out of here, while the rest of us stay behind to tidy up this mess.”

He was glaring resentfully at us all, myself included. It was becoming obvious Commander Wann thought I was one of them, much to my growing unease. I need to leave. Go back to the Enclave on Coruscant. Danger and destiny clung to them all – even the non-Force sensitives – like an oppressive cloak, and I wanted no part of it. Master. Why did you have to leave me here?

The mercenary shrugged. “Well, this kolto mess is entirely the Republic’s fault. You don’t have any right to whinge that it blew up in your face.”

I could see the Commander’s face mottling an ugly red as he looked the larger man up and down. I edged back towards the door again as the Republic officer seemed to think better of starting a fight he’d undoubtedly lose.

“Jenkins! Dalora!” he snapped, gesturing towards two young soldiers stationed at the rear of the room. “Escort the crew of the Ebon Hawk to the Embassy’s exit. They will be residing in their ship until they have clearance to leave Manaan.”

Even I could see that the green Republic grunts were uncomfortable. One shuffled his feet, refusing eye contact, while the other took a tentative step forward. Canderous bared his teeth in a feral grin. He’s the unarmed one, though.

“But- Bastila is not well-” the Cathar protested quietly, before Commander Wann interrupted her.

“I’ll have her transferred this afternoon. Just get out of my embassy!”

In a whirlwind of activity, I dazedly found myself outside the opulent building between a group of Selkath guards and the crew of the Ebon Hawk. The mercenary Canderous disappeared briefly, before returning with a groaning human woman slung over his shoulder. She reeked like a cantina’s opening night. Captain Onasi shook his head in weary despair as Canderous reappeared, and I wondered who the dishevelled human was. Surprisingly, the Selkath had let her, as well as the rest of us, past without anything more than a cursory once over. The Republic soldiers escorting us, on the other hand, had been clinically turned back.

I don’t think anyone’s realized I’m tagging along. Everything had been numb since the battle. I’d barely had time to breathe. The shuttle. I can get to Master Karon’s shuttle now, and leave. No one will notice.

I’d always been quiet, overlooked. I spotted the Cathar brushing back the hair on the drunk woman’s face, murmuring something quietly before the mercenary took off at a brisk walk.

I stepped to the side. There was an alley between the Embassy’s eastern wall and the neighbouring commercial sector that screamed refuge, peace, safety from these dangerous vigilantes. Before I knew it, I was running.

As I turned the corner, I thought I heard the Captain exclaim in surprise, and the Cathar call out, “Wait! Was that Master Karon’s apprentice?”

xXx

Kylah Aramai

Think, Kylah, think! I desperately required a plan. Stars twinkled through the cockpit window as the shuttle eased towards Rii’shn. I’d escaped Manaan so far, but evading my master wouldn’t be so easy.
A shudder trembled through me and I had to focus on slowing my traitorous heart. I’d almost had the real prize, even better than bratty Shan, but then sheer, shattering power erupted from her-

Revan might be a broken shell, but I’d underestimated her. And whatever the precious Order had done to her was close to disintegrating her mind. And wouldn’t that be a sight to see. Oh, how sweet it would have been to truss her up and deliver her to Malak!

But I had nothing. And cold tendrils of icy fear were creeping insidiously through my mind. Rage. Pain. Not fear! I dug my nails deep into my hands as a focus, deep enough to draw blood. I will not be weak. I will find a way out of this!

I needed a plan. Malak enjoyed me, but he wouldn’t hesitate to kill me – slowly – for my failure to capture Bastila. And if he ever learned I’d had Revan in my grasp then I’d be better off jumping into a sarlacc pit. I couldn’t go back to him just yet. If I wanted to displace Bandon – and I would, one day, by the stars – then I’d have to show Malak how worthy I was.

I need a place to regroup. Away from Malak. A place to strengthen my grasp on the Dark Side, and figure out my next move.

Korriban. The idea hit with shattering clarity. What better sanctuary for a Dark Jedi than a Sith Academy? I’d never visited there but I’d heard Bandon brag enough times about beating up on the little dark younglings. He always did enjoy pulling legs off insects. And surely, Malak would be otherwise engaged with the GenoHaradan’s machinations, and Bandon’s mission to Kashyyyk, to think of looking for me on Korriban-

Well. I had four hours before I landed on Rii’shn; from there, I could acquire more appropriate transport. To Korriban it is. Surely I can make myself scarce. Once there, I’ll devise a plan to capture that snooty Padawan. Revan, on the other hand, I might just avoid.

At least I’d sorted out Karon Enova.

My eyes closed, and I could feel my lips stretch in a bloodless smile. At least there was that.

xXx

Zaalbar

The shine of the pit lane holoscreen bit accusingly into my vision; I could see the two swoop bikes were neck and neck as they coasted over the choppy Manaan waters. How could I let her do this? That other rider almost knocked her off a second ago!

But Mission rarely listened to me, and refused to be swayed by common sense. She’d acquired a few wins, enough to glean the interest of the mercenary backers who ran this dangerous sport. After yesterday’s no show – all races had been cancelled – Mission was all the more hungry to risk her life once again.

What was I thinking? She is as eager as a pup and twice as blind to the danger. The determination to carry her bodily away from this place grew; she might rail against me for it, but it was in her best interests. I did not believe I would cope with the guilt if something happened to her.

The two bikes split away from each other and simultaneously crested separate jumps. I wasn’t sure which one housed Mission anymore, and apprehension kicked in my gut. The crowd watching the screen gasped as one bike sailed into the air, landing sideways into the water and spinning, before righting itself and accelerating after the other.

Let Mission be safe, I prayed silently. And- and let her not win. It seemed a betrayal, hoping for that, but the Sector Champion had challenged the winner of this bout, and he was reputed to be both corrupt and treacherous on the track.

I could feel a growl starting in my throat. He was a Gamorrean, and there was something rabid about that species; all they cared for was corruption and greed and-“Zaalbar,” a quiet voice spoke behind me, barely audible over the hum of the swoop fans.

I turned, my bleak thoughts splintering into non-existence as I recognized the human female addressing me.

“(Jen!)” I cried, relief and hope and anger all at once rising to the surface. I could hear Mission’s bucket droid beeping in welcome next to me. “(You're back!)”

I took an involuntary step forward as if to embrace her, and then remembered exactly how she left. She sighed heavily, her eyes dropping closed.

“I- I came to talk to you both. To apologise.”

I looked at Jen Sahara in silence; she was staring down, shoulders hunched in what seemed to be shame. That she regretted her actions I had no doubt, but the potential consequences of what she had done were hard to swallow. I took some time to think over an appropriate response.

“(I have never understood this concept of apology),” I said finally. “(In my culture, it is our actions that show what we feel, not our words).”

At that, her head jerked back up, green eyes flashing with something akin to determination. She pursed her lips. “I respect that Zaalbar, and you’re right – but still. I also need to say the words.”

“The winner is the Flying Starcream!” a synthesized voice cut through the air. “With a respectable time of 121.43 seconds, beating Bek from Taris by a slim 0.85 seconds!”

“(Mission. She lost).” I was both gratified and surprised to hear her winning streak come to an end. I had already been approached by two agents wanting to sign Mission onto their books. If Mission knew that I had scared them off, I did not think I believe I would hear the end of it.

And what now, that Jen Sahara has returned? Where will fate lead us now?

I glanced sideways at her, for the first time noticing just how awful she looked, even for a human. Dark purple blossomed over a puffy eye and swollen cheekbone, and her clothes were crusted with blood. My nose wrinkled. She smelt like stale alcohol and death.

Jen Sahara was nothing if not observant; noticing my appraisal, she looked down at herself and sighed. “I may have had too many drinks yesterday. I would have freshened up first in the ‘Hawk, but Carth refused to wait. He said he tried to find you yesterday after we left the Embassy…” she trailed off, looking behind her into the mechanic’s bay. I followed her gaze and located Carth Onasi, arms folded, leaning casually against the pit wall with an intense gaze focused solely on us. On Jen.

“(There was no swoop racing yesterday),” I explained. It had been scheduled, but an attack at one of the embassies shut down the entertainment quadrant. It puzzled me greatly; I had thought Manaan had little overt violence.
A high whine of a swoop engine thrummed closer; the swoops were coming in. I spotted Mission’s purple and green machine, remarkably unharmed, glide into the landing bay. My young cub must have seen Carth, for she launched herself recklessly off the swoop and ran towards him, away from us. I hastened to follow, assuming Jen would do the same.

“Carth!” I heard Mission call out in excitement, and the Republic officer soon had his arms full of exuberant Twi’lek. She had always been effusive with her affection, but I hadn’t realized she’d thought so much of the human Captain. Judging by the surprise on his face, neither had he.

“Mission, I, uh, it’s good to see you.” His arms hesitantly returned her embrace. “I wish you hadn’t left. We’ve come to see if you want to join us again.”

Mission took a jerky step back before unclasping her modified helmet and dropping it gracelessly to the ground. I groaned as it landed with a sharp thunk, and stepped forward to retrieve it. Mission did not look after her equipment well.

“Uh uh,” she shook her head, eyes pinching in annoyance. “No way. I mean, it’s great to see you an’ all, but I sure ain’t gonna stick around after the way Jen left.”

Carth coughed uncomfortably, and looked over to us. “Yeah. Jen. About that-“ “Mission.” Jen’s voice, quiet but resolute, came from behind me. Mission whirled around, paling in surprise. Her lekku wrapped defensively around her neck. I wanted to rail at Jen Sahara for hurting Mission this way. My young friend had not yet reconciled to the true character of her sibling, and nightmares of Taris still haunted her sleep. Jen’s betrayal had cut deep, being so wholly unexpected.

“I can’t believe this!” Mission spat out at last. Her face flushed a dark purple, her eyes flashed darker still. “You’ve got some gall, coming back here after what you did! What sort of coreslime space tramp does that to her friends? You could have killed us!”

Jen’s voice was low and deadly serious as she answered. “It was wrong of me – more than wrong – but HK was certain he could disable the ship without loss of life.”

“You blew up our ship! While we were on it!” Mission railed on, and to my dismay I saw her eyes fill with angry tears. I stepped forward to lay a comforting hand on my young friend, and felt her shake underneath me. “There ain’t no way you coulda known we would be okay!”

Carth Onasi looked worriedly around, and I noticed we were attracting attention from the humanoid mechanics. I had taken to waiting for Mission in the pit lane, but it was not a private place by any means.

“I’m sorry,” Jen said simply. “If I could take it back now, I would. But at the time, all I knew was that I needed to escape. To leave before we landed.”

It was sincere and heartfelt, but I could not understand the logic behind it. To take such risks with the lives of others was not the act of the honourable warrior I had thought she was. Mission seemed to agree, for she sighed brokenly and leaned against me, burying her face against my chest.

Her next words were muffled. “Y’think we would have stood in your way, if you wanted to leave? Sheesh, Jen, you think we could have stood in your way?”

“Bastila could have, and would. And I- I was afraid.” Jen’s eyes had fallen closed, and I could see her fists clenched tight against her side. Her face looked worse without the sharp contrast of her eyes; mottled swelling left a patchwork of bruises along the left side of her face. “That transmission you found on the Ebon Hawk, the night before we reached Manaan. It was about me.”

“What transmission?” Carth cut in, frowning.

“We found a message Bastila sent, a plea for help from that Jedi Master who turned up,” Mission answered, before turning back to Jen. “But you said it was about Juhani.”

Jen tilted her head, looking at Mission once more. “I was dissembling. I mean, the Order will be overjoyed she’s denounced the Dark Side, but that’s not why Bastila sent the message. It’s got to do with me, and this damn secret mission they sent us on. I’d only agreed to go to Manaan because she vowed there were no masters here.”

“And then she sent for one,” Mission said slowly.

“Yeah.” Jen sighed heavily. “Not that I blame her, now.”

“You shouldn’t,” Carth snapped. “For all Bastila’s experience and power, she’s still a Padawan. And you- you’re- you’re a- blast it, I don’t even know what you are, Jen, but sending you to the Jedi Masters is the smartest thing Bastila’s done since she boarded the Endar Spire.”

“(Maybe we should talk elsewhere),” I interrupted uncomfortably. The swoop rider Mission had competed against was eavesdropping openly, and the two mechanics working on his bike were suspiciously frozen. “(This is not a good place for this sort of conversation).”

Mission followed my gaze and scowled angrily at the racer.

“What are you staring at, chuba-face?” she snapped.

The Rodian threw his hands up in tacit surrender and turned away, but I saw his ears twitch. “(We should leave this place,)” I added.

Jen was nodding brusquely in agreement. “Zaalbar’s right. The crew’s back on the Ebon Hawk, and I- I guess I need to talk to everyone before we leave.”

“Leave?” Mission asked.

“We’re getting out of Manaan while we still can,” Carth explained. “The Selkath have stopped all Republic and Sith traffic, but Wann’s got us out on a technicality. I don’t think the credit rests solely with him, but he believes we’ll have clearance to leave in a few hours.”

Mission folded her arms, a recalcitrant look on her face. “I’ll hear what y’all have to say. Doesn’t mean I’ll go with you though.” She looked over at Carth, and nudged him. “Did ya see me race though?”

I missed the Republic pilot’s reply as Jen turned in my direction, staring at me solemnly. I had to stay with Jen, I had no choice. And despite Mission’s belligerence, I knew my young friend wanted to forgive her. So do I.

Carth and Mission started meandering through the pit lane, and the mechanics who had been covertly observing us resumed normal activity. Jen and I followed behind. The swoop racer with the foolish Starscream name glanced over his shoulder at us again; I stared at him pointedly until he turned away. He could have given Mission more space on the track, and I would have liked to tell him so.
“I’d release you from the life-debt, if I could,” Jen was muttering. “I think it would be safer here for you and Mission, but Carth has some borked idea that’d be leaving her to the mercy of the streets.” Her eyes slid back to me. “He underestimates you, I think.”

“(You dishonour my life-debt by leaving without me. I had thought you understood, Jen Sahara).” If she had, she would not have run.

The human did not reply, and I had no more words to say. She would leave, and I would follow, and help her act with greater honour than she had thus far. I swear it.

xXx

Spymaster Gaalin

I perused through the report again, still disbelieving, still shaking my head in refusal to accept the facts. The agent who’d handed me the encrypted datapad had gulped and scarpered – obviously he’d had some inkling to its contents, I must look into that later – and now I knew why.

Eridius was going to be pissed.

Twenty-three agents had been dispatched to lay a trap that should have destroyed some of the most powerful Jedi in the galaxy, and this nobody Force-sensitive not only survived, but slaughtered the lot of them.

Including our only two Dashade agents. I winced irritably. It had taken years to locate and recruit those Force-resistant agents; it would not be an easy task to replace them.

How had this happened? The ambush had been a hurried affair; Hulas had been taken by surprise with the arrival of Jen Sahara and her immediate demands to leave Manaan. He worried that we wouldn't easily have another chance to eliminate her. Spymaster Dallas had dispatched all the nearby agents we could muster, setting it up as an Exchange ambush to cover our tracks - I'd thought the manpower overly excessive, but Dallas had been rightfully concerned over the high price the Sith had so eagerly parted with to dispose of her.

My eyes closed in dismay. Excessive. As it turns out, I was excessively wrong. What sort of Force-sensitive could slither their way out of the quagmire on Rii’shn, and then jettison back to Manaan in a stolen Exchange vessel?

Resolution soon overcame my despair; I wasn’t one to wallow in self-pity, even after disastrous mistakes. I sighed heavily, opened my eyes, and pulled the datapad back, searching through the report contents once more.

The droid aided her, I realized, reading the summary of the holo-footage before the cameras had been disabled. What an unusual combat droid. Together, the two of them created the sort of conspicuous carnage we try to avoid.

There were too many unknowns here, and it irritated me to no end. Why was Darth Malak after this incredibly dangerous and strangely unknown Force user? Prolonged use of Dark Force powers were strongly linked with insanity, and Darth Malak’s actions of late had certainly echoed that possibility. Bombing Taris, attacking Dantooine… that sort of widespread slaughter was guaranteed to turn otherwise neutral factions against the Sith. And yet the overwhelming size of the Sith armada - if recent reports were to be believed - suggested that Malak was powerful enough to start wildly attacking civilian targets without fearing repercussion. The Republic counter-attacks thus far have certainly been ineffectual.
I grunted in annoyance, leaning back in the unyielding office chair. I’d have to call in some data analysts, I realized peevishly. There were too many things I was missing lately, and the GenoHaradan had a lot to lose if the Republic did not prevail… and if they did not, there were other moves we could make to ingratiate ourselves to the Sith.

I shoved the datapad to the side of the polished poraclay table, and pressed a button on the inset communication panel.

“Send me the two best analysts onsite,” I demanded as the bored receptionist answered my call. “Ajax, if he’s available. Oh, and get them to bring their own chairs.” I disconnected the call, surveying my clinically empty office. I preferred to work in a cold, uninviting room bereft of any personal treasures; others were less likely to dawdle here, and it helped me keep focused on my work.

With determination, I forced my mind back to the issue at hand. An ambush had been the wrong way of targeting this Jen Sahara. After all, a disruptor rifle can quickly end any Jedi or Sith, provided you catch them unawares. Yet I wasn’t willing to risk any more of my agents, nor did I think Eridius would let me without further information.

I’ll open her contract up to the freelance assassins, and flag her as highly dangerous. The freelancers had autonomy of a sort within our rank, but were not as highly trained, and therefore generally less effective. There were a lot of them, though, spread throughout the galaxy. And while they clamour for the glory, I’ll work on matching Jen Sahara to another identity. There must be more to her than we’ve found so far. The droid, too, I should search for the droid.

And who knew? The freelancers might get lucky.

xXx

Jen Sahara

My head throbbed dully, my body ached, and everyone was staring at me in expectation. Mission’s lips were pursed in a mulish pout, her arms folded, and a foot tapped impatiently. Zaalbar stood still by her side, impassive.

“Where’s Bastila?” the Twi’lek demanded.

We’d entered the Ebon Hawk minutes ago, intercepting Canderous who’d been carrying in recently purchased weapons, by the looks. Juhani had rushed into the central common room when she’d heard us arrive.

“She’s in the med-bay, recuperating from injuries,” Juhani answered Mission in a soft tone. Her eyes were on me though, intense and dark with emotion that was less fury than I deserved. I’d woken on the Ebon Hawk some hours earlier, with a wicked hangover and no recollection of just how I’d left the Republic Embassy. I’d barely been able to keep up with Carth when he went running off to retrieve Mission.

“You missed out on all the fun, kid,” Canderous interjected. He was sitting by a side table, surrounded by guns and mods and tools. Feet propped up on a bench, he was the only one who looked at ease. He caught my eye and smirked. Suddenly, I thought I could guess how I’d ended up here. “Although I hear you were having fun of your own.”

“Conjecture: Jen Sahara had the most fun. I was keeping count.”

All eyes swivelled to the red droid. He’d been waiting outside the Ebon Hawk when I returned, negotiating with a uniformed Selkath. The Ebon Hawk was cleared for take-off, but before they would transmit our launch codes there was the minor matter of outstanding docking fees. HK-47 had somehow persuaded them to be waived. After all, the Selkath had docked the ship, not us.

I shivered. The droid was scarily competent, and showed more initiative that should have been possible. “HK, power down,” I ordered. I heard the Mandalorian snort.

“That droid needs to go,” Carth said flatly, entering the room. Somehow, he’d found another ghastly flight jacket to wear, lime green this time. A Republic uniform would have looked better on him. He threw a disapproving glare at Canderous’ upraised feet, before staring at me, like the others. “I’ve just received clearance for takeoff. There’s an hour wait, so that’s how long you have to convince Mission to come with us.”

I glanced back at the sulking Twi’lek girl. Convincing her is child’s play; regaining her trust is another matter.

“Look,” I said finally. “I’m sorry, and I mean it. But Zaalbar was right when he said actions are what matter, not words. And I don’t trust myself, so I sure as stars can’t expect any of you to trust me. I came back to get some answers from Bastila and her master, but I came back too late.” My words came out jumbled, rambling, and I wondered if I made sense to anyone there.

Mission snorted. “That’s what I don’t understand. Why’s Bastila hurt? Where’s that Jedi Master? And why are y’all here, instead of with the Republic?”

“There was an… incident at the Embassy involving the Sith,” Juhani said delicately.

“(No place is safe from the Sith,)” Zaalbar roared, his voice startlingly loud. Mission and Juhani both visibly jumped.

“(No, Jen Sahara, you cannot do that to me!)”

I blinked, startled. Kashyyyk? The Wookiee homeworld? The only thing more puzzling about the Jedi sending us there was Zaalbar’s reaction. He was visibly upset.

“(What?)” Zaalbar roared, his voice startlingly loud. Mission and Juhani both visibly jumped.

“(No, Jen Sahara, you cannot do that to me!)”

I blinked, startled. Kashyyyk? The Wookiee homeworld? The only thing more puzzling about the Jedi sending us there was Zaalbar’s reaction. He was visibly upset.

“So what’s the plan then? More ruin hunting?” Mission asked.

Carth tilted his head towards the Cathar. “We’re going to Kashyyyk, apparently. Juhani might be able to shed some light on the why.”

“(What?)” Zaalbar roared, his voice startlingly loud. Mission and Juhani both visibly jumped.

“(No, Jen Sahara, you cannot do that to me!)”

I blinked, startled. Kashyyyk? The Wookiee homeworld? The only thing more puzzling about the Jedi sending us there was Zaalbar’s reaction. He was visibly upset.

“Okay, why?” I demanded. “I expected Coruscant, or one of the other Core worlds – but Kashyyyk?” I hadn’t any plans beyond coming back to face Karon and Bastila. With the former dead and the latter comatose, I suddenly realized I had no idea what to do next. I’m as directionless as space junk, I thought in disgust. Sun and stars, Bastila, I can’t believe I actually desire you awake!

“Master Vrook is meeting us there. He was on his way to Manaan, I understand, but has diverted his route to meet us on Kashyyyk instead,” Juhani explained. Her gaze was unfathomable, and still fixed intently on me. “I understood from Bastila that this was one of the planets we were meant to visit from the start.”

“More Force relics to stop Darth Malak?” Carth asked.

The Cathar was nodding. “Yes. There are two more Star Maps to discover; on Kashyyyk and Korriban.”

“Star Maps? What sort of ruin is that?” Mission asked curiously.

Sweat broke out on my face, and all at once my heart pounded ferociously. Star Maps. The words meant something to me, something important. Where had I heard it before? Bastila had only ever said we were looking at ruins. She’s been so reticent with everyone. But on Tatooine, I wasn’t with her. She didn’t need me for whatever she found. She didn’t need Jen Sahara. I’d known it was a cover story, I’d known, but why was Jen Sahara in my head? Why was Darth Revan?

“That glowing thing we found on Tatooine. And at the bottom of the ocean,” Canderous grunted, shifting his feet off the bench. He was wearing his customary bored expression, but his gaze was intent. There was more to Canderous than he let on. “It must be pretty powerful for the Jedi to go to all this trouble.”

“It’s a navigational map,” I muttered through numb lips. Back on Tatooine, I’d had a vision. Street Kid found one in a krayt dragon’s cave. “It points to something.”

Someone squeezed my hands tight; I blinked, and the Cathar was crouching in front of me. “Are you okay?” she murmured softly, her gaze roving over my face. “What are you seeing, Jen Sahara?”

“Nothing,” I muttered in return. “What are these maps, Juhani? What do they point to?”

Juhani let my hands go and rocked back on her heels. “I do not know. I am not sure that Bastila does, either, but she is convinced it will aid us against Darth Malak. And so are the masters.”

Frelling fantastic. This secrecy has got to end.

“So, Kashyyyk huh?” I said finally, and looked over the others, gauging their agreement. The Wookiee was shaking his head in refusal.

“(You mentioned Korriban also,)” he interjected, almost angrily. “(We could go there instead, we may find everything your Jedi need without going to Kashyyyk.)” Zaalbar held his arms stiffly at his sides, towering over Mission as he stood in the corner of the room. He’s an exile of some sort. Why else would a Wookiee resist returning home?

“I’m not sure Korriban is a good idea, Zaalbar,” I replied slowly. “And I promised myself I wouldn’t run anymore. If a Jedi Master awaits me on Kashyyyk, then I’ll go there. It’s just—” I looked back to Juhani, frowning in puzzlement. “How do we know they’re on Kashyyyk?”

“They sent us an encrypted message through Republic channels,” Carth answered that, leaning against the lockers. The tacky jacket he wore clashed terribly against the dull durasteel. “I guess with Bastila out and the ship impounded, it was the only way to contact us.” He hadn’t stopped staring at me since I’d returned to Manaan. He was justifiably angry, but now and then his gaze would soften with something like empathy that made me want to curl up and hide in a dark corner. I can’t think about Deralia, and Jen and Revan. I don’t want to think about that.

His words sunk in and my mind raced. “Republic channels,” I said slowly, “The Sith will know our destination, then.”

“Excuse me?” Carth interjected in protest as Canderous barked a laugh.

“Come on, flyboy.” I sent him what I hoped was a quelling look. “You can encode the message all you like. People are still going to hack it if it’s come through the Republic comms.” I tapped my fingers absently against my thigh; the clothes were crusted with dirt and blood. I really needed to clean up. “No one’s going to expect us to go to Korriban first.”

“Why would we go to Korriban, when we’re expected on Kashyyyk?” Carth said flatly, a warning note entering his tone.

“I’m assuming we need to visit all the maps?” I queried Juhani; at her nod, I continued. “And Nord attacked Bastila on Tatooine. Dark Jedi went after her on Manaan. Malak must know what we’re after. If there’s Jedi enroute to Kashyyyk, surely they’ll be looking for the Map there. We could go after the other one in stealth.”

“Isn’t that a Sith planet? After all that’s happened, are you nuts?” Carth exclaimed, his voice twisting in incredulity.

“Calm down before you have kath pups,” I grinned. Carth’s eyes had widened comically; I’d forgotten how fun it was to rile the Republic officer up. Serious, Jen, I admonished myself. This is a serious discussion. “Look, all I’m saying is that maybe we should talk it through before jumping to some Jedi Master’s whim.”

“Are you sure you are not running again, Jen Sahara?” Juhani asked softly. Canderous dropped the mini-blaster he’d been modifying with an audible thud, and looked over at me measuringly. I could see he was interested in my response. I pushed back a scowl of irritation. Juhani… all of them, had more than enough reason to doubt me.

“No,” I forced out. “I know why Bastila sent for that master.” I closed my eyes. “For Master Karon. If I hadn’t run when I did, I might understand more. Regardless, I can see that I can’t avoid them. But if it’s our quest to find these sodding maps, then I think we should do Sith-infested planet first. I’d rather infiltrate when they’re not expecting me.”

“The Dark Side is strong there,” Juhani whispered. Her tawny eyes were wide and glistening. “Jen, the lure of it will always be my strongest foe. I do not believe Korriban is a wise choice… for me or you. And should this not be Bastila’s decision? She would choose Kashyyyk, I think.”

“Hey, Bastila doesn’t make my choices,” Mission interjected angrily. “And if I decide to tag along, then there ain’t no way she’s gonna boss me around!”

“Mission, let’s not all get tied up in who is leader here,” Carth admonished. “After everything that’s happened, I’d like to think we’re all in this together. But Korriban is a terrible idea. And if Bastila were awake, you know she’d be saying that!”

“We need to know more about these Maps before we can make an informed decision,” I said in my most decisive tone, and abruptly stood. “Let’s see if we can wake the princess up before we leave Manaan.”

xXx
The bridge of the flagship was deserted and dark bar the eerie green glow of navigational consoles. The Sith had evacuated, as expected, and left an empty ghost ship populated with ominous shadows. And my greatest challenge yet.

I felt the comforting presence of Masters Kester and Jai’lel flanking me. I wasn’t meant to be here, a Padawan whose talents most assuredly did not lay in combat, but surprise was of the essence. When we learned of the trap Darth Malak set for his master, we had to grasp our opportunity – and us three were coincidentally nearby.

The cloaked figure at the head of the room was facing us, immobile, as we approached. Darth Revan. The Sith Lord. I swallowed past my fear. If we had a chance to stop this senseless slaughter, then the price of my life was not too steep an exchange.

Darth Revan stayed still, waiting for us, and as we closed twin bars of blood red appeared in her hands. They illuminated ominously against a steel mask and midnight robes.

“Jedi,” the dark lord said softly. Her voice was gravelly; throaty and bitter. It sounded nothing like it had, once. “Sneaking onboard my flagship to attack me? Tut tut. Isn’t that against some Jedi code?”

“You cannot win, Revan.” The words slipped out against my volition.

“Why, it’s young Bastila Shan,” she mocked. She took a step, and motioned me forward with a ‘saber. “Come, then.”

“I’m waiting for you, Bastila.”

Bastila?

My eyes fluttered open as sluggish awareness woke within my mind. I saw a face leaning over me, fuzzy at first, before my vision sharpened.

There was no mask this time, but I knew her. A patchwork of purple and yellow, one eye half-closed against swollen flesh.

“I’m waiting for you, Bastila,” she sighed.

I screamed.

xXx

I knew nothing, for a time. My sense of being was scattered, dissolute. Occasionally I felt soft hands on me, urging warm liquid down my throat, murmuring platitudes. I would open eyes and see a feline face I thought I should know. A deep mental lassitude weighed heavily on me. I was content to just be.

“-better you stay away, after last time-”

“-can’t reach her through the bond-”
“-sheesh, why won’t she say anything?-”

“-the way I see it, we all got a vote here. I was paid to take her topside, and now we’re in the skies. From here, I’m a lot more interested in going to a planet that will reap me a job, rather than a tree-infested wild. Unless you plan to pay me-”

“(I cannot go to Kashyyyk. Mission, Jen, surely you will agree that we do not have to-)”

“-we must make a call, Onasi, we can’t wait much longer-”

“-that homicidal droid does not get a vote!-”

“-Stars, Bastila, would you just wake up?-”

xXx

“Bastila, can you hear me?”

The words edged through my consciousness, but this time I understood them. Slowly, my gummy eyelids unstuck and bright light stabbed daggers into my vision. I winced and squeezed them shut.

“Bastila?”

“Juhani,” I croaked. My lips were dry and cracked.

“Here.” A soft voice, warm skin against my cheek, the cool press of ferraglass against my lips. I swallowed gratefully.

“Shhh, it’s okay,” Juhani was murmuring, “You are safe, Bastila, we are all safe.”

I could hear my breathing, fast and panicked, and blood pounded against my eardrums. But there was no threatening psychic presence stabbing at my very being until I splintered into nothingness. Whatever that had been, it was not here.

With forced determination, I slowed my breathing. I realized my eyes were still squeezed shut. Juhani’s next to me. That means-

“The Star Map,” I whispered. “Did you find it, Juhani?”

There was a heavy pause. Perhaps because so much weighed on her answer, the silence seemed longer than it actually was. I tentatively opened my eyes once more.

I wasn’t in Hrakert Station.

“Where am I?” I asked with a touch of asperity. I moved to sit up but my body refused to obey. Juhani placed a cautionary hand on my shoulder.

“Bastila, please, take it slow. This is the first time you have returned to full consciousness in almost a week.”

“A week,” I said blankly. A week? I was in a tiny triangular room with a low ceiling and shelves sparsely stocked with stims, patches and fluids. It was as close a medbay as a swoop was to a starship.
With sudden clarity I knew the place. “I’m on the Ebon Hawk. Juhani, what am I doing on the Ebon Hawk? Where is Master Karon?”

“Please, Bastila, a lot has happened. I fear to tell you everything…” The Cathar trailed off into silence. My gaze returned to her; she was solemn, unblinking. I could sense her concern, and I allowed my mind to open. Where is Master Karon? Surely I should be able to sense her nearby—

Close, very close, too close, I became aware of another presence in my mind. It coiled and unfurled at my awareness.

Bastila? Can you hear me?

Revan is here. The Force was with me; weak and unsteady, but enough to indicate the proximity of a powerful Force user. Revan is here on this ship with me. "Where is Master Karon?” I demanded again, feeling the heat of apprehensive anger bud to life. I could not face Revan alone, not in this state, not on this ship.

“There was a Sith attack on Manaan,” Juhani whispered. Her eyes glistened with melancholy. “Karon has joined the Force.”

Horror pounded through me. No! No! Not Karon! A Sith Attack.

Revan had left Manaan. But she was back, here, and Karon was dead. Killed by a Sith. And Revan was back.

All went white.

---

Snippets of a conversation slowly resolved into meaning.

“I do not know anymore what I am strong enough for. I did not agree with this decision, and yet… yet it feels like a test I must take, to prove I am worthy of being a Jedi once more.”

A snort, dismissive and abrupt. “You put too much pressure on yourself, Juhani. I don’t think you were ever as dark as you believed yourself to be.”

“Well, I thank you for that. If it were not for you, I would still be lost in the dunes of Tatooine. But I worry… I worry that I may slide back. That we both may be tempted down a dark path from which we cannot return.”

My eyes stayed closed, and I kept my breathing even. I heard a rustle of someone moving.

“Yeah, me too. I need Bastila… stars, I want Bastila to wake up. I could actually do with her guidance, and I can’t believe I’m saying that but…”

The words trailed away, and I could barely make sense of them. Revan is here, in this room with me. And wishes my guidance?

“The bond between you both… this may aid you when we land.” Juhani’s voice was low and hopeful. “I will aid you too, Jen Sahara. I do not know what is in store for us, but I will trust in the Force to help me through whatever is to come.”

Memory returned. Master Karon is dead. And yet, Revan wanted my guidance, and did not sound like a Sith. It was all too much; my precarious grasp on consciousness slipped and I faded once more into nothingness.

xXx
HK-47:

Start-up System Check
Motoring Functions Online
Memory Core Function... Unable To Access

Audio Sensors ... Online
Optical Sensors ... Online
Tactile Sensors ... Online
Olfactory Sensors ... Online
Gustatory Sensors ... Not Installed

Shielding Function ... Online
Assassination Protocols … Restricted Access

Combat Mode … Owner Command Required

Scanning External Environment…

Location: Ebon Hawk Rear Starboard Section

3 Organic Meatbags, 1 Droid in Targeting Area

Identification – Jen Sahara (Current Owner), Mission Vao, Carth Onasi, T3-M4

Input – Carth Onasi to Jen Sahara: "Why are you powering that thing on? We need Teethree for this, not that bloodthirsty machine!"
Voice stress analysis: Hostile

Sensor Scan:

Target: T3-M4
…Physical Analysis: T3 Model series, detected A303 security modification
…Location: Interfaced with primary engineering control panel of the Ebon Hawk
…Objective: Unknown

Internal Conclusion: T3-M4 is modifying the ship
Primary Objective: Protect Master (Jen Sahara)
New Objective Accepted: Investigate to ensure no threat to Master (Jen Sahara)

Input – Jen Sahara to Carth Onasi: "HK's... useful. Teethree's having some difficulty changing the ship's signature, and HK has surprisingly hidden talents."

Interrupt: Conclusion: T3-M4 is acting under orders of current master (Jen Sahara)
Potential threat dismissed
Objective Complete

Input – Carth Onasi to Jen Sahara: "No way, sister, that carbon scored scrap pile can stay shut down. He blew up the Ebon Hawk!

Output: "Conjecture: I disabled the ship without loss of life or major injury to allow the master to escape without notice. The Ebon Hawk sustained no serious damage. Retort: One would think a certified pilot could acknowledge the difference, organic meatbag or not."

Input – Jen Sahara: "HK, please don't talk about that!"
Voice stress analysis: Ashamed

Hidden Subroutine Initiated: Order From Master: Do not verbalize subject of Ebon Hawk disablement

Output: "Statement: As you wish, master."

Input – Carth Onasi (muttered): "I don't believe this."

Input – Mission Vao: "What exactly is a ship's signature anyway?"

Output: "Explanation: A vessel's signature is a unique electronic code appended to every transmission. It is widely used as a means of tracking spacecraft, and considered highly illegal to modify."

Input – Carth Onasi to Mission Vao: "It goes against the grain to attempt this, but the Sith know what ship we have. I'm dead set against going to Korriban… but if we have to, then let's make damn sure they don't recognize us on arrival."

Input – Jen Sahara to Carth Onasi: "And don't forget, Carth, that this ship has quite the history when it belonged to Davik Kang. I'd rather not get caught up in any of his past… dealings."

Input – Jen Sahara to T3-M4: "Teethree, do you think you can do it?"

Input – T3-M4 to Jen Sahara (Astromech Designated Communication Language): "Attempting to access Ebon Hawk's core hardware routines. Manufacturer authorisation required to flash firmware and recalculate vessel signature. Initiating brute force hack routines. Unknown time until completion."

Input – Mission Vao: "The lil' fellow's trying, but not sure if he can do it yet."

Input – Jen Sahara to Mission Vao: "How well do you understand droid, Mission?"

Input – Mission Vao to Jen Sahara: "A little, I picked up the basics on Taris. The Bek's always had a couple of beaten up utility droids around the base, y'know, and I used to tinker on the security system with their help. Although usually they'd end up fixing whatever I broke."

Input – T3-M4 (Astromech Designated Communication Language): "0.001% of brute force routines completed."

Input: Mission Vao: "He's gonna be awhile."

Output: "Observation: With that sort of accuracy, perhaps you should consider a career as a Public HoloNet Journalist."

Input – Jen Sahara: "HK, I have some questions for you. What was the language you used earlier? On Rii'shn, before we entered the warehouse?"

Internal Diagnostic – Language not found Scanning...
Error #1E001FFF
Memory Access Violation
…Attempted Access to Locked Memory Core Files
…Sequence Failed
Return to Main

Output: "Response: I am... unsure, Master. I have been experiencing certain... errors in programming since the restraining bolt was removed back in Yuka Laka's store. Speculation: It could be related to this."

Input - Jen Sahara: "Oh, that's just great. Well, how did you know I could understand it?"

Output: "Response: I do not know, Master."

Interrupt:
…Quick Self Diagnostic Routine Activated
…Result: No Errors Detected
…Self Diagnostic Scheduled
Return to Main

Input – Carth Onasi: "Sounds like there's a lot of things you don't know, you worn out bucket of bolts."

Voice stress analysis: Annoyed

Output: "Objection: Worn out?! Listen, you talentless organic meatbag... one word from my master and I will pull you apart limb from useless limb!"

Input – Carth Onasi to Jen Sahara: "Turn this thing off, Jen. Or I'll jettison him out the airlock. I'm serious."

Visual / Audio Tracking: Carth Onasi leaving targeting area

Input – Mission Vao: "Well, at least we know you can't harm anything unless Jen tells you to."

Output: "Statement: I cannot engage in hostilities without a command from my master. Unless my master is unable to properly protect herself."

Input – Mission Vao: "You mean, if meek Jen ever shows up again?"

Voice stress analysis: Exasperated

Output: "Clarification: My primary function is to protect my master, even if it is from herself. Observation: Her fragile meatbag shell has suffered numerous leaks in recent times."

Input – Jen Sahara: "Oh for frell's sake – HK, I don't think meatbag is actually a word,"

Output: "Expletive: Damn it, master, I am an assassination droid... not a dictionary!"

Input – Mission Vao: "Assassination droid?"
Voice Stress Analysis: Alarmed

Output: "Extrapolation: It is sufficient to say that I am a fully capable translator and cultural analyst, and I am also proficient in personal combat. I am a loyal droid willing to serve my master, organic meatbag or not.

Input – Mission Vao to Jen Sahara: "I've never heard a droid insult their master the way HK does. It's creepy."

Input: Jen Sahara: "Not to mention impolite."
Voice Stress Analysis: Amused

Output: "Retraction: Did I say that out loud? I apologize, master. While you are a meatbag, I suppose I should not call you such."

Input – Mission Vao: "Suppose? Sheesh, you could be a little more convincing y'know."

Input – Jen Sahara: "I agree. No more meatbag calling, HK."

Hidden subroutine initiated: Order From Master: Do not address Master as meatbag

Output: "Appeasement: Yes, master. Of course, master."

Input – Mission Vao: "I'm with Carth on this, Jen. I don't think having HK around is a good idea. You should turn him off."

Audio / Visual Tracking: Mission Vao leaving targeting area

Auditory Input: Sigh
…Source: Jen Sahara

Input: Jen Sahara: "HK, pull up the current newsfeeds from the Core worlds. Anything of interest from Coruscant, or anywhere we've been. And… just be quiet."

Master Defined Sub-Routine Initiated: Locate and Display Newsfeeds that Match Defined Parameters
…Interfacing with Communications Panel: Initiated
…Scanning Available Frequencies: Initiated
…Match Found: Public Holo-Feed: Intergalactic Republic News: Channel 47E
…Streaming Holo-Feed on Console: Initiated
Return to Main

Input – Holo-Feed Distribution from Intergalactic Republic News: Channel 47E:

Audio/Visual Tracking: Czerka Representative Marlani Gerrant, Senior Marketing Overseer: Source – Holo-feed:
"…ship that exploded in the docking bay in Manaan, destroying our facilities. Luckily there have only been reports of minor injuries to some ground crew…"

Audio / Visual Tracking: Canderous Ordo entering targeting area

Audio/Visual Tracking: Czerka Representative Marlani Gerrant, Senior Marketing Overseer: Source – Holo-feed:
"…been identified as an Exchange vehicle using a forged Czerka signature to gain clearance. To this end, we are announcing trade sanctions against the Exchange, and introducing an increase of armed escorts to some of our outposts."

Audio/Visual Tracking: Exchange Representative Dillan Starsonn, PR Agent to Outer Rim Worlds:
Canderous Ordo:

We were headed to Korriban, and that sat well with me. I had no patience for the Sith and their little training school, but Korriban did have an underbelly of trade and crime and opportunities that would certainly keep my life interesting… unless I stayed with Revan. I still hadn't decided.

She wasn't what she once was, that was certain. If Revan had been a Mando'ade, then nothing in the galaxy would have stopped us. And now, maybe she was just a broken echo of former glory. I needed to know.

She'd been avoiding me since we left Manaan, hanging around that Cathar and the storeroom that doubled as a medbay. I'd heard the Jedi princess once or twice, but it didn't seem like Bastila was particularly coherent. Whatever had happened at the bottom of that cursed ocean had certainly done a number on her.

