“You seem to be recovering well, Lord Slytherin,” one of the few Ladies present remarked with a smile – playing with her jewellery as if to draw attention to the expensive show of wealth – clearly alluding to the incident from earlier this month when he had been gravely injured.

“Healer Greengrass is an expert in his field, Madame,” Marvolo answered with a straight face he had trouble maintaining. It was getting old that everyone felt the need to comment on this episode, so even as it had brought him another wave of sympathy and good press, he now wished the public would let it rest. “And Potions Master Snape is the best I know. So I never doubted I would make a full recovery.”

This month’s big pre-session party was being held at Griffin House, as the other members of the Wizengamot had more or less subtly hinted that they wanted to visit the home of the Slytherin family and the last of the Potters. Currently, a mix of mostly conservative members, with a few of the neutrals and more open-minded liberal members – most called them the light faction – sprinkled into the crowd, were mingling in the rooms Marvolo had the elves prepare for this occasion.

“What is this?” Lord Hawkworth – one of those conservatives he had never approached, as the family wasn’t influential enough – inquired, waving one hand negligently at an unframed painting proudly displayed on an elaborately carved stand in one corner of the room.

Marvolo walked over, after excusing himself from his current conversation partner. He had placed the picture there deliberately. After all, it was a picture Henry had created with his own hands and sent to Marvolo. He quite liked the winding knot of snakes his son had painted, the selection of colours, the composition… it was a little rough along the edges, but to Marvolo’s eye – he had trained himself in the arts to fit in with the pure-blooded elite – it held the promise of a great artist.

“This, Lord Hawkworth, is the depiction of a pile of snakes, as one can find where they try to conserve warmth, or when males compete for one female… Why do you ask?” he spoke to the sneering man, nonchalantly brushing along the edge of the stand, smiling over the gift he had been given by his son.

“It’s a muggle painting!” the old Lord – easily in his seventies – almost shouted in disgust. “It’s not moving!”

A brow rose slowly towards Marvolo’s carefully styled hair. “Have you ever spent any time considering what goes into the making of one of our portraits, landscapes, or still lives?” The younger Lord asked sarcastically. “No?” They were attracting a steadily growing audience, and the still sour-looking Lord Hawkworth was deflating by the second. “Then let me educate you.” Marvolo didn’t even try to keep the condescending tone out of his voice. “There is a Guild of Painters with offices in most major magical settlements around the world. They guard the magic needed to animate paintings, give them some resemblance of life, quite fiercely, and only accept those witches and wizard into their ranks who are already displaying an affinity for the art of painting."

Turning a little to the painting, gesturing at it with a proud expression, Marvolo changed his stance to address the others now all gathered in this corner of the room. “This was painted by my son, Henry, and he sent it to me. I’m contemplating how best to frame it. Lucius,” Marvolo turned to the blond man standing next to Benjamin and Xerxes, “can you recommend a good artisan to frame a picture?”

“Of course I can, Marvolo,” Lucius nodded his head as he was considered whom, of the many he knew, he should recommend. “Do you have a particular style in mind? If so, I certainly can get the right contact for you.”

There were some murmurs over the tactless old Hawkworth, some compliments to be forwarded to the artist, and then more talk about the proposals to be discussed in the next meeting.

Hawkworth was a thorn in their flesh when it came to getting laws passed. Still feeling resentment over being ignored by Voldemort and his Death Eaters in the past, at being dismissed as unimportant and useless to their goals, now the Lord used every opportunity to take his petty revenge.

Maybe it was time for the old man to give his seat over to his son, who was much more sympathetic to the young Lord Slytherin… Well, if this were to happen, it would need some careful planning and manipulation. The man still did not have much influence and so was no real threat, and there was so much to do at the moment already. It probably was not worth the risk he would have to take if he were to act soon. No need to rush.

Smiling, Marvolo played the gracious host for the rest of the afternoon and early evening. Socializing in this fashion was at the same time exhausting and refreshing. He really had missed this at the end of his last war.

“You like the picture?” Harry asked a little surprised, not sure what to feel. Marvolo just had told him about the evening before when he had entertained a group of Wizengamot members at their home, gleefully retelling how he had shamed that one Lord for his trying to make Marvolo look bad for displaying a picture that had not been animated.

A surprised look flitted over the handsome face of his guardian in the communication mirror. “Why shouldn’t I like your picture, Henry? It is very well done, and that snakes are the subject matter only adds to the appeal for me.” Before Harry could regain enough of his wits to answer to this, Marvolo went on. “Do you have a suggestion where we might hang it? I have sent it to be framed by a French artisan – an expert in his field, as far as Lucius knows – and it should be back soon.”

Blinking a moment at the expectant face, Harry’s thoughts were scrambling. “Uhhh… what's with the space in between the door to the music room and the library?” Harry suggested, not really sure if those two rooms were on the same floor, and if the space he had in mind – between two doors to whatever rooms – was even big enough to fit the picture.

Tapping one finger to his chin in thought, Marvolo contemplated a moment, before he answered decisively. “I think it might be best if we look for a fitting place together, once you are back for the Yule break. Or what do you think?”

Nodding, a little off balance, Harry just agreed. “Yeah, we can do that.”

“Speaking about the holidays, have you made any plans to meet with friends? Because you are expected to accompany me to several social functions as my heir. You are excused from most of them, because you are at school.” The other wizard made a face, startling a nervous laugh out of Harry, which earned him an eye-roll. “I will remind you the first season after you graduate and all the mothers start pestering you. I will have to dodge witches left and right, starting at the end of November. And probably fend off offers for marriage contracts between their family and ours.” A sigh made its way over to Harry, and he was glad that Marvolo wouldn’t insist on arranging a marriage for him.

With a start, Harry realized that Marvolo was waiting for an answer to his question. “I’ve made no plans so far. It hasn’t come up. We're all too much involved in homework and classes. We have Quidditch training three times a week…” Harry trailed off, wondering whom he would like to meet during the holidays. He certainly would like to get away from Marvolo for a time if he could manage, but what would the Weasleys think of his visiting? They had offered in the past, but would they again?

“The first game will be the first weekend in November between Slytherin and Gryffindor, right?” Marvolo asked, changing the topic slightly.

Harry nodded, enthusiasm overriding his tiredness for the moment. “Yes, we all look forward to it. It’s too early to know how the weather will be, but we're training for several different scenarios. At the moment we mostly train to get Ron up to speed. He's really good when he feels like no one’s watching… that probably will be a problem, though.”

“I will tell Barty to keep the day free of appointments. I really want to see you playing. It has been quite some time since I have watched a game of Quidditch. And longer still since I felt that it would be more than an obligation.” Marvolo seemed really interested and Harry felt compelled to make a snarky remark.

“And will you sit in the Gryffindor stands, wearing Gryffindor colours, sir?” Harry tried to picture this and had real trouble with the idea.

A smirk appeared on the youthful face under crimson eyes. “I guess your friends will prefer if no adult sits among them. I plan to sit with the faculty. As for which team I will cheer on, I admit to being in a tight spot. Cheering for Slytherin would be appropriate because the House is named after our family, founded by our ancestor. On the other hand, you are the Seeker of the Gryffindor team, and not cheering for the team my son plays on would be odd. I guess I will have to cheer for neither, or for both teams.”

Harry had to concede that this could work. “I still have an essay for charms to finish. So…”

“You wish to end our call.” Marvolo nodded and sighed. “I probably should finish on my own homework. Think about what you want to do during the holidays. I think we should visit some of your family’s businesses, you should tell me if you have any preferences. For now, have a good evening.”

They finished their call and Harry stood from his bed to walk over to his desk. He placed the mirror into the drawer and picked up the folded piece of parchment he had been moving around since the summer.
The day he had been adopted and Marvolo had explained how life was to continue from then on, Harry had written questions on this piece of parchment. Questions he had wanted to ask of the Headmaster. Until now he hadn’t had the time or opportunity to do so, but the pure act of writing them down had shaken his belief in the Headmaster and his motivations. If that had been Marvolo’s plan at the time, it had worked out pretty well.

But it had felt like a spur-of-the-moment decision. Looking back, Harry wasn’t so sure that he remembered everything correctly. He had been under the influence of a calming potion, and pretty distracted besides.

Harry smoothed the parchment out, looking at the few questions he had written down then. He still didn’t have the answers to these, but wasn’t sure if he even still wanted them. With the way the man had reacted to the pranks that had been played on him – or to the murder attempt – it was pretty obvious that Albus Dumbledore did not have Harry’s best interest in mind when making his decisions.

Marvolo probably was the same, having his own agenda behind his actions, but considering his actions so far – the emergency portkey, the vow, the mind-healer, daily talks over the mirror – his agenda seemed to include Harry's being healthy, informed, and reasonably happy.

Thinking back to his dreams of someone coming and taking him away from the Dursleys from the time before he got his Hogwarts letter, the way Marvolo treated him came pretty close to what he had dreamed of.

He actually had sent the picture he had painted to be framed, wanted to display it somewhere in their home. Wanted Harry to help find a good place to hang it… Refolding the parchment Harry decided that he would use an opportunity to ask for answers if he ever got one, but that he wouldn’t try to create an opportunity. At this time there wasn’t much the Headmaster could say or do to compensate for his past actions.

It was a little ironic, considering that Marvolo had rated a second chance after killing his parents and making him an orphan in the first place. But Dumbledore had been the one to place him with the Dursleys, had never checked up on him, and had sent him back even after he had asked to stay somewhere else. He could have checked then, couldn’t he?

Abandoning that train of thought, Harry sat down to get started on the essay he had planned out earlier in the library. Ron wasn’t approving of the group's new study habits and had started to spend time with Seamus and Dean whenever he felt he could get away with waiting a bit longer before finishing his homework.

Hermione was starting to despair, and Harry was unsure how to help his friends find a good middle ground. Hermione could get rather obsessed with studying, but Ron tended to slack on his work, doing only the least he needed to pass. There was no easy way to bring those two attitudes under one hat.

They walked from the room upstairs down to one of the bigger studies, leaving behind a raging Bellatrix, despite the calming draught Greengrass had administered when she didn’t cooperate with the Squib Mind-Healer.

Rodolphus was at his wit’s end. Had been for a long time now. Even before their Lord’s fall and their long stay at Azkaban, he had known his wife had fallen prey to the infamous Black madness. In a way he was happy that they never had had children. Not only because they would have had to leave them behind when they had been sentenced to Azkaban for life, but also because they would have been prone to inherit the same unstable mind.

He trailed behind the others through the dreary hallways, resigning himself to losing for good the woman he once had loved. In a way he had lost her a long time ago, but to finally accept it and move on was different from just knowing it.

They reached the room, sat down around a small table, and filled their cups with the tea appearing on it moments after they had all found their seats. Rodolphus got big eyes watching his Lord add three spoons heaped with sugar to his tea. It was the first time he saw the man drink tea or eat at all. He never would have guessed the Dark Lord liked his tea overly sweet.

Shaking his head, he focused his attention back to the conversation taking place.

“If there is a way to help Mrs. Lestrange, then it is a long and involved process.” The Mind-Healer gave her explanation to the whole group turned in the direction of the Dark Lord, Xerxes and Rodolphus mere spectators even when the whole affair concerned them more than almost anyone else.

“If I had only the use of non-magical remedies, I would put her under medication to counter her manic mood swings. Then I would try to determine if she experiences auditory or visual hallucinations. Depending on this, there would be a need for extensive therapy. Talking mostly… but as she is clearly not inclined to participate in any form of therapy for her state of mind… I’m not sure it is possible to help her back into life as an independent individual.” She looked almost neutral, but Rodolphus was almost certain that he had seen a flicker of fear in her eyes. He was sceptical that any muggle method of healing could help at all, but his Lord had said that muggles had advanced in the care for ailments of the mind further than their healers had. There was even talk among the Death Eaters that the same woman regularly met with their Lord’s heir to help him cope with all the changes.

Rodolphus didn’t think that … well, maybe he ought to change his perception of these things, if he wanted to remain useful to his Lord. It was clear to Rodolphus that the Dark Lord gave Madame Goyle the same respect as Healer Malcolm Greengrass.

“I could get medical studies and samples of medication for you, Lord Slytherin, if you want a Potions Master and Healer to look for a magical adaption. That is all I can say and offer, sir.” The woman fell silent, leaving a strained absence of sound in the room.

“Thank you, Healer Goyle.” the Dark Lord said, seemingly deep in thought. “Your nephew will take you back home. If your expertise is needed again, I will contact you.”

Through the words exchanged between the Healer and his Lord and his father, Rodolphus sat in his seat idly tracing patterns on the leather of his armrest, thinking. His Lord had spun plans to find new lives for all of them that had been in Azkaban, as he had done for Barty. The young wizard was happy in his position as the assistant of Lord Slytherin, planning the wizard’s social calendar, handling the daily owl-mail, and moving freely amongst the British magical community once again. His and Rabastan’s bodies would be among the first to be found, they both were planning and considering different possible new lives, but as they had still a lot of healing to do, there was time left before they would step back into the open.

“Well, that was informative, but sadly not really a solution, now, was it?” Xerxes sighed, settling back into his own chair, rubbing a hand over his eyes.

Rodolphus looked up in time to see the Dark Lord empty his cup and nod. “You are right, Xerxes, but looking back on her behaviour in the past, and what I have seen in the last weeks, I didn’t really hope that there would be an easy solution.” Dark red eyes moved calculatingly between Rodolphus and his father. “I propose that we give Severus’ new potion, that we give to the kids, a try. It might help her, but if it doesn’t, I have a plan in mind how she might still be an asset for our cause.” In a rare – no, a previously unseen – show of vulnerability, the Dark Lord slumped back in his chair, closing his eyes, and took a deep breath. “If one of you has a better idea, I’m all ears.”

The eyes of father and son met over the table, both equally tired and resigned to the fact that Bella was most likely a lost cause. Waving to his father, signalling that he should be the one to say it, as the Head of their Family, Rodolphus emptied his cup of tea, before refilling the delicate china with steaming tea, adding cream and a dash of rum from a small flask he carried around with him.

It might not be wise, but he needed a little drink.

“If a dose of the potion is ready, I think we should get to it. With the young children coming from less-than-desirable situations it works pretty well. I’m not sure it will work so well on Bellatrix, but we certainly should try.”

“Well, let’s get to it.” With decisive force the Dark Lord pushed himself out of his seat and walked to the door, rightfully expecting his Death Eaters to follow, as they did only seconds later.

24th of October

It had been a few days since Bella had taken the potion created by Severus. They had had to force her to drink it, making use of the Imperius curse so as to make sure that she wouldn’t choke on it or be otherwise bodily harmed.

Her behaviour hadn’t changed till now and probably wouldn’t. She was still insisting that she wanted to go hunt Mudbloods and Muggles, begging her Lord to let her go out and fight for him and his goals. Of course he declined her offers and begging, telling her she still wasn’t healthy 足够的 not to be a liability in a fight.

But Marvolo felt decidedly better about the whole thing now. Healer Goyle’s assessment of Bellatrix and the fact that they had given her the potion... that he had exhausted every avenue of action available to him, appeased his half of the bond between liege and vassal.

He might have brought the severe situation on her by indulging her madness and even pushing her farther along into the depths, until she went after a pair of Aurors after he had vanished. But now he had done all he could think of to rectify the situation.
What to do next? Should he imprison her himself? Hand her over, claiming she had come running to his door? Whatever he would decide, it was common courtesy to ask her husband for ideas first.

So he had summoned Xerxes and his two sons to his study at Headquarters and was now waiting for them. Plans spread around him, Marvolo worked until there was a knock on his door.

“Come in!” he called out, waving his hand over the parchments, papers, and maps, sorting them into neat stacks at the side of his desk.

“My Lord.” Three men had entered, going to one knee in proper greeting. A surge of satisfaction coursed through Marvolo. He really liked the reverence given to him. He had worked long and hard to be acknowledged in this way. Another feeling he had lost due to his mangled soul.

“Rise,” he ordered, standing himself to walk over to the nicer seating area in front of the fireplace. “I called you here to discuss the fate of Bellatrix.” A lazy wave with his hand indicated the others should take a seat and they did. First Xerxes sat across from Marvolo in the other wingback chair, leaving his two sons to take the love seat facing the fire.

After Marvolo had called for refreshments – tea and small cakes with an apple filling – he looked over to the youngest Lestrange. “All attempts to help your wife regain her sense have failed. If neither of you has any more suggestions on how to help her, I feel it is time to decide how to prevent her from doing any harm to our plans.”

One look at Rodolphus, and Marvolo knew that there would be no resistance from the wizard if he should propose handing Bella over, or even killing her.

“I’m unsure what we should do, my Lord,” the considerably recovered wizard said, choosing his words with care. “She obviously is beyond hope, if it is possible to gain something from the situation, we should use it. Maybe she can be included in the plan that will result in us two being declared dead?”

Nodding slightly, Marvolo turned his attention to Xerxes and Rabastan, silently asking for their input. Not getting any response. The both of them didn’t seem to have any idea either.

“There is one other concern to consider.” Now it was for Marvolo to select his words with care. He didn’t want to reveal his method of immortality to more people if he could avoid it. “Before that night I gave something of great value into her care with instructions to place it into a vault at Gringotts. I’m not sure where she placed it and would like to get it back as soon as possible.”

“A golden cup with two handles?” Rodolphus asked, getting a nod from Marvolo in answer. “I saw her pack it into her pocket one day we had planned to visit the bank. I think she placed it in her personal vault. One of the smaller vaults, traditionally used by the wives of Lestrange men.”

“So only she can access it?” Marvolo frowned. That would be a problem. As long as she was alive, there was no way the goblins would let anyone access the vault but her. They really relished every opportunity to make the lives of wizards harder if they could get away with it. So maybe it would be better if Bellatrix was found dead?

Xerxes leaned forward, bracing his arms on his legs. “If I remember correctly, there was a stipulation in the marriage contract regarding the obligation to provide at least one child. If there had been wilful hindrance of having a child on her part, it would have been grounds for a divorce or for demanding compensation.” He looked apologetic towards his sons. “It was something I insisted on, because I didn’t trust her nature. She never seemed like a woman interested in being a mother, but I wanted to make sure they would have at least one child. Now I still wish for my sons to have a family, but with Hermione, the pressure to continue the family is not as great.” This information was new to Marvolo, but considering what-all he had deemed unimportant at the time, it was no wonder he hadn’t asked or forgotten what he had been told about the marriage between the two.

“I could claim everything she has in compensation for the violation of that stipulation. So it would be sure that the contents of her vault will not go back to the Blacks. It might take some time, but I think this is the safest way,” Xerxes continued, while Rabastan levitated the second pastry to his plate without moving from his seat.

“It sounds like a viable way. Maybe it would be best if you started the process now, citing the discovery of your heiress as the reason you finally move to cut ties with her…” There had been some whispering about Xerxes’ reluctance to cast his sons out of the family and to dissolve the marriage. The first was more or less accepted, because that would cut off all possible bastard children as well. But that Bellatrix was still a Lestrange was something that caused some raised eyebrows in society.

“So she can be the scapegoat for the next planned reduction of the escapees?” Rabastan wanted to know.

“That would be best. I have a place in mind, and we should use the bodies soon, or they will start to decay. If I start with altering Bella’s memories tonight, we can set the events in motion fairly soon.”

Planning was swift from there, and the next few days saw gossip about the decision of Lord Lestrange to finally remove Bellatrix Lestrange, born Black, from the family. Some were suspicious of why he had decided to do so now, and some were happy that he finally no longer felt the need to keep the woman in the family, hoping for an heir despite all odds.

Marvolo worked diligently over a longer period of time on altering Bella’s memories to match a wild chase through France, discord between the escapees, and a heated discussion getting out of hand.

Soon the number of escapees would drop some more, hopefully helping calm the almost frantic search for them.

Severus had spent the entire morning cleaning up his quarters. Of course there was no actual dirt or dust anywhere, as the Hogwarts house-elves were a diligent bunch, but there had been old potions magazines in odd stacks on different flat surfaces, some overly long extra essays lying about… In short, a level of disarray most would have named clean, but did unnerve Severus.

Especially as Sonja would be visiting today.

After a last look around his rooms – nervously ignoring the spotless bedroom – Severus made his way down to the edge of the wards so he could apparate to London and collect Sonja from her home.

The moment she stepped out of her flat, smiling, Severus felt an answering smile spread over his face. It was a feeling he was growing more accustomed to by the day.

“Severus! I’m so excited to finally get to see Hogwarts!” They embraced, exchanging a chaste and short kiss, before stepping back so they could look each other in the eye. “And I’m a little nervous. Why does the Headmaster want to meet me?”

Severus sighed, hooking her hand in the crook of his arm, his other hand firmly grasping her hand. “I guess he is mostly curious who the woman is who has finally found my heart. And it is very likely he fears to lose his spy, as he used my continued attachment to my childhood love to pressure me into doing his bidding.” Severus explained while they walked slowly to a secluded spot often used for apparation because it was out of the way.

“So what should I say, how should I act to make it easier for you?” Sonja asked, anticipating his need for her cooperation so as not to complicate the delicate balance he had with Albus Dumbledore.

“Try not to meet his eyes. He is an exceptional Legilimens, and has no qualms using this ability against everyone if it suits his needs. Other than that... be yourself. I wouldn’t demand that you act a certain way just to make my life easier.” Severus would love to watch Sonja and Dumbledore go head to head over some of the topics he knew they would never agree on.

Sonja smiled up at him with mischief in her eyes. “But what if I want to act so I will make your life easier, Severus? Would you provide me with the information I need to do so if it is my wish?”

A dark head was inclined in defeat. If she wanted to protect him, it wasn’t his place to deny her the chance. “If you want to make my life easier, you shouldn’t let him see that you are open to exploring all kinds of potions – dark as well as light – you shouldn’t bring up things that reflect badly on him, and should appear suspicious of all that is termed dark by the Ministry and those that proclaim to be the epitome of Light.”

Her laughter filled his ears. She was obviously delighted by his list of things that would make Albus Dumbledore suspicious. Or the face Severus had made while listing them. It was hard to tell.

“He’s pretty shallow in his world view, isn’t he?” Sonja asked, not waiting for an answer before she continued. “I will do my best to stick to the image of a light-oriented potions enthusiast. So, take me to your home, now that you have seen mine.”

“I haven’t actually been in your flat,” Severus remarked with a smirk on his face. They had danced around this topic a few times, neither in a rush to advance their relationship in this direction.

“Ready?” The Potions Master asked his fiancée before spinning into the thin tube of apparation at her nod.

The village of Hogsmeade looked quite cosy, as it had the first time she had been here, but today Sonja didn’t only go to the Three Broomsticks, or one of the shops with potions ingredients, or books. No, today she would get to see Hogwarts for the first time.
Walking at a leisurely pace alongside Severus, up the hill and past the train station, Sonja asked her partner about his lessons, why he taught the potions the way he did, if they were taught in a particular order. And other questions along this line.

When the castle came into view the first time, Sonja stopped and brought Severus to a stop beside her.

“It’s beautiful, isn’t it?” Severus spoke into her ear, leaning down to her, inhaling as if savouring her scent.

“Magnificent!” she breathed, briefly wondering what a Muggle would see, standing here. She had read, and Severus had told her, that there were spells layered into the wards to let the castle appear as a ruin should a non-magical person lay an eye on it. “Will we be living here?”

“If you want to. And if I’m still a professor here once we are married. We will see…” There was no uncertainty in Severus’ smooth dark voice, but she agreed with him that the times were turbulent, and it was quite possible that all would change for Severus with his position as a spy.

They made their way over the grounds towards the school, not seeing many students out and about. It was a rather cold day, so it wasn’t really surprising.

What was surprising was that the Headmaster was waiting for them in the entrance hall – big enough to fit an entire house in, much to Sonja’s surprise – smiling overly bright.

“Severus, my boy, who is the lovely lady at your side?” The old man had opened his arms as if he wanted to embrace them, blue eyes behind half-moon spectacles twinkling like mad. Feeling Severus stiffening beside her, Sonja fixed a bright smile on her face, avoiding eye contact by inspecting the interesting surroundings.

“Sonja, darling, may I introduce the Headmaster of Hogwarts, Albus Dumbledore. Headmaster, my fiancée, Sonja Jiggers.” Sonja only briefly looked at the Headmaster, shaking his hand, before once again looking around.

“Yes, the castle is rather magnificent. I know the Jiggers Family, but I don’t remember you attending our lovely school…” And there was a gap to fill in, as Severus had told her several times, a habit the old wizard seemed to have, using it often, probably because most people couldn’t stand leaving gaps, or perhaps even thinking they were giving an elderly man help with telling him something he had known but since forgotten.

“That is because I didn’t, Headmaster. This is my first visit here, and Severus has promised me a tour of the castle and his lab.”

They managed to ditch the Headmaster after they had been to the owlery and the astronomy tower. It seemed the old wizard was decent enough to let a young couple in love have a little privacy to kiss – Severus wouldn’t tolerate her calling it snogging – and enjoy the view. And it was a nice view, even when the days were getting shorter and more dreary by the day.

“So we can make a tick by snogging on the astronomy tower on the list.” the young Squib said on their way down, a spring in her step and a smile on her slightly reddened face.

“What list?” Severus asked a little suspicious.
“The list I made of things to do in Hogwarts, together with you, my love.” The look he gave her for this had her giggling, which made his lips twitch. “You wanted to show me your lab and the potion you're working on?”

Taking her hand in his, entwining their fingers, he nodded, getting them walking again. “Yes, I have the base finished and would like us to test it if you agree.” The lilt of his voice made a question out of the last sentence.

With a soft smile, Sonja stepped into Severus’ way, rose to her toes, and gave her grumpy Potions Master a small, chaste kiss. “I will gladly help you with your experimentation, and will test it together with you. And then we will have a nice private meal in your quarters?”

By the time the third group of students broke out in heated whispers once the couple walking hand-in-hand had passed them, a scowl was etched into Severus’ face. “My reputation is going to go to hell,” he sighed.

“Nonsense!” Sonja interrupted his morose statement. “They will learn that the fact that you let one person get close will not change your personality. Or do you think I will have such a deep effect on you?”

He gave her a kiss. “You are changing me and my life, don’t ever doubt that. But I agree that having you in my life will not change my professor persona one bit.”

Once they reached the private potions laboratory, they started to discuss Severus’ attempts at brewing a potion geared to identifying the probability of a couple having magically gifted children of good health. It was a lively discussion about alternative stirring patterns, whether to use scarab-eyes or the brightly coloured forewings of the beetles, if a simple pewter cauldron was better or if an iron one would yield better results.

Later that evening Severus brought Sonja home again and came back into his rooms. A small cauldron containing a royal blue potion no longer bubbling – that, according to Severus' theory, would indicate a high chance of magical children for him and Sonja – was waiting in the lab to be cleaned up. But for now, Severus would sit down on the love seat Sonja and he had snogged on – evidently another of the items on the ominous list – sipping on a small tumbler of fine whiskey, basking in the good memories of the last hours.

As Sonja had managed to dodge the Headmaster's attempts to get more information out of her directly, he probably would tap into his sources and probably would get the information he wanted rather quickly. That would result in another meeting with the old meddler. If the man could just stop calling him my boy it would be easier to put up with him and his demands.

As soon as his Lord’s heir and Lily’s son graduated, he would resign from his post and spend his time with his family and research.

It was a lovely dream, and it felt good to finally have one again.

28th of October
Against the roaring flames, the stars of the night sky were invisible. It seemed that far too many people were milling about, keeping the gaping crowd at bay, drenching the surrounding forest with water to keep the hot burning fire from spreading.

It was an eerie scene, illuminated by the flickering red light of the fire and the flashing blue lights of several vehicles, the only sounds that of the fire, water being pumped, and people yelling, creating a deafening cacophony.

Percy’s French wasn’t good, but he had caught a few words here and there which led him to believe the muggles assumed that there was some substance in the house making the flames that hot and impossible to extinguish with water. Rolling his eyes, the red-head in a suit – he was in possession of one since he had started working at the Ministry, anticipating the need to interact with the Muggle Government sometime – snorted exasperatedly. Of course this fire was not the result of some silly chemical, but some really powerful dark magic. It wasn’t quite Fiendfyre, but it was dark enough that the casting had alerted the French Ministry. Calling several aurors to the scene.

Once they had seen the woman dancing around the burning two-storey house, laughing like mad, they had alerted the British. Percy had been appointed the contact for the French Ministry in the case of the fleeing Death Eaters who had been seen in various places around France right at the beginning at the whole debacle. At first Percy had been reluctant, but he quickly realized this was a chance to repair some of the damage his career had taken, due to the disaster that the Tri-Wizard Tournament had been. He already knew some of the people he would have to work with, and his French was getting better. So who else would be able to do this job right?

Looking down to the bound witch near him, rocking back and forth on her knees, eyes glued to the devastation started by the wand they had found on her, Percy was glad two Aurors were standing next to her. He wasn’t confident that he would have been able to contain Bellatrix Lestrange even in her clearly deranged state.

They would take her back to Britain as soon as the Minister – the French and the British – had approved the portkey to do so, but Percy would remain behind, coordinating the evidence-gathering. There were several fading apparition trails that needed to be followed, and who knew what they would find in the house once the fire was under control. If there was anything left at all.

With a sigh, Percy resigned himself to a long night and several long days to follow.

House burns down in south France!

That was the blaring headline of the Prophet on Monday morning. Hermione read snippets of the article to the Gryffindors sitting around her, Harry only listened with one ear while he contemplated the mirror call with his guardian from the evening before.
Marvolo had informed him that there would be news of one Death Eater captured and several killed the next morning. And he had informed Harry that it was a front to give those supposedly killed a way to start their lives from scratch.

Harry wasn’t sure how he felt about this. The fact that he had been told as well as the fact that it had happened, that Marvolo was planning such things, and that he had told Harry about it. It was hard. On the one hand, Harry longed to trust someone, wanted a family, someone to care about him and not only because he was the friend of one of their children. On the other hand, it felt wrong that he seemed to have found what he wished for with the murderer of his parents, a wizard still plotting murder and the breaking of laws.

“They have found three bodies in the house, or what they think are the remains of three bodies. Currently they aren't sure if all three belong to the escapees, but the remains are large enough to belong to adults.” Hermione was distinctly green around her nose and didn’t touch her food again during breakfast that day.

“Good riddance!” Dean commented between bites of scrambled eggs. “When the Aurors wait long enough, the problem will solve itself!” A few of the Gryffindor boys laughed at that, but Hermione looked sceptical.

“I don’t think that it'll work that way,” Hermione said, folding the paper and handing it over to Parvati, who was reaching for it from further down the table. “It’s strange to think that that woman is related to me, even if only by marriage, and cousins once removed… still.”

“Don’t think too much about it, ‘Mione!” Ron said from across the table, after swallowing a large mouthful of bacon and fried mushrooms. “You are a Gryffindor, after all, nothing like that insane witch or those two brothers.”

Hermione got her notes for this day’s classes out of her bag, ignoring the speculation starting up around them. A smart move on her part, at least in Harry’s opinion, because he knew the feeling of being torn between two halves of oneself. Well, that was the way he often felt, it was quite possible that Hermione didn’t have that same problem. Xerxes Lestrange had a pretty tame official face, even if the family had a tainted reputation.

“Hey, Potter.” someone said, standing behind Harry’s back. Harry turned half on the bench so he could see who was talking to him. It was one of his year-mates from Ravenclaw, Terry Boot, standing there, looking rather excited. “Hey, Boot. And it's Slytherin-Potter, now.” It would look odd if he let it go, were someone to call him by only part of his name. There were so many rules of etiquette to follow, Harry wasn’t quite sure how he had managed to get so many of them into his head over the short time he had had lessons this summer.

“Whatever!” the other boy waved away the correction on how to address his classmate. “I noticed a note on the board in the common room this morning. You and Granger are starting a duelling club? What do you plan to teach?”

“Well, with the change in Defence Professor in the middle of the first term, and the theory-heavy approach the new professor has, we thought that having a safe place to practice for our OWL exams would do us all good. As for what we'll be teaching… I thought it would be mostly useful, versatile spells that can be helpful in many situations.” In fact, Harry had started to compile a list of spells he thought would be the most helpful to learn, while Hermione was compiling a list of spells that were known to be asked for quite often in the practical OWL exams.

“Useful in many situations? Like what, exactly? We had the same set of professors, Potter, what could you two teach the rest of us?” The other boy seemed quite sceptical, and Harry had to concede that it was a point Boot had there.

“Last year I needed to know a lot of spells not normally taught in fourth year. Hermione did the research, and we practiced a long time to get them all right. I survived the tournament…” Harry had no intention of going into any depth here, “and learned a lot about learning from books. Professor Flitwick will be the sponsor, and you don’t need to take part if you think it will be a waste of time.” Harry tried to sound unconcerned, but felt the uncertainties raise their head. He had feared that there might not be any interest from students in their club when Hermione had first proposed the idea.

“I already placed my name on the list,” another voice joined the conversation. “Even if only a fraction of the stories being told are true, the two of them will be wonderful teachers.”

Harry gave Theo a friendly smile, his Slytherin friend was a good diplomat. A much better one than either Ron or Hermione.

“And if you still doubt all those rumours, Boot, then you might consider the attack from earlier this year. There were people on the ground casting stunners at Harry. He dodged them on his broom and managed to take them down. I certainly think that I can learn something from him.”

Boot nodded and left without another comment as one of the other Ravenclaw boys called for him.

“I still think we shouldn’t let all the Slytherins into the club,” Ron muttered loud enough to be heard clearly by all in the vicinity.

As Harry knew it would, this comment – made more than once and now slightly amended not to exclude all Slytherins on principle – set off Hermione into another of her infamous rants about the rules. “Don’t start again, Ron! I’ve already told you that an official school club can only be restricted by class level, not House! We could have said only third-years and up, or only those fifth-year and under. But not all but Slytherins!” Theo had a smirk on his face and Harry rolled his eyes at his friend, turned back to the table and continued with his breakfast.

“But we have four Quidditch teams! So clearly there is a way to have a club only for part of the Houses!” Ron wasn’t going to give in this easily. He had made it quite clear that he would have preferred a secret club, so they could have excluded whomever they wanted.

Nudged on his shoulder, Harry scooted a little further down the bench to make room for Theo. “So what do you plan to do in your first lesson?” The lanky teenager wanted to know, selecting an apple from one of the plates filled with fruit, clearly intending to finish his breakfast at the Gryffindor table.

“I thought to start with the disarming charm. You know, the one Professor Snape used against Lockhart? I’ve come to appreciate it quite a bit. It might seem simple but we’ll have a rather mixed group… probably.”

The rest of breakfast was over quickly, filled with planning and bouncing ideas for the Defence club off Theo, while in the background Ron and Hermione were bickering about the purpose behind the rules governing the school. It almost felt like a normal day, if he managed to ignore all the speculation about the fire in the south of France.
31th of October - Halloween

At breakfast Minerva sat down next to Severus, filling her cup with freshly brewed tea, looking on in fascination as Severus added a spoon of honey to his coffee. It was a little funny that he was the only one she knew that drank his coffee this way. There were, in fact, not many wizards and witches who drank coffee in Britain. Severus just was the exception to most unwritten rules.

When finally all the professors had made it to the table, Minerva cleared her throat to get her colleagues' attention. “I want to remind you all that Mr. Slytherin will not attend classes today, as his guardian has arranged for a day off for him. He will be back after dinner.”

Most of the others just nodded – they had heard this in the last faculty meeting, after all – but Albus looked a little surprised. “How is it possible that I am only now hearing of this? We can’t make such exceptions for single students, Minerva. Why wouldn’t young Harry take part in the festivities? We shouldn’t let Tom force the boy to be absent from the cheerful feast with his friends.”

Not the least impressed by his slightly chiding tone, Minerva placed her fork down next to her plate. “As the excusing of students from lessons for family reasons is handled by the Deputy Headmaster or Headmistress, it falls solely under my jurisdiction. There was no need to involve you, Headmaster. Are there any more questions?” A few headshakes answered her, and she stood and left before the Headmaster could voice more objections. It was hard to see him lose so much of his brilliance.

She was still skeptical about Lord Slytherin, but the fact that he had arranged for Harry to have a quiet day in remembrance of his parents, when no one had ever done so before, granted him a slight growing of respect.

ooOoo

While the others went to their lessons, Harry waited, wrapped in his new warm winter cloak, in the entrance hall for his godfather.

Before he could start to worry, the tall form of his godfather walked through the high doors, his robes swaying around his legs, a heavy cloak hanging from his shoulders, a grin on his face.

“Harry, pup! I can’t really wrap my head around the fact that he got you out of classes. What’s his hidden agenda? What do you think?”

A little bemused, Harry realized that Sirius was trying to be cheerful and brighten the mood. Not that he needed cheering up. Until this year he had never really thought about visiting his parents' graves, or remembering them in any way on the day they had been murdered.

So he rolled his eyes and grinned, accepting a brief embrace from his godfather. “He probably wants to look like a thoughtful and kind guardian, I would guess. But as he has to act like one most of the time to achieve this, I think I can live with it.”

Sirius laughed, startled. “Well, it is a likely agenda. But I guess he has at least several more. He is Slytherin, after all.”
They fell into step and walked towards the entrance, Sirius slinging his arm over the shorter teen's shoulders. “I thought we first should go to Godric’s Hollow, take a look around, then go to the graveyard. Maybe? Get something to eat… I haven’t planned too much ahead.”

Harry nodded, not saying a word, looking at his feet and the path they now followed over the school grounds.

“I guess one plan is as good as any other,” Harry shrugged, “How is your search for an heir going?”

Moaning dramatically, Sirius placed his hand over his eyes, never faltering in his stride. “It’s so much work, Harry! I thought it would be easy, but man, was I wrong! The chronicles are a mess, no order I can find. And then the Squibs often changed their names, or went abroad – not that I would blame them – making it so much harder to follow their trails. I thought about just paying for a test for all muggle-born wizards and witches I can find, but sadly the Goblins really don’t like that idea.” The two of them turned a little so they could see each other and grinned. “Well, I have a few people following the paper trail through all of Europe. We'll see if they can find anyone… And if I can’t find anyone, I might just change the rules and name Nymphadora my heiress.”

Harry had only met the young Auror a few times, but he already knew that she would not really fit in with the stiff rules surrounding the old families with seats on the Wizengamot. “If you try she might just hex you to the ceiling of a room and leave you there!” They had a good laugh over this mental image and reached the gate leading to the road down to Hogsmeade and the train station.

“We'll apparate from here, I think.” Sirius decided. “No need to walk any further than the edge of the wards, after all. Ready?”

Taking a steadying breath, Harry nodded. “Ready,” and took a good hold of his godfather’s arm.

A moment of uncomfortable travelling later, they were standing behind a bush on fallen leaves that were starting to rot, quite out of sight.

“There's a small memorial in the middle of town, and the house…” Sirius swallowed, “the house you all lived in has been preserved as a reminder. I only ever saw the house that night before I stupidly went after that rat, and Remus told me about the memorial…”

Harry knew that Sirius wanted to let him make the decision what he wanted to see, what he was ready to see, but he was unsure himself. What could he cope with at this point in time? Could he visit the house where his parents had died? Where his darkest memories were? Those that he was forced to remember whenever a Dementor came too near?

Maybe it would be better not to go there yet.

Sirius only nodded and turned them around so they could walk down a quiet little street lined with cosy little cottages and houses. It was a peaceful place, one that looked as if it could be the stage for a children’s book or film.

“You know, all I ever hear about mum and dad are little snippets. I know that I have Mum’s eyes and that Dad was good at flying. But what were their favourite colours? Was there anything that Dad could eat so much of that he would feel sick? You know, the things that are silly, things I know about my best friends… no one ever tells me such things.”

Obliging his godson, Sirius started to tell what he could remember, odd little events that had stuck with him. A really memorable Potions class with Professor Slughorn, after which all students had had vibrantly pink hair, some Quidditch matches and the fact that Lily had loved watching the sport, even if she always avoided James.

It didn’t take long until they reached a small square in the middle of the settlement, the obelisk morphing into a statue of a man and a woman holding a small child.

For the longest time they both stood there under a notice-me-not spell Sirius had cast over them before they had started on their short walk through the town. It was odd for Harry to see a memorial for his parents and himself. He had seen more than one memorial for the dead of the two World Wars on school trips the Dursleys couldn’t prevent him from attending. Seeing one dedicated to himself, making him out to be a great hero… he rather would have had his parents than all this fame. And now he had trouble to feeling hatred for the man who had killed them.

He sighed. “It is odd seeing them... us, like that. Do you know who made it?”

Sirius shook his head. “No, but I guess we can find out if you want to know.”

“I think I would like that.”

They started to walk again after that, no particular destination in mind. Randomly walking the streets. “I was wondering if you could spend the Christmas holidays with me,” Sirius asked out of the blue, probably to break the silence and the mood that was steadily getting more morose.

“I would love to see you for a few days. Mar... he said I have to come home, because there are several social functions I have to go to.” Sirius made a face, clearly unhappy that he had to attend many of those as well, and then his face brightened. “Oh, we'll get to see each other at some of those! That might make them more bearable! So you'll have… spend the holidays over at Griffin House?” They were stumbling from one awkward topic to the next. But Harry appreciated Sirius’ effort not to insult his guardian. They had a few rougher discussions over the mirrors, but it seemed that maybe they could move on from this.

“Actually, he asked me what I wanted to do over the holidays so he could plan around my plans to visit friends. As he sees me writing to you, and visiting duties I have to fulfil, I guess spending time with you during a family holiday would be something he would demand anyway.” Harry started to smile again.

“You talk to him often?” Sirius wanted to know, not entirely successful in feigning indifference.

“Every evening. But you already know that. You gave him the notes on the communication mirrors. It’s nice to not have to write so many letters on top off all the essays we already have to write. I can’t even rush through the history essays anymore, now that Remus reads them.”

Sirius ruffled the mop of unruly black hair. “I remember that fifth year was a hard one. I know from experience. Don’t allow yourself to fall behind, trying to catch up will not work out too well.”

Without speaking the decision out loud, they started to make their way over to the church and the graveyard behind it.

A curious mixture of dread and anticipation filled Harry’s stomach, he was unsure what to think.

ooOoo
Filled with grief, Sirius watched over Harry from a few steps behind and to the side. He had conjured two small flowers that Harry had laid down at the graves. Now the teenager stood there, hands locked before him, eyes staring at the headstones, small drops of water falling down from his face to the ground.

In a way this silent crying made Sirius mad. His own parents had always told him that boys and men didn’t cry, that if you were strong, you would not show emotions. It was obvious that someone had drilled Harry in the same useless sentiment. It couldn’t have been Slytherin, as he had only had custody of Harry since the summer, so it had to have been the Muggles.

Sirius never had liked Lily’s sister, nor her husband. He had only met them a few times, that vile man actually only once, but he had known at first glance that if they’d had magic, they would have been great friends with his family. Bigoted idiots, the lot of them.

Well, it was early in the day, and Harry only needed to be back at school after dinner. So maybe they could visit one of the places Lily had loved to see in London. See a few happy places Harry could link to his parents. Creating a few happy memories, chasing away the gloom. With a little luck, they would find a cinema playing one of the films Lily had taken the Marauders to see.

It definitely would be a better ending to the day.

Chapter Notes

I have managed to get all currently written chapters uploaded here. Not all of them have been reviewed again before uploading, so I could catch up faster. If you find something really bad, let me know and I will fix it as fast as I'm able to. You will find the date I plan to post the next chapter at the end of the last one.

It was the morning of the first of November when Harry met his friends again. He had gotten back in the middle of dinner the night before and had retreated into his room and behind the curtains of his bed for some privacy. He had thumbed through his picture album, looking at all the pictures of his parents Hagrid had collected for him back in first year.

“There you are, Harry!” Ron greeted him on the stairs down to the common room, while Dean and Neville walked on before them, eyes still half-closed with sleepiness. “I wondered yesterday, but Hermione said we should leave you alone, that you would have come to us if you wanted.” Harry could see that Ron was not so sure about what Hermione had said, so he nodded to confirm their friend’s assessment.

“Yeah, I wanted some time to think. But now we can prepare for the game on Saturday.” What followed was a lively discussion about Quidditch and what the weather probably would be like, a conversation that lasted until they all had reached the table. When they met with Hermione in the common room, the girl rolled her eyes, and Harry and she shared a fond smile. Their friend was rather predictable when it came to Quidditch and Slytherins.

“So why weren’t you in classes yesterday, Harry?” Colin asked as he walked by, open curiosity in his eyes.

Ginny, walking a step behind him, gave him a light slap to the shoulder. “Don’t be so thick! What day was it yesterday?” She turned from a bewildered Colin to Harry. “Sorry for that. I’ll explain it,” she added to Colin, and dragged the young Gryffindor down the table to a mostly empty section.

Sighing, Harry looked at what was for breakfast that morning, and snatched up some toast and honey. “Is it really so interesting where I am any given day, that those not in our year and House ask about it?” It was more a rhetorical question than anything else, because Harry knew others were interested in what he did more than was normal, but he got an answer anyway.

“Well, yes it is. You are the Boy-Who-Lived and the heir to two families,” Hermione explained in her typical lecture mode, buttering her own slice of toast.

“You didn’t spend the whole day with him, did you?” Neville wanted to know, looking a little green around the gills, probably imagining a day in the company of Lord Slytherin, an intimidating figure even if you didn’t know that he had been Voldemort before his stint as a spirit haunting a forest in Albania.

“No, don’t worry, Neville. Sirius picked me up. It was…” He took a deep breath, avoiding his friends’ eyes, looking down at his plate. “... not so bad. We went to Godric's Hollow. Visited the memorial and the graveyard.” He brightened as his thoughts turned to the later part of the day. “But after that we went to London, and Sirius showed me places my mom liked. We even went to see a movie. Sirius wanted to show me a film he had seen back then with my parents and their friends.
But as it wasn't running anywhere, we just picked one at random.” He smiled in remembrance, munching on his breakfast, while Hermione explained cinemas and movies to those students born to all-magical families.

Nearing the time they would have to leave so as not to be late for their first lesson, Theo came over, a bunch of scrolls tied with pale blue ribbon in his hands, the strap of his bag over one shoulder.
“Good morning, Harry. I thought I’d give you my notes now, so you can have a look at them in your free period.”

Smiling at his first Slytherin friend – some of the others were tolerable, so they might become friends in time – Harry took the scrolls to put them into his own bag. “Do you need them back, Theo?”

The lanky teenager, still a bit taller than Harry, shook his head. “No, these are copies. You can keep them.” Then a smirk appeared on the other’s face. “I know he wouldn’t like you to know, but Draco is wondering what you're going to teach this Friday in the first Defence Club meeting. You have seen the announcement that Friday will be the first meeting?”

Harry nodded, closing his bag, and taking up his goblet of milk, emptying it in a few big gulps.
“Hermione and I agreed with Professor Flitwick that this Friday was as good a day as any other.
So, Draco will be there?”

“I guess most of our year will be there. Who can afford to miss a chance to practice?”

Harry nodded, standing up from the table as most of the other students were doing. “With our current professor, probably no one. Practising Charms or Transfiguration in the common room works well enough, but Defence just needs more room!”

Soon they split up to reach their respective classes. Harry was deep in thought and a little nervous over the first Defence meeting on Friday, the others concentrated on their next class. It seemed Harry’s worst fear – nobody showing up – would not come true. But thinking back to the brawling during that one Duelling Club meeting with Lockhart, Harry had plenty of reasons to worry.

ooooOOoooo

Clutching their warm cloaks over their equally warm winter robes to their bodies to shield them from the biting wind here on the pier on the island of Azkaban prison, John Dawlish and Kingsley Shacklebolt started on their way up to the imposing silhouette of the triangle-shaped building.

John had the “touch-sphere” in one of his pockets, and they were here to check Umbridge. It had taken a lot of convincing that they should be allowed to come here to check that the old bitch had not sent the Dementors after three heirs. So far, not one of the suspected people they had tested at the Ministry had tripped the sphere.

“Think we'll be successful here?” Shacklebolt asked, rubbing his hands in their gloves to get them warmer again.
“I think that Umbridge had a really good reason to remove Lord Slytherin’s heir from the picture. And with what happened at the school, I doubt she has any qualms about murdering children. She tortured students!” John had to take a few deep breaths to regain some of his calm, even if the anger was a nice way to keep warm. He quickly recast his warming charm. Sadly, those didn’t tend to hold up well under such conditions as these.

They didn’t talk any more on their way up to the prison building, and kept conversation to a minimum even after they had entered.

With the Dementors now back at the prison, the overall atmosphere was much more unpleasant than it had been the last time they had visited. And the fact that they had to use the boat rather than a portkey was an inconvenience too. But with the officials claiming there wasn’t much use in testing Dolores Umbridge, it had been hard to get permission to do the testing at all.

Walking down the dreary corridors, still wrapped in their cloaks, Shacklebolt spoke calmly in his deep voice, quietly so his words wouldn’t carry too far. “Think the Minister is trying to cover up behind her? There were a great many more obstacles to clear than I had anticipated for testing Umbridge.”

Nodding thoughtfully, John had to admit that the other had a point. If this was another thing to lay at Umbridge’s door, it would look bad for the Minister. “There were a great many hoops to jump through. But I think it’s more fear over there maybe being something, than real knowledge that there is something to hide.”

They reached the cell on the least secure level where Umbridge was being held. The moment their steps could be heard from her cell, pleading started in it, easily to be heard from their position. “Let me out! There's been a terrible mistake! The Minister values my work highly!” She went on and on. She probably had sounded more demanding and sure of herself when she had first been thrown into her cell. Now she sounded pleading and pathetic.

“Back from the door, Umbridge!” John bellowed, startling a high pitched squeak out of the woman in her grey-striped prisoner robes.

They heard shuffling and the sound of something heavy landing on the floor with a surprised ‘umpf’. Rolling his eyes, John opened the door with a complicated wand movement and muttered incantation. “Up from the floor, Umbridge.”

While the witch scrambled to obey, John dug into his pockets and produced a small sphere with three smaller spheres inside it. One had lighted up when the Auror on duty that day had touched the sphere, another when a clerk handling most of the Ministry’s paperwork had grabbed it in his hand. They were pretty sure that the last small sphere was linked to the culprit behind the attack.

Before the woman could protest, John had grabbed her arm, bringing up her hand and pressing the sphere into the slack hand with its stubby fingers.

One of the spheres inside the big one started to glow a bright pink.

“Well, well,” Shacklebolt drawled from where he stood, his wand in his hand, pointed at the prisoner to keep a lookout for his Auror partner. “I wasn’t sure this trip would be worth it. But now I’m quite glad that we took the risk.”

Stepping back from the bewildered woman, her once prim hair in disarray, John pocketed the Touch-Sphere again. “I think we can go, Shacklebolt, we have found what we’ve been searching for.”
They hurried to get back to the boat and the shore. There was a meeting of the Wizengamot today, and they both had to give reports to not only Scrimgeour, but to their respective leaders as well.

They had found the one sending Dementors after children. They might be standing on opposing sides, politically, but harming children was not something either of them would ever approve of.

oooOOooo

The first Wednesday after Bellatrix had been captured again and three bodies had been found badly burned, all members of the Wizengamot had been called to an emergency meeting. Marvolo snorted as Bartemius presented the summons to him.

Emergency.

Right.

And because of that, they had waited several days before calling the meeting. Of course Marvolo knew that there had to be an investigation before the Wizengamot would be called to judge, but to still call it an emergency meeting felt silly.

With a wave, Marvolo dismissed his personal assistant, knowing that the man would rearrange his schedule so he had the rest of the day free to attend the meeting, and started to walk to his rooms. He needed to change into his Wizengamot robes and his comfortable shoes. It either would be a really short meeting, or an exceptionally long one. It was hard to predict how the others would react, and what Cornelius would come up with.

With quite a bit of time to spare, Marvolo made his way to the floo and vanished in the green flames, whirling on his way to the Ministry.

Sirius smoothed his robes down for the third time since he had stepped out of the floo in the big atrium, walking slowly down the corridors to the Wizengamot chamber. He really wasn’t comfortable with his new position as Lord Black. Yes, he was sure it would be better for him to fill the spot than to let the seat remain empty, only waiting for his cousin’s son Draco to fill it when it was time. But he had run away from home not only because of the unpleasantness his parents had always spouted, or the fact that they had aligned themselves with Voldemort – even if that had been a large part of it – but also because he had wanted nothing to do with all this political stuff. And now here he was. Lord Black, member of the Wizengamot, forced to participate in the political dance all these years after he had left so much behind to avoid this responsibility.

When he entered the oval hall of the Wizengamot, a lot of its members were already present. Slytherin was surrounded by several of his closest associates – Malfoy, Nott, Lestrange – and was being glowered at by one of the less important Lords. Sirius tried a moment to remember his name, looking at the crest on the man’s robe for a clue, but gave it up quickly as not really important at the moment.
He nodded to Augusta, but walked past her over to the Black family seat. He cast a cushioning charm on the black onyx bench, streaked through with thin silver-white veins, before he sat down. He wasn’t in the mood to talk to anyone before this meeting. It probably would have been the wise move to talk with his allies. But as the reasons they had been called here had something to do with the recapture of his cousin Bellatrix, he was in a rather foul mood. In addition to his disgruntlement over his position and the need to wear such posh robes, he felt terribly conflicted over the whole mess. Or rather, over the fact that he couldn’t care less what would happen to Bellatrix. His cousin. The girl he had had quite a few shouting matches and prank-wars with when they had been children. He wished he weren't required to take part in deciding what was to be done next.

Watching in detached interest as the rest of the witches and wizards of the Wizengamot trickled into the hall and to their seats, Sirius played with his wand. The work on Grimmauld Place was going well, old grime and décor vanishing to make way for new wood panelling, carpets, and paint. He was going through the library and all the old records he had found, still searching for leads to find an heir. After Harry had decided the position would bring so many additional responsibilities that it would be too much for him, Sirius had approached Andromeda and her daughter Nymphadora. He liked the young woman, who was working as an Auror. But both she and her mother had declined the position as heir to the Black family, even if he could manage to change the rules of inheritance to allow for a female heir and Head of House. He couldn’t really blame them, he could do without the title of Lord Black himself.

A bang shot from the wand of Lord Abbot tore Sirius out of his thoughts. “Please be seated, Ladies, Lords. We will start in a few moments.”

Small groups broke up and dispersed to take their respective seats. The murmurs subsided and ended, leaving a permeating silence behind. Only the sound of cloth rustling, and the shuffling of parchment by the secretaries and assistants sitting at the tables in the middle, could be heard.

The Minister stood. “My Lords and Ladies. I’m proud to announce that the French Ministry and our own Aurors managed to capture Bellatrix Lestrange at the scene of a house fire this last weekend.” The man in the offensive magenta robes of the Ministry members – Sirius felt that this was one of the best pranks he had ever seen, making them all wear those colours – stood there like a peacock waiting to be praised.

Sirius rolled his eyes. What utter codswallop. The man had done nothing to gain praise. If there was someone to be recognized for effort, it would be the Aurors and the French Ministry who had done all the actual work.

Nonetheless a few polite claps were heard throughout the hall, but ended again rather quickly.

“She will be Kissed by the end of the week, as the Head Auror assured me that her questioning will be finished by then. We will inform you of any and all worthwhile information gathered from her.”

The Minister’s tone was matter-of-fact and caused first shocked silence, followed immediately afterwards by outrage. It was not the place of the Minister to pass out Kiss orders like candy at a birthday party.

Malfoy stood, a sneer on his face. As Bellatrix was his sister-in-law, it was expected of him to have an opinion on this. Even disregarding the fact that he was – or had been – a Death Eater. “Didn’t we just have this, Minister? I remember there was a ‘Kiss on Sight’ order on Lord Black. And he was innocent! Dementors were sent out after children! I don’t think we should skip the normal procedure. I rather think we should stick to it, or even make it more controlled, to make sure that no soul of an innocent is fed to these vile creatures.” The fierce way the man spoke... caught Sirius by surprise. Until now he had not seen the man this passionate about anything outside of battles. Always so calm and composed, mocking his opponent most of the time. But then they had never really interacted before.

Madame Bones stood as well. “I agree with Lord Malfoy. Even with the fact that Bellatrix Lestrange actually was found guilty by a court, just issuing a Kiss order is not under your jurisdiction, Minister.”

Sirius thought that the red colour of Fudge’s face clashed quite wonderfully with his robes. It was obvious the man didn’t like being reminded of what he couldn’t do.

In the face of the murmurs of agreement, the Minister was quite flustered as he responded. Maybe he hadn’t anticipated to meet any resistance over this. “Well, excuse me, but I think it is the best solution. She escaped Azkaban! People were killed! Property destroyed! What would you rather do? I see no alternative to the Kiss!”

“If we don’t think about this, it is no wonder you can’t see an alternative,” someone from the benches in the back called into the room, not bothering to stand. Sirius saw quite a few of the others nod at this.

Augusta Longbottom stood. “As one who suffered from her actions in the last war, I think we should have a look at the facts.” She waited for all to settle down once more, and only started to speak once the Minister had sat down too. “There is no doubt she did commit atrocious crimes in the last war. But she only managed to escape from Azkaban because the Dementors had been removed, allowing criminals to make their way to the island in an attempt to free some of the prisoners. She never did manage it while the Dementors were on watch.”

She looked rather intimidating, the lines around her eyes deep with worry and tension. “I don’t see a reason to shorten her sentence by essentially killing her.”

“I have a question for Lord Lestrange, as she is part of his family, I want to know why he hasn’t disowned her!” One of the less important Lords associated with the Light called from his place behind Sirius. The dark-haired wizard didn’t bother turning in his seat to have a look. It was rather easy to place someone he didn’t know by watching the others whose place on the political spectrum he already knew.

Lord Lestrange stood, a grave expression on his face, his posture rigid. “I don’t see why you should be entitled to know about my family affairs.” His tone was scolding, and Sirius felt himself reminded of Professor McGonagall the one time she had held a stern lecture about using transfiguration on the pets of other students as a prank. “But as your accusation is no longer true, I will give a short explanation.” The old wizard – once one's hair started to turn white, Sirius thought it only right to call the person old – turned to the one disrupting the proceedings, and therefore looking in Sirius’ direction, giving the animagus an excellent view of his displeased expression. “In retrospect, I think I just refused to deal with the situation, the results of my own sons’ foolish actions.”

Sirius noticed Slytherin lowering his gaze to his hands, folded in his lap. He still couldn’t decide if the remorse was genuine or just supreme acting.

Lestrange continued, “But a few days ago, I dissolved the marriage of my son to this witch, calling on a clause in the marriage contract. I will not disown my sons, because that would cut off all children they might have had somewhere.” The old wizard stiffly sat down again on his seat, spreading his robes in an expert movement. Practice made perfect, it was impressive, how the older Lords and Ladies managed to convey their disdain or disapproval just in the manner they moved the masses of fabric of the traditional robes.

“If she no longer is a Lestrange,” Marchbanks stated in her slightly brittle, but still cutting, voice, “then she is a Black again. Is she not?”

All eyes turned to Sirius. Who barely managed to keep from fidgeting. Knowing that it was time for himself to express his stand on this, Sirius stood. “I haven’t managed to get around to it until now, but for her crimes against our society, I fully intend to cast her from the family. So, no, she will not be a Black for long.” Murmurs spread through the room. Sirius sat down again. He needed to look up the steps to cast someone out of the family once he was home again. And once he was already searching through that particular book, he would also look up the way to accept someone back into the family. He planned to change the image of the Ancient and Noble House of Black, a muggle-born heir and half-blood family members were an excellent starting point.

“Do we even know if she is responsible for those that were murdered during the escape?” Lord Nott wanted to know, directing the debate back to the topic at hand.

Madame Bones, as the Head of Law Enforcement, answered that question. “We don’t know who killed the Auror on duty, or the civilians invading the prison. It could have been any of the escaped Death Eaters.”

“That is totally beside the point!” the Minister interrupted. “She was certainly involved in the deaths. And therefore should be punished accordingly. Escape from Azkaban is punishable with the Kiss!”

Now Sirius could no longer pretend not to be interested, and stood. Again all eyes moved to him. “Before I fled there never was a successful escape from Azkaban. So I doubt there is something like a standard punishment for escape, because there never was a reason for one to exist. That you, Minister, just set the Kiss on Sight order does not create a precedence! I agree with Dowager Longbottom. Let us send her back to Azkaban. Now that the Dementors are back there, she should be safe enough.”

Maybe being Lord Black was not so bad after all. Sirius sat down again while the others around him argued. Should there be a set punishment for escape from Azkaban? Now that there had been two successful escapes, it was clear that it wasn’t as impossible as they had always believed. Others remarked that they had adjusted the procedures for animagi, and that the others only managed to escape because the Dementors had been removed. It moved back and forth without any hint of the discussion going anywhere.

Amused and a little bit annoyed as well, Sirius noticed that they were drifting away from the main point again. If they continued to stray from the topic so much, they would be here until late at night. He had hoped to work a little more on his new motorcycle. Hagrid had offered to return the one he had borrowed all those years ago, but Sirius had declined. It was more fun to start from scratch with another motorcycle. And he could use some fun in between searching for an heir, renovation, and all the other pesky responsibilities of an adult wizard.

“Why don’t we give her a new chance at life by de-aging her back to an infant?” One of the Lords on the highest level, that of the Houses, asked out of the blue, silencing the room. Sirius only knew that he was known for his daring potions experiments, but sadly not for his successes. For the life of him, the dark-haired animagus couldn’t remember the man’s name – he was really bad at this, and probably should make an effort to learn all the names – but it was of no consequence as his suggestion was already being screamed and shouted into the ground.

“That is preposterous! There is no reliable de-aging potion!”
“At least two of the three who have tried to use the one recipe known, died!”

“All accidents resulting in de-aging had horrible consequences!”

The Lord proposing this idea, stood there like a rock between waves on a stormy sea. Out-waiting the storm. Sirius was slightly impressed by his composure, and suspicious of the man’s motivation.

“I think I have created a potion that will be successful where others were not. I used the information gathered after all those accidents you spoke about.” He waved his hand in one direction, indicating someone. “Why not risk it? Some of you clearly would approve of giving her over to the Dementors. Others would condemn her to a slow death on that damnable island. With my potion, there would be a chance for her to live!”

Sirius snorted. And there was the motive. A person to test his potion on. Hopefully that man was enough of a coward to never to go after people to get his test-subjects.

Suddenly an eerie silence started to spread through the room. Sirius looked around and spotted Lord Slytherin no longer sitting with an expression of hidden pain, standing in front of the silver seat with its two snakes. What was he up to now?

Only when all sounds had stopped did the man in his green robes of silk and wool start to speak. “It is noble to consider giving Bellatrix… a new chance to live. But I feel I need to make you aware of circumstances you all seem to forget.” He spoke calmly and deliberately, and Sirius found himself listening attentively, almost captivated by the performance.

“It might have passed by your notice, but even if someone is declared not responsible for past actions, most will still remember and hold them responsible.” Blue eyes wandered unhurriedly over the assembled wizards and witches, not accusing, but more like he dared them to contradict him.

“I can handle the reactions, because I remember, and am a grown man. But if she survived, if we found someone willing to take her in, raise her? She would most likely not remember anything. But the world around her would remember. The people raising her would remember.” The man made a pause, tucking some hair behind his ear – a nervous tell? – swallowing, before he continued. “Growing up despised for something you can’t understand, hated for something you can’t remember doing. Don’t you think, can’t you see, that this would be crueler than death or imprisonment?” He turned slowly, addressing those behind him as well. “Is imprisonment not kinder than stealing a soul? Feeding it to some horrible monster? I would prefer death over that fate, and I guess many others here would agree.”

And just like that he stopped speaking. If Sirius had someone to bet with right now, he would have liked to bet how many of the others had their jaws hanging down, leaving them open mouthed and looking stupid. Well, whatever he thought about Slytherin most of the time, here he had a good point. Sirius remembered the horror of Azkaban. Sending Bella back there would be punishment enough, in his opinion. So when a vote was called, that was what he voted for.

Marvolo was a little surprised, because he had not lied when he said that he would prefer death over the kiss. Of course he would choose living over either of those, but almost all cultures around the world had some kind of story around souls and rebirth. There was almost always some hope in them. All stories speaking about soul-consuming monsters – not that he had found that many – insisted that the soul was lost and never would return once consumed. So better the way with a little bit of hope than the one not leaving any kind of loophole.

He sat down after this short spontaneous speech, watching as the Wizengamot slowly came to a conclusion. He voted with the majority to just send the witch back to prison, even if the idea to regress her back to an infant had some merit. But as long as those around her knew who she had been, it would probably end in her being harassed for something she couldn’t understand and could do nothing about. It would most likely turn out something like his own childhood, and look where that had led him.

No need risking the creation of another individual bent on destruction. But the idea of de-aging might work for those of his followers that still were hiding out at Headquarters. Rodolphus and Rabastan might benefit from it, and could maybe be passed off as their own sons. Severus certainly would like the challenge of searching for a reliable de-aging potion. They could pose as half-blood sons from Muggle mothers… he would have to think about this some more.

While the normal tedious procedure of voting went on around him, Marvolo watched two figures in the familiar crimson of the Auror Corps entering the chamber, walking along like they were trying not to draw too much attention to themselves. They reached the seat of Madame Bones and she bent down a little down to make it easier for one of the Aurors to speak into her ear.

Marvolo was intrigued, watching them with interest, not paying any mind to the last counting of those who had abstained from the vote.

Before the Chief Warlock could dismiss them and declare the session closed, Madame Bones stood and called out to gain their attention. “Lords and Ladies, please, if I might ask for another moment of your time. I was just informed that the Aurors investigating the case of the rogue Dementors have found evidence that Dolores Jane Umbridge may have been involved in this crime. I wish to inform you all that there will be an in-depth investigation into her possible involvement. We will keep you informed of developments.”

After that they started to rise and depart. Marvolo walked over to Xerxes, planning to get him and his sons together to plan what to do to create them a new life, now that their deaths would hopefully be official soon.

Back in his office, Cornelius filled a small tumbler with his best scotch, and sat down behind his desk with a weary sigh. It was rather unfortunate that he now had no prisoner to hand over to the Dementors. They had been rather unhappy over their temporary removal from the prison, understandably so. But he had hoped that handing over someone to them to be Kissed would smooth the unrest over.

Now he had to search for another solution. Maybe he could push for Dolores to be Kissed?

If the foolish woman truly had sent Dementors after three heirs of respectable families, the Wizengamot might feel it a poetic justice.

He would need to remember that he was deeply wounded by Dolores’ betrayal. It wouldn’t be beneficial for his continued position as Minister if he got caught up in the schemes of his former Undersecretary.

Filius was a little excited as he levitated the four enormous house tables to the sides of the Great Hall on Friday afternoon. After the lists from all four Houses with the names of those willing to participate had been collected, it had been clear that no single classroom was big enough to teach all the students in. At least, not for something needing as much space as practical defence did. So the faculty had decided it was best to use the Great Hall for this club.

The last time they had attempted to establish something like this – three years prior – Filius had declined any kind of association with it, as Gilderoy had been going to head it. Even as he was sure that duelling in a competitive setting, as he had done for many years, was nothing compared to actual battle, he had been sure the vain man was unable to teach it. And on top of that Gilderoy had had already proven by then that he had no real knowledge of anything related to the subject he had been teaching. In an assessment like this, Filius knew he could trust his Ravens.

In formal duels, there were a great many rules to follow. Actual battle knew no rules of any kind. In a duel you could be sure that there was only that one opponent, and the area was clear and enclosed in a shield to protect the audience. There was nothing to hinder anyone from sending a fatal spell at your back in a fight.

This club was meant to give the students a little bit of practical defence experience. It wasn’t meant to be a place to train them in actual battle, nor in formal duels. He guessed it would land somewhere between a practical Defence lesson and exchange about practical application in dangerous situations. Mr. Slytherin had a lot of experience with those.

Satisfied with his preparations, Filius made his way over to the dais housing the head table, and hopped up on the edge to sit there and wait.

Only moments later three students entered the hall through the big doors. All of them in Gryffindor robes. Mr. Slytherin and his two friends.

They spotted their teacher the moment after they had taken in the changed appearance of the Great Hall.

With a big grin Filius greeted his students. “Miss Granger, Mr. Slytherin, Mr. Weasley! How nice to see you all. Do you feel adequately prepared? Do you need any last-minute advice, or information?” Heading a student club of this magnitude was something new. Most of the other clubs – gobstones, the choir, dancing – only were attended by a few students, a club attracting most of the student population was something else. Even if it would end up with only the first meeting this big.

“No, thank you, Professor. I think we are prepared as well as we can be,” the young witch answered his question, and then started with questions about further reading material for the current class of charms they were studying.

Out of the corner of his eyes, Filius watched other students walking in through the doors in small groups, only slowly drifting closer to where he and the three Gryffindors were waiting. Gryffindors and Ravenclaws were those most eager to get to the front. A few Slytherins kept farther back. He would have to watch out for trouble brewing. Only too often did those two groups clash with one another.

Standing, the short Charms Professor waved for the students to come further into the room. “Come in, come in! No need to be shy! You'll see more when you stand in front!”

Minutes before the meeting would officially start, the slow steady stream of students stopped. A low murmur filled the room with background noise, all waiting full of excited anticipation.

Time to get the show started.

“Welcome! Welcome you all, to this first Defence Club meeting. I’m here to make sure there is help at hand if something goes wrong. The club itself is being led by two of your fellow students. Miss Granger and Mr. Slytherin here.” He made a sweeping dramatic gesture to the two nervous fifth-years, giving the word over to them.

Clearing her throat, Miss Granger took a step forward, dragging her friend behind her by his robe sleeve, causing Filius to grin again. “Welcome. We’re all here because we want to learn and practice how to defend ourselves and others in dangerous situations. Theory is all well and good, but it won’t help us when there’s really a need to defend ourselves.”

With each word the witch with her untamed hair spoke, her confidence seemed to grow, her voice getting steadier, the barely-noticeable tremor vanishing from it.

“I’m good at theory, and Harry is really good at the practical side of defence. Together with you, we should be able to practice what we might need in the future, and what we certainly will need for our exams.” That got a few chuckles and joking calls from the students, especially from the Gryffindors, causing the young witch to blush as she gave the still nervous-looking teen boy standing beside her a nudge forward.

One step took Mr. Slytherin right to the edge of the dais. Filius saw him take a deep breath, exhaling it slowly before he started to speak.

“I… didn’t expect so many would come. You’ve all have probably heard quite some stories about the adventures my friends and I have found ourselves in since we came to Hogwarts. I’m quite sure that most of it is exaggerated or invented. No one really tells me the rumours going around. But that's not really why we're here. I've found that it helps to know a lot of spells to react in a situation you might be in while on your own, or need to protect someone who can’t do so on their own. With Hermione’s help and with ideas from you, I hope to help us all expand our spell knowledge and our ideas of how to use them.”

Filius listened and watched. With a little training and experience, Mr. Slytherin might become a great orator in time. The students were listening, and the boy’s voice carried into the far corners of the Hall without the assistance of a spell. He would make a great Lord and member of the Wizengamot one day.

“I thought we should start with Expelliarmus today, see where everyone is at – with what shoddy professors we all have had most of the time – and collect ideas at the end of the session.” He tried to sound confident, but angry murmurs from many of the older years made him falter, before he straightened his spine.

“Those of you already familiar with the spell can help those that aren’t, to get it right.” He already waved for his friend to help him demonstrate when an angry voice called up from the audience.
“What good is such an easy spell? What can you do with it? It’s so easy to dodge!” A few cruel laughs seemed to agree with the speaker, and Mr. Slytherin turned to the students once more, searching the crowd just as Filius did.

The Charms Master tried to locate the potential troublemaker, he – the voice had sounded like a boy – was someone to watch.

“It is an easy enough spell,” Mr. Slytherin agreed. “One that first-years can master. One that to know well enough to cast it in your sleep can help you react fast. Maybe faster than your opponent can dodge, or fast enough to force them to dodge, buying you time to run.” Those green eyes roamed the crowd, just as unable as Filius to locate the speaker, now again silent and hidden among his peers.

“When we – Hermione, Ron and I – were in third year, we knocked out an adult wizard with three simultaneously cast Expelliarmuses. Don’t dismiss a spell just because a first-year can cast it.” A smirk appeared on the boy’s face. “Remember that troll that got into the school back when I started here? If you’re younger, let one of the older years tell you about that day. What do you think would work against one, when it has you cornered, raising its club, about to smash you into the ground?”

For a moment the students were surprised to be asked a question, then the first suggestions were called.

“A stupefy!”

“A cutting hex to its throat!”

“Have you considered that the hide of a troll is nearly as spell-resistant as a dragon's?”

Filius had to chuckle at the startled expressions on many of those that had gleefully called much more complicated spells up to the teenager standing, wand in hand, on the dais, taking in all their ideas, and throwing them over with that simple question.

“Ron knocked it out with its own club back then. With a spell we had started learning only that day. A first-year spell! Wingardium Leviosa. If you know your spells, can aim them properly, and are creative with those you can cast in your sleep, as often as needed, you have a better chance to get away. A much better chance than if you try to cast a more complex spell you might not pull off in the heat of the moment.”

With that, Hermione Granger and Harry Slytherin-Potter first demonstrated the spell, before they descended into the crowd, splitting it into groups, each with one older student to help, instructing them on how to cast the spell.

Filius watched the proceedings and was delighted at what he saw. The two student leaders split up groups composed of all one House or one year, mixing them up. He heard the girl explain it was to make sure they all would get to practice with different people, to learn more by having to adapt. They both were patient with explaining the right pronunciation, wand movement, and how to hold the wand.

He was glad that his intervention wasn’t needed at any time.

When the meeting broke up after over an hour, Filius walked over to the now again three teenagers, smiling. “Well done, all of you! Have you already planned what you want to do next?”
Nodding with bouncing locks, Miss Granger answered with an eager gleam in her brown eyes. “We thought about the leg-locker curse and Petrificus totalus. After that, we wanted to start on spells from each year that will likely come up in the practical exam. Do you think that there will be practical exams for the others? I mean, those not taking OWLs and NEWTs this year?”

Interrupting the flow of eager words, Filius smiled. Miss Granger’s enthusiasm was endearing. Sometimes it could be a little bit much, but most of the time he wondered why the girl hadn’t been sorted into Ravenclaw. “I’ll see if I can get the new Defence Professor to tell me how he plans to conduct the examinations. As for the OWLs and NEWTs, I’m pretty sure one of the older Ravenclaws can tell you what was asked for in the practical part of the OWL exam on Defence.”

She smiled. “Thank you, Professor.”

“And now I think it's time for you to go back to your common room. Have a good evening and sleep well.”

Three “Thank you, Professor.” was the last each of them said to him before they left. Chuckling, Filius began to set the Hall to rights again. He could have left the work for the elves, but he enjoyed manoeuvring the big tables too much to let the opportunity go by.

He was eager to see how many students would turn up to the next meeting, and what his colleagues would say about his report once he was back in the staff room. There were a few bets to settle. Sinistra had been certain he would have to break up a few fights. Pomona had held the bet and was due to get a sizeable pile of the finest Honeydukes chocolate for her win.

As many of the other Gryffindors had been to the Defence Club, those that had remained in the common room – those not that interested in Defence or just eager to use the opportunity of a mostly empty common room – had been filled in by the others who had returned before Ron, Hermione, and Harry.

They stayed a while, making plans for the next meeting, finishing off some last notes, and playing a few rounds of exploding snap.

Once the first- and second-years had vanished, the older years trickled up to the dorms. Harry followed the others from his year up, and got to listen to Seamus and Dean speaking about some of their female year mates.

“The Patil twins are something to look at!” Seamus said, making a motion with both of his hands as if he were trying to paint their outline into the air before him.

“Yeah, I wouldn’t be adverse to taking one of them to Hogsmeade, or the Astronomy Tower.” The both of them laughed, while Neville was red as a tomato.

Ron rubbed his neck, a blush creeping up there under his hand. “Yeah, they are rather pretty. But I guess after the debacle of the Yule Ball last year, I have only a vampire’s chance in daylight to get a date with one of them.”

Harry thought his friend sounded rather put out, as if the girls were the problem here.
They said good night at the door to the fifth-year boys' dorm, where Harry made his way further up the tower to his own room.

The Ball had been a veritable failure on his part. If he had known then what he had learned this summer, it would have gone better. A lot better. For one, he actually knew how to dance now. He was not exactly comfortable yet, but he was pretty sure he wouldn’t step on the toes of his dance partner every other step. Or ignore his date the whole evening. He cringed at this thought. He had been pretty rude. His chances for another date with one of them were pretty slim.

That wasn’t really a problem, though. They might be pretty, but Harry only had asked them because he’d really needed a date, as a champion and all that. But today he had seen Cho among those attending the club meeting. He had even spoken to her for a moment, demonstrating how she could improve her grip and aim for her spellcasting. His stomach had made some odd movements while Harry was near her, not settling down into his normal nervousness even as he had moved on to help others.

Did he like her? It was possible. But would she be open to spending time with him? She was a year older… would that be a problem? Probably not a bigger one than the fact that the man who had ordered her old boyfriend's death was now Harry’s guardian. Sighing, and stripping out of his robes and clothes – placing them neatly onto a chair – Harry hurried through his nightly ablutions.

Maybe Sirius would be able to help him figure this out. He had promised the man a call on the mirror, but wished he could just take his favourite book – the one all his dorm mates had wanted to borrow – and read a while in bed.

Being a teenager on top of all the complicated crap that was his life was really not fair at all.

oooOOooo

Sonja sat on the love seat in front of the fire, her head resting on Severus’ chest, one of his arms slung around her. They were both reading different potions-related texts. The fire gave off a nice warmth in front of her, and Severus was a really nice heat-source behind her. At the moment they were researching how to make the potion he currently was working on, a little bit cheaper to produce, and have a longer shelf life. It was an interesting and quite complicated puzzle they were working on. That her wizard took her opinion as seriously as he did, made her feel really appreciated. It was much better than the patrons at the Apothecary looking down on her, pitying her for her lack of magic.

She hoped that he would invite her to stay the night. It was Friday evening, tomorrow there would be a game between the Slytherin and Gryffindor Quidditch Teams, and she would like to watch it, together with the man she would marry.

Smiling contently, Sonja snuggled a little deeper into the man sitting behind her, his legs framing her own, a warm blanket covering them to make a perfect cocoon for them on their seat.

Severus laid a kiss to her hair at the back of her head, inhaling before he burrowed his nose in her hair. “Do you want some more wine, love?” he asked her, placing his book on the small side table, to take up his wand that had been resting there.

She nodded, humming, turning a page.
Before he could levitate the pitcher over to them, though, someone knocked at the door to his quarters. Severus gave a sigh and Sonja started to peel the blanket off so she could get up to make the way free for Severus to see who wanted to speak to him. The annoying – knowing – twinkle in the Headmaster’s eyes as Severus and she had passed through the man’s office made her guess that at least he wasn’t likely to show up at Severus’ door.

Finally they had managed to de-tangle themselves from each other, and Severus walked over to the door, opening it just at the moment another knock sounded.

Sonja folded the blanket and sat down again. She was going to be a part of Severus’ life, so she wasn’t going to hide away.

“I’m sorry to bother you, Professor,” a blond teenage boy in Slytherin robes addressed his Head of House. “But one of the first-years is panicking over a letter that was waiting in the dorm when we all came back from the Defence Club. She’s inconsolable. Pansy is out of ideas, so I came here to ask for your help, Professor.”

“Wait a moment, Mr. Malfoy,” Severus said before he walked back to Sonja, bending down to give her a kiss. “I hope it won’t take long, Sonja. So please make yourself comfortable.” He grabbed his outer robes from the back of the love seat, slipping it on.

“I will be here when you return, Severus.” She smiled up at him, ignoring the boy standing in the door.

They exchanged another kiss, before Severus vanished to help calm down a student, leaving her in his rooms, with a pitcher of excellent red wine and a plate of tasty cheese.

This promised to become a really nice evening.

Chapter End Notes

I know that de-aging is an often-used concept in many fan-fiction stories. But I feel that if there was a reliable way to de-age whenever you chose, it would have a not-insignificant impact on the wizarding world. Aging Potion is mentioned in canon, de-aging is not. As far as I know. (Neville's Trevor was subjected to a shrinking solution that made him into a tadpole again. I looked it up ;) )

Next chapter planned for 19th of May 2017
Now this story will be updated together with its counterpart over at FFnet. Every other Friday. The date I have planned to update the next chapter will appear at the end of each chapter in the comments section. And now that we are caught up here all comments you make, questions and speculations you share with me, wishes you leave behind will influence were the story goes next. I have a goal in mind and a few milestones on the way, but where something will happen, from whose point of view I will tell, and on which parts I put the focus, all that is influenced by you my dear readers! So have fun reading and let me know what you think!

Saturday the 4th of November

Coming out of the bathroom – her hair still a bit damp – Sonja found Severus standing in his bedroom, already in his severe teaching robes. Either he was a morning person, or he simply had learned in over a decade of teaching to make the best of his early mornings. She smiled at the thought that she would learn which was true in due time.

Severus answered her smile with a small one of his own, stepping up to her for another sweet kiss. “Do you want me to dry your hair?” he asked, brushing some of the wet strands from her forehead.

Considering the offer, and remembering all the times she had heard witches complaining that their hair was untameable after using a drying charm on them, she was curious what her hair would do. “Yes, please, Severus.”

With a flourish of his dark wand, her hair dried. It didn’t feel any different from the way it did when she let it dry normally, but she would see how it behaved the rest of the day. Snatching up her robe from the bed and quickly slipping her arms into the sleeves, she was ready to go.

Checking herself over in a mirror on the door of the wardrobe, Sonja decided that she looked respectable enough to brave the Great Hall for breakfast.

“Before we go and face the dunderheads during breakfast before a Quidditch game, I wanted to give this to you,” Severus said as Sonja turned to face him. He was holding a golden chain with a pendant looking like a small bouquet of summer flowers.

With a few steps she was by his side, and turned around so he could place the chain around her neck and close the clasps. “This is an emergency portkey that will take you to my house. Now that your association with me will be common knowledge in short time, and you are at a disadvantage, I organized this as a way for you to get to safety if someone should try to take out their irritation with me on you.”

Softly Sonja smoothed out a worry line between Severus’ brows. “I’ll be careful. It’s not as if I only now started to live as a person without magic among those that can use it.” To change the topic of conversation over to a lighter one, she played with the pendant – it looked like it had been done with colourful enamel on a silver base – and asked, “How did you manage to get it? I always had the impression that the Ministry tends to be reluctant to let people carry around portkeys all the time.”

Opening the door for her, and following her into the corridor, Severus gave her a short explanation. “Lord Slytherin was kind enough to help the process along. He informed me that he would be honoured to make your acquaintance. As far as I know, he plans to be here for the game.”

The rest of the short way up to the Great Hall, the two lovers talked about the upcoming game between Severus’ House and the Gryffindors. And the Squib asked what the visit of yesterday evening had been about. With an exasperated eye-roll Severus explained that the girl had gotten a letter from home telling about a missing cat which the girl loved dearly. A simple floo call had cleared the problem up. Between the moment the letter had been send and the time they had called the cat had come back. Agreeing with Severus that it was foolish to send such a letter and not contact the child the moment they knew the concern was unwarranted.

Sonja was looking forward to the first game of Quidditch she would get to see. And for breakfast in the Great Hall.

Minerva looked up from her discussion with Filius over the possible tactical shifts in the new teams they had this year. Some older players had graduated last year and now had to be replaced, shaking up the tactics the teams had developed over the last few years. For instance, Gryffindor had a new captain, and Minerva was curious how the girl had managed to integrate the new keeper into the team.

Looking over the students, as she did every few moments so she would spot brewing trouble as early as possible, to prevent trouble, she spotted Severus walk in with a woman at his side. The two were in a lively discussion, and the almost-smile and the life in the dark eyes of her colleague, were something she hadn’t seen for far too long.

Not really paying attention to the animatedly speaking Charms Professor, Minerva cast her thoughts back many years on a quest to remember when Severus last had seemed so carefree. A wave of regret swept through her as she realized that it had been with Lily at his side in the library, studying, that she had last seen him so happy.

Finally Severus and the young woman had reached the table at the front of the Hall, all professors and quite a few students looking at them.

Ignoring the curious students, Severus helped the woman at his side to climb the steps – what an uncharacteristically chivalrous action on the Potions Master’s part! – and turned to the side so he could easily turn to the table and his companion.

“Sonja, these are my colleagues. Filius Flitwick, Minerva McGonagall, Pomona Sprout…” he named them all in the order they were seated at the table this morning. They certainly had preferred places, but they changed now and again so they didn't always sit next to the same people.
“This is my fiancée, Sonja Jiggers.”

The woman in her simple but flattering robes, smiled. “It’s nice to meet you all. I’m sure we will get to know each other well soon.”

Soon Minerva and the others got over their shock and started to ask questions. Like the others – at least she thought they wanted to know the same – Minerva wondered where Miss Jiggers had gone to school. So she simply asked. “Where have you gone to school, Miss Jiggers? I would remember if you had attended Hogwarts.” She smiled and was happy to see an equally happy smile on the young woman’s face, as she filled her own plate with different fruits, offering a plate of bacon to Severus.

“Not sure if you would have heard of the school, or the university I attended. As I’m a Squib, I never went to a magical school. Father now is really happy he encouraged me to study economics. The Apothecary is doing better than ever.” The disarming smile on her face was somewhat of a conundrum for Minerva. Someone who only regularly interacted with one Squib – Argus Filch – who was bitter about his lack of magic, wouldn’t expect a Squib to be happy among those able to wield magic.

“And now that Severus has come into my life, I actually get to take part in one of the few places where a person without magic can contribute. “I love discussing potions with you.” At the end of her sentence, she had turned to Severus, smirking slightly in his direction.

Minerva had to blink to make sure that she was not imagining things. Severus was smiling back. True, it was a little lopsided and barely visible. But the young wizard the Transfiguration Professor only knew as a withdrawn teenager, and later a dour man, simply didn’t smile for just anyone!

And then her eyes fell on Dumbledore sitting in his chair in the middle of the table. She knew from experience that one could hear every normal conversation taking place at the table from there. So he must have heard. So why were his features seemingly frozen in an expression of shock? Hadn’t he known that Miss Jiggers was a Squib? Didn’t he approve of a Squib marrying one of his employees?

The lively conversation around her, her need to get to know this woman capable of making Severus smile, quickly made her banish her wonder over the Headmaster’s behaviour to the back of her mind. She would have time enough after the game to analyse what she might have seen.

Slipping into a warm woollen vest, Marvolo finished dressing for sitting in the stands for however long it would take for one of the Seekers to catch the snitch. Nagini was basking near the fireplace, coiled on the rug. She tended to be exceptionally lazy in the colder months of the year.

.:Where are you going?:. she hissed sleepily from her place.

.:I will visit Henry at school. Watch him playing Quidditch:. Marvolo answered, slipping into his robes before he pointed his wand at one of his favourite scarves, charming it to sport both Gryffindor and Slytherin Team Colours.

.:What’s that, Quidditch? Is it fun?:. The snake’s head rose from the heap of her body, turning so Marvolo was in her field of vision. She regarded him patiently. Or so he assumed. It wasn’t easy to interpret a snake’s moods by its limited – and that was a generous exaggeration – facial expressions and body language.

::I like watching. And Henry likes to play. So, yes, it’s fun::. Should he take a hat? The weather that far up north could be rather cold in November. It probably would be wise to take along a hat and mittens. He didn’t like to be cold. Too many bad memories. He summoned both items from one corner of the big wardrobe.

::But what is it::. the snake persisted. Marvolo smirked, tucking both hat and mittens into one of the robe pockets. His familiar could be incredibly stubborn sometimes. And once she understood to her own satisfaction she tended to not care any longer. In a way she had a similar character to his own. He loved researching obscure magic, but once he understood it, he rarely did anything with it.

For a moment he contemplated how to explain the intricate nature of Quidditch to a snake. He never would manage to explain the game in its entirety in the time he had. So, maybe it would be enough to explain Henry’s part of the game. ::It is a little like hunting birds. Henry flies through the sky trying to catch a little bird before the seeker of the other team gets it::.

Settling back into her comfortable coil Nagini hissed a reply, already no longer interested.

::Birds always mock me from the branches of the trees. I don’t like birds. But I wonder how they would taste::.

Laughing softly, Marvolo made his way out of the house, to apparate to the borders of Hogwarts’ grounds. Time to be the charming father of the Gryffindor Seeker.

Harry and Ron walked down the path to the locker rooms together with the other team members. Ron was pale with nervousness, shaking, and Harry tried to calm him down as he spotted two figures coming up the path from the village.

“Ron, look over there!” Harry pointed to the two in an effort to distract his friend. Ron was a good keeper, but only when he wasn’t thinking so much. Sadly, the prospect of playing in front of the whole school made him think, dreaming up nightmarish reactions of the other Gryffindors and his family to the failure he expected to be.

Ron turned, squinting to see better. “Who are they?”

Harry had a pretty good idea who they were. One was walking with a little spring in his step, looking around like someone enjoying himself immensely. The other was as tall as the one walking by his side. But in contrast to the first man’s easy going demeanour, he was walking rigidly, his arms swinging stiffly by his sides. Like he had to control himself to keep calm.

As family attending Quidditch matches at the school was not a common occurrence, it was quite possible that the two men walking up towards them were Sirius and Marvolo. Considering the really good acting Marvolo had proved to be capable of, and the fact that Sirius barely tolerated the other man… Soon they were near enough to one another that it was obvious that Harry’s guess had been spot on.
“Henry!” Marvolo called out, waving his arm to make sure Harry could spot them. He felt a smile curl his lips, they both had come, just as they had promised they would. It was really nice to have two adults interested in just him, and keeping their promises.

He waved back, the broom over his other shoulder wobbling with the motion.

A few moments later the team and the two adults met on the path. While the girls and the twins continued to the locker room, Harry walked slowly between the two wizards, Ron uncertainly hovering by his friend’s side.

“You can go follow the others, Ron. I'll be there soon.” It was nice that his red-haired friend was concerned for his safety, and at the same time annoying that he suspected that Harry wasn’t safe here after all Harry had told him.

With a reluctant nod Ron hurried to catch up to the others.

Turning to Marvolo, Harry grinned. “So you decided to go with both colours!” Sirius looked startled for a moment and then got a surprised expression.

“You are wearing both Gryffindor and Slytherin colours! And I thought the conflict of interests would force you to remain neutral, Lord Slytherin,” Sirius drawled, rearranging the Gryffindor coloured scarf and hat he was wearing.

Marvolo laughed. “Well, I hope for a re-enactment of the last World Cup.”

For a moment Harry was bewildered before he grinned. “You know that’s highly unlikely, don’t you, sir? Our chasers are really good and have played together for years.”

The older wizard laughed again. “Well, I said I hope for this outcome, but I know it is unlikely. So do your best and catch the snitch. I will cheer on the Slytherin chasers, so they will make so many points with goals that Slytherin still will win.”

They were rapidly approaching the point where the way to the stands separated from the way to the changing rooms.

“Well, I will cheer for the whole team of Gryffindor,” Sirius declared, giving a nasty look to Harry’s guardian, who only chuckled. “And I think I will sit with your friends, Harry. Be careful, pup, and see that you win!”

Harry grinned and nodded. He would do that. Sirius gave him a hug, and Marvolo gave him a squeeze to the shoulder. More contact than they had ever shared, if they didn’t count the hug Harry had enveloped the man in after the horrible disaster of the Inferi cave.

With a warm glow inside his chest, Harry walked the last part down to the changing rooms. Both Sirius and Marvolo were here to cheer him on. It felt good to finally have a family. With a little luck the rest of the world would soon accept that Marvolo wasn’t Voldemort any longer. Or at least Harry hoped he wasn’t, because it seemed like a good idea to give the man a second chance for real. He might still have his followers. But what was the difference between them and the people following Dumbledore’s lead? Both groups were working to realize their political goals. They had really different ideas on what was the best for their world – and Harry was pretty sure there were things on both sides he could agree to, as well as things he couldn’t – but it seemed that they now had the same methods to work towards their goals.

Banishing politics from his mind, Harry entered the locker room to prepare for his first game in over a year. He had so missed this!
Albus sat down between the other professors, deep in thought and listening to the polite conversation between Severus, his fiancée, and Tom. How was it possible that he had so miscalculated? Severus had told him that Tom approved of his choice of partner. But the girl was a Squib. How was it possible that Tom, who despised anyone weak, could accept someone incapable of using magic as the spouse of one of his followers? How could it happen that he had so badly miscalculated?

All the teachers, and what looked like most of the students, had come to watch this game. Their excitement was evident in the level of noise all around him. One of the students even had constructed a lion-head hat which roared now and then from the top of the girl's head. He was pretty sure he had seen her demonstrating the hat during breakfast in the Great Hall.

The ingenuity of some students always managed to make his days brighter. And the young dreamy Ravenclaw was one of the students who made his days brighter.

But his thought soon circled back to the conundrum of Tom willingly associating with Squibs. Encouraging his followers to interact with Squibs. Trying to integrate them into magical society when they would certainly feel inferior, surrounded by a power they were unable to access, ever. Petunia Evans once had asked to be allowed to go to Hogwarts together with her sister. A request Albus had seen more than once, and as he always had done, he had bestowed upon her the kindness of turning her away. It was a bitter life to live surrounded by magic, never to truly touch it.

Could it be possible that Tom had information – crucial information – Albus was missing?

“Hey, come over here!” Sirius shouted out to his godson's friends. Hermione spotted him first, and promptly changed direction. The Longbottom boy was following in her wake, a blonde girl with enormous blue eyes – looking surprised – and a big lion head on her head sat down beside them with a dreamy smile.

“Lord Black, how nice of you to come!” the bushy-haired witch greeted Sirius, sitting down on the bench and casting a warming charm. The day was clear, but chilly.

“No, please don’t! I know it’s customary to address a Lord or Lady with the title they carry, but you're Harry’s friend. And I don’t really put much stock in those stifling traditions. So, please, in such an informal setting, call me Sirius.” He looked over the other teens, and smiled. “That goes for you too! Sit, sit. I have chocolate here, want a piece?”

They shared in the bars of fine Honeydukes chocolate, and chatted about different topics, from schoolwork to school gossip, until the game finally began.

“Hello, everyone, and welcome to the first game at Hogwarts since the last year, when our favourite sport had to give way for the Tri-Wizard Tournament! And here come the teams: Gryffindor, with new Captain Angelina Johnson – such a good-looking girl – and new Keeper Ron Weasley, brother of the two Human Bludgers Fred and George, as well as our youngest seeker in several hundred years, and the two other Chaser girls, Alicia Spinnet and Katie Bell. And Slytherin, with Captain Montague, his fellow Chasers Warrington and Pucey, Seeker Draco Malfoy, and the new Beaters Vincent Crabbe and Gregory Goyle. Let’s hope for a clean and exciting game!”

“Who’s the guy commenting?” Sirius asked, amused by the overly enthusiastic boy, commenting the game with flowery words. If he kept this up, the game would be even more fun.

“And there are the players, the captains are shaking hands. And off they go! Madame Hooch has released the snitch! The game is on!”

Cheers went up all around the pitch, blocks of House Colours moving with the cheering.

Only listening with half an ear, Sirius followed Harry’s circles around the pitch with his eyes. The three chasers of Gryffindor were an excellent team. It was obvious that they had played together for years. But the Bletchley boy was a seasoned keeper. Ron was a nice kid, and a good friend – as far as Sirius could tell – but he was lacking the practice and experience he would need to play at his best. For each goal the excellent chasers of Gryffindor scored, Ron failed to keep his hoops clean of the quaffle.

One of the Gryffindor boys sitting near to him groaned. “If that keeps up, the snitch will decide the game!”

And as far as Sirius could tell, that was exactly what was going to happen. Ron wasn’t really confident on a broom as keeper, but the Slytherin chasers were no match for the three Gryffindor girls.

The whole block of students in Gryffindor robes and with red-gold coloured scarves, hats, and banners, jumped up as one of the twins almost managed to knock a Slytherin chaser off his broom with a bludger.

“That was a close call! Good work from the Weasley twins! They have more than a talent for pranks, folks!”

The voice of the commentator continued to fill the pitch, exclaiming with every interesting move the players made.

When it stood 40 to 40, after some near-misses of the grandiose trio against the Slytherin keeper, and some barely prevented goals by the Slytherin chasers, Lee Jordan’s voice echoed loud and clear. “Was that the snitch?”

Sirius jumped to his feed, his eyes glued to the two small figures making daring manoeuvres at a breakneck speed. One was wearing the red and gold of Gryffindor, his black hair easily spotted, the other was wrapped in the silver and green of Slytherin, his blond hair a bright spot against the dreary sky.

From his tense grip on the rail before him, Sirius’ knuckles were going white. He gasped as both seekers suddenly swerved to the right, putting the Malfoy kid nearer to the snitch, as he had been on the right of Harry, suddenly they both dove down towards the ground – making Sirius’ old heart stutter for a moment – before suddenly changing direction again, shooting up into the sky. Harry had the faster broom and made a tighter turn, getting ahead of the other boy, now again in a better position.
Then Harry levelled his broom out, holding one hand formed into a fist high over his head. “He has the snitch! Potter… the Gryffindor Seeker has caught the snitch! The first game of the year finishes with 60 Slytherin to 190 Gryffindor! Gryffindor wins!”

All around the lone adult wizard, teenagers were dancing, cheering, and chanting. Gryffindor had won!

With shaking knees Sirius sat back down, ignoring the celebrating students around him. For the first time he really understood how James’ mum had felt when she had found the two of them one summer making insane stunts on their brooms in the orchard behind the manor. She had banished the brooms to the house and they hadn’t seen them again for the rest of those holidays at all. If those stunts had looked anything like the moves he had seen Harry make just now, he was actually quite surprised that good old Dorea had been so lenient. Here Harry had had Madame Hooch and the other professors to help if anything went wrong. But James and himself hadn’t even told anyone where they had gone.

Maybe he should just adopt someone already over the age of twenty to have an heir, and forego the whole terrifying experience of being an actual parent. He wasn’t really that interested in settling down, after all, and he wanted to live, not die of shock because his kid was reckless.

“I still think we should have gone with the idea of targeting the Weasel’s weakness. You all have seen what a weak keeper he is. If we played on his insecurities…”

Draco rolled his eyes. Montague had belaboured the point many times by now.

“Yeah,” Bletchley said, muffled by the towel he used to dry his hair – Draco had seen once what his hair did when dried with a charm, it was a wise decision to take the longer road – looking up. “The song you came up with was pretty good. Had a tune to it!”

Draco shook his head. Was it really so hard to understand? “You really want to see what the … what Lord Slytherin might do if we tried something like this against a friend of his son? I would really prefer to never know what he might do. No, we have to work on our chaser formations. And you two need to have a better overview where a bludger would do the most good. Just randomly smacking it at the other team isn’t going to work.”

Before one of his… friends… could come up with a reaction, Montague interrupted Draco’s lecture. “Who made you captain, Malfoy?”

There wasn’t much the blond could say to that, so he shrugged. “Just some thoughts,” he replied before he went into the shower. He wanted to warm up under the hot water before they made their way back to the castle. Maybe it would have worked, sabotaging the red-head with the song he had written one evening as a little fun he used to avoid working on his history essay, but he was pretty sure it wasn’t worth the risk.

And being polite with Slytherin’s friends seemed to work. Never before had the other seeker come over to shake his hand after a match with so genuine a smile. Winning would have been better, but getting thanked for a good game was worth something, too.
“Well done, son!” Harry turned to the man who had spoken, grinning like mad. It had been wonderful to play a real game of Quidditch again. And they had won! Sure, Ron still needed a lot more confidence, but Angelina and the other girls were almost unstoppable.

“Thank you, sir!” He probably looked a little like a loon, with his face-splitting grin, windswept hair, sweaty Quidditch uniform, and a broom over his shoulder. The others from the team were drifting over to the locker rooms to shower and change, the students drifting up towards the castle, as it was getting darker, with heavy clouds moving up from the south.

“I wish I could stay and celebrate with you. But I guess it will be a Gryffindor-only party?” That got a few people in the vicinity laughing, among them Professor Flitwick and Sirius. “Have fun at your party. You have earned it.”

Not really knowing why he said it – and later berating himself while he stood under the heavenly warm water – Harry cheekily tugged at the scarf divided down its middle between the two teams’ colours. “But whatever the outcome of the game would have been, you were guaranteed a reason to celebrate.”

With a small smirk, the slightly taller man nodded his head. “That is true, Henry.” Then he switched to Parseltongue.:I have an appointment with a mind healer. I have heard it helps one to cope with irrational fears and big changes:.

Several people shuddered, or got paler once the hissing started. It was funny how snakes never really made much noise, but the tones of Parseltongue were so easily heard by those not able to understand them.

.:You will call tonight?:. Harry hissed his question back, getting a nod in answer, and then quickly departed to change. It was getting cold standing out here in the light drizzle now falling from the sky. A hot shower sounded like exactly the thing he needed right now.

He was really nervous. How ridiculous was that? And if he hadn’t told his son that he was going to meet with Healer Goyle, he would have moved the appointment. Again. Because this was the third attempt to actually start to work with the woman to get his… feelings sorted out.

He so wished he could just skip this. It felt like weakness, what he was doing. Having feelings at all, caring for others… but avoiding those had gotten him into the trouble he had been in, the trouble he hadn’t really left behind – yet – so doing it again and hoping for a different result would be foolish.

Once he had made his way to her office, he got the new loophole-free secrecy contract out of his robes, and sat down while the woman read the rather large stack of parchment sheets.

Looking around, Marvolo realized that he was rather skittish, and that it was very likely that there would come topics on the table he rather would not speak about.
With a sigh he plucked a tissue paper from a box offering them – probably to be used by patients crying – and waved his wand at it, transfiguring it into a box. A box made out of fine-grained dark wood, a lid attached with brass hinges, and a mechanism to open the box that could be called complicated. Another tissue was transformed into a velvet lining. All these things finished, Marvolo placed the lining into the box, reverently placed his wand on top, and then closed the mechanism. Finally he placed the box outside his easy reach, but still in his line of sight.

“What are you doing, Lord Slytherin?” the Healer asked, placing the quill she had used to sign the contract down on top of the stack.

“Making sure that my temper will not cause your early demise just because I slip in control. This way it will take some time to regain my easiest way of killing you. Hopefully enough to regain my senses and calm down.” Marvolo answered, working hard to keep a moderately calm exterior. It was harder than it had any right to be.

“I thank you for your consideration and foresight,” was the Squib’s calm and collected reaction, while she sat back, a notebook and pencil in hand, her blouse and skirt surrounding her in an aura of professionalism. She was calmer than most people would be in the face of a man so casually mentioning his inclination to kill when upset.

But maybe she had known exactly what she was getting into when she agreed to take him on as a patient. Her nephew was one of his Death Eaters, and she had made a study of the human mind, it was a logical conclusion that she would be prepared.

“You said that you want my help to deal with feelings you do not understand, and find better ways to react to urges new to you?” Her pen was poised for taking notes, and Marvolo was staring at it with dread. Giving trust and control to someone other than himself was hard. Maybe even impossible… maybe he should start with something small.

“That is what I said,” Marvolo agreed reluctantly. He had said as much, but now he wasn’t so sure anymore. “But I think… we might need to start with something… different.” When he had been younger Marvolo had read many works on the human mind and what one might use to manipulate it. And while researching ways to help Henry deal with the trauma he had experienced, he had read up on the newest developments in the field. He knew what the theory said what was needed to help with... problems like his. He was rather reluctant to acknowledge that he had a problem. But the fact was that he was better able to plan, had better control over his magic, and could do more before feeling tired. All hints he had found after his return pointed in the direction of that one conclusion.

How averse to admitting it he might be notwithstanding.

“Currently I experience urges to torture people that frustrate me. I have used duelling practice and conjured objects I let explode to calm the need for destruction. Do you have other suggestions?” He balled his hands into fists, breathing deliberately to remain calm, intent on remaining in control of not only the situation, but himself as well.

“Redirecting violent urges into destroying inanimate objects is a good solution. You might consider other physical activities to get the energy out of your system. Weeding a garden, felling a tree, running… I suggest trying different methods to find those that work the best for you, Lord Slytherin.”

Marvolo nodded, called the box with his wand to his hand, opened the mechanism, and took his wand back. “Thank you, Madame Goyle. I will contact you again for the next appointment.”
He walked out of the office rather quickly, leaving the box behind. That wasn’t what he had wished to accomplish, but in a way it was a start. Everything he had read about it indicated that therapy wasn’t an easy process, and he was doubtful if it was possible for him to give the trust needed to receive help.

He apparated home, intending to get some more planning done. Probably pushed by his vows to be working for the good of their community and his loyal vassals. But whatever the reason for his motivation and energy, he would take full advantage of it.

After dinner, the victory party in the Gryffindor common room really kicked off.

The twins had managed to get pastries, butterbeer, pumpkin juice, and the funnier of their joke products in great quantities, giving their party-catering a decent base. All of the House had added some of their own sweets to the buffet, so now there was quite a feast to be had. Decorations from past festivities – stashed somewhere around the tower until they were needed again – hung from every possible place on the walls and furniture, giving the right atmosphere.

In several corners, some of the older students were cuddling, snogging, and maybe more, mostly ignored by those around them.

Harry sat among his team mates and friends, smiling and just feeling light for once. In a way, this year had been harder than those before so far, but at the same time he had had more adult support than ever before as well.

And now while singing songs, making jokes, and eating some of his favourite foods, there was a small flicker of hope growing that the other Gryffindors might accept that a Parselmouth could be a lion like them, that the family name of Slytherin didn’t automatically made him into an untrustworthy, backstabbing dark wizard. The camaraderie and generally relaxed atmosphere indicated that it just might be possible.

Sadly, Harry didn’t notice the blazing glare sent his way from the other side of the room, where a sulking girl sat, making her friends happy that she seemingly was on her way to feeling better, finally.

oooOOooo

Really late that Saturday evening, Severus found himself sitting in the Dark Lord’s study, a small tumbler of good scotch whiskey in hand. The Potions Master was curious what this meeting was about, and quite happy to not be at the school at the moment. His Slytherins would be bemoaning their loss at Quidditch against Gryffindor, so he was glad for the distraction.

The man sitting behind the desk had a pensive expression on his face, his red eyes unfocused. Suddenly he started to speak, still staring off into the distance. “What is your view on de-aging potions, Severus?”
One dark brow rose slightly in interest. That was a most controversial topic. Disregarding the ideas springing up in his mind of why his Lord had chosen this particular topic, Severus took a sip from his drink before starting on somewhat of a rant. “As most do at some point, I studied what is known about the theory behind de-aging, while I worked for my Mastery. I, personally, feel it is an unattainable goal.” He made a small waving gesture with his empty hand. “The costs to counterbalance the gain are simply too high. If we assume that de-aging is successfully attained when the witch or wizard regresses in body and mind back to a younger, former version of themselves, ageing after that like any normal human would, then some accidents in potions development have caused true de-aging. But,” he couldn’t help the sneer crossing his face, and noted the amused glint in his Lord’s eyes over his passionate speech, “the side effects of these successful instances have been severe indeed.”

A questioning look and a wave of the slim hand, prompted the Potions Master to continue. “Blindness, deafness, infertility, loss of all memories, loss of magic… I could go on for a while. Some of those that did survive the initial change killed themselves after a few years because of depression-like states that couldn’t be treated with potions. They never were happy. About anything. I feel that the gained additional years of life are balanced out by a cost equalling that gain.” For a moment Severus gazed into his tumbler, swirling the amber-coloured liquid. “I quickly came to the conclusion that the price was too high, and directed my interests elsewhere.”

“So you claim that all potions have a cost counterbalancing the gain we get from their use?” The Dark Lord sounded a little sceptical, but clearly was willing to listen to Severus’ explanation.

So, Severus nodded. “I do, my Lord. For most potions, it is the time needed to brew them. The more powerful potions take months to brew. Another part of the costs are the ingredients. Some are rare, or dangerous to work with, or even to get access to. One error in the process can be deadly, or at least cost all that already went into it, making high levels of skill necessary for success. In a way, brewing a potion resembles the workings of a ritual, channelling the magic to combine the aspects of the ingredients to achieve the desired goal.”

A contemplative silence descended onto the room. Severus sipped his drink, glancing in the direction of the Dark Lord, who was obviously deep in thought.

“How would you go about passing a wizard off as his own son if you had to?” The question was stated quite innocently, but Severus had to employ his Occlumency to keep himself from snorting. However it was phrased, there was an order hidden in there.

He quickly went over what might work, before he assembled something that maybe could be called a plan. “I would probably go with a shrinking solution to shrink the person to a size to match the age aimed for, and later use the counter-potion in carefully measured and calculated doses to make it seem as if the person does age and grow.”

The Dark Lord leaned forward in his seat, steeping his fingers under his chin, his elbows resting on the leather surface of the desk. He frowned. “I remember quite distinctly, Professor Slughorn testing the classes’ potions on a few potted plants. They simply shrank in size but remained adult plants, just in miniature.”

Severus nodded. “It is the only remaining legal use of the potion. It affects plants and animals, as well as humans, quite differently. While it shrinks plants and let’s them keep their mature appearance, it makes animals – mammals, fish, amphibians, and so on – appear younger. Once it was used to keep pets in their cute infant stages until they died of old age.” Even if he found little kittens and puppies cute, he never would say it out loud. The appearance aimed to trigger caring instincts in adults of their species worked on him as well. There was no shame in that. “Now it is “Clearly this was some potions trivia the Dark Lord never had bothered to learn. And who would blame him? It truly was not something that factored into conquering the country. Or so Severus had thought.

“That sounds like a workable idea. Please write up a plan of how long preparations would take, ingredients needed, and everything else, if you would have to apply this to two men aged in their mid-thirties, changing them to no younger than twelve. I also want you to research rituals that can be used to adopt an adult, or change their appearance to match other parents than the one they really had…” It was clear that his Lord was unhappy that he didn’t know a more precise way to describe what he wanted.

Bowing his head, accepting his new mission, Severus clarified the order to make sure he had gathered the important points correctly. “I will make a plan of dosage and preparation for the shrinking solution and its antidote. And I will research rituals and potions to change an adult’s parentage, I assume for someone in their thirties?”

“That is correct. You might use the library here in the house. If you require a text you can’t find here, in your own collection, or in those of the other Death Eaters, inform me and I will endeavour to acquire it.”

It was early in the morning of Sunday before Severus got back to the school. He was called to the Headmaster’s office by the man’s Patronus to report before he had managed to get to his quarters. Carefully checking his Occlumency shields and recalling what he would tell the Headmaster about the prolonged meeting with the Dark Lord, Severus prepared on the way.

The Dark Lord’s wish to know every bit that Severus could tell him about what Mr. Slytherin was doing at school, reports on other children and what the Order was doing, as well as more tutoring-session plans for over the Christmas holiday, and the excuse of potions to identify burned human remains, would be enough to explain the long meeting.

Hopefully.

With a sigh the Potions Master walked the deserted hallways, watched by a few sleepy portraits, up to the Headmaster’s office, opposite to the direction he wished to take.

ooooOOooo

In the dark common room of Gryffindor Tower, a girl crept down the stairs from the girls' dorm, wand lit with a lumos, casting dancing shadows over the remains of the party that had finally ended almost an hour ago. It had been rather easy to stay awake behind the curtains of her bed with the anticipation and anger coursing through her.

How could they all celebrate that traitor for catching the snitch? It was all too clear that he had no pride in Gryffindor at all. Shaking hands with those slimy snakes, as if they were worth more than the mud the pitch had turned to under all the student’s feet.

She carefully stepped over an upturned old chair, reaching the bottom of the stairs up to the boys’ dorms. She knew that his rooms were at the very top. Even higher up than the rooms used by the Head Boy, if he was a Gryffindor. What a ridiculous thing. As if he was better than everyone else.
She snorted and started to ascend the stairs. She had practiced the spell she wanted to use on Friday evening, while all the others had been down in the Great Hall, listening to the poisoned tongue of the boy who had ripped her love from her.

Cormac had written a letter that his father had not managed to deflect the unfair, unfounded accusations. But at least her one and only love wouldn’t have to go to Azkaban. But he wouldn’t return to Hogwarts either. He had told her that he would go to one of the smaller schools over on the continent. Her love had tried to let it sound as if it had been his decision, but... she just knew that the slander had made the other school decline his request to attend lessons there.

But he would be really proud of her once he heard what she was about to do.

Finally she had reached a place where there was a kind of prickly feeling on her skin, just before she would come in actual contact with the wards. She would place her spell here, and then watch in the morning what the effect would be. There was no way that the snooty prat would look and notice before he tripped the spell. He would get his punishment for all that he had done to destroy her life.

It was early in the morning, and Harry couldn’t sleep anymore. It was too early for his friends to be awake, and he just couldn’t stay in bed. He felt restless. So he got out of his bed and into his new warm clothing. It felt wonderful wearing trousers and a shirt that actually fit, shoes not held together with tape and wishing, a jumper without holes. It felt so good to finally have an adult caring for the most basic of things. Sometimes he just caressed the softness of his clothes, remembering how the Dursleys always had claimed that he was a burden and they were providing even more than they should for him.

With an abrupt motion Harry turned to take his warm cloak from its peg by the door and opened it. He would take a stroll over the grounds – maybe to the greenhouses or the lake – to calm down a little before he went to eat something for breakfast. After that he might be in the right frame of mind to start on his homework. Or plan the next Defence Club meeting. It had been cool how many had come. Harry wanted to help them all, and didn’t want to disappoint Hermione.

Slowly walking down the steps around the tower, Harry checked that he had his mittens and hat. It would be rather cold outside, after all, it still was dark, not a hint of dawn to see. Looking up – satisfied that he had everything to stay warm while taking a walk – Harry caught a peek of the door to the currently empty-standing Headboy's room, when his foot caught on something, the boy lost his footing and fell forwards.

Caught off guard, falling too fast to get out his wand to cast some charm, some spell, Harry tried to break his fall with his arms outstretched before him. His hands collided with the stairs, pain travelling up his arms, the sickening crunch of breaking bones vibrating through his body. Harry curled into a ball, cursing in his mind, before his tumbling down the circular stairs caused his head to ring and spin so badly that he no longer could think straight.

Fred lay awake in his bed, studying the canopy of it, puzzling over a problem with their portable swamp plan. The last test they had made was just a little too watery, where the one before that had been a little too close to porridge. The consistency they were aiming for and the plants that should grow at the edges were not quite right just yet.

While he thought about a way to counter the poisonous effect of the one ingredient that ensured the perfect consistence, he heard a muffled cry followed by something heavy falling down the stairs outside their dorm. He knew that sound because George and he had thrown their trunks and those of their dorm mates down the very same stairs some years earlier. But at this time of day, paired with the cry, it was highly unlikely to have been someone having fun.

He bolted out of his bed – barely managing to not get tangled into his deep red bed curtains – and came face-to-face with his frantic but still sleepy-looking brother. They didn’t need to say a word, and stormed out of the room without slipping on their bathrobes or slippers, only making sure that they had their wands with them.

It didn’t take them long to get to the common room, finding a crumbled form unmoving on the floor at the foot of the stairs. Fred rushed forward, wondering who of the other Gryffindor boys had managed to get up so early and then managed to fall down the stairs. Before he had even checked who it was, he heard his brother hurry up the stairs. They needed Madame Pomfrey, and only a prefect could use the floo to inform a teacher and the medi-witch.

With a steady hand – experimenting for the development of their products had hardened him somewhat against accidents – the twin moved the fabric of a high quality cloak away from the head and face of the boy. He gasped and quickly checked for a heartbeat when he saw it was Harry. Why would their Seeker lose his footing? He was one of the least clumsy people he knew. Not daring to move the younger boy, Fred just sat there helplessly, listening to thumping feet on the stairs. Help was coming.

Minerva watched with a really bad feeling about this accident while Poppy moved the body of Harry Potter – she might have to call him Slytherin in class, but he would always be the son of James and Lily for her – out of the Gryffindor Common room. Something felt fishy about the whole thing. But now was not the time to chase after a mouse like that.

Getting out her wand, Minerva conjured her patronus. “Severus, Mr. Slytherin fell down the stairs and is unconscious. Poppy is taking him to the hospital wing. I think you are the better choice to inform his guardian.” Her silvery cat patronus vanished through the floor on the most direct way to the Potions Master and resident spy.

Despite his prickly exterior, Minerva had come to appreciate the dry wit and sarcasm of her younger colleague. As a spy in the ranks of the Death Eaters, it was his job to keep his cover by providing useful information. If she was able to help keep him safe with something that would have to be told anyway, she would do so without thinking twice.

After that was finished, the Head of House Gryffindor turned with a flaring tartan night robe to face the gathered students. Addressing the prefects, she gave orders to the whole House. “Make sure that no one goes up to where Mr. Slytherin likely faltered on the steps. Prepare for Aurors to come by and take your statements. I will arrange for breakfast to be delivered here, as many of you will not be able to get dressed. Please stay calm, you will be kept informed about Mr. Slytherin’s wellbeing.” With the last sentence she looked over at the Weasleys, huddled together on one of the saggy couches – she probably should replace some of the ones worse off – framing a nervous looking Miss Weasley and a teary-eyed Miss Granger. Now she would first go to her rooms to dress, before venturing to the infirmary. The poor boy got no rest.

It had been a sleepless night. And because he still wasn’t calm enough to sleep, he had called the three Lestrange men to his study to discuss his idea of how to give the two brothers a new chance at a life.

At the moment they were eating an early breakfast – Marvolo had selected a bowl of porridge with cream, honey, and sweet cherries – while Rabastan and Rodolphus contemplated the reasons for and against pretending to be their own sons. It was obvious that they were reluctant to commit to this plan.

“You know that this is only a tentative plan at this point, don’t you?” Marvolo asked, filling his cup with fresh tea, adding three spoons of sugar before stirring. Their careful glances were stating clearly that they were not so sure about that. “Passing you off as your own sons would work as a way to keep you in your own family. But changing your identity is something we can’t avoid, if you don’t want to go into permanent hiding as Augustus has elected to do.” He had been surprised when Augustus had asked if he could stay hidden and devote his whole time to research. But if he considered the man’s interests and goals, it wasn’t as odd a choice as it first had seemed to be. And as he was sure to have enough material to occupy several wizards with research for decades, he had agreed.

Rabastan nodded. “We are aware, my Lord. But I think I speak for both my brother and myself, when I say that we are reluctant to undergo puberty and school a second time.”

Marvolo nodded, conceding the point. The life of a teenager wasn’t the easiest one – even if his own memories were clouded quite a bit, the gist of it was clear enough – and waiting several years before becoming an adult again, adding on top of that the stigma of being the son of a Death Eater… he could understand why they were reluctant to go that way.

“Maybe we could make you into sons of mine, from a different woman?” Xerxes suddenly suggested, causing slow blinking, incredulous looks from his sons. “What? You could be close to your current age, would be part of the family… and as bastards, not eligible for the position as heir. It could work.” Marvolo's old friend shrugged and then grinned at the dumbfounded look on his son’s faces.

Before Marvolo had time to contemplate that idea and the possible implications, a silver-shimmering doe came through the wall, stopping prancing before the man sitting at the head of the table. “My Lord, your heir is in the infirmary. He fell down the stairs from his room to the common room. He’ll live. I’m awaiting you at the gates.”

Without glancing back at the others, Marvolo was out of his chair and the house, and into the small garden behind it, where he apparated to the gates of the old Castle.
His Potions Master was waiting for him, giving a shallow bow from his neck, turning to walk up the path to the school at a brisk pace.

Without prompting, Severus started on his report. “The Weasley twins heard something heavy fall down the stairs. One of them claims to have heard a cry, or yell. As far as I know, your son has several broken bones, but Madame Pomfrey should be able to tell you more once we reach the infirmary.”

Marvolo opted not to answer. He was planning furiously. It was highly unlikely that his son had had an accident. So someone must have done something to make him fall. Down the stairs. So, another murder attempt. The third in as many months. The poisoning resulting in dehydration could have been deadly with another dosage. He would need to call Malcolm to keep watch over what the medi-witch did. And there needed to be an investigation. Maybe he should try to convince Henry to ask for a re-sorting. If he became a Slytherin, Marvolo would be able to shield him much better. He would be safer in Hufflepuff and Ravenclaw as well.

Two minds were whirling as the two dark men walked all the way to the infirmary in silence.

When Harry regained some measure of consciousness, the first thing he noticed was the thick fog in his brain, slowing down his ability to think, making his thoughts sluggish. The next was the pain he felt in several parts of his body. When he tried to move – feebly at best – he couldn’t. Maybe some form of restraint? Harry wasn’t sure what exactly had happened, and his slow mind was of no help at all.

Next he noticed two people talking, standing close to his bed. A woman and a man, most likely. At first he couldn’t understand what they were talking about, but they sounded like they didn’t like each other. There was a frosty undertone to their conversation.

Floating between waking and sleeping, Harry listened, content not to struggle to come to full consciousness, he didn’t want to face whatever was waiting for him. From the reason he felt like a train had hit him to whatever might have caused it, there was no wish to see it right now. Resting sounded like a really good idea.

“What were your actions until now?” the male voice asked with a distant politeness.

“He has a concussion, so I didn’t dare risk a sleeping- or pain-relief potion. Skele-Gro is necessary with this extensive number of fractures, but as he takes potions regularly to supplement his intake of nutrients, and to heal long-lasting damage, I only immobilized the injured parts and waited for you, Healer Greengrass,” answered the female voice, obviously annoyed that she had to speak with the other.

The man hummed, parchment rustled. “The potions Heir Slytherin-Potter has to take have no adverse reactions to being combined with Skele-Gro. There is no need to keep delaying the healing of that many broken bones. Thank you, Madame Pomfrey, for the excellent care you show our patient.” He sounded not as distant as the woman, but reserved.

“Will you tell me why Mr. Slytherin has to take those potions? I know what they are typically used for, but I feel the need to know for sure.” She had a quiet intensity in her voice. It was really important to her to get the answer to that question.

There was a sigh. “I will need the permission of my patient and his guardian, and your vow not to tell anyone. But when my patient’s guardian doesn’t agree, I will not be able to tell you anything.” The man was almost whispering now, while Harry still was floating on a nice cloud of carelessness.

There was some rustling of clothes, the clinking of glass against glass, and then the murmured words of some spell. A few heartbeats later, Harry felt himself moving away from the waking world, closer to dreams and sleep. Maybe he had been given some potions, but all in all he didn’t really care, whatever had happened had brought him to the hospital wing, both his healer and the Hogwarts medi-witch were here. He was safe and cared for. He could sleep and let them deal with the problems.

His last thought before sleep claimed him was that Madame Pomfrey was really good at chasing people away who would bother her patients. She would keep them all away.

On the other side of the room, well away from the beds and the space the healers would need to do their work, there stood a small group of people. The Headmaster looked grave, as was proper for such a situation, Professor McGonagall as Henry’s Head of House, and Professor Severus Snape, as Marvolo had insisted the man stay. At the moment, Marvolo was seconds away from starting to pace in agitation. The Headmaster was infuriating as usual. Or maybe even more so.

“I want Aurors to come here and check the cause for my son’s fall down the stairs,” the dark-haired wizard almost growled. Why the Headmaster was this stubborn about it was almost inconceivable. Why the man insisted on being so contrary made no sense to Marvolo. All he achieved by his actions was pushing away his allies. Or at least it looked that way when he considered the face Minerva McGonagall made.

“I don’t think it is necessary to involve the Ministry in this, Tom. Everyone stumbles from time to time. Just last week I almost tripped over my own robes on the way down from my rooms to the office.” Luckily the old man didn’t smile when he told this anecdote, so Marvolo managed to keep the fury and anger caused by his worry – however hard it might be to admit this even in his own head – and just clenched his fists at his sides.

“Don’t be so stubborn, Albus,” the Head of Gryffindor scoffed at the Headmaster, before she turned to face Marvolo. “I made certain no students would come near the likely place the fall down the stairs started. If it was an accident, the Aurors could prove it without a doubt. And if it wasn’t, we would know as well. If we don’t call them, there are grounds for doubt, considering all that has happened so far this year.”

A debate started between the Headmaster and his Deputy, arguing back and forth, going in circles. Dark blue eyes – Marvolo had remembered to glamour his eyes just in time on their way up to the castle – met dark ones and from one moment to the other there was a familiar presence at the front of his mind. Marvolo saw pages being flipped over in something like a fast-forward replay. Then the flipping stopped and Marvolo got a good look at what was a page in the handbook on the currently valid and most-used Hogwarts bylaws. The page detailed the rights a parent had. Asking for neutral investigation of an accident that had happened on school grounds was one of them.

Sending an image of an approving nod back into his Potions Master’s mind, Marvolo prepared to interrupt the heated but useless discussion.

Out of the corner of his eyes he noticed that Malcolm and the school’s medi-witch were still standing next to Henry’s bed. To distract himself from what was happening there, he turned to the still-ongoing discussion. He could wait for hours for a lull in that particular conversation. The Headmaster maintained the point that it had been an accident and to bring Aurors into the school again would stir up unrest, harming the students. The Deputy-Headmistress insisted that not calling someone to prove beyond doubt would cause worry and rumours to run rampant.

“It is a moot point, what you are discussing, Headmaster, Professor. I insist that a neutral party come here and make sure my son has not been attacked for a third time. I will not budge in this. I propose that we ask Madame Bones to select a team and head the investigation.” He really wanted this investigation to start. It seemed like his point had been made, as the Headmaster nodded in the direction of the only witch in their group, sending her off to inform the requested party of what was happening at Hogwarts.

Paying neither man still standing just inside the infirmary any attention, Marvolo moved over to the bed his son was lying in. He was a horrifying sight. His arms and legs were in braces, and a sort of collar held his neck immobile. Bruises were starting to form. If the boy had any less luck, Henry could have died in this fall. A third time… having another human – mortal – being needed for his plans was hard to bear.

A chair floated over and he sat down, both the witch and the wizard turning to him.

Giving the wizard seniority – the medi-witch was older, but the Healer was of greater medical authority – Madame Pomfrey stepped back as the younger Healer started to talk. “A concussion, broken wrists as well as ulna and radius in both arms, several bruised and cracked ribs, bruises in several places on his body, sprained ankle, and a broken fibula. He will recover, but it will take time. At the moment your son is sleeping, Lord Slytherin. It will be some time before he regains consciousness.”

“Thank you, both of you. I will be staying here.”

It didn’t take long for Marvolo to be alone with his son, contemplating what he might say to get the boy to ask for a re-sorting. He was absolutely sure that this wasn’t the result of an accident.

oooOOooo

John trailed behind Madame Bones on the path up to the castle from the gates. Shacklebolt was walking at his side. They both had donned their warmer crimson robes, as it looked like it would start to snow soon so far up north. Their boss – or rather, the boss of their boss in the Ministry – had been furious when the message from Hogwarts had reached her.

It seemed this year was one for serious cases. Very different from their usual fare of thefts, drunken brawls, fighting between family members… tattling on someone who might have some forbidden dark artefacts or books in his or her possession usually was the most serious their cases got.

Dementors set on children, torture of children, and two murder attempts were a real deviation from the norm.

“What do you think, Shacklebolt? Accident or murder attempt?” A cold burst of wind tore at their robes, and John saw his partner cast a new warming charm on his robes.

“I think we shouldn’t make any premature assumptions about what happened. But we might speculate about the reason we’ve been placed on the same case. Again,” was the dry response of the dark-skinned man walking beside him.
With a nod, John conceded the point. It would predispose them to interpret what they saw in a certain way. So he turned to the other question. Why were they placed together again?

“Maybe because we're good working together? I guess we would have to ask Scrimgeour to know for sure.”

“Probably.” They walked the rest of the way in silence, both deep in thought. John thought about the problem of their prolonged partnership, for the both of them. He was fairly sure that no one knew he was a Death Eater. He had never been named, because he had been a pretty new recruit at the end of the last war. And he was equally sure that their superiors didn’t know of the likely association of Shacklebolt with the Order of the Phoenix. But their different political leanings were known, and their obvious success in the last – difficult – investigation they had conducted together could have sparked an idea. Maybe they were working so well together because they complemented each other? If someone wanted to use that, it was likely they would be placed on many cases as a team.

Fred and George were sitting on the bottom step of the stairway up to the boys' dorms. They were making sure that not one of the other Gryffindors would walk up to the place where Harry had faltered in his stride and fallen down the stairs.

The normally easygoing and cheery red-headed teenagers now looked rather foreboding and grim. Harry was like another younger brother to them, had given them the money they had needed to pursue their chosen profession. Without his help they wouldn’t have been able to start on the serious development of their products.

The first pranks had been funny, if a little too focused on just one person. But funny. The laxative had been poorly executed. Either it had been a careless prank, or a sloppy attempt at murder. Everything after that had been horrible.

They felt the need to make sure to remove those that had caused all this from Gryffindor. Those actions were against everything the proud House of Lions stood for.

The room was filled with students. The girls had fetched homework and textbooks from their rooms. They had even managed to get dressed. The boys were still in whatever they had been wearing to bed. It was a sight to behold. If the atmosphere had been less tense, it might have been a lovely Sunday morning.

The portrait opened, and Professor McGonagall climbed through the hole, followed by a woman with short grey hair, and a pair of Aurors. “Attention! After the Aurors have inspected the scene, you all will be able to return to your dorms. I’m happy to inform you that Mr. Slytherin will be back in classes soon. Messrs Weasley, Madame Bones wants to speak with you. As you are of age, you may speak with her alone, but if you want me to be present, I will, of course, stay.”

Fred looked over to his brother and saw that his twin had come to the same conclusion. There was no need to ask for the Professor to stay. “Thank you, Professor, but we can speak with Madame Bones without your presence.”

The two Aurors went up the stairs, while the twin pranksters spoke to the Head of Magical Law Enforcement. They recounted the few facts they knew, talking about the party of the evening before and when it had ended.

It wasn’t long until they had finished their account and the two Aurors came back down. The one man, his dark skin contrasting nicely with his robes, turned to the twins. “Can you tell me who can get past the wards at the top of the stairs and what’s behind them?”

“Sure, Auror, those are the wards protecting the room Harry sleeps in. He's set the wards to only let friends get past them. I think the staff and prefects can get through, too.”

A few others – Ron and Hermione, Neville, Colin, and Ginny – were hovering nearby, clearly eavesdropping on the conversation. The whole room was silent, not something that happened often. But it was the reason that not only those nearest were able to hear the short report the Aurors gave to the Head of the DMLE.

“We think that we found the fraying remains of a simple tripping jinx that was set near the last step that can be reached without crossing the wards. But it was a simple one, once tripped, it is prone to vanish in a short time. No way to tell who cast it,” the shorter of the two Aurors, the one with brown hair and light skin, said with a helpless shrug.

“So we will need to interrogate all the Gryffindors?” Madame Bones rubbed her hand over her eyes. It was an enormous task.

From the sidelines of the circular common room up in Gryffindor Tower, a girl looked on, conflicted. It seemed quite possible that she could get away with almost killing that slimey snake of a traitor. Because if she didn’t tell, not even a priori incantatem would reveal that she had been the one to set up that simple tripping jinx – with its helpful warning not to use it where people could fall down a ledge or something – because she had used a lumos to get back to her bed right after setting it.

But if no one found out, then she wouldn’t get the credit for her clever plan. Cormac wouldn’t get to know, her darling would be oblivious of the lengths she’d gone through to avenge him.

Getting away with it would be fantastic, but she wanted Cormac to know what she was willing to do for him.

So she watched the Aurors and Madame Bones talking, probably planning what to do next, the students sitting around aimlessly, watching.

“Are you okay, Julie?” one of her friends asked, sitting down in a sagging crimson chair next to her. “You look like you didn’t sleep too well.”

Without a glance at the other girl, all too often vanishing in the background just like herself and the others in their year, Julie got up from her chair, shoving a few first-years out of the way, walking on the most straight line towards the Ministry employees.

“Julie!” the call of her friend was full of worry and concern, but Julie didn’t listen. She was sure of what she would do. She wanted to let Cormac know what had happened, wanted them all to know how that traitorous snake had ruined her life. With each step, her determination grew, her face flushed in her anger, her steps got more forceful.

“I had hoped that the traitor would die! That we would be rid of him!” she screeched, her face contorted into an ugly grimace. “But, nooo! He ruins Cormac’s life, ruins mine, but he will live a happy life! With money, fame, prestige!” She started to punch the nearest Auror, wand forgotten in the pocket of the robe she preferred on Sundays. “He ruins everything! Why can’t he just vanish?!” Wracked with hysterical sobs, her hands fisted into the heavy robes of the Auror, Julie Parkes sank down to her knees, spent.

With short concerned looks between the Ministry personnel, the young girl was hoisted up between the two men, while Professor McGonagall escorted Madame Bones up to the girl’s dorm to search for further evidence.

oooOOooo

After a small meal at the bedside of his son, Marvolo listened to the report John Dawlish was giving him, while Severus was standing to the side, representing the school in all of this. The Headmaster had tried to place Minerva there, as the boy's Head of House, but she had insisted on staying at the side of the girl confessing to setting the tripping jinx with the intention of killing Henry.

Filius Flitwick and Pomona Sprout were tasked with watching over the rest of the student population, so only the Head of Slytherin was available to watch over the injured student and the Auror investigating the incident on a parent's insistence.

“We aren’t yet sure she actually did cause the fall of your son, Lord Slytherin. But it is quite possible that her confession is true. Madame Bones found letters from Cormac McLaggen that contained a lot of accusations aimed at your son.” Only with great concentration had the wizard managed to not kneel, or stand at attention in Marvolo’s presence, causing a bubble of amusement that quickly died again. While his son lay unconscious in a hospital bed there wasn’t much that could hold his interest for long, or amuse him.

Marvolo stood, and started to pace. Sitting this long on a chair was taking its toll on his back. “So she set a trap for my son in an attempt to kill him. Encouraged by her boyfriend? Maybe a desire to make Henry pay for perceived wrongs?” He sighed and rubbed his eyes. “So the boy gets away with his attack because he claims the Death of Cedric Diggory – his supposed friend – has shaken him so badly that he blames Henry for it, reacting with pranks that got out of hand. The others claim that they were influenced by McLaggen…” Thank you, John, please keep me informed.” It had been so much easier when he could send a death squad after those that had infuriated him.

With a small bow from the neck, the Auror and Death Eater retreated from the infirmary, leaving behind the Dark Lord and the Head of Slytherin House.

Silence fell over the room until Marvolo started to speak about a thought that was on his mind, since he had heard that a girl – the girlfriend of the original attacker – had caused the latest incident. “It is remarkable what love for another can make humans do.” Stopping before one of the windows, looking out over the grounds getting darker by the minute, Marvolo spoke in a contemplative tone. “You changed your alliance during a war. It caused Henry’s mother to step between a murderer and her son. And now a girl throws away her entire future to gain the approval of another teenager, who probably will forget her soon. I can’t claim to understand, really understand, why love has these consequences… Be prepared for the eventual re-sorting of my son. As soon as he regains consciousness, I will urge him to ask for it.”

As always, the Potions Master picked up on the dismissal without problems. Intelligent followers were preferable to pure muscle. They didn’t need as much guidance. But they did need a little more supervision, as they were prone to having their own goals.

Now alone again, Marvolo walked a few more steps, before he settled into his chair again, preparing to wait some more. Maybe he should ask Xerxes to take over communication with the media – especially that vicious Miss Skeeter – as he was aware he was letting his duties slide by staying with his son. Or maybe he should say, letting his other duties slide, because staying with his injured son after another attempt at murder was one of his duties, too.

“You think I should ask to be re-sorted?” Harry asked from his bed, opening his eyes tiredly. He watched as Marvolo settled more comfortably into the chair by his bedside before turning blue eyes to the teen.

It was a little unsettling to see those blue eyes in the familiar face. Whenever they talked over the mirror in the evening, Marvolo let his eyes stay as they were, red as rubies, and to see them glamoured now was not something he was used to.

Marvolo nodded. “I think you should. But my opinion is not the deciding one.” The look the man sent the teen sitting up in bed was a pointed one. “What do you think you should do?” Harry huffed, and frowned down at his hands, still in splints so he wouldn’t move the complicated fractures until they were healed.

“I’m not sure. I felt safe again with the new room. The constant pranks had to stop and they did. But now…” he trailed off. Now it was all too clear that there might still be people in his House who would attack him. The past hadn’t painted the best picture of their loyalty to a House member, or their tolerance towards a Slytherin – regardless if it was one by family name or sorting – so it was a real possibility that the atmosphere would remain tense for the rest of this year and the next two.

But would re-sorting into another House change that? Or would he be placed in Gryffindor again? Probably not. He had asked to not be sorted into Slytherin the first time, and the Hat had listened, to assume that the Hat would listen again wasn’t that much of a stretch.

Harry sighed, propped up on his pillow, he felt vulnerable. He felt as if the decision had already been made. “But would it be better anywhere else?”

“I think that you would be safer. Slytherin would respect you, if maybe only for your name and connection to me. Hufflepuff and Ravenclaw are much less inclined to oppose someone simply because their family is associated with Slytherin. The Headmaster has concentrated his efforts to gain allies against Voldemort on Gryffindor House. Consequently, families sorting regularly into the House of Lions suffered greatly during the war.” The older wizard spoke in soft tones, his hands resting folded in his lap, one leg thrown over the other, a picture of calm and poise.

“So you think I should ask for a re-sort. And what would you say if I was sorted into Hufflepuff?”
Some time into the regular mirror calls, Harry had started to use 'sir' less and less often. And ignoring the rule established during their very first meeting, Marvolo hadn’t insisted on the use of the address.

Now the man shrugged, smiling slightly. “Hufflepuff lays emphasis on hard work and loyalty. Both are characteristics that someone can be proud of.” Both of them knew of the negative prejudice most people held for Hufflepuff. The House of those fitting nowhere else, of the dregs of society.

It was probably a parent thing to say kind things to nervous kids. However old they might be. “And your real thoughts on this?” Harry was sceptical that Marvolo had told the truth.

“That is my real opinion on Hufflepuff. I had a few followers who had been in Hufflepuff. I only ever had real problems recruiting Gryffindors. So there are children of my people in all the Houses but Gryffindor. They could influence the situation in your favour.”

The rest of the time Marvolo could stay he spent telling Harry of his travels just after school, while he had been working in a shop situated on Knockturn Alley. Borgin and Burkes. A place selling and buying old and questionable objects, more often than not things the Ministry would call dark. Visiting places to acquire such objects, investigating their value. It was an interesting way to pass the time until Madame Pomfrey brought a small bowl of broth for Harry’s dinner.

With the promise to be back the next morning, Marvolo reluctantly left.

Harry endured being spoon-fed, happy that his guardian was not there to watch, and then settled down, waiting for his friends to show up.

ooOoo

Hermione looked around the infirmary as she and Ron walked through the door. They wanted to talk to their friend, and had been told he was awake, so they had made their way up straight after dinner.

Once the two of them walked around the screen surrounding the bed, seeing a chair near the bed, they spotted Harry and more or less successfully suppressed gasps. Harry looked horrible. With the purple bruising on his face, the casts on his arms, and the white sheets, he looked so small in his bed.

Green eyes opened, and the injured teenager flashed them a tired smile. “Hello, Hermione, Ron! Come, sit, and tell me everything. I haven’t had many visitors.”

“Not even… Lord Slytherin?” Ron faltered before he could decide what name to use for Harry’s guardian. He blushed because it was obvious both of his friends had noticed his indecision.

Hermione went to get a second chair to sit on, and only got to listen to Harry’s response to that question. “He was here. For quite some time, too. But besides him and Madame Pomfrey, I haven’t seen anyone. And they couldn’t tell me what I want to know anyway.” Hermione levitated the chair she had found, seizing the opportunity to practice. “So. What’s the talk in the common room?”

In logical order Hermione started to recount the rumours and happenings from the common room, generously embellished by Ron. Harry nodded along, trying to distract himself from the growing pain in his broken bones by listening to the tale. It filled in some of the holes, but Harry had to concede that, barring the rumours, he had already known the facts.

“So the speculations over a possible re-sort are overflowing again,” Hermione concluded her report. “Is the option on the table?”

Harry nodded cautiously, making a grimace at the twinge in his chest. “Yeah, my guardian said he wishes for me to ask for a re-sort. Explained that he thinks the other Houses would be safer for me.” Wiggling his nose, as it was itching and he couldn’t scratch it, Harry searched for the words that would explain to his oldest friends his stance on the whole re-sorting thing. He could see that Ron was fighting with himself, probably to not blurt out the first things that came to mind. “You’ve seen what the others think of a Slytherin in Gryffindor. Even if it is only by adoption... the atmosphere just isn’t right anymore.” Harry turned his eyes to the red-faced wizard standing next to their bushy-haired friend. “The rest of this year, two years more, with new first-years coming in... I feel like I won't have a safe place in the tower for the rest of the time we'll be in school here.” He sighed. It was clear that Ron wasn’t happy with the idea of Harry's being placed in a different House. But he couldn’t say anything to dispute the problems Harry had laid out, however much he wanted to, it simply was the truth.

“If you can’t feel safe any longer, Harry. I think it is best to let the Hat put you somewhere else. But you are aware that there will be a lot of fuss about something like this?” Hermione was once again the voice of reason.

“Yes, Hermione, I know. But I’m sure that it can only get better, because the rivalry isn’t as bad between the other two Houses and Slytherin… So... I can count on you staying my friends? Because that is the only point keeping me back. I don’t want to lose you.”

With reassuring words and nods – Ron’s not as convincing as Hermione’s – his two friends said goodbye as Madame Pomfrey decided it was time for them to leave.

Once the Matron was alone with her patient she came over to Harry’s bed, a phial filled with potion in her hand. “You will take this pain-relief potion, and then you will sleep. I should be able to let you go back to your lessons sometime tomorrow. At the latest, you should be able to leave before dinner. Bottoms up!”

She held the phial up to Harry’s mouth – as he was unable to hold it himself – so the teenager could drink down the potion. After that she helped her patient to settle somewhat comfortably under the covers, before she left to let him sleep.

Tomorrow would be an interesting day. And that was one of the few certain things remaining.

oooOOooo

Dust covered every horizontal surface and quite a few of the walls in the entryway of the old house Severus was contemplating – not for the first time – selling. But as the neighbourhood only got worse with time, the prices for land and houses were steadily declining. Not a good time to sell.

But today he wasn’t here to contemplate the meagre belongings his father had managed to gain and leave for his son. No, he was here to have a look at the things his mother had stored in the cellar one afternoon while her husband had been out drinking with his friends.

He was reasonably sure that the trunk and boxes held the information he needed. Information on the requirements to claim the Prince seat on the Wizengamot. As far as Severus knew, there still was an old manor somewhere, and some valuables in a vault. And the Prince family had been small for the last several generations. He probably was the most eligible descendant of the family for the Lordship. At least concerning the most direct and shortest line descending from an actual member of the core family. Severus’ mother had been a Prince, even when all contact between her and the family had stopped once she had married Tobias Snape.

Severus walked down the stairs into the darkness of the shallow cellar, reeking of mildew, damp earth, and stale air. He cast a lumos and started to pick his way through the room between old cardboard boxes and furniture.

After some time – and much suppressed cussing – Severus found the trunk he was searching for under a moth-eaten, faded blanket. For a moment the young wizard pondered the best way to proceed from here. There wasn’t much room to move down here. Bent almost in two to avoid bumping his head, Severus cast a spell on one of the broken chairs standing about, causing it to glow. With his wand now no longer occupied with a lumos, he could use it to levitate the clutter standing all around to make a way from the place where the trunk sat to the door. Before he would sit here in the cellar to go through the documents, hell would freeze over.

Levitating the trunk out of the cellar was no easy task, and once the old and battered trunk touched down on the faded, threadbare carpet, Severus made himself a cup of coffee, washing the stale taste from his mouth.

After a good stretch – bending in two was not good for his back – he sat down on the floor and opened the trunk. It was filled to the brim with books, letters, unbound parchment, wizarding photographs, as well as different knick-knacks. Sighing, Severus braced himself for long hours of searching through years of repressed memories and attempts at communication.

Some hours later – in the early hours of Monday – the living room was covered with several stacks of books, letters, and parchment. But the really important bits of information Severus had taken into the kitchen, placing them on the rickety table by the window. It was still dark outside, and the flickering street lamp wasn’t able to cast a steady light on the overgrown front garden.

Taking sips from his honey-sweetened hot drink, Severus organized the information he had found. One was a letter from his grandparents, whom he had never met, writing to his mother after Severus had started at Hogwarts, telling her that they had made him the heir. Sadly, his mother had made no comments on this and obviously hadn’t accepted the offer for money. If she had done, he certainly wouldn’t have had to get everything second-hand. There were several letters from later dates, commenting on accomplishments Severus had made in school, making the Potions Master wonder why they never wrote to him directly. Had his mother placed an owl redirection ward on him? It was unlikely, as she only very seldom used magic once her husband had lost his composure, starting with the violence. Many of the letters had still been sealed, so his mother probably had simply ignored them. Severus had long since assumed that he had inherited his pride and stubbornness from his mother, now he was certain that he was right.

Among the letters was a small book, detailing what Lord Prince had to do, family values, and an accounting of old family assets and alliances. But the most interesting at the moment was a text detailing all conditions an heir needed to match before he was able to claim the title.

Now he sat there in the old kitchen of his childhood, a list of requirements on parchment on the table in front of him. It was a little disconcerting how well he matched the description he had gathered from the pages of the book. In age, over thirty. He had worked for over a decade in a respectable position that was not estate management. He was healthy and able to father a child. All in all, it seemed like a really short list. What did he know about the customs? About the family traditions? About really anything that mattered? But the Dark Lord had been quite clear, and the prospect of having influence, direct influence, on decisions of the Wizengamot… It was something to consider.

In the past, he would have struggled with this alone. He had never had anyone close in the Order, mostly because as a spy he had been hidden for too long to be trusted. And among Death Eaters there mostly was a kill-or-be-killed mentality. That might change in the future, but at the moment he had a person to speak to who would be equally affected by any choice he made in this. Gathering the pertinent information into a small improvised satchel, Severus cleaned up the living room with a swish of his wand, simply dumping all the other things back into the trunk, before he made his way out of the house.

Sonja just was taking the money from an elderly witch – who was constantly complaining about the rise in the costs for dried dragon dung – when Severus came into the Apothecary, looking around as if he were searching for someone or something.

As their eyes met, he smiled and walked over to the counter, aptly sidestepping the few early-morning patrons. She nodded in the direction of the entrance to the offices at the back, signalling him that she wanted to meet him there. His nod was confirmation enough, and a quiet word to one of the helpers made sure that the counter and shop wouldn’t be empty while she was gone.

They exchanged a kiss, and her wizard smiled a little tiredly. “That is because I haven’t slept all night, nor much at all this weekend. I know that’s hardly ideal. I will take an energizer before I start teaching today, and I will go to bed early.” It felt silly to reassure her in this manner, but at the same time it felt wonderful to have someone worrying about his sleep – or lack thereof. “I wanted you to read this,” he handed her the small bundle from inside his warm robes, “and tell me what you think about it. I’ll be back after dinner?”

With an exasperated sigh, Sonja accepted the bundle, and then gave him another quick peck on the lips. “I’ll have a look and will see you tonight. But you need a good night’s sleep, Severus.”

Thinking back to what had been in the Prophet this morning, she was aware that it was unlikely for him to find true rest for some time, so she simply gave him another kiss and a little shove. “You shouldn’t be late, love. It feels like you'll have much to do, with all that is happening.”

He sighed and enveloped her in a strong hug before he stepped back. “Too true, Sonja. I will try to come by in the evening. Or send an owl, if I can’t manage to visit.”

“I would prefer you get a whole night of sleep, rather than you stressing out to come visit on a Monday evening.” He accepted her prioritising with a nod before they parted with another kiss.
As promised the day before, Madame Pomfrey released Harry from the hospital wing on Monday morning. In time for breakfast and all lessons of the day.

On his way down to the Great Hall – It was fantastic how magic was able to heal injuries – he walked slowly as Marvolo came up the stairs. “Henry, I’m glad to see you out of bed.”

Harry nodded. “I’m glad to be out of bed, too. Why are you here, sir?”

“I said I would be here, didn’t I?” Marvolo asked, turning with swinging robes so he was walking in the same direction as Harry.

“That you did, sir. Will you stay for breakfast?”

“Why not? It has been years since I last ate at one of the tables. And I don’t recall ever eating at the Gryffindor table.” His eyes were crinkled in amusement, and Harry was unsure if he wanted to laugh or to cry. The man once known as Lord Voldemort would eat breakfast between students at the Gryffindor table in the Great Hall. It seemed like his life was doing everything to avoid getting boring.

The moment they set foot into the Hall, Harry realised that the rumours would grow to new heights because Marvolo had come here to eat.

It was a nice breakfast. The other students kept their distance while Marvolo and Harry talked about their plans for the upcoming holidays. There were a number of balls and festivities to attend. The school Xerxes Lestrange had founded this year was having a festival with songs, a play, snacks, and a small arts and crafts market. Harry was glad they would visit the school – that sounded like fun – but wished he could get around attending so many other parties.

When it was time to go to the first class, Marvolo said goodbye and vanished from the Great Hall and the school grounds without speaking with any of the staff.

Before Potions Theo walked over to Harry where he stood by his friends Granger and Weasley, clearly separated from the rest of the Gryffindors. “Harry, there are thousands of rumours running wild. What happened?” Sadly the matron had barred entrance for all students from the infirmary on Sunday, so only his two closest friends and his guardian had been allowed to visit.

“I fell,” was the deadpan answer, forcing Theo to contain a laugh. That the heir of Slytherin was a true Gryffindor was just too good to be true.

“Remind me to tell you a few of my favourite variants.” He gave his summer guest a friendly pat on the shoulder. “I’m just glad that nothing too serious happened.”

Draco and the others had badgered him to ask if the rumour that he would ask to be re-sorted was true. Vince and Gregory wanted to know if it was true that the girl had ambushed him from behind. But Theo had convinced them all that it would be idiotic to ask such things between classes in the corridors. Would one of them answer such questions in such a setting?

And neither would the Dark Lord’s son, adopted or not, Harry had more than a few Slytherin qualities. Theo was sure of that. And he would bet his monthly stash of sweets on the re-sorting taking place sometime soon.

But not right now, as the door to the Potions laboratory opened and Professor Snape awaited them for their next double lesson of Potions.

oooOOooo

The whole day Harry felt reminded of his first few weeks at Hogwarts. And all the other times when the whole student population had been pointing and whispering behind his back. But now he was older, and had some experience with ignoring the stuff. But it still irked him.

Very much.

Harry had a hard time concentrating on the lessons, or his homework, because he constantly was thinking about whether he wanted to ask for a re-sort or not. Staying in Gryffindor – even in his own room – had become almost impossible. Too often had his housemates pranked him, tried to kill him. Gryffindor had been his home, his family, just as Professor McGonagall had told them on their first evening here. Not everything always went fine with family. His life with the Dursleys had been ample proof of that. But just because the others were family, one didn’t have to take everything they dished out.

Maybe it would be better to leave the family he had at the moment, and join another.

With a normal family, such a switch wasn’t done easily, if at all, but with family of choice it was something that could be done.

Just before dinner Harry had made up his mind.

Hermione and Ron had watched him, talked to him, all through the day. But they had avoided touching on the subject they both wanted to talk about the most. Ron probably because he couldn’t imagine Harry anywhere but in Gryffindor. And Hermione probably because she wanted to rehash all the arguments for or against a re-sorting until they were wrung out.

But apparently they both hadn’t found the courage to start the conversation.

“Can I leave my bag with you?” Harry asked his two friends as they searched for seats near the middle of the Gryffindor table.

“Why?” Ron wanted to know, sitting down inelegantly on the other side.

“Because he wants to ask for… you know. Am I right?” She directed a challenging gaze at Harry, who nodded in her direction before he turned to face the head table.

Harry sighed. “It can’t stay like this, Ron, Hermione. And regardless how I turn the problem, there’s no solution. As long as I stay a Gryffindor, there will be problems. The house rivalries are not as bad between the other Houses and the family name Slytherin.” Harry scoffed. It was so ridiculous, this separation along family names, and Houses.
Before he could change his mind – for the fourth or even fifth time this day – Harry walked up to where the Headmaster was sitting and spoke loudly, so that his voice carried quite a bit, causing the whole Hall to fall silent. “In the light of what has been happening to me here since the start of the year, I ask the Sorting Hat to re-evaluate my placement in Gryffindor. I no longer feel safe there.”

Harry saw the moment the customary twinkle in the blue eyes over half-moon glasses vanished. But before the old man could start to speak, while he was in the motion of standing from his seat, the Sorting Hat suddenly landed on top of the table, as if it had been dropped from the ceiling.

“Someone asks to be re-sorted?” the Hat’s booming voice asked into the Great Hall.

“Yes, I ask,” Harry answered, standing tall. He felt eyes take him in, weigh him. Even though the Hat only had pits hinting at something like eyes, it was obvious that the Sorting Hat was assessing him and his request.

Harry’s hands were getting wet. He was nervous. What if the Hat decided that he had no grounds to stand on and refused to re-evaluate his placement? He took a deep breath, falling with ease into one of the meditative breathing patterns he had learned from Snape.

“Very well! Not a question asked often. Place me on your head and I will see where you fit best now.”

The Headmaster sat down again, and Professor McGonagall came to the front of the table, conjuring a stool for Harry to sit on.

With a nod from her stern face, Harry turned his back on the professors, facing the students to sit on the stool. The Hall was filled with curious students all looking at the Head table and what was happening there. They all were trying to find a spot from which they could see better what was about to happen.

Just before the Hat was placed on his head, Harry spotted Hermione smiling at him and Ron looking conflicted, sitting at the front of the Gryffindor table. They had changed places to be closer.

Then a voice sounded in his head. “Well Mr. Slytherin-Potter. Nice to meet you again.” Harry could see – as the Hat no longer was so big that it fell to his nose – how everyone was watching attentively, not able to hear what the Hat was saying to Harry. “Yes, well, it doesn’t happen often that I get to see a mind for a second time. Still a difficult case, I see. But now you wonder what might have been different if you hadn’t objected against my first suggestion so adamantly? Well, we probably will never know what would have been different, but you can follow your new ambition now in...” and the last the Hat shouted out for all to hear “SLYTHERIN!”

Harry felt magic wash over his clothes, changing the colours from the red and gold of Gryffindor to the silver and green of Slytherin. He wasn’t really sure this was the best course of action. But he hadn’t been a Gryffindor for nothing. He had a goal, and jumping in was the only way to reach it. At least Marvolo would probably be happy.

Handing the Sorting Hat to Professor McGonagall, Harry smoothed down his tie in its new colours of green and silver, tracing his fingers over the Slytherin House crest on his robe where the Gryffindor Lion had been just moments ago. He tried to ignore the whispers among the students and concentrated on his Transfiguration Professor as she started to speak with a sad smile.

"It was an honour having you in my House, Mr. Slytherin. I hope you will be happy with your new housemates. And I expect you to apply yourself to your studies in my lessons." The last was said in a stern tone, but with a smile in her eyes.

Harry smiled a little unsure – too much had happened in the last two days – and nodded to his old Head of House. "I don't think my guardian or Professor Snape will tolerate anything else, Professor."

After she gave him a fond smile and a pat on the shoulder, Harry walked over to the Gryffindor table, where Hermione and Ron sat, his bag between them.

"Man, you in Slytherin green, that's unsettling, mate," Ron said, a little pale.

"Don't be an idiot, Ronald," Hermione admonished, holding Harry's things out to him. "I think the green suits you. And we still share many of our lessons, and can study together. Just because Harry is in a different House now, it doesn't prevent us from spending time together."

Harry was unsure what he should say to her compliment regarding the colour green worn by him, and simply ignored it, accepting his leather bag. "Thanks for taking care of my things for me. I guess I'll have to sit with the other Slytherins this evening. Maybe you can look up what the rules say about sitting at a different House table?"

"I will," Hermione answered with a reassuring smile.

"Blimey!" Ron suddenly exclaimed, getting even paler. "You can't play seeker for Gryffindor anymore!"

The shocked faces of his oldest friend startled a laugh out of Harry. Of course Ron would think of Quidditch. "Breath, Ron! I'm sure Ginny or some of the others will take the position without problems. And it's not like I'm going to play for Slytherin now, is it? The team is complete and plays well together."

A hand landed in a friendly – but strong – clap on Harry's shoulder. "They would be stupid to not even consider letting you play on the team, Harry," one of the twins said, while the other smiled over from behind Ron. "Go over to the Slytherins, Harry. We're all hungry, and you are delaying the proceedings."

The mock earnest look brought another laugh out of Harry. He looked around and found that the twin – Fred or George, he still had trouble telling them apart – had told the truth. All the platters and dishes were still empty, the whole school focused on the five of them standing at the end of the Gryffindor table nearest to the teachers.

Harry blushed and nodded to the twins. "Right. See you tomorrow!" And he swung his bag over one shoulder, walking over to the Slytherin table. On his way he searched the faces of the Slytherins, looking for Theo and the other fifth-years, because he wanted to sit with those he already knew. At least better than the rest of his new House.

Somewhere close to the middle Harry spotted Theo turned to face his way, waving. So he altered his course and headed over to him and the others sitting around his friend.

"Harry," Theo greeted, scooting further down the bench so there was enough space for him to sit down comfortably, "welcome to Slytherin."

Some more murmurs echoed the greeting, and Harry sat down beside his friend, next to Daphne and opposite to Draco. It felt surreal. And the way they all visibly refrained from barking out their questions, made him feel apprehensive of his reception once they would reach the common room.

"Thanks," Harry said to Theo and smiled at the others, before he redirected his gaze to the food that had appeared on the table. It wasn't as diverse as the feasts tended to be, and comparing the selection to what he was accustomed to over at the Gryffindor table suggested that the elves sent specialized selections to the tables. Probably based on what the students sitting there preferred to eat.

He selected some rolls and cold venison in slices, before he filled his goblet with milk. The others around him filled their plates as well, the girls being particularly fussy, not something that Harry had noticed the girls in Gryffindor do. But maybe he hadn't really paid as much attention to the food selection as he did now.

"Will you need to borrow an owl?" Draco asked from across the table, buttering a roll and placing it beside some apple compote on his plate.

Harry frowned. "Why would I need to borrow an owl? I can send Hedwig if I need to send a letter."

"Well, don't you need to inform your godfather and Lord Slytherin about your re-sorting?" Theo asked before Draco could do the same.

Nodding, Harry now understood why the others assumed he would have to ask to borrow an owl. "I don't need to send an owl. I'll just use the mirrors I have. And I would guess that..." Harry only hesitated a fraction of a second before he decided that it would be best to stick to the form of address he had used before, "Father will know quite fast, either way. " The newly minted Slytherin quite deliberately didn't turn to look at his new Head of House, but some of the others weren't quite so subtle. Crabbe and Goyle couldn't restrain themselves from looking at the Potions Professor, sitting at the Head table.
Harry noticed that Theo and Draco quickly changed the topic of conversation after that. Discussing anything pertaining to Dark-Lord activities in the Great Hall certainly wasn't a bright idea.

"I guess you'll have our schedule from now on?" Daphne asked with a contemplative frown.

"Probably," Harry nodded with a shrug. "Or maybe not. It probably depends on whether my electives make it possible. With me in the fourth-years' Ancient Runes class, it's a little more complicated than just attending all my classes with you lot, now."

Draco nodded and swallowed before he made a suggestion. "If you don't want to wait until the Professors have sorted it out, we can compare our schedules once we're in the dorms."

"It'll get quite crowded in the dorm now, with another to sleep there," Zabini drawled, while handing the platter of fresh fruit down to the older students.

After that the conversation circled around the lack of space in the dorms, and how much Zabini disliked sharing a space with the other boys. It seemed that Crabbe and Goyle snored quite loudly, and even the best silencing charm they could manage wasn't strong enough to smother the ruckus for a whole night.

Harry mostly listened and wondered how much of a pampered brat Zabini was, or why they weren't capable of casting a stronger silencing charm on their beds. The one night he had spent in the dungeons after the attack on the Quidditch Pitch, he had felt it was not as loud as the dorm of the fifth-year Gryffindor boys. Or maybe he just had been too tired and worn out to notice.

Considering the dramatics before dinner, the rest of the evening meal in the Great Hall progressed without much additional fuss.

ooOoo

Due to his Lord's warning, Severus wasn't surprised by the call for a re-sort. And because he had interacted with the boy more closely than ever before since the summer, he wasn't surprised by the outcome either. The teen was a Gryffindor, that was just true, but he had a lot of the qualities usually associated with Slytherin as well. That he was sorted into the House of the Founder he was descended from wasn't that much of a stretch. Many a child from difficult homes – abuse, domestic violence, and the like made cunning a necessity – found their way to the House of snakes.

"Will he be alright in your House?" Minerva asked almost whispering from his side, reaching for a plate of Yorkshire pudding. Her concern for the young man who just had been transferred from her responsibility to his was evident.

"He will be, Minerva, there is no need to worry. He is a descendant of our Founder. He will be guarded by the House. I will make sure of it," he quietly reassured her. And he would make sure of it. Not only because the Dark Lord would skin him alive if he didn't do his best to protect his son, or that he would break his word to Lily if he faltered, but because he always strived to do the best for his charges.

During the normal Monday evening meal – even if he felt the effects of a mostly sleepless weekend quite pronounced by now – Severus held one eye on the Slytherin table and the fifth-years gathered near the middle of it, at all times. Before he could meet up with Sonja after the meal, he would have to make sure the newest addition to the House was comfortably settled.

Maybe it would be a good idea to give Mr. Slytherin the heir's rooms, and not to place him in the dorms together with the others. Six boys in one room was enough as far as he was concerned, even as he was sure none of the sons of the other Death Eaters would do anything rash or idiotic, the son of Madame Zabini was quite another matter.

He was finished with his meal before his students had eaten the last bits, waiting to accompany them down to the dungeons, to make sure everyone knew and understood the new situation. When Severus noticed the first of the older students leaving, and Mr. Slytherin starting to gather his things, he stood, nodded in Minerva's direction, ignored the Headmaster, and strode down the table.

"Follow me, please, Mr. Slytherin. I will show you to your room." The teenager quickly stood from the bench and swung his bag to carry it comfortably, obediently following the Potions Master.

Soon they were surrounded by most of the other Slytherins, the first-years running – or almost running – to get ahead of the group so they wouldn't miss a thing that was about to happen, on the way down to the common room. It was obvious that they all were eager to see what they might gain from the presence of Heir Slytherin. It promised to become an interesting year in Slytherin House, even more interesting than it already had been.

Sighing silently to himself, Severus matched his stride to the unhurried steps of the teen walking just half a step behind him.

ooOoo

Theo and his friends – some of whom he had known since they all had been toddlers – walked a little behind their Head of House and the Heir of Slytherin, Harry, who now would belong to them at last. It had been a possibility, but he hadn't dared to really contemplate this outcome. Distantly he was aware that his father would be happy that Theo had managed to gain the friendship of the boy and therefore would now be in the natural position to be his guide not only into the larger society, but also into the environment that was Slytherin at Hogwarts.

"Are we sure he's a Slytherin?" Tracy said in a low tone, so only those really close could hear. "The way he acted this evening was a little brash, wasn't it?"

Glancing back to her, Theo shook his head a little. "It might seem that way, but I would disagree." Sometimes the others just didn't look deep enough under the actions of those around them. This was one of those instances. But he wasn't in the mood to explain why Harry had acted the way he had, and why exactly it was a genuine Slytherin move.

"Well, considering that the Headmaster didn't look too happy, I would guess that this was the only way for him to get it through. In front of everyone, without warning for the staff, so no one could try to talk him out of this. You have seen that Professor Snape wasn't surprised at all?" Draco explained in such a condescending tone that the girl couldn't misread his thoughts. Smirking over her frustrated huff, Theo silently agreed with Draco's assessment of the situation. The Headmaster certainly hadn't wanted Harry to become even closer to the Slytherins, would have wanted him to stay a Gryffindor. Asking for a re-sort in public had made sure that no one could claim it hadn't happened, or attempt to deny the request.

They reached the entrance to the common room and filed in after the younger years – eagerly sitting in front of the main fireplace, waiting for the expected speech – searching out their favoured places to sit.

Harry stood – a little awkwardly – next to the Professor, who stood in his customary spot for announcements to the whole House. Once everyone had settled down the Professor let his gaze sweep over them all and then started to speak. "To avoid any misunderstandings, listen closely. Mr.
Slytherin is in a dangerous position because his heritage was uncovered. Some hold his relation to the Lord Slytherin against him and will not hesitate to do him harm over it." The man spoke with a quiet intensity only amplified by the smooth silken quality of his voice. "As members of House Slytherin, it is our duty and honour to protect him, as he will stand for each and every one of us." A few surprised murmurs went through the crowed, and Theo felt his eyebrow wing up in silent surprise. Harry, on the other hand, didn't look as if this was anything new to him. "Mr. Slytherin will occupy the room reserved for the officially acknowledged heir. It is within his purview to decide who is allowed into the room and who is not. I expect that all eventual disagreements between Mr. Slytherin and any of you will not leave these rooms." With another of his dark, dreaded looks, the Professor waved for them to disperse and turned to Harry. "I will show you your room, Mr. Slytherin. Your belongings should already have been moved."

Only the knowledge that he had to finish an essay due tomorrow stopped Theo from following his friend and the Potions Professor.

Harry walked a small circle through his new room. It mirrored the style of all the other dorms he had seen at Hogwarts. The bed had four posts holding up a canopy, the blanket was made of wool and silk, the pillow big and fluffy. There were a small armoire, and a desk with a padded chair. All in all it looked quite similar to the rooms he had had up in Gryffindor Tower. The décor was tinted green, and the windows were charmed ones, showing a view over the lake. The room wasn't circular, and there were no curtains dividing the place. But he had his own bath, a seating area, and what could be called a little library.

They were nice rooms, and Harry unpacked his things under the warm glow of the fire's light. He wondered if the elves maintained the fire, or if he would be able to light one himself. The past winters had made it clear that the dungeons could get quite cold, and judging by the number of fireplaces in the common room, the Slytherin dorms were no exception to that fact. He would prefer to have warm rooms at all times.

Once he was done with unpacking, Harry collected the mirror Marvolo had crafted for him and flopped down on his new bed. Better to call now and start with the shorter call. After he had informed Marvolo, he would have to call his godfather. He just hoped that the fact that he had managed to forget to inform him about his fall and stay in the infirmary wouldn't make the animagus too cross with him.

The moment Marvolo answered Harry's call on the mirror, the older wizard looked surprised. "Henry, you were re-sorted? I didn't expect you to make this important a decision quite so fast." He only paused for a beat before a wry smile tugged at the corners of his mouth. "But you always had quite a few Gryffindor qualities, so I guess it is not so surprising after all."

Shortly Harry furrowed his brow in confusion. How was it that Marvolo knew he had been re-sorted? It hadn't sounded like the professor had already informed him, more like he had deduced it from something he had seen. Shaking his head to get his thoughts back on track, Harry dismissed his musing over how Marvolo knew. He could just ask if he really wanted to know.

"I have been thinking about this for quite some time now. And after what happened Sunday morning… I just couldn't stay any longer. So I asked to be re-sorted before dinner." Harry shrugged as well as he could, lying on his back on the bed. He didn't wish to discuss his reasons for this decision now.

Marvolo nodded, a small smile on his lips. "Can I assume by the green just behind you that you have been sorted into the House of our ancestor?"
With a feeling of satisfaction Harry realized that Marvolo had noticed the change in decor and had naturally concluded that he was no longer staying in the rooms at the top of Gryffindor Tower.

From the heights of the castle to the lowest foundations. Well, not the lowest. The chamber probably was a lot deeper into the rocks than the dungeons were.

"Yes. And Professor Snape has given me the rooms designated to the officially recognized heir… This should have been your room as well, shouldn't it?" Sudden curiosity prompted him to ask, but he almost instantly wished his mouth hadn't run away from him. This thinking about consequences thing that supposedly was a part of proper Slytherin behavior needed some serious work.

To Harry's relief Marvolo didn't get angry, only smiling sadly he shook his head. "As there was no Lord Slytherin when I went to school, I couldn't have been the official heir. So no, those rooms wouldn't have been mine. But I'm happy that you now will reside in them. I will do what I can to add to your security."

They didn't talk long after that. Harry had to inform his godfather, and as regular communication with him was considered one of his duties by Marvolo, the man didn't object when Harry brought it up as a reason to cut their call short.

Sirius heavily sat down in a wingback chair next to the fireplace in their favourite sitting room. Just now he had managed to get Remus to sleep. The poor man had managed to get a cold just days before the moon was full. And as he insisted on taking the Wolfsbane, he couldn't take any other potions to combat the illness, making his nose run, his voice hoarse, his head pound. Or so at least Remus declared. Sirius wasn't so sure it was impossible to combine other potions with wolfsbane. But Remus wasn't about to risk weakening the potion that let him keep his mind during the transformation, as it never had been done. Accepting the decision of his friend, Sirius had stopped pressuring the werewolf, and had started preparing herbal teas and chicken broth.

The day before – Sunday, if he hadn't lost all touch with reality – he had received an owl from Minerva, informing him that Harry had fallen on the stairs, and had to stay in the infirmary for healing of a few broken bones. She hadn't gone into too much detail – always a bad sign – and Sirius had decided to ignore the demand between the lines that he come and visit with Harry. He felt guilty about this decision. But as Harry had his friends and his guardian – even when it was hard to admit the man would step up and do what any decent father would – and Remus had no one beside Sirius himself, it wasn't too difficult to ignore those feelings for the moment.

He just hoped that Harry would understand once he got the opportunity to speak with him.

Just as Kreacher popped a tray with a glass and a decanter of red wine to a small table just to his right hand, the mirror he always had in one of his pockets started to vibrate.

Eager to speak with Harry, Sirius got the mirror out of the pocket and answered the call. "Harry! I'm so glad you called! Remus is sick with a cold, and just before the full moon. I couldn't leave him to be by himself. I hope you understand. I give you two pranks free of revenge as a repayment. All right?"

The teenager on the other end of the mirror looked gobsmacked for a moment before he started to laugh, rolling around on what looked like a green silken comforter.

A green comforter? Sirius was confused and only barely able to wait with his questions until his godson had managed to calm down again.
Sweeping at his eyes to get rid of the tears of his mirth, the teenager, with his black hair tousled even more than usual, chuckled a little before he began speaking again. "Ohhh, Sirius! Thank you! That was just what I needed. This weekend was just sooo messed up."

The feeling of silly pranks vanished under the topic Harry wanted to discuss with his godfather, making Sirius uneasy. Had he misread Minerva's letter? Had the fall been more serious than he had thought?

"I gather you've been told that I fell?"

Sirius nodded, slipping out of the chair to sit on the floor.

"Did anyone tell you that a girl – McLaggen's girlfriend – set up a tripping jinx? I take that as a no," Harry stated drily to the look of horror on Sirius' face. "That was the drop to make the potion overflow." Harry sighed, rubbing one hand over his face. "I asked to be re-sorted just before dinner. The Hat accepted and placed me into Slytherin." Now the green eyes behind the glasses looked unsure.

Before the teenager could express his concerns, Sirius quickly tried to come up with a few reassuring words. "Well, if you feel better surrounded by people you know have ulterior motives, more power to you, pup. And I quite like Andromeda, she was in Slytherin, you know." Internally Sirius winced. That hadn't been as reassuring as he wanted to be. But judging by the tentative smile on Harry's face it had been adequate enough.

"Show me your room! I'm curious. We never managed to really get a good look at the Slytherin dorms!" He truly was curious, and he felt this was a safer topic than the change in house.

"If you never set foot into the dorms yourself, how did you manage to include all the dorms – and not just Gryffindor – in the map?" a curious-sounding Harry asked while getting up from what Sirius recognized as his bed.

"We asked others for general maps. I managed to get into Hufflepuff and Ravenclaw with a few others I was dating…" He probably should not get too deep into that topic if he wanted to keep Harry from chasing after everyone who would have him. "And mostly we got descriptions of the layout out of books in the library – that was Remus' job – or distant relatives. Regulus was always describing things when telling our parents about things from the term…"

Sirius felt better the moment Harry started to show him around his new rooms. Being a parental figure of any kind was honestly terrifying. The idea of finding an adult to adopt looked better by the day. Not for the first time Sirius wondered why James had asked him to be godfather, or why he had accepted the honour and duty. He felt unqualified for this role, only barely managing not to be a disaster. At least now, after his biggest blunder of going after the rat without a solid plan.

Maybe he could help Harry to avoid the errors he had made as a young man.

oooOOooo

For the first time that Ron could remember, he was sitting in the common room together with all the other Gryffindors waiting for the Professor to come in to give them an official speech. Probably it wasn't really the first time, but now, with Harry missing because he had been re-sorted, he was much more focused. Normally he would pass the time while waiting by joking with his best mate. Not focusing on the tension like he was now.

The room fell silent the moment the stern Transfiguration Professor climbed through the hole behind the portrait, her eyes cold, her lips pinched. Ron was certain that he wasn't the only one squirming in his seat, even though he had not done anything wrong. He was pretty sure he hadn't done something wrong. Hermione would have told him, and would still be nagging. She might have lost some of her love for rules, but she still lamented when there was the need to break or bend them.

"Never in all my years as Head of Gryffindor have I been so ashamed of my students. I'm aware that not all of you knew about or participated in the pranks and attacks on Mr. Slytherin. But one of our own no longer felt safe among us. Because of actions taken by a Gryffindor, and from inaction by others. We all – and I include myself in this – should have done better. Miss Parkes has been taken into custody and will not return anytime soon, if at all." She made a small pause, letting her gaze wander over the gathered students, making Ron feel even more like he had thrown a rock through the kitchen window. "Bullying will not be tolerated, and I will make sure all prefects understand what constitutes bullying. It is true not everyone in a family gets along with everyone else all the time. But picking on someone is not something a family does either. I hope you all will learn from this, and not abandon your friendships with Mr. Slytherin only because he now has joined the House of his ancestor."

Before they really could process what the Professor wanted to say with this, she had vanished again, leaving the students on their own. It took a few minutes, but soon the gathering had broken up into several smaller groups, discussing what would happen next.

Ron sat next to Hermione, not really listening to her prattling about all the different rules for visits to the common rooms of other Houses, or when it was acceptable to sit at a different table for meals. Ron didn't want to lose his friend, and that Harry had waited so long to ask for a re-sort because he wanted to keep him and Hermione close felt good. But he felt like that it would be hard work to keep their friendship.

"Hey, Ron!" The twins plopped down next to Ron and on the floor. "Tomorrow after classes we're going to have a tryout. We need a new seeker. Angelina wants the whole team to be there."

Oh yes, there was Quidditch, and they no longer had Harry to play for them.

It was late when Severus finally managed to prepare for his promised visit to Sonja. But before he could reach the edge of the wards to apparate to her flat, a small owl winged its way down to him, obviously aiming to land on him wherever it could.

To prevent the bird from landing on his shoulder, or – magic forbid – his head, the Potions Master extended his arm as a perch for the messenger. With deft fingers he untangled a small scroll from the owl's leg, noting his name written on the outside in a familiar cursive. He had seen it many times on orders he had gotten from the apothecary. And on almost all his letters of the last weeks.
This was from Sonja.

Slightly altering his path as the owl took flight again, Severus unfurled the letter and read it by wandlight.

Dear Severus,

You are not here yet, so I guess you will disregard your promise to get an early night in favour of visiting late. You need your sleep, so I will send this letter by express owl. I want you to get some real rest!
I managed to look over the information you gave me and am happy that it seems you are fulfilling all the requirements for the Prince Lordship. I like the one stating that working in a respectable position is expected. Right down to earth, that. Those are family values I can uphold.

Today there were a few gossiping witches in, looking for hair-care potions, it was easy to steer them to the topic of society weddings. My vote goes to marriage before you take the seat. There is no way either of us wants the attention a marriage after would bring us.

Go to bed, get some rest, write me back in the morning.

Love,

Sonja

Smiling softly to himself, Severus walked a short round over the grounds, savouring the cold fresh air before he returned to the castle and his quarters in the dungeons. Of all the people making claims on his life, Sonja was the only one whose orders he always would follow with a happy smile.

Snarking at that sappy thought, Severus wondered at what love was doing to him. It really could be a dangerous force.

Tuesday 7th of November

The common room fell quiet the moment Harry walked through the portal leading to the boys' dorms. Theo walked over from where he and the rest of the fifth-years were waiting and sketched a bow in the other teen's direction. "Heir Slytherin."

Said teen rolled his green eyes – while Theo cursed Daphne for pointing out, repeatedly, how well Slytherin green matched them – stepped close to him and the others, shaking his head. "Seriously, Theo, don't. I never loved the attention coming with being me. So if we could be just us in the common room, at least, that would be great."

A few nervous chuckles could be heard from some of those Slytherins who had Death Eater parents, or close relatives. Theo smirked, Harry was refreshingly blunt. "I'm sure I can manage to behave somewhat normal. But you know what will likely happen if we don't follow protocol, or you get hurt?"

Settling his bag a little better on his shoulder, Harry nodded, his hair as unruly as ever. "I know who he is, and what he's willing to do, to protect… his heir. I'll try to make it easy on you all." A dark-haired head nodded in direction of the Greengrass sisters, Draco, and his two goons, green eyes sweeping the room as if he was trying to spot all those linked to the Slytherin family through more than House placement.

Sometimes Theo wondered how much Harry knew of the Dark Lord's actions and followers. And then they started to walk up to the Great Hall for breakfast. That wasn't an uncommon occurrence. Most mornings they walked in big groups up through the halls. It was a tradition that had started roughly at the same time as the other houses had started to alienate Slytherin openly. Not leaving the younger years at the mercy of some of the older Gryffindors had become paramount.

For a moment there was a hush in conversations in the Great Hall when they stepped in and found their places at the Slytherin table.
Theo sat down next to Harry, and the others from their year took seats around them. They all started to fill their plates with the various foods, when Draco stopped reaching for a bowl of scrambled eggs, staring at a small phial standing next to the goblet in front of Harry. "What's that? Henry?"

"My daily nutrient potion." With a sigh the phial was opened and Harry had downed the contents, only making the slightest of grimaces. "Daphne, can you hand me the pumpkin juice?"

"Certainly. Here you go."

From there on it was a pretty normal breakfast. There were dark clouds racing over the enchanted sky of the Great Hall, and when the owls came in, the students were sprinkled with the raindrops from hundreds of wings. The droplets of rain were ice cold. It was sure to start snowing soon.

Some letters and newspapers were delivered to their table, ignored by Harry, who carefully selected an apple from the stack near his right hand.

Pansy gasped and hurried to open the Daily Prophet, almost knocking over a pitcher of milk in the process. "Look at that! Skeeter has found a new target!' Her ear-piercing voice secured her the attention of half the Slytherin table and quite a few Ravenclaws as well. And because it was almost tradition by now to read humiliating articles out loud, Pansy started to read them all the main article of today's edition.

"Student Liaison at Hogwarts spells Disaster!" she proclaimed with obvious delight on her face.

Theo felt Harry heave a sigh at his side, taking another helping of scrambled eggs.

"After the victorious game of the Heir of Lord Slytherin on this past Saturday, the confused Gryffindor girl Julie Parkes set a prank that nearly cost our beloved Boy-Who-Lived his young life. Quick help by the competent Medi-Witch Poppy Pomfrey was able to prevent any lasting damage. Persisting in keeping his adopted son safe, the well known, young, and gorgeous Lord Slytherin insisted that Aurors be called to investigate and stayed the whole day at his son's side in the hospital wing. If that isn't the act of a devoted father, I don't know what is, my dear readers!"

Snickers rose from different spots around the Slytherin table, and Theo noticed another unhappy sigh from Harry, who shook his head the moment Theo raised a questioning eyebrow.

"Oh listen, this is the best! Witnesses described Miss Parkes' actions as seeming to be under compulsion, and her friends confirmed that she has acted depressed and erratic ever since Mr. McLaggen was expelled from Hogwarts for attempted murder. Her parents have asked a healer to perform a full medical scan for undue influence. There are rumours about Cormac McLaggen using spells and potions on young, impressionable girls to get them to spend time with him. With him alone. Ohhh I always knew he was the worst kind of guy for a girl to get close to! Oh, look, there is even a bit about a frantic Mr. McLaggen trying to defend that oaf of a son!"

Theo no longer listened to the gossips revelling in a new kill – figuratively speaking – when Harry stood, gathering his bag. "What's the first class we have?" the green-eyed teen wanted to know, slowly moving away from the table and towards the entrance hall, prompting quite a few of the others to stand as well.

Before Theo could answer the question, they were approached by the red-headed twins from the Gryffindor Quidditch team. "Hey there, Harry!" the one on the right called out. "Can we ask our favourite Slytherin for a favour?" asked his identical brother from the left. Beside the point that they were middle sons of the Weasley family and therefore probably closely associated with Dumbledore and the light faction Theo didn't know much about them.
With amusement clear as day in his voice, Harry answered the two wizards with a question of his own. "And what would that favour be?"

Both twins wrapped an arm around Harry's shoulders, effectively sandwiching the smaller teenager between them on the way out of the Great Hall. "Well, we have a rather good grasp on what the typical Gryffindor student expects of prank products. We even managed to ask a few Hufflepuffs and Ravenclaws. But the Slytherins, Harry, the Slytherins have been giving us trouble."

"You want me to help with your market research?"

"In essence, that is what we want to ask, yes." confirmed one of the brothers – Theo wasn't able to distinguish between the two and never had bothered to even try until now – while the other one only nodded with a wide grin on his face.

"We might come up with something. But we have to be careful, Professor Snape is sure to be more alert to mischief than Professor McGonagall." The nods the twins gave to that statement were rather grave, acknowledging the fact that the Head of Slytherin House wasn't known for his leniency with pranks.

"That we will be, Harrykins! We will see you later!" And with this parting shout the two of them vanished, leaving a smiling Harry and a few confused Slytherins behind.

"Marketing research?" Draco drawled and tried to pry for information all the way to their first class of the day.

Draco had a good feeling about his chances to get closer to the Dark Lord's heir after lunch. The other teen had been friendly to them all most of the time, sitting with him, Daphne, or Theodore instead of members of the other Houses. If he could keep Crabbe and Goyle from doing something stupid, and himself from insulting the Gryffindors, he probably should be able to improve their relationship.

The moment they walked down the hill to the place they usually had Care of Magical Creatures – somehow he wished he had taken another elective in third year, another subject he was prone to get dirty doing hadn't been his best idea – the reality of Henry's association with unworthy Gryffindors came crashing down around him.

He had to remind himself that Granger was the heiress to the Lestrange family to prevent a sneer from marring his face, as the girl came over from the greenhouses.

"Harry!" she shouted, waving one arm frantically through the air, her red mittens clear to see in the dreary weather.

"Excuse me?" Henry didn't really wait for them to answer in any form or fashion before he took off – at least at a respectable pace, Draco was happy to note – walking over to the two Gryffindors he had been friends with since first year.

"You didn't really think he would leave his friends just because he now is a Slytherin?" Theodore said with a sarcastic lilt to his voice, clapping him on the shoulder, before adjusting his hat and scarf, to better keep warm.

The rest of the way to the gamekeeper's hut, Draco kept an eye on Henry and the Gryffindors. The Weasley seemed to be unsure how to act, Granger was constantly talking. So nothing new there.
Draco groaned quietly when he spotted the gigantic shape of Hagrid, the half-giant, waiting for them by the pile of wood he passed off as a kind of house. The man was grinning, as far as Draco was able to tell through that brush of a beard, and gestured for them all to come closer, earning himself wary looks not only from the Slytherins.

"Hello there, Harry! I heard about you being re-sorted! May do them snakes some good to have a Gryffindor among them. Don't yah think?"

Draco ignored what was said after that. He lamented that the oaf once more was their teacher. Grudgingly, he had to admit – only in his own head, mind you – that the man knew his monsters and could handle them. But he had the regrettable tendency to judge his monsters by what he could do. Last year and the monstrosities they had had to raise was a prime example of that.

"Come on!" the giant called, hefting half a cow onto his shoulder, dripping blood onto the leaf-covered ground near the forest.

Had he told them what they were going to do? Draco remembered with a shudder the one time he had set foot on the ground under the dense foliage of the forest normally forbidden to students. He still wasn’t sure what the teachers had been thinking, assigning first-years a detention at night in the Forbidden Forest. It had been horrible, so Draco kept close to the others as they followed their Professor in a tight group deep into the dark wood. The smell of rotting leaves and raw meat only serving to remind him of that horrible evening they had been searching for a wounded unicorn.

The following lesson on Thestrals was both eerie and fascinating. Once the question on who could see the skeletal horses was answered, Draco was, at the same time, sad that he couldn’t see them, and glad he couldn’t. And then he realized that he wasn’t able to tell which death Henry had allegedly seen had been the one making him able to see the beasts so closely related to death.

Rumour had it he had seen Quirrell die. He certainly had been in the room when the Dark Lord had killed his mother, if one could trust the stories circulating concerning the events of that night. There was no doubt that he had seen the death of Diggory last year. And judging by his face, he was seeing them not for the first time…

It was hard thinking what life had to be like for Henry. Just this summer Draco had finally realized how dangerous the Dark Lord was, and that his family name wasn’t enough to protect him from the man or from what would come for him in the years to come. It was a sobering thought that Henry probably had known this since they had been eleven.

Once, Draco had resented the other boy for the fame. Now he believed it had mainly been envy and hurt pride over being rejected. Draco was happy that Henry was either Gryffindor enough to just give people another chance, or so truly Slytherin that he gave it out of the realisation of the political potential a friendly relationship between them had.

oooOOooo

Several cracks of apparation filled the room Marvolo was overlooking from his comfortable throne set up on a dais. He had been happy to learn that Henry had enough Slytherin qualities to be sorted into their family’s House at Hogwarts.

But now that his son had changed into one of the Houses containing more children of his followers than any other, he should make sure that they all knew what he expected of them.

Once he rose from his seat his Death Eaters sank down to one knee, bowing their heads in respect. It was a sight to behold, all those people clad in dark robes with their white masks bowing to him.
in respect. Maybe he should issue a statement banishing the robes and masks from being necessary for every meeting. In the past he had sent his people out to attack some family or place with little prior warning, if any at all. Therefore it had been best to make them bring the props to intimidate and conceal their identity to every meeting. As it now would probably never again become necessary to employ such tactics, it might be best to get rid of another of the outward signs of the continued existence of the Death Eaters.

"I'm sure those of you with children of Hogwarts age have already heard about the re-sorting that took place yesterday evening. My son and heir was sorted into Slytherin." He saw some heads look up at that, so a few still must have been ignorant about that.

"There are students at the school angered by events, willing to harm my son. I demand that you warn your children to not get involved in such schemes, but report them to a teacher – preferably Professor Snape – or protect him if it should become necessary. I trust that you will be capable of imparting to them the serious consequences for failing to comply."

Then he called for reports, sitting back down. The potent headache relief potion he had taken before he had called his Death Eaters – having one of them as personal assistant constantly at his side was working out well – made him a little weary and happy to sit down. Maybe he should take a break from actively trying to absorb one of his horcruxes with remorse, and search the scarce literature for other known ways.

The reports brought nothing to new. Mostly he had his people listen to the reactions to his actions, seemingly repairing damage done during the last war. The Department of Mysteries was slowly releasing the bodies retrieved from the lake of Inferi, sparking a rather large number of burials and memorials all around their community.

The reactions were mixed. There were those always ready to give someone another chance, those buying into the story of the young man under a terrible ancient curse, some holding onto grudges with all their might, a vast majority that wasn't sure what to think, and a few so caught up in their own problems that they really didn't care.

It was useful information, and a good basis to make his next decisions on for what he should do over the winter season and it's customary social gatherings.

"Before I release you to go home, give me an update on your efforts to stabilize our population. Xerxes." He called his oldest friend to report first because he wanted to get the news of the school first. Maybe those that had trouble having more children of their own would contemplate adopting one of the children Xerxes and London had found and rescued into their own families.

"My Lord, we now have ten young witches and wizards at the school, who were stranded in the muggle world without suitable guardians. Another thirty kids of differing ages with adequate non-magical guardians are attending lessons five days out of the week. Some of those families are eager to discover potentially magical ancestry. One of them already has spent a lot of time tracing their ancestry through the ages by muggle means. They hope for help from our side. But I fear the goblins still are reluctant to conduct as many ancestry tests as we could need. I have the feeling that for once it isn't a matter of money."

Lucius informed him and the others that his wife was expecting, a few declared they were still searching for a suitable partner, and then it was Severus' turn.

"My Lord, I'm happy to inform you that I have found a woman to marry. She wishes for a wedding over winter break so as not to spark too many rumours with her visits to the castle and the evenings I take off from duties to visit her."
"I'm very pleased, Severus, very pleased indeed." It seemed that his desire to increase their numbers was able to be reached with his current measures. Now he needed to decide if he wanted to give in to the constant urging of eligible witches – and some wizards – and marry himself. Leaving a family as small as theirs only with two members was a risk. And he couldn't bury Henry under the burden of marrying so young, maybe even before he was out of school, only so he would father a child as fast as possible. But he really hadn't found himself drawn to anyone. Be it man or woman. Maybe that part was still missing? This probably was another topic to research.

Chapter End Notes

I had banished Hagrid's absence to the bag of my mind somehow. So I thought this might be a good place to allow him back to the school. Not so sure about all the Slytherin's reactions, but I guess they have to test the waters on this new situation.

I hope your summer (for all on the northern hemisphere) is better than the one here. Yesterday it was raining constantly, setting parts of the city under water. I really hope for some nice sunny days.

Thank you all for your comments and reviews. I love to read what you think of the story, what you miss, what you think will happen... When a day was hard those help me to start writing and to keep my planned schedule! Thank you very much!

Wednesday started normally enough. Sleepy students in the common room discussing homework that had to be done by today. Some frantically searching for someone who could help them finish, or give them the right answers. And among them, Harry, with his tie done neatly and his robes without a wrinkle.

A few things were different, though. The common room wasn’t round, the students bore the Slytherin crest – or the version used in the school, only with the snake – and they weren’t trying to bribe their friends with sweets to get last-minute help with homework, but were exchanging favours, or collecting them. It was a strange system, but Harry guessed that it could work out without too much hassle if the favours granted and asked for all revolved around homework and other inconsequential stuff. But to stay on the safe side, Harry decided then and there never to grant a favour in such an exchange without specifying for what the favour could be exchanged.

In a way, it reminded him of the lessons he had had during the summer with Marvolo, as well as with his grandfather’s portrait. The system of favours and the political dance that was common practice among the Lords and Ladies of the Wizengamot. If one wanted to pass a specific law, get something through the Wizengamot, support a specific department or project, more often than not it was necessary to get someone to agree who normally wouldn’t be on your side.

At first it had felt dishonourable, but as both Marvolo and the late Lord Potter, who had been on Dumbledore’s side most of the time and opposed to families like the Notts and Malfoys, had told him the same thing, there was no other option than to believe that this really was the way things were done.

He had to be careful. With his position as heir to two families and ties to at least one more, any favours he owned might be of higher value than he dared to think about.

“We have Defence first, right after breakfast,” Theo suddenly stated right from behind Harry, making him spin, startled. Holding up his hands in apology, the still taller boy asked a question, ignoring Harry’s hand near his wand. “What have you done last in Professor Slinkhard’s class?”

“We did a bunch of detection spells. Checking for humans, dangerous plants, animals... stuff like that. The essay topic was on how to recognize and avoid dangerous places and situations,” Harry huffed. While he couldn’t argue that this specific lesson had some value – knowing that there might be something dangerous in a place was important to being prepared – the clear emphasis on avoidance rankled with him. In his experience, problems didn’t simply vanish if you avoided them long enough.

Nodding, Harry turned away from the windows looking out into the lake and narrowly avoided a collision with a few first-years running back to their dorms to collect something. Or so it sounded, judging from their shouts to their classmates still standing near the exit. Harry heard one of the prefects scold the kids for running in the common room just as he and the others stepped through the door into the corridor.

ooOoo

In the Great Hall, Harry waved to Hermione, who had to elbow Ron to get the red-head to pay attention as he was eating and rather focused, and walked over to his new table with a slight smile on his lips. They had no classes together today, but they had agreed to meet in the library for a study session after classes let out for the day.

Maybe it would be possible to keep his friends, find a few new ones, and bring the Houses closer together.

Harry just had selected a bowl of porridge with diced apple and a dusting of cinnamon to go with his goblet of milk – and the dreaded nutrient potion – when Montague came over to sit down across the table from Harry. Draco, as a member of the Quidditch team, looked up to the captain with a question in his grey eyes.

“I’m here to ask you something, Slytherin,” the burly seventh-year addressed Harry, waving at Draco to stay quiet. The blond looked unhappy about something, confusing Harry for a moment until the older student, playing chaser on the team, started to speak again.

“Now that you're in our House, do you want a spot on the team? You're the best seeker the school has at the moment. I want you for the team. I want to win again! And as the game between Slytherin and Gryffindor is already finished, you wouldn’t have to play against your old team… this year. What do you say?” The solidly built young man sounded eager over the prospect of having Harry play on his team, as he failed abysmally to conceal that very fact.

Harry, meanwhile, furrowed his brow. “Seeker is Draco’s position. He has trained with the team, and you're working well together. Don’t you think it would disrupt the team's dynamics to introduce me this late?” He wouldn’t even contemplate just taking the position on the team, costing someone else that position in the process. But he knew that wouldn’t be a reason the other Slytherin would accept. So he cited the other reasons this was a bad idea, expecting that it should work. Changing a well-trained team without the need to do so was bad tactics.

The captain hummed, nodding almost imperceptibly. Harry started on his breakfast. He was hungry and not inclined to give in too easily. Because, although he really would like to continue playing Quidditch at the school, he never would stoop so low as to just get Draco kicked from his position. He might or might not have bought his place on the team, but the blond was really good.

“I see your point, Slytherin,” Montague said, filling the plate before him with eggs and some sausages. “But would you try out for a reserve position? Train with the team? There's always the possibility that we need someone to fill in. Maybe someday Malfoy here doesn’t want to play anymore, or he wants to play on another position. Maybe he can train against you. I think that would be a training the other teams haven’t tried yet. Interested?”
Harry tried to remain calm and appear unaffected. This was so different from what he was used to. Gryffindor was straightforward. Do you want to play? Come to the tryout. The best will be on the team. And that’s it. This? This felt like politics. Or chess. Judging the moves the other made, sacrificing pieces to gain an advantage.

It seemed that Marvolo’s efforts to drum politics and how to play them into Harry’s head over the summer had been successful. Or at least somewhat of a success.

Quidditch was a part in this. But Montague had more than one goal here. Slytherin was a bigger player than Malfoy. Lord Slytherin a much more scary man than Lord Malfoy. Currying favour with the son of one of them was more promising than doing so with the other. That Harry was the son of the bigger fish – so to speak – and the better seeker was only one more reason to offer the position on the team to him.

Eating the last of his breakfast – licking the spoon clean – Harry sighed. “I will come to the practices and help Draco train, if… father agrees. He has said more than once that this is the OWL year, and that I have to do my very best to get good grades. He agreed to let me play Quidditch because I already was on the team. I don’t know if he'll agree now that this would be a new team.” It was a little bit of a stretch to claim this was true. But it was close enough and would give him some leeway to get what he wanted. Play Quidditch, but keep Draco as a possible friend by not getting him kicked off the team.

It felt alien, this manoeuvring. And Harry wasn’t really sure he liked making decisions like this, acting like this, playing others to get what he wanted. There just had to be a better way.

He didn’t get to contemplate this any longer this morning, here the first time he really was aware of playing the game of politics over something as silly as a seeker position on the school Quidditch team, because the Prophet and the rest of the morning’s post was delivered for this morning.

A gasp from Daphne turned the attention quickly to the headline on the front page.

Attack on small magical settlement!

Was the glaring headline on the front page of the Daily Prophet Marvolo was scowling at, a hot cup of sweet tea held in one hand. Yesterday had been the full moon, and that obviously was the result of Greyback’s attempt to get back at him for ignoring him and his thoughts on how the Ministry’s policies on werewolves had to be changed.

He needed to react to this. For one thing, this could easily be a stumbling block to his attempts to get the harsh and unreasonable legislation abolished. Furthermore, all known werewolves would get to feel the displeasure of the public. He would have to shield Mr. Lupin, as the remnants of Umbridge’s bloc certainly would try to get at him through the man he had hired to teach his son.

But one step after the other. He needed to eat, dress, give orders to his people, and then get to the Ministry and the Minister, offering his expertise on the man.

What was named a settlement in the headline only had been a small farmstead housing two magical families near a muggle village. Several people had been killed by the one werewolf attacking – even if Skeeter hinted at a possibility that there might have been more involved, describing everything in gruesome detail – and one had been injured and infected. The survivors were badly shaken, and one picture was showing an angry man chasing the photographer with a pitchfork.

The name of the two families was unfamiliar, so Marvolo made a mental note to ask Lucius to gather information on them. They probably were descendants of re-emerging magicals, maybe in the first or second generation.

Either way, they would need help. All their poultry had been killed, their greenhouses and fields partially destroyed. It looked as if they made their income on selling eggs and poultry, as well as growing native magical plants to sell to the different apothecaries.

Draining his cup and grabbing an apple, Marvolo started to pace. Maybe the newly infected man could be approached to teach the children at Xerxes’ school about herbology. It was a subject that could be taught to those too young to have a wand, and to Squibs as well. Having a werewolf on staff would also help defuse unfounded rumours and preconceptions. Marvolo would love to have a vampire teach history, but as those generally preferred to sleep during the day, it was simply not feasible to have one teach young children.

After he had made short work of the apple, Marvolo discarded the paper and made his way over to the study. He would write several letters with orders because there was no time to summon his people and give them their orders in person.

Xerxes needed to see if the position for Herbology was still open or could be split. The Carrows were to track down the werewolf, maybe they would be forced to do something about him themselves. The man had been terrorising the British magical community for so long. That the Aurors hadn’t managed to get the man was almost laughable. Maybe they hadn’t been trying all too hard? And Lucius would have to look into the families, and what might be done to help them remain independent.

The letters were written on the parchment he used for all his letters, something of high quality, but without any distinguishing marks like some Lords favoured. With a quick spell the notes would only be readable to someone with the Dark Mark, and would catch fire the moment someone without it touched them.

Barty accepted the order to make sure the letters would reach their respective recipients with a deep bow, leaving Marvolo alone in his rooms to change into his best robes.

Only minutes later Marvolo stepped into the Floo with billowing silk robes, wrapped in his best woollen cloak. In a way it was silly, but there was always the possibility his way would lead him somewhere outside today before he could come back home to get it, so he took the cloak with him even while only travelling through the fire from one building to the next.

This promised to become a difficult day.

Landing rather awkwardly in the entrance hall of the old London townhouse, Remus picked himself up from the floor, stuffing the portkey into his pocket. It was convenient that Lord Slytherin had provided a portkey for him to get to the warded stretch of wood for his transformation and back again to this house. He always felt drained even with woldbane to help ease the transformation, and apparating back would have been difficult. With the cold that still held him in its grasp, it would have been nearly impossible to get here without splinching himself, or waiting longer before making the trip.

Before he managed to hang up his coat on the rack by the door, Sirius was there, all concern and guilt. “Moony, you're back, and look better than I would have thought.”

Rolling his eyes at his friend, who was herding him into the kitchen, where warm soup and tea were waiting, Remus chuckled and then started coughing. “I’m fine, Sirius, really. I transformed and rolled up in a sheltered, cozy spot to sleep the night away. A wolf with a cold rests if it can. So I did exactly that. Stop fussing.” Sinking into one of the chairs, Remus batted away Sirius’ hands and got himself a cup of tea.

With a dismayed expression Sirius threw himself into a chair on the other side of the table, while Kreacher bustled about in the background. It looked like he was cleaning the silver while simultaneously preparing a big meal for more people than two. The old elf tended to go overboard with food ever since Lord Slytherin had been by, promising the elf to get rid of the dark artefact the elf had guarded for so long.

“Moony, tell me, what shall I do?” Sirius dragged a hand through his dark, chin-length hair, his head falling back so he was staring at the ceiling. “I’m a horrible godfather. Didn’t even visit Harry when he was in the hospital wing. I feel like I manage to make every possible error and more. Going after Peter, when I should have stayed with Harry. Staying here with you, when my godson would have needed me.” He sighed, aggravated, his eyes crunched shut, his mouth in a frown. “I’m hopeless.”

Remus regarded his friend over the rim of his cup. He had done so much growing up in the time since he had come out of Azkaban. The old Sirius wouldn’t have known that he had made an error, or he at least wouldn’t have admitted to his mistakes. But at the same time he seemed to have lost his ability to decompress, to let go of some of the tension, the stress. Sirius needed some time to let his hair down, so to speak.

“We're all just human, Sirius. And Harry knows that you want the best for him. So please don’t chastise yourself so much, okay? I think a big part of your problem is stress. You need to relax.” Thinking back over what Sirius had enjoyed the most after they all had graduated, during his auror training, he started to smirk. That would likely work wonders on his overly tense friend.

“I think you should get out for an evening. Go to a club. Enjoy the music, a nice drink, some company…” He trailed off suggestively, startling a huffing laugh out of Sirius.

“That’s a lovely idea, Remus. But really, how can I go out like I used to? I’ll be recognized. And as I’m Lord Black now, that would spell so much trouble. No, I think I can’t risk it.” A wistful sigh escaped his friend, and his grey eyes stared dreamily into the fire merrily crackling in the big fireplace.

Remus snorted, triggering another coughing fit. It took a moment before he could speak again, but then he scoffed at the last of his schoolboy friends. “Really, Sirius, are you a wizard or not? Use a little transfiguration, glamours. It isn’t that hard to make sure no one would remember the real you if you went into a Muggle club.”

A gleam appeared in Sirius’ eyes. “You’re right. It has been so long! Once James and Lily had to go into hiding with little Harry… yeah, it was just too tense an atmosphere back then. But now I could go out again, couldn’t I? Roam the clubs. It’ll be glorious… you’ll come too, won’t you?”

“Help you find someone for a night and stay behind? No, thank you. I think I’ve done that enough. You don’t really need any help charming the gents and ladies, Sirius. And I think it would help you to relax, you’re too wound up at the moment.”

The tension was slowly seeping out of Sirius, now he was slouching in his chair even worse than when he had first sat down. The sight made Remus smile. Sirius always had been a charmer, chasing after everyone that didn’t state clearly that he or she wasn’t interested. It had started at Hogwarts and had never really stopped. And all the time, the most outgoing of them had clearly stated his intentions. Each of his partners had known that there would be nothing serious about the relationship. No commitments, no declarations of love. Only mutual pleasure and a good time.

And strangely enough, because Sirius could be such a gentleman if he wished to be, there almost never had been drama or hard feelings. Mostly only during their time at school. After that, Sirius had mostly avoided magical clubs or parties, concentrating solely on muggle places to find his partners.

Suddenly a thought came to Remus, startling him to laugh, resulting in another coughing fit. He was so glad that he would be able to take a pepper-up the next morning and be rid of this cold. Considering how many women had spend a night with Sirius, some of them when the then young man had been truly drunk, it wouldn’t be too odd if there was some child out there… Remus got big eyes, staring at his friend who looked quite worried himself by now.

