“I think it’s lovely that you’re composing music for your mate’s wedding,” Sarah told her, still staring at her hands. “Do you feel any discomfort about him marrying someone else when he’s your mate?”

April chuckled without slowing her fingers. “That’s a very personal question. I assume you didn’t mean to pry.”

“I’m…” Sarah stood. “I’m sorry. You’re right. Please excuse me. I didn’t mean to interrupt.” She backed toward the door where Fred waited patiently, but April never stopped smiling cheerfully, never stopped sending swirls of delightful, playful notes into the vast room.
Continuing the tour, Fred gestured down an offshoot hallway, dimly lit and narrower than the grand corridor. “Omega Gabriel’s suite is down this hall, but we will leave him to his privacy. He prefers not to be disturbed.”

“Of course,” Sarah said, wondering for the millionth time about Gabriel. He seemed an unexplained mystery. He had been so lively at the wedding party, but she had rarely heard anything of him whatsoever outside of that. He never made the news the way Castiel did. His image was so rare in the media, many people didn’t realize that Castiel even had a brother. Prefers his privacy, indeed. Sam had flat refused to discuss him other than a simple confirmation that he existed. And then the sudden invitation to attend a party, thrown in a public venue on no notice at which the man ran around stark naked and performing like a porn star.

Sarah had questions.

The music from the end of the corridor behind them changed tone, turned quick and anxious, pounded and stomped like a tantrum.

“This is the billiard room,” Fred continued, paying no mind to the swirl of questions in Sarah’s head. “It was once the family chapel, but Alpha Castiel had it converted during his stint as a medical resident. He claimed he needed respite of leisure more than of spirit at the time.” Fred let Sarah poke her head in. It was a man-cave so classically designed, she was surprised not to find lithographs of hunting dogs on the oak-paneled walls. Billiards, poker, darts, an oak bar with leather bar stools. Sarah tried to imagine a younger Castiel in this room, attempting to allay his stress by striking billiard balls violently, but she couldn’t see it. He’d either changed drastically since then or he was keeping a large portion of his personality private. Perhaps that ran in the family.

Heading back down the corridor, Sarah realized that the tour served an interesting and likely intentional purpose of humanizing the pack. This house was grand and elegant. It was old money, spruced into modern good taste. There weren’t claw marks down the warm wooden wall panels. There was no broken glass, speaking of violence unkenneled. The art work on the walls was fascinating and thoughtful, not crude. The house was a powerful statement to the humanity of the people living here. They couldn’t be beasts and choose to live this way.

It was massive, but it was a home.

“If you’ll accompany me upstairs, we can settle in the upper living room and talk. I assume that would be acceptable?” Fred began to climb the wide staircase without waiting for a response.

“Isn’t that the Pack’s personal space?” asked Sarah, hesitating on the first step.

“Indeed,” agreed Fred, but he didn’t pause. A glance over her shoulder told her the foyer was empty. Then a small door at the rear, near the exit out to the pool caught her eye.

“Fred, where does that door lead?” she asked him, pointing.

He looked around in interest, leaning over the bannister a bit. “That provides access to the basement levels, miss. Down there are Alpha’s ‘Heat and Rut’ room, his workout room, and the Playroom. I can show them to you, if you like. They aren’t in use at the moment.”

“Oh,” said Sarah, flushing a little. “You mean Playroom, as in sex dungeon?”

Fred smiled kindly. “No, miss. We don’t have a dungeon. But it is most commonly used for sexual activities, for scening, for play, sometimes for punishment.”

“But it’s not a dungeon?”
“It’s not,” he assured her. “Would you like to see?”

“Maybe another time,” she told him, tearing her eyes away and following him up the stairs. “We really should get started on the interview. I have quite a few questions.”

“This way,” he held an arm out to lead her to the left.

“These rooms…” she began.

“These are the family bedrooms. We shan’t be opening any of these doors. There is a living room down the hall where you may set up your recording equipment.”

“It’s just a digital audio recorder,” she mumbled, staring at the corridor lined with closed doors. Turning down a wide hall to the left, Sarah heard an unmistakable moan and a ‘WHAP’!

She stopped.

“This way, please,” Fred encouraged.

“What is that?” she demanded, her feet planted.

Fred cocked his head, listening. Another slapping sound, of something hard and flat striking flesh. Sarah had witnessed enough punishments to know what a paddle sounded like. She heard Castiel’s voice, a little strained, but she couldn’t make out the words.

“It appears some of the Pack are in the Game room. Do not be alarmed. We won’t disturb them. Our destination is across the hall, and we can close the door.”

“Fred, I don’t get it. Doesn’t all of this disturb you?” Another loud strike, this one followed by a yelp. Dean’s voice. Castiel’s low moan. Michael’s voice, inflected up in question, and Castiel’s response, seemingly through gritted teeth, followed be a long groan of pleasure.

“This way, Sarah,” he repeated.

As they approached, the sounds increased in volume. The door was wide open, and Sarah realized they would have to pass it to arrive at the door on the end where Fred was heading. Fred was not disturbed in the least. In fact, he stuck his head in the door and spoke to the occupants.

“Dinner will be served on time, Alpha. You have time for a shower if you prefer.”

“Thanks, Fred,” Castiel gritted out. Sarah tried not to look. She tried. She tried valiantly. She failed.

Cas sat in a cushioned chair, bare from his shirttail down, his head thrown back. Dean was on his knees, completely naked, feverishly blowing the Alpha, both hands encircling what his mouth couldn’t take, his eyes rolled up high, not quite closed, but showing only whites. Michael stood behind Dean with a paddle in his hand. Michael was dressed. He seemed relaxed and easy. As she glanced in, against her will, he swung the paddle backhanded, easily, almost lightly, and popped Dean’s upraised ass. Dean’s eyes clenched closed and he picked up his pace. Castiel moaned again.

“Try rolling your sleeves up, Michael. I find that helps me feel the swing better.” Cas adjusted his position in the chair, but Dean followed him, never losing connection, and Cas’ hand wound into his hair and scratched at his scalp.

All of this Sarah saw in just a glance. Her ears and face were burning by the time she reached the living room, a much less formal room than the one downstairs. It looked loved and lived in. The TV at the far end was massive. The couch looked ripe for day napping. A large cabinet clearly held a sophisticated gaming system, and wide windows looked out over the southern lawn, past the garage, toward the Facility, although it wasn’t visible from here.

Fred efficiently produced two glasses of ice water and set them on a round table by the window.

“May I call you Sarah?” he asked abruptly.

She chuckled. It was the formality juxtaposed with explicit lewdness. It felt surreal. “Of course,” she replied. She set her untouched whiskey on the table.

“Thank you. I have done so already, I know, but I’d like for you to feel comfortable here, and I’d like for a few moments to step out of the role that my position dictates. I assume that is what you would prefer as well, that is, unless you want to interview a butler.” His eyes twinkled. There was a kindness to him that flowed over a vein of steel.

“Yes. Thank you, Fred. I’d really rather talk to you than to the butler.”

“That’s what I thought.” He sat in a chair near the couch and nodded her toward it. It didn’t take her long to arrange her notes and recorder.

“You seem to have known Alpha Castiel’s grandparents,” she started, more chatting than interviewing. “How long have you lived here?”

“I don’t actually live here at all,” he said. “I have a house of my own close by, not a part of the estate. But I was a very small boy when I first began to accompany my father on his rounds. It was a fascinating way to grow up. I was born in 1940, during the war. My father had a bad leg. He limped most of his life. He wasn’t suited for combat, so he remained behind and worked for the Novaks. They’ve been the wealthiest family in the region for some time, and during the war, they took in a great number of locals into their service. Many people were in need of a good job, my father among them. He was a widower, raising a young boy on his own, and Gertrude Novak allowed him to bring me along with him when I was out of school. She doted on me, let me be her personal attendant. I had access to the entire house. I helped Cook. I helped the gardener. It was a magical place to grow up in. It was as if there was no war.”

Sarah smiled as he spoke.

“And your father?”

Fred nodded. “He was good at the work. He liked it here as much as I did. It always felt like a world unto itself. It felt safe. Predictable. He was promoted to head butler rapidly, and I became a ‘boy of all trades’.”

“Those days were very different from today though, weren’t they? The family was different?”

He nodded. “Yes, quite different. Gertrude and Allen Novak were among the fiercest of believers that it was incumbent upon Lupins to assimilate into Primate society. They were devout religiously. They were pillars of the community. They were charitable, both in heart and in action. Sarah, I hope I convey this well, as I am the only person left who can speak of them as a witness.”

She looked up, saw the earnestness in his eyes, and nodded.

“What has come to pass, especially over the last sixty years or so with Lupins…the frailty, the mental instability, the degenerative nature of many of their afflictions…none of that touched this house back then. Gertrude and Allen Novak were both healthy, fulfilled people. They loved their community. They got on well with their Primate neighbors. I will admit, even as a young boy, I was quite aware that their sexual habits were quite a bit less private and more boisterous than anything I witnessed from my own species, but to me, it seemed normal – witnessed as it was from a very young age. And as I said, I spent virtually all of my time here in the house. I knew that they were Lupin. I knew that there was a difference in the way they comported themselves, in the way they communicated with each other, in the way they processed emotions. They were different, but they never seemed less than human.”

“So you believe it was having grown up around it that inoculated you from being disturbed by what they do to each other?”

He nodded somberly. “I think that is a very likely outcome. It also helps that Alpha Gertrude always made time for my many questions.” He smiled a private smile in memory. “She was an endearingly kind woman and at the same time, fierce enough to shake the walls if pressed hard enough.”

“Much like her grandson?” posed Sarah.

He smiled again, this time broadly, and he nodded. “Very like her grandson. Her persona seems to have skipped a generation and then come back home again. It is fitting, is it not?”

“Hmm,” said Sarah, scribbling some swift notes. “But Zachariah was different?”

Fred sighed. “Alpha Zachariah and I grew up together, you see. I am older than he by six years.”

“What was he like?”

“Zachariah was an austere child, studious and grim. He rarely played with toys other than to build things on occasion. He never played with other children. He had no use for me at all as a child. He spent most of his time reading or shadowing his father, who was an astute business man. Allen Novak was a business genius, and to his credit, he taught much of what he knew to his son.”

“It sounds…so much like a Primate family,” observed Sarah shaking her head a little.

“It was, I suppose,” Fred acknowledged. “None of the Novaks of those generations Presented as Omegas, and that allowed them to miss much of the tragedy that struck all around them. Alpha Gertrude’s Ruts were rapidly hushed affairs. From my perspective as a child, she seemed to grow ill a couple of times a year, just as many people do, and she was hustled away for a few days with her mate closely attending her. I didn’t know until I was perhaps twelve, what was actually happening. Of course, my father knew. It was his job to provide them with food and clean bedding.” Fred’s face softened.

Sarah let him stay in a memory for a moment, and then she shifted. His eyes popped back from the distance, and he smiled wistfully. “But you were asking about Zachariah,” he reminded himself.

“Yes, well. It was too much to hope that the ills of the world would stay at bay forever. Zachariah was ill-suited, I suppose, to much of the less pragmatic side of a wealthy inheritance. He had no impulse to charity, nor to forming sustainable relationships with friends or neighbors. He was a very insular man, trusting only himself. Needing only himself. He was sent away to Scotland to boarding school for a number of years, and I believe that broke him even further from feeling connected to this community. It was a shame. He was so very lonely.”

“When he Presented, and he was alpha, they brought him home to private tutors for the remainder of his pre-college schooling. Where he’d been, in Scotland, had been amenable to Lupins. Scotland is perhaps the best example of an integrated social climate. He was never ostracized there, but once he Presented, his mother wanted him home where she could guide him. Being an alpha is no easy matter. And being an adolescent alpha has to be hellish. As if being adolescent isn’t hard enough, imagine having impulses to mount and to mate that are nearly unbearable to fight. The only outlet for many young alphas is to turn to violence as a way to funnel some of the energy out. That wasn’t an option for Zachariah, so he turned to incessant masturbation.”

Sarah looked up in surprise. “When you say ‘incessant’…”

Fred leaned forward. “I mean all the time.”

She stared at him. “Like a toddler…?”

He chuckled. “Much worse. Although luckily, those initial hormone spikes don’t go on forever. He grew out of it. His parents were set on having him mate young to avoid the seemingly inevitable outcome that he would turn to a life of promiscuity and sire a bastard or mate accidentally to someone unsuitable. It may need to be noted at this point that Zachariah was never going to be promiscuous. He was asexual as far as I could tell, only seeking a partner during his Ruts and only at biological mandate. I cannot speak from actual knowledge, I’m afraid, as he never confided in me, but I believe even during Rut, he would have preferred a solitary experience, had his body allowed it.”

“So it was his parents who chose his mate?” Sarah asked, fascinated. She hadn’t intended to focus on the Novak family history, but it was turning out to be mesmerizing.

“Not exactly,” Fred responded after a sip of water. “They held parties, introduced him to a great many young women. They flew across the country more than once to attend galas where they hoped he would meet a True-Mate. He never Triggered though, no matter how many events, no matter how many ladies.”

Sarah looked up at a sudden thought. “What would they have done if he Triggered with a man? You said they were still assimilated and devout. Was homophobia a part of their world view?”

Fred nodded sadly. “Yes, I’m afraid it was. It was common in those days to downplay a same-sex True-Mate and bring in a substitute for public display. If Zachariah had Triggered with another man, they would have brought the poor man home to the mansion and kept him a virtual prisoner here, securing a lovely young thing to parade on Zachariah’s arm in public, preferably a young widow, already Mated and left bereft who could not Mate again. It was seen as charitable for all parties. It was a barbaric custom.”

Fred went still, his face set in anger in a way that looked unfamiliar to his muscles. His eyes drifted far away.

“Fred? Are you all right?” Sarah asked carefully.

“If I may speak frankly, Sarah,” he said, bringing his eyes back but retaining the hard angles that defined the angry set of his jaw. “You’re looking to understand this species that is at once so like us and yet so very different. You think them barbarous. You think them uncivilized because there is a violence to their interactions that you don’t understand. I have to tell you though, if you’re seeking barbarity, you’re looking chiefly in the wrong species.”

She didn’t respond. The anger in his face was slowly supplanted by pain. Eventually, he found the words to continue. “I am a gay man. Such has always been the case. And while I cannot pretend that the Novaks, neither Gertrude’s generation nor Zachariah’s, truly understood me, what I can tell you for certain is that they, all of them, were lightyears more accepting of me than my own friends, my own community, my own species.”

“Fred, I’m sorry.”

He shook off her consolation. “My father knew, of course. We spent so much time together. He was very attentive as a parent. He loved me unconditionally, and he knew before I did that I had a difficult road ahead of me.” Fred’s face softened again in a way that Sarah was beginning to see tied to his memories of his father. “He tried to help prepare me by teaching me techniques of distraction and deflection. He taught me self-defense. He taught me ways to keep myself hidden from public view. None of it was particularly useful, I must say, in protecting me from bigots, but it’s been quite useful in my professional life. It’s important that the butler be truly visible only when he’s needed.” Fred smiled a secret smile, and he winked playfully at Sarah, lightening the mood.

“So you and Zachariah both had a difficult time coming of age?” Sarah prompted.

“Day-to-day, this house remained a bubble, separate from the rest of the world. I believed nothing could ever really change here because there was an enchantment on the estate. I used to pretend that the stone wolves at the door were magical, and that they protected all who set foot inside from real evil. Zachariah was not a happy teenager, nor a happy young man, but he kept to himself, and he didn’t bother anyone. He lived by a code of morality so engrained that it defined his every action, his every word. I wonder sometimes, looking back, if he needed that code to keep himself in check from the darker impulses of his wolf.

“I was shaken from my childish pretenses that no ill could ever descend upon this house one April. Zachariah was 17. I had assumed the role, some time earlier, of assistant butler. It all happened so fast, I still wonder that it was within the span of a single month. First came Naomi Leaven. She was young and rich and polished. She attended a party at the house for the youth of the church the Novaks attended. She wasn’t beautiful by any stretch of the imagination, but she was shrewd. She dressed well, spoke well, she was charming, gracious, charismatic, and the single most ambitious person I’ve ever met. She took perhaps twenty minutes to appraise Zachariah, and then she went to work on him. He toppled very quickly, and the two were engaged to mate within the week. In those days, it was tradition that high society youth announce their intent to mate, and allow for a Primate-style engagement. That allowed both families to delve into any unsavory aspects of their own child’s intended, calling off the engagement before it’s too late if any off color details were unearthed.”

“Virtually everything about their union was indeed ghastly,” he agreed. “Perhaps the best that could be said was that they shared their dislike of each other to enough of an extent that neither was left heartbroken when the dust settled. What they had in common was their religious devotion, their business aspirations, and their shrewdness. But where Zachariah was private and insular, Naomi was extremely social. Where he had no time for social climbing, that was possibly the only thing she truly valued. In him, in the Novaks, her path was paved to have power, wealth, and standing. As a beta and a second child, she couldn’t count on inheriting from her family. She found Zachariah a monumental weight around her neck, but he was the one with the money and the business connections, and so she went after him with everything she had.”

“What else happened that April?” Sarah reminded him gently.

He looked up at her from where he’d been staring into his lap, and he took another sip of water, using the action to look away.

“My father had accompanied beta Allen and the chauffeur into town to help attend him at the tailor. It was quite a normal outing for them. Beta Novak preferred to have his own butler’s hands present to assist rather than rely on the tailor who wouldn’t be there every day in the same way. They had done exactly the same thing countless times in the past. This time, none of them came home. They were all three killed in a collision. I was 23 at the time, well into my adult years, but it felt as if I’d been orphaned as a young child. Having never known my mother at all, I felt the loss of my father terribly, and had I not been employed here already, I don’t know what I would’ve done.”

“I’m so sorry,” said Sarah sincerely.

“It is perhaps true, at least for me, that if you really wish to understand Lupins as a species, you have to watch them mourn,” Fred said unexpectedly. “Gertrude and Allen were True-Mates. She loved him intensely. She was unabashed about showing him affection whenever and wherever she chose, and there was a solidity, a predictability about that that made everyone here feel stronger, wolf or ape either one. She adored him. He adored her. And he was submissive to her in all kinds of simple ways that, as a young gay man, I felt honored to be allowed to witness and line my sense of self with in how flagrantly it broke the heteronormative patriarchal mold. He was unashamed of his submission. It was his privilege to offer her that. It was his gift. And it was a quiet, simple, elegant thing, not a coarse, raucous, debasement.

“When Allen died, when George and my father died, Gertrude mourned. At first, I didn’t realize what I was seeing because I was so very lost myself, but over time some things became clear. Gertrude surrounded herself with all of his possessions, anything that might hold his scent. She wore his clothing, the little bits that fit her. She spoke of him and of my father constantly, until it hurt me too much to be near her. I began to avoid her, but she sought me out. She brought her wider pack family to stay at the house, and they sat together for hours in silence, just breathing, and she included me in as much of that as my duties would allow.

“It was very different from the way we Primates mourn, at least as far as I’ve seen. She did it intentionally, with a fury and a steadfast purpose that was a little frightening, and she kept it up for ages, years. Every day there was a part of her day that was turned toward him, and she never stopped seeking me out to surround me in her presence. And it helped. It made the hurt hurt so badly, that it flamed up and consumed me, but she was always there. She spent hours alone with Zachariah, sharing scents, sharing pain. Looking back, it’s really impossible to describe. I can’t imagine what it’s like to lose a True-Mate except to have stood witness to the rubble in the aftermath.”

“And Zachariah?”

Fred’s facial expression, torn into a grimace of remembered agony, smoothed to a closed-off mask. He took a deep breath. “Zachariah Mated Naomi in May. They didn’t have a honeymoon. He Mated her on a Tuesday with no fanfare, and then attended his studies the next day. They both enrolled at Kansas University for college, so they could continue to live here. Zachariah loved his father, and he mourned too, but there was a notable difference. He had internalized all of the lessons his parents taught him about upright living in a social strata at the top, but he only listened to the lessons of the mind. He ignored everything they had to teach him about how to nurture the heart. It didn’t help that one of the last things his father saw to was to have both Zachariah and Naomi tested to determine the characteristics of their internal wolves. I suspect beta Allen was hoping, as a last ditch effort, to discover that they were incompatible from a Tertiary standpoint. Of course, had Allen liked Naomi, he wouldn’t have cared how her wolf compared with his son’s. He died before the results were published, and Zachariah didn’t attend the consultation.

“At the loss of his father, Zachariah turned even more deeply inward. He was never overtly unkind, that I saw, but he was cold. His business sense and his need for order commanded most of his attention. And his mother was still Alpha, of course, but Zachariah took over most of the Pack business, day to day. He promoted me to Head Butler, and he assumed control of the various business initiatives. He left Naomi to her own devices, which mostly meant making social connections and planning parties that neither Gertrude nor Zachariah attended more than they had to.”

“And then Gabriel was born,” Sarah cut off her notes to look up at him.

His face had dropped twenty years in a flash. He was outright grinning.

“Oh, lord, he was a terror, wasn’t he?” she guessed.

“Gabriel was the life and the breath that this house was sorely lacking for so long,” Fred admitted happily. “His grandmother came back to life the moment she laid eyes on him. She doted on him, carried him, fed him, bathed him, rarely left his side. Naomi’s response to that was very Lupin. She couldn’t assert her rights to her son over the will of the Alpha. Some things are engrained within them to the point that no amount of assimilation can break it, and hierarchy is the strongest impulse of all, I’ve found. Naomi was devastated to lose custody of her son, and before you jump to conclusions, let me assure you that she had not lost custody. Gertrude was smitten, and rarely put the child down, but had she realized that her actions hurt Naomi, she would have backed off. I’m certain of it. But Naomi is a hateful woman, and she imagines that everyone, especially her mother-in-law share her vitriol, and she would never have lowered herself to go begging for her son back. It was a simple misunderstanding, a strange happenstance where too much adoration for the same child caused a rift that never healed.”

“That’s horrible!” Sarah interjected, making a face.

“Naomi is a mystery to me, I admit,” said Fred. He paused and seemed to be thinking. “All of this that I’m telling you, Alpha Castiel has promised me a free tongue, and has promised to review your notes before he allows you to publish words that could harm this Pack. I need to be sure that you understand my loyalty to him is unwavering.”

Sarah nodded, she hoped in a comforting manner. “Yes, Sam explained the limits. I’m not going to use anything you tell me in a way that could hurt the Pack. I’m not looking to write a tell-all book. I just want to understand why the violence, the rape, is acceptable. You have my word I’ll be careful”

He nodded distractedly and took another deep breath and another sip of water. Sarah hadn’t touched hers. “In a Primate family,” he went on at last. “It might be expected that a situation like this could cause friction between the two women, but that the mother would ultimately win out and assert her rights to parent the child. Some families recover, and some harbor resentments forever. Some mothers may not have any ill feelings at all.”

Sarah nodded.

“In a wolf pack, the Alpha’s rights are supreme. If the Alpha takes a liking to a pup and assumes its care, their instincts lead the mother to surrender the pup and the Alpha to assume the role of parent. It happened very quickly. Gabriel was no more than six months old when I realized that Naomi had relinquished all of his care to Gertrude. She abandoned her son entirely, emotionally and physically. And when Gertrude sickened a few months later, Zachariah assumed control as Alpha, and Gertrude died in her sleep. At that point, it was too late for Gabriel. Naomi wanted nothing to do with him. His care fell to nannies, many of them Primates, like me.”

“Oh, God. Poor Gabriel…”

“You must understand the push-pull of the wolf’s instincts never lets up,” Fred said on top of her dismay. “Having witnessed it from the inside my entire life, I can attest honestly, that the worst of the damage that wolves do to one another is when that push-pull collides with their attempts to assimilate into Primate society.”

“How so?” Sarah challenged. “You said that Naomi abandoned her son through instinct.”

“I did, but had she been fully invested in listening to her instinct, she would have been invested in the Pack emotionally and wired to protect all of its members in their need. When Gertrude died, Naomi’s instincts will have been urging her to take him back up and tuck him close as her son. I believe that Naomi arrived at Zachariah’s doorstep already severely damaged by her own parents’ attempts to assimilate. She was taught that the impulses of her wolf were a weakness to be destroyed, and indeed, the one time she heeded her instinct, it meant the irrevocable loss of her own son.”

“Irrevocable?” said Sarah, astonished. “He’s right here!”

“Not to Naomi. Her bitterness is a bottomless pit, and her vengeance is limitless. She turned her powerlessness at Gertrude into relentless spite aimed at Gabriel. I watched it helplessly, trying my level best to provide him warmth in a way that didn’t overstep my role. We all did. But Gabriel was resilient and beautiful. He inherited his mother’s charisma, his father’s shrewdness, his grandfather’s devotion to family, and his grandmother’s zest for life. He is a delight to know, and he has been his whole life.”

“And then Castiel was born,” Sarah said into the lingering silence.

Fred huffed a laugh, and then looked haunted. “You can imagine what it must have been like to bring Castiel into the pack, but you would probably imagine wrong,” he said laughing quietly. “Castiel is his own person. He’s the stubbornest person I’ve ever known. And I’ve neglected to mention that while Zachariah had no interest in understanding his own Keller score, he was in fact, exceptional for the time, and others wanted desperately to study him. I assume, as a researcher yourself, you’re familiar with his scores.”

“Zachariah’s? Yes, I am.”

“What those scores mean within the construct of the pack is something I very much hope is changing. Zachariah was, as I said, cold and distant. He was a strict disciplinarian, and a bulwark for the Pack. Anyone who wanted to approach his family had to face Zachariah first, and few made it through. Internally, Zachariah suffered massively. His Tertiary aspect, as we understand it now, found very few outlets for rebalance. He had almost no relationship with his mate to speak of. They didn’t share a bedroom, although he insisted she accompany him while he was in Rut. Sarah, if you’re concerned about rape among Lupins, I more than suspect that what happened during Zachariah’s Rut was criminal rape. What you’ve witnessed yourself was much more likely to have been mutually beneficial, mutually consensual rebalancing. Lupins NEED rebalancing on occasion. Without it, they devolve into irrational and nonsentient beasts. I’ve seen it happen. I watched it happen to Alpha Zachariah. I watched it happen much more slowly to his mate. What rebalancing Zachariah found often came through his endeavors to raise upstanding sons.”

“He was abusive?”

“No, not as such. But it seemed that when they’d earned a spanking, every now and then he seemed to allow a trickle, perhaps more than a trickle, of his wolf into the events as they unfolded. I doubt he could help himself, despite being a master of self-control most of the time. I worried about the boys when they were very young, and I stayed close while Alpha applied his hand or his strap. I never once saw him cross the line from discipline to abuse, but you know as well as I that that is a hazy line at best.”
Fred pondered for a moment, and then sighed, years and years of unsaid thoughts spoke themselves into oblivion on that sigh.

“When Gertrude died, I considered leaving my post and looking elsewhere for work. It seemed that all of the simple goodness that made the house a home for me was gone, but Gabriel needed me, and he was such a happy child, I couldn’t leave him to be destroyed by a mother who can’t love him. I came to realize that Zachariah needed me as much as the children did, and in a way, I needed them too. House service was all I knew. This house was my home even if I never slept here. And now, if you’ll pardon me, I need to see about assisting Tony in serving dinner.”

It was a startling end to the interview, and Sarah realized she never got to her most important question.

“Fred, please! How can you stand by and watch them hurt one another the way they do? How can you take that in and think it’s okay?”

He stood, but he smiled down at her. “Sarah, I don’t stand by and watch. That would be sublimely rude. I’ll share with you what my father taught me. First, ignore your own gut. You aren’t a wolf, and you can’t feel what they feel. Second, moans of pleasure mean walk away. Moans or cries of unexpected pain mean stand out of sight but close at hand and await the outfall. Crashes of breakage mean come running. We don’t interfere in their exchanges. We don’t offer them advice unless they ask for it, and then only if we have decades of experience to lean on. We don’t pretend to understand what they sense from each other. We follow instruction and protocol.”

“What if something goes terribly wrong? How would you know?”

He chuckled. “When you’ve seen as much of it as I have, you know. It’s really not that complicated.”

“What is your overall impression of Castiel? Would you tell me if it was less than complimentary?”

“My dear, if I had less than complimentary insights into the Alpha, I would not have been granted license to speak frankly with you in the first place. But if you want my honest answer, serving as a Primate witness to all sorts of Lupine behaviors and coping mechanisms, healthy and otherwise, I sincerely believe that Alpha Castiel is both as good an Alpha and as powerful a man as he seems, and that his vision is a good one. Is it the best possible? I don’t know. What I do know is that his parents, even his grandparents were crippled in a way he’s refused to be, and everything he’s done for his species has made a tremendous difference both in the macrocosm and the microcosm. I would do anything for him, if that tells you what you want to know. And Sarah, I’ve seen him release his wolf upon another person. It is terrifying, make no mistake. But it is meant to be terrifying. What would be worse would be for him to release it arbitrarily on an innocent, and that I’ve never seen, nor will I.”

“How can you be sure?” She stood and followed him slowly to the door as he opened it for her. All sounds from down the hall had ceased.

“Because I know who he is, and I trust him. Don’t we all make the same calculation about each other every day? You’re no alpha, Sarah, but what’s to stop you from taking a butcher’s knife and stabbing my husband to death while he sleeps beside me one night? You’re physically strong enough.”

They walked slowly down the hall. Sarah had turned her recorder off, but she left it with her notes in the living room.
“That’s an oversimplification,” she countered.

“Is it? Or is it merely a lack of familiarity on your part? Wolves seem unstable and unpredictable to you because you’re not yet familiar with their patterns and their rules. For me, I find Primates far more violent and unpredictable.”

They descended the stairs together.

“You mentioned that you’re married. Did you have children?”

“No,” he said simply. “David wasn’t interested in being a parent. He had a much rougher childhood than I did, and many of the scars followed him into adulthood. I can’t complain though. We’ve had a very full life, and I got to raise two boys who grew into exceptional men. I hope I’ve been of some assistance. If you’ll excuse me.” Fred disappeared through a back hallway, leaving Sarah in the parlor where Sam and Jess were waiting for her.

“Oh, the pups!” gushed Sarah. “May I?”

“Knock yourself out,” Jess told her. “I’ve had my fill today. Hank won’t stop crying.”

Sarah cooed at him and clucked her tongue as she lifted the squalling twin to her shoulder. “They’ve grown so much!”

The small bassinet they were in was on wheels, so Sam pushed it toward the kitchen. “Did Fred have some good insights for you, Sarah?” he asked over his shoulder. She followed him, and Jess took up the rear. The kitchen was bursting with activity.

“Yes, he did. I understand now why Castiel took exception to offering him up for feedback without running it by the Alpha first. He was very candid.”

“All my childhood exploits, out in plain view for Dr. Meyer to pick through?” asked Cas, handing off a basket of bread rolls to April.

“No, sir. Nothing like that,” Sarah told him with her eyes on the pup at her shoulder. Somehow looking at his face was a challenge after seeing him at his leisure in his own house under the attentions of his own Submissive. Dean, for his part was arguing with Tony about whether the sauce needed more salt or not. His clothes were back on, and he didn’t move as if his backside was sore. Unlike Sam, who still had a stiffness about his gait. “Although he was quite open about your family history. I’ll leave my recordings and my notes for your review when I go.”

“I appreciate that courtesy, Sarah. Won’t you join us? Dean, leave it alone. You can add more salt to your own portion at the table if you must.”

Dinner wasn’t what Sarah had expected either. It was exactly like any formal dinner hosted by any patriarch anywhere. Michael and April teased (flirted?). Dean ate two full plates and endured ribbing from his mate about which of them was eating for two. Cas had a way of steering the conversation away from topics that touched too many nerves. Sarah was reminded of a ship’s captain making minor adjustments to the rudder to wend a way through dangerous waters. Gabriel had a funny quip at hand whenever Michael needed tweaking. Sarah sat between April and Kali. She watched the subtle interplay between Castiel and his mate. It was clear they had a connection that no one else could witness, and there was a warmth to the way they interacted that was soothing to watch. Sarah felt a little voyeuristic.

“So, tell me,” began Castiel, helping himself to another roll and passing the basket to April. “If he didn’t spill all my childhood secrets, what did Fred have to say?”
“Oh, well, he…” Sarah took a roll and passed the basket to Kali. “…told me a lot of your history, like I said. Somewhere in there, I feel like I learned a great deal about Lupins, but it’s going to take me some time to analyze the details.”

“Of course. We’re a complicated species.” Cas buttered his roll, and then tore it in half and placed half on April’s plate.

“He has a great deal of faith in you, sir.”

“I’ve had to earn every ounce of trust the hard way, Sarah,” Cas responded. “Something’s still eating you though. Out with it. Friday Pack dinners are for meaningful discussion. You’re here, so you’re Pack. Let’s talk about it. What are you concerned about?”

Sarah frowned. Everyone was looking at her. Here in this posh space where every fiber was positioned with intent, it seemed silly to worry about violence. About rape. “Sir, what’s to keep a Top ranked wolf from committing atrocities in the name of Pack hierarchy. We Primates can’t sense the difference. How can we, can I, be sure that what I’ve witnessed is really a necessary thing, and not an abuse of power?”

Castiel set his utensils down and thought carefully. “I’m not sure how to answer that, Sarah.”

“Pshhh!” came from Dean at the end. “Why does it matter if an ape can tell or not?” he asked. “As long as the wolves in the vicinity don’t get their panties in a wad, you can go about your business.” He spoke with his mouth full, and then paused to swallow. “Like at the party. Don’t think I didn’t see you freak.”

“It’s a bigger question than that, alpha,” Michael added. “All of this is great as long as we keep ourselves separate from the apes, but if we’re ever going to be successful at integrating with them, we can’t ignore that question. It’s really the heart of everything.”

“Exactly,” said Sam. “We can tell the Primate populations that what they’re witnessing isn’t destructive, but let’s be honest, in certain circumstances, that might not be true. We can’t lull people into walking calmly past an actual assault and not realize what it is. We have to be able to define the difference so they can judge for themselves.” Sam put up a hand at Dean’s intended interruption. “And they can’t just go by how the other wolves respond. Sometimes there aren’t any other wolves.”

“To really answer your question directly, Sarah,” said Cas. “What keeps us from committing violence upon our own people is the same thing that prevents Primates from doing the same. There are the internal connections between people that leads us to care for rather than harm each other. There are our internalized value systems. There’s the sense of self-preservation that tells us that the more violence there is in the world, the more likely we are as individuals to fall prey to it ourselves. There are laws, of course, but those are not really a deterrent, more a means of applying consequences in standardized form after the fact. I could well ask you the same question.” He paused and looked up. “Yes, please, Fred. Coffee for me. None for Dean or April. Everyone else may decide as they like.” He focused back on Sarah. “What keeps you from harming others in the absence of witnesses, for that is the heart of your question, since Primates make unreliable witnesses to Canid behaviors?”

She sighed. “Morality, I guess. It’s against my religious strictures. It’s antithetical to who I am.” She faded out with a thoughtful look.

“Well, there you go,” said Gabriel. “You answered your own question. Potatoes, please Sam. I’m starving.”
“Dean, Pet,” Castiel said in a quiet voice. Dean looked up. “You’re through eating. Go downstairs please and wait for me. Leave your clothing here.”

“Yes, Sir.” It was said with a grin, and Sarah’s face pinked as he stripped off before bolting out.

Cas lowered his face into his warm cup of coffee, so he missed the quick look April shot toward Michael and the baffled look Michael shot back followed by a quick look up the table at the Alpha.

“Whatever you’re planning, Kitten. Go ahead with it. But that’s ‘One’.” Or perhaps he hadn’t missed it.

“Yes, Alpha,” she said into her lap with a smile.

“Pie, miss?” asked Fred at her elbow.

“Yes, please,” she answered trying to puzzle out why April and Cas both looked pleased, and Michael looked ready to run for it.

“Sarah,” Cas broke her out of her reverie. “You have one hour with Jessica and no more. Leave your recorder and your notes in the living room where they are. Fred will be gone by then, so Sam will see you out and take responsibility to see that you don’t leave my house with anything I’ve asked you to leave for my review.”

“Of course, Alpha. Thank you for your hospitality. I won’t disappoint you.”

Cas tilted his head a bit as he studied her. “No. I don’t believe you will.”

The rush of warmth was at odds with her determination to stay objective. God, he was a powerful warrior and a wounded puppy all at once, and she thought it might kill her if she ever had to disappoint him. Luckily, she had no such intention. And apparently, he knew that. Damn the man and his intuition.

Gabe snickered.

Chapter End Notes

First, the author mentioned something about there being shorter chapters from this point on...then we LAUGHED and LAUGHED!!!

Be well, take care of yourselves and each other. Drop a note if you want.
Chapter 100

Chapter Summary

Fred's got a bone to pick. April needs a duet partner. Sarah's whittling down to the core of it all. And Cas needs someone to vent his spleen on. Who, oh, who could that turn out to be? Oh, and Michael's awash in pregnancy hormones.

Oh. And Happy 100 to all of us. :)

Chapter Notes

Stop right here and go back one chapter to catch the link that I forgot to post in the pre-chapter notes. It's a preview of April's 'Witch' song. I stole it, but whatever.

I owe a huge debt of thanks to mljmorris for talking me through how rigorous the interview process is for a PhD candidate while she's gathering supporting data from a live subject. I would make a terrible PhD student. Fuck that, let's just tell each other stories. Sorry, Michelle.

To all of my friends who are going through something right now, and that's more than a few of you, this escape is for you. You know who you are, and if you're not sure you're included, I assure you, you are.

This chapter comes with all the hugs in my body!

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

Chapter 100 – Friday, August 18, 2017

NOW:

Castiel sat alone in his office, waiting. Fred would check in before he left for the day, and Cas expected he was in for an earful. He felt like a right prick, and Fred wasn’t one to let that go without comment.

Dean could wait.

Would wait.

Fred didn’t bother knocking.

“If that is everything you require, Alpha, I will retire for the evening. The house is in repose for the most part. Sam has the little ones. Jess and Sarah are settled. April and Michael are in the Conservatory with their heads together. Gabriel and…"

“Fred, stop. I get it. I don’t need a cast list.”

“Very good, Sir. I will return on Monday morning unless you require me over the weekend. I will see you again on Tuesday when you return from your journey.” He stood framed by the door – not leaving. Waiting to be dismissed.

Cas ran a hand over the back of his neck and stood to cross in front of his desk and settle his weight there. Better if he started it off. Right?

“I’m sorry I had to ask that of you,” he said with his head down just a little, gazing unfocused at Fred’s wedding ring. The wrinkled hands clasped so politely in front of the man was one of those ineffable constants in Castiel’s life. “You’ve always given more than I had a right to ask you for, and this was…probably a step too far. Please know that I am grateful. I know what it cost you.”

“Do you?” asked Fred, stepping in and closing the door. He stood before Castiel, straight-backed and dignified.

“Was it that hard to be truthful?” joked the Alpha in return, more than a shade too light for the sharp look in Fred’s eye. “I need her to understand, and the things you’ve seen… Fred, you know more about us than anyone. She can’t hurt you. She can’t hurt me.”

“She can hurt you, if you let her, Alpha; if you open yourself up to that possibility, and what’s more, she can hurt Gabriel. I beg you to consider someone other than yourself for a change.” Fred’s eyes flashed angry. Rarely did he take Castiel directly to task, but he’d never hesitated when he felt a threat to his Pack.

Cas didn’t stir. He sank down inside himself and considered. “What did you tell her?” he asked at last.

“Probably very little that you expected me to,” the butler responded cryptically. “But you’ll hear it for yourself in the morning.” Fred’s eyes suddenly turned uncharacteristically dark and unsure. “I would like to warn you,” he added. “The recording may contain pieces of your family’s history of which you are not yet aware. It involves Gabriel in his infancy. You should gird yourself.”

Castiel’s face paled. “Thank you for the warning.”

“I did my best, Alpha, at your instruction, but I cannot leave without being certain you understand what you’ve required of me, and of what it cost. A butler has no higher duty than to protect and defend the privacy and the sanctity of the family he serves.”

“I know, Fred…I’m…”

“No, pup. I believe you don’t know. It is my sworn obligation – my responsibility! – My CALLING! …to defend this pack from filchers of private affairs, and I’ve just contaminated myself for you and your need to control everything! I am debased, Castiel. And I did it for you. You owe me more than you can repay.” Fred’s iron-toned voice plated a steel cage around Castiel, and the Alpha’s jaw dropped suitably. He was speechless.

Fred held his eyes for a moment, a long, brutal moment that incorporated all their long years together and robbed Castiel of his sense of authority. He was six years old and busted with his hands in Fred’s personal bag, looking innocently for sweets, but about to be schooled in the inviolability of other people’s dignity.
At last, Cas dropped his eyes, chastened. “Apologies, my friend. But as painful as it is, what I asked of you was necessary. She needs to understand. You have served this Pack well your whole life, and that is not in question tonight any more than any other night, but you are the only one who remembers. I will protect Gabriel as I always have.”

“Protect yourself as well, Sir,” the old man reminded him gently, his ire spent, his eyes easy. Cas nodded, his own demeanor back in place, if a little shaken.

“When you listen to the recording tomorrow,” Fred said, turning toward the door. “Keep in mind that your grandmother cast an intimidating presence, but that she meant no harm, especially not to Gabriel. Keep in mind that sometimes, in our selfishness, we of powerful persona may trample loved ones underfoot without ever seeing them there. It is a lesson that could resonate down through the years, if we are amenable to hear it.”

Castiel’s brow pulled down in confused apprehension.

“Also, Sir, I must confess to having been dishonest with Miss Blake at one juncture.” Fred put his hand on the knob and looked up at Cas. “I explained to her that we in House Service routinely keep our advice to ourselves unless requested to give it. I admit that wasn’t a truthful statement on my part, but I beg you to overlook the lie in this instance given the purpose of the interview.”

“You’re a treasure, Fred,” sighed Cas – subtextually saying, ‘I love you like a father’. Fred would hear it loud and clear. “I’d be lost without you.” Fred nodded serenely and turned to leave but paused as Cas went on softly to himself: “I can’t always tell anymore,” he muttered. “…When I’m using people, and when I’m not. I’m starting to lose the difference.”

Fred chuckled. “Then I’ll be sure to remind you, Castiel James.” And then he was gone.

Michael finished the dishes with Sam and hung the dish towel up neatly. He checked his phone. April was adamant he join her in the Conservatory, but Michael hadn’t spent enough time with his nephews lately, and he missed them.

A look into the bassinet spoiled his plan. They were both fast asleep. His phone pinged again.

Sam snickered. “She’s nothing if not persistent,” the beta commented, reading her summons over Michael’s shoulder. “Go on and see what she wants. These two won’t stir again until eleven or so. They’re dead to the world.”

“I’ll help you get them upstairs,” Michael told him, collecting J.T. into his arms without waking the pup.

Sam looked over the little black ball of fur in her enclosure. Portia was happily settled in her fluffy bed, not managing more than a couple of thumps of her tail for Sam. He chuckled and hoisted the bassinet with Hank still sleeping inside, following the Omega up to his room at the top of the stairs. “Are you worried at all about what Jess might tell the Primate?” Michael asked as he resettled J.T. next to his brother.

“Who Sarah? No, not a bit. She’s finally starting to make some progress in her understanding of our culture. I think this could be a real breakthrough for her, if she’s willing to listen.”

“You like her,” Michael deduced, watching Sam’s face. “A lot.”
Sam gave it a little thought. “Yes, I really do. She’s got a good heart. She’s smart and tenacious. She could do our movement a lot of good…”

“Or royally fuck us back to the dark ages,” put in Michael.

“Don’t be a cynic,” Sam chided. “She’s got her eyes wide open. She’ll figure it out. Have some faith.”

Michael’s phone chirped again, twice in quick succession, and Sam laughed.

“Speaking of tenacious,” the beta teased, and Michael pulled a face. “What’s she on about?”

“I’m not sure. Probably trying to take advantage of our mates’ absence tonight to do something else wedding related. She loves planning surprises. I haven’t packed yet though…” Michael faded out as he tested his bonds. Dean had them pinched tight. Soon he would shutter them completely. Michael and April both had the night to themselves as they often did when the engaged couple made time for themselves.

Michael was much less excited to take advantage of that than he had once been. Things had changed.

“Michael?”

“Hmm?” Michael was focused inside his own head. He’d forgotten Sam.

“I’m fine here for the night. You should go see what she wants.”

“Yeah, yeah. I’m going. You’re sure you don’t need anything? I mean, you could wheel them down the hall and keep me company while I pack.”

Sam gave him a wary look. “Are you afraid to go downstairs by yourself?”

Michael flustered, offended. “I’m not afraid, beta! Don’t be stupid.”

“Look,” said Sam calmly. “I know all about the mess you guys made of yourselves. It’s natural to feel cautious about sticking your hand back into the flames once they’ve burned you, but surely she’s not…”

“No! She’s not,” shot Michael. “Are you settled here, Sam? Do you need me to bring you anything?” His words snapped, and his face closed.

“I’m fine, man,” Sam told him smoothly, laying a soft blanket over both sleeping bodies.

“Good,” Michael snipped, and he fled.

Stupid Sam. Stupid April. Now the whole fucking house knew he was on the hook and caught in his own net. Michael stormed down the stairs, into the Conservatory, and confronted the girl, advancing on her aggressively. She straightened, and her eyes flew wide.

“I thought we agreed you would leave me out of your stupid games!” he spat. “What the fuck do you want, and why was it necessary to put me in the line of fire again? I just got myself untangled, no thanks to you! Now Cas thinks we’re meeting in secret! What was with all the goo-goo eyes at the table? Are you insane?”

“What…Why are you angry? I just wanted to take advantage of the privacy to work on our duet. For the wedding?” She took a couple of tentative steps backward toward the piano bench.
“What duet?” His brain had skittered to a stop. It came out like an indictment.

She grinned. “I wrote a song. I think you might like it. I want to sing it with you on stage at the reception while they dance their first dance. Michael, I need you to do this with me. Here, sit. Listen.”

She sat him down on the loveseat nearest the piano bench, and then she settled herself. She began to play a tune, an unfamiliar one, and Michael’s brow knit in consternation.

“Pete…”

“Shhh! Just listen!” She played on.

“No, we shouldn’t do this here. Cas is still in his office, I think. He’ll hear. It won’t be a surprise. We should go up to the piano in the Game room.”

She laughed. “Now who’s trying to meet in secret?” She continued playing, vocalizing softly and watching his face as he thought. Then she began to sing quietly, and his eyes narrowed.

“You want me to sing this with you?” he asked, scooting closer to the edge of the couch, clearly fighting an impulse to go to her. “In public?”

She smirked into the lyric a little, but then went back to a simple delivery. It was slow and thoughtful. It bespoke pain and distance, coming to a deeper connection from places of fear and rejection. It spoke of core-deep acceptance after years of rebuff, and it made Michael’s soul shimmer with promise. He wanted desperately to sit beside the girl, to look into her eyes and ask her in song to open herself to him, but his feet wouldn’t move. He wanted to fall wholesale into the words her lips spoke, into the melody that lifted and carried him, and he fought the yearning that battled anger inside him. She wasn’t singing it to him anyway.

He imagined a sparkling black dance floor, sprinkled with colorful autumn leaves, where the two men they loved would dance. Slowly. Deliberately. Intentionally. And he envisioned the stage: Pete at the piano, himself standing at the end of the keyboard, wearing a crisp tuxedo and with a microphone in his hand. His eyes would be fixed on the couple turning slowly alone in the spotlight.

He could see it.

Clearly.

Too clearly.

And it hurt. God, it hurt.

April ended the song. She looked at him, the distance between them meaningless.

“Sing it with me? Please, Michael?”

Michael was never going to be able to deny her anything. He nodded, still perched precariously on the edge of the cushion.

God, what an ass he was. Totally befuddled. A complete fool for a girl. What was the word?

Twitterpated.

Right? From Bambi? And that was Michael now. Lost to his own machinations.
He still didn’t know how Castiel had caught on to him. He’d been making careful, stealthy moves on Pete over those two months, but they’d all been in secure moments just like this one, when all the bond links went dark to allow the alphas their privacy.

Privacy.

It had its uses. And he’d been careful to let a good night’s sleep cover his tracks from the night before, snuggled safe in her arms in a way that was wholesome in the morning light.

“Michael, it’s okay,” her voice brought him back to the present.

He breathed deeply, grounding his feet, clenching his fingers into the soft cushion. “Is it?” he asked softly. He felt achingly sad suddenly. What the fuck was wrong with him, and when had he become so very lost?

“Sweetheart, it is,” she assured him.

A sob broke over his Adam’s apple, and he curled into himself, hiding his tears. Damned pregnancy hormones. April’s warm hand slid into his, and her scent surrounded him. He reached for her, and he pulled her close, weeping pitifully.

“It’s all right, Michael,” Pete whispered into his ear. “Breathe my scent. I’m here. I know it hurts.”

“What’s wrong with me?” he wondered aloud, holding so tightly onto her that it had to be painful. She crooned soft words at him and stroked his hair.

“Nothing at all, baby. Nothing’s wrong with you. You overflow sometimes, just like I do. Let it out, Michael. It’s fine. I’m here.”

“Please don’t leave me, Pete,” he begged, feeling weak, feeling broken. Images struck again…a bloody medical glove, a forlorn beta mate alone in shock on a hard-plastic chair, a pale Alpha doctor with no words of comfort, a warm Omega pianist in his arms…

Michael clung to her.

The wave of powerful emotion passed slowly, and it left Michael staring out the far window and down the lawn. His chin rested on top of her head, and his hand held hers in a light touch, the clutching gone, the tears wiped clear. They both sat still, tangled together, coming down, calming down.

“I’m sorry,” he told her after a very long silence.

“What on earth have you got to be sorry for?” she wondered from beneath him. “It’s my fault. If anyone should be sorry…but I’m not sorry.”

“Pete.”

She huffed a laugh. “You still think I’m Peter Pan?”

They still weren’t looking at each other. The air went crystalline, as if they were caught in an antique snow globe and the wrong motion would destroy the stillness and the perfection.

“I took advantage of you,” he said.
“I liked it,” she admitted. “It felt good to be pursued.”

He laughed at hearing her mirror his words. They’d become so intertwined in their plays to trap each other that it was no longer possible to tell where one started and the other ended. He took another clumsy swipe at his eyes to dry them. He wanted nothing of his breakdown to show, just in case Castiel checked in on them before heading downstairs and locking himself in with Dean for the night.

Michael was entrapped so tightly at this point that he was hopeless ever to find a way out. And April, the same. It was such a disaster though. There was nothing innocent about what they’d done to each other. A therapist combing backward through each carefully laid trap would be dismayed that they could even begin to trust one another.

Michael had seized on every opportunity, every time the alphas locked their door and their minds behind them, so they could play hard, every millisecond of privacy when his connection to Dean went dark. Had seized those moments to lay his traps. Like a spider. Like a troll under the bridge.

But in all that scheming, he’d never crossed their lines. He’d been so very, very careful. Don’t touch. And he hadn’t. Neither had she. Cuddling in an Omega Pack bed was allowed, and God, how they made use of that little allowance.

Dean hadn’t guessed the half of it. Castiel probably knew, but he was clearly going to play his hand out slowly over time, not all in one flop.

But the sticky web Michael spun around his prey had turned on him, catching his arms, his legs, up in a tangle he didn’t feel tightening in on him until it was too late, only then to realize that his prey held all the ends in her tiny fists. She was a much greater spider than he.

No, they had never done a single thing that crossed the lines that were set by their alphas. Never once. Well, once. Michael’s mouth still watered sometimes as he recalled her kisses. Just that once. A single flare up of flame where there had been deepening smolder for too long – long enough that it couldn’t hold any longer.

But it had stopped there. One kiss. One moment of honesty, when their game broke through the facade, and they couldn’t pretend any longer. Maybe Michael had started it, and maybe it had been April. Each suspected the other. But neither of them was innocent, and neither of them had escaped the web in the end. And apologizing about it now was fruitless.

“IT’s all right to grieve, Michael,” she told him somberly. “I’m safe. You can lean on me when it gets too heavy to carry.’

She offered him an out, if he wanted it – a quick-release. His trauma still sat so heavy, and it overbalanced his top-heavy emotions often enough that it was a valid excuse for him to skate away on if he’d wanted that. Trauma and pregnancy combined in an Omega to make them tender to the touch. Michael was no exception, and he wasn’t going to pretend otherwise. But neither was he going to pretend that listening to her sing something that he knew she’d actually written for him – sing it in duet to their mates – didn’t hurt so much that his insides no longer felt solid.

Why did it have to hurt so much?

Why did it have to hurt at all?

Wasn’t his life a win now? Mated, impregnated, a toppled Alpha – just as he’d always imagined – a beautiful girl at his shoulder, deeply in love with the whole lot of them – wasn’t it enough? Why did it hurt? What was he still mourning?

Hadn’t he needed something to grow in beautiful light and not in darkness? Hadn’t he needed a love story he could tell his pups about in years to come? What did he have to tell them now? That he’d stolen something that wasn’t his to take? Was his love of this woman cheaper for its origination down in the muck of wrongness? Was he so lost to beauty that the only option to find it was to wrangle it away from someone else? Did he deserve the woman who sat warm between his knees? Would he ever?

“Shh, you’re thinking too hard,” Pete told him.

He huffed, and her hair moved.

“Look, if you don’t like the song, you could just tell me,” she said, and again he laughed.

“I loved it,” he said, pulling away and finding a grounding in her eyes. “It’s perfect.”

She studied his face for a moment, down on her knees before him. She reached out and smudged a thumb gently beneath his left eyelid. She smiled. “Not yet, Michael,” she said – a whisper. A secret.

“I know.”

“Come on.” She stood and pulled him to his feet. “Let’s make good use of tonight while they’re busy with each other. Come sing with me. I’ll go easy on you. I promise.” She led him out and up the wide stairs to the Game room where they could close the door and not announce their melody to the whole house just yet; where they could use the privacy offered up to them in the way it was always meant to be, in a way that held no shame in the aftermath.

It was a beautiful song.

The alphas were going to love it.

***************

Sarah set her recorder up again and settled back on the couch. Jess took her place opposite, open and ready. Sarah marked the date, the time, the site, and the identity of her interviewee. She had so many questions, and she only had an hour. It wasn’t enough. Perhaps she’d be granted a follow-up later.

Sarah was only a couple of simple questions in, background questions. They weren’t into the meat yet. A tap at the door preceded Fred’s head poking in.

“Pardon the interruption, ladies. I’m taking my leave. Do either of you require anything before I go?”

“Good night, Fred,” said Jess warmly. “Thank you for your help today.”

“Not at all, beta. Pups are exhausting to the strongest among us. I hope you sleep well tonight.” Jess beamed at him. The butler turned to Sarah. “Miss Blake, I must apologize for monopolizing our exchange earlier this evening.” He waved off her negating protest. “I would very much like to make it up to you and allow you to conduct an interview at your own pace. I know we never reached the details you need from me. Would you please allow me to showcase my beloved’s love of entertaining by accompanying us for dinner next week? You’ll have us both for the evening, and you may ask anything you like.”

Sarah was gobsmacked. “Fred, that would be delightful! Are you sure?”

“Absolutely.” He winked. He smiled a very unbutler-like smile. Was the old man flirting? Sarah grinned and saw Jess in her peripheral vision, mirroring.

“I wouldn’t miss it,” Sarah told him, flushing. He’d once been dashing, she could tell. Maybe David would show her some old photos.

After he was gone, Jess broke out in a belly laugh. Sarah turned a baffled look on her, delighted. “Have you ever…?”

“Never,” Jess assured her, laughing. “Sam is never gonna believe me. I want stories when you get back.”

Sarah saw Jess in a new light and wondered if the two of them could be friends. There was a mysterious light in there that spoke foreign words, words Sarah couldn’t translate, but words she felt compelled to dig after. Jess wasn’t like the others. She floated on a different plane somehow.

Sarah refocused and drew Jess back to the subject. They went through the beta’s history, through her upbringing, her experience with physical discipline as a child, her experience with the various aspects of Lupin culture… did her parents display their sex life in front of the pups (no, not really), did they raise their children with a strict hand (yes, quite), had she felt secure as a pup (definitely). Sarah went through these questions rapidly, marking places where deeper investigation was needed. Where had she lived? What was her family structure: A Pack or a nuclear, Primate-like family?

Then they moved from the whats, wheres, whens, and whys of her childhood into her adult life. What had she experienced in preparing for the Bar? Had she had biases to face? How did she overcome them?

Then they dove in more personally. Sarah asked Jess to describe what it felt like to be a wolf. How did she experience being a Submissive? How did she know it was an authentic aspect instead of implanted? What was it like to ‘fall’ or to ‘float’? What did she value about her connection to the Pack? Sarah asked for stories, and Jess delivered them: Her rage at being torn from the boy she’d hoped to mate. The strapping she took from her father after the tantrum she threw. Her illness. Her devastation when she realized she was barren. Her determination someday to return to Lawrence. Her plans, carefully followed, month by month. How fiercely she’d fought to gain the position in the Public Defender’s office that would let her come home to Sam. How living without a pack and without a Dominant left her feeling precarious in everything she tried to do. How nothing ever felt complete or satisfying in the absence of a firm, grounding hand. How frightened she was to think that Sam might already have Mated. How scared she was to face him at last.

It had been so long.

Sarah made notes and let Jess talk, listening carefully for important hints. She needed to delve further into the differences for the young woman in the three phases of her life: her childhood where her Lupin needs were handled for her, her early adulthood where they were neglected to the extreme, and her Mated life, where she and her mate worked in tandem to keep each other balanced. Sarah was finding a running vein of truth within the stories that she thought she could bring forward and highlight.

She would need much more from Jess about those years on her own. Sarah needed proof, not anecdotes. Would Castiel allow that? Had she left a data trail at all?
Her hour was running out, and she had so much left to ask. Even more than the data trail, tonight was supposed to be about finding a justification for what an ape had witnessed and put into a light that withstood scrutiny by other primates. Sarah pivoted.

She cut the beta off. “Jess, I’m still lost. I need you to help me understand…”

“Anything,” said the beta openly.

“He rapes you.”

Jess was shocked. “No, he doesn’t.” Her voice was cold steel. Her eyes flashed. “How dare you?!”

Sarah swallowed and tried again. “Explain it to me as you would a wolf pup.” She scooted forward, abandoning her pen, her hands holding each other in her lap. “Like you will explain it to your sons. I need to understand.”

“What’s to understand?” Jess asked back, baffled at the disconnect, suddenly closed off. Sarah was losing her. “He’s powerful. He’s rightfully powerful, and I’m strong enough to bear him at his full strength. Don’t you see how that makes me worthy? It makes me glorious! How is this hard to understand? Do you think me a weakling? Do you think I’m a wilting flower? Goddamn, but he’s beautiful when he’s furious. He’s completely unfettered. How many could stand before that and come out of it whole, not broken? You couldn’t. I know that much. You would crumple in a flat second. You would cry and scream and break in two. Not all of us are so weak. Some of us are wolves, Sarah. Wolves! Did you forget? We’re not peaceful monkeys picking lint off each other’s backs in the sunshine. We’re wolves!”

“Why do you need to be humiliated?” Sarah abandoned her questions, abandoned her plan. She let herself fall into Jessica’s brown eyes, hoping to discover the answer.

“Humiliated?! No! Humiliation would be to be carried with kid gloves, to be coddled like a child who cannot bear the brutality of the real world. Me? I am strong! I am unbreakable! You want to know how I can stand it? His power unleashed on me? God, how can you stand your mealy existence? Don’t judge me, sister! You’re not even truly alive! Have you ever been really challenged in your life? Have you ever once tested your mettle against a power so raw it should destroy you? You have no basis on which to judge me at all. You’re a pathetic facsimile of a living woman.”

Sarah’s jaw gaped. She wanted to protest. The gall. But the fire in Jess’ eyes was compelling.

“What’s it like?” Sarah heard herself ask, barely breathing. Jess’ smirk was everything but fair, but Sarah wanted to know. She knew Sam so well now, she could predict his words sometimes before he said them, but the beast inside him was still a mystery. She wanted to know.

“It’s liquid fire poured out on my body,” Jess told her calmly. “It takes all of my selfish desires and burns them to ash before my eyes, destroys so completely everything that I think I want, that there is nothing left but him. Only him. It’s a religious experience, and it’s a catharsis. It comes at the highest point of my most self-centered tantrums. Jesus, those get bad. It always feels like the world’s against me, and it enrages me, and then his arms encircle me, and he holds me down. And I fight. God, I fight. But the harder I fight, the tighter he holds. And everything burns, and I’m sure it’s the end of everything, but he’s strong, and he’s got me, and he rages so much greater than I can, and I realize when the pain peaks that he’s got me, not to drag me down, not to humiliate me, but to lift me up into brilliant flames, to wash me clean, and to give it all back, my self-control, my self-respect.

“We are wolves, Sarah. It may not always be easy to watch, but you don’t get to turn it into something ugly. It’s beautiful like an Old Testament purification. Don’t you people seek the same thing from that God of yours? Don’t monks up in the mountains try to flagellate themselves to regain their purity through pain? You think your God loves you, but he never comes down from his lofty throne to touch you, does he? Imagine having that God, the one you say loves you, love you so much he sleeps beside you every night and makes pasta salad for you when you’re exhausted. He’s a God, Sarah, not a man, and he chose me. And I’m strong enough to house him when he’s enraged. Are you strong enough to house your God?"

“Holy fuck,” whispered Sarah, forgetting the recorder.

No, this wasn’t helping to convince the researcher that the wolves were stable rational beings. This was insanity. Every cult leader with a hard-on had tried that line on his followers, and Jess’ tone held mockery on the aftertaste. How much was real?

Jess chuckled, coming back from her frenzy. “It’s really not that complicated,” she said in her courtroom voice, abandoning the mockery and laying it out as if it were the simplest concept possible. “I get tangled up in my own emotions sometimes, and the best way out of it is a painful flush. Sometimes spanking is enough, and sometimes it’s not. Sometimes, I need my own voices drowned into oblivion by a stronger, louder, more forceful entity, and I need a wash of real pain, a little fear... It takes a powerful flush of hormones to wash it all the way out.”

“How do you and Sam determine that it’s the right time?” Sarah took the offer to calm back down. She leaned back and picked her pen back up.

Sarah tried not to laugh, but it burst out anyway. What a bitch. She wondered again what it would be like to have Jess as a friend. Never dull, probably.

Sarah was missing the core somehow. It had seemed like they were so close, but Jess pulled the rug out from under her just at the critical moment. Dr. Meyer was going to review this recording and demand that she alter her thesis conclusion to match his opinion. He would gloat over it: he was right all along. They were uncivilized, and they needed to be saved from themselves. But Sarah wasn’t ready to concede that yet. It didn’t fit. It didn’t fit the statistics.

“Jess, what does it feel like if Sam doesn’t put you down when you need it?”

“Is that what you call it?” the beta asked, quirking a brow upward again, taunting. Sarah sighed, annoyed at herself for provoking her interview subject. So much for staying objective. So much for passively observing. Jess leaned in again, stage whispering. “Call it what it is, little one. It’s a Dom-i-na-tion. It’s a powerful and painful fucking, Sarah, right up the ass. Unprepped. And it hurts. Fuck, does it hurt. Have you ever been fucked raw in the ass without lube, without prep? It burns! It feels like you’re going to rip in two. And there’s sweat that isn’t yours trailing down your back, and there’s hot breath on your neck, and then his teeth clamp down, and his hands hold on impossibly tight, and OH, GOD, he growls right in your ear!”

“But that’s crazy! Jess, it’s crazy! That’s not healthy coping! Jesus, have you tried therapy?!”

Jess laughed loudly. Rudely. “Therapy?! And miss the sweetness of the power in his hands? Are you kidding? I wouldn’t give this up for anything! It’s...it’s incredible!”

“You...” Sarah frowned, looking deeply into Jess’ face. “You...want to be raped.” It wasn’t a question, it was a revelation. The piece fell into place. Jess wasn’t crazy, she wasn’t forced into anything, despite the appearance. It was a role play after all, only a spectacularly realistic one. “You…love it.”

“Now you’re getting it.” Jess sparkled. “Just don’t leave here thinking I’m brainwashed. I’ve had all of that from the monkey-troop I can stomach for one lifetime.”

“But you fought so hard.”

“Didn’t do me any good, did it?” Jess teased.

Sarah couldn’t stop the smile. She really wasn’t accustomed to interviewing someone so utterly shameless. “Talk me through it, beginning to end.”

Jess sighed, sad to have her fun cut short. Being a brat when there was no dominant at hand wasn’t any fun at all. “It’s always a last resort,” she admitted, dropping the taunts entirely, reading Sarah’s worries that Jess’ refusal to take the subject seriously might undermine the study if she didn’t straighten up. She flushed, imagining Sam’s displeasure if he found out Jess had run the Primate around in circles and not given her what she really needed. And Castiel. He’d be unimpressed in the extreme.

“Sam hates the whole practice, if you want to know the truth. It has to get really awful before he’ll go there, and to make him do it in public like he did; he would only do that if I was really hurting badly. If it was up to Sam, he’d put me in a hot bubble bath surrounded by flowers and feed me chocolates. But that’s not me, now is it?”

“I’m confused,” Sarah mused. “I thought True-Mates were sure to match sexually. How is it possible that you and Sam don’t share the same affinities? The same kinks…?” She let her question lead Jess forward, and the beta was suddenly uncomfortable.

“Jess?”

“I don’t know,” Jess admitted.

Sarah looked back at her notes. The little box by ‘True-Mates’ near the top of the questionnaire was checked. She looked up at the beta.

Oh.

OH.

Sarah left the box checked for now. She made a note to speak with Castiel about it.

Moving on.

They didn’t have much time left. Jess described what her emotional journey through a D.F. was like from the inside. Sarah tried not to blush. As if.

A tap at the door announced Sam checking in.

Then they were shaking hands. Sam waited in the doorway. His eyes bored heavily into his mate’s. There was a promise there. His face seemed chiseled from granite.

Sarah lowered her eyes, collecting her bag, straightening her notes on the low table. Sam would have sensed Jess’ taunting headspace throughout the interview, Sarah realized. He was displeased. Sarah saw Jess straighten her spine on the way out. Sam’s eyes followed her coldly. Sarah tried to scent the Turning hazel eyes on Sarah, Sam softened and smiled. “Did you get what you needed?”

She licked her lips. “Nearly. I’m closer than I was before. Do you think we could do this again after I’ve had a chance to go over my notes? I need to make sure the narrative corroborates my hypothesis. Some of today’s interview was…”

“Useless?” he guessed astutely.

“She was very cooperative, Sam,” Sarah said, shouldering her bag and looking around to make sure she’d left everything she’d promised.

He scoffed. “No she wasn’t.” He ushered her out and accompanied her down the stairs. “Or if she was, it was despite her turning brat, not because of it. I’ll get you another interview. She’ll take the next one seriously, I promise you.”

“Sam,” said Sarah, stopping him with a hand on his arm. “She really did help me a great deal. Hearing it in layers that way may have been the best way through where I was stuck. There are just so many layers. I’ve been picturing a Lupin’s psyche as tri-part, each a separate segment, and each mostly independent of the others. Jess’ psyche unfolds in layers like an onion, and I’m not sure she has a lot of control over how she accesses the deepest ones. I think that speaks to the hypothesis in and of itself. Please don’t be too hard on her. She helped me a great deal.”

Sam sighed. His height was a little bit of an encumbrance, but he managed to lower his face a little. “We agreed that you would observe, Sarah. Observe, and not interfere. Right?”

“It felt to me like she wanted to be helpful, but something inside her was throwing up barriers. Is it fair to punish her for that?” Sarah adjusted her bag. Sam opened the front door and walked with her toward her car.

“It is. But I’m not going to explain it to you again. You need to do some thinking. You’ll get your recorder and your notes back tomorrow. Expect Castiel to want to talk them over with you.”

She nodded. “Thanks Sam. Thank you for your hospitality. Dinner was delicious, and I enjoyed seeing all of you at home in your own space. It was enlightening. I’m sorry to have been the cause of…” she gestured lamely toward his backside.

Sam clucked his tongue. “You’re not responsible for our mistakes, Sarah.” It was a reminder and another piece of the puzzle for her to think on.

She let him hold the door for her, and he tapped the roof with his knuckles before heading back into the house with an uncomfortable limp.”

“Wrap it up in fifteen minutes, folks,” Sam told the Omegas, peeking into the Game room on his way to bed. “The van leaves for the airport at 4:30, and you,” he indicated Michael, sitting backward on the piano bench. “…haven’t packed yet.”
“Sam!” said April cheerfully. “Can I talk you into doing a song at the wedding? I have the perfect one picked out…”

“Not a chance,” he laughed. “I don’t sing.” He abandoned the doorway and came in to accept the tight hug she offered, still chuckling. “I’m going to miss you in Charlotte,” he told her.

“I’ve got important work to do,” she reminded him. “Matt’s going to talk Cas into letting me perform in public tomorrow night. It’s ‘Diva’ night at the Duck Pond.”

“Diva night,” Sam repeated skeptically. “I thought they wanted you in serious venues. Isn’t that a Drag bar?”

“Don’t be judgmental. Performing with divas can teach me a lot about stage presence. Besides, only about half of the performers are men. It’s not about drag. It’s about being fabulous! I’ll fit right in. It’s a good place to start where the audience expects a mostly female song repertoire, and they like a lot of over-the-top flair.”

Sam shook his head and sighed, catching Michael’s eye. “If you say so.”

“Besides, they want me to fly under the radar for a while, and what better place than somewhere that most of the performers are hidden beneath layers of makeup and costuming.”

Sam frowned at her. “Kiddo, I know you didn’t mean it that way, but you need to watch what you say. Drag queens aren’t ‘hidden’. Promise me you’ll be respectful of the men you meet there. For many of them, dressing in drag and performing on stage is more authentic than when they wear slacks. Often, it’s the least hidden version of themselves. I need to know you’ll be careful.”

“No, I get it. I’ll be good,” she promised. “Performers are performers. I’m there to learn, not to judge people. You’re the one who suggested it’s not a serious venue. Who’s being dismissive?”

He swatted her ass lightly. “Fine. You win. Go be a diva. I want at least one song recorded. Send it to me as soon as you can.”

“I will,” she beamed.

“Michael? You good?” Sam asked, heading back out.

“Hmm? Yeah. I’m peachy.”

“One more run-through, Michael,” April commanded, taking her spot beside him again. “It’s really sounding good. Put your heart in it.” And she swept the intro back up again. Sam didn’t stay to hear it.

“You’ll need a full gospel choir back-up when you record this,” Michael mentioned offhand, just before she began to sing, and her ears went bright pink at the notion that Michael expected her to record it.

Watching the praise light her up, more than anything in the whole world, Michael wanted to straddle her hips on the piano bench the way Castiel so often did. He wanted to taste the pinkness of her inhibitions for himself as she shed them. He wanted to feel the muscles in her torso moving her arms, her hands, her fingers, as she turned piano keys into magic. He wanted to press his lips against the back of her neck – long and elegant – when she bared it in a sophisticated upswept hairdo.

He wanted.
God, he wanted.
But he waited.
And he sang.
Anything…
…for her.

Cas knew Dean was pissed off before he ever opened the door. Their double-Claim vibrated with impatience. Cas took a couple of deep breaths. Jumped lightly on the balls of his feet twice, thrice. He blew out through his lips.

He stilled.
The door slammed behind him, encouraged by an extra push from the Alpha whose eyes were hard when they found Dean’s.

Oh, yeah. Dean was pissed.

Good.

Dean’s green eyes glowed with fire. He was nude, centered in his safe space, kneeling perfectly.

Not perfectly.

Dean’s palms were supposed to be flat on his thighs, but they were both clenched into fists. His shoulders were supposed to be relaxed. They weren’t relaxed.

“Is that so?” asked the Alpha, not willing to take the provocation further until Dean was out of his blue square, but it was enough. Dean’s nostrils flared.

He was beautiful.

“I see.”

Cas paced a wide circle around him, assessing from every side. It was a brutal tease, but it was also a necessary evaluation. Dean’s whole body was tense. Left in here alone for nearly two hours, Dean had abandoned his training and turned to fuming silently. That was not like him. Cas noted the flex in the balls of his Sub’s feet. His feet were straining, but the color was still good. His backside, recently paddled but not heavily taxed, was barely pinker than it would have been on its own. Cas could see a portion of the cane stripes he had left last night. Those would need to be considered today. His plug was still in place, the base flat against his rim, securely held and comfortable.

They couldn’t push any limits tonight. There wasn’t time. Dean needed a good night’s sleep, and he needed a relatively whole body at the end of their play. Short and powerful, but not damaging.

Cas squatted behind Dean, still not talking to him. He lowered down onto a knee and bent down low. He looked at the swelling that remained in his testicles. They were almost back to normal. A dark stripe defined each along its outer edge where the clothespins had been.

That had probably been a step too far without any prior discussion, but Dean had borne it beautifully, and Cas had followed Dean’s lead. It hadn’t been a flight really, not a fun one, but Dean had tells when he was on the track he needed, and even into a dark tunnel like last night, Dean’s body was the guide. Cas took a deep breath and stood back up.

He rounded back around and backed up several steps, watching Dean watch him. Castiel absorbed the anger, letting it feed his own needs. Castiel found himself deeply in need this night. He felt powerfully masculine, unequivocally male, and he wanted strength, hardness, the unique version of force that he could only get from a man, could only give to a man. It was in the scents of masculine musk and the rigid planes of flat, hard muscle; he wanted to grunt against those planes and force them to give way to him.

Castiel’s blue eyes held Dean’s green ones. He let no softness through. He stripped slowly, never breaking their gaze. He could nearly see all the words Dean wanted to say cascading through the Sub’s head.

So, it was like that, was it?

Good.

Castiel gestured with his left hand, and Dean’s face twitched with dislike. He wanted something much different. But he moved anyway. And that was the whole point tonight.

Dean slowly flattened himself onto his belly, abandoning his square and slithering forward like a snake toward his Dom. His nostrils were still flaring, but his body was breathtaking. Those shoulders, feline as he crawled, flat to the floor, his buttocks moving of a piece with his lean thighs, his rounded calves, the flex of his feet. It was amazing. Castiel considered backing up a few yards. He could watch the sculpture that was Dean’s body forever.

Dean met him in the center of the room, square atop the softened surface that could be raised as a platform but for now was flush to the floor. A new signal from Alpha’s hand put Dean to work, laving his feet with his lips and his tongue. Dean’s hands took hold of Castiel’s legs while he worshiped the man’s feet with his tongue. He could do this for hours. It wasn’t his favorite, but he was good at it. Each foot received its share of adoration.

The slow body worship, intense but methodical when done correctly, would calm the Sub and light a smolder beneath the skin of the Dom. Dean settled, splayed out on his belly, covering Castiel’s feet in wide, warm strokes up his feet from his flattened tongue, one hand around each of his heels, pulling in counterpoint. Then he worked his tongue between each toe, flicking it expertly to tease up against the balls of Castiel’s feet.

It was delicious. Dean managed to put his whole body into the work of his mouth, flexing his feet, his ass, bringing the play of muscles in his back into a meditation of intentional movement. Castiel swallowed.

“I won’t have it, Dean,” he said in a hard voice, and Dean winced, but the tension in his shoulders didn’t ease. Castiel let him stew a bit in silence.

“I can wait all night, if I must,” he reminded the man at his feet. He heard Dean huff angrily through his nose without pausing his attentions, now working their way up Castiel’s bony ankles. Cas stepped his feet wider to give him room, mindful of Dean’s hands and arms.
“We’re not moving on as long as you’re in disobedience,” he stated, setting the parameters. “If you make it all the way to the top of my head, and you’re still throwing a tantrum, we’ll simply start over again at my feet.”

Dean’s shoulders trembled, tightening a bit before settling back as they were. He didn’t speak, but his teeth grazed Cas’ shin lightly, followed closely enough by his tongue that it could have been a mistake.

It wasn’t a mistake.

“Stop that,” the Alpha told him, rigidly. “Do it right, or it ends right here. Don’t test me tonight, Dean.”

The Sub would have noticed the lack of his pet name by now, and Castiel was itching to move on. He heard a series of hoarse breaths from his Sub, and he felt hot moist breath around the turn of his foot. Dean was trying, he could feel it. He was angry at being made to wait so long, and he’d whirled up into a tantrum inside himself, and he wanted to explode in rage, but he was trying to bring it back down.

God, he was magnificent.

Dean panted and rested his forehead on the flat of Castiel’s left foot. Every muscle in his body was in subtle motion, and no marble facsimile by the likes of Michelangelo could ever do it justice.

He whined.

His grip tightened around the back of Cas’ ankle, and he leveraged himself up to his elbows, committing his tongue and his lips and his eyes back to the painstakingly slow progression up his Dom’s body. His toes curled under and pushed against the floor to jostle his flattened body forward.

Upward motion had to progress along the line of Castiel’s body, in a slow climb like a cobra. He couldn’t get up onto his knees until the strength of his back and his core proved insufficient to hold him. His knees widened against the floor to help stabilize him, and even more muscles engaged. Castiel, looking downward at his charge, watched himself respond physically. He hardened, and as he watched, a stringy drop of precome fell into Dean’s hair.

Castiel heard his own breath, shallow and fast. Dean wasn’t the only one panting.

The Sub was at mid-shin now, and he came to a halt with his face nestled between Castiel’s shins, whining softly. His toes twitched.

“No, Dean,” Cas told him. “You don’t make demands. You know that.”

The Claim-bonds rankled.

Castiel knew what Dean wanted, and Cas wanted that too. But the submission had to come first, and they weren’t there yet. An impact punishment for greeting his Dom in temper would be no punishment, not when it’s all Dean really wanted. This slowdown was harder – a true struggle and finishing it without losing his temper again would be a victory for Dean’s self-control. Dean’s fingernails dug into the backs of Castiel’s calves. The Alpha could wait as long as it took provided Dean didn’t out and out explode on him or refuse to comply.

Castiel waited. Dean breathed, huffing. From this moment it could go either way. The Alpha steeled himself to walk away if Dean forced his hand.
“Trust me, Pet,” Cas commanded. He knew Dean would hear the multitude of messages buried in those three words. He’d called Dean ‘Pet’ again, and that would give him hope. He’d also reminded Dean that a visible spark of rage right now was a promised end to the play, full stop. ‘Trust me’ to see you through this, but also, ‘Trust me’ to end it on the spot if necessary.

Dean’s tongued traced a thin line across Castiel’s shin, all the way around to his calf.

“Good boy,” he whispered.

Back at it, the Sub proceeded slowly upward, slipping into a meditative trance, beginning very slowly to slough off the tension and the frustration of having been left stewing in his juices long past when his anticipation had peaked into disappointment. His breathing evened out. His eyes slipped closed. His hands began to knead Castiel’s calves as they slipped ever upward.

He spent a long time on Cas’ knees, pulling his own knees under him and bowing his back to press the line of his body to curve against his Dominant’s shins. He reached one hand upward to Castiel’s ass, gripping like a mountain climber and bracing himself as he worked his tongue over Cas’ thighs – both of them. He flowed upward, a backward stream flowing upward against the Alpha’s height, as if gravity repelled him rather than pulled, and he worshipped every inch that he could touch with his tongue and his hands. He left the hardened cock alone, passing around it and bowing his body to avoid touching it.

Up to the jut of hipbones, over the ticklish flat of the runner’s belly, a tracing of the fine line of dark hair that ran from his groin upward, a dip with pointed tongue into his navel.

Castiel’s breath was coming ragged now, and he closed his eyes, feeling Dean’s hands around the bones of his hips. Up high on his knees, Dean stretched higher, straining his neck, ignoring the insistent press of Castiel’s rock-hard length against his throat. Dean’s arms came around Castiel’s waist, and he clung on, pressing his cheek into Cas’ belly, touching closely along the length of him, from his knees all the way up, clinging to him as if a moment’s weakness would leave him flailing for purchase as he fell into darkness.

“There you are,” said Castiel, gripping his chin lightly and turning his head to look upward.

“Better?”

Dean’s green eyes looked lost, mournful.

Not better.

No longer angry, but not better.

Cas found his fingers in Dean’s hair, scratching, soothing. Dean had wrangled himself into a torturous submission, and now he was hurting. That wouldn’t do at all.

Cas sank down onto his knees – slowly, so as not to unbalance his partner. He touched Dean’s cheek. Dean’s eyes drifted closed, and Cas hissed softly to correct him. They opened again, a little stronger, a little less distraught. “I’ve got you, Pet. Trust me.”

Dean nodded, holding his lower lip lightly in his teeth. Cas smiled patiently and removed it.

How many times had he done that over the years? How many more were yet to come?

“Come with me,” he said simply, feeling the prickly tickle of the hairs on his legs pulling free of the drying spittle that had plastered them against his skin. It was a little bit itchy, but he ignored it. Dean gave him his hand and let him pull him to his feet.
“First thing’s first,” the Dom said. “Let’s get you ready. Lay out on the bench for me.” Cas pointed without looking. “That one.” He left Dean to get himself situated as he perused the cabinet full of options. Cas hadn’t really put any planning into this evening. The clench in his gut demanded power and pain and fierce reckoning, and he knew he could deliver that for them both without a script. Accounting for Dean’s state of mind meant he needed to take his time, but it didn’t deter him from his purpose. If anything, Dean’s tantrum fueled him, even now that the Sub was levered back down where he belonged.

Castiel wanted him hurting. Lord help him, it’s what he wanted.

He selected a sturdy paddle – drilled through with multiple holes and an extra-long handle – and a leather flogger, grabbed a partial bottle of slick, and he sauntered back across the room where Dean was waiting for him, watching him. Cas made sure his face was blank. That may have been the most difficult part, as his wolf was practically dancing on his leash. Cas maneuvered the silicone plug out of Dean’s ass, setting it upright on the floor beneath the bench. His movements were deliberate. Dean was already tensing again, but this time, in anticipation, not anger. His flesh twitched beneath his skin.

Cas had his prize racehorse back.

So beautiful.

So powerful.

So delicate.

He set his chosen implements on the side cabinet within reach.

“So, tell me, Pet,” he said conversationally as he slicked up three fingers and sank them all the way into Dean’s hot body as far as they would reach. The Sub clenched down on them. His breath caught. Cas found his prostate easily and swiped across it a few times to make sure he had Dean’s attention.

“When you spoiled my plans yesterday, did you already know what you were spoiling, or was it a good guess?” Cas attacked Dean’s prostate furiously, and every muscle spasmed at once. Dean panted and whimpered. His anal muscles tightened their grip around Cas’ fingers.

“Answer me.”

Dean huffed a few breaths, looking for his voice. “Good...good guess, mostly.”

“Mostly? Be precise, please, Submissive.”

Dean’s fingers whitened on their grip bar. He pressed his ass backward into Castiel’s fingers. Cas stopped moving. “If you do that again, I’ll put you in a cage for the night,” he promised darkly. Dean blew his breath out and relaxed intentionally. His nipples prickled against the bench. Endorphins were beginning to light him up from the inside. He could feel his own hair. He could feel everything. He’d begun to sweat.

“I knew you had plans,” he admitted. “But I didn’t know for sure what they were until you mentioned how Michael’s gangbang scene conflicted with our foursome. That’s when I figured it all out.”

Castiel removed his fingers and he slapped Dean’s right thigh hard several times. “That’s for deliberately interfering in my plans. You know I despise when you do that, Pet. It's disrespectful.”
“Yes, Sir,” Dean responded politely, flipping his head to keep the Dom in his sights as Cas walked around behind him.

“And you continued to try to corner me by setting us a moratorium that we don’t need. Be honest, Pet. Does that request have anything whatsoever to do with a desire to let our appetites build to a crescendo at our wedding? Anything?”

“Yes, Sir!” Dean told him emphatically.

Cas spanked his left thigh, harder and longer than he’d done to the right. The slaps echoed magnificently. Dean’s ass clenched tightly in response, and he ducked his head.

“Try again,” said the Dominant coldly.

“Yes, SIR! It does! I wanna build up to it with you! What if I get stage fright and can’t perform like I want? What if I’m too satisfied from before, and I freak out?”

Castiel breathed himself back to the ground. “That’s not a concern of yours, Pet. You’re not required to perform at all. You need only Submit. Do you worry that you won’t be capable of turning your will over to my keeping if I keep you well fed before we marry?”

Dean whimpered into his elbow.

“Answer in words,” Cas corrected.

“No, Sir.”

“Then please explain. What’s the purpose of the moratorium?”

Dean huffed deeply and very nearly lost himself in hyperventilating. The full truth would get his ass lit up enough that sitting tomorrow’s panel on stage would be a nightmare.

“I’m not going away, Pet, and I’m not asking you again.”

“Just do it, Sir,” Dean huffed. “I deserve it.”

Cas stalked around to the side and crossed his arms over his chest furiously. “Tell me the truth!”

“Please, Sir! Use the whip if you want!”

“LOOK AT ME, DEAN!”

“Fuck,” Dean muttered, forcing his eyes to meet the Alpha’s. Castiel’s eyes had gone red. Dean had called up the Alpha, and he wasn’t getting out of anything.

“I wanted to piss you off,” he admitted.

“Obviously,” Cas responded, tapping his bare foot impatiently on the floor. “Mission accomplished. What else?”

Dean’s whole body deflated as he sighed. “And I wanted you so worked up at the wedding that you turned animal for the Claiming. Wanted you to put off your foursome plans until the honeymoon so Michael would focus just on me all the way through Thursday’s gang scene. He’s been distracted by April, and I miss the one-on-one attention.”

Cas pursed his lips. His eyes, already red, grew flinty. “We have rules for a reason, Dean Michael Winchester! I’ve had to install TWIN of them to address the manipulation that has shaken the very bedrock of this Pack! What’s it going to take to get you to TALK to me?!”

Dean sucked his lips under, rolling them in to cover his teeth, and he closed his eyes.

“Look! At! ME!”

“Sir, PLEASE!”

Castiel stilled himself and brought his tension mindfully back down. He watched Dean squirm.

“Who calls the shots, Pet?” he asked conversationally, and Dean whined pathetically.

“You do, Sir.”

“I don’t think so,” Cas told him, strolling around him and shaking his head sadly. “It rather seems that you believe YOU do. Is that correct?”

“No, Sir!”

“I’m not stupid, Dean. You wound me up very like a mechanical toy. Must I remind you that it’s an unpleasant experience to be played by one’s own Submissive?”

“I’m sorry, Sir!”

Cas chuckled darkly. “Don’t waste your breath on untruths, Pet. You’ll only dig yourself deeper.”

Dean buried his head in his arms again, and the two of them, in tandem, felt the moment ripen. Cas let the adrenalin course through his body. He wasted no time once he’d taken his stand. He lubed his cock unceremoniously, then positioned himself behind the Sub and sank into him.

Dean stiffened and gripped the bench. “Sir!” he shouted in surprise.

“Shut up!” Castiel told him rudely. “You’ve said enough!” Cas fucked him powerfully, up on his toes, and gripping bruises into his hips. This was precisely what he’d been craving: a release of epic levels of passion, hard and bruising enough to be worrisome had there been onlookers. He wanted to be angry. He wanted to unleash! And he put his back into it. The bench creaked and rocked dangerously.

Dean, for his part, went passive, bowed over the bench, ass up, head down, silent, holding on for all he was worth to keep himself from toppling over the end.

“Let GO!” commanded the Alpha. “Hands behind your back!”

Dean made a questioning noise, but one by one, he let go of the bars with his hands and got his arms moving enough to get his wrist into the grip of his fist. It was all on the Dom to keep him stable now, and Dean began floating at once. The onslaught continued, Dean’s body slipped a little in his sweat against the leather, but he didn’t fall. Cas was pissed, and he made sure Dean knew it. His knot began to bulge, and Dean could feel the girth of it swell painfully as it was pressed into his body again and again. Cas’ hand closed over Dean’s fist. He leaned down over Dean’s body and took the meat of his back in his teeth, right over his shoulder-blade. Dean’s instincts flared up in warning, but Dean’s wolf braced its paws and held its ground.

He breathed a long, shaky breath out while the rabid wolf at his back shook him out like a doll and fucked him stupid.
Dean came spectacularly, groaning low and guttural. Cas’ fist took hold of his hair and wrenched his head back. Spittle hit Dean on the cheek.

“Who’s in charge?! SAY IT!”

“You are! SIR!”

”SAY IT, DEAN!!”

“YOU ARE, SIR!!”

Cas exploded inside Dean, both hands going back to his hips to help him grind in tight without sinking his knot in where he so wanted to be.

So satisfying. All the sweat and the power and the planes of hard flesh. All the miles and miles of hot skin under his hands. Cas pulled out and took Dean by the hair again, wrenching him up to straddle the bench. Cas torqued him backward and buried his tongue down Dean’s throat. Dean’s hands broke apart, and he flailed a little, but Cas collected both wrists without looking and held them tightly before him in one hand.

Dean was in pain, sitting uncomfortably with his balls squashed where they didn’t belong, and still too sore to handle, but Cas didn’t give him a chance to adjust. He kissed Dean hard, angrily, furiously, clashing teeth and catching at lips, and Dean folded for him.

“Push me too hard, Pet, and you’ll regret it. Hear me?” He broke his lips away and breathed heavily into Dean face.

“Nnggh!”

“You’re not in charge, Dean.”

“Sir, I’m sorry.”

“You’re about to be,” Cas told him, still sweating heavily across his back. “Lay back down.”

Dean let Cas arrange him. The bench was slick with semen and lubricant, sweat, maybe a little bit of slobber. Dean didn’t think about it too hard. He felt Cas run light fingers along the cane stripes that crisscrossed his butt. There were four. Dean’s body shivered.

He floated. His hole clenched around nothing.

“Be still!”

Dean lost his breathing. His Dominant was still displeased, even after the completion of his climax washed through him. Now he was calmer, more in control, still angry.

Not good.

“Hands on the back of your head.”

Dean complied.

“Set your feet.”

The muscles in Dean’s thighs flexed and rolled, centering his weight and making sure each foot was grounded enough to hold him without the use of his hands.
“Tell me the truth, Dean, if I push you to your limits, will you stop me before I cross them? … Knowing you have an early call in the morning, a long flight, numerous panels tomorrow, a full seminar…can you keep an eye open for the lines before we cross them?”

“Not my call, Sir.”

Castiel let the words hang in the air. This was the side of him he showed only to Dean.

Cas tapped the flogger against his own thigh to thrum down his leg in a wave. He walked back around to the front of the bench and let Dean see his blank eyes, red-rimmed, but emotionless.

“Good,” he responded flatly. “That’s right. It isn’t.”

Dean let out a breath all at once. He’d been holding his breath after he answered that last question, and Cas had missed it.

Damnit. He couldn’t afford to miss something like that.

But it was relief that Dean was feeling as he released it all. Dean didn’t want to change things any more than Cas did.

Cas resumed his position. He rubbed the curve of Dean’s ass with his hand, adoring everything about the man. He considered saying so, but then decided to hold the thought until a riper moment. The flogger in his left hand, Cas held the handle up against Dean’s hip, a circumstance of not wanting to put it down while he warmed his target zone up, but the leather dangled down Dean’s leg this time, and it would be a supple reminder to the Sub of where they were heading.

Cas struck Dean with the palm of his hand. Not hard. Not yet. He enjoyed watching his hand move the muscle and the flesh – the curving layer of fat and connective tissue – every time he hit Dean. He liked watching how it was different from different angles, over different spots, at different power. Dean’s ass pinked rapidly. The mess that was their previous activities’ remainder smeared down the insides of Dean’s thighs. Sometimes Castiel’s hand splattered it out onto Dean’s cheeks.

He began to strike Dean harder, keeping an even pace. The flogger dug into Dean’s hip as Cas’ fingers clutched at him. It couldn’t be comfortable. Chill bumps broke out repeatedly over Dean’s back.

“Sir…!”

“I thought you were going to shut up for me, so I could work,” observed Castiel coldly.

“More, please. Harder?”

“Ah,” was all the Dom said.

He ignored the request, continuing his slow build. Dean’s cock was hardening again, and that would drive him crazy if Cas let it go unnoticed long enough. Oh, if only they had all night.

“Sir, please!”

Cas slammed the flogger back on the cabinet top and pulled Dean upright by his hair. He squawked in surprise, dragging painfully behind the tug on his head.

“Plan B, Pet. Your mouth is too free. Let me fix that for you.” He dragged Dean off the bench and all the way across the room.
“Knees!” He pointed to a spot on the floor. Dean knelt at once. His back reflected in a floor-to-ceiling mirror. Cas stared at him for a moment. Dean was out of breath, panting hard, staring into the depths of Castiel’s eyes, and he was utterly perfect.

“I love you,” said Castiel without thinking. Adoration flashed in his Sub’s eyes before he caught himself and tucked himself back under. The mask wouldn’t last.

Castiel scurried back to the bench to retrieve his implements. He cleaned himself quickly with a washcloth at the sink. He calmed himself, leaning onto his arms and breathing deeply. Then he returned to his Sub.

Standing before him, Cas schooled his face back to stern and unresponsive despite the liquid adoration that looked up at him. He shoved his cock unceremoniously into Dean’s mouth. Dean quickly pulled in his lips to cover his teeth, and Cas snarled at him, grasping his chin painfully.

“No, Pet. No barrier. Leave your teeth uncovered. Relax. Look at me.” Dean let his lips come back to their relaxed position, but he couldn’t hide the confusion in his eyes.

Cas studied Dean’s face. Their eyes danced in expectation. Dean trusted his Dominant implicitly. Was it not time to return that trust? How far did trust like that go?

“Will I be pleased if you hurt me?” Castiel asked rhetorically. Dean’s eyes flew wide. “Don’t answer that. Your job, Pet, is to concentrate. If you bite me, if you cause me any pain whatsoever, the consequences will be extremely unpleasant. Do you believe me?”

Dean nodded awkwardly.

“Good. Know then that when I say unpleasant, I do not mean this kind of unpleasant.” With his left hand, he lightly waved the handle of the flogger over Dean’s back so that the tails brushed his skin gently. Dean groaned, and chill bumps danced everywhere it touched.

With no warning, Cas used the paddle in his right hand to smack Dean’s ass from over his shoulder. With his mouth full, Dean was relegated to sucking in a deep breath through his nose. He stiffened and held on to Castiel’s thighs.

He didn’t bite down. He didn’t even graze the man with his teeth. Drool escaped his mouth, but both men ignored it. Cas wasn’t hard, but his length was still a significant weight inside Dean’s mouth.

Cas struck him again, his left hand once again stabilizing Dean with the handle of the flogger pressing into the flesh of his shoulder. The tails dribbled down over Dean’s chest to mercilessly tease his right nipple, and Dean bowed his back a little to make use of those little dangling strips of leather.

His flesh had to be singing with sensation. Castiel watched his eyes, and he hit Dean’s ass again, harder.

What the Dom liked about this paddle in particular was its long handle. The mirror helped him aim with confidence, but the reach of the paddle sat perfectly aligned with the undercurve of Dean’s backside from this position. The flogger caught between them and pulled a bit, and Dean’s moan alerted Cas to the unintentional stimulation from the front. He let Dean have his play. It wouldn’t be enough, and that would become apparent over time. The straps flowed and gave way too easily to make them anything but a tease.

Dean’s nostrils flared wider, seeking air. Cas noted the color of his face just before flicking his eyes back to the mirror and striking him again.
Holes drilled in the paddle increased the sting and made for bright spots on his backside. Some of those would turn into bruises if Castiel wanted them to bruise.

He did.

He clenched his fingers into Dean’s shoulder, and he set up a vicious rhythm that was designed to make Dean fight to find his breath, far more painful than the simple training session under Michael’s paddle before dinner. Cas felt the graze of teeth when Dean swallowed, but it didn’t hurt, so he passed it. Dean’s eyes unfocused as his breath became a frantic pull and push through nostrils that couldn’t quite keep up.

Cas pulled him off by his hair and let Dean catch his breath. He couldn’t look away from Dean’s face. His cheeks were a vibrant pink, and his pupils were blown wide. He stared up at Castiel as at a god. Dean’s cock sat red and angry below his belly. Cas had wrenched a climax from his Sub many times by spanking alone, but usually those happened with Dean over his knees, and he usually had at least a trace of friction against Castiel’s thigh.

“Spread your knees wider, Pet,” he instructed, and Dean complied at once. “Get your feet clear of the paddle. I’m going to hurt you now. Here we go again. You may come if you like, but don’t touch yourself.” Dean surprised the Dom by releasing his thighs and grasping his wrist in his hand again, behind his back. His eyes stayed on Castiel’s. He licked his lips.

“Holy fuck, I love you so much,” whispered Castiel. Then he snarled with all the menace of his station and he thrust Dean back into place, his mouth taking in a fuller girth than it had. Cas hardened at the sight of Dean’s submission, at his trust, and although his teeth were there, Cas could feel them scrape just a touch, Dean didn’t hurt him.

It was a slightly different swing this time, with Dean’s elbow in his way, but he leaned over the kneeling man, a slight bend at the waist that gave him the reach he needed. He held onto Dean’s shoulder, and he watched the mirror as he swung the paddle. Dean began to groan a continuous note that warbled with the strikes to his ass. Cas twitched the fingers that held the flogger, and Dean whimpered when the movement travelled the length of it and rippled against his sensitive nipple.

Cas released a flurry of quick, hard pops, barely pulling back at all, building up the intensity of the sting in one spot until Dean was shaking in place, all of his concentration centered upon keeping his mouth open and still, even while his body became so over sensitized that he couldn’t think in words anymore. Cas could tell he was floating. It was a tone he knew well through the Claim he’d just renewed, and he slowly began to ramp the power back up with his paddle, pulling Dean higher, splitting him in two between his attention diverted toward not touching his Dom’s delicate flesh with his teeth and all the sensations in his body. It was hell, in its way, and it was glorious.

Dean’s fist tightened around his wrist. Cas saw it in the mirror, and he responded with a flurry of fast pops, each to the center of Dean’s ass, where his internal nerves could take the blow and vibrate from it just right.

Dean dropped his jaw as wide as he could, the last intentional motion he managed before his balls pulled up tight, and he came in spurts between Castiel’s legs.

Cas tossed the paddle onto the floor and pulled out of Dean’s mouth. He sank down onto his knees in the mess and kissed Dean hard, smearing the drool on his chin and nearly weeping in joy. Dean was lax, kissing back lazily.

Cas kissed his fill, whispering love between breaths, and then he let Dean clumsily urge him back to his feet, so the Sub could finish him off. Cas went willingly. Dean pulled out all the stops, wrapping his lips around Cas and using his expert tongue to coax him along. Cas whipped him gently with the flogger, along his back, down into his lap, over his heated ass. It didn’t hurt at all. The tails were a warm, expressive extension of Castiel’s touch, and everywhere they reached was a caress. Dean hummed tunelessly after swallowing as much of his Dom’s length as he could, and he worked the muscles of his throat again and again against Cas’ head, swallowing over and over in a massage before pulling off for a breath.

His hands stroked rapidly, and Dean almost choked when the Alpha came, caught unprepared for another swallow just as the gush of fluid reached his throat. Sputtering indignantly, Dean pulled back enough to catch the rest in his mouth, swallowing most of it.

Cas was on the floor beside him in a heartbeat, cradling him, caressing him, running the warm leather tails of the flogger over him until Dean giggled at the tickle. They kissed deeply, sharing the taste in Dean’s mouth. Cas couldn’t get enough of it. He delved deeper and deeper with his tongue until he risked choking Dean. The Alpha’s hand at the back of Dean’s head pulled him in. Cas couldn’t get close enough, couldn’t bring Dean all the way into him the way he wanted. He whined, pulling Dean up into his lap and holding onto him with one hand splayed across Dean’s flaming red ass and the other at the back of his head. It wasn’t enough.

Dean, for his part, seemed to be feeling the same. He wrapped both legs around Castiel’s waist and curled them tightly to draw their groins close. He, too, had a hand locked in his love’s hair, and he had his mouth open as wide as he could get it to make a space for Castiel to join him in a single space.

They didn’t keep track of how long or how frenzied they kissed. They didn’t talk about it. Eventually, they slowed, laying out side by side, the sleepiness of a spent member lulling them both into dozing, each of them caressing lightly as they fell into and out of sleep.

At length, it was Castiel who stirred. “Jesus, that was good,” he muttered quietly. He sat up slowly, uncomfortable in the sticky mess. “Dean, baby, are you awake?”

“Nuh-unh,” Dean responded, flinging an arm over his eyes. “Fucked into oblivion,” he added, rolling over and seeking Cas’ warmth with his body.

“Come on, you lightweight.” Cas swatted his butt with his hand, and Dean flinched, rolling back the other way without opening his eyes. “We need to get cleaned up.”

“Carry me,” whined Dean pathetically.

“Not a chance, Winchester,” said Cas, laughing. Dean couldn’t keep a straight face. He let Cas pull him up and look him over. Dean watched in the mirror.

“Good?” Dean asked once Cas seemed to come to a conclusion.

“You’re going to be very sore tomorrow. These are going to bruise,” he explained, running a careful hand over the worst of it.

“Am I going to live?” Dean asked him, turning and examining himself in the mirror.

“You’ll live,” Cas told him. He started up the shower and then collected the items he’d scattered everywhere. “Almost out of lube in here,” he observed, tucking the bottle back in its drawer.

“Michael’s on it, I bet,” Dean mentioned, still checking out his spotty backside.

“Hey,” called Castiel in a soft voice. “Come here a minute.”
Dean looked up. Cas was standing near the shower. He had an odd look on his face. Dean padded over to him lightly and wrapped his arms around the man, saying, “If you’re about to break up with me, this is not the way to do it.”

Cas chuckled. “This is definitely the way to do it,” he disagreed, but he walked Dean backward into the shower.

“You’re thinking much too hard, my love,” Dean told him, allowing himself to be washed. “We’re good, right?”

“Yes, Dean. We’re good. I’m not breaking up with you.” Cas used that deadpan voice that never failed to make Dean grin like an idiot. “Pack your brat away for a minute though and talk to me.”

“Oh.”

Cas couldn’t not grin back at Dean’s crestfallen face. “God, you’re such a brat, Winchester.”

“You love me.”

“I do. Duck your head under and rinse.”

Dean rinsed off and then traded positions, following Cas’ gesture to go ahead and dry off. The Alpha soaped himself and talked over the flow with his eyes squeezed tightly shut. “You said some things tonight, Dean. I need to know how much of that needs my attention. You know I’ll give you anything you want, right?” He ducked under the water himself and rinsed, emerging after wiping his face with wet hands to find Dean holding his towel out for him.

“Can you give me Jo, unmated and living in our basement, happy to be my celibate best friend forever?”

Cas gave him a reproving look, and Dean shrugged. Castiel took the towel and dried himself efficiently. He didn’t miss the catch in Dean’s gait as he collected bathrobes.

“Jesus, man, you made a mess!” Dean deflected, looking around.

“I beg to differ,” Castiel told him from beneath that brow. “And don’t change the subject.”

“What? About why I torqued you before we got here?” Dean slipped his robe on and then began to collect Cas’ clothes from the floor, looking each item over before deciding the whole lot needed cleaning and dumping it all in the hamper with his towel.

“Are you really worried about your public performance at the wedding?”

“No, babe. That was just to turn up the volume here. I’m fine. I promise.”

Cas studied him.

“Is Michael really neglecting you?”

“Oh, no, you don’t!” Dean protested, rounding on the man. “You’re not using me to stymie those two. You know that was a part of the scene, too.”

“Do I?” posed Cas. “Something got you thinking that a postponement of our foursome was in the cards. I know a lot of the timing has to do with how you were hoping to tweak the tone for tonight, but Dean, level with me. You put two major cards on the table, and I need to be sure I understand what’s real and what was play.”
“It was all play, Cas. You oughtta know my moves by now.” Dean made for the door, but Cas got an arm across the doorway ahead of him.

“Oh, so then, you don’t want a weeklong moratorium on sex between us?” Cas’ face was so wide open, Dean knew he couldn’t be asking that question in innocence.

“I wanted two weeks, actually. And thanks for reminding me of that right on the heels of ‘I’ll give you anything’.”

Cas chewed on that, cocking his head in thought. “If you want two weeks, I’ll give you two weeks. Is a ramp up more important than our mates are?”

“That’s low, Alpha.” Dean swatted his arm away, and Cas chuckled. Dean opened the door and held it for his fiancé. “You’re a train wreck where those two are concerned anyway. You’ve got Michael jumping at shadows. What’s with throwing him into the middle of getting your swipes in on your mate yesterday, anyway? You’re gonna confuse the fuck out of him.”

“No, I’m not. He understands. We’ve discussed the boundary lines, and he’s been advised that if he keeps between those lines, he can expect to enjoy more contact where he wants it. And you changed the subject again. I had been planning to roll out and orchestrate the full foursome in all its glory next Friday. Dean, you had to know all about that when you scheduled your scene with Michael.” Castiel led the way up the stairs and toward the kitchen. “And that’s fine. If that’s the best time to do it, I’m so very there, you’ll be seeing three of me…”

Dean snickered at the image.

“…But you were up to something. You told me it was a done deal on the schedule, but Michael said it was still tentative.”

“Jesus Christ! The two of you!” Dean stopped in the kitchen archway.

Cas flipped on the light and turned to look at him. “Which is it?”

“It’s scheduled, Cas. We’re go for Thursday right after work. Got our room reserved and everything.”

Castiel stared at him, obviously confused. Dean hobbled past him, headed for the fridge. “I’m not required to explain it all to you, Alpha,” he asserted cheerfully. “Nothing in Rule 7 says we have to fill in all the holes for you.”

“Then I’ll refer you back to Rule Five and remind you that manipulation and lies are already forbidden.” Cas watched Dean reject everything the refrigerator had to offer.

“Ah, but you have to prove it before you can come after me,” said Dean, deciding on a beer instead. Cas narrowed his eyes, but he didn’t challenge the proclamation with a reminder that Rule One demanded obedience. They could go in circles all night. Having Dean in his kitchen, comfortable in the space, well-spanked, well-fucked, and playing sparring games…it was all Cas had ever wanted. Dean looked up after popping the top from his bottle, expecting to have to parry again, and he was caught off-guard by the sappy look on his fiancé’s face.

“What?” he asked, taking a swig.

Cas took the beer and drank a hefty dose. Dean snatched it back, but Cas didn’t let go. He used his grip on the bottle to pull Dean in and nuzzle into the space behind his ear.
“You know what?” Dean asked.

“What?”

“We’re getting married.”

“Yep,” answered Castiel.

“You ready?”

“I’ve been ready to marry you since the first day I saw you on the lawn outside the Engineering Building.” He followed that up with a nibble along Dean’s throat.

“You say the damnedest things, C.J.”

“It’s simple truth,” Cas told him, walking him backward toward the kitchen table. “Drink that, or you’re going to spill it when I fuck you.”

“Wanna bet?” sassed Dean.

Cas spun him and bent him over the redwood table. Dean saved the bottle, bracing himself on his elbows and getting a good gulp down before the bottom of his light robe fell over his head, tangling him in darkness. He struggled free and spread his legs. He settled comfortably on his elbows. Drinking wasn’t as easy as he’d boasted, but Cas’ ruthless frotting against the crack of his ass jostled him a lot. Cas used the friction to harden himself enough to press into Dean’s sore hole. He went slowly, testing that there was enough fluid left inside to work into a good coating of lube – in a little, out a little, in a little more, out nearly all the way, in almost to the root, hold for a breath, tremble a bit, out again.

Dean made a show of keeping his bottle in motion, but it was only a show. Cas had the angle in this position to grind himself against Dean’s prostate, and he knew precisely where it was.

“Give me one more tonight, baby,” Cas cajoled. His meaty hand encircled Dean’s dick, bare now that his robe was thrown up over his back. The Alpha moved his hand in time with his thrusts, slowly and sensuously. He was in no hurry. Dean shoved the bottle down the table until it was clear, and then he circled his arms beneath his head and buried his face.

“Marry me, Dean Michael Winchester,” proposed Castiel as he moved his hips and his grip. “Marry me, and you can come,” he babbled.

“That’s a dirty fuckin’ trick, Alpha. I’ll do anything for a great orgasm.”

“I know,” laughed Cas. He admired everything he could see and feel, knowing that the experience for Dean was more than a little painful, knowing that Dean wouldn’t have it any other way.

“You’re incredible, Dean.”

Dean grunted. “You’re just flattering me, so I’ll say yes.”

“Is that a yes?”

“No, it’s not a yes, C.J.! Did it sound like a yes? Oh, fuck, yeah, right there. Just like that. Oh, GOD!”

Cas applied himself, right where Dean melted under the strain. “Better answer me quick, or it’ll be too late.” He kissed Dean over the soft fabric of his robe, between his shoulder blades.
“Ah, c’mon, Mom” Dean whined as if sleepy and begging for extra time. “Five more minutes.”

Cas bit him, and Dean yowled, turning away in surprise, then laughing.

Cas shook his head to get the corner of Dean’s robe out of his face. “Every time I spank you, I worry that I’ve gone too far,” He told Dean sternly, righting him with a hand at his hip, and continuing his ministrations. “And not fifteen minutes later, you always prove I didn’t go far enough!”

“That feels amazing, man,” Dean told him truthfully, hiding his face in his arms again. “It hurts in the most incredible way.”

“You like it slow?” Cas asked him seductively.

“Mmm…”

They heard footsteps approaching from the parlor. A voice preceded its owner: “I can hear and smell you in there. I’m coming in anyway.”

Kali.

“Do what you will with that!” she warned.

Cas didn’t change his pace, didn’t change his grip, didn’t change his attempt to reach the back of Dean’s neck with his lips, although Dean’s robe was in the way. Dean spread his feet a little bit wider. He reached back with one hand and got it situated at the back of Cas’ head, holding him tight, pulled down right over Dean.

He’d come a very long way from panicking months ago when Sam walked in unexpected. Dean didn’t even realize the journey had changed him. He wasn’t thinking along those lines at the moment, but therein lay the whole point.

“I’m getting ‘His Majesty’ some juice,” Kali told them. Dean turned his head so that Cas, if he stretched, could reach his cheek. Hot breath over his face was the last thing the over stimulated alpha needed.

“Cas, I’m coming!”

“Do it, sweetness. Come for me.”

Cas let Dean dribble sticky white spurts over his hand, and then he held Dean by the hips and pounded into him, shaking the sturdy table. The bottle wobbled precariously.

“G’night, boys!” Kali excused herself with her glass of juice.

“Ni..igh..ght, Kal…i!” Dean pulsed.

Cas came with a soft moan, pressing his hips forward and holding them close, pressing everything but his knot into this man he adored so much. He breathed into Dean’s ear for a minute. “Grab your beer. I’m sitting down, and I’m taking you with me.”

Dean scrambled for the bottle as Cas pulled a chair around with his foot and sank down onto it, pulling Dean by the hips to keep him connected. They shared the remainder of Dean’s beer there in the chair. Cas’ cock slipped free, and Dean made a face at the sensation of fluids dripping free and running down under his thighs into Castiel’s lap.

Cas ignored it. He kissed Dean, a hand holding his chin, his eyes serious.
“I love you,” he told Dean. He let Dean escape the intensity and curl beneath his chin. “I wish you Godspeed tomorrow. I expect great things from you on your journey, and I’ll be waiting for you when you come home.” He kissed the side of Dean’s face, and then whispered, “Come home to me, Pet.”

“I will, Alpha,” Dean promised. “Always.”

Chapter End Notes

Thanks for all the continued support.

I have a song chosen for April’s duet with Michael, but it's not time to post it.

If you missed my late addition of April's show tune from the previous chapter, there's a link at the top of that page. It's another example of April writing more than a little autobiographically from her darker side, and it's meant to be performed in the show by the witch protege and her witch mentor, so it's a little on the nose, but doesn't that song NEED to be a show tune?

FUCK! I have to go back to work tomorrow! ;o) Love you guys! Lots!
Chapter 101

Chapter Summary

Sarah hears an alternate offer. Naomi moves into her new home. Jack and Ketch say goodbye to their old lives. Dean and Cas spend some time with their mates. April debuts as a diva. Oh, and Cas forgot all about condoms as a thing. Good job, Alpha.

Chapter Notes

I didn't get it up in time for Christmas, but whatever. I hope those of you who celebrate bringing some light in at the darkest time of the year found something to celebrate this season. It's pretty dark out there right now. But the solstice has passed, and the sun will return, as it always does.

Happy New Year to the Pack!

A big thank you to all of you who sat in the darkness with me this last round. You help more than you can possibly know.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

Chapter 101 – Saturday, August 19, 2017

THEN:
“What about a badger? Do you think I could identify as something like that? You said it doesn’t have to be a wolf.”

“Mr. Winchester, focus, if you please.” His instructor paced past his desk, following a strict pattern through the smattering of low classroom tables. He rapped his knuckles sharply atop the pile of photos and drawings that the others at Dean’s table were still pawing through slowly. “No badgers. No skunks. No sea lions. We are Canids, young man. You will never connect with your wolf if you cannot properly envision him, and he will NOT be a wolverine or a beaver!”

“Maybe you’re a golden retriever,” suggested Linus to Dean rudely.

“You’re an effing golden retriever,” Dean mumbled back quietly. Dean had about had it with this class. Once a month the Lupin students had a three hour session away from the population of Primates, predicated on providing them some better insight into learning to live in a society that didn’t particularly want them in the first place. He’d been looking so forward to today’s exercises, a chance to try to find resonance with a particular image, but everything he tried fell flat, and he was flatly discouraged.

And he’d already been working on it at home, under the supportive eye of his mother, who seemed to know which images to pass across to him and which to discard. It rankled that she tucked all the beefy, angry-looking power beasts back into her folder without a second thought and only offered him the skinny docile-looking mutts. Surely here at school, with a guide who knew how to read a successful resonance, he would find what he’d been looking for.

He would be powerful, with gaping maw and dripping nostrils. There would be a flame of intensity in his eye. There would be muscle in his shoulders and his legs.

But there was nothing – not a twinge of recognition from any of those images – and Dr. Suisse just pointed him on, reminding him that not everyone was a wolf at all. There were even Dingoes among the pictures. And then Dean remembered an argument with Sam from breakfast. Caniformes, it seemed, encompassed all kinds of predatory mammals, categorized by the shape of their jaw and the formation of their teeth and claws. And by their diet: Carnivores with powerful canines to devour meat ripped unceremoniously off the bone, Caniformes took so many forms that Dean’s head spun at the possibility. Maybe the photos were too limiting.

His Wolverine comics notwithstanding, the pup could easily imagine himself unique in his community. It wouldn’t even matter if he Presented Omega if his avatar was a grizzly bear. The image stuck in his head, and for a moment he thought he’d hit upon something. “What about a bear?” he asked, looking hopefully upward toward his instructor as he made another slow pass.