I'd tracked Revan down to the rear of the ship, watching a newsvid while the Twi'lek's pet droid tinkered with one of the control panels. HK-47 was downloading the holo-feed for Revan; I kept a wary eye on him as I walked closer. That robot was efficient enough that I wouldn't underestimate him.

Revan tensed as I stepped closer, but kept her eyes on the newsvid. It was some story about Czerka and the Exchange at each other's throats, over a minor explosion in Manaan and some mess on their sister planet, Rii'shn.

"I can't think that Czerka would want to face off against the Exchange. Or vice versa," I said slowly. I'd wondered earlier where Revan had gone. Bastila had mentioned she'd left Manaan altogether. "Y'know, it almost sounds like someone very cleverly put the two of them at odds. You went to Rii'shn before, didn't you?"
Revan looked sharply over at HK. "HK-" she muttered, before the combat droid cut her off.

"Query: Is this going to be another discussion on foreseeable consequences, master?" HK answered in his metallic voice. I had little use for machines, but damn, this one was both amusing and competent.

Revan's voice cut through the air. "HK, power down." The droid voiced an assent before shutting down completely, and I took the opportunity to appraise her. I considered myself a decisive man, but something held me back from acquainting Revan with the truth about herself. Maybe it was pure curiosity. I wanted to understand her first, to see if there was anything left worth knowing, to see if she deserved the truth.

"You've been avoiding me," I told her flatly.

"Hardly," Revan replied, but her eyes darted to the exit. A frown crossed her face, and she dragged her gaze back to me. She'd healed well, only a faint yellowing remained on the left side of her face. She's damn lucky. I would have killed most people for doing what she did. And maybe that was it. She still owed me; one punch wasn't enough to even the scales between us.

"Spar with me, Jen Sahara," I offered.

She blinked. "You want to fight?"

I grinned slowly. "Yeah. Unarmed combat. Are you up for it?"

An exasperated puff of air escaped her mouth. "Are you getting bored, Canderous? I remember chatting with a Trandoshan, once, who said that if Mandalorians go too long between battles they start killing each other just to pass the time."

I laughed loudly. "You're thinking of Iridonians. We Mando'ade spar, to pass the time. It's how we test each other's mettle. Come on, Jen Sahara, let's see what you're made of."

She stared at me intently for a moment. "I'm not particularly keen on messing up my face any more, Ordo," she said finally.

"Bah," I spat in disappointment, my lips curling. She isn't who she used to be. Not one bit. "I didn't expect you to be a coward."

I could see her temper rising; her brows lowered and she scowled angrily. "Hardly," she hissed, eyes flashing. "Fine. I'll take the bait. Let's do this then, Mandalorian."

I felt a fierce grin forming as I stood opposite her. "No Force powers," I said flatly. "No blasters, no weapons." I unclipped two mini-blasters and left them by the wall; the damn Selkath hadn't returned my repeating blaster before we'd left. A vibrosword, shiv-blade, and two 'frag grenades followed.

Revan quirked an eyebrow at me, her anger had already fled in keeping with her mercurial character. I wondered idly if the Revan of old had been so temperamental. "Is that all?" she asked dryly.

"No armour," I grunted, pulling at a worn buckle that opened with an electronic hiss. I'd rifled through the supplies on the Ebon Hawk, cast-offs and spare kit from Davik Kang, but I needed to find a decent vendor. I'd had little time to acquire anything on Manaan, and what options I'd found had been less than desirable. "First to yield loses."
Revan looked down at her cloth shirt and then grimaced, shrugging her shoulders. She'd equipped as little armour as she had weapons. Mine dropped to the ground with an audible thud, followed by a heavy plysteel interleaved shirt. Bare-chested, I bared my teeth at her as her gaze trailed down my chest.

I wasn't bad to look at, I certainly knew that.

"Are you ready?" I taunted, raising my fists. Her eyes snapped back up and caught mine, a flinty green gaze. She nodded, legs apart and arms held loosely at her sides while she appraised me.

I stepped forward, lunging with an exploratory left hook. Swifter than I'd expected, she ducked under and side-stepped, but I'd predicted that and kicked out with a leg. She somersaulted over it and landed behind me gracefully.

"No Force powers," I repeated, turning to face her. Damn, but she was quick. How much was innate I didn't know.

"No Force powers," she echoed. "As much as I'm able to, at any rate." It was muttered, under her breath, but I caught the words and scowled.

"A fair, clean fight, Jen Sahara," I ground out, circling around her. She kept her eyes on me, but made no move to advance. I jumped forward and let loose a flurry of blows that she somehow evaded before rolling to the side and coming up in a crouch.

Come on, Ordo, show her what you're made of. Another kick that she deftly dodged, and now a mocking expression emerged on her face. Guess it's time to distract her.

"Did I ever tell you that Revan once fought Mand'alar, much like this?" I panted, circling around her. I feinted to the left before punching with my right, and yet somehow she was dodging almost before I'd started moving. I need to connect just once, solidly, and I can down her.

"No," she bit out, brows lowering in distaste. "I'm surprised she didn't just fry your Mandalore with some dark Force power."

So, she has a bad opinion of herself. I wonder if the Jedi are responsible for that. "Well, I only heard the stories. But she kept true to the Mando'ade way. Fists, feet, nothing else but pure strength and speed."

Revan snorted derisively, ducking under an exploratory roundhouse. Sounds pretty fallible, Canderous. I'm sure if someone wanted to win they'd just stim themselves up.

"They could, but no Mando'ade would follow them." I stepped forward with a kick, hitting empty air again. "Are you afraid to hit me?" I taunted.

"No," she scowled, and I jabbed my fist forward directly towards her side. It should have hit her, and yet somehow she dodged to the left once more, this time counter-punching and striking me in the gut.

I grunted in surprise, and raised my arm to block a second punch. "You'll have to do better than that," I jeered, and recognized surprise on her face as she realized how ineffectual that had been. I dropped down and struck out with a leg, connecting solidly and tripping her over. I jumped forward with a raised elbow, but she'd rolled out of the way and I landed on the floor with a thud.

We both scrambled to our feet; she was cautious once more as we circled around, both searching for an opening. I heard a series of beeps from the Twi'lek's utility droid in the corner; it caught Revan's attention briefly and I grabbed the opportunity, vaulting forward with a rapid jab. She started ducking the instant I moved, and once more I connected with empty air.

A sharp boot to the back of my thigh had me flailing off-balance, followed by a blow to the back. I fell, and converted it to a roll, coming up in a crouch and flinging my forearms up to block the next impending attack.

But she was four steps back, in the centre of the half-circle room, breathing heavily and eyeing me over. She's testing me, as I am her, I realized in annoyance. Her blows were impotent, but I wasn't sure I could get past her speed.

"Are you ever going to stop dodging?" I asked mockingly. "Like a hood-mouse running from a kath hound."

Revan actually poked her tongue out, and that loosed an unexpected laugh from me. She certainly ain't boring. Or cowardly, despite her initial reluctance. I struck out with a boot followed by my right hook – she jumped over the first then threw her arms up to block.

My fist slammed through her guard and into her jaw.

She crashed backwards onto her arse; I lunged forward to exploit the opening but Revan was already scrabbling backwards to her feet, a hand cradling her face as she glared sullenly at me. A trickle of red seeped through her fingers.

"That's first blood to me, Jen Sahara," I said smugly.

"Sithspit," she muttered, rubbing her face. The blood came from her lip; it'd be swollen by the morning. "I think I'll stick to keeping out of the way, thanks."

"Are you regretting it already?" I mocked. "Not many Force-users like fighting blind. They become dependent on their magic tricks, like old men hiding behind a shield. That's why we admired Revan, you see. Even after defeating the might of our army, she still agreed to an unarmed duel with Mand'alar. And won."

"Admired," Revan spat out disbelievingly. "You admired that insane monster who slaughtered millions around the galaxy."

"People die in wars, Jen Sahara," I said coldly. "From what I've heard and seen of Revan, she killed only when necessary to achieve her goals. Malak, on the other hand, kills gratuitously even among his own followers." I shook my head in disgust. "It's a stupid waste. I don't understand how his army has expanded so rapidly."

Her brows had slammed down again and her eyes glittered dangerously. She wasn't enjoying the conversation - some part of her didn't appreciate discussing Revan so candidly. I wondered if she had any idea at all.

"Are you going to talk or fight, Canderous?" she jeered.

"I can do both," I replied drily.

The utility room we were sparring in tapered into a tight corner at the stern of the freighter; I recognized that as the best place for crowding her and landing a blow. I stepped forward and loosed a jab that she deftly avoided again, but in doing so she'd backed right into the nook. I put as much power and speed into a swinging right uppercut as I could, but still, still, she saw it coming and dived out of the way, rolling behind me and striking out with a sharp kick to my side.
I grunted, throwing my arms up instinctively as I twisted to face her; she'd backed off once more into the centre of the room. How can she react so quickly? It seemed like there was no delay between my action and her subsequent reaction; to get past her dodging I'd either have to distract her or trick her.

"Did you know that by beating Mand'alor, Revan had a claim to the title?" I said conversationally, moving around her. I wanted to try backing her into the corner again. Revan kept her eyes fixed on me, but her face had tightened. "I'm not saying the clans would have accepted her, being an outsider, but they would have listened to her case if she'd consented to clan adoption. If she were still alive, I would follow her."

That definitely startled her; I used the opportunity to launch a fist that connected solidly in her side. She stumbled backwards with a yell and failed to dodge my other fist that sunk deep into her solar plexus.

She crashed onto her back with a thud, groaning, and I capitalized by launching a flying kick. Somehow her instincts were faster; she rolled to one side before leaping up to her feet.

I'd hurt her this time. She was doubled over, breathing unevenly, pain lines scored in her face. Blood dripped down her chin from the earlier blow, and her lip was already visibly swelling.

"Had enough, Jen Sahara?" I mocked, stepping forward towards the stern of the ship once more. Revan was wary now - when I struck out with my right hand, she bobbed under it but didn't counter-punch this time. She jumped backwards to avoid a kick, and was once more crowded into the corner.

I was coming in from a slight angle, leaving a bigger opening on my right. I won't wait for her to duck to the side this time, I'll just expect her to.

I punched out with my left fist and anticipated a dodge; my right hand immediately swung in a powerful roundhouse that slammed into the side of her head.

Revan crumpled to the floor.

I jumped on her, pinning her arms with my knees, one fist raised to connect again. She moaned and stirred, turning to face me with an unfocused expression.

I vaguely heard the side door swish open.

"You ready to yield yet?" I taunted. Her eyes cleared, losing the glassy look.

"Ordo! What- what are you doing?" Onasi had entered the room behind me. He sounded amusingly outraged. "Get off her!"

"Yes, I yield," she hissed. "Damn it."

I grunted in satisfaction and stood, offering Revan a hand which she grudgingly accepted. I yanked her to her feet, and turned to face the Republic captain.

He had a hand on his holstered blaster, body tensed, ready to take action. My muscles clenched in response, and I immediately glanced toward my weapons – on the other side of the room.

"It's alright, Carth," Revan muttered. "We're just- training."

"Training," Carth responded blankly. I saw him take in my shirtless garb and Revan's loose clothing. He turned a dark scowl on me. "Right. You sure this isn't some sort of primitive Mandalorian mating ritual?"

Revan laughed at that, genuine and loud, before it turned into a choke. She stepped back, leaning heavily against the wall. That comment isn't worth my time. I guess Republic's version of sparring is firing blasters at a wall.

I looked back at Revan. She'd fought well, and was quicker than should be possible, but she lacked stamina. She's out of shape, not what she was once. Still, it was a warm satisfaction to know I had beaten her, she who had once taken down our leader. And she's definitely gonna feel this come tomorrow.

"Training?" I repeated back at her, raising a brow.

"Yeah," she sighed, closing her eyes. "Tomorrow, Canderous. Every damn day until we land on Korriban. But for now… I'm gonna go lie down."

xXx

Belaya Linn:

Dreshdae was a cesspool of lowlifes and mercenaries, and that was not even counting the Dark Jedi. I had been here little over ten days, and already I was considering turning tail.

I sat down on the hard bedroll that served as my sleeping quarters in the cheap dormitory I was renting, my fists clenching in my lap. My courage was lacking. I had yet to venture near the Sith Academy and whether it was fear of the Dark Side or finding Juhani there of her own volition I did not know.

Perhaps a year of searching is enough. Perhaps she truly is gone.

That fateful day, I'd cursed Master Quatra's name to the Outer Rim and back. Weeks passed with the healers uncertain whether she would pull through or not; I had stayed, then, if only to find out for Juhani's sake. For I suspected my friend had taken flight believing in her Master's death. It was Quatra's fault, all of it. Everyone could see Juhani felt too strongly for her Master, but to throw it back in her face like she was nothing...

It wasn't worthy of a Jedi, let alone a Master.

I sighed, looking down at the lightsaber cupped gently in my hands. Master Tefain had entrusted it to me when I'd passed the Knight trials; it had been constructed with a rare bondar crystal and glowed a gentle gold when activated. Tefain... what must you think of me now. My gentle master pleaded with me to stay at the Enclave, but how could I? How could I desert Juhani, who was as dear to me as... as Quatra was to her, little did she know.

When Quatra woke from her healing coma, I launched into her verbally and without mercy. Now, I was somewhat ashamed at my tirade, but also uncertain that I would do anything differently, had I the chance. After that, I'd left Dantooine, vowing to find my friend.

I'd started my search on Taris, Juhani's homeworld, a planet whose racial prejudices were second in magnitude only to the scale of inequality between the rich and the rest. Juhani spoke rarely of her youth, and when she did I heard bitterness and desolation dredging up from the depths of her soul. I hadn't expected her there, but one's place of origin seemed an obvious starting point.

I found dark whispers, and little else. Whispers that a small handful of slavers had recently met their end in a bloody, ruthless way by a Sith assassin - for no Jedi would act like that, even if the plasma beam was rumoured to be a dark blue. My heart clenched with dread but, despite my efforts, I could not even dredge up a reliable description of the slavers' murderer. Whoever it had been had left Taris shortly after the event.

Coruscant was my next destination; I hoped in vain she had returned to the Order, perhaps believing a different Enclave would be easier or more forgiving. A holo-message from Tefain awaited me there, pleading once more for my return. They should have been begging Juhani, not me. Quatra is still a Master, still with the Jedi, and Juhani... well, it was entirely possible my old friend was now one with the Force.

I'd spent the last few months hiring private detectives - even an Exchange snoop - to no avail. Eventually, I'd surrendered to the last obvious option: The Sith. I must gather my courage, put on my bravest face, and enter the Academy. If she truly had fallen, then surely here I would find mention of her, whether she be at the Academy or elsewhere amongst Darth Malak's forces.

And if not, then I will return to Tefain. If he is still alive.

The news of the Dantooine bombing was appalling. That Darth Malak had both the gall and the firepower to mount such an attack would have sent ripples of fear across the galaxy. I'd always thought Darth Revan had been the stronger of the two, but the Sith forces had increased since her demise. The apprentice had certainly outstripped the master.

And Tefain... The thought of his potential death saddened me, yet perhaps the months of living rough and hiding my identity as a Jedi had hardened my empathy somewhat. I hoped my old master survived and that I would one day reunite with him, but finding Juhani was my primary goal.

I took in a deep breath, and glanced around the bare dormitory. Six other sentients were currently residing here, although the room was empty for now. As a Czerka-run hostel it was bare, rundown, and eminently affordable. A good starting place for one attempting to approach the Sith Academy.

I heard footsteps and hurriedly concealed my lightsaber; to my fellow roommate I was posing as a mercenary down on her luck – a common occurrence in Dreshdae. A Rodian entered the room, giving me an affable nod as he walked past, a tray of hot food clutched tight in his grip.

"How's the job market?" he asked in passable Basic.

"Fine," I answered briefly, not wishing to encourage further conversation. The Rodian took a spoon of the meal in front of him and grimaced, the corners of his small mouth turning down in disgust. It was a plyfoam tray heaped with unidentifiable brown lumps, and did not appear appetizing in the least.

"This is awful," he commented, and I couldn't help a chuckle in agreement. I certainly would not miss the food here when I finally departed.

"Indeed," I agreed. "Korriban's cuisine is not particularly palatable." He stared at me unblinking until I shifted in discomfort. "Uh, I mean it tastes like frelling kath dung and smells like marsh-toad puke?" I cringed, aware that my Chandrilan accent was out of place, and stood abruptly.

"Goodbye. I am going now," I said stiltedly, and hurried out of the room, feeling awkward and embarrassed. I was ill at ease, pretending to be something I most decidedly was not.

I must stop dawdling. It matters not what some anonymous Rodian thinks of me; what is important is seeing this through. I'd heard one of the Sith Masters often frequented the cantina; a Twi'lek female with a sense of humour and a soft spot for other women. That must be my starting point.

My steps became purposeful as I headed towards the local cantina. I would discover a way in, and then see if there was any information to be had about my friend.

And if by some miracle I did find a fallen Juhani, I still had no idea what I would say or do.

xXx

Mission Vao:

"Big Z, look what I got," I said breathlessly, my arms full of an exoskeleton that wasn't quite as light as I'd hoped.

Zaalbar glanced up from the armour he'd been repairing – he'd been doing this inventory of the ship's equipment, and I'd been bored enough to scout around for more. Canderous, it seemed, had quite the stockpile.

"(Mission, is that the bounty hunter's armour?)" Zaalbar replied, his hands stilling on the plysteel plates he'd been rejoining. The Wookiee was seated at a workbench in the engineering bay of the Hawk, crowding over the tools and benchtop alike.

Although, Big Z did tend to crowd over everything.

"Yeah!" I answered, lugging it over to him. "It's meant to have some sort of Force resistant powers, but it's broken in places."

"(Mission,)") Zaalbar said slowly, his brows lowering. "(Didn't Canderous Ordo retrieve that from Calo Nord's corpse?)"

"Uh huh. D'ya think you can fix it? It might be useful, what with going to Korriban and all-"

"(Mission!)" Zaalbar howled, cutting me off. I blinked in surprise.

"Sheesh, Big Z, where's the fire?"

"(Please do not tell me you stole that from the Mandalorian!)" Zaalbar wailed. "(I know you are bored, but he will notice that it is missing, Mission!)"

I scowled angrily, folding my arms and glaring at him. "How stupid d'ya think I am, Big Z? I bought it from him. It's too small for him, and broken besides, and I still have my pazaak and swoop winnings. I'm not a brainless Gamorrean, y'know!"

Zaalbar looked abashed at that. Well, about as abashed as a seven foot Wookiee can look. He scratched his head uncomfortably, causing his fur to stick out in all directions. He's getting scruffy looking again. I'm gonna have to do something about that soon. It didn't go down too well last time, what with the bath and all.

"(I believe I jumped to the wrong conclusion, Mission. I certainly do not think of you as stupid.)" He leaned over and picked up the blue and white exoskeleton, perusing the side plates that had been severed by a lightsaber. "(You are right, it would be very helpful if I can fix it. I might be able to modify it to fit you.)"

I beamed at the Wookiee. "Great, I'll leave you to it for a bit then, Big Z."

I was starting to feel restless. The hyperspace journey had taken ages, and I really wanted to talk to Jen – even if I was still upset with her. But it seemed like her every waking minute was spent training with Juhani – who barely spoke two words to me – or getting beaten up by Canderous. And she was distant whenever I did manage to collar her. Friendly, but distant.

I guess I missed my friend.

_Maybe I should track her down now. Looks like Big Z's gonna be awhile. And Carth won't play any more pazaak against me._ I grinned. Carth wasn't bad, for a soldier old enough to be my dad, but he certainly wasn't letting me score any more creds from him.

Zaalbar waved me away absently, and I wandered out the door, keeping my footsteps silent and my ears open for any sounds. Soft voices in the direction of the central common room reached me, and I quietly moved in that direction.

A haggard and barely lucid Bastila Shan was leaning heavily against Juhani. _Whoa, she's awake!_ I kept back in the shadow of the open corridor, away from the artificial lighting, and unabashedly eavesdropped.

"...believe it's a weapon that's powering Darth Malak's army," Bastila was whispering. She looked terrible, her skin sagged from hollow cheekbones and there were bruised shadows under her eyes. She looked old. "We have no other explanation for the exponential growth of his armada. The Star Map found on Dantooine had the coordinates of the four planets; hence our quest." She closed her eyes, panting slightly as if the conversation had exhausted her.

"So if it's a weapon, our endgame will be to destroy it then?" Jen was standing back from them, her arms folded defensively as she stared at them both. Whereas Juhani looked worried whenever she surveyed Bastila, Jen just seemed resolute. Like she was steeling herself for something unpleasant.

"If we are correct in our assumption," Bastila whispered. Juhani put an arm around her.

"I'll tell the others," Jen muttered. "Not that it's much more than what we already knew, but I'm not holding back information from them. They all deserve to know what we're up against." A dark colour suddenly flushed her face, as if she'd recalled something decidedly distasteful. "We need to talk, Bastila. Alone."

"I am tired," Bastila mumbled from next to Juhani. "I do not deny you, Jen, but I am... exhausted."

"Later," Juhani interrupted in a quiet but steady voice, as she began to lead Bastila towards the makeshift medbay. "We must focus on Bastila's recovery first, Jen. We will need all our resources on Korriban."

As the two shuffled away, I heard the plaintive query: "I do not understand why we are headed there, Juhani," before they entered the medbay. Jen sighed in frustration, before turning around to leave through the starboard exit. She took two steps passed me, stopped, and then turned again.

"Mission," she said wryly. "How long have you been listening in?"

I grinned impishly at her. "Awhile. Long enough that you shoulda sensed me by now."

Jen chuckled. "We were a bit distracted."

"I know," I said, wandering over to sit down on one of the central benches. The canvas material had a fraying hole on the edge of it where plimfoam was showing. I picked at it absentely. "It's good news though, that she's up. She'll be back to her bossy self in no time I guess."
She laughed, louder this time, and came to sit next to me. "Yeah. Hopefully by the time we hit Korriban, because we could really do with her help."

"But she's famous, right?" I asked, pulling a long strand of plimfoam out from the bench. I grimaced, and tried to stuff it back in. "I mean, surely some of the Sith would recognize her on Korriban?"

"She won't be able to leave the 'Hawk. But I was meaning the bond between us. From everything I've been told, Korriban's a dark place. Guess it has to be, with a Sith Academy there and all." Her words were wry, and the corner of her mouth lifted in a grin. But a different emotion spoke clearly through her human eyes. She's terrified, of the Dark Side.

Well, of course that made sense. Jen had been so angry at times, and the sabotage on the Ebon Hawk certainly hadn't been the actions of a friend. Or a Jedi. But I hadn't really clicked that it would frighten her so. Of course it would! Sheesh, it would scare me spitless.

"How's the bond thing going, anyway?" I asked curiously.

"Not so well," the human sighed, rubbing the side of her face and then wincing as she inadvertently pressed against ugly swelling. "She doesn't respond to me. I'm not sure if it's purposeful or not… she had a lot of psychic damage. Juhani said there was some sort of vast entity near the Star Map on Manaan that damn near blew Bastila's mind apart. I think the length of her recovery indicates what a near thing it's been."

"She's gonna be okay though, right? I mean, she sounded okay."

Jen smiled at me then, her mouth tilting up in a way that made the bruising all the more pronounced. "Yes, I think so."

I pulled my feet up on the bench, wrapping my arms around them as I looked over my human friend. I wonder how much kolto she's going through daily. Fortunately, Davik Kang had left the Ebon Hawk well-stocked with adventuring essentials; I'd seen Big Z move crates of healing supplies and stims over to our makeshift medbay. Good thing too, 'cause I bet no one thought to stock up on Manaan, the freaking kolto capital of the galaxy.

"Why are you doing this thing with Canderous?" I asked her in curiosity. "Is it some sort of training? I can't see Canderous letting you fire freaky Force powers at him without getting his own back."

And he certainly is getting his own back. I haven't seen any obvious marks on him, yet.

"No Force powers, just unarmed sparring," Jen confirmed, which made even less sense. The port door opened, and we turned our heads to see Juhani re-enter the room, walking towards us with a tired smile.

"Bastila is asleep again," Juhani murmured. "I am very glad she was able to get up. It bodes well for her recovery."

Jen nodded at the Cathar, but otherwise said nothing.

"Y'know, Jen, that just seems a little unbalanced," I said, rewinding the conversation. "I mean, if you're not using Force powers, how in the Outer Rim d'ya expect to beat Canderous with your fists?"

Juhani interrupted, answering before Jen had a chance to. "The Force guides our actions unknowingly, even when we aren't drawing on it." Her tawny eyes were trained on Jen. "The more you are familiar with it, the more it will guide your actions and sharpen your senses."
Jen was frowning. "Do you mean the reason I manage to dodge most of his blows is because of the Force?"

"I am sure much of it is innate, and a lot trained," Juhani responded quietly. "But put a neural disruptor around your neck and you would notice the lack."

"I bet Canderous doesn't realize that," Jen muttered under her breath. "About me or Evil Bitch."

I didn't think she meant that comment to be heard, but we had, and Juhani sent her a piercing look in response. "What- what do you mean by that, Jen?" The Cathar had taken two steps forward towards her, a furry palm raised as if in question.

"Oh, it's nothing," Jen replied, shooting her a frown. "Just that Canderous won't stop going on about the frelling blood duel between his Mandalore and that sithspawn Darth Revan. I'd rather not hear anymore about it, but Mandalorians seem to have this perverse sort of respect for their conquerors."

"He is kinda weird," I agreed, wrinkling my nose. I noticed then that Juhani's mouth was slightly open, in stunned surprise or something – which looked weird on her stripy face. I wonder what's up with her.

"I do believe there is something I must do. Excuse me." Juhani said at last, her eyes darting away from us both. Jen stared after her in confusion, even long after Juhani had left the room.

xXx

Bandon Stone:

*Kashyyyk. My lip curled in disgust. An empty planet filled with brainless Wookiees and pathetic Czerka minions. And supposedly home to a Star Map.

Three days until the star cruiser would leave hyperspace and enter Kashyyyk's orbit. According to the intercepted comms, there would be at least one Jedi Master waiting. Vrook Lamar. That'll be... interesting.

But my primary mission was to locate the Star Map and destroy it, and then lie in ambush waiting for Malak's ex-girlfriend. If I take out the Jedi farts first, then Revan will be suspicious when she lands. I can deal with the wrinkled old coots in the aftermath.

It would certainly be an interesting challenge, trying to track down the ancient Rakatan legacy, especially seeing that Malak didn't know its location. I find that curious. That one of the Star Maps Revan found by herself. I wonder if even then, before they turned on the Republic, she didn't quite trust Malak. In which case it was imbecilic of her not to have dealt with him earlier.

Revan had never overly impressed me. She had a tendency to listen to her subordinates if they held an intelligent viewpoint and, while that might at first seem advantageous, it also left her vulnerable to betrayal. A true Sith forges his own path, and cuts down any who oppose him.

But Revan's sheer power, ahh. I'd certainly respected that. I'd heard that a Force user of her strength hadn't been found in centuries, and Malak was her equal in that regard, or tantalisingly close to. And the both of them had tempers that, once loosed, were ferocious enough to rock planets.

I'd always been careful not to warrant their rage, or deflect it onto someone else if necessary. I'd seen both of them kill in a blazing fury, and I wasn't idiotic enough to roll the dice with my own life.
Such is the glorious power of the Sith. The power of life itself. One day, Malak would stumble and I'd take over the reins. My power was still emerging, and so was my knowledge. But not yet. I will bide my time, and grow my strength, and strike when the time is right.

I heard the exit hatch open and felt the presence of a comrade enter the room. I remained staring impassively out at space so he would come to me. It was crucial to maintain the pecking order, even with the little things, and I was undoubtedly Malak's first apprentice.

"Bandon," Yudan Rosh acknowledged as he took the final step next to me. "I've had reports that Lamar will be accompanied by at least two other Masters on Kashyyyk."

"And?" I said in a bored tone. "Is that supposed to make me quiver in fear?"

"Don't turn this into a pissing contest," he returned coldly. "Our target is Darth Revan, not Lamar or anyone else from the Order."

I snorted, allowing the corner of my mouth to turn up in a derisive sneer. As a race, I'd never considered Twi'leks brave, and Yudan hadn't changed my mind in that regard. His Force abilities weren't to be ignored, however; nor his previous battle experience. I didn't count him my equal, but that was due to his lack of ambition rather than strength. Yudan had quite the power, and the quite the past. "Are you going to run from three robes, Yudan?" I mocked.

His expression didn't change, but then Yudan Rosh had always been a frakking icicle. He held my gaze. "I remain focused on our Master's orders. We are heading to Kashyyyk to kill Darth Revan, not play games with Jedi Masters."

"Are you questioning me, Yudan?" I whispered. I drew deep into the Force, letting it fill me to completion with sweet, sweet power. It was a threat, a vow, a promise of what I would unleash if Yudan Rosh dared defy me.

He stilled, his cold eyes fixed warily on mine.

In a straight shoot-out of sheer strength between us, it would be an interesting match. One day soon, I knew, I wouldn't let him back down from my taunts. One day soon I'd grind him beneath my feet.

But for now he said nothing; merely stared blankly at me.

"You're scared you'll finally have to face Tokare." My tone was malicious, and Yudan's yellow eyes narrowed. But he still remained silent. Pathetic. Oh, Vandar Tokare was definitely one to be careful around, but he also very rarely engaged in any form of combat. But then, he wasn't my former master.

The Twi'lek's face had turned to stone, but he hadn't embraced the Force. I'd never quite decided if he was naturally cowardly, or if the steel inside him had been snapped when Darth Revan bedded him. He'd been a general in the past, one of the frakking Jedi Thirteen - or, as those devoted Fleet twats used to call them, Revan's Guard of Twelve. And once, there'd been no one as besotted with Revan Freeflight as Yudan Rosh. Apart from Malak. I snorted in derision. I hadn't been involved in the Wars, so all I'd heard was Nisotsa's drivel. But I did know that Yudan was a captain, one to fill the ranks and lead the minions into slaughter. He'd never be more than that. He'd followed Revan and Malak since the Mandalorian wars, and one days he'd follow someone into his own grave.

"I am leading this mission, Yudan. We will do what we need to, and if further opportunities arrive then we shall take them," I stated coldly, turning away from him and staring once more out through the transparisteel window, into the abyss of space. "I am no fool, but nor shall I fail to take take advantage of fortuitous circumstances merely because you are a little frightened. Now, leave me be."

xXx

Carth Onasi:

Jen was alone in the central common room when I walked in, a lightsaber held loosely in her hand.
The swelling on her lip had died down, but she had a cut under one eye, and a large purpling bruise on the side of her face.

"You look awful," I said. Jen was spending her waking hours either training with Juhani or the Mandalorian. And why I could understand the former, the sparring with Ordo seemed senseless, considering she didn't actively use the Force.

Jen grinned impishly at me. "Aw, Republic, you sure know how to make a woman feel special."

I flushed at that, belatedly realizing how tactless my words had been. "Sorry. It's just- I don't really see what you're getting out of those fights, other than an extra handful of bruises."

"I beat him, yesterday," she said absently. "I got a lucky blow in, now I've got to figure out how to repeat it." She sighed deeply, and then winced, one arm pressing against her ribs. "I dunno, Carth, it's honing my reflexes. And there's something to be said for a good, clean fight…" her lips twisted.
"Maybe it's an outlet for me, and that's useful in itself."

"What, getting beaten up daily stops you losing your temper?" I was only half-serious, but she frowned, and I could tell she was taking my suggestion onboard.

"Maybe," she said softly. "I'm working on that with Juhani. Control, I mean. I…" she trailed off, hers gaze fixed somewhere on the durasteel wall behind me. She seemed to have lost the thread of the conversation, and had than damn distant look on her face again. There was a large part of me still angry, still furious, about what she'd done, but then I'd remember the frozen, sick look on her face when I'd mentioned Darth Revan's invasion of Deralia. Or I'd catch Jen unawares in the common room, glancing over to Mission with a shamed expression in her eyes.

Jen regretted what she'd done. I wasn't sure if I could get past it, but I had to give her credit for facing up to us and trying to put things right.

I hadn't seen Jen much during the hyperspace journey, though. Neither had Mission, and I'd heard the girl complaining about it. Maybe it was remorse that was keeping Jen tucked up with Ordo and Juhani, as much as training - for the both of them seemed to have completely forgiven Jen for scuttling the Ebon Hawk.

I frowned, and recalled the reason I'd tracked her down.

"We're approaching Korriban," I said, moving to the kitchenette to brew some caffa. "We'll be exiting hyperspace tomorrow. Do you have a plan, Jen, or are you just going to rush in like usual and this time really get yourself killed?"

She was silent; I turned to see she'd dropped her head in her hands. "I'd counted on Bastila being awake and coherent by now," she said, her voice muffled. "I've only had two conversations with her since we boarded, and she's not in any state to aid me or answer any of my frelling questions."
She sighed, a stifled exhale of breath, before continuing. "I don't deny that Korriban freaks me out a little, Carth… but we've gotta strike while we have the element of surprise."
"Freaks you out," I muttered in disbelief. "Jen, Korriban is a training ground for the Dark Side-" "Yeah, I'm aware of that," she interrupted sarcastically. I frowned at her hunched figure.

"Let me finish," I shot back. "Look… I used to think it was just a fancy name for something I see every day. Corruption is everywhere. People are greedy and stupid and do horrible things. But I'm starting to think it's different for the Jedi. That there's this evil watching them, waiting for its chance."

"Like some bad, scary monster?" Her voice was flippant, though her posture was anything but. She was still huddled up on the plimfoam bench, refusing to acknowledge me with her gaze.

"Don't make light of it, Jen," I said sharply. "Just look at Juhani. She seems as straight and true as any Jedi should be… and yet think of the way you found her, back on Tatooine. And then there's you..."

"What about me?" she snapped defensively, jerking up to glare green daggers at me. She can really ask that, after Manaan?

I frowned. "Jen, you have so much courage and strength in you... and yet, there's this incredible darkness, too. Like the flip side of a cred coin. When you have so much power, the stakes are higher. I can only imagine the kind of conflict that goes on inside you, and with no training I'm concerned… more than concerned… at what's going to happen when you get near a Sith Academy."

She didn't answer, but I could see the truth of the matter written on her face. And here I was, worrying about the person who'd blown us out of the sky a mere fortnight ago. I could feel myself scowling. I'd been doing a lot of that lately. "Do you even know where this map is?"

"No." She sighed, her face solemn and set as if carved from permacrete. Wayward curls framed and softened the look a little. "I've been searching the lowerbase holonets. There's scant information on Korriban - but there's only one colony and its right next to the Academy. Also… there's mention of a nearby Sith-controlled valley steeped in dark artefacts and archaeological digs."

"Sith-controlled," I said flatly. "Of course. Blast it, Jen, we don't even know what these Star Maps do! Nothing about this mission makes any sense. Bastila, a Padawan for all that she's experienced, being saddled with the responsibility of tracking down our best chance at defeating the Sith. Why? And how do you fit into this – and don't tell me your scholarly background is useful when Bastila already found two of these maps without your help!"

An eyebrow quirked over an amused green eye. Damn that woman. Despite myself, her amusement took the edge off my anger.

"Are you quite finished?" she drawled.

"No," I bit out, and did my best to level her with a serious glare. "But some answers will do for now."

She didn't reply, and I left my cooling caffa to walk closer to her. Nothing for it. I may as well blurt it out. "This has something to do with whatever happened on Deralia," I said in what I hoped was a matter-of-fact tone. Her shoulders tensed and that piercing green gaze shuttered.

"No… Carth, I don't want to talk about this. I can't," she pleaded.
"Jen – this whole Star Map business – you can't think that you're here because you got some fancy qualification at a backwater Academia. You're a strong Force Sensitive, that much is obvious, but something happened on Deralia when Darth Revan invaded. And somehow the Star Maps are involved."

"Please, Carth, please just drop it," her voice rose in pitch, but my words kept coming.

"I can't. I'm sorry… but I can't. This is bigger than just you. All of our lives are at stake here… and the future of the Republic."

"I don't know what happened! I don't remember, okay?" Her eyes were still squeezed shut, and she was visibly shaking. I felt like a damn heel, but this was too big to ignore for the sake of her feelings.

I sighed softly, and sat down next to her on the plimfoam bench. I felt her visibly withdraw from me. "Look – I know you've got black spots in your memory, and it's been messing you up. It's just that… Do you know why?"

A pause, and then – "What do you mean?" in a clipped, angry tone. I'll take that as a no, then.

"Jen, you were captured by Darth Revan's forces when they invaded Deralia. I- uh, found this out on Manaan. There's no easy way of saying this, but you were hurt – badly hurt - over days. By the Sith, I mean. The Jedi rescued and healed you, but it's the reason you have your memory loss, and the Jedi seem to have left you floundering in the dark about it all. No wonder you're confused. Just how long have you been travelling with the Jedi?"

I realized then that she was staring at me once more; but her eyes were wide and round in a slack, expressionless face. Stang, this was an idiotic thing to push, Onasi. But Bastila hadn't been honest with Jen, and Jen couldn't get a handle on the Force, and we were headed straight for Korriban-

She was muttering no under her breath, squeezing her eyes tightly shut. And I felt like a complete heel. If Dodonna had been right, then Jen had been tortured for who knew how long, and here I was trying to dredge it all up simply because Bastila had kept secrets. Suddenly I felt thoroughly ashamed, and reached a hand out to rest over hers. She flinched backward, and I dropped it.

"I'm sorry," I said quietly. "I shouldn't be pushing this. I- uh, it was wrong of me."

"I'm sorry," she bit out. "It's not like you enjoy speaking about your past, Onasi, so why you think you can grill me about mine when I can't remember it, I don't know."

"Because it affects us all," I answered back slowly. "But maybe it's Bastila who needs to do the talking. And you're- you're right, it is hypocritical of me. I don't like talking about my past, and I honestly don't see why you'd be interested, but if you really insist on knowing then I suppose I could answer a question or two."

"Wow." Jen looked taken aback, but the sickly look had gone from her face. "That was a bit like pulling teeth, flyboy." She quirked an eyebrow at me. "You got some deep dark secret in your past?"

"No," I sighed. "No dark secret, just… a lot of heartache, that's all."

"You lost someone," she deduced. Her voice dropped. "I'm sorry, Carth. I won't pry."

The generosity of her words was unexpected, and wholly undeserved coming on the heels of my interrogation. It surprised me, because I'd always picked Jen as the nosy type. Maybe that was the reason for my reply, bald and unbidden.

"Yeah. A wife and son on Telos. I never... I never found my son."

I didn't elaborate further – how could I? The word Telos said it all. These days, Morgana's face was hard enough to capture in my mind's eye if I wasn't holding a holo-picture. And Dustil… he'd be Mission's age now, almost a man.

I sighed, dropping my head in my hands. It was four years ago, and in some ways the grief was so raw it felt like yesterday. And yet… time moved on. I'd spent the years immersed in work, with nothing but daydreams of vengeance to keep me going.

I felt the slight, unassuming pressure of Jen's hand resting softly on my shoulder. We sat there, in silence, for some time.

xXx

Uthar Wynn:

The human boy stood in front me, sullen as he'd always been since the day he was brought to me. But his power... Given a bit more time, he could succeed as my first apprentice. Although, granted, I doubted I would let that Twi'lek schutta live for much longer. She'd been useful, but all tools eventually outlived their usefulness. Or broke.

And Yuthura was less than trustworthy these days.

Which brings me back to the reason I've summoned him. For it meant I needed to accelerate his training, if he were to be a worthy replacement for Yuthura Ban.

I smiled coldly. "I have an assignment for you."

The boy nodded, his dark eyes flicking up to mine in attention. Over the past year I'd slowly clawed my fingers into his soul, having him accomplish more and more personally selected missions. His status within the Academy had flourished as a result of my attention, just as his companionship with students of his own age had withered. Truly, I wondered whether he knew just how much I owned him.

"What is it you want me to do?" His voice was short and monotone, but not lacking in fear. Which was better than respect, in my mind.

"Someone of great importance has landed on Dreshdae. A very personal friend of Darth Malak. But she's hiding low, and I want to find out why. I need you to tail her; stay in the shadows and don't get caught. You are very good at that, my dear boy."

The boy nodded, accepting my reasons. After all, that made two new arrivals in as many days. The first had checked in as a Rita Sunrider. Otherwise known as Jedi Knight Belaya Linn. On a foolish quest to find some lost Jedi. I will greatly enjoy dealing with her personally.

But Kylah… a turned Jedi who'd recently betrayed Bastila Shan and caused the destruction of the Endar Spire. If Darth Malak sent her here for a purpose and I interfered, the results would not be very… palatable. If, however, she is hiding from Malak... then I would dearly love to know. And there is no one more suited to this sort of reconnaissance than my dear boy.

"Here is her last known location," I added, handing him a datapad. I saw the boy's eyes widen apprehensively as he read the name. He swallowed.

"Yes," I said coldly. "She is a powerful target. I need to know what she is doing here, Dustil. I suggest you do not let her see you."

"Is that all, Master Wynn?"

I nodded. "Report back to me with your suspicions daily."

The boy gave me a brief bow, and turned to leave.

"Oh, and one more thing," I said pleasantly. "There's another newcomer, goes by the name Rita Sunrider. If you come across her, lead her directly to me. She is a special case, shall we say."

xXx
Past and present challenges

- Jen Sahara -

Dreshdae was smaller than I’d expected, and mostly overrun with Czerka traders and desperate mercenaries searching for work. Soldiers in Sith uniform were also prevalent, but I’d yet to spot a Dark Jedi. I found my curiosity about the place was overriding my caution; I’d spent the last week fearing our arrival to Korriban, and now I was impatient to shake that useless feeling off.

Fear is for the weak.

It might be one of the few times I agreed with Evil Bitch, but even so, I breathed in deep and pushed the voice away, focussing on a calm that Juhani had me practising daily. I am at peace; I am resolute. If I hadn’t been the one to find her, I never would have guessed that mere weeks ago Juhani had been rampaging out in the wilderness.

But her serenity and determination inspired me, and never had it been more crucial to rein in Revan’s violent thoughts and inhumane emotions than on Korriban, training ground for the Sith.