“What is it, Remus? Do I need to get a Healer? Is my hair pink?”

Shaking his head, Remus tried to calm his friend down. “No, all is well, just sit down again.” Once Sirius was again seated in his usual chair, Remus started to fill his plate with the breakfast items Kreacher had prepared for them. “Just this moment I thought, with the number of women you’ve had a close physical relationship with, there is a not-so-small possibility that the problem of an heir might already have been solved. Don’t you think?”

Watching his friend closely, maintaining an innocent air – barely – Remus saw the exact moment Sirius realized what his friend had just said. The animagus almost choked on the tea he had been sipping at, spluttering he set the cup down and looked over to Remus, mortified. “You can’t be serious, Remus! I was careful! And I stopped once the war was getting too dangerous, and Harry had been born.”

Seeing his friend getting defensive, Remus made a placating gesture with his hands. “No need to get flustered. There’s nothing wrong with enjoying life like you did. But you have to admit the odds for an unplanned child rise with every encounter.” Seeing that his friend was still uncomfortable, probably because his parents had berated him over his flirtatious nature right from the start, Remus tried for a friendly smile. “I think you should start visiting the clubs again, Sirius. You aren’t exactly cut out for the sedate lifestyle of a traditional Lord. It’s just another old-fashioned expectation that you’ll change. You know I just wanted to tease you, right?” Now Remus was really concerned he might have gone too far. The fact that Sirius really wasn’t into long-term relationships and had no preference of women over men – as so many traditional old families expected of their sons – had brought him a lot of troubles over the years. From the contempt of his father and mother, to the jealousy of those shunned where Sirius had been favoured.

If Sirius tried for the life tradition and society all but demanded of the members of the Wizengamot – looking the other way as long as some pretence was kept – he would never be happy. Better to show him that he had Remus’ support than let him try to conform to the norm.
Taking up his cup of tea again, Sirius grabbed the Prophet and flicked the newspaper open.

Remus watched as all colour drained from his friend's face, making the contrast between his dark hair and the fair skin even sharper.

“Sirius?” Before Remus managed to formulate a decent question, Sirius had downed his tea, stood, and flicked his wrist, levitating the newspaper over to his friend.

“I'll have to go to the Ministry. The blockheads will try to use this against our reforms. I'll need to do my part to contain the damage.” The grim-looking man was half out of the kitchen – probably to change out of his comfortable jeans and t-shirt into appropriate robes – when he whirled around, looking back at Remus still sitting at the breakfast table. “Rest, I'll send word if anything noteworthy happens. If you need anything, send Kreacher to me. He's faster than any owl, and you shouldn’t cast a Patronus today. See you later.”

With a horrible feeling of apprehension, Remus took up the Prophet and started to read. It didn’t take long for him to loathe Rita Skeeter even more than he already had. That woman had no qualms over using the misfortune of others for her own gain.

Reluctant but aware that he needed the rest, Remus headed for his bed after finishing a nice breakfast without much appetite.

oooOOooo

The day had started out bad. Really bad. Cornelius wished that this all was just a dream, but he knew he just wasn’t that lucky. When he had accepted the position of Minister – urged on by Lucius – he had hoped to once be known as the man who had led the way into an era of peace.

And now here he was. A man back from the dead, handed a new life, Ministry employees sending Dementors after children, werewolves attacking wizarding settlements.

It was a catastrophe that he and the rest of the Ministry – including the Aurors – had learned of the attack from the Daily Prophet. And of course Miss Skeeter had used the fact that she knew the Ministry didn’t know yet in a small article on a later page, dedicated to Ministry failures of the last years. Sometimes her shark-like disposition was useful, but the witch knew no loyalty. Someone she praised one day would be torn to the ground the next without reservation.

As long as the Aurors were gathering evidence, he would go down to the holding cells, as he had a message to deliver. With a last look to the mountain of paperwork on his desk, the Minister turned to leave his office, when the door opened.

His current assistant – Weasley, one of Arthur’s boys, efficient and a little too eager – was standing in the door, smoke rising behind him and a big red envelope screaming silently behind some spells. “Minister, Lord Slytherin is here and wants to speak with you. Do you want to speak with him?” the frazzled red-head in a neat robe asked.

“If Lord Slytherin is willing to walk with me down to the holding cells, I see no reason why he shouldn’t be able to speak with me.”

Of course the man had listened in and greeted him with a grave expression just behind the office door. “Good morning, Cornelius. I trust you have already seen the morning paper?” Blue eyes quickly glanced over to another three howlers arriving at the desk of the Minister’s secretary. This was going to be a day like harvesting nettles.

“I have, yes.” They fell into step with each other, Marvolo erecting a barrier around them with a small flick of that infamous pale wand. “And I would bet that whoever attacked there set it up so Miss Skeeter knew that there would be a story waiting in the morning.” Cornelius really hoped that the reporter had gotten a message in the morning and hadn't known since the evening before. If she had, that would be so much worse.

“And how would you know this, Marvolo?” Cornelius had listened to all the stories going around. Lord Slytherin was the top topic of Ministry gossip at the moment. Greyback had been a thorn in the Ministry’s side for decades now. The way the man tried to infect as many people as possible, preferably young, was a problem. In the last war, the werewolf allegedly had worked together with some of the Death Eaters. If Marvolo still remembered some of the things from that time, it might help them find the bastard faster.

“He contacted me. Threatened me. He was unhappy with the work I’m doing to reform the current laws regarding werewolves.” Ministry personnel stepped out of their way as they turned into the corridor leading to the elevators. Two witches floating stacks of folders behind them seemed to be in a heated discussion, but not a word was audible. As Cornelius had suspected, the shield around them was a sound barrier. They stepped into the first elevator to arrive, and a few others waiting for one elected to wait for the next to come by.

Once out of the sight of prying eyes, Marvolo rubbed his eyes with one hand. “I didn’t go to the Aurors because there wasn’t anything substantial. Only vague words and past memories I somehow wished I had lost together with my last life. I think this is his attempt to sabotage our attempts. To sway public opinion. I want to offer my help in containing the possible backlash, and what I can do to locate the man.”

Nodding slowly, Cornelius contemplated the implications. The public was in general inclined to regard werewolves with leeriness. Only slowly had they accepted that not all infected with lycanthropy were evil incarnate. After such an attack – and the way Skeeter had written about it – they would only too readily go back to hating them all.

“Thank you, Marvolo. I think the Aurors could use all hints that might help find him.” With a deep sigh and a wry smile, the smaller wizard turned so he faced the so-young-looking Lord Slytherin. Young until one looked at his eyes. His eyes very clearly showed the many years the man already had existed on earth.

“And now to the easiest point on my agenda today.” They stepped from the elevator and Marvolo dispelled the sound barrier.

On the last part of the way to the holding cells behind the Auror Department, Marvolo walked a half step behind Cornelius. They crossed the paths of a few Aurors, walked past a few cubicles, and then finally stepped through the door leading to the specially warded cells. In a way, it was only right that the man who had brought the crimes to the law enforcement's attention would be there when he informed the culprit about the impending trial.

They stopped before the only currently occupied cell, looking down on the miserable, small form in the terribly dull grey robes of the Azkaban prisoners. Currently the occupant of the cell was lying down on her side, back turned towards the entrance, possibly sleeping. Knowing the conditions at the prison out in the middle of the sea from his yearly inspections, Cornelius guessed that this was the first time since she had been convicted for her crime of torturing students at Hogwarts that she could sleep in any comfort. It was just too cold and damp for any form of comfort at Azkaban.

With a little fumbling Cornelius got his wand out of his pocket, and then cast a small charm, causing the sound of a small blast. The figure on the cot startled awake, almost falling down, ending up standing next to the cot, looking around wildly.

Her small, haunted eyes fell on Cornelius' form and his flattering pin-striped robes. "Minister! I knew you would come to your senses. I have done nothing wrong! Those children needed a hard hand to keep them in line."

Before she could continue to gain more momentum and regain her simpering tone, Cornelius interrupted her harshly. "Dolores Jane Umbridge, I'm here to inform you that tomorrow there will be a trial concerning the illegal issuing of a Kiss order. The Aurors have found irrefutable proof that you were the one to forge the documents. I have no doubt that you will be convicted. And the usual punishment for an illegal Kiss order is the Kiss." He tried to steel himself for this. Dolores had been his colleague for quite some time. She had been mostly competent, eager to rise in the ranks, if a bit aggravating over time.

The woman started to yell, sob, and beg, and Cornelius couldn't stand it, so he turned to go, but halted just around the corner. And this had been the least difficult task of the day. Now he would have to field a horde of reporters, and a mob of angry Ladies and Lords. So he stood there, taking deep, even breaths. He had hoped to have an easy time as Minister, to make a name for himself.

Trying to calm himself, he got to overhear an interesting conversation.

"That can't be true! No, I don't believe it!" That was the high-pitched denial of Dolores.

"Well, Madame. As far as I know it is true," came the drawl of Marvolo’s well educated voice. "In fact, it is part of the original agreement between the Dementors and the Ministry. Because the Kiss order is, in fact, a promised soul for feeding. So if there is one that can't be carried through, it is written down that within the year another soul has to be offered. I distinctly remember that there have been two instances where, instead of a soul for feeding, there have been substantial numbers of prisoners added to the prison." The man sounded a little amused, and there was no sound from Dolores. "That is one of the reasons, I believe, that a Kiss order isn't issued lightly most of the time."

Something heavy landed on the floor, and steps moved in Cornelius' direction. Aware that Marvolo would be there any moment, Cornelius pushed away from the wall and straightened his robes. When the young wizard in his green silken robes came around the corner, Cornelius was sure he once again was presentable, projecting not tiered bureaucrat, but Minister of Magic.

"You have read the whole treaty?" It was a massive document, and the original language was a type of post-classical Latin with sprinkles of different French dialects. Not something one would read for fun.

"It is likely that you would be surprised by a lot of things I have read over time," Marvolo said with a smile in his voice. "I once spent several weeks researching Mediterranean housekeeping spells. It was quite fascinating."

Together they walked to the Wizengamot chambers, talking about the different spells to clean a pot of scorched soup.
After the last class, Harry made his way to the library, nodding to the other Slytherins as they parted ways. It still felt pretty awkward spending the whole day with the Slytherins. But that was perfectly normal. It had only been the second day, after all.

Hermione and Ron were already sitting at their favourite table for studying. Close to the sections they needed most in their essays, far enough away from Madam Pince’s place near the entrance to be out of her field of vision or her hearing. It had proven to be almost ideal. The only problem was that many others thought the same, so one had to be quick or take one of the other tables.

“Hello,” Harry whispered, a small, somewhat sad smile on his face. Ron grinned up to him, nudging the chair on the other side of the table with his foot so Harry could grab it a little easier. Hermione barely acknowledged that Harry had said anything at all, causing him to chuckle. It was so typically Hermione.

Harry sat down in the chair opposite Ron, set his bag down next to the chair, and got out his notes for the next essay for Herbology on self-fertilizing plants. It seemed that Hermione was also working on that essay, as the book in front of her was opened to a page with the illustration of a bush with veins, throttling a small animal.

For a few moments they worked in silence, only the scratching of quills on parchment and the distant murmur of others making any noise.

Harry looked up to ask Hermione if he could use the book she had been referencing, when he met her brown eyes head-on with his own green ones.

“Are you alright? You seem distant and distracted. Any trouble?” There was honest concern in her eyes and Harry smiled again.

“If he has trouble, then it’s probably with those Slytherins,” grouched Ron, furiously scratching out a word on his own parchment.

“Don’t be daft, Ron!” Hermione scolded, surprisingly stern for a whisper. “Don’t you remember the morning Prophet? Can’t you imagine what that attack can do to Professor Lupin?”

A startled Ron looked up from his work, paling as he looked over to his friend.

“You really aren’t thinking, are you?” Hermione shook her head, bushy locks bouncing around. She concentrated on Harry again, prompting him to speak with a look.

Harry huffed, cleaned his quill, screwing the inkwell shut, before he began fiddling with his rolled-up essay. “You’re right, Hermione. There is something on my mind. But it’s not the attack – it’s horrifying, yes. Montague offered me the Seeker position on the team.” Harry heard a gasp from Ron, but the redhead didn’t say anything, probably because Hermione had silenced him, and Harry continued, “There’s no way I could steal the position from Draco just because of my name, my family… Draco is good. But… I didn’t just say it like that. There's all this manoeuvring… it feels so easy, going with the flow. It’s somewhat unsettling how easy it is.” The way he had stretched the truth this morning, the fact he called Marvolo father around the Slytherins, when he didn’t call the man that in his own head. It was positively Slytherin, and so different from the way he had acted last year. Or ever since he had started at Hogwarts. That was what had been bothering him the whole day, and now he was feeling bad for not thinking about the attack and the possible consequences.

Hermione stretched her arm across the table and patted Harry’s hand. “It’s nice of you that you have declined the position. And you shouldn’t feel guilty that you are a natural at politics. I’ve tried to learn it. Uncle Xerxes told me that I’m too blunt most of the time. Said I have to work on being diplomatic and cautious…” She gave a wry smile, causing both heirs to chuckle and Ron to look confused.

Almost all the rest of the time they had planned to study together, both Hermione and Harry spent explaining the basics of politics in magical Britain to their friend. After going over the ways of the Wizengamot in general terms, Harry felt better. That Hermione saw things similar to the portrait of his grandfather was a great help. It was easier to accept the word of his friend than to accept the word of paint on canvas.

Her last words before they parted to go to their respective house tables made him feel really better. “It’s the intent, Harry. Wingardium Leviosa is a light spell. A first-year spell. And you can kill with it, or rescue a girl from a troll. Cunning juggling of words can do good or bad. It all depends on what you want to achieve.”

It was easier not to do things like that at all. Doing things for the right reasons was so much harder, if you weren’t sure what the right reasons were.

Marvolo stepped into the house, a slight headache building behind his eyes. Flimm was there in an instant, taking the cloak as he discarded it carelessly.

What a day. Dealing with the press wasn’t something he enjoyed. Rita Skeeter was relentless in her pursuit of a story. In the past she might have made a good Death Eater. But no. She lacked the necessary potential for loyalty. No way to ever be sure she would stick to one person, case, or goal… besides making the front page.

With a weary sigh, Marvolo walked into his study, planning to check if reports were waiting for him. And to make a call via mirror to his son. The boy certainly would want to know what was happening behind the scenes. The Prophet was read all over Britain, including Hogwarts. And keeping Henry in the dark had cost Dumbledore control and the boy’s trust. He wouldn’t make the same mistake as the old goat.

There was a stack of letters on his desk. Sitting down in his chair, Marvolo checked the charmed drawer to his right hand. Correspondence from his followers had gone in there for a few weeks now. Since Henry was back in school, the strict division between home and work had started to blur. Maybe he should enforce the division better. Henry wouldn’t want to know more than he already did about the continued existence of his Death Eaters. But without a clear division it might be impossible to prevent Henry from learning more by accident.

A little later – he just had finished Xerxes’ letter confirming he could use an advanced teacher for herbology – Flimm popped into the room. “Sorry, Master Slytherin, sir.”

Rubbing a hand over his forehead, Marvolo diverted his attention from the letter Lucius had sent to the patiently waiting elf. “Yes, Flimm?”
“Master should go eat. Flimm has made food, waiting in dining room.” The elf sounded unsure. Until now not one of the elves had made food without being ordered to. How late was it? Marvolo looked over to the clock sitting on top of the mantle. It was indeed later than he had thought it was.

“Thank you, Flimm.” It seemed appropriate to at least treat the elves as well as he did his human servants. After he had met Kreacher, he had realized that an elf dedicated and happy was a force to be reckoned with. The little being had thwarted his plans, after all.

Deep in thought, Marvolo walked into the dining room, and sat down at his usual place. Then he saw the plate and what was on it. It looked like a mess. A mess made of double cream, various berries, and what looked like crumbled meringue.

His hand froze halfway to the spoon.

“Why have you made this dish, Flimm?” How on earth could the elf have known? Was this some plot to poison him?

The elf appeared with a little plop next to Marvolo’s chair, wringing its hands anxiously, ears drooping low. “Flimm saw Master unhappy, stressed. Wanted to make something to cheer Master up. Is not the right dish to do so?”

Well, it was the right dish. He loved sweets, and this particular dish had been one of his favourites, even if he never had managed to eat it another time after that first one. And as he had been contemplating going over and punishing Igor some more, he probably was in need of cheering up.

“How did you select the dish?” There was no one left alive who could know he had loved what he only knew as Eton Mess.

The elf seemed to relax and stood a little bit taller. “When Master Harry and Master Slytherin came here to live, Flimm went and asked Nott elves about what Masters like to eat. Oldest elf remembered Master Slytherin as boy. Told many things. Flimm remembered.”

An old elf from Nott? Could it be that this elf had already been there when he had visited one winter break? For his birthday, Benjamin’s father had insisted on having a celebration. The food had been wonderful, even when the rest had been somewhat annoying. Now, looking back, Marvolo guessed that the creation of his first horcrux was at least partially to blame for the lack of joy he had experienced the first time someone had cared enough to celebrate his birthday.

It caused him to feel something… he wasn’t quite sure what… that the old elf remembered that day, and mentioned it to an elf, which then proceeded to make his favourite dessert to cheer him up.

“Where did you get…” Marvolo prodded the dish with the spoon, and spotted fresh strawberries, raspberries, as well as blackberries, “...fresh berries this time of year?”

“Malfoy elves have greenhouse. Greenhouse full of fresh fruit all year round!” Now the elf was excited, not quite bouncing on its feet, but positively giddy. Maybe Marvolo should arrange for the greenhouses on the lands around Potter Manor to be renovated so Henry and he could enjoy such luxuries throughout the year.

“Thank you, Flimm. Please be sure to only keep such close contact with elves from families who are close to me.” The elf nodded, and popped away again.

Not about to let the nice food go to waste, Marvolo started to eat. Elves were really good at showing their disapproval without getting outright impolite. And it seemed that they were equally good at showing their approval. Now the only question that remained was how Marvolo had earned the approval of the elf bound to the Potter family.

If he didn’t ask, he probably would never learn what the reason was. But at the moment he wanted to relax and relish this delicious dessert, not ask humiliating questions.

Sitting in the common room in a chair near the biggest fireplace – a pair of seventh-years had vacated the seats as soon as Harry and Theo had come close – Harry read a book for his history essay, and waited for a mirror call from Marvolo.

“This is so strange,” Theo whispered from his place on a rug in front of the fire. “This spot is reserved for the upper years. That we are sitting here now is quite significant.”

Harry sighed. Everything seemed to be of significance as of late. The rooms he had to sleep in, the place where he sat to eat in the Great Hall, the seat in the common room he used to study… When being the Boy-Who-Lived had been tiring, being Heir Slytherin sorted into Slytherin was utterly exhausting. And complicated. Despite this, he still felt safer here than he had felt in Gryffindor Tower since the start of term.

“And sitting somewhere else would only cause trouble, right?” A startled Theo looked up, but didn’t have a chance to say anything before Draco, followed by Crabbe and Goyle, came over and sat down in the other wingback chair near the fireplace. The bookends took position a step behind the chair. It looked a little silly in Harry’s opinion. But it seemed to work on the younger years, making them avoid the Malfoy heir.

Draco just stared, causing Harry to roll his eyes. Sometimes this posturing got really silly. “I’m currently waiting for a call from my… father. So just spit it out.”

“But why?” was all Draco asked, a look of deep concentration on his face. It seemed as though he wasn’t sure what he should think. There he wasn’t the only one. Harry still was unsure what he should think about most of what had been happening. Most of the time he just played it by ear, and so far it had worked out pretty good.

“Because it’s the right thing? Because I’m not sure playing against my old team would be fun? Because it would be a bad move to change the team now? Take your pick.” Harry tried for unaffected, but was relatively sure that he had failed spectacularly.

Draco huffed and gave Harry a speculative look. Then he nodded and moved over to where Daphne and Millicent Bulstrode were arguing over the theory behind their latest transfiguration assignment.

While Harry was debating whether he should finish the chapter or go to bed, the mirror started to vibrate in his robe pocket. With a smile to Theo he got up and got the mirror out of the pocket.

:Hello, sir:. Harry greeted hissing after he had accepted the call. A few of the still remaining students – all from fifth-year and up – turned to look at him at the sound of Parseltongue as he walked by on his way to the entrance to his room.

:Hello Henry. I’m sure you have already heard about the attack last night. I wanted to ask how you are, and tell you what happened today at the Ministry:. Tired red eyes looked out of the mirror, a few faint lines around the eyes spoke clearly of a trying day.

The door fell closed behind Harry, and he walked the few steps over to his bed, getting rid of his shoes before sitting down. “Yes, I have seen the Prophet. My day was pretty normal. Classes, homework… I was offered the position of seeker. I said I had to ask you for permission, my OWL year and all that. Hermione and I decided on what to teach during the next club meeting. Nothing too spectacular.” He frowned, should he ask? Who else could he ask without risking his reputation?
seventh-years left to make room for me and Theo. It was weird.”

Marvolo chuckled lightly. “Congratulations. I needed longer to get that much respect from the whole House. But I guess you have an advantage, Henry.” He smiled and Harry had to agree, being Heir Slytherin, and known for it, was an advantage to gain respect in Slytherin House.

“You look like it was a hard day.” Harry changed topics, not only because he was eager to hear what had happened at the Ministry today.

Smiling at the pretty transparent manoeuvre, Marvolo started with a kind of report. “The most interesting bit certainly was that the Aurors managed to get the evidence needed to prove that Dolores Umbridge was the one to send Dementors after you. Tomorrow we will meet to judge her, and she will be Kissed.”

Harry nodded, a little stunned, prompting Marvolo – who had been waiting for a reaction – to continue. “The Aurors are searching for the werewolf responsible. The Carrows also search for Greyback, because I’m sure he was the one to commit that… attack. Lucius and Xerxes work on supporting the survivors. The next interesting part was the emergency meeting of the Wizengamot.
I think the old blocs are disintegrating.”

“Disintegrating?” Harry was intrigued. The old blocs of what was called light and dark in the last few decades had played a large role in his lessons in politics over the summer. Even Madame Longbottom had talked about them in the one meeting they had managed to have. It was almost a given that two big groups of seats voted along the same lines, opposed to each other. A few families stood in between, swaying the vote one way or the other. Others had changed blocs after marriages, or the death of an old Lord. The blocs breaking up hadn’t happened in hundreds of years.

“The stance on the status of werewolves and other magical, not completely human, beings I have brought into the arena is shaking things up. The stances on muggle-born magicals, rituals, and so-called dark magic are pretty much lined up. All who believe one thing on one topic agree with their group on the other topics. But the opinion on werewolves doesn’t follow these rules. My attempt to change the laws, challenge the old stereotypes, forces them to confront those differences.” He rubbed his hand over his eyes, sighing. “I’m not yet sure if this is a good thing or not. Maybe we can use this… but only time will tell.”

Harry nodded. If this topic had been universally ignored until now it would be reasonable to assume that being forced to talk about it would change the dynamics.

Feeling sleepy, Harry decided that he would not draw this out, but ask what he needed to ask and go to bed. “I already talked with Sirius today. He said that the Department of Mysteries has released Regulus’ body, and he asked if I want to attend the funeral this weekend. I would like to.
Do you think Professor McGonagall will agree to let me leave school grounds for that?” Harry felt a little apprehensive, to ask for special treatment felt somewhat wrong. It had been good that he had been able to visit his parent’s graves, spend time with Sirius on Halloween. But asking for a repeat still felt wrong.

“For the funeral of your godfather’s brother? I’m sure she will agree. I’m not so sure that the Headmaster will not try anything to prevent it,” Marvolo said with conviction.

They didn’t talk long after that, both tired from the day and eager to go to bed. Whenever Harry hoped it would get calmer, something new came up. Now the political scene was changing, the Headmaster was still intervening, Harry was still a horcrux… life wasn’t boring, that was for sure.

With a thoughtful look, Albus watched the swirling green of the fire vanish behind Elphias, who just had left.

His old friend had been by to tell him about the day at the Ministry. To no longer be a member of the Wizengamot – either as the Chief Warlock or Regent for the Potter seat – was a rather large impediment for his gathering of essential information. But what Elphias had to tell might be another way to get a little bit of his influence back.

The happenings of the day, following the attack of the previous night, seemed to break up the old lines of the traditional voting blocs. If he used the scepticism regarding werewolves, he might be able to gather a new following behind himself.

But first of all, he needed to aim the Order at the werewolves and the victims. Without a clear agenda, because Tom was acting so oddly normal at the moment, the feelings of belonging and purpose were missing, or at least rapidly dwindling.

Albus sat down behind his desk and started to write an invitation to all Order members. Best to meet the next evening and ensure that everyone still was working towards the Greater Good.

While the quill scratched over the parchment, Fawkes the Phoenix watched the human he had spent quite a lot of years with together.

Chapter End Notes

I always thought that there had to be some secret society of elves behind the front of wizards and witches. Elves determined to care for their humans. And able to do so, largely ignored by those who think themselves so strong, and are so ignorant of so much of the magical world.

On another note, I feel that Sirius in canon has somewhat of a Casanova feel about him. When I remember correctly, the books (I do not speak about all the additional information from other sources) never mentioned a steady girl- or boyfriend for Sirius, nor a love interest of any permanence. So I decided to boost that aspect ;) Maybe he can find someone, but if he does, he will have to be dragged into a relationship kicking and screaming.

After a whole day of teaching, and a meeting with the Dark Lord – the two-fathers potion so far looked like a success, the surrogate and child were well – Severus was now approaching the old derelict house the Order was using as Headquarters. With the obvious lack of violent attacks, they didn't have many reasons to meet. So after the big meeting when the Headmaster had revealed that the Dark Lord had split his soul to ensure his survival, their activities had dwindled almost to a halt.

As usual – and as he preferred – he arrived as one of the last, only the Headmaster still missing. The man was probably intending to make an entrance once all others were here. Lupin was sitting at the table, looking ill. Moody sat in one corner, his peg-leg sticking out in front of him. The Aurors of their group sat together, quietly discussing something. A small island of red hair indicated where the Weasleys were gathered.

A quick glance over at the table all were gathered around revealed that Molly Weasley hadn't brought any of her baked goods. As Severus had had to forego dinner for his meeting with the Dark Lord, and had declined a bowl of some sweet concoction the Dark Lord had offered – something with berries and much cream – he now was quite hungry. But without the almost traditional pastries, he would have to wait until he could return to Hogwarts before he would get something to eat.

"Thank you all for coming here." A bright smile and his customary twinkle behind the half moon glasses were prominent on the wrinkled face, badly hiding an expression of unease, maybe? Severus wasn't sure. That he could see anything at all on this face was telling in itself. Normally the Headmaster had masks as impenetrable as any Slytherin's. Severus assumed it was a trait all people associated with any form of politics developed over time. Sometime it was a blank mask like his, or some were so filled with emotions that everything of significance was hidden behind those displayed so easily.

"With the attack of last night, and what happened at the Ministry today, I feel it is necessary that we find another way to counter Voldemort's plans." The old man turned to Lupin and his smile changed into the fatherly – in Severus' opinion slightly condescending – one he often used on those who owed him. "Remus, my boy, Can you get in contact with the werewolves close to Greyback? We need to know if he truly was the one to stage this attack, and how Voldemort hopes to gain something from this."
Lupin leaned forward in his chair, a frown on his face. "You know that I'm too well known in those circles as the one that went to Hogwarts to get close to Greyback's people, Headmaster. And I doubt that Lord Slytherin had anything to do with this attack. Why should he do something like that? Judging by all the things he has done and said in public, and the lack of attacks… I think he might actually be working on reversing some of the things he did." The wolf looked a little unsure, one of his hands waving a little back and forth in front of him.

Moody snorted, clearly not impressed by the other's reasoning. "Do you think everything that man does happens in public?"

"No. Of course not. But you all have to agree that his public actions are clearly opposed to what he did… back then."

William Weasley cleared his throat, drawing all attention to himself. "I'm pretty sure he only survived rescuing me because he still has at least one Horcrux." With an apologetic smile to his mother the young man elaborated, "I read up on horcruxes after the incident at the underground lake. It was just so improbable that someone could survive being submerged in a lake filled with Inferi. But the information he has provided, the dismantling of that lake..." The wizard shrugged a little helplessly.

Severus refrained from rolling his eyes. Why did they all have such problems With accepting that one might do good things to hide one's true intentions? Or that deciding to change what one did was entirely possible. They all believed in second chances, but almost as often as they gave second chances, they condemned someone on the spot. It seemed more based on what they felt was convenient at the moment than some rules or principles.

It was infuriating. And a good way to manipulate them if you had a position of authority, or reverence.

Like the Headmaster did.

"After you destroyed the ring, Headmaster, I think it would be reasonable to assume he would gather the other horcruxes. To protect them," the young Miss Tonks – her hair changing from blue to a vibrant lilac – suggested.

Remus nodded. "I think he might even try to stitch his soul back together." The wolf looked like he was really hoping he was right, wanted to believe that this was a possible truth.

Severus watched attentively while the round descended into mindless, useless discussions that turned in circles around the same points again and again.

Molly Weasley quickly became agitated, a mother bear intent on protecting her cubs, Arthur tried to moderate her, but was clearly unsure and reluctant to commit to any of the positions present among them. The Aurors – Tonks and Shacklebolt – only added facts to the discussion, proving that Lord Slytherin hadn't done anything breaking any laws. Even that he went out of his way to avoid breaking them.

Severus only waited for when the Headmaster would call on him. It felt different to be a real spy among those that trusted him on the Headmaster's word, than it had when he had been a double spy, hoping that the old man would be able to be a shield for his one true friend. How things had changed. It no longer felt like a knife stabbing him through his heart when his thoughts wandered near Lily.

"Severus, my boy, do you have any news of what Voldemort might be planning?"
And here it was, the question he had been waiting for. In preparation, Severus had asked the Dark Lord what he might answer once it was posed.

Standing a little straighter, Severus turned his eyes from Mundungus – who had said in his circles no one had been approached by any Death Eaters – to the Headmaster. "If you want to hear plans for attacks or any other violent actions, I have to disappoint you, Headmaster. I only have been called to individual meetings. He is monitoring my experimental potions quite closely. He wants to hear about Mr. Potter as well." All eyes were on him, a position he didn't really enjoy. But if he was to take up the Lordship, he would naturally be standing in the middle of attention quite regularly. So he better get used to this. "But I have met Lord Lestrange, Lucius Malfoy, and Dawlish when meeting with the Dark Lord. They were either leaving his office, or arriving when I was leaving. I have also seen papers on the Dark Lord's desk leading me to believe that he is trying to gather funds in a newly acquired Slytherin vault."

It was true. As well as rehearsed. But that was nothing unusual. He had answered questions with rehearsed statements quite often. Only the roles of who helped him rehearse and who saw his performance had changed.

"I see. Thank you, Severus, my boy. If you see a way to gather more information, please do so." It seemed that the old man truly was desperate. Why else would he encourage his only spy to risk his life by being reckless?

Severus only nodded in reply, keeping the fact that his Lord used an awful lot of headache potions to himself. Maybe Lupin was right and the Dark Lord was trying to stitch his soul back together, and the attempts caused headaches. If this was truly the reason for the need for pain potions, why would the Dark Lord go through something causing him pain?

It was a point to consider.

"Why are we still doing this?" Mrs. Jones asked into the lull in conversation. She flushed a bright red when quite a few incredulous looks turned in her direction. "What?" she asked defensively. "We gathered because You-Know-Who was back, but the Ministry was denying it. There was a need to help guard the prophecy, spread awareness. But now the prophecy has been removed, and all and sundry know that he is back. The eyes of the Prophet and the whole community are watching his every move." The woman looked around, searching for those sharing her opinion. By what Severus could see from his strategically selected position there were quite a few who fell into that category. "There is no longer a need for us to work like this… be so secretive about it." Doge made to interrupt her but was stopped by Hestia Jones just talking over him. "I know that he still is capable of doing evil, but isn't that true of most of us? We all can do bad things. But we are no longer alone, right? All this meeting in abandoned houses… what have we really done?"

And another discussion started. With each passing minute the words got more heated. Body language got more aggressive. Molly Weasley yelled that she would not allow her children to be killed in a useless attempt to prevent a war. Which prompted Moody to ask if she thought the war was inevitable. If looks could kill, the old Auror would have died then and there, but Mrs. Weasley just yelled again that she believed there would be a war.

Amusement well hidden, Severus watched as the Order tore itself to shreds. The Headmaster tried to bridge the growing gap between those insisting that there was no way the man known as You-Know-Who – such an inane moniker – could act within the laws or with good intentions, and those willing to give a second chance to everyone asking for one. Soon people started to leave. Some – like Arthur Weasley – with reluctance and apologetic faces, others citing their wish to follow the laws – like Miss Tonks and her colleague Shacklebolt – and only a small percentage leaving.
without an explanation. That Mundungus Fletcher was among those didn't come as a big surprise. The man was an opportunist, getting money and free food to relay gossip was one thing, but coming in conflict with the laws when more than one Lord was involved was too big a risk.

For a short moment Dumbledore looked defeated, but that was quickly hidden. The remaining group was rather small. Severus was there – of course – Doge had remained, Alastor Moody as one of the Headmaster's oldest friends was still there, and Lupin was still sitting in his chair. Minerva and Hagrid hadn't been there to begin with, so their stand in this break was still unclear. But one thing was clear: after this evening, the Order of the Phoenix wouldn't be what it had been any longer.

"It seems," the Headmaster started, clearing his throat before continuing, "that we will have to start from the beginning. Keep your eyes and ears open. Search for those who might be willing to help us. Those able to look behind the public mask of Lord Slytherin to see Voldemort underneath it." He gave them all his benevolent, grandfatherly smile with his blue eyes twinkling, his patterned robes the only bright spot in the dreary room.

Once the Headmaster had dismissed them, Severus didn't wait any longer. He was tired and hungry, and wished to return to his quarters. That a full day of classes waited for him did nothing to improve his mood. But that the Order had almost self-destructed this evening was something most likely positive. They would need time to regroup and redefine their goals. So Severus had important information for his Lord when they next met.

But first, getting something to eat.

Daphne sat still while Pansy brushed her hair in preparation for trying out a new sort of braid they had seen in Witch Weekly. This week's edition contained several articles on hair care. From new variations of time-tested potions for dry, greasy, limp, frizzy hair… all in all, for every kind of difficult hair, to charms to make elaborate hairdos. It was fun trying something new. So they did. It certainly was better than writing another essay on the best ways to prepare fertilizer.

The others were there too, Astoria getting her nails painted by Millicent, and Tracy on her belly on the bed, reading the Charms book. It was a cosy evening between friends, and at the moment not one of them was speaking.

Maybe she should bring up the topic most of the girls over thirteen had been thinking about since the re-sorting had happened. Or maybe even since this last summer, when the news of the scandalous adoption had made the front page.

"He looks rather fetching with the green on his robes, don't you think?" she said casually, checking her fingernails for chips or other places that might needed attention using the nail repair charm her mother had taught her as she had turned twelve.

"Oh yes! He does!" Pansy said with feeling, snorting at the end. "But do you really think his father will allow him to be with any of us?"

Daphne had to agree, it was highly unlikely that Lord Slytherin would agree to one of them being with his adopted son. At least not for a marriage.

"I can't marry him anyway. I'm the heiress. I need to find a younger son somewhere." She made the customary face she always made when this topic was brought up, eliciting the expected words of sympathy from her dorm mates and the equally customary eye roll of her younger sister.
"Don't be ridiculous, Daph," the younger girl said. "At least you'll be able to put in your opinion on whoever our parents find for you. I was never asked what I thought about that prat Draco Malfoy," That got them all giggling. It was no secret that Malfoy tended to whine if things weren't going his way. On the other hand, the well-known wealth of the Malfoys was an asset. As well as the boy's good looks.

"Well, we might not be the ones to marry him," Pansy said, setting the brush down on the bed, tilting her head to get a better look at the moving illustration of how the braid was to be done. "But the balls and parties of the winter season are coming up. He will need to dance, and maybe even have to bring a date to some of the events."

Daphne nodded, that was exactly what she had thought. With him escorting her she would get much more attention and might be able to get a few families with more sons interested. Maybe even some of those families more firmly on the light side of politics.

"There's no chance for me to get more than the occasional dance with him," Astoria sighed, dramatically tossing her head back one hand pressed against her forehead. "Mum and Dad certainly will insist I glue myself to my intended."

"Do you all already have the gowns and robes?" Millicent wanted to know, finishing up the nail polish on Astoria's hand before grabbing her wrist, wanting to cast a drying charm.

"No," Daphne answered for her sister as well as herself. "Lady Malfoy hasn't yet revealed the theme of the ball she's preparing. Mother always waits for that information. She informed us that she has arranged for a tailor to come by the day after the term lets out and the train takes us all back to London."

"I so hope that mum will allow me more than one set of robes this year," Astoria said, placing her other hand in Millicent's care to get the rest of her nails painted. They all knew that the older girls attended more than one event and got a gown and robes for each of them if the family was wealthy enough to be able to pay for it. Only small kids went to not more than one or tow events. And younger girls that went to more events would get to wear only one set of robes to all of them. Only if their parents regarded them as old enough – and mature enough – to be on the market to find a partner would they get more clothes.

"Does one of you want to swap with me?" Tracy asked from her bed, closing the Charms book with a gentle thud. Daphne tried to turn her head to look over to the only girl of her year that wasn't steeped in politics like the rest, but Pansy's hand in her hair stopped the motion.

"Hold still! I won't be responsible for you walking around bald if you don't hold still," her friend hissed.

The Greengrass family might be the most influential of them, but Bulstrode and Parkinson were equally involved. Davis, on the other hand, had Muggle relatives, and her mother was from an unimportant, small family, that only had been magical for a few short generations. Not long enough to rise to anywhere in the circles the rest of them frequented.

"We'll visit with my father's relatives. Those that know nothing of magic. We'll have to pretend all the time. And no magic!" She let herself fall onto her back gazing up to her canopy.

Daphne snorted, trying to not move while she felt gentle hands braiding her hair, parting it into smaller portions. That was something she couldn't let go uncommented. "Don't be sad, Tracey. Do you think we'll be at a party like we sometimes have here in the common room? It'll be all manners, stiff ballroom dancing, polite but incredibly dull conversation… but at least we'll get to wear nice things, and maybe we can slip away for a moment or two.”

Tracy groaned. "Well, at least you'll be around magic. Able to speak about normal things, be yourself." To another snort from the four girls used to high-society posturing, Tracy laughed and amended, "Okay, maybe not entirely yourself, but you won't have to hide that magic is a part of your life. If I'm not careful with what I say, we can get in so much trouble for breaking the Statue of Secrecy. I truly wished we would celebrate with mum's family this year."

"How well can Pot... Slytherin dance, Daphne? You did take lessons with him this summer, didn't you?" Millicent wanted to know, while closing the small bottle of nail polish now that she was finished.

"He was a disaster when we started. But Lady Malfoy is a really good teacher. After a few lessons he stopped stepping on my feet." That made them all laugh, before they started on a recount of the winter ball at Hogwarts last year.

The conversation drifted to gossip soon after, and Daphne turned to ponder how she would get a few more dances with Harry than the other girls. She really felt that she would have to look for a possible husband soon if she was to find someone acceptable, and didn't want to be the target of gossip like that her friends were sharing with relish just now. Maybe it would work if she just asked Harry if he would be her date for one of the events they both were to attend. He was just such a kind of guy, willing to help. And as this wouldn't cost him anything, maybe even be in his favour by portraying him in a favourable light, it might just work.

Smirking a little when she imagined the look of bewilderment he most likely was going to sport when she asked, Daphne joined the others in a recollection of the older girls' reactions to Hermione Granger's date to the Ball during the tournament.

Friday 7th of November

Lessons with the Slytherins weren't really that different from lessons with the Gryffindors. History was still a challenge not to fall asleep, Herbology still had those complaining that they had to work with earth and get dirty, the coursework was the same. Changing Houses really wasn't that big a deal when he only looked at the lessons.

But when Professor Flitwick said, "Good answer, Mr. Slytherin, take five points for Slytherin." it came as a shock.

Not sitting with Hermione and Ron was another difference. Theo and Daphne – the two sitting next to him most of the time – were different in their behaviour in class. Ron would give a quiet commentary or complain, Theo was concentrating and, unlike what Hermione was prone to do, didn't point out every minuscule error he made. It would take some adjusting to, but Harry was sure it would become normal quite soon.

He wasn't sure if it was a good thing that all the changes, all that he never would have guessed would be happening, would be normal soon. Only a few months back, he would have called everyone crazy if they claimed he would be living as a member of the Slytherin family in Slytherin at Hogwarts.

But the demands of OWL preparation, as well as the Defence club, provided ample distraction.

"Hermione!" Harry called as he spotted his friend on her way to the Great Hall, as he himself came up from the dungeons. It was early for the club, but they had agreed to meet before the others would arrive, to talk a last time over what they would cover in this meeting.

"Harry!" Hermione answered with a smile on her face and her bag clutched to her side. It looked like it was overstuffed again. Maybe he should get her a bag with extension charms for Christmas? No, that was too big a present. Maybe he could give a hint to her great-uncle.

A few moments later the two moved up to the front of the Hall, deep in discussion over the planned lesson.

"What is it you two are planning to do today?" a smiling Professor Flitwick asked from the dais at eye level with the two teenagers.

"I thought we might go over the summoning and banishing charms. After we have repeated the spell from last time," Harry quickly continued before Hermione could protest and start a rant on the importance of revision.

Looking right through the manoeuvre, the girl rolled her eyes and huffed in amusement.

"That's advanced material. Why do you think it's useful in the context of self-defence?" the Charms Professor asked, clearly interested in their reasoning. Harry didn't doubt for one second that the man already knew of the usefulness of those charms in defence. During Harry's explanation the other students – still many more than Harry had expected for the first meeting – came in and started to form little groups, chatting excitedly.

When the time to start arrived, Harry got everyone's attention with a small bang from his wand. This was a spell he had looked up and taught himself after the last session. It was always useful to have a way to get everyone's attention quickly.

"Hello and welcome everyone! I'm happy that you all are back! We will start by going over the Expelliarmus once again, before Hermione and I show you the use of summoning and banishing charms as a way to distract your opponent. Please pair up. If there's an odd number here today, a group of three can work together. Hermione will go down the right side of the Hall and I will walk down the left side. If one of you has a question, or we see something, we're there to help."

It was clear that not all were happy that they were starting with the same spell they had been learning the last time. But Hermione had it right: if you wanted to cast a spell successfully in a stressful situation, you needed to be able to cast it in your sleep. And one only reached this state through constant repetition.

In short order all students were split into groups, and Harry watched Hermione walk over to a few first-years who looked as if they could use some more explanation on how the spell worked. Harry set out to walk among the students on the other side of the Hall, looking to see if there was someone in need of his help.

Most of the students seemed to get the spell right most of the time, but a pair composed of a Ravenclaw girl and a younger boy from Hufflepuff seemed to be having problems. While Harry walked over to see if he could help them sort it out, he spotted a group of giggling Ravenclaw girls – maybe the same age as Ginny – casting Expelliarmus at the other two, disrupting their attempts to practice. And whenever the boy or girl Harry now recognized as the girl he had helped against some bullies during the break at Sirius' trial – and from his runes class and practice – looked around, the girls pretended to be absorbed in practising themselves.

Bullies. Harry really disliked bullies. Cowards making fun of others, making them feel small so they could feel strong, were among the most despicable people there were.

"What are you doing there?" Harry demanded to know, stepping in between the two groups.

"Nothing, just practising." Their too-innocent expressions, the mirth in their eyes, and the giggling, belied their claim. Harry was unsure what he could do to make them stop and not make the situation any worse for the target, as he had no doubt the girls frequently ganged up to act against the dreamy-looking girl with her wide eyes and blond hair.

"I think we should mix this up a bit," Harry decided on the spot. Breaking the group up might help defuse the situation during the club, and after he would go to Professor Flitwick. That situation was exactly the reason official clubs needed a member of staff to be present.

"You," he gestured to one girl of the giggling group, "will join the trio of seventh-years over there." When he was finished with splitting up and distributing them, he had paired the bullying girls with responsible older students. Some of the prefects, or at least near a group with a prefect and quite a few groups away from the girl they were targeting, as well as each other.

He wasn't sure they knew why he had done it, but the two the girls had bothered were practising peacefully, when Harry finally went to complete his round.

After that they moved on to the two new spells, explaining how summoning something from behind your opponent or banishing something into them could work quite well as a distraction, and that this was something they had to be aware of as well. Because something they could use to attack and distract also could be used against them. They were using hundreds of soft pillows to practice this, and in a few corners of the room Hermione and Harry had to break up some pillow fights, or gather loose feathers from exploded pillows. It was a mess, but once the meeting was over, the grins on most of the faces attested to the fact that it also had been a great time.

Before their Charms Professor could walk away – probably to his quarters for a quiet evening, or some marking – Harry stopped him. "Sir, I've noticed an instance of what looked like bullying to me. Can I speak with you about that, and how we might prevent it from happening again?"

"Sure we can, Mr. Slytherin." the professor agreed, nodding solemnly. He waved his wand to conjure three chairs in front of the dais to sit on. "Tell me what you saw."

It was almost after curfew until they had come up with a plan for how to act should something like this happen again.

Saturday 8th of November

Of course Professor McGonagall had approved Harry’s absence for Saturday morning and afternoon to attend the small family gathering to bury the remains of Regulus Arcturus Black. While attempting to flatten his stubborn hair – and not getting anywhere, as usual – Harry contemplated if it was a good thing or not. He felt he should be there for his godfather when the man’s younger brother was laid to rest, but on the other hand, he never had been to a funeral and was unsure what to expect.

The clothes Marvolo had send him via owl when he had asked over his mirror what was the right thing to wear to a funeral looked very solemn, making him seem paler than he was. Beside the shirt, everything was in black or shades of dark greys, his shoes polished to a subtle shine. Harry felt he needed to move carefully in those clothes, as he had done when wearing his family robes.
Either of them.

Giving up on getting his hair into some semblance of order, Harry slipped his wand into the sheath he wore over his shirt but under the wide sleeve of his robes. With this style and cut it was rather easy to reach a wand placed there. He wouldn't precisely be allowed to perform magic away from school, but Marvolo had insisted that he needed his wand to defend himself long enough for help to arrive.

With a last look in the mirror Harry left his bathroom and made his way through his room – grabbing his new winter cloak as he walked by the chair – down the corridor and into the common room. He had told Theo and the others where he was going, mainly because he didn't want any dumb rumours to start, and he had wanted to ask someone who might actually have experience with this kind of occasion for advice. The pointers they could give him hadn't been all that helpful, but Harry supposed it was better than nothing.

"Hey, Slytherin! You look like you're going to a funeral!" one of the older boys – if Harry wasn't mistaken it had been Higgs – called over, probably trying to make a joke at Harry's expense.

Not really having the patience for petty name-calling at the moment, Harry only nodded in the direction of where Theo and the others were sitting over their homework and revision, before turning back to the other boy, not really stopping on his way to the exit. "That's good then, as I'm on my way to one, wouldn't you say?"

He was to meet with his Head of House at the front doors so the man could take him to the place where the small family gathering was to meet. From what Harry had gathered, the grave would be on the grounds of the old Black family estate in the countryside. But they would meet in London.

"Professor," Harry greeted the man already waiting, in travel cloak and a black – what else – scarf, at the doors out onto the grounds. It seemed that it had started to snow since Harry had passed through the entrance hall after breakfast on his way down to the dorms to change.

"Mr. Slytherin," the man greeted in return, his normal impassive, closer to irritated than friendly, mien in place. "We will walk down to the gates. From there I will apparate you to the point where your godfather will take responsibility for you. Are there any questions left?"

"No, sir. I have no more questions." And so they walked through the slowly falling snow to the gates in silence.

Slipping his hands into his mittens, Harry contemplated once again the runes homework they had been assigned this week. They had to make a plan on how to use runes to keep something warm, or warming, for longer than any warming charm could manage. In a useful manner, mind you.

It would be really useful if his mittens, or the cloak, had a rune-anchored warming charm on them. Because even though they were made out of warm wool and lined in silk, they still only damped the cold. Harry still felt it. But fabric wasn't a medium one could etch or carve runes into. So how was he to apply runes to fabric? He could etch runes into a cauldron, or maybe even in a bowl made from wood. But as runes couldn't be used for heating something like a fire would, at least not without adding magic to it to activate such runes every time, it would be rather pointless.

Maybe he could paint them on? But paint probably would flake with time. So was there another way? It took Harry the rest of the way until he had the idea to stitch on the runes. Like embroidery. He would have to look up how to maintain the order of the strokes, but it sounded like it was a more durable and plausible method. It was a little embarrassing that he hadn't thought about this earlier. Some of his fancy robes had embroidery on them.
They reached the wards and crossed them. Professor Snape held out his hand for Harry to hold onto. This was the part Harry really didn't like. Why did all forms of magical travel with the exception of brooms make his stomach lurch?

Remus was already waiting for them in the entrance hall, and Harry noticed that the place had been cleaned and partially renovated since the last time he had been here. Sirius had talked about it, but seeing it in person was something different altogether. But it was obvious that a renovation was needed. Now that Sirius was Lord Black, he would have to invite people over, for talks and the like. He couldn't really do so while the house stayed in the state it had been in.

"Thank you, Severus, for escorting Harry here. We will bring him back to the castle after the funeral is over."

The Head of Slytherin House didn't say a word, but only nodded before turning with a billowing cloak to go back outside.

ooOoo

Sirius came down from his room, feeling a little apprehensive about the day's planned events. He had managed to keep the guest list relatively small. Or, judging by the looks the wizard from the Ministry who would oversee the process had given him, decidedly small.

The last male Black – as far as he or anyone knew – felt immediately better when he saw Remus escorting Harry deeper into the House. The teen looked rather grim in that much grey and black, but it fit the occasion and Sirius' mood.

Only moments later the door chime went, and Remus moved to open the door. Kreacher had been better since the portrait of Sirius' mother had been threatened with permanent silencing, and Lord Slytherin had retrieved the dark artefact the elf had been guarding. So there was no angry shouting from the witch in her frame when Remus opened the door, and no old, frail elf muttering under its breath.

"Narcissa, Lucius, thank you for coming." Both Malfoys looked paler than usual with their fair skin and blond hair, dressed in the dark colours of formal robes of mourning. At first Sirius hadn't wanted them to be there, but Remus had reminded him how close Regulus and Narcissa had been. And if he was going to invite his cousin, he couldn't very well not invite the witch's husband.

They both murmured a few appropriate words, and walked over to where Harry was waiting when the chime went off once again, announcing the arrival of the rest of the family.

"Mrs. and Mr. Tonks, Dora," Remus greeted the other Black sister not imprisoned, her husband, and their daughter.

Sirius greeted them and noticed that he was feeling oddly detached from everything. If he hadn't, he probably would have felt the urge to laugh at the uncomfortable look on Lucius' face when he was greeted politely by the muggle-born wizard Ted Tonks, and the sparks of mischief Andromeda didn't manage to hide in time.

Nymphadora took Harry along in apparition, and before Sirius could protest, Andromeda had captured his arm to pull him into side-along apparition. It probably was for the best, and just judging by that thought, Sirius knew he wasn't fit to Apparate anywhere.

Their small group met the grave-looking Ministry Official at the gates to the Manor and its grounds – it all looked a little abandoned, as was to be expected – floating a respectfully wrapped body by his side. With the minimum of words exchanged, Sirius opened the gates, pulling on some weeds that were blocking their free movement, and fell into step behind the official and the body of his brother. Andromeda held onto his arm, offering silent support, while Harry walked between Dora and her father. The two Malfoys brought up the rear. In this fashion they walked up the front path to the big imposing Manor, turning to the left once they reached the overgrown evergreen hedges marking the entrance to the gardens. It was a rather gloomy scene. Water was dropping from bare branches, leaves were rotting on the ground, it was cold, but just warm enough that the water wasn't freezing to ice. Soon they reached the part of the gardens where generations of Blacks had been buried, passing by headstones and small memorials. Sirius had always wondered if this place was working like the rest of the normal world. It was enclosed by thick boxwood hedges, seemingly small from outside, but you could walk hours inside without crossing your own path once. Or so it always had seemed. Maybe there was some credence to the claim that the Manor had been built here because of the natural magic in the place. Either way, once the message had reached him that his brother's body would be released this day, Sirius had come here for the first time since his escape from Azkaban to find a resting place for his brother.

Surprisingly they hadn't long to walk before they reached the part of the graveyard Sirius had found. There stood an old oak tree which would provide shade in the summer, a bench of stone was there too, and a slab of natural stone Sirius hoped to transfigure into a memorial befitting his incredibly brave younger brother.

The official floated the wrapped body to the slab of stone and started on an obviously well-worn speech to honour the deceased. It lacked actual information about Regulus, but contained all the words expected to be uttered on this occasion. Sirius didn't really listen, and he suspected the others were lost in recollections and memories just like him. Maybe with exception of Harry, who stood between Dora and Ted, watching the proceedings with great concentration.

While the man from the Ministry spoke about a youth at Hogwarts, Sirius thought back to summers spend chasing each other around the gardens on toy brooms barely able to leave the ground. When he spoke about upholding family expectations, Sirius remembered two small boys hiding in the cloak racks, snickering about some old wizards and witches talking so overly politely during one of the many functions they hadn't been allowed to attend because they still had been too young.

Then it was his turn. He took a few steps, leaving Andromeda behind and turning around to face the small gathering. Lucius looked as stoic as ever, both Narcissa and Andromeda had tears in their eyes, flowing down their cheeks. Dora was standing by Harry and a sad-looking Ted. Sirius really was glad that he had decided to keep this as small as possible. If he would have had to talk in front of all those that had expressed their interest in being here, he was sure he would have had a breakdown or would have made a scene.

As it was, he barely managed to bring himself to speak. "For the longest time I felt my brother had made all the wrong choices. As I'm sure he thought of me. He found Death the moment he realized that he was on a dangerous path and tried to change it. I wish that I had been less stubborn in school, trying instead to keep in contact with my baby brother, protecting him as I always had promised. I'm sorry, Regulus. You were never the idiot I accused you of being. I hope I'll be able to make you proud now that I fill the role our parents wanted you to take."

Getting out his wand, Sirius concentrated on what he wanted to have as a memorial for his brother. It was at the same time draining and liberating to transfigure the stone into a tomb encasing the body, covered in depictions of plants his brother had liked the most. After a few moments the tomb and the bench matched, and Sirius let his wand arm fall to his side. He took a few tentative steps to lay his hand onto his brother's grave. There, in the flowing cursive he remembered from his grandmother Black's letters, was inscribed:
Harry sat on the green sofa listening to Ted Tonks explaining the modern mechanics of the stock market to an intrigued, if reluctant, Lord Malfoy. Andromeda Tonks and Draco's mother were talking about different family gatherings from the time they had been children, laughing every so often about something. Remus was standing nearer to the fireplace together with Tonks – she insisted on avoiding her given name – speaking quietly to each other. Sirius had snuck off some time ago, and Harry was really tempted to go after him. There was no one here he could talk to, and he felt decidedly awkward.

Once out of the room and in the hall, Harry took a deep breath. Where could Sirius have gone to? Probably into one of the rooms that were out of the way? Regulus' bedroom? His own? Furrowing his brow in concentration, Harry quickly came to the conclusion that searching the house would take too long. The other adults would come looking for him if he took too long. "Kreacher!" Harry called the old elf. He certainly would know where Sirius was hiding, cutting down on the time needed to find his godfather significantly.

"Young Master Harry calls for Kreacher?" The elf looked better than the few times Harry had seen him during his short stay here. No longer dirty and looking like he would keel over any moment, the elf waited more or less patiently for Harry's orders.

"I need to know where my godfather is. Please tell me?" Whenever Harry had to interact with one of the elves, he heard Hermione's voice from last year in his head. Now he knew better, but her goal of improving the lives of house-elves prompted him time and time again to be polite. And he felt like this behaviour would serve him well.

"Master Sirius is up in the family living room, young Master Harry." Without being dismissed Kreacher popped away, probably to tend to the needs of the guests down in the formal parlour.

But as the elf had told Harry what he had wanted to know, the teenager didn't dwell on the odd behaviour but started to trek up the stairs to the room with the big family tapestry.

It was a short walk for someone accustomed to walking long stretches between classes from one part of Hogwarts to another. Opening the door to the room cautiously, Harry spotted Sirius standing in front of the dusty tapestry.

A few silent steps on thick, no-longer-dusty carpet brought him over to where the older wizard was leaning against the back of a loveseat, cradling a tumbler of some amber liquid.

"Hello, Harry." Sirius didn't look up, but scooted a little bit over to make room for him.

Accepting the unspoken invitation, Harry placed himself next to his godfather so their shoulders touched.
"Are you alright?" Harry asked, knowing that it was a dumb question. How could Sirius have been alright? But it was a way to start a conversation.

Sirius snorted. "No, not really. But thanks for asking. I take it you couldn't stand the others any longer either?"

"Well, it was quite fun watching Malfoy getting educated by a muggle-born wizard about shares and computer trading… but I felt out of place." The silently added I wanted to look for you, went unsaid.

Shaking his head Sirius snorted again, before he took a sip from his glass. "Well I guess that would be a funny sight."

They stood there in silence long enough that Harry started to look more closely at the tapestry, noticing all the burned spots where it looked like someone had pressed a lit cigarette to the fabric, eliminating parts of what looked like a family tree.

"That's the family tapestry," Sirius explained, waving his hand at the dusty piece. "I was on there once." The man stood from his perch to walk over and point at one of the burned spots. "Here, mother burned all of us who didn't fit her standards from the tapestry. Not sure, but I guess it damaged the magic, somehow. Look." He pointed again, and Harry pushed himself away from the loveseat to walk a little closer. "That's the place where Andromeda should be. Dora isn't on here, the way Draco is." Harry followed his godfather's finger at a place near where Narcissa Black was connected with Lucius Malfoy by golden thread leading to Draco Malfoy. Next to it Bellatrix and her husband were listed.

"I haven't found any written accounts of how it works. But I have studied it quite a bit since the beginning of the week. The first generation of children with another surname are listed, but not their spouses or children. Only those carrying the name of Black are on here. If it was different, your father and you would be included as well." A sad chuckle startled Harry, who had his hand stretched out, just hovering over the brittle-looking surface. "I guess it would get too big if all descendants from the one who made this tapestry would be included."

Sirius pointed at the bottom of the tapestry where the name of a witch and wizard were stitched in gold. "There were Blacks before that, but they aren't listed. I checked in the books containing the family history. I think it doesn't quite work the way the ancestry test offered by the goblins does."

"Do you think it can be repaired?" Harry asked, curious if it was possible and wishing there was something similar in one of the Potter properties, it would be great to look at all those that had come before him.

"I guess… maybe I should get a Charms Master to have a look at it. I… see this here?" Again Harry let his eyes slide to the point Sirius was indicating. There was a woman without a spouse listed, but with several children branching away from her. "I think it lists bastards as well. I wonder…" Long fingers traced over the spot next to Regulus Black where Sirius' name once had been.

"You think you… you could have a child you know nothing about?" Harry's stomach clenched. It was not a nice thing to think about his godfather, that he might have a child and hadn't cared enough to keep track of it. Or rather, her or him.

"Maybe? I don't know? I thought I have been careful, casting the necessary charms, using condoms… you know, being responsible. But it was a rather wild time after I graduated from Hogwarts. Auror training. I often went to muggle bars, found someone for a night, who also wanted something without commitment, had fun, never saw them again. I stopped once you were born and your parents had to go into hiding. Had to keep a low profile, pretending to be the secret keeper and all… Then I landed in Azkaban… I hadn't thought about it until Remus brought up clubbing as a way to get rid of some of the stress."

Harry listened wide-eyed to this tale, trying to picture a young Sirius leaving a bar or club with someone he had just met there. He couldn't really imagine doing something like that. And he had trouble seeing it for his godfather.

"If this tapestry was working, I might know for sure. You know, because the name would be on there, I could search for them, offer assistance. Be there. I already screwed up my responsibility towards you, now that I've thought of it, know it might be possible, I want to make sure… be there if I'm wanted..." Sirius trailed off, looking sadly at his spot on the tapestry.

"I guess you better get someone to look at it then." Harry tried for cheerful but felt that he didn't quite manage it. He blinked slowly. "Do you think a child of yours would have magic?"

Sirius nodded without taking his eyes from his fingers slowly stroking the air above Regulus' name.

"And would be around my age. Not younger by much, and only a few years older?"

Another nod from Sirius prompted Harry to go on.

"There is Dean, you know… he once told me he isn't sure if he's muggle-born or not… his father left when he was a little kid, or so he says… maybe it's not actually true?" But Dean didn't look much like Sirius or any of the Blacks he had seen in the portraits around the house. It was just too strange to think about. But it could be, couldn't it?

Wide grey eyes landed on Harry's green ones clearly surprised by the very idea.

oooOOooo

Draco looked up from his rewritten notes from the last Herbology lecture when someone stepped into the common room relatively late. Just inside the door stood Harry, looking around the room lit only by candles and the fires in the fireplaces as if he was searching for someone.

When he spotted them – the girls, Theo, and Blaise were sitting with him – he did only hesitate the moment it took him to unclasp his cloak before he started to walk over to them.

"Draco, please tell me how you managed to get out of attending the funeral? I'm glad I was there for Sirius, but it would have been nice not to be the only teenager present. It got a little awkward during dinner." The heir of Slytherin slumped into the open seat near Daphne, and draped his cloak over his lap.

Draco smirked. His interest to attend the funeral of a man he had never known – family or not – and then to spend the rest of the day in the stuffy company of his parents and other adults had been as great as his enthusiasm for Binn's lessons. "And why should I answer that question of yours?" He feigned disinterest in the conversation by checking where he had left off copying his notes, which were smudged with something that looked suspiciously like mud. He loved to banter with his friends, teasing and playing tug-of-war with words. It was an amusement his father had always approved of. In the last few years – or maybe only year – he had started to see what the point of it was. Sadly, Crabbe and Goyle were not really adept at this, and therefore Draco found few partners for such sparring.
Harry snorted inelegantly, and flopped back into his chair, quite obviously tired from a day under constant scrutiny. "I'm sure that there'll be a few more family meetings where we'll have the fun of suffering together. I think I'll go to bed." Without reacting to Daphne's hopeful looks of offering comfort or a sympathetic ear, Harry stood, took his things, and walked to the entrance to the boys' dorms. Leaving Draco bereft of the gossip about the day's happenings. Now he would have to ask his mother or go without knowing. Maybe he should've have teased Harry so. It wasn't a big secret, after all. He simply had told his parents that he needed to study more because he was unhappy with his transfiguration work. And as that was true, it hadn't been so hard to convince them of the necessity of more study time.

Maybe he could correct the blunder the next day, when the Quidditch team practiced again.

Chapter End Notes

Any ideas for possible kids for Sirius? I'm really curious what you would want to see! Please tell me your ideas.

Thanks to Jordre and Jake for helping to improve my spelling!

Thank you all for reviews, ideas and support! Someone asked why I haven't recommended a story in quite some time. The simple answer is: it isn't really easy to find those gems among all the stories started that I want to present as especially worthy to be read. And I prefer to recommend those that are either finished or updated regularly. If you know of some story that I really should read please point me in the right direction!

Sunday 15th of November

Harry was on his way back from the infirmary and his meeting with Mrs. Goyle to the common room. He had to place his newest drawing into his room and make it to the Quidditch pitch in time for the training he was to attend as one of the reserve players, before his new team mates would miss him.

This session had been especially hard on Harry. With the burial the previous day, it had been made clear once again that his new guardian, the man he had called father in front of the other Slytherins – for purely political reasons no less – had laid traps to kill. Had killed many times, to create that many Inferi.

But at the same time, he had talked to Marvolo the evening before, before going to sleep. Over the mirror the man had created for the purpose of offering Harry a way to contact him any time. Whenever he wanted to ask him something. He had even interrupted Death Eater meetings because Harry had called over the mirror.

There were so many contradicting emotions and thoughts whirling around in Harry's head.
Sometimes it felt like he was torn in two with his need for a family he didn't have to share with his friends, and the fact that he felt that he should hate the man who had killed his parents in the first place, removing the chance at a normal family for him.

Harry had asked Marvolo over the mirror if he was okay with Harry's playing as a reserve player on the team this year. Marvolo had asked if Harry had any trouble with his classwork, or felt that he didn't have the time to spare. The teen had denied any problems with his classes. While the essays had been getting ever more difficult, the material was starting to get more interesting... well maybe with the exception of Defence. But preparing for the club was a nice distraction and helped him to get deeper into the material.

So, no, he had no trouble keeping up with the homework and lessons. Even the meetings with Mrs. Goyle and his lessons with Snape for Occlumency didn't demand enough of his time that he felt he needed to drop something to cope.

Marvolo had then said if Harry – of course, the man was calling him Henry all the time – wanted to play, he was allowed to. The difference in activity, the physical exercise, might be even good for him. In fact, the man had seemed rather perplexed at the fact Harry had even felt the need to get permission first.

So this morning over breakfast, Harry had talked with the captain of the Quidditch team, confirming that he indeed wanted to be on the team as a reserve seeker. It wasn't really a shock when he learned that the whole team had already planned on his attendance. It wasn't a big stretch to assume he would like to participate. And in fact, Harry was glad that he hadn't been forced to give up flying. It was one of the things he liked the most. He felt free in the air. And that was something that he really could use from time to time.

With practiced ease Harry stepped over one of the vanishing steps, deep in thought. The Gryffindors had been noisy about his visits to the hospital wing, it remained to be seen if the Slytherins were going to be the same. For some reason, the fact that Harry was seeing a Mind Healer hadn't been used to make fun of him. Almost a miracle, considering how easy it would be to use this against Harry. He only remembered too well how Dudley and his friends had used the made-up story of a child's mother going to a mental clinic to torment the youngster. It was highly unlikely that the magical world was any better in this regard.

Harry wasn't sure, but he thought he had seen a first-year Slytherin girl standing beside Madame Pomfrey, when he had arrived at the infirmary to walk through to the private room they were using for his talks.

Harry crossed the entrance hall on his way down into the dungeons, coming across a few students who had been late to breakfast. He felt a little better now than he had after waking up. His dreams had been tumultuous. Mrs. Goyle's advice always was good to help him find his way to deal with all the problems his life was throwing at him.

Today he had drawn a more abstract picture in stark contrasts of black and white. He wasn't yet sure what he wanted to do with it. Some he had kept, others he had left with Mrs. Goyle. Maybe he would burn this one.

Not bothering with the password that had been changed this morning, Harry hissed at the door to open. It was handy that Parseltongue was able to open the doors to the Slytherin common room. Maybe he should try if this was a password set on all common-room guardians.

"Harry!" Theo called over from the group of love seats, armchairs, and some stool-like seats that were heavily cushioned and made from leather, they seemed to be using most of the time. Seeing the fire merrily burning behind a metal screen, Harry decided what he was going to do with his work from today.

Rolling his drawing up into a tight scroll and folding it in half, Harry walked over to the others. He was determined not to let the past and expectations of others ruin his chance at a happy future. Marvolo was showing every day that he was caring for Harry, trying to do what was best for their community. Harry had heard the man make an oath to work as a Lord with an obligation to care for his people, and what the teenager had witnessed of the man's actions indicated that he was bound by that vow. Where was the reason to chase after revenge? He felt like it would be a useless endeavour.

No one could force him to love the man who had adopted him. But no one could force him to hate the man, either. It looked as if his best bet to lead a happy life lay with going with the flow. The Headmaster hadn't spoken with him in quite some time, and what Harry had heard about the old wizard's actions didn't sound like he was inclined to put Harry's best interest in front of many of his other plans. Sirius was preoccupied with other problems, such as discovering whether or not he was a father. The animagus didn't have the best record of placing Harry before his need for revenge.
Harry came to stand in front of the fireplace and extended his hand to let the folded paper fall into the flames. For a moment he watched the fire consume the drawing of his conflicting emotions, then he turned to look at the others and sat down on one of the last stools.

"Sorry for vanishing right after breakfast." Harry smiled at Theo, who looked speculative, before he turned to look at Draco. "When should we go up to the pitch?"

"Soon. I think we should gather our things and go now, actually," the blond answered, getting up from his seat, gathering his notes.

Harry followed, once again steeling his resolve to base his decisions on his goals and what was good for him, and not let himself be so heavily influenced by his need to get approval. He wanted to fill his position as the future Lord Potter the best he would be able. He wanted to make friends with those people he actually liked, regardless of their family, political association, or House here at Hogwarts.

Harry was pretty sure it wouldn't be easy, that he would have to remind himself time and time again. But Mrs. Goyle had promised to help him reach that goal, as she agreed that it was a good way to deal with the problems the situation he was in presented him with.

Seeking revenge, or wallowing in guilt, were less attractive routes to take from here. The Dursleys had always made it sound like Harry was responsible for everything that went wrong. But he knew – if not in his heart yet, at least in his mind – that this claim wasn't actually true.

ooOoo

On their way up to the pitch through the heavily falling snow, Draco snuck a few sideway glances at Harry, walking beside him. By now most of Slytherin House had pieced together that the teen had regular meetings with some kind of healing professional in the infirmary every other week. The first-year girl from this morning hadn't been the first seeing Harry heading there, or entering, or leaving.

Others had seen different Professors escorting a woman in professional-looking clothes into or out of the castle on the same days. Now that they had seen him take a potion every day with breakfast, it was clear as day that he had some long-term problem that was slowly being resolved.

But as Harry was the Heir of Slytherin, they hadn't said anything before – even if they had to make sure the younger years knew to keep their mouths shut – and now that he actually was in Slytherin House, there was no way they would spill something sensitive like that to the whole school.

Time to distract the other from his dark thoughts – judging by the deep scowl he was sporting – and to sate his own curiosity. "So, I gathered Aunt Andromeda was there yesterday? I'm somewhat sad that I didn't get to see father interact with her and her husband."

Harry snorted, and then rolled his eyes in Draco's direction. "That's a rather pathetic attempt to gather information, Malfoy."

A grin spread across Draco's face beneath the scarf he had wrapped around it. It would be, if the only goal had been gathering information. "Well, Slytherin, I'm really curious how that worked out. But I think you understand why I wasn't all too keen on attending myself. I'm neither close to Cousin Sirius, nor did I even know his younger brother. And I had to study! Herbology isn't my strength. And father expects me to do at least well. Everything beneath an Exceeds Expectations will get me into trouble."
"Maybe you wouldn't have such a hard time if you weren't so afraid of getting your hands dirty?" It was phrased like a statement, but it sounded more like a question. And Draco had to concede that it probably wasn't helping his practical work any that he really would prefer to not get his hands into the dirt.

"Well, not everyone is as accustomed to living in the dirt as... others." That had been close. He had almost referenced to the Weasleys, and if there was something Draco had learned in school, it was that insulting the friend of someone was a sure way to alienate the person one was talking to.

"You do know about water and soap, right? Or even cleaning charms? I can show you how to get your hands clean again. Maybe that will help with your grade?"

Draco had the sudden urge to stick out his tongue, but at the same time felt good for making the other laugh, because the amusement was clear as day in Harry's voice.

They reached the locker rooms and started to change while keeping up a conversation about Herbology. Draco was mostly complaining about what they had to do in the practicals. And that he really didn't think he would ever need it.

"Sometimes you really can whine, Draco. Maybe you should ask Neville – Longbottom – for help. He's really good with plants of any kind."

Draco had no time to answer that as the rest of the team and the few other reserve players came in, quickly discarding their cloaks. It seemed that the snow was falling faster.

"Hurry up, you lot!" Warrington barked. "The weather gets less pleasant by the minute, and I want us out there flying for at least an hour." The captain sat down to undo the ties of his boots, barking out more orders. "Slytherin, Malfoy, I want you both practising tailing an opposing Seeker. One of you will take the lead, the other will follow. Switch after a few minutes. Mind the stands and goalposts, I don't want Pomfrey screaming at me for encouraging your recklessness if one of you breaks anything." Once both of them had acknowledged the order, the seventh-year turned to the others. "We Chasers will work together with our Keeper. Passes and goal practice." All three included in that group nodded, while getting out their Quidditch uniforms to put on. "In this weather we can't stay up long. And after the disaster of the last time we practiced with bludgers in bad weather, I will not get them out again. Crabbe, Goyle, you will use those." Two bags were thrown across the room to the two Beaters who just barely managed to catch them. "These contain quite a few small balls. If one hits anyone, it will stick. At the end we will count. Each one sticking to you will cost you a Knut. Crabbe has the green balls, Goyle the silver ones. They whistle when thrown. Crabbe, Goyle, you get the money at the end."

Draco snorted. He thought Chocolate Frogs would work better than money, but he wasn't captain, so what did he know?

Following Harry around, or leading him into steep dives, and sharp curves in the still-falling snow and brisk wind, was really fun. No previous training session had ever been so demanding. With the heavy snow neither of the Seekers had seen much of what the others were up to, and if this had been a real game, it would have been almost impossible to see the Snitch.

When the timer Draco had set for an hour alerted him to the end of the time set for their training, the blond gave Harry the agreed-upon signal and the two of them turned their brooms to land. The whole team met up at the feet of the hoops nearest to the castle, in the wind shadow of the stands there.

"Let's see how our Beaters did." A few of the balls were sticking to funny places. One they had to pry from Pucey's left foot. All in all, the Keeper – Bletchley – had the most hits, with over twenty, and both Harry and Draco had the least, with only three on their backs.

They were on their way back into the changing room for a hot shower and dry clothes when movement at the edge of the pitch drew their attention.

It looked like the Gryffindor Quidditch team had made its way down to practice. They needed to train a new Seeker, and therefore had been practising whenever they could the whole time since the re-sorting.

"Look, look, what do we have here?" one of the red-headed twins – Draco never had bothered to even try to tell them apart – drawled from behind his scarf and hat. "Slytherins decorated with sprinkles!"

"Do you reckon they're less sour with sugary sprinkles all over them?" the other twin asked in a mock-contemplative voice, holding his right hand to his chin, supported at the elbow with the other hand.

Draco felt his pride bristle at being mocked, but was stopped short by an amused snort from Harry. "With this much icing sugar on us all, I would say the lot of us here are as sweet as little kittens."

Draco blinked, totally derailed from launching into a rant, and took in their group's appearance. All of them were covered in a light dusting of white, including the Gryffindors who had just made their way down from the castle. And there was only more of the stuff piling on them the longer they stood here.

Laughter erupted around Draco from all the Gryffindors – Draco couldn't see who was behind the warm clothes to conclude who the new Seeker was – and even from the older Slytherins on the team. That broke the tension, and before Draco could get his bearings back, they had made their way over to the locker room.

Wondering whether Harry had planned the effect of his joke or not, Draco quickly got out of his clothes and under a hot shower, ignoring the others around him as best as he could. Communal showers were a concept he didn't like one bit.

After lunch the whole team gathered around one of the fireplaces in the common room to discuss tactics against Ravenclaw, the next team they would be playing.

The brooding mood Harry had been in after he had been off alone didn't return for the rest of the day.

Monday evening, 16th of November

"No, Sirius, I will not prank the whole of Slytherin. Really, what do you think that'll accomplish? I just changed Houses because I didn't feel safe any longer in Gryffindor. Offending everyone in my new House sounds like a really stupid idea!" Despite the fact that he really did think it a stupid idea, Harry had to laugh. His mental image of all his Housemates with green skin and silver hair was too funny not to.

"Oh, c'mon Harry! We did something similar to all of Gryffindor once, and Ravenclaw... well to everyone. It was fun. And you're in a really good position to do it, too!" Sirius was clearly excited by the idea, and Harry smiled fondly, settling a little deeper into the cushions of his love seat by the fire.
"I never was one to play such elaborate pranks, Sirius. I don't think I should start now. I have enough on my plate. Adding detentions on top of it, seems to be a bit… I don't know … foolish?"

Giving a dejected sigh, Sirius slumped down into something to sit on, before grinning into the mirror. "You're more like Remus than me. He always was after us to revise more, to study." Sirius gave a mock shudder, startling Harry to laugh again. "But maybe you can integrate the colour-changing aspect into your Defence Club? Combine the idea with the small balls from your Quidditch practice and shields against physical attacks?"

Interested, Harry sat forward. "That sounds like a really fun exercise. Maybe only let small groups practice against each other, not only shielding, but dodging as well." Harry's mind was already planning how to facilitate this idea into drills and exercises that would fit the wide range of skills and experience the club had in its members.

"Before you go off planning the next meeting, I would like to ask for a favour." Now Sirius seemed nervous, or embarrassed, one hand mussing with his hair, his cheeks getting a little more colour. Harry was instantly curious what his godfather wanted to ask that would make him so nervous.

"Go on," Harry prompted him when Sirius hesitated a little too long for the teen's patience.

"Well, I wanted to ask you to get me the address of Dean's mum. I would like to meet her, see if I know her, if Dean could possibly be my son… I've been asking around for an expert to look at the tapestry, sent a few owls. But with a lead like that, I just can't wait. You know? I just have to make sure now! There are paternity potions to test if someone is the father of a kid. But I would need a guardian's permission…. So could you ask?"

His godfather looked so hopeful and at the same time so unsure that Harry had trouble saying no, as he wanted to. The prospect alone, of going up to the other Gryffindor and talking to him... it would be so awkward. "You know what you're asking, don't you? What should I do, walk up to him in the Great Hall and say something like, 'Hey, Dean, you told me once that your dad vanished when you were really little. You know my godfather could have been that man. Would you give me your mother's address, so he can go check if he shagged your mom?" Harry tried to mask his embarrassment with an exaggerated, cheerful tone. But his blush gave him away. Of that he was sure.

Sirius gave a rueful chuckle. "I know. That's terrible. Maybe a little more diplomatic? Don't you think if it is actually true, he ought to know as soon as possible?"

Now it was Harry tugging on his hair with one hand, while the other held the charmed mirror. If it was him, he would want to know. Maybe Dean would like to take over the place as heir, and if he did, he would need all the time he could get to learn what he needed to know.

But making contact would be hard.

"You're going to owe me big for that one, Sirius." Harry gave his godfather a piercing look, willing him to understand just what a terrible idea this was.

The relief over Harry's willingness to help was clear as day on Sirius' face, and the man gave a small sigh. "Of course, Harry. But you know that I'm always willing to help you regardless of that, don't you?"

"Yes, I know." It wasn't the first time Sirius was saying that. And Harry believed that whatever the situation, Sirius always would try.
To change the topic to something else, and something he was really interested in as well, Harry made himself comfortable again, before asking, "What are your plans for the winter holidays? Got a bunch of invitations? I'm not sure what events I'll have to attend, but I would love to go to one you're hosting."

They talked about the different invitations Sirius already had received, and those he was expecting. They would meet at least at the party hosted by the Longbottoms, and the one hosted by the Malfoys. Harry was starting to suspect that this year the Christmas Holidays would be a lot less relaxing than the years prior.

Tuesday, 17th of November

After lunch – there had been soup with sausages or roast with different vegetables and potatoes – Harry took a deep breath and murmured a "I'll see you later," to Theo before walking off to the Gryffindor table, where he had spotted Dean in a heated discussion with Seamus. Judging by the swinging arm movements, they were talking about Quidditch.

Harry quickly reached the Gryffindor table – dodging students leaving for classes – and quite a few eyes were trained on him. Some time it would be nice to not be the centre of attention. Just one of the masses, able to blend in with the surroundings.

"Dean, might I speak with you?" Harry tried to sound confident, friendly, just like a friend asking for some time to talk, not like he was making a formal request. He felt that he hadn't been all that successful.

"Sure. What's up?" Dean said, turning on the bench so that he sat with one leg on either side of it, better able to look at Harry standing next to him.

"Maybe somewhere more… private?" This was really awkward, and Harry was sure that he could have fried an egg on his face, so hot did it feel.

Dean frowned in confusion, but nodded, standing to swing his bag over his shoulder, motioning for Harry to take the lead. So Harry did, noticing with some depredation that Seamus, Hermione, and Ron had stood as well and were walking along behind them.

They needed somewhere private to talk, but Harry wasn't about to go all the way up to the Tower – not even knowing if he would be welcome there – and the dungeons were not an option either. So he aimed for one of the many unused classrooms near the Entrance Hall. Once he had stepped inside, Harry set his bag down next to one of the tables and turned to watch the parade of Gryffindors filing in behind him.

It was kind of comical seeing them all here, when he only had asked Dean to speak with him. Determined to get his task done, Harry turned to Dean, trying to ignore everyone else. And before Hermione could start on one of her rants, or Ron could demand what this was about, Harry started to speak. "My godfather asked me to speak with you and relay a request he has."

Dean only looked more curious at this – if it was even possible by this point – and quickly interjected a question of his own. "Your godfather, that's the one who broke out of Azkaban where he had been imprisoned without a trial and was innocent?"

Harry nodded. "Yes, that's him. As you can see, he wasn't in a position to do much the last decade and more. But now that he can move freely again, he has realized… that he might have a child somewhere. You see, he was rather care-free after graduation and during his Auror training. He always tried to be careful, but... well. When he told me that, I remembered the time you told me that you really weren't sure if you were muggle-born, or if your father was a wizard. So I told him that you didn't know much of anything about your father. Currently he's working on finding a reliable way to see if he has a child somewhere, but until he has found that way, he would like to find out if he might be your father. So he asked me to ask you for your mother's address so he can ask for a meeting."

Harry had spoken rather quickly, watching the faces of the others go through several emotions, from anger to disbelief, always pressing on so the others wouldn't interrupt him. Now that he had said his part, he had to force himself to stand still, without shifting from foot to foot, fiddling with the hems of his robesleves.

Dean blinked a few times, processing the long string of words. Then he nodded slowly before a grin spread across his face. "Well, yes. It would be pretty cool to finally get to know my biological father. Mum always insisted that he was a nice bloke, but didn't tell much more about him. I love my stepfather, and all my sisters. But knowing the man who really is my father would be pretty neat. At least if it's someone as cool as your godfather, Harry. Shall I write the address down now?"

Feeling a little dumbstruck, Harry nodded, getting a quill and a piece of parchment from his things. That had been easier than he had anticipated.

Cursing himself a moment later, when Ron exclaimed, "What has Sirius done that he doesn't know if he has a child somewhere!" Hermione inquired, "How does he intend to discover any children he might have? Can you elaborate on that?" And then they started to talk over each other, not even making long enough of a pause to let him answer any of their many, many questions.

Once Dean had finished writing down the address, Harry made his excuses – hiding behind the need to study and do his homework – to leave the others behind and pass along the address to Sirius.

They were still talking loudly over each other when Harry turned into the corridor leading down to the dungeons. This wouldn't stay quiet for long.

oooOOooo

Setting down his mug of sweet hot chocolate, Marvolo took the stack of envelops and a few scrolls of parchment from his personal secretary. Bartemius had a professional expression firmly in place but Marvolo was sure that the twinkle of amusement in the man's eyes would have had the man cursed in years past.

"Have you sent out all invitations to the winter festival at Griffin House?" There really wasn't a good reason to punish Bartemius for his amusement over the tedious task of planning the winter season with all its many balls, festivals, and meetings. Even the fact that Marvolo really didn't enjoy the proceedings – and frankly dreaded the many people who more than likely would be garnering for his attention – and that Barty was amused by that, wasn't enough of a reason to cast a Cruciatatus at the man.

"I have, my Lord. Invitations have been sent to all on the list you provided. Inquiries have been sent to a few musicians and the elves have been informed to plan the food as well as the decorations," was the respectful answer, given with an equally respectful bow.

"Good. Now we only need to somehow manage to get all these invitations read, sorted, and prioritised. It's simply not possible that Henry and I will be able to attend all those." A sweeping motion with his hand indicated the stack now resting on the surface of the desk between the two of them. Bartemius didn't react beyond a murmured "Of course, my Lord."

With a sigh, Marvolo took up his wand, levitated the first missive, cast a general detection spell on it, before he made a swish with his wand to open the envelope.

A card of heavy, cream-coloured parchment with flowing, elaborate cursive writing slipped out of the envelope. "This one is from Lady Malfoy, an invitation to the large Winter Ball she's hosting. We can't miss that one. So, block the day before Christmas for it." Marvolo looked up for a moment, noting that Barty was scribbling with his quill on a large sheet of parchment he had secured to a writing board with a sticking spell.

"The theme of this year is Hospitality." Marvolo said with some exasperation. He had heard of the puzzling custom of selecting themes for large gatherings, but he wasn't sure why someone would need a theme. "Hopefully the tailor can work with that. Make sure to get an all-day appointment just after term at Hogwarts ends." The order resulted in more scratching noises, while Marvolo floated the letter from Narcissa into the accepted basket on a side table before he turned his attention to the next missive.

This was an invitation from the Longbottoms, another gathering they would have to attend. It had the usual heavy, high-quality parchment and formal writing in excellent penmanship. But this one contained a few words that had Marvolo thinking back over the last months at the Ministry and official functions.

And it seemed that Madame Longbottom was right. Headmaster Dumbledore really did seem to have withdrawn from the public. Since he no longer was an important part of the Wizengamot – as he held neither the regency for the Potter seat, nor the position of Chief Warlock – he hardly had to be present anymore. But he hadn't been at the Ministry on any of the days Marvolo had been there to discuss something with the other Members, or some department head. The old man hadn't even been mentioned by one of those normally closer related to the Headmaster's favoured politics over the last weeks.

Marvolo didn't believe for a moment that the man had decided to concentrate on the school and withdraw from the field of politics otherwise. This was a worrying development. What was the man up to?

Narrowing his eyes, Marvolo levitated the invitation to Longbottom Manor over to Barty, before he summoned the small satchel waiting for him to move the papers in it back to Headquarters into his hand. With a few efficient movements, he got out Severus' written report on the last Order meeting. They hadn't managed to find a time to meet in person, as Severus was working to organize his marriage to Sonja Jiggers, and Marvolo had too much to do as well.

Breaking the seal on the thick stack of parchment, Marvolo started to read. It looked like the Order of the Phoenix was breaking apart, but Severus also stated his concerns that his impending marriage might put his own trustworthiness in the eyes of the Headmaster into doubt. Marvolo had to concede the point Severus was making. As the spy no longer gave any useful information on the Dark Lord's movements and plans, and would be marrying soon, as well as taking up the mantle of Lord Prince – and all that without consulting the old man for his advice – it was more than likely that he would lose credibility with the wizard. The quality of information Severus had been able to bring back from the Order had started to decrease. Maybe it was time that he started to search for another spy, or stop relying on one altogether.
But for the moment planning the winter holidays for Henry and himself was more important. There was no way Marvolo would be able to influence what his old Transfiguration professor would think or do.

Scoffing at his own nervousness, Severus raised his hand to knock on the door to Minerva's quarters. Sonja and he had come to the conclusion that they wanted to marry this month, so they would have some time to themselves before Severus would claim the title of Lord Prince during the December session of the Wizengamot.

She had asked a good childhood friend to be her witness, and he had decided to ask Minerva to stand by his side during the short ceremony they would have.

But he had to ask her first. It was kind of ridiculous that he felt even more nervous now than he had when he had asked Sonja for her hand in marriage.

After his short decisive knock, it took only a moment for the door to open and reveal Minerva standing there, lacking the hat she normally wore around the school, and in comfortable robes as well as slippers. "Severus! What a surprise, come in!"

As he normally avoided socializing with the other professors, Severus wasn't surprised that his older colleague hadn't expected to see him. He sat down when she pointed at a comfortable-looking chair, and accepted the cup of tea she offered him.

After a few moments of silence, Minerva rolled her eyes at him, huffed and started to speak. "You didn't come here for company, Severus. Normally you seem to quite enjoy being alone. And I guess if you wanted company, you would have gone to visit that young lady of yours. So out with it! What has you so tense?"

Severus chuckled. Her no-nonsense attitude was a nice change of pace from most of their colleagues, who tended to be much too kind and diplomatic for his taste.

"You are right." Severus played with his ring, a much simpler version than the one Sonja was wearing, before he took a deep breath and steeled his resolve. "I came to ask if you would grant me the honour of being my witness for the marriage ceremony."

Before he managed to explain more, or even mention the date Sonja had set, Minerva had set her teacup down, crossed the small space between them and had drawn him to his feet. Clapping her hands on his shoulders before giving him a hug, Minerva was beaming over her whole face. "I'm so happy for the both of you! Of course I'll be your witness! I always feared you never would find someone to walk by your side through life. When will the ceremony be held, and will you both be living here at the castle together?"

Carefully extricating himself from Minerva's grasp, Severus sat down in the chair again, smiling. "I hope that I will get permission from the Headmaster, but I fear my position could get precarious soon."

With a frown on her face, Minerva turned to pick up her cup, before sitting down again opposite from Severus, obviously prepared to listen to his reasoning. "Why should your position become precarious? Albus trusts you, Severus. He's said so many, many times."

"Has anyone told you about the last Order meeting?"

She denied this with a shake of her head.
"Things aren't going so well. Lord Slytherin is acting in ways that Albus doesn't seem to expect, or accept, as truth. The fact that I will marry soon, and my inability to give him information that matches his expectations, among other things, will cause his trust to waver. I'm almost certain about that."

A raised eyebrow commanded him to elaborate on that. Taking a sip from his tea, Severus contemplated whether it was worth the risks to tell Minerva more. In the end, the Headmaster's knowledge about the guilt he had felt for relaying the parts of the prophecy he had overheard, and his ability to wield that guilt, and the unrequited love for Lily, to get Severus to do what the old man wanted, were the main reasons Albus did trust him. When the man started to doubt that he still could use this, which would happen soon, Severus might need an ally on staff.

Deciding that Minerva probably would be appalled by the Headmaster's scheming, Severus started to tell the story of his turn from the Dark Lord to be a spy, and why he believed that the Headmaster's trust in him might start to waver soon.

They spent hours talking, until Severus left in the early morning hours to catch a few moments of sleep before he would have to get up again for another day of teaching. He was confident that he had won an ally today. Minerva hadn't been impressed by the way Albus Dumbledore had used Severus' need for redemption to get what he wanted.

Wednesday, 18th of November

Xerxes sat at the back of the classroom, looking on as the Healer, together with Fabian and his wife, held a talk about healing of teeth in the muggle and the magical worlds. The children listened attentively, the younger years – as well as many of those who grew up among magicals – truly fascinated and a little horrified by what they were told.

This was the first in a series of planned events where one of those Muggles who knew about magic through their children – most of them parents of children attending the school – would talk about their field of expertise alongside a witch or wizard working in a similar field. It was to show pureblood children that Muggles had found a way to solve problems without magic, and for the muggleborn to learn how some occupations translated over to the magical world.

Xerxes was optimistic that it would work well.

For one, it seemed to make the parents without magic of their own be more at ease to have an opportunity to be involved in their children's education.

The next talk would be held by a veterinarian and a magizoologist. Xerxes planned to attend then as well.

While he observed the children listen, Xerxes pondered their progress. It was a shame that the goblins were so reluctant to perform more ancestry tests, having set up a monthly limit of only four tests to be conducted. As there were always those needing a test performed for marriages, or to clear up who was going to inherit something somewhere around the world, it was a struggle to find a slot to let one of the muggleborns they had rescued be tested. Therefore they hadn't managed to get very far with their hope to place the kids with actual family.

So far they had rescued nearly forty children under the age of eleven from unsuitable living circumstances. They had lived on the streets, in foster families, or institutions for mentally ill children. One of those showed signs of the sight. All in all, Xerxes wondered how many of those children would have still been alive by the time they turned eleven if they hadn't been found now.

London was happy as well. Even though he was still unhappy with the fact they hadn't found any older children on the streets who should have gotten a letter from Hogwarts, but never did. There had been hints. But considering that children who had lived a few years on the streets normally had problems with any kind of authority, or even adults in general, it wasn't really that surprising. So the older Squib worked together with a muggleborn wizard with a degree in social work to spread rumours that there was someone willing to help without asking many questions. They had to be careful to not get into the reputation of abducting children for nefarious purposes. Not an easy feat, as the children they found did disappear from the streets and the muggle world.

"Do you have questions?" Jean asked, smiling kindly at the children and some of the teachers standing in the back, just like Xerxes eager to learn more about a world they had largely ignored until now.

Xerxes watched a small boy – maybe four or five – walk over to the back of the room, where there was a shelf with books and a low table with a terrarium containing the snake Lord Slytherin had donated to the school. As the boy walked over to one of the female teachers, getting her attention by pulling at her sleeve, Xerxes turned his attention to London, walking in through the door leading out into the gardens.

"Yes?" The old Lord asked of his slightly younger employee.

"It seems I might have managed to make contact with a young wizard, I think he is fourteen, living in Liverpool. We arranged for a meeting tomorrow. He is suspicious of my claim that magic is real – especially because I couldn't show him any – but he agreed to let me bring someone else who can show him magic."

"Sounds like a plan. I guess it will take some time before the young man will consider moving here?"

"I feel it is most unlikely that he will agree to come here at all. But maybe he will agree to learn some things, and help get others like him off the streets as long as they are still young enough. At least in Liverpool." London spoke quietly, keeping an eye on the front of the room, where Jean answered one question by displaying an enormous model of a set of teeth being brushed by an equally enormous toothbrush.

"Tell me how it turns out, will you?"

The other nodded, leaving Xerxes relieved.

It was sad to admit that those young magicals living on the streets either died young, or took so much damage to their ability to trust and integrate into a society with rigid rules that they most likely would never be part of their community.

Moments later London already had left again, leaving Xerxes alone to watch the end of the question-and-answer session. Smiling, the old wizard was only partially paying attention to the adults talking to the children, or the teacher and the small boy over by the snake tank, changing out the water.

He felt that his sister would have been proud of him for what he was doing with this school. There were only a few Squibs currently learning here, but they would have a chance to stay in the community they had grown up in, keeping in touch with magic. Maybe they would be able to change the perception of Squibs in society. It would probably take years, if not decades, or even generations to accomplish this great goal. But a start had been made here.

And soon there would be an experienced Herbalist on staff as well. They would be able to grow their own potions ingredients and hold lessons for the older children. That the man now was infected with lycanthropy wasn’t a big concern in Xerxes’ eyes.

With a big smile Xerxes walked over to his nephew and the man’s wife. ”Thank you two for coming here today! What are your plans for over the holidays?”

After the latest Defence Club meeting, Harry was now sitting in his rooms, writing the last lines of the conclusion of his potions essay. It was rather late already, as he had talked with Sirius over the mirror just after the Defence Club meeting had been over. This time Hermione and he had split the students into groups from the beginning of the session, introducing the Protego into the number of spells to be practiced.

Because Harry had paid attention, Luna – the blonde girl from his runes class who had a funny way of talking – had been far away from those that had bullied her the week prior. He had walked by her and her group a few times, walking past Cho Chang, the Ravenclaw Seeker, with her wonderful black hair a few times. Her smile was doing funny things to his stomach.

Shaking his head, turning his attention back to his essay, Harry checked if he had included all the facts he had listed on a spare bit of parchment. As it seemed he had managed to include them all, Harry cast a drying spell Hermione had shown him on the scroll, before rolling it up and binding it with a small green ribbon.

He hadn't spoken with Marvolo yet, so after he had cleaned the quill he had been using, and had screwed the inkwell shut, Harry got out the mirror Marvolo had charmed for him, and walked over to the rug in front of the fireplace. The weather had only gotten colder over the week, prompting Harry to always keep a fire going in the fireplace when he was in his rooms. But still, this was the most comfortable place in his rooms. Some of the other Slytherins had taken to wearing their scarves constantly, along with more than one sweater, to keep the cold at bay.

His call was answered almost instantly, showing Harry that Marvolo truly kept the mirror with him at all times.

"Henry, how are you?" The man on the other side looked tired, his red eyes small, the brown hair mussed.

"I'm well," Harry said, making himself comfortable with his back to the fire, relishing the warmth. "I just finished the potions essay I had planned to finish today."

"So, still on top of the work? I remember that there were quite a few nervous breakdowns when my year took their OWLs." A small chuckle made its way over the mirror. Still a strangely human sound to come from the wizard still – if only in secret – being called the Dark Lord.

"Not yet, but Hermione always harps on that we need to keep on top of our work. Ron is going to strangle her sometime soon if she doesn't ease up a little about it." Harry smiled in remembrance. His two friends got into these squabbles quite often when they were studying together in the library.

"Talking about stressful times," Marvolo changed the topic rather abruptly. "Barty and I have been planning which events we will have to attend. Some take place when you are still at the school, so you will be spared those. But there are quite a few to which you will have to accompany me. To at least one, you should ask one of your classmates to be your date. One of them will be the small gathering we will be hosting. I have already included invitations to your friends, and those of your classmates who have influential families." Seeing that Harry wanted to interrupt to ask a question, the red-eyed wizard elaborated on the specifics. "I invited Miss Granger as well as Mr. Weasley. A total list is on its way to you via owl. The letter also includes a list of the invitations we can't decline and when the dates are. If there are still things you deem unclear, you can ask me via mirror the evening after the owl has reached you."

"Sounds good," Harry said and then sighed. "Will I have any time to myself?"

"I have tried to keep enough days free so you can finish the homework you will undoubtedly get."

Harry groaned at that, getting only a laugh in response, causing the teenager to scowl.

"I feel for you, Henry. But we both can't escape our duties and the expectations heaped upon us. At least you can hide behind me in regard to matchmaking mothers. I fear I won't be as lucky." That got Harry chuckling. Imagining eager witches hunting down Marvolo to trap him in marriage was somewhat funny, at least until the moment he realized that any woman Marvolo would marry would instantly become his stepmother. He didn't feel like he wanted one. Having an adoptive father was hard enough.

"And the small family gathering your godfather is hosting, as well as a ball at Longbottom Manor, and one over at Xerxes' place are on the list. I think it is likely that you will enjoy those at least."

"Probably," Harry said doubtfully. "Oh, Sirius will be in Hogsmeade tomorrow." Harry said, sounding happier, as he thought back to the conversation with his godfather earlier that evening. "He thinks that Dean from my year – a Gryffindor – could maybe be his son, and therefore he has asked Dean's mother if she agrees with testing to see if it's true. They plan to meet up tomorrow. I plan to go there with the others, meet Sirius, have a good time… I'm allowed to go to the village without an escort now, aren't I? I mean, with Bellatrix Lestrange caught…" Harry knew they hadn't really spoken about this, but he was aware that the Death Eaters who had escaped from Azkaban hadn't really died in that fire in France, but were hiding out at the house Dorea had been given as a gift for her marriage to Harry's grandfather on the Potter side. More than once a call on the mirror had interrupted Marvolo while planning with the Lestrange brothers how to give them a new identity, or the man's discussions with Rookwood on some obscure magical theory or other. So the danger wasn't as gone as the public believed, as the Death Eaters weren't dead. But it should be gone for Harry, as they had been in contact with Marvolo.

"There is no reason for you to fear the escapees any longer," Marvolo assured Harry, again not really confirming in words that he had instructed those wizards to stay away from Harry. "But there still might some dangers lingering out there. To keep you as safe as possible, Crabbe and Goyle senior will meet you at the gates." Harry's sigh and eye roll was met with a pointed look, staying the words of protest Harry felt at the tip of his tongue. There was no way he would be getting out of this one, so there was really no reason to argue the point.

"It is late, and I feel we both should be in bed." Marvolo stated, getting up from the chair he had been sitting on, giving Harry a short glance at the shelves in the background as he started to leave the office at Griffin House. "Have fun in the village tomorrow, and call once you are back in the school. Sweet dreams."

"Sleep well," Harry answered. He hoped that he would have a good time the next day in Hogsmeade having to split his time between the Gryffindors and the Slytherins likely wouldn't be easy. His desire to see Sirius too, might make it all the harder. And along with all this, he needed to come up with ideas for his friends, and his guardian for Christmas. What could he get the man? What would he even want? Getting up to get ready for bed, Harry snorted. If he didn't manage to come up with a decent idea, he just would buy a really big basket full of sweets from Honeydukes. The way Marvolo always ate sweet things, that should be at least an acceptable gift for the man.

Chapter End Notes

Thank you all for your many ideas of who might be Sirius child, or if he even has one or even more than one :) as is often the case it will be absolutely impossible to make you all happy. But I hope you will find my way to deal with it at least logical ;)
The list of thinks I plan to include still is rather long, and I feel it probably will stay long for some time yet. Your reviews and talks with my sister and the two wonderful people reading over the chapters to get the most embarrassing errors out always tend to spark more ideas!

Thanks to Jordre and Jake for helping to improve my spelling!

Story recommendation: "Morphed Secrets" by nightkitty555 (I found it over at FFnet)
It is a nice take on the Harry is Severus' son theme. I feel I might have been influenced by this story in my portrayal of Sonja.
Another chapter. It is brought to you with the help of all those writing reviews keeping my momentum alive! Special thanks this time to DreamOn. Your review came at a moment where I desperately needed some encouragement. So thanks very much to you all for the support.

This is the edited version. I hope that there are now quite a lot less errors ;)

As Dean had asked Harry to accompany him to the meeting with Sirius, and as Snape had insisted that he – as at least a somewhat competent student, able to follow directions – was to prepare and conduct the test, Harry was walking down to Hogsmeade together with the other Gryffindors. Theo and his other friends in Slytherin were walking on their own, planning to meet up for lunch at the Three Broomsticks later on.

They just had reached the big gates to the Hogwarts grounds where two adult wizards, bundled up against the cold, were waiting for them, silently falling into step behind the small group without a word.

Harry ignored his bodyguards in favor of answering the question, while Ron scowled. The redhead was unhappy with what he claimed to be Death Eaters following Harry around. If only the other had known how close to the truth he truly was.

“That’s everything we’ll need to test if my godfather is your father or not.” Harry wiggled the satchel a little, resulting in the sound of glass and metal tinkling against each other.

“Why are you the one to conduct the test?” Hermione asked, turning back for a moment to look questioningly at Harry and the others. “Wouldn’t it be better to ask an experienced potioneer? Like the one working at the apothecary in Hogsmeade?”

For a moment Harry wondered if she was miffed about the fact that Harry had been asked, and not her. She had been consistently better at Potions than Harry had been in the last few years. But that wasn’t really the point here.

“Not sure.” Harry shrugged, because he really wasn’t. “Sirius asked Professor Snape to help do the test today. But as the Professor had other duties to attend to, he got me out of bed early this morning, dragged me down to his potions lab, and made me do this test a half dozen times.” Harry snorted. “I’m absolutely sure that he isn’t my father after that.” In a way, this was some kind of twisted compliment. Or maybe Snape had done it to make sure Sirius wouldn’t come complaining should the test not produce the outcome the man wanted.
Harry’s disgruntled expression must have looked quite comical, as the Gryffindors walking with him started to laugh before they all hurried up. They were to meet Sirius at the Three Broomsticks, where he had planned to rent a room, and it wasn’t getting any warmer, so they had all reason to make haste for their destination.

They had decided to walk down to the village as an opportunity to enjoy the weather. It wasn’t snowing any longer, but the white stuff covered everything, making for a nice landscape to wander through. Draco was walking up front next to Astoria, followed by the girl’s older sister Daphne, while Theo walked fast enough to avoid Pansy and Millicent, who were following closely behind him.

“Have you heard the rumours about Lord Black?” Millicent asked with a squeal in her voice. The girls were much too excited about those stories told at all the tables in the Great Hall, and between lessons in the corridors. After some Gryffindors had started to speculate about Dean Thomas and the possibility that the boy was a half-blood, as he didn’t know much of anything about his father, the story had quickly made its way around the school. Combined with a few old stories about Sirius Orion Black going after anyone even only remotely interested while he was at Hogwarts, and during his Auror training, it made for prime gossiping material.

Theo tried to ignore the giggling and whispering, concentrating on his plans for presents he wanted to find during the day in the village. He needed something for Aidan, his younger brother. Theo grinned. It was something new to get regular letters from a younger brother, to have someone to care for. Maybe a pack of Exploding Snap cards, or a few pranks from Zonko’s would be the right thing for him. At least Theo was sure he wanted to get something obviously magical that would be fun to play with. Something he had had fun with when he had been Aidan’s age.

It didn’t take long for them to reach their destination, where they split up into pairs, to go search the shops around the village for presents to give to friends and family. Draco walked through the snow at Theo’s side, and they both were silent when they made their way over to one of the smaller stores offering books and assorted little trinkets.

Theo slipped out of his gloves, folding them and storing them in his cloak pocket, and started to sort through the children’s books stacked on a table just past the entrance. Maybe he would find some fairy tale for Aiden among them. “Well, if there is anything to the stories, he might find someone. And considering the puzzle presented by Henry’s mother and Heiress Lestrange, he might even find some descendants from a squib line and a likely heir among them.” He shrugged. Draco was the heir to the Malfoy family. Why he still thought about the possibility of becoming the heir to the Black family as well... True, Draco was one of the last Blacks left, but only in the maternal line, so Sirius Black had a greater claim on the title. And he was still young enough to have children, might even already have a child somewhere.

Draco growled low in frustration, “Can you be any more evasive, Theo?” as he looked at small trinkets on a shelf near the table Theo was searching for a book. “How is it, being a big brother? It seems that I will become one soon, and I think it would be best to prepare…”
Seeing the insecurity and honest curiosity on his friend’s face, Theo started to relay the few things he had learned about being a big brother. After all, Aiden hadn’t been part of their family for all that long, and a lot of the time Theo had been at Hogwarts and therefore away from home.

They managed to find a few little tokens for their friends, and a book for Aiden, before they made their way to the Three Broomsticks to meet up with the others for lunch. The number of presents to get this year was somewhat larger than in years past. Getting to know Henry and his friends in Gryffindor had expanded the circle of people he was obligated to give something to. As well as the group of people he wanted to give presents.

Would it be all right to get them all some generic sweets? Or did he need to get something more? It always was a rather delicate balance the first few times.

ooooOOooo

After a rather quick breakfast, Minerva had made her way up to her quarters to gather the two clothing bags containing Severus’ and her own formal robes. Today was the day her erstwhile student was going to marry. And she was one of the few people invited. The whole secretive cloak-and-dagger routine around it somehow made it even more thrilling.

Chuckling a little to herself, Minerva wondered how old she really was to entertain such young-girl thoughts about drama. But she suspected it was better to enjoy the secrets as if it were a good prank, than be sad about the fact that it seemed necessary to use secretive means in preparation.

Severus had sent his robes to her and asked her to bring them along to the Leaky Cauldron so he would be able to claim gathering ingredients as the reason he would be away the whole weekend. So the animaga checked if she had everything before she stepped up to her floo in the office. She already had told the Headmaster that she would be out for the day, for a nice family gathering in London. As she considered Severus something like a nephew, it wasn’t a real lie.

At least she didn’t intend to keep up the pretence for long. She would see to it that Severus and his bride would be welcome at Hogwarts. She understood why Severus deemed it necessary to keep the marriage from the Headmaster before it was set in stone, but after this there would be nothing the old meddler – always thinking he knew best – could do to dissolve it. Then she could give the man a piece of her mind.

After changing in a room up in the Leaky Cauldron – if the owner didn’t do something soon, it would start to resemble one of the better establishments down Knockturn – Severus briskly walked down the stairs into the main room, where Minerva was waiting near the bar.

She smiled warmly up at him, causing an uncomfortable feeling in his stomach. In a way he wished his mother would be standing there, proud over the fact that he had found a lovely woman to marry. But imagining that situation quickly brought back reality. If his mother were still living, she would be a bitter old woman by now and probably wouldn’t be smiling, might not even be here if his father were still alive too.
Pushing those thoughts away, Severus smiled a little, feeling shaky with the enormous undertaking he would embark upon today. Sharing his life and all it entailed with another person. It had been a long time since he last had made such a life-changing decision.

With a deep breath Severus stepped up to his friend, offering her his arm, and walked them both over to the Floo. “Sonja and her father will meet us in the Entrance Hall of the Ministry. Thank you again for agreeing to be my witness.” To avoid adding any sappy comments to that, Severus fell silent and allowed his older colleague to precede him through the Floo network.

She spotted him nearly the moment he stepped out of the Floo. He was wearing robes in a deep forest green with delicate embroidery at all seams and hems, resembling different leaves and plants used in Potions. The colour looked wonderful on him, and they matched wonderfully with her gown and robes of different shades of lavender, decorated with tiny embroidered flowers. They had selected leaves and flowers of the same plants in an attempt to express their desire to belong together and complement each other from this day forward until the end of their days.

Next to Sonja, her father – in dark blue silken robes of his own – gave her arm a reassuring pat, before he moved to greet his soon-to-be son-in-law and the elder witch behind Severus, in tartan woollen robes.

“I never would have thought that I might say this. But Professor Snape looks dashing!” her friend whispered in Sonja’s ear. They were close in age, and when it had become clear that Sonja wouldn’t be able to come to Hogwarts, they had fought to stay in contact. It hadn’t always been easy to write letters via Sonja’s father, or find topics they could talk about to each other, but they had persevered.

“I think so too, Loretta. But I guess you’ll have to keep to just looking at him. After today, he’s mine.” They both chuckled. Loretta had gone to Hogwarts shortly before Severus had started teaching there. In fact, Loretta had only escaped being one of his students because she hadn’t been taking Potions at NEWT level. So his first year teaching and her last year at school might have been the same, but they never had interacted in any meaningful way.

They had no time to talk more before the other three came over and a round of introductions followed.

“Shall we move to the family department?” her father asked before he started to walk in the direction of that department, Severus and Professor McGonagall falling in behind him, followed by Loretta and Sonja. On both sides people made room, most of them smiling at the small procession. It was a rather traditional approach to a marriage, so they were getting some of the traditional well-wishes from all sides as they walked through the thinner Saturday morning crowd in the atrium around the rather disturbing fountain in the middle.

It felt as if almost no time at all had passed before they suddenly were standing in front of the office of the official who would lead the ceremony and fill out the forms needed to register their marriage.

After Severus had knocked, it didn’t take long for the official to open the door, bow, and wave them into the office. Sonja looked around the small room and found it quite pleasant. It was lightened by a window showing sunshine through fluffy white clouds – something she knew to be charmed to look like this – giving the impression of a nice summer day. The furniture was of high quality, and there was nothing standing around that would distract. Sonja had seen quite a few magical homes over the past years, and more than one had at least some items on display that were either tacky in their grandeur or silly in one way or another.

When she had been a little girl, Sonja had dreamed about what her marriage ceremony would be like, going overboard with unicorns being present and things along those lines. But now that she stood here next to the wizard she loved – even after such a short time, they really had worked on getting to know each other – all her childish dreams paled against reality. The trappings of the thing weren’t all that important anyway. What was really important was the man standing at her side, and she couldn’t have dreamed up a better one.

“If the bride and her witness could please move over here.” The official started to arrange them into their places with a few guiding hand movements and friendly pushes. “The groom over here please.” And not a minute later they were all where they should be.

Severus stood turned towards her, a smile in his eyes and even a hint of it around his mouth. Their witnesses stood behind them and slightly to the side, the official to Severus’ right, Sonja’s father on his left.

They reached for each others hands, and clasped them tightly in the space between them.

“Today we have gathered here to witness the promise between Severus and Sonja, to go through life together. To master all hardships, share all joy. To stand by each other through whatever may come.” The official was speaking clearly, his voice smooth with practiced ease, the words flowing without stutters. While the promises were spoken, the man wound a silken ribbon – a white one – around their joined hands and bound it with a complicated-looking knot on top of them.

“Are you willing to keep working on your relationship, hold the promise in your hearts, and provide and take strength for and from each other?”

“I am,” they both spoke at the same time, and the ribbon vanished in a bright flash of light.

A little dazed – maybe the magic was somehow responsible for that? – Sonja followed the instructions on where to sign to complete the paperwork, and then they were outside the office again.

The whole ceremony hadn’t taken longer than a quarter of an hour.

Loretta hugged Sonja, who was clinging to Severus’ hand with all her strength, before she took a step back to beam at her friend. “And now let’s go and eat. Shall we?”

Not paying any mind to the world surrounding them, Sonja walked by Severus’ side – arms hooked around each other – back to the entrance hall and the floos in there. As the father of the bride, her dad had arranged for a table in a restaurant, and therefore he was the first to leave, shortly followed by the rest of their party.

ooOoo

Over the excellent soup – seated around a small table in a corner of the room, shielded by privacy wards Severus had erected – the five of them held a quiet conversation.

“So have you decided where you want to live?” Sonja’s friend asked of him and his bride.

Sonja shook her head, while Severus smiled, relishing the happy feeling caused by the fact that they were now married. “Not yet.”

Severus placed his spoon in the now empty plate. “Most of the year I need to be at the school. Sonja works here in London. We’re still searching for the best solution.” In fact they hadn’t really spoken about it. When he claimed the title of Lord Prince, he would get access to at least some old houses, that much he knew. He had made tentative plans to make one of those inhabitable for the both of them.

Minerva cleared her throat. “Well, I checked, and the Deputy Headmistress is in charge of organizing the accommodations of all students as well as the staff of Hogwarts. It’s traditional for the spouses of professors to live in the castle, even if they work outside the grounds. And as the building wasn’t built only with a school in mind, but to be a safe haven during times of war, there is space in abundance. Plainly, we have many more rooms than we currently need. I’m quite sure that the rooms of the Head of House of Slytherin are big enough for two, or even a family with children.” The old witch gave Severus and Sonja a brilliant smile. “If you feel comfortable travelling by floo, you could use the public floo in the post office in Hogsmeade to travel between London and the village for work.”

Sonja nodded with a small smile. “That sounds like a good idea, Minerva.” The Head of Gryffindor had insisted that Sonja – as the wife of one of her colleagues – use her first name. “I have no trouble travelling by floo, and the walk to the village and back is a nice one.”

“Then it’s decided. I’ll make all the arrangements needed, so everything will be ready when you two come back Sunday evening. And don’t worry about the others. I’ll make sure they know that you have every right to live together. It won’t stop the normal gossip, but it should curb the worst.”

Severus rolled his eyes at Minerva, who chuckled. They both knew that the gossip among the staff and student population was one of the few things that never seemed to change. If something was a secret, it typically was known by everyone in a matter of hours. And on top of that, blown horribly out of proportion. Maybe Severus should think up a small speech for an announcement for Sunday evening. The stories the students would come up with could only be worse.

But they wouldn’t think about that today. Today was dedicated to celebration, not worrying. There would be enough time for that tomorrow evening.

After the soup, there followed a roast with potatoes and different vegetables. The last course was a trio of different desserts with chocolate and cream. They all enjoyed the food, and the conversation. It was a nice November afternoon in comfortable company.

oooOOooo

When Harry and his friends from Gryffindor stepped into the big hall of the Three Broomsticks, Sirius was sitting at a table near the entrance, waiting for them. The older wizard was obviously nervous and jumped up the moment he spotted the group of teenagers. “Hello! Harry, Ron, Hermione! You have to be Dean Thomas, right?” Taking a few steps towards the dark-skinned boy, extending his hand in greeting, Sirius seemed even more nervous than before.

A little unsure, Dean took the last step to close the gap and took the offered hand. “Nice to meet you too, sir.”

Harry nervously shifted from one foot to the other, causing the things in his satchel to make noises when they collided with each other. This was a rather uncomfortable situation all around. That the whole village and large parts of the school got to watch wasn’t improving anything.

Blushing, Sirius took a step back. “Please call me Sirius. Snape said Harry would perform the test?” Grey eyes looked questioningly towards Harry, who nodded in confirmation. “And I have a room upstairs reserved for us just for that reason. It’s a rather small room, so I guess it’s best if only Dean, Harry, and I go upstairs. The rest of you, sit down, order something to drink, I’ll pay.”

That met with Ron’s approval, who had been about to say something – probably something less than ideal, judging by the expression quickly draining from his face – but now he just got out of his patched cloak to slump into one of the chairs. With a roll of her eyes Hermione took one of the other chairs, while Neville, who had been mostly silent, sat between the other two. “I think I’ll get a butterbeer, that’ll help me get warm again. It’s really almost winter now, don’t you think?” Ron broke the silence between the Gryffindors now settling in to wait.

While his three friends started to discuss winter-like weather and when the seasons really changed, Harry followed his godfather and Dean up the stairs. The moment he was four steps up, he felt a heavy person follow him and had to roll his eyes, because the two wizards tasked with protecting him on this outing were so determined to follow him everywhere. But if getting tortured for failure was a real possibility, they were probably really motivated to avoid failure.

Or maybe the two working as professional guards just were dedicated to not lose a client on a job. How was he to know their real reasons without asking questions he really didn’t want to know the answers to?

When the three of them went into the room Sirius had reserved, the two guards took posts on each side of the door. Somehow Harry felt like he was some kind of prince, and in a way he was, as the heir to two important families... at least close to what a prince would be in the wizarding world.

Sirius closed the door behind them, and Harry walked over to the stone-topped table near a window to set up the equipment he had carried all the way from Hogwarts.

“Your mother and I met the day before yesterday. We didn’t recognize each other, but that doesn’t mean much. We talked for quite a while and noticed that we were frequenting the same clubs and bars during that time. If you are truly my son,” Sirius blushed a little at that, fidgeting nervously in the chair he had selected, before getting up again to pace in the space in front of the fireplace, “we most likely were more than a little drunk when we met. But this will clear the question right up. You’ll see.”

After that, Sirius’ awkward rambling suddenly stopped, and an equally awkward silence filled the room, only broken by the sounds Harry made during his preparations.

He had placed a tiny cauldron over a small burner, and started a flame to heat the container up to the right temperature before he added the first ingredient.

The flame flickered and illuminated the small parchment Harry unfurled next to the cauldron. There was a base of several essences already mixed in a small phial Harry placed on top of the table right above the other ingredients, before he got out a small cutting board, a pair of scales, a blade, and a small mortar and pestle.

He would need to have everything prepared so he could add them in quick succession once the cauldron had reached the right temperature.

“I'll need a hair from each of you,” Harry informed Dean and Sirius, who both were avoiding looking at each other. It really was rather uncomfortable to be here with the two of them. If Professor Snape had done this before, he might have come up with an excuse only to not be required to stay in such a situation for any length of time.

Maybe letting Hermione do this would have been better. She never seemed to feel awkward in such situations. Maybe her eagerness for new knowledge helped her to ignore the tension. Busying himself with the preparations, Harry worked on ignoring the rising tension in the room.

As the right temperature was reached, Harry was distracted quite thoroughly by the steps needed to create the potion. It was a quick brew, and took no more than fifteen minutes before a dark, opaque liquid slowly rolled in the tiny cauldron.

“I will first add the hair from Sirius. The potion should become clear with that step. Then I will add the hair from Dean. The potion will change colours again. Depending on what colour it turns you either are father and son, or you’re not.” Finishing that short explanation, Harry let the dark, straight hair from Sirius drop into the cauldron, continuing to stir in even circles.

“It'll turn the colour of blood – a deep red – if you are related that close, but will turn a pale, almost white if you're not.” Harry had dared to ask why the potion turned those particular colours during the preparation in the morning, but had capitulated rather quickly partway into the Potion Master’s explanation. For all the work he had invested into getting better in Potions, Harry held no illusions about his ability to gain a NEWT in the subject. It was highly unlikely that he ever would get above the level of a merely competent brewer. He never would reach the understanding of the subject needed to gain a Mastery.

“Now we'll see.” Three pairs of eyes followed a curly, dark hair on its way into the potion, where the calm, steady stirring motion quickly dragged it under the surface. One, two full circles the colour remained unchanged, but then it started to change from the dark, clear potion it had been to something lighter.

Three more circles later the whole content looked like milk, proving beyond a doubt that Sirius was not Dean’s father.

“Well, that’s not what I had been hoping for.” Sirius drawled with an embarrassed smile. “I hope we'll get to know each other regardless.” Waiting for Harry’s nod, Sirius then vanished the potion, so they could pack everything back into the satchel.

“Would you like to have an old prankster at your side today? I've kept the day free, for the other possible outcome.” He rubbed his hand along his neck, looking sheepish and undecided.

“I for one would like your help in selecting presents for my friends, and those acquaintances I have to give something, Sirius. You surely remember some of those totally illogical rules that I have to follow,” Harry said, while cleaning the tools he had used. Since the summer he had tried to get all those unwritten – and some written – rules into his head, but who could get what for whom still felt like a totally foreign concept.
“I can’t promise to know all those rules, but I’m willing to muddle through this challenge together with you,” Sirius said with a big grin. “Do you have a list?”

Before Sirius opened the door again, he turned to Dean, who looked a little lost. “I’m sorry that the test came to this conclusion. I’ll gladly help you to discover who your father is or was. And if you ever need someone to help you in the wizarding world, I would be happy to be of assistance. You’re a good young man, I’m sure you’ll reach your goals.”

Dean nodded a little stunned, but smiled. “It would have been cool if you had been my father, Sirius. But I guess I’ll just have to continue searching.”

In good spirits, despite the un-wished-for result, the three made their way down to where the others were waiting, followed by Harry’s silent but imposing shadows.

oooOOooo

When the afternoon neared its end, Minerva stood next to Severus and Sonja. “Before you go off for the evening, I think I should transfigure your robes into something that will not stand out so much where you are going. All right?”

“Yes, thank you, Minerva.” With a wave of her wand, Severus’ robes changed into a suit of black wool, over a shirt of green silk. Getting comfortable in his changed clothes, Severus watched as the Transfiguration Professor changed Sonja’s robes into a warm dress. They kept their cloaks the way they had been, bundling up against the cold.

Turning to look at their guests, Severus took his wife’s arm – feeling a happy warmth deep inside his heart – and gave a small bow. “Thank you for being part of our wedding. Have a safe journey back home. We’re happy that you’ve been here and look forward to seeing you again soon.”

They exchanged words of goodbye before going different ways. Severus and Sonja watching before they turned on the spot, Severus taking them both to an alley near the hotel he had reserved a room in. It was in muggle London, one of the best, and he didn’t plan to leave the room at all until they had to return to the castle the next evening.

“Lead the way, Mr. Snape,” she answered, a smirk on her face.

Before he started to walk, Severus bent forwards and captured her lips in a kiss. He was so very happy that she had said yes, and was willing to share her life with him, despite the ugly past he had to carry.

No longer delaying, Severus turned around and led the way into the hotel and up to the receptionist. “Hello, I've booked the honeymoon suit, Snape is the name.”

ooOoo
Sonja looked around appreciatively, taking in the exquisite woods, fabrics, and décor. If she hadn’t known that her father was rather rich, and Severus would get control over the fortune of an old family in the near future, she would have felt the room more than a little extravagant.

There even was a bowl of strawberries and a bottle of champagne waiting for them. The berries looked good, but considering the time of year, their quality was questionable. Or did magically produced fruits make it into high-end muggle hotels?

Severus tossed their cloaks over an armchair right next to the entrance before he sauntered past her to open the bottle of champagne, expertly filling the two glasses with the bubbly liquid.

With a smile she accepted the glass and stole a kiss before she kicked off her heels. Her feet were killing her, even with the cushioning charms her friend had put on the shoes, they weren’t made to be comfortable for this long.

“What do you think, my love, a nice hot bath to get warm, before we take a look to see if the bed is as good as the price for the room suggests?”

Sonja had trouble not giggling over Severus’ exaggerated, suggestive tone. It was a good plan, she wasn’t really cold, but a warm bath together with her husband sounded wonderful. She gave him a heated look and a slow smile. “I think this plan of yours is perfect, love. But I will need help to get out of this dress. Do you think you’ll be able to provide the help needed?”

Her dark wizard sipped on his glass, and smirked at her. “I guess I can do that.” He suddenly got a serious expression, and got a small phial out of a pocket with one hand, offering it to her.

“A contraceptive potion, Severus?” she asked him. Until now she hadn’t bothered to take one regularly, and the two of them had used the charm when they had had need of it. They hadn’t really talked about it, but when they had tested Severus’ attempt to create a potion to test a couple for their combined prospect of having magical children, he had told her that Lord Slytherin was determined to shore up the magical population. She had somehow assumed they would try for children from the start.

“We haven’t even found a home for us yet. I thought it should be up to you to decide when…” A little flustered, and blushing, Severus wiggled the phial at her.

So she took it, turned it over in her hand, and sat it down next to the bowl filled with ice cubes and strawberries. Then she looked up to Severus, taking in his calm expression. He left the decision to her, even when she knew that Lord Slytherin still had quite some sway over those who had sworn themselves to him.

She gave him a smile. “I don’t want to wait, Severus. There isn’t really an ideal time for starting a family. But you and I have everything we really need. And there is no guarantee it’ll work out with the first try. So I won't need that, darling.”

Taking their glasses of champagne with them into the bathroom, the two of them started on Severus’ plan for the evening. There were no long conversations that evening. But they came to the agreement that the bed was as good as the price for the room had suggested.

Watching his deputy during lunch – quite a few students who had missed breakfast were eating with fervour at their house tables – Albus came to suspect that she was up to something. She was a really good Head of House and Transfiguration professor, but first of all she was a Gryffindor and not used to scheming. It was obvious she was up to something, the question was, what was it she was doing?

Well, there wasn’t a real reason not to ask her. “Minerva, what has you so distracted today? Is there something to be done I have been neglecting? Some parents asking for special lessons? One of the professors asking for new equipment?” She had tried once or twice in the past to handle such requests without involving him, when she thought he was bogged down with other responsibilities. It was a trait useful in a deputy, but her tendency to only inform him after the fact was something he really didn’t like. He might not need to do everything himself, but he liked to be informed about everything going on in his school.

“Nothing like that, Albus. Just organizing some changes in accommodations for one of the professors. It will be done before dinner is served. The elves are eager to help, but have had more than one question so far, so they keep interrupting me to get their answers. No need for you to get involved.” She patted him on his arm, before she took another roll from the basket sitting between their plates.

Albus furrowed his brow. Why would one of the professors need changes to their quarters? And that in such dimensions that the elves had to work more than a few minutes at them? It was rather curious. “Oh, what a curious thing.” He knew he wouldn’t be able to let it rest, and normally Minerva wasn’t inclined to keep something like this from him once he had noticed. “What have you ordered them to do? Is one of ours moving quarters?” He took a sip from his red wine, it went rather well with his roasted chicken breast.

The dark, almost furious look on Minerva’s face took Albus by surprise. But before he could react, she gave him a caustic reply. “Severus needs a few changes finished before he comes back this evening. I agreed to oversee their execution. And frankly, it’s none of your business, Headmaster. These matters fall into my responsibility, and I’m more than capable of seeing them done. If he chooses not to inform you of the specifics, that’s his right.”

Severus? Now Albus was truly surprised. What could his young Potions Professor need changed in his quarters? And why wouldn’t his spy inform him? There weren’t many reasons for the young wizard to keep something from him, ever since the day Severus had come to beg for protection for Lily and her family, he had been open with everything.

But thinking back to everything that had changed in the months since Tom had not only regained his body but also claimed the title of Lord Slytherin, and managed to get back into society, it was entirely possible that Severus wasn’t any longer as tightly bound to him as he had been in the past. There was no doubt Severus was still determined to protect Lily’s son, but as the boy was now the legal son of Tom, this was a rather dangerous shift in the dynamics.

Slowly continuing his meal, Albus was aware that Minerva was silently fuming beside him. It seemed she wasn’t happy with him, but what exactly her problem was remained unclear. But if he knew Minerva at all, she wouldn’t keep silent for long. She had a tendency to speak her mind, even if she was mature enough to not do so in the middle of the Great Hall in front of the whole school.
And true to his expectations – he really knew all his employees rather well – she huffed once they both rose after finishing their meal. With silent amusement, Albus noted that she barely restrained herself from ranting at him.

They were walking up the stairs in the direction of the Headmaster’s office when she prevented him from asking her by letting that rant lose.

“After this evening it will no longer be a secret, so I will warn you now, Albus Dumbledore. If you make life for Severus and his new wife harder than it already will be, just because they didn’t ask for your approval first, I will make sure that you will regret it. Do I make myself clear? There are some of the finest pranksters in my House, and I’m sure some of Severus’ Slytherins would be happy to help as well. Leave him be. Or bear the consequences!” She stormed off and changed into her animagus form before Albus had a chance to react.

Severus was married? If that was true, the whole situation was rather more out of control than he had thought. When Severus had told him that Tom was determined to do something about the current state of their population, Albus had wondered what methods he would use.

Was this part of Tom’s plan? Or had Severus finally let go of his guilt? It seemed rather far-fetched to assume Severus was even capable of forgiving himself for his past errors. Had the man turned against the light? Had he nurtured a viper in their midst? Considering that Severus was a Master Occlumens, there were no easy ways to make sure of his allegiance.

Deep in thought, Albus made his way up to his office, where he walked slowly over to stand by Fawkes to look out over the snow-covered grounds. How could he make sure that his only spy in the enemy's camp was still truly his? It was imperative that he manage to find a way. Maybe Alastor would be able to provide some ideas on how to achieve this. Minerva certainly didn’t seem to be on his side in this.

It had been a nice day in the village yesterday. Today they had stayed indoors, finishing up homework and redoing notes so they wouldn’t have so much to do in preparation for revision before their OWLs next spring.

Now Harry was sitting in his room on the floor, surrounded by all the small things he had bought on his tour with Sirius, and his friends. The groups had changed frequently during the day, as they all tried to not let their friends see what they were getting for them. Now Harry was checking his list of people he had to give a gift to with the things he had bought to get a list of those he still needed to find something for.

He just had finished attaching small scraps of parchment with names to the things he already had, when there was a knock on the door. “One moment!” Harry called out, quickly dumping everything into the two charmed burlap bags he wanted to use to store the things in until he could wrap them closer to the holidays.

When Harry made it over to the door and opened it, Theo was standing there, his chess set in hand, smiling. “Do you have time for a game of chess? Some third-years are making a fuss in the common room, and Crabbe and Goyle are doing something in the dorm I don’t want to think about. Can I ask for shelter here with you?”

Harry snorted. “Sure, come in, Theo. What exactly are Vincent and Gregory up to?” He wasn’t really sure he wanted to know, but his curiosity had always been a force to be reckoned with.

“It looks like they're sorting out their trunks. Maybe for the first time in ever. I don’t really want to know.” Theo walked in and over to the rug in front of the fireplace, looking at the burlap bag sitting on the chair there. “Have you found something for everyone?”

Harry followed and shook his head sadly. “No. I managed to get most of it, but I have serious trouble with what to get for my godfather or my… father. You know his birthday is during the holidays as well. Do you give something to your father for his birthday?”

Theo nodded, sat down, and started to set out the chess board. “I do, actually. I think it's customary. Most of the time I find something that Father collects and get him one of those. At least I have done so since I was old enough to owl-order on my own. But it’s really not easy. You still have a few weeks, though. White or Black?”

“I have an idea for Sirius. He was a real prankster, so I guess I'll get something from the Weasley twins for him, maybe arrange a contact between them so they can work together on some pranks. I think the three of them would love that. But for… Father… well, it’s rather hard, it’s not like I really know him that well.” Harry sat down opposite his friend, pushing a stack of catalogues under the love seat. “I guess I'll have to search for a bit. I’ll take white, I can use any advantage I can get.”

Laughing at his friend, Theo turned the board so the white chess-men were standing near Harry, and then waited for the green-eyed teenager to make the first move. “That's true, but you are getting better.”

They spend a nice afternoon playing a few games of chess. Theo won two out of three games, to Harry’s secret glee. Against Ron he never managed to win. To win even one game was so much better.

ooooOOoooo

It was a rather odd request that brought Malcolm Greengrass to Griffin House today. His Lord had asked him to gather and deliver some rather special literature. When the Dark Lord asked for this, Malcolm had been rather shocked. Something like that wasn’t even talked about in polite society, that he would ask for his Healer to procure and deliver such was unusual at the least.

So now here he was, different shrunken books and magazines of what amounted to pornography in his pockets, still guessing why his Lord wanted them and hadn’t bought them himself.

Malcolm smirked because he certainly had had a fun afternoon, searching through the family's rather extensive collection of moving photographs, animated artwork, and texts on this topic, to find a broad selection just as his Lord had instructed. But while the search had been fun, the thoughts now circling around his mind were rather less so. Because he certainly hadn’t wanted to think about his Lord in such a context. That he had been asked to provide not only material showcasing different witches, but also wizards, and to provide material geared to different interests and preferences, had sparked the question if maybe the Dark Lord had never found a sexual preference.

The thought of being caught thinking over the possible scenario of the Dark Lord's still being a virgin wasn’t one Malcolm liked entertaining.

When he reached the door – bundled up in his best travelling cloak over warm woollen robes – an elf opened the door, waving him into the entrance hall. “Flimm will be informing Master Marvolo about you being here, Healer. Please wait.” And before he could react in any way, the elf had popped out of the room, most likely to wherever the Dark Lord currently was.

Before Malcolm had managed to banish his speculations from his mind, the Dark Lord walked into the hall, coming from deeper in the building. Without a seconds hesitation, Malcolm went to one knee, bowing his head in proper greeting.

“Malcolm, you have what I asked for?” The question was asked in such a normal tone of voice that the younger wizard could forget for a moment what it was he had stashed in his pockets.

“I have, my Lord. I hope what I have found will meet with your approval.” But the scandalous nature of those books was not forgotten for long, causing him to blush, to his mortification. The chuckle coming from the Dark Lord at the same moment only served to deepen his embarrassment.

“Follow me.” Without further instruction the Dark Lord turned to walk down the corridor to the study Malcolm had seen the other times he had been in this house. Aware that the powerful wizard wouldn’t wait for him, Malcolm hurriedly got up from his knee and walked quickly so as not to fall behind any farther.

Once inside the study, the Dark Lord waved his hand at the table between them as if to demand that Malcolm present his findings. So that was what the Healer did, getting out the stacks of parchment, bound books, and framed sensual images, to enlarge them so they were once again easy to see.

With reluctant curiosity Malcolm watched as the Dark Lord started to sort through the items with an expression of almost horrified fascination almost hidden behind a mask of indifference. Only another little fact sparking Malcolm’s imagination. He really would have preferred to be able to pretend that his Lord didn’t have a sex-life, and wasn’t interested in one at all. But as he was the man’s Healer, he probably wouldn’t be able to do that. It was a little ridiculous that he was so embarrassed by this topic.

“I assume that there is a way to ascertain if a person has a body capable of all normal reactions pertaining to procreation?” the Dark Lord asked delicately, carefully selecting his words to formulate his request.

Malcolm now was sure that his Lord had no real experience with sex. Hopefully the man had at least an academic understanding. Having the Talk with his Lord as the one explaining would be mortifying. “There are several diagnostic spells to make certain that these bodily functions are healthy.” He took a deep breath, he was a Healer, the Dark Lord’s personal Healer, he had tortured in the past. There was no reason he should blush like a young schoolgirl or a prudish old maid over this topic. “Have you experienced problems in this area, my Lord?”

With a contemplative look the Dark Lord made a vague gesture. “I’m unsure. When I was a teenager I noticed certain reactions. But they never were connected with circumstances typically associated with them. Since I regained a body, there haven’t been any reactions at all.” Suddenly deep red, blazing eyes were focused on him. With a suddenly dry mouth Malcolm had trouble swallowing.

“These,” the Dark Lord waved his hand once over the materials laid out on the table, “will help me in the exploration of this matter. But as this body might still be faulty, I guess it would be wise to ascertain there are no… health problems involved.”

Hiding behind his professional education in everything regarding the body, Malcolm got out his wand and silently asked for permission to cast the diagnostics needed, which was given with a small nod.

About twenty minutes later a relieved Malcolm was on his way home. The diagnostics had proven that the Dark Lord was perfectly healthy in that regard. But he had to ask the man to endeavour to eat a more diverse diet, adding more vegetables and whole grains, to make sure it stayed that way. With a lighter heart and a mind full of disturbing ideas, Malcolm headed to the nearest point he could apparate from. Maybe he could search for some company tonight. There still was this order to find a partner, maybe he should spend more of his time trying to follow it. With his mind made up, the young Healer decided he would search in earnest this winter season.

Chapter End Notes

I have the feeling that a few of you will be happy with the outcome of the paternity test, and some will be not. To see if Sirius has a child or children already we will have to wait some more time. Finding an expert isn't easy ;)
I hope my take on a marriage ceremony is plausible, it's the first time I have written something like this, and it's unlike some of the wizarding ceremonies I have read in different stories.

Thanks to Jordre and Jake for helping to improve my spelling!

Sunday, 19th of November

Snow covered the ground around them when Sonja – held securely in Severus’ arms – appeared just outside the wards in front of the gates to Hogwarts. She was smiling contentedly, snuggling a little deeper in her husband’s embrace before she reluctantly left the warmth behind.

They both turned to face the castle, Severus capturing her hand in his, squeezing it through the thick layers of knitted mittens. “Welcome home, Mrs. Snape.” he murmured, startling a little laugh out of Sonja.

“Let’s get inside. It is fairly cold this far up north.” Sonja stamped her feet – in warm boots and not the delicate silk shoes normally going with the robes she was wearing – to get them to warm up, spurring Severus into leading her up the gravel road to the castle.

Dinner had already been over before they had departed from their hotel, so now as they ambled the halls down to the dungeons, there weren’t any students wandering around. As tomorrow was Monday and classes would resume, and considering the chilling temperature in the halls, Sonja wasn’t surprised they didn’t encounter anyone until they reached a bit of wall that looked remarkably like all the others they had already passed on their way down here.

Sonja grinned back. “Probably not. But let’s do it anyway.”

Before Severus opened the door he got his wand out and cast something – probably a charm – at her that made her clothes appear as if she had just dressed. Maybe something that mimicked the effect of a good ironing? Then he turned the wand on himself, making sure they both were presentable.

Giving her a reassuring smile, Severus turned to the wall and clearly stated “Dittany,” causing a section of the wall to open, revealing a room filled with young witches and wizards who were chattering and causing an amount of noise Sonja hadn’t really expected. It sounded more like the crowed on a busy Saturday in Diagon Alley, than a group of students about to go to bed.

The moment Severus took a step into the room, though, one of the students near to the entrance spotted him, and silence spread out through the room, all faces turning to face them. Taking a deep breath, and swallowing, Sonja stepped through the door as well. She looked upon all those young people able to wield magic and therefore carrying around a deadly weapon everywhere. It wasn’t often that Sonja was reminded quite so forcefully of the fact that everyone with magic was able to harm her easily.

But exactly that was the reason she needed to be here. She loved Severus. Hiding out in London or even leaving the magical world would send the wrong message. It would imply she didn’t belong, that it was best to exclude her. Humans were able to harm each other just fine without magic. The only safeguard was educating the youngsters to be good people. If they managed that, it was of no importance if someone had magic or not, because they wouldn’t be inclined to do other humans harm.

Her back straight, Sonja stepped up to her husband’s side, linked her arm with his, and looked smiling over the group of students.

ooOoo

Harry had watched the girls play a game of gobstones – he really wanted to learn the rules and tactics before he played with the others who were so much better at the game – when the door to the common room opened and their Head of House walked in. He looked as severe as ever, but his robes and cloak were somewhat different.

Before Harry could make out what exactly was different about them, as the light wasn’t good where the Professor stood, and there were several others as well as some pieces of furniture between them, the dark-haired wizard began to speak.

“Before the rumour mill butchers the story into something barely resembling the truth, and because I feel that you, as my students, should learn of this from me,” in a surprisingly gentle gesture – at least to Harry’s eyes – the professor guided the woman standing slightly behind him, to his side, placing his arm around her middle, “I want to introduce you to my wife, Sonja Snape. She’ll be living here at the castle, but will continue to work in London. I expect you all to show her proper respect.” The am I clear wasn’t said out loud, but the look Snape gave them all was doing a fine job of conveying the message anyway.

The moment Harry realised that the Professor had to have married over the weekend, his mind kicked into high gear. The lessons over the summer had been quite focused on the concept of the need for proper behaviour befitting his status, and proper responses in a plethora of social situations. Weddings had been one of the more complex situations, but thankfully meeting a newly wedded couple was the easiest situation amidst of the tangle of whens and ifs he was expected to remember and navigate with ease.

Seeing as all the others were sitting in their seats almost as if frozen, Harry stood and made his way over to the happy pair, a little dismayed at the look of uncertainty slowly creeping into the woman’s eyes. When he stood before his Head of House and his wife, Harry bowed, a little nervous he might botch it, and recited the words drilled into him. “I wish you both a happy marriage in magic. May you prosper together.” He came back up to see a blinding smile on Mrs. Snape’s face and something that might count as approval in Professor Snape’s eyes.

With the tension now broken, each of the other Slytherins came forward to present their well-wishes, giving Harry the opportunity to retreat to a quiet corner from where he watched and got lost in his own thoughts.
Of course Marvolo’s attempts to increase the magical population by forcing his followers to marry and procreate had come up more than once in their conversations. With the Notts adopting a boy, Draco’s parents expecting a second child, the development of a potion to enable two men to have a biological child together – with the help of a surrogate mother – it was obvious that this was more of the same.

But it looked like there was love between the two, obligation not the only reason for the marriage. And looking back, it hadn't come all that unexpectedly. There had been rumours of Professor Snape’s having a female guest, meeting up with a woman in the village, a woman who was not a teacher had been sitting with him at the table.

Considering there never was any gossip of such things about any of the teachers at the school, Harry mused that their lives had to be quite dull. There was always talk about who was dating whom, at least among the older students, who had been seen going to Madame Puddifoot’s Tea Shop and so on and so on. But never about any of the Professors. Maybe they just were too old to have a private life of that kind, or were simply too good in hiding their private life from the students.

Harry hoped that he had selected the right words. There were several phrases one could use to congratulate a couple on their marriage. There were several wishing good fortune, with differing emphasis from the financial over simple happiness together, to many children, and, to Harry’s bafflement, even some that sounded friendly enough but wished ill on the future of the newlyweds.

If he had remembered right, the one he had used wished the newly married couple financial stability, children, and happiness together. It would be a safe bet, not putting too much emphasis on one of them over the other. Judging by the fact that both had looked pleased – as pleased as Professor Snape ever got – he hadn’t made a terrible blunder.

While he had been pondering the awkward traditions surrounding marriages, all students had finished congratulating their Head of House and his wife, slowly sitting back down, while Mrs. Snape took her husband by his hand and left the common room through the door to the Professor’s quarters.

Quickly steering his thoughts away from pondering what they might do the rest of the evening, Harry turned to the other fifth-years, who had gathered around him, as they had started to do more often in the last week, giving them a questioning look.

Blaise was the first to speak up, just loud enough to be heard over the low murmur in the room. “Well, that’s something new. I never would have thought there was a woman who could tame our sour professor.”

Daphne slapped the dark-skinned boy over the head, getting chuckles out of those sitting around them, and an indignant “Hey!” from Blaise himself. “Don’t be a prick, Zabini. Just because he is a private and reserved wizard, you shouldn’t mock him.”

From there the conversation quickly moved on to the topic of the upcoming holidays, leaving the boys to make their excuses once the girls started to discuss how they would like their robes to match this year’s theme of the Malfoy ball.

When they walked down the corridor to the fifth-year dorm where they would split up – Harry continuing to his own room – Draco shook his head, sighing. “Since I started at Hogwarts, I always expect mother to need to reuse one of the themes from years past. But she always finds a new one, more ridiculous than any before.”
Theo just shrugged. “I think she tries to come up with something that would stymie the tailors. Or do any of you come up with a design yourself?”

That got the others all laughing, and they parted with happy banter, Harry walking on to reach his room. In a way he missed rooming with others. It had been such an important part of life at Hogwarts, so different from what he had been used to. But he supposed it was easier living in his own room now that he was Heir Slytherin as well as The-Boy-Who-Lived, a place to be on his own, to retreat to when the others were getting too intrusive, and a place he could call both Marvolo and Sirius every evening without others listening in on his conversations.

After getting out of his robes and shoes, Harry collected both mirrors and settled comfortably on his bed, finding a warming charm had been applied, making the covers a comfortable place to sit.

Deciding he would call Marvolo first, as Sirius never made such a fuss over his being up late, Harry took the correct mirror into his hand. Beside the fact that Professor Snape had married, there wasn’t much to tell, but he liked the ritual of the daily calls anyway. And maybe Marvolo had something to tell, or Sirius had found an expert to help with the tapestry. So Harry spend a nice hour talking before he went to get ready for bed. Tomorrow another day of classes waited for him.

Monday, 20th of November

Hermione was going over the essays she needed to hand in this week in her head as they made their way into the Great Hall for breakfast. They were late, because Ron had needed to run back three times into his dorm to get something he had forgotten. Sometimes she wondered why – or how – he always managed to misplace his things. She was sure if his head wasn’t attached to his body, he would forget it somewhere around the castle as well.

Like most mornings, the Slytherins, and with them Harry, already were seated at their table, eating with manners she wished more of her own housemates had. Well, with the exception of Crabbe and Goyle, who behaved much the same as Ron. Thankfully the other boys seemed to mature, starting to eat with their mouths closed, and no longer showing each other things that were gross.

Quickly Hermione selected a sufficiently big space on the benches near to where Neville was sitting, sat down herself, and set her bag down at her feet. “Good morning, Neville. Please pass the fruit.” She selected a pear and then handed the dish further down the table, where Lavender asked for it.

Most of the student body had arrived for breakfast when the Headmaster rose from his seat in the middle of the head table and got everyone's attention with a loud sound caused by his wand.

“Good morning, everybody,” the old man said with a cheerful voice, opening his arms as if he was trying to hug them all. “Please grant me a moment of your attention. This last weekend our most beloved Potions Master, Severus Snape, has entered the bond of matrimony with the lovely woman now sitting at his side. Please welcome Sonja Snape, née Jiggers, here at Hogwarts.” He brought his hands together for a few oddly spaced claps, managing to pull a few of the students with him. Hermione noticed that all Slytherins were clapping with polite enthusiasm, but most of the others only sat there staring, their breakfast all but forgotten. “I’m sure you all will help her if she needs help getting around our lovely school. Now let me no longer keep you from your meal.”

While Hermione watched the Headmaster sit down and turn to Professor McGonagall to talk, to she wondered why the man seemed to ignore the Potions Professor and the woman sitting by his side. Shouldn’t he have said some words of congratulation? Something more than his wish for the students to welcome her? It was rather odd.

“Do you reckon he has her under a potion? Or maybe even the Imperius?” Ron asked before taking a big bite from a sausage, scowling up at the newlyweds speaking animatedly with Professors Vector and Flitwick.

“Ron!” Shocked by that casual accusation of using one of the Unforgivable curses, Hermione turned to fully face Ron, feeling her cheeks flush in anger. Would he ever develop a filter between his brain and his mouth? “How can you just claim such a thing!? That’s a serious accusation, and a lie! I know Professor Snape isn’t your favourite teacher, but that’s no reason to claim he's committed crimes worthy of a lifetime sentence in Azkaban!” Huffing in frustration over her friend’s insistence on disliking their Potions Professor to the point of open warfare, Hermione snatched a piece of toast from a nearby basket. She would try to ignore her immature classmates in favour of getting a nice and healthy breakfast.

But it did prove hard not to constantly refute the rude and unkind speculation the others engaged in. “Maybe she likes being insulted?” Dean asked with a snicker, earning himself laughter from quite a few boys, and disapproving glares from the more romantically inclined of the girls. So the more outlandish claims following were interrupted by Lavender, who sniffed and somehow managed to look down at the Gryffindor boys. “You simpletons, isn’t it obvious that she managed to crack the hard shell Professor Snape had erected around his heart, and brought out the sensible soul hiding from the evils of the world?”

Rolling her eyes in the privacy of her own mind, Hermione quickly finished her breakfast. When the others insisted on being immature brats, she didn’t want to stick around. That was how she ended up walking alongside some Slytherins towards the door out of the Great Hall.

“Good morning, Hermione,” Harry’s cheerful voice greeted her from the side, and with a smile she turned to look at Harry, her hair swinging behind her.

“Good morning, Harry. You all didn’t look too surprised by the news.” Her statement sounded more like a question, and she was curious if this was merely the result of all that famous training to keep your composure in public, or if they really had already known.

“He informed us yesterday evening,” Theo answered casually with an easy smile.

“See you later in Potions?” Harry asked which she answered with a smile and a nod. “Then try to keep Ron from dozing during History.” With a wink Harry turned with the others, Draco Malfoy and Crabbe and Goyle, the two boys who always seemed to be glued to his side, as well as Theodore, towards the stair down into the dungeons. Not one of them had their books with them, probably because they had a free period first.

Soon Hermione was immersed in revision of the chapter she had read in preparation for this day’s lesson. It was sad that the professor for this undoubtedly fascinating subject was such a terrible teacher. Considering that she had troubles staying awake in the class, it was hardly a wonder that several of her classmates opted to either nap or do self-study during that stretch of time.
To avoid the masses of students leaving, Severus and Sonja left the Great Hall through the teacher’s entrance right in the back near the head table. The Professors were prone to use this entrance whenever they weren’t in the mood to walk by the house tables and risk being accosted by their students with questions. For this reason, the entrance saw the most traffic in the morning and evening.

The two of them had almost reached the end of the small corridor and the door there leading into the entrance hall, when the Headmaster called from the door into the Great Hall. “Severus, my boy, please, if I could have a moment of your time?”

Knowing quite well that this wasn’t a polite request but a thinly veiled order, Severus helped Sonja put on her cloak, spelling it with a warming charm. She playfully rolled her eyes at him, and gave him a short but intensive kiss. “See you tonight, Severus. Have a nice day.”

Now it was on him to roll his eyes and give a mock scowl. He having a nice day teaching dunderheads the delicate art of brewing? Not very likely. “Have a nice day too, my love.” He watched her walk out of the corridor, then turned to face the Headmaster, glimpsing the shuffling of several small painted figures in a landscape picture hanging on the wall.

For long moments the two wizards stood there, Severus in the heavy, dark robes he always selected for days he would be teaching, as they were sturdy enough to withstand the demands placed on everything that came into contact with students, and the Headmaster in some truly eye-watering bright blue robes with delicate embroidery of what looked like constellations. Severus had decided to wait for the old man to make the first move. If he said anything now, he might manage to give something away that the Headmaster didn’t know just yet. It had always worked rather well in the past on different people who tended to think highly of themselves.

“I’m saddened that you didn’t confide in me, my boy. Marrying in times like this is quite a risky step to take, don’t you think? If you had only trusted me more, I might have been able to give you some invaluable advice. By placing her by your side now, you have brought incredible danger upon her.” If there was something that Severus respected the old Headmaster for, it was his ability to keep the mask of grandfatherly friend and mentor firmly in place, while threatening quite clearly with unpleasantness if not everything was to go his way. Determined not to let himself be manoeuvred into letting his anger get the better of him, Severus took several calm breaths, contemplating his response, before he spoke. “We saw no reason to inform anyone of our decision to marry so soon after our engagement. We are both adults, and do not have much family. Sonja didn’t want any publicity, and I wholeheartedly agreed. If it had been known beforehand that a reformed, former Death Eater was to marry a Squib from a well-known family, what do you think would have happened? We both know the situation our world is in, and exactly that state is the reason we didn’t want to wait.”

Just for a fraction of a second, Severus saw clear as day the frustration and confusion on the Headmaster’s face. It was obvious that the old man hadn’t anticipated that Severus would stay this calm, or would be obviously aware of the dangers they both were in. Certainly the dangers the Headmaster imagined were more dire than the reality, but nevertheless both Sonja and Severus had talked about his current predicament as a follower of the Dark Lord – now better known as Lord Slytherin – and a spy for the self-proclaimed Leader of the Light, Albus Dumbledore.

The twinkle returned to the blue eyes, and a small frown settled onto the face of the Headmaster, creating a rather curious contradiction. “Your new wife is a Squib, my boy. Won’t that provoke problems with your associates, and Tom in particular?” It was startling how quickly the man’s proclaiming and demanding equality for all in the wizarding community would so easily point out the stereotypes prevalent in their society.

“It will not. I remember quite clearly that I told you the Dark Lord’s plans had changed. Due to the distinct possibility that magics born into non-magical families are caused by old Squib-lines resurfacing after several generations, he has decided to keep them in our own society, therefore reducing the seeds for new such lines in the muggle world. Me marrying a Squib, will keep her and any eventual children firmly away from Muggle society. He made it clear that he wouldn’t tolerate any actions liable to harm those goals. And he already knew of our engagement. Marrying now doesn’t change that.” It seemed the old man was bent on believing the worst of the Dark Lord, regardless of what intelligence Severus brought back.

Folding his arms over his chest, Dumbledore shifted his weight to one foot, assuming somewhat of a contemplative pose. “Are you sure off that? It is quite a gamble to marry only with the assurances of safety made by Tom, who, as we both know, is prone to sudden mood changes and manic behaviour.”

There was a heavy undertone of I’m older and know better than you to the Headmaster’s words. It was getting harder and harder to keep an incredulous snort to himself. Folding his own hands behind his back, his wand easy to reach from this position, Severus gave the Headmaster a sceptical look. “Since the Dark Lord has regained a body, his mood has stabilized quite considerably. He does still torture – I fear that Igor is still being held somewhere – but never without due cause, or without prior warning. I fear you need to accept that our knowledge of how he is likely to react to any given situation, based on his behaviour shortly before his fall, isn’t going to be accurate anymore. He has changed. How else is he able to pass as a Lord of the Wizengamot without slips?”

It looked like the Headmaster was sucking on a lemon drop and had found it to be made without sugar, but Severus wouldn’t let the man speak now. It was time someone tried to make him see sense. If none of them managed, he would be prone to take some desperate and dangerous actions in the near future. So Severus kept talking. “I’m dedicated to keeping Lily’s son safe, just as I have sworn to you. I’ll do what is within my abilities to work on preventing a new war, to help to prevent further loss of life. I’m in the best position to keep gathering information on the Dark Lord’s actions and bringing it to you. But at the moment, it looks to me as if you are unable to accept that reality doesn’t match your expectations of what would happen once he would be back.” Severus made a small pause for effect. “If you keep being wilfully blind, I fear you might overlook something truly important because you are chasing after shadows, causing us to lose sight of our goals.” Without giving the man time to gather his wits and regain his balance, Severus gave him a curt nod. “I have to prepare for the fifth-year Slytherin-Gryffindor class. If you will excuse me.” He turned on his heel, his robes billowing impressively, and left the small corridor towards the entrance hall. He had spent enough time already trying to talk sense into a delusional fool. Maybe he should hint to Madame Pomfrey that the old man needed a check-up.

This talk had troubled Albus greatly. It truly seemed as if Severus had moved on from Lily, had found the ability to fall for a different woman. To find love. It had seemed so utterly impossible the night that troubled young man had met with him in the open, in bad weather, sinking to his knees and begging for help.

Maybe it would have been better if he had had let Severus swear an oath on Albus himself when the young man had sat sobbing in his office. Now with Harry in Tom’s hands, there was the possibility that the boy, and therefore Severus, would be swayed to follow Tom down the dark path. But no, it was impossible that they would be able to forgive the murder of Lily.

Albus had stood there, thinking, for a longer time than he had realized when a small voice from one of the few portraits in this corridor caught his attention. “I’m sorry, sir. But you probably don’t want to be seen just standing here when the others leave after they have finished breakfast.”

Albus gave the young witch in a portrait of a small Sunday picnic a friendly smile, and started to make his way up to his office. He would have to think about what Severus had said. Was it possible that Tom had found his way back to an earlier state of mind? Or was Severus no longer reliable?

He almost had reached the door when a portly wizard painted in front of a bookcase and another painting of himself spoke up. “It is a sad fact of history that many an error could have been prevented if the people in power had only looked at the world and had seen what was there, not what they thought was true, but what was actually there.”

Without answering this or acknowledging the man, Albus walked out of the corridor. If there was someone in this world aware of the dangers of power, it would be he. How could a painted likeness of some wizard long forgotten to history think his advice was valuable or even wanted?

Saturday, 25th of November

Pacing up and down in his reception room, Sirius waited none too patiently for his guest to arrive.
It had proven to be rather difficult to find an expert on charms who was willing to come to the old infamous Black Townhouse and examine an old artefact that showed signs of failing.

Many hadn’t even deigned to reply to his polite letters of inquiry for help. And that when he had asked Remus to help him write them. Others had send short, rude notes. And he really had sent a letter to everyone he could find, even going so far as to sent letters to Japan and China, as well as both North and South America.

But luckily his old Charms Professor, a Master in the subject, had agreed to come over and take a look. The professor had said more than once that he was unable to make any promises. But Sirius hoped that the small wizard might be able to give him some more information about what was wrong, enabling him to write better letters to those few experts and Masters who had sent polite denies because of the vague nature of the inquiry.

Finally the fire flared green and a short figure emerged from the Floo, looking around while smiling in a friendly manner.

“Professor Flitwick! Welcome to Grimmauld Place! Come in!” Sirius felt instantly better the moment the kind eyes of the part-goblin professor fell on him.
“Certainly, Lord Black.” Sirius gave him an exasperated sigh and rolled his eyes, he still had trouble accepting that he truly was Lord Black now. “I’m happy to help as much as I can. But mostly I’m glad for this opportunity. There aren’t many tapestries like the one you described, and most families guard them fiercely.”

Sirius nodded, that was certainly true. He himself wasn’t aware of any other British wizarding families that had something similar, but it was quite possible that they simply held them close, telling no one of them. “Then let’s not waste any time. Follow me!”

And so they walked up the stairs to the room the monstrosity hung in. But as he hoped the thing would reveal whether he had any children he should be taking care of, Sirius supposed he had to change his attitude a bit.

Opening the door with a flourish and an exaggerated bow, he let the small Hogwarts professor walk in first. He was almost sure that the professor had been chuckling at his antics. “Over there, Professor,” he said, following the man in.

“Oh, please. You are no longer a student, and I’m no longer your professor. My name is Filius.” A hand was extended towards him.

With a big smile of his own, Sirius bent down a little – Filius was really a fair amount shorter than him – and shook the other’s hand. “I’m Sirius, and not joking either.” He winked, and then sat down to watch the Professor work.

And it was a good thing he had taken a seat, because it took several hours of intense muttering, casting of spells, and more muttering, before the wizard working on the tapestry turned around to face Sirius. “First, I don’t think that I personally can help here. Maybe we can sit down somewhere while I explain?”

It was a sensible request, so Sirius nodded, his dark hair falling forward in the motion, before he led the way over to a small seating area. “So what have you found, Filius?”

“The moment I saw the tapestry I thought it was possible that all the small burns are the cause of the failing charms. By the way, these are a true work of art!” His eyes were shining with awe over the intricate magic he had examined today. “The way all those family tracing charms, preservation charms, charms to make small likenesses of people… it is magnificent! Sadly, I have only cursory knowledge about all those charms tracking the progeny of those already recorded in the tapestry. It somehow works on the concept on recording the names and dates belonging to those descending from those already recorded, I think, by somehow utilizing wards keyed to family members. As I said, I’m by no means an expert. But I’m sure that the burned places distort the weaving, stopping the tapestry from working properly. I can give you a detailed writeup of my findings and the name of an expert in those kinds of family-related charms and wards. If you are interested, Sirius?”

With a small smile – there still was hope he would not have to search high and low for every woman he had ever had sex with to check if he might have faltered in his contraceptive charm – Sirius accepted. “That would be really helpful, Filius.”

He offered tea and some pastries as a refreshment before Flitwick made his way back to the castle, but the Charms Professor declined. “I have a study group with some of my Ravens this evening. I better make sure to be back in time. I will send the information you need by owl.”

After the flames in the Floo had returned to their natural red, Sirius contemplated what to do with a young Saturday evening. Maybe Remus’ suggestion he should go out into the city, visiting the clubs and bars, wasn’t so bad after all. Deciding that this was exactly what he would do, Sirius walked up to his room to stand in front of his wardrobe for the next hour, searching for just the right outfit to wear on his first trip through the bars in what felt like much too long.

Monday, 27th of November

In between the many missives of his morning mail, Xerxes found one from Hermione, which he placed to the side to read in leisure later – her letters always were long and full of details he didn’t want to miss – and one official-looking envelope that had a seal identifying it as one from Gringotts. Eager to see if it was about the thing he hoped it was about, Xerxes tore it open with his hands, not patient enough to get his wand out to do it the proper way.

Quickly his eyes flew over the stilted, formal writing, skipping the politely worded introductory sentences to get to the heart of the matter. And indeed it was the confirmation that the vault his once daughter-in-law Bellatrix had owned was now his.

After his Lord had made clear that he needed to retrieve something of his that he had entrusted into Bellatrix’ care, to place into her vault in the depths depth under the bank, Xerxes had filed a complaint against the Ancient and Noble House of Black because the marriage contract between his son and Bellatrix had been broken.

Back when the two of them had decided they wanted to marry, they had written the requirement of at least two children into the contract. Xerxes remembered that Bellatrix had been reluctant, and had wished the number to be limited to one child. When Rodolphus had explained to her that he could demand at least one son, leading potentially to many, many daughters, she quickly changed her tune. Two children was much better than the potential need to have a dozen daughters and still be trying for a son.

He wasn’t sure why there never had been a child. If it was because they simply hadn’t been able to have them, never tried, or whatever. He wasn’t about to ask his son, either. But it had been a reason to demand the agreed-upon compensation from House Black. He and the new Lord Black had exchanged quite a few letters over the matter.

At first Sirius Black had been furious over the demand, but finally he had relented. Xerxes thought it was possible the man had realized that he had no interest in being in the possession of anything that had belonged to his least favourite cousin. He even had disowned her from the family once he had been recognized as the Lord.

Probably Xerxes’ willingness to return some invaluable Black heirlooms to Lord Black, and therefore the family they belonged to, had been the argument that had swayed the man’s opinion.

And here now he had the notice that the vault of Bellatrix Lestrange had been seized for the Black family, and was now given to Lord Lestrange as compensation for a broken marriage contract. The key was encased in the envelope and Xerxes immediately decided to go there after he had finished his breakfast of eggs – sunny side up – lightly toasted bread with orange marmalade, and a nice cup of tea.

It didn’t take him long before he was dressed in fine but everyday robes, and a warm fur-lined cloak. A short Floo trip later he had reached the bank, and then stood waiting in line to get to a teller. In a way it was funny how, if you didn’t have an appointment, which everyone could get, everyone had to wait in line. Every Lord was the same as the parents of a muggle-born child in this hall. That was probably the reason his own father had once insisted that Xerxes was always to get an appointment when he had to deal with the bank in person.

But this was too important to wait two days or more to get a free spot for an appointment. His Lord had repeatedly asked after the cup he wanted to get back, had even described it in detail, so Xerxes could get it out without having to contact him first. Sometimes his Lord was more like the friend Xerxes had had back when they had been in school together, and on some days he was more the Dark Lord commanding his troops. But in this Xerxes was pretty sure that both personas had the same goals and reasons to act.

So as a good friend, and a devoted follower, Xerxes acted the moment he had the opportunity.

Soon it was his turn to follow one of the goblins to the carts and take the nausea-inducing trip with one of the horrible things down into the bowels beneath London. The door to the vault was opened after the pitiful creature that once had been a magnificent dragon had retreated before the sound it associated with horrible pain.

Behind the door were stacks of coins, books, and other artefacts. With searching eyes he walked through the assorted riches, ignoring most of it in favour of concentrating on a two-handled golden cup that largely resembled a chalice.

It didn’t take all that long to find it, and with the goblin's permission he cast the counter curse against the gemino effect that guarded the contents of the vault against being removed by someone uninformed of the spell's presence. The things inside would duplicate on contact with skin until the contact was broken. In addition to burying intruders under gold, the pieces turned hot too, burning the unsuspecting thief. Xerxes felt that it was an excessive security measure, so he didn’t put up the charm again after he had taken the cup from it's place high up on a shelf. Before he placed the cup into a silken bag he had brought, Xerxes shortly examined the example of fine craftsmanship.
There was the image of a badger carved into one side. This was without doubt the cup his Lord had ordered Xerxes to retrieve.

With the cup inside the silk bag hidden inside his robes, Xerxes left the vault with the intention to come back sometime later this month or even next year to search for those items Lord Black had named as those he suspected Bellatrix had taken with her or had been gifted later. He didn’t feel that it was all that urgent.

Moving quickly, Xerxes got back into the cart – he was sure the goblins had designed them to be the worst experience ever on purpose – and from there into the Alley. He would buy a book for Hermione, maybe a collection of poetry to broaden her horizons, before he would head home so his unavoidable visit to Marvolo wouldn’t be observed or connected to his visit to the bank.

Whistling a tune, he walked down the street, forcing everyone to make room for him with his confidence.

ooOoo

Marvolo was sitting in his office at Headquarters, jotting notes down on a ritual he was developing.
As he had had not one ounce of success with trying to absorb one of the horcruxes he had managed to get back into his possession, he had decided to move his efforts to a way to move a horcrux from one object into another. After all, he had to find a way to get the horcrux out of Henry without harming his son.

Even if he managed to truly regret the murder that had created his latest horcrux – and he felt his murder of Lily Potter was the one he was most likely to feel true regret for – it was far from certain that the re-absorption wouldn’t cause harm to Henry.

He tossed the quill away in the direction of the merrily burning fire heating the room, when the wards around the house informed him that one of his Death Eaters had apparated into the building.

Quickly notes vanished into a warded drawer, ink droplets were vanished, and boring paperwork replaced his previous work, because it would have been curious to find him here not working on anything.

It didn’t take long until there was a knock on the door, announcing his visitor.

“Come in!” he called, placing the quill to balance on top of his inkwell. Looking up in time to see the door open to admit Xerxes clothed in his normal attire, holding a silken bag in one hand. In a second Marvolo was out of his chair and stood next to his friend, who looked like he had not expected such a reaction.

And quite frankly, Marvolo was rather surprised himself, but didn’t want to ponder to long on this. “You have found the cup?” his question was urgent, his voice almost inaudible but intense.

“After I got the message from Gringotts that the vault had been seized for House Black and in turn granted as compensation for a broken marriage contract to House Lestrange, I went to the bank immediately. It was easy to find. I guess Bellatrix wanted to be able to see the proof of your trust in her every time she visited the vault.” Without further words Xerxes offered the bag, and Marvolo reverently took it from the man, taking it over to the desk to set it down. After a moment fiddling with the drawstring, Marvolo held the cup in his hands, feeling the vibrations of his magic and soul bound to the relic of the Founder of Hufflepuff House.

“Thank you for your quick action, Xerxes. And thanks for the invitation to a game of chess.” He smirked, feeling much lighter with another piece of his soul back under his direct control. “I’m delighted to accept.”

Clearly getting the dismissal, Xerxes bowed, turned, and left the office, apparating away only a short time later.

Marvolo sat down at his desk, looking at the cup, feeling immense relief. Discounting the diary and the ring – still not returned to Marvolo by Dumbledore – which he had been forced to absorb because they both had been destroyed. He now had all his soul pieces back under his control. The locket and diadem were guarded in this house under heavy wards, and the cup would soon join them. But if he kept running into roadblocks and walls in his attempts to find ways to reabsorb them, or move them between containers – he had a vague theory that might work to move the pieces back into himself – he might never find a way that would work.

The interesting, engaging conversation he had had with the one Weasley boy, the curse-breaker, came to mind. Maybe Gringotts had a way to achieve what he was working on. The young man certainly had to be a member of Dumbledore’s Order if the old man had trusted him enough to take him along to the removal of the curse the old Headmaster had picked up from the ring. And if that was the case, the red-headed wizard now knew that Marvolo had created horcruxes. Maybe if he asked in the right way, potentially by asking for help to get them back into himself and melded with the soul residing in his body, the other would be willing to help.

And if Marvolo was honest, as long as he only asked for information and didn’t bring his horcruxes and another potentially hostile wizard together, the risk was low.

Getting out a fresh sheet of parchment, Marvolo started to carefully started to compose a letter. He needed to be aware that the letter might be intercepted, and even though William Weasley might be sympathetic to his goal in this – the way the other had shown interest in magic most British wizards would call evil suggested as much – were one of his family or associates to see the letter, the consequences might be unpleasant. So he chose his words with care, offering a further discussion of old magics and wards as a reason to meet. Hopefully the young man would agree.

oooOOooo

They had decided to have been born in the late fifties. That had been a time before their father had married their mother. When he had travelled the world for several years, searching for interesting magical sites, and entertainment. He had known then that once he was back in Britain he would have to take over the family and all responsibilities associated with it. So he had seized any opportunity for some fun.

At the moment Rudolphus and Rabastan sat over a list of the lands and regions their father had travelled, crossing out all those which made it easy to track someone born there. All others, annotated with notes on pro and contra, were copied onto a separate list.

There were a few places on the African continent, mostly in the Sahara and the West African rainforest, where the old practice of masters taking on pupils, instead of building centralized schools, was the norm. Then there was China. Also a well-organized and ancient, tradition-rich magical community, the devastation of the muggle-originated so-called cultural revolution had forced the witches and wizards to move from traditional places – if only temporarily – erasing and destroying many records during the sixties. Furthermore, the land had many rural areas without much of any formal recording at all. Europe quickly was ruled out completely. The aftershocks from Grindelwald’s and the muggles' wars had already lost their biggest impact by then, making tracking someone all too easy, complicating the needed task to forge their identities.

There had been smaller Asian and South American communities their father had visited, but most of them were either so close-knit that it would be hard to pretend to come from there, or they hadn’t had enough upheaval to explain away the lack of proper documents.

“So it looks like we'll need to learn either one of those obscure African languages, or Chinese. That will be fun.” The sarcasm was thick enough to walk on, and Rabastan gave his brother a rather hard jab with his elbow.

“No need to be so enthusiastic, brother. Do you want to walk in the open again, or don't you?”

Rodolphus sighed. “Yes, I want to be free again, really free. But this is not an easy task. This plan sounds impossible to manage. How shall we pretend to be anything but British wizards? We don’t know any local spells, and either of those places has too unique a magical tradition to get by with what we know already. Then there is the little fact of needing to learn a really complex language.
You can’t tell me learning a Chinese dialect and the symbols needed to read and write is an easy task? And the African languages aren’t any easier. And on top of that, there's much less material available to learn them!” Rodolphus had started to get louder at the end there.

Rabastan could only nod. Comparing the problems his brother had just named to exchanging their mother’s contribution to their genetic material with those of another witch, ageing them to be the same age so they could pass as fraternal twins, the latter set of tasks seemed really easy.

“So we should go with a small South American community then? There was a pretty isolated one that was wiped out by an earthquake a few years back. Portuguese is much easier to learn than any of the Chinese, other Asian, or African languages and cultures.” Rodolphus looked rather sceptical, but was listening. ‘The culture is mostly European, with only a few truly local elements still preserved. At least in that community. It was mostly composed of descendants of immigrant European witches and wizards. As are the spells. If we pretend to having travelled a lot after we were old enough, being away when the disaster struck…” he trailed off. It was a rather daunting task that lay before them.

“So we start researching Portuguese, ways to learn a language quickly, and local spells, magical plants, and traditions?”

Rodolphus sighed again, but nodded. “And we probably should inform our Lord of our decision on a place of origin. Maybe he has some insight that would prove useful?”

They once again sank into contemplative silence, walking around the library, now collecting information about South American magical communities, Portuguese and Spanish, as well as any books on how to learn languages quickly.

ooooOOooo

The rest of the month of November moved quickly for Harry. The Professors were burying them under homework, and Hermione went right along with it, making schedules for revision for each of their friends. That group now included Theo, Neville, and Luna, who was helping with the schedules by making sure that they included leisure time. As she pointed out, a mind bogged down with facts lost its ability to fly. At first Hermione hadn’t liked that idea much, pointing out she already had kept evenings free for Ron and Harry to use for Quidditch practice, as well as Friday evening for the Duelling Club, and the weekends for Harry’s regular appointments and extra lessons, but had had to fold in the end.

Besides the regular meetings to complete their essays – all conducted in the library, because that was the best place for people from different houses to meet – Quidditch practice, daily calls with both Marvolo and Sirius, regular sessions with his mind-healer, and extra tutoring with Professor Snape, Harry didn’t have much time to paint or draw.

Most notable was the one Quidditch training session where Draco managed to catch the snitch before Harry because he had been looking after Cho Chang, the Ravenclaw Seeker, as their team had come to the pitch for practice before the Slytherin team had been finished. Draco and the rest of the team had fun teasing him over this. But luckily they kept the teasing to the common room, making sure the story didn’t get out to the whole school. Harry really began to appreciate the secretive nature of most Slytherins. It made sure embarrassing stories didn’t make it to the wider student population. But he had to concede that it was a real possibility that the fact he was Heir Slytherin had something to do with that as well.
When Harry asked after one particularly hard session with Mrs. Goyle if Marvolo was still going to her too, he got to see a really rare sight: Lord Slytherin, self-proclaimed Dark Lord, looking embarrassed. He had reluctantly said that he hadn’t been there after the one really short visit that had been the first session. Harry had asked, despite the fact he assumed it wasn’t the case, if Marvolo had too much to do and had not managed to find another appointment because of this. Marvolo had snorted – another first – and had denied Harry’s assumption. In fact, Marvolo feared that he might kill the woman in his frustration and so had decided not to tempt the fates. In a bout of reckless cheekiness, Harry had said that one could count that as a kind of progress, startling Marvolo into laughing. Looked at from a certain angle, one could really claim that his avoiding a situation where he might get so frustrated that he would kill was progress.

Before he really knew it, November was over, and the time until Christmas break was short. He would have to return to living with Marvolo, being dragged into the society nightmare that were the many events held over the month and into the new year. And he still had to find two presents for Marvolo: One for Christmas, or Yule as Marvolo insisted on calling it, and one for the man’s birthday. Remembering how happy he had been the first time he had gotten a real present for his birthday, Harry was determined to get one for Marvolo. Because somehow he was sure that the other had never had a sincere birthday present before.

With a new routine established, and many new experiences on the horizon, Harry wondered at how nice it was to know that Voldemort wasn’t after his life. The year so far hadn’t been peaceful, but with that many adults on his side, the problems had been easier to face than ever before.

A story in short chapters written as dialouge. It is refreshingly funny and in its form not something I have seen often.
Friday, 1st of December

Daphne sat with her dorm mates in the common room around one of the low study tables with nice cushioned chairs around it. They had placed two candlesticks at strategic points so they had enough light to write by, and were finishing as much of their homework as they could so they might have a little free time on the weekend.

But Daphne wasn’t really focused. She had decided to ask Harry today, as she was sure he wouldn’t think to ask her himself, and because she didn’t want to risk the chance that another girl would think to ask him first. But she was unsure how she should do it. None of her lessons ever covered how to ask a guy to be her casual date to a ball, or rather several balls, so she could attract the attention of possible candidates for marriage. The thought that her mother wouldn’t approve of her plan made her smirk.

There was no time like the present, so she closed her inkwell, gathered her things into a neat pile, and stood from her chair.

“What are you doing, Daph?” Millicent wanted to know, looking up from her herbology essay with a smudge of ink on her nose.

“Securing me a date for the winter festivities. You have ink on your nose.” Having the others distracted with this little hint about the ink, Daphne quickly walked over to the two wingback chairs by the fire, which were currently occupied by Harry and Theo, while Draco and Blaise sat next to them on the floor bend over a chess game. Draco with the white pieces clearly being in advantage.

Both other boys were reading. Theo had a book on the use of runes in warding open to a page in the middle. Harry was reading a book written in a language, or at least script, she never had seen before.

Taking a moment to compose herself, Daphne took the last steps and just started talking to get Harry’s attention. “Harry, do you have a moment?” He looked up, placing a strip of parchment between the pages of his book to mark his place. “I wanted to ask you something.” Only long practice prevented her voice from shaking.

“Sure, Daph. What was it that you wanted to ask?” He sat up a little straighter, sitting more like a proper young man, his attention turned to her as it should be.
Here goes nothing. If she wanted him as an escort, she had to ask him. And she would do so now, because she had decided that she would. “I know that you aren’t interested in me as a girl…” she huffed frustrated, that wasn’t the focus she wanted. “Do you want to be my date for the balls? Not as a prospective couple, but as friends. I know you are reasonably good at dancing, and not likely to bore me to death. Besides that, I think you aren’t really ready to take a girl you might be actually interested in to the ball, but you could help me get the attention I need to find someone for me. So will you go with me?” It was against everything she was used to, asking in such a way. In the middle of the common room, where everyone could see, and with such open words, without a way to back out without losing face. But she was sure this was the best way to get Harry to agree. She had observed his behaviour since the lessons over the summer, and she was sure that his placement in Gryffindor had been a good fit. As surely as he was a Slytherin, he still had many Gryffindor tendencies, and with those he wanted to trust as friends, Harry seemed to clearly prefer the Gryffindor way to handle things.

Harry blinked a few times, really slowly, before he smiled a little unsurely back at her. “Well, I hadn’t thought about it, but you’re probably right that I need a date, aren’t you?” he sighed, carding his hand through his birds nest of hair, making it even messier than it already had been. “Going as friends? I think I can do that. I would like that. Yes, Daphne, I would like to be your date to the ball, or balls. I guess we need to colour coordinate our robes?” He rolled his eyes a little at the last question, startling Daphne to laugh. Maybe they had subjected him to too many fashion lessons over the last weeks. Telling him how to combine an outfit and how important the first impression was, and the right statement, not only with how he acted and moved but with what he was wearing. Obviously he had listened attentively.

“We should try.” She tilted her head, trying to make out what the book was about, or at least what script it was in. “What are you reading?” she changed the topic. Now that the daunting task had been accomplished, her curiosity won out.

Seemingly glad for the shift and leaving fashion behind, Harry almost closed the book, keeping his finger as a marker between the pages. “It’s a book on magic and intent, and how the latter influences the outcome of spells, rituals, and the like. It’s written in parselscript. I’ve had it since the summer, but haven’t found the time to read in it much until now. It’s the only copy, and I wasn’t sure it would be… clever to read it up in the tower.” He seemed reluctant in his choice of word, but Daphne understood nonetheless. Something so obviously connected to Slytherin openly displayed among the Gryffindors could get the object in trouble, and even if they wouldn’t object, she always had suspected that the lions were rather wild and less refined, putting everything that found its way into the tower in danger of being damaged.

“Do you know how old it is?” She loved old handwritten books. It was a little sad that she couldn’t read that one, it sounded like the topic was really interesting.

“Not exactly, no.” Harry shook his head, stroking the spine of the book carefully with two fingers. “I only know that it’s a family heirloom.”

Daphne smiled and nodded. “I will leave you to your reading. There’s still time to make sure our robes don’t clash later.” She winked at him, giggling a little at his huff and resigned look. There weren’t many boys their age she knew who enjoyed the careful selection of colours for clothing.

With a bounce in her step she returned to her friends, to be interrogated on how her endeavour had gone.
Theo let his book sink into his lap. “You really hadn’t thought about your need for a date?” Harry shook his head, looking up to meet Theo’s eyes. “And it didn’t even occur to you to ask Hermione? She certainly would be happy to go with you. Don’t you think?” It was a pretty obvious solution to Theo. In years past he had always asked one of the girls he knew well, but knew he wouldn’t be able to marry, to go to the balls with him. This year his father had told him that he would have to go without a date, and dance with all the girls who might be a possible match for him.

Theo felt a little apprehensive about being considered old and mature enough to start looking for a bride. It was a big step, and he wasn’t quite sure yet what he wanted in a partner for life. He wasn’t even entirely sure he was into girls. He’d had dreams about Blaise for a while after the one time he had walked in on him last spring in their dorm. On the other hand, some traditions weren’t that easily broken.

Harry’s answer tore Theo from his musings. “No, I really didn’t think about asking her. She’s more of a sister to me. I can’t see her just as a girl. You know? And after the fiasco of last year’s Yule Ball, I’m not so sure she would have answered favourably, anyway.” A blush crept up his face, and Theo instantly was intrigued.

“What did you do?” He bent forward, his eyes glued to the bright red face in front of him, aware that Draco and Blaise were listening too.

“We might have asked her as a last resort, after agonizing far too long over who to ask. She was offended we thought no one would ask her, and that we hadn’t thought to ask her earlier. By that time Victor Krum had already asked her. It was all rather horrible, and I would prefer to leave it in the past.”

Seeing that Harry really was uncomfortable with the situation and aware that the other might fear the potential blackmail material – even so, it was rather weak material – Theo decided it was time to defuse the situation. So he started to tell a story of his earlier troubles with girls. Because who didn’t have some embarrassing situation with a girl in their past? Catching on quickly, Blaise and Draco joined in the fun, and soon the chess game and their books were forgotten, all four boys laughing and giggling over silly stories of interactions with girls.

Harry had decided that it was time for him to go to bed. It was still slightly surprising how much easier it was to be by himself in the Slytherin dorms. Back in Gryffindor, Ron or one of the others would have complained that he wanted to go to bed so early, or even have mocked him for going to bed at a time only little kids got to sleep. The Slytherins either hadn’t the need to establish a reputation built on childish acts of defiance of common sense, or respected his decisions because he was the adopted son of the Dark Lord. Because that certainly was at least part of the reason he was left alone so much, and got to sit in the spot reserved for the most influential student of their House.

On the way to the hall leading to the actual dorm rooms, Harry walked by an alcove where two seventh-year boys were sitting, books, scrolls, and other materials on the table between them. As he passed them he couldn’t prevent hearing what the two were speaking about.
“He really will make you marry a witch?” the incredulity was clear to hear even while Warrington whispered, clearly unhappy about something.

The other boy nodded glumly. “Since the decree went out to increase the number of children, my uncle is adamant that everyone of the family procreates.” He snorted, letting his head fall back against the wall and the tapestry hanging there.

Harry’s mind was working quickly. If he was right, the boy talking to Warrington was named something Yaxley. And a Yaxley had been there that night in the graveyard. So it wasn’t really hard to work out what the two were talking about. But why would Marvolo’s order to his followers to find a partner and have bigger families, make the boy sitting here unhappy?

Before Harry could gather his thoughts and walk on he was spotted. Yaxley went pale and Warrington’s face became carefully blank. It was evident that they both thought it rather unfortunate that Harry was standing there. Because he was sure they would wonder what he had heard and if he would tattle to his guardian, Harry took a few steps and slipped into the alcove with them.

They didn’t object, watching the younger teenager warily. “I’m sorry, but I couldn’t help overhear part of your conversation,” Harry started in a careful tone, working on keeping a non-threatening, friendly mask in place. “You did sound unhappy over the prospect of getting married?” Harry made his statement sound like a question, not adding any of his suspicions to the implicit question, wondering where all those fancy words were coming from suddenly. It seemed talks with adults about politics had coloured his vocabulary quite extensively.

“It’s no secret that I’m gay.” There was bitterness in the boy’s voice, and Harry furrowed his brow in confusion. The Dursleys might have made comments implying that being gay was something bad, but all that Sirius and Marvolo had told him about the wizarding world’s view on this topic was the opposite of the Dursleys’. Being gay was something that was as normal as not being gay. So why was Yaxley so bitter about it?

Only asking questions would help him understand. So that was what he did. “Why would your uncle force you to marry a witch when he knows that? And how is your uncle even able to do that?” The looks briefly flickering over the older, bigger boys’ faces made Harry think he was missing something rather obvious to all who had grown up in wizarding Britain. For all that he had caught up on many things over the summer, there was still rather a lot he didn’t know.

But it seemed that his status as the Slytherin heir afforded him some leniency about those chasms still left in his knowledge, as Warrington started to explain, the other boy too unhappy to have the energy for it at the moment. “His uncle, Corban Yaxley, is the head of the family. Septimus’ father is the younger brother. And as the head of the family decides all the big things, he can force marriages to happen, can reject spouses he doesn’t approve of, and so on.” The look Septimus Yaxley had on his face was one of resignation and defeat. Harry thought that he would have looked murderous if someone had been trying to marry him off to someone he didn’t like. At least he wanted to think that he wouldn’t just go along with it.

Marrying for life was something different than being under the guardianship of someone whom you didn’t like. Or thought you shouldn’t like. Maybe even should hate? Either way, a guardian wasn’t important any longer when you became an adult. A wife wouldn’t just vanish.

Harry frowned. “How does that even work? The part with procreation. How does it even work if you like boys, men, whatever?” Would Marvolo want this to happen? And if the answer to this was yes, why did Marvolo have Professor Snape working on that potion making it possible for two men to have a biological child?
“Well, there are potions to make it work, like normal. I’m hardly the first forced to marry a woman to make sure a child is born. Wizards – and witches – have been forced to marry people they aren’t attracted to practically since the beginning of time. The continuation of the family line always was more important than something as trivial as happiness.” Yaxley snorted, rubbing his hand over his face and hair. He looked truly defeated.

Harry sat there, perplexed by the oddness of the wizarding world. Maybe not only the wizarding world. Fragments of half remembered lessons about history from his muggle school floated through his mind. Arranged marriages had been the norm in certain circles not so long ago. Marriages to gain more land, secure peace between nations, confirm alliances… the possibilities were endless. Taking into account that wizarding Britain still had many other outdated practices, it didn’t feel too far-fetched that this might truly still be happening.

“I just hope the witch father picks out for me, will be content to let me have an affair once the child is on its way. I don’t think I can live in celibacy just because a witch I hardly know doesn’t want me to stray.” There was bitterness in Yaxley’s voice, convincing Harry that this certainly couldn’t be right, and regardless of what Marvolo had planned, this couldn’t happen. There was a potion in development that would make children possible. And wasn’t it plausible to assume that there would be more than one child from Septimus Yaxley if he could marry someone he actually was attracted to? Someone he really loved?

“I’m not sure your uncle has it right.” Harry stated in a quiet voice, drawing the attention of the older teenagers to him. Green eyes fixed on the glimmer of hope barely visible in the depth of Septimus’ eyes. “Father has a Potions Master working on an old, unfinished potion he found in Slytherin’s journals. Its goal is to give two men a child with the help of a surrogate mother. Why create such a potion if it isn’t to be used?” A little late Harry realized that to make this better he had to talk with Marvolo about his plans, and ask him to put pressure on Corban Yaxley. But now that he had already stirred up the hope, he remembered only too well how bad it was when hope was smashed. When Sirius had to flee after third year and Harry didn’t go to live with him, it had hurt. He couldn’t allow that to happen, when all he had to do to help was speak with Marvolo the way he always did.

“I will speak with father. I know he doesn’t want to be misunderstood. Have a nice evening, you two.” With that last sentence Harry cut off any further conversation, standing to walk to his room. He had a call to make.

Because of his quick departure Harry didn’t see the calculating looks exchanged between Warrington and Yaxley. Was this the loyalty to those of his House that Professor Snape had alluded to the evening Slytherin had been re-sorted? If so, there might just be hope for Septimus.

Saturday, 2nd of December

“I know you want to come, Sonja. And I would love to have you at my side. But it simply isn’t safe.” Severus tried to stay patient while he dressed in clothes cut to give him maximum freedom of movement. His trousers and boots were sturdy and warm, as were the robes he had selected. Sonja was looking on, cloak in hand, not really happy with him at the moment. “I never have been there, so I don’t know how the wards will react, or if there are any curses around that might act up. I have seen protections at the old family homes of other families that are set up to be a challenge.
To make sure a new heir claiming the title after the last Lord has died without passing it on directly is worthy. I don’t know enough to be sure the Prince family hasn’t done something like that. If you are by my side, I would have to divide my attention. Such a distraction can be fatal. I would love to take you with me. Believe me, I truly would. But not on this first visit.” It didn’t feel right to be stern. In a way it was like talking to one of his advanced potion students, talking them out of making an interesting experiment he just knew would end in a disaster.

A frustrated huff from Sonja made him turn and look as she sank onto their bed. “On a normal day I can live happily without magic. I have adapted to being surrounded by it while I can’t use it. But this is bloody frustrating. Knowing it might be dangerous, wanting to be there, cover your back, and knowing at the same time that it would be more dangerous if I was there.” She let herself fall backwards, staring at the canopy above their bed. “I want you to ask one of your colleagues to cast a monitoring charm on you, so they can go help you if there is a problem.”

Severus rolled his eyes. Even if he did that, if he managed to get himself into a situation where he would need help, it was highly unlikely for anyone to be quick enough to be able to help. “What if I take a portkey with me, spelled to activate if I lose consciousness, taking me straight to St. Mungo's? This way no one beside me would get into danger.” Negotiating was something familiar. Most of the time he had been forced to negotiate from a position of weakness. This might be actually the first time he negotiated with someone he considered an equal.

His wife – and wasn’t that a truly surprising development – sat back up, clutching her cloak and eyeing him speculatively. “Additionally, you will tell one other adult able to wield magic, and you will send a patronus message every thirty minutes.” There was a tremor hidden beneath the steel in her voice. She jumped as a load crack sent sparks up into the chimney. She was nervous.

Closing the last silk button on his robes, Severus took the few steps to stand between Sonja’s legs. He bent down to give her a caste, lingering kiss. “I will be careful, my love. And I will send a message to you as soon as I’m sure that the place is safe, and I’m Lord Prince. Maybe Minerva would like you to visit?” If he had to tell someone where he was going, his most staunch ally at the school was probably a good choice. He had told the Dark Lord, of course, but that wouldn’t really help Sonja cope with this.

Sonja nodded and the two of them started their trek up to Minerva’s living quarters. Saturday afternoons frequently were devoted to the marking of homework for all of them. Especially the OWL and NEWT students needed more elaborate remarks than just slashes, and crossed out and underlined parts of their work, so they could improve.

They didn’t meet many students in the corridors. Lunch was long over, and it was still many hours until dinner would be served. Now that the cold was almost omnipresent in the halls, any sensible person stayed in a heated room. So that meant either the library or one of the common rooms for the students, their quarters or offices for the teaching staff.

After Sonja had knocked, it didn’t take long for Minerva to open her door. “Severus! Sonja! What an unexpected visit. Come in, come in. It’s warmer in here.” The older professor took a step to the side, making the way free for them to step in.

“I have other things to do this afternoon,” Severus declined, guiding Sonja in direction of the door with a hand on the small of her back. “I intend to take a look at the old Prince Home, and take over the Lordship, as I’m the last of that line. Sonja can’t come with me on this first visit, and she demanded I inform another of where I go. I hope you will have a pleasant afternoon while you wait.” A quick glance assured Severus that Minerva had understood what he was asking of her. She would keep Sonja calm and distracted while Severus was away.
Giving his wife a quick kiss goodbye, Severus nodded to his colleague before he walked down the corridor with billowing robes. He shouldn’t wait any longer than he already had. If he wanted to officially claim his seat in the Wizengamot in the next regular meeting, he would need to claim the title soon. If there was a problem delaying him, there wasn’t much time to spare to get this all to work.

Between the things of his mother, in the last letter ever sent by her parents, there had been a portkey labelled with the simple word manor. Severus assumed that it was exactly what his grandmother had written in the letter wrapped around the small brass key. A portkey to the gates in the fence around the main property. It had been a revelation, reading all the letters his mother had never even opened. His grandparents had taken more interest in his academic achievements and his day-to-day life than he ever had expected. He asked himself what his life would have been like if his mother hadn’t been so stubborn and proud. But in the end, such questions were a waste of time. He would never learn what might have been different. It was a real possibility that he never would have been born.

Severus stepped through the gates to Hogwart’s grounds and at the same time outside the wards. His gloved hand retrieved the portkey from his cloak pocket, and he turned the small key over in his hand a few times. He was prepared. An emergency portkey to St. Mungo’s – the Dark Lord had given it to him, claiming that he didn’t wish to lose his Potions Master to something as silly as lacking preparation – hung around his neck. The small emergency potions kit was packed and stored securely in his pocket. There was a kind of alarm system established. Everything he could do was done.

Taking a deep breath, Severus tightened his grip on the portkey and spoke the activation phrase. “Per aspera ad astra.” (1)

After the colourful swirls and disorienting spinning of portkey travel had stopped, Severus effortlessly regained his footing. This Latin phrase had sparked his worry that there might be some kind of trial for him to face once he came here. It often was interpreted along the lines of the idea that there had to be dangers and obstacles to be overcome to reach a big goal.

In light of his suspicions, Severus cast several detection charms before he took a step closer to the wrought iron gate in front of him, right over the cobblestone path he stood on. There didn’t seem to be any curses or even alarm spells on the path, the gate, or the two fieldstone pillars holding the gate.

The walls were covered in common English ivy, blocking the view of the grounds behind them. Only a few bare treetops could be seen from where he stood. The gate looked well cared for. No grass or other plants had made their way onto the path, as they tend to do when a street isn’t travelled regularly. Maybe some kind of plant repellent charm, or a spell on the road to keep it clear?

Cautiously Severus took two steps forward, getting near the gate and the wards around the property that seemed to be bound to the property boundary. They felt non-threatening, friendly almost, for lack of a better term. So they probably recognized him as part of the Prince family. When Severus placed a hand on the gate it swung inwards on well oiled hinges, soundless. Either there were really good charms on all he had seen so far, or there was someone still looking after this place.
Maybe his grandparents had hired someone to look after the house and the grounds? Someone like Filch maybe?

With cautious steps, wand ready in his hand, Severus passed the boundary and closed the gate effortlessly behind him. The grass was covered with tiny ice crystals, the weak winter sun not strong enough to melt it. Beds were covered for winter, roses wrapped in rough cloth to protect them from the cold, all the leaves from the trees – oaks, one or two elm trees, maple trees, ash, all of them old – had been moved into piles, clearly indicating that someone was taking care of the place.

When the house came into view, Severus had seen a fair bit of representative garden. But judging by the size of the grounds, it looked like there might be a garden for vegetables and potions ingredients in the back, or somewhere out of the way.

The building itself was something to see. It was build in the style of the Tudor period. Small arches, tiny towers – more decorative in nature – intricate carvings, oriel(2) at several parts of the facade, dormers in the story just under the roof. Probably so the servants' quarters had a little more room. Parts of the house were covered with ivy, and it looked as well cared for as the rest of the grounds did.

Following the directions of that last letter, Severus walked up the stairs to the carved wooden door serving as the main entry point into the manor, placing his hand in the middle of the door near the knocker in the form of a dragon head. Wards flashed, but before Severus could yank his hand back, or cast a shield charm with the wand held in his right hand, the door opened with the click of a lock.

Casting his usual array of detection spells in quick succession, Severus watched with a funny feeling in his gut as candles all around the entrance hall flashed to life, casting their warm, unsteady glow over a tiled floor and priceless, handwoven carpets, onto several oil paintings that turned their judging eyes onto the lone wizard cautiously taking the last steps into the house, and several doors leading into different parts of the manor.

His grandparents had written down that the heir needed to go to the patriarch's study on the ground floor of the manor to claim the title of Lord Prince by placing the tip of his wand onto the family crest to be found there, and speaking the words of an oath. The letter had given directions to the study, and casting detection charms the whole time, Severus made his slow way through the halls and rooms, coming across a library and a music room with an old harpsichord covered by a linen cloth. Most of the furniture was covered with cloths, giving the house an abandoned atmosphere.

It wasn’t hard to find the study, and therefore the golden crest mounted on a carved piece of wood hanging over the fireplace situated next to the door through which Severus had entered the room.

Another series of spells was cast. Severus was suspicious. It was too easy. There hadn’t been a single spell that was dangerous, only one showcase with objects of a dark nature, but warded so unprepared hands wouldn’t be able to get to them and come to harm. Nothing that would prove a challenge. Had he been wrong to assume the activation phrase hinted at a test of some kind?

He hesitated a moment in front of the crest before he touched it with the tip of his wand. He had memorised the words of the oath and now spoke them, carefully enunciating each word. “I, Severus Tobias Snape, son of Eileen Prince, son of the Prince Family, do hereby claim the title of Lord Prince. To fill the responsibilities of a Lord to his people, to further the welfare of the wizarding community, to serve magic. So have I sworn, so mote it be.” Coming from the place where his wand touched the crest, magic swirled through the room. Testing Severus and his intentions, his plans and his determination, the magic wasn’t gentle to him as it wrapped around him, bringing a sense of obligation, duty, and responsibility with it. A moment later Severus found himself sitting on the floor, panting, feeling a little light-headed. That hadn’t been what he had anticipated, or expected to happen.

“Master needs something to drink? Tea? Wine? Cherry so happy to have Master back!”

Startled by the happy, high-pitched voice, Severus turned to his right and came face to face with a happily bouncing elf with huge lavender eyes, wearing a toga crafted from two tea-towels.

It looked like his assumption someone had been taking care of the manor and the grounds had been right. Only, his guess that a Squib was the one, had been wrong. Pinching the bridge of his nose, Severus took a deep breath. On top of everything else, he now had his own personal elf to care for. Sending it to get himself something to drink might afford him some calm to think. And send a message to Sonja. If he was to wait any longer, she would worry needlessly.

“Bring me some cold water, Cherry. Then come back and wait. I have some questions for you.”

With a happy almost-shout of “Cherry will do that!” the elf was gone just long enough for Severus to cast his patronus and send a short message of “All went well. Will look around,” to Sonja.

When he next looked around, three elves were standing near the desk, bouncing on their toes, clapping their long spindly hands, ears flipping back and forth. In short, they were the image of eager anticipation and excitement. A crystal glass and pitcher were standing on a silver tray on the desk waiting for him to take a drink.

For the moment ignoring the three elves, Severus poured himself a glass of water and got out his potions kit. A sip from a headache potion would do him some good at the moment. He removed the stopper from the vial and added a healthy dose of the potion to the water, before storing the potion back in its slot in the kit. Then he swirled the glass, mixing the potion and water, before emptying the entire glass without pause.

Then he turned to the elves, who immediately started to babble when his attention was obviously on them. “Basil will clean Master’s bedroom today!” “Has Master a little Master or Mistress for Honey to care for?” “The House can be ready for Master this evening. Cherry will make sure of that!”

“Silence!” What had he done to be saddled with three house-elves? All families he knew had one, maybe two. Sometimes a few older but not as wealthy families shared in a family of elves. But an empty manor with three elves? He never had heard of anything like this. “I’m head of Slytherin House at Hogwarts and therefore live there most of the year. So it’s not important to make this manor ready to be lived in on the spot. I need a list of repairs needed on the grounds, as well as all keys to vaults you may have. Then one of you will give me a tour around the grounds, showing me everything of importance.”

“Cherry will do so!” the little elf said decisively. It looked as if she was the senior elf, or head elf, or whatever the title might be. All three were still beaming at him as if he were bringing sweets and they were children. It wasn’t a look he was accustomed to seeing aimed at himself. Sonja smiled at him, but this unadulterated joy wasn’t something he would associate with any sane adult.

Sighing, Severus sent Basil and Honey – whoever had named those elves seemed to have had a fixation on food – to gather a list of needed decisions, and then ordered Cherry to show him around.

Somehow this had been too easy. Maybe the true obstacles would show themselves later, when he went to claim his seat on the Wizengamot. In a way, he would have felt better if there had been some nasty curses in the Manor or the study, something to test him, something to overcome. Now he felt as if Mad Eye Moody’s motto of constant vigilance would get to be his own for a long time to follow. Paranoia had been his friend and companion for years now, it had been silly to hope that his need for it would diminish in the future.

The rest of this Saturday Severus spent touring an extensive garden, or rather park, and the much-too-big manor. He would have to go through the ledgers in the study to see what else there was and how much everything had descended into chaos while there had been no one around to take care of the estate.

That was probably something that Sonja would be able to help him with.

Only one thing was sure: the future held many unknowns for Severus, many challenges, and opportunities, as well as dangers.

Wrapping a big scarf around his neck, Arthur walked out of the back door and into the garden. The frozen grass made crunching sounds under his heavy boots. Winter was making its first tentative moves into their region. Under the light of the almost full moon, he found his way through the unkempt garden down to the orchard. If he couldn’t find his eldest there, he would have to search the rest of the grounds, but he was pretty sure that Bill had gone there. Probably to think.

Most of the family went down there to think. It always had been the place that held the least chaos at any given time. Molly had been down here often since Albus had called the Order back together. Each thing happening had made her stays down there more often and longer. Harry’s being adopted, Albus’ telling them that You-Know-Who had split his soul, the Order’s breaking apart… It hadn’t been easy ever since the end of the Tri-Wizard-Tournament.

Shaking his head to clear his mind, so he would be able to concentrate on the here and now, Arthur cast a Lumos so that he would be able to see under the trees. The branches were bare, letting light fall through, but the ground was treacherous, with fallen branches, long grass, and rotting leaves covering it all. An eclectic torch – or something similar to that – like the Muggles used to carry a small light around would be nice, he would have his wand free to cast other spells and still be able to see. Maybe he should get himself one for Christmas.

He found Bill at the other end of the orchard looking out over the field on the other side of the simple fence, something clutched in one of his hands. With a few more steps Arthur was at his son’s side, leaning against the fence, looking onto the frost-covered meadow on the other side.

“What’s the matter, Bill? You’ve been quiet the whole time through tea. And now you’ve been out here for a quarter of an hour already. Talk with me, Bill. Maybe I can’t help, but I’ll try, and you know that talking can clear up things. Do you have trouble at work? Or with Miss Delacour?” The last was Molly’s suspicion. Bill had spoken about the girl he was dating rather often, and his mother was convinced that the French girl wasn’t good enough for her son. Arthur wasn’t so sure she was right, but he didn’t know what was really the reason for Bill’s moodiness, so he hadn’t said anything.

Bill sighed. “Everything’s fine at work and with Fleur. No, I’m thinking about a letter I got a while back. An acquaintance asking for help, you could say, but I’m unsure if I should help.”

Arthur was taken aback. He had thought he had brought up his children better than that. “Why would you even hesitate? If you can help someone asking for help, you should help to the best of your ability!” There wasn’t a question about that in Arthur’s mind. If one was able to help a friend, that was what one should do.

Bill snorted. “You don’t even know who asked, or for what! But I will explain the circumstances of what he’s asking for. We’ll see how you feel about this then.” That reaction made Arthur’s stomach drop. Bill hadn’t said that a friend had asked for help, and he wasn’t a boy any longer. It was a possibility that someone had asked for help gaining access to Gringotts past its security measures. But that surely wasn’t the case, because then Bill wouldn’t have to brood about it. Declining such a request for help should be easy.

“Oh, dad, listen. This acquaintance has made many mistakes in the past. At least now he calls them mistakes. He knows that I’m well versed in dismantling dark curses, wards, and so on. At the moment he claims that he’s working on undoing curses he placed on some objects he doesn’t want to destroy. It looks like he’s run into a block, and needs another perspective on the matter and asked me if I would be willing to get him information from the goblins, or point him in the right direction for his research.” Sticking his hands into his robe-pockets, Bill stopped talking, clearly waiting for his father to say something.

“Well…” Arthur was unsure. That did sound a little ominous. Maybe he didn’t have enough information to base his advice on. “Why doesn’t he turn the objects in to the Ministry? There are a few Aurors who are willing to take such things off the hands of someone wanting to get rid of them. Without filing a report and all that. Anonymous, you could say.”

But Bill was already shaking his head. “If he would do that, it would get out to the public. It certainly would, and I understand why he can’t risk that. I was even surprised that he dared to write me at all. You see, with our family's reputation, our association with Dumbledore, I would have never thought…” Another sigh producing a small cloud of mist in front of Bill’s face could be heard. It was getting rather cold out here. Arthur stuck his hands beneath his arms in a bit to keep them warm.

“If your acquaintance really wants to leave his mistakes and a bad past behind him, I think you should help him. If there is no way out of such a pit, no one will ever attempt to leave a dangerous path… so yes, if you don’t get into conflict with the law, or risk your life, I would say you should help him.” Arthur was a little proud of himself for adding those last two qualifications. He had to remember that his children were getting older, and their problems became increasingly complicated accordingly.