“Eyes on your table, Mr. Winchester,” came the stern correction, and Dean deflated. “Bears are not Canine. They are Ursine. You are not a bear.”

Dean sighed. Nothing on the table was working for him. Another few minutes and they would all shift again to begin digging through a new pile at another table, but Dean wasn’t excited any longer. So many wolves lay before him, and none of them did anything at all for him, even the vicious, teeth-bearing wretches. Nothing.

Jo had hers – an almond-eyed beauty with a sleek coat that shifted in the light, merled between grey and light brown. She was all wolf, and she was breathtaking. Dr. Suisse confirmed the resonance with a look deep into Jo’s eyes and a whiff of scent at her throat. Jo sat rapt by the image, sitting off to the side with a handful of others who had already found a picture close enough to draw their own wolves out into the light. Jo was gazing at her photo in complete adoration, entranced to the point that she didn’t even notice her best friend flailing.
This lesson was supposed to be fun. Everyone said it would be fun. But Dean wasn’t having fun. He slumped sloppily in his chair, shuffling idly through the remaining pictures with his head propped up in his hand, mindfully avoiding the domesticated dogs. There was a cocker spaniel on that side of the pile for fuck’s sake. What self-respecting Lupin could ever find resonance with a spaniel? How could he show his face in class ever again if…?

Wait.

That one? It was a wolf. A grey one. Hold on.

Dean glanced to either side of himself as he surreptitiously slid one photo out of the mass and pulled it down into his lap to inspect it more closely.

He felt an odd sensation in his groin, and he tightened up almost unconsciously like trying to hold it when he really needed to pee. He felt a little bit dizzy, and he lowered his head, careful not to breathe too loudly. He didn’t want to attract the attention of his tablemates. He bit his lower lip.

It was a wolf, and Dean went lightheaded with relief. All thoughts of walruses and pandas fled as he absorbed the image. No, it wasn’t a full-blooded wolf. It had an odd stripe of white running down between its ears, down the length of its muzzle. That was no wolf marking. There was more than a little dog in this wolf. But Dean couldn’t deny the sensation of familiarity that sent his blood quickening and wetted his mouth with saliva.

Cautiously, he sent a thought into the back of his mind. “Hey, buddy? You with me back there?”

Nothing.

Or…well…wait…a spindly little tremor answered him back. Dean gasped quietly to himself.

A hand fell firmly onto his shoulder from behind, and Dean jumped, startling upward. His instructor stood behind him with a triumphant look in his eye. “Close your eyes now,” he said. “Focus on every detail you already have in place. Slowly, draw your eye back and out and let the image fill itself in. Don’t force it. You’ve got him on a leash right now, and that might spook him. Go easy. Be gentle. Let him have a minute, and then see if you can lead him out into the light. One breath at a time…”

Dean’s concentration, focused tightly inside, brought a bead of sweat to his brow. He could scent when Jo drew close, summoned by the instructor who knew the two of them to be close friends. He arranged her very close so that her scent would help surround and bolster the fledgling wolf pup, encouraging him out of the shadows to the homey scent of pack. Dean’s breath caught again as he got his first full view of an animal that he knew with all of his being was his own and no one else’s. It was him as clearly as if he were looking into a mirror, and it was beautiful.

Clear, bright green eyes blinked uncertainly back at him. The wolf’s straight narrow muzzle sat low to the snow around its feet, but the tip of his nose angled up daringly, boldly seeking. Pointed ears flickered uneasily back and up and back again. There was a trail of long soft fur trailing off of them – another indication that there was more than a little dog in this wolf. His tongue lolled uncomfortably and then disappeared inside his mouth again as he panted and licked his own muzzle. Those green eyes darted, careful, alert. Dean felt kinship immediately. There was a canniness about the beast that told him it wouldn’t miss much, and Dean liked that his wolf was that aware. He noticed the tail for the first time when the wolf – Dean was doggedly refusing to acknowledge that it wasn’t full wolf – stepped forward slowly with a deeper dip of his head and a careful wag of his long tail. Low shepherd hips and a healthy flag of long fur down his tail destroyed the last vestige of self-delusion that Dean was holding onto.

He was a wolf-dog cross. A mutt. Clearly a submissive one if the body language meant anything. Dean might only be 9 years old, but he could read body language as well as anyone.

A submissive mutt.

But a clever one.

Those green eyes. He was sure they could read into his soul.

Dean watched him for a little longer before imagining extending his hand to the animal, palm down. Their eyes met again. There was no challenge. They were the same, his wolf and his imagined self. And as preposterous as it seemed there within his own imagination, Dean longed for its trust. The wolf stepped forward slowly, assessing the risks with eyes and ears and feet planted in the snow before each tentative step.

Dean felt warm breath over the back of his hand, and his whole body erupted in chill bumps. His breath caught again, and even though his eyes were still closed, and he hadn’t said a word, he felt Jo’s touch on his arm and Dr. Suisse’s hand tighten on his shoulder. He huffed a delighted laugh, aware uncomfortably that there were tears squeezing out of the corners of his eyes.

It wasn’t what he’d imagined this would feel like. It was better. And worse. And...scary as fuck, and such a relief...all at once. It was overwhelming.

“There, you got him. Well done, Winchester.” The praise felt like a benediction, and Dean couldn’t stifle his chuckle of relief and delight and welcome. It wasn’t a wolf, but it wasn’t NOT a wolf, and it had so much life, so much potential. “Collect your things now, and take your picture with you, please. Join the others in the corner while the rest of us keep searching. Two minutes, class, and then we’ll switch tables again. Focus!”

Jo was at his shoulder when he opened his eyes again. His picture was still in his lap and visible from the right angle, but Jo wasn’t snooping. She smiled at him in solidarity and hoisted him to his feet.

“A badger? Really?” she asked, amused.

“It could happen! He doesn’t make the rules, Harvelle,” Dean protested, a little wobbly, a little punch-drunk. “Just because they don’t bring pictures of bears or seals doesn’t mean it couldn’t work that way. They’re Caniformes too! Sammy bet me, and I had to look it up.”

Jo rolled her eyes. “We’re mammals, too, you dork. Why not aim for a housecat or a white-tail deer?”

“I’m just saying,” he persisted. “They don’t have the first idea how far back this shit really goes. They’re all the same thing, like, a common ancestor is what the article said, back through bears and seals and weasels.”

“And skunks,” she said with a raised brow, pleased with herself.

“Yes! And skunks. I’ll betcha Sammy pulls a skunk outta his cave when his turn rolls round.”

Jo laughed right along with him, happy to tease their shared kid brother in absentia; knowing they’d team up on him later and taunt him with the idea he was intrinsically a skunk more than a wolf.

In the quiet that followed. Dean shifted his gaze carefully to Jo. “You told me yours...” he started.
“Only if you want to,” she responded, her eyes trained on the instructor halfway through another slow lap. Dean slid the photo from his lap to hers, upside down to keep it private from the rest of the class. Jo took it without looking and leaned back before sliding it up her belly and taking in the image of his most personal, most vulnerable self.

“He’s gorgeous,” she said softly, as honored that she got to see his as he had been when she pulled him aside earlier and showed him hers. “Those eyes…,” her ears bright red, and her own eyes bright with excitement. “He’s got some dog in him,” she observed without judgement. “Dogs are smarter than wolves, you know. Cleverer.”

“Easier to train, you mean,” he said, letting a touch of petulance through.

“No, I mean they’re better at reading people than wolves are. I think he suits you, and I mean that in a good way.”

“Hmm.” He took the picture back and considered it before sliding it between two pages of his math book and tucking it safely away. “Maybe.”

NOW:

Cas picked up the receiver of the phone on his desk, punched two digits, and then said, “My office, if you please.” He sat down behind his desk, comfortable in a lighter pair of slacks than he wore to work and a well cut linen shirt. “Jess will be here in a moment. She owes you an apology.”

“Ah, well, then, there’s another fantasy unwoven. Have a seat. We have a bit to cover this morning.” Castiel graced her with one of his signature looks, and she sank back into the loveseat cushion with a sigh.

The knock came quickly, and Cas simply said, “Come.”

Jess walked in with her head high but a pink tinge to the tips of her ears. She spoke with practiced care. “Miss Blake, I was rude to you last night. I wasted your time and put your work at risk.” She spoke sincerely, but there was an edge that told Sarah Jess never would have offered this apology voluntarily. “I apologize profusely. It won’t happen again. I’d like to reschedule at your convenience.” A lightning fast dart of hazel-brown eyes to where Castiel sat with his fingers laced and steepled beneath his chin begged his forbearance. Jess put her eyes back on Sarah’s before lowering them.

“Thank you, Jess. I really did gain quite a lot of ground last night even with…your…difficulty in talking to me. I would very much like to accept your offer to reschedule and build on what we started – if your Alpha allows it.” Sarah tossed the ball back to Cas. His eyes flipped from Jess to Sarah and back again before nodding.

“Of course,” he said somewhat curtly.

“Sir, please!” Jess pleaded. “I won’t do it again. I swear! I’m sorry!”

“I understand, beta,” he told her. “But it wasn’t to me that you were rude.”

It was terribly uncomfortable, but Sarah figured her role out before it could grow miserable in that tiny office. “I accept your apology, Jess,” she blurted. “I forgive you. I’d love to try it again.”

Jess wilted visibly in relief, and Cas nodded almost imperceptibly before turning his attention down into his drawers to the right side of the desk. “Thank you, Jessica,” he said without looking at her.

“That will be all.”

“Yes, sir,” she said, a little stronger than she looked. She shot a shy smile at Sarah and then fled.

“That was entirely for her, wasn’t it? Not for me.” Sarah spoke into the silence Jess left behind her.

“It was for her and for the hierarchy in general,” Cas replied easily, pulling her notes and recorder from his desk and placing them before him. “It was also for you, Sarah. We are, first and foremost, civilized people, and when there is an affront, an apology is the appropriate response. She was deliberately rude, whether you noticed or not, and she would just as appropriately have owed you that apology had you both been Primates.”

“I noticed, Alpha, but I didn’t really feel there was any animosity in it. She seemed to be struggling with herself.” Sarah eyed her notes. There were brightly colored tabs attached here and there and notes in a strange hand.

“And that makes a difference?” he posed. “If your mother was rude to a houseguest of yours, would it matter that her problem was actually with herself and not the guest? Would that mean she owed no apology?”

“I see your point, sir,” she told him. “But that was extremely uncomfortable for me. If hierarchy weren’t involved, I would just as soon have let it go. In a lot of ways, I learned more with the way it all happened than I would have if she’d been completely cooperative.”

He was obviously as ready as she was to move on. His eyes twinkled. “That’s because you are astute enough to read between the lines of what she gave you. Very good, Sarah. Tell me what you learned.” He sat back and sipped his own coffee. Sarah’s sat abandoned on the table at her elbow.

“The critical piece to the success of the thesis, I believe, is going to be the evident and supportable stability of psychological strata at each life stage where a wolf is fully supported versus the untenable quality of the psyche when it isn’t. Jess is a prime example of that. I’ll need documentation, of course, but I see the same pattern again and again. Wolves cannot continue at length without the hierarchy in place. Here, look, Jess talked about pushing through college and law school, but her descriptions of her internal struggles…it’s not sustainable. She was hanging on by the barest grip by the end. She would have broken soon. And then, just then, she moved back here and Mated. That’s the pattern. A wolf can hang on long enough to bridge a chasm like that, but then they need support or they fall over the edge. And that’s a beta. If any wolves have a natural propensity to self-stabilize, it’s the betas.” Sarah dug through the papers before her, turning them, searching. Cas let her dig.

She continued. “I had intended to select a few of your Facility students to highlight, but if I could, I’d like to see if I could use Jess’ case instead. She’s not ACRI trained, but she’s further along in the life cycle. She’s faced some real hardships, and she’s found balance with a mate. She’s well into her professional career and is already childrearing. Do you think you could allow that, sir?”

“Jess has been through a great deal, Sarah,” he told her heavily. “I will leave it up to her.”

“Sir…” Sarah paused. “Not that it matters, really, but…she said some odd things about how she doesn’t fit just right with her mate. Are she and Sam…?”

“Are they True-Mates?” he guessed. She looked up at him across the desk and nodded.

“Why is it such a touchy subject?” she asked.

“It’s not to everyone,” he answered. “Many wolves don’t care one way or the other. Jess doesn’t care. Sam does.”

“It’s important to Sam. Why?”

“Why is anything important to anyone? It’s more than a point of pride for Sam to feel that he’s Mated to his one true perfect mate. It’s a point of intimacy. He wanted her desperately. He wants her to be perfect. He wants their union to be perfect. Who among us doesn’t long for such a connection?”

“He loves her a great deal. Isn’t that enough?”

“Not to Sam,” said Cas. “I admit that it isn’t entirely rational, and I’ll leave it at that.”

“So, they aren’t True-Mates.”

“In the interest of clarity for the sake of science, I will answer. No, they are not True-Mates. But I caution you to keep that information private as it is, as you say, a source of particular touchiness to a beta whom I love dearly, and it makes no particular difference in any appreciable way other than to the integrity of your research. It is also a matter of opinion at this point. There is no data either way, nor any attainable.”

Sarah ruminated quietly for a few moments.

“The rape is a roleplay,” she said by way of changing the subject, and his eyes took their twinkling up again.

“What makes you say that?” he asked, leaning way back in his chair.

“If it was unwanted assault, her scent would reflect the distress of an assault, and he would stop. There’s no question that he adores her and would move heaven and earth to keep her safe. The rest is all choreographed motion and noise.”

“And that differs from what you’ve always maintained how, exactly?” he challenged her, taking another drink of coffee.

She took a deep breath, and her gaze unfocused. “I don’t know how to put it into words. The words all fall flat. It’s not truly rape, because there’s a constructive tone to it all even at the height of the violence, but it’s also not truly consensual because the decision is absolutely not in the Bottom’s hands. But it never gets out of control, and the focus never leaves the welfare of the Topped.”

Cas watched her struggle with it for a few minutes. She tangled herself up admirably, and then even more admirably untangled herself once more, sighing in frustration as she petered off to silence. She still couldn’t get the words to mean what she needed to make them mean.

“It’s all exactly what we’ve already talked about,” she conceded pointlessly. “But without context, the words are meaningless.”

“As with so much human complexity,” Castiel reminded her.

“I need help, sir. I need help explaining this to Dr. Meyer. He’s not going to understand the context.”

“No, he’s not,” Cas agreed. He continued to watch her for a minute or two as she frowned and dug through the notes. “Your coffee is growing cold,” he pointed out.

She picked the cup up absently and sipped at it. “I can’t think how to present this to him that doesn’t set him up to turn it back around on me,” she grumbled.

“Then don’t,” he suggested vaguely.

“Don’t what?”

“Don’t defend your argument to Dr. Meyer.”

She scoffed. “I wish that was an option, but I have to pass it by him or it dies where it is. I’ve got a deadline coming up. He expects me to bring my progress by on Monday.”

“So walk away and find another advisor.” He made it sound so simple, and his face was placid. She frowned at him.

“What are you suggesting?” she asked. “Apply to another program? It took me every connection I had to get this spot. I can’t walk away from it.”

“I’d like you to study under Jim Murphy at Brown University,” he said simply, like it wasn’t a nuclear bomb dropping from the sky. “Karl Meyer has already lined up his defenses against your hypothesis. If you attend that meeting on Monday, you’ll lose everything you’ve worked for. He has alternate plans for your research, and if it’s all the same to you, I’d prefer he not be given the opportunity to upend our progress.”

She stared at him.

“It’s your choice, of course,” he added.

“Jim Murphy?”

“He’s a tenured professor with Brown, on extended leave. He could advise you from Massachusetts without ever setting foot back on campus and without requiring more than one or two face-to-face meetings. We could overlap those with the semiannual meetings he attends here. You would be invited to move into the house here with us – all the better to continue studying the individual interactions that have so captured your imagination, assuming everyone agrees to be observed. You would, of course, be restricted to defining your scope to cover only those of us who participate willingly.”

She stared at him. “You’re not serious.”
“I am very serious.”

She scoffed again.

He sat forward, placing a wide palm on her notes. “You’re far more critical to the success of our movement than I believe you are aware, Miss Blake. You bring a fresh eye into something that’s been argued to death by the cynics on the inside until we no longer hear each other speak. You are beautifully naïve, perfectly unbiased. We need you desperately, and Dr. Meyer is inches from pinching you right off and casting your work into the file cabinet of obscurity forever. In light of that, I’m offering you an alternative that serves us both.”

“Sir!” She found her voice again at last as the shock gave way to simple disbelief. “That would be highly inappropriate! I can’t work under you and research you at the same time. It would be unethical to say the least!”

“You wouldn’t be working under me. You would be working under the advisement of Pastor Jim.”

“Who works for you.”

“As do forty-three other research fellows whose projects vary in scope and premise but all of which are targeted to understand our species better than we do now.”

“I…”

“Every contact that you knew prior to now got you a chance to put your foot in the door, Sarah. I’m offering you better. I want you to commit to jumping all the way in, and I’m willing to support you in your efforts. You have significantly better connected contacts than you once did.”

“Live here?”

“That’s part of the offer. It’s not a requirement.”

“Sir, how could I begin to stay objective?”

“Constant oversight,” he replied easily.

“Pardon me, but my head is spinning. May I?” She nodded at her notes and began to gather them up. “How do you know all that…about Dr. Meyer, that he’s planning to subvert my conclusions?”

Cas met her eye. “You’re not my only contact in the department.”

“You’ve been spying on me?”

Cas laughed softly. “Not on you, per se.”

“On Dr. Meyer.”

“It is critical I know where my enemies are and what they are up to. Your presence doesn’t alter that.”

She frowned again. “I don’t want to be a pawn in a power play, Castiel. I won’t be used.”

Cas shook his head. “I know what I’m suggesting is unorthodox, Sarah, but I’ve put a great deal of thought into it. I believe in you. I’ve observed you closely, spied on you if you insist on that word, and I’m convinced that you are the way forward for all of us. You’re not a pawn. You’re much more important than that. What I’m offering you is exactly what it seems at face value. You may live with us, observe us closely from the inside, ask anything you like, confer with Fred as much as you need to, and your conclusions, assuming they withstand the scrutiny of a well-respected academic researcher on staff at Brown University, would be your own. I will not lead you nor unduly influence you.”

“Sir, with all due respect, if I lived here day in and day out, how could you possibly not influence me? I’m already closer to you than I should be.”

“Indeed? In what way?”

She hesitated, and then she chuckled. “You’re teasing me.” She saw pride pass across his face. In her?

“I respect you, Sarah,” he told her. “I respect your integrity. You have never been untruthful with me, nor with anyone on my team. You are good at what you do, if a touch unpolished yet. Polish will come with time and practice.”

“Sir, I’m pursuing a doctorate. If I leave the position I fought so hard for, can you promise me I still have the chance to achieve that goal?”

“You doubt Brown University’s capacity to issue an academically respected doctoral degree?”

“Alpha, please. This is important to me. You’re asking me to throw away the last ten years of my life, just like that.” She snapped her fingers. “I worked very hard to get where I am. I can’t risk that.”

“Sarah, he knows everything you’re going to say, and he’s going to railroad you no matter what that means for the data or the conclusions. He’s not a researcher, he’s a crusader, and he’ll do real damage to actual human people if you put even the small amount you have now into his hands. Whatever you decide to do for yourself from here, I’m begging you not to give it to Karl Meyer.”

“Can you prove it?”

Her eyes were steel.

“I have email chains from two separate sources that detail his plan in depth. He hasn’t been subtle.”

“Sir, is it possible that you’ve been misled?”

He studied her. “It’s possible,” he admitted. “Does that seem realistic to you?”

“No,” she conceded uncomfortably. “No, that all sounds like Dr. Meyer.”

“As far as your work yesterday goes,” he indicated her notes with his chin. “I see little that I feel requires further explanation until I know how you digest it. Fred will be offering you a second interview if he hasn’t done so already. I caution you to stick to your planned questions when speaking with Fred, or you’ll never get what you need from him.”

She chuckled. “Yes, I noticed. He was far more forthcoming than I expected him to be. I hardly had to ask him anything.”

Cas cleared his throat and adjusted his position in his chair. “That’s my fault, Miss Blake. I asked him to break the family vault open and speak to you with absolute candor. I expected him to talk about me, maybe about Gabriel. I never expected him to talk about my father or, God forbid, about himself the way he did. He’s a sneaky old bastard, and he did that to spite me, I think.”
She raised her brows and stifled another laugh. “You, sir?”

“It’s a long story,” he demurred with a palm up to allay any further questions along that line. “Suffice it to say, he’s good at finding ways to chastise me even with our relative ranks and the many years that have passed since I was truly his charge.”

“He loves you,” she said, mostly to see how he would respond.

He smiled softly. “That is entirely mutual. We’ve been through quite a lot, he and I.”

“And Gabriel,” she added.

He didn’t reply to that. He sat in his chair, doing the ‘Alpha in its own lair’ thing with his knees kicked high to settle him way back, and his fingers steepling at his sternum. His gaze was cool, not really a challenge, but not exactly friendly either.

Okay, so Gabriel was still off limits.

“What are my options if I don’t want to let Dr. Meyer submarine me, and I don’t want to work for you?”

“I can use my connections – and Dr. Singer’s – to attempt to find you an alternate program that offers you a similar outcome to what you have now. Of course, you would have to start over on your research, and I cannot promise you continued access to our facility. You would, in many ways be starting over with no guarantees.”

She smirked. “You were all right with having me onsite while I was advised by Dr. Meyer. Who could possibly be worse than that?”

He leaned forward with an intimate air as if confiding. “The enemy you know, Miss Blake.” He winked.

Damn the man.

“And expenses?” she asked. “Tuition and board? Graduate responsibilities?”

“Ah, good,” he said, looking very pleased indeed. “If we’re down to negotiating, I will excuse myself from the conversation and refer you to Jim Murphy’s assistant. I have her card here somewhere. Woman by the name of Bela Talbot. I believe you’ll get along swimmingly.” Cas fumbled around in his desk. He obviously didn’t have a card. Sarah let him flounder just to see how far he would take the ruse, but he stopped after no more than a few seconds. “Perhaps I could send you her contact information?”

“That would be fine,” she replied. Damn the man. Sarah was running through the conversation swiftly in her head, searching frantically for any red flags. Surely, what he was proposing was inappropriate at best, but she couldn’t quite nail it down. And in the end, she didn’t want to. A chance to live amongst them – not just anyone, but the Winchesters – and study them up close. She’d be insane to turn that down, and his smirk said he knew exactly what she was thinking.

“I have a couple of months left on my lease,” she said at last.

“Understood, then. We move forward on your timeline, Sarah.”

She sipped her coffee, but it was cold. “I’ll submit my withdrawal from the University on Monday.”
“Hold off on withdrawing, Sarah. I think we can do a transfer. I should know by Tuesday. Can you put Dr. Meyer off that long?”

“Not with any integrity,” she answered and was rewarded with a real laugh.

“I leave it to your good judgment, then,” he said chuckling. “More coffee?”

“I’ve taken up enough of your time this morning, sir. I need to go and let you get back to work.”

“Very well.” He stood and escorted her out, helping her pack her papers and recorder away. They strolled casually toward the front door. Sarah could hear Jess singing softly to the pups in the next room. “Sarah,” Castiel began, bringing her attention back to him. “I cannot guarantee you the outcome you seek. No one can do that.” He turned to face her at the door, pausing before he opened it. “What I can promise you is that I will never use you in a way that you do not have a hand in planning. I’m not a virtuous man, but I am true to my word. If you can see within me the same fire that I see burning in you, then I ask for your trust – trust that I can steer us a way forward, trust that I can remove barriers from your path so that you may do the work you were born to do, unfettered by mundanities. I want you on my team, Sarah Blake. I cannot say it more clearly than that.”

“I think you’re expecting more from me than I can deliver.” She couldn’t hold his eyes.

“Good,” he told her, and he opened the door.

***************

Naomi secured the last of her personal effects, what she had with her – the rest was in storage – onto a cart with an elastic cord. “I believe that’s all of it,” she told the orderly. He smiled kindly at her and wheeled the cart out, mindful of the larger bags overhanging the edges. He knew enough of her sharp tongue to know that she wouldn’t appreciate an extra scrape to her expensive luggage.

Naomi looked around her room sadly. She wasn’t going to miss it at all, but she was once again completely untethered, and she felt an impulse to cling to the horrible space simply to have something knowable at her back. She felt small, a sensation she hadn’t felt in years and years.

“Waiting on you now, Mom,” said Gabriel from the hallway, not unkindly. “Got your chariot idling and your new digs all ready for you. Just need the woman herself – unless you’d rather stay here…”

He was teasing again. “Oh, for pity’s sake, Gabriel. Don’t be ridiculous. This was a stopgap, and nothing more.”

“Good. Come on, then. Kali’s in the car. We’re taking you to lunch.”

“Well, it’s about time,” Naomi told him sternly. “Not even invited to your wedding. Am I an afterthought to you too, son?”

He laughed. “No, Ma’am. Anything but.” He let her take his arm and made no bones about escorting her through the industrial corridor as if she were the most important wolf on the planet. “How about steaks for lunch?”

“Ugh! How can you eat anything so heavy in this heat?”
“Ookay. Salads and cold soup or something? Kali probably knows a place. She knows the city better than I do. We’ll go eat, and by the time we get you to your new place, you’ll be unpacked and all moved in. Come on, Mom. I know you’ve got a faster pace than this in there somewhere.”

“I’m old, Gabriel. I walk slowly. And I’ll thank you to call me ‘Mother’ just like always. You know I don’t abide this informality from you. It’s cheeky. I don’t like it.”

“Apolologies, Mother.”

“Oh, good grief!” she retorted. “That’s even worse! Would it kill you to show some respect?”

Gabe flagged Kali in her car where it was idling in the shade. She pulled around. “In you go. Sit up front with Kali. Omegas go in the back. How’s that for respectful. You go on and tell Kali what you want for lunch. I’ll sit back here and be seen and not heard.” He caught Kali’s eye in the mirror with a wink. She huffed.

“Don’t worry Mrs. Novak,” she told the ex-Congresswoman. “I know how to deal with smart mouths like his.”

“Well, at least someone has some sense around here,” said Naomi buckling her seatbelt. Kali laughed. Gabe grinned in the backseat.

“Oh. Yeah,” he interjected, forgetting all about his promise to be silent. “I have marks all over my ass, Mother. Wanna see?”

“Gabriel!” she shot back, scandalized. “Now I’ve lost my appetite entirely. Kari, dear, would you please select whichever lunch venue you prefer? I shan’t be eating with you. My stomach has turned queasy.” Gabe grinned even wider. Kali met his eye again through the rearview mirror as she pulled onto the street. She wasn’t enjoying his antics any longer. Too much, Omega.

Chastened, he sat back and grumbled to himself.

“If I’d brought you to the wedding, do you think you could remember her name?” he asked at the next stop light.

“Gabe, stop it,” Kali warned. That was her ‘not kidding’ voice. He looked at her face, and read the plea there. Today was hard enough. For everyone. A little less asshole in the mix would be much appreciated.

“Tell me your name again, dear,” Naomi asked with her most invested expression, leaning over a little to cut Gabe out of the conversation.

Kali gave her a simple smirk. “I really doubt you could pronounce my full name, Mrs. Novak. In the U.S. I go by a diminutive. You can call me Kali.”

“OH! The Destroyer? How exotic!”

“Mother, I swear, if you start up with one of your racist rants…”

“Gabriel! How could you say such a thing! I would never!”

“Mm-hm,” he said, guarded. He was trying. God, he was trying. Kali would learn. Keeping Naomi focused on his terrible sophomoric behavior kept her out of herself, and it made her bearable. This ‘getting to know each other’ thing Kali wanted to do was a disaster waiting to happen.
“How about a café?” Kali suggested, pulling in and giving no one much of a choice.

Naomi ate a healthy lunch in spite of her declaration of having lost her appetite. She selected the salmon and was pleased to find the small café served a wide variety of cocktails. It was a bit of a trendy favorite for wealthy alumni back for a Saturday of football, and it was designed for rich, fussy clientele. Gabriel behaved himself perfectly even when Naomi was recognized and pulled aside for pictures and a brief stint at a nearby table to share insider stories from the smoke-filled rooms in D.C. He worked his way quickly through three beers.

“Relax,” Kali told him watching Naomi glad-hand as if she were still campaigning. “Just another couple of hours, and then we can cut and run. It’s not that bad. She’s on her best behavior too.”

“Well, yeah,” he mumbled. “She knows her ass is on the line if word gets back to baby brother that she turned Wicked Witch of the West.”

“I thought that side of her was broken,” Kali put in, taking a sip from her water glass.

“Fucked if I know how it works. Shh! Here she comes.”

“Gabriel, you’re making me a nervous wreck,” Kali laughed. “Chill out.”

“Trouble?” asked Naomi sliding back into her chair. She was flushed with pleasure. She and Cas had that in common. A run-in with strangers in public – strangers who could do them good of one type or another – always made them both glow with happiness.

“Do you know what you’re wearing to the big wedding, Mom?” Gabe asked, apropos of getting her nose out of his business.

“Oh, well, the invitation was so sudden,” she demurred. “I would hate to have to scrounge up something from last season, but your brother really was quite the cad to spring it on me at the last moment. And Mother-of-the-Groom is not exactly a role I’ve ever played before, having been excluded from your wedding entirely, as I was. I may have to embarrass him by wearing a repeat!” Her face contorted in disgust just in case her lunch mates didn’t realize how horrifying that would be.

Castiel wouldn’t care if she showed up naked.

Gabe considered telling her that, but a look into the stress lines around Kali’s eyes stopped him.

“It’s, uh, short notice and all, but I’ll bet Kali can help you fix up one of your old dresses for the occasion if you asked her nicely.” Gabe kept one eye on his wife. It was a gamble.

“Oh? Do you work in textiles, Kari?”

“Kali, Mother.”

“Kali. Of course. How clumsy of me.”

“Yes, ma’am. I’m an artist of sorts. I’m doing all the wedding party’s clothing up until the reception. I’ve finished everything that’s critical if you’d like me to look through your dresses to see what we can work into a Mother-of-the-Groom-worthy gown. I have some time. If you’d like to purchase something off the rack and have me perfect it, we can do that too, but we would need to hurry a little bit.”

Naomi stared at her in silence. She seemed not to know how to take Kali. Was she an artist? Artists held a high status in Naomi’s world view. But she made wedding clothes. So she was a seamstress.
That made her a servant of sorts.

“Close your mouth, Mother. You’ll catch flies,” Gabe suggested.

“It’s only a suggestion,” Kali said to them both, unsure.

Gabe chuckled. His mother was still bereft of vocabulary. He leaned way in. “What she means to say, Kali, is yes, and thank you.”

“Well, of course,” Naomi said on his heels. “Yes, dear, that would be very generous. I don’t know what I would have done without you.”

“She gets that a lot,” Gabe cheeked with a wink at her over his glass.

“Don’t be silly,” said Kali. “You would have had time to get a fitting in somewhere. We still have two weeks.”

“Two weeks,” said Naomi uncomfortably, blinking. Gabriel frowned watching her. In moments she had drifted away inside her head.

“Mother?”

Unfocused eyes stared into his face, aware that his word meant herself, but unable to place just how. “Jesus,” he muttered, putting a hand on his mother’s shoulder and looking around, assessing for potential danger. “We’ve gotta get her out of here. We can’t let anyone see her like this.”

Kali handed him her key. “Take her to the car. I’ll settle the check and meet you there.”

“Good,” he said. “Good. I can do that.” He put his napkin on the table and squatted in front of his absent mother, careful to keep his voice down. “Mother. Mother! Fuck. You gotta listen to me right now. We’re leaving, and you need to walk with me. Come on, Mom. Come with me.” He stood up slowly so that hopefully, her eyes would follow his and her body would go along too. She stood up in a daze. “This way.” He took her hand and wrapped an arm across her shoulders, shooting a worried look back at Kali. She nodded encouragingly to him.

An hour and a half later, Kali drove them away from Naomi’s new condominium. The attendant staff had her in its custody. Gabe slouched miserably in the passenger side of Kali’s car with an arm thrown across his face, shaking. “Jesus fucking Christ!”

“I know, Gabe. Try to relax and breathe for me. We’re going home right now. Your brother’s home if you need an alpha.” Kali was speeding.

“Slow down, babe. I’m not taking one for coming home with a speeding ticket.”

“Thought you were catatonic. What do you care if I speed?” she shot, but she slowed a little. His face was ashen and the trembling was still wracking his whole body.

“I’m…freaking out a little, I think,” he managed.

“I’ll get you home, baby. You just hang tight and breathe.”

“He’s leaving tomorrow,” Gabe mourned in a rare show of worry.

“But he’s here now. Just let me get you home, and we’ll worry about tomorrow once you’ve got color in your cheeks again.”
He chuckled sadly. “Yeah, okay. One thing at a time.”

“I’m never going to see you again,” his mother said simply, reining her mournfulness back to a subtle touch. It seemed like a simple conclusion.

“That’s not true,” said Jack, leaving a kiss on her nose as he passed her in the hall again. “I’ll come back to visit. Believe me. You’re gonna be tired of us visiting all the time.”

“Us,” she said. “My little boy all grown up and Mating.”

“Really, Mom?” he asked, a touch exasperated.

“You still have baby fat on your cheeks, Jack. Humor me.”

He grinned. She tried to hide the sadness in her eyes when she touched his face, but she wasn’t completely successful.

“You’re going to be fine, Mom.”

“I’m going to miss you,” she said. “A lot.”

“Good,” he laughed. “I’d hate to think I could spend twenty-six years with you and move away without leaving a dent at all.”

“You’ll call me when you land?”

“Mom, it may come as a surprise, but I’m going to miss you too. I’ll call every chance I get.”

“You say that now,” she accused, taking the carry-on bag he handed her and following him into the living room. “But you’ll forget all about me when you Mate.”

He blanched. “Can we not talk about that right now?” He set the two suitcases in his hands on the floor, looking around to see if he’d left anything out he wanted to take.

“Nervous about Mating an alpha?” she asked him, reading his worry as only a mother could.

He sat heavily on the cushioned recliner in the living room, and she followed him down, taking a spot on the footstool, still covered in half-folded laundry. “I barely know her, Mom. All I have is a scent, a couple of emails, and a Skype conversation. What if she hates me? What if I can’t cut it at the big facility where she works? What if she tries to Mate me, and it doesn’t take? I never imagined Mating an alpha. What if she wants to Top all the time? I don’t think I’d want that.”

“Jack, listen to me.” Kelly found his eyes with hers. “She’s going to love everything about you. Your work here has been transformative to a whole community of Omegas. You are an incredible man, and you’re going to be just fine. And you found yourself a True-Mate, baby. Do you get how rich that is? It’s not all going to be easy, but a lot of it will be like you were made for each other. If you don’t want to be Topped, she’s your True-Mate, and she’s not going to want that either. You match. It’s not like other partners you’ve had. It’s like going home, only better. Believe me, Jack. I’ve been where you are. I know.”
“You miss him, don’t you?” Jack asked carefully.

Kelly’s eyes glassed over, but she kept them from spilling. “Every single day.”

“Mom, what if we Mate, and it’s just like you and Dad, and I lose her somehow? I’d have to be crazy to set myself up for that…or her. How can I do that to someone else either? I saw what you went through. It’s not worth it.” His eyes darted back and forth between hers, intent, seeking revelation.

She smiled again, and this time the tears flowed over and dropped into her lap. She carded fingers through his hair. “It’s totally worth it,” she said softly. “I wouldn’t trade a second of what I had with your father, not even if it meant I didn’t have all the pain that came after. You hear me? It’s worth it. You go out there and Mate that girl, and don’t you look back. You have a life ahead of you, Jack Kline, and your time has come. Call me once in a while, all right? And you’ll always have a room here. Come back and see me sometime.”

“I love you, Mom.”

“Love you, too, sweetheart. I’ll ship you whatever you forgot to pack.”

He rolled his eyes. “Who says I’m leaving anything behind? Besides, I’m not going straight into it. I’ve gotta settle up with the Pack Alpha first and make sure we’re copacetic. I don’t even meet her for more than a week. If worse comes to worst, I can fly home for the weekend and pack up whatever you want me to take.”

“Oh, because you’ll be made of money in only a week? Plane tickets aren’t cheap, Jack. You’ve got to be careful with your money from now on. You have a family to think of.” She ruffled his hair, and he dodged.

“I’m not the alpha though, Mom. I don’t have to be the breadwinner. That’s on Jo’s shoulders. She’s got seniority over me at the ACRI. She’s something like an Executive Vice-something or other. Probably makes a lot more money than I will for years. I figure I get to spend whatever I make like play money – buy string pearls and fur coats and shit.”

Kelly regarded her son with a frown. “You’d look pretty in a string of pearls.”

“I know!” he burst out, laughing. He stood up and buried her in a tight hug.

She pulled back and took his face in her hands. “Work hard,” she told him. “Protect your Pack. Answer to your Alpha and your mate. Don’t fight it, Jack. I know you can get stubborn and dig your heels in, but these ACRI folks, they don’t play. You could dig yourself in deep without realizing you’re holding a shovel.”

He nodded. “Take care of yourself, Mom. Call me whenever you want. I’m pretty sure phones still go both ways. And I want you to come visit us when we get settled.”

He laughed off her kisses. “I’m not sure ‘knock ‘em dead’ is the appropriate version of goodbye when your baby boy is heading out to get a Mating-scar on his shoulder. I’ll call when I get there. Promise.” Jack heard his phone buzz, and he knew it was a signal from the car at the curb. He collected his suitcases and stumbled out the door, decidedly not looking back at the house. His mother followed with his carry-on, and the driver helped them load the trunk.

He leaned down and kissed his mother’s cheek. Her warm hand on his arm was all the hug she offered out here in public. She nodded wetly at him, planting a stubborn smile on her face, and he nodded back.

She watched the car pull away from the curb and disappear around the corner. He turned around in the back seat just before it would have been too late, and she raised a hand in farewell.

***************

Ketch slung his hanging bag over his shoulder, shifting a little to get it centered. He cast a final look around his now barren apartment. He sighed, wondering vaguely if being capable of carrying everything he owned in two bags was a bad sign at his age. He thought not, unless the fact that one of the bags contained nothing but toys and impact implements counted against him.

He wasn’t going to miss this place. It was five years out of his life, but it was nothing more than a void between where he’d come from and where he was meant to be going. It was high time the train of his life finally pulled out of the station. It was past time he built a real career out of his natural talents. It was far past time he took a mate of his own. Ketch’s blood itched under his skin.

It was time.

He closed the door behind him and dropped the key unceremoniously in the apartment manager’s box on his way to his car. The car would be collected from the airport by a work colleague and sold, the proceeds sent on to him in Kansas. Ketch was sweating heavily as he started up the car, but he left the windows down and settled for air conditioning as nature intended. Everything was finally starting back up again. What was a little sweat?

***************

“Feeling better?” Michael asked from his place on the bed, on his belly with his heels raking over his backside, and his chin cradled in his arms.

“You’re a tease, Michael Quentin,” Dean shot at him, feeling miles better, and wishing he could take the improvement and do something useful with it where his mate was concerned. Michael felt the familiar longing, and he spread his knees wider. Dean had somewhere important to be. But he couldn’t walk away from naked, freshly showered, pregnant, Omega mate; not like this. Dean ran a hand underneath Michael’s knee and manhandled him around, lifting his hips up with a grip beneath each muscled thigh to Dean’s shoulder level, eliciting an unmanly squawk and a hearty laugh from his mate, who braced his torso on the bed with strong arms.

All the running was beginning to shape Michael’s thighs and calves, and Dean noticed as he buried his face in Michael’s richly scented channel. He plunged his tongue in, spearing him as deeply as he could.

“All! Jesus!” Michael was still laughing, but his shortles took on a gruff tone as his arms gave way. Dean let him settle flat. He followed his mate so that the alpha ended up on his knees. Dean rimmed him with gusto, tasting and licking until Michael squirmed in agony.
“Touch yourself, Michael,” Dean instructed before diving back in to lap wetly at his rim and reach in with both thumbs to stretch Michael open, allowing him to lick deeper. Michael got his knees beneath him and stroked himself in time with Dean’s tongue. When the Omega came, he doused Dean’s face with richly scented slick. Dean moaned at the smell alone. The flavor was one thing, but that smell. His puppy had altered the scent of its mother’s slick to set off Dean’s instinctive alpha responses, and he very suddenly had no plans ever to leave this room.

Michael groaned and rolled onto his back.

“Well, that did it,” whined Michael. “You wanted me to sleep until dinner. I think I’ll be out until tomorrow morning after that one.”

Dean chuckled into the bedding. “Me too. Only I can’t stay and sleep. I gotta get up onstage. Opening panel is in twenty minutes.”

“You gonna wash my mess off your face?” asked Michael sleepily.

“Fiancé’s marks on my ass, and mate’s slick in my five o’clock shadow,” murmured Dean. “I’m good to go just like this.”

“You’re depraved, Winchester,” Michael told him affectionately, slipping his eyes closed.

“You love me depraved,” said Dean, struggling to his feet and nudging Michael until he shifted to get underneath the covers. “Sit up and drink this whole bottle of water. I don’t care if it makes you pee. Travelling dehydrates you. Charlie’s got a key, and she’s going to check on you in a couple of hours. Order room service if you get hungry. Don’t leave the room for anything but a fire.”

“Mmm,” said Michael, taking the water bottle without opening his eyes.

“Michael?”

“Yeah?”

“Baby, you’re going to stay here and be good, right?”

“Right here, alpha. Cross my heart.” He cracked his green eyes a little bit as he took a deep swig.

“I’m not fucking around, man. I will fucking flay you if you cross me on this. Don’t go thinking you can play word games with me. We both know what I expect, and I’m not going to fuck around with technicalities. You hear me?”

“Dean. Alpha. I swear on my oldest, most ancient relatives. I’m good for it. I’m gonna be right here when you get back. Not going anywhere in the meantime. Not letting anyone in the room. Not gonna Skype with naked men through the hotel WiFi. Right here. Good for you in every way you want me. Go break a leg. Don’t fuck anyone though, okay? Please?”

Dean huffed. “I’ll be back in a few hours. Love you. Get some sleep. Watch whatever you want on cable, but you know the rules. They don’t change here. Keep both bonds wide open for me, man. And take care of this while I’m gone.” Dean touched Michael’s expanding belly.

“Kiss me before I fall asleep.”

Dean wasn’t sure he met that deadline. Michael seemed out for the count before he even pulled away. He scrubbed a hand across the scruff on his own chin, smearing what was left of Michael’s slick and spreading it evenly so it would dry without flaking heavily.
“Jesus Christ, Dean, you smell pregnant!” protested Sam in the elevator. Dean smiled with all the smugness he could manage before he paled, remembering that he would never get a chance to tease Sam back in the same way.

Shit.

“Relax, alpha,” Sam told him, catching the scent of mortification and guessing where Dean’s mind had gone. “I don’t envy you this one. You reek, man.”

Jo was waiting for them as the elevator doors opened, and Dean got a nearly verbatim repeat of disgust from his best friend, but this time he didn’t temper his smugness at all. He pulled Jo in for a tight hug and rubbed his face on her throat just a little.

“Gross! Winchester, you need a fucking straightjacket! And a babysitter! God!”

He laughed, lifted a middle finger for her, and took his instruction sheet from Charlie.

“Touch me with whatever smells like that, and I’ll castrate you in your sleep,” Charlie told him calmly. “I have a key to your room.”

“What?” he asked in feigned dismay, inciting her to gesture that she would be watching him… fingers to eyes, out toward him, and back. Fiercely.

Spoilsports, all of them. Like they’d never smelled Omega slick before. Dean smirked happily to himself as Meg rounded the back of the stage.

“Jesus, Mary, and Joseph!” she called. “He broke you! Goddamnit, Dean, if you ever see me like that,” she pointed him up and down to indicate she meant the whole package. “Shoot me.”

“Fine,” he grumbled. He poured water from a bottle onto a handkerchief from his pocket and scrubbed his face with it. “Bunch of clenched ass-wipes, all of you,” he told Meg. “Your time is at hand, my friend. I give you a month. You’ll show up to work dripping wet.”

“Forget it, Winchester. We’re up,” she told him grabbing the handkerchief and throwing it into a trashcan.

“HEY! That was Castiel’s!”

“Well, it’s garbage now. Get your ass on the stage.” She shoved him with a hissed whisper: “And try NOT to advertise that you brought your mate with you. Jesus! It was supposed to be a secret!”

Oh. Right. Michael’s scent on his chin might be fun to tease his friends with, but would the audience notice? Sam slipped past him and held the curtain open, mouthing, ‘It’s fine,’ to him.

Dean took a minute to catch himself. He’d been happily floating away on the hormones that Michael was beating him over the head with and forgetting all about the job at hand. Dean looked up into Sam’s face. That familiar nod met him, centered him, steeled him.

He gripped his microphone and stepped into the lights. Just don’t fuck anybody. He was pretty sure he could remember that.
Castiel stopped in the doorway to the Master suite and watched her. An afternoon spent stabilizing Gabriel with calm supportive words and a hand always touching his body somewhere had left Castiel feeling particularly family-centered. He felt drawn to his mate somehow, even more than usual. The wave of affection that surged up from his gut when he found her dressing for the evening was warm and welcome. He braced his hands on the doorframe above him and stood there like a creep, watching her dress. She knew he was there, but she continued on without speaking or turning. Her body wanted him. Badly. That pull from within him that he felt turning his insides to goo was beginning to reflect back from inside her own. It was an echoing call for a pup by both bodies, where once it had only been his. But the physical connection wasn’t going to be enough to sustain them forever. They needed to build on the shaky ground beneath them and find a way to connect as people.

“I’m going to New York next weekend,” he said at last. “I need to do some business with some of our donors, and it can’t be done from here. I’m thinking of flying out on Thursday and coming home Sunday night.”

She turned to face him, and her breath caught. He was framed in the doorway with his arms raised above his head, leaning slightly in.

He was a god.

April collected herself with an internal grumble of irritation. She couldn’t keep letting his beauty derail her like that. “Three days without you is going to be hard, Cas, but I’ll be okay. Dean will be here.” She turned back to hide the fear and sadness in her eyes, but she didn’t even attempt to muffle what he could feel through their bond. She was through with doing that – for better or worse. “It’s close to the wedding though, and we promised to help ‘Martt’ move. Your absence is going to be missed.”

“Martt?”

She giggled. “It’s their ‘ship name. You like it?”

“Kitten, come with me. To New York. Please?”

She turned and gaped at him. He was asking? Why was he asking? What was that sensation he had roiling around in his sternum? He left the doorway, and she absolutely didn’t fixate on the way his shoulders shifted as his arms dropped. “I’m not taking Dean. He and Michael both have work here. There’s wedding planning still going on, and you’re right, I should help with the move. I’m the one who offered them our help. But I can’t put this trip off. I tried, but it can’t wait another month. I want you to come with me. I’ll understand if you need to stay here and work.” He arrived at her place on the plush carpeting just as she turned back around so that he came up behind her and wrapped warm palms over her hips.

“Come with me, Kitten. I need you.” His lips were soft and dry on her shoulder, and she rested the side of her head against his.

“How will you get any work done? You’d be too worried about me alone in a hotel room…”

“No, April,” he turned her with his hands at her waist. “I’m not leaving you in the hotel. I want you to see New York. I want to go there with you. I can get everything finished by mid-day on Friday – by three at the latest. I want to take you to a Broadway show or two. I want to spend some time with you, love. Just you and me…and Nicholas, I suppose.”

Her eyes widened. “Cas…”

“Look, he’s been badgering me endlessly to bring you up there anyway. You can spend Thursday night and most of Friday in heavy conference with him and the others about the show. He has a guy he wants you to meet for the job as your agent. He can introduce you to people, April. I know you said you don’t want to use my connections to build your career, but this is how it’s done. You make a connection, and it spreads out from there. Go and meet the glitterati in New York. Do whatever musicians do. Make some connections of your own. You don’t need me for that; I’d just be in the way.”

“Go out into New York with just Nick? Cas, are you ill?”

“Well, Jenn watches over him, but he doesn’t really need a chaperone most of the time. And I trust him. He’s a brat, but he knows how to move around the city and in and out of the people around him without getting mauled. He’ll keep you safe. He’ll probably want you to workshop with the musicians and meet the show’s crew. I don’t know what all, but you can expect not to get a lot of sleep while you’re in his presence. I gather the important connections mostly happen in the middle of the night in his circles.”

She gazed up at him. His earnestness poured out. He was trying so hard, and the bond fairly vibrated with his unease. He licked his lip and sighed.

He braced himself and continued. “Friday night, Saturday night, I’ll get us tickets. What would you like to see?” His blue eyes danced. She could feel his body heat warming the air between them, what little air there still was between them.

“I don’t know,” she told him. “I should get advice from Nick, I think.”

“Good,” he nodded solemnly. “I’ll call him.”

“Are you all right, Castiel?” she asked carefully. She stepped away and collected her necklace from the bureau, handing it to him and turning her back to him while lifting her hair. He draped the necklace over her front and fastened it easily, then rested his hand on her neck.

“I’m fine, Kitten. It’s been a tumultuous few weeks. You and I need to start again at understanding each other, and that makes me wary for some reason. I can’t put my finger on why I’m still uneasy.”

“I broke your trust,” she told him, setting a hand on his arm. “I don’t expect a quick fix from that.”

His heavy sigh was the only answer she got, coupled with a wave of sadness from his side of the bond. He wrapped an arm around her front across her chest from one shoulder to the other, and he pulled her in tightly.

“I’m not going to give up on winning it back, Alpha. I’m good for it. You’ll see. I’ll wait.”

He hugged her even tighter still. “I’m conflicted, Kitten – turned all around and baffled where you’re concerned. I love everything about you, and we fit so well together in almost every way without having to try. I enjoy spending time with you, playing with you…If you feel up to the sport of playing mind games with me in the big sandbox, then I’m all for it. Let’s do it! What the hell am I still worried about?”

He released her and sat down right on the floor, his back to the bed, his knees up wide before him.
He looked up at her as at a puzzle he couldn’t unlock.

“Maybe we’re asking too much,” she said. “Being mates comes easy. Maybe we should settle for that.”

He cocked his head to the side. “That wouldn’t be enough for you,” he deduced. “That wouldn’t make you happy at all.”

“I would have Michael,” she murmured softly. “Cas, I don’t know if you have it in you to give me more. I can’t ask more of you than you can give. That wouldn’t be fair. After everything, after all the tangles and the talking, and the…after everything, you’re still holding back…something. Maybe it’ll come with time, and maybe you won’t ever be able to give me that part of you. I’ll take whatever you can give, and I can be happy with it. It’s enough. You’re enough.”

He studied her as if trying to determine if she meant it how it sounded. Then he frowned. “No, it’s not enough,” he argued. “Neither of us will be satisfied with the barest bones of a relationship. We are both more than the sum of our parts, and I don’t want you just to fulfill my chemical needs. I know we’re having a rough time connecting, but I love you, damnit!”

April risked mussing her performance dress by sinking down next to him. “I love you, too,” she told him quietly. “But I’m not sure if I love the real you or the public face. I’m coming to know you slowly, and everything I learn helps build us both up stronger. You make me laugh. You make me feel strong. You’re so much greater and smarter and more powerful than I am. I feel safe with you, but I also feel brave. Is that just the chemical needs thing? Is there more? Is it hopeless that I’ll ever know for sure?”

His soft eyes grew troubled, and he looked away. She saw his jaw set with stubborn resolve, and he focused back onto her face with energy and light, pulling up onto his knees to face her.

“Come to New York with me. You do your thing with Nicholas while I’m doing mine with the corporate whores I have to pretend to respect. Then we’ll go out. You and me. We’ll stay out all night and make headlines in the tabloids. Come play with me, April.”

She laughed at his childlike exuberance, caught up in his charisma, swept off her feet by his enthusiasm. “When you put it like that…” she said as he leaned in and kissed her hard enough to remind her who he was on all levels.

He nuzzled into her hair as their kiss broke. “Baby, I’m sorry, but I can’t knot you for a while. We need to be careful. I don’t want to risk you catching before your Heat. Heat can cause complications to an early pregnancy. We have to wait.”

“So we’ll wait. Does this mean everything’s off the table? I mean, they sell condoms at the drugstore on the corner.” She bit her lip shyly and blinked up at him. The look he gave her was adorably confused, and then he laughed.

“I haven’t had sex without a bloodstream full of prophylactic hormones for so long, I hadn’t even considered that,” he laughed and then erupted into gales hard enough to bring tears to his eyes, amused at his own idiocy. She chuckled alongside him.

“You’re joking,” she accused, but he fed her a tone of embarrassment through the bond, and she shook her head slowly in wonder, adoring everything about him in that moment.

***************

April wasn’t sure quite what to think of the venue at first, but she was shocked when the Mistress of Ceremonies nearly trampled a Japanese couple in his haste to get Castiel in a bear hug. The man was enormous – easily over six feet tall without the stilettos, and Amazonian with them. He nearly smothered Cas, shrieking the whole time, and Cas emerged rumpled and laughing.

“Jordyn! It’s good to see you, too. We need a table in the back. I’d prefer not to be too obvious tonight. Can you slip us in unnoticed?” The question was preposterous. Everyone was looking at them, but Jordyn’s eyes flew wide, and he made an effort, putting a manicured finger to his own lips and stage whispering:

“Follow me!”

Mark disappeared into the crowd, but the rest of them, Benny and Andrea, Cas and April, Matt and Bobby all filed in, following the outlandish transvestite in bright crimson sequins. Jordyn’s hands were in April’s hair before they even made it to the table, cooing over its softness, begging Cas to let him take the Ozzie backstage with him for a makeover. He wanted to play dress up with her before the show began, and he had both Cas and April laughing as they sat.

“Actually, my friend,” Cas told him, pulling the gargantuan man into the empty seat beside him. “April’s why we’re here. I hear it’s Open Mic night. Do you think you could squeeze her in for a spot?”

“Oh, no, baby doll!” Jordyn over-emoted his disappointment, crushed to have to spoil her hopes. “We’re full to the brim. Some big new thing stuck her nose in and signed up in every empty space we had. I’m so sorry! Sweetie, you got to call ahead on drag night. It gets cray-cray around here!”

Matt leaned in and cleared his throat. “Check again, man. This girl IS the ‘big new thing’. She’s on the list already.”

“WHAAT!? THIS girl? Nooo! That was a Winchest…OH, FUCK!! You mean THIS girl?!!?”

April tried not to laugh. It was loud and effusive and everything Castiel usually despised, but she felt nothing but affection and amusement through the bond from him, and she couldn’t help smiling as well. Her smile vanished when the Primate man in sequins and stilettos grabbed her by the hand and launched her nearly airborne to get her backstage, declaring her ensemble completely unacceptable.

Cas watched her go with a smile on his face.

“You could have warned her about Jordyn, Alpha,” Benny rebuked.

“I didn’t realize he was working here, Benny. It’s wonderful to see him that happy.”
“Friend of yours?” put in Andrea, and Cas chuckled again.

“Bobby sent him to me years ago for one of my – our…” he amended, including Benny. “… gender studies in grad school. He was a wreck back then. Didn’t have the slightest idea where he fit or how to ask for what he wanted.”

“He blossomed fast once he met a few others in our study though,” said Benny. “He just needed a safe place to explore.”

“And money for shoes,” put in Bobby. “Those sparkly straps holding his feet to the pointy soles that are torquing his feet all out of alignment probably cost 500 bucks, easy.”

“Where did Mark go?” asked Castiel, looking around.

“Who knows,” answered Matt, distracted. “Networking, probably. He knows everyone in Kansas City. This might look like an amateur dive, but if there are insiders here, he’ll find them. It’s gimmicky, but my boy knows what he’s doing. This is going to be real music, Alpha. It’s not just glitter and posing. The set band is real. The performers are veterans. They only adopt new faces if the newbs can prove they have the chops to hold their own and fight for stage space. Divas don’t like to share. April’s got her work cut out for her here. Mark’s probably trying to see if he can get her a set at the piano.”

Cas nodded and sat back. He could still feel her, and she was not in any distress. He had promised to get out of her way and let her try her hand at performing. He had to admit, this wasn’t what he pictured at all, but it wasn’t his career, and she wasn’t alone.

Mark’s face was all business when he found them a few minutes later. He and Matt put their heads together in conference. People stopped by their table to talk again and again, passing over Castiel to speak with Mark, most notably a tiny Scottish redhead with a thick brogue and a long red cocktail dress who let Matt pull up a chair for her. She stayed through the first set, through April’s premiere song, and through Jordyn making a flourish of seating April, now caked in makeup and sporting plumes in her hair, to a seat at the piano to play with the musicians as backup for the next set. The redhead Scotswoman had a calculating look in her eyes. She whispered incessantly with Mark, and then abandoned her seat without so much as a backward glance.

Mark looked triumphant, and Matt smiled as he continued to take an epic amount of notes. This was a business meeting for the two men. April performed twice more at the microphone, bravely introducing a song of her own composition, and she backed up several other performers with her playing and her impromptu support vocals. She slipped in easily and highlighted the singers’ talents. The audience responded powerfully to her.

Cas thought she was brilliant.

But Matt’s face was stern when she made it back to the table on wobbly heels at the break. He set about going through the notes he’d taken, and April shot Cas one sweet smile before she buckled down to listen to her teacher.

Apparently, she made herself too present in her backup of others. Matt made the point emphatically: Divas don’t share the stage. Get out of the limelight, or get off altogether. Keep your head down and be invisible. No one’s looking at the band when divas take the stage. And for God’s sake, keep the vocals unobtrusive. There’s no faster way to make a bad name for yourself around here than be accused of stealing someone else’s performance.

April took it with the air of a student eager to learn, nodding in concentration. Cas watched her, and Benny watched Cas. After she left again, wobbling off with a stinging swat to her ass by Mark, Benny leaned in. “I think this is harder on you than it is on her. You sure you’re okay, boss?”

“I don’t like watching her struggle,” Cas admitted.

“You think it’s adorable if she pukes, though,” Benny told him. “Put her up on a stage, and you can’t imagine there’d be anyone in the world who wouldn’t fall all over themselves to gush over how great she is.” There was a tease and more than a grain of truth to Benny’s words.

“She is pretty great,” Cas told him, missing the point flagrantly.

“ALL RIGHT!” cackled Jordyn, falling into Mark’s empty chair by Castiel. “Where have you been hiding her all this time?”

“You can’t have her, Jordyn,” Benny told him. “She’s already taken.”

Jordyn sat back in disgust, batting his fake lashes. “ECH! Thank you, Jesus, for small miracles! I don’t mean like that, you pervert! I mean…” He caught Castiel’s eye, and he was instantly smaller and quieter. The affectation dropped, and so did the timbre of his voice. “Cas, man, this girl’s the real deal. What is she doing here?”

Cas smiled and touched his arm. “She’s practicing, Jordyn. Most of us don’t have your natural polish without practice. She’s got a lot to learn.”

“Mmm,” he agreed. “But her instincts are good. Look at her up there,” he nodded toward the piano where April sat playing. “You see how she let her hair fall a little to cover her face? She’s using that to fade into the background. That’s not an accident.”

Cas glanced at Matt who was still furiously taking notes and mumbling to himself. “Jordyn, do you know the other man who was with us? The one who sat where you are? Have you seen him before?”

“Simpson? What kinda question is that? Everybody knows Mark Simpson. Alpha, that man IS Kansas City music.”

“Then what was he doing where I found him in a conservatory in Topeka?” Cas asked as softly as he could over the music, hoping Matt didn’t hear him.

Jordyn shrugged. “Hell if I know. Everybody has bills to pay, I guess. It costs a pretty penny to tie the knot, and he’s tying his balls to a chain any day now, if my news is correct. I heard he thought he could get an inside step on picking out the next great up and comer. Looks like he did.” He nodded back toward the stage. The heavily costumed singer was bowing his thanks to the crowd and made a point of directing some of the applause to the pianist, obviously pleased with her. April beamed. Matt glanced up but then tucked back down and kept writing.

They didn’t see Mark again for two hours. It took a while for Cas to realize that Bobby was gone too. Benny cast Cas a worried look, but Cas felt reassured rather than worried. The world was as it should be if the people he trusted to move silently through the dark places where the reeds were thickest were out of his line of sight. It meant they were doing precisely what he most trusted them to do – keeping his Pack safe and paving him a way forward. Cas raised his glass in a silent toast to Benny and then sipped.

Benny looked askance from his best friend, to the stage, and back again. He leaned in close. “Dean’s right about you. You’re a Mob boss. Don’t bother denying it.”
Cas chuckled into his glass. “I wouldn’t dream of it.”

At the conclusion of the evening, one thing was clear. April needed voice lessons. She was passable by normal standards, far better than some performers whose recordings top the charts, but natural talent and an ear that could mimic others wasn’t going to cut it where Mark wanted her performing. The Kennedy Center didn’t hand out medals to ‘Passables’. She didn’t seem to take offense or count the advice as an insult or a defeat though. She glowed with triumph at having withstood the tempest of a crazy stage where ‘Over the Top’ was just the start. They adored her backstage, most of the performers trying to adopt her on the spot and scuffling over who got to apply her makeup.

She’d made friends. Her feet were killing her, but she’d stepped up and ad-libbed backups for some of the most demanding divas in Missouri, and walked away with their adoration. It was a step. Just one. And it would mean very little in the long run. It was just a practice run, a chance to let her coaches see her under the spotlights and focus in on where she was weak.

From here, there would be a lot of work. She had many more nights like this one yet to come. She had miserable work sessions in studios not yet imagined where nothing would go right for hours and tempers flared up hot and fast. She had marathon composing sessions ahead of her, when deadlines would be looming, and the notes didn’t want to come.

But not yet.

Cas sat across from her in the back seat, rubbing her feet, watching her think in silence. He basked in the sensation of her emotions, laid out before him in all their depth and rich, rich colors, and he wondered what she was thinking as she watched the street lights flow by one after another.

She looked around at him, and she smiled. A coy look down at her lap and then up again from beneath her lashes, and Cas no longer had to wonder what she was thinking. After a night as intense as this one, she would need help rebalancing. She was holding it together for the long drive home, but she could only do that so long.

Cas cleared his throat and tapped Benny on the shoulder. Benny looked up into the rearview mirror. “Something bothering you, Alpha?” he teased.

“See if you can find a 24-hour drugstore, Benny. I need a box of condoms.”

They’d been friends a long time, and had been through all kinds of trials together, but the great Castiel Winchester, Alpha of alphas, finding himself caught out on the town with a horny Omega and no protection, wasn’t something he was ever going to let his friend forget. Cas took the ribbing but reminded Benny that if there’s one thing Mob bosses know, it’s vengeance.

Benny wasn’t fazed. He was the one with the car keys after all.

They got the Winchester couple situated with little fuss, and the four of them giggled their way into the kitchen entrance. Only Cas was tipsy, but his playful mood infected everyone.

Benny and Andrea had decided to stay over so that their dog and April’s could bond, teaching the puppy some doggie social skills. And Benny had an early morning ahead of him. Jack and Ketch would both be arriving early, and Benny wanted to be there. He and Cas hatched a plan to bring them in while their mates were away in North Carolina and let Andrea and Benny both get to know them. It was the first Convention Benny had missed in years, but he didn’t regret his decision to skip out.

Benny’s new betas would stay at the Winchester estate in the Gate house. It was an elegant plan. Cas needed to leave town tomorrow for a couple of pivotal meetings in Dayton, and Benny was taking custody of April while her mate was gone. Having his two new Packmates there as well meant that April could expect to be allowed to work uninterrupted, kept company by Andrea who was less likely to hover over her every move.

And the puppy would get everyone’s attention. A permanent yard for Portia was being fenced in over the weekend, so she could frolic outside at her leisure without the danger of getting lost.

The couples stumbled up the stairs together but parted at the top. Benny knew where he was going. He practically had a room of his own here.

“Hey, brother,” he called up the hall to the Alpha whose head was already bent low over his Ozzie’s neck. “It’s been a long time. You need me to show you how to use one of those rubber things?”

Castiel flipped him off, and Andrea pointed out loudly that with the current state of her own belly, there was no clear evidence that Benny knew how to use a condom any better than Castiel might. Castiel reached down and hoisted April up into his arms bridal style and carried her into his room, slamming the door hard behind him.

Benny snickered. He wasn’t drunk, just thrilled to see his best friend happy and excited to get his own Pack off the planning room floor at long last.

“Come on, Mercutio,” his mate coaxed. “Two couples can play at that game. And we don’t need a condom.”

Chapter End Notes

Only one chapter this month. Yuletide family stuff consumed a lot of my time. Everybody is well this year. They say hi.

I liked working some parallels into this chapter. That was satisfying.
Chapter 102

Chapter Summary

Gabe's losing ground in every direction and finding himself pretty OK with that. Benny sets the new guys some boundaries.

Chapter Notes

Oh, my dearest loves. I've missed writing terribly. It's been so long. Adoration and appreciation to all of you for being so damn supportive. You guys are at the forefront of my thoughts when the therapist asks me if I've got a solid support structure, and I say, Yep! I'm set! They're the best!

And I continue to be committed to actually finishing the thing at some point. We really are making progress. Just slowly. Think of it as a delay/denial kink of mine. Yeah, that's what it is.

This THEN section was born from a suggestion, as many are. I throw it out there: if there's something from anyone's past you want to see, no promises, mind you, but I'm very open to requests.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

THEN:
Castiel didn’t like to frequent the clubs when he visited New York and other big cities, but he dropped in now and then to make sure he had a feel for the pulse of popular BDSM play styles. He couldn’t afford to lose touch with what the Primates were doing, even if a lot of it felt dreadfully off base to him.

He never took Dean. Dean wasn’t for play, and he wasn’t for showing off. He was a jealously guarded secret. He was Castiel’s and Cas’ alone.

Not for sharing, not even by harmless voyeurs.

He sat near the back of the public space, dimly lit, sipping red wine, and for the first time this evening, he was alone.

The orange wristband he sported advised others that he was not playing this evening, but most of them knew who he was, and they liked to sidle up to the booth he’d made into his perch and pester him with questions.

No, that wasn’t fair. Having questions has never been a crime, and it stands to reason that if Cas has answers, Cas should make himself available to answer. At least within reason. Cas knew no one here tonight but the proprietor, a wolf named Sandy, and a few of the employees. Most of the clientele were Primates, priding themselves on playing in a “wolf” space as if that added credence to the silly play-acting they did with each other.

Castiel grunted quietly to himself, disgusted at his own harsh contempt. Tomorrow, he would fly down to Providence to scope out the community outreach facilities there and meet with an investor who wanted an ACRI-style facility built on the Brown University campus. Cas wasn’t even seriously considering expanding the business yet. They were still feeling their way through in Kansas.

He sipped from his glass, watching the stage where a binding demonstration was turning more into a full public scene than a demo. Cas was pleased with the couple. They weren’t Lupin, but they seemed to have the subtle, nonverbal interplay down better than most apes. The Domme was quick to respond to discomfort that hadn’t been intended, and the sub spoke trust with his eyes, not fear as so many ape subs seemed to do, at least in the clubs Cas had visited. Would that he could alter that.

They were a good pairing, and Cas let his eyes wander out into the spectators, many of whom were so engrossed in the stage show, they stood slack-mouthed and lusting. The smell was cloying. Cas would need a shower.

He spotted a couple near the back, and he focused on them, not alarmed exactly, merely attentive. The Dom was dressed in an oozy white silk shirt and a pair of black trousers that probably came from a tuxedo ensemble. At his feet, a diminutive sub knelt, mostly nude, clearly uncomfortably cold and trembling. The man’s hand clutched harshly in her hair, mussing it at the top of her head from the tidy and sophisticated bun she had knotted at her nape. The woman looked miserable in every sense of the word, and the man was ignoring her except where his grip was causing her pain. His eyes were on the stage, and one hand stroked a flat palm over his erection. The sub couldn’t have seen anything if she’d tried.

Cas took another sip, scenting the air afterward, seeking any olfactory tell he might be able to get from the couple. There was nothing. The room was too full of horny escapades to pick out an individual scent. He watched them.
The demo ended, and the stage cleared, sweat and semen swiftly wiped away by staff, and all the binding ropes coiled neatly in the Domme’s carryall. The audience began to disperse. Cas’ focus went back to the pair near the rear. The Dom had pulled her bodily to her feet by her hair, and was speaking harshly to her in her ear. She winced, and her hands came up to hold his wrist and his hand, an effort to extract herself.

Her face turned from discomfort to frustration to anger in rapid turns, and her voice lifted above the crowd.

“I said no! I don’t want to do this anymore! Let go!”

Castiel stood up.

“You swore to me, little girl. You can’t be good for one fucking night? Didn’t I promise I would take care of you if you’ll just do what I say for one evening? You act like it’s all about you! Spoiled, useless, piece of…”

Castiel’s grip on his lapel startled him enough that he let go of her hair, and she dropped back down to her knees without his hold. Cas walked the man backward until his back thumped against the wall, and he held him there with a forearm across his chest.

“What the fuck, man!?”

“What’s that young woman’s safeword?” Cas asked him.

“Jesus! Let go of me, you asshole! It’s none of your business. She’s into humiliation shit! We were just playing around. Haven’t you ever heard of scening? She gets off on it. Trust me, man, she loves it!”

The man smelled out of control. He smelled like dominant aggression turned loose. He smelled dangerous.

“I asked you a question,” Castiel replied, steel in his tone. His forearm pressed tighter against the hard chest in front of him.

“And I said mind your own damn business!”

Cas could sense the club’s muscled bouncers taking positions flanking him, but he didn’t turn.

“I rarely repeat questions once I’ve asked them, but I’ll give you one more opportunity, as you seem rather dim to me. What is her safeword?”

“We don’t have one, all right? We agreed to a free night. Anything I want goes! She agreed, mister, so mind your fucking business and get off me or I’ll have you thrown out on your ass! Last time I looked, she called ME Daddy, not you!”

“You initiated a hardcore humiliation scene with no means for the sub to tap out?” Cas asked him, repulsed at the recklessness of apes.

“She. Loves. It.” He answered. “Leslie, tell this cretin you love it!”

Cas turned his head a fraction and found her with his peripheral vision. She was standing near one of the bouncers with his suit jacket draped across her shoulders, trembling too hard to speak and giving off terror in her scent.
“Bruce,” Cas said to the bouncer who had relinquished his blazer. “Take her to one of the empty rooms and calm her down. Call Carmen in. Get her some juice and something to wear.”

“Sure thing, Alpha,” Bruce answered, settling his massive palms over her shoulders and turning her gently with a soft word in her ear. Bruce could be the gentlest man Cas had ever known. Or he could tear a body in two. Cas thought it might be best to have him elsewhere. He turned his attention back to the ape in his grip.

“Look,” said the dickwad in tuxedo pants. “I get it. You misread what you were seeing. It happens. We should maybe play at home next ti…!” He choked off his word as Cas shifted his arm to fall across his throat.

“I haven’t misread anything,” Cas assured him. “And YOU aren’t ever going to see or touch that young lady again.”

“You can’t tell me…” He ran out of air again and petered off.

“That may be entirely true, my friend,” Cas said lightly. “Or you may well find that I CAN instruct you in the proper care and treatment of a sub, and that I CAN decide whom you must never contact again. You may find that I can ENFORCE my instruction as well,” Cas enunciated the word carefully, and the douchwheel’s eyes widened.

“Who are you?” Cas was asked. It wasn’t the first time someone like this pathetic loser had asked him that, and he could hear Dean’s playful voice in his head…(I’m Batman) or (I’m no one to be trifled with), and Cas’ lip twitched incrementally.

“My name is Castiel, and you’ll find that my presence in this place holds weight. Given a chance to explain ourselves and our mutual actions this evening, you’re going to be gravely disappointed that my opinion carries far more credibility than yours. And that leaves you a couple of choices. Would you like to hear them?”

“No, that’s not one of the choices.” The other bouncer at Cas’ back chuckled. Cas turned his head and spoke to him. “Jared, would you please give us some privacy?”

“Sure thing, Alpha. Folks, back up a bit!” Jared began shooing the crowd back to their regular activities, and Cas softened his arm a bit.

“I’m going to give you a little advice, mister…?”

“Fuck you!”

“‘Jim’ struggled in Castiel’s grip, but Cas had him bound in place, even as it seemed like there wasn’t enough pressure exerted to hold him there. “It is critical if you’re going to attempt this type of play, that you are fully aware of your own compulsions and how to control them. What you’ve mistaken for an urge to dominate a partner is actually a psychotic impulse to release an unfettered and destructive level of aggression. You, Jim, are not a candidate for safe BDSM play. You are immature and impulsive, and your sadistic impulses pass unfiltered onto your unwitting victim. Don’t try this again unless you’ve sought and completed a concentrated course of intensive psychotherapy. You’re forthwith banned from this club and all others within a fifty mile radius. You need to find a safe outlet for your aggression. I hear that pounding old tractor tires with a sledgehammer works for some people."

‘Jim’ was irate. His face was bright red, although, to be fair, his airway was also partially restricted.

“Calm yourself, Jim. I’m going to let you breathe freely, and I want you to take in slow, deep breaths until your heart rate slows. Listen to me while you calm down. Shh, don’t speak.”

Jim’s furious glare didn’t leave Cas’ face, but he’d stopped struggling.

“Good. I need you to understand that a proper D/s scene gives as much to the sub as it does to the dom, but that’s not something you can take for granted. The very moment the Dom fails to listen to the sub or fails to notice distress is the moment he forfeits the right to lead. I’m not telling you this by way of instruction. I am NOT instructing you, Jim. Do you understand? I’m putting an explanation to the consequence you’ve earned, wherein your rights to Top other people has been revoked. Do not engage in any form or power exchange play with live people. Do you understand?”

“The fuck…? You can’t…”

Cas’ fist closed in a tangle of the man’s hair, and he slammed the 70’s disco wannabe’s skull into the plaster, leaving a slightly rounded dent in the wall.

“Ungh!” Jim grunted.

“Are you still listening to me, Jim? Nod for me.”

Jim’s unfocused eyes cracked open, and he nodded slightly, taking the opportunity to size up the man who seemed to be able to do whatever he wanted. Castiel shifted to bring his face very close to Jim’s. The man went completely still.

“Good. Here’s the kicker. Take this chance you’ve been given, once you’re released to crawl back to your lair without a stopover at the precinct for fingerprints and assault charges, and learn something from it. Tonight could well be the turning point for your life, but that depends entirely upon you. Jared is going to throw your ass out now, but he’s going to slip you a short list of resources that you can use if you’re interested in joining the world of adults who have mastered the skill of self-restraint. Do you understand?”

“Yeah…” Jim blinked, stunned at his own answer.

“Don’t forget your ban, Jim. Don’t forget that I will be very displeased if I learn you’ve attempted to break it. My name is Castiel, and I will be watching.”

Cas let him go and backed up several feet. Jim came off the wall looking dazed.

“You may gather your things and leave with dignity, escorted by my good friend Jared; or you may throw a tantrum and have you hip bruised by the pavement as you’re flung unceremoniously from the premises. Leslie will be escorted home safely. You may relinquish your sense of worry for her wellbeing now. She is not yours to protect. Have a lovely evening, Jim.”

“Chad.”

“I beg your pardon?”

“Name’s not Jim. It’s Chad.”

Cas beckoned Jared, a Primate with the bulky body-type of a beta, but the disposition of an alpha.
“Jared, would you please escort Chad to the exit? You will want to retain a copy of his ID, so that you can blacklist him until further notice.”

“I got him, Alpha. Go enjoy your drink. Show’s starting soon. We got a strapping lesson.”

“Thank you, Jared. I do love a good strapping.”

NOW:

Dean’s back glistened with sweat which aggravated the scored fingernail marks striping him from shoulders to hips. He quivered, head tucked down between his arms, hands clutching the wooden slats on the headboard.

He held.

And Michael gloated.

That was all his doing, and the pair of them were magnificent. If only someone could see.

“You did it, angel,” Michael praised earnestly. “You remember what we said? You want me to take the ring off and let you feel what you just earned from me?” He crawled up onto the bed behind his mate, running a soothing hand along his heaving flank. Dean didn’t manage any words, but he nodded, his face turned downward. Away.

It was too much.

Every molecule vibrated separately from every other, and Dean couldn’t catch the rhythm of breathing. What a way to go though, eh? Suffocate on his own ineptitude? Maintain perfect concentration through the whole ordeal and earn that tone from Michael only to succumb by failing to remember how to breathe, the first skill he ever learned? His chest heaved, and his back rounded, pulling at the welts and setting his body alight with a crisp stinging that caught his attention.

He gasped.

“Shh, shh,” Michael smoothed. “All done, sweetest. Goddamn, you’re beautiful!” Michael’s voice and his touch centered the Sub. Slow, steady strokes up and down his ribs gave him something to mimic when the concept of breathing fled once more. He slowed down to Michael’s soft, pleased voice, his careful touch.

“I’m reaching beneath you, baby. Gonna unsnap the ring. Don’t flinch. Be my good boy.” Dean squeezed his eyes closed. His body so flooded with adrenalin and endorphins, it felt separate from the mind holding him to a regular breathing pattern, frustratingly necessary if he intended to maintain consciousness through his reward. Separate too, was the wolf, panting in the sunlight, ears pricked forward, then laying swiftly down again in a circular repeat, looking for something solid.

He gasped again as the cockring released its hold and disappeared. A warm, dry hand circled him, applying a firm easy pressure but not going anywhere with it. Michael scuffled a little at Dean’s back looking for the best position, but he soon settled. The hand slid backward and squeezed his knot – full, swollen, sore, and hot.

“OH! SIR!!”
“Shh, it’s all right, sweetheart. Relax. Breathe with me and relax. Don’t talk. I’ve got you.” Michael adjusted his torso to lay over Dean’s left side, pressing his Sub’s chest into the bed so that only the structure of Dean’s thighs, set rigidly against the bedding from hip to knee offered him height off the soft welcoming mattress. The lightest push in the wrong direction would topple him, but that would spoil Michael’s reward. Michael moved carefully, mind wide to Dean’s senses – all of them.

Michael breathed smoothly and deeply, humming pleasure when Dean matched him with careful effort. The training that had gone into perfecting Michael’s Submissive…well, there was no use mourning that he’d missed out on that. All that was left was to put it to use and appreciate it.

Once Dean’s breathing stabilized, and Michael could sense that he wasn’t lost to tunnel-vision any longer, he increased the pace of his pulsing squeezes ever so slowly. Dean’s moans at the sensation…that was Michael’s reward for a job well done. Dean keened softly and began to pulse his hips incrementally into the clutch at the base of his cock.

He was so close already.

It wasn’t a time to draw anything out. He ached in so many places, and the places that didn’t ache, stung.

But he’d done it, and he deserved the touch, the grip, the warm fist and the encouraging voice, entreat ing him to let it all go and just feel.

So he did.

Michael stayed right there with him, but the Dominant let the Sub decide the tempo and the depth. Dean turned a gentle thrumming pulse of his hips into a desperate thrusting, using muscles he’d forgotten he had, clinging to the bedstead and pushing backward into the weight of Michael’s body, downward into the ring of his fist, wet with all the moisture from Dean’s efforts, slicked up from running intentionally over the head of his cock and spreading precome all the way down to the sensitive space behind his bulging knot.

Dean was too tired for this. It took longer than it should. He had to slow almost to a stop twice to catch his breath and let his burning thighs get a grip. There should probably be a conversation soon about his workout habits. But not yet.

When it finally washed over him, it was more an exhale of warm relief than a shock to his overwrought system. Dean whimpered into the pillow, and he began to shake all over, but it felt so, so fucking good.

And it went on, pulsing across Michael’s fingers, into the duvet that they didn’t think to move before they soiled it. Dean began to sob softly in relief. His shoulders shook with the force of his release. His pillow absorbed the sweat, tears, and slobber that he had long since stopped trying to contain.

Dean’s knees gave out, trapping Michael’s hand beneath him, and the Dom chuffed an amused laugh, pulling free and licking between his fingers. He ruffled Dean’s hair.

Dean floated for a while more, there in the wet spots. He was in no hurry, and no one needed anything from him at the moment. He was free. Free to feel.

Just feel.

He could feel each and every place on his body, from the coolness when Michael’s warm damp cloth passed across his back, to the cold tang of the juice that slipped down his parched throat when Michael eased him onto his back and sat behind him, holding a straw between his lips.
Thoughts evaporated before they coalesced here in Dean’s reward. Just as they ought to do.

He missed the passage of time. Had he slept? It was dark. He was naked and warm beneath clean, dry bedding. Michael’s lazy hand swiped up and down his arm, from shoulder to wrist where it lay on his belly.

It was dark.

“W’t time zit?”

“I dunno. Late. Early. Go back to sleep, alpha. I’ve got you.”

“Michael…”

“Shh.”

“Gotta pee.”

Michael chuckled. “I know,” he whispered. “I was hoping you would sleep a little longer. I was watching you come back down out of the clouds. It’s beautiful. You’re beautiful, Dean.”

“Feel like a wet mop,” Dean mumbled. “Gonna have to call in sick. Can’t walk.”

Michael laughed, quiet to fit the hour. “You can’t call in sick from your own convention because of a hard scene, baby. C’mon. Let’s get you walking. Just to the bathroom and back. I’ll help.”

“Can take a piss without you holding it for me, sir…” It was a pathetic effort at throwing a brat’s voice into the mix, and Michael ignored it. He hefted Dean toward the side of the bed carefully, and pulled Dean’s arm around his shoulders. Their first mutual step sent Dean’s breath into little huffs. He rocked back on his heels, but Michael steadied him.

“You’re going to be something to witness at the sessions tomorrow,” the Omega observed. “There’s no hiding this, Dean. You good with that?”

“A little late to ask that now,” Dean grumbled back, bracing his spine and hobbling forward with his teeth gritted. He wasn’t really resentful. He’d known full well what he was signing up for. Mostly, he just needed a bag to punch when the aches shot up from every moving part, and Michael knew that. Not all aftercare is tangible, ticked off of a checklist. Sometimes, it’s standing in place and letting the Sub grouse a bit.

And Dean knew what Michael was doing. Entering his sixth week of pregnancy, the Omega was beginning to feel the pressure of his swelling womb assert dominance over his guts, and his guts weren’t at all appreciative. The embryo would be no bigger than a sesame seed, but the support structures were taking over Michael’s lower half. He was uncomfortable most of the time, but he put it all aside to let Dean berate him with a lighthearted amount of self-pity.

And that to Dean and Michael both, was what being mates was all about.

Buck up, Winchester, thought Dean. You got a show to put on.

Michael helped him pee. Dean fell asleep standing before the toilet, leaning backward into his mate, Michael’s hand directing his flow, and his strong arm keeping Dean centered against him so his legs didn’t buckle.

And Michael was content.
Gabe’s face as he spoke to his brother over the phone, his face alone told Kali she should bugger off to parts elsewhere. It was probably time to head back to her apartment in Kansas City to finish packing everything that was left. And there was always work to do in the shop, even if it was closed on Mondays. Gabe wouldn’t meet her eye. He had a childishly petulant glower going – a damned good one – and he was kicking out at the table leg in increasing strength the longer he listened to whatever Castiel had to say.

Kali settled for backing out without a word, popping a terse text into his phone, and making herself scarce.

Gabe fumed silently.

“How did you find out?” he asked, a la fourth grader.

At the other end of the line, Cas huffed impatiently. “She told me, Gabriel. Look, I’m not upset that you’re teaching them survival and defense skills. Hell, that’s great! Keep doing it! They need all the confidence they can get. But you need to tell me precisely what you’re teaching them. I want details, Omega.”

“She told you,” he said flatly, running a hand through his hair exactly the way his brother did it. “Of course she did.”

“I’m waiting,” the Alpha reminded him. The power disparity fairly crackled down the distance between Ohio and Kansas. Hierarchies didn’t maintain themselves, and Castiel’s expression was audible through the land line.

“I can’t tell you the details, man. There’s a code.”

“I’ve HAD it with your fucking CODE, Gabriel! There is nothing in the world that my mate and my pack should be keeping from me. I demand answers, or so help me…”

“Alpha, listen. Take a day or two. Cool off. I can put together a rough sketch…”

“I’m not interested in a rough sketch!”

“If I give you my whole playbook, man, I got nothing left!” Gabriel begged.

“Watch yourself, Omega,” said Castiel coldly. “Informalities are not appropriate right now, and you know that. You have until I return tomorrow to pull yourself together and answer me.”

“Sorry, Alpha,” the Omega said deferentially, thinking fast. Across the distance, Cas sighed heavily.

“If I have to get the details from April, you will be grounded for two months. But, Gabriel, I will get answers.” Cas had imbued his tone with that ineffable alpha sternness that brooked no argument. Gabe’s eyelids fluttered, and he felt a tremor cross his neck and shoulders as if a weighty hand rested there.

Silence followed the Alpha’s declaration. They listened to one another breathe.

“I’m…” Cas tried, appealing to Gabe’s desperation to reach as many vulnerable individuals as he could. “I’m parsing together a new curriculum, and Gabe, if the strategies you have to teach Michael and April are important survival skills, then we need to add them to the courses we teach. I don’t understand what’s got you so…”

“Defiant?”

“Stubborn!”

“There’s a code, sir.”

“So I’ve heard.” Cas didn’t hang up, and Gabriel wouldn’t until he’d been granted leave. The argument stalled though. “I can hear you, Omega,” Cas told him. “You’ve got your arms crossed, holding the receiver with your shoulder so you can hunker down better. I know you, big brother. But you’re not going to win this one. It affects my mate and Michael, and it’s about their safety. Gabe, you have to know, there is no barrier in the world big enough to keep me from getting every detail when their safety is in the mix. Don’t test me.”

Gabriel didn’t answer him.

“I’ll be home tomorrow. I expect you to be forthcoming when I get there. Goodbye, Gabriel.”

Gabe slammed the receiver down without answering. The concurrent feeling of contented safety and security that passed through him only served to fuel his ire. He wasn’t one to struggle in his bindings the way so many Omegas did now that their providential station was becoming more and more apparent, but COME ON!

He couldn’t hold it against April. Keeping things from her mate had nearly been catastrophic, and he knew she was obligated to meet her own needs before his.

But the code.

Was nothing sacred?

Gabe had to face up to the fact that telling Cas all his strategies would harm no one but himself. Years of sneaking in and out of the shadows – using techniques he developed himself and practicing relentlessly on his own brother until he felt certain he could wrap Cas around his pinkie finger and make him see any damn thing Gabriel wanted him to see – that might serve other Omegas in vulnerable places too, but mostly it meant freedom for Gabe. Telling it all to his brother was the hard snap of a lock cinching down on his movements.

April brought him tea on her break, and she questioned him with her eyes when she noticed the mood he was in. He shook her off. It wasn’t her fault. And he didn’t regret one moment of instruction that was meaning she and Michael had a toolbox full of options when shit got too real to think.

But damn that Alpha! Damn him and his omniscient insight. Damn his need to control everything. Damn this fucking universe that made sure Gabe knew in his soul that Cas had the right of it. Gabe closed his eyes. April’s hand on his was light and warm.

And Castiel was right, as usual. Not only would Gabriel not be winning this one, his gut reminded him that he shouldn’t, and that burned most of all.

“How’d it go Saturday night,” he asked, looking for any way to get his mind off his brother.

“Went great!” she beamed. “Benny’s got the video. I’ll have him send it to you. And, Gabe, I signed an agent! Mark’s been circling her for weeks, and she’s been putting him off, but she was there on Saturday, and she signed me…just like that!”

“Breathe, kiddo.” He set the tea down just in time to catch her hug. “Whoa. Right. We’re excited about this, I know. But don’t lose your head. You’re not in the short game. You’re playing long, remember? An agent is going to want you onstage or recording right away, and that’s not what you said you wanted.”

“I know,” she admitted. “I’m still working the plan. It’s just a thrill to have people who don’t know me sit up and pay attention. I never expected anyone but my parents to think I have any talent – not really.”

He grinned at her. “But you knew different, didn’t you? Don’t lie to me. You knew you’re elite long before you let on that you knew.”

Her face grew drawn and distant. “Gabe, there are so many talented people. It’s a numbers game…numbers and luck. It’s hard work, but there’s so many other factors that go into having a successful career in music. The vast majority of professionals are making a living one gig at a time, taking students and all kinds of inconveniences just to get by. Do you know how many really talented hardworking musicians work two or three jobs in addition to their gigs? How naive would I have to be to think I have a shot at something bigger? No matter whether I’m elite or not…whatever that even means. I’m a little fish in a great big ocean that chews up and eats little fish like me. I would’ve had to be delusional. I can’t afford not to be realistic.”

“Well, what I know about the big successes out there?” he said, nudging her in the ribs. “Is that they’re all delusional. They just don’t care. They do it anyway.”

She smiled demurely. “I didn’t stand a chance back at my dad’s house in Lawton. I never would have dared to hope.”

He caught her smile deepening, and he chuckled. “Mm-hm,” was all he said.

She blushed and looked back up. “It’s exciting. Next week I’ll meet with a guy in New York that Nick wants Cas to hire as my manager. And Nick is giving me full credit as a co-writer of the show now that I’ve had a hand in every piece he’s got. I’ll be listed right alongside him on the marquee, in the playbill.”

“Kiddo, you wrote two of the songs! You deserve that spotlight. He may have given you a chance that most composers don’t get at your age, but April, you pulled through. He heard you on your first trip to New York, and he zeroed in on you because he knows what IT sounds like, and you’re IT!” Gabe turned in his chair to face her, his tantrum forgotten. “And Cas with his jaw hitting the floor! That was fucking rich!”

Okay, so possibly not completely forgotten.

“Who’s this agent? I want to do a full background.”

April laughed. “You can’t possibly think Cas hasn’t already scoped her…”

“Yeah, well, we don’t necessarily look for the same things, he and I,” Gabe put in, not ready to be put off.

“Her name’s Rowena McLeod. She’s a Scot. Thick brogue. I could hardly understand her.”

“And the manager wannabe?”
“Guy named Darius Cain. Nick’s worked with him for years I think. He goes by his last name. I’m not making any decisions until I meet him in New York next weekend.” She watched him chew on the news. He obviously didn’t know either name, but he was running through something in his head. Formulating a plan, perhaps?

“April, I need you to be a little circumspect about the lessons I’m giving you and Michael. Can you do that, punkin? For me?”

It came out of nowhere, and April sat up straighter, not falling for the affection and for once not playing that she might. “I’m done keeping secrets from him, Gabe. I told you that. If there’s something you don’t want him to know about, then don’t tell me.”

“Heaven give me strength,” he moaned, casting his eyes skyward, and she smacked his leg.

“You don’t care what he knows,” she accused. “As long as he doesn’t know everything.”

“Sue me!”

“And you don’t want him to catch you sneaking out!”

“Duh!”

She laughed, and after a moment, he joined her.

“He’s a good man, Gabe,” she said seriously once their chuckles died to an awkward silence. “He loves you, and he’s good at picking out the parts of each of us that need a firmer hand. He wants to take care of you. I think you should let him.”

“Well look at you, little miss ancient tree of wisdom.” There was no bite in the words, only fondness.

“You don’t fool me, Omega,” she told him conspiratorially. “You’re ready to hand off the wild adventures anyway. Having Alpha rein you in, however you manage to work it, lets you turn it loose guilt-free.”

He studied her closely, and then tossed his hands inconsequentially into the air as if a paradigm shift to his life’s work was of no moment. “I still have my computer,” he pointed out. “Still have my network. Only thing missing is…Alex.”

His face lost all color, and April moved fast to place her neck, the space just behind her ear, directly before his nose as she hugged him, and she breathed deeply. It was instinct; Alex’s death coming up randomly and slapping Gabe on the back of the head sent him reeling, and he needed Omega scent in his nostrils.

Minutes passed.

Both of their cell phones buzzed alternately. But they didn’t move. They didn’t speak. Until Matt came tapping on Gabriel’s suite door.

“April? Break’s over, hon. You okay?”

“Hm? Yeah. Yeah, I’m fine. Coming.”

Matt disappeared, and April pulled away from her brother-in-law. His amber eyes had so very much to say…so much he would never say…so much he would never need to.

“Don’t ask me for things you know I can’t give,” she whispered. “And take a good look at what’s got you so turned around. Cas may have scratched a scab off before you were ready, but it was coming off eventually anyway. You don’t want what you once did, Gabe. Go figure out what it is you want now. And leave me and Cas out of it. Kay?”

He didn’t flinch when she called him out and laid him bare and hit the bullseye all at once. He held her eye and let her in. He knew she could see it – could see the fledgling creep of a desire long stifled. He knew there was no hiding from any of the three of them. His wife, his brother, his cohort, there was no hiding this. Gabriel was Omega above everything else, and he longed nightly in the same way Michael had until recently, until his fulfillment. Maybe it was having the twins here. Maybe it was the scent of pregnancy that followed Michael’s steps.

Whatever.

What good was a life spent saving others if he sacrificed what he risked everything to give them a chance at? And it had always been there, this longing. He pretended that his sequential traumas had obliterated what his body craved, but it had never faded; not even a little, not even when his rage at his own helplessness blinded him and sent him scrabbling away at it, seeking to scrape it out of his body like a lesion. Not even once he knew for certain he’d scraped away every potential to carry and nurture from within himself.

The longing remained.

Damn the Alpha and his intrusive questions! Damn the beta and her deep soulful brown eyes that reflected compassion instead of pity! Damn that Omega who could see him to his core, no matter how many masks he layered one atop the other!

She was still looking at him. One brow arched up slowly. She knew what he was thinking.

“Get the fuck out of my room, you brat!” he said, standing abruptly and overbalancing her. She tumbled and landed on her hip with a squeal and a laugh.

“I’m gonna be Aunt April,” she told him with authority. Smugly.

“You’re already Aunt April twice over,” he pointed out.

“It’s different.”

“You’re a bitch. I don’t want kids.”

“Yes, you do.”

“Omegas make lousy fathers.”

“Omegas make excellent parents,” she shot back. “The pup isn’t going to care who shot the sperm at whose egg. Be the mom anyway if that’s what your Omega tells you is right. Seriously, Gabe. Kids don’t care. They want love and security and trust. They want affection, direction, protection…hey, that’s a rhyme sequence. I should work that into some lyrics.”

“Get out!”

“I’m going!”

The pillow hit the door after she slammed it closed. Gabriel stood in the middle of his room, stunned. He’d only been toying with the idea. He hadn’t been serious. Right?
He looked around sharply. Where had Kali disappeared to?

***************

Jack lazed in the jacuzzi, letting the afternoon sun heat his shoulders. The sun felt different here than back home, and he loved it. He closed his eyes and reminisced. That last Skype chat with Jo. His alpha. Holy shit. His alpha. He felt his cheeks warm at the memory. They hadn’t simply talked, and Jack smiled to himself.

He was a shy beta, normally. He’d never before really considered Skype video sex. They weren’t even Mated yet. He’d stuck with other betas his whole life, never put any real thought into what a female alpha might do for him. TO him.

He’d been tentative at first, treading carefully, knowing alphas have their own sense of space. Alphas Top. He’d always thought that was kind of a given, unless they were definitively Tertiary Subs. But Jo wasn’t – a Sub, that is. So…thus the light treads into dangerous topics.

So much wasted worry. Jack stretched his legs out under the water, leaning way back in sublime satisfaction. He was a little sore around his groin from their impromptu play, and he wanted to feel it. That had most definitely NOT been his intent when he opened the topic of preferences, but as they chatted honestly, unabashedly, as the words tumbled out so easily, and they both realized how well they lined up, one against the other, first Jack and then Jo had let nature and instinct lead them, and it had been a spectacular bit of unexpected debauchery.

She was beautiful. She was so much more beautiful naked and panting.

“The Alpha’s expecting us at the big house in twenty minutes. Get out and get dressed. I’m not waiting for you if you dawdle.”

The Brit and his overbearing presence broke the spell around Jack, and he ducked his head beneath the water to wash off the layer of sweat on his face.

“No one uses the word ‘Dawdle’, in America, Arthur,” he said as he climbed out. He grabbed a towel, slung it around his hips, and trotted into the cool main floor of the Guest house, hurrying a little regardless.

“The name, boy, is Ketch. It’s a single syllable that even your perverse, lackadaisical, pedestrian linguistic standard on this backward continent should be capable of enunciating correctly.”

“My bad. Ketch,” sassed Jack cheerfully, enunciating with care. “You don’t have to wait. I’m kinda prone to dawdling,” he called down the stairs as he hustled up them three at a time, smirking. The guy was a blowhard, but he wasn’t really that bad. He was just unsure of his status here in this strange place, and he wasn’t willing to give away a gram of standing he didn’t have to. Unsure far worse than a beta like Jack whose status was obvious. Didn’t mean Jack wasn’t going to tweak him when his bluster topped acceptable levels, but Jack was sure they would settle. There was a possessive, protective glint in the Dominant’s eye that Jack thought could mean good things, provided it was canted toward covering him, and not AT him.

Jack took a few extra minutes to shower the chlorine off his skin. He wanted his scent to speak for him. He liked the way people responded to his openness when they could smell him without interference. His scent spoke for him often when he couldn’t find words to speak for himself.
Ketch watched the pup take off up the stairs, dripping a trail of water behind him. Chewing the inside of his cheek to keep his face from twitching, Ketch turned and sorted the fruit bowl again, waiting. Somehow, the apples kept finding themselves congregated together on one side, leaving the aesthetic flawed to say the least. He redistributed them seemingly at random among the oranges, and then he froze.

Jack, the realization dawned heavily, brutally, had been taunting him, not simply digging through the fruit to select the best option, but mindfully, deliberately baiting him. It was just a fucking fruit basket after all, and Ketch had tumbled straight into a trap that an infant would have spotted.

Ketch removed the remaining apples and dumped them unceremoniously into the garbage.

Rearrange that, you little shit.

But for all Jack’s childish nonsense, Ketch was actually a little fond of the boy already. He didn’t have a spiteful bone in his body – not really, fruit bowls notwithstanding. He was wide eyed, but he wasn’t naïve, and he obviously genuinely loved his work. Ketch couldn’t fault him there. He was, quite sadly, envious of the young man.

They’d had a little more than a day together in this house at the back of the Winchester estate; time to get to know one another, to break the ice. And thus far, Ketch felt solid in his decision to drop everything and move. That he matched with the petite and spunky beta-Sub from the convention circuit was less of a surprise than that he felt comfortable with Jack and with the nominal Pack Alpha whose benevolent grace brought him here in the first place. At least, Ketch thought it was Benny behind the offer letter in his luggage. The signator was Novak himself – or…Winchester. Whatever. But big folk like that don’t muck around at ground level for betas like Ketch.

Ketch opened the refrigerator for no reason whatsoever, waiting on Jack to reappear. He couldn’t stand still. He slammed it closed again.

Nerves.

It was all down to nerves. He would settle seamlessly with Jack in short order. He kind of liked the boisterousness of the boy’s tweaking. It kept him on his toes, and he liked the way Jack’s eyes narrowed when Ketch lobbed a particularly barbed insult at him. Jack was not the issue. Nor was Margaret. His mate, no more than an image on a screen and a flirty tease over the phone at this juncture, would soon be eating out of the palm of his hand. Everything about her felt right, and he was antsy with anticipation.

But it wasn’t that.

It was Benedict LaFitte. Every inch an alpha, but barely a Dominant whatsoever, Ketch knew he and Benny wouldn’t settle until they’d faced off, mettle to mettle. And the ramifications of that weighed on the beta. What would he do with a Pack if he bested Benny? Traditional wisdom dictated – in fact, legal dispensation required – that Pack leadership could only be Topped with an Alpha. And Ketch wasn’t a man to pull his punches. So, if he won, then what? He and Meg would nod their respect and walk away, heads held high to live…what? Alone?

But they couldn’t skip it. And they couldn’t gloss it over with a customary ritual encounter that only pretended to be a throwdown as was meant to occur. Ketch could feel himself rise up to the challenge every time he and Benny were within scenting distance. His wolf wanted a fight, and he wanted a real one. Benny’s blue eyes sparked hot and red more than once already as well. They were both itching to test each other, test themselves.

Ketch had rarely met another Dominant of his own rating. His cool, contemptuous gaze could silence most Lupins without a word spoken. Ketch did not shout. He did not command, as such. And while he may have postured a bit as the situation required, he certainly never swaggered. It was all in the eyes, he found. Speak softly, but carry a big stick.

Big stick, indeed.

None of that gave him any idea what to expect in a confrontation with Benny.

Jack came galumphing back down the staircase with the same ebullience he put into climbing it.

“Did he say what we’re doing?” Jack asked, eyeing the fruit basket with a telltale twist of his mouth and a quick look away.

“He did not,” Ketch replied haughtily. “Although, given that it is midday, I presume lunch might be a fair guess.”

“Good. I’m starving! Come on, slowpoke! I’ll race you to the cart. First one there drives!”

Ketch coiled his fist and then released it again, following the pup out the sliding back door and regretting not saving one apple to thump the back of that boy’s head with as he darted away.

Benny was waiting for them at the top of the drive, but rather than lead them into the big house, he guided them to his car instead. “Thought we’d grab a bite and then scope out a couple of prospects for a Pack lodge. You boys game?”

Jack hopped happily into the back seat, quickly immersing himself in the screen of his phone. Ketch ground his teeth and made a point of looking about for any other ‘boys’ in case he’d missed the presence of a plurality of youth. Benny chuckled at him.

“Don’t sweat it, beta. It’ll keep a while yet.” He placed a heavy palm on Ketch’s shoulder and nodded at the car, utterly content to let the tension between them stand. Reckless, it seemed to Ketch.

Benny dangled a set of keys. “Wanna drive? I can navigate. Lived here most of my life, but I figure you could use a little getting used to the map.”

Ketch regarded him in silence for a moment, weighing the relative strength that he could feel. Between the two of them, his beta had no chance. If that’s all there was, there would be no need for a confrontation at all. Certainly, Jack wasn’t about to challenge the Alpha, even if he wasn’t Alpha quite yet. No, it was the Tertiary Dominant wolf that was clawing at Ketch’s chest that needed a physical encounter to be sure of. He could feel Benny’s alpha, but he couldn’t feel his wolf. How would they fare when it came down to Ketch’s wolf against Benny’s alpha? Benny wasn’t simply alpha, he was Deep, but Ketch felt like he might just match strength for strength as a Profound Dominant, even if that strength pulled from a different source. There was no way to predict these things. Sometimes the numbers didn’t mean what they seemed to mean. They had to know though. They had to test where the boundaries were.
Benny’s eyes weren’t speaking challenge at the moment though, so Ketch let it go. He took the keys in a sweep of his hand and took the driver’s position without comment. Benny trotted around and got in the passenger side.

Jack kept his head down, pretending to be more attuned to his phone than he was. He could smell the imminent danger, and only a fool shuts himself inside a moving vehicle with two borderline confrontational Dominants without taking note of it and checking that the rear doors weren’t childproofed.

But Jack was also hungry, and he already kinda trusted the big bear of an alpha to handle the spark and make space for it when the time ripened. Not in a moving car. And Jack wondered if Ketch noticed that he was far easier to attack while driving and distracted from whatever his passengers were doing than Benny was.

He hoped so. He liked Ketch, despite the contemptuous ooze, and he didn’t want to think the guy was a simpleton.

“What are you hungry for, Jack?” Benny asked him.

“Pizza? I could go for some pizza, I guess.”

Ketch scoffed.

“What?”

“Um, yeah, sure. I guess that works too.” Jack watched the backs of both their heads as he fed fuel forward to see if they would argue with each other. Benny took him up on it, but nicely.

“It was Jack’s choice,” he stated firmly. “So, pizza it is. Don’t worry, KC isn’t about to run out of smoked meats. Turn left here.” Subtle power point score for Benny. Ketch’s neck reddened as he steered, but he showed no other outward signs that he’d just taken direction from a lesser Dom.

Jack could feel it build though, and it made his mouth water. Of course, that could also be hunger.

Lunch was a small dive pizzeria that had quite the lunch crowd. Benny talked them through his and Andrea’s plans for the pack. He listed out the standing house rules, and he listened to both men’s input. Ketch found himself in reluctant agreement with all of the rules, unable to find anything to press against. And both betas agreed on the spot to abide by them.

“We’re on a time crunch here fellas because I don’t want either of you to wait longer to Mate than you have to, but there’s a big wedding in less than two weeks, and both of your mates would scalp me if I didn’t make sure the schedule allowed them to attend unencumbered. You’re both invited of course, and I expect you to be there. Any questions about that?"

“Jo said she’s back in town on Wednesday morning,” Jack said. “She said her Rut shouldn’t get triggered, but you just never know. Would it be better for me to, I don’t know, go to ground until after the wedding? She’s really looking forward to it.”

“Let’s err on the other side, kid,” Benny told him. “She’s back on Wednesday. Let’s put you two together on Wednesday afternoon. If she’s got a Rut coming, it’ll flame out before the wedding, and then you can go watch her wear a dress for once in her fucking life. You’re not real likely to see that again, Jack, so you might wanna grab the chance while it’s hot.”

“Wednesday is…” Jack stumbled over his words and paled. “It’s…it’s in…”

“It’s day after tomorrow, if you want to be exact,” put in Ketch. “Having cold feet?”

“I, uh, that is, no. I thought we had a week or more alone to get settled first. That’s all.”

“You need more time?” Benny asked.

“Can I ask you a question, alpha?” Jack said instead of answering the question.

Benny nodded easily. Their lunch was gone, and they were down to the business Benny knew was important.

Jack shot a nervous look across to the beta-Dom who sat with perfect posture, and he swallowed. “She’s alpha, and I’m beta, right? So, she bites me? But our Z-ratings are backward from that. What if I’m supposed to bite her because I’m more of a Top in kinks than she is? How do we know what to do?”

Benny’s eyes crinkled with soft humor, but he wasn’t laughing at Jack. “Your Tertiaries are oriented same as your Secondaries, Jack. You’re gonna feel that when you meet her. Don’t get yourself worked up over it all. The Z-thing confuses the hell out of folks. I want you to throw that out the window for this. It’s got no standing in Mating. Mating is a Secondary process.”

“Always?”

“Always, when the couple are not both betas,” Benny replied firmly, only to have a pointed clearing of a beta-Dom’s throat contradict him. Benny sighed heavily as Jack looked back and forth between them.

“You mean Michael, right?” Jack asked with his brows high. “Michael and Dean? They Mated backward, didn’t they?”

“They are, to date,” Benny answered him with a nod of concession to Ketch, “…the only known couple to Mate from Tertiaries instead of Secondaries, and they’ve since fixed that error.”

“I can’t wait to meet ‘em!” Jack gushed. “But then, okay, so…Secondary…that’s her alpha against my beta. Jo’s the Top, so she does the biting, and I wear the scar. Right?”

Benny nodded.

“And for Meg and Arthur…”

“It’s Ketch!” Ketch said through gritted teeth.

“Since they’re both beta, it skips down to their tertiaries? He’s a Top, so he bites, and she scars?”
Benny was looking back and forth between them. His eyes narrowed in thought. “Ketch, have you corrected Jack about your name more than once?” He said it lightly, but it sent a frisson of energy through both of his subordinates.

“Numerous times already, and it’s beginning to be a nuisance!”

“Mm-hm. And Jack, were you listening to the rules a bit ago? There was one about respect.”

“I’m sorry, alpha! I didn’t mean anything by it. It was just a bit of fun. He’s a little on the pompous side.” Jack’s chair scooted a few inches backward with his nerves.

“I’ll not argue that,” Benny conceded. “But I aim to start us off with a clear understanding of the hierarchy, and that was downright rude, given that you have already been informed of his preference.”

Jack bowed his head in shame, his whole face going dark.

“Ketch? It’s your name. Your response. You’re up.”

“What, here?” The usually unruffled beta was looking decidedly ruffled.

Benny made a noncommittal face and took a swig of his tea. “It’s not my battle, but I don’t see why not,” he said.

Ketch looked around the restaurant. Everyone he saw was Lupin. “Right.”

“Wait,” protested Jack, scooting back a few more inches and putting up his hands. “I’m sorry, man… Ketch. I get it. That was rude.”

“Faster you comply, kid, the faster it’s over and done with,” Benny told him warmly.

“Jack Kline,” Ketch said with feeling, and Jack’s baffled face pivoted. “You knowingly broke Rule Number Three within twenty minutes of agreeing to it. On your feet.”

“But…we’re not even a pack yet!” Jack protested loudly enough that several people looked round.

Ketch didn’t falter. “Maybe not, but you sat there and told us you’d follow every one of those rules. Now, you’re either going to hold up your side of that, or you and I give the Alpha here cause to think we’re not committed. I don’t know about you, boy, but I’m not moving back to that one-bedroom flat in the middle of the Ozarks. You asked me when we met what my line of work is. Allow me to demonstrate.”

Benny took another drink. More than a few people were watching now.

“What are you gonna do?”

“Don’t be scared, Jack. You’ve felt a paddle before. I know how to swing it to make it do what it’s meant to do. I don’t intend to count the multitudinous smaller infractions that I could retroactively apply, such as your rearranging the fruit purely to torment me, and your deliberate soiling of every towel in the house so that I would have no choice but to scrounge naked and dripping for a clean one following my shower. None of that counts, Jack; only the poor choice you made to bait me with a deliberate and taunting use of my given name, when I’ve already explained that I detest it. On your feet, lad. Stand up.”

Something in Ketch’s tone and temperament pulled Jack to his feet even without a harsh command.
“Good.” Ketch removed the chair, nodding his thanks to the diner at the next table over who helpfully pulled it clear. “Trousers and skivvies at your ankles. Bend over the table. And please, as we may actually still be imbibing our beverages when this is over, I ask that you keep your genitals clear of the surface. You may hold on if you like.”

Jack swallowed and unbuckled his belt. He couldn’t look at Ketch, but Benny maintained a calm demeanor that he could hold onto. He shoved his clothing to his ankles, turning beet red in the process, and then he hid his face in his arms on the table.

Jack didn’t even see where Ketch pulled the paddle from, but its cool, smooth surface rubbed small circles on his backside.

“Count, Alpha?” Jack heard Ketch ask.

“Up to you, beta,” Benny told him.

“Very well. I’m accustomed to a short ten-count for such an infraction, so that’s what we’ll do. Don’t count them aloud, Jack. I believe I can be trusted to reach ten without assistance.” There was a smattering of chuckles from the dining room. Everyone was watching, and Ketch was clearly preening in the spotlight.

Jack didn’t get a chance to think any further about how well Benny had crafted this whole exercise for Ketch’s benefit, to help him learn to trust that the Alpha knew who he was and what he needed. That thought had just entered Jack’s head when the first strike landed, and he whoofed in response, gritting his teeth as the sting set in. It wasn’t a particularly hard stroke. Jack had received far worse before, but it really didn’t take a hard swing from a wooden paddle to sting. The second raised him onto his toes and sent his hands grasping outward for the table’s edge.

“I’m glad we have this opportunity to begin again, Jack Kline,” Ketch told him as he swung again. His tone was conversational, and neither of them saw Benny smirk at how well Ketch’s style fit in around these parts.

“My name is Arthur Ketch.” He struck Jack low on the crease, and the boy grunted, his face very red. “However, I am not overly fond of my first name…” He hit Jack again. “And I ask that you respect my preference, and call me ‘Ketch’.” SMACK. “Do you believe you can do me that honor, Jack?” SMACK!

“Yes, SIR!”

WHACK!

“Thank you, Jack. It’s an easy thing, really.” SMACK!!

“Aaahh!!” That one had hurt. One more. Just one.

“I’ll respect you. I expect you to respect me.” SWAP!!!

“GODDAMNIT!!”

“I beg your pardon?”

“I mean, I’m sorry, Sir! It won’t happen again!”

“Good. That is all, beta. You are dismissed. Dress yourself please, and let’s give our attention to the Alpha. I rather expect he has more to discuss with us.”
From the diners, a light smattering of polite applause which Ketch acknowledged with a courteous wave.

Jack was already covered and slouched low in the chair that their neighboring table slid back for him wordlessly, glaring at Benny.

“Something on your mind, Jack?” Benny asked him.

Jack leaned forward, hissing in a voice that Ketch, still posturing in his pomposity, missed. “That wasn’t about me, Alpha. That was you and him. I’d like to be left out of it next time, if it’s all the same.”

Benny laughed and patted Jack’s cheek, leaving his palm in a soft hold of the lower part of Jack’s face. His eyes grew deeper blue, not red, although Jack could feel the alpha in him. “That was too for you, beta. I may look soft, but I don’t play around with the stability of this pack. You and Ketch,” he nodded as Ketch sat back down and joined them with a frown. “You two were starting off on a good foot. The playfulness, the teasing, Jack, I don’t have a problem with that. In fact, I wanna encourage you to play. But there’s a line you don’t get to cross, and that’s where consent and boundaries come in. This man’s name…” He pointed at Ketch. “…is his most precious belonging. Play with him all you want, if you think you can handle whatever he doles out in retribution. But you call him by the name he asks for. Do you hear me?”

Jack, truly chastened far more than the paddling had done, nodded. “Yes, Alpha. I hear you.”

Benny wrapped his hand around to the back of Jack’s neck and pulled him in to rest their foreheads together. “Good! I knew you’d be a quick learner. Let’s go find a place to live.”

They trudged through several dusty lots in the hot sun, most of them didn’t have a single standing structure. Benny explained that he had already ruled out all of the existing homes in the area. Even the big ones were too small for a pack such as he wanted.

“How many of us are there?” Jack asked, stepping into the shade of a maple standing out on its own.

“Got eight to ten as of today,” he answered. “Depends if the holdouts say yes in the end or not.” Benny kicked at a buried rebar sticking out of the ground. This lot had obviously been a construction dumping ground at one point.

“And pray, what does the mix stack up to be?” Ketch queried.

“Well,” Benny responded, joining Jack in the shade. Ketch followed more slowly. “I figure on two Omegas to start.” He nodded at Jack. “Jo’s mother is Omega and a widow, so where Jo goes, Ellen goes.”

“Dr. Harvelle?” asked Ketch in surprise.

“That’s right,” Benny told him. “And I’m custodial alpha to one of our contractors who’s unmated. He gets an invite, but I’m not going to force him. If he doesn’t want in, we’ll find him another alpha.”

“Pardon the confusion,” Ketch said, sounding pretentious in his ‘expertise’. “But isn’t it a bit pointless to bring along an unmated adult Omega into a newly formed pack? He’s bound to leave within a year or two when he Mates.”