I didn’t enjoy even thinking her name in the privacy of my own head, but it was becoming second nature - and Canderous bloody Ordo wasn’t helping any.

Our spars were useful. Despite what I believed was mild disapproval radiating from the Cathar, I actually felt more relaxed and at peace with myself afterward, not to mention that the practice seemed to be re-honing skills I’d once had. Either that, or I’m a fast learner. Regardless, I was already able to hit Canderous harder and more effectively.

The Mandalorian, however, seemed determined to distract me with war stories – and he certainly had quite a few. While interesting, informative, and occasionally appalling, it did make it difficult to stay focussed on the fight, and then my speed would be compromised. And he seems to have a penchant for bringing up Darth Revan. He’d obviously deduced it was a trigger of mine, and gleefully abused it for victory.

Her voice in my head had been quieter of late, less frequent, and I dearly hoped that was a sign of things to come. Carth’s revelation had left me more than uneasy; I’d known something had happened on Deralia, but the implication here was torture. Jen, tortured because of Revan. I shivered, feeling like the edges of my soul were fraying. And then, what? Jen, killed by Revan or her followers? And of course Revan, killed by Bastila’s strike force. But I had no memory from either side here; and just how I - Street Kid - fit into all of this was anybody’s guess. I’d been a Jedi, once. Is it possible I agreed to this psychic minefield for some reason I don’t yet remember?

But I most certainly didn’t have the answers, so I’d thrown myself into training, both Force and combat alike. Since the devastating flashback on Rii’shn, I’d finally understood just how high the stakes were – just how shatteringly bad things could go if I let her take over.

And that was where the fear trickled back in. While my abilities with the Force were definitely improving, they were nothing to the power that Evil Bitch could draw on. Whether it was her experience or simply the dark side of the Force I didn’t know, but I’d be dead many times over if it wasn’t for her. Tatooine, against the Sand People. Rii’shn. Kylah.
Which swung me right back to my bond sister. Bastila, presumably, didn’t know about Kylah yet. I’d had few conversations with her, and even during the last one she’d been uncharacteristically quiet.

…

“Does no one else think this is a bad idea?” Carth was demanding. We were due to exit hyperspace outside the Korriban system in little over an hour; a good time for us to regroup and confirm our plan of action. “Sending out just Jen and Juhani – the two who recently were slaughtering everything out in the Tatooine desert?”

“Look, I’m not saying it’s a great idea. I’m saying it’s the best one we’ve got,” I explained, sighing. “Bastila can’t leave the ship. Even you can’t leave the ship, you’re too… too-”

“Too what?” He frowned at me.

“Too Republic!” I snapped. I heard a snicker from Canderous. Bastila, leaning against Juhani on a tattered bench in the common room, had yet to offer any opinion on the matter.

“She’s right,” Canderous added in his gravelly voice. “Anyone looking at you can see you’re a soldier, Onasi, and I don’t reckon you’d do well playing at being on the Sith side.”

“ Aren’t you a war hero yourself, Carth?” Mission piped in. “I mean, isn’t there a chance you might get recognized by someone who follows all the boring HoloNet news?”

His shoulders dropped in defeat, and he sighed in capitulation. That’s one down, I thought drily.

“(What you say makes sense, Jen Sahara. I shall travel with you, of course, and guard your back.)” Zaalbar said, as solemnly as a Wookiee could.

I shook my head. “Not a good idea. Teethree may have succeeded in changing the ship’s signature, but there’ll be reports of our crew make up. And a seven foot Wookiee isn’t exactly subtle. Look – we’re going to need people staying in the ship – as guards. Think about the repercussions if some little Sithling snuck onboard and discovered Bastila Shan was on Korriban.”

“I could come with you and help,” Mission said brightly. “Like, I could pretend to be your slave or something. I bet those Sith scum will buy that. And you know how sneaky I can be.”

I stared at her in silence, while Zaalbar howled in protest. There was no way I could let Mission near the Sith Academy, but I also understood her character, and that the wrong words would merely spur her to reckless behaviour.

“(Absolutely not, Mission!)” Zaalbar growled. “(Not if I have to truss-)”

“Zaalbar,” I snapped, and the Wookiee quietened. Mission’s headtails were already twitching in petulant protest and her eyes sparking with temper. I noticed absently that Bastila had closed hers. “Mission,” I said in a calm voice. “It would be suicide for you to go anywhere near the Sith Academy. No matter if you are unseen and unheard - it won’t stop Force users from sensing you. And if we were somehow separated, and other Dark Jedi thought you were a slave…”

“Slavery is an abhorrent practice,” Juhani hissed suddenly. “I do not think I could pretend to have one.”

Mission still looked mulish, and I sighed. “Look, I’d feel better if I knew you were still on the ‘Hawk. Dreshdae is Czerka controlled, and I don’t trust them not to go snooping around docked “Fine,” Mission said sulkily. “I’ll stay behind then.”

My eyes swung to the Mandalorian, and he lifted a brow at me. He hadn’t been forthright regarding his plans, and whether they included our quest or not. I loathed the idea of him leaving with full knowledge of what we were embarking upon, but then I also didn’t believe he’d betray me. Not without reason, anyway.

“What about you, Canderous?” I asked finally. “Are you with us?”

He stared at me for some time before finally answering. “Truthfully, I haven’t decided yet. There are things I haven’t quite worked out,” he said slowly, more cryptically than was customary from him. “I’m a mercenary these days, and other than the one job from Karon, I haven’t seen any credits. I remember Bastila promising me payment back on Tatooine.”

At her name, Bastila stirred, opening her eyes and sending Canderous an astringent look. “I believe I said the Masters would pay you well for your services, Canderous, and they shall. When we encounter them.”

“I don’t have anything to pay you,” I added. “Your assistance would be useful, although I don’t know how well a Mandalorian would fit in a Dark Jedi training facility…”

Canderous grunted. “I’ll check out Dreshdae, and go talk to some of the mercs. If you need my help, ask and we’ll talk. If I decide to go my own way, you’ll know.”

I looked at the large warrior, appraising him as I silently mulled over his words. He’d been generous with his time, and scathing with his insults. Definitely a self-centred man but with his own code of honour that I respected. I found myself hoping he’d stay.

“So, just you two then,” Carth was muttering “I suppose you’re right Jen, it’s the best option – but I don’t like it.”

“I’ll have Bastila as well,” I responded quietly, and she turned to look at me then, eyes as dark and silent as our bond had been of late. “I’m counting on your guidance to get through this, Bastila.”

She nodded, and a moment after I heard the words.

I will aid you the best I can.

…

A day later, and we were trudging through the plasteel tunnels of the Czerka colony. From the little I knew of Korriban, most of the planet was a dead rock, and Dreshdae the only actual settlement if you didn’t count the Academy. While it had a breathable atmosphere, Korriban was cold and sulphuric, so most sentients did not leave Dreshdae unless they had to.

I’d left the ‘Hawk outfitted with an alloy mesh armour Zaalbar had patched up, and a standard issue vibroblade visible on my hip. For our first foray into Dreshdae I thought it sensible to appear as mercenaries; by mutual consent, Juhani and I had both concealed our ‘sabers. She had, however, eschewed any form of armour despite the Wookiee’s growing collection.

As always, the local cantina was our first destination as a starting point for information and, therefore, Canderous joined us. He was on the lookout for a weapons trader; he’d lost his highly modified repeating blaster to the Selkath on Manaan, and we were all a bit sick of his grumbling regarding the fragilities of the Echani weaponry he was wielding.

After auto-printing the appropriate forms and paying the exorbitant docking fee to an officious Czerka employee, we moved out of the spaceport area of Dreshdae and towards the commercial sector, sparse and small though it may be. A cluster of uniformed Sith soldiers were chatting animatedly to each other at the turn of the corridor, but they quietened as we approached. The apparent leader, a young male human, eyed us over derogatively.

“Well, well, another group of worn out mercenaries come begging for a job,” he drawled to his followers.

Juhani tensed but Canderous seemed unfazed, treating them to one of his unimpressed stares.

“That’s the very definition of mercenaries, ain’t it. We go looking for jobs.”

“Oh great, a Mandalorian,” he muttered. “I’m sick of you lot crowding out the cantina. Why don’t you go find another war to lose?” The other soldiers snickered as the first sneered at Canderous. The Mandalorian looked at them disparagingly but stalked on; in another place, I’d doubt Canderous would allow such taunts without repercussion.

I shot him a questioning look as we left them behind.

“Kids playing with guns,” he drawled at me. “All bollocks and no brains. I’m not so old that I don’t remember being that cocky.”

I snorted. “Honestly, Canderous, I don’t think you’ve mellowed that much with age.”

He shot me a feral grin as we rounded a corner and the tunnel widened into a circular plaza, with numerous exits leading off to various retailers. The grubby beige walls were rounded outwards, marred with numerous vents that kept the air conditioned within the colony. Various holo-pictures were tacked up in a disorganized fashion, advertising products or services available throughout Dreshdae. Most of them were stamped with the Czerka emblem, the conglomerate that owned a fair whack of the galaxy’s commerce.

On Korriban, however, I wondered whether bounties and merc jobs were more prevalent than retail. Somehow, I can’t see people haggling over the price of the latest hygiene product to come from Alderaan. The scalp of some unfortunate – yes. That seems more likely.

The plaza was meant to be the central point of the colony, and I found it to be a bit of an ugly eyesore. The cantina’s entrance was immediately visible, and the three of us walked in cautiously. The décor was stark and bare in contrast to the plaza, immediately making me conclude that this place, at least, wasn’t run by a Czerka affiliate. The room itself was elongated and rectangular, split into two sides around a prominent bar that gleamed silver until artificial lighting.

Thick cigarra smoke clung to the vented ceiling, the source being a group of Mandalorian mercenaries drinking around a large table. Canderous’ attention was caught, and he strode over to them with a swagger in his step.

Juhani shot me a questioning look, and I shrugged my shoulders; at this stage, I didn’t have a better place to go as the rest of the cantina looked mostly deserted, so I wandered slowly after Canderous.

“Canderous Ordo!” the nearest Mandalorian hollered, catching sight of our motley group and standing in greeting. With amusement, I spotted five guns on his immediate person, and idly wondered how many more were concealed. Mandalorians.
“Ergeron Jangar,” Canderous replied. He sounded pleasantly surprised, an emotion relatively unfamiliar from the brawny Mandalorian. It briefly occurred to me that right here might be where we parted ways.

“I haven’t see you since Malachor,” the one called Ergeron commented. The other residents had turned to face Canderous appraisingly.

“You’re well decked out,” Canderous said. “Been adding guns to your collection?”

Losing interest, I surveyed the room again, this time my eye landing on a Twi’lek lounging in the opposite corner. One of the few other beings in the room had just placed a colourful drink on her table, and scurried off via a dismissive motion from her.

A tingle of premonition tickled me and I left Canderous, sauntering around the other side of the bar. The server was pouring another drink for the human who’d scuttled away. I felt the comforting presence of Juhani behind me and I paused for a moment, observing, while the same human tottered back to the corner, this time with a grotesque purple concoction clutched in his hands.

The Twi’lek, outfitted in a skimpy leather costume that left little to the imagination, appeared decidedly unimpressed. Her attire would have me picking her for a slave had it not been for her confident expression and obvious authority over the younger human, who’d slumped in dejection.

Tattoos inked over the top of violet lekku, and her sultry lips had been darkened to black. Her eyes… shot up swiftly to meet my appraisal, and I recognized them as an unnatural violet purple. Dark Jedi. Powerful, if her eyes have turned. I didn’t want to dwell on where that thought had originated.

I strode forward again, this time with forced confidence, and the Twi’lek once more shooed away the drink giver.

“Go away,” she said to him, pleasantly but firmly. Her striking eyes swung back to me. “And what do I have here, hmm? A couple of Force-sensitive mercenaries, loitering in Dreshdae.”

Her voice was sultry, melodious, and along with her attire oozed sexuality. With a start I realized I could sense the Force swirling around her and, by Juhani’s tense presence at my back, she had too.

Exercise caution, Bastila murmured. I hadn’t realized she was paying attention as the bond was still insubstantial and faded. The few times I’d seen her awake, Bastila had appeared as weak as a day old ash-rabbit. She may not be hostile, but a Dark Jedi of this power will not tolerate any insubordination.

“I am Ness Jonohl,” I introduced, a fake name spontaneously slipping from my tongue. “This is my friend Staria.”

“And you want to join the Sith,” the Twi’lek replied, her dark lips twisting in amusement.

I wanted access to the valley, the one the public HoloNet listed as the area of excavations and Force-sensitive tombs. But the Czerka officials in the docking bay had also informed me that only Sith students or associated personnel were permitted access.

I inclined my head at her, not quite willing to answer. She quirked an eyebrow at that, her smirk deepening.

“Not so apparently desperate as most others, I see,” she murmured. “Have a seat, Ness, and we’ll talk. Your friend Staria can buy me a Corellian whiskey.”

I looked questioningly at the two colourful cocktails placed in front of her, and a tinkling laugh met my unspoken question. “Dear Shaardan is still trying to guess my drink of choice. I suppose I should give him an indication of my preferences, but his eagerness to please is very amusing. You can have one, if you like.”

I shook my head in dismissal, not willing to trust drinks of unknown origin. “Can you get us both a whiskey, Staria?” I asked quietly over my shoulder.

I sensed the faint humming of disapproval through the bond. Be careful, Jen. You do not want to impair your judgement in front of a Dark Jedi master.

Her caution annoyed me as always, but now, perhaps, I could forgive her for it, better understanding the demon that lurked in my mind.

But I do need to ingratiate myself with her I suspect. First impressions are important.

There was a pause before she replied: Fair point.

I sat in a proffered chair, and the Twi’lek smiled at me, but her unnatural eyes were watchful, intent. “So,” she said at last. “I am Yuthura Ban, but I suspect you know that already if you’re here.”

I smiled in what I hoped was agreement, unwilling to disabuse her.

“You and your friend are either powerful, or already trained in the Force, either of which intrigues me,” she continued on. “Or I suppose you could be both. We get plenty of turned Jedi here, but normally they dress the part.” She looked down at my armour disparagingly, before eyeing over my face. I was uncomfortably aware of the swollen bruising still prevalent from my sparring. “If you wish to join our Academy, you need to prove your worth.”

Oh great. A little Sith initiation scheme no doubts. “And how do we do that?”

The amusement faded from her relaxed expression, chased by something akin to disappointment. “We Sith encourage independent thinking, but if you must have a little pointer, I will tell you thus: Open the Academy door yourself, and you will be admitted into our ranks.”

Juhani was back, placing our drinks down and taking a seat. She looked awkward and tense, and had not ordered a drink herself. Somehow, I had the feeling she generally abstained, being in the company of Dark Jedi notwithstanding. Yuthura glanced back at the Cathar, and once more appeared diverted.

“Of course, you could perform a little task for me, and I would then sponsor your application myself,” she said breezily.

I eyed over the two garish cocktails. The first had turned a murky green colour and appeared to be bubbling. “Let me guess, I have to order your favourite dinner?” I replied drily.

Yuthura laughed merrily, sounding genuinely entertained. “I think I can employ your talents a little more productively. Are you interested, Ness Jonohl?”

I paused at that, eyeing over the Twi’lek measuringly. There was no denying she held raw power and seemed content with her career choices, at least outwardly. Although Yuthura didn’t appear to be overtly evil, as such, there was no denying the Dark Side had corrupted her – at least, in a physical sense, if her eyes were anything to go by. Curiously, I wondered what her desires and motivations were.

“Why would I want to join the Sith?” I asked slowly.

Jen. This is a dangerous line of inquiry.

Yuthura looked surprised. “An interesting question,” she murmured, “and not one I hear often. For, after all, Force-sensitives on Dreshdae are usually here because they already know the benefits. But perhaps you are undecided. In the end, you will either embrace ultimate power or run in cowardice.”

“Ultimate power,” I said sceptically. Not every little Sithling wields ultimate power. Some run. Some hide. Some go insane, as Evil Bitch so often showcases.

Her face turned contemplative, almost rapturous as she elaborated. “There is nothing as glorious as bending the Force to your will. It rewards the cunning and the mighty – we, who have been gifted and set above the rest.” Her eyes snapped back to mine, piercing in their luminescence. “So, what is it to be? I desire a truthful answer. Are you here to be a Sith or not?”

“What are your tasks?” I riposted. I picked up my glass and took a cautious sip. The liquid burned a slow, welcoming fire deep in my belly.

A responding smile curved her full, dark lips. “There is a… very important visitor hiding out in the private Czerka suites. She is one of us, but she has not made herself known to either myself or my master. It would be… intriguing if someone could unearth her reasons for hiding out on Korriban. I would proceed with caution, however.” Yuthura tapped long fingers on the tables. I sensed rather than saw Juhani shift in uneasiness. “Alternatively, you could eliminate a group of runaways from the Academy. Last seen heading to the shyrack caves – although I do suggest you research those first. Force sensitives rarely, if ever, return from there, and I imagine Thalia May and her friends have long since perished. Proof of that would suffice.” Yuthura looked me over again. “If none of those appeal to you, human, then you shall just have to find another way of impressing me.”

“You left us to die!” a voice roared from behind us, and I twisted around to see one of Mandalorian mercenaries shake an armoured fist threateningly at Canderous.

“Mercenaries,” Yuthura muttered derisively. “Arguing over the size of their vibroblades, no doubt.”

“I did what was necessary at the time,” Canderous bellowed back. “If I had not done it, the battle would have-”

“The battle would have been won anyway!” the other man snarled.

“Excuse me, I’ll think about what you said,” I muttered absently and left the Twi’lek, who shot me a startled, perhaps even offended, glance. Juhani scrabbled to her feet to follow me.

“I will have my vengeance – for the men who died at Althir. I challenge you to a blood duel, Canderous of clan Ordo!” The angry words rang out clearly though the cantina. I froze halfway back to the mercenaries, who had all fallen silent, warily watching Canderous and the other Mandalorian face each other. They both wore identical expressions of rage. A blood duel? A dazed vertigo assailed me briefly; I shook my head irritably and it dispersed.

“I did what was expedient, and for the greater glory of Mand’alor, Jagi,” Canderous countered in a low, furious tone. “I’ll not hesitate to fight you, but for the sake of our history I’ll give you one last chance to back out.”

Jagi, darker-skinned and slighter in build, threw back his head and laughed mockingly. It was an angry sound. “It was for the greater glory of Canderous Ordo! Are you so without honour that you refuse to accept? You bring shame onto your clan-”

“Shut your mouth!” Canderous thundered. His jaw was set. “I accept, Jagi of clan Bala. It will be your end.”

“You will not win,” Jagi’s voice had dropped, his eyes narrowing in unconcealed fury. “Not when the debt of honour is so great. In fact- I call upon a second! Allen of clan Bala, will you guard my back and fight for my honour, should I be no more than a battle song?”

One of the other warriors who had been at the back of the pack, out of sight, stepped forward to face Canderous. He was dark haired and skinned, with the same wiry build and long face as Jagi. Brothers, I bet.

“Allen-” Canderous started in surprise.

The man’s lips twisted. “Yeah, I survived too. Only a handful of us got out alive – the rest were slaughtered for your glory. Jagi, I accept!”

Canderous swung his attention back to Jagi, and his eyes had turned flinty grey. His rugged face could have been carved from permacrete. “Very honourable, Jagi, to challenge me away from my clan,” he drawled sarcastically.

“If you can’t find a second, Canderous, that’s your problem. You’ll just have to go through both of us if you want to gain a shred of dignity back.” Jagi crossed his arms, a smug look of righteous superiority gaining precedence on his weathered face.

Canderous must have glanced towards Ergeron, for I spotted his friend shake his head ever so slightly.

“I need time to contact my allies,” Canderous bit out. “You cannot deny-”

“Three days,” Jagi spat. “I have waited years to repay you in kind. I shall not give you the chance to run away. I challenge you to reclaim your honour outside the shyrack caves, at dawn in three days time! My choice of weapons is vibroblades.”

There was an undercurrent of murmuring at that, and I saw a look of distaste cross Canderous’ face. “Vibroblades?” he countered derisively.

A scowl twisted Jagi’s long face. “Not so good with those, are you, Canderous? Vibroblades may not be traditional, but they will do. I will reclaim my honour!” Jagi’s voice had the ring of righteous fury towards the end.

The wooziness returned, and with it, a memory...

An older man, heavily muscled and highly armoured, faced me across a dusty clearing that was sattered with corpses and limbs and broken weaponry. His face was pierced and tattooed; his eyes dark and watchful. Dozens of heavyset Mandalorian warriors stood some way back, weaponless and mostly injured. Near all had markings on their face. Clan leaders.
Surrounding them was a mass of Republic soldiers that stretched deep into the distance, swamping clusters of unarmed Mandalorian foot soldiers. Plumes of smoke decorated the landscape, and here and there was the shine of a lightsaber announcing the presence of a Jedi.

“Dereck of clan Takal has accepted,” the man stated, his eyes never leaving mine. He wore an ornate horned helmet; ostentatiously visible and marking him as supreme leader. “This battlefield may be the end of our offensive, but I will reclaim my honour by striking you, the leader of my enemy, down first!”

“You don’t have to do this,” a voice muttered behind me. It sounded furious. “It’s insane, even for you.”

The older man continued taunting. “Dereck of clan Takal will fight for my honour should I be no more than a battle song on the lips of my clan. Is there no one who will stand as your second, Jedi Revan Freeflight? Is there no one who believes in your honour?”

…

An overwhelming nausea threatened to overwhelm me as I struggled to push the vision away. My stomach heaved. Just when I thought that bitch was quiet, memories of her past had to overrun my present.

Jen?

Did you see that? I fired through the bond, as the vertigo assailing me slowly melted away. I felt Juhani’s hand on my arm, anchoring me to the present.

I cannot see through your eyes, Jen.

“As I thought,” Jagi taunted mockingly. “No one here is willing to stand up for your honour.”

Canderous will lose face, even should he win, I realized with sudden clarity.

My head shot up and I strode forward to Canderous’ side. I could see him shaking with fury. The words tumbled out, clear and loud and fierce. “I will stand for Canderous of clan Ordo. I, Jen of clan Sahara, will guard his back and fight for his honour should he be no more than a battle song on the lips of his clan!”

Canderous jerked his head to face me, intense and severe, but I found myself unable to read his expression.

Jen, what are you doing?

Jagi scoffed mockingly as he glanced at me in derision. “An outsider, Canderous? Really?”

“Says the one duelling with vibroblades,” I snapped. “Outsiders are allowed, even if it is unorthodox. Didn’t your Mandalore fight Darth Revan in a blood duel?”

For some reason Canderous choked, appearing visibly startled as he continued to stare at me. Jagi, on the other hand, just looked annoyed. “Big words from such a small human. This does not concern you.”

“I accept, Jen of clan Sahara.” Canderous said, his voice strong and sure, his eyes still never leaving mine.
“Fine, so be it,” Jagi spat. “I’ll spread the word, Canderous, so if you don’t show you’ll be known far and wide as the disgraced coward you are!”

“I will be there, Jagi!” Canderous snarled, swinging back to face his old comrade. “See that you are!”

This is unwise, Jen. This is not what we are here on Korriban for.

Canderous is one of us, I shot back.

Is he?

Jagi and his presumed brother Allen stalked past us and out of the cantina. I spotted Canderous’ old friend Ergeron edge away towards the bar.

Well, I daresay he will be after this duel.

“Thank you, Jen Sahara,” Canderous muttered. “You don’t understand what this means to a Mando’ade. Or– maybe you do. I dunno,” he scowled. “I need to be on my own for a bit. Jagi was a good friend and a fellow warrior, once. I’ll– I guess you have some questions, and you have a right to them. But give me some time. I’ll see you back at the ‘Hawk tomorrow.”

With a nod, more respectful than I’d seen from him before, he turned and left the cantina. The remaining mercenaries looked away from us, murmuring amongst themselves. I turned around, back towards the Twi’lek Dark Jedi, but some time during the ensuing confrontation Yuthura had left.

“That was unexpected,” Juhani said softly, her slanted eyes holding mine as if in question. A blood duel, I wondered. Unexpected is not the word. And another flashback from the insane villain in my head. Bastila had told me, back on Tatooine, that I’d been a Jedi once and followed Darth Revan into the Mandalorian Wars and subsequently the Dark Side. I shivered. If that was true – and I didn’t entirely trust Bastila’s honesty – then perhaps I’d actually seen that famous duel.

I’d have one up on Canderous then, ha.

What do you mean?

And there was my bond-sister once more. Bastila had thought more words to me in the previous hour than we’d spoken since we first entered Manaan airspace. My thoughts were whirling from this unexpected Mandalorian business, but more pressing were the words that needed to be said between us. I’d vowed to stop running, and that meant facing up to Bastila.

We need to talk, Bastila. I pushed the thought out decisively before I could change my mind. I found something out on Rii’shn.

She paused before replying. Something that made you return?

Yes. Something that made me realize I couldn’t keep running.

There was another silence. I felt like we were stepping on eggshells around each other, both wary and trying to keep a peace that neither was sure would last. Our track record hadn’t exactly been promising. I idly wondered if the Jedi Order had ever had two such ill-matched people bond together.

“Jen, are you okay?” Juhani queried. I nodded briefly at her, vaguely aware that I was standing still in the middle of the cantina, staring blindly at a side wall. I stalked over to the nearest chair and sat, with Juhani following me in puzzlement.

“Just having a conversation with Bastila,” I explained.

Very well. Bastila’s mental voice sounded weary, and fainter than before. Say what you will.

I would prefer to talk in person. I needed to see her face. She had the upper edge with the bond - I did not underestimate Bastila’s mental aptitude with the Force. I had to see her expressions, indicators that would give her away. Our inconvenient mind-link was too easy to hide in.

If you must. But may I suggest you pay a visit to the Academy first. It would be a good idea to orientate yourself even if you cannot get past the door.

See what we’re up against, huh. It shouldn’t take long, and wasn’t a bad idea. Judging from Yuthura’s description, I was willing to bet some sort of dark Force power was required to get in. It’s one way of proving yourself a Sith. I didn’t really fancy sucking up to Yuthura – tracking down Dark Jedi, runaway or otherwise, wasn’t appealing and likely to end in bloodshed. Bloodshed – the very thing I was trying to avoid. On Korriban, of all places.

Okay. We’ll go see what’s so special about this sodding door. Then I’ll come back and we’ll talk.

xXx

Outside the colony the air tasted sharp and stung irritably in my eyes. The landscape was bleak; dusty moors stretching into rocky outcrops on either side. One sun radiated a harsh light that reflected glaringly from all sides. I squinted in annoyance and wished for a visor of some description.

“If you embrace the Force it aids somewhat,” Juhani murmured quietly. “And perhaps it is prudent to be prepared in a place such as this.”

It was relatively deserted outside; I’d spotted a group of traders and their droids head towards the west, following a beaten path that led towards the nearby cliffs. The shyrack caves, I mused, remembering a detailed holo-map of the area transmitted on the side of our docking bay. From what Yuthura implied, that area is safer for non Force users. I wonder why.

My attention swung back the other way, towards a wide ferracrete path inlaid deep into the stone ground. Blocks of varying shades of grey had been placed in a pleasing pattern, forming a sort of road that twisted towards the nearby mountains. From here, I could see where it ended – in a distant archway etched into the side of the nearest peak.

“That’s the academy,” I said softly. “It’s dug deep into the rock. There’s an exit on the other side of the peak and that grants access to the Sith tombs. There’s at least six different Sith lords laid to rest there, in tombs riddled with traps and archaeological mysteries.”

Juhani turned to stare at me in surprise. “How do you know all that, Jen?” she whispered.

“It’s amazing what you find on the HoloNet,” I answered wryly, taking a breath and starting the short journey to the Academy. “Although, granted, there wasn’t much about Korriban.” Certainly I didn’t find anything on the Star Map, but being an ancient Force relic it was a logical conclusion that its location was with a dead Sith Lord. Dark Force users were attracted to power, after all. I grimaced.

We lapsed into a comfortable silence, trudging along the strikingly decorative path as the dusty planet echoed an emptiness all around us. The road was surprisingly quiet, and I found myself curious about my Cathar friend. Although we’d spent a lot of time together recently, it had mostly revolved around Force discussions and meditation.

“What made you decide to join the Jedi, Juhani?” I asked, breaking the silence at last.

She glanced at me, her slanted eyes widening in deep surprise. To my astonishment, her cheeks turned a faint red. Juhani… blushing?

Jen. Are you prying? Bastila’s tone was sharp, and yet she still felt incorporate, weak. I ignored her.

“You don’t have to talk, if you don’t want to,” I said mildly, but I was certainly interested. “I mean, I’m certainly interested, but your secrets are your own, my friend.”

She breathed in sharply at that, as if I’d shocked her once more. Then a genuine, warm, smile curved her face. “Thank you, Jen Sahara,” Juhani said softly. “We Cathar do not make friends easily. Your manner and respect means a lot to me.”

I smiled back, feeling lighter. Juhani had been the only one not to question me about Rii’shn, and my actions on the ‘Hawk prior. She simply accepted that it had been a struggle with the Dark Side, and that now, I was back on the right track. I didn’t really know how I’d come to deserve the Cathar’s regard.

I expected the conversation to be over, so was surprised when Juhani spoke again.

“The Mandalorians slaughtered most of my people on Cathar. I was but a kit, then, and the Republic didn’t yet acknowledge them as a threat – they were still busy rebuilding after Exar Kun.” She paused, her eyes tawny and thoughtful in the harsh Korriban sunlight. “My parents were refugees, and they found sanctuary on Taris.”

“Taris,” I said blankly. “Taris? As in, the scum infested hole flyboy and I crashed on?”

She smiled, but it was sad, almost tormented. I recalled suddenly how non-humans were persecuted on that planet. “Yes. My father lasted three months before lashing out against a member of the aristocracy – he was jailed, and my mother never saw him again. I believe that is when she truly began to struggle, a non-human refugee on Taris, trying to raise a young daughter on her own.”

Juhani trailed off, and we walked for minutes in silence. Jen Sahara’s childhood was, despite her oppressive father, peaceful and happy. Street Kid’s – mine – well, I’d only had glimpses of it. While the poverty could likely compare to Juhani’s, somehow I felt I’d been luckier, or coped better. Or had the advantage of a strong friend at my back. The bitter melancholy I sensed from my friend touched on a childhood fraught with pain.

Juhani breathed in deeply and continued her story. “I will not wallow in memories, but suffice to say – my mother died in debt to the Exchange, and I was taken as payment. Then, a group of Jedi came, and changed everything.”

There was no elaboration at first. The path was steeper now, climbing up the rocky outcrop. We’d turned a sharp bend, and the deep archway was hidden from view, but it couldn’t be far, now.
“They rescued you?”

“They shut down the child slave trade, and set up schools and orphanages. One of them spoke to me, told me I had Force sensitivity, and that I could pursue training should I wish. I... I was enamoured, and it became a burning drive to emulate these heroes and follow in their footsteps. It was an end to the nightmare that had been Taris, and not long after I was on Dantooine, making my dream a reality.”

It sounded lovely, and had altered life drastically for Juhani, but Taris hadn’t seemed any better when I’d visited it. “The Exchange were still running a slave trade not so long ago. I didn’t see any services for orphans, and discrimination was rampant. The Jedi-”

“Saved my life, and that of many others,” Juhani cut in sharply, fire flashing in her eyes. “You do not know the torment I suffered through on Taris. You have no idea what it is like to be bound like a beast and treated as such!”

“I don’t dispute that Juhani. Just whether the Jedi made any lasting difference on Taris.”

She sighed, a look of defeat passing her eyes as her anger faded. “Perhaps you are right. They left, to fight the Mandalorians, and I expect Taris went back to the way it always had been. It… it was a rat-hole, a festering warren… but as much as I hated it, it was still home. I grieved when I heard of the orbital bombardment.”

I mulled over the timing in my head. “You would have been with us then.”

Juhani nodded in assent. “I overheard Mission speaking of it, on the Ebon Hawk after we left Tatooine. I didn’t want to believe it. This is the first I have spoken of it.”

Juhani was an intensely private person, I realized as I looked at her sideways. Dressed plainly, she strode with a sinewy grace, and her very build right to the warriors tail at the back of her head calmly stated that this was not someone to be trifled with. We were lucky to have her with us.

We’d rounded another bend, and the Academy entrance suddenly loomed into view, tall pillars carved deep into a stark cliff face. The arch of the inset entrance was higher than I thought, grand and imposing. Foreign symbols were etched on either side of expansive double doors that appeared to be made out of a dark form of ferracrytal.

I shivered. I felt a cloying, hungry feeling all around me, and hoped like frell that Evil Bitch hadn’t been here before. Who am I kidding. Of course she sodding well has. She probably tortured all sorts of budding lil Sithlings.

And found the Star Map.

I stopped in the middle of the path, some distance away from the structure, where I could make out three figures hanging about the entrance. I didn’t know who’d found the Star Maps. Bastila had said that Malak – and presumably Evil Bitch before him – was believed to be using whatever the maps pointed to, to power their expansive armada.

Yet Street Kid had found the one on Tatooine, I remembered that much. I don’t want to believe that I followed them down into depravity, down into the Dark Side. Maybe Bastila had only said that to explain the murderous anger in my head, without divulging Revan’s presence. How else could she explain it away? My eyes narrowed, as my thoughts spun wildly. Then maybe I’d been on this same quest – to stop Malak and Revan before. Before... before whatever happened at Deralia to me and Jen and Darth Evil Bitch. Before she tortured Jen.
Or maybe… maybe I really did turn dark, and I found the Star Map on Revan’s orders.

No… I didn’t want to think that… couldn’t think that. Street Kid was good, dammit, she had a good heart and strength of character and was everything I wanted to be. She’d loved a good man, and that love was returned, from the little I had seen.

I wonder what happened to him. Intense sadness assailed me, for surely there was no answer, other than death, to that question. Otherwise, where was he now?

Well, I thought with finality. Maybe I did fight in the Mandalorian Wars, but that doesn’t mean I followed the same path of corruption. Surely not every Jedi who fought to protect the Republic would have turned around and betrayed it. Surely I wouldn’t have. I had a feeling that the strength of the Republic had been important to Street Kid. I won’t believe I fell. Not until Bastila gives me a name I can ‘Net search for myself.

I noticed Juhani looking at me measuringly, waiting with patience in the middle of the dusty road. She probably assumed I was once more chatting with my bond sister, and I gave her a brief nod. I need to think towards the solution. I’m involved in this quest because I’ve found at least one of the maps before. I may have been exceedingly unhelpful on Tatooine and Manaan, but dammit – that’s changing now. Surely either Evil Bitch or Street Kid have been to the Korriban Star Map before.

I idly wondered if there was a way to force flashbacks, before realizing how dangerously unpalatable that would be should it provoke Revan. I’d be happy if I never heard her again.

Bastila, I pushed out through the bond. Who found the Korriban Star Map before?

There was no answer. I nudged slightly against our psychic link, and it provided little resistance – Bastila, I believed, had fallen into a deep sleep. I sighed, and strode forward. Yet again, it seemed my answers would have to wait.

As we neared, it became obvious that a human man dressed in plain dark clothes was in charge, and having a great deal of enjoyment berating the other two - a young Bothan and a slightly older human, both of whom were standing to attention.

“You moved! True Sith show dedication, Jorso,” the first man mocked, twirling a deactivated lightsaber in his hands. “After eighteen hours, I expect you to be better, not worse!”

Our footsteps slowed, and the Dark Jedi human turned to sneer at us. “I think you took the wrong turn, mercenaries, unless you’re hungry for a little lightsaber action. So get lost, unless you want me to teach you a lesson.”

I felt my eyebrows lift. “Wow. And I’d heard the Sith were so polite,” I drawled. Juhani shifted next to me into a battle ready pose.

A curious, calculating look crossed the man’s face and he strode over to us, leaving the other two standing prone at the entrance of the great Academy.

“We can be, if it’s in our interests. You must be hopefuls, dressed as common mercs. Well, you can always join them.” The man jerked his head sharply towards the two behind him a cruel smile on his lips.

“What are you doing to them?” Juhani asked, her voice quietly intense. She was getting upset, although in truth the Bothan and older human didn’t look to be in pain of any sort.

The man smirked. “It’s simple, really. I’ll let in whoever remains standing the longest. If I’m in a good mood.”

Juhani’s eyes flashed fire. “You should not toy with people's lives! That’s disgusting and barbaric.”

The man gave her a decidedly unimpressed glare. “I’m sorry, did you think we were in a nursery?” he sneered.

I snorted, strode past him and up to the looming doors. The two hopefuls refused to meet my eye, and now that I was next to them I saw the human was pale and sweating. The Bothan looked a little better, but his fur was probably concealing his true condition. I took a step closer to the door and pushed.

It was as ineffectual as I expected, and I heard a snicker behind me. I forced my weight behind it, pushing harder, to no avail. Sighing, I drew slightly on the Force, tasting its life and sweetness and tempting power, and then released it in a focussed punch at the door.

“That didn’t frelling work either,” I muttered.

“You must be very sharp to possess such an astute sense of perception!” the Dark Jedi called out mockingly from behind. I sighed again, turned, and strode back to him and Juhani. “Obviously deaf, however, since I asked you to leave.”

I ignored that, and stared the human straight in the face. Angry blue eyes under a shock of black hair met mine dead on – he was handsome and young, in his early twenties, much younger than me.

I ignored that, and stared the human straight in the face. Angry blue eyes under a shock of black hair met mine dead on – he was handsome and young, in his late teens or early twenties. Much younger than me.

“I’ll leave,” I answered, aware my silence had been nonplussing him. “After you’ve told me what sort of Force is required to open the door.” It’d be something dark, a twisted application of the living energy all around us.

“You think I would tell you?” he snapped back, his mouth contorting. “Have my brains started dribbling out of my nose, or something?”

Juhani shifted again, and he eyed her over, still scowling. The sun winked behind the cliffs as late afternoon shadow threw the entrance into dusk.

“Look, if you two want to be admitted, go and see Yuthura in Dreshdae like the rest of the rabble.” He smiled, and it was a cruel sight. “Tell her Mekel sent you. Unless, of course, you want to join Jorso and Drel.”

“You won’t let either of them in, will you,” Juhani whispered. “You would let them die out here of exposure first.”

“Idiot,” he sneered at her. “A Sith is not a bantha, all endurance and no brains. If these rotgrubs are as stupid as they seem then they deserve their fate.”

I looked the human man up and down, considering my options silently. If I challenged Mekel, I was pretty confident I could force my way into the Academy. But I wasn’t ready to resort to violence, not yet, not if there was another way. The evil presence in my head hamstrung me.

Maybe I do need to investigate Yuthura’s tasks first. I wasn’t naïve enough to believe we could find the map without any violence – not here, not on Korriban – but I didn’t exactly want to rush into it. Pain and anger were the two guaranteed ways to wake up Revan.

And I liked having my head back to myself.

I sighed. “Let’s go back, for now.” I nodded at Mekel, or whoever he was. “I’ll see you again.”

“Jen,” Juhani hissed after I’d taken a few steps. I stopped, raising a quizzical eyebrow. “Are we just going to leave those poor men there in the hands of that… Sith?”

I looked back at the Academy. Mekel had turned to saunter back to the others, who were still standing immobile, desperation blinding them to the obvious. Empathy was something I aspired to, especially now, now with the shattering knowledge I’d acquired on Rii’shn. But there was a time and a place, and honestly – we had more vital things to be concerned about. “I highly doubt they’ll perish, Juhani,” I said slowly. “Persuading them to leave will draw Mekel’s attention more than I’d like to at the moment. They are here by their own choice, and we simply cannot afford the risk of convincing them otherwise.”

She looked at me for a long time before nodding reluctantly. “I hope you are right, Jen. For I believe if we have the opportunity to redeem someone, we should grasp it wholeheartedly.”

We started walking back, and a chill swept me as the light slowly faded. Redemption… While I admired Juhani’s righteous drive, I only had to look inside my own head to see that for some, redemption was simply not an option.

xXx
A scout around

-Mission Vao-

It was boring being trapped in the ‘Hawk. We’d just spent weeks all cooped up together in hyperspace, and now that we’d actually landed I was eager to have a scout around.

But Big Z was following me like a bristling overgrown guard. I mean, sheesh, I’d promised to stay behind and not to go to the Academy of Evil, but surely a look around Dreshdae wouldn’t be that dangerous. I’d even take Zaalbar along, if he wasn’t such a noticeable, hairy pain in the behind.

“(Mission, you can help me with this,)” Zaalbar suggested from his customary place by the repair bay. He was holding a handful of dissembled armour plates in a furry paw. I wrinkled my nose at him.

“No way. I mean, no offense Big Z, but I’d rather go talk to Bastila.” My eyes caught on the blue and white exoskeleton I’d purchased from Canderous; Zaalbar had laid it in his completed pile. I jumped off the bench I’d been lounging on and moved to pick it up.

“(You should be nicer to her, Mission, she’s been through a lot lately,)” Zaalbar reproved.

“Yeah, yeah,” I muttered absently, picking it up. Sturdy, and lighter now that Zaalbar had removed some of the panelling to resize it, it might just end up being perfect. I struggled to fit it on, and Zaalbar walked over to help.

“(The fit might be loose,)” Zaalbar worried, and he connected the automatic clasps at the side. I felt the armour shrink to fit around my waist. “(It is made for a human male after all, but I think it will do.)”

I brightened, taking a few exploratory steps. “I’m not used to the weight, but I’ll give it a go. Thanks, Big Z!”

I headed towards the central common room, trialling the armour and eager for some company. Carth was there, sipping a cup of caffa and appearing highly amused as Bastila paced in circles, muttering under her breath. He quirked an eyebrow as I entered.

“Nice get-up, Mission,” he said drily. A frown crossed his face. “Hey, isn’t that Calo Nord’s old armour?”

“Yeah, Big Z fixed it up for me.” I spun around, flexing my shoulders. “Not sure about it yet, though. What’s up with her?” I jerked a thumb in Bastila’s direction; she had slumped against the durasteel wall. Shadows smudged bruises under her eyes, which drifted closed.