“And would you still say the same, when I tell you Lord Slytherin wrote me to ask for help, and that the dark objects we are speaking about are horcruxes? What then?” The sarcasm in Bill’s voice was a surprise, but considering the additional information his oldest son had just dumped on him, it seemed to be logical. Add to the problem that the former Dark Lord – Arthur wasn’t so sure about that claim – had rescued Bill and one could claim there might be somewhat of a life debt involved, it got only more complicated.

Taking the prolonged silence as a confirmation for his suspicion, Bill snorted again. “See, and the moment you hear that name, you disregard everything you just said. Mum doesn’t believe he has changed, I’m not sure, and you… I don’t know what you think about all this. You’re unusually silent on this topic.” Bill turned to look at Arthur, who turned so he could rest his right arm on the fence.
Furrowing his brow in thought, Arthur tried to formulate a response to that. He had been unusually silent, but he truly didn’t know what to think. So he shrugged. “You know that it’s complicated, with your uncles killed in the last war. All the others that we knew and who were killed. And now here he is, starting fresh where no one else could.” Again he hadn’t taken a firm stance on either side of the matter, but he hoped that Bill would be able to understand him anyway.

“So you still think everyone deserves a second chance, as long as they truly wish to change their ways, but you have trouble with granting it to someone who has done so much evil and wrong in the past?” Arthur shrugged again. He was proud that his son had managed to piece it together that well, but he still couldn’t bring himself to actually voice the idea that He-Who-Must-Not-Be-Named should get another chance. It somehow felt wrong, despite his conviction that everyone should get a chance to change their ways. It was all a really tangled mess.

“Are you able to help? And do you think his request is genuine?” Arthur cast warming charms on both of them, under the clear night sky it was getting really cold.

Bill nodded. “He asks about a way to move soul pieces from object to object without destroying either. The goblins have something like that, but they don’t teach it to non-goblins. Normally we just destroy whatever object contains a soul piece. It’s easier, and I guess it’s not worth the hassle. I have picked up bits and pieces… But giving information like that to an outsider? I never would do something like that.” Looking contemplative again, Bill turned further so that his back was to the fence. “Let’s get inside. Mum is probably frantic by now, and I’m starting to freeze.”

The rest of the evening passed with talks about Molly’s disapproval of foreign girls, her happiness over Bill’s decision to come back to England, leaving the dangers of tombs behind, and her wish that he would spend some time with Miss Tonks.

When Bill said he wanted to head back home to his flat, Arthur walked him to the edge of the wards, while Molly started to clean up the kitchen, soap bubbles flying everywhere, the dishes washing themselves.

“Don’t let her get to you about that girl of yours.” They both rolled their eyes, Molly loved to match-make, and neither of them agreed with her meddling. “And if you need to talk again about anything, I’m always willing to listen.” Arthur grabbed his son’s shoulder giving it a reassuring squeeze.

“I know, dad. And I think I’ve decided what I’ll do. If he’s willing to send me his notes, I’ll take a look and point out any obvious errors. That should help, but shouldn’t anger the goblins. I better get home and write a letter. See you, dad!”

Once Bill was outside the wards, he spun on his heel and vanished. After a moment staring at the almost full moon half vanishing behind trees and the house, Arthur took a deep breath and sighed. Why had You-Know-Who decided to take up the title of Lord Slytherin and make his return into society so blatantly obvious? Why hadn’t he decided to start over as someone else? It would have been so much easier for them all to leave the past behind, had the man just done that instead!

Looking forward to his warm and cosy bed, Arthur walked back to the house, determined to help Molly with the few things that she still had to do, before they would go to bed, maybe read for a while and then hopefully sleep peacefully.
With a glass of red wine in one hand and an artificial – but genuine-looking – smile on his face, Marvolo stood in the magically heated garden behind the Bones residence, watching as the other guests slowly arrived. The full moon and a few strategically placed torches and fairy lights made the area just light enough that everyone could see comfortably. Off to one side, in a small gazebo, some instruments were set to play soothing music that blended into the background but provided a nice distraction.

Lucius walked over to him, smiling the politically polite smile he always wore around people he had to work with. “Marvolo, how are you on this fine evening? Madame Bones has outdone herself this year, don’t you think?” the blond asked, indicating a few non-melting ice sculptures standing about as decoration. One faun near them was holding a cornucopia from which real fruit was offered to the guests.

“As this is my first visit to one of her winter parties, I wouldn’t know, would I?” Marvolo smiled a more genuine smile. Interacting with his own followers was preferable to standing alone, the possible target of matchmaking mothers. Then he chuckled. “Tell me, is Draco having a hard time with his schoolwork, or is my son the only one? Henry asked me if it was possible to attend some of the functions and parties with me, so he would get a break from writing essays and taking notes during the professors’ lectures. He complained about the massive amount of work they have to do for their OWLs. I feel by the end of the month I probably will be willing to switch places with him. A boring lecture from Binns to sleep through might be exactly what I need then.” Or, as an alternative, not quite killing Igor with curses. Socializing with those he could barely stand on such a regular basis as he would have to do in the next few weeks could easily try his patience beyond its limits.

Lucius chuckled as well, his strain carefully hidden behind his polite mask. “My son has voiced similar complaints in his last letter. I remember quite vividly how strenuous OWL year was on me. But I’m sure they will pull through. The young heiress Lestrange seems to be intent on making them all comprehensive study plans.”

They descended into polite but insignificant small talk, while Marvolo remembered what else Henry had told him last night. On Friday his son had informed him about Yaxley’s interpretation of his order to have more children and bigger families. As his son had assumed, he was not happy that the man had been about to force his gay nephew to marry a witch. Such unions traditionally only ever produced one child. So Marvolo had summoned the man through the Mark and had corrected that misunderstanding. Yesterday Henry had informed him how grateful Septimus Yaxley was about this intervention. Judging by the way Corban Yaxley – the boy’s uncle – was avoiding him tonight, the man wasn’t over the humiliation of the correction Marvolo had had to administer.

Marvolo’s musings were interrupted when Madame Bones herself came to speak with him and Lucius. With a small bow of his head, Marvolo – as the one higher in rank – greeted their host. “Madame Bones, let me congratulate you on this lovely evening. The food and drinks are wonderful, and I see that you are taking the security of the Ministry’s personnel quite seriously.” With a lazy wave of his hand, Marvolo indicated the Aurors in full uniform scattered around the crowd of witches and wizards working in the Ministry in one capacity or another. It was the least prestigious of all the winter functions, but also the one that no one could just miss. There were even Aurors patrolling the property's border. Considering that it was the night of the full moon and what had happened on the last full moon, it wasn’t an unreasonable precaution.

“Thank you, Lord Slytherin. I will relay your compliments to my elf.” She looked around the crowd in their finest robes, her eyes brushing over the well built forms of the two wizards standing in front of her, taking in their expensive robes so clearly outclassing those of the majority of those attending. It was obvious that they had done this deliberately, following an unspoken custom among the Lords and Ladies of the Wizengamot. Attending this party hosted by a Ministry Department Head – only the big and important Departments were ever eligible to host it – but making sure everyone knew they felt it beneath them.

Some, like Dowager Longbottom, would not flaunt it as obviously, but they all did it.

“Why don’t you mingle a little, Lord Slytherin. It is a good opportunity to get to know a few more people than those you are already acquainted with.” There was a dangerous twinkle in her eyes, and Marvolo was sure it was a challenge. She wanted to force him to interact with more people than his political allies – not that she knew they were still truly his followers – or his political adversaries, but with the normal wizard from next door. Maybe he should really do so. It could be a way to find a few new people who might fit in with his Death Eaters. Because of his need to be extremely careful – he couldn’t risk being discovered – he hadn’t added to his numbers anyone truly new since his return.

Before he could form a reasonable response the howl of a wolf sounded. All around him the people fell quite, the background music suddenly the loudest sound. The howl rose again just to be joined by another a few seconds later. Then a third voice joined into the chorus and panic broke loose.

Witches screamed and ran. Wizards were losing their nerve, milling about aimlessly, unsure what to do or where to go. Aurors tried to get a somewhat organized retreat going. Small tables were overturned, and glass shattered on the ground.

With his pale wand in hand, Marvolo was scanning the hedges and trees at the edge of the garden, looking for the movement of a charging werewolf.

Maybe he should have done something about Greyback before now. But there always was so much to do. Banishing all errant thoughts from his mind, Marvolo noticed several Death Eaters looking in his direction. With a few hand signs he quickly had them ordered into positions somewhat resembling an ordered assault team. Hopefully no one would pick up on the fact that some of those looking for his direction during a situation likely to escalate into a fight were Aurors. That could spell trouble in the future.

Suddenly he found himself beside Madame Bones in a position to guard her back and depend on her to do the same for him, when the first of several werewolves broke through the hedges. The fight was on.

Chapter End Notes

(1) Per aspera at astra is a latin phrase that can be found in many places. If you try to translate it as directly as possible it goes something like “through rough times to the stars” or “over rough paths to the stars”, “through adversary to the stars”, or even more rough “through the rough to the stars”. I never tried to translate latin directly into English, so maybe it isn’t truly accurate. :D but the idea is close enough.
(2) oriel: I have searched a while for a translation for what I would call “Erker” in german. Bay window was one I found, but that’s not really what I was looking for.
Because I wanted the one not reaching the ground but starting somewhere in the middle of the building. If some of you have a better word for it please tell, I’m curious how you would call it!

This is somewhat of a cliffhanger. But the chapter was long enough and I wanted to take a small break before attempting to write a genuine fighting scene. It will be a first for me! I hope you all aren’t too cross with me ^^

Thanks to Jordre and Jake for helping to improve my spelling!

Party Crasher

Tuesday, 5th of December

Fearful eyes were almost glued to one of the first terror-inducing beasts that had crawled under and through the hedges at the edge of the party. The shaggy fur was long and thick enough to keep the beast warm in the cold weather. The small eyes peered evilly about, searching for easy prey. Sharp fangs glistened with the saliva dripping from them to the frozen ground. Their growls made all hairs on her arms stand on end.

Mafalda had ducked behind a table that had been overturned. She was too afraid of encountering a werewolf were she to run towards the house along the hedges bordering the garden. They were coming through the hedges in several places. Her frantic search for a better place to hide, eyes hectically flicking left and right, didn't yield any results. So she decided to stay put, even if she wished she were somewhere else. Anywhere else! She cast longing glances to the house further down. Maybe there would be an opportunity to run to safety if she kept watching.

A yelp made her turn from the house to the tall figure standing beside Madame Bones, shielding each other's backs. A shaggy wolf lay on the ground, trying to get back on its paws, while four others parted ways to stalk around it to attack the witch and wizard fighting them. She watched as spell after spell was rapidly cast – squeaking with each splash of colour, shivering as if doused in cold water – an Incarcerus from Madame Bones entangling one wolf in strong cords, binding its front paws together so it tumbled snout-first into a pile of snow. It started to chew on the ropes, while a strong blast sent from Lord Slytherin's pale wand sent another wolf flying into two more.

There were so many wolves! She never had thought that there were so many werewolves in Britain! It was simply too much to comprehend!

Suddenly glass shards all around rose into the air, started to move forward – towards the fight just mere feet from her hiding place – and became daggers shining like silver in the unsteady light. Then the daggers were flying like Quidditch players towards the wolves, some impacting with dull sounds, others falling to the floor with clattering sounds. One wolf howled, sending a cold shiver over Mafalda's back. Why? Oh, why had she decided to be here today?

Behind her she heard the sound of running feet, high heels rapidly falling onto stone floors, urgent voices deep and high. But she didn't turn, too mesmerised by the two fighting in front of her, keeping the wolves at bay. They were casting constantly now, one spell seemingly seamlessly flowing into the next, wolves dodging and jumping to avoid the vivid fire of spells, shaking themselves, thick fur standing on end, after being hit by stunners.

And they were eerily quiet. Not a word uttered, not a single incantation used. As if they had lost their voices, only the wolves and those fleeing behind her making any sounds.

Mafalda hadn't been good at Defence, but she knew that a stunner normally would take out its target if it hit. A surprised gasp escaped her, one hand clutching her wand tightly when she saw one wolf just shaking when hit with a spell she had thought to be a stunner. How strong were those beasts?

She watched as a blond wizard in blue robes – she thought that she recognized Lord Malfoy – ran to the side of Lord Slytherin casting a spell that sent another wolf tumbling into two of its brethren.

Now with three people fighting them at this part of the hedge, it seemed as if the wolves were hesitating, changing their plan. The moment an Auror came to her hiding spot, dragging Mafalda to her feet, tugging on her arm, urgently demanding, "Follow me. Come on, you can't stay here!" she had to split her attention. Tripping over her own feet would be a problem, making her into an even easier target.

The witch watched, while being dragged to safety, as a wall of blue flames sprang up from the ground, reaching high into the starlit sky, one wolf not quick enough to avoid running into it, catching fire on the spot, falling down on the other side of the wall, rolling around with pained howls breaking from between its jaws.

Then she was inside the house, the Auror who had gotten her from the place behind the table handing her over to another, who ushered her to a loveseat where she sank to sit, her knees too weak to stand any longer.

"Werewolves are monsters! Mindless, savage monsters! With no other goal than to harm wizards! What a mess!" one witch sitting a few feet away called out, repeating herself over and over until one Auror pressed a phial into her hand, which she drank down just to calm down once she had emptied the small glass container. Mafalda thought that she would like a calming draught herself.

Shouts of incantations, the howls and snarls of the wolves, shattering glass and ice, and breaking wood were just barely to be heard underneath the frightened chatter of those cowering in the house. The stench of burning hair filled the air, mixed with the unpleasant smell of urine and vomit. Mafalda just wanted to go home. No, be home.

At last Madame Bones walked into the room, followed closely by a tired looking Lord Slytherin, both of them drenched and flushed, heated by the fight. A big stone fell from her chest. The way those two incredible fighters walked, it was clear that the danger was over. With a sigh Mafalda fainted, sinking into the witch sitting right next to her.

Amelia stuffed her handkerchief back into her robe pocket while she turned to one of the Aurors who had been responsible for security today. "It looks like the werewolves have left, Madame Bones. At least seven of them are dead. We're still checking those lying about. So far it looks like no one was infected, but there have been many injuries from broken glass and the like, so we'll need to check thoroughly..." Listening with one ear, Amelia looked over to where Lord Slytherin sat on a stool, still keeping watch over the edge of her gardens from the stool he had transfigured from some wreckage that had been lying about.

She hadn't missed how Lucius Malfoy, and others who had been let off after the war on claims of having been forced to take the Dark Mark, had looked in the man's direction, as if looking for guidance or commands. Maybe it wasn't so surprising. Whether they had taken the Mark willingly or not, they had been trained to look for him and his orders in a fight. Such structures when trained enough didn't vanish overnight. They became instinctual. As they should, if they were to be relied on in a fight. It was one thing Rufus always demanded from his new trainees. Train in teams until the command structure was second nature to them.

Nonetheless it was an interesting observation to make.

And she had noticed that he obviously had rigorous combat training. He had only used hand signs as all Aurors were taught, so information to be shared around could be made seen even if one person was silenced, or had to use incantations at the same time.

That the spells he had used all had been legal – no killing curses, or overly dark curses – wasn't something she had missed either. There wasn't much doubt by this point that he was serious about keeping to a legal appearance, at least in public situations. She still had a few doubts about his actions in a more private setting, but just knowing what he probably still did wasn't a crime. This ruling was a holdover from the time many spells, wards, potions, rituals, etc. had been declared forbidden. They couldn't condemn those that had learned about those suddenly banned things before they had become illegal. Learning them, teaching them, using them was a crime, but not simply knowing them. And as for the learning and teaching part of that, exceptions were regularly made. They needed their curse-breakers to know how to deal with old things that occasionally came up somewhere, after all.

"Get everyone who is not an Auror into the house. Place two Aurors at each main entrance, bar the rest with the emergency wards. Get Healers from St. Mungo's over here, and start taking statements. No one will leave!" Amelia gave her orders. Rufus was somewhere around too, but as the Head of the DMLE, she was the one in charge. The Auror nodded and moved to do as he had been told.

Turning to Lord Slytherin, Amelia noticed the red spots of blood that had soaked into the snow covering the ground for the first time as more than a peripheral. Maybe she should ask a Healer to look her over too. This perceiving things in snatches was a symptom of shock.

"Lord Slytherin, you should go into the house with the others." When he looked up, she was reminded of the one time she had been part of a battle where Voldemort had been present. There was an intensity in the wizard's gaze that sent a cold shiver down her spine. Luckily the knowledge of who he had been hadn't distracted her during the fight.

"Of course, Madame Bones. But please know that I'm willing to offer assistance in securing the area if there should be need." He stood gracefully, robes only a little wrinkled. As there had been no wizards on the other side of the fight, and they had managed to keep from actually coming in contact with the werewolves, they didn't look as if they had been fighting for their lives at all. It was staggering not to look as if you had just fought for your life, when you had been.

She watched for a moment as he walked away, wand still in hand, ready to react should one of the probably dead werewolves lying around get up again, before she turned to make sure the garden and surrounding area were secured, banishing her musings over the mystery of Lord Slytherin from her mind.

Sitting with a few other notable figures of the Wizengamot, Marvolo watched the Minister get his bearings back, while Healers and Aurors were milling about, tending to the wounded and taking statements from everyone. Their group hadn’t been questioned as of yet, but if they didn’t come over soon, he would seek them out. He wanted to go home, and plan his own actions in regards to those rogue werewolves following Greyback. If they came face-to-face again, he wouldn’t let the other leave again.

Suddenly the conversation between Cornelius and the new temporary Head of the Department of Magical Games and Sports – Marvolo hadn’t bothered to remember the man's name yet – came to a halt, Madame Bones stepping up to their seats arranged around a low table. "Minister, I thought you would be happy to know that the wards around the grounds weren't broken. In fact, they worked as intended. But," she held her hand up to interrupt Cornelius who clearly wanted to demand an explanation how the dangerous, dark creatures had it made onto the grounds, and kept speaking, "it looks like they came over the ward line before changing. The fact that there have been many people coming and going today to prepare the party seems to be the reason they went unnoticed when they crossed the wards to a little grove. It looks like they had help coordinating the setup. We will need to investigate further to be sure."

A few other wizards and witches had come closer while Madame Bones gave her explanation to the Minister. Now Amos Diggory – the father of the boy Pettigrew had killed at the Graveyard – leaned over the back of a lounge some of the department heads were sitting on and argued with his arms swinging in wild gestures. "With the way the legislation was changed over the last months, something like this just had to happen! Give them a little opening, just a little less rules, and they lose all restraint!" The man pointed at Marvolo, a dark look, almost a scowl on his face. "With how he has pushed for the laws to change, what could we have expected?!"

Marvolo thought that he couldn't very well let this stand as it had been said, especially because others had started to chime in on the same vein. Several voices mingled, only parts of what they said audible over the din. "They're just animals. Vicious animals!" "After that we should kill them all!" "I always knew they can't help being monsters!"

Seeing that it would be almost impossible to gain anyone's attention without shouting – and that would be undignified – Marvolo cast a reversed version of the Notice-Me-Not charm that was rather less well known than its normal version. It had been after he had read about sirens that he had started to experiment with a charm like this. He had thought it could come in useful.

It didn't take long for the eyes of those surrounding him to turn his way. "Mr. Diggory is correct in his assumption, that this is a reaction to the change in laws. But why those particular werewolves have reacted in this way, there he is quite mistaken." As soon as he had started to speak the attention of all in the immediate vicinity was on him. This spell was really handy, but he had to be careful, as the effect could be easily detected and didn't work well on those with efficient Occlumency shields. "Fenrir Greyback resents those changes. He is of the opinion that werewolves are better, stronger than humans, and that they could overrun humans if they just were of greater numbers. That is why he tries to infect children and take them away from their families. To raise them away from human culture, indoctrinate them in his philosophy. My political associates and I have been working on making it easier for werewolves to stay away from extremists such as Greyback. Of course he would react to this threat to his powerbase."

And now to add the bit that would make him look human, relatable, "I admit that I didn't anticipate the vehemence with which he would react. This attack seems to be more of a desperate act. There were so many capable witches and wizards here, I'm unsure of what he hoped to accomplish."

To make sure those surrounding him wouldn't catch on to the fact he had manipulated them a little with his spellwork, Marvolo wandlessly and silently dispelled the charm, turning his own gaze to the Minister, who naturally would be the next to speak.
But it was the Chief Warlock Abbott who spoke next. "I think we should call a meeting tomorrow, let Madame Bones, or Head Auror Scrimgeour, lay out the facts, then hear opinions on the happenings of this evening before we move on to gather ideas on how to deal with this." The old wizard stood, bringing order to his robes. "I will leave now to set everything in motion for this. I trust our Auror office and the DMLE will be more than able to handle everything else."

Blinking his eyes slowly, Harry rolled onto his back, his blankets and comforter pulling at his legs with the motion. It had to be the middle of the night, and Harry wondered why he had woken. His nightmares had gotten fewer and fewer – with a few occasional flares when he had a particularly hard session with Mrs. Goyle, which was normal, she had assured him – and he had been dreaming something pleasant he no longer remembered before waking up. Or at least he was pretty sure he had dreamed something pleasant. Harry frowned, still not really awake.

Then he heard the sound of something vibrating in the wooden drawer of his desk, and he was out of bed, standing beside the desk and opening the drawer in the blink of an eye. Who of the two was calling him in the middle of the night? Harry knew that it was the full moon and that Sirius had used that as an excuse to stay with Remus, not going to the function Marvolo had complained about.

Either of them would wait until the morning to call him if it wasn't that important. While he reached for both mirrors to see which one was vibrating, Harry wondered if he truly was afraid that something might have happened to Marvolo. It still felt somehow wrong that the man who had killed his parents, made him an orphan, had become someone so important in his life. As he did each time when his doubts arose, and the feeling that the world, his friends, would hate him if he should show or admit that Marvolo was someone important to him, Harry reminded himself of what Mrs. Goyle had said. Everyone deserved to be happy. Marvolo Slytherin was a different man than Tom Marvolo Riddle had been. Marvolo wasn't Voldemort. The differences might be minuscule in some respects, but in others they were like day and night. He shouldn't let the public, people he didn't even know, dictate how he should act concerning his happiness. No one needed to understand him but he alone. And it was totally acceptable not to understand himself at the moment. Some people never understood themselves and led happy lives nonetheless.

Harry wasn't sure he really understood. Sometimes he felt his head had finally gotten the message to not feel guilty over his growing attachment to Marvolo, but he was sure his heart would probably break in two over the strain between guilt and that new feeling of family.

Holding both mirrors, Harry felt that the newer mirror was vibrating. Marvolo was calling. ..Yes?.. he hissed in Parseltongue, accepting the call, while depositing the other mirror back into the drawer with appropriate care.

..Henry, I'm sorry I woke you.. Marvolo started, the hangings behind him indicating he was sitting on a small settee in his bedroom at Griffin House. ..I wanted to make sure you heard what happened from me, and not the rumour mill that will make it into a horror story before the day is out:.

Frowning at the tired look on the other man's face, and the absent minded way he stroked the back of Nagini's head where she was hanging over his shoulder, Harry wasn't really sure he wanted to know ..What happened? Are you okay?..

..I didn't come to any harm. But I'm tired. When we finally were allowed to leave, it was already quite late. As for what happened, Fenrir tried to take revenge, at least I think he did.
I can't really fathom what his plans might have been:. Red eyes slowly blinked, underlining the claim that Marvolo was tired.

.:So he used the full moon to attack the Ministry party at the Bones Residence?:. There wasn't any other possibility. Marvolo had explained the purpose behind this particular party and had spent the most time on being cross over the fact that he couldn't skip this particular event. When he had heard that Sirius would opt out under the pretext of caring for a friend, he had expressed something akin to envy over the fact the other man had such a ready excuse at hand.

.:Exactly. They came through the hedges well into the party. I must say that cursing the Defence position at Hogwarts had the effect I had hoped for back when I placed it. There are frighteningly few wizards and witches capable of defending themselves, or even thinking when under attack, or really only the threat of attack. You're sure the current professor isn't one worth keeping?:. Nagini hissed lazily, flicking her tongue out, clearly searching the warmth of her human.

.:Not if you want people able to defend themselves. He is a pacifist. He makes us practice de-escalation, role playing different scenarios over and over:. Harry rolled his eyes, slowly walking back to his bed, sitting down on its edge. .:But if you're asking if you should remove the curse on the position, yes, you should:. Harry had thought quite a while about this. Whether he should ask for Marvolo to remove the curse or not. He had no single good experience with demanding something from an adult, in whatever way. The Dursleys had always made sure he didn't get things he asked for, and then he had simply stopped, preferring to take care of things himself. Mrs. Goyle claimed the job of a parent was to listen for what their children asked for and give them help when necessary, even help their children pursue their interests. As he hadn't much experience with adults and children, and their interactions with each other, Harry could only call on what he had watched between his aunt, uncle, and Dudley, as well as the interactions in the Weasley family. The way Dudley had always gotten what he asked for probably wasn't the right way to go about things as parents, but considering what they had done to Harry… well, Mrs. Goyle had said that they certainly didn't know right from wrong, and had been treating Harry wrong the entire time. And the Weasleys certainly did listen to their children. Not that they were able to give them what they all wanted, or that Mrs. Weasley didn't have a firm idea of what her sons should be doing with their lives – she certainly didn't approve of the curse-breaking Bill was doing – but they at least always listened.

Harry was startled out of his thoughts by the clearing of a throat. .:If you want to watch me undo it, I will do it during break?:. The hissing sounded like a question. At first Harry was stunned that Marvolo actually agreed to undo the curse, then he was suspicious about the man's motives. Why would he want Harry to be there for it?

.:It's not Dark Magic, if that is what you're fearing. In fact, I'm pretty sure it's fairly standard fare for any curse-breaker. So no need to look so cross:. Marvolo chided with one raised brow.

Harry ducked his head. He still had trouble controlling his facial expressions. And he knew he had to get that under control. It was another of those topics on which the portrait of his grandfather and Marvolo agreed. Grandfather Charlus had explained that a politician wearing his feelings openly for all to see was much too easy to manipulate and take advantage of. Not a position Harry would want to be in. So he probably would have to learn this cold mask thing all the adults mixed in politics around him were doing.

So that he wouldn't have to decide if he wanted to watch or not, Harry changed the subject. .:This will harm the changes you are pushing for regarding the laws about werewolves, won't it? They will use the attack to gather people behind them with fear as a motivator.:

Marvolo nodded, something gleaming in his red eyes that Harry had trouble identifying.: They most certainly will try. But I'm confident that we will be able to keep them from gaining much. With your godfather and several other supporters, we still hold the majority in the Wizengamot on this matter. I certainly hope to spin it in a way that will paint Fenrir as the bad guy here, and his attacks as a desperate attempt to drive a wedge between law-abiding wizards and witches infected with lycanthropy and our community.:

Harry nodded, rubbing his eyes tiredly with his free hand. It was probably already terribly early. ..I need to go to sleep if I hope to make it through classes tomorrow without dozing off.:

..:Just be ready for the horrible, sensationalist article the Daily Prophet most likely will print. And know that there will be an emergency Wizengamot meeting tomorrow. I will call again when I'm back home. Sleep well, son.: Marvolo nodded, Nagini hissed a farewell, and the mirror went blank. Without much pause, Harry placed the now blank mirror on his bedside table, before he slid between his sheets again, settling in comfortably to get some more sleep before he needed to get up and go to breakfast in the Great Hall.

Wednesday, 6th of December

The next morning Harry was rather subdued on his way to breakfast, causing a few of his Slytherin friends to furrow their brows. But Harry didn't really notice. Deep in thought, he waited for this morning's edition of the Daily Prophet. After what Marvolo had told him last night, Harry wanted to know what approach the newspaper known for scandalizing everything was going to take on the attack.

"Harry, are you well?" Theo asked as they sat down at the Slytherin table and Harry ignored the perfectly fine roasted mushrooms in front of him.

Harry turned to his friend and gave a small frown. Smiling wasn't possible with all the worry occupying his thoughts. "I'm well, but I haven't slept much, and I fear there will be bad news in the paper." He rubbed over his eyes, as he really hadn't slept that well after he had been woken by Marvolo's mirror call.

"Bad news?" Draco asked, filling his plate with various pieces of fruit – apples and pears, mostly – before getting a piece of toast as well as some scrambled eggs. It clearly was an attempt to get him to explain more. And Harry assumed he could. Most of his Slytherin classmates had a subscription to the newspaper anyway, so they would get a copy in a few minutes and would read the sensational version.

So Harry decided it was pointless to keep it a secret, and most likely beneficial if he got his version out first. "Fenrir Greyback attacked the party at the Bones residence last night. Father called me on the mirror to inform me. As far as I know, there was no one injured by the werewolves. But judging by the way the Prophet tends to interpret stories to their liking, I expect that the news will sound much worse coming from them."

Harry watched as his friends blanched. And why shouldn't they? Their fathers had been there too. "He said that the werewolves didn't injure anyone. And I'm sure if someone's family had been sent to the hospital, or needed a Healer, their children would have been informed." He tried to give them all a reassuring smile, but guessed it came out as more of a grimace.

They all looked up to the windows when the rustling of feathers heralded the arrival of the owls carrying the morning post. With apprehension Harry took the rolled up newspaper from the owl landing before him, before he gave a piece of bacon to Hedwig, who had come as well to greet her master. He was one of the last to open the tie, flinging the roll open so he could see the headline, but the change in tone and rise in volume of the chatter in the Great Hall already told him what he would see. The blazing headline of Werewolves savagely attack over a picture of red-stained snow and broken glass was enough of a hint at the horrible article everyone was reading at the moment.

With a sigh – he really didn't like the tendency to make everything sound worse to sell more papers – Harry started to read the drivel written by none other than Rita Skeeter. He needed to know what everyone else would have read about the attack, so he could try to counter the rumours. This was going to be a hard day.

The same newspaper found its way onto the breakfast table at Grimmauld Place, where Sirius was sipping his coffee and ignored the paper to reach for an envelope of heavy parchment with the official seal of the Wizengamot on it. Remus, who was sitting on the other side of the table, was still too tired to care what the newspaper said, and was listlessly eating his porridge, prepared by Kreacher, who was hovering in the background, ready to get anything his master would want to have.

Setting down his mug of heavenly coffee, Sirius broke the seal and got the letter out. When he saw the first few lines of the letter he muttered "Emergency meeting?" his brows climbing up his forehead. Why would they call an emergency meeting when there had been a party they all had to attend just the evening before? But further down the parchment the reason was made clear with blunt words.

"Remus," Sirius got his best friend's attention, "I think you should know that the scumbag Greyback attacked the Ministry party yesterday evening. I'll have to go to a Wizengamot meeting today. It sounds like there are some that want to tighten the laws again, maybe even put something like martial law into place to hunt down werewolves..." Sirius trailed off and frowned even deeper. That wasn't something he could allow, for Greyback to ruin everything for all those that had done nothing wrong, working hard to keep others safe from them every month. That was just unacceptable.

"You stay here, rest. I'll keep you informed, but now I need to take a shower." Remus nodded, catching one edge of the newspaper and dragging it over to him, so he could read what was written there. If Sirius didn't know that this was pretty standard, even with the wolfsbane potion, he would have been concerned with Remus' looking as if he hadn't slept in days. But it was normal, and Remus now only needed time to rest, sleep, and eat, nothing that Sirius could help with.

Sure his friend was safe here, Sirius – still in his pyjamas and a dressing gown – sprinted up to his room to take a shower, get into the right robes, and be ready for the meeting in time. His vote and voice were needed to keep the worst from happening.

At his friend's side, Marvolo walked into the chamber and into pandemonium. At least compared to the way everyone behaved on normal days, this was quite different. Everyone was on their feet, at least two screaming matches taking place between members of the Wizengamot, several Aurors were present, trying to keep the peace. The Minister stood with Madame Bones and Lord Abbott near the entrance, obviously discussing something urgently.

"That looks like fun," Xerxes murmured, the sarcasm thick enough to walk on.

"They look like headless chickens running around without a sense of direction," Marvolo murmured back, his glamoured eyes sweeping the crowd to tally how the blocs probably would line up. All of his were already here, so there was a solid number of votes on his side. Dowager Longbottom was sitting on the stool in front of the Potter seat, talking with Sirius Black, so that was another three votes most likely in his favour. It still was somewhat odd to know that those two would vote with him on some topics. Not all – Black just was too stubborn for his own good – but regarding werewolf laws they did.

Lucius walked over to them, pale blue robes trailing behind him, he nodded to them both, as they were not only older but of higher status, and then turned so he could look over to the mass of people in fine robes emitting anxious energy. "Lord Slytherin, Lord Lestrange," he nodded, getting polite nods in return. "My wife sends her greetings. There isn't much time before the session will start, but several of the Department Heads seem to agree with Diggory – he is here for the Department for the Regulation and Control of Magical Creatures, the Beast Division – that the attack was a reaction to the lowered strictness in the laws regarding werewolves. I heard that there have been many howlers already to the division in reaction to the article in the Prophet this morning."

Marvolo listened while watching the interaction of everyone present. What Lucius had to tell was nothing less than he had expected. Those opposed to granting rights to werewolves would try to use this backlash in their favour, to manipulate those reliant on the broader public for one thing or the other to vote along their lines. Even with Umbridge gone from the picture, they would have their work cut out for them.

A deep resounding gong called them all to attention, and they parted ways to walk to their respective seats. It was only a short distance to the Slytherin seat, and after casting a cushioning charm – it looked to be a long session – Marvolo sat down, waiting patiently for all the others to settle down.

Once everyone was seated the Chief Warlock stood, banged his gavel on the flat stone placed before him for exactly this purpose, and called, "This emergency session of the Wizengamot on the 6th of December 1995 shall begin now. You all were called here to discuss the happenings of yesterday evening. Madame Bones shall give us all a report on the information known to us at the moment." With a gracious nod of his head, the old man gave the floor to Madame Bones, who looked paler than usual even in her plum-coloured robes.

"Thank you, Chief Warlock. Yesterday on the night of the full moon, several werewolves attacked the party held at the Bones residence. They were acting with forethought, sneaking onto the grounds, outside the gardens used for the party, before nightfall and moonrise. A total number of five werewolves were killed. Two were captured, and are currently being interrogated. The number of attackers is undetermined as the testimony was contradictory. A total of twenty guests were injured, but mostly by wild spells and broken glass. No one was infected with lycanthropy." Her voice was clinical, stating the facts, not embellishing anything and making sure that the fact the party had been at her house didn't influence her report.

Marvolo nodded in approval. Her professionalism was something he greatly admired. But he feared that these facts would do little to appease the panicking public, or the fear-mongers eager to gain influence through any means.
Diggory spoke next, obviously eager to get the permission to speak, he almost jumped to his feet and repeated what he already had said the evening before. "I ask you all, what changed? There hasn't been this big an attack in years, if not longer! But now they act! Now they attack! What other reason could there be than the much more relaxed laws? We from the Beast Division call for a hunt on all werewolves! Let's catch them all, eliminate the problem at its roots!" Marvolo was sure Diggory would have rambled on and on, his arms underlining his points with strong gestures, if the Chief Warlock hadn't called a halt to the man's words. Giving the floor to another.

"Lord Black, you may speak." Nods were exchanged, and Black stood, his robes tailored more along the lines of a duelling robe than the wider, more flowing robes traditionally worn to sessions in the Wizengamot. He probably was aiming for intimidation, and to remind everyone that he once had been an Auror, had fighting experience. Not the most idiotic choice to make as a young member for a violence-related emergency session.

"My Lords and Ladies, you are aware that this argument is purely happenstance?" the air quotes around the word "argument" were almost visible, but Marvolo wasn't convinced that it was the best idea to be so clearly condescending towards the other members, they likely would react in opposition to everything if they felt mocked. "This attack could have been planned for years, months. At the moment we don't know their reasoning. It would be hasty to take action against all wizards and witches infected with lycanthropy, because a few have attacked a party, failing to infect anyone."

The words that followed were more of the same. From what he had heard about the oldest son of the main Black family, Marvolo never would have guessed that he would be the voice of reason in such a setting. But here he was, valiantly arguing to wait for more information, for the interrogation to end, before taking action. Because once they started to prosecute all werewolves regardless of their involvement in anything illegal, there was no way back.

It didn't take long for arguments to start to repeat themselves. Those falling in line with Diggory's extreme view, called for extermination, or at least imprisonment of werewolves, because it was so obvious that they were dangerous, needed to be kept cowed, or better yet, removed. Those standing with Marvolo and Black on this, argued that they should hunt those down that had actually committed the attack. "Let's gather memory copies of those that had been at the party, get pictures of those wolves. Determine how many were male, how many female, if there are any identifying features. There is more evidence to be had, why should we ignore that?" Dowager Longbottom made a good point, but there were many Lords and Ladies reluctant to agree to a gathering of memories.

Were they afraid of being outed as one of those running, hiding behind tables? Most of them probably were, there hadn't been that many participants in the fights that hadn't been Aurors. Either way, her suggestion was shot down, and as there was no way to force someone to provide a memory copy for testimony – it was actually explicitly excluded as a form of evidence that could be demanded in the laws – they quickly moved on.

Marvolo watched and contemplated. He could maybe sway the whole situation in his favour, if he testified about his knowledge of Fenrir and his goals. After all, he had once known him well. But admitting that he still remembered so much before this big an audience was a risk, if he didn't get everything right. But if he managed… in the end the decision was made for him when they neared a vote over the generalized hunt for werewolves and it looked like the number of members going to vote for this hunt was greater than the number of those opposed to this nonsense.

He held his hand, wand lighted with a silent lumos, high in the air requesting his turn to address the Wizengamot. A moment later the Chief Warlock called out. "Lord Slytherin, you may speak."
Hesitating a little – he needed to portray reluctance – Marvolo stood, noxing the light on his wand as silently as he had cast the lumos. "Thank you, Chief Warlock." He turned so he could speak more directly to Madame Bones and the Minister, as if he were trying to blank out the bigger audience listening to his every word. "I feel that I have important information to add to this discussion before we come to a decision and vote." He took a deep breath as if to steady himself before he continued with what he wanted to say. "I remember more of the past which I wish to leave behind me, than I would like. Part of those memories are the motivations and plans of one Fenrir Greyback." A wave of murmurs went through the hall, Lords and Ladies turning to those sitting close to them, but Marvolo ignored them all. He needed to be convincing, needed to play his part well.

Another deep breath before he continued, giving the others time to calm down. "He wants to establish a werewolf society, overthrowing us magicals. He sees us as weak, werewolves as superior." That brought quite a few outraged shouts, which he also ignored. "He uses the fact that someone infected can't be a part of our society to gather them, bind them to him, make them loyal. Our changes to the harsh laws, giving hope to those wishing to lead law-abiding lives, are a threat to his plans. They diminish the grounds he builds on. Of course he would take action to counter our efforts!" That last Marvolo almost shouted, straightening his spine to appear sure of this, of himself.

"The Aurors and guests have managed to beat the attack back, and until the next full moon there is time to catch those responsible for this attack. I agree that we must take action, but we must hunt those that are a threat. Concentrate our efforts on the true danger, Fenrir Greyback! Not let ourselves be distracted by the easier-to-catch, but comparatively harmless targets, those werewolves living as normal a life as they can manage. Let's hunt for Greyback, he is the real problem here."

A few people really applauded after this passionate speech. More passionate than Marvolo had intended when he had started. But maybe he had swayed enough votes in favour of his suggestion to make sure the Ministry would not come knocking at every known and suspected peaceful werewolf in Britain.

Another hour later the Chief Warlock finally called for a vote. "Raise your wands when the action you want to see enacted is called out." The assistants readied their quills to take note of the way the Wizengamot would vote. "Who wants to see the proposal of the Department for the Regulation and Control of Magical Creatures, Beast Division, to round up all werewolves to deport, imprison, or put them down, enacted?"

Forcing himself not to look around, Marvolo waited, and was relieved to see that fewer people had voted for this proposal than he had feared, when the assistant cast a golden number into the air above his head.

Next Lord Abbott called out for those wanting to see Marvolo's own proposal to hunt for Fenrir and his pack – relying on his memories of likely hunting grounds and hiding places – which got more votes than the proposal made by Diggory. Marvolo felt better instantly, but managed to keep his relief from his face. They had managed to contain the damage intended by Greyback.

That there were ten Lords and Ladies, who wanted to wait for more information before committing to a course of action, and no abstains, wasn't really important after that. Madame Bones came over to him the moment the session had been dismissed by the Chief Warlock. "Do you have any prior engagements hindering you from accompanying me to the Auror Headquarters right this minute, Lord Slytherin?" The woman spoke with clear determination, making an impressive figure even after this long day, sitting about, listening to old men bickering.
"I have nowhere to be right this moment. Lead the way, Madame Bones." With a shallow bow from his hip, Marvolo gestured with a sweep of his arm for her to precede him, implying that he would follow right behind her. If he gave the Aurors all the information he had, and that his Death Eaters had gathered in the last weeks since the first attack, they might be able to track them down quickly.

Albus walked at a leisurely pace down from his office and quarters late on Wednesday afternoon. He rather would be at the Wizengamot meeting Elphias had sent him an owl about. But as he was no longer the Potter Regent or the Chief Warlock, he wasn't invited to attend. Maybe it would be enough when his old friend came over after the meeting to give him an accounting. It was highly likely that they would vote for the werewolves to be more strongly persecuted again after all the havoc Greyback had wrought. It would enable him to appear as a benevolent and helpful advocate of their rights if the vote went as he expected. Intervening on the behalf of those who might be useful to him would sway them in his favour. Just as the Lupin family had been in his debt for the admittance of their son to the school. It was handy to have people grateful to you.

Not being able to be at the Wizengamot meeting gave him the opportunity to meet with his brother, though. And with Hagrid. He had thought long about it, and had come to the conclusion those two might be the best for a budding plan he was working on. It was obvious that Tom was slowly working on that poor boy, Harry, to turn him around and away from his true friends and the right values.

They just had to get him away from that man.

His walk down from the school to the village and through it to his brother's pub was an uneventful one. The weather wasn't particularly nice, but rather dark and dreary with a persistent drizzle of almost frozen rain falling down on Albus' bright orange robes. He preferred bright robes during the bleak months of winter.

When he stepped into the Hog's Head – Aberforth really should clean the windows, there was barely any light coming through – Hagrid was already there, sitting at a table in a corner, a big tankard in front of him.

Albus sauntered over, smiling genially. "Hagrid! How nice that you are already here."

"Headmaster," the half-giant greeted back, a broad smile making his thick beard twitch, "Aberforth said to go up to the private room at the back of the hall to the left. He'll be there shortly, y'see?"

"So lead the way then, my friend. I will follow behind you." With a hand Albus indicated that Hagrid should go up the stairs first, and the big groundskeeper did so, carrying his tankard in one hand, dwarfing it.

They sat down in the room Aberforth had assigned to them, making idle conversation about the goings on in the Forbidden Forest until the door opened to admit a disgruntled-looking wizard with his sleeves pushed up his arms, his grey beard not as neatly trimmed as Albus kept his.

"What do you want to talk about, Albus? And make it quick, I have guests down in the Inn, and I do have to work for my income. So get on with it!" With a huff he sat down in a chair near the door, impatiently looking at his older brother, and Hagrid sitting on a big cushion on the floor.

"I have asked you here because I need your help with something important for the good of our world," Albus started with a carefully conspiratorial voice. He needed to convince Hagrid and at
The same time keep his brother from leaving in a huff because he was acting too overtly suspicious. "You both know that Lord Slytherin is a most dangerous wizard, and certainly up to no good. He never had any interest in bettering our society, only his own gain on his mind. As long as he has young Harry in his grasp, though, we won't be able to oust him from his wrongfully captured seat and position. So I propose that we prevent Harry from returning to the deceiving Tom at the start of the holidays." Albus aimed for an important face to go with this – in his eyes – valuable plan, but had trouble maintaining the expression when his gaze fell on his small audience.

Hagrid looked like he had seen a Grimm, clearly shocked, and Aberforth even was shaking his head at his older brother. "Albus, clearly you can't think that would work! What do you intend to do? Put the lad under the Imperius curse? Dose him with recreational potions to make him dependent on you providing them? And how will you keep the Aurors off your trail? You can't assume the lad's adoptive father would let his disappearance just go?"

With great effort Albus managed to keep an interested mask up in the face of his brother's accusations. He always had had a penchant for nitpicking plans, pointing out possible flaws without pausing to search for possible solutions to the problems he was exaggerating in the first place.

With great patience Albus started to explain his solutions to these seemingly existing issues. "I will of course make sure that Tom thinks Harry is on an extended visit with friends, or maybe his muggle relatives. And with your help, Hagrid," he turned to the groundskeeper, "I'm sure we can get Harry to leave his friends alone, to visit with you to be shown something of interest in the Forbidden Forest just before the train leaves for London."

Hagrid had placed the tankard – now empty – on the only table in the room, now wringing his hands nervously. "You certainly can't want me to betray his trust, Headmaster! Harry and I are friends! True, he didn't have much time this year, but it's his OWL year, that's a really busy one for the students! No, sir, please, I can't do that." Tears were rolling down from the normally smiling eyes into the thick brush of Hagrid's beard.

Before Albus could come up with a response to that, Aberforth interrupted him again, anger glinting in his blue eyes. "Are you finally going barmy, Albus? You can't seriously claim that's a good plan!" He shook his head again, clearly exasperated. "I will have no part in this harebrained scheme of yours! You hear me? And now leave, Albus. And don't darken my doorstep anytime soon." Then he turned towards the still confused Hagrid, and addressed him gruffly. "You are always welcome here. And don't get involved in that disaster of a plan if you can help it. Nothing good will come of it!" Without waiting for an answer or permission to leave from his older brother, Aberforth left the room, leaving the door open, clearly wanting them to leave.

Hagrid left quickly, mumbling something about needing to feed the thestrals in the forest, and wanting to search for more unicorn tail hairs, before making a beeline to the door, trying and failing to look small.

Albus was unhappy with the way things had gone. He had rather hoped that those two would know what a danger Tom still was and that removing Harry from the man was the best way to shift the odds in their favour. If he didn't manage something very soon, it might become necessary to kill the boy himself after all. With the horcrux most likely lodged in the boy, there was no way around that. His vague hope that Tom's doing the deed himself might keep the boy safe wasn't worth sacrificing all hope for.

A much gloomier Headmaster returned to his office, walking to stand next to the window Fawkes was sitting next to. Why had Tom chosen such an unlikely path? And how did it happen that he had been unable to see this possible path? At dinner that evening the seat at the middle of the teacher's table stayed empty, to the curious glances between the professors.

oooOOooo

Close to nightfall, the no-longer-full moon hidden behind the rain-bearing clouds, a few people woke on the floor of an abandoned hunting cabin. They were naked, their bodies covered in scars, hair and beards long and unkempt. One after the other they staggered over to a heap of old and badly mended clothes, picking through them all to find their trousers, shirts, socks, and shoes.

The biggest man among them, with teeth filed to a point, long, yellow-tinted fingernails, and grey matted hair, appeared to be unhappy with something, a snarl on his face, as he was dressing himself for warmth. Fenrir was as unhappy as he looked. When he had first woken after the last night and the transformation, he had counted his pack. They were several wolves short. That could only mean one thing: they had lost members of their pack, more than he had planned for, in the attack they had started on that forsaken party.

"Jeb!" he growled, yanking a sweater riddled with holes over his head. "Why didn't you know that there would be so many Aurors? It was your job to get us all the information we needed! You failed, Jeb, you failed!"

The other man looked frightened enough, looking around their normal place to change during the colder nights of the year. When not in their wolf forms, they needed clothes, and leaving them somewhere outside could get them wet, or even missing, so they always searched out an old house, shack, or similar, to leave the loathed but needed objects of human culture within.

"Get me a newspaper! One from today! Now!" he roared the last as Jeb still hesitated. While the young boy – Fenrir had taken him when he had been nine – scrambled from the cabin to do as he was commanded, Fenrir strode purposefully out of the room where the others still sorted out who would be wearing what. Maybe the fact that he hadn't been able to get his teeth into at least one wizard or witch wasn't as big a problem as he feared. True, he had wanted to infect a few Ministry people, but the first goal had been to make them fear wolves again, so they would stop making them a part of their weak way of life. That was the most important part. No wolf should be able to choose something other than living with his pack, strengthening his army to overthrow the weak humans. They only had the upper hand because there were so many of them, but he would change that.

Oh yes, he would.

He paced, as always full of energy after a full moon, until Jeb came back, bringing with him a torn and muddy edition of the Daily Prophet. After Fenrir had slowly worked his way through the article on the front page, he was grinning, showing his teeth. It looked like his most important goal would be met. They were feared again.

oooOOooo

Corban Yaxley was feeling much better today. Getting tortured by the Dark Lord – the man still was the Dark Lord even when Corban was sure something wasn't right with him – hadn't been the problem. What had made Corban doubt his Lord – or rather the man's methods – was the way he had been lecturing over the Yaxley family's history. Parading all the Squibs born into the family out for Corban to see, the poor performance at school, the trouble with casting magic often exhibited by members of the family. And the Dark Lord had claimed those were the results of inbreeding. What a lot of hogwash. Every sensible pureblood knew that mudbloods were stealing the magic from respectable families, robbing them of their rightful might, their potential, to claim... what wasn't theirs, causing Squibs in the first place.

Those ridiculous claims that the shameful Squibs cast out were the reason that mudbloods were born at all, had only been another proof that that snivelling idiot of a wizard Pettigrew had botched the resurrection ritual. But Corban knew he had it in him to set everything to rights. Help the Dark Lord become what he was meant to be once again.

In his best casual robes he walked into the private room in one of the clubs down Knockturn Alley that was frequented by those without the money to buy themselves positions in the Ministry. But here one could find the wizards, young and old, who held true to the old traditions despite their lack of wealth, which made it easy for the likes of Malfoy or Nott to gain positions of power and buy themselves free of the silly punishments the Ministry enforced for even more useless laws to protect muggles.

When he stepped through a curtain, everyone fell silent. There they were, the young men he hoped to recruit to his cause, his mission to get their Dark Lord back the way he used to be. Their champion to get back into the ruling position in this world. Where they all belonged.

"Good evening, my young gentlemen," he said to them with a little evil smirk.

A young wizard – maybe in his early twenties – with red hair turned in his seat, gave Corban an assessing look, and then narrowed his eyes. "What do you want here?" If Corban wasn't mistaken, this was one of the Carrow family. Maybe a nephew of the twins? The sneer on the boy's face looked remarkably like the one Alecto often wore.

"Father! This is just a nice evening between friends." Of course his son was here. That was the reason he knew of this meeting in the first place. There was worry in his boy's eyes, and the way they were talking in here just moments ago, it was understandable that they were worried.

"I know, son. And I share your concerns. So no need to worry. The laws prohibiting the hunt on muggles are a disgrace. But just trying to change them now will hardly work." With a few more steps Corban was close to an empty seat near the middle of the small dirty room, which he took, placing himself in the centre of these young men, disillusioned with the life they were forced to live due to the Ministry's errors and banishing of old, valued traditions. "The Dark Lord is intent on raising the number of wizards and witches, where it has been reduced by a war and the Ministry's shunning of tradition." The way the Dark Lord was going about this wasn't the best – of that Corban was sure – but the idea was right. They were too few to really take on another war. "I speak of the tradition of mistresses. Kept women. It was the norm for the Head of the household, for every adult wizard with the means to keep them, to have a kept woman, to work in the house and to have more children. A half-blood or a mudblood, or muggle, if she was pretty. I'm here to get your help in starting this tradition anew." And just with these few words he had the attention of everyone.

He started to explain his plan – or rather the parts this youngsters needed to know – to them, outlining the actions they were to take in the next weeks. They would need safe places to keep the women. They would need to find them, healthy, good-looking women that at best wouldn't be missed. And if they managed to be careful enough, they soon would have a lot of magical children they could raise with the right values.

"Of course, those half-bloods will not be part of the families. But the sons will be passable soldiers, and the daughters will give birth to another generation of magical children. And just another generation later, there will be children worthy to be included in the pure families we want to preserve." It was a long game, but it was what the Dark Lord truly wanted. More magical children. And no need to let men have children together, or to include mudbloods raised with muggle values.
in their society.

I hope the fight managed to be good. Fyreheart pointed out that with that many Aurors in attendance, it shouldn't be too difficult to beat the werewolves back, and I agree. So something to consider if you think it was too short ;)

I feel I should clarify that I do not agree with any of the misogynistic and racist statements of Corban Yaxley in this last scene. He is an all-around bigot only out to increase his own feeling of importance and power through pushing others down. But I hope that was evident enough with what I wrote ;)

Thanks to Jordre and Jake for helping to improve my spelling!

After lessons had been over for the day, Harry had fetched his drawing supplies from his room down in the dungeons and walked out onto the grounds. It had taken some time, but finally he had found a spot from which he had a really nice view of Hogwarts and the lake. Now he was drawing a rough sketch as a base to create a painting of the castle. Harry had thought long and hard on what to get his guardian for Christmas and the man’s birthday. He had decided to find some interesting book for Christmas – he was debating if The Art of War by Sun Tzu, or The Prince by Machiavelli would be the more fitting – as he didn’t really know if Marvolo did celebrate that holiday. For the man’s birthday, the much more important occasion to give a gift in Harry’s eyes, he wanted to give him a painting of Hogwarts he had made himself. His impression from the few times Dudley had given something to his parents had been that parents always were happy to get something their children had made with their own hands. As he really had limited experience, and the painting of a big pile of snakes had been a success, he had decided to repeat that on a larger scale.

Erasing one of the towers for a third time – it had looked somewhat wrong each time he had drawn it – Harry looked up to see someone walking towards him, holding a wand lighted with a lumos in front of them. Concentration shifting back to a fourth attempt to get that pesky tower to look right, Harry ignored the figure getting closer and closer, for the moment. Since his move to the Slytherin dungeons, he had felt a lot safer than before.

He had just started to erase his fourth attempt as well, when the person stopped next to him, slightly panting. “Harry, here you are! It wasn’t easy finding you!” Hermione said, out of breath, tucking her hat down over her bushy hair, fumbling because her hands were safely encased in knitted mittens.

“How that you’ve found me, what can I do for you, Hermione?” Harry asked, squinting up at the castle. Maybe he had the perspective wrong?

Harry heard a huff from his side but continued to study the castle in front of him. There had to be a way to draw that tower and make it look good.

“I wanted to see if you would be willing to study with me. I’m really interested in comparing your way of writing the potions instructions to those that are in our books. I’m having trouble to understand what’s in them that helps you to brew better. I never had trouble with the way our books present the instructions.” She sounded irritated, probably because Harry seemed as if he wasn’t paying her any attention.
“I can lend you some of my notes, so you can compare and come up with some questions you want me to answer. At the moment, I have to finish this sketch. There isn’t much time until the holidays, after all, and I need to get this finished in time.” Maybe getting more of the area surrounding the difficult tower finished would help with getting it to look right?

“I suppose that could work.” Now his friend sounded reluctant. “But it really would be easier to get down to the helpful differences if you were there from the start, Harry.”

A little annoyed, Harry turned to face Hermione. “I guess it could be quicker, but you can get to the bottom of this mystery after the holidays, or even after exams. You said so yourself, you have no trouble with the way the receipts are written in the textbook. But I have to have this finished before we leave the school for the holidays, so this here is of higher priority.” He shrugged seeing the war behind Hermione’s brown eyes. He knew well enough that there wasn’t anything much more important than studying and knowledge to Hermione, but her tendency to create plans and schedules to organize everything had given her a sense for prioritising things based on the date something needed to be finished.

“I guess you’re right. May I borrow your notes?” She didn’t sound really happy with this solution, but Harry was happy that she had accepted his reasoning.

“I’ll bring them up with me to dinner, if that works for you?” Harry asked, turning his attention for a moment in her direction.

She shrugged, rubbing her hands together. “I guess that’ll work. You coming back with me? It’s really cold out here!” Harry looked at his sketch and then at the castle. There was still that tower to draw, and a few bigger, important parts to mark, before he was truly finished with his work for today. But it was really cold and his feet were starting to feel the cold, too. His right hand, without gloves so he could draw at all, was cold as ice as well. But he wanted to finish this.

“I guess I’ll finish up here, with the Defence Club meeting tomorrow, there will be no time to finish up tomorrow, and the weekend is filled with study time and homework.” Here Harry gave his studious friend a pointed look, maybe making her blush. But as the cold had flushed her face a bright red already, it was hard to tell.

“See you at dinner then,” Hermione said, turned on her heel, and walked up the path she had come down, meeting with two tall figures making their way over to Harry.

It seemed he wouldn’t get as much quiet as he had hoped for.

Fred and George stopped right next to Harry, looking over his shoulder to see what he was doing. “Not bad!” was the comment from the twin on the right, while the one on the left nodded with a thoughtful look on his face. “Yeah, it’s clear what you have drawn there. Percy never managed to get his pictures of Penelope looking remotely like a human. That’s probably why he had them stashed away in the bottom drawer of his desk at home.”

Harry laughed at that picture. Poor Percy, chasing his two brothers, trying to get back his pictures, mortified that Penelope would see them and be affronted. It wasn’t nice of the twins to tease their brother with his lack of practice or talent – or both – but it was hard to be mad at them for long. And it was clear they never had done something like posting the pictures on the board in the common room, if they had, this wouldn’t be the first time Harry had heard about it.

production. We have tested them, and worked out the last kinks. You, as our silent investor and Gryffindor inside of Slytherin, are the best to get them to the snakes so we can get a good picture of what they like and would buy. Would you do that, Harry?"

Harry gave them a raised eyebrow, they needed to be more specific before he would agree to anything. He still could remember vividly the picture of Dudley choking on his own tongue. No, agreeing to something the twins had thought out but were reluctant to explain was maybe as dumb as agreeing to a trade with a Slytherin without sorting out the terms beforehand.

“We want you to offer those products to the Slytherins for the prices marked on the outside of the packaging, and get them to answer the questions we have on the parchments in there somewhere. Give us the money and the filled in questionnaires afterwards, and we’ll be happy.” They gave him matching grins and wiggled their eyebrows, holding out the satchels to him.

So this was something like marketing research the twins were doing here. They had said as much at the beginning of term, that they planned to use this last year at Hogwarts to get a clear picture of what the normal Hogwarts student wanted from their joke products. It was only logical that the Slytherins were harder to approach than the other three Houses for two Gryffindors. Harry guessed it wasn’t a horribly terrible idea to offer the other Slytherins the opportunity to look at the merchandise. “If you accept accountability for all eventual trouble – bad reactions to some ingredients or the like – then I’m in. Help carry the stuff back to the castle?” Harry stuffed the pencil he had been using in one of his pockets, got out the glove for his right hand to slip it on, and closed his sketchbook, before he turned back towards the castle.

On the way back he asked the twins a lot of questions about their products and what they were planning to work on next. They had a lot of great ideas for future products and were already planning on how best to structure their shop, as well as how to disguise their products for owl order into Hogwarts. They expected to be on the banned items list rather quickly, much to Harry’s delight.

When Harry sat foot into the common room a little later, carrying two satchels and his drawing supplies, the room was packed with students. The atmosphere was quiet and studious, a few smaller groups playing games at the edges of the room, one group laughing about a story one of them was telling. All in all it looked like a typical late afternoon just before dinner would be served.

A glance around the room quickly showed Harry where he could find his classmates. The others were sitting near one of the fireplaces close to the entrances to the dorm corridors. Without missing a beat Harry walked over to them, carefully setting his newly acquired satchels on the ground.

“How is homework going?” Harry asked innocently, earning himself some very pointed glares. Goyle only grunted, carefully copying an essay from a messy draft onto a new scroll, while Theo pointedly closed his Defence book. “I know you wanted to take a walk outside, and looking at how red your face is you actually did do that, but that’s no reason to mock us. You will have to write that essay yourself.”

Harry sighed in defeat, there was no mistake, he would have to write that incredibly dull essay for Defence. But for the moment he had something to distract himself and everyone else, so he got out the satchels.

“I have managed to get us all a discount for some of the prank products the Weasley twins have invented. Anyone interested in some Skiving Snackboxes to get out of a few lessons with our current excuse for a Defence Professor?” Harry felt that was a clever way to get the conversation over to where he wanted it to go. Obvious – as looks from Theo and Draco confirmed – but welcome, so the Slytherins rolled their eyes at him but were amused.

“A discount you say?” Draco asked, opening one of the satchels and spreading out the boxes from within to look at them and the descriptions on the outside of the packages. They all were eye-wateringly bright. The others at the table quickly removed their homework from the table, grabbing for a box or two, thankful for the distraction, and curious to boot.

“Yes. They want to know the average Slytherin student’s opinion on their products. So, for you to have an opinion on their products you need to be able to test them before answering any questions. They asked me to help with that.” Harry snatched up a thick roll of parchment tied of with a red ribbon. As he had suspected he discovered upon opening the scroll that these were the sheets with questions.

“I wonder,” Daphne started, turning a box of Extendable-Ears over in her hands, “where they get the money from to fund all their research. They clearly have made an investment here. And say what you will, the salary of a Ministry Employee isn’t big enough to support that big a family and make risky investments.” The girl wasn’t looking at Harry directly, but he just knew she was asking him.

A look around the table showed that Draco and Theo, as well as Millicent and Pansy, agreed with Daphne’s assessment. So they probably had had some form of education on things like the financial management of an estate and all that entailed.

“I know they have an investor who wants to remain anonymous. Their mother doesn’t approve – it’s just no proper job in her eyes – so I understand their caution,” Harry offered as the only explanation he was going to give, not stating clearly that he had been the one to invest in their business, but admitting to it nonetheless. It was funny how Slytherin talk worked sometimes. Or maybe it should be named politician talk instead. In Harry’s – admittedly limited – experience, all politicians talked that way, regardless from which House they were.

“I guess you might have seen that one before. It turns the one eating something with it in it into a big canary. The feathers fall out one after the other, and once they’re all gone, you turn back. I know a few times someone used it in the Great Hall,” Harry explained, happy to collect the sickles Crabbe got out of his pocket and hand over a piece of parchment together with the change.

“If you use that on me, you’ll be in trouble!” Zabini said to Crabbe with more than a little fervour in his voice.

“We’ll visit family over Yule. Last year a cousin hexed me as a prank. This will be great revenge.” Crabbe’s face was satisfied, and the boy left to store his newly purchased goods in his trunk.

It didn’t take long to attract a crowd with the Weasley merchandise. One of the older boys complained about the prices he had paid previously for a nosebleed nougat. “I guess you didn’t purchase it directly from the Weasley twins?” Harry asked and got a shake of a head and a scowl as an answer. “Then it's likely that it was sold and bought more than once before it came into your hands, and someone made a profit out of it.” With grumbling acceptance the other handed over the money and accepted the box, along with a sheet of parchment filled with writing.

One of the first-year boys tossed a tube of canary cream back on the table, scoffing at his friend, “Who would like to sound like an animal? Howling like a werewolf? Why would you want to sound like one of those monsters? I think the Ministry should just kill them all and the problem would be solved,” before turning as if to vanish into the crowd surrounding the table.

Harry felt himself go very still at this casual dismissal of the humanity of werewolves. Without much of a thought Harry had extended his arm, his hand taking a firm grasp on the back of the boy’s robe, reaching his target with the thoughtless ease of the practiced seeker. “What did you say?” His voice was almost a growl, the small boy turning as far as he was able, his face pale and his eyes wide. “Did you just state it would be a good idea to just round up and kill a group of witches and wizards to just kill them? Regardless of if they had violated any laws or not? Without a trial? Or are my ears tricking me?”

Harry didn’t really register the awkward angle the boy had to hold his head with that much of his robe clutched in Harry’s hand, but he registered all the eyes that were on him, the silence around them, the rising tension.

“Yeah, that’s what I said! You’ve got a problem with that? They’re all dangerous beasts. My parents say they’re better off dead anyway!” Either the little Slytherin had argued with the Hat just as Harry had done the evening of his Sorting, or he hadn’t yet learned any subtlety at all. It was also possible he was ambitious and not cunning. At all. Because saying such a thing when at a clear disadvantage wasn’t the smartest thing to do.

“You already learnt Wingardium Leviosa? The levitation charm? You know, a friend of mine knocked out a troll using that charm, back when we were first-years. So you can be dangerous too. Each of us can be. Do you think we should all be killed, just because there are some choosing to do evil? Harm others? No?” The boy was now rapidly shaking his head, clearly afraid of Harry.

That was what finally penetrated the anger that had gripped Harry. He was terrified of himself. Had he just grabbed an eleven-year-old kid? Almost shaking him, yelling at him?

Yes he had. Suddenly he felt sick to his stomach. Carefully he loosened his grip, making sure the boy stayed upright. He took a deep breath to centre himself, and get more distance between himself and his anger. This reaction had been overly dramatic. But his anger hadn’t been unfounded. Had it? No, casually suggesting a large number of humans should be killed wasn’t something you just let stand.

“You should think more about what you say, and not just parrot back what someone else told you,” Harry said, now a lot calmer. But the churning feeling in his stomach was still there.

Ignoring the first-year now scurrying away, he turned to the other fifth-years, seeing curious and careful expressions aimed his way. “Draco can you take over the distribution? I have to collect something from my room before we go up for dinner.” After he had received a small nod from the blond, Harry hurried away to the safety of his own room.

He was horrified over his own reaction. He didn’t want to be a bully. He hated bullies! Where had that come from?

ooOoo
Theo was on the move the moment his silent conversation with Draco and Daphne was finished. They all had seen the horror in their friend’s eyes. He had been terrified by his own reaction.

It had been unexpected, so Theo supposed he could understand the surprise, and considering how… mild and non-confrontational Harry seemed to be most of the time – even with his snark and sarcasm shining through with increasing frequency – the violent reaction seemed a little out of character for the new Slytherin.

Speeding up after he was out of sight, Theo managed to reach Harry at the door to his room before the other could properly close it. “Come on, let me in. You look like you can use a friend.” Obviously hearing the steel in Theo’s voice, Harry let his hand fall from the door, walking over to his desk, starting to rummage around some drawers.

Because he had another priority at the moment, Theo only allowed himself a brief look around the room. It was quite similar to the normal dorm rooms, if a bit bigger and more orderly than the room he had to share with not only Draco and Blaise, but Vince and Greg as well. The last two weren’t the most orderly people.

“What the kid said wasn’t right. He not only contradicted Lord Slytherin’s politics in public where you could hear him. He also casually demanded the death of innocent, if occasionally dangerous, people.” Theo walked over the really nice rug over to the bed and sat down at the edge. “Don’t beat yourself up over this. Maybe you overreacted. But you caught yourself. No one came to harm. Maybe he’ll learn to think before opening his mouth and parroting what he's heard somewhere. At least he'll learn to keep his mouth shut until he knows how the wind is blowing where he is at the moment.”

Harry made a face at that, making Theo smirk. Of course the Gryffindor sensibilities would object to the fact that you could think whatever you well pleased, as long as you knew when and where to speak your mind and when to keep quiet.

“Come on, let’s get up to dinner, and after let’s play a game of chess. You need to practice if you want to get better.”

Harry rolled his eyes at Theo for that obvious attempt to change the topic, but he smiled. “Thanks for trying to cheer me up. Let’s go. Will you help with the younger years tomorrow in the Defence Club meeting? I think we should improvise a session on how to use prank charms any first year would know to get away from a dangerous person.”

Glad that his friend didn’t seem inclined to brood over the incident, Theo happily agreed. Making sure the younger kids knew how to defend themselves adequately was a good goal. Reinforcing the lesson Harry had taught this evening was a nice side effect.

After a long day teaching classes, and an evening spent grading essays with Sonja reading a potions magazine next to him, Severus was on his way to the hospital wing. He had a basket of finished potions to deliver. The days since his visit to his ancestral home – his own manor now – had been busy ones. He had instructed the elves in what he wanted them to do, which rooms to make habitable first, how he wanted the potions garden planted, and other things along those lines.

He had taken Sonja to visit, and they both had admired the potions laboratories – yes, several laboratories – in the basement. At the moment they were debating on whether Severus should sell the house his parents had left him. And about the robes they would need to have made for the events they would have to attend after officially claiming his new title. She thought it would be best to go to one of the tailors in Diagon Alley, Severus would prefer to have one of the elves make them for him. Honey had said she was proficient in sewing. Sonja was sceptical.

Severus stepped through the doors to the infirmary, seeing that all the beds were empty, but there was light still on in Madame Pomfrey's office. With a few more steps, phials softly tinkling in the basket as they moved against each other, Severus came close enough to the door that he could hear two voices behind it, arguing. Out of habit, Severus’ steps got lighter, more careful, so he wouldn’t make as much noise.

When he recognized the voice of Aberforth Dumbledore, he cast a spell on himself to make sure his steps, clothes, and the basket he was carrying wouldn’t make a sound. This was too good an opportunity to waste.

“That can’t be right. Truly, you must be mistaken.” The medi-witch sounded distressed, as if she wished whatever she had been told was a lie. A fire was burning, the scent of burning wood and the sounds of flames didn’t leave a doubt. Maybe a floo call?

“I know what I have seen.” There were stubborn undertones in the younger Dumbledore’s voice. “And I don’t claim to be right, that’s why I’m asking you to check. He is acting strange. Making plans to keep a student from their guardian. I think he’s losing it. There’s only one other explanation, and I hope that’s not the reason. I rather would believe he’s getting old enough to lose his marbles. So please, the next time he’s in range of your wand, cast a diagnostic and test for dementia.” At the end, the owner of the most shady pub in Hogsmeade was demanding that Pomfrey should just do as he said.

While the two inside the office – Dumbledore most likely by floo call in the fireplace – were debating over technicalities, Severus mulled over the few words he had overheard. The Headmaster was planning to abduct a student? There was practically no way the student in questions wasn’t his Lord’s son, the boy he was sworn to protect. Who else could be a target? One of the Death Eater’s children? It was unlikely the Headmaster would try to capture one of those kids.

After several moments the discussion inside the office slowly was moving to an end. Severus moved back to the entrance, removed the spell keeping his level of noise down, before he walked back towards the office, making more noise than he normally would. When he was back, knocking on the office door, he heard the last words of farewell between the school medi-witch and the Headmaster’s brother, before the door opened.

“Good evening. I have here the new batches of Pepper-Up potion, sleeping draught, calming draught, and stomach soother. Are there others you will need more of?” Long practice enabled the Potions Master to look unconcerned and not show any of his inner planning and scheming to the witch accepting the basket from him.

“I'll need more skin-cleaning solution soon. Some teenagers get up to some desperate measures over pimples.” She rolled her eyes, turning to place the basket on a table near her storage shelves.

“Please send me a list as soon as possible. I'll have to plan carefully to get everything brewed in time.” They wished each other a good night before Severus left, and Madame Pomfrey started to move the new potions into the spots she had designated for them.
On his way down to the dungeons, Severus laid out a plan for the rest of the night. He would need to inform his Lord as soon as he could, without drawing undue attention from the Headmaster or any of the man’s spies. It was impossible to leave the castle without being spotted by at least a few portraits, or without alerting the Headmaster through the wards. At least Severus was pretty sure the wards were set to inform the Headmaster if a student or member of staff left the premises.

Maybe his best bet would be to fake being summoned. Deciding on this course of action, Severus chose a stretch of hallway with a lot of portraits to touch his arm, right over the mark, for a brief moment before accelerating his pace. Hopefully this would corroborate his claim once the Headmaster received the report from his spies on the walls.

Sonja was already in her nightgown, only wearing an open robe over it, when Severus set foot into their quarters. She looked questioningly when he only gave her a short kiss, before going for the wardrobe and the hidden compartment inside, where his Death Eater robes and mask were hidden. “You're being summoned?” She sounded sleepy and on edge at the same time.

“No, love. But I have something to report, so I will claim a summons as the reason for leaving the school. There is no need to worry.” He got his wand out, casting a patronus to inform the Headmaster he would leave, as was the established procedure between them.

“Then I'll take a book and will sit up reading. As I would do if you truly were called to a madman bent on destruction.” She gave him a small smirk, winking at him, while hiding a yawn behind one hand. Her ring reflecting the light from the candles and fireplace sent a pleasant feeling through Severus.

They exchanged another kiss, before Severus charmed both items he had retrieved from the wardrobe to shrink until they fit into his pocket. He wouldn’t actually don them, at least not until he returned to the school, so he would present the expected image for the Headmaster.

Marvolo was preparing a small room for Nagini’s use during the time she was to shed her current skin. As no elf would be able to understand her instructions, and she already was irritable enough, Marvolo was currently adjusting the humidity, number and position of stones, branches, and other natural objects, as well as the temperature, to Nagini’s specifications.

.:Now it’s to warm. Just a little colder. And that big stone over there should be like a stone right from out of the sun:.' she hissed impatiently, her eyes getting a milky colour, a clear indicator the big reptile was about to exchange her skin for one a little bit bigger so she could keep growing.

Not complaining, Marvolo cast a few more charms, making a big stone in one corner of the room self-heating so it would feel like a stone which had been in the sun for several hours. She was really moody shortly before she was about to shed her skin.

Suddenly Marvolo felt one of his followers calling for him through the Mark. That hadn’t happened at all since he had returned to a body. He wasn’t sure about the time he had been nothing more than a ghost. At the moment, he thought it most likely that not one of his Death Eaters had thought to summon him during that time.
I need to leave, Nagini. Please test the room, I will adjust what still isn’t the way you like it, once I’m back. Her hiss in answer to this information sounded displeased, but getting everything to a point where she would be satisfied could take hours still. So he cast a spell at the door, to keep the atmosphere inside the room separate from the rest of the house, before he went to get his robes and apparate over to Headquarters.

The moment Marvolo arrived in the big room used for meetings – the place he had been called to – the one waiting for him got down on one knee, dark robes pooling around him on the floor. It took only a short look for the Dark Lord to be sure that Severus had called for him. The fact that he had done so through the Mark was a reassurance. If there had been a problem with Henry, the man would have sent a patronus.

“Severus, rise. What is so urgent you have to inform me at this time of night?” It wasn’t all that late, but late enough that most sensible people who needed to get up in the morning would be headed for bed.

“I overheard a conversation I believe you need to know about, my Lord,” The still-kneeling man answered, his head still bowed. Marvolo rolled his eyes, sure the other wouldn’t be able to see it. In a way, this display of deference and submission was gratifying, but it also made things more complicated than they should be, making interactions between him and his followers a lengthy process.

“I said rise, Severus. And follow. It sounds like this will take some time, I’d rather sit for a longer talk.” Without waiting for Severus to do as he asked, expecting the man to hurry, Marvolo turned around and made his way over to his office in the house. He would take this opportunity to take a drink before he had to deal with an irate Nagini again.

Two tumblers were retrieved as well as a bottle of excellent muggle scotch before Severus arrived at the door, following Marvolo in with another bow. Following a silent command, given with the wave of a hand, Severus sat down in the chair reserved for visitors.

“What is it you want to report?” Marvolo asked, swirling the drink in its glass, marveling at its smooth colour and scent.

Severus took up his own glass, cradling it between his hands folded around the small container. “While delivering potions to the infirmary, I heard Madame Pomfrey talking to someone I think was Aberforth Dumbledore, about the man’s suspicion the Headmaster may be suffering from a decline in his mental health. He demanded the mediwitch test the Headmaster for dementia. The proof he provided was a plan hatched by the Headmaster to keep a student from his or her guardian. He wasn’t elaborating on the plan, but I think the most likely target for such a plan would be your son, my Lord.” Severus took a tentative sip from his drink, the Potions Master always was careful with spirits or wine around Marvolo. Probably a force of habit, because in the past his followers had needed their wits about them all the time they stayed in his presence.

“Do you think you will be able to get more details? My son carries reasonable protection against abduction with him at all times, but if the Headmaster really means it, my son could come to great harm before I can be there to get him to safety.” Suddenly his stomach made odd movements, churning, making Marvolo think of what might cause something like this. It wasn’t the first time something like this had happened. When he had been told his son had fallen down the stairs from his dorm, breaking several bones, he had felt something similar.

He was worried about another person coming to harm. It was disconcerting and reassuring at the same time. Reassuring because it was an indicator for his returning and still-improving humanity, the harm undone that he had inflicted on himself. And disconcerting because such feelings could easily be exploited by others, and therefore presented a weakness. He would have to find ways to shield his weaknesses, because cutting away his human nature would harm his magic and mind again. Not an error he would repeat knowingly.

“It will not be an easy task. If he really asked his brother to assist with such a plan, he clearly doesn’t trust the members of his Order with this. And rightfully so, I would say. Those still standing staunchly by his side mostly aren’t inclined to do anything risky, or so obviously against the law. Those who would be willing to risk something like that, are no longer following the Headmaster blindly.” Severus paused to take another cautious sip. “I would hazard a guess that any attempt to abduct your son would happen only when he leaves the grounds of the school. Either during the last Hogsmeade visit, or with the start of the winter holidays, my Lord.”

Marvolo nodded in agreement. It was the most likely time to try something like this, because an abduction from school grounds would cause trouble for the Headmaster of the school, maybe even cast suspicion on the man. He would surely try to avoid that.

“Look for more information, but be careful not to compromise your position. I will make Henry aware of the potential problem.” Taking another sip himself, a little evil smirk settled on Marvolo’s face. “How is your wife? And have you already prepared everything to claim your seat on the Wizengamot properly?” Marvolo knew he was rattling the other's composure with that question. He knew that Severus wasn’t really looking forward to taking up the position in the spotlight he would get the moment he came to the Wizengamot chamber laying claim to the Prince seat.

“I have begun to get everything ready, my Lord. I’m still debating on the right robes to wear, and the right moment to announce my claim. I’m also still unsure if I should inform the Headmaster beforehand, or not.” Severus sounded reluctant, but relaxed a little more into his seat, assuming a position more fitted to a peer, an equal, not a follower or subservient.

“I guess you'll have to make the decision of whether informing the Headmaster beforehand is a good idea or not. But I can give you the planned agenda for the next regular meeting.” With a wave of his hand, Marvolo cast a silent accio for the sheet of parchment on which he had copied the agenda of the next Wizengamot meeting.

A small scroll zoomed over from a shelf near the door, landing in the outstretched hand of the Dark Lord before he flicked his hand again to banish it in Severus’ direction.

Fumbling a bit because he still held the small tumbler in both hands, Severus managed to catch the scroll before he set the remainder of his drink down on the desk in front of him. After he had unfurled the scroll and had scanned the agenda, Severus pulled a face of distaste, causing Marvolo to chuckle. “Be glad it isn’t the budgeting session. That one could be classified as torture. I would advise you to announce your claim during the open session to bring forward unexpected additions to the agenda at the start of the meeting, just after the section where the Minister informs about various things.”

A hand with long, pale fingers came up to pinch the bridge of Severus’ prominent nose. There was no way he could deny his family connection to the Prince family. “I feel like this will be the hardest order to follow you have ever given to me, my Lord. Dealing with all those dunderhead Gryffindor Lords and Ladies… What do you wish me to report to the Headmaster regarding the content of our meeting, my Lord?”

With those words the deferential posture was back again, Severus sitting at attention in his seat, head slightly lowered, small scroll vanishing inside one of his robe pockets. Marvolo leaned back with a small sigh. It was easier with Xerxes to be just himself, and not the Dark Lord. Maybe with time this state could be reached with some of the younger followers as well.

“If you need advice on your robes, go with something in family colours, and maybe cut more along the lines of the robes you use in the laboratory, remind the others that you have a Mastery, have reached a respectable position under unfavourable conditions. So maybe traditional robes altered to include some of the typical features of brewing robes, such as sleeves that narrow down considerably towards the hands?” That Lucius fell almost too easily in a somewhat friendly relationship with Marvolo irked the man, but that Severus constantly slid back into a much more subservient role, always so cautious, not trusting his Lord even if he was willing to follow his every command, was somehow even more infuriating. Maybe Marvolo needed another meeting with Mrs. Goyle, as he obviously wasn’t going to get his feelings and reactions in order without professional help.

“I will take your advice under consideration, my Lord.” Severus bowed in his chair, not relenting on what he had asked for, an explanation about why he had been called.

Marvolo sighed again, this was frustrating and wouldn’t be solved by cursing the other man. “Give me a report on Henry’s progress in Potions, as well as an evaluation over the stance of the other Slytherins towards him. After that, I would like to know how your two potions experiments are developing. For the Two Fathers potion I might have another willing proband for you. He is currently in his last year at Hogwarts, but I guess he will not wait long after school to settle down.”

Severus started on his two reports on the spot, leaving Marvolo to listen to his Potions Master and wondering how he could manage to change the way they interacted to something he felt more comfortable with. It was over an hour later before Severus left to join his wife, and Marvolo apparated back to Griffin House to pander to Nagini’s irritated demands. Maybe he would find some time to work some more on his theory on how to move horcruxes between containers without harming either container or soul piece. It was a most frustrating puzzle to solve.

Friday, 8th of December

It had been a long day for Harry. The way most of the younger years had looked at him in the common room and during meals, it was clear that they were spooked by the display they had seen the day before.

Theo’s attempt to make him feel better hadn’t dispelled all his doubts, but his friend’s attempt to help him had eased some of his worries. He hadn’t been angry about something stupid, petty. But about the casual dismissal of the value of human lives. He had over-reacted, but had managed to catch himself. At the moment, Harry planned to speak with Mrs. Goyle tomorrow to see what she thought about this.

But that was tomorrow. Today, or rather now in this moment, the next meeting of the Defence Club was about to start. Once again the Great Hall had been cleared for more floor space, and students from all Houses and years had assembled. Hermione was standing beside him, looking over the crowd, a smug look on her face. She loved organizing these meetings and all the others listening attentively to explanations from her and Harry.

He had informed her the previous evening that they should change the next lesson to one on what damage was possible with first year spells and charms, and how it was important to be careful, as well as how creative use of them could help in a pinch. They had done similar exercises before. But all in all, it was important to keep practising.

“Hello, everyone!” Harry got the attention of all those present. “Thank you all for coming. Today we will practice shield charms and various little hexes. We all need to remember the damage that can be done even with spells that seem harmless if cast in the right – or wrong – situation. A tripping hex on someone near a ledge, or on stairs, can possibly even kill. So always be aware of the damage each of us is capable of!”

With the last Harry searched the room for the cluster of first-year Slytherins, wanting to impress on them that just because someone could cause a lot of harm was no reason to kill them.

Soon after that, Harry and Hermione walked down from the dais and out among the students, helping with explanations and demonstrations where needed.

After Harry had explained how a person under the influence of a Petrificus Totalus falling face first into a shallow puddle could easily drown before the spell wore off to the young Miss Smith and her friend – quite aware of the fact the boy from yesterday was only a few steps away – a voice he knew well tried to get his attention.

“Harry, can you help us? I think we have the pronunciation of the jelly-legs jinx wrong.”

He turned and came face to face with Cho Chang, the Ravenclaw seeker and the girl he had asked to the ball last year. Without success. It was a little embarrassing remembering his fumbling attempt to ask her out, and how long he had taken to even gather the courage to go up to her and ask.

“Can you show me?” he asked, trying his hardest to not blush. Cho was really pretty and still managed to make his stomach do funny things.

Cho and her friend – Harry thought her name was Edgecombe – turned to each other, Cho casting a stable Protego and her friend, with her reddish-blond hair in a messy bun, attempting to cast the jelly-legs jinx at her friend’s shield.

“No, your pronunciation is good. You’re making an extra twitch at the end of the wand movement. Look!” Harry got his own wand out, and not pointing at anyone, demonstrated the movement a few times, before he asked Cho’s friend to copy him.

After a few more tries, a light shot from Edgecombe’s wand towards Cho’s shield. “Thank you, Harry.” Cho started to say more, but Harry felt a hand on his arm and turned to see who was there.

“Hello, Harry! I have no partner to practice with.” It was Luna, standing there, a dreamy expression on her face, as if the fact that no one had been willing to work with her wasn’t all that bad. Remembering all the times he had been selected last for a team in a school sports lesson, or how the other children had stayed away from him because of Dudley and all the lies Harry’s aunt and uncle had told, he decided to do something about it. He might not be able to force others to accept the sometimes quirky Ravenclaw, but he could make sure that she had someone to practice with.
Not quite ignoring Cho’s further words of thanks, but dismissing them with a small nod, Harry walked together with Luna to a place where they could stand face to face a few feet apart. “I’ll start with a shield, and you can cast the first jinx,” he encouraged the girl across from him. At first he thought that she wasn’t paying any attention, which caused his shield to waver. He barely managed to get it back up before a yellow stinging hex would have crashed right into his face.

With Harry now no longer deceived by Luna's seemingly absent-minded state, they exchanged a few more simple so-called prank spells, before Hermione came over with Neville and Ron in tow. “I think Luna can practice with Ron and Neville for a while, Harry. You need to help me with explaining to the others.”

“You okay with that, Luna?” Harry wanted to know from his practice partner. She nodded, but Harry nonetheless was a little reluctant to leave her with his two friends. Explaining something as simple as the Protego to a sixth-year was embarrassing. More than one had objected to his explanation at the start of the Club. A few still did.

So it happened that Harry walked by a few seventh-years boys, with Defence as one of their NEWT courses, when one of them commented on a girl – a seventh-year as well, if Harry remembered correctly – which was practising different shields not too far away. “Those robes hide too much. Have you seen what she looks like only in a skirt and blouse?” There was something eager in their voices. Harry wasn’t all that sure this was how one was supposed to talk about a girl. “Oh yes! And her ass! Do you think I could get her to agree to come on a date this Hogsmeade weekend?”

Harry walked over to some of the younger students, trying to ignore the way the older boys had talked. He wasn’t here to help the NEWT students with their practising. Most of the time they just went over the spells they needed to know and be able to cast for their exams at the end of the year. A few helped out with explaining now and again. No, he was here to help those in OWL year or under, and a few others who hadn’t bothered taking Defence against the Dark Arts further after taking their OWL in the subject.

So Harry tried to do just that. But the rest of the lesson he had troubles concentrating. As soon as he came near one of the girls close to his age, he couldn’t help but notice things about them he until now mostly had ignored. He saw the way Hermione’s cardigan sat around her chest – she had discarded her robe some time before – and had to remember himself sternly that she was more like a sister to him. The way Ginny’s skirt swung around her legs, as she dodged a well-aimed powerful leg-locker curse thrown by one of the twins.

It was very distracting and mortifying. Some of the girls were almost strangers to him, Hermione and Ginny family, almost sisters. And then there was the warning from Marvolo in the back of his mind. That some families had strict expectations regarding dating and everything associated with it.

Harry did his best to ignore what suddenly caught his eye wherever he looked. Now he was happier than ever that Daphne had already asked him to be her date to those events they would be visiting together. Girls had been terrifying before, and Harry was sure that becoming a blubbery idiot staring at their chests wouldn’t make interacting with them any easier.

As if being adopted hadn’t been enough already, becoming an adult at the same time was just too much. Maybe he could get advise from an adult? He would have to think about that, because Sirius would be the easiest to talk to, but Harry very much doubted that he would also be the most helpful adult. Somehow it felt more like the man would tease Harry without mercy over Harry’s insecurities.

Turning to a pair of Hufflepuffs – he was pretty sure those were second-years – Harry banished all thoughts from his head that weren’t related to instructing, and concentrated on the club meeting.
The party he was headed to today – one in a list of many, many more – was to be held in a clearing somewhere in the woods. To make attending possible, the invitation was a portkey. His old Head of House had always been eccentric about everything. Some of the parties he had held for his selected few had been outright ridiculous. In a way, Marvolo was curious what was in store for them today.

But even more curious had been the fact he had been invited at all. With all the old professor knew about Marvolo’s time as a student, he would have guessed the man would be wary of him. But maybe all his work to get his reputation repaired had worked so well that he once more was someone Horace Slughorn wanted to have in his collection.

Unsure if this was a trap, possibly set by Albus Dumbledore, or a sign of his success in reintegrating himself with society, Marvolo checked his appearance a last time. He had selected trousers from a dark woollen cloth, a silk shirt with a silk vest – richly decorated with embroidery and glass beads – over which he would wear an open robe made of wool and lined with silk. He planned to apply ample warming charms if it proved to be necessary. A clearing in the middle of nowhere. It was a distinct possibility that he would need warm clothing to avoid having his teeth clattering together.

Reading the activation phrase from the bottom of the invitation out loud, Marvolo activated the portkey, and after a moment spent in the colourful disorientation that was portkey travel, he found himself on a nice carpet surrounded by floating lights. It took a moment, but then his eyes – glamoured again to hide their true colour – adjusted to the lighting situation, so Marvolo could properly take in his surroundings. Others were already there, and a young witch wrapped up in what looked like a Roman or ancient Greek costume in colours probably intended to look like ice and snow – there was too much glittering involved to be anything else – came up to him.

“Welcome, Lord Slytherin! Your host asked me to show you to him the moment you arrived. Please follow me!”

She seemed friendly enough and wouldn’t really pose a threat in such a public venue, so Marvolo didn’t object, but smiled a little polite greeting. “Lead the way, fair Lady.” Her delighted giggles were another proof that simple flattery could get you a long way with any human.

While following the young witch, Marvolo had time to take in the décor. Charmed ice was arranged in blocks to form small benches, tables, and a buffet off to one side. The light was provided by floating orbs and what looked like fairies that fluttered about. The ground was covered with a large number of carpets, leaving only small gaps to see snow through. It seemed parties out in the open were the thing done this season. Hopefully the next few parties would be held inside and near a nice, warm fire.

The host was surrounded by a number of younger celebrities. Or rather people who were called celebrities. A singer Marvolo thought he had seen on the front of the Daily Prophet once since his return, members of the Harpies Quidditch team, and someone who Marvolo suspected was the team’s manager.

“Welcome!” Horace Slughorn called out the moment he saw Marvolo stepping into the group surrounding his settee placed between two fires lit in bronze braziers. “How nice that you could make it, Lord Slytherin! I imagine you got way more invitations than you could accommodate, didn’t you?” The man, quite a bit larger than in his time as Head of Slytherin House at Hogwarts, managed to get to his feet and held his hands out in front of him. To Marvolo’s immense relief, it was only to shake hands and not to hug him. That would have been simply too awkward to contemplate.

“My secretary had a lot of trouble balancing all the invitations that I got. But I have to commend his organizational talent, he managed to fit everyone in whom I insisted to visit.” Barty had truly made a great effort to make the plans work out, but this party had been on the maybe list, not the can’t-avoid-have-to-go list. Making Slughorn believe he had been one of those inviting him whom he really wanted to see, was beneficial in Marvolo’s eyes, so he let him believe it without speaking it out loud. Always tell the truth if you could, it was much better than lying, because it was easier to do and much harder to spot.

“Go around, meet a few people. You’ll find more than a few Ministry-related wizards and witches here. What I heard was, you haven’t had much time to get to know the current finest of magical Britain!” Slughorn clearly wanted to impress his acquaintances with the fact that he had managed to invite Lord Slytherin to his party, and curry favour with him by granting him the opportunity to meet more people who might be useful.

Connections were a currency Slughorn always had known how to invest and use to his advantage. And maybe he could use this party to find a few possible candidates to draw to his side of things. A quidditch star was influential with young wizards and witches, and the more simple-minded masses. They could open up ways to get his message out to those not inclined to read a book or think too hard.

“I’ll do that,” Marvolo agreed with a smile and a polite nod, provoking his old teacher to laugh jovially. Before the old man could say much more, he was drawn into a conversation with a witch dressed quite extraordinarily. It was possible she was a member of that popular musician group called the Weird Sisters, but Marvolo wasn’t sure. As he turned to see if there was someone he might be interested in speaking with, an arm snaked around his own, drawing him closer to a muscular, female body. Suppressing his first response – cursing whoever dared touch him without his consent – Marvolo turned to look at his assailant.

“Nice to meet you, Lord Slytherin. Or may I call you Marvolo?” Her voice was nice to listen to, and what he had felt to be a well-trained body, looked the same. Adding her nice dark and flawless skin to the other things he could see, she combined many traits in herself that most considered desirable. Or so he assumed by his observations and readings.

“I don’t even know your name, lovely Lady. Don’t you think calling me by my first name would be rushing things?” Marvolo tried to relax his posture and not tense up. He wanted to be charming here, gain possible allies, not alienate strangers. And she was possibly flirting with him.

She laughed and fluttered her eyelashes at him. Definitely flirting.

“My name is Gwenog. Gwenog Jones. I’m captain of the Holyhead Harpies.” Her smile was radiant. Marvolo was relatively sure she was interested in him. He didn’t feel the same.

Definitely flirting.

“My name is Gwenog. Gwenog Jones. I’m captain of the Holyhead Harpies.” Her smile was radiant. Marvolo was relatively sure she was interested in him. He didn’t feel the same.

“Nice to meet you, Miss Jones. I heard your team is doing well this season. How is your training going?” Marvolo managed a nice conversation with her, subtly rebuking her flirting attempts clearly geared to get him to agree to a more short term involvement.

“I’m a single father of a teenaged boy. There are responsibilities that override a few things one could consider pleasant self-indulgence.” He managed to pull off a convincing look of regret to go with that statement, making her back off, stating he was one of the more responsible adult males she had ever met. She gave him a peck to the cheek and promised to send him and his son tickets to one of her games that was to take place during the summer holidays.

After that conversational minefield, Marvolo retreated to a bar off to the side, to order himself one of the drinks, after he had noticed – with his lips curling in distaste – the fact there were no simple spirits or wines to chose from, only those mixed concoctions with much more fruits and sugar than he wanted to ingest. He needed a drink, so one of those sugar-infested, colourful things it had to be.

While watched a house elf shaking a clear container with a lid in the air above its head, a young wizard leaned against the bar next to Marvolo. “It’s hard dodging witches all the time, isn’t it? If you want, I can introduce you to my circle of friends for maybe more interesting company.” If he hadn’t been looking for subtle cues at all the parties he attended, he might have missed the wiggle of eyebrows or the quick wink. But he did watch for tells like these, so he did see.

Great. Another one interested in dragging him off to a secluded corner, or another private space.

“That is a generous offer. Mister...?” Marvolo let his question trail off. Maybe he should spend some time learning the faces and names of all the minor celebrities of wizarding Britain, and everyone involved with various businesses. It might make these parties a little easier.

“Oh! I’m Rolf Spudmore, related to the Spudmore family creating brooms over in Germany. I’m managing the subsidiary here in Britain. Nice to meet you, Lord Slytherin.” he extended a hand, while his other elbow remained firmly planted on the bar.

The elf set the drink down in front of Marvolo, levitating a straw, a small umbrella made from paper, and a charmed giant snowflake onto the glass rim to decorate the sweet-smelling drink.

Accepting the hand in a short shake, Marvolo cast a wandless detection charm on the glass. It was free of poisons, potions, or any other tampering. He took a cautious sip and made a face. It was sweet enough, but combined with the spirits in there, it was a little strange. Maybe he could get used to it over time. He took another sip before turning to the smiling young man at his side.

“Nice to meet you too, Mr. Spudmore.” Another sip to give him time to gather his thoughts. “I would really like to meet your friends. But what I said to Miss Jones is the same I will tell you. I’m a single father, and have a reputation to repair. Indulging in… some things that might be seen as… questionable in the public eye isn’t something I can risk at this point in time.”

This declaration didn’t cause the small smile to vanish from a classically beautiful face. Another person who usually would be called attractive. Was he attracted to the man? Marvolo wasn’t sure.

“Well, considering the… climate in good old Britain, and the expectations heaped upon us, we know how to be discreet. But there isn’t a need to rush.” After that the conversation changed to the current climate for the broom industry and what Henry felt about his current model – the Firebolt – and how it compared to the Nimbus he had had before. It felt like a safer topic, and while they talked, often joined by others who stayed only a short time, no other witches tried to catch Marvolo’s interest quite as boldly as Miss Jones had done.

It was a really tired Marvolo who returned home in the early hours of the morning. He would need to go on a vacation after the holiday season was over.

Chapter End Notes
starting from the 17th of October I will have to make room in my writing time for some real-world things. Writing time will be short, and access to the internet almost non-existent, so I will move the date for the next chapter a bit to accommodate those demands on my time.

With my phone I will be able to read my mail and see your reviews. But I will probably not be able to answer any of them.

Thanks to Jordre and Jake for helping to improve my spelling!

First published on the 6th of October 2017
Next chapter planned for 25th of October 2017
In a little over two years this story has grown to sixty chapters. I never would have made it this far without all the comments and questions you have left me here. Your continued support has helped me stay on track and managing to keep my self set deadlines. The knowledge that there are people all around the world waiting for the next chapter is a great motivator!
I'm not sure how much longer I will need to get to the end I already have, but I'm happy to know we will make that journey together!

Saturday, 9th of December

It was early – and cold – when Kingsley and Dawlish took the Ministry-issued portkey on Saturday morning to a place near the cave they were sent to search. Since the disastrous party under the full moon last Tuesday, all Aurors had been searching the places Lord Slytherin had provided as those he remembered as being used by Fenrir and his cronies before that night in 1981.

They had all amassed quite a bit of overtime. But Kingsley had serious doubts about the Minister’s promise to give them time off to balance those hours of extra work. The way the year had developed since the summer, it felt highly unlikely that there would be time for them to take time off.

“Have the faeries stolen your senses?” Dawlish asked from his side, amusement clear in his voice. Since they had worked on the Dementor attack on school children, the two of them had been unofficial partners, always assigned to the same cases. Considering that they most likely were aligned to opposing political groups, Kingsley wasn’t sure if it was a genius move or a daft one.

They both started to cast spells on themselves. Spells to mask their natural scent, to mask the sounds they would make moving through the forest surrounding them. As was Ministry protocol for the attempt to apprehend werewolves, they had been deposited a good half hour walk away from their destination. It was assumed that the typical werewolf had sharper senses than a wizard or witch.

On one of the first meetings of the Order, Kingsley had asked Remus Lupin if this assumption was based in facts, or if it was just one of those regulations some Ministry employee without any field experience had set into place based on their own fears.

As he had thought, a werewolf’s senses were as good as any wolf’s when the person was transformed, and not any better than a normal witch or wizard’s when in human form. There wasn’t even any bleed-over after a transformation. Remus had explained that the drain of transforming probably was responsible for that.

Short nods were enough to communicate the fact that they both were ready to leave, following a small map drawn onto parchment that had been handed to them, together with the portkey. It was well done, with enough landmarks to make sure they would find their way, but none of the useless decorations maps made by magical folk often had.

They walked a little while in silence, even their footfalls on the frozen ground muffled by the spells they had cast. “I don’t understand him,” Kingsley stated into the chilly air, his warm breath creating a small cloud in front of his face.

“You don’t understand whom?” Dawlish answered, stepping around a fallen tree, wand in hand, eyes restlessly sweeping over the surrounding area.

“Lord Slytherin. He just doesn’t act the way I had expected he would act.” It might be a little bold, asking someone he suspected was a Death Eater – the man never showered in the communal showers offered at the Auror office, so Kingsley never had seen the man’s bare arms – anything regarding the one who most likely still was a Dark Lord. But who else should he ask? Dumbledore was losing his grasp on reality, or so it appeared, taking into account every action the man had taken since the evening of the third task. Especially the last few months – since he was struck with that curse – had been riddled with questionable decisions. The only other one who might have any insight, was Snape. And as an ex-Death Eater, probably ex, his accuracy and honesty weren’t things Kingsley would trust easily. It was in a way contradictory that he would trust more in the one man he knew who was probably a Death Eater and had never defected to the light.

“And what do you think he should do?” the younger man clad in the crimson robes of their profession – maybe muted colours for work in forests would be a better policy – threw the question right back at him.

And indeed, Kingsley wasn’t sure what he had expected. Or maybe he wasn’t comfortable with his own guileless acceptance of the old Headmaster’s expectations of what was about to happen. They walked another few minutes in silence before Kingsley had come to a decision what he would say to that. “I guess I expected the war to continue the way it had been before the attack on the Potters. Terrorist attacks, murder, that kind of thing.”

Dodging a few low-hanging branches, Dawlish took his turn on staying silent for a while. “I’m sure you’ve heard the same rumours I have. Some of them are pure speculation, but the one that even made it into the Prophet sounds plausible to my ears.” The answer sounded contemplative. “I guess neither of us will ever know for sure.”

Well, that hadn’t brought any new information to light. Or maybe a tiny bit. If Dawlish was a Death Eater then it was possible that even they didn’t know for sure what had happened to change He-Who-Must-Not-Be-Named so fundamentally as to change his tactics this radically.

John walked carefully next to his partner through the thick underbrush in the forest, searching for the cave which was, or had been in the past, a werewolf hideout. He had been relatively young when he had joined the Dark Lord. By then the aggressive way to handle things had had already started. “I think whatever the reason for the lack of terror and aggression, we should be glad that it happened. Or do you wish things would be like you envisioned them? I for one love the peace and quiet…” He trailed off and then laughed. “Maybe not so quiet as that.” There had been too many unusual incidents outside of shoplifters and accusations over supposed dark objects, to call the last months quiet.

That brought a chuckle from the dark-skinned Auror slowly walking through the deep litter of old leaves. “I guess this is better than open warfare. But I have to admit that I feel apprehensive. Before, what would happen was more or less predictable. We didn’t know when and where something would happen. But what happened followed a pattern. Now all bets are off.”

John hummed. “Maybe. You’re older than me. All I ever noticed was my parents arguing if all the bloodshed really was necessary. My mother was always sure that terrorism was the best way to destroy whatever was left of our traditions. Most of my family was concerned over the eradication of values and traditions. Mother always worried that someone she knew would get injured, or even killed.” In fact she hadn’t been happy when John had come home bearing the Dark Mark with pride. She had started crying, convinced that she would lose her son to some skirmish.

She had rejoiced when the Dark Lord had vanished after his attack on the son of James and Lily Potter.

“I think we are almost there,” Shacklebolt said from a spot near a big tree where the ground started to rise steeply and big rocks indicated that they had reached the place where caves were more likely to be found.

Checking that the surrounding area was clear, Kingsley cast a Disillusionment charm on John, who shivered under the feeling of raw egg running down his face. He would take the lead, scouting out the cave, hopefully completely hidden from any possible inhabitants of the cave.

Carefully creeping up the hill, John made it to an opening in the side between two old, gnarled trees. Flickering lights – probably from a fire – on one wall were proof that the cave was indeed in use as a shelter. Sending small blue sparks down between the trees to where Shacklebolt was waiting, John sent the pre-defined signal that he had found the cave occupied.

It took only a short moment for Shacklebolt to scurry up the hill and pause by John, who had lifted the charm hiding him from view. Since they were about to attack a group of werewolves, it was better that they were able to see each other. With them invisible, the risk of one of them accidentally hitting the other with a spell was too high, cancelling out the advantage of not being seen by their adversaries.

A nod from Shacklebolt started their further investigation. Wand at the ready, a stunner already on his lips, John slowly made his way into the cave, carefully placing his feet to avoid making noises on the rough ground. A rock tumbled by one of his feet would make sounds rolling over the stones and dirt of the ground.

Voices and fire reflected from the walls made it more than clear that there were more than three people deep down in the cave. On the list from the Dark Lord, this cave had been described as simple, only one entrance and no out-branching side arms. If the people inside were to run, they would have to go past them.

When John’s eyes fell on the group, his first thought was disbelief. Those were the werewolves the whole of wizarding Britain was afraid of? There sat six people. Two women and four men. All were clad in threadbare robes and a mismatch of other clothes. Most of them didn’t even have shoes. They sat around the fire, huddled close to stay warm, talking and occasionally laughing about something, eating what smelled like roast rabbit.
Maybe the rumours were true after all, that werewolves tried to discard anything human. Or they just had nothing better because they were outcasts. Either felt equally likely to John, and probably there were wolves living in rags for of both of those reasons.

Shacklebolt was pressed to the wall on the other side of the small passage, concentrating intently, wand held close to his chest. Their eyes met over the gap between them, and then they jumped into action.

The moment they moved, two stunners flew into the group of people, knocking out two of the people sitting around the fire. One fell forward, landing directly in the flames. The woman next to him jumped up, screaming, before she grabbed the man – his hair on fire – and dragged him out, falling to another stunner shot from John’s wand.

Then the moment of surprise had passed and the suspects started to fight back. One of the men picked up a rusty knife, sprinting at John, just to be felled by another stunner from Shacklebolt, to fall to the floor and into his own weapon. The last two standing – one woman and one man, both with dark hair – got out wands from somewhere and managed to erect shields, deflecting another two stunners.

As the two left their comrades – or was it pack? – behind, Shacklebolt and John carefully advanced. The two with wands moved into another passage leading away from the place now filled with unconscious people and the smell of burned hair. John kept an eye on them, covering his partner while he bound the four downed suspects with conjured ropes. “You can’t escape, just give up!” John called. There was no harm in trying to make them give up. It would probably spare them some pain, and the two Aurors some work.

But the defiant answering shout of “Never!” put an end to that line of thought.

Silently communicating, they decided that John would go under a disillusionment charm to take the two remaining suspects out, while Shacklebolt would guard the captives and John’s back.

Creeping through the small, den-like place, John heard frantic whispers from the passage the two remaining werewolves had vanished in. But before they could come up with an escape plan, John had made his way over and stunned the two, one after the other.

Levitating them both back into the bigger part of the cave, where Shacklebolt was casting some easy diagnostic and healing spells, John moved back to his partner. “That was too easy.”

“What are you talking about?” Shacklebolt wanted to know, checking the ropes on the one that had fallen into the fire before casting a general healing charm on the blond-haired man.

“Overpowering them, incapacitating them. It was too easy!” Shouldn’t it have been harder? These were werewolves. Dangerous creatures, as far as Ministry laws were concerned. The tales and what he just had seen just didn’t go together, at all.

Shacklebolt snorted, throwing John a disbelieving look. “After all this time in the department you still buy the Ministry propaganda? A werewolf is dangerous on the nights of the full moon. Most other days and nights they’re just ordinary people. And even with most of them being wizards and witches… they’re no match for an Auror. Those infected at a young age most of the time have no real education either.” The older Auror shrugged and checked a last time on their captives.

The arguments seemed sound, and with the evidence right before his eyes – it had been too easy – he had to believe it. Now he understood why his Lord worked on changing the laws regarding werewolves, they had been made with the supposed danger of werewolves in mind. Laws based in lies, prejudice, and ignorance couldn’t be good for a society.

With help from two more Aurors called in as reinforcements, they managed to get the suspects to the Ministry and the holding cells. Now they had to try to make them talk. Get them to spill what they knew about the rest of the attackers on the Bones party. Probably not an easy task.

Right after a late breakfast sitting at the Slytherin table, with Hermione and Luna on the bench across from him and Theo, Harry walked up to the infirmary. He was to meet with Mrs. Goyle again.

Since the moment he had grabbed that first-year by his robes, Harry had thought about this appointment and what he wanted to speak about. His regular occlumency training had helped him cope with the rushes of anger that had led to rash behaviour in the past. But in hindsight, his own actions reminded him of Dudley. And he shuddered at the thought of acting like his bullying cousin.

The infirmary was almost empty. Only Madame Pomfrey was bustling about, parchment rolls in her hands, her hair a little frazzled. She probably was sorting paperwork, or something like that. She barely acknowledged Harry when he greeted her as was proper according to all the lessons Madame Malfoy had drilled into his head over the summer.

The door to the private room they used for these meetings was open, and Harry could see Mrs. Goyle pouring herself a cup of hot tea. A fresh canvas had been set up on an easel, brushes and paints stacked on a small table beside the seats.

“Good morning, Mrs. Goyle,” Harry greeted from the door, stepping in when she waved for him to do so, smiling, to close the door and walk over to his designated chair.

“Good morning. Have a seat. Do you want a cup of tea?” She added a spoon of sugar to her cup before she started to stir her tea slowly.

“Yes, thank you,” Harry nodded, carefully sitting down, folding his hands in his lap. A cup to hold onto and to stare into might help him through this meeting. Sometimes it was really hard talking about what he had experienced, what he was feeling, and what the reasons for his feelings and decisions might be. Drawing and painting were great for that too.

While tea filled the second cup, Harry’s eyes fell onto the painting supplies. If he wanted to create a painting of Hogwarts for Marvolo he would need more – and better – supplies in his room. He had his drawing pad and the great coals and pencils Marvolo had given him before he had boarded the train back to school. But he had no easel, canvases, oil paints, brushes, or any of the other things he might use to create a real oil painting.

“What about getting more supplies for painting? Drawing is nice, but I want to paint more. And there isn’t an art class at Hogwarts...” he trailed off awkwardly. Asking for things he wanted to have still was hard. But he really needed those things for the present he wanted to give. Why it was so important to make something special and give it to Marvolo on the man’s birthday, Harry wasn’t sure. But he knew it was important to him.

“I normally order the things I use at my office from a local arts supply shop. But I guess they wouldn’t know how to deliver to Hogwarts, or what to do with Galleons.” She smiled gently, inviting Harry to share in the joke. “I don’t know where to get such things in the magical world. But you can ask your friends. Miss Granger has muggle parents?” Harry nodded. “They could get you what you need and send it here. Maybe one of those with magical parents know, or can find out, where to get these things in Diagon Alley? I’m sure Lord Slytherin would be happy to get for you whatever you wish.”

Nodding slowly Harry had to agree. All evidence pointed towards that outcome if he asked Marvolo. The man was happy to buy things for Harry – with the money of the Potter vaults the man was managing at the moment – but why he did so was unclear. Harry felt it was more likely to be out of some kind of need to present a certain image, than because the man wanted to make Harry happy. “He probably would. But I don’t want him to know, yet. You asked what I was going to give Marvolo for Christmas. I thought a book was good. But his birthday is coming up as well, and I want to paint something for him. If he's the one to get those supplies for me… I guess I want it to be a real surprise?”

Mrs. Goyle nodded thoughtfully. “Asking your friends is the best bet then, I would guess. If that doesn’t work out, you can send me an owl and I'll get you what you need and bring it with me the next time we meet.”

“Thank you. I might do that.” Harry hoped Hermione or maybe Theo could help. Because he already was on a tight schedule as it was. To have to wait for the next therapy session would be cutting it too close.

“How have you been?” Mrs. Goyle started on the therapy session with one of her usual questions. Causing Harry to take up his cup of tea – now considerately colder – to have something to do with his hands.

“Quite well, I would say.” Harry took a sip from his tea, looking everywhere but at the woman sitting opposite from him. “Classes are going well. Maybe with the exception of Defence. The Professor and his insistence on only preventing violence, and that using violence ourselves is not the way to go is, frankly, frustrating.” Carefully taking a sip, Harry thought about the reason for his frustration with Professor Slinkhard. “Or maybe it’s simply the fact that what we learn in his class doesn’t prepare us for the OWLs next spring. And that in turn annoys Hermione, causing her to be annoying herself.” His friend’s constant harping about their need to self-study was getting on his nerves. The fact that Ron was really getting ticked off faster and faster when they were trying to study together, wasn’t helping in any way, either.

Harry felt a small smile on his lips. He knew exactly what she was doing there: Showing him what good he was already doing to improve the situation. He wasn’t helpless, he already was doing something to learn what he needed to know.

“It is. I’m already planning the next meetings, and the first one after the holidays. I plan to let the club members practice how to incapacitate someone without really harming them.” Planning those meetings was fun. And explaining how to cast a spell to others, working one on one, was fun too.

“So what is it that’s occupying your mind? I see clearly that there’s something bothering you.” Mrs. Goyle was truly a perceptive woman. She always saw more than one would think. Maybe it was a common skill among psychiatrists. It sounded plausible.

For a moment Harry was unsure where to begin. And as always Mrs. Goyle only sat there, drinking her tea, not putting any pressure on Harry to answer quickly. So Harry took his time to plan out how he wanted to explain his problem. Or rather the problem which had bothered him the whole time since it had happened.

“I guess you know about werewolves?” She nodded, “One of my parents’ best friends is a werewolf. He’s a nice guy, and my history tutor. This Tuesday was the full moon, and a few rough werewolves attacked a party. It caused quite a backlash for Marvolo’s attempts to replace some of the more absurd laws regarding werewolves.” A quick glance made sure Mrs. Goyle was still following along, and Harry took a deep breath to steel himself for the hard part. “A few days later one of the first-years said it would be better to just get all werewolves rounded up and killed. I simply lost it. Grabbed the kid by his collar, almost shaking him. I managed to not hurt the boy, but it was a close call.” Harry was unsettled by the shakiness of his own voice. The telling of the story brought back the feeling of nausea and revulsion he had felt every time he had contemplated that situation after the fact.

“Oh course it’s wrong! You can’t just kill someone because he might pose a danger. We would have to kill every witch and wizard. Every human for that matter! Each of us can harm and kill. With our bare hands, a chair, a wand! Just because we can, Doesn’t mean we will!” Harry was panting a little, and felt himself flush – probably a brilliant red – the moment he realized that his Gryffindor heart had taken control of his mouth.

“So you were defending the principles of most modern states, and human rights. What about your reaction unsettles you so?” She was really good at formulating leading questions, making Harry think about why he reacted a certain way, why he made some decisions, or was unhappy in certain situations. It was disconcerting. Even now that he noticed, he had no way to resist her attempts to make him understand. Or maybe he just didn’t want to resist. She was doing it to help him, after all.

Again Harry took his time, filling his cup with new tea, adding sugar and milk with deliberate movements, before he answered. “The violence. I behaved like a bully. I don’t like bullies.” There, that was the truth without saying too much of the things he would rather forget.

“How do you define bully?” She took one of the few small cakes sitting right next to the teapot, giving Harry the time to formulate his answer.

Every time the word bully came up, Harry’s first thought went to his cousin and uncle. Dudley and Vernon Dursley were the epitome of bullies. Right after that, Luna’s situation came to mind, followed by McLaggen and his friends. “A bully… a bully is someone picking on someone smaller, or just weaker. Taking things away, hurting, with fists and words. And all only because they can and have fun doing so. Putting others down to feel strong.”

Silence fell over the room. Mrs. Goyle had an expectant expression on her face, clearly waiting for Harry to realise something. And Harry had indeed realized something. The moment she had him define what a bully was, he knew that he might have been violent, but it didn’t really fit what a bully would do. “You say I’m not a bully for reacting the way I did?”

“That is exactly what I’m saying. Your reaction wasn’t ideal, but you’re human, Harry. And humans make mistakes. But you didn’t do it to have fun, did you?”

Harry shook his head. “No.”

“And you didn’t do it to make the other feel small and helpless, did you?”
“No.” He clutched his cup, the heat seeping through the china into his hands. He hadn’t done it with any of that on his mind. His own violence had scared him.

“We can discuss ways for you to handle such a situation better, should something like this come up again. But you are not a bully just because you defended the rights of others, spoke out against bigotry. That was a brave thing to do.”

The rest of their time they discussed ways Harry could defend the rights of werewolves against bigots without resorting to violence. Harry felt reminded of his actual defence lessons, but better prepared nonetheless. Now he had an array of arguments ready to confront anyone daring to question the rights of werewolves in front of him again.

With his mind eased and a plan of action regarding the supplies he would need for Marvolo’s birthday present, Harry left the infirmary, running into Luna who was skipping from stone to stone in the corridor, making her slow way towards the stairs down into the entrance hall.

She turned – earrings looking somewhat similar to Brussels sprouts swinging with the motion – and gave him a happy smile in return. “Hello, Harry. You look better than during breakfast. All the Nargles are gone now. Want to come down to the greenhouses with me?” After so much time studying with Luna for Runes, Harry had no problem following her quirky and abrupt changes in topic. He just smiled more. It was nice to speak with someone who seemed to be able to ignore the opinions of others and be only true to themselves. If they had been in primary school together, she probably never would have let herself be scared away by Dudley, as so many others had.

“I wanted to ask Hermione something. But when I’m finished with that, I guess taking a walk outside, and having a look at the plants in the greenhouse, would be a nice thing to do.” Her smile was radiant and she turned to skip alongside Harry on the way to the library.

He would ask Hermione about art supplies and if her parents would be willing to help him get what he needed, then he would have a nice time with Luna walking around outside, enjoying the clear air and the warmth of the greenhouses.

Some days were good. Even when most of his life still was in turmoil while he searched for a place and a way to deal with his complicated family situation. There were good times.

oooOOooo

Near the end of the first term they always had another staff meeting to speak about their students, those that had problems with their classes, those that caused nothing but trouble, and those that were doing exceptionally well.

Severus was sulking in his corner, holding onto a strong cup of coffee sweetened with honey. Pomona and Filius were talking animatedly over by the window, the others were leafing through their parchments with notes on the students, while Minerva herself sat on her chair waiting for the Headmaster to finally grace them with his presence.

Since the start of the school year, her old friend had had less and less time for school affairs, leaving more of the work to her, cutting into her already short supply of free time.
With a sigh, Minerva waved her wand and let the plate of biscuits float over to her, so she could take a few and place them on the saucer next to her cup of tea. The smell was divine, so Minerva leaned back in her chair, stretching her legs, using the time to relax and contemplate which of her favourite books she would read this evening.

It was almost half an hour after the scheduled starting time of their meeting, when the Headmaster finally arrived.

Minerva felt vexed. She could have finished a lot of the paperwork waiting for her on the desk back in her office. The others seemed to share her sentiments. Filius even had called for one of the house-elves and had her bring a stack of essays from his office to grade. Severus had sat quietly in his chair – possibly meditating – and now had his unreadable mask back in place. But she knew him well and was sure that her younger colleague was simmering inside, wishing he could have spent this time with his new wife, or at least with something productive.

“You haven’t waited for me to begin, surely?” blue eyes peered at them over the rim of the old man’s half moon glasses. The Headmaster stood in the door to the staff room. “Minerva, you could have started the meeting without me.” Something bristled inside of Minerva at his chiding tone. She wasn’t a little girl. Hadn’t been a girl in a long time. Why was Albus insisting on making everyone aware that he was older?

“You should have sent a message that you would be late, Albus. You’re normally here early and insist on being a part of this meeting. We thought waiting would be best.”

With calm, even strides the Headmaster walked to his chair, sitting down with a flourish of his robes – which were an intense dark red – waving for them to start. So Minerva did. “Let’s start with our new first-years. Have any of you noticed one of them struggling?”

She looked over at Filius who – as was almost traditional by now – started with the new Ravens he felt had trouble adjusting to boarding school. The others chimed in with their own observations and ideas, working around the table from one Head of house to the next, letting each professor add to the discussion.

As usual, the meeting dragged on for several hours. There were many students, and there were many reasons to speak about individual students. From too-challenging lessons to too-easy ones. Minerva was a little surprised that Mr. Slytherin – she still had trouble calling the son of James and Lily that – was doing much better than in past years. His writing was more readable, his work no longer the bare minimum necessary. All of them agreed that he was paying better attention in class and seemed to come to class prepared. In some classes just better prepared. But Severus always had maintained that the boy didn’t do the required reading. He even was doing well in Ancient Runes, despite his late start in the subject.

Minerva had thought being separated from Miss Granger would rather hinder Mr. Slytherin’s performance. But maybe the fact he no longer was a regular player on one of the teams, and that he spent less time with Mr. Weasley – the youngest, to be precise – was counterbalancing the loss of Miss Granger’s encouragement to study.

“Before you all leave again,” Poppy spoke up over the rising din, once they had finished with their discussion, “I want to remind you that it’s time for the yearly health checks the school provides and demands of its staff. As not one of you has reacted to my politely worded invitation to come by the infirmary to get it done and out of the way, I will now inform you that I have set up a schedule to conduct the exams over the next week.” The medi-witch looked around the room with steel in her eyes, and Minerva felt that a student witnessing this would have laughed so hard they would have been rolling around on the floor. Not one of the professors liked to get prodded, so they all avoided the yearly check up as long as they could manage. And now – being caught out – they very much looked like a bunch of unruly children.

Severus was about to protest, but the resolute woman cut him off. “There will be no excuses, no forged reports from other medi-wizards or -witches, nor any healers. I will be the one to administer the exam. Don’t be so shy about it. And I’m sure our Headmaster will be more than willing to lead by example and be the first right on Monday evening.” There was murmured agreement, but it didn’t sound all that enthusiastic.

“Sheadmaster, I want to inform you all that I will be away from the school on Monday due to some family matters,” Severus said into the starting noise of them all getting ready to leave.

“A weekday, my boy?” the Headmaster asked, bushy brows climbing up his forehead. “You can’t leave your classes alone the whole day. And isn’t this a little short notice?” There was it again, the chiding tone and the demeaning address.

Minerva was about to interject, when Severus spoke up. “There is a rule in place that enables a professor to take time off to deal with family matters if she or he provides a replacement for the missed lessons. Sonja agreed to teach the classes on Monday. General ways to judge the freshness of ingredients, how to avoid cross-contamination, and so on. It perfectly supplements the Potions curriculum. I don’t foresee any problems.”

Minerva nodded her head in appreciation. That rule was indeed on the books. In fact, back under Headmaster Dippet, and many of his predecessors, it had been used to bring in some different speakers for the classes and give the professors some much-needed free time to keep up with new developments in their fields.

The use of this rule had declined under Albus’ tenure. But Minerva wasn’t sure why that was.

“Thank you, my boy, that sounds like a good idea. I hope the family matters you have to attend to aren’t something dire.”

Because she had much to do – and dearly needed a bathroom break – Minerva left in the direction of her own quarters. There was a stack of fifth-year essays waiting for her. And as usual, Miss Granger had easily written double the length required. Maybe she should try once again to get the girl to stick to the requested length. She surely would earn a good bottle of scotch from all of the girl’s professors for that feat.

With a small smile on her lips, Minerva hurried from the staff room up the stairs to her quarters.

Sunday, 10th of December

Bill was a little apprehensive about the meeting he was about to attend. The talk with his father had helped a little to clear things up. But in the end he had to live with his decision. And he had decided to help Lord Slytherin in his quest to repair his soul, in the hope that it would be better for Harry in the end, if the man who had adopted him was more human.
But before he could go to the goblins to ask for permission to relay details of the ritual used to move a horcrux from a container they wanted to keep into something they didn’t mind destroying, he needed more information from the man himself. Like what he already had tried, how many times he had split his soul, and other things like that.

They had arranged their meeting in this restaurant in muggle London by owl, and now Bill sat here in his only muggle suit, waiting for the other to arrive. It was a little surreal to meet with a man who had been called a Dark Lord – and most likely still was one – with a bad attitude towards the non-magical in a non-magical place.

And what a strange place it was. It was a small cozy place that reminded Bill strongly of Madam Puddifoot’s. All small doilies, plush couches, flower patterns, and sweet smells. One might expect old ladies or lovesick teenagers in a place like this. But Bill watched with bemusement as young men and women in clothes fit for a fancy bank, or in things that looked as if they had been purchased at random from a second-hand shop, came in, sat down, smoked and ate.

One thing was sure, his presence here wouldn’t be memorable. Even if he had dressed in the way some wizards did – those that had lost touch with the muggle world, or never had any understanding of it in the first place – he wouldn’t have stuck out among the people who seemed to be regular patrons of the tea shop.

Sipping on his strong coffee, Bill had to concede that the drinks and probably the food were good. Just before he had finished his first cup, the small bell on the door sounded another arrival. This time it was a man in an expensive suit with a serious expression, not the giddy anticipation some of the others had shown when they had arrived.

Bill instantly noticed that this was the man he had waited for. The way he held himself, the way his eyes searched the room for hidden threats, the way one arm and hand were held, ready to let a wand fall from a holster strapped to one forearm, were all obvious tells. Working for Gringotts in Egypt had schooled his eye for possibly dangerous people. More than once shady wizards had tried to lay claim to what they had found in the tombs. And a few groups had tried to protect their national heritage against the goblins and the wizards working for them. Bill always had tried to keep away from that tangle of issues. He was there for the adventure, not to discuss if some government of the past had had the right to make a contract with the goblins regarding the historical sites they were now systematically raiding, or if those contracts were even worth the parchment they were written on.

Bill debated for a moment whether he should stand to greet the older and more powerful wizard, but before he could come to a decision Lord Slytherin had already spotted him on his slightly saggy blue settee and had made his way over to him, nodding in greeting and sliding onto a pale – probably faded in sunlight – green armchair on the other side of the small table.

“Mr. Weasley, I’m grateful for your willingness to meet with me.” The man placed a leather portfolio on the table between them. “I brought some notes of what I have been working on. I guess another point of view and a second opinion might help me get it to work properly.”

Bill reached across the table for the leather-encased parchments, waiting for a protest or something like that, but Lord Slytherin just let Bill take the portfolio and turned to the young woman with blonde hair done up in some elaborate braid to give his own order – sweet hot chocolate and a piece of fruit bread with cream – before turning back.

them crossed out, others circled. There were snippets of ritual phrases, rough sketches of runic circles, and lists of herbs, stones, and other objects often used in cleansing rituals.

Bill's brows rose high on his forehead, vanishing into his hairline. This looked a lot like notes on the creation of a powerful and dangerous ritual. And the creation was further along than he had thought it would be. The redhead swallowed before he let his eyes rise from the parchment now placed in his lap. “These are your notes on the ritual you hinted at… Lord Slytherin?” There was a slight tremble in his voice, and Bill silently cursed himself for this show of anxiety. He wanted to appear strong, but he didn’t know enough about the man sitting just out of arm's reach to be comfortable with the situation.

“Yes. Those are my notes. Well, I tossed out everything that wasn’t legible, and sorted them a little better. I don't think there's anything missing. What do you make of it? Do you see problems, missing parts?” There was a tension in the other man Bill hadn’t anticipated seeing. Lords generally had masks able to hide everything. Or so he had thought. Maybe if it was important enough, those masks became less impenetrable. Or maybe the so-young-looking man was playing him and showing tension on purpose. There never was a way to know for sure.

The young waitress interrupted their discussion, so Bill waited until she had placed the plate and cup before Lord Slytherin, before he answered the question. “What I gather from the notes, you have two different attempts to create an extraction sequence, and only one to settle the… piece into a new container, binding it. I’m not sure I see where the difference between the two extraction sequences is, but on first glance they look like they should work. There are a few runes I don't recognize in the containment circle. Why have you chosen to combine them with the old hieratic symbols? What purpose do they serve?” Working with the goblins didn’t normally involve a lot of inventing new rituals. There was a set number of rituals the Ministry approved of – which was by no stretch of the imagination a large one – and only a handful more the goblins did use anyway. And most of those were in some way related to matters of inheritance and adoptions, and a few ways to clean objects of dark magic. So this opportunity to see the development of a new ritual was exciting. Even if it was just the re-invention of something that might already exist somewhere in some goblin heads, it was the most captivating thing Bill had encountered since that curse in one of the tombs he had worked on which duplicated body parts from anything that touched the cursed object.

Quickly swallowing a piece of his fruit bread, Marvolo nodded. “Those are Babylonian in origin. I have seen them in another ritual connected to the subject matter. They are connected especially to the soul and to magic. As far as I understand, they are the best suited to have a stabilizing effect.” With the parchment notes spread between them, a lively discussion started. Bill asked questions and got answers, so he could better understand what the goal behind this ritual was, as well as the reasoning behind the choices made.

It was well over an hour – and several more cups of coffee and tea – later when Bill finally had gathered enough courage to ask the question that had preyed on his mind the whole time since the Headmaster had told them about You-Know-Who’s horcruxes. “So these are to move a piece from a living vessel to an object?” If this was the case then maybe this man really was willing to change his ways.

Lord Slytherin nodded. “You understand that I want to be sure that the living vessel will take no damage. I plan to test it, that’s the reason for the second extraction sequence.” A slender finger pointed to the part of the notes containing that information.

“How did it even happen that a living… vessel was created at all?” Bill had been a moment from saying living thing, but as he had to remind himself, that thing actually was Harry, and not a thing at all. So vessel was the most vague and still respectful term he could come up with.

“I certainly didn’t plan on it. But I went there prepared to create one that night. When everything went… wrong, it must have happened by accident. Not that I had thought something like that at all possible. But the information I worked with, and still do, was spotty at best. Even contradictory in some aspects. It seems logical to assume that without all the information, there were things that I missed. Like the severe side effects.” He sounded calm and collected, but his eyes were entirely too unmoving, his arms held too rigid, to make that believable.

Maybe talking about a night he almost died was the reason for that. Bill decided to change the topic quickly. Or he tried to. “You actually have something to practice with? I know that there were two already… rendered ineffective. Then there’s the one in the living vessel. And then there’s one more?” Two already destroyed, one in Harry, one to practice with. That made four horcruxes. Four murders to rip apart the soul. Suddenly Bill was glad he had decided not to get anything to eat.

“I have more than one try to make the ritual work,” Lord Slytherin stated with a deathly smirk. “Discussing this with you helped a lot already. Now to the other problem I’m working on. It seems I’m not in a position to re-integrate the pieces through the only way that has been documented. Whether it is because there is still so much missing, or because of other… damage, I still want to stitch them back together. I haven’t made much progress on that ritual because… well. Will you have a look?” Another, smaller, bunch of parchment was placed on the table and slid over towards Bill.

With his blue eyes wide in surprise, Bill reached forward, cautiously picking up the small bundle. Was this still part of the official story, the disguise? Or was this actually true? Until now the discussion had been pleasant, and pretty much legal. Even if they had spoken about a ritual related to horcruxes – the darkest magic Bill had encountered until now – a Ministry employee would have classed what they had talked about as grey at most. Or would if the context wasn’t known.

Bill grimaced. Well, maybe the magic had been darker than the general public was comfortable with, but the discussion hadn’t strayed from what the curse-breakers regularly discussed over a good meal. “Why ask me for… assistance? There must be other curse-breakers. People you have worked with in the past?” And it was a conundrum. Why would Lord Slytherin chose to consult a curse-breaker who was close to Dumbledore and not one affiliated with the Dark? It didn’t look like a well-reasoned decision.

A levelled look was aimed at Bill, making him want to squirm in his seat. “The old Headmaster had already told the lot of you. Or so I learned. Those other curse-breakers you speak about don’t know the specifics. And I would rather not increase the number of people... in the know. All I've heard about you suggested that you are skilled at your chosen profession. And the rumours have been proven true.” Those words sent chills over Bill’s back. How did the man know that the Headmaster had told them about the horcruxes? Had one of those disagreeing with the Headmaster talked? Was Snape a true spy for Lord Slytherin? There always had been rumours the man was a Leglimens. Maybe he had picked the information from one of their Aurors or Dodge, during one of the Wizengamot meetings?

“I'll have to read these notes carefully.” Bill held up the small package. “I think you're on track with the ritual to move the pieces. For the other, I can ask around if you want me to. I won't promise anything, but it might be worth a shot?”

Lord Slytherin nodded. And then started to ask a barrage of questions of his own. From the best time in the moon phases, or even the year, to perform the ritual he was designing, to the requirements of a ritual room to do it in. He had never been to a ritual room at the bank – or so he claimed – and was curious what the goblins deemed the most suitable environment to perform rituals in.

When Bill finally was on his way home, he felt even more conflicted. It had been a truly interesting afternoon. He seldom had the opportunity to talk so freely about a topic he was interested in, or had so well-versed a conversation partner. Even the Master he was currently working under hadn’t that much insight and knowledge. If the man hadn’t been a dark wizard bent on murdering everyone opposed to him in a not-so-far-away previous life, he would have made a good – dare he even think it? – friend.

Well, if what he had seen today was really the truth, there might be hope for the man. And if that came to pass, there might be a possible friendship there. No reason to condemn Lord Slytherin from the start. But enough reason to stay wary around him.

Monday, 11th of December

Sonja watched with a barely suppressed smile as Severus paced in their bedroom, already halfway dressed in his new fancy Wizengamot clothes. He made an impressive figure in the tailored trousers, highly polished ankle-high boots, silken shirt with silver cuff-links, and a waistcoat almost entirely covered with embroidery of a deep black. “Calm down, Severus. This isn’t like you at all. I never have seen you this ruffled.”

It was clear she hadn’t managed to banish the amusement from her voice, when dark eyes levelled a quelling look at her. “Well, I’ll have to keep up appearances once I leave our rooms. I had hoped that I could keep my walls down in our rooms, at least.”

Truly chastised, Sonja stood up from their bed, cravat in hand, and took the few steps over to her husband. She gave him a gentle kiss, and felt his rigid posture ease a little. “You’re right, my love. Please accept my apology.” It was so easy to forget that he was just human like everyone else, the way he normally had such an iron grip on his emotions. Sonja guessed that he only had started showing his happy emotions to her, while he still kept them hidden when he wasn’t around her.

She started to bind the cravat at his throat, when he smiled down at her. “Will you be all right with my dunderheaded students? The Slytherin-Gryffindor fifth-year class was always an exceptionally volatile one.”

Sonja raised one eyebrow to his devilish smirk. “There will be no flames and cauldrons, and you know I made sure that the examples I will give them can’t react adversely with each other. As long as no one actively tries to cause trouble, there is no danger.” She started to giggle the moment he snorted.

“I wouldn’t bet a knut on that. I’m just glad that the NEWT class with the Devil Twins has no Potions today.” He took the robe from a hanger, and slipped his arms into the sleeves. Sonja hurried to help him do up the lacing at the wrists, which made sure that the sleeves would lay snugly around the underarms. Trailing her fingers back down towards his hands, Sonja smiled up at her husband after she had finished doing up the laces.

“Let me braid your hair back, Severus. I think it would look really good out of your face.” She had suggested it more than once already, and she hadn’t much faith he would go with it now, but she was determined to get him to at least try it once, before she would stop pestering him about it.

So his eye-roll didn’t come unexpected and only made her smile. “You don’t want me to? Oh well, then your everyday handsomeness will have to be enough.” That made him laugh, lighting up his whole face in a way Sonja absolutely loved. He looked so much younger when he smiled or laughed.

Only a short while later they left their quarters, walking side by side, happily chatting about Sonja’s plans for today’s classes. A kiss in front of the Great Hall – ignoring the silent and curious stares of the students walking by – was their goodbye. “Good luck, my love,” Severus murmured next to her ear.

“Good luck to you too, Severus. I have a feeling you’ll need more of it than I today.”

They parted ways and ignored the not-so-coveret glances thrown their way. It seemed that it would take some time until the newness of Professor Snape's being married lost its fascination for the students.

A walk over the grounds – and a short hunt for some mice at the edge of the forest – had been exactly what Minerva had needed on this frosty and dark Monday morning. Now she was on her way back to the school for a nice strong cup of tea and some porridge with almonds and honey for breakfast.

On the path up to the school – or down to the gates, depending on one's perspective – Minerva spotted Severus in a long, billowing cloak over what looked like formal, and expensive, robes. “Severus!” she called to get the younger professor’s attention.

Only a few moments later they met on the gravel way and stopped walking at the same time.

“Good morning, Minerva. Out for an early stroll?” Severus was his normal polite, distant self, making her smile. Despite the fact he had found love, and had married, her young colleague hadn’t changed all that much.

“After a night mostly spent grading homework, I needed a little fresh air to wake up today. You’re up early. I hope your family affairs aren’t anything dire?” There weren’t many occasions calling for formal robes that could be called a family affair. Listening to Severus reassuring her that it wasn’t anything concerning, Minerva suddenly recalled that today was the date of the normal December Wizengamot session.

“You’re going to London!?” Her exclamation cut Severus short and sounded more like a question than like the statement it should have been. Severus was going to claim the Prince seat on the Wizengamot. A bright smile broke the stern face of the Transfiguration Mistress. Despite the fact that Severus neither had confirmed nor denied her assumption, Minerva continued to enthusiastically ramble on. “Your mother always was a bright, politically interested young woman. Or at least she was during her time at school. She would be so proud to know that you are about to take up the mantle of Lord Prince. Good luck!”

Now she had to hurry to get breakfast without wolfing the food down like so many of the teenagers were prone to do. But now she would have a much better day than she would have without meeting the Potions Master. Her heart would be lighter, knowing that he'd finally made a place for himself in the world. It seemed finding the young woman had given Severus new motivation to make something out of himself and his life. She wholeheartedly agreed.
A little bemused by the other’s behaviour, Severus started to walk again after Minerva had resumed her walk up to the castle. It had been some time since he had seen her so outside her normal controlled and stern exterior. The last time it had been concern for him – after his long stay in the Dark Lord’s company – that had broken her normal front.

But now he had an appointment to keep and new information to ponder. Once he had been old enough to understand and remember, there hadn’t been anything left of the young, spirited, politically interested young woman Minerva seemed to remember. Marrying against her parents’ wishes had certainly changed Eileen’s life for the worst. If the letters were to be believed, only her pride had caused her not to seek help with her parents when poverty and her drunk of a husband had caused them to live in misery. Aware that dwelling on the past and possible what if scenarios wouldn’t do him any good, Severus steered his thoughts towards the Wizengamot session and what he would have to do to claim the title and seat of Lord Prince. The explanations he had found in the manor he had acquired had helped him prepare, but a small part of him – hidden in the darkest recesses of his mind – waited to be ridiculed by the Lords who had been sitting there for years, and had been brought up steeped in the traditions of high society. Despite his achievements in Potions and his proficiency in duelling and the mind arts, he still doubted others would pay him the respect due a Lord.

It didn’t take long for him to reach the border of the Hogwarts grounds, walking through the gates with his head held high, where he concentrated on his destination and spun on his heel. The next thing he saw was the front of Griffin House, where his Lord was waiting for him.

With a deep breath Severus took the last few steps towards the door, and raised his hand to knock. Moments later the door opened and a high-pitched voice from the height of Severus’ knees greeted him. “Welcome, Master Potions Master. Master Slytherin is waiting in the office. Please follow Flimm, Master Potions Master.”

And so Severus did. It still felt surreal that this house, in the possession of the Potter family – one he always had associated with strong feelings about what was dark and should be banned – for several generations, was where the Dark Lord lived. Severus guessed that he had to keep up appearances, but the house the meetings were held in just fit his expectations of where a Dark Lord should live much better than this cheerful house.

The walk was a short one, ending in a small breakfast room, where Lord Slytherin just seemed to have finished his breakfast, tossing his napkin down on the table, right next to an empty bowl.

“Good morning, Severus.”

Red eyes swept up and down over Severus, taking in his appearance. “The robes are good. You make a striking figure. Which is more important than it should be, if one wants to make any progress at all.” The shake of the head accompanying this proclamation moved the slightly wavy hair, making Severus recall all the effort he had invested into getting the Dark Lord back into a human body. It was certainly something he could be proud of. Sadly, there was little chance for him to ever publish his findings in this particular project. At least it didn’t look likely at the moment.

Lord Slytherin walked out of the room, Severus following him out into the entrance hall, where an elf was already waiting with a flowing dark green cloak of heavy fabric. “Let’s go to the Ministry now. It’s a little early, but it would be best if we inform Cornelius beforehand. He’s easier to handle if you drop him some seemingly important information now and again.” A sardonic smirk was turned in Severus’ direction. “I think you should have enough experience in pandering influential figures with what they want to hear, don’t you think?”

Swallowing to get rid of the sudden lump in his throat, Severus nodded. “I guess that being Head of Slytherin House has provided me with ample opportunities to practice speaking in meandering lines around the truth.”

To Severus’ secret relief – and more than a little puzzlement – the only response to that was an amused little chuckle.

Apparating again – this time with the big atrium of the Ministry as his goal – Severus followed Lord Slytherin into a situation he never had faced before. At the moment, teaching a group of Slytherin and Gryffindor first-years how to brew a pepper-up potion looked more appealing than facing the bigoted Lords and Ministry lackeys in the Wizengamot. Why was he doing this again?

Accepting his wand back from the security wizard in the atrium, Severus turned when he and Lord Slytherin were greeted from behind. “Lord Slytherin. Severus! You’re early.”

“And so are you, Lucius. Is there something on the agenda for today that I have missed?” Lord Slytherin answered while Severus only gave a nod in greeting. As usual, Lucius was dressed up just to the point of too much, his robes of the finest material available, his hair gleaming in the torchlight of the atrium.

“Not that I’m aware of. The DMLE probably will update us on their progress in the werewolf hunt, and our friend will add a little bit of excitement, but other than that, I fear it will be a boring meeting, just as usual. It is the festival season, after all.” Lucius smiled coldly, gesturing for them all to start moving again, making room for the next group to approach the security desk. Weaving their way through the crowd of wizards and witches going about their business at the Ministry, the three of them exchanged idle pleasantries. Out here in the open there was no knowing who might try to listen in on a conversation.

When they reached the lifts and ventured into the first one coming their way – Severus dodging one of the paper planes darting out of the lift and around a corner – Lucius looked surprised for a moment when Lord Slytherin pressed the button to get them onto the level where the Minister’s office was located. “We’re going to visit Cornelius?” His question sounded innocent enough, but Severus couldn’t help but remember how the Dark Lord would have reacted in the past at being questioned. A lot had changed since the summer.

“There is still time, and Cornelius always has a good tea at hand. We might as well spend the time until the meeting with a little small talk with the Minister,” was Lord Slytherin's answer, a barely noticeable flick of his eyes – now glamoured blue for the public – indicating a Ministry employee standing in the far corner of the lift.

They walked up to the Minister’s office in silence, Severus pulling up his occlumency shields higher to keep up the composure he demanded from himself in public. It was a little ridiculous that he was so nervous about this. He had lied to the Dark Lord, a volatile man and one of the best Legilimens alive today. He routinely had relayed information to both sides of the war, keeping a precarious balance between the two. And now he was nervous because some old, rusty people might sneer down at him because his father had been a muggle.

The current assistant of the Minister – and wasn’t that the latest Weasley to graduate... Percy, if memory served – rose and led them to the Minister’s own door without missing a beat. “Lord Slytherin, Lord Malfoy, Professor Snape. What an honour to have you here. Can I bring you something to drink?” The lanky young man, in respectable but simple robes, opened the door and announced their arrival to the man sitting behind the desk. “Minister, the Lords Slytherin and Malfoy, together with Professor Snape, are here to see you.”

With a short nod the Minister dismissed his assistant. “Thank you, Weasley. Please bring in some fresh tea and make sure we won't be disturbed.” Signing a last piece of parchment with a flourish, then placing the quill on a small tray next to the inkwell, the Minister stood and walked towards their little group with a genial smile, his arms held open in a welcoming gesture.

“Welcome, Marvolo, Lucius. What brings you to my door that early in the morning when we were to see each other anyway, later at the Wizengamot?” An exaggerated wave of his arm ushered them over to the seating arrangements next to a fireplace with a merrily dancing fire inside. Easily the most comfortable place for a chat.

Severus took the opportunity to get a good look at the whole office and found his impression of the Minister of Magic Cornelius Fudge confirmed. The man was an idiot focused on the material things in life. The number of gem-encrusted artefacts, silk cushions, and rare woods used in the furniture left no room for any other interpretation.

Reluctantly Severus took a seat between his Lord and Lucius, opposite the armchair the Minister was settling down in. It was softer than Severus preferred and forced him to look at a painting behind the Minister which was much too bright to be placed anywhere where it could be seen. In the next moment the door opened again, admitting the young Weasley who was levitating a tray with the different objects needed to make a decent cup of tea.

It didn’t take long until they each had a tea to their liking before them and the Minister leaned back in his seat, his eyes intently focused on Lord Slytherin. “Now tell, Marvolo. What have you planned? More information on the werewolves? I have it on good authority that the Aurors have managed to apprehend a few, following your directions to their hideout spots.” The Minister was gleeful with anticipation, and Severus felt himself reminded unpleasantly of a few of the more troublesome students he had had to deal with over his tenure.

Stirring his tea with far too much sugar – three spoonful in that tiny cup! – the Dark Lord smiled. “No, I have no more information on the werewolves. Lucius and I have escorted Severus here today so he can claim his seat on the Wizengamot.”

Gleaming eyes, much to reminiscent of goblins sensing the opportunity of a good deal, turned to Severus who inclined his head towards the Minister, before he took a sip from his tea.

“No, I have no more information on the werewolves. Lucius and I have escorted Severus here today so he can claim his seat on the Wizengamot.”

Gleaming eyes, much to reminiscent of goblins sensing the opportunity of a good deal, turned to Severus who inclined his head towards the Minister, before he took a sip from his tea.

“Indeed. My mother was the only daughter of the last Lord Prince. My grandparents left me in the position as heir despite the rift between my mother and them. Now that my wife and I are married, we decided it was time to pick up the mantle that has been left neglected for so long.” Sonja and Severus had decided to make sure everyone knew they were making important decisions together. They hoped this way of going about things would help deter all those people likely to pity Severus for picking a Squib as his wife, or assume he had been swindled. People were only too willing to assume the worst of women seemingly marrying over their own station in life.
The Minister’s eyes flicked down to Severus’ hand where his wedding band sat, before smiling brightly at Severus. “Let me congratulate you on your marriage, Lord Prince. There is still hope we won’t die of boredom during the meeting today.” They all laughed, Severus forcing himself to follow the others’ lead and stopping first.

“I surely hope normal Wizengamot meetings don’t rival teaching the same curriculum year after year?” Severus knew that politics could be tedious, he had listened to enough people involved in it complain over the years, but the manoeuvring was something he was looking forward to. But the way his Lord, Lucius, and now the Minister were acting wasn’t all that reassuring.

Only with long practice did Severus manage not to stare incredulously at the Minister when he started chuckling. “No, no. Don’t fear. Some aspects are quite thrilling, but there are some aspects of our work that can get tedious with time. I guess alternating between teaching our children and your duties as Lord will keep the boredom at bay.”

After that Severus mostly kept listening to the banter and chatter between the other three men. “How are your investments working out, Marvolo? I remember you planning to invest in a German broom company?” The conversation turned over to estate management, investments, and how Lord Slytherin was working on gathering a fortune independent from the Potter money. For a brief moment Severus wondered how Potter felt about the fact that the man who had murdered his parents was now living off their money and wealth. Considering all the circumstances, the brat was doing rather well. Severus certainly never would be happy to associate with Potter’s son, but since this summer the boy had ceased to be such a pain in the ass. Protecting him had become easier, now that the Dark Lord had the same goal as Severus.

They spent the time until the meeting talking about Lord Slytherin's progress in his endeavours to accumulate wealth. It seemed as if Lucius had lent money to the effort as a sort of starting capital. Parts of the earnings were used to pay that initial loan back to Lucius. Most of the talk went over Severus’ head, but he listened with some effort to learn and understand. He had an estate to manage, and, while he knew how to handle his own earnings, the level of understanding needed to manage a big estate and heaps of money still evaded him. Maybe Lucius would be willing to help in exchange for some help for Draco to get a Potions Mastery.

They continued their discussion on the way down to the Wizengamot chamber.

ooOoo

Sirius stood next to Augusta Longbottom, talking about the upcoming events they were both invited to, when a murmur went through the number of already assembled Lords and Ladies. The Minister had just entered the chamber – of course, wearing his plum-coloured robes – accompanied by Lord Slytherin – the bastard – Lord Malfoy – the smug idiot – and Snivellus. What was Snivellus doing here?

“What’s Snape doing here?” With confusion clear in his eyes, Sirius turned back to Augusta as if she had the answer to the question of the day.

“I don’t know, Sirius. But seeing as the Minister is now here, let’s get over to our seats. The meeting is about to start.” Augusta seemed unconcerned, smoothed down her robes with the Longbottom crest, and walked over to her cherry wood bench. For some reason Sirius hadn’t bothered to learn, she was sitting on the bench itself and not a stool, as was customary for a regent.
Maybe it had something to do with the fact she was also Regent for the Noble House of Potter? Pondering the number of rules, customs, and traditions he still hadn’t managed to get into his head, Sirius walked over to his own bench among the others of the Most Noble and Ancient Houses.

Before he sat down he got out his wand to cast an extra strong cushioning charm on the bench. That thing tended to get uncomfortable pretty quickly once he had to sit there over half an hour. And as he had already learned in the short time he had been Lord Black, when there was a stranger brought to a meeting by one of the members, there would be something unusual happening. And that always ended with long-winded speeches and much longer meetings than he was happy with.

Sitting down on the blessedly soft surface, Sirius spread his robes out so as to avoid creating too many wrinkles. The last time he had brought them back with a lot of creases, the look his house-elf had thrown him had looked like it should be able to kill. He really preferred to sleep soundly, without fearing the revenge of an elf for disrespecting his clothing.

Thankfully the others quickly found their seats, Malfoy on his bench held up by peacocks, a perfect choice in Sirius’ opinion, while Slytherin sat down on the bench with the silver snakes. Snape stayed at the front near the dais where the Chief Warlock and the Ministry Official were sitting. He took a seat on the petitioner's bench, and again Sirius asked himself what reason the greasy git had to be here on a school day.

Maybe he was here as an expert for the Wolfsbane Potion? It would fit the whole werewolf debacle.

The Chief Warlock stood and signalled for the meeting to start. “Welcome to the December meeting of 1995. Our agenda today will be as follows.” Sirius tuned him out. Like all the others, he had received a small scroll with the agenda, together with the invitation to the meeting. It was customary to send those invitations, and Sirius suspected that this was the case because some Lords and Ladies tended to forget to come to attend the meetings.

“Thank you, Chief Warlock.” The moment Fudge started to speak, Sirius returned his attention to the present. This was the most important part of the meeting. Information from the Minister on what was happening in the Ministry. “I’m happy to inform this august body about the success of our Auror corps in apprehending some of the werewolves involved in the attack on the Bones residence.” The small man waved a hand in direction of Lord Slytherin. “This was possible because Lord Slytherin provided us with information on past hiding places of the werewolf Fenrir and his associates. Many of those places seem to be abandoned, but one small cave was in use when two Aurors checked it.” Calls from various places within the hall interrupted the Minister, who waited with an air of impatience until everyone had calmed down and taken a seat again.

“The apprehended suspects are currently being interrogated by the Aurors. They are confident that the captives will help them find the rest of the attackers.” Another excited murmur swept through the hall, a few people calling to just kill the beasts and get it over with. Sirius snarled silently. Every time someone so casually called for killing werewolves, he was reminded of the danger Remus was in from such bigots.

“If that is all you wanted to inform us of, Minister Fudge?” The small wizard nodded and sat down again, prompting the Chief Warlock to get to the next point in the agenda. “Is there anyone among those present who wishes to add a new point of order to our agenda?”

For a moment Sirius had hope that no one would stand to add something to their long list of boring topics. But then Snape stood and turned to give the Chief Warlock a small bow.

“And you are?” There was not a hint of emotion in the voice of the Chief Warlock as he asked this.
Sirius scoffed. These aristocrats were assholes, the lot of them. Everyone knew about Severus Snape, reformed Death Eater, Dumbledore’s spy, and youngest Potions Master in Britain. Asking after his identity in such a way was just a petty move.

“My name is Severus Tobias Snape, son of Eileen Prince. I’m here to claim my family seat in this hall, as I have rightfully claimed the title of Lord Prince.” If there was one thing that Sirius had to say about Snape that was positive, it had to be the man’s iron control and his backbone. Even when they had been teenagers, it had been clear that Snape wasn’t that easily cowed. That had been one of the reasons why the four of them had picked him as a target for their pranks. He was fun to rile up – he still was – and hadn’t been prone to run to a teacher for help.

Doge stood, a scowl on his face. “Can you give evidence for your claim?” Sirius’ eyebrows rose up. Why was Dumbledore’s friend sounding so hostile? This wasn’t coordinated with the old man to get another of his supporters into the Wizengamot? Steel grey eyes narrowed while fixing the Hogwarts Potion Master with a glare. If Snape hadn’t told Dumbledore what he was up to, did that mean he wasn’t Dumbledore’s man any longer? Was he working for Slytherin again? Or had he chosen to stand on his own two feet?

“As far as I know, there are no more slots for ancestry tests at Gringotts open this year.” There was a smug look on the old face, but Snape didn’t seem fazed by that little fact. It had been a topic of gossip on each get-together Sirius had had to attend, so it wasn’t anything new. Snape wasn’t stupid. He had no sense of humour and didn’t take care of his appearance, but he wasn’t stupid. So Snape had known and probably had a solution.

“Why would I need to get an ancestry test from the goblins?” There was so much condescension in this one question, it was a wonder Doge wasn’t shrinking into his own bench to get away from the fire. “I only need to prove that I was accepted as Lord Prince. Don’t you think? You all know that my claim concerning my mother is true. You all know she was the daughter of Lord Prince. So you know I’m the most eligible for the title. We don’t need to know the whole tree of my ancestry to know that much. So why do you ask for it?” Sirius felt a little odd. He had the urge to cheer his old school nemesis on.

The silence following that loaded question dragged on. Then someone cleared their throat. The Minister stood. “I guess it would suffice if we could check the birth certificate of Professor Snape to check if his mother is stated as Eileen Prince. But I doubt that is really necessary. Or is there someone insisting on this pointless complication?”

Sirius waited with bated breath. It was clear that there were many among the Lords and Ladies who weren’t happy with such an obvious half-blood – not even bearing the name of the family he wanted to claim – taking one of the seats among them. That alone was enough to bring Sirius onto Snape’s side for this meeting. If he could annoy the old rigid hypocrites, he would do so with glee, every single time.

While the Minister searched the chamber for anyone who might object, Sirius watched as one of Arthur’s older sons came into the chamber carrying a leather portfolio, taking the few steps needed to get to where the Minister was standing in front of his seat next to the Chief Warlock.

Not one dared to speak up, so Lord Abbott stood and turned to face Snape.

The old man spoke in a serious tone. “Lord Severus Tobias Prince, why have you come here today?” Sirius recognized the traditional words from his own claiming of the seat. It was a farce that neither he nor Slytherin had had to prove the validity of their claim but they had tried to make Snape prove it. Sirius was sure Lily would have blown her hat if this had happened in her time. Many prejudices were still alive and well. Maybe they could work on breaking some of them. Even if working together with someone like Snape, or Slytherin wasn’t what he really wanted to do. But maybe the goal to make a better world for his godson was worth the hassle.

After the oath had been taken, Snape walked over to the family seat of House Prince, and the boring session went its usual course.

oooo0oooo

This evening the Great Hall got to see an unusual group of students sitting at the Ravenclaw table. Harry and his Gryffindor and Slytherin friends were sitting together there in neutral territory, as Hermione had termed it.

“I certainly can ask my parents to get you the paints, brushes, and so on, that you want to have, Harry. But owl post is slow, so maybe it will be too short a time for you to finish the painting if I write them now.” Hermione filled her plate with various roasted vegetables and added mashed potatoes as well as a slice of roast to her meal.

“What are you even talking about?” Pansy – who had followed Draco over to their place at the Ravenclaw table – asked from her place between an amused Theo and an incredulous Draco. “Why do you want to have paint, Henry?” In fact, almost all the fifth-year Slytherins were sitting at the Ravenclaw table with Harry, and three Gryffindors. Only Neville, Hermione, and Ron had joined them. Several of the older Ravenclaws eyed them with curiosity and confusion. Luna was sitting next to them, smiling serenely.

“Because I want to make a painting, of course. Why else?” What did she think he would be doing with oil-paint other than painting? Sometimes the Slytherin girls confused the heck out of him. Only Daphne was easy to talk to. The fact that the Slytherins from his year all tended to follow him around as they did – like ducklings following their mother sometimes – because he was the heir to Lord Slytherin rankled as well. But many of the Gryffindors had done the same. Only his being the Boy-Who-Lived had been the reason for that.

“Most artists make their paint from scratch,” Millicent suddenly threw in from her place next to Vincent. “They buy or gather the pigments and mix their paints with their own recipes.” Her tone was matter-of-fact, and her attention barely wavered from her plate of assorted pastries.

“How do you know something like that?” Draco asked, clearly sceptical.

Millicent snorted, obviously not impressed with the blond’s disbelief. “I’m interested in art. Not that you have made any attempts to get to know me better. When I was younger I wanted to be an artist. But sadly, I lacked talent, so father made me concentrate on something more suitable. He can’t say anything about my interest in art, so I at least still have that.”

Bringing the discussion back to topic, Hermione suggested another solution. “Maybe I can involve Uncle Xerxes in getting you paints. He could pick up the supplies from my parents and bring them here a lot faster than normal owl post.”

Nodding thoughtfully, chewing on his piece of roast, Harry thought it over. It would be cutting it pretty close if he went with that option. But there was no way he would get the paints and canvas here any sooner. He would have to prepare as much as he could and maybe work on the painting in his break. After all, the present was intended for Marvolo’s birthday and not Christmas. There was a little more time there than if he had wanted to have it finished by Christmas. “I think that’s a great idea.” He smiled, then got his bag out from under the table, searching for a slip of parchment he had prepared. “Here’s a list of the things I need. As soon as you can tell me how much it will be, I’ll give you the money. You can borrow Hedwig to send the list and a letter to your parents.”

They ate in silence for a while, but the moment the plates were cleared and then again filled with different sweet dishes for pudding, Hermione started to speak again. “The Potions class was something extraordinary today. Don’t you agree? I loved all those pointers to gauge the freshness and quality of ingredients. There should be something like this right at the start, in first year.”

Harry smiled fondly, for all that she could be terribly irritating in her quest for knowledge sometimes, her eagerness and how happy she could get over a lesson was amusing, and so typically Hermione. “It was a nice change of pace,” Harry started to formulate his own opinion, when Draco rudely interrupted.

“I don’t know when I’ll ever have to learn this here at school. I would have rather attempted another potion today, then sort through boxes of dried leaves, and slippery frog liver.” The sneer that Harry got to see less and less these days, was prominently displayed on the Slytherin Seeker’s face right now.

But it quickly vanished when Theo asked with false innocence. “I thought you wanted to try for a Mastery in Potions? As far as I know, a Master Potioneer expects their apprentice to already know such basic things.”

They finished their dinner with much laughter and friendly teasing, discussing what they had learned in today’s potions class taught by Professor Snape’s wife.

oooOOooo

At the head table the mood wasn’t as happy as down at the four House tables.

“Albus, I know you have much to do, but I won’t accept your attempts to evade the yearly health check. I have time after dinner is finished, and I expect you to come with me to the infirmary.”
Poppy spoke with confidence, not meeting her old friend’s eyes. She didn’t want to risk his seeing her worry. Since the evening Aberforth had called her via floo, she had been on edge. The Headmaster of Hogwarts affected by a decline in mental health? That was business that could get nasty pretty fast.

“I’m sure one of the others will be free tonight, Poppy. I really have too much to do and can’t spare the time. Over the break I might be able to free an hour up.” His blue eyes twinkled as he leaned over the table, turned so he could look in her direction, a goblet of red wine held in his hand. The aura of grandfatherly friendliness was strong. But one needed more than puppy-dog eyes to get out of her care.

“If you have an appointment with someone, just tell them I insisted. I’m sure they will understand.
I’m infamous for my unrelenting pursuit of those under my care to do as I say. And if it’s only paperwork or the like, it can wait for thirty minutes, for sure.” She let steel creep into her voice.
No errant student nor any of the professors would get out of something needed for their health.
“And I’m sure you don’t want me to drag you up to my office by your ear?” He flushed a little at this reminder of a not-so-well-known incident she had found in his medical files. The matron of Hogwarts had had to drag a first-year Albus to the hospital wing, away from his books, to administer a pepper-up potion.

A long-suffering sigh signalled the defeat of the Headmaster in this matter. And in fact, once they all had finished their meal, he followed her up through the castle without complaint. Once they were inside the infirmary, Poppy waved Albus over to one of the beds behind a curtain. “Sit down. I’ll be with you in a moment.”

She bustled over to her office and the file cabinets she kept there under tight wards. Tapping the required places to unlock the cabinet containing Albus’ file, she opened the drawer and picked up the quite sizeable file kept there about the Headmaster. He was no young man any longer, and this file contained his whole medical history from his time spent at Hogwarts, from the age of eleven, through his whole career as a student, to the time he had been a professor here, and now all the years he had been Headmaster of the school.

When she came back into the main room, Albus was sitting in the bed, swinging his legs, looking quite unconcerned. “I will cast the usual general diagnostic charms, and a few that are added to the normal screening once the patient has reached a certain age. Please sit still for that time, until I’m done.”

She hadn’t bothered with some of these charms in the past. Of course she always checked for cancer, problems with the eyes, and so on, but until now she never had cast the charm used to determine if someone was suffering from the early stages of dementia. It was just so unlikely in wizards that it mostly only ever set in when the individual was really old and near to dying. It was also a common side effect of some magics, but as Albus always had been such a light-oriented wizard, she never even suspected he could suffer from such problems.

But with the curse he had been hit with this summer, that might have changed.

The first few charms created small scrolls showing nothing new. Albus tended to eat too many sweets and didn’t move enough. But his teeth were well, the heart was in good condition, as was the digestive tract. His eyes hadn’t gotten any worse. And then Poppy came to the charm to check the brain functions. The scroll for that wasn’t so promising. She wasn’t an expert on this type of problem – after all dementia was a rather rare condition in magical folk – so she decided then and there that she would consult with an expert on this before she discussed it with Albus and informed the board. Because if the Headmaster was suffering from dementia, she was bound by her oath to the school to inform the board.

“See, this didn’t take all that long, Albus. We’re finished. There are some points I’m not sure about and will discuss with an expert over at St. Mungo’s.” She was interrupted in her attempt to explain when Albus stood from the bed.

“That sounds fine to me, Poppy. If that is all, I will be up in my office. There are some things I need to finish tonight.” And he was out the door before Poppy had managed to regain her composure. With a shake of her head, she gathered the new little scrolls, the medical file, and made her way back to her office. She would need to write a report and include the findings of today’s medical exam as well as Aberforth’s observations. It didn’t take long, and then she was kneeling in front of the fireplace calling the hospital. Hopefully her fears would prove to be baseless.

Back in his room, Harry set his bag down next to his desk, and then walked over to the bed and the side table with its small drawer he stored the mirrors in. As he tended to sit or even lie on the bed when talking on the mirrors, he had moved the mirrors here. It was so much more convenient.

Taking out the mirror Marvolo had given him, Harry sat down, getting rid of his shoes, then scooted back until his back was right up against the headboard, getting comfortable for a call to his guardian.

He didn't have to wait long before Marvolo accepted the call. “Hello, Henry. How was your day?”

Harry smiled a little. It was nice that someone cared enough to ask him about his day. “It was a nice day. Professor Snape’s wife taught the potions class. Defence was as boring as ever. But I had time to spend with my friends. So that helped even the dreadful lesson out.” And spending time with his friends really did help. “And how was your day?” Harry felt good when someone asked about his day. He suspected it would be a nice thing to do to ask in return.

“Long,” Marvolo answered, shifting to sit more comfortably in a wingback chair as far as Harry could see. “Today was the Wizengamot meeting for December, and it dragged on and on. I’m happy that’s finished. And after this call, I want to work more on the ritual to move the pieces between containers.” Marvolo rubbed his hand over his red eyes. He really looked tired.

“Pieces?” At first Harry wasn’t sure what the other was talking about, but then it suddenly hit him. Marvolo was talking about the horcruxes. “So you’re making progress?” That would be good news. If Marvolo managed to create a ritual to move the horcrux safely from one container into another, he might be able to remove the piece from Harry, taking him out of the line of fire from all those that might know about the horcruxes and planned to kill Marvolo.

“Slow progress, but yes, I’m continuously working on it. William Weasley has been so kind as to meet with me to discuss my attempts. He had a few good ideas and pointers. At least for the ritual to move a part. Re-integrating isn’t going as well, I fear. Besides headaches, I have gained nothing from my attempts. I guess I might have to find another approach, or work some more on myself before that will get me anywhere.” Harry was still amazed that Marvolo was willing to discuss such things with him. After all, he wasn’t much more than a kid, and all the other adults who had had responsibility for him before had either not cared at all, or had tried to keep everything that might be troubling or dangerous from him. And the radically different tactic was working. Harry had come to trust that Marvolo would tell him the important things. And that was a first. Not even Sirius had managed to gain that level of trust. He was too easily swayed by Mrs. Weasley, and she certainly was one of those adults convinced that children didn’t have any business with grown-up affairs.

“I hope the ritual will work out. Have you talked about the werewolves and the attack on the Bones party at the meeting today? I wanted to know if the attack will have negative effects.” Harry sounded unsure even to his own ears. He didn’t like it, but he was worried for Remus, he had come to quite like his father’s old friend.

“Dawlish and Shacklebolt managed to apprehend a few of the werewolves at one of the places I told them about. I think we will be able to direct the anger at Fenrir and his people, keeping all the backlash away from the innocent people affected by lycanthropy. So I don’t think that your history tutor will be in any danger.”

Harry nodded, a little relieved.

“Have you asked a girl to accompany you to the Malfoy ball? And maybe to a few of the other events? I know that it’s a little awkward, but both of us will have to have a woman – or a man – to escort to the parties. I’m still debating who to ask. Maybe I just will ask Benjamin or Xerxes…” Marvolo had looked a little lost, but now he shook himself, focusing back on Harry. “So do you know who to ask?”

Harry blushed. “Well, I don’t need to ask anyone. Because I was asked. Daphne – Greengrass, that is – asked me. We had dancing lessons together over the summer. You remember? She wants to get some more attention over this season so it will be easier for her to find someone to marry.” He made a face, getting a short, small chuckle from Marvolo, Harry had real problems with the custom of arranged marriages for political gain. “So we’ll go as friends. I’ll be free from crazy girls trying to catch my attention, and she’ll get the attention she needs.” Harry made another face. “I really appreciate that you won’t force me into a marriage.”

Marvolo hummed. “I don’t think it works well for most people. Lucius and Narcissa are a nice example that it can work. But most of the time, it's only an arrangement of convenience. Not that those can’t work, but if the personality of the two married don’t work well together, it's doomed to fail. I think you’ll be able to find someone suitable on your own. So there is no need to pick for you. But if you need help, just ask and I will find someone for you.”

At that Harry sent his guardian a fiery glare, earning himself another chuckle. After that they talked about investments Harry wanted to make for the Potter estate, a part of his lessons on how to manage everything, and Marvolo gave Harry an overview of how the investments for the Slytherin family were working out. It got late before Harry went to bed, doing his occlumency exercises as Snape insisted he do.

With a little luck everything would stay peaceful until the break.

Chapter End Notes

I had a good look at the points of the story I still have to tell, and I realized with a start that most of them have to happen before the end of the year. And I thought: are there plots my readers would like to see finished? I have I dropped something I have now forgotten about? Is there something that I didn't elaborate on you are missing? Questions and ideas in reviews are a great inspiration! I love to read all your reviews. The short and the long ones!

Theisaryz-Eufuelle commented that the Scene of the Graveyard would be an interesting one to see from the perspective of my story. And I have to agree, ever since I read that comment the scene rattles around in my head demanding to be written. I guess I should do that. Once it is finished it will be posted as one of the Out-Takes!

Interruption

Tuesday, 12th of December

Checking another time that he had all his books for today's classes packed away in his bag, Harry stepped out of his room into the corridor, narrowly avoiding a collision with a small first-year boy sprinting along. Fondly shaking his head – had he been so small himself? – Harry closed the door behind him, feeling the wards going up, before he walked down the corridor to the common room.

With a sleepy sounding "Good morning!" Theo fell into step with Harry, Draco just a few steps in front of them. "I really yearn for the break. All this revising, practising, and writing is getting old."

Harry chuckled. "So you want to go to a lot of stuffy balls instead, Theo?" The answering groan of desperation from Theo, his head thrown back and an arm dramatically flung out, let Harry laugh again. Draco just turned around and rolled his eyes at them both.

With a much better mood, Harry stepped into the common room. The windows were still dark, this early in the morning on a December day there was no light to even try reaching them through the water of the great lake. But the large number of students already up and about made quite clear that breakfast was about to be served in the Great Hall.

Before Harry and the two walking by his side – he had made peace with the fact that a kind of honour-guard of Slytherins was always following him around – reached the exit, Daphne and her younger sister caught up to them. "Good morning, Henry. We need to speak about our clothes for the holiday season."

With apprehension churning in his stomach, because he dreaded the need to get even more new fancy clothes, Harry slightly turned to Daphne, returning her greeting. "Good morning, Daphne. And why do we need to speak about what we will wear?"

Two, no three, low chuckles told Harry that this probably had been one of those questions he wouldn't have asked if he wasn't so new to all this. Not for the first time he wondered what his life would have been like if Dumbledore had seen fit to let him learn all he now knew he needed to know.

With fond exasperation Daphne snatched Harry's arm and linked arms with him, before she answered. "We need to coordinate your robes and my dress. Or rather dresses. It would be horrible, after all, if the colours and styles were to clash with each other."
Remembering some garish examples of wizards trying to dress as Muggles from the Quidditch World Cup, Harry had to agree that a little coordination so as not to make fools of themselves would be a good idea. So he nodded slowly. "Where shall we start? With the hardest? Or one of the easier ones? I've been thinking about the theme for the ball Draco's mother is organizing and I'm at a loss. How do you represent hospitality with something to wear?" It was a puzzle Harry hadn't been able to unravel, and he had spent more than one history lesson ruminating about it.

Daphne laughed. Since the invitations to the Malfoy ball had been sent, the most outrageous ideas about how to dress to match the theme had been tossed about the Slytherin common room. Interestingly enough, Harry had noticed that the teasing and silly jokes stayed inside the common room and dorms. In the public eye, Slytherins behaved, mostly, like snotty little heirs to a fortune, regardless if that was true or not.

"As the heir to two families you will have to wear robes with family colours to most events. I guess we can get away with waiting for ideas from the tailor for those we'll wear to Draco's. So what are the family colours you wear to combine Slytherin and Potter, Henry?"

"The combined robes I have now are a neutral colour – a dark grey – combined with the secondary colours of both Houses." Harry explained, trying hard to remember the correct terms to explain, because apparently it was an important difference what was the first and what the second colour.

"Why would you combine the secondary colours? I wondered when we saw you in them at Aidan's adoption, but I forgot to ask." Theo now used this opportunity to sate his curiosity.

"Because red and green as the main colours to combine are just too much like Christmas decoration. But maybe that would work for this particular occasion?"

Laughing over the picture conjured by Harry's deliberately thoughtful expression and words, the group of Slytherins made their way to the Great Hall. It was a good start into the day.

ooOoo

Harry felt pretty great. Now that he was a Slytherin himself, he got to see a totally different side of his classmates from that House. A much more private side. It wasn't always pretty – Crabbe and Goyle weren't any brighter in the common room than outside of it – but it had shown him that they all were kids just like him. With favourite subjects, those they hated, fears and hopes just like his own.

He could see Hermione and Ron over at the Gryffindor table and was about to excuse himself from the others to sit and eat with them at his old House table, when a girl in Gryffindor robes, a few years younger than him, strutted over to where he was walking, a look of determination on her face.

"Harry, I wanted to ask you to come with me to Hogsmeade on the next weekend we can go." Her voice was strong, her posture rigid, and Harry had trouble keeping his mouth shut.

There was no way to react politely to that. "Sorry, but who are you?" It might not be the nicest thing, but it was a fact: he didn't know her name. The older students almost never bothered to learn all the names of students younger than them. Harry guessed that Hermione knew all names of the younger Gryffindors, but she was a prefect and in a way had a duty to look out for them, rein them in, and so on.

Her face flushed a rather ugly shade of blotchy red. "I'm Romilda Vane, we have been fellow Gryffindors for three years now!" Her tone made clear that she felt insulted over Harry's apparent disregard of her.

But Harry didn't feel as if he had any obligation towards her. She was pretty enough with her dark hair and eyes, he guessed. But being pretty wasn't the most important thing by far. "Sorry, Miss Vane." The girl stiffened and a spark of anger entered her eyes. "But we barely know each other. And I already have plans to go to the village with my friends. So I have to politely decline your invitation." He gave the girl a short nod before turning to walk over to Hermione and Ron where they sat with Neville and most of the other fifth-year Gryffindors, aware of the few Slytherins still following him. Harry dearly would have liked to add a few adjectives to his refusal of the invitation. But he had learned enough over the summer to know that he would have embarrassed himself as well if he had given in to the urge.

"What a... rude little girl," Draco muttered as he sat down at the Gryffindor table, looking only a little uncomfortable to be here in what he would have called enemy territory just a few months back. Harry just knew that he had wanted to say something much more rude than that, and gave him a pointed look.

"Good morning, everybody. What did Romilda want from you Harry?" Hermione asked filling a small bowl with yoghurt and fruits.

"She asked me out to Hogsmeade. I declined. I already have plans. Luna wanted to go with me, and I guess I just assumed that we all would go together. Buy some things as presents, eat and drink at the Three Broomsticks. Those sorts of things." Harry shrugged and started to fill his plate with an assortment of his preferred breakfast foods. A small phial materialised next to his goblet filled with milk. It was uncanny how the elves managed to get his potions to his plate wherever he sat. Their mixed group of students tended to choose one of three tables at random. Only the Hufflepuff table never saw them sitting down for a meal.

"Have you two ever spoken before?" Hermione asked curious.

"Not that I can remember," Harry answered shaking his head, before he unstoppered the phial and drank down the potion, shaking himself in reaction to the taste. No potion ever seemed to taste good.

"That wasn't the most clever way to go about asking you out," Daphne said, shaking her head, snatching up an orange to peel. "She should have tried getting to know you first."

"But you can't deny that it was brave to just walk up to Harry and ask him," Ron stated from the side before he dug into his breakfast, a book propped up on a pitcher so he could finished the assigned reading for their shared transfiguration class for that day.

Harry had to chuckle at Hermione's glare for endangering a book in this way, and for not doing homework on time. The bushy-haired witch turned her back towards the red-head and addressed Harry who still was amused over the constant squabbling between his two friends. "I sent a letter and your list to my parents yesterday evening. I hope it won't take too long for them to get the letter."

"Thanks for helping me out." Harry smiled over to her before he quickly looked around the table to see if the others were trying to listen in. "I want to make a suggestion. It's been a while since my last dancing lesson in the summer, and I thought it would be a good idea to practice a bit more before we'll be forced to dance in front of an audience. Hermione, Daphne, Theo, Draco, do you think we could practice together?" Harry really was nervous over the prospect of dancing in front of so many people who would gossip over his errors for weeks if he made any. That Daphne had asked him to be her date had helped him out of asking someone to be his date. Remembering the disaster that had been the whole Yule Ball of fourth year, Harry was really glad that he didn't need to ask someone. But the dancing wasn't something he would get out of. So he had better practice more as long as it was still possible.

All around them students chatted, ate, finished their homework at the last minute, and generally made a big ruckus, while Harry and his Gryffindor and Slytherin friends planned a set of dancing practices.

Watching while Draco and Hermione got into a debate as to what music they would practice, Harry smiled. It felt so good not to fear for his life. Not puzzling out some mystery that would put him at risk. Just talking with his friends, going to his lessons and completing his homework, flying in Quidditch practice. As unstealiy as the year had started, now it seemed to become one of the best years at Hogwarts so far.

oooOOooo

Without his robes – which he had tossed over the only remaining chair – Marvolo moved over the stone floor of the former kitchen on all fours sketching out the latest version of the ritual circle with chalk. Bill Weasley's help had been what he needed to break through some of the blockages in the creation of the ritual. Now he was about to try the ritual to move a piece of his soul from one container to the other. Or at least, he was preparing to.

For the first actual attempt, try he would have to decide which of his horcruxes he would work with, and into which container he would transfer the fragment of his soul. And that was a problem he was currently stuck on. So he had decided to start laying the circle out, a work that needed – no demanded – concentration and careful execution.

It was a distraction from the problem he was currently pondering. Should he use the cup, the locket, or the diadem? He wasn't sure. All his horcruxes had been placed in precious artefacts, and now with the two biggest back in his body, their size wasn't so relevant to his sanity. Or so he believed. And right along with his troubles to select one to test the ritual, Marvolo struggled with the decision into what to place the pieces of his soul. He wasn't about to try to place them into his own body – that could go horribly wrong – but he wasn't willing to just use anything random either. It needed to be something that could be destroyed more or less easily. If all else failed destroying the container – or ordering someone else to do it – would work to restore the pieces back into Marvolo's body. As experience had shown. He would rather not resort to that method, but he felt that moving all the different pieces back into one was an important step.

Sitting back on his heels, kneeling on the ground in the middle of the circle, Marvolo sighed. Why couldn't he just use one of the chipped plates, or cups, which had been left behind in this house? They were as good as anything else, nothing truly important, clearly okay to be destroyed. But no. All of him despised the idea. His soul had no place inside a common piece of porcelain.

Concentrating on his runes once more, Marvolo walked calmly around the circle, checking everything he had done so far. Before he could continue, he should decide on an object to use. Something of significance… maybe he should get something made especially for this purpose and not use something that should be discarded.

Before he could start on that circle of thoughts that had occupied his mind all day again, the connection he had to his Death Eaters flared once for one of them. It wasn't something that happened all that often, but it was the predefined way for one of his to contact him and ask for an audience who normally had no reason to interact with him.

Turning his back on the kitchen and the runic circle, Marvolo decided it would be best to see what the man asking for an audience wanted. He wouldn't get to testing the ritual today, not until he had a decision for the two cumbersome questions. Marvolo walked the way to his office with quick strides, searching for Barty. It didn't take long to walk the distance and open the door, looking around the room. And there was Barty, in the office, probably working on all the paperwork Marvolo had never even once associated with conquering the world in his own youth.

"Barty, I need your mark." With decisive strides Marvolo walked over to his secretary, watching as the wizard rolled his sleeve up enough to bare his wrist, kneeling down among pooling robes to offer the arm up to his Lord and Master.

Firmly taking hold of the pale wrist and hand, Marvolo watched as the now much smaller Dark Mark came into view. This was a much better way to go about marking his followers. It had to have been youthful beliefs of invincibility leading him to mark his followers as obviously as he had done.

Concentrating on the one Healer he had inside the walls of St. Mungo's, Marvolo pressed his finger into the small mark, sending a small spark of magic into the connection calling for the one he held in his mind. With that done, Marvolo let go of the other's hand, looking around the office. He would have to rearrange a little before he could let the man come in. It wouldn't do to let his follower see what a mess his office got from time to time.

His motion to get his wand and cast a charm to sort the mess was interrupted when Barty cleared his throat behind Marvolo's back. "My Lord." The man sounded nervous.

With no little irritation – probably not only based on the interruption – Marvolo turned to look at Barty only barely restraining a snarl. "What?"

"You have chalk on your trousers, my Lord. And…” he trailed off, only gesturing to indicate the still disheveled state of dress, with rolled up sleeves, the robe missing, his trousers indeed covered with chalk and dust.

Marvolo closed his eyes and took a deep breath. "Get me a fresh robe." He listened as quick steps moved away from him, the door opened and then closed again, leaving him alone in his office. Another few deep breaths and Marvolo had regained control over his emotions. Concentrating to stay calm, he walked over to his desk, and sat down. Then he sent all the parchments, books, and letters to their places – or at least out of sight – with one spell, spelling his clothes free of chalk and dust with a second flick of his wand. Then he rolled down his sleeves again and closed them with a set of silver cufflinks – fashioned in the likeness of snakes – he took out of a drawer of his desk. Restored to a more intimidating – and proper – appearance, Marvolo sank back in his chair, waiting for Barty to bring him a robe. Maybe he should order himself something to drink and eat. "Flimm!" Not enough to eat and drink could make anyone a little short-tempered. Marvolo remembered only too well nights unable to sleep because it was too cold and his stomach empty. And an endless time just drifting, constantly hungry and cold – decades later – unable to do anything about it. The elf popped into being, startling Marvolo out of his uncomfortable recollections. "Hot tea, cake and biscuits." With a bow and another pop the elf vanished again. With a small groan Marvolo stretched to make his back pop. Crawling around the floor wasn't something he should do for hours on end.

Jeremy Jugson was nervous. Very nervous. As a young man just starting his time as a healer at the biggest hospital in Britain he had gladly accepted the Dark Mark. Shortly after that, his Lord had vanished and Jeremy had buried himself in work. That was why and how he had made his career as the expert on dark magic's side effects on a wizard's or witch's health. Because even with dark magic declared illegal, there were still curse-breakers exposed to it regularly, Aurors who hunted criminals hexed and cursed. People lived in old houses littered with cursed objects, there were places saturated in dark magic. There were enough people affected that he had enough patients. All in all, he had made his reputation and was now one of the youngest senior healers on staff.

But now he was very very nervous, because he had information his Lord needed to know and was unable to talk about it. Regardless he had felt that he needed to inform his Lord and had used the Mark to ask for an audience. He had felt it unlikely that he was deemed important enough to be considered anyway.

But now what he had thought impossible had happened. He had been summoned. How was he to explain what he had discussed with Madame Pomfrey while his healer's oath prevented him from speaking about a patient's health without his or her consent?

While his mind ran in progressively smaller circles with worry, Jeremy had finished gathering his dark robes and the white mask. The summons was still there, a steady burn at his wrist where the now concealed, smaller Dark Mark was hidden.

Taking a few steadying breaths, Jeremy concentrated on the pull on his mark and spun on his heel to disapparate. In the next moment he stood in a cosy study, a fire merrily burning in the fireplace, candles illuminating rows of books neatly stacked in their shelves. Before he could take in the whole room, Jeremy sank down to kneel on the floor, heart beating much too quickly. His mouth was dry as a desert.

"Get up from the floor and sit down." The voice of his Lord was impatient, so Jeremy stumbled over the folds of his robes in his haste to get up and comply with the order.

The moment Jeremy sat in the wingback chair his Lord had indicated, cold sweat started to bead under his mask. Not even the night he had been marked had Jeremy been alone with the Dark Lord. Now he felt that it wasn't an experience he would search out again any time soon.

The moment a warm hand turned Jeremy's own over and placed the small container of a calming potion – working as a healer one learned to identify the most common potions by colour alone – in it, the healer realized that he had lost himself in his own thoughts in his attempt to remain calm.

"Away with the mask and down with the potion. Neither you nor I have the time to waste with hysterics."

With shaking hands Jeremy did as he was told, and a moment later the calming effect of the potion worked its wonders on his nervousness. "Thank you, my Lord." Jeremy took a few calming breaths and then looked up into his Lord's face who now sat down in the other wingback chair, pouring tea into two china cups. It was a surreal scene, the Dark Lord offering him refreshments.

"You wanted to speak with me, so speak."

Watching as the Dark Lord added three spoons of sugar into his tea, Jeremy took up his own cup and added only a little squeeze of lemon before he started to speak. "Today at work there was a case I was consulted for that I feel is of great interest to you, my Lord." He needed to be careful in how he worded his report if he wanted to avoid the awful effects a broken or even strained vow would inflict upon him.

"You're a healer." The reaction was more murmured than spoken aloud, but the moment Jeremy saw the dawning understanding on his Lord's face, a big stone fell from his chest. Jeremy never had been important enough to know the names of all the other Death Eaters, but he had known that at least one other healer was part of the group. Severus Snape was said to have been not only the Dark Lord's Potions Master, but his spy, or Dumbledore's, depending on who you asked. A healer had never been exposed in the aftermath of their Lord's vanishing act, but now Jeremy knew that the Dark Lord was aware of the oaths a healer had to take to work at St. Mungo's.

"Effects of dark magic is your field of expertise, correct?" The look levelled at him where he sat with the mask in his lap and a cup of tea held in his hands, was as sharp as the question. "That's correct, my Lord. Most of the healer community regards me as an expert in that field. I certainly am the most experienced in this field in Britain." It was bragging, but as Jeremy wasn't sure how informed the Dark Lord was about these things, it was the better plan to voice those facts out loud than risk his life on spotty information.

"So consultations are quite common?" Before Jeremy could do more than nod in confirmation his Lord proceeded with more questions. "But most consultations probably aren't worth being reported to me. So this consultation must have been something unusual. The consultation wasn't from someone inside St. Mungo's?"

"That's correct, my Lord." Watching his Lord think, Jeremy sipped on his tea. If this was how his Lord was going to ask questions until he had come to all the important facts without Jeremy actually saying anything, then it would work out.

"I assume you normally don't get asked for your insight from that particular source often?"

"In fact it was a first, my Lord. Private Healers, healers from abroad, my own colleagues. That's pretty normal. But the letter I got yesterday evening, just as my night shift had started, was a first. I spoke with the sender in the morning and contacted you just as I had finished my shift, my Lord." And indeed it had been a shock. Madame Pomfrey had been the mediwitch of Hogwarts when he had gone to school there. In fact her work had been part of his inspiration to try for a spot as a healer-apprentice.

Jeremy watched with fascination as the red eyes of his Lord grew wide with surprise and a kind of surprise he normally only saw on children's faces when their very first pain potion started to work. It was always nice helping small children. Once in awhile he took on a shift in the emergency ward just to help a few children and make them smile. The idiots who experimented, or those who shouldn't be brewing their own potions, and all the others injured each day were bearable if he could make one child smile.

"A hypothetical question." Carefully setting his cup down on the small table between them the Dark Lord leaned forward with a twinkle in his eyes. "If someone were to suffer from a dark withering curse, designed to kill within minutes, but delayed enough that the progress seems slowed down considerably, to have it removed later, what would be the possible side effects?"

Now Jeremy's eyes grew wide. Madame Pomfrey hadn't been able to precisely describe the curse she had told him about, to explain why she thought the signs of decline in mental health in the Headmaster of Hogwarts was connected to an exposure to Dark Magic. But this sounded like something that would match. "A withering curse? How far would this curse have developed in this hypothetical situation? And which part of the body should I assume was affected?"

The devilish grin on the Dark Lord's youthful face made a cold shiver run down Jeremy's back. "A hand. After a few weeks, the blackening had reached the elbow."

"Then I would expect that traces of harmful magic would start to circulate through the whole body after the first week. If this state would keep up for a longer period of time, I think the normal longtime effects of exposure to harmful magic would start to show. Dementia-like symptoms, loss of sense of time, forgetfulness, and things like paranoia and fear, wouldn't be surprising." Jeremy carefully put more emphasis on the points Madame Pomfrey had named in their discussion.

"Thank you, Healer Jugson. Please follow the normal procedures required in such a case. Thank you for your good work, and don't let me keep you longer than necessary."

Recognizing the dismissal, Jeremy stood, bowed, and left the room. Just as the door closed behind him he almost jumped out of his robes because the most boisterous laughter he had heard in quite some time suddenly started in the office he had just left. The healer blinked slowly. It seemed that the Dark Lord was happy with the news Jeremy had brought. It was time to get home, sleep, and shower, so he could be ready for the dinner date he had this evening with the young witch working as a medi-witch on the ward for magical bugs and diseases. So far, the order to find someone and start a family was the one bringing him the most joy of all those he had ever been given.

Marvolo, meanwhile, was laughing and dancing in his office. Albus Percival Wulfric Brian Dumbledore was losing his marbles. What delightful news. Madame Pomfrey would be forced to bring her concerns for the Headmaster's health in front of the Board of Governors, who would then proceed to search for a new witch or wizard to take over the position. A man not in full control of his mental capabilities wasn't able to lead a school and be responsible for so many children.

It was an interesting hypothesis that the curse might have caused a decline in the mental health of the Headmaster. Of course, there was the chance that there was another cause. But it was worth testing. Maybe he could use Karkaroff for this purpose. The man had been incarcerated for quite some time now, and torturing him wasn't as stress-relieving as it had been in the beginning. Karkaroff was much too resigned to his fate by now.

But before he could start a proper experiment he needed to know all the facts. As Severus had been involved in the process more than any other of his Death Eaters, it probably was the best to ask the Potions Master. He would have to make good notes and probably should write down the curse he had designed, as well as all the facts he had about the development with the Headmaster.

But maybe it would be better if he finished up the other things waiting for his attention first. With a sigh, Marvolo walked back to his desk and sat down. The ritual to move the horcrux out of Henry had the highest priority. Even if he currently had trouble deciding which of his horcruxes to use in the ritual and where to move it to.

During lunch break, Harry sat with the other Slytherins at the Slytherin table quietly discussing some quidditch tactics when the door to the Great Hall opened. It wasn't such an unusual occurrence, there always a few people leaving early or arriving late to a meal, but when whispers started to spread through the Hall, Harry looked up and around.

"Isn't that your father, Draco?" Theo asked, taking the opportunity to get another portion of green beans onto his plate.

"Yes. But I don't know why he's here. The last letter I got this morning was from a few days ago. He never mentioned that he would come to the school."
The door opened again, admitting a wizard with grey hair and old-fashioned robes, hurrying towards the Head table where at that very moment loud voices started to argue.

"That should get interesting," Daphne said between sips from her cup of tea. "Sit down, boys, don't attract attention."

Reluctantly they all complied and watched with fascination as the professors at the Head Table got involved in a heated debate. "I wish I could hear good enough to listen in on that conversation," Harry idly mused, selecting a fruit pudding for dessert.

"We can probably ask my father." Draco said before he shut up to relish his favourite dessert of chocolate mousse.

The Headmaster was still arguing with what had turned out to be the Board of Governors – Draco had recognized a few of them – when the students slowly started to disperse so they wouldn't be late to their afternoon classes.

"Harry!" the green-eyed teenager turned as Hermione called for him, seeing her and her uncle Xerxes Lestrange standing side by side, while the wizard was holding a rather big parcel under one arm. Curious, he started to weave his way through the other students to his friend.

"Hermione, Lord Lestrange," Harry greeted with the bow required of him, still feeling rather awkward over all the formalities.

"Heir Slytherin-Potter. My nephew contacted me late yesterday to ask if I would be willing to play the owl and deliver a package of painting supplies to Hogwarts. I was intrigued and happy to have an excuse to visit my dear Hermione." The older wizard extended his arm with the package and Harry happily accepted it with a big grin on his face. "Thank you very much, Lord Lestrange. Delivering these for me was very kind of you. But if you would excuse me, I will need to place this in the dorm before the next class starts." With another nod Harry left Hermione in her uncle's company. He had proven to be a decent sort. Hermione was really happy about the discovery of her magical ancestry and that her father got to get to know his uncle. She also was determined to use the power she would one day wield to improve their society. That train of thought reminded Harry of the Society for Elvish Welfare or something, he snorted and hurried to make it to the dorm. He would be able to start on his painting of Hogwarts here at Hogwarts. His chances of getting the painting done in time had increased significantly.

It was late on Tuesday evening when Cassius Yaxley, the younger, searched for something to fashion a mask out of. He had spent the last five days following Susan Smith, a mudblood witch who had been in the same year as him. He had started this in response to his father's plans to re-introduce the tradition of kept women. They needed targets, women they could capture and keep. Those that wouldn't be missed terribly by anyone if they went missing.

After five attempts to make one of the intricate masks used by the Death Eaters – his heroes since the time he could read – he changed tactics and created a simple bone white mask without the designs he knew were on the original masks. In the heat of the moment, a simple white mask would suffice to hide his identity and intimidate his opponents.

Now he had to hurry so he wouldn't be late to their meeting place where five of the others would meet up with him to go over to the small village where the mudblood Smith lived in a small flat together with two other young women. He shrugged into his robes – stained dark to cover up the marks of a spilt potion – and closed them down the front. They weren't as heavy as he would have liked, lacking the movement of heavy fabric, but they would do. He placed the mask over his face, moved the hood to conceal his face further, and applied a sticking charm so it wouldn't slip at an inopportune moment.

It didn't take long for them all to apparate into the small clearing Cassius had scouted out over the last few days. It wasn't far from the house with the flat, so it was a good place to start their raid from.

"Everyone here?" Cassius let his eyes wander over the others. Each of them had managed to get dark robes and masks, so they were quite the imposing group. "Remember the plan. We apparate to the house. There is a door at the back and one in front. Two will keep watch outside, making sure they can't run. The others will split into teams of two, one goes in through the front and up the stairs, the other two go through the back door. Stun them, then apparate them out to the clearing and from there to the hut in the woods." They had found a little derelict hut they would use until they had the bitches under control.

All around there were agreeing noises and nodding heads. Splitting the group into teams of two was done quickly. After that Cassius explained the layout of the house and flat to them all in minute detail. It was interesting what one could learn by watching others through their windows for a few hours a day.

"Any questions?"

There were none, so they had only to wait a few more minutes, till the time their targets normally went to bed on a weekday. They would have an easier time when the others were bedraggled and not in a position to defend themselves.

What followed went by in snatches. Apparating to the backdoor of the house. An alohomora to the door opened it without a problem. They sprinted up the stairs, almost tripping over the shoes standing by the door into the flat. Then they were in the flat, marching over to the rooms, led by the unmistakable sound of snores. Before the bitches could properly wake up, Cassius had shot a stunner at that ungrateful whore Susan, snarling into her unconscious face. "Now you'll wish you hadn't declined my invitation, bitch. You should have been grateful to even get a moment of my attention. But no, you felt you deserved better. Pah!" he spat in her face. "I will show you your place, mudblood!"

He apparated to the front door, his captive pressed to his side. Then he raised his wand in the direction of the star-covered sky. "Morsmordre!" A cloud of eerily dark green sparks rose from his wand into the night sky, forming a big skull which opened its mouth to let a big snake slither out, forming the dark mark over the house. Shouts sounding from the surrounding houses signalled that it was time to leave, so Cassius hoisted the unconscious form of Susan over his shoulder and turned again to apparate to the clearing they had come from.

The others were already waiting, the other two bitches – one with red hair, freckles, and skin as pale as milk, the other with dark curly hair and a nice tan – bound on the floor. That had gone better than Cassius had hoped for. His father would be proud of him. For taking the opportunity and for making it happen without a hitch. Now they only needed to get the captives to the hut and feed them the love potion they had prepared in advance. That would make controlling them easier.

With a smug look hidden behind his mask, Cassius apparated. They had thought of everything. This would get them the acknowledgement they deserved, and a nice little bitch to clean for them, cook for them, and tend to their other needs as well.

With apprehension seated deeply in his stomach, Marvolo walked up to the office rooms of Mrs. Goyle’s practice. She had said he could come by after her normal office hours, giving him an appointment on short notice. In a way he was grateful that she had managed to find time for him, but on the other hand he really wished he wasn't here right now. Talking about what he was feeling, about his problems and what in his past might be the cause for them wasn't something he really wished to do. But he didn't see many other alternatives. Healer Greengrass’ collection of pictures, texts, and other things had been interesting, but hadn't brought the insight Marvolo had wished for. And now, before one of these days a determined mother managed to herd him into a marriage, he needed some answers. And who should he ask? One of his Death Eaters? Before he spoke with one of them about his seemingly absent preferences he would dance a waltz in the middle of Diagon Alley. Dyed pink from head to toe.

There was no one but Mrs. Goyle present, and on the table sat the box he had transfigured on his last – and first – visit. With a sigh and hands steady because he had huge amounts of willpower, Marvolo put his wand inside the box, set it on the table and carefully lowered himself into the seat meant for him.

"Good evening, Lord Slytherin. I'm happy you have found the time to come here again." Her tone was pleasant, her posture professional. Marvolo wanted to run, set the place on fire, and just start talking. It was an odd combination, and it made him decidedly uncomfortable. "Is there some particular topic you want to discuss tonight?"

With this question she relieved Marvolo of opening up the conversation himself. Normally he had no problems talking, getting others to spill their most guarded secrets, but now he felt like words were evading him.

Briefly closing his eyes, folding his hands and placing them in his lap, Marvolo reminded himself that this woman had helped Henry a lot – the young man had relaxed considerably, and Severus’ reports indicated that his son had adjusted to life in Slytherin House quite easily – and that he needed to talk to someone. Talking with a medical professional bound by oaths not to talk about what he said to her was a good choice, better than his other options.

Gathering what courage he had, Marvolo just started to talk. "You're aware that it is expected of a Lord to marry. Sooner rather than later. I have met a lot of people, many of whom were trying to get my attention." One of his hands came up to rub over his eyes. "Not one of them caused a… reaction on my side. So I asked someone to gather some… study material for me. He brought an impressive collection of what could be called, samples of every bit of erotica magical Britain has to offer." Another huff and Marvolo berated himself. He could torture without batting an eye, but talking about sex was difficult. Sometimes he cursed the fact that he had been brought up in a conservative, religious orphanage. While some of the old families tended to be prudish, the muggles had seriously screwed with his head in this. "I studied the pictures and texts with time and in a comfortable setting." In fact he had been wearing some of his most comfortable clothes, had sat near a warm fire with a glass of good red wine near at hand. "But nothing got the reaction one would expect. I surely can see and appreciate aesthetically pleasing body forms. Both male and female. But that's it. Both men and women have hit on me. Not one of them caused even a spark of interest."

Marvolo was aware that he hadn't really asked a question as of now. But Mrs. Goyle sat there patiently paying attention to every word he said, listening intently. "I know that from a healer's perspective on the body, everything is fine. So I feel that my lack of… reaction must have its cause somewhere in my mind. I will need to marry and I'd rather pick a partner… matching with my needs. But without knowing what those are…." Marvolo trailed off, the urge to run from the office right after obliterating the woman sitting there calm as a lake’s surface on a sunny windless day.
"Have you considered that sexuality is much more complicated than just being attracted to either men or women?" Her gaze was questioning and Marvolo just shrugged. He couldn't claim to have thought on this topic for any length of time, really. As a teenager his worries had been elsewhere, later he guessed that his mutilated soul had curbed any sexual desires he might have had. His forays into the minds of others had always had a goal, and their sexual fantasies never had been on the list of interesting topics.

"There are people who only are attracted to those they can hold a stimulating intellectual conversation with. Others like feet. Some need someone to dominate them, or even pain to get aroused. And of course the other way around. As long as all participants are willing, there isn't anything wrong with that. It is even completely normal for an individual to have no interest in sexual acts at all."

Marvolo quietly contemplated that he never had noticed an arousing effect when he had punished a Death Eater, or watched them torture others. "I would recommend that you not put so much pressure on yourself. There's no need to put a label on yourself yet, or anytime at all."

Silence fell between them. In a way Marvolo saw that Mrs. Goyle was right. There was no real need to put a label on his sexuality, or his lack of one. At least not until he was forced to select a partner in marriage. But considering everything, he would be pressed to select someone based on political merits anyway. Nodding, Marvolo conceded her point. "I guess you're right, Madame. I most likely won't be able to select a partner based on sexual compatibility between us anyway."

A sad smile and a shake of her head, was Mrs. Goyle's answer. "The political needs are sometimes stifling. In a way I'm glad that I was not considered worthy of being married off. It enabled me to chose my own path in life." Before they could speak more about anything, there was a pecking sound from one of the windows.

Frowning, Marvolo turned in his seat to look out of the window from where he thought the sound was coming. An owl was sitting on the windowsill, impatiently pecking at the glass. With his frown deepening Marvolo stood, called the box wandlessly to his hand, and opened the box, before he carefully took the last steps to the window. A careless wave of his wand had the window opening, clearing the way for the owl to come in. And the small, sleek-looking bird flew in just to land right in front of Marvolo holding out its leg with a small scroll bound to it.

After he had cast several charms at the scroll – checking for contact poison, curses, and other potential nasty dangers – Marvolo took the scroll from the bird which launched itself into the air the moment it had delivered its cargo.

The scroll was sealed with the coat of arms of the Auror office and Marvolo's instincts were sending him warnings. Without hesitating another moment, Marvolo broke the seal and quickly read the short missive.

\textit{Lord Slytherin,}

\textit{In connection with the sighting of the Dark mark over the scene of a crime you are asked to come to the Auror Department as soon as possible to aid in the investigation.}

\textit{Head Auror Rufus Scrimgeour}

With a sigh Marvolo turned back to Mrs. Goyle, folding the summons – it was foolish to think it was anything other than an order – to stuff it back into his pocket. "I fear we will have to cut this meeting short. But if you are agreeable, I would like to try again next week?" They quickly arranged another appointment before Marvolo hastened to get to the Ministry. A Dark Mark had been seen at a crime scene? He needed to know who had worked against his orders, or who was bold enough to claim something as theirs to use that wasn't. There was no way he could let that development stand.

Chapter End Notes

The season of family gatherings, long dark evenings, and colds (at least where I live ;) ) is upon us. I hope that I will manage to keep my update schedule, but maybe I will stretch it to three weeks again over Christma. We'll see!

Story recommendation: "Hermione Granger, Demonologist" by BrilliantLady it is finished and shows "the Dark" in a way I haven't seen anywhere else

Next chapter planned for 1st of December 2017
It seems my story is now to big to be converted to mobi format with the sides possibilities.
If you want to use mobi format you could use one of the sides on the web offering to convert different other formats to mobi (like this one: https://ebook.online-convert.com/convert-to-mobi). The other three formats offered by this side still do work. If there is interest I can try to provide a link with each new chapter to an pre-converted file somewhere else.
Please let me know what you would prefer in a comment!
Thank you!

Another year almost finished. I will publish another chapter this year, but will make a longer break over Christmas.

I'm so very happy every time one of you writes me a short or long review, letting me know what you liked about a chapter, your speculations, your ideas. It helps me create this story and keep writing even when I'm tired and feel uninspired :)

Wednesday, 13th December

During breakfast Severus listened attentively to the discussion his colleagues had, sipping from his cup of coffee with honey and eating his toast with scrambled eggs. Sonja was eating next to him, deeply engrossed in the latest issue of Potions Quarterly. It contained a detailed examination of the effects of dried toad livers over fresh and pickled ones on a certain branch of hair care potions. An interesting read.

"I can't believe that the board insists on having an expert check the Headmaster's health." Minerva shook her head, her lips pinched into a sour expression. "He's as collected and competent as ever!" Severus almost snorted at that and quickly hid his face behind his cup again.

"But you can't just dismiss the findings of Poppy out of hand, Minerva," Filius interjected, arms moving about in his exuberant gestures. "We know that the Headmaster has duelled with dark wizards in the past. That way he came into contact with some dangerous curses. The curse that affected his hand and arm this summer could be a cause as well. I for one would feel better when a certified healer told us that Poppy's concerns are unfounded."

"Poor Albus," Pomona said into the strained silence. "It must be hard to know that your own mind is going to lose its edge." She sounded sad and was almost constantly shaking her head.

Severus had to work not to roll his eyes, or snort. The fact that the Board of Governors had come by the previous day during lunch to demand the Headmaster undergo a more extensive health screening than Madame Pomfrey was able to execute, was still occupying the minds of the staff. Severus had listened to quite a few amusing rumours circulating around the school. The best one so far claimed that the Headmaster had been seen sunbathing in the nude during the summer, and now the scandalized Governors were calling for his dismissal.

A strong scent of herbs, myrrh, and sherry preceded the arrival of Sybill, with her dramatic, overlarge glasses, her many colourful scarves, and her other usual flourishes. Now Severus had to keep himself in check even more fiercely. He was quite happy with the fact that the Divination Professor only seldom found her way down into the Great Hall for meals. But obviously she wouldn't miss the opportunity for one of her dramatic – and obviously faked – predictions.

With an overacted sigh, the professor Severus detested the most out of all the current staff fixed the Headmaster's empty seat with a mournful gaze. "How sad and dark a fate awaits our dear friend. Only loss and despair are in Albus' future. It's hard on us whose inner eye isn't clouded with the trivialities of the mundane, daily struggles, to know, but to be ignored.” A few students sitting near enough to hear what Trelawney was saying either sniggered or looked on in awe. It always tended to surprise Severus that there were so many human beings who would fall for such bad acting.

Of course, in the back of his mind Severus was aware that he held such deep animosity towards this specific colleague only because she had been the one to speak the prophecy which he had foolishly carried back to the Dark Lord, only to place his one friend squarely into the spotlight.