“No,” Benny told him sternly. “It’s not. Adam’s my family, even if he’s grabbed up by someone else two days after we sign the formalities. I promised him I’d look after him, and I’m going to do that.”

There was the snap-pop of a strap landing to the way Benny spoke.

Ketch made an oddly formal bow to the Alpha, bending his head at a bit of an angle and lowering his eyes. Jack didn’t think Benny was fooled by the submissive response. Ketch still held too much tension in his shoulders to have been completely mollified by a simple rebuke.

Benny looked around the empty lot. It was big – big enough for a full Pack compound with room for a yard and garden. “Aside from the two Omegas,” he continued, leaning up against the trunk of the tree. “There are five betas. We got Andrea, you two and Meg, and one more renegade who is hoping with all her digits crossed that she never encounters a True-Mate at all. I suspect if I dig back to the start, it was Charlie who came up with the idea to put a Pack together in the first place.”

“And alphas?” Jack asked, knowing that’s all Ketch really cared about in the first place. How many alphas would he need to fight through for rank? Benny’s eyes went to Ketch first.

“Three, if we’re lucky. I haven’t heard back from the third, but I’ve got the Omega she befriended on her first day at work, so I’m using him as bait.” Benny had a fond look in his eye.

“You think this is a game?” spat Ketch, unexpectedly irate. “I’ve already got to shoulder for room between you and Jack’s mate. And you want to entice someone else in just for kicks?”

Benny worked his jaw and took a deep breath. He shook his head with his eyes on the dirt and his lips pursed – not submissive, just thinking. “No, it’s not a game. But I don’t want a pack just so I can strut around feeling important. I want a family, Ketch. A big, stable one. And Lisa needs us. She may not know that yet, but she needs us. And we need someone like her.” Benny kicked casually off the tree. “I’m hoping that she’ll Mate in the next few years and bring us another Omega, but even if she doesn’t, I mean to offer her a home. And for the record, beta, you don’t actually have to shoulder in anywhere. We don’t hardscrabble for rank in my pack. We go by Secondary/Tertiary split. That means that if Lisa says yes, you’re fourth. Period.”

Ketch’s jaw dropped in shock.

“Next, you’re going to tell me this ‘Lisa’ is a Submissive,” Ketch said offhand.

“She is,” Benny confirmed. “She’s a Classic Sub. And an alpha. And she outranks you. If you can’t handle that, I suggest you rethink fast.”

Ketch looked stunned. He thought fast. “Margaret…” he started. “I…”

“Yeah, Meg’s pretty keen on joining the Pack, so you’re gonna want to give it a hard think before you take that away from her. And, Ketch, if that’s what you decide to do, you tell her that before you Mate, not after. She has the right to choose for herself if there’s a choice to be made.”

Ketch responded only with a long, strained exhale. Benny nodded.

“Now. According to the land plot from the county, this lot is supposed to be 224 yards deep and 67 yards wide. I’m no cartographer, but it looks like the neighbors might have encroached on the boundaries over the years. Ketch, you good with pacing? You think you could walk it off for me and check? Just a rough feel for whether we’ll have a fight on our hands if we want to bid on this lot will do. Best estimate.”

Ketch looked around vaguely, but he nodded and headed off for the far end to start walking it off.

Jack watched Benny watching Ketch. “And where am I ranked?” he asked.

“You’re right after him,” Benny answered with a sideways head cock toward Ketch.

“Really?”

“We don’t have a lot of Dominants,” Benny replied, squatting in the shade and squinting out at Ketch.

“Just the two of you?” Jack guessed.

“Yup. It’s gonna be a strain until we settle our impulses. I have to admit, my wolf doesn’t want anything to do with his, but my alpha is startin’ to feel like a showdown sooner rather than later is the way to go.”

Jack chuckled humorlessly. “He could stand being taken down a peg.”

Benny nodded noncommittally. “Maybe. Not your job though, beta. You leave him be for a bit. Let him struggle however he needs to to wrap his head around it. It’s gonna be an adjustment for him, but that’s his work to do, not yours.” Benny stood up again and sighed. Jack tracked him as he paced to the edge of the shade and turned.

“How are you feeling now, Jack?” Benny asked, evidently changing the subject. “I think I took you by surprise at lunch. Tell me what you’re thinking about that.”

“Embarrassed,” Jack told him.

“‘Bout what, exactly.”

“About having my ass paddled in public!” Jack answered loudly.

“Not about being called down for disrespect?”

“I mean, yeah, I get it. I was a douche. And I’m sorry. And I apologized for that.”

“And you’ve been punished,” Benny reminded him. “I’m not looking to drag you back through it again.”

“But did you have to stroke his ego at my expense in front of people? I would’ve learned the same lesson if we did it privately, back at the estate.”

“Is that what I was doing?” There was that calculating look in Benny’s eye again. He was working Jack out, figuring out who he was. He didn’t let Jack answer, changing the subject without warning. “I’m almost hoping the neighbors built their fences a bit over the property lines. You know why?” Benny asked abruptly, turning to watch Ketch sweating as he paced and counted.

Jack gave it a little thought. “So you can test whether they’ll be good neighbors before you commit to living next to them?”

“Very good,” Benny beamed. “Exactly. This lot has been empty for decades. It’s natural to bleed over a little over the years. No harm, no foul. But if it sells, and they wanna fight over squatter’s rights and make a big show in posturing where they don’t have a legal standing… It’s not that I wouldn’t take that challenge, Jack, it’s that I gotta ask myself, is that really the kind of people I want to live next door to? If I put it to them, and they agree to pull everything back, that shows me something. You think we would get a chance to know that much about our neighbors if we don’t have a boundary dispute right off the bat? Do people usually show you who they are right at first? Or are they overly polite? What do you think, Jack?”

Jack scratched the pointed tip of his ear. “You jumped at the chance to punish me in public to see how I’d respond to your authority?”

“You and him both,” Benny agreed. “I got a policy, Jack. I trust people as far as I can, but in the end, I don’t believe what they say. I believe what they do. You and Ketch are unknown quantities, and I’ve agreed to bring you both in and make you family. Don’t begrudge me a little precaution where my family is concerned.”

“And what did you learn about us?” Jack asked.

Benny strolled up to him, wrapped a hand around the back of his neck in solid alpha style, a comfort and a hold both. Jack breathed in sharply through his nose, and his pupils dilated. Out here, in the sun, that had to mean something. Benny set his forehead against Jack’s and closed his eyes. He could feel Ketch pull up short out in the sun on his way back with the number.

“You don’t have to be anyone you aren’t, kid,” Benny said quietly. “You’re not responsible to knock Ketch down a peg or two. That’s on me, if it turns out to be necessary. Let go of your fear. I’ve got you. I’ll always look out for you, and you’ll always be safe. Your only jobs are to back me up in defense of the Pack if you’re needed, and do everything in your power to make that alpha who’s like a daughter to me happy.”

Jack huffed. His hand came up to grip Benny’s forearm, clinging on. “You think I can?”

Benny smiled with his eyes still closed. “She’s gonna love you, kid.”

“Look, not to be intrusive…” Ketch called from several yards away. “But it may well be the hottest day on record, and there is a noticeable temperature differential between the full sun and the shade.”

Benny and Jack both laughed, pulling apart. “Well then, come on in where it’s cooler,” Benny gestured. “Got some water in the car. I think we’re through here. What do you figure for length?”

Ketch grumbled a little, mopping his brow and neck with an honest-to-God handkerchief that he’d pulled from his back pocket. “It’s definitely shorter than 67 yards side-to-side, but the back lot looks to be in its proper placement to me. We’d need a survey to be certain. Are you…considering this one, alpha?” Ketch’s tone hit an odd note, but Jack couldn’t tell if it was that he didn’t like the space or that he was struggling with the deference he needed to show.

Benny nodded, looking about him in satisfaction. “It’s close enough to the city center, but out of the suburban density. Andrea spotted it a week or so ago and asked me to take a look. I think she’s partial to this street.”

“Is a lot this large in the Pack budget?” Ketch asked. “We’d be building from scratch. It’s going to cost a pretty.”

“Are you asking out of curiosity, beta?” Benny challenged. “Are you going to be around to see the finished compound?”

“You truly expect me to bend my neck to a Submissive?”
“She’s an alpha, Arthur,” Benny replied factually.

There was a beat or two. Maybe time for a couple of breaths. The air crackled with heat, but it wasn’t the sun. The planes of Ketch’s face hardened, and he snarled faintly. That was all the warning Benny got.

Jack shouted in alarm and dodged around behind the tree, using its trunk as a shield as Ketch launched himself in feral rage at the alpha. Benny had time to drop one foot back to support his stance and raise his arms to catch the man, but they crashed to the ground, a mass of writhing arms and legs. Benny’s red eyes gleamed as they caught the light, and the once seemingly placid man snarled and snapped like the fighter he was.

Benny landed a couple of good blows to Ketch’s jaw once he managed to roll him onto his back, but the beta only grimaced and shifted, setting them to tumbling again, and Benny took a stiffened palm to the jaw as they rolled. He shook it off, working his lower legs around Ketch’s trying to trap his legs in a vice grip. Jack kept the tree between him and the increasingly sweaty men rolling around in the dust. They were both covered in dirt in no time, and both had blood flowing from their faces, Ketch from his nose, and Benny from a split lip. A dust cloud began to rise around them, stagnant in the still air, renewed constantly by the scrabble of arms, backs, and feet that kicked and dug in.

Jack watched in trepidation. Neither man was looking to really hurt the other. It was an exercise in restraint almost as much as it was in fury. It wasn’t about causing injury. It was about standing. It was about Dominance, the hierarchical kind, and much more was being determined than which man had the physical wherewithal to defeat the other. A great deal was happening under the surface for them both, even without a Claim-link between them. It seemed that Benny was spending a lot of time on his back, taking blow after blow to his face, a fierce grunt echoing from each of them with every punch. But Benny’s quick hands were busy. He sacrificed the pristine nature of his face to allow him to worm his hands between them and unbuckle Ketch’s belt. The beta didn’t notice, too wrapped up in altering the color of Benny’s jawline. Ketch’s wolf, fully unleashed, was a frightening animal, and Jack panted in borrowed adrenalin. It wasn’t his fight. It felt like he was in there too though, taking those strikes, grunting in pain. Jack’s nails dug into the bark.

He saw Benny’s jaw set, and his shoulders shift before Ketch caught on. Jack had never been a wrestler, but that was some kind of Greco-Roman shit that Benny pulled out from somewhere. In the blink of an eye, Benny had Ketch facedown in the dust, clouds swirling over their heads, sprawled out on top of him.

“Easy way or hard way?” he asked into the sweat of Ketch’s neck. They were both panting. A car drove by 50 yards distant on the road. Ketch lay still except for the heaving of his chest, then he exploded in a burst of movement, struggling against the alpha’s hold. But Benny was ready for him.

“I know you can feel it, Arthur. I don’t roll for you or any beta, not in this lifetime. That might not be fair, but it’s the way it is. Accept it quick, or invest in a lot of lube, cause I’ll refresh your memory as often as I need to.”

Ketch let out a plaintive and furious keen into the dirt, and he struggled again, but he got nowhere. Benny had him pinned. Benny planted a palm at the back of the beta’s neck, his fingers splayed up into his hair, and he pushed his torso up. With his other hand, he yanked at Ketch’s pants, first one side and then the other until he had the fabric down below the turn of the beta’s backside. His briefs disappeared in a burst of ripping fabric that had Ketch shouting out in pain and scuffling for freedom again.
Benny snarled at him and flattened him into the dirt with both hands. “I don’t think so, beta! You started this. I get to finish it. Stay down!” Benny held him in place as they both panted in exertion for a few breaths, long enough to feel sure that Ketch had heard the message. Then he punctuated his statement with a hard shove against the beta’s shoulders and sat up, straddling his thighs.

Ketch had dirt-coated blood and snot running out of his nose and over his lip. He had tears of frustration leaking out of his eyes, clenched tightly against the reality of his position. He worked his hands beneath his chest, palms flat to the ground as Benny freed his own cock and moistened it with a packet of lube that Jack hadn’t known he was carrying.

“Don’t even think about it, Arthur,” Benny said in a hard, calm voice. “We can do this here and now in relative seclusion and be done with it once and for all, or I can decide you need weekly public reminders for some time to come until the message sinks in. You wanna test me? Go ahead and keep struggling. I know for a fact that Meg loves to watch a good D.F. She gets off on it. You want her to see you in this position?” Benny was moving as he talked. He all but released Ketch from his pin, walking backward on his knees to get Ketch’s trousers out of the way enough to give him room to maneuver. Ketch didn’t take the bait. He lay still, his palms still pressing into the ground, but his head bowed in acceptance.

“Good choice,” Benny told him when it was clear he was through struggling. With no warning, Benny wrapped his hands around Ketch’s hips and hoisted them upward until his knees caught him and held. Ketch shouted out in surprise and humiliation, but Benny didn’t torment him any longer than he needed to. He let gravity pull his body to drape over the beta’s, and once in place, he guided his cock to the tight, unprepped center of Ketch’s ass and pressed slowly in. He wrapped an arm around Ketch’s chest, high up where it would feel like a threat to his throat but not impeding his breathing, and he thrust in hard, painful, ruthless, dominant. Alpha.

Jack turned his back to the tree trunk and closed his eyes. His breath came in heaving spasms. He didn’t want to be here for this. Maybe he could escape to the car. But the keys were in Ketch’s pocket, and the car would be an oven right now. Jack had his fists pressed back against the trunk and his eyes squeezed tightly shut, but he couldn’t stop himself from hearing. Even pressing his hands against the sides of his head wouldn’t stop the sounds of a brutally painful mounting on the other side of that tree. There was no wind, but Jack could smell the musk of infuriated alpha. Benny wasn’t furious, but his alpha had been stoked, and it stepped up and responded. An alpha could only take so much goading before it leapt into action.

Jack’s legs felt weak. He slid down the trunk to sit in the dirt. The afternoon sun had shifted. He was sitting in sunlight now, wondering how long the ordeal was going to last when Benny answered that for him with a load groan that petered off into a series of short huffs.

Jack turned from his shoulders and peeked around the tree. They were both filthy and wet with sweat. They were still but for the efforts to catch their breath. Oh, Jesus, Benny hadn’t knotted him, had he? They would be stuck here like this for ages if…

No. Benny released the grip of his teeth from the back of Ketch’s neck, not a bleeding bite, just a subduing one. He pulled up onto his knees, pulling out with the motion and fell clumsily, tiredly onto his hip. He patted Ketch’s hip a couple of times to let him know it was over, and the beta slowly straightened his own legs out behind him and groaned as he rolled over onto his back. Leaves and detritus stuck to his shirt and his bare belly. The front panel of his briefs covered his genitals, but the back was destroyed. Ketch rolled to face away from both of his companions and breathe. His hands sought out the damage, both to his clothing and to his person, and he moaned, curling up with knees to chest.

“Goddamn, I hope once was enough,” Benny grumbled. “I’m gettin’ too old for this.”

Ketch laughed out a single guffaw, and then quieted again.

Jack slipped back to his feet and wordlessly collected the car keys from Ketch’s pocket. He met the beta’s eye with a look that he hoped communicated compassion. He wanted Ketch back. Maybe not the snide contemptuous version, but the solid steadfast adult-in-the-room vibe that Ketch gave off – Jack wanted that to remain.

“Trunk?” Jack asked Benny.

“There’s a small cooler of water in there, kid. Bring the whole cooler. And there’s a tub of wet wipes in the glove box. Bring that too.” Benny was kneeling now. He’d tucked back in without bothering to clean up, and he was bracing his weight against his arms on his thighs. He was already dressed, already back to himself. Ketch would take a while longer. Jack nodded and trotted out into the heat to get water.

The cooler wasn’t heavy, and Jack was back in short order. Benny had water and some light snacks packed which he fed to Ketch by hand after wiping him down and checking him for damage.

Ketch winced as he stood up. He kicked off his shoes, removed his trousers and the scraps of his briefs and then slid his legs back into his pants commando. Benny gave him space. Jack didn’t say a word. He stood by the tree with a water bottle and a snack-pack of crackers and cheese. Ketch took a few tentative steps, limping a little and making a pained face.

“You and me, Ketch,” Benny told him. “We’re all this Pack has by way of real Tops. And I see how it could feel like that should move you up the ladder a few spots. I need your Dominance to shine while we figure ourselves out. Everyone is gonna need your steady presence, even me. You hearin’ me? But that doesn’t mean that in the big picture we can ignore who we are. If I tried to put you above the alphas in a play to win your loyalty, every one of us would suffer. It doesn’t work, Arthur.”

The use of his despised first name popped Ketch’s eyes to Benny’s, and he held there.

“The response is, ‘yes, Alpha’,” Benny pointed out.

“And in a few weeks, maybe a few months, you’re going to forget what this felt like,” Benny went on. “You’re going to itch to try it again, and I don’t really wanna hurt you any more than I have to.” Benny’s busted lip and swollen jaw mocked that statement, but Jack could tell he wasn’t talking about surface level injuries. “So I want you to take a minute right now and take stock of how you feel; how you feel right now; how you felt while we were rolling around in the dirt like schoolyard boys. Look me in the eye, Arthur Ketch.”

Ketch looked up.

“Does it hurt?”

Their hard gazes held. Ketch’s chest heaved again, but Benny was calm. Eventually, Benny got a silent nod in answer.

“Were you close to winning? Maybe if we had another go, you might top out?”
Ketch sighed and looked down, sighing heavily with the weight of it.

“Look at me!”

“No, Alpha,” he said, eyes coming back up, full of fire. Disappointed in his own limits.

“If we do this again, how’s it gonna end? Answer me, beta!”

“The same,” Ketch conceded sulkily.

“The same,” Benny agreed. “So, can we agree that we don’t need to do it again?” Benny strolled casually to the cooler and brought a handful of ice up to his jaw, a clear concession that he hadn’t walked away unscathed. “If you say it out loud, Arthur, you’ll find it easier to remember when the pain has faded and you get the urge to try me again.”

“No, sir. I don’t wish to try again,” Ketch said softly, sincerely.

“No, I don’t imagine you do.”

“Alpha, if it’s all the same to you, I would prefer to be called by my family name, even if I must ultimately surrender that for yours.” Ketch had his politeness volume turned way up, and Jack had to hand it to him, the level of composure he was showing was no easy feat. Jack looked at Benny and saw a quick twinkle in his eye when he caught Jack’s eye. Benny winked at Jack.

“Duly noted, Ketch. From here out, you’ll only hear your given name from me when I need your undivided attention, got it? Sound fair?”

“Yes, Alpha.”

“Good. Let’s get outta this heat. I think we’re done here. What d’you say, Jack? Think this is our spot? Should we see what price they’re asking?”

“Yes, sir,” Jack told him, following him toward the car with only a single backward glance, and letting Ketch limp more slowly behind. “I like it.”

Benny chuckled. “Not much to like or dislike yet, pup. It’s just an empty field. We’ll make it a home quick as we can though. You wait and see. Oh, and Jack, maybe you better drive.”

“Yessir.”

Benny let Jack start the engine and get the air blowing as he dropped the cooler back into the trunk. He waited by the passenger door for Ketch to catch up. “Jack’s Mating is scheduled for Wednesday, Ketch. Do you think you could be ready for yours on Thursday, or do you need a few days to heal?”

“It’s not my call, sir,” Ketch responded, leaning into the car and then startling back when the top proved hot enough to burn.

Benny sighed. “Beta, look, I’m not interested in turning you into a Bottom. You don’t owe me your submission. I want you to be you. All I ask is that you don’t countermand or undercut me. Don’t challenge me or contradict me in front of others. If you have something you disagree with me about, come talk to me in private. I’m a fair guy. What I’m asking here is for you to make the decision that only you should be making. I tore you up a little just now. It happens. But you need a couple of days to heal. Tell me when you think you’re gonna be ready to move on. That’s all I’m asking.”

“You don’t want my submission?” Ketch queried.
“That’s all you took from that?” Benny popped back.

Ketch made a shrugging motion with his head and one shoulder.

Benny lowered his chin, pulling out the alpha again. “There’s a big difference between submission and deference. As long as I get some version of the latter, wherever you feel you need to draw the line is on you. Hell, crawl around on your belly if it suits you, but don’t play the martyr with me, boy. I never said you had to kneel, so if you find yourself itching to do that, might wanna investigate why.” Benny got into the car without another word.

***************

“Call her phone again,” the balding academic ordered. “She’s got ten more minutes to show, and then we’re leaving. She’s got some explaining to do if she wants my continued support.” He was furious. Students didn’t stand Karl Meyer up. Ever.

A breathless, sweaty face appeared in the doorway. It wasn’t Sarah. “I checked her office space, doctor. She’s not there. In fact…” the young graduate student went on. “It looks like she’s cleaned it out. It’s empty.”

“What?!”

Dr. Meyer stormed down the hallway and two flights of stairs to the basement where the grad students were graced with a tiny modicum of space – just a desk and a phone in clumped cubicles. Undergrads scattered in his wake, spilling books and papers, shouting at him. He ignored them.

Her cubicle was empty. He opened the file drawers, but there was nothing.

“Check online,” he demanded of his assistant who had followed wide eyed. “Make sure the…”

“It’s all gone,” she broke in on him, balancing her laptop on her forearm and typing quickly with one hand. “All the files she had in her folder are gone. It’s empty.”

“DAMNIT!”

Karl looked around and realized they’d all followed. The whole team was here. Of course, they were here. He’d ordered them here. He was set to take the reins of this project by force, and he’d rallied his troops in a show of intimidation, and they were all staring at him.

“Who leaked it?” he asked, turning his accusing eyes on one after the other. No one spoke.

“Someone let something slip! And HE found out about it! I want to know who it is, and I mean NOW!”

Heads poked cautiously out from behind cubicle walls to gawk as the old geezer lost his shit.

He pointed a finger in his assistant’s face. “Stop her stipend. Put a hold on her status. She doesn’t so much as check out a book from the library until I find out what’s happened.”

“Do…we have that authority?” the assistant challenged, looking around. “Don’t you think we should wait and talk to her first? Maybe it’s a misunderstanding.”

“It was YOU, wasn’t it?” He was beside himself with rage.
“No, sir. It wasn’t me,” she told him. “But I don’t think we should jump to conclusions. What’s the worst that could happen?”

His eyes flew wide. “The worst that could happen,” he hissed in a strangled whisper. “Is that that animal who’s got his talons in MY project finds out that I…” He dropped his voice lower, realizing he was essentially in public, and he turned his head so that no one could see his lips. His assistant frowned, worried about his sanity suddenly. “…Finds out,” he whispered. “That I used a backdoor technique or two to get the right kind of spy inside his doors. If the full index of everything that happened to get her there comes out…” He left off as if the answer was unavoidably obvious. She stared at him.

“What did you do?” she asked just as softly. “Is your position in jeopardy? Doctor, you’re tenured. What could they do to you? How bad is it?”

“Dr. Meyer, if you have a moment, I’d like a word with you in private.” Karl and his assistant both jumped as the Dean’s voice intoned from the doorway. They spun around, clearly feeling like they’d been caught with their hands in a cookie jar.

“Of course, Seth,” Meyer told him with a shaky breath and a quick squeeze of Sharon’s arm. “I’m… all yours.”

Sharon watched him go, following the Dean a pace or two behind and flanked by the department head and his second, both upper level professors, both chair holders like Karl, but higher in status. She was in shock. This couldn’t be happening. WHAT was happening? Sharon sank down onto Sarah’s desk chair and ignored the rumor mill that began spinning furiously around her. A quick look round told her no one was paying her any mind, and then she texted, “I think it worked.” Then she shut her phone off, dropping it with her laptop into her shoulder bag, and she slumped down in the chair.

“They can track text messages, you know,” a welcome and familiar voice said to her conspiratorially. She smiled without opening her eyes. She’d suspected her friend Hervé was the other contact that Dr. Novak kept referring to, but she hadn’t been sure until now.

“It’s a burner,” she told him, matching his volume, noting that the hubbub was dying down. People were scattering with their first hand news. “I’ll dump it. I’m sure he’s going to start pointing fingers, but none of us have done anything wrong other than not pledging him our undying loyalty.” She opened her eyes and smirked at him where he stood draped over the cubicle wall, leaning on his arms, staring at her.

“That’s a crime in itself,” he reminded her in his deliciously rich Mexican accent. “To him.”

“Only to him,” she replied, flirting openly at last. She was trying to piece together the right words to ask him out to lunch when he beat her to it.

“Come on. Let’s gossip over coffee. I’ll tell you mine, and you can tell me yours, and we’ll tie a brick to your burner phone and drop it into the ocean.”

“There’s not an ocean for two thousand miles,” she said with a grin, letting him pull her up.

“Semantics,” he said with a wink, and then changed his mind with a startled epiphany. “OR… Roadtrip!”

She laughed. “Hold your horses there, buddy. I’ll agree to coffee and some light subterfuge, but I’m not sleeping with you just to get rid of my phone.”
“Gotta start somewhere,” he teased, but his hand felt good in hers as they left the basement hand-in-hand, so she didn’t release it. “And you’re right anyway. We’re about to be back on the streets without a project or a faculty advisor. Gotta watch our expenses like the broke college students we are.”

“What?” she asked. “You didn’t get paid for all that spying?”

He halted and frowned at her in alarm. “He PAID you?!”

“Kidding.”

“Jesus!” he exclaimed, clutching his chest dramatically, but he let her pull him along.

“My money’s on Novak long-term though,” she went on. “I mean Winchester, I guess. I think Sarah Blake’s onto something. We’ve each been researching the other species and our own, but there’s no crossover yet. If Meyer loses his job, you and me, we could look into what Castiel’s offering to Sarah and see if there’s a place for us at that table. Your tight organizational skills, my flashes of intuition. We have a lot to offer.”

He squeezed her hand, pleased more than he was ready to admit at her praise and the fact that she saw them both as a single unit.

“Gotta wait and see what happens to Meyer first,” he pointed out. “Keep our heads down a while longer in case he just gets a slap on the wrist.”

Two uniformed policemen and a guy in a suit who couldn’t have been anything but a cop passed them heading back into the building where Dr. Meyer was in the inquisition of his life. Sharon and Hervé both turned to watch them disappear into the building.

“Jesus,” he repeated.

“Winchester doesn’t fuck around,” she said in shock. “Remind me not to cross him.”

“Yeah, no shit. Still want that seat at the table?”

“Hell yes,” she told him, braver than she really felt. “But I want coffee with you first.”

Chapter End Notes

Shh! Just don't look at the word count, Nudge. It'll only freak you out. :P

As a reminder and/or clarification. I mostly get to work on this fic for one week out of every four. That means a miserable long three weeks of dead silence before we get back together briefly and then fall silent again.

Sending so much love to the Pack. Y'all are my rock. (Yes, that's subject/object agreement. It's a big rock.)
Chapter 103

Chapter Summary

The researchers have finally made some progress figuring Michael's weirdness out. Maybe. Michael gets a chance to show how far he's come in his relationship with Dean. Jo and Jack settle. Michael has another checkup, and Dean loses another little bit of his footing. But in the end, Dean finds he's kind of okay with that.

Chapter Notes

This one is one of those that delves way down in with all the words into the research. It may not be clear enough or investable enough to hold everyone's attention. Skip over to the next section if it's not your thing.

I had a very rough three weeks, and my feet are killing me. :( I meant to use my scattered off days to answer comments, but my mind was elsewhere. I will get to them. Chatting with you is my highlight, and I'm not skipping out on that.

I hope you enjoy this. I will probably have another soon.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

NOW:
Benny read the report with his forehead resting in his fingertips. Not only did he have a pounding headache, but the ramifications of what he was reading added weight that felt like a physical pull on his body. They couldn’t afford to be wrong, but so much of it was still speculation, tied loosely by strings and points of data that didn’t yet connect to each other directly.

Bobby sat across the desk from Benny silently, motionlessly. Waiting for his colleague to finish.

“It’s a stretch,” Benny said at last, laying the report that he’d coauthored on his desk. ‘A stretch’ may have been the mildest term possible for a paper with the lofty premise of attempting to tie the supernatural assumptions about the origins of their instinct that so many wolves kept close to their hearts to provable scientific theory.

“It’s been proposed before, pup,” Bobby reminded him. “It’s not a novel idea. Only, no one ever had enough supporting facts to back it up. We’ve been all metaphysics and no epistemology, but now... Maybe it’s a new day. And it ain’t just Lupins. This theory might explain the core of instinctive behavior for ALL animals. There’s no reason the same set of rules wouldn’t govern birds and fish and houseflies.”

They’d already been over how odd it was for the two of them, diametrically opposed on the topic for their entire lives, to suddenly find common ground, coming as they were from opposite sides and arriving at the same conclusions.

Benny nodded, but added, “Without Michael’s data points, we’ve got nothin’ – nothing that hasn’t been posited countless times before. Dean’s not going to allow this.”

“Cas will.”

“Come on, man,” Benny whined. “Enough. Don’t cut Dean out of it. You know that’s wrong.”

Bobby didn’t answer him. He simply sat in front of Benny and looked at him.

“No, you know what? I know this is important, but if it’s got staying power, it’ll still be there when the next Omega-Dominant comes around. We’re not selling Dean’s mate down the river. Bobby, this is Dean we’re talking around here – Dean and Michael both.”

“You read through that again and tell me there’s any other explanation that makes any sense.” Bobby was adamant, but so was Benny. “Occam’s razor, Ben. It’s the only thing that fits ALL the data and the stories.”

“No,” Benny argued. “It’s the only explanation we’ve come up with so far that fits all the data. Doesn’t mean it’s the only possible explanation. And old fables don’t count as data.”

Bobby leaned across and activated Benny’s desk phone, dialing their boss up on speaker.

“What is it, Benny?” Cas answered into the room.

“Cas, it’s Bobby. Could you grab holda your fiancé and head this way for a bit?”

“Um. Sure. Dean might be on a call, but I’ll see if he can break free. What’s this about?”

“The preliminary report off 68-437 is out. Wanted to go over it with you both.”

“…437? That’s the study of Michael’s data.”

“Yep.”
“On my way.”

The air was tense enough to slice. Dean paced while he read. Castiel leaned against Benny’s desk. No one pointed out the round table in the corner with four cushioned chairs tucked neatly beneath.

“Who did the data analysis?” Dean asked, flipping to the front where the cover sheet would tell him.

“The data structure, the whole organizational matrix,” Benny said. “Kevin put that together. But the theory beneath it all is Bobby’s and mine…and a host of old aboriginals.”

“This is where we jump from science into fantasy land?” Dean asked rhetorically. “I always wondered when that would happen.” He tossed the report onto Benny’s desk. “That all you needed? I have work to do.”

“Dean, please stay,” Castiel said calmly, still reading, studying the tables.

“You’re not buying this are you?” Dean asked him pointedly. “It’s a myth, man!” His voice had taken on a pleading tone. “They’re trying to use Michael to bring mythology into this. We’ll be a laughing stock. Jesus, I thought I was the religious one here!”

“Dean, sit down and shut up until I’ve finished reading.”

“You mean you’re serious about this?!”

Cas looked up and pinned Dean in place with his eyes. “I won’t know whether to take it seriously until I’ve read the whole report. Put your ass in a chair and zip it!”

Dean threw himself onto the couch on the far wall, saying, “Michael’s not for sale guys.”

Benny shot a look at Bobby, but Bobby was watching Castiel. Finally, Cas closed the packet and looked up with a heavy breath.

“It’s a stretch.”

“Cas, if the next word out of your mouth is ‘But’…” Dean warned, and Cas turned to him with an invested expression, interested in hearing the rest of the sentence. Dean subsided into grumbles, and Cas went on.

“…BUT... There’s a stronger argument here than I’ve ever seen before, and it’s got meat to it that we’ve never had before.”

Dean’s fury fairly leached out of him in waves. He had his arms crossed over his chest, and he was sitting down in no sense of the words except literal. Cas had told him to sit, so he was sitting. The Alpha shot him a look that mingled exasperation and patience with amusement.

“But Dean’s right too. The only way to fill in the gaps at this point is through Michael, and that’s not something we’re going to allow. We’ll have to find an alternative, or wait for the rest of it to trickle in from other sources.”

“Other sources?” Bobby asked in a flat voice. He was disappointed but not surprised.
Cas turned to him. “Science doesn’t stand still, Bobby. I learned that from you. If we’re sure enough about this to publish, even as an unproven theory, and we do so with full acknowledgment of where the gaps and the logical leaps are...If it stands up to scrutiny, then someone somewhere will add another data point, and then another. It becomes a puzzle the worldwide community works at simultaneously, each fitted piece paving the way for the next. We don’t have to subject Michael to anything. All we need is time and enough interconnected brains asking all the same questions from their own hometowns.”

“Sure would be quicker if we could…”

“What part of NO are you deaf to, old man?” Dean broke in.

Cas stepped between them. “Dean, knock it off. Bobby, don’t ask again.” Both men huffed like brats.

Cas looked instead to Benny. “Talk me through it. Pretend I didn’t read anything. Explain it to me. How do we substantiate something that has no physicality, that exists only in meta-space?”

“Claim-bonds and Mating-bonds exist only in meta-space, Alpha, and no one doubts their existence, because we poked at them long enough to learn how to mark them,” Bobby reminded him.

Benny pressed his lips together and pulled his crossed feet down off his desk. “Okay. Here’s what we determined. I’m explaining it through Michael because Michael is who we’ve got. You good with that?”

Cas nodded.

“Dean?” asked Benny, craning to look around Cas.

Dean looked up, sulking heavily and gestured moodily for him to go on.

Benny’s eyes crinkled in benevolent affection. “The theory is ancient. There’s a version of it in every extant aboriginal Lupin culture, and it’s one of the few touchstones that survived the cultural purge – probably owing to the fact that it’s ubiquitous among our people.”

Bobby turned away and helped himself to a cup of coffee.

Benny eyed him but continued.

“The theory goes that a Lupin’s instincts pull from a wellspring at the base of our evolution, crossing somehow – metaphysically perhaps – through time in both directions to govern our instinctive behaviors and our thoughts. One version of the theory makes it out to be a type of hivemind that is built from nothing but the thoughts, actions, and response patterns of every Canid that has ever lived, somehow depositing their life history – every choice they made and its outcome – within that wellspring, adding to its sum total, and becoming a retrievable volume of innate knowledge that every other Canid can access in one way or another, guiding our actions toward the positive.”

Dean shifted and softly sang out the first few notes from the “Twilight Zone” theme. He was pointedly still sitting where Cas put him.

“If the peanut gallery can’t control itself,” Cas said to no one. “It will be gagged.”

Dean sat back and zipped his lips with a finger and thumb across them, his eyes still intense.

“Thank you, Dean. Go on, Benny.”

“Right. Well, it’s folk tales, obviously. It’s myth, as Dean so adamantly pointed out. But the thing is, we keep finding evidence that there’s more there than stories. And it’s not just Michael, but I want to use him, because he’s unique. Let’s start with the hypothesis that this wellspring is real and attainable. Let’s suppose that it exists, and all we need to tap into it is the right code. What’s the code? How do we know when we’ve punched in the right sequence? And is Michael our Rosetta Stone?” Benny half expected a comment from Dean, but the Sub stayed mute, so Benny went on.

“What we surmise from other research, both our own and the volumes out there from ages past, is that we’ve all got a way to touch the database, but each designation either touches a different place, or we touch it in a different way, and no one does it consciously. No one’s got more access than one narrow arc of it at any one time. Access is limited to what’s needed for survival and success. Also, it appears that each designation pulls the information we get from it into a different part of our brains.”

“Are you merely theorizing, or is there evidence?” Cas asked. He’d read it, but he needed to hear how Benny understood it.

“There’s evidence out there, but without the structure of this theory to build on, all the evidence means nothing. If we put the ‘Instinct Database’ theory beneath the data, then data points that never added to anything suddenly become relevant. We know that certain hormonal and chemical ratios pop up again and again where wolves report their deepest metaphysical experiences.”

“Where does Michael fit in?” Dean asked, his eyes on the floor in front of him.

Benny nodded. “Right, well, we’ve been playing around with what we know of Michael, everything about him that makes him special, and it’s interesting. Here, he’s got…these are his ‘special skills’ if you will: He’s both Omega AND Dominant. That’s not unique, but it’s close enough that we decided to include it as relevant, noting also the extreme dominance rating he achieved during his test. He’s got a heightened capacity to read base desire in people who have not outwardly communicated. He is unique in his ability to self-Release. Now, we’ve only witnessed that once, and he was admittedly engaged in sexual congress with a partner at the time, so that would have to be verified as an ability and not a one-off. Even as a one-off, it’s notable. He successfully sparked a Mating-claim on an alpha. He did it sans demonstrative aggression, and he somehow did it in a way that Dean’s alpha didn’t register that it happened at all, leaving the door open for Dean to Mate him right back.” Dean couldn’t resist touching the faint scar on his shoulder as Benny spoke, but he didn’t interrupt.

“Dominant or not, that shouldn’t be possible based on what we understand about the Secondary aspects of Lupins. It would be like discovering a rabbit that could fly simply from having an aberration in its genes that gave it bat-like webbing between its toes, then to discover it flies without using its webbed feet at all, and then to learn that it can pull a fish up into the sky alongside.”

“I’m a fish, Benny?”

“And finally, Michael has reported an extra-corporeal incident while his sentient mind was unconscious, an event that he is adamant occurred precisely as he reported it. An event that jibes with a host of folk-tales.”

“He wasn’t extra-corporeal,” Cas said, frowning. “He had a body. It just wasn’t his human body. It was his wolf.”

“Well, we argued that,” Bobby admitted. “But we put it into the file with the other weird wolf dreams we’ve got documented, and most of those are extra-corporeal. We think they all come from the same source. More on that later.” He waved Benny to go on.

Benny sighed and leaned in. “We focused on the two especially unusual abilities because they are both provable and incontrovertible. Dean, Michael Mated you. There’s no doubt about that. And he self-Released. Neither of those should be possible, but Michael did them without any undue effort and no training whatsoever. We have to presume that they are both instinctive actions on his part. Of course, without the opportunity to interview him, we can’t know for sure how much thought he put into either prior to making them happen.”

“No, Benny,” Dean said tiredly.

“Right. Then, we stick with the assumption that he was acting on instinct. And that begs the question of the definition and source of instinct, which brings us to our ‘Instinct Database’ theory. If Michael’s getting more from instinct than the rest of us, we want to know why and where it’s coming from.”

“And you want to link his abilities to the ‘Instinct Database’ Theory.” Cas tapped his report with his finger.

Bobby handed Benny a bottle of water and took the topic up himself. “If you take Michael and try to figure him out by working on it from him as an individual and then moving outward,” Bobby said, looking at Cas. “You don’t get anywhere because there are a billion and twelve possible answers, and we’d have to slog through researching each one to eliminate a billion and eleven.”

“Not appetizing,” Cas agreed.

“But if you pick a theory, any reasonable theory, and you apply Michael’s oddness to it, you cut through the bullshit pretty fast.”

“It’s all bullshit, Bobby,” Dean pointed out.

Cas calmly walked across to stand before Dean. He slowly placed his own hand across his own mouth with a determined look in his eyes and a raised brow. Dean mirrored him by rote, trained beyond thinking about it cognitively, and Cas left him like that, returning to his spot at Benny’s desk. Dean sat on the couch, blinking passively, covering his mouth with his hand, effectively gagged.

“When you can contribute anything but contempt, Dean, you may rejoin the conversation. I leave that to you. Drop your hand when you’re ready.” Dean dropped his chin and his eyes, but he left his hand where it was.

“Please continue,” Cas told Bobby.

“As we said, this isn’t a new theory. It’s been kicking around long enough to have some understood structure. The most common form says that Omegas and Subs can touch and see the side of the database that allows them to read people’s wants. That gives them a leg up when it comes to being a confident Bottom in any relationship. Alphas and Dominants don’t have that access. They see the opposite side, the side that lets them understand a person’s core values. It’s not the same thing, and there’s very little overlap, even for someone like Dean who should theoretically get both views. It would be like trying to see both sides of the moon at the same time. You get one or the other at a time, not both.”

“Yes, I’m familiar with the theory and its constructs,” Cas replied.

“In all the models that fit the data that’s already out there,” Benny said. “There’s a conception of the four outlying aspects of Lupins as being either rigid or flexible, depending upon all of their various characteristics.”

“Yes,” Castiel said, thinking. “Alphas and Submissives are flexible, while Omegas and Dominants are rigid. The first two must mold themselves to the realities of their environment, adjusting dynamically to whatever confronts them, while the latter two are bound to a strict behavior pattern that is imposed on them by chemistry, circumstance, or anatomy.”

“Now apply that to Michael,” Bobby instructed. “And apply it to Dean.”

Cas shot a look across at Dean. The alpha-Sub’s face had gone slack with his hand over his mouth, and his eyes fought to stay present, caught as he was in Castiel’s firm touch. Cas skipped a little of the explanation. They all knew it, and he didn’t see the point in doggedly repeating the visual of a ‘sphere of knowledge’ as it was usually portrayed. The moon metaphor that Bobby mentioned brought the proper visuals into play. It was a sphere floating alone in meta-space with thin cords connecting it to every living Canid all at once. The cords pulled instinctive knowledge out, but they also sent lived experiences in to add to the database over time. Many people envisioned that it existed outside of time so that early Canids had just as rich a wellspring as those alive today. But it was dynamic and ancient, defining the base of everything they had ever been as Canids.

Cas stepped into the center of the room as he worked through the question. “Dean would get a double-dose of flexibility. His flexibility gives him access to everything in the database, but he can only skim along the surface of it, too pliable to pierce though.”

“And Michael?” posed Benny

“Michael would be a spear. He’s rigid in every aspect. He could go straight into the heart of it and access everything at once from the inside outward because he’s got the highest rigidity possible.” Cas heard the words leave his lips, but he said them without knowing he was going to, a flash of intuition. As he rewound what he’d heard himself say, he nodded. It made sense, even if he didn’t know where he came up with the visual of a stiff pointed lance that crunches through the outer layer to lodge at the heart. The report he’d read hadn’t put it like that at all.

“The imagery of a ‘sphere of instinct’ is an apt idea, Cas,” Benny agreed. “Some people, mostly folks like you, way out of the edges, have reported feeling like they can draw information up from a much deeper well if they try. What they’ve described is the sensation that while their normal daily activities might be supported by a surface level touch, the same level as the sense we all have of our own wolves, an extra push when they need more gives them a much richer view.

“The Tertiaries are ancient, and we’ve all felt a sense of instinct leading our wolves. That particular part of the theory is accepted by the wider community already. Instinct travels fastest through our wolves. But our Secondaries hear it too. It’s just different. Imagine the Database as a crusted sphere with a thin layer of liquid knowledge at the surface. All of us have access to the top layer. Only a few can get to the rich crusty layer beneath the liquid wherein lie the layers and layers of repetitive life experience, letting the intent behind the instincts guide their Secondaries. And only an Omega-Dominant has the wherewithal to pierce the crust entirely and get down inside the thing and look outward. Imagine the view from there.”

“He says it’s as natural as breathing,” said Dean, staring at the floor, his hand now in his lap. “He and April said something a few days ago. Both of them. Said that it felt like sipping power from a deep well.”

“And Michael?” Castiel asked him, startled.

Dean looked up at him. “Supposing this is true,” he said. “You say you have evidence that all of us flit along the surface like humming birds, sipping instinct from the surface while only a few can poke their bills into the muck underneath and get to the really good stuff. What’s the evidence? You got anything but anecdotes? Michael notwithstanding.”
“It’s not all anecdotal, Dean,” Benny replied. “Although anecdotal evidence backs the theory up in every way. One point that comes up again and again was so clear in Michael’s hormonal readings that we couldn’t pass it by. It’s a magic ratio, Dean. The magic ratio. Michael hit it dead square center. He hit it during his first and third Keller rounds. He hit it after you bit him the second time in the woods when you Mated him spontaneously, and both of you hit it in Oklahoma when he Mated you. You know the ratio. It’s Serotonin to Dopamine to Oxytocin. Those three are usually in flux with each other. But every time anyone ever has one of these odd-ball reports that we can’t explain, if there are readings available, we get the magic ratio of 3:2:4. That’s not a ratio people hit in their daily lives. You know that.”

“It’s not… and excuse me Alpha, this is not contempt, it’s skepticism…” Dean started, adjusting himself on the couch to sit forward again. “It’s not supported just because you can cram various data points into empty holes in the logic. It’s still chock full of holes. You say the visual representation of a sphere of instinctive knowledge works, but will it still work without the visual imagery? This idea of flexibility versus rigidity – what the fuck does that actually mean? How does an Omega combine with a Dominant to give the guy access to something no one else has ever touched, and how does that translate to him being able to masturbate his way to an Omesol Release? Seriously, guys. You took a beautiful and ancient myth, the cosmos in metaphysical terms, and you cut and pasted shit that kinda looked like it fit all over it and called it a Eureka moment.”

“Your skepticism is far more appreciated than your outbursts were, Dean,” Cas told him serenely. “Thank you for reining yourself in.”

“Call me your good Pet,” Dean joked, pretty damned proud of himself. “Please, Alpha?”

“No. Not here.”

“Later?”

“Perhaps. If you’re good.”

“Can we continue please?” Bobby’s face was flat.

“Apologies, Bobby. Go on. I’m certain you have a defense against that argument, or you wouldn’t have written the full report yet.”

“Dean, Michael’s data is incomplete,” Benny said. “We have more questions than we do answers, but every last point fits. His ability to put a Claim in amicably, his ability to cause his own Omega gland to Release its stores, it’s Michael occupying a place in the center of Canine identity, not outside of it like the rest of us. He can reach across the diameter of the space from the inside and connect the opposite points. In the moment of Release, he IS both the alpha and the Omega. He Mated with you twice from that same position. It’s telling enough that your body recognized an entirely different designation when you Mated. Your body doesn’t know what to make of Michael, but it knows he’s your Top, and it knows he wasn’t an Omega, not really, not in that moment. In certain high arousal moments, Michael is everything at the same time, centered as he is inside the heart of all Canine knowledge and instinct, inside everything that makes a Canine. We believe that your body, Dean, it was prepared to accept anything at Mating except another alpha. What it registered was an alpha/beta/Omega hybrid, and that was decidedly… not an alpha, so it accepted the Mating-bond. Michael’s Dominance willed it, and touching the interior of the sphere as only he can, your body was ill-equipped to deny that. He pulled your hormonal ratios into alignment with his, and he willed it into existence.”

Dean shook his head. “It’s still conjecture. You have no proof.”
“We have that scar on your shoulder,” Bobby indicated the round mark that Dean tried hard to leave visible. “That scar means that whatever’s going on, it reaches outside of Michael himself. He’s got enough mojo to let it roam around outside of metaphysics and his own masturbatory habits.”

“I thought you were going to determine that he puts out way more hormones than other Omegas, and that’s how he fooled my alpha into baring its throat,” Dean mumbled.

“Michael’s hormone outputs are all normal,” Benny supplied. “He’s as textbook a Central Omega as they come. It’s not the concentrations, it’s the ratio.”

“…And he just happens to be ‘The Chosen One’ of prophecy who can wield the great sword and save us all from Perdition, and dragons, and whatever,” Dean mumbled again testily.

“His dream sequence was no dream, Dean,” Benny told him. “He took his conscious mind inside the core of Canine instinct where only the subconscious can usually go, and it was too abstract a vision for his limited brain, so his instincts translated that experience into a wolf-scape dream that he could comprehend. In essence, for a short while, Michael WAS instinct as far as we understand it. He had access to view you in your most primal image because he was really there, inside of everything.”

Dean stared at Benny.

“Think about it,” Benny encouraged. “Take everything you know about how he moves through the world and try to apply any other explanation.”

“He’s not good at simultaneous designations,” Dean said weakly.

Bobby shook his head. “That stems from a different part of the brain. It’s a cognitive function. It’s intentional. This stuff, the weird stuff, is all instinctive. It’s hind-brain stuff. He IS good at layering designations, but then, that’s common for Omegas anyway. Think about it, Dean. Think about how he reads people and situations and knows on instinct how far to push before he steps over the line. Does he step over the line?”

Dean scoffed. “All the fucking time!”

“Does he really? Or does he push right up to the mark and then stop as if he can see the razor’s edge of that invisible line?”

Cas was nodding. “He challenged my alpha to a duel of wills that I thought for sure would get him killed, but I pulled it out, barely. He knew what I could take and still hold on. He wasn’t even worried. He could see it in a way none of the rest of us can.”

“Guys, come on! Michael’s a lot of weird-ass things, but he’s not the Messiah of dogs! If he had this instinct thing so cornered, he would be a wiz at manipulation tactics, but he’s not. He’s clumsy as hell. He trips over his own traplines!”

Cas chuckled, nodding and making an amused concession face.

“Here though,” said Benny. “Say you need to learn a new skill. Driving! Think of when you learned to drive. You’ve got no instincts yet other than universal ones like startling if something unexpected is speeding toward you. What are the first few weeks like? And I mean you personally, Dean, you’ve got great Canine instincts, and you’re not a clutz. Did you ever feel uncomfortable behind the wheel?”

“Uh, at first, I guess. Been a long time, Benny. Seems like I remember being overwhelmed at how many different things I needed to keep track of all at once, and it was a little challenging until my “Exactly. When your instincts collide with your intentional actions, until you learn to harness the instinct and memorize a set of response patterns, you’re clumsy as hell.”

“That is a disturbing idea,” Castiel said. “If Michael’s an incompetent manipulator because his cognitive side hasn’t mastered the skills and is tangling up his instincts, it’s only a matter of time before he’s comfortable behind the wheel and outdriving all of us.”

Dean sighed. “Look, if you guys wanna publish that, be sure to put a disclaimer on it that says ‘we don’t know our asses from holes in the ground, but this is what our GUT says is right’. Don’t know when we started publishing scientific papers on gut feeling.”

“That’s pretty much the disclaimer that’s going in the preface,” Bobby admitted.

“I hope you alter the wording so that there’s less ‘ass’ and less ‘holes in the ground’,,” Cas told them seriously.

Benny approached the Sub and put his hand on Dean’s shoulder. “No one’s saying you have to accept this at face value. The theory has been around about as long as Lupins have had language in the first place, but it makes sense in a new way. The point of all this isn’t to try to convert anyone into a mystical new religion. It’s to see if we can harness the power of our own instincts. We know they’re out there. We feel them. We act on them. We behave socially just as Canids have for hundreds of thousands of years. That has to come from somewhere, and even if it’s not this rusty round blob of knowledge floating out in nowhere, it’s still something. Envision it however works for you. But the base of the report is that your mate, specifically because he is two designations that don’t normally occupy the same body but are both designed to reach deep, has the reach to touch the core of who we are in a way the rest of us can’t, and he’s instinctively using the tools he has at hand.”

“And he’s got superpowers because he’s a spear, not a ribbon,” Dean finished for him. “Well, that’s a lot less painful than a radioactive spider bite.”

Benny’s phone rang, and he hit the speaker button. “Becky, are they here already?” He checked the time with a soft expletive.

“Yes, Sir,” she chirped. “And you might want to hurry. I think he can smell Jo. He’s looking really donald.”

“On my way,” Benny told her, hanging up. “Jack and Andrea are here. I gotta go get them. Dean, will you please find Jo? Tell her it’s time.”

“Um, yeah. I’m on it.”

Benny left in a hurry, and Dean followed him slowly enough to appear headed toward his own funeral. Bobby stopped him in the doorway.

“Dean, look, the paper isn’t actually going to tie in the myths. It’s going to stick to the theory from a scientific and metaphysical perspective, same as we do when we reference Mating-bonds. It doesn’t matter how you digest it all, the clear point is that Michael can do what he does because he’s got far more reach into whatever the source of our extra-corporeal connections is. Re-read the data tables.
Check it out for yourself. Something connects us, pup. Something is tying you to him right now, giving you access to his emotions and sensations. It don’t matter if that something is a sphere or a cloud or a rainbow-brite doll. Whatever it is, it’s real. And your boy gets to drink from the deepest, richest part of it. You visualize that however you think makes sense, and then come back and let’s talk.”

Dean nodded mutely, glanced to Cas, and left. He had a Mating to coordinate.

********************

Michael’s social media feeds had exploded since Charlotte. He kept one ear on Balthazar’s run down of the gangbang he planned for Dean, finalizing that everyone was in place and knew the goals and the rules. Michael wandered through the contractors’ prep room, circling Balthazar slowly, his head in his phone, and only nodding in agreement now and then. Balthazar sat straddling the dressing bench with his laptop on the bench in front of him, his locker door open beside him.

“We’ve got to emphasize the importance of everyone staying in their lane through the sequence,” Balthazar told him. “If we let them pick their own pace, it’s going to be a clusterfuck.” Balthazar looked up, hearing what he’d just said and adding, “Literally.”

“Mm,” Michael agreed without looking up.

“Am I boring you, Omega?”

“Hm, what? Oh. No. No, you’re good. I heard you.” Michael looked up, but his eyes twitched to go back into his screen.

Balthazar nodded coolly. “Michael, what’s going on?” He kicked his chin toward the phone, and Michael startled a little, looking back at it as if he’d been caught watching porn.

He smirked at his own jumpiness and turned to Balthazar. “Twitter is blowing up on me,” he admitted. “They know I was in Charlotte even though I never showed my face. Dean’s limp is all over YouTube and Instagram.”

Balthazar chuckled meatily. “Oh, yes. I saw that, too. He does self-pity better than any alpha I’ve ever seen. I want all the details, Michael. What did you even DO to him?”

Michael laughed outright. “I’m not telling you,” he declared. “You’ll work it into your scenes at work, and that will eventually get back to Dean. He likes privacy.”

Balthazar shrugged it off. He didn’t really need Michael’s choreography. He had plenty of his own, but he loved bringing the high blush to Michael’s cheeks. The boy was too easy to tease if he wasn’t in a Dominant mindset. But Michael had already moved on.

“Why don’t they take any Omegas to the cons?” he asked Balthazar. “Why don’t you go? There have to be plenty of Top-types who need a rebalance or something. Don’t they think you would have anything to contribute to the panels? They spend so much time up on stage saying ‘Omegas are this…Omegas need that’, but they’re just talking about us, not with us. Doesn’t that piss you off?”

“They do take a couple of Omegas, Michael. They work the one-on-ones.”

“They don’t do any panels,” Michael countered. “They’re never up onstage.”

Balthazar made an uncomfortable face. “Dr. Ellen does the seminar circuit,” he pointed out lamely.
Michael let that statement stand without comment. The silence lengthened. Michael’s phone buzzed in his hand.

“Look, it’s complicated,” Balthazar finally broke. “The cons, they’re…they’re not containable. Everywhere else they put us for work, the Facility has complete control over what happens to us. If we were up on that stage…I don’t know, Michael. I don’t want any part of that risk. I don’t want to be the reason that every other wolf on the stage is distracted, worrying about how to protect me if things go batshit.”

“Yeah, fine,” Michael said with feeling. “Doesn’t have to be you. It doesn’t have to be anyone who doesn’t want to be there. But they can’t keep this charade going forever! They let Omegas into the audience. What kind of safety is there for them? They literally sprinkle security everywhere, and it works. So, what, as long as it’s not someone they know and like, it’s perfectly fine to let the risks run a little higher? I’m sick of the double standard, Balthazar!”

Balthazar considered him curiously. “Did you send Dean up onstage limping to make sure the audience knew you were backstage somewhere? Hoping they’d raise the roof of the place until Dean brought you up onstage to join him?”

“Nah, I’m not an asshole, man.” Michael turned, running fingers through his hair. He kicked idly at the open locker door as he passed, and it rattled rudely in the echoing space. “Truth is, I gave him what he wanted. I kept expecting him to pull up when we started to get intense. He knew he was crossing limits of what he could sleep off, but he was so there for it… I don’t know what to make of it. He’s the one who picked the scene. The very first day, man, he coated himself in my scent just before he went down for the opening set. And he didn’t give it a second thought. Just, bathed in me, natural as you please, and then went onstage acting like he didn’t reek! And then Monday night. Dude, the guy could hardly walk! He had to have help hitting the target for his midnight piss!”

“Jesus.”

“I did everything he asked me to do, Balthazar. I stayed where I was put, helped out backstage, kept my nose behind the curtain the whole time and never bitched or moaned about any of it. It was fun, actually. Charlie’s a hoot.” Michael couldn’t suppress a slight smile at the memory of how seamlessly he and Charlie kept things running. He had a mild premonition that she would be growing more and more a close friend if they kept spending time in the same places. “But it was almost as if Dean was trying to out me without having to say the words. Why would he do that?”

Balthazar sat up and leaned slightly away from Michael. “Do I look like a shrink to you?”

Michael snorted. “Well, you’re a lot of help.”

“Alphas do that kind of thing when they’re on the nest, Michael. It’s classic posturing behavior. They need to advertise that they knocked up some poor schmuck by walking around coated in their mate’s fluids. You’re overthinking it. Dean’s a hedonist, like me. He’s never been one to turn the volume down on a scene if he’s got a partner who’s willing to play it up all the way to eleven. He got carried away. Doesn’t mean he’s trying to sabotage his own restrictions. Doesn’t mean he was hoping the audience would storm the backstage rooms hunting you down.”

Michael shook his head and checked his phone again. According to the little list to the side, he was trending. Michael was trending on Twitter.

“No, Balthazar, some part of him wanted it known that I was there. Dean doesn’t do anything by accident.”
Balthazar let Michael pace and stew. “I’m curious what you mean to do with that little revelation,” he said, looking only mildly curious.

Michael stopped walking and looked at him. “I don’t know yet. I need to think. If I’m right, then maybe I’ve already got a third of him on my side. If I’m wrong, then I can’t make heads or tails of it.”

“How have you considered talking to your mate?”

Michael chuckled. “Yeah. I should talk to him. It’s funny. A few weeks ago I wouldn’t have even considered that. I would have pressed in where he looked to be cracking to try to break him open.”

Balthazar’s brow rose in interest. “And now?”

“Now, I want to show him what I deduced, and see what he thinks about it. What’s happening to me, Balthazar? Am I turning into a compliant alpha-slave?”

Balthazar’s head back and laughed. Michael waited for him to collect himself with a worried frown. When the older man caught Michael’s expression, he stopped laughing. “No, boy. You’re still you. You’re just growing up, that’s all.”

Michael didn’t agree. “Following his instructions in Charlotte felt really good,” he admitted. “Too good. I wasn’t even tempted to break my promise. He had me on a leash, and I was pathetically happy to be there.”

“Damnit, kid, you’re mixing everything up!” Balthazar snapped his laptop shut and shoved it clumsily into his locker before slamming the door closed. “Go talk to him about all this, if that’s what your gut tells you to do. Stay where he puts you if it feels right to do that. Learn to go with your gut and quit thinking so much!”

“And give up the idea that an Omega belongs wherever Omegas are being discussed?! You want me barefoot in the kitchen shooting out pups one after another?! Someone should be up on that stage representing our gender, Balthazar! Maybe it’s not supposed to be me, but it should be someone!” Michael’s anger unleashed on Balthazar, but the contractor didn’t take it personally. Michael wasn’t angry at him.

“That’s not what I said, Michael.”

“Then what?!?”

“If it felt good to you to stay up in your room following his instructions doing something you’re not especially interested in doing, how much better is it going to feel when you get the chance to do what you were born to do with his full support?” Balthazar leaned back against the wall of lockers and crossed his arms over his chest. Michael gaped at him. “Think about it. Maybe you and he have a parallel life goal. Maybe you’re meant to be doing this crusade side-by-side. And I know you’re ready to get started, but he’s not ready yet. If you’re right about this though, he’s getting there. It sounds like he’s got a massive barrier to get around first. You and Castiel are chipping away at that barrier from the outside, and Dean – at least some part of him – is whacking away from the inside. Before you realize it, viola, no more barrier.”

“I should talk to him,” Michael posed, almost like a question.

“Kid, I’m no therapist. Do what you want.” Michael turned inward, introspective, thoughtful. “If I hadn’t been so compliant at the con, he would have been miserable, not playful like he was. He would have been on edge when he needed to concentrate. He wouldn’t have been in any kind of mindset for the scene we did.”

“Mm-hm,” Balthazar agreed, clearly growing bored with the conversation.

“I’ve been going about this all wrong. He doesn’t respond to pushing. He only digs his heels in harder. I need to flip it around, be a source of comfort to him, not worry, and let him come to the conclusion that there are holes in the con panels from a secure mindset. Dean’s never going to agree to putting me onstage until he trusts that I won’t push his boundaries while I’m up there. Balthazar, you’re brilliant!”

“Any time, Michael. Can we get back to the scene? I still have some calls to make.”

“Yeah! Fine. Everything sounds fine. I gotta go. I’ll see you tomorrow! Thanks, man!” Michael snatched up his bag and hurried out of the prep room, leaving Balthazar chuckling cynically to himself, still determined never to Mate. Mates were more complexity than they were worth. And he had absolutely no desire to join the circus act up onstage at the conventions either. Michael could have all of that he could take as far as Balthazar was concerned. What good was talking about sex when you could be having it?

***************

“You’re not still sore that I cut corners on finding my mate, are you?” Jo asked the man perched on the edge of her bed holding onto her tea cup while she scooted upward, positioning herself to take it. The blanket slipped down to her lap, but Dean had seen enough bare chests not to think twice about Jo’s. Hell, he’d seen Jo’s often enough not to find it notable. You don’t go through Presentations and puberty in someone’s back pocket and then get squeamish about nudity later. Dean handed the hot mug to her once she was settled.

“I’m not sore, pipsqueak. But you have to admit you picked a hell of a time to take a month off. We need you through this transition. I don’t know how we’re gonna manage without you.” Dean settled a little further on the bed, hiking a knee up and turning to face her.

Jo teased, “I’m sorry. I’m a little distracted right now what with this effervescent new Mating-bond ringing in my ears. Who needs me, exactly?”

“I do, you little snot! Ya happy? I need you. There, I said it. Don’t expect to hear it again.”

Jo laughed happily. “As long as we’re both real clear about that fact, I’m not gonna make you chant it to me.”

“Good, because that’s not going to happen!”

Jo sipped her tea, and Dean squinted vaguely toward the two-way mirror, trying to discern if anyone was still in the booth. “I’m not mad,” he repeated. “I’m really happy for you. How are you feeling?”

He turned back to her, watching the play of emotions on her face and turning on his professional persona.

“It feels really strange. I guess you can relate. I’ve held a lot of Claims in my life, Dean, but this is something totally different. I can feel the hot water on his skin right now. Not just awareness that he’s warm, but I can actually feel the shower as if it was me in there.” Jo pulled her knees up to make a tent in the blanket and rested her forearms on them. “It’s amazing. I can feel the wound on his shoulder sting when the water hits it. I can feel the emotions that make him want to keep running water over it and making it sting again and again.”

“Yeah, it’s…pretty great, Jo. I think you’re gonna love being that close to someone…”

“Even if it’s not you?”

He scoffed and looked at his lap, blushing.

“Dean Winchester, did I embarrass you?” She twinkled merrily.

“Shut up,” he mumbled. “You know, I didn’t ask how Jack was feeling. I asked about you. Should I go ask him?”

“I’m good,” she said serenely. “It feels good. I don’t think we triggered a Rut, if that’s what you’re looking for. I’m tired. Feel like I could sleep for a week. Kinda wanna snuggle right back down with Jack and doze for days.”

“Just sleep? Really?”

“Ah, well, multiple rounds of sleepy sex would be welcome too. But it’s not like Rut at all, this feeling. It’s a warm, contented blanket, not a hot, fast rush. I’m looking forward to kicking you out and seeing what being on the receiving side is like.”

“Oh, yeah?” Dean asked, interested. “Your boy Jack not a catcher?”

She smirked. “Not so much. That was actually his first time being the goalpost.”

Dean’s eyes widened, and he nearly spilled her tea. “You’re joking! You popped his backdoor cherry?! Jo! You pervert!”

“Don’t be an ass, Winchester. He’s straight, and he’s never been with an alpha before. When would it have come up?”

“Heh heh…You said ‘Come up’,” he teased with a shove to her knees.

“Would you grow up?! Stop it, you’re gonna make me spill.”

“No, but, seriously?” he asked, settling back down.

“Yes, seriously.”

Dean frowned in thought, his mind back up out of the gutter and working through it from a clinical perspective. “Jo, you need the alpha connection. Do you know how you’re going to…?”

“Chill out,” she interrupted. “He’s got me covered when we need to touch a Secondary nerve. It’s not that he’s not interested, he’s just never tried it before. And I only need it every now and then. Most of the time, I’m happiest on the ‘Slot B’ side of things as long as his ‘Tab A’ is working.”

The adjoining bathroom door opened, releasing a cloud of steam, and Jack stepped in with a towel around his waist, still dripping. He was hunkered over, reaching for the small case on the floor by the bathroom door for his change of clothes. “Jo, babe, you wanna see about something to eat, or would you rather…?” He glanced up and froze, catching sight of Dean. “Oh, shit! Dean. Dean Winchester! Oh, my God. It’s you!”
“Hold up, there, cowboy,” Dean chuckled, standing up and backing away a couple of steps on the off chance that Jack had a possessive side to him. Dean hadn’t seen any hint of that, but he’d not seen them together near a third wheel yet either. But Jack didn’t care where Dean sat in relation to his mate. He was thrilled that the celebrity was in his room at all.

“Jo!” he squealed with his voice hitting three octaves too high. “It’s Dean Winchester!” He scrounged around quickly in his bag for his phone, mindlessly thinking of asking for a picture, and his towel slipped off.

“Yeah, maybe put on some pants, Jack,” Jo told him calmly. “He’s not going anywhere. In fact,” she winked at Dean. “He’s more a pest we’re going to spend a lot of time trying to get rid of.”

“Pants. Right. Shit. I’m a moron. Hold on.”

“And breathe, buddy,” Dean suggested, finding the whole thing quite amusing. Jo noticed his entertainment and flipped him off which only served to make him grin wider. “You know, if you pass out, we have to cart you down to medical, and it’ll be late evening before you get some alone time with the missus here. Try to avoid that. She gets cranky when she’s horny.”

“Oh.” Jack’s face as he glanced back and forth between Dean and Jo was priceless. He’d frozen again with his boxers at his knees. Dean didn’t know what emotion Jo sent him through their newly minted bond, but it seemed to do the trick. “OH!,” he said next, his eyes growing hooded, and the boxers changed direction.

“And that’s my cue,” Dean told them as Jack scuttled back under the covers and into the warm orbit of his mate.

“Dean, wait,” called Jo. “Didn’t you come in here to tell us the readings? How did it look?”

The alpha stopped with his hand on the doorknob. “You know I would’ve said something if it was a miss,” he told her with his eyes on the floor. “You kids did good. That was an honest-to-god True-Mate match sealing itself, and all the lights turned green. Your Pelio-readings bubbled like a teapot.”

“Good,” said Jo happily. Dean looked up and saw that she had curled down into Jack’s arms with her head pillowed on his chest. The green-eyed serpent in his chest dissolved a little bit. The two of them looked very much like they fit together. “Snap the lock on the outer booth on your way out, would you? I don’t really want an audience for the next round or two.”

“You know,” he suggested. “You could go home.”

“Not yet,” Jack told them. “We’re both a little shaky. It’s better if we stay here tonight and head home in the morning.” He glanced from Dean to Jo, craning his chin a little. “That is…if it’s okay with you?”

She smiled and nuzzled into his chest. “I like this guy a lot, Dean. Can I keep him?”

Dean’s face turned to invested innocence, and he pointed vaguely out the door at his back. “Kay, I gotta go throw up now. You two good here on your own?”

Jack looked worried, but Jo laughed. “It totally serves you right, you dick!” she reminded him.

“Yeah, and I totally told you so, too, Joanna Beth!”

“Dean!” she called again as he was heading out once more. “Tell April that Jack and I will take hers and Castiel’s place next weekend to help her Primate friends move into their new house. Find out where we need to be and what time.”

Dean frowned in confusion. “Come again?”

“When April and Cas go to New York next weekend, her tutors are moving to a house here in town. They’ll be short a few hands and muscles. She asked if we could fill in. Tell her we’ll be there.”

Jack had slipped down enough that he could cradle Jo’s face in his hands and begin a slow worship of the delicate skin at her throat. She was ignoring him, stilled by the laser beam of Dean’s glare.

“Cas is going to New York? Next weekend?”

“I thought you knew. He’s taking April. She said they might even stop over in Oklahoma City and spend Thursday night with her folks.”

Dean stared at her. “April told you this?”

“Well, excuse me if I didn’t go through you to talk to her. We’re friends, Dean. We text all the time. Yes, she told me. What’s going on? Jack, sweetie, hold on a minute.” Jo pushed herself back up to sitting, and Jack snuffled a little as he pulled backward.

“He’s leaving town this close to our wedding without me?”

Maybe he’s buying you a surprise gift in New York.”

Dean blinked. “That son of a bitch.”

“Dean, what?” Jo was beginning to feel real concern. Dean’s face said the ground had just dropped out from under him.

“They’re leaving tomorrow?” He looked dazed, like he’d just been struck by lightning and didn’t know yet whether it hurt.

“Really late,” Jo answered. “They’re staying through your…” she glanced at Jack, “…scene with Michael, and then flying out right after.”

“That son of a bitch!”

“You’re scaring me, Winchester. What’s wrong? He’s not skipping out. He’s just leaving for the weekend. It’s not like he’s not coming back.”

Dean had a fingernail in his teeth, thinking. “Son of a bitch,” he muttered.

“You said that already,” Jack pointed out helpfully.

Dean looked up. “He’s gonna give me those two weeks after all, the slippery asshole. I can’t believe I didn’t see this coming. He didn’t want to do it at all, but I won a point off him when his guard was down, and now it’s payback. He’s going to force my two week hiatus down my throat like an intubation tube.”

“What the fuck are you talking about?” Jo demanded.

“I gotta go. I feel a brat episode coming on. You two good here? Yeah? Kay. See you. Enjoy. Congrats. Stay hydrated.” He hustled out, forgetting to lock the hallway door. It wouldn’t matter. No one had any reason to poke into the room that had a newly Mated coupled turning back into the warm embrace of bliss. No one was going to disturb them.
“Stop right there!” the authoritative voice echoed down the hall. Dean froze with his hand on the turnstile bar. He turned.

“What?” he asked his mate innocently.

“You’re not going anywhere without me. And you and I are going to talk about whatever it is you think you’re about to pull.” Michael strode confidently toward him. Dean’s body betrayed him as usual, turning into jelly at the figure Michael cut in his Dominant aspect, one brow pinning Dean’s feet to the floor.

Dean abandoned the turnstile, grabbing Michael’s hand instead and pulling him bodily down the short span to Dean’s suite. Once inside, Michael stepped the power down a notch and leaned against the kitchenette counter with his arms crossed.

“Did you know Cas is taking April to New York this weekend?” Dean asked him.

“I…what? We have wedding appointments. Like, three of them. There are decisions we’ve been putting off. We’re helping Mark and Matt move. We need to do everyone’s final fittings. He’s leaving?”

“It’s what Jo said.”

“How would Jo know? Isn’t she ga-ga from Mating? Why is she talking to you about New York?”

“She and April are BFFs, remember?” Dean shot back. “April told her. Jo mentioned it to me offhand, like she thought I would already know. They leave tomorrow.”

“Dean, our scene is tomorrow.”

“Yeah. They’re staying through that and then hightailing it out on the redeye.”

Michael gaped at him. “I have to reschedule everything,” he realized.

“Right,” Dean agreed. “He knows about all that. But he scheduled the trip anyway. And if he didn’t tell you, and he didn’t tell me, but he didn’t ask April to keep it hush-hush. That means he meant for us to find out by the grapevine and be sideswiped.”

“Son of a bitch,” muttered Michael. He visibly thought about it, but he wasn’t finding any explanations.

“You thinking what I’m thinking?” Dean asked him.

“No, I’m completely lost.” Michael paused and then belched spectacularly, taking himself by surprise and going red in embarrassment.

“Excuse you,” Dean told him without heat as if the discourtesy had been his own. He fetched Michael a glass of water and dug through a drawer to find a chewable tablet for gas. Intestinal distress wasn’t really supposed to hit this early, but Michael was clearly uncomfortable.

Dean filled in the gaps for Michael while the Omega sipped his water. “I told Cas I wanted a two week moratorium on sex to get the two of us revved up for the ceremony and the wedding night. I thought it would be dramatic and romantic.”

“He didn’t want to do it at all, if I recall,” Michael replied.

“Right, so we settled on one week as a compromise.”

“Except, you didn’t want a compromise. You wanted two weeks.”

“I’m still lost,” Michael admitted. “Why is he going to New York?”

“I maneuvered him out of the foursome he wanted to do. He meant to try it out on Friday, but I threw spikes in his wheels, and he lost the chance to get it in at all before the wedding.” Dean flopped down on the couch and sprawled.

“I remember that…” Michael said with confusion on his face, still not getting it.

“Don’t you see? Michael, I won! I scored off him. I slipped in the back way and pulled his chair out, and he fell flat on his ass. He can’t let that stand.”

Michael’s face clouded and lowered. “And he’s getting you back by giving you what you wanted in the first place?”

“Don’t confuse me with facts, man. I’m thinking here.” Dean got up and paced.

“Should I be worried about your mental health?” Michael asked him. Dean put up a palm in warning. “He’s up to something. I can feel it. I just have to work out what it is.”

Michael buried his face in his hands and rubbed. Hard. “Maybe he just has business in New York, Dean. Maybe it’s last minute, and he forgot to tell us. He forgets stuff almost as often as you do.”

“Rude,” Dean said, turning to face Michael.

“Paranoid,” Michael retorted.

“Come to New York with me,” Dean said, feeling tingles in his fingertips.

“Not a chance,” Michael parried.

“Not for the whole weekend. Just for Saturday evening.”

“You want me to spend three hours on a plane, each way, for one evening. You’re out of your mind. We have things we need to do here, and I’m miserable right now. I’m belching up ‘Old Faithful’ even with my feet flat on the ground.”

“I need to surprise him, Michael. I need to score one more hand.”

“What you need is a hard spanking,” Michael said flatly. “I can take care of that for you right now.”

“Yeah, that’s not a bad idea,” Dean said easily. “Prolly help me think better.”
“Really? We just did a big scene on Monday.”

“Scening and spanking aren’t the same thing, man,” Dean told him as if it were common knowledge.

“Wait. Are you seriously asking me to spank you?” Michael set his glass on the counter so he didn’t drop it.

“Just a quick O.T.K.” Dean was already pulling his shirt over his head after unbuttoning the top couple. “Just get me present and clear my head.”

Michael didn’t move, so Dean walked over, took his hand, and led him to the couch, shoving him bodily into place. Dean slipped his slacks and underwear down to his knees and placed himself over his mate’s lap. He settled, breathing deeply. Michael didn’t move. Dean looked around at him.

“Come on, man. Help a guy out. Think of it as popping a zit on my back that I can’t reach. I can’t do this myself.”

“This is the weirdest experience I’ve ever had, Dean Michael.”

“Bullshit. You did drugs in college.”

“I did downers, Dean, not LSD.”

“Don’t make me insult you and piss you off just to get a…” SWACK! “Ouch!”

“Lay still, or I’m going to miss the mark. Jesus, this feels weird.”

He slapped a hard hand down on Dean’s perfect backside a few more times, the sight of bare skin sending him a message very different from the one Dean was seeking. Michael’s cock thickened, but he shoved the impulse aside. Dean was looking for a supportive presentation from him, not a roll in the hay.

“What are you planning to do in New York?” Michael asked.

Dean squirmed a little, changing his balance point and leading Michael’s hand lower. Michael obliged him, still feeling supremely awkward. He struck several more times. Hard.

“I dunno,” Dean grunted.

“Why is he going to New York?” The quick slaps heated Michael’s hand as much as they did Dean’s ass. He picked up the pace in an effort to shorten to process. Dean huffed at him and ducked his head down below the level of the couch, tightening the muscles of his thighs.

“Dean? Why is he going to New York, and what do you hope to do there?”

“Gonna surprise him, Michael!” It came out pained and far less enthusiastic, far less certain.

“To what end, dammit! Just to score a point?” Michael’s hand stung fiercely, but he kept the rhythm steady.

“Lemme up! Stop, man. Let me…catch my breath.” Dean wormed his way up and slunk backward onto the couch without covering up.

“Why is he taking April with him?” Michael asked, examining his own hand and rubbing the sting out. Dean lay out beside him at an angle into the corner with a knee knocking into Michael’s.
“I don’t know,” Dean replied. His face was rapidly returning to its usual color. “I just feel like showing up on Saturday night and popping up unexpected…feel like that would show him…”

“Show him what? That you know how to buy an airline ticket and track him down by his credit card receipts? He’s not going by himself. You said he was taking April. What if he’s got plans with her that are personal and intimate? You’re going to barge in on them?”

Dean hefted his feet into the air and made a grab for the elastic of his underwear. Michael helped him slide them up his legs.

“It’s how we operate, Michael. He’s gonna expect me to try something.”

“Come on, alpha. Think. Why’s he taking April?” Something about Michael’s voice indicated he’d made a guess of his own.

Dean lifted his hips and shimmied his slacks back into place before slouching back onto the couch in his undershirt and pants. He sighed heavily, glancing at Michael. “Are you going to make me say it all?”

“No. I’m not Top right now, just your mate. Dean, I need to know where your head’s at, that’s all. Do you have it?”

“Yeah,” Dean said, defeated. “They need the time together, don’t they? Just the two of them. They just went through an awful tangled up FUBAR, and I’d be a dick to spoil their bonding.”

Michael patted his leg, adding. “After the wedding, she won’t ever have him again the way she does right now. Give her the weekend. Stay here with me and remember that after the wedding, I won’t ever have you the way I do right now either.”

“Can’t you picture it though,” Dean asked wistfully. “They could go out dancing somewhere in the city, only to spot you and me dancing past as if we just happened to be in the same club a thousand miles from home.”

“Did the spanking really help?”

Dean smirked. “I think so. I would have come to the same decision on my own eventually anyway, but that sped me up. You did a good job.”

“You,” Michael pointed at him on his way back to the kitchen. “Would have bought plane tickets on the spur of the moment and then been too stubborn to back out once the credit card payment went through.”

Dean grinned at him.

“Whereas, I, on the other hand, have been a model packmate and all around good boy,” Michael told Dean with a wink. “I deserve a reward.”

“I’m not driving you out to see Naomi.”

“Don’t be stupid, alpha.”

“What then?”

“Let’s … spend some time together, Dean. Just you and me. Before the wedding. Before the little one turns my guts into his trampoline. Forget Castiel for a few days and come back home with me.
You don’t need to win every hand. Let this one go.”

Dean shrugged back into his shirt and rubbed his butt a few times before he began working his buttons. He advanced on Michael in the kitchen slowly, lost inside his own head and the sensations from his mate. He took Michael’s water glass and drank.

“I’ve never pulled up before, Michael.”

“You’ve needed to,” the Omega reminded him. “Needed to, but couldn’t. Turn away this time, Dean. Focus on me. I promise you he’ll still be there for you when you turn back around. He’s not going to disappear on you if you stop the mind-fuckery. It’s not his sense of watching out for your crazy turns that keeps him close to you. He loves you, Dean. Let him prove it in a new way. Let him come to you while you’re balanced, not just when you’re self-destructive. Let him go. Let him go for now.” Michael’s voice dipped into whispers, and his lips tickled Dean’s ear. “He’ll be back. I promise. You don’t have to reel him back to you in a panic to get him to come home. He’ll come back on his own.”

Dean clutched at Michael’s hips. “I know he will. I’m not afraid like I once was.” Dean’s whispers vanished into the air that thickened around them. “But it all feels so different now. It’s new. It’s a new kind of scary.”

“I’ve got you, babe,” Michael assured him. “We’ll do it together.”

“Can I have him tonight though?” Dean asked in a small voice. “It’s a long two and a half weeks from now until we marry. Can you give us this one last night?”

Michael smiled into Dean’s hair. Dean could feel it. “If he asks me nicely,” he said, evoking the old Michael.

Dean cinched him tightly then took a bracing breath and let him go. “Good. Done. Settled. Thanks, man. I feel tons better.”

“Where were you going just now, Dean? Home?”

“I needed to drive. I do that sometimes when my skin starts to flake off from hard emotions. It helps ground me.”

“But you’re all right now?” Michael was poking around in Dean’s head. Dean could feel the assessment as surely as if Michael held a stethoscope up to his chest. “You remember I have an appointment?”

Dean checked the time on his phone. “Yeah, man. I have an alarm. I wouldn’t have stood you up. Come on into my office for a bit. Let me get a few things done, and then we’ll walk down there together.” Dean held the door for Michael, and the omega kissed him lightly on his way through.

Dean blinked.

“What was that for?”

Michael chuckled. “Do I need a reason?”

“No, I guess not.”

Michael schooled his face and caught Dean frowning a little. “I’m proud of you, Winchester. That’s all. I’m proud of both of us.”
“Oh.”

“Go on and finish whatever you can. Don’t mind me. I’ll just hang out on your couch.”

“Right. Yeah. Got stuff to finish.”

Michael chuckled again at his mate’s fuzziness. Dean shuffled across to his desk and fluttered about on his keyboard for a few minutes before giving it up and joining Michael on the couch again, making out with his mate comfortably until the alarm sounded on his phone. Dean’s hand reluctantly left Michael’s soft belly to silence his alarm tone, and he even more reluctantly disentangled his tongue from his mate’s.

Their foreheads rested together. “Michael…”

“Dean, you don’t have to say it.”

“No, but, do you have any idea how lost I would be without you? Even with Castiel’s ring on my finger, man, I… I need you so much.”

“I know, Dean. I know. I love you too. Come on. Missouri will chew us out if we’re late.” Michael shoved Dean to his feet and let the alpha hoist him up as well. “Knock on Cas’ office on the way out, alpha. See if he’s coming too.”

“Yeah.”

Castiel wasn’t in his office, but the two weren’t surprised to find him already sitting in the tiny waiting area outside Dr. Mosely’s office with a tablet in his hands, clicking away at the touch screen and humming quietly to himself. He looked up when the mates stepped through the glass door and smiled warmly.

With no preamble, Cas scootched over on the bench seat to make room for Michael and began talking as if in the middle of a conversation.

“April and I take off at 11:30 tomorrow night. We’re spending one night in Oklahoma, and then the remainder of the weekend in New York. Michael, I rescheduled my tuxedo fitting, and I’m confident the two of you can handle the rest of the wedding plans without me. Dean, I’m still waiting for your last scene journals.”

“Yes, I am. I apologize for the short notice, but it’s actually good news. Benny and Sam set some wheels in motion that I can pin down if I go now. It’s the end of a very long courtship into some very deep pockets, and everything is ripe. I need to see this through personally.” Cas turned his tablet off and looked up at Dean. “I’m taking April with me, Dean. We need to spend a few nights together, get to know each other all over again. You understand, don’t you?”

Dean blushed and stammered, kicking his toe into the carpet. “I…uh…yeah…Cas. I get it. Just took me by surprise is all, what with Jo and Meg Mating and all the stuff going on here.”

“Jo and Meg have their Alpha to watch over them, baby. They don’t need me. It’s you I’m worried about.”

“Me?”

“Yes, Dean, you. Will you be all right? I’ll be here long enough to examine you after your scene tomorrow. After that, you’ll have Michael. We’ll be home Monday night.”

Dean scoffed. “Of course I’ll be all right. You go on and do the big Alpha thing. Enjoy yourselves. Don’t worry about me. I’ll probably spend the whole weekend laying around in bed, recuperating.”

“Michael Winchester…” a nurse called from the doorway.

If Missouri was nervous with Castiel watching her work, she didn’t show it. She examined Michael thoroughly. She ran readings of his hormones, both those in his urine and the ones he expelled to the environment around him. She studied his measurements, comparing his expansion to her tables, and she asked him dozens of questions. The alphas let Michael do the talking, although Cas piped up with an answer now and then when Missouri strayed into technical jargon.

“No ultrasound today?” Michael asked when Missouri peeled her gloves off and began to wash her hands.

“No yet, Omega,” she told him. “There’s nothing much to see at this stage except fat and connective tissues. Your uterus is too small to get a good picture, and the embryo is still tiny, much too tiny to make anything out.”

“But I feel so much bigger already.”

“That’s perfectly normal, Omega. Over the next few weeks, you’ll stop growing wider as fast as you are right now. Don’t go panicking on us. Give the little jelly bean a couple of months to catch up to your body’s preparations. Once the fat stores are done building up, you’ll plateau on your weight for about three months, and then after that, all the growth is your pup taking on weight.”

“Everyone says it’s a little boy,” Michael told her by way of asking.

“That’s right,” she nodded with a glance to Cas. “His sex organs are firmly established already, although they aren’t fully developed. Noses as sensitive as you have around you, you can trust them. I agree. I smell the same thing. You have yourself a little boy.”

“And he’s okay?”

She smiled at him and patted his thigh. “He’s doing great, Michael. Everything looks perfect. I told you before – you were born for this. You’re going to have a strong, healthy little boy. You just keep up the good work. You’re still exercising?”

Michael nodded. “Jogging won’t hurt him, will it?”

Cas answered him. “Jogging won’t hurt him at all, and staying fit will do you both good.”

“Michael, sugar,” Missouri continued. “You look fine. All your metrics are right where we want them. Any other problems? How’s your nausea?”

Dean cleared his throat. “It’s gotten better over the last week, Missouri. He’s gassy and bloated, but he’s less nauseated. It feels like he’s shifting out of the initial hormonal discomfort and into more of a physical one.” Dean caught Michael’s incensed glare. “What? It’s true.”
Missouri ignored the short fuse and nodded. “Right on time, then. It should continue to improve until it gets much worse, but that’s a worry for another week. Anything else?”

“Sex is still okay?” Michael asked sheepishly.

“Absolutely. Baby, you Top or Bottom all you want to right up until the time I tell you to stop. Even as much length as Dean’s packing when he’s fully engorged won’t hurt that pup. You’re not going to jiggle it loose. Your orgasms won’t cause a miscarriage. If anything, they help because they keep you balanced.”

Michael glanced at Dean and then at Cas.

“So, then, I can still play after the wedding, when we’re all on holiday for the honeymoon?”

“Well, now, that’s entirely up to your alphas, Michael. But I have no objection from a pregnancy standpoint.” Missouri winked at Castiel, and he grinned back.

“May I have a copy of your findings from today, Missouri?” Cas asked her. “I’d like to study his chemistry a little more.”

“What are you up to, Cas?” Dean asked him beadily.

Cas didn’t rise to the challenge beneath his words. He answered straight. “I want to compare the hormone ratios from today to what we saw during his Mating and testing logs,” he explained easily. “Just email them to me, Missouri.”

“Cas.”

“You promised me access to everything we would have organically, Dean. I’m holding you to your word.”

“He’s not your research subject.”

“He’s not a breakable jewel who needs to be kept behind a glass case either. There’s a middle ground, and I mean to walk it. I’d rather do that with your assistance, but I’ll do it alone if I must.” Cas was on his feet and preparing to leave before Michael had even wormed back into his clothes.

“What’s going on?” Michael asked them both, eyes darting between them.

Cas gestured for Dean to explain, and Dean turned heavily to his mate. “The research team thinks you’re the Golden Ticket that’s going to unlock the theory of instinct for us. It’s the ‘Holy Grail’ of Lupin research. They unscrambled some of the data we got off our Matings, and they’ve got a few new ideas. Old ideas, actually. I told them to keep out of your pants though. I’ve got your back, Michael.”

“They think I can help? How?”

Dean shook his head slowly. “Not like this, man.”

“Dean?” Michael asked as he pulled the elastic of his waistband into place and dropped his shirttail over it.

“Michael, man, I told you. I can’t put you in there and watch what they would do to you.”

“But what’s new, Dean? Cas? What have they learned? How do I help?”
Castiel forced himself to meet Dean’s eye as he answered Michael. “Some of the readings and observations the team has collected from you have opened up access to a new line of reasoning. Or, rather, a very ancient one. We can’t be sure what we know yet, but you present some unique opportunities. Dean’s correct in that you won’t be sacrificial no matter what.”

“But…?”

Dean stepped up, taking Michael’s focus again. “They want to ask you questions about what it feels like when you do all the weird shit you do,” he admitted. “They think it would help to understand how much thought you put into it versus you doing it all on instinct.”

“That doesn’t sound too bad,” Michael mused, watching Dean. “Why does it make you so uncomfortable? It’s just questions, right? I mean, the team can compile them and then you and Cas can do the interview, right? I’ll answer whatever they want to ask, Dean. I want to help.”

“It’s a slippery slope, Michael…”

“I trust you, Dean.”

“Jesus, Omega, you’re gonna be the death of me.”

Michael moved into his space and placed Dean’s hands on his hips, as close to the tiny little beating heart as he could get his mate. “No, I’m not. I’m the opposite of death. I’m giving you life.” Michael’s voice was low and sultry.

“That’s a shitty blow, man.” Dean clutched on though, taking the comfort offered him.

Cas stayed near the door. “We won’t allow it to get out of control, Dean. You know that. You trust me with your safety. Can’t you please trust me with Michael’s?”

“It’s not a matter of trust, Cas.”

“Yes, it is. That’s precisely what it is. And it made sense when you thought you were protecting him from being forced to take part in a study he wanted nothing to do with. But he wants to help. Dean, he wants in. At this point, you’re standing more in his way than you are standing guard over his safety. You know I’m not going to allow anything that puts him at risk. Trust me, Dean. Please! Otherwise, what was all that craziness we all went through together for? What did we gain from pushing each other’s panic buttons over the last couple of weeks?”

Dean frowned and rested his forehead on Michael’s shoulder. “Just the questions? Just talking?”

Cas said, “Nothing but words, Dean. You and Michael have my promise. And it’s fine by me if you’re the one to execute the interviews. Just the two of you, if that makes you more comfortable.” Cas had his back to the door, and he stood statue still. Dean’s resolve had watched one assertion after another fall by the wayside, and Cas knew this one hurt.

“I don’t mind talking, Dean,” Michael told him. “I want to do this. It could help one of our pups somewhere down the line. It could help me. You’re still learning new things every day.”

“Fine,” Dean said suddenly. “Fine. Let’s do it.” He sighed heavily and buried his face in Michael’s throat. “The best thing that’ll probably come out of the interview is going to be that we discover you’re not the ‘Chosen One’ after all.”

“Thank you, alpha,” Michael whispered to him.
Dean made an unsettled grumbly sound of irreverent dissent, and Missouri looked up from her computer in the corner. “Hoo, boy, if you were mine and you made that noise, you’d be lit up all the way home. Now go on and get out of here. Go on.”

Cas chuckled softly as he ushered the other two out.

“It’s a good thing he’s not yours, then, isn’t it, beta?” Cas added over his shoulder, and Missouri blanched a bit. It was a subtle smackdown, but it was enough to draw her up tight and get her attention.

“Yes, Alpha.”

“Good night, doctor.”

***************

Sam stood in the doorway of the room he shared with his mate in the Manor house, watching her watch the twins sleep from her place stretched out on the bed. He had meant to bundle his family back home this evening, for all of their sakes, but Jess looked peaceful and comfortable, and Sam wondered if she might be better off staying. Certainly the pups thrived here with all the hands and warm smiles ready to lend aid to their care, but it was Jess who held Sam’s eye. She was lost to a dreamy, sensuous state of mind as she lay out on her side, idly stroking one finger along Hank’s cheek. The pup twitched in his sleep.

“We could stay, if you’d rather,” he said quietly.

Jess didn’t look up. The softness of her face lingered.

“I just got them to sleep. They were both so tired, and they fought it.” She couldn’t tear her eyes off her sons, asleep side-by-side in angelic perfect repose.

“You’re exhausted, sweetheart. Lie back and get a nap. I’ll keep watch.”

“Look at them, Sam,” she mumbled drowsily. “Have you ever seen anything so perfect? And fifteen minutes ago I was ready to launch them both out the window.”

He huffed a short laugh and sat on the bed by her hip so she could remain hovering above the bassinet. His eyes followed hers, and his heart agreed with her. His sons were perfect.

“Toss them out the window, and you’ll be following right behind,” he threatened with a hand running up her thigh and over the swell of her ass, still sore from her recent corrections. She was too sleepy for a full laugh, so she simply smiled softly.

“Sam…” Her hand made a grasp for his, and he gave it to her. She pulled him upward to nuzzle into his palm, and he went easily, shifting his weight over her hips with grace to spoon her from behind and bask in the soft, sleepy glow of pack. He could see the pups from over her shoulder. It seemed to Sam that he could see the whole world from here.

“I never knew I could love this hard,” she told him. “I would never throw them out a window. Even when I’m exhausted beyond thinking, I would do anything for them both.” Her voice was soft and drifting.
Sam smiled as he scented her neck. “Me too, baby. Go on to sleep. No one’s going to take them from us. Breathe out. Let go.”

“I’m not afraid…” she protested languidly.

“Yeah, you are. You’re all clenched up deep down like you’re terrified they’ll be stolen while you sleep. No one’s ever going to let that happen, Jess. Look…” Sam drew her eyes back across to where J.T. rubbed at his tiny face in a crinkly bunny nose of cuteness before settling back into stillness. “Look at him. Look how sweet and tiny and perfect he is.”

“I can’t do it, Sam. I can’t be strong enough…”

“Shh. Yes, you can. Not by yourself, maybe, but you’re not alone, Jess. You don’t have to try to do it alone. I’m not going anywhere.”

“Sam, I can’t. I get so tired! I’m tired all the time! I love them so much, and they need someone who can care for them properly!” She whispered fiercely and then sniffled. “Hank’s going to need…”

“Jess, stop! You’re tired because there are two of them and only one of you, and you’re not able to get enough sleep, not because you’re weak!”

“Hank needs more care than I know how to…”

Sam clamped a hand across the back of her neck and forced her onto her belly. “Shh!” he whispered into her ear. “You’re exhausted, and you’re panicking. We’ll figure it out, love. Breathe for me now. Just breathe. Don’t talk.”

“You don’t understa…OW!” Sam’s hand smacked her left upper thigh, and she cut off with a yelp.

“I said, don’t talk. Breathe like I taught you, and get some sleep. We’ll discuss it as much as you need to when you’re rested.” Sam leaned his body weight down over her, stifling her into the soft mattress, and giving him enough reach to caress J.T.’s tiny fist and Hank’s velvety forearm. They really were perfect. Sam knew exactly what Jess was feeling. Without a firm hand and a strong sense of his own wolf, the two newly minted parents were in danger of echoing each other straight into a full panic cycle. The years before them stretched out in terrifying unknowns, and they only had one chance to get it right. Such tiny little souls depending on the two of them to fulfill all of their needs for the next many years was a terrifying realization even for someone who wasn’t Submissive, someone who didn’t need a strong hand beneath them, stabilizing their stance. Sam felt the weight of both little ones and his mate all at once, and he knew exactly what Jess was feeling.

“Shh, shh. Sleep now, babies. All my sweet babies,” crooned Sam. Peace settled over his shoulders as he felt Jess slip away inside their bond. A Dominant satisfied was a strong pull for Sam. He felt giddy for a moment, a quick rush of gratification, and then he dropped a light kiss on Jess’ throat before he rolled backward and off the bed.

Sam dropped a light blanket over his mate and then pulled their soft yellow baby blanket across his sleeping sons’ forms. For all her protests that she couldn’t do it, Jess had them both glowing with health, ruddy and plump and growing. Sam smiled softly into the bassinet. He considered offering to take over on the home front for a few weeks to let her focus back on the professional world where she was most familiar, but he remembered what had happened the last time he’d made a suggestion like that, about how she should manage her side of their mutual life, and he sighed. If she asked, he would swap out in a second, terrifying as that would be, but the idea wasn’t going to come from Sam. He would get his turn soon enough.
Jess had wanted the first six weeks to herself, and Sam had the second. Time was running out on her time alone with the pups, and he knew that if she handed them off before her time was up, she would never shake the feeling that she’d failed somehow. That’s not how Sam saw it, but it wasn’t his job to direct her vision. Hank’s little fingers curled around Sam’s index finger and pulled it to his lips. He began to suckle gently, and Sam’s knees went weak. He breathed out a careful breath before slowly extricating himself. Warming up a couple of bottles was well within his capacity.

Sam trotted down into the kitchen, floating a little on a rush of oxytocin. He was on a timer at this point, in a race to beat the hungry wails of his boys before they awakened their mother from the much-needed nap Sam put her to. He’d promised her that she wasn’t in this alone and that he wasn’t leaving. He needed to make good on that promise.

“On the right side, beta,” Fred advised him when the butler saw him raking through the refrigerator. “In the back. We keep a warm pan of water on the back burner of the stove at all times. Just drop two bottles in, and I’ll mind them.”

Sam plucked two bottles, premixed and ready to warm, from the back shelf, shook each a little, and set them into the warm water.

“Thanks, Fred. You guys have an assembly line going, don’t you?”

“It’s a necessity while the pups are this small. They’ll grow out of it soon enough,” Fred told him, adjusting the burner and checking the thermometer clipped to the side of the pan. “Actually, Sam, it was Michael who put the assembly line in place. When they awaken, you can bring down the whole bassinet and change them in the parlor before you feed them. They have bouncers set up in the dining room in case you’re on your own and need to feed them both at once. It is fairly seamless.” He picked each bottle up one at a time and swirled the liquid inside.

Sam stood by the center island watching. Thinking.

“We were planning to go back home tonight, Fred.”

“Oh.” Fred turned with a look of such pathetic disappointment that Sam chuckled softly.

“But it might be better for us to stay on for a while. Jess is overwhelmed and worn out.”

“Yes, that would be far preferable,” Fred jumped in before pinking a little at the collar, swallowing noticeably, and turning to resume his study of fluid thermal dynamics.

Sam chuckled more heartily and scratched his forehead. “Level with me, Fred. Do you and the rest of the staff really enjoy having…”

“Absolutely, beta!”

Sam’s brow hit his hairline. Fred never interrupted. The primate stood pat, turned to face Sam, nostrils flaring.

“Why?”

The butler sighed and went back to the bottles. “I will never have children, Sam, not children of my own. I made peace with that long ago. But please don’t… They are not a burden to us. They are a gift. And they have brought a lightness into this house that it has not held in far too many years. Jessica is exhausted, as you say. You, yourself, have limited time at the moment to devote to them unencumbered. We are your pack, Sam. Let us take up some of the strain. It won’t be forever. It’s just for a spare few fleeting weeks. Please.”
“You don’t…uh…” Sam studied the countertop with a frown on his face. “You don’t think they might grow confused about who their parents are? What if they don’t know me, Fred? We brought them home at the start of convention season. I’m gone more than I’m here.”

Fred smiled patiently. “There’s no danger of that, Sam,” he assured the beta, and the strength of his conviction pulled Sam’s eyes up. “They light up when they scent you. They adore you, you and Jessica both. They always relax in your arms.”

“Maybe, but Fred, Michael has such a way with them. What if they’ve bonded more closely with him than with me?”

“Go fetch them, Sam, and see for yourself. They know who their father is. And please don’t take them away from us merely to be sure they don’t form bonds with Omega Michael. Linking with him does not harm them, nor does it pull them away from you.”

Sam let out a relieved breath. “Yeah,” he sighed. “Right. Love isn’t a pie, right? There’s enough to go ‘round.”

“There is at that.”

“If you’ve got the bottles,” Sam said, feeling much easier. “I’ll go grab the pups.”

*********************

“One down, one to go,” Dean asserted as he backed out of the parking space. “Jo and Jack hit a homerun, and no sign of a Rut. Now we just have to get Meg pegged.”

“I gave Jo access to my suite for the night,” Cas told him offhand. “We need their Processing room back in the morning. Full slate of tests on the schedule. I wanted them to have the option to sleep in.”

Dean scoffed. “Benny has a suite too, man. Should be their own Alpha giving up his digs, not you.”

“Benny is using his suite tonight,” Cas informed him. “He wants to be onsite for them if they need him.”

Dean pouted. “She’s gonna stink up the place with girly alpha stench.”

“That’s reparable,” Castiel reminded him. “Stop whining. It wasn’t your decision to make. It’s MY space to lend, not yours.”

“You’re unlikely to be in there for a good long time anyway, Dean,” Michael commented from the backseat.

“Nooners, Michael!”

“Honeymoon, Dean!”

“Enough.” Cas’ voice was quietly commanding, and they both snapped their mouths shut. Cas turned slightly. “Michael, do you have any objections to my taking Dean in hand this evening? I will not leave him any worse off than he is right now.”

Dean scoffed quietly and grumbled under his breath.
“Excuse me?” Cas challenged, and Dean shot him a petulant scowl.

“I said: Don’t do me any favors. A scene that doesn’t leave a mark ain’t no scene at all.”

“Indeed?”

Dean blanched at the expression on his fiancé’s face. “Oh. Uh. Shit. I mean…” Somewhere along the line, Dean must have earned a shit-ton of bad karma to gift him a mouth that kept turning on him like that.

“Please continue. Tell me what you meant.” Cas was doing that thing. That thing that made Dean’s belly squirm. Dean responded by flashing his winningest grin.

“I meant, I’m putty in your hands, sir.”

Michael sat back on the long bench with a shake of his head. “Knock yourself out, Sir. Nothing you do tonight will change what I have planned for tomorrow.”

“Excellent.” Cas gloated across at Dean, who found an inexplicable need to check his speed and focus tightly on the road in front of him. His ears burned, and the squirming intensified. One glance in the rearview mirror caught the tail end of Michael’s eyeroll, and Dean chuckled in spite of his blushing cheeks.

Damn, he had an awesome Pack! He gunned his baby a little, and headed for home. If this was to be their last hoorah before they married, Dean wanted to make it worth the effort.

Chapter End Notes

I spent time at work, while I was supposed to be working, clarifying the timeline for this story. It was a great time to review all the dangling ends and think through how I want to tie it all up. It also showed me in stark terms just how slowly it all moves. There are several instances where a single day takes four chapters. Total calendar time span for the plot, not including flashbacks, is about 6 months, and that includes skipping right over most of March and all of April. How is that possible?? :D I’m not judging, just baffled.

Anyway, thanks for sharing this run with me. Running is more fun as a pack.
Chapter 104

Chapter Summary

It's the morning of Michael's big scene, and he's not feeling all that great. April, on the other hand, is invigorated. We're taking stock of the pack's state of mind for a minute. Dean's got some introspection to do. Cas is a rock for all of them, as he should be.

Chapter Notes

I accidentally wrote two chapters. I don't know how that happened. They are both finished, but here's the first. The second will come in a bit.

I hope everyone had a lovely Valentine's Day, a good President's Day for my fellow U.S. citizens, a wonderful "Love Your Pet" Day yesterday, and a delectable "Sticky Buns" day as my interwebs tell me Feb 21 is.

A big thanks to Hufflerin for the THEN prompts. This one and the next are both for you.

Cas, Nick, and Benny are all juniors here, if that helps situate them in time.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

Rebecca (Becky) Elaine Rosen
Omega-Neutral [A/B/D]: -21, [D/N/S]: -4, [Z-Scale]: -2, no Pack affiliation cis-Female, Heterosexual, b. 1989
 unmated
Wolf Avatar: Domesticated Dog, Breed -- Yellow Labrador

Chapter 104 – Thursday, August 24, 2017

THEN:
“You’re staying on campus for the weekend?” Benny asked, poised in Cas’ dorm room doorway with a weighted satchel slung across his chest, and hanging low over one hip.

Castiel looked up from his computer, befuddled for a moment. “No. I’m leaving for home in a minute. I need to figure out how to word this. Apologies are hard through email. You’re coming by for dinner, aren’t you?”

“Yeah. I’ll be there,” Benny answered. “Think I would send you into the lion’s den by yourself?” He stepped into the narrow space and looked over his friend’s shoulder at the note Castiel was composing. He read it quickly. Cas sat back a little in his chair with a defeated slump.

“Again?” Benny asked him quietly.

Cas sighed. “I don’t know why she puts up with me, honestly. It’s not like we haven’t talked about boundaries a thousand times. It’s just that once I go fully under, I can’t control everything he does. He’s convinced that being the Dominant gives him the right to run roughshod over whatever we agreed to do together. He won’t follow my lead, Benny. It’s like having a bull elephant with the impulses of a six-year-old on a leash made of twine.”

“I don’t know many six-year-olds with an impulse toward barbed wire,” Benny pointed out. “You’re gonna hurt her someday, brother. You need to back out and get it together before you leave a mark that won’t heal.”

Cas shook his head and frowned. “I don’t think he’d really hurt her. And he always stops when she calls ‘Red’. We’ve got some protocols in place that work. But I spoil more scenes than I get right.”

“Thus the apology,” Benny nodded toward the monitor. The silence that followed made Cas twitchy. It didn’t help that he could feel Nicholas barely stifling amusement from his bed beneath their only window.

Cas sighed.

“By email?” was all Benny had to add.

“She’s not speaking to me right now,” the dark tone matched his mood. Castiel abruptly closed out of the note without saving it and parked his computer. He huffed miserably and stood to face the room.

“Are you coming?” he asked Nicholas. Nick shrugged and lifted the tome he was holding, an indication that he needed the weekend alone to study. It was either that or he was in no mood to nurse his roommate back to good spirits. Castiel didn’t give him a second thought. It was probably best that the Omega had a couple of days to himself.

Cas turned instead to Benny, his study mate and best friend. “I know what you’re thinking, Benedict, but you don’t know what he’s like. Campus mental health services can’t help me. The Helpline can’t help me. I have to figure this out by myself. And no, finding another partner won’t help either until I know what the fuck I’m doing. At least Marie trusts me enough to try.”

Benny stepped back toward the doorway, and Cas followed him, hooking his own bag up onto his shoulder. “Cas, you’re the toughest judge of yourself there is. I wasn’t thinking to harsh on you about anything but the email. That’s a dick move. Give her a little time, and then go talk to her face-to-face. Or call her up. Don’t send a fucking email, man.”
“You think?”

Benny shared a knowing look with Nick. “Yeah, brother. I do.”

Castiel came in through the kitchen from the garage. Cook was laying out Friday’s lunch table with soup bowls and linen napkins. He looked up as Cas stepped in, and he smiled warmly. “Just in time, Alpha. It’s baked potato soup and honeyed ham sandwiches today. Welcome home.”

“Thanks, Isaac. Is my brother around?”

“Gabriel is out for the weekend with friends, Sir. He won’t be home until Sunday evening.”

Cas nodded, trying not to let the man see his annoyance. “Benny’s coming for dinner,” he said. “Nicholas is staying on campus.”

“Yes, Sir.”

Fred moved in the archway, and Cas looked up. The butler’s grey eyes had a compassionate lilt to them. Apparently, hiding a tumultuous headspace wasn’t going to make it past the butler as it had the cook. Stepping in, Fred took Castiel’s satchel and nodded imperiously to get him moving through the parlor and on up to his room. Cas led the way, but he wasn’t actually leading. At the top of the stairs, he cast back over his shoulder and asked, “Where’s Gabe?”

“I believe Omega Gabriel is weekending at the lake for the next two days.”

Cas kicked his shoes off inside his bedroom. “He’s supposed to ask me for permission if he wants to be out overnight, Fred. Did you even try to stop him?”

“Stop him? No, Sir. But I did remind him of his responsibilities in that regard. I believe he gained permission from your mother.”

Cas scoffed rudely. His foul mood had found an outlet, and he didn’t try very hard to rein it in. “Mother would let him skydive without a parachute if he asked her,” he countered acerbically. “Does he have an alpha with him at least?”

“Yes, Sir. It’s a gathering of all the usual suspects, unless I’m mistaken.”

Cas took a breath to say whatever came to mind, ready to lay into the old man, then all the fight fizzled out of him, and he stood morosely, shoulders dropped, brow struggling to maintain an expression of authority, but failing entirely to do so. Fred stood by his bureau and watched him struggle.

“What is it, pup?” the Primate asked him softly. “Can I help at all?”

Cas sat heavily on his bed and scrubbed his palms over his eyes. “I don’t know what I’m doing out there, Fred, and I keep hurting Marie. I don’t know who to talk to. I don’t know what to do. It’s not getting any better with practice.”

Fred thought about it and stepped closer. Not close enough to touch. “If you mean sexually, Alpha, I’m afraid I cannot help, but if you mean interpersonally, I may have a few suggestions for you if you’d like to talk it out with me.”

Cas made an irritated noise and looked sideways. “It’s wolf-based. It’s nothing you can help me with. Ever since I took that damned rating test, my wolf is always right there, ready to throw his weight into everything, as if shining a light into the den I socked him away into gave him permission to break the tethers. I don’t have anyone who can teach me how to do this. No one else is even close.
My father could have, but the bastard left us!”

“Alpha, I must insist that you refrain from disparaging a man whose circumstances are beyond our fathoming. We don’t know that he…”

“The hell we don’t! He left me, Fred! He knew what I was. He knew what I was growing into, and he fucking abandoned me to do it all alone! You have no idea what this feels like! That’s just the point! No one knows! Jesus, Benny’s probably as close as I’m gonna get to a match, and he’s miles down the graph from me. I can’t control myself when I’m with a partner! That damned wolf comes out and takes me over, and all our plans go right out the window! Who the hell is ever going to want me, Fred?! I’m a monster!”

Fred’s expression maintained its placid softness, but there was steel in his eyes. “You’re no such ting, Castiel James, and wallowing in self-pity is the least constructive path you could choose at this juncture.”

“It’s not self-pity.”

“Indeed?”

“I’m scared, Fred!”

At that, the butler softened. He crossed the short space between them and sat down on the bed beside the boy he’d watched grow from an infant to the strapping young adult that he was now. He wrapped an arm across Castiel’s shoulder and gripped his arm, bracing him physically.

“Alpha, I don’t have the answers for you, but I know that you’re going to find a way through.
You’re going to ram that thick skull of yours against the problem again and again until you figure it out. I believe in you, pup.”

“I don’t want to hurt anyone, Fred.”

“And that’s precisely why you won’t, not really. You’re a good man, Castiel. You’ve got a good partner in that young lady. She’s teaching you more than I think you’re aware. I see differences in the way you carry yourself from one week to the next. Sometimes it feels as if we are making no progress at all, when in fact, we’ve covered great strides.”

“I pissed her off again by going off script,” Cas admitted, leaning subtly into the man’s hold. “She’s not speaking to me.”

Fred lowered his head to meet Cas’ eye. “You know what to do when you’ve hurt someone. You take responsibility, you fix it, you apologize…in that order.”

“I know. But that’s just the point. I can own up to it, and I can apologize, but I don’t know how to fix it.”

“Have you consulted with Dr. Singer on the matter?”

“Fred, Bobby’s not a Dominant. He won’t be able to help.”
“That may be so,” Fred admitted starkly. “I wouldn’t know. But what I know is that I am not a wolf at all, and yet you and I have untangled some nasty conundrums together more than once. The good doctor has a great deal more experience than you or I combined, Castiel. Please don’t write him off without at least making the effort.”

“He’s busy,” Cas groused petulantly. “Too busy for me or Gabe, either one.”

Fred pulled away a little and fixed Cas with a stern eye. “I thought you weren’t going to wallow.”

Cas didn’t answer directly, but he met his butler’s eye with a rueful look. “I discovered that he and Marie have been talking about me behind my back. She’s told him very private things, things about me. I don’t want to talk to him. He betrayed me. They both did.”

Fred held his eye mercilessly, wordlessly compelling Cas to see the childish petulance in his conclusion. The Alpha huffed angrily and looked away. “I don’t want to take this to Bobby,” he insisted. “He’s got a skewed view. All he knows is her side. I’m convicted before I ever open my mouth.”

“One forgets the vibrance of youthful certainty as one ages,” Fred said cryptically. “It has been many years since last I felt so certain of something with no evidence whatsoever. Time and experience and having one’s feet pulled ruthlessly from beneath one from self-destructive assumptions have a way of beating that kind of false certainty out of us in due time, Castiel. The only person I suspect has reached a conviction at this point is you.”

“Don’t you get it? I don’t need an expert to talk to. I need a Dominant.” Cas looked at Fred with a pained grimace. And then his eyes focused differently, a realization crossing them as if a heavy drape had pulled back. “Fred, you’re a dominant. You can’t give me any advice on the wolf directly, but maybe just some of the little things.” His eyes glittered. Fred’s mouth opened as if to respond, but nothing came out.

“Do you ever go overboard when you’re Topping your mate?” Cas asked abruptly.

Fred’s eyes widened in surprise. “I don’t have a mate, Alpha. David is my partner and despite the lack of legal recognition, he is my husband.” The reminder made Cas blush in embarrassment. That had been a stupid thing to say. “And I’m not sharing any details of our private intimacies with you. Nor are you welcome to pry into them.” It was said lightly, but Cas felt shame send a flush through him to the soles of his feet. He mumbled an apology.

Fred chuckled and cinched Cas in by his shoulder before releasing him and rocking back to his feet. “Nothing I could share with you will be of service in getting a handle on your own Tertiary gender, my friend. You need a Lupin mentor, and you have one, but you’ve jumped to conclusions about him, and you’re your own worst enemy. Go and speak with Dr. Singer. Let him explain this…betrayal.

“You have a momentous task before you, Alpha,” the old man continued as if he hadn’t been offended only a moment ago. “But you will overcome it. If any man alive has the wherewithal to conquer this particular demon, that man is you. Whatever your father failed to accomplish is not your task to finish. You do not carry your brother’s burdens, nor your mother’s. You bear your burdens and yours alone. Focus, Castiel James. Focus on what you must overcome, and do not allow distractions to pull you off course.”

“I worry, Fred. I’m afraid I can’t do it. I’m afraid it can’t be done. My wolf, he’s…massive, willful, impulsive, hateful sometimes. He’s a sadist. He revels in the screams of pain he wrings from her. And I have no control over him when he gets his feet set like that. He doesn’t listen to me!”
“Castiel, son, he is you. Perhaps your first order of business is to accept who you are. There are thousands of true sadists in the world. It isn’t a death sentence. It’s not a shackle. It does require that you learn control, but that may not be possible if you’re only willing to work on it from outside the beast.”

Cas stiffened and shot him a startled look.

Fred continued carefully. “You have the ability to shift your conscious mind in and out of your various mindsets, no? Such that at times you occupy a forebrain view and at other times you are decidedly Alpha?”

“Fred, that would be insane. You want me to go inside the wolf when he’s mindlessly lost in his own lust? He could kill someone! I could kill someone!”

Fred nodded serenely. “It is, as I said, not something I have any experience with. Perhaps the time to get familiar with him from the inside is not when your arousal is at its peak, but rather, while he’s at rest, while he’s sated, perhaps.”