“Something about Canderous, Jen, and a duel,” Carth commented, placing his cup down on the chrome bench. A flash of irritation crossed his face.

“Huh. Nothing out of the ordinary then,” I said, expecting a knowing grin from him but he just looked further annoyed. I glanced over to the Jedi again, who was still leaning against the wall. There were hollows in her cheeks, and she looked like she’d lived through a famine. I wasn’t sure who appeared worse these days, her or Jen, whose patchwork of facial bruising might finally get a chance to heal if she’d stop challenging that old Mandalorian geezer.
“Bastila,” Carth called, “You look like you’re going to fall asleep there. Maybe you should think about retiring?”

She opened tired eyes, and seemed to notice me for the first time. “Hello Mission,” she said in greeting, with a forced smile. Maybe I’m too hard on her. “Perhaps you are right, Carth. I think I shall lie down for a moment, at least until the others return.”

“And I’m gonna go for a walk,” I said breezily as Bastila slowly left the room. I pulled at the side of the armour. It wasn’t totally comfortable, but the thought of being Force-resistant was super-awesome. Especially on Korriban. That’d make it safe enough to have a scout around, right?

“A walk? A walk where?”

“Sheesh,” I snapped, turning around to glare at Carth. “Why is everyone on my tail all of a sudden?”

He raised his hands in surrender. “Sorry, Mission, but I don’t fancy having Zaalbar breathe down my neck when he notices you missing.”

I folded my arms, wrinkling my nose in irritation even while I conceded his point. No one liked having to deal with a grumpy seven foot Wookiee, although I was sure he wouldn’t hurt Carth too bad.

I brightened as a thought occurred to me. “Maybe you could wear a visor and a hat, or something, and come out too? Big Z won’t mind if someone else is with me, y’know.” Carth wasn’t all that bad. And humans all looked the same, surely no one would recognize him with a little bit of effort on our part.

Carth grinned wryly. “You can probably convince me, Mission. If Zaalbar’s alright with it—”

“He’s my friend, not my mother!”

“...and when Canderous is back.” Carth spoke over me. “I don’t like leaving the Ebon Hawk empty. I don’t trust those shifty Czerka dock workers, and Bastila’s too well known, and too hurt.” The familiar look of mistrust creased his brow.

I rolled my eyes. “Fine, I’ll just go look around the docking bay then.”

“Okay… I’ll just wait by the loading ramp then.” He was back to sounding amused.

I stuck my tongue out at him and stalked out of the ship, muttering under my breath. Why does no one trust me these days? I know I snuck out on Tatooine after promising Bastila I wouldn’t, but that was only ‘cause she was being such a bossy snot. I unlocked the main hatch and jumped off the ramp to the grilled floor below. Landing on the balls of my feet, I absorbed the impact with minimal sound. I used to make a game of it, back on Taris, jumping from duct to platform as silently as possibly.

I surprised a Trandoshan dressed in a white Czerka shirt, who stumbled back from the ‘Hawk with his hands outstretched. It looked like he’d been inspecting the line number embossed on the side of the hull. Not that it was ship specific, and I was sure Carth had checked any registration numbers had already been scored off long ago, but still. Sneaky little gorg.

“What are you doing here?” I demanded. “I’m pretty sure we dealt with all the paperwork when we landed.”
“(Just a customary check of docked ships!)” he pleaded unconvincingly, turning around to make a hasty retreat. His steps were fast, and direct to the exit hatch.

“Stay away from our ship, ronto-breath!” I hollered after him as Carth’s footsteps clattered down the loading ramp.

“Czerka Corporation,” Carth muttered from behind me. “About as corrupt as the Exchange, but at least with the Exchange you know where you stand.”

“What d’ya think he wanted?” I asked, frowning. The door to the colony swished closed behind the shady dockworker.

“Who knows?” Carth sighed. “We’ve paid upfront to dock our ship for ten days in an individual landing bay. Maybe that’s enough to warrant curiosity. Maybe the signature Teethree programmed doesn’t quite match up. Stang, maybe he was just looking to see if the Ebon Hawk was empty and he could pinch something.”

Well, I couldn’t judge that too harshly, I thought, my fingers twitching. I took a few more steps, well aware that Carth wasn’t leaving his watchful position from the ship. I scowled, and had a long look around the bay. Tomorrow, I’ll sneak out.

The dock was pretty standard really, an open air walled-in area with a refuelling gig on the side that was currently empty. But it wasn’t that long ago when I’d never been off-planet. I’d never even been in a docking bay, before. It was amazing how, after a few planets, the awe wore off.

The bay itself was large, suited for vessels even bigger than the Ebon Hawk, and we’d paid for privacy. Our ship’s computer had been loaded with an account full of credits from the Republic when we left Manaan – which was good, really, ‘cause other than me and my swoop winnings, everyone else had been pretty much flat broke.

The air had a funny taste to it and I wrinkled my nose, glancing over to the dock door that would grant entrance into the fully enclosed colony. A terminal by the exit caught my eye and I scampered over, noting that the armour didn’t slow me down. I tapped a few keys to access the public HoloNet, disabling audio output and making a face at the mandatory Czerka adverts taking up half the screen.

I could get Teethree out here, to hack into the system and see what he can do. My slicing skills didn’t usually let me down, but they were nothing on a droid as spec’d as Teethree. Maybe, just maybe, he might be able to find something about these mystical Star Maps.

xXx

“Mission,” Jen said in greeting, as her and Juhani entered the docking bay some time later. “What are you and Teethree doing?”

I grimaced. My neck ached from bending over the console, and my throat was sore. I blamed it on the weird smell – it wasn’t as bad as parts of the Lower City had been, but the stench of refuse and unwashed sentient didn’t grate against your throat the way Korriban’s air did. “Information gathering. Not doing very well though. How’d you guys go?”

“Let’s go inside to talk,” she replied, tilting her head towards the ship. Juhani nodded in greeting to me, but said nothing. I rolled my shoulders, which had tensed up a bit, unaccustomed to the weight of the exoskeleton, and spotted Carth still lounging by the entrance ramp. Yikes, he’s got some serious staying power. We’ve been here for ages! Or maybe he really is scared of Zaalbar. I stuck my tongue out at him as we passed, and he shot me a very dry look.

“Is Bastila asleep?” Jen queried once we were inside, and the hatch was firmly closed and locked behind us. She sounded like she already knew the answer.

“Yep,” I answered, skipping ahead of her deeper into the ship.

“Hey,” she called out behind me. “Isn’t that Calo Nord’s exoskeleton?”

“Far out,” I said in frustration, “Canderous loots it and no one cares. Now it’s like the hottest topic of conversation.” Next I fully expected Teethree to grill me on it, if Bastila didn’t beat him to it.

“No, it’s just that – doesn’t it have some sort of neural Force resistance?

I stopped, frowning, and turned to face her in the ‘Hawk’s main corridor. It was an ugly ship really, dull durasteel plating running through the entirety of the vessel without any form of decoration to break up the industrial look. That surprised me - it used to be that creep Davik’s ship, and I remembered the flamboyant clothes he always wore. I wondered idly if I should do something to spruce the place up a bit.

“Canderous’d said it’d protect from the Force using cortosis, whatever that is.”

She tilted her head, a frown creasing her face as she stared at me intently. “Cortosis only stops ‘sabers, that’s why some vibroblades can block them,” she murmured absently. “There’s something about it… Mission, can I try something?”

“Sure,” I said brightly. “I trust you.”

Jen froze at that, before a dull red colour rose in her cheeks. I realized what I’d said, then, and that it was true – even after what had happened in Manaan. I smiled at her. “The past is in the past, right?” I said softly. “You’re back with us and I just know you won’t do something like that again.”

Her eyes widened, and a wondering look crossed her face. “Thank you, Mission,” she said very softly. “I’ll endeavour to be worthy of that.” Concentration chased away the emotion, and she raised her hand, palm out. I felt a vague pressure around my middle, pressing inwards, before it dissipated.

“Interesting,” she murmured. “I wonder what it is. It offers some defense. I wouldn’t trust it as invulnerability against Dark Jedi though, it has its limits, and only protects against direct attacks at your torso.”

Juhani had poked her head into the corridor, shooting Jen an inquiring look. Jen grinned, dropped her hand, and motioned me onwards.

Carth and Zaalbar were waiting for us in the centre of the ship, and as I moved to sit next to my furry friend, I heard an ominous rumble from his stomach. Hungry again. We’d better get him something before he gets grouchy. I know what he’s like when he doesn’t get his ten square meals a day. And none of us were fans of that regurgitated gloop from the ‘Hawk’s kitchenette, not even Zaalbar, who’d been known to eat refried bantha kidneys.

“So, what’s this I hear about a fight?” Carth asked Jen as she found a seat. The common room was pretty crowded with us all in there, and we didn’t even have Bastila or Canderous in attendance.

She grimaced. “Canderous had a bit of history come up. We’ll sort it.”
“You don’t think we need to stay focussed on our mission?” his voice was pretty mild, neutral even, but I could see a flare of irritation in Jen’s bright eyes.

“Not you, too,” she muttered. “Look, Canderous is one of our crew. If I can help him–”

“He’s a merc, Jen. You’ve heard him, he only cares about payment–”

“Yet he’s been there for both Star Maps,” she countered, voice low and serious. “And found us a way off Taris. He’s been a pretty large part of things, whether he claims it’s just a job or not.”

I saw Carth pause at that, considering her words. I mean, I wasn’t that sure about Canderous either, but the gruff Mandalorian didn’t seem all that bad. Even if he did get pissy when I called him an old geezer. “I reckon Jen’s got a point, Carth. I mean, we’re all part of the same team, y’know. We should look out for one another.”

I spotted Juhani looking at me with a weird expression on her face. I’d never really spoken much to her; she’d kept herself apart and seemed disinterested in anyone who wasn’t a Force user. She was so quietly intense, and my first meeting with her hadn’t exactly laid the foundations for a good relationship between us.

Juhani was smiling at my words, a small but hopeful smile, and I wondered whether I’d had her pegged wrong from the start. Maybe she’s just shy. Shy, and scared. With the Dark Side experiences her and Jen’d had, I could understand that. I beamed exuberantly at her, and she blinked in surprise.

Carth sighed, nodding at me before glancing back over to Jen. “You’re right, both of you. We are a team – not the ones the Jedi Council would’ve picked, but we’re doing better than the Endar Spire ever did. I might just have to overcome my disillusionment of Mandalorians.”

Jen snickered at that, but Juhani was nodding solemnly. “I, too, have reason to dislike Mandalorians, but Canderous has proven himself to be a worthy warrior. All of us… all of us, together, have come so far already.”

Carth coughed. “Yes, well, speaking of that – what did you find out so far?”

Jen grimaced, lifting dusty boots to rest atop the table. Carth gave her feet a pointed look and she rolled her eyes. “You do know this isn’t your ship, right flyboy?”

“I’m the pilot,” he countered drily. “I figure that gives me some leverage to lay down ground rules. No feet on tables.”

She looked decidedly unimpressed, but swung her feet down regardless. “Okay, so there’s a Dark Jedi master in the cantina – she’s a sort of recruiter. We have to accomplish set tasks to prove ourselves “worthy” enough to enter the Academy. Or, if we open the door we’re automatically admitted.”

“Open the door?” I cut in. “How hard can that be?”

“Brute strength ain’t gonna do it,” Jen said wryly. “I tried. I’m picking that some dark use of the Force will open them, but I really don’t want to go down that path. Not… not anymore.”

“We are strong enough to find another way,” Juhani said softly. “The path we follow… it is the right one, and we will hold true to it.”

“Yes,” Jen echoed. “We will. I will, this time.”
Carth was gazing at Jen with something like respect on his face.

“Well, I did a bit of digging with Teethree’s help.” I beamed at the little fella, and he beeped a jaunty tone at me. “Couldn’t find anything on the Star Maps, but d’ya know the Academy hasn’t been here long? Like, only a handful of years.”

“Oh yeah, it’s always been a favourite spot of creepy Sith Lords.” I wrinkled my nose in distaste. “It’s like their burial ground or something. There’s about a dozen tombs at least on this dead rock.”

“The Force feels darker here,” Juhani murmured, with a faraway look in her eyes. She shivered. “There is something twisted about its feel. I do not like it.”

“But there’ve been other Academies before this one. Like, there was one built deep into the shyrack caves, that’s abandoned now because of these poisonous rancors called taretaks- no, teranteks- um,-”

“Terentateks,” Jen whispered. Her face had turned a hideous grey colour. Juhani breathed in audibly and stepped to her side. The feeds I’d skimmed through about them sounded horrid; like, honestly, the most warped, dangerous type of monster in the galaxy. But it wasn’t as if there was one right here in the ship with us, so there was no need for that ugly drawn look on Jen’s face.

“Force warped rancors,” Juhani said softly. “They are drawn to Force sensitives.”

“And they feed off them,” Jen shuddered, closing her eyes. Slowly, the colour returned to her face. She’s seen one before. She must have, I thought in a horrified sort of awe. The rancor in the Undercity had been the scariest thing I’d ever seen, and Taris was filled with all sorts of scum. But terentateks were worse, by all accounts.

“Do you- have you seen one before, Jen?” Carth asked, frowning. Not so long ago, he’d refused to believe she’d done anything in her life other than read books.

“I don’t know,” Jen muttered, shaking her head with her eyes squeezed shut. “Doesn’t seem possible, does it. That rancor down in the sewers was bad enough.”

“(These caves do not sound like a place to visit,)” Zaalbar howled. I could hear the despair in his voice. I knew, even if I’d never admit it, that I sometimes took slightly more risks than maybe was necessary, but we’d never been so close to death as in the sewers. That had been the turning point, then. Jen, throwing herself in danger to save our lives. Big Z, swearing his weird Wookiee life debt.

I blinked suddenly, feeling my eyes turn a little moist. Jen was back, and she was with us, no matter what happened on Manaan. Right. Time to get back on track.

“Traders go through the caves all the time,” I said, forcing my voice to be light and cheery. “It’s a common route to a small mining camp on the other side of the mountains. As long as they stick to the southern tunnels, away from the ruins, then they’re usually okay. Unless a Force user enters, or even someone with a little sensitivity – then those monsters come out and eat everything.” I glanced over to Jen, giving her my best I’m serious look. “Don’t go there, Jen.”

“Wasn’t planning to,” Jen replied, grimacing. “Yuthura suggested we track down a group of runaways who’d headed that direction. We’ll give that a miss. Although, Mission, you mentioned ruins?” She frowned at me, and I nodded in response.
“Yeah, there’s some tombs and ruins of a really old school deeper in the caves. Well past the trade route. Seems like this creepy planet is the resting place for every dead Sith guy.”

Jen looked over at Juhani, a considering look crossing her face. Carth watched the unspoken communication between the two, frowning. “You’re thinking the Star Map might be there,” he said slowly.

I could feel myself getting worried. Sometimes, I could still see the rancor if I closed my eyes, saliva dripping from it’s sharp, rotting teeth. Its breath was ten times worse than a hungry Wookiee’s. So much for not going there. But what if the Star Map really was in the shyrack caves? Maybe… maybe then it’d be better if the non-Force users went there. Now there was a thought.

“I don’t know what’s more likely,” Jen admitted. “The tombs on the other side of the Academy, or the tombs in the shyrack caves. We just don’t know enough about the area yet.”

“I believe our best chance is still to enter the Academy,” Juhani said softly. “We may find more information there. I do not believe we should face terentateks unless we have a compelling reason to.”

Jen was silent for a minute, before sighing and nodding firmly. “Right. So back to either locating Yuthura’s mysterious guest, or finding a way past Mekel.”

“Mekel?” Carth queried.

“A Sithling guarding the Academy. He’s got a couple of hopefuls standing to attention until they drop of exhaustion.”

“Nice, what a sweet guy,” Carth replied sarcastically. “He should get the Sith congeniality medal.”

“Yeah,” Jen sighed. “Welcome to Korriban.”

xXx

The following day Jen had stuck around for as long as her patience would allow, before conceding that Bastila wasn’t waking any time soon. We could all see how desperate Jen was to speak to the Jedi, which I didn’t really understand. Don’t they chat all the time in each others’ minds?

Carth was seeing them off the ‘Hawk while I trailed behind. I couldn’t spot the Cathar, but the other two had halted on the loading ramp.

“I’m glad you came back,” Carth was saying, standing close to Jen at the ‘Hawk’s exit. His voice sounded a bit forced.

“Yeah. So am I,” she replied neutrally.

“Doesn’t mean I’ve forgiven you for what you’ve done,” he muttered, and while his words were accusing his expression was certainly not.

“I’ll work on that,” she replied, a wry look on her face. “I can’t take it back, Carth, but I’m doing my damnedest to do what’s right, now.”

“I can see that,” he agreed, his eyes intent upon her. “I don’t like being here, on Korriban, with you two going out by yourselves… but you’ve proven you can take care of yourself. Just… just stay true to the mission, okay? Don’t do anything you don’t have to.”

She glanced back at him, this time a small smile playing along her lips. “I hear you, flyboy. I’ll be good.”

Somehow, the conversation sounded weirdly private despite being out in the open docking bay, so I stayed some steps behind, uncertain whether to wish Jen farewell or silently retreat.

“Don’t you think you should take a communicator?” Carth asked, gesturing to his wrist. “Doesn’t it make sense to stay in touch? If things go belly up we may have to make a quick getaway.”

Jen seemed to think that over, before shaking her head. “I’m not sure that’s a good idea. If we’re playing at being prospective students, then we don’t want to show any outward ties to others. A communication link to our crew is a little suspicious. And remember, I can talk to Bastila. When she wakes, that is.” She frowned. “If Canderous returns, tell him we’re planning to be back tonight.”

An irritated look crossed Carth’s face. “What’s between you and Canderous?” His words were abrupt, annoyed. I felt my eyebrows rise in disbelief.

Whoa, Jen and Canderous? That’d just be kinda strange, and a bit gross. That’d explain all the fighting, though. Humans were weird.

“What do you mean?” she asked, throwing him a puzzled frown.

He was shifting uncomfortably. “Look, Canderous seems to hold everyone in the same regard – a sort of callous disrespect. Apart from you.”

“He’s a Mandalorian,” came the dry reply. Jen was quirking an eyebrow, and looked highly amused. “They like anyone who can give them a fight.”

Carth scowled. “And you’ve offered yourself up in this sort of duel-“

“I know,” she sighed. “It seemed like the right thing to do at the time, and I wouldn’t take it back even if I could. But there’s nothing up with us, whatever you are trying to imply.” I dunno, kinda sounds like denial to me.

Carth blinked; she’d surprised him somehow, and he’d started backpedalling. “I wasn’t implying-”

Jen shot him a quelling look and cut in, crossing her arms. “Mandalorians aren’t really my type.”

“Oh?” His voice was loaded, somehow, and I was starting to feel uncomfortable, listening in. I was pretty sure they’d forgotten I was there. “I’m not sure I want to know what is.”

“Well, not Republic flyboys with an awful taste in clothing.” She shot a half-amused, half-derogatory glance at his jacket. She was right, though, it was pretty ugly. I almost felt bad for trashing the orange one back on Manaan.

“Hey!” Carth looked affronted. “What’s wrong with my jacket?”

Jen laughed, her eyes sparkling with delight. “Carth, it’s puke green. Honestly. Couldn’t you find anything better in Davik’s cast-offs?” Her grin was impish, even under his mock glare. “It’s not really your colour, you know.” She paused, and appeared to be holding in more laughter. “I don’t think it’s anyone’s colour.”

“I didn’t realize Jedi were such critics of fashion,” Carth replied drily, loosing a chuckle himself.
That comment earned him a frown. “I can’t call myself that. But- but I certainly won’t name myself a Sith, I can promise you that.”

“Good,” he said softly, his eyes intent on her. “After Tatooine and Manaan… well. Good.”

Jen’s eyes landed on me then, further back in the shadows, and she took a step backwards, an inscrutable look fixed on her face. “See you later, Carth, Mission.” She turned and exited.

Carth turned to spot me in the hallway, and stepped back inside, before locking the ‘Hawk’s exit hatch behind him.

I folded my arms and stared at him. “You haven’t forgiven her, huh?” He’d said that, but the conversation certainly hadn’t sounded like it.

“Have you?” he returned, frowning at me. “Betrayal… I’ve had a life time of it. I don’t trust easily, and when it’s broken…”

“I have, yeah,” I said. “Cause I don’t think she really betrayed us, Carth. I don’t think she was thinking straight at the time. She just wanted to run from Bastila – but she’s back, now, owning up to it. I reckon we all have to give her a chance.”

“I want to,” he sighed. “Maybe you’re right. And maybe I never really trusted her before.”

“She’s good at heart,” I said earnestly. “Whatever happened to her in the past, whatever is between her and Bastila, I just know that Jen’s one of the good guys. Her and Juhani, they struggle with the Force an’ all, but they’ll come through for us. Just you see.”

He looked at me searchingly, his eyes soft. “You have a big heart, Mission,” he said, smiling at me. “And… I’m giving her a chance. I promise.”

I beamed at him. “Great. I’m gonna go help Big Z for a bit.”

Carth smiled again, before turning and heading towards the cockpit. I waited silently for some time until I was certain no one would hear the exit hatch open. Now’s my chance! I’d only said I’d stay behind, after all – I never said I’d stay put on the ‘Hawk. Surely a little scout around couldn’t be that dangerous. I’ll only be gone an hour, max. They won’t even notice I’m missing!

We hadn’t seen Canderous back yet, and I wondered what that duel thing was all about. It kinda sounds like they’re gonna kill each other. I grimaced as I slipped through the exit hatch and closed it behind me. Mandalorians are crazy.

The air was warmer and cleaner when I entered the colony, nodding amicably at the docking staff who barely noticed me waltz through. Even with browsing the HoloNet, I didn’t really get whether Dreshdae was controlled by the Sith soldiers who lurked near the commercial sector, or the Czerka conglomerates who ran the docking bay and the habitation quarters. However, I was smart enough to skirt the retail plaza – Czerka, I could handle. I wasn’t too keen on getting noticed by the Sith.

But I was bored, and all I really wanted to do was have a look around.

Dreshdae itself was mostly made up of living quarters – dormitories, units and suites. The dormitories were easily accessible; long rectangular rooms overrun by mercs and traders looking for a place to crash. The hallway outside reeked of bad hygiene and musty, unwashed clothes, so I strode past it silently, avoiding eye contact with any of the traders walking past. It’s funny how people would leave me alone if I just looked confident and busy enough.
The map of Dreshdae had shown the more pricey suites to be located behind the apartments and Czerka reception chambers, and presumably that meant higher security. However, there were a couple hidden behind the dorms, tucked away down a long dead-end tunnel, and that engaged my curiosity. I wasn’t planning on breaking in anywhere despite the tech spikes filling up my utility belt – see, I had plenty of credits, and didn’t go around acquiring other people’s stuff unless I needed it – but the layout of Dreshdae intrigued me, and it couldn’t hurt to have a little walk around. It’s not like I’d encounter any Dark Jedi there, they’d all be staying at the Academy.

I reached the corridor behind the lower-end living quarters, and there was absolutely no one around. I saw two closed durasteel doors with auto-print mechanisms – the suites, then, coded to whatever anatomy suited the species of the renter. The tunnel itself ended in a large grill that must lead to part of the colony’s ducting system. I eyed it over curiously, before a chill of premonition danced a sudden tickle down my spine.

I should get outta here. It isn’t safe. It was an irrational thought out of nowhere, but I was used to trusting my instincts. I spun around abruptly, noticed the corridor was still eerily empty, and took a hurried step before tripping over something that wasn’t there.

I fell to the ground, gasping before scrabbling to my feet, my eyes catching that of a human boy who was leaning tensely against the cracked plasteel wall of the colony.

His dark eyes were wide, and I could tell he was just as startled as me. Where did he come from? He hadn’t expected to be noticed, judging by the way he was pressed against the wall, hands flat on either side. He looked to be about my age, although I never found it that easy to tell with humans. Dressed plainly and wearing a concealing dark coat, I wondered what he was doing this side of Dreshdae.

I have him a tentative smile. “I guess you’re just looking around like me, huh?”

He blinked, and I thought I’d surprised him further. I grinned and kept talking, uneasy but not wanting to either intimidate or antagonize the stranger. “I was getting bored and thought I’d take a walk around Dreshdae. Not that there’s much to do around here though.” I wrinkled my nose. “Honestly, this place is a bit of a dive.”

He opened his mouth to say something, presumably thought better of it and shut it again. I quirked an eyebrow at him. “Are you staying in one of the suites?”

“I, uh- no, not exactly,” he stammered, his eyes flicking over to one of the locked doors and a dull red blossoming on his cheeks. Ah ha, he is nosing around, just like me.

“I grinned again, this time genuinely. “Me neither. I wanted to have a look around the cantina, but all those Sith soldiers kinda put me off.”

His gaze flicked back to me, and now an intense look deepened the brown of them. “That’s a good idea. Avoiding the plaza, I mean. Sometimes some of the students visit there, and it wouldn’t be safe for a girl out by herself-”

“Hey, I can take care of myself!” I protested hotly. I could feel my lekku twitching instinctively. When would people ever take me seriously?

He blushed again, but a small smile also graced his face. “I’m sure you can. But this is Korriban.” At least he didn’t sound patronizing. “Where are you from?”

I looked away, feeling my eyes sting a little despite myself. My homeworld had been on my mind a

“Oh!” His exclamation caused me to glance back at him. He sounded genuinely upset, and sympathy softened his further words. “I’m sorry. About- about Taris, I mean, I heard about the bombardment. My- my homeworld was bombed four years ago, so, I guess, I know how you feel.”

“Thanks,” I said quietly. “I was lucky, I just happened to be leaving at the time, but all the people I grew up with… I still don’t know what happened to them. I have to hope they made it through, and maybe one day I’ll see them again.” Although I wasn’t really sure I wanted to go back to Taris. I did want to see Lina again, and Gadon, and heck even Zaerdra, but going back to Taris seemed a bit like stepping back in life. I’ve seen and done so much since then. I feel like I’ve left that life behind. I wondered idly if my irresponsible brother would ever head back there or if he was still on Tatooine, searching for his next big break. I’d always love Griff, but I actually hoped I’d never see him again.

“There’s nothing left for me back home,” the boy said softly, but he sounded resentful rather than grieved. He was clenching his jaw.

“I wish this stupid war would just stop,” I burst out. “All this murder and fighting, and its all the innocent people who get caught in the crossfire.” My headtails curled around my neck and I crossed my arms defensively. “I’m sorry. I just hate all this, y’know? I wish everyone could just get along.”

He had a sad smile on his face as he looked at me. “That’s a fairy tale. People will never just get along. Most are inherently selfish, and will grasp for power at the expense of others. It’s the only way to keep yourself safe – be stronger than the rest.”

I blinked, surprised at the bitterness his words conveyed. “That’s a bit jaded, don’t ya think? I reckon most people are good at heart if you give them a chance.”

He snorted in disbelief. “You really are naïve, aren’t you? Most people would hit you up for credits – or worse – if they came across you alone in a deserted corridor.”

I scowled, and let my arms drop to my hips. Wow. What a depressing outlook. “You need to get better friends if that’s your view of the world.” A stony look settled over his face, and I regretted that our conversation had turned sour. It was nice, actually, to talk to someone my own age, even if he was bitter. Suppose that’s probably natural if you live on Korriban. “Look, I don’t want to fight. Let’s talk about something else, huh?”

His expression was shuttered now, but he seemed to consider my words, pushing off from the wall and shoving his hands into deep pockets. “Okay, then. Are you staying in a room somewhere?”

We were avoiding introductions, I realized. It felt wrong to give a fake name, but equally, giving out my real name was overly reckless. Jen said there would be reports of our crew. I wondered why he was avoiding it.

I shook my head in response to his question, my lekku uncurling again. “Nah, we won’t be here long, and our ship’s big enough. Doesn’t make any sense to sleep away from it.” I grimaced. “It’s boring though, staying on the ship. No one will play pazaak with me anymore.”

He was looking at me with an inscrutable expression, and I wondered what he did for fun. A thought hit me, and I brightened. “Hey, you don’t play, do you? I’d be keen to play someone new.”

“That’s a gambling game with cards, right?” he queried, shifting uncomfortably. “Sorry, not really my thing.” His eyes slid away from me to the ground.

I sighed. “That’s a shame. What is your thing, then? What do you do for fun?”

The boy blinked, and then flushed. I wondered why in the Outer Rim he appeared so uncomfortable with everything I said. Social skills weren’t high on the priority list of Dreshdae inhabitants, obviously. “I, uh, not much, really,” he finally stammered.

“Not much?” Sheesh, he doesn’t give anything away about himself, does he? His clothes and bearing were nondescript, like he wanted to fade into the crowd. And he’d been completely unnoticeable before, unless I missed the tell-tale sign of a stealth field generator. But they were easy to spot, and I could swear there had been nothing in the corridor. Ten credits he’s been snooping in some of those suites. I could feel my curiosity, which had waned, spark once more back to life.

“Well, back home sometimes I used to sneak out to the swoop track,” he muttered, looking away as his cheeks flushed. He sounded embarrassed. “I guess that’s not something a girl like you would be intere-

“No way!” I cut in loudly, rising up on my toes in excitement. “I’ve just been racing the track on Manaan! The track’s out on the water, and it’s fantastic! I won my first three heats, you should have seen it!”

He was looking at me again, and this time a true grin lightened his face. “Manaan, huh? They’re part of the championship circuit. I hear the water tracks are hugely popular. Wow.”

“I know, right!” I beamed. “I lost my fourth race by less than a second. I reckon I could’ve challenged Flying Starscream again and won, but – well, we left Manaan.” I wasn’t sad about that, I wasn’t, but swooping had been so much fun.

He still had a genuine smile on his face, his eyes never leaving mine. “I never raced professionally, just practice runs on an illegal track when I could sneak out. Although – you said you were from Taris? Their local season was widely followed before the bombing, even if they had been dropped from the intergalactic tournaments. I wouldn’t be surprised if Taris opens again soon. Did you race there?”

I shook my head, my thoughts tracing back to the underground track in the Lower City. “I always wanted too, and I followed the races closely. The Beks – a swoop gang I grew up with – always did well. I used to imagine I’d grow to be a famous swooper and win them the title.”

We shared a smile, reminiscent of childhood dreams, and I wondered if he’d had the same fantasies. But his look slowly faded to be replaced with one of curiosity. “What are you doing on Dreshdae?” he asked finally. “Are you with traders or mercs?”

I tilted my head to the side. “Merc, I guess.” It was a better fit than trader at any rate. And Canderous, at least, was an actual mercenary.

He frowned at me, a sort of disillusioned look creasing his face. “How come you have such a rosy view of everything if your people are looking for paid work that generally involves fighting? Fighting for money?” he said in disbelief. “I mean, it’s not exactly an ethical career choice, is it?”

“I- well, no, but I mean, I’m not a mercenary. And most of my group aren’t either.” Ethical choice, hah! That’s a load of bantha pooodoo coming from someone I’m pretty sure was just breaking into an apartment. I tossed my head. “And anyway, here on Korriban it’s normal, right? Like,
“compared to all those Dark Jedi scum, mercs are basically the good guys.”

I’d said something wrong, for his face tightened and his eyes pinched in anger. “Dark Jedi scum,” he echoed softly, almost hissing. “Do you have any idea how dangerous it is to say something like that here? You foolish, foolish girl.”

Fear swept through me suddenly, and I took a step away from him in astonished fright. “No,” I muttered. He’d been so nice, a little bitter maybe, but there was no way someone like him could be one of those core slime evil creeps. “You can’t be one of them—”

“Run back to your ship, little girl,” he sneered, and the face I’d considered open and honest took an ugly turn. “If you stick around the tunnels of Dreshdae, sooner or later you’re going to get yourself killed.” He took a menacing step towards me, and I scrambled back further.

“How?” I burst out. “Why would you want to—

“To have power enough to stop any atrocity happening to me ever again?” he cut in, eyes flashing. “You have no idea. The potential is limitless… and I will not be a victim ever again!” He ended on a shout, and I glanced around quickly; we were still alone, but the one thing I didn’t want was to be part of a scene.

I breathed in deep, torn between running and telling him what a brainless Gamorrean he was being. “But… the Dark Side… it makes you kill and destroy everything you love! Look—some of the people I’m with— they, they can help you. Come with me. You don’t have to stay here on this rotten planet.”

He looked at me like I was stark raving mad, and then a blinding flash of fury contorted his face further. “Go away!” he screamed viciously. “Go back to the safety of your ship before I do something you’ll regret, and stay there!”

I took another step back, but determination swelled within me as well. I didn’t believe this boy would actually hurt me and, whatever demons he was fighting, well surely—surely—Jen or Bastila or Juhani would be able to help him. If he stayed here, on Korriban, he’d end up as just another one of those twisted Dark Jedi.

“No,” I said softly, staring at him. “I’m serious y’know. My friends— they’re good people. They know all about this sort of stuff. You don’t have to stay here on this rotten planet. There’s a better way! A happier way!”

The incredulity on his face grew, if anything, and then he gestured in the air with his hands. I gasped; the boy had completely disappeared from right in front of me. There was no technology that could do that. I looked around wildly, but the corridor was empty.

The sharp press of cold metal against my neck iced my spine, and I froze in shock.

“You see how easy it would be to dispose of you?” his disembodied voice whispered from behind me. “A flick of my wrist, and you’d be a puddle of bloody flesh on the ground. How dare you preach of a better way to me, you stupid little girl.”

My breath caught in my throat as I felt the knife trail down my neck. Between my headtails, the most sensitive part of my body. It was as light as a caress, scratching a menacing pattern from side to side. Big Z, Jen, I’m in such kath dung now! My insides froze. The fear was nauseating, and I didn’t know if I should scream for help or just bolt and hope for the best.

The knife pressed in hard, right at the base of my skull, and a desperate whimper escaped my lips.
“Go,” he spat, and I felt it on the back of my neck. “And if I catch you again, I’ll slice your pretty little headtails off.”

And with that, I ran.

xXx
I woke, awareness coming groggily as the sound of knocking slowly permeated through the haze of my mind. Normally I needed little sleep, and was alert within seconds of waking. But not since Manaan.

My senses felt eroded, like my entire being was immersed in water, and I struggled just to remain up to speed with what was occurring. Every morning I felt like I was still clamouring after pieces of my mind, scrabbling to put them back together in a coherent order.

“Uh, Bastila? Do you want some lunch?”

I sat up, leaning back against the stark, utilitarian wall of the Ebon Hawk’s medbay. “Come in, Carth,” I answered.

The door swished open, and Carth was holding a plate full of hot brayda rolls, a wry smile on his face. The yeasty aroma invaded my senses, and I realized that I was, in fact, ravenous.

“Look what I found at a stall just outside the docking bay,” he said, offering me the tray. “Sure, they charged me an arm, but what do you expect from Czerka employees on a Sith-controlled planet.”

“Thank you.” I bit into one, my eyes fluttering closed as the hot dough melted in my mouth.

“Jen and Juhani left a few hours ago,” Carth continued talking as I finished the roll. “Jen was pretty keen to talk to you Bastila, but – well, you’re sleeping about eighteen hours a day at the moment.”

My eyes snapped open at my bond-sister’s name. Her presence was nestled in the back of my mind, sparks of irritation palpable now that I focussed on it.

Jen. I sent an inquiring probe to her. The communication was second nature now, and I found with little effort that I could feel her emotions, distinguishable from mine and yet somehow part of me. Force bonds were rare indeed, and it seemed that ours was notably strong. I’d heard stories of mind-links that, over time, allowed recipients to share Force power, an aptitude which, given the true identity of my bond-mate, alarmed me more than a little.

But since her return, my opinion of Revan had been slightly mitigated. Her recklessness and inane sense of humour were foreign to me, but her confidence and strength of spirit were admirable.

Bastila, she acknowledged, but her attention was distracted. I dearly wished I could see through her eyes, as she’d queried yesterday. She had through mine once, I recalled with a shiver. I had not realized that was possible.

But her thoughts and memories were infinitely more accessible than her eyesight. And yesterday she experienced some form of recollection, for I had a sudden vision of an older Mandalorian warrior facing me challengingly, a faded background of soldiers and smoke blurrily painting the scene behind him. My grasp on the memory slipped, and it vanished before I could make any sense of it bar the obvious: some fragment from the Mandalorian wars. Had my connection to the Force not been so irritatingly feeble, I would have had a better idea of what she had recollected.
I wished I knew what had happened on the Endar Spire to shake loose the identity of Jen, for before the Sith ambush there had not been a single inkling of Revan appearing.

“Are you talking to her right now?” Carth asked suspiciously. I nodded briefly in assent. “Where are they?”

I glanced up at the Republic soldier standing in the doorway, still holding a handful of delicious food. Carth’s hair had the slightly static appearance of some time spent in the Ebon Hawk’s sonic refresher – a place I was sorely tempted to visit myself. Oh, what I would give for an actual hot water shower! But they were rare indeed on freighters this size.

I was feeling better, and stronger, I realized. It’s about time.

“Carth, can you give me a minute please? I will meet you in the common room.” I glanced down at my rumpled clothes, loose fitting garments that I had worn for days. “Once I am properly attired.”

He nodded and left, taking the food with him, and I drew in a deep breath, slowly collecting my thoughts. I still found it difficult to come to terms that we were, actually, on Korriban of all places – and that for the first time, our motley crew was working as a collective team to find a Star Map. I had not understood properly, until yesterday when Carth blocked me from sending a coded message to the Order, explaining in minute detail the need for radio blackout.

A stealth mission. And everyone who knows of us, Sith and Jedi alike, believe we are enroute to Kashyyyk. Oh, it made sense indeed, for if Darth Malak had any foresight he would soon be sending troops to reinforce Korriban. But I could not help but be apprehensive. Revan, on the dark planet of Korriban. So soon after blowing the Ebon Hawk out of the sky just so she could run.

I breathed in again, buried my fear, and stretched out my senses towards her.

How are you going?

The answer back was quick. Not well. We figured we’d try searching for Yuthura’s friend in the suites, but no joy so far. We’re just pissing off traders and mercenaries alike. I’m about ready to pack it all in and go challenge that sadistic little Sithling at the Academy. In fact-

She cut herself off, and I couldn’t help the concern at her tumultuous thoughts. Oh, I was aware that she considered me reserved, apprehensive even – but Revan’s volatile thoughts and spontaneous actions certainly warranted caution at the very least. Although I did admit that we both wished for a rapid conclusion on Korriban, and a slow, thoughtful approach would not yield that. We are here for two more days at least, due to that primitive duel she agreed to.

Finding the Star Map in two days was highly improbable, but I wished we did not have the distraction of the Mandalorian’s issues. Revan and Canderous seemed to hold a perverse respect for each other, and I did not know what to think about these brawls they had been engaging in during our hyperspace journey.

One day, Canderous will come clean to her. That is, if our long overdue conversation didn’t show that she already knew. Whatever her reason for returning to us, it had been shattering enough to turn her full circle. Although Revan seemed… less dark and highly determined to remain so, since her return. Perhaps it was wishful thinking on my part, but although her anger, mistrust and fear were still there, it wasn’t ruling her the way it sometimes had on Tatooine.

So then she couldn’t know, surely? The horrible fear of her reclaiming her heritage would otherwise come to fruition. Anyone can be redeemed, I reminded myself. And her character now seemed to be that of Revan Freeflight the Jedi Knight and not the Sith Lord.

Well, it certainly isn’t Jen Sahara.

What isn’t me? She shot back, catching me unawares. Revan’s surprising strength within the bond often caught me by surprise, and my lingering weakness did not help matters.

Never mind, I replied, hoping she would drop it. Mild distrust radiated between us, and I was aware, yet again, how desperately we needed to talk despite my misgivings. She desired it in person; I wanted the additional privacy of being physically elsewhere. I did not wish her to view my face, should I need to dissemble. But, I could avoid it no longer.

I sighed, stretching as I slowly stood. A pile of folded Jedi robes sat on a shelf next to a roll of bandages. Juhani’s doing, no doubt. The Cathar was quietly thoughtful, her nature unassuming and easy to overlook.

I focussed my thoughts back to my erstwhile bond-sister. What is your plan from here?

Yuthura said I needed to impress her. So I’ve told her I’m off to open the door, or get someone else to do it for me. Hah! Let’s see how Mekel responds to an ultimatum.

Be careful, Jen. This Yuthura is a recruiter for the Academy, and not one to cross.

But Sith appreciate a show of strength, she answered, amused for some reason I could not fathom. She’s following us, all nonchalant and casual, but I can tell we’ve intrigued her.

If you can find a peaceful way to enter, then please choose that path. Jedi value life. Do not kill if you do not have to, Jen.

It won’t come to that, I’m sure. Her mental voice was dry. He’s no match for me. He’ll back down. I wondered if she realized just how innate her confidence in her own abilities ran. I don’t plan on doing anything… dark, Bastila. Just shame him enough in front of a Master that he either capitulates and opens the door, or I best him and convince Yuthura I’m Sith material.

This could go wrong, Jen.

Yes. So could any of Yuthura’s tasks.

Revan, as always, rolling the dice. It seemed I had no choice but to trust her instincts. Master Zhar always claimed she held the Force’s own luck. Master Vrook didn’t believe in luck, Force-born or otherwise.

I pulled back from the mind-link, and took a moment to quickly dress, shrugging off a minor dizziness that still dogged me. The recovery to my stamina, both mental and physical, was frustratingly slow. But I had been lucky, for I did not believe I exhibited any long term damage. Psychic blows of the sort I encountered can shatter minds and destroy memories. Permanently. Revan, here, was the sterling example.

I sighed, pushing the thoughts away as I quickly dressed. Carth was waiting in the central common room looking disapprovingly at Zaalbar. The plate was mostly empty.

“Throw rug here spotted the food,” Carth muttered as I came forward to find a seat.

The big Wookiee hung his head. “(I left you two, Bastila. I hope that is enough. I was hungry.”)
“Thank you, Zaalbar,” I said, reaching for one and hoping Carth would be happy to procure more. “I am sure that will suffice.”

“Have you, uh, made contact with Jen?” Carth asked, as I struggled not to demolish the baked good. I nodded at him, finishing the roll before answering.

“They are attempting to enter the Academy, this time by force I believe.”