Pushing his thoughts on those past events – which couldn't be changed anyway – into the deep, dark places of his mind, Severus once more concentrated on the present. He needed to get every nuance so he later was able to relay an accurate report to his Lord. If they would be able to remove the old man from the castle, Severus' own job of protecting Lily's son would be easier.

Severus looked up as the morning post came in with the big flock of owls and the few other birds carrying mail, sprinkling the people sitting in the Hall with small water droplets from the feathers and wings of the birds flying in from the cold weather outside.

The fifth-year Slytherins were still chuckling, and Harry was flushed in embarrassment, because Pansy had pointed out that he still had some dried paint on the tip of his nose as he had arrived in the common room this morning.

"Let poor Harry be, Pansy. You've seen how deep he vanishes into what he's doing when he's working on his art," Theo chided gently, while he filled his plate for a second time. He loved the food at Hogwarts, and the ability to chose what he wished without one of the elves sending him disappointed looks if he didn't take at least two pieces of fruit with his breakfast.

With a curt nod, Pansy made a big show of her effort to stop laughing. They all had seen Harry drawing by now, as he often sat in the common room with his pad of paper and his coal and pencil, drawing plants from 1000 Magical Herbs and Fungi or one of the pets roaming the room. Theo had once suggested Harry should draw a Hippogriff, sending Draco into a fit about savage beasts and that he really would appreciate it if they wouldn't bring up that blunder at every possible opportunity.

They were in the middle of their meal – now much quieter as the reality of an early morning hit them after the fun of teasing Harry had faded – when the post owls came flying into the Hall. Theo greeted his father's owl with a piece of crisp bacon which the bird ate with relish, while Theo released two scrolls from their ribbons on the eagle owl's leg. A big smile shortly spread over his face, as he saw that one of the letters had been written by Aiden. He loved letters from his little brother. The boy always had much to tell from his classes at the school Lord Lestrange had founded. What pranks some of the others had played, games they had learned, excursions they had been on... Theo wished that there had been such a school back when he himself had been young enough to need to learn his letters. This school sounded like much more fun than studying alone with a tutor.

Suddenly Harry shot up from the bench, shaking in some suppressed emotion that didn't look pleasant at all, and rushed off without a word, leaving his bag and everything else behind.

"What's wrong with him?" Blaise asked of no one in particular, looking after the almost running figure of their Housemate.

Theo left the others to their quiet speculation and took up the newspaper Harry had been reading before he had decided to run off to places unknown. He didn't have to search for long, and the change in atmosphere in the Great Hall indicated that more people had looked at their copies of the Daily Prophet by now. There on the front page, with a ghastly image last seen right after the Quidditch World Cup over a year ago, was the article Harry had most likely read.

With quick eyes Theo scanned the information – what little there was – on the first page and soon came to a conclusion that explained perfectly why and to where Harry had run.

"Stop guessing," Theo admonished the others, folding and turning the newspaper so the others could see. "I would say Harry is on his way back to the dorms, and to his mirror, to ask his father about this."

Quite a few of the others paled considerably. Either because they feared for a family member who might be apprehended after a crime with a hovering Dark Mark above it, or because the thought of calling out the Dark Lord as Harry was probably preparing to do left them with horror in their guts.

Ignoring the angry and fearful murmurs spreading through the Hall, Theo started to read the article carefully. It seemed that the Dark Mark had been cast over a small house containing two flats, one of which had been inhabited by several young witches in an arrangement to share the rent among them. The young witches were missing – presumed abducted – and there were minimal signs of a struggle. The Aurors had been informed after the muggles living in the neighbourhood had called in the muggle equivalent of the Auror Department because of the odd sight of the Dark Mark. The only statement from a Ministry representative was the comment from one Auror that they were working on the case with all due haste and resources at their disposal.

Theo snorted and picked up his and Harry's things. "I'll go back to the common room. Check on Harry. Please inform Professor Slinkhard that we'll probably be late. Thanks." Not waiting for a confirmation from the others that they had understood what Theo had said, he turned and strode from the Hall, following his friend.

This was one of the situations where Harry was prone to make hasty decisions and cause himself loads of trouble. And as a good friend, it was his duty to at least try to talk Harry out of whatever harebrained scheme he might come up with.

Almost out of the Hall, Theo caught the eye of Hermione Granger – Heiress Lestrange – sending her the silent reassurance that he would look after Harry. The small sad and worried smile he got in response sent thrills of warmth through his body. Shaking his head – he had no time for this now – he got rid of the distraction to concentrate on what he needed to do now: Find Harry and make sure he didn't do something stupid.
With fraying patience, Marvolo held onto his polite mask. He was sitting in one of the small cubicle-like spaces that were placed all around the Auror Department – at least he wasn't in an interrogation room – and watched the chaos around him. He had expected some sort of chaos after the Dark Mark had been spotted once again. But this wasn't resembling the relative order of an anthill, looking like utter chaos but serving a clear purpose, each ant knowing what to do. No, the Aurors were running around like headless chickens. If he still had been out to claim wizarding Britain by force, it would have been too easy. No challenge at all.

The fact that he was tired beyond measure wasn't helping his temper. They had called for him to be here some hours before midnight, and now it was time for breakfast at Hogwarts. And he neither had gotten any dinner nor had anyone offered him something for breakfast, or even to drink.

So here he sat, hungry, thirsty, and tired. Marvolo thought it said a lot about his self-control that there wasn't anyone dead yet.

The Auror who had asked him the same questions over and over since Marvolo had arrived late the last evening, was moving back to the cubicle. And not anything remotely helpful, either. Marvolo didn't know who had cast the Mark, or where the girls had been taken. He was boiling inside, incensed that someone had dared use his Mark for their own purposes. As soon as he could leave he would summon a select few of his Death Eaters to get to the bottom of this.

"Lord Slytherin. I hope you will be more amendable to helping find those young witches now than you have been in the last few hours." Marvolo rolled his eyes. This man was full of himself, but that front he tried to project had cracks all over. After all, the Auror hadn't slept at all this night. Just as Marvolo hadn't been able to rest.

"I'm more than willing to help. But you constantly ignore my answers to your questions just because they aren't what you want to hear. And you ignore the advice I have tried to give you. The Dark Mark over the house can be dispelled. But as I can see, you don't believe me." Marvolo didn't manage to keep the sneer of his face. And the Auror's face wasn't friendly either. If they didn't get rest soon, they were liable to kill each other.

Before the Auror could again demand to know where the young witches had been taken, Marvolo felt the mirror in his pocket vibrate. Ignoring the Auror, Marvolo got the mirror out and answered his son's call.

"Henry. You look upset." And the boy did. He was flushed as if he had been running, his green eyes were blazing with anger and frustration, and his mouth was set in stubborn lines.

"Because I am!" was the harsh answer. Then the boy suddenly looked puzzled. "Where are you?"

Casting a look around himself – taking in the pandemonium – Marvolo shrugged before he answered. "I'm in the Ministry, the Auror Department. You have read the morning paper?"

Henry nodded jerkily and after a moment's hesitation switched to parseltongue. ..:I have. You weren't arrested, were you?:.

Marvolo felt the underlying tension in his son at this question. If Marvolo had been arrested, it would place Henry once more into a situation where he couldn't be really sure what the next day would bring regarding his living arrangements. And that in a moment where everything seemed to be working out. Having grown up in an orphanage where kids came and went, each one hoping to find a family, Marvolo felt that he could relate to that dreaded uncertainty. So he tried to manage a reassuring smile, not so sure that he was capable of producing one that would pass muster. :No need to worry. I really wasn't involved in whatever happened. But I was asked to come here to help with possible inside knowledge which I might still possess. Not that that has worked out until now. They don't even want to listen when I tell them that the Dark Mark can be easily removed from the sky:.

He sighed with an exasperated air, casting the hovering Auror a disapproving glare. A quiet snicker from the mirror drew his attention back to his son. :I will keep you informed, Henry. Most likely I'll have a long and hard day. After I manage to get done here, I will have to see who dared go against my orders:.

:You think one of… them went after the witches living there?:. Henry only hesitated for a moment and then didn't clearly acknowledge the fact that the Death Eaters very much still existed. :Why would they risk something like that?:.

Out of the corner of his eyes Marvolo was aware that another person had come over to hover nearby, but he ignored the incompetent people in favour of focusing on his son, who actually was asking intelligent questions. :I used deeply ingrained prejudices to get those who were influential or just convenient onto my side. Several of them still hold those beliefs close, even with – or maybe because of – the new evidence to the contrary we have found. Appearing law-abiding and pleasant might have lessened their fear of what I might do if they take matters into their own hands:. And he was already mulling over ways to correct that misconception. Maybe Karkaroff would be of use once more, to remind everyone that those who betrayed the Dark Lord would wish for death long before they would be granted that reprieve.

Sadly, it was a possibility that he would have to let the perpetrators be caught by the Aurors, as he needed to be seen as the Lord Slytherin fitting in with society, following the laws, even when he had different opinions on what magic needed to be restricted and what not.

"You will be late to classes, Henry. You can rely on me. I will keep you informed." The looming presence just at the edges of his awareness wasn't going away, so Marvolo felt he probably would be forced to interact with the person. But first he needed to be sure his son was calm enough to go through a day of classes.

"Okay. I will go then. Call later today?" There was insecurity in those incredibly green eyes, and Marvolo tried again to don a reassuring face. Maybe he should practice them in front of a mirror. Until now he mostly had needed other masks – knowing, friendly, polite… – and all of them were becoming easier and easier. But reassuring in a way a parent was to a child, and not in the way of a partner in some political or financial endeavour, wasn't something he had much practice with.

"I will call. Even if it is late, or there's only time for a really short call. Keep the mirror on you." A quick nod from Henry and the boy's relieved expression made Marvolo feel as if he had managed to do what he had planned. Set his son's fears at ease.

Pocketing the mirror, Marvolo turned around to face the little crowd gathered at the edge of the cubicle spaces.

In a glance he had noted the nervous but pleased expression of the Auror who had tried to get him to admit some kind of guilt – Marvolo hadn't felt it necessary to remember the man's name – the calculating look on the slightly lionish looking Head Auror, it all pointed at several more unpleasant hours. "Good morning, Head Auror Scrimgeour. I feel you must be quite busy this morning. How may I help?" Marvolo could watch as contempt and suppressed anger swirled through the wizard's eyes, and held fast to his pleasant, if tired, expression himself. He was here to gather information for himself but also to make sure the best for their society was done. And leaving the Dark Mark hovering over a village mostly inhabited by Muggles wouldn't do any good.

"My Auror here informed me just now that you claim to be able to dispel the Dark Mark, Lord Slytherin. I would like to know how that is done." The Head Auror was an imposing and impressive figure and the tone of his voice, the barely hidden threat, was authoritative, as someone in his position would need.

"That's correct. You really think that someone would create a spell with such an impressive effect without creating a way to get it down quickly again?" Seeing that the other wizard's patience was rather thin by this hour, Marvolo hurried to launch into an explanation he had never given before.
Of course there was a counter, but he never had given it out to his followers. He wasn't quite sure why, but the roots of the charm might have had something to do with it. "Are you familiar with the group of spells usually called the Nightlight Charms?" At the look of confusion, Marvolo almost started to chuckle. All who grew up in wizarding Britain had seen or heard of those charms. They were used by parents to set a small light in their children's rooms that couldn't set anything on fire, but wouldn't vanish before the night was out either.

"Of course I have. What has that to do with this!" The head Auror was now seriously pissed, but one of the other Aurors a young witch Marvolo felt had a family resemblance with the Blacks – probably Nymphadora Tonks, the one Dawlish had told him about – looked as if she had made the connection. A clever one, that.

"They take on different forms – mostly of pleasant animals and flowers – but are all variations of the same base-spell, which is why they all have the same counter. Research I did uncovered the way to create a new variation – unique incantation and all – to link to a design I came up with." Horrified disbelief was the most prominent expression on the faces of all within earshot. "You can simply cast the counter for the Nightlight and remove it with that."

Marvolo remembered quite well how smug he had felt after realising that the spell used for generations to ease the fears of small children in dark bedrooms would now be used to inspire fear and dread in grown-ups. He still thought it was rather clever, and a fine example that any spell could be bent to do evil with enough imagination and determination.

"We never… a simple Finite doesn't work on a Nightlight… It really is that simple?" Marvolo just nodded, then rubbed his hand over his eyes. He really was terribly tired.

"It really is that simple. I remember thinking I would need something simple everyone could cast without trouble. Keeping the incantation in certain circles made sure not everyone could use it. But I guess as it is rather simple, anyone who has heard of the incantation and seen one of the old photographs… As I have told your Auror several times already, Mr. Scrimgeour, I was with my mind-healer yesterday evening. And I'm unaware of any plans and plots to abduct the young witches. Several of those pressured into service and those that only were loosely associated with the organisation could have told the incantation to any number of people, who might have told more… I'm sorry that I can't help you with narrowing the field of possible suspects down any that way. But what little I could hear indicates that whoever took them knew their schedule and the layout of their flat. I would start with those that are close to them." It was funny how his oath to do the best for their community was affecting him and his actions. Even funnier was that he was pretty sure someone closely related to his Death Eaters was the culprit, but he hadn't once said an untrue word in that explanation.

"Thank you, Lord Slytherin. I guess it would be best for you to go home. Take our sincere apology for cutting your appointment with your… healer, short." Scrimgeour sounded unsure over how not to draw attention to the fact that Lord Marvolo Slytherin, former Dark Lord – probably – had just admitted to having a mind-healer.

Marvolo snorted. "I don't recommend existence as a bodiless spirit for over a decade. And living under a curse causing paranoia, leading to horrible actions… let's just say taking up a somewhat normal life takes work." Without a further word, Marvolo stood from his seat, cast a wandless charm to straighten his robes, so he didn't look as if he had spent the whole night in his clothes, and walked out of the Auror Department, his head held high. He wasn't sure it had been the best idea to repeat the information that he had been with a Mind-Healer the evening before. But it was where he had been, and if they decided to question him again, maybe with veritaserum, or another truth-indicating tool, having actually stated the truth the first time would prove valuable. At least he had managed to work in a more plausible explanation for his need of a Mind-Healer than confusion over his sexuality. Trauma over past events would place him firmly with those not even able to speak the words Dark Magic in a tone above a horrified whisper.

Now he needed to take a short nap and then decide who might be the actual culprit and how he was going to confirm those suspicions. He had to suppress a yawn and spontaneously decided to take a longer nap. He needed a clear head for what was going to do.

John walked up to Scrimgeour next to Shacklebolt, who had also been called. The night had been hectic in the Auror Department since the moment their Muggle Liaison had informed them that the Dark Mark had been reported to the police by some muggles in a small village. They both were pretty tired by now.

"Ah, there you are! Come here, Dawlish, Shacklebolt. I have a job for you." Another senior Auror walked away after receiving some orders from their boss and the Head Auror's attention was all for them. "I want you to go to the crime scene and dispel the Dark Mark. Lord Slytherin was kind enough to pass on information on how to achieve that. I trust at least one of you is familiar with the nightlight charm?" Puzzled, John turned to look at his partner – they had been a pair for all their assignments for some time now, so the term was appropriate – and to his relief found the other as confused as he was himself. "I know it seems improbable, but Lord Slytherin claims that the Dark Mark is a variant of the nightlight family. Go and check!" Without waiting for their response, the man with the wild hair turned and walked over to another group of Aurors to give out more instructions.

Without the need to discuss what to do next, John and Shacklebolt fell into step and started to walk over to the room reserved for apparation, warded to only allow Aurors in or out.

"Did you know?" Shacklebolt asked, checking his robes, clearly avoiding looking at John at all.

"Did I know what? That the Dark Mark is supposedly a horrifying nightlight? No, I never would have guessed," John snorted. His mind was still trying to cope with this revelation. The Dark Lord never had told anyone that there was a counter to the Dark Mark hovering in the sky. It always had dissipated after some time, depending on some factor they never had figured out. For a while there had been a kind of contest among Death Eaters on raids and missions who would manage to cast a Dark Mark to last the longest. The longest time recorded had been a little over fifteen hours. But because they didn't always get reliable times for the end of the spell, they soon had abandoned the game.

He never would have guessed that such a simple and happy spell as the nightlight charm had been the basis for the Dark Mark.
Shacklebolt only hummed non-committally. As long as they now were working together, neither of them had confirmed the other's suspicion regarding their political alliance until now. John was pretty sure they wouldn't either. It wasn't really necessary, after all.

"I think that if he ever had told anyone, if he had it would have been widely known by now. Just because it's so hilarious. A Dark Lord, using a charm used by mothers all around the world to create small lights for their children at night, to spread terror?" Chuckling they slipped into their warm cloaks and into the room to apparate to the crime scene. They had a job to do.

Quite a bit away from the hustle and bustle of the Ministry and the excited chatter of Hogwarts, Albus was pacing inside the small kitchen of his hidden safe-house. After the Governors had all but demanded he let himself be checked over by an expert in the damage of Dark Magic, he had hidden behind all the paperwork he had been neglecting until the heaps of parchment on his desk were at risk of toppling over, before he had retreated to this old cottage near the sea he used from time to time to relax away from demands and curious eyes.

Now he was here in equal parts to hide from the worrying looks of Poppy, as for an opportunity to clear his thoughts and decide what to do. Was this a design to remove him from the school? Diminish his influence further, to clear the road for the dark designs of Tom?

Albus dearly wished he could be sure that Poppy never would be involved in such a scheme. But could he be sure? Just before colliding with the worn table in the kitchen, the old wizard turned sharply on his heel to walk back the other way.

On the other hand, she insisted on the examination each year, mostly taking to more or less forcing him to come to the hospital wing, or even walking up to him in his office, claiming if he wouldn't come to her of his own accord, she would search him out. Sometimes she would demand he sleep more, eat more of this and less of that, giving advice on his health as was her job. But until now, the exam never had turned up anything dire.

So if she truly had seen signs of a problem with his mental health, she would have done what now was happening. Informing the Board – as was required when an illness of a member of staff might endanger the students – and contacting an expert to get better insight as to what might be done.

But wouldn't he know if his mind was compromised? His pacing got more frantic, the end of his long white beard moving about in the wind created by the fast movement.

He had always been proud of his clear mind and ability to evaluate its state without outside observation. In fact, he had relied on it to make sure his own faults – the fact he wasn't to be trusted with power – didn't cause him to cause trouble or harm. But if he couldn't trust Poppy, who did he have left?

Was it possible that she had been coerced, or influenced? Maybe some spell, or potion? But he was pretty sure he would recognize the effects of the Imperius curse on someone's behaviour – he had known that most of those claiming to have been forced with the curse to serve Tom had lied – and Poppy always was too careful about what she consumed to be slipped a potion.

So had someone managed to slip him something? Albus shook his head, changing directions near the cabinets on the other side from the table. That was as unlikely as Poppy being under some undue influence. He had his own personal silverware, goblet, and plates. All were charmed so he would see a glow around them if they came into contact with poisons or potions mixed into his food or drink. And he was taking a general antidote to such things regularly. In the past there had been too many crude attempts on his life – mostly from Gellert's followers after their duel – so he had started to take precautions.

But if no one could have given him anything, and Poppy was just as normal as ever, how was this all possible? Maybe he could ask Severus for a cleansing potion… but no. That slithering Slytherin hadn't told Albus that he was going to take up his position as Lord Prince. Hadn't even hinted at the possibility. Albus had only learned of this because his good old friend Elphias had come by to tell him.

Albus snorted and stopped near a window, peering out to the shoreline and the spray of the waves. Family matters indeed. Maybe Albus should have paid closer attention to his spy. Now the young man had gone and gotten married, only to claim his seat on the Wizengamot shortly after that. Was Tom the reason for this change? Had he put pressure on his Death Eaters? Or was Severus delusional enough to believe that there wasn't any more danger? Albus wasn't sure, and that frustrated him greatly.

Despite all his wishing that Tom somehow was behind this, Albus tried to stay realistic. He had come into contact with a lot of really dark magic during this last summer. He had destroyed a horcrux, and if that wasn't dark magic, nothing was. And he had been carrying that thrice-damned curse around in his hand for far too long. Alastor had been right to scold him for his attempt to use the situation to his advantage. He clearly had done more damage than he could have gained if his scheme had worked out.

Now no longer full of frantic energy, Albus started to prepare himself some tea the good old-fashioned way. Sometimes it was nice to just take the time to make every step of the process the muggle way. A luxury to have the time needed to prepare a pot of tea without magic.

He needed to do research to find a way to determine if his state was as severe as Poppy seemed to believe, and then find a way to appear sound of mind. He couldn't be removed from his post at Hogwarts. If that happened, his only other remaining position would come next, and then who would stand in Tom's way, preventing him from harming their society?

By lunchtime Harry had managed to calm down a lot. Oddly enough, he had believed Marvolo the moment the other had claimed to have been ignorant of the attack until the Ministry had asked for his help.

Now he was listening to the gossip going through the school. As usual the story from the Prophet had been all through the school by the end of the first lesson. Now, a few hours later, the variations on what was going on stretched from someone new claiming the title of Dark Lord therefore challenging Lord Slytherin, to the claim that the ghosts of those Death Eaters who had died in Azkaban and the last war had come back to haunt them all.

If it weren't for the fact that three young women were missing and maybe even dead, it would have been quite hilarious. Sometimes Harry thought that creative writing assignments – other than divination homework – might make a nice addition to the curriculum. With the strange gossip springing up regularly, there just had to be a writing prodigy somewhere among the students.

He just had settled at the Slytherin table – Draco in a heated debate with Theo over the latest Quidditch news from the league – looking over the available dishes, when Hermione came over to sit with him, ruthlessly shoving the other boys a little to the side.

"Harry, you were gone so fast this morning! I've been wanting to talk to you since yesterday!"
Guess what Uncle Xerxes had to tell me!" The girl was so excited that the manners learned this summer had no chance to stand up to her enthusiasm.

Harry smirked, ignoring the reason he had run out this morning, and filled his plate with roasted vegetables, chicken breast, and potatoes. "Then do tell! You're almost bursting!"

With an indignant huff, Hermione gave Harry's shoulder a little punch, not happy he was teasing her, but not caring enough to leave and not tell him anything. "He not only came to bring the supplies for you, but because he wanted to inform me that the family might get two more people. He received a letter from two wizards – twins, he said – telling him that they think they might be his sons." Harry simply watched her and made the appropriate noises at the right moments. Once Hermione was on a roll it didn't need much to keep her talking. "Uncle Xerxes thinks it's possible. He was travelling after he finished school, as was tradition in many families who had enough money to make something like this possible. He said it was meant to give the young adults the opportunity to broaden their horizons, see new places, learn new things, before they had to take over their responsibility to their families."

Seeing the dangers of a looming tangent ahead, Harry quickly swallowed what he had been chewing, and interjected to keep his friend on track. "So he did more than travelling?"

Hermione blushed, but quickly came back to her train of thought, others around them now attentively listening. "Yes. He met a young witch, he said, and they got close." Her blush got deeper. "The two claim that their mother recently died and they went through her things. Finding his name in one of her diaries, they want to come here and test if they truly are his sons. I'm so excited! I'll get to meet wizards from another country, get to talk to them. Not in passing like during the World Cup, or only other European wizards and witches from Durmstrang and Beauxbatons."

"Where are they from?" Daphne asked from across the table. She had fixed some nice green hair-things – Harry had no idea what the contraptions used by girls for their hair were called – in some small braids, glittering in the candlelight, having an oddly distracting effect on Harry. Funny what he was noticing lately. The way someone wore their hair hadn't mattered much last year, besides noticing that it was either short, long, or somewhere in between. But now he looked at girls and found their hair was drawing his eyes, and the styles other boy's wore sparked the question if he maybe could manage something similar with magic, and if it would look better than his normally wild hair.

"South America. They've been travelling a lot, they wrote. Uncle Xerxes answered them yesterday, to invite them over for Christmas. He wanted to know what I thought, and reassure me that I was his heiress. Some grown men not carrying his name, born out of a liaison with a witch he hadn't known all that well…” Hermione blushed again, suddenly conscious that some might call the possible additions to her family bastards because their parents hadn't been married, and seemingly not sure how to react.

"Don't worry, Hermione," Daphne reassured the other witch, "Having children outside a marriage isn't really all that scandalous, as long as neither parent was married to another at the time. And the way it sounds, that wasn't the case here, was it?"

Harry listened only half-heartedly to the following discussion about bastard children throughout time both in wizarding and muggle society while he ate his delicious meal. It was still a little bit startling whenever his Gryffindor friends – really, any of them – interacted on friendly terms with his newer Slytherin friends.

Here he was hoping that this trend would continue. It was so much better than the alternative.
After his nap – much too short to really help with the fatigue, but already longer than he really could afford – Marvolo had called a few selected Death Eaters to his office in his Headquarters.
The Carrow twins now were out and about in the seedier pubs to be found in small villages and Knockturn Alley, listening in to drunken ramblings. He hoped that whoever had been dumb enough to risk angering him was also dumb enough to brag about it.

John Dawlish had brought a detailed report on what the Auror Department had managed to gather that would qualify as evidence. Sadly, it wasn't much. But knowing what the Ministry did and knew was important, so Marvolo had sent John home to get some much-needed sleep.

Over lunch Marvolo had talked with Xerxes and Lucius, sending them out to gather a picture of how his followers were taking the change, and who might be unhappy with the lack of violence.
Maybe he should have made such inquiries much earlier. It might be not really that useful to call his people too often, but the opportunity to scan their minds had always been a good one.

He would have to rectify his oversight tonight.

After a few well-placed spells, the big assembly room was clean and prepared for the Death Eaters.
"Barty." Stepping forward and going to his knees, Marvolo's assistant held out his arm, baring the Dark Mark. With his finger and a small pulse of magic Marvolo sent out the call, before he stepped back and sorted his robes a last time.

It didn't take long until the first figures appeared in the room with different levels of sound. Idly wondering what exactly determined the volume of the popping sound caused by apparation, Marvolo waited for all his people to arrive. He had instructed the Carrows to stay out, so when everyone but them was there, Marvolo launched into his little prepared speech.

Nagini was slithering around his feet – she finally was finished shedding her old skin and was much happier for it – adding to the menacing effect he was aiming for. "Someone has broken one of the few rules we always held dear. Someone is claiming something they aren't entitled to.
Someone will suffer greatly for this treacherous action." The burning fury that had been simmering in the back of his mind since he had been called to the Ministry finally broke to the surface. It crept into his words, making the s-sounds remarkably similar to the sounds of parseltongue, sending shivers through his followers. "You all have seen the news. If the one claiming our symbol for something I didn't authorise is among those standing here before me, Igor will get someone to keep him company." Somewhere in the back one dark figure fell to their knees, begging to be spared. Marvolo had to restrain an eye-roll. Such a pathetic display. That one probably wasn't the culprit.

"Severus!" The Potions Master stepped forward from his place among the others, confidently walked forward before sinking to his knees in a sea of pooling robes. Dark eyes behind a white and silver mask met with Marvolo's own red ones. It did not take much effort to link their minds so they could communicate via pictures and feelings. Marvolo showed his servant the names of all three missing witches and after that the image of his own graduation feast, with a feeling of overwhelming curiosity. Slytherins in their last year tended to bind their ties in a subtly different way. All three had graduated not that long ago, so it was reasonable to assume that Severus had taught them and might know something more. Quick images of all three witches – obviously from Potions classes – came from Severus' mind, accompanied by the feeling of certainty and thoughtfulness. The order had been given and received.

The next hour was gruelling. One after the other Marvolo called the Death Eaters before him and searched through their minds. It was embarrassingly easy to follow their desire to keep things hidden to the memories in question. And he got to see far too many things he would rather not have known. It seemed his people took his order to have bigger families to heart. One thing he was certain of rather quickly was that he certainly was no voyeur. Suppressing more than one shudder, Marvolo made his way through all those he didn't know as well, and incidentally those that hadn't been in his service as long as those he trusted more. The younger ones, those that had been made Death Eaters just months before that night, all weren't guilty. It was when Yaxley tried to run that he knew he had found a lead. A quick stunner and some binding ropes, and the useless wizard was ready to be interrogated.

This mind felt almost sticky, like honey, or tar. And Marvolo had to work his way through delusions until he found the memory of an evening in the dark and shabby backroom of a pub. He was giving a speech and trying to recruit his son and the boy's friends for an effort to help the Dark Lord back to the right path.

"You want to reinstate the custom of kept women? Are you insane?" Of course Marvolo knew about that custom. It really wasn't something only the wizards of Britain had ever thought of. In fact, Marvolo was convinced that the Vikings had brought the idea of prisoners of war to be used as slaves to the islands. All in all, using prisoners as slaves, selling, and even making them for that specific purpose had been part of several economies in the past. But it had been some time since such actions had been accepted practice. In fact, it had been wizards and witches who had realized it wasn't right rather earlier than Muggles did. Maybe the fact they didn't want to come in contact with non-magicals had made this easier, but they never would manage to change anything the political way if they tried to get that practice reinstated.

A long and freeing cruciatus later – Yaxley of course was screaming and writhing on the floor – Marvolo lowly growled to the wizard whimpering on the floor. "You will either go to the Aurors and turn your son in, or you will encourage him to do so himself. You have one day from now before I'll take action myself. Am I clear?" Another whimper was the only answer, but that would do.

"You others are dismissed." The message was clear enough, and they certainly wouldn't do something as stupid as this.

The hall cleared quickly, but it took some time for Yaxley to manage to get to his knees and move to leave himself. Marvolo impatiently tapped his foot. He had promised Henry to call on the mirror to keep the teenager up to date with what was happening. If Yaxley needed any longer, Marvolo would need to do something about it. "Hurry up!" Spurned into action by the venom in his Lord's voice, Yaxley finally managed to get out of the room.

Rolling his shoulders to loosen the kinks caused by leaning forward to look into the eyes of kneeling men, Marvolo walked out of the room to the office. He would need a headache relief potion before he could call Henry. This had been a rather long day. A really long day indeed.

They had woken up in a dingy small room, chained to the floor made from a rough, dirty stone. The three of them had quickly inspected the room as well as was possible with their arms and legs bound by heavy chains. The room wasn't big, or all that sturdy, but they couldn't reach the walls from where they were secured, so there was no way for them to find a weak spot in the wooden wall to break through.

Not one of them knew how long they had been unconscious, but judging by the fact they were hungry, thirsty, and needed the loo, it must have been the whole night and probably large parts of the next day.
Susan had been screaming for some time, calling for help, but now they had huddled down together, crying silently, trying to conserve warmth. They only had their nightwear and no heating. It was cold.

"If we had our wands we could be out of here by now!" Jenny murmured with anger, her arms slung around her own torso.

"But if they had managed to miss such an essential part of keeping someone prisoner, I would be rather more ashamed for having been bested by them," Neela snorted and they all had a short moment of humour before the despair of their situation chased the good mood away again.

Until now they had managed to keep their body functions under control, but it was getting rather uncomfortable fast. Before they could start to go over their possibilities – for the fourth or fifth time – the door opened, creaking on its hinges, admitting a figure garbed in dark, long robes, face hidden behind a bone white mask.

The three of them shuffled their positions so they could move better and have their eyes on the figure at the same time. Susan was wary. Who was that?

"There you are, weak, filthy, as dirty as your blood." There was a definitive sneer in that voice. But the way the figure moved, it was clear he – his voice at least sounded as if he was male – wasn’t all that sure of himself. "On your knees in the dirt where you belong. I will teach you your place." The laugh that followed was hollow and eerie. A cold shiver run down Susan's back. She hadn't thought that she could feel any colder than before that man had come in here.

Jenny's taunt of, "You know your robes are tatty, right? And I think the charm you used to get them black, is fading. Not much of a wizard, are you?" was rewarded with a harsh backhanded slap into her face, and a quick kick to the side for Neela.

"Silence! Susan will be mine, as she should have been the moment I decided to have her. And you others know that my comrades are at the moment playing a game of cards to see who gets to choose first." His following laugh was dirty and ended in a snicker. And suddenly Susan knew. That was that Yaxley boy, that pathetic little boy who had been obsessed with her in school. The one who couldn't take no for an answer. Cold dread filled her stomach. She was currently getting a degree in forensic psychology, she knew to what lengths stalkers would go to obtain the object of their fixation.

Two quick hexes from Yaxley's wand had the others stunned, before he grabbed a small vial from a robe pocket and opened it by popping the cork out with one thumb, holding it with the same hand. "Now be an obedient little mudblood and drink this. If you do, your existence as mine – like it should have been for far longer now – will be almost pleasant. But I will have you no matter what you do or think, make no mistake. Now drink!"

He pressed the phial against her firmly closed mouth. The scent of freshly baked cinnamon rolls, damp earth, and broom polish filled her nostrils. She knew that scent! Her eyes widened in horror. All girls in her year had at least once brewed amorntentia, or at least had scented it once. Interpreting who the one and only might be based on the scent each of them would get was a favoured party game at all-girl parties.

When Yaxley pinched her nose so she would have to open her mouth eventually to breathe, Susan knew that there was no way for her to escape the potion. Now she finally understood why the potion wasn't in the regular potions curriculum. It wasn't romantic to dose someone with a love potion. The last clear thought she had was that she hoped the Aurors would find them all fast. It was unlikely they would manage to get out of this by themselves.
The description of the Dark Mark and the way it works in the films let me wonder if there were other, friendlier, versions of shimmering and glittering lights hovering around. The fireworks the twins Fred and George came up with sounded similar. And suddenly the idea of a Nightlight Spell had been born. I hope you like it ;)

Various Troubles

Wednesday, 13th of December

Severus hadn't yet crossed the wardline of Hogwarts when his methodical search brought up results. It was a definite advantage to being an Occlumens that he could recall almost everything he ever had experienced at will. So since the moment the Dark Lord had given him the order to find who might know the three witches – and wasn't that mode of communication the most extraordinary – Severus had been combing his memory for hints of the three witches, whom he had seen them with, or any other moment that might be of any value. He had been so preoccupied with this that at first he hadn't noticed that their Lord had dismissed them, or even that someone had been tortured. In the past he never would have gone so deep into his own mind while in the presence of the Dark Lord. It was a sign of how much the man and circumstances had changed for Severus to be able to do that now.

Now he was standing a few steps away from the wardline, his mask safely stored in transfigured form in one of his pockets – handkerchiefs and pocket knives were favoured as concealment transfigurations – and had found probably important information the Aurors needed to know.

With a flick of his hand his wand dropped from its sheath, and Severus cast the patronus charm. It was getting easier and easier with each day he was living with Sonja. "Love, I will have to go to the Ministry, the abducted witches were students of mine. I might have information that will help. I probably will be late." With a flick of an ear the Patronus turned and galloped over towards the castle.

Severus turned on the spot, the image of the apparation space in the Atrium of the Ministry of Magic fixed in his mind. He was wearing his dark Death Eater robes, but as he always wore black billowing robes, that wasn't really noticeable without the mask and with the hood down.

Despite that, the wizard behind the security desk paled as he saw the infamous Hogwarts Potions Master striding towards him, the few people around quickly darting out of the way.

"Go...Good evening Professor Snape, sir. May I check your wand?"

With a sneer on his face – this was such a waste of time, what did this check even accomplish? – Severus handed over his wand, waiting impatiently until he got it back, before he strode away without greeting, aiming for the elevators.

It was an irate Severus Snape who stood in the elevator, watching the few flying memos circling the light, tapping his foot, while he listened to the artificially kind voice announcing the levels and departments.

When he strode into the Auror Department – reminding himself that he was Lord Prince and had every right to be here – he saw a scene that made him sneer even more. The few Aurors present looked like they hadn't slept in days, and the way they moved and talked implied that they had lost any and all hope.

With a snort Severus turned on his spot, searching for an Auror he knew or the Head of this particular department. When he spotted Head Auror Scrimgeour, Severus strode over with confidence in his steps. He had a right to be here, he had information to help three young witches, and helping them was in his purview both as their former professor and as Lord Prince.

"Excuse me," Severus made his presence known. The fact that he hadn't been called or approached until now wasn't a good sign for the state of the Auror force. Maybe what counted as peace had made them lose their edge. Severus remembered only too well how trigger-happy the Aurors had been at the end of the last war.

Turning, the direct boss of the Aurors noticed the figure standing by his side, instantly reacting by standing taller with his shoulders back. It was an impressive shift. "Professor Sna… Lord Prince. What gives us the honour of your visit?"

"I may have information pertaining to the abduction of Miss Smith and her two friends. They all were students of mine, and I recalled that another student was enamoured with Miss Smith. The fact that his advances were publicly and repeatedly declined wasn't really well received by him. I always felt he might be one of those people who can't accept no for an answer." Back then Severus had rolled his eyes and told the boy to not waste his time with someone who obviously wasn't interested in him and whom he couldn't marry anyway as his father wouldn't approve.

Suddenly there was something like life back in the few Aurors that stood near enough to hear their short conversation. Severus could see fire in the eyes of the man standing before him, determination pushing formality and politeness out of the way. "Who was that student?"

"His name is Cassius Yaxley, the oldest child of the current Head of the family. He was a Slytherin, and graduated together with Miss Smith. I'm not sure what became of him, but I recall that he had planned to study for a Cursebreaker position." In fact Severus only remembered vaguely that this had been the boy's plan from one of the many career meetings he had had with the fifth-years back then. It still was one of the more tedious jobs that came his way each year. Crushing dreams during those meetings when students simply had no way of reaching the needed qualifications wasn't his favourite pastime.

All in all, the impression of Cassius Yaxley that still remained in Severus' mind to this day wasn't a favourable one.

The Head Auror waved someone over and gave a nod to Severus. "Please give all information you have to Auror Tonks. She will make the official report. But we will act on this new information immediately."

As that probably was the best, Severus only nodded and followed Miss Tonks over to one of the desks where she waited until he had taken a seat before she sat down herself and got out some parchment and a quill. With an inaudible sigh Severus moved on the chair until he had found an acceptable position to sit in for a long time. If they hadn't changed their procedures much, he would be here for quite some time. At least now he was here as a witness and not as a suspect, like the last time after his Lord's fall. Only the Headmaster's intervention had kept him out of prison then.
Moving his attention from his fruitless musings to the young Auror across from him, Severus started to answer her questions in the hope that it wouldn't take the rest of his evening. He had hoped to play a game of chess with Sonja. Maybe that would still be possible if he made sure the questions were answered quickly.

With a loud clatter the book first impacted against the wall before it landed with a heavy thud on the carpet. Sirius watched this with blazing eyes, lowly growling in frustration. Why was this so bloody hard?

Hurried steps came nearer, first down the stairs and then down the corridor towards the library Sirius was sitting in, trying to work. The moment the door opened Sirius stood and started to pace, not in the least inclined to see the concerned – or maybe even amused – look on Remus' face.

"Moony, this is bloody insane! I swear mother, that insane bitch, removed every hint that there have maybe been any squibs in the Black family ever from all the books within this house!" To get rid of some of the frustration that had built again over the last weeks, Sirius slammed his hand against the wall, resulting in a sharp sting and a satisfying noise. "And I got the letter from the last experts on enchanted ancestry devices I asked. They say it would be better to create a new one and leave the old tapestry alone. They're afraid of possibly wrecking the thing entirely if they try to repair the damage done."

Remus sat down in the chair Sirius had so recently vacated and watched his friend pace. After a few moments of tense silence, Remus started to speak. "Maybe you should do something else for a while. You've been glued to these books for weeks now." Remus chuckled. "You never looked at any book so long back at school. Maybe with the exception of the one James smuggled into the dorm back in sixth year."

Sirius remembered only too well, and blushed. It had been a magazine bound in a cover to disguise its contents. Before then, all his knowledge about the anatomy of girls had been guessing and whispered speculation. His mother had been stifling in many ways. A relentless prudishness she imposed on her sons had only been one of them. Maybe his tendency to flirt with anyone whom he found at least a little bit interesting had had its origins in his rebellion against her and his father.

"And what would you suggest I should do?" Sirius heard his own frustration clear as day in his voice, and slumped down in a comfortable armchair near one of the many bookcases filled with old dusty tomes.

"Not sure. Go search for a present you can give Harry for Christmas? Blast a few more of those ugly ornaments your mother always used to decorate the house with into tiny teeny smithereens?" There was an amused shimmer in his friend's eyes as he suggested all his ideas.

Sirius contemplated those possibilities. "Well, I'm really not sure what Harry would like to have. He already has a serviceable broom… maybe he would like some tickets for a professional match?" It was really hard to think up good presents for a fifteen-year-old boy. Maybe some records and a way to play them in a magical environment… but what music did he like?

With a sigh he ceased to chase around his thoughts. "I guess I should work on bringing those back into the family who were turned out by my mother. That is something I can do. And I think Andromeda would be happy, and maybe a child of Dora's can take up the mantle of Lord Black after I'm gone." It was a good plan. Because Sirius had serious troubles seeing himself married and a father. He just couldn't imagine living like that.
"Or you can help me grade Harry's latest essay." A laughing Remus threw a scroll of parchment at his head, causing Sirius to duck. Some reflexes just never got lost.

Sirius made a face. History never had been something that interested him. Not even when his godson was writing an essay would he overcome that dislike.

"Or I could write a scathing letter to the editor about the scandalous way they have reported on the abduction of three young witches. Really, the Prophet gets more sensational by the day, Remus."

Remus only nodded. They had already spoken at length about the article and abduction over breakfast. Sirius could see the doubt in Remus' eyes. His friend was again fearing for Harry's safety with his new guardian. "I will repeat myself as often as I have to, Remus. Slytherin might be many things, but he isn't stupid. And doing something like this, when it's likely to be linked to his past and the Death Eaters… that wouldn't only be stupid, it would be dumb. I'm sure he isn't directly involved, and therefore is no bigger threat to Harry than he was yesterday. Please stop fretting."

"I know I'm being silly. But whenever there is happening anything good in my life, there usually comes something along to ruin everything. And now here we are. You've been proven innocent and are free, I have a good job I enjoy, someone with influence is working for better treatment for people affected by lycanthropy… I feel as if there is something just waiting to happen." Sirius could see the anxiety, the fear of what was to come in his friends eyes. As always since he was back from Azkaban, guilt coursed through him at what Remus didn't say. That when he had found friends, one of them had done something extraordinarily stupid and endangered the young werewolf's life. That Remus was still his friend after that was a miracle.

Before Sirius had a chance to come up with something reassuring to say – not that he was even certain he would have found something – the mirror he was carrying around in his pocket at all times started to make itself known. With an apologetic look to Remus, Sirius got the mirror out of his pocket and answered the call.

"Harry!" Sirius greeted, happy to see his godson, even if they talked nearly daily over those mirrors. The boy was already in his pyjamas and seated near the end of his bed. The Slytherin green was still startling to Sirius, but he had come to accept that the current Gryffindors had been extraordinary brats to Harry, even endangered his life. Tripping someone on or near stairs was a no-go for pranks. "It's quite late to call. You should be asleep, don't you think?"

Harry rolled his eyes, not taking Sirius seriously at all. His godson knew him too well. "I'm in bed already, am I not? So where's the problem? I wanted to ask you something."

With a jolt Sirius realized that the same doubts that plagued Remus might be haunting Harry as well. He certainly had seen the newspaper – nothing stayed secret for any stretch of time at Hogwarts – and logically had to know about the sighting of the Dark Mark and the abduction. "Is this about the abducted witches? You know I don't think that Lord Slytherin…"

Waving his hand impatiently Harry interrupted Sirius. "I know he didn't have anything to do with it. I called him this morning the moment I saw the article. He was at the Ministry, trying to give them all the information he had, and by the look on his face he was annoyed because they were acting stupid. I know that he knew nothing about it. No, I wanted to ask something different." And then Harry blushed.

For a moment Sirius was gobsmacked. Harry already knew that Slytherin had had nothing to do with the missing witches? Good. Then what was Harry wanting to ask? Blinking to get a clear head, Sirius asked. "What do you want to know? I'll try my best to answer."
"I know that you didn't like growing up as the Black heir, but I thought that you must have learned everything you would need… and you knew my dad, so maybe you can help me with…” His godson was an adorable, blushing, stuttering mess, and Sirius had a hard time not laughing. But showing his amusement clearly wouldn't do. So Sirius waited for Harry to get his bearings and actually ask something.

When Harry closed his eyes – probably mortified – Sirius allowed a grin to briefly spread over his face, watching his godson take some deep breaths to calm down.

"First I wanted to know what dad did to get his hair under control. Everyone always tells me that I look exactly like James, only my eyes being Lily's. So I guess dad had my hair too?" It was clear that Harry had asked the easier question first, but that was all right with Sirius.

With feelings of nostalgia and a little sadness, he nodded, his hair brushing over his ears and falling into his eyes. "He had the same messy hair. When he was your age he even tried to make the messiness more obvious. Cut it shorter… I remember that he always complained about his mother making him wear it longer than he would have liked. Maybe growing it out a bit will help? I would guess using haircare potions meant to smooth hair out would help too. Why do you ask? Don't like your hair?"

Moving his hand through his hair – making it stand on end even more – Harry scowled. "It's not that, exactly. But I will have to go to several events, balls, the like, during the holidays, and dress up and so on. And… well, I don't want to embarrass my date." And there it was again, the blush. Sirius remembered the parties he had had to go to back when he still was living with his parents. He had hated the parties when he had to talk with the grown-ups, but when he could go of with the other kids it had been bearable, fun even, from time to time.

But he planned to concentrate on the important parts. "You have a date?!" He wiggled his eyebrows. "Who's the lucky one?"

"Daphne – Greengrass – asked me to go with her. And I agreed. She's nice, and I had dancing lessons with her this summer. So I know that I won't get in trouble with her when I have to dance. She also said she's searching for someone else to marry, so I don't need to worry about her trying to snare me, or something." Sirius couldn't keep a small smile from making it to his face. Rambling teenagers were adorable. "And with a date, other girls – or their mothers, more likely – won't bother me, right? So I thought it was a pretty good plan, but now she's started to talk about coordinating our clothes, and I realized she probably expects me to do something about my hair. And I simply don't know how to get it to behave. So thanks for the idea with the potions and letting it get longer."

Sirius nodded when Harry suddenly fell silent, as if he had realized he was rambling. "It's always a good idea to go with someone you know what to expect from if you don't have someone you have an interest in. Greengrass… I remember that parts of that family were thought of as neutral back during the first war. There also were rumours that they, or at least a few of them, had been Death Eaters… But I guess you know her better than I ever knew those Greengrasses that went to school with me."

Harry nodded on his end of the mirror, looking a little less pale now that the blush was gone again. "Do you have any idea what to do about girls I don't even know asking me out to Hogsmeade? I guess I was a little rude the other day."

"You were asked to Hogsmeade by a girl you don't know? Well, I didn't know you were so popular with the girls already." Something like that certainly warranted a little teasing. Nobody had asked him on a date when he had been fifteen.
Harry blushed again. "Stop that! A younger Gryffindor girl asked me. And I told her no. I will go with Luna and my friends. Why would I even go with someone I've seen a few times but never spoke to? People are weird sometimes."

Harry was growing up so fast. For a moment regret flooded through Sirius. Regret that his attempt to get Wormtail back for his betrayal had landed him in prison, making it impossible for him to be there for Harry as he should have been. Not for the first time Sirius wondered if Dumbledore had neglected to do more to ensure Sirius had a fair trial so the Headmaster would be the one to place Harry. He shook his head and redirected his attention to a more immediate concern. "It seems as if you are becoming a man, Harry. Noticing girls? Do you know what you need to know? Don't let anyone pressure you to do anything you're not comfortable with. Or your partner! That's really important! Always make sure whatever you do, that your partner is on the same page and happy as well." How to structure a talk like that? He had gotten the talk together with James, and it had been mortifying. But now Sirius knew how important it was to have real information, not just the stories passed down from one generation of schoolboys to the next.

Harry's face was as red as a quaffle when he interrupted Sirius. "No need, Sirius, really. I already got the talk during this summer. I think once is plenty! I know the contraceptive charm, and also what etiquette there is... really! And if I have questions, I'm sure to come talk with you."

Now it was Sirius' turn to frown. He remembered Slytherin asking him if he was prepared to talk with Harry over such matters. "He gave you the Talk? Seriously? Was it any good?" Harry was adamant not to retell his experience with Slytherin giving the Talk. But the fact that the maybe-former Dark Lord had given Harry a copy of the book Useful Charms for the Young Bachelor – one he and his friends had coveted when they had been teenagers – was much more interesting anyway.

In the end Remus had to break off their discussion, pointing out that it was quite late and Harry would have to get up early the next morning. It was a much happier Sirius who got to bed that night. Speaking with Harry about such trivial teenager things had lifted his spirits.

Tonks was excited and eager to act. After Professor Snape – or Lord Prince, as she should address him now, who would have thought? – had been in the office to give them what information he had, energy had been back in their actions. They all knew that most crimes of a violent nature happened between people who knew each other. Brothers, spouses... close family and friends were more likely to do each other harm, than total strangers. Exceptions were terrorist attacks, like those that had happened in the last war, and crimes done when a thief was spotted doing their work. Or something along those lines. But abduction?

After it was reasonably clear that Lord Slytherin knew nothing about the abduction, she had been sure it probably was a crime belonging to the first group. With a lead on who might have had an interest in getting Miss Smith under their power by force, it hadn't taken long to find his address in the Floo register.

They were now readying themselves to go after the young man and maybe rescue some young witches – not that much younger than Tonks – as the young Yaxley was still only considered a suspect.

Looking around, Tonks came to the conclusion that the insistence on calling the wizard a suspect was only a technicality. For anything else, the team assembled was just too big. Tonks herself had been assigned to the healers they would take with them, to make sure they were safe to do their work. She wasn't quite sure if she should be happy with this job, or complain that she was kept out of the way of the real action.

After a pointed glare from one of the senior Aurors, Tonks rolled her eyes but changed her hair from bubblegum-pink to a dull and muted muddy-blue. She stood next to the pair of healers, watching as the first team used one of the portkeys to get to their destination.

Then it was finally time to use their portkey to follow the rest. Tonks landed in a slight crouch, her wand out, already scanning the surrounding area for dangers. She blinked in surprise as she took in the scene before her.

A greying, older wizard in robes of an old-fashioned cut was standing to the side – behind a few Aurors – yelling at the top of his lungs. Between the other noises Tonks just managed to make out a few of his sentences. "No son of mine would ever be this stupid! I can't believe the Hat actually put you in Slytherin! You have brought shame upon yourself!"

Those words seemed to be aimed at a younger wizard, only wearing a nightshirt, his hair sleep-tousled, a witch wearing barely anything standing before him as if she was shielding him. The young wizard hiding behind the young witch was snarling at everyone around them. "What right do you have to invade my dwelling! Leave now!"

All the while the young witch, wielding a frying pan of all things, tried to stay between the Aurors and the wizard behind her. Her words didn't seem to make any sense. "You can't have my Cassius! He's mine! I don't share!" The lone female Auror standing near seemed to draw the most anger.

Well, this was more complicated than Tonks had anticipated. Unsure what she should do, she looked on as one Auror tried to silence the older wizard without using force, while another tried to talk the witch down.

"Ridiculous! That's never going to work," Tonks heard one of the healers murmur and the two stepped around Tonks, aiming their wands at the couple surrounded by Aurors. Two quick stunners and the distracted couple fell to the floor. Smirking, Tonks followed the two healers. She could approve of such pragmatic problem-solving. The boss of this operation clearly was of another opinion.

"Healer Vane! You can't just stun our suspect! You clearly are overstepping the boundaries of your competence!"

Healer Vane cut him off. "Auror Proudfoot, you clearly had trouble getting those two under control. I suspect that at least one of them, if not both, are under the influence of a mind-altering potion or substance. I was within my authority to harmlessly incapacitate them to keep them from harming themselves or others."

"And what substance would that be?" Proudfoot clearly didn't belief the healer's assessment, his voice dripping with disdain.

"Some love potion – maybe even Amortentia – for the witch. She certainly was in the tight grip of jealousy. Quite contrary in such a situation, don't you think? I'm not yet sure about him. But we'll see."

Tonks followed her orders to the letter, not once moving more than a step away from the healers. Not often was there an opportunity to listen in to so much amusing bickering between senior members of the Auror Department, or for one of the older Aurors who looked down on her, the female newbie only there because of her Metamorphmagus abilities, to be constantly teased about his lack of control over a situation.
With a smile on her lips and her hair back to a brightly shining lemon-yellow, Tonks helped to get the two stunned people to the Ministry, while a few others brought the father of the wizard to the Department to be questioned with his grudging acceptance.

Hopefully they would get the location of the other girls fast, so they could get them out before the others involved in this scheme could decide to do something drastic.

Thursday, 14th of December

The newspaper on Thursday morning brought the news that the witches had been found during the night after Lord Prince and Lord Slytherin had given important information to find the responsible people, arresting them.

Harry noted with interest that no names were mentioned, nor were any places. He remembered too clearly the way Skeeter had reported on the Tournament last year, and how all real and imagined facts about him had been paraded out for all to read and gossip about.

Funny how that changed when there was someone with power affected.

After his call with Sirius, he had received a short one from Marvolo informing him that he had found out who was responsible and had instructed the father of the young man to make sure the problem was resolved in a way that the witches were returned safely.

Yaxley senior had connections – the main reason why Marvolo had bothered with recruiting him in the first place – and those now served to shield his family name from the backlash of his son, his oldest son, abducting three witches and casting the Dark Mark over their house.

Those same connections probably had helped the man stay out of Azkaban after the war. Harry snorted, his eyes narrowed in anger.

"What's the matter, Harry?" Theo asked, filling his goblet with milk. "They've been found. That's good, right?"

"It is," Harry agreed, folding the newspaper and placing it in one of the few spots on the table where there was some free space. "But I don't like the way the Prophet reported on the story." Harry left it at that. He was aware that he couldn't risk informing the others about what else he knew. He couldn't tell them that the son of Corban Yaxley, a Death Eater, had used the Dark Mark in an attempt to get the Dark Lord to go back to the old way of doing things. Or that the Headmaster might be losing his mind and was currently missing, probably to evade an examination by experts.

Revealing all the information Marvolo passed on to him would be a risk. Sometimes not knowing something was easier, because back then he hadn't had the responsibility of keeping the information from those that shouldn't know.

"The way they use the euphemism of kept women to talk about what would essentially be sexual slavery is sickening," Pansy agreed from behind her own Prophet. "There is a difference." The following discussion between the fifth-year Slytherins was distraction enough that Harry could stay silent, eating his breakfast, and taking his potions. He hoped that Yaxley wouldn't manage to get his son out of the punishment he deserved, and that the Headmaster would either be removed from the school or that the plan to abduct a student wasn't real. And that the test they would have today in Potions wouldn't be too hard.
With a sigh Harry ate the last bite of his toast before he packed his bag to follow after the others.

Friday on his way to lunch with the others, Harry saw the Headmaster for the first time after that meal when all the Governors had walked up to the Head table. But now the old man was walking towards them with a spring in his step as if there had never been anything wrong enough for him to vanish for a few days.

The discussion between Theo and Daphne about whether it was easier to silence a raven or a toad suddenly stopped, when the Headmaster stepped in their way, his eyes trained on Harry, a smile fixed unmovable on his wrinkled face. The fact that the Headmaster was wearing robin's-egg-blue robes didn't even register.

"Harry, my boy! Please come with me, so we can talk. I promise to not keep you too long, so you won't miss out on lunch." The way the Headmaster presented his request was pleasant enough, but something about the man seemed off. Even without Marvolo's warning – delivered more than once since the start of the week – Harry wasn't so sure he would have liked to go anywhere with the Headmaster alone in that moment.

"What do you want to talk about, Headmaster? Both my guardian and my healer insist that I'm not allowed to skip meals. So if this isn't super-important, I would rather go to the Great Hall for lunch now." Harry knew that this was a change in his behaviour from previous years. In the past he would have waved to his friends, silently promising to tell them everything later, and walked off with the Headmaster, happy to be told anything at all. But back then the friends at his back would have been Ron and Hermione, not Theo, Daphne, Draco and the rest of the fifth-year Slytherins. Not all of them were truly his friends, but Slytherins always travelled in packs, and for good reasons too.

A merry twinkle was in the blue eyes as the Headmaster peered over his half-moon glasses down at the students. "I just wanted to ask how you feel now, living in Slytherin, Harry. There never were many re-sortings, and none in the time I have been at Hogwarts. I'm curious if it is working out as you had hoped. Nothing more." Harry felt the hairs on his arms rise. If someone felt the need to add those last two words, there certainly would be more than just asking how he felt in Slytherin. By the way the others shifted behind him, Harry was sure they had heard it too.

But the Headmaster's supposed question was easy enough to answer. "I like it. Living as a Slytherin in the Dungeons, sir. The rooms are nice, and it's a nice change not to have to climb all those stairs every time when I need to retrieve something from the dorm." Harry made himself smile up at the Headmaster and suddenly felt something brush against his occlumency shields when his green eyes met the blue ones of the Headmaster. Startled, Harry took an involuntarily step back, dropping his eyes to his bag slung across his shoulder, as if to check that the roll of parchment – his notes from charms – wasn't about to fall out.

Harry's thoughts were racing. Professor Snape had told him that there were Master Legilimens out there able to use their ability to dip into the minds of others without the use of their wands, or any incantations. He had even told a story about natural Legilimens able to read the thoughts of all around them without even trying, needing to work hard to close their own minds against the onslaught of strangers' thoughts.

But Harry never would have guessed that the Headmaster would go so far as to illegally invade a student's mind. His trust in the man his parents had followed in the last war had been strained before, a few cracks here and there – not getting Sirius out of prison, the sparsely given information – but now it shattered into a thousand pieces.

On the outside there was no indication that Harry had just deflected a mind-probe from the Headmaster. "I'm happy to hear that, my boy. It's sad how a few individuals could make your life up in the tower so difficult that leaving your friends behind seemed the better alternative."

Was that a threat? "We're still at the same school, Headmaster. And if you would excuse us, we're going to be late, and I had promised my friends to eat with them." With a polite nod, and a few polite and empty words muttered from the others, their group slipped by the Headmaster and walked down the corridor a little bit quicker than before.

Harry felt that he was trembling, and was so happy right now that Marvolo had insisted he learn Occlumency to help them keep their emotions from leaking over to each-other. If Harry hadn't learned, would he even have known what the Headmaster had just done?

He let his gaze sweep over the walls in the corridor they were walking through. Paintings hung left and right, decorated with green branches from different conifer trees, charmed icicles, and sparkling baubles – the decorations had gone up earlier in the week – before he shook his head and took a few deep breaths to get the trembling under control. "Not here. Later!"

Without further comment the Slytherins surrounded him, starting up harmless conversations about homework, the upcoming Hogsmeade weekend, the holidays, and whatever they could come up with that wouldn't arouse any suspicions should someone be eavesdropping. The tension thrumming through Harry's body didn't leave him until they set foot into the Great Hall. It was unlikely that the Headmaster would do something to him here among all the other students and therefore so many witnesses.

Albus stood in the corridor looking after the retreating Slytherin students walking in a tight group around Harry. He was perplexed. It seemed someone had taught the boy Occlumency. He hadn't thought that the boy was even capable of such a feat. Harry, after all, was quite young and emotional. Certainly Tom hadn't been able to instruct the boy himself? Regardless of where the boy had learned to shield his mind, even just with the flimsy shields of a beginner of the art, it was unfortunate. The damage was done now. The hasty retreat could only mean one thing: Harry had noticed Albus' probe and recognized it for what it was. It had been a foolish attempt. Why had he even thought that the boy might know something of Tom's plans? It wasn't like anyone sensible would trust a child with important information.

Shaking himself, Albus wrenched his thoughts away from this unproductive path. He didn't have that much time to get done what he had planned to do, before the potions he had taken to bypass diagnostic charms indicating his mind was declining would lose their potency. Of course there wasn't anything wrong with him. But taking the potions would negate any negative spells or substances slipped to him for as long as it took the healers to give him a clean bill of health.

So with a spring in his step, Albus walked the path the group of students had taken only moments before, intent on reaching the Great Hall before lunch ended.

At first his entrance through the big door didn't garner much attention, giving him the time to search the sea of students for Harry and those that had been with him. They were seated at the Ravenclaw table together with Miss Granger from Gryffindor and a blonde girl from Ravenclaw who looked supremely surprised. They were talking quickly, Harry and a few of the others looking quite pale.

Ignoring that problem for the moment – he always could claim that the sensation Harry might claim to have felt was a mere imagination of someone just starting to learn that complex art – Albus strode confidently up to his place at the head table, smiling genially as his old friends and younger colleagues spotted him.

"Albus!" Poppy exclaimed, quickly standing from her place, food on her plate forgotten. "We've been trying to reach you! Where have you been?" By the time Albus had reached the steps to the dais, Poppy had rounded the table, wand in hand, as if she planned to cast diagnostic charms at him right here in front of the whole student body.

"Poppy!" Albus aimed for a light chiding tone. "No need to get quite so worked up! I merely took a few days to sort a personal matter." He had not informed Minerva of his absence, but he was sure she hadn't had any trouble taking up his responsibilities. "Now I'm back. What was it you wanted to speak with me about?"

Of course he knew what her fretting was about, but he just kept smiling, walking around her and the table to get to his seat. He was going to eat lunch – or attempt to – before she dragged him off to be poked by a bunch of healers. There was cauliflower today and he loved cauliflower. With the butter sauce and potatoes, they made for a fine meal.

"Albus!" Poppy called out with a scandalized expression on her face, causing him to chuckle. "You will come with me after we have eaten. Do you hear me? And no skiving off this time!"

As this matched wonderfully with his own plans, Albus just nodded, sitting down, throwing his beard over his shoulder, reaching for the potatoes with one arm.

It seemed as if something was going his way for once.

ooooOOooo

"He did what?" Hermione whispered furiously, something like fear in her brown eyes.

"It felt as if he was trying to get a look at my thoughts. Not my memories, but what I was thinking at that exact moment." Harry felt shaky still, even now, sitting between his friends at the Ravenclaw table, neutral territory between his friend from Gryffindor, Luna, and all the Slytherins almost glued to his side.

"But how?"

Before Harry could start on an explanation of what Legilimency was, Hermione's mouth fell open into a surprised O, making it clear that she had just remembered something. The things she had read and remembered were scary sometimes. "The Headmaster is a Legilimens? But it's illegal to read somebody's thoughts without their consent! I know that for a fact!" Hermione was flustered and looking around as if she were trying to find a reason that she could accept as good enough, for why the Headmaster would do something like that. Harry noted with a little satisfaction that it seemed to be difficult for his clever friend to come up with an explanation.

Harry noticed the Headmaster stepping into the Great Hall when Theo leaned in a little more. "Give it up, Granger. There is no good reason for the Headmaster to peek into the mind of a student. I guess it's his blatant prejudice against any and all Slytherins at work here."
Hermione hadn't much ground to argue about that one. It was pretty clear that the Headmaster had a tendency to short-change the Slytherins whenever he had a chance. In one of many discussions, Theo had brought up their first year and how the Headmaster had waited for literally the last moment before he had pulled the rug from under the Slytherins' feet. It had only taken a moment for Hermione to realize how hard that must have been on the first-year Slytherins, to come to the Feast knowing they had won, only to have it taken from them the way the Headmaster had done back then.

Hermione chewed on her own lip, looking conflicted. "The references I've seen only mentioned that it was illegal to use Legilimency on someone without their consent. How were you able to sense it? Are you sure that he really did try…" The hard look in Harry's eyes killed whatever Hermione wanted to say right in her mouth.

"Just be sure to avoid eye contact. It will prevent him from gaining access," Harry said grimly. He needed to call Marvolo as soon as possible to inform him of what had happened. Hopefully he wouldn't ban Harry from going to Hogsmeade this weekend. He had been looking forward to it for days now. And he needed to get some small tokens as presents for his friends.

"How did you learn to protect yourself from Legilimency?" Now Hermione had abandoned her tries to defend the Headmaster and her thirst for knowledge made itself known. Draco rolled his eyes behind her back. He had stopped the worst of his teasing and bickering since Hermione had been named heiress Lestrange, but still had trouble accepting her unrelenting quest for ever more knowledge.

Luna, stirring her stew absentmindedly, answered in her usual dreamy voice. "It's hard to learn Occlumency without the instruction and help of a Master. Father tried to help me learn, but we didn't get very far." Harry gave her a calculating look. Judging by what Professor Snape had told him, Occlumency was an obscure art because it was almost impossible to learn it without proper instruction and a Legilimens to help with practice. There weren't many Master Legilimenses around most of the time, and fewer people still were willing to let a stranger into their heads as was needed to learn effectively.

"My instruction started with meditation," Harry explained to the crestfallen Hermione, as always unhappy with knowledge that might be unattainable for her. "I'm sure you can start with something like that, and then ask your uncle for more help?" Harry was almost certain that Lord Lestrange would be able to either ask Professor Snape for his help or to find another master to instruct his heiress. If there was someone with the self-discipline needed to master this, it would be Hermione. At least Harry was pretty sure she would have an easier time of it than he himself had had.

"I've had instruction in meditation as well," Daphne added to the conversation. "Mother always said it was a good way to pass boring parties and endure the most dreadful of guests." Laughter followed this explanation, given with a roll of blue eyes and a mock shudder. The eerie mood so broken, the rest of lunch passed rather pleasantly. But Harry didn't forget what the Headmaster had tried to do, firming his resolve to call Marvolo as soon as he was back in the dorm after classes let out.

It was quite early – he just was dressing for dinner – when the mirror sitting face down on the dresser started to buzz. With a small frown – why would Henry call now? – Marvolo picked the mirror up, buttons on his shirt only half done up, answering the call.

"Henry, are you well?" The boy looked anything but. He was pale, but his cheeks were flushed, his eyes were bright, but looking around nervously, the moving background indicating that Henry wasn't sitting down but pacing, probably in his room.

"Yes… yes I'm well. Frightened a little, nervous, confused, but well." Henry paced, the candlelight flickering in the draft his fast pacing created.

Waiting for Henry to continue, Marvolo carefully walked backwards until he sat on the edge of his bed, Nagini hissing, annoyed at being jostled. When the boy just kept pacing, Marvolo prompted him. "Why do you call before dinner has even begun? Normally you call after you are finished with whatever you had to do for the day. And didn't you have the Defence Club today?"

With a huff Henry let himself fall down into a seat – probably onto the bed – and nodded slowly. "Yes, we had. It went well. No, what I need to tell you happened just before lunch." The boy took a deep breath and obviously braced himself. "On the way down to lunch we met the Headmaster today. He asked a few pointless questions, wanted me to go with him – alone – and then asked me how I was acclimating in Slytherin. And I'm sure the moment I met his eyes, the old man tried to read my mind. I quickly broke eye contact, and then we walked away. But now your warning sounds much closer, more threatening. I wouldn't have thought he would do something like that… despite everything I've learned since the summer…" Fisting one hand agitatedly into his unruly hair, Henry huffed again, his eyes seemingly resigned to the troubles he was constantly faced with.

"It can be hard to let go of past impressions of people." Marvolo always had been dismissive of others, disregarding them. There had been a few instances where he had had to struggle to accept that they were more cunning and capable than he had thought. Or that a muggleborn witch could hold her own against him, even if only for a short time. He'd never had to endure the agony of losing someone he had held in high regard, to the depths of betrayal by their hands. His expectations had always included that possibility, but he imagined that it would be hard. Realising that someone you thought was a hero in fact had more of a villain than could be ignored.

"I think you will find that the Headmaster was committed to St. Mungo's this evening for a time of treatment against the effects of exposure to Dark Magic. At the moment it looks like the effects might be reversible, and the old man allegedly went willingly. For the moment Professor McGonagall will take over the duties of Headmistress." The relief on his son's face was so obvious it only illustrated the distress the boy had been in. "I'm sure I don't need to remind you that none of this can reach the ears of others from your mouth before the official announcement is made."

Henry huffed again, rolling his eyes with a playful smirk on his face, he seemed to find it amusing that Marvolo had reminded him to keep it secret by telling him that he wouldn't remind him. "So there's no reason for me to stay in the castle tomorrow? It's a Hogsmeade weekend."

Marvolo smiled a little evilly at that, only slightly dimming the hopeful smile on Henry's face. "I think you can go if you agree with me tagging along. I would even say that being in the village and not the almost empty castle is safer anyway. I will meet you and your friends at the gate to Hogwarts' grounds when?"

"We'll go right after breakfast. But I guess we won't get up all that early. So, around ten in the morning?" Henry sounded unsure, but if that was because he wasn't sure when he and his little friends would be ready to leave, or because he didn't know how they would react to find Lord Slytherin accompanying them.

"I will aim to be ready then. Give me a call on the mirror when you leave the castle. I will apparate then." That sorted out, they spoke about inconsequential things until someone knocked on Henry's door calling him to come to dinner. Then they quickly ended their call.

With a sigh Marvolo finished dressing. It seemed he would have to change his plans for the following day. But keeping his heir safe was more important than a breakfast meeting with some Lords who were likely to agree with him anyway. They all claimed to hold family above all. They should understand. Or he would make them understand.

Chapter End Notes

I wish you all a few happy days, a good start into the next year, and good health!

Thanks to Jordre and Jake for helping to improve my spelling!

他发现自己异常紧张。他正打算向自己的朋友和同学寻求建议。没有什么好害怕的，也没有什么可羞愧的。也许当他们还在一年级的时候罗恩会因为他的问题而大笑，但现在他的老朋友和哈利一样关心给他留下好印象。虽然斯莱特林的其他五年级的学生不会嘲笑哈利。或者至少哈利在说服自己他不会。在去其他人宿舍的走廊上哈利用最后的一口气，抵抗着与巨魔的战斗，同时对这个感到非常可笑。他敲门并打开门的时候听见了里面叫他进来的声音。

“哈利！这么早到真是惊喜！你为什么这么早来？”西奥从他正在扣衬衫的时候回答。他之前说过他们要在公共休息室见面的。“是的，”哈利点点头，虽然他周围其他男孩的早晨例行公事只在他意识的边缘。他看到一串不好的笑话正要从他朋友的舌尖上冒出来，所以哈利赶紧解释了他需要建议的原因。“我想今天去霍格沃茨拿到一些头发护理药水来控制下我的头发。因为达芙妮会喋喋不休地抱怨我不尝试。所以我需要你的建议看下什么样的工作，我能在尝试前得到，因为如果不行的话我还有时间换种不同的东西。”

哈利稍微有些害羞地缩在最近的封闭木箱上，避免打扰其他人。

“我帮不了你，”西奥说，微微一笑。他的头发天生就很好。”

哈利突然有一种想吐的冲动，但幸好他没有真的这样做。“不是每个人都能像你那么秃头，西奥。”

“我们知道了。”哈利点了点头，他只是隐约意识到其他男孩在说他们的早上例行公事。他姨妈和姨丈有访客时，哈利就被赶进壁橱，或者——后来——楼上的房间。但他姨丈被迫打扮——他表弟的言辞非常清楚的表明他讨厌打扮得体——因为他足够聪明知道自己得到了一些好处。例如，薇尔莉特的妹妹常来时给她的侄子一些钱。

终于呼吸了一口气，不时地抵抗着一个巨魔，哈利敲门并打开门，听见里面有叫他进来的声音。

哈利突然有一种想吐的冲动，但幸好他没有真的这样做。“不是每个人都能像你那么秃头，西奥。”

“Well, I can’t help you there,” Theo said, smirking. “My hair is naturally well behaved.”

哈利有突然地冲动想要吐，但幸好他没有真的这样做。“不是每个人都有你那么秃头的头发，西奥。”
"He is right about that, Theo. So step aside and let someone with an inkling of common sense take over," Draco said with more haughtiness in his voice than he usually exhibited when in relatively private situations. "Come here!" the blond boy commanded, waving Harry over to his own bed. "I need to take a closer look at your problem."

It felt silly, but Harry complied, walking over to the other boy’s bed, sitting down on it at Draco’s direction.

“You could try Sleekeazy’s. But if you want to go for a less drastic change, you could try the newer Pompouse-Pomade potion that is sold in the Apothecary at Hogsmeade. With that many cowlicks, it’s hardly a wonder your hair resists being styled.” Draco had spoken with conviction and now Harry was contemplating his choices. Normally he didn’t have to cut his hair often. But the short haircut Aunt Petunia had insisted on really wasn’t flattering at all. It just didn’t work with his hair. At all.

“Do you think letting my hair grow some would help?” Harry asked the room in general, looking over the boys in various states of dress, or undress in Goyle’s case, who just came out of the bathroom where he obviously had showered.

“It can’t do any worse when it’s longer,” Blaise claimed, only sending Theo into a fit of chuckles.

“Now you’ve jinxed it!” Theo laughed, stopping in the middle of tying his tie.

The conversation – if one could call it that – dissolved into banter after that, until they all were ready to go up to the Great Hall for breakfast. Harry now had a plan, and felt better for it.

OOOOOOOO

It was a group of bundled-up teenagers that met at the doors to the grounds. It was lightly snowing, the air freezing cold. It was a hard winter day, and all of them, as well as all the others around them, were buzzing with excitement.

The moment they stepped out of the castle, Harry got his mirror out of the pocket of his cloak. Careful not to drop it, as the mittens he was wearing were hindering his hand movements a little.

“What are you doing?” Ron wanted to know, stuffing his hands into woollen mittens, probably knitted by his mother.

“Calling…” For a moment Harry hesitated. How should he call Marvolo in this mixed company? With the Slytherins he always called him father, claiming him and a little bit more security, but when with Gryffindors he had called him his guardian grudgingly, because they all had so many deep-rooted opinions on him. But now, there were Luna, Ron, Hermione and Neville, Draco, Theo, both Crabbe and Goyle, Daphne, her little sister Astoria. A mixed group. In the blink of an eye Harry made a decision. “...my adoptive father. He insisted that he come along today if I wanted to go. Arguing wouldn't have done anything. So I'm telling him that we're on our way, and he will meet us at the gates.”

Hopefully Harry would manage to slowly help his friends accept that he was happy now. It was still tense sometimes, and he wasn’t always sure that he really should feel like he did, but Madame Goyle was helping him cope with that, to work on being happy, being himself.
“That sucks!” Was Ron’s only reaction. Either he hadn’t heard how Harry had called Marvolo or he had tried – rather successfully – to pretend that he didn’t care.

So he made the short call before turning back to his red-headed friend. “It’s better than being stuck at the castle!” Harry laughed, shoving Ron a little off course, starting a short snow fight, bringing colour to all of their cheeks, even as some of the Slytherins and Hermione tried to stay out of it.

When they stopped a few moments later, they took up their walk down to the gates again. “And it really isn’t quite safe for me to be out alone. Fenrir is still at large. Then this thing with the young women being abducted, Death Eater wannabes… and then there are still the just generally crazy, or the criminals out for money…” Harry trailed off, shrugging. And before Ron could formulate a response to that, Harry felt his left hand seized and turned to see who was walking at his side.

Luna smiled serenely up at him, her blonde hair sticking out from under a light blue hat decorated with what probably were dried pieces of fruit and feathers from different birds. “Thanks for asking me along. It’s really nice to have friends.”

Harry nodded. After all she was right. Having friends was great. But why had she captured his hand? With a bemused expression and a curious feeling in the pit of his stomach, Harry turned to look forward again – he didn’t want to slide in one of the piles of snow last night’s storm had created – slowly swinging their linked hands between them, their friends around them making plans on where to go first.

ooOoo

It didn’t take long to grab the warm cloak, his scarf, a pointed hat – with the way the weather was, one would be required – and gloves from fine leather and fur. A few moments later he was outside the anti-apparation wards and spun on the spot. And just as Marvolo had thought, it was snowing, the thick layer of snow crunching under his booted feet. It was a fine day just before the winter holidays would begin. In a way he was happy to get Henry back home, spend a little more time with him.

It was funny how much had changed since the summer. Their daily talks over the mirrors really had helped to create a feeling of family between them. At least Marvolo thought it was what family should feel like. He admittedly hadn’t much experience in that area of life.

Soon the first students walked past him, throwing him curious glances. Some of them walked faster, as if wary of him, not really an unreasonable reaction to a strange man standing at the gates of a school. Then he saw a mixed group of students, easily recognized by their House-themed scarves, walking down the path. A smile stole onto his face. It seemed so easy for his son – it still felt really good to think that – to bridge the normally existing chasm between Gryffindor and Slytherin Houses. And he didn’t even try. What Marvolo would have done if he had been able to gather people around himself so easily. Well, he had gathered people easily enough. But they all had shared the same interests, the same background. The people Harry had around himself were different in so many ways. Was this the so-call power that he himself didn’t know? In the end it was inconsequential. Marvolo had no plans to make anything out of the self-fulfilling prophecy.

When the teenagers reached the gate, Marvolo took a step forward and greeted them. “Good day! I hope you’ll still have a good day with an adult trailing behind you!” That got a few shy laughs from the group and broke the ice. When Henry walked past him, Marvolo briefly laid his hand on the boy’s shoulder in greeting. He got a smile in return, and from the girl walking next to Henry, holding his son’s hand – that was unexpected, he would need to get information on her – he got something that looked like a confused or dreamy smile.

Marvolo tried to make his presence as unobtrusive as he could. He was here to make it possible for his son to enjoy the outing with his friends, not to stifle any joy that would come from such a day in the village.

Once again Marvolo couldn’t help but compare today’s Hogsmeade with the one he had known from his own youth. Most of it was exactly the same. The Three Broomsticks was still there, no new houses had been build. But the booth just outside of Honeydukes was new. It was decorated in the most garish colours, with moving holiday crackers exploding again and again.

The children quickly noticed that new oddity as well, and their course changed so they were walking in that direction. It was slow going, as the mass of students consisting of those with the same destination and those that were just crossing the path they were walking was so big.

“Is that Fred and George?” the youngest Weasley boy asked, standing on tiptoes in an effort to look over the heads of all those walking around. “What are they doing there?”

“Looks like they're selling something,” Lucius’ son drawled, probably rolling his eyes by the sound of it.

“Yes. I know that!” The red-head sounded annoyed. “But what?”

“Really, Ron. Just look at the banner they've put up.” That was the Muggleborn girl, Granger. She sounded as if she were rolling her eyes as well. A sentiment Marvolo could easily agree with. It wasn’t that hard to deduce what the Weasley twins were selling at their probably temporary booth.

Finally they managed to get to the booth, where they could finally see that there were three teenagers manning it. The red-headed twins known beyond Hogwarts as pranksters extraordinaire, and a boy their age with dark skin and dreadlocks. They were calling out the benefits of their merchandise and demonstrating now and then how the Christmas crackers – because that was what they were selling here – were working.

When the unknown boy and one of the twins pulled at the opposing ends of a cracker, first there was a mighty boom to hear, then a pink cloud of smoke smelling of violets came out and drifted over the watching crowd. When the two pulling it became visible again, the crowd started to laugh. They both had been dyed pink and were wearing frilly hats.

For a moment the picture of Lucius Malfoy dyed a deep toad green flashed through Marvolo’s mind, and he stifled a small laugh. It would certainly be hilarious. And totally juvenile.

.:Don’t dare to bring such things to our festivities!: Marvolo hissed to his son, who eyed the offered selection with obvious interest. There was no way that he could allow such indignities to happen during his own party.

.:I actually thought that Sirius would love them: was the unconcerned reply delivered with a cheeky grin over the boy’s shoulder.
To that all Marvolo could do was nod. Sirius Black certainly would find those abominations funny. But the man wasn’t really all that mature. At least not when it came to pranks, jokes, and the like. “As long as they don’t make an appearance during the small event that we’ll be hosting. It’s your money to spend!”

So Henry made his way over to the front of the crowd, Marvolo keeping an eye on him and the surroundings. It was hard to keep his eyes practically everywhere and not be too distracted by the people milling about. That there still was a constant stream of snow falling from the sky only made the endeavour more complicated. But Marvolo felt it was worth it.

After most of the group had purchased at least a few of the crackers from the Weasley twins – even Lucius’ son had bought a few, he had have to keep an eye on that – the teenagers split up into smaller groups. Miss Granger, Henry and the girl still holding onto his hand, Nott’s son, and a few others wanted to go to the book store. Weasley, the Longbottom boy, and a few others preferred the joke shop Zonko’s, or the sweets shop as their next destination. After agreeing on the Three Broomsticks as a meeting point for lunch, the several now smaller groups separated.

By the end of the day they had been in each of the shops. Henry had bought some sweets at Honeydukes, asking the girl at his side – Luna was her name, as Marvolo learned during the day – what her favourites where. Not really a subtle attempt at flirting, but it seemed to have worked out rather well. The girl had smiled a little brighter as Henry had handed her a mixed bag of the strangest candy Honeydukes had to offer. The girl really was an odd person.

When it was finally time for the children to go back to the castle, Marvolo was more than happy that he had offered this to Henry. The boy had been laughing, interacting with the other teenagers without the hidden fear Marvolo still could remember so well from his own youth. It seemed that Henry didn’t feel the need to constantly question the motives of the children around him. And he still was careful with whom he spoke. Maybe he would be able to find a good balance, one that Marvolo himself was still searching for.

Monday, 18th of December

It had been a few days since the young witches had been freed. A public trial for all the young wizards who had been involved would be held right after the turn of the year. Most likely they would be sentenced to life in Azkaban, if all the rumours of what they had done and planned to do proved to be true. But other than that, Marvolo knew that there was more to be done. Because the young wizards hadn’t acted on a whim. The idea to kidnap the witches hadn’t even cross their minds until Corban Yaxley had spoken to them. Planted that vicious and useless idea in their heads, leaving them to their own devices for too long. That wizard wasn’t a leader. A leader would have known that the young men had been desperate to do something. Stupid or lazy enough to not think of something to do on their own, but also desperate enough to take matters into their own hands once there had been even a shadow of a plan.

The idea could have been something Marvolo would have had used in the past. But he never would have let them stew in that idea without guidance. But Corban Yaxley had done so, and now there was trouble. The man clearly had outlived his usefulness.
It had taken some time to prepare everything – the fact that the Aurors now had a spell to test who had touched something made things just a little bit more complicated – but now he was ready to make sure that this particular dunderhead wouldn’t be around to throw Bludgers into his plans any longer.

The small phial of poison securely held in his pocket, Marvolo apparated to the edge of the wards around the relatively small manor that had been in the Yaxley family for several generations now. With a strong disillusionment charm on himself, Marvolo didn’t hesitate to pass the boundary of the wards. After all, the wards around all of his followers’ homes were set to let him pass. More often than not, the fathers of the current owners had incorporated those changes. A quick spell revealed that nobody was home... well, expect the man he had come to punish, and the elves living here.

After a quick detour through the kitchen to cast sleeping spells over all the elves – he wouldn’t repeat that particular error ever again – Marvolo walked silently through the halls, following the directions of a simple point-me spell. It wouldn’t have been hard to guess where he would find the current Head of the Yaxley family, but guessing was just that, and Marvolo liked to be sure.

When the Dark Lord reached the door to the men’s smoking room next to the big room usually used for dinner parties and the like, he could hear the grumbling complaints of a drunken man from inside. Or maybe an angry man just going about getting drunk. Either way, he was at his destination. Time to dole out a just punishment.

Marvolo dropped the disillusionment charm, becoming visible again. After a deep breath and setting his face into the stern lines of a disappointed Lord, he pushed the door open without touching it directly.

He was wearing gloves of the kind muggle healers used – he had conducted extensive tests with different barriers and the new spell; these were the least restrictive that still worked – so he wouldn’t have to be overly careful not to touch anything. This should look a certain way once the Aurors showed up. His name couldn’t be connected to this in any way.

“My Lord!” Surprised, Corban jumped up from his seat, jostling the small end table of dark wood next to him, causing the tumbler of amber liquid to fall to the floor. Before Marvolo could start to speak, the other wizard had taken the few steps separating them, and had fallen to his knees, his hands raised beseechingly. “Thank you, my Lord! I knew you would help me get my son and heir back! When will we start? Who will go with us?”

Internally Marvolo felt startled by this unfounded conviction that he was here to lead a raid on Azkaban just to free some spineless idiots. On the surface, not one hint of his confusion showed. Maybe the man had taken some recreational potions to cope with the stress. There wasn’t really a good explanation for this display otherwise.

“My Lord? Because they were captured doing your work, my Lord! They were doing what was right!” The disgusting wizard spoke with fervour, but there was a spark of fear in those old eyes.

“Is that so?” With a little step back and to the side, Marvolo walked around the kneeling man, waving his wand to remove the spill and straighten the table. He really would prefer not to be touched by that man. Who now looked positively bewildered, half turned, still kneeling on the ground.

“Did I know of this plan?” Marvolo asked with deathly calm, his red eyes piercing the flushed wizard.

“No, my Lord. The young people acted a little hasty. I had planned to inform you of my idea, my Lord. Get your approval…” To this obvious lie, Marvolo raised an eyebrow, causing the wizard to bow lower and trail off.

“Was any of the young men one of my Death Eaters, and therefore one of those with the permission to use my mark to claim a crime?” Marvolo was sure he should have thought about the possibility that the incantation had leaked out to people not of his circle. Sadly, there was no way to get the spell under wraps again, now that it was out of the bag, so to speak.

“No, my Lord.” It seemed that the message Marvolo wanted to send was sinking in. Corban had started to shake and was getting paler.

“Then why do you claim that they were doing my work?” With a little dramatic twirl, Marvolo got the phial out of his pocket. The poison should work even better when ingested with alcohol instead of tea, as Marvolo had had planned originally.

To this question Marvolo didn’t get an answer. Another wave of the yew wand in his hand hat the tumbler standing back on the small table and a decanter of some amber alcohol floating over from a cabinet. It really was pointless to speak with the man, who would be dead in a few moments anyway.

“I feel that your younger brother will be a better Head of the family when you are removed from the picture.” Marvolo placed the small phial next to the decanter and the tumbler, both cut from crystal, clearly some of the more expensive pieces in this room mostly decorated with dark wood. “And I won’t hesitate to use force.” Maybe casting the Imperius would be best. That way, there wouldn’t be any signs of a struggle, as the traces of the spell quickly vanished once a person was dead.

But it seemed that Corban Yaxley knew that there was no way to escape, and if he wanted to go with some dignity still intact, he needed to do as he was told. After all, he had sworn himself to Marvolo as his Lord, it was his duty to do as he was told. And to follow the rules his Lord laid down. And it was up to Marvolo to punish his vassal for breaking his law. It was curious how those old spells and magics worked. No wonder the Ministry had felt it safer to just ban them all. The Ministry tended to go the easy way, rather than the best one.

With a satisfied smile Marvolo watched as Corban sat down in his armchair, placed his wand onto the end table, took the phial from the surface and removed the cork, just before he emptied the contents into the small tumbler. The phial was placed down – now empty – and the drink that filled the room with the smoky aroma of good fire whiskey was added to the deadly mixture.

“No one uses my insignia defying me. No one acts against my explicit wishes without suffering for it. You were acting against me, Corban Yaxley. You intended to recruit those young men and use them to undermine my goals, because they do no longer fit perfectly with what you believe in. But I have evidence that your ridiculous beliefs are false. You did defy your Lord, now you will die by your own hand in recompense.”

It didn’t take long after the tumbler was empty for Corban Yaxley to fall out of the armchair, shaking with convulsions, foam coming from his mouth. When the rattling breaths finally had ended, Marvolo took a last look at everything before he re-applied the charm to hide his presence, before he then swiftly left the room and house to apparate back home.

Now he had to wait.
Tuesday, 19th of December

It was the last day before they all would be taking the train back to London. The common room was alive with people searching for stuff that somehow had managed to migrate from their trunks to who-knew-where, even this early in the morning. Harry sat, still rather sleepy, in his chair in front of the biggest fire, waiting for Theo to finish with whatever was taking him so long. He was sketching, as he was doing quite often since his therapy had introduced him to art. It was different now that Aunt Petunia wouldn’t tear up what he made, while praising whatever smear of paint Dudley brought back. Now he had people that actually appreciated what he did. His biggest creation, the painting of Hogwarts by night, was currently drying in his room, and now he tried to get a small sketch finished for all those who were close to him. It was better than sweets – which he would sent to most of the people he regularly interacted with – but not as significant as some of the other acceptable things one could gift to a peer. The rules were rather strange sometimes, but he needed to follow them if he wanted to be Lord Potter one day, and respected. One couldn’t really play the game by flouting the rules.

At the moment he was trying to capture the likeness of Millicent Bulstrode’s cat, which was curled up on top of a school bag. He planned to give each of his Slytherin year-mates and all of the Gryffindors of his year a small sketch. Or all of them who weren’t really his friends. It was a lot of work. But it was fun, too.

He only wished that he knew a way to animate his sketches.

Suddenly Professor Snape strode into the common room, and the conversations and general din suddenly stopped, making way for an all-encompassing silence. Within moments all eyes were trained on their Head of House, who was looking around, obviously searching for someone or something. Harry noticed that the man held a letter in his hand and wondered who had sent it and who was about to receive important news.

A moment later the conversations started again, now with the topic changed. When Harry spotted Yaxley, the seventh-year who was the oldest son of the younger brother of the Head of the Yaxley family, staggering more than walking next to Snape, the letter clutched in his hand, Harry knew that something had happened there.

It was only reasonable to assume that the scandal of the other’s cousin abducting and drugging three young witches to keep as sex-slaves wasn’t going to remain without consequences. Maybe Corban Yaxley had been taken into custody as well, making his younger brother the next Head of the Family… no, only if there was issued a lifetime sentence, or the Kiss administered, would the position change to the younger brother.

Harry shook his head, and went back to sketching the cat. It had ignored all the commotion like nothing mattered as long as it had a comfortable spot to sleep.

By lunch the fact that Corban Yaxley had killed himself in his home, leaving his younger brother in the position of Head of the Family, had made the rounds. The reactions were varied. Harry himself wasn’t sure if he believed the story of suicide. But most of the other students seemed to be of the opinion that it was a likely reaction for a Slytherin. Harry wasn’t so sure. Many Slytherin alumni had managed to talk themselves out of tighter spots, why should the man take poison over something his son had done? But Harry kept his thoughts to himself, only remarking that the Aurors would get to the bottom of the matter when asked for his opinion persistently.

Kingsley was one of the Aurors who had been sent to investigate the apparent suicide of Corban Yaxley. In fact the place was crawling with people. And as usual, he and Dawlish were here to help as a team. “Let’s ask the two elves living here if there was anything unusual yesterday evening. That’s the time the healer said the man died, right?”

Dawlish nodded, carefully moving around the people milling about.

They made it to the kitchen all right, where the two elves watched, wringing their hands, as a team of Aurors inspected each and every piece of food, as well as the opened bottles. The interrogation of the elves was quick and brought nothing new. The elves had been dismissed and had gone to bed, until they had gotten up in the morning to prepare breakfast and found their master dead in the gentlemen's smoking room.

“Do you think the new spell for evidence on who touched something will help?” Dawlish asked, sounding rather sceptical.

“No. I’ve seen the phial. It’s of a make I've seen often in Knockturn Alley. No idea who the brewer is, but those phials go through many, many hands before they're used,” Kingsley explained. It had been a mystery for many decades now who was providing those potions. From simple sleeping potions to the worst poisons, to the elaborate recreational potions sometimes taken by the young and stupid.

It didn’t really feel right. Didn’t feel like a suicide. But they probably would have trouble to proving that.

The light of a grey winter day fell through the windows into the corridors of St. Mungo's. Minerva had brought a package of Sherbet Lemons for this visit. She was really happy that Poppy had insisted on their yearly examinations, and that she had consulted an expert. It looked as if Dumbledore had been exposed to a dangerous amount of Dark Magic. But they had noticed it early enough to be able to counter it before it really became dangerous. Now, just before the Christmas Holiday, she was here to visit with her old friend, to tell him what was happening at the school. He always preferred to be kept in the loop.

A friendly Medi-witch had described the way, and now Minerva was standing in front of the private room Albus was in. She knocked and waited a moment before she was called in. “Hello, Albus! I brought some of your favourite sweets.” She smiled at the old wizard sitting sideways on his bed, looking rather unhappy. “Don’t sulk, Albus. You will be back at the castle in the new year. A few more purification treatments, and the traces will be gone.” It was quite clear that Albus wasn’t happy being here.

“I simply think that this isn’t necessary, Minerva.” Albus finally smiled at her, looking rather despondent in his hospital-issued robes. “Poppy could have given me the potions, could have performed what is necessary. No reason to force me to stay here. Really, Minerva! This is not necessary.”

“You know as well as I that Poppy doesn’t have the ritual circle needed to combat the traces of Dark Magic, Albus. Why are you so against this? You above anyone else know what can happen if someone is exposed to Dark Magic for too long.” She patted his arm, placed the sweets on the bedside table before sitting down in the visitor’s chair.

“I know that you don’t like to be inactive. So I brought you this,” she got a magazine out of her expanded inner pocket. It had taken her some time to find it, as she hadn’t made it a habit to venture into the muggle world aside from the yearly muggle-born visits. “A knitting magazine. I remembered that you repeatedly talked about how you like to read them and look at the pattern schematics.” Minerva was sure Albus was going stir-crazy, being confined wasn’t something the old Headmaster could bear. But it simply was needed. She was sure he would complain and mope some more, and when he came back after the treatment was finished, she would have her old mentor back.

“It simply is a dull place to stay, Minerva.” He smiled and took one of the candies, before he opened the magazine. “Oh, that’s a new one. I haven’t seen this edition before.” It seemed as if he was trying to put up a brave front, but she wasn’t really fooled.

“I will visit often over the holidays. There aren’t many students staying at the school this year, the others can easily manage without me for a few hours at a time.” Before Minerva could start on the school gossip she had planned to tell to Albus, the door opened again.

“Good evening, Mr. Dumbledore. I’m here to bring you your dinner. And don’t levitate the cup again. Do you hear me? You shouldn’t use magic during the treatment period. There’s a reason why you had to hand over your wand to the hospital staff.” In that moment the medi-witch turned and noticed that Minerva was sitting in the visitor’s chair. Her face instantly morphed into an artificially friendly mask. And while she placed the tray she had brought onto a small table to the side, she started to speak. “You will have to go now, Madame. Visiting hours are over.”

Minerva frowned. “The people down at the entrance said there were still a few hours’ time for visits.” And they had. She had asked yesterday to make sure she would have enough time for a proper visit.

She was quite rudely interrupted by the unfriendly medi-witch. “The patients on this station need more rest, so the visiting time is shorter here than on the others. So you’ll have to leave now!”

Quite miffed, and tempted to find the locker of this awful woman to pay it a visit in her cat form, Minerva said her farewells to Albus, wishing him a good rest, before she was ushered out of the room and then the ward. With an offended huff Minerva left the building to apparate back to the castle. She would come back the next day, once the train had left, so she would have more time to visit with Albus.

ooOoo
Albus really wasn’t happy that his plan hadn’t worked the way he had wanted it to. What they had given him to affect him and paint him as unsuitable for his calling of Headmaster of Hogwarts must have been stronger than he had anticipated. They still had committed him to the hospital, claiming he had dangerous levels of Dark Magic taint running around in his bloodstream, that should be removed as quickly as possible.

In that moment he hadn’t been able to come up with a way to get out of this confinement. And now he was here, in the hospital, without his wand, without proper clothes, forced to participate in daily rituals they claimed were to help him.

Just like he now sat down at the table, picking up the spoon to pretend to eat the soup, Albus had managed to convince the personnel here that he was cooperating, while the whole time he was looking out for a way to get away, reclaim his wand, and rescue them all from the dark wizards out for their health.

Minerva had brought him his favourite sweets. But did she really not know anything? Or was she in on the plan, delivering the poison to him in the form of his Lemon drops?

It was hard to work when you couldn’t know who to trust anymore. Maybe he would manage to slip away when the young medi-wizard in training came in three days to bring him to those rituals. He was properly awed by Albus, and most likely didn’t know any better. It should be possible to convince him that Albus was held prisoner here.

“Now, Mr. Dumbledore. It’s time for you to go to bed.” The medi-witch was back, not really paying attention to the fact that Albus had managed to vanish the soup wandlessly, and not eat a drop of it. He wouldn’t make it easy on them all. But all that wandless magic had made him really sleepy. So Albus let himself be manhandled over to the bed, placed there and tucked in by the witch aimlessly rambling off unimportant gossip. Her wand was poking out of her apron pocket, if Albus just wasn’t so tired, he could have snatched that wand, and made a break for it. Maybe he should claim not to be hungry tomorrow, so he wouldn’t be quite so tired the next time there was an opportunity. But before he really could make any more plans, he slipped into sleep, the staff around him none the wiser that he planned to make an escape as soon as he found a way.

Chapter End Notes

To all of you A Happy New Year! I hope you had a better start than me, and that this year will be better for all of us than the last.

Thanks to Jordre and Jake for helping to improve my spelling!

Never before had Harry taken the train back to London for the Christmas Holidays. It was not really all that different from the return in the summer. Or maybe it was. There was the normal excitement, people searching for something at the last minute, hastily eating breakfast. But on the other hand, not everyone was going, so there were a few islands of calm in the sea of hastily moving students. And quite a few did leave their trunks at school, only taking a few things with them.

“Where do you want to sit, Harry?” Theo wanted to know, climbing into one of the thestral-drawn carriages down to the station in Hogsmeade.

“On the train? No idea. Ron and Hermione have to patrol, as does Draco.” Harry followed his friend and sat down heavily on the upholstered bench, puffs of warm air making clouds before his face. It was a very cold day, and it didn’t look as if it would really get any brighter than the dreary grey the sky currently held. “Find a big compartment, where the others can come and go, stay for a while if they want to? I want to draw, so I have no preference.”

Theo laughed, burrowing deeper into the thick scarf wound around his neck. “That’s as good a plan as any other.” They were quickly joined by Astoria and Daphne, after which the carriage started on its way down the road to the gates and the station beyond.

The two teenagers managed to find a compartment rather quickly. They had their school bags packed with the things they would need – or maybe would want, rather – to use during the long train ride. The rest of their stuff was in their trunks, which the elves had moved earlier in the morning. Harry had packed everything of his. Theo and the others had left quite a few things behind. Harry knew that it would mean packing everything again once the holidays were over, but he just couldn’t bring himself to leave anything behind at school.

It didn’t take long for the others to turn up. Hermione walked in together with Ron, Neville, and Ginny. Ginny decided to search for some of her own year-mates, dragging Neville along, who smiled and shrugged silently in apology. One look around and Ron left again with a mumbled. “I think I’ll sit with Dean and Seamus.” Leaving only Hermione to place her bag in one of the racks, where she also deposited her winter wear.

A few moments later Draco came in, followed by Crabbe and Goyle. “I think I'll patrol right after the train starts moving for a time. And then again later. Has anyone seen Pansy?”

“No,” Hermione answered. “But I fear Ron will try everything to get out of patrolling. So if you aren’t against it, I’d like to accompany you until you either find Miss Parkinson, or I can track Ronald down.”

Harry watched with an amused twinkle in his eyes as Draco accepted with a polite – if slightly stiff – nod. It was amusing time and time again to see Draco wrestling with the old prejudices he had been raised with. Now that Hermione, the muggle-born witch, was heiress to the old family of Lestrange, all of Draco’s old world views were being challenged. Mostly the blond teenager managed to cope rather well, but then there were situations like this one that still came as a surprise.

Once the Gryffindor and Slytherin prefects had left the compartment together, Harry got out his sketchbook and started to work on the sketches he still had to finish. While Draco wasn’t anywhere nearby, Harry planned to sketch a peacock for his present. It just was too fitting not to do it. After all, it was the animal on the Malfoy family crest. That the strutting around those birds were known for fit so well with the way Draco sometimes walked around was just a happy coincidence.

With a small smile Harry started to move the charcoal piece over the thick paper of his sketchbook.

Draco felt awkward walking next to Hermione Granger, the Gryffindor know-it-all, whom he had taunted so often over her heritage in the past. And now that it was clear she really had magical ancestors, he felt insecure around her.

They made their way down the train, students from younger years darting out of their way the moment they saw the prefect badges on their lapels. Draco liked the position of power and respect he had gotten with being made prefect. But he didn’t really like the late evening patrols, or the fact that first-years were expected to come to him to ask for help and sympathy if they needed it. The fact that the other Slytherin prefects knew perfectly well how to keep others from taking advantage of them even prevented Draco from foisting the less appealing duties onto someone else. So it really was a mixed bag. The fact that his parents had been so very proud of him had slightly tipped the scales in favour of being a prefect. Sadly, the day-to-day wasn’t all that glorious.

They walked in silence, keeping an eye out for trouble, and searching for their counterparts. Draco was sure Weasley would go to some trouble to evade patrolling and keeping order, and Pansy probably was somewhere with her friends. As soon as he found her, it would be easy to arrange something resembling a schedule.

“Why don’t you pick that up?” Draco started as he heard the mocking tone asking a clearly rhetorical question, taunting. The laughter to be heard just moments after were confirmation that there was a group of children mocking one or more others.

Neither Draco nor Hermione were strangers to such situations. But, Draco had to admit, they probably had been on different sides when they had experienced bullying. Draco had been – and was – mostly the one doing the taunting. Granger probably had been the target most of the time.

“What is going on here?” The Gryffindor prefect asked the moment they stepped into the place at the end of a wagon where there was a little more space than in the walkways, shielded from being seen into from the compartments.
There were several first-years – they were so small – standing in somewhat of an unorganized group. A girl had tears running down her face. Several books were on the floor at her feet. One of the boys looked defiant, another nervous. They hadn’t mastered the innocent look yet. As they all were in their normal clothes, not school robes, it wasn’t obvious to what house they belonged. But a cursory glance at least let Draco know that there was not one Slytherin among the children fidgeting before them.

“Nothing,” the bravest of the lot claimed, contradicting himself by shifting nervously from one foot to the other.

“Right,” Draco drawled, giving them all an unimpressed look. “Apologize. Pick her books up. And then get back to your compartments. Then we can forget this. Or be stubborn and we will report you.” Most professors only acted against bullying when it reached the level of the attacks on Harry at the end. Everything that wasn’t life-threatening usually only resulted in a few points lost, a detention at most. Maybe the fact that prefects tended to handle such situations without informing a professor contributed to the situation.

And it seemed that these first-years had already learned as much. “As if! By the time we're back after the holidays, you'll already have forgotten everything about this. Probably even the moment you're back with your own friends.”

Draco smirked and shrugged one shoulder. “I might. But she,” Draco waved a hand in Granger’s direction – who was glowering impressively – without really taking his eyes from the outspoken one and therefore probably the leader of this group, “has no trouble remembering the most obscure facts even after years. I’m sure she’ll make sure that this incident gets reported if you refuse to behave.”

It was a testament to Granger’s reputation as a know-it-all that the moment Draco brought up her powers of recalling facts, the books were picked up, apologies were hastily uttered, and youngsters scurried away.

Once they were alone the Gryffindor gave Draco an unimpressed look. One of the sort his mother was prone to give him whenever he tried to get out of some stupid duty. “What?” he asked with feigned confusion.

“We should report them anyway. But now we don’t know their names.” Granger clearly wasn’t impressed with Draco’s way of handling the situation.

“There was no Slytherin among them. Do you want to tell me that not one of them was a Gryffindor? That would reduce the number of possible suspects dramatically.” Draco frowned. He knew from tales that Ravenclaws were prone to bullying those that didn’t make an effort to fit in, but he couldn’t really imagine Hufflepuffs bullying anyone. They were just generally too nice.

Bushy hair brushed her shoulders as she shook her head. “The one who talked to you is a Gryffindor. But not all of them were, and certainly not the girl they were bullying. We should report this.”

Draco rolled his eyes. For all that Granger had changed, she still was fixated on the rules. Maybe her inclination to stick to the rules and not to question everything presented to her as a fact was the reason she had been placed into Gryffindor and not Ravenclaw. It always had been a recurring topic of discussion among the Slytherins of their year how Granger was not a Raven.

“Report him if you want. But you know as well as I that the professors don’t really act against such things.”
Granger didn’t react to that, which Draco took as confirmation of what he had said. She probably would report the boy anyway, but that wasn’t his concern. When they walked past a compartment occupied by Pansy and her friends – probably discussing their dresses for the balls they would attend – Granger and Draco split up, she planning to search for the current Weasley prefect and he to speak with his female counterpart in Slytherin.

Ron had managed to dodge Hermione and her insistence that he should take on patrolling the corridors in an effort to keep the other students in line. Why would they even need to? They all were on their way back home, eager for the holidays. In Ron’s opinion, there was no real trouble to be feared. But Hermione had only huffed, crossed her arms, rolled her eyes at him, and had stormed off to do as she had planned all along.

Now the red-headed young wizard was on his way to speak to his best friend. If he still could call Harry that. Because Harry had changed so much since the summer. Since that awful day his dad had taken Harry to the Ministry where he had been adopted against his will. Ron had felt that he and Harry had been drifting apart. And if he didn’t do something to keep them together, now that Harry was a Slytherin in school and out of it too, their friendship would certainly die.

At first Ron hadn’t known what to do. But then he had written to Bill for advice, and his older brother had delivered. If one wanted to keep a friendship, one needed to work for it. When you lived together with your friends, ate together, went to classes together, played together, it was easy to keep a friendship alive. But if you had to arrange for time to do something together, it was harder.

Ron was now in the more difficult position, with Harry now living in the dungeons, and going to classes with the Slytherins. But he was stubborn. He would not give in so easily. Even with the way Harry had changed, Ron would find a way to make things work.

He reached the compartment Harry had sat down in earlier and looked through the door. The curtains weren’t drawn, so Ron could see Harry sitting in the seat by the window, a book on his lap while he was taking notes on a piece of parchment. This new studiousness was one of the new things that Ron had trouble accepting.

His blue eyes wandered over the others in the compartment. Nott, Crabbe and Goyle, another Slytherin who was part of their Quidditch Team, were sitting there with Harry. Those new people Harry was spending time with were another thing hard to accept. But as Bill had said, Harry was a friendly guy. If someone was decent to him, he wasn’t one to just ignore them, never had been.

Taking a deep breath, Ron steeled himself before he pushed the door open, walking in to sit down on the one seat not occupied by someone or something. All conversations stopped, and Harry looked up from the book he was reading. It was Intermediate Transfiguration, their textbook for Professor McGonagall’s class this year.

“Ron!” Harry said with a smile, starting to pack his things away. “Hadn’t thought you would surface again. Hermione was quite cross that she couldn’t find you.”

“Yes, well, I don’t know why she’s so keen to walk up and down the train. She could read something instead.”
Harry laughed to that. After all, it was true that Hermione tended to read a lot. Like in almost every free moment she had.

And then they sat there for a few moments in awkward silence until Ron finally managed to break the uncomfortable silence. “I wanted to invite you to the Burrow for a few days during the holidays.” It would have been so much better if the Slytherins hadn’t been here. Not that Ron feared to be rejected, but it was uncomfortable with those others here.

“That’s great!” Harry said with a big grin. “It’s always great at your home! But I will have to ask for permission. I’m not sure where I have to be during the holidays. You know, all the events and balls… would be great to just be with my friends for a change.”

Ron was baffled. Harry needed to ask for permission? He never had asked in the past. “Why do you need to ask if you can come? You never stopped to ask for permission in the past. Am I no longer important enough?” Ron felt hurt, deeply hurt. And even more so when he saw the uncomprehending expression on Harry’s face.

“Ron, seriously, do your parents know that you want me to visit?” It had taken a moment, but now Harry seemed to know what he wanted to say, his green eyes locked firmly on Ron’s face.

Ron shrugged, now puzzled himself. “Of course, I told them. Mum always wants to know if more people will be at the Burrow. So she can cook enough for everyone.” Why would Harry ask something like that?

“So your parents gave permission for my visit?” Now Harry gave him a pointed look, and he had stressed the word permission in an odd way. Ron felt himself blush brightly the moment he caught on to what Harry had been trying to say. “Please don’t be that way, now that I finally have someone caring enough about me that he wants to know where I am or where I plan to go.”

After that the conversation was strained, and Ron quickly found a reason to leave again. Maybe Dean would play a game of chess with him as he had claimed they had planned all along. Ron wasn’t convinced that the others had bought his excuse, but no one had said anything, so he planned to pretend that everything was just the way he had claimed it to be.

Why was life so much more complicated now? All had seemed so simple when they had started Hogwarts.

oooOOooo

From where Marvolo stood next to one of the many decorated windows with a view out into the snow-covered garden, he could hear the other attendees of this tea party talking animatedly to each other. He had moved to this spot here, a little away from the others, to have a moment of quiet. All these parties were getting to be a bit much. Especially in the way that they were piled on each other during this time before the turn of the year.

It was soothing to watch the snow fall, knowing that the children were already on the train on their way back to London. They would arrive in the early evening, and Marvolo planned to be at the train station to pick his son up. Something no one had ever done for him when he was a child. Not that he would have wanted to be picked up. At least he never would have admitted to being jealous of all the children whose parents came to meet them at the station when he had been a child and later a teen. He wasn’t even that sure what he felt now. There was only a vague sense of curiosity what it would have been like to have someone to care about him.

Marvolo knew that he had only a few moments of time for a break. His absence would be noticed soon, and as Lord Slytherin, guardian of the Boy-Who-Lived, and the reborn and redeemed individual responsible – somehow – for the fact that Henry was an orphan. The others would follow him the moment they realized that he wasn’t just in the restroom for a moment.

This tea party was one of the more boring gatherings Marvolo had had to attend. The fact that there were several match-making mothers of older, still-single witches after him only added to the horror of this afternoon.

“Hey, beautiful. The old stuffy people are a bit much, aren’t they? Can I keep you company?” The voice from behind him was trying to be seductive, and certainly wasn’t entirely unsuccessful. It only took a moment for Marvolo’s lips to curl in amusement as he realized that Sirius Black was standing behind him, flirting with him.

Marvolo turned to the wizard slowly coming closer, his robes moving around his legs with the elegance of the expensive fabric they were made of. “You certainly can keep me company, Lord Black. But I doubt you’ll want to.”

The look of incredulous shock on the other wizard’s face was enough for Marvolo to chuckle. It was obvious that Black hadn’t expected him here. “Who did you think I was?”

After a moment of bewildered spluttering, Black managed to regain his balance, as Marvolo allowed him to reclaim his composure. It would have been easy to keep him off balance if Marvolo had wanted to.

“I thought you were that young bloke from the magical sports department. The one that came over from the continent and started only last summer? I’m… I really don’t know what to say.” Black obviously felt uncomfortable, and still not back on firm ground.

Marvolo had seen the young man Black was talking about. He had a fit body, and was wearing green robes today. Not of as good a cut as Marvolo’s, or of such fine quality, but to be mistaken for him was quite the compliment. “Thank you, I guess.” Marvolo smirked. “There are fates worse than being thought to be a young quidditch player. Spending any more time fending off match-making mothers is one of them.” He picked up his glass of red wine from where he had placed it on the windowsill. “But be assured I’m certainly not interested in any more than talking with my adopted son’s godfather.”

That earned him an unsure laugh. “Match-making mothers are a nightmare.” There was more humour in the young dark-haired wizard's voice than Marvolo himself felt when pondering that particular problem.

“What are you doing to evade their clutches? When they are after me – the barely redeemed former Dark Lord – they have to be really pestering you.” With a slight wave of his hand, Marvolo indicated the whole of Sirius Black. A young wizard of considerable wealth, a good – if slightly tarnished – family name, good looks, and a roguish charm that many women seemed to like.

Said wizard carded his hand through his hair, flushing slightly. “I can’t deny that they are persistent. But I guess the fact that it’s obvious I don’t plan to marry and settle down anytime soon, keeps them a little at bay.”

Marvolo took a sip from his wine, mulling those words over. “And the fact I have a son, am older – if you look at it a certain way – and thought more mature is the reason they’re more persistent with me?” He frowned. That would be bad, because he really wasn’t sure what he wanted to get out of such a relationship.

“Maybe?” was the reply Black gave, shrugging a little helplessly. “Or maybe I just ignore them better. I really don’t want to marry, even if the whole responsibility to continue the family line now lies with me. But I wouldn’t have cared before. Why should I care now? But do I want the money and everything to go to Lucius’ brat? I asked Harry to be my heir. He said it would be too much. Now… I’m not really sure what to do. Do you know anything about ancestry-tracing enchantments, Lord Slytherin?”

Marvolo blinked in surprise. That was a rather abrupt shift in topic. Or maybe not. From talking about heirs to ancestry-tracing enchantments wasn’t too big a leap. “That’s not a branch of magic that I studied extensively. And the secrets of those enchantments are rather closely guarded by those creating them. Why do you ask?” All Marvolo knew about those enchantments was that they were bound to a family by blood, and recorded the ancestry as it happened, so to speak. Where the ancestry test provided by the goblin nation laid open the ancestry of a person just based on their blood, the ancestry-recording – or tracing – enchantments took notes when someone of the traced family was born or died.

“There’s a tapestry. It was damaged when my mother burned the spots where people were named whom she didn’t approve of. It damaged the enchantments. I had hoped to see if there is someone, somewhere, who can be my heir. Other than Harry, Narcissa’s son, or Dora. But everyone I ask just says to create a new one. And I’m not sure that’ll work.” Black turned to look around and then sat down in an armchair standing a little to the side.

“I’m sorry. I never was that interested in those types of enchantments. So do you plan to marry and have a child, at all?” Marvolo was curious. He knew that it was society's expectation that young wizards and witches should marry and have children. At least one, better more. And that expectation was even heavier for those that were either Head of a family, or heir to that family. He had demanded that his followers have more children. It was a little hard to argue that he should be exempt from that rule.

But as he was in no way interested in sexual contact with anyone a marriage seemed superfluous. And like a recipe for disaster, as Marvolo was sure that any eventual partner would want sexual interactions, and if not with him, with someone else, adding to the potential disaster. Jealousy was a strong emotion, one that he had used in the past to manipulate people to act as he wanted them to.

Black slumped even deeper into his seat. “No. I don’t think I ever will. But then… life can be unpredictable. Maybe I’ll meet the one tomorrow and never look back?”

Before Marvolo could formulate an answer to that ridiculously romantic notion of true love, they were found by the hostess and dragged back to the larger party. Their eyes met over the room, resignation and a little bit of desperation evident to both of them. Then Marvolo turned his attention to the people in his little group, keeping up with the boring conversation, while idly wondering how it had happened that he felt that he was in the same boat with Sirius Black.

Xerxes watched as the red train rolled into the station. He was standing among all the other families here to pick up their children for the holidays. Next to him were Hermione’s parents, and his Lord. Xerxes had picked up the two dentists from their home, and they all had been talking about the school and the attempts to get magical children without a proper family adopted. The school was doing great, but the children they had taken from the streets, from abusive or neglecting homes, and foster care, were hard to get into wizarding families. Many weren’t equipped to care for children with trauma to overcome, or they wanted to know the ancestry of the child in question before committing to taking them in.

Even understanding why they were so interested in the ancestry of the children, Xerxes preferred to give children to those families who were willing to take in a child regardless of their ancestors. The fact that many of the children – especially the older ones – needed so much specialised care had forced Xerxes to employ mind-healers and psychologists specialised in trauma patients. Helping them was a slow process.

The train stopped and the doors opened almost like an explosion. Children and young adults poured out of the train, owls and cats suddenly making a racket, families shouting in greeting and in an attempt to find each other more quickly.

Their group stood their ground, keeping watch in every direction to make sure they would spot the children they had come here to pick up as soon as possible.

It didn’t take long for a group of teenagers to come out of the train, spot their group – many of the Slytherin parents were clumped together right in the middle of the platform – and make their way over, managing to handle their trunks and familiars with some difficulty.

Xerxes until now had forgotten what a mess the platform always was when the train was leaving or arriving. But it had been some time since the last time he had picked up his sons from the train. And dropping off Hermione and her parents at the start of term hadn’t offered an opportunity to visit the platform or take in the pandemonium. He had had too much to do with his own school back then.

A trunk made a resounding sound when it hit the platform, and a bushy-haired girl in a warm muggle coat flew by to crash into her parents. “Mum! Dad! I’ve missed you both!”

Xerxes smiled, his focus on his nephew and his family while registering the others greeting their children around them. Benjamin clasped his son’s shoulder, Lucius looked on as his wife – in robes accentuating the fact she was pregnant – greeted their son with a warm embrace, and his Lord awkwardly stood next to his adopted son. They both looked unsure what to do.

But now was the time to greet his heiress, and tell her about his plans for the holidays. There were a lot of events that he had planned.

“Hermione, I’m happy to see you so high-spirited.” Xerxes smiled at the young girl, who was held in a loose embrace between her mother and father. “I gather the travel was comfortable and not too boring?”

The girl laughed. “A train filled with students on their way home for the holidays? I guess there would be no way to make that boring.” Her eyes sparkled with mischief. Xerxes would have loved to know the story behind that look.

“I still have trouble understanding why the kids have to travel by train when magical transportation would make it possible to reach the school in a few seconds,” Jean stated, her cheeks red from the cold, her curls peeking out from under her warm woollen hat.
“It’s a good opportunity to talk with friends, to work on last-minute homework, make new friends… it’s kind of a transition from home to school, or back, depending on the direction of travel.” Hermione shrugged, her tone one Xerxes knew from those accustomed to lecturing.

With a laugh Xerxes gained the others’ attention again. “I wanted to inform you all that my two older sons will be visiting Britain shortly after the new year. They asked for an opportunity to meet with the family in its entirety and proposed a meeting in a restaurant. They wrote it would be neutral territory. I just received the letter this morning, and I wanted to ask all of your opinion before sending a reply.” Of course the letter was only a ruse to make the new identities of his sons’ more believable. They had worked on it together the previous evening, coming up with polite wording and a good reason for the newly created twins to visit London.

Xerxes had to say that the new looks were excellent. The ritual their Lord had adapted for the ageing to the same age and altering of their genetic make-up had worked perfectly. His sons now were of the same age, a few years older than they had originally been, and looked as if their mother had been of mixed South American and Hispanic ancestry. They had decided on a background as gatherers and hunters of exotic magical beasts and plants of the South American continent. It was a good explanation for the lack of permanent residence or stable income.

They had been working a lot on their language skills, and a few exotic – at least from a British perspective – spells to give credence to their story.

“I think we should be able to find the time. Which restaurant do you want to go to? Are there wizarding restaurants?” Fabian said, clutching his daughter to his chest with his right arm and the hand of his wife in his left hand.

“There are.” Xerxes nodded, that had been easier than he had feared. “I will make a reservation and write a letter to make the arrangements.”

Talking merrily among each other, they waved to those still on the platform, walking down to the barrier so they could leave through that exit. Xerxes had a portkey to his home, where they would eat dinner, plan the next weeks, and just talk before he would transport the Grangers back to their own home.

ooOoo

Harry had watched the others go to their families, greeting them with easy familiarity – Mrs. Weasley smothering her four youngest with hugs, Theo nodding to his father, Draco embarrassed over his mother’s embrace – while he walked towards Marvolo who was standing among all those others, waiting for him.

There were quite a few adults casting doubtful or curious glances at Marvolo, or those that restrained themselves from bowing to him. If it hadn’t been a reminder that Marvolo had a past by the name of Voldemort, it would have been hilarious.

Harry reminded himself that this was Marvolo the new person starting over, the man who had cared for Harry, the man he had talked to every day for a few months now, because he was interested in how Harry’s classes went, what he did from day to day, and how he felt. Just those simple facts made him that much better a guardian than the Dursleys had ever been.
Harry gave a short bow, not really sure how he should greet his guardian. The enthusiastic hug Hermione had used on her parents felt as inadequate as a simple bow or handshake. Maybe he should have asked Madame Goyle for advice beforehand. But too late now.

“Thank you for picking me up… Father.” Using that to address Marvolo didn’t feel quite right yet. Using father to name him in front of his fellow Slytherins had been surprisingly easy after the first few times. But using it here to Marvolo’s face was really not quite right yet.

Marvolo nodded, his presently blue eyes unreadable, with a small smile. “Why shouldn’t I be here to pick you up… son? The tailor will arrive shortly at our home. I thought it best to get you some new clothes – you have grown – and we both need robes for the events and balls.” Marvolo rolled his eyes, forcing Harry to hold back a snort. It wasn’t the first time that Marvolo had expressed a clear wish for the social season to be over already. By all accounts – Sirius had added his share of stories – going to all these parties, events, and gatherings was tiring.

So Harry sighed, accepting his fate. “We will apparate home. And you might be happy to know that there was a lot of snow over the last few days. Everything is covered in white. And Flimm was busy decorating the rooms for the festivities. He was adamant about making all your favourites for dinner today.”

That brightened Harry’s spirits. With the promise of shepherd's pie and treacle tart, the ordeal of getting measured for new clothes again would be easier to bear.

With a last wave to his friends – those that still were there – Harry took charge of Hedwig’s cage, while Marvolo called for Flimm to get the trunk back to Griffin House. After a short and uncomfortable trip via apparition, Harry was home again.

And for the first time, going away from Hogwarts to stay with family over the holidays felt like coming home.

oooOOooo

The staff room was as sterile as the rest of the building was in most places. White and the lime green of the healer’s profession dominated the décor. People in the lime green robes of the Healers sat scattered around the table, which was covered with parchments and clipboards, as well as cups of over-steeped tea and bitter coffee.

Jeremy Jugson had listened attentively as one after another of his colleagues had reported on their patients, asked for second opinions, and discussed treatment plans for those cases that were more complicated than a simple spell gone wrong.

In front of him – right next to the too-sweet but still bitter tea – was the file on his main patient. Albus Percival Wulfric Brian Dumbledore. All his thoughts had been revolving around that man for the last few days. It felt like weeks. And what they had found so far really was troubling. Jeremy hoped the others would have an idea on how to proceed from here.

“Healer Jugson, please inform us how your patients are doing.” The healer in charge of their floor – Alice Delwick – passed on the right to speak and moderate the discussion to him.

“Of course, Healer Delwick. I’m concerned. Mr. Dumbledore isn’t very cooperative. The mediwitch responsible for him reported that he is using magic without his wand, and tries to sneak his potions so he can discard them.” With a flick of his hand the file in front of Jeremy opened. “The tests on his blood are back. They show traces of mood-lightening potions, and those that are commonly used to mask the effects of several ailments that affect the mind.” Jeremy cast a look around the room to impress the seriousness of the situation on his colleagues. “I think he was actively trying to conceal the effects of the harmful magic on him. The case is much more serious than we first thought. The fact that he is still using magic, not actively participating in his treatment… I think he might be more paranoid than I had first assumed. Taking those new findings into account, I want to place him into a closed room under constant supervision. Maybe it isn’t too late to counter the effects if we intensify the treatment now. But it could get bad rather fast if Mr. Dumbledore was to attempt an escape.”

For a moment everyone was silent. Disbelief was the prominent emotion on most faces. And Jeremy couldn’t blame them for that. Albus Dumbledore had always been put on a pedestal, even by those that didn’t agree with his policies. He always had been the infallible hero or idiot, depending on who you asked.

“He is an intelligent wizard. How can you even think for a moment that he would sabotage his own health in such a way?” And there it was, the first veiled accusation, an expression of disbelief. And there probably would only be more opposition to work against.

“I agree that he is intelligent. And that is the reason why I believe that he has taken steps to conceal his state.” Jeremy nodded in response, steering the conversation back on track. If they got into that kind of discussion – about politics and character traits rather than healing – they wouldn’t accomplish anything today. “The treatments already administered should have caused a bigger improvement than we can observe in Mr. Dumbledore. Intelligent men notice that something isn’t right if effects of harmful magic start to show. Paired with the usual paranoia starting at the same time, the mind comes up with all kinds of explanations, mostly not connected to the truth at all. Mr. Dumbledore has had enough opponents in his life that he might have thought they were trying to get rid of him.” A pointed look interrupted one of the others who had opened his mouth to say something. “Mr. Dumbledore is intelligent and talented enough to brew the potions to mask the bad effects. After all, he has studied alchemy, which isn’t such an obscure art for no reason. I’m sure even a mood-lightening potion isn’t above his capabilities.”

The room descended into chaos after that. Most of the healers didn’t want to believe that Dumbledore might actually be so bad in his mind that he would act against them and sabotage his own treatment. A few argued that Jeremy was the expert in this field, bringing on some of the more frequent accusations of being a dark wizard just because he knew his way around dark magic and its long-term effects on human bodies.

During the long and useless discussion, Jeremy wondered if his Lord needed to know of these new developments, and how he should communicate those bits of information. It was one thing to discuss a patient with fellow healers to get a second opinion, but the oaths they all took prevented them from involving others in any way if there wasn’t a need for their help for the sake of the patient.

In the end it was decided to speak with Mr. Dumbledore, instruct the people responsible for his care, and to repeat the tests determining the levels of harmful magic in his blood. Not what Jeremy would have preferred, but better than what some of the others had wanted to do.
With a sigh Severus stepped over the threshold into his and Sonja’s quarters. The last staff meeting before the holidays had just ended, and it had been much too long. At least the train had made it back to London safely, and most of the students had left the castle until the start of the next year.

Throwing his teaching robes over to one of the hooks by the door, using a little magic to make sure it landed safely and didn’t fall to the floor, Severus walked deeper into his home, already making plans for a lazy evening with his wife.

As this year not one of his younger Slytherins had opted to stay over the holidays, he didn’t have many responsibilities. Only some of those having their OWLs and NEWTs this year had decided to stay determined to dedicate the time to their studies. Maybe Sonja and he could make a few visits to the manor, get to know the elves better, and pick out what rooms they would like to renovate first. On the other hand, the fact that there were no students at the school he needed to keep an eye on all the time meant that he had no excuse to stay away from the many events he had been invited to since he had claimed his title.

It seemed there rarely was a blessing without a blemish attached as well.

But there on the settee in front of the brightly burning fire sat one such rare blessing. Sonja was reading by the fire, wrapped in a warm blanket, intently focused on the book in her hands. Smiling at the welcome sight, Severus walked over. “Love, do you want a glass of wine? I was just about to order one up from the kitchens.”

Sonja looked up, smiling a little nervous smile which instantly set Severus on edge. “No wine for me, please. But I would like a hot chocolate and an apple.”

“Is everything all right, love?” A few quick steps had Severus at his wife’s side where he sank down to his knees faster than he ever did before his Lord.

“I think.” Another trembling smile was aimed at Severus. “But I would like for you to cast a diagnostic spell at me. I don’t know the name, only that it exists. I have heard enough people talk of it to know that much.”

“Is something wrong? Don’t you feel well? I can get Madame Pomfrey down here to look at you.” Severus felt his heart racing in his chest, almost as if it were trying to break free. He couldn’t lose his love. He was sure he wouldn’t survive if he lost her.

“No, there is nothing wrong. Please calm down, Severus. I’m perfectly fine. I just want to know if what I suspect, is true. We can go out and get a muggle pregnancy test, but I think if you know the charm I was talking about, that would be so much faster.” She almost laughed at his frantic behaviour and it took Severus a moment to comprehend what she was talking about. But when he realized what it was she had said, he sat down on the floor heavily, feeling faint.

“Now you look like I need to fetch Madame Pomfrey,” Sonja laughed, but the fact that she still sounded a little nervous soothed Severus’ frayed nerves.

“I’m fine, love. And I know the charm, so no need to involve anyone else at this moment.” But Severus still needed to rest a moment before he was able to cast the charm so they would know for sure. Once they had their answer they settled into the settee, Severus with a fine glass of red wine, Sonja with a cup of creamy hot chocolate, wrapped in the blanket and content to cuddle while they wrapped their minds around the changes that would come into their lives all too soon.
I fear the next few chapters will be slow again :D there is so much that has to happen during the holidays. But I have been looking forward to this part of the story, so it will be fun to finally write it.

Thanks to Jordre and Jake for helping to improve my spelling!

Thursday, 21th of December

Harry had just moments ago woken up from a restful sleep in his own bed, in his own room, at home in Griffin House. It was such a strange concept still. The last time he had been here he still had felt so much more conflicted over the fact that he had been adopted. That now the man who had killed Harry’s parents was his new father.

But in the meantime so much else had happened. Marvolo had visited the Quidditch game Harry had played in. Had included him in important events, kept him informed. Harry felt respected as an almost adult. Not treated like a child as Mrs. Weasley and most of the professors tended to do.

In a slightly disgruntled mood, Harry exited his walk-in closet. He had way too many clothes, and he was sure Marvolo was using each and every opportunity he could to get even more of them made and added to the pile. The reason for this strange behaviour was still a mystery, though.

The evening before, Harry had tried to argue that they had bought warm winter robes and clothes in Hogsmeade, and that there was no reason to buy even more now. But Marvolo and the tailor had ganged up on him, claiming that Harry had grown since then – Harry was happy that this was even true – and that it was unseemly to be walking around with robes and trousers too short by even a fraction of an inch.

Harry still felt it was ridiculous to buy new clothes just because they started to get a little short – and the fact that the supposedly too-short clothes were not removed from his wardrobe was one big argument in Harry’s favour – but he had been overruled.

The fact that the trousers of fine wool, the silken shirt, a knit vest, and robes of a heavy woollen cloth – all perfectly colour coordinated of course – felt so incredibly good when worn just added to the strangeness. After a few months of school uniforms and robes it felt strange all anew that he now had well fitting, new, high-quality clothes to call his own.

But at the moment, the fact that he was dressed as posh as a Malfoy wasn’t the most pressing problem.

It was late. He had slept in. And Harry wasn’t sure that it was okay to get to breakfast so late.

He guessed that Marvolo would have sent one of the elves if it was a problem, but he couldn’t get rid of the nigling worry in his stomach.

The formal dining room was empty, so Harry walked past it towards the door to the kitchen. The smell of breakfast came from there, and as he reached the door he could hear tea being poured into a cup and the sizzling sound of bacon being cooked. Maybe breakfast wasn’t finished yet.

“Good morning, Henry. Come in, have a seat and fill a plate!” Marvolo looked and sounded as if he was in a good mood today. He was holding the Daily Prophet, just lowering it enough to look over the pages towards the door, where Harry was standing feeling quite awkward.

With a deep breath and a shaky smile Harry walked into the room. “Good morning, sir. I’m sorry I’m late.”

But before he could really start in on his apology, Marvolo already had waved one hand as if to banish the matter from the room. “This is the first day of a holiday that won’t be much of a holiday at all. I thought you deserved to sleep in for once.” The red-eyed wizard impatiently waved his hand, moving Harry’s chair away from the table, clearly ordering him to sit down already.

So Harry did exactly that, and started to fill his plate with scrambled eggs, some of the freshly cooked bacon that Flimm levitated over to him, a slice of toasted bread covered in honey, and some cut-up apple slices.

It was a peaceful breakfast, and as had been the custom even over at Theo’s place, they shared the newspaper, once Harry had eaten a decent portion.

“Do you have any plans for today?” Marvolo wanted to know at one point, taking another of the small cakes that Flimm had served them.

Harry shook his head, mouth still filled with his last bite of bacon and eggs. Once he had chewed and swallowed he answered. “I hadn’t thought that far yet. I somehow got the impression that most of the holiday would be occupied with events we would have to visit, so I mainly worried how to pack all the homework, and all the revising Hermione wants me to do, in the time of the holidays as well.” In fact, Harry had feared that the train ride back to Hogwarts would be the moment he would get to finish his homework. Even if he now didn’t need to sneak his school stuff into his room, if there wasn’t any time to do the essays, then there was no time.

“We do have quite a few events planned. I will give you a schedule at dinner this evening. But there should be enough time for your studying and a few visits to friends,” Marvolo said casually, folding the sports section of the newspaper to place it on the table next to his plate.

Harry perked up. Time for a few visits to his friends? That sounded much better than he had feared. Maybe an afternoon at the Burrow wasn’t that far out of the realm of possibilities after all. “Can I visit Sirius? Maybe even today?” Yesterday on their talk over the mirror, Sirius had gushed over the motorbike he had bought just a few days back, and now had managed to get it into one of the unused rooms to work on it. Harry was eager to see it and hear more of Sirius’ plans on what to do.

“If your godfather is free, I have no objections.” Marvolo nodded, filling his cup with more tea. “So go ahead and ask him.”

With a big smile Harry finished his orange juice – a nice change of pace from the normally ever present pumpkin-juice – before he stood from the table to hurry to his room where both mirrors were placed on his desk.

Harry really hoped that Sirius had time.
Pacing impatiently in front of the floo, Sirius drank his coffee as fast as was possible. Just a moment before Harry had called over the mirror asking if he could visit today. And of course he could visit. Sirius hadn’t had anything special planned today, only to relax and unwind after so many social events he had had to attend.

Doing so with his godson would be even better than doing it alone.

The cup of dark coffee had been drained for some time before Harry stumbled out of the floo, grinning like mad. “Sirius!” the teen cried out, sprinting over to Sirius, enveloping him in a big hug. With a big grin on his own face, Sirius folded his arms around the still lanky but now at least quite a bit taller teen.

“I’m happy to see you too, pup.” Stepping back, releasing the other, Sirius clapped one hand on Harry’s shoulder. “Do you want to eat breakfast with me?”

Harry gave him a sheepish grin. “I just had breakfast. I slept in today, and came here just after I had finished eating.”

“Well, then you'll have to watch me eating breakfast,” Sirius decided, and slung an arm across his godson’s shoulders. They went down to the kitchen where a nice breakfast was still laid out on the table.

“What are your plans for the holidays, Harry?” Sirius asked so he would be able to eat and listen to Harry, avoiding an awkward silence.

“Well, Ron invited me over to the burrow and I hope I can go. Because – as you should know – there are many events I'll have to go to. The ball Malfoy is giving, the small gathering hosted by Neville’s grandmother, and a few others.” His mouth full, Sirius nodded, and rolled his eyes. He had to go to all of those too. At least he knew Harry would be there as well. Maybe he could get some more time to spend together out of it. “Lord Lestrange has invited us over to the school he has started this autumn. They’ll have a small crafts fair, and a play as well. I think that'll be fun, because Hermione and her parents will be there too.” Sirius nodded, taking another fork full of egg and bacon into his mouth.

Harry sipped at the tea Sirius had pressed on him and seemed to be thinking what to say next. “Then there is revision… OWL year is really hard, I tell you. I wonder why I never noticed how stressed the fifth-years were each year. And homework, of course. I never gave Hermione much credit, but she's right, doing it as soon as possible is less stressful.”

Sirius made a face, while Harry chuckled, a little embarrassed. “I can tell you, your mother would agree, and Moony certainly will be proud to hear that you take your studies that serious.” Sirius made a face. He never had given much thought to homework, studying, or his OWLs, at least not until he had to. But now he was the adult, and he knew that it was his job to encourage Harry to study, learn, and do his homework in time. It was just really going against all he held dear. “How are classes going?”

“Fine. I’m happy I changed Divination for Ancient Runes. Not making up predictions on how evil, mishaps, and death will fall on me, is a relief. Defence is mostly theory, and I’m glad Hermione came up with the idea of the Defence Club. It gives me a lot of opportunity to practice my spells.”

While Sirius ate his breakfast – throwing in a question now and then – Harry happily told him about his studies, a topic they normally skipped during their calls over the mirror.
Then Harry got a gleam in his eyes and asked in a teasing tone, “Are you going to show me the bike you've found to tinker with?”

With a gleam in his own eyes, Sirius stood from the table, leaving it to Kreacher to clean up after them, waving for Harry to follow him. “I repurposed my mother’s favourite parlour into a work room. I think the bike I got is a real beauty. Sadly, the previous owner had no sense at all, leaving her in a terrible state, but that gives me so much more to do.”

Now it was up to Sirius to prattle on and on about the bike, his plans, and what he would do first. Harry followed him, listening intently. Once they reached the workroom, thick tarps covering the floor, Sirius started on the spot to work on the motorbike, getting Harry to help, handing him things he asked for. They spent the entire morning working and talking, even skipping lunch. Sirius felt reminded of the days he had spent working on his first motorcycle together with his best friend and chosen brother James, but at the same time it was different, as Harry was so much younger than Sirius, and not at all a carbon copy of his father.

After a wonderful morning working with their hands to renovate the old, rusty motorbike, Harry walked into one of the renovated bathrooms in Grimmauld Place to get rid of the grease and oil he had on his hands and – inexplicably – his face.

Sirius had hurried to get some tea served for them in the one room upstairs that was cleaned and renovated the most. It was the parlour with the tapestry inside, but it had big windows to the street and the back garden, making it one of the cheerier places. Which didn’t say too much.

After getting the stubborn stains from his skin, Harry made his way over to where he could hear Kreacher puttering around with the delicate china which had come with the house.

“That smells delicious, Kreacher,” Harry complimented the moment he stepped into the room. Flimm was always happy to receive some compliments about his work, and Dobby for sure always almost burst with pride when Harry had said he was doing something good. Maybe Harry should go visit the elf in the kitchen. He hadn’t seen the bubbly Dobby since he had helped Harry with the second task during the tournament.

Kreacher’s reaction was a sneer, but thankfully he didn’t say or mutter anything. So Harry sat down on a settee, adding sugar and cream to his cup of tea. They talked a bit more about the motorbike and Sirius’ plans for it. Charming it so it could fly sounded like fun, but Harry worried that it would be against Ministry regulations, and that would get Sirius in trouble.

Finally Harry contemplated the old tapestry with its many burned spots. “Have you found anyone who thought it possible to repair that thing?” It would be nice to get all those burned from the tapestry because they somehow had offended the family, onto it again.

Sirius shook his head, sighing. “No. Each expert I had here claimed it was impossible to get it repaired. Some even claimed any attempt to reverse the damage would only make it worse. Not sure if I really care about the risk, but I don’t know how to find an heir without that thing.”

Harry smirked. “Not interested in going the traditional route?” he teased and got a mock scowl back for his effort.
“When have I ever done something the traditional way? And marrying some woman is the last thing I want to do at the moment.” Sirius slumped down in his seat, scowling at the ceiling.

Harry played with his teacup, pondering something in his mind. He hadn’t had the opportunity to test it yet, but if Sirius really wasn’t concerned over maybe ruining the tapestry, it might be worth a shot.

“Maybe there is a way.” Harry began tentatively, folding his hands and leaning forward, placing his elbows on his knees. “I got a book for my birthday, detailing how magic can do incredible things when worked in Parseltongue.”

Sirius looked at Harry, a question clear in his eyes.

“I haven’t really tried it yet. Too much schoolwork, and too many… people around. But if there’s enough motivation and a clear intent, it should be possible to do many things that there’s no way to do any other way.” Harry shrugged helplessly. “There’s also a chapter about problems, and gruesome stories about what can go wrong. But I guess this is a relatively safe project?” The last came out sounding much more like a question, and Harry really didn’t feel that confident any longer. Sirius’ look was just so sceptical.

“Maybe I could try with something simpler first?” As he said this, Harry’s mind already was racing, searching for something that he could do to prove that his idea could work. “Like turning this spoon green?” he offered up his first idea.

Sirius sat up, clearly considering the idea. “Can you tell me about how this will work? Or is that too close to family magic to talk about?”

Harry opened his mouth and then closed it again, just nodding, as he realised that this was indeed something he couldn’t talk about with someone not belonging to the family. “I can tell you that only the object, or being, the spell is aimed at can suffer from any bad consequences. And as long as I have a clear intent and a clear goal in mind, there shouldn’t be any big problems.” The book had compared the magic of intent to what happened with accidental magic in young children. They almost always had a very clear intent. They wanted to have something, or needed to be safe, warm, they needed light… it didn’t happen often that they were confused over what they wanted. Once the needs got more complicated, or conflicted with others, instances of accidental magic occurred less often. Usually with the increasing age of the children.

All Harry needed was a clear image of what he wanted to happen, and a clear desire for it to happen. And he was reasonably sure that he had both. He wanted for Sirius to no longer have to worry about finding an heir, because he knew without a doubt if the tapestry could give him a name or not. So Harry wanted it to work as it had been intended on creation. Sirius nodded slowly. “Alright, Harry, you can test it. First on this spoon, and if that works, you can test it on the tapestry. I’ve even considered just burning it, so I can concentrate on something different. Like convincing Dora that now that her mother and she are back in the family, she should accept the position as heiress.” Harry snorted. Never would Dora – or rather Tonks – agree to something like that. He hadn’t spoken with her often, but what he had been told of her by Sirius didn’t point at someone willing to put up with the norms and demands of society.

But now wasn’t the time to discuss this. And Sirius even knew all of that. So Harry got his wand out and placed the spoon on the table in front of himself. He thought what words he should use, before he pointed his wand at the spoon and concentrated, clearly picturing the outcome he wanted to see when he was finished.

Parseltongue, grinning in wonder as the spoon turned a bright leaf green. “Look, it worked!”

Sirius nodded, clearly not really that impressed. “I could have done that with a simple colour-switching spell.”

Harry shrugged. “Yeah. But a normal Finite shouldn’t work on this.” At least the book had said that magic worked this way wasn’t easily countered by normal means used by a witch or wizard without the use of Parseltongue.

Sirius raised a brow and got out his own wand. Pointing it at the green spoon on the table, Sirius cast a wordless Finite without any effect. Frowning a little, Sirius sat a little bit straighter, aimed his wand again and spoke aloud this time. “Finite incantatem!”

The expression on his godfather’s face turned to impressed. “If you can return the spoon to its original colour, I will admit that it might work.”

Turning several possible phrases over in his mind, Harry concentrated on what he wanted to happen. The spoon should be silver again after he was finished. How could he express that in a few simple words?

.:Green vanish, reveal original colour again:. It wasn’t all that short, but as the green slowly shrank back, revealing the silver colour of the spoon again, it was clear that it had worked. Had the selection of the verb had an effect on how the change had happened? An instant turning at first, a slow change back? It was something that Harry could consider.

But now he had to find the words to best impress how he wanted this to work. If Sirius allowed him to try.

Pleading green eyes turned to Sirius, who sat there, eyes glued to the spoon which now was again of a silver colour. Slowly grey eyes rose from the unassuming piece of cutlery, taking in the young wizard sitting there tense and waiting. “That’s really something. You think you can do this?” Harry nodded. “You’re sure there is no danger for you?” Harry nodded again. “Then you may try.”

Harry stood, walked over to the tapestry, and eyed it while his mind was whirling. He wanted this tapestry to be whole again, magic and material. He wanted it to work again, to be like it would have been if it hadn’t been damaged. He wanted the damage to vanish, leaving the tapestry whole again.

That might work.

Ignoring the shaking in his hand, Harry pointed his wand at the tapestry, picturing it without the burn marks, no person removed by crude means and for petty reasons. He took a deep breath and blanked out the piercing gaze of his godfather that he could feel on his back. There was no benefit in being distracted now. With the now practiced patterns of a relaxing breathing exercise, Harry calmed his racing heart before he started speaking. Or rather, hissing.

.:Tapestry be whole again, as if damage was never done:. Harry felt power rush through him, leaving him dizzy and his eyes watering. Suddenly he was sitting on the floor, limp fingers almost losing their grip on his wand. How had he ended up down here?

Before Harry could manage to clear his mind enough to comprehend what had happened, Sirius was crouching next to him, sounding troubled. “Harry! Are you okay? You said there was no danger for you! Did you even know? Maybe you’re more like your father than I had thought! Such recklessness!”
That had been harder than he had expected. Maybe he should have anticipated something like this. Changing the colour of something was easy, repairing such a powerful, ancient artefact was a little bit harder. Or maybe, rather, a lot harder.

Smiling a little ruefully, Harry reassured Sirius, “I’m alright, just a little dizzy. Maybe that was a bigger effort than I had thought it would be. I have felt worse, after an afternoon trying to learn the patronus charm with Remus.” He had been two years younger then, and there had been a mock Dementor affecting him, but that wasn’t really all that important now, was it?

“Did it work?”

Giving him an unimpressed look, Sirius turned his body so he could look at the tapestry. He snorted. “It did work. But now isn’t the time to look at the impossible magical feat you just achieved. Now we will get you onto the settee, and have you eat a big piece of chocolate while we wait for Remus to come here. If he says you’re okay, then it’s fine. If he says you’re not okay, we’ll call a healer.” There was something like steel in Sirius’ voice and Harry wisely decided not to challenge him on this. And chocolate sounded really good anyway.

oooOOooo

Severus had apparated them over to the manor – after pressing Sonja into taking a stomach soother, as she had had a queasy stomach for several days now – and was now watching with amusement in his eyes as she walked through the old house, telling the three elves which rooms she wanted to be renovated first.

The fact that the three small elves were almost jumping up and down, so happy and eager to help their Lord and Lady feel at home, was as amusing as Sonja’s businesslike tone in ordering what room was to be renovated first.

“What do you think, Severus, what colours should we have in the dining room? A light sage green, or maybe a golden yellow?” Sonja turned to him, arching a brow the moment his amusement was spotted.

“You know how my quarters are arranged, love. I’m not really a man known for his taste in interior decoration. But I like references to potions, and am a Slytherin. So, greens?” He really wasn’t sure what colours would look good, and as long as Sonja didn’t plan to decorate everything in the red and gold of Gryffindor he would be content.

Sonja laughed. “I’m amazed that there really is something most men I have met seem to share.” Now Severus was the one arching a brow in a silent question. With a shrug Sonja answered. “I haven’t met many men who were interested in decorating a home. Picking colours and whatever else is necessary.”

She walked over to him, pressing her smaller body to his tall frame. “Or am I mistaken?”

Closing his arms around her, smiling down at her mischievous expression, Severus gave a slight shake of his head. “You are not. I’m really not interested. But that doesn’t mean that I have no opinion... So please, no Gryffindor red.”

The peals of Sonja’s laughter echoed through the halls. “No worries, love. I’m not that fond of red as a colour for walls, rugs, or drapes. But I like greens and blues, and maybe a few subtle yellow and orange hues for the rooms with the furniture of that beautiful honey-coloured wood.”

Severus knew that he needed to organise the renovation of Prince Manor, but he really wasn’t all that interested in the particulars, details, and all the small decisions it would require. It seemed that he had been lucky enough to find a woman who not only loved him, but was willing to take care of these things for him.

“Cherry, please start with the formal rooms and the kitchen. Until the summer, we most likely will spend most of our time at Hogwarts. As Head of House Severus needs to be available to his students most of the day, including nights. After that, you will start on the master bedroom and the nursery.” The big eyes of all three elves got even bigger as they easily made the connection why the nursery was among the first rooms to be renovated. “Clean up all the rooms enough that they don’t look as neglected as they do now. Severus, why don’t you take Basil out into the garden to explain how you want your ingredients garden organized, and which lab to clean first? I’m sure you’ll enjoy planning your lab much more than walking through all the bedrooms, parlours, and studies with me.” Her grin was impish.

Severus’ first instinct was to stay with his wife. She was unable to cast any spells, practically defenceless if she should come across something dangerous. And the next thing he did was beating that instinct down with common sense. She was an intelligent woman, who had lived in the magical world for most of her life. She wouldn’t risk touching something that seemed ominous. And she wasn’t alone. Two dedicated house-elves would be by her side, eager to protect the Lady of the Manor and the heir even now growing inside of her. He would make her feel like she was incompetent if he insisted on being by her side all the time because she wasn’t able to look after herself.

He took a deep breath, checked his occlumency shields and then smiled at his wife. “If you need me for anything – like deciding on a green for the living room – send one of the elves. I will be in the garden.”

They parted with a kiss, and Severus could hear Sonja giving orders until he had reached one of the doors leading outside. “I wish for all the common herbs and plants to be available in the garden. No reason to not grow them in my own garden now that I have the space. One of the greenhouses will be dedicated to plants from the Mediterranean.” Sonja had been right. Even though he was no herbologist, he was a Potions Master and knew enough about the magical and mundane plants he needed in his craft to have strong opinions on how a garden should be planned. He would have a fun day outdoors, even with the weather as bad as it was in this part of the country.

When Remus arrived at Grimmauld Place he found a nervously pacing Sirius in the parlour with that hideous tapestry, and a sleeping Harry on one of the settees.

“What happened?” Remus asked of his oldest friend once he had taken in the room and the mood.

Sirius waved a hand in the direction of the tapestry and stopped his pacing to turn so he could see Remus. “Harry repaired the tapestry. I gave him chocolate because he was looking a little peaky, shaky on his feet… then he laid down and was asleep in seconds. I think we need to call a healer.” Sirius yanked his hair out of his face with one hand, nervously carding that hand through his dark hair more than once, truly looking worried and lost.
Not concentrating on the fact that his friend just had claimed that Harry had done what several expert had claimed to be impossible, Remus got his wand out and stepped over to the settee where Harry was lying curled up under one of the new blankets Sirius had gotten for the house.

He cast a charm and started to talk just to hopefully soothe his nervous friend. “Madam Pomfrey made sure that each teacher knows how to cast the basic diagnostic charms. Especially the charm to check for magical exhaustion. She explained to me the day she instructed me on how to cast it that it was so we would be able to distinguish between those students who didn’t get enough sleep from those who were over-exerting themselves with casting spells. She made it quite clear that we shouldn’t send those staying up too late to her.” He wasn’t all that experienced with this charm – it didn’t happen all too often that one of the students used more magic than they should – but these readings didn’t looked too bad.

“Stop fretting, Sirius. A slight case of magical exhaustion. Harry will be fine. A nap and an early night today should be enough to get him back on his feet.” Remus took the few steps to stand next to his friend, clasping his shoulder. “You said Harry repaired the tapestry?”

With a distracted nod, Sirius turned and walked over to said tapestry, Remus following close behind.

“I haven’t really looked at it yet. I only noticed that all the burned spots were gone after Harry sat down on the floor. Claimed he was dizzy…” Sirius trailed off and stopped a step before the wall, his grey eyes wandering over the now no longer burned tapestry.

Remus stood next to his friend and started to inspect the tapestry. All the burned spots were gone. There was Alphard, the uncle of Sirius who once had given him money, Andromeda as well as her husband and daughter now were displayed, alongside Bellatrix, her husband – him with a date of death – Narcissa, her husband and son Draco. Other spots showed small portraits. All in all it seemed fuller, especially in the generations which were still alive today. And there was Sirius. Not sure if he was seeing correctly, Remus rubbed his eyes, and then looked again.

“Who is Olivienne Moreau?” Remus asked – unsure how to pronounce it – pointing at the place near of Sirius’ own portrait where a young woman was woven into the tapestry. There was a line between Sirius and her and then another line going down to split and connect two more portraits to them.

“Who?” Sirius asked, turning his eyes from where he had been looking at some older relatives, to where several people had been burned off in each generation.

“Olivienne Moreau.” Remus repeated, deciding on a French pronunciation. “And her children – twins – who look a lot like you.” Remus had to smirk. It seemed as if Sirius had bungled the contraception charm at least once.

Sirius reverently stretched his hand in the direction of the small group of portraits among the sea of all the others. “I’m a father?” He sounded totally shocked, his hand trembling.

“Harry did an excellent job with the repair,” Remus murmured approvingly. “The colours are really vibrant, there isn’t a speck of dust… it’s as good as new!” And the tapestry really was. Remus wondered how it was possible that Harry had managed to do this when all the experts – or so-called experts, Sirius had become truly desperate at the end – had declared the endeavour was pointless.

“Why did she never contact me?” asked Sirius, his eyes still fixed on the place where his own likeness was connected to the three others.
“Do you remember her?” Remus asked only to be answered by a silent shake of Sirius’ head. “Then maybe she didn’t know your name either. So how could she have found you? And if she knew your name... the date of birth is after that November... so you already were in Azkaban.” It wasn’t nice to bring that fact into the discussion, but it was a fact. Sirius had been in Azkaban when the twin girls had been born.

Sirius nodded numbly. It seemed as if this was a little bit much for him. “Come, let’s go to the kitchen, get you a drink. And then you will contact a private investigator to search for the mother of your children. I would guess she might be French? Or maybe from Canada? Or Switzerland?” With a last look at the peacefully sleeping Harry, Remus guided his old friend down the stairs and into the kitchen.

Once he had Sirius sitting in a chair at the table he started to brew a nice pot of tea. “At least now you have found two possible heirs. If they are willing to move to our nice foggy Great Britain.”

The look Sirius threw at Remus for that quip only made the werewolf chuckle. It was always fun to tease a friend.

ooooOOooo

Marvolo had spend most of the morning with paperwork and preparations. Paperwork because he had to do it sometime, and preparations because the 21st of December was a good – safe – day to perform rituals of high complexity.

He had decided to test his ritual to move a horcrux from its container to another today just for that reason. These plans had influenced him in allowing Henry a whole day with his godfather this early in the holidays. They also had caused him to decline a few invitations from woefully muggle-oriented, so-called light families. Luckily, most of those holding seats in the Wizengamot never held functions on those days traditionally used for rituals, or celebrations of magic. Not all of them – probably less than even a handful – observed those rituals any longer, but it was traditional to leave those days for personal affairs, so those that wanted to could perform their rituals in private.

Because of the real possibility that something might go wrong, Marvolo had called Malcolm Greengrass here to watch the proceedings and to provide help if needed. Of course he had made the man swear an oath making sure he couldn’t speak about what he was to learn this day, if it wasn’t paramount for him to share the information to ensure Marvolo’s survival. Marvolo felt reasonably sure that there would be no need for help, but it was better to be safe than sorry.

“Are you ready for me to begin, Malcolm?” Marvolo asked, slipping the robes he had thrown over the simple long shirt made from thin linen cloth he was wearing as his only clothing down his arms.

“I am, my Lord,” was the shaky answer of his healer. The soft sounds of glass phials being moved around signalled that the Healer had everything at hand that might be of use should something go wrong.

Taking up the diadem – the part of his soul encased within was going to be moved today – and a gold-plated hollow sphere made from clay – where the soul piece was to be moved to – Marvolo carefully stepped into the interconnecting circles he had drawn with chalk onto the smooth stone floor of the ritual room he had found and cleaned out in his Headquarters.
It had taken some considerable effort to make all the lines as clear and precise as he could. Drawing with chalk drenched in some potions wasn’t really all that easy, as the material got more temperamental and unpredictable in drawing on stone, leading to irregular lines and dangerous gaps if one wasn’t really careful. One of the reasons so many people get hurt trying complicated rituals to reach a goal were these difficulties. But Marvolo had worked highly focused, and later checked the ritual circle several times until he was sure there weren’t any errors.

No, if something was going to go wrong, it would be because he had made an error in the creation of the ritual, not in the performing of it.

Carefully placing his bare feet so as not to smudge any of the lines, Marvolo moved through the circle, placing the two objects to be used in their appropriate places, before he moved to the blank place in the dense markings where he would be sitting during the ritual.

Sitting down cross-legged, placing his hands on his knees, Marvolo started on his breathing exercises to get into the right frame of mind for this ritual. After several minutes he started to chant the words he had come up with for this. Small bowls filled with specific herbs set up at strategic places started to smoke as the herbs caught fire simultaneously, filling the room with flickering light – in addition to the white magical lights hovering in the four corners – and a sweet scent that was tart at the same time.

Up until now all seemed to go as planned. Focusing on what he had to do, Marvolo changed the chant from the one to start the ritual to the one designed to extract the soul piece from its current container, which promptly started to glow softly in an eerie red.

When the red glow separated slowly from the diadem, coalescing into a small cloud over the object of precious metal and stones, a feeling of pride coursed through Marvolo. It was working! The cloud was smaller than he would have thought, but in the end, he hadn’t been all that observant when he had moved this part of his soul out of his body and into the diadem. The pain and ripping had distracted him.

Then suddenly everything went wrong. Instead of moving over to the second object, prepared to accept the soul piece as its new container, the cloud floated over to where Marvolo was sitting, frozen to his spot in fear of causing bigger problems, seemingly following a straight line.

Slightly panicking, Marvolo changed the chant to the one intended to help the soul piece to settle into its new container. Those were based on the original words of the horcrux creation ritual, as placing the piece in a container was a main part of that ritual. But it looked like the container would be Marvolo’s body instead of the sphere of clay.

The moment the small cloud made contact with Marvolo’s torso, right where the heart was located, pain shot out through his whole body. It made him falter in his chant, voice cut off, a cry of pain wrenched from his throat. Then he fell to his side, shaking, all his nerves burning.

Was this as bad as the evening he had been reborn? Or as bad as the moment the piece of his soul that had been contained in the ring had returned to him? It was incredibly hard to measure pain in any way objectively.

For the moment not willing to try moving on his own, Marvolo only concentrated on breathing, and contemplating what had gone wrong. The part of extracting the piece from its container had worked perfectly, but binding it to a new container had failed, instead moving it back to its original container. If he was willing to call his body a container.

Maybe he would need another death to bind the soul piece to anything other than his own body?
And would he need to change his approach at all? From where he lay, panting, the diadem seemed unharmed. Maybe this was all he really needed?

While he was concentrating on his breathing and thinking, a frantic Malcolm had decided the ritual had ended in failure, hurrying over to his Lord.

ooOoo

It had been terrifying to look on as his Lord performed a ritual to move a piece of his soul from one inanimate container – the diadem of Ravenclaw! – to another. That something like breaking one's soul and extracting it from the body was even possible, Malcolm never would have thought. That his Lord was working to dismantle the precautions he had taken to prevent his own death was another baffling fact.

But now he knew what had caused the bad reaction during that planning meeting back at the end of the summer. The claim it had been a reaction to old wards being broken had never felt really true. But Malcolm was neither an expert in wards nor an expert in obscure dark magic, so he hadn’t questioned the story he had been told.

But now he was crouching next to his Lord, who was curled on his side on the floor, slowly pouring a strong pain relieving potion into the whimpering man’s mouth. As a Healer he got to see many people at their worst, but it always was staggering to see someone as powerful as Lord Slytherin brought so low.

“As far as I can see there are no wounds, no damage done. If the last occurrence is any indication, the pain will fade with time. If I may be so bold, I would suggest bringing you back home, where you will rest, my Lord. A good night’s sleep and another pain relieving potion should suffice, my Lord.” All the charms he had cast had given him results eerily reminiscent of the effects the Cruciatius curse had. But now wasn’t the time to ponder the medical implications of the return of a part of a soul to the original body, now was the time to get his Lord back into something resembling respectable clothing before he would escorted him back home.

Malcolm walked over to the chair next to where he had his potions set up to get the robe, shoes, and socks his Lord had worn before he had removed everything that would be not needed during the ritual. He picked the things up. It would be easier to get his Lord into the robe and shoes over where he was resting on the floor, then to somehow bring him over to where the clothes had been placed.

The chalk drawing was smeared around the place where the Dark Lord was now turned onto his back, panting, as well as the path Malcolm had taken to come to his Lord’s help.

“My Lord, I will help you dress before we will return to your home. Is this all right?” A weak nod was his answer.

So Malcolm started with the difficult task of dressing a grown man who wasn’t able to be of any assistance. This had always been a part of the healer education he hadn’t liked. Moving patients around without the aid of magic. It was so much easier to levitate someone to dress them, or to pass on the task to a medi-witch or -wizard entirely. But here for his Lord he was the only one at hand to help, and using magic might not be a good idea at the moment. When rituals went wrong, or at least not as they had been planned, adding more magic into the mix so soon – especially if the magic wasn’t essential – was something to be avoided. After several minutes of struggling, Malcolm had wrapped the Dark Lord in his robe and moved on to put socks and shoes back onto the man.

Hopefully his Lord would be able to stand once that task was finished. There was no way Malcolm would be able to carry him to the floo if he couldn’t walk at all.

ooOoo

In a way, it was totally demeaning to need that much help from another to move around. On the other hand, he had known that this was one possible outcome and had done the ritual anyway. At least he had prepared everything required to make sure he would get the help needed. Was that a redeeming factor?

Marvolo’s mind offered up insignificant titbits and ideas to ponder while he was helpless after the ritual had derailed so completely. The pain potion was helping to dull the pain, and the random thoughts his mind was coming up with helped with ignoring the fact that one of his followers had to dress him as if he were an invalid, or a toddler.

Marvolo tried to ignore the fact he was whimpering when Malcolm hauled him upright and moved one of Marvolo’s arms over his shoulder to better support his weight on the way to the floo. Once they had managed to establish some kind of stability, Marvolo did his best to shuffle along. For the next experiment, he would make sure he could just sleep in the ritual room without moving much.

The trip by floo was quite taxing on his already strained system. Only with great difficulty did Marvolo manage to keep from throwing up. Malcolm was considerate enough to stop for a moment in their floo room so Marvolo could catch his breath.

While they were standing there, the front door was opened, and Marvolo wondered for a moment who that might be, until he realised it probably was Henry coming home from his stay with his godfather. It was already late enough for that.

If he had been capable of blushing at the moment, he would have, for fear of being seen by his son in such a weak state. He was pretty sure he did blush the moment he noticed Lord Black and Mr. Lupin were accompanying his son into the house.

Then the state of Henry registered.

“What happened to my son?” Marvolo was sure that if his voice hadn’t sounded as if he had been gargling with sand, it would have sounded much more intimidating. But the way it was, he sounded rather pitiable.

Henry looked rather sheepish where he was leaning against his godfather. Who answered instead of the teenager. “He repaired the family tapestry by hissing something at it. Harry’s fine and just needs sleep.” The tall man gave Marvolo an assessing look. “And what happened to you, Lord Slytherin?”

Before Marvolo could come up with an answer – his mind was frighteningly slow at the moment – Malcolm answered. “Lord Slytherin worked a cleansing-ritual on a historical artefact that had been cursed. He’s tired, so I suggest you help heir Slytherin up to his room and then leave.”
Marvolo was glad that they did exactly that. He was worried and curious over what exactly Henry had done using Parseltongue in casting magic, but at the moment he just wasn’t up to doing anything about those feelings. That had to wait for tomorrow.

When he was finally in his bed, staring at the ceiling, slowly slipping towards sleep, Nagini slithered into the room.

.:You both are really reckless! Why do you risk yourself? Don’t you care for me? The young one said he wanted to sleep, will you pay me some attention? You look like you’re falling asleep just now:. She slithered up on the bed and moved over so she could peer into his face.

Marvolo sighed. .:I’m sorry, my dear. But I need that sleep right now:. And then sleep claimed him while Nagini was muttering in the background, complaining in colourful language about the fact that now both her humans were here and she was ignored regardless.

Chapter End Notes

I’m not sure how to name the new twins, or where they are from. There are so many places in the world where French is spoken. So if you have any ideas, write a review I can use your help! ;)

Thanks to Jordre and Jake for helping to improve my spelling!

Chapter Notes

This was no easy chapter. Lots of research and decisions. Not everything will be revealed in this chapter, but I hope you have fun reading anyway ;)
Oh, and thanks to all those offering me ideas about where the twins could be from and how to name them. Some of you had me confused for a while because they offered up names for boys ;)

Sorry that it's a day late. Friday was a little hectic.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Friday, 22nd of December

Heavy trepidation rested in Harry’s stomach on his way down to breakfast this morning after his stupid leap without thinking first the previous afternoon. Or at least Marvolo would call it stupid, that was as sure as the rising of the sun at the beginning of a day.

And at the same time Harry was curious. He hadn’t been in the best shape when he had come home yesterday, but it had been clear as day that Marvolo had been even worse off. The healer had said something about a ritual to remove a curse from an object. Had Marvolo tried the ritual he had been working on? If so, he seemed to have been careful, but whether he had been successful wasn’t as certain.

The moment Harry stepped into the room, the peaceful picture he saw made him blink rapidly in surprise. Marvolo was sitting in his usual place, newspaper folded so he could read it, teacup on its saucer floating near his right hand so he could easily reach it to take a sip.

With cautious steps Harry walked in – thankfully his exhaustion hadn’t translated into any sourness – and spoke the usual greeting. “Good morning, Marvolo. You look better.” Harry winced internally, that hadn’t been the best idea. Maybe he still was more tired than he had thought.

“You look better as well.” There was a wry smile on Marvolo’s face. It seemed that he saw the irony in the situation.

So Harry walked over to his place, first filling his own cup with tea, then taking one of the Belgian waffles and pouring chocolate sauce over it in abundance, before he selected a few of the ripe and sweet-looking fruit offered as well. There always were sweet options on the table whenever he ate with Marvolo, and today Harry felt like he needed the extra energy.

“I hope I don’t need to explain why making your first forays into the realm of intent-based magic casting without proper supervision was a bad choice?” There was no trace of the threat in the question that Harry had anticipated. For a moment Harry stopped chewing, he was so surprised.

When the pointed look registered, he quickly resumed chewing before he swallowed the tasty bite of waffle. “There was an adult present, and an adult wizard at that. And Sirius was on the list of approved adults to supervise when I try new things.” Harry knew it was a weak attempt. The list had been given with the condition that they only were allowed to supervise when they could perform whatever spell he wanted to learn themselves. And beside Harry himself, there was only Marvolo able to speak Parseltongue. Not daring to look up, in fear he would blush because of that weak excuse, Harry concentrated on his plate and the food on it.

The chuckle from the other made clear that he didn’t fool Marvolo with that explanation. And Harry hadn’t thought about the rules at all the moment he had thought of how he might be able to repair the tapestry and help Sirius. He looked up again as Marvolo asked in true interest. “Why did you choose to start with something that big and complex, anyway? I remember that there is a recommendation what to try first. And I remember a nice few hot days at Hogwarts where my milk just was that few essential degrees colder because I practiced with changing the temperature of liquids.”

Harry set down his cup and shook his head. “That wasn’t the first I tried. Before that I changed the colour of a spoon, to green and back. It was really easy. Easier than it was when I was learning the colour-changing charm.” And it had been. But that could be because he didn’t have to move his wand in such a complicated pattern, changing the speed in the middle of the motion.

Marvolo folded the newspaper and placed it on the empty chair on his left, sighing. “To avoid further misunderstandings, you are not to practice wielding magic only directed by your intent and parseltongue without my presence. Is that clear?”

Harry nodded. That was a lot less harsh than he had feared, even as there was steel in Marvolo’s voice. “Yes, sir.” Then he hesitated a moment before he decided to ask, after all he was really curious and it did affect him. Up until now, Marvolo had had a tendency to tell him things other adults always had been trying to shield him from. “Healer Greengrass wasn’t all that clear on what you were doing yesterday to make you look so… worn out.” That wasn’t really a question, but outside of a classroom situation Harry hadn’t really had an opportunity to learn how to ask questions of adults. And for some reason Harry didn’t want to think too much about, Sirius didn’t truly count.

“I tried the ritual I have been working on to move a soul piece out of a horcrux and move it to a new container.” For a moment Harry was baffled – that was an answer he hadn’t really anticipated – but then he found his orientation again. It seemed that the honesty they had shared in their conversation over the mirrors hadn’t been lost now that they both were in the same room again.

“What went wrong?” Because Harry was sure something had gone wrong the day before. There was no other way that Marvolo would have looked so bad off, otherwise.

“Not as much as could have. The Diadem of Ravenclaw is in perfect condition. Or at least it looked that way yesterday. But I didn’t actually manage to move the soul piece from one container to the other. Instead it returned to me, with much the same effects as when the piece from the ring was forcibly returned to my body.” Harry felt a cold chill run down his spine. That sounded like a dangerous failure. “But I wonder if there is even a need to make the move to another container perfect… I think I should concentrate on perfecting the part of removing the soul-shard without causing any kind of damage to the container.”

Harry watched as Marvolo’s red eyes slid to where his longer hair now hid the scar a little better than before. Yeah, Harry certainly wouldn’t object if Marvolo concentrated on making sure that the extraction didn’t harm the container. It might be a little bit selfish – knowing that Marvolo got hurt wasn’t nice – but when the time came to extract the tiny fragment of soul from him, he certainly wanted to know that it was safe to do so. He certainly didn’t want to die because someone decided that Marvolo had to die and killing Harry was the only way.

So they got into talking about rituals in general, what there was, why they were so dangerous, and how Marvolo had been sure it was safe enough to try what he had made, because Harry really felt that it had been uncharacteristically reckless. By that point Nagini had slithered into the room, agreeing fervently with Harry, prompting Marvolo to explain a lot more about the process he had followed until he had felt safe enough to try.

When Harry went to prepare for their outing planned for the day, he felt somewhat better. Knowing that there was a curse-breaker Marvolo had looking at what he came up with, discussing it with another person, and that Healer Greengrass had been there and would be there for any further attempts was reassuring as well.

But for the moment, Harry had to dress for a visit to one of the Potter businesses he still knew too little about. And that was the reason they were visiting today.

oooOOooo

“Stop pacing, Basti.” Rodolphus looked over to his older brother, before picking up the shirt from his bed. “We need to get dressed and then we need to get into the right frame of mind. There is no time for worrying.”

Rabastan turned to his brother, revealing the face that had drastically changed after the ritual they had performed with their Lord’s help. Hair so brown it was almost black fell in soft waves around his face. They had grown it out and practiced braiding it, because hanging loose it would get in the way, but long hair was something common in South American wizards. “But I am already in character. The older brother worrying how they will be received by their father who knew nothing about them until they contacted him. Why shouldn’t I be pacing?”

“Hey, we are twins!” Rodolphus exclaimed indignantly. Taking the ageing potion in a greater dose so he would be as old as his brother had been a big step. He no longer was the baby brother. Even if Floppy had insisted to call them little masters when they had explained that from now on they were to be treated as strangers even if they still were part of the Lestrange family. He was as old as his brother now.

“But I still was born before you!” Rabastan joked, stopping to pace. “So I’ll be the older brother yet again.”

Snorting – it seemed his brother was determined that Rodolphus would stay the younger forever – Rodolphus started to put on the clothes they had selected for this day’s meeting. Consulting the Dark Lord and Snape – both shockingly aware of muggle society – they had opted for dress shirts and jackets worn over some trousers called jeans which were rather tight, long coats, and leather shoes.

“I think travelling the world in search of rare ingredients for potions and rituals is a good life. It’s much better than hiding.” Rodolphus was sure if he only repeated it enough times that he would learn to accept that this was going to be the way things were. As a kid he had dreamed of travelling the world, then he had craved to help their Lord rescue the traditions of their community. And now they could help by not disrupting their Lord’s plans. Maybe even help by finding things all over the world.
“I just hope the young girl isn’t so clever that she will see through our story the moment we stand before her.” Giving Rabastan the evil look they had used on each other when one had ruined a plan as long as they could walk, Rodolphus shook his head.

“We did a good job, there’s no way she can know about the rituals we used, and therefore she can’t know who we used to be. If we don’t tell her!”

ooOoo

Hermione was excited. She would get to meet wizards from overseas and would be able to talk to them for longer than a few moments. That was what she had wished for during the Quidditch world cup, and the Tri-Wizard-Tournament, to learn about different cultures. But both times what had happened around the events had dashed those wishes thoroughly.

Uncle Xerxes had picked them up so the trip to the restaurant wouldn’t take so long. At the moment they were already seated at their table ordering drinks to pass the time until Xerxes’ sons would be here.

“And please don’t ask them too many questions at once, Hermione,” Her mother admonished her, a merry twinkle in her eyes. Hermione mock-pouted, before she collapsed into giggles. “I’ll try, mum. But I’m just so curious!”

Hermione felt like running around in circles and jumping up and down. It had been quite a few years since she had done exactly that the morning they were to visit an exhibition about Egypt in London. Thinking back, Hermione always felt a little embarrassed for her younger self. But she had been looking forward to that visit for days.

“I’m sure she’ll be a perfectly polite young lady.” Xerxes said with a smile, nervously folding his hands on the table. Hermione was sure he had to be terribly nervous over meeting his sons after all those years. She wasn’t quite sure how she would feel in his shoes. But when she ever had children, she would know they existed. Men were a little disadvantaged in this.

“How are the preparations for the festival at your school progressing?” With practiced ease Hermione’s mother Jean moved the conversation into safer waters. “Everything is finished,” Xerxes answered with a thankful smile. They talked about the festival that would take place the following day until two men in their late forties, early fifties – Hermione never had been good at estimating the age of people – were led to their table by one of the staff.

While Hermione looked them over, everyone stood to greet the new arrivals. The two weren’t identical twins – like Fred and George – but fraternal twins. If she hadn’t been told that they were twins, she would have guessed they were brothers who were close in age. Both had dark – almost black – hair that was braided back from their faces. They had a dark complexion and brown eyes. Their clothes weren’t anything remarkable, but since they had been travelling the world, it was to be expected that they knew how to dress as to blend in with muggles.

“And this is my heiress, Hermione. She is currently home from school for the holidays.” Her uncle’s words yanked Hermione out of her recollection of the oddly dressed wizards and witches she had seen the summer before last.

“Nice to meet you,” she greeted politely, accepting the hands offered and shook them with a sure It’s nice to meet you too.” There was a faint trace of an accent there that Hermione couldn’t identify.

They settled down again, and soon they had ordered their food. Under the watchful gaze of her parents, Hermione had no trouble restraining the barrage of questions fighting for attention in her own head. The fact that the two brothers, who had introduced themselves as Tiago and Teofilo, had so many entertaining stories to tell from their travels made it easy to just listen to them talk.

Soon dessert was brought out and the conversation had switched over to schooling. Xerxes had told some of the funny things that had happened at Hogwarts while he had been a student, Jean and Fabian had shared the story of how they had met during their studies to become dentists, and Hermione had been pressed into telling the story of her efforts to free the house-elves of Hogwarts. Now that she knew more about house-elves she felt a little stupid for charging in head-first before doing any research. But there had to be a reason she was a Gryffindor and not a Ravenclaw.

“We thought you all might like to visit some of the important and interesting sights of London, after we have finished our lunch. Jean organised a tour with several stops. The Tower of London is just one of them.” Her father was smiling, it was obvious that her parents liked the newly found additions to the family. They suddenly had much more of that. Going to get herself an ancestry test had been a good decision after all. Hermione really looked forward to being able to be an influence on politics once she had finished her schooling.

“That is a really nice offer, Mr. and Mrs. Granger. Tiago and I would be really happy to see the city.” The one with the slightly broader face, and a slightly curved tooth – Hermione wasn’t sure if it was from a crocodile or something else – as a charm around his neck, answered for them both.

“And I would like to treat you all to a piece of cake or some ice cream at Fortescue's in Diagon Alley at the end. What do you think?” Xerxes was in a really good mood, and Hermione was happy to see this. Ever since his other, younger sons had escaped the prison and then died in that horrible fire, she had worried that he might slip into a depression, but now it looked like this danger was less likely to happen.

Engaged in lively chatter, the group of six ventured out into London to have a good time.

oooOOooo

After they had brought Harry back home yesterday, Remus and Sirius had gone back to Grimmauld Place and gathered what information they could from the tapestry. The actual portraits were tiny enough to only hint at the appearance of a person, but it was enough to see the colour of their skin, hair and other such superficial facts. There were also the names, and the dates of birth. It should be enough for a good investigator to be able to find her and the twins, especially because they could tell that she had been in London somewhere in the months from January to March of 1981.

Remus and he had spent the whole morning with the search for someone who would be able to search for Olivienne in both the Muggle and magical world. Because for the life of him, Sirius couldn’t remember ever meeting her. But obviously he had. The tapestry showed the evidence plain enough.
They had found someone and contacted the young muggleborn wizard who had agreed to come to Grimmauld Place and talk with Sirius, to see if he would accept the job.

That was the reason why Sirius currently was pacing up and down the stairs in nervous anticipation. Now that he knew of his daughters, Sirius wanted to get to know them, meet them, be a part of their life. But he knew that it would take time to find the three of them. The world was big, and the part in which French names could be found wasn’t that much smaller… but there was always the possibility that she was living somewhere else with the twins. Sirius feared that his patience would run out long before they could be found. And even when they were found, there was still the possibility… turning to walk back, Sirius quickly changed the direction his train of thought was going in. He couldn’t think about that, not yet, it would only make him worry more.

Remus stepped out of the room where they had set up everything and shook his head at Sirius. “Sit down and take a calming draught, Sirius. He will think you want to murder the three, the way you’re acting now.”

Sirius threw his friend a glare, only to get a laugh back, before he went to do as Moony had instructed. Running himself ragged wouldn’t do any good anyway.

Not a minute later than agreed upon – but much later than Sirius would have liked – the young wizard was shown in by Kreacher. The first impression Sirius got was that he looked capable. His robes looked well kept, and professional, but obviously weren’t from one of those tailors Sirius had to get his robes from. Damn that ridiculous notion of fitting in. Sirius would love to see the faces of the whole Wizengamot if he came in in jeans and a leather jacket for the next session. But now he needed to focus.

“Welcome, Mr. Jacobs. Thank you for agreeing to come here on such short notice.” Sirius could be serious – no pun intended – when he needed to be. And currently seriousness was needed.

“It’s no problem, Lord Black.” The young man shrugged and gave a polite smile. “I currently don’t have any other jobs. It’s no problem to come here and see if I can help you. You said that you had someone you wanted me to find, Lord Black?”

“That’s correct. I recently discovered on the family tapestry, that I have daughters – twins – with a woman I met only once. She never contacted me after that one meeting, but at most we exchanged given names, so that’s no surprise.” It wasn’t easy to speak about this. Not even remembering Olivienne felt terrible. He loved his carefree life, no commitments, lots of fun. But not even remembering the woman who was the mother of his daughters? Somehow that wasn’t right.

“So you want me to find them? For what reason?” The question was offered neutrally enough. Contacting the young muggleborn investigator had been the right decision. One of the more conservative – and experienced – investigators might have judged him over the fact he had had kids with a woman he wasn’t married to.

Sirius nodded. “I want to make contact. I hope that I can be a part of the girls’ lives, if their mother allows it. And I’m also searching for an heir. But before I can ask if they, or one of them, wants to accept the position, or if they even want to have anything to do with me…” Sirius took a deep breath. “So, do you think you could find her?”

Mr. Jacobs gave a wry smile. “That depends on if you can give me more facts to go from than the fact that I’m looking for a woman who is the mother of twin girls.”

“Reasonable.” Sirius shuddered inside, he sounded like one of those boring old men he had always made fun of. “Her name is Olivienne Moreau. Born on the tenth of July 1951. She probably has some African ancestors. Dark skin, dark hair with tight curls. She has to have been in London or one of the cities near London during January to March of 1981. We most likely met in one of those clubs,” Sirius handed over the parchment with names he and Remus had compiled the previous evening. “But I don’t remember meeting her. The twins were born on the eleventh of November 1981. They were named Nawel Lyra and Enora Libra. Remus – Mr. Lupin – claims they look like me. But I think the portraits on the tapestry are too small to judge. They seem to have lighter skin than their mother, hair a little bit straighter.” There wasn’t anything more they had found that was fact, so Sirius shrugged and asked. “Is that enough?”

The young man was looking over the list, then got out one of those travel quills and started to take notes. “Witch or Muggle?”

“I have no idea. I guess Muggle, because if she had been a witch she would have used a contraception charm?” Sirius assumed – more asking than stating – that he had been totally pissed when he had met Olivienne. That would explain why he couldn’t remember meeting her, and why he had either messed up the charm, or forgotten to cast it in the first place.

“I guess it should be enough, but it will take time. It all happened many years ago. Many documents might already be lost. Most witnesses have forgotten what they knew. But with three names, dates of birth for all of them, and a starting point where one of them was during a not-too-long period of time.” He nodded, pursed his lips in thought, and looked Sirius directly in the eye. “I will work for you if you’re willing to pay me three Sickles a day, and expenses, of course.” The smile was disarming, but even with the amounts of money Sirius had in his vaults he wasn’t going to pay that much without trying to get the price down.

“2 Sickles per day, all expenses covered,” was his counter offer.

“Accepted.” The young man grinned, probably seeing himself travelling all over Europe, all costs covered by Sirius.

“I would like frequent updates.” They started to hash out some more details and then wrote down everything in a proper contract.

When Sirius watched the young man go – more than an hour later – he felt better, hopeful. There was a good chance he would get to meet his daughters pretty soon.

Harry stood in the floo room at Griffin House, his cloak draped over his arm, watching in amusement as Nagini argued with Marvolo.

.":You were away all day yesterday! I want to come along!:. Her head was raised quite a bit from the floor, and the golden-yellow coloured rug her large body was coiled on contrasted nicely with the dark green of the snake’s scales.

Marvolo gave an exasperated eye roll before he started his hissed explanation yet again .:"That’s all good and well, Nagini. But it’s cold outside, and you and I both know that you’ll start complaining about being cold after just a few moments away from the warmth of the fire. And I guess you’ll be bored soon as well:".
For a few moments Nagini swayed back and forth, probably contemplating if staying near the fire was worth more than being with her wizard, and the young one. \textbf{I know you can wave your stick and make it so that I stay warm.} She sounded smug, clearly of the opinion that she had found the solution to all the problems Marvolo had listed.

\textbf{You would have to stay with me the whole time, no slithering off at all.} That hissing could sound that stern always made Harry puzzle how it was that Parseltongue worked. Snakes didn’t really make any sounds, and the hisses humans speaking Parseltongue made always sounded the same, or so Ron and Hermione had claimed. Was it context that made it possible to discern between emotions?

\textbf{If you carry me, I will stay warm without you waving your stick around.} now the snake sounded even more pleased. Harry snickered, it was fun seeing her outmanoeuvering Marvolo for a change. Normally it was Harry who got pressed into doing something for the snake, like retrieving some of the rats for breakfast just this morning.

Marvolo’s red eyes gave Harry a you-think-that’s-funny look before he turned back to the snake, who was curled into a smug heap of green scales. \textbf{If you can’t behave I will send you back here with a portkey. So come over here, we need to leave.}

Harry swung the cloak around himself, and tucked the mittens into one of the pockets. It was time to go and meet Theo so they could visit a weaving mill that belonged to Harry. It still felt really strange to know that he owned businesses, houses, flats, acres of land. Why and how had his family managed to get all that wealth?

Marvolo stood as Nagini slithered up his body to wrap herself around the tall wizard, while the older cast a glamour on his eyes to turn them to the blue he wore in public, and waved Harry to go on through the floo.

Harry grabbed a pinch of floo-powder out of the container on the mantle – made out of some almost translucent, milky stone – before he threw it into the flames and stepped in, calling out his destination. “Nott Home.”

ooOoo

Theo had waited by the Floo, his father back in his office helping Aiden with his reading, for Harry and the Dark Lord to pick him up. He still felt a deep sense of pride over the fact that he had managed to get as close to Harry as he had since the summer. When Harry could bring one friend on an outing, Theo had been the one chosen. Maybe Harry would have asked Hermione if the witch didn’t have a prior engagement, or that Weasley from their year if it weren’t obvious to anyone who had ever meet the boy that he would be bored within minutes. Being the first Slytherin, one of those Harry had gotten closer to just this autumn, to be considered was pretty good.

And putting aside all that political posturing, Theo simply was happy that he would get to go on an outing with his friend.

With a flare of green light and the typical sound Harry stepped out of the Floo first, followed by the Dark Lord carrying a really big, green snake around his shoulders.
“Hello, my Lord, Henry.” Theo bowed in greeting. The two were already wearing their warm clothes, so Theo quickly slipped into his own coat, wound the scarf around his neck, and put on the mittens.

“You’re ready to leave?” asked the Dark Lord after hissing to his snake, offering each teenager an arm. Harry took hold of the one nearer to him and Theo, assuming that they would continue their travel via apparition, took the other arm.

“I am, sir,” Theo answered.

“When does your father expect you back?” the Dark Lord wanted to know.

Theo looked up to the wizard his father had sworn his life to and answered, “Father and Aiden expect me to be back for dinner. I have promised to help Aiden to rehearse for the play tomorrow.”

“Very well. I’ll make sure that you will be back by then.” With a spin they vanished into the crushing darkness that always accompanied apparation. Theo’s father always claimed that apparating on your own power wasn’t as bad, but Theo doubted that.

ooOoo

With a still unusual feeling of contentedness Marvolo watched the way Henry and his friend Theodore looked on as an elderly Squib operated a loom, creating inch after inch of cloth before their very eyes.

“How does it work?” Henry sounded truly curious, stepping closer to the non-magical loom with its moving parts, the noise it was making in regular intervals. “What type of cloth are you making?”

“This is wool yarn. It will be a patterned twill. A diamond pattern. The warp is dark, the weft a slightly lighter blue. It’s a durable fabric, great for high quality working robes.” With practiced movements she beat the weft into place, changed the shafts and set the shuttle into motion. “The shafts,” she pointed to a part of the loom and Marvolo grinned because both boys already looked lost, “control the pattern. The shuttle holds the weft and moves from right to left and back again through the shed. After a while it all is rather easy. I remember when I started here – that was when Lord Charlus Potter was still in charge – I felt like I had been thrown into a parallel world.” She laughed, her hands and the loom never ceasing to move. The room was filled with the sound of wood moving on wood, with clacks and creaks, the air was dry, filled with the scent of herbs to keep moths and other critters away from the wool.

“For a while there it wasn’t as nice working here. The cloth created here without even a spark of magic is better for use with charms and such. The tailors love our fabric, gladly pay more for it. But after the young James died, we got a new manager… well all is well now again.”

She stopped speaking and continued to work, so the three of them moved on to the next big loom. And they walked past a few more. One was currently in the process of being warped, thread for thread drawn through those openings, bound to some horizontal beam. Marvolo felt like he was watching an intricate ritual being prepared by a practiced witch. But this woman was a Squib, like all the others who were working on the looms here.

Henry had a frown on his face. “What was she hinting at? Was there a problem here?” He was speaking too low to be heard by anyone but Marvolo and Theodore who both were walking right next to him over the din of noise created by all those looms.

“There was indeed trouble with the manager, until I fired him. A wizard of at best mediocre abilities. His father was manager before him. The man made sure his son would get a job here and manipulated everything so his son would take the position as manager once he retired,” Marvolo started to explain, keeping his gaze on a loom creating several patterned ribbons at once, kept working by power taken from a mill – which was powered by the river flowing next to the building – and distributed via mechanics Marvolo didn’t properly understand, which was monitored by a watchful young man.

“He used the advantage his wand gave him over the workers to take liberties, shorten the wages to keep more for himself... a lot of the women are happy he is gone now.” The expression flashing shortly on Henry’s face made it quite clear that he had understood what liberties the sorry excuse for a wizard had taken. “No one was willing to come forward and speak to the Aurors, not that I blame them, so I simply made sure he will have trouble finding work again.” And Marvolo had made sure the man never again would find pleasure in non-consensual activities of that kind.

They walked by a few looms producing simple plain weave linen fabric when Theodore asked a question. “Why is cloth created without magic any better? I mean, why go to such length as to put up signs like this one.” He pointed to one of the big signs painted in red on white which all read No Magic which were placed everywhere around the looms.

Marvolo smiled, he had been surprised as well the day he had inspected everything he now had to manage until Henry became of age. “Charms typically placed on clothes, such as self-cleaning, water fastness and so on, deteriorate over time. It seems that fabric produced without magic have fewer remnants of magic which interfere with anything cast on robes produced out of it. Potter fabric holds onto charms longer as a result. And the traditional tailors never would get away with buying in the Muggle world. I think the requirements in material and pattern wouldn’t be easily met in the Muggle world anyway.”

That was one of the reasons that high quality objects were as expensive as they were. You just couldn’t use magic to create the foundation for magic to be applied to it. That was, if one wanted the charms to last.

Harry listened attentively as Marvolo explained why the fabric created in this mill was so sought after that they could charge almost any price they wanted. And he was pleased to realize that this explanation about remnants of magic from the creation interfering with charms cast later matched perfectly with what Professor Babbling had said about the material they should select for projects with runes. The less contact something had with magic prior to being worked on, the less possibility there was that something would go wrong because of interaction between different spells and magical effects. She had made them all write essays about why it was important to know everything about an object to be imbued with runes before starting.

He still was angry that there had been a man in charge of one of his businesses and had abused that position of power. But did he want to know what Marvolo might have done to the man? Harry wasn’t sure, so he decided to wait and maybe ask later. But there had been another question waiting for some time now.
“Do you know how it happened that the Potters, Malfoys, and other families have so much, and families like the Weasleys don’t? I would have thought that history class should explain that but I guess Professor Binns never will talk about something like that.” In fact Harry wondered if the ghost ever would tell something that was actually interesting. Most of the time he spoke about conflicts and the treaties that had been written in their aftermath.

“Let’s take this to the balcony.” Marvolo decided, pointing at a small balcony attached to the manager’s office from where the hall with all the looms was easily to survey.

So they moved to up there and sat down on a few rickety chairs placed around a small table. The young secretary who had greeted them on their arrival brought them tea, and they settled down, still watching the looms in operation. Harry remembered weaving some easy samples in primary school, but they had used thin sticks to move the strings up and down while weaving the piece of string attached to the stick in between those already on the simple loom. What he was seeing here was so much more complicated.

“Simply put, it all comes down to who was where and did what. Those that were in the right place at the right moment are now those families that hold seats on the Wizengamot and have money. But I guess you want a more in-depth explanation?” Marvolo was sipping at his tea, making a face of distaste, before he added three more spoons of sugar to the cup.

Harry just gave him an unimpressed look. Of course he wanted a more thorough explanation.

“When people started to settle down – moving from hunter-gatherer to agriculture – those that were able to provide shelter were elevated above the others. From time to time, those that provided shelter from bad weather, natural disaster, other humans, became chieftains, lords, kings. Groups came together under one leader. Individuals gained a reputation for themselves, gained the trust of others, were named leaders, or declared themselves as such. In time, kings and queens emerged and gathered courts around.” Marvolo made a pause to see if he had all of their attention, which he did, before he took another sip from his tea, and then started to speak again.

“Among those being called to the courts, and among those gaining a group of dependants, were magicals as well as muggles. Merlin, Morgana, the four Founders, to name a few. All of them had magic and enough skill to use their talent to shield and use those weaker than them. Kings had the right to assign land, and the people living on the land, to people they chose. And most often they chose someone they wanted to reward, someone they could rely on.” Marvolo took another sip from his tea, and Harry grabbed one of the small tartlets that had been brought out with the tea.

“With the land came income, as well as responsibilities. Some were more apt in managing their money, making their fortune grow. When the Wizengamot was first called together, called by a muggle king to help in a war, the most talented wizards and witches, those with the most land and influence, were called together. War and invasion – like the one from what is now France which brought the Malfoys to our island – upset the established order, creating opportunities for others to rise. Those families that are called most ancient and noble are those that have managed to stay in their position the longest. Those that are simply called House of joined relatively recently.”

Theo nibbled on a tartlet and looked a little nervous, maybe. Harry was intrigued. He would really like to know who had been the lucky one in the past of his family to bring about the start of the wealth and importance of the Potters.

“Do you think there’s a family which actually knows for sure what happened to bring them to where they are now?” Harry asked of no one in particular, idly stirring his rapidly cooling tea.

“We know pretty much, if not all,” Theo mumbled, blushing. Maybe he was embarrassed because the Notts hadn’t been in the Wizengamot all that long. Comparatively speaking.

“I know a lot from the beginning,” Marvolo started, looking contemplative. “Salazar wasn’t the one where everything started for the Slytherin family. But he certainly is the one most remember. The name vanished in the male line, and the last Gaunts fell for the myth of pure blood. First losing their magical talents, then their money and influence.”

Then he looked over to Harry. “You’ll have the honour of learning all that I know during the summer. And I guess you’ll learn what your grandfather can teach you about the history of the Potters.”

They took a tour of the storage of finished fabric and then dropped Theo at home before they and Nagini, who had been silent most of the day, returned to their own home for dinner.

oooOOooo

During the whole day – as he now finally was able to think clearly again, recovered from the ritual – Marvolo had been pondering two problems. One was if he needed another death to anchor the floating soul to the new container, and if it needed to be an unrepentant murder as was required for the creation of a horcrux in the first place. And second, if the returned piece of his soul would cause some more changes to him.

The first was something that needed a few more days to ponder, and probably would have to wait until after all the festivities were over and done with. But the second could be tested rather easily. At least compared to the speculations on how to adapt the ritual to move horcruxes between containers.

One possible change to his mind he had just finished testing, and was now packing away the materials gathered by Malcolm back into the charmed drawer in his bedroom. It looked like his current belief that he might simply be asexual and not unable to feel attraction to another human being because of his mutilated soul was still the most likely.

In a way, Marvolo wasn’t even all that upset about the possibility. After all, he had always thought of such affairs as a weakness, but he was unhappy with not being sure.

He had always thought to know his own self pretty well, his motivations, his shortcomings, his own faults. He never would have admitted to any faults in the past, but he had always known of his own fears, his own weaknesses, because you needed to know to be able to shield them. Not knowing if he simply wasn’t interested in sex, or if the continued effort to repair his own soul would change that, was frustrating.

And all those matchmaking mothers and older witches haunting him because it was just expected of a Lord to marry, wouldn’t simply go away.

With a sigh, Marvolo cast the locking charm over the drawer. It would just be too complicated if Henry ever found this and started to ask questions. Marvolo was pretty sure he would prefer to not have to speak about the reason he had such… material… in his room.

With another sigh, Marvolo banished those unproductive thoughts to the back of his mind and walked over to his bathroom for a nice long soak in hot water with a potion in it Severus had invented sometime ago to counter the effects of the cruciatus curse. The small phial had been on his night-stand when he came into his room after dinner, and Flimm had informed him – after being asked – that Malcolm had brought it over earlier in the day and that he had to take a bath with it, healer’s orders.

Contemplating how bad he had been to his own followers that Severus had come up with a potion to counter the regular exposure to the torture curse, he started to fill the tub and stripped out of his clothes. It had been a long day.

ooooO0000

Rosamund was walking down the hall, floating a stack of bed linen beside her. It was late, all patients asleep in their beds, and she looking forward to the end of her shift. It had been a long day with difficult families visiting their loved ones, and a few of those rare fans of Gilderoy making a ruckus at the doors. She would really enjoy a glass of red wine while taking a long hot bath once she was home.

Sweeping the hall with her gaze, the lights dimmed due to the late hour, she thought she saw someone moving out of one of the rooms. Setting down the stack of linens on a lone chair standing next to a potted plant, she carefully but swiftly made her way over to where she had seen the movement.

When she spotted the man trying to sneak about in his nightshirt, she was surprised and a gentle smile automatically spread over her face. All of them developed such a handling-the-patients smile, it was more effective in keeping them calm than many other tools.

“Mr. Dumbledore, why are you out of bed?” She smiled, moving one hand to her wand, the other towards the old man, who looked a little like a child who had been caught trying to steal some sweets from the kitchen cupboard. ‘Come, let’s get you back into your room. You have to be tired after the long day you had.” There was a moment where Rosamund feared he would try to dodge around her, or run, but then he deflated and went willingly.

Half an hour later she looked in on Mr. Dumbledore a last time before going to change out of her work robes to find him sleeping peacefully. She would have to report his nightly wandering to the Healers. They had asked that they all keep a close eye on Mr. Dumbledore. But that could wait until tomorrow.

Whistling a jaunty tune, Rosamund walked away from her shift, waving to the medi-wizard taking over and went to go home. It had been a long day indeed.

Chapter End Notes

I thought a while about how much Mr. Jacobs should charge. I decided to assume that the wizarding coins are worth more than usually stated. It makes more sense to me that way. If seven Galleons for a wand is too much for the Weasleys to pay easily, it makes no sense that that much money can be earned with a day’s worth of work by a normal wizard or witch. I’m sure there are many different views on that, but this is what I chose for this story.

Saturday, 23rd of December

Currently Sonja and Severus were out in what was to become the potions garden, laying down a plan of what to plant where. It was always important to take the soil into consideration, as well as water availability, shade and sun, and what other plants were growing nearby. Therefore they were out here to see the place with their own eyes and check the conditions with all their senses.

Severus had a sturdy piece of paper clipped to a board, as well as a pencil to make sketches and take notes with. Both were more convenient in this scenario than the usual parchment, quill, and ink.

They had left the castle this morning right after breakfast. Sitting at the same table as the students, because so few had stayed this year, wasn't what Severus would call a nice breakfast situation. He had been glad to leave early.

"Do you think it's going to work out for us to stay the whole day?" Sonja suddenly asked, adjusting her scarf and hat.

"Aurora agreed to watch my snakes for me today. And there are a female and a male prefect among those that have opted to stay behind. If there should be any trouble, they know who to ask for help. I'm sure they all will still be there when we return this evening." And how Severus wished he could hand the responsibilities of Head of House to someone else for at least the duration of these holidays. He dearly wished to spent as much time as possible with his lovely wife in the manor, renovating.

"So I guess we won't get to stay here tomorrow?" Sonja said with a grin, using her hoe to break the slightly frozen ground of the spot they were currently checking.

"Minerva certainly will insist that we attend all meals. But there is still more to the holidays than Christmas. So we will get more opportunities to work on the Manor." Severus grinned over to his wife. She grinned back. "We'll be expected at the Malfoys' tomorrow, so we'll be able to escape the castle for at least part of the day." They had a lot of fun renovating. Much more than Severus would ever have guessed.

He let his eyes wander over the horizon, or what he could see between the small outbuildings and trees surrounding the Manor. Everything was covered in a thin layer of ice crystals – glittering even in the overcast light they had – the air cold and crisp. It was a really nice winter day to be outside securely wrapped up in warm clothing.

Just moments before he was about to bend over his board again – to write down Sonja's assessment of the soil at the spot she currently was examining – when he spotted the form of an owl heading in their direction.

The notes forgotten, Severus fixed his eyes on the approaching messenger. It only took a moment for Sonja to pick up on the change in Severus' posture, looking around to search for the cause. Soon they were both following the owl's flight to the half toppled remain of a fence where it rested, clearly waiting to be relieved of its burden, a scroll of parchment.

Dropping the board and pencil to the ground, Severus got out his wand and started casting detection charms at the owl and the missive on his way over. All came back without any indication that there might be a trap laid for him. So it probably was safe to get the scroll from the owl.

The moment the scroll was no longer attached to its leg the owl took off without waiting. Checking the seal, Severus quickly realised who had sent the letter before he broke the seal and unfurled the scroll.

Master Snape,

I write to you in the hope that your schedule will permit the addition of another project. The fact that the goblins have imposed a restriction on the number of ancestry tests hinders the efforts of Lord Lestrange in finding families for those young witches and wizards he is rescuing from the inadequate system of foster care the Muggles have established.

I'm not asking for you to recreate the potion the goblins are using. But I am asking for you to find something to check for familial bonds beyond those between siblings, or parents and child. Something to indicate the existence of common ancestors, not reveal all the names of them. Such a potion shouldn't violate the treaty.

I will, of course, compensate you for your work and the materials should you choose to accept my proposal. Please inform me of your decision.

Sincerely,

Lord Marvolo Slytherin

Several thoughts immediately started running through Severus' mind. There were several perks to being an expert Occlumence. First there was the fact that his Lord had asked him to develop this potion – not ordered – that was something that never had happened before. Then there was the idea of the potion itself. It was intriguing to ponder how he might achieve the goal that had been set.

"Who is the letter from?" Sonja wanted to know, gliding over the ground over to him. Her curiosity shone in her eyes.

"Lord Slytherin." Severus smiled at her questioning glance. "He asked if I might develop a potion for him." Holding out the scroll for her in invitation, he smirked. He loved the challenge that the development of a new potion offered.

Sonja snatched the scroll out of his hand, unfurling it, to read as quickly as she could. The smile that spread over her face was evidence of how much she liked inventing too. "I think there are some books in the library that could help us with that." She waved the scroll in a playful manner. "Do you want to finish here first, or go back and start right this moment?"

They shared a smirk. Severus summoned their supplies, and they walked back to the manor holding hands, the library their destination. They would spend a delightful day researching and gathering information to develop their vague ideas into a first attempt they would be able to brew and test.
Bundled up warmly to ward off the cold, Fabian followed his daughter and wife through the festively decorated London. They had had breakfast this morning and then had made their way into the city to make the last purchases they needed. They had started early so they would have the afternoon and the evening free to visit the school festival his uncle had invited them to. They needed groceries for the meal tomorrow, some last-minute presents for some neighbours, and candles, as well as a few other odds and ends.

"I'm so happy that Uncle Xerxes is getting to know his older sons! I'm sure it'll help him cope with the loss of the younger sons." Hermione obviously struggled over how to talk about the two wizards who had escaped from the prison and then later supposedly died in a fire caused by one of the other escapees.

Fabian smiled another sad smile, unnoticed by the two women walking before him, chattering happily. It had been an interesting meal, conversing with the two wizards who claimed to have been born in South America, listening to their stories, to stories told by Hermione and Xerxes. It always was like getting to peek through a small window into a world so different from, but at the same time eerily similar to, his own.

The timing of the two wizards' appearance was a little suspicious, though. At least in Fabian's eyes. Two sons escaped from prison, and were caught in a fire so that their bodies weren't able to be identified by sight. Hermione had written to them that the newspaper had said that the Aurors had informed them that the remains had been clearly identified. But with the knowledge that magic was able to give someone the appearance of someone else with a potion, it wasn't all that reassuring to hear such claims.

Magic was capable of so much, so why couldn't it be used in faking one's own death?

And shortly after that convenient death – ending the search for the escapees – another two sons, twins, older this time, popped up out of nowhere.

Fabian had read enough murder mysteries to smell a plot twist when he saw it.

Yesterday evening he had asked Hermione to see her ancestry test. He had claimed that he wanted to study it further. Sadly, it only showed Hermione's direct ancestors. Not even Xerxes was on it, only his parents, as they also were Dorcas', Fabian's mother's, parents. No siblings or their descendants, only ever the parents of the one in the generation after that. If it had been different it might have shown if the claim that Xerxes had had a total of four sons was true, or not. So it had proven to be useless in this.

But did it really matter in the end? He had no proof for his suspicion. And he had to assume that those Aurors knew what they were doing. They were the police in the magical world, after all. They should be aware of what magic could achieve. Shouldn't they? And therefore surely they would have tested to make sure no one had used magic to fake their death. Just to pop up as totally different people a few weeks later.

The fact was that his little girl still had enough faith in authority not to fall into the trap of endless worrying and fruitless thoughts going in circles. For all that Fabian knew, the story they had been told was the truth. The two men they had met yesterday certainly had looked older and not at all like the pictures that had been published – even in the news shows on the television – to warn everyone about the dangerous criminals on the loose.

Deciding that it would change nothing, and would only worry everyone, Fabian quickened his stride to walk between his two girls. "Do you want to pick up one of the illustrated books of the most beautiful places all around Britain for the newly discovered members of our family?" Jean and Hermione both laughed, and their daughter happily dragged them over to one of the nearest bookstores to search for a nice present.

They certainly would not leave the store without at least one overburdened bag of books. It never ended any other way when Hermione managed to get them all to go into a bookstore together. They all loved reading too much to let it come out any other way.

Smiling, with his doubts about Tiago and Teofilo all but forgotten, Fabian allowed himself to be dragged into the store overflowing with late shoppers just like them.

The grounds of Dorcas' School for Youngsters – the name had come from somewhere and stuck despite all efforts from Xerxes to use the other name – was filled with people. There was a strange mix of attire to be seen. Wizards and witches in robes and billowing cloaks, people in the latest muggle fashion, suits and dresses. Pointed hats and knitted caps. Colours ranging from the sombre to the cheerful. Music was playing in the background. Everything was lighted by fire, floating candles, and torches. The scent of cinnamon and other spices, hot apples, and baked goods filled the air. Xerxes walked around, speaking with everyone who wanted a word, happy that his plan had worked so well. If Severus Snape managed to make the potion their Lord had said he would request, it would get even better. Getting all those lost children into families to be loved and cherished was what he truly wanted.

Soon he moved over to the assembly hall with its stage, where the play all the children had worked so hard on would take place. He had never before looked forward to an amateur theatre production with quite as much anticipation as he did now.

While he searched for his place he saw Lucius and his wife standing with the Greengrasses a little farther back, talking animatedly. This informal gathering seemed to be well received by everyone. With a smile Xerxes sat down. Narcissa had selected her robes in a style that put emphasis on the fact that her pregnancy was showing. It was wonderful to know that the number of children was going to increase in the next years.