Cas shook his head again. “I can’t. I don’t want anything to do with him. I don’t want to be saddled with him for the rest of my life. I don’t want to have to guard his lair and hold his chains forever, and I damned sure don’t want to go inside him and look through his eyes!” Cas released a momentous exhale, one that bore the weight of the world. “It would be best if I learn to live a celibate life like father did. It would be irresponsible to unleash this mess on someone else again and again.”

Fred laughed at that. “I should not need to point out that your father sired two sons rather late in his adult life. He was no celibate, Castiel. I should not need to point out that your Ruts are not going to vanish merely because you find them distasteful. You cannot solve this problem by avoiding it. You are a sexual being like the rest of us, and you need physical contact.”

“I need him, Fred. I need my father. I begged him not to leave.”

“Your loss is profound, Alpha. But you are not alone. Call Dr. Singer. Let him guide you. Then call your lady friend and grovel for her forgiveness. Take it slowly with her. Take it in small doses. Learn control one step at a time, and listen to whatever Dr. Singer has to teach you.

Cas didn’t respond right away. He fidgeted with his fingers tangled together in his lap. He avoided meeting Fred’s eye. He heard the soft chime through the intercom announcing that lunch was served. He looked up, troubled.

“I’m ashamed of who I am, Fred. The sadist inside me, he’s dreadful. How can you stand to know that about me?”

“Stand it? Castiel James, I’m honored to know you.”

“But it’s sick! It’s wrong!”

“No, son. It isn’t either of those things unless you wield it badly. And I believe you’ve discovered the source of some of your troubles. Unless you come to terms with who you are and make peace with your wolf in all his glory, you’re never going to gain a controlling hand over him.”

“You’re not ashamed of me?” Cas asked, puzzled. “If I told you some of the things I’ve done…”

“Spare me the details, Alpha. I beg you to consider that I am not wired quite the way your and your kind are. Nonetheless, I find no shame in your admissions. I believe it’s time you figured out how to reach that same conclusion for yourself. Perhaps then you may find that you have more control than you expected.”

Castiel regarded him somberly. “Was everything my parents raised me to believe a lie?”

“No, Castiel, not everything.”

Cas stared at him in shock. What was he saying? Butlers did not say such things about their employers. But Fred wasn’t taking it back. Castiel felt his spine straighten. He felt the hot flush of resolve clench his jaw and spark his eyes to take on a red tint, and he exhaled a catharsis of intent. “I’m going to get through this, Fred. And then I’m going to figure out how to help others to do the same. We shouldn’t have to do it alone. It’s too much.”

Fred smiled gamely at him. “There’s the Alpha I know so well. Come now. Your lunch is cooling. There’s time for dog training this afternoon.”

“Dog training?” Cas huffed, following after his butler. “Weren’t you listening? He’s not a dog, Fred. He’s a wolf! Or a hellhound, maybe. Not a dog!”

NOW:

Portia whined and scratched at her gate through breakfast. She despised being separated from the pack, but she couldn’t control herself well enough yet to be allowed in where the Subs were hard at work down on their knees, and they didn’t need the distraction. For April, it was a distraction anyway, the sounds of her puppy’s displeasure keeping her from focusing on her Dominant’s commands. He wanted her focus, and she couldn’t keep her mind from straying across the kitchen to where her puppy begged for escape.

A hard grip took hold of her chin and startled a gasp from her. Her eyes shot upward to his. His eyes had gone red, and he was clearly displeased. “Have you more important things to be doing this morning, Omega?” he asked rhetorically.

She lowered her gaze in shame, but his grip tightened, and she looked up again plaintively.

“Do you need help staying present?” he asked. This time it wasn’t rhetorical. “We can remove the dog to her outdoor run if you need us to, or you can fight through and learn to hold your attention where it belongs in the face of distractions.” The choice he preferred for her was obvious, but he left the deciding to her.

“Portia, SIT!” he commanded from the length of the kitchen, and the puppy slammed herself onto her backside and stopped whining at once.

“I can do it, Sir,” she told him, not remotely sure that it was the truth.

He nodded sternly. “That’s two marks, April: one for losing concentration and one for failing to hold my eyes while we talk.”

“Yes, Sir.”

“Back to work.”

She took a deep breath, let it out, and then moved back in to take his weight on her tongue once more, swallowing awkwardly around the span of his cock to get him settled correctly, and then she closed her eyes and began a meditative breathing pattern. If it hadn’t been for Portia’s pitiful cries, this morning would have been a perfectly relaxing way to start her day. Cockwarming was April’s favorite morning ritual. Sometimes he put her through position training instead, shifting her from one to the next like a yoga vinyasa, a salutation not to the sun, but to the radiance of her Dominant. She liked that too, but the closeness of warming him, holding him, scenting him, comforting him… nothing else compared. Not that a rousing blow job that ended with his fingers tangled in her hair was ever unwelcome, but… No, this right here, this was heaven. This was where she was meant to be.

He’d fed her first, as he often did, letting his own breakfast grow cold while he cared for his mate intimately. Now he was reading the paper and crunching through a slice of bacon, mindful not to drop crumbs on her head. April knew that there were others at the table too, but she felt alone with him. She could feel his idle touch through their bond, carding through her emotions, through an absentminded assessment of her physical state even as his focus was on reading an article on the front page.

Portia’s high-pitched whining started up again very softly, gaining volume in doses, picking up momentum. Castiel ignored the dog. April swallowed again, tightened her hold around his calves slightly, sucked in a line of drool that threatened to dampen his slacks, and stilled. She felt his praise silently from within, and she shivered with pleasure. Portia would have plenty of attention later, just not right now. The little dog was also in training.

“We’re doing Meg at 10:30, Cas,” Dean said from down the table. “Benny asked if you and I can both be there for this one. Did you get a break in your schedule?”

April listened with half an ear, wondering vaguely why Dean was up in a chair and talking. Why wasn’t he on the floor enjoying his mate’s direction like she was?

“I may not make it,” Castiel admitted. “Crowley’s got Dayton doing backflips, and I’ve got a call at 9:45 to try to untangle it. He’s attempting to defy me through overkill, I believe, taking every instruction at its most literal and mind-numbingly intricate interpretation. He’s driving Jonathon crazy with details. He’s applying a three-year-old’s ‘Why’ tree to everything, and he’s grinding the whole enterprise to a halt. Give my apologies to Benny and Meg if I don’t show, but I have to do this first.”

April heard a low whistle from Michael, then a loud hiccup that sounded a bit like a cough-burp hybrid.

“Shit,” he mumbled. “Excuse me.”

“Try some more water,” Dean suggested. “Slowly now.”

“I know how to drink water, alpha!” Michael spat. April had to swallow again to stifle a laugh. She was certain that her mate knew that that had not been a gag reflex adjustment. His touch inside her head took on a flinty feel. She quieted, concentrating on her breath and the weight of him in her mouth. That answered to why Dean wasn’t on his knees though. Whatever Dean’s response to being treated like a doormat, April didn’t hear it. She wasn’t meant to hear it. She was meant to concentrate on pleasing Castiel.

The puppy began jumping against her gate once more. When his Sub didn’t react, Cas hummed in pleasure, plumping slightly on April’s tongue. She felt a drizzle of precome slide down her throat, but it was too far past her taste buds for her to pick up the saltiness of it. Real submission, the kind that took concentrated effort on her part, was a turn-on for her mate, and that made her nipples tingle in the open air.
April felt him home in on the sensation in her chest, and he hardened further still. They were echoing each other now. Concentrating was that much harder when he responded this way, but she knew her job. Whatever their bodies decided to do, she was to maintain her breathing rhythm and keep still. The thought of what was happening in his head, in her mouth, it set her to tingling everywhere, and she felt herself dampen at all of his favorite orifices. She wanted. She drooled a bit more. And he could feel it.

Her nostrils flared in an effort to suck in enough air now that his cock cut off her throat. She’d been breathing through her nose all along, but somehow now it was harder to draw in enough air. Her grip tightened. He thrust minimally into her mouth, riding the erosion, unencumbered by alternate directives like she was. She felt him give over to a dreamy, lustful headspace, sleepily pulsing his hips ever so slightly. Her restrictions were an anvil she could beat her head against, but the control was so, so sweet.

April fought for it. Her jaw wanted to form a perfect ‘O’, wanted give him a tunnel with an embouchure of her lips that he could rut into, wanted to give him something to pulse against, but she dropped her jaw instead, going slack. His cock slid across her tongue without an answer from her, and his touch in her head glazed over in pleasure and pride. She swallowed.

“Cas, are you listening, man? Are you…? Oh. All right. I’ll shoot it all at you again in the car.” Dean’s voice faded in and back out again. April wasn’t listening. She was turned on, desperate, ravenous for her master’s touch, but she held. Whatever she needed, he would provide. If he wasn’t giving her what she craved, there was a reason. There was always a reason. Trust Alpha. She felt her body tingle with promise, a ripple of chill bumps that started at her forehead and spread across her entire frame. He went still in her mouth, and her eyes popped open in surprise. She felt more than heard him chuckle. Glancing up, she saw him smiling at her. The dreamy look was still there, but he wasn’t chasing it.

“You’re such a good girl,” he praised with a hand in her hair. “Hustle up and get dressed, then come down and kiss me goodbye. I’ll have someone come pick you up this afternoon. Be packed and ready to go.”

She nodded and pulled slowly off. She dried his cock with the cloth he handed down to her, and then she tucked him back in and zipped carefully, mindful of his erection. She slipped out from beneath the table, letting him ease her to her feet, and she chirped when he landed a hard pop to her butt as she turned to go. A look over her shoulder caught the smolder he leveled at her. His body went unsatisfied, but his wolf was pleased, and she blushed and trotted out, paying no mind to the maids at work in the parlor. April’s nakedness was no new thing in this house. Her house.

Perhaps she was meant to come away from her breakfast ritual feeling small, bound, controlled, or owned, but she didn’t, and she didn’t really believe he meant her to. She felt powerful. April felt invincible as she scurried up the stairs to dress. He’d set her alight with potential, that mate of hers, the man who ruled others as easily as he sharpened his pencils. He would head in to work this morning invigorated, prepared to tear Crowley however many new holes the beta needed to get the message. Castiel’s message.

That vigor was April’s too. Whatever her tutors had in store for her today, whoever she was meant to wow with her fucking God-given talents or whatever, they could all fuck themselves! April was no one’s plaything but Castiel’s, and she danced to no one’s tune but his. And he wanted her emboldened today, she could feel it. He wanted her flying from her own potential. He wanted her to let go and soar! She giggled loudly to herself, enraptured, engaged, in love.
And ready for anything!

"Menu, Cas? Cake? Flowers? Anything? Don’t you have any opinions?"

Cas blew out a frustrated breath and stepped out of the car into the heat of the dying summer. “I found the photographer and the venue. I chose the wording on the invitations. I don’t care about the colors or the cake.”

“Bobby found the photographer!” Dean protested. “And only after you handed it off. That chick’s going to cost us thousands! Belize, Cas? Really?”

Cas laughed. He held the front door for Dean and Michael, and all three of them entered kiosks of their own to gain medical clearance for the turnstile locks. Dean took it right back up as the door slid open on his kiosk while he was still zipping back up.

“All right. At least decide this. We got a gift in the mail from a fan. It’s a little ceramic cake topper with all of us sculpted. Can we use that or do we have to go formal?”

Cas paused at the turnstile with a charmed expression. “I think that would be perfect, Dean. If you like it, I’m certain I will too.”

Dean smiled shyly at the answer, but Michael silently put a finger gun to his head and pulled his finger-trigger to blow his metaphorical brains out. He slipped past Cas and held his entry card up to the sensor to gain admittance through the gate.

“Really?” asked Dean, starry eyed, a bit smitten by a pair of blue eyes, his crankiness forgotten. Cas touched his jawline with a knuckle and leaned across to kiss him chastely.

“All I care about is you.”

Michael stalked off down the hallway, leaving the two of them behind.

“Shit, Michael, wait up!” Dean scurried through after his mate, and Cas followed more slowly.

“Walk, please, Submissive,” he called patiently forward and was a little shocked when Dean slowed to a quick walk.

“Hey. Hold up! Dude.”

Michael stopped and waited for him. “Don’t you need to get to work?”

“Course I do, but I can walk you to class first. Don’t be like that.”

“I’m sorry, Dean. I feel awful today. It’s making me cranky.”

“Come here.” Dean pulled his mate into a tight embrace, but Michael stood stiffly, not hugging him back. “Was it missing out on our routine this morning?” Dean asked him. “You weren’t in the right space, baby.”

Michael looked away. “I can’t go into a Dom class like this,” he worried aloud. “I’m caught in my Secondary. I feel stuck there. They’ll eat me alive. I want to go back to a one-on-one with Joshua. Or better yet, skip it until we get back from P…”

“From where? What was that?” Dean goaded playfully, adding a gentle tickle to the back of Michael’s neck. “Where are we going? Starts with a ‘P’?”

“Is everything all right?” asked the Alpha catching up.

“Michael wants to skip Dom class because being pregnant has him stuck as an Omega,” Dean summed up.

“Working through a tough headspace to find the right tone is an important skill, Michael. There will be times when your Dominant is needed in a real life situation, whether it’s a good time for you or not.” Cas lectured paternally, but a good look at the Omega had him rethinking swiftly. “Or.” He sighed. “We could cut you a break and let you spend the day with Charlie and Balthazar. It’s Dean’s decision.”

Dean scoffed and said, “Nice set up, Alpha. Here, Dean, be a great guy like me, or be prick to your mate and make him go to class.”

Michael giggled.

Giggled?

Dean frowned at him then decided. “Stick with me today, babe. I’m gonna get antsy the closer we get to tonight’s big do. I may need you. You can come with me to witness Meg’s Mating. That’ll be fun, right?”

“I’m not a child. Can we skip the patronizing shit?”

“God, you’re adorable. Come on. I got an early staff meeting.” Dean caught Michael’s neck in the crook of his elbow and hurried away with him. Cas stood thoughtfully, thinking hard about Michael’s errant state of mind. He shouldn’t be this trapped as a Secondary persona this early in his pregnancy, and his flip-flopping between amused and irritated – was that a sign of imbalance, or was that just Dean’s influence? Cas himself sometimes found it difficult to stay annoyed with Dean when his playful brat batted him around like an otter with an oyster shell.

“Alpha! You have to come quick! Meg’s having a nervous breakdown!” Cas turned. Becky catapulted around the corner and down the hall toward him. His advice to Michael about needing quick access to a Dominant presentation on little notice fresh in his head, Castiel glared at her, and she pulled up sharp with terrified eyes.

“Back the way you came right this instant! Walk calmly back to me, and tell me what you need to say all over again. March!”

Becky fast-walked, Olympic style, then she poked her head nervously around the corner and strode stiffly back to him.

“Hands on the wall!”

“Sir?”

“ONE!”
She dropped her clipboard with a loud clatter and splayed her fingers and palms flat against the wall. Cas didn’t waste any time. He nudged her feet wider with his foot and yanked her yoga pants to her knees. Tucking the long tail of her shirt into the neck of her collar, he set about spanking her bare backside harshly.

No quarter given.

She winced in pain and sucked in a hard breath.

“Meg will be fine,” he told her. “Her panic is not unexpected, and she’s not unattended. She’s had a watch on her since yesterday.”

He didn’t slow the speed of his strikes, nor let up while he talked. He’d had enough of Becky’s tearing through the hallways as if the Facility had caught fire. Becky’s grimace pulled her lips tight. Her eyes squeezed tightly shut, and her backside tucked as far under as it would go. Her fingers turned white against the wall.

“OW! Alpha!”

“I was clear last time, was I not? You are the public front of this operation, and the way you comport yourself sends a message to our clients.”

“OUCH! I’M SORRY!”

He set his jaw and laid into the Omega receptionist. Castiel rarely did the punishing onsite, but this particular employee had just triggered his last nerve, and he’d promised her his own personal attention the next time it happened. He let his wolf have a taste of her through the application of his hand which Dean always assured him somehow morphed into a steel plate when he was riled.

Finally he let up, slowed, slapped a couple more hard ones just to set punctuation to the moment, and then stepped back.

“Breathe, Becky. You’re done. You did it, and you’re all right. Come here to me.” His voice was still all Alpha, but the wolf was gone. She hiccupped, waddling a little as she turned, and dove into his arms. He held her and smoothed her hair. “Shh. You’re okay. What did you learn this morning?”

She sniffled grossly. “No running and shrieking in the halls.” Her voice trembled. He hugged her close, but they didn’t have the hallway to themselves.

“Nice work, Alpha,” said a flat voice coming toward them. “That ass glows enough to roast marshmallows.”

“Billie, keep walking, and shut the fuck up,” he told her sharply over Becky’s head. A snarky mouth turned against Cas was one thing, but Billie had no business mocking Becky.

“I would, Cas, but I’m actually looking for you.” Billie ignored the chastisement. She set her coffee right on the ground as she knelt to help Becky get her leggings back in place and tug her shirt free of her neckline. She handed the Omega her clipboard back and dug a tissue free from a small packet in her bag. Cas transferred the whimpering woman into Billie’s custody and took the tablet she handed him.

Becky snorfled loudly, but Billie rocked her with a maternal touch, cooing gently.

“What’s this?” Cas asked in surprise. “We had that Bill locked! How are we short of votes?”
“Shh, sweetheart. It’s all over now.” Billie took a moment to console the Omega and rub the sting out for her, but then she looked up, and the switch from Domme to beta in her eyes was a visible thing. “We lost Riley, Cas. She’s siding with the conservatives on this one, and she took Fieldman with her.”

“All right. Let me think. The vote’s not happening until Monday.”

“Yes, Sir. I thought you’d want to know first thing.”

“I do. Thank you, Billie. I also need to go pry Meg’s talons out of the rafters.”

Billie chuckled. “Yes, I heard about that. I believe she’s in the A-B prep room in the south wing. You can’t miss her. She’s shrieking. And throwing things.”

“Terrific,” Cas deadpanned. He looked back to Becky. “Are you ready to go back to your desk?”

“Yes, Alpha. I’m sorry.”

“I know you are,” he told her stooping until his face was at her eyelevel. “And I know that you do what you do out of a deep concern for the wellbeing of your colleagues. I’m not angry with you, Rebecca. But the chaotic behavior must stop, do you understand? Chaos and panic breed chaos and panic. We require a calm, confident, professional presence from our staff at all times, especially those working directly with the public. Promise me.”

She nodded vehemently. “I promise.”

“All right, Omega. Off you go.”

Billie let her go then turned back to her boss with a carefully studied flatness. “I feel certain that you logged that punishment into our system, sir, as you know that failure to log direct contact, even among staff, is vulnerable to garnering us another ISO noncompliance.”

“Oh course, I did,” he answered strolling off down the hall. “Or rather, you’re going to do it for me. The count was somewhere around 75, I believe, and the power rating, based on the way my palm stings, was a seven.”

Billie stopped walking, forcing him to turn and look at her. “You doled out a class E punishment for running in the hall? Damn, Cas.”

“It was a third or fourth occurrence,” he said with a shrug. “I warned her.”

“Yes, well, log it yourself. I have my own kettle that’s boiling over. Do you want me to brainstorm a couple of scenarios for changing the vote count? I can send you something.”

“Thank you, Billie. I would appreciate that. Log the spanking first. Sign my name under your authority.”

Billie’s body went slack with her irritation. “You’re killing me,” she protested, but he didn’t give.

***************

Michael enjoyed the morning spent glued to his mate’s hip. Dean was in a professional frame of mind. It wasn’t one Michael got to see all that often unless Dean had it turned toward him. Watching him work – focused on others this time – was Michael’s chance to really understand what drove the man. Dean’s book outline was now complete. Michael thought it was brilliant, and he was thrilled that Dean trusted him enough to let him have some input on the structure of the thing. It was one thing to know intellectually that Dean was an expert in Omega training and development. It had always been a given between them, and Dean had applied techniques to helping Michael find his footing that were subtle and sophisticated. But it wasn’t until Michael delved into the details of his new book, all the complex patterns of words that had somehow emerged from his mate’s brain to exist nowhere in the Universe but upon those pages, that Michael really digested the fact that no one was feeding this stuff to Dean as he trained Michael. Dean was the source of it. Dean was the real expert. And his outline hinted at intriguing connections of thought and pattern that Michael couldn’t wait to see fleshed out.

A couple of times on his outline review, Michael had needed to process an insufferable spike of exasperation at seeing evidence of the conditioning that Dean had put him to right there in bold type – what had appeared at the time to be impulsive decisions on Dean’s part – all clearly part of a greater pattern. But Dean hadn’t programmed him like a computer and set him free to wander about according to a preset algorithm. The alpha was very real and right there with him through all of it, fucking up left and right, working just as hard at his own Submissive training, applying a framework of structure around Michael that Dean knew would bring them both peace in the end. It had always been human, loving, warm, and very real, and Michael couldn’t hold any resentment at the way his training had proceeded straight out of a formula that his mate designed.

And here the alpha was in his professional capacity doing precisely that in ways that touched hundreds of people in a single day. Michael watched the staff hang on his every word at their morning meeting, seeking guidance from the man who could untangle their most complex problems, trusting him to take them seriously, and lead them out of the mire.

Michael found it ten shades of hot.

Especially when Dean slipped his glasses on to read from his laptop.

Damn.

Dean tucked Michael into a back corner in the processing booth. They had spent a few minutes with Meg, but she had too many people around her, and they were only making her more nervous. And besides, Michael’s wolf did not enjoy watching the Sub suffer. He couldn’t help her. She wasn’t his.
And it irked him that her own Dominant wasn’t taking her in hand as she needed. Michael’s edginess communicated itself to his mate, and Dean ushered him out with a quick kiss to Meg’s forehead and a promise to make sure everything went perfectly.

Meg appeared in the Processing room first, escorted by Charlie and Hannah. The wait once she was placed seemed interminable, and she paced in misery. It looked like agony to Michael, although she hadn’t truly Triggered yet.

Finally, the word came through that her beta mate was ready. Charlie and Hannah scuttled out, and Michael watched nature perform one of her most riveting rituals. Ketch wasn’t what he’d been expecting. Where Meg was a playful, sarcastic brat, Ketch had a dourness about him, a dismissive cant to his shoulders, a presumptiveness about the way he looked about the room and judged everything he saw. He seemed far too dark for Meg to Michael.

Until he zeroed in on Meg.

And then Michael saw it.
They locked onto one another like strong magnets, percussive and violent. Michael startled with the force of it, his back pressing into the wall behind him, his eyes saucers in his head. Ketch was brutal in his Claim, furious in a way that only a True-mate can rev out of a Top. Meg went limp in his hold, bruising beneath his hands, moaning loudly as he tore at her hair and yanked her head back to bare her throat.

When the Claim hit, Michael felt it in his feet. The Top seemed frozen in place wrapped bodily around the small woman, barely seeming to breathe, covering her possessively with his bulk. There was blood on the sheet. It wasn’t a peaceful stillness, but a wound spring, all potential energy bound up in his grip waiting to explode. His back trembled. His toes twitched. His knees shuffled forward one at a time to pull his body in even tighter around her.

A single lock of Meg’s hair fell to the bed, the only part of her Michael could see. He worried that she would suffocate, but no one else in the booth seemed ill at ease. They moved fluidly, calling out readings and vital signs. Ellen had both hands in motion on her keyboard, eyes glancing up now and then at the couple on the bed. Ellen asked for specific data, and a different voice answered each question.

In the room, Ketch was growling softly and beginning a slow pulse with his hips. His head was low over hers, probably still holding on to the shoulder he’d bitten. Michael couldn’t really tell. He was reminded of a lioness guarding her kill from pesky buzzards, hunkered low, possessive, threatened.

“Looks good,” Ellen said with a glance up at Dean. Dean was staring at the couple with his arms folded across his chest, situated square in the middle of the booth like a ship’s captain, his feet planted. Benny had a spot near the door, but he was looking at the floor, his nostrils flaring as his chest heaved; second-hand arousal barely contained for the moment. Michael looked back at the couple. Ketch was working his arms beneath Meg’s shoulders into an embrace of sorts, but he hadn’t let up on the curl of his body.

Michael watched. It hadn’t affected him the way it clearly did Benny. That seemed odd to Michael, but it let him watch and process with a dispassionate eye. Ketch had used a startling amount of unnecessary aggression, it seemed. Meg wasn’t his prey, and she’d consented to Mate him. Why the terrifying attack? Why scare the crap out of her and cover her tightly enough that she couldn’t breathe? There were no external threats to ward off. What was the point of this display?

“He’s going to need a minute, Charlie,” Dean said. “Let him work through the first aftershocks. I don’t want you in there yet. We can’t count on a knot holding him in place, and that’s a hell of a possessive response he’s got going. Meg’s still with us, right?”

Michael found it reassuring that he wasn’t the only one worried for the Sub’s welfare even as a technician called out that her vitals were strong.

“We need to get a Peliomometer on them, Dean,” Charlie disagreed. “Time’s a-wasting. Trust me…”

“I’ll do it,” said Benny authoritatively, holding his hand out to Charlie. She set the meter in his hand, and he fiddled with it for a minute before stepping through the door. Michael held his breath as Benny came into view in the room before the large glass pane and began slowly to move around the bed, taking readings.

“Couldn’t you install meters on the bed itself?” asked Michael softly.

“Shh!” Ellen stifled him swiftly. The tension in the room mounted as Benny reached their heads and passed the meter slowly over them, much too close considering the sound Ketch was making in his throat. A firm touch to the back of the Dominant’s neck and a stern, “Don’t!” from Benny stopped the growling, but Ketch was twitchy until Benny nodded at the glass and walked quickly away.

Ellen apparently had all the data she needed from the little handheld, and her fingers flew. “Yep. It’s good,” she told Dean. “Strong and tight. It’s a complete bond.” She switched to address Benny as he came in, blowing out a breath. “It’s stable, Alpha. We have ourselves a new Packmate. Hope you can handle him.”

Benny grinned out at the room before him. “Oh, I can handle him. Let’s hope he can handle Meg.” Benny caught Michael’s worried face, and he laughed good-naturedly. “Relax, Michael. That was textbook Mating. She’s okay under there. Not everyone gets to do like you two knuckleheads.”

“It’s been over and done with for ten minutes, Benny,” Michael said. “Why’s he still clinging like he’s waiting to shoot his load? What’s going on?”

Benny shrugged. “Bonding. It takes a little while to get comfortable with the new connection and feel secure enough to let go. The afterglow feels good, brother. They’re rolling in it a little bit, that’s all.”

“Peak outputs are starting to drop,” one of the technicians announced. “They’re coming back down. No signs of recess or instability in the bond.” The woman looked up at Dean. “Alpha?”

“Yeah, call it,” Dean told her. “We’re done here. Log it at 10:47 a.m. Wrap it up. Give them some privacy. Ellen, it’s all yours. Nice work as usual, Omega. You’re amazing.”

“I don’t have anything to do with it, Dean,” the Omega told him with a light dusting of pink on her cheeks, pleased at the praise. “It’s all Mother Nature. I just run the board.”

“You’re a godsend, and everyone here knows it,” Dean told her very softly, leaving a kiss on her temple. He collected Michael and escorted him out.

“Is it always that violent?” Michael asked.

“Have you never seen a natural True-Mating before?” Dean countered. “That was pretty tame because we had the environment controlled for him. He didn’t have to worry about countersuits or attackers.”

“I’ve seen a couple of them, Dean, but they weren’t like that. He looked like he wanted to dig a hole and bury her.”

Dean chuckled. “He’s massively Dominant, man. Maybe what you witnessed before didn’t involve a high-rated Dom or Alpha. Those guys always put on a good show.”

Dean led the way back to his office and began to click rapidly through his messages and emails with only part of his attention.

“We didn’t act like that,” Michael put in.

Dean looked up. “We did on the second round. It was way more violent between you and me in the dirt than what those two just did in a laboratory setting.”

“Our first round was an aberration,” Michael murmured. “I’m starting to get it now, how weirded out everyone was. Still, it makes no sense for the Top to be that aggressive when the Bottom is in full agreement about Mating. If they aren’t fighting it, what’s the aggression for?”

Dean smiled and shook his head affectionately. “Just the way it works, love. Don’t get me wrong though. I appreciate that you didn’t tear into me on that first run. If we could train people to do what you did, it would save a lot of people a lot of unnecessary bruises. Now, shush. Find something quiet to do. I need to work.”

“Yeah. Okay. Can I read off your bookshelf?” Michael perused the options and didn’t wait for Dean’s go-ahead before selecting one that seemed interesting but not over his head with technical jargon.

The mates spent the late morning serenely. Each kept one eye on the other, Michael in awe of Dean’s easy rapport with his own staff, with the clients, with the new teams scattered across the continent who rang him up constantly for input on one question or another. Dean had a habit of using his speaker to take the calls, so Michael got both sides of each conversation. He enjoyed the irreverent humor that Dean wove into everything regardless of who was on the other end of the line. It held just of touch of his stage persona – that same confidence and a little bit of swagger – and Michael couldn’t help wondering which persona came first.

Dean, for his part tried hard to stifle the preening he knew he was doing under Michael’s distracted eye, but he couldn’t help himself. His Dom was splayed out on his couch, ostensibly reading a book about Tertiary designation emergence and development. His Dom was right there, watching him work, sending through a veritable hum of pleasure in how Dean managed his desk. How do you not turn such a moment into a porno?

Damnit, Michael.

Focus, Winchester.

A month’s absence for a Honeymoon on the horizon that overlapped Jo’s Mating moon, Dean and Jo both out of pocket at the same time, not to mention that Dean was still slogging through some of the work backlog from his own time off with Michael, the countdown clock was running low. There was still research data that Dean was close to giving up as opportunity lost since he kept shoving its review to the bottom of his priority list. He couldn’t afford to echo Michael into a break right now, much as he wanted to.

“Lunch?” he said by way of cutting the rising sexual tension. “It’s enchilada day. Come on, Michael. I need to get out of this room.”

“Yeah,” Michael agreed. “Do you mind if I ditch you for lunch? I’m meeting Balthazar. Final plans and all.”

“Um. Sure. Anything I need to be in on?” Dean asked hesitantly.

“We’re not changing anything, Dean, just getting all the pins set up. I’ve got to get the final write-up to Cas by one.”

“He’s making you write it up?” asked Dean, startled.

Michael’s face fell a little. “He doesn’t trust me yet,” he admitted. “I screwed up with you more than once after I promised you both I wouldn’t. He’s got my leash in his teeth right now. And this is a big one. I need to get it right.”

Dean’s face did that soft affectionate crinkly thing. It wasn’t a smile. It was something that lived in his eyes and his Mating-bond. It was warm. Michael sighed, saying, “I know you trust me, baby, but this is big for both of us. I’ve never done anything with this many players before, and you’ve never had a public scene. We’re both in uncharted waters. What if you don’t react the way you think you
Dean snickered and advanced on Michael slowly. “First of all, you’re not going to fuck it up because you’ve planned it well, you brought in experts who know what kind of landmines to watch for, and you’re overthinking everything to the point that you’ve already accounted for anything that could go wrong. Second, man, I should have told you. I did a public thing with Cas in Dayton. It was spur of the moment. His nerves were on edge, and he needed a pressure valve release. And I fucking loved it. You hear me? Wipe that worry off your list. This isn’t one of those fantasies that turn squicky when you try it out in real life, at least not on my side. I’m in, Michael.”

“You did?” the Omega asked cautiously. “How public?”

“The entire Lawrence contingent was there, babe. Watched me take it up the ass flattened against a clear glass pane and shooting off without a hand on me. All those eyes, Michael. People I knew. People I didn’t. It was harsh and rough and hot as hell, and I loved it. And you, by the way…” Dean held Michael’s eye. “You would’ve known about it before now if our bonds had been open when it happened. Not trying to rehash settled shit here, but truth is truth. So stop fretting over whether or not I’ll be okay in there, and relax. We’re gonna be fine.”

“Tell me one more time before I go meet Balthazar. Tell me what you want.”

“Sit,” Dean instructed, pointing Michael back to the couch. The alpha squatted in front of him, balancing by holding onto Michael’s thighs. “I want to be a piece of furniture in there. I want to be treated like I’m not even human. You get me? I want to feel denigrated, like I’m only useful if my body can get somebody off. I want you to treat me like a new sex toy you just bought off the internet, and you want to share with all your buddies cause it’s that awesome.”

Michael’s eyes bore into Dean’s. “Subhuman,” he breathed. “Animal?”

“Yup. Enslaved animal, maybe,” Dean clarified. “Go deep into your fantasies, man, and let go. I wanna be useful, but in the way a beer keg is useful, in how it gives pleasure to others, in how they take pleasure without thinking about the means. No one cares whether the spigot filling up their pint is enjoying itself. But no one takes a hammer to the spigot either, right? Abuse the damned thing and it won’t work right anymore. Are you following?”

“Oh, yes. I follow. I needed to hear you say it again. We could go so wrong if I misread you, Dean. Tell me you’ll stop it if it’s not hitting the right note. This is for both of us, not just me. Tell me you’ll safeword out if you need to.”

“Impala,” whispered Dean into Michael’s ear. “Not right now, obviously. That was a test.” He paused to let Michael feel around inside him. Then he said it again slowly, a whisper.

“Impala.”

“You’re sure?”

“Positive.”

Michael grinned. “If it goes well, I want to look into setting up a monthly party with you as the centerpiece.”

“Hold on there, Cochise. One thing at a time.” But Dean was laughing, not alarmed. “Let’s get through today before we start selling tickets. Come on. I’ll take you by Balthazar’s lair, and you two can put the final touches on the plan.”
Dean lunched with Sam and Sarah, and he learned she’d made her decision about sidling over to work for Cas, that her previous advisor was facing charges of ethics violations and had been suspended, that she would be staying with the Winchesters, observing them at home, while she worked on her thesis. He was far more accommodating of the idea than she expected.

“It’s time we ripped the band-aid off,” he told her with his mouth full. “Pussyfooting around the hard stuff is only tangling us up. So let’s do this. Stay outta my vinyl collection is all I ask.”

Sam nodded but shot Dean a sharp look.

“What?” Dean asked.

“You’re okay with having Michael under the microscope with the rest of the pack? You’re okay with April getting her share of scrutiny? We’re all going to end up published, Dean. You get that, right?”

“April’s not my problem, Sammy. She’s Castiel’s. And Michael…Jesus, I dunno. I’m starting to feel like I’m battling against myself here. I know the public isn’t ready for someone like him, and my bones go cold thinking about how they’re gonna start throwing rotten fruit at his head any damn day now, but… I can’t lock him in a closet either. So, band-aid, like I said. Rip it off fast and clean, and let the shit hit the fan however it’s gonna. Doesn’t mean I like it. Doesn’t mean I have to.”

“I’m proud of you, Dean.”

“Yeah. Whatever. Cram it up your ass, Sammy, I got work to do.” Dean grabbed his tray and dumped the remainder of his lunch into the trash, dropping Sarah a casual, “Welcome to the jungle,” on his way out the door by way of wishing her luck.

She gaped as he stalked out. “God, that guy is fascinating, Sam. I had no idea. He’s, like, fourteen different pressure points all firing at once. Like he could go postal any second. But he’s also the most lovable flirt, and the biggest nerd…”

“I don’t recommend flirting with him,” Sam said into his coffee. “You’ve met his boyfriends. There are two of them, remember. Psychopaths, both of them.”

Sarah giggled. “I’ll keep that in mind.”

Dean stormed back toward his office, encountering Castiel headed in the opposite direction.

“Hey, hey…” Cas said sliding into his path and halting his forward progress. “What’s wrong? You look like you could chew glass. Talk to me, Dean.”

Dean let himself be stopped. He let Cas’ hands circle his waist and settle at the small of his back. “Five-thirty can’t get here fast enough, man,” he mumbled churlishly.
Cas frowned. He held his fiancé in the middle of the hallway and rocked him a little bit, pulling him in close and letting Dean’s chin tuck up over his shoulder where the scent was thick. “Just a couple more weeks, baby, then we’ll take a nice long break. You’ll see. It’s going to be so relaxing.”

“Who says I want relaxing?” Dean asked. “And hey, are we staying IN Paris or out on the outskirts?”

Cas startled and pulled back to look at Dean with a shocked expression. “What?! How did you find out? That was meant to be a surprise!”

Dean laughed and kissed the baffled look off Castiel’s face. “Michael slipped a little. I wasn’t sure until just now. Thanks for being transparent.”

“You’re a brat, Winchester. Forget relaxing. I’m going to tan your ass until you forget how to sit down.” There was a growl emanating from Cas’ throat, and it soothed Dean, brought him right up from the swamp he’d stepped into and put him on his feet again. How fucked up was that, he wondered.

Whatever.

Dean was tiring of constantly comparing his comforts and kinks to an imaginary standard of normal. He was outgrowing the need to do that so fast he could feel it rub uncomfortably every time he moved. He wondered if crabs felt this way just before they molted. His old skin was too tight, and all of his old conditioned reflexes pulled and caught in ways they had never done before.

What would his father have said to that if he’d been here to watch Dean flail against his expectations? The realization that John knew Dean had always taken reprimand from his own brother, that he had always known Dean needed it, it’s as if that knowledge tore something loose that Dean couldn’t shove back inside.

Since he’d misunderstood John’s finger-pointing after Mary’s death, was it possible Dean had also misinterpreted John’s harsh judgments toward submissive men as well? Dean had labored long under the assumption that John believed what he believed, misguided as it was, and that it was Dean’s task to dig himself out from under the weight of paternal bias, that John was wrong, however staunchly he believed. But Dean wondered under the light of what he’d learned before his father passed: was it possible that John didn’t look down on masculine submission as a matter of course so much as he eschewed it personally because it wasn’t who John was? He’d never actually said words to any effect, but John Winchester bowed to no one. That had always looked like a declaration of his values to Dean. But what if it wasn’t? Maybe it had never irked John to have a Sub for a son. Maybe that was all projection of Dean’s own psyche, railing against something he found distasteful himself. Maybe John never put that weight on him in the first place.

Maybe Dean had done it to himself.

Now there was a topic for Tessa.

“Are you all right?” Cas asked with a look of concern.

“I’m peachy,” Dean responded blithely. “Missing my dad today…more than usual. Wish I could talk something over with him.”

Castiel fairly oozed compassion. His concern turned soft, tender. “I understand completely, love. Would you like to sit with me while I eat? Are you going to be okay?”

“I’m good,” Dean told him honestly. Mostly honestly. Not dishonestly. “I have to get back for a call, and I gotta work out around Jo’s absence. We’re meeting in conference room 4 if you wanna join. It’s not going to be easy. We’re already stretched as thin as we can go.”

“What time?”

“One forty-five?”

“I can’t. I have a legislative vote to fix.”

“Ouch,” said Dean. “You win. Go fix votes, Alpha. We’ll manage. But look, this evening? With Michael? I’m planning to go all in, let my hair down, sink way under. I know you’ll be watching. Tell me I don’t need to worry about you getting possessive or worrying about me. I need to wipe that thought out of my head before I start or it’ll fuck me up bad.”

Cas nodded, understanding that his Sub carried a lot of responsibility around with him. Keeping both Doms at ease was one of the biggest. “I’m only there to help, Dean. If you’d rather, I can assign another alpha to stand watch.”

“No! I want you there. I do. But I want you there getting hot, not getting pissed. Or worried. Promise me?”

“I promise,” Cas told him. “Cross my heart. Dean, I’ve watched you work before. I’ve watched you with clients, students, and staff. I’ve never felt anything akin to anger or possession, and what’s more, as long as you have that ring on your finger and that scar on your shoulder, I know who you belong to. Don’t worry about me. I don’t judge your fantasies, baby. I adore them. Go let off some steam. I think we’ll both love it.”

“And if we don’t?”

Castiel’s eyeroll was epic. “Then either you never do it again, or the next time you do it, you don’t invite me to watch!”

“This isn’t like when I’m working, C.J. This isn’t for someone else, it’s for me. I’m the client in this one. You gotta make a space in your head for the difference before the big dog catches wind. He’s not going to like it one bit.” Dean lowered his face and leaned in conspiratorially. “Raphael is going to be there. Don’t rip his cock off, okay? We just finished a round of hiring. I need a break from reading resumes.”

“I swear to behave myself,” Castiel told him somberly. “I want you to release whatever might be worrying you, let go, and enjoy yourself. Don’t give me a second thought. That’s why I’m staying out of view. Focus on Michael, Dean, or he’s going to find a creative way to draw your attention back, and you might not appreciate that as much as the rest of us will.”

Someone in the hallway cleared their throat, and Castiel answered without turning. “Yes, I’m coming. Go on without me.” He kissed Dean rather soundly and reminded him to finish his scene logs before he added another one to the list. He sent assurance through their Claim-bonds and through his eyes, then he squeezed Dean’s shoulder and turned on his heel, disappearing before Dean’s vision refocused from the kiss.
The afternoon disappeared in a whirl of activity, the likes of which Dean was realizing was the new norm. Michael never showed back up, but Dean could feel him, close enough that Dean knew he was still onsite, and he dutifully checked in a couple of times by text message. When Dean’s alarm went off, he jumped, lost as he was in the chaos of managing a goliath that was growing into a behemoth before their eyes. Dean stared at the screen. He thumbed the alarm to silence and sat, transfixed by the display on his phone.

It was time.

He blinked a few times. He looked up at his monitor. Now or never. Fish or cut bait. Sink or swim. Shit or… He breathed. In. Out.

In.

Out.

Dean saved his document and logged off his computer. He sent his phone to the answering service. He locked his office door and stripped out of his clothes. He slipped into his suite for a restroom break and a chance to wash his face. Then he went back to his office. Kneeling gracefully in the middle of the floor, he gave thanks for plush carpeting.

Dean began a slow recitation of an ancient calming prayer in his head. He felt his heartrate slow. He felt warmth in his belly, and he pushed it out to the tips of his fingers and his toes. He concentrated on every body part one at a time, cataloguing the sensations from each area, sending in oxygen, heat, relaxation, gratitude, and peace. Dean felt himself morph into a conduit of sorts. He felt the sheer, inexplicable pleasure of releasing his will for the satisfaction of someone else, someone he loved, someone he trusted. Dean let his thoughts float. He rounded into each thought as if entering a room, looking around, getting the full picture, examining its depth and context, and then leaving it behind without commentary.

He got stuck in one room. It occurred to Dean, as it usually did at some point along the way during a good scene, that discussing a scene and planning it prior to submitting defied the concept that he was supplanting his own will at all. If his Dominant gave him what he asked for, how was that submission to the will of another? And in that thought came the natural follow-up – what would he do if his Dom took Dean’s gift of submission and turned it into something very, very real, taking rather than giving, only for his own pleasure and refusing Dean any for himself? Dean shivered at the thought. Chill bumps ran up his spine and spread out over the top of his head. He longed to know what that would feel like in a wider context. Today would come close. Certainly, there was to be a touch of humiliation to it, a distance that wasn’t normally part of Michael’s repertoire. But Dean was certain that in the end, Michael’s touch would be a giving one, not a take. If Dean followed the script, he would be rewarded as he’d said he wanted.

Was that more for Dean, or was it for Michael?

The mates had moved into deep waters in terms of their relationship. Michael caught on fast, and he had a fire about him at times that singed Dean’s fingers and toes. The young Dom was so close. He understood how Dean’s brat provoked action when he wasn’t getting what he needed, but did Michael really understand why? Would he be able to connect the dots in Dean’s psyche and realize that having to ask for it diminished the outcome? Was Michael ever going to be able to get ahead of the game running in Dean’s head, cut him off before his brat made a move, and snuffle him into the mud preemptively? A full body shiver passed across the alpha’s nude body, and his cock stiffened.
If Michael took the reins into his own hands tonight, if he set ruggedly handsome men to using Dean in whatever way he could imagine, sent him pride and pleasure straight into Dean’s head, and then left him gaping, sore, and unspent at the end… heaving in beautiful agony…

But that wasn’t Michael, and Dean could respect that.

But maybe Cas would. Someday.

It was an existential question at the heart of his very being, and it wasn’t going to be answered today, not by Michael, not by Castiel.

For now, Dean felt ready. He felt soft inside, pliable. He felt a frisson of anticipation, but no fear.

His alarm chirped softly. This one was set to be gentle, not strident.

Dean flowed upward to his feet, and he turned the alarm off. He took a deep breath at the door, turned his office light out, and slipped naked into the hallway.

Chapter End Notes

Don't worry, it's coming. I put it off way too long, hoping my muse would smack me with inspiration that didn't seem trite. I gave up waiting, and just wrote something. Posting soon.

Love to the pack.

Thanks again for hanging in there.
Chapter 105

Chapter Summary

So, Dean and Michael kind of do a thing, and there are some friends along for the ride.

Chapter Notes

Here’s the second of two. If you got caught off guard, be aware that there were only a few hours between posting this chapter and the previous, so if you missed one, head back and pick it up real quick.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

Chapter 105 – Thursday, August 24, 2017

THEN:

Dean was drunk, raucously laughing at the bar with Benny. It had been a good day, and they all needed to let their hair down. Dean was also beautiful, and Castiel was listening raptly to Charlie across from him in the booth, but his eyes kept finding a perch on Dean’s laugh lines.

Charlie had been regaling him with a story of her latest conquest, a beta from the History department of KU, and throwing her usual impertinent tone across the affair as only Charlie could. Castiel laughed in all the appropriate places.
He hoped.

Benny winked at him. Cas turned back to Charlie with a startled blush.

“Are you planning to see her again?” he asked. That seemed adequate to the topic no matter where she’d been headed.

“Most def,” she nodded. “She’s got the best setup I’ve ever seen in a 600 square foot apartment. I’m gonna take lessons in config and storage maximization. The chick had, get this, an entire St. Andrews cross that recesses into the wall behind her TV. No good if you wanna binge Buffy and get your tingles going at the same time, but, and I say this with all conviction and all possible gravity, sometimes Buffy has to take a step back and share the room. Orgasms don’t orchestrate themselves, even for the queen of hot badasses.”

Cas laughed and took a swig from his bottle. At the bar, Dean had stepped away from his stool and was mimicking a punch drunk alpha buffoon, laughing hard as he ducked an imaginary punch and falling on his ass as the man picketing outside their construction site had done. Charlie followed Castiel’s eyes, laughing along with most of the bar. It really had been funny when it happened, funnier still in the way it was presented on the evening news.

Funnier still that the picketers had since been removed from the premises for their own safety. Would that Cas could have them removed to Missouri for their own safety, but it was a win if for no other reason than the construction contractors didn’t need to wade through crusaders every day on their way back in from lunch or risk assault charges for trying to access their work tools amid the chaos.

Dean looked across at Castiel, beaming, resting on his butt with his arms on his knees. Cas raised his beer in silent salute, and Dean grinned.

“Come on, alpha,” Sam said, extending a hand to pull him up. “You’re drunk. Let’s get you home.”

“Am not,” Dean told him. “And besides, Cas promised to go over tomorrow’s plan with me.” Dean let himself be hauled to his feet, and he collapsed in the booth next to Charlie. “Right, Alpha? I’m not drunk. I swear.”

“That’s a lie, Winchester,” Cas laughed. “But I’ll admit I’ve seen you drunker.”

“See?” Dean threw toward Sam. Then he turned his crystalline green eyes back to Castiel. “Oh, yeah, remember when our big grant came through? I was way drunker that night.” He pointed a finger across the table. “You made me postpone that scene we had planned, remember? The one where you were gonna, tie me down and put the…Um.” Dean’s ears went pink, and his eyes dropped to the table as he stammered an end to whatever he’d meant to say.

“I do, remember,” Castiel assured him. “You spoiled my evening, and all the produce went bad.”

Dean’s shoulders shook as he giggled into his lap. He peeked up at Cas through his lashes, grinning a private smile. Cas felt heat pool in his belly, and he changed the subject. Sam left them to it.

“We can go over the schedule in the morning. The only thing that needs our immediate attention is finding a new home for the Keller Certification classes. I’m determined not to lose momentum now that we’ve got it. Putting the course on hold in the middle of it will cast doubt on the competence of the initiates once they complete it. I’m not comfortable asking anyone to start over simply because we couldn’t provide a suitable classroom in time.”

Dean sobered. He frowned. He leaned across the table. “Worse comes to worst, Alpha, could we do them at your house? It’s not like there’s not enough room. You’ve even got all the equipment. I know it’s a little unorthodox, but…”

Cas leaned in too, drawn magnetically toward his colleague’s body. “I can’t, Dean. If I don’t maintain a clear line between my professional realm and my personal life, I set myself and the whole mission up for accusations of exploitation. We’ve already got Karl Meyer claiming brainwashing and sexual grooming. I can’t bring business into my house.”

“Fuck that douchebag!” Dean cried, and Charlie nodded her adamant agreement.

“Yeah, Alpha, he’s a whiny little bitch. No one listens to him,” she added, looking to tap her bottle against Dean’s only to realize he didn’t have one. Charlie stole Castiel’s, placed it in Dean’s palm, clinked them while still holding him by the wrist, and then released him and his swiped beer with a wink. Dean took a long pull from Castiel’s beer.

Cas made a face of suffering forbearance, and signaled Zeke for another round. “People DO listen to him, Charlie,” he told her stubbornly. “Where do you imagine the protesters came from? No one had any idea what our construction project was until he stirred them up at City Council, made it seem like we were training prostitutes to walk the streets of Lawrence every night. He’s dangerous, and we’d be fools to ignore him.”

“When do we need a place, Cas?” Dean asked him. “I mean, last, last possible minute…how much time do I got to swing a miracle for you?”

Cas chuckled. He lowered his chin and fixed Dean with a somber expression. “It’s not actually necessary to come through at the very last possible moment, you know. A little bit of a cushion would be greatly appreciated.”

“No, but then I wouldn’t get props for being a miracle worker. Work with me here.”

“Right, I forgot.” Cas leaned back to let Zeke set down three beers and a single glass of unchilled water that he placed with a thunk directly in front of Dean. “It’s all about your image. Thank you, Zeke,” he called to the bartender’s back. Dean eyed the water but he didn’t drink it until he looked up and found Cas staring it him with a very particular expression.

Setting the empty water glass back on the table, Dean continued. “Mock me if you must, but I don’t just work miracles, Alpha. I do it with a flare. Round here, a little theatricality goes a long way in keeping morale up. Everyone’s nervous, man.”

“Exactly!” Cas exclaimed. “Don’t add to that by stretching a predicament into a downright crisis!”

Dean shook his head. “It’s not a crisis. We got kicked out of our space. So, fine. We go find another space. There are literally thousands.”

Charlie sat forward and set her old bottle near the edge of the table to be collected. “It’s not that simple,” she said. “I’ve had feelers out myself ever since we got the eviction notice. There’s nothing. Everyone knows we got the boot for political reasons and no one wants to take the risk that someone might vandalize their property. No one wants to be associated with us.”

“That’s because everyone’s looking at us as a risky bet,” Dean told them both. “We have to flip it, make it obvious that the bigger risk is to NOT rent to us, sell them on the big picture, point out the David-and-Goliath of the thing. You guys are missing the point. This is a buyer’s market! We’re the ones with cash in hand, and there are empty spaces everywhere. The political shit is just free advertising! It’s got to come off like Marie Curie just got kicked out of her lab, and the whole fuckin’ world is never gonna know about Radium if she doesn’t find new digs! What we’re doing here is important, guys! We’re not gonna let a little thing like losing a training room stop us. Hell, it’s not even gonna slow us down! We all know that! So relax, chill out, trust that it’s gonna come together before the deadline, and give me a fucking break!” He sat back and downed half of his beer in one go.

Charlie stared at him, slack-jawed. Cas nodded, still somber. “We have three weeks, Dean. Considering time to negotiate a contract and getting the equipment moved, it would be best if we had a new location pegged by next Friday. We need adequate parking and security. It needs to be somewhere with reasonable accommodations for a classroom. An empty warehouse won’t do this time. I want working air conditioning and a janitorial staff included, unless you’re volunteering to scrub toilets. We need a way to ensure privacy…”

“Dude! I get it! Look I was there when we set the specs on the lab we’ve already outgrown. I know what we need. Trust me. I can do this.”

“Give it to me before Friday, and I’ll make it worth your while,” said Cas with a carefully non-flirty expression.

Dean studied him. “I don’t want your money, Castiel.”

“I’m not talking about money,” the Alpha shot back. Dean swallowed. He blinked. He went very still.

“A…reward?”

“Within reason,” Cas said holding up a finger.

Dean shot a look at Charlie. She gestured vigorously for him to take the deal. He looked back across at Cas, who sat relaxed in his booth seat, swirling his beer, one arm stretched up along the back of the booth. “Contracted before Friday, or just located with…wheels in motion and shit?”

“If you present me with an address, including suite number if applicable, before Friday next that ultimately becomes the location we move our Keller Certification class to for the remainder of the course…AND, we move in without having to interrupt the flow of the class whatsoever, I will reward you adequately.”

Dean licked his lips. “When you say ‘adequately’…?”

“Deal’s closing, Dean. Do you want in? Going…”

“How do I know I’ll like the reward?”

“Going…”

“Is there punishment if I fail?”

“No. That would be stupid on my part. You enjoy punishment. Do you want in or not?”

“Of course I want in. This is gonna be a snap!”

“Good. Then I believe that’s all we really need to discuss,” Cas said. He looked around. Everyone in the bar tonight was a part of the project. Dean hadn’t been wrong when he said that everyone was nervous. They were at a pivotal juncture. The construction phase was over-budget, but it wasn’t behind schedule. That was going to be key – having a home to move into once the training courses began drawing to a close. They could keep using the tiny lab on the corner, but it was too small to house the whole team.

Castiel wasn’t truly worried about his Keller class. He had no idea how Dean would manage it, but he knew it would happen. It would happen, and all the specs would be ticked off the list perfectly. He half expected Dean to find a place with a Starbucks and a sushi bar built into it, or free childcare included, or some other crazy benefit that he’d never have thought to look for. Such was the nature of Dean’s miracles. Cas could let that one fall off his to-do list now that Dean had taken custody. One worry of many.

He looked across at Dean and found the man studying him.

“We can do this, Alpha,” Dean told him.

“Yes, we sure can!” Charlie agreed. “Oh!” she startled. “Bids came in for the monitoring equipment! I forgot! You wanna see them?”

“Not tonight,” Cas laughed. “I expect I’ll need a good bottle of Merlot for that sticker shock. We’ll do that together at the next staff meeting. Bring everything.”

“Including wine,” Dean added.

NOW:

People were leaving for the day, flowing counter to Dean’s path as they headed toward the turnstile at the end of the hall. A few of them spoke to him, but most of them recognized his unfocused eyes as a prelude to something, and they left him alone. He swam upstream easily, against the flow, a salmon heading toward spawn, on a mission and not to be deterred.

He found himself flanked as he entered the Contract wing, flanked by an alpha who stayed two steps behind and to his right, barely visible peripherally, a host, not a guard. Dean was already floating. It was a delicate feeling, but it survived all the mundane tasks like unlocking doors and speaking with the concierge.

The alpha host ushered Dean into a large empty room. He directed Dean’s attention to the mounted cameras, the restroom facilities, the bed, the cabinet filled with supplies, the door lock’s quick release function, and the presence of alpha monitors outside who would be listening and watching. He explained how to call for their assistance in an instant in addition to how to set them en garde should things become worrisome but not dangerous.

Dean could feel Castiel and Michael both. They were close. They were already watching. The host asked for Dean’s safeword, and Dean gave it to him, enunciating clearly for the monitors. He remained floating. Everything felt muzzily unattached and powerfully real at the same time. He answered plainly when asked if he needed a toilet, and he declined a drink of water.

At last, the tedious requirements fulfilled, the host directed him onto his knees and left him alone. Dean set his palms on his thighs and breathed. His hands were dry.

He stayed like that for some time, alone. The room was warm but not hot, spacious but not cavernous. Dean gave an internal nod to his fiancé and felt one in return. Then he turned all of his attention to Michael. The Omega moved. Dean could feel him leave the observation booth and round toward the entrance. Michael was zoned as tightly onto Dean and Dean was on him.
The door opened with a whisper swish, and Dean lowered his eyes, bowing his head in deference. He could see Michael’s polished black leather shoes. Fully dressed, then. Nice touch.

The door snicked shut again. No one else entered, just Michael. Dean could smell him – the sweet musky scent of pregnancy mixed with the rich cherry tones of Omega and the sandalwood scent of Michael himself.

“On your feet. Hands on the bed. Let me inspect you before we begin.” Dean obeyed, leaving his forebrain a mental note for later to remind Michael to use the proper terms for a Submissive’s positioning. He felt Michael’s hands roving over his body, and he broke out in chill bumps again. Soft, uncalloused fingers probed at his hole, tugged at his sac, stroked his penis. A sharp slap to his ass left a handprint. Dean could feel the warmth spread, and he smiled slightly to himself. Michael had been very clear about wanting to leave the first mark.

Michael’s splayed hands slid around his hips to his belly and dug in a little, a possessive clutch. Dean could feel Michael’s erection through his black slacks, pressed up into the crack of his ass. One hand came up and pinched Dean’s left nipple. A hot, wet breath dampened the back of Dean’s neck. A tongue traced his scar. Dean felt his knees go weak and his cock drip a single sticky line of precome onto the bedding. The scent of Omega slick wafted into the air around them both.

“My good boy,” Michael whispered into Dean’s ear. “Are you ready?”

“Yes, sir,” Dean breathed back, already a little lost, a little desperate. “Please.”

“Good, good boy. Down you go. Middle of the bed. Hands and knees. I want to show you off to a few of my friends. Be good for me now. I want them to see what an amazing fuck you are, Winchester. Wanna bask in letting them feel how lucky I am, yeah?”

“yessir,” Dean whined, sinking a little further under.

“Atta boy.” Michael got Dean situated on the double bed, head down, arms braced straight for the moment, a bow to his upper shoulders like a stalking cat, his ass facing the door. Michael left a resounding SMACK echoing against the high ceiling, and another handprint blossomed on Dean’s opposite cheek.

The door opened, and Dean heard the sounds of men, smelled them, felt the change in the air around him. His nipples prickled. They chatted easily among themselves. Dean counted scents. Besides Michael, there were five. Raphael was the first to touch him, a featherlight single finger that ran up his spine, sending chills out across his ribs. Balthazar was here. Oh, God, was that Adam? Dean’s mind skittered a little. He’d told Michael that he didn’t need to know absolutely every name on the list as long as they all pulled from the Contract wing and there were no girls, but Adam? The kid was straight.

It was more like a cocktail party than an orgy at first. Dean held his position, but the attendees weren’t paying him all that much attention. Michael leaned casually against the far wall and chatted amiably, accepting compliments that his centerpiece was a charming addition to the room. Hands touched Dean idly. Stroked across his ribs, through his hair, one finger tickled his foot, making him flinch.

He tried to follow their conversations, but his mind kept floating away, the sensation that nothing they said to one another need matter to him buying him a gentle peace. He felt the weight of someone joining him on the bed to his right, but a surreptitious glance told him it was Aaron sitting down, not approaching him, still chatting. Dean felt another drop fall from the tip of his dick. He felt every wisp of breeze as someone moved, walked by, shifted. Dean could feel every nerve in his skin reaching outward, searching for a touch.

And then he had one. A hand tangled in his hair and jerked his head upward to stare into deep brown eyes. Chocolate eyes. Rich, hard, deep eyes. Raphael. He was nude. He was fucking beautiful. His eyes captivated exactly the way Dean had expected. Raphe thrust two fingers into Dean’s mouth and watched the Sub suck them in greedily, humming in approval, fucking them in and out of his mouth with a hungry expression.

“How many of us do you expect him to take, Michael?” Raphael asked calmly. “I don’t want to break your toy, but a fuck-hole that gives out after two or three rounds is a shoddy piece of ass.”

“There’s nothing shoddy about his ass, you prick,” Michael answered back coldly. “See for yourself.”

“Yeah?” Raphe responded. He mounted the bed on his feet and straddled Dean’s waist facing backward, leaning down and rubbing spit-slick fingers over Dean’s hole with no preamble. It was a zero to sixty kind of experience for Dean, and he scrambled in his head not to tuck under on instinct. He felt Michael’s metaphysical eyes narrow at him, and he got himself straightened out, even bowing his back a little to present to the man above him.

The chatting around him continued, and now that his head was up, Dean could see most of them. Some were naked, and some were in the middle of stripping. Balthazar stood facing Dean’s head with a hand on his own cock and a delighted expression. It was Christmas morning for the Omega, and he couldn’t decide which present to open first.

“Adam, love, give the lube to Raphael,” Michael instructed. “He’s going to open our boy up for us.”

Dean felt a swoon pass through his head, an honest to God light-headed swoon. His mouth dropped open, and his muscles went slack. Hands from every side began to reach in toward him and touch. The bed jostled with weight from every direction. Dean wasn’t permitted to close his eyes, but he wasn’t permitted to focus directly on anyone either. It dehumanized everyone around him as much as it did the Sub at the center. Hands and fingers explored his body. So many. All over. They rolled over his shoulders, tickled along the backs of his knees, traced down the length of his dick, grasped his chin, kneaded the curve of his ass, and a single lubed finger penetrated Dean’s asshole. He sucked in a breath and ducked his head.

“No!” Michael corrected abruptly, and Dean jolted and pulled his head back up to where Raphael had placed him. A dark chuckle met his ear from above. A single sharp slap rocked him forward as it pinked his ass. Raphael’s finger slid deeper and began to pulse.

The idle conversations in the room, were they intentional? Everyone seemed distracted, not even all that interested. Someone appeared directly in front of Dean’s face and kissed him hard, thrusting a tongue into his mouth boldly. Dean dropped his jaw and made room for the intrusion. He couldn’t tell who it was, taken by surprise as he was. The man was gone as fast as he appeared, leaving Dean to lick the taste off his lips. Omega.

The floating sensation solidified rapidly, if solid is even a word to describe floating. Dean felt debased and adored. He felt ignored and cherished. He wanted to roll over onto his back, pull his knees to his chest and demand a hard fucking, but though he trembled in place, he didn’t move. His cock ached already, and they’d barely started.

Michael’s touch in his mind took on a ruddy mix of lust and appreciation. Holy fuck, Dean was pleasing him like he’d never done before, adding a totally new flavor to their mix, and the sensations pinged back and forth between them. Raphael worked a second finger into Dean’s hole and thrust smoothly in and out. Someone’s hand circled Dean’s dick and gave him an easy pull or two.
“If he comes before I want him to,” Michael warned. “You’re both in for it.”

“Can I put a ring on him?” Aaron asked thoughtfully. “Hold him off longer?”

“No,” Michael answered shortly. “He can hold by himself – as long as you don’t go jacking him off early. Touch him all you want, but don’t be a dick. He’s not superhuman.”

Someone’s tongue touched Dean’s rim between Raphe’s fingers, and Dean and Raphael both groaned. It delved in deeper, letting Raphael stretch him open to make way for a thorough tongue-fucking. Dean’s fingers clutched at the bedding. He started to drop his head again, and then stopped himself. Sweat erupted from his pores.

Pride swam through his bond from his mate. Dean exhaled slowly.

Everything felt so much better in real life than he’d imagined. He trembled.

Someone put a hard, knot-based dick in his mouth and instructed him to suck. Dean wasted no time getting to work, using tongue and lips and suction to work the man over since he wasn’t permitted to rock on his hands and knees. Dean risked a glance upward. Will. The contract alpha-Neutral had never worked with Dean before, but Dean had been on his interview panel and knew his work. The man thrust way back into Dean’s throat, forcing his way past the tight, constricting ring at the back of his mouth and forcing Dean to lengthen his neck to align his mouth with his throat, giving the man a pathway to fuck him deeply. Dean felt the bulge of a knot touch his lips, and he moaned pitifully on the outstroke.

“Nice, Michael,” Will observed. “He deepthroats alpha cock. Wish I’d known that before now. Would’ve hit on him when we first met. I could’ve been sinking myself into this warm hole for the last year. Damn, boy!”

Michael didn’t respond. His eyes were on Dean’s, narrowed to bare slits, unfocused, lustful, floating, blissed-out, and not yet overwhelmed by sensation. Michael let the team play on its own, but he was watching.

“Fuck! Oh, shit!” cried Will suddenly, taken by surprise. He pulsed in hard, then pulled back a bit and shot a thick stream of come into Dean’s mouth. The Sub took it all, holding it on his tongue until given an instruction. “Damnit!” the alpha cursed, frustrated. “Goddamnit!” He knelt down, looked furiously into Dean’s glazed eyes as if it were Dean’s fault, and he slapped Dean hard across the cheek. Dean let his neck go slack to take the blow, sealing his lips to keep his prize on his tongue. He returned to his position, still lax, still holding a full serving of alpha come in his mouth.

“Jesus Christ,” Aaron murmured, enthralled. He dove in to kiss Dean, plundering his mouth with his tongue, and Dean let the Ozzie take custody of the bitter salty fluid, passing it across to him placidly. That kiss. It was the same as before. It had been Aaron’s mouth on his earlier.

Good to know.

Raphael’s finger fucking continued. He was up to four, maybe. Hard to tell. Dean had lost count. The count wasn’t his to worry about anyway. That persistent tongue came and went, sometimes up high, tracing the dimples of Dean’s lower back, sometimes reaching into his hole as far as its pointed tip could reach, sometimes ducking down low to follow his taint and tickle his balls. Dean let someone’s hands spread his knees further apart. It had to be Balthazar.

He’d lost track of Adam. Was the boy participating? Was he really here in the same way the others were?
Michael answered that for him. “Dean, look at me,” he commanded. Dean turned his head. He found Michael had moved to where he could see Dean’s ass. Adam knelt calmly beside him, passive, nude, not aroused, his eyes on the floor. Dean’s vision blurred with the sloppiness of his senses. Hands never stopped touching. Some of them pinched. Some of them slapped. Most of them caressed sweetly.

Michael stared into Dean’s eyes, green into green. He dove deeply inside Dean’s emotions, and he chuckled darkly at what he sensed. “He’s ready, Raphael. Let’s light him up.”

Raphael pulled his fingers out, and Dean’s body followed them, earning him a swift, hot correction to his lower left thigh. He had no idea who had struck him. A lubricated vibrating plug slipped into his hole, and set his prostate tingling mercilessly.

He keened, lips pulled tight across his teeth. His eyes squeezed closed on their own, and even a swift hard ten-count spanking to his ass couldn’t pry them open again.

“Hands’ off!” called Michael. “Everyone back up!”

Dean shook in place on his hands and knees. He panted hard. His butt muscles tightened involuntarily.

“We’ll wait, Dean,” Michael told him. “Pull yourself together. You’re better than this.”

“NNnngh!” Dean whined. He relaxed his butt around the vibrator like lifting a boulder, like it was a near impossible task, and he opened his eyes with almost the same effort. His pupils were blown, his green eyes nearly black, sweat dripped from his belly, his nipples, his chin. He trembled. That had to be the highest setting on that damned plug, and it was ruthless.

“Look at me,” Michael commanded. Dean whimpered but obeyed. “Are you ready to continue?”

Dean couldn’t speak. He nodded vigorously. Michael nodded back. The Dom looked down at Adam. “Ready, sweet boy? Like I taught you, okay?”

“Yes, Michael,” Adam said with a breathy voice. The young Ozzie took the belt that Michael handed him, took it reverently in both hands and disappeared behind Dean, back where the alpha couldn’t see him. Dean’s eyes grew impossibly large, and he stared at Michael in shock.

“Go ahead, Adam. He’s ready.”

The first stroke landed dead center across Dean’s ass, right over the base of the plug which protruded just enough for the strap to jostle it unmercifully. Dean jolted forward. His spine twisted in divine anguish. His feet clenched with electric pulse, sweating from the adrenalin.

“Hold him!” Michael instructed, and hands caught hold of Dean’s arms and shoulders. He could smell Balthazar to his left, Aaron to his right. Raphael still straddled his waist. Adam hit him again, and Dean cried out. Where the hell had the Ozzie learned to swing like that?

“Nice, Adam. Good boy. I told you you’d be a natural! Again. Get a rhythm going.” Michael was goading now, an asshole of tortured teasing that set Dean a whole new challenge, or more than one actually. Dean’s alpha sparked up unexpectedly in challenge at being strapped by an Ozzie, and his ass burned with each strike, making staying in place that much more difficult.

“Submit, Dean!” Michael demanded, from both inside his head and without. “Submit to me. Let go.”

Dean moaned loudly and went lax again. He yiped at the next hit, but he didn’t fight it. His prostate zinged with sensation, his butt was on fire in the best possible way, his alpha was confused as all hell, but Dean floated above it all, euphoric.

“Good, Adam. Let’s give him a break from the strap and move on. Who’s first?” Michael said, so casual it was startling. He seemed unaffected, but Dean could sense differently. Michael was soaring right there beside his mate, not from sensation, from the control. Everything Dean was feeling was his to grant or pull away.

“Actually,” the Ringmaster said calmly, offhand. “Give him one more.”

It had to have been choreographed beforehand because the belt came down on his ass before Dean finished processing the words, and coming as it did after he’d relaxed, it hurt like a motherfucker, and he yowled high and sharp, thumping his feet against the bed.

Michael grinned. “There you go. That’s the sound I wanted. My good boys.”

Dean huffed shallow breaths. His eyes fluttered and then held. His cock ached and throbbed. Michael was running a scene for Dean and Adam both, and Dean went dizzy with the implications. He heard a high-pitched whine, and drifted in his head long enough to wonder who it was coming from, long enough to realize it was himself, and long enough to curl into it in his head. It was a beautiful sound. Michael liked it.

God, Michael could have anything he wanted.

Raphael had dismounted the bed and was helping coordinate the participants. What a fucking brown-noser. Dean could tell he was reserving the last spot for himself, and Dean felt a twinge of resolve cut through from his front brain. He meant to give Raphe the best he had next to what he meant to hold in reserve for his mate, and that meant he had to focus. At this point, it was all about stamina. The plug in his ass shifted just at that moment, and set Dean’s teeth grinding in frustration. He looked to Michael with a grimace on his face, ignoring the roaming hands that spanned his body. Trying to ignore them. The vibrator turned everything up in volume, and Dean felt his senses begin to overload.

Christ, not yet!

Michael smirked at him with lust-filled eyes, and Dean growled. Immediately, someone slapped him hard right over the welts from Adam’s well-applied strap. The plug pulled backward, wrested from its cozy spot without turning off so that it vibrated along his rim on its way out. Someone held it there for a beat or two. Dean huffed in alarm. Holy fuck, that felt amazing! His cock dribbled a hearty spurt into the sheets.

“AAAaahhh!” he shouted as Aaron sank down into him from behind with no warning. He pushed in slowly, but he went straight in, not pausing, just one long steady shove from tip to base. Dean knew it was Aaron. He’d worked with Aaron before numerous times, modeling in class and contracting a threesome scene once or twice or…maybe more. Whatever. The Ozzie was a Bottom, not a Top, but he could follow instructions, and he liked to play being a puppet, making him ideal for someone like Michael to work with. Michael coached him now, pacing slowly around the bed, giving him subtle instructions, touching every nerve of Dean’s he possibly could without actually touching him at all.

Dean felt Michael release the worry that he wouldn’t be capable of letting anyone else touch his mate. To Michael, he was still the only one touching Dean.

Balthazar slithered in between Dean’s hands on his back and licked mercilessly at Dean’s dangling cock, sucking down the salty drips and making Dean pant that much harder as Aaron got a hard, thumping rhythm going. Dean felt his floating begin to steepen into a soar. Balthazar’s cock bounced enticingly below his chin, smelling ripe, throbbing with anticipation. Dean forced his eyes outward, trying desperately to ignore the movement in his peripheral vision. The soaring picked up speed.

No, no, no, no, no, no! Not yet! Not yet!

Dean needed to clench his eyes closed, but he couldn’t. Not allowed. He clenched his jaw instead, clawed at the sheets with his fingers, sent as much of the strain out to non-erogenous zones like his calves and his elbows as he could, visualizing the strain accumulating there and shooting out into nowhere. It wasn’t working. Balthazar’s clever, clever tongue made a mockery of Dean’s efforts, and then Aaron lost his rhythm, froze up, pressed hard into Dean’s ass, and came with a loud groan, his fingers gripping tightly to Dean’s hips. He pulled out quickly and dove in to taste the mingled flavors at Dean’s hole, pressing in deep and licking in long, luxurious scoops of his tongue. Michael swatted Aaron’s ass lightly with his hand and nodded for him to back out.

“My turn!” shouted Balthazar, worming his way out from beneath Dean again. Dean used the break to catch his breath.

“Your turn? I was second!” Will protested, shoving Balthazar hard. Michael let them scuffle. He stepped around them, checking on Dean.

“You already shot your load, you Cretin! You forfeit!” Balthazar announced.

“Say that to my face, you pompous wanker!”

“I’m talking to your face, moron, unless your face is on the other end!”

Michael could feel the strain in Dean’s wrists, in his thighs. “On your back,” he told his mate without touching him.

“Can I hold him?” asked Aaron cheerfully. He jumped up onto the bed and lay with his legs sprawled, leaning up against the headboard. Michael chuckled indulgently.

“Rest your head on Aaron’s tummy, Dean, right between his legs on your back.” Dean fell into position, and the release of tension was an immediate high. He hadn’t realized how badly he’d tensed up, but lying down was like being lifted onto a cloud. Aaron immediately began to pet his chest and his face. Dean was in far more danger of zoning out like this than he had been on his hands and knees.

Michael had cuffed Will hard on the back of his head while Dean was getting settled, and the alpha stood rubbing the spot and sulking.

“Balthazar is next,” Michael declared. “Dean, knees up. Show us that hole. Will, make yourself useful and get your tongue in there exploring the slit of his dick. I want him out of his mind with sensation. Raphael, get busy tweaking his nipples. Those fuckers are mad sensitive. Make him scream. Let’s see how far we can take this toy before it tops out. Dean, damnit, knees up!!”

Dean nearly kneed Raphael in the head, but they all got situated. Will had his weight sprawled across Dean’s left thigh, pressing it in to grind against his hip. It hurt, but Dean pulled the discomfort into the same place he processed spankings, turning it into a warm and welcome ache. Dean’s feet pointed to the ceiling, his toes alternately curling and splaying as Balthazar crawled up to him, licked him open lasciviously, hummed in appreciation, and then pulled up onto his knees. He aimed his cock with one hand, hummed Dean’s rim with the head, and then thrust unceremoniously in.
Couldn’t anyone take a gentle approach?

Fuck!

Dean’s breath was punched out of him as Balthazar’s bottoming out percussively jibed with Raphe’s biting down on a nipple, Will’s soft nibble at the very tip of his cock, and Dean screamed.

“What can I do to help, Sir?” Adam asked. He was kneeling by the door, soft and sweet.

Michael looked across at him and then back at Dean. Dean was sweating again, so turned on he was shaking. It wasn’t all Balthazar’s fucking that set him shivering, although he pulsed with the motion. He was on fire, overwhelmed by the sheer multitude of singular places on his body that were all firing at once. Balthazar fucked hard, deliberate, precise. Big enough to pass for a young beta, Balthazar had reach inside Dean, and the Alpha’s prostate was set singing again. Dean’s mouth hung open. He couldn’t help it.

“Adam, son, you remember when I kissed you? You liked that, right?” The Ozzie nodded enthusiastically, lifting in his kneel high up until he was straining. “Would you like to see what it’s like to kiss an alpha? He’s a man, and that’s not your usual digs. Baby, you don’t have to. It’s okay if you don’t want to.”

Adam shot a look at Dean, whose eyes drifted in a dazed mist, whose mouth hung slack and welcoming – soft, like a girl’s – whose body jolted with the tangle of touches and punches from so many directions, he wasn’t really present to experience them all anymore. Dean was soaring hard. Adam nodded, standing, biting his lip in wonder. Raphael stretched out a hand to help pull him in from across Dean’s body, and Balthazar swore fiercely as Adam bent down slowly to lick a single line across the fullness of Dean’s lower lip. Raphael groaned and made a grab for the base of his own cock. Dean whined and reached upward with his head to seek the Ozzie’s soft kiss. Adam granted it. His wolf and Dean’s mingled at the contact, a rare occurrence, given their orientations didn’t match and neither held a claim on the other, but it was kismet, and Adam closed his eyes to the sensation.

“Oh, my fucking….” whispered Aaron from his front-row seat. Balthazar lost it. He came with a grunt and a series of sharp, short thrusts, the squelching noise from Dean’s hole growing that much wetter, and the smell of sex growing that much headier. Adam looked up and cast his eyes around innocently as Dean chased the loss.

“What?” the Ozzie asked.

Michael ignored them all. “Dean get your right knee back up where it belongs or I’ll have Adam cane both of your feet before we’re through.” Dean squeaked and lifted his foot skyward. Michael smiled indulgently. His erection poked a tent in his slacks, and he was far more affected by the scene than he let on, but he wasn’t through yet.

“Everyone off,” he instructed. Dean could feel Michael’s ecstatic rush when all of them except Aaron moved immediately. Michael’s cheeks were vibrantly pink. He looked Dean over, smiling serenely. Dean followed him with his eyes. Aaron’s hands cupped over his nipples, tweaking them between flattened fingers, the peak of each nipple easy to reach with flat palms. He scratched at Dean’s skin with his nails, not to hurt, just to keep him on edge. Michael smoothed a hand across Dean’s ass, letting his fingers dip and slide as they crossed the peaks and valleys of his Submissive’s offerings. He held Dean’s eye as he put his fingers in his mouth and sucked them clean.

Michael didn’t DO fluids. He didn’t like them. He… Dean watched him and panted. He wanted those fingers in his own mouth, and Michael’s smirk said he knew what Dean was thinking.
“Will? Are you with us again?” Michael asked him. Adam shifted back in and began to gently play with Dean’s lips with his own. It wasn’t kissing in the classic sense, it was more sensuous than that. Dean was lulled into a peaceful float once more when sharp claws raked suddenly down both sides of his torso from armpit to hip, leaving wicked welts in their wake and earning a yowl from the alpha who was caught totally unaware. Will grinned at him from his place, poised between Dean’s thighs, and he squished into Dean’s gaping hole with furious relish, setting up a pace and force that had Aaron scooting backward to sit up straighter and try to brace Dean’s shoulders from the onslaught. Dean grunted on each thrust with the power of it. Will growled ferociously, his hands wrapped around Dean’s thighs, slipping in the sweat there, and leaving whitened traces behind as he realigned his grip again and again.

As the force increased, Dean cried out, his toes curling in tightly, his cock bouncing proud parallel with his belly, and his legs flying akimbo, unrestrained. His breathing became a punched out affair, barely taking in enough air before it was knocked back out of him. What Will missed in finesse, he made up for in enthusiasm and size, and he tore into Dean’s hole like he was drilling for oil. Aaron laughed at Adam’s attempt to continue kissing, and Michael watched with apparent disinterest.

Michael wasn’t disinterested.

“How do you feel, Dean?” he asked over the sounds of slapping flesh and wet squelching. “Floating? This isn’t the craziest thing you’ve ever done, surely. But you’ve never done it like this, have you? Who are you right now, love? Are you worried about who’s watching? Are you comfortable being my good, good boy? I’m so proud of you.” Michael’s words, calm and easy as they were, belied the harsh treatment Dean’s ass was receiving from the randy alpha who had little self-control. Luckily for Dean, Will didn’t last much longer the second round than he had the first. He came with a shout, pulling out and shooting streaks up Dean’s belly. He followed his own effluence by leaning down over Dean and rubbing his spunk in, leaving little globules of hardening jizz coating Dean’s abdomen, and Michael growled a menace from behind him.

“Clean it up!” Michael commanded, and Will went pale.

“Me?”

“You’re the one who made the fucking mess! Lick it up!”

“I’ll do it,” Aaron volunteered, easing his way out from beneath Dean.

“Sit up, Dean,” Michael told him. “Scoot toward the foot a bit and lean back on your hands. Stretch out your torso.”

Aaron went to work licking Dean’s belly clean, and Michael shoved Will’s head down to help. Raphael took up a position near Dean’s feet, standing at the foot of the bed, holding each of Dean’s feet out wide and watching with hooded eyes, blinking every now and then dolefully. Dean couldn’t look away from those deep, dark brown eyes. His skin felt too tight. Tongues lapped at him. Balthazar took up the job of continually tweaking Dean’s nipples, and Dean began to whimper again. His ass hurt. His skin was beginning to feel scorched from all the attention. His lips were swollen from the kissing.

He was still so hard, he ached.

“Who’s touching you, alpha?” Michael asked again rhetorically. “Feel good? Everyone can see you, baby. They know what you are, and they’re hungry for it. Did you ever think it would feel this good to be this vulnerable? You’re mine, Dean Winchester. No one’s ever made you feel like this before. Have they?”
Dean shook his head drunkenly. He’d never felt like this before, alight from everywhere at once, gaping and swollen from serial fuckings, used and pinched and spanked and fondled, licked and stroked and kissed. He’d done this kind of thing before maybe, but never without his mask firmly in place. For the first time, Dean was naked before a slew of takers, and he felt alive. He felt electric.

“Get him on his feet,” Michael said. Hands obeyed. They reached for him, heisting him, holding him up. “Bend him over the bed. I want to watch him take an alpha’s hand to his thighs, down where it hurts like fire. Raphael?” Dean found his face pressed into the bedding. He was breathing in the stink of spent wolf, his nose pressed into the spot where his ass had leaked and smeared. He took a deep breath.

Raphael struck him with a flat palm. All pretense that he was a mere showpiece at a cocktail party had long since been abandoned. That had been a gentle way to start it off, easing Dean into the idea that his presence here was for their use, not for his pleasure, but it didn’t hold. He was far more than a ceremonial centerpiece. Raphe hit him again. He was swinging hard, the way Cas did, much harder than anyone hit Omegas. Dean’s legs shook.

“Dean, hold!” Michael demanded.

Adam flattened himself on the bed and lay out on his belly with his knees crooked up against the headboard and his face directly in front of Dean’s. Tentatively, he slid closer and kissed the tip of Dean’s nose to encourage him to look up. Dean was sobbing, lost to the overstimulation and the pain. He turned his head upward, and Adam surged forward into a kiss. Dean followed the motion of the lips and the tongue, and the harsh beating against his legs continued. He didn’t know up from down anymore, completely overwhelmed and tumbling through space.

His mind didn’t register Raphael breaching him, but his wolf did. The pain to his thighs eased, and an alpha cock rammed home. Dean’s wolf rolled and went limp. It flailed like a ragdoll with the demands of the alpha-Dom. Dean hurt everywhere, but it was sublime, and his eyes rolled up in his head, utterly out of his control.

Nothing at all remained of Dean’s control.

Somewhere outside of himself, he heard Michael say, “Don’t knot him,” and Dean had no idea what that meant.

Sweet, sweet softness at his mouth vanished, and he chased it again. In its place, Dean found a half-hard cock nudging against his lips, and he opened on instinct, taking it in and suckling on it for comfort. Salty, slick drops coated his tongue, and Dean tightened his lips into the work. He heard a high whine from above him. He heard the wet sounds of kissing over his head, but he was too stoned on endorphins to find out whose tongue was wrapping around whose.

Raphael crowded up tight, right up against Dean’s legs both to hold him upright and to keep his thighs stinging. He didn’t use the same brute force that Will had employed. He pressed into the channel of Dean’s ass and ground in tight, rotating his hips and reveling in the feel of the gaping stretch and the viscous fluids left there by his colleagues. He struck Dean’s prostate, sending wave after wave of electricity up Dean’s spine.

Raphhe was a master at control. He used his years of experience to watch Dean’s shoulder tension, the tendons in his neck, the bunching of the muscles in his aching thighs to give him a read on the man’s condition. Dean was at the very tip top of his potential. He wouldn’t hold out much longer, but Raphael felt him digging his stubborn claws in to wait until he had Michael inside him. Dean wasn’t about to lose it to Raphael.
Damn those stubborn Winchesters.

Raphe pumped his hips, grinding, grinding, working the sweet spot. Balthazar, Will, and Adam had gone kind of sleepy, sprawled out all over the bed and each other, lazily watching the master make his statement. Aaron kissed Raphael sluggishly over Dean’s head while Dean sucked him off. The Omega didn’t need another round, but Dean needed the stimulus, and Aaron was a professional after all.

When Raphael came, he came with a loud grunt. White streams dripped out onto the floor around his feet, and his knot hadn’t tried to surge forward to fill the void. Aaron came shortly after, right down Dean’s throat, and Dean languidly licked him clean.

Dean sagged against the bed, his knees bent, the weight of his chest holding him upright. His cock dangled freely, heavy and dark.

Erect.

Wanting.

Ignored.

“Had enough, Dean?” Michael asked him as Raphael pulled out with a tender pat to his ass and let Dean sag.

“Nosir,” Dean rasped. “I want you.”

“Do you now?” Michael chuckled. “You just took four solid poundings, sucked off two, had your ass and your thighs beat black and blue. You look pretty wasted to me, Dean.”

“Nosir.”

Michael took stock. Dean was a mess. He shouldn’t.

He dug into Dean’s head, into his body, he searched for a spark. He chuckled at what he found, a deep, dirty sound. The brat was holding out, and it had an ember glowing, waiting. For Michael.

“You’re amazing, Winchester. Crawl up on the bed if you can. No one touch him. Let him do it himself.” Dean grunted ugly and harsh as he worked his knees up to crawl inelegantly up the ruined sheet. He could feel his hole gape and drip, but it didn’t sting. No one had torn him. It ached, but he was still whole.

“Adam, doll, come help me undress. The rest of you, get out of the way. Jack off if you want. No one touches my mate from here but me.”

Dean lay absolutely still on his belly, his head turned to watch Michael undress. Michael kissed Adam sweetly when the Ozzie began to unbutton his shirt, and Adam blushed, evidently finding that kissing men was a pastime he might grow accustomed to.

Dean’s eyelids fluttered. His cock twitched. His mate was coming. Michael was coming to fuck him good and hard. Michael would put him over the top and let him come. He’d been so good.

“Get up on your knees, Dean,” Michael told him, and Dean somehow managed to obey, shaky as he was. His chest and face were still in the bedding, but Michael didn’t need those, just his ass. Dean presented. He bowed his back and showed off the gape of his hole, showed off how good he’d been in taking everything Michael doled out, let the dribbles of come drip down his sore thighs.
“Good boy, Dean Michael,” his mate said, a voice filled with adoration and wonder, with pride. Michael leaned down and dragged his tongue through the mess at Dean’s hole, and Dean’s thighs tightened. He made a soft “oh” sound, the strongest noise he had left. It felt charged. Michael kneed up behind him and reached around his hip to grasp Dean’s cock, wrapping a hand around it.

Dean panted in sudden alarm, his hips thrusting into Michael’s hand on their own, and his groin lighting up with pent up sensation. Michael chuckled again. Everyone in the room seemed to disappear but the two of them, although a part of Dean’s mind wanted to have his model behavior broadcast to the whole world. Dean’s thoughts snapped back to the present when Michael pressed into him, slow and stuttered, just the way Dean liked it, despite the gaping. Michael’s hand never left Dean’s cock, and Dean’s floating took on a definite power soar at the feeling.

He had little left to give, but what he had, he gave. Michael fucked him, fucked the come out of him, fucked the memory of other men out of him, Claimed his body and his heart for all the witnesses to see, the Claim slamming into place, and Dean and Michael came at the same time, shouting hoarsely, echoing one another in mind, body, spirit, and voice. Michael held Dean and stroked him through to the last. Come dribbled off Michael’s fist and out of Dean’s ass.

Then they collapsed in a heap, utterly exhausted. Michael kissed Dean’s swollen lips, and Dean mumbled unintelligibly.

In the observation booth, April leaned bonelessly against Castiel’s chest, snuggled naked in his lap facing the window. His knot held her fast in place, and his eyelids drooped in fulfillment. Her palm-prints on the glass left two smeared inverted snow angels that would require cleaning before the next use. Dean said he wanted Cas to enjoy himself, not rile up with worry. He needn’t have been concerned. Castiel watched sleepily as the Contract team checked on one another, collected their personal items, bade the couple goodnight, and slipped out, leaving Dean and Michael naked on the soggy bed, kissing each other to sleep. An alpha-monitor from the far booth clicked the ‘Active’ light off then slid in silently to tuck a warm blanket over the pair and leave bottles of water on the side table.

“That was fun,” April told him softly, needlessly.

“I’m glad you enjoyed the show, kitten.” He held a chunk of cantaloupe to her lips, and she bit into it, taking the bite from his fingers with practiced lips. “I want you to think about how it might feel to you to be in the middle of a scene like that, the only woman present, surrounded by men who are not entirely focused on you, but are also playing with one another. You don’t have to answer right away.”

“Would I be Subbing?”

“Naturally,” he answered, feeding her a piece of watermelon.

“Is this how our foursome will go?”

“Sometimes. Not always. I want to begin to delineate the boundaries though. If you struggle to feel comfortable in the presence of gay men, or if Dean cannot feel at ease when you are present and active, we will need to redefine the idea of the foursome.”

She thought about it. “I don’t see how it would be an issue, Cas, unless you added another girl, and you wanted me or Dean to…whatever. I like men. Watching them fuck each other is hot. I’m good with that, especially if it’s you and Dean and Michael we’re talking about.”

He could feel her sincerity, and she could feel the wry touch in his head when she mentioned Michael. He didn’t say anything about it though. He continued feeding her melon and watching the window in front of him.

“That was a big step for Dean, wasn’t it?” she asked.

“Yes, it was.”

“Do you think he did it all without putting on his public face? I couldn’t tell. I’ve seen him show off in videos so many times. He struts around and stuff, and parts of this had the same feel, but this time seemed less like a show.”

“Hm,” Cas responded. “I need to go see what’s on the internet, it seems. I thought there were limits to the degree of lewdness allowed on public platforms.”

She giggled. “Most of what’s out there is a tease. Dean does what he does at the main panels onstage without ever showing anything he’s not supposed to or touching anyone. It just seems like he’s giving them more than he really is. He knows whatever he does is going to end up on YouTube. I think he tailors it to that. But, yes, you should watch the videos. You’re going to want to know what you’re buying before you marry him.”

Cas pinched her ass hard, but he touched her mind with his amusement, and she snickered.

“Tell me what you did today,” he said, changing the subject.

“I spent a lot of time working with Portia,” she told him. “It’s going well. Andrea taught me some tricks to get her to pay attention. But she’s a puppy, and there’s only so much attention she has to give. We played too. She’s a little brat. But I’m giving her lots of attention.”

“Mm, good.” He nibbled the tip of her ear softly and whispered, “What else?”

“I spent some time with Rowena. She’s very pushy. She wants to help me, but she doesn’t truly understand my plan yet. Mark had to run interference for me, and that got kind of uncomfortable. I dunno, Cas, she made me feel like I have no idea what I’m doing, but her plan…it’s too much, too soon. There’s no room for starting a family. There’s no room for me to get comfortable in the arena. There’s no room for me to develop my sound, either in writing or performing. Maybe we should have put off hiring an agent.”

“Maybe,” he said thoughtfully. “Or perhaps we simply need to fill her in on your plan better. You won me over. You have Matt and Mark both on your side. Maybe it’s a matter of educating the newcomer about the rules of the house.” He nibbled again, and she giggled. “Show her who’s boss,” he whispered.

“That’s easy, Alpha. You are,” April answered, cuddling in.

“No, kitten, for this, you are. Think of the agent the same way you do Portia. Train her to your expectations, and keep at it until she’s got it. Don’t accept anything but compliance, even if it takes months of patient work.”
“Cas,” she protested. “I’m not built for that. I feel stupid trying to act like a dominant.”

He laughed, and the ripple through his knot caused her to tighten up around him. Ah, the simple pleasures. “It’s not acting like a dominant to stand your ground, April. Don’t think the only way to do this is to force it down someone’s throat and make them say ‘Yes, ma’am’. If I know you, you’re going to get your way anyway. You’ll work around her, playing your subtle games until she thinks the whole idea is hers.”

“Would that be so bad?” April asked, hiding her face in the crook of his arm.

“Manipulating people is unkind at the very least,” he told her. “I want you to be straight with her. You did well today. You needed help, and that’s fine, but you spoke to her out front, not through manipulative tactics. Keep doing that. Consistency is the key, April. Matt and Mark will back you up. Maybe call a business meeting where the three of you all work to explain it to her together. She may be pushy, but you’re more stubborn, and you don’t owe her your submission. Don’t give in to her. It’s not her career. It’s yours. In your relationship with her, you are not an Omega. You are not a Submissive. You are the boss. You are her boss. Don’t tell me you can’t lead a team, kitten. I’ve seen you do it. This team is your orchestra, and you are the conductor. Do you hear me?”

She smiled into the reflection in the window before her. She could see his face. That was his Alpha face. She nodded. “Yes, Sir. I understand.” Her focus shifted from the closeup view of the reflection to the interior of the room, and she watched the two men gently touching, talking quietly, slipping away bit by bit.

“They look happy together,” she observed.

“Mm,” he agreed.

They could see Michael’s face, soft in sleepy satisfaction. April watched him take care of his mate. Her head relaxed back onto Castiel’s shoulder, and he cinched her in tightly, dropping random kisses along her throat.

“Cas, I’m sorry…” she said.

“Please don’t say it again,” he whispered uncomfortably. “I don’t need to hear it again. We both made mistakes, April, but Michael is not one of yours. Love isn’t something you need to apologize for.” He caressed a single string inside her emotional tangle that was pure Michael. She brushed him gently away from it, and he let it go, unsure if she meant to guard it possessively or simply couldn’t look at it yet.

They sat still, cool in the empty room, connected by more than their bodies, and they let the matter drift away. In the room before them, Michael’s eyes slipped closed and his fingertips fell still mid-caress in Dean’s hair.

April giggled softly. “How, Cas?” she asked him vaguely. “How is that about you?” She gestured toward the sleeping men.

“What are you talking about?” he asked her back, distracted by the silkiness of her hair suddenly.

“Just now, that’s what you were thinking wasn’t it? About how much you love being the Top to those two? This wasn’t your scene, it was Michael’s.” She maintained an amused touch to her voice.

“I don’t know what you’re referring to…”

“Possession and satisfaction, Castiel. Pride of ownership. I can feel what you’re feeling, and I can tell it wasn’t about me.”

“Well, they are mine,” he said defensively. “I’m allowed to feel pride when there’s something to be proud of.”

She laughed at him, and he blushed. He bent his head and bit her shoulder. She squealed and kicked out, thumping the window.

“Shhh!” he laughed, capturing her leg and tucking it up close. “You’ll wake my sleeping pack. They need their sleep after my big scene.”

“Yours,” she teased. “Michael might take exception to you taking credit for his scene.” She was laughing with him, cuddling close, enjoying the sensation of his knot and his playfulness, of his adoration.

“It’s good to be the king,” he whispered into her ear, and then he turned her chin and kissed her. Castiel ate up the amused adoration she fed him. It wasn’t what he’d been feeding from for the last six months; this was far more grounded and unstaged. It was something rich and real, and he shifted into the kiss to let her feel how grateful he was, how blessed. The condom caught in the wiry curls of his pubic hair and tugged painfully, and he winced, grunting out a sound of disfavor, of privileged distaste. Condoms were of the devil, he was sure of it.

April’s hand eased over his pubis and freed him from the pull even as she deepened the kiss. “You could trim,” she suggested softly, drawing back and resting her jaw against his face. He kissed it lightly and shrugged.

“There’s a power statement in having a mane of hair framing my knot. Trimming would diminish that. Besides, once your mid-season Heat hits, we won’t have need of these foul contraptions any longer, not for years…” He kissed her throat. “…And years.”

Already thinking alike, along the lines of planting fertile seeds in fertile gardens, they watched together as Dean’s hand slipped beneath the blanket and moved slowly across Michael’s padded lower belly, stroking him while both men slept. A spike of anguish echoed through April’s belly in synchronicity with Castiel’s, and she gasped as he cupped her face to his, his brow wrinkling in a sudden quiver of unexpected pain. He held her to him, trying like hell to breathe through it with furrows marring his forehead and his lips a thin, tight line. He tried sending her comfort as he realized she was experiencing the same sensation for herself, not merely as an echo of his.

“You feel it too?” April whispered, and he clenched his eyes and nodded, keeping her face pressed into his.

“Breathe,” he whispered back, pulsing his hips on the off chance that there was any mitigation to be gained through pleasure. “Breathe, baby. It’ll pass.”

“Cas…Hurts.”

“I know. I’ve got you. Breathe with me.”

She panted lightly, clenching down on him, and he rubbed a hand into her belly. The condom caught them both as they writhed against the painful waves, and Castiel’s knot gave way to a slick collapse of the bulk of his girth. He slipped free, and he turned his mate to straddle his lap, kneading her lower back and tightening his jaw.

A few more pained breaths passed, and the spasm released them both, leaving them wheezing into one another’s hair.
“I need…” Cas panted. “I need to do something about that soon.” April huffed, catching her breath.

“I don’t know how you put up with it for so long.”

He sniffed loudly and laughed a short simple breath out. “I’m amazing like that. Haven’t you heard?”

“You’re a conceited dork,” she parried back at him with a gentle nibble to his chin. The tension in her thighs eased.

Castiel almost went dizzy with relief. He hadn’t realized how badly he ached for a mate comfortable enough with him to call him names, to tease him over his weaknesses, to trust him enough to drop all the facades. Carried over an emotional threshold by their shared pain and her simple insult, so real in the moment, Cas sobbed into her shoulder. He hugged her tightly, burying his face in her throat, and she wrapped both arms and both legs around him as well.

“I love you,” he snuffled out eventually, getting himself back into his own grip.

“Love you, too, Alpha,” she rasped back. “I would have called you a dork much sooner if I’d known it would make you this happy.”

**************

“Dean?” Cas whispered with a touch to his hip. “Baby wake up for a few minutes. Let me look you over.”

“Cas?” Dean rolled onto his back with a sleepy groan. “Michael broke my ass. Wanna see?” He began kicking the blanket off.

“Yes, I do,” the Alpha answered. “That’s why I’m here. Roll over onto your belly. Spread your legs. Just lay still for me, all right?”

Dean nudged Michael on his way over onto his tummy, and set the Omega stirring. “You’re in big trouble now, buddy,” Dean warned. “Alpha’s here. He’s gonna see what you did.” Dean’s green eyes twinkled as Michael’s opened groggily. Dean spread out, kicking Michael as he went for a full spread eagle.

Michael groaned. He hadn’t expected to fall asleep. He hadn’t played half as hard as his mate did. “Watch it, Dean,” he grumbled blearily. “I’m not above lighting you right back up, Alpha or no Alpha.”

Castiel ignored the bickering. He had his penlight in his mouth and was inspecting Dean’s backdoor with his fingers. The fingers of one hand splayed out to hold his cheeks apart.

“Clench down,” he instructed, and Dean tightened up with a groan.

“Good. And now push out.” Cas ignored the white dribbles that cascaded over his fingers. He padded them around Dean’s rim, wiping fluids out of his line of sight, and pressing in just to the first knuckle. His eyes drifted into the distance as he focused tightly to what he was feeling in spaces he couldn’t see.

“What do you sense from him, Michael?” he asked as he pulled his finger free and ran a gentle hand down Dean’s thigh, looking at the blossoming bruises there.

“He’s fine, Cas. He’s not in all that much pain considering what they did to him. I expected worse.”

“Cchh!” Dean protested, giving Michael the stink eye. “Not my first rodeo! You’re looking at a professional here, baby!” Michael smirked at him, lying on his side with his torso propped up on an elbow.

April slipped in behind her mate and stretched out beside Dean, stretching languorously like a cat. Castiel finished with Dean’s thighs and moved his inspection upward to take in the roundness of his butt, heavily bruised in wicked stripes, swollen, red and angry. Cas took a good long look, kneading the muscle and searching for skin breaks. His hands roamed upward to work the muscles of Dean’s back, and the alpha moaned in pleasure.

“You did very nice work for a first effort, Michael,” Cas praised, swatting Dean’s ass abruptly and making him jump. “Let’s talk it over when I get back and figure out some ways to improve the experience for both of you.”

“Yes, Alpha,” Michael answered with a very Omega blush.

“He’s undamaged for the most part. I’m extremely pleased. Well done, both of you.” Cas pushed up from where he’d been leaning in on one knee and slipped into the restroom to wash his hands. Michael beamed at Dean who rolled his eyes, and the two of them scuffled playfully for the driest spot on the bed. Cas came out drying his hands on a towel. “But you didn’t come anywhere close to pushing his limits. For a first try, that’s a good thing. Today wasn’t about stretching his abilities. It was about testing the waters. Now that you know both of you have it in you to succeed in an environment like this, I’ll expect you to begin exploring ways to make it meaningful and fulfilling. Dean, write it up. I want it in my email inbox before I return from New York. This one is important. No stalling.”

“Aw, man!” Dean covered his eyes with the crook of his elbow. Cas cleared his throat, making Dean peek out from under his arm to see the full weight of Castiel’s failure to find him cute in that moment.

“yessir,” he muttered.

“Good boy,” Cas purred.

He leaned over the side of the bed, stretching to drop a kiss first to Michael, a rare one on his lips that made Michael blush, then to Dean, leaving his mark by way of a pair of swollen, spit-slick lips, and finally to April, seeing as she was lined up with the others and why not?

“Ready to go?” he asked her, and he helped her up when she nodded. “I’ve ordered you two a meal from the kitchen.” Cas told them. “That’s something your planning failed to consider, Michael. Next time, I will expect you to consider aftercare better than you did this evening. I don’t believe you took into account just how much leading a scene like this would take out of you, the Dominant. So, scoot on back to Dean’s suite, both of you. Eat well. Get a painkiller into Dean. Drink nothing but water. And I want both of you in bed early. Am I understood?”

“Yes, Sir.”

“Yes, Alpha.”

“I love you both. I’ll see you on Monday. You both know the house rules. I expect you to follow them, and I’ll be keeping tabs.”
Michael made it to his feet to give April a goodbye hug, but Dean settled for blowing her a kiss from the bed.

He slept very well that night, curled up with his mate, a warm throb in his ass and a belly full of steak. He slept so well that he was up and typing out his report before the alarm even went off. His backside hurt to sit on, and Dean loved it.

And to think, the majority of the heat of pain that lingered into the morning had been from Adam, the straight little Ozzie who swung a strap like a Roman charioteer. Dean snickered to himself, still flush with endorphins, still floating just a bit, still thrilled with the circumstances of Universist Balance that put him right here after starving him for so long.

Right here, where everything aligned in seamless perfection. The battles at their doorstep would wait just a breath longer. Dean was under no illusions that they would be easy, but lined up four abreast and feeling the depth of the growing pack fan out behind him, he felt stronger as he braced to face the hordes at their gates than he had ever felt before.

They were gonna win this fucking war! He could feel it.

Chapter End Notes

I sometimes blank out when I put up a new chapter and forget what I had meant to say to y'all in the notes. I think this is one of those times. I feel like there was something important, but I'm drawing a blank.

Hmm.

Oh well. Whatevs. Love to you all.
Chapter 106

Chapter Summary

April and Cas recalibrate a bit. Dean's tuxedo fits just fine. And it's time for Sarah to hear from the peanut gallery.

Chapter Notes

Hi folks. It's been longer than usual, yes? Yes. So, my last work break was a love-fest of epic proportions. All I can say is that if I'm gonna take a writing break, THAT's what I wanna do instead. All of it. Thanks for all the awesome hugs.

Second, it wouldn't be a post-apocalyptic post without a nod to the sad, sad news our fandom received too recently. I for one, am certain that the words shoved into John Winchester's mouth on the 300th episode, were for us in our time of grief. So I, for one, intend to take those words to heart and to enjoy what we have while we have it.

Third, to get the most out of this THEN section, I recommend spending some time watching Misha's portrayal of Castiel on your television screen for a bit so that his incredible voice work will be fresh in your head. That voice is critical to this scene.

Warnings for mentions of graphic violence and regret. Enjoy!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Chapter 106 – Thursday, August 24, 2017

THEN:

Viscous red dribbled stickily down the far wall, pooling along the baseboard, melding with puddles to the left and right. The man panted heavily, leaning against his own thighs, arms braced and trembling. His chest heaved with exertion and fury. Adrenalin, fast waning now that they all lay motionless in heaps upon the cold concrete floor, set his limbs shaking. His lip twitched. His cheek spasmed. The flesh along the bridge of his nose crinkled as his face continued to convulse in uncontainable rage. Red eyes flicked from one bundled heap to the next, watching for movement. He took stock. The two in the corner had had their throats crushed. The big one on the other side of the room was leaking greyish pink brain matter onto the floor – clearly, that was where all the blood had come from. And the three scattered evenly between the door and where Castiel stood panting had all been dispatched with one pistol shot each, aimed surgically to destroy the musculature of their hearts – one shot each to the chest.

Six men dead. By his hand.
It had taken less than ten minutes.

And forever on, from this point, his life would be split between a then and a now, between a time when he’d been able to affirm positively that he stood with the angels in all their purity and their innocence and their steadfast condemnation of the grisly violence of death. Of murder. And now.

Castiel wretched and vomited on the floor between his feet, and then stumbled hastily back to avoid the spreading muck.

He’d never be able to pretend innocence again. He’d just murdered six men in cold blood. With his bare hands. If one applied the term men loosely enough to cover the monsters they’d been at heart.

And the only thought that ran through his head on repeat was that he hadn’t managed to corner all of them. It hadn’t yet been a large syndicate, but there were eight men on the upper council, and he’d only neutralized six. Sure, there were foot soldiers by the scores out doing the dirty work: collecting ‘capital’, Omegas harvested in the prime of their lives, put to work in the darkness, enslaved and tortured, raking in profits for the upper echelon by the tens of thousands every week. Cas knew the foot soldiers were powerless without their commanders, ready to scatter back to their petty crime origins without the organization and resources of the syndicate at their backs. But the task wasn’t complete yet. No, there were still two more leaders out breathing air somewhere. Cas had meant to corner all eight of them tonight.

Were the remaining two out working the inventory? Checking over their living, breathing stock?

Almost, that had been Gabriel. Almost, but for Gabe’s quick thinking and defensive brutality that allowed Castiel’s brother to level the men with gunny sacks and truncheons. Gabe got away, but Marina was dead. And while it had been the foot soldiers in the ramming truck that knocked their car skidding into a light pole, it was really these six, these eight, behind the grim work orders that had killed Castiel’s darling sister-in-law and devastated his brother.

Cas pushed himself to standing and wiped his mouth with the back of his hand, leaving a coppery smear of blood. Not his own. He didn’t remember being sprayed in the face with his enemy’s blood. When had that happened? When he’d bashed number three’s head against the cinder block wall repeatedly, no doubt. His face continued to spasm into a furious grimace. His eye twitched.

He surveyed. He debated cleaning up versus leaving them where they lay. He had no idea if he’d left traces of himself in the mess. He had scant knowledge of the advances of modern forensics. He’d not taken a scratch. None of that was Castiel’s blood. Would investigators be able to trace the carnage back to him? The gun weighed heavy in his waistband. Father’s pistol would have to go missing somewhere it wouldn’t be found.

It didn’t matter to Cas if he was caught. He couldn’t bring Marina back. He couldn’t help Gabriel. Gabe had fallen down a well of grief and trauma. His eyes stared glassy whenever Cas spoke to him. He’d snapped emotionally, and they all knew what that meant for an untethered Omega. Without a claim from a strong life line, Gabe would succumb to insanity. And Marina was gone. Father was gone. There was no one who could help him.

Cas felt his eyes well up, overflow, and leave tracks through the minute red spots on his cheeks, down through the smears across his mouth. He clenched his eyes closed, willing them to transition back to blue. He needed to think.

Cas smelled Bobby behind him before he heard a sound, and somehow, he wasn’t surprised by the man’s presence. Somehow, it seemed an inevitability. Bobby had always turned up when Cas found himself in an ugly mess, always, ever since Father died. He didn’t turn, even when a solid hand came down upon his shoulder and squeezed. He couldn’t look at the man. Not yet. How had Bobby found him here?

“Alpha,” the old man said in a voice strange to Castiel’s ear. It was careful, neutral, soft. Cas sighed, sniffled, and wiped at his eyes again, smearing more blood and turning his face into a grotesque mask of dead men’s blood.

“Castiel, we can’t stay here. Come with me. We need to move now.”

“I did this, Bobby,” Castiel confessed needlessly. “I need to turn myself in.”

Bobby scoffed loudly. His grip tightened on Castiel’s shoulder, and he spun the younger man to face him.

“Don’t be stupid. That won’t help your brother.”

“Bobby…”

“You listen to me, boy, and you listen good,” Bobby snapped with authority. “You’re coming with me. We’re going to clean you up, scrub you clean until you sparkle, and you’re going to get right back to your studies. You’re not going to breathe a goddamn word of this to anyone, not anyone, Cas, except to let Gabriel know he doesn’t need to watch his six anymore. It’s done, and we need to get out of here. We need to leave it behind us and walk on from here.”

Cas sobbed, clutched at Bobby, and stared at the door. It couldn’t be that easy, not after what he’d asked of his wolf and his alpha, not after what they’d begged him to allow them to do.

“Son,” Bobby beseeched softly, trying to capture Cas’ eyes. “Castiel, you did what you had to do. We’re in a war, make no mistake. It’s not a war that the sun shines down on, with rows of proud soldiers marching in formation before crowds of waving banners, taking kisses on our cheeks from a grateful nation. Castiel, this is a war in the shadows. But it’s a necessary war. And we HAVE to fight it. And we HAVE to win it. Do you hear me?”

“No, Bobby, I can’t…”

“Damnit, boy, wake the fuck up and look around you!” Bobby’s tone flipped to pissed, and Cas startled in his grip, eyes flying wide. “It’s time to grow up, Alpha. Don’t you dare wallow. We ain’t got time for that. You pick your damn self up off the goddamn floor and get to being the man you’re supposed to be. Are you listen’in’ to me, boy? Stop sniveling that you got dealt a shitty hand. You know who got a shitty hand? Your brother, that’s who. Now come with me, get a damn shower, pull yourself together, and go take care of Gabriel!”

Bobby was furious, and Cas could only stare at him.

Bobby rolled his eyes and muttered under his breath. He looked around at the carnage, counting. “All six…” he mumbled to himself, and Cas lowered his eyes in shame. “That’s all of the upper council, Alpha. We leveled the lot of ‘em in one sweep. That’s one syndicate down, countless more to go. You with me?”

Castiel’s mind skittered. No. He’d killed six, but the council was a table of eight. Two of them were missing. Had Bobby said ‘We’?

“I…? You…?” he eloquently sputtered.

“Seems like the council was less cohesive than they thought,” Bobby added. “Joachim and Colin had a private mini-council session a mile from here. ‘HAD’ being the operative word.” Bobby’s tongue traced a line across his bottom lip, and his eyes danced.

“You killed them?”

“I didn’t invite them to sign my dance card,” Bobby answered caustically.

“How did you know I was here?” Castiel asked, beginning to come back to himself and beginning to realize how deep a pile of shit he was in.

“I keep an eye on my alphas, Cas,” the mentor reminded him evenly.

Castiel nodded. How Bobby knew what he always knew had baffled him for years, but he wouldn’t get any answers from the man that he hadn’t already heard. Cas turned slowly and regarded the room. Bobby was right. They needed to move. He surveyed the damage with an analytical eye, and his mind traced along the lines of probability from this moment forward, running complex models out to their ultimate conclusions. If he was careful, several of those models yielded outcomes that meant good things for Gabriel…and that’s really all that mattered.

When he turned back, Bobby had a white handkerchief extended in offering. It was a white flag in the physical sense only. Bobby would never surrender. Cas took it and scrubbed his face. He stiffened his spine. He set his jaw.

“There you go,” said Bobby in the same voice he’d once used to coach Cas through vertebrate anatomy lab when Cas had struggled to distinguish the myriad nerves in a cat’s eye.

“It may be a just war, alpha,” Cas said in a stronger voice. “But we need to fight it in the open. Not like this. We can’t ever do this again.”

Bobby tugged at Cas’ shoulder, and the two men began walking away. Neither of them looked back.

“We fight on every front at once, Castiel,” said Bobby firmly. “We can’t afford only to walk the high ground. If we do that, we lose.”

“No.” It was a starkly implacable response, typical of Castiel.

“Cas…”

“NO, Bobby. This was a mistake…”

“It wasn’t a mistake, Castiel,” Bobby growled, stepping out into the pitch black darkness outside the bunker. Castiel followed more slowly. The syndicate chose its council room well, a boon to the pair who’d used its hidden properties to their advantage. The two were alone in the night. “It was a necessary mission, and you implemented it with perfect clarity of purpose. Don’t let your soft side play Monday morning quarterback now that the deed is done. You HAD to kill those men, Castiel. Someone had to. You can write all the legislation you want, but no jail cell is going to stop the syndicates.”

“We’re no better than they are if we become vigilantes!”

“BULLSHIT!”

“Damnit, Bobby…!” Cas spun to a stop and yanked his shoulder clear of his mentor’s grip. His eyes flashed red, but Bobby didn’t flinch. He stepped right up into Castiel’s face, a red hue suffusing his own eyes and a finger planted in Castiel’s chest.
“Stop it! We don’t live in that world yet, boy, and no one’s going to wave a magic wand and give it to us. We gotta build it ourselves, brick by fucking brick. We have to tear out the rotten with our goddamn teeth and plant a new garden in its place. That’s going to mean spilled blood and lots of it. And you…you are the only one with all the parts in the right places to do it right. You’re the only one strong enough, smart enough, rich enough, and canny enough to pull this off. Don’t you dare go squeamish on me now, boy.”

“I’ve had enough of being your puppet,” Cas snarled back.

“Good! ’Bout fuckin’ time, too! I’m pretty damn tired of pulling your strings! Now get in the fucking car!”

Bobby spun away from him with surprising agility, skipped around to the driver’s side, and slammed himself in without another word.

Cas swallowed. He glanced about him. He slipped into Bobby’s car, still clutching the bloodied handkerchief that would need to be burned. He realized that in his rage, he’d never made an exit plan. If Bobby hadn’t found him, he’d have had to trudge back through the streetlights with blood caking his face.

“What do I tell Gabriel?”

“Tell him you eighty-sixed the fuckers who killed his mate and tried to bag him for resale. What kind of stupid question is that?” Bobby pulled the car easily from the curb, driving carefully so as not to attract unwanted attention. “You won’t be a suspect, Alpha. You can let Gabe in on it enough to ease his fears, put him at peace in that spaghetti bowl he calls a brain. You can trust your brother.”

Castiel fidgeted, and Bobby couldn’t suppress his eyeroll.

“You’ve been grooming me this whole time,” accused Cas in a flat, gravel-strewn voice.

“That’s what mentors do,” Bobby reminded him.