Carth grimaced, and Zaalbar looked worried, insofar as a Wookiee could.

“(I do not like being unable to help Jen,)” Zaalbar growled softly. “(My skills would be better put to use fighting her enemies than fixing cast-off armour suits.)”

“I do not like sitting here either, Zaalbar,” I admitted. “But we may hinder rather than help, should we leave the privacy of the Ebon Hawk.”

“I’ve got to learn Shyriiwook,” Carth muttered, earning a grunt from the Wookiee.

“(It is a much more expressive language than your simplistic Basic,)” Zaalbar told an uncomprehending Carth. “(I will leave you both now, and attend to the ship’s portable communicators. Mission had an interesting idea for a modification.)”

As the Wookiee left the room, I slowly finished the roll, leaning back on the bench and closing my eyes in weariness. When I opened them again, I saw Carth looking at me expectantly.

I sent him an inquiring look. “Can I help you?”

“Yes,” he said quietly. “I want to talk to you about Jen.”

Despite myself, my spine immediately tightened in nervousness. “What exactly do you wish to know, Carth?” I asked, the wary tone obvious even to my own ears. His brown eyes darkened in intensity as he stared hard at me.

“Bastila… I know you Jedi like your secrets, and maybe you have reasons for them – but it hasn’t helped us any. It hasn’t helped Jen any. You need to- to tell her who she really is.”

I felt my eyes widen with stunned disbelief. There was no way Carth could know the truth, not if he was still standing there instead of storming after Jen with a warm blaster in a tightly clasped hand. If there was one person onboard the Ebon Hawk who would react in the worst imaginable way, it would be the once-betrayed Republic loyalist, Captain Carth Onasi. My stomach fluttered in nervousness. “Carth- what, what do you mean?” I stuttered.

He sighed. “Look, on Manaan I found out she was tortured when Darth Revan’s forces took Deralia. Badly enough that she’s damn lucky to still be breathing.” His brows lowered. “The Sith don’t go around torturing nobody scholars – not to that extent. I’m not stupid, Bastila. I know she has memory loss. And I know that unknown Force-sensitives aren’t suddenly able to use the Force in battle, no matter how strong they are. She used to be a Jedi, didn’t she?”

I was too bone-weary to dissemble, too exhausted to deceive. I closed my eyes and gave a very brief nod. He doesn’t know everything. He doesn’t know Revan, I realized in sudden relief. The galaxy made a little more sense again.

I heard him exhale. “She’s older than her records say… I noticed that on Taris. Her data’s been tampered with to erase those years, hasn’t it? I’ve seen the effects of long-term torture, Bastila. It breaks some people, and others block out chunks of their life just so they can cope. Some of my “You must understand, Carth, that we never believed she would regain any of those memories,” I whispered. Not after we implanted Jen Sahara, a traitorous voice reminded me. “She showed no signs of it, and the neural scans indicated that any sort of recovery wasn’t within a plausible range of likelihood.” Except for her dreams. Her subconscious crying out through the Force link. But that, too, the Force healers said was natural – and to our advantage. “Something happened onboard the Endar Spire that changed everything.”

His eyes met mine. “She had a head injury, a severe one. Either from the fighting on the ‘Spire, or the crash landing.”

Trauma to the head. Enough to, in some part, undo what the Council did. That made sense, and explained just how she managed to accomplish so much on Taris. I shivered. The Endar Spire had been a desperate gamble by the Council, and it had failed.

“You need to tell her the truth,” Carth continued, in the same quiet voice. “She ran… she ran because of all these damn Jedi secrets screwing with her head. How is she meant to resist the Dark Side without knowing her past? She has a right to know, Bastila.”

Oh the complete irony in his words. She wouldn’t resist the Dark Side if she truly knew the truth. I looked away, in part to stop Carth from seeing any glimmer of it in my eyes. But he was right, I didn’t believe I had any choice left but to come clean. “I know, Carth. I’ve known since her return.
But I have not exactly had much chance to speak with her, if you recall.” My voice rose in indignation, and I turned back to shoot him a disgruntled look.

“Fair enough,” he agreed mildly, but his voice still carried a thread of steel. “But you will talk to her. She’s out here on Korriban doing the Council’s bidding with no recollection of any train.”

“It wasn’t meant to happen this way!” I interjected hotly. “We had Master Galdea on the Endar Spire, with a squad of Jedi Knights. I didn’t choose to go to Tatooine and embark on this quest with a skeleton crew, Carth. I have been doing the best I can with what resources the Force has thrown my way!”

“I know, I know! And look, we’ve found two Maps, so you’ve been doing something right. It’s just- it’s Korriban and I’m worried about how Jen will cope in this environment. And- and Juhani, of course,” he tacked on belatedly.

I stared at him in silence; he broke the gaze to look away, a slight colour on his cheeks. And Juhani, indeed. Revan, without even realizing it, had managed to tie Carth up in metaphorical knots since Taris.

A loud knock at the hatch interrupted our conversation; with a hurried nod to me, Carth rose to investigate. I sighed, rubbing my temples and drawing in the Force as a precaution. I felt bone weary once more, like I had spent the day in gruelling combat practice rather than a conducting a ten minute conversation.

Oh, but I would be glad to leave Korriban behind. If I had not been incapacitated, we would be on Kashyyyk instead. And I might still have a better handle on… on everything.

Revan is leading this mission now, for better or worse. Her luck was astonishing – it always had been throughout her infamous life - and now that she was actively involved in the hunt for the maps perhaps we would end with a speedy exit from this dark planet. And perhaps we will not need to find the Map on Kashyyyk, if Master Vrook is already there.

I would be very relieved to be back in his company, and under his tutelage. He was seen as a harsh taskmaster, and I knew many believed he had held me back – that a Jedi possessed of my gifts should surely be a Knight after so many years. In my weaker moments, I may have even thought the same. But I trust Vrook. He did not believe me ready for the trials, and I would dearly like to succeed upon my first attempt. It wasn’t a black mark, to fail the trials – many Knights had, even some of the strongest. But I was a perfectionist, and detested the thought of my own failure.

With all that has happened upon this journey, I hope he will approve of my actions.

The clattering of boots caught my attention, and I looked up to see Canderous follow Carth into the room.

“Canderous, welcome back,” I said in greeting.

“Princess,” he drawled. Oh, but I abhorred that nickname. “Where’s Jen?”

“Trying to get into the Academy.” Of course he would be thinking about his duel in two days time. That was irresponsible of my bond-sister to allow herself to be pulled into his mess, but I did not believe she would turn back from it. And perhaps there was some merit in having the Mandalorian accompany us out of loyalty, should the duel go as Revan expected. Certainly, the extra brawn could come in useful when Force powers could not.

“I need to know when she’s back,” he stated in a low voice. His arms were full of new weaponry – surely we have enough assault weapons on board – and a sleek vibroblade rested on his hip.

“She’s out there trying to find a Star Map, in case you’d forgotten,” Carth cut in, sounding mildly annoyed.

“This is Mandalorian business,” Canderous bit out. “Not yours.”

Carth rolled his eyes and looked about ready to fire a retort back, before seemingly thinking better of it. He looked back at Canderous again, frowning. “We’re both military men, Canderous, even if we have fought on different sides. I’m sure we can get along for the sake of the mission.”

“I can get along with whoever I need to, Republic,” Canderous replied, shooting Carth a decidedly unimpressed look.

“Good,” Carth said mildly. “Because the Mandalorian wars are well and truly over.”

The reference to losing didn’t seem to faze Canderous; he sat down opposite me, dumping his load of weaponry over the central table. It was becoming a familiar sight.

“We likely faced one another at some time in the past. What battles were you in, Carth?”

I sighed softly, leaning back again and closing my eyes. I had no time for the glorifying of war and the showing off of battle scars. I stretched out my senses and concentrated back on the bond between Revan and I; sometimes, it felt as tangible as my connection to the Force itself. Revan’s being sharpened into focus, and I wondered if she was preparing herself for an imminent confrontation.

“I’m a star pilot Canderous, I was on the front lines for most of the war, and fought where I was sent. I don’t keep a list of the battles I’ve been in like some sort of tally. The horrors of war are something I’d rather not relive.”
What a snot-nosed show-off. Her thoughts rang in my connection to the Force, derogatory and yet amused. I did not believe she was directing them towards me. He’d back down if Yuthura wasn’t here. I felt her draw in the Force with a practiced ease that disconcerted me, and hoped she would be careful.

Canderous snorted. “With that sort of attitude, no wonder my people made the Republic tremble. We focus on the glory of battle, the victory of triumphing against the odds~”

“What, like you did against us?” Carth cut in sarcastically. “Why did the Mandalorians attack anyway? It’s something that’s always bothered me. I mean, I know your people are pretty bloodthirsty, but the Mandalorians invaded on an unprecedented scale, and seemingly with no provocation.”

My eyes snapped open, catching on the mercenary. I’d heard murmurs amongst the Jedi, bare wisps of rumours that there must have been some reason for the war – that something must have encouraged the leader of the Mandalorians to mount the invasion.

The irritation on Canderous’ face faded to introspection; he removed his hands from the repeating blaster he was inspecting and stared absently across the room. “Mand’alor had a vision that he could unite the clans and sweep the galaxy by storm. But the clans were dispersed and weakened… he started recruiting outsiders into the Mando’ade way, and over time our numbers swelled.”

Canderous exhaled, his gaze snapping back to Carth’s. “He was a bold leader, but could be patient when the times called for it. When he began our offensive it was on the Outer Rim, conquering worlds just outside your Republic. We did it quietly so the Republic wouldn't really know what was going on until too late. When we finally did hit the Republic worlds, your people had no idea we were coming.”

A vision, I thought in curiosity. I wonder if Canderous’ Mandalore had any sort of Force sensitivity. I was swiftly distracted by a tug on the Force from Revan, followed by a victorious crow: Hah, pulled your legs out from under you! If I stayed immobile and focussed, I could almost interpret Revan’s actions as she decided upon them.

“A vision? A vision of slaughtering anyone who gets in your way? What a charming guy,” Carth muttered. “I’ve heard about some of the full-scale genocide you Mandalorians committed.”

“I thought a fellow warrior would understand conquest,” Canderous retorted. “Although I always did have you pegged as one of those cowardly peace types.”

Hundreds of needles stabbed Revan’s presence in my mind; I breathed in quickly and felt her pain and fury flare to life like an incendiary grenade. Detach yourself from the pain, I counselled, alarmed at the velocity of her emotions. Use the Force to hone your senses and reactions. Do not surrender to your emotions – rise above them.

Like quicksilver, Revan’s focus swung on me, and her rage ebbed away. I felt a torrent of power rush in under her command; she was watchful now, wary but calm, as she actually seemed to absorb my advice, act upon it, and turn back to the situation at hand.

I felt gratified, and more than a little surprised at her sudden cooperation.

“I’m not a warrior, I'm a soldier,” Carth said, quiet but intense. “Peace – yes, we defend peace and protect the innocent – usually from warriors.”

“I accept who and what I am.” Canderous said, standing up. “It is our strength and our values as Mando’ade that very nearly won us the war, despite being heavily outnumbered and logistically haghtied. You keep your peace, Republic, and see how well you can defend it from the next conqueror.” With that, he grabbed the larger gun from the table and stalked out.

Carth sighed, and I wrested my attention back to the conversation in the Ebon Hawk, shooting him a disappointed look. I had hoped those two could cease bickering, for even Canderous and I had moved onto a more civil relationship.

“I know, I know,” he raised his hands in surrender. “Believe it or not, I was actually trying to be polite. But I’ll never understand him… or respect his beliefs.” Carth grimaced. “The Mandalorian Wars are such a defining point in our lives and we were on opposite sides… and, he is right… the Republic very nearly fell.” Carth paused then, looking me over seriously. “Bastila, did you ever think about joining the Jedi who followed Revan and Malak to fight the Mandalorians?”

My breath caught, that line of questioning I hadn’t expected. I felt a furious rush of colour flood my face, recalling those Knights who had left. “No,” I said firmly. “Absolutely not. I had the wisdom to obey the will of the Council.”

I’d been younger than most, and my gifts had not yet manifested, but even so- I couldn’t comprehend the level of unmitigated gall shown by Revan in not only openly defying the Council, but also calling upon others to join her and the Republic’s war effort. It wasn’t merely her; Meetra, Yudan and Xasat had been fairly successful in recruiting further Jedi to defect. And of course I cannot forget Malak. For how far would Revan have gone, without Malak? But in the end, Revan had been the ringleader, the catalyst that had started the drain of Jedi Knights from the Order.

“Unlike Revan, I guess.” Carth muttered in agreement. “Still, do you ever wonder if things could have been different? Would Revan and Malak still have surrendered to the Dark Side if the Council had supported them instead of dragging their feet?”

As his words sunk in, a flare of outrage sparked to life in my belly. I sat up straight and felt a fierce expression tighten my face as I stared at him. “That is the height of absurdity, to blame Revan’s corruption on the Council! She was warned – she and Malak both – what the horrors of war can do to a Jedi, especially ones as emotive as those two! The Order-”

“The Order abandoned the Republic,” Carth said quietly, but his words cut through mine like a lightsaber. “We needed Masters, to advise and counsel, alongside powerful Jedi Knights like Revan and Malak. Instead they were the only ones at first to offer aid, and were left to lead the best they knew how, despite their youth and inexperience-”

“The Council was not about the about to throw lives away foolishly,” I interrupted, forcing my voice and emotions to dampen down. There is no emotion; there is peace. I reminded myself that Carth had witnessed firsthand the carnage of the Mandalorian Wars, and his bitterness was well justified.

I felt the weight of Revan’s focus on me, curious and speculative; either she was distracted by my vexation or her situation had been adequately resolved. I did not, however, wish her to pick up on any of this conversation. “In time, we would have aided you against the Mandalorians. But the wisdom of the Masters saw beyond the immediate threat. Something urged the Mandalorians to war – something that likely devoured Revan and Malak also-”

Carth snorted in derision. “Mandalorians have desired conquest since the dawn of time. You heard Canderous and his account of that vision. That was nothing but a rallying cry to excuse a full-scale invasion. Damn it, Bastila, we needed the Jedi Order!”

Ouch, Yuthura’s got quite the tongue on her. Heavy amusement slid through the bond. Mekel’s going to have to do some crawling to get back in her good graces.

“The Order would have been there when the time was right, Carth. I do not doubt the wisdom of the Masters, and nor should you.” I stared at him solemnly, and wished the Republic Captain shared my faith. “You asked me if I think things could have been different? I know they could have. If Revan had only listened to the Council, millions of innocent people would still be alive.”

“Yeah, right,” Carth muttered, standing up abruptly and scowling at me. “And every single one of them would be speaking Mandalorian.” With that parting shot, he stalked out of the room.

I sighed angrily, my own irritation coming to the fore. This is the opinion of Republic soldiers who do not see the wider picture, I reminded myself, while an insidious voice pointed out that I, myself, did not fully comprehend the reasons for the Masters’ inaction. But unlike Revan, I kept my faith with them. Master is not a rank one attains without a level of wisdom and understanding that surpasses that of ordinary mortals.

You doing alright there, Bastila?

I dragged my thoughts back to my bond sister. I may have had less than harmonious words with Carth, I admitted. How is your situation?

Mekel’s run away with his tail between his legs. I’ll have to watch out I haven’t made an enemy. Her voice was wry, and too unconcerned for my comfort. I think he’s one of Yuthura’s underlings, actually. She’s given him quite a tongue-lashing.

Are you inside?

Yes. It’s… a bit awe-inspiring. The height of this structure is incredible. Surely this has been here for eons, despite the Academy being fairly new. But the Force… it feels twisted here. Can you sense it?

Awe-inspiring was not the terminology I would have used. I breathed in deep, released my earlier exasperation, and meditated on the connection between us. Weariness was creeping in on the edges of my focus, and I understood I was approaching my limit for the day.

The Force felt like pure life, strong and vibrant and limitless. I’d always had a powerful affinity for it, but I wondered – not for the first time – if our inconvenient link hadn’t amplified that.

I do not notice any difference from here.

I exhaled and relaxed against the wall, closing my eyes. Revan was further distracted and pulled away from our communication. I had lost the strength to stay intent upon her circumstance. Exhaustion slowly gained prominence and I let myself drift away in a slumberous doze.

xXx

“Big Z, I’m sorry, alright?”

“(You could have been hurt!)”

“I know! I know, okay, and you’re right – this planet is full of nothing but scummy rotten creeps!”

The sound of erupting tears dragged me back to consciousness, and with a start I realized I’d nodded off on one of those awful plimfoam benches in the common room. My eyes fluttered open.
“And this useless armour didn’t do a damn thing to stop him!” There was a scuffle, followed by the metallic thump of something landing on the ground. Another broken sob in a young girl’s voice. Mission.

My back ached as I fully woke now, seeing the young Twi’lek falling apart in the Wookiee’s arms. They hadn’t noticed me, tucked away in the corner bench, having fallen asleep unintentionally. A sharp pain shot through my back as I moved, and I let out a soft groan.

Mission yelped, jumping out of Zaalbar’s arms and running from the room like a scalded loth-cat.

The Wookiee started, glancing at me in surprise before bending to pick up the discarded exoskeleton Mission had unceremoniously dropped to the ground.

“(We did not mean to wake you, Bastila. I’m afraid we didn’t realize you were there,)” Zaalbar said apologetically before following the young girl in haste. I felt a moment of awkwardness, having unwittingly intruded on an apparent private conversation. I was aware that the impulsive Twi’lek did not think highly of me, and did not wish to further aggravate this.

I stood, stretching slowly and wincing. Another plate of rolls had magically appeared on the table; a wordless apology from Carth, perhaps. I took a couple in appreciation and walked slowly towards what now seemed to be my room: the makeshift medbay. My meagre possessions had even been moved there from the captain’s quarters.

Jen? How are things going?

Everyone here is either insane or sadistic. Or both. Revan’s mental voice sounded highly annoyed, an undercurrent of frustrated derision seeping through it. The headmaster is inordinately interested in Juhani for some unknown reason. We haven’t been granted leave to enter the valley yet, and we can’t go back to Dreshdae today. There’s this one Sith – just a boy really – who’s canvassing for advice on how to mistreat these bunch of student wannabes who aren’t performing to his expectations. Her anger was rising with each thought. This is just – it’s a waste, Bastila. These students are drunk on power. It’s like someone’s handing out blasters to a bunch of toddlers.

I breathed in deeply, and tried to visualize peace and serenity flowing out from me towards Revan.

Remember the Jedi Code, Jen. There is no emotion-

For frell’s sake, Bastila, not that again.

I sighed impatiently. I did not spend all that time after Tatooine for you to so carelessly disregard it.

Did you know the Sith have a code, too? It’s just words, Bastila. It doesn’t help me here!

Well it certainly should! I could feel myself frowning in frustration. It is not merely a motto, Jen. The words itself guide you to properly utilize the Force. If you embrace the Force with passion, with anger, it will tempt and twist you into actions you would otherwise not take. That is the very essence of why we preach caution! If you let your emotions guide your actions, then you are bereft of clear judgment.

You make it sound as if feeling anything is a crime. There is no emotion – bah!

No, I answered slowly, remembering my own training. That is not what I meant. Simply that one must remain clear-headed and not allow irrational feelings to dictate our actions. That is especially true when you wield the power of the Force. Do you think all of these students were so malicious toward others before they entered the Academy and were encouraged to embrace their emotions, negative or otherwise?

There was a long pause before she finally answered. There is some truth in what you say, Bastila. I’m not sure that’s the whole of it though.

I felt an unwanted flare of irritation at her doubts of my counsel, until the absurdity of just whom I was advising hit me. I closed my eyes, sat down on the hard bed, and attempted to take my own advice.

How are you planning to access this valley?

I’ve intrigued Yuthura – I believe she’s my best bet to get access, but I’ll need some leverage. She’s Uthar’s first apprentice, so she has some clout around here.

So this Uthar is the headmaster?

Yes. Nasty piece of work. Turned on the old headmaster some years back with his first apprentice, and then backstabbed the one who’d helped him usurp the position. Typical Sith politics. Her words had a fake nonchalance that was obviously forced. I closed my eyes.

If he is the Master on Korriban, then he will be powerful indeed.

I don’t underestimate him. She was serious now. He’s permanently immersed in this… miasma of Force power. I’m… uneasy around him.

I stayed quiet, but my concern was burgeoning. Revan, too, stopped communicating, and our bond echoed the trepidation we both felt. I understood the reasoning for coming here instead of Kashyyyk, but I still wasn’t sure I agreed. On Kashyyyk, at least, we would be safe.

But Malak would know. And he’d be a braindead murglak if he didn’t guard the Korriban Star Map before we could get here. Our only realistic chance of success is speed, and stealth.

That she had caught my thoughts so effortlessly worried me. I had not meant for her to hear that. But my connection with the Force was still shaky, and Revan’s grasp was growing stronger. One day, she would pluck the truth from my mind. If she didn’t already know.

I breathed in deep, dampened my emotions with a serene calm, and pushed out to her once more. Why did you say you couldn’t come back? Canderous is expecting you.

There was a pause. Tell Canderous I’ll return tomorrow. That leaves us a day to prepare. I could almost hear her sigh before she continued. Uthar stressed that true students needed to cut their ties with anyone left behind. That we need to focus on the Force if we are to be “worthy”. She sounded serious. I think it would look suspicious if the first thing we did was to head back to our ship. Not if we want access to the valley.

Very well. Watch out for each other, Jen.

We are. Juhani… she’s a pillar of strength, Bastila.

Despite myself, a small thread of jealousy wormed itself treacherously in my belly, dispersing the serenity I was struggling to maintain. I was the one bonded to Revan, and yet from the moment the Cathar had joined our party, the respect and understanding between the two had far eclipsed ours.

Somehow, every word I had said, every action I took, had been the wrong one. I was meant to watch Revan from afar, safely guarded onboard the Endar Spire, slowly spending my nights rifling through her discordant dreams for clues. Instead, we’d been ambushed, and it had all gone downhill from there.

But she came back.

And now on Korriban, one of the most corrupted destinations in the universe, we were actually coming to an understanding. We were actually working together. And if she and Juhani were close, then I should be thankful for the strength they could draw from each other. I would be thankful for it.

With a deep breath of resolution, I sent her another thought. What happens now?

For me, dinner. With a bunch of Sithlings. Revan was a contrary mix of amusement and irritation. I wonder if I should start a foodfight.

xXx
I stepped softly through the granite halls that were carved deep into the rock; the Force wrapped tightly around me, concealing my presence from most. As ever, the thrumming power inherent in the connection filled me with conviction that my path was the only sensible choice.

The expression on that Twi’lek girl’s face flashed through my mind. Scared, but so earnestly hopeful it made me want to puke. And yet… and yet a weak, traitorous part of me had wanted to throw it all away, and follow her.

‘To where, Dustil? To a group of sad mercenaries who can apparently “help” me against the power of the Dark Side?’ I snorted derisively to myself, and a nearby Sith soldier whirled around, startled, searching up and down the corridor but not spotting my presence. Why would I give this up this gift?

She sounded so stupid, so naïve. Most people are good at heart… what complete trash. But she believed it; I could see it in her shiny, innocent eyes. Selene had been a bit like that, once, and the pull to trust in her worldview had been difficult to resist.

Selene was long gone now.

With every step that further lifted me in Master Uthar’s esteem - that developed my abilities and strengthened my grasp on the Force - I could feel the boy I was once die. Bit by bit. I didn’t want to be that hopeful dumb boy, who’d laughed and lived on the swoop track and yearned for a father who never returned home.

But I wasn’t sure I wanted to be what I was becoming.

The fear on the girl’s face should have been gratifying; a testament to my might over her. Yet somehow, a sickening type of heartache was undermining it. I need to control this. Let my anger fade the rest away. For I didn’t want Uthar prying into my thoughts and seeing that Twi’lek. He would scour my mind, too, if he thought something was detrimental to my training. And Uthar was nothing if not meticulous in tying up loose ends.

A good thing she said her stay on Korriban was brief.

The hallway expanded into a magnificent cavern that dominated this side of the Academy. The caves here were ancient but, in recent times, sculptures of dead Sith Lords had been carved into the granite, threads of black ferracrystal running through the art and creating a stunning display. I wasn’t much interested in that sort of thing, but even I had to admit the results were impressive.

I stopped, leaning silently against a massive statue of a sneering Lord Naga Sadow while observing the occupants of the room. Selene used to pull comic faces at the sculpture, waiting until Mekel or I would break into fits of muffled laughter. Then there was the time she flicked a glob of frostti cream right up Sadow’s nose. It was a good thing Mekel had Force pushed it off just as Master Uthar rounded the corner.

Things had changed since those days.

Glancing around, I saw Master Uthar was busy extolling the virtues of the Sith Code to a handful of listeners; new students I mostly didn’t recognize. The one I did – Shaardan – was nodding vigorously, like an eager kath hound begging for a bone. He’d been here for years, failing the Adept trials three times thus far. It made him an anomaly; most either passed or died in the attempt. And the tests were gruelling enough that I certainly wouldn’t put myself through them a second time.

But Shaardan was harmless; all talk and no strike. He was a toy, really, that both Masters Uthar and Yuthura played with turn apiece. Standing near him were two others; a human woman and a Cathar of all things, listening intently to Uthar’s lecture. Their faces were wary and their bodies tense, so they couldn’t be entirely dim-witted about what they were getting into.

Sometimes newcomers were. Some of them didn’t make it past Uthar’s first lecture.

Further beyond in the shadows my eyes caught on Mekel, who was standing still in the entrance to one of the training rooms, facing back into the cavern. Intense hatred marred his face as he glared fiercely at the newcomers.

Interesting. I edged around the cavernous area, holding tight onto the Force wrapped around me. Master Uthar showed no sign of recognizing my presence, but not much escaped his notice. I kept my eyes on the listeners, and was surprised to see the human female glance in my direction, before focussing back on Uthar.

Mekel’s gaze shot to me as I closed in, and a shutter fell on his expression. He was one of the few who knew about my ability and, other than Master Uthar, the only one who could recognize the dead patch of Force that signified my cloaked presence. It’d taken him years of practice and observation.

“Having fun?” he drawled, slouching back against the granite wall.

“You got an issue with one of them?” I asked, releasing the Force and jerking my head back to the centre of the room. Mekel scowled.

“Fishing for information as always, huh? Well, I’m sure Lashowe will acquaint everyone here, so I may as well tell you.” He crossed his arms, glaring at me as if I was somehow responsible for his current predicament. “That woman back there, that Ness Jonohl, she’s gonna frakking get what’s coming to her. If you find out anything useful about her, let me know. I’d be… grateful.”

I wasn’t sure what Mekel’s gratitude was worth these days. “Tell me what happened, and I’ll see,” I shot back.

His lips twisted. “The inbred harpy challenged me, in front of Yuthura, in front of the entrance.” His dark eyes were flashing dangerously, and his third finger crooked on his thigh. [I seek revenge], it said in the street-sign he’d taught Selene and I. Once, we’d communicated that way constantly.

I quirked an eyebrow in surprise. “What, to get in?” That’s bold. Mekel was nobody’s fool; if he thought he could slither out of a dangerous duel he would have done so. Also, he wasn’t exactly a pushover, in the Force or in combat. But the implication here was that he certainly hadn’t won.

Mekel nodded abruptly. “Yuthura’s pretty pissed with my performance. She’s sending me off to the tombs to prove myself or some rot. Like I’m not already a fully-fledged Adept.”

I felt my brows rise further. The tombs were dangerous, a place Initiates were sent, often to weed out the weak or the idiotic. Those of us who returned did so without any form of prestige, and a new humility towards the Sith Masters. For the true Masters of the Force – Uthar and Yuthura – had no compunction about wandering through the deathly traps and Dark taint that had driven many a lesser Sith completely insane. Us journeymen knew better than to enter any tomb unprepared.

Mekel was still seething. “I want to teach that frakking scow a lesson, but it’ll have to wait until I’ve returned. And that schutta Lashowe came out and witnessed most of our fight. I’m going to punch her smug little face in one of these days.” Mekel sent me one last furious look and then turned, storming away down one of the tunnels that led to the sleeping quarters. I reached out to the Force once more, wrapping it tightly around me like a reflective shield, obscuring my physical presence. With a deft twist, I cut the Force weaves around me off from the rest of the world, and my psychic presence would be unnoticeable to anyone.

I thought back to my once-friend. There had never been any harmony between him and Lashowe; Mekel’s cruel streak was rivalled only by hers. Both well-established students, Lashowe had been here the longest and believed that gave her superiority over us. Her venomous barbs didn’t aggravate me quite the same as it did Mekel, which irritated him all the more. He wanted allies against Lashowe, but these days we pretty much all stood alone. Trust no one.

We’d been tight, once; Mekel, Selene and I. That was before Selene had vanished, and I’d turned on my old friend; still, to this day, believing he knew something of her disappearance.

Mekel was a Telosian refugee like myself, and we’d both been nabbed by Sharlan Nox, a Dark Jedi recruiter who’d picked at the leftovers of the carnage on Telos. I’d just had enough time to see the obliteration of my home – the clinical high-rise apartment Father paid for and Mother had hated - before I’d been captured. Much later, a HoloNet news search had confirmed my suspicions; my mother was well and truly dead.

It helped that my useless father was famous, otherwise I highly doubted I’d have found her name and had that closure. Once, I’d asked after Mekel’s family, only to hit a stone wall. We’d never exchanged backgrounds, despite our shared heritage. All I knew were guesses – he was from an entirely different part of Telos to me. A darker, more dangerous part I’d never known.

He didn’t know my family name – no one here did. From the moment Sharlan captured me, I was smart enough to shut up about that. A Republic war hero for a father would hardly be an asset. It never had been, after all. I’d once envied those who had dads who actually came home at night.

The early days on Korriban had been frantic, desperate, and yet somehow infinitely happier than the present. Mekel and I had bonded over the destruction of our homeworld – as morbid and devastating as that was – and Selene… well, Selene was a shining star that didn’t belong here. It wasn’t long before she’d begun to have doubts. She wanted to leave. She’d convinced Mekel, or so I’d thought.

He’d been the last to see her.

She wouldn’t have left Korriban without seeking me out once more. We’d been on the cusp of something special, something I’d never felt before, and although to this day I wasn’t sure whether I’d have left with her I just knew she would have tried to persuade me one last time.

And Mekel… he was adamant they were just friends and he’d never had any interest in her that way… but they’d been close too. Mekel was smarter and funnier and better looking than me, so I wouldn’t have been surprised, really. But he’d vowed there was nothing there, and that he wanted to leave too - that Korriban was twisting his soul and making him crueller and meaner than he was happy with. Deep words, and ones he denied thereafter.
When Selene disappeared, Mekel and I had no choice but to stay, and a wary distance developed between us. He’d become Yuthura’s man, and I… I was Uthar’s pet. I heard the term and detested it, but Master Uthar was quick to allay my frustrations.

_It’s a derogatory term, yes, but it means people will underestimate you, Dustil. Allow you strength to blossom, your anger to crest and your knowledge to grow. One day you will no longer hide in the shadows but take your place at my side._

I could hear his voice in my head, sometimes. I thought less of Mother, and Telos, and Selene, and more about the power and invulnerability that my path would undeniably lead me to.

_To Yuthura Ban’s downfall._

I’d not killed outright, not yet, but I’d been implicit in the deaths of some already. One day, I would challenge Yuthura, and only one of us would walk away.

I was nowhere near ready. Yet.

But things were changing rapidly, and I had to up my game. Ever since _that man_ had arrived a month ago.

…

“And this is it? These are the students you have been training for our Master?” The words dripped with venomous disappointment. The man’s eyes were dead pits of hate as they fell on each and every one of us. “Sixteen Adepts and a few dozen Initiates. I am disenchanted, Uthar.”

_Master Uthar’s face was blank, but he bowed his head fractionally._

_“Darth Bandon, we aim for the glory of our Master and his will… but we can only mould the clay that is here.”_

_“Then look further afield, Uthar,” his voice snapped out as the Force spun around him in intensity. It did that around Uthar, too. “You have Nisotsa Organa and Sharlan Nox afield hunting for new blood, and that Ban woman canvassing the traffic here. If they’re not bringing in the troops, then discipline them or I’ll see to it myself. You won’t appreciate it I have to get my hands dirty, Headmaster. I usually take things too far when I do.”_

But that wasn’t fair! We already had new students arriving almost daily. And near all of them were weeded out; either they pissed themselves on the first few days and tried to run, or they karked it in the tombs. The greenhorn’s initiation, we called it. Those that came back, crawling with humiliation, were the ones who lived. My eyes met Mekel’s, standing to attention behind the billowing dark robes of Darth Bandon. I could almost hear his thoughts – what a frakking gimboid – and his fingers twitched - [power-mad] - and I didn’t know whether I wanted him to be cautious or caught out. I settled for not signing back. I’d trusted him, once. First rule of the Sith: don’t trust anyone, not even your allies.

_Darth Bandon looked around at the students once more, a sneer on his face. “I’ll take the ten longest serving Adepts.”_

…

And just like that a power vacuum emerged at the Academy. Darth Bandon had done this before, but never had I remembered so few fully trained students left. Only six Adepts – five, after Thalia ran - with Lashowe being the longest-serving and Dak following her lead when he wasn’t nerding out over the excavations. Lashowe was Uthar’s, as much as me, but I was his hidden trump card, his prize. Lashowe was just his front to Yuthura.

And since Bandon had ripped most of the strength from the Academy, Uthar would make his move soon. He was discontented with Yuthura’s growing insubordination, and Bandon’s eyes had fallen on me, just as he was about to leave. Master Uthar had made some comment about fresh prisoners to distract him, but I’d seen the slight tightening of discomfort on his face.

Next time Bandon arrives, he’ll take me. Unless I’m Uthar’s first apprentice, he’ll be able to take me.

I shivered. Nothing on Telos had prepared me for the political games of power that went with being a Sith. Mekel handled it better, in some ways, but sometimes I fancied it was despair I saw in his eyes, too.

Good. If he had something to do with Selene… then frakking good. I hope he chokes on it.

Back in the grandiose cavern Master Uthar had turned and was headed towards me. I straightened, carefully blanked my mind, and released my grip on the weaves and they unravelled, joining the Force. No flicker of startlement crossed the Sith Master’s face; he’d known all along about my presence. The newcomers were wandering away behind Yuthura, headed towards the Initiates’ sleeping quarters. They’d obviously passed first inspection. I wondered idly if they realized just how many trials were to come. No one’s place here was secure, as Mekel’s current situation so aptly showed.

“My dear boy,” Master Uthar greeted, and I bowed once. “Walk with me. I wish to show you something highly entertaining.”

I fell in next to him, silent, as he strode confidently down through the establishment he was master of. I envied that power; here, in his kingdom, Uthar was a god. Until someone strikes him down, a little voice reminded me.

For that was the way of the Sith. The powerful rise on the backs of the weak.

The girl’s voice rang in my head. There’s a better way! A happier way!

“You are distracted,” Uthar murmured, coming to a standstill and turning milky white eyes on me. Some students whispered that he’d voluntarily eschewed any physical vision, preferring instead to see the world through the Force at all times. Perhaps, in his case, it was just the way his body reacted to the volatile power of the Dark Side.

“Ahhh, you are thinking of your old friend,” Uthar murmured, and with a tingle I felt him probe my psyche. My body iced over, and I deliberately pulled up a memory of Selene in my head to encourage his assumption.

Uthar wasn’t right all of the time, it seemed.

He slung an arm around me in a false sort of companionship. I did my best not to tense. “Let go of your doubts, young one. Shed your weaknesses. If she had stayed here, she would have only held you back, and you know this.”

“Yes, Master Uthar,” I murmured, looking away, and most assuredly not thinking of my encounter with a hapless Twi’lek girl mere hours ago.

This seemed to appease him, for he carried on walking and I followed in silence. Sometimes Uthar would be like that, considering and almost patriarchal in his regard towards me. Other times, I’d disappoint him and things would not be quite so… pleasant.

Our path took us past the training rooms; circular arenas where students would pit themselves against each other, and not always with the readily accessible training ‘sabers. They were empty currently; the entire Academy had an eerily barren feel to it since Darth Bandon’s visit.

There were only three ways to leave the Sith Academy. Get trained enough to join Malak’s war, be powerful enough to usurp the headmaster or his apprentice, or die.

Some, like Selene and Thalia, tried to run. Whatever had happened to my old friend, I hoped she’d made it out. There was no way Thalia could have, since she’d been penned into the shyrack caves – a place no Force sensitive would go if they valued their lives. Thalia had only just graduated, too, but she’d been as firmly Yuthura’s as Mekel was. Yuthura had grown too strong in the ranks – and I wasn’t quite sure how Uthar had tricked Thalia into running, but I imagined both her and her little group of Initiates would be digesting slowly in a terentatek by now.

With a start, I realized we’d walked further than I anticipated. A locked durasteel door had been welded into the rock, and Uthar dismissed the soldier guarding it, opening the door with a wave of his hand. I still didn’t know if that was a Force trick, or some sort of wireless auto-print mechanism.

I followed him into the interrogation rooms.

Three more soldiers were inside, two standing at ease by the door and one working on a console. “Leave us,” Uthar demanded curtly, and they all nodded respectfully before disappearing.

Students were not strictly allowed entrance into the interrogation rooms, although I’d been here before more than once. The soldiers kept the captives… captive, and alive. Dark Jedi would direct the treatment. I remembered once when Darth Bandon had visited and killed two Jedi Padawans in a display of overzealous examination.

Master Uthar, who’d pegged them as potential students in the making, was left seething, but Darth Bandon was one of the few that Uthar wouldn’t readily pick a fight with.

Sometimes, if a captive had outlived their usefulness, they’d be transferred to a practice room for us students to experiment on. Lashowe, in particular, revelled in those opportunities. She had a keen ability to harness the Force into electrical lightning, and relished the chance to show it off. Those unfortunate prisoners met their end in that duelling room.

There was only one prisoner, shackled in the central cage. She was slumped back against a conductive pillar that allowed for variable electric shock treatment to be administered, and surrounded by the amber crackle of a Force-inhibition field.

I recognized her immediately.

…

“Are you ok?” I asked the older woman as she sat morosely in the cantina, a non-alcoholic juice cradled between her hands. Wisps of sun-streaked brown hair framed an older face. She looked tired, and unbearably sad. “Can I help you?”

She turned at my voice, and eyed me over. Immersed in the Force, I could feel her senses stretch out and take stock of mine.
“Maybe,” she said slowly. “I am looking for Yuthura Ban.”

I slid in the chair opposite her. She matched the description the traders had given, and her Force ability further qualified that. This is Rita Sunrider, or I’m a Mon Calamari’s lunch. Freckles spattered over a lean, graceful face that looked out of place on Korriban.

“If you’re looking for Yuthura, you want in on the Academy,” I stated boldly, hoping to force her hand. I’d had no luck tracking down Kylah yet, and achieving my secondary target would at least be a sop to Master Uthar.

“I am after information, actually,” she corrected in a soft voice. “I am trying to track down a friend. She may be with the Dark Jedi.”

Probably a revenge quest, I thought angrily. Come here to assassinate some student who stole her dinner once. All sorts of scum drifted to Korriban, thinking they’d be a match for the Academy.

“I doubt I can help you with that. But I know who can.” At her inquisitive look, I elaborated further. “I can feel your strength. My master is the leader of the Academy. He’ll want to persuade you to join our ranks, if you are so inclined. At the least, he’ll be able to find the information you need.”

She looked decidedly uneasy. “If I can find out about my friend without entering the Academy I’d be happier. I need to let her know she can come back; to tell her about her master. Is there a Cathar studying there?” Her words rang true, and I couldn’t help but believe them genuine. But still, Uthar requested her presence, and I’d bring her one way or another.

“There is a Cathar,” I lied. I couldn’t remember the last time I’d seen one. “I don’t know her name though.”

The colour drained from Rita’s face, but her eyes burned a hopeful blue. “There is?” she whispered. “Could it be? Could I have actually found her?”

I shifted uncomfortably, unsure how to proceed.

“Can I implore you to request her presence here?” Rita leaned forward, hope shedding years from her expression. “Please. I can pay you if you desire.”

“I can do better than that,” I offered, smiling at her. “I’ll take you to her.”

…

She’d still taken some convincing, but her yearning to reacquaint with her old friend overrode sensible caution. She’d followed me into the Academy and directly to Uthar, who summarily dismissed me with a pleased nod.

I deliberately hadn’t thought of her again, until now.

And now, here she was, slumped and unconscious from some ministrations of Master Uthar’s no doubt. He’d get what he wanted, and then she’d die, either in this room or by the hand of a student.

Another death to my tally. Drex Voona, a male Rodian Force-sensitive. Talal Born, a male human Padawan who’d fallen. Tushka, a mercenary who’d been in possession of knowledge that Uthar deemed dangerous. And now Rita Sunrider, a foolish Jedi on a quest to save someone who probably wasn’t worth saving.
I’d never killed outright, but those deaths belonged to me directly. Drex Voona. Talal Born. Tushka. Don’t be a marsh toad, Dustil, I sneered to myself. Uthar doesn’t remember all the names he’s killed. And just think how many died on Telos. People die every damn day.

“I thought you might like to see the results,” Uthar commented, his gaze fixed on me. He was gauging my reaction, looking for any signs of weakness or mercy. Mercy is weakness. I straightened my spine and looked him directly in the eyes.

“I hope you’ve retrieved the information you desire, Master,” I responded calmly.

"Oh yes," Uthar breathed, before bending over the console and tapping a few keys. A robotic arm moved inside the cage, stabbing Rita with a hypodermic needle. Her body shuddered as the drugs flowed into her system. "It's not of any great import, but it is amusing. And you've missed out on learning these sorts of techniques, my dear boy. I would be remiss in my duties as a teacher if I did not give you the opportunity to hone your skills."

The bottom of my stomach fell nauseatingly; I bit the inside of my cheek and forced a smile that felt as fake as it must have looked. He wants me to practice torture.

"Do you want to know her real name?" Uthar murmured. "I knew it already, but it was delightful to make her confess it. Breaking people is a sweet pastime. See if you can, my dear boy. Be inventive."