With a wave to Benjamin and his son, Xerxes sat down to wait for the play to begin.

oo00oo

Theo sat next to his father in the first row watching the play unfold on the stage. The audience sat in darkness, the stage was brightly illuminated.

The play wasn't all that engaging. Lots of small parts of different animals played by the children. Aiden was a fox, and there were a squirrel, a bear, several different birds – including an owl and a magpie – a mouse, a wolf, and several others.

They all looked quite cute in their costumes, complete with makeup. It had been difficult imagining what they would look like only from what Aiden had prattled on and on about the whole time since Theo had come back from school. It was nice having a little brother, and the novelty hadn't worn off yet. And so Theo couldn't really stop grinning.

The seasons changed on the stage by the change of the light from a sunny yellow to a reddish-brown changing the tint on the trees made of cardboard so they changed from summer to autumn trees.
When the trees changed to those of winter – their branches suddenly bare – Theo knew that some magic was in play here. First the leaves did fall down to the wooden floor and then snow started to fall from the ceiling.

The applause after the winter had changed into spring again and the play was over was thunderous. One after the other the audience stood and clapped. Theo felt himself grinning from ear to ear. Aiden had had so much fun preparing for this, it had been a delight to help him rehearse.

"Did you see me?" said boy, still in his fox costume, came running down to Theo, skipping with each step and shouting his question. Then the boy crashed into his older brother, enveloping Theo in a hug.

"Yes, I saw you, Aiden. You were really good!" It was easy to close his arms around his adopted brother, returning the hug. "What do you think? Do you want to get something to eat? I'm hungry!"

For a short moment Aiden stayed in the hug, his head tilted back so he could look up to his much taller brother. And then he suddenly was walking towards the exit, Theo's hand firmly grabbed in his own. Laughing, Theo followed Aiden out into the cold, and over to one of the tables offering food and drink.

ooOoo

"What do you think?" Jean turned around, away from the small stall showcasing a multitude of different ornaments, to look back at her husband, who was standing behind her, grinning at her enthusiasm. "Should we buy one of these for our tree back home?"

There were so many pretty things the children had made. No angels or simple baubles like they could have bought in every other store, but small depictions of robins, snowflakes, different plants, ice crystals. They were simply beautiful.

"As long as it's not something obviously magical, I don't see why not. Maybe that robin over there?" He pointed to a small bird made from clay and painted in bright colours.

Jean gave a small snow globe with eternally falling snow a sorrowful look, but then turned to the different robins. Fabian was right, if they bought something that was obviously magical they couldn't risk it being seen by their neighbours, friends, or co-workers. And that meant they couldn't hang it on the tree.

Sometimes it was hard not being able to tell anyone that their daughter was a witch, and attended a respectable school for magic. Some of their acquaintances tended to mock them – not nearly subtly enough – about the fact that Hermione didn't attend one of the prestigious boarding schools their children had been sent to.

But it was what it was. They knew that their daughter was one of the best students at her school. Was going to be part of her world's leadership. The fact that she took that responsibility as seriously as she did almost everything was something Jean was proud of and a little bit sad over. Her girl tended to be too mature, too much like an adult. She should be a teenager, obsessing over romances, schoolwork, and gossip. Not about the rights of house-elves or Hippogriffs.

In the end they decided to buy a robin and a small bunny, before they wandered to the next small stall offering different kinds of cookies. They were content in the knowledge that Hermione was somewhere here having fun with her friends from school which made it easy for them to luxuriate in the opportunity to delve into the magical world.
Harry stood together with Hermione, Draco, Theo, and the Greengrass sisters near one of the fires, each of them holding a bowl with warm stew – potatoes, carrots, and pork were the dominant ingredients – and a slice of bread, and talked with them. It had only been a few days ago that they had been in school together and then on the train, but they already had so much to talk about again.

Hermione alone had lots to talk about with the meeting of Xerxes and his previously unknown sons only a day in the past. It sounded as if they had had a fun time in London, visiting the Tower, Big Ben, Buckingham Palace, and Diagon Alley. They even had braved the Knight Bus, which Hermione had talked about with incredulity bright in her eyes. That thing was a safety hazard in her eyes.

Harry couldn't disagree. The way passengers were sliding about with their seats was prone to cause accidents.

Draco had earlier complained about the way his mother's swinging, unstable moods were keeping the house in a tense state. He had come across a sobbing elf near his parents' rooms on the day they had gotten back from school. The blond had assured them all that he was looking forward to becoming a big brother, but until then he was happy to stay at the school, far away from all the drama.

Daphne had just started to talk – using a moment when Hermione had her mouth full of stew – asking questions about their holiday homework when another person stepped into their small circle.

"Henry, I want to talk with you a moment," Marvolo said the moment the light from the fire fell on him, causing all the teenagers to fall silent instantly.

Harry felt like rolling his eyes. There was no reason to fear that Marvolo would do anything to them where so many people were watching. And Harry felt it was unlikely that Marvolo would torture a Death Eater relative of theirs just because they had dared speak in his presence.

Harry nodded and made to step away from his friends, but Marvolo quickly waved at him to stay where he was. "I plan to return home in another hour. Do you want to stay longer? You certainly can stay till the end of the festival if you wish, but I still have a lot of paperwork to tackle." The question had been posed rather matter-of-factly, making Harry feel like they both had learned their roles rather well since the summer.

"I would like to stay a little longer, sir. Shall I take the floo home?" Being allowed to stay behind with his friends felt really good. Marvolo didn't try to control him as the Dursleys had done, or to treat him as a small kid like too many of the Professors had always done. But with the full moon so far off, the wards around the school set by Marvolo himself, and so many adult wizards around, there really wasn't much of a danger to be expected here.

"You may use your portkey," Marvolo made a vague waving motion towards where the chain with the twin crests rested under Harry's shirt, scarf, and cloak, "the Floo, or ask Xerxes, or even Benjamin to apparate you back home."

Their discussion was interrupted when a small boy – not much older than five Harry guessed – came running towards them, and gripped Marvolo's warm robes with both tiny hands. ":Slithering Darkness: needs help! Please! Come help!" The boy looked cute in his mouse costume and makeup – his short hair still was charmed a grey befitting a mouse – but he quite obviously was near a panic, keeping tugging on Marvolo's robes.
The moment Harry registered that Marvolo had paled, looking down at the boy, he started to wonder if he really had heard a piece of parseltongue in there.

"Who needs help? And where?" Marvolo sounded calm enough, but Harry was sure there was a slight tremor in the man's voice.

"In the biolog… boil… the classroom with all the pictures of plants and animals. :Slithering Darkness: she's stuck under a rock, somehow it toppled from its place and fell on her. I can't get the lid off! Come help!" The tugging was getting more desperate, and now Harry was sure the small kid just had hissed what probably was the name of a snake.

Then Marvolo suddenly looked totally calm. "Show the way." The boy didn't wait around but started to run away from them, Marvolo on his heels in a much faster pace than Harry had ever seen.

"I think I'd better follow," was all Harry said to his friends before he too hurried off. Marvolo was lots better at handling Harry since they had become somewhat of a family, but he doubted that the man who still was a Dark Lord would do so well with a small boy who, if he truly was a Parselmouth, belonged to the family.

Not really acknowledging that possibility yet, Harry dodged a few couples and their children on his way to the biology classroom. It was a good thing that he had kept up with his training. Flying had helped with it, as had the Defence club. Otherwise he certainly wouldn't have managed to run through the crowd without knocking anyone to the ground.

When he reached the classroom, the light was on and Marvolo was bent over something on one of the tables, while the boy dressed up as a mouse was nervously looking on.

A few quick steps brought Harry to the young boy's side, where he crouched down so he wasn't towering over him so much. Suddenly he felt really tall. "Hey. He's really good with magic. The snake will be fine." The moment Harry had said that, he realized that he actually couldn't be sure that the snake would be fine. He didn't know how badly it had been injured. But if it had been too late already, Marvolo surely would have stopped by now. Patting the shoulder of the child by his side, Harry offered what comfort he could, only to find himself with an armful of frightened child a moment later.

Marvolo tried to concentrate on healing the snake who seemingly was called Slithering Darkness. He certainly had heard that the child had spoken the name of the snake in Parseltongue, and the greeting between the snake – who had several broken ribs as well as injuries to a few inner organs – and the child indicated that they were friends of sorts.

In the back of his mind with a lot of other painful memories he tried to avoid most of the time, was the recollection of the first snake he had ever met. It had been just before he had been sent to school, to learn reading, writing, and all that. He had loved having a friend so unique, something special. After one of the older kids had killed it with a stone, because the girls had shrieked about the dangerous snake, and Marvolo had been helpless, he had never again become so attached to one of the snakes that found him.

Not until he had learned of magic, had learned how to defend himself, sometimes proactively, but the connection he had felt with that very first snake he had only reached again once he had found Nagini.
But now he needed to concentrate on the healing spells he was casting. He had brought the snake here, promised that there would be prey and warmth, essentially taking the snake under his protection. She had been hurt in the place he had left her. It was his responsibility to help her. Maybe he should place a few spells on the terrarium and its contents to make sure something like this couldn't happen again.

A few spells later he sat back, noticing Henry embracing the small boy who had brought them here in an attempt to soothe him. Ignoring that situation and all its implications – any Parselmouth was part of the family, but how could he care for a child as young as the boy? – Marvolo turned to Slithering Darkness. ..How are you feeling, my scaly friend?..

..The pain is gone, grown Speaker. Why haven't you visited? One of your hatchlings is here. I like his company. But I would have liked to see you too:. The snake slowly coiled into a small heap, as if she was testing her body, not once looking at either human in the room.

..I didn't know… that you wanted to see me. I will do better in the future:. Marvolo didn't feel so well. His hands were cold. He felt as if he were going to be sick. He had almost said that he didn't know that he had a hatchling here. But it couldn't be, could it? There was no way that he could take care of such a young child.

Marvolo turned to where Henry still was almost kneeling on the ground, his arms slung around the boy – he didn't even know the young one's name! – both looking at the snake which was slithering over the table, seemingly satisfied with the state of her body.

..Henry, take him to one of his teachers. He should get out of the costume and get something to eat. I will search for Xerxes, let him know that the home of Slithering Darkness needs better protection:. Before his son could answer, Marvolo turned on his heel and left the room. He needed to get out of there or he would break down.

ooOoo

For a moment Harry was stunned. Why had Marvolo left so fast? Without even placing the snake back in her habitat. But then the boy in his arms turned and Harry realized that he had other priorities right now.

"Let's get her back into her home, and then we will search for your teacher," Harry stated, not sure if he should ask if he was okay with that or if he shouldn't ask. Irate with himself for having to call the boy, boy in his head, Harry decided to do something about that right away. "By the way, I'm Harry. What's your name?"

"Hello, Harry! I'm Marcus. Can we get ..Slithering Darkness:. some new water?" The boy… Marcus looked shy, but much calmer now that the snake was healed.

"Sure we can." Harry stood and walked over to the table, where the snake was curiously peering over the edge. ..May I pick you up? You will get cold pretty fast if you stay out here:..

..I think Harry will be really careful. I'm sure:. And there was the last doubt about if Marcus was a part of the Slytherin family or not, gone. They would be able to give Marcus a real family.

Harry smiled.

..I'm always careful when carrying such a fine lady. And I think we will move the stone so it can't crush you again. If that's fine with you?:. The hiss Harry got in answer was not really a word, but an agreeing noise.

Harry picked the snake up with deft fingers and placed her in the terrarium, before he added the stone directly on the ground. Then he placed the lid back on the terrarium and turned to Marcus who was watching attentively. "Let's get you out of your costume." Harry held a hand out to Marcus, who with a last hissing goodbye to the adder walked over to the teenager and took the offered hand.

Together they left the classroom and went out to where all the others were having fun.

Xerxes watched as Marvolo paced up and down in the classroom they had retreated to. Beside an impatient hand sign to follow, causing him to extract himself from a conversation, Marvolo hadn't uttered a word, or indicated in any way what he wanted.

At the moment Xerxes tried to get a sense of if he was standing here watching his Lord pace, or if his friend from school was in need of help. Depending on the answer to this question, Xerxes would have to react differently, act differently. But at the moment he had no idea what the answer might be. So he waited.

"What can I do?" Marvolo suddenly started to speak, clearly not expecting an answer. "I don't think I can do that, be what he needs." Shaking hands raked over a pale face, through previously neat hair. "I can't be… how can I even hope to…"

Xerxes slowly sat down on the desk standing behind him, watching as Marvolo paced in front of the rows of neatly hung children's drawings – mostly snowflakes and snowmen – this looked more and more like a situation where a friend was needed, not one where his Lord needed his service.

"What's wrong, Marvolo? What happened between the moment you walked away to speak with your heir and now? And don't try to claim otherwise, something did happen!" A wave of fear swept through Xerxes as Marvolo whirled around a snarl on his face.

But then the face crumpled from fierce to something vulnerable before Marvolo turned quickly away to look out of the window. "Did you know there is a Parselmouth among your students?" The question was whispered so quietly that Xerxes wasn't quite sure he had heard right.

"A Parselmouth? No?" Xerxes was confused as to how it could be that there was a Parselmouth among his students. And that confusion certainly wasn't only clear as day in his voice, but on his face as well.

Several minutes passed with Marvolo staring out of the window towards the fires and merriment, or pacing up and down while Xerxes tried to pinpoint the one student who would most likely be a descendant of Slytherin. But he didn't get very far.

"I don't think I can be a father, Xerxes. Henry is away at Hogwarts most of the year. He isn't far from being an adult. It just isn't the same…" By now Xerxes was reasonably sure that his friend was suffering from a panic attack. It wasn't anything he hadn't seen before. Men about to become fathers regularly fell into this behaviour. And those that didn't even a little usually had proven themselves as either totally uninterested or terrible fathers.

Before he could form his thoughts into a coherent explanation of why Marvolo would make at least an adequate father, the door opened and Henry Slytherin-Potter walked in. Maybe it would be best to leave, but on the other hand his Lord had wanted his presence. It would be rude to leave, but it was equally rude to stay and listen to what certainly would be a private discussion.

"Here you are, sir. I was searching for you." At Henry's words the Dark Lord stiffened in a way Xerxes had learned to associate with extreme anger. "I brought Marcus to his teacher. What are we going to do now? When will we take him home?"

Xerxes blinked in surprise. Of course the child would go with the Dark Lord, to be with family. Now knowing more than just that one of his students at this school was a Parselmouth, Xerxes started to go through the list of enrolled students under eleven to find the one called Marcus and what he knew of him. Surely his Lord needed to know and would demand to know soon.

"Henry, you're being rash. For all we know… Marcus, is living with loving parents. We can't take a child just because we want to." Marvolo almost sounded dazed, not angry. And Xerxes valiantly tried to concentrate.

"Well, that would be better anyway. Our family would get bigger, not only Marcus, but his parents too." There was a stubborn tone to that reply, and Xerxes had to smirk. That boy certainly had a backbone, Xerxes didn't feel all that confident at the moment.

"Actually," Xerxes interrupted, with a wildly beating heart, "he's an orphan. As far as the foster system had recorded, he has no known father. His mother died from complications in childbirth. There's no other known family. So he has stayed with different foster families until we found him. The last one agreed to let him be adopted into a magical family before they were obliviated. At the time, I didn't anticipate the trouble we would have with the ancestry tests." Xerxes stopped himself from shifting nervously from one foot to the other under the gaze of the two other wizards. It was a little unnerving how alike they looked in their intensity.

Then they suddenly turned to each other and exchanged a few sentences in hissing noises. At least Xerxes assumed that they were talking to each other. It just sounded like insensible hissing to his ears.

"And how do you think this will work, Henry?" Marvolo threw his hands up into the air before resuming his pacing.

"You can hire a nanny. Have the elves help. Eat breakfast with him each day, send him here to school, then work. Be there in the evening asking what he has done the whole day. It's not that hard. You're doing it now!" The teenager had started to pace as well, and Xerxes felt superfluous. But to leave the room he would have to cross the younger wizard's path, bringing attention to himself that he would rather avoid.

Marvolo only gave a snort, and kept pacing.

"We can't just ignore the fact that he belongs to the family. In a few years others will learn about his ability, will recall that we must have known. How will we look then?" The voice of the green-eyed teenager was cutting now, almost mocking. And Xerxes had to give him a point for politically sound thinking. That would be a scandal of epic proportions. "We both know what to avoid, what not to do. And there are people we can ask for help. We can't leave him here!"

Slumping down on a desk – the chairs in this room were too small for an adult to sit comfortably on – Marvolo rubbed one hand over his face. He looked tired. "Getting custody of you was rather easy, Henry. Everyone was still shocked over my sudden reappearance. But doing the same now for a kid that young? Those valiantly against me would mount what forces they can to oppose this adoption. It won't go as smoothly as adopting you was."
Henry nodded, and sat down as well. "Well, it won't be easy then. That's no reason to not do it."
Then the boy slid into the hissing sounds of parseltongue again, excluding Xerxes from the discussion which continued for quite some time.

When the Dark Lord turned to Xerxes once again, the older-looking wizard had contemplated how best to leave – he should be out among the guests, not sequestered here in one of the classrooms – just to come to the conclusion that there was no way to leave without possibly drawing his Lord's ire.

"Can you please make sure that Marcus is informed by one of his teachers that he has remote family? Tell him that the fact he can speak to snakes made us realize, because it's a family gift. Ask him if he would be agreeable to meet with us, as we want to get to know him. I'll get my solicitor on the task of preparing everything for an adoption." Xerxes only nodded and bowed. Marvolo sounded resigned, but there still was a spark of something in the man's eyes that Xerxes wasn't used to seeing there.

Uncertainty.

It wasn't something totally new, but since the young boy by the name of Riddle had proved that he was more than a mudblood, Xerxes had never seen it again. Seeing it now made him appear human again. Trying to smile reassuringly without being patronizing, Xerxes made for the door. "I'll do that, and keep you informed."

When Xerxes was once again among all the guests, children and parents, he relaxed. It would be not easy getting Marcus under Marvolo's guardianship, but in the end there was no doubt that the gift of Parseltongue would be enough to sway those that had to decide. Family had the most influence over such decisions, and it was unlikely that that would change anytime soon.

Albus sat in a quite cosy armchair in the lounge the long-term patients got to use from time to time, contemplating his possibilities.

Yesterday evening he had tried to nick a wand from the medi-witch when she had caught him scouting the hallway. He had learned that the small pockets in the robes were spelled to make sure the wand couldn't be taken out by just anyone. A sensible precaution – some of the people that were treated here shouldn't get their hands on a wand – but annoying for himself, being held here against his will and without reason.

He hadn't had any visitors today, and taking a wand would be discovered quickly, so he needed a solid escape plan before he tried to get his hands on one again.

Maybe he should take another look at the complex magical wards around the door to the ward that were keeping patients in, but which let personnel and the occasional visitor through. Albus had looked into other possible exits and had only found the windows, as the fireplaces weren't connected to the floo network. And even if he was reasonably fit for his age, climbing out of windows and down walls wasn't something he thought he could manage without trouble.

Trying to look casual, Albus got up from his seat, and wandered off, looking at pictures and portraits on the walls, a potted plant that looked to be in dire need of water, and other people sitting around, either reading, playing games, or staring into space.

When he reached the hall and walked slowly in the direction of the door, Albus huffed a breath of relief. If he could manage to look a while at the doors, he might find the conditions that regulated who could pass the door, which would significantly increase his chances of success.

Near the door Albus started to concentrate on the door frame, trying to identify the nexus of the ward barring his exit this way. It was hard doing this without his wand, and silently, as he didn't want to risk drawing attention to what he was doing here.

"Mr. Dumbledore! There you are!" Albus flinched in surprise when the man who claimed to be a healer working for Albus' health spoke up behind him. Turning while trying to come up with a good reason for standing here, Albus placed his grandfatherly smile in place. "Healer Jugson, why were you searching for me? It's late in the evening, but not yet time to go to bed, is it?" He laughed, trying for friendly. "It makes me feel quite young again to have a curfew to be in bed. How may I help you?"

The healer smiled friendly enough, but the fact that two others – a witch and a wizard of big build – were standing just behind the man with concentrated expressions, made Albus wary. "The results of our repeat test have just come in, Mr. Dumbledore. And it seems that the extent you're affected was masked by something during the first test we did. Please come with us, we are moving you into another room. Luckily we caught this in time to adjust your healing plan so you probably will be able to leave not too far into the new year."

Before the healer – certainly one of Tom's people, he just had to be! – had finished his last word, Albus tried to run for the door. Another room? Adjustment to the healing plan? That couldn't mean anything good! But before he had reached the wards he was struck by a spell and everything went dark.

oooOOooo

It was infuriating! Normally Fenrir didn't tend to use such big words, but the current situation needed big words. There was no other way to express his anger and even come close to the real enormity of his feelings.

He was pacing here, the cracked and dirty floorboards groaning under his steps, in a ramshackle rundown hut, when he should be living in one of those manors that the wizards had built only for themselves.

With a growl that exposed only the tips of the fangs he had fashioned out of his canines so he would look more like his true self even in this inferior form, Fenrir turned to the hapless fool sitting on the faded armchair. "So you have lost another one? How is it that suddenly all of our people run away?" But Fenrir already knew the answer.

Slytherin.

His influence on the Wizengamot and the laws was eroding the ground Fenrir had build his pack on. Now the laws were changing and the members of the pack suddenly had other opportunities.

"Rob said he didn't need – or want – our help any longer. His brother offered him a job on their small farm. They grow and gather potions stuff. I think." Ted shrugged, his faded robes sliding with the motion.

With another growl Fenrir turned sharply on his heel, walking in the other direction. This wasn't good, in fact it was catastrophic. The people were leaving, his pack shrinking. And they had half a month until the moon would be full again. Much too late to act against that bastard Slytherin, or the cowards that abandoned him for the prospect of acceptance by wizards. However shaky that acceptance would be. Again turning, dust falling down from the ceiling, Fenrir sought an escape from the dilemma he was in.

The Aurors were hunting them down, obviously knowing all of their older hideouts. Most likely the doing of Slytherin. Again.

The more intelligent and flexible wolves were deserting him and their cause, leaving for the continent, or finding shelter with wizards like common mutts. Leaving Fenrir only with those wolves who had no other options, or had been with him since they had been cubs. Sadly, not one of them knew much magic, or any at all, leaving them without options outside the transformation on the nights of the full moon.

The fact that everyone whom he wanted to hurt most was behind strong wards only added to his problems. And the so-called suicide-through-poison Yaxley had suffered. Well, there was no way that had been suicide or an accident. It clearly had been a message to the remaining Death Eaters. Who dared to even set one toe out of line was to suffer death, or worse. So it was unlikely that Fenrir would get help from those who shared his taste for fear and torture.

Without stopping in his pacing, Fenrir searched for a way to secure his position, to instil the fear of werewolves back into those pathetic witches and wizards.

He kept pacing until late that night without finding a shred of moonlight.

With a sigh Marvolo slumped into the armchair in front of the fireplace in the living room at Griffin House. What a day this had been.

When he had thought about possible further Slytherin descendants, then he had thought about a slim possibility of finding an adult, or someone who had already died. Never even once had the thought crossed his mind that there might be a child he would have to take in.

And that was exactly the situation they were in now. They had to take Marcus in, just as Henry had said. It wouldn't work out any other way. If there was any way to avoid it… but there wasn't and it would be best when Marvolo stopped searching for a way to avoid the inevitable. If they didn't start with attempts to adopt Marcus right now, the moment they noticed he existed, that could be something their enemies could use against them.

Marvolo wasn't convinced that they would be able to adopt Marcus without problems, but Henry's fierce words had helped him realize that there were fewer obstacles there than he had feared.

Slowly shaking his head in remembrance, he got up again to fetch himself a tumbler of firewhiskey. Henry's claim that he would testify in favour of Marvolo so he would be able to adopt Marcus. The exact wording Henry had used still was bouncing around in Marvolo's head. That the fact that there was absolutely nothing wrong with the way Marvolo acted as a guardian was one of the things Henry had the most trouble with. That Henry had wanted to hate him in the beginning but couldn't keep doing that because he suddenly had what he always had wished for, someone who cared.

Marvolo could relate, and that fact terrified him. It was right up there on his list of terrifying thoughts of the day, next to being responsible for a boy only five years old.

He really didn't feel capable of that, and wasn't that a first. He had never thought that he couldn't do something. If he had to guess, he would say that was pretty normal for the average human, but since his childhood he never would have called himself average in anything.
Slowly sipping on his drink, staring into the flickering flames, he contemplated whether it would be a good idea to visit with Madame Goyle soon. He couldn't keep taking strong calming draughts every day for the rest of his time. As he had done today.

Chapter End Notes

I know some of you dread the addition of another Parselmouth. But I thought about it and feel it's unrealistic to not have more parselmouths around somewhere. If Lily Evans was a descendant from Slytherin, there have to be others.

Furthermore I needed a way to clearly show how much Marvolo is changing and I didn't want to invent something that would throw him and Harry back in their development for that purpose. Developing plot in such a way mostly only feels frustrating for me when I read it, I can't bear to write something like that. ;) And besides that I love the idea of "big brother Harry" so I hope you'll roll with it and see where it takes the story.

And here it is: chapter 70! Thanks to all of those who have made the journey with me. I think over half of the story should be written by now :D but we'll see if I will reach chapter 100.

_the middle of the night, Saturday, 23th of December_

Harry woke to being shaken at his shoulder. He opened heavy lids to a room bathed in subtle light and Marvolo sitting at the side of his bed, sounding a little panicked. "Henry! Henry, please wake up!"

Harry was awake instantly once the panic registered, sitting up just slowly enough for Marvolo to back off without their heads connecting. "What's wrong?" Harry still sounded half asleep, rubbing his eyes in an effort to get the remnants of sleep out of his eyes.

.:He's panicking:. Nagini hissed from somewhere near the door, and Harry rolled his eyes because that was the most unhelpful comment ever. And when had she started understanding plain English?

.:Nagini, I'm not panicking:. Marvolo hissed, clearly not amused, watching Harry arranging himself to get out of bed.

"Stay under the covers, Henry. I need to speak with you, but there is no reason to get up."

Harry blinked, totally confused now. Why would Marvolo come into his room in the middle of the night, wake him, and then only speak to him? But he at least wanted to see properly so he reached over to his bedside table to pick up his glasses. And to quickly check that he had covered the picture of Hogwarts he had been working on last evening. Wouldn't do for Marvolo to see it before it was finished.

When he was sitting under his warm covers, leaning against the headboard, his glasses on his nose, Harry asked again. "What's this about? Couldn't it have waited until, I don't know… breakfast?" He realized he sounded grumpy, but he was. Getting woken in the middle in the night tended to do that to him.

The look Marvolo gave him for that seemed to imply that Harry was slow, but then he started to speak, still sounding somehow off. "The day after tomorrow is Christmas Morning. And I fear we'll not have enough time to get something, and I don't even know what to get. But I feel it's really important. Or don't you agree?"

The moment Marvolo had mentioned Christmas Morning, Harry had caught on and silently was cursing himself for his stupidity. Images of him sitting in the dark, listening to the merriment of the Dursleys, a box of dog biscuits, a coin taped to a loveless card, and a single toothpick flashed before his eyes. This was important, and there wasn't a lot of time left.
Harry nodded, his thoughts racing. "Yes, you are right. We need to get him something." Even after years of the same treatment by his aunt and uncle each year, their mocking gifts had hurt him. This was important. They needed to do this right. And he would have known that even before he had spoken with Madame Goyle about the lack of presents from the Dursleys.

"But what?" Marvolo huffed a breath, and the smell of alcohol wafted over to Harry. It seemed that Marvolo was very much affected still by the thought that a small child would soon be dependent on him and his actions. That probably was a good sign. Not the alcohol, but the fact that Marvolo was working himself up over caring for Marcus.

"Something nice. But we don't know a lot about him yet..." Harry let a few possibilities run through his mind. "I think a toy, maybe. He's too young to really like a book, I think? A nice blanket? With a picture of the snake on it?" He shrugged a little helplessly. What would a six-year-old like to have as a present for Christmas. "Maybe a few sweets as well?"

Exhaling slowly, Marvolo nodded. "Sweets... that's a good start." There was a flash of pain before the mask was back in place. "I don't think we will get a blanket made in time. But I think the Tales of Beedle the Bard are maybe something for him. I know for a fact that there are a few illustrated versions out there."

.:Stop talking so much in that useless way! I want to know what's going on. If you don't speak properly, I miss most of it:. Nagini sounded like Draco when he didn't want to go out in the rain for Quidditch training as she wound her way up the side of Harry's bed. Harry felt tension falling away from him and he snorted.

.:I'll go to bed:. Marvolo hissed, patting Harry's leg where it rested under the cover. .:Come with me?:. The snake hissed to that question, waving her head in silent contemplation. Then she started to move up onto the bed and under the covers, twining her body over and around Harry's legs.

Laughing as her tongue tickled him on top of his right foot, Harry hissed an observation in Marvolo's direction. .:I think she'll stay here the rest of the night:. Marvolo laughed and stood. .:Sleep well, you two. We can't get any presents during the night anyway:. With a wave of his hand Marvolo doused the lights again, before stepping into the hall and closing the door softly behind him.

With a sigh Harry placed his glasses back on the table beside his bed, before he slid down under the covers, moving the big snake around until he was once again comfortable and slipped back into sleep.

Sunday, 24th of December

Carefully avoiding the ladders strewn throughout the many rooms, Draco moved swiftly from the breakfast room – where he had picked up a sandwich – to find a space where he would be safe from his mother.

After dodging a frantic house-elf, Draco made it into the music room nearest to the ritual room. It wasn't used often, but today it was occupied.

"Father, what are you doing here?" Because normally his father would be in the middle of organizing, or back in his study getting some paperwork out of the way. Finding him in a spot great to hide in was unexpected.
With a weary sigh Lucius closed the book he had been reading, looking up to his son. "I didn't sleep well last night. Your mother kept turning and tossing around. Not that she woke up." Draco's father gave another sigh, "I have a headache, and the potion hasn't kicked in yet. So please, stay quiet."

Draco just nodded, wondering how it was that his mother's sleeping habits all of a sudden disturbed the man who had slept beside her for over a decade already. But who was he to judge? Maybe his father just had had a bad dream and didn't want his son to know. So Draco walked over to the bench set in front of the piano to eat his sandwich with ham, mayonnaise, and tomato slices.

As much as he looked forward to the ball, meeting all his friends, dancing with Astoria, he could do without all the hubbub and unrest created by the preparations.

When an elf came into the room, vanishing dust from flat surfaces and the carpet, then starting to float garlands of greenery – Draco didn't care to get close enough to identify what kind of conifer it was – to the ceiling, both Draco and his father fled again.

Maybe taking refuge in his own room, pretending to work on his homework or revision, would give him the calm he wanted to have.

When Henry walked in for breakfast the next morning, Marvolo was already reading the article about the festival in the Daily Prophet. All in all it was a complimentary article, with an emphasis on the quality of education offered to the children, as well as the fact that it gave young muggle-born witches and wizards an opportunity to acclimate themselves earlier to the way things were in magical Britain.

"Good morning, Henry." He greeted the boy with a smile, working hard not to blush over his irrational behaviour of the night before. Mixing a strong calming draught with alcohol wasn't the best idea he had ever had. Not the worst – by far – but certainly not the best. Waking the boy in the middle of the night, what had he been thinking?

"Good morning." Henry didn't look all too awake, slowly taking his seat at the table and almost mechanically filling his plate with his usual favourites.

"Didn't sleep well?" Marvolo folded the newspaper, placing it to the side, and started to prepare another cup of coffee. The headache he had awoken to luckily had reacted favourably to the sobering potion he had taken.

Henry shook his head. "Every time I turned I woke because Nagini got in the way. She's decided to spend the day on the rug in front of the fireplace in the study."

Marvolo felt his eyes go round as Henry filled his mug with coffee instead of tea, adding lots of milk and sugar.

"Are you sure that you should get up? The evening is going to be a late one. Usually such a ball doesn't end until well into the night." Marvolo took a sip from his sweet coffee, taking in Henry's ruffled hair and pale face. "I recommend you at least take a nap before we depart later this afternoon."

Before he could elaborate why he thought that was a good idea, or bring up what they had discussed in the middle of the night, he felt as one of his Death Eaters called for him.

What now? Marvolo hoped, for the sake of whoever was calling, that they had a really good reason to disrupt his breakfast like that.

He good up with a sigh, quickly draining his coffee and snatching up an apple to take along, and looked over to Henry, who now suddenly looked a lot more attentive. "Everything all right?" The teenager asked.

"I don't know yet," Marvolo answered already preparing to leave. "But I'll find out."

Henry looked worried. "So you have no idea? They wouldn't call unless it was important, would they?"

"Flimm! My cloak!" He needed to make sure Henry didn't needlessly worry, because there was no reason to. "Besides the order to look for children in dangerous situations who might need help, and the one to have bigger families, there are no orders that all of them have. Maybe someone has found Fenrir?" He shrugged and accepted the cloak from the elf. "Don't worry. I don't plan to leave Headquarters. I'll be quick." And he planned to be.

"Good." Henry nodded. "I'll start on the transfiguration essay."

Swinging the cloak around his shoulders, Marvolo swept from the room and made for the floo room to apparate over to Headquarters. He really hoped that there was a good reason to call on him today, of all days.

Once again Jeremy was waiting for his Lord, not sure how his questions would be taken. To keep his mind from falling into blind panic – how he could work in an emergency situation at the hospital but be so nervous now, he didn't know – Jeremy wondered if the others were equally nervous whenever they had something urgent they had to tell their Lord. Or was it just him?

Suddenly the door to the audience chamber opened with enough force to make it crash into the wall. Without hesitation Jeremy fell to his knees, bending low to the ground, struggling to keep his breath calm. He wished Dumbledore's test results had come a few days later. Then he wouldn't have had to call his Lord during the days surrounding Christmas and Yule. But there wasn't a thing he could change. He just had to hope that the stable state of mind the Dark Lord had displayed since his return would hold out.

"What's so terribly important, Jeremy Jugson, that it couldn't wait a few more days?" the Dark Lord demanded to know the moment he took the last steps to come to stand in front of Jeremy's hands where they rested on the wooden floor.

"I received the results of a test we repeated on a patient. It had come to my attention that he wasn't improving as he should have. It seems as if he had taken a potion to mask the effects of the dangerous magic affecting him. The results of the new test show how severe the damage really is.
His treatment could go either way. He could regain his health – with a little luck – or lose his life, if he is really unlucky. I'm contemplating giving a little more responsibility to one of our junior healers. I'm feeling a little under the weather, and might need a few days off. But I wanted to ask what you wish me to do, my Lord." Jeremy quickly reported his reason to be here – maybe that would help the man keep calm – making sure his Lord could infer from his report that there was a chance to kind of sabotage the treatment of Mr. Dumbledore. Because his oaths made it impossible for him to directly cause harm to a person under his care as a healer.

Shivering in fear, or because the floor was cold – he wasn't really that sure which was the cause –
Jeremy waited with anxiety growing in his stomach with each moment the Dark Lord stayed silent.
Marvolo allowed himself a few slow blinks. It wasn't as if Jeremy could see his shock from his position on the floor, where he was prostrating himself as was proper. Or more likely as he, as Voldemort, had deemed proper in his insane days of the past. Maybe the healer had expected his Lord to be in an extra foul mood because of the hour and date.

But what shocked Marvolo more was the fraction of a second he had hesitated to make a rational decision. Why would he hesitate? Why would emotions come in the way of rational planning?

"Wouldn't it be suspicious if you were to sabotage his treatments?" First rule of any planning, plotting, and decision making: get more information. As much information as possible. Then he would weight the pros and cons, consider the consequences as well as his goals, before coming to a rational decision.

His hatred for Albus Percival Wulfric Brian Dumbledore wouldn't override his common sense. And his pity and guilt over what the curse he had designed and placed on the ring had caused for the old Headmaster wouldn't dictate his actions either.

Marvolo never had thought that it was possible to feel hate and pity for the same person at the same time. It certainly was disconcerting, and led him to the theory that the last piece of his soul to return had restored even more of his humanity.

"It shouldn't be, my Lord. Such cases are never entirely predictable. At the current moment, everything between a full recovery and death is a possibility. The most likely outcome is some permanent damage to the old man's mind. It should be easy enough to make sure the treatment is altered just enough to favour a less positive outcome, my Lord."

Jeremy sounded confident, but manipulations were always prone to discovery, and the fact that the permanent damage to Dumbledore – and especially the old goat's death – would certainly fall under intense scrutiny didn't make it any better.

Tapping a finger of his right hand against his lip, Marvolo quickly went through his options, keeping up tight shields around his mind to keep his turbulent emotions in check. "Don't risk your place at the hospital. Do your best to heal the old idiot. You might be able to improve our knowledge and the healers' capabilities in such matters. That is much more important than that Dumbledore is damaged further."

And it was more important. With everything the old man had already lost, and now this prolonged stay in the hospital, it was highly unlikely that he would regain as much influence as he had once held.

"Was there anything else you wanted to inform me about?" This was in a way good news, but it still had interrupted breakfast with Henry, and their possibility to talk a bit more about the young boy they had discovered yesterday.

"No, my Lord, this was all. I ask for your forgiveness that I dared to interrupt your day, my Lord."

As the healer was still cowering on the ground, Marvolo allowed himself to roll his eyes. Sometimes the extreme reverence got on his nerves. "You're forgiven. Go. Report back – a written report will do – if there are any new developments." So dismissed, the healer stood, bowed again, then left.

Marvolo waited a moment until the other had left, before he made his way out as well.
have to explain to Henry what he had learned and then somehow get his hands on a few chocolate frogs and an illustrated version of The Tales of Beedle the Bard.

oooOOooo

London had volunteered to explain to the kid what had happened the day before and what would happen next because of it. He had seen the boy during breakfast with only those present who were living here. All other students wouldn't be back until a week into the new year. And now he was searching for Marcus, as he had thought it would be better to talk with him in a more private setting.

As he had thought he would, London found him in the biology classroom with his face pressed against the glass of the terrarium, hissing. If he hadn't known better, London would have guessed that the young child simply was playing, pretending to speak to a snake.

London took a seat near the terrarium, making a little noise, to wait until Marcus would switch his attention from the snake to the human in the room.

"Hello, Mr. London!" the boy whirled around, the short robes he wore over his trousers and pullover, swinging. "Did you know that a snake can feel people walking in because the floor shakes with every step?" Almost jumping, Marcus came over and looked up curiously. "Is it already lunch time?"

"No," London smiled and patted the chair standing at the same table he had sat down at. "I wanted to talk with you about the two men who helped your snake friend yesterday. Do you remember them?"

Suddenly Marcus looked alarmed. "Are they in trouble?"

Inwardly smirking over the little boy's worries, London shook his head. "No, they aren't in trouble. After all, they helped a snake in danger. Why should they be in trouble for that?"

Reassured, Marcus nodded solemnly, and sat down.

"But they noticed that you, like them, are able to speak with snakes. That's an ability that runs in only one family. They are distant family to you, and would like to get to know you better, now that they know you're here." London had contemplated many different ways to break the news, since Lord Lestrange had approached him about this the previous evening. But in the end there was no way to do this delicately, as some people might insist this should be handled. So he had decided to be honest and keep his explanations to words a boy not yet able to write all letters would understand.

Marcus' brow furrowed in concentration. "Why didn't they know? I could have lived with them."

"Because the connection between them and you is way in the past. Way before your parents, or even your grandparents. The family didn't stay together, so they don't know where else there might be people with the ability to speak to snakes. They only found each other this past summer." How did one explain family feuds, disinheriting of Squibs, and other factors unknown to a child? As London didn't even know what, of all the possibilities, had been the reason that the descendants of the Slytherin family had been lost, he decided to go with the common outcome of all those. Losing contact.

London watched as Marcus thought that through. "I would like to meet them. They seemed nice. Can I go play now?"
"Sure you can." He watched as Marcus went back to the snake, hissed a few words – probably it was several words, there was no way to be sure – and then ran out of the room, probably over to where the others were playing a game of cards.

That had not gone the way London had expected it to go. He had either expected anger over the fact he had been alone so long, or over-enthusiastic happiness. But he guessed, as the small guy couldn't be sure what would happen, this was a reasonable reaction. From what little he had learned about how Lord Slytherin handled himself around his adopted son, he had at least some hope that this would work out to be something positive for the child.

oooOOooo

A few passes with a comb, and Harry was happy with the way his hair was styled. Now that it was a bit longer, and he had used the potion which had worked out best from those he had picked up in Hogsmeade, it was a little bit more controlled. Not enough that he felt like a swot neat as a pin, but more as if he had really used a brush for once.

With a chuckle and a nervous gesture neatening his robes, Harry deemed himself ready.

A chuckle made him turn. Marvolo was standing behind him his robe over one arm, slacks, gleaming black dress-shoes, a silken embroidered dress-shirt already donned. "You look good. Why the sudden interest in your appearance? Are you interested in Miss Greengrass?" There was a teasing note to Marvolo's voice, and Harry responded by sticking his tongue out. He wasn't in the mood to be teased.

"No, I'm not. As you well know. She asked me to go with her as a friend. Nothing more." Time to change the topic, "You look good as well." And he did. Currently his eyes weren't glamoured just yet, so the vibrant red stood out from his dark hair and pale skin.

"Go on. Miss Greengrass is waiting for you. We'll meet up at Malfoy Manor." With a nod Harry stepped over to the floo and the ornate box on the mantle. A pinch of floo-powder in hand he stepped into the fireplace calling out his destination.

A nauseating trip with a lot of whirling later, Harry stepped out of the floo over at Greengrass Manor. The room was richly decorated with a plush carpet, silk-covered walls, and a painting on the ceiling depicting some mythological scene.

Before Harry could start to wonder what to do now, an elf popped into existence right in front of him, making him jump. Even after weeks with elves of his own, he hadn't become accustomed to their penchant for popping up unexpectedly. "Young Master, good evening! Please wait here, young Mistress comes down soon." And with another pop the elf was gone.

Luckily for Harry it didn't take long until Daphne came into the room, closely followed by her parents and her younger sister Astoria. With a smile and a bow Harry greeted his date for the day before he turned to Lord and Lady Greengrass to bow again. It was kind of terrifying to be here on his own with so little actual training in these matters, representing the two families he was heir to. Truly terrifying.

But Harry always had been good at working under pressure, and this wasn't a situation where death was a real possibility – unlike against those Dementors in the forest – and judging by the smiles on everyone's faces, if he did something wrong, it wouldn't be held against him.

"Harry, what did you do to your hair?" Daphne blurted out, breaking the socially acceptable, but stilted, atmosphere.
Harry grinned when he answered. "I let it grow out a little, helped along with a potion, and then worked still more potions into it. I definitely am not vain enough to go to that much trouble on a normal day at school, but for something like today it's worth all the hassle."

"I remember the days I could do just that with fondness," Lord Greengrass drily remarked before turning to his wife, taking her hand in his.

Her eyes were sparkling with amusement, and for a short moment Harry wondered what story the both of them were remembering. "I like your robes, Heir Slytherin-Potter. Are those flames? This year's theme was a real problem to match robes to," Daphne's mother asked with kind curiosity.

To that Harry could do little more than nod. It had been hard. "Father came up with the idea of what hospitality means in different cultures. There are differences, but offering shelter and food are almost universal. Neither of us wanted to go as loaves of bread, or something like that, so we went with the warmth of fire. Like the one in the home's hearth." Remembering part of that discussion Harry snorted. Seeing the questioning glances he explained without being prompted. "A young witch – I guess an apprentice – suggested we should incorporate images of animals in the flames, to add a bit of variation. Father said that would have been a design fit for a Dark Lord, earning him some horrified looks. When he explained that such a design would be reminiscent of Fiendfyre, the idea was quickly brushed aside."

Everyone laughed, but Harry was pretty sure there was tension on Lord Greengrass' face. So, as Harry had guessed – because the man's younger brother was a Death Eater – this Lord was sworn to Marvolo as well.

"So the dark colour at the top is to stand for the chimney, and the sparkling vest over your shirt is for the embers?" Astoria asked, intently inspecting the embroidery on the fine silken material of Harry's robes.

Again Harry smoothed down the material. He wore dark brown slacks from wool, standing for the wood used to feed the flames, of course, a white shirt with a bright red, sparkling vest over it, and the robe getting darker at the top covered with embroidered flames springing up from the hem on top of it all.

Daphne was in a dress of silk in mixed shades of yellow and orange going to her ankles, with an almost sheer robe over it – a few strips of dark fabric created intricate designs on the over-robe – mimicking the effects of a lantern. She obviously had decided to pick the theme of offering light to the visitor from the list their tailor had provided when challenged to find matching themes and colour schemes for the two of them.

"You look really great, Daphne." Harry suddenly had realized that he should compliment his date. It wasn't as if he had to lie. She looked great with the lighter, colder colours of her lantern ensemble, her hair done up into something which looked too complicated to comprehend without hours of study.

"Shall we go?" Lord Greengrass asked, and Harry, once again resorting to what he had learned over the summer, stepped up to Daphne, offering her his arm, and then offered his other arm to Astoria, so he would escort both girls through the floo and over to Malfoy Manor. Draco would be there to greet them and keep Astoria entertained, while Harry was expected to move around with Daphne to give her the chance to attract the interest she needed to find herself a wizard to marry who wouldn't bore her to death, or make her life hell in a different way.

Steeling himself for the evening to come, Harry walked into the Floo, a girl on each arm, calling out their destination. "Malfoy Manor!"
It hadn't really been all that long, but Draco wished he could move to the buffet in the other room now instead of when everyone had arrived. Standing here next to his parents, greeting all the guests as was now expected of him – it had been so much easier before he had turned thirteen – was getting tiring fast.

And what for? The buffoons that worked at the Ministry. Of course the theme his mother had selected for this year was ridiculous, but some of the costumes people had chosen to wear were even worse. The decorations were wonderful, as they were every year, but Draco was sure he had counted the red shimmering globes standing in for berries among the green leaves of ivy and holly at least a dozen times by now to keep himself from rolling his eyes when another wizard or witch made the same comments to his mother.

Was there a limited list of comments one could make to a witch expecting another child after the first one was almost an adult? The blond was contemplating to start compiling a list when Harry came through the floo between two of their fellow Slytherins, the girls' parents on their heels.

Astoria looked good in her velvet dress and robe combination. It matched Draco's own in texture and didn't clash in colour, making them two matching warm blankets like those that were to be found in every parlour and bedroom the Manor had to offer.

"Astoria, Daphne, Harry. How nice to see you! You look good. And Harry, you managed to find a brush able to tame your hair… some." That earned him chuckles and one playful glare, easing away some of the tension that standing here had caused to gather in Draco's back. Draco greeted Astoria by grasping both her hands in his, gently squeezing them, before he offered the polite bow required of him. He exchanged a bow for a curtsy with Daphne and a bow for a bow with Harry. "I'll find you once I can leave here. Theo and his family are already here. I didn't see Heiress Lestrange yet."

And there was another wave of guests, forcing the others to move on into the halls decorated for the ball. So with a little internal sigh – his mother hadn't let him get away with complaining at these things since he had been eight – Draco turned back to his duty as part of the group of hosts.

Together Severus and Sonja stepped out of the floo into the mass of others on their way to greet the hosts of this evening. With a wave of his wand Severus removed the inevitable soot from both Sonja and himself. Sometimes he wondered why exactly no witch or wizard had come up with a more comfortable – and clean – method of travel. Maybe there was no way to keep the speed, but get rid of the unpleasant aspects. By no means was Severus an expert in that kind of magic.

With a smile Narcissa greeted them both. "Severus, Sonja! How wonderful that you could make it. I had feared duties as Head of House Slytherin at Hogwarts would prevent you from coming," Narcissa gushed in her usual enthusiastic way, while Lucius gave Severus a look clearly communicating that he knew that, if not for Severus' wife, the Potions Master would have indeed claimed some trouble at school in order to stay away.

But Severus actually wasn't all that sure he would have done that. Now that he was Lord Prince, it wasn't as if he could continue to ignore the whole hassle of socializing any longer. And even knowing that he had taken on the title, now he had to live with the consequences of his actions.

They made place for the next guests to be greeted and moved over to the ballroom, where Sonja stifled a laugh and at Severus' questioning look moved her head to indicate a couple standing to the... side, both looking like slices of cake. They really were dressed up as slices of cake, as if they had either transfigured their robes to take on the form of enormous cake pieces, or had enlarged real cake slices.

"Ridiculous," Severus murmured. "Cake… who with a shred of dignity pretends to be a cake?"

Sonja snorted, giving her skirt and robes a little twirl. "The theme wasn't that easy to use, love." Severus supposed he had to concede the point. After all, they had thought over one week to come up with the idea of dressing in robes inspired by glasses full of dark red wine. It had taken some convincing from Sonja to get him into red robes, but as it wasn't Gryffindor red, it was better than being a cake.

"Maybe. But not everyone makes their robes match the theme." He waved his hand in the direction of some people in perfectly normal formal wear. "So why dress up as a cake?"

Sonja's only response was another laugh, before she dragged him onto the dance floor. Severus willingly followed her, before he took over the lead. "You look absolutely wonderful this evening, my love," he murmured into her ear, before spinning them both around. "Let's dance and enjoy the evening as long as we can."

Sonja laughed again. "You sound like it's a dangerous mission."

"Speaking with a bunch of politicians? It's not that dangerous, but most of it is even more boring and at the same time as challenging as teaching a class of first-years."

And they did enjoy the dancing, the fine food, and even a conversation or two. All in all, Severus was sure pretty fast that it was a good thing he had managed to avoid attending in the past. Without Sonja by his side, he was pretty sure he would have made so many sarcastic comments that everyone would be avoiding him pretty soon. And that would have been all right with Severus. But now, with Sonja by his side, everything was different, and better.

ooOoo

Music played by actual humans filled the air. Harry maneuvered Daphne through the crowd of people dancing. It was actually fun, now that he knew what he was doing. Much more fun than it had been last year, when he had been forced to attend with only one measly dancing lesson for preparation.

"What do you think? Have you caught the eye of someone you would like to meet?" Harry still had trouble with the concept of arranged marriages, and especially the easy way his Slytherin classmates seemed to accept the necessity of such arrangements. He was so glad Marvolo had promised to not subject him to an arranged marriage, even though he insisted on a contract to regulate the terms of a marriage he wanted to enter. It was just the done thing. If he were to ask Hermione, he certainly would have a list of arguments for or against marriage contracts within a week. At most.

"Maybe. It's hard to judge. There aren't many close to our age that would be older than me. The war put a damper on the number of children born. If I go for a younger wizard, there are a few more. But many are only children, and so are out of the running anyway. Maybe I'll have to look outside of Britain, because I certainly will not marry a second cousin." She shuddered dramatically to emphasize the point, and Harry had to agree. What Marvolo had told him about the effects of inbreeding in the remaining lines of Slytherin House he knew about had reinforced the idea not to marry anyone even remotely related to himself.
Once the dance was over, they stepped away from each other, bowed – or curtseyed – to each other, before Harry offered his arm. He felt transplanted into one of the Jane Austen films from the BBC that Aunt Petunia had watched from time to time, with all the bowing he had to do in this one evening.

"Would you like to take a break, maybe drink something?" Harry hoped she would agree, he was parched.

"That sounds lovely," was Daphne's answer, so they wandered over to the buffet set up in another big room attached to the ballroom, but far enough removed that talking was a little bit easier, the music not overpowering everything.

When they came up to the punch bowl, and the many pitchers of different beverages – magically refilling, of course – Harry asked Daphne for her preferences before addressing the man standing behind the table waiting to fill small cup-like glasses.

"Daphne! Harry! I finally found you! That's harder than I would have guessed." Hermione came over to them, smiling, her face flushed with excitement, Theo and the little guy Aiden trailing her.

"Hermione! Did you come with Lord Lestrange?" Harry asked while handing a glass of red berry lemonade to Daphne.

"Yes, I did. We both were invited, and my parents didn't feel comfortable attending such a prestigious event. They claim to need more time to acclimate. But mom insisted that I'll have to tell her every little detail."

Harry smiled at his eager friend, she clearly was excited and watched everything as if she was an explorer who had snuck into some secret society, gathering what information she could before she had to flee again.

They each got a drink and then drifted over to where the pastries were to be found. There were treacle tarts so tiny that Harry could have easily fit three of them in his palm. All of it was rather bite-sized, giving them the opportunity to sample quite a few different ones without being in danger of overindulging.

"Theo, I do want to have another of the chocolate ones, please," Aiden asked of his brother, as he was too short to reach that far on his own.

They fell into easy conversation, resting a little, drinking and eating to refill their reserves. The evening could get quite late, or so Draco had told them.

They watched two more dances, during which Draco arrived with Astoria, happy to be with their younger friends and away from the adults. Then a piece started that Harry had dreaded during their dancing lessons.

Hermione's eyes started to glow. She loved such dances, and when Harry took a look at Daphne, he just knew he wasn't going to get out of this one. "Do you want to dance, Aiden?" Hermione asked the young boy, who nodded enthusiastically. Harry assumed that seeing all the adults do it made the young Aiden want to dance as well. Draco asked Astoria for a dance and, because Theo subtly shook his head with a grin, Harry did as well, knowing by now that ignoring his date at a ball was rude, and he had to make sure she enjoyed herself. He led her onto the dance floor to join in an old-fashioned line dance still well liked in the wizarding part of Britain.

ooOoo
As was customary at such gatherings, like this ball a few of the members of the Wizengamot had slowly moved over to a small study for a discussion. Marvolo was part of the group gathered there, a glass of fine wine in one hand, a small plate of petit fours floating next to his free hand. Lucius had selected a nice room with a big fireplace, a lot of comfortable seats – mostly armchairs, and two wingback chairs – and the walls covered in bookshelves.

Currently Amos Diggory – father of the boy Wormtail had killed – was speaking passionately about the need to make those who had anything other than pure human ancestry register. He wanted to start with werewolves, go on to those with veela in their ancestry, then those descended from giants, goblins, and any and all others who could reproduce with humans.

It was a ridiculous notion. It would bring nothing but data to prosecute those with mixed ancestry. Not increased security or any of the other benefits Diggory and those still remaining of Umbridge's group claimed they wanted to achieve.

It was similar to a plan Marvolo had contemplated in his past. Registering all so-called muggle-born witches and wizards had been part of Voldemort's agenda. Now he knew, of course, how useless those plans had been.

Marvolo prepared to cut in – there was no way he could let something dangerous like that happen – when Madame Longbottom stepped up to Diggory. "Don't be an idiot, Amos. What you are talking about sounds suspiciously like some of the things Grindelwald did." The old witch was forceful with her accusation. And she was right. Targeting minorities within the magical community had been a part of Grindelwald's campaign. He had needed to control those that were not as firmly integrated into the magical community as witches and wizards born into it.

"Madame Longbottom! My only son was killed by a dark wizard." The hateful but short look thrown in Marvolo's direction made clear enough who Diggory blamed for Cedric's death. "How can you even think I would agree with something a dark wizard would do?"

Marvolo rolled his eyes, took a sip from his wine, and picked up one of the sweet little cakes. Those methods never had been tied to an ideology, but had been used by all totalitarian regimes throughout time and space.

"The way werewolf attacks have declined since we have made it easier for them to lead a law-abiding life, and the fact that there isn't even a hint of people with mixed ancestry causing more trouble than any other part of the population, should be evidence enough that there isn't any reason to implement such dangerous, and useless, methods." Marvolo spoke clearly, slowly. There was no need to rush this. It was more like he needed to be careful. The poison Dolores Umbridge had been spreading obviously had deeper roots than Marvolo had thought.

Lord Black stepped away from one of the shelves, turning to involve himself in the discussion. "You needn't be dark to do bad things, Amos. And targeting people for being different will not bring your son back." The harsh words were spoken softly, but nonetheless sent Amos Diggory running from the room.

The tense silence didn't last long, then the discussions moved over to their thoughts on the regulation of what was termed dangerous but needed magic. Like portkeys, certain wards, the floo network, and others of that calibre.

Marvolo listened, and he listened well, because when he was to start his attempts to change the laws regarding so-called dark magic, he needed a good picture of where everyone of influence stood on this and similar topics.
It was really late when Marvolo finally went to collect Henry so they both could go home.

oooOOooo

Now that everyone had pretty much accepted that Lord Marvolo Slytherin was a normal – pretty boring – member of the Wizengamot, Rita was in desperate need of a new story. And now she was in hot pursuit of what she was sure was the next big hit on her list of successes.

As the anti-bug wards around the hospital did nothing to keep Rita away, even in her form as a bug, all she had to do was avoid being seen. Because a bug in a hospital was in danger of being squashed on principle when spotted.

So she had clung to the folds of the cloak of a patient hurrying to get through the doors, and then had used the disturbance of a flying girl to move over to the leaves of a flowerpot someone was delivering to one of the patients. That manoeuvre had brought her up to the right floor and into the right department.

The people didn't appreciate what a hard job she had. They all believed she just wrote down whatever she got told by people. But now, getting the right story before anyone else meant hard work. Sneaking around, risking her health and freedom to bring them entertainment.

Seeing her best chance this evening in an open door, Rita took the opportunity to fly over the corridor and slipped into what looked like a staff room.

A quick look around and she spotted a high shelf filled with boxes of what looked like notes and patient files. That would provide enough cover so she wouldn't be spotted while she listened to the two healers who at the moment were chatting idly, while preparing themselves a cup of tea, or maybe coffee.

Her buzzing was concealed by the sound of coffee being poured into cups, the rattling of spoons against the side of mugs, so she managed to safely reach the top and settled between two boxes, her faceted eyes watching as the two wizards in lime-green robes settled down, thoughtful expressions on their face.

"How good are his chances, do you think? Will he make it?"

"Dumbledore?" The healer rubbed his eyes, taking a sip from his mug. "Maybe. The fact that he actively was sabotaging his treatments has worsened his prospects. But it's possible that we have caught on just in time." He sighed, and Rita was listening intently. Her hunch had been right. There was a story here.

"Do you want to start a betting pool?" There was a moment of silence in which they just were looking at each other. "Okay, okay. Don't look like that. You have to agree that it's tempting. We don't have such a complex case all that often. They're either so far gone, that we only can help keep them calm and from causing harm, or it's so early that they're better within weeks. A case where the outcome is such a toss-up... you can't blame us for betting. And then he is such a big figure. Jeremy," the healer ended in a whine, then huffed, "you're no fun!"

"This is serious. So come on, let's go over the treatment plan again."

They got out some parchment and quills, sliding into heavily technical language. Rita listened, memorising what she could. The only weak spot she had found over all the years in her animagus form was that she wasn't able to take notes. But she had trained her memory to the best of her ability. Someday soon she wouldn't need to take notes any longer.
Chapter End Notes

Thanks for all reviewers! Those that write only once, those that write often! You help me keep my drive despite many distractions (I got a graphic tablet for my birthday!)

On an unrelated note: my condolences to all those people out there in the world who need to put others down to feel better about themselves. You must live in such a sad world.

And a few pieces of advice:

If you don't like a story, go find another one. There are so many out there, one should suit you.

If you have very specific ideas of how something should go, write a story yourself! It's not that hard! Just start and get going! That's what I did ;)

Thanks to Jordre and Jake for helping to improve my spelling!

Next chapter planned for 30th of March 2018
Monday, 25th of December

The morning after the ball, Marvolo moved silently from the door to Henry’s room down to get himself his breakfast. Henry was still asleep, not really surprising after the late night they had had.

The scent of the usual foods offered for breakfast reached him before he had reached the ground floor. Everything looked homely. The warm light from candles and the fire in the fireplace, the tasteful decoration – and Marvolo really had doubted something like that was even possible – and the way the table had been laid, filled Marvolo with calm.

On the way here he had passed the parlour where the tree stood. This was Henry’s and his first Christmas together. And as they both knew only too well, a family Christmas was important. That was why they had made sure Marcus would get something from them.

So Marvolo decided to drink some tea, eat a few waffles with honey and the sweet cherry sauce the elves had prepared for today, and wait for Henry to wake up. They would unwrap their presents together. As a family.

Christmas had always been important at Wool’s. Each child got something new to wear and something like a treat. A piece of fruit, hard candy, once even chocolate. But when he had arrived at Hogwarts, he had seen what the children with a proper family had been sent each year. It had driven home how unwanted all of the orphans really were.

Hopefully the fact that Henry and he had sent some extra presents wouldn’t cause trouble and tension to rise among the children staying over at Xerxes’ school. With a frustrated huff Marvolo steered his thoughts down another path. It was irritating to care about the feelings of others. It had been tolerable as long as it had been confined to Henry, and the few of his followers he knew the longest and who were actually useful, or loyal. But now it seemed to extend towards people he hadn’t actually met.

To spend the time somewhat productively – and to distract himself – Marvolo reached for the Daily Prophet waiting next to the bowl with fresh fruits. He skimmed a few articles until he reached one titled Dumbledore dangerously ill. He just had to read that one.
your own. But Albus Dumbledore did just that, and then was stubborn enough not to accept help from the knowledgeable and kind Lord Slytherin (see more on how the remarkable wizard has made his return on page 7) when it was offered.

And now shocking revelations have reached our office. There have been some rumours that the curse had negative effects on the old Headmaster, which he ignored. Only to be found out by the competent school medi-witch, who consulted an expert, which led to the Headmaster being admitted to St. Mungo’s for treatment. But before Albus Dumbledore agreed to cooperate, the Board of Governors had to intervene.

So far so usual. A lot of professional curse-breakers and the occasional Auror have to be treated to combat the negative effects of the magic they encounter in their daily work.

But reliable sources inside the hospital have informed me that, unlike normal cases, this one has no foregone conclusion. It’s still unsure if the old Headmaster will even manage to survive his unfortunate clash with dangerous magic caused by his own overconfidence. And even if he does survive, it’s uncertain if and how his mind will be affected.

I’m no parent, but if one would ask me, regardless of the outcome of the excellent treatment the healers are providing, I wouldn’t be comfortable with him retraining his position as headmaster. There would be no way to tell how compromised he might be. If he even manages to survive. Of course, the healers and the Board of Governors will have to decide that when the time comes, and I’m sure they will take all aspects into consideration.

But until the outcome is clear, let us all hope the renowned healers of St. Mungo’s will be able to help Albus Dumbledore to overcome the consequences of his error back in the summer.

It was fascinating how Rita Skeeter always managed to get such information. The fact that Dumbledore had broken some protection and been cursed had been all over the country when it had happened. It hadn’t been in the newspaper, but everyone and their aunt had talked about it.

But how had she managed to get that information from the hospital? That was a mystery. Just like the pictures of him from back at the Malfoy’s garden party in the summer. The reporter was certainly crafty and cunning. Especially when her stories were playing into Marvolo’s plans.

Marvolo was almost finished with the crossword puzzle on the back of the newspaper – just filling in Hades for Greek god of death – when Henry made an appearance. They had spoken briefly before going to their own rooms yesterday, and had agreed that it would be best to sleep as long as possible as they were expecting company in the afternoon.

“Good morning, and happy Christmas, Henry. I hope you have slept well.”

“Happy Christmas to you too, and I did,” Henry answered, a small smile on his face. “But the scents of a good breakfast have been luring me away from bed for the past hour or so. I could no longer ignore my stomach demanding food. Did you sleep well?”

As Marvolo had noticed Henry kept omitting any form of address when speaking with him. Neither sir, nor Marvolo was added most of the time. And even more surprising was that Marvolo didn’t feel it was done out of lacking respect. So he let it slide.

“Yes, I had a restful night. How did you like your first big ball? Did it meet with your expectations?”
Henry snorted while filling his plate with a wide variety of foods. “It did. And I’m happy that so many of my schoolmates were there as well. We could dodge most of the adults that way. Dancing was more fun than I had hoped for. Even those line-dances. I hadn’t thought it would be possible. And the food was good. Do you think the Malfoys will get leftovers to eat for the rest of the year? There was so much food there. It’s impossible that all of it was eaten yesterday.”

Marvolo hummed. It was true the plates never got any emptier regardless of how late the hour got. There would have been many leftovers, as Henry called them. But it seemed that this was a normal occurrence in any magical household. There had always been an abundance of food at Hogwarts. Even during a time when the muggle part of Britain had to ration food and other supplies, there always seemed to be enough of everything in Diagon Alley and at Hogwarts. “I’m not really sure. But I would guess that neither Narcissa nor Lucius would allow leftovers to be served at any of their tables.” Now it was Henry who made a non-committal sound, continuing with his breakfast, once again fixing himself a cup of coffee with milk and sugar instead of the tea that was also offered.

“The others wanted to know if we managed to help the snake at the festival. After all, they were there when Marcus came to get you for help. I told them that the snake is well, but haven’t told them anything about Marcus or that he is a Parselmouth like we are. I wanted to ask you first when the best time would be to tell someone. Because I would prefer my friends to learn about it from me, and not the Daily Prophet or the rumour mill.”

Slowly nodding, Marvolo set his cup down. It truly would be better they informed selected people of their wish to take Marcus into their family before the Daily Prophet put their spin on it. “When the holidays are over and I can go to the Ministry to set things in motion, I think. Maybe we should inform a few others – like your godfather – earlier. But I guess we should try to keep this out of the public eye as long as we can manage.” He threw Henry a significant look and was rewarded with a nod.

They finished their breakfast in companionable silence.

“Finished?” Marvolo asked when Henry had emptied his plate and was only toying with his empty cup.

Henry only nodded, and Marvolo held back a sigh. It wasn’t all that surprising that this morning was turning into something strained. They both weren’t accustomed to family life and had probably heaped more expectations on this day than would be considered healthy. So Marvolo quickly thought about how he would break the tension if this was him trying to gain someone as an ally. It probably wasn’t the best way to do this, but breaking the tension had to be better than letting it stand.

“Let’s go over to the parlour and take a look at all the parcels stacked underneath the tree. We should see what everyone got for us before your godfather makes an appearance. He surely will want to see what you think of his gift.” Marvolo’s attempt to break the tension was rewarded with a grin, and they both quickly stood from the table to walk over to the parlour, taking a big step to avoid stepping on Nagini who had opted to rest in the middle of the door, blocking the way.

Sometimes his familiar puzzled him with her behaviour.

ooOoo
When Harry stepped over the threshold into the parlour, he stopped for a moment. The tree was magnificent. Candles and fairy-lights sparkled from every part of it, miniature apples, glittering snowflake ornaments, and icicles dangled from the branches. The scent of spices, hot beeswax, and pine needles filled the air. The large number of parcels under the tree itself, all of them wrapped in colourful and glimmering paper, grabbed Harry’s attention next. Surely those weren’t all just for Marvolo and him?

An amused voice sounded from just outside the door. “Go in, Henry. We should start unwrapping. And I would advise you to write down who sent you what. It is required to send notes of thanks to each of them.”

Harry groaned and gave Marvolo a narrowed gaze over his shoulder, but he walked into the room and knelt by the tree nonetheless.

Flimm was called to get them both a piece of parchment and a quill. And while they waited, Harry checked the piles to find his gift for Marvolo among the heaps. Who would send them that many presents? Harry had only expected small tokens from the other Slytherins in his year, Ron and Hermione, and Sirius, maybe even Remus. But this many?

After a while rummaging under the tree, Harry emerged with a grin on his face. He felt eager to see if Marvolo would like his present... and anxious at the same time that it might be rejected. All in all, Harry hadn’t a lot of practice giving others things. Only since he had started at Hogwarts and only for a few selected people. Hopefully this wouldn’t ruin the day.

Best to get it over with.

Harry held the small package – wrapped in shining green metallic paper – out to Marvolo, who took it without saying anything, but with a small unsure smile, and a small nod.

He waited with bated breath, watching how careful Marvolo was in unwrapping the present. Piece by piece he took off the Spell-o-tape – Harry was sure its only difference to what the muggles used was that the sticky quality was achieved with a sticking charm – then carefully unwrapped the paper to reveal the book within.

A smirk settled on Marvolo’s face, and there was an amused glint in his ruby-red eyes. “The Art of War? An interesting choice. Thank you, Henry.”

Fidgeting a little, Harry smiled. Marvolo seemed to at least like the present a little. “It’s not that easy to find something for you. It was this or The Prince by Machiavelli.” Marvolo laughed at that, and moved his wand, causing one of the parcels to swoop up from under the tree and over to them.

It hovered before Harry, who grabbed it with care. It certainly felt like a book. It had the distinct form he was used to finding from presents Hermione gave him. It took Harry only a moment to decide that he didn’t have the patience needed to unwrap all the gifts carefully as the other had done, and simply ripped the paper off.

Marvolo snorted at that, but didn’t really comment.

Harry looked down at the title – because it indeed was a book – and smiled. That was something he really had wished to have, but hadn’t dared to tell anyone about. Charms for Sketches looked exactly like what he would need to add magic to his animal sketches. He would have loved to start reading it on the spot. “Thank you! That’s great! How... “ He wasn’t sure how to formulate his question and was rescued from his floundering by a kind smile and words.
“You talked so often about your sketching and drawing, and the fact of how you were fascinated with the animated sketches in your charms textbook… well, it won’t enable you to make sophisticated paintings, but it should be enough to animate a sketch of an animal, or a scene into a repeating loop. If you want to, you can try out some of the charms during the holidays, with my supervision, of course.”

Robbed of his ability to speak, Harry nodded enthusiastically. That sounded really good! Emotions swept through Harry, but he decided not to look at them so closely right now. He aimed another smile at Marvolo and then turned to the remaining gifts in their colourful wrappings.

Over an hour later, Harry had a long list of names written down and a heap of things stacked on a low table nearby. There had been token sweets from most of the Slytherin students – which made Harry feel slightly guilty because he hadn’t gotten everyone something as well – and a plethora of different books on self-defence spells from Daphne, Theo, Draco, and the other Slytherin fifth-years. Of course there had been a book from Hermione, but it was about Hogwarts and its founders, a collection of anecdotes and – thankfully – not one of those dry historical texts.

Sirius had given him a hand-written manuscript looking a lot like a collection of different prank potions and spells Sirius and his friends had developed – or discovered – during their own time at Hogwarts. Harry wasn’t really sure what to do with that.

There had been the knitted sweater from Mrs. Weasley. This year in Gryffindor red, which made Harry wonder if there was a hidden reprimand in the gift. The tin filled with small pieces of fruit cake looked delicious and filled Harry with happiness. It would have been really sad if the Weasleys had not sent anything, because that would have meant they were putting distance between themselves and Harry for being adopted.

The twins had sent samples from their range of products, Ginny had sent him a long letter and a bottle of red ink, throwing Harry for a loop. Surely she didn’t still have a crush on him? He would read the letter later. He really hoped that it was just a friendly letter. Because of one thing Harry was sure by now. He didn’t feel anything for Ginny. Well, not more than he would for a sister, she just was the little sister of his friend.

Many names on his list belonged to Death Eaters. Even Severus Snape had sent him a gift: a book on ingredient preparation and preservation. The card coming with the book had been signed by both the professor and his wife. It was hard to imagine Professor Severus Snape in any kind of homely scene, so Harry quickly stopped.

“I think I’ll need another bookshelf,” Harry stated taking in the stacks of books on the table.

“I’m just glad that they managed to keep to age-appropriate gifts this time,” Marvolo said rolling his eyes, startling Harry to laugh. “Get Flimm’s help to clean up that mountain of paper. And then we still have a few hours before Lord Black and Mr. Lupin will be here. How far behind are you on your homework? I’ll have to get some paperwork done, so you’ll have to entertain yourself for a while.”

Harry grinned. “I’m well ahead of my work for school. But I guess I’ll just have a look at all these gifts, and maybe start on the thank you cards… I’m sure I can avoid being bored.”

Nodding, Marvolo stood up, levitated his small stack of presents – Harry had gotten him a collection of chocolates in addition to the book – and left the room.

.:This is a fun ground:. Nagini hissed, and Harry again laughed as he saw the big snake slithering over and under the balls of crumpled paper strewn over the floor. .:Really, it feels wonderful on Harry watched her, feeling really good. It had been at least as good a morning as his first Christmas at Hogwarts. And worlds better than any Christmas back at Privet Drive. Now only Sirius’ visit needed to work out, and all would be fine.

It was good that they didn’t need to wait until after they had eaten breakfast before they were allowed to open their presents. Last year he had been with a family who insisted on waiting until after breakfast. That had been horrible.

But now he ran, together with the others living here, still in his pyjamas to the big tree standing in the living area. There were several stacks of presents beneath the tree, one for each of them. Eager to see what Santa had brought him, Marcus fell to his knees and looked around to find his name – he had learned to read and write it since he had come here – on one of the tags.

When he finally found it – the others already ripping their presents open – his eyes got round in wonder. There were four presents with his name, not two like on most of the other stacks. Why did he get more?

The paper was different, green with small slithering snakes. And there was a card with something that looked like a knight’s crest. Really special. Marcus opened the card but the writing inside was all loopy so he couldn’t read it. He would have to ask one of the adults to read it to him.

But that wasn’t important now. With shining eyes he ripped open the first of his presents. It was a nice jumper in a green he liked, and it was so soft too! The next gift was a colouring book with plants and animals, as well as a tin box of coloured pencils. That would be fun!

But there were still two gifts to go. With eager hands Marcus grabbed a book-shaped one and moments later – paper easily shredded under his hands – he saw that his guess had been right. Quickly but carefully Marcus leafed through the pages, seeing that there were a great number of moving pictures in the book.

The last gift was a little oddly shaped, and squishy. A few tearing sounds later, Marcus held a cuddly snake soft toy in his hands. Such a great gift. But why had he gotten more than the others?

Clutching the snake to his chest, Marcus took the card and walked over to Mr. London who was sitting in an armchair drinking coffee, or something.

“Mr. London, sir?” Marcus asked carefully. He never could be sure how an adult would react at being asked something before breakfast in the morning.

“Yes, Marcus? How can I help you?” But Mr. London always was so kind, there wasn’t really that big a reason to be careful around him.

“There was a card with my gifts. I can’t read it.” Marcus held the card out to Mr. London. “Can you read it to me, sir?”

“Sure.” The man took the card and invited Marcus with a wave of his hand to take a seat on the armrest. Marcus clambered to that place, now really curious what was written in that cart with a knight’s crest.

Once Marcus was settled Mr. London started to read. “Dear Marcus, even Though we only learned of you a few days ago, we wanted to give you something for Christmas. We don’t know what you like yet, but as you are such good friends with the snake at your school, we hope you will like the cuddly snake. Henry selected the storybook. When we meet we may look through it together. Henry and I both are happy that we found you, and hope that you will become a part of our family. And they have both signed, look here.” Mr London turned to card so Marcus could see the two places where two someones had written their names. “Henry Slytherin-Potter and Marvolo Slytherin have signed this.”

The rest of the day was filled with laughter and playing children. Marcus kept to the sidelines, colouring in his book and thinking.

He had seen quite a few kids coming and going where he had lived before. One boy had told him that Marcus should get used to the idea of never finding a family. The boy – Jeph, he had called himself – had no father, because the man had left Jeph’s mother, and because he might come back one day, no family had been willing to adopt Jeph. And because Marcus’ father was unknown, Jeph had told him it would be the same for him. No one would take him in for fear of losing him to his father, should he ever come back.

Until now it had felt just too true. But Jeph hadn’t known wizards were real, so why would what Jeph had said still be true now? Maybe Henry, the boy he had meet at the school, and Marvolo, the adult :Slithering Darkness: had sent him to get for help, were nice. It was worth a try.

Concentrating on colouring in the cat and owl, Marcus let go of his musings in favour of the fun colouring brought him. Being a wizard was great.

oooOOooo

Ron ate another of the hashbrowns his mother had made for their gathering, while listening to Bill and Charlie sharing some of the more exciting stories from their jobs. Both were ignoring the unhappy looks their mother threw them. Ron wondered if his plan to become an Auror would find more acceptance. It would be a job at the Ministry, just like Percy, but not so boring Ron would have to fight falling asleep most of the time.

It was great being home with everyone here. The food was wonderful. Ron had missed his older brothers, and even his parents a little bit. It would have been perfect if Harry could have been here.

“Why can’t Harry be here, mum? Didn’t Ron invite him?” Ginny asked with more intensity than Ron had thought his little sister had outside of Quidditch, or fighting off the twins and their pranks.

“Ron did ask him to come, my dear. But it seems with all that Heir and Lord nonsense, he doesn’t have much time. It’s sad, really. But didn’t he say he would come here for at least a day?” Their mother turned to Ron, who had stuffed another bite into his mouth just a moment before, and now flushed bright red as all faces turned to him.

When he had swallowed the bite, Ron nodded. “Yes, I asked him, and he said that he would love to come when he gets permission. He said he would floo-call, or send an owl. He gave me parcels to distribute.” Now Ron flushed even brighter. He had totally forgotten that those gifts were still in his trunk. And under the laughter and taunts of the twins – heartily supported by both Bill and Charlie – Ron hurried up the stairs to get the lot of them. They already had unwrapped the gifts that had been stacked under the tree in one corner of the kitchen, each receiving the customary sweater they all had put on the moment they had freed them from the paper. Ron had only complied reluctantly, because his was once again a maroon colour.

Carrying the gifts both from Harry and Hermione, Ron was back in the kitchen only a short time later, dumping his load onto the table where his brothers had quickly made room for the gifts.

“Looks like Harry has made something for most of us!” one of the twins called. Ron didn’t look up as he was sorting the gifts by their name tags, so he didn’t see which one had spoken. But during that sorting he realized that his brother was right, there was a slim roll from Harry for each of them.

With quick and sure fingers, Ron removed the wrappings from the packages. Hermione had given him a book – what else – but at least it was the new book about the most successful players of the Cannons’ since their founding, and not one for keeping a study schedule or something of that kind. Another package from Hermione was filled with candies, as was one from Harry. The last thing Ron opened was the roll bound with a red ribbon. When he unfurled it, a sketch was revealed. It was a sketch like Ron could easily find in one of his many Quidditch-related books and magazines. It showed a keeper in front of the three hoops, moving to stop a quaffle that had been thrown to the left-most ring. Even when this picture wasn’t moving at all the dynamic was clear enough.

It took him a moment but then Ron realized that this was him. Him, the Gryffindor keeper, during one of the training sessions of their Quidditch team. The slight disappointment that had come up with being only given a sketch vanished. Harry had captured one of Ron’s best moments on a broom on paper. That was great!

“Look he drew me that baby dragon Hagrid hatched!” Charlie called out, holding his own sketch so that all of them could have a look at it. Ron had to nod. That dragon looked exactly like that blasted thing they had smuggled out of the school.

Fred and George held a sketch between them, beaming like loons. “He made us a design for a logo. I think it’s a blast!” Both twins looked down on their sketch, and then moved over to a corner of the table, bending over another piece of paper, which Ron assumed was a letter of some kind.

“I got a car sketch.” Their father smiled, casting a spell at the sketch, straightening out the paper that constantly had tried to roll back up.

Bill chuckled and showed his sketch of a Pyramid and sphinx without giving any comment. Their mother was holding her sketch – it looked like a bunch of flowers from where Ron was sitting – to different parts of the wall searching for a spot she might hang it after it had been placed in a frame.

Ron mused that it might work out to remove some of his earlier sketches – he would dearly love for those embarrassments to be gone – to create the space needed, when he looked over to where Ginny sat.

His sister looked down on her own sketch with a frown, before releasing her hold on the edges allowing the paper to return to a roll. Shortly after that she excused herself and went up the stairs, probably to her own room.

His only sister’s strange behaviour quickly was removed from Ron’s mind. Planning the day Harry and Hermione would be able to come over – what to eat, who else to invite – was of much greater interest. Ron looked forward to that day. Of course he would have loved to have Harry here the whole holidays, but he understood that it was important for Harry to have a family Christmas with his godfather instead.

Since the summer, Ron had learned that he really could do without the money an old family name would bring when that meant he could avoid all the boring and tedious responsibilities coming with such names as well.

They spent the rest of the day with lots of good food, games, and stories, until Ron fell into his bed at night a smile on his face, as he knew that Harry would be over on the 27th. Harry had called via floo to ask if that would work out, and Ron had happily agreed. Soon after, he dreamed colourful dreams of professional Quidditch.

Remus looked around the cosy decorated entrance hall of Griffin House as he followed his oldest – and only remaining – friend into the house. Harry stood, beaming over his whole face, next to his guardian, clearly happy that they had accepted the invitation.

The next moment both Sirius and Harry disregarded all manners, running the few steps separating them to hug each other as if they hadn’t met just the day before at the Ball the Malfoys had hosted.

“Lord Black, Mr. Lupin, welcome to Griffin House and a happy Christmas. Please come along to the parlour. Flimm insisted that we needed a variety of cakes, so we are in dire need of help to eat it all.” Lord Slytherin greeted them with such politeness that it almost felt faked, but not. Both Sirius and Harry didn’t mind the usual way guests were escorted through the house and quickly walked down the hall, speaking animatedly. If Remus could trust his ears, they were talking about what robes had been the most boring, and which the most silly, worn to the ball of the day before.

Blue eyes met mottled green in a shared moment of fond exasperation. Before Remus could comprehend what had happened, Lord Slytherin was already walking down the hall towards the parlour where two voices could be heard. Remus followed, totally off balance. How was it even possible that he and the wizard who had killed two of his best friends felt the same about Sirius’ antics?

Bewildered, Remus followed their host only to walk in on a scene that made him smile. Both Harry and Sirius were sitting on the floor in front of the magnificent tree looking at a small mountain of presents. “See, the description says that it’s possible to create an animated picture by sketching – or painting, or whatever – a series of pictures showing parts of the movement and after that to cast the charm that will merge them. I’m sure it’s not the method used for our school texts, or the Prophet. But I’m eager to try it.” Harry’s enthusiasm was almost tangible. Remus never had seen the teenager so at ease and happy. Even at Hogwarts, the year he had been a teacher there, he had never seen him this happy.

“Henry, let’s settle down for tea. I remember Flimm stating that the cherry topped cream tartlets are best eaten warm.” This reminder was stated in a friendly tone, and once again Remus had to wonder. Was Lord Slytherin really that good an actor? Or had the man really changed that much?

“Fruit cake or one of the waffles, Remus?” Sirius asked from across the low table where he had settled next to his godson.

“A piece of fruit cake please,” Remus answered, holding out his plate to make sure that Sirius wouldn’t drop the slice on the way.

Lord Slytherin poured the tea into four cups, letting each of them choose a cup, before adding three spoons of sugar to the one remaining cup.

A moment of quiet stretched out between them, as each sipped their tea, or took a piece of cake, and Remus was casting around in his head to find a safe topic to talk about, when Sirius spoke up.

The sarcastic tone he used made Remus fear the worst. They had talked about their wish to keep the peace so Harry would enjoy the day, but it seemed that Sirius just couldn’t keep himself under control. “Have you seen the article by Miss Skeeter, about Headmaster Dumbledore’s health problem?”

Harry looked up from his plate with a frown, quickly glancing over to where Lord Slytherin was slowly setting down his fork.

“Indeed. I read the whole paper this morning. When I have the time – which isn’t all that often, to my regret – I read at least all of the headlines.” The way Lord Slytherin carefully kept his voice level, not reacting to Sirius’ provocative demeanour, assured Remus that he was determined not to engage in an argument.

“Shouldn’t he be better by now?” Harry asked, worry evident in his voice. “I thought it was only a checkup. Are the rumours true?”

“As I don’t know any of the rumours making the rounds at Hogwarts, I can’t answer that. And I’m not sure how reliable a source Miss Skeeter is. But I know that the curse was rather dangerous, and Dumbledore took his time before he accepted my help. So I think it’s possible that he is worse off than it appeared at first.”

“I wonder how Miss Skeeter was able to gain access to such sensitive patient information. Under normal circumstances, it’s impossible for one of the staff to break the confidence of their patients,” Remus interjected in an attempt to keep the conversation civil.

The frown on Harry’s face vanished, only to be replaced with a knowing smirk, drawing the attention of all adults to the teenager. Lord Slytherin sent his ward a questioning look which clearly was understood by the teen. They knew each other better than Remus had anticipated.

With a small laugh Harry answered the unspoken question. “Hermione puzzled it out the past school year. You might all remember the unflattering articles Skeeter wrote during the tournament?” Nods all around answered him. “Well, she used things in those she had no way of knowing, if she hadn’t been listening in. As a matter of fact, she was there, listening in. Because of the fact that she’s a animagus and takes the form of a beetle, she was able to sneak past all the security. I guess that’s what she did at the hospital as well.”

Remus blinked slowly. Another unregistered animagus, just as Sirius, James, and Peter had been? How many more of those were there? Maybe it wasn’t as uncommon an achievement as widely believed.

“That would certainly explain a few things,” Lord Slytherin said with a slight smile. “I’ll have to congratulate Miss Granger on her success the next time we see her. Why is she still free, with I guess at least three then-Gryffindors in the know?”

Harry played with his tea cup, taking another sip, before he answered the question. “Because Hermione kept her captive in a jar to make sure she would stop writing such slanderous articles about us. I guess she let her go after it was revealed that Mr. Granger’s mother was a squib.” Harry shrugged inelegantly, clearly unsure if he should have spoken about this at all.

“Why didn’t you tell Harry about the Headmaster, Lord Slytherin?” Sirius tone was biting. Was he out for trouble? Maybe the fact that they were here for Christmas, with the murderer of James and Lily as Harry’s new father, was eating more at Sirius than he had been willing to admit.

“It had slipped my mind by the time Henry came down for breakfast. I didn’t keep it from him intentionally.” There was a short non-verbal exchange between Harry and the probably former Dark Lord. “And as we don’t usually throw out the Prophet right after breakfast, he’ll be able to read the article if he wishes.”

There was a moment of uncomfortable silence broken when Harry perked up and turned so he was looking directly at Sirius. “How is the search for your daughters going, Sirius? Any news yet?”

That was enough to distract Sirius from his quest to instigate some discord between Harry and Lord Slytherin. “I sent off a private investigator to find them. I neither have the time nor enough of a clue to do it myself. But I’m in the process of writing letters to those members of the family I faintly remember from before.”

“Why can’t you just send an owl to the twins? I mean, Hedwig manages to find the people I want to reach even without me telling her where to go.”

Sirius laughed. “I contemplated that. But what if Olivienne is a muggle, and her daughters are as well? How will they react when there suddenly is an owl carrying a letter? Remus reminded me that such a thing would be a breach of the Statue of Secrecy… It would be quicker, but I can’t risk that, can I?”

“Probably not,” Harry agreed and threw a look in the direction of Lord Slytherin. The man nodded almost imperceptibly which caused Harry to grin from one ear to the other.

Of course Sirius picked that up and looked on expectantly and a little worried as Harry scooted forward on his seat, obviously eager to tell whatever was on his mind.

“You remember that festival at the school Lord Lestrange has founded this autumn?” Both Remus and Sirius nodded. “Marvolo gifted an adder to the school – for the biology classroom – and on that day the snake got into a pickle. One of the kids living there full time noticed and got Marvolo to help. His name is Marcus. And he was so happy that we could help his friend. She is named Slithering Darkness.” Harry huffed. “Sorry. I’m rambling. But I’m excited. Marcus can speak Parseltongue, so he somehow is a descendant of Slytherin. Not sure what line, but he is family… so I’ll get a little brother.”

While Sirius started to pepper Harry with questions, Remus took in the scene. Harry clearly was happy and looked forward to being a big brother, Lord Slytherin, on the other hand, gave off the impression of being uneasy. The wizard certainly was aware of the likely obstacles he would face when trying to adopt another child, and one as young as that. There was no reluctance over the fact that Marcus was to be adopted – and how could there be, another Parselmouth, not working to adopt him would cause a scandal – but some reservations seemed to be there.

“You’ll stay for dinner, won’t you? Flimm made plans for a delicious meal. He would be disappointed if you decided to go home early. And I wanted to play a game of exploding snap with you, and pull a few crackers. We have quite the selection, even a few I bought in Hogsmeade on the last weekend the students could go.” Harry managed to defuse any lingering tension with his infectious good mood.
Late in the evening after a tasty dinner, Remus and Sirius returned to Grimmauld Place dyed eye-wateringly bright green and pink. Harry had fallen off his chair as the two of them had pulled on the ends of one of the more garishly coloured crackers that had been on the table, he had laughed so hard.

Remus smiled, wishing Sirius a good night. Despite the rocky start, the evening had developed into a pleasant gathering. After this, Remus would be hard pressed to claim that Harry wasn’t happy where he was now. In the light of the happiness he had seen today, he had to forget the past and his own doubts about Lord Slytherin. Regardless of if the man still aimed for control over magical Britain or not, he obviously had managed to make Harry happy, and that was the most important part in Remus’ eyes.

Tuesday, 26th of December - Boxing Day

It had taken some time – as he had expected – but now it was finally here: the first of the letters in answer to his inquiry. Asking all the schools of magic teaching in French after current and past students had felt like the most obvious thing to do.

His father would have taken the same actions. And considering that he had been a successful private investigator until his recent retirement, Sam felt following his dad’s example and asking magical schools was the best way to proceed. The structures didn’t differ all that much between worlds, and people were essentially the same everywhere. It really didn’t have that big an influence on how to proceed if he was working in the magical world or in the muggle one.

With a quick stroke of a quill he marked Beauxbatons as answered on his list, before he broke the seal – the two crossed wands each shooting three stars – and unfolded the letter.

Cher Monsieur Jacobs,

Suite à votre lettre datée du 22 dernier, je vous informe de nous n’avons pas l’habitude à répondre à ce genre de demande de renseignements concernant des mineurs, qu’ils soient ou non élèves dans notre établissement.

Cependant, je peux vous informer que la dernière Olivienne Moreau qui soit sortie diplômée de notre vénérable institution l’a été en 1785. Par conséquent, il semble plus que probable que cette dernière n’est pas la personne que vous recherchez.

En espérant que vous réussirez dans votre quête.

Sam snorted. On the one hand he approved of the policy to give no comment on students, or minors in general, but on the other hand it would make his job harder. If the other schools had similar policies in place, he would be reduced to finding the mother. And it was a real possibility that she was a Muggle, that her children were muggles as well. He wasn’t sure what Lord Black would do in that case, but that wasn’t really his problem. He only had to find them.

Once again cursing the lack of a registration system in Britain, Sam started to write templates in several languages, to send to different offices all around Europe to ask for information on an Olivienne Moreau, born on the 10th of July in 1951. There had to be a certificate of birth somewhere.

He planned to post some small ads in newspapers all around London for information on her from back in early 1980. Then he would have set everything in motion that might bring him the information he would need to wait for, giving him some time to gather information on reasons why someone might have come to London in early 1980.

If she simply had been a tourist it would be harder, but it might be that she had been there to speak at a conference, or just attend one. Maybe she had studied in London, or one of the other reputable universities in England. There were almost endless possibilities. Sam really hoped that one of his letters would yield a result, otherwise it would get tedious pretty fast.

With a sigh he turned to his letters. Better to get them out of the way.

After a morning filled with homework and the writing of thank-you-notes because he had spent the day before reading in his new books, Harry now stood – in his new colour-combined formal family robes – next to Marvolo in the reception room of Potter Manor, greeting all those many guests. Neville and his grandmother had already arrived, and several people working in high positions at the Ministry – the man who had taken over the department of International Cooperation after Barty Crouch Senior’s death, for example – Lord Lestrange and other Death Eaters… it was a daunting and tiring task.

When the Malfoy family came in, Draco smirked when he stepped up to Harry. “How are you adapting to all the new things?” The light teasing tone prompted Harry to roll his eyes at the blond. “I’m managing,” Harry answered in a deadpan tone. “At least today no one will turn up dressed like a cake.” They all had had a hard time keeping from rolling on the floor in laughter when Astoria had spotted that particular costume.

Draco snorted, subtly tugging at his sleeves to make sure his blue robes were settled correctly. “Not setting a theme helps with that, Harry. I’ll see you later.” Quickly following his parents, Draco vanished from Harry’s line of sight, and the teenager – once again with somewhat tamed hair – turned to the next family, the Notts, including Aiden who looked around with open curiosity. While Harry went through the motions of greeting a Lord and member of the Wizengamot, he cast glances around the room they were currently in. Aiden’s awe was well deserved. Flimm and his friends had outdone themselves. Every horizontal surface was covered in fluffy, white, sparkling stuff that impersonated snow quite successfully, and that without being cold. Several places were sporting icicles, adding another bit of sparkle into the mix. The windows had been charmed to sport patterns of ice resembling flowers, and small snowdrifts were building up in the corners of the rooms. All in all, the theme throughout the rooms was winter, snow, and frost.

When the Greengrass family arrived – including the younger brother of Daphne’s father – Harry perked up. He would be allowed to go now, as Daphne was his date and it wasn’t appropriate for her to join the reception line. That only would happen if they were married, or at least engaged to be married soon.

Some rules could work in Harry’s favour. He just needed to know them all.

With a nod for Marvolo, Harry offered Daphne his arm, falling into step with the other members of her family.

“How have you managed your first few big gatherings so far, heir Slytherin-Potter?” Lord Greengrass wanted to know, keeping the conversation on safe ground.

With a smile Harry quickly composed an equally empty but polite answer, hoping fervently that he would be able to slip away soon to play host to all the teenagers who had come with their parents.

ooOoo

Marvolo watched with a small smile as Henry walked away with the oldest Greengrass girl and her family. They seemed to have formed a friendship over the few months of school since September, a fact that filled Marvolo with something resembling happiness. He felt better with Henry having a few Slytherin friends in addition to all those Gryffindors. It would help the teenager grow up with better connections and a well-rounded character.

The next group of guests quickly demanded Marvolo’s attention, and they and those that followed quickly made Marvolo realize that the fact he was standing here alone with Henry gone to be host to the younger guests, only put emphasis on the fact that he wasn’t married.

Considering he was planning to adopt another child, one so much younger than Henry had been, the expectations of the whole of their community were looming even more menacingly over him.

The looks he got from a few wizards and witches didn’t help him to feel better. He would have to make a decision soon. And he still felt torn.

The arrival of the Minister and Madame Bones gave him a reason to banish that problem into the deep recesses of his mind. Now wasn’t the time to search for a solution to that particular problem.

“Cornelius, Madame Bones! Welcome to Potter Manor!” Marvolo bowed before the Head of the Department of Magical Law Enforcement before he turned to the Minister to shake the smiling wizard’s hand.

“Marvolo, Marvolo, this is such a nice evening for a ball like this. And I like what you have done here as decoration! But that you, dear Amelia, still insist on Marvolo calling you by your last name... why this formality?” While the Minister lamented their continued formality, Marvolo met Madame Bones’ eyes and they acknowledged the fact that even though they had fought together against a common foe, the formidable woman didn’t deem him deserving of her trust.

“I’m sure, Cornelius, that Madame Bones and I are more than able to decide when, and if, we want to interact with each other on more familiar terms.” Marvolo could clearly see that the Minister accepted his words, but didn’t put much stock in what might be the reason for the tension between the two of them.

Not many arrived after the Minister, but Marvolo had trouble hiding a grin when Xerxes came through the floo, bringing along the mother of his heiress, only to be followed by said girl and her father. “Xerxes! Miss Granger, Doctor and Doctor Granger. Welcome to Potter Manor.” The two muggles looked splendid in their robes, and Marvolo was happy that he had agreed to invite them.

He was pretty sure Miss Granger had started the whole thing, asking Henry to offer her parents this opportunity. After carefully deliberating what the reactions might be, Marvolo had agreed. It was an attempt to help Heiress Lestrange to get more deeply involved with magical society by making it possible for her to share more of her life with her parents.

“Lord Slytherin,” Mr. Granger said, executing a perfect bow. “I want to thank you for the invitation. My wife and I are delighted to be able to experience this part of our daughter’s world with her.” They exchanged some more pleasantries and soon Marvolo could follow the others and enter the ballroom.

A few dances into the evening, Marvolo had decided on a course of action. He needed to marry for more than one reason. First to get rid of all the unwanted attention now heaped upon him by those seeking a way to advance in the world, and second to secure their – Henry’s and his – situation and claim on adopting Marcus. The second reason was much more important than the first, of course.

But as he now was pretty sure that he never would be interested in a sexual relationship with anyone – regardless of who that other was, or were – he needed to make sure to find the right person. Maybe he should try to make contact with those living up to the imposed expectations, but who secretly followed their true desires. It was possible that he might find someone – witch or wizard – who felt the same as he and would be happy to find someone to spend their life with in platonic harmony.

Of course he needed to take his time, and speak with Henry about this. It was much more important to keep their home in balance than to get matchmaking mothers off his back. There were still so many days to the new year and the end of the season of excessive gatherings. With a sigh Marvolo walked to the next group of people, bracing himself for more conversation and a few more dances.

If it hadn’t been so sad, he would have laughed over his longing for an evening in his study taking care of paperwork.

Outside of the manor, and outside the wards, the ground was covered in real frost and snow, branches groaning under the weight of snow and frozen water. From a perch high up in one of the sturdier oaks, Fenrir inspected what he could see of the brightly illuminated windows. The binoculars he had brought allowed him to watch the witches and wizards in their fancy robes, made for no other purpose than to boast, dance to music he wasn’t able to hear from where he was sitting. The only sounds he could make out were the wind in the plants all around, a few small animals scurrying around, or sleeping nearby. When he suddenly heard the sound of careful steps on frozen leaves he shrunk his binoculars, placed them in his trouser pocket and started his descent back to the ground.

“Report!” Fenrir demanded in a whisper from the sentinel who had returned from his foray near Potter Manor.

“No people outside the house. Couldn’t find a breach in the wards. No way that we can get in there without making them all run.” Several low growls of displeasure followed that proclamation. Fenrir’s among them.

It had been a long shot to come here today. After their relatively successful invasion of the Bones party, it had been to be expected that the Dark Lord would not make the same errors. The fact that the weather wasn’t all that pleasant, with the wind howling now and again, only helped in not looking paranoid.

“Retreat. Get back home. I’ll inform you of our next steps,” Fenrir barked out over another gust of wind. The few wolves still loyal to him nodded their acceptance and made their way home.

Fenrir stayed a few more moments before he too took his leave. Another failure. He would need to have a success soon, or the last of his people would run away to the continent. With a mood as dark as the clouds chased over the sky by the fierce wind, Fenrir made his way home.

Translation of the letter:

Dear Mr. Jacobs,

We write this letter in response to your inquiry from the 22nd of this month. It is in general our policy never to answer requests concerning minors and if they are students at our institution or not.

But we are able to inform you that the last Olivienne Moreau graduated from our esteemed institution in 1785. It seems reasonable to assume that this alumna isn’t the person you are looking for.

In the hopes that you will manage to find who you are searching for

Deputy Headmistress Lucille Dumont
A few months before Christmas I still thought it might happen that this chapter would be published on or near Christmas. Well there was snow today, so it fits at least a little ;)

I have written a short three chapter sketch of a story beginning and already published the first chapter. The “story” is called One Night Stand. I don't plan to go further than the beginning for now. First I will finish this epic of a story ;)

Take a look and tell me what you think!

Thanks to DiagonAlleyParis for the help with the French version of the letter.

Thanks to Jordre and Jake for helping to improve my spelling!

First published on the 30th of March 2018
Next chapter planned for 13th of April 2018

With a groan Harry stepped out of his shower to towel himself dry. Apparently standing around, walking, and dancing used muscles flying on a broom didn't, because he was stiff all over. The hot shower had helped, and it was likely that Marvolo would have a muscle relaxant potion at hand, which would take care of all the rest of the tension.

That thought stopped Harry in the door from his bath to his bedroom, momentarily dumbfounded. When had magic become so normal? Before this he would just have lived with the small aches. He had done that thousands of times after a hard day tending to the garden at Privet Drive. Living with magic constantly around him and so casually used – outside of a classroom setting – seemed to be having a slow effect on his perception of it.

As there was no function Harry needed to attend today, he slipped into one of his simpler trousers, and tossed on a sweater, and a casual robe.

A few steps brought him to the easel standing next to his desk. Harry carefully removed the cover to take a look at what he had done so far. The painting looked good, even a day later. So Harry guessed he had managed to finish it in time to give it to Marvolo on the man's birthday.

Once he had covered the painting, Harry strode from the room, a big smile on his face. Today was the day he would visit the Burrow and Ron.

As usual, Marvolo was already seated at the table, reading the paper, a cup with steaming tea standing right on top of his plate.

"Good morning!" Harry yawned. When one was host of an event, there was no way to leave early. It had been a late night.

"Good morning, Henry," Marvolo greeted with a slightly distracted tone.

"Anything interesting?" Harry sat down, smiled as a fresh cup of coffee appeared next to his plate, and started to place his favourite foods on his plate. He quickly downed the nutrition potion – hopefully he would be rid of that soon – and started to eat.

"Nothing new. But I hadn't expected anything interesting. I hope you remember that Healer Greengrass will be here after breakfast. He needs to repeat the diagnostics to see if you still need to take the nutrition potion."

Harry groaned. He had totally forgotten about that. "But that will take ages." Harry knew he was whining, but he didn't really care. He couldn't go over to the Burrow and meet with Ron when he had to sit still and wait while the myriad of diagnostic spells was cast.

Marvolo chuckled. "The ritual wouldn't take as much time. You're the one who decided to insist on charms for the diagnostics, Henry."

Harry frowned. He remembered that conversation. A ritual that was quicker than the method currently used by the Healers in St. Mungo's. And as far as he now understood, the only reason the ritual wasn't taught anymore was because rituals were considered conspicuous. Too close to the dangerous magics that were forbidden to be used comfortably. Most patients wouldn't consent to be part of a ritual when there was another way.

Harry had taken part in a ritual for Aiden's adoption, he had been part of the ritual to check if he was a horcrux. He would be part of another one to remove Marvolo's soul fragment from him.

Would it be really that bad? And it would be quicker, making it possible for him to go over to the Weasleys' earlier.

"Can you explain the diagnostic ritual to me?" Harry didn't look in Marvolo's direction but busied himself with buttering a slice of toast. It was hard to admit – however indirectly – that he might have been wrong in the summer to reject the diagnostic ritual. And on the other hand, he couldn't have known then what he knew now.

"I'm no expert on healing magic, or healing rituals. But Malcolm surely will be happy to explain whatever you want to know." Marvolo didn't look in Harry's direction – Harry peeked to make sure – feigning interest in an article of the Daily Prophet.

Harry was grateful that Marvolo had such a good sense of situations and was willing to make it easy for Harry to change his mind. Someone like Draco, or Snape – or rather the way they had been before Harry had been adopted – would have rubbed it in. Gloating wasn't the best tactic for such a thing. Marvolo was a really good politician, something that Harry needed to learn, but at the same time the older wizard was willing to tell Harry the truth, something he really appreciated.

ooOoo

Malcolm had brought his complete healer's bag at his Lord's insistence. And now that he was explaining the ritual to his Lord's heir, he was glad that he had done so.

The boy was listening attentively and looked as if he would accept the ritual, because he wanted to cut down on the time he would need to spend here. Wishing to be with his friends seemed to be a good motivator to reassess his prejudices.

"Any more questions, heir Slytherin-Potter?" Malcolm waited patiently, watching thoughts racing behind those green eyes, hidden behind those glasses that could be superfluous if the boy just would be willing to take the potion to correct his vision.

But the Dark Lord had made it clear that his adopted son was the one in charge of decisions concerning his own body if there was no inevitable reason that action was needed. An approach which seemed to be working so far.

While the teenager vanished behind a screen to change into the white linen tunic, Malcolm started getting out his supplies, and setting up what he could before his patient was in place in the middle of the circle to be set up.

"Please lie there." Malcolm indicated the padded-table-like piece of furniture he had brought and unshrunk in the middle of the small room they were using.
The teen walked over barefooted, sat down, and then carefully maneuvered himself into a lying position, looking positively awkward.

With careful hands Malcolm removed the glasses from the teenager's nose, internally rolling his eyes that the boy still insisted on wearing them when there was such an easy way to get rid of them for good. After that he started with the ritual.

While chanting the words – sounding remarkably like old Gaelic, which he didn't speak one word of – that repeated after a few verses, Malcolm carefully took one rune stone after another and placed them on the body resting before him. One went to the middle of the forehead, one right over the heart. Another two he placed onto the hands which were turned palms up. Placing three rune stones on each leg was not as easy, as balancing them wasn't simple there. Malcolm carefully kept to the order needed, and kept pace, coordinating placing the stones with the words he was speaking.

When he moved on to placing the candles around the teenager, the boy was breathing deeply, as if in sleep. Earlier this year such a situation hardly would have been possible. The boy had been much too suspicious to relax that far in Malcolm's care.

Carefully lighting the candles placed in a circle around the table, Malcolm walked in measured steps until he reached the place where he had started, right next to a small stone table with a piece of parchment and a never-empty quill set up ready to be used.

The last step was to link the ritual with a quill and parchment to record what was about to be discovered. With a few precise gestures Malcolm did just that, and then sat down on a stool monitoring the procedure.

It wouldn't take long, but as his Master during his time training to be a healer had always said, one couldn't leave a patient unsupervised even when conducting a ritual that had been done a thousand times. There always was the chance that something unexpected might happen. Life and magic were just unpredictable like that.

While he watched the quill moving over the parchment, Malcolm contemplated that in the earliest version, the patient would have been totally unclothed, and the runes would have been drawn onto their skin with some paints created in a painstakingly complicated process. Studying the history of healing was always entertaining, and interesting at the same time. Despite his fascination for the history of his craft, Malcolm was happy that some things had changed and developed. Most patients nowadays would be much too embarrassed to get totally nude, even for their healer.

"We are finished. Please don't move while I dismantle the circle." The candles were quickly extinguished, the stones quickly gathered. It was obvious that the boy was no longer in a trance, as green eyes watched every move Malcolm made.

Once the last stone had been removed and placed back in the small velvet pouch the teenager sat up. "What's the verdict?" There was worry, curiosity, and apprehension mixed in that gaze.

"Let me have a look." Malcolm snatched up the parchment and looked at the runes scribbled onto the parchment. Learning to read those had been the hardest part of learning this ritual. "It looks like all those old breaks are doing rather well. Since we set them straight, the bones have continued to get stronger. The damage done by poor nutrition over a long time has been mostly removed as well. I think we can give up the nutrition and healing potions. But we'll have to check again in a few months, and I will give you instructions as to what you should eat. The house-elves at Hogwarts are accommodating when it comes to making sure the students get what they need."
"Is that why there are never any nuts near where Fay Dunbar sits at the Gryffindor table? She's allergic to them, as far as I know," the young man butted in, sounding curious, visibly cheered by the verdict, as he had called it.

Malcolm nodded. "It is indeed." With another glance at the parchment, he came to the conclusion that his patient was in pretty good health, all things considered. "Besides your eyesight, there's nothing else that would need addressing at this point in time. Have you any questions for me, heir Slytherin-Potter?"

Much too quickly to be believable, the boy shook his head, and scurried away to return behind the screen when Malcolm answered to that with a friendly, "If that's the case, you can dress. I'll search out your father to relay the news."

Without waiting for the boy to be finished with dressing, Malcolm packed the last things into his bag before leaving the room, closing the door behind himself with an almost inaudible click. The Dark Lord would be happy to hear that his son had agreed to the ritual and that it had shown that their efforts in healing the boy had borne fruit.

Being able to help one of his patients always left Malcolm with a content feeling of accomplishment. For once he didn't feel even a thread of dread while walking to meet with the Dark Lord.

"You have your portkey? And you know when to be back?" Marvolo felt nervous for reasons he couldn't really pin down. Why ever should he be nervous about sending his son over to a day visiting with friends? Henry had been over to the Burrow more than once, had stayed part of his holidays there. They even had allowed Marvolo onto their property for Henry's birthday party. All evidence pointed to the fact that Henry would be safe with his friends.

So why was he so nervous?

"Yes, Mum," the word was heavy with sarcasm, but for some unfathomable reason, it made Marvolo's heart stutter. "I have everything and know when to be back. I'm not venturing out into the Forbidden Forest. I'm only visiting with friends."

Marvolo swallowed and applauded himself silently in his own mind for the fact that his answer came out sounding perfectly normal. "Then don't forget the presents for your hosts, and make sure to be home on time. Have fun and extend my thanks to Mr. and Mrs. Weasley. Off you go!"

With a grin Henry snatched up the two presents and moved over to the floo, where he struggled a moment with the items until he had a hand free to reach for the floo powder.

ooOoo

With a bouquet of flowers, an expensive bottle of wine, and the distinct feeling of being ridiculous, Harry used the floo to go over to the Burrow.

He still was a little bemused over Marvolo's behaviour, when he stepped out of the fireplace to come to stand in the warm and cozy home of the Weasley clan.

"Harry, dear, please come in!" Mrs. Weasley bustled in from the kitchen a warm, welcoming smile on her face. "Kids! Harry's here!" She bellowed into the room, sure to alert everyone up to the attic about Harry's arrival.
Before the motherly witch could get a hold of Harry to smother him with a hug, Harry thrust the presents towards her. He had no desire to be squashed alongside a bunch of flowers and a bottle of wine. "Thank you for your hospitality. I hope your family had a nice Christmas."

"Why, thank you, Harry. We had a great time. All kids home for Christmas. It doesn't happen nearly often enough, now that Bill and Charlie are all grown up and out of the house!" She accepted both gifts and moved her nose over the bouquet, breathing deeply. "What lovely flowers! Go on up. Ron's probably still in his room, sleeping. You can go wake him."

Before Harry had a chance to react to her suggestion, Mrs. Weasley had already left for the kitchen, murmuring something about finding a vase to place the flowers in.

With a shrug Harry turned to the stairs and started to walk up their creaking length and past the rooms of the others. The twins' door was closed, a sign warning not to enter and the sounds coming from behind the door convincing Harry that he could greet the twins at a later time. The other rooms he came across were either empty, or had the doors closed, so Harry couldn't be sure if someone was inside. When he finally reached Ron's room, the snoring coming from inside made him grin. Ron obviously was taking advantage of the opportunity to sleep in over the holidays.

Quickly opening the door so it slammed into the wall covered in quidditch posters of the Chudley Cannons, Harry strode into the room with heavy steps, calling out in a cheerful tone, "Wake up, Ron. Come on, it's time to eat!"

A low unhappy growling sound came from the mound of blankets that were hiding Ron on his bed. Harry laughed and picked his way through the stuff littering the room's floor. It was a good thing house-elves cleaned the student's dormitories, otherwise there would be a lot of accidents due to students tripping over the stuff on the floor.

"Come on, Ron. I'm sure you don't want to miss out on the breakfast your mother is keeping warm in the kitchen." Harry felt a grin stretch his face, and his good humour was easily noticed in the teasing tone of his voice.

"Harry?" a bleary-eyed Ron sat up, peeking up from just beneath his blanket. "You're early."

Harry laughed. "I don't think so. Even had a healer appointment before I came here. No, you're sleeping in late."

Harry could pinpoint the moment when the realization that Harry was there had made it through the haze of sleep to Ron's mind. Suddenly his friend was awake, bolting out of bed, searching the floor for clothes.

"Did you bring a warm robe? We could go flying. I'm sure you can borrow a broom from one of my brothers. You know they're all here? It's sad that you have so many stuffy parties to go to."

With a permanent grin on his face, Harry listened to his friend prattling on while he searched for something to wear, putting the articles of clothing on as he found them. It felt almost the same as before Harry had been adopted by someone Ron couldn't stand. Maybe the rocky parts of the way were behind them.

They made their way down to the kitchen together, tossing ideas for the day back and forth, when Ginny stepped out of her room, just to stop in her tracks the moment she saw them on their way to breakfast.

"Good morning, Ginny," Harry greeted with a smile, and then frowned when the red-headed girl turned on her heel, walked back into her room, and closed the door with some force.

Bewildered, Harry turned to his friend, who only shrugged. "Don't ask me, mate. I don't understand girls. But she's been in a tiff for some time now. No idea what happened. The last time she was this morose, the twins had sheared the hair of her favourite doll completely off. Mum magicked it back, of course, but she was plotting revenge for a while."

Seeing that his friend didn't want to discuss his sister and her strange behaviour, Harry let the topic drop.

Did Ginny still fancy him? He dearly hoped not. Even though he had noticed girls with a much greater frequency, his friend's little sister didn't make the list. She was pretty – there was no doubt about that – and he was fond of her. But more like she was his sister as well, not like he wanted to take her on a date. Cho Chang – the Ravenclaw seeker – was of greater interest to him, or even Daphne. Even though it couldn't lead to anything serious between them, she had appeared a few times in his vague and confusing dreams.

A few of those charms from the book Marvolo had given him for his birthday, and which had made its rounds through the dorm by now, really came in handy when he was woken by some of those dreams. It would be too embarrassing to get out of bed to clean himself up. Even with a room to himself.

"Harry! How nice that you could come! Let that sluggard eat, we want to show you something." The twins had come down too, looking excited, both obviously eager to talk to their silent partner.

A quick glance at Ron assured that his friend had no problem with Harry talking to Fred and George while he devoted all his attention to his breakfast of scrambled eggs, hash browns, sausages and grilled vegetables. So Harry followed the twins over to a corner of the living room where Mrs. Weasley wasn't likely to spot them and sat down.

"The logo you sketched for us is great, Harry. We've been searching for something like this for a while. Look, we made a few packaging mockups, have changed a few of our older designs. What do you think?" Pieces of cardboard, parchment, and even a few boxes were pulled from various pockets and held in Harry's direction.

The colours were glaringly bright, but as all the stuff was prank material for children, that was exactly the right choice. Soon they were deep into a discussion over what the best packagings would be, and what they needed to include in warnings on the outside. Harry laughed and soon had forgotten all about Ginny's strange behaviour.

ooOoo

On his way back from the loo and to the kitchen, where they had commandeered the table to build a card house from several decks of Exploding Snap cards, Harry suddenly found himself cornered by Ginny.

An angry-looking Ginny, her eyes sparking dangerously.

While he tried to keep a calm and friendly façade, Harry's mind was furiously going over all their interactions in recent times to find the reason for her anger. But he came up blank.

"Can I help you?" He needed to remind himself that he was capable of defending himself, but the fact that she was really good with some of the nastier hexes they had trained with in the defence club made it harder not to flee to where the others would be witnessing their discussion.
"How could you ask a Slytherin girl to those balls? You could have asked me! I would have loved to spend more time with you. Vicky and Isobel were sure you would at least invite me to the Ball at Potter Manor!" She clearly was distraught and angry, sweeping gestures only accentuating her obvious agitation. "Am I too poor for you all of a sudden? Vicky explained that you clearly had to be careful to not make my older brothers angry at you. They are very protective. And the way you dismissed Romilda made clear that younger girls aren't interesting for you. But how could you ask that Slytherin ice princess bitch?"

Well, it seemed as if those two girls – Vicky and Isobel – had fanned the flames of the crush Harry had hoped was finally dying back into a roaring flame. That was an awkward situation he now was in. He needed to make clear that Ginny probably never would be his girlfriend – or even more – but without hurting her feelings. She was still the little sister of Ron, and the twins. And despite that crush, he liked her.

"First, Daphne asked me, not I her. And I had dancing lessons with her this summer. Going through all those events with the pressure to make a good first impression on the whole society… I'm happy she's there to help me navigate all the possible pitfalls. And if she hadn't asked me, I probably would have asked Hermione." Harry took a quick breath, eager to continue to speak before Ginny could start on an even longer rant. Once she got going, it was almost impossible to stop her. "I like you, Ginny. But only like a sister, nothing more. And there is no other reason to that than the fact that I just feel for you what I feel for Hermione. Where she is like an older sister, constantly nagging at me to study more, you're like the little sister one can play quidditch with. I know neither Vicky nor Isobel, so how did you come to the conclusion that they would be able to interpret my feelings?" Ginny's face was assuming a steadily darker expression and Harry felt his heart beating faster and faster. "I hope nothing I did projected an illusion of feelings I've never held. You're a beautiful, intelligent witch, Ginny, but I would never date my sister."

Before Harry could make the situation any worse – why was speaking with furious witches not part of his training? – Ron's head poked around the corner into the corridor the two of them were standing in. "Harry, what's taking you so long? Hermione and Luna arrived just a moment ago, and we want to start building. Do you want to take part too, Ginny?"

It was a miracle to Harry that Ron hadn't heard a word of what his sister and friend had been speaking about, because Ron simply wasn't that good an actor.

Harry had just turned to answer Ron in the affirmative, when Ginny huffed and stormed away. The eyes of both boys met and with two shrugs of confusion they moved to the kitchen where Harry greeted both Hermione and Luna with warm hugs. He felt really happy about seeing Luna here so unexpectedly. She always was a refreshing presence with her unique outlook on the world.

The laughter and sounds of explosions soon filled the kitchen, while the older Weasleys were sitting over in the living room talking. It was a nice morning, and when Mrs. Weasley came into the kitchen to banish them so she could prepare lunch, they went outside to play with the snow and to fly around the trees in the orchard. Not one of them had seen even a glimpse of Ginny, and Harry was glad to be able to avoid this particular mess for a little longer.

Wearing some of his best robes, Marvolo confidently walked through the Ministry, the crowds parting before him as Moses allegedly had parted the Red Sea. It was a curious thing when one of those seemingly long-forgotten titbits of muggle sayings and metaphors made a re-appearance. Was there a story in the wizarding myths that had a similar setting? Someone parting a body of water for their people? Maybe he would find an opportunity to research it… later. Because if there was, the possibility of it really happening in some fashion would be more likely.

Smirking to himself, Marvolo shook his head. He was in a curious mood. Elated over the progress that had made Henry accept the ritual for diagnostic purposes, and nervous over the prospect of seeking the adoption of young Marcus. Xerxes had relayed that the boy rarely was seen without his snake plushie since he had received it at Christmas and that the boy often asked one of the caretakers to read him a story from his book. But it was hard to find a few hours to spend with the child in the packed schedule of the holiday season.

Reaching the door of Mrs. Wisby's office, Marvolo knocked decisively. A sunny "Come in!" was his answer. This woman was really extraordinary cheerful. In a way it was refreshing to see someone smiling so happily who was old enough to have suffered under the war he had started and remember it clearly to this day.

Pasting a smile on his face – he needed a holiday from all the festivities – Marvolo opened the door and stepped into the chaotic office. "Mrs. Wisby, hello. I hope that you can spare a moment of your time for a request I have."

"Lord Slytherin!" She quickly stood from her chair, a smile on her face, both hands extended in his direction in greeting. "How nice to see you!" Quickly a worried frown settled on her face. "There's nothing wrong with the adoption, is there?"

Sensing a long, worried rant starting, Marvolo quickly shook his head with a reassuring smile. "No, don't worry, Henry is fine and there's nothing wrong with his adoption. In fact, I'm here because we have come across another member of our scattered family whom we wish to take care of."

"Lord Slytherin!" She quickly stood from her chair, a smile on her face, both hands extended in his direction in greeting. "How nice to see you!" Quickly a worried frown settled on her face. "There's nothing wrong with the adoption, is there?"

Sensing a long, worried rant starting, Marvolo quickly shook his head with a reassuring smile. "No, don't worry, Henry is fine and there's nothing wrong with his adoption. In fact, I'm here because we have come across another member of our scattered family whom we wish to take care of."

And as quick as lightning the blinding smile was back on Mrs. Wisby's face. "Oh, that's wonderful! In that school that Lord Lestrange founded last autumn? I have to say I love the idea, but it caused quite a stir in the Departments having any connections to families, inheritance, and the like."

Marvolo watched, mesmerized, as the witch walked around the office, expertly dodging the many piles without so much as stirring a single piece of parchment. He briefly wondered if shifting one of the piles even a fraction of an inch to the side would be enough to trip her up.

He didn't pay all that much attention to her prattling on about the different happy stories of families coming back together, when a sudden shift in her tone and body language made him snap out of his musings. "Oh, I almost forgot. The change in procedure is so recent... We'll need to make sure the child really has the family gift, and there needs to be an evaluation that the child will be well with you..." Mrs. Wisby clearly was flustered and confused, not used to following a new procedure after long years of doing things one specific way.

"How did that come to be?" Marvolo tried for curious, but at ease. He had his suspicions that the fact he had managed to adopt Harry Potter had caused this drastic shift in policy, but didn't want to give himself away so easily.

"Adoptions weren't all that common in the past. Well, with the exception of war orphans going to close family. But with Lord Lestrange getting the magical children without proper family that lived with muggles into our community, the demand was expected to go up." She wandered over to a table to the side stacked with several books, lose parchment, and scrolls. "So the normal process came under scrutiny. And someone aware of how the muggles do things like this, pointed out that we had no methods to decide who would get custody if more than one family wanted to claim a child without as obvious a proof as a well-known family gift. Or to be sure that the family taking in the child would treat them well. I fear I'm not yet familiar with all the details." She started to pick through the paperwork on the desk, clearly in search for something specific.
It made sense to change the procedure for adoption. Memories of situations came to Marvolo's mind, scenes of yelling matches between Tobias Snape and his wife Eileen, a small boy running to hide from his father. Scenes of a small boy watching how his mother Walburga punished his bigger brother for daring to be sorted anywhere but Slytherin. Some parents didn't even manage to treat their own children with decency. Making sure a child going to a new family would be treated well seemed like the right thing to do.

In theory it was a good idea, but it was inconvenient. In fact, such measures hadn't been enacted till now because all those who might pass a measure like this thought the same. One day such rules might get in their way, so they all preferred the rules missing. The fact that someone had made sure to enact them now meant only one thing: someone had more to gain by making adoptions harder than by leaving the rules lax, ensuring fewer problems in the future if they should wish to adopt at a later time.

But who would gain from that? He would alert Xerxes, Lucius and the others to those changes. They had been enacted so quietly that they all had missed their addition. They would have to reassess their plans in light of those changes.

Only one thing was relatively certain. The Headmaster hadn't had anything to do with this. Severus' reports had indicated that the Headmaster had concentrated on getting Henry back under his influence. The old man hadn't the interest to care about other children, his past clearly showed how little the Headmaster really cared about the individual needs of his students.

There was nothing for it: he would need to go along with this new set of rules. At least in the open, his current persona wouldn't permit anything else. "Well, then I guess we'll need to figure things out together. Won't we?"

Mrs. Wisby smiled, exclaiming in joy, "There it is!" when she found what she had been searching for, and walked back over to her desk. "There are two separate things that need to be done, proving that the child you wish to adopt really is a part of your family, and passing the evaluation."

Marvolo slowly nodded and got his wand out. With a casual flick he had conjured himself a nice stool to sit on – there really wasn't enough space for anything else – and sat down so he could speak with Mrs. Wisby more comfortably. "And to whom do I need to prove that I'm a decent parent and that Marcus is a member of the Slytherin family?"

A bemused look came to her face. "I'm not sure."

Marvolo groaned inwardly. It was a good thing Henry was with his friends today. This might take a while.

oooOOooo

He had managed to gather quite the force. Not all of them were werewolves, but they all were unhappy with Lord Slytherin and the man's actions. He had hoped to wait for the next full moon, but he just knew that it would be too late by that point.

So here they were.

The silhouette of the patched-up house against the sky with the barely visible waxing moon clearly marked their target. It wasn't as close as he had wished to strike, but the Weasley family were a well known fixture in Harry Potter's life and therefore as close to Lord Slytherin as he could manage in the time he had and with the resources at his disposal.
"I'll break the wards. Stevens, take those good at offensive spells and place them around the perimeter. Keep an eye on the windows and the doors. If they try to flee or get too close to one of those, target them. No prisoners! Kill them all." He turned to the smaller group holding beater-bats, knives, and other weapons of that kind. "Make sure to attack everyone who comes close enough. Get them down, take their wands, kill them. Any more questions?"

Shuffling and shaking heads were his only answer. Fenrir nodded. "You'll see when the wards fall, or someone comes out of the house. That's the signal to start attacking. Go!"

ooOoo

Harry and Luna stood outside of the Burrow near some of the trees in the orchard, looking on an enchanting sight. Before they had gone inside for tea, they had left various fruits – dried cherries, fresh apples and pears – out there as an offering to the fairies, and it had worked. Now the air above the fruits was filled with the high pitched chattering of fairies.

Harry wasn't sure if one could call it chattering when the beings didn't actually speak, but it sure sounded the same as a conversation between humans did if you were far enough away not to be able to make out any actual words.

"Aren't they pretty?" Luna asked in a dreamy voice, rubbing her arms under her pretty but rather thin cloak.

"Yes, they make interesting patterns when they're quarrelling about which of them get to eat the cherries. It looks as if those are their favourites, don't you think?" They had made their escape when Fred and George had pulled a prank on Ginny, turning her hair and skin a glaring shade of purple.

With a frown, Harry watched Luna shiver in the cold, for a moment distracted from the colourful and lively display of the little winged creatures. "Come, we can share my cloak," he offered, already opening the fastenings. The cloak was made out of an excess amount of warm silken-velvet fabric, covered in embroidery of different kinds of leaves.

"Thank you, Harry. That's a good idea. Did you know that sharing warmth can save your life when two or more people are snowed in and have to survive in a hollow dug into a snow-drift?"

Blinking at the cheerful manner she shared this observation, Harry slung his cloak over her shoulders, placing his arm around her so the fabric would stay put. It was really nice standing so close to her. And it had been a good idea: he could feel her shivering. Hopefully now they could stay a little while longer. With the moon getting bigger, the light wasn't blinding, reflected from the snow, but cast everything in a nice glow.

They stood there in companionable silence when something caught Harry's attention. Startled, and with his hand on his wand, Harry turned his head slightly. Had there been someone? It had been too big to have been a bird, or a fairy. He suddenly felt on edge, looking around carefully. It felt a little like when Dudley and his gang had crept up on him in breaks at school.

"I think there are people walking along the edge of the wards," Luna suddenly said, without taking her eyes off the dancing fairies, her tone free of any worry. She simply was stating a fact. Sometimes her quirks baffled Harry. Hermione wouldn't have sounded as calm, she would have been intense, or would sound urgent when there was a possible threat near.

"I think we should go back inside. Warn the others," Harry stated, trying to stay as calm as Luna. If there truly was danger near, they shouldn't alert whoever was out there to the fact they had been spotted. It would give them an advantage.

Strolling back to the house, unhurried and arm in arm, still sharing a cloak, Luna and Harry took their time. But Harry was tense, his wand in his hand, ready to cast a shield should something head their way. Even now, with the threat of Voldemort gone, his senses were screaming at him that there was danger. And it always had served him well to heed the warnings his instincts were sending him.

"Harry, Luna, there you are!" They were greeted enthusiastically by Mrs. Weasley once they had stepped into the kitchen. "Want some hot chocolate?" She was grinning at the two of them but Harry really didn't have time to puzzle out her reason for beaming at them. Harry quickly let his cloak fall onto one of the chairs, turning to see if Mr. Weasley was anywhere near.

"We've seen movement around the wards. I think there are people out there, and it doesn't feel as if they have anything good planned." Harry noticed that he was sounding slightly out of breath and maybe a tad hysterical. But he did fear that his and Luna's observation wouldn't be taken seriously.

"Now, Harry, don't be silly." Molly chided. "Are you sure it wasn't just a deer, or maybe a big bird?" Mrs. Weasley had such an indulgent tone, paired with a fond smile, that she seriously confused Harry.

"That was no animal, Mrs. Weasley," Luna said sure of herself, as all the people currently in the house came into the kitchen to hear what was being discussed.

Before the oldest witch present could say more, Bill interrupted her, gaze intent. "Can you tell how many? And where?"

Glad that for once there was an adult actually listening – Marvolo had done a good job of that too, but that wasn't true for most adults in Harry's experience – Harry turned to the curse-breaker to answer the question. "Not sure, it felt like more than three. But we were standing near the orchard, there could be more."

Suddenly the heads of Arthur, Molly, and the two eldest sons snapped up, all looking in the same direction. "Looks like you two are right," Arthur stated getting out his wand, just as the twins, Bill, Charlie, and Mrs. Weasley did the same.

"Everyone up the stairs," Mrs. Weasley directed, clearly only speaking to the younger people present. Hermione followed the instruction the moment it was given, Ron and Ginny looked ready to object, and Harry felt his own Gryffindor side rearing its head. He didn't want to go and hide like a little kid!

"The outer ward is down," Mr. Weasley stated, cold and concentrated, unlike Harry had ever seen him.

"They'll be surprised by the inner wards then," Bill said with a predatory grin that was echoed by his brother Charlie.

Suddenly the light of spells hitting a ward shone through windows of all sides of the house, reflecting off walls so they were visible in the kitchen. That spurred everyone into action.

Quickly Harry and the others were in Ginny's room, where there was a sturdy tree near the house which would allow them an escape route should they need it. Then Mrs. Weasely left again, admonishing them to "Stay here and out of the way!" before closing the door.

Harry didn't like the situation one bit, looking on the worried faces of Ginny, Luna, and Hermione, he felt the need to do something. Anything! But at the same time he knew getting down and into the thick of things wouldn't help. The others were competent, knew more spells than Harry had learned yet, and would be distracted by his presence.

Ron had crept over to the window, carefully casting a look outside. "Looks like the wards are holding up. Bill did a good job." Suddenly a bright flash of light struck those wards just in front of the window, making Ron retreat with a muttered curse.

Looked like the window was no viable way to escape. Hopefully no one was going to set the house on fire.

Then suddenly Harry was struck by an idea. Marvolo. If he were here, they would have a much better chance to overwhelm the attackers. Harry was sure this couldn't be anyone under his adoptive father's command, but everyone willing to attack an entire family was prone to be afraid of him.

Harry gripped his wand tighter and concentrated on a happy memory. The first that came to mind was Marvolo and him sitting next to the Christmas tree unwrapping packages and animatedly speaking about what was revealed. His first proper family Christmas with his very own family. When he spoke the words his Patronus easily shot out of his wand, bounding around the room. When the stag came to a halt in front of Harry, he gave the animal a message for Marvolo, ignoring Hermione berating him for his use of magic outside of school.

"Lay off, Hermione. I think that was a pretty good idea, and no one will berate him for sending a message to get help."

Hermione huffed, annoyed. After that they all sat there, listening anxiously for any and all signs of what was happening outside.

ooOoo

For quite some time now, Marvolo had been using the techniques for meditation and Occlumency to keep calm. After Mrs. Wisby had helped him with filling in the required forms – he had done them once but bureaucracy had a tendency to make no sense and was hard to remember correctly – they had tried to determine which person or department was responsible for the assessment of the family, and the acknowledgement of the family claim. They had even gotten out the actual text of the laws governing adoptions. But the text itself was vague.

Very vague.

It only stated that the government had to make sure that children to be adopted went to close family whenever possible, and that the future guardians needed to be acceptable. Acceptable!

What an easy law to exploit. Because of the vague way the law was worded, there never was Wizengamot involvement when someone decided to change the procedure for an adoption. It was infuriating, and good to know. Maybe he could manage to get someone into a position where the way adoptions were handled came under his own influence.

But currently he was standing on the floor where most of the different divisions of the Department of Magical Law Enforcement were located, listening in while members of different divisions got into a steadily more and more heated discussion.

"I don't see why the Improper Use of Magic Office should oversee adoptions! We make sure no one misuses magic! How does adoption factor into that? The Wizengamot Administration Services oversee all legal matters, they can make sure all proper steps are taken." The wizard speaking for the office monitoring the trace looked smug.

"We might be responsible for court dates, hearings, and things like that, but we never had anything to do with adoptions. That's not something the Wizengamot is ever involved in! Why should we be bogged down with even more work?" The wizard in his ill-fitting robes gave a pointed glare to all standing nearby. "I think the Administrative Registration Department should do this, they are the ones keeping track of our population. They are most likely to know if some kid belongs to one family or the other."

Marvolo rolled his eyes. If this kept up, they never would find a way to make this adoption work.
He really needed to know who had managed to sabotage all and every adoption by this ingenious use of administrative pitfalls. The person either needed to die or be recruited. Maybe ruining their reputation would be enough.

"Just because we have the animagus registration doesn't mean we should keep track of adoptions.
You know that most kids that are adopted either have close family in our community or none at all…" Marvolo looked up from the red faces and angry gestures when he noticed a person stepping into the corridor between the different divisions. Madame Bones was walking towards the escalating discussion, a look of annoyed anger on her face. It looked like one of the Aurors currently on duty had informed her of this… disaster.

When her accusing gaze fell onto Marvolo he held up his hands in an imitation of surrender, shaking his head. He hadn't had anything to do with this. Well, he had asked a question, but that had been all. "I just asked who was conducting the new steps needed in an adoption process. How was I to know that it isn't clear whose job it is?" Marvolo shrugged and kept a smile off his face at the annoyed sigh the formidable witch gave to that.

Before she could start sorting everything out, everyone's attention was drawn by the silvery shine of a patronus breaking through the far wall, heading in their direction.

"That's Henry's patronus." Marvolo murmured suddenly feeling as if he was about to go into battle.
The stag came to a skittish halt in front of Marvolo and his son's voice hastily spoke. "There are wizards attacking the Burrow. Mr. Weasley and four of his sons are fending them off, but there are more than five. I'm pretty sure. We need help." Then the patronus faded from view, its message delivered.

Madame Bones took action on the spot, ordering the Aurors on duty to prepare to defend the House of Arthur Weasley and his family against an unknown number of attackers before turning towards Marvolo where he stood his thoughts whirling. "I guess I can't make you stay behind?" He shook his head. "You can apparate there yourself?" Marvolo managed a nod "Good. I hope there will be no problems regarding chain of command?" There was a challenge in her voice and despite the situation Marvolo felt his lips quirk into a tiny smirk.

"Your people, so you're in charge. If it's all right with you, I'll make sure my son his safe, and support where necessary." He felt a strong desire to call his own people for help, but he had seen that the Aurors were competent, and the only way to call for his Death Eaters was nothing he could do in public.

Without any more unnecessary words, the group departed for the Burrow, all of them ready to step onto a battlefield with an unknown number of hostile magicals attacking a house with children.
The moment Marvolo landed a few paces away from the wardline around the Burrow – seeing spellfire flying towards the oddly shaped house, just hearing the shout of "Ministry lackeys!" from somewhere – he knew he was out of his depth. He preferred responding to reacting to a situation, and he simply never had made plans for a situation close to this. Attacking houses, defending a place against attacks from outside, open battle. All of that was pretty clear in his head. But he had never had need of plans for how to defend a structure from the outside while it was under attack. He always had been able to call his people to the inside of each building that he might have to defend. And he never would have come to the defence of others in the past. He would have to make a plan.

Later.

At the moment, Madame Bones was sending Aurors after the figures running away, and Marvolo made the decision to follow her commands.

A first.

There had never been a battle he had taken part in where he had not been the one in charge.

"Dawlish, Tonks, Slytherin," Madame Bones called out, and once she had the attention of all of them, motioned for them to move around the house clockwise, taking out all possible threats they might encounter. Then she waved to the remaining Aurors to come with her and walk counterclockwise around the house to do the same.

With quick gestures Marvolo and his two Aurors – well, one was truly his, and the other a loan from Madame Bones – agreed on an order to walk in and started to search out their opponents stalking off into the darkness. Snow, half melted and then frozen again in some spots, crunched under Marvolo's boots, but a quick spell took care of that possible give away. With a frown, straining to hear and spot the possible dangers, Marvolo cast a flurry of other silent spells. After that neither he nor his clothes caused any sound, nor was he any longer detectable by scent. Even if the myth that a werewolf's senses were better than a human's were untrue, there were charms and potions as well as rituals to enhance one's senses if one desired.

Breaking glass made Marvolo turn towards the house just in time to see a burning piece of something being thrown through a window in one of the upper floors. Forcefully reminding himself that the children – his son! – weren't alone in the house, Marvolo cast one very strong and silent stunner at a pathetic, cowering figure holding a beaters-bat, felling what seemed to be a man. Adhering to Ministry protocol, a binding spell followed, before he moved on. There was no time to secure any of them further, but as they worked around a circle from one point in opposing directions, it was pretty sure they would manage to subdue all threats.

Suddenly Auror Tonks was thrown into his way, landing with a loud thump, air rushing out of her lungs. Marvolo automatically turned in the direction she had come from, falling into a defensive stance over the fallen witch.

"You!" a big figure snarled, taking the last step to be fully illuminated by the thin crescent moon.

"Fenrir," Marvolo said without inflection. He hadn't thought they would meet. What a pity that he had two witnesses here. He would need to capture the mangy wolf alive, and limit himself to spells actually approved by the Ministry.

And then with a flick of his wrist Marvolo started to send a barrage of spells at the thorn in his side. Cutting curses, stunners, joke hexes like the jelly-legs curse, one after the other as fast as he could manage. It was fast enough that all Fenrir could do was dodge, cast shields, and try to avoid being hit. As much as Marvolo liked duelling with Severus, Lucius, or Augustus for the skill those three posed, this absolute dominance fighting against a single wizard of inferior skill had its own charm.

And then a stunner flew past Marvolo's hip, connecting with Fenrir's chest, toppling the werewolf unceremoniously onto his back.

"Bastard," the female Auror snarled, and reminded Marvolo fiercely of her late aunt Bellatrix in just that moment. Wrapping the wolf in thick silver chains, Marvolo chose to not comment on his observation.

Before they could resume their chase, Madame Bones and her Auror escort came into view.

Full of worry for his son, Marvolo broke rank without much thought, striding in a not-quite-run towards the house. He just had to check on his son. He had to! There was no way in the world he would be able to wait.

He reached the door to the house just when a wizard stepped out of the building, wand raised and at the ready.

"All is clear!" Marvolo called, holding his own wand in a way that was usually a sign of a peace offering, because it was almost impossible to start any serious, dangerous spell aiming at the one standing in front of that way.

"Lord Slytherin." Marvolo recognized the voice as the one of the curse-breaker Weasley – William, the oldest – and tried not to be offended by the suspicious tone. "How come you are here?"

"Henry sent a Patronus to call for help. I was at the Ministry. Madame Bones heard the message and accompanied me with a few Aurors that had been on duty. I hope all is well?" It was funny how dropping the name of his son made the tension almost vanish. But he guessed the truth in this case was a rather good explanation for his appearance here.

"They broke a few windows, hoping to get us to run outside, I guess. But it feels as if they were ill-prepared." Charlie Weasley – the one working with the dragons – said before turning to his older brother. "Come on, let's check the ward line." So the two brothers wandered off.

Madame Bones suddenly spoke from behind Marvolo, and only long training helped him not spin on the spot, cursing her. "May we come in, Arthur?"

"Yes, yes! Of course! Come in!" the head of the household exclaimed, appearing quite flustered, with his reddened cheeks and mussed-up hair.

And so they filed into the kitchen, while cracks in the garden spoke of prisoners being taken away to holding cells at the Ministry.

Marvolo was just about to turn around to take part in the debriefing after this short battle, when a considerable weight collided with him. "I was so worried! Saw that fight you were in! Are you injured? Thank you for coming!"

A weight fell from Marvolo's chest as he closed his own arms around his son, who had him encompassed in another of the boy's crushing hugs. He would have to do something to get one that didn't happen in the wake of some dangerous situation. They felt nice enough to go to some trouble to figure out what other circumstances might tempt Henry to grant them.
"I'm fine. Really I am. He wasn't really a challenge. Even as a somewhat useful duellist, Fenrir mostly relies on fear and intimidation to win. And we were three against one. He didn't stand a chance." He could go into more detail of why he had been sure to win, but didn't feel it necessary to do so just now.

In fact he felt quite content, standing in the kitchen wrapped in the arms of his son, his head resting on his son's head – and that wouldn't be possible for much longer – only listening in to the debriefing taking place around them.

Madame Bones recounted the number of assailants they had managed to subdue, stated the fact that there had been a hag among them, as well as several werewolves from the list of those deemed dangerous, and a few known criminals.

Marvolo's eyes met with those of Madame Bones across the kitchen filled with redheads, and he watched her features soften for a moment, watching him embrace his son, before she turned to accept a cup of tea from Mrs. Weasley.

What strange turns his life had taken since he had regained a body. And somehow it felt as if the strangeness wasn't about to stop anytime soon.

Chapter End Notes

That got longer than I had planned, so a few things will have to wait for the next chapter. Someone brought up Amelia Bones as a potential partner for Marvolo, and even though I feel it would be really hard to get them together, I find myself curious how that would work out. No idea if it will happen here (haven't really planned who Marvolo might find as a platonic partner for a marriage) but I find myself plotting possible ways to explore this idea.

Thanks to Jordre and Jake for helping to improve my spelling!

It had taken some time to get everything sorted. The kids had all gotten a mug of hot chocolate with cinnamon after Lord Slytherin and all the Aurors had gone and now were up in their rooms. Molly had said for them to sleep, but she was pretty sure they were doing anything but.

Next to the kitchen she could hear Bill and his girlfriend talking in a mixture of rapid French and broken English. The French witch had been with her parents but had insisted on coming through the floo the moment Bill had called her so she wouldn’t hear about the attack through the papers in the morning.

Maybe she was worthy of her son after all. Even if she clearly had no concept of how to keep a house in good shape, or how to cook… With a sigh Molly walked over to the stove to fill another two mugs with hot chocolate.

Arthur came back into the kitchen, putting his wand away. “All the windows are whole again. And I set a few monitoring spells all around the border of the house. Should anyone decide to come back, a chime should alert everyone the moment they step anywhere near the house.”

With a sigh clearly speaking of how tired he was, Arthur settled down in one of the chairs at the kitchen table, accepting the mug Molly floated over to him with a smile. “Thank you, love. That’s just what I need now.”

Storing her own wand in her apron pocket, Molly sat down next to her husband, sipping on her own hot chocolate. “Do you think those were the last of the rough werewolves? I surely hope they were. But with Fenrir among them it’s likely, isn’t it?” She slumped a little to sit more comfortably in her chair, and tangled her fingers with Arthur’s when he extended his hand in her direction.

“Amelia seems convinced that they were the last of them. I agree with her assessment that this had too much desperation in it to be anything other than a last-ditch effort.” He smiled at her, squeezing her fingers and taking a good swallow from his hot drink.

For a moment they sat there in silence. Only the low talking from the room next door, the creaking of the boards in the upper floors where their younger children obviously weren’t asleep yet, and the sounds of the wind blowing around the house and through the garden could be heard.

“It was startling to see… Lord Slytherin so obviously relieved that Harry wasn’t harmed,” Molly murmured once she had finished her chocolate. She still hadn’t really processed that bit of information the evening had brought. It probably would take a few days until she felt at ease again.
in her own home. Luckily the children wouldn’t have to return to Hogwarts right away. Molly wasn’t sure she could let them go right now, not after the attack of this evening.

“Do you think he’s aware of how that embrace looked?” Arthur asked, sounding pensive.

“You think it could be a front?” Molly asked, suddenly alarmed. It would certainly be much more like that man to pretend than to actually care for the boy whose parents he had murdered.

For a moment there the world that had been so out of alignment fit again into the well known shape it had been in for many years. The man that had caused the death of her beloved brothers just pretending to care for the boy she felt was another of her sons... but then Arthur shook his head.

“No. Maybe Lord Slytherin can act that good, but can you see Harry doing the same? I think it’s pretty clear by now that the man has truly changed. Maybe Albus was right and everyone can find redemption.”

Molly didn’t comment on that. Maybe it really was true, all those stories about a curse affecting a young man whose curiosity for all magic got him into a lot of trouble. And maybe he truly had tried to start over. Maybe she could be civil for Harry’s sake. But as her brothers would never get a second chance, she wasn’t sure that it ever would be more than forced civility.

They had apparated home to Griffin House right from the edge of the Weasleys' property, and into the room reserved for travel into the house. Under normal circumstances Marvolo avoided bending the wards to make this possible, but today he truly wasn’t willing to take any chances, or stay outdoors longer than necessary.

Henry stumbled a little as they landed. “Everything well, Henry?” His son had looked unharmed, but one never knew what shock could do to a system.

“Yeah, I think I’m fine,” the boy answered, taking a shaky step and raising his hands to open his cloak.

Before either of them could decide what to do next – but going to bed probably was high on the list of possibilities – Nagini slithered through the door.

::You two were gone long. Why didn’t you take me with you?:. The snake sounded put out over the fact she had spent the whole day by herself.

::I spent the day at the Ministry, you would have been bored, and cold:. Marvolo hissed in answer, starting to get rid of his own cloak and warm winter accessories. Regardless of what he did, Nagini always found a reason to complain.

::I smell blood:. Nagini stated, starting to move her body to reach higher into the air, swaying her head back and forth as if in search of the source of the smell.

With a quick flick of his hand Marvolo had his pale wand in hand, casting a diagnostic charm at Henry. But it came back green. The boy hadn’t sustained any injuries.

::What happened to your sleeve?:. Henry wanted to know, pointing at the left sleeve of Marvolo’s robe where, clear as day, there was a tear in the fabric.

.:Must have caught it on a branch or something:. Marvolo noted, putting his wand back into the holster so he could get out of his robes.

.:Nagini smells blood, so the branch probably injured you. We should call the healer:. Henry’s hisses turned a bit frantic and so Marvolo didn’t object, but simply nodded. Henry had been good about staying out of the fight. There was no real harm in calling Malcolm in to have a look at a scratch. When he was here he could check Henry for symptoms of shock as well.

“As you wish. But then he will have a look at you too. Sit down in the parlour, order some hot chocolate for me and whatever you wish for you. After you managed to stay out of the fight, you have earned a treat.”

Henry rolled his eyes annoyed at the teasing tone, but did as he was told. Nagini followed him, hissing all the while that she very much would like a fire burning in the grate.

With a smile on his face, Marvolo walked to the study to use the snake ornament there to summon their healer.

_Thursday, 28th of December_

.:I don’t want to stay behind:. Nagini hissed for the fifth or sixth time since Harry had come down the stairs. She kept slithering into Marvolo’s way while the man dressed to go out.

.:You are too big, Nagini. The children will be scared of a snake as big as you are:. Harry never had heard Marvolo explaining something with that much patience to his familiar before. Most of the time Nagini tired of the game pretty quickly, but not today.

Today they were going to visit the school and eat breakfast with Marcus. Nagini wanted to be with them, because she obviously thought that she was part of the family. And Harry thought that she was right.

“Is there a way to shrink her? Professor Snape did shrink Neville’s toad, Trevor, back into a tadpole, once. She wouldn’t be that scary if she would be small enough to curl up in your hand.” Harry said, folding his scarf so it wouldn’t bunch up uncomfortably under his cloak.

Marvolo hummed and then stopped before stepping on Nagini. With a sigh he got out his wand. .:You can come if you let me shrink you:. Nagini swayed a few moments on her spot flicking her tongue out again and again. .:I want to come:. A wave of Marvolo’s wand and a hissed incantation later and Nagini was shrunk to a much more manageable size. Marvolo swooped down to pick the small snake up. .:No complaining that everything is so big now:.
Nagini gave a wordless hiss of assent and Harry laughed. He was terribly nervous, but there was no way he would allow that nervousness to show. Marcus was the one important now. They could give him a family, and Harry truly wanted to do that. With Mrs. Goyle, he had realized that the Dursleys should have been a true family for him. That they were the one at fault for the strain that always had been present in the house. As far as Harry knew, Marcus had never been called a freak, but he had never had a real family, either. Always living in foster families couldn’t be good in the long run.

Anyway, they would do their best to get Marcus into their family, and Harry would do his best to be a good big brother.

Xerxes had expected his Lord at the edge of the wards. And the moment he and his son apparated in, he gave the man the smallest bow he could under the present circumstances. It had been getting steadily more normal to interact with the Dark Lord as an equal. The number of meetings where only the Dark Lord’s followers were present had sunk to under one in a month, but the high number of social functions the month of December had brought had provided ample opportunity to interact where the whole community was watching.

It was only reasonable to expect these changes.

“Good morning, Marvolo. I’ve heard about the capture of Fenrir. It made the front page of the Prophet. I’m glad that no one was injured and that this dangerous man is no longer free.” Xerxes smiled, it was so good to see these two wizards so at ease with each other.

“Good morning, Xerxes. Thank you for giving us the opportunity to meet with Marcus.” The Dark Lord inclined his head with a smile, guiding his adopted son with a hand on the teenager’s shoulder.

“It’s no problem. I’m happy that Marcus will have a family in you and your son.” And Xerxes was happy. The school was working out better than he had hoped. There were a few squibs that had been hidden away now getting an education, and many children from old-fashioned families following his Lord were now able to make friends and learn together with other children, where before they had been alone, tutored at home, almost without contact with others their age.

“I learned yesterday that the procedures for adoptions have been changed. It seemed all rather disorganized to me. I think you should look into the changes. Let me know if I can be of assistance.” Marvolo had sounded rather nonchalant, but Xerxes recognized an order when it was given. What he found more intriguing was the look his Lord’s son gave the two of them. It was almost as if the boy had also heard and understood the order. Xerxes remembered at least one time that his Lord had reached into a robe pocket during a meeting to take out what looked like a mirror, after which he left the room while hissing in a way that had to be parseltongue.

Hermione had mentioned that her friend talked with his adoptive father and his godfather every single day. Had that been one of those talks? Did the boy know that the Death Eaters still existed? It would be an interesting conundrum.

With a small bow Xerxes turned to go to his office, he had a Ministry problem to research. Marvolo and Henry stepped into the building where the kitchens and the dinner hall where located.
Lord Lestrange talking about the capture of Fenrir the previous night had brought the happenings back into Harry’s mind. He was truly glad that the werewolf who had infected Remus, and so many others, had finally been caught. And now he was curious what would happen. Would there be another emergency meeting for the whole Wizengamot? Or would the man be kept in custody until the next regular one?

While he walked next to Marvolo through the hall serving as a somewhat overly large dining room, Harry decided that there was no harm in asking. “Will there be another emergency meeting of the Wizengamot, now that Fenrir has been caught?”

With a surprised huff Marvolo turned his head a little so he could answer speaking quietly. “There isn’t any need for a meeting. Fenrir has been sentenced to death for being a rabid werewolf for years. At least well over a decade by now. I expect that the execution will take place in a few days at the latest.”

Harry was a little surprised by the calm and unemotional delivery of this news. After all, Fenrir had been an ally to the Death Eaters in the last war, and Marvolo had acted as if he cared for those of his old followers who had been captured and thrown into prison. Maybe that right there was the difference. The Death Eaters were special cases, bound by something close to what had been oaths of fealty in the past. Fenrir only ever had been an ally – at most – and had never shown any attempts to adjust his behaviour to the changes in the way Marvolo was going about reaching his goals now.

When they neared a table where Marcus and an adult were sitting, all thoughts about Fenrir and his likely fate vanished from Harry’s mind. They were here to get to know Marcus, and for him to get to know them better. Harry remembered only too well how frightening it had been to be adopted by Marvolo. Even if Marcus didn’t know anything about who Marvolo had been, it would be easier for him to adjust if they knew each other before they became a family.

“Good morning, Lord Slytherin. Heir Slytherin-Potter,” the adult man greeted them, waving his hand at the two empty chairs at the table. “Have a seat. I think Marcus and you have already met once?”

“Yeah, we have.” Harry sat with a smile, smoothing his robes down as he sat. “Marcus came to us for help when the school snake was in trouble.” Harry smiled what he hoped was a sincere and reassuring smile. “How is she?”

The caution vanished from Marcus’ face and he started to talk a mile a minute, clearly excited. “She’s fine! Yesterday she told me that she really likes the brown mice more than the white ones. Says the white ones aren’t fat enough. I told her you would be here today, and .:Slithering Darkness:. wanted me to get you both over to her box because she wants to talk with you too! Can we go over after we have finished with breakfast? Mr. London says we have to eat something first. What do you like more, waffles or pancakes?”

Harry was taken off guard by the sudden expectant pause in the flow of words, and judging by the slightly dazed look on Marvolo’s face the other wasn’t faring any better. Mr. London – if that truly was his name – had an amused look on his face, so this seemed to be pretty normal.
Before the situation could turn really awkward Nagini slid out of the sleeve of Marvolo’s robes where she had been hiding, curiously flicking her tongue out to scent the room. :Are you the young one my human said we would meet today?: her much smaller head turned so she could slither her way over the table to where Marcus was sitting.

.:Who are you? And what is your name? I have a snake friend who lives in the science classroom. Where do you live?:. Marcus clearly had no fear interacting with an unknown snake. Harry thought Marcus might not have had any bad experiences with snakes before.

.:I go where my human goes. That’s the big one who carried me through the cold. The young one is my human’s child. I like him too. And I think I might like you as well:. Nagini slithered the rest of the way, right across the plate that still was empty, onto the small hand Marcus held towards her.

“I like both waffles and pancakes,” Harry answered one of the earlier questions, starting to fill his own plate with a variety of the offered foods.

“And I like to eat something different every morning. Today I would like a bowl of porridge with apple slices, honey, and nuts.” Marvolo picked up the line of conversation, doing as he had said in filling a bowl with porridge and then adding all the other ingredients from smaller bowls sitting around the table.

Nagini slithered from Marcus’ hand up his arm and around his neck, so she could rest comfortably on his small shoulders. Harry was sure that Marvolo’s familiar was heavier than Marcus in her normal state.

“I would like a roll with chocolate spread, please,” Marcus said, pointing at the jar in question. Without further prompting Marvolo wandlessly levitated a bread roll from a small intricately woven basket, then sliced it with a swift movement of his wand right over Marcus’ plate. A few more gestures had the chocolate spread evenly distributed on both halves of the roll, an eagerly watching Marcus happily clapping his hands. “That was neat!”

“Thank you.” Marvolo accepted the enthusiastic praise with a smile and a regal nod, making Harry fight hard to not snort and embarrass himself.

For a moment they ate in silence, Nagini slithering all around Marcus, his plate, and the food near him. She clearly was happy that she had managed to come along.

Harry spotted the small snake plushie peeking from a spot on the chair right behind Marcus. “Do you like snakes? Do you have other animals you like?” Harry asked, intend to show his interest in what Marcus liked and disliked. No one had ever asked him what he liked before he had come to Hogwarts. He felt it was important to show Marcus that he cared about stuff like that.

“I like snakes a lot!” Marcus exclaimed his eyes shining. “No other animals can talk!” The conviction on his tone made clear that this was a pretty important part of why he liked snakes. “But cats are nice too. They are so soft, and can run around and jump really high! But I don’t like bees and mosquitoes, the stings hurt!”

And so it went on. They traded their favourite colours, foods, games, and then switched to things they didn’t like. Harry listed a few vegetables he didn’t really like all that much, but he was aware that there was little food he wouldn’t eat, unlike Marcus who had strong opinions about all kinds of food, some were too green, or too crisp, or too mushy.
At the end they went over to the science classroom to introduce Nagini to the common adder living there before they said goodbye, promising to be visiting again soon.

“I feel that went well,” Marvolo commented on their way back to the edge of the wards.

“He really doesn’t like lots of foods,” Harry remarked. That was something that stuck in his head. Maybe because he never really got to choose what to eat, always happy to get something when he was allowed to eat? Then it should be a good sign that Marcus was this picky. Right?

“It’s good he can choose then, isn’t it?” Marvolo answered, and while taking a hold of the offered arm Harry realised that Marvolo shared his slight – not really confusion – amazement over this. But considering that Marvolo had grown up in an orphanage where everything had always been in short supply that was not really so unlikely.

Bracing for the unpleasantness that was apparition, Harry turned his attention to the gathering they were to attend this evening at Longbottom Manor.

oooo

It had taken the medi-witches a lot of work to get the needed potions into their patient. But now they could finally conduct another cleansing ritual for Mr. Dumbledore. Jeremy would have loved to conduct this ritual on the 21st, but it had not been possible as they hadn’t known it was even needed. So now was better than never, he would say.

After the repeat test had revealed the more severe condition, they had had the leverage to take more serious measures. Measures such as forcing Mr. Dumbledore to take the needed potions, banning his leaving his room on his own, or at all, among other things.

This ritual they were conducting today would determine the chances the old man had at recovering.

“Be certain to not stray from the steps. And take care to execute them in synchrony.” Jeremy looked around the group of healers gathered around. This ritual was a complicated one, several people had to work in concert to make the magic take the right course.

Two strong medi-wizards came in carrying a stretcher with a sedated Mr. Dumbledore into the circular stone room. Minimizing the influence of external magic was important, but it made the use of rather unorthodox methods necessary.

After their patient – clothed only in linen robes – had been placed on the specially prepared place in the middle of the circle permanently etched into the floor, Jeremy checked one last time that everything had been prepared to his specifications.

Even with the order from his Lord to do his very best, he wasn’t sure this would work out in favour of his patient. They didn’t often get to use this ritual, and practising wasn’t something they got to do without a patient.

On his signal, he and the other six participants in this ritual started to move and chant, creating an interesting effect with their voices sounding as one, rebounding off the stone surfaces where their shadows were cast by several candles, and seven small fires burning in cauldrons danced to the music.
This went on for some time, then the tempo of their steps and chanting changed, and they drew in the bundle of herbs they had been holding when passing their evenly spaced cauldrons. Magic coursed through the room, around them all and into their patient. If they managed to keep up their harmony for the next two hours, the old Headmaster might get better after all.

The gathering at Longbottom Manor traditionally was one of the last of the year, and in the last few decades, one with mostly light-allied families invited to come. The Malfoys, for instance, had made a point of not attending, even when they were invited, for quite some time now. In fact, the gathering had lost a lot of its pull in the years since the last Lord had died.

This year Augusta noted with some grim satisfaction the number of people who had agreed to come had grown significantly from last year. She was pretty sure she knew the reason for that change.

Being declared regent for the Potter seat on the Wizengamot had given her a lot more influence. Suddenly everyone wanted her ear, so they might manage to exert some influence over how Harry Potter, the-boy-who-lived, developed his political stance. It was disgusting, but at the same time all too familiar.

She stood in the entrance hall greeting their guests with Neville standing at her side, fulfilling his duties to a standard he hadn’t managed in the past. Maybe he finally was growing out of his insecurities.

“Good evening, Minister! How unusual for you to find the time to be here!” Augusta gave her best fake smile and a small bow, which tilted the fox sitting on her pointed hat for the evening forward as if it was about to jump onto the Minister’s bowler hat.

“With Fenrir and his last supporters finally apprehended, I thought it only right to take the time to celebrate with some of my dearest friends.” Cornelius’ smile was oily, and his excuse as flimsy as any in all the other years, with the only difference being that now he was giving one for the reason he was here and not for staying away.

“That was good thinking on young Harry’s part to send a Patronus with a message to Lord Slytherin,” Augusta said with a smile and a nod that implied her agreement, but the stiffening of Cornelius’ posture made it all too clear he had understood her dig at his so-called success. If not for Harry’s Patronus, Fenrir might have managed to escape again.

“He is a bright young wizard,” Cornelius agreed with a strained smile. It had to be hard admitting – if only indirectly – that he had been wrong about Harry and his warning of Voldemort’s resurrection. It had been swept under the rug quite thoroughly, but as it hadn’t been going on long before Lord Slytherin had come back to start over, Augusta really wasn’t surprised. No one reached the position of Minister of Magic without a shred of political talent. Not even if that person was in the pocket of someone as wealthy as Lucius Malfoy.

“Have a nice evening, Minister,” Augusta said, not waiting for him to thank her before she turned to the next guests arriving, a slight to Cornelius’ pride but still perfectly polite.

Xerxes Lestrange walked towards her, a smile on his face and his heiress – the Gryffindor girl from Neville’s year – with Nott’s boy on her arm in his wake. “Xerxes, welcome! How are things at your school?” They knew each other from their school days and had respected each other most of the time. The fact his sons had died in that fire over in France, and that he had taken a muggle-raised girl as his heiress, had smoothed out a few of the grievances between them. His founding a school dedicated to the education of all children connected to the magical world – Squibs included – had added to her willingness to give him another chance.

“All is going well. The Yule festival was a big success. The teachers are contemplating to hold another one in the summer.” They chatted for a while and finally came to the capture of Fenrir. It was a theme that came up again and again throughout the whole evening. Augusta felt it was so much gossip, but as the man had wreaked so much havoc, it felt like she could not really fault her guests for being eager to talk about the events of the night before.

It would be a long evening with a mix of guests she hadn’t had in her home for a long time. With a small internal sigh she straightened her posture and started on her first round of the ballroom.

They had managed to get out of the mandatory socializing in the stifling company of all the adults who had come to this ball rather fast. So now they all were gathered in a nice parlour a little away from the big ballroom, sitting on the couches with their drinks, chatting.

Harry was sitting with Neville and Theo at one of the tables playing a game of exploding snap. The girls – Susan, Hermione, and the Greengrass sisters – sitting over near the fireplace were talking animatedly. Judging by some words floating over to their game of cards, Harry guessed they were talking about career options and OWL preparation.

There were groups of older and younger children – or maybe teenagers for the older kids – at other tables, each sticking to those they knew the best. The adults might use these events to make new connections for their political gain, but the children forced to be here as well used every opportunity to just talk with friends.

All in all, it was a little odd. Harry had been invited to the Burrow, of course, and he had spent time with the others from Gryffindor and Slytherin in their respective common rooms, but this, this was alike and different at the same time.

Maybe the closest he could come was comparing it to Draco’s birthday party from the past summer. But then again, now he was friends, or at least friendly acquaintances, with the people present here, so it was different again.

“Say, Neville. I heard that there are great greenhouses here at Longbottom Manor. Do you think we could get a visit in? Father insisted that I study when there’s no event I have to attend, so I didn’t get many opportunities to go out,” Theo said as he had to take another card.

Neville blushed a little, nodding. “We do have good greenhouses. And if everyone is in agreement I don’t know a reason why we shouldn’t go.” Then he placed a card on the pile, causing the cards to explode quite spectacularly.

“Say, Harry, how are things moving with the adoption?” Astoria suddenly asked, rolling her eyes. Maybe she didn’t approve of them playing a game that some deemed pretty childish.
“What adoption? Is there something going on with your adoption?” Susan asked curious, turning her attention totally on Harry. It looked like only those closely associated with Marvolo – or rather his close political allies – knew about Marcus. The fact that Susan seemed oblivious spoke quite clearly about how her aunt was handling information from work.

“No, everything is all right. But, well, we have found another Parselmouth.” Harry gave Astoria a look, hoping to get the message across that they hadn’t wanted to let the information spread just yet. But the girl ignored him, turning to Susan.

“Harry is to be a big brother. I think it’s great!” Astoria was almost bouncing in her seat, and Harry shook his head in exasperation, so much for keeping it under wraps.

With an exasperated sigh, Harry turned back to the game. “I guess after the time father spent at the Ministry yesterday trying to sort out that mess the adoption process has become, it will not take long until it's all over the papers.” That comment got nods from everyone, the tendency of the Daily Prophet reporting on Harry’s life was well known after the spectacle of the last year.

“The little boy from the festival,” Hermione stated, smiling.

“Marcus. I hope it won’t take too long until he can come live with us. How is Aiden doing, Theo?” Harry really wasn’t keen to speak about his family, so deflecting the conversation to another topic hopefully would work.

“Oh, he loved our tree and the fairies. And he really likes the school. Being a big brother is an adjustment, though. Aiden constantly wants to spend time with me, even when I do something really boring. While working on our Transfiguration homework Aiden was constantly asking questions. I’m sure you’ll have the same trouble soon.” Theo laughed and the others did as well. That was until Daphne said, “I hear you.”

“Hey!” Astoria exclaimed in not-quite-mock-outrage, flinging a cushion at her sister.

A short pillow fight followed which quickly involved everyone, until Neville called them all to order, suggesting that they move over to the greenhouses and take a walk through the garden.

The house-elf had quickly fetched their cloaks for them and they marched out into the cold, chattering on about school work.

Strolling through the fringes of the gathering, Marvolo spotted Severus standing together with his wife in a little alcove-like niche with a window and curtains. Maybe he should use the opportunity presented here to speak with Severus about his own troubles with the expectations of their society.

“Good evening, Lord Prince, Lady Prince,” Marvolo greeted before he stepped through the gap the curtains of heavy velvet left into the space the other two were occupying.

Of course they had been officially introduced at the first event they had both attended. So they could skip quite a few of the pleasantries required on a first meeting. But not all of them.
After the usual small talk about weather, common acquaintances, and the current company.

It took longer than Marvolo would have liked, but being polite was important. If he had wanted to get to the point as quickly as possible, he should have called Severus to a meeting through the Mark, and not initiated a talk in such a public place. Even with the voices of the other attendees a murmur in the background, and them mostly shielded from view, this wasn’t by any stretch of the imagination a private meeting.

“I have to say that I envy you for your state of married bliss,” Marvolo stated dryly. “Almost since the day the Wizengamot decided to grant me a second chance based on the law of Haxby, witches and some wizards have been haunting me in a bid to gain my hand in marriage.” He sighed over dramatically, gaining an impassive mask from Severus, who certainly had enough practice in keeping his feelings under wraps, and a quirk of her lips from Mrs. Snape.

“So not one of those seeking your attention has caught your eye, Lord Slytherin?” the young woman wanted to know, her arm linked with that of her husband. They clearly presented a unified front.

“I feel it would be a disaster to marry any of them. I’m pretty sure I couldn’t match their needs or expectations of what a marriage entails.” Marvolo wanted to scoff at his own evasiveness. He would have thought that it shouldn’t be all that hard to admit his own lack of interest to the man who had seen him at his worst, and whom he trusted enough to brew his medicinal potions. Marvolo thought he saw a flicker in Severus’ eyes at that, but Mrs. Snape seemed to have a little trouble catching on. “Has anyone made their intentions that clear already? That would be a little forward, wouldn’t it?”

“The political gain some might envision are met easily enough. But with marriage comes an intimacy, or maybe I should say an intimacy is expected, that I have no desire for. But I would have trouble turning a blind eye to infidelity, and that combination would probably prove frustrating for those seeking marriage.” Hopefully that would be enough to bring the point across.

Her eyes widened, her hand going to her stomach where Marvolo knew a new life was growing, she had understood.

“I fear there aren’t that many ways to evade the matchmaking. I managed because my occupation as a teacher wasn’t glamorous, and my position as heir to the Prince family wasn’t even known to myself. It seems impossible to counter the appeal of the Slytherin name.” Severus voice was smooth and hinting at all he didn’t voice. The fact he was shrouded in mystery, powerful, knowledgeable, and pretty good-looking, was only implied, and Marvolo was thankful for that. Empty flattery in this moment would have been irksome.

“Why not search for a marriage of convenience then?” Mrs. Snape asked, interested and confused.

“Not many who find themselves in a similar position would admit to not being interested in intimate relations of any kind. And duty might force them to marry anyway.” Marvolo shrugged and slightly turned so he would address Severus over his wife. “I would like to find a partner. But I fear my needs and wishes are hard to meet. As infidelity would cast a bad light on any marriage, despite my lack of interest, any person with need for such would be unhappy in a relationship with me. The fact that most of our population either fears me or loathes me adds to the problem. I would like to be able to speak and debate with a partner, not share my home with someone agreeing in everything, or holding my past over my head constantly. Anyone unmarried either is too young, or already at the end of their life. I can’t see myself with a young partner lacking the experience to keep up.” Marvolo trailed of, carding his hand through his hair in a gesture of frustration. It felt highly unlikely that he would be able to find someone.

“These certainly are very specific requirements,” Mrs. Snape nodded, a contemplative expression on her face, before she turned on her husband. “I know that you are known as a discreet Potions Master, accepting commissions for complicated potions from individuals who wish to acquire something that they would prefer to get through channels not quite as public as the next apothecary.”

Severus only looked at her, waiting for her to reach the point she wanted to make, earning himself a huff and an eye roll, which caused him to smirk a little. They clearly were a good match.

“I’m not talking anything illegal. There are more than a few potions one might feel embarrassed about needing. Like those that force a reaction of a male that might not occur as easily with the wrong kind of partner. You know exactly which potions I’m talking about.”

Severus nodded, glancing for a moment in Marvolo’s direction, of course he would know which potions were used for that kind of task. Potions combating impotence and other causes leading to a similar effect belonged to the oldest known recipes. “They usually only are needed, though, when a marriage is already established, and are consumed with the goal to provide a child for the family. So my theoretical knowledge of people using such potions wouldn’t be of help here anyway. There is also the fact that my supposed discretion wouldn’t be all that good if I would actually speak of my supposedly existing customers. Or am I mistaken?” Severus’ whole posture and tone of voice was so serious that it was clear he was putting more emphasis on the whole thing than was needed, giving the whole thing an air of levity. It was kind of silly to first compliment Severus on his discretion just to turn around and practically ask him to reveal who those customers have been.

In front of the curtains, or rather more to the side, Amelia stood listening in on the conversation. As not one of the three there had cast any privacy charms – not even the most simple ones – she didn’t feel guilty in the least for eavesdropping.

And what interesting information she had gathered. So, Lord Marvolo Slytherin thought of himself as asexual. The Dark Lord Voldemort’s sexuality never had been on her thoughts during the time they had worked to defeat him and battle his Death Eaters. And why should it have been? But now she was intrigued. She could relate to the desperate need to evade match-making mothers. It had taken a long time until the world had accepted that her need for a career was greater than her wish for family. That she just wasn’t interested in any of that never even had been considered a possibility.

As most of the magical community was obsessed with the need to continue families, admitting to having a sexuality not going along with the need to produce children wasn’t really the done thing. At least not in the open. In her year there had been a few that had been forced to marry someone they weren’t attracted to for the sake of the family.

Susan had told her about the rumours going around the school that there was a potion that would enable two wizards to have a child together with a surrogate mother, that would carry the traits of both fathers. If that was truly the case, the current popularity of Lord Marvolo Slytherin might help to break the customs forcing so many people to lead unhappy lives. Because having an affair might be the usual way to handle the respective needs of such a marriage, it being discovered still carried a stigma.

But would she be willing to bind herself to the man who had been Voldemort to help in breaking those outdated norms? She certainly didn’t know the man well enough to contemplate something like that with any seriousness at the moment.

Shaking her head, Amelia walked over to a few of her acquaintances she hadn’t spoken to yet this evening.

“Madame Longbottom,” Marvolo greeted their host for the evening, taking a flute of champagne from a floating tray before he stepped over to take a seat near the one she was occupying. “I congratulate you for an evening well organized.” Marvolo toasted in her direction before taking a small sip from his glass. Indulging too much wasn’t something he could risk.

“Thank you, Lord Slytherin. I have heard more than a few versions of an interesting tale this evening. It seems you have once again fought at the side of Aurors against an army of transformed werewolves, just a few nights after the new moon.” There was more than a little sarcasm in her words, and Marvolo couldn’t restrain a small chuckle from escaping.

Getting more comfortable in the armchair comfortably upholstered with a fine floral-patterned velvet, Marvolo drawled in a bored tone. “It seems the luck of always getting into dangerous situations my son seems to have is contagious. I was in the Ministry trying to sort some things out when Henry’s Patronus message reached me. Of course Amelia Bones didn’t hesitate to take action.”

“She certainly has earned her spot,” Madame Longbottom agreed with a regal nod. “And watching how the simple story evolves in the claws of the rumour mill is quite entertaining. I’m pretty sure that I know the facts of this situation. What I couldn’t extract from all those tales was the reason why you were at the Ministry.”

Smiling at the clear, but nicely done, attempt to fish for information Marvolo decided that it probably would be best to inform his son's regent of the current situation in regards to the adoption procedures.

“There is a boy by the name of Marcus, who is able to speak with snakes. Both Henry and I are determined to adopt him as soon as possible. There is no reason to not take him in, as he clearly is part of our family. I was at the Ministry to arrange everything needed for that. It wasn’t as easy a process as I had thought it would be.” Clearly surprised and intrigued, Madame Longbottom shifted in her seat, suddenly resembling a lioness about to spring into action. Marvolo went on, “Someone changed the way adoptions are handled, but it looks as if they started and never finished. There are new steps to take, things to prove, without a responsible department named. I’m baffled, not something I’m accustomed to.”

By now everyone Marvolo thought might be able to help knew about the changes and had the order to find evidence who had been the one to set this into motion, and what might be done to clear up this tangled mess.
“What an unprofessional way to go about changing such important procedures. That’s just not right. Can you give me more details? I’ll have to do something about this.”

All too happy to have someone investigate this who was not so closely linked to himself that it would raise suspicion, Marvolo started to explain what Mrs. Wisby and he had found during their search the previous day. Maybe they would be able to get this sorted before the next regular meeting of the Wizengamot in January.

Friday, the 29th of December

It was early in the morning, the sun not yet even close to rising, as Walden Macnair stood waiting in the cold. He didn’t mind the weather, or the early hour, because what he was here to do was something he loved to do.

He was here to do the job the Ministry paid him for: Eliminating a dangerous beast by separating the head from the body with his favourite axe. When he had heard that Fenrir Greyback had been caught, a small, evil smirk had taken up permanent residence on his face, and he had started to sharpen his axe.

He had used the steel his father had given him for this purpose so many years ago. It just was better done by hand than with a spell. No spell had ever been invented to sharpen an axe the way he wanted it to be done.

When the sound of three sets of feet on snow reached his ear, Walden turned to watch the two Aurors bring the beast over to the block. The beast in the shape of a man, shackled both at hands and feet, didn’t fight, but was walking like a drunk, or someone heavily sedated with strong potions.

Making a face, Walden shifted the grip on his axe. He would have liked for Fenrir to be aware of what was happening, for him to be struggling and screaming in a fruitless attempt to evade the inevitable. This way it was only half as much fun as it could have been. No way to change the facts now, he should better enjoy this in all the glory there was.

The flickering torches illuminated the courtyard used for executions like this, casting their unsteady light over the few officials here to witness the execution of the long-standing death warrant for this feral werewolf. It was obvious that they weren’t happy to be here this early, waiting in the snow. But the orders had been clear, after waiting the time it would take for most magical ways of impersonating someone to wear off, the execution had to take place as early as possible to evade the curious masses and the reporters, and – most importantly – to make sure there was no chance he could find a way to escape.

By now the three had reached the block right next to Walden, and the Aurors were forcing the beast down to its knees, placing the head down on the big, sturdy piece of wood. A few sloppy wand movements and a murmured incantation later, the shackles were attached to the floor, preventing the beast from escaping.

With a happy grin on his face – behind the mask which was part of his traditional getup – Walden positioned himself next to his target, taking aim and raising his arms with the axe high over his head.

The sound of sharp metal hitting something soft and then getting stuck in wood, rang around the small dark and cold yard just seconds later.

Chapter End Notes

I'm sorry for making you wait another chapter for Marvolo's birthday. But I plan for the next chapter to have that part of the story ;)

Thanks to Jordre and Jake for helping to improve my spelling!

Sitting down at the breakfast table, Remus first poured himself a cup of tea before he picked up the Daily Prophet. As Harry had holidays, Remus didn't have much to do – there simply weren’t that many essays to read and mark – so he spent his time reading books, the newspaper, organising notes for Harry to study in preparation for his OWLs, and so on. Maybe he should accept a few more jobs like the one he had at the moment to fill his time constructively. Or he could write a new textbook for History of Magic classes. A new one was desperately needed.

After he had eaten a good portion of his breakfast, and had braved the society pages droning on and on about a local art auction for charity, organized by the amateur artists themselves, his eyes fell on the section with various, mostly uninteresting notices from the Ministry.

There, between the announcement of a promotion and the search for a new supplier of tea for the break rooms, was the notification that the execution of one feral werewolf by the name of Fenrir Greyback had taken place in the early hours of the morning.

And that was all. No mention of the reasons the execution had been demanded, or if there had been a trial. Remus had known that there had been an outstanding warrant, and he really was glad that that monster was gone. But he had a bad taste in his mouth regardless of his relief.

Almost an hour after Remus had left his room, Sirius ambled down for breakfast, his hair unkempt and his clothes clearly not fresh from the wardrobe.

Remus raised a brow in silent inquiry. Sirius shrugged. “No sense in getting ready for the day, when I plan to go to bed again soon, is there? But I need to see if there's mail for me, write an answer to anything important, and eat something. I’m starving!”

With an indulgent eye roll, Remus returned to his paper, only to stare at the unassuming, much-too-short notice.

“What’s wrong?” Sirius asked between bites of scrambled egg.

“Greyback was executed this morning.”

A surprised noise from Sirius caused Remus to look up. “And why are you looking like someone kicked your puppy? I, for one, think it’s a good thing that vile bastard is gone for good.” Remus nodded, but frowned.
How to explain his mess of emotions to his friend? “I agree that Fenrir Greyback has earned what he got. But do you realize that there never was a trial, or even a hearing of some sort? Get enough people to agree I’m dangerous and out to infect as many as I can and the same could happen to me.” Remus knew he sounded bitter, but he couldn’t help it.

Sirius hummed, refilling his mug with coffee. “That would be unfortunate. That’s true. But I still can’t say I’m sorry that he didn’t get a trial. We both know he was a monster.”

Remus scoffed, folding the Daily Prophet with jerky movements before placing it at the edge of the table.

Sirius sighed, rubbing his hand over his face. “And I managed to step in it again. Right? Sorry, Remus. I see that there’s a bigger problem here. But isn’t Lord Slytherin working on that at the moment? I distinctly remember him speaking about the need for equal rights for every intelligent member of our society during all those dull parties.”

Now Remus rolled his eyes at his friend in exasperated amusement. Sirius really wasn’t cut out to be Lord Black, though it was admirable how much he tried to fill the role he had never wanted to take.

Sirius furrowed his brow in confusion. “What did I get wrong now?”

“Maybe you could be a little more active in this? Maybe push for rights not only for those infected with lycanthropy, but those with mixed heritage as well? Hagrid probably would be happy if there was less prejudice against half-giants.” Remus gave Sirius a pointed look, leading to the other wizard groaning.

“You make it sound so easy to overthrow prejudices hundreds of years old. Shall I advocate for goblins getting wands next? I agree that people with goblin, veela, giant, or something else in their ancestry shouldn’t get mistreated for that. But you know that realism is a thing, yes? Demanding too much, too fast can lead to backlash. I am already working to help get the laws against lycanthropes amended. It’ll take time. Years, probably. Maybe Harry’s children, or grandchildren, will be able to tackle the next piece of messed up legislation.”

Now it was Remus’ turn to rub a hand over his face. He knew that laws were changed faster than the perceptions of society. And that if prejudices weren’t countered slowly over long stretches of time, the laws were liable to be brought back.

Maybe Remus simply was unhappy with how the prejudices of others had hindered his own dreams all of his life. He wished it would be different, and was tired of waiting. “You’re right, Sirius. I think I’m getting a little impatient with the state of it all.”

Sirius nodded and let the topic drop, reaching for the letters waiting on a side table. For a moment the only sounds in the room were the fire providing them with warmth, cutlery on porcelain, and the rustling of parchment as Sirius went through his letters.

“Look, a letter from Jacobs!” Sirius exclaimed, holding up the letter he had been reading.

“What does he say?” Remus inquired truly curious.

Sirius quickly scanned the letter, his brow furrowed in concentration. “He has answers from the different magical schools he contacted. Not one of them has a Olivienne Moreau as an alumna, so he thinks she's most likely a muggle. The schools weren’t as helpful concerning her daughters. Sam explains that they all have a policy of not speaking about their minor students with outside parties.
Inconvenient, but understandable, I think. He says that he got a lot of answers to the inquiries he had posted in several newspapers. Working through those is his next step. Well, I guess it would be unreasonable to expect more this soon after he started to investigate.”

“But still we hope, eager in our impatience.” Remus commented, startling a laugh out of Sirius. They understood each other. Some things just took time, but even knowing that, they had trouble waiting while they could do nothing much.

A last look into the mirror – “Lovely as ever, Augusta!” -- she made sure her hat was on straight and her robes were hanging correctly over the purple, velvet dress she had chosen. Since Lord Slytherin had told her about the mess he had uncovered while trying to adopt another child without proper family, thoughts about that had troubled her.

The other witches of her bridge group had been outraged when she had told them over their breakfast meeting this morning. They all agreed that it wasn’t right to put so many obstacles into the way of those that wanted to take in children without a proper family. They all had agreed that a child with such an obvious family gift as Parseltongue should be taken in by family without that much hassle. It had worked well in the past. Why should it be changed?

They all had agreed to keep their ears open and ask around to find out who had changed things so drastically.

Augusta herself somewhat agreed that the process so far had been pretty open to interpretation. At first she hadn’t been happy that there had been nothing that could be done about Lord Slytherin – then Marvolo Riddle – adopting Harry Potter just based on the fact that he could speak to snakes, the Slytherin family gift. She had had serious doubts about the man’s suitability as a father. Now she knew that the man made a decent father and was content with the way the situation had developed.

But testing someone to see if they were a suitable parent? How would that even work? Augusta was pretty sure it would take weeks, if not months, of surprise visits and constant monitoring. What qualities would even be tested? How kind someone was? How stern? If that wasn’t just as biased as the previous way of determining things, she no longer was Augusta Longbottom.

But at the moment, the fact that no one seemed to be responsible was the more urgent problem.

In a whoosh of green flames, Augusta whirled away through the Floo network towards the Ministry. Once she had stepped out at the other end, she spelled her robes clean with a flick of her wand. Sooty clothes did nothing to add to an imposing persona, and she would need all she could get.

The few people scuttling about the atrium quickly made way for her as she walked with determined steps towards the elevator. She would go up and into Cornelius’ office. He certainly should know about the mess some underlings had created. And if he didn’t already know, it was time he learned of it!
As was the case every year over the extensive season of social gatherings, paperwork and parchments had built up into heaps on his desk. And as he did every year, he came here in the last few days between the Longbottom Ball and the New Years Ball hosted at the Ministry on the first of the new year to get as much done as he possibly could.

No one would bother him with requests, he had no appointments, and both were requirements to get anything done around here.

He just had finished reading a terribly long-winded and boring letter from the Bulgarian Minister, when the door opened with a bang. Irritated, Cornelius looked up only to smooth his face quickly into the polite mask he wore most of the time. Whatever had caused the mood this formidable witch was in hopefully had nothing to do with his Ministry.

“Augusta! What a pleasant surprise! How can I help you?” With a happy smile Cornelius got out of his chair and walked around the big desk to greet her.

“I doubt you will think my visit pleasant when I’m done speaking, Cornelius.” That did indeed not sound good. Despite his apprehension, Cornelius kept up the pleasant face and invited his guest over to the seating area. Before he could start with damage control, he had to find out what really had happened to rile her up like this.

“Do you want some tea, Augusta?” She accepted with a nod and settled back comfortably in the velvet chairs.

“Are you aware that someone has been changing the rules governing the adoption process without finishing the job?” the older witch asked pointedly, sipping from her tea.

Cornelius frowned. Buying himself some time, he prepared himself a tea to his preferences, adjusting the amount of milk several times.

Cornelius thought quickly. He knew the laws governing adoptions. They were vague enough that neither the Wizengamot nor he were needed to adjust the procedures. “No, I wasn’t aware that there had been any changes. How do you mean that the changes weren’t finished?” That claim sounded rather ominous to him.

“Mrs. Wisby told about the changed procedures. And Lord Slytherin wasn’t able to discover which department is responsible for conducting the tests that are now required. So the changes weren’t finalized, and anyone trying to adopt a child now will be held up indefinitely by bureaucratic hurdles. That’s not a situation that can be left alone. It would be terrible for all the children who otherwise could join a loving family. So tell me, Cornelius, who had the bright idea to change something that has been working for hundreds of years?” The way she said that was clearly a challenge. A challenge to his authority, questioning his competency to lead the Ministry and make sure nothing major happened that he wasn’t aware of. And even if he hadn’t been a Gryffindor at Hogwarts, he couldn’t let this challenge go unaccepted. It would undermine his image in Augusta Longbottom’s eyes, and with her, in those of many others. She had a lot of influence with the older witches and now also an easy access to Lord Slytherin... and with him, to a lot of the more conservative members of the Wizengamot. No, he couldn’t risk this getting any more out of hand than it already was.

So he smiled winningly. “I’m sure we’ll manage to untangle what was done and add what’s still missing.” Augusta didn’t look too convinced that they would manage that, but she nodded anyway and started to relay what she knew.
Saturday, 30th of December

He felt his years more keenly than ever before. Or at least he could not recall ever feeling this old before. The medi-witch who had brought his breakfast and lunch had been kind and patient, answering all the many questions he had dared to ask among all those chasing each other around his mind.

Albus sat in his bed, pillows behind his back propping him up into a comfortable position. Next to his bed sat Minerva in a visitor's chair. She had had to surrender her wand before she could enter the room, leaving her miffed and Albus remembering the fact he was held in a secured room because they deemed him a danger to himself and others.

“You look tired, Albus. I had thought the healers were working on improving your health.” Minerva clearly was not happy with what she had seen so far. Security wards around the room, his food in bite-sized chunks to be eaten with his only tool a spoon, no healer or medi-witch entering his room alone. High security meant exactly that.

But as Albus was able to remember the plans he had made to escape, he could understand why they deemed such treatment necessary.

“Healing is an exhausting process, Minerva. And healing from that much dark magic affecting a person is even harder. I am tired, have been for a while now. But I feel as if a black mist has been blown away. Or as if a veil has been lifted, which was obscuring my view of the world. They truly do their best here.” He tried to smile reassuringly, but judging by the look in his deputy’s eyes, he fell short in his efforts. “What have I missed?” Albus quickly asked in an attempt to distract her.

Minerva’s look clearly said that she wouldn’t be fooled and had seen that attempt for what it was instantly, nonetheless she still let him change the topic. “There was no trouble at the school. But Fenrir Greyback attacked the Weasleys’ home and was apprehended by a group of Aurors who accompanied Lord Slytherin. He was at the Ministry when a Patronus message from Mr. Slytherin reached him. It was reported in the Prophet in great detail.” Minerva shook her head. “Other than that, there was nothing important.” Suddenly a bright smile broke through her stern façade. “Severus and his lovely wife have been absent from the castle for most of the holiday. Since he picked up the mantle of Lord Prince, and as a married man, he had a lot of events to attend and something better to do than stalking the empty corridors in search of errant students. I feel being married has worked wonders on his mood.”

Albus listened as Minerva filled him in on all the gossip he had missed. It didn’t go unnoticed by him that she was leaving out everything to do with him. Probably in a bid not to upset him.

He interrupted her rant about a row between Pomona and Rolanda – about some sweets stored in a cupboard in the staff room – gently. “Minerva. Don’t you think I need to know what the reaction to my… illness was? I’ll learn it either way. Better to hear it from a friend and have time to prepare. Don’t you think?”

She looked down on her hands before looking up again, searching his face. “Are you sure, Albus?
You look like you need rest.”

“That’s why I’m currently sentenced to bed rest. It looks like Poppy isn’t the only one adamant about this kind of thing.” His joke fell on deaf ears, only causing Minerva to give him a look. “I’m resting, Minerva. Please tell me what is going to be waiting for me once I leave the hospital.”

Minerva sighed, unnecessarily adjusting her rectangular spectacles, before nodding slowly. “I don’t know how she got hold of the information, but Miss Skeeter wrote an article about your illness, citing sources in the hospital. She was her usual self. To summarize: she made you out to be a fool and dangerous for the children even if you should… survive. Shortly after that, one of the governors came to the castle, more or less subtly urging me to take over the position of Headmistress. He wasn’t the last.” She folded her hands, looking down. “They probably will not agree to allow you to come back.”

Albus pondered her words, watching her wringing her hands. Could he deny the claim that he might be dangerous? Looking back at his actions in the weeks before he had been forcibly admitted to St. Mungo’s, Albus could see why there might be doubt about his suitability for his post. But it irked him anyway.

“We’ll have to see,” was all he said to this whole mess, as there wasn’t any reason to talk about it more. Their conversation switched back to the more inane stories of the days at the school, before the medi-witch on duty came in to send Minerva away.

Before long, Albus was asleep. Healing was a tiring process.

Sonja and Severus had returned to the castle while many of the rooms at the manor were renovated all at once. The three elves had started with great enthusiasm on the changes Sonja and he had agreed upon. The garden had to wait until spring, but painting the walls, changing wallpaper, new varnish for the panelling, and polishing all of the furniture could be done now. The fumes and the dust had been too much for Sonja, so they were sleeping at the castle to avoid the worst of it.

With all the chances the last months had brought, Severus welcomed the familiarity of his quarters. His aimless wandering, while waiting for Sonja to be finished in the bathroom, led him to the fireplace in their cozy living room. There on the mantle stood the phial with the memory the Dark Lord had given him. He still hadn’t decided what to do. Did he want to see Lily's last moments? Or was he better off not knowing the details?

With careful hands he picked up the phial, spinning it between his fingers. Memories had an odd texture when captured like this. Not really water, or vapour, but still displaying properties of both. Severus sighed, recognising his wandering thoughts as his attempt to once again avoid making a decision.

“Are you okay, love?” Sonja asked from the door to their bedroom, clad only in her bathrobe, currently working on her damp hair.

Despite his troubled thoughts and indecision, Severus smiled. She looked absolutely tempting. “Depends on your definition of okay.” Severus gave his wife a wry smile, still fiddling with the cold glass phial.
“Why do you feel the need to even make a final decision about whether you want to view the memory or not?” Sonja asked, walking over to the loveseat while braiding her hair.

That was an excellent question. With a huff Severus sat down next to Sonja, carefully setting the phial down on the small side table. “I’m not really sure. Maybe because not deciding on a course of action feels like cowardice?” He shrugged, his gaze locked on the shimmering not-quite-liquid swirling lazily in the phial.

“You said it was given to you so you could make the decision on your own. You were not asked to return the memory by a certain time, were you?” Severus shook his head. “And it won’t get stale or something, right?” Severus snorted, but nodded. Memories stored this way – based on everything known today – would hold indefinitely. “So why not keep it as a memento? Keep your options open. You don’t want to view it now. But maybe that will change some day.”

With a sigh Severus let himself slump and moved so his wife could embrace him. A little rearranging later, they sat comfortably, Severus’ head resting in his wife’s lap. It cost Severus little effort to relax into her soothing caresses of the contours of his face. He wasn’t sure it would be easy to act as Sonja had suggested. But he surely would try. Maybe one day he would want to see Lily’s last moments. And until then, the phial could wait.

Concern for her youngest child and only daughter brought Molly to her girl’s door late in the evening. Ginny had been withdrawn and occasionally explosive over the last few days, avoiding company and eating too little.

And even now there was light shining from under the door, and it sounded as if something soft – a pair of socks, or a pillow, maybe – had just hit the door. If Molly knew her daughter at all, she was sure that there was something seriously bothering Ginny.

Cautiously she opened the door, peering into the dimly lit room, and spotted Ginny sitting on her bed in her nightgown. Tears were streaking down her cheeks, and her face was showing lines of frustration, while she was writing on a piece of parchment with a book as her flat surface. Since that horrible incident with the diary in her first year at Hogwarts, Ginny had never touched a diary again.

“Dear? What’s wrong?” Molly asked, stepping into the room and closing the door behind herself. After a moment's thought she flicked her wand at the door and the walls, setting up a rudimentary silencing charm. Her charms weren’t really that good, but after the twins once had commented that they couldn’t know not to listen in when she didn’t even make the attempt to keep them out with magic, she had come into the habit of casting the only silencing charm she knew whenever she wanted the closed door to be interpreted as a signal for a wish for privacy by the twins.

“How does Harry ignore me? Why doesn’t he love me? Can’t he see how wonderful we would be together?” At the end she was almost wailing her question, falling forward towards where Molly had sat down on the bed beside her daughter. Embracing her little girl, Molly thought about how she could help Ginny cope with her unrequited love.

Because from what she had seen over the last visit, Harry really wasn’t interested in Ginny at all. He treated her just as he did Ron, or Hermione. Maybe a little less friendly, because Ginny probably had been a little aggressive.

Molly smiled sadly. Her little girl knew what she wanted and wasn’t shy about going to get it. But in this instance, that probably wouldn’t work out. So she gently rubbed Ginny’s back, letting her cry out all her frustration and heartache.

It took some time, but finally Ginny calmed down enough that they could talk. Molly set out to explain to Ginny why Harry most likely wasn’t interested in her.

“I think I have an inkling why Harry doesn’t love you like that. You know that he sees Hermione more like a sister, right? And they met when they both were just eleven. Practically grew up together. Ron’s his best friend, almost like a brother. When you met Harry, you were just eleven yourself, and Harry was only twelve. I suspect he just sees you as a sister. Maybe he isn’t even able to see you as a young woman. It happens when two people are close during childhood.” Ginny didn’t react in any way, still sniffling and pressed into Molly’s side. “Your father and I were in the same House, but we never interacted much until we were well on our way to being adults. I know it’s not what you want to hear, but it will probably make you happier to let go of your… idea of Harry and take a look at all the other boys.” Calling Ginny’s interest a fixation probably wouldn’t help matters, so Molly quickly chose another word. Maybe she should have started to protest Ginny’s insistence she would marry Harry Potter once they both had finished school when it first started, when Ginny had been learning to read. In a way she felt responsible for the situation as it was now.

Molly stayed with a distraught Ginny well into the night, and only left once her little angel was asleep. Maybe she needed to distract her girl the next few days and set her mind on other boys before she was to return to Hogwarts.

Sunday, 31st of December

Flimm woke Harry early in the morning on this special day, just as he had asked the elf to do. It had taken a little convincing, but in the end Flimm had agreed to let Harry prepare the breakfast for this day. Marvolo’s first birthday since he regained a body and was trying to follow a different way.

Harry was convinced that a birthday was just as important as a family Christmas, so making breakfast seemed a good way to acknowledge the fact that Marvolo and Harry were a family now, and that Harry cared for Marvolo. At first Harry hadn’t thought he should – or even could – care for the man who had been Voldemort, but long talks with Mrs. Goyle had convinced him that no one had a right to demand explanations for how Harry felt, or got to dictate who he could care about or not.

Marvolo had made an effort to do right by Harry ever since he had adopted him. There probably were lots of people who would claim that Harry just could not forgive what had happened in the past, but as Mrs. Goyle had pointed out, they were not the ones living Harry’s life.

Only a blind man with no sense for his surroundings could have missed Marvolo’s habit of picking the sweetest dish available at any given time. So he had created an apple compote, porridge with nuts, raisins, and a number of different sweet additional toppings to choose from, a sweet bread that was great with orange marmalade, and a big stack each of pancakes and waffles.

He had just finished arranging the table and casting warming charms – and cooling charms – on the food so it would stay the perfect temperature when he heard Marvolo move down the stairs.

Preparing their cups of tea just the way they normally took it, Harry was standing by the table the moment Marvolo walked in, as usual dressed in finely tailored robes.

“Good morning, Henry...” was the absent-minded greeting that trailed off at the end when Marvolo looked up. Harry just had to grin at that look of astonishment.

“Happy birthday, Marvolo.” Harry waved his hand at the table and the food waiting for them. “I made breakfast. All of your favourites, and a few basics.” When Marvolo only blinked a few times, slowly, before nodding and turning towards Harry, the teenager had trouble containing his laughter. It hadn’t been intended as a prank, but it seemed it had the effects of one.

“Thank you, Henry. It’s not as if my birthday was ever really ignored, but never did someone go to these lengths to make me happy. Thank you indeed.” Marvolo sat and Harry followed suit, pleased that his simple idea had been so well received.

They filled their plates with the food Harry had prepared, as well as fresh fruit and a few savoury dishes Flimm had insisted on, starting their normal morning routine in silence. The holidays hadn’t been all that long, but Harry had noticed that it was easy to fall into a routine that felt comfortable.

They split the Daily Prophet and each read their respective parts while eating to their heart’s content. “Do you have any plans for today?” Harry wanted to know. “I know there won’t be a party, but maybe a visit to the theatre, or something?” He wasn’t really sure what Marvolo would like to do on his birthday. Dudley had always invited one or two friends to go on some outing with him, and others Harry knew would invite all their friends to a party with lots of food and games.
Marvolo was more of the outing kind of guy – at least in Harry’s eyes – and probably had had enough of parties with a large number of people for the next few months.

“I haven’t planned much. First I’ll have to deal with that,” Marvolo waved to indicate a basket filled with letters and scrolls placed there by Flimm and ignored by Harry until now, “and later we’ll be visiting Marcus for dinner. I asked Xerxes yesterday and he agreed. The rest of the day I hoped to spend at home enjoying a few quiet hours for once.”

“You’ll have to write a response to each one?” Harry made a grimace in sympathy, but then had to grin over the prospect of seeing Marcus again so soon. “Before you open all those letters, I want to give you your birthday present.”

Marvolo’s look clearly said that he had thought the breakfast was all that he would get, and was all, or even more than, he had expected to get.

Harry stood, suddenly nervous, and called “Flimm!” in the previously arranged signal to bring down the easel which supported the painting Harry had finished in time. A few steps brought him over to the cloth covered canvas. “I made this for you.” He shuffled his feet and felt ridiculous.
Why was he so nervous? Who was he kidding? He had put a lot of work into this and now feared that Marvolo wouldn’t like his present.

With deliberate movements Marvolo stood, walked around the table and stopped next to Harry in front of the easel. Then he waved his hand and the cloth moved upwards to hover up and away, revealing the painting underneath.

Harry watched Marvolo’s face and felt relief when he saw wonder and a hint of happiness in Marvolo’s red eyes.

“That’s a really good painting of Hogwarts. I think I remember the spot you stood in to paint this. You haven’t been working out in the cold all the time, have you?”

Harry laughed, feeling like dancing now that his gift had been accepted. “I only made the first sketch standing there. After that I worked in the dorm. Hermione helped me with getting the material. It was fun. But animating the snowflakes to actually fall wasn’t possible anymore. I guess that’s something I’ll have to try another time.”

“We’ll have to find a good spot for it. I want everyone visiting to see it. Maybe we can move another picture to a different spot…”

They searched for a place to hang the picture and found one in the hall, where they moved the picture of an autumn forest to one of the guest rooms. After that Marvolo opened all his mail. Harry helped, and snorted more than once over the phrases that were used over and over again. It was pretty clear that there was obligation at work here, not real interest. And a lot of people obviously didn’t even care enough to pretend.

oooOOooo

Marvolo, Henry, and a once again shrunken Nagini were sitting at the dinner table with Mr. London, Marcus, and a few other kids. Nagini currently was slithering from one child to the other, getting scratches on her head and snatching a few small bites of bacon.

The fact how at ease the children were around his snake assured Marvolo that the decision to buy a snake for the science classroom had been a good one. To reduce prejudice, one had to start early on.

“What’s your favourite colour?” a little girl asked of Henry, who made a contemplative face. Marvolo watched with interest the way his son interacted with the small children while he ate his own roast and vegetables. He needed to set a good example.

“I guess I have more than one,” Henry finally answered. “I like the gold-yellow-red combination of Gryffindor, but green is a really nice colour too. And there isn’t much that reminds me more of the freedom of flying as a sky-blue.”

Several little heads nodded solemnly, forcing Marvolo to quickly cover his amused snort with a cough. It was just too funny seeing such young children so earnest. After the declarations of various favourite colours had finished, the conversation moved on to favourite animals, foods, and more of the same.

Even as it was funny conversing with young children, Marvolo feared that the novelty would wear off soon. It really was hard to believe he actually was working towards adopting Marcus and becoming the adult responsible for the boy’s life. The thought might even be more fearsome than death. Not something he had ever expected to happen. But that was true for a lot of things that had happened since the summer.
“What’s your favourite colour, Father?” Henry suddenly involved Marvolo in the conversation, who now found himself the centre of attention of all the children and an amused-looking Mr. London.

“I guess I like both the deep green of a dark forest, and the red of rubies, Henry. And before you ask, my favourite animal is the snake, or more specifically the boa constrictor,” Marvolo answered, giving the cheeky brat – he was grinning from ear to ear – a short little glare.

“Why do you call Harry Henry? Isn’t Harry his name?” Marcus suddenly wanted to know, looking curiously from one to the other.

Now the look between the two visiting wizards became uncomfortable. Of course Marvolo had stuck to his promise not to assume a familiarity that wasn’t there and address his adopted son by his new actual name instead of the nickname all his friends were using. And now they had to explain this somehow and in a way that the children sitting around them would understand.

“Well,” Marvolo started struggling to find words that would work, but managed to sound certain of himself. It always was a good skill to appear confident and sure, whatever one’s true state was. “Henry is the name that is listed on his birth-certificate. As Harry is one of the more common nicknames for someone named Henry, he has elected to introduce himself as Harry to those he feels close to.” Marcus still looked confused and turned to Henry when the teenager started to speak.

“Until I was adopted, everyone called me Harry. I was just a kid then, and I think father now calls me Henry all the time to help me get used to being called that. You see, soon I’ll be an adult myself, and adults don’t call each other by their nicknames all the time.”

“I want to have a nickname too!” Marcus claimed with conviction and soon a flurry of alternatives were offered from the kids sitting around them. Some of the ideas were absolutely silly – like snake-tamer – and others simply not really something that Marcus felt fitting.

In the end Marvolo ended that line of discussion before it could get even more out of hand and end with tears. “Most nicknames that aren’t obvious choices from a name come with time. Don’t rush it, Marcus, I’m sure you’ll have a nickname in time.”

After that Marvolo directed the conversation and noticed that keeping it from going in a dangerous direction was not as easy with children as it was with a group of members of the Wizengamot. And required a lot of the same skills.

It didn’t take long until it was time for bed, and Marvolo was pressured into telling a bedtime story to all the kids. Quickly everyone agreed upon The Fountain of Fair Fortune, and Marvolo started to read with Marcus nestled into his side. “Make a higher voice for the witches!” one child demanded once Marvolo reached the part of the three witches sharing their tales. With an internal sigh Marvolo started to make different voices for each of the characters in the story, much to the delight of the children listening. And to the amusement of the adults who also had made it over to the sitting room where everyone had found a seat on a chair, a blanket on the floor, or one of the many cushions scattered around the room.

Once the story was finished, the children – among them a few bemused looking teenagers – were ushered off to their beds, and Marvolo picked himself up from the cushion Marcus had insisted they sit on, closing the book to give back to Marcus. “Sleep well, Marcus. And pleasant dreams.”

Small arms wrapped around Marvolo as close to his middle as Marcus could reach. “Good dreams, Marvolo.” And off he was, running after the others, his book clutched securely in his hand.
“You’re a great storyteller,” Henry remarked as he slowly picked his way through the mess on the floor over to Marvolo’s side.

“You thank you, Henry. I once made an effort to school my voice to exactly that effect, if for another purpose than reading bedtime stories.” He hummed contemplatively before giving Henry a grin and a raised brow. “Maybe we should add such training to your schedule this next summer. It obviously has a number of benefits.”

Henry rolled his eyes and asked with obvious sarcasm. “You’re already making a list, aren’t you?”

Marvolo chuckled and only nodded in response.

“I might need to pressure you to come by more often for the bedtime story,” Mr. London remarked. “Especially the older kids tend to avoid company most of the time.”

Surprised, Marvolo gave the squib a questioning look. “I fear I might not have the time to start a new career as professional storyteller.”

“Too bad. Have a nice trip home. Lord Slytherin. Heir Slytherin-Potter.” The man gave a bow so well executed that Marvolo almost was sure his suspicion that this man had grown up part of a family of high social standing was correct. But as the man obviously didn’t want his familial connections known, and there was no current need to get to know them, Marvolo let the matter drop.

Both he and Henry grabbed their cloaks and walked to the edge of the wards. A short apparation with Henry as his passenger brought them home, where they parted for a moment, planning to meet up in the study to go over the steps they wanted to take in their goal to adopt Marcus into their small family.