“I’m a murderer. I don’t understand any of what I did, even if I was the one who did it. And you. You guided me straight to it the whole way.” Cas studied his hands. Blood caked his fingernails. Tiny speckles of it spattered his forearms.

“Lemme ask you a question, Alpha,” Bobby posed. “If you thought this plan through but rejected it on moral grounds, what then? Try to illuminate the syndicate to the public? Get the cops involved? Work tirelessly for years to dismantle their operation one dirtbag at a time? Don’t answer. Just think. Are you your father’s son, or are you a wolf? Who the fuck are you in the deepest part of your soul, boy? If you try to repress it, it’s gonna kill you as surely as it killed your Pop.”

“My Father,” Cas corrected. “And he was a wolf, Goddamnit.” The man was dead, the least Bobby could do was not disparage his dignity.

“Don’t toy with me, pup,” Bobby countered.

“I think we’re past the stage where you can cow me with that tone,” Cas snapped. “Let’s get one thing straight right now. This? Tonight? This was a mistake. A terrible, mistake. And I’m going to clean the brain tissue out of my hair and think it though until I can make heads or tails out of it all, and I’m not ever going to be your weapon again. If you need a dagger, you do it your own damn self!”

“Hey, don’t lash out at me,” Bobby snapped. “I didn’t make you do a damn thing.”
“You knew where I was heading, and you paved the way.”

“I couldn’t have stopped you if I’d wanted to. Don’t go revisionist on me, Castiel. Don’t pretend you didn’t know your choices. You did what you HAD to do, and nothing on earth would’ve stopped you before you’d finished it. It’s done now, and you have the luxury of waffling around in your own head about moral choices and where your lines are. Dammit, Cas, that’s a luxury we can’t afford if we’ve got the slimmest chance of winning this war. None of this is pretty, but we don’t decide reality. This is a WAR! Don’t you get that?”

Cas stared out the window, ignoring the reflection in the darkened pane. His reflection. He couldn’t make anything mean anything. He’d been so committed on his way in, stubborn as a bull, no doubt whatsoever about right and wrong and who deserved to die bloody. Now, the whole world was spinning in freefall. He wasn’t sure of anything except that he didn’t ever want to feel this way again.

Finally, he took a deep breath and spoke to his lap. “We have to pinch it off from the demand side, Bobby. We need to realign people’s thinking, build a new morality. We attack the problem from the source. If there’s no demand for Omega fuck-houses, there won’t be a black market.”

Bobby glanced across at him. The Alpha looked too young and too spooked. His heart went out to the boy.

“Yeah, we need to do that. And we’re gonna work on it. That’s the public face of the war. That’s what you can take into the lights and in front of TV cameras. You go out there and drive the bus on that offensive. Shame them, Castiel. Make it so easy for them to get their wolves stroked in the light of day, and publicize the horrors of the black market, that they can’t stomach it anymore. But, son, that’s not going to convince everyone. You know better. Don’t bury your head in the sand.”

“I killed six men, Bobby, three of them with my bare hands. What am I supposed to do? How do I go back to class and pretend I have any business studying medicine? What could the Hippocratic oath ever mean to me now?”

“It means the same thing it’s always meant, you idjit,” Bobby insisted. “It means you struggle and fight on the side of righteousness. Ya protect the vulnerable. Ya don’t lose sight of the goal. You stand and fight wherever someone can’t do it for themselves. And you do whatever you have to, ‘cause the damned enemy don’t give a fuck about your moral conundrums, Alpha. They aren’t gonna play nice so you can keep your conscience clean. They cheat and steal and rape and kill. They make their own rules.”

“As do you, obviously,” Cas mumbled. He didn’t appreciate being set up to play Batman.

“As do you,” Bobby shot back. “As you should. You’re Alpha, Castiel, or have you forgotten the responsibility that comes with that title?” Cas glanced at him, unfamiliar enough with the details to know if he was poised to be Batman or Spiderman, but knowledgeable enough to have caught the reference, wherever it stemmed from. He humphed.

Bobby pulled the car over on a dark stretch of two-laned highway between the streetlights, and he killed his own headlights. He put the car in park and shifted to look Cas dead in the face.

“We’re not gonna keep having this discussion again and again. You get your head straight right now. Pick a side, Castiel. Play it dirty or play it clean, but don’t waffle back and forth and then blame me for pulling your keister outta the flames you get yourself into. Which is it gonna be? Choose.”

Cas stared into the old doctor’s eyes and licked his lips, regretting the action immediately when the copper tang of dead man’s blood sparked on his taste buds. He couldn’t find the words. His head spun. His eyes beseeched Bobby’s for an alternate choice, but they found only hardness and resolve.

“I’m no vigilante,” he tried.

“All evidence to the contrary,” Bobby countered.

“It was for Gabriel,” Cas said, hoping without hope to make Bobby understand the agony of what watching Gabriel flounder had done to Castiel. But it was clear that Bobby not only understood, he concurred. It had all been for Gabriel.

“There are how many Gabriels in the world?” Bobby responded, not giving an inch. “They may not be your brother, but they’re someone’s. Do they matter less? Are you so selfish that only your own kin deserves this kind of rage?”

Cas stared at him. Thinking. Those algorithms ran models in his head at dizzying speeds. Who was he in the depths of his soul? Who was Bobby? What did the future hold for any of them? For Gabriel?

Who am I?

His Alpha had no trouble with that question. He was ALPHA, goddamnit. His wolf, too, took the question, chewed it up into soggy, slobbery shreds, and spit it out at Castiel’s feet in disdain. But Cas had never doubted where those two stood. They didn’t get a vote. Civility, if it was worth claiming, was worth fighting for as surely as was the bodily safety of thousands of unnamed Omegas, still stuck in miserable servitude. Righteousness was a slippery slope, and Cas was not as naïve as he seemed. How many despots had begun their campaigns with the best of intentions? Bobby was wrong.

“Fight beside me, Bobby,” Cas said at last. “I will chart us a course, and we’ll win this damn war someday. But we do it the right way, not like this.”

Bobby shook his head sadly, but Cas cut him off. He’d found a resolution of purpose within those depths.

“It’s not all going to be pretty. I know that. I’m not stupid. But we’re going to put this whole sordid mess behind us, and we’re going to draw new lines. This can’t ever happen again, Bobby. Not like this. Now, drive. Take us somewhere we can clean up without being seen. I can’t let Gabriel see me like this.”

Bobby nodded somberly and put the car in drive. He clicked his headlights back on.

“And another thing,” Cas said as they pulled onto the pavement. “From now on, you answer to me. If that’s not something you can stomach, we can’t work together. I mean it.”

Bobby’s face flashed a strangely satisfied flicker before he tamped it down again. Cas found it notable, but didn’t comment. He watched Bobby’s eyes from the side as the man who’d led him by the hand through the awful uncertainty of adolescence and into a strident adulthood, considered the flipping of their roles. How would he answer? Castiel didn’t know himself whether or not he was bluffing. A bluff of this magnitude would destroy his credibility, making him a mockery of an Alpha, with all the muscle of a great leader, but with no standing to command anyone or anything.

Cas didn’t know it, but Bobby had weighed him through the whole conversation and judged him ready, forged in fire and pain and infinitely impossible choices and emerging from the kiln a whole new being – a hunkered silhouette in the shadows, coated in muck and sin, that slowly unfolds, still in pain, but determined now in a way that would be tested again and again through the long years to come – a shadowy figure that stands slowly to its full height, lit from behind by the fires of virtue, shoulders back, fists clenched, jaw immovable, angel wings spread aggressively skyward, daring to wield the strength granted to it by an unjust universe, and stubbornly resolved to hold itself within sight of true righteousness and to go no further into the shadows.

Bobby watched Castiel draw his line. He would go no further.

Could Bobby kneel to a man like that?

Oh, yes. He’d been waiting all his life for Castiel.

“Whatever you say, Alpha,” he demurred, choosing to downplay the moment to avoid spooking the Alpha back into reticence. Cas’ quick flicker of a side-eye told Bobby he didn’t appreciate the flippancy, but he only nodded and turned away to stare into the night.

Who was he in the depths of his soul?

He was a wolf.

He was a creature of the light and the darkness both, and that razor’s edge would prove a balance he doubted he’d ever master. But he had to traverse it anyway. He had no choice. Robert Singer had said there was no one else, and he’d been right.

There was no one else.

There may never be anyone else, not with the wherewithal that Castiel Novak had at his disposal.

And it had to be stopped. For all of them. For Gabriel. For Marina. For Cas’ Uncle James whom he’d never met. For Bobby’s mate, long gone years before Bobby ever came to Lawrence. For all of them.

It had to stop.

Castiel would stop it. But a glance at Bobby reminded him he couldn’t do it alone. And that was all for the better. It wasn’t any one man’s war. It would take an army. Castiel needed to build an army. He ran through the acquaintances he had who had an axe or two to grind, and he realized it was no small number.

Bobby snickered, and Cas shot him an offended glare from beneath blood-streaked locks that spiked over his forehead.

“You’re muttering tactics under your breath,” Bobby explained. “Who’s Maureen?”

“She’s an ally,” Cas responded petulantly. “If we’re doing this, we need more allies.”

The light of humor disappeared from Bobby’s eyes as if it had never been. “Yes, we do.”

“Can I rely on you, Bobby? Do we understand each other? Are you mine? I’ll make a clearer statement if I have to, but you understand why I’d prefer not to do that. I owe you a great deal.”

“A threat couched in careful words didn’t fly over Bobby’s head. He was as wolf as Castiel, and he knew what Cas meant.

“I’m with you, Alpha,” Bobby told him seriously, a mercy to them both. Would that his simple affirmation would hold when the chips were down and Cas took a higher path than Bobby thought was necessary. But those were conflicts for another day. For now, it was enough.
Bobby’s little two-seater disappeared into the night, and the man who made his way back home with the sunrise without a pistol on his person, back to his wounded brother, was not the man who had left the day before.

Gabriel noticed.

Only Gabriel noticed.

NOW:

Cas stood in the doorway watching his mate disappear into her father’s embrace, a solid balance finding resolution inside her psyche that Cas felt snap into place. She hadn’t seen her folks for six long months, and Cas kicked himself internally, vowing not to let it go so long again. April released her father reluctantly only to dive headlong into a hug with her mother that melded the two Ozzies together into one swaying mass of blonde hair and tears. Castiel stepped forward from the doorway of the Anderson’s tidy middle-class suburban home with his right hand extended.

“Reggie. It’s good to see you again.”

“Castiel.”

The greeting between alphas stuck on formality again, as it had done the last time Cas met the couple for a quick impromptu dinner in Oklahoma City on the night after his grilling with the FBI over the mysterious explosion of a Lupin resources facility that was in direct competition with Castiel’s. Formal and stilted their handshake was, but at least Castiel was invited in. Reggie shook his hand firmly and even clapped a hand to his bicep in greeting, but the man turned back toward his daughter, dismissing the Alpha promptly. This wasn’t really a visit about Cas. He had eyes only for April.

Castiel wasn’t offended.

Kathleen Anderson hugged her daughter as if she’d feared never to see her again, and April clung on just as tightly to her mom. Cas studied his shoes. He had nearly cancelled this part of their weekend trip, utterly out of the way as it was, and a mere stopover in the middle of the night that meant none of them were likely to sleep more than an hour or two before April and Cas had to leave again for the airport at four a.m. He’d thought it might prove too selfish a plan to be reasonable. Surely, he’d argued, April’s parents would rather wait one more week when they were scheduled to arrive into Lawrence early to help with the wedding preparations. Surely, asking them to sit up all night for a squeaked-in visit of only a few hours when they should be sleeping was a bad idea, an inconvenience. But April insisted. And here they were, and by the looks of it, none too soon at that. Kathleen was weeping, and April was more than a little misty.

The two pulled apart at last, and Kathleen turned her radiant smile on Castiel. She, at least, didn’t cling to formality, pulling the man into a tight embrace and thanking him for bringing her daughter home. Castiel hugged her carefully, mindful of the alpha at his back, scenting the air for signs of discomfort. But Reggie seemed copacetic with the handling of his mate, and Kathleen soon had Castiel and April both tucked in at the kitchen table with drinks before them: a beer for Cas and a hot cup of tea for April. She rummaged through the refrigerator and began pulling food out to work it into a late meal of epic proportions.
“Please don’t go to any trouble, Omega Anderson,” Cas fretted. “We’ve eaten, I promise.”

“It’s no trouble,” she insisted. “And won’t you please call me Kathleen? Would you rather have dessert? I can whip up a batch of cookies or a cake in no time. Pineapple upside-down is my specialty. It won’t take me twenty minutes.” Her hands never stopped moving, and April giggled into her tea, shooting Cas a look.

Reginald stood his ground in the doorway, frowning. Castiel turned his eyes from his mate to her father with a frown of his own. Something was eating the man, and he wouldn’t settle until he’d said it. Cas was moments away from breaking the ice, but Reggie did it for him.

“She’s not pregnant,” he said stiffly. “Kat said you two were stopping by to give us the news in person, but she’s not pregnant.”

“I never said that,” Kathleen defended. “I only said that it might be news that brought them down in person.”

Castiel straightened. “No, alpha. Not yet. Soon, we hope. Next cycle, maybe.” He reached for April’s hand. “We hope, anyway. We’re ready to try.”

Reggie’s eyes narrowed as Cas attempted to breathe through the painful tightening in his gut without showing anything on his face. He took another drink and looked to his mate.

“You’re feeling the grip of the clock counting down,” April’s father told him confidently. “It’s way past time you got serious about it, and instead, you fooled around, putting everything else first, and putting my daughter through pain she don’t need.”

Castiel growled softly. “When we choose to have children is no one’s concern but ours, alpha. That’s not why we’re here.”

“Why are you here?”

“April misses you both. She’s bonded to you, Reginald, that much is clear. She needed to see you. It’s been much too long.”

“I never bonded my daughter…” Reggie stated loudly, defensively.

“You never Claimed her,” Cas disagreed. “Although you probably should’ve. But you two are closely bonded, and she needs both of you. I apologize for imposing on you so late at night, but it was either this or put it off until next week when we’re swamped with well-wishers from all over hell and gone. I don’t know how much time we’ll have to spend with you both before the wedding. And April insisted…”

“It’s fine!” Kathleen put in, an attempt to break the tension between two alphas who both felt ownership over the young lady sipping her tea. “We understand you’re both busy. You just drop on in whenever you can. Right, Reg?”

“Hmm,” Reggie responded, still looking at Castiel.

“Alpha,” Kathleen pleaded. “You’ll scare them off, and they won’t come back to visit.” There was anguish in her voice. Reggie shuffled his feet uncomfortably.

“Don’t be silly, Mama,” April told her. “Daddy’s just worried, and Cas is being a stereotypical mate. Let them be alphas for a minute. They’ll work it out. God, it’s good to be back home. Everything is just the same!”
Cas huffed a laugh, and Reggie grunted, but he finally joined them at the table. Kathleen set a mug of tea in front of him. “So? Dessert? What’ll it be?”

“It’s not a restaurant, Kathleen,” Reggie grumbled. “It’s one in the morning. They don’t want cake.”

“I’m dying for one of your pineapple cakes, Mama,” April dissented. “I wanna sit up all night and eat cake and talk. I miss you so much!”

Kathleen patted her hand. “Coming right up, baby girl.”

“Thanks, Mama.”

The affection was palpable, and it broke the tension between the posturing alphas. Cas scootched his chair over a little and tossed an arm around April’s shoulders. She let her head fall softly to his shoulder, and she breathed in the mingled scent of birth pack and mate, and she sighed happily.

“It’s good to have you home, punkin,’” Reggie noted. “Even if it means you have to put up with your ol’ man being an alpha brute for a bit. I’m concerned is all. You smell ready, and I’ve seen what it does to folks who try to postpone things when they get ripe like that. I don’t want you hurting.” His face was austere as he spoke. “I don’t ever want you hurting.”

“I’m fine, Daddy. We know. We’re not putting it off. Maybe, next time we visit we’ll have good news to share. We just had to get all the ducks in a row. There’s a lot to think about what with Cas’ career and mine.”

“You career?” Reggie asked, perplexed, sitting forward. “What career?”

“I told you, Hon,” Kathleen said airily from the kitchen. “She’s working with a composer in New York. She’s going to be a star one day.”

“Nonsense,” the alpha muttered. “She needs to focus on raising a family.” He shot a firm look toward Castiel, but didn’t get the support he expected from the man. Cas sat sanguine, sipping his beer, a reflective expression on his face. “Is that true? You’re letting her waste her time with musicians?”

Cas glanced at Kathleen and smirked. “No, I’m not.”

April giggled.

“I’m missing something,” Reggie grumped.

“I’m not letting her waste her time,” Cas clarified. “I’m permitting my Ozzie mate to develop her career however she decides is appropriate. She’s a brilliant musician in her own right, which I’m sure you’re aware, and she wants to engage herself in a career in the music industry. It’s what April wants.” April could feel Cas nudging her from the inside to speak up for herself, but she snuggled down to rest against his chest and remained silent. He tightened his arm around her, and let her be. He could run this gauntlet for her this time. It’s what alpha mates were for.

“What she wants? What about what she needs? She’s Ozzie! She can’t…”

“I’ll stop you right there, Reginald,” Cas interrupted. “You’re in no position to decide what she can or can’t accomplish. I must insist that we set some clear boundaries where April is concerned, you and I. Her life choices were once yours to manage, and I commend you for a fine job. But the circumstances have changed. She is not yours any longer, not as she once was. She’s mine, and I defend what’s mine. Pray, stay clear of my territory, and I’ll offer you the same consideration. Stray too far across that line, and I’ll be compelled to respond forcefully.” The red in Castiel’s eyes spoke more than his words did, and the weaker alpha pulled back. His breath shallowed, and his pupils tightened. In less clear circumstances, Castiel’s words could have sparked a confrontation, but Reginald was a man of instinct, and he knew where the lines of ownership were. He bowed his head slowly.

“Oh, NO!” cried Kathleen from the pantry. All three heads whipped around. “We’re out of baking powder! Completely out. I can’t make a cake without it…”

“I’ll go,” Castiel said at once, standing up. “Is there a 24-hour grocery store close?”

April stood too. “It’s not far. Daddy, can we take your car? It’ll be quicker if I show him.”

“Mm,” Reggie answered without much commitment behind it. “You know where the keys are.”

They were halfway to the store before either of them spoke, April sending Cas directions through their bond rather than break the tense silence, no more than a sensation of a tap to his right arm for a right turn or his left arm for a left turn. He followed her guidance silently, his mouth set in a stiff line.

“Was that really necessary?” she asked him as they approached the store, it’s parking lot all but empty and lit up from above.

“You should already understand that it was,” he told her tersely. “I know he’s your father, but he needs to back off. You don’t deserve to be put between the two of us, but you’re mine now, not his.
I won’t apologize.”

“He means well,” she said.

“He’s wrong,” Castiel countered.

“Did you bring me here so you could plant your flag in my chest and chant a victory song over my conquered body?” she asked him pointedly.

He turned to gape at her for a moment in shock. “What? No! Of course not.”

“Then why are we here? We’re going to see them both in a week anyway. It’s the middle of the night. Where’s your worry that I won’t get enough sleep? Where’s your decisive Alpha protectiveness? Why did you leave it up to me whether we drop in or not?”

Cas pulled into the brightly lit lot and parked in a space near the door. He put the car in park. “I wanted a chance to explain my marriage to Dean face-to-face. I owe them that.”

April blinked in surprise. “How do you figure? How is that any of their business?”

“It just is,” he told her stubbornly.

“You drew a line in the sand just now over my career; told him to keep his damn nose in his own business. Your marriage doesn’t concern my Dad any more than my career does.”

“April…”

“You don’t owe them an explanation, Cas.”

He sighed. “Let’s just get the baking soda and get back. Can we do that?”

“Powder,” she corrected. “Baking soda and baking powder aren’t the same thing.”
He met her as she rounded the car, and he kissed her knuckles when she slipped her hand into his.
“What would I do without you?”

Castiel rummaged along the shelves for baking goods, inspecting the boxes and cans, looking to see if there were any differences between brands to account for the differences in price. Chemically, they should all be the same, right? Maybe the higher end brand was more pure? He squinted at the label as he searched for evidence of a benefit of one over the other. Behind him, he felt April go stiff, and he sensed her shock through their Mating-bond. Castiel’s head popped up. He dropped the red can to the floor and shoved her behind him without a thought, searching the end of the row for a threat to match her shock.

A young man blinked back at him, a slight frown tying his brows together.

“What?”

“Nate,” said April from over Castiel’s shoulder, and he spun back around.

“Nate?” asked Cas. He looked around again, taking in the youth, barely more than a teenager, a grocery-store apron tied over his clothes, a cart of prepackaged cheeses before him at the end of the aisle. Cas looked the boy over, evaluating his mettle and his strength. He couldn’t scent him from here – there were twenty feet of space between them – but he didn’t need the scent to get the measure of the young alpha. “That’s your Nate?” he asked his mate. She met his eye and nodded. She looked spooked.

“Jesus, what next?” he muttered, uncharacteristically pessimistic. Gathering himself, Cas spun on his heel and approached the man, his hand out in greeting.

“Nate?” asked Cas in surprise, looking back to April with his hand still awkwardly before him.

She sputtered, her eyes flicking rapidly between the two men, trying to answer them both at once. Nate saved her. “Oh, shit, I’m sorry, Alpha. I shouldn’t have said that. It slipped out. Jesus Christ, what on earth are you doing here?”

“We’re in town visiting April’s parents,” Cas told him smoothly, dropping his hand.

“Right,” said the youth, eyeing the can of powder that had rolled to a stop against the baseboard, as if a middle-of-the-night excursion for baking powder was a part of every familial gathering.

“Nate, why are you still in town?” April asked him, taking in his apron. “What happened to college?”

“I leave tomorrow,” he told her. “This is my last shift, actually. Had to earn a few bucks this summer to make up the difference in tuition. I got a good scholarship, did I tell you? It covers most of the bill, but there’s a gap, and I wanna pay for what I can in cash. Student loans are killer. I don’t want…” He stopped, flushed, and took a half step backward. “I’m sorry. I should get back to work.”

“Where are you going? For school, I mean,” April asked, stepping clear of her mate and approaching Nate. He blushed hard.
“I’m moving to College Station, down in Texas? I got in to study engineering, just like I wanted. Like I planned.”

April beamed. “I knew you would! I’m so proud of you!”

“Yeah, thanks. It’s a little different now that I’m not planning for two. Easier.” Nate’s discomfort leaked from his body and his eyes. He looked to Castiel, standing stoic by the endcap of the aisle, measuring him. There was an awkward few moments. April seemed at a loss for words, and then she pulled her eyes from her ex and pulled Cas closer by his arm.

“Nate, this is Cas.”

“Um, yeah. Yes. I know. It’s…it’s an honor to meet you, Sir.”

“And you, Nathaniel,” Castiel said pompously with a nod. He didn’t offer his hand again. Instead, he placed his palm over April’s hand on his arm. “My mate has told me bits and pieces of her life here in Oklahoma before we met. She speaks fondly of you. I didn’t know you had a nickname for her. That’s a bit of a surprise.”

“Cas…” April chided quietly.

Nate’s eyes danced between them, looking for meaning. It wasn’t hard to suss it out. He took another small step back and lowered his eyes. “I apologize,” he repeated. “It was a surprise to see her here. That’s all.”

“I quite understand,” said the Alpha stiffly. “I would appreciate your restraint in the future. I’m certain you understand.”

“Yes, Sir. Of course.”

“Oh, good grief!” sputtered April. She lunged forward and pulled Nate into a tight hug that he didn’t return. His terrified eyes never left Castiel’s. Cas didn’t thaw. He glared.

Nate pulled away as quickly as he could, and he put a quick three yards distance between them. “It was really good to meet you, Sir. I’m glad April’s happy. That’s all that really matters anyway, right? Right. April, I’ll, uh, see you around.”

“Nate, wait. Maybe we can…”

But he was gone. He’d left the cheese cart blocking most of the aisle, and disappeared into the back.

April rounded on Cas. “Don’t tell me it was necessary that time,” she shot. “Would you like to mount me right here to make sure he got the message?”

“He called you ‘Kitten’.”

She shook her head at him. “It wasn’t the same meaning at all, Cas. I can’t believe you’re jealous. Can we please go?”

“Watch your tone,” he told her sternly. “I am not pleased with you at all right now. I suggest you don’t make things worse.”

“Not pleased…? What’d I do?”

He advanced on her until he was hulking over her bodily. He whispered furiously. “You never told me that your ex-boyfriend, whom you nearly Mated, used the same affectionate nickname! How do you suppose that makes me feel, Omega? I’ll tell you. It’s humiliating. Do you expect me ever to use that name again?”

“You’re making a big deal about nothing,” she protested weakly.

“On your knees, Omega.”

“Here?”

“Right fucking now.”

She slipped gracefully downward until she was kneeling before him. “Sir, please. It was an honest oversight. I never meant for you to feel humiliated. You chose the perfect name for me, and I adore it. It doesn’t mean to you and me what it meant to Nate.”

“Don’t say his name,” Cas snarled at her.

“Alpha, please…”

“Here’s what’s going to happen,” he said. “We’re going to buy the baking powder your mother needs. We’re going to drive your father’s car back to your parents’ house. You’re going to go straight to your bedroom and stay there until I join you. I’m going to spank you until I feel that I’ve expressed myself suitably, and then we’re going to enjoy the cake your mother is making for us. Do you have any questions?”

“You’re going to spank me where my parents can hear?” she asked softly.

“Would you rather I did it in the living room where they would be compelled to watch?”

“Alpha, please!”

“Sir, is there a problem?”

Cas turned stoically to face the woman who appeared to be a store manager with one brow lifted. “The young stock boy who just left his cheeses here,” Cas posed to her. “His name is Nate, I believe?”

“Yes, Alpha,” said the aging woman carefully. “Has he offended you or your mate?” The woman eyed April. She knew her. That meant she knew who Castiel was. Small towns had that in their favor. Everyone knew everyone.

“No, of course not,” Castiel answered. “I wonder if you are familiar enough with his circumstances to be aware of how short he currently falls in his tuition? How much does he need to cover the difference between his scholarship and his full bill?”

“Cas…” April tried again, but her mate didn’t respond.

“I, um, I could find out,” the manager said. “His mother – the younger one – and I are friends.”

“Good. Do that, please. Here is my card. It would please me to fund the remainder of his tuition bill. If you will send the details to me, I’ll see to it. You may discuss the gift with his parents, but I would prefer to remain anonymous to the young man himself. Please inform his mothers that this isn’t an act of charity. It is a gift.”

“It’s a buy-out,” grumbled April to herself, her head bowed. Castiel heard her, but he didn’t think the manager had, so he didn’t respond. He would respond soon enough. The manager took the card and nodded. She cast one more look at April, whose cheeks were bright with anger, and she left the pair to one another.

“On your feet. Pick up the can, and let’s go.”

“Yessir.”

They were silent on the drive home, each thinking about the ridiculous circumstance that put April’s only ex inside the only building in Lawrence other than her home that they would enter on their brief stay here. What were the odds?

He had looked thinner to April. He looked pale. That could be his state of health, but it could be the lighting or the condition of having Castiel laser beaming a glare directly into his brain. They weren’t even friends anymore. She hadn’t contacted him once since their grand falling out with all its shouting and ferocity and words that neither could ever take back. He’d tried pathetically to resume a friendship after the fact, but only once, and without much heart to it. He had to have known she wouldn’t answer. And he was going out of state for school. That’s something he had flat refused to consider while they were a couple. It was too expensive and too far from their parents, too far from support they expected to need as a young Mated couple.

April sighed heavily. She looked out the window. Her mate was angry in a way that he would use to foster a strengthening of their bond. She could feel him gathering himself to throw down fiercely. She could feel him even from without, merely from the tension in the car. April found the tension erotic. She felt her wolf respond and take her body with it. But April was mad, too. How dare he call her down for keeping a part of her prior life private? He owned who she was now, but he didn’t own her past.

April slammed the car door closed once it halted in the carport. She slammed the garage door before he even made it out of the car. She left the baking powder on the seat and disappeared into the house in a huff. Castiel followed more slowly.

“What the…?” asked Reggie from the kitchen. “What’s eating her?”

“Excuse us for a few moments, alpha,” Cas said, handing him the little red can they’d purchased from the grocery store without stopping to look at him. “I need to see to something. We won’t be long.” Cas inhaled deeply and stalked down the short hall to the room at the back where April had grown up and come of age.

He closed the door behind him with a click. He moved slowly. April eyed him warily. She wasn’t on her knees as she should’ve been. She sat upright on her bed, leaning against the wooden headboard, her ankles crossed, her arms crossed over her chest, her breath heaving. His face was flat, emotionless if you didn’t know what to look for. He crossed his own arms over his chest and leaned back against the door he’d just closed, silently watching her pout. For she was pouting, damnit. She realized too late that her face had taken her Tertiary, not Secondary, and altering that now would only draw attention to it. She looked away.

“No, you don’t,” he corrected. “Look at me.”

“I haven’t done anything wrong,” she insisted. “This isn’t fair.”

“Is that so?”

She sniffl ed miserably and tucked her feet beneath her, sitting up and leaning forward. “I didn’t keep that name from you on purpose. I had no way of knowing you and Nate would ever meet each other, and I damn sure couldn’t have predicted he would call me that.”

“So I was never supposed to find out that every time I call you Kitten, you hear two of us…”

“That’s not true!”

“Do NOT interrupt me!” he thundered, stepping closer.

She buried her face in her hands. “You hear two of us,” he went on reasonably. “Overlapping each other; his voice forever beneath mine. All it would have taken would have been a word in my ear, and I would have found an alternate nickname, one that doesn’t evoke a pimple-faced child.”

“Alpha, I like my nickname. I don’t want a different one. I don’t hear him when you talk to me. I only hear you. Since we first met, it’s only been you.”

“That’s not quite true, but I don’t intend to go there this evening.”

“I want to be your Kitten. Alpha, please don’t change it. It was never sexual with him. It was something he called me out of friendship. It’s not the same.”

He studied her. Something about this encounter was off, but he couldn’t put his finger on it. April wanted, needed his firm hand. She’d been subtly pushing for it since they arrived, and it wasn’t simply lack of sleep. She seemed genuinely alarmed that she might lose something of value. Was it the nickname, or was it the innocence of her childhood home?

She misread his stillness, taking it for a patience in waiting for her to fulfill her responsibility to him. Slowly, as he studied her from the inside, she slipped off the bed, drew her dress over her head and knelt naked upon the floor. Her blue eyes held his.

“We were destined to do this here tonight, weren’t we, Alpha? From the very beginning?”

“Yes, it seems that way. Kitten.”

She gasped in a relieved breath and her eyes overflowed. He caressed the reassurance his use of her name sent through her bond, holding it with care, holding her with care. “Present over the bed for me.”

She didn’t answer, but she scrambled to comply. His anger had been real, but it wasn’t about Nate at all. It wasn’t about a name. Her outrage, too, had been real, but it was gone now. They had found the settling place in their heads, and they moved as a single unit. His face wrinkled itself into a tight, livid frown as he landed blow after blow onto her supple upturned backside. He let all the tension flow downward through his arm, and he turned her flesh bright red.

April didn’t cry out, but the sounds of her punishment were loud enough to echo down the hall and into the kitchen. There weren’t any sound-proof rooms in this modest house. She clutched at the bedspread, the same one she’d used most of her life, a simple floral design that had seen her through from childhood into adolescence, a thick, comfortable span of warmth and comfort that she’d tucked Nate beneath as she and he explored each other’s bodies, making out, feeling out one base after another without ever striving for home plate.

Castiel drove him out, scoring the bedspread with new memories and vanquishing the ghosts of the past. Vanquished too, were the medial, insufficient, half-hearted efforts of her father over the years, not nearly powerful enough to balance an Ozzie like April. Castiel’s hand crashed down again and again in a pattern they both knew well by now, but one that had April’s parents both stiff and silent in the hall entrance. Neither brave enough to interrupt, but both alarmed at the sound.

Castiel braced her with his left hand on her back, and he showed her no mercy – not from the unfairness of life that meant she paid for his upsets, not from the quite justifiable inequity that she shouldn’t owe him an explanation for her past, not from the embarrassment of having her ass whacked like a child in full hearing of both of her parents. If Cas could have dragged Nate here and made him sit front and center to witness, he would’ve done so. Castiel drove it all out with brute force, paving the way for a new path, one that he marked in hot, red skin from right now to forever. This room wasn’t April’s childhood bedroom anymore. It was the room she kicked and writhed in while he held her in place and walloped the tar out of her – because he could, because he had all the power, and he chose to prove it. To April. To Reggie. To Kathleen. Even to Nate. Mostly, to himself.

His mate.

Not theirs.

God in heaven it felt good and right and proper and powerful.

She would bruise again.

He spent himself upon her flesh, spent his passion and his ire. He panted as he pulled to a stop, falling to sit beside her, sweating.

She’d gone lax and still, her muscles slack, her eyes dry. She turned to look at him. Blinking peacefully. He blew out a long breath and looked her in the eye. He tumbled back to lay beside her. He reached a hand out and tucked her hair behind her ear.

“No tears,” he observed, caressing the space below her eye, and she smiled softly.

“No.”

“My good girl,” he whispered.

“Yours, Alpha.”

His eyelids fluttered in very real, tangible pleasure, like a mini-orgasm that had nothing to do with his genitals at all. In fact, he hadn’t so much as thickened through the ordeal, a very new experience for the Alpha whose wolf found a sexual thrill in every expression of power.

“Looks like we both needed that.”

She nodded. Her ass throbbed. Her heartbeat slowed back down slowly, and she could feel it in the curve of her butt.

“Is he gone now?” Cas asked her vaguely. But April knew whom he meant. Nate. Somehow, he’d been lurking back there all these months, looking for a way out, for closure. She nodded again.

“I think so.”

“You think so?” he asked with an amused twinkle, lifting his head in surprise and fixing her with a look that offered more where that had come from. April chuckled gently.

“Yes, Alpha. I think so. I know what to watch for now. I’ll let you know if I see it again.”

He hauled himself up. “No need, Kitten. I’ll be watching as well. Come on. Up you go. Let’s go back out and let your folks know you’re not dead.”

She laughed and then groaned as he helped her turn over. She stumbled a little, but he caught her. He dressed her, smoothing out her dress and getting it situated on her shoulders. He stopped her at the doorway, halting her hand on the knob and looming up close behind her. His mouth warmed the air at her ear, and she shivered.

“I love you desperately, little Kitten,” he whispered. “Come help me explain that to your parents. They don’t understand.”

She leaned backward into him. “They will. Just be yourself, and they will.”

No one slept that night. The hall was empty when the mates emerged. In the kitchen, two fresh hot cups of tea sat ready for them, and the cake was already in the oven. The tension between the alphas, so palpable before, was completely gone as Castiel helped his mate into her chair with a kiss to her temple. They chatted amiably. All of them. There was laughter, the kind of laughter that spoke of home, and Castiel’s fit in with the others as if he’d been there all along. In a way, he always had been.

Cas talked about his fiancé and about how his marriage to Dean was an addition to his Mating with April, not a detraction, about how desperately he needed them both, about how desperately April and Dean needed each other, about how seamless they were growing in their ties to one another. He confessed that Michael had been an unexpected rival for April’s affections, and that they were committed to honesty and fairness among the four of them. Kathleen tutted judgmentally at April, whether in disapproval that her daughter had allowed her eyes to stray from her mate or in dislike of hearing about it first from Castiel himself, Cas didn’t know, but he covered April’s hand and stood up for her. It wasn’t about right or wrong, he explained. It was only ever about love, and where there was love, they could make it work.

April flipped her hand over beneath his and laced their fingers.

Reginald nodded to himself, his eyes on the table before him, his plate down to nothing but crumbs of moist cake. He hadn’t done a lot of talking. Mostly, he listened. Whatever he’d been listening for, it seemed he found it somewhere along the way.

He only nodded again as Castiel explained to him that if April was to keep her connection to her father, one that they both valued immensely, that one day in the not-too-distant future, Reggie would need to place a Claim on his daughter. The alpha greyed a bit, but he didn’t protest the assertion, and Castiel chose to leave it there, to let it percolate. It was a difficult message to absorb for a man who worshipped his daughter for what she represented more than for who she was.

Cas knew she would never be permitted to visit home without her mate until that Claim solidified, and he knew he wouldn’t always be free to come with her. The great pendulum of the world was swinging back again, and everything was changing – changing for the better, but not always changing in a way that was comfortable. Some people would find the changes supremely hard to swallow.

All too soon, they gathered their luggage from the entrance hall and loaded it into the car. Reggie drove them to the airport, to the same terminal a cab had picked them up from only hours earlier. Hugs all around, and a sniffling mother hiding her eyes as she bade her daughter goodbye again, a firm handshake on the curb, and then they were gone.

Cas took April by the hand and led her into the airport. Castiel always flew coach. And yet, he and his mate were soon bundled into a private car and zooming out onto the tarmac where a jet sat waiting for the two of them. Their luggage disappeared into the belly, and Cas handed his mate up the gangway steps and into the tiny jet ahead of him.

He caught her amusement, and he pinched her ass in retaliation, but she only yipped, dodged, and laughed harder before looking around and marveling at the luxury.

“Don’t waste your time trying to see it all,” he told her. “None of this matters because you, young lady, are going to stretch out and go straight to sleep. Right here. Right now. Shoes off. I’ve got a blanket and a pillow, and the seat lays out flat.”

“Aww, Alpha,” she moaned, peeking into a cupboard and flipping a couple of switches to see what they did. One brought a screen down at the front of the cabin and the other covered the window by her head.

“Sleep, April. Now. I will lay down with you. Come here.”

“Can’t I wait until we take off?”

“We’re taking off right now. Get your seatbelt on.”

“Yes, Alpha.” April beamed at him and patted the seat beside her. He kissed her lips and then disappeared into the cockpit, returning with a satisfied expression and settling in next to his mate. The powerful engines boosted them forward. Cas and April watched the earth fall away beneath them, Cas helped her flatten the seat until she could lie down, and then he joined her. Soon, they were both asleep as the jet winged swiftly toward New York.

***************

Dean’s tuxedo still fit him perfectly, much to Michael’s pleasure and envy. Michael’s needed nearly catastrophic altering. It very nearly didn’t work without scrapping it and getting him a maternity suit. Michael ogled his mate as Dean stood before the mirror and let Kali look him over. She kept flinching toward one spot or another as if to pin or mark it, then pausing, tugging, and stepping back with a tilt to her head. In the end, she left it alone. Michael flushed with pleasure at the form Dean cut.

“Knock it off,” Kali told him sternly, cutting his view of his mate off. Michael jumped.

“What?”

“You’re not fucking until the clothes are packed away. I’m not going to have them cleaned and repaired this close to the event. It’s too much of a risk that something might go wrong.”

Dean snickered. “You tell him, beta.”

“Go change, Dean. Yours is fine. Leave it with me and get out of here and let me work.”
“Leave it here? Why am I not taking it home with me?”

She looked at him as if he’d forgotten PEMDAS, and hers was the only brain left in the room. “Because wedding parties always forget shit and guess who gets to go dashing out to find a last minute replacement? You’re not in charge of bringing anything with you to the wedding, alpha, except your own ass and your mate’s; not the clothes, not the rings, not the vows, nothing.”

“Don’t you trust me?” he teased, easing his vest off his shoulders and into her waiting hands.

“Not an inch,” she replied calmly.

“What about my plug?” he persisted. “Are you taking custody of that too?”

She paused, her hand out for his pants but not taking them when he held them out. “You’re wearing a plug?” she asked.

“Uh, seemed like a good idea,” he answered awkwardly. “Why? Bad idea?”

“You’re not supposed to enter a Shareer ka Daava ceremony pre-prepped.” Kali took his pants and hung them with care. Michael watched them both, interested. Dean scratched his face and glanced at Michael.

“Well, yeah, I know. I mean, ordinarily, yeah. But I’m not Omega, and if we tried it without any prep, it could get real messy real fast. I planned to have a plug worked in and some lube already in place when I walk in.”

Kali stared at him, her eyes narrowed. “You’re going to walk down the aisle at your own wedding with lube dripping out of your ass? You’re going to stand there in front of the Universe and everybody and say your vows while you’re wearing a butt plug?”

Dean blushed a little. “I mean, you got any other suggestions? I could take the plug out before I walk, but that leaves the lube leaking all over the red runners on the floor. That’s not a pretty picture to me. Unless you think I should wash the lube out too, you know, just before the wedding starts. Course, that means that Cas needs to have a tube of it in his pocket.”

Michael snickered, tried to stifle it, then snorted into his hand. Kali laughed too.

“God, Dean. You and your crazy ideas. This ceremony is going to be a laughingstock. My career is over.”

“Don’t be dramatic,” he told her, setting his backbone back into place. “It’s gonna be epic. And I can’t think of better way to get hitched than with a size eight shoved up my rectum.”

Michael burst out laughing, doubling over his own knees where he sat on the viewing couch in Kali’s workshop. Kali eyed him askance, a look of frustration on her face. “You two are morons,” she decided.

“Just the two of us?” Dean teased, standing in his socks and garters and his silk boxers. “What about Cas? It’s his shindig too.”

“Give me everything you’re wearing,” she reminded him. “Socks, underwear, garters, all of it. You’re not going to ruin the biggest day of my career by forgetting your underwear.”

Dean stripped naked and hopped down off the pedestal, going for his street clothes. “Be sure and wash those silks,” he said. “I think Michael’s flatulence is contagious.”
“That’s disgusting, Dean.” Kali held the pair of boxers he’d tossed to her on the end of a pencil and dropped them with distaste into a basket at her feet along with the socks that he’d worn for no more than fifteen minutes.

“We’ll go over this in detail at the rehearsal,” she said. “But I want you at the venue, ready to dress at ten a.m. Your robe will be waiting for you in the dressing room before the ceremony, and your tux will be ready for you to change into after the wedding. Eat lightly before you come, but EAT. You hear me? I’ll not have you pass out at the altar in something I created. People are watching, important people.”

“Yeah, like Cas,” said Dean happily. “And Michael.” He stooped to kiss Michael’s lips, still naked.

“Are you listening to me?”

“Relax, Kali. We still have two weeks. You’re going to say all of this again and again between now and then. I get it. This is a big day for your career. I won’t let you down, I swear.” Dean swept up his street clothes from the pile on the counter and shook them out to find his boxer-briefs.

Kali made a face. “Dean, look. It’s your wedding. I know that. I’m not trying to eclipse you. It’s just that…the wedding industry…it’s an industry, you see, and that means that even though it’s your big day, and it’s all about you, in the background of all that, it means a great deal to me in a totally different way. This is my livelihood at stake. I can’t afford to be blasé about it when people who can make or break my reputation are honed in on this event like it’s the biggest job interview of my life.”

Dean, dressed now in underwear and a t-shirt, walked slowly across the room to take her face in his hands and kiss her on the tip of her nose. “I hear you, Kali. I won’t let you down.” He winked playfully, but his eyes said he meant it.

She nodded, touched by his sincerity, and she hugged him impulsively.

“I have no need of an alpha, Michael,” she said as she let Dean go to finish dressing. “I have everything I need waiting for me at home.”

Michael sat forward on the couch, moving up to the edge and fixing her with a canny eye. “About that,” he said, pinning her in place with his gaze. “You know I do all the ordering for the household, right? Consumables and stuff, all that boring shit?”

“And?” she asked, breaking his eye and needlessly straightening Dean’s tuxedo again.

“Your husband has been on birth control most of his life. Orders it through the family account at the pharmacy we all use. You know his prescription is overdue? By three weeks? I only know because it goes across my desk, and when the auto-renewal was cancelled, the pharmacy called the number on the account, not the patient. They called me, Kali. Something you wanna tell us?”

“It’s none of your business,” she stated firmly. “It’s between Gabriel, his doctor, and his wife. Most likely, he simply forgot. He’s been busy.”

Michael shook his head. “Try again. It automatically renews. If it needs a doctor’s approval, they go through Castiel. Someone stopped it on purpose three weeks ago.”

“Still none of your business.”

Dean, standing close to Kali as he dressed, took one step closer and buried his nose in her throat. “Damn, kiddo. You’re fertile too.” A huge grin broke out on his face, and he lifted her up with both arms around her lower back, spinning her happily. “This is gonna be so great! Puppies as far as the eye can see!”

“Put me down, you imbecile! Dean, stop it! Put me down!” She beat at him with her hands until he slowed and lowered her back down.

“Tell me it’s true. You two are making puppy plans?”

Kali sighed. “Not plans, exactly. We’re considering our options. Gabriel still has a long way to go before he’s truly ready for a step this big. We need to be clear of the drugs before we can be tested for viability. That’s all this first step is about. It doesn’t mean we’re going there, just that we’re checking to see if we can. He’s pretty scarred, fellas, both physically and emotionally. Please don’t make a big deal about it. Please? Dean? Michael? Promise me.”

Michael stood up and faced her. His face had lost its teasing tilt. He looked her in the eyes. “Anything you need from us, Kali. Anything at all. Always.”

“You’re gonna make me cry, you big prick! Knock it off and get outta here.” She turned rapidly, seeking escape in her work. Michael nudged his mate somberly to finish dressing, and Dean followed his hint.

***************

Sarah had most of her belongings packed already. She had time left on her lease, but it seemed advisable to run to ground sooner rather than later. Dr. Meyer had been arrested, arrested, and charged with three counts of felony bribery and abuse of office. As a sitting professor for a public institution, his job fell under the Kansas penal code for public servants, a detail that had escaped Sarah, but not Castiel.

Dr. Winchester had assured her that she would receive sanctuary at his home just as soon as she felt ready to claim it, despite the way that might look from the outside. He’d boldly told her that he had no fear whatsoever of appearing to have played a role in the ouster of his nemesis, for he hadn’t done anything illegal. In fact, he told her that he’d already applied to the Douglas County Sheriff’s office to have her and her colleagues protected from acts of reprisal, volunteering to serve as a warden over her safety should she choose to hunker down on his property and seek asylum there.

Everything was in place. All she had to do was show up on his doorstep with her suitcase in her hand and step over the threshold. And she wanted to. Badly. But she couldn’t shake the feeling that it had all fallen together too seamlessly. It was too perfect.

Sarah sat in the middle of her bare apartment on top of her suitcase, turning her plane ticket over and over in her hand. It had taken a lot of thinking to determine whom she should approach. She didn’t want to destroy his trust in her altogether, but she couldn’t simply take him at face value either. His callous hamstringing of Karl Meyer spoke of a cold, brutal, surgical, possibly psychopathic ability to ruthlessly cut down anyone in his way. If he could do that to Karl Meyer, what else was he capable of? What else would he do if he felt something important to him was threatened? His Pack? His work? Where did the man draw his lines?

Did she dare throw in her lot with a man like that? Just for a research paper?

Did she dare sit on the sidelines when the movement was ready to explode all around her?
She needed the council of someone above it all, someone who knew him. Really knew him. But would anyone in his inner circle tell her the truth?

In the end, she went with her gut. She’d been assigned to Jim Murphy as her faculty advisor. Dr. Murphy had a pristine – a hallowed – reputation, and he was known the world over. Search as she might, Sarah couldn’t find anyone who had anything negative to say about him. A quick trip out to Massachusetts wouldn’t be odd. He was her advisor, after all. What’s more, the man had known Castiel since they were both boys. That didn’t bode well for digging up dirt if dirt there was to dig, but it might help her to get underneath her reticence to trust the man whose home she was supposed to be moving into. Surely, if Pastor Jim trusted Castiel, there was a reason. Surely. But she just couldn’t let it go without digging.

He had a dark side. Sarah could feel it.

She needed to look into those shadows and see for herself what drove him. She had to know.

Sarah stood up, collected her suitcase, tucked her ticket into an outer pocket, and headed toward the door. Just as she reached for the doorknob, there was a loud knock. Sarah jumped. She opened it immediately without thinking, cursing herself for a fool as soon as she felt her hand turn. What good was it to seek asylum from reprisals if she didn’t even check the peephole on her own door?

But it was Gabriel Novak, not a stooge of Dr. Meyer’s.

He stood leaning against the doorjamb with a lollipop in his mouth. He smirked at her. “Kinda jumpy there, are you?” he asked rhetorically, taking the lollipop into a casually flirty hand. “Come on. Let’s go for a drive. There are some things you need to understand about the Alpha.” His cocky head jerk and his utter lack of evident concern piqued her curiosity. Omegas didn’t behave like this.

“I need to get to the airport,” she told him, bemused.

“No, ya don’t. I had your ticket cancelled about an hour ago. It’s useless paper now. So? Looks like you’re free after all.”

“You…? How did you know to…? Why did you do that?” She was gobsmacked.

“Sweetheart, it’s not Jim Murphy you need. It’s me. So, here I am. Grab your purse or your sweater or whatever girls ride in cars in and come on. I’ll even let you drive. It’s Michael’s car. She’s a beauty.”

“Gabriel, I’m not going anywhere with you.”

“You are if you want the real story on my baby bro and his penchant for wiping folks right off the gameboard.” He tucked his lollipop back into his mouth and smirked happily again.

“You’re insane,” she muttered.

His eyes lost their humor. “I’m aware,” he said. “But that doesn’t stop me knowing what’s what. In fact, it helps. Truth is, Cas played you badly. He’s gotten so good at pulling people’s puppet strings he forgot the golden rule: never let them see the strings. The trick is to throw in some ‘Oopsies’ here and there, so it doesn’t come off clean every time. Life never works that way for real, now does it? It’s messy. Things get fucked up. The cable guy never shows between the hours of seven and one. The movie theater’s A/C goes out just as the film’s starting. Shit happens. People fret. That’s life. Cas forgot to throw any banana peels in your path. That’s all. It’s a rookie mistake, but he’s learning. Now come on. I’ll even buy the burgers – or, well, Castiel is buying them, but he doesn’t know that.”
She stared at him.

“Burgers? Seriously, your tickets are jacked. Your furniture is gone. You have nowhere to go but with me.”

“This is the part of the movie where everyone watching is screaming at the girl not to get in the psychopath’s car,” she told him. “Do I look that stupid?”

“You actually don’t, but that’s kinda beside the point. And I’m not the psychopath. That would be my brother. Me, I’m just your garden variety PTSD, long-term chronic depression, and suicidal tendencies sort of crazy. Way less interesting than a real life psychopath.”

“Why would I believe anything you have to say?” she asked, crossing her arms over her chest. “You’re his brother. You’re loyal to him. This is just another ploy to get me in his camp.”

“Well, yeah. Duh,” he put in, taking the sucker back out of his mouth and looking very earnest. “Only, he doesn’t know I’m here. He kinda missed the memo about how you’re squeamish of joining his team seeing as how all his enemies go down in flames. How you think maybe he’s got a dark side the size of the Chrysler building, and how you don’t know if you can afford to tangle yourself up in that.”

She stared at him some more.

“I haven’t spoken to anyone…” she said. “Not anyone.”

“You bought tickets to Massachusetts. Only thing in Mass is a guy with a halo so bright we can see it from here.”

“You watched my credit cards?”

“Yup.”

“You’ve been watching me?”

“Yup.”

“Why?”

Gabriel rolled his eyes. “You know, all this would be great to discuss over a burger. I’m hungry. I swear I won’t kill you until after we eat. I mean, that’s why we’re still talking in the doorway, right? You’re worried I’m going to fit you for cement shoes if you blink wrong?”

“Why is all this necessary?” she asked him as if he hadn’t spoken. “Why do you sneak around like a Mob operative? Why can’t I find anything on you other than your existence and some totally useless party photos? Who are YOU, Gabriel?”

He stepped backward, raised his brows, and dangled a set of car keys from his index finger. “Gonna have to share that burger with me to find out,” he coaxed.

“Oh, for the love of… Gimme the damn keys!” She lunged for them. Gabe cackled as he let her swipe them. He followed merrily as she stalked down the hall.

He really hoped Sarah stuck around. Gabe planned to tell her nearly everything, no matter what his brother would have to say about that. Gabe was no fool. They needed Sarah, and she was seconds away from turning tail and never looking back. She couldn’t go into this mess thinking it was the good guys against the bad guys. Or, rather, that’s exactly how she needed to see it, but she needed to have her ‘good guys / bad guys’ viewfinder recalibrated.

Calibrations were a specialty of Gabriel’s. Castiel’s, not so much.

Sometimes you had to take the bull by the horns and rip the band-aid right off.

Sarah was one of the good guys, regardless of which metaphors Gabe had to slaughter to get from here to there, and they needed her on their side. She wasn’t a child though. It was time she saw what they were up against for herself. It was time for an ape to see why the ends sometimes justified the means, even when you really, really wished they didn’t. It was time to show her what Castiel needed from her, and why.

And it was time to introduce the young researcher to his little brother, the Alpha Doctor Castiel James Novak Winchester.

There’s no way she would ever believe it from someone else.

She would believe Gabriel. People always believed Gabriel – possibly because Gabe nearly always told the truth.

How psychopathic was that?

Chapter End Notes

I promised someone more movement than I squeezed into this chapter. I'm still thinking maybe three more chapters to go. Something like that? Don't quote me. I suck at guesstimating my own verbosity. Anyway, I hope you enjoyed.

For anyone who might not have guessed before now whether Castiel ever really went there when we went dark side...yeah. He totally did. But what's an angel without a bit of devil in him? He's not that guy anymore, but he's still 'That-guy-adjacent', so make of that what you will.

Finally, no, Sarah isn't a self-insert. That would be Maureen. Sarah is way cooler than I am.

Love and hugs! Chins up, stiff upper lips, Winchesters don't cry, damnit.
Chapter 107

Chapter Summary

April, Michael, and Sarah all make strides toward the careers they want. Cas and Dean have tough choices to make.

Chapter Notes

I got super lazy at some point about noting trigger warnings. That was rude of me. Apologies.

There's a D.F. in this one, but that's the only warning I have today.

Carry on.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

Chapter 107 – Friday, August 25, 2017

NOW:

Cas and April went separate ways early Friday morning. April waited patiently while Castiel signed her custody temporarily over to Nicholas’ alpha. The two alphas held a brief consultation in private, and then Castiel left her with a knee-buckling kiss and a reminder to behave as if he were with her at all times. Nick smirked, but he also assured his friend that no harm would come to April while she was on their home turf.

“She’s fine, Alpha,” he promised. “This is my home. You think I’d let anything happen to her here?”

Cas smiled grimly. “Call me if you need anything, Kitten. I’ll drop everything and come for you. Jenn has permission to spank if it comes to that, so don’t test her. But, baby, have fun and accomplish whatever you can while you’re here. Get in there and start building yourself a network. That’s what you’re here for. This is a workday for you, not a vacation, not yet. Enjoy yourself. I’ve lifted the restrictions on what you may eat and drink. Please don’t allow yourself to become inebriated. You need your wits and your dexterity. I’ll meet you later tonight.”

April grinned and took his forearm near the elbow, cutting him off in a polite way. “I know what you expect of me,” she said conspiratorially. “I’ll be good. I’ll make you proud. See you late tonight, Alpha mine.” She leaned in for another kiss, and his lips didn’t want to let the moment go.

Castiel spent the day in meetings. He had fundraising to do. He had lobbying to accomplish, despite being in the wrong city. There were people here whose ears ran direct connections to the voting buttons in Washington D.C. Castiel had work to do and insufficient time to accomplish it all. Billie’s presence was sorely missed, but he managed without her. By the end of the day, nearly all of his goals were met except for keeping himself fed. He was starving, having worked straight through lunch. He trudged down the hall to his hotel room exhausted and ready to call it a day.

Cas showered and changed into a smart dress blazer and pressed navy slacks. Checking up on his mate found her precisely where she’d promised to be, at an exclusive party organized by Nicholas and filled with music industry insiders. Cas suppressed another frisson of fear knowing that she wasn’t where he could protect her and might at this moment be encircled by sharks. He’d been fighting those clenches all day, and it was wearing on him. He breathed through it, working his shoulders. He couldn’t protect her every second of every day, not if she was doing this. His bond told him she was fine, a little tired, a little overwhelmed, but not alarmed or threatened. His phone held a short string of check-ins, none of them disturbing. She was fine.

Still, he wasted no time in hailing a cab and making his way straight to the penthouse Nick called home. Cas wended his way through the throng, catching snippets of music emanating from several rooms at once. It was a party in appearance, but it was business; a place where offers were made and new connections were formed, where demos sought an invested ear, where ‘up-and-comers’ attempted to transition to ‘arrived’. Castiel suppressed his need to rush straight to her side. He plucked a glass of white wine off a passing tray and sauntered lazily among the ambitious and the talented. He heard his name fall quietly from strangers’ lips as he passed them without engaging, both his old name and his new, but he didn’t turn. Let them talk. This evening was about April, not Castiel.

His Mating-bond flared warmly when she sensed his proximity, and he chuckled to himself. He’d sneaked up on her it seemed, but it was a pleasant surprise. Cas rounded the open glass doorway onto the rooftop garden, and he spotted her. She was beautiful and glowing as her eyes searched out his. Nick had her by the hand, and the two of them were in the middle of telling a story or joke to several others, men and women, apes and wolves. April’s eyes shone with vibrant life and amusement, and she fairly glistened in the moonlight. She appeared to be holding court alongside Nicholas Maraby, the darling of Broadway. Pride and ownership erupted in Castiel’s breast, and he smiled softly. April’s eyes flicked across the rooftop, and she grinned back at him, but she didn’t stop her story.

Cas found Jenn leaning placidly against an enormous topiary planter, out of the way and mostly ignored – a bodyguard more than a participant.
“How’d it go today, alpha?” he asked, coming alongside and taking a place beside her. He selected another glass of wine from a passing waiter and handed it to her. She took it with a simple nod.

“It’s a good thing that girl’s already Mated, Castiel. Nicholas thinks he’s in love with her.”

“Is that so?” asked Cas unperturbed, puffing his chest out a little, preening in the knowledge that he owned the most desired of Omegas.

“Truth be told, everyone’s in love with her,” the alpha told him. She caught his eye and rolled hers. “You can deflate now, Alpha. You’ll pop a button. Aren’t you supposed to be mad with jealousy?”

He grinned at her and glanced back toward his mate. “I have nothing to fear, Jenn. She knows who she belongs to.”

“Well, to answer your question, she was a perfectly angelic Omega all day: sweet, polite, charming. I might fall smitten myself if I wasn’t immune to that kind of thing.” Jenn downed her glass in three big gulps.

Cas was lost in watching his mate, watching her entourage.

“Is that the alpha Nick picked out for her?” he asked, eyeing a blue-eyed man with a veritable mane of lustrous silver hair. The man was handsome and tall, charismatic.

“Yes. That’s Darius Cain. He’s had his hand in three quarters of all the Grammy winners for the past two decades in one way or another. Real insider. Knows everyone and everyone owes him a favor. Never known him to consider cutting ties with top performers to focus on only one act before, especially not someone completely unknown and untested, but he hasn’t been more than five feet from April’s side all night. He’s campaigning hard. He wants this gig, Castiel. Wants it bad.”

“Can he help her?”

“Probably better than anyone else living.”

“Will he be good for her?”

“Oh, well, that’s a different question,” Jenn replied airily. Cas turned abruptly, seeking explanation. “Depends on what you mean by ‘good for her’. He’s going to push her, Castiel. He’s not easy to sway from his own ideas. He’s stubborn. I get the sense that April and Nick have butted heads in the creative arena, and she’s won some of those rounds. If that’s the case, your mate may be able to hold her own with Cain, but I warn you, she won’t ever be able to give him an inch, or he’ll take the reins and run with them.”

“Can he serve as a suitable chaperone?” Cas asked impatiently. Whatever creative disputes they got into weren’t Cas’ concern. He wanted her safe. “I know what my research shows. I want your opinion. I’m not hiring just a business manager for my mate, Jennifer, I need a bodyguard and an alpha chaperone. Is this Cain the right alpha for the job?”

Jenn scoffed. “Not to put too fine a point on it here, Alpha, but if he fucks up, are your henchmen going to show up at my door at three in the morning and take the failure out of my ass? This really isn’t any of my business.”

“I don’t have henchmen,” he insisted. “I’m not the Mob.” He ignored her snort and went on. “You know I trust your opinion, but I would never hold you responsible for what comes of this decision. It’s mine, and it’s April’s. All I need is your input, if you’re willing to give it.”
Jenn sighed and looked back out across the rooftop. People were dancing. There was a weird little drumming circle in the corner. Someone played lightly on Nick’s grand piano. Her voice when she continued took on a tone that was characteristically alpha. His eyes narrowed as he listened. A breeze brought the scent of pot wafting across the roof.

“He’s good, Cas. He’s Submissive, so he’s not about to challenge your Claim even in the slightest, although you already know that. What you want to know is will he see it through whether she hits the big time or not, or will he scurry off to the next protégé. Does he have the grit and the judgment to keep her balanced when she’s hundreds of miles from you and having a meltdown? Can he keep her safe from dangers external and internal both?”

“And?”

“I don’t know him well personally, mind you, but all of my instincts say he’s the right man for your mate. Of course, what you really need is for him to fall under her spell. You need him to feel honored to swear her his life and to be ready to throw his body in front of a train to save hers. And you need him to hold firm in the face of her tantrums and deal her the severity she needs to get back on her own feet. Nothing less than that will ever be enough for you, Castiel, but to get that, you have to make him Pack and let him love her like family. Can you do that? This guy’s loyalty, if he gives it, will be total. Can you live with that? She’ll have her own personal Galahad; a Galahad with a paddle in his pocket and a knot on his cock.”

Cas inhaled stiffly through his nose. That was the real question. Could he stomach what he really needed from April’s new ‘Business Manager’? He would be so much more than that. But April couldn’t begin to have a successful career if she was tied hand and foot to Castiel’s side, and she couldn’t go winging across the world without alpha support. Cas wanted as few people playing roadie for her as he could manage. Cain was well-positioned to play several roles at once.

Dean was going to throw a fit. Bringing another alpha-Sub under the roof was a risky plan. In truth, it was a business arrangement. Castiel didn’t have to bring him into the fold. No one had so much as suggested doing that with Rowena, the new agent. But this was different. Cas needed him to be Pack, or the Alpha’s stalwart wolf would never be able to abide knowing that the substitute might have to knot April if her Heat hit unexpectedly or if her wolf needed a D.F. that Castiel couldn’t provide while she was too far away for him to reach her quickly enough. He needed to let the man guide his mate in all manner of ways, and he needed to stay out of the way.

Castiel felt himself pause upon the uncertain choices of a forked road. From here, their future together balanced upon the pinnacle of choice. From here, he proved to himself and his mate if he truly meant to allow her a path of her own, or if he was all talk. She couldn’t do it without an alpha chaperone. It would fall apart before she ever began. But was he deluding himself about how far he could stretch without breaking? Cas thought of Michael and his determination in the face of Castiel’s spit-slaying fury. Michael had trusted him further than he’d trusted himself.

Cas ran a metaphysical hand down the flank of his shuddering wolf. (Easy there, my friend), he soothed. (We can do this. If we love her, we have no choice.)

April shot him another glance across the space, and smiled a private smile. Castiel nodded and lifted his glass. Her head tilted in impatient sufferance, and she beckoned him with her hand. He chuckled and pushed off the planter.

“Excuse me, Jenn. I’m being summoned.”

“Good luck, Alpha,” his colleague called softly. “Don’t eat him.”
Saturday passed in a whirlwind of carefully prepared meetings and work sessions. April spent the morning with Nick’s creative team. She was thrilled to reunite with Damon, Jackson, and even Keira, whom April still felt guilty about using to incite Michael to finally make a move on her weeks ago, a lifetime ago. The young alpha violinist didn’t hold a grudge. She’d been playing the same game from the opposite side in effort to get a tumble from Jackson, notoriously hard to tumble.

It was thrilling to watch professionals putting honest effort to turning April’s notes into music. Men and women in the prime of their careers rehearsed her piece, listening attentively to her when Nick forced her to take the podium to talk through her intentions, through her mindset when she’d put it all together. They nodded in understanding, and some of them scribbled notes on their sheet music in response to what she told them. It was intoxicating. Behind her, Nick gloated.

After she’d relinquished the podium back to the conductor, and the starched woman had swirled her baton, and music swirled into life, April covered her mouth with both hands, overcome. People kept dropping by: producers, record label representatives, talented artists, people who knew people, and people who knew Nicholas. Everyone shook her hand. Everyone slipped her their business cards. Several of them coaxed her into joining them in tickling out a song while the rest of the team disappeared for a break. April was spinning, mind and body, and she let go and went wherever Nick took her. She sang in brief moments when someone encouraged her. She played the piano in the great orchestral rehearsal space when they asked her for a quick once-through. She felt herself tumbling with the rapid-fire tumult, and she let herself flip and turn in the deluge. She trusted. Someone would ground her if she began to drift away. Someone would tether her to the floor before she disappeared into the sky.

Castiel was not present, and her wolf began to panic. He’d left her with Nick and a promise to return to take her to lunch. Surely, she needed his strength. Should she call for him? Was he busy? She couldn’t remember when he’d vanished if he’d told her where he was going.

“Whoa, there, baby cakes,” Nick said, catching her elbow. “Come with me. Let’s get you somewhere quiet for a minute. Damn, kiddo, you fall fast.” He led her down a narrow hallway and they slipped into a tiny practice room, just an upright piano, a few plastic chairs, and some folded music stands in the corner. He set her into one of the chairs and knelt down in front of her, checking her eyes. He snapped his fingers in her face.

She startled. She scrabbled a bit in her chair, feeling suddenly as if the ground had dropped out from beneath her.

“April. Baby, can you see me? Are your ears ringing? Focus, sweetheart. Focus and breathe. I’m going to call Cas. Hold on for me.”

“Alpha,” she murmured.

“Don’t go passing out on me, kiddo. My ass hasn’t healed from the last time I got a good blistering. I’m in for it if you lose consciousness.” Nick pulled out his phone and hit speed dial.

“Hey, Alpha,” Nick said cheerfully into his phone. “No, nothing’s wrong. Why do you ask? … No she’s okay. It’s just…Are you nearby? Could you maybe drop by? We’re breaking early for lunch, and she wants to share it with…. Well, yeah, she’s here. I could put her on, but she’s kinda in the middle of… Yes, Alpha. Here she is.”

Nick bit his lip and held his phone out with a shaky hand. “He wants to speak to you.”

April dove for the phone.

“Cas? Alpha?” she whimpered. “Can you come get me? I need you.” She began to snifflle without warning, and she blinked back tears that hadn’t been there the moment before.

Cas found the room they’d tucked into with no problem. He wrenched the door open with a curt, “Nicholas, get out. Wait in the hall.” And then he closed himself in with his mate. Chamber rooms in Nick’s rented work space were high-tech and completely sound proof, so Nick couldn’t hear what they were doing in there, but his feet registered the concussion from her Release when it hit. When they came out, April looked weary, splotchy, and a bit on the tender side, but her eyes had cleared, and her step was lighter. Cas guided her out by the hand. He whispered into her ear, and she nodded and scurried down the hall to the restroom.

Cas turned to face Nick.

“Where’s Jenn?” the Alpha asked straight off.

“She’s working. She doesn’t babysit me when I’m at the studio.”

Castiel didn’t respond. He waited. Nick fidgeted, leaning casually against the wall but feeling less casual as the clock ticked the seconds away.

“She’s fine, Alpha,” Nick protested. “Everything happened exactly the way it’s supposed to. April got to try an independent hand at things for a few hours. You got to practice leaving her to it. We noticed a fall before it got out of hand, and we called out for assistance. This is a win, Cas. Full win all the way around.”

“No one told me the two of you would be unchaperoned this morning.”

“You didn’t ask.”

“I’m in no mood to be played with this morning, Omega. April and I are leaving. I hope you got what you need from her, because she’s done for the day.” Cas pivoted and began stalking down the hall.

“Cas, wait! Listen to me. This wasn’t a failure, man. I’m telling you. It’s a resounding success. She did it, and she was brilliant. She’s got this. It was too much at once, maybe.” At that admission, Nick huffed and rubbed the back of his neck. “I probably shouldn’t have brought in as many contacts as I did, but we only had about 24 hours to pack it all in, and there are so many people who need to see and hear her, get to know her and not just take it from me. I’m telling you, she’s won folks over already. That pup’s train is pulling out of the station just from this one visit. I’m already hearing collaboration ideas whispered in my ear. She’s gonna get proposals from this, Alpha. She’s on the gameboard. That takes presence. She needed to be here in person.”
“Nicholas, building the career she wants is not a one-weekend, overnight, instantaneous explosion. It’s going to take time, and at this point, her welfare takes precedence over squeezing in one more meeting. You were reckless. We talked about easing her into finding her feet, not drowning her in clamoring faces. You told me that this morning was a workshop for your show. If you had kept your word, this wouldn’t have happened. You can expect me to be much slower to trust you with her wellbeing again any time soon.”

Nick looked away. He scratched his arm. He scuffed a foot at the carpet. He looked back at Castiel. “She’s gonna be big, Castiel. It might take time, you’re right. But it might not. If the show hits the critics the way I expect it to, she’ll be the next big thing. You can’t be poised waiting in the wings to come sweeping in to save her every time she feels woozy. You have work of your own.”

“I understand that,” Cas gritted between his teeth. “That’s why I intend to see that she has appropriate support whenever I can’t be with her, not just leave her alone and hope she doesn’t falter. If I had known that you invited throngs of people to your practice session to ogle her like a Van Gogh exhibition, I wouldn’t have left her with you. Nicholas, let me be perfectly clear. April does no work of any kind in public or outside of our home without a responsible alpha onsite and devoted to her welfare. None.”

April emerged freshly scrubbed from the restroom. The pink splotches on her face were fading fast. Cas held a hand out to her without looking round, and she slid her small hand into his large one.

“You have an alpha in mind, then,” Nick asked, unperturbed by the Alpha’s anger.

Cas glanced at April, and she nodded slightly back. “Yes, we’re leaning toward offering the job to Darius Cain. April feels he’s well-suited. She likes him. He strikes me as competent in all the areas we need him to be. His background checks out. And my conversation with him this morning confirmed that he’s a good fit.”

“And you have our gratitude,” Cas told him shortly. “I would like to remind you that in future, kindly make no promises to a potential employee of mine that I haven’t signed off on. Alpha Cain had some odd ideas about what I would be offering him by way of contractual benefits. He’s been disabused of those ideas. Watch it, Nicholas. You overstep.”

“Jesus, you’re cranky these days,” Nick grumbled.

“And you haven’t changed at all,” Cas shot back. He turned to April. “Have you got everything? Ready to go?”

“Yes, Alpha,” she told him placidly. “Bye, Nick. Thanks for everything. I hope Jenn takes it easy on you.”

“Don’t count on it,” Nick told her with a twinkle in his eye and a wink. He watched them walk away and then called, “Oh, hey. Kiddo. I need that revision by the fourth. Got another session coming up, and we can’t rehearse if we’ve got no piece.”

She raised her hand in acknowledgment without turning.
Instead of returning to their hotel room, Cas took her to Central Park, and they walked hand in hand in the sunshine, still hot and a bit muggy.

“How did your meetings go yesterday?” April asked awkwardly. Why did she feel awkward? Where was this shyness coming from?

“They went well,” he answered just as stiffly, leading her onto a turn in the path, wandering aimlessly it seemed, and yet still directing their way. “I accomplished what I came for. We’ve got funding to expand in Dallas to meet the projected growth there, although I’m looking forward to the day we stop relying on donations so heavily for capital projects. It’s not sustainable, and it’s not the business model we want to follow.”

She nodded, unsure how to respond and feeling out of her depth.

“And, as a bonus to the day’s success,” he continued, squeezing her hand. “We managed to flip three votes on the bill we need passed on Monday. They aren’t the representatives we’d counted on initially, but a vote is a vote, and it looks like we may be making inroads to cement some new alliances in Washington. That’s never a bad thing.”

“I’m glad,” she told him succinctly, smiling up at him. He turned his blue eyes to her, and he huffed softly and kissed her knuckles.

“Don’t worry, Kitten. You’ll learn it just as I did. Don’t be intimidated. Politics and business are pools I swim in out of necessity. I don’t enjoy them any more than you do. My real work is at The Facility. But, if it’s all right with you, I’d like to share some of my observations and frustrations with you. I’d like to be free to talk about what I’ve got on my plate. If you don’t want that, I can keep it to myself. Or talk to Dean instead, I suppose. Not that he’s a substitute… Jesus, I didn’t mean it like that…”

April laughed. “It’s fine, Cas. Talk to Dean or talk to me. I don’t mind listening as long as you don’t expect me to have an M.B.A. or anything. I’m not lost from what you said. You’re good at making it simpler than it probably really is. I like it when you lean into me at the end of the day. I like it a lot. It’s just that I feel young and ignorant. I don’t like being so unprepared, so naïve. But you’re patient with me, and you’ve never made me feel stupid.”

“That’s because you’re anything but stupid,” he confirmed staunchly. “And what you do with music…Kitten, I’m completely lost most of the time. I watch you working, and I’m in awe. You disappear inside the notes, and the sense I get through our bond is breathtaking. I could watch you for hours. I’ve loved music all my life, but it’s never felt like this before you played that piano in our house. You bring emotions out of me that I never knew were there. You let it sweep you up and take you far away, and I have the privilege of riding along with you, totally out of my element and totally immersed in something I could never reach on my own.”

They walked in silence for a while. Cas chose the route at random, and April followed easily.

“Thanks for coming for me this morning,” April said, her eyes on the ducks crossing the path in front of them. She received another squeeze to her hand and a soft caress within her bond.

“I will always come when you need me,” he said softly, almost shyly. “I shouldn’t have left you in the first place.”

“I needed to experience that today,” she told him. “It won’t always be that crazy. Nick got carried away. He wants me to know so many people, Cas, and I need to be capable of handling it.” She thought for a moment. “It was terrifying, but also exciting. People are taking my music seriously, Alpha. The orchestra, they listened to me. Here I am, only eighteen years old, and people in their sixties were listening to me. People from the record labels have my music demos now. I didn’t even know Nick was compiling them from what I sent him, but he’s been distributing my music all over the place, and some of the people I met today have already heard my songs.”

Cas felt the sudden spike of anxiety run down her spine, and he pulled her closer and wrapped an arm around her. He leaned in to kiss her temple. “I’ve got you, love,” he reassured. “You’re going to be just fine. You can do this.”

She leaned her head to the side and rested it against his shoulder for a few steps. “Alpha, I’m sorry about Michael, about the position I’ve put you in over him.”

It came out of the blue, and he sucked in a deep breath and pulled himself up to his full height, dislodging her closeness. “April, you don’t owe me an apology. I told you that.”

“Please, Cas. I need to say this. Can we sit?”

Cas slowed to a stop and closed his eyes for a moment, reminding himself that this was precisely the point of their trip. His lips tightened briefly into a straight line, and his hand gripped hers, then he nodded and opened his eyes, exhaling hard. “All right.” He led her to a nearby bench in the shade and they sat side-by-side. April winced a little, but once she was seated, it didn’t hurt much.

“The thing is,” she started, focusing on her hands in her lap. “I went after him first. No matter how you look at it, I was wrong to do that, and it was an affront to my bond with you. I hurt you. I hurt Michael. I hurt Dean. I had my reasons, but I didn’t have the right to play games with people the way I did, least of all you. Even if I wasn’t Omega, I wouldn’t have that right. I’m your mate. I feel so awful, and there’s no fixing it now. I can’t make this right, Alpha. I’m so sorry.”

April risked a look up at her mate. He was staring across the park toward the water in the distance, pain etched at the corners of his eyes. His hands sat still on his knees. His body was a broken series of stiff lines. Every time he blinked, the red ring around his irises advanced a little to subsume the blue.

Finally, he sighed. “April, I can’t pretend I’m not hurt. I can’t fix this for you any more than I can for myself. I really don’t want to discuss it. But I know that ignoring it isn’t going to make it go away. I’m angry, and I’m hurt, and I feel like an enormous fool not to have seen it for what it is. In retrospect, everything looks so clear. I can’t imagine how I missed it. You stepped way out of bounds to deliberately pursue a man you have no rights to when your bond and his are already spoken for. You had no right to manipulate his feelings. You couldn’t possibly have controlled every eventuality well enough to protect everyone involved and insure that no one was hurt. You were utterly reckless with your own Pack. And you betrayed me. Me. Your mate. When I would die to keep you safe. Am I hurt? Yes, Kitten. I was devastated.”

“Cas…” she sighed fruitlessly, and he took her hand.

“But I’m as much at fault as you are, and I need to take accountability too. No, listen to me, Omega.” She’d pulled up and away, but he held her hand firmly. “Everything you said about me is true. I’m presumptive. I’m conceited. I discounted you and your depth out of a sense of superiority that I don’t deserve to hold. I steamrollered you into my own image of what I wanted you to be without ever bothering to look closely at who you really are. After meeting you father, I believe that’s probably something you’ve been experiencing your entire life, and I’m so sorry.”
She frowned and looked away. His pain and hers crested within the two of them, and it hurt physically. She fought to hold back tears. The last thing she wanted this time was to manipulate him, and tears were an unfair advantage.

“You blessed me with the most gracious, generous gift that anyone’s ever given me in my life. You willingly moved aside to make room for Dean in our lives. April, I can’t put words to what that sacrifice says about you, and what it says about me that I snatched at the chance the second it was uttered. Maybe it was a betrayal of our bond for you to go after Michael, but it was no less a betrayal that I dropped you off on Jo’s doorstep and went after Dean the first chance I got. The difference, clearly, the only real difference, is that I’m Alpha, and you’re not. Kitten, that breaks every moral code I have. It’s not who I want to be. It’s not how I define myself, and I’m ashamed of myself for ever thinking I had the right to a partner outside of my bond with you, and you don’t. Please, can you ever forgive me?”

“You secondary and tertiaries aren’t trifles, Alpha,” she said. “We can’t pretend everyone is the same. You’re struggling with them right now. I can feel it. You fight so hard. Every day. I don’t ever want to be something that causes you that kind of struggle. I want to be your place of peace, Cas, not another…”

“April,” he cut her off. “There are times when the struggle is necessary. When my wolf and my alpha are wrong, they need to corrected, just like everyone else. Avoiding that only makes it worse. Yes, I’m working on two fronts right now, but that’s my job. They are mine to manage, not yours.”

She nodded sadly, reaching up to his face to caress his jawline, to lend him her unique type of strength. It was different than his, and she wanted him to have all the armament he could use. He leaned into her touch, and his eyes slipped closed again. “You’re so strong,” she whispered. “I’m proud to be yours, Alpha.”

He smiled and kissed her palm. “I’m proud to be yours as well.”

“Will we be okay?” April asked.

His eyes opened slowly. He looked right into her eyes. “April Renée, if you’ll forgive my transgression, I have an enormous favor to ask you. I mean to marry another. I mean to make him my husband and to affix his name just below mine in Pack rank, and I don’t ever mean to discuss with you again the relative right or wrong of that decision. I need you to tell me right now if that’s going to eat away at our bond. I need to be sure. Please don’t lie. I need to be sure.”

April held his gaze bravely. “Castiel James,” she bit her lip as she worked out how to say it. “I adore your fiancé. I can’t imagine life without him. I’d be honored to welcome him into our Pack and to make room beside us…” She narrowed her eyes in an attempt to convey the depth of her commitment. “…Between us sometimes. You have my blessing to marry. Let’s stop wringing our hands and just make ourselves happy, can’t we? Please?”

His eyes held hers. He dug down inside her, and he wasn’t subtle about it. His nostrils flared. She didn’t hide or dodge. Her eyes blazed gold, and his reddened. “Michael will make you happy?” he asked.

“I’m in love with him,” she said.

“Will he make you happy?” Castiel insisted.

“I can’t answer that unless we try exploring what we feel and how to make space for it. I don’t know. I think so.” Her face flickered with doubt and hope and worry. Cas lifted his chin and pulled her in to rest her head against his chest.

“You’re amazing, Kitten.” He rested his chin on her head. “I love you.”

She answered him internally rather than out loud, but her affection flowed unencumbered, and he let it warm him.

“Cas?”

“Hm?”

“Is it weird that I still want you to play a…parental kind of role for me? Am I sick to get off on that?”

He laughed at the sweetness of the question, and the heavy tension popped like a bubble.

“There’s a reason you and I are True-mates, April,” he said. “That role fulfills me just as it does you. I find it erotic and powerful. I love it.”

“But, it’s…unhealthy…isn’t it? It’s like I’m a child inside my head. Doesn’t that mean something’s wrong with me?”

“Not at all,” he assured her. “We all respond to what we respond to. There’s no right or wrong to it unless we act on it outside of the strictures of ‘competent, consensual, adult’ decisions. It would be wrong of me to force you to play a role that made you uncomfortable, but if you and I align in our desires, nothing we do together to fulfill ourselves is wrong.”

She mulled that over a little. “Have you ever stepped over that line, Alpha?”

Cas sat her back up. “Yes,” he confessed with a sigh and a deliberate look into her eyes, back to their usual blue as his were. “Not where minors were involved,” he clarified rapidly. “But I was terrible at understanding consent when I was young and inexperienced. My wolf took more from my partners than he was granted license to take. I owed apologies an embarrassing number of times to people who were extremely patient with me. I have not always had the level of control I have now.”

“Did you ever sleep with Nick?” April asked spontaneously.

Cas blushed deeply. “Um…yes. We were roommates for three years. We tried several variations of sexual relationships. None of them worked for us, and we eventually concluded we’re incompatible, shook hands, and agreed to seek fulfillment elsewhere.”

April gaped at him, and Cas blushed deeper. “I’m a man like any other, April. Once I finally allowed myself to experience mutuality in sex, I struggled to set limits. Mostly, I turned to my friend Marie and to my roommate, but I admit that I was rather insatiable for a time.”

“Benny?”

“No. Benny has never been more than a friend and colleague. Unless you count D.F.s, which I don’t.”

“You’ve dominated Benny?”

Cas nodded seriously, this time unembarrassed. “We had to settle our hierarchy or there’s no way we could’ve worked together. It still comes up every couple of years. I expect it probably always will.”

“What would happen if he Topped you?”
“He won’t.” Cas broke their gaze and looked back out over the lake.

“Then why keep trying?”

“Because it’s our nature to solidify our relative status when it becomes uncertain. We are creatures of instinct, April. We are slaves to our nature, and that’s not a bad thing. It suits us.”

She watched him for a moment. His eyes seemed ancient. The lines on his face spoke of experiences she would never comprehend. She realized she really didn’t know him at all. Not really. Not the way Benny and Nick did. Not like Dean. Or Gabe.

“Cas, have you ever done something that you’re really ashamed of?”

He snorted without looking at her. “Many things,” he admitted.

“Are you really a Mob boss in secret?”

“No,” he said simply. “But it may be a matter of semantics. I have a network of people who accomplish things for me without publicizing themselves. At the end of the day, I don’t suppose there’s really much of a difference except that nothing that I accomplish that way is for personal gain. Maybe I’m fooling myself that the distinction matters.”

April crossed her ankles and settled her hands in her lap primly. “It makes a difference to me,” she told him. “Mob bosses harm people for power and wealth. You don’t.”

He humphed.

“That brings up another question I’ve been wondering about,” she said.

“Shoot. I’ll answer anything.”

“Where does your wealth come from?”

That earned her a chuckle. “Inheritance, mostly. And good business decisions. My paternal line had quite the talent for amassing wealth going back about five generations – ever since wolves first joined modern society. The Novaks were geniuses at business, and it grew from there. We lost quite a bit to inheritance taxes once they were enacted, but there’s always enough remaining to build on, and a good business mind at the helm did the rest. Of course, that lineage broke with me. I’m terrible at business. I take advice from Gabriel, and I leave what I can in the hands of my Board of Directors. I try to stay out of their way as long as things are going relatively well.”

“You have a whole other business besides the ACRI?” April asked in dismay, and he looked at her with a brow lifted.

“We have an empire, April. You’re part owner in Novak Industries now, as are Dean and Michael.” He seemed astonished that she hadn’t known that. They stared at each other.

“Does Dean know?”

“Of course.”

“And Michael?”

“Michael has met with the Board twice to settle up the alignment of the Pack with the direction of the business ventures.”
She stared at her mate.

“Jesus Christ, April, I’m sorry. I keep fucking up. I didn’t even realize it had never come up. I wasn’t keeping it from you. I don’t think you’re…incapable of participating. It’s just that I have an almost grotesque dislike of the business ventures, and I pay them as little attention as I can get away with. Shit. I’ll introduce you to the Board as soon as we get home.”

“What kind of business is it?” she asked, totally shocked.

“Logistics and transport, mostly. Our biggest single role is in overland trucking of goods.”

She didn’t know what to say. “You’re a shipping magnate?”

He chuckled at the absurdity. “As are you, if you want to be specific.”

April shook her head in dismay. “What else don’t I know about you?” She let her eyes wander across the blue sky, speckled with late summer clouds. “Have you ever murdered anyone?” she asked as a means of throwing out the most outlandish query she could come up with. The silence that followed had her head whipping around. “Cas?”

“Yes,” he told her, pale lines marking the tension in his face. His eyes skittered between hers, from one to the other and back again. “Yes,” he repeated, stronger. “I’m not proud of myself, but I can’t take it back, and I can’t pretend I wouldn’t do the same thing all over again.”

“With your own hands?” she pressed daringly. He held, and he nodded.

She frowned, working him apart in her head. “You did it for Gabriel,” she guessed astutely, and he only nodded in reply. Fierce anger left an echo in his eyes. His brow twitched, but he stayed mute. He let her rifle inside his head. He opened his mind to her, scared out of his wits, fully aware that he’d let her past the point of no return, and she a mere teenager from Oklahoma with no frame of reference to digest something like murder in the wider scheme of things.

Her eyes narrowed, and her face hardened. Out of nowhere, she slapped him hard across the cheek with her full arm behind it. His head flew to the side and reddened. He snarled, nostrils flaring, and he whipped back around and caught her wrist, his eyes blazing hot. She glared right back, letting him hold her without acknowledgment.

“Don’t ever keep secrets like that from me,” she insisted furiously. “We’re in this together, or we’re nothing.”

He panted harshly through his nose, processing everything, glaring at her, hating himself as he’d not done in years, hating her for bringing him back to that place. They’d fallen wildly out of balance in their heads in the sparest of instants, and that couldn’t stand. It stung that she had a point, and it stung that her handprint blossomed on his cheek.

No one struck the Alpha.

No one.

Castiel released his wolf.

He was an instinctive creature, bound to obey his nature, and his nature was livid.

The wolf used his hold on her wrist to flatten her body out along the bench facedown. He clambered over her, growling harshly in her ear and slobbering along her throat. Her pants disappeared with a body-heaving tug that took her shoes along. All of it ended up tossed carelessly into the dirt. April squawked and scrambled for balance and footing. He pressed his chest and hips into her back to hold her still.

“Don’t ever do that again,” he hissed. “Not for any reason.”

Without waiting for a reply, he hitched his own clothing aggressively downward and he pressed into her, all the way in, all the way past his knot, all in one violent thrust. April panted and struggled for balance. One of her legs caught in the tight space between the bench seat and its back. The other fell unsupported off the front. Castiel had a foot planted firmly on the ground and his other knee on the bench between her legs. He fucked into her hard, angry, vicious, and she cried out in pain. His hand tangled in her hair and pulled her head back, lengthening her throat. His other hand pulling against her shoulder gave him leverage to take her brutally, and he did so, his wolf fully engaged with no hold whatsoever.

Castiel pummeled her painfully, losing himself to the message, letting his alter ego express itself for once. It didn’t take long for the tension to build and to crest, for the Claim to echo beneath the tree and his knot to lock itself inside her channel. Her roared in victory, and he bit down on her Mating-scar, breaking it open, and pulling a scream from his mate. Castiel spilled his seed inside his mate, and he overflowed his fury into her head.

When the pulsing ended, he lay braced on top of her, one foot on the ground, his fingers knotted in her hair, panting desperately, blood tracing his lips. He stilled and then let his head fall to rest between her shoulder blades. April lay still, her own breathlessness mirroring his.

On the pathway before them, park-goers walked on without pausing. No one in Manhattan cared what wolves did.

They didn’t try to sit up for several minutes. They didn’t speak out loud. Inside their heads was a different story. Within the bond, the Ozzie Submitted wholly. The Dominant wolf’s glare softened to that of an appeased nobleman, possibly a Kraken who had accepted the virgin sacrifice and relinquished his hold over the village. For now. The wolf sauntered back into the shade and flopped back down. They found peace. They found balance.

What a fucked up world it was.

Cas untangled his fingers from her hair and attempted to smooth it back into its silky sheets. He kissed her back. He eased her upright carefully, settling them into a seated position with his mate in his lap, bare from the waist down. He rubbed surreptitiously at his cheek. The sting was brighter than he would’ve credited her with if he hadn’t felt it for himself. He felt sympathy for Michael knowing she’d landed more than one of those slaps across Michael’s cheek as well. Of course, Michael wasn’t alpha, and that made a difference.

“Perhaps in future,” he said quietly into her ear. “You can find an alternative method to communicate your displeasure. Slapping your Dominant is never going to be acceptable. I will respond with a forceful reminder of our respective positions every time, so it will behoove you to learn the lesson this time.”

She chuckled and dropped her head back to rest against his shoulder.

“Yes, Alpha.”

He kissed her temple again, longer this time, lingering with his lips pressed into her messy hair.
“Whoever you killed,” she said very quietly. “Is the world a better place without him?”

He took a deep breath and wrapped her up in his arms, putting his forehead into the sore mess at her shoulder and ignoring the smear of blood on his face. “Them,” he clarified. “And yes, but that’s no excuse.”

“Is the Pack safer?”

“April, I’ve had this fight with Dean already. I’m not surprised that you’re of the same camp. The two of you put more faith in my leadership than I deserve. We don’t live in a vigilant society where might makes right, and we are free to do as we see fit in defense of our families. What I’ve done – I cannot ever make that right. It was wrong, even in the knowledge that I would make the same choices again. There is no easy answer. What I can do is play an offensive game and avert any need ever to have to make choices like that again. I protect my Pack proactively, do you understand? I watch out for dangers before they arise, and I divert them.”

“I understand,” she said. “That’s why you need the network that isn’t a Mob. You’re running interference out front of us.”

“Precisely.”

“So,” she said abruptly after several silent minutes, changing the pace. He lifted his head. “We both finished everything we needed to do for work. The rest of the weekend is ours?”

“It is.”

“And we’re together in New York City.”

“Just the two of us,” he agreed.

“And except for the fact that we’re stuck on this bench until your knot deflates, we have all that time to ourselves.”

“We have show tickets tonight for eight o’clock and tomorrow’s matinee at two,” he reminded her. “Everything else is ours to choose. What would you like to do?”

“Lunch,” she said assertively. “D.F.s make me hungry.”

“Me too,” he laughed.

“Then, maybe The Met? You can show me what it is about art that you love so much. I’ve spent my whole life so focused on music, I don’t know what else there is out there in the world. Would you share your love of paintings with me? I’ll try not to scoff and say that I could’ve painted that when I was five.”

He laughed again. “Some of it deserves that,” he admitted. “Not everything that’s mounted to a wall is a masterpiece. I’d love to take you to The Met with me though. It’s a date. We can start to expand your myopic artistic experience. After lunch of course. And we’ll keep it short. You can’t possibly digest a museum like that in one visit.”

She snuggled into his lap, tugging at his knot and loving the feeling of solidified placement. The apes strolling by could never understand how perfectly safe and cherished she felt when her Alpha wolf flattened her and set her straight. What was a little pain when the end result was an immersion in adoration this deep?
“I have no idea what myopic means. It sounded like an insult. But I forgive you. I love you, Castiel.”

“I love you, too,” he confirmed tightening his hold but resisting the impulse to expand her vocabulary. Several more minutes of inwardly turned thoughts passed like the breeze that ruffled the dark green leaves above them.

“Cas, I think I’m ready to talk to Michael, if you’re okay with it.”

“To talk to him?” Cas teased, hinting that it wasn’t the talking that he worried about. He flattened his tongue and licked a broad stroke across her shoulder, cleaning the blood away. It had already clotted and stopped oozing red smudges.

“You know what I mean.”

“You want my blessing,” he clarified, more a statement than a question.

“I need to know that you’re really okay with it.”

Locked on his knot and incapable of going anywhere as she was, it was easier to say he was okay with it. Cas knew he wouldn’t be okay with it for years. The only thing that would help was to drive his discomfort out with saturation. Once it was a settled affair, in every sense of the word, the ubiquity of it all would do more than careful discussions ever could.

“I’m not that much of a hypocrite, Kitten. I can’t insist that you attend me naked and display yourself at my wedding to someone else and tell you not to follow your own heart. I understand how Michael fills a very different need for you than I do. I ask that you be careful, that you step lightly and keep us both informed about what you’re feeling. I ask that you…that you don’t allow him to…”

“He won’t father my pups, Alpha. I promised you that already, and I meant it. You and Dean won’t ever have children together. I’ll honor that prohibition. Michael and I won’t either, no matter what turn our relationship takes.”

“Fuck,” breathed Cas on a sudden realization. “We’re not using a condom right now.”

April laughed. “It’s a little late to be worried about that now.”

“It’s dangerous,” Cas insisted petulantly.

“It’s only slightly risky,” April insisted. “I looked it up. And there’s no sense worrying about it now.”

“We should find a pharmacy for a Plan B dose…”

“No,” April told him adamantly. “If I get pregnant from today, so be it.”

Castiel’s gut unclenched immediately, the pain disappearing as if it had never been. He released a breath. He nodded against the side of her head. “All right, my Omega. As you wish.”

“What do you truly think of Cain?” April asked, changing the subject again.

“You like him,” he answered.

“He’s offering to drop everything and move to Kansas, to leave New York for me,” April replied. “We can’t let him do that unless we’re sure.”

“Nonsense,” Cas snorted. “He can always come back here and pick up right where he left off.”
She shook her head adamantly. “No, he can’t. He’s taking a massive risk, and if it falls apart on him, his reputation will be shot. Everyone he knows already thinks he’s flipped his wig. This is a crazy move for a guy who’s spent his whole career positioning himself to be a spider at the center of a complex interconnected web…”

“Is it?” Cas asked her. “Have you met us? Besides, he hasn’t spent his entire career in entertainment. He was Special Ops as a young man, and he’s got an impressive resume with some skills you might not expect.”

“Is that so?” she asked. “You dug into his background?”

“Naturally. Please don’t insult me. There’s not a snowball’s chance in hell that anyone is going to get close to you without a thorough investigation.”

She nodded. “Right. And Gabe signed off on him too?”

Cas hemmed a little at the unexpected question.

“Please don’t insult me, Alpha,” she teased back. “I know the two of you, probably Michael as well, have your eyes peeled for any threats to my safety and happiness. I know for a fact Gabriel was looking into his background. You wouldn’t have allowed us to meet if any red flags came up.”

Cas licked his lips. Full disclosure was a new and uncomfortable habit, and it would take some time to settle. “I don’t have Michael’s research yet,” he admitted. “But Gabe says he’s clean, if a little on the morose side. Morose, I can deal with, as long as he has your best interest at heart. I need a bulldog, April, not an employee. I need someone who will lock onto you as if your breath is primary to his, as if your happiness is superior to his. I need someone who will devote the rest of his life to your well-being.”

“You don’t ask much,” she commented sourly. “Who died and made you boss? We don’t have the right to demand that of an employee – not for me.”

“My father died and made me boss,” he retorted. “And I don’t give a fuck whether we have the right or not. I won’t settle for anything less. This is your safety that’s at stake. He’s either all in, or he’s out. He’s Pack, or he’s not.”

“Alpha, I just need a manager. Why the secret handshake and cloth-covered alter? What’s going on?”

Castiel cleared his throat. “He’s not just your manager and bodyguard, April Renée. He’s to be your on-the-road alpha. Do you understand? He’s my proxy when I can’t be with you. It will be his responsibility to guide your career and to open doors for you. It will also be his job to bring you home to me as safe and stable as you left. To me and to Michael.”

“I don’t want a proxy,” April said with alarm. “I want you.”

“I can’t always be where your career is going to take you.” Castiel’s knot slipped loose, and he wasted no time in spinning her on his lap. He caught her knee and lifted her leg across his belly to get her facing him. “This is the only way, Kitten. If Michael could do it in my stead, I could live with that, but he can’t. He’s Omega, and his career lies in a different direction. He’s not qualified to protect you. Cain is. He’s fully trained as a bodyguard. But he’s also a Sub, like you. I watched the two of you together. You fit. The rest of it will take time, but it will work if we approach it carefully.”

She shook her head. “My wolf will never kneel to him.”
Cas caught her chin and forced her to look at him. “She will if I state my instruction very clearly. Your wolf will do as I say. April, this is the only way to give you what you want. It’s the only way. That doesn’t mean it has to be him. But if not him, then we keep searching.”

April studied his face and ran her thumb across the livid red handprint that still marred his cheek. “I’m scared.”

“I’m not going to leave you to get acclimated by yourself. Everything you and he do together, I’ll be right there until we’re all three certain it’s time…shit, goddamn it, all fucking four of us, I mean… Michael included, if that’s what you need.”

“Does Dean get a say?”

“Not really, no. But he can register his opinion and his advice as always. He’s my right hand. I will always listen to him, especially where your safety is concerned. At the end of the day though, Kitten, it’s my decision and yours. Even Michael doesn’t get a say yet. So, if you understand what I plan to ask of him, and you understand what I expect of you, then I’m asking you, is this the guy?”

She sighed. “I believe so, Alpha. I trust him. If you trust him. More importantly, if Gabe trusts him, then I think he’s the guy.”

Cas made an aggrieved face. “Why does Gabe have more clout than I do?”

“Just the way it is, Alpha,” she smirked. Then she dropped the smirk, replacing it with a dark look of dawning horror. “He’s going to have to set a Claim on me.”

“Yes.”

April’s head hit Castiel’s chest with a hollow ‘Thunk’. “Maybe I could be a house Omega and play the piano in my spare time. Raising pups is a full time job.”

Cas lifted her chin again. “Do you mean that?”

“Well, it is.”

“I’m not arguing that. I’m asking if that’s what you want.”

“No,” she whispered. “It’s not.”

Castiel nodded firmly. “That’s what I thought. Do you need another spanking? We could go back up to our room and get you settled; eat in the hotel dining room.”

April shook her head. “I need my pants back, but I’m good. I wanna explore New York with you before Dean takes you away from me.”

He lifted her up and set her on her feet before letting her haul him up too. “He’s not taking me away from you. Nothing much changes after the wedding, Kitten. We’re already married for all intents and purposes. The wedding has already happened through countless midnight conversations, scuffles and arguments, promises and commitments, fuck ups, fixes, accusations, admissions, apologies, and acquiescences. The only thing left to do is to ease Dean’s fears that I might ever let him fall. That’s going to be quite enjoyable for me, but it doesn’t appreciably change anything. Come on. Get dressed, and let’s get some lunch.”

Talk of Dean brought to mind that Cas still needed to stay mindful of whatever the alpha might be plotting as vengeance for Castiel’s scuttling eastward without him. On short notice. With his mate in tow. Cas didn’t know what it would be yet, but he knew there would be…something. He half expected Dean to show up at the show this evening. A purchase of seats right next to Cas’ and April’s would have been classic Dean. But if he was planning that, he’d left his cell phone at home. A check of Dean’s GPS locator placed his fiancé dead center in Lawrence, Kansas, right where he was supposed to be.

That’s where his phone was. Was Dean with it?

Someone whistled at April’s bruised, red ass as she bent over to get her pants on, and Cas reached across the pathway to plant a fist in the perpetrator’s jaw without so much as looking him full in the face. He took April’s hand and continued in the opposite direction as if nothing had happened at all, leaving the asshole to collect himself and to consider his life choices. April grinned at her mate, swinging their hands cheerfully.

“Buy me some New York style pizza, and I’ll tell you about my day,” she promised. “I met Yo-Yo Ma.”

Cas dropped her hand and froze in place, his face plastered in shock as his mate continued playfully on without him. “You met… Really? Can you introduce me?”

***************

Dean spent Saturday morning stretched out on the oldest, squishiest couch in the house, a brown leather monstrosity in the downstairs game room. He still had an ache deep in his ass when he clenched into it, but his first foray into a Submission scene with multiple players, more witnesses to Dean’s very personal vulnerabilities was over and done with. He felt like a freshly deflowered ex-virgin, still a little befuddled in the aftermath, still not quite sure how he felt about it.

He’d already hammered out his report for Cas, and that had helped him organize his emotions, if not his emotions about his emotions. He had managed to hold on to his front brain submissive the whole way through, even with Raphael, so the experiment was a success, as far at that went. Mostly, he felt languid and chill. That was good, right?

Dean paged through the Saturday edition of the paper, enjoying the tactile reality of real paper in his hands, and he sipped coffee heavily diluted with cream. He scratched at the top of one foot with the big toe of the other, his t-shirt and sweats shifting easily as he moved, and he rolled a little to resituate.

“You turn feline when you’re satisfied and comfortable,” Michael told him from the doorway. “Anyone ever tell you that?”

Dean chuckled without looking up. “Yeah, I seem to recall hearing that before. Once or twice.”

The speed at which Dean accepted the observation gave away the source, and Michael narrowed his eyes. “Cas told you that,” he guessed sourly. Dean still didn’t look up. He was feeling soft and lazy – too much so to respond. He flipped the page to the editorials and found on a skim-through that more articles than usual were geared toward the debates on Omega rights and agency.

“Am I ever going to stop trailing after him?” Michael asked sadly, stepping in and flopping onto the floor by Dean’s shoulders. “Every time I discover something new about you, he’s already been there.” Dean put fingers in his hair and scratched his scalp lightly, still reading.
“We’ll find something, babe. We’ve got all the time in the world to search.”

Michael leaned into the weight of Dean’s hand. “I sound like a whiner.”

“Only a little,” his mate soothed. “Besides, Cas never convinced me to take my primary sub into a group scene like you did. That was a first, man, and that was all you.” Michael hummed in satisfaction, pulling a section of the paper off Dean’s legs and perusing the text. They read in silence for a while. Dean’s nails stayed in motion over Michael’s scalp, only abandoning him long enough to take another sip of coffee every now and again.

“Damnit,” mumbled Dean. “The battle lines are really settling in. The rhetoric is getting worse. Way worse. We need to brace for impact, Michael. It’s gonna get wild and hairy real fast.”

“What’s up? With Naomi cratering in the polls, I thought we had momentum?” Michael turned to look over Dean’s shoulder. Dean pointed to the article he’d been reading.

“We do. But that’s just the problem. When the movement was small and seemed like it only affected Lupins, the apes wrote us off; assumed we were simply squabbling amongst ourselves. Now, it’s spilling out and taking up the general population. Now every dick with a mouth and a platform has a fucking opinion about what’s best for Omegas, no matter if they know diddly-squat about anything. I’m telling you, it’s gonna get buttloads worse before it gets better, and you, my love, are sitting dead center of the firestorm. We need to increase security for the wedding and get Billie’s take.”

Michael could feel Dean’s hackles rise as he envisioned the dangers that awaited his mate. He stood and pulled the paper off Dean’s lap, shifted Dean by his hips to lie flat on his back on the couch, and climbed up to straddle his thighs. Taking Dean’s hands, he laced their fingers together.

“I’m ready to face them, alpha,” Michael told him quietly. “They’re not going to hurt me. I’ve got you and Cas. Gabe. Sam. I’m safe. You’re going to see to that. I trust you. Right? You feel it?”

Dean sighed. “I know you trust me. I feel it, man. I do. And I trust you, too.” His eyes slipped closed, and his grip tightened in Michael’s grasp. “I know I need to stop blocking your way. Michael…I get it. I don’t think you get what’s holding me back.” Dean went silent. Michael leaned forward and settled against him in the tight space between Dean’s body and the cool back of the sofa. Dean released his hands and wrapped an arm around him, pulling him in close.

When he started talking again, it was softly.

“When my mom died, I thought it was all my fault. Thought I was being punished for breaking the code of the alpha, for all the times I secretly wished to have a hand on my neck and a strap on my ass. Thought I was the worst kind of sinner because I’d Presented as an alpha, and that’s what everyone wants to be, and here I was tossing it out like it was worthless. I’d rather be on my knees with a cock in my mouth and a hard hand holding my hair than be alpha and take care of my family. Thought Mom’s death was something sent down on me like a preview of Hell, where I was headed someday – like an Ebenezer Scrooge ghost visit warning kinda thing. ‘Straighten up, Winchester! There’s time to fix this nonsense before it’s too late if you’ll get your shit together’. Like the fucking Universe burned my mother to ash just to get its message across to me that I was being selfish, and that was the only way to get my attention. That every time I jacked off to a fantasy of getting my ass whipped, I was breaking some sacred code and tearing off a corner of my soul.”

“Jesus, Dean.”

“I still feel that way sometimes, Michael. It doesn’t make any difference that it’s illogical and a load of crap. I can’t shake the feeling that I’m damned for the way I am. I don’t want to be this way. I want to be strong and bold. I want to harness my alpha side and swagger and be confident, protect and take charge and mean business…”

“Baby, shit, you are that alpha. Don’t you know that?”

“No, if I can’t protect you, I’m not.” Dean’s eyes squeezed shut, and he wrapped his arm across his face, hiding his pain behind his own elbow. “Alphas take charge, damnit! They stand their ground even when it pisses people off because alphas are born to command, not to fucking compromise. I’m going to Hell, Michael. I can’t stop that. It’s already done. But maybe I can save you and Cas and the rest of my family. If I can keep you from the same damnation, it’ll all be worth it. I have to keep you safe, Michael. I have to.”

Michael was in shock. He’d had no idea Dean even held a belief in the concept of Hell, much less felt condemned to be imprisoned there.

“That’s absurd,” he told his mate firmly. “You’re not going to Hell. I forbid it. Dean Michael, you listen to me. There’s no such place, and even if there was, it’s not for the likes of you.”

Dean’s voice was weary. “Michael, leave it alone. I don’t know why I even…”

“No. You listen to me, alpha. You picked up a crap message when you were a pup. You thought that alphas only have one acceptable presentation, and you swallowed that message down into your soul. You tried to be something you’re not, and it ate you up from the inside. It felt like you were being punished because it hurt every time you squashed your own impulses, and it hurt every time you didn’t. You tried to live up to someone else’s image. But, baby, their image is bullshit compared to what you really are.”

“You don’t understand,” Dean whimpered.

“I don’t? I don’t? Really Dean? What do you think I was up against as I grew up? You don’t think I experienced the same damn thing every damn day after I Presented? I couldn’t be what they tried to turn me into, and it hurt so fucking bad.”

“You’re not weak the way I am…”

Michael pushed himself up and took a biting hard hold of Dean’s chin with his hand, shaking with a sudden rush of anger. “You’re not WEAK, Goddamnit! You’re amazing! You wouldn’t put up with that kind of talk from me for a second. What the fuck makes you think it’s acceptable from you? You know better, Dean Michael. Fuck it all, you KNOW better!”

Michael was furious. He couldn’t lay still. He shoved himself to his feet and then knelt beside his mate, taking Dean’s hand in both of his own. He entreated Dean to understand with green eyes that blazed with streaks of gold. “You’re not WEAK, Goddamnit! You’re amazing! You wouldn’t put up with that kind of talk from me for a second. What the fuck makes you think it’s acceptable from you? You know better, Dean Michael. Fuck it all, you KNOW better!”

Michael was furious. He couldn’t lay still. He shoved himself to his feet and then knelt beside his mate, taking Dean’s hand in both of his own. He entreated Dean to understand with green eyes that blazed with streaks of gold. “They were wrong, all those years ago. Don’t you see? Whoever put that on you was dead wrong! If a Sub or an Omega came through your classroom spouting this drivel, you would instantly know better. You wouldn’t doubt for a moment that someone in their past had put a mind-fuck on them, and you’d do everything in your power to straighten them out. You’d fucking bend over backward to get them thinking right. Damnit!”

“Really?” Dean shot back, sitting up stiffly. “You know that without question? What do you know? You’re not the one who wakes up drenched in his own sweat with flames licking all over his body twice a week. You’re not the one who hears the screaming of the damned ringing in his ears over and over again! Don’t presume to tell me what I know or don’t know! If the Universe is seeking balance, then there’s a hell of a correction coming someday, Michael. It’s gonna drag me under when it hits. But I’ll be damned if it takes you too.”
Michael sat back on his heels as if Dean had slapped him. He blinked, feeling his eyes transition fully to a golden halo. He shook his head slowly.

“You’ve got it all wrong, alpha. But until you grasp that for yourself, you’re never going to be able to see me as anything but your responsibility because you’re too busy standing guard over me. You’re never going to be comfortable letting me share your crusade with you. You’re locked into a protective stance, expecting to sacrifice yourself for the greater good, expecting that it’s your only choice. But you know what? That strips me of my own say in what role I take. I may be an Omega, and I may be yours, but I don’t need you to sacrifice yourself to a horde of demons to keep me whole. I kind of thought maybe we could fight together, Dean.” Michael’s eyes filled with tears with his vehemence. “I kind of thought you were human more than alpha, and you would have enough respect for me that we could stand back-to-back and fight as a team, not lock me in a cupboard and plant yourself in front of the door expecting to take a mortal wound in my defense. My fucking hero.”

Michael clambered to his feet and stalked to the door. He wasn’t being fair, and he knew it. Dean’s fears and his insecurities wouldn’t crumble from an angry response, but Michael was sick of the inequity inherent in their dynamic. Adding a mountain-sized chip on Dean’s shoulder to what they already had to traverse merely in navigating their secondary/tertiary splits was more than Michael could stomach.

“And another thing,” he said in the doorway. “If you think that either of us, Castiel or I, would leave you burning in Hell for five minutes without busting in to yank you out, you’ve got another think coming, you asshole. That shit wouldn’t stand, Dean. Think about it. Can you envision any version of the Universe where that man or this one would let it end up like that? So get the fuck off your golden steed and stop trying to save the rest of us by throwing yourself onto every grenade.” The Omega spun on his heel and took one step…

“Michael, wait.”

To his great surprise, Michael stopped. He stood silent and twitching just outside the door, facing away from Dean.

“Please don’t go. Running away every time you get mad isn’t helpful.”

Michael turned slowly to face him and leaned against the wall just inside the door. A perfectly taxidermized elk head mounted above his head served as his back-up, lending him gravity. “I’m sorry about your nightmares, Dean. I didn’t know. I wish you’d told me sooner. I think I know what they look like from inside our bonds, but you never seemed out of sorts after one of the orange-toned dreams, so I didn’t know what they were. You cover for them very well.”

“Thanks, I think,” Dean muttered. He sat forward on the couch, leaning his elbows on his spread knees, looking intently at the floor. “It’s kind of a habit. I had to learn to hide it from Sammy when we were kids. I got to where I barely think about it in the morning, even the ones that are really dark.” Dean fell silent.

“I’m always here for you, Dean. Please don’t hide nightmares from me. If you wake up sweating, you wake me up. Promise me. You’re not supposed to have to go through that alone anymore. The Universe made that correction you keep expecting. It left you alone long enough, and then it righted itself and brought you and me together. Now neither of us has to battle alone ever again. Promise me.”

Dean didn’t want to make that promise. He knew that in the dead of the night, while Michael slept peacefully in tones of green and blue, as he waited for his heart rate to slow, and he scrabbled for reality versus the horror of the dreamscape, the last thing he would want to do would be to awaken his mate. Michael watched him chew on it.

“Does Castiel know?”

“He knows I sometimes have nightmares.”

“Does he know how frequent they are?”

Dean looked away, leaning way back on the couch, staring up at the ceiling.

“And Tessa? Have you told the therapist?”

“Yes. We’ve talked about it some. She’s not pushing me though, and I haven’t been ready to go there.”

Michael studied his mate’s face. Dean’s bond held nothing but raw sincerity. He was eating himself up on the inside, trying to consume himself to protect his mate.

“The quickest way to overcome a phobia is to barrel straight through it, Dean,” Michael told him firmly.

Dean didn’t answer. He kept his eyes on the ceiling. Michael could feel him processing though.

“I want a spot in your battle plan, alpha. I want to do the same work you do. I want in. I swore I wouldn’t push you, but you need to be pushed right now or you’re going to stay hunkered in that defensive posture forever. Everything out there is set to blow into a firestorm any second, and my gut tells me the way we meet that is head on. We go out strong, shredding every damn one of those op/ed pieces from people who don’t know an Omega from an ostrich. We have to show them, Dean. No one alive can do that better than I can. But you gotta LET me.”

“They’re going to tear you to pieces…”

“They’re going to write awful, nasty, false shit about me.”

“They know where you live.”

Michael scoffed. “Yeah, and I dare them to take a crack at this place trying to get at me. I fucking dare them.”

Dean stared morosely at the ceiling.

“You’re not a broken alpha, Dean Michael. You’re the best possible mix of all of us. You’re strong and vulnerable at the same time. You’re powerful and charming and you know how to drop all the walls in your head and let it all flow into someone else’s hands for a while. You’re smart and you’re instinctive all at once. That sense you have going on in there, the one that compels you to show no weakness, it’s losing its grip because we’re proving it wrong every day. And now it’s getting desperate the same way a cornered dog does, and it’s throwing everything it has at you just the way it’s hitting the fan outside our doors. You gotta weather the last throes of a dying instinct. We’re going to fight this war out there and in here all at once, but no one does it alone. Stand firm just a little while longer. Do something radical right in its face, and silence it for good. Put me onstage. Stand beside me and be there to watch over me, but let me do this, alpha. Please. For both of us. For all of us.”

Dean blew out a long breath through his mouth.
“Sometimes I don’t know what the hell I’m talking about, man,” Michael continued. “But sometimes my instinct is so strong, I’m certain. This is one of those times, and I’m asking you to trust me here. I know it’s the right choice, alpha. I can feel it. Go ahead and poke at me all you want to with your probes and ask me whatever questions you can trying to untangle how I know. Dean, I know.”

Dean scrubbed his hands over his face without lifting his head. He’d lost, and he knew it. But had he really lost, or was it just the insecurities that were losing? Wasn’t that the goal? To overcome the objections his insecurities kept throwing at him.

“I won’t push your buttons while we’re in public, man. I know how hard this is for you. But we have to find the balance point. We have to balance our way into it and figure out how a Dominant Omega confronts the public without turning himself on his heels. Help me do that, Dean. Help me discover who I am.”