Uthar pressed another key on the console, and the amber prism of Force-inhibition stuttered, and then winked out. I understood, then, that Uthar meant for me to find another method of interrogation than the standard electric shock treatment. Can't have you taking the easy way out behind a console, Dustil. My own inner voice was a dark sneer. You have to get your hands dirty. You have to be inventive.

I swallowed back a lump of sick, my fists clenching tight as I willed myself to be strong. I must do this. There is no other way. Rita slowly swung her gaze to me, and her eyes widened comically in outrage.

"You!" she cried brokenly. "You betrayed me!"

I forced a nonchalant shrug and took a step towards her. "I'm a Sith, and you are a Jedi," I retorted coldly. "What the frakk do you expect, you imbecile." Uthar chuckled behind me. A sort of resigned desolation swept Rita's face, and her eyes closed.

"It was a lie then," she whispered. "There is no Cathar here."

"No," I conceded, and then a sudden vision of whom Uthar had been lecturing minutes ago sparked in my head. A human woman and a Cathar, of all things. I turned to look at Master Uthar. "There wasn't then," I mumbled under my breath.

Uthar threw back his head and laughed. "Isn't it hilarious, my dear boy? I am intrigued to see if it's the same Cathar; it is rare to encounter one. And, as the Jedi as so fond of saying, there is no coincidence… there is only the Force."

I turned back to look at Rita; her eyes had snapped back open and she was staring at the both of us, puzzled and afraid. Uthar's stepped up behind me, resting his hand warmly on my neck. It felt like an unbearable weight that I would never be able to shake off. There was no point in trying.

"It's your move, my dear boy."
I'd not managed the sort of skills Lashowe had. My talents lay in concealment, a duality of hiding both my presence physically and spiritually. Master Uthar had been intrigued with me from near the start; he'd admitted once that he'd never known someone with the ability to enshroud themselves both ways. But, as he so often lamented, my use of the Force was too inward, and I needed the practice.

My hand raised tentatively, and I pushed outwards, hard against her neck. She choked, and strained against the durasteel restraints, but it did not stop her breathing.

"What is your real name?" I asked. I had to do this, I had to go through with it, and I would not fail in front of Uthar. For his disappointment, at times, could be worse than what I was about to do.

"I- I have already told your Master!" she gasped, and anger twisted her face now, sitting hand in hand with the fear. I could feel the ebb of the Force sitting deep within her, now, cautious and watchful. She was physically restrained, but without the inhibition field her Force abilities had returned. No doubt, she'd already tried her strength against Master Uthar, and his return response was likely what was holding her back, now.

Or her injuries.

"But you haven't told me," I replied. Once more, I lashed out with the Force, a tight squeezing of air currents under my command. She choked, and shook her head irritably. I could feel Uthar's displeasure behind me.

"Find your strength, my dear boy," he said quietly.

"It – is – Rita Sunrider!" the woman ground out, and the anger in her was winning now. It burned within her Force signature.

I could feel anger burn inside of me, too; that she would make me do this, make me feel this squeamishness at something that should come naturally to a true Sith. She could at least make it easy for me! I felt my face contort as I allowed my fury to blossom. She's nothing but a worn out Jedi. She is no match for me, and I won't let her upstage me in front of Uthar.

He'd told me to find my strength. So, I pulled hard onto the Force, melded it in the weaves I used every day, and wrapped it around the Jedi schutta. And squeezed.

She screamed as the pressure assailed her body from every side; her stomach, her arms, her mouth, her eyes. I felt the response of Force power bleed out from her, weak and tired and injured, just like her physical body. I focussed hard on forcing the weaves to remain just so, keeping my anger stoked above all else. This is your fault, Rita Sunrider. You should never have agreed to come.

A slight touch from Uthar had me release it once more, and she sagged against the restraints, a low whimper escaping her. Her aura dimmed, shrinking to within her own body.

"What is your name?" I asked again.

She slowly lifted her head, and I could see the fear there once more. But the fury – it hadn't completely gone. She's not broken yet. She licked her lips, and glanced behind me to Uthar.

"It is Belaya Linn," she said softly.

It wouldn't be enough. I knew it, I could tell by Uthar's heavy hand on my shoulder, and I damned the human for the visible anger on her face. Why must you make me do this more? I screamed inwardly.
"What is the Cathar's name?" My voice was low and dark, and she flinched.

"No," she said. "No… she is not here. Do not make me answer that… it is of no import to you!"

"Tell me," I insisted, but she shook her head wildly, a sob tumbling from her lips, and I felt my rage spike against her once more. With a snarl, I threw the Force back towards her, with all my fury and fear and doubt behind it, amplifying it. She was forced back against the restraints as she writhed and screamed in agony. Damn you! I don't want to do this… why are you making me, you stupid Jedi scow? I heard the crack of ribs breaking, and once more, Uthar's hand pulled me back from the abyss.

She was crying, in great heaving sobs, her head bowed and words tumbling aimlessly from her lips. Her psychic signature on the Force had retreated to a whisper.

"Please… no more," she begged, her voice breaking on a deep, hacking cough. I saw the bright red splatter of blood strike the floor like a brand.

"Then answer me," I said coldly. "Answer me, or taste more of the same. I will have the name in the end."

"Juhani," she whispered, head still lolling as she sobbed again. "Forgive me… Juhani."

I was made of ice cold granite with a pit of fury at my core. It was the only way to not feel, to not care about this woman whose quest had so disastrously failed. I turned, my face expressionless, to look at my master.

He tapped a key on the console, and the amber prism of Force-inhibition once more winked into existence. In a way, it protected the breaking woman as much as it imprisoned her.

Uthar was smiling at me benevolently. "You did well, my boy." His voice was soft and caressing.

It damned me to a future of darkness.

xXx
“Through victory, my chains are broken,” I murmured to myself, tapping through the restricted archive.

“Padawan!”

A jolt of unwanted surprise lurched through me. Turning, I found myself pinned by an intense turquoise gaze.

“Not Padawan anymore,” I muttered, feeling the bottom of my stomach drop out. Stars, she won’t understand. My fingers twitched to shut down the output display, but stopped at a firm shake of the Zabrak’s head. Great. I can’t avoid a lecture now.

“Old habits take time to break,” the Jedi Master said, grimacing as she stepped towards me. “Particularly when I come across you…” She broke off, close enough to view the holoscreen over my shoulder, and gave an audible sigh that echoed through the quiet library. “Breaking the rules again.”

“I was researching-”

“You do realize that some on the Council did not support your rise to Knight?”

“I passed the trials-“

“My old student,” she cut in once more, the exasperation in her voice evident. “Perhaps you would like to explain to me why you are viewing restricted data that only a Master has clearance for?”

Not really. I frowned in frustration. “Look, Karon, the Sith dallied with the Mandalorians two decades ago. I think-”

I stopped at her raised hand. She stared intently for a moment before finally speaking. “You suspect they have influenced the Mandalorian skirmishes.”

“It’s more than just skirmishes,” I grumbled. “But yeah, I’m considering the possibility. Did you know there’s a famous Mandalorian saying? Kar’tayl gar aru’e. Understand your enemy.”

“I believe the Mandalorians have a lot of sayings. And I’m certain you could use any number of them to justify any number of actions.” She placed gentle hands on my shoulders as her turquoise eyes sharpened in concern. Her voice dropped on the next words. “My friend, my old Padawan, there is a reason this knowledge is restricted to Masters. We do not conceal information to serve our own ends. Some knowledge is dangerous, even to those with years of training.”

I held her gaze, but I could see she wasn’t convinced I’d taken her words seriously. With an inward sigh, I resigned myself to at least an hour’s discourse on the subject.
“Jen!” an urgent voice dragged me from the hazy depths of slumber and a half-forgotten memory. My eyes opened, and the blurry shape of a Cathar leaning over me came into view.

“Call me Ness,” I whispered groggily, rising a hand to rub at my eyes. I winced; the side of my face was still tender from my last bout with Canderous. Perhaps I should have applied more of that gree-bacta salve back on the ‘Hawk, but it stank. “Stay in character, Staria.”

“Oh, yes. Of course,” she murmured as I sat up with a groan. “Are you alright, my friend? You were thrashing about in your sleep.”

My hand stilled, and dropped, and I met the alien amber eyes watching me in concern. “A dream, or a memory. It’s this cursed place. Staria - I dreamt I was looking up the Sith Code,” I muttered. The frelling Sith Code. I grimaced. Kar’tayl gar aru’e, indeed.

But it fit. It fit with everything I knew so far. Street Kid had fought in the Mandalorian Wars. She’d – I’d – followed Revan into that war, at the least. I’d believed in the cause passionately. Sun and stars, I’d been a frelling Jedi Knight. Bastila had said I’d been a Jedi, but a Knight? How many Padawans d’ya think followed Revan and Malak, you numbskull? That meant- that meant I outranked Bastila, in a sense. A surprised laugh erupted from me before I could stop it, and Juhani pulled back, her ears twitching nervously.

“You were here?” Juhani whispered, her eyes moving around the small habitation quarters we had been resting in. I drew in the Force deeply, and could sense her apprehension. She thinks I learned it on Korriban.

“No,” I muttered absently, stretching out my legs. “I was with the Jedi somewhere, researching the Sith. Researching the enemy.” Until Karon rebuked me for it. Karon. “Master Karon was lecturing me…” I mumbled, and my eyes widened. “Stars, Juhani, I think she was my Master.”

“Oh,” Juhani replied uselessly. My mind jumped about, trying to connect the dots, and all I could see was the life draining from the Zabrak Jedi on a cold floor on Manaan. She’d been my frelling Master, and she stuffed Darth Revan in my head? And Jen Sahara? I must have… I must have, for some reason, agreed. Why else would a Master do that to their old Padawan?

The Force roiled angrily through me, frustration cresting through my veins and demanding an outlet. A growl rose in my throat, and my fist clenched. My eyes rested briefly on a useless plasteel side table before I sent my hand punching straight through it, the Force riding high in my muscles. It shattered into a thousand splinters. Much like my mind.

“Sithspit,” I cursed bitterly. “If I’d been five minutes earlier on Manaan, she might still be alive! And I might know more about… about everything.” The Force ebbed as despair rode out the fury, and I dropped my head lifelessly into my hands. At my waist, I was hyper-aware of the only token I had that proclaimed Karon’s importance to me, once. Her lightsaber.

I hadn’t let out of my sight since Manaan.

“Let it guide you.”

What did that even mean? When I’d turned it on, facing that mouthy Mekel, I’d felt the Force sing through Karon’s lightsaber in a cleaner, lighter way than the red ‘sabers did in my grasp.
Kaiburr crystals are, in essence, Force amplifiers, a voice murmured in my head. I wondered with a wrench whether it was Karon’s voice, or merely just my own broken mind tormenting me. They are the power source for our lightsabers, and different crystals sing louder to different Force sensitives. Once entrenched in corruption, they turn scarlet no matter their original hue.

The red ‘sabers burned and twisted, and the Force was a rollercoaster of emotions. Is that what Karon had meant? Could a natural rock influence a sentient being, or did the being influence the rock?

Does it even frelling matter? Karon’s dead, and I still have more questions than answers. I need… I need to talk to Bastila.

My bond-sister was asleep through the bond, having her own bad dreams. It all comes back to Bastila. As soon as I’m done here, she’ll tell me the whole truth.

“Regrets and what-ifs are poison,” Juhani was murmuring softly. Her warm hand was resting gently on my shoulder. “You must look to the present and the future.”

“But if I hadn’t run in the first place… or, no – if I’d stayed, maybe then I might be meek little Jen Sahara once more.” I felt my whispered words break as I realized that. If Karon had brainwashed me once, wouldn’t she do it twice? On the Endar Spire, all I’d been was Jen Sahara. Did I agree to that too? An entire scrubbing of my identity? No… no. My entire being rebelled at that thought. It seemed like the worst kind of violation.

And Juhani must think I was going frelling insane. I jerked my head to look at the Cathar, and the strongest emotion I could see in her feline eyes was a deep, distraught empathy. “Don’t listen to me, Staria.” I forced a laugh. “This place is just getting to me. I’ll- I’ll go meditate with Bastila when we’re back on the Hawk.” I laughed again, and inwardly winced at the hollow sound.

Juhani was still staring at me intently. “What happened on Rii’shn?”

None of the others had asked yet. They’d all, even Carth, seemed to accept my brief explanation. No more running. And it was the truth, but not the whole of it. Juhani… the only one who’d accepted me back with no recriminations, perhaps deserved more.

“I found the Dark Side within me,” I said simply, staring past her at the plain granite walls that extended upwards to a ridiculously high ceiling. Absently, I wondered if the original creators of this cavernous warren were five metres tall.

“We all have the darkness within us,” Juhani whispered. “It is how we deal with it that defines us. Even if we have failed before, there is still hope to do better.”

Was Juhani talking about herself now? Her amber eyes had a faraway look and glistened with emotion. Not so long ago, she believed herself too weak for the Light. She’s come far.

“But what if it’s always there?” I murmured. The rage, the fear, the pull for power… the feelings came and went, but thus far I’d never felt them go entirely. “The Dark Side?”

“It is a battle that we face constantly,” Juhani agreed, and her attention was back on me again. She’d composed herself; her face serene and thoughtful. “I am only just beginning to comprehend that.”

I sighed heavily. “Yeah. Do you think some Jedi fall because they’re just so damn sick of resisting it?”
Her eyes widened fractionally. “No,” she said after a moment’s thought. “I believe the more you live the Jedi way, the easier it is to resist the pull of Dark Side. But that doesn’t mean we should become complacent, for no one is infallible.”

I shot her a sideways glance. “Wise words. Are you sure you weren’t a Knight?”

Juhani smiled sadly. “I was close. It was when I failed my Knight trials that I fled.”

I blinked, startled to hear her speak of it.

I saw a pained look before she closed her eyes. “You must understand… my Master, Quatra… I was devoted to her. The sort of blind, unwavering devotion that is both unhealthy and weak. She had made it clear numerous times how wrong my attachment to her was, but at the trials… I was made to choose… and when I saw her… I thought it was part of the vision. I…” She inhaled deeply. “I am sorry. I try not to dwell on it, but this place has me on edge.”

You and me both. Her slanted eyes were open once more, but evading my gaze. She regretted speaking, I could see. “I think she was the wrong master for you.” She was an intense soul, Juhani, and this Quatra sounded like a by-the-books ice queen with little empathy. I wondered idly if I’d ever met her.

Juhani’s gaze had snapped back to mine. “Perhaps you mean I was the wrong Padawan for her.”

“No,” I said a little forcefully. “For the Master chooses the apprentice. When she realized the depth of your devotion, she should have transferred you to another Master rather than try to kill it with coldness and jumped-up Knight trials.” For, to my ignorant ears, it sounded like Quatra had used Juhani’s trials to test the depth of her emotions. Bet she didn’t expect it to backfire this way. But in the end it had hurt the Cathar far more than her Master, I suspected.

The chronometer dinged, breaking our conversation with a high-pitched electronic buzz. I frowned, and leaned over to switch it off. Our eyes met again.

“Yuthura will be here soon,” I said, feeling my lips twist. Juhani nodded, and we both rose silently. I felt refreshed after a decent sleep, but I could have done without the dream. Suppose it’s too much to hope that Bastila didn’t see it.

Uthar’s drivel yesterday must have dredged it from the depths of my damaged memory. I didn’t put much stock in either the Jedi Code or the Sith Code. It’s just words, Bastila! I’d seethed at her. But Bastila disagreed vehemently… and I promised myself I’d take the time to listen to her, now.

I shook my head to clear the thoughts, and began buckling on my discarded armour mesh. Juhani was already clothed in her plain tunic. We’d both, I noticed, ignored the dark robes that Yuthura had mentioned, when she’d taken us here the previous evening.

…

We followed Yuthura Ban in silence down the imposing corridor carved deep into the rock. Her posture was tense, and her lekku flicked her discontent. I wondered if she felt this sort of orientation beneath her.

There were many doors on either side of us, all wooden and without any obvious locking mechanism. The Twi’lek Dark Jedi stopped in the centre of the hallway, and turned to face us.

“These are the aspiring student dorms,” Yuthura murmured silkily. Other than the occasional glance at Juhani, she kept her attention focussed on me, pegging the Cathar as an unimportant
Intriguing, in that it was the flipside of Uthar’s reaction. He’d been quick to agree to our admittance as Initiates, and then spent the next hour espousing the glory of the Sith, their code, and their delightful way of life. Then, before dismissing us into the temporary tutelage of Yuthura Ban, he’d directed Juhani to visit him tomorrow.

Not happening, I’d thought darkly at the time, sending a loaded look towards my friend. There was no way I’d let her meet someone like Uthar Wynn alone.

“Pick your rooms. There are no locks, so I suggest you do not be too quick to make enemies,” Yuthura was saying. She threw me a pointed look, referring no doubt to yesterday’s incident with Mekel. She hadn’t been particularly impressed at the time, but I’d wagered a minor irritation on her side was a worthwhile trade-off for a swift entrance into the Academy.

I hadn’t expected the witness, though. Halfway through the confrontation, a young, blonde human woman had slipped out through the Academy’s grand doors and set Yuthura’s teeth on edge. I had the odd feeling that Yuthura wouldn’t have sent Mekel off to the tombs had the witness not been there.

And the blasted irony was vicious little Mekel, being forced directly to where we needed to go.

Within the Academy, Yuthura’s sensual voice contained the monotony of boredom. “You will find robes inside that befit your new station in life.”

I glanced over at Juhani, whose mouth had tightened.

“Once you have proven yourself a true student of the Sith,” Yuthura was saying, “you may end up having your own secure quarters on the other side of the Academy with the Adept. But the first part of your training is your initiation, shall we say.” Yuthura smirked. “You must show yourself worthy.”

I folded my arms, quirking an eyebrow at her and concealing my unease. “Time to use our… independent thinking, was it?”

Yuthura laughed, a high tinkling noise. “I do not want to like you, Ness Jonohl, but it seems I cannot help myself. You are quite amusing.”

“I aim to please,” I said drily.

“I will give you one tip: placate Mekel or risk his wrath at your leisure. He does not forget a slight.” Yuthura’s words were soft and surprising. Her unnatural eyes were serious, and I wondered at her motivations. She’d sent him to the Valley of the Sith Lords, but perhaps she hadn’t had a choice.

“He’s a favourite of yours,” I said quietly.

“It does not pay to have favourites here.” Yuthura replied, her voice colder than before. “You are foolish if you trust anyone.” Her gaze slid over to Juhani. “Allies, yes, to help increase your prestige and power. But a true Sith stands alone. If you do not comprehend that, then it is at your peril.”

…

She had little more to impart after that; a pointer towards the nearby amenities, and a brief discourse on Uthar’s rise—slaughtering the old Headmaster Jorak Uln plus his apprentice a few years back in the charming tradition of the Sith. At some stage Uthar must have chosen Yuthura Ban as his first. I wasn’t sure what to make of Yuthura; she seemed content in her environment, but her posture changed when she spoke of her master and it wasn’t deferential.

We’d been left to ourselves, then, to rest and find some food in the student kitchenette. The empty room filled with rows of food synthesizers had been a disappointment; I’d had an amusing vision of throwing a wad of mash at some unsuspecting student, but it appeared Dark Jedi wannabes didn’t socialize over meals.

One Initiate entered while we were dallying, shooting us both a distrustful look while filling a plasteel container with gelatinous goop before vanishing.

“Maybe the Adept’s have a cantina on the other side of the Academy,” I remembered muttering grumpily, while serving myself a tray of nutritious yet highly unpalatable mush.

Yuthura had told us to be ready at dawn for training, so we had retreated to one of the empty rooms to rest.

And now, it was time to start the day as a Sith student.

I sat back down on the lone bed with a sigh. “I wonder what Yuthura’s training entails,” I muttered, looking up at Juhani. Unease coiled like a sick snake in my belly. “I won’t lie to you, Juhani. I’m… scared. Here, this dark place… I’m scared I’ll lose myself to the darkness. Again.” A shiver coursed through me, and I stared down at my hands. They’d been covered in blood back on Rii’shn. Sure, the blood of people contracted to kill me… but the enjoyment I’d felt then was bone-deep terrifying. Maybe I was wrong. Maybe Korriban was the worst place to visit next.

A gentle touch on my head had me looking up. “Together we will be each other’s strength, Jen. Together we will walk in the light.” The Cathar sounded so righteous, so damn good and strong, that I couldn’t help but feel a bit better.

Juhani stared at me, and I saw the uncertainty in her as she struggled to comprehend my words. It was hard to suppress my smile.

“I-I do not believe your irreverence is an appropriate response, Jen,” she said finally.

The grin broke out genuinely now, and I nudged her leg with my hand. “Maybe not appropriate, but it seems to work for me.”

I saw her lips curve with the smallest of smiles. “Humans baffle me,” she murmured. “Especially your odd humour.”

“Do Cathars not tell jokes then?”

She frowned. “To be honest, I know little of my peoples’ culture or customs.”

A light knock interrupted our conversation, and she rose silently, stepping forward to answer it.

A male human stood awkwardly in the doorway, hands hanging loosely at his sides as if he didn’t know what to do with them. He was garbed in a dark grey robe that ill-fitted him, hanging loosely at the sides. Somehow, he didn’t appear cut from the same cloth as all the other Force sensitiv around here. But he was one, I could feel the spark of it around his aura.

I’d been holding in the Force without realizing it. It had become second nature at some stage.

“Oh, ah… hello,” the young man stammered. He was older than Mekel by a few years, but youth was still evident in his rounded cheeks. “My name is Kel Algwin. Master Yuthura ordered me to show you the Archives this morning.”

I glanced briefly over at Juhani, whose expression was neutral.

“Archives,” I echoed. “Great. Are we studying for something?”

Kel blinked uncertainly. He was an olive-skinned, attractive sort, with an open, wholesome look to him that most certainly didn’t belong on Korriban. Either he had a very convincing front, or he wasn’t going to last long on this frelling planet.

“Well, er… we are studying to be Sith, of course,” he replied at long last.

I inclined my head. “Can’t wait for the final exam,” I muttered. “Well, Kel, I am Ness Jonohl and this is Staria, although I’m sure you know that already. Want to lead the way?”

He stood there, his eyes flicking over both me and Juhani. A twitch on his left eye betrayed his nervousness. “Ah, do you not want to change first? Into robes, or a uniform?”

“No,” I said flatly. I understood why Force-sensitives preferred the advantage of robes to armour – although I still felt more comfortable behind scale mesh – but what I didn’t get was this blasted conformity the Sith and the Jedi seemed to have in announcing their alignment with the colour of their clothing. And surely, being contrary on Korriban would help me fit in as much as wearing their stars-cursed uniform.

“Ohay,” Kel replied slowly, seeming anything but. “Come this way, please.”

We followed him down one of the imposing corridors out of the student quarters. Again, the sheer height of the granite ceiling impressed me. It must have taken some work to carve out these passageways. Mission said this Academy was new, but the caverns themselves aren’t. They’re ancient. The Force was strong here, or perhaps I was more attuned to it. I could feel a dark twist to it; an angry, resentful vibration that felt like it wanted to latch into my head. My eyes slid to Juhani and I thought I saw a tremor by her mouth.

As we turned a corner, my senses touched on an odd, dead patch in the Force, a gap where the Force curved away, as if something was repelling it. Yesterday, when Uthar had been glorifying the values of the Sith to us I’d thought I’d sensed the same thing. It had been moving, then.

“Ness?” Juhani questioned, and I realized Kel and Juhani were waiting for me further ahead while I’d been blankly staring at the wall. With a shake of my head, I fell into step with them. The Force is warped on Korriban. Maybe this is just a sign of Dark Side corruption.

Juhani was shooting me a warning glance, and I chased the thoughts from my head. She probably thinks I’m chatting with Bastila again. Bastila was still asleep, but lightly so. She’d wake soon, I could tell.

The bond was growing stronger.

I cleared my throat. “So, Kel, this place is pretty empty.”
The young man gave me a cautious sideways look as we neared a set of double doors. “We normally have more students than now,” he agreed. “Darth Bandon visited us a month ago, and most of the Adepts left with him to join the war.”

_Darth Bandon._ The name meant something to me, or it should. _Or it does to Evil Bitch._ One didn’t call oneself _Darth_ without being powerful, I knew that much. “Malak’s apprentice,” I half-guessed.

Kel nodded, opening the doors and leading us inside a large, deserted room. “Bandon or Nisotsa come here every few months to take the strongest. The departure of the last group has caused a bit of a power struggle here, actually.”

He didn’t seem like he was going to expand on that, and instead motioned to the consoles on one side of the room. Most of them had cerebral plug-ins for those with implants, and all boasted a holo-reader and full AV headset. “These computers are off the grid, linked into our Archives and databanks. The ones on the other wall are connected to the galactic HoloNet.”

“What do you mean?” I asked. “About the power struggles?”

Kel blinked. “Oh, ah… just Academy politics. You’ll get used to it once you’ve been here for a while. So anyway, Master Yuthura—”

“They’re the two leaders here?” I queried. At his nod I grimaced, and saw a slight wince from the Cathar. I’d humiliated Mekel yesterday in front of Yuthura – his Master, if her reaction was anything to go by – and worse, in front of what _must_ have been Lashowe. “Lashowe reports to Uthar,” I said slowly, seeing confirmation in Kel’s face before he looked away.

No wonder Yuthura has dressed him down so harshly. She couldn’t afford to show any sort of mercy to her favoured student in front of Uthar’s plant. It’d figure the headmaster and his apprentice would play out a little power game using their students as bait. _I don’t need to get involved. I should keep my head down, and stay out of these Sithling politics._ But it might already be too late for that.

“Here, this is the Archive’s home portal,” Kel told us, motioning to the screen. A holo-picture... appeared on the pad in front of the terminal. “Master Yuthura wants you to become familiar with the history of the Sith and the founding of this Academy. She’ll be here to check on you shortly and give you some rudimentary training.”

He took a step back, his body language clearly stating his desire to leave us – and it was a perfect opportunity to do some uninterrupted research. And yet… curiosity overcame my caution. For Kel was also a weak link, and our best source of information on how this sodding Academy worked.

Jen? How do you fare?

“How Kel, which faction is the most powerful?” I asked. He glanced towards me again, twitching eyes betraying his uncertainty.

I’m fine. Just interrogating a Sithling.

“Well,” he said slowly. “Dak follows Lashowe, although most of the Initiates tend to side with Mekel. I- I stay out of it as much as I can.” I stared hard at him, and he dropped his gaze to the ground. “I- Mekel’s always been kind to me. He can be nasty, but he leaves me alone. I don’t want to take part in any fighting.”

I mulled things over. Mekel, nasty little snot that he was, was probably stringing Kel along for his own purposes. However, it seemed we’d come at a fortuitous time. I’d felt Mekel’s strength, and it wasn’t to be sneezed at – but it didn’t exactly frighten me either. The small amount of actual Dark Jedi here was a pleasant surprise.

Overconfidence can lead down dark paths, Jen. At the least, it can cause errors of judgment. Even the mightiest of Jedi can be slain by a knife wound. I grimaced. Bastila’s caution, as usual, was annoying – the more so because she was right.

“Mekel’s the most powerful graduate here?” I hazarded a guess.

“I shouldn’t be talking to you like this,” he mumbled after a long pause.

“You should not be here,” Juhani said, her voice low and serious. She’d surprised both of us by speaking; I’d almost forgotten the Cathar was there. “Kel. You are too good for this place, and you know it.”

My stomach clenched. This was reckless and dangerous, no matter Juhani’s drive for redemption. “Staría,” I said warningly. She flashed me a challenging look, her slanted eyes glinting in resolution.

“I- uh,” Kel’s eyes were wide as he looked back and forth between us, uncertainty and unease rolling off him in waves.

“You do not belong here in this darkness,” Juhani said softly. “You do not have to stay with the Sith.”

Sod it, Juhani, this is frelling risky. And yet, if she was going down that path, I may as well throw my hat in and support her. I suppose if we get caught out, we can always say we were tricking him.

What is risky?

I sighed. “She’s right, Kel. This place will devour you, and you’ll end up detesting yourself.”

Juhani wants to redeem the world.
I spotted his fists clenching, and my muscles tensed in response. “Master Yuthura always says I’m too trusting,” he muttered, “too willing to show weakness. What you’re saying… Sith like you use any means to succeed, to trick others.”

Is that not a good thing?

“We are not Sith, Kel,” Juhani whispered.

“Yeah, we’ve only been here one night,” I added irreverently. “I’m sure it takes at least a couple of days.”

“Ness,” Juhani reproved.

I ignored her, still staring at the young man. “Look, Kel, Staria’s a good judge of character. Honestly. You must have thought of ditching this stars-cursed place.”

Kel was shaking his head, and his dark skin paled somewhat. “No,” he said. “You don’t just leave the Academy. I mean… not that I’ve ever thought of it. But you can’t. Either you graduate and join the war, or…”

“Or?” I prompted.

“Or you keep trying to graduate, like poor Shaardan. But those that try to run… they never get far.” His voice dropped to a husky whisper, and I heard the echo of despair behind it. Something snapped in me, and I stepped forward, my hands dropping onto his shoulders.

“Kel. Look at me,” I commanded, putting on my best authoritative voice. His black eyes shot up to focus on mine, and I felt his shoulders bunch under my hands. “Once we’ve concluded our business, we won’t be staying. And we will offer you a way off this planet, should you wish to take it.”

He stared, and I could see the beginnings of hope start to burn in his eyes. His mouth opened soundlessly. He wanted away from this soul-destroying place. Juhani is right.

“Don’t say anything,” I added. “We’ll talk no more about this. But we’ll come for you before we leave and give you the option.”

He glanced over to Juhani, who was smiling beatifically at me. “Okay,” Kel said. “I think. Thanks. Maybe. Um…”

I laughed, and motioned him away. “Go. Don’t dwell on this conversation, Kel. We’ll see you later.” The Force thrummed through my words, and I winced when I recognized the faint taste of compulsion. That had been both accidental and instinctive.

“We will not forget about you, Kel,” Juhani added quietly. Her words rang genuine and true, and once more I was filled with admiration for my Cathar friend. She is a true Jedi.

And then the young man smiled, hope well and truly alight in his face. He turned, and made for the exit.

“One last thing,” he murmured at the door. “What you said earlier, about Mekel. Most people believe he’s the strongest, and if he weren’t aligned with Yuthura then Uthar would be priming him to replace her.”

“You don’t think that,” I said slowly.
Kel shook his head. “I watch people, and stay out of things as best I can. The strongest graduate here is Dustil, and he’s Uthar’s true protégé.”

I’d missed the fifth candidate in our conversation. That was sloppy. “I thought Lashowe led Uthar’s faction?” I asked.

“Outwardly, yes. Dustil works alone… people call him Uthar’s pet, like he’s some sort of bootlicker. But he hides his strength and works for Uthar in the shadows. Everyone underestimates him, even Mekel. I don’t. I’ve seen what he can do.”

“Thanks for the tip,” I said quietly. Kel shot us one last, small smile before exiting.

Juhani and I shared a measuring look as the door snicked closed shut behind Kel’s retreating figure.

“Well,” I said, sighing. “Sith politics 101. That was enlightening.”

“We may have another crew member when we leave,” Juhani replied. Her slanted eyes were wide with pleasure. “This is a good thing we have done, Jen.”

“Ness,” I muttered. “Use Ness. The walls likely have ears. And anyway… you started it.”

She gazed at me soulfully. “Thank you for supporting me, Ness.”

I inclined my head. “You are shining a light in the darkest of places, Staria. And… despite the risks, you are right to do it. But let’s hop on the consoles and see what we can find, okay?”

With a loaded look between us, we moved to adjacent computers and started our research. Despite Kel’s directive, there was only one primary objective for us both: finding the most likely location of the Star Map.

There was plenty of information on the tombs, they’d obviously been studied excessively by Dark Jedi and Sith scholars alike. Part of me was surprised to realize there was such a thing as academics aligned to the Sith, but I lectured myself that believing things to be so black and white was not only ignorant, but potentially foolhardy. Not all Sith are evil… and not all Jedi are honourable.

There were half a dozen tombs of great importance, all of which listed various traps, and warnings about unstable Dark Force energy that made me grimace. Enough to make any ill-prepared Force sensitive insane, I imagined. None of them had their contents fully recorded – either no one had come back alive from the depths, or those that did refused to share their knowledge. They were all ancient. I’d been hoping that I’d find one eons older than the rest, as an obvious hiding place for a hidden relic.

Juhani was tapping away awkwardly on another console next to me, having also switched off the visual feed. I turned back to my screen, pulling up a query on the dead Sith Lord Naga Sadow. Sadow had triumphed over Ludo Kressh, and Sadow’s tomb lay near the bottom of the valley. It held some importance to the leader of the Academy, it seemed graduation ceremonies were often held there.

How likely would it be for a Star Map to reside where they send all the wannabe Adepts? And if it’s so accessible, wouldn’t Malak have come back to destroy it? Perhaps he meant to, in time. Or perhaps, with the supposed destruction of the Dantooine master Map, he hadn’t thought it necessary. That’d be an embarrassing oversight, given how far we’ve come.
Kressh’s tomb, on the other hand, lay somewhere in the bowels of the shyrack caves, protected by the stars-cursed terentateks. Somewhere, presumably near the ruins of a much older Sith Academy. I shivered. When Mission had mentioned that, I’d been swamped with a vague, foreboding feeling – like someone trampling over my very soul.

_Ludo Kressh was a cautious Lord, and obsessed with the history of the Sith, a dark and all-too-familiar voice whispered. He surrounded himself with artefacts of dark power, even if he didn’t fully comprehend them._

I swallowed, pushing Revan’s voice away. Korriban was messing with my mind, and yet I could _feel_ I’d walked this dark path before.

My eyes slid back to Juhani, who was frowning in consternation at the screen. _I need a distraction._ Looking back to my console, I tapped a key back to the home portal and saw a link to the Academy’s founding. _May as well follow Yuthura’s orders. She’s likely to test us on them._

The holo-reader lit up with a recording, despite my earlier preference for text-feed only. Two figures shone into existence; one, an older humanoid bowing deferentially to a masked, dark-robed figure that faced him.

“What is that?” Juhani asked, her attention caught by the video.

_“It is time to open this Academy up to new students, Jorak,”_ the masked figured said in a cold voice. _“I know you’ve been snivelling around here for years, letting the odd Force-sensitive poke around under your tutelage, but I expect you to actively recruit now that I am leading the Sith.”_

_“It shall be as you say, Lord Revan,”_ the older man replied.

“Jen?” Juhani’s voice was sharp and frightened. Bile rose in my throat as stunned shock froze my mind, and a sickening vertigo rushed in my ears.

...

"No messing about, Jorak," I commanded. I could sense the older man was appeasing me, waiting for me to throw my weight about and then leave. Little did he know that we’d met before. I’d dropped a false name back then, of course, and kept a low profile. Acted suitably servile and pandered to the Sith’s ego—just enough that he’d been willing to let me roam this part of Korriban mostly unhindered. And I’d found what I required, and then I’d left.

But now... now I led an empire. Now I had a war to win. And for that I needed trained Adepts— and Jorak Uln was powerful enough to both seek out and train suitable prospects... if he complied.

"I have only let a few Force sensitives walk these walls before now, my lord," Jorak answered slowly. "But I understand the playing field has shifted since your rebirth."

_Jen! Come back!_

“Indeed,” I replied, and pulled the Force deep into my body, deep enough to impress upon him my superior power. “I have a Dark Jedi with me, Nisotsa, who shall serve as an off-world recruiter for your Academy. Lord Malak will be here in three months to witness your progress. I expect no less than six loyal Adepts, Jorak. If not, then my apprentice shall delight in testing his new experiments on you."

_The damn mask made it hard to breathe on Korriban, with the tangy sulphuric taint in the air. The Force had once aided me in ignoring it, but it seemed that while some of my talents had_ strengthened… others had waned. The mask was a symbol I’d once believed in, when I’m been idealistic and not understood the real threat. These days, its foreboding presence carried more importance than its history.

A steel mask lay innocently on the ground.

The wind howled over the rocky terrain; it was a desolate and lonely place littered with the debris of war and the breaking of innocence.

The mask was of Mandalorian make, perhaps once belonging to a foot soldier, judging by its simple yet striking design. As I reached to pick it up, a Force vision blindsided me with such intensity that I felt a scream rip from my lungs.

Death. Howling death all around. The screams of a billion Cathar, all being relentlessly hunted due to one leader’s ego. I could sense all the sparks of life extinguish one by one, and with each a small segment of my soul cried out in anguish.

I told them! Again and again… we can’t ignore these atrocities… and this is proof!

What is this? Jen! Please, answer me!

My head jolted abruptly to the side, and a burning sensation spread throughout my cheek. I blinked. A Cathar was standing in front of me, a wildly shocked expression in her amber eyes. The downy fuzz on her cheeks seemed to be standing on end. A Cathar just slapped me. Huh. Didn’t they all just die? A tinny noise was ringing in my ears.

Jen, what did you just see? All those deaths in the Force? Are you- are you still there? Please-please-

“Jen,” the Cathar said, her voice low and shaky. “Jen, come back to me.” Her hand snaked out to switch the console off. Hey, I’d been watching that. I wasn’t sure what I’d seen, though.

“Don’t call me that,” I said automatically. For some reason, she flinched.

“Ness?” she whispered, the very name a question in itself.

“Ness Jonohl,” a voice said in disbelief.

The night was warm on the grassy plain, and the two men were staring at me outside the tent that was our temporary campsite.

The red-skinned Twi’lek was frowning, muttering something about luck under his breath before giving an audible sigh. “Well, I do not see another solution but to ride this one out. They are expecting Knight-” his mouth twisted, “Ness Jonohl to attend the delegation, so you shall go and I will accompany you as an advisory Master. We’ll be staying out of the negotiations as much as possible.”
No we won’t, I thought in determination. Andara will become part of the Republic if I have anything to say about it.

JEN!

…

My face stung, and I opened my eyes once more. I was curled up in a foetal position, mumbling something incoherent as the same Cathar crouched over me. I’d never seen her eyes so wide.

Have I seen her eyes before?

Jen… do you know who I am?

The Cathar’s hand shakily rose to cup the side of my face. She’d slapped me twice, I realized. All those images, flooding in, cracking through my mind. I shied away, it was too painful. I couldn’t think about what I’d seen, what I’d felt. Who I was.

“Please, say something,” she begged. Juhani… the name slowly floated up through my subconscious.

The door to the room swished upon, and a female Twi’lek strode in, her face pinched with barely concealed fury. She glanced down at me prone on the floor and her displeasure deepened.

Jen, you have to pull yourself together… please, answer me!

Bastila, I realized groggily. Bastila, I need your help.

“I trust your time has been productive,” the violet-skinned Twi’lek sneered, looking at me scornfully.

“Get up,” the Twi’lek hissed venomously. Her luminescent eyes were shooting sparks of fury at me. Yuthura, my mind rose helpfully. Something’s happened to royally piss her off. “If this is your way of studying, you won’t be here long.”

I slowly stumbled to my feet, but my concentration was on Bastila, and the serene pull of the Force she was projecting out to me. Juhani was tenser than I’d ever seen her, a coiled spring of nervousness as she glanced between me and Yuthura. She’s ready to fight, if need be. Her ears were laid flat against her head. What did I just see?

My mind flinched away, an instinct for survival.

Yuthura looked at the both of us, frowning as she took in our collective unease, and appeared to dismiss our situation. A disinterested, derisive expression crossed her face, and she turned on her heel.

“Follow me,” Yuthura growled, and stalked out of the Archives.

I gave Juhani a shaky, slow nod, and we followed the Dark Jedi master out of the room in silence.
The place felt claustrophobic, like the sweeping granite walls were closing in on me. The feeling had been growing, nurtured by that evil Headmaster’s proclamation that we stay away from Dreshdae and focus on our studies if we were to be properly admitted as Initiates.

Cathar didn’t do well when they weren’t under open skies. We were creatures of the wild, that little I knew of my people.

But I had survived Manaan, and triumphed. And while I would choose a cave over a body of water, this cave was intertwined with a sickening, twisted side of the Force that called to me. Independence. Freedom. Strength. All things I yearned for, and the Dark Side whispered how tantalisingly easy they were to grasp. I feared that the temptation to reach for them would grow.

Revan was walking next to me, a naked look of uncertainty on her face that cut me to the core. She stumbled once, and as I reached out to steady her she shot me a grateful look. What had happened back in the Archives… for a moment, I thought she had truly gone. Her face had been blank, and she had not recognized me.

I wonder if part of her realized her true identity when she saw that holo-recording. And her mind almost broke from the sheer enormity of it. I shivered, and my eyes flicked back to the angry Twi’lek who was leading us silently through the Academy. Revan was shying away from the knowledge now, scrabbling to pull herself together to face whatever was to come.

This was entirely the worst place for her to fall apart.

Her head must be a veritable minefield. I would not, could not, lie to her, if she asked me directly. I did not agree with Bastila about that, no matter that I shared her concerns. Anyone can be redeemed. Everyone deserves the chance. But now was not the place, nor the time.

I glanced back to Revan again, and saw that she had composed herself somewhat, her jaw clenching as she stared intently at Yuthura’s back. There was an undercurrent of rage to the Dark Jedi master, and it seemed directed at Revan. But Yuthura had been amenable – if irritated – yesterday when she admitted us, and we had not seen her since.

Yuthura came to a halt outside the Initiates quarters, and turned to face us. Her lip curled in disgust as she very obviously eyed over our clothing.

“Did you not find the proper robes of a Sith student inside?” Her voice was silky and sneering.

Revan raised an eyebrow, and inwardly I admired how quickly she had reclaimed a calm front to the world. No doubt, her psyche was still reeling. “Do Dark Jedi have uniforms then, Master Yuthura?” she murmured, her mouth quirking. I was glad she added on the Dark Jedi’s title, though, for it seemed to calm the irate Twi’lek a little.
“It is not compulsory,” Yuthura replied, her tone indicating otherwise. “But your bearing and clothing say somewhat about your character and your strength. Wearing Sith robes announces to the world whom you are and the power you wield. Most Sith wear them proudly, although there is the odd exception that prefers to hide in the shadows.” Her voice had trailed off towards the end, a disparaging thread obvious.