Maybe it was time to get Henry’s opinion on his tentative plans to find himself a partner for marriage.

ooOoo

Harry quickly walked down the stairs to the Lord’s study, where he was to meet with Marvolo. The evening had been nice, and seeing Marvolo read a story to all the children had been something else. For a moment he had imagined how it might have been to have someone read him a story about witches and a knight when he had been Marcus’ age. Aunt Petunia certainly never would have picked such a story, as she and Uncle Vernon had even prevented Dudley from seeing anything on the telly which had any mention of magic. And anyway, Dudley had never had the patience to sit through a story being read to him. Harry remembered quite clearly the few instances in the early years in school when the teacher was reading them a story, where he had to avoid punches and pinches from a bored Dudley.

Shaking his head to banish this fruitless train of thought – he was fifteen going on sixteen, not five – Harry raised his hand to knock on the door to the study. When he heard the “Come in!” from inside he opened the door and stepped in.

“Come and sit,” Marvolo said, an opened letter in his hand. “Do you want to have something to drink?”
“I would like a cup of hot chocolate, please,” Harry answered, picking one of the two chairs by the desk to sit down in.

“Madame Longbottom wrote to me. She is working on sorting out the adoption mess and has drafted the Minister to help. She wanted to inform us, and claims that my involvement in this would probably be an obstacle instead of an asset. So with a little luck it won’t be long into the new year before we can adopt Marcus.” Marvolo sounded satisfied with the development, and Harry had to agree that Neville’s grandmother probably was the best witch for this. She was determined, imimidating, and known to be supportive of the light agenda. Where some people would be contrary just because Marvolo wanted something, Madame Longbottom wouldn’t encounter the same problems. “That’s good. Marcus certainly would benefit from getting here before the summer holidays. So he gets you all to himself for the first weeks or even months.”

“You think that’s something he needs?” Marvolo sounded normal enough, but Harry had spent a lot of time talking to him, so he was pretty sure he had seen a short spark of fear or maybe worry in the other’s red eyes.

“I think he would probably have an easier time adjusting? But I’m not sure and not an expert.” In that moment Flimm had the drinks appear on the desk, which offered Harry the opportunity to conceal his awkwardness by sipping from his cup.

“Maybe we should consult Madame Goyle about this. She certainly is more of an expert on this than either of us,” Marvolo decided after adding three spoons of sugar to his tea, stirring thoroughly.

Fiddling with his cup, Marvolo took a deep breath, and Harry wondered what he wanted to talk about that he was so obviously nervous, even in their own home. “Concerning the question Marcus asked earlier. I understand that you might never be comfortable with letting me use a more familiar address. Frankly I’m astonished that we have come so far. When I decided on my new path this last summer, I never expected to find a true family. I’m not averse to calling you Harry. But I can understand if you never feel enough at ease with me to grant me the privilege to use it.”

Harry had no idea how to react to this declaration and chose to change the topic to the next steps in the overhauled adoption process. Marvolo allowed the change without protest, and when they finally retired to bed, it was as if Marvolo never had spoken about his wish for a more openly acknowledged closeness as father and son.

Chapter End Notes

Riada, thanks for bringing up the memory that Marvolo gave to Severus. I hope what I added works for most of you.
And I wanted to thank Montara for letting me “watch” the way through the story by making a comment on every chapter! I love when someone does that :D

Thanks to Jordre and Jake for helping to improve my spelling!

During his long shower under gloriously warm water, Harry had thought about Marvolo’s declaration of the previous evening. It had been good that they had dropped the topic, and that the awkwardness had vanished after that. That way Harry had gained some time to think about it.

All in all, it probably was about time to allow Marvolo to call him Harry. Just as the Weasleys did, and most of his year mates from both Gryffindor and Slytherin.

But despite the closeness that had developed between them, Harry was still reluctant to take that step. Maybe talking with Mrs. Goyle would help him to sort out his head.

Until then there was still enough to do to distract him from thinking about it.

Harry was quickly dressed, his hair brushed so it didn’t look too messy, and he quickly walked down the stairs to where he could sense the delicious smells of breakfast.

“Good morning, Henry. A happy New Year to you,” Marvolo greeted, folding the newspaper and placing it to the side.

Harry smiled. It was a really nice feeling of home, the smell of sweet tea, fresh toast, grilled tomatoes and mushrooms… it was nice to know he would get to eat his fill. Lightly shaking his head to derail that particular train of thought, Harry smiled back. “Happy New Year to you too. I hope you had a good night’s sleep. Nagini was searching for a warm place and woke me.” In fact her cold body near his feet had interrupted his sleep more than once that night, but she had insisted on staying under his covers.

“As she chose to stay in your bed, I had no trouble sleeping,” Marvolo said with a grin, picking the Prophet back up. Harry rolled his eyes and sat down in his usual place.

For a moment they ate in silence, and Harry went through the schedule for the day. As this was the evening of the New Year Ball of the Ministry – the last of the many events he had to attend this season – there wasn’t a lot planned. So maybe he should spend the morning revising. It would make Hermione happy at least.

“I wanted to ask you something,” Marvolo started after Harry had finished his first plate of breakfast and was contemplating if he should take one of the oranges. “I’ve been pondering for some time now – and even more since we learned about Marcus – the expectations for me to Harry felt his brow rise at the ambiguous way Marvolo described a potential partner. Most wizards would have spoken of a woman. Marvolo hadn’t specified. Maybe just like Sirius, his adoptive father had no preference in a partner one way or the other. “I guess that would depend.” Harry wasn’t sure how he would feel if they were to add another adult to their family, but he had learned during his therapy not to jump to conclusions with so little information.

So asking a few more questions was probably a good idea. “Do I know this person? Do you love them?” Why else would Marvolo ask something like this now, if there was no concrete reason to do so? Maybe he sounded a little colder than he wanted to be. And Harry felt the tension in his shoulders. While the addition of Marcus was decidedly a good thing, this was a risk. Or at least it felt like one.

Marvolo carefully set his cup down, looking clearly surprised, blinking slowly. “No. I’m not in love with anyone. This is a purely theoretical discussion.” The older wizard pinched his nose and Harry waited for more of an explanation, barely refraining from moving to sit on the edge of his seat. “By now I’m pretty sure that I have no interest in any kind of romantic relationship. So I would have to find someone with similar preferences. Anything else would most likely cause problems.” That sentence held a world of omitted information. But before Harry could find time to identify the missing bits, or ask questions, Marvolo had continued to speak. “This has become more urgent now, as the expectations of society for a young Lord to marry get more pronounced if a young child is part of the picture.” Marvolo took a sip of his tea and Harry tried to wrap his head around this conversation. Sirius had broadened Harry’s knowledge and perception on the interactions between people in a romantic sense. The Dursleys never had allowed for the possibility that there was anything else than attraction between men and women. What little Harry had seen of other families had only reinforced this picture. Romantic love was something happening between a man and a woman leading to marriage. Always.

Living in a boarding school among teenagers had shown him the possibility that girls might be interested in other girls, and boys in other boys. But that it was possible to simply not be attracted to anyone… that was something new.

“Why bow to the expectations of society at all in this?” Harry asked with a frown. There had been a time when he had wished Marvolo would follow the rules and laws more than he probably did. But in this there was no reason to do what others thought was the right thing. Just as he didn’t follow what others thought he should feel, Marvolo shouldn’t marry just because others thought he should.

“I certainly would prefer not to marry at all. But we would have an easier time with the adoption of Marcus – now that the rules have changed – if our family matched the traditionally expected… composition.”

Harry nodded slowly. That was a reasonable point. Living in Privet Drive and all the newspaper articles about himself in the Daily Prophet had taught Harry that people loved to gossip and were quick to judge. But if you had a tragic story while fitting their expectations, they would side with you. The tragic young man recently freed from a curse, the orphan adopted by that man, with a young love and the noble cause of taking in another orphan… it would make for great headlines. That much was clear.

But there were other things to consider.

“Wouldn’t that complicate other things?” Harry asked, shooting Marvolo a questioning look with a raised brow. After all, there was still the little matter that the official story of Lord Marvolo Slytherin didn’t match that well with reality.

To that Marvolo gave a slow conceding nod. “Any spouse would fall under the same family oaths as you and I. But I agree that a certain level of understanding between a potential partner and me would be needed. I’m not all that optimistic that it’s an easy task. But as it would affect you just as much as me, I felt it prudent to speak with you at this point.”

With a sigh Harry took up that orange he had stared at and started to peel it, shredding the peel in the process and filling the air with its appetizing scent. That sounded as if it wasn’t all that likely Marvolo would find a partner. And maybe someone as a partner for Marvolo would help keep the peace, help make the changes Marvolo wanted to make the legal way. “I guess that there’s no reason not to meet whoever you may find?” It sounded too much like a question for Harry to feel comfortable. But in the end he simply didn’t feel comfortable with this conversation at all.

Having a little brother in Marcus was one thing. Getting another parent… he really didn’t feel good with that prospect. “Why not hire a nanny? There’s reason enough for us to not want another big upheaval at the moment.”

“Well, either way we’ll need a nanny. I have no idea how to care for such a young child. It’s not as if anyone would have trusted me to look after their children once I was out of school…” Marvolo trailed off and gave Harry a sad smile. “But I guess together we’ll manage to beat the odds and provide Marcus with everything I never had, and you never had.”

When Harry walked back up to his room – to work on his revision and the last bits of his homework – he thought that once again there had been a lot of things that hadn’t been said between them. But enough had been said. Harry and Marvolo were a family. They would look out for each other, and would do all they could to give Marcus a family as well. The way to this point had been anything but straight, but in the end it wasn’t that important.

With a smile on his lips, Harry got out his potions notes and started on the revision.

oooOOooo

Once again Severus had thrown himself into his best robes – amusing Sonja greatly with his scowl – for yet another inane social event.

Maybe not as inane as many of the others that had taken place the whole of December, but the mix of guests left much to be desired. There were too many people among the guests who were working for the Ministry.

But currently he stood together in a group with a nice mix of potions enthusiasts and healers, talking about the newest developments in the field of Potions. “There was a story that someone with kids in school told me,” said Healer Smethwyck from St. Mungo's while turning a little more towards Severus. “The story claims that there's a potion in development to enable two wizards to have a biological child with the help of a surrogate mother. I confess to being intrigued. Is there any credibility to this story? It seems too fantastic to be true. Almost like those stories about wizards with some dubious ancestry carrying their own children.” All around the witches and wizards gave polite laughter. Severus felt inclined to agree that those stories tended to be unbelievable, unclear on any substantial details, and most likely were fairy tales. But the insinuation that his work on the two-father potion was not something worthy of acknowledgement stung.

“The first test with the potion is going well. The first subject is well into the second term of her pregnancy, and all is going as well as can be expected. Of course the viability of this can only be evaluated after the child is born and the test is repeated with other fathers and surrogate mother. But at the moment I’m confident that my work, which is sponsored by Lord Slytherin, will lead to a viable way for two wizards to father a child together.” Severus watched with quite a bit of internal glee as the faces of all those around him morphed from amused laughter into more serious expressions. Each of them knew what a revolution this would be, enabling gay wizards to break with the tradition of marrying a woman anyway just for having children, instead of getting together with another wizard.

For a while Severus answered various questions about his methodology in testing the potions and his failures on the way, but refused to answer questions about the three involved in this test, or the exact composition of the potion. Sonja’s presence at his side was a welcome anchor in the whirlwind of conversation. Maybe he would be able to bear the hubbub of a potions conference with her at his side. He hadn’t been to one since he had attained his Mastery. The general din of rumours, gossip, and mocking of those that hadn’t managed to invent something new in a while had always made him weary of those gatherings. The fact that most were taking place during times he needed to be at the school teaching had always been a convenient excuse. But with his wife at his side, he might enjoy the exchange between experts that also happened there.

“Why start with a potion to enable two wizards to have a child together? Why not attempt to enable two witches to have a child together?” A young healer in training – a witch in this case whom Severus could barely recall from his potion classes – asked. There was definitely a dangerous glint in her eyes, and Severus guessed that he might had been hard on her in potions, interfering with her wish to become a healer.

But that’s not what she had asked. With calm professionalism Severus answered her question. “I’m working on the base provided to me: the failed attempts of Salazar Slytherin, who was motivated by his wish to provide one of his sons with the ability to have a child with his lover.” Excited murmurs erupted in the group surrounding them. “I combined his theories with more recent information on human procreation to refine his methods, and change a few ingredients. He had tried to use blood or hair from both fathers. I changed that component of the potion and the procedure to be used. But I agree that a similar potion to achieve the same for two witches is a worthy challenge to develop, and a worthy goal to work for.”

That wasn’t what the young witch had expected to hear. Most likely she had expected that this hadn’t crossed his mind, or that he wouldn’t acknowledge the existence of witches in the same circumstances as gay wizards had often found themselves throughout time. She blinked a few times in surprise before regaining her equilibrium. “So you’ll attempt something like this next?” She clearly wasn’t convinced that he would feel inclined to do so.

“It’s an interesting challenge. While the need for a surrogate to carry the child would fall away. I have no idea how to get a genetic sample from the mother not carrying the child. I guess the work on the potion for two fathers will only be of little help.” The discussion spiralled into other topics from there, quickly reducing the group of them to only those really interested in potions, which enabled Sonja to feel secure enough to start participating. The fact that she was a Squib among fully qualified witches and wizards sometimes made her hesitate to engage in conversation not directly tied in with her field of expertise.

“Are you enjoying yourself?” Severus asked her when their group decided to retreat to a much cosier sitting area and they were walking through the rooms.

“Immensely,” she whispered back almost conspiratorially. “I love watching you discuss your work with this much passion!” They exchanged a quick kiss, and then re-joined the group which had already started to discuss the different merits of peppermint and its various substitutes in headache-relief potions.

The halls of the Ministry were filled with people in their finest robes. Those varied from years out of style and fraying at the edges, to the most up-to-date creations of velvet and silk. Sometimes even dragon hide, or some fancy pelt. It was a curious mix, and maybe the most entertaining of the gatherings.

The fact that there were also dignitaries of other countries at this New Year's Ball made it even more interesting for Sirius.

Currently he was dancing a line dance with a young French wizard who had as much fun flirting with Sirius, as Sirius had with flirting with the exceptionally handsome dark-haired wizard. They both hadn’t spoken that much, but there truly wasn’t a real need to speak. Glances, brief touches, and smiles were all that was needed to communicate.

At the moment, Sirius was pretty sure he would get more out of the evening than just flirting and dancing.

Earlier he had spoken with his godson, who was happy that this was the last ball for this season. After that the other kids of Hogwarts age had gathered up everyone and moved over to one of the smaller rooms off the main ballroom, to play games and talk. Thankfully Harry seemed to be in good spirits.

When Sirius spotted Harry with the blonde daughter of the Quibbler’s editor among the people dancing when he guided the French wizard to one of the quieter corners of the Ministry, he had to grin. It seemed that Harry was finally stretching his wings in the dating game. And that Lovegood girl seemed like a good match for Harry. She wasn’t one of those interested in his fame.

In even higher spirits, Sirius gave the hand he was holding a lingering open-mouthed kiss, before grinning up to brown, eager eyes.

This really was a nice evening, and it was about to get even better.

Marvolo just had watched Henry and Miss Lovegood dancing the third dance in a row – he would have to discreetly check the family's history, current political goals, and the like – when Madame Longbottom came over to him, a glass of punch in her hand. “Good evening, Lord Slytherin. What a rare sight to see you standing alone.” She sounded friendly enough and she had a point.
“I’m just back from a short break.” When one was drinking warm tea and punch all evening, short breaks were just a necessity. “And I have been watching Henry dance. Mr. Bagman told me just moments ago, how much better my son has become in dancing since the Yule Ball of last year’s… no, it’s a new year now, isn’t it. So, I guess I have to say, since the Yule Ball of the last Tri-Wizard Tournament.” Marvolo nodded in the direction where Henry was just leading Miss Lovegood into another dance, this one belonging to the group of more recently invented pair-dances. “He told me that Henry had considerable trouble in the one dance he performed then.”

Madame Longbottom nodded. “Neville told me that the ball had been fun, when he wrote home. But he wasn’t the centre of all the attention. I imagine opening a ball without any training beforehand and while still so young would be intimidating.”

Marvolo felt that this concluded the pleasantries customary at the beginning of every conversation. He was curious to learn what the formidable witch had managed to get done on the mess that adoptions in wizarding Britain currently were.

“Cornelius wasn’t aware of the changes, but that’s hardly surprising. We had a look at all the unfinished changes, and Cornelius had his assistant – Molly Prewett’s boy Percival – asking around. It seems as if a new hire – an assistant for several administrative offices – a Miss Susan Summers, has started the whole mess. She’s currently on holiday. So we couldn’t ask her for her motivation, or if she was acting on her own accord or at the behest of someone else.” Madame Longbottom clearly was agitated over the whole topic. The way she spoke with expressive arm movements was a clear indication, as she normally was a picture of the composed older Lady.

“I agree that finding a solution has priority over finding out who started the mess and for what reasons. What are the Minister’s thoughts on the situation?” Marvolo was glad that someone widely regarded as a light witch had taken such an interest in this. Madame Longbottom would have an easier time sorting this out. She was a woman and was respected in large parts of their society, and as a grandmother who had raised her grandson while his parents were in hospital, no one could claim she didn’t know enough about rearing children.

“Yes. A solution is the most important. Cornelius is about to set up a new office to take over the coordination of all the new steps. First we tried to just reverse the mess. But the members of the different offices were averse to such a step. Some were outraged that the Minister tried to intervene. Others are of the opinion that the procedure was in long need of an overhaul. I guess we’ll have to make an amendment to the existing laws to make that office responsible for overseeing the compliance of the procedures with the laws. Any ideas who might be the right person to have this office? Cornelius pointed out that there aren’t that many adoptions that they would have enough to do all year round. And he’s right.”

“Not from the top of my head, but I’ll think on it.” Marvolo nodded, already going over a list of his people in the Ministry. “What do you know about this Miss Summers? Maybe we can deduce her motives before she’s back from her holiday.”

“Mr. Weasley said that she was in his year, and a Gryffindor. As far as her colleagues could tell, she’s a muggle-born. I guess that’s the reason no one really knows where she is.” Madame Longbottom answered with an expression of concentration on her face.

“Maybe she felt that the procedures for adoptions are outdated? Henry’s friend Hermione Granger, Heiress Lestrange, had a clear opinion on the matter. I guess it’s not unreasonable to think others might feel similar.” Marvolo noticed with amusement how Madame Longbottom blushed a little. He hadn’t expected that she would feel embarrassment over the fact that she hadn’t approved of his adoption of Henry. But it was a clear indication that she now thought otherwise.
“That’s a possibility.” The older witch – older in appearance at least – conceded with a nod.

“So the discussion I had to witness will not repeat?” a female voice suddenly asked from the side, and both Madame Longbottom and Marvolo turned quickly to see who had spoken.

“Madame Bones, what a surprise,” Marvolo greeted, still feeling a little on edge around this witch. She was much too aware of people and their motives for him to feel really safe around her. She had been there when the werewolves had attacked her party, had seen how his Death Eaters still turned to him for orders. She had indicated, in the way she had asked him for how he wanted to proceed back when Fenrir had attacked the Burrow, that she expected him to insist on being in the role of commander… She clearly wasn’t as easily taken in by his story as all the others had been.

ooOoo

Since Amelia had overheard that conversation between Lord Slytherin and Severus Snape – she still was a little surprised that the proud man had taken up the mantle of Lord Prince – she had found herself going back to what she had heard over and over again. It didn’t happen all that often that she heard of someone openly admitting to their lack of sexual needs. And the fact someone so widely known and spoken about wasn’t really trying to hide it was something that didn't happening often. Maybe he really would manage to change the customs as he was slowly changing the status of werewolves, and the view on muggle-born children.

But she needed to know more about him before she could even contemplate marrying him while openly communicating that she only did so because they both were searching for a partner, or probably better put, a companion, not because there was anything remotely sexual happening between them.

She remembered clearly that he had said a partner would have to be able to stand their ground – Amelia was sure she would be able to do that – but not hold his past over his head – she wasn’t sure she would be able to let the past rest – she was old enough to have the life experience to keep up with him, and they shared at least a few interests.

But there still was the issue that she knew virtually nothing of the man behind the public façade. How much of the young man who fell under a curse, how much of the ruthless Dark Lord, how much of the consummate politician, and how much of the caring father was really a part of him? What was an act? What was true?

It was unlikely this really would lead to anything in the end. But… she felt curious as she hadn’t since she had left school. So she walked through the halls of the Ministry’s New Year’s Ball with her eyes peeled for the striking figure of Lord Slytherin. He obviously made an effort to look the part, and kept in shape, as his body showed.

When she spotted her target standing near to the dance floor, talking with Augusta Longbottom, she made her way over to them.

She got to hear the end of their discussion and was glad to hear that Madame Longbottom had taken up the task of solving the problem of the adoption process. With a smirk on her lips she took the last steps and posed the question that came to her mind the moment she heard what the two of them were talking about. “So the discussion I had to witness will not repeat?”
“Madame Bones, what a surprise,” Lord Slytherin said and Amelia noticed with amusement how quickly his mask flickered over into one of polite emptiness, just like the one most of the members of the Wizengamot wore all the time. He had let his guard slip a little around Madame Longbottom, a renowned light witch. That was a surprise, and only made the riddle more interesting.

“A surprise, Lord Slytherin? Why? You certainly must have known that I would be here, just as any other person working here. I’m certainly not surprised to see you and your Heir here, or the large number of journalists, or entrepreneurs.” It was fun teasing the man. And if the glint in his blue eyes was any indication, he saw the humour as well.

“That’s true. But I had thought that you would have no real interest in talking with me, Madame Bones. After all, besides the few times we have interacted in the Wizengamot, or the two times that we found ourselves on the same side of a battle, we have hardly interacted at all.” Lord Slytherin projected an honest air of confusion. He clearly was a really good actor. But that was something that could be said about almost all the most successful politicians.

“Isn’t that reason enough to change the pattern of our interaction? Use this event to get to know each other better? As I plan to stay in this position for years to come, we’ll continue to have to work together.” Amelia smiled and was aware it was closer to a sharp knife than a happy expression.

Lord Slytherin’s lips curled into a small smile before settling back into the polite mask. “A polite talk in the Ministry building certainly offers an opportunity to get to know a person that differs significantly from the one offered by a fight for one’s life. Even if I have to say that one can learn a lot about a person by fighting alongside them.”

“If you would excuse me?” Madame Longbottom said with a suspicious glint in her eyes, giving them a nod and then leaving them alone.

“I have learned that you clearly keep practising your duelling, Lord Slytherin. And that time without a body is not something that changes patterns in spellcasting.” Amelia kept a close eye on Lord Slytherin and thought she saw a flicker of surprise in those eyes. He blinked slowly a few times, as if truly surprised.

“I guess you might be right. I… never thought about it. But I hope you have recognized that the repertoire of my spells is different now that I’m no longer… out of my mind.” Amelia nodded, still concentrating to catch every flicker of expression she could. She had noticed that not one illegal spell had been cast by Lord Slytherin in either confrontation. And after the clean up that had been done at the underground lake, she knew that not one of the things Lord Voldemort had known were forgotten by Lord Slytherin. So it was a choice on his part not to use those spells. That he had managed to do so in a fight attested to a strong awareness of what was and wasn’t illegal, and a strong desire to follow the rules. What she couldn’t deduce from what she had seen so far was his motivation for that desire to follow the laws. Was it a true desire to turn over a new leaf? Maybe even a case of bad conscience? Or was it just the easier route to take? Feign a law-abiding life publicly, and do what he wanted in private?

She really didn’t know. And that troubled her. “Yes, I certainly noticed that. But as I’m sure you know, the Aurors and Hit Wizards made a point of watching all the memories they could get their hands on, as often as they could, to get an idea of You-Know-Who’s fighting style, searching for a weakness. I concentrated on the shields and less lethal spells. Those motions haven’t changed one bit.”

Pretty soon they were talking about battle tactics, and Amelia noticed with some surprise that Lord Slytherin happily discussed past attack patterns with her, and even started to ask about defence methods that one could use to defend others from a group when getting to the fight after the attack already had started.

Lord Slytherin clearly was a riddle worth solving, and Amelia felt she would have fun doing just that.

Wednesday, 3rd of January 1996

“Eighty-one was a profitable year for us.” Sam nodded politely as the owner of this pub – or maybe club, it seemed to be somewhat of a hybrid form – rambled on and on. For some reason he had started with the founding of this establishment to explain why he had written in response to one of the adverts Sam had posted in several newspapers. “The conference centre just down that street was new and brought a lot of people who wanted to have a nice few drinks after a long day. Sadly, they had to close a few years back. But I guess that would happen once the number of guests who came from there had decreased a lot… Anyway. I remember a Olivienne who was here back in February of eighty-one. There always were a lot of academics – engineers, doctors, lawyers – but few women, and even fewer black women with French names.” The man nodded decisively, moving as if to take a glass down from the shelves behind the bar. “You sure you don’t want to drink something?”

“I’m sure, thanks.” Sam declined for the fifth – or maybe even sixth – time. “Are you sure that she had been to the conference centre that day? And do you remember anything else? Other people she was with? Maybe what conference she attended?” This really sounded like the most promising lead of all those he had received and followed up on. There had been so many obvious false answers, and even more too-vague ones, but this? This might actually be a clue.

“Yeah, they all had those name tags, and big entrance cards and stuff around their necks. She had one of those when she came in, and searched for it later in the night, before she left with that good-looking man. Slim, and a lot of leather in his clothes. He ordered more than one round for everyone, and paid right there and then. Don’t get people like that so often that I wouldn’t remember them clearly. Can’t tell you the name of the conference though. Those cards never made much sense to me. And I guess it was neither the start nor the end of the month. But I can’t say what day exactly.” As Sam had declined a drink the man had replaced the glass and was now polishing those that were not yet moved to their spot.

“She met a man here and left with him?” Now that sounded like Sam had struck gold. Asking for a better description probably wouldn’t help, as Lord Black had said he had been using various disguises when going out in the city.

The owner nodded with a calculating glint in his eyes. “So you think this is a good lead?”

With a little internal sigh Sam nodded. Most of the obvious and not so obvious false leads had been people claiming to have information in hopes of getting something for it. One woman even had written claiming to be the one he was searching for. It had been rather easy to make her admit it was a lie and leave.
Sam got out his wallet to get out a fifty Pound note and slid it over to the man behind the bar. “Thanks for the help. And a good new year.” Sam was pretty sure he had gotten everything that he could have from here. As the conference centre had closed the next step wasn’t as easy as going there to ask what conferences had been held there and to go through the lists of people attending. But now he had a better idea where to search.

Walking out of the pub, Sam closed his coat. Time to go home. He had to write a report for his client.

oooOOooo

The fire in the fireplace and the few candles cast a warm glow all over the living room in Prince Manor, the turning of pages and the sound of quills being dipped in ink or moved over parchment made for a cosy atmosphere. The creation of a new potion, once the first idea was clear, always started with hours of research. Being able to share the work with a competent partner only made the process better.

“I didn’t know that there was a potion to check if a specific woman was the mother of a child. I mean, a woman usually is aware when she gave birth,” Sonja mused, placing one of the prepared ribbons into the book she currently was searching through.

“If I remember correctly, there was a Potions Mistress who was convinced that she had been switched at birth. She created the potion to confirm her claim, as she was pretty sure that her father was the one married to the woman she claimed wasn’t her mother,” Severus mused, noting down references to a few other works from the text he currently was reading.

“Did she succeed?” Sonja wanted to know, dipping her quill so she could make another note on one of her parchments.

“Not as far as I’m aware. The tale goes that she proved without a doubt that the two actually were her parents. But as we’re trying to create a potion to check for a familial connection in the past, this one should help us get a grasp on all possible connections through the maternal line.” Severus placed the quill down and looked up from the book on the table before him. Sonja was more lying than sitting on the loveseat in front of the fireplace, and they both had cups of fresh tea within reach. The problem he had been presented with by his Lord was much more complicated than either Sonja or he had thought it would be. All potions testing for the connection between a child and its parents – with only the one potion to check for the mother Sonja had just found – were limited to do just that. And what they wanted to have was a potion proving a common ancestor generations back. They both were stumped on just where to begin.

While they had identified some of the core ingredients present in each of the potions they had seen so far, and knew that the blood of the person searching out their ancestry was always used with the potion the goblins could offer, they had trouble going further than that.

“It’s fascinating how thorough the goblins and wizards have been in erasing all knowledge of the ancestry potion. One would think that there would be traces, or even just hints left somewhere,” Sonja mumured, setting her things aside to stand up and walk around for a while.
“There still is some knowledge left,” Severus stated drily, bringing Sonja to turn around so she could see him, raising a brow in silent question. “We know that there is a body part of a goblin involved.”

Sonja snorted and resumed her pacing. “Well, why else would they be the only ones providing the potion while still insisting on making sure no one else knows how to brew it?” When Sonja fell into a brooding silence after that, Severus felt uneasiness stir in his mind.

“You are aware that the Goblins will go to war again if any witch or wizard starts so much as even thinking about re-creating the potion?” he asked his wife, who threw him a playful scowl.

“But it’s such an interesting riddle to solve! With the knowledge of potions we have, which parts of a body usually lend themselves to which use, and the knowledge of the result that this potion produces… It’s almost too easy to make a guess. I think it can’t be something like hair, or nails, or some such. They would just gather and sell that stuff for money, and would hardly start to restrict the number of tests as they have done now…”

Before she could continue any further, Severus stood from his seat, stepped into her path and captured her hands. “Please, stop.” She stopped in her pacing and fell silent. “I agree that we probably could narrow down the possibilities. But I don’t want to be known for being one of those breaking the long-standing treaty with the goblins. Let’s have a look at rituals instead. Those that once were used to get a complete medical history of a person. As far as I’m aware, there is a potion needed for them that ensures the magic goes farther back than it would do otherwise. And maybe we should identify means to combine or compare the blood given into the potion when two individuals are involved. We certainly have a lot of avenues open before we have to resort to desperate measures. Yes?”

Carefully extracting her hands from Severus’ grasp, Sonja enveloped him in her arms. “Don’t worry, love. I’ll restrain myself and will not research this matter, however tempting it may be.
Let’s go over to the library and search for books on rituals. And while we’re at it, we can plan what to do on your birthday.”

For a moment Severus was tempted to just let her search for the knowledge once forcefully removed from all potions publications, but the chances were too slim that she would actually forget his birthday – she was much too organized for something like that to slip her mind – to risk a new goblin war.

“Maybe something small. Just you and me. First going to the opera and then eating at a nice restaurant?” He offered up a plan instead of risking war. “After all the social events, some rest would be good. Don’t you think?”

Sonja laughed, releasing him from the hug. “That sounds good. And as it is the last day before the train brings the students back to the castle, we should use the opportunity until you have to be available around the clock again.”

Hand in hand they walked over to the library – now cleaned of all dust, and filled with more books moved over from Spinner’s End – to search for more texts to aid in their research.

Life very certainly was good at the moment, and Severus was determined to relish every bit of it as much as he was able.
Albus sat up in his bed, a mountain of pillows behind his back propping him up. He still tired easily and felt the effects of prolonged bed rest. He would have to start slowly once he was allowed to leave his bed and his room here at the hospital.

In the visitor's chair sat his healer, Jeremy Jugson, whom he suspected was a Death Eater. The man had just arranged his parchment on the small table he had floated over to use, ready to take notes.

“How do you feel, Headmaster?” It was a conundrum for Albus how a Death Eater could hold the position of Healer at St. Mungo’s but he had to admit that the wizard never had been accused of being a Death Eater and therefore had no records stating as much. From a purely bureaucratic point of view, everything was in order.

“I’m tired and would really like to have a walk by the shore of the lake near Hogwarts. It’s quite boring being stuck here.” Even with the ritual that had been forced on him clearly having a positive effect on his mood and ability to think, Albus felt suspicious of this Healer, an expert on the effects of Dark magic. There was no way he would ever feel safe at the mercies of such a man.

A long-suffering sigh left the wizard in lime-green robes. “Headmaster, I hope you realize that every healer of this institution has to make a vow to put the best interest of their patients before any other concerns or alliances. So any past or present family alliances, or obligations, are meaningless. Whoever comes to me for help will receive the best care I can provide. Even if their stance in politics or other fields are opposed to mine. Everything would go much smoother here if you could manage to look past your prejudices, sir.”

This objection was brought forward in such polite words and with such a friendly demeanour that Albus was taken aback for a moment. This certainly was the reason why the man had managed to get this far in his young career. “You surely can understand why I might be cautious around people who associated themselves with certain circles in the past.” If there was another Healer with as much authority in this field, Albus would have asked for that one to treat him. And maybe he should, now that he seemed to be on the mend.

Another sigh recaptured Albus’ attention. “I had thought that you would approve of someone channelling their youthful indiscretion and curiosity into something that is useful for society as a whole. I became a healer in the treatment of the effects of Dark Magic, as there always will be such a thing in the world, and people in need of help.” The Healer rubbed his eyes and took up his quill. “Anyway, this doesn’t help us in getting you back on your feet, Headmaster. So I would greatly appreciate your cooperation. If you please would answer my questions with more than the shortest answer you can come up with?”

With a conceding nod Albus gave in. He could see the point, even if he would love to have a Healer more in alignment with his own political stance. Those were not easy to find, as they all generally tended to avoid working with dark magic, and therefore were lacking in the knowledge and experience needed to work with wizards and witches suffering from long-term exposure.

“Beside tiredness, do you feel any other bodily symptoms? Headaches? Pains in joints or bones? I see that there have been no more high temperatures in the last few days.” And the professionalism was back, their brief discussion and short allusion to past connections to the organisation known as Death Eaters put aside.
“I feel shaky, but my joints are only complaining on a level I have grown accustomed to. The perils of old age, I’m afraid. But I feel that I have much less appetite than I’m used to. But I’m not sure if that’s merely a side effect of the lack of foods I like.” In fact one thing he felt the loss of quite dearly was the food quality and variety offered at Hogwarts. “And I’m bored. Having nothing to do isn’t something I have experienced all that often.”

Mr. Jugson was scribbling away on his parchment, taking notes. This question and answer pattern went back and forth for some time, Albus trying to answer honestly while also keeping a close eye on the wizard asking and taking notes.

“I feel you’re making good progress, Headmaster. I will inform the medi-witch that you are allowed to go to the common room tomorrow. There you can select one of the books or magazines to take back to your room, maybe that will help holding back some of the boredom. You may also ask your visitors to bring you something to read. But remind them to keep to light reading. Nothing too complicated or upsetting. If you stay this cooperative, in the next week or so, we might be able to release you into the care of your family.”

“Will this information find its way to the newspaper as well?” The moment he had spoken, Albus realized that it might have been unwise. But the blush staining the Healer’s cheeks was pretty surprising, so Albus let his worries over his own lack of discretion drop.

“All of the staff is most distressed over this leak of confidential information. Checks of the wards around the patients' files and the anti-eavesdropping charms on our staff rooms have turned up no weak spots. And the vows we have made are airtight. At the moment, further inquiries are being made into who might have given information to Miss Skeeter and what the hospital can do to prevent further breaches of privacy.”

Albus gave a gracious nod and refrained from pointing out that Miss Skeeter might only have guessed, or lied about her source. He did not for a moment doubt that his brother might plant such information to keep him from returning to the position of Headmaster. After all, it had been Aberforth’s doing that got him into the hospital in the first place.

At the moment Albus wasn’t even sure if he could be angry with his brother for that. The safety of the students should be the main focus of the Headmaster of Hogwarts. And admittedly, since the adoption of Harry Potter by Tom his focus had slipped from that goal.

After the Healer had gone, Albus removed the pillows so he could lie down and take a nap. This constant fatigue was most annoying.

Chapter End Notes

I have written an Out-Take about the reason why the goblins went to war over the ancestry potion, and why they have reduced the number of tests available in a certain time. You can find it in my small collection of Out-takes to this story, together with a few others.

Friday, 5th of January 1996

Sirius was bounding around over the short grass on the lawn covered with a thin layer of ice and snow. This was a night of the full moon, and the moon was about to rise over the horizon. Since their time at Hogwarts they never again had had such a secure location to run in as they had now. And even though he wanted to think badly of Lord Slytherin, there was nothing he could criticise about the wards the man had set up. Sirius had spent the whole day checking them over, even as Remus had insisted that it wasn’t necessary.

And Remus had been right. And the old bookworm had known it, looking smug as hell when Sirius had come back into the room where Remus had been resting on a kind of divan bed, already under a strain because of the nearness of the full moon.

Now Remus was getting rid of his clothes – as Sirius could clearly hear, even as he kept looking elsewhere just as Remus had requested – so he wouldn’t shred the trousers, shirt, and robes during his transformation.

With enthusiasm that felt a little ridiculous – he really wasn’t five anymore – Sirius moved his nose down to the ground searching for interesting scents that might lead them into a merry chase and to something for Remus to fill his stomach with.

It was also a way to distract himself from the horrible sounds that suddenly filled the air as the moon started its ascent into the sky. Bones were breaking, things were tearing, and Remus first groaned in pain only for the sound to shift into a decidedly inhuman whine and howl. With the wolfsbane potion the transformation was less painful, but that didn’t eliminate all the discomfort. Unfortunately.

In the past Sirius had been fascinated by the shift, always watching when it happened, eagerly following the slide of muscles and rearranging of bones. The first time he had seen someone take Polyjuice potion he had seen the similarities and had to ask Remus if the change felt similar at all.

Remus had said that the transformation he went through each month was at least ten times worse.

But only now, after he had suffered himself for years in Azkaban, did Sirius understand that Remus might not actually feel comfortable with Sirius watching the transformation that closely. The fact that it had been a regular part of all the nightmares Sirius had had in his dank cell back at the prison might have contributed to his awakened awareness. In fact, the more human awareness Remus had gained through the potion he was now taking to make his transformation safer, pushed Sirius into contemplating all this, because now Remus would remember much more clearly.

Maybe earning his friend's wrath was so not worth it.

Anyway, while Sirius had found the older trail of some birds, and a fresher one of a few deer, Remus had finished his transformation, and now a shaggy wolf was standing next to Sirius, head tilted to the side as if asking what Sirius had found.

With a happy bark Sirius moved his front paws and stretched out, butt in the air, tail wagging, asking his friend to play with him. Only moments later the two of them ran, chasing each other, one of the light birch woods their destination.

This was so good. He needed to make sure that he could run with Moony each month. And how much better Moony looked. His fur was thick and free of matted or dirty patches, he had gained weight as well as muscles. It was obvious that living with a friend, regular meals, and a steady job that he loved were doing him good.

Dismissing all those grown-up thoughts, Sirius immersed himself completely in the moment, he in his animagus form – kept warm by his thick coat – running alongside his very good friend under the full moon over snow-covered ground. There wasn’t much which made him feel as free as he was now. And without the need to avoid professors or other students, there was nothing they needed to worry about.

Marvolo had apparated them to a spot within walking distance of Madame Goyles’s office. They had appointments following one after the other, and Harry’s was to be first. Marvolo had brought a few muggle books – Harry had been really surprised to see them come out of a package Marvolo had received at breakfast – he was planning to read while he waited.

“You don’t need to wait for me, you can use your portkey once your appointment is done with,” Marvolo explained, not for the first time.

Harry rolled his eyes. “I understood the first time. I’ll make Hermione proud and go over my notes for Runes again.”

Their arrival at the office building put a stop to the – admittedly short – conversation. It didn’t take long, and the two of them were inside the office being greeted by Madame Goyles. “Come in, come in. A tea, Lord Slytherin? Or do you wish to return later?”

“I’ll take the tea and will be waiting here. Back in my office the desk is covered in parchment. I’d never be able to find the peace of mind I need to read these,” he motioned his one arm where he held the books to clarify his point, “if I were to return there.”

“Sit down then,” Madame Goyles said, waving at one of the chairs in the nicely appointed room intended for patients to wait for their appointment. “Harry, do you want a tea as well? Or would you prefer something else to drink?”

“I’ll take a tea as well. Thank you.” It didn’t take long to fill each of their cups with tea and add milk, lemon, and sugar to everyone’s liking. Harry had to school his features to avoid grinning over the three heaped spoons of sugar Marvolo added to his measly cup of tea. It wasn’t even a big one! That quirk was something that Harry probably would always find funny.

Marvolo settled into one of the chairs, cup close at hand, and started reading, while Madame Goyle and Harry moved into the room where they always had their talks. Harry was nervous yet again, just like he had been before every other session before this one. He was pretty sure that they did help, but that didn’t change his nervousness about them.

“How have your holidays been? I remember that they’re quite exhausting with all those events to attend,” Madame Goyle started the conversation.

For a moment Harry was startled. He totally hadn’t thought about the fact that Madame Goyle had grown up in the magical world. Well, at least until she hadn’t gotten a letter from Hogwarts. And as an eleven-year-old would have to spend at least the school holidays with her family, it was almost a given she would have had more or less frequent contact with the magical world. “It was a lot. But I guess there isn’t really a way to get around it. Not if I want to fill the role of Lord Potter once I’m of age.” Harry shrugged a little helplessly. “And it wasn’t all bad. I got to spend time with my friends. Got to dance. At least part of it all was fun.”

“It’s good to hear that you had fun. And you’re right that all these obligations come with the title of Lord in the magical world of Britain. But I hope you’re also aware that there is no real obligation for you to pick up the title. You could just let it rest with a regent as you have now. It is an option.”

Harry frowned for a short moment. And then slowly shook his head. “I didn’t know that.” But it wasn’t that surprising. Most of those who had any interest in telling him something about how this all worked, also wanted him to actually do that job. Madame Longbottom clearly wanted him to take over where his father had left off, and his grandfather before that. Sirius hadn’t been all that thrilled with the idea, but now he had picked up his own family title, so clearly he would argue more for Harry to join him in the misery than agree with his letting the responsibility go. And Marvolo had adopted him to have an heir. But not only that. The fact that Marvolo clearly was someone who wanted power meant he probably didn’t even consider the possibility of Harry not wanting that kind of responsibility.

Then another thought struck him. “You did look that up?” Why else should Madame Goyle know of something like this?

“To effectively help you, I need to know the circumstances affecting you. So, yes I did look up a few things I wasn’t all too sure about.” Madame Goyle smiled kindly, admitting to doing research.

Harry nodded, he guessed he could accept that. And maybe Marvolo would explain how keeping a regent even when he was an adult would work. At the moment it felt good to know all this stuff, to learn how to take up the job. But as he didn’t really know what he wanted to do as a job to earn money – estate management wasn’t all that interesting – after he was finished with school, knowing all his options to get more free time was important.

“Did anything change? It was, after all, the first time since the summer that you spent more time with your guardian.” She really was good at keeping the conversation on track, while also allowing him to go off on a tangent if something came up that he felt strongly about, or needed help with.
“We found out that there’s another parselmouth. He has no family. At the moment, at least. And is cared for at the school that Lord Lestrange founded this last autumn. We want to add him to the… our family. So we’ve been meeting him a lot. So that he can get to know us, while still staying somewhere where he feels safe. You know?” Harry started explaining more than a little awkwardly. He had planned to ask Madame Goyle about how to handle all this, after all.

She nodded, not saying a word or betraying any thoughts, only smiling pleasantly, looking attentive.

“The day before the Ministry Ball, Marcus – that is, the child who’s a parselmouth – asked me over dinner why Marvolo calls me Henry. Because my name is Harry. And, well it’s kind of… hard? Marvolo later said he’d be happy to call me Harry, but could understand if I never felt comfortable with that. And I simply don’t know what to do. Because, well… it’s kind of true that we’ve become close. But on the other hand, there’s still the past. It hasn’t vanished… But I know I shouldn’t let others dictate what I need to be happy.” Harry carefully placed the now cold mug of tea down, throwing his hands up in confusion and defeat. He just couldn’t figure this out.

For a few moments silence filled the room. Madame Goyle tapped her pen a few times on the clipboard she was using to make her notes on and finally kindly but firmly pointed one thing out that Harry had known already. “Only you can make that decision, Harry. You already have listed the most important facts in this. You are close to your guardian. The past of what he did, and what happened between you, will never just vanish. Others can’t make the call on what is needed to make you happy and lead a good life.”

Harry growled in frustration. It would have been too easy, but sometimes it would be nice for something to be easy in his life.

Madame Goyle had the nerve to chuckle. “Just remember that there’s no need to make a decision about this right now. There’s time. Isn’t there?”

Harry nodded, and they slid into easier topics for a while. It was clear that Harry would have to ponder the problem with the name for a little bit longer. And at least until the Easter holidays, or even the summer, Marcus wouldn’t be living with them. And the explanation that Marvolo had come up with worked well enough.

Harry just knew that the thought would pester him until he finally came to a decision. It would be a pain for a while to come.

ooOoo

Henry looked wrung out when he stepped out of the office followed by Madame Goyle. Not too surprising, actually. Marvolo himself felt those sessions draining, and not in a good way. Confronting thoughts one normally avoided, facing uncomfortable truths… it was hard. Harder than Marvolo had thought, and harder than he ever would admit.

With a flick of his wand, Marvolo shrank the different parenting guide books he had ordered – and started to read while he had waited – and let them slip into his pocket, standing from his seat.

“I’ll come home right after I’m finished here. You don’t need to study if you don’t want to. It has been a long day already. And the essays you have shown me so far are of good quality. You can afford to have a slow evening, Henry.” And it was true too. It seemed as if only a little encouragement had been needed to help Henry apply himself to his schoolwork. Marvolo didn’t remember that much about all the lessons Quirinus had taught while supporting Marvolo’s then bodiless spirit. But he had paid attention in quite a few of the Gryffindor first-year classes. He had been interested in Harry Potter and his performance, after all. Then he hadn’t been all that impressed, even more angered over the fact that this mediocre boy had bested him somehow. But now he was pretty sure that the under-performing he had witnessed had been caused by a mixture of factors, Quirinus’ stutter being just one of them.

He watched as Henry took his portkey back to their home before following Madame Goyle into the office, where he sat down in the only place where he had neither window nor door at his back.

As usual he placed his wand in the box he had transfigured on his first visit here, before he sat back and tried to relax.

When the tomcat living in this office suddenly landed on his lap, Marvolo almost jumped out of his robes. And then the infernal thing started to purr!

Marvolo watched with speechless amazement as the cat got comfortable on his lap, of all possible places.

“He seems to like you, Lord Slytherin” Madame Goyle commented, just to dive right into the questions she usually asked. “What’s on your mind these days?”

For a moment Marvolo breathed in the long-practiced patterns of his occlumency training, his hands caressing the purring cat almost of their own volition. It was oddly relaxing.

It probably would be a good thing to get the worst, most complicated concern out of the way first. “At the moment, everything has lost importance compared to my… doubts about my suitability to be a father to a child much younger than Henry.” There, that was accurate, but didn’t state that he had felt real panic the first time he had realized that he would come to be responsible for a child as young as Marcus.

“You don’t think that you’ll be able to provide what is needed for a younger child? But you feel that you’re doing well with your teenage son?” Madame Goyle always insisted on getting him to make clear, precise statements, formulate the facts as he knew them, and above all else be honest, however hard it might be for him.

“Henry can take care of himself. He can dress on his own, now that he has suitable clothes. He can eat and not make a mess, knows when to take a shower, how to care for his teeth, how to tie his shoes. I don’t need to make sure he’s entertained, don’t need to fear he’ll play with the fire in the fireplace or torment the house-elf. There’s so much that can go wrong!” Marvolo fell silent suddenly. That had come out more panicked than he would have wanted.

“That you know of those possible problems, that you’re thinking about what might be possible problems with a young child. Both are evidence that you’ll manage, Lord Slytherin,” Madame Goyle said, not unkindly.

But her unwavering politeness didn’t really fool Marvolo. It was a mask, just like his politeness or his mask of confused uncomfortable young wizard whenever someone brought up his past deeds.
“I grew up in an orphanage during the aftermath of the Depression, and during the second world war. I don't have a single good example of a father in my past. In fact, most that should have been father figures for me I would call disastrous to emulate. How will I ever be able to provide for more than the material needs of the child?” Because between him and Henry they would make sure Marcus would have everything he could ever need. Enough food, a warm home, clothes that actually fit, games and toys. But with Henry away at Hogwarts most of the year, would he, Marvolo, be able to provide for the emotional… needs?

For a moment there was silence, only the purring of the cat making any sound, while Madame Goyle clearly pondered her answer.

“As I said, your awareness of the possible problems, and your desire to do right by the child, is more than some parents can claim for themselves. I would propose the hiring of a nanny as on-site support, freeing you of duties like helping the child dress, bathing, and other daily things along those lines. And for everything else, the willingness to try and ask for help when needed will get you a long way.” This was delivered in a matter-of-fact tone that had a calming effect on Marvolo. It was true he had planned to hire a nanny anyway. All the daily stuff would be covered that way. The thought of not being required to dress a small child was a relief.

After that they talked about what Marvolo might prepare before Marcus came to live with them. Prepare a room, find a nanny, organise a way for Marcus to get to school each morning. He felt that this might be a good way to manage his nervous thoughts. He always did better when he was able to act. Regardless how much planning and preparation were part of him, the inability to act, being forced to just wait and see what would happen was always galling. He guessed that was a characteristic that all Houses shared. Having to wait without the ability to influence the outcome, either by knowing things, working hard, scheming, or rushing in, was hard on anyone.

The talk about planning and preparations had brought another thought to the forefront of his mind. There was still a man being held captive at his Headquarters who was thought lost in some remote wilderness during bad weather. Maybe it was time to do something about that.

When he made his way home he found Henry sleeping in the library, a book on different kinds of paintings, their history, and the history of their makers open in his lap. With a smile on his face Marvolo carefully woke his son, gently shaking the boy by his shoulder. “Go to bed, Henry. Sleeping on the couch will only lead to a crick in your neck and a sore back.”

With a sleepy mumble Henry stood from the sofa. “Good night. See you at breakfast.”

“See you at breakfast. I might leave the house again for a short time, but I’ll be back before long.” He really should do something about Karkaroff.

ooOoo

When he stepped into the small room that had been Igor’s prison for many months now, the first thing Marvolo noted was the putrid smell. It was obvious that the man hadn’t been able to bathe, hadn’t gotten the best food or any access to a toilet.

A grim satisfaction settled in Marvolo as the traitorous wizard noticed his presence and started to beg, moving so he was kneeling – with obvious difficulty – raising his hands in a pleading gesture, mumbling words that were mostly unrecognisable.
He was a pathetic sight.

“You know that you’ll never leave here alive. Why do you still beg?” He would have to make sure that the body of Igor would be found near where he last had been seen. And the body needed to appear as if he had died of natural causes plausible for a man lost in a storm. Maybe a fall breaking his neck? That should be easy enough to accomplish. Maybe they would need to heal him first, erase all traces of the many hours of torture they – and before anyone else, Marvolo – had heaped upon him. The possibility that some magical investigators would get involved wasn’t something he could just disregard.

Additionally he would make sure that there would be no doubt that the body had been there the whole time. Insects, animals and scavengers would have left their mark, as would the weather.

So Malcolm would have to start healing the man, and they would have to move him, the current conditions wouldn’t help the changed goal. And until the man was a clean slate again, Marvolo would have to do some research to find the right rituals and curses to mask the fact that Igor Karkaroff hadn’t died in that storm last year, living in captivity instead.

Only one question remained. Would he kill the traitor in front of his Death Eaters? Or let them keep wondering, maybe even believing that the man still was a captive used as a tool to help Marvolo manage his anger and frustration?

That was an important decision, as either course of action could have positive and or negative reactions from his followers. He needed to weigh the pros and cons before he committed to one over the other. But first he would inform Malcolm of his newest task.

Sunday, 7th of January 1996

They were surrounded by the glaring orange of the Chudley Cannons that Ron had covered all the walls with. Quidditch players zoomed in and out of their posters, and from time to time the groaning of the ghoul in the attic was loud enough to be heard over the experiments down in the twins’ room and Ginny’s complaining about the noise.

Carefully moving one of his pawns, Harry sat back on the big orange pillow, feeling content. “I’m really hoping that Ginny’ll manage to get over her crush on me.” And how dearly Harry wished that the girl would overcome her fixation. “She’s pretty, and nice, but more like a little sister,” Harry quickly added to prevent Ron from exploding on him. His friend really tended to overdo the big-brother routine.

“I’m pretty sure those other girls had a lot to do with the whole,“ Rone waved his hand vaguely in the air, “mess. And that you’re now the heir of Slytherin on top of the whole boy-who-lived stuff didn’t help either.” Ron moved his rook, making Harry wonder how many moves the redhead was planning in advance, because he couldn’t see what this was going to accomplish, and then looked up with a thoughtful expression on his face. “Do you think it would have been easier to get a date to that Yule Ball as the heir of Slytherin?” Ron asked.

“I was a champion and the boy-who-lived back then. Can’t see how being heir of Slytherin on top of that would have helped any.” Harry shook his head, contemplating his next move. He was going to lose anyway, he was pretty sure. The chess pieces didn’t like him any, and were shouting contradictory advice all the time, which only made playing harder. “We both just waited way too long before asking any of the girls.” He huffed and sent forward one of the pieces shouting the loudest. “If I could send a message back in time, I would advise myself to just ask Hermione the first opportunity I got and be done with it.”

“Why ask Hermione? Weren’t you interested in Cho back then?” Ron asked trying to sound casual and interested. But all the lessons over summer, and the last few days, even his stay with the Slytherins at school had sharpened Harry’s senses and perception. Ron wasn’t calm at all, he was tense, trying to conceal something. Envy or jealousy maybe?

“Because she would have been a safe choice. She’s like a sister to me, and I’m like a brother to her.
No expectations – she never would want a kiss from me – and no awkwardness, because we know each other so well already,” Harry easily answered, keeping a close eye on Ron’s reaction.

Ron relaxed, grabbing a cookie from the plate Mrs. Weasley had sent up with them. “So why didn’t you ask her to the balls that you had to attend over the holidays? Why go with that Greengrass girl from our year?”

“Because she’s searching for a match. And going with me, someone with so much value on the market,” Harry and Ron made a face of distaste, both of them didn’t really like the idea of arranged marriages, “but also clearly someone who would never be a serious candidate, was going to get the right kind of attention. And she asked me first.” Harry had explained this more than once already, but could totally understand why his friends from Gryffindor tended to ask him again and again.
Marriage matches and contracts were things used mostly by the more conservative families. And most of those didn’t have a lot of children in Gryffindor.

“All those lessons on dancing and manners…” Ron trailed off, clearly searching for words, and sending forward a piece to slay one of Harry’s in an attempt to cover up his uneasiness. “Are they helping any? With girls, I mean.”

Focusing unhappily on the board between them, Harry slowly answered his friend’s question.
“Knowing how to dance removes a little of the dread over potential humiliation. Also the standard ways to ask help to have a starting point, kind of. Remember how we didn’t know how to ask?
Which words to even use? That’s better after the lessons. I guess.” Harry shrugged, trying to ignore the shouting chess figurines to find a good move to make. Holding a conversation and playing a game of chess at the same time wasn’t something that Harry was all that good at. “But Theo pointed out something at the New Year’s Ball. As they – Draco, Theo and the others – have had lessons with many of the girls their age from early on, the girls all have tons of blackmail material on them. They know their weaknesses, and some of their more embarrassing moments. They both agreed that it’s pretty horrible to even contemplate dating one of them.”

For a moment Ron looked surprised, than a look of horror crossed his face, and he paled, making his freckles stand out clearly. “That’s a terrible situation! Having the girl you like knowing how you were a stumbling idiot in dancing lessons. But you joined them much later. You like any one of them?”

Harry shook his head. From the Slytherin girls, not one really had caught his eye. They were pretty enough, but he was almost sure that he wanted someone not that tangled up in all those plots and politics, not keeping up a mask around the clock, never really letting it down even in the common room. Because all the girls third-year and up had a real tight grip on their poise even in the common room. Lots of the boys did too, but somehow the standards for them weren’t as rigid in some aspects. Not exactly fair, in Harry’s eyes. “No. I guess there’s just too much history, you know?”

“What about Cho? She’s not together with anyone as far as I know. Lavender said she’s really one of the few in sixth-year without a partner,” Ron asked next, throwing Harry a questioning glance.

Harry flinched a little, and rubbed his hand over the back of his neck. That was a minefield he would rather avoid. “She’s pretty, and she’s nice. But… with all that happened after the third task. Cedric dying… The rat did it, but… it’s complicated. Can’t see her really talking to me, now that I was adopted by the man who was brought back in a ritual right there next to Cedric’s body.” Even without the added complication of being Marvolo’s son, and the man having ordered the murder, Harry was sure Cho and he as a couple wouldn’t really have worked.

Ron hummed, nodding knowingly at Harry’s explanation. Harry frantically searched for a way to change the topic or switch the focus over to Ron, but his friend was faster. “Dad said that you were dancing with Luna Lovegood quite a lot at the ball.” Ron waggled his eyebrows, a grin on his face. “There are a lot of stories told about Ravenclaw girls. Always up for an experiment, Dean said.”

Harry felt himself blush. Really he shouldn’t have lent his book from Marvolo to all and sundry. Some of the others had really started to talk too much about such stuff for Harry’s liking. “Don’t be that way, Ron. I like that Luna simply doesn’t care about all my wealth, or that stupid celebrity thing everyone else seems to see before they see me. Luna’s just… easy to talk to, I guess.” Really, Harry just liked spending time with the younger Ravenclaw girl. She was happy and funny. It was easy to be with her, no need to keep himself in check all the time. And even the strange stuff in his life paled against the strange things she always had to tell.

“Do you think…” Ron started to ask, but then suddenly stopped speaking, blushing.

“Do I think, what?” Harry asked, interest sparked.

“Do you think, we should play something else? You’re not really paying attention. You’ll have lost in just three moves.” That clearly wasn’t what Ron had wanted to ask, but Harry wasn’t one to pry – he knew what it felt like to be asked stuff you didn’t want to talk about – and all too happy to accept a way out of this game of chess.

“Exploding Snap?” he offered, and Ron quickly agreed. After that their topic of conversation stayed on much safer ground, as Ron tried to get information on the Slytherin Quidditch team out of Harry, claiming that it wouldn’t hurt as Gryffindor and Slytherin weren’t to play against each other again this school year. Until the time Harry had to return home he laughingly declined and held off all of Ron’s attempts at information gathering.

oooOOooo

Sam sneezed. That damn dust was everywhere. It hadn’t been all that hard to find out where the old records from the closed-down conference centre had been stored. It had taken a little bit longer to get the owner of the storage facility to agree to open the storage unit and let Sam rummage around in the files and paperwork.

And while going through heaps of unrelated paperwork was a boring task, Sam was grateful for people with a tendency to hoard old files and forget they were paying for a storage unit each month. If the one keeping the books at the company which had bought and liquidated the conference centre had kept up a little bit better, or if the one doing the liquidating had been more vigorous in getting rid of no-longer-needed stuff, there would have been much less for Sam to work with.

After more sneezes, and a few paper-cuts, Sam finally found a box with the right year on all the papers inside. He was getting closer. Now he only needed to find files from February in the mess that this was.

He snorted, and moved another box over to the table he was using. He felt that it would be harder than he would like to find what he was looking for. There was no order whatsoever in these files or the way the boxes were stacked into the storage unit.

A few hours later Sam cursed himself for being right. The boxes were so mixed that he feared he would have to look through each one in turn until he finally found what he was searching for.

It was still a few hours later when Sam finally found the box with the files of February 1981. He went through the loose papers until he found lists of names. Attendance lists, lists of people registering for specific talks and presentations. That’s what he had been looking for.

It took some more time to go down the list and find the name Moreau, Olivienne on a list for the talk about the decline in number of fishes in the North Sea. The name of the conference was listed too. It was something long, using words which Sam had trouble bringing into any context he could understand. But that really wasn’t all that important. He wanted to find the woman, not converse with her about the field she had studied at university.

And there it was, on a list of people who had entered into some kind of raffle: Olivienne Moreau, Sorbonne. If Samuel remembered correctly, that was the name of part of some University in Paris. It had been mentioned in History of Magic. And Sam only remembered it because that had been the one question that he couldn’t answer in his OWL test, which cost him the E he had hoped for.

With a grin on his face Sam flicked his wand into the familiar pattern of a copy charm, making himself a duplicate of the sheet he had found. Now he no longer had to search the whole world. Not even the whole of Paris. Only those that had been studying the oceans in February 1981 in Paris, France.

The whole endeavour was looking up.

“I think that everything is now sorted the best way possible, under the circumstances,” Cornelius stated with a tired sigh. Augusta simply nodded, because there was nothing more to say. Even Lord Slytherin looked tired. But they all had every reason to be tired. They had worked a long time to sort out a solution they were convinced would make it through the Wizengamot. In the end, all factions agreed that children were better off placed with a real family.

The hardest part had been defining which things would be assessed to declare someone a fit parent. Lord Slytherin had kept silent during that part of the conversation. He had even offered to step out of the office – they were using the Minister’s office for their meeting – so as to not be accused of influencing the decisions unduly.
“I agree. And once the January session comes around, we should be able to make the changes needed, to sort this better than it ever was.” Lord Slytherin pinched the bridge of his nose – as if trying to stave off a headache – before relaxing back into the plush armchair he was sitting in. “But we still need to decide who from each department will be the one responsible for their department’s part in the procedure.”

“I guess Mrs. Wisby is a good choice to oversee matters, coordinate everything. Even if there should be more adoptions for a while, the workload won’t be enough to keep several people occupied the whole year,” Cornelius repeated, not for the first time. The man was obsessed with keeping the budgets low.

“Having the actual work rotate between different members of the Aurors, the Administrative offices, and so on, will help keep the people on their toes. Routine won’t muddy the waters, and it’ll be possible to avoid someone assessing themselves for an adoption.” That had been a point Augusta had felt was really important. There was no way to make sure no one with influence would be prevented from using that to their advantage. But the requirements they had written into their proposal hopefully would appeal to people from all factions.

The ability to be able to provide all material needs for a child would resonate more with the wealthy – and conservative – families. The need to get a clearance from the Aurors for law-abiding behaviour most likely would resonate with the light-oriented members. At first Augusta had wanted to exclude a family if one member had broken the law, at least when it was something more serious than apparating without a license, or accidentally creating hybrid plants in your garden.

A pointed question of where they would draw the line from Lord Slytherin – Would in-laws count? Great-uncles? – made her realize that such a decision would be very subjective and bound to come under question. So they had written down that only direct guardians – so the one adopting and their spouse if one existed – needed to have clear files with the Aurors.

All in all, she was comfortable with what they had decided on.

“Anything new on who started this whole mess?” Lord Slytherin asked of Cornelius, who sighed but nodded.

“My assistant, Arthur Weasley’s son, is currently trying to find Susan Summers. She should be back at work after her holiday. He’ll bring her here.” Cornelius suddenly stopped speaking and turned towards the door to his office. “I guess he found her.”

There probably were wards on the door that informed Cornelius if someone was entering the room in front of his office. Following the Minister’s example, Augusta and Lord Slytherin turned to the door as well. The small wizard in charge of the Ministry quickly threw each of them a look with a silent question, and Lord Slytherin accepted immediately with a nod. Augusta hesitated a moment longer. Did she trust him to get the answers they wanted to have? Lord Slytherin obviously wanted the Minister to think that he was trusted. But Augusta had fewer scruples to appear demanding and was convinced that he might have troubles. But in the end, she now knew the name of the witch who had started the first changes. It would be relatively easy to ask her some questions herself later if Cornelius did bungle this first attempt.

So she nodded as well just moments before there was a knock on the door.

“Come in!” Cornelius called out, settling himself more comfortably into his chair. Augusta refilled her cup with tea, offering to refill Lord Slytherin’s cup as well with a silent gesture. The finely clothed wizard – he always wore clothes of fine quality, but not of the frivolous make some Lords seemed to prefer – accepted with a slight inclination of his head, so Augusta was pouring tea into the cup he had levitated to her when the door opened.

“Minister, Madame Longbottom, Lord Slytherin,” the red-headed, lanky wizard greeted the people he obviously hadn’t expected to be there. A young witch was behind Weasley and looked a little nervous.

“Thank you, Mr. Weasley, for bringing Miss Summers here. I’ll ring if I need anything else.” With a little bow the assistant left, leaving Miss Summers behind.

“Miss Summers, please sit down.” Cornelius smiled his oiliest smile and made the poor girl even more nervous. Augusta refrained from rolling her eyes. She was here to listen, and listen she would do.

“Thank you, Minister.” She sat down, nervously smoothing her robes.

“It has come to my attention that you initiated changes to the adoption process and left for your holiday before the changes were completely implemented, leaving the people responsible for them in confusion.” So this was the angle Cornelius wanted to take. Not berating her for changing anything at all, but for the way she had gone about it.

“That was unfortunate,” Miss Summers agreed. “But it all went rather slow. But the system was so behind the time. The focus was on everything but the child. A monstrosity! When I read about Harry Potter’s adoption, I was outraged. The poor boy! Wasn’t even asked if he wanted to be adopted. I specifically asked Mrs. Wisby. She was so confused over why the child should have any say in something like this.” Miss Summers was talking herself into a frenzy – with her face and gestures, her whole body, showing her anger – not noting the expressions of careful blank politeness from her audience. And Cornelius let her talk. “And something like this, when it's been known for years – if not decades! – by now how important it is for a child to agree to an adoption. They can develop severe problems with the building of attachments if they are forced into something they aren’t comfortable with.”

Lord Slytherin briefly had something flickering over his face that had Augusta curious. Why would something inane like this have an effect on the powerful wizard with his excellent control over his emotions and facial expressions?

“It took me so long to find someone who would be even willing to listen! Only when I spoke with Madame Umbridge in an attempt to speak with you, Minister, did I finally find someone who was willing to listen.” She smiled sadly when she mentioned the vile woman who had deemed it acceptable to torture children in the name of discipline. Using a blood quill, of all the stupid things to do. “She agreed that the magical world was badly in need of updating the adoptions procedures, as it had been too long since they last had been adapted to new knowledge and the changing times. She didn’t inform you, Minister? She said you were too busy at that moment to talk with me, but I should go ahead and start implementing the changes, and she would inform you.” Miss Summers stopped with a hopeful smile, while Augusta and the two wizards had quickly exchanged a look.

Umbridge had used this idealistic young woman to instigate a change of the adoption policy which – in its old form – had allowed Tom Marvolo Riddle to adopt Harry Potter, which had led to him claiming the title of Lord Slytherin. And that had set things in motion which had been in direct opposition to what Umbridge had wanted to happen.

It all matched maybe a little too well.

“And when Dolores Umbridge later was put on trial over torturing students, and setting dementors on innocents, you didn’t question this order?” Augusta had had enough. This girl was too gullible if she just followed her vision even after the woman endorsing it had been proven to be a criminal who endangered children.

Miss Summers blinked slowly as if she had run head-first into a wall. Augusta wasn’t sure, but felt that Miss Summers was maybe a little too naive for work in the Ministry. At least for any positions of real power. “No. Why should I? I knew that I was right. The changed rules for adoptions are in favour of the children. They will be protected and happier as a result. And the Minister was informed. If he had disagreed, he surely would have made his opinion known. Right, Minister?” The young woman turned from Augusta to the Minister, her expression searching for approval.

Cornelius had a look on his face as if he had eaten too many beans and now had trouble with his bowels. “I have the sad duty of informing you that I was never told about these changes, nor did I ever approve them. Your failure to follow the correct protocol has caused lots of unnecessary trouble.” He took a deep breath before he gave the now really pale witch a stern look. “I’ll have to ask your superiors to see how your performance in general is perceived. If you are lacking in other areas, the Ministry will do better without you.”

They all watched without any outward reaction as Cornelius dismissed the young woman and she went, clearly stunned and confused. Augusta felt for Miss Summers. Yes, she had caused a lot of problems with her blind enthusiasm. But her idealism was something that Augusta could understand and accept. Some people wanted to do good and were willing to put in the extra work to reach their goal. Sadly, good intentions were no protection against something not working out as it had been planned.

“Well, that wasn’t what I expected,” Lord Slytherin said into the short silence that had spread as soon as the door had closed behind Miss Summers. “It took Miss Summers a long time to get a start on all those changes, if Umbridge started this before she became a professor.”

“I wonder how she managed to change anything at all,” Cornelius mused, preparing himself a new cup of tea. “Not one of those that had to work with her on the changes are people who normally are accepting of changes. There’s no way that they would have worked with a nobody of an assistant.”

Both Augusta and Lord Slytherin agreed with silent nods. Most of the witches and wizards working for the Ministry were set in their ways, and only accepting of change when forced.

“It feels a little too convenient that she is so clearly the culprit for these unfortunate changes,” Augusta said slowly. But who would do this, now that Umbridge was out of the picture?

“I suspect we may have more problems with pushing our proposal through than we had thought.” Augusta had to concede that Lord Slytherin was probably right. There was someone else still at work here, and that someone was clearly in opposition to them.

Chapter End Notes

Some time ago someone commented that the therapy sessions were too awkward, and therefore not close to anything real. I have never been a participant in any therapy sessions, so I don’t know anything first-hand. But when I think about both Harry and Marvolo, they don’t strike me as people easily willing to talk about their feelings, thoughts, and their reasons for them. So I reason that the whole sessions are awkward because both of them are unhappy and generally not the most emotionally mature.
But that’s just me ;)

Thanks to Jordre and Jake for helping to improve my spelling!

Chapter Notes

Thank all of you for chiming in with your opinion and experiences with therapy. Only writing from your own experience limits what one can write about severely, so I don't do that, jumping into the unknown from time to time. The majority of comments seem to indicate that I haven't strayed too far from the realm of what's possible and believable. At the end of the day therapy is a deeply personal experience and I hope what I have come up with for Marvolo and Harry both matches what they can manage with their past and personalities.

Standing near the door, only a few steps into the room, Aberforth watched as the healer passed out last instructions to his brother. He watched and wished to be back home, or really anywhere else. But being here was as much a duty as it was defiance.

Back when their mother died it would have been Albus' duty to push aside his wishes and care for their ill sister. Not planning world dominion as he had done.

And now here they were many years later, with reversed roles. Now it was Aberforth in the position of the one expected to care for his brother. And he was here to do exactly that. Maybe it would make the great Albus Dumbledore, defeater of Grindelwald – the travesty! – realise that his brother was an honourable wizard, and that he, the older, was in debt to Aberforth.

But that probably was too much to hope for.

"Keep in mind, Headmaster Dumbledore, you'll have to take your potions each day three times a day. Mr. Dumbledore I count on you to keep an eye on that." Aberforth nodded, not sure if he should be amused or annoyed over the way the healer had decided to distinguish between him and his brother.

"I'm sure we'll manage, Healer Jugson," Albus answered from where he was sitting on the bed, before Aberforth could. Always that need to be the centre of attention. It was grating on Aberforth's nerves. But on the other hand, he really wasn't keen to be in Albus' shoes.

"I'll make sure he takes his potions, Healer. I'll get Poppy Pomfrey to spell them into his stomach if he doesn't cooperate." And he planned to do exactly that if Albus planned on being difficult. He had made sure his brother got the help he had so obviously needed. He wouldn't allow all that work to go to waste now.

"If he doesn't take his potions willingly, or even tries to hide that he isn't taking them, bring him back here as fast as possible," the healer scolded in a tone that managed what no one had really been able to do since their mother had died. Aberforth felt chastised and nodded before he really had registered what the man had said.

As satisfying as force-feeding potions to Albus would be, getting him back into the hospital under such circumstances was probably the wiser choice.

With an acknowledging nod the healer changed the topic of their discussion. "I have arranged for Madame Pomfrey to visit every other day to run a few scans. I expect to see you in two weeks' time for a checkup on how you're recovering." The young wizard looked stern, and again Aberforth felt reminded of their mother. Most of the time she had been a mild, polite witch, but under the right circumstances she had had the tendency to be as hard as a stone and as fierce as a nesting dragon. "But if there are problems you can come in any time."

"I'll keep that in mind," was all Aberforth could say to that. He took the remaining steps to stand next to his older brother. "Come, Albus, we need to go now. I can't close the pub for the whole day."

It was easy enough to get home and place Albus in the guest bedroom that never had been used before. Hopefully the old meddler would get better soon. Aberforth really would rather be far away from his brother again. But he doubted that he would get his old post as Headmaster of Hogwarts back after this incident.

Opening the door to the pub, Aberforth made a valiant effort to concentrate on the matter at hand: Providing drinks and the occasional meal to his patrons. Albus and his troubles would be still there at the end of the night.

Paying close attention, ready to act the moment it looked as if there might be a problem, Marvolo watched as Marcus coaxed the little snake out of her terrarium into a shallow bowl filled with slightly damp earth and moss. ::We'll clean your home. Put a few new things in. It's easier to do if you aren't in it::.

Both Henry and he were here to help Marcus in getting more confidence interacting with snakes. After all, it was likely that he would need to interact with a snake to prove that he indeed had the Slytherin's family gift of Parseltongue. Mr. London was sitting a little bit farther away, watching, and therefore a possible witness in the further adoption process.

He also was there as a school representative to make sure the young boy was all right while together with two almost-strangers.

Xerxes was playing it safe, and Marvolo had to agree. However much this playing by the rules – which were stupid in this case – irked him. It was the wiser choice in this instance.

::But I want to keep the nice stone, smallest speaker::: Slithering Darkness said, slowly moving over the edge of her enclosure. Henry snickered over the nickname the snake had given to Marcus, and Marvolo had to admit her way to make sure each of them knew without doubt to whom she was speaking was amusing. He wondered idly if she would continue to call him the tallest speaker should Henry grow to be taller than he.

Marcus looked up to Henry, a question clear in his eyes. ::I think we can manage that::: . Henry answered with a nod toward where the snake had started to burrow herself into the mixture of earth, rotting leaves, moss, and sand they had filled the bowl with. ::This is nice::. came a pleased little hiss from the snake, sending Marcus into peals of pleased laughter.

Taking the shallow bowl, now with the addition of a burrowing snake, from those small hands, Marvolo set it down out of the way onto a table Marcus would be able to reach more easily.

Then he turned his attention to all the supplies they had gathered on a table nearby and then to Marcus and Henry. Both of them still needed to learn the trick required to speak Parseltongue without actively looking at a snake. This here was a good opportunity for them both to practice. .:Marcus, can you get the bucket? Henry, I want you to vanish the water from the small pool there in the corner:.:

Marcus carefully climbed down from the stepladder they had placed near the enclosure so the short boy had a better look into the terrarium, and then raced across the small distance towards the table with their supplies. Henry got his wand out, gave Marvolo a short look and then asked his face scrunched up in concentration ..:Am I allowed to try it with Parselmagic?:..

It should be simple enough, but to make sure that Henry was thinking in the right direction on how to word the spell he decided to ask before giving permission. "And what exactly would you ask your magic to do?"

To his credit Henry gave this question a moment's thought before answering. "I would ask the water in the small puddle to vanish."

"And where do you want it to vanish to?" Marvolo asked pointedly. He knew, of course, that vanishing spells were part of the fifth year curriculum, and that the spell itself didn't need the clear statement of where the vanished things went. He was pretty certain that Professor McGonagall would have explained – more than once, most likely – that things vanished in this way would go into non-being, or everything, a rather obscure way to explain the effect of the spell in his opinion. Parselmagic, in contrast, needed more precise directions spoken to work as you would wish it to work.

"Into the air?" Henry now clearly wasn't sure any longer if that was the right answer.

"You most likely would create mist that way. Not really what we want to have here." In that moment Marcus came back, carefully placing the empty bucket at Marvolo's feet before climbing back up the stepladder eagerly waiting what would be next.

..:You and I, Marcus will move all the earth into the bucket. I was told that it would be a great addition to the beds over by the greenhouses:. Marvolo said to Marcus, who nodded eagerly, before he turned towards his older son. ..:Use the spell you have been studying for most of your transfiguration classes this year. Maybe that'll help you to come up with an alternative wording:.:

It seemed as if Henry had accepted the fact that he was allowed to do magic while under the supervision of his guardian. Pointing his wand, Henry performed the spell not with perfection, but with confidence. "Evanesco!" The water inside the small pool vanished. With a small smile Henry turned from the terrarium towards Marvolo.

"That's neat!" Marcus called out, and judging by the small grin tucking at the corners of Henry's mouth, the teenager enjoyed the praise clear in the small child's tone.

"Yes, that was very well done." Praise given at the right moment was a great motivator. And looking back at the past, Henry could use a little praise from family. "Now can you tell me what you have learned about the theory behind this spell?"

The question didn't remove the smile from Henry's face, but a small furrow made an appearance while he thought about the answer. "I know that we covered that in class." the boy muttered. "Something about becoming one with everything else?"

"Not too far off, but I recommend that you have another look at the theory here. Vanishing spells are likely to be part of your OWLs."

With a sigh and a nod, Henry started to wash the branches they had decided to add to the enclosure, while Marvolo levitated the stone Slithering Darkness wanted to keep out and over to where Henry was working, before he started to move the earth mixture into the bucket.

.:Can you tell me why we have brought sand that has been washed, Marcus?:. When they were doing this – cleaning up a terrarium – then he would use this to educate the younger members of his family in everything they needed to know to care for a snake.

.:Because it's cleaner, and has only round, smooth grains!:. Marcus exclaimed. They had spoken about all this before, while they had gathered the different things that they then had levitated here.

.:That's correct:. Marvolo answered with a smile. All in all, the indignity of cleaning like a common house elf could be borne when he got the opportunity to spend time with his son. Or rather his two sons. It might be better to get used to the idea of having another son early. In the end he would do whatever he needed to get custody of Marcus. So there was no danger of being disappointed if he worked on getting used to the new idea.

They had a lovely afternoon talking with Slithering Darkness, moving everything inside her home to the spots she wanted them to be in. By the end Henry had an easier time speaking the language of snakes without one at hand, but hadn't managed to come up with a good wording for the Parseltongue version of the vanishing spell. So Marvolo reminded his son once again never to experiment with that specific branch of magic without his supervision. "I'll promise not to experiment without asking you first," Henry finally interrupted Marvolo's rant, rolling his eyes. They both knew that this didn't cover all possible angles. But Marvolo let it slide. Happy that his son was using his long-dormant Slytherin cunning, and would be able to use it in a pinch if he was truly desperate.

To his own surprise Marvolo was slightly sad that Henry would be gone back to school soon.

"Say again, Susan?" Sunny – known by her mother as Claire Vane – said to her friend sitting on the sagging two-seater in her minuscule flat, placing the two mugs of hot chocolate on the cluttered table next to the loveseat, perching herself close to her friend. She hadn't really managed to get the girl she had gone to school with to explain what exactly was wrong that she had come here crying her eyes out.

"I'm on probation!" Susan wailed, clutching the lone bright red pillow so hard her fingers turned white.

"On probation? Did you get a decent explanation why you were placed on probation?" Sunny nudged the mug a little closer to the miserable Susan. "And drink something, it'll make you feel better."

Releasing the pillow from her death grip, Susan took up the mug with shaking hands, blowing on the surface of the hot drink before taking a cautious sip.
For a few moments they sat in silence while Susan calmed down enough that an actual conversation would be possible.

"You know what I told you about the reforms of the adoption process I was working on?" Susan asked, getting a nod from Sunny. Her friend had been ecstatic over being trusted so early in her career with something that important. Susan snorted, sounding bitter. "It seems that Madame Umbridge did not, in fact, inform the Minister. So I worked on all this, worked late hours, without the Minister's knowledge or approval! And now he learned about it! And called me into his office! Lord Slytherin was there." Sunny watched in concern as her friend's composure once again started to fail, desperation creeping into her voice. "Lady Longbottom was there! And Weasley didn't warn me!" Susan set the mug down so she could place her face firmly in her hands, her next words muffled. "I thought they wanted to praise me. It's so mortifying!"

There was a lot that Sunny could have said to this revelation. She had tried to caution her friend, who was much too naive and passionate about her cause to heed the warning. Had tried to make Susan realize that there might be other intentions at play than the wish to improve adoptions and their outcome for the children affected.

In this moment the I told you so was on the tip of her tongue.

But that would have been cruel, more than cruel, as Susan had come here to find a sympathetic ear and some consolation, not mockery. Later Sunny could once again try to make an effort to let Susan realize that politics was a pond filled with grindylows, not crups.

Letting the lesson on politics rest, Sunny stood to get them a refill of hot chocolate. At the moment she would concentrate on being a good friend.

With a sigh Sonja sank down on the loveseat in their quarters at Hogwarts. Severus sank down to her feet, nimble fingers opening the laces on her boots before removing them completely. "Thank you, my love, for a really great evening of visiting the opera and great Italian food." It had been the best birthday he had had since Lily and he had had their falling out during their OWL year. Maybe even better than any he had reluctantly celebrated as a child before Hogwarts.

"I'm happy you had a good evening, love. I think we both needed a break from the research." Sonja wiggled her toes and then tucked up her feet under one of the pillows. "We need to do this more often."

Severus laughed, getting up from the floor to sit next to his wife. "If I wasn't Head of House that might be possible. But I agree, venturing out into Muggle London more often is a good idea. Not being recognized and stopped for aimless chatter at every corner was a nice change of pace."

Sonja poked him lightly in the ribs with a finger, clearly amused. "That only happened at the functions, Severus. Don't get overly dramatic."

Severus rolled his eyes, and tucked her into the crock of his arm. "I haven't been to Diagon Alley yet. After I became the new Lord Prince and am no longer just the youngest Potions Master and former Death Eater, I estimate the number of people willing to speak with me has at least tripled."

They both snuggled down, Severus summoning their favourite woollen blanket from the place where it was stored. The fire crackled merrily, casting a nice red glow over the room.

"I had a thought on the potion for the family connection recognition," Sonja suddenly said into the
"During our date?" Severus snorted, they were so much alike.

She nodded. "When the bartender mixed our drinks." Severus felt a brow rise towards his hairline. "What if we make it a more-components potion?"

"Do go on." That was a new idea they hadn't explored before.

"Well, the problem, in essence, is a reaction between the elements breaking up the material added by the two people, and the bloodroot that is essential to the part that will bridge the gaps between generations. Right?" Severus nodded, exactly that was the problem. Not one of the volatile ingredients could be substituted, as there wasn't anything else that might give the needed effects, but wouldn't also carry the unwanted ones. In consequence Sonja and he had come to a grinding halt in the familial-relations-potion research.

"What if we changed the process and how we brew the potion? I think if each person involved with the test gets one dose of the potion designed to break apart the genetic information, swirl the potion in their mouth for a moment, and then the two are combined with the part analysing and comparing… that should make the combining actually possible without blowing the whole thing up. Or what do you think?"

Severus blinked a few times, slowly processing the idea that Sonja had come up with. Normally potions were easiest to described as one purpose, one potion. Giving several potions to reach one desired effect wasn't something usually done. Anything like that would be seen as a ritual in the current climate. But as there wouldn't be any blood involved it might just be accepted. "That's an idea we should pursue. It certainly would get rid of the explosion. We need to see if it'll still work with the staggered addition of the ingredients." He really wanted to go test it now. Or at least write up a new set of notes.

Slight chuckles from Sonja and her shaking with laughter made Severus look down to where she was curled into his side. "Go get the notes and bring along the chocolate. You won't be able to relax anyway when you try to keep yourself from working tonight."

She knew him so well. Only a few moments later they were curled back together, now with notes and books around them, working on Sonja's idea for how to get the potion to work.

This really was the best birthday in a long time.

Wednesday, 10th of January 1996

With a tap of his wand Henry's trunk shrank down to a more manageable size. Today Henry would go back to school. In fact it was only under half an hour until the train would leave Kings Cross Station.

"Henry!" Where was the child? Only moments ago he had walked back up the stairs to get his cloak. Fetching a piece of clothing shouldn't take this long.

"Sorry!" was called from upstairs shortly before quick steps came down the stairs. "Nagini was complaining that she'll be mostly on her own again, now that I'll be back at school." Henry grinned and rolled his eyes. "I think you might need to spend more time with her. She's lonely."

Marvolo snorted, slinging his scarf around his neck. Nagini could be quite demanding. "She just likes to complain. She'll be with me most of the time for the next few days. I have a lot of correspondence to work through."

"Why haven't you taken her to the Ministry yet?" Henry wanted to know, stepping before the mirror to adjust his clothes.

"Can you imagine the reaction if I walk into the Ministry with Nagini slung over my shoulders?" Marvolo asked, arching a brow.

Henry laughed out loud. "I would love to see that. I'm sure quite a lot of people would run. Maybe one would even pass out?" There was a big grin on Henry's face, making him look a lot like his father. With a pang of something Marvolo didn't want to think about, he shoved the pictures gleaned from memories of Death Eaters who had been to school with one of his staunch opponents back then, into the darker recesses of his mind. "I'm ready to leave," Henry stated, turning around to face Marvolo with obvious enthusiasm.

With a last look around Marvolo let Henry walk out the door in front of him. He just couldn't be one of the parents who needed to return home to fetch something left behind. When he had been a student at Hogwarts, some of the others in his year had been prone to forgetting stuff, making their parents apparate several times between the station and their home. It had made him look down on them back then, and still he had nothing good to say about such a lack of planning. With a shudder he realized that he heavily relied on Henry's being able to pack his own stuff, and that Marcus wouldn't be able to do the same for some time to come.

He would learn to work around that. He had managed to do so for some of his more… slow death Eaters. How hard could it be to do the same for a child he actually cared about?

"You do have everything?" Marvolo checked one last time as the door fell closed behind them and the wards came up.

"I checked thrice," Henry answered with a small smirk.

Wondering why his son would smirk when asked something so mundane, Marvolo offered his arm so he could apparate them to the station.

As usual Henry stumbled on their landing, but it was easy to help the teenager to stay upright as Marvolo had expected something like this to happen. There already were people bustling about, the train was standing with open doors, ready to take the children back to Scotland and the castle for the next term.

Henry was practically bouncing, looking around for his friends. But decorum demanded he stay by his father's side, and he managed to do so. If barely. "Run along and look for your friends," Marvolo said, astonished at the fondness in his voice. He hadn't tried to put it there on purpose. "I'll catch up with a few of the others." He wasn't actually sure if Henry saw him pointing at a few of his followers standing together a few paces further down the platform before the boy was gone.

With a chuckle – again trying not to pay too close attention to the feeling of fondness where he would have expected at least exasperation – Marvolo walked over to where three of his followers were gathered talking animatedly. "Xerxes, Benjamin, Lucius, nice to see you. I hadn't thought you would be here, Xerxes."

"Marvolo, how are you? Hermione and her parents were over for breakfast, so I apparated them here. It's so much easier than muggle transportation. Even if I have to say that sitting in one of those automobiles is an experience," Xerxes answered with a twinkle in his eyes. "Much less jostling than the Knight Bus makes us believe, I would say."

Lucius clearly was surprised by that announcement. "You have used one of those… dangerous contraptions? I heard that they can explode, killing the people inside. There are so many better options for transport without using muggle means."

Marvolo chuckled again. "As if splinching, getting lost in the floo network, or failing charms high in the air, never happen." The way the current head of the Malfoy family paled because he had disagreed with his Lord, without really meaning to, only heightened Marvolo's good mood. It was a little too easy to tease the poor man. "The technology has improved since your own father had a good look at one of the early versions. And just as a competent witch or wizard will have no real problems with travel, one can learn how to operate one of those cars safely. Not that I have felt the need..." He let himself trail off, opening the floor for each of them to chime in with their opinion on what method of travel works best for what situation and what forms of muggle travel they had experienced before.

"I always wondered who decided to use a train to get all the students to Hogwarts. It's not like there are any other trains around exclusively used by magical folk," a female voice suddenly pitched in after Benjamin Nott had ended his story about one fishing trip from the back of a boat on a lake in the north of England.

As one the four of them turned to come face to face with Madame Amelia Bones wrapped up in a warm cloak and scarf, a pointed hat keeping her head warm.

Marvolo smiled. He was pretty sure someone as well read as Madame Bones would know this, as the addition of this method to arrive at Hogwarts had its own chapter in the easy-to-optain Hogwarts: a History. "If I remember correctly, the train was introduced by Minister Ottaline Gambol in 1827. She wanted to put an end to some of the more ridiculous ways students and their parents had chosen to use for travel to the school. I think the Muggles needed to be made forget what they had seen too often. How forcing everyone to travel to another spot so all children could board the train helped with that, I'm not sure." Marvolo shrugged while he watched Xerxes smirk, Lucius and Benjamin trying to look as if this was nothing new to them, and Amelia Bones rolling her eyes at his showing off.

"I think the fact that there are a lot of people coming and going at a train station, and there is floo access as well as a safe place to apparate to, helped with that goal." Madame Bones easily stepped into the small space in their circle that had opened with their turning to see who had spoken. "Susan tells me that the train ride is a great opportunity to catch up with friends. And I, too, remember the travel with fondness for exactly that reason."

Quick flashes of his own travels moved before Marvolo's inner eye. The first one, with his nervous anticipation of trouble and the eagerness to finally belong. During the war, when the news of destroyed tracks had made him doubt if the train would even go, if he might have to stay in London with bombs falling on the city. The constant political struggle. "I have varying memories of the train and the travel. But judging by the look on Henry's face just after we arrived here, the catching up with friends bit of the journey is one a lot of the children enjoy."

Madame Bones' eyes were far too sharp for Marvolo's comfort, watching his every move and expression. "If you'll excuse me, I want to properly say farewell to Henry." Only waiting the bare minimum not to be rude, Marvolo nodded to them all before he turned and walked out into the madness that was the platform just before the train was to leave. Children and adults standing or running around, trunks stacked and standing in the way all over the place, animals underfoot... it was madness.
He felt the eyes of at least one person on him but ignored it in favour of searching for his son.

Luckily it didn't take long for Marvolo to hear a call. "Here! I'm here, Marvolo!" For a short moment he felt irritation that Henry had disregarded his demand to be called father or sir in public. But then his common sense took over. With this many parents around, calling for father wouldn't have helped much, the title simply applied to too many wizards present.

So Marvolo turned to see where the call had come from, spotting his son standing in the door of a waggon a little further down the platform. He walked over, dodging other people, and at least two cats.

"You have found a compartment?"

Henry nodded. "Yes. It was easy enough. Theo had already laid claim to one." For a moment an uncomfortable silence descended between them. Henry played with the hem of his cloak, clearly nervous.

Determined to not make this any more awkward than it already was, Marvolo ignored the nervous fidgeting. "Keep up with your studies. Call on the mirror in the evening. Don't forget to keep in touch with your godfather, and please stay out of trouble." Marvolo was acutely aware how different this time was from the first he had brought Henry to the train.

Henry nodded, clearly intending to follow that demand, before he blurted out a request of his own. "Please tell Marcus that I would love to keep visiting. You'll keep visiting him, won't you?"

The imploring eyes, the not-quite-spoken command in that question, made Marvolo smile. It was good to see how willing Henry was to be an older brother. After all, it could have gone entirely differently, with Henry resenting any other child who might challenge his place as heir, or just as the sole focus of Marvolo's attempts to be a father. "I certainly plan to keep visiting him. And I will keep you up to date about the whole process of adoption. If it fits in with your schedule, maybe Marcus and I will call you on the mirror."

The shrill sound of the whistle cut through all the noise for a fraction of a moment. The warning that the train was to leave soon.

"Call when you're back in your room. Have a good time." Unsure of himself, Marvolo stepped a little closer, opening his arms in an attempt to offer a hug – because the few he had had so far had been nice, and wasn't that what parents did when bringing their child to the train? – he found himself in the arms of his son just a fraction of a second later.

"Don't work too much, entertain Nagini, and keep me in the loop, please." Henry said, somewhat muffled by the thick fabric of Marvolo's cloak.

"I'll do that." Giving the shoulder of his son a somewhat awkward pat, Marvolo stepped back as far as he could, prompting Henry into releasing him from the hug.

Henry moved away from the door, closing it behind himself.

Marvolo stayed standing close to the tracks on the platform waving for a moment as the train started to move. When a child of maybe nine or ten years of age almost ran him over, waving like mad, obviously trying to keep up with the train as long as possible, Marvolo scowled down at the little hooligan. With a high pitched squeak the kid ran, and Marvolo pinched the bridge of his nose. Maybe he should ask Lucius to duel with him. Purely for practice. Naturally.

With a clear plan in mind, Marvolo cast a last look after the train – it wasn't visible any longer – and then turned on his heel apparating right back to Griffin House.

oooOOooo

It was odd to be equal parts happy to go back to school and sad that he was going back to school. Being back at Hogwarts with his friends was going to be great. But he would miss out on visiting with Marcus. Maybe they would be able to use the mirrors so Harry would be able to speak with him sometimes.

Not willing to stay in the corridor, Harry moved down to where Theo had found and commandeered a compartment for them. When he came to the door he saw that a few of the others had already found their place.

"Harry!" Astoria exclaimed when he slid the door to the side so he could get in. "There you are! Come over, sit down, and tell us everything about the small boy who will be your younger brother." Harry rolled his eyes sending Daphne into a fit of giggles, and sat down next to Daphne and across from Theo.

"Calm down, Astoria. There isn't much to tell. Marcus is a small child, still learning to read. He's a Parselmouth, and father and I have been spending time with him, so we could get to know each other." Harry opened his cloak so he wouldn't get overheated now that he was inside the train. He deliberately turned towards Theo. "How is Aiden doing? I know he's still too young for most of the functions, but I guess you still had the chance to spend plenty of time with him?"

Theo gave Harry a look that would have killed if that had been possible. His friend clearly had understood what Harry was trying to do with that question and wasn't impressed. Giving his friend an unapologetic shrug Harry watched Daphne and her younger sister turning towards Theo to pepper him with questions about his adopted younger brother.

They had been going for some time when the door to their compartment opened and Draco stepped in, already looking harried. "Can I seek shelter in here for a moment? I'm sure we never were as nerve-wracking as the firsties this year. How do they think I would know what homework to expect until the next holidays?" The blond's short but passionate rant interrupted the steady stream of questions Astoria had been asking – everything from Aiden's favoured food to the animal he liked best – and tore Harry away from his book. He had been reading the Potions text. With the end of the holiday, the extra lessons with Professor Snape would resume and he really would prefer to give the man no reason to be displeased. Irritating the Potions Master was a sure way to make learning from him almost impossible, even after Marvolo probably had threatened bodily harm to the man if he didn't cooperate, and failing might cause serious trouble for Snape.

And wasn't that irony, Harry learning Potions in an attempt to prevent one of his least favoured professors from being tortured. And for all that Harry knew, this wasn't even a valid concern any longer. Because someone as caring as Marvolo was to both him and Marcus – even with followers still – surely wouldn't torture a teacher over the lack of motivation in their student.

At least Harry was pretty sure that Marvolo was much saner than that.

Draco slumped into one of the empty seats, exhaling a long breath and visibly relaxing. "Luckily the meeting of all the prefects was rather shorter than the first one. Oh, and Granger and Weasley are on their way here as well. So we'll only have a few moments of quiet."

Harry chuckled. There was no way he could refute the claim that Hermione could talk a mile a minute once she got rolling. This tendency was barely tolerable after tests and exams, but great when it came to lesson revision.
And right on cue the door opened again to let in the two fifth-year Gryffindor prefects. "Here you are, Harry!" Hermione greeted a big smile on her face, which got even bigger the moment she spotted the Potions text Harry still held in his hands. "Doing revisions?" Her eyes narrowed playfully, her smile giving her away, "Who are you, and what have you done with my friend Harry?"

"Har, har, Hermione. It might be a new idea for you, but I'm aware that were in our OWL year, and father is serious about me doing good in school." It was a great motivator to have an adult who was interested in how well he did in his lessons. But if Hermione hadn't come to that conclusion herself, he wasn't about to tell her.

"I can only agree with Hermione," Ron spoke from behind their bushy-haired friend. "That's not like you. Studying on the train back to school." The red-head scoffed, stepping past Hermione – almost pushing her into Astoria who was sitting near the door – to sit down between Harry and Draco.

"Well, before this year, I never went anywhere during the school year, staying at Hogwarts. And this is our OWL year. Marks haven't been all that important before. And if you claim that I have no need to study for Potions, then I'll have to ask who you are." Throwing Ron a pointed look, Harry settled a little more into his seat at the window, placing a ribbon as a marker into the book.

Hermione sat down in a seat near the door, brown eyes sparkling, her prefect badge pinned to her Hogwarts robes she – naturally – already had changed into. "I wish I hadn't returned the time-turner after third year. I simply haven't enough time for everything I want to do!" The other Slytherins exchanged covert glances at this casual admittance of being favoured in such a way. They all remembered the unhappy rant they had all been treated to some time just before the holidays because a seventh-year had been disappointed by Professor Snape's declining the application for one.

"What, besides revision and homework, do you want to do so badly?" Harry asked, leaning forward in interest.

"Tiago and Teofilo have written a letter. They were hunting in the grasslands in the east of Argentina. Hunting and gathering. I really would love to research the magical community there. And the plants and animals that are to be found in the Pampas. The letter made me so curious. But I just can't fit in any time for research into my schedule without cutting into the time I have planned for homework, or revision." She huffed in frustration, and Harry had to fight hard to keep from laughing over the grimace Ron was making where Hermione wasn't able to see.

"Tiago and Teofilo. Those are the illegitimate sons of Lord Lestrange, aren't they?" Theo wanted to know, clearly happier now that he wasn't the sole focus of Astoria's curiosity.

Now Hermione's eyes narrowing had a much more threatening air. "What is your problem with them?" harry was pretty sure all of them thought that she probably expected someone to have a problem with them being born as the result of an affair, outside of marriage. But as Harry had learned in the many lessons over the summer, that men having children before marrying wasn't considered a problem. Much as it hadn't been in the muggle world either. Hopefully they would be able to steer clear of that mess, as it was a sure way to get Hermione ranting about inequality. Harry was pretty sure not one of them really wanted to hear about it on the way back to Hogwarts.

Theo shook his head. "Of course not. Just trying to confirm some of the rumours I've heard. Have they written something about what it's like being a supplier of wild, exotic potion ingredients?"

Now it was Theo who was leaning forward, eager to hear more. "Besides the stories about curse breakers working for Gringotts those about the daring individuals travelling to places at the edge of the world were always my favourites. Is it really as exciting as the books make it sound?"

That took the wind out of Hermione's rant before it could really start, but prompted her into a detailed recounting of the letter's content. Harry was only listened with one ear contemplating the existence of stories about curse-breakers and travelling adventurers gathering stuff from various exotic places and animals. Maybe he should ask his friend if there were a few books he could borrow. Reading for relaxation wasn't something he had been able to do in the past.

The Dursleys never would have allowed him the time – nor had they encouraged such behaviour in their own son – Ron only ever read quidditch magazines without Hermione's prompting, and Hermione's idea of light reading… he wouldn't even go in that direction. But Theo probably was a good source for actual light reading material of the non-educational variety.

After some time Draco left to do some more patrolling, closely followed by Astoria, who said she wanted to go find some of her friends. But Harry grinned when he saw Daphne roll her eyes at her sister's back. While Hermione and Theo still were discussing the economics of trade with potion ingredients, with Ron valiantly trying to keep up and contribute, Harry turned towards Daphne with a smile.

"Did you have any success with attracting a few possible suitors?" It wasn't exactly a polite question to ask, but Harry thought that he could get away with it as a friend of hers who had helped with getting her better odds at this game. If one could call the search for a future husband a game.

Daphne gave him a sharp look and a huff. "It certainly has attracted some. Not sure if I would call any of them suitable suitors." She scrunched her nose at her terrible play on words, making Harry chuckle. "Several are simply too old. Why should I marry a man thirty years my senior? Or even older?" She shuddered. "But there have been letters from the continent. The fact that we were seen together at more than one ball was reported in more than one newspaper outside of Britain. Father will arrange for a few meetings over the upcoming holidays, and in the summer. Maybe I'll find someone among them. Thanks for helping me out."

Harry smiled, once more immensely grateful that Marvolo had no plans to arrange a marriage for him. "Thank you for your help in keeping me out of trouble and from embarrassing myself at one of those balls. I'm pretty sure I would have managed to make a mess of it somehow."

They both laughed heartily over that, because after the disaster that had been the Yule Ball, it was just too real a possibility.

The opening of the door didn't bring the lady with the sweets cart – as they all had expected – but Luna Lovegood, who was smiling brightly, her wand tucked into a messy bun on top of her head, a bunch of butterbeer corks strung onto a string hanging around her neck like a necklace. "Hello, everyone." she said serenely into the room, before she stepped in, closed the door and walked over to where Harry was sitting. "I really like the sketches you're making. Do you think you could make one of them suitable suitors." She scrunch her nose at her terrible play on words, making Harry chuckle. "Several are simply too old. Why should I marry a man thirty years my senior? Or even older?" She shuddered. "But there have been letters from the continent. The fact that we were seen

As usual Luna didn't seem to noticed that everyone around them had stopped talking and now were all staring at her. It was a skill Harry wished he could copy easily. "I never have drawn anything from just a description." Harry answered, trying to turn her down politely. How should he draw an illustration of something he didn't even think existed?

"Oh, I hadn't thought about that. It might be hard to get one of them to stay still long enough for you to get a good look at it." Luna sank down next to Harry – Ron had moved to Draco's former place some time ago so he was nearer to where Hermione was sitting – clearly thinking about the problem. "But would you be willing to try? I'll do my best to describe them as accurately as I can manage. If it doesn't work out, then that's not too bad."

Harry blinked. A few years back, before Hogwarts, he hadn't thought unicorns or dragons were real, but had drawn them anyway. That is until Uncle Vernon had found and burned those pictures. How hard could it be?

"Sure. Let me get my sketchpad if you have time now?"

Luna nodded, her eyes staring out of the window – even though it already was dark outside – a small happy smile on her face.

Only a few moments later they were settled with Luna's feet in Harry's lap, which made him blush, to his intense mortification, working together on capturing the image of a Dabberblimp on the paper.

Judging by the smirk in Theo's eyes and on Ron's face, Harry was sure to get teased endlessly over this in the next days. Maybe even weeks. But sitting there, listening to Luna describing a curious, probably water-dwelling creature, sketching and with her so close, he was almost certain that it was worth all the teasing in the world.

After some correspondence and preparations for travel into another country, Sam was now in Paris on his way to the official who hopefully would help him get the information he needed to find Olivienne Moreau.

Just in case – getting information wasn't all that easy when it could be used to track people down – Sam had arranged a persuasion fund in advance. It was filled to the brim, and Lord Black had said he was willing to fill it again if it was needed to get the job done. This was the first time that Sam had so many galleons at his disposal. It was somehow strange what a difference money made. He had known that this was a fact of life for some time now, but with the amount in that fund and how easily it was given… it had made him realize just how stacked the deck was against everyone not born into an obscenely rich family.

But before he would get out the big guns, there also was the story he had come up with. It was based mostly in fact, but he'd changed a few key points to make it seem as if he was searching for Olivienne because an old man who had talked with her at that conference was dying and wanted to give her lots of his money to enable the woman to further her studies of the oceans. Hopefully the promise of money for science would sway the bureaucrats to help.

Striding confidently – only few people would question someone about their right to be somewhere if they looked as if they knew what they were doing and were in a hurry – Sam walked into the building, nodding in greeting to the man stationed in a glass booth near the entrance, greeting another man walking towards the door with a polite "Bonsoir." Preparing himself, and his solid knowledge of French, to charm the information he needed out of whoever was responsible for this kind of stuff.

He was really glad he had accepted this job. It had been interesting so far, and the pay was good as well. Much better than searching for incriminating evidence of employees' stealing at work, or a spouse's cheating.

Quickly checking the paper with the directions he had been given, Sam turned a corner and started to peel off his coat. He was so close to finding her.
Chapter End Notes

Writing is a welcome reprieve from the real world for me. I hope I can offer a few of you something to distract yourself with when life gets too stressful. We all need distraction now and again.

Thanks to Jordre and Jake for helping to improve my spelling!

“So, you have found her?” Sirius asked, his heart suddenly stuttering in his breast, hope rising. He had done his best to keep himself occupied, distracted from what was happening with the search for his twin daughters. But now with the wizard he had tasked with finding them and their mother standing – well, sitting – before him, he no longer could hide behind empty flirtations and the obligations of being Lord Black.

“It’s likely.” The man answered with a nod, accepting a cup of tea from Remus. “The file on her at the university in Paris points to her place of birth being on Martinique. That’s an island in the Caribbean that belongs to France. I went to the magistrate to check if I could get her current address, but it’ll take several weeks until I get an answer from them.”

Remus sat down on the last empty chair, placing one of the muffins Kreacher had made onto his plate, before sitting back to ask a question. Sirius was so glad his best friend was living in his house, helping him with all the difficult stuff. “And travelling over there will help find her quicker?”

Sam nodded again. “It’s usually easier to go directly to the source, so to speak, then relying on others to go through several layers of bureaucrats.”

Sirius took a muffin as well, slowly nodding. It probably was true, bureaucrats were a pest. “You think she still lives there?”

“And if she doesn’t, I probably can find family of hers, or friends. Which would help locate her.” Sam sounded confident, and Sirius had to agree that he had a point.

“Did you make a copy of the file?” Remus wanted to know. He always had been the most sensible of the four of them.

“I did.” With a flick of his wand Sam enlarged a small stack of paper he got out of his robe pocket, floating it over to where Sirius was sitting.

With a funny feeling in his guts – was he nervous? Surely not! – Sirius captured the floating file and opened it up so he could read it. “Marine Biology?” What could they even talk about when they would meet? It was bad enough that Sirius couldn’t remember a thing about that night. But that they would have nothing in common was just as bad. Wasn’t there a way that they could avoid meeting each other?

“Thank you, Sam, please start arranging everything you need to go to Martinique.” Remus interjected while Sirius started to panic. “Either by plane or portkey is fine. I think the magical community isn’t all that big on the smaller Caribbean islands.”

Sam quickly finished his cup of tea and stood. “That’s probably true. Not enough magicals to warrant regular international portkeys. I’ll have to inquire when the next connection by portkey is available. But I guess by plane should be faster. I’ll send word once I know for sure when I’ll be travelling.”

And then the private investigator was gone, and Remus sat down next to Sirius, placing a calming hand on his shoulder. “Deep breaths, Sirius. You want to meet Nawel and Enora. And I’m sure Miss Moreau will be willing to tell you all about the girls you have missed. There alone is weeks of topics for conversation and a basis to build from to get to know her. You’ll be fine.”

“Will I? We don’t even know if she will allow contact between me and her daughters. And look here.” He gestured dramatically with the opened file in his hand. “She finished her dissertation. Despite the fact she had just become a mother! Can you imagine how that had to have been? Working on a dissertation and caring for two babies?” Sirius shook his head. That sounded almost impossible to manage for him. It had been hard to comprehend how James and Lily had managed to be parents to one child, together!

“That certainly wasn’t easy, I give you that. But there is no need to panic before Olivienne is even found. You managed to successfully complete Auror training. You’re now working to bring order back to the assets of the Black family, and on top of that you’re working in the government. I’m not sure how it happened,” Remus teased, “but you’re an adult now.”

To a claim such as this, there was only one possible reaction. Sirius gave his friend an unimpressed look and then cast a charm at Remus that would have turned his hair bright blue, if the infuriating man hadn’t managed to dodge it.

It engendered a duel through the whole house between Sirius and Remus, using only prank spells. It worked wonders to clear Sirius’ head from gloomy thoughts, and ended with them both coloured in odd combinations, with hair standing on end and their voices sounding decidedly off.

The day ended on a happy note. Pranks and silliness were simply what Sirius needed in big doses at least once a week.

“Have you taken your potion, Albus?” Aberforth stood in the door to his own small kitchen and patiently asked the question for the third time. Just as he had done every morning, noon, and evening since his brother had been released from the hospital.

Looking very much distracted, Albus finally looked up from the book he was reading, turning a little so he could make eye contact with the very much annoyed Aberforth. There was no way he could be paid enough to put up with his older brother. And he wasn’t being paid at all!

“I’m sorry, did you say something?” Albus smiled his charming grandfather smile, and Aberforth had the sudden urge to go open a new bottle of the strongest firewhiskey he had in the bar.

“Yes, Albus. I did say something.” He did not sound as calm as he would have liked. “Have you taken your potion?” Enunciating each word as clearly and slowly as he did whenever one of his patrons got a little more drinking in than was properly wise.

“I did take my potion. You gave it to me with the plate of scrambled eggs.” Now Albus sounded as if Aberforth was the one not paying attention.

Aberforth rolled his eyes and walked over to where he had stored the potions. “It’s noon, Albus.
Time for another dose. Do I need to feed it to you? Or did you just get lost in a book again?”

Aberforth couldn’t see his brother’s expression, with his back turned, while he got out another phial of the potion from behind the wards he had set.

“I have to confess I greatly enjoy having the time to catch up on my reading. It’s something I didn’t really get to do the last few decades. I’ll take the potion and then will call one of the Hogwarts elves to provide us with some food.”

Aberforth didn’t comment on Albus’ continued insistence on getting food from the Hogwarts kitchens, instead checking on the wards he had put up mostly so he would know if his older brother tried to tamper with the potions he needed to take. So far everything was fine. He did indeed seem to get better from day to day. Maybe come February Aberforth would be alone again.

Setting down the phial on the table next to his brother, Aberforth gruffly turned around to leave again. “I’ll have to check on my stores, see what I need to order more of. I’ll be back for food.”
Seeing that Albus was recovering was good. But at the same time Aberforth wished his brother would show a little remorse for his actions. It probably had been too much to hope for from the beginning.

Wednesday, 17th of January 1996

They’d been back at school for barely a week, and Harry felt in need of holidays again.

OWL year was intense.

With a slight umpf, and the sound of a heavy object placed down on the floor, Harry sat his bag down next to the table his group had claimed in the common room to study. The girls had objected against using the boys’ dorm for further study. Pansy had claimed that they never did clean their room. Harry wasn’t really sure if that was accurate – he strongly suspected the elves cleaned under the mess with magic – but no one had been in the mood to argue with Pansy.

So their study group was meeting in the common room. After the seventh years had admonished the younger students to please refrain from speaking above a whisper just at the beginning of the week, it was much quieter in here than in the library. Add the fact that there was no fear of losing face before students from any other House, it seemed that the Slytherins actually preferred to study here in what could be called privacy.
Sometimes one just needed to express the frustration of trying to remember all those details about a plant, or the names of all the many moons of Saturn.

Without prompting Theo moved over to make room for Harry. “What did Weasley want?”

“He was playing owl for the twins.” Harry answered, diving under the table to get out his cards with dates of various important points in history. “I think he wants to save up some money for the next Hogsmeade weekend, and the twins make a joke out of it.” Harry tossed the scrap of parchment that had been sealed when Ron had handed it over, waiting for Harry after his last day of classes, over to Theo. The slender boy caught it with ease, his eyes then moving quickly over the short text.

After a snort Theo tossed the note back, managing to make it land first on Harry’s head before it fell down to come to rest on the floor next to where Harry still was searching for his notes. “Must have been like living among doxies, growing up with those two as brothers.”

Harry nodded distractedly. The twins basically had only told him that their market research was going well and that they simply loved sending their brother around for no reason at all. Remembering the story about the transfigured teddy bear, Harry hummed in agreement. “From what they’ve told me, and what their family tells, they were right horrors. Ahh! There they are!” Finally successful, Harry emerged from his quest to settle back into the pillows stacked on their seats.

Draco was deeply entranced in his notes a few seats over, Daphne was patiently explaining something to Vincent and Gregory, who both had the expressions on their faces that Harry associated with them concentrating. Most of the others were either rewriting their notes or reading various textbooks. This time between the last lesson and dinner quickly had become time for either homework to be finished, or revision, quietly in their common room, sometimes in the library taking advantage of Hermione’s extensive notes and reference list.

Both activities had taken over every moment of spare time they had. It was taxing. Harry had decided to use the Friday Defence club meetings to work on his practical defence, reducing the needed preparation by a lot. It didn’t bring him any actual free time, as the Slytherin Quidditch team was still insisting that he help them train.

With a resigned sigh – there was no way Marvolo would allow him to slack off – Harry turned the cards so the names of battles, treaties and stuff was facing him and started on his attempt to remember as many dates as he could.

Their table descended into the silence of concentration, only disturbed twice by younger students creeping by on the way to their dorms, and Harry distractedly placed the cards either on his left or right depending on whether he had remembered them correctly or not.

“Harry, I think your bag is buzzing.” Theo said, eyes trained on a diagram of a half-section of some plant stem.

“My bag is buzzing?” Which year had it been that Albert Boot had resigned as Minister for Magic in the aftermath of a goblin rebellion?

An elbow to the side startled Harry enough to make him take note of the world around him. Theo gave no indication that he had been the one wielding that sharp, pointy elbow, but Harry had no time to complain about that because the buzzing was indeed coming from his bag.

Marvolo was calling on the mirror!
Only seconds later – history notes forgotten on the table – Harry was heading for his room, mirror in hand, accepting the call. “Sorry, was studying and didn’t notice the mirror right away.” Harry said by way of a greeting, only to startle when a high pitched giggle reached his ear.

“You have ink on your nose!” Two faces were grinning out of the mirror, bringing a smile to Harry’s face.

“Thanks for pointing that out. I’ll have to wash it off before I go to dinner. Remind me?” Harry reached his room and walked over to the desk. “Here, Marcus, I put the picture you sent me up next to my desk! I had to ask around to get a little Spell-O-Tape. If I remember, I’ll buy a roll when we get to go to the village the next time.”

“Look, Marvolo! There it is! Harry put it right there next to his desk!” Harry shared a moment of fond exasperation as Marcus obviously felt the need to repeat what just had been said for Marvolo, who had heard everything anyway. They both had noticed that tendency while they had cleaned out the snake enclosure. It seemed to be something pretty normal for the kid.

“And I see that there’s lots more empty space right there next to the picture of .:Slithering Darkness:. Maybe Nagini will be willing to pose for another picture?” Marvolo suggested, using the Parseltongue version of the snake’s name.

With an excited shout and no parting words, Marcus vanished from the mirror – Marvolo’s flinch indicating that he might have hurt the man in some way in his enthusiasm – and only his running steps could be heard as he moved away from where Marvolo was still sitting.

“I think it’s almost certain that you’ll get a new picture soon,” Marvolo said with a smile. “How’s school?”

“Exhausting,” Harry answered with feeling, walking over to his bed to sit down heavily. “I didn’t notice before, but I have to repeat, fifth year is really hard. And I mean it! Really, really hard. And what I can see of the seventh years, NEWTs aren’t any easier. I have no idea how anyone was willing to enter that blasted tournament of their own free will while also preparing to take those exams. It’s madness!”

Harry gave Marvolo a half-hearted glare as the man had the audacity to actually chuckle. “Keep an eye out for the trade in illegal and mostly fraudulent offers of mind-enhancing substances that surely will start up soon enough. At least there was a market for that stuff back when I was a prefect. Dragon claw was sought out frequently. I’m still appalled that it was so easy to sell basically chalk dust or powdered sugar, claiming it was powdered dragon claw. I’m sure that many a busy entrepreneur managed to make a pretty Knut with such trades.”

“Does that actually work?” Harry sighed, leaning back against one of the posts of his bed. He would forego his scheduled reading of his transfiguration notes today in favour of a little more sleep.

“If it’s real powdered dragon claw it does. But that would be cheating, which is forbidden, and in all three years of being involved with the prefects at Hogwarts there never was any actual powdered dragon claw confiscated. So, don’t risk it, Henry.”

“Hadn’t planned on it. But I’m sure Hermione will have a little breakdown once the trading starts. She still doesn’t approve of the twins’ selling of prank products, and their tests with various volunteers.” Harry smiled a fond smile. Hermione and her love of rules could be infuriating at times. But that she had bent, or broken, those rules for him in the past only made her friendship that much more precious. What had she said back in first year? They could have been killed, or “Go eat something, Henry. And then go to bed, you look as if you haven’t slept at all since going back to Hogwarts.” There was actual concern in Marvolo’s voice, Harry was pretty sure of it. “Did you have trouble sleeping? Odd dreams? Out of place feelings?”

Now Harry sat up straighter with surprise. Why would Marvolo inquire after symptoms of their odd connection bleeding through again? “No, nothing of the kind. Just too much homework, panicky friends, and long hours studying. And Professor Snape checked my shields first weekend back. He said they were adequate, but there was still a lot of room for improvement.” Harry tried for a fair impersonation of Snape, only earning himself an eye roll. “Did you have troubles?” The question was out before Harry’s mind could catch up with his mouth. He had asked out of concern, but it was too easily interpreted as Harry doubting Marvolo’s capability to maintain strong shields around his mind. It probably wasn’t the best idea to go around questioning the wizard’s ability.

“No, I didn’t have problems. But I haven’t slept as much as I should either. Flimm has taken to starting to clean where I can see him when it’s getting really late. I never noticed before how passive-aggressive house-elves can be if they think their masters are being unreasonable.” Marvolo smiled again. “I wanted to remind you that the January Wizengamot session is soon. We’ll bring in the changes to the adoption laws and procedures, just to give you a heads up. I think we should be successful. Too many from different blocs agree with us. But one never should be too sure. Now, you go eat dinner, and I’ll check in on Marcus and Nagini. It looks as if one of the other kids might be taking an interest in what Marcus is drawing. Have a good evening and see you tomorrow!”

The mirror suddenly only showed fabric – probably Marvolo’s robes – and Harry could hear Marvolo asking someone what they were doing. Deciding that he should indeed go to have dinner, Harry ended the call, slipping the mirror into one of his robe pockets.

It wasn’t long until the weekend, and at least then he would have the opportunity to sleep a little. It sounded like heaven. Having a room to himself had definite advantages in that respect. No early risers to disrupt his sleep.

Humming to himself, Harry returned to the common room where he gathered the others around him so everyone would get a decent meal before returning to homework and revision.

Thursday, 18th of January 1996

It had been a successful breakfast meeting. In preparation for the Wizengamot session the next day, Marvolo and his allies in this particular matter had met at Nott House to work out what they needed to do on the next day to achieve their goals.

It had been a rather unusual gathering. Beside his usual allies – Lucius and his political following, Xerxes, Benjamin and the others – Madame Longbottom had been there, bringing quite a few of her friends. One of them Black, who had made sure Marvolo knew that he was still watching what went on at Griffin House and whenever Marvolo interacted with the public. It had been amusing for a few moments.
There had also been others who usually were to be found in the groups labelled light and grey, or sometimes neutral and liberal, willing to listen why they proposed the changes they were about to introduce.

The Minister had been absent, as had Madame Bones, but in the end it was better not to show their hand too soon. That two of the most important members of the Wizengamot because of their position in the Ministry were on their side wasn’t something that they needed to be talked about widely before it became obvious during the session.

They still hadn’t managed to find who had cleared roadblocks for Miss Summers so the disastrous, half-baked changes to the adoption procedures could have been enacted. And as long as they hadn’t found whoever had taken over from that pink cow Dolores Umbridge, they couldn’t really look out for where the attempts to hinder them might come from.

Marvolo walked at Xerxes’ side until the old wizard had to take another path up to the building which held the offices, teachers’ lounge and other such rooms. He had to finish up some paperwork as he had explained before, and now parted only with a nod to his Lord and friend.

Marvolo himself had come by because he wanted to visit Marcus. It was early still, so the child would be in school. But at this age quite a bit of the day was spent with crafts, games, or story time. Xerxes had been sure that Marvolo would be welcome to read the students a story – Marvolo was sure he hadn’t imagined the humour in Xerxes’ eyes – and had sent a note to the school before the meeting had started.

Seeing the young Marcus without Henry around was different, but just as he had promised his son, and as he had promised himself, he wouldn’t be scared away by the unknown. If he could confidently make an old ritual work without complete information, which hadn’t been performed successfully in hundreds of years, he could manage to do something people all around the world did every day.

He would be a father to the best of his abilities.

When Marvolo stepped into the classroom where Marcus and the other kids his age where sitting, all the children were colouring something. Or maybe drawing. It was hard to say from where he stood, trying to catch the eye of the teacher who currently was crouching next to a kid, probably explaining something.

So Marvolo walked over to have a better look over the room, searching the bowed heads for Marcus, finding him moments later, looking unhappily down onto the picture before him. Marvolo felt a smile tug at the corners of his mouth. Marcus looked kind of cute – just as small cats did – with a frown on his face.

In the wake of that thought came a wave of horror. How could it have happened that he, the Dark Lord, thought something or someone looked cute?

He took a deep breath.

The last returned piece of soul had once again brought another piece of humanity back to him. It really wasn’t as dramatic a change as he had experienced after the ritual giving him a body. But the small things still managed to startle him.

Marvolo was brought out of his thoughts by the teacher coming over to him with a smile on her face. “Lord Slytherin, welcome! The children are drawing their favourite animals at the moment. I want to include stories and information on them over the next few weeks. After that a bit of playing in the yard is planned.” She was speaking hurriedly, or maybe she always talked at that speed. Marvolo wasn’t sure he cared either way. “After that will be lunch. Are you willing to help me keep an eye on the children during playtime and lunch?”

Marvolo really would have liked to spend time with Marcus alone, as the other children weren’t all that important to him. But he supposed that wasn’t something that charming, young Lord Slytherin could say out loud. He had to appear as the young wizard willing to be social with everyone if he wanted to get Marcus into his family. “I have no prior experience with keeping so many children safe at the same time. But I’m certainly willing to help you out.” Best to make sure the woman knew he had no real clue how to handle a bunch of young kids. Surely keeping bloodthirsty adults in line didn’t count as previous experience for this?

“You won’t be alone with them, Lord Slytherin. So I see no possible problems.”

If he had been superstitious, her assurance would have fit really well in that moment, because from where the children were sitting a stirring of wild, raw magic caught Marvolo’s attention.

“Give me the green one!”

“No!”

“But I need it! NOW!”

“I had it first!”

“You've had it too long!”

“I need it this long!”

Two children were arguing about something. And they were getting agitated enough that at least one of them had started to let their magic lose. With a worried frown the teacher started to walk over quickly, already speaking while she approached. “What is the matter here? There's no need to shout. You know the rules. If there's a disagreement, we inform an adult.”

Marvolo refrained from scoffing. He remembered well enough that informing an adult would be considered tattling, and those who tattled were not well received by the others. If one wanted to fit in, you either learned to resolve problems quietly, got others to just do as you asked, or always gave in.

Maybe that wasn’t the way it always was, but nothing he had seen or heard since his own childhood in the company of too many children and too few caring adults, had led him to believe his view was anything but right.

While the situation was steadily sliding into total chaos, Marvolo noted that Marcus was the child who desperately wanted the green pencil – or was it a crayon? – and the other seemed to be an equally stubborn girl.

“No you don’t!”

“Do! I’m drawing a dragon! A Welsh Green! See, they’re green!” She seemed obviously smug with her deduction, and convinced that she was safe with that.

Marcus did not seem inclined to let it go this easily, and grabbed to take the pencil from the girls hand. “I’ve waited long enough! I’m working on a snake, I need the green too!”
Before the teacher had managed to squeeze through the group of other children who had turned to watch and didn’t really listen to her demanding they make room, magic exploded out from the two fighting children, blowing papers and drawings into the air, pencils flying around, paper ripping.

It was a mess, and on instinct Marvolo let his magic rush out to suspend all the flying objects in the air. The image of a pencil burrowed in a kid vividly painted itself in his mind.

Gently lowering the art supplies to the floor, Marvolo wondered which of the children was responsible for this strong display of accidental magic. And while he contemplated the ramifications of someone so young displaying such a strongly destructive magical force at such a common thing as simple frustration, the teacher was berating Marcus.

“That was naughty of you, Marcus! Attacking another like that! You’ll stay here with Lord Slytherin, cleaning up the mess you made, while the others get to play outside in the snow. And you’ll apologize for all the pictures you have destroyed after you’re done! No dessert for you today.” Without even asking Marvolo if he was agreeable to watching over the punishment she just ushered the other children out of the classroom leaving Marvolo alone with a Marcus who was sitting rigidly in his small chair, his small hands balled into fists, and his face turned towards the ground.

Marvolo sighed. That was oddly familiar. Maybe the teacher had seen something he didn’t, but at the moment Marvolo couldn’t have told if the girl or Marcus had caused the mayhem. And even if Marcus had not reacted the best way to his frustration over having to wait so long, the girl hadn’t helped at all in defusing the situation. Putting the blame solely on Marcus seemed rash to Marvolo.

He carefully walked over to where Marcus was still sitting, lowering himself onto the much-too-small chair next to the young wizard. “Are you hurt, Marcus?” Marvolo hoped that the teacher would look the other children over while they were outside. He was reasonably sure that he had caught everything in time. Before the flying objects could hurt anyone, but he wasn’t sure.

As the only reaction he got from Marcus was the boy's turning away a little bit more, stiffening his posture, Marvolo sighed again.

This would be anything but easy. With all the practice he had in manipulating people by promising them what they thought they wanted, he wasn’t really prepared for a situation like this.

What had he wished to get when he had been this young? Harassed by the other children, experiencing accidental magic?

Marvolo noticed the picture Marcus had worked on still was on the desk, unharmed. “What are you drawing, Marcus?” First step: get the child out of the pouting and general uncooperative mood.

“Nagini,” Was the mumbled reply.

Nodding solemnly, Marvolo moved a little closer, surveying the picture. “I certainly can see the resemblance.” And he did. It also explained why Marcus had been in need of the green pencil the girl next to him had been using. “Do you want to finish it, before we start picking everything up?”

Marcus gave a tentative nod, relaxing a little. With an over dramatic wave of his hand, Marvolo made the pencils all over the room hover up into the air, forming a line so they could dance over to them. Eyes round with wonder, Marcus lost the last traces of his defensive body posture. “I don’t think any of those pencils have the right green to match Nagini’s scales. What do you say?” Maybe he would be able to point out better ways to get what one wanted than just exploding the whole room. Marvolo wondered what would have been different if he had been shown different avenues to get what he wanted besides brute force and thievery. He certainly had learned that if you were willing to do what was needed, you could get whatever you wanted. But the finer points of manipulation, or simply working inside the rules, had been things he had learned much too late.

“That one is close.” Marcus pointed to one of the pencils, the only dark green. It was the only one even close to a Welsh green as well, and probably the one the confrontation had been about.

“Well, why use second best, when we have magic?” Marcus looked sceptical, but Marvolo didn’t let himself be deterred by that. Step two: showing other ways to solve the problem. It didn’t cost him but a moment of concentration to change the colour of the lead inside one light blue pencil to the exact shade of Nagini’s scales. This kind of colour changing wasn’t all that hard to do. But normally Marvolo didn’t often have a reason to do so. “Use this one. I can turn it back once you have finished.”

Marcus eagerly took the pencil and started to fill in the scales on the snake he had drawn. While the boy was occupied with that activity, Marvolo looked around to inspect the damage done. There were a few pieces of paper strewn around which obviously had been drawn on. Most likely they were the remains of pictures destroyed in the wave of magic. If they could manage to gather the right pieces a Reparo might be able to restore the images enough to make them presentable again.

“Look!” Marcus got Marvolo’s attention by shoving the picture almost in his face. So Marvolo took the picture and carefully held it at a distance where looking at it was more feasible. “That’s a good drawing of Nagini. I’m sure she’ll be pleased to learn that you regard her as your favourite animal.” It looked as if Marvolo had managed to sufficiently distract the child, now they should start cleaning everything up. “Let’s pack the pencils back into their cases. And then we’ll gather the picture pieces. Do you like puzzles?”

Bringing the cleanup – the punishment – back to the boy’s attention his face clouded over like a storm brewing. But he did as he had been told. Maybe there was more at work than simple resentment against being punished unfairly. Because Marvolo was sure Marcus felt unfairly punished. Was he working with Marvolo so easily because he was willing to go to great lengths to ensure the continued goodwill of an adult looking into adopting him? Or did he resent that particular teacher? Either way, Marvolo would have to speak with Xerxes before he could leave. For one thing, he wanted to make the suggestion to have two people in each class at all times. It would be safer to have a wizard or witch with good reflexes in each class to prevent harm when accidental magic got volatile enough to cause harm.

And then he needed to find out if Marcus was prone to violent displays of magic, and if the teachers always were so quick to judge the guilt of one child over another.

“Well done, Marcus.” A big pile of torn and shredded paper now was resting on one of the tables. “Let’s sort which pieces belong together and then I’ll try to repair them with magic.” Not all that eager Marcus started sorting, but quickly got more enthusiastic. It seemed a jigsaw puzzle would be a good idea for a present.

It didn’t take all that long to fix the pictures that had been damaged, so Marvolo helped Marcus into his cloak, as it was clear looking through a window that the other children still were playing in the snow. “Don’t forget your scarf, hat, and mittens, Marcus!” The boy, who had been almost to the door turned and ran back, seemingly unable to stand still while Marvolo bundled him up for playing in the cold. Once Marvolo had applied a warming charm for good measure, he followed the running child outside at a more sedate pace.

“I hope you didn’t clean up all by yourself, Lord Slytherin.” The teacher’s tone held a hint of a reprimand, at which Marvolo felt his hackles rise.
His answer accordingly was almost painfully polite. “Of course not. I helped him realize that there are better ways to solve such a situation with magic, which would make force unnecessary. He gathered the paper, and sorted it, so I could repair the images.” Before the teacher could react – probably with a rant defending her teaching approach – Marvolo injected the question he really wanted to know the answer to. “Is this the first time Marcus has had such a violent outburst of magic?” If it had been, it would only be more urgent to find the time to show the boy how to direct his magic into more productive avenues. The parenting books he had read all said the same thing about frustration and how children learned to cope with it. If they didn’t find good ways to work with frustrating situations, they would get into trouble a lot in later years.

From his own observations, especially of himself, adding magic into the mix, good coping mechanisms were essential to avoid some of the more dangerous pitfalls. Henry seemed to have turned to sports and avoidance prior to his start with therapy. Marvolo himself had turned to torture and vengeance and now had to work hard to find other ways. It would be best for Marcus to let him find something better now, than forcing him to relearn later in life.

Friday, 19th of January 1996

The Headmaster’s office looked exactly as it had done the day the old man had been forced to go to St. Mungo’s, Severus noted when he came in to confirm once again with Minerva, who was acting in her capacity as Deputy Headmistress, how Sonja would take over his classes for the day. It wasn’t really that surprising that she would display her loyalty to the old manipulator in such an obvious way.

On second glance, one might see a hint of Slytherin underhandedness in her refusal to allow any of her own things to be visible in the office. She didn’t need to remind visitors that she was standing in for the actual Headmaster when the office looked like he could walk in any moment.

“Looking forward to spending the day in the company of distinguished adults instead of the dunderheads you would have to put up with otherwise?” Minerva asked with an impish smile on her face, setting her quill down.

Severus rolled his eyes – he wished – and drawled in answer. “I’m not sure bickering politicians are an improvement over teenagers not paying attention in the potions classroom.”

That made Minerva chuckle. “Well, I’m sure you’ll manage to enjoy your day spent not teaching. And I only heard positive things from the students over your lovely wife teaching about ingredient freshness and storage. I’m sure her lessons will be well received today as well.” Severus refrained from commenting, only giving a short nod.

“I should be back by dinner. But if the session runs longer, Septima already agreed to keep an eye on my Slytherins this evening.” It felt odd that he was going to be somewhere else than the classroom on a normal Friday during term. But it was important that he attend this session. It was only his second one, and the matter they wanted to pass today was important to his Lord.

And to himself. Seeing what some muggle-born children suffered, leading to their never getting their acceptance letters. Opening up the way for young, suffering witches and wizards to find a home in their world felt really important. It was great if the muggle parents were as supportive as Miss Granger’s, Heiress Lestrange’s, parents were. But sadly that wasn’t always the case.

“Do you want to use the floo in the office here?” Minerva offered. “You won’t need to walk all the way down and out of the wards that way.”

Already having said his farewells with Sonja, and wearing the pretentious robes he had acquired after he had claimed the title of Lord Prince, Severus nodded. “Thank you, that would be helpful indeed.”

“Go on then, Lord Prince, I’ll see you in the evening.” As she knew how little he loved the political bickering, there was a slight teasing tone in her voice, prompting Severus to repay her in kind with a smirk on his face.

“I wish you the time to make a dent in the stack of parchment waiting for your attention.” Minerva huffed at that jab, waving him away with an imperious gesture. They both enjoyed their banter which they had gotten new fodder for with the positions they both had found themselves in this past year.

Getting a pinch of floo powder from the jar, Severus threw it down, stepped into the green flames, and called out his destination. “Ministry of Magic!” He was sure this would be a long day.

Augusta had decided to be early, coming alone, as she did every time since she had taken the position as regent for her grandson and now regent for the Potter seat. She had made sure on the last weekend to meet with Harry to get a feeling for what he wanted to happen with his own vote this session.

Not surprisingly, he had fervently argued in favour of the changes to the adoption process they had worked on with the Minister since Lord Slytherin had stumbled upon the mess Miss Summer had made of it. The boy’s stance on werewolf rights hadn’t changed – no surprise there either – and after she had explained the few changes on import taxes and regulations for the import of common potions ingredients, he had tentatively agreed with her stance that dragon products needed to have some parchments for verification that they hadn’t been hunted from the wild, but harvested at one of the reserves.

She was satisfied to see that he didn’t just go along with what she suggested, but had asked for how that should be set up and controlled. If they actually made it to that part of the agenda, Augusta would have to bring forward the suggestion to include something like that into the law before they could vote on it in her capacity as the Potter regent.

“Augusta, good morning my dear.” Elphias slowly walked over to her, smiling kindly. They had a habit of talking with one another before the sessions. And they had lots of time to do so.

“Elphias, how are you this fine day?” It had been raining, temperatures just above the freezing point, when she had left the Manor, but these pleasantries were nothing but pretence anyway.

“Needs must, needs must, I’m sure you know only too well, my dear.” He spoke in a way Augusta remembered well from her own grandmother, words picked to play down the problems age brought, but the voice asking for soothing words and pity to be heaped onto the one speaking.

She had refused to give her grandmother such when she had been just out of school, and she wasn’t about to give it to someone insinuating that she would have to suffer from stiff joints and constant aches as well, therefore knowing what he was speaking of. “Getting old isn’t for the faint of heart,” she simply offered before changing the topic, “Have you heard from Albus? Last I was told, he was going to stay with his brother for the rest of his convalescence.”

Doge wasn’t all that happy with her brushing off his attempt to gain some sympathy – what had he expected calling her old? – but jumped at the opportunity to talk about his good friend.

Only listening with half her attention, Augusta watched as a group of Lords – well, mostly Lords – came in, drawing the attention of most of those already in attendance. There in the middle and slightly to the front of the group walked Lord Slytherin. As always in the signature green and silver colours of his house. He was talking with Lord Lestrange at his side, and around them were Lord Malfoy, Lord Nott, the newly installed Lord Yaxley – from one of the lower houses – and Lord Greengrass. After them the stream of people arriving didn’t stop. There was the new Lord Prince. She never would have thought that the small runt in Slytherin from James’ year would turn out to be such an imposing figure. Just one more proof that, given enough effort, everyone had the potential to rise above their origins.

“Let’s settle down,” Augusta interrupted Elphias’ rambling about the books he was going to bring with him on his next visit to Dumbledore. “Seems as if everyone will be on time for a change.”

And indeed the benches were filling rather quickly, even the number of plum coloured robes indicating that most of the Ministry-appointed members were already here.

Doge looked around, surprised by her rude interruption. “Seems that way.” He nodded. “Well then, let’s see how this year will start.” With another nod in her direction, he walked off to find his own seat.

Augusta cast a cushioning charm on her bench of carved flowers before she sat down. This was going to be interesting.

But first the announcements. Abbott called the room to attention, causing everyone to fall into a hushed silence. After he had called Lord Yaxley forward to give his oath, Abbott turned to a list of notices one of the scribes had handed him. “Before we come to the agenda for today, let me inform you of a few important items of interest.” He unfurled the short list – Augusta thought that it was unusually short – and started to read from the top. “The wizards responsible for the abduction and torture of three witches last year, were sentenced to life in Azkaban.” There wasn’t really a reaction to that. Some of them had been in that trial and the news had been in the Prophet right after the day the sentence had been announced. “Suggestions for the cause of the annual spring fundraiser should be handed in before the end of February.” The scroll snapped shut with a sharp sound the moment the Chief Warlock released the bottom edge. “Is there anyone else who needs to make an announcement?” He waited a breath, looking around the room “No? Well, then let’s start with a motion to change the laws governing adoptions brought in by Minister Fudge. Minister, if you will.”

“Thank you, Chief Warlock.” The Minister rose from his seat, giving a small bow to the head of the Wizengamot. “As we have seen a rise in the number of adoptions since the past summer, it has come to the Ministry’s attention that the procedures were in severe need of an update. A first attempt to do so within the confines of the current laws proved unsuccessful, so my advisers and I have come up with the following changes to the law.” A flick of the wand and Arthur’s middle son was sending out copies of the law they had been working on for the past weeks. Augusta caught the copy sent to her and unfurled it. Her grandfather had always told the story of the one ancestor of his who had been swindled into supporting a law going against his direct interests by changing what was actually written in it between negotiations and the actual passing in the Wizengamot. It had been a good lesson to ingrain in her the habit of always reading anything she was supposed to sign or vote on just before she did so.

The Minister gave them all a moment to read before he started on his explanation of what exactly the changes were. “As you can see, the best interest of the child to be adopted is still the most important concern.” Cornelius started on his speech, sticking to the highlights just as they had decided was the best approach. As Augusta already knew what the law was about and how they thought it should work, she let her eyes roam over the assembly. They still didn’t know who had been the one behind the scenes, pulling the strings so that Miss Summers could enact all those half-baked measures. This was their opportunity to watch all those Lords and Ladies who might have been involved.

To be effective, the Wizengamot chambers had been split into several segments, each containing a few individuals, each of them watching only those individuals in their assigned section. She had picked the section of the Ministry bench where all the Department Heads were seated. The Minister hadn’t openly communicated the work that was going on, but rumours always happened. And as Percival Weasley had been involved, Augusta wasn’t surprised that Arthur only nodded when he read over the proposal. Most others had known that adoption procedures would be a topic today – not everyone made a habit of reading the agenda before a session – but from all those in Augusta’s portion of the hall, Amos Diggory was the one person showing the most obvious displeased reaction.

During the discussion picking up after Cornelius had finished with his presentation of the new law, Augusta divided her attention between what everyone said and Amos’ reaction to what was said.

When Griselda Marchbanks asked one of the questions they had expected, Augusta saw Amos nodding with a grim expression. “This sounds as if it would make it possible to take children away from their muggle parents. Surely you can’t want that?”

“May I point you to the clause we specifically added to prevent that exact scenario from occurring?” Cornelius answered with a charming smile, clearly agreeing with her that this was a concern that needed to be addressed. “Here under the definition of what an unsuitable guardian is, it clearly is stated as point a, let me quote, ‘the lack of personal ability to wield magic never can be grounds for being declared an unfit guardian’. Just because the parents of a child are Squibs or Muggles, there is no cause to remove the child from their custody.”

There was more back and forth, questions digging deeper, people trying to find the edges of the rules, questioning the viability of the procedures they were proposing be put into place. And all the time Augusta watched the face of Amos Diggory getting darker and darker. He obviously wasn’t happy with the way this was going.

But why was Amos so set against children in need of a family being adopted? As long as Augusta had known him, he had been in Albus’ corner, or at least close to it. One of the few supporters the old Headmaster had had in the Department for the Regulations and Control of Magical Creatures. Sure, he had been dealt a hard blow when his son had died in the third task of the Tournament… her thought process came to a sudden halt.

Was that possible? Could it really be that?

Was Amos Diggory so grief stricken that he would do anything to get revenge on who he had to see as the one who killed his son? Was Amos against children’s being adopted, just because Lord Slytherin was advocating for such adoptions to take place?

It seemed petty. But then she herself still had trouble speaking to Xerxes Lestrange for any length of time, because he had always been adamant about not disowning his sons. It was no longer that important with the death of those two after their escape from the prison. But she could understand holding a grudge. And she had held one for many years against the father of those responsible. Lord Slytherin was in many ways still the wizard they all had fought against. So working against him for what a Death Eater had done… she could understand that. But she still thought – hoped, really – that she never would have condoned the suffering of children in the name of revenge.

Augusta offered no arguments or questions during the debate, closely watching Amos, sneaking short glances to the others in her section. After all, his being upset about the changes of laws hundreds of years old, was no proof that he had been involved in the manipulations which had made the changes necessary in the first place. There might still be others involved.

Finally the Chief Warlock called for a vote. “Those of you in favour of the law light your wands.” Augusta held her wand high, as did all of those allied with Lord Slytherin – they had managed to overcome their wariness around the man since he had first claimed his title – and a lot of those who hadn’t been in on the plan from the beginning. If Augusta was right, those clearly were more than half of their numbers.

“Those against enacting the changes proposed, please light your wands now.” Amos was among the first to raise his glowing wand. Only a few others followed his example. As Lord Slytherin had promised, his allies had worked hard to make those most conservative dark families realize that it was a good idea to include those young wizards and witches into their families, and into their culture early on. Augusta wasn’t sure she could trust their motivation.

“Those that don’t want to decide either way, please light your wands now.” Since Abbott had become chief Warlock, changing the question for abstaining members slightly, the number of those had dropped quite a bit.

“With a clear majority the law brought forward by the Minister has been accepted. The Wizengamot instructs the Ministry to enact the changes needed to make the necessary adaptations.” The gavel came down with a loud bang. “The Wizengamot will break for tea. Session resumes in a quarter of an hour.”

With a sigh Augusta rose from her bench. This was a good opportunity to let the others know that she suspected Amos Diggory might be behind, or at least involved in, the framing of Miss Summers. Maybe one of the others had made another observation that she needed to know about. Working together with such a large group of people was beneficial, but probably short-lived. There weren’t that many topics it was so easy to agree on.

Augusta reached the break room, selected a small cucumber sandwich from one of the floating trays, and let herself drift over to where Amelia was standing, talking with Lord Slytherin.

Saturday, 20th of January 1996
Coming to the Caribbean was a real blessing after the dreary January weather in France and England. After searching the records of births in the year 1959 – luckily there only were a few hospitals on the island, and the city of birth had been listed in the files of the university – Sam was now walking through one of the smaller settlements in the centre south of the island.

He hadn’t been able to get the address of Olivienne Moreau’s own home, but asking an older man owning a small odds and ends shop in the centre of the nearest town had given him an address for the woman’s mother.

As he was walking down the street, greeting the curious neighbours looking over from their windows or gardens, he looked out for the house which he had been directed to. Sam didn’t feel bothered by the interest of the locals. As a man obviously from Europe so far from the usual tourist haunts, he was bound to be noticed.

A few more minutes down the steep street Sam came to the house, painted in bright colours and sitting in a small but neat garden. Taking a deep breath he opened the small gate in the fence and walked up to the front door to knock.

“Un moment, s’il vous plait!” was called not from inside the house, but from the garden out of sight of where Sam was standing. He scolded himself, there really wasn’t a reason to be this nervous. It wasn’t as if he hadn’t prepared a good story to explain his presence and why he was searching for Olivienne Moreau.

A woman emerged from around the corner of the house. She wore shorts, a loose blouse of some delicate fabric, and a straw hat on top of her unbound hair. She would fit what he knew of Olivienne Moreau – African ancestry, mid thirties – but that applied to a lot of women he had meet since the airplane had touched down on the island. “Bonjour. Qui êtes-vous?”

“Bonjour. Je me présente, Samuel Jacobs. Est-ce bien le domicile de la famille Moreau?” Sam really was glad that he had taken the time to learn a few different languages. Translation spells were known to fail when local dialects, accents, and the like came into play. And they did nothing that would help him speak the language.

But seeing as the woman switched over to an accented English once she had heard him speak, his accent probably was worse than he had realised. “It is, Mr. Jacobs. My mother is in the garden. If you’ll follow me.”

What a coincident! It seemed he would need to deliver his news earlier than he had expected. But his only task had been to find her and establish communication. Everything else would be Lord Black’s job. Sam decided to pay attention to both women’s reactions and actions to maybe make the whole easier on his employer. This was going to be interesting.

Chapter End Notes

I know, it’s a mean place to end the chapter, but I wanted to give what comes next a proper stage ;) And this chapter was filled already.
Here are the translations for the few phrases used earlier in the chapter:
One moment! - Un moment, s’il vous plait!
Hello, who are you?” - Bonjour. Qui êtes-vous?
“Hello, my name is Samuel Jacobs. Is this the residence of the Moreau family? - Bonjour. Je me présente, Samuel Jacobs. Est-ce bien le domicile de la famille Moreau?

Thanks to DiagonAlleyParis for the help with the French translation.

Thanks to Jordre and Jake for helping to improve my spelling!

Sam was pretty nervous while he followed the woman who had identified herself as the daughter of the woman living in the house known as the residence of the family by the name of Moreau.

He didn’t really know if Olivienne Moreau had a sister, but he thought it unlikely that this woman was anyone but the one he had been searching for.

“I’m searching for an Olivienne Moreau who was in London in February 1981, my search led me here. Have I found who I’ve been searching for?” There really wasn’t a reason to drag this out. In his experience people tended to react with suspicion if one took too long to explain why he was there, especially if it was necessary to tell the truth at some point. He had heard of others inventing stuff at a first meeting, only to be made a fool once the truth needed to be revealed.

“You were searching for me?” She seemed surprised, but quickly turned to an older woman – her tight curly hair turning grey in a few places – introducing Sam with a few quick sentences in French, before waving her hand at one of the empty garden chairs. “Sit, and explain!”

So Sam did exactly that. He sat down and, folding his hands in his lap, took a deep breath.

How best to begin?

“I take it that you have been in London in ’81, studied marine biology, attending a conference there and meeting a young man – dark hair, grey eyes, pale skin, lean, mostly leather clothes – in a bar. Ending up being intimate together?” It felt awkward talking about a one-night stand with the mother of the woman who had taken part sitting right there, listening attentively, and not knowing if she could understand what he was saying or not.

“He introduced himself as Sirius. I tried to get hold of him when I realized I was pregnant, but I never managed.” She nodded, her attention sharpening, as if she herself was assessing what to tell Sam and what not to tell him.
“That was my client, then.” Sam nodded, smiling, at least he had that confirmed. “You wouldn’t have been able to find him. He kept hidden rather well.” All Aurors had had good warding… well, at least those that survived for longer than a few months after the attacks by Death Eaters had started in earnest.

His gaze flicked over to the mother, the way she was focused on the conversation, Sam was pretty sure she understood most, if not all, of what they were saying. Could he risk mentioning magic? In a way he would need to. How else could he explain why Sirius Black had known to search for her now, of all times?

Well, better start slow. “You said you searched for him when you noticed you were pregnant. I assume you are a mother to a child turning fifteen sometime this year then?” After all he really couldn’t explain how he was certain she was a mother of twins. Not without also revealing the existence of magic to two muggles he didn’t know at all. If the twins had no magic of their own, this family would be in the dark about it, and he would be violating the Statute of Secrecy if he told them.

Maybe he should have prepared himself to meet his target here. And the fact that the woman wasn’t as forthcoming with information as he had expected her to be wasn’t helping him any, either.

She nodded, caution clear in her whole posture. “I am. But why do you want to know?”

There wasn’t really a way back, so Sam moved forward. “Did you notice anything inexplicable happening around the child? For instance, when it was distressed, or bored?”

A short burst of laughter erupted from the woman, a lot of the tension going out of her. “Oh, mon Dieu! Stop pussyfooting around! You’re trying to ask if my child has magic!” Her question came out more like an exclamation but with a sigh of relief Sam nodded.

That was promising.

“Are you a wizard, Mr. Jacobs?” Her question was pointed. She was a terrifying woman. And her mother wasn’t any better. Her stare certainly was able to drill a hole into his head. So he only managed another weak nod, while the older woman threw in a comment from the side.

“Ainsi donc, le père de mes deux beautés est un sorcier?”

“Tais-toi, Maman! Laisse le parler.” Miss Moreau waved her hand impatiently at her mother, her eyes firmly locked onto Sam, who tried to gather his wits. “I hope you have an explanation.”

Sam took her next impatient hand-wave as his prompt to speak, and so he spoke. “You probably know of the war that was going on in the magical part of Britain at the time?” She gave a short nod of confirmation. “It ended in the same year at the beginning of November. My client, Sirius Orion Black, was accused of several crimes and tossed into jail without a proper trial in the wake of the confusion and chaos after the leader of the Death Eaters had been… incapacitated.” Because killed was so obviously not what had happened to the man now once again walking around. “Late the past summer, new evidence was provided, the lack of a trial discovered, and the unjust imprisonment ended.” Sam had a captive audience of two and was pretty sure those were the two most frightening women he had ever met. “He was set free and subsequently claimed his family assets, including a seat on the Wizengamot for the Most Ancient and Noble House of Black. He moved into the old family house in London, and started with renovations.”

Sam paused for a moment to give Miss Moreau a chance to ask questions, but another impatient hand wave prompted him to continue speaking. “Over Christmas, an ancient family heirloom – a tapestry displaying the family tree of the Black family – was repaired and suddenly was showing much more than before. That’s how my client learned of the fact that he had twin daughters by the names of Nawel Lyra Moreau and Enora Libra Moreau. With not much more information than their date of birth, their names, as well as yours, and an idea in which clubs he had been during the window of probable conception,” Sam felt his ears and cheeks flush what was probably a bright red, going by the almost gagging laugh of the grandmother of the two kids he had just named, “Lord Black hired me to investigate and find you and your daughters, Miss Moreau.” Deciding that he didn’t need to recount the way he had taken to find her here, Sam made a small “and that’s that” motion with his hand. “So you see, Lord Black had no way of knowing of your daughters’ existence, nor any means to contact you before I managed to track you down.”

“Tiens compte que quoi que ce monsieur puisse te proposer. Si c’est un Lord, c’est qu’il a de l’argent!” Mrs. Moreau spoke up, standing from her chair. “Je vais nous chercher quelque chose à boire.” She picked up the tray with an empty glass pitcher and two glasses and started on her way back to the house.

Miss Moreau tapped her finger against her lip, dark eyes taking in Sam, who had the inexplicable need to fidget. If he hadn’t known any better, he would have sworn that she had an intimidation ward or something on the garden. “I don’t remember Sirius as the caring type, eager to be a father, or one to take on any responsibility.” She paused, raising a brow. “What prompted him to search us out now?”

If Sam had to sort this woman – as all alumni of Hogwarts tended to do with strangers anyway – he would have placed her in Slytherin in that moment. “You’re right. Lord Black doesn’t want to marry. But he needs an heir or heiress, and society is pressuring him to marry and make sure that there is one. He wanted to check if he already had a kid before letting himself be… tied down in that manner.” Sugar coating anything wouldn’t work on her anyway, so why lie?

“So he wants to take my girls from me?” There was a dangerous edge to her voice, making Sam quickly deny her question with a shake of his head.

“Nothing of the sort. There is no need for the girls to be separated from you, or to relocate. As far as I know. My task was to find you and establish a line of communication.” Only now did he realize that he had no idea if there were any special rules regarding the living situation or education of a Black heir or heiress.

“Heiress to what, exactly?”

“The whole estate, including several houses, money, old artefacts, the seat on the Wizengamot. But I’m not entirely sure to what sum exactly that amounts.” He knew of course that the Black family had a lot of wealth and had been bigger, meaning that all that wealth that had been spread out between the different members now mostly was back with the main estate. But it wouldn’t be wise to speculate.

“I want to meet with Sirius before he can meet the girls. And it’s their decision if they want to meet him at all. They are currently away at school, but I’ll send a letter. I suggest you inform Sirius that you have found me, and what my stipulations are. I’ll give you the address for my own home.
Meet me there the day after tomorrow. We’ll see what Sirius has to say for himself.”

And so Sam was thrown out – more or less politely – before he could get something to eat. But he guessed that was probably for the best. He needed to inform Lord Black and get a little more information on what Lord Black was offering and expecting.
And after he had written and sent his letter, he would find a nice section of beach, or a bar with good cocktails, and have a good evening.

Ever since one of her mother’s friends had told her that her toddlers had magic, Olivienne’s world hadn’t been quite the same. Since then she had suspected that the mysterious, talented – at least in bed – Sirius no-last-name had been a wizard and the girls had inherited their gift from him. Why else should she find herself unable to locate a grown man in London? And such a striking figure at that.

The explanation the wizard detective had given was plausible. Or as plausible as anything ever was in the world of magic. The old witch who was friends with her mother had started to teach the twins early, mostly in the magic native to the islands in this part of the world, and not the modern nonsense with wands and so on that they taught at schools now. So she and her mother had protective spells around their homes, linked to a few pieces of jewellery to inform them of danger and the intent of visitors, and to enable them to activate certain other features that had been included.

Remembering the unease she had felt from the wizard earlier, Olivienne smiled. It was always good to remind magic-wielding men that she wasn’t powerless or easy to cow. Judging by the fidgeting she had seen earlier, that had worked out rather well.

Accepting a glass of fresh lemonade from her mother, Olivienne sat down at her table and started to write a letter to her twins. Nawel and Enora would be interested to learn that their father had finally turned up. Maybe they would insist on a test to prove that he indeed was their father. They tended to be demanding when it concerned the validity of any information they were given.

Maybe she should have informed Mr. Jacobs that she wanted a paternity test. But in the end she easily could inform him or Sirius later.

In quick efficient sentences Olivienne wrote down everything she had learned today, before adding what had happened in her life since she had sent the last letter. She would pass it on the her mother’s friend – she only ever had called her tante –, who would use the floo to get it over to the small magical centre in Fort-de-France where it would be placed into the bags transferred over to mainland France each day, from where an owl – of all things – would take the letter to Beauxbatons.

Her girls were accepted there. Not once had they heard a slur based on the colour of their skin, the thigh curls of their hair, or the fact that they had been born on Martinique. It seemed that prejudices in the magical world mostly were directed at those from a non-magical background, or any other background that was considered deficient in intellect or culture. Olivienne wasn’t sure if being the daughters of a British Lord would be good or bad for their chances in their world.

Probably only time would tell.

They had found a nice alcove in the library to spend a little time away from all their friends, who were either engrossed in their revision, or working on homework, when they had left.

Luna was sitting on the floor, her legs crossed before her, her head bent over some strange floppy strands of… something – strings probably was the best way to describe the objects – braiding, while Harry had sat down on the padded bench in the window, drawing.

Since he had received and read the book on how to animate simple drawings, Harry had wanted to try it. But there had not really been time. Now he had to draw a Bowtruckle for Care of Magical Creatures and intended to make it an animated drawing. Something simple, like the creature turning around and around – something repeating seamlessly should be the easiest, according to the book – showing both the front and back, as well as the sides.

If nothing else, this was going to help him remember how this funny tree-dweller looked.

Soft steps followed by the clearing of a throat draw Harry’s attention away from where he was trying to get the left leg right. He looked up, and there was Neville, all bundled up and smiling a little sheepishly. “I was sent by the twins to get you. And Luna. There’s a big inter-house snowball fight in the making down at the pitch. Ron is ecstatic, Hermione insists on being some kind of supervisor… please come down. It’ll be more fun if you’re there too!”

Harry would have loved to continue his drawing, but it was likely that there wouldn’t be snow all that much longer, so using this fairly sunny day for something other than doing homework and revision seemed like a good idea.

And the others obviously had thought the same.

“I’ll need to put my stuff away and get my cloak, mittens, and so on.” He turned his gaze to Luna, who was still sitting on the floor, smiling up to him with the calm demeanour she almost always had, and just answered in her dreamy voice. “I’ll put this away, get my warm clothes, and meet you at the great doors in fifteen minutes.”

Looking over to Neville, Harry smiled. “That’s settled, then. Please tell the others we’ll be down as quickly as possible.” He heard Neville quickly moving away while he gathered up his supplies.

“It’s fun having actual friends.” Luna said as if it wasn’t one of the saddest things anyone could say. But Harry understood only too well, and simply nodded with a smile, holding his hand out so he could help Luna get up from the floor.

They both picked up their things and parted ways at the stairs, where Luna had to go up to reach Ravenclaw tower, and Harry had to go down to the dungeons. For a moment it felt as if they should do something, but the moment was gone before Harry could really grasp what he felt he wanted to do, and he just smiled at Luna before going down the stairs.

Xerxes had pondered how best to approach this meeting. It wasn’t exactly easy. On the one hand he had to do what was best for the school, making sure his teachers knew that he had faith in them and their abilities. On the other hand, he had to do what his Lord wanted, especially when it came to the child his friend and Lord wanted to adopt as soon as possible.

So he had delayed the meeting until this day, using the fact that it had been a weekend and that there had been the Wizengamot session to make Marvolo agree to let it rest this long.

But now he sat here in his office, waiting for both the teacher – the near-Squib Matilda Moors – and Marvolo.

Hopefully Marvolo had cooled down a bit from the first time he had stormed into Xerxes’ office demanding action against a teacher unfairly accusing Marcus of violence.

He went to a lot of work to set up the meeting in an environment that hopefully would contribute to a relaxed atmosphere. His greatest fear for this was that the teacher might take this as an attempt to cow her or something along those lines.

To prevent that, he had carefully selected three identical armchairs, had arranged them around a table big enough to hold cups and snacks for them all and still allow room for writing, and had ordered some food he knew both his guests would like.

There was a knock at the door. Hopefully this would be Mrs. Moors, as Xerxes had asked her to be here earlier than he had asked Marvolo to arrive. “Enter!” he called out, moving in the direction of the door to further reduce the intimidation factor. The door opened. “Mrs. Moors, do come in! Would you prefer tea or coffee?”

The woman blinked several times, before she got her bearings back. Maybe she had expected a different reception. “Tea would be nice.” Maybe Xerxes had overdone the friendly bit. He probably was more nervous than he had realized if he was making such errors. Under normal circumstances he had more composure than that.

They both settled into the chairs, where Xerxes used several levitation charms to get the tea into their cups, and the cream and sugar where they needed to go. After he was finished with that. He had nothing more he could use to stall, and had to call himself to order sharply.

He should prepare the teacher for what this meeting was about before Marvolo arrived.

“Mrs. Moors, as I told you before, this meeting is intended to find a better way to handle the classes with younger children. After Lord Slytherin came to me with the story of how the squabble over a pencil turned into a dangerous tornado of flying art supplies, I realized that there might have been more than one reason why no one has attempted something like we are here, before now.”

Xerxes was the one to blink in surprise as he was forcefully interrupted. “I’m absolutely capable of taking care of a class of children on my own. Even if some of them have magic, and deplorable manners. And just because I set a punishment Lord Slytherin doesn’t agree with is no reason to undermine my authority, or doubt my competence!”

For a moment Xerxes wondered where this outburst had come from, but then the realisation hit almost as a shock. Mrs. Moors was only still carrying a wand because she had managed to get enough OWLs, and barely at that. She had been good in everything theoretical, but lacked in performance with magic in general. She had Outstanding marks in History, Astronomy, and Muggle Studies, but only barely passing grades for Potions, Runes, and Arithmancy. She had failed in all classes where performance with a wand to a certain degree was needed for a passing grade. Her NEWTs were even less impressive. She had managed only three: one for History of Magic, one for Astronomy, and the last for Muggle Studies. As far as Xerxes' research into her qualifications had turned up, she could only perform charms and jinxes taught to first- and second-years at Hogwarts. For all intents and purposes, she was almost a Squib, and probably was treated as such by most people.

“No worries, Mrs. Moors. No one doubts your competence. But you can’t be everywhere in a room of small children. So I wanted to propose that there always be two adults in class with the children. Helping where it’s needed, and making sure that magic can’t get that out of hand so easily. I want to get your input to this idea. But that’s not the main point of this meeting with Lord Slytherin.” Xerxes had kept his tone polite, careful not to let his realisation of her position show in any way. Dorcas always had resented the occasions where someone had treated her with pity for her lack of magic. Mrs. Moors relaxed slightly.

“As a parent – or as good as – to Marcus, Lord Slytherin is interested in knowing if this was the first violent reaction of the boy’s magic. You, as his primary teacher, are the best person to ask for such information.” After Marvolo had cooled down a bit in that meeting after the incident, he had indeed shown concern that this could be a regular occurrence.

In that moment there was a knock at the door and after Xerxes’ call to enter, Marvolo walked in, exhibiting all the grace of the predator. One of the usual ways the other was prone to mask his slight discomfort at entering a totally alien situation. Xerxes had to work hard to mask his smirk, and judging by the narrowing of his friend’s eyes, he hadn’t been all that successful. “Marvolo, come in take a seat, and a cup of tea, before we begin.”

A few pleasantries were exchanged, and an overly sweet tea was prepared, before Xerxes started to lead into the discussion by removing any temptation even to come near doubting Mrs. Moors' expertise. “I’ve already informed Mrs. Moors that I plan to double up the adults per classroom to reduce the risk of accidents and increase the personal attention each child can get, making it easier to help them develop their strengths and improve their weaknesses.”

Xerxes noted with relief that Marvolo was nodding. “If you make it mixed teams, one person at ease with performing magic, and one either incapable of using it, or rarely relying on it, you would make sure the children learn from the beginning the diversity of our world, providing positive role models.” This suggestion was delivered with a calm tone in between sips of tea. “I think the person with more experience in teaching should be in charge, and the other more of an assistant.” All three of them were aware that this qualification – of being a trained teacher – almost always applied to the Squibs Xerxes had hired. Very few witches and wizards with other avenues open to them went to Muggle University to get teaching degrees.

Mrs. Moors nodded, visibly appeased by the way both Xerxes and Marvolo had spoken so far. “It certainly would make dealing with discord, and difficult children easier. If there are enough funds to make that possible, you won’t hear me complain. And I’m sure the others will agree.”

“I’m currently more interested in getting insight into Marcus’ behaviour in class. I have mostly spent time with him when he was the focus of attention, not really competing with anyone.” Marvolo switched the topic, turning his full attention to the teacher. Xerxes watched in interest. It was always nice to see how others dealt with the intensity Marvolo was once again able to display, now that he had his good looks and sanity back.

“Was that the first time his magic reacted so forcefully to his frustration? Or has it happened before?”

Mrs. Moor slowly shook her head. “That was the first time I’ve witnessed something like this from him. Until I saw that only Marcus’ drawing had been left undamaged, I wasn’t even sure he had been the one causing it. It could have been the girl reacting defensively to the situation. Marcus was grabbing for the pencil in her hand.” She took a sip from her tea, clearly contemplating the matter. “I haven’t seen much magic in my classroom so far. Most of the time there is no need for the children to defend themselves or others, nor is there much anger.”

“So no positive displays either? Levitating something? Floating down from the swing?” Mrs. Moors simply shook her head, again not interrupting Marvolo. “I’m not sure what would be considered normal for a child his age. I haven’t been around many small children so far. Nor would I consider myself a typical case.” Marvolo turned to look at Xerxes. “Do you have information on what he did to catch the notice of the Obliviator Squad?”

Xerxes shrugged. “I can look it up. But I think it’ll match with most of the others from less-than-ideal living conditions. Something spectacular to defend themselves from harm, either by other children, or a supposed caretaker. If Obliviators are called, it’s mostly something that can’t be explained away or just be ignored. So, likely inflating someone, or pushing them away.” Xerxes got a feeling what Marvolo was getting at. But arranging for therapy for Marcus would have to wait for later. “I’ll have a look after we’re finished here.”

“I wanted to offer to donate art supplies to the school,” Marvolo said, snatching up a few of the sugar-coated cookies. “I was a little puzzled as to why there was only one pencil of that particular green in the whole classroom.”

Mrs. Moors sighed. “I’m not sure why or how it happens, but more stuff gets lost or turns up broken than I would consider normal for a school. The children are very careful with the supplies, never damaging anything on purpose. But despite that, after a day or two, pencils start to turn up in odd places, broken, in need of sharpening constantly… Now that I think about it, that is more than odd.”

Xerxes frowned. He had assumed that the constant need to order more supplies – paper, erasers, ink, pencils, and other stationary like that – was normal, attributing the high demand to the number of children learning and the fact that they were children in the first place.

An amused chuckle from Marvolo brought both Xerxes and Mrs. Moors up short. With a pointed, questioning look, Xerxes prompted his friend to speak up and explain his sudden mirth.

“Hogwarts has a poltergeist, as the only place in Britain as far as I know, because there are so many adolescent witches and wizards living there the bigger part of the year.” Dread started to form in Xerxes’ stomach. “Maybe these are the early signs of a poltergeist forming here because of all the children spending so much time here. It could be that the ambient magic in the massive wards we placed here is contributing to that.” A slightly evil grin was aimed at Xerxes. “I think we have found another possible reason for why an elementary school for magical children wasn’t established sooner.”

Closing his eyes and pinching the bridge of his nose, Xerxes quietly despaired. How could he handle a ghost as disruptive as Peeves had always been?

He would need to consult with the Deputy Headmistress, or maybe Severus Snape. As two who had taught at the school longer than Xerxes had gone to school there, they should have some insight.

Opening his eyes again, Xerxes gave the still-amused-looking Marvolo the evil eye. “I want your help in tracking down any and all literature that might help us determine if this scenario you’re painting is an actual possibility.”
“I’m happy to offer my assistance! I don’t think it’s all that often that one can investigate the causes for the manifestation of a poltergeist.” Marvolo sounded eager and Xerxes nodded in acceptance. What else should he do? One thing was clear he wouldn’t be bored anytime soon.

Tuesday, 23rd of January 1996

They had send out invitations to participate in their experiment with the morning mail. Students at several tables had received the letters written by Sonja – she also had had a heavy hand in the wording – asking them to help test a batch of potion to see if it was able to correctly gauge the closeness of the relation they had to others invited as well.

They had to stick to those either above the age of seventeen, or who they could get permission for participation from the parents for. They also had invited a few adults. All in all, they had managed to get quite a few positive answers through the charmed parchments.

“I still feel it was a juvenile way to ask for an answer. Boxes to tick at the end of the invitation. There are much more dignified ways to go about something like this,” Severus groused once again, while carefully measuring out doses of the collecting-solution into ivory goblets.

“Shush, darling.” Sonja said from where she was preparing several shallow bowls of quartz with the testing-compound. “I know it goes against your sense of professionalism and decorum, but I remind you that we both agreed it was the best way to get answers swiftly. Sometimes it’s expedient to let go of proper ways for the sake of efficiency.”

Severus sighed, because they had agreed that they needed to test this first attempt at a two-part procedure for this on a greater scale soon, and that it wasn’t possible to go the long and arduous way of acquiring willing test subjects.

“I know, love. But I’m still sure we could have found someone else to take Black’s place in this test.” And how it had irked Severus that the insufferable, immature Lord Black had agreed to participate.

Sonja threw him a teasing look over her shoulder. She really knew him well. “We did invite Mrs. Tonks, and she said no. So be happy that Lord Black agreed, because otherwise we wouldn’t have had a relationship of second cousins for our series.”

They had invited people with known family connections to see if they could prove that connection, or closeness, with their potion. They already had tested themselves, establishing that they had eliminated the explosive quality of all their previous one-potion attempts.

Dinner had been over for a while, and just before they had finished the setup there was a knock at the door.

Sonja opened it to let in the Weasley twins. Unusual calm, the two stepped in and walked over to one of the tables at a gesture from Severus, but he guessed the eager glint in their eyes, the way they were eyeing the bowl and goblets on their table, indicated that they wanted to be a part of this very much, and therefore would do what they could to prevent failure.
Severus had sent a letter to Arthur Weasley, asking for permission to get Ronald and Ginevra Weasley to take part in the trial as well – it would have been good to see if the reaction to identical twins was different or equal to that between normal siblings of the same family – but had been denied.

One after the other, the others came in. Black and Mr. Slytherin walked in talking animatedly about some woman who someone named Sam had found on some island or other. Draco came in, followed by a few more Slytherins, like the Carrow twins, the Greengrass sisters, and a pair of distant cousins who both were in their seventh year. Miss Granger came in – looking flustered – closely followed by Lord Slytherin and Xerxes Lestrange.

Hopefully this selection of individuals would help them gauge the effectiveness of their current formula.

When all were settled at their tables with the partner Sonja and Severus had assigned Severus walked to the front of the classroom they were using, his robes billowing around him.

“First, thank you all for your agreement to help us with the development of a potion to ascertain familial closeness that doesn’t violate the treaty with the goblins. Let me explain the procedure.”

Severus took a few steps, which brought him behind the setup prepared on his own desk. “Each of you will first need to swirl the potion from the goblet in their mouth until the sand in this glass,” He indicated a rather large sand glass – calling it an hourglass would be inaccurate as it only ran a few minutes – standing before him, “before spitting it out again into the very same goblet. After that we,” here he waved his hand between his wife and himself, “will walk between the rows, looking at the results of the intermediary step. After that you’ll combine the contents of your goblets with the potion in the bowl and wait for the reaction to settle down. Please be prepared to report on any experiences during this, and what the last things consumed by you were. Including potions you might have taken today.”

A few questions followed to clarify matters before the testing commenced. Severus took note of quite a few pulled faces. He hadn’t expected anything else, as the taste really left something to be desired and having to keep the potion in your mouth, moving it around, for a few minutes didn’t make the experience any more pleasant.

Sandgrains silently fell from the top of the glass to the bottom, measuring the time, while Severus felt anticipation rise. Sonja and he had speculated that the colour of the potion, as well as the cloudiness, would be the deciding factor to determine family connections. Their own had been rather muddy in appearance and had had the unappealing colour of decomposing flesh. He was eager to see how the reaction was going to be for the pair of twins they had here today.

Relieved mutterings filled the room as the time was up and the undignified process of spitting the potion back into the goblets was undertaken. If it hadn’t been disrespectful, Severus would have snorted at seeing the Dark Lord spitting something into a goblet. This certainly wasn’t something one got to see often.

Sonja and he started to walk the rows, taking notes, and asking a few questions here and there, and as he was accustomed to doing, Severus listened in on the conversations that seemed to be the most interesting. This habit of living as a spy probably never would vanish again. Turning his attention to the conversation between Lord Lestrange and his heiress, Severus wrote down the observation of yet another unchanged-looking collecting-solution.

“I’m just a little irked over Ron’s reaction. I simply don’t understand why he’s been so infuriating since we’ve been back to school.” The girl explained in a hushed voice.
“His reaction to what?” Lord Lestrange asked just as quietly. Severus moved on to the next goblet. No obvious changes.

“That I wanted to leave a little earlier than Harry because I had a letter to send to Victor. I’ve been in correspondence with him since he was here during the tournament. Ron suddenly got that sour look on his face. And he’s always hovering as if he wants to say something, but can’t find the words, or something!” Severus was amazed as always at how unaware teenagers could be. Even Miss Granger, usually so observant, obviously couldn’t tell that the Weasley brat had a crush on her.

Deciding that it wasn’t his job to help her with her fledgling love life, Severus left her to the capable hands of her great uncle, walking over to where Draco was talking to his mother’s cousin. They seemed civil enough. No reason for Severus to remind his student that he should be respectful. Doing so would have been infuriating. Maybe he would have managed to get a nice insult in. For a moment Severus allowed himself to indulge in that fantasy, before noting that these two potions hadn’t changed their appearance either, and moving on.

It always had been fun insulting the only Black Gryffindor in memory. But as Sonja had asked him again when she had brought up the possibility to include him in the invitations, did he really want to risk being the one holding onto a grudge longer than Black, leaving himself open to being called immature?

Sonja and Severus walked back to the front so they had a better perspective to watch the second phase.

“Try to pour at the same pace so the three components mix evenly. Call for help should there be a violent reaction, and step back if you’re in doubt,” Sonja instructed while Severus got his wand out. He saw the Dark Lord raise a brow in silent surprise, feeling a light touch on his shields passing through the image of the boy standing next to the Dark Lord tinted with not-quite-there worry. Severus send back a piece, an image, of his memory of brewing an earlier batch. That version had foamed and managed to cover the table they had been working on under a bright blue coat of bubbles in under a minutes time. It shouldn’t really be that dangerous.

A bit of tension left the Dark Lord’s shoulders, and he picked up his ivory goblet to start combining the three parts.

There weren’t any violent reactions, and even the Weasley horrors managed to behave themselves. Much to the surprise of them all the potion turned colourless and transparent for the two sets of twins. The others took on different hues of green, or blue – in some cases Severus wasn’t really sure – and different intensities of milkiness.

Sonja asked everyone to answer a few questions, while Severus transferred the results into transparent phials, labelling each one with the two people who had contributed, before casting strong preservation charms on them. Judging by the level of milkiness compared between the siblings and the one from the Dark Lord and his heir, the less cloudiness the closer the connection. The same seemed true for the intensity of colour. The less intense the more closely they were related. It seemed as if there were two or more measures for closeness. They would have to make many more tests if they were to have any hope of getting a somewhat useful scale to measure the connection between two individuals.

But they seemed to be heading the right way. Sharing a triumphant smile, Sonja and Severus cleaned up after everyone had left, looking forward to a nice evening together.
Standing at the front of the room on his small raised dais, Marvolo waited for his followers to arrive. He had a traitor to get rid of and had decided – after asking Malcolm if the man had been healed enough – that today was the day.

The Carrows and Malcolm were already here, preparing for what was to come this evening.

Marvolo himself didn’t feel the anticipation he remembered from the first time the traitor had been among his brethren being punished. If he was honest with himself, his enjoyment of torturing had dimmed considerably over the months since he had regained a body. His theory was that it had something to do with his absorbed horcruxes, and the emotions he had regained as well.

In the end it wasn’t that big of a problem. If he had retained his love for torture, he would have had a problem over time, he was almost certain. It was harder to keep up the mask of young, friendly wizard and Lord if there was a secret to keep as big as regularly torturing people.

One after the other the Death Eaters arrived. Overall they had been slow to respond, but that was only to be expected in the middle of the night. Most of them probably had been asleep.

Severus was one of the last to arrive, giving off waves of unhappiness, something decidedly unusual for the spy. Severus was able to keep his composure under almost all circumstances.

At least that was the impression Marvolo always had had, and his visit to the man’s mind after Marvolo’s resurrection only had strengthened that impression.

Only under the most dire circumstances did Severus show feelings he didn’t want to show. And during a meeting surrounded by Death Eaters, the young man never had shown anything resembling the mood he was projecting now.

Dark eyes met red ones over the expanse of the room. Marvolo let his spy and Potions Master know of his need to be aware of why the man was so… well, grumpy. What he got back was a deep embarrassment and the mental image of Severus’ wife.

For a moment Marvolo was thrown for a loop. He hadn’t even considered that his followers might be doing something else beside sleeping at this time of night.

Best pretend he had never asked or got an answer. Some things he really didn’t need to know about the daily life of his followers. And he was sure Severus would do his best to make sure this particular topic wouldn’t come up between them again.

“Welcome,” Marvolo greeted the gathered Death Eaters who fell silent immediately, turning their full attention to him. “Today you’ll see what awaits those who go against us, who once agreed to be part of this group.” He had prepared a small speech to make sure all of them understood that while he wasn’t torturing them for insignificant infractions, or condoning useless violence, he also wasn’t going to let something as big as Karkaroff’s treachery slide. The man simply had given too many names away to be spared. Marvolo had a duty to protect – or avenge – his people.

“He gave away the names of those he should have protected. He brought pain upon his comrades and their families. He has paid for his crime ever since the night we gathered here back in July, and today you’ll get to see how I’ll make sure his death won’t be traced back to any of us.”

He gave the prearranged signal to Barty, who was standing by the door leading into the back rooms and the entrance to the cellar and went to inform the Carrows.

Only half a minute later, an almost healthy-looking Igor Karkaroff was brought in. His clothes had been changed to something closely resembling what he had worn when he had been captured – his own clothes had been reduced to rags since then – and his hair had been cut and his beard trimmed. The siblings were handling the man without any care, probably leaving bruises on his arms.

It had taken some time, but Marvolo had found the spells he needed to achieve the effect he wanted. It should look like Karkaroff had died in that storm he had been warned about, getting what was coming to him because he had ignored the warnings of the locals.

A small wave was enough for Amycus and Alecto to push the traitor to the ground, stepping back so they wouldn’t be in their Lord's way. Once Karkaroff had managed to get to his knees – not daring to look up – Marvolo informed the man of his fate. “You’ll die tonight. Any last words?”

Karkaroff didn’t look as if he would be able to formulate anything even resembling a sentence, so Marvolo didn’t wait any longer.

Feeling the eyes of all gathered here on him, Marvolo raised his hand, pale wand firmly grasped, and started the series of curses he had so carefully planned, and had then practiced, to give the impression that this was an easy task for him.

It wasn’t.

But appearance was important. Even now.

The first spell would make sure that Karkaroff wouldn’t die until the very end. Then Marvolo started to reduce the body of the traitor into a state that would be expected to be found when a human body had lain about in the wild for several months.

The sharp sound of a neck breaking would imitate the cause of death Marvolo wanted the Muggles to assume. After that, Karkaroff didn’t stop screaming while his body started to decompose, developing the traces of animals, insects, and other things eating at him. Effects of the weather were imitated next. Heat, cold, wind, and rain.

When he was finished, there only was a husk left of the man.

Tired, Marvolo let his arm sink to his side. There was still work left to do before he could send the Carrows on their way to place the body of Igor Karkaroff at the foot of a cliff near where they had captured him, to be found soon.

The pause he allowed himself before he started to clear away all traces of the spells he had cast hopefully would be interpreted as his admiring his work.

Finally he waved at the twins. “Take him to where you found him. Make sure the place you leave the body in is one that hasn’t been visited since the summer. Best would be to bury him under a landslide. And make sure to not leave any trace of your presence! Dismissed.”

The Carrows vanished first. And all the others still stood at attention, waiting for him to dismiss them as well.

“Remember, as long as you follow my orders and keep our secrets, I’ll protect and support you. But defy me and you’ll bear the consequences.” A few certainly remembered Corban Yaxley and the man’s death by his own hand, unsure if the man had killed himself before the Dark Lord could get a hand on him, or if the poison had been forced on him.
Marvolo wasn’t about to sate their curiosity. “Get back home. I’ll see most of you soon.” But for now he would go home, take a long hot shower, maybe get a mug of hot chocolate with the little marshmallow pieces Flimm had started to add, and then check if Henry might be awake.

He felt the need to talk to his son, hear something about his dull day, maybe how far he had come in the transfiguration essay he had wanted to work on after the potions test, something normal. Somehow that sounded like the exact thing he could use right now.

It was odd, but Marvolo didn’t feel like investigating this need right now. Unbidden, the advice Mrs. Goyle had given him came to mind. It wasn’t necessary to confront his thoughts and feelings every time he felt something unsettling or new. But he couldn’t run away forever. At the moment he was too tired to do anything about it. So he left the room after the last Death Eater was gone and apparated over to Griffin House.

Flimm was already waiting, taking the robes Marvolo had worn, and picking up the clothes the tired wizard let just let fall to the floor on his way to the warm shower he was focused on.

Wednesday, 24th of January 1996

As so often, Harry and his mixed group of friends were gathered at the Ravenclaw table for lunch. Harry had a letter from Marvolo in his pocket, still a little puzzled about what he should make of it. The letter spoke of work until late in the night, which Harry had translated into a careful description of a Death Eater meeting taking place, and a wish to speak with Harry – Marvolo had written Henry, and Harry was getting a little irritated by that, even knowing that he would need to allow Marvolo to call him Harry – that he had dismissed in favour of writing a letter, because Harry could use every hour of sleep in his OWL year. It was puzzling, and Harry planned to call Marvolo on the mirror as soon as he found a moment of peace.

It so wasn’t going to be now.

“It’s so hard to decide what to do after school!” Hermione exclaimed, spreading out a lot of brightly coloured pamphlets on the table between the plates, ignoring her food. “I did a little research at the end of second year. I needed something to base my selection of classes on.” Her tone was a little dismissive, as if it was a natural thing to do, and not something unusual. Harry briefly wondered how many thirteen-year-old students would even bother if not pushed by their parents. “But now I’m unsure what I can combine with the duties of a Lady. You know?” Hermione asked of them all, clearly wanting... no, more like expecting, an answer.

Neville was the first to speak up. “I think I want to work for a Herbology Mastery. It fits well with the businesses of my family. And I’m good at it. Gran can manage the seat a little longer, and working on research and such once I’m finished should work well together with being Lord Longbottom.” He heaved a mighty sigh. “Not sure if Gran will support my wish, though. She always harps on and on about me following in my father’s footsteps. Which would mean to go into Auror training.”

“Don’t look so morose!” Ron chimed in, clapping the other Gryffindor on the back, “Being an Auror is great! I want to go be an Auror after school. I think it’ll be awesome if you and Harry are there too!” Here Ron turned to include Harry, clearly wanting him to agree, but Harry wasn’t so sure. Being together with Ron and Neville certainly wouldn’t be bad. But if it would be enough to make him enjoy being an Auror was more than up in the air.

“Training with you would be fun,” Harry finally agreed, but before Ron could ramble on, he continued speaking. “But that would involve a lot of fighting. I don’t think I want to spent the rest of my life fighting. Not sure what else to do, though.” As there wasn’t all that much time left before lunch would be finished, Harry returned to eating what he had put on his plate, still paying attention to his friends because they now started to make suggestions about what he could do for a living after they all had finished school.

“Why don’t you become a teacher, Harry?” Daphne wanted to know, waving her fork around over her plate. “I think you would be a great teacher.”

“If you aim for a Mastery in Defence you could teach it like you do at the club, or maybe go into research.” Theo chimed in from where he sat between Draco and Daphne.

“You could also go into art.” Luna said with quiet conviction, smiling over to him while idly stirring her soup.

“I think I understand why you don’t want to fight. But as the youngest seeker in hundreds of years, professional Quidditch should work out almost as well as Auror! I’m sure the teams would do almost anything to get you onto their team!” Ron brought the conversation back to himself, clearly happy with his clever suggestion.

That it was only another, more regulated form of fighting, probably didn’t even occur to him.

“If you’re interested in going into professional Quidditch, I’m sure I can get you into contact with Victor. He can give you sound advice as a professional player himself. What to look out for in a contract, how to manage the fame, and all that. Shall I write him?” Hermione picked that idea up. It was quite the turnaround from her earlier years. Twelve-year-old Hermione probably would have tried to persuade him to take up a more academically inclined career path. It was nice to see that she, too, was growing up and out of her childish tendencies.

“Why are you still writing to that stupid guy?” Ron suddenly demanded of Hermione, his ears taking on a shade of red not working well with his hair.

“Because I want to! And what does it concern you, anyway? I don’t have to defend my choice in friends to you, Ronald Weasley!” Hermione – rightfully, in Harry’s opinion – objected vehemently against Ron’s protest. They quickly descended into what would have been a shouting match if Hermione hadn’t kept her voice down. And they drew a lot of attention anyway.

Harry noticed with amusement that all of the others sitting around the arguing Gryffindors were rolling their eyes. Maybe it was the constant exposure to Slytherin politics and observations, but Harry was pretty sure that Ron had a crush on their studious friend, and that Hermione hadn’t really noticed yet. She was pretty perceptive, but when someone was the one affected, it was a little different than looking on from the outside.

Hermione stormed off when Ron didn’t shut up, and when the rest of them left the Great Hall, Ron had fallen into a broody silence. That was going to get even more awkward before it – if ever – it got better, Harry would almost bet on that.
It certainly was better to reside in the guest bedroom in his brother’s home than being stuck in a closed ward at the hospital. But it still wasn’t what Albus really wanted.

Of course he now realised that the danger he had been in had been very real. The exposure to that curse had clouded his mind to the point that he had been a real danger to himself. He might have reacted violently to a shadow, making sending Aurors after him necessary. And if that really had happened, he certainly would have lost all chance to get back into his rightful position of Headmaster, and of every hope of one day regaining the position of Chief Warlock.

But still, he was better now, the ritual had removed the damaging influence, and the potions he was taking as directed were helping him restore his concentration and health. So why was he still restricted from using magic, reduced to reading and to correspondence? There certainly was a lot of work waiting for him on the Headmaster’s desk at Hogwarts. Minerva was a good deputy, but while still teaching and with her duties as Head of House, she had no way to keep ahead of the work.

Setting down the book he had now read a third time, Albus got up from his chair to pace the length of the room a few times. He could use the exercise to build his stamina back up.

Elphias had informed him of the trouble that had come about down at the Ministry regarding the adoption laws. Of course Albus had thought about ways to change them, to prevent the most dark families from stealing children from muggle backgrounds from their families. But in the end the vague nature of the old laws, and the possibility of placing a child with a family, if needed, without much interference from the Ministry had trumped any other concerns. And to only spoil Tom’s plan to buy the loyalty of his Death Eaters by funnelling children into their stagnant families the effort had been too big.

Elphias had been stumped by who might have been behind that tangling of procedure and competence, but had commented on the apparent ease with which Tom had managed to unite a large number of votes from all the usual voting blocs.

That had been truly troubling news.

Before he could follow that line of thought further, the door opened to admit an irritated Aberforth. “You have a guest!” said Albus’ brother in his gruffest voice, before turning on his heel and marching off right past that guest and down the stairs.

Albus stared after his brother, a little bit flummoxed, before turning to see who was visiting him here in his exile. He just barely managed to contain any outward reaction when the trademark blond hair gave away the identity of his guest. “Mr. Malfoy! What a surprise. Please do come in, sit down. I would offer you something to drink, but I fear that isn’t possible at this moment.” It took them some time, but after a few silent moments, they both were sitting down, facing each other, and Albus waited for an explanation of why Lucius was here.

“Mr. Dumbledore, I’m here as a representative of the Board of the Hogwarts Governors,” Lucius Malfoy started to explain the reason for his visit. “It was decided that in light of recent events, and current public opinion, the Board cannot support your return to the post of Headmaster. We all feel you should have the opportunity to resign on your own. You have until the end of January to do so, before the Board will take it upon itself to announce the change.” For a moment Albus was searching for a way to react to this. Was his reputation really that tarnished in the eye of the public?
That simply wasn’t possible, he had always worked for the best of the whole population. Who had managed to make them all forget what good he had done?

“Did Tom, Lord Slytherin, have his hand in that?” It wouldn’t be the first time that Lucius had used pressure and bribes to evict him from his position at the school. It was only logical to assume that Tom might have ordered Lucius to do so again.

His hands folded around his gloves, placed on his knees, Lucius shook his head. “No, he did not. I wasn’t involved, either, until the vote was called at the last meeting. It was a surprise. You can’t pin that on us this time, old man. The tides have certainly turned. Consider the offer to resign before we throw you out of office because you pose a threat to the students.” Lucius stood, gave a shallow bow from his neck, and prepared to leave. “I wouldn’t try to regain the goodwill of the public. Retire gracefully. That’s the best you can hope for at this point.”

Long after Lucius Malfoy had left, Albus sat there deep in thought. How had everything gone so out of control? Where had he miscalculated? Why was one error in judgement over a cursed ring enough to diminish his defeat of a Dark Lord, and his constant work to counter the Dark? It was a complicated puzzle.

Walking from his room after a long talk with Marvolo on the Mirror, Harry tried not to let himself be frustrated over his own lack of courage. Neither he nor Marvolo had spoken about the stuff that had started to keep his mind busy more and more.

How he should keep Marvolo and Voldemort and their actions separated in his mind, when the Death Eaters still existed and acted. How it could be that he had come to see that there might be an actual need to put pressure on people, exchange favours, keep blackmail material at hand, if one wanted to accomplish anything good in politics. How he wanted Marvolo to call him Harry, despite knowing all he knew about the wizard’s continued use of the Dark Arts – part of that certainly being his research in how to remove a piece of soul from Harry without killing him – and the people who had died, in the distant and not-so-distant past.

It was a terrible mess, and nothing of this had been talked about just now.

Mrs. Goyle had shown Harry art as a way to express what he couldn’t talk about. Maybe writing a letter, just as Marvolo had done would give him the time to weigh his words carefully, make sure that what he wanted to say was clear to understand.

It was a sound plan, but would have to wait until Harry had finished the homework for Potions that was due tomorrow. With tutoring and lots of dedication, Harry had managed to get a grudging acceptance from Snape – Harry wasn’t really sure where they stood now – and he wasn’t about to lose that by handing in an essay riddled with blotches and spelling errors.

Harry settled down in their usual spot near the main fireplace, the place of honour for the most important students of the House, where the others were already waiting for him, getting out a new sheet of parchment to make a clean version of his homework.

Over time the younger kids started to leave for bed, the older students getting more relaxed, someone even getting out some spirits, passing the small bottle round among their group. And Harry drifted over to help both Vincent and Gregory with the theory of some of the spells used to defend against dangerous magical creatures such as lethifolds, boggarts, and others that could be deadly if encountered unprepared.

He was explaining the theory behind the Patronus Charm again, when a girl sitting somewhere a little away started to speak. “No, can’t see what’s the fuss all about. Just a scrawny fifth-year. Not all that good marks, not even handsome. And I’m sure he’s only bark. No bite to that one.” If Harry wasn’t mistaken, the one speaking was the seventh-year, Joane Pyrites, daughter to one of the lesser Death Eaters. Last year she had belonged to those sitting next to the fire.

That probably was enough of a reason for her to feel resentful against Harry. And he was pretty sure she was speaking about him.

The room fell silent, and it was clear that there was no way he could evade a confrontation any longer. He sighed, and checking that his wand was where it should be, stood. He turned while checking where everyone was sitting. Possible allies, neutral or undecided students, and those daring enough to disregard the rumours that there was a bad and short future waiting for all those who would do Harry harm.

“Oh, look, the kitten is showing its claws.” Pyrites and her friends laughed, obviously not unaffected by the alcohol they had been drinking.

Harry mockingly raised an eyebrow, carefully taking a few steps into a more open section of the common room so he would have room to move. “You’re confident, aren’t you?” He asked, taking his wand out of its sheath, idly running his hand down the length of the carved wood. “It’s easy being confident here. But that confidence makes you stupid. You shouldn’t drink quite that much. Hasn’t your father one of those nifty tattoos?” Harry tossed out there, seeing her pale a little, and how the others flinched. It seemed they hadn’t expected him to know who they were or that they had family members in the Dark Lord’s ranks. Marvolo had made sure that Harry was aware of the orders he had given out to all his followers – bound to him by a version of a fealty oath – and their children at Hogwarts. And to make sure Harry would be able to seek their help and protection if he ever should need it, Harry had been informed of all their names, Houses, and the year they were in.

Until now Harry hadn’t used that information, he still really wished to be just himself and treated for who he was as a person rather than who he was in society, but he was willing to do so now. He might even be able to prevent greater harm if he did this now, with enough force to make his point.

Settling his feet in a good position, already thinking over what he might need to cast to make her back off that wouldn’t break any rules of the school, or at least would make sure the prefects didn’t feel they would need to report him, Harry focused most of his attention on Pyrites, where she tried to get out from among her friends.

She clearly had thought he would back up without a fight, avoiding a confrontation. She clearly had forgotten that he had been sorted into Gryffindor as well.

“But I don’t need to run for help to protect myself. So you were saying?” He tilted his head to the side, projecting much more calm than he was really feeling. This could go so wrong so quickly.

He felt more than he saw his friends moving into positions around him, getting into place to guard his back.

But his attention was on Pyrites and the other seventh years standing – or better sitting – at her side, some clearly no threat because they were too sloshed to aim a wand straight. Or even sit straight.
“Really? You thought speaking ill of me would be enough to make me run? You weren’t paying attention last year, were you?” Harry quickly brought up a Protego to block a spell shooting at him from behind Pyrites.

In a split-second decision, Harry shot a quick series of body binds at Pyrites and the people sitting around her. They all dropped, too slow to react, and came to rest against each other and the love seats at odd angles, because it was too crowded for them to fall properly to the floor.

Keeping his wand trained on Pyrites, Harry walked over to where she was staring at him in horror. “You think me weak, because I don’t use my status to put others down, make you grovel? Or because my mother had parents unable to wield magic?” He asked in a deadly calm voice, making sure it carried into the last corners of the room. “I understand your confusion. But take a piece of advice. If I were anyone else, I might feel the need to make you fear me right now by, say… casting something painful at you. Right here where everyone can see.” He waved his wand around at all the people watching, not one of them raising their wand to protect those that had been standing with Pyrites. “We all know it has worked in the past. Pretty well even, by what I saw last summer.” Harry heard a few gasps, but still focused on the terrified eyes of Pyrites. “But I’m me. So I’ll say this. I don’t demand you like me, but I expect you to be civil. Do we understand each other?”

Of course she had no way to confirm or deny his demand, still frozen in a body bind, helpless. But Harry nodded anyway. “You might want to warn your family. Because I have a feeling that this will not go unnoticed, even if I don’t speak about it.” And Harry didn’t plan to speak to Marvolo about what had happened. But there was a darker shadow in that corner near the passage that connected the common room with the quarters of their Head of House, the resident Potions Master and spy. The man would probably report what he had seen here, regardless of Harry’s wishes.

Turning to see Septimus Yaxley standing with the fifth-years at his back, Harry casually placed his wand back in his sleeve. “It’s getting late. Let’s go to bed, no use to study any more tonight, anyway.”

It had felt natural to decide this for them all, but a part of Harry was still surprised that they all actually did what he had said – or more accurately – ordered them to do.

Once they all had made it to Harry’s room, following him in unspoken agreement, and the door had closed behind them, Harry let his bag fall to the floor, the sound of its landing muffled by the nice carpet, and sank down, shaking, himself.

Theo was there only a blink of an eye later, holding a glass of water in his hand, steadying Harry so he could take a few sips. It took a moment for Harry to realise it, but then he heard Theo murmuring soothing words promising that he was safe, that everything had gone well, that he could relax now.

Once Harry felt the small panic attack had passed, he sat back, giving Theo a weak smile, and looking around the room. The others had settled down onto his chair, the loveseat, the bed, and the carpet. There was a decidedly awkward air surrounding them all, and Harry wished the others had gone before he had recovered.

“Thanks for your support.” He rubbed his neck with one hand that was still shaking slightly. “I hope they’ll reconsider their actions before they do something like that again.”

“They won’t dare,” Yaxley said with conviction. “The wordless spells at so rapid a pace... I’ll wager not one of them is able to do that. They won’t bother you again, Heir Slytherin.”
“It really is late. And I guess we don’t want to invoke Snape's ire. I’ll make sure Harry’s alright, the rest of you go to bed. We’ll see each other at breakfast.” Theo kept his tone friendly, but left no room for doubt that the others should leave now.

Theo’s help was minimal, getting out Harry’s pyjamas for instance, but Harry was happy that he was there.

Once he was under the covers, sitting in his bed, Harry voiced the question that was burning on his tongue. “I did those silently?”

Theo nodded. “You did.”

“Well, shit.” He never had even tried to cast something without speaking the incantation. It wasn’t even taught before the student reached sixth year. Deciding that he didn’t have the energy to think about it more right now, Harry moved so he was comfortably settled into his bed, sleep quickly claiming him, while Theo left the room.

oooOOooo

Severus had been informed by the wards on the common room, of a number of spells cast in rapid succession. While he normally would ignore spells aimed at other students low in potential to harm such as those now, the short span of time in which this many Petrificus Totalus had been cast hinted at a group ganging up on an individual, and that wasn’t something he could let slide.

He watched the situation play out and was pretty sure that Mr. Slytherin had spotted him where he was standing in the shadows, his dark robes passably blending in.

Mr. Slytherin was right, Severus would report the incident, and the fact that the boy had handled it well, to the Dark Lord.

Leaving the seventh-years where they were, Severus retreated back to his quarters and returned to his wife. He would write a short note in the morning and send it before breakfast. Now he had other things to do.

Chapter End Notes

Hope you liked it :) Once again a few scenes came out other than I had planned, but I feel they fit well into the story in their current form.

Translations:
Oh, mon Dieu! - Oh my God!
Ainsi donc, le père de mes deux beautés est un sorcier - So the father of the two flowers is a wizard?
Tais-toi, Maman! Laisse le parler - Silence, mother! Let him speak.

The first thing Marvolo saw on the dinner table that evening – beside the delicious smelling stack of waffles waiting for him – were two letters placed near his plate. Normally letters were taken to the study, seeing that Flimm thought these important enough to be placed on top of the evening edition of the newspaper made Marvolo quite curious.

He walked over to his place, sat down and had a look at the letters, while floating tea into his cup with nary a thought. Just seeing his own name on the two envelopes cleared up who had written to him. He would recognise Henry’s improved but still unpractised letters anywhere, and the spiky hand of his Potions Master was so distinctive there wasn’t a shred of doubt of who had send the letter.

Getting out his wand to cast the detection charms that had become second nature quite some time ago by now, Marvolo made sure that no one had tried to tamper with the letters. He had come to rely on Flimm and trust the elf, but it always paid to be overly cautious. He didn’t really like the man, but Mad Eye Moody had a point with his cries of constant vigilance.

Taking a sip from his tea – maybe he should add another spoon of sugar – Marvolo contemplated a few scenarios which could result in him receiving a letter from his son and the boy’s Head of House at the same time. It couldn’t be something too serious as Severus wouldn’t have dared delaying to inform him by patronus or equally fast means, and Henry had the mirror to communicate much faster than by owl post.

So maybe something formal, but not urgent?

He decided to read the letter from Severus first, as he was pretty sure that whatever the man had to tell him, he would do in a short and comprehensive manner. Teenagers were prone to rambling and overly emotional displays. At least what he had witnessed in the past and been told since he had adopted his son indicated that was the case.

A quick, weak, slicing charm cast without his wand, broke the seal, and with a practiced flick of his wrist the letter was out and unfolded.

For a moment red eyes moved quickly over the letter the tension slowly seeping out of Marvolo’s shoulders. It was indeed nothing serious. The letter had been sent in the morning, just after breakfast ended and before the start of lessons.

Severus had thought it soon enough to inform Marvolo – Severus had written in his role as Head of House and was using suitable address and wording – of a small altercation which had taken place the evening before in the Slytherin common room. It seemed that Henry had handled that rather well. Maybe it wouldn’t even be necessary to take action to remind the parents of those careless students what Marvolo was willing to do in defence of his son.

But he could maybe arrange for a social event – dinner would be nice – and let a comment drop regarding this. Bragging about the skills of one’s child was something accepted and even expected in their social circle, after all.

A small smirk danced over Marvolo’s face as he imagined the reactions he would get to see if he did that. Surely they would panic for a moment and try to hide it. It would be delicious. He would have to consult with Barty to find a date for that dinner.

After this short report from Severus – not actually demanding any action on Marvolo’s part – Marvolo expected to find some longer winded recounting of the same event in Henry’s letter.

But the letter had quite a different topic. And was written in the flowing script of the almost slithering lines of Parselscript.

_Dear Marvolo,_

_While we have spoken many times about the things happening in our lives from day to day, we seem to avoid some topics quite successfully._

_I know that this is a rather un-Slytherin way to go about this, but I feel that there isn’t really a good way to express what I feel we need to do while being subtle about it, and making sure that there isn’t any way for my words to be misinterpreted._

_Soon our family will grow to include Marcus, and I feel we need to clear the air between us concerning the past we share, the present and demands and expectations placed on us by others, and the future we wish for._

_Considering some of the topics, and the possibility of tempers flaring, I think it might be good to have Mrs. Goyle on hand as a kind of mediator and translator. She always has helped me understand how I feel, and why that might be the case or what the cause. I hope she’ll be able to do something similar for the both of us._

_It might seem odd that I’m writing a letter for this, but some things have been going around in my head for some time now, and despite the fact we speak each day, I haven’t found the courage to bring them up. Writing everything down has some advantages that speaking face to face lacks._

_Hoping to hear from you soon,_

_Henry_

_PS: please pass on greetings from me to Nagini_
Marvolo slowly put the letter down onto the table. Oddly enough the fact that Henry hadn’t said anything about the confrontation in the common room stuck out the most to Marvolo.

Of course he couldn’t deny that there was a lot Henry and he didn’t talk about. The capture, torture, and subsequent captivity of Karkaroff hadn’t been discussed. Despite the fact that Henry technically had been present as the Carrows had brought him in. And that the man had died just a short time ago hadn’t been mentioned either.

Marvolo hadn’t tried to keep the continued existence of his Death Eaters from Henry, in fact he had accepted a few calls in the middle of Death Eater meetings and was sure Henry had realised what had been happening at the time. But they never actually had talked about that.

Of course Marvolo had made sure Henry knew which families had strong ties to him – implicitly admitting that they had at least one marked Death Eater in their family – so his son would know who was bound to help him if needed.

And Henry had seen more than once how his Death Eaters had greeted him formally when he had called them via their modified mark.

But in the end, these observations Marvolo had allowed Henry to make didn’t really replace actually talking about it, and allowing Henry to ask questions.

Was it wise to allow this talk, that had a big potential to turn into a confrontation, to happen? Marvolo wasn’t so sure. The escape of the Death Eaters from Azkaban could come up. If Henry asked the right questions, the death of Bellatrix – his decision to sacrifice her – might come up. Or that the Lestrange brothers really weren’t dead after all.

On the other hand, he might have to turn the question around.

Would trying to ignore the obvious need Henry had to talk about things be a good idea?

It had been the tactic Dumbledore had employed, which had backfired on him spectacularly. So the answer was a resounding “no”. He couldn’t ignore this polite request for a confrontation.

But before he went back to his study to write a letter back – it seemed appropriate to use the same line of communication – Marvolo would eat his dinner. No reason to let good food go to waste.

While he ate, Marvolo started to compose a letter to Mrs. Goyle to inform her of Henry’s wish to have a session with Marvolo present to talk about topics concerning them both. Maybe he should review the secrecy contract he had made her sign. It was best to make extra sure that nothing incriminating talked about between him and his son could make it to the Auror Department.

It was late into the night when Marvolo finally went to bed, shoving a grumbling Nagini to the end of his bed to make room for himself. Writing such carefully worded letters, and reading legalese were time-consuming activities.

With a sigh, his familiar wrapped around him, Marvolo slipped into a restful sleep, aided by a small dose of a sleeping draught.

Up in the room they shared with two other girls, Nawel was braiding the hair of her sister Enora with careful motions and patience, just as their gran had taught them. Most of the time the braids held for more than a week, but they redid them frequently anyway.

It was comforting.

Enora was holding the latest letter from their mother in her hands. Silently contemplating the contents. Beside the fire and the click of beads nothing disturbed the quiet of their dorm, as the others hadn’t made it here yet. They probably still were in the big communal bath enjoying the steam bath, or the bubble pool.

“How do you think the meeting will go?” Enora asked out of the blue, still fiddling with the letter, making clear what meeting she was referring to.

“As I don’t truly know anything about that wizard – that isn’t rumour, anyway – I really can’t say,” Nawel answered, giving a shrug with one shoulder even though her sister couldn’t see that she did so. “But I’m sure that maman will ask a lot of questions. And demand answers.” Enora gave a humming sound of agreement as her only answer. They both had been curious who their father was as long as they could remember.

Speculating about him, why their maman hadn’t been able to find him, what he was doing for a living, had been one of their favourite pastimes when they couldn’t quite go to sleep in the evenings. Lying in bed and spinning fantastical stories of their father the superhero, prince or king, wizard, or maybe even spy, just like James Bond, had filled many hours.

Now the letters from their mother had given them facts, but the story still was fantastical. Just as if it had been plucked right out of one of their favourite fairy tales. A young man at odds with his family, wrongly accused of betraying his friends, imprisoned for a long time, managing to escape, found innocent, and then finally searching for his lost daughters. If they wanted, that could be the plot of a tragic play, or a romance novel.