“All right,” Dean sighed. “You win. We’ll get with Charlie and Ellen and work you in. I want you to start in the seminars first though, not the conventions. And you don’t go anywhere without me or Cas right beside you. And Michael? Man, I mean stitched hip to hip. You can answer questions about your own experiences, but you’re to follow every damn one of our instructions throughout. Anyone gets outta line, and you can expect their ass to be tossed out onto the street without a fucking refund. Don’t go trying to be an expert on shit you don’t know. No grandstanding. No showing off. Act up even a little, and it all stops, and I mean on a dime. I will haul you bodily from the stage if I don’t get the obedience from you that I need.”

“I understand, alpha.”

“Michael, man…damnit…”

“Thank you, Dean. I won’t let you down.”

“I think I’m gonna pass out.” Dean rolled his body and lay back out on the sofa longways. Michael approached him cautiously, slowly, and he wordlessly curled his fingertips under the band of Dean’s sweats, tugging them smoothly down his hips and tucking the elastic behinds his balls.

“I can help with that,” Michael whispered seductively, adding a filthy rasp to his tone. “Let me show you some gratitude, Dean.”

Dean lifted his hips a little and shoved at the fabric of his pants beneath his ass, kicking his legs to get them down his thighs. Michael’s distraction seemed like the best idea ever. His mate’s hot mouth closed over the head of his dick and worked its way slowly downward. Michael wrapped a hand around Dean’s bulge, where his knot lay inert beneath silky skin, and Dean rolled his hips into it. Deft fingers massaged his balls. Dean groaned in pleasure.

“I’m right here, Dean. I’ve got you.” Michael dove back in to sink his mouth onto Dean’s cock as deeply as he could without gagging, and he stripped out of his jeans without taking his lips off of his mate’s swiftly hardening erection.

Michael released Dean’s cock and stood to swing a knee over his hips and straddle him again, this time lining his puffy hole up and sinking all the way down to impale himself. Michael’s knees bracketed Dean’s ribs, and Dean’s hands came up to hold Michael’s hips and guide the subtle rocking motion of the Omega’s torso above him. They both closed their eyes, delving deep into a place that wasn’t visible from the outside. Dean craned his head back sharply, lengthening his throat, breathing hard through his nose, Submitting from within even though the moment didn’t require his submission.

Michael’s scent thickened, and they both rolled their hips, Michael sitting hard and fast on Dean’s pelvis. He sat upright, using his thighs and his knees to rock into it, his hands clutching at Dean’s forearms.

“You give me so much, alpha,” Michael told him in a gruff, lust-filled voice. “You give me everything. Everything. I owe you more than I could ever repay. Every time I think I’ve seen the deepest part of your generosity, you surprise me with more. You have no idea how magnificent you are, Dean.”

“Michael…” Dean whimpered, overwhelmed at the praise, and finding it painful to process while he was feeling such pleasure physically. Michael’s channel was hot, tight, and wet. It clenched around his length, embracing and massaging, so welcoming, so warm. Dean’s sweats bunched below his knees. He lifted his knees and set his feet flat against the leather, pulling his hips down to begin a rhythmic thrusting. Michael groaned, leaning forward and transferring his hands to Dean’s chest and shoulders, holding on. Dean began to pummel his mate’s ass with powerful, meaningful thrusts. His head was still torqued back on the arm of the couch, out of sync with the forcefulness of his thrusting, a contradiction in presentations that Michael found irresistible.

No one else on earth was lucky enough to have this. Not this. There were other alpha-Subs in the world, but they didn’t have Omega-Dom mates who knew how to leverage this kind of presentation and make good on everything Dean’s body was seeking. Michael lifted up a little on his knees to give Dean space to slam into him hard and fast, and he leaned in to suck a bruise into Dean’s adam’s apple, mirroring his complicated dual presentation. Dean whined hard, re-set his hands on Michael’s hips and pulled him into every pummeling thrust.

“Feels so good,” Michael muttered, shifting to suck a bruise into the scar on Dean’s shoulder. “Fuck me, alpha.”

“I need you, Omega,” Dean whimpered. “Can’t live without you. Don’t wanna think about losing you.” Dean’s hips didn’t slow. They shifted into frantic. He was dropping into a panic, and Michael pressed down onto Dean’s pelvis.

“I’m not in danger, alpha. I’m right here. Fuck me hard, baby. Knot me. Take ownership. Fill me up. Keep me safe.” It was a barrage of words whispered into Dean’s ear, and the alpha’s face crumpled. He wrapped both arms around Michael, crushing their chests together, and he fucked fast and hard, drowning the voices in his head, replacing them with his mate’s soft crooning.

“You’re sex on legs, Winchester,” Michael told him through clenched teeth. “You make me come in my sleep just from having your scent beside me.” Somehow, Michael was holding onto himself even as Dean lost it. The alpha’s head strained back as far as he could get it. His thighs burned with the forcefulness of his driving heat. Dean’s knot strained to enter his mate and lock them together.

“Michael, don’t… I’m not… I can’t… It’s too much. That’s not me.”

“Fuck me, Dean. Knot me. Take me with you when you come. I’m close.”

Dean growled at the instruction, at the promise. He rolled into the back of the couch, turning Michael onto his back, getting his knees and hips lined up to drive right back in and send them both over the edge. Dean pressed his knot into place and rocked against Michael’s ass. The Omega lifted his legs high into air, hooking one foot over the back of the couch and catching the back of his other knee in his hand to hold it wide and clear, opening himself up as wide as he could. Dean tucked his head down and rested it at Michael’s breastbone, curling up tight and letting his sweat mingle with Michael’s as he found a hard, fast rhythm.

“Come for me, Omega,” Dean gritted out. “Come on my knot.”

“Harder, alpha,” Michael responded. “Fuck me harder.”

“NNNnnngghh!” Dean growled, every nerve alight, his sense of himself merging with the sensations he could feel from his mate. His knot locked, but Dean risked tugging at it to keep thrusting, giving Michael what he needed to come without a hand on his cock. The burning pull of a knot against the inner musculature of his rim sent the Omega pulsing white streaks between them, smearing it against both of their bellies, and Dean’s eyes rolled up in his head as the clenching of Michael’s channel tumbled him too. They toppled together, near enough, going sloppy in their rhythm, going inside their bonds until all they could see were colors, all they could feel was where they connected. They caught each other. Yin and Yang. Alpha and Omega. Now and always.

Dean didn’t try to stop the tears of relief and release. He held Michael to him, and he wept silently, burying his nose behind Michael’s ear, right up in his neck, right against his scent glands.

“I don’t deserve you,” he whispered.

***************

Sarah’s arrival at the manor on Sunday morning turned out to be an understated affair. Gabe helped her carry her luggage upstairs and down the hall to a guest room directly above the kitchen. She had everything she could want here, including an en suite bathroom, a fireplace, and a back stairway that led directly to the rear of the kitchen by the garage entrance. She could come and go with little fanfare and make midnight kitchen runs in peace. No one else was home. Dean and Michael were at church. Kali was working out of her shop. Sam had taken his family back home. Cas and April would be in New York until Monday. The LaFitte Pack had moved out, each to his own new home to begin the exciting process of settling in. The staff had Sundays off.

The silence felt oddly oppressive as if the house forgot to breathe without its occupants to bring it to life. Sarah thanked Gabriel and made a joke about offering him a bellman’s tip, which he took with a cheery thank you, and no sign he recognized it as a joke.

Well, that was a quick lesson learned on Sarah’s part. Don’t joke with Gabriel about money.

Left alone in the spacious room, Sarah left her baggage packed for the moment, instead pulling out her journal and trying to summarize what she could of what Gabriel had told her. He had to have been truthful. It was all too tragic to be manufactured. Too many points along the way were matters of the public record for it all to be a lie. But was it truth? He’d left things out. There were places in his telling where his face had clouded over, and he’d demurred with an, “I can’t tell you the details, but it wasn’t pretty,” or some such.

Gabriel idolized Castiel, that much was obvious. He saw everything from a certain perspective, not necessarily the barest form of truth, but not exactly glorified either. Where Castiel had scars, Gabriel called them out for what they were, and where he’d faced hard decisions, Gabriel didn’t hide the fact that some of his choices would not have withstood public scrutiny after the fact. But Gabriel didn’t mince words when it came to the trials they faced as a species. He painted it gritty and complicated for Sarah in a way no textbook or group forum could ever do. He painted it harsh but hopeful, tragic but encouraging. He painted it human.

They really were human, even with all the violence and the vulgarity. Sarah wrote notes for as long as she could think, and then her pen stopped, and her eyes glazed over, switching in her head into a frame of mind that wasn’t scientific at all.

In the widest sense, Castiel was far from perfect, but in that context, he was striving day by hard-fought day to build a safe place to raise his family, and wasn’t that what everyone did? He had a wider span of resources to call on than most people did, but he’d been using those resources not to wall himself and his kin into a fortress that he meant to defend. He’d been building up the people themselves. All of them. His charitable works included funding for primate hospice and literary centers in towns without a single Lupin inhabitant. And he’d done that his whole life. He gave resources to underfunded inner city works programs that assisted young adults making the transition to permanent jobs for the first time in their lives. He opened battered women’s shelters all over the country. He funded partnerships with private businesses to quietly lend support to Lupins caught travelling at the start of their cycles.

It was in that vein, what he was doing for his own species that made Sarah’s head spin. She knew he was wealthy, powerful, well-connected. She didn’t know he personally oversaw an Omega rescue program and offered succor to those traumatized by trafficking. She hadn’t imagined he facilitated foster and adoption programs for orphaned Lupin pups or that he maintained a strictly regimented network of alpha mentors and Omega support nationwide, that he personally developed methods to Release Omegas with disabilities who couldn’t be struck corporally without inflicting harm – all of it on his own initiative. None of this had been in existence twenty years ago. The research, the training, and the contracting was just the beginning. And here Sarah had insisted upon arguing semantics over his playful use of masculine pronouns just to tweak her. She felt like an idiot.

What she now knew dovetailed seamlessly with what she’d seen of him as she watched him remove Dr. Meyer with a scalpel and military precision. He was indeed ruthless where his enemies were concerned. He was cold, unforgiving, decisive – Gabe hadn’t even shied away from the label psychotic – but to become one of Castiel Winchester’s enemies took deliberate work. It wasn’t accidental. It was only with a history of weighted works at one’s back, weighted to cause harm, to destroy people, to undermine what was being tirelessly built, that drew his ire and his action. Castiel removed these people like carving mold out of a wedge of cheese. He kept the good and cut out the bad. And he continued always to build. It happened everywhere at once.

And people who might otherwise suffer, thrived instead. And Castiel went home daily to his Pack, where he ate and slept and loved and fought and tried. Every day, he tried.

Gabriel’s telling was slanted. Sarah knew that. But stripping away the pride of an older brother describing how the sun shines on his little brother, even pretending half of it was exaggerated, Sarah couldn’t come to any conclusion but what she was left with.

Castiel had once asked her if she was a researcher or a crusader, and she thought she’d known what he meant. She hadn’t. She didn’t. But she wanted to.

She looked up and out the window before her. The back lawn stretched rolling and green. Below her, a little black puppy dug a series of holes inside a fenced enclosure. Sarah thought she could relate to the peace that comes with joining a cult, with ‘drinking the Kool-Aid’, and maybe she was no less naïve than they rest of the world when it came to falling for a sales pitch. But she didn’t think so. The hallmark of a cult was it’s isolationism. It never stood up to scrutiny in the wider world.
Castiel’s world was the wider world, in every sense, and everywhere she looked, she found more confirmation that he had a vision that was real, and noble, and attainable, and it was exciting. And she wanted in.

And she WAS in. She was at ground zero, ready to line up with them shoulder to shoulder and carry a lance of her own into battle, and she felt dizzy with the possibility and the fear.

Below her, the puppy spotted a squirrel outside her enclosure her began flinging herself at the fence, barking her little furry head off at the squirrel who didn’t so much as flinch, and Sarah laughed.

She unpacked.

Chapter End Notes

It's all coming together. Finally. I thought about giving Cain some speaking lines, but then decided to leave him a little mysterious.

Love to everyone. Thanks especially to my friend in Greece. You're a delight, and I look forward to some playful collaborations.
Chapter Summary

Loose ends? What loose ends? Let's see how many loose ends we can close in one chapter. It's chaos, folks, and a massive steam blow-off at the end.

Chapter Notes

I couldn't get through this chapter without constantly hearing Chuck in my head commenting that endings are hard.

A quick note about Jess. My version isn't even close to canon-compliant, and it's easy to see her as horrible. She's possibly the least likable of all the non-villains. But the point here is that she's right for Sam, even if that's uncomfortable and even if he doesn't show that side of himself to anyone else.

And a quick note about word count. I think we've just...ahem...moved, totally by accident, into the lead for SPN fics on this platform for word count. For those of you who have read every single fucking word. God bless you. And holy fuck.

That is all. Enjoy the chaos.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.
“Shh,” Sam said, putting a hand across her mouth. “Someone just came home.”

She bit him.

He grunted and snatched his hand back with a look that he hoped warned her that he was not pleased. Curled naked in his own rumpled twin bed, he examined the meat of his palm in the dim light. Jess used his distraction to climb out of bed and reach for his robe. She nearly made it to the door of his bedroom before his eyes widened in alarm, and he bolted out of bed to cut her off.

“You can’t go out there. Are you crazy? Someone just came home,” he hissed. He pressed her back by her shoulders with his back against the door. His eyes pleaded with her.

“I need a shower,” she told him in a voice that would easily carry down the hall even with the door closed. Sam had never wished so hard for a lock on the door before.

“Shh! They’ll hear you. If we get caught, I’ll be grounded for a month, and I won’t be able to see you outside of school for who knows how long. Jess, please.”

She scoffed rudely. “You think they don’t know?” she asked him. “Your whole room reeks, and need I remind you it’s Dean’s room too? He knows, Sam. They both do. You’re making a big deal out of nothing.”

“Maybe,” Sam countered. “But there’s knowing and then there’s knowing. As long as we keep it low key and don’t shove it Dad’s face…”

“Right,” she said skeptically. “Your dad strikes me as an openminded man with an easygoing constitution. Maybe he’s happy for us, Sam. You could ask him next time he’s home and conscious.”

He snarled and pressed her forcefully against the wall by the door. “You don’t know dick about my dad, so watch your mouth,” he growled, grinding his hips into hers in punctuation.

“You’ve said worse yourself,” she reminded him much too loudly. “You don’t care if he knows we’re fucking. You just don’t want an ass-whipping from a drunk, and you don’t have the weight to stand up to him yet, not without your brother there to run interference for you.”

Sam’s eyes dilated, and he panted against her body, poised for violence, snarling. Without warning, he bent and lifted her up bodily, threw her onto his bed, and covered her with his bulk, still scrawny enough that he didn’t have much to work with.

Jess didn’t fight. She grinned and shimmied low into the bed, spreading her legs eagerly and pulling him in by the back of his neck to a bruising kiss that was all hunger and teeth. Sam didn’t enjoy being goaded, but if she was going to go there, he’d respond. Already mussed and fouled, his bed creaked as he found his mark and thrust into her swollen softness. The headboard thumped into the wall, but Sam was too far gone to hear it.

In the kitchen, Dean rubbed his nose, grabbed a beer from the refrigerator, left the sacked groceries on the counter, and fled to the front porch to wait his kid brother out.

Teenagers. Jesus.
NOW:

Sam flipped through the remaining forms on the desk in front of him and double-checked that every line had a response penciled in. He would file it all digitally, but he systematically compiled everything by hand first to be certain it was all complete before logging on to KU’s registration platform. He took a bracing breath and opened his University account on his laptop. Sam had never imagined going back to school for a Master’s, much less setting his sights on a PhD – not really. He’d planned to be a cop, a beat cop, a grunt. Somewhere along the way his worldview had grown larger. Much larger.

He’d discussed it at length with Jess, of course. With the Pack behind them, the two new parents could make it work. Benny swore to give Sam room in his schedule for school work. Cas promised they could lean in for babysitting or a quick meal and a bed any time they needed it. Jess kissed his throat, told him she was proud of him, and committed to taking on more of the household tasks while he crunched through the hardest sections to come.

Sam had also talked it over with Sarah. The ape was ahead of him along a similar track – a mirror image of his track, actually. They were after similar goals from opposite sides, and Sarah told him she’d help him with laying the groundwork for his thesis. Sam had read her notes. He thought he could possibly team up with her and go at it from different directions but in concert, much as Cas and Benny had done nearly a decade before. Sam worked easily with Sarah. Comfortably.

Too comfortably, maybe.

He pressed his lips together tightly and began to type.

Sam was no idiot, and he knew there was idle talk out on the floor. He also knew there was a chemistry that made his hours spent in her presence totally frictionless. They got each other far better than most people Sam had worked with. There was a synergy that made his supportive explanations spur her observations to a deeper clarity, and her keen third-person view solidified concepts for Sam that he’d taken for granted all his life.

That he found her sexy wasn’t relevant. She was a colleague.

And Sam was neither stupid nor naïve.

He was also happily Mated and adult enough to see the dangers for what they were. He was mature enough to know his own mind, his own desires, his own weaknesses. It wouldn’t matter if Sarah jumped the shark and threw herself naked into his lap, Sam wasn’t going to go there, no matter how beautiful and intriguing she was.

She wasn’t Jess.

And Jess was his whole world.

What did a pair of intense liquid brown eyes have in comparison?

She didn’t set him on fire the way Jess did, the way Jess always had. She didn’t sit up with him in the middle of the night and talk through the hardest choices of his life. She didn’t let him see her sweaty and out of sorts, covered in baby puke. She didn’t stand toe to toe with him and let passion override good sense. She didn’t lean into his chest in exhausted tears, too tired to stand on her own anymore, and trusting him to hold her. She didn’t harbor a wealth of scurrilous inside jokes that there could be no explaining. She didn’t pull from him a need long suppressed and give it a platform in a way literally no one else had ever done. Perhaps she got him intellectually, interpersonally even… but…

She wasn’t Jess.

That didn’t keep him from befriending the woman though. It didn’t keep him from seriously considering where to draw his lines. Joking around with her was fine, but the casual flirting had to stop. It had begun innocently, before either of them realized that their personalities aligned so well, before there was danger that it could really sink in and catch. The last thing Sam wanted was for her to think he was offering something he wasn’t.

It was easier with wolves. A Lupin could tell by scent that Sam wasn’t open to opportunities. With a primate, he didn’t know if she could read him or not. Part of him wanted to just throw it all on the table and ask, but that might horrify her, and he didn’t want that either.

Sam’s monitor blinked with a prompt warning him his session would soon time out from sitting idle.

He huffed at his own idiocy, checked his form, and began to type. Down the hall, he heard Jess slam the door to the garage on her way back home from the grocery store, and Sam smiled to himself as Hank began to fuss in the bassinet beside him.

***************

April worked diligently all week. Rowena had been offered a small space behind Michael’s office with a tiny desk and a computer. The agent had an office of her own in the city, but she’d shifted to working straight out of the manor for the moment as she tried to pull out all the stops for her new client, who seemed on the verge of being the most lucrative Rowena had ever had.

Matt stayed right by April’s side, helping mold the tunes she was planning to record for demos, organizing them into genres, and fixing them into a logical order. Mark ran back and forth between the musician and her agent, fielding questions, offering suggestions, taking notes. It was turning into an incredibly productive week, and they all felt the momentum shift into high gear and meant to make the most of it while they were still together in one place. And while no one was yet pregnant.

The only dangling participle was Cain. Cas sent out the job offer, carefully worded and legally reviewed, but the alpha had yet to respond. It was as if the air above the house stopped moving as it waited. All the scurrying the team did was for naught without an alpha. Nicholas called at least once an hour to check in, but he tiptoed delicately around asking after the status of the job offer.

April hit her fed up mark with Nick by eleven-thirty on Tuesday, reminding him rudely that she had no chance of meeting his revision deadline if he didn’t leave her the fuck alone to work on it, and after that, he switched to texting Mark.

April had little more than a week left before the honeymoon when she could expect to be unreachable by the team. Before that happened, they hoped to have at least four distinct demo ‘albums’ ready to distribute, get Nick squared away with all the revisions April expected to be a part of, and make a plan for how to hit the ground running when she returned in a month. Everyone had marching orders while she was gone, but it all depended upon getting through the workload on the table before she left, depended upon getting a business manager situated at the head of the train, and the pressure was high.
Fresh from a Release, a renewed Claim to her bond and her Mating-scar, and a full D.F. from her mate – something he’d never offered her before – April was firing on all cylinders. She was calm and assertive, decisive, energetic. She felt a powerful creative wave sweep over her, and she rode it effortlessly under Matt’s steady hand. Complex rhythms and harmonies spilled from beneath her fingertips, caught in digital form as the recording equipment Mark installed captured every note she played, even during breaks and idle moments.

There weren’t many of those.

Matt called periodic halts to the driving pace, reminding her to tend to her puppy, to let her brain switch tracks for a while. She fought him every time he spoke up and had to be overruled unanimously by everyone in attendance, even Gabriel, before she conceded. If they didn’t gang up on her, she refused to stop, so they learned rapidly to present a united front, even phoning Nick for a voice of support when April’s spine stiffened stubbornly, and she tried to railroad straight past them.

“Your wee doggie was a concession by your Alpha, if I heard correctly,” Rowena trilled, collecting a hot cup of tea in the kitchen. “’Twould be a pity if the Alpha learned that you’re neglecting the pur thing.”

April spun to confront her. “You wouldn’t!”

“Oh, I most certainly would.” Rowena stirred honey into her tea in an uninvested way, casually tinking the spoon against the side of the china cup. She spoke without a care in the world. “I’m new here, it’s true, lassie, but I learn fast. Word’s got around that you plan to…plant a bairn in the barn soon, shall we say? What would the Alpha say about that if he knew you couldn’t find a few moments out of your day to tend to the dog? How much time would he think you have to give to a baby?”

“Mind your own business,” April told her sharply. “It’s not the same thing at all.”

“No,” Rowena agreed. “It’s much harder with a wee infant or two than one little puppy.”

April looked down at Portia, playing happily with shredded scraps of fabric. Without a word, she unhooked the puppy’s leash from the wall by the back door, affixed it to her collar, and led her out into the run for a quick training and play session. She couldn’t afford to put Cas in the position where he doubted her ability to balance her work with motherhood. She didn’t want to know which way he would choose. Losing either would be a devastating blow.

“That a girl,” Rowena smiled, blowing across her cup and heading back to her tiny office. Passing Mark in the archway, she winked. The worry lines tracing his eyes didn’t ease. He stood vigil, silently watching the young woman through the window.

That was three of them now who had thrown their whole lives out the window to latch on to this young prodigy. Soon it would be four. Keeping her healthy and stable wasn’t a matter of being generous. It was the livelihood of all four of them at stake. Whether April ever forgave him or not, Mark expected a conversation with Castiel was at hand. She couldn’t be allowed to run herself into the ground like that. She wouldn’t last two years that way, and Mark meant for her to last far longer.

**********************

More evenings than not, as they approached the last weekend before the wedding, their work hours ran straight on past five o’clock, and work spaces spilled over into their home. There was a constant stream of people through the front door – attorneys, couriers, business people, wedding contractors, Facility staff, deliveries.

Michael had never imagined such a hum of activity infringing upon his home like this, but there was nothing for it. Dean halted any attempt to make progress on his book, disappearing into Castiel’s office with a serious expression and a stack of papers every evening. Michael’s past weekend together with Dean was a soft, blissful memory, from the hard-driving gangbang on Thursday, through the stark honesty that scraped scar tissue off both of their wounds on Saturday morning, and through an entire Sunday spent in each other’s company, building on what they’d started months ago. Building…always building. Michael would have panicked at the organized chaos all around him had it not been for the new layers of mortar in his bonds with his mate. Instead of losing it, Michael hummed to himself, strolling amid the pandemonium, turning up where he’d yet to be summoned with whatever they were just about to realize they needed already in his hands.

“I’m gonna start calling you Radar,” Dean told him affectionately the fourth time it happened, and Michael gloated softly. “Thanks, man.”

“It’s what I’m here for, alpha,” Michael responded. “Just keep in mind that a pregnant man needs his sleep, and I’m horny all the time. You can pay me back by fucking me to sleep before ten o’clock tonight.”

Dean laughed, catching Cas’ amused eye. “Deal. Go get a long bath, and I’ll meet you upstairs.”

“Finish what you’re doing first, Dean. I can amuse myself for a while.” Michael slipped out, and Dean’s eyes followed him. The alpha’s body nearly did as well, but Cas put a hand on his arm.

“Dean. We need to focus.”

“Amuse himself, he said,” Dean commented more to himself than to Cas. “What do you think he meant by that?”

Cas snapped his fingers. “Dean. Focus. Work now. Fuck later.”

They had far too much on their plates to get to all of it, but they had no choice but to keep plugging away at it until they’d made a dent in each item. Dean’s attentiveness to his mate as he sent Michael off to sleep with a muscle-relaxing orgasm was well intentioned but hardly up to his usual standard of care. He was too tired to do it right.

Michael didn’t seem to be holding any grudges though. He slipped into a deep slumber before his belly was wiped down with a warm cloth and a soft kiss.

The week flew by all in that vein, never getting quite enough accomplished to scratch an item completely off the ‘To Do’ list, but doggedly pressing forward. Media interviews were conducted on the hoof by cell phone, covering everything from Castiel’s epic new power rating, to the status of the merger, to the stalling of the FBI’s investigation in Oklahoma, to the rise of an angry wave of dissension over the ACRI’s stance on Omega rights, to the upcoming nuptials. Everyone was buzzing. Everything was at stake.

The contractors were all put on overtime to work the staff through the ramping stress. Client appointments were rescheduled for the week, and everyone on site was mandated, by order of the Alpha, to attend a minimum of one Scene session, whether at home or at work. Some of the staff were given daily appointments. They couldn’t afford for anyone to shift out of balance. Every hand, every mind, every body was needed, working at its highest capacity, and they all stepped up to meet the need.

Sam’s right arm ached deep in the muscle tissue. He hadn’t had a week like this since training.

Michael sat in Dominant class feeling useless discussing proper and effective aftercare when his mate’s bond fairly vibrated with strain. Dean was on his game, but the man never stayed that way for long under tension this powerful without someone holding onto him. Michael’s knee bobbed under his desk in anxiety, wishing he could ditch class and go stand beside his mate. Or, alternatively, he wanted to go back to his office at home and dig through his wedding planner for anything he might’ve missed. Lists of countdown preparation tasks ran on repeat through his head. Most of it he could take care of from his phone – from his phone as he stood in his office at home, beside his mate, watching over him, going over his lists.

He sighed impatiently and checked the wall clock again.

“Winchester, am I boring you?” asked alpha Uriel.

“Sir, an honest answer to that question will wind up with both of us out of sorts,” Michael told him. “I apologize, but please don’t ask me questions if you don’t want to know the truth.”

The seasoned Dominant nodded. “Very well. I’ll ask a different question. Can you control yourself in my classroom, or do you require assistance?”

Michael slumped in his chair, all the smartass disappearing the instant Uriel’s alpha touched the man’s tone. “I can control myself,” he muttered.

“What was that?” Uriel asked him loudly. “Dominants do not mumble, Winchester.”

Michael sat up straight, blushing. “I said, no sir. I do not require assistance. I can control myself.”

“Glad to hear it. If it turned out that you couldn’t, we might need to assess if you are in the right classroom.”

Michael growled softly at him, and the instructor cocked his head. “You don’t like that?” Uriel goaded. “Good. You’ll need that fire to set the right tone when you work a scene, but I don’t care if you scored a 45 on your Keller test, Omega. This is my classroom, not yours, and you’re a long way from your full strength, boy. I’m not Raphael, and I don’t roll for the likes of you. Not now, not ever. Test me anytime you think you’ve got the weight to pull it off.” Uriel’s eyes sparked red, and his lip curled.

Michael’s wolf threw its shoulder against the gate in Michael’s head, and the Omega cracked the lock for him. He didn’t need the wolf for this, but he saw no reason to deny the beast a voice either. His eyes flattened instantly, and a cold, haughty expression took the place of the disingenuous sycophant he’d tried to pass off as an invested student.

“Understood,” he said without emotion. “I apologize for the disruption, sir. Please continue.”

Uriel held his eyes for a few more moments, then evidently decided not to press the issue. He turned back to the front of the room and picked up where he’d left off. Michael could feel eyes on him. Beta eyes. Alpha eyes. No one else was Omega here. No one but Michael. It meant he had to travel two miles for every one of theirs, just to arrive at the same place. The embarrassed blush was gone, an angry flush taking its place. This guy with his, ‘This is my fucking classroom’ could eat dicks for all Michael cared. There would be a reckoning someday between the two of them, and Michael wouldn’t need a 45 rating to roll the fat bastard onto his back to show his fat belly.
Dean fiddled with his pen as the meeting began to wrap up on Thursday afternoon. Crowley’s Scottish brogue over the phone line had become a bagpipe drone that never paused for breath. Dean didn’t think he’d ever known anyone so in love with his own voice. The man had been soundly and thoroughly corrected, as close to a woodshed strapping as Castiel could do from here, and the beta had changed his tune right in the middle of his monologue after the briefest but staunchest of smackdowns. But it hadn’t shut him up. It would’ve been funny if Dean didn’t have so much to accomplish waiting for him back in his office. He glanced up at the clock and then at Cas with a look.

Cas raised one finger. Wait.

Dean rolled his eyes.

Crowley droned on about branding and leverage, something about coalescing algorithms and cohesive trajectories, and Dean sort of wanted to be Michael long enough to say something snide. He began a new doodle on his notepad. It was a hangman image with a stick figure in a kilt dangling by its neck over a pit of fire. Cas tapped Dean’s notepad with a stiff finger and sent him a stern look when Dean glanced up. He dropped his pen and let his head fall backward to stare upward.

“Thank you, Fergus,” Castiel said at last. “I’m sure I speak for everyone when I say I appreciate your support. Please be mindful of our time allowances. Your report is due no later than four o’clock central time, just like everyone else’s. I’m sure we all need to get back to it. If there’s nothing else?”

No one said anything.

“All right,” Cas sighed. “That’s it for now. Those of you packing up for Portland, finish your reports before you leave. No excuses. If you can’t keep up with your daily grind with a convention on your plate, it’s the convention that gets dropped, am I clear? We need to tighten up the rigging. Ask for help if you need it but stay focused on the core mission. The Facility comes first, before sing-a-longs.”

A chorus of “Yes, Alpha” echoed back at him, and he nodded.

“Dismissed.”

“Jesus Christ,” grumbled Dean, pacing the Alpha as they headed back downstairs toward their offices. “We’re not gonna survive that guy, Cas. He’s killing morale.”

“Patience, Dean. I’ll break him. Give me some time.”

“Wish I could’ve seen his face when you cut him off,” Dean murmured wistfully. “I’ll bet it was epic. Maybe Jonathon snapped a pic. I’d call that a real dick pic. Get it? Cause it’s a picture of a dick?”

“Try to remember that you are part owner of this institution and a responsible adult, my love,” Cas chided calmly with his eyes on the opened manila folder he carried. There was no heat in his voice at “Act the part for me, please. Fake it if you have to.”

Dean snickered, leaned in and kissed Castiel’s lips. “Yes, Alpha,” he promised. “Oh, if you need me, come on in. I’m set to DND on my phone and computer. Someone assigned reports due in an ungodly two hours. I’m swamped. And I may not be going to Portland, but that doesn’t mean I get out of signing off on the schedule for it. Probably need to stay late tonight. You wanna take Michael home for me? Swing back by later and pick me up?”

Cas frowned. “Can’t you finish up at home? It doesn’t make any sense to make two trips.”

Dean shook his head. “Can’t think at home. Too much going on. Too many people.”

Cas regarded him for a moment, watching Dean’s eyes. “Is it Sarah?” he asked carefully. “Dean, if it’s not going to work having her in the house, I’ll move her to the Guest house and limit her access.”

“It’s not Sarah, man. It’s the workload and the wedding details and all the crazy last-minute shit. It’s Portland, and extra security on the house, and the merger, and trying to get specs on expanding Dallas, and running a training department short-handed, and Michael’s pregnancy. You know me, Alpha. I don’t handle overload well. It’s too much. I need to shut myself into one of the H/R rooms and scream myself hoarse, if you really wanna know. This will be the first convention I’ve ever missed. You get that, right? I’m always there. I understand why you benched me, dude, but…”

Cas chuckled affectionately. He carded a hand through Dean’s hair. “It’s Thursday, Dean. Get through today and tomorrow, and I’ll reward you when you get home, no matter how many visitors might still be in the house. You can do it, alpha,” he said. “Do it for me.”

Dean smiled absentmindedly, enjoying the hand in his hair. “Wait. Reward?” he opened his eyes and looked at Castiel. “You said we were on a moratorium.”

“I never said that,” Cas told him. “We agreed to a one-week moratorium. Last I looked, tomorrow is a week and a day from our wedding. It’s also a Friday. If you’ll remember, I stated my intention to begin opening the gates for a foursome on a Friday to make sure we have the capacity to rest or to heal as needed after what may turn into an intense experience. I believe you were the one who jumped to the conclusion that my trip to New York without you was a declaration that our hiatus had begun. I never made any such statement. What’s more, I’m declaring Saturday a day of rest. No one will do any work on Saturday whatsoever outside of basic necessity.”

Dean stared at him.

Cas lowered his chin. “Get through today, Dean. Tough it out and get through tomorrow, and I’ll reward you. Deal?”

“When you say, ‘get through it’, what d’you mean?”

Cas laughed. “Assuming you don’t die. Lord, please don’t die. All you have to do is tuck your head, stay focused, meet your deadlines like you always do, ask for help if you find you can’t meet a deadline, and meet me in the playroom at 6:30 on Friday evening. Can you do that?”

“I can do that,” Dean told him dreamily.

“Good. Get to work. You now have an hour and fifty minutes to get that report to my desk.”

“Fuck,” Dean exclaimed, checking the time on his phone.

Cas swatted him as he turned to leave. It wasn’t hard enough to hurt. It merely warmed Dean’s right ass cheek and made him jump. “You’re adorable, and I’m in love with you, Winchester,” Cas called.

“You’re a sap,” Dean called back. “And you swing like a girl.”

Cas laughed. He’d show Dean. He knew some girls who could swing with intent. Cas considered it a compliment. His door latched behind him, and his lightness fell away. Like Dean, Cas had more to finish than he could possibly accomplish before the wedding. The two of them had some late nights ahead of them and precious little time to devote to last minute wedding details. Thank God for Michael and Kali.

Cas went rapidly through his messages, sorting them into business, political, personal, and confidential. He dialed the assisted care facility where his mother now lived and checked up on her, taking the full report down in his personal journal before phoning the woman herself.

“Hello, Mother. How are you feeling?” Feeling guilty about splitting his attention, Cas scrolled through his emails, hoping she couldn’t tell she only had one of her son’s ears.

“Abysmal, Castiel,” she replied sharply. “The way patients are treated in this place. It’s a disgrace. How did you select it, by throwing darts at the phone book?”

“You need to do the physical therapy, Mother,” Cas replied. “And you need to do the mental exercises as well. Your mind will stay sharp longer. We talked about this. You agreed to follow the therapists’ recommendations. I’m hearing that you’re combative and uncooperative. Those exercises aren’t for the staff’s health; they’re for yours. If we need to alter something, I’ll look into it, but if you’re putting up a fight because you simply don’t like them, I cannot help you.”

“Therapists! More like Dungeon masters. Those people are evil, Castiel.”

“Mother, no one can make you help yourself. You have to commit to it on your own. You have a degenerative condition. Every opportunity you have to slow its progression is an opportunity you won’t get back.”

The line went quiet, and Cas turned away from his monitor to make sure the connection was still intact.

“I’m tired, son. I’m not sure what the point is to all this work. You told me yourself that there’s no hope of reversing the direction of the disease. Why make me pretend I have any control? Who’s it for? Me? Is it for me, Castiel?”

Cas sighed. “Mother, with a little effort on your part, with a positive mental attitude, you can still live a relatively normal life for years. Years. If that doesn’t matter to you, I can’t change your mind, but you still have a life to live, and it’s not like you to give up before you’ve thrown everything you have at the issue.”

“…At the issue,” she repeated. “You think I’m not behaving like myself? Have you forgotten to whom you’re speaking? Perhaps it isn’t me who needs to readjust her expectations. Perhaps I’m not behaving like myself because I no longer AM myself. You cannot possibly imagine what the silence in my head feels like. It’s dreadful, Castiel. So, you’ll forgive me if I don’t jump up and down for joy that working with Attila the Hun every day and playing his patronizing games might allow me to enjoy even more of this.”

Cas licked his lips. His palms broke out in a sweat at the thought of what it must be like to try to carry on without his Secondary designation thinking thoughts in and around his own. The silence would be unbearable.
“Mother, please try. You’re going to have some bad days. We know that. We talked about that, remember? But there will be good ones as well. The silence won’t feel as oppressive with time. And I know you’ve always wanted to be a grandmother. If you can’t do it for yourself, can you possibly do it as a means to be present to get to know your grandchildren? Michael’s already carrying our first, and April and I plan to have pups just as soon as we can. This time next year, you could be holding your grandson, possibly more pups than one. Please. Please don’t give up. You’ve never given up on anything in your life. I don’t believe that was all your beta’s doing. I don’t believe it.”

“Michael’s son is not my grandchild,” she protested weakly.

“Oh, yes he is. He’s Michael’s and Dean’s, but he’s also April’s and mine. He will be your own grandson as surely as any child who comes from my seed.”

“Don’t speak crudely, Castiel. You may practically bathe in the stuff in private, but there’s no need to speak coarsely about it to your mother.”

He smiled grimly. “There you are. I knew you were in there somewhere. Listen, I’ll be by on Sunday. Gabriel is coming on Saturday with Kali to bring you dinner and to eat with you. I’ll speak to the therapy team about customizing your therapy so that you tolerate it better. It does no good to go through the motions if it’s not meeting the goal of helping improve your quality of life.”

“If I hear the phrase, ‘Quality of Life’ one more time, I’ll shriek,” she threatened, and Castiel couldn’t blame her. Hers was a grim trajectory. But he wasn’t ready to let her waste away to skin, bones, and nightmares yet.

“You have my word,” he said gently. “Mother, Kali has your dress for the wedding. She’ll do a fitting while she’s there. Please be kind to her. She’s your daughter-in-law, and she makes Gabriel happy. It gains you nothing by antagonizing your son through insults to the people he loves. Do you understand?” It come out with an unusual inflection, not the standard demand for acquiescence, but a query to check if she’d comprehended. He could no longer take that for granted.

“I will be the perfect hostess and a perfect mannequin as well. You have my word, too, son.”

“Thank you,” he told her, and he meant it. “By the way, your office has been in touch with Monday’s voting decisions. They asked me to pass them along, so I’m emailing you. If you disagree with any of the choices, there’s time for you to discuss it with them. I only ask that you go through me rather than contacting them directly. There are legal concerns to consider.”

Silence followed again.

“Mother?”

“I…don’t want to know, Castiel. That isn’t my responsibility any longer.”

“Legally, no, but they are still the team you assembled. They’ve made a commitment to seeing your mandate through to the election. They want your input.”

“No,” she said vehemently. “Not anymore.”

“All right,” he said sadly. “I’ll inform Anita. I’ll let her know that the torch is in her hands now. I’m sure she’ll be sad to hear that, but she’ll understand. They all will.”

“Castiel, I hate to cut you short, but my program is starting. Do call again, won’t you?”

“Goodbye, Mother. Be well. I love you.”
“Yes, of course. Goodbye, son.”

No sooner had he hung up than Becky transferred a call from the team of attorneys working feverishly toward the merger. Dates had been announced, and the clock was ticking. Castiel took the call and was swept away into a maelstrom of activity. He didn’t have time to fret over his mother’s condition.

Dean closed his door and leaned against it for a moment, closing his eyes, feeling the odd tingle where Castiel’s hand had just smacked him. Sometimes it felt like the two of them were truly bonded with the way their bodies reacted to each other. He didn’t linger though. That report wasn’t going to write itself, and he’d promised. Everyone had promised. Cas needed status reports, including full gap analyses on the condition of every department and sub-department, and he needed them right now so the planners and the legal team could get the final pins in place for the merger. Dean had most of the data, but he still needed to assemble it into something Cas could read and understand at a glance.

He slid into his chair and dialed Jonathon in Dayton.

“I know what you’re going to ask me,” Jonathon said as he answered without bothering with ‘Hello’. “And it’s already in your in-box. That’s everything from the Keller training side. Do you want to talk through it, or do you just wanna paste it and go?”

“Hello to you too,” Dean joked, navigating to the data file and scanning through it. “Nah, buddy, this is golden. Thanks a million. I’ll take it from here. Gonna mesh ‘em side by side, make it a cinch to see the differences. I’ve already got the tables set up and labeled. Oh, and by the way, you coming into town on Thursday or Friday? Michael wanted a final check on the hotel bookings and who might need reservations for dinner Thursday night.”

“I wish I could make it Thursday, Dean,” Jonathon replied. “But Crowley scheduled a staff meeting for Friday morning at ten. I can’t reschedule it, and I can’t miss it.”

“What a dick,” Dean responded. “He knows half the team is planning to be in K.C. that weekend. Jesus, I’m surprised he didn’t schedule it for 4:30 in the afternoon.”

Jonathon huffed a humorless laugh. “I’ll bet he considered it,” he said. “But he knew there are limits to what people will take. He’d’ve been in a conference room by himself. I take it Crowley isn’t attending the wedding?”

“We should be so lucky,” Dean told him. “He’s flying in by private jet on Saturday just before the ceremony and skipping right back out a couple of hours later. He made sure we knew that.”

Jonathon laughed. “Such a workaholic. He’s a role model for the rest of us. Talk to you later, Dean. See you on Friday if you’re not tied up with wedding crap.”

“Bye, man. Safe flight.”

The report he’d promised – bright and shiny, professional, thorough, and accurate – hit Castiel’s inbox with twenty minutes to spare and carried a very inappropriate, very suggestive subject line.
Castiel smirked as he read the title. Finding a way to motivate Dean had never been difficult. Cas mentally added, ‘Need to choreograph a foursome’ to his To Do list and began to review the report.

By Friday evening, their first Friday Pack dinner with Sarah, everyone’s nerves were frayed. Sam’s empty chair had a double-wide bouncy seat strapped onto it, and Jess fussied over her boys. Beside Dean, Michael rolled his shoulders and shifted in his chair, looking for a comfortable way to sit on reddened flesh. The day’s Dom class had not gone smoothly for Michael.

Dean had, on top of everything, sat with Cas through a video conference with Cain once he’d finally responded to the job offer. Grilling the man by video wasn’t remotely satisfying when his scent wasn’t detectable, and Dean still felt unresolved about it; unresolved about everything to do with Darius Cain, most especially the idea that he might be invited to join the pack if the connections fell well into place. Cas assured him that that decision was still some ways off, down the road.

April had begun to carry the energy of her work sessions around with her, a little wild-eyed and manic. Gabriel seemed to be riding her high-strung notes. His jokes were louder and coarser than usual, enough that even Kali found them irritating, and the newlyweds snapped at each other more than once.

“Everyone stop,” Castiel told them firmly after they’d begun to eat and the stress from each wolf ricocheted one to another. “Stop. Set down your utensils. Close your eyes. Breathe. We need a moment of peace. Shh.” He put his arms outward to the side corners, giving one hand to April and, with a forearm resting across his nephews, giving the other to Jess. Both women took his hands. With a clattering of cutlery, the rest of the table followed suit. Jess slid her hand into Sarah’s. Sarah hesitantly took Michael’s. Michael squeezed Dean’s hand with a solid grip. Dean smiled softly at him and then turned to take Gabriel’s hand on his other side. Gabe let his be captured, but his eyes were on his wife’s as he kissed her hand and winked. Kali rolled her eyes and then turned to cover April’s hand on the tablecloth.

“Eyes closed,” Cas reminded them. “Let’s calm down together. It has been a wearisome week, and we’ve all accomplished a great deal. I want each of us to spend a few moments in review, silently within ourselves. Think through everything you’ve done since last Sunday, and marvel at yourselves. I am exceedingly proud of each and every one of us. Right now, I want you examining why you deserve to be proud of yourselves.”

There was a snort from down the table, but it was soon stifled. Silence, but for their breathing, filled the dining room.

“Gabriel, close your eyes, please.”

“Pshhh, you wouldn’t have known mine were open if you had yours closed.”

“Shh!”

“Heartbeats slowing.” The Alpha’s voice was hypnotic. “Breaths deepening. Slow down. Stop being for a moment, and float.”

He let them glide for a few more moments, conscious that dinner was cooling on their plates. With a squeeze to April’s hand, he opened his eyes and found her blinking at him with a soft sigh. Her eyes no longer looked tight. She nodded wordlessly, then turned to apply the same pressure to Kali to bring her out too. It went like that back around the table, even Gabriel blinking calmly as his eyes opened and his head lifted with a deep breath.
“Better?” Castiel asked his pack.

Sarah was bemused. “Is that a ritual you do often? Like saying grace in a way? It was lovely.”

Cas addressed his meal with knife and fork, answering with his head down. “No, we’ve never done that before. It was a spontaneous response to an unsettled energy level. A pack that is that keyed up is destined for conflict. I would rather enjoy our meal together than bicker.” He spared a glance into the seat at his left, Sam’s seat, and found both boys watching him with wide, interested eyes. “It had no religious significance. Rather, it was a meditative practice.”

“Many prayers are just that, Alpha,” she said with a portion of chicken on the end of her fork. “It’s a renewal of community and fellowship to pray together as much as it is a conversation with God. It’s very often a meditation within the self as well. Prayer has all kinds of positive effects.”

He nodded in understanding. “Well, in future, if we do that again, please feel free to use that time to offer a prayer as you would. You are welcome to make yourself a home in this house, Sarah. I consider you pack while you’re under my roof, and your needs will be met here. That includes spiritual ones that differ from ours.”

“Thank you, Alpha,” she said shyly, unaccustomed to such a direct expression of acceptance. Did that mean that if she began dating someone, that he would be welcome to share her bed here and show up at breakfast in a bathrobe? Not that she had any prospects for such a role at the moment or any time available in which to squeeze such a person. But she had no idea what the future held or how long she might call this place home.

“You’re welcome,” said Cas. “In every sense.”

Conversation began to break the formality of the moment, springing up around the table organically now that the pack had skipped back down several orbitals to its natural energy level, and laughter took the place of anxiety. Announcements were made as usual. Discussions varied from the personal to the global, and everyone but the twins took part. Dean told the Pack that he and Michael had agreed to a trial period with Michael taking a chair in panel discussions at the next seminar. Kali updated everyone about what remained incomplete going into the last week before the wedding, with Michael adding commentary to her list.

Cas announced new safety rules in light of the influx of hate mail the Pack was receiving following their newest social media posts. No one was to go anywhere off the estate alone without his personal approval. Betas and Omegas would be required to have a security guard with them at all times outside the gates. Jess got nowhere in arguing with him. Their personal bodyguards would move into her house as soon as Sam returned from Portland and took his family back home. He’d already been informed and agreed to it.

“It’s a temporary measure, Jess,” Cas said. “But I insist. Further protest is unwelcome. The matter is closed. You will comply with my command.” His eyes offered her no softness, and she mumbled her acquiescence with her head lowered.

“Thank you,” he told her. “Don’t test me on this, any of you. You will find I mean business.” He met everyone’s eye, one by one, and only moved on once he was certain he had their compliance. Kali would bear watching, but she seemed resigned to carting a bodyguard with her to work every day. Finally, he nodded and shifted onto the topic of April’s progress. He asked her to update the Pack on everything she had on her plate.

Everyone, it seemed, had an opinion about Cain. Even Sarah. But in the end, Castiel made it clear that how and when and to what degree the alpha-Sub took a place in the Pack was his decision, and he would make it when he saw fit.

Dean’s green eyes weighed the statement for a moment, and then he nodded and turned back to his plate with a hearty complement to Tony’s use of a glossy citrus glaze. Cas knew he hadn’t heard the last of Dean’s input on the matter. It had become painfully clear during the video call that Dean didn’t like the man, predictable in that they were both alpha-Submissives. Dean would be watching him with unflappable persistence, and Cas expected to need to intervene more than once in the coming months.

Michael took the news with a surprising degree of acceptance, considering that Cas had clearly stated the full role he expected the man to fill, as it were. Thinking through how Michael might find it such a benign turn of events, Cas could only conclude that Michael welcomed anyone who pulled the spotlight off of his own plans for April. Someone else in the Pack with the authority to touch her so intimately, someone who had such clear and delicate lines of acceptable behavior to traverse, who would draw Castiel’s wolf’s attention away from Michael, such a person was no threat to Michael at all, he was a gift.

Dean had argued with Castiel after the video conference, worried for April’s safety more than Cain’s if Castiel’s wolf determined the man was overstepping his authority the first time he touched her. But Cas brushed him off. Cain might someday be Pack, but his role was institutional, not personal, and Castiel’s designations knew the difference. Hadn’t she successfully completed Ozzie training without his wolf raising a stink? It was the same thing, Castiel insisted. Cain was a proxy, not an intimate.

“Until he falls in love with her,” Dean countered in the privacy of Cas’ office.

“He’s gay, Dean. But even if that should come to pass in a platonic way,” said the Alpha. “Her bond is with me. Her heart is fully occupied between Michael and me. She has no reason to become emotionally enmeshed with her chaperone.”

“Reason? When have emotions ever followed the track of reason? Didn’t you see ‘The Bodyguard’, man? Whitney Houston, Kevin Costner? Big, vibrant song at the end?”

Cas huffed a laugh. “Yes, Dean. I saw that movie. And that song was Dolly Parton’s before it was Whitney Houston’s.”

“That’s right,” Dean agreed. “And Dolly’s movie was the same thing. The vulnerable girl falls for her big, brave protector man.”

“April isn’t vulnerable,” Cas insisted.

“Are you just gonna make the same mistakes all over again?” Dean asked bluntly.

“No!” Cas shot back vehemently. “Things have changed. I have the full scope of April’s emotions open before me now. No one’s going to sneak into her affections without me knowing about it. That’s not ever going to happen again, Dean.”

“So it doesn’t sneak up on you, and instead you get to watch it all unfold live and in stereo sound. It’s not gonna change anything, man. If she goes for this jackass, there’s nothing you can do about it. And you’re gonna have to stand there and know that his knot has been inside your mate’s ass, and there’s not a damn thing you can…”

Cas growled loud enough that Dean’s mouth snapped shut. “That’s NOT going to happen,” he insisted again. “I vetted this guy. He’s not her type at all. She’s certainly not his. There’s no chemistry between them, no spark, not even the frictional kind like she had from the start with Michael. Dean, at some point, we have to let go and trust our mates. I may not fully trust Cain yet, but I trust April.”

Dean shook his head, but he didn’t argue.

“We can’t be worried every moment that someone in the world is going to turn our mate’s eye,” Cas went on. “At some point, we have to trust that our connections with them are strong enough to hold.”

Dean pressed his mouth into a tight line and then lost his battle to keep it shut. “Yeah, maybe so, Alpha, but this guy isn’t just anyone. He’s not just working with her. He’s gonna be paddling her bare ass and knotting her, and he’s gonna do it while you’re hundreds of miles away. Please don’t write it off as a business relationship. It’s gonna be so much more than that. And you might actually rip his head off his shoulders without ever realizing you’re at risk of doing that. Man, I need you to be sure. It’s too dangerous to take it lightly.”

Cas looked up at Dean from his desk chair and sighed. “I know.” He swallowed. “We’re all going to be very careful. But Dean, we don’t have a choice. If she’s going to make a go of it, there will need to be times she’s away from all of us. Unless you’re volunteering to quit your post and chaperone her, I don’t have a choice. It has to be an alpha, and he has to have full access. Nothing less will work.”

“You should’ve chosen a woman,” Dean said in resignation.

“I tried,” Cas conceded. “Believe me. I tried. And if I ever unearth a woman with the right qualifications, I will make the switch, for all our sakes. A homosexual man was the best I could do. In the meantime, April and I need your support to make this work. You don’t have to like him, Dean. But I need you to trust that she and I have put a great deal of effort and thought into this decision and give us the benefit of the doubt here.”

“And accept another alpha into the pack,” Dean pressed.

“Perhaps.”

Dean’s eyebrows met his hairline as he shrugged and lifted his palms outward. His eyes clearly said he thought his fiancé was digging his own grave but that Dean washed his hands of the responsibility for what might happen.

“Sam’s gonna love this,” he added sarcastically.

“Sam will cope,” Cas told him shortly.

“You really think your Alpha can handle another man fucking your mate?” Dean tried one last time, going for blunt. “Your wolf?”

“Yes, Dean. I believe that I can control myself if it means April has a chance of living fully to her vast potential. If I can temper myself to allow her an intimate connection with Michael, one that triggers my possessiveness far worse than a custodial alpha does, then I can manage this. We will see when the time comes for him to place a Claim. I intend to stand witness to that, and I will expect you to be there as well.”

“Yikes,” Dean said. “Have the whiskey handy. I’m gonna need eye bleach for this.”
As dessert was served, Castiel made another announcement.

“Dean, Michael, Kitten,” he introduced. “I believe the time has come. If the three of you are agreeable, I invite you to join me half an hour after dinner concludes. I will be in the Playroom. Your presence is voluntary. Your participation is likewise up to your own preference. I intend to take the evening to let my hair down a bit. Tomorrow, we rest. Tonight, if you’ll join me, we play.”

Michael had his head lowered tightly over his custard, spoon frozen in the process of scooping out a bite, eyes flicking between Cas, April, and Dean, waiting for someone else to speak first. He caught Dean smirking down the table at Cas. April met Michael’s eye with her lower lip caught in her teeth. Her cheeks held a beautiful blush, and her eyes a vivid light. A slow smile spread on Michael’s face, and he focused back into the shallow bowl before him, letting smooth custard slide down his throat.

“Can I kneel for you, Alpha?” asked Dean.

“We’ll see,” Cas answered cryptically. “I promised you a reward, and you met all of the requirements and then some. If you want to kneel, I’d like to give it a shot, but we will need to be cautious for this first attempt.”

Sarah’s ears had gone bright red. She didn’t need to be Lupin to feel the heat coming off of Michael’s body next to hers. She could feel the air pressure shift as the spark of the proposition turned him into a poised arrow, nocked and drawn, prepared to loose.

She cleared her throat uncomfortably, and Gabriel laughed. “Get used to it, kiddo. At least you’re not anyone’s brother. The time’s coming when you’re going to witness the full monty and not blink an eyelash. Hope you like backsides. You’re gonna see a lot of them, usually in an upright presentation, and usually a bright shade of pink.”

“That’s enough, Gabriel,” Cas chided.

“Right,” he retorted. “That was too much, but you four eye-fucking and talking D&S positions is fine. Apologies, Alpha.”

Jess and Kali both laughed. Soon, Sarah joined them, shaking her head, telling herself to get over it. Dinner was over, and Cas didn’t intend to wait around arguing with Gabe. He dismissed the table, and helped Jess unbuckle the twins’ seat as Tony appeared to begin clearing dishes with Fred.

“Thirty minutes,” Cas reminded Michael and April as he took Dean’s hand to lead him upstairs.

“Is that so you won’t get cramps?” Gabe wondered idly.

“See? That’s what I said,” Michael answered enthusiastically. The room began to empty. Michael remained in his seat, passively watching April who hadn’t stood up either. Soon, they were alone. Cautiously, she lifted her head and looked down the length of the table at him.

“Did you know he was going to propose this tonight?” Michael asked. “Did he tell you?” He shifted forward to put most of his weight on his lower thighs just above his knees.

She shook her head subtly, just a miniscule motion. Her gaze was guarded.

“Pete, if you don’t want me there…”

“I want you there,” she blurted.

“How there?”
She took a moment to consider the question. Then said, haltingly, “I…don’t want…to kneel…for you.”

He rolled his eyes impatiently and leaned forward onto his elbows with his hands clasped before him on the table. “I get that. I’m not asking you to. I’m not asking for anything but for you to tell me where we stand right now, you and me. Are you ready for this? Is it just sex? If it’s just sex, Pete, I can live with that. For now.”

Tony came back in to finish clearing on Michael’s last question, and then he backed quickly out again, reversing his steps. Michael turned his head slightly to watch him depart. When he turned back, her pale blue eyes caught his, and Michael felt his breath knocked out of him at their intensity. The moment lengthened into an unsustainable span. He couldn’t look away. He couldn’t breathe. Everything he’d been holding back for so many weeks was reflecting back at him in her eyes, and it was an offer. Not a demand. Not a question. Not a submission.

Just an offer.

His lips parted slightly. It wasn’t just sex.

“Can you give me that with him right there?” he asked quietly. “We don’t have to do it this way.”

“I want to do it this way,” she said, matching his volume. “I want everyone to see it, especially Castiel.”

“Pete.” He broke her gaze with a sharp intake of breath and a hand through his hair.

“Only if it’s what you want too, Michael. You’ve been so patient. You kept your word. You didn’t pressure me.”

“Jesus, I’m shaking,” he said into his lap.

“I don’t know what happens next, Michael. But I want you. I can’t pretend I can keep that separate from how much I love you. If you want to, I’d like for you to come with me, and I want to see what it’s like for you both to make love to me at the same time. I’m being selfish…” Her eyes fell back to her lap.

“You’re not,” he insisted.

She risked a look up at him. “Oh, yes, I am.”

His eyes softened, and his ears turned bright red. “Then we’re both being selfish. I’m so turned on right now I could dive right over this table and take you here, and still make it to the Playroom in half an hour.”

She smiled wickedly. “Wouldn’t that surprise them both? We would turn up already reeking of sex.” She laughed at the image of the alphas taken by surprise, and then she blushed and looked away again. “They’re kissing,” she said with her eyes tracing a path through the floor and several walls set opaque between the two couples.

“Mm-hm.” Michael agreed, following her line of sight. Slowly, he stood up and rounded the table, holding a hand out to help her to her feet. For a moment, she only stared at his hand as if unsure that it might not bite her. He waited motionless, and when she put her trembling hand in his at last, he stepped back and let her pull against him instead of the other way around. Once they were both standing, he turned slowly away, her hand still in his, and he guided her from the dining room and across the parlor, across the foyer, into the Omega sitting room near the massive front door. She followed him wordlessly, pausing as he closed the door behind the two of them, standing still as he raised his eyes to hers, waiting motionless as he stepped deliberately closer at an impossibly measured pace. His hand came up to cradle her face with a touch that was so tender it was felt more in her soul than through her body. She shuddered, and he shushed her gently. Her eyes tracked his as he flickered his gaze down to her lips and then back up again. She could feel his body heat now. She could feel his breath, stuttered and shallow. She could smell coffee and custard.

Slowly, so slowly, he brought his face closer to hers. Their eyes jumped and danced, unsure where to settle, and then they slipped closed, first April’s and then Michael’s. The first tentative touch of lips sent a shiver through them both. It was barely a touch; a warm, delicate brushing of lips, and then he pulled back a little, opened his eyes to find hers, frowned in concerted intent, tilted his head a little, and moved back in to touch her lips again.

Her hands found his hips, and his both took places at the sides of her head, flexing his fingers through her hair. He pressed in closer with his body. She moaned softly and kissed him back, deepening the touch, setting her own intentions clearly before them both. His fingers tightened in her hair, and his kiss began to shift from careful to something that was anything but. Her lips parted the slightest bit, and he traced the shape of her mouth with his tongue along that part, not breaking the plane of her mouth, but exploring the very edge where their lips came together.

April’s fingers flexed. They gripped. She pulled. And Michael wrapped her up with both arms and dove into her mouth hungrily with a whine. Her back thumped against the door, and she kissed him back feverishly, starved. One of her arms traversed his upper back to cling to the opposite shoulder, and her other pulled hard at his lower back as she lost herself in the feel of his mouth, the taste of him, the texture of his tongue, and his teeth against hers.

That they could both still feel their mates’ passion tipping over within them wasn’t lost on either of them, and a part of each of them hoped their mates weren’t so enmeshed in each other that they couldn’t feel the echoes from the front Omega sitting room. Michael wanted Dean’s attention, and he wanted Castiel’s. Shifting the tilt of his head, Michael took hold of April’s jaw and he plunged into her mouth, investing himself in learning where his fantasies had strayed from reality, and where they were real. What she tasted like, felt like, smelled like. God, what she smelled like. A throaty growl slipped out of his mouth and into hers, and she swallowed the sound, utterly taken, utterly overwhelmed. Her hand slipped downward to take a firm hold of his ass, and he nearly lifted off the floor in his haste to get away from the painful grasp, huffing hard with his head thrown backward. His hand closed around her wrist and pulled her hand clear even as he blew hard breaths out through pursed lips.

“Fuck!” he moaned, closing his eyes again and dropping his head onto her shoulder.

“I’m sorry,” she said into his ear, her hand hovering over the seat of his pain, not touching, and he let go of her wrist and shook his head.

“Not your fault,” he huffed breathlessly. “Got forty today in class with the hole-punched paddle for mouthing off. Had that doubled for me when I got home. I’m a little tender right now.”

“Jesus, Michael. Are you…sure you wanna…”

“I’m sure,” he told her adamantly, lifting his head and letting her see it in his eyes, how very sure he was. “Just, maybe you could wait a few days before the ass-grabbing.”

She giggled sympathetically, shifting to holding his waist instead of his butt, and she leaned back into him with wide eyes. “Come here and let me kiss it better,” she whispered.
“If you’re kissing it better, it’s not my lips that hurt,” he pointed out, but he met her lips anyway, and they disappeared into the slick, hot slide of lips and tongues and the feel of each other’s hands.

He pulled away, breathless, aware that she could feel the hard line of his cock against her hip. He stood panting, staring into her eyes, and she mirrored him, an indescribable look on her face.

With effort, a world of effort, Michael stepped back slightly, pulling his body clear of hers. He blinked slowly, finding his breath. April’s arms let him put distance between them, settling back upon the softly padded hipbones that had once been sharp. His lips closed. He swallowed. He watched her follow suit. Fuck, she was beautiful. His head swam. What followed was a long moment of connection in silence. He caressed her nape and traced his hand along the curve of her jaw to catch her chin lightly between his thumb and knuckle. He smiled softly, and warm lines appeared at the corners of her eyes to match.

April leaned forward and placed her forehead against Michael’s. He let her rest that way for a breath or two, and then he tilted in to kiss the tip of her nose.

“I like who I am when I’m with you,” he whispered.

“Me too, Michael. You make me want to be my best self. Even Castiel doesn’t make me feel that way.”

“We need to stop now, or we won’t be able to stop,” he said, pulling back further, getting his legs beneath him. “I’m in real danger of not being able to stop when I’m this close to you. You smell so good to me.”

“Cas is going to let us have this, let us have each other,” she said, her pupils widening.

“One thing at a time,” he told her. “Let’s see how this evening goes. And then we’ll know more about what he means to allow.” Michael tapped her temple gently. “How is he responding to what we just did?”

She grinned easily. “I’m not sure he noticed.”

“Hm. Maybe we should try it again.” Michael stepped back up into her space and petted a long caress down the back of her head, letting her silky hair fall lightly through his fingers. “If he hasn’t noticed, I’m obviously not doing it right.”

Grin still in place, April lifted her face up to his and fell once again into his kisses. There was nothing chaste or tentative about the way he kissed her this time. He let go with his hands, pulling her in tight with his elbow crooking around the back of her neck, and his mouth opening wide against hers, all hungry noises and muscle. She went lax in his embrace, holding onto his shoulders, letting him take the kiss, letting him in.

One kiss melded into the next, one touch shifted into the next. Their lips swelled and reddened, their hungry mouths couldn’t quite get deep enough, wide enough, rough enough, and soon they were rutting helplessly into each other, both swept away by the sensations.

April broke away first, a gasp and a shocked look in her eyes. “That got his attention,” she panted, staring at Michael in dismay.

“Good,” he said, running his hand down her arm and catching up her hand to kiss her knuckles. “Is he angry?”

“No,” she shook her head. “He’s turned on. I don’t think he’s going to wait until the half hour mark.
He’s moving downstairs right now, and he seems to be in a hurry.” She giggled a little.

“Not coming in here,” Michael mused, catching Dean’s swift progress down the wide stairs just outside in the foyer and on down the back stairs toward the Playroom. “Fuck, this is weird.” He let his mind trace Dean’s, and then he looked back at April.

“Are you ready, Pete?” He squeezed her hand, and she nodded eagerly.

“More than,” she said.

“Come on. Let’s see what the Alpha has planned.”

Trotting eagerly across the marble foyer, the two Omegas hurried hand in hand to the narrow hallway and its half-flight of stairs, catching sight of the Playroom door just as it closed on spring hinges behind their mates, and the grinned as they followed the two men.

Pushing the door open and holding it for April, Michael caught Dean already stripping out of his clothes. His mate’s eyes were lust-blown and intense, Dean’s lips as swollen and red as Michael was certain his own were. April darted in and began to disrobe without a word.

Castiel stood near the door, watching Dean. At their entrance, he turned to Michael.

“That was a short thirty minutes, Alpha,” Michael observed.

“I rounded up,” Cas admitted. “The original plan was to review our progress from this week, Dean and me, and to set some preliminary goals for next week. That’s not what happened.”

“No, we noticed.”

“Kitten,” Castiel said in an assertive voice, turning away from the door. “Are you open to allow me to lead us this evening in a foursome? I don’t intend to layer any extra Dom / Sub activities on top of our natural proclivities. Tonight is purely for pleasure. Are you in?”

“I’m in, Alpha. All in,” she declared stoutly as she folded her clothing neatly on the countertop.

“My safeword is Celestial,” he reminded everyone. “Kitten, please state yours.”

“Beethoven,” she said clearly. Very clearly. As if it was the highest of importance that everyone in the room heard her. Castiel laughed right out, grinning like a fool, and shaking his head as he turned back to Michael.

“Michael? Same questions.”

“I’m as in as it’s possible to be, Alpha.”

“And your safeword?”

“Cavalier.”

“Yes, you are,” the Alpha noted agreeably. “Dean?”

Dean was already on his knees within the confines of his blue square, signaling his readiness, but he too answered clearly. “Full speed ahead, Alpha.”

Cas snickered at their enthusiasm. He took a couple steps closer to Dean, leaving Michael at his back. “And your safeword, Pet?”
“Irrelevant,” said Dean with his eyes twinkling into Castiel’s.

Cas came to a dead stop and stared at Dean. “Interesting. We are starting things off like that, are we? Fine. Remove yourself to my favorite spanking bench, Pet, and settle onto it.”

“Yessir!” said Dean, springing up and climbing into position. Cas held his hand out to his mate as he walked forward into Dean’s line of view. She met him, and went up onto her toes as Castiel pulled her immediately into a bruising kiss, bending her harshly over the support of his arm and then breaking away with a ‘POP’.

Setting April back upright, he beckoned Michael closer, and shocked both of their mates by doing precisely the same thing to him. Michael came back upright breathless and wide-eyed, panting hard and stumbling a bit. Castiel held his eye with a smolder that robbed Michael of whatever oxygen he had left, and then turned to face Dean. He bent low and captured Dean’s lips with his own, adding a bite to the tender flesh that made Dean cry out and flinch before he released him.

“Michael, my friend,” Cas called behind him teasingly. “The floor is yours while I correct my Submissive. My mate is yours to touch however you both like with the exception of any act that could impregnate her. Kindly, keep your semen out of her fertile orifices, and you will hear no objection from me.”

“Jesus Christ,” Michael whispered, turning his gaze from Cas to April. “Pete?”

Her eyes sparkled to match Dean’s, hungry and burning with desire. “Michael, please.” Her voice was broken, barely more than a breathy whisper. He scrambled out of his clothes.

At the bench, Castiel trailed a hand down Dean’s bare back from shoulder to divot, watching chill bumps erupt under his fingernails. “What is your safeword again, Pet?”

“Impala,” Dean answered right away.

“That’s not what you told me the first time, is it?”

“No, Sir!”

Michael made it to April in one big step, knelt with her down onto the padded floor, laid her out beneath him, and crashed his lips against hers. For her part, she kissed back, clutching back onto him, a continuation of what they’d started upstairs, but this time in full view of their mates, totally nude, and grinding into each other with their hips.

“If I ask you a question, and you give me a false answer, what sin have you committed?” Castiel asked conversationally.

“It’s a lie, Sir,” Dean stated with his head craned back to watch his Alpha.

“How do I feel about being lied to, Dean Michael?” Castiel asked with a hard swat to his ass. Dean groaned and clenched his eyes closed.

“You hate it, Sir!”

“What is your safeword, Dean?”

“IMPALA!” The spanking continued. No safeword would stop a punishment this clearly earned, not even as Castiel demanded he repeat it at volume five more times. Dean’s eyes fought to stay open as Michael found himself impossibly hornier having his own mate watching him rut shamelessly into the Alpha’s mate. Dean shouted in pain, finding it an outlandishly difficult task to work through the burning sensations with Michael so present in his head, and the two Omegas so engrossed in each other before him. He could tell that Cas was watching them too. He could feel it in the way Cas funneled his lust into the swing of his arm, and Dean felt tears spring into his eyes. The room swam before him, and he panted hard.

In front of him on the floor, Michael turned his head, winked meanly, and shifted downward to suckle on April’s nipple. She threw her head back and moaned, holding onto his head. Michael’s hands went everywhere on her body, and her entire body flushed in response.

Cas hit Dean harder, breaking him into closing his eyes again, pulling another yell from his throat.

“You did tell me you needed to scream, Pet. Will this do?”

“AAAAaaaarrgggh! Yes…SIR!” Dean shouted, flush with heat of his own, hard cock bobbing below the edge of the bench, and getting no friction. Dean’s body was on fire. He wrested his eyes back open. Michael had shifted again and was teething gently at April’s labia with painless nibbles. Her hands were so tightly woven into his hair, it had to hurt, and her thighs trembled as she wrapped them over his shoulders. Michael’s inflamed backside glowed in presentation, a beacon for any alpha, but neglected for the time being. Castiel hit Dean again twice more, and then he appeared back in front of the prone alpha, kissing the daylights out of him, clutching at his hair.

“Are you sorry, Dean Michael?” he said breathlessly. Dean nodded, unable to get the words out. Castiel’s eyes flickered back and forth between his, too close to meet them both at once, and desperate not to miss anything. “Are you really?”

“Yes, Alpha,” Dean managed, still panting hard.

Cas shook his head in forbearance. Dean wasn’t sorry at all. But his ass was on fire, and that’s what they’d both wanted. Cas cocked his head toward the Omegas writhing on the floor. “Go on, then.”

Dean didn’t have to be told twice. He vaulted from the bench and buried his face in his mate’s upturned ass, red and swollen from the day’s correction, and Michael’s squawk, muffled by the depth of his tongue inside April, sent her convulsing against the floor.

Castiel sauntered toward the three of them, loosening his tie as he strolled. The cufflinks popped next, gathered up in his palm as he walked slowly around his lovers, his eyes feasting on them from above. Turning to the back, Castiel made quick work of his clothes, honed in tightly to the noises behind him. He could feel what Michael’s tongue and lips, his hands, were doing to April, and he could feel how much she was enjoying the man’s touch. Barely even started, April was close already.

Castiel walked back to the trio slowly, letting his Alpha feast its eyes on the fracas, dropping a small handful of foil packets on the floor at his feet. Dean’s hands had Michael’s thighs in such a tight grip that Michael’s legs bore white streaks where Dean’s fingers slipped in his sweat. Michael was keening a high, shrill note into April’s body as Dean ate him out, and the view from above was incredible. Castiel knelt down at April’s shoulder, then he laid down, stretching out beside her and catching her attention to look into his eyes. Castiel made certain he was touching each of them along the length of his body, and slowly, he closed the distance between April’s lips and his.

He tasted coffee on her tongue. April hadn’t had any coffee at dinner. But Michael had. Cas pulled back, feeling himself spin, staring hard into his mate’s eyes as she felt herself overstimulated. Michael’s tongue was relentless, and she whimpered. Cas kissed her again, rolling into her and taking her mouth hard with his own. Her went deep into her sensations, into the power that he’d granted Michael to make her feel pleasure that drove her mad. Cas broke the kiss and pressed his mouth close to her ear.

“Come for Michael, Kitten,” he whispered.

“Oh! GOD!” she cried out, wrapping her legs around Michael’s head and pressing his face in as tightly as she could as her core pulsed a measured rhythm and slick issued from her channel.

“Atta girl,” Castiel crooned into her ear. He reached down along her side and stroked her body, damp with exertion until his fingers found Michael’s hair. Pulling, he brought Michael upward to loom over April, still alight with aftershocks, and he pushed himself up onto his elbow and kissed Michael hard, tasting April on his tongue. Michael rutted his cock into the crease of April’s hip, losing control completely as Castiel fucked into his mouth aggressively.

Dean followed Michael’s flattening body by crawling upward between April’s legs. He got his knees beneath him and pressed them outward to spread Michael’s legs, taking April’s along with them, and catching sight of Castiel’s hand slithering down beneath April’s thigh to press a finger into her channel. Dean used his hands to press Michael’s sore cheeks apart, and he dove in with his tongue, mimicking Castiel’s finger, and licking up the slick reward that gushed outward in spasms.

There was an intimacy between Dean and his fiancé that Dean hadn’t expected as the two of them shared their mates. It was a layer of closeness that pulled them tighter together instead of distancing them from each other.

Why the fuck had they waited so long to do this?

Dean whimpered when Michael clenched his channel tightly, catching the alpha’s tongue mid-thrust, and forcing him to work against the pressure to keep it in there, then Michael released his muscles, and his channel fairly sucked Dean inward, pulling at his tongue from within.

“Alpha!” April cried. She was inundated with sensation, bodies above her, beside her, at her calves and feet. Michael had broken away from Castiel’s kiss to apply a vicious suction to her left nipple, and Castiel mouthed hungrily at her bruised and broken Mating-scar even as he forced a second thick finger into her channel.

Michael whimpered at what Dean’s tongue was doing inside him, despite the agony of his mate’s grip on his sore ass, and he leaned hard on his left hand to run his right one down to circle his own erection. Three quick and flurried swipes, and he came with a groan, spilling over his own hand and April’s tummy. If there was punishment to come for that later, so be it.

April followed him, caught by Castiel’s clever lips and teeth upon the sensitive nerves on her shoulder. Dean lapped eagerly at the slick Michael’s body produced, and then he kneed up behind him and buried his cock to the hilt in his mate’s channel, snapping his hips powerfully forward, only to pull back out slowly and do it again. Castiel sat up and got to his feet. He pulled April out from under Michael with his hands beneath her shoulders, and he let Michael fall gracelessly to his elbows. Pressing April down into the same position facing Michael, Cas took to his knees too. He snatched up one of the foil packets near his foot and rolled the condom over his cock with a snarl of distaste. He shifted forward on his knees, wiped his hand gently through the slick at April’s inner thigh and coated himself in her moisture. He entered his mate from behind, mirroring the other couple.

Dean smirked. “I’ll race you, Alpha,” he goaded, thrusting harder into his mate, and feeling Michael shut his eyes tight at the pleasure. Dean rolled his hips deeply and nailed his prostate, then he did it again.
“You’ve got a head start,” Cas objected, but he wasted no time in catching up, and April collapsed beneath Michael’s chin and chest with a loud grunt. Michael followed her down and let her hair fill his vision. The alphas fucked furiously, forcing their mates to share the space before them, a mess of hair and shoulders and heads jouncing into each other. Castiel’s eyes burned with a fierce light as he gritted his teeth and raced to beat Dean over the edge. Dean threw everything he had into the effort, slamming into his mate’s slick channel and setting Michael’s gluteus muscles into a furious ache just the same as if he’d opened back up on him with the paddle.

Michael’s nostrils flared as he craned his neck upward, rutting his nose against April’s throat and scenting her in full view of her mate, rolling his cheek into the gland behind her ear. She clung to the hair at the back of his head, forcing him in tighter, letting his shoulder crush against her Mating-bite, sending her into orbits of sweet sensation.

Castiel heaved at her hips with both hands, grunted a loud roar over her back, and came hard as his knot locked into place. Dean was only moments behind. He fell forward over Michael’s back with a cry of ecstasy. The four of them lay heaving and sweating, piled up in a damp heap, mouths agape and eyes closed. Cas wrapped an arm around April’s belly and fell sideways with his mouth sucking bruises into the side of her neck. Michael whined a protest and followed her as she tumbled sideways, pulling at his own mate until Dean caught the hint and eased to the side to join the others. All of them shuffled a bit to make an arrangement to satisfy everyone. Soon all four had their heads close together and their hands still sweetly caressing hot sweaty flesh.

April turned her face upward and gave her mate her swollen lips as she clench her channel around his knot. He moaned into her mouth and then stretched his neck to leave warm kisses along Dean’s sweaty temple. Dean chuckled an exhausted laugh, causing Michael to groan at the way his ass burned beneath the bend of Dean’s hips. Dean caught Michael’s lips in a sweet apology before turning back to Cas for a kiss that was anything but sweet.

“Not exactly a foursome, Alpha,” he muttered affectionately. “You’re knotted to yours, and I’m knotted to mine. This what you had in mind?” Dean’s smirk told Cas he wasn’t disappointed, just surprised. Cas was fast catching his breath.

He reached out and gently petted Michael’s arm, down his bicep to his elbow and back. “There’s not a plan, Dean. I set about making one, and then I threw it out. Did you have anything in mind?”

“Me? Babe, you know what I like. Surprise me.”

Cas chuckled darkly.

Dean continued. “And Michael wants the opposite. Whatever you’re thinking for me, he wants the exact opposite. Right?”

“Mm,” hummed Michael with his lips tracing April’s ear. “Yes, please. Maybe a little less doggie-style for the Omega with the blistered ass.”

Dean laughed. “See? Exact opposite.”

“I understand,” Cas told him. He began to trace a determined line with his tongue along April’s neck, diverting when his tongue met Michael’s to jump the gap and set Michael’s toes curling with a searing kiss. April and Dean both fell still and sleepy, riding the endorphins into a light doze as they waited out the alpha’s knots.

Some time later, Dean awoke to a gentle shaking at his shoulder. He lifted his head and looked around. Cas was squatting naked before him, and Michael and April were sharing the shower. His head thumped back down onto the floor. He smiled up at Castiel.

“Are you really okay with that?” he asked, nodding his head to the back of the room where the Omegas’ hands were cleaning one another in unclean ways. Cas smiled down at him then checked behind him to see what they were up to.

He made a facial shrug as he turned back around, and stood up, lowering his hand to pull Dean up. “Seems that way. My wolf isn’t concerned as long as it feels secure that Michael and April are both Pack and Michael doesn’t actually fuck her. I’m as surprised as you are. I expected to spend the evening with one hand on the leash, but the big guy is fine.”

“And your Secondary?” Dean asked, leaning sleepily against Castiel’s chest.

Cas kissed his temple again and held him in a loose embrace. “The Alpha seems to believe Michael is mine as much as you and April are. That might change if Michael presents a Dominant aspect toward her, but he doesn’t seem prone to doing that. He seems very strongly oriented as an Omega, and that makes all the difference I believe. We couldn’t have known that until we tested it.”

“And what about you, Castiel. April had his face in her crotch, man. She came like that.” Cas took a deep breath and gave Dean a slightly sheepish look, blushing slightly and looking away.

“Oh, really?” Dean teased. “You liked it. You like it a lot?” He broke into real laughter as Cas rubbed the back of his own neck and blushed deeper.

“What can I say, Dean? They make an enticing picture together.”

“Wow,” said Dean, taking the Alpha by the hand and shooing the Omegas out of the shower. “You remember what my record is, yeah?” he asked, turning Castiel around beneath the spray.

“Your record is still four, Pet,” Cas told him seriously.

“Right. Let’s break it.”

Hours and three more rounds later, April sat astride Michael’s hips riding his cock at a steady pace, the condom stretched tight over his erection, and her hands braced on Michael’s ribs. Somewhere along the way, the idea that Michael shouldn’t actually enter her had been cast aside in a lustful haze, and replaced with the declaration that as long as they used protection, Castiel’s wolf would have no issue. More precisely, Cas wanted to watch them fuck and had answered with a vague, “Whatever!” when Dean pressed him.

At Michael’s head, Dean knelt astride him facing April with his knees by Michael’s ears. Michael suckled wetly on one testicle and then the other, alternating randomly and using his tongue to lave over the wrinkled flesh and strain his tongue to run it up Dean’s erection while Castiel drove into the alpha from behind. Dean lost the bracing of his arms and let his torso fall lower, holding himself upright only enough to give Michael’s chin and lips free movement. Behind him, Cas thrust hard, and Dean found himself pressing backward with his hands to keep from bowling April over with his head in her belly.

“Yeah, Alpha!” he cried out. “Yeah. Just like that. Jesus Christ!”
Without notice, Castiel pulled out and kneed backward, calling, “Celestial!”

“What!”? Dean pulled up fast, stepping away from Michael’s warm lips and standing all the way up in a flash, backing several steps away. “Cas, baby. Are you okay? What’s wrong?” Dean’s face paled in alarm. April scooted backward toward Michael’s shins, slipping free of his cock, and sitting supremely still. Michael froze too, looking up at the Alpha, clearly assuming that it was he who had triggered the safeword, but unsure how.

Dean stepped up to his fiancé, a hand extended to touch his arm with a grounding caress, and he stooped down to put his face near Castiel’s as Cas stood bent over and panting. “Cas, what is it? Talk to me, man.”

“It’s you, Dean. You were…so close to April. You said you…didn’t want to…and I forced you too close. I had you right up on top of her. I’m so sorry.”

“Jesus fucking Christ, man, is that all?” Dean asked in relief. “That was nothing. We weren’t touching. I didn’t even notice. Holy fuck, you scared me.”

“It’s not nothing, Dean,” Castiel insisted. “I promised all of you we would be careful, and you were practically face-planting right in her breasts! I had to check on you! I had to put a stop to it.”

“A check-in, Cas! That’s all we needed. Jesus, I ‘bout had a heart-attack thinking your wolf was busting through. Next time, call a check-in. Hey, Dean, how are you doing down there? I’m just fine, Alpha. Harder please! Like that.”

Cas shook his head and sat heavily on the floor. Dean collapsed into his lap with his head against Cas’ shoulder. “I needed to pull you all the way out, Dean. I couldn’t rely on either of your subs or your brat or any of your usual in-scene presentations. I had to know for sure. The only way to do that is to pull you top-side with a safeword.”

Dean looked over his shoulder at Michael. “Michael, Alpha needs to know I’m fine. Tell him I’m fine.”

Michael, relieved beyond measure that he would live to see the sun rise, held a hand out to April to bring her back up to take her place again, saddle mounted, and as she slid back into her position, he said, “Dean’s fine, Alpha.”

“See? I’m fine. April? Kid are you fine with a gay man head-butting your belly while you ride my mate?”

“Yes, Dean,” she said, rolling her hips and grinding down on him hard. “I’m fine, too.”

“We’re all fine, man. False alarm. Can we get back to it? I’ve got a record to break, and I’m already past three.”

“Dean, I don’t believe you’re taking this seriously.” Castiel lifted him upright by his shoulders, looking intently into his eyes.

“Ca-aa-aas! It’s NOT a big deal. Come on, Alpha. We’re all good here. April’s good. Michael’s good. Look, they’re already back at it. Come on back. Here, I’ll help you up. Next time, though, don’t stop the play with a safeword when a check-in will do. Seriously” Dean stumbled to his feet and tugged on Castiel’s hand. Cas stood slowly, his demeanor taking on a far less playful tone. He caught Dean’s chin in a steel grip, and he held the alpha’s face close to his.

“I’m not playing, Dean. I don’t play when it comes to your safety.”
Dean mulled it over, then nodded and dropped back into place over Michael’s head. He immediately lowered himself back into a presentation position with the top of his head at April’s abdomen and his ass canted upward.

“See?” he called upward. “All good.”

“You’re mocking me,” Castiel told him flatly. “I pulled up in an intense moment to make sure we’re not pushing you past your comfortable boundaries, and you’re mocking me.”

“I’m not,” Dean protested wiggling his ass a little. “Please fuck me, Alpha.”

“Get up, Dean. We’re changing positions. On your feet. Kitten, roll off, love. I need your steed for another plan.” April obeyed immediately, sprawling on the floor on her tummy, and stretching out on the floor, certain she’d have more opportunities to play soon. Dean was slower to rise, but he did eventually, and as soon as he was clear, Castiel pulled Michael to his feet too and then left him to select a paddle from the wall. He hurriedly wiped himself down with a cleansing wipe and then returned to his playmates, hiding a cheerful wink at his mate.

“Here you go, Michael. See if you can deliver the message that he doesn’t want to hear from me.”

Michael took the paddle and looked it over. “Is this the same one Dean used on me when we got home?” He smacked his hand with it. Dean whimpered. “I think it is,” he decided, slapping it against his thigh.

“On your hands and knees, Dean,” Cas ordered. “You’re going to deep throat me while Michael sets you straight.” Dean fell lightly to his hands and knees. His erection, which had begun to flag, came roaring back to life as he settled his mouth and throat around Castiel’s massive bulk with his eyes straining to hold the man’s eyes. Before he was fully settled, the paddle cracked down against his ass, and he grunted loudly and dropped his jaw further.

“Like you mean it, Omega,” Cas said calmly, watching Dean’s eyes. The paddle fell again, harder. “That’s it. Just like we practiced. Can you feel how much that stings?”

“Yes, Sir,” Michael told him. “Both bonds are singing right now. He’s hard as a rock.”

“Very good. All right, then. Let him have it. Get him yelping.” Cas caught April’s greedy look, and he smirked. “Kitten, your job is to see if you can get you and Michael both off at the same time. Use your mouth and hands, and watch his body for signs that he’s close. The better your timing, the more pleased I’ll be.”

April scrambled into place, happily sucking Michael into her mouth and beginning to work diligently. Michael set all his concentration into swinging the paddle without dislodging the girl and into keeping his head on straight. Below him, Dean rocked on his hands and knees. Cas began a shallow thrusting into Dean’s mouth with his eyes wide open.

It would be anyone’s guess who might come first.

After a few minutes, it was April, followed closely by Michael, who dropped his paddle and buried his hand in her hair to hold her in place as he spilled down her throat. As the pulsing came to an end, he sank down to his knees with one hand still in her hair and ran an awe-filled palm over the mess of bruises across his mate’s backside, then he bent down and sank his teeth into Dean’s raging hot cheek. Dean released Castiel, and he screamed and came hard at the sensation, gulping down air as he tried to regain control. A hand at the back of his head pulled his face right back into Castiel’s groin, and Cas stroked himself a handful of times before painting Dean’s face with white, sticky streaks.

They collapsed again, breathing hard and spent.

“That’s four,” observed Dean. “One more to go to break the record.”

“I’m getting too old for breaking records,” Michael slurred.

“Speak for yourself, old man,” Dean countered. “I just need a short nap and some aloe.”

Cas lifted his head. “No, you don’t, Winchester. The rules state that application of medical intervention breaks the streak. You do it without aloe, or you tie the record.”

“Oh, yeah, baby. Talk dirty to me,” Dean crowed. Cas struggled to his hands and knees and crawled over to lean over Dean and kiss him far more tenderly than he’d done all night. Dean stared up at him with star-struck eyes.

“I’m so fucking in love with you, Dean Michael,” Cas told him, aware that their mates were both looking on. “You are my fantasies brought to life.”

“Ha ha, I knew you were playing a scene with that safeword.” Dean accused. “You just wanted me to brat out so you had an excuse to put a paddle in Michael’s hand.”

Cas shook his head. “No, the safeword was real, love. But I’ll admit I may have leveraged your reaction a bit to my own ends.” He winked.

“How very Crowley of you,” Dean told him.

Once they’d checked on April and tucked her in with a warm blanket and a warmer Omega, Cas helped Dean rinse off again before sliding into the far side of the bed with him and cuddling in close to whisper much of the rest of the night away before sliding between his hot cheeks for one last soft and lazy round beneath the covers. Dean came with a groan and a sigh on Castiel’s cock and the Alpha’s fist around his knot. He was asleep before Cas even let him go, exhausted but victorious with a shiny new record and a one-week moratorium.

Beside them in the bed, Michael held the little Ozzie close and let the rocking motions of his alphas’ coupling lull him back to sleep.

Chapter End Notes

GAH! This chapter was a mess to write. But I had to get it all out. Some of that stuff had been percolating in my head long enough to start getting moldy.

One last note on Destiel in this story: In my mind, Destiel is the primary relationship. I know that it often seems that each of them spends more of their energy on their mates than they do on each other, but to me, even that is simmering in a broth of Destiel.
Everything they do has that core relationship at its base. This foursome scene could certainly have had more Cas/Dean action, and that might seem like a brush-off of their connection. But it's not. At least not to me.

Love all y'all. Always.
Chapter 109

Chapter Summary

It's campy goodness for the folks in Portland. Dean negotiates for some work time during the Honeymoon. Then...wait...are you serious? Really?! FINALLY?! It's time for a wedding.

Told you we'd get there.

Chapter Notes

Warning for sexual violence near the end of this chapter. Y'all are expecting it if you've been reading this long. It's par for the course.

So close to the end, this one ran really long. Not sorry.

You'll notice we added some artwork. Be advised, similar character tiles have been sprinkled all around back through previous chapters. If you want to see them, dig back and take a look. Huge, huge, ginormous thanks to Melodina for her amazing work and support. I'm so incredibly lucky you picked me to be your friend. I adore you forever. I couldn't have done this without you.

More artwork coming.

Happy Mother's Day to all the moms, step-moms, mom-types, and would-be moms. You don't have to give birth to be someone's mom, and I honor all of you no matter what your story is.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.
Christian tapped the desk before him with a thumb. His hand was wrapped in a thick bandage, but the thumb was free to tap as he rested his throbbing palm before him. Krissy wouldn’t meet his eye, and he was rapidly losing patience.

“Not a chance, you hear me?” he tried once more. Her only reply was to roll her tongue along her upper teeth behind her lip and slip her gaze to his opposite shoulder. “She’s a victim, Kris. She doesn’t have the chops for this. I’m not about to victimize her a second time. We’ll find someone else.”

“She’s no victim, Chris.” Krissy told him, leaning forward in her chair and finally looking him in the eye. “She’s a warrior through and through, and she’s made for this. Everything that happened only served to set her instincts in place. She’d have wound up on your roster someday even if she’d been brought up in a golden cradle and fed milk and honey from a silver spoon. As it is…”

”As it is,” he interrupted, “She’s terribly compromised.”

“She wants a new last name,” said Krissy by way of an abrupt shift of topic.

“Why?” he asked, startled enough to bite.

“She said she’s not that person anymore.”

Christian sighed.

“Let me train her, Christian. She’s got a fire burning in her gut same as you do, same as me. It’s bullshit to tell her she’s off the list because of some fucking whorehouse she got nabbed into. It’s like she’s gonna keep getting fucked over and over again for the rest of her life. Damnit, she wants to do this. She needs it. She needs to get her feet beneath her and stand up straight again. She’s not going to do that as someone’s mate. That’s not Claire’s life, man. It was never Claire’s life, and it sure as hell isn’t now.”

“We’re not going to use her shitty experience to mold her into a campaign puppet, alpha,” he told her adamantly. “The answer is no.”

“Just talk to her, goddamnit. You go down to the dorms and watch her with the others for a while. Talk to her yourself. Give her an hour of your precious time, and see if you don’t agree with me. This one’s special, Christian. She’s not like any Omega I’ve ever met.”

“Dominance?” he asked, puzzled at Krissy’s passion.

“Nah, not Dominance. It’s something else. She’s a leader. She’s strong. She’s smart and tough, and she’s alive in a way the rest of them aren’t anymore – like most people never manage their whole lives. Talk to her. You’ll see it.”
"And the name she wants to change to?" Christian dodged committing himself, but he was intrigued enough to know he would follow his nose down the stairs to the Omega recovery dorm.

Krissy smirked. "She knows where the money comes from for what we do, and she's been typing away on Google. Did you know that Castiel's Pack name means, 'New Man'?"

He chuckled. "She wants to be a new man?"

Krissy nodded, sobering. "She's shrugging out of her old skin, Christian. She's leaving it all behind her. She wants to honor Castiel for providing the resources that helped her out of a jam, and she says she likes the idea behind taking a name that shows she's starting over."

"Claire Novak," he mused quietly. "That Alpha's going to love that."

"So you'll talk to her?"

"I'm not promising you shit, Kristina. But yes, I'll talk to her. It's about time I introduced myself anyway."

NOW:

"C'mon, Cas. It'll be fun," Dean wheedled. "Don't you wanna shed some of that 'stick-up-the-ass' public image you've got going on? All anyone outside of Lawrence ever sees is your hot professor persona. Let's shake that up a little."

"I can't sing, Dean. I'll ruin it for everyone."

Dean scoffed and cut off Castiel's escape attempt by swinging quickly around the kitchen island and standing in the archway. His hands cupped around Cas' hips, and his face hovered before Castiel's mere inches away. "You can't? Or you won't? I've heard you sing, baby. You can carry a tune just fine. All you need to do is stand hard and fast in your Secondary, and it'll be a snap. Your Alpha can do this. No one's gonna make you do a solo. We're all going to be there with you. You're backup, man. Come on. Say yes. It's gonna be epic."

"Everything's epic to you, Dean Michael," Cas deadpanned. But then he sighed. "I don't know the words."

Dean's face lit up instantly, and his fingers dug into his fiancé's hips, rocking his body a little in his enthusiasm. "April will teach you. She'll get you fixed up on the harmonies, teach you everything you need to do."

"Dean. Please. I'll make a fool of myself."

"Everybody needs to make a fool of themselves every now and then," Dean replied with a chaste kiss to his lips to communicate his undying appreciation. "Besides, that's your Primary talking. Slip that uptight fucker under and get into the alpha. You're gonna be great."

Cas sighed and wilted visibly. "I'm going to regret this," he mumbled. "But...talk me through it. What do you want to do?"

"Ha HA! YES! I knew you would come through. Okay, so, Sam had the crowd in Portland post a video of the whole audience singing ‘Seven Bridges Road’ together. You know, that’s one of our standards. We always do that one on Saturday night. It wouldn’t be a Con without it.” Dean took Cas by the hand and led him out of the kitchen and through the house toward the conservatory. “But seeing as I’m not there, Sam gave my part to the audience and videoed the whole lot of them singing their hearts out. Then he posted it to Instagram as a love letter from the crowd about how much they miss me. It broke my heart, man. I gotta respond. So, what I wanna do…they’ll all be back in the main ballroom tonight for the evening Q&A session. I wanna livestream a response straight to the screen, direct to the audience, and I wanna pull everyone in the house together to sing something back – like a thank you and a reminder that I miss the hell outta being there too. I want to let them know I’m not gone for good. There are rumors that you’re benching me permanently, man. We need to squash those rumors. I need you for that. They need to hear it straight from you.”

“Why does that mean I have to sing?”

April was tinkering at the piano when they walked in, and she looked up and grinned. “Because we want people to see you for who you are, Cas,” she told him, having caught the end of their conversation. “We want them to see that you have a fun side and that you’re more than that stern smolder you take everywhere you go.”

“The smolder works for me,” he insisted, fully aware that he’d lost the battle.

“This will work too,” April told him confidently. “Did you see the video Sam posted? It was the sweetest thing ever. But Twitter is blowing up with suspicions that you’re going to lock Dean in the house from now on once you’re married.”

“Oh, good grief!” Cas cried. “That’s ridiculous.”

“They’re pointing out that Sam showed up in Phoenix just days after Hank’s and J.T.’s adoption even though he had newborn twins at home, but Dean wasn’t permitted to attend Portland while your wedding’s still a week away.” April sat with him on the couch under the window.

Cas looked from April to Dean in dismay. “They’re reading far too much into this. You’re only home because we have last minute details to arrange, and you’re overwhelmed with so much on your plate. It’s a simple Secondary decision based on the realities of the moment. It isn’t a new paradigm.”

“I know that, Alpha,” Dean assured him, kneeling between Castiel’s knees and smirking. “But they need some reassurance. They need to see that you don’t have me chained to the wall…for the moment, anyway.” Dean took up Cas’ hand and kissed his knuckles, peeking up again with an entreat ing smile and whispering. “Sing with me, man. It’ll be fun.”

Cas didn’t have a prayer against those green eyes, especially when Dean winked at him. He drew himself upright and snatched his hand back, buffeting the side of Dean’s head in a playful cuff. “All right. But only if we’re all doing it together, only if you put me in the back where no one can hear me go off-key.”

“Hot damn!” Dean gloated. He sprang to his feet and backed swiftly toward the door. “You stay here with April and learn your part. April, get him ready. I’m gonna go get Jess and Michael and figure out how we’re gonna set it up. We only have a few hours, and I want it to be awesome!” He muttered to himself as he kicked up to a jog and disappeared down the hall. “This is gonna be so great!”

April laughed happily as he vanished. She turned back to her mate with a proud look in her eye. “You make him very happy,” she commented needlessly.
Cas blushed and sighed. “I hope so. I try.” He spared one more glance at the doorway, but then steeled himself and turned his attention back to April. “All right, Maestra. I’m all yours. What do you need me to do?”

Sam stepped up onto the stage, accepting his mic from the stage manager. The lights were bright enough to start him sweating before he’d opened his mouth, and the energy from the floor slammed into him almost physically. Sunday evenings were Dean’s thing, not Sam’s, but Dean was hundreds of miles away at the moment. Charlie joined him, grinning from ear to ear, carrying a small remote.

In short order, they had the crowd quieted. Charlie swore the link would work, but it wasn’t until the lights dimmed and Dean and Michael appeared side by side on the screen behind Sam, their faces enormous and glowing, that Sam relaxed.

The crowd erupted in joyful shouting and applause when Dean led off with a hearty, “Well, there y’all are! Hey folks!” He laughed at the crowd’s reaction, clearly enjoying the energy even across the distance. Michael sat beside his mate, bursting with pride, perfectly comfortable in front of the camera. Sam stepped as far to the side of the stage as he could so he could watch without hindering anyone’s view.

Larger than life, that was his brother Dean. The sizing seemed appropriate to Sam, and standing in the shadows while Dean fairly glowed in the spotlight felt just as right. Sam smiled softly, watching his brother. His hero.

Dean thanked the audience for their song of the day before. He told them how much it touched him. He told them that he missed them as much as they missed him. He clutched Michael’s hand and occasionally looked to his mate for a nod of encouragement and a smile.

“So, I gotta tell you,” he continued. “I was a little hurt that you did my song without me.” It was a tease and a lead-in, obviously, and the crowd snickered on cue. “I feel like that was a little cold, you know? Like I’ve been replaced already, and I’ve only missed one fucking show. But I forgive you. In fact, to show you all that I don’t hold any grudges, I’m gonna do the same from here. Y’all game?”

Dean thanked the audience for their song of the day before. He told them how much it touched him. He told them that he missed them as much as they missed him. He clutched Michael’s hand and occasionally looked to his mate for a nod of encouragement and a smile.

The audience responded as expected, and Dean grinned at them. “Thing is, while Sam’s away, it’s our job to look after his boys. I don’t mean to worry you, Sam, but we’re having a little trouble getting them to sleep tonight. We’ve each taken a turn rocking the pups, trying to put them down, but they’re not having it. They want their daddy.”

“They’re way past their bedtime, Dean,” Sam said into his microphone, stern and paternal.

“I know, man. Even Cas tried. Michael tried. They want you. But we had an idea. Maybe if we gang up on them, all of us, maybe we can overcome the two of them. You know, just whammy them from all directions. What d’you think?”

“What do you mean?” Sam asked, Dominant warning in his voice, playing it up for the setup.

“Hold on, we’ll show you,” Dean told the camera. “Ready Michael?”
“Let’s do it, alpha,” Michael confirmed, and the two men stood and left the living room. The camera followed them down the wide back hallway. Looking over his shoulder, Dean called back, clearly speaking to the camera operator, “Come on, Sarah. This way.”

Entering the enormous conservatory, the camera caught the expansive space and a tight cluster of people bent over April as she plinked away at the piano. Castiel was there. He had Hank tucked into the turn of his elbow with the pup’s head in his palm. He looked up as they came in and he smiled broadly, welcoming Dean with a soft kiss. Cas was as Alpha as he could get, a gentle overlord who suffered the ridiculous idiocies of his household with grace and amusement.

Jess was seated beside April, backward on the piano bench with J.T. in her arms. She looked embarrassed but game, and that was enough for Dean. Both pups were awake. Their wide eyes followed Dean and Michael with interest. Michael swooped down on them each in turn and left them a kiss each to their foreheads. Dean took Hank from Cas and turned back to the camera just as Gabriel called from the doorway:

“What the fuck is going on in here? You were gonna do a bit without me? This is a bit, right? We’re doin’ a bit?”

“Look, Li’l man,” Dean cooed. “Uncle Gabe is here. Gabe get your ass over here and kick us off. We need to get these two off to dreamland. If your voice doesn’t bore them to sleep, nothing will.”

“Oh, ha ha, you jerk,” Gabe countered. “We’ll see who has the magic touch, shall we? It’s not a boring voice that makes them feel safe enough to fall asleep, Dean-o. It’s an Omega voice. Stand aside. Lemme show you bigshots how it’s done.” Dean gave Hank back to Cas with a kiss to his Alpha’s cheek.

In Portland, Sam’s jaw dropped. Castiel had never allowed Gabriel this kind of publicity before. Something had shifted back at home, something momentous. But none of their expressions marked it as anything out of the ordinary. Cas took a seat next to April, on her other side from Jess, and he nodded to his mate, who began to play. Dean scooped a guitar up from the floor and joined in with a shit-eating grin which April mirrored.

Gabriel picked up the lyric, smirking into the camera, turning his body to follow Sarah as she circled the group. April carried the banjo and fiddle parts under her fingertips, and Dean filled in the rest on his guitar. The music was warm and inviting, rich and deep.

Gabe twanged:
”Headin’ down south to the land of the pines,
I’m thumbing my way into North Carolina.
Starin’ up the road, and prayin’ to God I see headlights.”

Gabriel turned toward J.T.’s wide open expression, letting the camera go, and singing to the pup. His voice was sure and smooth, calm but strong, and he put a southern twang into some of the words, making Jess giggle. Gabe’s expression entranced the pup who reached up to him, trying to grasp him by the face. Gabe gave him a pinky to clutch and turned to Hank for the second half of his verse.

”Made it down the coast in seventeen hours,
Pickin’ me a bouquet o’ dogwood flow’rs
And I’m a-hopin for Raleigh, I can see my baby tonight.”

The camera pulled back, capturing the chorus as every voice joined in softly. Dean situated himself next to Cas, wanting to hear him sing, wanting to feel Castiel’s initiation into a part of Dean’s life where he never imagined Cas would fit. And Cas sang. He sang loud enough that his voice was discernible, an easy-going baritone beneath the others, nothing showy, but a full contribution to the harmony of the song. If he hadn’t been there, the performance would have suffered, and Dean felt his heart swell at the realization.

Cas had clearly paid close attention to April’s teaching. He hit the harmonies as they split out, avoiding the rookie mistake of centering back toward the melody when his part diverged, and he sounded damn good to Dean. Cas looked up at the last line of the chorus, their voices blending like they’d done this for years, and he couldn’t repress a gummy grin as he beamed up at Dean.

Dean felt his heart rate pick up, and he blushed right down to his toes, but he pulled himself together and took the second verse himself, gentling his tone to bring it back to the oddly sweet lullaby they were trying to turn it into. Darius Rucker likely never expected his song of wistful longing to be used quite like this.

Hank’s eyes blinked slowly. The muscles in his face had fallen slack despite his best efforts, and he was mere moments from falling asleep in Castiel’s arms.

Dean watched the pup drift off. He turned back to Cas at his last line and sang:

"I ain’t turnin’ back to livin’ that old life no more,"

…just for Castiel, and Cas left him a wink as the chorus kicked in again.

Michael took the last stanza. His voice pitched higher and softer than the first two verses. Both pups were already fast asleep. Michael’s gentle voice secured them there. They slowed the tempo for the last refrain. Michael took the upper register as April lowered her pitch beneath his. The voices faded as they came to the end of the song, and Dean and April played one more round together. April backed out, laying her hands in her lap and letting Dean finish up with his guitar.

As he neared the end, Castiel put a finger to his lips with a meaningful look into the camera, reminding the audience that they had a live two-way connection open. He stood up and nodded to Dean then April and Jess. Michael helped Jess up with a hand at her elbow. Cas handed the pup carefully to Gabe. Hank didn’t move at all.

The audience watched with baited breath in complete silence, communally committed to keeping the pups fast asleep. It was a full Pack response in spontaneous mutual agreement, and it was breathtaking to witness.

Jess and Gabriel disappeared swiftly from the room, and after a moment, the sound of the audience’s appreciation filtered through the connection and into the conservatory in a crescendo of noise. Sarah put Dean back into full frame.

He couldn’t stop smiling.

It had all happened precisely as he’d envisioned it, and he was floating in euphoria. He felt Castiel’s arm slide around his waist, and he leaned into the warmth of the Alpha’s body.

“So, you see, Sammy,” he said happily. “We’ve got everything under control over here. You guys keep doing what you do, and knock one outta the park for me. We’ll keep the pups alive and fed for you while you’re gone. I’ll be back on the road just as soon as I can, right boss?” Dean tee’d the question up for Cas, and Cas answered resolutely in the affirmative.

“Right,” Dean nodded back into the camera. “And I know you guys miss me out there. I miss you too. The thing you gotta understand, I needed to be home for this weekend while we’re getting set for the big do next week, but I was set to barrel on through and keep running myself ragged anyway.
I didn’t wanna let you guys down, and the thought of skipping out on my annual visit to Oregon just about killed me. But if I’d gone, guys, it…it wouldn’t have been good. I woulda been set up for a major drop, probly right there in the middle of the show, maybe right when I had one of you in a place where I really needed to hold myself together. You Subs out there…you know. It’s not something we can always control, and I needed someone to put my brakes on for me and set some boundaries I couldn’t set for myself.”

Dean frowned a little into the camera, worried that he wasn’t making enough sense. He looked across at Michael, standing behind the camera and sending strength and comfort through their bonds. “We talk a lot about how to watch out for Submissives. Y’all remember. We spend hours at every convention pounding this shit into your heads. I need you to understand this. I’m a Sub, just like a lot of you are, and I’m not immune. Sometimes what’s best for me isn’t something I can see for myself. What you’re seeing play out right now, this is all those talks we’ve had, put into practice. This is what it looks like for real, guys. I didn’t want to stay home, but Alpha put his foot down, and he was right. He’s watching out for me, for you, for the Conventions we do, keeping the quality of what we try to bring you guys at the top of our game. I wasn’t gonna be the man you’ve all come to expect me to be while my head’s stuck at home worrying about the wedding and a million other things.”

Dean chuckled in a self-effacing way and shot a look at Castiel. “I’ll be back. And I’ll be everything you guys need me to be. Thanks for keeping it going without me, Sammy, Charlie. All you guys. Thanks for the song. It meant the world to me. You know I was joking about being put out, I hope. Most of all, thanks for giving me the space to be real, to be human, to have days when I can’t quite cut it. Your support makes us Pack, folks. I know you’ve got my back. And you know I’ve got yours.” Dean let out a deep breath, feeling his tension ease, surprised to realize how very tense he’d been.

“Anything to add, Alpha?” Dean asked Cas.

Cas shook his head. “I think you covered it, Dean. I want to go on record as letting all of you know that Dean has my full support to keep bringing his unique brand of Pack vitality to the convention circuit. If you were worried that our marriage might mean the end of anything, put those worries to rest. You can’t get rid of him that easily.”

“That’s about it, Portland. Y’all give Sam your everything, same as you do for me, and I’ll catch you later.” Dean saluted the camera, and Sam took the program back over from his end. Sarah cut the feed and lowered the camera.

Dean turned in Castiel’s hold to face him. “Thanks, Alpha. Thanks for that.”

“Feel better?” Cas asked.

“Much,” Dean told him. “Wanna go have a taste of my gratitude?” he propositioned.

“That’s low, man, using that name to tell me no. That’s a dick move.”

Cas chuckled. “I never promised to make it an easy week,” he pointed out. “Get to bed, Dean. We’re both needed at work tomorrow, full speed. I’ll be along in a bit. We’re all in the Master tonight.” Cas handed Dean off to Michael in a move that screamed ‘Dominants in cahoots’. Dean didn’t fight the handling.

“Oh, Michael,” Cas called as the two made their way toward the hallway. “Spank Dean before you come down to breakfast tomorrow, would you please? He’ll need a tension release before he starts another week at the pace we’re pulling right now. Nothing intense. He’ll need to be capable of sitting. Just get his attention.”

“Um, yes, Alpha,” Michael answered, uncertain in the wake of the odd request. “I’ll take care of it.”

“I’ll take care of it,” Dean mimicked rudely, proof that his brat was near the surface after all and that his compliance to his Tops’ decisions had a limit. Michael laughed and pinched his ass.

“Keep that up and I’ll be adding one before bed as well,” the Dom told him in his ear, tickling the minute hairs in Dean’s ear canal and sending chill bumps across his shoulders.

“Maybe…” Dean said hesitantly. “Maybe that would be best.”

***************

“We’re never getting a divorce, Cas,” Dean told his fiancé over lunch on Thursday. The two shared a booth at Maurice’s. They were alone for once, and their feet sidled up to each other, sock-clad, nuzzling. “I don’t care what happens, this marriage is gonna stick ‘cause I’m not going to have gone through all this planning for nothing. And I’m damn sure not ever gonna do it again.”

Cas smiled simply over his cheeseburger before taking a big bite. He chewed thoughtfully, then he swallowed and observed, “We may need to play a supportive role for our pups someday. We might have to do a great deal of the planning for them if they marry. You wouldn’t expect them to go it alone, would you, Dean?”

“Pssh! I’m leaving it to Michael. Tell me where to show and what to wear. That’s the extent of it for me. This is like the perfect preview of Hell, if you ask me.”

“Is that so?” asked Cas with a sharp expression.

“Damnit, Cas, you know what I mean. It’s not you. It’s the billions of details. All I want is a chance to stand up in front of everyone and say the big ‘YES’ to you. I don’t give a fuck whether the bunting is coral or salmon or bright fuchsia, for fuck’s sake. I don’t care if the coffee is pecan or hazelnut. All I want is to get married. Why did we agree to this fucking circus?”

“We could sneak down to the courthouse this afternoon if you like,” Cas teased him, knowing that the circus was more than just a show to Dean, knowing he needed the public statement.

“Shut up,” Dean grumbled. He focused on his lunch and ignored Cas’ gleeful expression.

“Then the circus is still a go?”

Dean looked up at him. He put an index finger up and leaned in. “I’ll do it once. Once. Never again.”

Cas smiled at him again, a soft thing, a gentle happiness rare for the Alpha who carried so much weight across his shoulders. “Just this once,” he agreed.

“What do you feel you won’t be capable of leaving behind for a month?” Cas countered. “I expect you to spend most of your time relaxing, not working. But I admit neither of us can leave it all behind entirely.”

“I’ve got some momentum going on the book,” Dean told him as he swirled a fry through his pool of ketchup. “I don’t want to lose that if I can help it.”

“All right. I can allow you to take your book with you. But if you want the book, you leave something else behind.”

“Oh, come on!”

“You need to choose two topics of business to work on, Dean. If you decide to take your book, and you want to keep your hand in the merger, you need to let Jody and Jo handle the department without you. You’re not doing all of it.”

“Jo’s out with Jack,” Dean protested. “Jody’s too green to run it alone.”

“You want me to let the most important decisions of our lives, the future of our business go by without my input? Are you insane?” Dean stared across the table in shock.

“Choose two, Dean Michael.”

“What about you?” Dean asked. “Are you limited to two?”

“No. But I don’t require the amount of sleep you do, and I have a wider capacity to juggle multiple items without becoming overwhelmed. I plan to work for a few hours after you’re asleep most nights.” Castiel continued his lunch, Dean huffed at him and looked away, gritting his teeth.

He worked his jaw and then turned back. “How about if I promise only to work in two areas per day but I switch up which two? I can put in a couple of hours before breakfast on my book, and then play it by ear as to what needs my attention after that?”

Cas gave him a piercing look. “I would agree to that wholeheartedly if I believed you could stick to it.”

Dean sat back, offended. “What are you saying, man? I’m good for it. Swear to God.”

Cas licked his upper lip and considered how to respond. “You understand that if you make me this promise and break your word, I will be very displeased? Think about it, Dean. If a so-called emergency arises, and you’ve already consumed your allotted time for the day on another facet of your work, I will still hold you to your promise.”

“Nothing’s gonna happen,” Dean dismissed his worry. “And if it does, I’ll hand it off to you or Benny. I swear, Alpha. Only two work subjects per day.”

“No redefining the definition of a work subject or the concept of a day in order to weasel your way into a wider work scope, Dean. When I say one day, I mean a 24-hour period from midnight in Paris to midnight in Paris. When I say work subject, I mean you are to present your plan to me on a daily basis, and we will define the scope of each day’s work together. You are not to step one toe beyond that scope. If I feel you need a break, I will call a halt to all work altogether, and I expect compliance without whining, else everything stops.”
Dean didn’t answer for a few moments. His gaze fell to the tabletop, and he chewed through everything he was feeling. He ate another fry. He took a drink from his mug of root beer.

“Dean?”

“I’m probably going to whine a little, Cas,” he admitted. “But other than that…It feels really weird to be saying this, but I’m good. You have my word. I’ll be good. I’ll obey you, Alpha. I promise. Feels really solid to have boundaries. I like the way this feels. I don’t want to screw it up.”

Castiel reached a hand across the table, and Dean took it, squeezing a little. His eyes flicked up to meet his Alpha’s, letting Cas see the struggle in them. It wasn’t an easy capitulation, but it was battle Dean wanted to wage on himself, on his self-destructive tendencies. He wanted to team up with Cas to battle from the opposite side for once, and it felt good to make that choice. He saw gratitude and relief in Cas’ eyes. He saw adoration and pride. He squeezed Castiel’s hand again.

“Two more days, Winchester,” Cas told him. “I feel like I’ve been ready for this my entire life, and yet, I still can’t wrap my head around it being real.”

Dean leaned far across the table. “It’ll be real when you Claim me. No ape ceremony could ever get through to our seconds and thirds. It’s gonna take bringing out the big guns for the message to sink all the way in, man. Trust me on this. We’re doing the right thing.”

“We’ll have to wait and see,” Cas told him. “Either way, it’s going to be a grand adventure, and I’m so happy you’re going to be there with me. I’m so happy, Dean Michael.”

“You’re a sap, C.J. Tuck that shit under or you’ll turn weepy when it’s time to say your vows.”