“Oh?” Revan replied curiously.

“I am referring to Uthar’s pet, but I am sure you can find out about the Academy politics on your own time,” Yuthura said in dismissal. “Come. Both of you, put your robes on and I will show you the training rooms.”

She crossed her arms and waited, and I exchanged a glance with Revan before we silently slipped into our room.

“Are you alright?” I whispered as we both retrieved a set of folded clothing from the only closet. Revan pulled a face at them.

“I fainted, I think. My head aches.” She frowned, rubbing at the side of her head.

“You were muttering something,” I told her quietly. “I could not make it out. And then you screamed.”

Her eyes were deep green pools of uncertainty. “I don’t know what happened. It hurts when I try to think of it.” She breathed in deeply. “Staria, our Master is waiting for us.”

I gazed at her for a moment longer.

“I’m okay,” she added. “Bastila’s helping through our bond. A lot. I can’t- I’m not sure what I saw, back there, but she’s keeping me together.”

I nodded in assent, watching her critically as she threw a robe on. She did seem remarkably composed, and I wondered if she was riding it out on instinct. My admiration for her swelled, then; for all that she had been through, for the fractures in her mind that must be there, she still managed to gather herself together and keep going because she had to.

I hastily robed myself, looking askance to Revan as she belted hers over the top of that mesh shirt she had been wearing. I did not think one was meant to wear armour beneath a Dark Jedi robe, but I was not going to call Revan out on it.

Yuthura had her arms crossed, a foot tapping impatiently, as we rejoined her. The Dark Jedi’s lekku were twitching over her shoulders in irritation, the tattoos snaking as they curled around her neck. I wondered if there was meaning behind them; from the little knowledge I had of Twi’leks, their headtails were a very sensitive part of their being. I believed to mark them in such a fashion must have been very unpleasant indeed.

“Where to now, Master Yuthura?” Revan asked, her voice neutral and possibly not as subordinate as it should have been.

Yuthura’s lips pursed as she stared down Revan. Anger was still simmering in the depths of her violet eyes. “I will assess your combat proficiency, and then you will both perform a task for me. Come.”

She turned with a theatrical flourish, and we had no choice but to comply.
The practice rooms were close and currently housing an inept duel between two Initiates. They were wielding white practice lightsabers similar to what I had once used, long ago, at the Enclave.
With a dismissive motion from Yuthura, the two Rodian students ceased their display and scurried from the room, glancing nervously at the Twi’lek as they passed.

The area was large; a circular room with a dirt-packed floor and only one other exit that was guarded by a Sith soldier. He wore a visor and comm-link, and was not the first armed non-Force sensitive I had seen within the Academy’s walls. Revan was eyeing him over curiously.

“Why are there soldiers here?” she asked.

Yuthura sniffed. “We have a taskforce all throughout Dreshdae, as well as the Academy itself.
They report to Uthar. There are some areas of the Academy that not even Adepts have access to, and that corridor is one of them. Now, pick up a training lightsaber, the both of you. Show me what I have to work with.”

I did not see how soldiers could stop a Force-user intent on going that direction, but perhaps that was a test in itself. Regardless, we were not here to whittle out the secrets of the Academy.

There was a large chest full of training lightsabers; weapons, the blades of which would not cauterize through skin, but merely leave a painful burn. I understood these did not have a crystal core, but instead utilized a neon technology that radiated a beam similar to a true lightsaber.

Revan was already rummaging through the bin, having located two she desired, and powering them on. Her off-hand lightsaber was shorter, and I saw a faint smile of recognition on her face. I stepped forward and hastily took the first available, before following her to the centre of the room.

The last time I had faced Revan was on the sands of Tatooine. She had started our duel with one, sole, vibroblade, and I had nearly killed her before her rage took over and swept away my strength like a dustball in the wind.

Revan shot me a rueful smile, and I could see the memory of it on her face, also.

“Proceed,” Yuthura commanded, her voice still tight and angry.

With a nod, Revan stepped forward and gave an exploratory strike. My sole lightsaber blocked hers, before deftly flicking back to parry her off-hand. The weight of the training lightsaber was less than I was used to, and I saw a grimace on Revan’s face as she, also, felt the difference.

At the Enclave, this had been my favourite part of training. The lightsaber forms, the ability to lose oneself in the parry-feint-riposte dance as one met an opponent in a ritual as old as time itself. The meditations and the studies had frustrated me, but this... I had spent years training with Master Quatra and, occasionally, her friend Master Atris. Once Atris had mentioned, a cold smile playing on her lips, that I would not have embarrassed myself against an Echani. It was high praise, coming from her.

Revan and I were well-matched; my speed with a single lightsaber off-set by Revan’s secondary weapon. And yet we were both just warming up, slowly going through the motions as we tested each other and our own limits.

I darted to the left before lunging forward in a powerful strike that Revan blocked with both lightsabers; she grunted, and pushed her weight against mine; I stumbled, off-balance. She leapt forward to swing at me and I rolled away just in time.

Scrabbling to my feet, I faced her warily as she shot me an amused grin.
“Two lightsabers are better than one,” she sang in a teasing voice.

“We shall see,” I murmured, and stepped forward again, my weapon held ready in front of me.

She leapt forward, and I dodged sideways, swiping at her legs. She hissed as I landed a blow against her calf; a split-second before which her primary lightsaber struck against my side. I grunted as the heat burned through my loose clothing.

We stepped back, circling each other warily. This time I advanced first, and as I went to attack, a powerful wave of Force energy rammed me to the ground. Caught by surprise, I collapsed upon the training saber and howled in pained shock as it scorched a hole through my robe and branded a blazing stripe down my chest.

Jerking sideways into a crouch, I took a moment to notice that Revan was still standing, glaring balefully at a smirking Yuthura. That came from Yuthura. I was impressed that Revan had managed to stay upright.

“I have not seen either of you use the Force overtly,” Yuthura sneered. “Really, Staria, if you are in a proper duel you should expect anything.”

I placed my free hand gently over the charred slice in my robe; my chest was stinging fiercely, but it was not severe. Training lightsabers did not cause major injury, and I had certainly tasted worse in the past. Revan’s gaze touched on me before landing back to the Dark Jedi.

“You have witnessed our proficiency, Master Yuthura. Perhaps you would like to enlighten us as to what has displeased you so.” Revan’s voice was cold, as cold as space, and just like that the fury reignited in Yuthura’s eyes.

“If you had just played the game,” Yuthura hissed, “then your strength alone would have admitted you into our Academy, sooner or later. But no, you had to charge in like a lust-blind rancor, beating your chest and howling out your challenge to the world.”

So it was the incident at the entrance that upset the Dark Jedi, but she hadn’t been so blindingly angry then.

…

“Mekel,” Revan murmured as she stalked over to him. The human’s eyes were wary, widening when they caught sight of Yuthura behind us. He had a handsome face, for a human, pale and expressive under a crop of jet black hair. “Let us in or face me.”

She ignited a short blood-red lightsaber, and came to a halt three steps in front of Mekel. In the distance, I saw only the Bothan huddled next to the entrance, and wondered sadly what had happened to the other hopeful.

Mekel laughed mockingly. “Open the frakking door yourself. Maybe it will work for you this time.”

“Aw, is ickle Mekel afraid to fight?” Revan taunted, taking a threatening step forward.

I felt Yuthura’s presence as she stood at my side. Her eyes were on the two facing each other, but her words were directed at me. “You stay out of this or you will face me.” Her words were mild, but I did not discount the threat behind them.
Mekel sneered, and his hand shot up with a blast of Force energy levelled directly at Revan. She batted it aside effortlessly and smirked at him.

“I’ll ask once more, and I’ll even do it nicely. Let us in, please,” her voice was mildly mocking and I winced. I did not know if she was trying to assist Mekel in saving face or anger him, but I doubted she was achieving the former.

“Frakk off you begging kath-bitch,” Mekel sneered. “Used to pleading like a two-cred joygirl, are you?”

Revan actually appeared to be enjoying herself. Mekel, too, although he kept shooting wary glances at Yuthura. I will never understand humans. “Someone needs to take to you with a soap dispenser. Stars, I’ve pissed in Mandalorian privies cleaner than your mouth.”

And with that, she jumped forward and lashed out with the red lightsaber. I tensed as Mekel hurriedly stepped back, withdrawing his own weapon and igniting it. Red met sparking red, and Mekel darted to the left, pulling his blade away from hers before stabbing it viciously at her thigh.

Revan’s speed was incredible, she knocked his lightsaber away with enough force that his arm swung backwards under the blow, and he was unprepared for her counter-attack.

Her lightsaber rested gently against his throat, and he froze.

“Let us in,” she repeated softly. I felt, rather than saw, Yuthura nod at him from my side.

The doors opened behind them; at first I thought it was some telekinetic energy from Mekel or Yuthura herself, until I saw the pale-haired human waltz outside, giving the exhausted Bothan a careless push as the large ferracrystal doors creaked shut behind her.

“Lashowe,” Yuthura hissed from next to me. She sounded displeased.

Revan’s attention was caught on the newcomer, a female human who crossed her arms and looked us all over speculatively before loosing a high-pitched laugh. Mekel took the opportunity to jump backwards, turning his head to survey the new threat.

When he looked back at Revan, his face had lost all mockery and held only deadly intent.

“Shall we go again?” Revan murmured, and Mekel snarled as he charged. Revan sidestepped neatly and her off-hand rose, yanking deep on the Force, aiming directly for his feet.

Mekel fell hard on his back, feet in the air and his lightsaber dropping to the side. A loud, malicious laugh sounded again from the newcomer. Mekel snarled, raised both hands, and sparks of pure electrical lightning flowed from his fingertips to engulf Revan.

She yelled, taken by surprise, and even from a distance I could see the blinding fury coalesce on her face as she stumbled backwards. My muscles coiled in tension, Yuthura’s threat would not deter me if Revan truly required my intervention. But then, as swiftly as it appeared, the rage dissolved as she somehow gained mastery over her emotions and once more threw off Mekel’s Force attack.

Mekel’s eyes widened; he had not expected such a quick recovery. But Revan was wary now, her face closed as she shifted her lightsaber to her off-hand, and withdrew another.

It activated with a familiar snap-hiss, shining an uncommon, blinding cyan that was a sharp contrast to the blood-red.
“You call that a Sith ‘saber?’ Mekel spat, but his voice was nervous.

“Blue or red, it’s a weapon you idiot,” Revan said coldly. “I picked it up from the corpse of a Jedi Master.”

Karon’s lightsaber, I realized with a gasp.

…

It had not taken long, from there, for Revan to disarm Mekel and Yuthura to intervene. After a sound dressing-down, the Twi’lek Dark Jedi had directed Mekel to disappear to the Valley of the Dark Lords and not return until he had found something worthy of prestige. Yuthura then admitted us herself, with a complicated weave of the Force creaking the impressive doors inwards.

Lashowe had disappeared as soon as Revan had stood over a prone Mekel, Karon’s lightsaber held steadily at his face.

Now, Revan was still glaring at the Dark Jedi Master. “I didn’t realize there were rules-”

“You are acting like an imbecile,” Yuthura spat. “There are rules for everything. Do you really think you’ll survive the Sith for long if you make enemies wherever you step?”

“Master Yuthura,” Revan said coldly. The honorific was there, but she didn’t sound at all subordinate. Her green eyes had turned to ice, and her spine straightened. “Maybe you should explain what has changed. For, yesterday, you were only mildly irritated at my form of entrance.”

Yuthura’s lips were pursed, and she looked Revan up and down, considering. I wondered what the Twi’lek was thinking. “We had a witness, if you recall. Master Uthar decided my discipline towards my Adept was lacking, so he added to it. Since your actions are to blame, it is only just that you, also, share in his punishment.”

Revan deactivated the training lightsabers, and for some unfathomable reason clipped them onto her belt. I had already retrieved mine, and followed suit, wondering if the weight of four lightsabers would bother Revan at all. Why does she wish to collect training lightsabers?

“Okay,” Revan said slowly. “So what, exactly, do we have to do?”

“Go to Tulak Hord’s tomb,” Yuthura hissed. “Mekel was directed there last night by Uthar, and has not returned. Go, now, and retrieve my Adept.”

xXx

We were walking cautiously down a rocky path bathed in the harsh Korriban sunlight, having just been admitted by two stern Sith soldiers who obeyed a nod from Yuthura. Her last, biting, order had been for us was to seek out the Adept Dak in the Valley’s excavation, who would direct us to the correct tomb.

The Academy’s exit was deep on the other side of the rocky peak from Dreshdae and, glancing behind us, I did not see a convenient way to return to the colony, other than back through the Sith institute.
“At least the doors will open for us now,” Revan muttered. “Did you see what Yuthura did, there?”

I shook my head. Revan was pale but composed, with no indication that something mind-shattering had occurred earlier in the Archives. I wondered how much Bastila was aiding her.

“She added our psychic signature to the doors,” Revan explained. “She did the same yesterday when we first entered. The doors must be some sort of Force relic that she knows how to manipulate. Uthar too, I’d assume.”

I nodded, but my attention was focused on the environment. As we descended down the trail, the valley swept out before us in an eerie panorama of white and yellow. The light here was cold and alien, glaring brightly from the cliff faces on either side. The ground was a coarse sand that shifted under our feet, and ragged outcrops of stone jutted out from the ground in various places.

“Yuthura, for all her rage, strikes as me relatively reasonable for a Sith,” Revan continued, her voice begin to ramble somewhat. I wondered whether she was trying to distract herself from an inner turmoil. “She’d sent Mekel to the tombs yesterday, but hadn’t been specific as to which one. I wonder why Uthar was.”

“Perhaps there is something of import in the Tulak Hord’s tomb,” I offered.

“Hmm,” she responded doubtfully. “I didn’t look him up in the Archives. I remember reading about Sadow and Kressh, and then… then Yuthura came.”

I shot her a sideways look; she had an ugly grimace on her face, one eye squinting like a piercing migraine was biting deep into her head.

“Can she not recall the holo-recording? I felt foolish for not realizing there would be information on Darth Revan here. I saw just enough to understand it was the recent opening of the Academy, but I certainly had not known that Darth Revan had been the one to initiate it.

“I found some information on Tulak Hord,” I said quietly, hoping to draw her attention away. “He was a powerful Sith Lord who lived millennia ago, and was known as the Master of Hate.”

“How charming,” she muttered sarcastically, picking her way through a pile of rocks that had slipped to cover the path. “What is it with Sith and their monikers? You don’t have Jedi running about calling themselves the Master of Love and Fluffiness.”

“Perhaps it is vanity, or merely the desire to intimidate,” I replied. “But Tulak was, by all accounts, very powerful. There are rumours he was researching methods to drain strength from his opponents, and use it to extend his lifespan.”

Revan stopped, turning to face me, her face a picture of disgust. “Vampiric Sith rituals… probably none too surprising.”

“I do not believe that is possible.” I heard my voice drop. “The very idea… it is an abomination.”

“You won’t hear me argue,” Revan replied, jumping over a larger boulder that was jutted in our way as we descended further. “Well, Yuthura directed us to go seek out this Adept Dak, so let’s find him. Although, I’d meant to ask Yuthura more about our supposed training,” Revan murmured. “Like, do we have scheduled classes? Do we get detention if we’re late?” She snickered.

I frowned at her inability to take the situation seriously. “I believe we do as she commands. In that respect, it is not so dissimilar to the Order.”
“Other than the torturing,” she muttered. “And I’m willing to bet the Jedi get better food.”

“Food is fuel.” I replied, uncertain what her problem with the synthesizers was. In my youth, I would have given my sword arm to have a free, infinite source of nourishment.

The ground had levelled out by now, and on both sides rose steep, impregnable cliffs. I could make out a handful of dark, visible caverns, granting admission to nightmares awaiting beyond. The Force itself twisted malevolently around us, whispering offers of power and freedom. This entire place set my hackles rising.

The valley wasn’t deserted by any means; sparse groups of Sith-clad soldiers were trudging throughout the valley, and I even noticed a couple of what looked like civilians. Somewhere beyond, lay the Adept who would direct us to Mekel’s destination.

I lifted my chin in determination, and glanced at Revan to find her staring at me. She gave me a small smile.

“You never know, we might find what we’re really looking for today. Let’s go find this Dak, okay?”

I nodded, and followed her silently, deeper into the expansive valley. But there was something else bothering me, that had tugged on my memory since Kel had first named the Adepts and introduced us to the Sith politics that resided within the Academy.

It is a very common name in the Core, I reminded myself. It was one of those names that transcended species, for on Dantooine alone I recalled a Rodian trader named Dak, the Falleen Master Dak, and also my old… friend.

I did not make friends easily. At the Enclave, my only one had been Belaya. And, once, Dak Vessar. Before he had run, to leave the Force behind and study at a Technic Institute, he’d told me bitterly.

It will not be the same Dak.

And yet, as we walked closer to a sole figure bending over a malfunctioning utility droid in the middle of the valley, a tremor ran through me. The harsh Korriban sunlight doused the human in a bright light, and he straightened as he heard us approach.

The man, dark haired and dark eyed, wore a closed expression on his bronzed skin.

“Dak,” I said helplessly.

He blinked, and his composure shattered. “Juhani?”

Revan stiffened, shooting me an incredulous look. I stared at him in shocked silence for several seconds, and he was just as stunned as me. More so, probably, for I’d had some forewarning even if I had not believed this encounter possible.

“Did… did you fall to the Dark Side?” I mumbled through numb lips.

His expressive eyes tightened, and a flash of anger chased away the surprise. “I didn’t fall, Juhani… I had my eyes opened. And don’t look at me like that… here you are, wearing the same robes as me.” His lips twisted, and the same look of angry disappointment he’d worn years ago reappeared. “I can’t believe you’re actually here. On Korriban.” He laughed bitterly. “I expected you to still be mooning over Quatra.”

My eyes closed in remembered despair. “I struck her down, Dak. During my Knight trials… I failed, and I almost killed her.”

I heard him gasp and step closer. Oh, how he’d detested my devotion to my strict Master. Belaya, too, had been quietly disapproving, but Dak was not shy in expressing his feelings. He had begged me to leave with him, exposed the depths of his feelings – emotions which I did not desire nor deserve – but still, I had been tempted. I had found the restrictions of the Order difficult, and I had cared for him, in my own way.

His hand touched mine fleetingly, and I looked at him again, this time through moist eyes. There had been a time when Belaya, Dak and I had been happy.

“I’m sorry,” he said quietly. “You know what I think of that ice-cold dragon… but I’m sorry regardless. I guess Belaya’s still there?”

I nodded briefly, half-aware of Revan intently focussed on the two of us, all but forgotten by Dak. “She is a Knight now, Dak. Knight Belaya Linn. She is a credit to the Order.”

His mouth twisted again, whether in resentment or rueful acknowledgement I did not know. “She always was the best of us three. She loved you too, did you know that?”

I blinked as surprise coursed through me, and took an awkward step back from him. “We were good friends, Dak, but you are surely mistaken–”

His mocking laughter cut through my trail of stuttered words. “What a frelling joke. Me and Belaya, both dreaming of your affections while you were hopelessly in love with that Zabrak scow.”

“Dak,” I said warningly. Perhaps Revan was correct, perhaps Quatra had been the wrong Master for me, but I would not stand for insults toward her. And he must be wrong about Belaya; she who was my truest friend, once.

Dak’s dark eyes were burning with emotion, but he shook his head, as if conceding to my unspoken request. “So, Juhani, you’re a new Initiate then?” his eyes flicked to Revan. “And your… friend?”

“I am Ness Jonohl,” Revan said smoothly, stepping forward and offering a hand. Dak stared at it as if it were a sandsnake. “Juhani is known as Staria. I am sure you can understand her desire to keep her past private.”

Dak turned to face me again and I saw Revan’s hand drop uselessly. “Your friend a fallen Jedi too, then?”

“Yes,” Revan cut in. “We have both decided the rigidity of the Order is not the place for us. The Sith offer so much more potential, after all.” Her face was smooth and blank, but the wariness was evident in her eyes.

Dak shot her an irritated look; I could sense he wished for her to leave. If only you knew her identity, my old friend. You would not find her so easy to dismiss then. “Juhani, I am one of the few Adepts here. You do know what this means?”

I nodded briefly, and was about to say something but he spoke over me. He hasn’t changed in that regard. Dak was always the talker between the three of us. “Juhani, this place isn’t like the Order. You have to be careful who you ally with.” He aimed an obvious sideways look at Revan, who rolled her eyes in disbelief.

Sometimes, her inability to take matters seriously was ridiculous.
It was time to cut to the chase. There were so many things to say between the two of us. “Dak, have you ever considered leaving this place?”

He started, jerking back in surprise, and I saw Revan’s eyes close slowly in exasperation.

“Leave?” he said tightly. “Why?”

“This place... it is bad, Dak. Surely you can feel it.” I said quietly. “I know the Order had its restrictions, but this place... the place is worse.”

“Juhani, surely you aren’t trying to redeem me or some such banthacrap?” he spluttered. “No... you can’t be, you’ve left as well.” He frowned. “I admit the thought of leaving with you is desirable, but you can’t just ditch the Academy.” He laughed. It was a hollow sound. “Force, Juhani, those that try generally end up dead. I’m an Adept here - I have some measure of security now.”

He reached for my hand, and clasped it tightly. His grip was warm. “Juhani, I can take care of you here. I know how to play the game. Trust me.”

His gaze was intent upon mine, eyes as black as the Dantooine night sky, and I recalled those past days when we had been friends. Dak was quick with words and more studious than I; in some ways, he made me feel a safety I’d not known before. But my drive, then, had been to impress my stand-offish Master.

Revan’s polite cough broke the spell; I blinked, and looked back to her. An angry scowl settled over Dak’s face.

“Sorry to interrupt, but Yuthura’s sent us on a mission,” Revan said mildly. “I’d prefer to get it over with.”

“Yuthura?” Dak questioned, his voice twisting over the name. “Juhani, Yuthura’s not the power here. Come with-”

“Yuthura?” Dak questioned, his voice twisting over the name. “Juhani, Yuthura’s not the power here. Come with-”

“She’s Uthar’s first apprentice,” Revan spoke over him, her voice harder than before. “I understand you are allied with Uthar Wynn, and perhaps that will be an interesting discussion later as we have not formed any alliances. But regardless, we have been directed to enter the tomb of Tulak Hord by Master Yuthura, and I don’t think we can disobey such an order.”

Dark frustration gathered on his face with every word, and I could see that here was one person whose first impression of Revan was not a positive one. When she dropped the name of the dead Sith Lord, however, Dak’s face paled and he took an involuntarily step backwards, dropping my hand.

“Tulak Hord?” he gasped. “What did you do, piss in her tea?”

“Uh-”

“Juhani, no, you cannot go there. No one returns, not from Tulak Hord’s tomb. Not past the first chamber, and that’s been picked clean. Why in the Outer Rim would Yuthura order you there?”

“I- uh, may have had something to do with Mekel being sent there,” Revan muttered. “So that’s the worst tomb then, huh?”

Her face was tight, wary, but I saw the gleam in her eye. If the crypt is so dangerous, then perhaps that is exactly where the Map is housed. I shivered. Dak’s apprehension was not something to be “Mekel,” Dak said in disgust. “If he’s been sent there, it’s on Uthar’s doing. Yuthura’s on her way out, Juhani. Let your friend clean up her own mess, and come with me. Trust me, Uthar is the real power here.”

Revan was quiet, watching the both of us, and I wondered what she was thinking.

“There’s something in that tomb that kills every person who sets foot in there,” Dak continued. “It’s the only one that Master Uthar avoids. Doesn’t that tell you something?”

“It tells me that Uthar sent Mekel to his death,” Revan muttered. “And maybe I had a part in it. I’m going in, Staria. You don’t have to.”

“We are a team, Ness,” I said quietly. “Dak, which tomb is Tulak Hord’s?”

He was frowning angrily at me, before an exasperated sigh escaped him. “Talk to me privately, first.”

I gazed at the bronzed face of my old friend, and then nodded to Revan. With a brief pointer at the nearest tomb from Dak, Revan walked towards the entrance before turning to watch us, well out of earshot.

“Juhani,” he began, stepping close to me. His hands settled on my shoulders, warm and comforting. He was my height; tall for a human, and more muscular than I remembered. Older than the Adepts we’d encountered so far; he seemed out of place on this corrupt planet. But then, so does Kel Algwinm. “You don’t know how happy I am to see you. I never thought… I never thought we’d meet again. Especially after hearing about Dantooine.”

I’d barely had time to digest the news about the Enclave’s destruction so soon after the devastating bombing of my homeworld. The only silver lining was the reports suggested that the destruction was not widespread. On Manaan, Karon had assured me that Malak’s forces had been run off after obliterating their primary target: the master Star Map.

Dantooine would have less to rebuild than Taris, and the casualties were not as severe as Malak would have planned. But to have the two planets that meant the most to me so viciously attacked invested me fiercely and personally in the war.

I looked up at Dak, whose face was warm and intent, and felt myself smile. “I, too, am happy to see you Dak,” I said softly. “But I wish our reunion was not here. Dak… this is not the place for me. Or for you. I wish we were back at the Order.”

A pained resentment flared in his dark eyes. “I have forsaken the Order, much as you have, Juhani. Even if I could go back, I don’t think I would want to. Juhani- there is power here. Power to be who you want, if you just play the game. Stay with me. Ditch your friend. Maybe, one day, we could leave Korriban together.”

“Dak,” I said gently. “I will not abandon Ness. We must go into this tomb.”

“You always were too damnably loyal,” he said in frustration. “Just- just don’t go far, okay? If you come out, and act sufficiently meek, then that should suffice. It’s the greenhorn’s initiation, don’t you see? The recklessly stupid die, and the cowards run in fear and don’t get far. But if you come back, if you crawl to Yuthura – or better yet, Uthar – then you’ll make it back. Make it back, Juhani.”
“I will,” I promised.

He looked afar to Revan, who was staring hard at us from a distance, a deactivated lightsaber held ready at her side.

“You should choose me over her,” he muttered. “I’ve got a bad feeling about her.”

I stepped away from him, then, leaving the memories of warm Dantooine nights and companionable laughter behind. We had both changed immeasurably since then.

“I hope to talk to you again, Dak.” I whispered, and walked away, towards Revan.

xXx
Jen Sahara - Brushes with death

Brushes with Death

- Jen Sahara -

Jen!

I came to with a shuddering gasp, my limbs frozen and my eyesight blinded. My first fleeting thought was that, perhaps, I’d knocked back one too many fire-whiskeys, and no doubt I’d never see the end of Carth’s disapproving gaze.

Then: memory rushed back in a torrent. The Sith Academy. Kel, filling us in on the delightful antics of his buddies. My mind… fracturing on something I’d seen in that room. Yuthura, pissed, sending us to the tombs. Dak, pissed, that Juhani would follow me into what he claimed was certain death.

And then…

It was our paranoia that tripped the trap - we were both so focused on reaching out with the Force to find whatever taint had corrupted the place, that we completely failed to spot the mechanically triggered poison gas. Could have done with a non-Force sensitive here. We’re too reliant on the Force, and it blindsided us. I had the distinct feeling that I’d learned this lesson before, in one of my histories at least.

I’d lasted longer than the Cathar, despite her species’ constitution, as instinct had me twisting the Force somehow to partially block the insidious gas that was deadening to our senses. I’d just had time to spot a partially opened exit, yank on the Force to propel me into a flying leap, and collapse into the room beyond as the door snicked shut. I thought I’d heard the thud of Juhani falling behind it, and fervently prayed that the gas was not lethal. It was the last thing I recalled.

Well, frelling kath crap. This day just keeps getting better.

Jen, you’re back. What’s going on? Bastila had that hysterical edge to her mental voice again.

I have no idea. I’m trapped, and can’t see. I clenched my jaw and pushed outward with the Force, but something solid buffered against my reach on all sides.

“Awake already, are you?” an oily voice taunted. “Excellent! Two students in two days, and one waiting outside. This might be just what I need!”

Sithspit. Someone’s got me, and I can’t reach the Force.

I am never staying behind again, Bastila replied in a taut, prim voice, but I could taste the fear behind it. The bond reverberated as Bastila reached out to me, her very psyche brushing against mine. I wondered idly if we would ever be able to unravel the intricacies of our bond. I relinquished control to her, and felt as she stretched out, touching against the barrier that imprisoned me on all sides. This is new, I realized with faint surprise. She can reach… beyond me now.

“Not very talkative, are we?” the voice was lightly sneering, and put me in mind of Yuthura, albeit a raspy, older, male version. “You are not nearly as fun as Mekel, but eons stronger, I can sense that. Mekel is just about used up, but you, my dear. You will last me days.”
Force stasis. Very strong. I am not sure we can break out of this, Jen. She was scared, and it was filtering through to me. I gritted my teeth, and clamped down on the fear. Not helping, princess, I shot back.

“How about you restore my sight, o disembodied voice, and I’ll see just how amusing I can be,” I said tightly. I could feel my eyes were open, but absolute blackness met them. And without the Force beyond a foot’s radius, I was blind in all senses of the word.

A mocking laugh echoed to me, followed by the sound of dusty footsteps walking away. A click, and the faint light of a halogen lamp illuminated the room, causing me to wince briefly.

As my eyes adjusted, I canvassed the area I was imprisoned in. A massive cavern that rose high enough that no ceiling was visible; instead, all that could be seen was a mass of moving shadows that I bet was a nest of shyracks. A large sarcophagus dominated the centre of the room, suggesting that here was the source of the dark taint. The corpse of a half-butchered tuk’ata was draped on the ground next to it. Sith hounds, some part of me recognized with a shudder.

The room itself had signs of habitation; two benches littered with datapads and tools, a bedroll deeper in the cavern, and the prone form of Mekel slumped vertically in what I assumed was a similar prison to mine.

The creature itself that had us captured was old, humanoid, and clad in the disintegrating robe of a Dark Jedi. Gaping pits where his eyeballs had once been just added to the macabre visage of an insane Sith Lord. This is Tulak Hord’s tomb, and Juhani said he messed about with draining life to gain immortality. Yeah, but she’d also mentioned he was alive millennia ago. I didn’t care how powerful this Master of Hate was; surely he’d be nothing but decomposed dust by now.

“You are an intriguing specimen, I must say,” the man was muttering as he circled me. Even sightless, he acted like he had physical vision, facing me as he wandered aimlessly about. He’s using the Force to sense me.

There is always a weakness in any shield, Bastila mused, her fear pushed far away as she concentrated on the task at hand. Somewhere there will be an opening to exploit, if I can just locate it. I was content to let her control things; if I could distract this deranged zombie in the meantime, all the better.

Deep, deep within my core, the all too familiar fury had ignited. Being trapped and helpless was not a favourite position of either myself or Revan, but it was just the sort of situation where her strength overwhelmed and conquered my very soul.

No. I refuse to go down that path.

Even if it costs your life? Revan taunted.

It is strong everywhere, Bastila murmured, and I felt her probing touch on all sides. Keep searching, I replied, you’ll find something. I tried to feel nothing but a reassuring confidence in her abilities.

“I have been so disappointed at the chaff Uthar’s been sending my way recently,” the man was muttering. “Ever since that trumped up wench forced me to open the Academy to any mook with an iota of Force-sense, it’s been nothing but weeds and drek. Mekel was a delightful surprise, but you! There’s something almost familiar about you my dear.”

I froze. Bastila froze. My breath was trapped in my lungs.
“Could it be?” he murmured, and this time I felt the brush of his strength push through his force restraints, circling my very essence with a tight, malicious squeeze before retreating. He laughed in delighted surprise. “Well, well. I used to pride myself on never forgetting a face, before Uthar took my eyes. But I recognize your unique aura nonetheless. Don’t you remember me, my dear? You were very eager to learn my secrets, all those years ago.”

He may have been human, once, or something similar. Fleshy folds ridged down the back of a hairless scalp, but that could have been due to the corruption he was so strongly steeped in. Deep within the pits of his eye-sockets glowed the spark of true insanity.

I licked dry lips, and felt my heart thundering in my frozen chest. “I’m afraid you have the advantage of me,” I whispered.

“How disappointing,” he commented, striding behind me. “Although I imagine I look somewhat different. In other circumstances, my dear, I would not take your life. I did so enjoy our discussions; it is rare to meet someone as intrigued with Sith history as myself. But, I’m afraid, I do have a debt to pay to dear Uthar, and you will give me the strength I need.”

I couldn’t afford to stay frozen. I didn’t dare lose control to Revan. And Bastila, oddly, had retreated in a flurry of anticipatory fear. My hands were clenched tightly against my sides; I could feel the hard press of my sabers against my belt, but had no room to grip them. Around me, within the stasis cage, was the smallest amount of Force available. With a mental wrench, I yanked on the Force and focused on the barrier between me and the rest of the world.

And all the while, my mind was racing like a stimmed-up junkie. He lost a battle to Uthar, and has been here for some time. He’s draining life from Initiates. Uthar fears this place enough to avoid it, so he’s likely an equal strength. And he knew me, unless it’s Evil Bitch he’s sensing.

"Jorak Uln,” I said quietly, all the while lightly pushing out with gentle tendrils of energy. I started at the ground, feeling the jagged shape of tiny stones pressing up through the soles of my boots, and the curve of the insane Sith Lord’s Force prison as it tucked under my feet. “And here Uthar’s bragged to the world that he ended you.”

“Ahh, so you do recognize me, my dear!” he crowed. “I had hoped I had made an impression on you, Ness Jonohl. Your glowering boyfriend was an annoyance, granted, although his strength made an admirable bodyguard, I do admit.”

Blistering shock ripped through me, and the Force fell from my grasp like a ferracrete brick. Ness Jonohl? It was me… it was Street Kid and her boyfriend, here on Korriban…

… and he knew me as the fake name I gave Yuthura Ban?

What? Bastila radiated confusion. I did not catch that – what did he say? She paused, and in a quieter, questioning voice: Jen?

Ness Jonohl. Could it be… could it be the reason that fake name tumbled from my lips so readily was because it was my actual name?

“I always wondered why you left so suddenly, my dear Ness. You were so intrigued with the tombs that I hoped you would stay. I did warn you about the terentateks, my dear. I had you pegged for death, once I heard you and your boyfriend disappeared into the shyrack caves and never returned.”

I’d just started to reach for the Force again when he dropped that grenade. The shyrack caves. The
I told you Kressh liked his little artefacts, Revan mocked from the deep recesses of my mind.

“Did you find it?” Jorak’s mad visage was close to me then, his brows raised in a grotesque expression of curiosity. “Ludo Kressh’s tomb? Is it there, as the Archives say?”

“I don’t know,” I whispered. “We didn’t make it past the terentateks.” Was I lying or not? Had I found the map before, or merely deduced its location?

“Ahh, a pity,” he murmured, taking a step back. “Still, you are lucky to have escaped. But those were the days, back then, weren’t they my dear Ness? No weaklings traipsing through the tombs of the mighty past, with no understanding of the sheer glory they are walking amongst. Ahhh…” He trailed off, his sightless face pointing up in the throes of sweet recollection. “It will be like that again,” he whispered, and his voice fairly thrummed with joyous anticipation.

He’s completely deranged. And I don’t have the frelling time to dwell on his revelations. I bit down hard on the side of my cheek, the sharp pain providing a coppery focus with which to draw in what Force I could manage. It snagged Bastila’s attention, which turned at once, predictably, disapproving.

Pain is a focusing tool of the Dark Side, Jen! She was more appalled than anything.

Shush, I grumped, or come back, and sodding help!

“You may appreciate my experiments Ness Jonohl. Watch what I have learned from Tulak Hord!” With a loud exclamation and a gasp of pure ecstasy, Jorak was instantly bathed in an eerie black light that somehow sucked the pale illumination from the one lamp in the cavern. My attention was wrenched to him in horrified fascination; his hand raised, pointing at Mekel, as he mumbled words I couldn’t decipher under his breath.

The black light enveloped Mekel, and then, somehow, appeared to be sucking something. His pallor was wan, and as the darkness pulsed around him, hollows under his closed eyes became visible. His chest sucked in grotesquely, and he hung in the cage like a limp cloth doll whose stuffing was slowly vanishing.

The stasis field around me shuddered and loosened against my limbs.

“Stop!” I screamed in horror. “You’ll kill him!”

Jorak threw his head back and cackled as the black light snapped back into him, swelling around his physical body before vanishing. The pressure all around my limbs tightened once more as the stasis field increased in strength. “That is the idea, my dear Ness! This is the very key to immortality!”

Bastila! I shrieked through our bond. I need to get out of here! Find the weakness! She was riding with me again, stretching our collective Force-senses out with confidence, firmly investigating every curve of the enveloping restraint. She stilled, focusing on the edge under my footwear, and with a mental grunt thrust her strength against it.

Nothing happened.

“You shouldn’t concern yourself with the likes of him, though,” Jorak rambled on, oblivious to both my very horror and Bastila’s next attempt to hammer along the boundary of the stasis. “He doesn’t quite have the gumption of a true Sith. Do you know, I posed a moral question to him, and he gave a very Jedi-like answer. I was most appalled!"

I cannot find any weakness! Bastila cried helplessly. Keep trying! I shot back. I’ll keep him talking!

“What- what was the question?” I gasped.

“Ooh, I always did like your inquisitive nature, so I shall oblige you, my dear Ness. And then, I’m afraid, it will be your time.” He chucked, and sauntered out of sight behind me again. “I asked him thus: Your immediate superior amongst the Sith is an effective commander and a fine leader. He trusts you and you like him. You see an opportunity to kill him. What do you do?”

“Kill him, of course,” I muttered. The shield is too perfect, Jen! I have never seen the like! Desperation was lacing her words like acid. If there is no weakness, then how else can we shatter it? I shot back. There must be a way, Bastila!

Sheer Force strength would do it. But- you are cut off, and I do not know if I have the reserves- it is too strong for me, Jen!

Can you lend me your strength?

“Of course!” Jorak laughed loudly, wandering back into view. “Did you know poor Mekel elected to do nothing as the commander was good for the Sith? What idiocy! He was a fool to let down his guard, and you would not make the same mistake!”

Yes, I-I think. The bond opened, further than it ever had before, like a flower blossoming under the gentle sun. Her strength, the very essence of Bastila poured through the bond like a thick, golden light. Like an extra well I could draw from to amplify my own strength. If I had the moment to think about it, I’d be swamped with wonderment.

I did not even budge the shield before with my strength. How can you believe you will do any better, directing the same Force?

I’m going to weaken the field. The very thought of how sickened me. Mekel. Hold on. I’ll strike as fast as I can. It was a prayer, useless and fleeting.

Black eye-sockets stared insanely at me, the very stuff of nightmares. “I will finish things, now, and your strength will allow me to leave this place, and face Uthar at long last. I have been looking forward to this. Farewell, my dear Ness.” He raised a hand.

“Wait!” I called desperately. “Mekel… he’s still alive, isn’t he? Can’t this power be used to drain someone completely unto death?”

The hand stilled in front of me, and Jorak’s dirt-smeared face tilted to the side. “Well… of course. Everyone who enters here is sucked dry.”

“Then… why don’t you finish him first?” I whispered. “It will give me one last demonstration… and I do so appreciate the art of such skill.”

Jorak’s head was thrown back in glee, and he cackled. “Ahhh I knew you would, my dear Ness! And do not despair, my dear, for you will live on through me! But, as a last request, I will present it once more.” He turned, facing Mekel, a frown lining his creased and blackened face. “There is not much left in him, but enough for a demonstration. Watch in awe!”
The halo of dark light surrounded him and thrust out to Mekel, enveloping the Sithling in the pure taint of evil incarnate. Last time, the shield had shuddered and weakened, ever so briefly. I was on edge, waiting for that moment, and had to endure the sight of Mekel’s slack form convulsing, the skin around his face pulling tautly inward as Jorak sucked his very life force dry. Mekel’s exposed limbs turned grey, and the desperation within me crested——and just there, a faint trembling as my Force cage thinned and lost strength—

Now!

With the strongest mental thrust I could manage, I wrenched deep on Bastila’s reserves and drove the Force into the shield with all my strength. Jorak turned in surprise, the stasis field imploded, and in a singular motion my ‘saber snapped to my hand, activated, and was thrown directly at the insane Sith Master.

The lightsaber thudded back into my grasp.

Silence. Followed by the thud of his lifeless body collapsing to the ground.

His jaw, locked in a silent scream he hadn’t had time to unleash.

Jen?

The only sounds I could hear were the harsh pants of my own breathing.

Jorak’s dead. I’m free. I breathed in deep, willing my heart to calm and the tense fear to dissipate. I switched off the ‘saber, turned, and spotted the prone form of Mekel. With a muttered oath, I rushed to his side, dropping to my knees.

He’s dead… or almost. The young man’s face had drained of colour, his cheeks sinking into deep shadows. I ripped open the dark robe to see a smooth chest, rippled with the muscles of youth. It was cold as I pressed my cheek against it.

The faint, stuttering beat of a dying heart barely reached my ears.

He’s fading. I manipulated Jorak into using up the last of his life so I could escape, and he’s dying. Bastila!

Reach out to him, Jen. He is not lost, yet!

I breathed the Force in deeply, and enveloped Mekel with it, and could just sense the spark of life slowly dimming to nothing. It stuttered, winking out, like it had faded through the fabric of life to the other side. What now? I thought helplessly. Bastila, help!

She was with me, then; intermingled intimately with my very connection to the Force. I gave over to her will, and felt her touch as together we reached out with a desperate hand to pull the spark back. To, very gently, fan it once more into existence. It resisted at first, as if he was so very tired of it all, and wanted nothing more than to sink into oblivion. It felt intensely familiar, and my memory was, at once, swept away.

…

There was no sight here, no sensation of touch or smell or even the anger that had dogged me for so very long.
It had all been such an unmitigated failure, everything I had been determined to accomplish slowly corrupted and twisted until my primary intent had all but vanished.

I was standing on the precipice, and below was black. Not a furious swirl of darkness I was so familiar with, but a soothing black of oblivion that promised rest and release from it all. The temptation to fall was so strong, and it would be so easy to just let go. Leave the anger. Leave the betrayal. Leave the grief behind.

Behind me I sensed a warm light, a channel of life that hurt.