But it was hard to believe that it was actually the truth.

Finishing another braid with a large bead, Nawel tried to formulate what was on her mind. “I remember what those who went to Hogwarts last year told us about the stories told over there. How the Blacks were in league with that Dark Lord. How it just was clear that Sirius Black had to be the same, that it was only natural that he would betray those he called friends…” For a moment she struggled with the words, “I fear that the British might expect us to be what they think a Black witch should be. A family cursed with insanity.”

“Don’t!” Enora demanded. “You know as well as I do, that those stories get bigger each time they are told. And these are stories told here for their shock value, right along with the stories about the tasks. Dragons, Merpeople, Acromantulas. A Sphinx! Don’t borrow trouble. We’ll get to meet him, and then we’ll see.”

“So you want to meet him?” Nawel wasn’t so sure about that. She was curious, there was no doubt about that. But at the same time she feared what she might learn about the man who was her father.

What if he only wanted to use them to have an heir?

She always had wished for a father who wanted to know her, spend time with her. Therefore those stories making him out to be struggling, fighting, keeping away to keep them safe, had always been the ones she preferred over those he was the powerful hero in. Because if he could be there for them, why wasn’t he?
“I want to meet him. Wouldn’t it be terrible to look back, I don’t know, ten years from now, and ask what if? And we still have to make that paternity test. Until now all we have is the word of a wizard we don’t know that there is an ancient tapestry claiming we are the daughters of Lord Sirius Orion Black.” Enora patiently explained, as always, she simply was the more level-headed of the two of them.

Now Nawel made the humming sound of agreement before starting on the next braid. First they would wait for what their mother had to tell them about the man claiming to be their father. Then they would see.

“It’s nice of you to visit, Elphias.” Albus greeted his newest guest, doing his best to appear well on the mend, even as walking up from the door to the living room had put a little bit of a strain on his body. He was working on regaining some of his stamina, but it was slow going.

“Why wouldn’t I visit a good friend?” Elphias said in a mock offended tone, playing up the act with a hand placed to his chest, right over his heart. “And I hoped we could talk a bit about the gossip making the rounds at the Ministry.” With a huff Elphias dropped himself to sit in one of the faded armchairs. Albus really couldn’t understand why his brother insisted on keeping the colour scheme of the rooms so dull, using mostly variations on brown. Leather, wood, nothing but browns.

“Rumours?” Albus inquired, trying to not sound too eager. Even with all the time he had spent reading current publications, and the newspaper each day, nothing could replace what people were talking about in hushed voices and behind closed doors.

“Yes. Somehow it seems as if nobody actually was responsible for pushing forward those uncompleted changes to the adoption procedures once Dolores Umbridge had been sentenced to the kiss. Some speculate that a vengeful spirit was left behind, sabotaging everything with the dark energy generated by her need for revenge.”

A vengeful spirit? Albus snorted at that thought. Dementors consumed souls in their entirety, there would have been nothing left of Dolores Umbridge after a kiss. “So all agree that she is the only one responsible? Truly? What an easy out for all who simply went along with the changes without thinking of the consequences.” Of course Albus knew that most who had been needed to create such a mess probably only had gone along with it to gain the favour of a more influential person, or because they had been gullible enough to fall for some scheme. It still was cowardly to hide behind a dead person.

“You know how it is, Albus.” Elphias waved Albus’ concern away. “It’s easy to claim ignorance, or even to maintain ignorance, if you just go along with the madness that is the bureaucracy of the Ministry these days.”

Nodding to this – it was just too true – Albus expertly shifted the topic of their conversation from one to another until he had heard all that interested him. By then they had consumed an entire pot of tea and a plate of different pastries.

They exchanged pleasantries and then Albus was alone again.

So the initial efforts to change the adoptions had been started by Dolores Umbridge using the naive Miss Summers as a tool. But for all Albus knew about those things, the young muggleborn girl never would have been able to wield the influence necessary to effect all the changes that had occurred.

Elphias had said that by now so much time had passed and everyone had spoken with almost everyone else, airing their different ideas over who had done what for which reasons that it had become impossible to untangle the mess.

Albus wasn’t so sure about that and got out a piece of parchment and his quill to start writing a letter to the Minister. Maybe he would be able to get to the root of this mystery if he went for the one most interested to get to the bottom of it. The fact that the Minister hadn’t known – Albus knew that Cornelius wasn’t good enough of an actor to pretend otherwise – could harm his standing with the other officials in the Ministry, possibly endangering his position.

Hopefully Albus would learn who had meddled there and for what reasons. Whoever it had been could be a threat to his own plans, or an asset, depending on the reasons behind those actions.

With quick, big steps Sirius hurried through a cold Paris on the way to the place Olivienne had selected for their meeting.

He wasn’t feeling all that well, in fact he was decidedly nervous. For one, he was in a suit, formal muggle clothing never had been something he liked any better than formal wizarding robes. Then there was the fact that he hadn’t been able to get a look at the place they were meeting in, because her decision had come via letter practically at the last possible moment. It had been meant as a gesture of goodwill on his part, but it seemed that she had used his willingness to let her pick a meeting spot as a way to unbalance him.

Way too Slytherin a tactic for his taste.

Anyway, dwelling on what made him feel nervous wouldn’t make those things go away. So best he concentrated on what he hoped to gain from this meeting. Some more knowledge about his daughters and their mother, as well as permission to meet the girls and speak with them.

That Sirius didn’t really know what Olivienne might hope to gain from meeting him was only another point adding to his nervousness.

Maybe he should have accepted Moony’s offer of coming along, after all, having an ally at hand might have been a good way to keep his nervousness down.

Finally Sirius stood in front of a café that matched the address he had been given, and that looked like it was a cozy place. Steeling his nerves, Sirius strode over to the door, opened it, and went in, starting to undo the buttons of his coat. It was a lot warmer in here then outside, where a slow drizzle made the weather rather unfriendly.
A short sweep of the place confirmed Sirius’ first impression. This was a cozy place. And in a corner, overlooking the whole room, sat a woman who matched the description Sam had given him of Olivienne Moreau, stirring some hot beverage in a big cup.

Now the game was on. There never was a second chance at a first impression, and Sirius really wanted to make a good first impression now that the circumstances had changed so drastically. In the end their first meeting had been back then, and the fact that Sirius didn’t remember a thing implied that he probably hadn’t left a good impression at all.

Taking a deep breath, Sirius walked over to where the woman was sitting, a – hopefully – polite smile on his face.

“Olivienne Moreau?” Sirius asked, giving a small half bow in her direction.

“Oui.” was her answer, her dark brown eyes wandering up and down over Sirius’ figure, assessing him and making him want to squirm as if Professor McGonagall was about to start berating him for a prank. “I assume you are Sirius Black?”

Even her voice managed to instil the dread that the formidable Transfiguration Professor always had managed. Not that Sirius ever had let it show.

“I am,” he answered with another short bow. His voice was steady, but he was pretty sure the fact that he had bowed twice by now, betrayed his nerves.

A slim elegant hand waved towards the bench opposite the one she was sitting on, a clear order only underlined by her demanding, “Please be seated.”

Placing his coat over a hook on a wall nearby, Sirius opened his suit jacket, and slid into the bench. Olivienne and he watched each other over the table without words for a moment. She was as striking a figure as Sam had claimed her to be, and she probably would be able to cow any man who dared crossing her. If she had been as commanding when they had met back then in that club... Sirius could clearly see what had attracted his attention that night.

“How was your journey? Did you have a pleasant flight?” She clearly wasn’t driven by the fear of silences that he had so often seen displayed by the witches clamouring for his attention. They never could stand a silence, starting to talk about something if he just stood there watching but not speaking. Now it was he, unable to stand the silence.

“The flight was fine. But the difference in temperature was, as it always is, a shock. Weather in Europe in January is always so unpleasant,” Olivienne answered, and the two of them fell into meaningless talk about the troubles of long-distance travel, the unpleasant weather, and Paris until the waiter had been by to get Sirius’ order and then deliver the hot milk-coffee and the pastry that had been recommended.

“Can you do something to keep eavesdroppers away?” Olivienne asked, vaguely waving her hand through the air, clearly referencing magic.

Sirius nodded. “Of course.” He got his wand out, cast a look around to make sure no one was watching, and then cast a spell that had made the rounds among the students at Hogwarts their seventh year. “Now what we speak of will go unheard by others.” He didn’t even know how to address her! They had children together so given names seemed appropriate, but he didn’t want to appear to assume too much. It was an altogether awkward meeting.

“Since your investigator came to my mother’s house, I have asked different people to tell me what they know about you and your family,” she began, sending Sirius’ stomach into a plummeting fall. That could have set him up for failure from the start. Because why would a decent person want to meet with an ex-convict – however undeserved – and the son of as dark a family as the Blacks always had been known as? If she approved of such a background, he might not want to make one of the twins his heiress after all.

“The picture they painted was rather… chequered. So I decided it would be best to get your story right from the source.” Once again her eyes travelled over Sirius. “My impression was that of a man trying to live life to its fullest. Now that I know of the war raging in Britain at that time, I believe that I understand why one would adopt such a mindset. But I need to know who you are now. So please, share why you think I should let you be part of my daughter’s life.”

So she was an even better person than he had any right to hope for. Taking a sip from his coffee, Sirius contemplated where to start and what to tell. It was too long a story to include everything. He would need to stick to the highlights.

Trying to keep his composure, Sirius started. “I guess most of what's said about the Blacks isn’t entirely off the mark. All the halfway decent people tended to be thrown out rather quickly in the last decades. One of my cousins was thrown out for falling in love and marrying a muggleborn wizard instead of going along with the marriage arranged for her. They have a lovely daughter, who's working as an Auror.” Sirius stopped himself from telling the story of all those thrown out, but hoped that this one story was enough to show, that aside from the official image, there was more diversity in the family.

“I ran away from all the pressure to comply with the family line, as I was heir, and support the pure-blood ru… propaganda, when I was old enough to truly understand the implications. The fact that neither my mother nor father would have won any parent-of-the-year awards, especially after I had been sorted contrary to family tradition, only contributed to my wish to be elsewhere. Looking back; the only thing I regret about that is that I left my younger brother behind. Judging by all that I learned since I came back, he wasn’t as lost and unredeemable as I had thought at the time.” A short and familiar stab of pain reminded Sirius of his guilt in this. Maybe if he had stayed, Regulus wouldn’t have joined the Death Eaters, later being killed in an attempt to topple Lord Voldemort.

Another sip from the excellent cup of coffee braced him for the next part. “I joined a vigilante group fighting against the terrorist group known as the Death Eaters, because I felt that my position as an Auror would help them, and that the corruption inside the Ministry was already too widespread for the Ministry to be able to do anything about it.” Sirius sighed. “Many of my closest school friends joined as well. And it soon became evident that our chances were slim at best. People were vanishing, turning up dead, killed in gruesome ways… I think your assessment of my motivation for searching out company in the clubs is spot on. Death was a real possibility at any time.”

It had been an intense time. Filled with excitement, battles, the feeling of doing the right thing, fighting the just fight.

Sirius shook his head. “The foolhardy recklessness that led me to run away from home, join the Aurors, and fight as part of a vigilante group, also led to me being arrested and sent to prison. I had a lot time to think in my cell. And since I was freed by the actions of Lord Slytherin… I’m still working on growing up.” Sirius dared to look up at Olivienne, only now noticing how he had avoided looking at her while talking about his past. She had a mask in place that would easily hold up to any Ministry function or Wizengamot meeting. There was nothing to read there but polite interest.
“The fact that I was still in line for the Black Lordship and all the influence and wealth that comes with that, was unexpected. But as my godson – Harry Potter, you may have heard of him by the moniker of the-boy-who-lived – was adopted by Lord Slytherin and I was confronted with the need to do something to help him, I accepted the responsibilities I once ran from.” Sirius sighed again. There was no way Olivienne would agree to let him meet the twins. “I try to do good with the influence I now have. I want to improve laws governing the rights of children and those affected by lycanthropy, right wrongs done in the past. I’m not sure that it’s working, but I try.”

Sirius fell silent, and after a few moments started to eat his pastry, so he wouldn’t get up from his seat and start pacing.

Why wasn’t she saying anything?

“Well, this gives me a good overview of what you think about yourself. But not one reason why you think it is a good idea for you to meet my daughters.” And still there was the calm and intense tone in her voice.

Restraining his errant thoughts which wanted to run down totally inappropriate pathways – that voice in the bedroom, a shame he couldn’t remember – Sirius nodded. She was right. “Yes. Now that I know that I’m a father, I feel that it’s my responsibility to offer them the possibility to get to know me. They are old enough to decide for themselves if they want to stay in contact with me. I dearly hope that they will allow me to be part of their life. Much too late, I realise, but as neither of us knew where the other was... “ Sirius trailed off. He would have loved to claim that he would have acted differently that night – not chasing after Peter – had he known about the twins, but he wasn’t all that sure, and didn’t dare lie. He shifted in his seat, the leather of the bench creaking, and placed his hands flat on the table to stop himself from drumming them nervously.

“I see that you are now enough of an adult to dress respectably,” Olivienne said with a smirk and a wave indicating his suit.

Sirius chuckled despite himself. “I have a good friend I can ask for advice if I need to dress for something other than a Quidditch match, or a visit to the bars and clubs.” Removing a piece of imaginary lint, Sirius smoothed a small fold in the sleeve of his jacket. “Dressing the part of a responsible adult isn’t easy, but I’m willing to learn.”

“I fear that will have to be enough.” Olivienne said, suddenly serious again. “I’ll write to the girls and see if they want to meet with you. As they are currently in school, we will have to arrange something with the school if they don’t want to wait till the next holidays. Until then,” she got out a notepad and a pencil, “I wish to know more about what being an heiress entails. What comes with being part of the Black family, and what other things might impact the girls if they should agree to this.”

Getting out a few documents Sirius had prepared in advance, he started to answer all that Olivienne wanted to know. He had changed the rules regarding the appointment of an heir only slightly to include a clause removing the need to have graduated from Hogwarts. He indeed had been surprised to find that no one could be excluded based on gender, or being born outside of a marriage, paired with the requirement of attending Hogwarts, it had been a curious mix. Especially if compared to some of the rules other families had. Slytherin needed a boy speaking to snakes as an heir, the rules were truly absurd in some cases.

They spoke for hours before they went their separate ways with the promise to keep in contact.
Saturday, 27th of January 1996

“Man, why would you stay here? It’s a Hogsmeade weekend!” Ron complained after Harry had explained to his friends that he was heading up to the Hospital Wing. “And I thought we could all go together. As a group.”

Harry rolled his eyes at his friend. “No one keeps you from going as a group when I stay behind, Ron. I have an appointment with Mrs. Goyle, and lessons with Professor Snape after that.” They had reduced the number of sessions for Occlumency lessons as Harry managed better and better. But as he expected the meeting with Marvolo to stir up feelings, generally being unsettling, Harry had asked the Professor if he would be willing to help him meditate after the meeting was finished.

Surprisingly enough, the Potions Master had agreed. For all that old resentments between them sometimes flared, they both got along much better now.

“Can’t you move the appointment?” Ron almost whined, making Harry wonder why it seemed so important that Harry go with them.

Waving at where the others slowly were drifting towards the gate – only Neville and Hermione still lagging behind – Harry asked with more than a little incredulity. “If you want to go as a group, then why are you standing here, by me, when I’m staying at the castle, and those going to the village are almost out the door?”

With a hastily called goodbye, Ron ran after the others, leaving Harry standing in front of the doors to the Great Hall, shaking his head. Ron was odd sometimes.

Harry turned and walked up the big staircase surrounded by the younger Gryffindors and Ravenclaws on their way back to the tower, excited to have their common rooms mostly to themselves as the older students were down in the village for at least the morning.

When Harry arrived at the Hospital Wing, Madame Pomfrey smiled at him, waving in the direction of the room that they typically used for their sessions. “They’re both already here. I’ll make sure that you’re not disturbed.”

Harry nodded his thanks, walked up to the door – which was closed and probably warded – and knocked on it.

“Come in!” Harry was called to enter by Mrs. Goyle, and so he did.

He felt more nervous than he had in awhile. A feeling that was only slightly lessened when he came to see the familiar setup of art supplies, comfortable seating, and beverages to help soothe a dry throat.

“Hello, Mrs. Goyle.” Harry bowed in her direction, turned after she had returned his greeting so he was looking at Marvolo where he sat with a cup of tea in hand, and hesitated only for a fraction of a second. “Father.”

“Hello, Henry.” Marvolo greeted back, and Harry thought he might have seen a flicker of uncertainty in the other’s eyes. Dismissing this as a trick of the light, Harry walked over to the last empty armchair in the triangular arrangement, and sat down.

For a moment no one said a word, and Harry felt decidedly out of place for all that he had been the one to ask for this opportunity.

Finally Madame Goyle started the conversation for them, filling her role as mediator and moderator. “We are here because Harry has asked for an opportunity to talk about a few things on his mind with Lord Slytherin, face to face. I have signed the contract binding what might be said here today under even more stringent protections than the other agreement of confidentiality I signed at the beginning of our sessions. So, if Lord Slytherin is happy with the wards on this room, you can proceed, Harry.”

Being put on the spot like that wasn’t exactly helpful, so Harry jumped to ask the question that came to him at the mentioning of an additional secrecy contract. “You signed another contract, Mrs. Goyle?”

She nodded with a serious expression. “I did.” Before Harry had to ask the obvious follow-up question the therapist continued of her own volition. “It seemed to be the sensible decision, considering what might come up in this discussion, and that helping you and your father work through this will do our society more good than my responsibility to inform law enforcement of dangerous plans I might get information on, could.”

This statement was delivered in such a calm manner that Harry needed a moment to decipher that she actually had decided to keep crimes secret from the Aurors, because she believed that was better for everyone in the long run.

Harry blinked slowly, mostly ignoring the smirk on Marvolo’s face, preparing a cup of tea to his preferences. “Right.” That certainly set the stage for what he wanted to talk about. “It’s actually quite hard to speak about.” If something was hard, start by saying it is. This technique had helped getting into a flow a few times already, so Harry used it almost without actually thinking about it. “There have been hints, of course. Actually, some of them were pretty obvious. Like when one of my calls interrupted a meeting, or how the Healer, or the Professor, bow from time to time when in private… But the fact that the Death Eaters still exist in some capacity I’m not sure about, makes it harder for me to accept that… my wishes and feelings regarding how Marvolo and I interact have changed so much.” Ignoring – if even only a bit – that Marvolo actually sat right there next to him, helped talking, and Harry felt that he was starting to be carried away by his words, no longer needing to force them out, but actually trying to keep up with them.

Harry only registered vaguely that a hand raised by Mrs. Goyele stopped Marvolo from interrupting the flow of words, now easily coming forth.

“How can I accept and keep silent about a man who tortured others into insanity, getting a second chance to live as a secretary? While my friend is almost an orphan because his parents are in hospital, barely aware? How can it be that I feel worry about the man in whose name all those atrocities were committed?”

His desperation became pretty obvious in his tone, his pleading for a way to cope with those conflicting feelings. The guilt, the happiness.

“Because it’s great that someone actually cares about my grades, how my day was, what my plans are. But while most of the bad things happened in the past, done by Voldemort, Marvolo isn’t the law-abiding man he pretends to be. Or is he?” The last was directed with quite a bit of force towards Marvolo, who still held his cup of tea delicately in his hands. His wand nowhere in sight.
Harry’s green eyes were fixed on Marvolo, tracking every movement the man made.

“I’m not sure if I really understand the divide you’re feeling.” Marvolo sounded cautious, speaking slowly, as if he was tasting the words, weighing them to see if they matched what he wanted to say. “And I’m not sure I can provide the reassurance you need. But I’m willing to try.”

Harry sat on the edge of his seat, hands wrapped around the armrests, gripping maybe a tad too hard. He was willing to listen, as Marvolo really was a different man. Voldemort never would have even considered speaking about this. Hell, the man never would have treated Harry with even a shred of the attention or kindness he had been displaying more and more regularly.

“As I told you, the Dark Mark was created by my using a bunch of different spells, bindings, and rituals, taking what I wanted and mixing in whatever I found might be useful. At the heart of it all is the old fealty binding spell that was used by our family back in the time when families bound themselves in service to another, more powerful, family to the mutual benefit of them both.” Harry nodded because that was in fact something that Marvolo had told him before, trying to explain why he hadn’t handed over the escapees the moment he had found them. “Many have been led astray by what I told them while I was Voldemort. I harmed them. Erased all the potential good they might have done, because my actions landed them in prison in the end. To take your example, Barty had serious trouble with his father. He never was good enough, didn’t get any of the affection and attention he needed. I used that to get him to do my bidding, to warp him and his view of the world to my ends.” Shakily setting his cup down, Marvolo folded his hands in his lap, gripping so hard that his knuckles turned white. “And he wasn’t the only one. Your godfather’s younger brother. He had potential. My actions led to his death, led to the deaths of many people, all of whom could have done good, would have done something to influence our society.” Marvolo looked up from the floor he had been staring at and locked eyes with Harry. “My bond to them as my vassals compels me to right the wrong I have caused them. The vow I made as Lord Slytherin binds me to doing what I think is best for our society. Killing or causing the deaths of even more people isn’t what is best, I clearly believe that. Everyone who can have a positive impact on our world should get a chance to do so.” He swallowed. “I know you have realised how some tactics that the most righteous of people would condemn for being unfair, or underhanded, or just this side of illegal, are needed to get things done.”

Marvolo paused, and Harry realised after an awkward, tense moment that he was waiting for a confirmation. So Harry nodded. “Grandfather Potter has said as much, as has Madame Longbottom. She said that some people are just disagreeable out of spite, disagreeing with everything one person brings before the Wizengamot just because they have brought it forward. And that sometimes it’s necessary to outmanoeuvre them. But that doesn’t include murder.” Of the last point Harry was certain, even if other stuff he had been sure about in the past had vanished in a confusing mess of grey.

Marvolo inclined his head in a contemplating manner. “Maybe not. But you need to know that in the times this spell of fealty was created, it fell under the Lord’s purview to decide how one of his people should be punished if they broke his law.”

Now it was Harry who swallowed. He might have known that in an abstract sense. They had talked about early British history in school. But hearing a teacher say something about a regional Lord having the jurisdiction under their control was vastly different from a man sitting just a chair over, telling Harry he felt justified deciding if someone had to die because they had committed to being in service to the man.

“There has to be a better way!” Startled by his own outburst, which had made him stand and take a step towards Marvolo, hands balled to fists at his sides, Harry shakingly opened his hands and took a step back, almost falling back into his chair with a huff.

A mirthless laugh from Marvolo startled Harry even more. “I’m not sure if you’ll believe me, but I did try to find another way to cope with Bellatrix and her madness.”

Harry felt a brow rise in silent query when the old Lord Yaxley wasn’t mentioned together with the mad aunt of Draco. So Marvolo had tried to find a way to help Bellatrix Lestrange, but no way to avoid killing Yaxley? “And I shall believe that the old Yaxley killed himself out of shame?” The scepticism was so thick in his voice that even Ron would have noticed, one of the least Slytherin of all the people Harry knew well in their year.

“The investigation clearly showed that he was the one handling the phial containing the deadly substance. There was no evidence of force found,” Marvolo answered, and Harry just knew that other had been there, pressuring the wizard to kill himself. It was in the way he held himself, the way he spoke, the inflection some of the words were spoken with. It wouldn’t hold up in court, but Harry was sure nonetheless.

Funny how one learned to read people by simply keeping company of people doing the same constantly.

“We both know that a true Slytherin with enough time would make sure not to be caught.” Harry tried for a collected tone, but was pretty sure his effort fell short as he noticed a small, short flicker of amusement on Marvolo’s face.

Would the other answer truthfully? The fact that Madame Goyle had been asked to sign another contract indicated that he intended to do so, at least. “Where is the difference between Bellatrix Lestrange, killing many, torturing two people into madness, escaping from prison, and a man leading a life conforming with society's expectations – at least on the surface – that makes one worth saving and the other not?”

Harry felt himself breathing faster, as if he had run to make it to a class, while he waited for Marvolo to answer him. A small part of him still expected to be told off for daring to ask questions – thankfully that part had gotten smaller since the summer – making him tense and anxious.

“Well spotted, and a good question.” Marvolo’s praise came unexpectedly, and Harry hadn’t really much time to regain his footing before Marvolo continued to speak, not giving any hints to how he might be feeling about all of this. “Nothing Bellatrix did before or shortly after my fall went against the orders she had been given. Once I was back, having regained enough sanity to feel the demands of the bond between her and me, I started to feel pressure to do something about my failing her.” He paused just long enough for it to be noticeable, “And the others.

“I tried everything I could come up with to help her. Only sacrificing her for the good of the others once there was no avenue left, and she started to go against my newer orders.”

Once again Marvolo had his eyes trained on the floor, his hands gripping tensely at each other, the pale wand nowhere in sight. “Corban Yaxley, on the other hand, acted against clear orders more than once.” Harry remembered the fact that Septimus had been ordered by his uncle to marry a witch once he had graduated from Hogwarts even though he knew that Septimus had no interest in women as he was gay, going against an order Marvolo had given out. But what other order had he disobeyed?

There had been those witches abducted by a few wizards. One of those wizards had been Corban’s son, if Harry wasn’t mistaken. Did the late Lord Yaxley have something to do with that?
Nodding, Marvolo confirmed Harry’s thoughts, probably following them by reading Harry’s facial expressions. A little chagrined, Harry realised that he had let his guard down quite a bit, as he did every time he went to one of the mind-healing sessions. “Yaxley seemed to think that the way those young wizards acted was right and in accordance with my will. I couldn’t let that stand, because I do not condone kidnapping, rape, and slavery.”

In the wake of that forceful declaration, silence settled on the room.

Harry tried to sort his thoughts. Would the Aurors have made the connection between the late Lord Yaxley and his son’s actions? The man had managed to evade Azkaban after Voldemort had fallen. He probably would have claimed that his son was a big disappointment and that he had known nothing.

One thing about the current system of wizarding Britain was pretty clear to Harry by now: if you had money and a respectable family name, you could get away with a lot.

And hadn’t he decided to let some things go?

“Under what circumstances would you consider killing another human?” Harry asked the question without really acknowledging the reasons for why he wanted to know.

Marvolo thought for a moment, picking his cup back up – which started to steam once again – taking a sip, before answering. “In a situation where I would be forced to defend myself or others, I might feel that there’s no other way. But I have noticed while defending the Burrow, that it would need to be a really skilled opponent, or many of them, to leave only lethal means as a way to keep those safe who I want to keep safe. Currently I’m just so good that there are few who could pose a challenge to me.” A clear smirk graced Marvolo’s face. “Why deny myself the challenge by using spells that are easy to cast, but lethal, when I can capture and incapacitate aggressors?”

Was that good enough?

Hermione probably would have bristled because Marvolo hadn’t simply said killing was wrong and he would avoid it at all costs.

But just as only ignoring a bully wouldn’t stop them or keep them from bullying a more entertaining or easier target, claiming to never to be able to kill because it was wrong, fell short of the truth, ignoring some important points.

Was their situation perfect? No.

Was it easy? How could it have been?

But maybe it was good enough.

Marvolo was willing to explain himself to Harry, and his reasons seemed sound. More or less, at least.

“I feel that we have become a family since the summer. As much as we probably can at this point.”

Once again Harry was picking his path carefully, trying to avoid possible pitfalls and stumbling blocks. “And once Marcus comes to be part of that family… His question why you call me Henry when my name is Harry got me thinking… I want you to call me Harry.” Now it was out. And suddenly the fear that Marvolo would reject that offer, even when he had said he wanted to be invited to use “Harry”, overshadowed everything else. It would be horrible to be rejected now. If Marvolo refused to accept their closeness, denied it had been happening, Harry wasn’t sure what he would do.
That fear vanished as fast as it had materialised when Harry saw the open, blinding smile on Marvolo’s face. “I thank you, Harry, for granting me this privilege. And I hope you realise that I’m willing to answer all questions you might have, or at least that I’m willing to listen to them all, should you ask something I’m not at liberty to discuss. Even regarding those individuals bond to me by the fealty spell. It only recently occurred to me that once I have undone all those rituals keeping me tied to this world, it’s quite possible that I might die before all of those bond to me die, which would lead to their bonds falling to you as my heir.”

Horror at the thought of being the one in charge of Barty Crouch, or the two Lestrange brothers, the Carrows, his Potions Professor, overshadowed his joy that Marvolo had accepted to use his nickname.

Harry later wasn’t really sure how he had managed to get to the Potions classroom where Professor Snape was already waiting for him, leading him into a deep meditation Harry so desperately needed right now. He only knew for sure that somehow Luna had been waiting for him, being a calming presence at his side the whole way down to the dungeons.

ooOoo

After Marvolo had retrieved his wand from the ornate box Madame Goyle had brought with her, he said goodbye to Harry – it felt so good to be finally able to use the more familiar address – who clearly seemed to be quite distracted and beside himself, and made his way to the edge of the grounds.

Instead of going home to Griffin House, Marvolo apparated to Headquarters, where he walked into the duelling room.

While he had made sure all secrets would be safe, speaking about all of that with Harry, witnessed by the Mind-Healer, had been nerve-wracking. Confronting his own feelings, his errors of the past, was terrifying. Harder than fighting of a Lethifold, or seeing a boggart take on the form of his own corpse.

Would that still happen?

Marvolo conjured up a statue made from porcelain in the form of a faceless man just to let it explode into a cloud of fine, white dust. He needed to get rid of the nervous energy that had build up over the duration of the conversation.

Having feelings was so damn hard. But it brought so much good along with it.

Ceasing to think for a while, Marvolo just conjured and destroyed one faceless statue after another until he finally was so tired that he felt calm at last.

Chapter End Notes

I’m sure at least a few of you expected a much more violent confrontation. But Marvolo and Harry have spent so much time working on their coping mechanisms, their ability to keep their tempers, ways to work through their problems, that they just wouldn’t let me write a confrontation getting out of hand. I kind of like this restrained but somehow still tense confrontation with a silent referee at the sidelines :D

And for another question: one Reviewer asked for translations to be presented right after the piece of text in a language other than English. I’m torn about that and would like to know what you all think on that. Break the flow by providing a translation right then and there? Or make you skip and possibly ignore the content of a piece of foreign language text providing a translation for the curious at the end of the chapter?

Thanks to Jordre and Jake for helping to improve my spelling!

By the time Olivienne had reached the gate to the school grounds she was already on edge. Since the first time she had had contact with the European magicals she had felt unhappy with the way they treated her, the magicless muggle. Her tante – her mother’s friend – never had looked down on her like the Europeans did.

Trailing behind the teacher who had been waiting for her at the gates, Olivienne remembered how the friendly smiles had reassured her at first. But soon she learned to sort the magicals she met into three categories. The ones that were indifferent to her lack of magic – by far the group she could tolerate the best – those that hated her just for the fact that she had no magic herself – just more of the hate she had experienced during her studies for the colour of her skin – and those that were truly curious, but treated her like a small child, unable to make intelligent decisions.

Somehow the last group was even worse than those who hated her, or displayed disdain.

As a black woman studying science, and as a woman and unmarried mother, too often others had taken a position of superiority over her. Claimed things simply untrue, ridiculed her for her errors, her lack of common sense. It had left her defensive about herself, her work, her daughters, each and every decision she had ever made.

And even now walking through the halls of the spacious and wondrous manor – or maybe a big château nestled into a beautiful valley between high mountains – the students, both young and older, whispered behind her back, pointing at the muggle, never letting her forget that this as well was a world she didn’t fit in.

Just like Paris, her chosen field of science, the church groups for mothers… she never fit.

Taking a deep breath to calm down, Olivienne stepped into the room reserved for meetings between students and their family members.

“I will inform your daughters, Doctor Moreau. Please wait here.” The teacher nodded in her direction and closed the door.

The room was beautifully appointed. Precious woods, carved in delicate patterns, as well as silk covered the walls where they weren’t buried behind shelves filled with leather bound books, or moving paintings. Several big and tall glass doors led out to a balcony and revealed the view over a snow covered park, woods in the distance, and what had to be a vegetable garden.
Having grown up in a well-off family all this grandeur wasn’t something truly new. But just by looking at her, people tended to put her into the getting-by box. The fact that her mother had chosen to move into a smaller home, leaving the bigger, more stately house to her daughter and granddaughters, tended to cater to those impressions.

In Olivienne’s opinion, the tendency to judge strangers and place expectations on them was one of humanity’s biggest failures.

As the door behind her opened and she heard two set of feet coming quickly nearer, she turned away from the windows and greeted her daughters, smiling.

“Maman!” both of her little girls called out and only a fraction of a second later they were in each other’s arms, relishing the nearness no amount of letters could give them.

The door was closed and the three of them were alone, simply happy to be back together.

Because of the costs of international travel and the effects of jet-lag, the twins didn’t come home for the shorter holidays all that often.

When they finally separated again, sitting down on two love-seats placed at an angle next to each other, Olivienne saw that her little girls were more than eager to learn what she had to say about the meeting between her and the twins’ father.

“I have met with Lord Sirius Orion Black, and to give you the most important information up front: he has proven to me that he is worthy to make an attempt at being your father,” Olivienne stated in a factual tone.

She felt a little offended when both Enora and Nawel looked at each other and started to laugh. They were laughing so hard that they had to cling to each other to prevent falling to the floor.

“What’s so funny?” Olivienne almost flinched when her words came out sharper than she had intended.

“Maman,” there was found exasperation in Enora’s voice, while Nawel still chuckled, “the way you said that. You grilled him? I’m sure the poor man must have been highly uncomfortable.”

Olivienne gave an uncomfortable smile, and conceded the point with a nod. She tended to make sure people around her were unsure of themselves, wrong footed, when she was in a position placing her at a disadvantage, or making her feel insecure.

In some situations it worked in her favour quite well. But it had cost her a few opportunities when she came off as too antagonistic when applying for positions at universities and for jobs.

“Maybe I did,” Olivienne admitted with an impatient wave of her hand. “But that’s not the point right now.”

“What kind of person is he?” The curiosity mixed with equal parts caution and fear in that one, loaded, question reminded Olivienne why she had searched for the drunk, charming, polite, but still rebellious young man once she was sure she was pregnant.

Each child should have the opportunity to get to know both parents.

“He’s trying hard to grow up.” Thinking back to the meeting she had with him, Olivienne tried to be factual, not influencing her daughters either way. They would decide for themselves if they wanted to meet the man or not. “Working to fulfil the responsibilities coming with his place in society. Using that influence to do some good. He has a godson around your age, but no other children.” She got out the notebook she had used during the meeting with Sirius and parchments he had brought with him. “These are things regarding the expectations of an heiress, rules of the family, and other things along those lines. I’ll leave them with you so you can read them.” Placing the items on the low table next to the love-seats, Olivienne fixed her girls with a stern look. “Do you want to meet him? And please be honest. Meeting him one time doesn’t mean that you have to accept his offer. And not wanting to meet him right now will not remove the possibility of meeting him later.”

Olivienne watched her daughters look at each other, doing that silent communication thing old couples, best friends, and twins seemed able to do, before they each took one of the scrolls.

So they probably weren’t prepared to decide yet.

Fine by her. It was Sunday, they had a lot of time still before she had to leave again.

oooOOooo

After a leisurely morning, and sleeping in, Harry’s group of friends gathered in one of the unused classrooms to practice. Hermione insisted every day that they needed more practical experience so they would be able to perform the spells during their OWLs practical exam.

No one had been able to come up with an argument to counter that – Harry wasn’t even sure that they had tried to find one – so they all had agreed to meet after lunch.

There had been treacle tart for pudding, and Harry felt a little sluggish with all the food he had eaten. It made him slower in casting his shields against Theo and Draco, who cast several of the less dangerous spells they had to practice for defence at him. They had yet to land even one of their spells.

“Break!” Theo called letting his arm fall to his side, giving an eye roll and a smirk. Draco shook his arm to loosen the muscles, grimacing. “I have a feeling we might need more people to land a spell on you, Harry. All that teaching for the Defence Club seems to help with the speed.” Theo filled a glass from one of the pitchers they had collected from the kitchen, before he sat down on a table next to where Harry was standing.

Harry felt a little conflicted over the fact that he seemed that much faster at defensive spells than his friends, or any of their year-mates for that matter. It just was another thing to set him apart. Something he still felt bad about, making it something he needed to work on. Standing out had been something almost guaranteed to cause trouble either with his aunt and uncle, or Dudley and his friends. While he no longer felt the need to underperform in school – something he had been doing without really noticing – thanks to Madame Goyle's help, standing out in other ways still held a lot of negative memories for Harry.

But it felt great to be good at more than Quidditch!

Draco got himself something to drink as well and walked over to a basket the elves had pressed on them, filled with a number of snacks, from oranges, to different nuts, and baked goods, to get himself something to eat.

“You’re using incantations while practising? Shouldn’t you also practice silent casting?” Theo was speaking low enough that the others wouldn’t hear what they were talking about.

Feeling self conscious, Harry shrugged, taking a sip from his water. “Don’t want it to get out to the whole school that I cast silently. And I’m not about to try it again without the stress of the situation but with an audience. That would be a disaster about to happen.” Everyone knew that witches and wizards under stress sometimes were capable of casting spells they couldn’t manage under any other circumstances. Harry highly suspected that this was such a case. Which was the reason he hadn’t told Marvolo anything about it, even though he knew that Professor Snape most likely had reported on the incident.

Theo nodded, setting the now empty glass down. “Silent casting will be required starting next year. Can’t hurt to start practising, can it? Maybe in our dorm this evening?”

Harry nodded, that sounded like a good idea. No sense ignoring what had happened, or not starting early when he still could vaguely remember how it had felt to cast those spells silently. “Help me with my switching spells?” Transfiguration was a hard subject and unlike Defence, he had still trouble with quite a few of the things they needed to know for their OWLs.

Theo nodded and they set up the materials they would need to practice their spells, when on the other end of the classroom they were using a loud argument drew everyone’s attention.

“Our! Who do you think you are?” Hermione seemed at the end of her patience. Not something that Harry had seen happen all that often, and mostly not in such a loud fashion.

“I thought we were going as a group! And then you vanished! With, with, with Krum! How could you do something like this!” Ron was equally as unhappy, his face taking on a terrible shade of red. It clashed with his hair something terrible.

Scolding himself for such an unhelpful thought, Harry cautiously moved over where a circle was quickly cleared around the two friends shouting at each other.

“So you have a problem with me meeting up with Victor? Grow up, Ronald! I have the right to chose whom I spend time with. I spent time with my friends from school. Including you! And then I spent time with a friend who came all the way here just to meet with me!” Hermione’s hair was bushier than it had been when they had arrived here and Harry wondered if it might be reacting to her obvious anger. This was taking on a shape that seemed to be getting clearer.

“I thought if we went as a group, we would spend all the time together!” Ron sounded a little bit desperate, terribly disappointed, trying to cover it up with anger. Harry hadn’t seen many of his friends the evening before. After the therapy session he had worked with Professor Snape, and after that he had slept, skipping dinner only to find a snack at his bedside when he woke later in the evening.

“We never did that!” Hermione threw up her arms, her tone incredulous. “Neither you nor Harry ever wanted to stay that long in the bookshop. Shall I make you stay by my side, looking at books the next time we go as a group?” That question had been heavy with sarcasm, raising several brows with surprise. She hadn’t given the impression of being one to understand sarcasm to the Slytherins in their group.

“We spend all our time with books during the week! That one weekend we get to go to the village, why can’t you spend that with me!” And that was the crux of the matter. Harry was pretty certain about that. Ron had wanted Hermione to go with him, but hadn’t asked.

“But we went as a group, Ronald! Make up your mind, will you?” Now Hermione looked tired, and Harry felt with her, keeping up such high levels of emotion was exhausting.

From one moment to the next the tension in the air dropped, the cautionary circle around Ron and Hermione broke, and Harry dared moving a little more in their direction.

Ron was rubbing his neck, clearly embarrassed. “You’re right. Can’t read minds, can you?” Not looking at Hermione, but the floor near her feet, Ron took a few deep breaths and then blurted a question out, as if he wanted to get it out before his courage would run out. “Come with me to Hogsmeade the next time we get to go?”

Ron didn’t see it, because his eyes still were glued to the floor, but Harry had a clear view of Hermione’s confusion, morphing into realisation, moving quickly from surprise to pity in the time it took her to process that Ron basically had asked her on a date. The next Hogsmeade weekend was planned for February, the first Saturday after Valentine’s Day and therefore the day the village would be crawling with people holding hands and staring into each other’s eyes.

Idly asking himself if he wanted to go, and who he would ask, Harry watched Hermione searching for words, while Ron got more uncomfortable by the second.

He could only wait and see how it would develop. Trying to intervene would probably only make things worse, if he had even known how to intervene.

Taking a deep breath Hermione started to speak. “You’re a good friend, and I like spending time with you, but I don’t think it’s a good idea for us to go on a date together.” That had been rather blunt.

Harry’s eyes moved over to watch Ron’s reaction. The red-head first got really pale, only to then flush, before he turned on his heel and fled from the room, leaving his things behind.

For a moment Harry and the others stood there, blinking, unsure what to do. Hermione blushed, turned to Daphne and started to ask questions about the blonde’s take on a specific set of rules for vampires that one early version of the Wizengamot had tried to get in place.

Taking her cue, Harry turned to Theo and Draco, waving at their setup for practising switching spells, walking over.

The rest of the afternoon Harry tried to concentrate on his spells, watching what the others did, practising himself, but more than once his mind got distracted with the question if he should have gone after Ron.

But what should he say? What could he say?

Hermione wasn’t interested in Ron, that much was clear. At least to Harry. But there was no tactful way to tell that to Ron. His friend probably would want to talk Hermione down, make her out to be uninteresting. That tactic was something Harry had seen in the past. Boys and girls rebuffed by someone they had been interested in, talking trash about that other person so they could feel better about themselves.

When they left for dinner Harry kept his eyes open to see if Ron would come down to the Great Hall – he rarely missed a meal – but couldn’t spot him. When Ron hadn’t made an appearance when dinner ended, Harry carefully got the attention of the twins, and met them near the Gryffindor table.

“Hey there, Harrykins! What’s up!” the twin walking a step before the other greeted with a cheerful wave.
“What can we do for our favourite Slytherin?” asked the other twin, grinning from ear to ear.

His mood lightened by the pranksters’ antics, Harry smiled despite himself. “Ron got a basket from Hermione this afternoon. In front of an audience. Haven’t seen him since then. Maybe you can help him?” Harry felt so out of his depth with this situation. He had learned to dance, and had been to a few balls with Daphne as a friend. But she had asked him, so Harry was sure he still was as big an idiot about girls as he had been before the ball.

That information dimmed the cheerful aura around Fred and George, while they both nodded. “Thanks, Harry. We’ll find him, talk with him.”

The other twin looked thoughtful for a moment before he asked a question in an almost whisper. “Can we borrow that useful parchment of yours?”

Silently calling himself all kinds of fool, Harry nodded. He should have thought of that himself. It wouldn’t have solved the problem with what to say to Ron, but he would have been able to find him.

Luckily Harry carried the Marauder’s Map with him most of the time, especially on weekends, so he was able to get it out and hand it over. “They’re both my friends… Please let me know how it goes?”

“We know how it is. Don’t worry too much, Harrykins!” Stashing the map in a pocket, the twins winked at Harry and walked away.

With a sigh Harry walked out of the Great Hall, turning into the corridor leading down to the dungeons. Hopefully his inaction this afternoon wouldn’t cost him Ron’s friendship. Harry walked down and arrived as the last of the fifth-year boys in the dorm.

Practising silent casting with the others down in the dorms proved to be a good distraction.

And a good way to let Harry fall asleep fast. He was so tired by the time he went to bed that he barely managed to brush his teeth and change into his pyjamas before he crawled into his comfortable bed.

Monday, 29th of January 1996

Because he had had trouble getting up – practising silent casting after an afternoon reviewing had taken it out of him – Harry and his friends were late to breakfast. Not that anyone would comment on it, as almost everyone was late some days, but it meant that both Ron and Hermione were already in the Great Hall, eating breakfast.

While Harry searched his own place at the Slytherin table, the older years much more accommodating than they had been before he had hexed the upper years – he hadn’t thought that was even possible – he flicked his eyes from Hermione to Ron and back.

They sat at different ends of the table, studiously ignoring each other. In fact they almost sat with their backs to each other, quite a feat while sitting at the same table but not sitting sideways.

“You can’t help them sort that out, Harry,” Theo said, tugging on Harry’s sleeve, prompting him to sit down. So Harry did.

After a rather hasty breakfast of toast with honey, scrambled eggs, an apple, and a goblet of milk, they all got up and moved with the majority of the students to the exit of the Great Hall. They had to get to classes.

Just as Harry and the others passed through the door, someone ran into Harry. For a moment he was confused, then he felt parchment in his hand, heard a whispered “Greetings from Ron,” and then the one who had run into him was gone again.

A quick look confirmed that he held the Marauder’s Map in his hand, so it probably had been one of the twins, giving him back the map, and passing on a greeting from Ron.

Resigning himself to ask after his two friends in breaks between classes, Harry hurried after Theo and Daphne.

oooOOooo

An urgent floo call from the Minister had ended Marvolo’s breakfast earlier than he would have liked. He hadn’t flooed into the Minister’s office right away, because he had to pick up a questionnaire he had to fill in, and he wanted to get it done. It was high time that Marcus finally could come home.

Now he had the thick scroll of parchment in his pocket – he wasn’t really sure how many questions there would be to answer – and the elevator he had been in stopped at the right level. “Level One, Minister’s office and Minister Support Staff.” Marvolo wondered – not for the first time – who had been the witch speaking those sentences. Or was it a completely artificial recording?

Percy Weasley was manning the desk of the secretary in front of the Minister’s office. The lanky red-head stood when Marvolo came through the double-width door separating the corridor from the rooms of the Minister’s office. “Lord Slytherin, the Minister is waiting for you.”

Marvolo squashed the urge to answer with a flippant I know, and nodded, quickly walking past the young man towards the door to Cornelius’ office. With a little wave of his hand Marvolo opened the door and stepped in.

He walked in on Cornelius sitting behind his desk, drinking something hot from a cup, and shaking his head, while looking down on something on his desk.

“Good morning, Cornelius. You said it was urgent?” They had talked at various opportunities, most recently during the coordination of how to overhaul and repair the adoption process. But as much as Marvolo thought it would be helpful to be among the Minister’s advisers, he wasn’t one.

“Yes. Thanks for coming to the Ministry so early on a Monday morning. I got a letter… but please read it first, before my recounting influences your view on what was written.” Cornelius really seemed flabbergasted, and out of his depth, waving at a letter sitting there in the middle of the desk.
Marvolo walked over, so he could pick the letter up, and so he could get a good look at what else might be on the desk. It wasn’t really anything interesting, but knowing that was worth passing up an opportunity to show off his wandless skills.

He picked up the letter and looked for a signature at the end of the second piece of parchment.

He flipped the page back and began to read, concentrating so he would catch all the layers of meaning he had come to expect from the old wizard.

Marvolo felt his brow inch towards the line of his hair a few times while he was reading the letter that had confused Cornelius. When he reached the part where the old wizard complained about the board of Governors pressuring him on leaving the school, Marvolo looked up and over to where Cornelius was sitting. “The Board is trying to replace him permanently?” Of course he already knew, because Lucius had told him, but Marvolo really wanted to get an impression on how Cornelius took the whole situation.

“As far as I know. And I agree with them. At his age, and with the bad health he has been in recently. Public opinion is against him, and I think it would be a risk to let him return to the school.” Cornelius waved his hand as if he was trying to chase away some annoying fly, clearly thinking the whole issue of the Headmaster of Hogwarts was old hat.

Marvolo only nodded in confirmation that he had heard, and hummed a non-committal sound. He really wanted to keep out of that mess, at least in ways that could be easily linked back to him.

It took a while to get through that letter and read it again two more times. It seemed like a riddle, or maybe it only was the sign of a troubled mind.

“What do you make of that?” Cornelius asked, waving at the letter, the moment Marvolo set the letter down, pinching the bridge of his nose.

“Well, he is better. Otherwise he probably would have claimed that I was the one making Dolores Umbridge work on throwing the adoption procedures into disarray.” Marvolo felt amused by what he had read. Confused, a little puzzled, a smidgen annoyed, curious, but amused above all else. Part of that amusement probably had its roots in the miasma of emotions currently swirling in his mind. Would it get even messier in there when he absorbed another of his horcruxes?

Cornelius looked not any happier, but kept silent as Marvolo continued to speak. “I’m having trouble deciding if he wants to get you to tell him what you know of the background of the adoption-mess, or if he wants to cast all the blame on me.” Marvolo sat down in the chair – richly carved and upholstered with silken velvet – across from Cornelius, straightening his robes as he did so. “He started out trying to make you realise that you need to know who started the mess, or more precisely who kept it going once Umbridge was out of the picture. And then he gets on a roll. Claiming I was the one, creating the mess so I could sweep in, playing the hero to repair the damage.” Marvolo snorted, even in the past that wouldn’t have been a plan he would have thought to use. “Not sure what you think, but I can’t really see me in the role of the hero in shining armour. There’s simply too much dark in my past for that.” Marvolo shook his head and registered an easing of Cornelius’ posture.

“He claims I’m working towards a certain goal, and looking at the claims he made, they don’t lack a certain logic, but they aren’t founded in reality in any way I can see. He simply doesn’t provide any proof beside his claims of knowing my character.” Maybe Dumbledore should get into writing fictional books in his old age, he certainly had the imagination needed.
“So you’re not angry?” Cornelius seemed equally relieved and puzzled. “Dumbledore claims that you’re trying to work towards the goal of stealing all magical children from muggle families! He used quite drastic language. And what he suggests you plan for Squibs… I’m not sure…” Words failed to come to the Minister.

Marvolo couldn’t blame him. Really, suggesting Marvolo wanted to make slaves out of Squibs and use them in some sort of convoluted breeding program, it really made one wonder where Dumbledore got those ideas from.

Marvolo shook his head to get rid of the speculating thoughts. “Professor Dumbledore was pretty set against me the moment he met me back at the orphanage. I admit that I didn’t have the best reputation with the staff there, but I would love to know how he would have coped as the only magical person there, being bullied, suspected at every turn, competing with others for limited supplies…” Marvolo trailed off, it would be interesting to see how a young Dumbledore would have developed if thrust into the same circumstances, but the old argument of nurture versus nature wasn’t one Marvolo was going to debate now, or anytime soon.

Marvolo nodded. “I agree. Maybe let someone from the board learn about the letter? You’re not a healer bound by a vow, or in any other way obligated to keep the contents of this letter private.” In fact if the Minister wanted, he could let the letter be printed in the Daily Prophet if he wanted to. “Maybe let the content slip to a few people, if you don’t want to bring it to the Governors directly, but I think it would look better if you did that. Whatever else that letter does, it clearly shows that Albus Dumbledore isn’t fit to be in a position of responsibility for children.”

Now Cornelius’ gaze turned calculating. “And it won’t bother you if what all is hinted at, claimed to be true, and said about you in this letter comes to be wider knowledge, Marvolo?”

How considerate of the Minister.

Marvolo smiled and shook his head. “Those who will believe ill of me based on the past, will do so regardless. Those who judge me on my merits probably won’t be bothered by unfounded accusations. And keeping the children safe, among them my son, Harry, is more important.” It felt good to use Harry’s name out in the open, prove that he had managed to get closer to his son, that they had manage to strengthen their family.

“If you’re certain?”

“I am certain, Cornelius. Thank you for your consideration.”

After that they talked for quite some time more, but none of it was as interesting as the long detailed letter of wild speculation Marvolo’s old Transfiguration Professor had written and sent to the Minister.

On his way to the atrium from where he planned to apparate back home Marvolo walked into Madame Bones and was drawn into a long discussion about the requirements in place to apply to the Auror training program. When they parted with polite wishes for a nice day, Marvolo was truly puzzled. Why would the Head of the Department of Magical Law Enforcement want to speak with a former Dark Lord – as far as she knew – about if it was a good idea to lower the needed NEWT in Potions? Marvolo had agreed with her that Severus was a hard taskmaster where Potions were concerned and even an OWL in his subject would be enough for entry into the program if there was a more basic brewing segment added to the training. He even had suggested that the program could concentrate on recognizing dangerous brews, and forbidden substances, over brewing as there were dedicated members of the force doing the brewing for the Department.

Pleasantly confused, Marvolo returned to Griffin House intening to fill in the questionnaire as the first step in the process of adopting Marcus.

With a sigh Sirius placed another letter he had finished off to the side. Managing the family assets was a continuous and boring task. But as he much preferred having money to spend on nice clothes, good food, visits to the clubs of the city, to having to turn over every knut before spending it, there wasn’t much Sirius could do.

Looking over to the clock on the wall – telling the time beside a few other things – Sirius sighed again. The time he had promised Remus to spend on the boring, administrative stuff wasn’t over yet, and Harry was still in lessons so he wouldn’t be available on the mirror either.

Moping wouldn’t get the work done, so Sirius reached for the next letter in his in-basket, trying to shore up his work ethic.

All weariness was forgotten once he glanced down at the envelope, seeing who had sent the letter to him.

It was from Olivienne.

His wand made quick work of the seal on the back of the envelope, and only seconds later Sirius had unfolded the letter.

He snorted.

She certainly would have fit right in with his family's Slytherin tendencies. The whole letter was written in French, a language Sirius had told her he wasn’t fluent in. Neither reading and writing, nor speaking it.

For a moment he searched his brain for the translation spell Lily had all of them learn in their seventh year. She had insisted that they should learn it to get access to a wider variety of spells, suggesting they should each learn a different second language. Remus had managed to convince her that they hadn’t enough time to do so, and should use translation spells in the interim.

When Sirius was sure he wouldn’t remember the spell, he got up from his – surprisingly comfortable – chair and walked over to the shelf that he stored the more useful charms and spell collections in. A few moments later, Sirius had found the right spell and was wandering back to his desk.

The first thing he did was copy the letter over to another piece of parchment, storing the original back into its envelope. It would be a disaster if he miscast the spell and lost the original letter.

Checking with the book, Sirius practiced the wand movement a few times, repeating the incantation in his mind, not really casting just yet.

Then he placed the copied letter in the middle of his desk, removing all other parchments from the vicinity, so he would be sure to not accidentally translate them, and then cast the spell. A short glance showed that the text was now English, and Sirius set to reading what Olivienne had written.

Sirius

I talked to the twins. They want to meet you, but the school does not allow visits between students and non-family members during school hours. A direct meeting will have to wait until the break week.

But both put the idea at stake, which you could write before. Enora assured me that letters are addressed to her with her name will definitely happen. However, an owl may take some time to fly from southern France to London.

Spring break starts in the second week of April. The time should be enough to find a solution that works for all of us. Please make a suggestion when you are available during this time.

I will go home on Wednesday. If you want to meet me before, please let me know. Maybe I can find a gap in my schedule.

Regards,

Olivienne

All in all, it looked like a fairly smooth translation. With the exception of a few hiccups in the middle. Maybe it would be wise to let Remus have a look before Sirius wrote an answer and made an attempt to write a letter to his daughters.

Of course he had considered that possibility. In fact he was relieved that Olivienne didn’t insist that he send letters to the twins to her first, so she could monitor their conversations. He would feel much better this way.

Getting a scrap parchment – one where he had removed more than one draft already, rendering it rather thin – from the pile off to the side, Sirius made notes of what he might write to his daughters. The first letter should be to both of them, offering them separate letters if they wanted them.

Once the time had moved on to where Harry’s lessons for the day should be over, Sirius took a break from his mad scribbling, and got the mirror out of his robe pocket.

It took a moment but then Harry’s slightly worried face replaced Sirius’ reflection. “Sirius, what’s the matter. I’m on my way down to the dorm, to pack my books away.” And true to his word, Sirius saw the walls moving past Harry, or rather Harry moving past the walls. The view through the mirror had a curious effect on perception.

“I promised Remus that I would finish some of my correspondence, and part of the rest of all that boring stuff that you have to look forward to. But I’m bored and thought it would be more fun to speak with you, godson!” Harry rolled his eyes, making Sirius smile. It was good to see how well Harry was coping with everything, and how happy and healthy he obviously was. That first meeting between them – with Sirius in his other form – near where Lily's sourpuss of a sister was living, still was a dark spot in Sirius’ memories and made an appearance in his nightmares from time to time. At the time he hadn’t really understood what he had seen. But since then he had learned how Harry had been fleeing the house of Petunia to escape verbal abuse, lacking rations, and too many chores, largely heaped on him by the whale’s sister Marge, or something.

Even with the one facilitating the changes being Lord Slytherin, Sirius was happy that they were taking place.

“One could thing that you still are no older than fifteen, trying to ignore all the homework.” Harry laughed. Someone on Harry’s end of the conversation called something that Sirius couldn’t properly understand. “Go ahead. I’ll walk a little slower, we’ll meet in the common room.” Harry’s attention returned to the mirror and therefore Sirius.

Sirius smiled. “I got a letter from Olivienne. She wrote in French, so my translation is from a spell. Not sure how good it really is. But the twins want to meet with me. In the spring holidays, which is in April. Until then I get to write them. But I really don’t know what to write. You know? So I thought, why not ask my godson? He’s just a year older, he surely knows how to talk to girls his age.” Sirius felt himself blush, because he was so aware that he was rambling, but couldn’t stop himself.

Harry laughed. “You’re confusing me with your younger version, Sirius. I’m a disaster speaking with girls who haven’t been my friends for a while. But I guess I can give you some pointers as to what might be useful conversation starters.” Sirius nodded enthusiastically, that sounded like a great idea. “Ask about school. Their favourite subjects, their least favourite. Professors. You can tell them what you liked or disliked at their age. But I guess you should limit the number of stories about pranks to one per letter.”

Sirius took notes, while Harry talked and portraits, lights, and bare walls moved past his head. “You could also ask or talk about Quidditch, offer them to answer question they might have… I guess that might be a good start?” Harry shrugged, still walking and hitching his bag back up on his shoulder.

Sirius nodded. “Thanks. That’s helpful. How is your second term starting? Have they put out the information pamphlets yet?” They slid into one of their normal conversations after that, until Harry reached the dungeons proper, where he insisted on ending the call, as no one not of Slytherin was to know where exactly the entrance was, or the current password to get in. Sirius played up how wounded he felt to not be trusted, but couldn’t stop himself from laughing when Harry pointed out that he was one of the most Gryffindor people Harry had ever met.

It simply was the truth.

With the new input from Harry his letter writing got easier, until he suddenly remembered that the twins spoke French. Would they be able to read a letter he had written in English? Certainly their mother spoke English rather well, but that said nothing about the ability of the girls. Language studies often were less important at magical schools.

ooOoo

When Remus came home from his trip to gather some potions ingredients – he preferred to brew his own medical potions, pain-relief and the like – he found his friend asleep at his desk, surrounded by many half finished letters by the look of it. With a chuckle he prodded Sirius awake, so he would sleep the rest of the night in his own bed. He would be in a bad mood if he slept at the desk the whole night. And Remus wasn’t willing to spend a day with a grumpy Sirius.

“Come, Padfoot, it’s time for bed.” Guiding his grumbling, only half awake friend into his room, Remus wondered what had been so important or interesting that Sirius had managed to stay in his study so long that he fell asleep at the desk.

He would ask him tomorrow.

With great care Severus helped Sonja in her beautiful woollen robes out of the floo, getting his wand from the holster with a flick of his hand, to cast a spell at them both to get rid of the soot. Travelling such a long distance by floo was a sure way to get your robes covered in soot.

The smile she gave him to that was so radiant that Severus stood there a moment, smiling back, ignoring their surrounding.

Then a polite little cough drew their attention, and they both turned from smiling at each other to see an elf standing there. “Flimm is sorry. Master is wanting you to be in dining room. Food is ready to be eaten!”

A wave of the elf’s hand let their warm clothes move over to a clothes rack where other cloaks, scarves and hats were already sitting. Then he waddled away from them clearly expecting that they would follow.

Sonja gave Severus a shrug with an amused air. Since she had come to Hogwarts and with the time they had spend with the three elves at Prince Manor, she had relaxed in the presence of house-elves, had come to like a few of them quite well, in fact.

So they followed the elf through the hall towards the dining room from where animated voices were to be heard.

Severus had been here before, delivering potions for his Lord’s heir, giving lessons in basic brewing techniques and occlumency to the boy, and reporting to his Lord. But then he had been either in brewing robes, or even his Death Eater garb, not in one of his best sets of robes that he had acquired since he had taken up the title of Lord Prince.

Severus really was curious what the bigger purpose behind this dinner party was. Socialising simply for the sake of spending time with others just didn’t match up with his image of the Dark Lord.

“Ah, Severus, Sonja, welcome to Griffin House. Come in and sit down.” For a moment Severus felt like he had stepped into a warped version of the world he was living in. Then his dark eyes found the blue eyes of his Lord, and he felt the well known presence of the other's mind at the borders of his own. There was the request to go along with this even without prior warning, and the feeling of acknowledging a service rendered, or a task completed dutifully. So Severus smiled, gently squeezed Sonja’s hand on his arm to let her know to go along with this, and returned the greeting with as much warmth as he ever had shown someone in a social context. “Marvolo, it was a welcome distraction to get the invitation for this evening. Thank you very much!”
Severus noticed a few startled flinches at this familiar greeting among the others present for this evening. Lucius was here, as was Lord Lestrange, but there also were more Death Eaters and their spouses present, and no one else. Only Death Eaters, their partners – if they had one – so everyone knew that this casual use of given names was much more important than it would have been if even one of them had been someone different.

With more pleasantries exchanged Sonja and Severus found their places at the long table, close to where the Dark Lord was sitting at the head of the table between Lord Lestrange and Lucius who had his wife sitting at his other side.

Once the first course, a warm hearty soup, was served, Marvolo – getting into a role helped immensely in playing it, so Severus thought the name he had to use – started idle conversation up again, seemingly not paying attention to the other conversations reluctantly starting up around the table. “I’m a little amazed that Minerva McGonagall let the both of you be absent on a school night.”

Sonja grinned as she answered, because Severus had just taken a spoon of soup. “She is clearly indulging us, the newlyweds, with this. And I have to say the support of the whole staff.” She smiled winningly and with a mischievous glint in her eyes up to Severus. “Filius even said Severus and I should get off at least one evening per week.”

There were a few nervous laughs around the table and Severus gave his lovely wife a playful glare, before turning towards the head of the table. “As Aurora was willing to keep an eye on the Slytherins this evening, Minerva was more than willing to allow us the freedom to enjoy an evening away from the castle.”

During another course of the meal – some sort of risotto artfully arranged on a small plate – the conversation drifted from one inane topic to the other. It was polite enough conversation as Severus had come to expect at the beginning of most social events, but couldn’t quite fit with the fact that this was in some way a meeting of Death Eaters and their Lord. Even if the addition of the spouses made it a somewhat more socially acceptable version.

And then suddenly the hints at a pattern Severus had seen the whole evening clicked into place.

The topics revolved around the children of those present.

Only those that had children at school now at this very moment, and most of them in Slytherin, were here. Lord Lestrange had his heiress, Lucius and Narcissa had their son Draco, healer Greengrass had his nieces, Daphne and Astoria, and the others all were parents of students in his House.

“I started the adoption process for young Marcus today. There are questions in that paperwork that are truly ridiculous. Tell me: could you answer in a short and accurate way what a five-year-old wished to take up as a career from one day to the other? Marcus has changed his mind at least three times since I met him the first time. From Dragon Tamer, to Potions Master, to Fireman. Whenever I read him the story of the \textit{Fountain of Fair Fortune}, he insists on becoming a knight when he is grown.” The way Marvolo talked clearly invited the others to share a similar anecdote of their own children, or those they knew well.

“Draco wanted to be a Dragon Tamer for a while, but professional Quidditch Player surely was the favourite for longest.”

After that anecdotes of childish antics came flowing easier, and more than once Narcissa and Lucius, as well as Severus and Sonja, were the targets of more or less friendly teasing about young children and the hardships they could bring to their parents.

“Adopting a teenager probably spared me a lot of those troubles. But I hope to have some of the more rewarding experiences to share with Marcus once he comes to live here. And I hope he’ll make me as proud as Harry does. I heard recently that he seems to be easily capable of holding his own even against several more experienced students. Isn’t that true, Severus?”

And there it was, the little evil smirk making it clear to everyone that Marvolo – their Lord – was referring to something that hadn’t been a training session during the Defence Club meetings, or a tutoring session sometimes happening between the older and younger students from the House of Slytherin at Hogwarts.

“Oh, it certainly is true. The wards I have on the rooms only activate if there are spells cast in a rapid succession, normally indicating that several people are ganging up on one or two others. As a professor and Head of House I can’t let such things get out of hand. But when I checked, it was pretty obvious that only your son, Marvolo, had been the one casting. And by the looks on the faces of his closest friends, not one of them had been even truly worried, mostly keeping an eye on his back.” Out of curiosity Severus had tried to cast Petrificus Totalus that fast and often in that short a timespan, and had noticed that he couldn’t do it other than silently. The incantation simply was too long to permit anything else. He wasn’t quite sure yet if that truly meant that Harry Slytherin had cast those spells silently. Severus thought it possible that the boy had used a different spell with a shorter incantation.

After that, all those parents of Slytherin upper-years were on the edge of their seats, clearly wanting to check in with their progeny, demanding to know what had happened and how they could have been so careless.

Severus enjoyed himself immensely and gladly helped his Lord brag about the advances the young boy had made in all his classes this year, considering the handicap he had had to fight against all his time at Hogwarts.

It was a happily humming Severus who crawled into bed that evening, greeted by a chuckling Sonja. “I think you truly love to put people on the spot and make them realize their faults and weaknesses, don’t you?”

“I might,” Severus admitted, drawing her into his arms. “But it seems that it’s even more fun when aimed at adults. I’ll have to keep that in mind and try it at the next Wizengamot session.”

Cleaning his mind as he was accustomed to doing, Severus reflected that tag-teaming the parents of those careless students had been great fun, and that he wasn’t averse to repeating the exercise.

Chapter End Notes

I shamelessly admit that I used the translation spell to get out of a decision regarding translations this time. And because I had fun re-creating the effect of automatic magic translation. I wrote the letter in German, let a service translate it into French, and then let that text be translated into English. I feel that automatic translation has gotten much better!

Hope you had as much fun reading this as I had writing it!

Thanks to Jordre and Jake for helping to improve my spelling!
I want to once again thank all those people leaving comments on my chapters. You help me keep writing through a much too hot summer, bad days, and despite the temptation of new toys.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

Tuesday, 30th of January 1996

Idly stirring the spoonful of honey into his coffee, Severus let his gaze wander over the students sitting at the four house tables. Sonja and he had been up at an early hour discussing an article that might be useful in their own quest to find a substitute for the ancestry test the goblins had a monopoly on.

Maybe the author of that article could help them in performing more thorough tests once they had finished the preliminary tests with humans. To get a scale of colours and how to interpret them consistently, they would need much more than only a handful of examples.

Severus let his dark eyes wander over the hall. The students were either lethargic, fighting to wake up enough that they would be able to follow the lectures in the first lesson of their day, or hyperactive. In his years teaching, Severus had watched the transformation from energetic eleven-year-old to sleepwalking teenager many times. Over at the Gryffindor table, the older students were annoyed by the younger students and the Weasley twins. At the Slytherin table the younger students knew better than to disturb the older ones.

The do-not-anger list clearly also included the adopted son of Lord Slytherin, who was eating a balanced meal – he obviously had picked up good habits during the time his meals had been especially catered to his needs during the summer – and talked with the others surrounding him.

If someone had told him just a year prior that the son of James Potter and Lily would sit and talk amiably with the children of Lucius Malfoy, Benjamin Nott, and other suspected Death Eaters, he would have called in the Healers from St. Mungo's.

And now here he was, witnessing that exact scene, and not for the first time, either.

It seemed that the boy had inherited the big, kind heart of his mother, judging by the way he had let go of the past. In becoming friends, if tentatively, with Draco and accepting the Dark Lord as his guardian, Mr. Slytherin had provided ample proof of his capability of forgiveness.

If Severus had to find someone even close to that level of... a forgiving nature, not even Dumbledore would measure up. The old Headmaster had forgiven Severus and given him a second chance, but the fact that Dumbledore had insisted on Severus spying for the Order of the Phoenix, therefore forcing Severus to continue to do things some people would call evil diminished the level of forgiveness considerably.
Redirecting his thoughts to more cheerful topics, Severus took a drink from his coffee and then speared a piece of baked apple from his plate. Sonja was sitting next to him, deep in conversation with Pomona. It seemed as if his wife was haggling to get some cuttings from more rare plants – which were housed in the school’s greenhouses – for their own potions ingredients garden at Prince Manor.

Severus emptied his mug of coffee – contemplating a third one – as the morning post arrived with a mass of owls filling the air with the rustling of many feathers. One unremarkable owl landed carefully near Severus among the bowls and platters of food, expertly avoiding tipping over the pitcher of milk. Slipping a knut into the small pouch attached to the owl's leg, Severus took the newspaper from the bird, not paying it that much attention. They never waited for any affection anyway.

The first thing capturing his attention the moment he had unfolded the newspaper – breaking the waterproofing charm cast on it in an effort to shield the ink – was the headline over the article on the front page.

Dumbledore believes in Conspiracy!

With his brows rising steadily up his forehead, Severus speedily read the article – as always littered with more adjectives and exclamations than should be allowed in a publication claiming to inform about news – to a steadily growing backdrop of murmurs and shocked outcries from the students.

And the reaction was only too easy to understand. After all, the article claimed that Albus Dumbledore had written a letter to the Minister of Magic, Cornelius Fudge, claiming that Lord Slytherin was preparing to abduct all muggle-born witches and wizards from their families.

The article used a more colourful language and stretched the whole affair out over way more paragraphs than were strictly needed, but in essence that was what it said.

“Can you believe it! Albus writing such a letter?” Pomona asked in clear distress. Severus rolled his eyes, avoiding making eye contact with anyone least he be dragged into the surely terribly trying conversation to follow.

“Sadly, I can,” Filius spoke up, clearly worried. “I’m curious, though, how the letter came into the hands, or to the notice, of Miss Skeeter, if the claim is true that it was sent to the Minister.”

That was a good question indeed. But judging by the tone the article was going for, Severus thought it might have been intentional. Painting Albus Dumbledore in such a bad light would aid in removing him from the political picture, which clearly would ease the way for the changes the Dark Lord wanted to make.

Sonja reached for the paper Severus still was holding, and with a small smile he let go, so she was able to read the article for herself.

Eating his breakfast in silence, Severus listened to the staff’s reaction, sure that his Lord would be interested to learn what they all had thought and especially said out loud.

He would need to listen in to the chatter of his students to gather a more complete picture, but at the moment this article seemed to have severely shaken the base some had built their trust for the old wizard on.

As the morning meal was coming to a close, Severus wished Sonja a good day with a kiss right there in front of everyone, and was about to turn to walk out of the Hall when Minerva spoke up. “We’ll have a staff meeting this evening, after dinner.”

Agreeing murmurs were her only answer as the professors dispersed on the way to their classrooms and the first lesson of the day.

ooOoo

Aberforth snorted for the third time in as many minutes. That tickled Albus’ curiosity more than anything had so far this morning. He was waiting for Cornelius to visit, asking for advice, or even help, from Albus on how to act regarding Tom and his plans, which made Albus anxious. He really didn’t like waiting, and found that his stint in hospital hadn’t heightened his patience any. After all, his letter should have reached the Ministry yesterday with the morning mail. There had been plenty of time for Cornelius to react.

“What’s so funny? Don’t make me wait until you have finished the Prophet, Aberforth.” Mock scowling at his brother, Albus reached for the honey pot, planning to spread it on one of the toast slices.

“You did write to Fudge?” Aberforth asked, peering over the top edge of the newspaper.

Albus nodded a little confused. Why was Aberforth asking that? How did he even know?

Aberforth snorted again. “I’ll bet you a good pint of my finest ale that you’ll never guess what happened with your letter.”

Albus blinked, the knife he was using sliding over the toast with a scratching noise. Cornelius had already given a statement to the press? That was unusually forward of the man. “I think you’ll lose that bet, Aberforth. The way you’re acting it’s clear that someone wrote an article about what I wrote.” Sometimes Aberforth was a little silly.

“That’s true enough. But I don’t think you’ll like what you’re called in here.” Aberforth’s eyes were hard, and quickly moved over the text. “Here, that’s a really good one: fearmonger, they call you. And here, that’s another good one: lunatic! Oh, even better: a raving lunatic! I think you might want to go back to the hospital!”

With widening eyes, Albus waved his hand and ripped the newspaper out of his brother’s hands with a silent, wandless summoning charm.

That couldn’t be. That sounded like Rita Skeeter was once again trying to systematically destroy his reputation.

Blue eyes quickly scanned the article and came to the conclusion that this was an attempt to slander his name. A good attempt, by all that he could see.

Was this really what he had written? Albus felt his heart beat faster, his breaths quickening.

Miss Skeeter had a tendency to exaggerate. Surely she had done so here?
Suddenly Albus wasn’t so sure anymore.

And wasn’t that one of the more frightening thoughts he had ever had?

“Take your potion, Albus,” Aberforth said, quiet but with authority. A potion phial was placed before Albus on the table with a soft sound.

Searching for his brother’s eyes, Albus looked up. The mocking and teasing were gone, leaving pity as the only thing Albus could see.

Feeling numb – the thought of truly losing his mind was paralysing – Albus reached for the small phial, removed the small stopper and swallowed the potion in one go.

Maybe he truly needed more help. Aberforth’s idea of going back to the hospital might be a good one.

oooOOooo

It had been a great day.

A truly wonderful day!

Full of delights, as more and more letters had come assuring him that the people didn’t believe a word of what Albus Dumbledore claimed of his plans and actions.

And he was having a lot of fun right now.

Dodging another of the boil curses thrown by Benjamin, Marvolo took quick stock of where the others were. The three of them were working together quite well.

He had set strict rules for their duels, which were inspired by the rules of the mock battles the children had fought during the Defence Club meetings, aimed at increasing their mobility and accuracy of aim, as well as their ability to use their surroundings.

A well-aimed transfiguration from Marvolo’s wand changed the upper layer of dust and grime to water, and another spell let that water freeze to ice. With a yelp Lucius landed on his ass, making an excellent target for Marvolo who had no trouble landing a spell on the man’s arm.

To do that he had to extend his arm out from behind the box he had used as cover, getting struck with a curse himself. Cursing in hissing Parseltongue Marvolo snatched his arm back, quickly moving to another part of the room, which was filled with conjured and transfigured objects, to get away from where the others thought he was hiding.

The boils were spreading quickly, swelling and aching. He was not allowed to cast the counter curse – even though he had specifically selected this curse as the only means of direct attack because it was easy to counter – so the swelling and the increasing pain started to impede his ability to hold his wand in his dominant hand.

Switching his wand to his other hand, Marvolo decided to go all out.

A quick spell transfigured the all present dust particles floating through the air into much bigger and a lot less dense balls, which he then sent with a wave of his painfully curled hand towards where the others were trying to organise a concerted effort to subdue him with hurried whispers. The balls were too light to do any harm, but there were so many that they were an effective distraction.

It wasn’t easy casting with his off-hand, but nevertheless Marvolo was quick enough and much better with his aim now after countless mock duels to target each of the three wizards practising with him and managing to land a curse either on their wand arms or faces.

Pained hisses and the sound of heavy bodies colliding with walls, the floor, and the obstacles in the room, filled the sudden silence.

Marvolo stepped confidently out of the shadow between two stacks of boxes a small evil smirk on his lips.

Xerxes rolled over and to his feet. “And the school permits such exercises in that Defence Club your heir is running, my Lord? I have trouble believing that.”

Marvolo chuckled holding his arm out so one of the others could cast the counter to remove the now positively virulent-looking boils. “Harry lets them use soft balls spelled to stick to whatever they touch, or colour-changing spells. I can’t see how any professor might object to that version.”

Benjamin had cast the counter and had freed Marvolo from the nasty consequences of the curse they had been using instead of Harry’s more tame version of this same exercise. “It certainly changes things when the possible spells to use are limited by more than the ability of the healer at hand,” he observed before rising to his feet carefully, and as if he was in quite a bit of pain.

“Judging by the way Draco has improved since the summer, it’s an effective way of training reflexes,” Lucius said, freed of his own share of boils by Xerxes, and preparing to help the other wizard get rid of his own.

“I have to agree,” Xerxes nodded, otherwise holding still and pointing out the places where he had been hit earlier. “The stories being told between my acquaintances about what their children are writing from school mostly revolve around another unbelievable feat of magic our Lord’s heir has performed. The newest one claims he incapacitated between five and fifteen – the numbers vary – older students with silent spells.” Flexing his limbs to test if Lucius had gotten all the boils, Xerxes turned to look at Marvolo. “I remember that you always were the first to master any new spells silently, my Lord.”

Finishing the last counter for Benjamin with a flick of his wrist, Marvolo smirked over at his old friend. “I wouldn’t be surprised if my son had a talent for silent casting. Some aspects of our family magic lend themselves to a more instinctive understanding of the requirements to cast silently.” He grinned and waved for his duelling partners to follow him. “I haven’t heard that story yet. Severus could only inform me of what he found in the common room when he went to investigate. Is that story linked to the incident we spoke about yesterday?”

Marvolo would have bet a lot of Galleons on that, but he wanted to know what people were talking about. It was always beneficial to know how the truth was distorted in repeated re-tellings of an incident.

“It seems to be, my Lord,” Lucius finally confirmed.

“Theo wrote something similar. Said the older students had been resentful of the way your heir just jumped to the top of the hierarchy, challenged him under the influence of some liquid courage. Not that it did them any good.” Benjamin snorted, and chuckles from the others made clear they all agreed. “Your son didn’t tell you, my Lord?”

Marvolo smiled and shook his head. “I think he might have anticipated a rather forceful reaction from me. And he isn’t the kind of teenager to run to an authority figure to intervene in something as trivial as a small scuffle in the common room.” He had said it with only a hint of the pride he felt that Harry wasn’t only at the top of Slytherin House because of the fact he was heir, but for his own capability to hold the place, based on both ability and the fact that he was willing to hold himself to the obligations coming with the position.

Of course Marvolo didn’t miss the small flicker of Lucius’ eyes at the not-so-subtle dig at Lucius’ son Draco’s tendency to invoke his father’s name at every opportunity.

They settled in Marvolo’s study with a few good cups of warm, strong tea, delicious small cherry-filled pastries, and some of the best chocolate money could buy. Exchanging some inconsequential small talk, they kept an eye on each other to make sure that their earlier activities hadn’t affected anyone in a dangerous way. It always had puzzled Marvolo in his youth how so many could try themselves in the Dark Arts, old rituals, and generally dangerous magics without taking the proper precautions. And he was sure he would have trouble finding someone who would not be surprised to hear him say that he approved of the restricted section in the Hogwarts library.

It was a sad truth that the needed precautions often were missing from the texts detailing the dangerous magic now mostly made illegal and banned. And it was a fact he still struggled with from time to time that his own youthful ignorance had led him to disregard the dangers of Horcruxes.

The simple truth was that not everyone was competent to use dark spells or dangerous rituals. But that was no reason to restrict them from being used at all. It just needed much better qualified teachers to make sure that those who learned, learned properly.

When the required time had passed, the others left one by one.

Xerxes was the last to leave.

“I’m happy for you, Marvolo.”

Marvolo was reasonably sure that Xerxes wasn’t congratulating him on his handling of Dumbledore’s latest – admittedly weak – attempt to drag his name through the mud. “What are you referring to?”

“The fact that your son finally agreed to let you use his nickname. The others might not see it, but the last time I saw you so purely happy… I’m not sure I’ve ever seen you as happy as you have been today every time you used his name.”

Marvolo hummed and then nodded slowly. “I hope adopting another child will add to that. But I’m aware that such a young boy will also cause more trouble than Harry has done so far.”

Xerxes only nodded and returned home, foregoing all the ceremony Marvolo had insisted on in the past. Marvolo himself walked back into his office to retrieve Nagini, before he returned home to Griffin House. He had paperwork to go through – building a fortune for the Slytherin family, separate from the money he was managing from the Potter assets was a lot of work – and a curious letter from Amelia Bones to answer. She had asked him for a meeting in Diagon Alley, not using the official stationery of the DMLE but her private one. It was all rather curious. But nothing he could get to the bottom of just now.
With a complaining Nagini in tow – why hadn’t she been allowed to play with them earlier? – Marvolo returned home and settled comfortably in an armchair in front of the fire to call Harry and ask him about his day. Getting an account of the reactions to the Prophet from his perspective would be a great ending to this day.

oooOOooo

With a weary sigh Severus sat down in his favoured chair in the staff room. It was time for the meeting Minerva had called. And Severus was pretty sure he knew was the topic would be.

“We need to decide where we stand in the matter of Albus.” Minerva stormed into the room, starting to speak the moment the door had closed behind her. “I fear the Board will try to remove him from the position of Headmaster on a more permanent basis.” She made a dramatic pause and sat down in the chair she always used, leaving Albus’ chair empty. “And as the Prophet has shown us this morning their chances are better than ever.”

And that started a discussion which probably would last for hours. Severus sat back in his chair watching the useless theories and plans be constructed and discarded one after the other. It would be a long evening.

Wednesday, 31st of January 1996

The school looked like a great place for children. Ann was pretty sure she would have loved to go to school here, each morning travelling to a magical place, learning all about the ways she was different from the other children in her neighbourhood, and returning back home to her family in the evening.

Sadly, this school where children from families with the knowledge of magic and those from families where they were the first magical person, had only been founded recently. Ann followed the man who had been waiting by the floo to greet her and to observe her conversation with the young boy. He had introduced himself as Mr. London, and seemed to be a Squib. She wasn’t sure what made her think that, but as she hadn’t seen a wand on him so far, she wasn’t about to disregard her instincts.

But puzzling about this helped her keep her nerves. She had started to work at the Ministry only a few months back, and this was the first time she was on her own on an assignment. And that on a high profile case like this.

“Here we are, Miss Lucas. The boy should join us shortly,” Mr. London said, walking over to a chair standing next to a half shelf filled with colourful books and a few wooden toys – figurines of dragons, unicorns, and other creatures – to sit down.
Ann looked around herself. They now were in a small room with a low table in the middle, surrounded with low chairs, toys for small children in a box at the side, the chair now occupied by Mr. London, and different pictures on the walls. All in all it was rather cosy, but not like any room Ann could remember from her own schools.

She settled down and prepared to wait for a while, when the door she had just closed behind herself was opened again, and a small boy hurried in, almost skipping. He was followed by a young witch – at least the robes over her dress indicated as much – who smiled at Ann. “I’ll wait outside, just tell me when you’re finished so I can escort Marcus back to his class. I assume Mr. London has informed you that he will stay to represent Marcus in this?”

Mr. London hadn’t, but Ann had been informed that a representative of the school would stay during their conversation. It seemed a little odd to her, the man’s presence might influence Marcus to say something just to please the man, or make him afraid to say the truth. On the other hand young children could refuse to speak to a stranger if no known person was there with them all.

“I have been informed of the process, thank you.” Ann smiled and turned to the boy who already had taken a seat and was getting out the paper and coloured pencils to work on some picture.

Ann walked over to sit down herself and tried to determine how best to start this. “Hello, Marcus, do you know who I am?”

A bright red pencil was moved over the paper in big circles. “A witch from the Ministry. The others say if I say the right things, you’ll let Marvolo adopt me.”

Ann furrowed her brow. Who had said something so… wrong to the boy? If he said the right things? Before she could ask another question, Marcus continued to speak, not looking at her. “But Marvolo said, not to worry. We’re family, it might take some time, but we’ll be living together.”

Letting the comment about others and their claim he needed to say the right things go for the moment, Ann asked her next question. “So you would like to live with Lord Slytherin?”

At this Marcus looked up with a big grin on his face and nodded with enthusiasm. “Very much!”

“Have you met him often?”

“He comes to the school when he can. We have cleaned out –” A cold shiver ran down Ann’s spine the moment the boy suddenly hissed in the middle of his sentence.

Was that Parseltongue?

If it was, there clearly was no question that this boy belonged to the Slytherin family. And judging by the way he happily prattled on about what he had experienced with Lord Slytherin and the man’s familiar, and even the boy-who-lived, Marcus knew the family quite well already and looked forward to living with them.

Ann kept to her script, asking all the questions required of her, and noting down all the answers. After the boy hissed a few more times during that, seemingly always when he spoke about a snake that was living at the school in the science classroom, Ann was too happy to leave again.

Her report would be in favour of the adoption, but she was pretty certain she never would feel comfortable around people able to speak that language.

It was unnatural somehow.
Staunchly ignoring the hypocrisy of someone able to cast spells calling something else unnatural, Ann followed Mr. London back to the floo from where she gladly departed for the Ministry of Magic. She had forms to fill out and another visit to the school to prepare. There was a lot of work to do, now that the process for adoptions had been reworked by the Wizengamot.

ooOoo

Harry had gotten a letter from the Ministry in the morning post. The haughty owl delivering it had left without accepting the piece of bacon Harry had offered her. The letter had been written on low-quality parchment, like many official letters from the Ministry which weren’t from a department head. It had announced the arrival of a case worker from the Ministry in the adoption process of Marcus Everard, who wanted to ask Harry a few questions.

Another letter, this one from Madame Longbottom, had announced that she would stand in for his guardian during this interview, as Lord Slytherin couldn’t do it himself this time.

Both letters had said that they would meet with him after lessons, and that the meeting would take place in the Headmaster’s office.

When he had told this to his friends, all of them – Gryffindors as well as Slytherins – had voiced their concern over the fact that all the portraits of former headmasters and headmistresses would be able to listen in. The reasons they thought that bad had differed, but that wasn’t really anything new.

Harry had had to concede that it wasn’t really what he would prefer for such a meeting, but as he couldn’t really say anything that couldn’t be said in public anyway – he wanted them to be able to adopt Marcus into their family – the fact that he didn’t see any way to change the meeting place wasn’t really a problem. With that many witnesses, it might even be better, because no one could claim he had said things that he hadn’t.

At the moment Harry was on his way up to the circular office, hoping that someone would open the door for him, as he didn’t know what Professor McGonagall used as her password.

“There you are, Henry!” Madame Longbottom smiled at him. Harry noticed that she had left the hat with the stuffed vulture at home, opting for a less extravagant dark red pointed hat instead.

“I had wondered how I would get into the office,” Harry said, feeling relieved that at least that little problem had resolved itself.

“There’s no reason to be nervous. The questions will be easy, and there are no wrong answers. Stick to the truth and all will be well.” Madame Longbottom patted him on the shoulder in an attempt to calm him down, smiling.

While they took the last steps to the gargoyle, Harry thought to himself that there were a lot of wrong answers he could give. He needed to be careful, really careful. One wrong step, pretending too hard, or letting something slip that shouldn’t be known could ruin so much more than their chance to adopt Marcus and give him a good home.

On top of the revolving stairs, just before Madame Longbottom could knock to announce their presence, Harry took a deep breath and started to clear his mind. The border between Marvolo and the Dark Lord was clear enough. If he kept his wits about him, he should be able to tell only those things belonging to Marvolo, the man who had worked hard to be a good father.

“Ah, there you are, Mr. Slytherin, Augusta. Come in and sit down.” Professor McGonagall greeted them briskly from behind the desk. Harry realised that she didn’t seem to happy, and remembered that she was close to Dumbledore and had fought against Voldemort before that night.

The room hadn’t changed much since Harry had been here last. There were three chairs in the room before the desk where normally only two stood, facing the desk, but they fit perfectly into the eccentric style Headmaster Dumbledore favoured. The number of people present was another difference. There was an Auror present – recognizable because of the robes – and the woman who had also been there at his own adoption, then there were Professor McGonagall, Madame Longbottom, and Harry himself.

It was rather crowded in here.

“Hello, Harry, please have a seat. Not sure if you remember me. I’m Amanda Wisby, and I’m here to ask you a few questions.” She smiled in a friendly manner, and Harry remembered the cluttered office he had seen the day he had been adopted. If he could have, he would have sent to himself a message that day that everything would work out all right. On the other hand, if someone had handed him a piece of parchment claiming just that on his way up to the office of Mrs. Wisby, he would probably have felt more apprehension.

“It’s nice to see you again, Mrs. Wisby,” Harry returned the greeting, and sat down, ignoring the Auror, following the lead of the others on that one. With great concentration, Harry managed not to fidget or blurt out a question of his own.

Hopefully this wouldn’t take long.

“I guess you’re aware that your father has applied to adopt another child?” Mrs. Wisby had sat down in another chair directly opposite Harry’s, a smile on her face and writing implements in her hand.

Harry nodded, trying for a polite, interested, but calm expression. “I was there when we learned that he’s a Parselmouth just like us. So, yes, I know.”

The auror shifted from one foot to the other, radiating unease, but Harry tried his best to ignore the man.

“And what do you think of adding a young boy to your young family?” Her question sounded a little obvious. But maybe that was intentional. Why should she try to trick him, anyway?

“I’ve been the one to bring it up. I’m not sure, but I guess father was a little surprised. He thought for a long time that he was the last of Slytherin’s line. The possibility that the talent might go dormant in Squib lines for several generations hadn’t really been among the things he had considered.”

“You haven’t been Lord Slytherin’s son for all that long. How do you feel about the situation?” Mrs. Wisby wanted to know, making Harry wish he could roll his eyes. The group of questions if Harry was happy with the prospect of a younger brother seemed to be finished. Dismissing his wonder over the number of possible questions she would ask if he had stayed vague with his answers, Harry deliberately waited a moment, pretending to think hard. “It wasn’t easy at first. But I think we’ve both learned a lot, and now it’s really good.” And it was. It wasn’t perfect, but expecting perfection was a sure way to never being happy. And Harry was determined to find happiness in his life.
“I’m sure it is.” Mrs. Wisby smiled kindly. “But I’m sure there have been reasons for you to disagree with him. I’ve never heard of a teenager always happy with the decisions of their parents.”

That almost certainly was a trick question. Albeit one easy to spot. If he claimed that there never had been any disagreement, it would look suspicious, as if he were trying to hide something. “Not many. At first I wasn’t happy that he insisted I carry an emergency portkey with a location charm on it all times. I even once took it off and left it behind somewhere in the garden. But after the Dementors attacked, I saw the value of having a way to escape on hand. I wasn’t happy that he made me take an adult along on Hogsmeade weekends while the Death Eaters who escaped from Azkaban were on the run...” Harry trailed off, shrugging. Maybe if he hadn’t known danger so well first-hand, and hadn't been a little happy to have someone actually care, he would have been inclined to go against those rules. But he did know danger intimately, and enjoyed being cared for despite himself.

“So he's never had reason to punish you?” Mrs. Wisby still smiled with unparalleled kindness, and Harry started to suspect that it might be a mask after all. But he could be wrong. Seeing plots where there were none was a real danger.

“When I left the portkey behind, he made me answer a kind of quiz.” Harry chuckled, remembering the outlandish questions and answer possibilities that had been in that quiz. "One with several possible answers given per question. It was fun in a way.” While Harry thought back, searching for more situations in which he had been punished, it was silent in the room, only the fire making any sound. “I guess that was the only time,” Harry finally said, astonished. Had it really been just that one time? “Maybe… he always explains why something is the way it is, or why I can’t do something… The Dursleys never did.” Harry shrugged again. “I guess it helps that he’s so different, and knows a bit about how it is, growing up without parents.”

Harry would have liked to say more, really praise what Marvolo had done that Dumbledore never did, or the Dursleys, or any other adult in the past. But he knew he couldn’t do that and hope to keep the problems with his aunt and uncle from the public.

Marvolo's exposing his past had been a good move politically. Harry wasn’t in need of that kind of publicity. So he preferred not to expose his past.

Mrs. Wisby asked more questions, all of them clearly intended to get a feeling for Marvolo’s competence as a parent. What they ate for meals. Who prepared them. And other things like that.

Harry told about Flimm, who was handling all the housework and was really good with preparing food. The fact that Marvolo made sure that Harry saw a Healer, and how they had studied together during the summer.

It was relatively easy to gloss over things like the fact that the healer had broken several of Harry’s bones, or leave out how Marvolo had made an unbreakable vow not to harm or kill Harry. Instead he concentrated on small friendly, but largely insignificant, anecdotes. Buying clothes, visiting the Potter mill, making Harry drop Divination.

At the end of it all, he felt drained and quickly walked towards the dungeons once he had said his farewells to Neville’s gran and the Ministry workers. Not bothering to remember the current password to the common room, Harry hissed the simple Parseltongue password at the door and stepped in.

Most of the others seemed to be still up eating dinner, but Theo got up from one of the love seats by the fireplace the moment he spotted Harry. “How did it go?”
Harry smiled, rubbing his hand over his eyes. “I think it went well. Mrs. Wisby was there to ask the questions. Not sure why there was an auror present as well. But she clearly is in favour of simply placing kids into families with the same kind of magical talent.” Shrugging again – he was doing that rather often today – Harry let himself fall into the armchair he used most of the time, facing towards his friend. “Maybe the Auror was supposed to ask questions as well, but it looked as if he hadn’t been prepared to do so. Anyway, Madame Longbottom had no reason to interfere, and the portraits kept silent. But they seem to pretend to sleep most of the time anyway.”

Theo smiled. “Can you imagine that I haven’t been up to the Headmaster’s office even once so far?
What do I need to do to get invited up there? Smuggle a dangerous beast into the school and rescue a few first-years?”

“Don’t be silly,” Harry chided. “It’s a circular office with the walls filled with portraits of stuffy, old, sleeping people. Hardly worth the trouble. Believe me.”

Theo nodded with a clearly exaggerated solemn expression. “I’ll have to take your word for it.” For a moment they sat in silence, slumped down into their respective seats. “What do you think, go to the kitchens for some dinner?”

“Sounds like a plan,” Harry agreed and stood from his place. If he skipped dinner, he wouldn’t sleep well. His talk with Marvolo and Sirius could wait until later.

Talking about their current Herbology assignment, Theo and Harry made their way to the kitchens, where they were served delicious food by the eager-to-please elves.

oooOoooo

A sleeping Nagini weighing down his legs, Marvolo sat on his bed in his bedroom at Griffin House, casting a new log into the fire – using a levitation charm of course – so the room would stay warm until morning. Nagini did like the warmth, and Marvolo certainly had no objections to staying warm during the night. If he got cold in his sleep, he was likely to have nightmares. He hadn’t asked Mrs. Goyle, but suspected that it was linked to the many nights he had spent shivering in the cold of his room at Wool’s.

But right now he felt warm and content. His familiar was curled up on top of him and most of his bed, he had eaten a good dinner, and he had a book close at hand that he would read before going to sleep, after he had spoken with his son.

Marvolo hissed to the mirror in his hand, settling a little deeper into the cushions stacked behind his back.

The mirror flickered and the reflective surface was replaced with the face of a tired Harry. The boy yawned and mumbled. “Oh, hello, Father. How late is it?”

“Not all that late. Did I wake you?” Was Harry getting a cold? Why would he sleep so early? The clearly more-tangled-than-usual state of that impossible hair indicated that Harry really had already been asleep.

Harry nodded. “Was a hard day.” He yawned again, placing his hand over his wide-open mouth just in time not to grant Marvolo a straight look down his gullet. “The visit from Mrs. Wisby on top of all the homework was a bit much today.”
Marvolo nodded. His own memories of OWL year told basically the same story. Much too much homework, tests and quizzes, lots of revision, and a flourishing black market for stimulating and relaxing substances. Or what people tried to pass off for them, anyway. “How did it go?”

Harry moved – probably sitting up – and rubbed a hand over his hair, musing it even more. “I think it went well. Mrs. Wisby clearly wants the adoption to go through. She was really happy that you were adopting me back in the summer, wasn’t she? And the Auror who was with her, didn’t say a word.” The boy shrugged, his green eyes unfocused in his clear exhaustion.

Marvolo hummed. “As far as I heard, the Auror had to jump in on rather short notice, because the one who was assigned the task had been called to another urgent task.” He wasn’t all that sure it had been the best idea, but as the process was so new, it was likely that no one would question the missing questions of the Auror.

“Did you have a hand in that?” Harry suddenly seemed a lot more alert, eyes narrowed a little in suspicion.

Shaking his head, and laughing in approval, Marvolo denied that accusation. “No. I didn’t order any of that. But there was a case of fraud in Diagon Alley today. Someone tried to pass off horse dung as dragon dung to an apothecary. It looked as if a duel would break out. Not something anyone should risk in the middle of an apothecary, believe me. One of mine saw the opportunity, and asked for the Auror assigned to come question you as a partner for that situation. As they usually work together, someone else needed to take over the assignment at Hogwarts with you today.” Marvolo shrugged. “I think it was a good idea to use the opportunity.”

Now Harry hummed, and then shrugged. “I guess it would have taken longer if the Auror had asked question of his own. So there’s that. I have no idea how I will survive all the homework.”

Accepting the change in topic, Marvolo asked for the details of Harry’s lessons and where he had trouble. They kept the call short, as Harry really was rather tired and needed to sleep, and Marvolo was looking forward to reading in the comfort of his bed. The book he had found was a collection of wizarding fairy tales from India, only English translations, but interesting nonetheless.

Thursday, 1st of February 1996

Someone had be-spelled a harp to play soft music in the background. Only the fact that most students were not really awake just yet made it possible to hear it with so many people present.

Nawel was cutting up a few apples to go with her poached egg and bread roll, her sister clutching a cup of black coffee in her hands, sitting next to her, when the letters came in. Some of the students who had been to Hogwarts last year – well, the last school year at least – had told those that had stayed in France in whispers of horror that the owls carrying the post actually had access to the hall where everyone was eating. Bringing in water when it was raining, leaving feathers in the food, and generally tracking dirt on to the tables during breakfast.

Nawel was really happy that the whole thing with letters was organised differently here. Owls would leave their burdens in a room designed for that purpose and the elves would deliver the post.
after they had checked it for dangers such as curses or poison. Not that there had been a reason that the security had been necessary in the recent past. But that was the way it was done here.

Besides a few packets – sweets and the like from parents and other relatives – magazines, and newspapers, the letters were distributed. While the girls from their dorm, sitting at the same table, quickly bent over a magazine for young witches, Nawel turned the letter that had been placed between her and her sister in her hands so she could read the address.

She hadn’t seen the handwriting before, but the fact that it wasn’t one she recognized let her hope that it could be a letter from their father.

“Enora! Wake up! We have a letter!” Nawel poked her sister with a finger until she turned with a right glower to glare at her sister. If Enora had been a cat, her fur would have been standing on end, her fangs would be bared, and a hiss would surely disrupt the lovely harp music.

“Don’t be that way! I think it’s from... Sirius.” Nawel managed just in time to switch to using their probable father’s given name. They had agreed to not talk about their possible father until they knew for sure. Some of their classmates were terrible gossips and it could get annoying pretty fast if they got hold of that chance, that possibility in their lives.

“A letter?” Enora still wasn’t awake and wouldn’t be until she had finished her coffee.

“Yes, a letter.” Nawel rolled her eyes, and shook her head at her sister. Taking an unused knife from the table, she broke the seal and opened the letter. The letter was pretty long, at least two pages, if they weren’t used on both sides. And the letter was written in English as a quick, first look confirmed.

Lucky for them their mother had insisted that they learn English as a foreign language spoken in many parts of the world, additionally to the Latin and ancient Greek that was offered at Beauxbatons, and taken by most students for at least a few years.

While the level of noise around them slowly rose with the increased alertness of the students, Nawel held the letter reading, while her sister rested her chin on her shoulder, reading the letter at the same time.

Dear Enora Libra and Nawel Lyra,

I hope you’ll take the time to read my letter. As I never learned any French, and translation spells tend to erase the finer details of the written word, not that I would claim to have much talent with expressing myself in any clear way, I have decided to write in English, hoping that you’ll be able to read it, either because you’re more clever than me and actually know more than one language, or are able to find a much better translation spell, or even someone to translate this for you.

Your mother and I have spoken, and she gave me permission to write to you. If you would like to answer me, either in a letter together or in two separate ones, I would be really happy. Knowing that I have been a father all those years, unintentionally ignoring your existence weighs heavily on my mind.

I know I can’t expect you to give me a chance, but I still hope that I will get one.

As I’m not sure what to write you, and don’t want to bore you to death with some old stories, asked my godson for advice. Before I follow that advice, I would like to ask which name the both of you prefer to be called. The fact that your mother unknowingly continued with an old family tradition by naming you after constellations was a surprise. Maybe she did so because she remembered my name? I guess I’ll have to ask her about that.

You know that she’s scary, don’t you?

Anyway.

Before I descend even more into rambling, let me tell you a bit about how I’m trying to become a respectable adult now that I’m out of prison.

And he proceeded to do just that. His penmanship, terrible in places, filled all the pages without leaving much room, detailing his current actions to bring order back into the estate he had inherited, alluding to some events in the past, he asked them to inquire about anything they truly wanted to know. He also mentioned his godson a few times, as well as other people he would like them to meet – cousins of his, mostly – and places he wanted to show them.

Nawel felt he was almost trying too hard. But even thinking about what she would want to write in an answering letter, she felt a nervousness rising that might make her write an equally rambling letter in return.

“Think he sent that without reading it again because he feared to lose the nerve?” Enora asked, all sleepiness gone from her voice.

“Maybe,” Nawel answered distractedly, turning the last page to reveal the last sentences of the letter from their father.

As I now have managed to be a self-centred git for too many pages, I would like to ask you to write to me, tell me what your favourite subjects are. Do you like Quidditch? What do you want to know about me? Your mother said we could meet in your spring holidays, and I think one property belonging to our family might be a great meeting place. It’s a small home near the place where the Seine meets the Channel. You both wouldn’t need to travel far to get there, and we could all get to know each other better.

In the hope that you’ll grant me the favour of a chance to get to know you your father,

Lord Sirius Orion Black

That sounded as if Sirius Black truly wished to get to know them.

“We need to start eating, Nawel, or we’ll starve till lunchtime. Let’s read the letter again in the evening.”

Nawel reluctantly nodded, and placed the letter back in its envelope. She felt hopeful. If the man had been a stuffy Lord, he would have made sure to send a composed, polite, and interested-sounding letter. Not this unplanned, rambling letter more fitting for a boy their age.

She planned to write a letter back that was at least that long.

Chapter End Notes

This concludes the month of January. I fear writing a chapter stretching more than a few days is not my strengths :D

Thanks to Jordre and Jake for helping to improve my spelling!

First published on the 31st of August 2018
Next chapter planned for 14th of September 2018

last edited 31st of August 2018
Because I have something to write that has a set deadline, I'll have to postpone the next chapter after this (which is number 84) for longer than two weeks. The next planned update for this story is the 19th of October 2018. This hopefully will free my mind so I can concentrate fully on the other project. If I get that one done quicker, I'll return to writing chapter 84 and may be publishing that sooner, returning to usual update schedule after that.

Please don't be disappointed ;) and now have fun with the current chapter!

"Father said that OWL year is hard, but I never thought it would be this hard!" Daphne slumped down into her seat, dropping her quill to her parchment, a scowl of frustration on her face.

The whole group of fifth-year Slytherins was sitting around one of the bigger tables in the common room, working on various homework assignments or revision. Something, Harry had noticed, they did more and more. Between classes, meals, the Defence Club, and Quidditch training, there wasn't much else but studying.

Just yesterday evening Marvolo had laughed when Harry had complained over the workload. But then he had commiserated because he himself was preparing to take several OWLs and the transfiguration NEWT during the testing period in late spring. Dumbledore's move to get Marvolo's records wiped had proven to be an annoyance.

"I think we all can use a break!" Draco declared, setting his own quill down before capping his inkwell. Murmured agreement, the rustling of parchment rolling up, the sound of books being closed, and a few relieved groans echoed around the table.

Harry slid a piece of parchment he had used to practice drawing runes into the herbology text he had been reading, closed the book, and slid back onto the loveseat until he could rest his head on the backrest, rubbing his nose. All this studying was going to kill him. Harry idly wondered how bad it had to be for Ron staying around Hermione all the time.

"Do any of you have plans on whom to take on the next Hogsmeade weekend?" Pansy wanted to know, bringing back up one of her favourite topics of the last weeks. Theo rolled his eyes behind Pansy's back and Harry stifled the giggle that wanted to break loose. Especially the boys in their group were unhappy about Pansy's persistence with the topic.

"I'm only sure that Hermione and that Weasley boy won't go together." Theo remarked, neatly sidestepping the question Pansy had asked in many variations by now. The public rejection of Ron's question by Hermione had been the talk of the school for a few days. A good reason to ask such a question in a more private setting.

Harry himself hadn't yet managed to ask Luna if she wanted to go with him. It truly wasn't an easy task to find the time and the right words to ask.

"Do you remember the farce that oblivious idiot Lockhart made of Valentine's day? Those dwarves?" one sixth-year who had been walking by suddenly asked into the room, drawing the attention of almost everyone present.

"Dwarves?" little Tabitha Smith asked, abandoning her game of chess to turn in her place on one of the rugs in front of a fireplace.

Septimus Yaxley laughed, turning carefully so as not to disturb his boyfriend, who was resting with his head in Septimus' lap, reading in Quidditch through the Ages. "He had the whole castle decorated with hearts in different shades of pink. And he had paid a bunch of dwarves to dress up as cupids, and carry singing messages to students and teachers alike."

Harry wondered which professor had received one of those singing valentines – excluding Lockhart of course – and didn't notice the slight smirk on Draco's face as he started to add his own little titbit of information for the younger students.

"I remember that there were quite a few horrible examples among the valentines. A few people would have been better severed if they hadn't written their messages themselves." The moment Draco turned to catch Harry's eye the green-eyed teen felt himself flush. Please no! "Did you ever learn who compared the colour of your eyes to that of a pickled toad?"

Harry groaned and wished he could have just vanished under the table or his cloak. "Don't be such a prat!" Draco sniggered. "I didn't know any professors beside that blond fraud got any valentines."

"I heard that Professor Trelawney got a few. But I think that was on a dare," Millicent answered Harry's not-really-asked question, starting a recounting of different slightly horrifying retellings of dwarves barging into classrooms, waylaying people in the halls – in one case sitting on the person they had a message for – and singing terrible poetry in off key voices.

It was a much-needed and much-appreciated break in the ongoing study frenzy.

It was the second time that Lucius was on his way to the Hogshead. Or rather the second time he went there after he had graduated from Hogwarts. It had been a bit of a game among the students of his time to go there and order some hard spirits. To this day he wasn't sure if Aberforth Dumbledore – not really noticeably younger back then – had given them stuff because he didn't really care or because he deliberately tried to get them in trouble.

Anyway. Since he had been old enough to be beyond such silly games he hadn't purposefully sought out the lacklustre establishment. That is, until the Board had sent him as their owl to deliver the warning to Albus Dumbledore.

Now the time was up, and they hadn't received a letter of resignation of the former Headmaster of Hogwarts.

And so it was that Lucius Malfoy, Lord and Head of House of his family, was walking through the cold February weather, crushing old snow under his boot's heels, once again playing owl.

Not that he really minded this duty all that much.

Getting to fire the old meddler was something he had tried more than once in the past. But this time his charges were so much better, he was certain that there was nothing the old man could do to dodge this spell as he had dodged so many others.

Once again the owner of the pub greeted him and gruffly led him into the private rooms. "Albus, a visitor for you."

Lucius stepped in, steeling his mental shields and reminding himself not to meet the eyes of the old man. The tendency of a Legilimens to take a peek was dangerous, especially if the one in question was of questionable sanity. "Good day, Mr. Dumbledore," Lucius greeted the old man sitting in an armchair, a book in his lap. It felt good to deny the wizard any kind of title. He waited a moment for a reply, but he wasn't really sure the old man had heard him until he closed his book and raised his head.

The odd thought that the once so powerful wizard seemed incredibly old struck Lucius where he stood in the doorway to the modest living room. Well, modest if he was generous.

"I had wondered when one of you would show up."

Getting the official parchment out of the expanded pocket of his warm fur-lined winter cloak, Lucius prepared for his little speech. "Albus Percival Wulfric Brian Dumbledore, as a representative of the Board of Governors for Hogwarts School of Witchcraft and Wizardry, I, Lucius Abraxas Malfoy, am here to inform you that you are permanently removed from the position of Headmaster. This decision was made after due consideration based on the declining health and lack of judgement on part of the former Headmaster observed in the last months."

Lucius spoke with the practiced ease he always displayed on such occasions – he practiced such speeches before he had to give them – but felt slightly disappointed by the fact that the old man wasn't reacting as Lucius had thought he would.

"Have you any counter-arguments to make?"

The long white beard moved slightly with the shaking of the old wizard's head. "No, that's quite all right, Lucius, my boy."

Only long practice in not showing his thoughts to those watching kept Lucius from gasping at that calmly presented proclamation. "I'm not yet sure where I stepped away from my path. Or when. But these last days have shown me that I might be in more need of help than I would have thought when you last were here." A wave from the old hand sent a letter over to Lucius, where it hovered effortlessly. "Am I right to assume that you'll go to the school after your visit here?"

Lucius gave a terse nod. This wasn't going even remotely like he had envisioned it. "Then might I impose on your time by asking you to take a letter to Minerva? She'll be offered the position of Headmistress, won't she?"

Lucius nodded again, getting his wand out of his cane, casting a series of strong detection charms at the letter. Only when each of them had come up clean, not detecting any potions, mundane poisons, curses, or charms on it, did he take it with his gloved hand. "She'll be offered the position." Lucius wasn't really happy with that, but his old Transfiguration professor had always been a stern and capable witch.

The sad, sage smile was almost too much for Lucius to tolerate. "Thank you for making the effort to deliver the letter in person, my boy. All the best for you and your family, should we not meet again."

Some time later, a confused Lucius strode through the early evening up towards the gates of Hogwarts. That had been a strange visit. He had expected a lot more resistance, but maybe he should be happy that the worst scenarios that had been brought up hadn't come to pass. Duelling the wizard who had defeated Grindelwald on his own – as weakened as he might have been – wasn't really something he had wished to do this day.

Now to see if Minerva McGonagall would be willing to take over the position of Headmistress of Hogwarts. If she declined, a long discussion would follow. Too many candidates had been offered up for the Board to be able to decide on one single candidate anytime soon.

Saturday, 3th of February 1996

After another letter, Amelia Bones and Marvolo had arranged a date and place to meet. And so here he was in a set of his best casual robes – wool with subtle embroidery along the edges – over a suit from equally expensive material but of a muggle style, walking down Diagon Alley towards the small high-end restaurant they had agreed upon.

Marvolo had tried to get a feeling for why the Head of the Department of Magical Law Enforcement wanted to meet with him. And why she had used her private stationary and not the official one. But it hadn't worked. She simply had ignored the subtle hints he had added throughout the letter in an attempt to get more information.

And because of that fact, Marvolo felt a little apprehensive about the meeting that was to be happening in a few moments. The question why she wanted to meet with him – here – just wouldn't let him rest.

All the cues given – the stationary, the meeting place – pointed to a private reason for the meeting, but for the love of the gods Marvolo had no idea why Amelia Bones would want to meet with him privately. Different reasons had come up in his thoughts running in circles, whenever he hadn't been distracted by the endless administrative tasks required to pursue his political goals, training, research, or talks with his son. The most plausible of the lot was that maybe she was aiming to get a marriage contract set up between her niece – a girl in Hufflepuff and Harry's year as far as he knew – and Harry.

But despite it being the most plausible idea, it didn't really feel right either. Why should Madame Bones, who had lost family to the Death Eaters, want to tie her niece to the heir of Slytherin? It just seemed so unlikely.

When Marvolo stepped into the restaurant, he didn't need to give his name, or ask for Madame Bones. The moment the owner – or at least the witch currently minding the entrance – spotted him, he was greeted with a warm smile. "Lord Slytherin! Welcome to the Floating Candle. Madame Bones is already here and waiting. If you would follow me, please."

And so Marvolo did, getting an impression of the food served here when they walked past the alcoves set into the walls where he could smell what had been served at the respective tables. From the fragrant curries inspired by Indian dishes to more classically English dishes, a range of options was being offered.

Speculations over the possibility of getting a chocolate-heavy desert vanished from Marvolo's mind the moment he followed the witch in her dark blue, silken robes into an alcove where Madame Bones was waiting for him, idly browsing the menu.

"I'll be back to get your orders in a moment." And with a small courtesy, the witch was gone. It seemed she had perfected the move, maybe taking inspiration from a house elf.
"Madame Bones," Marvolo greeted with a bow in the woman's direction, feeling a little awkward. Another instance he had to confront feelings he wasn't used to. Normally he knew what he wanted out of a meeting, or knew a probable reason that another wanted to meet him. Going into a meeting with someone as influential as this woman practically blind wasn't something he did enjoy.

At all.

In the past he always had declined meetings where he either didn't know what he wanted, or what the other wanted. But this time something was different. A mix of his wish to be part of society, his need to appear agreeable, some weird sense of obligation he couldn't place, and simply his curiosity had compelled him to agree to the meeting.

"Lord Slytherin, please take a seat." Madame Bones waved towards the richly upholstered armchair across the table from her. "I can recommend the roast, but the curry is really good as well."

Marvolo sat down in the armchair, smoothing down his robes so they wouldn't impede his movement, and using the opportunity to take in Madame Bones. She had selected casual clothes, going for good quality and a more modern style, just as Marvolo had. Her posture belied a little tension, but more of the kind indicating nerves and not the tension usually hinting at someone being ready to fight at a moments notice.

"Is the chef known to make good recommendations? I might just leave the fate of my meal in his hands." Marvolo picked up the topic of meal selection that Madame Bones had selected as their starting point. An obvious choice for a meeting held in a restaurant, which didn't make it any easier for Marvolo to get a feel for what would be the real topic of this meeting.

"I usually take the roast with vegetables matching the season when I'm here. So I sadly have to say that I don't know if the recommendations from the kitchen are usually well received by the guests." Madame Bones' smile was easy, polite, and maybe a tad warmer than her usual professional smile.

"Well, maybe I'll take a risk and ask for a recommendation then," Marvolo decided. Not having to search the menu would give him more time to analyse his companion's behaviour. "Do you come here often?"

"Not really, no. From time to time, but there isn't a reason to eat out all that often."

Sighing in his head, Marvolo realised that Madame Bones, for all that she hadn't been a Slytherin during school, wasn't going to let him simmer over a small flame. In an attempt to fill the time until she would tell him why she had wanted to meet with him with something more interesting than the usual stock of small talk – the weather, the food, and Quidditch results – Marvolo seized their one mostly neutral common ground. "How does your niece like the current professor for Defence Against the Dark Arts?"

"Susan wrote that she fears Professor Slinkhard has a much too theory-centred lesson plan. Especially in her OWL year she would love to practice more. But judging by what she wrote, Professor Slinkhard is an improvement over Dolores Umbridge." Something dark entered the eyes of the witch across from Marvolo.

He ignored it even as he was fascinated and wanted to see if he might be able to fan that darkness into something more, instead he nodded knowingly. "Harry has voiced many of the same concerns, and the same approval. I think his exact words were: At least he lets us ask questions."

It was easy to fill the time with talk about their own experiences with their OWLs and the respective reports they had received from the children in their care about the Defence classes since they had come to Hogwarts, and especially this year. Marvolo felt as if he was dancing at the edge of a volcano. There were some topics he needed the discussion to stay away from, but he couldn't be obvious about it.

It was fun, if a little frustrating, because he really wanted to know what Madame Bones wanted to talk about.

When their food and wines had been brought to their table – levitated by a young wizard – Madame Bones fixed Marvolo with her gaze. "Do you have any objections to raising some privacy charms?"

"None," Marvolo said, picking up his glass of red wine, swirling it around to get a whiff of the scent. It seemed the verbal fencing and evasion of dangerous topics was over.

She got her wand out and set up a flurry of different privacy spells – including one to prevent people from reading their lips – with efficient wand movements speaking of extensive practice. Marvolo sat back, watched her spellwork looking for possible weaknesses, and sipped his wine, which truly was excellent and would work quite well with his lamb roast and the side dish of various root vegetables baked in a sauce of cream and excellent spices. The fragrant smells were mouth-watering.

Once Madame Bones was finished with her casting, she put her wand away and picked up her knife and fork to take the first bite of her curry with rice. "I know that I was rather evasive regarding the reason I wanted to talk with you, Lord Slytherin." She began to talk, rolling her eyes and smirking when Marvolo hummed in confirmation of her admission. She truly had made him wait.

She took another bite and after she had chewed – certainly longer than was necessary, it seemed she was trying to kill him – and swallowed her bite, she took a fortifying breath.

What could be so nerve-wracking that she had true trouble talking to him about it?

"During the Yule season I happened to be nearby when you, Lord Slytherin, were speaking to a few of your… acquaintances. Maybe I should have moved on, or made my presence known, but I stopped to listen."

Marvolo's mind was racing. Had he been careless enough to have talked about delicate matters where others could have heard? Where Madame Bones had listened in?

But no.

That made no sense.

If she had heard him talk about something truly incriminating, they wouldn't have met here. In private. She would have had him arrested. Weeks ago.

Despite the fact that Marvolo had concluded that whatever she had overheard, it hadn't been related to any of his less legal activities, Marvolo's heart was racing with the adrenaline of fear of discovery. He hadn't felt this way since the first few times he had sneaked a book in the restricted section of the Hogwarts library that he hadn't had explicit permission to read.

It was exhilarating!

"That's the way I learned that you think of yourself as asexual and feel the pressure of society to see a young wizard married and with a few children." She stubbornly was holding his gaze, not looking away but blushing in embarrassment.
Marvolo blinked in shock. That was not what he had thought might happen. This possible line of conversation hadn't even crossed his mind once. Madame Bones offering him a position as Auror had been among the ideas his mind had supplied, but his lack of interest in sexual acts never had come to mind. Maybe he needed to remember himself how much importance the different kinds of human relationships he had always regarded as a weakness had to others.

Before Marvolo could think on his obvious obliviousness in regards to human attachments and their importance in the eyes of others, Madame Bones got even more uneasy and ploughed on with her confession. "I know that it would have been proper to walk on, or make my presence known.
But I couldn't make myself miss the opportunity to listen in on what looked like it was a private conversation… I want to apologize that I…"

Marvolo held up one hand to stop her and the unnecessary apology. "Please, Madame Bones. There is no need to apologise. Luckily I no longer suffer under curse-induced paranoia, but I was a Slytherin in school. And am Lord Slytherin now. If I had felt the need to keep this private and a secret I would have set up wards. Or, more likely, never spoken at such an event where others might be near enough to overhear."

She had asked him to meet her because she wanted to confess that she had eavesdropped on one of his more private conversations?

That didn't make much more sense than any other ideas either.

Her smile was wry. "Maybe I don't need to apologise then, but that's not the main reason I asked for a personal meeting away from the curious eyes of the Ministry." Their food stood before them largely ignored, but Marvolo didn't care, the conversation was much more entertaining than the delicious smelling food. "I also wanted to offer you my support. Our society doesn't really acknowledge the existence of those not interested in… well, sex." Marvolo felt a small smirk tug at his mouth over the blunt nature of the witch even as he had trouble guessing what exactly she was offering.

"I know how hard a time most have envisioning even the possibility of someone not interested in any sexual acts. I guess it's such an integral part of most people's lives that it's easier to accept that the interest might be aimed at someone other than they would feel attracted to than missing altogether." She took a deep breath and seemed to gather herself. "What I'm trying to tell you, Lord Slytherin, was that it took a while before people accepted I wasn't going to marry. But even now the rumours say that I'm just am more interested in my career than in a family, or that my one true love was killed in the war."

Tilting his head to the side, Marvolo couldn't resist asking, "And who are they claiming was your one true love?" It was daring, considering that Death Eaters had killed people of the Bones family, but he was pretending only too gladly pretend to forget the past, and his own part in it.

"The names vary." Madame Bones waved the question away, literally, and gave him a searching look. "I thought about your tentative idea of finding someone for a marriage of convenience. Are you still following that plan?"

Taking a sip from his wine, Marvolo picked up his utensils, they should eat and not just talk.
Cutting into his roast he thought about her question. "I have not discarded the plan yet. But considering that I think our inclination isn't all that common and I can't see myself being happy with just anyone… I think it unlikely that I will find someone willing to marry me and be happy.
Added on top of that is the fact I'm older in experience than in looks, but in some ways considered younger than I am, father to a teenager and soon a child barely of school age. Managing everything is demanding enough. Others tell me a relationship is hard work if one wants it to work well."
Marvolo shrugged. "I'm not sure I have the energy left to invest in a relationship I can do without."

Conceding his point with a nod, Madame Bones picked up her knife and fork as well. "Nonetheless, my offer stands. If you need someone to talk to who has had some of the same experiences, I'm willing to lend my ear and give advice as well as I can."

The rest of their meal was once again spend in friendly banter and superficial conversations. Topics starting with the newest development of wand holster fashion – some versions were purely aesthetic and made drawing a wand even harder than keeping it in a simple pocket would be – to the differences in Hogwarts' curriculum of the present compared to both Madame Bones' and Marvolo's times, and not stopping as the Auror training program was brought up.

They took the wards down once they had finished their main course, and then ordered coffee and a dessert apiece.

Marvolo still was confused over why exactly Madame Bones had felt the need to offer him support by the time they parted ways and he returned home. Maybe Harry would be able to shed some light on this strange evening.

With the resolve in mind to ask his son if he could figure it out, Marvolo apparated back home.

If nothing else, this evening had managed to give him a few new things to ponder while distracting him effectively from his usual worries, currently mostly centred around the adoption and the slow progress on that front, as well as his stagnating search for a way to bind a soul piece to another container once he had removed it from the one he had originally stored it in.

Soon there would be another day suited to powerful rituals, and until then he had to have finished the next iteration of the ritual.

Deep in thought, Marvolo walked up the stairs, listening distractedly to Nagini prattling on about the rat she had hunted through the whole house.

ooOoo

On her way home Amelia thought back over the meeting she had had with Lord Slytherin. It had been strange. But when was anything involving Lord Slytherin not strange?

She wasn't really sure if her offer had been appreciated, but she felt better for offering her assistance. At first she had considered giving in to society's demands and help Lord Slytherin do the same.

But in the end, that wouldn't change anything.

So she had decided to help Lord Slytherin weather the storm that was society's expectations, and find his way to a way he could live.

She would support him in this, regardless of his choice. If he either found a partner for a marriage of convenience or went down the path she herself had chosen. She would help him and with a little luck he would be able to change the way society saw people like them. Just as he was currently changing the way their society saw werewolves.

Shaking her head at her own foolishness, Amelia apparated home and, once she had arrived there, started to walk towards her own room.

All these grand wishes to change what others thought about asexuals. It was a naive teenager's dream. One she had thought to have buried a long time ago. The only thing that really mattered was that she had offered her support and was determined to keep her word, should her support ever be needed.

Bent over his latest essay for Astronomy, Harry tried hard to concentrate. But it wasn't easy with a few first years playing exploding snap a few tables over.

He had tried to work in the library, but a few furiously studying Ravenclaws had laid claim to each of the tables. So he had come down to the common room. He supposed he could go into his own room to finish his homework – listing all the moons around the planets of the solar system – but sitting with his friends was better and worth the distraction caused by the loud noises of the explosive card game.

"I can't work here with this racket in the background!" Pansy exclaimed, jumped up from the cushion she had placed on the floor, and stormed over to the group of first-years.

"Poor little sods," Theo whispered as they all had to listen to Pansy sending the younger students packing.

Before Pansy had made her way back to their table, and before the first-years had packed all their stuff and left for their dorm, Harry felt the mirror vibrating. With a nod to his friends he stood and answered the mirror, walking over to one of the cosy corners to have a little more privacy.

.:Father. The meeting with Madame Bones is already over?:. Marvolo nodded, sitting in front of a bookcase, probably in his office at Griffin House. .:It was surprising. And short. Not one of my theories was even close to the truth:. Harry felt a tension leaving his shoulders he hadn't even known had been there. So the theory with the engagement hadn't been true either. What a relief.

.:So what was the reason she wanted to meet you?:. Just this morning Marvolo had contacted Harry to get his opinion about a possible engagement contract and other possible scenarios, and since then Harry had sat on pins and needles. Marvolo's reassurance that she had asked for a meeting in a private setting and not in her capacity as Head of Magical Law Enforcement hadn't really helped matters.

.:I think she just wanted to offer me moral support:. Marvolo hissed with surprise clearly written on his face.

.:Moral support?:. Harry answered, surprised at how well sarcasm translated into Parseltongue.

Marvolo laughed and started to recount the meeting while Harry listened attentively.

Sunday, 4th of February 1996

The usual din filled the Great Hall, and the moment the food appeared on the serving plates the big room filled with delicious smells. Only listening with half an ear, Harry picked his favourites – roasted carrots, mashed potatoes, and grilled chicken leg – and filled his plate to a reasonable amount. He would probably never be able to load his plate as high as Ron was wont to do, as a plate piled that way reminded him instantly of Dudley and his disgusting eating habits.

"That can't be!" a girl exclaimed somewhere not too far away, clearly to be heard over the general level of noise. Harry tried to ignore the spreading unrest as a colourful magazine was handed around. By what Harry could catch of the cover, he suspected that it was the newest edition of Witch Weekly, which had been delivered this morning.

There weren't that many subscribers at the school – it was aimed more at adult witches like Ron's mother – but it seemed they once again had published something scandalous enough to stir true unrest.

Remembering the unfortunate article about Hermione and a supposed love-triangle, Harry decided to pay more attention. But that was no reason to abandon a perfectly fine dinner. Maybe whatever had been written would kill his appetite. He wasn't about to skip meals now that he finally was rid of the not-really-pleasant-tasting nutrient potion.

The comfortable Sunday evening stupor was broken the moment Susan Bones came to stand beside Harry – he hadn't really noticed her approach, maybe he was more tired than he had realised – slapping down something just next to Harry's plate, pointing at it and demanding in a commanding tone. "Did you know about this?"

Putting his utensils down, Harry took a closer look at what had been placed so forcefully beside his plate. It was indeed Witch Weekly, opened to a page with small snippets of text with various claims and facts about different celebrities. Harry had seen similar pages in those terrible magazines Aunt Petunia had read, always complaining about them and their tendency to exaggerate, but buying them nonetheless.

Susan's finger pointed to one snippet relatively close to the middle, right next to the moving picture of a quidditch player being walloped by a bludger. And it started with Lord Slytherin courting Head of DMLE?

Suddenly all his sleepiness was gone, and Harry carefully took the magazine in his hands sitting up a little bit straighter.

Mysterious, handsome Lord Slytherin and tough Head-Witch of the DMLE have been spotted dining together in an intimate booth at the Floating Candle. They were talking behind silencing wards for hours. Is this the start of a most intriguing relationship?

For a moment Harry closed his eyes. It was a wonder this hadn't come up in the gossip sooner than dinner. The magazine had been delivered with the morning mail. Maybe the fact that it was buried between all those other snippets near to the end of the pages had helped prevent it from being spotted sooner. But in the end that wasn't really all that important.

"I take it your aunt didn't tell you she had asked my father for a meeting?" Harry asked, handing the magazine back to Susan.

"You knew?" Susan seemed taken aback and truly confused. Not all that far from reacting unreasonably as far as Harry was able to guess.

"He told me because he suspected she might have an engagement contract between you and me in mind. And he called me again yesterday evening, telling me that Madame Bones had wanted to talk with him about something she overheard at one of the many functions this past season. Offering him moral support or some such. Not that I had expected to see their meeting mentioned in this… magazine." Harry shrugged. He wasn't really sure what to think of this. The only thing he was certain of right now was that this probably would dominate the rumour mill for at least the next week.

Susan had her brow furrowed, gazing questioning down to where Harry was sitting on the bench. "Moral support? Why would he need that?"

Harry sighed. That really wasn't something he felt he could talk about to others. It wasn't his kind of secret to share. "Something personal. That's all I'm willing to say. Okay? It's not my place to share. Ask your aunt if you want to know more. Not sure if she'll be more willing to talk about it, though." Once again Harry shrugged, suddenly reminded of Draco's mother berating him for this habit. "But of one thing I'm certain: there's no courtship going on, or anything of that kind."

Before either of them could talk more about this piece of journalism, Professor McGonagall stood from where she was sitting right next to the empty seat of the Headmaster at the head table and without any serious effort had the attention of most of the students.

Susan quickly made her way back to the Hufflepuff table, taking the magazine with her.

"Good evening. I have an announcement to make." Those few words were enough to shut the rest of those students up who still had been whispering. "You all have noticed the absence of Headmaster Dumbledore. I have the sad obligation to inform you all that he will not be returning to Hogwarts, as he is retiring." That proclamation had the whole Hall filled with distressed voices. Mostly from three tables in the room. The Slytherin's were either not willing to make their opinion heard or were simply too refined to show their feelings so openly.

Harry suspected that most of the Slytherins would have liked to cheer but were aware how bad that would look, so they had tried for politely blank instead.

One of the worst reactions they could have chosen, according to all the lessons he had gotten in negotiations over the summer, both from Marvolo and his grandfather's portrait. If one showed emotions, the sudden absence of them almost always hinted at something they wanted to keep hidden.

"The Board of Governors has offered me the position of Headmistress, and after thinking about it, I have decided to accept." The Gryffindor table drowned out her next words with deafening cheers, whistling, and clapping. The more modest clapping from the other three tables didn't make a lot of difference among all that clamour. A stern – yet somehow still amused look – from their Transfiguration Professor managed to calm the Gryffindors down again. "Until we have found another professor for Transfiguration and it has been decided who will be Head of Gryffindor from now on, both Professor Snape and Professor Flitwick will act as deputy so the burden is distributed over more people."

While all around him the students began speculating who might become the new Transfiguration professor, and who the Head of Gryffindor, Harry mused that the meeting between his father and Madame Bones might not be interesting enough to be top of the talk after that revelation.

oooOOooo

The wind was howling around the house, the heavy rain against the windows filling the room with a lot of noise, almost drowning out the sounds of the merrily burning fire in the fireplace. The heavy cloud cover prevented the light of the full moon from reaching the ground, which was getting muddier by the minute.

Sirius sat on the floor of the south parlour on a thick woollen blanket, a few letters next to him, his back to the fire. "Thanks for translating the parts of the letters for me that were French, Remus."
Sirius said, his eyes trained – again – on one of the two letters his daughters had send him.

The werewolf gave a small huff and placed his head down on his front paws, his amber eyes trained on his friend's form.

"It's impressive how good their English is." Sirius felt pride for his daughters' academic accomplishments. Going by what they had written about their schoolwork, he had every right to be. That they had learned English as well only added to that. "I'm not sure why their mother still insist on writing in French, though. I know that she can speak more than just French."

Remus gave a small wuffing sound that Sirius knew to be one of agreement.

Frowning, Sirius looked up from the letter he currently was holding and directed his gaze to where Remus had made himself comfortable on a small mound of blankets and pillows. The reason for his frown wasn't the fact that the blankets and pillows would be covered in wolf fur by the end of the night. No, the reason was the massive cage Remus had insisted on putting into the room.

"I think that you are overly dramatic, Remus. And I will repeat this several more times this night." The small sound Remus made clearly was one of resigned frustration with his friend. "You have taken your wolfsbane. And even if it should inexplicably fail all of a sudden, I still could transform into Padfoot and be safe. There is no need to keep you in a cage just because I wanted to write letters to Nawel and Enora."

Remus had decided to stay indoors because of the terrible weather that had been forecast for the region of Potter Manor, and Sirius had happily agreed. Rain, sleet, and strong winds in February wasn't really fun to run around in. Not if the alternative was a place in front of a warm fire.

Remus stood, turned a few tight circles on the blanket – in a move Sirius knew all too well from trying to make himself comfortable on a cold stone floor with only a threadbare blanket – and then let himself fall to the ground with his back turned towards Sirius.

Sirius snorted. His friend didn't need words to clearly communicate that Sirius' opinion on this wasn't appreciated. "Sulk all you want, Moony, but you know that I'm right. There is no danger here." The big wolf – looking so much healthier with every moon he was in Slytherin's employ – just continued to ignore Sirius, who gave a theatrical sigh, preparing to make a draft for the first letter he wanted to write.

Of course Sirius knew the exact reason Remus had insisted on the cage, which Sirius had to transfigure. The woods outside the Manor had been warded to make sure the werewolf could run there in the marked stretch of grounds, adhering to the law that demanded a werewolf had to make sure he or she was in a secure place during their transformations. Said secure place had been defined as a space either closed with locks and structures strong enough to hold a rampaging wolf, or wards designed to do the same.

The decision to stay indoors had left them without a warded space – Lord Slytherin only had warded the woods – and Sirius' objection to locking Remus in the wine cellar had ruled out the only structure strong enough.

This was Remus' attempt to comply with the law, making sure that his actions would never be grounds for overturning all the improvements that had been accomplished. But Sirius still felt it was silly.

"Do you think I should send Kreacher over to France and the summer home now? Or should I..."
rather wait a bit? Or even arrange for a wizard or witch to clean things up? It has been quite some time since the house was last visited by anyone from the family, as far as I know," Sirius mused. He never had been the most patient and wasn't prepared to out wait his friend.

Hearing the rustling of fabric and a big animal moving, Sirius looked up again. He laughed because his friend was wearing his you-know-I-can't-use-words-in-this-form expression. Lily had once argued with James for more than an hour over the fact they all had named a few expressions they knew from Moony, while she claimed a wolf couldn't actually make such an expression. Something about muscles missing that would be needed. The three of them had laughed it off – Remus staying neutral if amused at the whole discussion – and Lily had left with a frustrated huff.

Turning his thoughts away from this painful recollections, Sirius repeated the questions in a way that Remus could answer them in their long established pattern of one small wuff for yes and two for no.

"Sending wizards probably really is better," Sirius mused, having started another parchment to make notes for his preparations. He would have to ask Lord Slytherin if Harry could come visit for a few days during the holidays. "Maybe I should hire some curse-breakers. If the house is even remotely like Grimmauld Place… Maybe Bill has the time." Sirius hadn't seen the curse-breaker often, but the few times he had it had been obvious that the oldest Weasley son was planning to propose to his girlfriend. A little extra money to start them out probably would come in handy.

"Do you think it's too much if I ask them to stay the whole holidays?" Remus wuffed one time, and Sirius felt frustrated by the lack of words cutting short on what Moony could communicate easily. "Maybe I should get you some letter cards or something along those lines for nights with really bad weather," Sirius sort of asked, tilting his head to the side.

Moony shook his head, huffed, and curled into a furry mound, clearly ending his participation in the conversation.

Laughing, Sirius let the topic drop, instead concentrating on his letters. He needed to write three, and he'd better hurry up to make sure neither his daughters not their mother would have to wait long.

Chapter End Notes

I'm not all that sure about the long part between Marvolo and Amelia… only one thing is certain: she isn't ambitious and ruthless enough to marry a man for political gain who she doesn't really like, especially as Lord Slytherin isn't really able to offer her much in that regard. And Marvolo is too intelligent to risk letting someone get that close who has as strong moral convictions as Amelia Bones has.

Maybe I'll manage to write it so they become friends. Only time will tell.

On another note: any suggestions for Transfiguration Professor and Head of Gryffindor? I'm currently combing through canon to find candidates for both positions and haven't really found someone yet.

After a long pause I want to recommend another story to you all! It's "Letters to everybody" by Siebenschlaefer which can be found on AO3. She asked me a while ago if she could use the "Law of Haxby" I made up for this story. That's how I started to read her stuff. It's good!

Thanks to Jordre and Jake for helping to improve my spelling!

Thanks to everyone who wished me luck with my other project. All went well ;) I managed to finish before the deadline and get it printed. Review number 4444 over at ff.net was made by DarkRavie. I like the way you always write the same ;) and I want to use this opportunity to once again thank all of you people commenting on my chapters. It’s fuel for writing I can really use. And Starfishz managed to push the number of followers of this story on ff.net to 5000! It’s so much more than I ever expected when I first started publishing! Thank you all!

Sunday, 4th of February 1996

Severus sat down with a quiet huff in one of the more comfortable armchairs of the staff room. He would have preferred to go home to Sonja over sitting here waiting for a long evening of useless discussions to end. But he was aware that there were things the whole faculty needed to talk about now that Minerva had decided to take the position of Headmistress. So he resigned himself to endure what was to come.

And if he was rational about it, talking about all the various topics connected to that change on a Sunday evening was better than trying to fit such a meeting in between their lessons during the week.

But he wasn’t feeling all that rational at the moment. In fact, he really had to work on staying cool and collected and not frowning too much. Hadn’t he decided to accept the inevitable? Not having this meeting now only meant that it had to take place later.

Severus huffed, folding his hands over his stomach, slumping back into the chair a little. This really was the best way to go about this. And Severus worked hard to let himself actually feel that it was. With someone waiting for him back in their quarters, it was a lot harder than it had been in the past.

One after the other, his colleagues walked in, chatting with each other, clearly agitated over the news. Severus wasn’t sure why, but most of the professors had been convinced until quite recently – as recently as this past dinner – that Albus Dumbledore would be back at the school, soon.

Minerva was the last to arrive, closing the door behind her, and flicking her wand at the door, casting a basic privacy charm. Probably with the intend either to keep Peeves away, or to prevent students from eavesdropping on them. Not that this measure truly would change anything. Whatever they talked about here, any decisions they might come to, all of it probably would be all over the school in a matter of a few days. Experience had taught him that much.

“Minerva!” Pomona started even before Minerva had reached her chair and sat down. “That can’t be really true, can it? Albus won’t be back? What happened? Didn’t Poppy say he was better?” The Head of Hufflepuff turned to where the medi-witch was sitting between Filius and Rolanda, clearly asking Poppy for her view on things.

Before the medi-witch could do more than huff – in a manner Severus associated with the expression the witch always sported when he wanted to leave the hospital wing early – Minerva sat down in the Headmaster’s chair with an air of authority, drawing attention to herself by the simple measure of beginning to speak.

“Albus informed me himself that he did not feel up to the task of being Headmaster of Hogwarts any longer. After that letter that somehow was leaked to the Daily Prophet, Albus said, he realized that he needed a lot more help, and Hogwarts would be better off without him. The Board offered me the position, and I decided just this afternoon to accept.” Just as Minerva was able to control a classroom full of teenaged dunderheads, she managed easily to control a group of highly curious teachers. “You can send him mail if you want to know more. But he asked me to convey his thanks to each of you for all your dedicated work at Hogwarts with him and for the good of our students. He planned to have relocated by now to a specialised clinic somewhere near the Nile Delta. But I don’t know if his plans have worked out.”

While muttering started all around the room – sometimes the resemblance between the teenagers they were teaching and the staff was disconcerting – Minerva got a roll of parchment out of one of her robe pockets and levitated one of the inkwells over so she could use it.

Only a sharp look from Minerva was enough to get everyone back to paying attention. Maybe the meeting wouldn’t drag on as long as Severus had feared. “With me taking up the position as Headmistress, we need to fill three positions on staff. The position of Transfiguration Professor and that of Head of Gryffindor, as well as the position of Deputy Headmaster or Mistress. I wanted to ask for your input.” Minerva let her eyes travel over the gathered staff. “Let’s start with the easiest position. Deputy Headmaster or Mistress.”

Severus felt the strong urge to roll his eyes. Easiest position. It was going to be a long night.

“Traditionally one of the Heads of House fills this position, and someone who already has had a few years of work here at the school in that position. Those requirements leave us with three possible candidates.” Sounds of agreement were heard all around the room. “I would propose to decide between Filius and Pomona, as Severus already fills the position of Hogwarts’ Potions Master in addition to being Head of Slytherin. That fact alone makes me think that he has already enough work on his hands. Don’t you agree, Severus?” Kind eyes were directed at him, and Severus had to agree with his friend’s assessment.

He was Potions Professor, stand-in parent for all Slytherins at the school, and brewed all potions used in the infirmary. That he also was the Dark Lord’s Potions Master and going to be a father within a few months time only added to the long list of responsibilities. And his title of Lord Prince – with all the added responsibilities of that – was still missing from that impressive listing of positions. “I agree.” There was no need to expand on that.

With a smile – apologetic would be the adjective Severus would use to describe it if he was forced to do so – Minerva addressed the Head of Hufflepuff. “I would like to offer the position to Filius, if he is willing to accept, as that would keep a nice balance.”

Pomona nodded and as one both women turned their eyes to the short figure of the Head of Ravenclaw where he was sitting on his usual place stacked with a high pillow to allow him easy access to the table.

“I’m honoured, Minerva, and gladly accept.” Filius answered with a small bow.
Minerva gave the Charms Professor a nod with a smile and turned back to the others. “It will be considerably harder to find someone to take on the position of Transfiguration Professor. Teaching teenagers isn’t something most aspire to.” While Minerva asked the room if anyone knew what had become of some of the students whom she deemed possibly competent enough to take up the position she was forced to leave as the new Headmistress, Severus contemplated her statement that few felt the call to teach young students. It certainly was true. Teaching at a school like Hogwarts was not without prestige, but those who had the skill to be great were more likely to take on apprentices than to commit their time to teenagers who had no talent or interest for their chosen field of study. As Severus knew from his own experience, time for research was limited to almost nothing when one needed to mark homework, set tasks for several classes a day, and worry over how to keep those doing poorly at the subject somehow close to the rest. He himself had quickly decided to weed out the students incapable of learning to brew under pressure. He had no patience for dunderheads unwilling to put in the work.

But he never would claim to be particularly suited to teaching.

Finding someone as qualified as Minerva was, would be hard.

“Didn’t Miss Switch finish her Mastery in Transfiguration a while ago?” Charity asked just as Severus returned his attention back to the staffroom and the discussion. “She might be interested in teaching. Even if she might not take the position for longer, she could help bridge the time until a new professor can be found.”

Minerva nodded with a small furrow on her brow. “I guess advertising in the Prophet and a few of the subscription magazines is the best way to find people interested in the position. Writing to a few of my acquaintances, and past students to find someone to help us in the short term seems like the most sensible thing to do.”

After that they moved on to the discussion of who might want to take the position of Head of Gryffindor. Traditionally, only someone who had been a member of that House in their own student time could assume that position. Interestingly enough, the number of former Gryffindors among the staff was rather limited, and Severus was determined to argue against appointing Rubeus Hagrid for that position. The half-giant might be skilled with handling the more dangerous – and the less dangerous – magical creatures, providing the potion stores of Hogwarts with lots of interesting and high quality animal parts for low costs, but Severus severely doubted the man’s competency as a caretaker for a herd of rambunctious teenagers.

Rolanda declined because she felt the need to keep impartial in her role as the Quidditch referee, and Charity didn’t feel suited to the position. A lot of the remaining evening consequently was lost to Pomona’s attempts to instil some confidence into the younger Charity – more than once pointing out how well Severus had done in his role despite his youth when starting – and everyone agreed that Hagrid had too many other duties already to add head of House to them.

Not even the length of a flobberworm nearer to finding a new head of House for Gryffindor, the meeting was postponed well after midnight, leading to Severus returning to his quarters only to find his wife already deeply asleep in their bed.

Quickly Severus prepared for bed, and then slipped under the cover right next to Sonja with a small smile on his face. The evening had been boring and tedious, but coming home to his love managed to lighten his spirits considerably.

oooOo000
Rumours were a funny thing. As he had learned in his past – with the whole parseltongue reveal, or the murderous godfather, and being entered into the tournament – as soon as something more recent or more interesting came along the old piece of gossip just went forgotten. Maybe not for always and ever – old stuff was brought up again when something new was discovered – but for long stretches of time.

And so it had happened with the small snippet in Witch Weekly over the last few days. The fact that Albus Dumbledore had resigned from his position of Headmaster, as it was reported, had overshadowed everything else the students might have talked about. Speculation on who would become Head of House for Gryffindor and who would take over Transfiguration classes had done their part in pushing the life of Lord Slytherin and Amelia Bones, or any other celebrity for that matter, out of topics to talk about. It had been a relief for Harry, as he had feared being questioned by everyone if Amelia Bones was to be his adoptive mother.

Instead he had taken part in discussions among his peers, listing the wishes they had for a new Transfiguration professor, and speculating who of the former Gryffindors able to teach would take the position. Hermione had been terrified as Ron had brought up the possibility of Hagrid's getting the position of Head of House.

At the moment Harry was walking down to the greenhouses to pick up Ron and Hermione, as they wanted to go down to the edge of the Forbidden Forest together to gather plant matter they needed for one of Professor Snape’s assignments.

“Hello, Harry,” a dreamy voice said, making Harry spin in place to locate the speaker. His rapidly beating heart didn’t really slow down much the moment he realized that it had been Luna calling out to him from where she was poking a stick into the remains of the snow from this past winter.

“I like this time of year.” Luna mused idly, returning to her poking of the snow. “Everything is waking up slowly.”

Remembering long hours cleaning up the gardens at Privet Drive in preparation for the work to be done a little later so it would look better than those of the neighbours, Harry nodded. After all, he relished the days getting longer and lighter just as much as any other student of Hogwarts did. “The change of the seasons is always interesting.” What an inane answer. The feeling of resembling the fools drooling over the veela at the Quidditch World Cup made Harry blush.
He was almost going to turn again, wishing her a good afternoon, when he realized that this might be a good opportunity to ask his question. They were alone, not something that happened often, and it had been a coincidence which somehow managed to calm him somewhat because he didn’t want it to look too serious for some reason he hadn’t been able to pin down.

“Do you have any plans for the Hogsmeade weekend after Valentine’s? Because I would like to spend the day with you.” There. He had done it. He had asked Luna to go to Hogsmeade with him. And he even had managed to do so without stuttering. He held his breath anxiously waiting for her answer.

Those wide blue eyes with only a few strands of blond hair sticking out from under the brim of a knit hat of various blues, moved to look at him, and her serene smile was still in place when she answered. “That’s a lovely idea, Harry. So I guess we both now have plans for that day!”

“See you in Runes then, Luna.” Harry said happily. “I can’t let Ron and Hermione wait much longer.” Luna only hummed, turning back to whatever it was she was hoping to gain while making holes in a pile of old snow, while Harry almost skipped down the way to the correct greenhouse, a grin on his face.

This year was so much better than previous ones.

A few days ago a letter had reached Bill sent by Lord Black startling a laugh out of the oldest Weasley child with the formal way of address. When he had opened it and seen that it was an inquiry to hire him for curse breaking work the laugh of incredulity had changed into a feeling of genuine interest.

The little he had seen of the Black Town House in London had tickled his interest with all the stuff that his mother had tried to clean out, or talk Sirius into getting rid off. So Bill had not hesitated to answer the letter.

Now he was on the way to Grimmauld Place to meet with Sirius and speak about the job offer. It sounded interesting enough, checking over a summer home to see if a human could live there safely.

And the payment Sirius had offered sounded anything but bad as well.

Bill reached the door to the dark house and used the knocker to make his presence known. Moments later the door opened to reveal the hallway and the small, wrinkly creature that was responsible for keeping the house in good condition. A task that clearly had gotten too hard for it to manage. Or at least it seemed that way to Bill.

“Master is awaiting you in the kitchen, wizard curse breaker.” The elf spoke without much of the reverence his brethren usually afforded all wizards and witches, and Bill felt reminded of the usual attitude goblins had towards the magic wielding humans. With a small smirk Bill stepped into the house, his fine tuned senses immediately picking up on the different sources of less than friendly magic in the house. The most present magic he could feel were the many layered wards, cautious and waiting, accepting him as a visitor but a possible threat.

“Bill!” Sirius called out the moment the tall red-head stepped into the kitchen. “Thanks for coming! I really need someone to make sure the summer house in France is safe, and I couldn’t think of anyone I would trust more than you to do it.”

Bill laughed good naturedly at that obvious display of eagerness from the wizard who should have presented at least a little bit of decency. He was a Lord of the Wizengamot and the Head of an old family, after all. “Being close to home is well and good, but I have to admit, that I’m missing the work in the tombs. Getting to check over and clean an old house might be exactly what I need.”

Sirius waved at one of the chairs around the heavy table, sporting a set of tea and small cucumber sandwiches. “Take a seat. Are you happy with tea? Or do you want something stronger?”

“Tea is fine.” Bill answered, while sitting down on one of the heavy chairs with their mismatched cushions.

Sirius poured them both a cup of tea and sat down himself. “So you’re willing to take the job?” The older man asked adding lemon and sugar to his tea.

“If I wasn’t I wouldn’t have bothered showing up here.” Bill said with a bit of friendly mocking in his voice which made Sirius pull a face on him.

“Yeah. Stupid question. So, I need it finished before the spring holidays, because I want to invite my daughters. Have you heard that I’m a father to two girls? Want to get to know them better, let them get to know me… all that stuff. They are attending Beauxbatons, so meeting up in France during the holidays seems like a good idea. But just as all the other properties that house hasn’t been visited by any human since,” Sirius hesitated, stirring his tea while furrowing his brow in contemplation. “I don’t know, in too long. That’s a fact.”

Bill hummed in agreement. “So you expect the usual pests, boggarts, doxies and the like? And as it’s a Black property also some cursed artefacts, books on dangerous and maybe even banned magic?”

Sirius nodded in response, there wasn’t much to explain in that regard anyway.

“I certainly can clean such stuff out, and identify some of the nastier objects for you. As it was a house to live in there probably weren’t any of the dangerous curses there to keep people out completely?” Breaking the ancient Egyptian deterrents against human invaders had been his favourite part of opening up tombs for Gringotts.

“That’s probably correct. Even if I wouldn’t put much past my family in that regard. So I would advise you to be on guard when opening up cupboards, wardrobes, and doors in the cellar. I plan to send Kreacher along as well, he can do the actual cleaning of dust and other dirt that surely has accumulated with time.” Sirius sighed and tucked a strand of his hair back from his face behind his ear. “We’ll probably should set up some sort of contract, if you haven’t one for freelance work already? If not, I’ll either ask Remus or get my solicitor to write something up. Handling your payment, the expected work, what is to be done if something unexpected comes up… all that stuff.” Sirius waved his hand in the air to indicate all the boring stuff he couldn’t name in the moment and Bill nodded.

Maybe he should think about getting some sort of template for freelance work as Sirius had called it. If this endeavour went well he would like to take on more jobs like this in the future, to add some spice back into his life. Even when his mother and Fleur preferred his new, safer line of work, he himself was missing the thrill and excitement of dismantling volatile curses.

“I’ve got here the floor plans. They were stored in one of the family vaults. I'm not sure how accurate they are. We need to decide how long this might take, so I know when you need to start and when I have to take you there to key you into the wards. Do you need a partner? I remember that there was a good reason why Aurors tend to work in pairs. I guess that same concern for safety applies to your work as well?”

It did, and Sirius agreed to go through the house with Bill on their first visit to get a feel for how dangerous the task would be. After that had been sorted they started to hash out what all needed to be written in the contract and what time lines they had to work with, as Sirius wanted the house finished by the start of the French spring holidays. They worked for well over an hour on planning to then slide into the retelling of some of the more amusing stories from Bill’s time in Egypt and Sirius’ time as an Auror.

When Bill finally left for his flat he felt happy with anticipation of an adventure that was promised to be rewarding in more than money. He really should strive to get more contract work like this in the future. Maybe even for the Ministry from time to time. Like the cleaning of that Inferi infested cave they had started on with Lord Slytherin but finished without the man. It was a solid plan and made Bill hum a happy little tune under his breath on his way home.

Wednesday, 14th of February 1996

The morning of Valentine's Day dawned to reveal a day of cold miserable rain. But that didn’t seem to deter any of the older teenagers of being emotional and hyped over the day of romantic love. And for once Harry felt nervous along with all the others. In a way it was kind of ridiculous. But on the other hand it was something so normal, that he relished it. Sorting through his feelings in relation to Luna the previous Saturday with Mrs. Goyle had helped him realise that he at least had a crush on the blonde girl. He still felt like shrinking in his seat every time he remembered the truly embarrassing talk he had had with his mind healer that day.

It had been at least as horrible as the talk with Marvolo in the summer.

Theo handed him the plate with the scrambled eggs, still too sleepy to talk much. Over at the Ravenclaw table a girl was getting louder and louder, almost screaming at one of her housemates about a gift that somehow had managed to be insulting. Harry tried to ignore the giggling of the younger witches, the screaming match that had started to attract the teachers’ attention, and the nervous whispering among some of the older boys. He had sorted out what he had wanted to give to Luna, asking Dobby to make sure an owl would deliver his gift to the girl with the morning post the evening the day before.

When the owls started to fly in through the big windows, bringing with them a lot of small rain droplets, Harry had just finished a bowl of porridge with honey, nuts, and small pieces of apple. As he had found where Luna was sitting today prior to sitting down himself he had a prime view on her greeting the school owl carrying a small parchment roll charmed to repel water. She smiled her usual serene, slightly absent minded smile, and gave a bit of her own breakfast as a treat to the messenger.

Remembering Luna’s comment over spring and the slow awakening of all things in that time,
Harry had drawn pictures of some of the early blooming plants, those that were out as the first, sometimes even before all the snow was gone, using the lack of leaves in the forests to get enough sunlight to flourish.

He just noticed her smiling more happy than before when the loud crash of a large metal platter falling to the floor drew his attention – as well as that of almost all people in the Great Hall – to the Gryffindor table.

“Can’t you see he is using you!” Ron was screaming, his head almost purple, the colour clashing horribly with his hair. “He’s a professional, famous Quidditch player. The best seeker in the world!” Harry felt his stomach clench. He didn’t know all that much about romantic relationships, but there was no way Ron could turn that beginning into anything that would be well received by Hermione. The fact that they both had totally overlooked the fact their friend was a girl, and Ron even had managed to put his foot into his mouth when asking her out to the ball, clearly seeing her as a last resort, wasn’t going to work in Ron’s favour either.

Harry never got to hear what Ron had wanted to say, because Hermione suddenly was standing as well, her hand curled into a fist, shaking, and screaming at the other Gryffindor with the same amount of fury as Ron. “Are you doubting my intelligence? Or do you think I’m just not worth the attention of someone as famous as Victor Krum?”

Daphne, sitting near enough that Harry could hear her, commented with something close to awe.
“The venom! Can’t you hear it?”

“She is going to cut him into ribbons with her tongue!” Astoria agreed with an obvious glee that was a little surprising to Harry.

He himself wanted to vanish into the ground, embarrassed beyond belief on account of his friend’s actions. They had grown apart since the summer, all the changes in Harry’s situation driving a wedge between them, but Harry still wished his friend well. But at the moment Ron’s impulsiveness was digging him a hole deeper than he could hope to get out of anytime soon.

“Let me be clear, Ronald Weasley! I’m not interested in you in any romantic sense. You just are too immature. Grow up! I’ll decide for myself who I go on a date with. It’s not your place to even think about such things. Leave me be!” And with that last declaration Hermione stormed off from the Great Hall a late Ravenclaw jumping out of her way near the doors to the Great Hall.

The picture was eerily similar to one Harry had witnessed back in their first year. Hermione storming away because Ron had been an insensitive prat. “I’ll better go look for her.” Harry muttered to his friends, already getting up from his place, grabbing his bag. “Please excuse my absence to Professor Slinkhard.”

“Will do.” Theo answered, while the others from his year muttered some words along the same line.

Quick strides allowed Harry to quickly leave the Great Hall without compromising his dignity.
When had he come to always think about how the way he acted might influence the opinion of him in the eyes of others? But that wasn’t important right now.

Getting out the Marauders Map from his book bag the moment he noticed that he couldn’t see Hermione anywhere, Harry quickly checked where she had gone to, finding her name next to a dot in one of the unused classrooms on the ground floor. It wasn’t hard to follow her there. One of the bathrooms might have been a problem.

He could hear her muffled sobs through the not quite closed door, and before he knocked on it – one didn’t simply walk in on an upset witch if one didn’t want to be hexed – he took a few calming breaths, raising his occlumency shields to hopefully better be able to help his friend.

“May I come in?” Harry asked when Hermione didn’t react for quite some time.

She didn’t tell him to go away, which he chose to interpret as an invitation to join her in the classroom.

So he went in.

Hermione was sitting in a window to one of the smaller courtyards – Harry wasn’t even sure this one could be reached by any other means than climbing out of one of the windows – on the window seat, her legs pulled up and her head resting on her knees, face turned away from the door and towards the window.

Watching the raindrops run down the windowpane, Harry tried to come up with a good way to help Hermione. Being supportive wasn’t something he had much experience with. Neither watching others doing something like this, nor getting help in such a situation. Mrs. Goyle had an analytical way of doing things, getting him to come to conclusions on his own, Harry felt that wasn’t what was needed right now. Marvolo tried, but having next to no experience himself, wasn’t really that good at comforting another. Yet. Mrs. Weasley was too… oppressive for Harry’s tastes, and not someone he thought he would be able to emulate.

With a shake of his head Harry cleared away all the distractions. He was making the whole situation more awkward by just standing here. Just go for it would probably be best here. He hadn’t been a Gryffindor for nothing. He could wing it if needed.

“Ron is a prat, and has no real filter between his brain and his mouth.” That was nothing but the truth and got something almost like a chuckle out of Hermione.

Harry slowly walked over to sit at the other end of the window seat – avoiding the chairs and tables covered in dust – all the while sorting through his thoughts. “I’m not sure what Ron is thinking that made him react the way he did. But I know that he isn’t the most mature of our year. And he hasn’t got a mind healer to talk to for help on sorting out all those,” Harry floundered for a moment, playing with the hem of his robes, “feelings. I at least find them terribly confusing.” That got a real chuckle out of Hermione, making Harry send a mock glare her way, which made her chuckle more, settling back to sit a little less hunched over. “But despite the fact that I understand being confused about feelings, I agree with you. It’s your decision who you go out with on a date and spend time with. And I can totally see what Victor sees in you.”

Harry felt out of his depth, but the small trembling smile Hermione send his way let him think that he hadn’t done too bad.

“So, you had confusing feelings to sort out?” Hermione asked, a dangerous twinkle in her eyes, effectively deflecting the conversation onto another topic.

Harry sighed. “I had. But I have a feeling that you noticed long before I did. Didn’t you?”

She nodded. “I think that I did. Yes.” She grinned and moved one of her feed to nudge one of his.
“You and Luna?”

He didn’t even try to keep the stupid grin from his face. “She just sees me. Harry. You know? I… I’m not sure where this will lead, but I’m willing to see for myself what it can be.” Hermione’s tear streaked face was brightened by a soft smile at Harry admitting to his developing feelings for the younger Ravenclaw girl.

“Yes, I think I see. Now more clearly than ever. Before uncle Xerxes made me his heiress I was the clever muggleborn for many. After, I suddenly became the heiress to an important and infamous family. It wasn’t that big of a deal. You, and Ron mostly, treated me just the same. As does Victor. The younger and older students, those I never interacted with that much changed their behaviour, though.”

The bell announcing the start of the first lesson sounded. Suddenly Hermione was on her feet. “We’ll be late for our first lesson! Harry! How can you let me mope here? Get up! Hurry! We can’t be late!”

Now it was Harry’s turn to chuckle, getting up from his perch much slower than his friend. This was such typical Hermione behaviour that he was pretty sure that for the moment at least Ron’s blunder was gone from the forefront of her mind.

Maybe he could get the twins on their brother’s case. They both certainly had a better hand at interacting with the witches in Gryffindor than Ron ever had managed so far. They might be able to help their younger brother see what he had been doing wrong.

They parted ways soon after reaching the entrance hall and Harry managed to only be about ten minutes late to Defence. Professor Slinkhard simply waved at Harry to take a seat, once more deep in a lecture over the value of de-escalation and the duty of friends to intervene before an actual fight could start.

The rest of the day passed by in a blur that seemed all too familiar by now. Only the constant whispers over the drama they all had witnessed were a difference to any other day since the winter holidays had been over. By the end, after dinner and another study session in the Slytherin common room – spend patiently explaining the differences between different flicks of the wand in charms to Vincent and Gregory – Harry wished the others pleasant dreams and walked into his own room.

Careless, trusting in the charms on his bag, Harry led it fall next to his desk, getting rid of his shoes on his way to his bed, where he sat down and let himself fall back to lie on it, staring at the canopy.

He was in need of holidays. For a moment he wondered what this year as Harry Potter, Boy-Who-Lived, would have been like if Marvolo hadn’t chosen this way. The less violent way. He was pretty sure he wouldn’t be a Slytherin now, and probably he wouldn’t have all the time he was investing into his studies, he would still be stuck in Divination, and seeing as he had needed Mrs. Goyle’s help – who was his mind healer only because Marvolo had insisted – he wouldn’t have a date with Luna this coming Saturday.

Sighing deeply, Harry sat back up and went to retrieve the mirror Marvolo had created for him. The adoption of Marcus had been stalled and Harry wanted to know what was happening on that front and if Marvolo had made any progress.

“He!” Marvolo greeted only moments after Harry had spoken the man’s name to the reflective surface, which now no longer was showing Harry’s face but the sweaty one of Marvolo.
“What are you doing?” Harry asked, feeling curious. There wasn’t much that could get a wizard to sweat if he was able to use magic. And Marvolo certainly had no reason to not use magic to get his menial tasks done.

“Conjuring pottery.” Marvolo gave a deadpan answer. “I’m frustrated and there’s no one with time for duelling practice. So I’m conjuring pottery just to blast it apart in the next moment. One could say that it’s cathartic.” It looked like the man was shrugging, and then the background moved, indicating that Marvolo had changed his position.

“So, it didn’t go well?” Why else should Marvolo be frustrated?

“I wouldn’t necessarily say that. All the stuff about whether I’m a good guardian, and if Marcus would be happy with us. That is done with and went well. But they want to verify that Marcus really is a parslemouth. And now they are uncertain how to prove it. Obviously they can’t take my word for it. Or yours.” Marvolo was shaking his head, pinching the bridge of his nose, probably cussing up a storm in his head.

Harry himself made a face because it sounded so stupid. “What do they want to do instead. Have him order a snake around?”

“In essence. But they say it can’t be one he already is familiar with. One of the simpletons from the Department for Regulation and Control of Magical Creatures said they simply could conjure one. I was this close,” he held up two fingers almost touching each other, “to conjuring one myself to show them what a monumental stupid idea that would be. I advised them to get in a snake from a muggle zoo. A constrictor of some kind. One of them said they had thought something smaller would be less intimidating for a young boy… I truly hope they will talk with the expert I recommended to them. He works with snakes regularly, as he collects their venom for potions ingredients.”

They talked for a while longer. Harry re-telling Ron’s blunder from this morning and Marvolo complaining about all the paperwork he had to finish, and how Nagini had knocked over his inkwell over and over again because she had been bored. He was looking forward to summer and even warmer spring days, so she could go out onto the grounds of Potter Manor. That possibility would cure her of her boredom better than anything else. When Harry’s yawn lasted for several seconds, Marvolo laughed loudly. “Go to bed, Harry. You need your sleep.”

Harry nodded, yawning again. “I guess you’re right, father. Pleasant dreams.”

For the first time they both realised in the same moment that Harry had called Marvolo father where no one else could hear them. They froze, unsure how to process or react to this. Not even sure if this was the first time that this had happened. In the end Marvolo was the first one to recover, ignoring the doubtlessly important moment. “I wish you pleasant dreams as well, Harry. I’ll keep you up to date on the adoption.”

“Thanks.” Harry answered still unsettled over the fact he had become so accustomed to calling Marvolo father that he hadn’t noticed he was doing it when it was only the two of them.

Later as he was buried under the covers and almost asleep, Harry realised that he didn’t feel bad about the development. Since the day Marvolo had adopted Harry the man had done everything in his power to be a good father. And as far as Harry could say at the moment he had managed to do a good job.

Feeling content and not unhappy with the way things were at the moment, Harry drifted off to sleep.

Sitting in a comfortable rocking chair on the balcony which belonged to his apartment, Albus enjoyed the book he was currently reading, the nice weather, and the view. The Sachmet Clinic was a most convenient mixture of specialised hospital for ageing wizards and witches and hotel, or better yet, apartment complex. It wasn’t exactly cheap to get treatment and housing here, but the long standing tradition of this place to accept unusual cases for lower fees made them the absolute experts in the field.

In getting a place so fast Albus’ celebrity status may have eased the way. But in the end the unusual circumstances of his mental health had been the deciding factor as he had since learned from one of the healers in charge of his care.

After only a few days spend here all of the reservations Albus had had about leaving his brother’s place had vanished. He now was sure he gladly would spend the rest of his life here, secure in the knowledge that he would find peace here and never would harm anyone ever again.

He still felt greatly unsettled over how far his mind had slipped. His decision had been right.

His mid-day meal popped into existence right next to Albus, breaking his musings, on the small table he had used for his meals whenever the weather was favourable. Like today.

With a smile on his face, Albus moved to a wicker chair – it simply was easier to eat while not rocking back and forth – and picked up the utensils to start on his meal of rice, stuffed vine leaves and humus.

Once he was finished eating, the plate vanished and Albus rose. Maybe he should go out and take a stroll through the gardens which were littered with wells and fountains, the sculptures of noteworthy healers and gods and goddesses, as well as boards for various games. He had seen chess and nine men’s morris but also a few he hadn’t seen before. Maybe one of the other residents would be able to explain the rules of how to play them to Albus.

Before he could make up his mind the chime sounded drawing his attention to the slate next to his door where names of people showing up with the wish to visit him were displayed. When he had been shown his rooms he had been given an explanation on how the slate worked and he had spent most of the first day examining the intricate charms work.

The name stated on the slate now was that of Amos Diggory. What did the man want here? Albus picked up the charmed piece of chalk and made a check mark next to the name, indicating his willingness to accept the visitor. If he didn’t want to see someone he simply would cross out the name. Not that he had had that many visitors up till this moment.

Curious why Amos Diggory, who had lost his son not even a year ago, was now visiting him here in Egypt, Albus moved into his sitting room and ordered a tea set to share with his guest via another slate mounted to a wall there.
“Amos, come in, come in!” Albus greeted his guest a few minutes later when the tall man appeared at his door. “I just ordered some tea. Why don’t you come in, sit down and have some?” It was clear to Albus the moment he had opened the door that Amos wasn’t happy. But why he looked so out of sorts wasn’t really as clear.

They sat down and Amos started the conversation with small talk, the usual stuff, weather, the hospital and the gardens it was situated in. But curiously enough the goings on of politics back home – a staple of small talk and gossip – was suspiciously absent.

After almost three quarters of an hour in the same range of topics Albus had enough. “Amos, you haven’t come here to speak with me about the differences in weather between London and Alexandria. As I have seen only recently the prices for international portkeys are too steep to contemplate buying one just to visit a casual acquaintance for a cup of tea. What are you here to speak about?” Because Albus was certain that Amos wanted to talk about something. The way he had hesitated several times, searching for words, but in the end clearly selecting a different topic had been an obvious give away.

For a moment it looked like Mr. Diggory's face was filled with loathing. But quick as a blink the man looked more like one who had lost all hope, than one preparing to murder another human being.

“Why have you given up, Headmaster? Why did you stop fighting? How shall I manage to oppose evil if you are not there?!” With each word Amos voice had risen in volume, going from a resigned, hopeless almost whisper to a beseeching shout.

Albus was stunned.

“I have given up? What evil should I be fighting in your eyes?” Albus had a feeling he already knew what evil Amos was speaking about. But that certainly wasn’t true, was it? Had his delusions dragged others down with him?

“He-who-must-not-be-named of course! He is corrupting the children with his so called school, and that adoption program! But with your sudden, unwarranted retreat he’ll find much less resistance!” There was a glint in the man’s eyes that looked a lot like a need for revenge.

With carefully chosen words Albus tried to relax the situation while also gauging how far Amos would go in his chosen mission. “Lord Slytherin’s actions have been all within the boundaries of the laws as far as I can judge. In what way do you think he is corrupting the children?”

But the wizard wasn’t inclined to answer any questions. “Why, Headmaster? Why have you run? Why did you leave the floor to the man who murdered my son?”

Aware of the quite real possibility that this confrontation might turn violent Albus tried to look calm and collected while he answered. “My health is no longer what it used to be, Amos. I’m told about things others witnessed me doing, but don’t remember them happening. You certainly can see how that can unsettle a person. The healers in this place are the best in treating ailments of the mind caused by old age and certain magics. It simply was my best option to search treatment here.”

He was exaggerating of course. The letter he had written to the Minister, which then had somehow found its way into the Daily Prophet, was the only thing he had no clear recollection of writing. But overstating his health problem might work in his favour here, giving Amos a way to rationalise Albus’ retreat from the political stage that wouldn’t result in immediate violence. “Have you gotten help to cope with your grief?” Outliving a child was said to be one of the greatest hardships that could happen to parents. Maybe that possibility for violence Albus could so clearly feel from the other wizard was caused by the trauma and grief caused by his son’s death.
One again ignoring the question, Amos stood, leaving his one cup of tea only half finished. “So once you’re better you’ll return?”

Trying for a casual stance, Albus stood as well, smiling his best grandfatherly smile. “I try to abide by my healer’s advice not to let myself be distracted from my current main focus by planning too far into the future.”

That answer, while totally untrue and much too vague to hold any valuable information, seemed to be what Amos had been wanting to hear. He smiled and gave a small bow. “Then I’ll return back home with the hope that you’ll be back in top form soon, able to rejoin our efforts to rid the world of one of it’s larger evils. Have a nice day.”

And he was gone, out of the door and probably halfway to the apparation area just outside the clinics wards.

Feeling weak in his knees, Albus slowly sank back down onto the divan he favoured in his sitting room – the vibrant colours just suited his tastes the most – and took a deep breath. What a strange encounter.

Could it be that the true figure behind the changes in the policies in the adoption process had just revealed himself to Albus? And were there more? The way Amos had talked it did seem likely that he had been at least involved in that somehow.

But all that aside the much bigger question was if Albus needed to do something. And if he chose to take action. What should he do?

Albus managed to go into the gardens that afternoon and wandered among hedges and under palms, pondering what he had learned. He really hadn’t decided by the time he went back to his rooms for dinner and a quite evening meditating. He needed more time to come to a conclusion.

Chapter End Notes

I’m back! And I tried to jump a little forward in time. Other configurations would leave out quite a bit, or put the focus too much onto only a few characters. I hope the way I decided to go about things works out well.

Recommendation: “Nose to the Wind” by Batsutousai on AO3. I love a good do-over story!

Sitting behind his desk, going over possible investments for the money Marvolo had managed to accumulate -- by carefully investing the loan Lucius had given to him at really generous conditions -- the sound of a house-elf popping into the room drew Marvolo’s attention.

Flimm was standing there in his snow-white linen towel, proud and without fear, waiting to be acknowledged to deliver whatever information he had come to impart. “Yes, Flimm?”

The elf came to attention and spoke in its slightly squeaky voice. “Blond wizard Lucius waiting in Floo room. Here to speak with Master Marvolo. Flimm said he would deliver message.”

Even if Miss Granger was mistaken about freeing all the elves, she seemed to have a point about treating them with some respect. Flimm was a lot more pleasant to be around than many elves Marvolo had had contact with in the past.

“I’ll be there in a moment. Set up tea for two in the drawing room and bring my guest there.” Marvolo didn’t know why Lucius was here, as he hadn’t called for him and there had been no pre-arranged meeting this day.

So it probably was something important.

A few minutes later Marvolo walked into the drawing room and Lucius rose from his armchair only to sink down to one knee and bow his head. “My Lord.”

Not willing to lose time over some silly formalities, Marvolo waved his hand somewhat impatiently and walked straight to his own favoured armchair. “Rise and sit down, Lucius. I gather you have something important to report?” Short flicks of his fingers had cream and sugar float into his cup, which then filled with hot tea, courtesy of the floating teapot operated by Flimm.

“That’s correct, my Lord. By chance I overheard a few wizards from the Department for the Regulation and Control of Magical Creatures talking about their decision to set up a test for the ability of parseltongue with a conjured snake. They seemed convinced it was the most hassle-free way to go about things. I clearly remember the description of the conjured snake as confused and dangerous in the text I learned that particular spell from when I was a teenager. I thought it best to make sure you knew of this as soon as possible, my Lord.”

Closing his eyes and counting backwards in increasing steps, Marvolo automatically fell into a relaxing breathing pattern. Those absolute ignorant and dangerous idiots!
He opened his eyes once he felt that he had calmed down enough. Then he took a few minutes to drink his tea before looking back at Lucius, who seemed paler than usual.

“Thank you for informing me, Lucius. I fear I’ll have to influence the process more than I had planned to, in the end. But I can’t simply allow them to set a conjured snake loose near a child that young.” He stood. “Flimm will see you out. Have a good day.”

Not waiting for Lucius to leave, Marvolo called his cheapest and most unremarkable cloak down from his room with an accio. Where he was planning to go now, standing out wasn’t something most should do. Not that it would be a problem for him, but today he really would prefer not to draw attention.

In less than five minutes Marvolo had apparated to a spot in Knockturn Alley that was used by all those who preferred not to be seen in the more socially acceptable places around here. And most of the time the upstanding witches and wizards totally agreed, preferring not to see the less friendly and beautiful.

With decisive strides, Marvolo made his way over to the specialised apothecary he had visited before. It had been around back when he had finished school, and once or twice he had helped out with their animals for some extra money. They didn’t make enough to hire someone to help, and in the end the place hadn’t offered the opportunities Marvolo had been after. Even if his unique skills had been – and still were – an exceptionally good fit.

Now he came here to hopefully get the owner, the son of the man he had worked for back then, and an expert on snakes to accompany him to the Ministry. A small bell rang as Marvolo stepped through the door and into the slightly musty and darkened interior of the specialised apothecary. The place where everyone bought snake venom who needed the best ingredients.

“One moment!” A call came from the back, from the door behind the counter covered with a tattered curtain.

So Marvolo waited a moment, listening in to the idle, sleepy chattering of the snakes all around in the different enclosures. They all were as close to the snakes’ natural habitats as magic could make them. Marvolo nodded in approval. That snakes were treated well always had been something that had been of great interest to him.

“How may I help?” the owner, Marten Singer, asked while stepping through the door and up to the counter. When Marvolo turned around to answer, he saw the wizard’s eyes widen in surprise. But the man kept standing, neither his father nor he ever had been associated with the Death Eaters.

“I’m here to ask for your input as an expert on snakes. The Ministry needs one, but the people in charge of the situation are stubborn and insist that conjuring a snake is just as good.”

“No way!” Mr. Singer interrupted, wide eyes even wider in surprise.

Marvolo nodded, grim. “I hope taking care of some of the work they seem to think is too much, will help them be more reasonable. Do you have time?”

He had time and so they moved quickly to get to the Ministry as fast as humanly possible. Marvolo didn’t explain why exactly the Ministry needed an expert on snakes. Better to keep his involvement as small as possible.

He was so frustrated with the stubborn, short-sighted people working on this. He wanted to get Marcus home. It all really was taking too long.
Marvolo worked on his patience while they arrived at the Ministry, waited in line at the security desk, waited for an elevator with enough space for two people, waited in the elevator on their way to the right floor, and then walked down said corridor dodging people who wanted to talk with Lord Slytherin.

At first Marvolo had planned to go directly to the Department responsible for getting the test with the snake sorted out. But that would make it obvious that he had involved himself with acquiring an expert for them. So they went to the office of Mrs. Wispy instead.

“Lord Slytherin! What a surprise!” They were greeted with her usual cheeriness, while she hurried through her stacks of parchment and books like she didn’t care she might topple one of them. For a short moment Marvolo wondered if she had this skill of avoiding toppling them because she knew the layout of her office so well, or if she would be able to do that in any room filled with random unstable stacks of objects.

Shoving that idle thought aside – even though it was a puzzle he would love to solve – Marvolo brought a strained smile to his face. No need to hide his waning patience with the proceedings from the woman so intent to get families united. “Mrs. Wispy, a small owl told me that you are in need of an expert on snakes. And as I feel the process shouldn’t be delayed any longer, I thought I’d bring someone I know to be competent and independent.” He turned halfway back to the wizard behind him, waving to point the witch’s attention towards him, for an introduction. “This is Mr. Singer. Owner of an apothecary specialising in snake parts, and more specifically, venom.”

The two exchanged polite greetings, and then Mrs. Wispy turned towards Marvolo. “I knew you would be able to point us in the direction of an actual expert. I tried to talk sense into them, but they brushed me off, claiming they were the experts on all things creature. I tried to tell them that they’re not experts on all things animal, just because they can spot a kneazle among a litter of kittens, but they were stubborn.” A hint of a mischievous smile, and a wink, was sent from Mrs. Wispy to both wizards. “I’ll just claim that they were being slow and I managed to find an expert they’ll have to work with now. Come, I want to inform them!”

Amused by her obvious glee to rub the noses of her colleagues in their incompetence, Marvolo followed without fuss, thinking he could claim to have visited to inquire into the progress and tagged along because he had been asked to.

Easily enough done.

It didn’t take long until they came near the doors to the Department for the Regulation and Control of Magical Creatures and slowed down when they heard loud voices from a cubicle near the main entrance to the Department.

“We need to make an appointment with the school,” a deep voice said.

“Can’t we just send a summons to a test here at the Ministry?” the answering voice almost whined.

“No! Because the one being tested is a small kid,” there seemed to be a silent idiot tacked on there, “and Mrs. Wispy insists we need to be cautious, take measures to make the child feel safe,” there was a derisive snort, probably from the person being talked to, “but I think if the kid can talk to snakes, it’s not really worth the hassle. It’ll turn dark anyway. Just look at that Potter boy. Resorted into Slytherin, he held on pretty long, but now he’s on the slippery slope into darkness. Friends with a werewolf, I heard.”

Marvolo clenched his hands, taking deep even breaths. Maybe he should get some Aurors down here to keep himself from attacking those people. Instead he strengthened his Occlumency shields.
and made himself a promise to memorise everything he could about those people and wait for an opportunity to ruin their lives.

Before the two men – judging by their voices – could say any more infuriating and incriminating stuff, Mrs. Wisby decided she'd had enough and walked around the corner huffing like an enraged hippogriff. “I’ll let you know that I’ll handle the matter from here on out! Really! What has the kid done to you?” She waved Mr. Singer forward, while Marvolo took a step back so he could observe from the shadows. “This is Mr. Singer. He owns an apothecary and trades in snake parts. He’s an expert in how to handle snakes and will be the one arranging and conducting the test. Your Department won’t be needed any longer.”

“Now see here! You can’t do that! We’re the experts and the process demands that the test for family magic is to be done by an expert prior to the adoption being concluded! And we are the experts on creatures in the Ministry. So you can’t toss us out,” the wizard with the darker voice, the one proclaiming Marcus a lost cause to the dark because of his ability, concluded smugly. Marvolo committed his face to memory and paid attention so as not to miss the moment Mrs. Wisby or one of the others would finally name some names. All would be so much easier if he didn’t have to search for them before deciding what to do.

“Nowhere is it stated that the expert needs to be from the Ministry. Amos Diggory declared your department the experts, but the fact it took you this long and you still haven’t decided what form a test needs to take to verify the existence of the gift of Parseltongue in a child, suggests otherwise!” Huffing in obvious frustration, Mrs. Wisby gave both wizards a disapproving glare, which reminded Marvolo of the face some of the caretakers at Wool’s had had down to perfection. He had perfected not showing his reaction to it pretty early on, but it never had changed the fact that such glares had sent cold shivers of dread down his spine.

Not being the one the glare was aimed at, in contrast, had some kind of reassuring quality. How odd.

“I had thought better of you, Neil, and you too Albert.” Dismissing the two angry and flummoxed-looking wizards, Mrs. Wisby turned to Mr. Singer. “Have you got some time so we can discuss how you would set up a test for the ability to speak with snakes for a child?”

With a clear grin on his face – it seemed as if the man had enjoyed the show – Mr. Singer nodded. “I came with time to spare. One thing I can say for sure now, we should get a non-venomous snake for this. Oh, and Lord Slytherin shouldn’t be there.” The look Marvolo got was apologetic, but he only shrugged.

“I always knew that I can’t be there. It was added to the procedures when they were re-worked. That’s not a problem. I’m just glad that now an actual expert will design and oversee the whole thing.” And he honestly was. The thought of Marcus having to converse with an angry, conjured snake, probably a venomous one... it simply was too much.

Mrs. Wisby took Mr. Singer to her office to discuss the test setup, and Marvolo slowly made his way back to the entrance hall to floo back home.

And while he was on the way – ignoring the curious looks he still was getting – his thoughts started to circle again.

They still hadn’t found the individual, or individuals, behind the disastrous changes in the adoption policies. And here he stumbled over two people in the Ministry obviously still harbouring animosity against him. Willing to condemn a child as young as Marcus as being dark – which practically was synonymous with evil in their books – just because of an ability he had been born
Neither seemed to be important enough to have the influence needed to effect the changes they had discovered, remove roadblocks for Miss Summers, or keep out of the limelight while doing those things.

But Mrs. Wisby had brought up Amos Diggory, a man who was all around well known and well liked. And who had a very good reason to be against everything that Marvolo might want to pass. Only now that Marvolo had been a father for a while and looked into growing their family, did he understand what it must be like to lose a child. He always had known the devastating effect something like this could have on a person, a weakness he had seen and used back then, but only now did he feel that he might actually understand why.

Maybe he should set a few of his people to looking into Diggory and his two friends in the Department for the Regulation and Control of Magical Creatures.

While thinking about the possible after effects of his off-hand order to Pettigrew to kill the Diggory boy, Marvolo had started to pace, berating himself once again for his stupid error back when he had been a teenager. Maybe he needed to find a way to make sure the book he was writing, gathering all the information on Horcruxes there was, would be available to anyone considering such a foolish move.

He had forgotten where he was and how long he had been pacing here when a woman suddenly spoke to him. “Why are you pacing here? One of the Aurors saw and informed Rufus and he sent me, because he was worried. What’s on your mind, Lord Slytherin?”

Marvolo turned to the voice and saw a contemplative Madame Bones standing there. “I guess I got sucked into fruitlessly contemplating the long-term effects of tragic events.” Because even as the official story said he had been pressured into going along with the resurrection ritual, and had watched helplessly while the young man had been killed, the fact that all that had been supposedly caused by a curse he had come in contact with decades earlier made it somehow his responsibility.

Madame Bones probably had seen his confusion over the whole mess he had created in a bid to start fresh. Smiled a friendly smile. “I offered you moral support. I guess listening to whatever had you pacing here for over an hour, scowling so darkly that a seasoned Auror was frightened enough to go to his superior instead of taking the situation in hand, is the least I can do.”

Smiling despite himself, Marvolo nodded his assent. “I guess sitting down, a cup of tea, and another point of view might actually be of help.” If he was careful to stick to his story – which he should be able to do easily – Madame Bones’ insight into the workings of the Ministry might actually be helpful to unravel his vague impression of the whole situation.

They retreated into Madame Bones’ office, where they drank tea and spoke for over two hours.

Ron knew that he had once again managed to screw up completely. The reactions of everyone around him for the last few days would have made it more than clear, if he hadn’t noticed the moment Harry followed Hermione out of the Great Hall Wednesday morning anyway.

All the girls in Gryffindor had started to glare at him, Hermione had avoided him, and Dean and Seamus had acted as if they pitied him. Ron wasn’t so sure that they weren’t joking behind his back. Neville had sided with the girls.

It was so unfair.

Everyone was on Hermione’s side. Ron just knew how they all said that he had hurt her. But not one of them even stopped for one moment to see that she had hurt him too!

And so he walked here, down one of the less-often-used corridors, while dinner was still going on, brooding. Why didn't one of his friends see how Hermione was ignoring him? They had been friends for so long. And still it seemed as if he didn’t even register as a possible boyfriend for her.

She even had said as much.

Balling his hands into fists, Ron made a tight circle in the hall, to avoid punching the wall. Even in his frustration he knew that punching a wall of solid stone wouldn’t end well for him.

Life was unfair! Why had Krum snatched Hermione up just before Ron himself had noticed that she was a girl? He had known her longer!

Scowling at nothing, Ron was so distracted by his thoughts running in circles that he didn’t notice the moment someone stepped out of an empty classroom behind him, following him with steps so quiet a silencing spell must have been applied.

But he couldn’t miss another figure stepping out of a door a little further ahead.

He stopped, looked up, and scowled at his older brother Fred instead of the floor. “What do you want?”

“Ickle Ronikins, why so aggressive?” asked the twin who had followed the younger brother. “We want to talk. Nothing more.” Ron turned around so his back was to the wall and he could see both twins – it always was a good idea not to have the twins at behind you – the fact that neither held his wand helped only marginally with Ron’s nervousness.

What were the twins planning?

“Let’s talk in there.” Fred said waving a hand towards the room he had just stepped out of. Suspicious about the whole situation, Ron followed his brother, one hand sliding into his pocket to grab his wand. Were the twins on his side or on Hermione’s?

The rooms was like so many other empty classrooms all around the castle. A few tables, a handful of chairs, a blackboard, and a teacher’s desk, with dust everywhere. George walked up to the teacher’s desk, sitting down casually on top of it, swinging his legs. The other twin stayed by the door, leaning against the wall, probably to make sure Ron couldn’t run.

Unable to relax, Ron took to pacing between the haphazardly arranged furniture.

“Harry made us aware that you could use the advice of an older brother. And we have to admit that we have been remiss in our duties.” The seriousness both of his brothers were maintaining made Ron even more worried. They never were like this. They always joked whatever the situation, they always found something to make fun about. And in a pinch they would poke fun at each other.

“And why doesn’t he speak with me himself?” Another thing that had irked Ron since Wednesday. Harry had followed Hermione out of the Hall, but hadn’t talked to his oldest friend.
The twin on the table looked a little surprised by that. “Ron, you have been avoiding everyone. He thought you needed space. He approached us this morning because he’s worried, Ron. And so are we.”

Ron scoffed and threw himself into one of the chairs. Turning away from his brothers. Harry hadn’t even tried to find Ron so they could talk. He had the map, it should have been easy enough. If Harry really wanted to.

“What made you say such a thing, Ron? Why did you imply that no one could find anything interesting or desirable in Hermione? We know that you find her beautiful. Like most of the rest since the Yule Ball during that tournament.”

Ron shrugged but stayed silent. Of course they were right. Ron had dreamed of her, and wished she would go on a date with him. She could be funny, and she wasn’t bad-looking, breathtaking when she wanted to be. Ron cursed his rotten luck that Krum had realized it sooner than he had.

“I listened when she prattled that nonsense about house-elves! When she insists on repeating the whole bloody test after we finished it. I endure her nagging! I’ve known her so long already. Why? Why won’t she date me?” If he had been any less frustrated and angry, he probably would have been mortified over the sound of desperation in his voice, over the fact that he exposed his innermost thoughts to his two brothers. The two brothers who had always pranked him, avoiding the older brothers and the little princess.

George furrowed his brow, placing his hands next to his legs on the tabletop, leaning forward. “You know, just because you’ve spent some time with her, did something a few times you think she should be grateful for, you’re not entitled to her time and attention!”

Fred took over with the same intensity before Ron could form any response. “She’s her own person. You could spend handfuls of Galleons, sing her self-written serenades, cook her favourite food, and she still has the right to send you packing.”

Ron narrowed his eyes. Why should efforts like that go without a reward?

“Ron, you wouldn’t feel happy if – I don’t know – Bulstrode was interested in you, would you? Would you agree to a date just because she sent you love letters? Sent you a butterbeer over at the Three Broomsticks?”

Bulstrode, that girl from Slytherin he thought of as the ugliest of the bunch, would be a horror. “I never would go on a date with her!” What could that girl ever do to win his favour? It simply was impossible.

“Then don’t be a dick, Ron,” Fred said, walking over to give Ron a pat on the shoulder. “Love isn’t like classes and marks, or gardenwork. Just because you put some effort in doesn’t guarantee you the outcome you wish for.”

Gaping like a fish out of the water, Ron stared at his brothers.

“We think you should take some time to think things over. And to distract you from what else is going on, we wanted to offer you a job this weekend.”
“Exactly,” George said from his place on the desk, now a little more relaxed, “we have rented a spot for a booth again. And we want to sell our newest merchandise. We could use another set of hands, and you’ll get paid. You in?”

Still in shock over the image that he might be expected to go on a date with Millicent Bulstrode if she should ever make an effort – what he had been doing with Hermione was different, wasn’t it? – Ron just nodded and soon was once again alone.

Were the twins right? He wasn’t really sure. Did he think that someone was obligated to go on a date with someone who just put in the effort? Was a date something you could buy?

Ron made it back to the common room just before curfew and still wasn’t nearer to an answer.

oooOOOoo

Saturday, 17th of February 1996

It was the Hogsmeade weekend after Valentine's Day, and the whole student body was in nervous titters over it. Well, all students third year and up. The weather had been dreadful the last few days, and today looked like it would become a reasonably nice day. Harry looked up from his place at the Slytherin table to the ceiling of the Great Hall, watching the big fluffy white clouds floating over the bright blue sky.

“What do you think about Miss Gamp? I’m not sure she’s that good at explaining the theory,” Theo asked Harry while adding more egg to his plate.

“I guess only time will tell.” Harry answered, returning his gaze from the ceiling back to his classmates at the table. “The first-years seem happy with Miss Switch. But can one of you explain to me why they get the teacher with a Mastery and we only get one that intends to start studying for a Mastery?” That had been a problem he had puzzled over since the new temporary teachers had been introduced Thursday morning.

“No idea,” Draco said from Harry’s left side. “Maybe she's better in the topics we’ll need for our OWLs? I hope she is! One subpar teacher is enough.” For a moment Draco frowned. As Harry had learned since he was closer to the Slytherins, the blond really was invested in good grades.

“Next year we’ll probably have a new professor. And Gryffindor will have a new Head,” Daphne added her own knut to the conversation. Harry nodded, cutting up a sausage, and wondering who might take over from Headmistress McGonagall. There weren’t a lot of Gryffindors among the staff.

“Why are you checking on the weather every few bites, Harry?” Theo suddenly asked, catching Harry glancing at the ceiling again, a small grin on his face. “Have you planned something special for your date?”

Harry felt himself blush and cursed the fact that he did. Now all the girls would pester him for details. Assuming a better posture Harry looked over to Theo and raised a brow. “Haven’t you?” That brought about a few sniggers from those sitting near enough to follow their conversation.
Theo laughed. “Touché, Harry. So the weather plays a big role in your plans?”

Harry finished his breakfast, grinned, and got up from his seat. “It does. And I better hurry and check that everything is organised as it should be. See you lot later.”

And with that Harry was walking out of the Great Hall in the direction of the kitchens. He needed to check with Dobby that everything was ready and which signals they would be using.

What luck that it wasn’t raining.

oooOOooo

The group which walked down towards Hogsmeade was a mixed bunch. Gryffindors, Slytherins, and Ravenclaws, as well as an international Quidditch player. Harry was grinning from ear to ear, walking next to a happily humming Luna, looking up to the bright blue sky. It had been happy coincidence that they had arrived at the doors at the same time. They had decided to walk down together, as the weather was cold, but nice and sunny.

Ginny and Michael Corner, from Ravenclaw, walked hand in hand right behind Hermione and Viktor, who were talking animatedly about some historical text they both had read in the last few weeks. Parvati and her sister were walking with their group, laughing and planning to enjoy the day together, ignoring all those with dates. Daphne, her sister Astoria, Pansy, and both Vincent and Gregory were trailing behind the couples, making jokes.

Both Draco and Theo were walking further down. Draco on a date with Millicent, and Theo with Lisa Turpin from Ravenclaw. He had informed Harry that he had been surprised that she had asked him, but had accepted because she was nice enough and he wanted to practice. When Harry had looked sceptical Theo had shrugged. It wasn’t as if Lisa expected more than a nice afternoon with tea and sweet cakes in Madam Puddifoot's Tea Shop.

Harry wasn’t sure that he really understood, but it seemed that all those who had to expect an arranged marriage after they had finished Hogwarts tended to go on dates with different people as long as they still could. Or at least the boys did.

Looking over towards a skipping Luna, Harry grinned and discarded those heavy thoughts. He wanted to enjoy the day. The future would be here soon enough.

“Viktor and I’ll go to the bookstore first!” Hermione called back towards Harry, the moment they reached the village.

Harry waved, while their group quickly disbanded when everyone started to walk to their first destination for the day, and turned to Luna. “Where do you want to go first?”

“I need a new quill,” she said swirling in place, stopping with her face towards Harry.

He smiled a little helplessly. “So, Scrivenshaft’s?” They had the biggest selection of quills and inks.

Luna hummed and snatched Harry’s hand, skipping towards the building which held the shop selling stationery. While Luna flitted from shelf to shelf as a butterfly would flutter from blossom to blossom, Harry watched with a happy smile. Luna seemed so happy all the time. He knew that people tended to make mean comments about her and to her face, but despite all that, she found happiness. Harry selected a new inkwell as his last one was running low, and then went over to the register to pay. “Luna, may I pay for your quills?”

She had selected a bunch of brightly coloured quills, simple goose feathers patterned in fantastic colours. Green with swirls, blueberry and purple with spirals, ruby-red scale patterns, and what looked like tiger stripes. “Thank you, that’s really nice of you.”

After that they walked in silence along the road towards the spot near the Shrieking Shack where Harry had arranged with Dobby to have his plan set in motion. Somehow Harry felt nervous over the silence that normally was so soothing. Maybe it was the fact that this wasn’t matching with anything he thought a date should be like? But should he even try to conform to some unclear expectations?

“I hope you like a picnic, Luna. I’ve asked a friend to organise something for us, right there on that patch of grass near the Shack.” Why, oh why did he have to be so nervous?

“That’s a nice idea. Mum often had a picnic with me. The last time it was raining, so we brought the basket into the living room and spread out her favourite blanket. She told me about the moon frogs that day.”

“Moon frogs? Where do they live?” Harry asked, leading Luna towards the spot that had been prepared by Dobby. There was a blanket on the ground, red and white gingham. The moment they stepped onto the blanket and felt the warmth of an area warming charm, Luna kicked off her shoes and sank down to sit in tailor fashion, beaming up at Harry.

He stripped off his hat and the scarf, along with his cloak, as it would get too warm quickly if he kept them on. “Dobby, a house-elf friend I made in second year, agreed to make us a basket.” Just then that basket popped into existence between them, and an eager Luna opened it up.

“Do you want a tuna sandwich?” Luna asked, handing him one, which he accepted gladly. Suddenly the silence wasn’t strained anymore. It was glorious. Birds were singing, the crowd of students in the village and their laughter and cries, the smell of spring from a few early flowers near where they were sitting in the sun filled the air.

After the sandwich was finished, Harry got out a pitcher of lemonade – charmed not to spill anything unintentionally – and two glasses, pouring them both a glass. “It’s nice out here,” Harry observed, sipping at the cooled lemonade. Magic was a wonderful thing.

“Yes, much nicer than the tea shop,” Luna agreed, rummaging in the basket for something, until she came back up with a cauldron cake, smiling.

“You’ve been to Madam Puddifoot’s? I haven’t been yet,” Harry asked, interested.

“Yes. Last year. One of the boys asked me for a date on a dare. It’s much too cluttered with stuff trying to make it look romantic. But it attracts Wrackspurts and other things that might confuse people. And the tea wasn’t nice. This is much better.” She bit heartily into the cake.

Harry laughed. “There aren’t many options for a date here. Don’t you think? I would ask you out to go to the cinema, see a film together. Or to an amusement park. Maybe eating something in a nice restaurant.” He shrugged. “Well, besides the cinema, everything I can think of we can do here in the village. There aren’t that many acceptable activities for dates, are there?”

“What defines an acceptable activity for a date?” Luna idly asked, sipping her lemonade and taking another bite of her cake.

“No idea. Society?” Harry hazarded a guess.

Luna hummed, moving her head from side to side in contemplation. “Wouldn’t it be better if the people going on a date would define what is an acceptable activity? Don’t you think?”

That made Harry pause, taking a small bowl of cut fruit out of the basket. “I guess that would be better. But in my experience, society has a way of getting into everything, judging what’s right or wrong, and letting everyone know its opinion.” Like the gossiping women of Little Whinging, and the middle-aged witches who read witch weekly, reacting to sensationalist stories about the romantic lives of teenagers.

“I know,” Luna simply said, clearly remembering the many taunting calls, and people stealing her stuff.

With a sigh, Harry leaned back on his arms, looking at Luna. “And do you think that this is an acceptable activity for a date?”

“I think it is. Society and what they call normal are overrated,” Luna decided and took out a fork, then scooted over so she could get some of the fruit salad.

“But it’s not easy to really ignore society and all its rules and expectations,” Harry stated, spearing half a grape with his own fork, holding it towards Luna in offer on a whim.

Luna grinned and took the grape off the fork with her mouth, offering her own fork to Harry.

“I guess it would be, with how many expectations rest on you.”

They talked about moon frogs next, and from there they jumped from topic to topic just as those frogs were wont to do.

It was late afternoon when they started to go back to the school. It had been a really nice, if confusing, afternoon. Never had Harry discussed so much philosophy in one day.

oooOOooo

Opposite from Zonko’s the twins had set up their booth for the day. After the success from the cracker booth before the Christmas holidays, Ron kind of understood why they had decided to repeat the attempt to sell their stuff from a booth.

But he was irritated about the way they had made him help. While Fred and Lee Jordan were handing out boxes with those ridiculous hats and collecting the money, George loudly called out the advantages of the Headless-Hat. “Surprise your friends and enemies! Scare them witless! Vanish your head and see others lose theirs!”

As he had been instructed, Ron once more put on the absolutely hideous hat, just glad that it vanished together with his head. The students walking by laughed, and Ron made a half-assed attempt at imitating a headless ghost.

This was so humiliating. He would have liked this job much better if he could just stand at the booth, collecting the money. But both Fred and George had insisted he demonstrate the hats for their customers.

While Ron repeatedly removed his hat – a silly thing with feathers – and put it back on, he watched as Hermione walked hand in hand with Krum from the bookstore to the hideous pink Tea Shop.

How normal and boring. All couples went to Madam Puddifoot’s Tea Shop. Ron had thought Krum would be above such average dates.

Or maybe Ron was just jealous that Hermione wasn’t interested in him. Because if he was honest, he didn’t have any other ideas for a date than going to the Tea Shop. Dean had told him that there were a lot of small booths, where one could sit next to their date, which made snogging so much easier.

That thought made Ron uneasy. How far had they gone? And did he really want to know?

Ever since his brothers had spoken to him yesterday, he’d been plagued by the thought of Bulstrode expecting him to go on a date with her just because she had invested time or money in him.

He hadn’t really slept last night. The thought of how horrifying that idea was, and his concerns that really was what he had been doing had kept him awake. Which was another reason he was so cross today, together with this horrible job and the fact that Fred and George had dragged him from the Great Hall down to Hogsmeade much too early. He hadn’t even had time to finish his second helping of scrambled eggs and mushrooms. The two had absolutely no respect for a good breakfast when they thought making money was more important than not being hungry.

It didn’t really take long until all the hats were sold. Even those they had used to demonstrate had been sold. While Ron helped with packing everything away, he watched Hermione walk back in direction of the school, Krum at her side. They were laughing and obviously having a good time.

Ron felt incredibly sad. It had taken him so long to see Hermione as a girl, and now he knew that he would love to be her boyfriend, but also that it was too late.

At least for the moment. Because how long did relationships over long distances last? And Krum certainly got enough attention that he had more temptation around to find someone other than Hermione.

Not that she was someone unworthy of his attention. Rather the other way around. Krum wasn’t around much, Hermione deserved someone who could spend more time with her, share her interests… Ron interrupted his thought process here and moved one of the last empty boxes over to the stack where the rest was gathered to be vanished.

If they hurried up they would be back in time for dinner. And Ron was hungry.

Since Amos had visited him, Albus had returned several times to his pondering of what he should do with his suspicions. He wasn’t really sure that he really had seen what he thought he had seen. Even thinking this, he wasn’t sure it even made sense.

As he did often, Albus walked through the gardens looking on while others played, or sat on a bench watching the different birds pecking at seeds and searching for insects. Getting the exercise the healers insisted he should get, and the sunlight he craved. Most of his life he had spent in Scotland or at other places on the British Islands. The amount of sun he could get here in Alexandria was something different.

When he came across an elderly wizard from Canada – they had played a few games in the past few days – sitting at a board set for checkers, but missing a partner to play... Well, he couldn’t very well let the man wait there for longer, could he?

“May I sit here?” Albus asked and after he got a nod in response he sat down on the carved wooden chair – almost a stool – and made his move as the man he only knew as Will had started immediately once he had asked to sit there.

They sat a while, moves being made back and forth. The sound of the pieces being moved over the stone of the board, the warm breeze in the grass all around, and the calls of a lot of different birds were all that was heard.

Then Albus broke the silence. “There is an acquaintance I know who might be in trouble. And I’m unsure if he really is in trouble and what to do if he is.”

The only response he got was a grunt, but he really hadn’t expected more than that.

“If what I thought I saw is true, then he could do harm to others. Lots of harm if he should decide to go another route, if political manoeuvring isn’t enough for him anymore,” Albus said, moving one of his pieces to claim one from Will. “But if I’m wrong… would me telling someone do him harm?”

And here he was again. A moral conundrum that demanded he make a decision whose interest was more important. Amos’ right not to be slandered, or the need to protect a person from bodily harm, and maybe others, children? Three interests were involved here. Amos with his grief, Tom and his attempt at a second chance, and that of all the children who had a chance at a loving family if they could be adopted.

He didn’t feel confident that the adoptions always would turn out good, and still feared that magical children would be taken from loving muggle families. But was that the most important concern here?

His long pondering and the distraction cost him one of his own pieces, but in the end this was only a way to pass the time, not something he wanted to win desperately.

“If I tell someone that there might be a problem, that he might try to harm another, the other could be on his guard, couldn’t he? And if I’m wrong?” Albus sighed. All his instincts, his long-held beliefs, told him to trust in Amos. He was an upstanding member of society. In contrast Albus hadn’t trusted Tom and the boy’s intentions since the moment he had met him in the orphanage. Maybe even before that.

But he himself had always thought that he was an upstanding member of society as well. And his actions hadn’t been good in all instances. He knew this now. But he hadn’t then.

Could it be that Amos was so injured still by the death of his son that he wasn’t thinking clearly?
If that was the case, the man needed help.

Could Albus do what his brother had done?

Get help for Amos even though he didn’t want it?

But whom should he tell?

In the end Will won the game, as Albus was too distracted to make a real effort. “Thank you, Will.” He said, standing and walking away, as Will set the board back to its starting configuration. Another partner for another game would walk by eventually.

Chapter End Notes

Writing Luna is always an adventure, but definitively fun!
Thank you all for your comments! I really like hearing your thoughts and speculations!

Thanks to Jordre and Jake for helping to improve my spelling!

Just after classes finished for the day and before dinner started in the Great Hall, Harry made his way up to the owlery. Ever since he had gotten the two mirrors enabling him to communicate with Sirius and Marvolo, much as he would have been able with a phone, there hadn’t been much need to send Hedwig out to deliver any letters. She still came by most mornings, sometimes staying for a while, nicking stuff from his plate, and Harry was always happy to see her. Today he had decided to go visit her for a change.

The date with Luna had been great, but now he wasn’t really sure what to do next. The two had agreed to meet up after dinner and then spend some time in the library together. Harry wanted to draw some more and had asked Luna if she would be his model. She had agreed under the condition that she was allowed to read, as she had found an interesting book on extinct – or as she insisted, allegedly extinct – magical creatures.