Cas chuckled. “And if I do, you’ll live with it. I plan to pull the video out every year on our anniversary and make you watch me get weepy all over again. You’ll get a swat for every snide comment you can’t repress. I’m not ashamed of having overwhelming feelings for you.”

“It’ll be worth it,” Dean agreed. “You’re saying I have a year and two days to come up with some world class heckling.”

“No, that’s not what I said at all! I said don’t heckle. Not even a little.”

“That’s not what I heard, Alpha,” Dean retorted.

“You’re such a brat,” Cas declared, dropping the subject. He slipped his shoes back on. “Come on, we need to get back. Billie’s got a presentation ready on the changing tide of our adversaries. We need to try to map out a response before we leave.”

Dean hesitated in his booth, not following as Cas got up and dropped several bills on the table. Cas caught on to his wary state of mind and prompted him with a tilt of his head. Dean blinked a couple of times and set his jaw, but he found the words he needed.

“Can you keep Michael safe if I let him do this for us, Alpha? Do you swear it? My mind says there’s no better way to confront the arguments against us than to prove them wrong. But my hands sweat every time I think of him standing there with a spotlight on him – more like a target. You’ve seen the things they’re saying about him already; that he’s brainwashed, a puppet, a trained pup spouting what we’ve programmed him to say. They say he’s a stooge, that he’s on a road to disaster, that we’re setting him up for catastrophe – him and all the Omegas who follow us?”

“Shh,” Cas soothed, sliding into the booth beside him. “I know. I’ve heard. I can’t pretend to know the future, but I swear to you I’ll keep him from harm, at least the physical kind. You and I will shield him as much as we need to. He’s got all the resources we can provide him at his back. He won’t ever need to be alone. But Dean, we have to let him live the life he’s called to live. When we finally add up all the research and their conclusions, all the suppositions from the last fifty years, this is what it leads up to. All of it. It’s a miracle he survived adolescence, Dean. He’s a miracle merely to be alive and whole. And the good he can do if he’s allowed a platform is immeasurable.”

“Save the sales pitch,” Dean told him somberly. “I know. I know it all. But I’m going to hold you to your promise. If one hair on his head…” Dean couldn’t make himself say anything more.

“The tide is turning, Dean,” Cas said firmly. “We’re seeing the last stand of a dying breed. The Alpha patriarchy enjoyed a brief moment in the sun, but it’s unsustainable, and it’s crumbling now. They’re losing their power, and no one ever gives up power willingly. We always knew it would be a fight.”

“You’re Alpha, too, Castiel. You’re giving it up willingly,” Dean grumbled petulantly.

Cas chuckled gently. “You’re alpha as well. That’s neither here nor there. It’s the institution itself that’s fighting for its hold. It’s run for three hundred years on a fable that Omegas can only thrive in repressive circumstances or else attempt to live like apes and die screaming. The false narrative that those are the only two options has never faced serious contention before now. If we show them a population of Omegas who are neither repressed nor insane, the institution will slap its collective hands over its eyes en masse for as long as it can and deny the evident truth of what it’s seeing so that it doesn’t have to compete fairly with Omegas for positions of power, of acclaim. That’s all this is, Dean. Alphas don’t like the idea of competing with Omegas on a level playing field when competition is still so fierce between the two species as well. What that does to Omegas is the real tragedy. We need to keep our eyes on the ultimate goal. Ultimately, if we’re going to compete in the real world with the apes for our fair share of the resources of this natural world, we must present an equitable front as one Pack, not a divided house that only thrives off the repression of the weakest. Dean, we need Michael and his story. I don’t like it. I wish there was another way. If there is, I’m all ears.”

“They’re gonna rip him to pieces, Alpha,” Dean said sadly.

Cas smiled and lowered his chin. “He can take it, alpha. He’s a narcissist. Nothing anyone says about him will pierce his armor. Michael has personal defenses that you don’t have. I’m not suggesting we abandon him to cope with it all by himself. I’m saying the opposite, in fact. But Michael is ideally suited for this war. And with his Pack at his back, he’ll be a formidable opponent to the establishment that insists he cannot exist.”

Dean nodded. “I’m still holding you to your promise, Castiel James.”

“I expect nothing less, Dean Michael.”

***************

“Are you certain the chain fastens inside the coat, not outside?” Castiel asked for the fourth time, fiddling with the thick filigree. Gabe batted his hand away.

“Leave it alone, Castiel. I fastened it the way Kali showed me. She made me do it seven times before she trusted me to do this without her. What the hell were you thinking signing on to wear this medieval getup anyway? It’s got, like, eighty pieces to it. What’s wrong with your tux?” Gabriel stepped back and took in the overall effect. Cas’ hand twitched again, wanting to shift the chain so that it lay outside his lapel. As it was, only the lowest portion of the golden parabola was visible to catch the light. How could that be right?

“I will smack you if you touch it again,” Gabriel warned, turning to stand at Cas’ shoulder so they could both see the figure he made in the full length mirror in the bathroom of his Facility suite. Cas had barely slept last night, even with April tucked warmly into his side where she belonged. He wanted Dean more than April at the moment. He felt wrong-footed without Dean beside him. Somehow, they’d both agreed that a night apart made sense coming into the big day. Cas had left the house for the night.

The man reflecting back at him in the mirror looked regal. Cas reluctantly agreed that the minimal flash of gold at his sternum added just the right touch of decoration to the rigid lines of his formal attire. A red silk sash cut across his torso beneath his coat, a diagonal line from his right shoulder to his left hip. It was reminiscent of a nautical uniform without being a mockery, and it looked formal without seeming costume-like. He looked powerful – an otherworldly prince perhaps. A second circlet of delicate complex gold links sat across his collarbone, serving as a collar for both silk shirt and outer coat.

Gabriel had yet to don his tuxedo. He stood in dissonance beside his brother wearing boxer shorts and a white t-shirt. His legs and feet were bare. Cas touched his shoulder, meeting his eyes through the mirror.

“Thank you, Gabriel, for everything.”

Gabe reached up and patted his little brother’s hand with a solid expression, free of teasing lilt. “It’s been long enough in coming, kiddo,” he told Cas. “I thought I was gonna have to limp down the aisle with both of us pushing walkers before you took the plunge. Thanks for not embarrassing me with that.”

Cas huffed at him and tugged gently at his suit coat.

“Go sit down,” Gabe instructed. “I need to get dressed. Don’t wrinkle anything. Eat something if you can, but if you get any crumbs on yourself, Kali will kill me.”

“I can’t sit,” Cas said. “I’m too nervous. Where the fuck is Benny?”

“He’s coming, man. Chill out. He’s collecting everything from Kali you need to carry with you.”

Cas breathed out a deep breath and wiggled his toes into the carpet, gripping the fibers through his dark silk socks. “Benny’s bringing the ring?”

“I swear, Castiel, I’m going to thump you if you make me go through it all again.” Gabe pulled his pants on and tucked his shirt in before zipping them up. “Calm down. Between Kali and Michael, everything’s under control. All you have to do is put one foot in front of the other and follow instructions for once.”

“I’m not accustomed to this role, Gabe.” Cas’ eyes were huge, his pupils tight, his face pale. “I need something to do. Give me something to do.”

“I can spill some rice on the counter and make you count grains,” Gabe suggested. “Oh, wait. No I can’t. You don’t have any rice here. Guess you’re just gonna have to be a grownup and manage for a little bit.”
“Don’t be mean,” Cas grumbled.

The door cracked open and Benny’s head poked in. “Y’all decent in here? It’s just me.”

“Benny! Finally! Come in. Do you have the ring?” Cas advanced on him, and Benny slipped in laughing. He looked refined in his tuxedo, fully dressed and relaxed.

“Woo, brother, calm down a little. You breathing? Yeah, I got it. It’s right here.” Benny produced the tiny black velvet-covered box and handed it to Cas to check. “Give it back when you’ve checked it for scratches. Kali made me swear not to put it in your hands before Pastor Jim tells me to.”

“Scratches?” Cas asked in alarm, popping the box open and pulling the ring free. “It’s scratched?”

Benny looked at Gabe. “He’s in some state, huh? Have you given him any whiskey yet?”

“No, alpha,” Gabe replied. “I intend to stay married.”

“Well, I’m under no such restrictions.” Benny rummaged through the tiny pantry and emerged with a partially emptied bottle of the good stuff. He pulled down three juice glasses from the cupboard and poured a generous portion out for each of them. “Here,” he said, handing Castiel a glass. “Drink. No objections. Just drink.”

Cas didn’t hesitate. He took the glass and downed it, leaning his head way back and clenching his eyes tightly closed. He gritted his teeth after he swallowed and then slowly exhaled.

“How do I look?” he asked Benny.

“You look like an Alpha’s supposed to look, Cas. You look scary as fuck. Dean’s gonna pee himself.” He caught Castiel’s eye, and they both burst out laughing. “Man, you are gonna knock his socks off. He’s not gonna know what hit him.”

“He’s not wearing socks for the wedding,” Cas reminded Benny. “He’s barefoot so we can slide right into the intimate ceremony without pausing to redress.”

“Where’s your mate?” Benny asked.

“She’s with Meg across the hall. I think they’re painting toenails or something.”

“I’ll go check on them,” Gabe told them, setting his empty glass on the counter. “Countdown clock says we leave in fifteen minutes. Benny, you’re in charge of him ’till I get back. Don’t let him mess anything up. And don’t let him go anywhere.”

“Where would I go?” Cas asked in dismay.

“Beats the fuck outta me how your mind works. I wouldn’t put it past you to decide to go to the lab and check on the research projects. Just…stay here. I’ll be right back. And eat something!” The door slammed behind him.

***************

Dean was about to worry a bloody divot into his bottom lip. He stood as still as he could manage, but he still vibrated in place before the mirror. Michael used a thumb to free Dean’s lower lip again, and then he caressed the side of his mate’s face and whispered calm words into his ear.

Dean closed his eyes and blew out a long breath. The place was unfamiliar to Dean, and it was throwing him off. They’d taken up residence in a wide dressing room across the hall from the enormous ballroom that was carefully confected to host his wedding. Kali tugged a little here and there, and then she stepped back to examine the heft and hang of the robe. Nodding, she began threading the silken sash from where it attached at his left shoulder to run underneath the back of the robe, through a complex series of loops meant to cinch the robe into perfect alignment before finally emerging at his waist to tie in a complex knot over his left hip. It wasn’t visible from the back, but it played a key role in holding the robe in its proper position.

The robe fell down Dean’s front in a heavy ivory plane, unbroken by seams or folds, unpleated by the sash. It made a solid flat statement of elegance from the front, a heavy sheet of casement covered by a single sheer over-drape of the thinnest silk. All the interesting design was only evident from the back. At Dean’s hips, the robe split invisibly from each hip to the floor. While he stood still, it appeared to be a skirt of unbroken form. When he walked though, the slits on each side revealed an intricate layering of silk pleats that allowed the front and the back to move independently of each other, all of it supported from within by the red silk sash that passed in a complex series of loops beneath the casement, anchoring what needed not to move and freeing what needed to be allowed to shift.

At his back, two graceful panels crossed each other, each attached all the way across his shoulders but opening in opposite directions, crossing over a bit like a bathrobe put on backward but hanging freely from his shoulders instead of his waist. Standing and walking, the robe covered him to his calves. Once he bent over across the ceremonial alter, the pleats and the panels would separate, baring him from the waist down. A heavily embroidered square panel of red and gold brocade would hang before his groin, making a framed artwork of his genitals between widespread thighs. The interwoven silk sash would hold everything in place to fall open just right, making a presentation of his presentation, making him a perfectly presented morsel for his Alpha to Claim.

As long as he stayed on his feet, the robe was strikingly prudish. It covered him from his throat to his feet, even covering his hands down to his fingers. Only a part of each calf and the backs of his heels, his fingers, and his head and neck were visible at all. It was solidly ivory, unadorned except for the splash of red at his waist, and it was elegant as fuck. Dean was afraid to move lest he disturb the graceful line it cut down his body.

“Don’t hold your breath, Dean,” Kali reminded him for the tenth time. “You won’t look near as sexy sprawled out on the floor passed out.”

Michael held a glass of orange juice to his lips with a napkin poised at his chin beneath it. “Drink,” he instructed softly.

Dean drank.

Years of practice taking sustenance from the hand of another meant they didn’t spill a drop, even onto the napkin.

“When this is over,” Michael whispered to him. “I’m going to ask Castiel if we can get the robe out again. I’m dying to Claim you in it myself. You look stunning. Cas is going to lose his shit when he sees you.”

Dean’s green eyes flicked to Michael’s but he couldn’t answer. He seemed not to have words at the moment. He looked back into the mirror.
"Turn," Kali told him. He turned around and checked the mirror over his shoulder. Everything about the way the robe hung was graceful. It was perfect.

"Walk upright," Kali told him. "Don’t slouch. The robe will move with you, so you don’t have to take tiny steps or move too slowly. Your normal gait will work. For the processional, slow way down, but keep a normal step. There’s no need for any kind of weird pauses or anything. After the wedding itself, it’s just like we practiced. You and Cas will wait until the room is cleared and the formal curtain falls to make the chamber private. Everyone’s going to find a place to stand where they can see, and then it’s all you and him. You’ll know when the time is right. Step out and wait for Sam to come get you. Listen to your wolf. This is a lot like the Keller test, Dean. Just do what he feels like doing. Let Castiel do the rest. Don’t be nervous. You’ll be fine."

"The plug?" Michael asked her. "Did we decide? Leave it in or take it out?"

She looked at Dean. "The one with the blue gemstone?"

He shook his head silently and reached behind himself but couldn’t find the opening with his hands encumbered by folds of heavy fabric.

"Let’s change them out," Kali told Michael. To Dean, she said, "Be still. We’ll take care of it. Where did you put the pretty one?"

Dean pointed at his duffle in the corner. Michael filtered through it until he produced a small velvet bag with a beautiful glass plug in it. It was topped with a sapphire blue glass gem. "Bend down, Dean," he said softly to his mate. "I’ve got you."

Dean took another deep breath and folded at his waist, relishing the feel of the panels separating across his hips. He felt Michael’s reaction through both bonds, and the world froze for a moment. Then there was an efficient tug at the institutional silicone plug stretching him open. It was replaced swiftly with cool glass coated with a layer of Michael’s own slick. Dean could tell it wasn’t synthetic. The two didn’t feel or smell the same.

"Move around a little and get it settled," Michael told him with a pat to his rump and a hand at his elbow to help him up. "Let me know if you feel anything wrong. I can still fix it."

"Michael, I need you dressed," Kali said, and Michael checked the clock with a curse. The photographer was due any minute for prenuptial shots. Getting dressed was easy for Michael. Already nude to prevent any elastic strap lines on his body, all he had to do was slip the tunic over his head and let Kali tie it at his waist.

"That’s it, fellas. I’ll go get Sam and Jo and the photographer, let them know we’re ready. Maybe one more sip of juice, but don’t spill." Kali opened the door to find a cluster of people waiting impatiently outside. She pulled Jo and Charlie in and sent Becky to hunt down the photographer.

"Jimeny Christmas, Winchester!" Jo enthused. "You look like a wet dream. We’re all going to walk down the aisle with hard-ons. Bend over. I wanna see."

Dean blanched but didn’t answer. His eyes remained locked on his reflection in the mirror.

"Hey, you all right?" she asked. "I was kidding, you know." She sidled up close to him so they could admire the reflection together.

He nodded wordlessly and dropped his head onto her shoulder. "Oh, Dean," she sighed. "Everything’s fine. You’ve got this, kid. Don’t worry." Jo looked over Dean’s head at Michael who gave her a concerned look back. "You’re just nervous is all. You’re not dropping. You’re not gonna mess anything up. Michael’s here. I’m here. We wouldn’t let anything happen to you. Look at me. Let’s see if we can find your voice."

Dean swallowed and lifted his head to look his best friend in the eyes. He nodded again.

“Repeat after me,” said Jo with a light cheery voice. “Yes, Alpha.”

“Y…es, yes…Alpha.”

“Good. There you go. Don’t worry. You’ll have it when you need it. Your alpha isn’t going to miss his own wedding. He’ll show when it’s time. Don’t force it. Don’t freak. Keep your eyes on Cas. He’ll get down the aisle first, so you just look to him. Sam and I will be right behind you. Michael will be right in front of you. You’re not alone.”

“Here, sip,” Michael said, offering him juice again. Dean drank obediently.

The door slipped open again and Sam came in with a harried expression. “Sorry I’m late. It was harder to get the twins ready than I thought it would be. I’m here now. Reporting for duty,” he joked. “Where do you need me?”

Michael pointed. “The ring is in that case on the counter, Sam. You need to put it in your pocket right now and don’t take it out.”

“Holy fuck, Michael,” Sam said taking in the Omega. “You look incredible!” Sam dug the ring box out, opened it to check the ring, and then closed it again and slipped it into his pocket.

“You look good yourself,” Kali observed with satisfaction, secretly pleased that her showcase wedding had the most beautiful participants imaginable. The photos were going to be devastatingly gorgeous.

“Dean?” Sam asked, checking on his brother. “Are you all right?”

Dean’s face flinched but he ground his teeth and fought for it. “I’m good, Sammy. Little freaked is all. My wolf is a persistent fucker this morning. Having to hold on by my fingernails to keep myself topside.”

Sam clapped him on the shoulder. “It’ll be worth it, man. You can do this. Jesus, I’m so proud of you. Look at you! I need a tissue. Fuck.” True to his word, Sam’s eyes misted over a little as he looked into the mirror before his big brother and took him in. “You’re the bravest and strongest man I’ve ever known, Dean, and I’m so proud to be your little brother.”

A wilty laugh escaped Dean’s throat, and he slipped an arm over Sam’s shoulder, reaching up and letting his sleeve hang loose behind his brother. “You haven’t been my little brother since you were fourteen, man.”

“You’re amazing, Dean,” Sam said simply. “I know what a big step this is, and I know it’s going to change a lot of things for a lot of people. I want you to know you have my full support. Always.”

“I know,” Dean told him. “Thanks, Sam.”

Someone knocked on the door and the photographer arrived to usher them all down the hall for pictures in a stately chamber with heavy drapes and gleaming hardwood floors. Kali took her clipboard along and ticked off boxes as they walked. Dean breathed. Jo and Sam flanked him. Michael checked the time and texted Benny.
Flashbulbs popped. Jokes were made and laughed at. All of them posed in whatever position the miniscule woman from Belize who was costing Castiel a small fortune gestured for them to assume. Someone slipped a small rosebud into Dean’s hand with a note attached. It was from Cas. It simply said, “I will love you forever. That’s my promise.”

Dean couldn’t feel his fingertips, but Michael assured him again and again that he was fine, and Dean decided to trust Michael.

It was all happening too fast. Dean wanted to dig in his heels and slow everything down. He found himself alone with Michael in the room where all the photos had been taken, and he found Michael’s lips on his in a slow, sensuous kiss that brought Dean’s brain to a screeching halt. Michael’s hands cupped his chin and his jaw. Thumbs traced lightly up his cheekbones. A hand circled round to put a firm hold on the back of his neck.

“I love you, Dean Michael,” the Omega whispered. “I’m never letting you go. I’m carrying your child. You’re my mate. Do you hear me?”

“Yes, Michael,” Dean whispered back with his eyes closed. Their breaths mingled between them smelling of breath mints. Michael’s lips traced Dean’s jaw to the soft flesh behind his ear. When he spoke next, it was right into Dean’s ear at an impossibly soft whisper.

“I release you today, Dean Michael, from the obligation of sole ownership. I will forever honor his Claim over you, and I will not infringe upon it, whatever comes. You have my blessing: to marry, to kneel, to bend for him, to obey him, to love him. I will share you with him without regret. Because I love you.”

“Michael,” Dean whispered back, clutching his arm, stunned. “You don’t have to…”

“I want to,” Michael told him pulling back so he could look Dean in the eye. “Come back to me, alpha. Go meet Castiel and bend for him. Vow to him. Then come back to me. I will always be here waiting for you. I don’t know what kind of magic brew you serve up in the cafeteria up there at the Facility, but that’s some fine Kool-Aid, Dean Michael. For better or worse, I’m all in. Everything Cas and April dreamed up together for this Pack makes sense to me now, and I’ll fight till my last breath to see it realized.”

“I love you, too, Michael.”

“Come on. Let’s get you two hitched. You’re going to love the reception.” Michael tugged Dean to the door. “If you can walk after the ceremony, that is,” he added as a teasing afterthought.

“You look wonderful, Michael,” Dean told him. “I meant to say that earlier, but my mouth wasn’t working.”

“I knew what you were thinking,” Michael told him with a wink.

***************

Ellen met Cas and his retinue at the venue door and held up a palm to them while she checked the hallway. Once Dean and his group slipped behind one door, Ellen beckoned them in and showed them to another. Cas rolled his eyes and handed her a small bud that he asked be delivered to Dean before the ceremony.
“Is all of this secrecy really necessary? We’ve been living together for months,” he groused.

“You wanted an ape wedding, Alpha,” Benny reminded him, straightening his sash. “They’ve got a whole bunch of rituals attached, and we’re following every damned one. Wouldn’t want to find later that the wedding didn’t take because we skipped something.”

“Didn’t take? Like a spell?”

Gabe laughed. “Oh, yeah. It’s a complicated potion, and you have to get it just right, or it won’t congeal. That’s what I heard, anyway. You got a penny in your shoe?”

“No. And I’m not doing that,” Castiel told him firmly.

“You look pretentious,” she commented lightly, but she returned his stiff hug. “And Gabriel,” she said turning to her elder son. “You, on the other hand, look quite dashing in a proper tuxedo. It’s too bad I missed your wedding. I’m certain you made a dignified groom.”

“You always know just what to say, Mom,” he observed, swamping her in a hug bigger than she was comfortable accepting. He didn’t apologize for not inviting her to his wedding. Neither did he apologize for reveling unclothed at his own reception. His mother didn’t need an explanation everything.

The party posed for pictures. Ellen and Bobby stood with Cas for a shot, infuriating Naomi who assumed the two of them had taken over the role of his parents. Everyone ignored her mutterings though, and Ellen and Bobby patiently escorted her out when the time came, leaving Castiel alone with April for a few moments while Benny and Gabriel waited just outside, guarding the door.

April smiled shyly at her mate, and he cocked his head and smiled back. “You’re the most beautiful woman in the world,” he told her. “You’re going to be stunning when you’re full of my pups.”

She giggled. “You’re incorrigible,” she told him. April’s naked body was dusted with a shimmery glitter that sparkled in the faintest of light. A delicate filigree chain that matched the much heavier one across his sternum sat at a jaunty angle across her hips. Other than that, she was nude. Her hair was delicately braided into an upsweep that released at her ear to tumble in curls nearly to her shoulder. Meg had done a magnificent job on her makeup. Her face looked almost bare, but somehow, every feature stood out in its best light. She was beautiful, and she looked happy.

Castiel strolled up to her and put a hand behind her neck, fearful of embracing her lest he cover his pretentious suit in glitter. “Is this truly okay with you?” he asked formally. “April, are you happy?”

She smiled and ducked her head. “I’m happy,” she said to the ground, leaving him to parse through her complex emotions without adding any unnecessary words.

“You won’t hide it from me if that changes?” he asked. He sent his concern to her as a bundle of alpha worry.

“I’m never going to hide from you again, Castiel,” she told him, looking up again. “I learned my lesson. Go get married. I’ll kneel at your feet, and I’ll be there when you’re done.”

“I love you, too,” he told her, and he kissed the tip of her nose. “Wish me luck.” He straightened his shoulders and caught her by the hand as he turned to the door.
“You don’t need luck, Alpha. You are your own luck.”

Benny’s head poked in. “You two ready? It’s showtime.”

***************

Castiel’s first impression of the room was that it felt enchanted. None of the fairy lights had been here the evening before when they’d rehearsed. None of the flowers or silken drapes had been in place. The crew must have installed everything after they left. The rows and rows of cushioned seats were filled on both sides. There were thousands of people here. Castiel saw faces he didn’t remember ever having met. But he also saw friends and family and colleagues. Warm faces turned to him as they rose from their seats in respect. A brass quintet began Holst’s Jupiter, Bringer of Joy, and April waited patiently for the right bars. They’d arranged it to skip the frilly entrance, leading right into its grandiose processional. Stepping off with a tiny arrangement of lilies at her side, April glided forward, looking like a vision. People watched her in awe. Castiel nearly forgot to step off himself, entranced by her beauty and her grace. Benny touched his arm.

“Go on, Alpha. This is your moment.”

Cas nodded, swallowed, squared his shoulders again, and took the first step. Behind him, Gabriel and Benny followed side-by-side. Faces turned. People whispered. Castiel followed his mate. As she reached the altar, she turned and smiled radiantly at him. He reached out for her hand and kissed it when he reached her. Soundlessly, she glided to her knees, her hand still resting lightly in his. Cas had a moment of trouble finding his breath at how beautiful and perfect she was in the moment. Her eyes left his and looked back up the wide aisle. Benny and Gabe were both grinning as they flanked Castiel, amused at his obvious befuddlement in the presence of his own mate. Gabe patted him on the shoulder as he slipped past.

“You’re so fucked, man,” he whispered with a squeeze.

“Thanks, Gabe,” Cas whispered back. He looked outward and found his mother, Bobby, Ellen, Kali, Jess. The twins were decked out in navy blue sailor suits, starched crisp. Jess had Hank. Kali had J.T. Both pups were fast asleep. A couple of attendants stood to the side at the end of the row to whisk the twins away if they became noisy, but they looked comfortable enough to sleep for days. Cas smiled at his Pack. The music faded and a string quartet on the opposite side of the room began to play Pachelbel’s Canon in D Major. Cas felt his heart drop into his shoes. The door at the back opened to reveal Michael, stately and gorgeous in a soft tunic that left little to the imagination yet preserved a sense of dignity. He had a golden circlet woven with ivy resting on his brow. He too carried a small bouquet of lilies, in one hand. He began to step gracefully down the aisle toward Castiel, and for a moment, Cas worried that Michael would impede his view of Dean. He’d never needed so badly in his life to see Dean’s face. He licked his lips, felt April squeeze his hand, felt Gabriel rest a hand on his bicep. His heartrate kicked up. Michael was beautiful, but he wasn’t Dean. With a smirk that said Michael knew precisely what Cas was thinking, he turned and took his place to Castiel’s right, looking back up the way he’d come, and Castiel’s whole world tunneled down to the sight before him.

Dean was beautiful. His hands were empty, hanging nearly covered by his long ivory robe, and his pace was deliberate, as graceful as the Omegas, inexorable. Castiel didn’t care that there were thousands of witnesses. He was alone with Dean. And Dean was walking toward him, a vision in ivory silk. Green eyes and freckles popped into clarity as he closed the distance with a cello pulse at his step.

Dean was pale, but as he neared the end of the aisle, he smiled, and Castiel melted. He shuddered a chuckle and held his free hand out to Dean just as Sam and Jo, both smiling broadly themselves took their places near Michael.

“You take my breath away,” Cas told him softly.

Dean ducked his head for a moment but then rallied and joined Michael who slipped down to his knees at Dean’s feet. Dean turned to face Cas, but he reached a hand back and felt Michael’s warm dry hand slide into his.

The four of them were joined in an unbroken line, each hand slotted into the others with a tiny bunch of lilies at either end.

“If you will turn and face me, please,” Pastor Jim reminded them gently. Dean chuckled. He didn’t want to. He wanted to face Castiel. The man cut an unbelievable figure in a custom suit that looked like it might have been designed for a Hollywood movie about alien royalty. Dean turned, but he didn’t let go of Castiel’s hand.

“My friends,” Pastor Jim intoned to the guests in a voice meant to carry. “I welcome you in the name of the Winchester Pack. Dean and Cas have asked me to tell you all how honored they are to have you here to witness this most joyous moment as they join their lives together, becoming one under the gaze of the Universe in its infinite power and wisdom.”

Jim turned his attention to the men before him.

“Dean and Castiel, for as long as I have known you both, it has been my great wish that you would one day come to your senses and marry. That that day has finally arrived is a blessing of great moment. And I believe that the winner of our betting pool is Christian Campbell, who may collect his winnings immediately following the service.” Jim paused to let the laughter die down. Christian whooped from the gallery.

“As Lupins, we don’t often marry,” he went on. “It is rather against our nature in many ways. We cannot pretend otherwise. But as we have seen, by the models standing before us, sometimes the Universe has another path for us than the one we might expect. So, it is my great honor to stand before this assemblage here today and to shout a great noise of joy up into the heavens above, that all creatures below might know our hearts are full to bursting with happiness.”

At that, Jim shocked the Primates in the room as he threw his head back and howled. All around, wolves joined him. It was loud and dissonant, and Dean busted out laughing at the look of horror on Naomi’s face. Cas chuckled as well, letting the sound of the Pack wash over him and center him.

As the howling died down, Jim slowed with a soft self-effacing laugh. “My howls have not improved with age,” he confessed. “And I promise that’s the only time I’ll accost you with them today. Let’s do something a bit more traditional, shall we? Castiel, Dean, your mates have requested an opportunity to sing for you.” He turned to Michael and nodded. Michael released Dean’s hand and stood. He helped April up and guided her to a place in the center of the dais where a single microphone stood alone.

“We’d like to go on record,” Michael said to the guests. “Pete and I, we talked it over, how to make it clear that what our mates are doing here today is something we support. This is what we came up with. This song is the first thing I ever heard Dean sing for Cas. I believe it was the first time the Alpha ever heard Dean sing at all. It seems appropriate to share it with them now as a reminder.”

He
nodded toward the string quartet, and Journey’s ‘Open Arms’ began to drift over the seated guests.

April started the duet off, and Michael joined in for the refrain, taking over for the second verse. Dean’s eyes stayed dry, but he clutched Castiel’s hand. He could see peripherally that Cas’ jaw worked in an effort to keep his expression under control. Back when he Mated Michael, Dean determined to ram his marriage through over every objection Michael came up with, blindly resolved to force his mate into acceptance. He never dreamed Michael would come to embrace his mate’s marriage like this.

It wasn’t a long song, and it ended too soon. Michael winked at Dean. He escorted April back to her place and guided her down into kneeling. He lean over and kissed her temple. He dropped to his knees right in front of Castiel for a brief moment, bowing his head for Cas to lay a hand upon his head. Then he stood and returned to Dean, slipping his hand back into Dean’s Pastor Jim took position again and paused to let the Scent-bonding settle into the wolves in the room. After a moment, he continued.

“Dean, Castiel,” he said. “We have no liturgy in the Universist Church for marriage. We will be exchanging rings in a bit, but I leave it to you to make your vows to one another as you see fit. I thank you for allowing us to stand witness to your commitment. For we in the gallery:’ he spoke louder. “It is incumbent upon us to hold these two to their words, to be mindful guardians of their promises, to remind them as they may need, to stand vigil over them in their solemn oaths, even to rebuke should they falter. Such is the gravity of our purpose here today. We are not passive witnesses, but invested participants in their commitment. What one wolf promises to another is held sacred by all wolves, for we are Pack, and there is no greater charge than to stand guard over the Pack.

“Dean Michael, what promises would you make to this man?”

Dean swallowed. His mouth was dry. Too dry. Cas squeezed his hand and gave him a confident look. He exhaled and nodded.

“Castiel James, C.J.,” he began strongly. Somehow, his alpha had control of his voice. Michael, Jo, and Sam had all told him, but he hadn’t believed until now. The wedding was for his alpha. This was his moment, and he wasn’t about to miss it. The microphone situated subtly within a display of flowers carried his words.

“I fell in love with you over a beer and a big, unrealistic dream. You seemed far out of my league, totally unreachable, but I’m not one to give up easily. Some people call me stubborn. I knew I could never have you, not the way I longed for. So I settled for what I could get, and that was enough for a very long time. During those years, you mentored me, supported me, laughed and fought with me. You taught me that no dream is unrealistic if your vision is clear enough. You taught me that no man is a finished piece of work, but that everyone is a work of art. You are amazing to me. You always have been. You see beauty in everything, in everyone. You never give up on people. You never give up on yourself, even when you’re your own worst enemy.

“You were born into a kind of power that none of the rest of us can fathom, and yet you search for matching socks just like everyone. You took your birthright and you made it about choices, not authority. I am dazzled by you, my love. I’m so in love, it scares me. And you know that. And you cradle that in a way that gives me trust and security.

“Cas, I promise never to leave you, never to give up on us, never to throw in the towel. I promise you my Submission, my obedience, my heart, my body, and my mind. I am yours to do with as you wish, and I trust that what you do with me will always be for the best. I promise you my undying trust, love, faithfulness, respect, and honor. I will love you forever, no matter what comes. I will stand beside you through every storm, and I will cheer you on to the summit of every mountain you need to climb. I cherish the sanctity of this moment, C.J. I will never forget today, or what it took to get here.”

Dean paused. It had all come tumbling out, much as he’d rehearsed it in private – strong and loud and certain. He looked into Castiel’s blue eyes, aware that his own had shifted to red, wondering idly why Cas’ hadn’t. It didn’t matter. He was still Cas.

“I will be your loyal brat for the rest of my life, my love. I promise you this before all of these witnesses. And I beg you…be my husband, Castiel – not my mate, not my partner. Be my Alpha, and my Dominant, and my husband from this day on. If you accept my promises, and you accept my plea, bring your mate and join me and mine. I ask that you honor me by saying so in front all of these wonderful people. Cas, will you be my husband?

Castiel laughed happily. “I will,” he said out loud. “Forever.”

“Very nice,” Pastor Jim effused. “Castiel? What promises have you to make to Dean?”

Castiel was still chuckling. “I’m not sure how you sneaked an answer out of me before I had my say, but that’s par for the course with us, is it not?” Cas quirked a brow at Dean, and Dean had the grace to blush, but he wasn’t sorry.

“Dean Michael, I could make you a million promises and mean every one of them. I’m certain that over the course of our lives together, I will make you more than I could begin to guess right now. I will try to keep this simple. The very first time I saw you, something inside me clicked over to a new position, and it’s never clicked back. It was love at first sight, from a romantic perspective. You were and have always been my soulmate, Dean Michael, and what happened to me that day was irrevocable, a profound bond of epic proportions that is bigger and more significant than either of the two of us as single entities. You were also, quite unfortunately, both a student of mine and a mite on the young side, both maladies healed by time.

“What I have always been drawn to in you, my love, is your effervescent vitality, your ebullient joy, your steadfast moral compass, your charisma, your dazzling cleverness that can unwind the stiffest conundrum but cannot play a game of chess to save your life. I love your complexity, the endless layers that I revel in peeling through one-by-one. I love your realness, your grit, your goddamned stubbornness, your nurturing, your resolute belief in the sanctity of family. I love you with every fiber of my being, Dean Michael Winchester. I vow to you, I always will.

“I promise you right here and now, before all of these people, I will make honorable the name you shared with me. I will never allow it to become sullied by ill deeds or words. I will protect the reputation of the name you trust me to carry, and I will strive to live up to that honor.”

Dean’s eyes were still crimson, and his nostrils flared as he listened. He was rapt, fully invested, and Cas smiled at him.

“Dean, I promise to love you, to respect you, to hold you sacred as my spouse for the rest of our lives. I will lead you, guide you, watch over you, protect you, care for you, and discipline you so that you can face every day as the amazing man you grew to be. I didn’t get to see your youth, but I watched your final steps into adulthood, and Dean, everything about you takes my breath away. I vow to be the supportive mooring you need to take that astoundingly bright light out into the world and make it better for all of us.

“I will never falter in my commitment to you. You have my solemn vow. I will never be unfaithful. I will never abuse my power over you. I will never forsake your council. I will be the Alpha you need me to be, and I will hold you to your word. Your trust is well-placed, my love.

“Come and be my husband, Dean Winchester. Raise a family with me and April. I welcome your mate into my home, into my Pack, into the sacred place where our pups will thrive and grow, and I ask that you say yes, before all of these witnesses. As I promised to be yours, will you promise to be my husband, my Submissive, my second-in-command?”

“I will, C.J. Always,” Dean answered, sounding a little stuffy.

Pastor Jim stepped forward and put a hand on each of their shoulders. “You make an old man cry,” he chuckled. “All right, let’s trade rings, and lock this thing up, shall we? Gabriel? Dean’s ring?”

“Yes, sir!” Gabe said, turning to take the box from Benny behind him. Gabe took the ring out and handed it to Cas. The two of them had surrendered their rings early in the week to have the engagement rings permanently affixed to the wedding bands that were designed to complement them. Cas took the ring and examined it. It was strong and masculine but quite elegant. It was beautiful.

“Castiel, please place the ring on the fourth finger of Dean’s left hand. Again, we Lupins have no traditions for this, but we’re going with secular western tradition. After today, the two of you may move your rings wherever the Alpha designates.” Jim made the statement with his usual irreverence. They’d discussed it at length already, and Cas had ruffled at the idea of following Christian strictures and had only capitulated when Jim pointed out that it was believed to have been the Romans who chose that finger in the first place. It had passed through Christian tradition, but it probably hadn’t originated there, and these days, secular Humanists usually used that finger as well. So in a way, it had also come out the other side. Castiel, as an avowed Heretic of every religion, balked at everything that smacked of doctrine. It had been pointed out by Dean that they both wore their engagement rings on the ring finger of their left hands without giving it a thought, and that fussing about it at the wedding was pedantic. Cas had agreed to a Universist pastor tying them together, he could suffer a few traditions.

All of that ran through Castiel’s mind as Dean presented his left hand and an inappropriate smirk from his brat. “Tempt me, and I’ll swat you right here, my Pet,” Cas threatened, and Dean grinned.

Jim was laughing too as he said, “Now then, you two already made your promises and all that, but this one is for the record. Castiel, repeat after me.”

Cas slipped the ring to Dean’s knuckle and looked at Jim, who continued once he saw that the Alpha was ready and no one seemed to be getting spanked at the moment.

“I, Castiel James, take you, Dean Michael,”

Cas repeated the words in a strong, clear voice that reverberated from the high ceiling.

“To be my lawful, wedded husband.”

“To have and to hold, from this day forward…”

“For richer, for poorer, in sickness and in health, in joy and in sorrow…”

“I promise to be your steadfast guide, to govern you justly, to apply discipline fairly…”

“For as long as we both shall live.”
And Castiel repeated each line with his eyes locked on Dean’s, meaning every word with all of his heart. If he could have said these words to Dean a decade ago, he would have done. So many years were lost to them. They could never get that back. But Castiel felt the moment grow thick with meaning as his wolf cottoned on to what was happening. Dean was his. Really his.

Finally.

Dean saw the red take over the blue, and he giggled. He could feel the wolf standing up inside Castiel, its ears pricked forward, its powerful muscles bunching in anticipation.

“Down boy,” whispered Dean too softly for anyone but Cas to hear just as Cas pushed the ring the rest of the way into place.

Jim smirked. He could feel it too.

“Soon, big guy,” he whispered before turning to Dean.

“Got your Alpha’s ring?”

Dean turned to Sam behind him. Sam handed the box backward to Jo and the ring forward to Dean. He clapped an enormous hand onto Dean’s shoulder and gave him a tight bracing smile of support.

“Got it,” Dean breathed. He could feel thousands of eyes on him under the gaze of Castiel’s wolf. It was a new kind of role for him to play in front of near strangers. The friends and family he was cool with, but there were business associates and barely connected professional contacts out there watching Dean swear to take a subservient role to his Alpha husband. Dean took a moment before he looked up again to let the past few months roll through his mind, everything he wanted this wedding to say publicly about his relationship with Castiel, all of his talks with Kali. He nodded firmly to himself and he looked up into Castiel’s red eyes with a stubborn set to his jaw.

“You ready, Dean?” Jim asked him softly.

“Fuck yeah.”

“All right, put the ring onto the fourth finger of Castiel’s left hand and repeat after me.”

Dean took the hand Cas offered him and admired the thick dark metal bands, melded together into one, as he slid it into place. Castiel released a long slow exhale. Dean looked up at him in question. Had the Alpha not been certain that Dean would go through with it? Dean narrowed his eyes and shook his head.

Silly Alpha.

“I, Dean Michael, take you, Castiel James,”

Dean looked right into Castiel’s eyes and said, “I, Dean Michael, take you, Castiel James,”

“To be my lawful, wedded husband.” Dean’s voice was powerful in the enormous space.

“To have and to hold, from this day forward…”

“For richer, for poorer, in sickness and in health, in joy and in sorrow…”

“I promise to be obedient to your will, to accept your guidance…”

“to follow your strictures in my heart as well as my head…”
“For as long as we both shall live.”

Dean had a grin on his face as he tried to slide the ring over Castiel’s knuckle. It stuck fast, and Cas had to finish the job himself.

“Very nice, boys. And all that’s left is the declaration. So, now, by the power vested in me by the state of Massachusetts and which the state of Missouri has promised to uphold, I pronounce the two of you husbands. If you’d like to share a kiss, now’s the time. Be my guest.”

Pastor Jim took a subtle step backward. Cas added a, “Don’t mind if I do,” before launching himself at Dean and attaching himself to Dean’s face. Dean’s hands came up to clutch Castiel’s wrists as the Alpha took hold of his face and backed him up powerfully enough that Michael had to dodge backward, tumbling clumsily from his knees over onto his ass as Castiel kissed the thunder out of his husband.

The wedding attendants cheered and the brass quintet struck up the classic wedding recessional. The wedding party was showered with flower petals from above, and the grooms broke apart, laughing. As the din died down, Pastor Jim came forward again with his hands up to request quiet.

“Never a dull moment with these two,” he declared. “All right, on to the festivities. It is my great honor, in the name of Castiel’s esteemed mother, the Congresswoman of Kansas District 3, beta Naomi Novak, to cordially invite you all to attend a reception in the grooms’ honor next door in the Blue Room. The wedding party will be joining you shortly. We have one more order of business to see to before we join in the festivities. If everyone will please follow Congresswoman Novak?”

Pastor Jim let the multitudes file out. The close associates, friends and family, who were invited to witness the Shareer ka Dhaava ceremony knew to stay put. They began to filter toward the front, ignoring curious looks from those who weren’t invited.

Michael had righted himself and straightened his tunic with the fastidiousness of a Regency valet guarding his position. He looked across at April and found her watching him in turn with a soft look on her face. Michael smiled back. Venue staff worked swiftly to reconfigure the space. The Universist altar was rolled back and a flat table, ornamented with a dark cloth and fixed with two thick leather hand straps, was rolled into place at the front of the dais.

Heavy curtains were untied and began to encircle the space the wedding party occupied as a thin canopy was arranged above the table. Dean and Castiel ignored the bustle. Their heads remained close together, their hands clasped up high by their throats. Kisses were exchanged. Soft words passed back and forth. People began to take places around the table. Billie took up a spot outside the curtained entrance making sure no one entered who wasn’t invited.

Benny and Bobby both circled the interior, scoping for infiltrators. One woman, a journalist Castiel had insisted on inviting to the wedding, was courteously escorted out. Each invitation for this portion had been sent with a special red card, but no one needed the cards. Bobby, Benny, and Billie knew every name on that list by sight. Outside, Rufus manned the back entrance and kept the curious moving toward the reception hall. It all happened very quickly.

When Michael looked away from April, everyone had found a place and fallen still.

The couple stood near the table, still captivated with each other, paying no mind to the intimate setting or the audience. Their lips kept finding each other in sweet, chaste kisses.

Pastor Jim eventually cleared his throat gently. “Your pardon, gentlemen. I believe everything is in readiness. We await your leisure.”
Castiel nodded at him and looked around. The dark red curtains cast the space in a cavernous darkness, dimly lit from high above by a few track lights that filtered through the canopy. The faces looking back at him patiently were all tinted with a red glow. Cas smiled at the people standing about him in a circle. He turned and looked down at April.

“Very nice,” his wolf praised, and she gloved up at him, thrilled. “Are you all right?”

“Yes, Sir,” she answered.

He turned to Michael. “And you? Are you all right for a bit longer?”

“Yes, Sir,” Michael answered. The carpeting was well padded beneath his knees. He’d seen to that personally when the configuration was designed. Castiel nodded, satisfied. He looked around at the gathered assemblage again. He took Dean by the hand and led him around the table.

“We thank all of you for coming,” Castiel said. “Over the last few weeks, Dean or I or both of us have spoken to each of you in person about what we’re doing here today. I believe everyone understands, but I would like to assure you, if any of you find the events disturbing, please feel free to slip out. The exits are marked clearly. For those of you who choose to stay, please be assured that the events that follow are entirely consensual. Dean?” Cas turned to his husband.

“Yes, Alpha. Entirely consensual.”

“Very good. If you have any misgivings, Dean, now is the time to voice them. Once we begin, your safeword will not be effective.”

“No, Sir. No misgivings. I’m ready.”

Castiel studied Dean’s face and then looked to Michael. When he went on, it was with the voice of his wolf, and Dean’s spine straightened noticeably.

“From this point, I must command you not to speak until the end of the ceremony. That goes for all of you as well. Your respectful silent attention is appreciated.” Castiel took a deep breath. He kissed Dean’s knuckle near his new ring and looked deeply into his eyes. Dean nodded, kissed Castiel’s knuckle back and left him to tuck out through the heavy curtain at the back. Castiel watched him go.

Kali and Gabriel stepped up on either side of Castiel and began wordlessly to undress him. He allowed the attention like a Pharaoh, moving as little as possible. Gabriel handed each piece of clothing off to Sam as they were removed. Sam folded or hung each item and arranged them on a bureau behind him. When he was nude, Castiel rolled his head on his neck, closed his eyes and breathed deeply, then opened them again and stood before the table, facing the back entrance. When he was ready, he nodded to Kali. Kali pulled the curtain from one side, and Gabriel from the other.

In the space that opened, Dean stood perfectly framed. His head was down, his hands clasped in front of him. Sam came regally forward, ducked through the curtain and stood before his brother. With a finger beneath Dean’s chin, he raised the man’s face.

“Are you sure?” Sam asked softly. Dean winced at the words. There weren’t supposed to be any words. His jaw clenched. He let fire show in his eyes. What kind of question was that to be asking now?

Sam obviously saw in his brother’s face what he needed to see, and he matched the set of Dean’s jaw and turned around. Reaching behind himself, he took Dean by the wrist and walked him forward and into the small space. It was beginning to grow warm and stuffy, but no one moved.
Sam presented himself to Castiel formally. He bowed just his head before stepping to the side and placing Dean’s hand in Castiel’s.

Castiel took hold of Dean’s hand and stood silently for a few moments, staring at his prize without blinking. At last, he dropped Dean’s hand and began a slow circuit around Dean, surveying him from every side. He ran a hand roughly through Dean’s hair, scraped nails over his throat, took him by the jaw and pulled him off-balance to glare into his eyes. Dean’s mouth dropped open. His eyes were impossibly wide.

Cas released his jaw roughly and picked up both hands to inspect his fingernails.

“Open!” he commanded, and Dean widened his mouth for inspection. Cas ran his fingers along Dean’s teeth and over his tongue, over his hard and soft palates, narrowing his eyes at the gurgling noise Dean made.

Finally, Cas stepped back and pointed to the table.

“Present!”

Dean whined high in his throat but didn’t move. His fingers tightened into a fist. Most of the onlookers would have full view of his presentation once he mounted to table.

“Submissive, PRESENT!”

They’d changed the wording at that point. The ceremony called for the word, ‘Omega’ but Dean was no Omega. A Bottom who Presented at the first command was declaring an intention to be the ultimate obedient Omega. Many Ozzies went ass-up the first time they were commanded, but Dean wasn’t Ozzie. His wolf was miserable though. It wanted to take to the table. Dean dug his bare toes into the carpeting and fought to hold position upright.

Capitulating on the second command meant the Bottom could be expected to need a firm hand but would generally not be a handful. They just needed some structure.

Just a little longer.

Dean wanted more than a little structure. He wanted everything. There was a third call to Present coming, and then it would be taken out of his hands. Castiel watched him tremble.

“I’ve never asked you for anything three times, Winchester,” said Castiel’s wolf, totally scrubbing the script and earning a gasp from Kali. “I’m not about to start now.”

Dean had time to suck in a quick horrified breath before he found himself driven bodily forward, facedown onto the table, bent at the waist. His robe fell open and a hot body pressed up behind him, leaving the ceremony far behind. Gone was the display. There would be no posing.

Dean scrambled to get into position as Castiel’s teeth locked around the back of his neck. He got one knee lifted into its slot, but the other was pinned. The wolf rutted painfully at him from behind, missing the mark because of the plug that was still deep in Dean’s rectum.

Dean panted. He reached for the hand straps but couldn’t get them. Sam stepped up on the other side of the table and took him by the wrists, pulling him tight against the table’s edge with a determined, almost angry look on his face. Sam’s wolf seemed personally incensed by Dean’s reticence to obey.

Suddenly, Michael was next to Sam, a fiery look in his own gleaming golden eyes. He took Dean’s left wrist from Sam. The two of them nodded to each other and stepped a few feet apart, splaying Dean’s arms out wide, and giving him no leverage at all.

Behind him, the Alpha’s wolf had found the plug and yanked it violently free. Dean cried out in pain. He heard glass shatter behind him as it landed hard.

Hard pummeling driving thrusts. Blinding pain. Teeth. Hands yanked at his hair. Drool or blood dribbled down his throat to his sternum. His arms were pulled impossibly tight. Castiel’s cock sank in past its knot and thrust hard and fast. Dean howled. He struggled. He fought his mate, his brother, and his husband with everything he had. He shoved backward with the knee that hadn’t found it’s perch, and he received a hard swat to his thigh in reply.

Castiel drove in hard. He practically climbed Dean’s lithe body in his zeal, getting one knee all the way onto the table and bracing himself on his arms against Dean’s back, forcing him flat.

“Not. About. To. Start. NOW!” Castiel huffed as he pummeled Dean’s hole. “You’re mine now! MINE!!”

“AAAAaarrggh!!” cried Dean with his head yanked back and his throat bare. Sam and Michael pulled him tight, and Castiel used the tension to force Dean all the way up onto the table to sprawl gracelessly across it. His legs splayed out straight behind him, spread-eagled. Castiel climbed up with him, getting his knees set between Dean’s thighs and forcing them wider than they were meant to go, stretching at the satin underlayer of the front of Dean’s robe until it strained, nearly ripping.

Dean felt the knot lock, and he screamed in pain. Then he felt Castiel’s teeth break the skin on his shoulder, and his scream cut off as if sliced with a knife. He went totally still, except for his panting. Castiel was breathing hard through his nose, growling at everything. His teeth held their grip even as blood dribbled over Dean’s clavicle.

Castiel continued to thrust painfully into Dean’s ruined body, and he moaned as he spilled, a shaky breath burbling past his lips. The hand gripping his hair pulled Dean’s head back just a bit more, stretching out the skin beneath Castiel’s tongue, and he lapped at the sore flesh without letting go.

Dean sobbed into the tabletop. First Sam and then Michael released his wrists. Dean tucked his arms in tightly beneath his body, beginning to shake with the rush of adrenalin. He was still panting hard. He’d never hardened beneath his husband. He didn’t come. He hadn’t experienced anything erotic at all, just the terrifying assault of the 25 staking its Claim for real.

Physically, it was Claiming sex. Emotionally, a D.F. was different. For Dean, this experience far outpaced anything he’d ever experienced. If he’d safeworded, the assault would have continued until Castiel was through anyway. It wasn’t a Claim despite the Claim that slammed over him. It was a Domination. It made no difference if Dean changed his mind or not. That was the difference.

It wasn’t play. It wasn’t about masochism. It wasn’t about stroking anyone’s wolf to ease the fire in its belly. It was about who owned whom, and it was about showing that to their friends. As their breathing began to slow, Dean’s trembling picked up. His breath skittered and shuddered uncontrollably. It was over so fast.

Castiel slowly let go with his teeth. He pushed himself to lean up using his grip in Dean’s hair, and then he let go and petted it back into place. Castiel looked about him. Sarah was gone, but everyone else was still there.

“Michael?” he asked breathlessly.
“Sir?”

“How is he?”

Michael knelt on the far side if the table and stroked Dean’s face tenderly, coaxing him to open his eyes. When he did, he blinked at Michael in confusion. “He’s scrambled right now, but he’ll be okay in a bit. Give him a few minutes. He’s in a lot of pain.”

“Dean?” Cas prompted. “Just relax. We’re going to take care of you. Close your eyes, baby. Lie still.”

“yessir,” came a sleepy reply. Dean’s body lay limp, worn out.

Bobby and Benny began herding the witnesses out in single file, directing them toward the reception hall with assurances that Dean was fine. Soon the enclosure was nearly empty. April climbed up onto the table beside Dean and sprawled next to him, lending him her strength as he continued to work through the tremors. Michael stayed by his head, petting his hair and massaging the sore spot at the back of his head. Sam fetched him a small cup of water and helped him drink it. Gabriel and Kali packed away Castiel’s wedding suit and fetched April’s dress and tuxedos for all three men. Kali began to unfasten the robe from Dean’s body, letting it gape open up his back to help him cool down in the hot space. She eyed the bloodstains along the collar. Those would remain for the photo session tomorrow, the rusty stains a symbol of a successful union.

Kali made a point of telling Castiel off as Gabe collected her and Sam. She wasn’t pleased. That had not been the ceremony they’d asked her to support. That had been a travesty.

Cas chuckled, leaning back down to cover his husband’s back and kiss the back of his neck sweetly. “Perhaps we didn’t follow the script,” he told her. “But that’s what my wolf needed. I believe it was exactly what Dean needed as well.”

Kali left in a huff with Gabe and Sam trailing.

“Dean? Can you speak?”

“I can speak, Alpha,” he mumbled. At least that’s what it sounded like he said.

“Baby, where does it hurt?”

“Everywhere.”

“Was that what you had in mind?” Cas asked. “I could try it again if I missed the mark.”

“Tha’s not funny,” Dean told him.

Cas chuckled and kissed him again. He didn’t need the words from Dean. He could feel him well enough, he realized. Their weak double-bond had just widened significantly, and Cas could feel it for himself. He laid his cheek between Dean’s shoulder blades and closed his eyes. His right hand scratched idly at the back of April’s neck, and his left did the same to Dean’s.

“I love you, Alpha,” Dean mumbled. “Thanks for taking that seriously. Means everything.” His breathing was back to normal, and the trembling was beginning to slow.

“This is going to sound self-serving, Dean,” Cas answered without opening his eyes. “But that was at least as meaningful to me as it was to you. You were right, as usual. We needed that.”
“I can feel you more than before,” Dean said. “Bonds are wider.”

“Mm-hm. I feel it too. My D.F. on top of multiple Claims seems to have done the trick to open a broader channel. If we’re lucky, it’ll stay this wide.”

“Mm,” Dean hummed, slipping into a doze.

“Kitten,” Cas said softly. “Get dressed. Michael, you too. We’ll meet you in a little bit. The knot won’t take long to deflate. I’d like a few minutes alone with my husband.”

Alone at last, Castiel couldn’t stop kissing Dean’s bare skin. Dean’s sleeves were still in place holding the robe on, but his back had been freed all the way across, and each freckle needed a kiss of its own. When the knot slipped free, Cas helped Dean stand and get blood flowing through his legs. Cas slipped Dean’s robe off and rolled it into a ball. He stuffed it into the makeshift bureau off to the side of the dais. The space had gone very quiet and warm, and Dean seemed sleepy.

“Kali’s pissed at you, Alpha,” Dean observed.

“She’ll get over it. At least we didn’t turn it into a delicate roleplay like she feared. If anything, what we did was far harsher.

“Tell me about it,” grumbled Dean, massaging his asshole with one hand.

“Stop that. You’re going to feed me cake with that hand later,” chided Cas.

Dean subsided, but he grimaced when Cas bent him back down to examine the damage. “You look good, baby. No tearing. Minimal bruising. The pain will fade rapidly.”

“Why does it feel like this, then?” Dean asked sitting up on the tabletop and wincing.

“It’s mostly psychological,” the M.D. informed him. “Your body responds to assault very differently than it does to the kind of pain you crave. Now you know what other alphas experience when they feel pain. Not fun is it?”

“I’ll live,” Dean grumbled again. Then he laughed softly to himself.

“What?” Cas asked, sliding naked between Dean’s knees.

“That was fucked up, Alpha. We are a couple of seriously fucked up dudes, and I’ve never been more in love with you.” Cas grinned as he leaned in to claim a kiss.

“You ain’t seen nothin’ yet, Winchester. Wait till I get you home tonight.”

“Oh, Jesus. Cas, I can’t!”

Castiel laughed and kissed him again. “I’m teasing Dean. I’ll let you heal first. Besides, serves you right for making my wolf wait a whole week to touch you. Come on, husband-mine, let’s get dressed and rescue folks from my mother.”

Chapter End Notes

I hope it hit the right notes. I hope it was worth the wait.
There's more artwork coming, thanks to Purrvet. Will make a master post to simplify checking all of it out once I figure that out. I learn slowly, but I learn...much like some of my beloved characters.
Chapter 110

Chapter Summary

It's a marathon wedding reception! Wolves don't do short parties.

Chapter Notes

First and most critically, Purrvet made us a beautiful piece of original art. It's at the heading of Chapter 28. Go. Go check it. Drool. He's gorgeous!

Second, y'all, I fully confess this mammoth chapter is nothing but a masturbatory self-indulgence. It's a fourteen-hour-long wedding reception, cause they don't do half measures, and it's so long. So, so long. But, ya know, whatever.

Warning in the THEN section for corporal punishment of a minor.

Warning in the present tense for an obscene attempt to embed music in a textual narrative. The playlist is posted at the end. Word from the author, assume that all music that isn't linked explicitly is all classic rock suitable to please Dean Winchester. What I tied in is just the purposeful songs, multiple though they are.

I do apologize for the unchewable length, but ... yeah.

Off you go.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.
THEN:

“Cas..tee..yel No..vak!” beta Clement enunciated, and Cas jumped a foot off his chair. His face turned beet red, and his heart slammed into his chest.

“Ma’am?” he asked with wide eyes. His pencil froze on the page.

“What was your instruction?” she asked in that carefully pronounced way of hers. Cas hated her with every fiber of his being, but he was stuck in her class for six more months. Maybe he would get alpha Stone next year. Maybe next year he could transfer.

“I finished the reading,” he explained.

“Was that what I asked you?” she persisted.

“Ma’am, I’m prepared for the class discussion. I’m just waiting for everyone else to finish reading. What does it hurt if I draw while I wait?”

She drew herself up and scowled at him. Slowly she advanced. She stopped with the side of her thigh at the top of his desk and hovered above him. She picked up the drawing he’d been working diligently to finish and inspected it with an air of distaste before folding it in half and tucking it behind her back.

“I see,” she said at last. “It must be quite an experience to be so much smarter than everyone else, Mr. Novak.”

“I’m not…” he bristled. “I wasn’t…! I just finished reading! Am I supposed to sit here and stare out the window with my hands folded on my desk?! Give me back my paper!!” Castiel was furious. He felt ready to burst with outrage. He found himself on his feet ready to lambaste the witch for humiliating him in front of people he already struggled to connect with. “It’s not my fault you assigned us forty minutes for a ten minute read! Maybe you should try teaching second grade! They read slower!”

He was in for it, and he knew it. The beta’s face took on a dead calm. She nodded once to herself and then took a measured pace backward. She pointed toward the front of the classroom. “You’ve been warned about disrespectful outbursts, Mr. Novak. I don’t care who your father is, you’re not exempt from proper behavior in my classroom. March!”

“Leave my father out of it,” he grumbled petulantly under his breath, but he wended his way to the front of the room. Every eye followed him. It wasn’t that his classmates didn’t like him, exactly, or he them. It was that they never spoke the same language when they talked to each other. He found his brow knit in befuddlement as he tried to understand their humor and their games, and he received the same puzzled frowns back whenever he attempted to break to logjam.

At first, it seemed that his constant run-ins with authority would earn him some credibility with his classmates, but they mostly seemed resigned to pity him now. Staying on the right side of the paddle wasn’t this hard for most of them, and it had become more a nuisance to witness his near daily punishments than a cause for respect. Only Brandon got swatted more often than Cas, and there was something really off about Brandon.
Castiel was beginning to agree with his mother on the question of schools. Cas didn’t belong here in a Lupin school with his kind. He didn’t fit. His father insisted on a one-year trial, stridently overruling his mother’s insistence on a Primate private education for her sons. Lupin public schools had improved, he insisted, and he didn’t want his sons raised separate from the pack that lived at their doorstep. He didn’t want privileged princelings in his house. Gabe took to it like a duck in water, but Castiel…

Mother had pursed her lips judgmentally, but she couldn’t change his mind. He was Alpha. It was his decision. Castiel trudged the well-worn path to the stool his belly knew so well. No matter how awful it was, he knew he was sentenced to this classroom for the whole year.

“Drop your pants, Mr. Novak. You know the position. If you have so much extra time on your hands, let’s see if we can fill it.”

Castiel fumed. She didn’t have to be a dick about it. He pushed his school slacks to his ankles along with his underwear. He faced the chalkboard at the front of the class, exposing himself to his classmates behind him, and he could feel each and every eye.

“What do you have to say for yourself, Castiel?” she asked him as she collected the heavy oak paddle from its hook on the wall by the door.

“I apologize for being disrespectful,” he chanted.

“And?” she prompted. She stationed herself to the side, just out of his periphery and not blocking him from anyone’s view.

He frowned. “And what?” He wasn’t sorry, and he couldn’t be forced to give her more than the required token words. She would be taking the rest out of his bottom in a moment anyway.

“And for misusing your time in my classroom when you were under instruction to make productive use of our limited hours?” she suggested with faux kindness. “We have only so many hours every day, young man. Wasting them by drawing wolves is a travesty.”

He sighed. Wasting them by putting on an authoritarian display was no better. Besides, it wasn’t a wolf this time. It was something else. If she couldn’t tell that, he clearly needed more practice. “I apologize for drawing pictures in class when I had over thirty minutes left after I finished reading. Next time I’ll stare straight ahead of me and daydream silently instead,” he told the blackboard. He knew that quip would earn him extra swats, but at this point, what did it matter?

He heard the paddle smack threateningly against her outer thigh.

“I see.”

Cas turned his head to look at her, curious about the delay. He could tell she was really mad. She regarded him coldly.

“Ma’am?” he asked.

“I can wait all day, Mr. Novak. Or if you’d rather, we can take the matter down the hall to the office.”

Castiel’s blood ran cold. A trip to the office would be far worse and would mandate a call to his father at work. “No ma’am. That won’t be necessary. Please.”

“Then do it correctly,” she insisted.
“I’m very sorry, Mrs. Clement, that I was disrespectful and that I drew pictures in your class. I will use my time better next time.”

“Bend over the stool, Castiel,” she told him, still cold.

He gritted his teeth and set his jaw. He waddled miserably forward two steps and leaned across the cold wooden seat, clutching onto the rungs on the far side and bracing himself. The first swat made him clench up hard, but he resisted letting her hear any sound from his throat. Father was going to be irate. He’d given Castiel a stern reprimand only two days ago about his inability to behave in class. Cas grunted involuntarily as the paddle swacked home again. He’d promised Alpha he would try. And now he’d landed right back in it all over again.

But he wasn’t sorry. She could make him say the words, but she couldn’t make him mean them. His eyes clenched hard as his backside took the blows. She always aimed right at the tenderest spots, and it fucking hurt.

It was bad enough to waste class time reading passages out of a textbook, but to waste over half an hour was ludicrous for a page and a half of reading. Cas could have read the passage eight times in the allotted time. As it was, he’d been through it start to finish twice. He failed to stifle another grunt, berating himself for letting her hear his pain. At least this time he’d busied himself quietly instead of impatiently drumming his pencil or pacing repeatedly to the pencil sharpener. Tears squeezed soundlessly from the corners of his eyes in his fury. The real clencher was that his impatience was borne not of inexcusable disdain for the class, but of frustration at the lost time. Castiel loved history. He craved more, not less, and he longed to truly engage in the subject that his textbook turned into lifeless drivel. He’d already read the whole book. Where it fell short, he’d researched the most fascinating sections on his own. He wanted to learn, damnit!

“OW!” he exclaimed as she struck the same spot for the fifth time in a row. It wasn’t fair. None of this was fair.

At last she released him to waddle in humiliation into the corner. He set his elbows against the wall and laced his fingers behind his head without being told. His butt burned with the sting of the paddle and the bite of eyes on him, drilling the pain in harder. His eyes stung with tears.

It wasn’t fair.

NOW:

Dean limped a bit getting his tuxedo on, but Cas had been right. The pain was fading rapidly. He felt lethargic, but he knew that a few minutes into the reception would perk him up again. The scent of Pack all about him – good will from people he loved and the scents that went with it – would snap him right out of it. He straightened his cummerbund and looked up for his cuff-links to find Castiel in his space, quite close enough that Dean could kiss him without straining.

So he did.

“May I help you, Alpha?” he asked lightly. “You gonna remind me to write my scene report?” The adrenalin was gone. The panic that sent him flailing in desperation had vanished, leaving behind a soggy sense of warm affection that was an odd aftertaste to such a violent affair. He was still bleeding a little from his shoulder, but Cas had bandaged him sufficiently to keep his crisp white shirt clean.

“The ritual isn’t complete yet, Winchester,” Cas told him with an Alpha air. “We have one final step. Would you rather finalize it here in private or out in front of witnesses? I can call the Pack together if you want to make it Pack business.”

Dean swallowed and lowered his eyes. “It’s not my call, Sir.” He knew what Castiel meant. As things stood, Dean still belonged wholesale to Cas, legally, personally, and socially. Dean had no standing whatsoever at the moment. He’d surrendered it all as surely as the Alpha had ripped it from his hands.

“Eyes up, Submissive.”

Dean looked up. Castiel’s blue eyes were warm and open. Dean saw a peace in them that was unfamiliar. The Alpha had soft laugh lines radiating from the corners of his eyes, lines Dean longed to watch deepen over the years to come. Cas raised Dean’s left hand again and kissed his ring without breaking eye contact.

“Your trust in me is a gift, Dean. I won’t ever take that for granted. Listen to me right now.” Cas was close enough that their breath mingled. They could each feel heat radiating from the other. The enormous cavity of space around them intensified their solitude, the simple canopy above their heads cloaked them in secrecy.

Cas waited for Dean to nod minutely in acknowledgement, and then he went on.

“Our wedding is one thing,” he said. “What that says to the world is that we choose each other. Every day we’ll wake to face the day and choose all over again, you and I. Do you agree?”

“Yes, Alpha.” Dean’s tone was firm.

Cas chuckled at the formality. Dean needed a little more ritual yet. The Alpha cocked his head. “But that’s not all that we’ve promised here today, my love. That’s only a portion. I know you love me. I cherish that gift. I’ll make every effort to be a good husband to you. Let me say that first and foremost and then move on, yes?”

“Yes, Sir.” Dean told him, formal but a little meek. It was the moment of truth. Dean felt weightless. He felt in a very real sense that his physical body might no longer exist and wouldn’t unless Castiel granted him leave to reoccupy his vessel.

“You’re so beautiful,” Castiel praised. It seemed that his voice filtered through all three of his designations at once. Dean blinked slowly. He let his consciousness delve effortlessly into his husband’s mind, simply following the tracer lines that were more open to him now, feeling his way along them to where they split into separate strands. Everything he touched touched him back, and he felt it bolster him as if his bones were strung with Castiel’s strength.

“Dean, you belong to me,” Castiel told him firmly. “You belong to me. I own you. Nothing can ever change that now, and it is good and right and just, exactly as it is. I do not ask your leave to approve of my actions.” Dean swallowed visibly. “I do not ask your forgiveness for what I took from you.”

Dean nodded grimly and slipped down to his knees. Castiel kept hold of his hand. Their gaze remained locked.

“Don’t ever forget your place, Dean Michael Winchester. You are not my mate. You belong to me. You are, in every way, MINE.”
“Yes, Alpha,” he replied in a whisper.

“Do you understand?” Castiel asked. His voice carried a huskiness that told Dean the wolf had the reins in its teeth.

Did he?

Castiel’s eyes had a hard edge to them now, willing Dean to hear him in a way he wasn’t sure the man ever could without a Mating-bond. But Dean was already there. He was SO there. Tears sprang up in Dean’s eyes, and his hand turned in Castiel’s to clutch onto him like a lifeline. Words failed him, but he nodded vehemently. It didn’t matter if Cas never finalized the ritual they’d discussed. Dean didn’t need it. He could live the remainder of his life just like this, putting on an alpha front for the world, but belonging wholesale to the man before him.

Right now, Dean was no one. He had no identity but what Castiel might grant him. He floated.

Cas held his eyes with a hardness that belied the ring on his finger. His nostrils flared. It was all about trust right now.

“You are so beautiful, my love,” he said once more, still speaking through every voice at once. “I believe we understand each other. So now I say this to you: Without retracting a sliver of what I’ve Claimed, know that you are washed clean of your frailties, made whole where you were weak, set upright on your own feet to stand straight and proud. What I own, I care for, and I will always own you. Envision that however you like, my Pet. It doesn’t matter how broken you believe yourself to be. What I grant you leave to carry is beautiful and whole. You are righteous through me. You are strong. You are brilliant. You are charged henceforth with the care and custody of my property. Forsake it at your peril, Winchester, for I will grant you no mercy should you fail.”

Dean sobbed out loud. His face contorted into a grotesque mask of self-loathing and relief. He reached up with his right hand and took hold of Castiel’s wrist, hanging on for his life. Castiel didn’t flinch.

“When you rise,” Cas told him almost coldly. “You do so as alpha. You do so in the full weight of your designations and your Pack position. You stand up into your birthright, unadulterated by any ritual, but you do so through me – only through me, always through me, purely through me. I charge you, Dean Michael Winchester, to live through me.”

Castiel fell silent. Dean’s thumping sobs broke out of him, a dam that had burst at long last, a flood that he could no longer hold in check, and he cried hard and ugly as he clutched at his husband to stay upright on his knees.

Castiel let him cry his fill without comment. He pulled Dean’s head in to rest against his thigh, and he caressed his Sub’s hair while he waited out the grief. Someday he hoped Dean would come to realize that he wasn’t broken, and that what Cas had ownership of didn’t need polishing. Dean’s soul shone brighter than the most brilliant star without aid from anyone.

At last, Dean took a deep shuddering breath and set his jaw. It quivered a bit, but then it firmed. Dean’s tears stopped. His face was streaked with wetness, but his eyes were resolute. He used his grip on Castiel’s hand to leverage himself back to his feet, and Cas pulled him up.

“I won’t let you down, Sir,” he told his Alpha.

“You couldn’t if you tried, beloved.”

“Thanks, Alpha’” Dean whispered simply.
“Come on, Dean. Let’s go wash your face and get to our party.”

“Wait.”

Cas stopped trying to herd his husband out of the enclosure. He stood with one arm wrapped around his shoulders. Dean exhaled slowly. “I didn’t think you really got it,” he said. “But you did. Thank you. Maybe it’s a fucked up way of getting there, but I needed this. Tessa’s already given me an earful about it though, so if it’s all the same to you, maybe we keep the details to ourselves.”

Castiel chuckled. “I just demanded you cleave to me as your god, Dean. I think we can keep this between you and me.”

“And where does Michael fit?” Dean asked him.

“Do you really need me to clarify?” Cas asked with a note of surprise.

“I mean, there’s nothing subtle about the new strata. I got what I wanted, Alpha, but that kind of leaves him dangling over a bottomless pit.” Dean settled his head onto Castiel’s shoulder. He couldn’t see Cas’ face. He could feel the touch of amusement though. They should have clarified this before right now.

“Michael’s position does not shift by a hair, Dean. He is precisely where he was. He is precisely where he deserves to be. What we’ve shifted here between us is for the two of us and no one else.” Castiel’s arm across Dean’s shoulder pulled a little, cinching him.

“Yeah, but…did I just agree to…I mean, if I belong to you, where does this leave me with him? Cas, I need him too.”

Cas chuckled again and turned Dean to face him. “Nothing changes about that, love. He’s still your mate. This wasn’t about elbowing in between you, whatever it may have sounded like. You belong with Michael. You belong TO me. I need to know you understand. He still belongs to you first and to me second.”

“Nothing changes?” he asked tentatively.

Cas raised his chin with a gentle hand. “Everything changes, but not for you and Michael. He’s a part of you, Dean, but he’s not between you and me. Let’s spend the rest of our lives figuring out what that means.”

Dean laughed wetly. “It’s a deal. Thanks, Alpha.”

Castiel kissed him once more, looked deeply into his eyes and then nodded firmly. “It’s only 1:30, and we’ve got the Blue Room all night, Dean. When you need to rest, you rest. There’s no rush. Don’t push yourself.”

“Yessir.” Dean snagged his cuff-links and let himself be led out through the heavy curtain. He blinked in the suddenly too bright room. Workers were already busy lowering the soft crepe banners. They would leave the front display for photos later, but the back of the house was being packed up efficiently. A couple of workers watched the two of them make their way out a side entrance.

“Congratulations, alphas,” cheered a tall woman in work boots who had a long ladder perched on her shoulder. “Better get in there. They’re already serving luncheon.”
April hugged her mother tightly, letting the Omega gush over her soft autumn-orange organza dress. April was on cloud nine, echoing Castiel’s joy. She couldn’t stop grinning. Michael’s hand rested in hers as she bathed in the scents of her birth family. Michael looked stunning in his tuxedo, and he shook her father’s hand formally. They’d met officially early in the week, but they hadn’t had time to really talk yet, and Michael still felt intimidated by the alpha whose face was practically carved from American Gothic. April had tried to convince Michael that the man was a teddy bear, but Michael wasn’t going for it. He was relieved when his sister appeared from nowhere and buried him in her embrace.

“You were the most gorgeous wolf up there,” she insisted to Michael as she released him. He smiled wanly, trying to keep his bonds at the front of his mind so he could watch over Dean. Dean’s emotions were shaky at the moment, and Michael didn’t want to leave him alone with that. Michael’s alpha was happy. It wasn’t that. But Michael knew the newlyweds still had a bit of private business to lock down, and it felt like they were doing it right now.

“Thanks, Rache,” he mumbled. “You look very pretty, too.” Michael caught April’s eye. She nodded at him with confidence. She could feel her own mate as well, and she wasn’t perturbed. That was good. Michael smiled. “But surely Pete here was more glorious than me,” he insisted, raising April’s hand and bringing her to twirl for Rachel. Her delicate skirt whirled with her, and Rachel hugged her when she came to a stop.

“What’s this?” Michael’s sister asked, nodding to where the two Omegas’ hands were still linked together.

“And you didn’t tell me?” she shrieked, whapping Michael in the gut. He whoofed and folded.

“Ouch! Jesus, Rachel!”

“What does Castiel have to say about this?” she insisted.

Michael smirked and wrapped an arm over April’s shoulder possessively. He kissed the top of her head.

“No way! You’re lying!”

Michael grinned at her. “As long as I don’t get her pregnant,” he allowed with a rueful face. “And I’m not going to do that.” He was uncomfortably aware of April’s parents still listening in.

“I don’t believe you,” Rachel challenged. She looked around to see if the newlyweds had arrived yet and then turned back to April. “For real?” She leaned in close and whispered. “For real?”

April nodded and turned to look up at Michael. “For real. Of course, we don’t know where we’re going from here, but it feels good to have the chance to find out. I love your brother, Rachel. He’s a good man.”

Rachel tucked her knuckles under her chin and made a wide-eyed face. “Oh, my God! This is amazing! Holy fuck!!” She turned and searched the crowd behind her. “Mommy! Come quick!!”
Michael laughed and released April to shove at his sister’s shoulder. “Go get a drink, Rachel. Don’t be a pest.”

She wobbled on her feet but didn’t fall. “Stop it, Mike! High heels! I’ll break my ankle!” April grabbed hold of her arm and helped her stabilize. Rachel shook her head. “I’m gonna need proof, you know. I dare you to kiss her in front of her mate.”

“I’ll do better than that,” he leaned in close and winked. April laughed and stretched up to kiss him softly on his lips. The look that earned her from Michael was really all the proof Rachel needed. She threw her arms around her brother and then followed the hug with another for April.

“Please, please, please tell me we can be sisters,” gushed Rachel.

“We’re already sisters,” April told her warmly. “We may have to wade through multiple in-laws to get there, but you and I are family now. That’s forever.” April cut off the weepy puppy-eyes by re-introducing Rachel to her parents who had both been standing awkwardly with glasses of champagne in their hands watching.

“You’re all at the same table,” April told them. “I made sure of that. I want my family to know Michael’s family. We have so much in common. I think you’re really going to hit it off. Mom, you and Michael’s mother both do embroidery, and you’re both Ozzies! Michael’s Pack breeds horses and dogs. Maybe you can visit.”

“Yes!” blurted Rachel. “You have to!”

“That would be…” Reginald cut off as Michael’s parents arrived. The alphas shook hands warmly. The Omegas hugged. April beamed. Michael felt split. He could feel Dean from the distance, experiencing something intense and not entirely pleasant, and before him, people he cared about were busy admiring one another’s clothing and announcing that the weather couldn’t have been more perfect.

April rested a hand on his arm and looked up at him. “He’s crying,” he whispered to her. “He never cries like this. Not like this.”

“He’s all right, Michael,” she whispered back. “He needs to let it out. It’s a big day. He doesn’t do half measures, and this is what he wanted.”

He nodded, but the haunted look didn’t ease in his eyes until he felt Dean calm down. Lunch was announced, and people began to find their place cards, settling in to eat a late lunch. Unlike Primate celebrations, a wolf shindig lasted into the wee hours of the morning. Most of the apes would leave before dinner was served, but the wolves were here for the long haul. Inhibitions would begin to fall away as fewer and fewer apes remained to find the revelry unsettling.

For now though.

Even Gabriel was on his best behavior.

Michael held April’s chair for her as she slid into place at the head table. Gabriel squeezed her thigh under the table and she swatted the back of his head.

“Behave, you two,” Benny told them both, leaning down between their heads on his way to his own seat.

“He started it!” / “She started it!” they announced in unison.
Benny left them with a look of warning, but he let it go.

Sam handed Sarah a flute of champagne. Lunch plates were being wheeled out, but he wasn’t hungry yet. He’d just tucked his mate into a quiet room off the hallway to feed the twins and assess their ability to stay a little longer. Eunice was standing by to run them home and watch over them until late into the night.

“Want to talk it over?” he asked Sarah. She looked up from her reverie, startled.

“What’s to talk over?” she asked him, taking the glass and sipping. “You’re going to tell me that was all normal and natural, and it’s just how wolves are. Damnit, Sam, you held him down so his husband could rape him! I couldn’t stand by and watch that. I shouldn’t have been there in the first place.”

Sam chewed on her consternation for a moment. “I guess my wolf was tired of all the dancing they do between them. They skirted around for years and never got to the point.”

“THAT was the point?”

“Well...yes, actually,” he confirmed. “And no, I’m not going to tell you there’s anything normal about what just happened in there. It was weird as hell. You aren’t going to see that happen again, Sarah. Not like that. I understand why it upset you, but it’s not usually like that, not even a full Domination between alphas. That was harsher.”

She scoffed. “I’ve seen pictures. Charlie showed me pictures of an alpha with his jaw broken. How is this worse?”

Sam made a face. Without the scents behind it, he couldn’t quite explain. This was harsher. It just was. “You know, the guy in the picture with the broken jaw is sitting right over there. We could go talk to him. He’s a good guy.” Sam nodded toward Victor who had his head close to Christian’s just as the two men exploded in laughter and clashed their glasses together in a boisterous toast. “He was on the wrong path, and he needed a correction. It was a hard lesson to swallow, but now everything’s on track again. It’s better for everyone, even Victor. With Dean, it’s different. He doesn’t need a correction. He needs an owner. The truth is, that’s been me since before I was ready for it. Now it’s Cas, and that’s better for all of us.”

She shook her head and looked back at Sam, dismissing the man whose jaw seemed fine and who clearly held no grudges. “Castiel vowed to respect Dean not ten minutes prior, and then he violated him. I don’t care how you spin it, Sam. It’s vile! And you helped him do it.”

Sam blew out a long exhale. “Come on, Sarah. You’re so damn close. Click over with me. Make the connections. You get this. I know you do. I can see it in your eyes. You keep getting stuck on your own culture. Let it go. Let go and feel. Dean’s going to come limping through that door in a minute, and he’s not going to be broken. It’s not brainwashing. It’s not a violation. It’s Pack.” Sam’s head was down close to hers as he whispered furiously to her. “And yeah, it was harsh. It was harsher than normal, but this marriage thing goes against our nature, Sarah. It’s like pounding a square peg into a round hole. It takes some doing to make it fit. They aren’t going to get there without a little pounding.”
She scoffed harshly again. “Marriage is a partnership. If it requires a rape to make it stick, maybe it’s not really a marriage in the first place!”

“It may not be an ape marriage,” he growled back. “But it’s what my brother needed. You don’t know the first thing about what he’s been through, about what he needs. You judge Castiel for promising him respect? Well, what you aren’t seeing is that it’s the highest form of respect Cas can offer him by giving Dean exactly what he wanted. He needs an Alpha more than he needs a husband. Maybe that’s not the way an ape thinks, and maybe it wouldn’t work for 90% of wolves either, but it’s right for Dean and Cas. My brother can do anything. Anything. He’s amazing. But he’s convinced he’s broken. No amount of therapy is going to change that. You hear me? But if Cas ties him fast and takes all of the worry about being broken onto himself, Dean’s free of it. Free of it forever. Don’t lecture me about respect. I’ll bet you don’t know anyone else in the world who would make that sacrifice for someone they love. I know I don’t. And yeah, I helped. I would do it again. I’d sit on him if I had to.”

Sarah’s face had gone slack and pale. “It just can’t…”

“Yes, it can.” Sam breathed hard through his nose. “When Dean and Cas come through that door, watch them. See for yourself. Feel it, Sarah. Don’t think. Look around you. Are these people beaten? Are they brainwashed? Are they broken remnants trammeled into submission? Every wolf in this room has been paddled and mounted at some point. Some of them experience it weekly. Some of them are sitting on tender butts right now. Some of them will be in pain before they leave here today, I’ll bet. Look at them. Tell me what you see.”

She looked about her. They looked like any people at any celebration. They laughed and smiled. Some were eating while others mingled about. Wolves and apes circulated without friction. No one was on their knees or bound with a collar and leash. There were no leather strap corsets or indiscreet leather thongs. It was a wedding, an elegant one. All the ways they balanced each other in spaces reserved only for wolves left them free of the trappings in places like this.

Sam leaned back in. “Some wolves aren’t built to house all of their own power,” he explained. “They need to give some of it away. Giving your power to someone else isn’t an easy exchange. It’s difficult, or it’s not real. If it’s easy, you’re not doing it right.”

“Why do you say this one wasn’t natural,” she asked, abandoning her argument. “How is it different?”

He snickered into his flute. “There’s no reason in a natural state that an alpha like Dean would ever challenge someone like Cas. I mean, he challenges all the time. That’s his brat. But Cas has about a billion other ways to handle it when Dean pushes him. It’s a very different kind of Dominance that Cas uses with Dean most of the time. This though, this was different. This was Castiel taking Dean’s very humanity out of his hands. Sarah, we don’t do that normally. I’ve seen apes do it to each other, but only the worst wolves ever do something like that, and it’s almost always abusive. What Cas did wasn’t a normal or natural move. It was a carefully orchestrated response to a problem they don’t have any other solution to.”

“What would happen if they didn’t do it this way?” she asked.

“I really don’t know,” he admitted. “I know Dean’s been balanced precariously on a ledge since he Presented as an alpha. He’s a hell of an alpha, but he’s always had this warbly, unstable side to him. He can’t be his own grounding post. He can’t do it. I did my best while it was just the two of us, before Castiel. But now, god, what he’s got now, in Cas…Sarah, he’s invincible now. This wasn’t a rape. I need you to see that. This was Castiel taking Dean by the kite strings and tying them around his own waist. Dean never has to worry about losing his footing again. Not ever. Maybe that sounds abusive to you, but to me…” Sam felt light-headed at the realization that his brother was really going to be okay.

“Sam, are you all right?”

He laughed. “You know what? I am. I just realized I don’t have to worry about him anymore.” He laughed again, lighter. “I’ve been worried about him my whole life. I don’t even know what to do with myself now.”

Up on the stage behind them, the band cut off. It had been quietly underpinning the murmur of voices with gentle instrumentals. Into the silence that followed, a snare drum rolled.

“Friends! Your attention, please!” called the band leader. “Your attention! It’s my privilege to present…Dr. and Dr., Alpha and alpha, husbands in their first appearance, the Winchesters! Dean and Castiel!”

The room erupted into applause and whoops as the couple strolled in hand in hand, glowing – both of them. Dean pointed to the front man on the stage in delighted surprise, grinning.

“What the fuck!?” he shouted. “You’re meant to be guests! What’re you doing on the stage?”

Jessie grinned back. “You think we would let some other douche band fuck up your wedding reception? Besides, your mates are planning to do more singing than we are. What other band would let them do that without getting their panties in a twist over sharing the limelight?” Dean fairly glowed with happiness. It was the whole convention band, set to play his reception and looking very much like they were honored to have the chance. It was a total surprise. Michael had hid this from him, and Dean hated surprises. Usually. This one though. Dean couldn’t stop smiling.

He looked around and saw Michael walking smugly toward him. “You’re an asshole,” Dean stated loudly.

“You love me anyway,” Michael retorted. Dean hugged him hard, thumping him on the back and then pulling back to scowl at him in warning.

“Are there any other surprises heading my way? If there are, tell me now.”

“You’ll have to wait and see, Dean. It’s a party. Lighten up.” Michael was still talking as he stepped in to give Castiel a hug too. April was right behind him with two glasses of champagne which she handed over with a little bow. Cas took his and kissed her softly. Dean did the same.

“Shall we?” Cas asked rhetorically. He took Dean’s hand and let April take his elbow. Michael fell in beside Dean, and the four of them entered the room like royalty. They were swamped immediately, and it was a delightfully welcome sensation. Dean spotted the new alpha leaning casually against a wall near the band. Cain lifted his tumbler in a silent toast, and Dean nodded. He nudged Castiel and then indicated the tall blue-eyed alpha in the corner. Cas excused himself from the melee and left Dean to go speak to the solitary man.

“Thank you for coming on such short notice, Darius,” Castiel said with a hand extended for Cain to shake.

“Only my Aunt Patsy calls me ‘Darius’, Alpha. Please. Call me Cain. And it’s my pleasure. That was some wedding.” The handshake was firm and solid.

“I’ll take that as a compliment. You chose not to attend the Shareer ka Dhaava. I didn’t see you there.” Cas turned to stand beside the man so they could both review the room. People gave them a wide birth, but they were being watched.

“I thought I better ease my way into the Pack a little more slowly than that,” Cain answered. “Things are going to be prickly enough between me and your number two without starting out with a full view of his lowest Submission as a first impression. I gather he wouldn’t appreciate that much.”

“Very generous of you,” Castiel commented. “You’re probably right. Dean can be sensitive to private matters. And you’re right, too, that he’s not going to jump right on your bandwagon straight away. You’re going to have to prove to him that you’re trustworthy. Cain, I’m not going to interfere between you two. You need to work it out for yourselves.”

Cain ran a hand through his hair and looked about the room. “Have you settled the question of my membership in the pack yet? You made quite the sales pitch, Winchester.”

“Alpha,” Castiel corrected with a firm growl in his voice, and Cain bowed slightly.

“Forgive me. Alpha.”

“Your status is probationary to start with, alpha,” Cas reminded him. “I made that clear in my proposal. Once you’ve cleared the first hurdles and proven yourself to the Pack, we’ll discuss membership. That is part of the deal, and I’m not reneging. However, you aren’t going to waltz into my family without showing us you deserve it. You’ll need to win Dean and April both over before that happens.”

“Then it’s merely a matter of time, Sir. Dean may not like me, but he’ll come to trust me eventually. I have nothing to hide. And as for April…Alpha, I can only try to express what I have planned for that young lady. She’s going to be however big she wants to be. The sky’s the limit. I won’t rest until she has everything she’s ever dreamed of.”

“You won’t rest even then,” Cas told him staunchly. “This job, if it works out for you, is not one that will ever allow you to rest on your laurels. The second you take your eye off her best interest, you’re out, and I don’t give a fuck how long you’ve been Pack by then.”

Cain paled. “Yes, Alpha,” he said, wide-eyed. Castiel tipped his head and touched his champagne flute to Cain’s whisky tumbler.

“Enjoy the party. Thanks again for coming.”

Castiel left him observing the stage band and smiled as he was surrounded from every side. Jo tugged at his arm. “Promise me a dance later, Alpha,” she demanded, and he agreed as he leaned down to let her grace him with a kiss.

“I’m not letting this chance to dance with you in a dress pass me by, Joanna Beth. It may never come again. And I would love a chance to sit with you and Jack a little bit later on. We need to get to know each other.”

“You got it!” she told him cheerfully. “I’ll come get you!”

Cas saluted formally as she dragged Jack away, oblivious to the lipstick smudge on his cheek.

“You’ve lost something, brother,” Benny told him, replacing the empty glass in Castiel’s hand with a full one and wiping at the Alpha’s lipstick stain with his handkerchief.

“My drink or my husband?” Cas asked. He couldn’t see Dean, but he could feel him. He was close-by and very amused.
“Both, but I only have a fix for one. You have to find Dean on your own.” Benny leaned into him, jostling the Alpha with a good natured nudge. “I’m proud of you, you know. You finally did it.”

“We did,” Cas agreed. “And the next thing you’re going to say is, it’s about damn time.”

“Well, it is. And I’m not the only one who’ll tell you that today either. Get ready to hear it all night.” Benny laughed at his own prediction, already feeling the open bar a little and happy as a lark at dawn.

Cas tried to keep a straight face, but he couldn’t, and he broke out into an enormous grin in the face of his best friend’s cheer. “What happened to us, Benny? Last thing I remember is you and me making crazy plans in your dorm room in the middle of the night. Look at us now.”

“We grew up, my friend. You and me both. It’s been a helluva ride so far. And just wait,” Benny pointed a finger at him. “We both got pups coming. You think this is nuts. Just you wait.”

Cas laughed again and conceded he had a point. He caught sight of Dean through a break in the crowd and the man took his breath away. “Jesus Christ. Gabe’s right, Benny. I’m so fucked.”

“Yes, you are.”

April tackled Cas from behind, clinging to him like a monkey and practically climbing him to get high enough to kiss his throat. He caught her with his free hand, leaned into the kiss and then lowered her to the ground, all without really acknowledging she was there. His arms wound around her, situating her in front of him, back to chest, and he rested his chin on her head. He tipped his glass for her to sip from.

“Yes, Mother,” Cas told him. He lifted April straight up with one arm, and she let herself be carried, dangling lightly across the floor.

“Don’t tempt me, cher,” Benny threatened. “I could mother the hell outta you if I had to.”

“Any time you think you can pull it off, I’d love to see you try,” Cas teased back. He set April on her feet at the head table. His plate appeared as he sat down. “Run and fetch Dean, would you, kitten? If I have to sit and eat, so does he.”

“Yes, Sir,” she saluted and dashed away.

From the raised platform upon which the head table sat, Castiel could see the whole room. He watched his guests from above, and he thought about what it had taken to make today happen. The air was thick with the hormones of emotion. It was his love for Dean and Dean’s return of that love that had brought a couple thousand people into the same place at the same time to celebrate. How very odd that seemed to Castiel. None of these people would be there for the day to day mundane choices and interactions that would bind their marriage. Why did they all look so enthusiastically happy? Why did it matter so much? Was it simply the open bar?

“That woman!” exclaimed Michael, throwing himself into the seat next to Castiel.

“Which woman?”

“The wedding coordinator! She took my checklist, and she won’t give it back! It has the schedule and all my contact numbers on it. I’m blind without it!”
Cas set a hand on the side of Michael’s face. “Perhaps it would be all right for you to enjoy the reception as a member of the wedding party at this point, Michael. Let her do her job, and let the schedule go.”

“Are you crazy?” Michael sat back as if burned. “I planned it down to the minute. I’m not about to put that into someone else’s hands. She’ll fuck it up before we get to the cake!”

Cas chuckled. “What would you like me to do about it, Omega? Do you need backup?”

“I…um…I dunno. I was just bitching, actually. But, I mean…”

Cas didn’t even try to stifle the laugh. He seemed to be laughing a lot today. He felt Dean settle gingerly into the chair at his elbow and smelled another plate being set down. “Michael, tell her the Pack Alpha instructs her to return your property to you. If she doesn’t, let me know. I’ll send her packing. It goes without saying that your satisfaction is far more important to me than hers. If you need to keep your eyes on the clock, you have my permission to do that, but with one stipulation.”

“Sir?”

“Enjoy yourself today. It’s a party. Don’t fret the small stuff. Have fun. Capisce?”

“Yes, Sir. Thank you.” He didn’t wait around.

“Hey, babe,” Dean leaned over, and they shared a kiss. Dean turned into it, letting the Alpha into his mouth to taste the lingering champagne. “What’s got Michael spinning?”

“He’s fighting with the wedding coordinator over whose wedding it is.”

“Oh. My money’s on Michael,” Dean responded with a proud look. He dove into his plate with gusto. “God, I’m starving. Aren’t you eating?”

“I’m eating. I’m going to sit here and enjoy watching you eat first. You’re a wonder to behold, Winchester.”

“Oh, crap! You’re going to be three times the sap now, aren’t you? Kill me now.”

“No, I was just fascinated at how much you can balance on a fork all at once, and I’m beginning to believe that the interior of your mouth is actually bigger than the outside, like the Tardis.”

“Or th’ Weasley’s campin’ tent,” agreed Dean with his mouth full.

“Charming,” Cas told him. He reached across with his napkin and daubed delicately at the corner of Dean’s mouth. Dean nearly spit his mouthful as he laughed and dodged.

A sudden clinking of glasses startled them both into looking outward. Bobby stood front and center with a spoon and a water goblet, tinking the edge of the glass with the spoon. Soon the music was taken up from all corners of the room as the guests demanded a response from the front table.

“On your knees, Pet,” Castiel told Dean with a twinkle in his eye. He reached for his champagne flute as Dean rolled his eyes and slipped gracefully off his chair. “Get your head above the edge of the table, Dean. No one can see you down there.”

Dean obeyed. His eyeroll was mostly internal, but Cas could still feel it. Taking a deep draft of champagne, Cas held it in his mouth and stood over his Sub, lining up by sight. Dean leaned his head back and opened his mouth just wide enough. Cas released the champagne in a trickle that landed perfectly on Dean’s tongue. A consummate professional, Dean accepted the entire mouthful without gagging or choking. He waited until Cas nodded to him before closing his mouth and swallowing.

“They’re going to make us do that all day, aren’t they?” he asked as he stood back up to catcalls and cheers. Cas pulled him in and kissed him soundly, ending with a ticklish nibble to his earlobe.

“If I’m lucky, they will,” he whispered.

Bobby turned to the crowd and announced, “Very nice. But fair’s fair. If you want that Submissive to perform, it’s only fitting that the rest of you follow suit. Here’s the deal – set him on his knees as often as you like, within reason, but every time he goes under, so does every Bottom in this room. If you’re a Top, and you’re holding a glass when the glasses get tapping, you’re on the hook to water every Bottom within a five-foot radius. I don’t care if it’s yours or someone else’s. If you can reach ‘em, you water ‘em. Spill on ‘em, and you answer to Cas.”

“Don’t bring me into this,” Cas protested. “It’s your game!”

Bobby raised his hands for quiet. “And if it gets outta hand, we’ll stop the play, so use some discretion. Folks still need to eat and talk and dance. This ain’t a pogo party.”

Someone shouted over multiple heads, “Who decides who’s a Top and who’s a Bottom?”

“Boy, if you don’t know that by now, you’re at the wrong party,” Bobby answered back. He turned back and winked at Dean who saluted him back with a fork full of pasta. “And with that, let’s get this party started!” Bobby pointed toward Jessie on the stage, and the drums kicked them into a lively tune.

“You’re still not eating,” Dean pointed out.

“Sorry. I was distracted watching you.”

“C.J., you’re gonna get plenty of chances to watch me eat. Cut it out. Want me to feed you?”

“Try it, and you’ll draw back a bloody stub,” Cas warned with menace.

“Ooh, the scary voice. Say something else, Mufasa.”

Cas pulled Dean in by his lapel and growled, “I’m going to tear you to shreds next time I fuck you, Pet. Be ready for me.” Then he straightened his husband in his chair and smoothed his lapel back into place with a delicate smile. Dean gaped at him.

“And…” Dean looked around to see if anyone had overheard. “And when do you think that will be?” he asked nervously.

“When I decide it’s time,” Castiel replied, digging into his pasta with enthusiasm. “Don’t worry, I’ll give you time to heal.”

Dean swallowed hard and set his fork down. “I think I’m through for now. May I be excused?”

“How very polite you’ve become all of a sudden,” Cas praised. “Of course. Give me a kiss. Go and have fun.”

“Love you,” Dean whispered to him as he left.
The reception moved through the afternoon on a cloud of endorphins and classic rock covers. Meg and Charlie convinced Ketch and Jack to rearrange several tables near the band so they could start the dancing early, much to Michael’s annoyance. Jack gave him an apologetic shrug but continued shifting tables until they had a space wide enough to dance in. And dance, they did.

Charlie, April, Jo, and Meg had a four-way dance circle tightly interlaced in the center of the floor, and they were singing loudly to each other to a cover of Black Veil Brides, ‘In the End’.

"Cause it’s the end, and I’m not afraid, I’m not afraid to die!” they shouted, sweat beginning to bead on their throats and dance from the ends of their hair. Jack stood nearby with his arms crossed over his chest, leaning his butt against the back of the chair. He felt Ketch come up beside him.

“I’m starting to get the sense that we’re only here for the sperm,” Jack observed.

Ketch shrugged. “Jo’s got her own sperm, Jack. You’re not even that important. You’re just here for the heavy lifting.”

“Terrific,” said Jack mulishly. He looked across at Ketch. “So, how’s Mated life? I haven’t seen you in – nearly a week, I think it’s been.”

“I’m dead on my feet, if you want the truth, but what a way to go, eh?” He really did look wasted. Ketch had heavy bags under his eyes, and the tint of his skin was a sickly pale.

“Are you staying hydrated?” Jack asked him.

Ketch lifted his wine glass and drank deeply. Jack chuckled. Across the way, the four women had their arms around one another’s waists, and they were screeching along with an Avril Lavigne song at the top of their lungs. Meg’s scandalous black, barely-there left her shoulders and her thighs bare. She had bruises and welts covering nearly every empty space, and she looked much better rested than Ketch did.

“Where does Charlie fit in, do you suppose?” Jack asked. “She’s not planning to Mate is what Benny said.”

“Where does she fit? She’s ours, Jack.”

“What do you mean, ours?”

“She’s yours and mine and Jo’s and Benny’s. She’s ours. We take care of her, watch over her. She’s Pack.”

“And Lisa’s,” Jack pointed out. “I mean, I’m barely above Charlie in rank at all. But Lisa, she’s alpha. You’re not still steamed about her, are you? Benny made it pretty clear what he thinks.”

“Jack, do me a favor, and go choke on a dick,” Ketch told him gently before excusing himself. He strolled confidently onto the dance floor, bent and swooped Meg into his arms bridal-style before hefting her up over his shoulder with a possessive hand on her ass. She squawked and held on as he joined the group in a surprising degree of grace for a tall man with a Sub on his shoulder.
Michael gathered the wedding party for the cake cutting a couple hours after lunch. They had an elaborate flower-festooned tiered cake decked out in lilies and roses, the handmade ceramic cake topper that a faceless fan had sent them sat on top framed in flowers. The blooms hid most of the Omegas’ nudity in the sculpture, much to Michael’s displeasure. He made the announcement himself, herding guests toward the far wall where the cake stood ready to be eviscerated.

Another round of ‘Water the Subs’ kicked off just before they really got situated, and Dean found himself on his knees several yards away from Cas. Not one to be stymied, he knee-walked the distance and opened his mouth like a baby bird to Castiel’s laughing. Cas had to stifle his laugh so he could perform his portion of the ritual. He pulled it together, and then nearly choked as April slid from halfway across the room and jostled Dean in her enthusiasm to line up for him too.

Next thing he knew, Cas had a line of Subs to water, all of them eagerly awaiting their portion, all of them delectably on their knees. He sighed in a feigned put-upon way and held his glass out to be refilled. He gave Dean and April full portions. Meg received a generous amount. Jess got a solid mouthful. Becky received a smaller portion. Adam took the second half of what Cas had held back from Becky. Gabriel got little more than a trickle. Michael on his knees startled him, but he dutifully satisfied the Omega. Cas looked up and realized he was surrounded. He saw Jo taking to her knees with Charlie a few feet away. He sighed in a feigned put-upon way and held his glass out to be refilled.

“Now, this is ridiculous. Half of you aren’t Bottoms at all! And most of you weren’t standing anywhere close when the clamoring started. JoAnna Beth, get on your feet! I’m not watering you!”

Jo gave up, and she pulled Charlie to her feet as well. Looking down, Cas found Sarah kneeling at his feet with a speculative look on her face. He paused a moment in thought, and then he held her eye as he took a deep drink into his mouth. Slowly, he aimed a perfect but agonizingly slow dribble into her open mouth. It would have been masterful if she hadn’t begun laughing halfway through and spraying everyone in the vicinity with white wine. Cas stopped the flow immediately, swallowed what remained in his mouth, and pulled her laughing and coughing to her feet, whispering, “Be careful what you wish for around here, my dear. We may just oblige you.”

“I deserve that,” she told him playfully. He watched her disappear with Charlie into the crowd, their heads close together and Charlie patting her dress with napkins. Cas knew he and Sarah had things to talk over, but she’d let the champagne loosen her inhibitions and her resentments. It would keep.

“Come on, Alpha,” Dean goaded. “You just gonna stand there? It’s cake!”

“I’m here. I’m here. Where do I cut?”

The photographer posed them formally, snapped several shots as the guests oohed and aahed. Ellen sniffled and wiped her eyes as Jo wrapped an arm around her. The two men each took small pieces of the cake, held each other’s eyes, and spotlessly deposited the cake into their husband’s mouth. Castiel was impressed. Dean didn’t have the experience feeding that he had eating out of someone else’s hand, but he’d performed the job masterfully. Cas didn’t have a crumb on him. He leaned in and rewarded Dean with a simple kiss and another smile. It never ceased to amaze Castiel how many apes utterly destroyed this simplest of trust exercises, their oaths to cherish still hanging fresh in the air, and at the very first challenge, failing spectacularly by debasing their new spouse in public with an intentional face full of icing. And people thought wolves uncivilized.

And then the champagne – the men interlocked their arms and each drank from his own.

“This is a stupid ritual, man,” Dean grumbled after taking a sip. “The cake, I get, but what’s the yoga position for? I’m all tangled up.”

“You look dashing anyway,” Cas told him.

“Can we eat now?” Dean asked, setting his engraved champagne flute back on the table for the wedding planner to collect or whatever. Someone was making a fortune from this wedding. Dean looked up at Cas, and realized he didn’t care. The man was stunning in his happiness. He held up two small plates with cake on them and nodded for Dean to head back to their table with a goofy grin on his face. They fought their way through the crowd, barely making it free unscathed.

“Fucking piranhas, man, I swear! Jesus, there’s enough cake! Chill out, people!”

“Dean, be polite.”

“Yes, Sir,” Dean said over his shoulder without a trace of brat. Cas frowned in alarm, only to relax again as Dean shot him a wicked grin in follow up. Cas shoved his plate at him and then reared back and snapped his hand forward to pop his husband’s ass with a perfectly aimed swat.

Dean snickered happily and buried his face in his cake as he walked, somehow consuming the whole piece before they made their way back to their seats.

“Check! Check! One, two, three! Can you hear me?” Dean looked around from Castiel’s death glare to the stage where Michael stood at the microphone. He raised his glass to acknowledge that the sound was still working.

“Good. Okay. Well, the band’s on a break, and we’re passing out the cake, so while we do that, I’d like everyone to take the next few minutes to get a glass of something in your hand. We’re going to be toasting the happy couple. That’s toasting, not roasting, Jo. You promised. Five minutes, folks. Grab a drink. Everyone toasts!” Michael slipped away, and the energy level in the room escalated as the crowd hustled about to do his bidding.

“God, man, look at him. He’s a fucking natural with a crowd.”

“About a third of these people are Submissives, Dean. Working a Lupin crowd is pretty easy for a Dominant.”

“Psshh. That sucks! Some of us have to work for it!”

“And some of you are charismatic enough to cut right through the D/S continuum and win compliance from a crowd out of sheer unadulterated lovability.”

“Now you’re just sucking up.”

“Is it working?”

“Am I wearing your ring?”

“Who’s the sap now, Pet?”

Jo took the first toast. She took to the microphone and lowered it more than a foot before she spoke. The crowd found that very amusing.

“Yeah, yeah, I’m short. Get it out of your systems, you jerks.” Once settled, she looked across the room to where Dean sat leaning into Castiel’s chest. She sniffed a little and took a moment. She pressed her lips together. Dean smirked a secret look at her, and she smiled back at him.
“Dean, I’ve known you forever. We met when we were…five?” He nodded in agreement. “Yeah, five. I’ve known you practically my whole life, and we’ve been best friends just about that whole time. You helped me scare off a couple of asshole fourth graders, helped me pick my shit up off the ground, walked me all the way home, and told me I draw the best bluebirds you’d ever seen. You remember that? That was how we met. I didn’t know it then, but I’d just met the guy who would set the standard for me for the rest of my life. Dean, no one else ever lived up to you – until now, of course. I love you, Jack, sweetie. No offense! I knew Dean first, and whether you really live up is still an unanswered question. We’ll see. You’ve got some mighty big shoes to fill.”

Jack shrugged gamely as Jo blew him a kiss.

“I don’t know what I would’ve done without you, Dean, without you and your family. You adopted me right in, and you shared everything with me. You are the most incredible friend a girl could ever have. I’m not ashamed to say I totally fell for you right off the bat. I defy anyone but your own brother to say they didn’t.”

“I didn’t!” shouted Meg. “Ouch! Damn!”

“But you weren’t meant to be mine, were you, Dean? You’re not built for me.” She chuckled at her crappy luck and then took a deep breath. “So, as it turns out, if I can’t have you, there’s not one guy in a billion who could. No one was ever gonna be good enough for you Dean, no one but a pair of unbelievably rare chart busters. You guys get this? You understand? It took two of them to tame him, and both of them busted the charts. That’s because you deserve the best, Dean Winchester. And I have to tell you, if it couldn’t be me, it wasn’t going to be anyone less than the very best. I have ways of making people disappear. You know I do. So, the fact that they’re still here and breathing means I’m not pissed. I’m happy for you. I couldn’t be more happy for you. And Cas? Alpha? You stay on top of him for me. He’s a handful.”

“I’ll do that,” Cas agreed, shooting Dean a menacing look. Dean chuckled and shoved at his face jovially.

“To my best friend, Dean Winchester and his husband, Castiel. Long life, lots of pups, and I hope he straps the stuffing out of you. I love it when you limp!”

The crowd cheered and raised their glasses in toast as Jo sipped hers.

“I love you, too!” Dean called. She flipped him off as she left the stage.

Benny followed her, squeezing her shoulder as he passed. He mounted the steps to shrill whistles and calls from his own Pack. He waved genially and took the microphone off the stand. He waited for the noise to die down.

“Cas, brother, if you’re waiting for me to confess a crush on you, you’ll be waiting a long damn time.” Benny and Castiel grinned at each other.

“I’m heartbroken, Ben,” Cas shouted. “I had such plans for us!”

“The hell you did,” Benny retorted. “You were waiting for this little slip of a girl right here.” Benny pointed to April near the stairs and she curtsied politely. “And she’s fixing to run you around in circles until you don’t know your ass from your fingertips, and we’re all gonna love watching that. I’m happy you found your mate, man. But that’s not what today’s about. Cas, today’s about you and Dean. I know you already know everything I might say up here about you. I can see you crinkle your brow worrying about all the stories I could throw out. All the things we did when we were undergrads, some of them legal. All the asinine plans we made that are best left on the scrap heap right where they are. Brother, I have stories about you… You remember when we stayed up all night long drinking your mother’s liquor cabinet and trying to outdo each other’s kinky fantasies? I don’t think it’ll surprise anyone that you won that contest hands down, but what you told me…Man, I’ll take those confessions to the grave with me.”

“Thank you,” Cas mouthed clearly. Dean looked up at him but didn’t press.

“You and I, we grew to be men together. You watched me fall head-first down the ravine of a True-Mate Trigger, and you toasted me and took Andrea right into your life like she was a part of me, like she had always been there. I watched you tumble the same way. Twice. The second one was a thing of beauty and a relief and a blessing. The first one though, man, I thought it was gonna kill you. I have to ask the question everyone who knew you both asked a million times: What the fuck? Right, folks? How the hell can two brilliant men, smarter by far than your average amoeba be blinder than a cave newt? Cher, your head was so far up your ass, you could still brush your teeth from up top.”

Benny laughed along with the guests, but then he sobered. “But then you came to your senses, and everything has been harder for all of you than you could’ve guessed it would be. Nothing came easy. You had to fight for it. But you stuck it out and worked through every puzzle, around every roadblock, over every damned mountain. Brother, I hope today feels good, because you earned it. You deserve this, Castiel, you and Dean, April, Michael…you deserve this. We’re building a Pack just down the road from you, Alpha, and we’re using yours as our model. Castiel, now that you’ve got your family together, you’re the prototype the rest of us will follow. So, I lift my hopes and my glass to you, Alpha, just as I’ve always done. To the Winchesters!”

“To the Winchesters!”

Michael jogged up the stairs to take the microphone from Benny. Nicholas followed him onto the stage with April on his arm. He whispered to her and then settled her at the piano. Looking around, Michael found Nick strapping a guitar over his shoulder and April adjusting her skirt on her bench.

“We do have two more toasts coming up later, but we’ve got something special right now. Alphas, we’d like to invite you both down to the dance floor. Pete and I have a song we’d love to share with you as you dance for the first time as husbands.” April began to play a delicate melody as Cas pulled Dean to his feet. His muscles had locked up a little but he nodded at Cas anyway. He’d loosen up with a little movement. The guests backed up to clear the dance floor as Becky and Adam scattered soft fabric autumnal leaves, red and orange, across the gleaming black floor.

“Oh, brother, really? Are there going to be bubbles too?” whined Dean.

“Shh! Be nice,” Cas chastised. “You can disappear into one of the lounge rooms for a nap in a little while.”

“I’m not a toddler,” Dean shot back.

“Then stop whining like one,” Cas hissed. They silenced their quiet bickering as they drew close enough to be overheard. Pausing at the edge of the crowd, Cas waited for Michael’s signal. The Alpha had a flare for the dramatic as well, it seemed.

The piano started a pulse, and Cas stepped out onto the floor. April hadn’t let the two in on the song, but she’d given them the tempo and the style. Cas knew approximately what to expect. He turned at the center and looked obliquely to his left, to the floor, seeking Dean peripherally, not meeting his eye, but commanding his attention anyway. Cas’ gaze lingered on the floor about three feet to his left with his sharp nose in sharp silhouette. Slowly, he held his left hand out, and Dean felt chills run down his spine. He reacted in the only way he was ever going to react.
He went to his husband, took his hand, felt Cas’ strength and confidence as Castiel’s hand curled around his and pulled him firmly around to stand before his Alpha. The strength and control stole Dean’s breath. Everyone else disappeared.

April began breathily to sing:

"I'm not looking for perfection...anymore."

Her voice was gentle and sweet. Castiel looked right into Dean’s eyes as he stepped off.

"If I bought into their perception, I'd be headed for the door."

Dean frowned slightly, listening to the lyrics, wondering where she was going with it.

Following Cas was easy. Following Cas had always been easy. Dean watched his husband’s blue eyes take on a red glow, and he smiled softly.

"You build yourself a fortress. You're cloaked inside confusion."

Ah, thought Dean. That’s where she’s taking it.

"A million eyes are watching you, but nobody can see past the illusion."

Dean saw Castiel’s eyes crinkle up as he spun Dean, and Dean laughed into the turn. Yeah. Yeah, she’d pegged him perfectly.

Michael’s tenor joined April in a harmonic chorus:

"Don’t hide yourself safe behind those walls. Just show it all to me. I wanna have it all."

“Don’t hide from me, Dean,” whispered Cas with moisture collecting at the corners of his eyes.

“Never, Alpha,” he whispered back.

The song slipped into a new verse, and Michael’s voice followed the couple around the dance floor, falling over them like a bridal veil. Of all the things April could have chosen to write about, she’d gone with insecurities laid bare and having the strength and the trust to take the masks off. She’d gone with having the guts to ask for that.

Faces flew past Dean’s eyes. He saw Rachel standing near the front with a tall, muscular alpha at her back. Glancing down, Dean saw that her fingers were intertwined with his, and he giggled.

“Don’t tell Michael,” Dean said softly, “But his little sister caught herself a fly.”

“Yes, I saw. I believe that’s one of the new alpha guards we brought in with the last wave. I forget his name.”

April’s parents caught his eye next. They were standing close together near the stage, and they weren’t watching the dancing. They had eyes only for April. Strangely, Michael’s parents stood right beside them, and the four of them seemed to be together in a clump.

“Uh-oh. I hope those four aren’t taking wedding notes. You don’t think…?"

“Shh. Don’t worry about anything at all, Pet. Just dance with me.”

“Your mother is watching.”
“Of course she is. Who could possibly take their eyes off you. You’re perfect, Dean.”

“Smooth-talking son of a bitch,” Dean groused softly.

“Come here. I want another kiss.”

“You’re gonna wear my lips clean off, man.”

“Dean, shut up and kiss me,” Cas insisted.

As the song ended, the glass clinking started up again, and Cas helped Dean to his knees right where they’d finished the dance. Dean looked up at him as Cas waited for someone to provide him a drink. He got red wine this time, and he smirked as he sipped. He kept sipping, and Dean’s eyes widened as he realized how much burgundy liquid was about to come his way. Finally, Castiel handed the glass off, pursed his lips and looked down with his cheeks bulging. He sent Dean a query silently, and Dean swallowed but nodded. He licked his lips. He opened his mouth.

Warm red wine struck his palette, and this time, he swallowed it carefully as it flowed across his tongue instead of letting it accumulate. It went on and on, and the onlookers began to notice. Dean cycled a breath out through his nose, clasped a hand around his wrist behind his back and steadied himself. He swallowed rhythmically. Two swallows, then hold and breath out. Two swallows, then hold and breath in. At last, the dribble slowed and stopped. A great cheer went up around them. Dean nearly lost the end of it as a laugh burst out of him, but he closed his mouth on it and only burbled to himself instead.