Mercy, I thought hopelessly. It is all lost. Mercy.

It is not all lost. Please, Force willing, come back. Have faith… it is never all lost.

The light engulfed me in a painful awakening that I wasn't sure I wanted. I didn't know what I desired anymore.

Please, it whispered again, and the very shape of the presence had a name I didn't know anymore. Bastila. Yes. Come back to us. You are not lost.

And my very connection intermingled with the presence until I didn't know where I ended and she began and what was anything anymore but this bright, painful, hopeful life she was offering.

…

Jen, focus!

That was… that was you, and I? Stunned, I reeled back psychically from Mekel, my focus turning inward to my bond-sister. The memory and the thoughts were already fading, but the desire to fall into oblivion remained. Our… bond?

Yes, but not now! You must focus on Mekel!

With a start, I ripped my consciousness back to the young man dying in front of me. I could do it now, I could taste the feeling of being on the other side, and together with Bastila's touch in my link to the Force we gently surrounded him in life and slowly coaxed the spark until it was a fragile flame. The essence of the boy filtered in through my psyche; angry, scared, and yet oddly loyal. Mekel, I whispered. Mekel, Bastila echoed, and for a short time we were three.

I felt what it was like to be trapped on Korriban; to be mad and suspicious of everyone, to desire someone who had eyes for my friend, to believe in that friend but have him lose faith with me, to wonder if this place was even worse than the streets and the lays I'd left behind. To feel like the only one I could trust to look out for me was my own dark Master.

There was no memory here, but his emotions were raw and painful.

Anger, fear, a yearning for freedom and bonds of loyalty to those I- he- cared about. The feelings sunk deep within me, interweaving into my own, and in that instant it became impossible to disconnect us.

He gave a shuddering gasp, separated from us, and I felt his heart thump harder, pulsing through the Force. Heal him now, Bastila commanded. My confusion must had reverberated through the bond, for once more she grabbed the reins and sank our collective power deep into his physical body; flooding it with life, knitting together muscles, and healing skin and bone. Energy flushed through his very veins. In wonderment, I was carried along as Bastila deftly strengthened the young man back to health.

But I could feel her reserves draining dangerously close to empty. Stop, I murmured. It is enough, and you are spent.

Mekel coughed, a spot of colour rising on his young, handsome face, and dark blue eyes opened to stare at me in shock.

One last pulse of healing Force, and Bastila retreated, releasing the Force to me once more.

Was that how our bond was created? I thought in wonderment. I remembered Juhani, once, telling me of three ways a mind-link could occur. From years of working together or from the intimacy of lovers. She hadn't the time to tell me the third way. Was this it? I was... dying. You saved me.

I- yes.

Bastila had saved my life, some time in the past. I would have to think on that later. And she could reach through the bond and direct my Force, should I let her. I could draw on hers, should she let me. That, in itself, was pretty awe-inspiring.

But- I stared at the young man in front of me. Bastila! Does this mean I share a bond with him, now? The thought was, frankly, preposterous. And a bit appalling, actually, when I thought of my altercations with Mekel thus far. Do bonds come into existence when you save someone's life?

Do not be ridiculous. It is not just about saving a life. Very few Jedi can even reach a soul on the brink-

Bastila, that's not answering-

Force bonds are rare, Jen. Ours even more so. An intimate connection like that which connects us can only occur if one is about the join the Force, and your very essence mingles with theirs-

Like we just did with him?

There was a long pause. And Mekel was still staring at me in wide-eyed silence.

*Force bonds do not usually manifest even if the conditions are ideal. I would consider it unlikely. She lapsed into another brief silence. Jen, this may be hard to believe, but you were worse off than Mekel. It took significantly more to bring you back.

Well, I certainly couldn't sense Mekel the way I could Bastila, but then, my bond with Bastila had grown stronger over time. A lot stronger, it seemed.

"Mekel," I said, breaking the silence. "Can you sit?"

He was still bemused, but pushed himself up on a hand, groaning as he did so. The young man looked behind me, his eyes resting on the still-warm corpse of Jorak Uln, before flicking back to me in undisguised surprise.

“That was... that was Force healing,” he muttered. “Frakk. Force healing?”

“Something like that.”

“And Jorak...”
“Dead.”

Jen, are you out of danger now? I am exhausted.

We’ll be on our way back to the ‘Hawk very soon. Take a stim or something, Bastila, I must talk to you. To everyone. I know where the Star Map is.

His eyes tightened warily as he continued staring at me. “I think… I think that was more than just healing. I was about to bleeding kark it… wasn’t I?”

At my brief nod, he grimaced and looked down. “Or I suppose you Jedi call it joining the Force.”

Alright. This once, perhaps. I sensed a mild disapproval radiating through the bond, and wondered what my bond-sister had against the occasional use of stimulants. But she was still recovering, and today’s events must have taken its toll on her. My muscles burned with taut stiffness, and I realized I wasn’t feeling so hot myself. It’d been a crap day. The Star Map? That is... excellent news, if you are sure.

I raised an eyebrow at Mekel, although he was still looking away. “What, does healing automatically make one a member of the Order?” I said mildly.

Pretty sure, Bastila. I’ll explain when I’m back onboard.

“I’ve never seen anyone on Korriban able to heal using the Force,” he snapped. “Damage control, yes – Kel’s pretty good at it, knitting together muscle to stop the bleeding. But you did more than frakking damage control.”

I sat back, sighing as I rubbed my head. “Let’s just say I had a bit of help.”

“Your Cathar friend?”

“No- I, kath crap!” I scrambled to my feet, rushing over to the door. Juhani!

I depressed the door control with a frantic thud, and it opened. A distressed Cathar was on the other side, one hand raised as if to thump loudly against the durasteel. She fell forward, embracing me desperately before pulling back.

“What happened?” she gasped, frowning as her eyes landed on Mekel.

“Turns out the old, dead Headmaster wasn’t quite so dead,” I responded. “He is now.”

“Jorak’s been killing all the students who come here,” Mekel added, slowly getting to his feet. “Leeching them dry.” He took a few steps towards Jorak’s corpse. “You lot don’t have a clue what this means. Uthar didn’t kill Jorak.” He laughed nastily. “Oh, Yuthura’s gonna love this!”

“Uthar will lose face,” I said slowly.

“More than that,” Mekel muttered. “This’ll be enough to challenge the frakkwad. If you want to be Master, you gotta bleeding kill the top tuk’ata. Uthar bloody cheated.”

“Will it be enough to steer the Adepts away from him, though?” I asked, and Mekel looked back to me in surprise. “Lashowe follows him. Dak follows him.” I sent Juhani a sideways glance to see her lips tighten at the mention of her old friend’s name. “And Dustil follows him, too.”

An annoyed burst of air released itself from Mekel. “Dustil… we were friends once. We were both grabbed from Telos after the bombing, y’know, and in the early days we stuck together.” He gave a shaky laugh. “I’m hoping he’ll stay out of things.”

From what Kel implied, I doubt it. And Mekel didn’t strike me as the merciful sort… but then I recalled what I’d sensed earlier. Loyalty. It surprised me, to find that sort of empathy at his core. The Dark Side twists people until they’re barely recognizable from what they once were. Bastila had said something like that to me yesterday. And Korriban is so very enmeshed in the Dark Side.

The blinding light of Mekel’s ‘saber activated, and bathed the cavern in blood-red. He pointed it at Jorak Uln’s corpse.

“What are you doing?” Juhani gasped in horrified outrage as the ‘saber bit deep into the dead man’s neck.

“Proof,” Mekel grunted, severing the head in a gruesome display. I grimaced in disgust and saw the Cathar turn away.

“That is abominable,” she said tightly.

Mekel had found a knapsack amongst Jorak’s belongings, and was busily stuffing the cauterized head into it.

“You do realize that could just about be anyone’s head,” I said mildly. In a macabre way, it was faintly amusing, a Sithling wandering about with the dead, eyeless head of an ex-headmaster. This place ain’t for the faint-hearted.

“Most of the Adepts know Jorak,” Mekel muttered. “The neurotic chivhole was leader when I first arrived.” He looked up at me, dark eyes glinting against the light of the ‘saber. “You gonna claim the kill?”

“No,” I said shortly. “I have what I need. Take what you want – but stay away from the sarcophagus.”

Mekel stilled, frowning at me. “Why?”

“I’m going to destroy it,” I said coldly. “I’m not leaving Tulak Hord’s secrets around for the next loony Sith Master to exploit.”

I could see the hesitation in the man’s face. He was a Sith student, after all, and Jorak had made himself mighty powerful.

“What are you doing next, Mekel?” Juhani asked quietly. “After this experience, are you certain Korriban is the place for you?”

Juhani, the one-Cathar redemption band. “Staria, his loyalty is to Yuthura,” I said flatly, watching Mekel’s eyes. Some causes, I could tell, were beyond us. “And hers is to Mekel. She sent us after you, y’know,” I commented to him in a neutral tone. He blinked, eyes tightening. “She’s not as self-serving as Uthar. Not yet.”

“But in the end, the Dark Side will twist everything,” Juhani whispered.

I could see his jaw clench as he stared between the two of us. “Thank you for my life,” he bit out. “But I don’t need a frakking sermon.”

I felt my mouth quirk. “Fair enough. Well, good luck Mekel. I doubt you’ll see us again.”
A faint look of surprise crossed the man’s face. “Really? You think you can just walk away?”

“Yep. I sense an insurrection looming,” I said wryly. “I’ll leave you Sithlings to pick over the corpses.”

Mekel stood, slinging the bag over his shoulder. His robe was torn and charred, and streaks of dried blood painted creases over his handsome face. His black hair was matted to his scalp. I imagined I looked no better.

“Goodbye then, Ness Jonohl. And thanks.” With a nod to the both of us, the angry young man left the tomb.

We waited in silence for some minutes, before Juhani walked closer.

“I do not know what to ask, first,” she said quietly. “The gas knocked me out, and when I came to – I thought that Dak must be right, and this was your end.”

“I’m like a loth-cat,” I quipped. “I have nine lives.”

“Perhaps,” she murmured, her eyes gleaming under the faint halogen light. “What did you mean, you have what you need? The- the Map?”

My eyes closed, and I sighed. “The good news is we can leave the Academy, and never return. The bad news is – the Map’s in the shyrack caves.”

I had no explosives on me to destroy Hord’s sarcophagus, so Juhani and I did the best we could with the Force, calling down rocks and dirt to cover the inner tomb until all that was left was the entrance. If I could ever come back and detonate this foul, corrupt place I would – but for now, we’d done the best we were able.

Dak had left by the time we exited the tomb, and Korriban’s only sun, Horuset, hung low in the sky. Maybe Mekel’s emergence had scared Dak away, or perhaps it was the rumblings of our combined Force collapsing in part of the cave, but by the drooping of Juhani’s shoulders I could tell she was disappointed. I just had the overwhelming drive to leave this festering Academy and do what we needed to.

We can’t forsake Kel, though. We have to return for him. After the Map. And maybe Dak, too, although I really didn’t get the same vibe from that one.

Juhani won’t leave him behind. Not without one more redemption attempt. The Cathar was pensive as we picked our way through the now deserted valley, and I knew the idea of leaving her old friend behind on Korriban would not sit well with her.

Bastila was beyond exhausted, and had moved into the realm of debilitated. She’d held nothing back, particularly in the attempt to save Mekel of all people, and now her body was paying the price. The stim had left her mind with a restless edge that should hold long enough for us to return to the ‘Hawk and talk, and then she could retreat into a recuperative slumber. We may not even need her for the shyrack caves tomorrow. My mind was already racing, trying to think of the best way to attack that.

Canderous. The duel is at dawn. Surely you have not forgotten?

Again, Bastila surprised me by picking out my uppermost thoughts.

Of course not! I lied hotly through the bond. I’d sworn to second him, and I wouldn’t back down on that. But with everything that had happened, somehow the gravity of Canderous’ personal business had slipped my mind.

Good. He is getting agitated. She pulled back, withdrawing from me into a light meditation, conserving whatever strength she had left.

The granite peak of the Academy loomed over us as we neared the top of the rocky path. I, too, was drained, and longed to be back on the ‘Hawk - maybe a quick stint in the refresher followed by a long sleep. But there was so much to think on, now. Jorak’s shattering revelation that I had pushed away, until the threat was gone and Mekel revived.

I knew my name. I knew my name. Ness Jonohl. I thought the name, I tasted it on my lips as Juhani and I walked silently through the Valley of the Sith Lords. Never had words sounded so sweet. These weeks of knowing who Evil Bitch was, these months of living as Jen Sahara – and now. I knew my name.

Jorak Uln had met me, once before, either visiting on Revan’s orders or following Revan’s trail much as we were doing now.

I could find out my history, I realized with startling wonder. Surely I’d find something on the HoloNet about Jedi Knight Ness Jonohl. And her boyfriend. I’d find out whether Bastila was telling the truth or not. Whether I really did fall.

But even if the worst should come to pass, and I had followed Revan and Malak into murder and evil and barbarous insanity, surely I’d tried to turn back. Why else was I involved with whatever went down on Deralia?

_Bastila had a strike team when she fought Revan._ My eyes widened. Whoa. Could I have been one of them? I didn’t know how Revan’s flagship fit in with the ground assault on Deralia and Jen’s death, but the famous encounter between Bastila and Revan must have taken place in the skies above.

_And if I had been involved… that would explain so much._ *Why there’s a bond between me and Bastila and the echo of Darth Revan._ And Jen Sahara? I couldn’t make sense of that. But she’d been taken and tortured at the same place and likely the same time. Perhaps the pieces were starting to fit together now.

Bastila had saved my life. Was that at the same time? Did Revan kill Jen and almost kill me, before Bastila finally killed her? And didn’t Darth Malak then choose the opportunity to try and blow Bastila into space dust from another ship?

I winced as pain stabbed into my temple, roughly where I’d knocked my head open on the ‘Spire. _Bastila had once told me my mind was destroyed._ Back on Tatooine, when I’d been consumed with rage and confusion. Back when Revan kept trying to take over. _Bastila was afraid she’d do more damage if she told me too much._ The incident in the Archives earlier sprang to mind, and I wondered, ruefully, if there may have been some truth to her words.

I certainly hadn’t credited them with any back on Tatooine.

“We need to avoid people,” Juhani said quietly as we halted outside the Valley entrance to the Academy. “Yuthura, Uthar… Stretch out your senses, Jen.”

“Ness,” I corrected her. Ness. The name sounded a bit washed out, though. Jedi Knight Ness. Surely I should feel some sort of rightness about it?
The ferracrystral doors opened for us with an ominous creak, and once more we sidled into the Academy. I breathed the Force in deep; stretching out my senses, and in silence we chose a route that skirted along the edges of the school’s domain. The hallways here appeared much the same as the warren of corridors in the living quarters; high ceiling, narrow width, foreign symbols etched deep in the wall that looked vaguely impressive. A cursory glance brought no recollection from Jen, other than it was a repeating pattern intricate enough that most would probably not notice, and believe it to be of some archaeological significance.

We couldn’t avoid the large cavern that dominated the far side of the Academy but, bar a few Initiates, it was empty. I stared down a passing Zeltron that glanced our way curiously; hard enough until she looked elsewhere. The Force told me that there was no one left between us and the exit, but despite my firm grip on an outer confidence, I still held in a tense breath until we finally opened the impressive double doors and spilled out onto the ornate path that led to Dreshdae.

I’d never been so happy to exit a learning institute in my life.

xXx

It was an uneventful journey back to Dreshdae, with looming shadows of the nearby rocky peaks eclipsing our path as we hurried back. The light was fading and we remained silently intent on the darkening surroundings, keeping an eye out for any potential threat.

We spoke little, both lost in our own thoughts. Juhani, no doubt, thinking of Dak, and me… dwelling on everything.

The air-conditioned environment of Dreshdae allowed a loosening in my chest. I’d stopped noticing the harsh sulphuric taint at some stage, whether it was because of long exposure to it, or the simple reason I’d been holding deep onto the Force like Juhani had suggested. The air in Dreshdae was a relief, though.

The inhabitants of the colony gave us a wide berth; we still wore the dark robes of the Academy, even if Juhani’s had a jagged slice down the front and mine was rumpled and dirty.

We both held our lightsabers at the ready.

I thought I recognized the figure of Shaardan - the other sentient who’d listened with enthusiasm to Uthar’s exposition the previous day - catch sight of us as we crossed the retail plaza at the centre of Dreshdae. The enclosed colony was small, and it took us little time to, finally, arrive at the spaceport.

Juhani was one step ahead as we entered the docking bay, and she rapped loudly on the hatch, which opened a moment later as the familiar sight of Zaalbar greeted us. And all around me, the Force felt normal again, less like the twisted, dark energy that infiltrated every corner of the Academy.

Apart from one dead patch just around the outer hull of the ship.

“One second,” I muttered to Juhani. “Go on in, I’ll be right behind you.”

The encounter with Jorak Uln still had the burn of adrenaline running through me. I was wide-eyed, ready to second guess everything, and this damn, puzzling behaviour of the Force wasn’t helping my state of mind.

But maybe it was just that, even here, Korriban’s corruption lingered. I wandered off the loading ramp, and around the starboard side of the ‘Hawk. It was just next to the hyperdrive coupling, a section about a person’s height, repelling the Force as if no life could exist within it.

From some distance away I stared intently, wondering how in the Outer Rim the Force could react like that, and felt Bastila stir at my confusion.

And then, part of it moved.

Startled, I realized that something or someone was there. My hand fell to my lightsaber.

I sensed a brief flicker of hostile intent, and it was just enough warning for me to dive to the side as an activated lightsaber came spinning out of nowhere to strike just where I had been standing.

Another attempt on my life!

My anger crested, and with it a torrent of Force inundated my senses, demanding an outlet. It slammed the malicious energy against the outer hull of the ship, and the sound of a body crunching against it made a dull echo throughout the empty docking bay.

The dead Force weaves dissipated, and a shocked young man dressed in plain clothes appeared a few metres in front of me, held taut against the Ebon Hawk by my frenzied will. I could taste the savagery of my rage as it rippled through the Force, and squeezed malevolently against the intruder, forcing him prone against the durasteel, tightening ominously against his neck.

Jen, control your anger! This is not the way... calm down!

“I am getting a little sick of people trying to kill me,” I hissed through gritted teeth. The man – boy, really, he was young, younger even than Mekel or Shaardan – scrabbled desperately at his neck. Fury pounded a glorious beat within me. The power, Revan whispered in my head. Hatred and loathing and righteous anger... it is mine to embrace!

Jen! You must listen to me! Do not surrender to your rage! You are stronger than this!

I won’t surrender, I echoed desperately, clutching at Bastila’s words. Revan will not own me! Shallow breaths racked my body as I struggled to rein myself in. The desire to squeeze, to suffocate and choke and destroy, ebbed; and I was aware of the boy pleading under his breath, eyes tightly shut.

A minute passed, and still I stayed motionless, hand aloft while the Force swirled ominously around the intruder, imprisoning him against the Ebon Hawk but doing no more.

“Why are you here?” I demanded.

The boy’s eyes opened, wide and frightful. His hands dropped to his sides, and as he realized the danger was passing a calculating look crossed his face. “Well- uh, everyone is curious about you, and, uh, I was hoping to find something to gain prestige.”

“In case you hadn’t noticed, I’m not doing so well at controlling my darker emotions,” I said quietly, and took a step closer. The boy swallowed. “I suggest you start responding with the truth.”

Jen? Bastila’s voice was inquiring, and only a little bit panicky, now.

I’m okay now, I think. Thanks.

What happened?
A Sithkid tried to kill me. Getting tired of this.

Oh. Do not- do not answer with the same gratuitous violence. Please.

“I, um, I was tracking someone.” A mulish look crossed the boy’s face and he glanced down.
“Look, if you’re going to kill me, then just get it over with alright?” His voice was filled with the false bravado of youth.

“Oh,” I kept mine flippant, pulled out my short red ‘saber and activated it. Let’s call his bluff. I wouldn’t – couldn’t – kill him, but he didn’t know that.

Three steps, and I was within striking distance. I lunged forward.

“Stop!” he cried desperately, his face two inches from scarlet death. “Please, it was Kylah! Master Uthar sent me to find her, and she was interested in this ship! Please don’t kill me!” His voice cracked, babbling with platitudes and pleads.

Kylah. Stars, Kylah is on Korriban. Dread circled deep within me. For if Kylah was here…

Kylah?

And she was scouting around the Ebon Hawk…

Kylah Aramai? How- she died onboard the Endar Spire, Jen!

“What do you mean, interested?” I could feel the anger building again, buffeting against the fraying edges of my control. It twisted, reverberated darkly through the scarlet beam of the ‘saber.

“I- she- she was looking up the transport logs, the manifest, the- the docking info- that sort of thing!”

The ‘saber stayed taut against the adolescent’s face, which was cranedSharply away from the hot burn of its beam. “Was she here? In this docking bay?” I hissed.

“No- I, uh, I don’t know!” he gasped. “I only came here for a look because she ran some queries on this freighter from spaceport control! I wasn’t going to do anything!”

“Jen? What is going on?” Juhani’s voice, quiet and peaceful, cut through the charged atmosphere. I heard the clank of boots coming down the landing ramp to my right.

“Don’t- calm down Jen. We didn’t come here to beat up the Sith kids,” Carth’s voice followed hers, calm and steady and so damned reasonable I wanted to throw something at him.

“I’m absolutely fine, guys,” I forced out through gritted teeth. Their emergence did, however, press the rage back under check, and I took a deep, deep breath. “I’m calm, I’m not going to kill anyone despite this being the second idiot today who has tried to end me. Frankly, I think I’m doing sodding well on this damn rotten planet.”

Did you send Juhani and Carth to check up on me? I demanded.

I- yes. As a precautionary measure only. You seem to be doing quite well.

Grudgingly, I pulled back from Bastila and focused again on the neophyte Dark Jedi. He’d gained composure of a sort, and was staring back at me emotionless. My ‘saber was still illuminating his young face in shades of red. Reluctantly, I released the ropes of Force imprisoning him, and in doing so brushed against his very psyche.

_He’s strong_, I realized, startled. _And if he was chasing Kylah, on Uthar’s orders… then this must be Uthar’s pet Dustil._ Not a neophyte, then, despite his youth. He was a teenage human, maybe Mission’s age, with rich dark hair and a strong face smattered with freckles. Intelligent eyes stared at me, impassive, waiting for my move.

Why did you say Kylah’s name, Jen?

Later, Bastila. I still have a situation here.

“Jen. You must let him go,” Juhani said quietly as she drew closer.

“As soon as I figure out what to do with him,” I replied dryly. “I’m not too keen on evading death by his hands again, and I don’t think Uthar’s pet can be easily negotiated with.”

A slight gasp from the teenager was the only acknowledgement I received; but it was enough to convince me I was right about his identity. I felt my lips curve in a small smile.

“But anyone can be redeemed, Jen, you know this,” Juhani murmured as she stepped to my side. Dustil glanced over at the Cathar briefly, before back to me and my ‘saber. Even Uthar’s protégé, Juhani? Sun and stars, you’d probably try to talk Darth Malak around.

What would reach this angry young man, anyway? My eyes narrowed.

“Your Master sent Mekel to his death, you know,” I murmured. “Ordered him into Tulak Hord’s tomb.”

Dustil flinched, and for a moment raw emotion was visible in his dark eyes. “Why the frakk should I care,” he said coldly.

“Because he was your friend… once.” I said quietly.

“You’re a bleeding slug-brained rotgrub if you’re frakking dependent on friends,” he spat, the curses sounding awkward on his tongue. He had the same accent as Mekel, but more refined, more educated. I bet he channels Mekel when he wants to look like he doesn’t care. “And people die on Korriban. If Mekel wasn’t strong enough… then he wasn’t strong enough.”

“Oh,” I said lazily, but held my ‘saber at the ready. “I never said Mekel died.”

He blinked. “What- but you said Tulak Hord- if he went- did Mekel run?”

I couldn’t help a smirk. I shouldn’t enjoy this Sithling’s discomfort, I knew, but a wicked part of me couldn’t resist. “No. You should ask Mekel about it. It’s quite the fun story.”

Dustil’s eyes narrowed with dislike but he didn’t rise to the bait. “So what now? We appear to be at an impasse.”

And so we were. I didn’t have any concrete reason to detain Dustil longer, but the thought of letting him loose did not sit well with me. _He’ll go straight to Uthar, unless the humiliation of being bested is too strong. And Uthar’s interested in Juhani…*_

“We could… pretend this never happened,” Dustil suggested. “I can promise I won’t mention your ship to anyone.”

“Sith’s honour?” I remarked sarcastically.
Dustil shrugged. “We both have reasons for forgetting this incident.” He paused, and it was a loaded silence. “Jen,” he added softly.

Just like that, the humour fled. Damn Carth and Juhani for their lack of finesse. “It’s a nickname,” I snapped. “It’s short for Ness.”

“Riiiight,” he drawled in derision.

“There is no sense in restraining him any longer,” Juhani said quietly from behind me. “He will find his own path.”

“Letting Sith loose who know our ship and have already tried to kill you is neither strategic nor conducive to survival,” Carth disagreed from the loading ramp.

Dustil’s eyes were flicking between me and Juhani, and I could see the wheels in his head turning. Our cover as Sith hopefuls was surely blown. Carth and Juhani, I groaned inwardly. Stealth ops they are not.

“This boy has no reason to betray us, Carth,” Juhani said mildly. “Surely he will respect that we have spared his life.”

But the boy in question had paled, an odd expression crossing his face, like some wild, preposterous idea had formed. He mouthed something silently, before shaking his head in apparent dismissal of his own thoughts.

Carth. He was saying Carth, I realized in puzzlement. That was Juhani, again, not doing so well at the whole covert thing.

But the hairs on my arms began to stand on end.

It was funny, how in some moments a dozen different impressions could coalesce into one startling conclusion.

Mekel’s voice, explaining their shared origins: “We were both grabbed from Telos after the bombing, y’know…”

Carth’s voice, telling me of his loss: “A wife and son on Telos. I never… I never found my son.”

Dustil had a long face, lean but with a strong jaw that he’d undoubtedly grow into. A wide mouth that might have a handsome smile if he could still remember how. A mop of hair that had the same rich chestnut colour and texture as our pilot.

Something akin to awe awoke within me, as a crazy conclusion peaked into sharp clarity. Add twenty years and Dustil would be the spitting image of Carth.

No. Way.

“What?” the Republic pilot called back. Dustil started shaking his head, desperation spreading over his face.

“You said you lost a son on Telos. What was his name?”

“No no no,” Dustil was begging in an urgent tone, quiet enough that Carth wouldn’t hear from that distance. “Please send him away, I’ll do anything you want, please!”
“Why would you ask that?” Carth replied tightly, not having budged from the ramp. Juhani, still next to me, drew her breath in audibly. Her thoughts must be racing, trying to connect the dots.

“Humour me. Please.”

The boy darted to the left, away from my ‘saber, and my hand shot out automatically to slam him back against the ship. He grunted, and Juhani shifted to cut him off.

“You can’t do this,” he spat in desperation. “Please, let me leave and I’ll be yours!”

“Sorry kid,” I murmured softly. “We all have to face our demons sometime. And as far as yours go… Well. I don’t think it’s that bad, really.”

“His name was Dustil, not that it’s any of your business,” Carth was outraged now, an honest anger darkening his voice. Everything clicked into place, and I smiled ruefully at the boy. He was shaking underneath my hand.

“It’s my business when he tries to kill me, Carth,” I shot back. “I think you’d better get your ass over here and see for yourself.”

“What?” Carth hissed. A pause, and then hurried steps as he clambered inelegantly over to us. Dustil cringed against the durasteel hull, shame and fear and anger darkening his eyes to an unfathomable black. My gaze slid to Carth; he was bewildered, disbelieving, and didn’t seem to recognize Dustil at first.

And then, a dawning wonder lightened his face, and at once I was reminded of the female soldiers who stalked him around the Endar Spire.

My, he’s not half-handsome when he smiles-

“Let me go!” Dustil yelled, and I released him, switching my ‘saber off and taking a step back. I clenched in readiness for any escape attempt, but judging by the adolescent fury building in his eyes I was pretty sure he was going to yell rather than run.

“You’re alive.” Carth stepped forward, arms raised as if to embrace the boy but Dustil flinched and stepped to the side.

“Oh, great,” Dustil sneered. It made him look younger. “It figures that you’d show up four years too late. Couldn’t you have gotten yourself blown up on some ship and saved us the reunion?”

“Dustil... what?” Carth frowned, puzzled now as he gazed hungrily at his son. “What are you talking about? I... I thought you were dead!”

“Too bad you didn't still think that,” Dustil shot back. “What, you thought I’d be happy to see you? Look, everyone!” Dustil gestured comically around the empty landing bay. “It's my father, come to rescue me! Sure, he may have left Mum and I to die, but let’s not quibble over details!”

“No!” Carth cried out in protest, flinching backwards. “I didn't abandon you! The task force just arrived too late. Telos was in ruins, and your mother... I found her body... but I looked for you. I swear I looked everywhere –”

“Ah, save it,” Dustil spat. “You abandoned us long before. We were alone all during the wars, and even when you came back, you still didn't stay.” His voice held the echoes of long buried childhood resentment.

“I didn't have a choice! I was needed...”

“Yeah? Well you were needed at home, too. Every damn battle that was more important to you than your family.” Dustil took another step away from us, glancing back at me cautiously. “You know what? It doesn't matter. Not anymore. The Sith are my family now, a family that cares about me. I don't need you.”

I snorted at that, and had twin Onasi scowls turn my way. I raised my hands in surrender. “Sorry!” I muttered. “Just the words Sith and cares about me in the same sentence is a bit hard to take in.”

“The Sith?” Carth turned back to his son, his son, his voice deepening to incredulous outrage. “You can't mean that! No! The Sith killed your mother! The Sith destroyed Telos!”

“So? You're the soldier, father,” Dustil sneered, and his words were laced with the venom only an antagonistic teenager could manage. “How many mothers have you killed?”

“No,” Carth rejected angrily. “You've been brainwashed. The son I knew would never –”

“You never knew me!” the boy yelled. “You weren't there to know me! You have no idea what I would or wouldn’t do!”

Carth was shaking his head in denial. “I don't know what's been done to you, but you're coming with me. Now.”

“Touch me, old man, and I'll kill you!” Dustil’s voice rose, and with a raised hand his forgotten lightsaber whooshed past me and snapped back into his grip. The red illuminated his angry, resentful expression. “Leave. Get off Korriban! If I see you again, I’ll end you!”

The Force rallied around him, a powerful, unstable tornado of energy. He’s close to losing control. This could end badly.

“Carth,” I said tightly, and he turned to look at me, a parent’s lost bewilderment in his dark eyes. “Let him go.”

Carth had frozen in shock, and Dustil slipped passed us, a hateful glare on his face as he all but ran out of the docking bay. I could see that Carth had absolutely no idea what to do next.

“Inside. Now,” I ordered, jerking a thumb towards the ‘Hawk. Juhani was already at the door, and I motioned Carth in first before locking the hatch securely behind me.

He had barely taken a step into the ship before turning around again.

“Jen...” his voice was utterly lost.

“I know,” I murmured, still reeling myself. First Dak, now Dustil. Next we’ll find Bastila's long lost mother or something.

“No you don’t!” he rejected hotly. “Dustil is... I thought... he’s alive... but-”

I sighed. “But he’s training to be a Dark Jedi.”

“How?” he cried brokenly. “I- four years ago, Telos was bombed by the Sith. Morgana died because of them. I came too late- our condo was flattened- by the time we landed- All the Sith wanted was to murder civilians and spread panic,” his voice echoed with deep bitterness. “Revan and Malak and Saul Karath… they’re monsters, all of them.”

I had no response for the utter misery etched on his face. He looked away from me, words spilling out like bitter droplets of pain. “I found my wife’s body. Morgana. I don’t think she suffered. But I wasn’t there… I should have been there. I never found Dustil. I checked the survivor lists compulsively, and every day the hope I carried in me died a little more. There were so many missing, so many bodies they couldn’t identify.”

He sighed and it was a desperate sound. “Eventually I gave up, and accepted that he’d died, too. I went back to the Fleet and threw myself into work… and never really stopped. And now… now I find he’s alive. And training to be a Sith.”

He looked back at me, and now the fire of anger began to burn in his dark eyes. “Jen… I can’t believe you let him go. I have to go after him. No matter if he hates me. I can’t let him stay here, in this evil place.” Carth abruptly tried to step past me; I moved to intercept him and he glared angrily.

“Don’t you dare try to stop me, Jen Sahara. Blast it, you should never have let him go!”

“Carth, listen!” My hands dropped to his forearms and gripped tightly, commanding his attention. “Of course we’re not going to leave Dustil here on Korriban. But would you rather we tie him up and chuck him in the hold, or convince him to come of his own volition?”

“I don’t care!” Carth yelled, his face furious and inches from mine. I felt his muscles bunch under my hands.

“Well you should!” I snapped back. “He’s both a resentful teenager, and a powerful Dark Jedi in the making.” Carth snorted disbelievingly at this, and I scowled at him. “Carth, he’s the protégé of Uthar Wynn. Y’know, the leader of the Sith Academy. Uthar kills the weak ones, Carth.”

He was shaking his head. Absently, I noticed he’d lost that stars-awful flight jacket. “I just– I’m just struggling to get my head around this. Dustil, alive after all these years… and a powerful Force user?”

“Carth, I promise we won’t leave Korriban without Dustil. But Kylah’s back, sniffing around the Ebon Hawk… I need you here, guarding Bastila.” I breathed in deep. “Give me a chance to persuade Dustil to come voluntarily.”

His dark eyes, serious and intent, gazed into mine for moments before he nodded imperceptibly.

“Jen?” Bastila emerged from behind us, deeper in the corridor, her voice a question.

At once I realized how close we were standing, and how warm his arms were under my hands. I released him, taking a step backwards and feeling unfamiliarly flustered.

Bastila glanced at Carth and then back to me. “I believe you wished to talk, Jen. We have… much to discuss.”

I nodded. “I’ll talk to you later,” I muttered to Carth, and followed Bastila deeper into the ‘Hawk.

We headed back to the medbay, which had turned into her quarters since Manaan. The pilot’s office – a small, separate living room near the cockpit which had been her domain prior - was currently empty, although I thought I’d caught Carth kipping in there a couple of times.

My mind was still whirling with the latest revelation of what had to be craziest day of my life.
Carth’s son. Alive, on Korriban, and the most powerful Adept here. I couldn’t imagine Carth’s turmoil.

Bastila closed the medbay door behind me, and sat down on the bed. I followed suit, looking at her in an awkward silence.

In the lengthy list of mind-shattering issues, it was hard to know what to prioritize. Perhaps that was why her next baffling question caught me so completely off-guard.

“What is going on between you and Carth?” she asked seriously.

“Are you certain?” Her voice was soft, but not so quiet that I could comfortably ignore it. I had no idea what she was talking about. I mean, sure, Carth was a good looking guy, and we got along great when he wasn’t being a paranoid idiot or I wasn’t blowing ships up, but the idea of something romantic happening was... was, well, it was ridiculous.

“This is ridiculous,” I muttered, wrenching my thoughts into some semblance of normality. “First flyboy thinks there’s something going on between me and Canderous, and now you imply something between Carth and I… sun and stars, I never realized my love-life was so busy.”

“You are dissembling,” she replied, in an irritatingly neutral voice. “And blushing.”

“I am not!” I shot back, my cheeks flaming.

“Perhaps I am mistaken,” she conceded, but I thought I heard doubt in her voice. I scowled. “Certainly there are more pertinent subjects to discuss. But at least let me impart to you the dangers of emotional entanglements to Force users.”

My embarrassment faded, overshadowed by amusement. “Please tell me I’m not about to have The Talk. From someone at least five years my junior.”

Irritation flashed through her eyes. “Must you turn this into a joke? There are valid reasons…” she trailed off suddenly as a thought struck her. And I heard it with startling clarity.

At least five years your junior…

I stiffened. For after all, Jen Sahara at twenty-six galactic years was likely younger than Bastila Shan. We stared at each other, and I felt my jaw clenching. Bastila looked away.

“Perhaps this discussion is best left for another day. But please believe that I have your interests at heart, Jen.”

I said nothing, using my silence to prod her into speech. She sighed, and turned to look at me again. Her eyes showed a considerable depth of exhaustion.

“I heard most of that conversation, Jen, regarding Carth’s son. I am… not sure that getting involved is the right course of action.”

Shock assailed me. “What, we should leave Carth’s son to the mercy of the Sith?” I could hear my voice rise in disbelief.

Bastila closed her eyes, and sat further back on the medbay bed, leaning against the wall. There were shadowed hollows in her cheeks, and I wondered how much the experience in Tulak Hord’s tomb had sapped her strength. I had no idea the bond could be so… powerful.

That is not quite what I meant. She surprised me by replying mentally. But he is here of his own volition, Jen. And we are here to find the Star Map… to stop Darth Malak. Every delay adds risk to our mission.

I swallowed back my instinctive snarl, and deliberately took the time to mull over her advice. Bastila had years of training and counsel from the Jedi, and I was making a concerted effort to listen to her. Not just because of Evil Bitch, but because the stakes of what we were doing were so damn high. And I’d never, till this planet, given her much of a chance.

But still, she was wrong.

Bastila. If we ignore every little thing we can do to help along the way, then where do we draw the line? I briefly recalled the Sith hopefuls I’d left standing under Mekel’s influence. I could have done something there, but had decided the risk was too great. Juhani, on the other hand, tried to redeem all that we met. Somewhere we have to find a balance. We can’t disregard every wrong we come across because we are doing something more important. In the end, what will that do to our humanity?

There was a long silence.

Perhaps, if I am truly honest with myself, I would say that I am scared of staying longer on Korriban than is necessary. Her emotions cascaded through the bond, waves of emanating shame. You are right, Jen.

I’m scared too, Bastila. But I can’t ignore Carth, or Canderous.

And that is true bravery, is it not? Doing what is right or what is needed, despite one’s fear. I would ask, as your companion and perhaps, one day, your friend, that you remember thus: It is your actions that showcase your true nature, no matter what may have been.

And here we were, dancing around the truth again.

We stared at each other in silence, her pale, beautiful face across from mine, a solemn expression in her dark eyes. It was time to find out the truth.

“Okay Bastila, let’s have it out,” I said, crossing my arms. She flinched.

“Ha-have it out?” she stammered. I felt her fear, and inwardly recoiled.

“I know, Bastila,” I said flatly. “Don’t bother hiding behind part lies and half-truths anymore.”

Her eyes widened to black pools of shock. She swallowed convulsively. “You found out on Rii’shn,” she said quietly.

“Yes,” I bit out. “I had a flashback, of sorts. Bastila, why is Darth Revan in my head? What did the Jedi do?’”

Her face turned white, and she blinked but did not answer.

“I know Karon was involved,” I muttered, my words spilling out. “And I know she was my Master, before all of this. Mine, not Jen Sahara’s, not Darth Revan’s. Stars, did I agree to this mental minefield?"

If anything, she paled further and didn’t answer my somewhat rhetorical question. I could feel an honest anger swelling up inside. “Dammit, Bastila, why do I have three personalities inside my head?”

A hysterical laugh burst out from her; it sounded utterly shocked. She clapped a hand over her mouth. Through the bond, I felt nothing but stunned disbelief. I guess she never planned on having this conversation with me. We were, after all, meant to be safely ensconced on Dantooine. I understood, then, how unfair a position she had been put in, due to our unlikely bond. It was highly doubtful that any of this mess had been initiated by her, a Jedi Padawan.

Apart from the bond. The whole saving-my-life thing.

“You- you think you have three personalities?” she spluttered.

“What? You mean to tell me I have more?” I hissed. “Did this become a new game at the Order? The masters so bored of reciting the Code, they decided to see how many personalities they could cram inside someone’s head?”

“No,” she answered in desperation, and her voice had quietened now, while her eyes searched my face frantically. “Please, Jen, give me a moment to decide how best to proceed.”

“To proceed,” I returned flatly. “No. You can’t hide the truth from me anymore.” I needed to hear it all, now, everything. But most importantly – even more important than the significance of Evil Bitch – was my own history. “Bastila, I know my name, now. Ness Jonohl. Jorak Uln confirmed it. I want- I need to know. Was I- was Ness a Dark Jedi?”

Her face was blank – I would have called it inscrutable, but it didn’t seem to be hiding any emotion other than bewilderment. The same emotion swam strongly through our bond.

“Dammit, Bastila, answer me! Did Ness Jonohl fall to the Dark Side?”

“No!” she answered, her voice strong and sure. “But, you must understand, Ness doesn’t ex-”

“Jen Sahara,” an angry, gravelly voice cut in from behind the door. “We need to talk. Now.”

A sinking feeling pulsed at me. “Canderous, give me some time.”

The door swished open. I felt Bastila’s palpable relief through the bond, and my anger crested further.

“The duel is less than a full sleep away. We must prepare. Have you forsaken me, Jen Sahara?”

“What?” I stood abruptly, glaring at the furious Mandalorian. “No! I said I’ll be your second and I will. But I need to sort this out-”

“Bastila will be here when you get back,” Canderous bit out. “Whatever little Jedi spat you two have can wait. This can’t.”

“Go, Jen,” Bastila said softly. “You cannot break your vow to Canderous. And I shall be here upon your return.”

Canderous was radiating pent-up frustration from waiting idly for two days, and Bastila had the shadows of deep exhaustion etched in semi-permanent fashion on her face. Even through the bond, she felt faint, weaker, like she had on the hyperspace journey from Manaan.

Bastila was right. Dammit. I had to talk with Canderous about the duel before he wound himself up any further. My conversation with Bastila could wait – and at the least, I already knew one, soul-defining fact.

Ness Jonohl did not fall.

“We will continue this as soon as I am back from tomorrow’s duel,” I said flatly and, with one last, long look at my bond-sister, I capitulated and followed Canderous out of the room.

xXx
“Sit,” I barked at Revan, pointing to the benches in the common room before stalking out towards the men’s quarters. I could feel a disgruntled scowl on my face; I’d spent the last two days cooling my heels and waiting for Revan to return from playing with the Sithlings. Waiting was something I neither excelled at nor enjoyed.