Castiel pulled him up and practically dove into his mouth. “You are so fucking perfect, Winchester,” he growled as he shifted his mouth clear.

“I’ll remind you you said that next time you blister me for being a brat.”

A tap to the microphone brought them around, and they found Michael and April standing side by side. Castiel called his gratitude up to them.

“And as the band will be on break for a bit longer,” Michael said. “It’s up to us to keep the music going. Dean? You had something you wanted to sing?”

“Oh, yeah! Right now?”

“Come on up, Dean. It’s your turn.”

Dean scrambled up the stairs and took the mic. “Okay. It’s cheesy, but it’s Metallica, and Metallica always gets a pass. Nick? Hit it.”

Nick and April kicked it off, and Dean produced a gritty version of, “Nothing Else Matters.” He pointed at Cas as he sang, “Trust I seek, and I find in you. Every day for us something new.” Cas blew him a kiss.

Soon after, as the band returned and the dancing renewed on schedule as it was meant to. Cas sent Dean to a private room to rest. “We’ll be here when you get back. A lot of the crowd will die down. I want you to take an Ibuprofen and try to sleep for an hour.”

“Yes, Sir.”

“What, no argument?”
“Not today,” Dean said with a blush. “Don’t break out the pie without me.”

“We’re not having pie for hours, Dean. Go rest.”

While he was gone, Cas settled at one of the large round tables on the floor with Jack and Ketch. They chatted comfortably as they watched the dancing, others stopped and stayed for a bit off and on. Every now and then someone would pull one of them up and onto the floor. Cas danced “The Tennessee Waltz” with Jo. She looked happier than he’d ever seen her. He kissed her cheek and told her so. After the third round away from his seat, he returned to find the table empty, so he forced himself to make a slow stroll around the room, greeting people who’d stood back from the first push.

The wine made him a little lighter, but he drank too slowly to feel much of an effect. He made warm small talk with his business associates, with some of the donors who’d made his enterprise possible. Chuck Shurley glad-handed politely and then nervously asked about Dean’s progress on his book. Cas chuckled and patted his sternum in a way he hoped came across as soothing before he excused himself to speak with the guests seated at the next table. Making the rounds took a couple of hours. Cas wasn’t in any hurry. He answered questions about the honeymoon and the Pack. He explained that he’d agreed to testify on Monday before he flew to France with his Pack; to testify against three alphas who believed they could murder a young pregnant man on the street with impunity. Cas didn’t mention that Michael still had nightmares occasionally. He saw Dean slip back in with Michael at his side. Dean looked rested and less crabby.

Cas danced with his mother. He danced with Gabe, with Kali, with Jess, with Mark. With Ellen. He applauded with everyone else when the band saluted Jo and Meg and their new mates with a rousing rendition of “Chandelier” with April on vocals, followed shortly by a full house round of, “A Little Help from my Friends” in honor of Benny’s forming Pack. Cas laughed with the rest of them when Gabe convinced the band to play “Jungle Love” for him to seduce his wife onto the floor with, and he wept with laughter when she took him up on it with no qualms about his lewd dance moves and took him in hand fit for a contract Dominatrix.

Gabe and the rest of the wolves were under strict instructions to keep their conduct ape and family friendly for the first several hours, through the more traditional rituals. Children of both species, of all ages, flitted about among the adult guests. The grooms had both agreed that a Pack function meant the entire Pack was welcome, and that meant pups too. There were several rooms across the hall reserved and outfitted for private use. But Gabe had attended ape weddings before, and he argued that once the troop tied one on, they could be almost as raunchy as the wolves, only with more clothes on. Thrusting lustily at his wife’s crotch wasn’t out of bounds given the limit he’d been given, and Cas didn’t care enough to stop him as long as Kali was having fun too.

By and by, as the afternoon waned into evening and the crowd began to thin a bit, Dean found himself with a fresh drink in his hand but nowhere to settle. Cas had a solid groove going on the dance floor, sandwiched between Michael and April and with Facility Pack all around them. The band was rocking Billie Eilish, and Cas seemed to be channeling his, “Bad Guy” persona. Gabe wasn’t the only one pushing limits, it seemed. But most of the apes were leaving, and those that remained...eh...let ‘em see. Cas still had his pants on.

Dean almost limped past but then spotted Naomi alone at a large empty table, and he diverted and stood at her elbow looking down.

“May I?” he asked. “I should offer you a drink, but it looks like you have one?"
Naomi startled and looked up. “Yes, I have one. It’s not too early for sherry.”

“I won’t tell if you don’t,” he agreed. “I can’t imagine anyone here cares what time it is.”

“Please, join me,” she gestured.

“You sure?”

“Dean, I admit, I don’t understand why he lives the way he does.” Her eyes tracked him as he sat carefully down in the cushioned chair. She saw him wince and grit his teeth. “I don’t understand the sheer arrogance of taking a mate and a spouse both. Everything about my son baffles me. But he is my son, and I love him.”

“Do you?”

“Of course I do.”

“See, forgive me. It’s not my place, but the thing is, I’m not certain he knows that. I’m not 100% certain it’s true. He may not seem to, but he needs you, Naomi.”

She scoffed through her nose and clinked her glass back onto the table. “Castiel hasn’t needed anyone but himself since he was three. He doesn’t need me. He never has.”

Dean made a face and looked away, but then he pursed his lips and went right back into it with a stubborn set to his jaw. “One thing I know, and this goes for everyone…there’s not a man out there who ever stopped needing his mother. He may have learned to survive without you, but that doesn’t mean he wouldn’t be thrilled to welcome you with both arms open if he thought you gave two shits about him.”

“That’s absurd,” she told him coldly. “He knows where I am.”

Dean crossed his arms over his chest. This was pointless. They were too alike, Castiel and his mother. Just like Sam and Dad. Neither of them would thaw until the other did first, and just like his own family, time was running out.

“Is it because he’s a hedonist?” Dean asked. “I mean, I know why you don’t like me. I get it, and it’s fine. I’m a grunge-scraper from the bottom of the barrel, and he should’ve done so much better. But what the fuck is it you don’t like about him? Look at him for Christ’s sake!” Dean gestured outward and then paused when he caught sight of Cas with Michael in front of him on his knees and a hand at the back of Michael’s head to hold him in place while Cas ground his pelvis against Michael’s open mouth.

“Okay, maybe don’t use right now as an example.”

“Dean, I know you and I haven’t ever gotten along. And I misled you about how well I knew your father. That was my beta desperate for one last connection with the man, and I’m ashamed of calling you the way I did. The truth is we only knew one another tangentially. We had one date together, and it was really accidental. But I had quite the crush on John Winchester. All the girls did. Your father was a spectacularly well-put-together man. He was a kind man as well. Those two don’t often go together. I want you to understand. What I’m trying to tell you is that I don’t dislike you. I’ve never disliked you.”

“You just didn’t think I was good enough for Cas.” Dean flicked his eyes back to the dance floor. “Any more than my dad was good enough for you.” Michael was back on his feet and grinding against April from behind as Cas fucked her mouth with his tongue. Naomi followed his eyes. “You may have had the hots for John, but he never had Mating potential, did he? And then Cas ignored all the rules you insisted on following because he doesn’t care about social standing."

“I had a much different life envisioned for my sons, Dean. What would you like me to say? The world changed underneath me, and they changed with it. I couldn’t.”

“You didn’t try,” he accused angrily. “You witnessed everything Cas did, and he watched it and learned from it, while you…”

“Shut myself away and pretended it wasn’t happening. Don’t feel you need to throw it at me, young man. I’m aware.”

“You’re aware, but you still aren’t doing anything. It’s not too late, Naomi. It’s not too late for you to get to know who your sons are for real…not the ghosts of who you wanted them to be! Ah, this is a waste of time!” He pushed his chair backward to prepare to stand, but he stayed curled over with his elbows jutting out and his fingers digging painfully into his knees. “Look,” he said without looking up. “I’m glad you came. It was important to me. It was important to Cas. We needed you to see what we are to each other, that it’s more than a school yard crush. I’m not my father, and Cas isn’t you, despite the fact he has a hell of a lot of your mannerisms. What we are to each other is as real and as permanent as it can get without a Mating-scar. We’re not asking you to understand it. Hell, we’re not even asking for your blessing. I know this wedding makes your skin crawl. You don’t have to deny it. I can see it. All I’m asking for is for you to crack the door open a little for him. Try to remember that he was your son before he was anything else. He’s not ever going to quit reaching out to you.
You have to know that.”

“That was quite the impassioned speech, Dean. I’m impressed.”

“Yeah, well, grunge-scrapers got feelings just like everyone else, I suppose.”

“No, you misunderstand. I’m not mocking you. I may not understand what my son’s vision for his family is or how it fits together, but I’m not blind. I see that he loves you dearly, and I admire the nerve it took for you to come and lay all of that at my feet. He tells me that your mate’s pup will be parented by the four of you? Although, how anyone as young as April could think of parenting anyone is beyond me. She still needs parenting herself.” Naomi shot another look out to the dance floor. “Oh, Lord!” she exclaimed, averting her eyes, and Dean huffed a short laugh.

“That’s the plan,” Dean confirmed. “I mean, about the pup-sharing, not about April needing parents.
That’s a whole other debate.”

“I’ll bet,” Naomi scoffed.

“So? Michael’s pup. When it’s born, you’ll have a grandson, Naomi. You have to know we’re going to put firm rules in place if you want to be a part of your grandson’s life. Cas and I will both see to it.
Michael, too, come to that. You have some choices to make, and you and I don’t have a lot of groundwork to build on. I’ll make you a deal.”

“I’m listening.”

“I won’t bullshit you. I won’t play nice for the sake of appearances, and I won’t blow sunshine up your ass. But I won’t sabotage you either. I don’t like you. You don’t like me, however you wanna shade it. But we don’t have to be enemies. And as long as you toe the line, I’ll make sure you know your grandchildren. I’ll warn you before you edge too close to stepping over that line. I’m calling a truce. Don’t give me anymore bullshit weepy apologies. Just play it straight from here on. If you can do that, then we can share some spaces now and then. If you can’t, then you won’t see hide nor hair of anyone but Castiel. Ever. So what d’ya say? Truce?"

Dean looked up at her. She had a baldly open expression on her face. She weighed his offer. “Michael is due in February,” she commented. “I may not make it to February.”

“What?” he asked. “What kinda talk is that? Of course you’ll make it to February. You’re not dying, Naomi. Don’t play victim with me. We don’t know how you’re going to handle the effects of losing touch with your beta, but we do know that it’s going to take a long time – a long time of hard, gritty work on your part – before it gets its teeth into you. And in a few months, who knows? I don’t read tea leaves, but I’m half expecting April to produce a litter when her turn rolls around. I know Cas wants a big family. You can be there for that. You missed out on your sons. Don’t miss the grandkids, too.”

“I resent the implication that I neglected my own sons, Dean Winchester!”

“Wasn’t an implication, Congresswoman Novak. And I’m waiting. Truce?”

“Truce,” she said stoutly, having run out of alternative ideas.

“Is everything okay over here?” Castiel asked with a wary expression. He rested a hand on Dean’s shoulder.

“We’re peachy, Alpha. I was just telling your mom here how we like to use the nipple clamps when you edge me.”

“Oh, my heavens!”

“Dean!”

“Oh, sure, face-fucking on the dance floor is fine, but a little erogenous male nipple action is taboo. Hypocrite much, Cas?”

“They’re ready to ask our brothers up for their toasts, Dean. I’m supposed to fetch you back to the table,” Cas said.

“Are you blushing? You are. You’re beet red.”

“Are you coming?” Castiel’s face still looked mortified, but his mother laughed.

From the stage, Michael was taking the microphone again, but rather than begin an introduction, he cued the band to play an old Willie Nelson song, and his Texan accent twanged sharply. “For y’all who may not know, I’m a Texas boy, and I figure what this evening needs is a little bit of Texas in the mix. Let’s see who remembers when country music had a heart to it. Sing it with me if you know it.”

Dean recognized the song and shot a glance at Cas. The Alpha had his eyes shut and an expression of deliberate acceptance in the hard lines around his mouth. Michael sang right to April, and it couldn’t have been more obviously a courtship than if he’d pinned her with a Homecoming mum and walked her into the high school dance.

"In the twilight glow, I see her – blue eyes crying in the rain."

Michael sang to her. His voice was gruff and engaging, flirtatious.

"When we kissed goodbye and parted, I knew we’d never meet again."
Her face, as she stood on the floor below the stage and gazed up at him, was rapt.

“Come on, Naomi,” said Dean, holding his hand out to her. “Dance with me. I dare you.”

“All right,” she said with a bracing calm. She took his hand, and Dean led her away, leaving Castiel gaping with his mouth open and his eyes stunned. Naomi, well-bred and raised to be a mate of standing, was an excellent dancer. Dean led her easily, gracefully, and they made a full turn around the floor before the song ended on a smile and a polite bow. He even kissed her hand. He let Gabriel escort Naomi away, and he parked himself next to April, looking up to regard Michael.

“What?” asked Michael, leaning away from the microphone.

“Today, Michael? Really?”

“It’s just a country song, Dean. You forget where I came from.”

“I haven’t forgotten anything, and you’re not as innocent as you look.”

Michael smirked. “Maybe not, but it’s still a good song.” He hopped straight off the stage and leaned forward to kiss April lightly on the lips. “You two have time for one dance before I get Sam and Gabe up here to embarrass you. Go dance with April, Dean.”

Dean took April’s hand. She followed willingly. He led her closer to the center of the dance floor, calling back over his shoulder, “Don’t come crying to me if her mate decides to give you a lesson in timing, my friend.”

Dean took the Ozzie into his arms as the band struck up Coldplay’s, ”Something Just Like This,” and Dean melted into the feel of her. She had been little more than a centerpiece all day, a prop to be shuffled about from one vignette to another, but as he danced with her, he realized she was fully engaged and having a wonderful time in her own right.

“You’re up to something,” he teased.

“Always,” she admitted lightly.

“Is it Michael?”

“Mostly,” she told him. “But it’s Cas as well.”

“I see. Getting him acclimated? Ripping off the band-aid?”

She chuckled and followed his lead as she spun her out and then back in again. “When we’re on the honeymoon, Dean, and he’s laser focused on you, I don’t want him worried about what’s happening between Michael and me.”

“Oh, and hitting on each other tonight is going to help that?”

“Yes,” she said simply. “No secrets. If we were more circumspect about it tonight, everything would still feel cloaked, and that would bug him every time his door’s closed in Paris. This way…If there aren’t any secrets, and no one’s tiptoeing around…”

“Like I said,” Dean concluded. “Rip the band-aid right off.”

“Besides, Michael’s only taking his fair share from me tonight. I did the same to him while you two were in Dayton. I put a playlist together that was designed to pull him under the waves. He’s much sweeter about his song choices than I was.”
As the song ended, Dean leaned in and kissed her just behind her ear. “Just be careful, all right? This is Castiel’s night. Please don’t ruin it for him.”

“I’m keeping an eye on Cas,” she promised. “He’s doing really well. All he truly cares about tonight is you.”

The band started another song, and Michael took the mic again. Dean shook his head as the intro played, patted April lightly on the cheek, and left her to be wooed.

"Beauty queen of only eighteen, she...had some trouble with herself.
He was always there to. Help. Her. She...always belonged to someone else.
I drove for miles and miles and wound up at your door.
I’ve had you so many times but somehow I want more.

I don’t mind standing every day...out on your corner in the pouring rain.
Look for the girl with the broken smile. Ask her if she wants to stay awhile,
And she will...be loved. And she will...be loved...”

Dean made his way back to the head table with an expression of deep bemusement. Fate was throwing frameworks up faster than he could climb them. Fate or April Renée.

“You looked wonderful on the dance floor, my love,” Cas praised as Dean joined him.

“Is that all you have to say?” Dean asked carefully.

Cas shrugged. “We already made this decision,” he said. “Stressing about it again and again isn’t going to make it any easier. Besides, look at him. He’s radiant.”

“Yeah. He really is,” Dean agreed. Michael’s voice was flexible enough to hit the high register the song required. From Willie Nelson to Adam Levine was a stretch, but Michael was alive and beaming, reflecting the adoration April cast toward him from below. “If you’re good, man, I’m good.”

Rachel swept by their table and stopped abruptly, pointing at her brother with an air of a sibling preparing to tattle. She froze with her brows up in accusation, waiting for Dean to react. Dean laughed. “We know, Rachel. It’s a good thing. He’s happy. We’re happy. April’s happy. Let him be.”

Her mouth dropped open. “Are you serious? How does he hit the fuckin’ jackpot like this? Jesus, every damn time! What the fuck?”

“Pulled a Ferris Bueller on you, little sister?” Dean teased, and her face matched Jennifer Grey’s for deadpan resentment.

“He’s had his share of shitty, Rachel,” Castiel added with a glance back up toward the stage. “And he’ll face more challenges yet to come than you’ll ever have to experience. He’s going to need your support. Are you sure you want to begrudge him a little happiness?”

“Ergh! Crap! You put it like that… Fine!”

“Besides,” Dean added. “It seems to me like you’ve got some of that same magic. What’s this one’s name?” Dean kicked his chin toward the alpha near the speaker who was trying to look like he wasn’t waiting impatiently for her to return. She followed his gaze and chuckled.

“That’s Josh. He’s a good dancer.”
“Uh-huh,” Dean commented. “Make sure you use protection when you dance. He may be on the good stuff we prescribe employees, but that’s not gonna keep either of you safe from STDs.”

“Yes, alpha,” she said sarcastically. “Not my first rodeo, you know.”

Dean turned to Cas. “What is it with kids these days?” Cas only shrugged.

Finally, the overtly blatant song ended, and Michael brought April up beside him. He was sweaty, but she settled into his side without hesitation. Dean had to admit they looked good together. Their voices melded beautifully when they sang. They played effortlessly off one another as the introduced Sam together. April looked very right standing there with Michael’s arm tossed casually around her waist.

Dean bit his lip. He could feel a slight clench of jealousy, but he shoved it down. Michael wasn’t leaving him, and he wasn’t cheating on Dean. The irony of the situation planted itself in front of Dean and refused to be ignored.

Sam took the mic from April with a wink.

Dean leaned backward and asked over his shoulder, “Cas, tonight when we get wherever you’re taking me…where are Michael and April going to be?”

“Sam’s taking them home,” Cas replied, pulling Dean’s chair out for him before taking his own. “They’ll have the night to themselves.”

“No restrictions?”

“None from my side except that they both know how I feel about managing her fertility. I’m ready to trust them to work it out for themselves. Are you?” Cas flicked concerned blue eyes at Dean, prepared to call an intervention on them if Dean wasn’t ready yet.

But Dean nodded slowly. “I’m never going to be ready, man. He’s my mate. But we don’t have a choice.”

“We do have a choice, Dean. And we’re making it. And it’s the right one. It’s hard, but it’s the right one.”

“Yeah,” sighed Dean turning back to face the stage. “Yeah.”

“Good evening everyone,” Sam said into the microphone before flinching back at the feedback wail he caused. “Jesus! Sorry. Hold on.” He adjusted his position and tried again. Dean slipped his hand into his husband’s, and Cas took Dean’s hand onto his knee and squeezed.

Sam got himself reoriented, and the feedback faded. “Better?” he asked, tapping the mic. “Better. All right. Everyone has a drink? We’re toasting again. All set?”

“Get on with it, Winchester!” Dean hollered.

“Pipe down over there, I’m getting to it.”

Sam took the microphone off the stand and set the stand behind him. He looked out at the guests gathered about, some standing before him on the dance floor, most back in their seats. He waited for them to settle, for Michael and April to join their mates at the head table, for the rustle of movement to die down. Michael leaned backward into Dean’s chest, and Dean wrapped his free arm around him without letting go of Cas’ hand.
“My big brother, Dean, is...” Sam began. “He’s my hero. He’s a nerd, and a child, and he leaves his dirty laundry in the bathroom while simultaneously bitching about a glass I may or may not be finished with that’s still on the coffee table in the living room. He has terrible table manners. He hasn’t voluntarily listened to a song recorded after 1982 in his life. He has the sense of humor of a twelve-year-old. He deliberately causes mayhem at important functions just to see what’ll happen. He’s also the smartest, bravest, kindest, most intentional man I’ve ever known.

“See, Dean and I, we lost our mom at a critical point in our lives. Neither of us was grown yet, but we were both old enough to know what was what. Everything went to shit fast, and I mean full-on, it’s-really-hit-the-fan-and-spattered kind of shit. Our dad couldn’t cope with what we’d lost, and he fell hard. We know more about that kind of crash now than we did then, and it wasn’t my dad’s fault. But the truth was, we were alone in the world, just the two of us, before we were ready.

“And me, I was a mouthy, rebellious, resentful teenager who felt the world owed me compensation for what the Universe took away, and I turned that on my brother. But Dean...” Sam took a deep breath and looked across the space as he searched for the right words. “Dean stuck fast, and he didn’t flinch no matter what Dad and I threw at him. He held us together. He took care of our home, our lives, he did the shopping and the cleaning and the scheduling. He made doctor’s appointments and then he dragged me to them kicking and screaming. He let me scream my fury right into his face, and he never once let on what it was taking out of him to stand there and take it. All he said was, ‘I know, Sammy. I know.’

“That’s what Dean does, you see.”

Sam licked his lips. “I’m supposed to come up here today and make fun of my brother, embarrass him, give him shit, tell stories about him, and I could do that. Man, the shit he’s pulled... It’s a wonder he’s still got both butt cheeks what with the flayings he’s earned in his life. But I won’t do that, because Dean deserves better. He’s been through enough, and he’s soldiered through it like a Winchester when the rest of us broke around him.

“So, I’m gonna embarrass him far worse with a full ‘chick-flick’ speech, and he’s going to have to sit there and let me turn the sap all the way up. And I need him to know...man, I’m sorry for what I put you through back then. I’m grateful to you for every single second of what you gave me, every second that you didn’t have the strength to keep going, but you did anyway. You deserve today, Dean. You deserve a lifetime of loving Pack around you. I can’t wait to meet my nephew. I hope he’s just like you.”

Sam smiled a watery smile. Dean felt warm to his fingertips. His breathing shuddered a bit. “Dean, what you’re doing today is bigger than a wedding. I think you know that, but I’m not really certain it’s hit you just how big this is, so let me explain how I see it: We’re rebuilding the global Pack brick by brick, and we’ve got a long way to go. We’re about to start having to fend off our own kind trying to rip those bricks down as fast as we place them. We all know that’s coming. It’s scary for everyone. And right in the middle of that, here you are, doing the same thing you’ve always done. You’re standing firm in your place, in your family, and you’re shouting a defiant, ‘Bring it!’ to the Universe.

“You’re scared as hell to reveal the side of you that seems dissonant from what the world expects, but you also know there are thousands of people out there with the same fears and the same needs, and they may not have the support structures you have. I watched you swallow your pride, your fear, your dread, and step out naked into the light in front of the whole world with your middle finger raised high, and I watched you stand up to every shitty assumption. You’re my hero, Dean Winchester. And I couldn’t have been raised by a better man. Today, I gave you away, and that hurt. I never got around to making it all up to you. But I know that you’re in good hands. You’re in the best hands. That’s a good thing, because just like Jo said, nothing less than the best would ever have been good enough for you.”

“Castiel,” Sam said. “Take care of my brother. Don’t let him get away with shit. Don’t let him hurt if you can stop it. He’s hurt enough already. Make him carry his Submissive sides with pride and that iconic swagger of his. Most of all, love him. Love him hard. Love each other. Watch the world change as the two of you… the four of you… show the whole world how to do this.”

Sam lifted his wine glass. “To Dean and Cas! To years and years of laughs and love and Dean’s unique style of bratting and Castiel’s signature eyebrow. You make me proud to be a Winchester, both of you. To Dean and to Cas!”

The applause was deafening, and Dean couldn’t keep his lip from trembling. He righted Michael in his seat and jogged across the space to catch his brother at the bottom of the stairs in a tight hug that neither wanted to release.

“Thanks, Sammy.”

“It’s Sam, you jerk.”

“Bitch,” Dean whispered back with a hand ruffling Sam’s hair. Sam batted at him. Jessie and the band swung straight into a rendition of, “Brother,” and Dean’s heart nearly burst with an overwhelming sense of destiny.

Cas saw Cain nodding to himself and turning to listen to Sarah beside him with a frown of concentration. The two alphas would bear watching, but Cas had a good feeling about Cain in the long term. It was the short term that worried him.

As the song ended, Sam put the mic back up to his mouth. “Oh, right. I forgot. I’m to hand off the stage to Gabriel. Gabe?”

“Coming!!” Gabe slipped in from the side door leading to the lounge rooms with his shirttail untucked and his hair a mess. Kali appeared in the doorway behind him, touching up her lipstick but looking otherwise entirely put together. The scent of a satisfying sexual release followed him as he dodged between the tables and made his way to the stage.

“Gabe, tuck your shirt in. There are going to be photos.” Sam held the mic in reserve until the Omega tidied himself a little. Dean licked his own fingers and attempted to flatten Gabe’s hair, but Gabriel dodged in disgust.

“Eww! Save it for the pups, Dean-o!”

“You love me,” Dean chirped.

Gabe snatched the microphone, grumling, “It was bad enough having ONE little brother. Now I’ve got two!”

“YOU LOVE ME!!” Dean declared emphatically as he made his way back to his seat. He diverted suddenly to crash into Anna with a hug when he spotted her for the first time that day. He mouthed, ‘later’ at her and then returned to the head table where Cas welcomed him warmly.

“God help me, I do,” Gabe conceded into the mic as he climbed the stair. “In fact, that’s pretty much the point of my toast, so I guess I’m done here.”

“Hey, hey, hey!” objected Castiel. “Not so fast! You promised me.”
“I did. And a Novak keeps his promises,” Gabe said seriously, fitting the mic onto the stand. “Even when he tosses the family name aside and becomes a Winchester. You’ll always be a Novak to me, little brother.”

Cas nodded in satisfaction.

“I do love Dean, it’s true,” Gabriel began. “He was the first ray of sunshine our house saw after the death of my mate, may she rest in the comfortable bosom of the Universe. Dean brought humor and vitality and…just…fucking LIFE back into our house. Dean, I don’t know if you realize how big a role you played in my recovery. But enough of that. Let’s talk Castiel. My kid brother, Castiel, was a total loser as a kid. You may not know this, but it’s true. And he’ll be the first to admit it. Right, Cas?”

Cas shrugged noncommittally. It wasn’t something he was prepared to argue, but that didn’t mean he had to agree.

Gabe just chuckled. “He was skinny and awkward. Short. He played chess. He read Jane Austin for God’s sake. He thought the K.C. Symphony Orchestra was a hot night on the town. At school, he couldn’t quite keep out of trouble; not that he was a troublemaker, but because none of the teachers knew what to make of him, and he couldn’t help that he was smarter than they were.

“At home though, my brother was the angelic ideal of a perfect son. I wanted so badly to resent him for that, but goddamnit if I just couldn’t. You see, Cas has this thing he does with his blue eyes and his chin quiver. Maybe he doesn’t do that much anymore, but that combo used to be deadly. We grew up allies against what was a less than ideal world. Maybe we fucked up a lot or maybe it was the world that was fucked up, but my brother and me found out we needed each other. And the asshole was always there, even when I wished he wasn’t, even when he saw things I wished he never had to see.

“And then he Presented, and all of us about shit our pants. Mom, you remember? We were like, ‘Holy Fuck! What just moved into our house?’ Cas stopped wetting the bed right about then. Guess it’s hard to house an alpha and a wolf like he’s got and still pee yourself at night. I dunno. If I had what he does inside me, I think I’d pee the bed every night for the rest of my life!”

“Really, Gabriel?”

“Don’t worry Mom. He knows it’s true. He told me I could say whatever I want as long as it’s true.”

“Try to show some decorum,” she chastised from her seat.

“It’s relevant,” he objected. “Talk about helping people shake off their shame. Learning that the greatest alpha in the world suffered from nighttime bladder-control issues until he was eleven is gonna make them feel so much better about themselves!”

He gave his mother an opening, but she settled back in her chair and waved him on. “So, anyway,” continued Gabriel. “I’m not going to go into everything that happened next. There are articles in the public record you can all look up if you want the full story. The short version is that where Cas and me thought we had it rough as kids didn’t hold a candle to what hit us as youth, as young men. It was the shittiest roller coaster ever built. We went from the deepest lows to the highest highs and back down again, repeatedly.

“Through all that, my brother had to learn from scratch how to slip a collar over the head of a feral beast and tame it to his will. He had to manage me and everything I had dragging at me and learn himself at the same time. His worry over me set him to thinking…about us as a species, about how we got to this broken place, about how we’re ever gonna get out of it to stand as a Pack in the sunshine again, to stop the dying and the screaming and the raping and the killing and the loss.

“He focused in on me in a way that…” Gabe’s voice broke a little, and Castiel’s breath caught. He began to stand, but Dean put a hand on his chest and stilled him. “…in a way that saved my sanity and my life. You saved my life, little brother, and I was so mad at you for so long over that. I didn’t want to be saved. You know that. You know how hard it was. You were there for every awful moment, and you never looked away. You never left me alone. I haven’t really thanked you for that. So…here’s me, your asshole brother, saying thanks. For staying and bearing witness. For holding me up when I all I wanted was to fall.”

Cas was speechless. Gabriel loved to be naked, but not like this.

“I watched for a chance to return the favor someday, and man, the Universe gift wrapped that fucker for you with a green satin bow tied around his dick. I thought for sure you’d take the bait and gobble it straight down in one bite and that would be all there was to the story of how you two morons met and married. But I’ll be damned if you didn’t pull up and play the gentleman. For ten years! Ten fucking years I watched you burn for him. I’m gonna unequivocally state, Castiel, I paid you back for watching me suffer and then some. It was like watching a train fall over a cliff in slow motion, only the train never fucking ended. It was a ten-year-long train wreck, and it went on, and on, and on, and on… You get the picture. And you had no frikken clue, did you? That whole time, even after you started sceneing together, and you were like a perfectly cobbled pair of boots for each other. You still had no idea. God, the endless whining, late-night floor walking, the hand wringing! That nearly did me in where even losing my mate hadn’t!”

“We get it, Gabe,” Cas told him. “I was oblivious.”

“Yeah, and so was Dean. Until that little firedrake moved in and shook everything loose.” Gabe pointed to April, and she beamed. “And she’s been leading you around by the prick ever since. That’s my girl!” he gushed. “So, I’m gonna sum up like this. Cas, I know your faith took a massive blow when you were still young enough to question things like faith, but I want you to close your eyes and take a deep breath in through your nose. Smell this room. Smell it all. Let it fill you. Dean, you too. Michael? April. Scent us. All of us. You smell that? That’s Pack, folks. And if you don’t wanna pin it on Universist Balancing, fine. Then you did that, all four of you. But I’m gonna go out on a limb here and take the status that I get as that man’s older brother, and say, Castiel, YOU did that. You gave us back to us. You gave us pride again. You gave me…fucking everything. And I love you, little brother.

“Raise your glasses, folks. Raise a toast to my kid brother and his brat. I hope you breed a houseful of brats who swing from the rafters and make you pull your hair out. To Alpha Castiel and alpha Dean and premature grey hair and all their many years together!”

Another loud chorus of cheers and applause arose, thumping of tables and stomping of feet, and a raucous cry of, ‘To Cas and Dean!’ The band thumped back in, playing Pharrell Williams’ “Happy.” Castiel excused himself to go thank Gabriel with a hug tight enough to hurt a little.

“Don’t get used to it,” Gabe warned him. “April bribed me to be nice.”

Castiel laughed happily. “Noted,” he added. “Now fix your shirt correctly. We need to go get the rest of the pictures done next door in the auditorium.”

Soon they settled in for a formal dinner, mostly abandoning the place cards and shifting to fill the empty places that tired apes had left as they filtered out. Cas graced them with a short speech of thanks between dinner and pie. Dean sang with the band through several of their favorite standards. He sat for over an hour with Anna and her mate, with others who had been at The Facility when Anna was there, reminiscing, telling her mate stories that he hadn’t heard before.

Dean and Castiel both took long moments with Claire and Krissy. They’d intentionally brought Alex into the reception with centerpieces built of flowers and small pebbles that each framed a carefully worded story about anonymous Omegas she’d rescued. The stories kept the details appropriately vague, the disturbing particulars shrouded in ambiguity, focused on the positive side of giving the hope to the hopeless. Claire dove into Castiel’s arms in tears, and he rocked her gently for several moments. Alex’s smiling face looked on from the center of the table. Gabriel hovered nearby waiting on a chance to hug Claire with Krissy draped bonelessly over his back with a soft smile on her face.

Dean went fully horizontal on the ground for a watering demanded by the remaining wolves as Cas teetered on his tiptoes to get maximum height above his Submissive. They didn’t spill a drop, and each pointed with pride to the other’s skill. They danced together until their feet hurt. They danced with the Pack and by themselves. They pointedly ignored the brazen coupling here and there as the night wore on. They laughed and teased and drank and sang until staff workers began to appear here and there, cleaning up around the edges.

As the night came to a close, Dean closed his eyes with his head resting on Castiel’s shoulder. They danced slowly to a duet between Michael and April: “I Can’t Help Falling in Love.” The floor was mostly empty. Meg danced with Ketch, her face buried against his chest. Charlie danced with Billie. Benny sat in his chair with his arms around Andrea’s belly and his lips against her scent-gland at the curve of her shoulder. An intimate stillness fell over the space.

“Alpha?” Dean said softly.

“Mm?” Cas responded.

“I love you a lot.”

“Good thing, Dean. You’re stuck with me now.”

Dean snickered a little. He tried really hard not to acknowledge the wave of emotion washing over him. But it slammed into him anyway, and he felt the lump rise in his throat as his eyes filled with tears.

“Hey, hey, shh,” Cas said, lifting Dean’s face up to his and kissing the tear tracks that broke free. “Don’t tell me you regret marrying me already. You have to give me a running start at least.”

Dean laughed a watery huff, and clung to his husband. “We did it, Cas. I didn’t really believe we would, but we did. I love you so much. I’m gonna be so good to you.”

“I know, love. I know. I love you too. And I think it’s time for us to bid these crazy all-nighters goodnight. I want to get you naked, so I can make you feel good and send you off to sleep knowing to your bones how much I love you.”

“I thought we were waiting until I heal.” Dean felt a spasm of pain pass through his core. He clenched against it.

“I don’t need to fuck you to make you feel good, Pet. You know better than that.”

“Then what are we waiting for?” asked Dean.
“Let’s go say goodnight,” Cas agreed, slipping his hand down Dean’s arm to his hand and leading him off the dance floor. Dean followed where he led. He would follow the man anywhere.

Anywhere.

Chapter End Notes

Playlist:

We are Young – Fun.

In the End – Black Veil Brides

All to Me – Shoshana Bean & Scott Hoying

Nothing Else Matters - Metallica

Tennessee Waltz - Standard

Chandelier - Sia

Wagon Wheel – Jason Manns

This is Me – Shoshana Bean & Travis Wall

A Little Help from my Friends – Louden Swain

Jungle Love – The Time

Bad Guy – Billie Eilish
Complicated – Avril Lavigne

Blue Eyes Crying in the Rain – Willie Nelson

Something Just Like This – ColdPlay & The Chainsmokers

She Will be Loved – Maroon 5

Brother – Jensen Ackles

Happy – Pharrell Williams

Can’t Help Falling in Love With You - IM
Chapter 111

Chapter Summary

Wrapping it all up. And, you know, as Chuck said,

"Endings are hard. Any chapped-ass monkey with a keyboard can poop out a beginning, but endings are impossible. You try to tie up every loose end, but you never can. The fans are always gonna bitch. There's always gonna be holes. And since it's the ending, it's all supposed to add up to something. I'm telling you, they're a raging pain in the ass."

No, not in my experience.

Chapter Notes

Warning for a bit of orgasm denial that wasn’t strictly expected at the time. The other warnings are at the end to prevent spoilers, but read them.

As I post the last chapter, know this. It’s not the last chapter. Caniformes is shifting to a series, and new additions will still be a somewhat regular thing. I’ll start with timestamps, and once I gather myself, I’ll launch the next story. It won’t be this long. Rookie mistakes were made. I learn. I adapt. I move on.

If you would like more of this AU, this pack, subscribe to the series or the author. Please note: the artwork that we added so late in the game is posted as the next work in the series, making it easier for you to scroll through all the character renderings in logical order. Dean’s full wolf and the tile for Ash are my personal favorites. Not that I have favorites.

Finally, gah! Where to start? Y’all, you don’t know what this project has meant to me. Three years these idjits had been in my head before I started writing. And then more than two years to parse all the babble in my head into a chronological story that held together at all. Two years of constant, constant, unbelievable support, generosity, love from people all over the world who read the tags for a spanky a/b/o and jumped in headfirst. There literally aren’t words to tell you how much it’s meant to me. I second guessed everything enough to qualify me as a full-on neurotic, and I never overcame my overuse of hyphens.

And I made lifelong friends. And I’m speechless about that. And I love all of you so much, it hurts physically. In a good way. Please enjoy the final chapter.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.
Chapter 111 – Monday, September 11, 2017

NOW:

Only a few people remained to stumble sleepily – or drunkenly – between the round tables still festooned with flowers and soiled tableware. Lisa put her son to work collecting centerpieces and packing them into crates. She’d volunteered to drop them off at an assisted living facility on her way home, minus the story cards and photos of Alex. Ben set to the task with a purpose, earning him approving nods from the adult wolves he passed.

He’d finally begun to come out of his shell, and Lisa couldn’t take credit for his evident new lease on life. That was on Benny. The Alpha gave her son attention he wasn’t accustomed to, made time for Ben, made sure he felt he mattered. The lump in Lisa’s throat caught her off guard, and she cleared it and turned back to collecting up the photos. Ben’s Presentation was imminent. She could smell a new scent on him sometimes, nothing definitive yet, but distinctly more mature than his puppy scent. Having a man in Ben’s life right now was a gift she hadn’t dared hope for before she interviewed for a spot in the big league show. She’d been bracing to help walk him through adolescence by herself.

Now, she didn’t have to.

“Ben! Catch!”
Ben whipped around at Jack’s voice and just barely caught the fluffy bouquet by its glass base before it shattered on the floor. “SHIT! JACK!” he protested. Jack just laughed and ruffled his hair as he sauntered past.

“Good catch.”

Lisa scented Benny behind her. They watched her son for a moment together, neither of them voicing the emotion beneath the pause. Benny set a hand on her shoulder and squeezed. She sniffled and turned to face him.

He said, “All that’s left is to portion out the leftovers to the kitchen staff to take home and to make sure they all get their tips. You guys go on home. Tell Ben he did a fine job watching over the little ones tonight. I appreciate his help. He’s a fine young man, Lise.”

“Thank you, Benny,” she told him, saying more with her eyes and the way her mouth seemed to want to form more words before closing firmly. She nodded.

Benny leaned down into her space and left an easy kiss on her cheek. “He’s gonna be fine, cher. We’ve got this. You did a fantastic job with him on your own, but you’re not alone anymore, and we want to help. Raising pups isn’t meant to be a solitary job.”

“I know,” she admitted. “I can’t tell you how much better he is already, just from the last few weeks. I wasn’t sure about your offer at first. I didn’t know how Ben would take it. But…look at him, Benny.”

“Resilient little bugger, isn’t he?”

She smiled. Ben gestured that he and Jack were going to start loading the car, and Lisa waved him out. “No one here even questioned that he doesn’t have a dad,” she mused. “Everywhere else we’ve been, that’s all that seems to matter, even among the wolves.” She turned back to face the Alpha, and her crinkled forehead spoke of her bafflement. “Why is it different here? You haven’t even asked me.”

Benny chuckled. “Don’t need to,” he admitted. “You’ll tell me the story if there is one when you’re ready. Thing is, Lisa, family isn’t about whose name’s on someone’s papers. It’s about who sticks around through the long haul. What I see is you and your son sticking around for each other, and that’s all I need to know. If you’ll let us, we’d like to stick around too.”

She sighed, willing herself not to get overly emotional. Being female and alpha was hard enough without struggling against the constant stereotype that she was more female than alpha. Benny cocked an eye at her, reminding her that he didn’t hold to any of the biased views that she’d fought against for years. She let out a wet laugh, half sob. She bit her lip and nodded. “I’d like that.”

“Good. I’ll get yours and Ben’s names on the application, and hand it in on Monday. Welcome home, alpha.”

“Thank you, Benny. For everything.”

“Don’t thank me yet,” he said looking around. “You and Ketch still have to hammer out a truce. I’ve made my position clear on the matter. You’re ranked above him, and that’s final. But he’s likely to look for ways to undermine you for a while. I’m gonna need you to plant your feet and not give an inch. I want you to keep me informed about how that’s going. I don’t want to be blindsided by a coup attempt in my Pack.”

“Yes, Alpha. I understand.”
“Good. Now, git.”

***************

Dean woke up in the little lake cabin just outside of town draped over Castiel’s torso with his head pillowed on his Alpha’s…his husband’s…shoulder. Light streamed in through the bedroom window, and it danced across the still waters of the lake down the sloping path outside. Cas was already awake. He watched the sun just clearing the horizon, his hand idly caressing Dean’s arm where it wrapped across the Alpha’s belly. Dean blinked awake in the silence and felt the stillness of the morning embrace him in a contentment that was entirely new.

Dean could feel Michael. He wasn’t too far away to feel present in Dean’s head. He was awake and irritated. Dean smiled to himself as he kissed Castiel’s bare shoulder.

“Morning,” the Alpha said gruffly.

“Mornin’,” Dean answered softly, unwilling to break the spell. “We got anything we need to do today? Wouldn’t break my heart to spend the whole day in bed. With you.”

Cas didn’t look away from the window. “I need to meet with the attorney prosecuting the murder trial to go over my testimony, but that’s not until early evening.”

“Want me to come with?”

“I’d like that, Dean, but only if you want to.”

“I want to,” he replied. “Would it be all right if I bring Michael along tomorrow to court? Seeing those fuckers face up to what they did will help him let it go, I think.”

Cas thought for a moment. He rolled a bit to face Dean. “We aren’t going to be around for the end of the trial,” he said. “We’ll be in Paris when the verdict comes in.”

“True, but it’s not about the verdict for Michael. It’s about witnessing that it’s more than just Omegas taking this shit seriously. I want him to see the full courtroom and all the people lined up behind the Omega to see those assholes prosecuted to the full extent of the law. I want him to see that it’s not only Lupins fighting. It’s all of us together. And I want him to get the chance to put human faces to the nightmare figures in his head. Seeing those guys for real is gonna suck, but it’ll also demystify them in his dreams. They aren’t monsters for real, Cas. They’re just people. Shitty people, but…just people. There’s a limit to their reach, and he needs to see that.”

Cas nodded. “All right. If Michael wants to come, bring him. Don’t leave his side for a moment, and if you see any sign of a threat to his safety, you get him out of there. I don’t think we have a feel for how far beyond the internet these people are ready to take things. It’s not worth risking his safety. Or yours.”

“I’ll watch out for him.”

“Mm,” hummed Cas. “Good. And he’ll watch out for you, too. But, you know, this isn’t what I wanted to talk about straight off while I was waiting for you to wake up.”

Dean smiled softly. “No? If I guess right, you weren’t planning on talking at all.”
Cas shot him a look, and Dean could see the switch take place in his blue eyes. Castiel’s gaze took on a predatory gleam that found answer in Dean’s green eyes.

“Roll over, Pet. Up on your other hip. Give me a little space between your thighs.”

Dean didn’t blink at the swift change of topic. He hummed his own agreement at the developing plan. He turned his back to Castiel and lifted his top leg to let Cas slot his morning wood tight between his thighs.

Castiel pressed Dean’s left leg back down to make a tight grip on him, and he pressed his body in close behind Dean. Up near Dean’s ear, he breathed out a soft moan and rolled his hips. “Lay still, Pet,” Cas instructed. “Press your knees together. Make it good for me. Grip me tight and let me use your body. Yeah, just like…like that.” He rolled his hips again, thrusting into the tight space between Dean’s thighs, just below his balls. Dean’s own need went ignored.

Cas held Dean across the chest with his lower arm. His other hand he held out beneath Dean’s mouth.

“Spit,” he instructed. “Give me enough to keep us both from chafing.”

Dean worked a bit to accumulate some saliva, and he let it dribble into Castiel’s palm. The hand disappeared beneath the warm blankets. Dean felt moisture ease the friction between his thighs, and he clenched his thigh muscles tighter.

“Good boy,” whispered his Dom. Soon he was thrusting into Dean’s back with enough power to plow Dean over onto his belly. Cas rolled over with him, taking position on top of his husband with a grimace of effort and his arms braced against the bed. For several moments, the stillness of the morning was taken over by the slap of skin and the masculine grunts of both men, huffs of breath, moans of pleasure.

“Sir!”

“Dean!”

“Nnngh!”

“ALPHA!!”

“DON’T COME! MINE!!”

Friction built as the wetness they’d applied wore off, and the heat it left tore into Dean’s skin enough to make his breath ragged. He reached upward, but the bed had no rails to grab. He flattened his palms on the headboard and pressed hard. He tucked his head. He needed to come. His body pummeled brutally into the soft bedding, and it was too much. He crossed his ankles and squeezed his knees. Every muscle strained.

Cas could feel his knot swell. Every downward thrust brought it to shove against the back of Dean’s thighs, and the pressure was blindingly sweet. His beloved Pet fought the need in his own body, fought the friction, fought to be good.

He was so good.

Cas could feel the fight within him, and the beauty of that view sent him spilling hard between Dean’s thighs and into the sheets. Dean lay tensed and still below him, his shoulders a delicious sequence of curves that trembled with the effort to hold. Dean held his breath, afraid to inhale, afraid any motion at all would break his hold over himself.

Castiel’s breath heaved. He rested his forehead between Dean’s shoulder blades. They lay motionless as the sun cleared the trees and climbed into the sky. Outside, a bass boat trawled by in the reeds near the bank.

“Alpha,” Dean groaned, shifting a bit. “I can’t.”

“Shh. Yes, you can. Give it a minute.”

“Please!”

“No, Pet, not this morning.”

“I was good, Alpha! Please!”

“It’s not a punishment, Dean. It’s about control. I want your submission this morning. It pleases me to take my pleasure from your body and leave you wanting.” Cas lifted up and extricated himself from between Dean’s legs. He shifted his weight until he lay beside his husband’s trembling form, leaning against him from knees to shoulders. He whispered, “You’re exquisite, Dean Michael. You handed me everything you have to give, and I’m not ever going to let you forget that.”

Dean whimpered into the pillow. He felt oddly poised, ready to tumble over the edge without a hand on him. He shivered as he felt his husband’s breath in his hair.

“What’s rule number one?” Cas asked.

“Cling to you,” Dean answered without turning his head.

“That’s right. That’s all you have to do.”

Dean turned just his head to face Cas. He puffed a few tight, gritty breaths and then swallowed and clenched his jaw. His nostrils flared. “Yeah,” he managed. “Easy for you to say. Jesus Christ! I’m still close.”

“Would you like a little help?” Cas offered.

Dean groaned and rolled to get the pressure off his dick. He sat up on the edge of the bed, bent over and breathing hard. “Somehow, I think you and I have different ideas about what would help. I don’t need any ice, thanks.”

“Suit yourself,” Cas said airily. “Let’s get a shower. Then breakfast.”

“Yeah. Cold shower.”

Cas chuckled. He climbed out of bed and stripped the sheets when Dean stumbled forward toward the bathroom. He tossed the soiled bedding in a wad by the shower to deal with later and he started the spigots flowing.

“Is that gonna be a regular thing now, Alpha?” Dean asked as he limped to the toilet. “You never played me that way much before – not for very long, anyway.”

Cas waited to answer him until Dean emerged again from trying and failing to relieve the pressure in his groin. He wouldn’t be able to pee until the erection flagged, and that might take a while. Dean looked up as he found Cas waiting for him outside the shower. Castiel’s face took on a thoughtful expression.

“If we try it for a few weeks, and discover that it’s not working for us, we can try something else,” he explained carefully. “But, Dean, I need you to fully realize the shift we made together. I’m going to uphold my side of that, even in the face of everything your brat might throw at us. You can trust me not to back down. I’m going to be consistent in a way I believe you crave from me. I’m not putting you in a cage, love. I’m not going to make you suffer for long periods. You don’t need long denial sessions. But you do need a chance to butt your own will up against mine. And I’ll let you in on a secret, Winchester. Come here.” Cas pulled Dean in and whispered gruffly in his ear. “My will is stronger.”

Dean laughed in spite of himself. “Uh, yeah. I got that memo years ago, man. Maybe we can skip the Sub torture. I get it. No argument from me. We good? I’m good. You’re good. Help me out with this…” He looked down and indicated his unflagging erection. It shouldn’t be this difficult to stifle a morning stiffy, but Dean couldn’t get out of the daze Cas had thrown him into, and his body loved it.

“Get in the shower, Dean. If you don’t want an ice pack, I’m afraid you need to wait it out the hard way.”

“Hard way. Ha. Thanks.”

“You’re beautiful when you struggle for me, baby,” Cas told him as he followed the man into the shower.

“So, if I can do it ugly, you won’t be as interested?” Dean posed hopefully.

“Nice try.”

***************

Their absence for the month left a strain that no one could assuage, and there were several conference calls to the villa outside Paris where they’d tucked in privately to celebrate, just the four of them. With a stunning view of the city and a hidden entrance, the rented villa gave them everything they needed except total isolation. Neither of the alphas expected to be able to get away entirely anyway, and the place was wired for modern technology that let them touch base whenever they needed to.

Dean made grand strides on his book. The immense satisfaction of a growing file folder settled into his skin. It was a welcome reminder of the strength of his secondary, and it drove him to arise every morning before the sun to sip a hot cup of coffee and clack away at his keyboard out on the balcony of the room he shared with Cas.

Michael and April spent their days sightseeing in the city and out in the countryside. The stolid alpha bodyguards kept a careful distance, but they were never far away when the Omegas left the sanctuary of the villa. Inside its walls, in its garden, in the myriad beautiful rooms they had to themselves, the two of them explored each other’s stories, hopes and dreams, fears and worries, explored each other’s bodies.

Castiel took a sanguine approach to their blossoming attachment. His mate was happy. Michael was happy. Dean was happy. Occasionally, he dressed them all to the nines and took them out on the town. He took them to the theater, to swanky restaurants, out dancing and to the burlesque shows. He took them out for a memorable night at a sex club he knew well, and he let them play. They all dragged in the next morning utterly spent, chafed and slaked, to sleep in a heap in the rising sunshine that fell across the wide canopied bed.

Cas took his husband alone to visit his favorite galleries, letting Dean select a couple of pieces for their home, and paying exorbitant shipping fees to get them back to Kansas unscathed. He left Dean with Michael for an afternoon and walked with April along the Seine and to the Eiffel Tower.

Cas stayed up late into the night every night keeping abreast of developments at home and putting together a path forward with Dean’s input and the Omegas’ advice. He missed a great deal, not being there, but he had enough of a handle on it all to pick up where he’d left off when he got home with his family.

Autumn flew by. They surprised Michael with a birthday party in the second week of November that he’d not seen coming. The house overflowed with revelers enough to make Michael gape at the outpouring. Dean even flew Michael’s family in for the weekend.

April went into Heat the week after, and the house went silent in anticipation. Michael paced at the top of the stairs. He arranged and rearranged plans for a Thanksgiving Day open house that he hoped would spill out every doorway and onto the lawn if the weather held. Being up on his feet was becoming more and more difficult, but he couldn’t make himself rest while the door to the Heat/Rut room stayed stubbornly closed. And locked.

Dean limped in from the parlor with a sandwich on a plate. He grunted gamely as he sat on the bench in the foyer and patted to cushion beside him. “Come and eat something. I don’t want you passing out, and little Felix needs the sustenance.”

“What have I said about that name?” Michael complained as he took his mate up on the offer. He took the plate and the spot beside Dean.

“It’s just a fetus name, Michael. You get to pick his name when he’s born. I get to decide what we call him before that. Relax. They’ve been in there for less than two days…”

“Thirty-nine hours, if you want to be precise,” Michael said with a full mouth.

“Right. They’ll invite us in soon. Save your strength.”

“They’ve had time to plant seven or eight pups,” Michael protested. “If it hasn’t caught by now…”

“Don’t you dare knock on that door, Omega. We’re giving them the time they need. It’s the least we can do considering they did the same for us. Show some respect.”

“Easy for you to say!” Michael groused. “I’m coming out of my skin. My Heat’s hitting, Dean. I can feel it. And on top of being miserable and big as a truck…GOD! What’s taking so long?” He dropped the empty plate beside him on the bench and began pacing again. Dean scented the air subtly. Michael might be right. His scent seemed deeper, muskier. Richer. Michael being pregnant meant it was anyone’s guess whether he would even have a Heat at all this round. Sometimes they hit right on schedule and just as intense as usual, and sometimes pregnancy eclipsed the whole thing, drowning the usual flush of hormones behind those that were working to build a tiny new person within him.

“Come here, Omega.”

Michael huffed at his mate, but he stalked up and straddled Dean’s lap anyway. His belly forced an awkward distance between them, and they both had to hold onto the other’s shoulders to maintain the position. Michael rested his forehead against Dean’s. Dean wrapped a hand around the back of his neck and then slid the other down over the meat of his ass the massage into his crack and give him something to press against. Michael groaned.

“I’m game for another round, sweetheart,” Dean told him. “I’ll take top or bottom bunk, whatever you want. You don’t have to suffer. You just can’t go busting in on the H/R room yet. We have to wait for them to be ready.”

“Dean, please.”

“Whatever you need, beautiful.”

“Will you fuck me right here in the entryway?”

“You know I will. Get on your knees on the bench. Let me know if it hurts to kneel like that. Rest your chest on the back support.” Dean tapped Michael’s leg to get him up on his feet, then he set the plate on the floor to the side. Dean held Michael’s hand and his elbow to help him jostle into place. He eased Michael’s elastic down below the curve of his belly in the front and lower in the back to bare his round backside to the prised sunshine coming through the glass on the front door.

Michael whimpered when Dean ran two fingers in a circle at his rim, sliding in the wetness that was ever present these days. His hole was swollen and puffy, slightly irritated most of the time, and often a little itchy. Dean didn’t tease him. He stroked him firmly and buried his middle finger right to the webbing, bending it to stroke Michael’s prostate. Dean let his mate press backward into the touch for a few thrusts, and then he pulled his finger out and sucked it clean noisily before bending down onto one knee and burying his face into his favorite flavor.

Michael cried out and slipped one hand into his pants. “Dean, let me touch. Please, alpha?”

“Go ahead, sugar,” Dean’s alpha told him, thoroughly pleased that Michael had paused to ask. The Omega lived right up front these days, and Dean loved it. He gave Michael’s hole a few more broad-stroked swipes before he unzipped his jeans and shoved them just below his straining cock, shifted the softness of his boxer briefs to protect his tender parts from his zipper, and coated himself in Michael’s slick.

Michael looked over his shoulder with a desperate expression. “Any time you feel like mounting up, Dean. Not getting any less pregnant over here.”

“Bossy fucker, ain’cha?” Dean grumbled, but he wasted no time in shoving all the way in. The doorbell rang, and Dean held mid-thrust. He sighed heavily and dropped his head, still buried inside his mate with his hands gripping Michael’s hips. He canted his head to peek under his own arm. The glass in the door was beveled at the edges, but the panes were large enough that the beveling didn’t obstruct the view. A stranger stood in the doorway, his eyes wide at the view inside. He looked away swiftly.

“Dean! Come on!” Michael goaded, and Dean punched forward hard with his hips.

Fred hurried in from the library to answer the door. “It’s the new swimming pool service contractor, alpha,” he said over his shoulder. “Please don’t interrupt your activities. I’ll show him around back.”

“Bring him through!” called Michael with his head buried in his crossed arms. “Shortest path to the pool is through the house. Come on, Dean! Like you mean it!”

“Jesus, Michael.”
Fred waited for Dean’s shrug and nod before he answered the door and escorted the wide-eyed ape past the pair on the bench. They were both mostly covered, but Michael’s rapid stroking of his own cock and boisterous moans made the scene far more lewd than it had to be. Dean took his discomfort out on his mate’s backside, fucking him hard. He wrapped a hand around Michael’s belly and pulled the man into him as he thrust. He buried his knot in his mate and angled his hips to drive into his prostate over and over again, setting Michael to press back into it.

They heard the backdoor slam closed just as Dean froze up and came with a shout. Michael followed him a handful of strokes later. Sticky white semen pulsed over his fist and onto the red cushion at his knees. In the miasma of hormones that surrounded them, Dean caught it clearly now. That was Heat scent. His cock twitched inside Michael’s body and he grunted as another wave of come pulsed into his mate’s channel. He’d come embarrassingly fast, but he wasn’t sure if it was the scent or the unexpected audience. Or both.

“Yeah, you’re in Heat,” Dean panted heavily above him. “Bout time. I was about to give up on you this round.”

***************

Inside the H/R room, Castiel lay drenched in sweat. Sidled up behind his sleeping mate, he tried to catch his breath. His knot hadn’t spent more than thirty minutes unlocked from her in nearly two days, all told, and he needed to rest. Mid-season Heats were usually milder and shorter than the semi-annual full-throttle of a standard Heat. But April’s body had synced with Castiel’s, and both were determined to see results this time.

Castiel exhaled into the back of her neck and considered the sheer folly of thinking he could have held himself clear for another four or five years while his mate put her resume together and gained a few more years. He didn’t have that kind of strength, and these last two days proved it. The only thing…the singularly only thing…that allowed him a modicum of control over his wolf this time was a repeated assurance to the beast that it wouldn’t hear the words, “Not yet,” again for a very long time.

Castiel’s wolf set about with intent, and he brooked no restraints, giving credence to Cas’ observations from the past that his wolf only bore its leash out of a respect for Castiel’s stubborn Primary resolve. If it wanted to, his wolf could slip the leash and create mayhem. Keeping it satisfied had always been key to winning its complicity, but this time, there would be no satisfaction without breeding.

And so, over the past two days, Castiel had fucked her raw, taking the bit in his teeth and running away with it. His stamina verged on pubescent, but his refractory period adjusted likewise, and that meant copious quantities of his seed filled her every orifice. April bore it with aplomb, with unwavering agreement. She urged him on, even when he tired, and she never complained about having her limbs forced into unseemly positions that meant he could pound his intentions into her all that much harder.

Castiel reeked. His hair lay plastered to his head. His sweat stank as it dried on his body. He drifted in and out of consciousness until he felt his knot slip free at last. Without conscious thought, he batted away the covers over his hips and shuffled down to clean her hole with his tongue like a mongrel dog, grinning in feral satisfaction when his Omega moaned and pressed her backside into his nose in pleasure.
He didn’t know when they’d eaten last. A handful of empty water bottles sat discarded on the side table. Castiel was beginning to come back to himself as he finished licking his kitten clean and straightened to pull her in to rest against his chest and taste her lips again. He knew he was disgusting, both in personal hygiene and in personal preference, but the sense of fulfilment that fell over him overrode every hateful impulse. April snuggled into him in her sleep, turning her head toward his throat, seeking his scent, and Cas felt owned and cherished.

He couldn’t smell it yet, but he knew a successful breeding the way animals know, and he glided slowly back to earth. He nosed her hair out of her face and peppered her temple with gentle kisses. Biological fulfillment was a new sensation for Castiel, and he would need to pay close attention to his own impressions so he could write it up in his file.

Not yet though.

Not yet.

“If that round didn’t do it, Alpha…” April trailed off.

“We’ll have to wait and see, kitten.” Cas wasn’t ready to try to explain how he knew they wouldn’t have to wait and see.

“I’m hungry.”

“And we need a shower,” he agreed. The surreal sense of discordant reality that viewing the world through his wolf left him with was fading rapidly, and he felt his own belly clamor for something filling. Cas called the kitchen and asked for cheeseburgers and whole milk before carrying April into the bathroom and washing every inch of her clean. By the time they returned, the bedding had been changed and the room aired. Fred left them a note that food was coming presently, and he’d scurried before they emerged freshly washed.

Cas pulled April onto his lap at the tiny table in the corner. She played idly with his hair. “They’ll be five months behind Michael’s pup,” she told him. He pressed his face into her shoulder and rubbed firmly into her soft belly.

“Mm-hm.”

“Alpha, talk to me,” she entreated, lifting his chin. “Are you back? It feels like you’re back, but you’re communicating in hums and grunts.”

“I’m back, kitten. I’m just a little disoriented. And you smell so good.”

She smiled into his eyes. “You went deeper than I’ve ever seen you, Cas. I liked it.”

He chuckled. “I noticed.”

“You have a breeding kink,” she observed carefully. “I liked that too.”

“Do you now? I’ll remember that.”

“Might be tough to mimic what this felt like if we’re not actually breeding though.” She shifted to straddle his lap and leaned in to claim his lips in a kiss that grew steamy but not demanding.

“I don’t think you need to worry about that kitten,” Cas told her abashedly as he broke the kiss. “I believe I’ve got the roleplay down any time you wanna go there.” He blushed.
She chuckled and shared the laughter with her mate. He was embarrassed, and it was the cutest thing she’d ever seen. April answered the door when Tony knocked and pulled it wide for him to wheel in a loaded cart. Still nude and unashamed, April nodded happily at him as he scuttled back out. His ears had gone bright red, but he was doing better about that kind of thing with more exposure. Cas set the food out before him on the table, and he took April back onto his bare lap to feed them both.

In the morning he would know for sure. His nose would tell him, and assuming he was right, and he’d planted fertile seeds into waiting soil, he and April planned to celebrate by unlocking the door, and bringing in the other two – all of them chomping at the bit for that.

***************

April, it turned out, had not only caught, she was carrying the litter that Cas so desperately craved. Eight weeks after her Heat, as the misery of her first trimester began to fade into the discomfort of the second, she squeezed Castiel’s hand as Dr. Mosely’s technician moved an ultrasound emitter over her slick belly. Michael stood at her head. He wasn’t supposed to be on his feet much, but he had leave for this. It was a big day. Dean sat on a tall stool near her feet, his eyes glued to the screen. They already knew there were multiples, but they’d hesitated to try to number them without a visual.

The tech took measurements and snapped photos with practiced efficiency, grabbing the statistics he needed before slowing down and talking April through what he was seeing. Cas watched silently. His mouth set in a hard line, and his foot jiggling against the rung of his stool. Dean put a bracing hand on Cas’ arm, and the Alpha covered it with his free hand.

“All right, it’s like this,” said the tech. “I’m going to highlight the beating hearts for you. Right up front here, toward the bottom, is number one. This one’s in the prime position right now, so it may grow the best. We’ll see. Sometimes they do a little shifting around in there. I can’t be sure of the sex yet. And up here to the left is number two. See it? It’s a little fuzzier because someone’s legs are in the way.”

“Cas…” said April with emotion, and he bent down over her to kiss her lips and soothe her.

“I see them, kitten. I know.”

“And way in the back of the anterior uterus, kinda squashed by its siblings at the moment, is number three. We’re looking at its heart through its spine. You see the orientation? It’s butt up, back toward the camera, upside-down and backward.” The tech drew a third circle and snapped another still shot.

“Three?” asked Dean. “Three in front? And there’s a backdoor pup too?”

“Yep. Those three are all together in the anterior womb. One in the posterior. Lemme get a shot of that one.” The tech shifted the wand around and pressed in hard near April’s kidney. She huffed a pained breath and clutched Castiel’s hand. He felt an Alpha response flush his hands and feet with adrenalin, but Dean stood up and put an arm across his chest, breathing calmly at his back. Cas nodded his gratitude, and controlled himself. On the screen, another beating heart moved rhythmically in black and white. “There it is. Looks great, folks. They’re all four within the normal growth range. They all show good movement and good development. Congratulations. You’ve got quadruplets.”

“Four,” breathed Michael. “Four pups all at once, and this one’s only going to be five months old when they’re born. We’re insane. Alpha, you’re insane!”

Cas exhaled hard, kissed April, turned round and kissed Dean, and then sat upright. “Sue me,” he teased.

***************

They held off on announcing the count publicly, but they went home and celebrated privately. Stuck on bedrest, Michael had made a nest of his bed where he was surrounded with study materials to keep him from falling irrevocably behind the rest of the class in his major. Dean and Cas both tutored him from home to keep him moving toward his degree in Lupin Development even while restricted to his bed. His pregnancy was a healthy one, but his body struggled to keep itself functioning with a foreign body the size of a football crammed between his spine and his guts. Everything hurt, and laying on his side in bed all day made it worse.

Celebrating the news of four viable pups growing inside April’s little body meant the four of them crowded onto Michael’s bed with glasses of sparkling grape juice and Dean’s guitar.

And then the bottom fell out.

Michael missed the next appointment for April, his butt rooted firmly to the bed he was beginning to loathe with his whole being, and Dean stayed behind with him. He was due in a week, and he decided any amount of pain was worth it just to get this damned pregnancy over with.

“I swear, Dean Michael, if you remind me one more time that apes have two more months of this than we do, I’m going to stab you in your sleep. I don’t need you anymore. I’ve got Cas and Pete. Maybe praying mantises have the right idea. The mother eats the dad after mating.”

“Baby, you haven’t slept more than two hours at a time in a week. Stretch out. I’ll rub your back…”

“Get away from me!” Michael objected. “It’s your fault I’m this miserable in the first place!”

Dean didn’t defend himself. He brought Michael a cup of juice with a straw and calmly massaged his legs to get the blood flowing. He reminded Michael to pump his ankles, and he watched until the Omega grumbled into compliance.

Neither of them expected Cas to carry a weeping April through the door half an hour later. The Alpha’s face was grey, lifeless.

“Cas? What?” Dean sprang from the chair he had pulled up beside the bed and helped Cas lay his mate out beside Dean’s. April immediately turned to Michael and clung to him sobbing uncontrollably. Michael wrapped her up and looked over her head in puzzlement. Cas met his eye.

“There are only three heartbeats,” he said flatly. “We lost one.”

“Oh, God,” whispered Michael. “No.” He clutched right back at April. His head ducked down into her space, and his shoulders shook as he cried with her.

Cas swallowed and didn’t object when Dean led him to the chair and sat him down.

“I would’ve come to get you, Cas. Why didn’t you call? You shouldn’t be driving like that. Like Castiel looked up at his husband with a look so lost, Dean struggled to hold his eye. “I had to get her out of there, Dean. I had to… I don’t know what to do. Had to do something.”

“Jesus, Cas.” Dean knelt on the floor between his knees and pulled him into an embrace.

“The others,” sniffled the Alpha. “The others are all sound. Still growing. All viable. It’s the, uh, the one in the middle of the front womb… There’s no sign of a body. It must have d… Must have died shortly after that first ultrasound. Reabsorbed. Already gone.”

April didn’t leave Michael’s bed for days. Michael rubbed her shoulders, massaged her legs, pressed warm hands into the tightness of her growing belly. He cajoled her into eating. He stayed up late into the night whispering nonsense with her. Castiel tried to stay too, but he couldn’t sit still long enough. Too long in one place brought the grief down as a crushing weight, and he stormed back to his feet, breathless, only to stalk out of the room and out of the house.

Working helped. There was always work to do. The newly merged joint venture was always facing one near catastrophe or another, and Castiel didn’t need to search for meaningful distractions. He spent every night tossing and turning beside his mate until she pushed him away and demanded he sleep elsewhere.

Dean stood watch helplessly. They still had two pregnancies to manage, and they would be bringing one to completion any day now. He needed his Alpha back, but he didn’t know how to reach him.

For her part, April used the week to find herself a new footing. Gabriel was a constant presence, and he guided her grief from a perspective no one else had. He talked her through the worst of the waves, holding her hand while Michael surrounded her from behind, and letting his voice find a monotone that didn’t threaten her delicate state of mind. Leaning against Michael was an unwieldy experience. His belly was taut and convex, and she had nowhere to comfortably rest her weight, but they each shuffled about a little until they found a position that worked.

And while Castiel didn’t abandon her, he couldn’t give her what Michael could, lost in his own grief as the Alpha was. Michael was graced with that one little step of distance, and that allowed him to keep hold of himself while supporting April in the dark moments when she questioned her own fitness to be a mother if she couldn’t find the courage to feel blessed at still carrying three pups where some people would never get even one.

Downstairs, Dean found the strength to do the same for Castiel, and by the end of the week, shuddering breaths exhaled on a new sense of acceptance, and hands braced against a supportive heave that brought them each back to their feet. There were more tears at odd and unexpected times, but they dug their heels in, and they looked forward. Castiel rallied late in the week, willing color back into his cheeks, and holding his mate in a tight embrace, swearing his presence and promising never to leave her no matter what. He had never left, but he’d given her the space she needed, space that Michael filled with a kind of solace Castiel wasn’t capable of providing.
For the Omegas, the experience cinched a connection that was unbreakable, would prove untouchable, would stand the test of time over the course of a lifetime of moments, simple and complex, ecstatic and horrifying. The idea that the Alpha had any authority over that connection whatsoever became laughable once it blossomed into the full weight of maturity.

Michael went into labor on the afternoon of February 6, 2018. His wasn’t a particularly cumbersome labor, but male Omega labor is rarely easy, and he struggled.

Missouri came to the house while Michael was walking with stuttered steps out on the back porch, naked and hunched over. Dean held him by the hand and the upper arm to support his steps.

“We need to go in, man. It’s too cold to be out here naked. We can walk the hallways all you want.”

“I’m burning up, alpha,” Michael objected. “I’m not cold. Let me stay a few more minutes. Here, let’s go this way.” Michael turned on his heel, and Dean jogged to keep up with him. He caught sight of Missouri watching from the doorway.

“Leave him be, Winchester,” she disagreed. “His body knows what it needs.”

Dean’s protest died on his lips as Michael doubled over in pain, clutching his belly and bending his knees. Missouri watched his face with a practiced eye. Dean braced him the best he could, but Michael sat all the way down on the flagstone and rolled into a ball of agony.

“Breathe through it, sweetheart. Breathe.”

“I’m breathing, damnit! Fuck!”

Dean let Michael squeeze his hand until Dean was sure the bones cracked, and he kept his other hand in motion kneading the small of his mate’s back. Their bonds helped Dean zero in on where Michael’s pain was most intense, and Dean shifted his massage and his pressure accordingly.

“Help me up?” Michael asked once the contraction passed. Dean hoisted him to his feet and followed helplessly as Michael began another lap of the porch. Portia bounded out ahead of April and tried to entice Michael and Dean to play with her, but she dutifully kept all four feet on the ground, a skill newly mastered.

“Cas wants an update,” April said softly to Dean. Dean looked to Michael and then shook his head a little. “Don’t think we’re making much progress.”

“Oh. OH!” Michael exclaimed reaching for April’s and Dean’s shoulders at the same time. A splattering of liquid hit the stone at Michael’s feet, and he bent double again.

“I’d call that progress,” Missouri observed. “April, tell Cas that Michael’s water broke.”

“Yes, Ma’am,” she answered. “Any idea how much longer?”

“Nope. Pups appear when they’re ready. Your Alpha knows that.”
April waited for Michael’s nod before she left him with Dean.

“See?” Michael said stiffly. “It’s a good thing we stayed outside.”

“Michael, babe, I don’t give a fuck about the carpets. You’re shivering.”

“I’m shaking from the pain, Dean, not the cold. It hurts like a motherfucker.”

“Look,” Dean tried a different tack. “Dr. Mosely’s here. Let’s get you in so she can check you over.”

“I’m not a horse, alpha! Quit pulling me!”

“You’re being as stubborn as a mule,” Dean replied, irritated, and struggling with his alpha’s insistence on hiding his mate somewhere enclosed and private and curling around him protectively. The open space around them was beginning to get to Dean.

“If you wanna go in, go in,” insisted Michael rubbing the undercurve of his belly with a hard touch.

“I’m not leaving you,” Dean growled.

“Good, then shut up and let me…Oh, fuck!!” Michael crumpled to the ground, curled up on his side, and rolled in pain with a sob.

“That’s it!” Dean scooped him up and carried him past a slightly amused Missouri, through the hall outside Gabriel’s room, down the steps to the right, and into the H/R room. Cas stood up abruptly from tucking a fitted sheet into place. Dean put Michael on the bed and climbed in after him. Michael stayed curled on his side. He reached for Dean’s hand, and he held on through the agonizing clench that traversed his lower back and rounded to the front, feeling like his body was trying to suffocate his son.

April appeared behind them with a cup full of crushed ice. She clambered onto the bed next to Michael and eased a few chips of ice into his mouth.

“You folks don’t need me here,” Missouri said from the doorway. Cas looked up, startled. “You’re not leaving…” He made it a strangled question.

“Alpha, you’ve delivered pups before,” she reminded him. “But no, I’m here for the long haul. Get comfortable though. It’s not going to be quick. And it’s not going to be easy.”

“I want his pain controlled as much as we can, Missouri,” Cas told her.

“Right,” said the beta. “I brought some options. Michael? Omega, are you listening? Dean, listen up. If we administer something now, it’ll slow the progression, and he will be stuck flat on his back until he gives birth. If he can tough it out for another hour or so, maybe move around a little, he’ll…”

“It’s not a matter of toughing it out, beta!” Dean growled at her. “He’s in pain! Help him!”

“Dean,” said Cas softly. But Dean wasn’t having it.

“Give him something!” he insisted.

Missouri waited for a nod from Cas, and she began to set items from her bag out on the counter. Michael groaned.

“Omega,” cooed Missouri. “Sugar, I need to take a look at you before we do anything else. You just relax for me, all right? Let me in, love. That’s right.” Missouri eased his thighs apart, and Dean helped him onto his back. Michael huffed miserable shallow breaths which turned into a screech as the doctor’s probing fingers touched his sensitive cervix. He kicked backward, trying to climb his mate’s chest.

“Shh! Hold still, Michael. I need to know how far you are.”

“Hurts!” Michael wailed.

“I know it does. Breathe with Dean, now. Just focus on breathing. It’ll be over soon.”

Cas huffed aggressively through his nose, and April curled tightly against Michael’s side, urging him to follow Dean’s breathing and to hold her by the hand.

Missouri slipped her hand out and took off her glove. She sighed. “Got a long way to go, guys. He’s getting there, but he’s only at three centimeters.”

April fed Michael another mouthful of ice chips. She smiled softly for him. He bit his lip and tried to smile back. “I’m being a baby,” he confessed. “You have to go through far worse. Don’t look at me, Pete. I don’t want to scare you. Maybe you should…”

“Don’t you dare send me away, Michael Quentin. I’m not leaving you!”

Gabriel appeared at his brother’s shoulder. “Anything I can do, Cas?”

Castiel licked his lips. “You can let Ellen know we’re in labor, I guess. She’ll send out the proper notifications.”

"We’re in labor, are we?" Gabe asked pointedly, his eyes going to the quivering man in the middle of the bed, shamelessly open to all viewers. “Michael might disagree that now’s a time for inclusivity, big bro.”

“I thought you wanted to help!” Cas snapped.

The afternoon wore into night, into the wee hours, into a beautiful dawn. No one saw it. There were no windows in the basement H/R room. Michael’s sweaty body writhed as his body worked to expel his offspring.

“Thought Lupin births were s’posed to be easier than apes,” Gabe observed sleepily from his chair in the corner.

Missouri removed her stethoscope and stripped the blood pressure cuff from Michael’s trembling arm. Her face was drawn and tired. “Men have a tougher time, Gabe,” she told him. “Generally. Nothing about the male uterus and birthing complex fits with a man’s internal anatomy. It’s like it was cobbled together as an afterthought.”

Cas took another deep breath and stood up from his chair to stretch. “No sign of intestinal entanglement?”

“He’s clear, Alpha. We’re just waiting on the cervix now. Need another two centimeters to get to eight.”
“Still?!” asked Michael, outraged at his body’s reticence to cooperate.

Missouri patted his calf. “Try to rest between contractions, sweetheart. You’ll be pushing in another hour.”

“Oh, thank God,” he said quietly, falling back into Dean’s embrace. Dean massaged his shoulders, his biceps. He reached down and dug his knuckles into Michael’s thighs. Dean’s hands were killing him, but he couldn’t stop. Michael had it far worse.

“Everything’s still okay, doc?” Dean asked. “It doesn’t usually take this long, even for men.”

“He’s doing great, alpha,” she assured him. “There’s no hurrying a pup that enjoys mama’s warm belly.”

“Mama’s warm belly is about to drop kick him outta there,” Michael groused. April snickered and leaned in to kiss his sweaty face.

“How are you feeling, kiddo?” Missouri redirected with a squeeze to April’s ankle.

She looked around without leaving Michael. “I’m better,” she said solemnly. “Did you know we’ve given them all fetus names?”

“You don’t say,” Missouri prompted. “Let’s hear them.”

“Michael’s is Felix,” April told her proudly. “We don’t know his real name yet. Michael’s not saying…”

They were interrupted as a harsh contraction put bands of barbed wire around Michael’s belly, and he clutched Dean’s hands and looked into his mate’s face for direction and assurance. Dean counted him through it then talked him into a relaxed state. Michael’s eyes were glassy with fatigue and pain. His painkillers were about to need renewing. Michael shook April’s hand weakly to remind her to pick her story back up.

“Cas named my pups. Just fetus names, of course. He said there was an old English children’s show his mother used to try to distract him with, him and Gabriel. What’s it called, Alpha?”

“The Magic Roundabout,” Cas told her in a distracted voice. He stepped around and set the backs of his fingers against Michael’s cheek, frowning as he assessed the man’s temperature.

“Right. All the names come from there. So, the back one is Zebedee. In front, we have Dougal, Ermintrude, and…and Dylan.”

Missouri touched her with a compassionate gaze. “Dylan is the one we lost?”

April looked away and nodded.

“Hey, April, look at me, baby.” April frowned but looked around at Missouri. She reached over her shoulder for Castiel’s hand, and he gave it.

“It’s okay, love. It’s okay to mourn him. It’s okay to remember his name and to remember that you’re still his mother.”

April nodded mutely and hid her face in Castiel’s wide palm. He turned his fingers to caress her cheek. “Would you like to hear about him? I know a few things, if you’re ready to hear them.”

April looked up at Cas. He nodded. He squeezed her hand. April looked back to Missouri.
“You remember authorizing a test early on?” Missouri began. “It’s a genetic test. The results stay locked unless there’s ever a need for them. Only my tech, Justin, and I look at the results. If we find something you need to know about, we talk. Otherwise, we seal it up and store it for good.”

Michael sucked in a surprised breath and mumbled a groaning complaint into the side of Dean’s arm. “Hey,” Dean prompted. “Eyes up here, Omega. Look at me. Ten…Nine…breathe…eight… Shhh…” Dean counted him down, calm and comforting. When the contraction released him from its grip, Dean mopped his brow with a damp cloth that Gabe handed him, and both men set back to massaging the Omega’s muscles.

“We have Dylan’s genetic results, April,” Missouri continued, pulling on a pair of gloves. She sat on a stool at the foot of the bed and began calmly to probe Michael’s cervix again with her fingers.

“I’d like to know,” April told her.

“Dylan was a boy, sweetheart. And an alpha. He was … I believe if I’ve got them in the right order, he was Ermintrude’s identical twin and a fraternal twin to Dougal.”

“Ermintrude’s a boy?” she asked, puzzled for the moment. They’d asked for the details to be left discreet. Cas knew, but the rest of them didn’t want to.

“Oops, I guess that was quite the spoiler,” Missouri smiled. It could have been a painful bit of useless information, but to April it felt like a little bit of the baby she would never meet would live on in his twin. “Michael, love, you’ve got one more centimeter to go. Hang in there, boy. We’ll be saying hello to your son very soon.”

Michael’s breath exploded from his body. He sobbed in exhaustion, and Dean wrapped tired arms around him.

“Dean, are your legs falling asleep?” Missouri asked him.

“I’m not moving from this spot, Missouri, even if they fall off.”

The morning aged into lunchtime, and Michael wearied but took each contraction as it came, summoning the strength from somewhere to face each one head on. Dean lost count of the number of times he told his mate he was proud of him. It didn’t matter. He was ready at each sweaty clench to say it again.

Finally, the timbre of the contractions shifted. Michael began to grunt into them and squeeze intentionally. He held his breath at the climax, and he pushed, panting hard at the end.

“Michael, PUSH!” Missouri said with a comforting touch to his leg to help him get it pulled far out to the side, out of his way. “On the next one, we’re going to crown this little one. Michael, grab your shins and pull upward. Remember what we said about pushing…your body knows. Go with it. The best pushes center around your core. Try to focus your energy there, not in your legs. You ready? Yell all you want, baby. Cas, you get this leg. Gabriel, hold this one. Dean, brace his shoulders and give him something to push against if he wants to. You’re counting, Dad. Michael’s gonna follow your count. Here we go. Michael, PUSH!”
Michael bore down hard, gritting his teeth and pulling his knees out wide and up. His groan became a shout. Dean counted slowly in his ear, and when he reached one, he reminded Michael to take a breath and rest.

The door stood wide open, and Kali guarded the entrance, but she didn’t impede anyone. Most of them began to gather in the hallway, listening to the progress. Sam was holding down the fort at work until he could cut out at five o’clock, but everyone who could slip away vanished one by one from the hallways shortly after lunch. It was Sam’s name listed for both Dean and Cas as an alternative contact in their absence, and that tied him fast to his work phone.

At the manor, the hallway outside and the parlor began to fill. Fred and Tony kept snacks and drinks fresh. Occasional progress news filtered up the stairs.

Sarah stepped into the kitchen and hung her satchel on a hook by the garage door. “Any news yet?” she asked a harried Tony. He shook his head and carried a tea service into the parlor. Sarah followed. Naomi was holding court with ACRI natives and local neighbors in the parlor, so Sarah slipped through and around the door down to the H/R room. The stairs were filled with seated people, all chatting nervously or silently listening. She slowed at the top of the stairs. From the doorway, Kali beckoned her, so she picked her way lightly through the bulk of Benny’s Pack. Rounding the corner, she stopped and watched over Kali’s shoulder.

“Jesus.”

“You’re just in time,” Kali whispered. “Go on in if you want. Cas wants you there. Just, stay out of the way, all right?”

“Michael and Dean won’t mind?” Sarah asked tentatively. Kali shook her head and gave Sarah a gentle shove. She eased her way in just as Dean was easing his own way out from under Michael. He stepped off the bed and winced, hopping irritably on his sleeping foot to wake it up.

“Wash your hands thoroughly, Dean, and then come right over here with me,” Missouri instructed. Dean hobbled into the bathroom with a quick touch to Sarah’s arm on his way by.

Sarah looked around and found that Jess had chosen to stand by the table in the corner where she had a view of the room but wouldn’t be in the way. Sarah joined her. At the bed, Michael looked decimated, but bravely resolved to keep going. In Dean’s absence, April slipped behind Michael and let him rest his back against her slightly bulging tummy and her chest. She mopped him with a cool damp cloth and then handed it off to Gabe. Gabe had one knee on the bed and the other on the floor, and he was feverishly massaging Michael’s cramping thighs. On the other side, Cas knelt on the bed in what appeared to be an uncomfortable splayed position, his hands in motion too over Michael’s sore body.

Dean returned, pale and nervous. Missouri handed him a pair of gloves. Michael cried out and clenched down. Everyone seemed to move in as one, like a huge animal expelling a breath. Dean got his gloves on and focused in where Missouri directed him. She pushed him onto the stool, and she guided his hands toward Michael’s inner thighs.

“Keep your wrists close together,” she instructed. “You’re not going to drop him. He’s coming now, folks. Michael, love, it’s all you. You push when you’re ready.”

“I was…” he huffed breathlessly. “Ready…four fucking…hours ago!”

“That’s the spirit,” Cas praised. “You’re doing so well, Omega.”
“AAAAAAARRRRGGGGHHHH-UUUUNNNNGGGHHH!!!”

“Oh, God! MICHAEL!! HIS HEAD’s OUT!!” Dean was breathless. He wanted to hold his mate and his son at the same time, but he couldn’t exactly do either yet.

Missouri stepped aside to let Castiel tend to the pup’s airways and assist Dean with easing the tiny creature the final short distance. Michael began to sob as the pup slipped free into his father’s waiting grasp. He reached for April and tried to kiss her, but he shook too badly, and he wound up pressing his face to hers instead as he wept.

Gabe pressed a hand into Michael’s shoulder, giving him Pack touch, the best gift he could offer at the moment, and Kali appeared at Gabe’s side to add hers, too. Jess slipped around to the other side of the bed and sat down by April’s thigh to help surround him on all sides. She pulled Sarah with her, but the Primate didn’t know what to do, and she stood awkwardly beside the bed watching the Pack bond. Dean’s sobs as he held the pup for Castiel to tend were the painful wracking kind. Cas cleared the baby’s airways and jolted the pup into sucking in a startled breath which resolved into a determined wail. He clamped the umbilical cord in two places and then helped Dean lay the pup on the bed between its mother’s thighs to cut between the clamps with shaking hands. Dean carried the pup to Michael. Together, they laid the little one directly on Michael’s chest, and all four parents put a hand on him at once. Dean sat on the side of the bed at Michael’s hip, not trusting his own legs to hold him. Cas stood next to him with a hand on his back. In short order, the pup stopped wailing and explored the world about him with wide eyes.

Michael looked on his son in awe, his thumb tracing the soft fur at his cheek, and marveling at how clear his eyes were already. At his inner thigh, Missouri tucked back in to see about the placenta as it slipped out almost unnoticed on a contraction buried under endorphins and bliss. With a little repositioning, Michael managed to offer his nipple to the baby, who latched on eagerly and began an ineffective suckling that melted his mother’s heart.

The baby had jet black hair and dark eyes, but both could shift as he grew. He mewed loudly, working air into his lungs. Michael chuckled and looked up to find Dean biting his lip as he met Michael’s eye. Castiel kissed the top of Dean’s head and sniffled loudly before leaving them to speak with Missouri.

“Go see to your family, Alpha,” she told him firmly. “Michael’s fine. We’ll give the little one a few minutes with his mama, and then we’ll check him over and make sure he’s fine, too.”

Cas’ face crumpled in relief as he gave Missouri a quick hug. He laughed softly at his own emotions, rejoining the others near Michael’s head.

“Alpha?” said Michael. “Would you like to do the honors? Need to count fingers and toes.”

Cas nodded, not trusting himself to speak yet. The pup had lost interest in nursing. Cas took him into his arms, and he laid him gently on his back on an empty portion of the bed at Michael’s knee. April and Dean helped Michael sit up to watch, and Castiel, the M.D., gave the pup his first exam, applying an antibiotic to his eyes and rubbing his skin vigorously with towels to invigorate the pup and help slough of the vernix coating.

“APGAR score, Alpha?” Missouri asked over her shoulder. She was scribbling in a notebook at the counter. Cas ran through the categories swiftly in his head, checking the pup over.

“Eight,” he replied, and he heard Dean sob again in relief. Cas swaddled the pup into a tight cocoon and handed him to Dean. Dean took him mutely, overwhelmed. “He’s got ten fingers,” Cas told him. “Ten toes. He’s all boy, biologically at least. And he’s healthy and strong. You did it, Michael.”
The noise from the hallway had been growing in volume, but it wasn’t until Alpha pronounced the pup hale that the noise of celebration registered.

“Hand him to Gabriel, Dean,” Michael told his mate sleepily. “I want him to be in his uncle’s arms when he hears his name. We need Bobby, if he’s here.”

Dean nodded and handed the pup off to Gabriel, who took him with a confused expression. His face cleared right up once he had the little guy in his arms though. Gabe’s face transformed to wonder, and a tear slipped free. Bobby appeared cautiously at the door and had to be tugged into the room by Ellen.

Seeing that they were both present, Bobby peeking over Gabe’s shoulder with a gentle look of his own, Michael cleared his throat. He held Dean’s hand. He reached for April’s. He smiled at Ellen before turning back to the men

“Gentlemen and Pack,” he announced softly, his raspy voice shredded. “May I present, Alexander Castiel.”

Gabe sucked in a startled breath. Behind him, Bobby reached around and stroked the pup’s cheek, whispering, “Alex.”

***************

20 years later

The full ceremony in Stockholm had been a whirlwind of flashing cameras and glittering dinners. Dean, Cas, Michael, and Benny made it home on the redeye, but they hardly slept for the media clamoring and the colleagues calling to congratulate them. Cas hated that April had missed Sweden, but she was a slave to the schedule far worse than he. She would be in attendance tonight though, flying from Baltimore to Kansas City with Cain and Jimmy.

“No, not in the parlor, man. In the conservatory with Pete’s Grammys.”

“Dean, for the last time, you’re not to call her that. That’s Michael’s pet name. I’m beginning to think you’re pushing me on purpose.” Cas flipped the box in his hand open again and looked at his Nobel medal. He still couldn’t grasp it. The three of them and Bobby posthumously had all been named joint award winners in the ‘Medicine or Physiology’ category, and they would split the cash prize. No one needed to mention that the entire monetary award was going right back into research.

Dean snickered to himself, the lines around his eyes deepening in his humor. “Maybe,” he chuckled. “Gonna do anything about it?”

Cas raised his brow and snatched the case that held Dean’s medal out of his Sub’s hands. “You’re not in charge, Pet,” he reminded his husband. “I am. Go change clothes. We leave in an hour.”

From the foyer, a familiar voice screeched piercingly, “KAT!! Quentin pinched me! KAAAAT!”

Dean caught Castiel’s eye. “It appears they don’t know we’re home,” Cas observed. The little ones never behaved this way in the Alpha’s presence. Despite his greying temples and a rather sleepy tertiary, the Alpha still had bearing.

He stacked the two thin boxes in his hands and handed them both to Dean. Dean followed him into the foyer where Renée came to an abrupt halt on the marble tile. Spotting them both, she burst into tears. Cas scooped her up and kissed her cheek.

“Shush, now. You’re all right. Where did he pinch you?” Cas examined her bicep when she pointed, and sure enough, there was a reddened area that looked fresh to Cas. Kat stormed out of the library, looking very much like she was about to take Quentin’s head clean off his shoulders, but she too pulled up short. Her face softened straight off, and her dark curls jounced as she dove into Dean’s arms.

“I thought you’d be home hours ago,” she grumbled, sounding very much like Michael. “It’s been chaos around here. He’s on a tear again.”

“We had some work to do at the office,” Dean told her.

“And interviews,” she said proudly.

Dean chuckled her under the chin, earning him a scowl and a dodge. For someone not biologically related to Michael, it was a mystery how she inherited all of his mannerisms, right down to his peevishness about being jostled.

“Where’s Quentin now?” Cas asked his daughters.

“Pool house,” the little one replied.

Cas handed her off to her sister. “Get some ice on that for about ten minutes and then see about getting her dressed, please. I’ll find Quent.”

“Papa, he’s been real bad,” Renée announced.

“Thank you, kiddo. I’ll take care of it.”

Dean stood awkwardly in the foyer as they all left him going different directions. He looked down at the boxes in his hands and polled himself.

“Conservatory? Yep, conservatory,” he agreed. He set off down the hall, setting about to make a display of the awards that even Michael wouldn’t find fault with.

Cas slid the glass door to the pool house open and scented the air. He could smell his son’s irritation and upset without even trying. He stepped in and closed the door.

“Quentin? Son, I need you to come out here.”

“Papa!!” Quentin poked his head out of the tiny bedroom in the back and launched himself into Castiel. “Kat said you would be home in the morning! It’s almost night time!”

“I’m sorry, Quent. It was a miscommunication. We didn’t mean to confuse you. Were you waiting for us?”

“All day!” the eleven-year-old told him adamantly, frustration in his voice. Cas set him down in a squashy chair and squatted in front of him.

“We’re home now. We all need to get dressed for the dinner tonight. Everyone’s going to be there, and they’ll want to see all of us on the stage for pictures. Son, I need you to promise me that you’ll stay right with Kat or Jimmy, and that you’ll talk to them using your inside voice if you need to tell them something. You remember how we practiced using our words to get someone’s attention, not our bodies?”

“I remember, Papa.” The pup dodged Castiel’s eye, and that told Cas that he’d not pinched his sister in a fit beyond his control. He knew what he’d done, and he knew it was wrong. As challenging as raising Quentin was, his inability to hide his emotions from his parents was a Godsend that helped them traverse the labyrinth of his needs.

“Quentin Gabriel, look at me.” It took him a moment, and his chin quivered before he was successful, but he got there. “Son, I’m not angry with you. But I expect you to apologize to your sister for pinching her arm, and I expect you to use words next time you have something you need to express.”

The pup’s eyes welled up with tears and he sobbed an apology. Cas chuckled warmly and pulled him in to rock him.

“You don’t owe the apology to me, kiddo. I’m not the one whose arm is red and blotchy. Here, sit up and explain it to me. Why was it necessary to hurt your little sister?”

Quentin lowered his eyes as his Papa sat him upright again. “It wasn’t.”

“That’s right. It wasn’t. It’s never necessary for a puppy to hurt someone’s body. We’ve talked about this numerous times. Were you angry with her?”

The boy nodded miserably, but Cas didn’t let him look away. “Eyes up, Quentin. If you’re going to do it, you can face up to me afterward.”

“Alex left!” he tattled. “He was sposed to stay, but he left! Kat said he was gonna get a spankin when you and Daddy came home.”

“What does that have to do with Renée?” Even under the child’s usual convoluted logic, Cas could normally follow him, but he was lost this time.

“Is he?”

“Is he going to get spanked?”

He nodded vigorously. “Is he?”

“I don’t know the story yet, Quentin. I don’t know why he left, where he went, who he notified. He’s Mated now, champ. His alpha has a say over his whereabouts. Perhaps she needed him. Surely you don’t expect me to start whipping your brother without getting to the bottom of it. And I still don’t understand what it has to do with your little sister. You hurt her, Quent. Tell me why.”

“Renée said that you spank everyone in the Pack who matters. She said that’s how you show you care about them.”

The light blinked on, and Cas nodded his understanding with his lips pressed together. It didn’t come as a surprise that his daughter needed a talk as well. That was usually the case with these two. “And you took that to mean that you don’t matter to me because I don’t spank you.”
The boy looked away again, blushing. He was no more than two years out from Presenting, and he was still so ensconced inside the mind of a child. Cas blew a slow breath out. Pinching his sister was a classic brat provocation, but…no, not this kid. Spanking him had never been an option. He was too sensitive. They’d always found other ways to ease his rising hormone spikes. Also, they had tools now that no one had had ten years ago thanks to Michael and his willingness to offer himself up as a research subject.

“Maybe it would surprise you if I told you that your sister isn’t completely wrong;” he explained carefully, turning the boy’s head with a hand at his chin. His green eyes took on a worried tilt as they danced back and forth between each of Castiel’s, searching for meaning. “But she got it just a little bit wrong, so I need to clarify for you. Think of it like this instead. I give each person in my Pack precisely what they need from me, Quentin, and everyone in my Pack matters. Does it make more sense like that? Sweetheart, Alex is Omega. And he’s not wired the same way you are. Kat’s an alpha. Sean’s a beta. All of you are different. All of you have differences that mean you need something different from me, from O-Pop, from Mom, and from Dad. Even between the four of us, we don’t all give you the same thing. Everyone has their own way of giving to each other. Do you understand?”

“She meant that you don’t love me,” the pup insisted with his bottom lip out in perfect brat mimicry of his father.

“Perhaps, but she’s wrong, champ. I love you with my whole heart. You know that. Why would you let anything someone said about us come between you and me? Didn’t we always say it’s you and me to the ends of the world?”

“Made me mad. She shouldn’t say that.” He dove into Castiel’s arms again, and Cas stroked his hair and rocked him.

“No, son. She shouldn’t have said that. That was wrong. It was hurtful and untrue. Besides, you’re not the only one that would apply to, are you? I don’t spank Kat anymore. Does that mean she doesn’t matter to me?”

He sniffled and rubbed his face against his Papa’s shoulder. Cas ignored it. He was changing soon anyway, and Michael wasn’t here to protest. “Look up, kiddo. Go wash your face. Apologize to Renée. I’ll stand beside you if you need me to. Then put your church suit on and attach yourself to Kathleen or James like you’ve got superglue on you. Tomorrow, you’re cleaning the pool as punishment.”

“Paaa-pa!”

“No complaining. You’re not getting out of it. Complaining will only earn you more of your least favorite chores, and believe me when I say I know what those are. O-Pop keeps a list.”

The pout was back. Jesus, this kid. Green eyes, freckles, and a lower lip that was built for pouting. Cas tried not to smile, but he was hopeless. He chuckled again and hugged his son, cutting off what might well have turned into a test of wills over how many chores Cas could assign before the boy learned to zip it.

“I love you, Quentin. I love Renée too, so don’t go after her with an attempt to one-up her. Now scoot. Get washed up. I’ll meet you upstairs outside her bedroom.”
The dinner was blessedly formal only in dress, really. Everyone in attendance was someone important to the mission, someone who’d been a part of the journey. Everyone here was Pack. Bobby’s medal sat displayed in a place of honor near the podium, on view for those who hadn’t been in Stockholm for the award. The Winchester Pack took up three tables to one side near the front, and the LaFitte Pack had another three on the opposite side. The place between Cas and Michael stayed empty through the salad and soup. She hurried in just as the entrees were served, ruffled and cranky, ditching Cain at the door. He followed her in at a more reserved pace, pausing in the doorway for Jimmy.

All the men rose to greet her, and April took Michael’s proffered hand and let him hand her into the chair Cas pulled out for her.

“I’m so sorry. The plane was delayed, and traffic was a nightmare.”

“It’s all right, Pete. We know. Cain kept us up to date.”

“Mommy!”

“Hey, sugar snap. My, what a lovely dress. What happened to you arm, my goodness!” April took her daughter into her lap and examined the deepening bruise on the back of her arm.

“Quentin pinched me!”

“I see,” said April, looking to Cas. He nodded subtly. April redirected. “Tell me what you’ve been up to while I was away. You practiced our duet?”

“I can play it by heart!” Renée enthused.

“That’s my girl. We’ll play it together when we get home. Then you’re going to tell me everything I missed.”

She had a two-week break, and she needed it desperately. Weeks away from her Pack stretched her like taffy, and she was near to breaking. Her mate let her pepper the pups with questions, but he placed a firm hand on her neck and squeezed. And under the table, on the other side, her husband’s hand rested lightly on her thigh. It was good to be home, despite the bitter disappointment of missing the award ceremony in Sweden.

Castiel had calmed her sternly over the phone, breaking her near devastating drop mid-sentence with a promise to take her absence out of her backside when she returned home. They had penciled in a full scene first thing in the morning. She knew mentally that it wasn’t her fault, that programs involving so many people whose livelihoods depended upon her showing up couldn’t be rescheduled. There could be no substitute performer for a gala like that one, not without it failing spectacularly, but she still felt queasy about missing out on Cas and Dean’s biggest night.

“Stop that,” he said leaning close and fixing her with somber blue eyes. “You’re home now, just like you promised.”

“Besides,” added Dean from Castiel’s far side. “We get tired of you always upstaging us everywhere we go. It was nice to have the limelight on us for a change.”

Cas shot him an irritated look. “Not helping,” he chastised. “You really are pushing, aren’t you?”

After dessert, the speeches began. Three-year-old B.J. squirmed off of Emma’s lap and dove into his mother’s outstretched arms. She wiped his chin and scented his puppy smell. Sitting still through the speeches was going to be a challenge for the three youngest. Michael had Quentin right beside him, par for the course in public. Quentin was always assigned to one of his parents and one of the triplets, all alphas, the two working in tandem to keep an eye on his emotional state. Dean had Renée on his lap, and he was playing Cat’s Cradle with her silently, using both of his shoe strings tied together.

Castiel nudged him with a warning about trying to walk like that, and Dean replied, “I’m a Nobel Laureate, Alpha. I think I can figure out how to walk to the stage.”

“When we get home tonight, Nobel Laureate,” Cas whispered back. “I’m going to strap you for pure cheek.” He patted his husband on the shoulder and turned back to the stage to listen attentively to the rest of Ellen’s speech. Dean shared a faux worried wide-eyed look with his daughter, then put a string-wrapped finger to his lips and continued their game.

When his turn to approach the stage rolled round, Dean wadded the string up and handed it to Renée before walking so very carefully in shoes that were meant to be laced across the top. He didn’t stumble at all, thank the Universe. Dean used his speech to highlight the advancements in Lupin health and societal strength over the past thirty years. From where they were now, back to where they’d started, had been a journey that covered such distance it was tough to remember what they’d once faced. There were still challenges, to be sure, but they knew who they were now in a way they hadn’t even conceived when Dean was a young graduate sharing a beer in a pub with a man he barely knew.

He thanked his family, especially Sam. He thanked the Keller colleagues he’d worked with for so long. He thanked those in attendance who’d been with them through the foundational ACRI years when they had no idea what they were doing beyond trudging toward a lantern on a mountaintop that only Cas could see.

Before he introduced Cas and turned the lectern over to his husband of twenty-one years, Dean insisted the pups join him onstage. He wanted Cas to speak to their colleagues with his family at his back, for they had been right there at his back every step of the way, and they belonged there. Dean got them all around him. Alex stood at his father’s elbow, tall for an Omega, like his O-Pop. Alex’s new mate, Heather, an alpha who’d chosen to join her mate’s Pack even though Castiel had fully expected to sign his son’s papers over to her, stood beside him, looking uncomfortable in the bright lights. The triplets stood scattered about, behind Dean. Kat, the alpha-Dom who seemed to channel the harshest sides of Castiel and Michael at once stood near the back. Jimmy Dean, the studious musician who had a propensity for bringing home Primate boyfriends on the regular and then breaking up with them explosively, had custody of Quentin. Emma, who was easily the most easygoing of the lot stood back of Dean’s left side with B.J. in her arms and her soon-to-be-mate George beside her. If Dean had a doppelgänger in personality among them, it was Emma. The triplets couldn’t have been more different from each other, and yet, each of them favored their parents in obvious ways and subtle.

Then came the twins, Sean and Mary Ellen, M.E. to the Pack, despite the intrinsic confusion that having an Emma and an Emmy in the same family engendered. Where the triplets all seemed to by 19 going on 30, the twins, both betas nearing 16, still clung to the security of their childhoods. Dean suspected he might have to give them each a shove at some point to get them to fledge at all, but it wasn’t time yet. Not just yet. The twins stood right in front on either side of the lectern.

Michael took a comfortable place at Dean’s back, nestled between Quentin and Jimmy. He put an arm over Dean’s shoulder and cinched him in close. Dean made the introductions more for the record than because anyone really needed them. He thanked Michael by name, and he went into detail about how pivotal Michael’s contributions had been, both his intentional works, and his unique capacities that had proven, in the end, to be key to linking their past to their future. Dean’s eyes welled when he thanked Michael for his tireless work: with children, with the community, with the lost and disenfranchised. What the medal before them signified was the search for the whys and hows. Michael, Dean declared, was the embodiment of what to do with the answers they found.

Dean was gratified that their children cheered the loudest when Dean kissed Michael’s lips and handed him Dean’s own medal.

Michael took it with a look of shock on his face. He frowned, looking the medal over and then broke into a grin. “I mean, if you’re sharing, there’s a quarter of a million dollars on the table,” he told Dean with a laugh. Dean rolled his eyes and pulled his mate in to stand at his side.

“Last, but not least, I want to bring up the man who started it all. There’s nothing I can say about him that you don’t already know,” Dean said into the bright lights. “Nothing that won’t get me in trouble, anyway. Cas. Come on up, man. There’s a roomful of folks here who wanna kiss your ass.” Dean stepped back and joined in the applause as Cas stood and straightened his tuxedo, ignoring Dean’s profanity completely. He took a few minutes to stroll around the tables and the wide stage and personally thank all of his children, his spouse, his mate-in-law, his Pack. Cas turned and beckoned to his mate, and she rose gracefully to join him to thunderous applause. B.J. shimmied free of Emma’s grip and stood clutching his mother’s leg through her delicate evening gown. She lifted him to her hip, careful that her sequined front panels didn’t pull or tear. She grinned and shrugged at Cas, and he grinned happily back.

Castiel, the Alpha of great acclaim, needed a moment before he could turn and face the crowd. His breath hitched when Dean took him by the upper arm and mouthed, “You okay?” Cas nodded. His whole Pack was here, even Sarah, back from her stint in Iceland living with a Pack of aboriginals. Sam’s twins bracketed their father. Hank’s firstborn, Luke, sat wide-eyed in his grandmother’s lap, reaching for Castiel up on the stage. Kali sat back in her chair with Gabe sprawling practically on top of her. He looked drunk, but Cas suspected it was jetlag.

Cas looked at Dean and nodded again. “I don’t have words to express this, Dean. How can I begin to tell them all what they mean to me?”

“Don’t worry, Alpha,” Dean told him, raising his voice above the din. “It’s mutual. They know. Just say thanks, man. They know.”

They were still applauding when he turned to the lectern, but as usual, he couldn’t be sure if the cheering was for him or his mate. He grinned into the crowd, struggling to see faces in the darkness. He scented instead. Everyone but Bobby.

“I, um, I need to make sure everyone understands how much the man who isn’t with us any longer did for this species long before any of the rest of us truly knew an alpha from an alpaca. Robert Singer fought in the trenches of this war before I was born. He knew every heartache that any of us face from personal experience, and he chose to make a difference in every way he could. Every Way.” Cas paused to remember. He licked his lips. He looked at the medal spotlighted on a stand by itself.

“Bobby was a father to me, a mentor, a colleague, a subordinate. He and I shared a vision of a world where being a wolf is secondary to being a human. We didn’t always agree on how to get there, but we never disagreed about where we were going. He was a gruff, no nonsense, straight-talker. He was a brat, if you can believe it, if you follow the clinical definition. He was a brilliant physician. He was impulsive and instinctive. He could cut through bullshit faster than a rattlesnake bites. He didn’t suffer fools. He didn’t roll for Submissives. He was a contradiction, and an asshole, and a saint.”
Cas put a hand up to shield his eyes. “I need the house lights up, please. House lights.” It took a moment, but the stage lights dimmed and the ballroom lights came on. Cas took a deep breath. So many people. “I could stand up here and say all kinds of things, but I want you to see it for yourself. To the room, to all of you I say, Bobby Singer personally touched my life and gave me wings I wouldn’t have had without him. Those of you in the audience who can say the same, please stand.” Cas took Dean’s hand as his husband stepped up beside him. In the ballroom, slowly, a few at a time to polite applause, people began to stand. At first, it was only a few, but as they thought it over, more and more realized that they too could say that they owed their wings to Bobby. He’d been sneaky about it oftentimes, but he’d been everywhere, and he knew everyone, and no one left his presence unchanged.

“What it comes to,” he went on when the applause died down, and he let them take their seats again. “Is that our war is unfinished. Every one of us has the power to be Bobby Singer to someone. Every one of us needs that assistance at some point. I believe that in the next two decades, we will have obliterated Omesol poisoning as a Lupin malady. That is my vision. What Bobby saved my brother and countless others from, no Omega will ever need experience again. But that doesn’t absolve us from fighting the war. We shift fronts. Bobby told me again and again, you concentrate your energy on the battle in front of you. Each of us fights the battle that confronts them, and we spread the fight to every front at once, just as Bobby Singer did. What he did alone, we do as a Pack. We are wolves. We don’t ever give up. We never stop fighting.”

It was a good evening. A culmination, and a reboot. Cas thought of his mother. She and Bobby had led similar lives in their youth, but they’d diverged in their choices, and that study of opposites was really all the evidence his kind needed to decide on a direction.

Dean rubbed his burning backside sleepily as he snuggled in beside his mate in the big bed.

“Keep rubbing it, and I’ll start over,” Castiel told him.

“Yessir,” Dean mumbled pulling his hand out from under the blanket.

“It’s good to be home,” April said stretching. “I missed you guys.”

“Where are we sleeping, Alpha? It’s your call,” asked Michael. Dean and April shared a mutual eyeroll. Once a sycophant, always a sycophant. Michael caught Dean’s side of that and slapped his bare ass hard over the white bedspread, earning a stout, “HEY! She did it too!”

“Behave, Winchester,” Cas admonished again. “Michael, would you please do a circle and make sure everyone’s in bed where they belong and no one’s bleeding or crying unexpectedly?”

“Yeah, sure. Be right back. Oh, I almost forgot. Benjamin’s sleeping downhill with Alex and Heather tonight. He was good at the dinner, and I promised him a reward.” Michael crawled backward to get out from between his mate and his wife.
“Good,” said Cas tiredly. “He can pee all over them at three in the morning and wake them up.”

“Yeah, Ben’s reward, but what’d Alex do to earn that kind of punishment?” Dean agreed.

“You two are terrible!” April protested. “That’s our baby boy you’re disparaging. Our very last.”

“Good!” Dean muttered. He watched Cas strip out of his underwear and ditch his socks. His Alpha wasn’t the sleek, toned runner with the physique of a God that he’d once been, but he still cut a delectable figure in the nude. Maybe a little more provocation was called for? Dean looked over at April, gorgeous and winsome as ever, and not yet forty. He winked at her, and she answered him with a flat expression.

“You know,” he said thoughtfully. “B.J. looks more and more like Michael every day. Have you seen the way his eyes glint green when the light hits them from the side? I think they’re shifting.” April’s lip twitched an amused not-smile before she schooled it to serious and sighed heavily.

“Cas, I think you missed a spot on his left thigh.”

“What was that, Dean?” Cas said at the same time. “What about Ben?”

“Oh, nothing… I was just saying he mmmMMPH!…” April tackled him with a pillow, and Dean fell backward on the bed with her straddling his chest and holding the pillow tight over his face. Cas frowned and watched her for a moment.

“Something I should step into?” he asked.

“No, Sir. We’re fine,” she singsonged. Cas rolled his eyes and disappeared into the bathroom to put his cufflinks back in their box.

Dean beat the pillow back and emerged red-faced. He got his hands beneath her thighs and flipped her onto her back. He pinned her, sat heavily on her belly, and began to let a slow, controlled dollop of spit hover over her face while she squealed and fought to get free.

“Dean Michael! That’s disgusting!” Cas reprimanded from the doorway. “Are you seven?”

April sat up laughing, and Dean quickly sucked his spit back into his mouth.

“I’m still telling,” he mouthed to her over Cas’ shoulder on his way to the bathroom. She shook her head patiently.

Cas raised a brow at her, and she giggled. It was an old joke. April had nothing to fear from Cas, even if Ben’s eyes were turning green. Her pregnancy four years ago came as a surprise to everyone, and in the aftermath, both men realized that through one mechanism or another, the pup could be either of theirs. Castiel’s abhorrence of condoms had made him eschew them even at a transitional moment after he gave up tutoring Omegas and weaned himself off the heavy doses of hormonal birth control. Michael was still nursing Renée, and he wasn’t taking any birth control at all. They’d both become complacent. In the hush that followed, they discussed paternity testing, if for no other reason than to be sure which name belonged on the pup’s birth certificate. Their son deserved to know. But they decided to wait. At some point, Benjamin would be old enough to decide for himself whether to request testing. In the interim, Castiel’s name resided on his birth certificate as Pack Alpha and father. It wasn’t wrong. It just might not be entirely right.

Picking at it like a brat was one of Dean’s surest ways to get a response from Castiel. Cas worried that Dean might prick a sensitive scab that the other two didn’t even realize they were vulnerable to. He didn’t want Michael or April to fret over something that didn’t matter one whit to him. Dean knew better. It wasn’t a sore point for any of them. Michael had birthed them three children of his own. Whether B.J. was his or Castiel’s seemed irrelevant all these years later, but the Alpha’s protective guard-keeping was an easy route to stoking him. For a brat.

“Do you want to tell me what’s going on, or do you want me to find a creative way to get to the bottom of it?” Cas asked. His belt lay coiled on the dresser where he’d left it after turning Dean’s ass a brilliant shade of pink just after they got home.

“I owe you anyway, Sir. I’ll pay you in full,” she told him. “I’m not snitch.”

“Is that right?” he asked, stalking toward her with that predatory glint in his eye. Dean emerged again and deliberately cut in front of Cas to slide into the bed, right in the middle.

“If you wanted me to spank you harder, you could’ve simply asked, Pet.” Cas stayed where he stopped, studying them both. Dean stretched his arms over his head and rolled onto his back, flashing his belly at his Dom, and smirking at April.

“I see. All right. On your backs, both of you. Side by side. Hands in the headboard grate. I want the ankles on your inside legs touching. I want the heels of your outside legs tucked over the edge of the bed. Don’t you dare close your legs. You don’t want to talk to me? Fine. You’ve both lost the right to your own voices until the sun comes up. Dean, get your arm out of April’s face. Shuffle over half a foot and stay there.”

Michael came back in, took one look at the scene unfolding before him and noped backward, heading for his own bedroom and a sound eight hours of sleep. The overnight flight, sitting beside a terrified Dean, had left him so drained, the edges of his consciousness were frayed beyond repair without a good night’s rest. He closed the door on his way out.

“All set?” Cas asked conversationally, but neither Sub answered him. They tracked him with their eyes. “I’m going to do, oh, all sorts of diabolical things to you two, and before I’m through, you’re going to be desperate to tell me what you wouldn’t say before you provoked me to action.” He plucked idly at the skin of April’s belly, then the course hair at Dean’s groin. They both sucked a hard breath through their noses. “But you can’t, can you? Your voices are in my custody, and I’m locking them up and putting them in a safe to which only I have the key. Shhh.” He put his finger to his lips and dragged a fingernail up the bottom of Dean’s foot and then April’s. Both Subs flinched and grimaced. Cas looked upward from their feet to their faces. He put a finger to his lips again. He turned and collected his belt from the bureau.

“No noise, now. You don’t want to displease me. Let’s begin.”

Chapter End Notes

Warning for fetal death in-utero.
Warning for detailed description of mpreg childbirth.

I wanna go on record as saying that while the length definitely got away from me, the story, just as it is, came out pretty much how I pictured it, give or take minor scene changes. April’s loss was meant to happen way earlier than it did, and it was meant to be the driving motivation that cements her attachment to Michael. I fucked up the timeline on an accidental whim, and had to traumatize Michael instead to make up the difference. Sorry, Omega. Wrong time and place. Other than that…yup. That’s what I wanted to say. For everyone who commented and everyone who just thought sweet thoughts at me. Thanks. So. Fucking. Much.

End Notes

Kudos and Comments are VERY welcome.

Works inspired by this one: Keller Score Graph for "Caniformes" by Melodina, Caniformes (Übersetzung) by Melodina

Please drop by the archive and comment to let the author know if you enjoyed their work!