Dating was so terribly confusing. By now he had seen and not ignored – at least not with imitating retching noises as Ron had done since second year – enough snogging between couples to be curious to try it himself. But he felt so completely unsure how to even get to that point, that he had decided to visit Hedwig. He hoped to have time to think away from his friends. As much as he loved having a big group of friends, they didn’t help him get his thoughts sorted out.

Maybe he should simply ask Luna if she wanted him to kiss her, or if she wanted to kiss him. Anything that went any further made Harry even more nervous, while at the same time he tended to get the book – which so many of the other boys had wanted to borrow – out from where he had placed it out of sight to read it at night.

Being a teenager really was confusing.

But the moment Harry stepped from the stairs onto the floor covered with small bones, feathers, owl droppings, and patches of half-digested fur, all thoughts of having time to himself flew away.

Ron was standing in one of the open arched windows, his small owl Pigwidgeon fluttering around him in obvious agitation. But as that owl always was that excited, Harry really wasn’t paying the small bird much attention.

Hedwig came down from one of the higher perches, and Harry walked over to where she found a place not out of Harry’s reach, his steps making enough noise on the dirty floor to be heard over the sound of wind, birds, and the slow dripping of rain from the roof edge.
“Hi, Hedwig,” Harry greeted his owl, carefully stroking the incredibly soft, white feathers on her breast. He chuckled when Hedwig assumed a pose making his stroking her breast easier, almost looking like she was posing for a picture.

Harry tried to ignore Ron, and the sounds his friend made at the other side of the owlery, but it really wasn’t easy. Maybe he should go down to one of the courtyards. In this weather it was almost certain he would be alone there.

“Harry?” And there went that idea. Keeping his face pleasant, Harry turned around to show Ron that he had heard him.

“Yes?”

Ron shuffled his feet, looking everywhere but at Harry, a deep blush clashing horribly with his red hair. “Thanks for sending Fred and George after me.”

Harry shrugged, feeling decidedly awkward. “They certainly know much more about relationships than I. And, well…” Harry turned back to pet Hedwig some more, an excellent way to avoid looking at Ron. “I felt that you might possibly have an easier time accepting help from them.”

For several minutes both Harry and Ron stayed silent, each focusing on his owl, ignoring each other and the comings and goings of the different owls.

“I don’t understand what Hermione sees in Krum. But I guess I can’t make her like me that way. Can I?” Ron finally said, not reacting to Harry’s admittance to his lack of experience. “So I’ll try to catch her interest?” It sounded more like a question than a statement.

“And how do you plan to go about that?” Considering his two friends and their respective interests, Harry wasn’t so sure that Ron would succeed. He was an avid fan of Quidditch, adventure, good food, and had a knack for coming up with tales Trelawney would like, but not much else. Hermione, on the other hand, had several interests that were tied to studying, like Ancient Runes and philosophy. The way Ron had only grudgingly supported Hermione on her quest for house-elf freedom and rights – not that Harry had been any better – let Harry think that the two of them hadn’t all that many interests in common.

There was a frustrated sigh. “Not sure.” Ron walked over the floor, crunching something under his feet, to lean against the wall near to where Harry was standing with Hedwig. “Maybe spending more time studying, with her of course, could help.” Ron shrugged and Harry had to grin.

“The fact that it’ll help you do good in your OWLs certainly won’t hurt either. It’s a plan, Ron. Not sure if it’ll work, but it certainly sounds better than yelling at her.”

Ron nodded thoughtfully. “Girls are so bloody confusing. Not sure how the twins do it. Asking a girl out, I mean. And Dean always talks about the girls he has kissed during the summer. Even Percy managed to get a girlfriend!” Ron suddenly exclaimed, startling a few owls into flight. “Can’t be that hard if even Percy managed it.”

Harry wasn’t so sure about the implied idea that it should have been hard for Percy to find a girl willing to go on dates with him, but he decided to nod slowly anyway. “Hermione isn’t the only one around. I think everyone can find a partner somewhere, even if it’s kind of hard and a lot of work.”

They stood in silence for a moment, Harry searching for something to talk about that was somewhat safer territory than girlfriends, Quidditch, or classes, but that wasn’t too much of a
“Are they still together?” Harry finally asked, the only topic that came to mind and was even somewhat safe. While Ron thought about his answer, Harry felt the need to contemplate if Ron would even notice a sudden shift in topic for what it was. A diversion tactic.

“I’m not sure. Percy didn’t write so far. Not that I even want him to write. But Mum tends to complain about him working too much.” Soon Ron was deep into a long rant about how not one of his whole family was even able to see him among all the older, talented, and accomplished brothers.

Harry didn’t interrupt him once, only making the expected noises at the appropriate times to keep him going. This rant wasn’t something new, and Harry felt that it might do Ron some good to get all those feelings of envy off his chest.

They left for the Great Hall together in time for dinner. When they split to go to their respective tables, Harry smiled. That had been the longest conversation they had had in some time. Maybe he would be able to keep Ron as a friend, even though he had been sure for a while that the closeness they had shared in their first years at Hogwarts would never return.

Xerxes sat in a comfortable armchair – nicely padded and with a cushioning charm – waiting for his Lord to return and reading his latest letter from Hermione. She had written at length of her rendezvous with the international Quidditch star Viktor Krum. He simply had to smile at the way she concentrated on the description of their debates over various academic and political topics. Other girls – and boys for that matter – probably would have concentrated on the places they had gone to on the date, or how they had looked, what their partner had worn. The better he got to know his heiress, the more he was convinced that her focus was an academic one.

The door opened, admitting Lucius and Benjamin, followed closely by Marvolo. So Xerxes folded the letter and slipped it into his pocket, a smile on his face.

“Thank you all for coming,” Marvolo started their meeting – Xerxes had been early to play a game of chess with Marvolo and had lost dramatically – after they all had taken a seat. “Did you find information on those two from the Department for the Regulation and Control of Magical Creatures?”

Lucius took over the conversation to answer with the findings the other three had made. “Neil is the wizard Neil Smith, a parchment-shuffler mostly. He is the wizard responsible for the werewolf registry, and naturally is invested in the continued existence of said registry.”

Marvolo nodded in acknowledgement, and a tea tray popped into existence on the small table in the middle of the seating group that had been set up in Marvolo’s study. Marvolo filled a cup for each of them by floating first the teapot and then the cream jug before finally adding sugar, one floating cube at a time.
Ignoring all that impressive wandless magic, Lucius continued to give his report. “Albert is most likely Albert Thomas. He’s the one in charge of checking applications for licences. You know, those that one needs to keep kneazles or crups.” Accepting his floating cup with a nod in thanks to their Lord, Lucius took a sip, and then continued, while the rest of them took their cups to sip at their tea.

Xerxes quickly covered his reaction to the tea. Marvolo had a tendency to just add a tad too much sugar to almost everything.

“Both of them have been seen with Amos Diggory more than once. At office parties, during lunch break…” Lucius took a sip from his tea, giving a delicate shrug with only one shoulder. “People seem to believe they’re friends.”

For a moment there was silence between them. Until Marvolo finished one of the delicate biscuits that had been provided with the tea. “I guess the fact that those two are utterly unremarkable and without any true power is the reason none of us ever attempted to get to know them better?”

Xerxes smirked but refrained from commenting, but Benjamin nodded. “The werewolves who allied with you, my Lord, weren’t interested in the registry beyond defying the order to go and register. And getting influence in the office handing out licenses to crup breeders… well, the Floo Office certainly had priority.”

“I want you all to search for the tiniest bit of dirt you can find about those two. If they have accepted bribes, have dalliances outside of their marriages, are visiting disreputable pubs…” Marvolo made small circles with his hand next to his face, clearly indicating that the list of possible blackmail material wasn’t complete. “I want to know it all. And while you’re at it, see if you can find proof of any involvement of those two in the mess that was made of the adoption process.”

They all accepted the order willingly, and then turned to the preparation for the next Wizengamot session.

Wednesday, 21st of February 1996

It had taken some time to work everything out. Bill had needed to arrange for a day off. Sirius had had to wait to get an international portkey to France. But today everything was ready. The curse-breaker and he would take the portkey, then Sirius would apparate them to the house. Once they were there, Sirius had planned to call on Kreacher so he would be able to help with the dust they were sure to find.

“Have everything?” Sirius asked Bill where they stood in the kitchen at Grimmauld Place. The red-head was checking his satchel for the fifth time in the last few minutes.

“I think I do. Or, let’s say, I’m trying to convince myself that I have everything I’ll need. Because how dark can a vacation home get, right?” Bill answered grinning from ear to ear.

Sirius laughed. “Do you really want me to answer that? I fear it’ll turn out to be filled to the attic with dangerous, cursed books, statuettes, and poisoned silverware.” It had been a while since he had set foot into that particular house. If he remembered correctly, it had been the summer before he had started at Hogwarts and had dared to be sorted into Gryffindor. “Not sure when the last human was inside that house.”

“But you know enough to apparate us there?” Bill wanted to know, reaching once again to sort through the many different items neatly arranged inside the satchel, before visibly restraining himself and closing the simple leather knapsack.

Sirius knew he probably had a wistful smile on his face, but he didn’t care. “I have many a fond memory of that place. I’ll get us there safely.” The memories were all tinged in both sadness and fondness, maybe even in equal measures. But it had been the last summer that his parents had seemed to care about him. He hadn’t been happy with everything they did, but he had been able to pretend that they were harsh sometimes because they cared.

Shaking his head, Sirius pushed that ache aside. He would make new, good, memories there soon. Dwelling on the past too long wasn’t a good idea. As Remus regularly reminded him.

“Then let’s go!” Bill was almost sending sparks into the air around him with the enthusiasm for their planned endeavour. It made Sirius happy to see the youthful happiness Bill found in his chosen profession, even as it reminded him painfully of how James would get when they had started planning a new prank.

Both of them took a good grip on the simple wood disk carved with the location the portkey was set to and the activation phrase and one word had them both hurtling through space in a whirl of colours that made Sirius dizzy.

ooOoo

The first impression Bill got from the summer cottage was one of wary watchfulness. The second one was that the garden was almost as bad as the one around the Burrow.

Or maybe not. His mother usually had the more dangerous plants under good control. It looked like there might be some devil’s snare hiding out under a thick bush of yew. They would have to check the small garden around the house as well.

The pathway up to the house from the gate thankfully was bare of any plants, dangerous or otherwise. So Sirius and he didn’t have to be cautious on their way up to the door.

Bill had his senses stretched out before him, almost tasting – at least this was the closest he could come to describing it – the wards around this place, which reluctantly accepted the visitor the owner had brought with him. He felt like skipping, or bouncing on his toes, like the moment just before they were allowed to open their Christmas presents back when he had been barely nine years old. This was so much closer to what he had done, and loved, back in Egypt. He, mostly alone, and the wards on a place he wanted to make safe to walk through. The lake inside that cave and all the Inferi inside it had been a challenge, and working in such a big team a new experience, but this was the reason he had decided to go into curse breaking in the first place.

They reached the door, and Sirius pressed his hand against the door, murmuring something under his breath, much too quietly for Bill to make out any words.
The door – dark wood, intricately carved and decorated with silver-coloured nails – swung open into the hallway, and Bill got his wand out.

“If I remember correctly, there's a kitchen in the basement, next to a potions laboratory, a wine cellar, a pantry, and a laundry. You know, where clothes are washed, dried, and so on.” Sirius waved at a small door set into the wall, next to where they entered the house. Just one look was enough, and Bill was sure that this house had been expanded through liberal use of expanding enchantments.

“There's a dining room, a tea room, a drawing room, and a conservatory with attached patio on the ground floor.” Sirius waved in the direction of the doors on both sides of the corridor leading away from where they were standing. “Upstairs there are several bedrooms, each with a small bathroom, another drawing room, a game room, and the small staircase leading to the attic.” Bill whistled, impressed over the amount of space someone had been able to get out of the unimpressive cottage. It sounded as if it was at least four times the size on the inside.

“And what’s up in the attic?” Bill wanted to know, looking around in search of the usual signs of magical pests which tended to settle into abandoned magical houses.

“Elf quarters, a storage room, and an owlery, as far as I know. It's possible that there’s more up there, but the kids never were allowed to go up there. For all I know, there’s a zoo or museum up there.” Sirius waggled his eyebrows in an attempt to lighten the mood. Not that Bill thought the tension in the air was in any way distressing. Quite the opposite really. He loved it.

“So we start with a sweep of the ground floor, working from here towards the back, and go up from there?” Bill asked, more in an attempt to include Sirius than to ask for the wizard’s approval. “I would like to dismantle or mark the most dangerous things we might find, before going into the finer details.” That had always been the protocol in any tomb: get in, make sure nothing behind you could trigger, and sweep the whole place for hidden nasty traps that might trigger in the back because the door had been opened.

“You’re the expert, Bill,” Sirius said. “Do you think it’s safe to call Kreacher? I would be happier if all the dust was gone before we start exploring.”

Bill shook his head. “No, not before we've finished the first sweep. Take one of my dust masks.” Bill opened his satchel and got out the two masks which were designed to cover nose and mouth and filter the air, so that even the most dense sandstorm wouldn’t impede the wearer's breathing.

So warded against dangerous dust and coughing fits, the two wizards carefully made their way into the house, wands drawn and repeatedly casting detection spells. When Bill had to place the first marker stone – a small rune-inscribed stone – to disable a charm designed to divert attention, which had deteriorated to a state it was trying to draw in all attention, Bill was glad he had brought a lot of those in two small bags inside his satchel.

This was going to be fun!

ooOoo

“And there were more Doxies than I had thought I would ever see again at one time! Not even in the curtains at Grimmauld were so many.” Sirius was talking animatedly, and Harry listened with amusement he didn’t bother keeping from his face.

“Did you find any boggarts?” There had been one in a desk at Grimmauld Place, so Harry thought it was only too plausible that there would be one at the summer cottage as well.

“Indeed we did!” Sirius said, waving his hands around so much that the image of him in the mirror moved out of focus, the bed hangings blurring in the background. “But we only marked and sealed the drawers, cupboards, and even a sewing basket, where we found them. Bill said he never had seen so many of them. Remus was astonished as well. He speculated they might have been breeding recently.”

“Don’t they just, I don’t know, pop into existence?” Harry was truly curious. While Remus had made sure they knew where they were likely to encounter dangerous creatures, and which they were, and how to fight them, their actual lives – procreation, behaviour, etc. – hadn’t been covered for all of them.

For a moment Sirius looked startled, then slowly shook his head. “I have no idea, Harry. But we decided to get more help before we get rid of those. I can’t say…” Sirius eyes got darker, and he suddenly stopped talking, changing the topic to talk about the nest of small, bright purple spiders they had found in the piano in the music room Sirius had totally forgotten about. But Harry didn’t need Sirius to tell him that he wasn’t sure if the boggart would turn into a Dementor for Harry’s godfather. He agreed that in this instance, caution was the better part of valour. They certainly had the time to prepare properly before confronting the boggarts.

“Bill will return a few times to dismantle some off the stuff we found, and then Kreacher’ll go in to get rid of the dust and spiderwebs. Clean the windows so that the sun can reach the inside again. Make the house habitable again.” As if someone had flipped a switch the eager anticipation on Sirius’ face changed to nervousness. “Do you think Nawel and Enora will like me?”

Slumping a little in his seat in front of the big fireplace in the Slytherin common room, Harry tried to put what he felt into words that would be reassuring and something clear enough. He feared that he would start rambling if he wasn’t careful.

“I don’t know them personally,” Harry finally started when Sirius started to look concerned. “But I can see that you really want this to work. And I’m sure they’ll see that as well. Everything else will have to come with time.”

“Will you come as well?” Sirius blurted out his question like he was unable to keep it in any longer.

“I’ll have to ask Marvolo if I can come or if he has other plans. You know by then the adoption might be finished. And…” Harry hesitated because he felt conflicted. “I really want to spend my holidays with you. But if Marcus already is adopted, he’ll be at Griffin House… and well, as his big brother, I would like to be there.”

Sirius smiled. It was a sad smile, but there was pride too. “You’ll be a great big brother. A better one than I was.”

Now Harry was sad too. “I’ll do my best.”
They met in a small park near the village where Fleur’s family had their home. The letter with the first invitation had mentioned Lord Slytherin’s wish to ask for a second opinion on something he was working on. Bill was pretty sure the man had been talking about the ritual to remove a horcrux safely from a living being and had answered promptly to make an appointment.

After a few letters back and forth, while also preparing for the examination of the small Black summer house, they had agreed on meeting in France on this very day.

Bill was the first to arrive at the bench, settling down after casting an area heating charm to have his lunch break here. It probably wouldn’t take Lord Slytherin long to make an appearance.

The curse-breaker had finished his first sandwich when he heard the sound of purposeful strides along the gravel path and looked up. He guessed he shouldn’t really be surprised that Lord Slytherin was able to blend in well with the muggle fashion. The story of his childhood in an orphanage in the middle of muggle London made a regular appearance in the newspapers – practically every time the man was mentioned more than in passing – and consequently in the usual workplace gossip. But he allowed himself to feel a little surprised by how well the wizard born in the twenties was able to blend into modern fashion.

“Do I have something on my face?” Slytherin asked once he was near enough to do so without resorting to yelling. “Or did I manage to dribble honey down my shirt?”

“No,” Bill managed to answer after he had taken a moment to gather himself. “I just wouldn’t think… seeing you in a jumper over a shirt and simple slacks… I have to confess to being surprised.”

At this Lord Slytherin laughed, before sitting down on the bench next to the eldest Weasley son. “You wrote to dress appropriately for a muggle setting. And considering the weather in the south of France, I didn’t want to go with a more formal mode of dress.”

With a casual flip of the man’s wrist he held his pale wand in hand – it must still fit him well if the man had chosen to use a wand so infamous that many recognised it by sight – and started to draw runes into the air, creating privacy wards which would disperse the moment they both chose to leave.

Without any preamble Lord Slytherin reached into his trouser pocket retrieving a shrunken scroll. “As the next good day for a major magical ritual nears, I wanted to ask for your opinion on my revised version of the ritual I had attempted this last Yule.” The older wizard held out the small scroll to Bill, who took it with a hand that, thankfully wasn’t shaking. “The last attempt didn’t harm the original container, but I had difficulties finishing it the way I had planned to do, and when I attempt to remove the horcrux from my son’s body, such isn’t tolerable. I have included my attempt at a recording of that ritual, and what I think I got wrong.” Bill started to turn the scroll over in his hands, uncertain if he should put it away or get out his wand to unshrink and read it.

A smirk curled the corners of Lord Slytherin’s mouth. “Go ahead. I have plenty of time. In fact, I would like to speak with you about your task to clean up an old Black property, if you need more time before we can discuss my ritual design.”

Too curious to withstand temptation, Bill got out his wand and started casting the charm to reverse the shrinking on the spot. The scroll consisted of several pieces of parchment all bound together by a tie of green silk. “I always had the impression that a Lord hasn’t much time so close to a Wizengamot session.” It wasn’t really a subtle attempt to fish for more information, but Bill didn’t delude himself into thinking that he was able to match Lord Slytherin at something so essentially slytherin as fishing for information.

He got a snort and a look clearly communicating that his attempt had been much too transparent in response, but Lord Slytherin chose to explain himself anyway. “Today the test required in the adoption process of Marcus will take place. Maybe it has already started. I’m trying to distract myself.”

Bill hummed. “In that case, I’m sure we’ll manage to fill more than my lunch break with something to distract you, Lord Slytherin.” With careful hands Bill unfurled the roll, sorting through the different pieces of parchment filled with the flowing cursive of a person well versed with a quill. “Do you feel up to removing some failing charm work and pests from an old house which has stood empty for far too long?”

Now it was Lord Slytherin humming in thought. “No curses? How unusual for a house owned by the Black family.”

“ Mostly there are charms and wards too long unmaintained which once were meant to keep toonosey children out of dangerous areas, now going to become lethal soon. There's even runework distorted by magical pests nibbling at the wood it was carved into. I have no idea what that has become now, but it feels much too sentient to approach without proper backup.”

“That sounds interesting, and as if it could be able to keep my interest for a while,” Lord Slytherin conceded, relaxing into the bench, stretching his legs out before him.

“We’ll see how long this takes,” Bill said before diving into the description of the ritual attempted last Yule. It really was written down with each detail there, even with references to the parts acting somewhat in parallel but at the same time in opposition to the parts of the ritual needed to perform in the creation of a horcrux. It truly was an eerie text to read.

Bill furrowed his brow. “Why not try to prevent the pain this will inflict on the one doing the moving? Isn’t that the part more likely to disrupt the working?”

A humm of agreement was to be heard from the side, and Bill turned his head in confusion. “I think there actually is a way to prevent the pain. But I’m not willing to pay that price.” A pale, slender hand moved to point to a few rune clusters around the incredibly complex circle of the older version of the ritual. “See here? Pain can only be prevented if the soul doesn’t return to its original place. All those runes making certain the soul piece can be removed from the living container without harm to that container, also make certain it returns post haste to where it belongs.” Without prompting Bill moved the newer version of the rune circle to the top. “I added in a delay, among other things, in the hope that it’ll make certain I can finish the parts keeping Harry safe before the pain will consume me.”

Bill was pretty sure he knew what the price Lord Slytherin no longer was willing to pay was. And he was glad that murder to prevent his own pain wasn’t on the list of options any longer for the man. So he bent down over the drawing of a circle, studying the intricate markings constructing something similar to a time-delayed cage between the place where the container was to be placed and the mark where the one conducting the ritual would sit.

“Have you contemplated including another person in the ritual? Kind of a guide? Someone who would do the working and not endure the pain?” It would remove the risk of interrupting the ritual because the one conducting it would be reunited with a part of their soul.
“And whom would I ask to do so? There aren’t many who know of this that are capable, and have my trust.” There was a challenge in the man’s blue eyes, but Bill wasn’t a young foolish Gryffindor anymore. That wasn’t a challenge he would accept. So he only nodded in agreement. This really wasn’t a task to be given to just anyone. “Have you heard of the Mongolian custom of using a charged stone in place of a participant in a ritual? It might make it easier to create the delay you’re going for.”

After that it wasn’t hard at all to fill the afternoon with interesting discussion, and once they had exhausted that topic, Lord Slytherin actually decided to come help Bill with cleaning up some failing charms in an old house.

Hearing a lot of interesting gossip about people no longer living while cleaning out an old house made the whole experience much more interesting.

oooOOooo

Marten smiled once he had finished setting everything up in the room the school was providing for this testing session. A few people from the Ministry were still not there to witness the test, and the teacher who had gone to retrieve the boy who was about to be tested wasn’t back yet either.

But he was happy with the design he had come up with for the test. The biggest problem hadn’t been finding a task for the boy to do, but to find something that others would accept as proof that the child had relayed information to the snake. Some of his first ideas could have been interpreted as a snake acting as any snake would do over the snake acting on the whim of a child.

And he wasn’t willing to risk that. The boy would be better off growing up with people who wouldn’t look at him oddly because he hissed at snakes.

Checking one last time that the scent and heat shielding charms on the basket filled with rodents and the maze with only one rat bound to one end were working fine, Marten settled down on his chair to wait.

Luckily he didn't have to wait long.

“And here we are.” Lord Lestrange came in, leading a group of other Wizengamot members, closely followed by the teacher and a small boy. The child – who by all accounts had to be Marcus – seemed excited and a little nervous. Something that seemed pretty reasonable to be in this situation.

Mrs. Wisby was the last to enter and close the door, gesturing for him to start.

“Good day, Marcus, Lords.” Marten nodded in their direction but only smiled for the small child, giving him a wink. “I’ll explain how this will work to Marcus in a moment and want you all to listen closely and to ask any questions after I’m finished and Marcus is sure he has a good understanding what his part in this is going to be. Everyone in agreement?”

Before one of the surly-looking Lords was able to answer, Lord Lestrange nodded decisively. “Sounds straightforward, Mr. Singer. Please proceed.”

Marten took a few steps forward, resting his hands on the boy’s shoulders, and turning him so that he was facing to the labyrinth Marten had spent some time setting up.
“This is the task I have set for a snake to master, Marcus. I want you to help my snake go to the chamber at the end where no rat or mouse is sitting. When it reaches that, I will give it a bunny to feed on. But you need to explain that it will get bigger prey if it goes to where there is no prey at the moment.” Hopefully the fact that going to where no prey was to be found would be against a snake’s instincts would be enough to convince the people who were hoping the test would fail.

“Is your snake a boy or a girl?” Marcus asked, tilting his head to the side like an inquisitive dog.

“A girl.” Marten answered, smiling. That boy truly was an interesting child.

“And if she goes to where no prey waits, she will get something truly good?” Marten nodded, encouraging the boy to keep asking questions. “So she can ask for something she wishes? Like I ask Marvolo for chocolate frogs, because I like them so much?”

Marten thought that might work even better. “Exactly like that, Marcus. Now let me ask if the others over there have understood as well, and then we can start.” He turned to the Wizengamot members and could see some resentment in a few faces, but no one insisted on asking questions, so he directed Marcus to stand on a small step-stool near the start of the maze.

After checking that the entrance to the actual maze was still closed, Marten walked over to the basket holding one of his own prized pet snakes. Before he dared to open the basket, he slipped on the thin leather gloves he always wore when handling his snakes. This one wasn’t venomous, but a bite would still hurt. A lot.

“This is Sanza. Can you explain the task to her, Marcus?” With practiced ease Marten opened the basket and took out the snake, turning so the boy would be able to see the young boa constrictor.

With a happy smile the boy nodded and promptly started to hiss. It was a peculiar sound, and that the snake was moving but didn’t make a sound herself was most peculiar as well. Of course Marten knew that most snakes weren’t able to make much noise, with exceptions like the rattlesnakes, but seeing it so clearly demonstrated was something else.

Sanza was lowered into the area marking the start of the maze, onto the wood chips and dirt he had covered the ground with, but moved the whole time so her head was pointing at the boy, angled so that one of her eyes was focused on the child. Or that was what Marten assumed was happening.

He moved his wand into his hand, ignoring the murmurs originating with the old men near the doors, his attention solely focused on the small child hissing animatedly to the snake, pausing again and again as if he was waiting to get an answer.

It certainly was a strange thing to watch.

“She’s ready,” Marcus suddenly announced, the excitement almost tangible in the air around him.

And it looked like Sanza was ready, the snake now posed with her head right next to where a sheet of glass separated her from the actual maze. “Good, then I’ll open the maze now,” Marten agreed with a smile, casting a silent levitating spell at the barrier, opening up the door.

With awe – and a few mutterings behind Marten that sounded suspiciously like swearing – they all watched how fast a snake could move if properly motivated. And just as he had hoped when he had designed this maze, Sanza was moving through the parts of the maze not drenched in the smells of prey, but along those leading to the place where no prey was waiting.

It didn’t take more than a minute for the snake to reach the end of the maze, where she turned to look over to Marcus, who smiled so broad a smile that he looked a little lunatic. Marten was almost sure that there was a conversation happening again, with really short bursts of hissing from the boy.

“She’d like to have a baby rabbit. She solved the maze right, didn’t she?” The way confidence so quickly switched to worry saddened Marten a bit, but he was happy to nod and smile in hopes that this would reassure the child.

“She did very well. And she can have a baby rabbit. Give me just one moment.” Marcus paid a lot more attention to how Marten caught a small rabbit for the snake and how Sanza then proceeded to capture the rabbit and swallow it whole than he did to the conversation between all the adults who had been waiting at the door.

By the look of it the test had been enough for Mrs. Wisby to be sure that Marcus was indeed a parselmouth, and that meant that the adoption was now able to move forward. Marten was happy for the kid, keeping watch as Marcus carefully stroked the bump in the snake's belly where her meal was now slowly being digested.

That had been fun and rather easy, with a little luck he and his shop would be mentioned in the Prophet in connection with this. It would be good publicity to have.

oooOOooo

Once again Harry made himself comfortable on his bed down in the Slytherin dungeons, holding the small charmed mirror in his hand and speaking with his adopted father. How much could change in a year. Stuffing another pillow behind his back, Harry listened as Marvolo explained his plans for another test with a revised ritual – Harry felt better the moment Marvolo told him that Bill had contributed to the new setup – that he was planning to use during the next appropriate day – which would be Ostara, or the spring equinox – to test if it was safe to use on Harry.

“I’m really not comfortable with the idea that you might get hurt during those experimental rituals, father.” Harry said once more, making a face just to be absolutely sure that Marvolo knew how happy Harry would be if this all wasn’t necessary.

“Sadly enough, there isn’t any hint at a ritual someone else might have created for this very purpose. So there’s no alternative to creating one myself, Harry. You know me well enough to realise that my work usually comes out the way I want it to.” Marvolo seemed certain enough, but due to the fact of what trouble Marvolo had managed to get into in the past, this declaration really wasn’t all that reassuring.

To Harry’s sceptical raised eyebrow Marvolo just chuckled. “I’m no longer a terrified teenager, Harry. Please, I promised to get my horcrux out of your scar. And I fear that I’m still not capable of the true remorse needed to absorb it the only other way that ever was described somewhere.”

Harry shrugged, aware of the fact that there probably wasn’t any way to get around that problem. “Do you know how the test went?” He might as well change the topic of their conversation if Marvolo insisted on being unreasonable about experimental rituals. In a way, Harry understood why many of them were banned. If one conducted one without guidance or a solid understanding, there was so much that could go wrong.

“Xerxes was here an hour ago. He said it went well. But we’ll have to wait for the official result. from the Ministry before we can go on with the process,” Marvolo answered, smiling.

“So by the spring holidays Marcus will be part of our family? Or do you reckon it’ll take longer?”

Marvolo tilted his head to the side, waves of hair falling into the red eyes. “I guess it’s possible that the adoption could be finished by then. If I’m to test the revised ritual, I probably should arrange for you two to have a…” a smirk appeared on Marvolo’s face, making Harry apprehensive about what the wizard might be planning, “babysitter arranged. Don’t you think?”

A babysitter? He was almost sixteen! He didn’t need a babysitter. The glare Harry sent at the mirror should have been able to melt it, but it only made Marvolo laugh so hard, he had to lower his hand, giving Harry a good view of the ceiling in the room Marvolo was using. “I’m old enough. I don’t need a babysitter. Really, father!” Harry was glad he sounded more indignant than whining. Because whining as Draco was prone to do wouldn’t have worked well to support his case.

After a while Marvolo sat back up, his face moving back into focus, tears of mirth having left their traces on his face. “I don’t know when I last laughed like that,” Marvolo mused before giving Harry a warm smile. “You certainly are old enough to stay alone for a while. But if Marcus is living with us by then… I think it’ll be better to have someone there who is legally an adult and has permission to use magic if needed. Don’t you think?”

Feeling his glare only slightly dimming, Harry nodded slowly. That was a good reason. Remembering a discussion he'd had not so long ago, Harry contemplated if that was something that might work.

“I can see you plotting from here, Harry,” Marvolo cheerfully declared, clearly in a much better mood than usual.

Harry simply nodded. He wasn’t exactly plotting, per se, but he was contemplating a plan that would give him two things he wanted at the same time. “Sirius invited me to spend time with him and his daughters – and maybe their mother, he doesn’t know yet – at his house in France during the spring holidays. Maybe Marcus can come with me, and we do that while you test that ritual?”

A thoughtful look on his face, Marvolo appeared to be giving this idea serious thought when there was the sound of something, or someone, tapping on the glass of a window.

“What’s that?” Harry just had to ask, falling silent when Marvolo waved at him and turned his attention away from the mirror.

“There’s a kind of stork at the window.” Marvolo sounded puzzled. “Who would send me mail with a stork?”

“No idea.” Harry answered truthfully, turning the conversation back to the topic he was more interested in at that moment. “Will you consider my request?”

“I’ll certainly think on it. And maybe ask Madame Goyle. I’m not sure what kind of reassurance Marcus might need once the adoption is finalised. But I’ll let you know in time.” The tapping sounds got more insistent with each passing moment. “Sorry to cut our call short, son. But I have to see what that bird wants. Have a good night and pleasant dreams.”

“Sweet dreams to you too, father.” Harry answered with a smile and a hint of curiosity in his voice. But he knew better than to ask. There always was the possibility of letters sent in the middle of the night he would be better off not knowing about.

Harry retreated to his bed with a book Luna had recommended, to read a while before going to sleep, his thoughts returning again and again to that curious messenger bird and the prospect of soon being a big brother.

Chapter End Notes

I already was accused of writing a mean cliffy here. But somehow it fit :D

Recommendation: The series “Of a Linear Circle” by flamethrower which can be found at AO3. A lot of great story, Founders time and time travel.

Thanks to Jordre and Jake for helping to improve my spelling!

First published on the 16th of November 2018
Next chapter planned for 30th of November 2018
So many people have linked the stork to the babies being delivered. :D I hadn’t expected that. And it got me thinking. Do any of you know of another animal linked to babies the same way the stork is? I know that it’s a pretty common image all over Europe, North America, and a lot of places where the British had significant influence at some time. I would love to learn of other baby delivering animals.

Not yet beta-read ;)

Thursday, 22nd of February 1996

The letter was written on something different than parchment. It could be very well made papyrus, almost of the smooth quality of good paper. But the material it was written on wasn’t more puzzling than the words written.

Greetings,

I have thought long on how to start this letter and couldn’t decide on a way to address you. It’s hard to break habits of a lifetime but I’m sure you won’t appreciate my use of the name given to you by your mother. After deliberating some more I decided simply avoiding any use of names probably would be the best.

A few days ago I had an unexpected visitor. He seemed rather fixated on fighting evil and at the same time seeing it everywhere. I have sent letters like this to a few individuals I feel need to know this and can be of assistance in getting the situation under control.

As the visitor’s grief over one killed by a Death Eater seems to be the main cause for the fixation and questionable behaviour I thought it reasonable to send a warning to you. But at the same time I’m not confident in my own ability to judge the situation, so I decided to leave the name out. Please take the necessary precautions for your family’s safety.

Regards,

Albus Percival Wulfric Brian Dumbledore

The stork had left the moment Marvolo had collected the letter, and now the wizard was slumped in his chair thinking quickly. Before he could try to decipher that letter Marvolo had to put aside the ridiculous notion that had sprung to mind the moment he had seen a stork had delivered the letter. Considering the typical stereotypes, Marvolo had wondered for a single moment who had had the grand idea to use a stork to deliver news on an adoption. It certainly hadn’t been that way when he had adopted Harry. Now that he had read the letter it was clear as day that his thoughts had gotten away from him. Even as he could see Mrs. Wisby deciding to add a bit of whimsy to the proceedings.

He had heard that Dumbledore was now living in a specialised clinic in Egypt, and storks were known to flew back and forth between Africa and northern Europe each year to spend summer and winter in the best climate they could find. It was curious that Dumbledore would select a stork to deliver his message but not out of the realm of possibilities.

It felt surreal that Albus Percival Wulfric Brian Dumbledore, the professor in his ridiculous suit who had set Marvolo’s cupboard on fire as a questionable attempt to discipline the young wizard he had found there in the orphanage, would sent a warning. Not a warning to desist acting in a certain way, or to follow his dreams, or something other related to things Marvolo himself was doing. No!
A warning of a danger – if real or not wasn’t really the point at the moment – to him and those he cared for.

That the infuriating man had decided to keep the name to himself was only another irritating piece of the puzzle Marvolo was now determined to work out.

“Flimm!” Marvolo stood and called for the elf. He needed some tea to stay alert enough to comb the letter for any clues hidden in the text and then make a plan on how to get more information.
For instance it should be easy enough to get information on who travelled to Egypt in the last two weeks, as most wizards and witches – and who else even knew enough to hate him – preferred to travel such long distances by portkey, and few had the ability to make one for themselves. So the Ministry registry should have the information Marvolo needed.

Flimm popped into the room, his toga fashioned from a white linen tea towel, Marvolo didn’t manage to pass out his request for tea and fruit tarts before the elf bowed and started to speak.
“Mr. Potions Master is here for Master Marvolo. Flimm shall bring Mr. Potions Master in?”

Severus was here? “Bring him here. And then bring tea and snacks for two, Flimm.” Before he could get out a few words of thanks – since he had learned what a loyal house-elf was capable of doing, it had gotten a lot easier following Harry’s example – the elf was gone. So Marvolo tidied up his desk before sitting down in his chair behind it.

The moment he was finished the door opened and Severus stepped into the room, walking around the bowing elf, only to go down on one knee the moment he was clear of the door. “My Lord.”

Severus always had a way to make this gesture of deference look so smooth and effortless, with his long dark robes pooling around his kneeling figure, his hair swinging gracefully with the motion. In the past he had loved to see someone as knowledgeable bow to him, and how Severus did so more gracefully than some of the oh so pure wizards from old families. But now – even as the gracefulness remained – the joy was gone. “Severus, come sit down with me. How do you like your tea?”

Barely showing a hint of confusion Severus stood, took the few steps to the chair Marvolo had indicated, and answered with a polite incline of his head. “Heavy on the cream and only one sugar, please. I hope to sleep tonight.”

Marvolo smiled and set about preparing the tea to Severus’ specification, levitating cream pitcher and sugar cubes without touching his wand. Some of his classmates had sneered at the unworthy use of wandless magic – equating what Marvolo had been able to do with the lowly work of the house-elves they had at home – but it had proven to be a remarkable tool to refine one’s control over the magic, so Marvolo did use it as often as possible.
“What brings you here on a school night, Severus?” Marvolo asked as the finished cup of pale tea floated, directed by his magic, over to his Potions Master. The moment Severus had accepted his cup, Marvolo started on preparing his own.

“A stork delivered a piece of interesting mail to me this evening, my Lord. I thought it wise to share it with you.” The younger wizard was composed as always, sipping at his tea.

“A stork?” Marvolo smirked stirring his tea so the sugar would have an easier time dissolving. “That sounds familiar. What had Albus to tell you?” That was interesting. Did Dumbledore send that letter to even more people? Or would the information differ?

Severus carefully placed his cup and saucer on the desk, getting out a rolled up piece of papyrus from one pocket in his robes. “He wrote to me that Amos Diggory visited him and seemed not entirely stable. As he knows of my vow to protect your son, he thought it prudent to give me warning that there might be danger directed at the boy from Diggory’s direction. He doesn’t sound that confident in his observation, though.” Severus held out the scroll for Marvolo to take. An offer he gladly accepted.

The next few moments were spent in silence, Severus drinking his tea and Marvolo reading the letter, searching for hidden meaning and comparing it – the wording, handwriting, length, offered information – to the letter he himself had received.

Aside from the name of the visitor, Severus’ letter held a lot of my boys and idle chatter that Marvolo really was glad were missing from his letter. It seemed to be true that Dumbledore wasn’t capable of treating students he had seen go through the halls of Hogwarts in his tenure as professor and headmaster as adults once they had graduated. He certainly hadn’t appreciated the task of being a spy close to that man as much as he should have. Being treated as a child for all this time would have driven him insane. Severus had a lot more patience than people gave him credit for.

“Thank you, Severus. To my surprise, the letter he sent you only has one piece of information the shorter one he sent me lacked. So Amos Diggory is the one making Albus Dumbledore uneasy enough that he resorts to writing a letter to warn a man he regarded as a sworn enemy for so long.” Furrowing his brow in thought, Marvolo re-rolled the letter and handed it back to Severus. If the man really was that unstable, it was a lot more likely that he really was the one who had supported Dolores Umbridge in messing up the adoption process and posing opposition to all the law changes Marvolo had pushed for in regards to werewolves.

“I have thought about the need to adjust security measures for your heir, my Lord,” Severus said, stashing away the letter in one of his hidden robe pockets. “And beside making sure he doesn’t leave the castle alone and maybe resuming guards during outings to Hogsmeade, I feel he should be safe enough while at school.”

“Diggory has good reason to work towards revenge, and connections within the Ministry. I’m not sure I feel all that comfortable letting Harry roam the school on his own.” It was suspiciously easy to admit his worry to Severus. Madame Goyle’s assurance that it was normal to feel worry over a human close to oneself, and the need to share that burden with others, came to mind briefly, but he dismissed it in favour of concentrating on the conversation at hand.

“Since your son has been re-sorted, he is never truly on his own after classes. He's part of more than one study group, as far as I know, and spends a lot of his time studying in the common room or the library. It's his OWL year, after all, and he seems more dedicated to his studies than I have ever seen before.”

Marvolo hummed, by all accounts Harry hadn’t really strived to gain academic knowledge before.
It had been obvious that this had changed the moment there had been an adult caring about his grades. “So you think there's nothing more to do than let Harry know that there is danger and where it might come from?”

Severus nodded, but Marvolo didn't let him go until they had discussed possible ways to harm Harry while at school or ways to get him out from the wards around the school. Severus looked worn by the time he rose to leave. “Please convey my sincere apology to your wife for keeping you so long.”

Friday, 23rd of February 1996

It was Friday morning, the last workday of his week, and currently all there was to do was writing a few reports. It looked like he would be able to go home early. Kingsley really would like to do that. He loved his job, and the last weeks hadn’t been all that stressful. But he had plans for this evening – a visit to a cinema and then a club – and could use the extra time.

Setting down his fresh cup of coffee on his desk in his cubicle next to the roll of parchment of the report he had finished before going to the restroom, he prepared to start on the next report and sat down. With a sigh Kingsley cast a spell on the spoon to keep stirring the coffee so that the sugar would dissolve and the coffee cool a little before he took a drink.

“What do you want?” Kingsley said to the wizard suddenly standing next to him with less malice than the words implied. “Is there something important?” He turned to look up to where his more or less official partner was standing, a smirk on his face.

Dawlish laughed. “Sorry to be a bother, but Scrimgeour wants to see us. I saw Madame Bones entering his office a short time before he came to ask me to get you and come into his office.”

Kingsley felt one of his brows creeping up his forehead. Madame Bones went to talk with the Head of the Auror Department and just after that the two Aurors suspected to be part of two opposing political organisations – if he was generous with the definition of that – working together were asked to speak with their boss. If this wasn’t more than coincidence, Kingsley was a niffler.

With a sigh Kingsley placed his quill down, closed the inkwell, let the report fall closed, and stood. “Any ideas what this is about?”

“Could be about the real culprit behind the whole adoption mess? Or something totally unrelated? I’ve no idea.” Dawlish shook his head, and Kingsley nodded. As sure as he was – even though he still had no proof of any kind that would hold up in court – that the other was a Death Eater, Kingsley trusted his partner. When it came to work they had found that they agreed on a lot of things, if not on all. If Dawlish had had any idea what this was about, he would have shared.

Together they walked over to the Head Auror’s office, many of their colleagues looking up from their work or chatter to watch them walking by. It didn’t take long for them to reach the office and to step through the door, closing it behind them, instantly muffling all sound from the bigger office “Shacklebolt, Dawlish, thank you for being prompt. Madame Bones has received an interesting letter with a warning that we need to investigate. But please take a seat.” The Head Auror waved his hand towards the seating group near the fireplace and they all moved to sit down. Madame Bones looked as if she were chewing on something, but sat down and left the explanations to Scrimgeour.

“Dumbledore claimed in his letter, one of a group he said, that Amos Diggory did visit him to complain over Dumbledore stopping his fight against evil.” Kingsley had trouble believing this. Albus never had been someone to share information freely without need. It had been frustrating from time to time while the Order still held meetings. “While he himself wrote that he doesn’t feel all that secure in his deduction,” Dawlish snorted, and as much as Kingsley would have liked to disagree, he had to work hard not to roll his eyes in disbelief, “The fact that Amos’ son was killed at the end of the Tri-Wizard Tournament, and ever since then Amos has blamed Death Eaters and later Lord Slytherin for his loss, lends some credence to the old Headmaster’s claims.”

That would be a good enough reason to at least investigate a bit. Kingsley nodded, because he knew fighting evil was a tricky business. It was really hard to see if someone was acting out of genuine fear, carelessness, ignorance, the need to defend, or actual evil intentions. It was too easy to define everything that one didn’t like – for whatever reason – as evil.

“You have proven yourselves as a team capable of handling delicate political situations well.” Madame Bones suddenly spoke up from where she was sitting, hands folded in her lap. “So I asked Rufus to assign you two as a team on this task. We need to make sure that Amos Diggory isn’t readying himself to attack someone,” Kingsley was pretty sure they all were thinking of the same probable target in that very moment, “or acting in any other way against the law.”

“So he hasn’t committed any crimes until now?” Dawlish wanted to know, leaning forward in his armchair.

“Not that we know of,” Madame Bones answered in a manner that seemed to indicate her suspecting something she either had no proof for, or that wasn’t a crime in the true sense of the word. She might know of some political actions that Diggory had attempted that she didn’t approve of.

“Good. So it’s more an undercover operation?” Dawlish seemed genuinely interested to take on this task, and Kingsley wasn’t really reluctant either. The Order might have disbanded once it had sunken in that there wasn’t any opposition that they needed to fight behind the scenes, as it were, but Kingsley still was dedicated to protecting their world from another war.

“That’s correct.” Scrimgeour confirmed.

After that they got to read the letter Madame Bones had received before being sent off to plan their approach to monitoring Amos Diggory and his actions without setting off a political avalanche by accident.

Saturday, 24th of February 1996
It was a sunny morning, and the students were all walking down from the castle to the Quidditch field. The air was filled with laughter and the sound of many people talking. It was even louder than when everyone was on the way to the village. After all, the younger years were here as well.

Harry was walking next to Luna, a silly grin on his face, and her hand in his. She was almost skipping alongside him, outfitted with a hat and scarf in Ravenclaw Team colours. Harry was wearing a similar getup, except that his hat and scarf were mostly green with snakes in silver. Today’s game was between Slytherin and Ravenclaw, and everyone was anticipating an exciting time.

“Who will win? What do you think, Harry?” Ron wanted to know. He and Hermione, as well as Neville, were walking with the mixed group of students.

Harry turned so he could see Ron. “I have no idea who will win, Ron. I know our team is good. But Ravenclaw is a good team as well. As far as I can see, we’re looking forward to an exciting match!”

“And where do you want to sit?” Theo asked, a glint of mischief in his eyes. Harry grinned in his friend’s direction, rolling his eyes. It seemed that teasing your friends about their relationships was a universal pastime of teenagers. Harry had seen it happen up in Gryffindor tower and down in the Slytherin dungeons.

“We’ve talked about it and decided to sit with the Gryffindors today,” Luna answered in her dreamy voice, not turning to look at Theo or any of the others. “There we can cheer for both teams without stepping on too many toes.”

That theory resulted in a lot of laughter and Harry had to grin. Cheering for Slytherin while sitting among the students from Gryffindor would be stepping on a lot of toes. But he was sure Luna had known that before suggesting they sit with the Gryffindors. “Sitting with one of the Houses not participating only leaves Hufflepuff and Gryffindor to choose from. And I simply have more friends in Gryffindor!” Harry once again rolled his eyes at his Slytherin friends, knowing exactly why some of them suddenly were so interested in where he was at all times.

People out to get him always had been a bother. But with a protective and influential parent, the irritation caused by people coming after him had increased. Marvolo didn’t brush off the danger, but made sure all his followers informed their children – or at least those still going to school at Hogwarts – to keep an eye out for Harry.

It was nice – somehow – and infuriating at the same time. Harry was really capable of defending himself. And he certainly knew of the dangers of portkeys by now, he wouldn’t just grab something handed to him by someone he didn’t know, for instance. And the way the antagonistic seventh-years acted around him now was proof that his duelling wasn’t all that bad either.

Theo nodded and grinned. “A snake and an eagle among the lions. Any objections to me tagging along?”

Harry rolled his eyes again. “I certainly won’t curb your adventurous tendencies. You have too few of them anyway.” Really, Theo didn’t even try to hide his plan to protect Harry’s back. Then Harry noticed Ron’s surprised expression and had to concede that this plot may not be as noticeable at first glance as Harry had thought.

They reached the stands and split. Daphne, her sister Astoria, Millicent, Pansy, all the little first-years – they themselves hadn’t been that small, surely – and the whole of seventh-year Slytherin split away to go up to their section of the stands. The Hufflepuffs went around the stadium to reach the stairs to their stands, as did the Ravenclaws. Harry had his hand tightly clasped around Luna’s, as they and his friends turned right and started ascending the stairs.

The climb wasn’t all that long, with them all traipsing up and down the many staircases of the castle on a daily basis, but it was still demanding enough that the chatter grew quieter for awhile.

They ended up with Harry seated next to Luna in the middle of the rows. Ginny sat down next to Theo with a “A Slytherin in the Gryffindor stands. How interesting!” instantly questioning him on his favourite team outside of school Quidditch. Ron sat down next to Lavender and her friend, while Hermione sat down on the other side of Luna, getting out a book filled with notes.

“How about you? What’s your favourite team?” Harry asked Hermione.

“Hermione!” Harry laughed incredulously. It was just like her to bring a book to Quidditch.

“Why does she do that?” Ginny suddenly asked from behind Harry. “She does know that shadowing the other seeker is a shoddy tactic, doesn’t she? If you’re better than the other, there’s no need to shadow them all the time. Seriously!”

“Just because you dislike that move doesn’t make it shoddy!” Theo argued, but Harry could hear the humour in his friend’s voice. “It might go against your Gryffindor sentiments, but as she has a slower broom, staying close to the opposing seeker can work out rather well. If she spots the snitch nearby, she won’t have to try to catch up to a much faster broom.”

In the meantime Draco used his tag-along to disrupt a few of the Ravenclaw chaser plays, eliciting a few boos from Luna and her fellow Ravens. Harry had taken to cheering. Cheering for good moves played by either team, earning himself a few funny looks from those sitting around them.

If she spots the snitch nearby, she won’t have to try to catch up to a much faster broom.”

Ginny snorted. “But if they both spot the snitch at a distance, Malfoy will outfly her before they reach it, even if she spots it first. I can’t see any advantage.”

In the meantime Draco used his tag-along to disrupt a few of the Ravenclaw chaser plays, eliciting a few boos from Luna and her fellow Ravens. Harry had taken to cheering. Cheering for good moves played by either team, earning himself a few funny looks from those sitting around them.

When a chaser managed to throw the quaffle through one of the hoops, Harry cheered. When one of the keepers managed to save an attempt, Harry cheered. When one of the beaters managed to keep one of the bludgers from knocking a player off their course, Harry cheered.

It was a strangely freeing experience.

There was outrage when Gregory managed to hit a Ravenclaw chaser over the head with his beater’s bat. Harry wasn’t sure that had been on purpose, but he hadn’t had the best line of sight, so he shrugged and decided to accept whatever Madame Hooch said had happened. In the end it was the referee who decided stuff like that.

How did one get to be a Quidditch referee, anyway? Professional players were scouted off the school teams a lot of the time, or from smaller leagues all over the world. Even from pick-up games. Trainers often were former players getting too old to play, but now with lots of experience to pass on to the younger players. But how did one become a referee?

Chambers managed to score the penalty shot, giving Ravenclaw the lead by a good forty points, the biggest lead one of the teams had gained so far.

Draco made a corkscrew dive in an attempt to draw Cho Chang along – at least Harry was pretty sure that was the case – when the other seeker flew over Draco and turned in direction of the Hufflepuff stands, Harry knew that Draco had outwitted himself. Cho had seen the snitch. And Draco hadn’t even noticed yet.

That didn’t bode well for Slytherin.

Just moments later Cho had caught the snitch and the game was over.

Three quarters of the school broke out into frenetic cheering, and suddenly fireworks were flying through the air. Blue and copper sparks, small cartwheels, words spelling themselves in the middle of the air, figures of small ravens flying about. It was glorious. Harry turned in his seat, and saw the twins, Fred and George, in the last row, shooting off more and more of their fireworks.

Harry was about to turn around to watch the fireworks at work, as Luna suddenly leaned into his side, moved her face really close to his and kissed him.

For a moment Harry felt as if he had been hit by a petrificus totalus. He couldn’t move. Then he kissed back, unsure of what he was doing, but enthusiastic. When Luna moved back he felt light headed.

The moment he regained enough of his senses to notice what was happening around them he blushed. All the boys and a few of the girls near enough to have seen were calling out for them to kiss again.

He was surprised when Luna did follow those calls, initiating another kiss.

Now he understood why people spend so much time kissing. It was great.

ooOoo

“And then she kissed me. In front of the whole school!” Harry finished his retelling of the day’s game, blushing again. Marvolo chuckled but didn’t say anything. “Even those who hadn’t seen it there knew by the time we all were back at the castle.” Harry felt like burrowing his head in the pillow behind him, or the one to his side. Maybe he would hide under his covers for the rest of the term.

When Marvolo had the audacity to grin, Harry shot him a dark look. “By all I know about Xenophilius Lovegood, he’s a decent man. Providing a platform for conspiracy theorists has thrown a light of suspicion on his publication, but what I have seen among the quite amusing theories are interesting documentations of folklore and almost forgotten knowledge.” Marvolo chuckled when Harry gave him an incredulous look.

“Did you send someone to gather information on the Lovegoods?” Harry wanted to know. Did Marvolo just call the Quibbler an interesting publication?

“Of course I did. He was shuffled forward in priority due to the fact that you’re interested in his daughter. Every Lord and Lady on the Wizengamot keeps close watch on people of interest. And every publisher is certainly on that list.” Harry had known that. It had been part of the lessons he had during the summer both from his grandfather’s portrait and Marvolo.

Harry rolled his eyes. “I’m surprised that you haven’t heard of this already. I’m sure it’ll be in the papers in the morning.”

“Even if the children have sent mail directly afterwards. Owls need a while to fly that far – there aren’t many families living near Hogwarts – and then their parents would have to contact me.” Marvolo tilted his head and moved to sit a little bit straighter. “But I agree with your assessment that it’s likely for this to be the headline in tomorrow’s paper. Are you unhappy about the kiss?”

Harry huffed. Was he unhappy? “I don’t know. I mean, I liked the kiss. In fact it was great! But there in front of the whole school? I’m not so sure if I’m happy with that. It didn’t really think about it… but now, in hindsight? I think I would have preferred a more private place?”

“Did you speak with your godfather?” Marvolo asked, and Harry chuckled, seeing the uncertainty in the other’s ruby-red eyes. “We both know that I’m no expert in any kind of romantic interaction. Your godfather, on the other hand, could be named an expert, and certainly had a teenager’s time nearer the norm than I.”

Harry nodded. Marvolo had a point. “I spoke with Sirius before calling you. He said that it’s nice to have a girlfriend who knows what she wants. And that it would be all over the papers anyway, so getting it over with quick is better. Not sure if I agree.” And he really wasn’t sure.

Being a teenager was really confusing.

“Well, Madame Goyle tells me again and again that the teenage years are a time to explore. The world, interactions between people, one’s own self. All that.” Marvolo waved his hand to indicate a list of further options. “Speak with Miss Lovegood if you want to avoid further displays like the one of today. I hear it’s important to share and discuss such things to ensure a successful partnership.”

Now Harry had to chuckle. Mrs. Goyle really was a miracle worker with unending supplies of patience. “I’ll do that.” Harry yawned. “How goes the adoption process?”

Marvolo smirked, obviously pleased with himself. “It’s going well. I’ll get information on when it can get finalised soon. I plan on having an adoption ritual similar to what we did for Nott’s adopted son, Aiden. Are you willing to take part in that? I could arrange for you to have permission to leave the school grounds for the weekend. What do you think?”
Harry sat forward on his bed eagerly. “Of course I want to be part of the adoption! Marcus will be my little brother! I would be offended if you were to exclude me!” Harry tried to mock glare but had to yawn again.

“Go to bed, Harry. It’s late. And even when you sleep in, you’ll need all the rest you can get.” Marvolo smiled. “And I’ll make sure you can be there for the adoption ritual. No need to worry. And now go to sleep!”

“Sleep well, Father,” Harry said in agreement – he was rather tired – and spoke the command to close the connection. He already had changed into his pyjamas, and only had to quickly visit the bathroom before he could slip between the sheets on his bed.

It had been a good day, but he wasn’t looking forward to the morning papers.

Monday, 26th of February 1996

They all were mingling in the rooms and halls located near the Wizengamot’s chamber in their usual finery, talking – or as Marvolo thought to himself: gossiping – about the session starting soon, those who were not there yet, Quidditch results, social events, and other topics along those lines. Marvolo was pretty sure that people just out of his range of hearing were talking about this week’s edition of Witch Weekly. As Harry had suspected, the kiss at the Quidditch game between him and Luna Lovegood had been interesting enough to warrant a whole two page article. There had been pictures from the Tri-Wizard Tournament, and they had reused the rumours they had spread almost a year ago. About a love triangle between Miss Granger, Mr. Krum, and Harry. About the families of them both – obviously – and if two unmarried wizards were capable of providing two young students with the necessary guidance.

It had been useless drivel.

But it had been expected drivel, and just this side of avoiding slander. The fact that Harry also had reported from school that the students really weren’t reacting all that much had been enough in Marvolo’s eyes not to take some steps against the magazine.

While Marvolo listened in on Lucius and Severus discussing the ongoing dispute over cauldron thickness, material requirements, and how silly that squabble really was, as all high-quality equipment was bought outside of Britain more and more, he watched as a disturbance made its way through the crowd. It didn’t take long to become clear that the disturbance was Mrs. Wisby fighting her way through, politely using her elbows where needed, in search of someone.

“Ah, there you are, Lord Slytherin!” she shouted cheerily across the room the moment she spotted Marvolo. Waving for his attention, her attempts to clear a way through the groups between them became more ruthless.

That elbow looked pointy.

“I thought I’d come down here and inform you myself! Why send an owl out to fly through the city, when I know that you’ll be here today anyway?” She was as sunny as always, and Marvolo felt himself starting to smile. There was only one message she would bring him with such an opening.

“The papers are finished and the adoption approved. You can come up after the session is finished. After you’ve signed everything, you’ll only need to arrange for a date when Marcus can move from the school to your home.” Feeling a little out of touch, Marvolo wondered if she ever was anything but cheerful. Then what she had said sank in fully and he used Occlumency to keep calm. “Can I expect you after the session, Lord Slytherin?”

With long practice Marvolo managed a smile which looked real enough to fool all but the best politicians. “If the session doesn’t run too long, I’ll come by your office before I leave for home.” Thankfully Harry already had decided that Marcus would get the room next to his, and Flimm had cleaned it and outfitted it with all new comforter, pillows, curtains, and other things a young boy would need in his room.

“That’s good. Just drop me an owl if you need to make other arrangements.” She patted his arm and was gone after a quick “Have a nice session, Lord Slytherin,” in his direction.

“She is something else,” Severus remarked drily. “Such a sunny disposition even after years working at the Ministry. Do you think she might have some pixie blood?”

Lucius snorted. “And her friendly demeanour is nothing more than a front to lure us into her trap? Or have I missed something about the nature of Cornish Pixies?”

Severus shook his head, smirking. “I don’t think you have, Lucius. But for all that they cause humans harm for fun. I never heard of a pixie being glum. Have you?”

Marvolo listened and watched as his two… friends kept bantering all through the rest of the wait, before the door opened and they all went into the hall. He wasn’t paying that much attention, though, as he went through all that needed to be done if he wanted to bring Marcus home sometime this week – maybe Friday would be best – and hold the adoption ceremony on Saturday. For one thing, he needed to make sure Harry could come home for the weekend. Then he needed to instruct Barty to write up and send out all the invitations, Flimm would have to clean the room once more, and prepare food for the adoption ceremony. Maybe they should hold that at the manor. It was possible that there would be a lot of people willing to come, he couldn’t very well send people away… His thoughts were racing, even as he was occluding heavily to keep calm and maintain a clear head.

He sat down on the silver bench with its snake legs, barely remembering the cushioning charm that was needed if he wanted to still feel his backside when the session finally would be over in a few hours. Pretty soon the usual aimless shouting matches, bickering, and disagreements started. Some topics had been discussed again and again over decades by now, and if no one stepped in, they were brought up again and again.

Today Marvolo had his mind elsewhere as the impending adoption was of greater importance than whether there was a need to limit the number of Quidditch teams one individual, or family, could own. That drew him out of his mad planning for a moment. It seemed there were rumours that the owner of the Falmouth Falcons was contemplating buying the Chudley Cannons. The possible disturbance of the balance of the league seemed to be a big concern.

Snorting, Marvolo returned to his inner musings. With Marcus moving in now, he would be there for the spring holidays and therefore during the time Marvolo had planned to use for the next test of his ritual. He furrowed his brow. He should step up the security measures. A healer on hand was all well and good, but he probably should also include a curse-breaker. Maybe Bill Weasley would be willing to assist. He clearly was competent enough to be of help.

Maybe Harry’s wish to visit with his godfather could be used to have both boys out of the house during that day. Marvolo would have to ask Lord Black if he was willing to take care of more than one boy, one of them just about to turn six, for a few days while trying to get to know his own daughters?

There was no other way to know than to ask.

In the end the meeting was over a lot quicker than Marvolo had anticipated. But that was the way of things when one was planning life-changing events.

Deep in thought, and not in any danger here in the halls of the Ministry, Marvolo only had distracted greetings for his follower-friends – all of whom grinned knowingly – and walked in the direction of the lifts.

Before he could reach them he was called. “Marvolo! A moment please!”

Surprised, he turned. Not many women called him by his given name. And that voice had been from a woman, he was almost certain. Amelia Bones was quickly catching up to him, plum robes billowing around her legs. As it would be extremely rude to simply walk on – and he was curious – Marvolo waited where he stood for her to reach him.

Once she was within arms' reach, Marvolo gave a bow from his neck. “Madame Bones.”

She smiled, bemused, and then waved her hand. “Please call me Amelia. Don’t you think that’s more than reasonable by now?”

Well, that was a surprising move. But even though he might be the elder – technically – the fact that he had been declared newborn not even a year prior, and that when two people were close in age, it usually was the woman’s decision to offer the use of first names, it was a socially acceptable move.

He arched a brow. “Amelia then. But I think we should consider that this could give credence to the rumours that we might be courting.”

Rolling her eyes, Amelia shook her head. “We can’t prevent them from gossiping. But after we have fought together, on the same side, mind you, it would be odd to stand on formality.”

“I don’t have any reasonable objections. Amelia. But I doubt that this was the reason you wanted to speak with me.” He really wanted to go up to Mrs Wisby’s office to sign the papers, and then go home. He needed to inform Harry and start on all the preparations.

She gave a short nod, and her demeanour changed from easygoing to serious. “I received an interesting letter from Egypt. The content is concerning, and I have decided to relay a few of the warnings given.”

So Albus had sent the letter to Amelia as well. For the fraction of a second Marvolo wondered idly if that was the extent of the letters the former Headmaster had sent regarding his unexpected visitor.

Considering that there were still people lingering, Lords and Ladies gossiping or simply avoiding going home, Marvolo got his wand out and raised a quick silencing ward around them.

Now it was Amelia's’ turn to give him a questioning look. Without waiting for her question, Marvolo started with his explanation. “I got a letter from the same place on Thursday evening. The warning inside was both pretty clear and explicit as well as vague. He didn’t mention any names. I guess your version was a little more informative?” He had suspected that Severus had received a version with the name, because the Potions Master was bound with a vow to protect Harry to the best of his abilities. It was only reasonable to assume that the Head of the Department of Magical Law Enforcement rated even higher on the trust scale.

She nodded, folding her arms in front of her chest. “He did. And I already set our best team of Aurors on this. I’m pretty sure you’ll learn of it soon.” Her smirk was tiny, but there.

Marvolo gave an unapologetic shrug. “I can’t control what people tell me. So I already spoke with Harry about why we need to increase security once again. He is a remarkably patient teenager. Or so the parents I know assure me.”

Amelia chuckled. “I can’t say that Susan is all that patient most of the time. But your son has more reason than most to accept guards.”

A solemn mood came over Marvolo – all those emotions were hard to get used to – he was, or had been, one of the reasons for Harry’s acceptance of the need for guards and other forms of protection other teenagers didn’t have to bother about.

“When Marcus moves in at the end of the week, I’ll need to find a way to make a young boy understand why he can’t go wherever he wants without an adult at his side.” He had to speak with Xerxes regarding arrangements at the school.

Amelia had a gentle smile on her face, and it was reaching her eyes. “I don’t think he’s unaccustomed to the concept, Marvolo. He’s young. And congratulations on the adoption going forward.”

Marvolo inclined his head in acknowledgement. “Thank you. I promised Mrs. Wisby to drop by her office on my way home. She said just before the beginning of the session that the papers were ready.” His spirits lifted again. Hopefully the feelings he constantly had to deal with would stabilize once he absorbed the next part of his soul. He didn’t even dare to imagine what it might be like if the opposite were to happen.

“As you already know to be more careful, I don’t want to keep you any longer.” Amelia said, moving to the side so he had a clear path to the lifts.

“At the moment I plan to hold an adoption ceremony on next Saturday. I would feel honoured if you would consider attending, Amelia.” Some invitations should be delivered in person, and this was a prime opportunity to do just that.

For a moment the witch looked contemplative. “I don’t think that I have anything else planned for that day. Please send me an invitation by owl. Have a nice day!”

Chapter End Notes

The adoption made a jump forward I didn’t expect. But I think it fits rather well at this point. I guess it’s pretty obvious what a big part of the next chapter will be ;)

Thanks to Jordre and Jake for helping to improve my spelling!
Chapter Notes

The long awaited adoption is here at last. Any guesses how many chapters it'll take until the summer? I’m not really sure, but I hope that after this I can jump a little forward in time so that we’ll reach the spring holidays soon. Have fun!

Monday, 26th of February 1996

Minerva sat in her office – she had started to consciously think of the circular office of the Headmistress as her office at the end of the last week – going through all the mail she had gotten over the weekend. The temporary transfiguration teachers who had stepped in to fill the post she no longer had time to manage by herself were doing well, but they needed a permanent professor for the next school year. And there also still was the matter of Head of Gryffindor, a position she still held at the moment.

That needed to be remedied before the next school year as well.

Maybe she shouldn’t try to fill both spots with the same person. In fact the arrangement with more than one teacher for a subject worked out rather well so far. If there wasn’t the problem of funding more teacher salaries, she really would like to hire an instructor for the younger years, at least for each of the core subjects.

And maybe there was a solution to the problems with funds without increasing the tuition fees.

She sighed, glancing over to the big ledgers she had spent a lot of time with since she had taken up the position of Headmistress in earnest.

It seemed that there were funds waiting that were tied to several conditions. After all the time the conditions hadn’t been met – they hadn’t been met well before Dippet became Headmaster – interest and ongoing donations had grown the pile of untapped potential money to quite staggering amounts.

Not all of the funds would be able to be released, as some of the conditions would require the school to break the current laws. Which handily explained why Albus hadn’t tried to tap into them. There simply wasn’t a way they could legally offer an introductory course into blood-based magics. So funds set aside for that and making interest – probably even getting a regular donation, but she would have to go to Gringotts to check if her suspicion was true – would stay untouched for ever. Or at least for a long time.

Minerva suspected that those magically enforced conditions had been put in place quite some time ago to ensure a diverse education of the magical youth. And so it had happened that the money had been abandoned rather than re-routed to other subjects once something had to be dropped from the curriculum.
She would need an adviser with more cunning and more experience with magically binding contracts to see if there was a way to unlock a few of those budgets. Maybe Severus would find some time over summer.

Before Minerva could get lost – again – in ruminations over how an Introductory Course in the Performance of Seasonal Rituals would or should look like, a shimmering patronus slithered through the wall of her office, paused before her desk and started to speak. “Good evening, Headmistress. I just arrived at the school’s gates and hope that you have some time to speak with me. I’ll make my way up to your office.”

The patronus dispersed and Minerva unconsciously sat up straighter. Tom Marvolo Riddle, or Lord Slytherin as he was called now, wanted to speak with her on a Monday evening? How curious. She knew there wasn’t anything wrong with Mr. Slytherin. In fact this year the son of Lily and James had flourished despite all the upheavals the poor boy had had to go through. His marks were better than ever. Not one of his teachers had complained about his class performance. Not even Severus, and the Potions Master had a tendency to find fault in the smallest of things if he wanted to. The boy had widened his circle of friends considerably, and even though his re-sorting had ended with him no longer on one of the Quidditch teams, he hadn’t stopped entirely.

Minerva wasn’t sure if all those positive changes had their roots in the fact that Harry had been adopted, and she was reluctant to attribute any of them to Lord Slytherin. But at the same time she couldn’t deny that he at least had been the small pebble causing the avalanche. He had been the one changing around Mr. Slytherin’s classes, organising mind-healing sessions for the child, providing a steady adult interest in the boy’s school performance and accomplishments.

The Dursleys certainly had been lacking in that respect.

And the changes in Severus since the summer. She had been worried when the young man had agreed to go back to his duties as a spy, now it seemed that there really was no reason to fear a war with Lord Voldemort as the leader of the opposing side.

Before she could sink further into her musings the wards alerted her to someone making their way up the stairs. That probably was Lord Slytherin.

With a few precise motions of her wand Minerva cleared her desk of anything that might be of interest to a visitor but wasn’t any of his business. She was just finished when a clear sound in her mind from the wards on her door – she would get used to thinking of this office as hers – and a knock on the same door alerted her to the visitor standing before it.

“Come in!”

And it was indeed Lord Slytherin, wearing his elaborate Wizengamot robes with the family crest under a heavy woollen cloak which was opened to accommodate the change in temperature between the outside and the castle. He came in, his hair a little windswept, closed the door and gave a polite nod of his head in greeting. “Headmistress. Thank you for giving me time to speak with you on such short notice.”

Minerva stayed seated, but nodded back in return, indicating one of the visitor chairs for her unexpected guest to sit in. “Call it feline curiosity and take a seat. You look hassled. I hope all is well? Do I need to call for your son?” It still felt strange to refer to Lily and James’ son that way, but she let that thought drop in favour of inspecting the young looking wizard taking a seat in the leftmost chair, draping his cloak over the backrest. He truly looked as if he had had a long day. Severus looked remarkably like this after a day teaching the younger years, or any of the Gryffindor-Slytherin classes.

“No, if you’ll allow it, I want to visit with him in the common room after I have spoken to you. My news is better delivered in person.” The smile that looked so genuine on the handsome face told the story of happy news and not those tragic ones she had had to bring too many times to one of her students.

“Then what has brought you here this evening, Lord Slytherin?” Despite the fact that travel wasn’t all that hard for magical folk, most parents restrained themselves to only communicate via letter. That a parent came to the school was not a common occurrence.

“You may have heard that Harry and I have been working on getting approval to adopt a boy named Marcus, who shares our family gift, into our family. Today, rather unexpectedly, the adoption went through. So I’m here to inform Harry about the fact that he’s now an older brother. And I have come here to you specifically, Headmistress, to gain permission to take Harry out of school this coming weekend. I plan to make the adoption more officially than merely parchment forms filed with the Ministry. There will be a party, and Harry has expressed his desire to be there when this happens, whenever that might be.” Of course Minerva understood the implication of those plans, there would be a ritual held during or before that party. And she also agreed that Mr. Slytherin should be able to be there for the boy who would be his younger brother from now on. What shocked her, though, was the small smile on the face of Lord Slytherin. It even reached his dark blue eyes. The man was pleased, and not in the smug way she had so often seen on former Slytherins, but more like someone who had worked hard and finally reached the goal that had proven to be elusive before.

As there were no rules prohibiting parents from taking their children from school grounds on weekends for family celebrations – and the arrival, or maybe addition would work better in this instance, of a new child to a family certainly qualified – Minerva nodded. “I see no reason to deny your request, Lord Slytherin. Please organise a way of travel and the time he is to be back at school with your son’s Head of House.” She smiled and stood. “And please accept my congratulations on the growing of your family.”

The wizard across from her stood as well and firmly grasped her hand, shaking it. “Thank you, Headmistress. You should receive an invitation to the party in a few days. I’ll take my leave now to talk to my son and Professor Snape to make all the necessary arrangements. Good evening.”

With a flourish of putting his cloak back on, Lord Slytherin was gone and the door shut behind him.

Bemused, Minerva stared at the closed door for a moment longer, before shaking herself like a cat drenched by rain and returning to her work, searching for new members of staff. She was dreading the search for another Defence instructor.

“I need to get my broom checked over the spring holidays! There simply has something to be wrong with it! She never should have been able to fly faster than I!” Harry snorted at Draco’s whiny tone. And tilted his head sideways to get another angle on his drawing. Currently he was working on the drawing of a flitterbloom that he planned to animate to move like the plant regularly did.
“Stuff it, Harry!” Draco complained. “She only has a Comet 260, I have no idea what happened to my broom that she was faster.”

Harry looked up and ignored Draco – who was unusually flushed – in favour of turning towards Theo who was playing a game of chess against Daphne. “Is he always like this when something doesn’t go the way he thinks it should?”

Draco gave an indignant shout that was almost drowned out by the laughter from Theo, Daphne, and a few others in hearing range.

“He tends to be this way. But he’s at least better than he was in first year, when he almost constantly complained that you got to be on the team and he wasn’t allowed to.” Theo told with the air of someone sharing a big secret, but loud enough that everyone near the central fireplace could hear him.

More laughter followed and Draco flopped down on the two-seater next to Harry with a groan. “You’re a cruel bunch of evil teenagers. Why do I put up with you again?”

When no one answered to that and the room suddenly fell silent, Harry returned his attention to the room, and looked around to the door as everyone was staring at it.

There just inside the door into the common room that was closing again that very moment stood Marvolo, open cloak around his shoulders and a look of amusement on his face. “Good evening, everyone!”

Quickly closing his drawing pad, placing it in his book on sketch animating spells, and placing them on the near end table, Harry stood and quickly walked over to his father. There wasn’t much that would bring the man to Hogwarts on a school evening. The mirrors Marvolo had enchanted for them were simply working too well to make visits or even owls a necessity.

“It worked?” Harry asked when he was almost at his father’s side, eyes wide in hope.

“I signed the papers after the session this afternoon.” Marvolo nodded in answer, a big grin on his face.

Not thinking of what this would look like for the others, and too happy to even care, Harry took a last hasty step and enveloped the wizard before him in a big hug.

They had managed it! Marcus wouldn’t grow up feeling a burden, or unwanted. He would have a family. A bigger brother and a father who both cared. Harry was sure they would manage to give Marcus what they both had lacked for too long. They both knew what it was like to not have family, or reliable adults of any kind to care for them. Now they had a chance to make a difference for someone else.

After a few moments arms came up and around Harry, Marvolo returning the embrace. And so they stayed a moment until Harry’s senses caught up with him. Fighting a blush, Harry let his arms fall to his sides, feeling Marvolo do the same. He was painfully aware that everyone who had been staying at the common room was now looking at two of them and that there were a few more students here, probably fetched from the dorms by their friends.

.:Can you tell me more?:. Harry asked in parseltongue, leading Marvolo to a more secluded corner for a conversation.

They settled comfortably in two adjacent armchairs of dark green velvet. ..:Just before the session started today, Mrs Wisby came to tell me that the papers were ready. I went up as soon as the session was over:. Marvolo started, the happiness not vanishing from his face. ..I went to see the Headmistress before coming here. She agreed to let you leave school this coming weekend.
I’ll have to hash out details with Severus, but that should be easy enough:.

Harry couldn’t stop himself from snorting, earning himself an eye roll from Marvolo. Harry shrugged unapologetically. Severus Snape was a sworn follower of Marvolo’s. There was no reason to assume that there would be any problem with Marvolo’s getting exactly what he wanted from the man in situations just like this.

.. Barty is writing invitations to the party that will be sent out tomorrow. There will be an announcement in the important newspapers about the adoption, of course. And I’ll have to search for a ritual I vaguely remember. Not like the one we did for Aiden, but something similar enough. Would you be willing to lay the rune circle if it’s not too complicated?..

Harry nodded with a silly grin on his face. ..Certainly:. He would be happy to have such a big role in the adoption. With an announcement in the papers the news would be all over the school in no time. ..Can I tell Sirius?:. Harry asked, certain that his godfather would wish to know of such a big change in Harry’s life from Harry himself. ..Will Marcus get godparents?:.

For a moment Marvolo just sat there blinking and with an expression on his face that reminded Harry of the time Dudley had run into the glass wall of the snake enclosure after the glass had reappeared behind him.

Before Harry could enquire if Marvolo was feeling well, the man quickly shook his head, and nooded slowly. ..You may tell your godfather. Everyone will know tomorrow anyway. And thanks for bringing a point to my attention I hadn’t thought about until now. He should get godparents, shouldn’t he? I’ll have to think on that:. Marvolo smiled again and rose, picking up his cloak as he did so. “Have a nice evening, Harry. I’m sure Severus will inform you of the arrangements for Saturday morning once we have sorted them out.” They now were moving back towards the main fireplace and the door to the common room, passing all the students trying, and failing, to act normal and not show how nervous they were in the presence of Lord Slytherin and his heir.

“I’ll be sure to keep in touch,” Harry said, following his father right up to the door. A little as if he was escorting a visitor back to the door of his own house. And that picture might not even be that far off from reality. “Have a nice evening, father.”

And he was gone. Probably to speak with Professor Snape and think about possible godparents.

The moment Harry turned back to the common room he was faced with a silent crowd of Slytherins, all visibly curious, and only the students of fifth-year and up even attempting to hide their true feelings.

Knowing that there was no way he would get even a moment of calm if he didn’t address the hippogriff in the room, Harry took a few steps back to his usual seat in front of the main fireplace.
“Because I know you’re all dying of curiosity.” Harry grinned at his friends and Theo rolling his eyes. “Father finished the paperwork on the adoption of Marcus, a young boy who is a distant relative. It’ll be in the Prophet tomorrow, and there will be a party on Saturday. To get the questions out of the way: I’m happy that I’ll be a big brother. Marcus is an intelligent kid. He loves snakes. Currently he attends the new school Lord Lestrange has founded. I don’t think that you need to know more.”
Murmurs started up again and the common room returned to its normal state on a Monday evening. The studious were finishing off homework given on that very day, the lazy were rushing to finish work given to them the week before and due the next day. Harry collected his drawing supplies and his book, smiled to his friends, and explained in a much lower voice. “Father just went to the professor to sort out the details of me leaving for home over the weekend. And because I don’t want my godfather to read about this in the mail I’ll contact him now. I’ll be back later.”

Theo nodded, Daphne smiled, the others gave only short sounds of acknowledgement, and Harry already was planning how best to present the facts and developments with Sirius.

Tuesday, 27th of February 1996

As expected, the news of the adoption had made the front page of the Daily Prophet. Sighing in resignation – there simply was no way he could stop the press if he was going to use mostly legal means – Marvolo folded the newspaper, placed it to the side of the table, and turned towards the honey-sweetened pancakes on his plate.

Harry had brought up an important point yesterday that Marvolo hadn’t even considered until then. The need to name godparents for Marcus during, shortly before, or after the adoption ceremony on Saturday.

It simply was too important a tradition to name a set of responsible adults as possible guardians in dire circumstances, and as more people to have a guiding influence on the child growing up.

Usually friends of the parents were chosen. There just was no other explanation how Sirius Black ever could have been made godfather to Harry any other way. And more often than not, it was a witch and wizard who were not married or part of the same family.

Marcus didn’t have that, as far as they knew, because his mother hadn’t been able to choose, and the foster child system employed by the British government at this time didn’t choose either.

Marvolo briefly wondered if it would have made a difference for him if there had been a steady adult presence in his life beside the rather overworked and disinterested people at Wool’s. Shaking his head to get back on track – it didn’t matter as it was much too late now – Marvolo cut a piece from his breakfast and explored his possibilities in this while he carefully chewed.

There were a lot of Death Eaters he could appoint to this position. Whoever he picked would be pleased and see this honour as a big sign of his favour. Marvolo furrowed his brow in displeasure. That wouldn’t work well. He couldn’t deny that this position was one only given to those trusted to care for the child, but it shouldn’t be seen as a reward. So everyone who might interpret it that way was out of the running from the start. But it still left a few Death Eaters. Among them Lucius, Benjamin, Xerxes, and Severus. Could he get away with asking one of them in the eyes of the public? The fact that at least some of them had serious troubles with him – even if only in pretence – or had when he had come back, might stick out as odd to some people.

So maybe not Lucius who still maintained a rather overly polite if no longer frosty relationship with Marvolo in public. The others were options though.
A bigger problem was to find a witch he knew well enough and who could fill the position of godmother. He didn’t really know many witches. There was Augusta Longbottom whom he had to work with on and off as she was Harry’s regent for the Potter seat, and a member of the Wizengamot herself. Then there was Amelia Bones who seemed determined to befriend him despite the past they shared. If he was to select her, there would be no one in the whole of wizarding Britain who could claim he was trying to push his adopted son towards dark magic. The same was probably true if he were to ask Madame Longbottom, but she was older and albeit she had been friendly enough, Amelia’s efforts at moving on were less strained.

Picking up another pancake and floating over the pot of honey, Marvolo decided that he wasn’t going to ask one of the wives of his Death Eaters to be Marcus’ godmother. He didn’t really know them well, so why should he ask one of them?

Finishing up his breakfast, Marvolo tried to come to a decision as he was short on time with the invitations sent out the evening before, Barty having worked nearly in accord to get all the letters written, addressed and attached to owls.

ooOoo

Like most days in the morning, Xerxes was at the school in his office, going through his mail. There constantly were more children found that had magic but were living with muggles, so they had to send out representatives to introduce their families to magic and invite the children to their school constantly too. But most of the letters were from magical families all over the country asking for information on the school. They wanted to know if the school cost anything to send their children there, what the curriculum was, and if they truly offered schooling for Squibs.

It seemed that their society really had been in need of a school for younger kids. Even as he had learned why there hadn’t been one before. Just as Marvolo had predicted, there had manifested a kind of poltergeist not unlike Peeves who existed in Hogwarts, only looking younger than Peeves and behaving more childishly. The poltergeist didn’t have a name yet, and all any adult had ever seen were flashes of a giggling, half transparent floating child vanishing around corners. As the number of missing or damaged supplies hadn’t increased and no child had come to harm, Xerxes wasn’t too concerned over this development.

They would deal with the manifestation of juvenile magic gathered in such quantities in one place just as Hogwarts had done for centuries.

Thinking of the Dementor, at that moment there was the sound of a floo activating in the room where his secretary was sitting at her own desk – a Squib he had hired to help with all the administrative stuff that came with running a school and home for children – likely announcing the arrival of his Lord who just the day before had adopted one of the children under Xerxes’ care.

Signing the letter he just had written – assuring a mother that they did in fact offer a course in tailoring for Squib teenagers – Xerxes looked up in time to see Marvolo enter his office behind a slightly intimidated looking young secretary. “Lord Slytherin for you, Headmaster.”

Xerxes stood and nodded to his young aide. “Thank you, Miss Hopkins. Please ensure that we’ll not be interrupted.”

With a murmured affirmative Miss Hopkins was gone, leaving Xerxes alone with Marvolo, who had a pensive look about him.

“Sit down, Marvolo. I guess you’re here because the adoption finally came through?” Doing as he had asked his friend to do as well, Xerxes sat down, folding his hands on his desktop on top of the letter he just had finished.

Marvolo sat down in the leather armchair in front of Xerxes’ desk and nodded. “Indeed. Yesterday was spent getting everything ready at Griffin House, sorting out the adoption ceremony and party on Saturday, ensuring that Harry would be able to come as well. And now that that’s done, I wanted to talk with you about when would be the best time for Marcus to move to his new home.”

“You say everything is prepared at your home?” Xerxes got a nod in answer without even the slightest delay. “Then I see no reason to wait any longer. Marcus can come home with you right after school lets out today. The bus will change its route slightly to pick him up tomorrow morning and bring him back again after school is done. And I would suggest that you come to pick him up today.” Marvolo looked a little as if someone had dared to smack him over the head, and Xerxes had to work on maintaining his professional expression. “You can send an elf to pick up his things right away, of course. Maybe you’d like to inform him yourself over lunch? We haven’t spoken with him yet, as we didn’t know how long setting up a room for him would take you.” They had been informed of the change in guardianship the moment Marvolo had signed the papers the day before. “That’s not what you expected to happen?” It was more a statement than a question as Marvolo’s face gave the man's surprise away in a way that Xerxes hadn’t seen all that often. Even back when they all had been just over eleven years old, Marvolo had had a rather uncanny control over his features.

“You’re right. That wasn’t even near what I had expected. But I guess you’re right, Xerxes. There really is no reason to keep Marcus waiting. It might even work in our favour if he gets to live with me for a few days before the adoption ritual.” And there the amusing expression of stunned disbelief and surprise was gone again. “Regarding that ritual. I need to have a look at a few books in your library. I remember dimly that I read about a ritual to accept a distant relative into the more immediate family. That would fit nicely with our situation. And I hope that you can help me sort out the question of godparents.”

Xerxes was sure that his own face briefly revealed his surprise. That wasn’t something he had thought about, which only showed how thorough his Lord was in his planning.

“I think I can’t ask you, as I’m supposedly responsible for your loss of your sons. But I need someone to discuss my available choices.” Xerxes nodded, agreeing readily. Soon they were discussing the merits and possible problems of all the people Marvolo considered candidates for the important position of godparent for Marcus.

He had been excited the whole day. His new dad had rolled his eyes when Marcus had started bouncing as they had waited in the floo room at school for their turn to use the floo to travel home. And before Marcus had been allowed to run up to his room, he had had to put away his cloak and change his shoes.

But after that, only the explanation that his room was on the second floor and had his name on the door had been enough to send him running up the stairs.
And now he was here.

There was only one bed in the room, a big bed with curtains that could be drawn around it. Carvings of guardian dragons at all four posts, a number of rugs that had different patterns lay on the floor. Marcus especially liked the one with cats chasing each other around the edge. There was a shelf with a few books, the figurine of a unicorn prancing, and a box with a few boardgames.

Marcus ran from one end of the room to the other. He looked into his drawers and the wardrobe, inspected his desk with the neat chair in front of it and his small bag for school next to it, ran to the window which looked out on a dreary London day, turned to run back to the bed and saw his new dad standing in the door, smiling.

“There is a room with games down the hall. Harry’s and my room are on this floor as well. Flimm attached plates with our names to the doors there too. You can enter my room when I’m in there and you need me, otherwise please respect my privacy. After dinner the tailor will be here. He needs to take your measurements for the robes you’ll be wearing to your party. Flimm will inform you when it’s time for dinner. Do you need anything?”

Too overwhelmed for words, Marcus simply ran the few steps to where dad was standing and enveloped the other's legs with his arms.

A hand settled on his head, smoothing down his hair. It was wonderful, and he would never have to leave.

Something heavy slid over his foot and Marcus looked down to see a section of Nagini slithering by on the floor. He giggled.

.:Tell me a story, little one:. Nagini demanded and Marcus let go of his dad’s legs to run over to the shelves to take a look at the books. There was his copy of the fairy tales dad could read so well, and a few picture books he enjoyed at school, as well as some he never had seen before. He got one out and had a good look at the picture on the front. An owl blinked up at him from the branch she had been painted on.

.:Sure. Sit on the bed?:. Taking Nagini’s change in direction as agreement Marcus climbed onto the bed and made himself comfortable against the headboard, settling the book in his lap, waiting for Nagini to curl around him, her head positioned so that she had a good view of the pictures.

.:I’ll leave the two of you to it. Flimm will be fetching you for dinner:. The door closed softly as dad left, but Marcus was engrossed in a story he was telling that explained how the crup and the kneasel on the two pages currently opened had managed to nick the pudding from the kitchen, and got to eat it before dinner.

The cutlery and plates were splashing around more water than usual while washing themselves under direction of Molly’s spell. She even had spelled a bucket and mop to gather the water from the floor to reduce the risk of her slipping on the wet floor.
Once again she felt conflicted over Lord Slytherin and the man’s actions. All she had heard from Ron and Ginny about how Harry was doing at school indicated that the boy was better off now than he ever had been while staying with his other family. In fact, what little she had learned about them from her twins and Arthur – from when they had picked Harry up for the visit to the Quidditch World Cup – hadn’t painted the most friendly of pictures.

And still she had trouble trusting the evidence before her eyes and disregard her gut feeling that there simply had to be something fishy about the wizard. He had killed so many in the past. How could it be that he had changed so drastically?

They had gotten an invitation to the adoption party that was to be held on Saturday at Potter Manor, she and Arthur, while the letter had said that all other members of the family no longer at school or living at the Burrow also had been invited. Short floo calls to Bill and Percy had confirmed that, just Charlie hadn’t received any owls yet. But that hadn’t been all that surprising, maybe she could have saved the money it had cost her to use the international floo calling system from the post office in Diagon Alley.

Arthur thought that they should go and gift the child a nice little toy, or maybe a sweater. Molly still had doubts.

With another angry flick of her wand she send the chimney sweep up through the chimney to clean it out. Before all this had started with Harry’s adoption the world had been easier. That much was certain.

“Another letter from your father?” Picking up the letter that had been delivered during their midday meal, Enora rolled her eyes, while Nawel muttered not exactly polite descriptors of the girl mocking them under her breath.

A few girls had picked up on the fact that they were receiving letters from the former convict Sirius Black and that the man, probably, was their father and not married to their mother. A few people still had problems with something like that.

Enora had a suspicion that there was envy speaking. The girls acting that way all followed one ringleader, who already was set to marry a wizard almost ten years her senior. She always tried to tell everyone how much money she would have access to, how good that match was for her family assets. It didn’t feel as if she really believed it, more like she was repeating it as often as she could in an effort to convince herself.

So she ignored her – there wasn’t anything they could do to help her anyway – and her cronies, and tried to help Nawel do the same.

“Stop muttering and read.” Enora admonished her sister, breaking the seal on the letter, and folding the letter open.

Once again it was written in English, with just the greeting at the beginning and at the end in stilted French. It was a nice gesture, but also rather awkward. It was just that bad.

The letter answered a few questions from their last letter – Sirius never had been to Namibia, and he rather liked spicy food – and asked a few more of his own. This exchange of questions that seemed a little disjointed and without context had started a few letters ago, and was intended to make it easier for them to get to know each other a little before they met in person.

But this letter contained a question that had a lot of context. He asked them if they would be all right if he brought his godson and another boy with him to the house for a few days over the holidays.

“What do you think?” Nawel asked in a rather low voice, making reading her opinion on the matter from tone alone all but impossible.

Enora shrugged. “It might help if we and mother aren’t the only ones there with him. His godson might also be another source for information. Watching them interact might help us get a better picture of who he really is?” The idea of a week of only them, their mother, and a relative stranger who most likely was their father in a house in the countryside had something daunting about it. Adding another teenager and a younger kid into that mix might make it easier to bear. “Let’s make a list of all the reasons that’s a good idea, and all those why it wouldn’t be a good idea.”

Nawel groaned playfully, her dark brown eyes sparkling with amusement at teasing her sister. “If we must.”

“Yes, we have to.”

It was funny how the Daily Prophet managed to ship as far as Egypt the same day as it came out. It probably had something to do with magic. Albus snorted and unfolded his third example of the newspaper he had received. His healers had decided that he was stable enough to read unfiltered news information again. Albus was pretty sure that was a good sign for his mental health and stability.

He wasn’t so sure it was a good idea to read the Daily Prophet if he wanted to improve more. But sadly it was the only publication from home that brought a good mixture of actual news from Quidditch, over politics, to society news. All the other publications he could pick that came from Britain were specific magazines, like Transfiguration Monthly, and others mostly publishing studies, papers, and other research pertaining to their field.

When he spotted the article detailing how Marvolo Slytherin had adopted another child without a proper family, Albus contemplated what might have happened to the boy he had found in that orphanage so long ago if he had been adopted by a magical family. Would they have been able to curb the dangerous tendencies Albus still believed he had seen?

There was no way to be sure. And as his healers insisted, there was no real benefit in speculating about past events and how they might have turned out if he himself had made a different decision. He wasn’t responsible for everything that happened, and it wasn’t his duty to prevent bad things from happening.

And most importantly – as the healers reiterated constantly – it wasn’t his place to decide what bad even was.

Deciding to be happy for a little boy by the name of Marcus that he was getting an older brother as caring as Harry, Albus moved on to the small advertisements section. The most curious things could be found there.

ooOoo

With narrowed eyes he read the morning paper and the announcement in it. Of course he already had heard about it through the Ministry grapevine the day before, but seeing it written drove the blade in deeper.

Once again the Ministry had let itself be led by Slytherin like a crup on a leash. Most of them were just too happy to avoid conflict, bow to those seemingly more powerful, and simply do whatever promised to bring the most profit for them.

Crushing the paper in his hands, sending the sound of tearing paper into the otherwise silent kitchen – his wife once again in bed dosed with potions to ward off the grief – he took deep breaths. He would win nothing if he acted out of anger. He would work patiently, methodically, and without rest towards his goal, following the plan he had made. There was no other way he could possibly rid the world of the evil that went by the name of Slytherin.

Saturday, 2nd of March 1996

Before they would go over to the Manor for a party, they had gathered around the fireplace in the kitchen at Griffin House. Or rather they would gather there. The adults currently were milling about in the formal dining room, and only Harry and Marcus were currently in the kitchen.

Harry was crouching on the floor, a piece of chalk in hand carefully drawing the circle of the ritual blessing Marvolo had handed to him. It wasn’t the same circle they had used when Theo had gotten a younger brother. Aiden hadn’t been part of the Nott family magic before the ritual, but Marcus already had access. His ability to speak with snakes was proof of that.

So Marvolo had spent many hours in various libraries – family libraries of different old families – searching for an old ritual blessing he vaguely remembered to once have seen. In the end he had been able to find it. The ritual was similar to the one used for Aiden with lots of runes for family-related terms, but it was different in many ways as well. For one, there weren’t any of the smaller circles with different family crests. Only three small ones, one with a rune for brother, one for father, and one for child.

Marcus was sitting on the big table, swinging his legs, watching with interest what Harry was doing. “Do you learn that at school? Mrs. Moors told us about runes and what they can be used for last week. But she said it’s dangerous if you don’t know what you’re doing.”

Harry hummed, and finished one rune with a resolute stroke. “If you combine the wrong runes in the wrong way it can get dangerous. That’s why father will have a look over what I have drawn before we begin.” Harry looked up and smiled over to his little brother.
It felt strange, he had a little brother.

“Why is that circle green?” Marcus pointed to the one Marvolo would stand in later, the one with the rune for father.

“Because I used green chalk for it.” Harry laughed when Marcus stuck his tongue out at him. “The instructions father gave me say to draw that part in green. It doesn’t have an explanation. We’ll have to ask him.”

Marcus hummed, fiddling with the hems of his silken robes. Harry had draped his own robe – the one he had that represented the Slytherin family – over one of the chairs, so it wouldn’t get in the way while he was crawling over the floor. The embroidery was delicate and Harry wasn’t about to risk it catching on anything.

Marcus’ robes were of similar make, as he was just as much of the Ancient and Nobel House of Slytherin as Harry and Marvolo. It was obvious that Marcus was accustomed to wearing robes each day at school, but robes made of silk were something different still.

“Are you excited?” Harry picked up the parchment Marvolo had handed him before sending him to lay the circle to check what was the next part to be drawn.

Marcus hummed. “Dad said there will be cake and ice-cream later. I look forward to that.” At the tone the younger boy used Harry looked up in surprise. Marcus scowled at the circle, making Harry smile. He was pretty sure he knew what the problem was.

“No reason to worry, Marcus. Father is an expert in this. And if he wasn’t sure I’m good enough to do this right, he wouldn’t let me attempt this. And he’ll check before we begin. I have participated in a few different rituals by now. It’s safe.”

And just as the weather could change within minutes in April, Marcus’ mood changed again.

“What kind of rituals were they?” Suddenly he sounded eager again.

Harry sat back on the floor – paying attention not to smudge any of the lines in the rune circle – and looked up to his little brother. “One was the adoption ritual when Aiden was adopted into the family of my friend Theo. The other one was one Healer Greengrass performed. A diagnostic ritual. They both went fine. And this will as well.”

Marcus scrunched his face up. “Dia-what?”

Harry smiled. That might have been a little big of a word. “Diagnostic. The ritual checked if there was anything wrong with me. Like broken bones, or a cold, or something like that. It’s quicker than checking everything with charms. And everything was all right.” Marcus seemed content with the explanation and looked on as Harry finished the circle with a few markings selected to represent their family. Snakes were prominent among that group.

Harry felt content and elated over the prospect that this ritual would finish the process of Marcus becoming his younger brother, and that he would have had a significant part in the ritual preparation.

Nagini was resting near her human and one of the contained fires that spread nice heat around it. There were a lot of other humans around, bringing with them an interesting plethora of smells. Marvolo had explained earlier that his family was about to gain a new member. She had shortly spoken with both little ones this morning before they had gone off to the room where the food was prepared and she wasn’t allowed to hunt. The elf was most insistent on that, and even had set some magic around the access points hindering Nagini from entering the room. But for today that magic had been lifted. Nagini was to be part of the ceremony.

That was bound to be interesting, even though it was quite boring at the moment. Humans had such an odd way of communicating.

.:Nagini?:. Marvolo caught her attention. She turned her head so that she had her human in her line of sight. .:Can you please check on the boys and see if Harry has finished the ritual circle?:.

.:I’ll check on the little one and the even littler one:. Nagini agreed and then started to slither over the wooden, smooth floor towards the opening in the wall everyone was using to get in and out of the room. She would need better names for her human’s hatchlings. Maybe the one she had called little one before had a point. The new one was so much more fitting to the description.

Nagini chuckled to herself when the humans scattered before her, making room for her magnificent form to move. She really missed the skittish, fat man who had smelled so interestingly of rodents. It had always been fun to chase him around a room, or get him to jump by slithering by just a little nearer than needed.

When she made it to the room smelling of cooked meats and plants, Nagini took in the position of her small humans, raising the front of her body a little off the floor. .:Master wants to know if the circle is finished:. She stayed away from where the bigger one of her small humans was sitting on the floor. Marvolo had taught her the dangers of disturbing a painted circle on the floor. Before her human didn’t tell her it was safe to slither over the ground covered in funny smelling markings she would stay clear of it.

.:I’m finished, Nagini. So father can come in to check my work:. The bigger hatchling – she really needed better names for them – answered, turning a little so he could see her.

.:Are you excited as well? I’m really excited!. the small hatchling hissed, sending jittery vibrations from where he was sitting towards the floor and all over the room.

.:I’m happy to have another human here at home. And you being here makes my human happy. I’m happy about that:. Nagini hissed at the small one with amusement. She found the concept of caring for the young slightly puzzling. Snakes usually only protected their young until they hatched, if even that long. Marvolo once had explained that human hatchlings couldn’t look after themselves from the start, that they even needed to be carried around. Nagini wasn’t all that sure Marvolo was serious with that, but she could see that the small one they had visited at that place for human hatchlings wasn’t yet skilled enough to hunt for his own food. .:I’ll let Marvolo know:. With that she turned around and slithered over her own body to return to the room filled with grown humans talking.

Nagini watched all that followed with interest. First her human went to where the little one had drawn on the floor, checking the markings and then doing some magic to make sure she couldn’t smudge the markings when she moved over them. After that the humans moved from where they had gathered before to where Nagini normally wasn’t allowed to go.

Her human took control of the situation telling everyone where they should stand, arranging her two small humans in certain spots, taking another inside the marking, while everyone else gathered to form a circle of warm bodies around the circle of chalk.

..: Nagini, please move so that you are a circle between me and my two sons:. Marvolo asked her at one point, and Nagini readily followed the directions. This would bring her into the middle of everything. She moved so her head was resting near the feet of the smallest human, who had the man smelling of dried plants and fire and a woman smelling of soap, beeswax, and parchment at his shoulders, hissing friendly words to him. The small one was so nervous, his heart sounded like a bird in a cage trying to get out.

People started to speak at the outer edges of the circle, each lighting a white candle when they said something, usually short. Then the two grown humans next to the small hatchling spoke before it was the turn of her humans, her family. And the air started to fill with the feeling of something almost like lightning crackling along her scales.

..:Marcus, son of distant family I do not know, I welcome you into my house and under my protection. I promise to be your protector, guardian, and father for as long as you need me to be. And to hold you close as family as long as I live:. her human hissed first.

..:Marcus, child of distant family I do not know, I welcome you to be my little brother, to grow up by my side, to play with me, and quarrel, as brothers do. I promise to be your protector, friend, and older brother for as long as we both live:. the little one added, filling the air with more of that delicious and curious feeling.

..:Together we’ll be from now on a family of three:. The hissing got really loud at the end when they all hissed the words together, and Nagini felt the energy charging forward and sideways into the humans around her, binding them all together in their smells even more than they already had been.

That had been nice. Especially the warmth now filling her. Maybe they would find another hatchling they could claim for their family so they could repeat this. She really would like that.

Children were running around, chased by Harry who was the only teenager present at the party. He had been pressed into donning wings fashioned after a Hungarian Horntail, spreading his arms and flapping them to make it seem as if he was flying, and was sporting a silly headdress as well. But Marvolo had to admit that his older son – and wasn’t that a truly glorious and frightening feeling, to have two sons – managed an impressive imitation of an angry dragon chasing away knights who were trying to steal from the dragon’s nest.

“He makes a convincing dragon,” Amelia unknowingly affirmed Marvolo’s own musings.

“I fear that it might be the result of first-hand experience,” Marvolo stated drily, grinning despite himself.

Amelia snorted, shifting a little so she had a better view of the children now turning and launching a coordinated attack on the dragon. “How much do you bet that the Prophet will have at least one article tomorrow wondering how it came to be that I’m Marcus’ godmother?”
“I won’t take that bet,” Marvolo snorted, that was a certainty. “But I’m happy to provide more gossip for the mills. If I’m honest, I’m rather curious to read what they make of me choosing the newly named Lord Prince and the Head of the Department for Magical Law Enforcement.” The little knights had managed to drag the dragon down to the ground – freed from snow and under warming charms set by the elves – and now Harry was calling for mercy between helpless laughter as he was being tickled.

Children could be cruel was the saying, and considering that a tickling curse was a rather effective tool in torture, that right there was proof of that saying.

“Well, I fear that they won’t go with common sense,” Amelia said, sipping from her cup of warmed punch. “They probably will once again claim that we are courting, and will play up the angle of Dark Wizard with the Professor.”

Marvolo nodded, giving in to temptation and morphing his expression to one more grave than he ever would truly show. “It can’t be that I searched for two strong individuals, of clear moral convictions, old enough to care for a child should it come to that, with assets and skills, insights and experience that could benefit my son. No it has to be that I want to sway a witch to marry me and that another only agreed to the position to corrupt a young innocent boy towards darkness.”

Amelia laughed, covering her mouth with one hand. When she had regained her composure she gestured towards where Xerxes stood with the parents of his heiress as well as a few others who obviously were muggles. It seemed that inviting all of Marcus’ classmates including siblings and parents had been a good idea.

“Would you be so kind as to introduce me to some of the non-magical guests of your party?” She asked.

Marvolo gave her a look. “This is Marcus’ party. But of course I’ll introduce you to some of the parents of muggle-born witches and wizards.”

The two objectives that he had had when he had given Barty the list of people to invite seemed to have been met. Make it a memorable party for Marcus, and provide networking opportunities to promote the inclusion of families with dormant magical blood into their society. It was really working out rather well.

Chapter End Notes

This is the last chapter for this year. I'll take a break of three weeks over Christmas. I wish you all a peaceful season of family gatherings! And a good start into the next year!

Thank you all for your comments and reviews they help me write on a hard day!

Thanks to Jordre and Jake for helping to improve my spelling!

March 1996

Settling into life with a small child in the house had its upsides and downsides, but Marvolo felt that the downsides were more numerous. It was nice to eat dinner in the company of Marcus, listening to the boy telling about his day and what he had learned in school, with Nagini hissing commentary now and again. They often spoke parseltongue at home nowadays.

But days like this one were trying, to say the least.

A door closed with a bang, angry, quick steps running along the hall on the family floor, before Marvolo heard the door open again, heavier steps following. "Master Marcus, come back here! You are not finished with setting the room to rights yet!" That was the voice of the nanny Marvolo had hired to help him care for Marcus in the evenings and on weekends when school was closed and there were no lessons for the day.

Mrs. Peters was another Squib he had found through his Death Eaters. She was a born Greengrass – but no one had volunteered more information on her parents – had married a Muggle who was now dead, never had a child of her own, and had worked many years caring for the children of other people.

She seemed competent, but today had been a bad day from the start.

Marcus hadn't wanted the porridge Flimm had made them, and had rejected most vehemently every alternative the house-elf had offered. It seemed the bad weather – a storm with heavy rain – had caused the teachers to have the children stay indoors for their playtime usually spent outside. Additionally, Marcus had complained that all the snow was gone.

All in all, this had been a really trying day for all of them.

With a sigh Marvolo stood from his desk, and made his way upstairs where he could hear the nanny knocking on the door to Marcus' room. They had been tidying up the playroom then.

"Can I help?" Marvolo asked and the nanny turned from the door to face her employer.

"The door is stuck. I don't think that's usually something this door does?" Marvolo shook his head, indicating that indeed this door wasn't one to get stuck. "Thought so. Then it probably was blocked using magic. Marcus is most unhappy today. He wasn't able or willing to concentrate on any of the games and started to throw toy blocks around. When I told him that we would stop and clean up the room he helped at first." She gave a sigh. "I think he's more than a little frustrated with how this day went."
Marvolo nodded. "I'll have a look at the door and a talk with my son. Maybe you want to take a cup of tea and a piece of cake down in the kitchen? Flimm certainly will be happy to provide you with both. My paperwork can wait." He wasn't too keen on bookkeeping and report reading anyway. Spending time with his son, even if he was cranky, was a better use of his time.

With a grateful nod Mrs. Peters made room in front of the door. "That sounds like a wonderful idea. I'll be back later?"

"I guess we most likely will need help getting ready for bed again." If he had to, Marvolo was pretty sure he and Marcus would manage, but it was easier with her help.

When she was gone Marvolo took a few deep breaths to calm himself down and then cast a silent unlocking spell at the door – Alohomora was enough – and went in.

Marcus was on his bed, face down, legs hanging over the side, listlessly punching a pillow with his tiny fist. The boy certainly had had a bad day judging by the picture he made. Marvolo felt a little bad for smiling and quickly schooled his face in a friendly one showing that he could feel Marcus' frustration.

"Wasn't a good day?" Marvolo asked as he sat down next to Marcus on the bed, smoothing down his casual robes as he did so.

"No," was the muffled reply.

"Want to help me clean up the playroom with magic?" The trick had worked before, and maybe watching some harmless magic being done would help Marcus to get out of his bad mood.

Hesitantly Marcus rolled over onto his back, looking up to where Marvolo was sitting and smiling at him. His efforts gained Marvolo a hesitant nod. With a hand stretched out for his son, Marvolo stood up hoping to lure his son up from the bed.

It worked like a charm, and together they raced through the hall and into the playroom, Marcus laughing and Marvolo smiling. When they entered the room Marvolo got to see a mess of toys spread out all over the room, colourful carpet and rugs covered with equally colourful blocks of wood, figurines of different animals as well as magical creatures, and the pieces of at least two jigsaw puzzles.

"Let's clean up here. You tell me where the pieces go, and I'll levitate them there." Of course Marvolo knew that this was kind of a cheat, and some would argue that he was going too easy on Marcus. But he felt that forcing the child to work on cleaning the room on his own the tedious way even as he was frustrated for some reason would be detrimental. It always had made him more angry and less likely to cooperate and listen. After many hours with Madam Goyle he guessed that those harsh methods were one of the reasons he always had treated emotions and emotional responses as weaknesses.

Better avoid creating the same environment for his young son.

Placing everything back where it belonged was quick work with this method, and Marcus was a little less hard to handle once that chore was out of the way. When Marvolo later went into his son's bedroom to say good night the boy sat against the headboard, his favourite stuffed snake clutched in his hand and a pleading look on his face.

"Can you make it snow?"

With a twirl of his wand Marvolo conjured up some dry, never-melt snow that started to fall from the ceiling and soon created small banks against objects and furniture in the room.

"And real snow? The kind that melts when it gets inside? I want to build another snowman!" So that had been the reason for Marcus' bad mood after school.

"It's spring now. There won't be snow until the next winter. But soon it'll be warm enough to go swimming. And broom riding outside." Marvolo knew how to change the weather in an area to get snow, and he even would be able to do it. But this kind of magic was one that was illegal for very good reasons. It had been banned once because people had blamed all kinds of weather mishaps on magical folk. New knowledge on how the weather worked on a global level made it quite clear that manipulation in one area, even just a small one, could have devastating effects somewhere else, and even bad long-term effects for the whole planet.

In short, it really wasn't worth the hassle.

"But I want to build a snowman," Marcus pouted, folding his arms over his chest, strangling the stuffed snake in the process.

"How about, I read you a story about a snowman?" Marvolo asked in an attempt to derail a possible temper tantrum. They had just recently added a book on the seasons and what changed between them to the child-appropriate library, which held several short stories about things one could see, experience, or expect in any given season.

And so the day ended with Marvolo imitating the voices of a snowman, a robin, and a squirrel. Marcus had fun and finally went to sleep, and Marvolo successfully had avoided doing the most boring paperwork ever invented for another evening.

oooOOooo

With each day that passed, the final exams were drawing nearer. And for Harry and his year-mates, the big OWL exams were coming up. Even students who normally weren't prone to care much about exams until the very last minute could be seen studying in the library quite regularly. These weren't the normal exams they were used to. They would have to answer questions about everything they had learned since they had started at Hogwarts, not only what they had covered in the past year.

Knowing his weak points, Harry had managed to jump over his own shadow, leave his pride behind, and ask Draco for help with his practical Potions work. Between those regular sessions – at least weekly to build up muscle memory on how to prepare ingredients – homework, practice with the Slytherin Quidditch team, lessons with Professor Snape for Occlumency, meetings with Madame Goyle every other week, and preparations for the Defence Club, there wasn't much time left.

When Hermione had offered – and in Ron's case insisted – to create study plans for them all once again, Harry had accepted and made sure that she counted the time spent preparing the Defence Club meetings and the club meetings themselves as study time for Defence Against the Dark Arts.

One aspect of those plans was that their circle of friends regularly met in the library for study sessions.

"Where's that information?" Theo grumbled under his breath, quickly paging through the Potions book they had been using since first year and which he had picked up from one of the shelves nearby.
"What are you searching for?" Hermione asked without looking up from the text she was scanning for something.

"The different uses of snake fangs in potions. I thought it would be in here, as I had references about this in my study notes from third year. But I can't find it." Theo looked up and over to where Hermione was sitting, frustration clearly on his face. The stress was getting to all of them.

"Have you looked in the theory section to the cure for boils? I think it's hidden between some more interesting titbits of information near the end of the page. Easily overlooked," Hermione said after only a short moment of hesitation, seemingly not really paying attention to the people around her.

Theo threw Harry an incredulous look, and Harry only shrugged. He didn't know how she was doing it, but when it came to books and what to find where inside them, he wouldn't second-guess her without very good reason.

A chuckle went around the table when Theo looked up from the book only a moment later, wide-eyed and surprised. "Thank you, Hermione!"

Some time later – Harry quickly lost track of time when he lost himself in magical theory nowadays, integrating what he now knew about Parselmagic made it that much more interesting – quiet footfalls neared their table in an out-of-the-way corner, and all of them looked up. "Hello, Ginny!" Daphne greeted the younger redhead, who slid in next to Luna, who was sitting right next to Harry, and smiled.

"I hope you lot aren't against me sitting with you?" Ginny asked, setting her book bag down next to her chair. "Eloise and Vicky are reading Witch Weekly up in our dorm and are giggling like mad, and I still have to finish my essay for Defence. Why it's important to know the habitats of potentially dangerous creatures." She managed to imitate Professor Slinkhard's voice and demeanour quite well, getting a few snickers from the mix of Gryffindor and Slytherin students sitting around the table. Luna seemed oblivious and lost in her own head, while Hermione gave a stern, disapproving look but refrained from saying anything. "I just know he wants us to write some drivel on how it's easier to avoid such places when one knows what to look for."

For a while they worked in concentrated silence, passing around books, asking quiet questions of their neighbours. It was so much easier to learn here than in the common room. Especially as Harry could sit with Luna, close enough to feel the warmth of her body next to his, and spend time with her this way. When Theo swapped places with Daphne to sit at the corner of the table with Ginny, Harry had to hide a grin by looking down at his own notes for Herbology. He was taking notes on learning cards on different plants with drawings of leaves, flowers, stem sections, and fruits or seeds if the plant had them. One of the sixth year Slytherins had seen the cards in the common room and offered money in exchange for a copy once Harry was finished.

When Ron came over to them, no book bag in sight, but his robes in disarray and his face flushed, Harry knew that this wasn't going to end well.

"What are you doing here, Ginny!" Ron seemed really angry but somehow managed to whisper-scream at his sister, his face blotchy red in anger. "Lavender said that you were on your way to the library to meet with Nott!" Harry was thinking fast to find a way to avoid a conflict in the library. This had the potential to get really loud and maybe even violent pretty fast.

"What is it to you?" Ginny furiously whispered back. "Are you angry because he's a Slytherin? Or because of the rumours told about his father?"

Theo carefully moved himself in his chair to face Ron, his body between Ginny and her brother.
Harry placed his quill down and reached for his wand slowly, trying to decide if he should do something and get problems with all three later, or if he simply would stay at the sideline waiting to see if his intervention would be needed. Maybe he should be ready to cast a shield charm over the books?

For a moment Ron seemed thrown for a loop, as if he hadn't thought about that particular angle of the problem yet. "No!" Was Ron's final conclusion, while he was shaking his head, still furiously glaring at Ginny. "Why should I have something against Slytherins?" Harry felt his eyebrows crawl up towards his hairline at that proclamation. That development was recent and a little startling that Ron seemed unaware of how this had been different not really all that long ago. But if Harry himself could come to call Marvolo father in that time, Ron could come to see that Slytherin didn't equate evil. They all were growing up, some faster than others.

But Ron wasn't finished. "You're too young! You can't start dating just yet! My little sister can't start snogging an older boy! That's simply not right!" Now Hermione was paying more attention to the whispered shouting match than the direction from where she obviously feared Madam Pince would appear any moment.

Harry watched, wand in hand but carefully concealed, as Ginny's face turned red in her anger. "How dare you! I'm plenty old enough to decide such things for myself!"

Suddenly Ginny and Ron both held their wands in hand, several people, precious books, and a table in the way. It didn't take long and they all were standing, wand in hand, a wary Theo clearly unsure what to do, a pair of siblings sending silent death glares at each other, and the rest of their study group worried about how this would develop. Or dissolve.

This could turn bad so very quickly. And no one was about to do anything. Harry felt the need to act, to prevent the disaster he could see coming. Spells flying, damaging the books, maybe even injuring one of them, earning them all a ban from the library for the rest of their days.

That wouldn't do.

With – much – more authority and conviction than he felt, Harry took a step forward to draw the attention of all present to himself. "Let's move this somewhere else. The library clearly isn't the right place for this discussion." He could see the moment both Ron and Ginny wanted to direct their ire at him for seemingly taking the other's side. Harry held up his hands, silently casting a silencing charm first on Ginny – her hexes were much more vicious than those of her brother – and then on Ron. "Don't be silly. Both of you. Get a move on!"

To Harry's surprise the others started packing up their materials, seemingly all eager to see this play out to the end. He felt like rolling his eyes. Why were people so willing to watch drama enfold between others? Quickly they managed to return books to the shelves they had taken them from, gather their stuff back into their bags, and march out of the library a few doors down into one of the many unused rooms around the castle.

Ginny and Ron were still glaring at each other, but Theo and Daphne managed to keep them apart on their short way to prevent any violent outbursts. Meanwhile Harry tried to come up with a way to clear the air. Just a few days back Ron had wanted to know how far Harry and Luna had gone. That he now had declared Ginny too young to do the same made him look like a hypocrite in Harry's eyes.

When Theo moved to stand with Ginny, Ron exploded and Harry's spell ceased to work. "Get away from my little sister! She's not old enough for a boyfriend! Keep your hands off her!"
Resigned Harry lifted the spell still affecting Ginny, and watched her storm at her brother, dust rising from the floor under her angry steps. "I have no boyfriend! And what would you say if I was with Harry? Would that be all right then?" Ron managed an impressive imitation of a fish, clearly uncomfortable with that accusation, but he did glance towards where Harry was standing, Luna at his side.

Ginny saw that motion and turned on Harry. "And you! You're together with Luna, who is in the same year as me. You can't really be of the opinion that I'm too young to have a boyfriend, or have one a year older than me!"

Holding up his hands, wand held between two fingers in his right, Harry shook his head. "Of course not. I just wanted to get us out of there before we all earned a ban from the library for the near future. I for one feel that you're capable of defending yourself quite well, and are mature enough to have a boyfriend. And I know Theo to be a good bloke. He'll respect a witch's wishes. Sort it out between the two of you, Ron, Ginny. I for one agree with Ginny that she's the one to decide here."

Taking Luna's hand Harry turned to leave. This clearly was something that Ginny had to sort out with her brother by herself. The hurt on Ron's face as Harry so openly took the girl's side in this was hard to witness. That Hermione smiled at him approvingly didn't really improve the situation.

Most of the others followed Harry out of the room, and they could hear the screaming before they had reached the doors to the library again.

They still had studying to do.

oooOOooo

Now and then Severus enjoyed a leisurely stroll along the halls of Hogwarts just before curfew. Knowing that he would return to his wife, a nice cup of warm herbal tea – too late to drink anything stimulating and find a sound sleep – made the silent march into a welcome exercise.

The possibility to catch a few students out of bounds only made the whole much sweeter. It always was fun seeing teenagers scramble and blush because they had thought to have found the best spot for hiding out. But much to each of the Professors' amusement, the same places had been in use by generations of students probably since the Founders' time.

As always when spring was just around the corner, the number of students he found in compromising positions during his regularly scheduled evening strolls had increased in the recent weeks.

Luckily Madame Pomfrey was diligent in answering all questions a student might come to her with – she regularly advocated for a mandatory health class to be added to the curriculum, because only a fraction of the boys ever asked her anything – and handed out contraceptive potions without asking too many questions, keeping the students' confidence. Severus himself made sure each year's new prefects were able to answer questions for their peers. But when he had learned that a certain book was making the rounds of the dorms, originating with Mr. Slytherin, he had been glad. There never was too much information on offer to prevent mishaps between students. Only informed teenagers could make informed decisions.

Today he already had sent Mr. Nott down to the dungeons a few corridors away from the Gryffindor tower entrance. At least the young man had managed to set up a perimeter ward-like spell to warn him and whoever he had been with if someone was approaching. As a result, only Mr. Nott had had to listen to a short but stern scolding before being sent down. The guilty look on the boy's face had Severus suspicious, though, that there might be someone else around still.

Which was why he currently was walking up the stairs to the Astronomy Tower. It was a clear night, and even as Severus never had participated in such activities as a teenager himself, he knew for a fact that stargazing was a pastime that was considered romantic by many. The need to huddle together to stay warm only added to the appeal.

The moment Severus reached the top of the tower where lessons were held, the cold night air hit him in the face, stealing his breath for a moment. There was still quite a bit of bite to the air, but the view of the stars was spectacular. As usual the lesson of the day in Astronomy would only start at a later point, but there was whispering in the air, and the distinct wet sound of lips moving against each other in a kiss.

A few steps out from the staircase gave Severus a much better view which allowed him to spot a pair of students seated near the inner wall, not paying the stars any mind as they had wrapped their arms around each other and their faces were attached at the lips.

Taking a few more silent steps, Severus positioned himself for maximum effect before he cleared his throat to get the couple's attention.

A blonde head and one with dark hair turned to look at the sudden noise, making Severus smirk. "Mr. Slytherin, Miss Lovegood, you might need the reminder that it's almost curfew and you both are too far from your common rooms to make it back in time. Shall I deduct points now, or wait until the time truly is up?"

The boy blushed, but the girl only smiled serenely her face naturally flushed from the snogging Severus had interrupted.

"No answer? I gladly would add a detention for the both of you. Naturally on different evenings." As Severus had come to expect Miss Lovegood seemed unaffected, but Mr. Slytherin quickly made to stand, putting his clothes back to order as he did so.

"No need for that, Professor. We set a timer so we would be back in the common room on time." The boy trailed off, blushing even more and taking on a most sheepish look. Severus' statement seemingly had only now reached the boy's brain.

"Indeed," Severus drawled. "Go on, I'll make sure you won't get lost on your way down." He waved for the students to precede him and watched in amusement as they did so, Potter… no, Slytherin, quickly picking up a blanket from the ground as he did so.

"I'm sorry, Professor," Mr. Slytherin started as the three of them were descending the stairs. "We must have missed the timer. Please don't punish Luna for my error."

Ever the self-sacrificing idiot. But maybe this was done in an effort to impress the young lady and could therefore be called a Slytherin tactic. Unwilling to get too deep into that line of thought, Severus moved to another problem he had with Mr. Slytherin being so far from the common room that late in the evening only with a younger girl as company, clearly not paying attention to his surroundings. "I thought that you had strict instructions from your father, Mr. Slytherin, to not move along the halls of Hogwarts on your own. Or have I missed some significant development that cancelled these orders?"

What Severus would have given to be able to see the boy's face in that moment. His shoulders stiffened as if he was preparing to say something, or to take a blow, but nothing was said and the posture corrected to be more elegant and projecting confidence. What had the boy wanted to say?
And why had he decided to keep his silence?

It only took a moment for the knut to fall. "I see. Nonetheless, I would prefer for you not to wander the halls close to curfew. Am I understood, Mr. Slytherin?"

"Yes, sir," was the only response the boy gave, still holding hands with the girl from Ravenclaw.

They handed over Miss Lovegood to a Ravenclaw prefect they encountered on the way to Ravenclaw tower, and then walked on in silence towards the Slytherin common room. After having lectured the boy on not going anywhere alone, Severus couldn't simply let the boy go down there on his own now.

"Make sure to meet with your girlfriend during the day, Mr. Slytherin. Do I need to explain sensible precautionary measures to you?" It always was better to ask after such things than simply assume that one of the students under his care already knew what they needed.

The blush that had vanished on their way down made a sudden reappearance. "That's… all right, sir. Father made sure I learned everything I needed to know about that over the summer. So, no need for any further explanations. Sir."

As Severus was pretty sure his Lord would indeed make sure his heir would know everything he needed to avoid being an embarrassment to the family, he let the boy go without making him sit through an explanation that would be awkward for them both.

If there was one thing – beside soiled nappies – that he wasn't looking forward to about being a father, it was the need to explain everything related to procreation to his child. Maybe Sonja would volunteer for that particular task.

It didn't take long after she had knocked for the door to open. "Cousin Nymphadora!" Sirius called out standing just inside the door. "Come in, come in! Remus is in the kitchen, if you're here to see him." Sirius waggled with his eyebrows and Dora rolled her eyes, drawing her wand.

"Don't call me Nymphadora, cousin! Or next time I come over I'll get you a nice chewing toy, cousin." Most of the time Dora liked Sirius, he was fun, but his insistence on calling her by the silly name her mother had given her to rile her up was getting on her nerves.

They both entered the house – so much cleaner than when it had been used as Order Headquarters – and Dora cast around for a topic to bring up that would capture Sirius’ interest. Better talk about something than let his mind wander and come up with pranks or something. "How is renovating at the summer house going? Do you think I could go there for a vacation sometime?"

"It's going well. Bill tells me that there aren't that many curses or cursed objects there. The most problems he had were with spells disintegrating and all kinds of pests. From rats to doxies to boggarts. He'll be finished soon. He said there's someone who helps from time to time, and I can get the elf to clean and renovate there." Sirius sounded happy about the progress he described. Dora could hardly imagine how it must be to prepare to meet your own children for the first time and they were already teenagers.

The way to the kitchen wasn't long, and before they could delve deeper into the renovation, they already had arrived. Remus sat at the table with a scroll before him, a well with red ink next to his hand, a steaming cup of what probably was tea near at hand. "Remus!" Dora felt butterflies in her stomach as the wizard turned around, pausing in whatever he was working on.
"Dora! What a surprise. Come sit down. Do you want to have a cup of tea?" Remus, ever the gentleman, stood from his chair, moving one facing his out so she could sit, and then went over to the stove.

"What are you working on, Remus? And why red ink?" Dora tilted her head in an attempt to read the scroll or at least get a glimpse of the writing. She morphed her hair into a shorter cut, spikes on her head, so it didn't fall into her eyes again.

"I'm marking a copy of Harry's latest history homework. As most know, Binns isn't exactly the best professor, so I've had the job as Harry's history tutor since the summer. I still mark his essays and answer any questions he has." He waved his hand, smiling a little self-consciously. "I get paid, but it still feels like helping Prong's little son like a friend should do."

"He'll have a much better chance at a good OWL result in history than many other students since Binns died!" Dora called out, grinning.

Remus laughed and walked back to the table carefully balancing a cup of tea in his hand. "I'm pretty sure Harry's friend, Miss Granger, will have no problem either. And probably quite a few others as well." Remus proclaimed, placing the cup in front of Dora on the worn table. "Do you want lemon? Sugar? Cream?"

"Sugar is fine." Dora said, accepting the small dish Remus handed her. "There aren't that many students in each year willing and able to self-study to such an extent." Taking a sip from her now-sweetened tea, Dora morphed her hair back into the style she had noticed drawing Remus' attention a few times. "Have you read the Prophet yet?"

Remus sighed, leaning back in his chair. "I have. You're referencing the article on this month's Wizengamot session?" He didn't look as hopeful as Dora had expected he would be.

"Yes!" Dora felt like shaking the wizard before her. Why wasn't he happier? "They have decided to move the responsibility for monitoring from the Department for Magical Creatures to the Department of Magical Law Enforcement! Isn't that a big step in the right direction?"

Remus gave another sigh. "Maybe. Dora, you have to see that this change is like a single stick trying to stop a flood. Even this doesn't change much. There is still a registry. We still will be treated as dangerous beasts. Still watched with suspicion. And do you think, just because the Department handling all the demeaning oversight no longer is named Creatures, that will change the fact that people still think it?" He leaned forward, placing his head in his hands.

And Dora felt out of her depth. She had thought this was a good development, and it surely was, but she hadn't realised how hollow this had to feel for someone faced with the prejudice day in, day out. She scooted her chair over so she was sitting next to Remus, carefully placing her arm around him. She certainly didn't have his insight but she wanted to learn. "It'll take time, you're right. Hopefully a lot of changes like this one will, in time, result in a bigger change."

Bill was on his way to get some lunch in a nearby pub when he spotted a now-familiar figure in the entrance hall, leaving one of the teller stations. Without a thought Bill quickened his steps and called out to the wizard he had gotten to know better over the last weeks. "Marvolo!"

The man in his well-made robes and cloak – wool with intricate embroidery of different abstract designs – turned and stopped to wait for Bill. "Bill, on your way to a lunch break?" Marvolo asked as he fell into step with him as he caught up.
"Yes," Bill agreed, looking the other over. He seemed tired. "What brought you to the bank today?"

"Setting up a trust fund for Marcus. And amending my will. I didn't find the time before today. And to do it now I had to shift quite a lot of tasks around." Shaking his head, Marvolo carded his hand through his painstakingly styled hair, destroying its careful order. "My respect for each witch and wizard caring for a child on their own has grown tremendously. Really. Marcus is in school most of the day, five days a week, and still my time seems to have shrunk almost by three parts." He laughed, and Bill once again noticed how much more human Marvolo had become since the first time they had met the last summer.

"I can't claim to really know. Even as the big brother to six siblings I never paid much attention to what mum did. But I know that she's struggling with serious empty-nest syndrome since Ginny went to Hogwarts. It's different having to care for such a young child, isn't it?" Bill asked, really curious. Fleur had started talking about plans for the future, marriage, children. It was all still pretty abstract for Bill. Until he had met Fleur, his career and the challenges of curse-breaking had been his main focus. Thinking about a future family of his own was... baffling.

They stepped through the doors out onto the stairs and slowly walked down to the street. People were hurrying up and down from one shop to the other. It wasn't exactly freezing cold any more, but still not pleasant enough to linger. At least it didn't rain today.

Bill turned towards the entrance of Knockturn Alley, where a small pub was located that was frequently visited by the human employees of Gringotts. The meals were simple, but tasty and affordable, and the pub was only a short walk away and still near enough to Diagon Alley that the clientele wasn't too dubious.

"Harry certainly was different. Older for one. Able to entertain himself," Marvolo answered at last, a scarf slung around his neck against the chill. "And he had learned with his previous guardians to not draw attention to himself. That he feared for his safety, not without cause, certainly added to his reluctance to interact with me." They were silent while they turned into Knockturn Alley and walked down the uneven cobblestone paving.

"The note you sent me was short and unexpected." Bill changed the topic when they entered the pub, and he looked around for an empty table, spotting one in a corner, near the back exit. He moved to sit there.

"I'm sorry that I cancelled the date so suddenly. But it really is hard to find enough time to prepare everything properly." They shed their outer layers and sat down at the table. "And I was thinking, rituals are performed on those specific dates for several reasons." Bill nodded, that was common knowledge even after all the time the Ministry and society had shunned rituals. "One is that the days help boost the power of those performing the rituals, making big workings easier for everyone. But I don't need a power-boost to perform this specific ritual. The boost might even have been part of the troubles I had." Marvolo shrugged and looked over to the blackboard listing the menu choices of the day. "How is the chicken broth?"

"I had it a few times. It's well-made but simple," Bill answered while his mind worked on all the reasons the quarter points of the year were considered good times to perform rituals. "And what of the stabilisation? I've seen the circle you've created. That's rather complex, it can't hurt to have a little help for the stability. I'm not really sure what might happen if the ritual was to go wrong." Marvolo only hummed.

"What can I bring you two lads today?" A witch in old-fashioned, threadbare, and revealing robes asked. She was of middle age – probably – and always here when Bill came in for lunch.
"The chicken broth and bread for me please," Marvolo answered, giving her a charming smile, looking totally out of place in the shabby pub in his fine robes. His everyday robes nonetheless.

"I'll take the curry," Bill decided. It usually wasn't as spicy as he preferred, but it was a big portion and he was hungry.

They talked about unimportant things until the food was brought, only too aware that even in Knockturn Alley there were people listening in and listening more closely when the word ritual was used. Once the food was there, a wave of the iconic pale wand under the worn table erected a one-way silencing ward around them.

"I want to test the theory if a less powerful day might be of benefit for this ritual." Marvolo started to explain his reasoning between two spoonfuls of soup. "This is good."

"You know that testing too many variables at the same time is prone to give mixed results?" Bill asked, breaking a piece of bread off from the chunk they had been given. "You've changed a lot in the ritual itself. Changing the point in time this significantly as well… that might change too much for you to be able to draw significant conclusions. If further changes come up, you may go in the wrong direction."

Marvolo nodded, taking a piece of bread himself. "It's not as if I had unlimited tries free, Bill. And the only negative repercussions of the ritual not working as it is designed will be the piece returning uncontrolled. I already endured that a few times now. I think I can do so again." The older wizard tried to dismiss the real impact of those occurrences, but Bill remembered. He remembered what Marvolo had told him he wanted to avoid with the redesign of the ritual, how he had feared the debilitating pain might cause him to mess up dangerously.

"Maybe the fact that there are still more pieces around," Bill didn't know how many exactly, but he knew that the one to be used in the next ritual wasn't the last, "is the reason you could withstand and survive the pain. What if that changes, the fewer there are?" Bill wasn't sure if he should mention it, but with two children dependent on Marvolo, it was more important for him to stay alive.

A sigh was, for a moment, the only answer. A few minutes later, their meals half eaten, Marvolo finally spoke again. "I have arranged for Harry and Marcus to spend a part of the spring holidays with Harry's godfather, Black. I hope to find the time needed for the ritual then. With both of them cared for, I can dedicate time to preparation and to recovering. I had hoped you'd still be willing to help with the ritual."

Bill nodded and swallowed quickly. "Of course I'm still willing to help. Harry is happier than ever, my siblings tell me. And Marcus needs his family." He didn't need to voice his interest in the mechanics of the ritual itself, or the concept of horcruxes – as repulsed as he was by the creation of them, he still was curious as to how and why they worked – Marvolo knew about Bill's academic interests anyway.

"I realise that. It's one of the reasons why I have decided to get more help than just a healer. Which day would suit you?"

They arranged a date and parted ways just outside the white marble building of Gringotts. Bill was deep in thought as he returned to his workplace, opting to fetch himself a mug of coffee before starting to lift curses from more heirlooms. Working on curses while distracted was a receipt for disaster.

Were his mother's fears founded on something else than prejudice? Bill couldn't deny his interest in curses, ancient and dangerous magic. Others had been consumed by the darkness, had lost themselves. While Bill was confident that his family and friends, and the fact that he didn't like to see others in pain, would keep him safe, there still lingered a trace of doubt.

Maybe talking with Fleur would help.

Chapter End Notes

There wasn't planned all that much in plot for this part of the story, but there still was enough to show that I didn't want to just jump over development and information in a few sentences. I hope this solution (showing snapshots of moments from the whole month) works well.

I'm still not sure how many more chapters I'll need to manage the whole way to the intended end of the story. But I'll guess we'll have to wait and see ;)

Thanks to you all for going on this journey together with me.

Thanks to Jordre and Jake for helping to improve my spelling!

Monday, 1st of April 1996

The moment Harry spotted the twins already sitting at the Gryffindor table as he walked in unusually early on this Monday morning. Dreams with Luna and himself in starring roles had woken him too early, but close enough to his normal time that he just had known getting back to sleep would result in his being tired and irritable all day.

Why were Fred and George already here?

On his way to the Slytherin table – still rather empty – Harry was spotted by one of the twins, who elbowed the other to get his attention. With big grins the twins saluted in Harry's direction, making him feel even more wary. Today was the first of April. There was no way that the twins hadn't planned something.

Sitting down at the table so he could keep an eye on the two, Harry took a good look at all the food already on the table. If the twins had managed to be here at the start of breakfast, they would have had enough time to contaminate all tables with whatever prank they had planned to execute.

He had to concede that it was a good idea to use this day for promotion of their products. But he really wasn't sure if he wanted to sample whatever product they had put in the food. Or into one of the many different drinks. Maybe into the pumpkin juice, the milk, one of the tea blends, or the coffee which usually stood near where the older students were likely to sit.

With a sigh Harry started to fill his plate, following the rumbling prompting of his stomach. He was too hungry to forego food in the hope of avoiding being pranked. Especially as the prank might be on the bench and triggered by a certain event, or time delay.

He rolled his eyes as he got a thumbs up from the twins. Really, why hadn't they told him beforehand? They should know by now that he wouldn't tell on them, and as their silent partner he felt they could have given him a heads-up.

Slowly the Great Hall filled with sleepy students, hyperactive first-years, and the members of the faculty. Harry ate his breakfast slowly, keeping an eye out for possible signs on all the others now starting their morning meal.

Sipping on his cold milk – he had learned to like it during the time he had been more or less forced to consume it regularly – Harry witnessed how Professor Sinistra suddenly reached with her arm across the whole table, exclaiming in surprise. In fact a lot of the people seeing this exclaimed in surprise, right along with Professor Flitwick, who vanished a wave of hot tea spilling from the teapot the Astronomy Professor had knocked over.

After that, more and more people developed a tendency for extra elastic arms and legs. A few of the more experimentally inclined Ravenclaws – incidentally those who tended to be down for breakfast early – started to walk through the hall, their legs lengthening and shrinking in a way that made their way from one end to the other a sight to see.

The changes only held a few minutes, and by the time Harry's arm shot out towards the ceiling as he stretched out his back, Professor Sinistra was watching, amused, as Professor Flitwick used his new-found flexibility to prance around the front of the hall, gleefully changing his height.

Harry was pretty sure that he saw the moment the effects kicked in for Professor Snape, because the man suddenly stopped all movement for several moments. Harry chuckled and nudged Theo, who was sitting next to him, eagerly awaiting the time the effect would kick in for him, to get his friend's attention. "Do you think we could stage a small incident that would draw the professor here? I would love to see him deal with flexible limbs."

Theo chuckled as well, flexing his arm almost absent-mindedly. "I'm pretty sure that would land us in detention. Not worth it. Especially as I'm sure he would manage to move even more menacingly than usual."

Harry nodded, carefully testing to see if his arms were back to normal. He wanted to take another drink from his goblet, but didn't dare risk spilling it all. "True enough. This is pretty funny." His arm reached for the goblet and instead shot out to Draco, who was talking with Pansy. On a whim Harry ruffled the other's hair, eliciting an indignant "Hey!" from the blond and laughter from the rest of the Slytherins sitting near enough to see.

Once the start of the first lesson for the day drew nearer, students started to leave the Great Hall. Harry and his friends were in an excellent mood, the others going on without their friend when the twins came up to their group from the lion's table.

"Fred, George, well done," Harry praised, a big grin on his face.

"I would bow if I had any idea what you're talking about, favourite Slytherin," the twin on the right said, grinning from one ear to the other.

Of course they wouldn't openly admit to what they had done. Harry shook his head in amusement. "Can we look forward to more of such situations?"

"Maybe, little Slytherin, maybe," the other twin answered, clapping his hand on Harry's shoulder as they moved him along into the entrance hall. "Where do you need to go?" Harry rolled his eyes at them, wondering how they had learned of his father's decree that Harry wasn't to go anywhere in the school on his own.

"The owlery. I want to send a drawing of the common room to Marcus. He made me promise. And Hedwig certainly will be happy to get something to do."

"Then we'll make sure that you reach your destination safely, little Slytherin."
Harry huffed but didn't protest. Even though there hadn't been anything resembling an attack, he just knew that it was only a matter of time. There would probably always be someone around who saw him as an easy way to get at Marvolo, to hurt him, or take revenge. That Mr. Diggory seemed to wait – for what Harry just didn't know – somehow reminded Harry of all the other years he had been here at Hogwarts. Whatever mystery they had tried to puzzle out each year, the culmination of it had taken place near the exam season.

Hopefully Mr. Diggory would find another way to deal with his grief than attacking a teenager, and the stressful situation Harry would have to face this year would only be his OWL exams.

One could do nothing but hope.

ooOoo

Filius was still chuckling to himself over the prank the Weasley twins had played on them all this morning. They certainly had a flare for the dramatic and an ingenious inventive spirit. As a teacher he was proud that they had taken what he had taught them and worked to make something all their own from it.

From what he had seen so far of all the products the boys had spread all through the school, they had applied lots of potions and charms knowledge to their inventions.

He stepped from his office over to the classroom, mentally going through the lesson he was to teach today in the first period of the day.

It didn't take long for the students to arrive before his classroom door, talking animatedly about their experience with the super elastic arms and legs they had had for a few minutes. Then the first students stepped through the door into the room and turned green. Their hair was green, their clothes were green, their skin was green. Not all the same shade, but certainly not natural.

Filius was out of his chair and halfway across the room before the girl who had stepped into the room first noticed what had happened. With a flick of his wand Filius cast a quick diagnostic at the girl and learned that she had been turned green by a simple colour changing charm. Nothing harmful.

His next spell was aimed at the door and highlighted a small line of what looked a lot like spell-o-tape sticking to both sides and the top of the door frame. Once again the ability of the twins to apply original concepts to long known spells was surprising.

"Come in, come in! And please ignore the change in colour you'll undergo. No reason to get worked up over a little April Fool's prank."

It took longer than usual to get the children to calm down enough so that he could start his lesson. Maybe he should try to remove the tape after this lesson was done. But he had to concede that the fact that each student turned a different colour, or at least a distinctly different shade – there was a raspberry red boy, a fire red girl, and another student in a more strawberry red, as well as a student turned moss green, one leave green, and several students in shades of blue – was impressive, and he would love to see when the colours would start repeating.

While he watched the students practising their charms – making sure none of them would cause some trouble out of boredom, teenage thoughtlessness, or lack of practice – Filius wondered if the other professors would have the same interesting day, with pranks laid out at their doors.

oooOOooo
The weather was nicer here than in London, which made Sirius hopeful that their stay wouldn't be confined to the insides of the house by rain or something. He feared that he or his guests might go crazy if they had no convenient way to avoid each other if necessary.

Remus certainly would call him overly pessimistic, but even though his correspondence with the twins had been regular and friendly, the letters he had exchanged with the girls' mother had been less so.

The woman had a serious issue with men. Or maybe just with Sirius, he wasn't really all that sure. But she certainly seemed to see a threat or challenge to her authority behind everything Sirius wrote. Even a question about what they might want to do while staying together at the Black Summer Cottage had somehow sparked a rant about his trying to con her into something. The fact that she insisted on writing in French, even though he knew perfectly well that she was able to write and speak English just as well as he did, was just another hint that she was less than happy with him.

But she still seemed to want her daughters to get to know their father as long as the twins wished for it.

A veritable conundrum.

"I think you should re-set the wards sometime soon," Bill said right next to Sirius, interrupting the older wizard's line of thought. "They're fine for now, but time and the lack of upkeep haven't been good for their integrity. That there's no real ward stone anywhere on the grounds only adds to the problem."

Sirius turned to the young curse breaker, who had rolled up his robe sleeves as a concession to the much warmer weather here in France, and nodded. Another thing for his list of things to do soon. "Sounds like a good idea. But not before the planned stay. It's only days away now." Bill nodded and Sirius looked over the garden, which looked a lot less like an overgrown jungle. "Any dangerous plants left out here? I think the children might want to fly a little during our stay." Sirius had already bought enough new brooms for everyone just for that purpose.

"I removed everything poisonous or aggressive. There's only harmless stuff left. As a result the little garden near the backdoor is bare now, as is most of the rest. But I'm sure you can put in some nicer plants easily enough." Bill explained, waving a hand in the general direction of where there had been some kind of potions-related bed. "Shall I show you the inside?"

Sirius nodded his assent and followed the red-headed wizard into the cottage, a silent Kreacher following in their wake.

The smell of fresh greens and sun was replaced by one slightly lemony mixed with beeswax. Much better than the dust and mould permeating the whole place before the cleaning had started. The spiderwebs and dust were gone too. A fresh coat of paint covered the wall where it wasn't decorated with carved wood panels.

"Looks so much better already!" Sirius exclaimed almost feeling like praising his elderly elf. The little thing had done a good job, but even after all the changes in the elf's behaviour, Sirius had a hard time accepting that all the malicious actions of the past had been ordered by Walburga – he really didn't think she had earned the title of mother – and not done out of the elf's own free will.

They toured all the rooms on all the floors, Bill showing where he had removed charms work that might be worth redoing again, like the cooling charm on a few of the cupboards in the kitchen, or the charm on the windows facing south that darkened the glass on especially hot and bright days.
And then they reached the bedrooms. "Kreacher, prepare that room over there," Sirius pointed out a room with a mostly blue colour scheme and two beds, "for my godson and his little brother." He turned so he could point out a room across the hall from the one he had just assigned. "That room will be for my daughters. Make sure to put enough towels into both bathrooms." There was a lovely painting of a scene from the Pyrenees on the wall over the desk in that room. "I'll take the master suite at the end of the hall." It was far enough from the rooms he had just selected for the children that the kids shouldn't feel too closely monitored, and on top of that held what passed for ward controls in this house.

"I'll contact someone to plant the garden to look a little nicer. Make sure to fill the pantry, Kreacher, and maybe prepare another room for a guest. I haven't heard back from Olivienne, but it's possible that she will want to be here as well. Once you're finished with that, please take care of upkeep and so on." Sirius waved his hand in the air. He really had no idea what was needed to keep a house clean and in working order. There always had been someone caring for that stuff around him. Or it hadn't been taken care of at all.

When the elf had popped out – presumably to clean something – Sirius turned to Bill. "You did a great job! Let's go down to the dining room and sort out the payment for all your work."

They walked down the stairs – with a new carpet put down on them – and into the dining room, where Sirius got out a small inkwell and a quill and took the payment slip attached to an invoice copy from Bill. He felt his hands shaking.

Not because it was a high sum that had built up over the cleaning effort – he had expected that, and the price was more than fair – but because this meant that it wasn't long until he would meet with his daughters for the first time.

He knew they still had to conduct a more conclusive test than looking at an ancient, just recently repaired, family tapestry, to make sure the two girls really were his daughters, and he feared the result.

Which was silly.

But still true.

Not even taking into account that this might all go to hell in a handbasket anyway because the girls didn't like him, or their mother suddenly decided to not allow them contact.

There was so much that could go wrong!

"Sirius? You all right?" Bill asked concerned, stuffing the signed invoice into one of his pockets. "You look like you just walked through a ghost."

Sirius took a deep breath and forced a smile on his face. "I will be. This is all pretty nerve-wracking, to be honest. But I'll be fine." And maybe if he repeated that enough times, he would start believing it.

Bill took the step separating them and clapped his hand – a surprisingly large one – on Sirius' shoulder in a show of support. "I imagine it would be. If I can help in any way…" Bill let his offer trail off, shrugging and obviously not sure what he could do to help, but willing to try if Sirius knew of something.

"Thanks to you I have a place to meet the girls that isn't Grimmauld Place. You already helped a lot." Sirius returned the gesture of a hand placed on the shoulder getting to feel the well developed musculature under those robes. The curse-breaker certainly was not bad-looking.

Before Sirius managed to ask the question lingering on the tip of his tongue – it had been a while since Sirius had been in one of the London clubs – Bill laughed and shook his head. "I'm claimed, and happy to be."

Now it was Sirius' turn to grin. That really wasn't much of a surprise. But there was nothing to gain if one didn't take a risk now and then. "She's a lucky woman. Thanks again for your help, and now go!" He gave Bill a little shove and already started to plan what else he could do while he was here before he had to return to London.

"If you have more dangerous places to clean, let me know!" Bill cried on his way out of the house, eliciting another round of laughter from Sirius.

The biggest part of the preparations were done, now on to the myriad of small tasks still to be done before he could welcome his guests here.

oooOOooo

Amos stood in the door to his office, watching with impotent rage as boxes of files and furniture were levitated out of the room that until now had housed the Werewolf Registration Office.

After the idiotic decision by the Wizengamot, now was the day that the office was moved. Fitting that this was the day of April's fools. Moving the office over to the Department of Magical Law Enforcement, was there a more useless way to organise the monitoring of dangerous wizard killers?

Through the bustle of Aurors levitating the inventory of the office, Amos could see Lord Slytherin standing next to Madame Bones, talking. It seemed the dark wizard had managed to corrupt the witch Amos had thought of as fair and staunchly light before now. But somehow she now was on friendly terms with the Evil who had caused his beloved son's death. She even had accepted the position as godmother to the poor child that had been adopted by he-who-must-not-be-named. But considering that the boy spoke to snakes as well, all the help he had tried to provide had been in vain anyway.

Curious as to what the evil wizard and Madame Bones were talking about, Amos tried to find a way to listen in. He was pretty sure casting a charm that would help him hear over the distance between them would gain their attention, as would moving to stand closer to them if he had no good reason to do so. And even if he spotted someone he could talk to near them, they probably would change their topic if they spotted him.

Should he try to disillusion himself?

Before Amos could come to a decision on how to proceed, the Minister and several Aurors stepped into the main area of the department, looking around as if in search for something or someone.

Amos watched from his office as the Minister – spineless coward that he was – jovially greeted the evil bastard of a dark Wizard and Bones. How he longed to get his wand out and cast a few choice curses at the lot of them. But as he was seriously outnumbered, and sadly not ruthless enough to match the willingness to use dark magic that Slytherin possessed, he knew better than to risk it.

"Look at this." A parchment was pushed into Amos' hand and he briefly flicked his gaze over to Neil, who was scowling in a way that probably could curdle milk if he wanted to.

One look at the official-looking letter in its standard Ministry script – obviously written by one of the many enchanted quills used for form letters – and Amos had a bad feeling. A few moments later he had finished the appallingly short missive and found his bad feeling confirmed. In polite but cold words the letter said that with the shift in administration of the Werewolf Registry, his position had been cut and he was basically fired. Of course he was offered another position, paying less and not at all related to his previous position, but he only had the rest of the week to decide, and would only receive pay until the end of the month if he declined.

"That's a disgrace!" Amos exclaimed, keeping his voice low enough that the hustle and bustle of the move covered his shout. "Do you know who'll take over your position now?"

Neil shook his head. "No. Haven't talked with any of the Aurors yet. But I guess one of the older Aurors no longer able to do work in the field? Or maybe a trainee?" Neil obviously was bitter, and probably worried where he should find work with enough pay to keep up the lifestyle he and his wife had become accustomed to.

"I'll see what I can do," Amos promised, folding the letter back up so Neil could store it in his robe pocket. He had no idea how he would do so, or where to start, but he couldn't leave one of his closest allies out in the cold in a situation as dire as this.

Amos looked up and around, searching in his mind for a good place to start looking for a better position for Neil. While he surveyed the room, he suddenly made eye contact with Slytherin across the room. There was a deep calm on that face, and a smirk so faint that Amos wasn't sure he hadn't imagined it. But he suddenly was very sure that this firing had been the man's doing. How the evil wizard had known to target Neil in the first place, Amos didn't know, nor had he any evidence. But he would have bet all his galleons that this was somehow Slytherin's doing.

"We're looking for Albert Thomas!" one of the Aurors who had come in together with the Minister called out, getting everyone's attention, which led to everyone's stopping what they had been doing, looking around in search of Albert. The dread in the pit of Amos' stomach was getting stronger.

"How may I help you?" Albert asked, stepping out from behind one of the tall filing cabinets, a folder of parchment scraps under one arm.

Suddenly several wands were trained on Albert, and Amos felt himself tense. What was that about?

"You're under investigation for accepting bribes. You'll come with us quietly and are suspended from your duties for the time being, Mr. Thomas," the Auror who had spoken first stated with authority.

All around the room chatter and murmurs rose, and Amos just knew that they had started to gossip and this would make the rounds of the Ministry by evening, if not earlier. Another plot to undermine his base, Amos was sure of it.

He had to concede that Slytherin knew what he was doing here. Amos was pretty sure he wouldn't find any traces back to Slytherin. And he hadn't even caused anything that would be considered illegal. After all, Albert had taken money, goods, and favours in exchange for speeding up the process of gaining a license, or even for avoiding the regulation checks that theoretically were needed before one was allowed to start a crup breeding program.

And so Amos watched with growing anger and desperation as Albert set down the folder of documents on the filing cabinet, and handed over his wand to the Aurors, then followed behind them out of the department. Just a moment later Amos saw one of the biggest gossips of the Department slip out through the door, probably to be one of the first to inform others of what had happened here today.
"I'll have to inform my wife of this," Neil murmured next to Amos, not really paying attention to anything outside his own misery, barely waiting for an acknowledgement by Amos before he walked away.

Watching in impotent rage as a laughing Minister walked out after the last levitated boxes, speaking with Madame Bones and Slytherin, Amos started serious plotting. He needed to find a way to get rid of the evil wizard. But he needed to be careful. Dolores hadn't been able to keep herself safe, and now was as good as dead, her empty shell just withering away after she had received the Dementor's Kiss. Even the great Albus Dumbledore somehow had fallen from his position of power, through an evil scheme Amos hadn't been able to uncover yet.

No, he had to be extra careful. It was only too possible that he already had managed to get himself onto the list of people Slytherin was determined to get rid of. Even if he couldn't quite fathom how that might have happened.

Even though his political goals had been countered, both in the adoption procedures and the werewolf laws, Amos was sure he had covered his tracks adequately.

Retreating back into his office, to pretend to fill out some paperwork, Amos searched for a way to sway the public opinion against Slytherin and his foolish law changes.

Severus sat down in his favourite chair in the staff room, once again wishing he could instead be down in their quarters working on the test protocols for their ancestry potion, and preparations for two more couples who wished to have a biological child together with help of the two-fathers potion.

But the Weasley twins had managed to cause a staff meeting once again with their penchant for pranks. While he waited for all the others to arrive, Severus thought back to all the other instances of excessive pranking the horror twins had brought over the school. If there was one redeeming quality to the twins' pranks it was – beside the effort and knowledge that had gone into creating the newest ones – that they targeted everyone the same and usually had pranks that were funny in a non-humiliating way. They had retaliated in the past, and poked too much fun of Mr. Filch in general, but they were worlds better than other so-called pranksters Severus could name.

Minerva finally arrived as the last member of staff, looking harried and out of breath. "Please excuse my tardiness. I ran into Peeves putting bubblegum into door locks." She sighed, made her way over to the chair previously used by Albus, and sat down.

"I gather from the lack of actual complaints from any of you, that the different... let's call them surprises, weren't that disruptive?" She looked around the room and all of them sitting there, clearly tired after a long day of teaching, a question clear on her face.

Most just gave a shake of their head, or a murmur of some indifferent agreement that it hadn't been as bad as it could have been, which didn't seem to satisfy Minerva, who turned a little so she could speak Severus with a mild glare. "You were suspiciously calm during breakfast. And I expected to hear a complaint from you, see Gryffindor with a heavy points loss, or the Messers Weasley in detention. Why did nothing of that sort happen, Severus?"

Severus snorted. "We were informed this morning, via elf, that there would be a potion and spell-based prank during breakfast and that it had been ensured that Sonja would remain unaffected." A murmur went through his colleagues. It seemed that they still thought him a humourless man, they really weren't paying enough attention. "And the prank placed on my classroom involved everyone only being able to speak in a whisper, or in rhymes, which did nothing to disrupt my class. There was no need to report the prank as it wasn't disruptive. In fact I feel I might ask for that prank to apply it permanently to my classroom door."

And he wasn't really joking. It had been a rather pleasant day with all the students either speaking too low to be heard or speaking in rhymes.

One after the other the professors talked about what their doors had done to students on their entering each of the classrooms, just to reverse the effects on their way out of the classroom. Filius in particular was gushing over the charms work he had seen this day.

In the end Minerva closed the discussion with a faint frown on her face. "It seems as if no one was harmed by any of the pranks today. There were safety measures in place, the pranks were not really disruptive to any of the lessons, and not one of them was permanent." She took her glasses from her nose, carefully rubbing with one hand over her closed eyes. "I'm not sure if and when, or what we should do to punish the perpetrators."

Severus cleared his throat, everyone turned around to look at him. "I'm not sure if everyone is aware of this, but I have no conclusive evidence on who exactly is the perpetrator behind the pranks we have seen today. Or did I miss something?"

Stunned silence fell over the room, and then Filius laughed out loud, slapping his hand on the table in an expression of glee and approval. "Severus has a point. I'm pretty sure I know who did it, but I have no proof. And not one of you has provided anything that I would deem enough to put a punishment on a student. Do you disagree?"

For a moment there was silence again and than some of the newer – temporary – members of staff tried to find arguments to punish the Weasley twins. But in the end, based on a severe lack of evidence, no one was punished for the day of pranks Hogwarts had gone through today.

Dora sat at her desk in the big office space of the Auror Department, just finishing off a report on a break-in into a tea shop on Diagon Alley the previous day, when one of the younger aides led a wizard of middle age and in expensive robes of a modern cut to her desk. "Auror Tonks, Mr. Cuffe here wants to report an incident." The young aide pointed at the wizard at his side before nodding to both of them, then leave again.

"Please take a seat, Mr. Cuffe," Dora said, giving the man a formal nod while moving her current work to the side. "How may I help the Chief Editor of the Daily Prophet today?" More often than not, a case involving the Daily Prophet had its roots in someone coming in to complain about something the newspaper had written. Had someone taken out their frustration with the most widespread publication in their society by vandalising the building?

"Thank you, Auror Tonks." The wizard accepted her offer of a seat and made himself comfortable in the chair next to her desk. "I'm not sure if I'm here to report on a curious anomaly or file a report on attempted murder, if I'm being honest."

That proclamation had Dora sitting forward in her chair, getting a new blank form for a report and her quill to take notes. "What a curious statement. What happened that you're not sure what it was?"
Mr. Cuffe got a piece of parchment out of his pocket, and smoothed it out before answering Dora's question. "It's pretty normal for howlers to arrive in our post room. That's why it's specifically warded to prevent fires from starting, other mail from being destroyed by them, or other nasty things from happening." He waved the hand not holding the parchment lazily from side to side. "But today hundreds of howlers arrived at the same time!" Dora felt one brow creep up towards her curly pink hair in surprise. There hadn't been anything that controversial in the newspaper today. "Here's a write-up of the statistics for the whole last week." He offered her the slightly wrinkled parchment, which Dora accepted to look at and add to the report.

"You keep statistics of the number of howlers?" It seemed rather pointless.

As if embarrassed Mr. Cuffe chuckled. "There is a betting pool going almost constantly in the office. You know, which day will be the one with the most or least howlers, that kind of thing. We even have recording spells linked to enchanted quills set up, so that we can read what was send without all the noise."

It was interesting to see how widespread the betting on seemingly silly stuff was. But that really was only a side note. "So you can tell me what had someone, or more than one person, sending you that many howlers?"

But before Dora had finished her question Mr. Cuffe already was shaking his head in denial. "Sadly no, Auror Tonks. The recordings are illegible. Partially because the parchment was rendered to mere particles by the force of the quills. The charms clearly weren't set up to take that much input at one time." He sighed. "So far that's a curious incident, especially as we had to put the results of a bakery competition on the front page this morning." He spread his hands out as if to indicate that he couldn't see who would take exception to something as harmless as that. "But if someone had been there in that room when all those howlers went off, they might have been seriously harmed. And if we didn't have such a room in the first place, they would have been delivered to me. And no one dared speculate what that number of howlers would have done outside of a warded room."

Dora nodded. It seemed reasonable to assume that the Prophet kept track of the addressees of mail coming into the building. "So you say this might have been a plot to murder you through the excessive use of explosive letters?"

Mr. Cuffe nodded. "I'm not sure what to think, but that particular thought did cross my mind."

Dora started to take all the information down that the form required – name of the one reporting the incident, what happened, where, when, etc. – while thinking through the possible motives to send so many howlers. Besides objecting to something that had been reported, and how it had been reported, there also was the possibility that someone thought the Prophet should have reported something that they had ignored. Sadly, that opened up a plethora of possibilities, including happenings that could be imaginary, or of such insignificance that Dora had no way of knowing of them.

"Please keep an eye out for more howler avalanches. Maybe a warding expert, or Charms Master can help you adjust the charms work, so we can get a bit more information on the content of the howler if this should happen again?" Dora advised the Chief Editor after they had finished the paperwork.

He nodded in agreement. "We've already contacted some of the experts we had set up the wards and charms in the first place."

In fact Dora wasn't surprised by that, so she only nodded before continuing. "In the meantime I'll investigate what's needed to record and deliver that many howlers. At the moment, I'm unsure if one person can even create that many howlers without leaving a trace." Dora herself never had sent any howlers, and hadn't really received any up till now. She thought there was some specific parchment needed, as well as a charm, if she wasn't mistaken. But she would have to look it up. Maybe she could get a lead on the perpetrator by checking who had bought lots of the needed supplies in the last few days. Could one make the special parchment at home?

She went to inform the Head of the Aurors about the new case and that she would take it up, all the while thinking about ways to locate, hopefully, the one sending too many howlers.

Friday, 5th of April 1996

The compartment they had settled down in was filled completely. All of the places were occupied. Harry felt kind of bubbly and excited where he sat next to the window, Luna leaning close to him, her head resting on his shoulder, book held in her hand.

Daphne and Pansy sat next to the sliding door, a game of chess going on. It was their third one, chess pieces smashing each other to bits quite regularly. Harry had a feeling the two girls were playing with the intention to capture as many pieces as they could, even if there was a better path to actually win the game.

Crab and Goyle were both deeply entrenched in quidditch magazines, not paying any of them any mind, which left Theo and Harry to listen to Draco who was talking almost without pause by now.

"It's almost surreal that I might be an older brother by the time we return for the rest of the school year after the holidays!" It was not the first time that Draco had said something along those lines since he had returned from patrolling the train. And it probably wouldn't be the last time. Theo rolled his eyes, and Harry had trouble keeping the laughter from bubbling out of himself. That he looked forward to a holiday with his own little brother visiting his godfather in France didn't exactly help matters.

"I have to say, though, that I'm not really happy that my parents haven't told me before now that mother had to stay on bedrest for these last weeks. Weeks! Can you imagine that? I think I would get restless after just one day on bedrest."

Once again Theo rolled his eyes. "Do you know if you'll get a brother or a sister?" In an attempt to get Draco to talk about things less dangerous – neither Harry nor Theo really wanted to know the medical reasons behind the need for bedrest – and potentially more interesting.

Draco shook his head, not a hair on it moving out of place. "If my parents know, they haven't told me. But seeing as I'm that much older it doesn't really make a difference. I'll be grown and of age long before my little sibling starts at Hogwarts or gets interested in Quidditch or… gobstones, or whatever."

"Marcus told me yesterday that he wants to learn to swim. I had a hard time trying to explain that the water might not be warm enough this time of year. Even in France. I don't think I managed to convince him. He kept bringing up warming charms." Harry grinned. Maybe they actually would get to swim in a lake or something if Sirius was willing to cast warming charms on them.

"Father wrote me that he bought a broom for Aiden. It might seem silly, but I really look forward to showing him how to fly." Theo smiled a little wider than he usually would. "Maybe we can arrange to meet, I mean all of us, little brothers included, to go flying?"
"We could do that." Draco said nodding and then a gleam entered his pale eyes, setting Harry a little on edge. "And Theo, any plans to meet up with that little red-head of yours?"

Theo gave Draco an unimpressed glare to that pretty transparent jab at the slowly developing relationship between him and Ginny. "If you had paid at least a bit of attention to what was going on the last few days, you would know that Ginny and all her brothers have opted to stay at the castle during the holidays. As has Hermione. Revising. I'm sure most of us would have done something similar if not for family obligations."

Harry nodded. "I certainly would have thought about staying at Hogwarts." He didn't want to contemplate that it wouldn't really have been a topic of contemplation before Marvolo had adopted him this past summer. "But with Sirius meeting his daughters, and Marcus now living with us, there wasn't a chance I would stay behind willingly."

"I hope to get enough revision in with the many events mother and father have planned for me to attend," Daphne said from where she watched with glee one of her knights pulverising one of Pansy's bishops on the hovering board between them.

"I'm sure you'll manage." Harry said, trying to sound reassuring. All of the older Slytherins knew that Daphne's parents were insisting that she find a suitable match soon, not that Harry felt it was necessarily a good idea to force her to pick someone this early. And narrowed down to old magical families. Maybe they should consider the possibility of Daphne falling in love with and marrying a muggle-born wizard. It would certainly make it easier to find someone not in line to inherit some old magical estate.

"We'll see," Daphne answered pretty distracted, now watching in dismay one of Pansy's pieces cleaving one of hers in half.

The rest of the ride Draco, Theo, and Harry filled with plans and ideas for things they might do together during the holidays. It worked rather well in keeping Draco away from speculating over the fact his mother was currently bound to stay in bed, and that he would be a big brother soon. It was getting dark by the time they reached London.

Marvolo stood on the platform waiting for the Hogwarts Express, carefully controlling his face. He had to work harder than he was used to to not grin like a loon, because next to him stood Marcus and he was hyped up and almost vibrating with excitement at the prospect of seeing Harry again.

"Stay near, Marcus," Marvolo reminded his son again, because he really didn't want to have to search for him among all the other children and parents waiting to pick up their children from the train. There were people everywhere and they all – or at least most of them – were tall enough that a child which just had started school easily could vanish between them all.

Marcus made a sound in reply that could be interpreted as one of agreement, if Marvolo was generous in his interpretation. But as his son was staying close just as Marvolo had asked him to, he didn't press for a more clear answer.

And then there was a whistle, the train arrived, slowing down, and Marvolo had to snatch out his arm, to keep Marcus from running towards the train by catching the little boy by his shoulder. "Stay, Marcus. We don't know where Harry is sitting on the train, and he'll have an easier time finding us if we stay where we said we would stand."

Marcus didn't protest or struggle, he just started to jump up and down in place, clearly unable to find a place or purpose for all the energy coursing through him. Somehow it was adorable rather than irritating.

The train stopped, the doors opened and students poured out onto the platform. Marcus jumped even faster and higher, chanting something like "Can you see Harry? Where is Harry? Harry is almost here!" the whole time.

And then there was a group of teenagers striding towards them, trunks being dragged behind them – it looked like someone had spelled them with a featherlight charm – smiling and laughing. Marvolo wasn't able to keep Marcus from running towards Harry, impacting with his older brother, enveloping him in a hug. Another short boy was running towards the group, clearly aiming for Benjamin Nott's boy. Together the small children effectively stopped the group of Slytherin students, forcing the others to move around the group. Marvolo felt himself smiling and looked around while Marcus and Harry greeted each other.

There was Lucius talking with his son, already almost on their way home, Benjamin waiting for his two sons just like Marvolo was, smiling slightly with a sad undertone. Lot's of other parents and guardians greeting their children, and students talking to their friends as if it would be ages before they would speak again.

Marvolo himself never had gone back on the train for any holidays but the summers, and the yule holiday was the first time he had seen the platform other than at the beginning or end of summer.

"Hallo, father." Harry's grin and happy attitude startled Marvolo out of his reminiscence, which was very welcome.

"Hallo, Harry." He smiled and cautiously accepted the hug Harry only hesitantly offered. With Marcus around all the time, Marvolo had become accustomed to getting hugs at all times of the day. But even though he and Harry spoke every night, they only had shared hugs on a few occasions. "Let's get home. Flimm was planning a veritable feast to celebrate your return this morning. And Marcus has been wanting to test his broom with you ever since he spotted it."

Harry nodded happily and took a step back. "I'll just quickly say goodbye to Luna, and be right back." And he was gone the few steps over to where Luna Lovegood stood with her father the editor of the Quibbler.

It really was quite the change they all had undergone since the last summer. A few minutes later – much quicker than Marvolo had thought – Harry was back beside them, and Marvolo extracted the Portkey they were to take to get home. It was so much easier to take a portkey than to apparate with two passengers and a trunk.

They vanished in a swirl of colours towards their home, Griffin House.

Chapter End Notes

Seems as if the technical issues are resolved for the moment. But work has been crazy since the start of the year. Writing is a nice way to relax after a long day at work. Thank you all for making it that bit more enjoyable!

Chapter Notes

Library Ghost 01 claimed that my story had reached almost the same length as the Bible... I just had to check that! SO... going by the word count on AO3 (that doesn’t include ANs like this one) with chapter 90 the story reached 722 567 words. o.O There are a lot of different versions and translations of the Bible around, but what is called the “King James Bible” has 783 137 words. That’s pretty close.
Out of curiosity I researched one of the books I have read many times in German and in English that is one of the longest single books I know well. The Lord of the Rings (as a one book edition) which has 481 103 words... I have to admit that I’m quite shocked!
Thank you all for staying with me on this long, long journey!

And as I don’t know how much time I’ll have during the day: here have an early chapter!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Saturday, 6th of April 1996

Harry felt like he was floating on a soft, warm cloud. His pillow had the best shape to cradle his head while he was on his stomach in his bed, not really asleep anymore, but not really awake yet, either.

That was how a cat in front of the fire had to be feeling. Totally content in the knowledge that there was no reason to get up and disturb this peaceful state. Harry snuggled into his covers and pillow a little more, relishing the warmth under his blankets. Even with his own room at Hogwarts, Harry didn’t get many opportunities to just enjoy the calm of mind and the relaxed feeling in his body. And back when he had lived at Privet Drive, there never had been an opportunity to sleep in. Even the Burrow with its many inhabitants had made such an occurrence – sleeping in – impossible.

Slowly the delicious scent of warm pancakes filtered into Harry’s half-sleeping brain, as well as an odd mix of muted sounds steadily getting louder.

The next moment the door was opened, and the odd sounds were easily identified as the steps of a small child and a large and heavy snake slithering over sturdy woollen rugs. Harry really didn’t want to wake up, but he wasn’t able to simply ignore the hissing going on in the room. Coming ever nearer.

:.Dad says we’ll have to wait until Harry wakes up before we can go play:. Marcus hissed, carefully tiptoeing over to Harry’s bed. ..:So if I wake him, we can play earlier!:. There was a smug undertone to the hissing as Marcus laid his plan out.

:.I’m sure that wasn’t what Master wanted to say, bubbly hatchling:. another, more female, voice answered.
.::Then why didn’t he say so?:. There was a pout in that question, and suddenly a not insubstantial weight was added to Harry’s legs.

The teenager grumbled unhappily, now a little more awake, turning away from the light streaming in through the door, burrowing his head in his pillow. Maybe he could get that blissfully calm state of being half-asleep back.

.::You just choose to ignore what you did understand, bubbly hatchling:::. That statement was followed by a hissy laugh, and movement from Harry’s legs upwards towards his head.

Some pointy bit of Marcus’ body – an elbow, or knee most likely – managed to hit Harry’s ribs, managing to drag Harry just a bit closer to a state of being awake.

He didn’t want to wake up yet. Harry grumbled again, trying to turn under his blankets, dislodging the smaller person from his perch half on Harry’s side, causing a giggle.

A small, much-too-cold hand caressed Harry’s cheek and then moved to carefully pry open one of Harry’s eyes.

One green eye quickly morphed from sleepily looking up to the much-too-close grinning face, into one glaring at the grinning face. “I want to sleep!” .::It’s too early to get up:::. Harry hadn’t really decided to start out in English, but he really wasn’t completely awake yet.

.::No it’s not!:. Marcus insisted, poking Harry when the teenager closed the one eye again. .::I’ve been up for ages already!::.

.::It’s early still:::. Nagini contradicted Marcus’ claim .::Let the little hatchling rest, bubbly hatchling. He’s soon shedding a skin, he needs his rest::.

Nagini might have had good intentions, but the discussion starting now over what it meant to shed a skin, and why one would need more rest before something like that, only worked to wake Harry further.

Pretty soon he was awake enough to notice the rumbling of his empty stomach and follow the discussion between Nagini and Marcus more easily. It seemed as if Marcus hadn’t been up all that long. Were all children that… bubbly? It certainly was an interesting choice in nickname Nagini had made there.

.::Get off me, Marcus. If I’m to get up and go to have breakfast, I need to get out of bed first:::.

Marcus squealed and Harry flinched when another elbow – or foot? – made contact with his back, as Marcus made haste to leave Harry’s bed.

“I want to play gobstones with you! And exploding snap! And after that we can build a castle! Maybe you can help me build Hogwarts? I’m not sure we’ve enough blocks to build Hogsmeade too, but we could ask Dad to make us more! Have you seen him wave his wand and blocks falling down out of nowhere? It’s sooooo impressive.” Marcus was talking a mile a minute, barely stopping to breathe.

Harry crawled out of bed and only listened with half an ear to his little brother prattling on and on and on. He really would have loved to sleep a bit longer, but somehow he had a feeling that behaviour like this was not that unusual. What had life been like for Bill and Charlie with as many younger siblings as they had? He certainly felt like he might understand Ron’s resentment towards his little sister back in their first two years at Hogwarts better after the holidays were over.
While there was nothing malicious in Marcus and his behaviour, it certainly had the potential to get very annoying very soon. If it hadn’t already crossed the line.

Harry gathered the clothes he wanted to wear today, getting a new pair of socks from his drawer, while Marcus described the small garden they had planned with the other children in his class, and moved out of his room in the direction of the bathroom. When Marcus tried to follow Harry into the bathroom the older boy put his foot down. “You’ll not follow me into the bathroom. Go tell Flimm that I’ll be down for breakfast soon. Or clean up the playroom so we can attempt to build a castle. I’ll take my shower on my own.”

He closed the door and leaned against it taking deep breaths – in the pattern learned under Professor Snape’s instruction for meditation – to calm down. While he listened for the sound of Marcus moving away from the door, Harry contemplated the possibility that these holidays wouldn’t be as relaxing as he had hoped they would be.

Shaking himself to get rid of the gloomy thoughts, Harry started with his morning routine. Once he stood under the warm spray of the shower, he tried to see the situation from different angles, one of the methods Madame Goyle had taught to him, that supposedly made seeing a situation clearly easier.

This all was new for Marcus too, and he was a small child still. Of course he would be excited. Better he was excited in a happy way, demanding Harry’s attention and interaction, than being nervous and hiding away from them all. Once they were with Sirius in his godfather’s house in France there would be a lot of other new things for Marcus to explore and be excited about.

Hopefully.

While working in the hair potion – not much of an improvement for his stubborn hair, but it didn’t sting in the eyes and smelled nice – Harry mused that if he had stayed at Hogwarts he would have been forced to study by Hermione, and would have had to watch the slowly rising panic in all the other students who were preparing for their big exams this year. Experiencing being a big brother was something new, slightly scary, but certainly more fun than even more study sessions.

And wasn’t relaxing, doing something different than usual, one reason to have holidays in the first place?

Still not quite rid of his grumpy mood, Harry went down for breakfast, where Marcus was asking questions about all the different foods from Flimm. “And the marmalade is made how?”

With a smile Harry sat down – murmuring a short greeting to Marvolo – exchanging a small grin with the red-eyed wizard who currently was reading the newspaper and drinking another cup of tea, at his usual place at the table.

Flimm’s enthusiasm in explaining how he worked to create all that they regularly got offered for their various meals, shed a new light on the whole situation. Maybe reminding himself that they all were still learning how to do this whole family thing would help with any annoyed thoughts that certainly would come up now and then during these holidays.

“Please pass the butter?” Harry asked of Marvolo, catching the butter dish once it had been levitated to where he was sitting. “Did you have any plans for us today?”

“No,” Marvolo answered. “I thought we would enjoy a nice day at home before you two need to prepare for your short visit to France.”
Spreading the butter onto a crispy and hot piece of toast – magic was great for keeping them at the ideal just-moments-ago toasted state – Harry nodded slowly. “So there'll be ample time to build Hogwarts and the village out of wooden blocks.” Marcus didn’t notice the topic as he was grilling Flimm on the process of making chips and why they weren’t served more often, replacing the boring potatoes which he didn’t like very much. “Can you show me how to change the colours and shapes of the blocks?” Before the questioning glance Marvolo gave him could make it to actual words Harry hastened to add an explanation. “Marcus wants us to build a model of Hogwarts, but if I remember correctly, the blocks aren’t shaped or coloured in a way that would make it believable. You know?”

Marvolo smirked. “It’s a pretty easy transfiguration. You just need to know what the shape should be like and hold a clear picture of your desired result firmly in your mind. I think you already should know the colour-changing charm? And what about the rule of no magic during holidays?”

Harry scoffed. “You were the one to tell me that the wards around the house and the fact that you’re here as well, disturbs the trace enough that it will not be picked up if I cast anything. So, will you show me?”

Marvolo chuckled, but nodded. “After you have finished breakfast.”

With Marcus happily engaged in his discussion with Flimm, Marvolo reading, and Nagini napping by the fire, Harry had time for a leisurely and delicious breakfast, adding waffles, pancakes, an apple and an orange, as well as a few cups of tea to the toast he had started out with.

Marcus was squealing in delight, running up the stairs, once breakfast had been declared over and the construction of Hogwarts declared the activity of the day.

oooOOooo

“Do you need a hand up?” Severus asked with a smile in his voice, which he still wasn’t really accustomed to, but resigned to hear.

Sonja’s glare was more playful than intimidating. “I’m still capable of moving on my own, love,” she admonished him, carefully gripping the handhold next to the door. A few steps took her up the steps to the door in the side of the train they were about to take. Severus was left to handle their luggage, which was harder without the ability to levitate them, but not as hard as it would have been had he not charmed them before they had left the castle.

Walking behind his wife, Severus enjoyed the view, as Sonja already had shed her warm cloak, carrying it over one arm, and he had a good view of her behind. They both were dressed in the latest Muggle fashion. Really nice maternity wear for Sonja – trousers and a blouse with a soft knit pullover on top – and a suit of the finest wool for Severus.

Once they had decided to travel the muggle way, this change in clothes had become necessary. But as far along as Sonja was by now, portkeys really weren’t an ideal mode of travel and their destination was too far away from Hogwarts for apparation.

“Here’s our compartment.” Sonja said a moment later. She opened the sliding door and walked in.

Severus followed her just a moment later, nodding in greeting to the older lady already sitting near the window. He effortlessly hoisted their luggage into the rack above the seats, before carefully sitting down next to his wife.

The whole time he felt the judging eyes of the older lady on them. He had learned to feel those gazes early on when he had run around in old, faded clothes, unwashed and underfed, seen as a troublemaker by everyone casting those judging glances.

The watery blue eyes took in Sonja’s obvious state of pregnancy, their expensive clothes, the wedding bands, and Severus’ long hair, which today was carefully braided to be out of his face. He was sure she wasn’t happy with his long hair, but chalked it up to the eccentricities rich people often had.

“On your way to Paris?” she finally asked them before either Severus or Sonja could get out their books and start reading, as they had planned earlier that day.

“No,” Sonja answered with a smile, “We’re travelling to Brussels. And you?” Severus successfully repressed a sigh, he really had no intention of holding a longer conversation with a muggle he didn’t know. He would have preferred to talk with Sonja, discussing their plans for the meeting in Brussels, or how to improve their testing plans. But it seemed his lovely wife had other plans.

“I’m visiting with my son and his wife. They recently became parents for the third time.” The conversation quickly drifted from congratulations towards babies and all that entailed. Severus looked out of the window, noticing that the train started to move, leaving the train station of Folkestone in Kent behind, only listening with one ear to the conversation, convinced that the old Lady wouldn’t think him capable of adding anything worthwhile to the discussion about the best clothes for newborn babies.

“And what’s your husband’s occupation?” she asked finally when her curiosity won out over her need to talk about herself.

“I’m a Professor of Chemistry, and work in the field of pharmaceutics. Currently we are travelling to meet with a peer so my lovely wife and I can discuss the next steps in a research project we have started together, with him.” Potions certainly was a kind of pharmaceutic discipline, and linked to chemistry as well, so this was his usual go-to cover story if he had to talk with a muggle for any length of time.

“Oh!” the old lady exclaimed, obviously delighted to have met someone so interesting on a long, mostly boring journey. “May I ask what you’re working on? A cure for cancer? Or maybe something for those pesky allergies?”

Sonja laughed, making Severus smile almost involuntarily. “Oh, no. Nothing like that. We work on fertility treatments, and other related fields.” She blindly searched for Severus’ hand, grasping it firmly in her own once she had found it. “We could have taken a plane, but I wanted to travel through the Channel Tunnel.” She turned to look out through the window, just seeing the occasional flickers of emergency lights speeding by, and the reflection of light from the other compartments. “It’s such a great feat of engineering.”

After a while Severus gave up on pretending to listen in on their conversation out of interest and got out a book he had charmed, before he had packed it, to look like a novel. The tunnel wasn’t all that long and soon they had a view of the French countryside near Calais.

Severus really was excited to meet with the Dutch Potions Master and pitch their idea for the family connection potion to him. Hopefully he would agree to work together with them on tests on a much bigger scale than they would be able to conduct by themselves. Blocking out the chatter of Sonja and the still-unnamed lady, Severus concentrated on the theory behind various shielding techniques laid down in eloquent detail in the book Sonja had found for him.

Sunday, 7th of April 1996, Easter

“Sit down and breathe, Sirius!” Remus almost shouted in an attempt to get his friend’s attention. Tomorrow was the day that Harry and the little boy Marcus would arrive, and Sirius had been panicking since waking up in the morning.

Said man only turned in a huff, shaking his head. “But how can I, Remus!? There’s still so much to do! Everything needs to be perfect! Can you imagine what might happen to us if anything went wrong?”

Remus closed his eyes and sighed. Maybe accepting the invitation he had declined for Easter lunch would have been the smarter decision. Sirius not sneering over Lord Slytherin maybe hurting him over nothing, but seemingly agreeing he might deserve a punishment dished out by a powerful wizard was so out of character that Remus really started to worry.

“Come over here and sit down.” Remus did his best to imitate Dorea Potter’s tone when she no longer was joking – it had worked on all of them rather well back when they had been teenagers – and actually broke through the panicked haze Sirius had vanished into earlier.

Getting out a small phial of calming draught from his pocket, Remus handed the potion to his pale friend. “Drink! And then you’ll sit there just breathing for a few moments.”

Sirius accepted the phial, but gave the milky pale lavender liquid a dubious look. “Really, Remus? Drugs?”

Remus huffed. “Used under the right circumstances and in the right dosage, it’s medicine, you dunce.”

Chuckling weakly, Sirius toasted his friend with the phial before knocking back the contents, shuddering at the taste in an exaggerated manner. Remus rolled his eyes at his friend and took a seat opposite of Sirius in the kitchen of Grimmauld Place.

It didn’t take long until Remus witnessed the relaxing effect of the potion, as the tension slowly bled out of Sirius’ shoulders, the worry-lines on his face easing and his breath slowing down. Only then did he start to speak, confident that his friend now would actually be able to listen. “You told me that Bill did a great job making the house safe, and that Kreacher and the firm you hired for the job were finished as well. You have your stuff packed. The portkey that will take us both over to the house is here.” Remus pointed at the small, shiny disk sitting on the kitchen table. “All your possible guests have confirmed that they will come and when they will arrive. I have agreed to help you with the last preparations and entertaining your guests. There really is no reason for you to get so worked up over the whole thing.”

Sirius didn’t open his eyes, still breathing evenly. “You know that my head never really was the one doing most of the thinking, Remus. And quite frankly I’m terrified that something might go wrong with the twins. Writing letters with them lets me feel as if I know them already, but... I don’t. And what if they don’t like me? Are disappointed? Their mother clearly has a problem with me. What if she's influenced them against me?” With the last question Sirius opened his eyes, fixing grey orbs on his friend, pleading to be told that he was imagining things.

Remus felt for his friend, happy that he had declined the invitation for Easter in favour of staying with him. “Judging by what you've told me, their mother has raised them to be independent. And if you think back to how we were at that age…”, Sirius chuckled at that, “I don’t think you need to fear them being easily influenced by anyone without a grounding in fact.”

“I’m happy that I’ll have you at my side, Moony.” Sirius finally said before getting up from his chair. “Kreacher will bring our trunks, and I think we should use the portkey so you’ll get to see the cottage in the best possible light.” And just like that Sirius once more was the confident wizard, Remus knew him as. But moments just like this were a clear reminder that this, more often than not – at least Remus suspected that was the case – was a front and not reality.

“Sure, I’m quite curious to see what the Black family considered a small vacation home. Will the others arrive by portkey as well?” Even though he knew on which days the two groups of guests would arrive, Remus hadn’t been told about the mode of transportation.

“Enora, Nawel, and their mother, yes. But Lord Slytherin wrote that he knows where the cottage is and will apparate Harry and Marcus there tomorrow. An elf will bring the boys’ luggage.” Once again Sirius took a deep breath and straightened his posture.

Remus walked around the table to stand beside his friend, once again marvelling about how easy it was to move this close to the last full moon. Having a stretch of woods to run in as well as the Wolfsbane potion each month was making a world of difference. That he had had a job paying good money for months now that wasn’t as taxing as teaching a whole school of teenagers, certainly was having an effect as well. If his healer was to be believed, his health had improved markedly since he had accepted the position as history tutor this last summer.

He took hold of the disk Sirius had summoned to his hand with a flick of his wand, and after the activation phrase had been spoken, the two of them were whisked off in a flash of dizzying colours towards France.

“Mom! Dad! I’m here!” Almost toppling over while trying to take off her boots – her mom wasn’t happy with everyone tracking in dirt – Dora called out to announce her arrival to the inhabitants of the house.

Only moments later – she was hopping on one foot trying to keep her balance – her father came into the hall smiling and happy. “Dora! How glad you could make it! No last-minute orders from your boss?”

Giving her dad a one-armed hug while dropping her second boot near the other, Dora grinned into his shoulder. “No last-minute assignments, luckily. But there’s not really all that much to do anyway. Many Aurors are tasked with the more menial, everyday stuff.”

A delightful scent of roast, and various side dishes Dora had trouble identifying by scent alone, was filling the air, making her smile. “Mom’s in the kitchen?”
“She is,” her father nodded in confirmation, releasing her from his strong embrace. “In fact she threw me out, claiming that the kitchen always looks more like something exploded if I try to help.”

They both shared a laugh, and Dora picked up the chocolate egg filled with various other chocolate figures – spring-themed, the note on the shelf had claimed – she had brought as a gift for Easter from where she had put it before following her father into the living room that had been rearranged to accommodate the dining table.

The sitting room looked cozy. There was a big vase sitting near one of the windows, filled with different young branches just starting to bloom or to sprout leaves. The branches were adorned with little ornaments, quite a few of which Dora had created herself in muggle kindergarten and school before she had started Hogwarts. Little birds, horribly brightly painted eggs, and glass flowers were hanging next to charmed miniature snitches and bunnies moving their ears around. The table was set out for three, and for a moment Dora was a little sad.

She had asked Remus if he would like to come with her to the traditional Easter meal at her parents’ house, but he had declined, citing the need to help Sirius with a last check of the summer home in France.

She suspected that it had been a diversion tactic, simply a way to get out of formally attending a family event as her guest. She had known that it would have been a big thing. Almost like calling them a couple. Or even more than calling them a couple. Maybe she had been a little too bold, asking him. They hadn’t even been on one simply date yet. But all her attempts had been thwarted with the simple argument that she as an Auror, she couldn’t be seen with a known werewolf in a way that could be interpreted as a romantic situation. Maybe she should simply invite him to the cinema.

“Where did you vanish now, Dora?” Her dad suddenly broke her musing, curiosity and a hint of concern in his eyes. His hair – still rather fair and hiding any possible grey ones rather well – was almost falling into his eyes, prompting him to repeatedly push it to the sides. Mom would most likely make him cut it again soon. “Darling?”

She shook her head to clear it of those distracting thoughts, concentrating back at the here and now. “I had asked someone to accompany me today. He declined.” She shrugged, unable to clearly frame her state of mind and emotion in words.

“So have you been with him for a longer time yet? And didn’t tell us?” The raised brow clearly communicated her dad’s scepticism, and Dora couldn’t keep herself from pulling a grimace. “Jumped the wand again, Dora? No wonder he declined your invitation to Easter lunch with your parents.” He laughed at her sour expression, and bent over double when she transformed her face and hair to more closely resemble an elderly witch, sticking her tongue out.

“What has you two this amused?” came her mother’s cultured voice from the doorway, where she just had entered, the food floating in after her on the fine china Ted and Andromeda had gotten as a present from Ted’s parents at their wedding.

“Dora had asked someone to come too. He declined. And judging by her face, she hasn’t really been together with him for long.” Dora was so glad she could control her complexion as her father gave a summary to her mother, otherwise she would have been blushing furiously by now.

Gently placing down the dishes, Andromeda snorted, and gave her daughter a knowing look. “Give the poor bloke a chance, dear. Invite him over for a more ordinary Sunday lunch rather than Easter.” Giving an eye roll, Dora morphed back into her most comfortable form, sitting back in the chair so she wouldn’t accidentally dip her robes into the food.

“Maybe I’ll try that. Thanks, Mom.” The sarcasm was rather thick and brought grins to both her parents’ faces.

For a few moments the conversation revolved around the food, how good it smelled, what-all had been used in its preparation, and that there was more in the kitchen from almost all the dishes. Once they all had filled their plates with slices of roast, young boiled potatoes, young green beans, caramelized onions, and gravy, conversation turned to other topics.

“Have you heard from your sister in the last few days, Dromeda?” Ted asked between a sip from his red wine and a bite from the beans.

“No. But I guess I’ll hear from her soon enough. She has tried to get me to convince you to ask for an ancestry test at the bank. I fear that’s the reason she has been trying to mend the bridges between us so consistently. And now that she has to stay abed, writing letters is one of the few ways to distract herself. I would have died from boredom if I had had to stay in bed for the last weeks of my pregnancy.”

Dora decided not to comment on that statement, but was curious why her aunt, little that she knew her, was confined to bed. “Were there any serious complications?”

“No, nothing too serious. Bedrest isn’t all that unusual for the later weeks of a pregnancy. Even with magic the strain of carrying all that additional weight can get to be too much.”

Dora only nodded, feeling a little better, knowing that it wasn’t anything really dangerous causing the healer’s order to stay in bed.

“How has work been treating you, Dora?” her father changed the subject, putting more of the beans onto his plate.

“Quite well. I guess you’ve heard about the massive amount of Howlers that were sent to the Daily Prophet a while ago?” Dora asked, waiting for her parents to nod before continuing. “I was tasked with investigating who might have done that and why. Currently I only know that no one has bought the necessary supplies anywhere in Great Britain in the last year. It’s quite the conundrum.”

Ted shook his head, sending his hair flying. “Aren’t the Aurors some dark-wizard-hunting special group? Why were you sent to investigate a prank?”

Dora sighed. Not again. “Dad. The amount of explosive force that was generated that day would have levelled the whole building if not for the special wards. It could be considered a terrorist attack. That certainly should warrant the investigation being conducted by the best, don’t you think?” Her father was too easily assuming that she was being slighted by her colleagues and superiors just because she was a witch. “And then there is the fact that the editor himself, Barnabas Cufle, came into the office to report the incident. You know how it is. The important people get the preferential treatment.” She shrugged, not really comfortable with that part of their society and its mechanics.

Ted huffed, but nodded. Andromeda tilted her head in thought. “I guess you already took into account that someone might have brewed the needed materials themselves?”

Dora nodded, taking a sip from her wine. “Yes. But they don’t really contain anything that couldn’t have been grown in a garden, or is so widely used that bulk purchases are the norm. Haven’t gotten far searching for a motive either. Hopefully my requests to possible supply sources overseas will be answered soon.”

“Sounds like a reasonable plan,” her mother agreed.

A little desperate to change the topic to something not related to her, Dora turned to her father and asked him a question. “How is your work going, Dad?”

He launched into describing all the troubles his patients had had – he was working as a neighbourhood healer and potions provider for a community of mostly muggle-born witches and wizards and others living at the edges of society – while Dora contemplated how best to snare Remus into a date with her. Going Muggle would probably be her best bet. Besides the age difference between them, the fact that he had been infected with lycanthropy was the other reason he frequently brought up when he tried to convince her that there was someone better waiting for her out there somewhere.

She wasn’t convinced, though. There weren’t many men as scholarly, genuinely kind, and at the same time mischievous out there. Considering the age a wizard and witch could reach, even when afflicted by a curse such as Remus was, the difference in age between them was of no real consequences. Convincing him of that, with his low self-esteem and his realistic outlook on the prejudices in their society, would be the hard part. But Dora hadn’t been a Hufflepuff for nothing. She knew what hard work meant and how to motivate herself when a task seemed too hard ever to get it done. Maybe if she borrowed a little of her mother’s Slytherin cunning she would be able to manage to get Remus to see past all the obstacles he had put between them in his mind.

Getting him to know her better was just the first step. Maybe cousin Sirius would be willing to help her by offering up some information on his friend. Like favourite music, and books. It was worth asking, at least.

oooOoooo

Pacing up and down the hall under the disapproving eyes of several of his ancestors, Draco tried to stay at least outwardly calm. He knew he was failing miserably, but was pretty sure he would get points for trying anyway. It was taxing for his nerves to be outside of the room, not knowing what was happening within. But being outside probably was preferable to being inside. Because did he really want to witness his little sibling being born?

His father hadn’t really looked all that happy when he had followed the Healer inside. In fact he had looked rather more pale than usual.

First Draco had tried to distract himself with homework, fully expecting not to find the time later in the holidays. It hadn’t worked.

Then he had taken out his broom for a flight, only to find himself drifting towards the side of the manor where his mother’s rooms were, hovering near her windows. Once he noticed that, Draco had turned away with a huff, landing and placing the broom back in the broom shed.

He was too restless to concentrate on anything, and unable to sit down for even a few minutes. A totally unreasonable state of being.

The Healer caring for his mother was the best in her field. His father was there as moral support for Mother, and there was nothing he was expected to do to help.
In fact he had been told not to cause any trouble and to occupy himself quietly. Walking the hall was reasonably quiet, Draco reasoned for his own benefit, and he was out of the way. The whole thing was simply infuriating. They had magic! Why should the process of giving birth take so long? He supposed that the healer would have been glad to explain, but Draco wasn’t all that keen to learn more about anatomy than he needed right now. Especially when it was his mother’s anatomy.

With a huff Draco turned once again at the southern end of the hall, rubbing a hand across his face. He really didn’t want to think about what was going on behind the silencing wards. Not now anyway. He knew and hoped that it would be him by his wife’s side sometime in the future and that he would need to know and face his reluctance then, but at the moment he just was the older-brother-to-be, nothing more.

Casting around for another topic to think about, Draco started to walk in the other direction, ignoring the shuffling sounds from the Malfoy ancestors staring down at him from their frames. Theo had spoken of his adopted brother – Aiden – often since the beginning of this year. There had been letters more than once a week. Well, letters might be too generous a term, as they more often than not were pictures of animals, or plants, or some things that weren’t so easily identified. Harry had spoken about Marcus a lot, ever since the Dark Lord and his heir had noticed the boy was a parslemouth as well during the winter festival at Lord Lestrange’s school.

Reaching the other end of the hall, Draco furrowed his brow in thought. There had been an increase in people talking about additions to their families. Either because their mother, an aunt, an older sister or cousin had fallen pregnant, or because the family was thinking about adoption. Even talk among the potions enthusiasts about the two-fathers potion Professor Snape was developing went along the same lines.

It looked like some tension had left their world which had kept many people back from having bigger families. So much had changed since the end of that blasted tournament and its stupid tasks. And so much more was about to happen.

Draco once more passed the door of his mother’s room. At that very moment he was about to change status as the sole heir and child of the Malfoy family. The pressure to continue their family line would no longer lie on his shoulders alone. And he would get to be an older brother. Both Theo and Harry had made plans on what they wanted to do together with their little brothers once they were home for the holidays. Draco knew that it would take some time before his little sibling would do more than sleep, drool, cry, and eat. But once the baby could walk, his little sibling would get so much more interesting.

Pacing up and down, turning at the end of the hall with a huff each time, Draco watched as the sun went down and the moon rose. Some time later one of the elves popped into the hall, wringing its spindly hands. “Young Master needs to eat! Young Master wishes to eat here? Or down in kitchen? Elves made all Young Master’s favourites, we dids!”

Not really having noticed his growing hunger, Draco stopped for a moment in his pacing, looking directly at the elf in the customary tea towel. He hadn’t eaten in hours, and now that he was paying attention he actually felt that he was hungry. And his feet were sore from walking the whole time. This hall had a floor of intricate wooden patterns with a woollen rug in the middle, but walking for hours still was walking for hours.

Looking back toward the still-closed door, Draco came to a decision and turned back to the expectantly waiting elf. “I’ll eat down in the kitchen. Give me a few moments and I’ll be down.” Now that he was paying attention to his body, Draco had a few other things to take care of before he could sit down more or less comfortably for an evening meal.

Nodding several times, the elf popped out again and Draco walked to the nearest bathroom for a short break.

Carrying in a basket filled with the ingredients needed for the ink, he quickly looked around to see if he had everything needed. It was fortunate that his wife had concentrated on her garden this past summer. Her way to deal with everything that had happened. In consequence there was no need to buy the ingredients in bulk from an Apothecary. Someone surely would have started to ask inconvenient questions.

The basket was deposited on the workbench, a really big cauldron moved over to a firepit and filled with several buckets of clear spring water.

He had been good at potions in school, not mastery good, but good enough to confidently brew the ink needed to create Howlers, and the potion to prepare the parchment, of course. Everyone could buy sets. They weren’t even all that expensive. But in the quantities he needed them, the purchase – even if he was to buy from more than one source – would create too much of a trail. Not a risk worth taking.

A fire was started in the firepit to bring the water in the cauldron to a boil, while he sat to prepare the ingredients in the quantities that he needed.

Later he would soak large bunches of parchment, old and new, in the one potion and charm a couple of quills so they would each use an inkwell filled with the other. Writing one letter would prepare several in parallel as the charmed quills would follow the lead of the one he was using.

It was a tedious process, but it also gave him the opportunity to aim all this rage at someone. And not just anyone. There had been no mention about the avalanche of Howlers he had send to the Prophet, but they had not once placed something as inane as the results of a bakery competition on the front page. In fact they had included articles about foreign policies and happenings over news about the Falcons. Not exactly what he had been aiming for. But a good development nonetheless.

Maybe he would manage to attack his real target next. But first he had to test to see if the charm he had found to disguise his voice was working as he expected it to do.

With a small sinister grin he set to work, writing with jerking motions, the quill making scratching noises on the parchment.

Chapter End Notes

annoying little brother brought to you by: julesa66 Teufel1987, I hope my explanation cleared up why an Auror was tasked with investigating the howler avalanche. I have always thought of the Aurors much like a SWAT team, being brought in as reinforcement for more average police, or working on murder as well as organised crime cases. So, more like the groups for more violent and extraordinary crimes inside the police than “spies” as you would find in something like CIA or MI5, more in-country stuff and closer to actual police. Not sure if the books actually go much beyond “dark wizard fighters” in the definition of what an Auror is. In the end I think it’s likely that they are a catch-all group for everything that goes beyond the more mundane kind of crimes, like shoplifting, apparating without a license, or misusing muggle artefacts.

“Do you two have everything?” Marvolo asked, not for the first time. The last two times Marcus and Harry had both had something else to pick up. But now both boys shook their heads, Harry grinning, and Marcus almost jumping up and down where he stood with his cuddly snake toy clutched under one arm. “Then come over here and get a hold on my arm.”

The two obeyed eagerly and soon Marvolo readied himself to apparate the three of them and the small satchels of his boys over to France.

They landed with relative ease, but while Harry only staggered on the gravel path, Marcus was visibly green.

Marvolo carefully lowered the small boy to the ground and crouched down beside him. “Deep, even breaths, Marcus. The dizziness will pass.” Quick steps on the gravel alerted them all to another person coming near, and they looked up to see a lovely little cottage sitting in a newly planted garden, and one tall wizard walking towards them, grinning.

“Harry! You’re here early! I didn’t expect you all to show up on time!” Black called out and more or less manhandled Harry into a hug.

“Sirius! Tone it down a little, you’re squashing me!” Harry exclaimed, laughing.

Marcus climbed to his feet next to Marvolo, prompting him to get up from the ground as well. A little shy all of a sudden, Marcus pressed closer to Marvolo, almost hiding in the folds of his travelling cloak. Smiling down at his younger son, Marvolo placed one hand on the little shoulder. It probably wouldn’t last long. Marvolo had witnessed more than once how Marcus changed from hiding, shy, to enthusiastically taking part in something. It had been the same at the birthday party and at a few play date things – he still had trouble processing that he really had gone socialising with other parents while Marcus played – they had gone to.

Marvolo watched as Black released Harry from his clutches and turned to walk towards where he still was waiting with Marcus plastered to his side.

“Is that a swing, Sirius?” Harry suddenly asked, looking out over the garden behind and around the Black turned around, halting his advance for a moment, and Marvolo felt Marcus shift at his side, peering out of the cloak folds. “It is. When I had a look at the catalogue with everything in it the firm I hired offered for garden improvements, I spotted some playground equipment, and thought that might actually be a fun addition. Don’t you agree?”

Harry nodded. “It looks much better than the one on the playground in Little Whinging. What do you think, Marcus, do we want to test them?”

It didn’t need more encouragement for Marcus to shout an enthusiastic “Yeah!” and run off to take Harry’s outstretched hand, pulling his older brother along into the garden and over to the swings just visible from where Marvolo was standing.

“Do you need to worry about that munchkin getting into anything dangerous. I made sure all poisonous or dangerous plants were removed before inviting anyone here,” Black explained as he walked over until he came to stop at a respectful conversational distance.

“I know,” Marvolo answered, drawing his eyes away from where he could see Marcus swinging – Harry was old enough to have everything under control – to look at Black and then grin at the other’s dumbfounded expression.

Watching Black trying to cope with that statement, Marvolo didn’t even contemplate explaining anything without being asked to do so. It just was too much fun watching the other wizard flounder in confusion, obviously coming up with some pretty outlandish explanations on his own.

“But I thought… how… weren’t you here sometime in the past?” Black finally asked, one hand conspicuously close to where the man’s wand probably was hidden in a secret pocket in the seam of his trousers.

That question was oh-so-tempting an opportunity to mock Black some more. “Of course I’ve been here in the past. Time travel really is something better avoided.” The stories Marvolo had read in the past had made him treat that branch of magic with much more caution than any other. “But I guess you assume that I must have been here last before losing my body. Am I correct?”

Black nodded, eyes narrowed in suspicion or thought, not easy to tell on the man’s face. Maybe it was a little of both.

“But as I have been helping Bill with cleaning this house up, and a truly delightful endeavour that was, my last visit wasn’t that far back.” Marvolo didn’t bother to keep the amusement out of his voice. It simply was too much fun to tease one of the great pranksters who had tormented poor Severus all through their school years.

“You’ve been helping Bill?” Black almost stuttered that question, quite clearly struggling with the concept of Bill and Marvolo working together.

“I have. It might be a surprise for you, but Bill and I share a fascination with the ways places have been protected with the aid of magic in the past, and how enchantments, curses, and wards deteriorate over time. We’ve had a lot of stimulating discussions. I have asked him for his opinion a few times, as his work with the goblins has given him a different point of view on some things. And he asked me some things. Cleaning out the garden was an unexpected challenge.”

And it had been that. There had been some mutant plant hidden in that garden that they had had to burn with a controlled bit of fiendfyre to get rid of it for good. Marvolo suspected that one of the Blacks had been into experimental breeding of plants. Another branch of magic where Marvolo agreed with the Ministry on the need for regulation.

Black gave a few slow blinks, before shaking himself like a dog getting rid of water in its pelt.
“Right. I don’t really want to know what you would find to be a challenge, would I? Don’t bother.” Black held a hand up just as Marvolo opened his mouth to launch into a detailed description of the plant had kept growing back, faster and faster, when he had tried to get it to a more manageable size by utilising cutting charms. Riling up people was fun he hadn’t engaged for too long.

“But as you see, I’m aware that both my sons will be safe here. Harry has a mirror he can use to contact me, and I know for a fact that you should be able to send a message via Patronus should the need arise. I’ll be using tomorrow to get a few things done, but on all other days I’ll react quickly should you need me to come here for whatever reason. Any more questions, Lord Black?”

“No. I think Remus and I will be able to handle the two. Harry always has been easy to have around,” Marvolo barely restrained himself from rolling his eyes, as if Black had had a lot of time to spend with Harry, “No reason to suspect that Marcus will be a problem.” At that Marvolo couldn’t help but snort, causing Black to look puzzled again.

Shaking his head lightly, Marvolo waved the other off. “I guess you’ll get an education over the next days then, Black. You might not trust me in general, but trust me in this: a small child like Marcus is a totally different kind of challenge.”

Black looked smug now, seemingly sure of himself and his ability to keep a child just old enough for school entertained and happy, but frowned when Marvolo got his wand out. “Harry knows how to cast Marcus’ favourite nightlight, but I think it would be good if you knew as well. So please pay attention.”

It didn’t take long to teach Black how to cast the sleeping snake curled up that Marcus asked for every evening before going to sleep. But it had Marvolo grinning, remembering how the Aurors had looked once they had learned that the Dark Mark which had inspired so much terror floating over the scenes of Death Eater slaughter in the past war was nothing more than a customized night-light spell.

They both walked over to the garden, where Harry and Marcus both were using the swings, trying to get higher than the other in their attempts, monitored by an amused looking Remus Lupin.

“Dad!” Marcus shouted the moment he spotted Marvolo walking over and let go of the swing at the apex of the movement, floating gracefully through the sky, landing with a soft sound on the grass, seamlessly breaking into a run, ending with enveloping the stunned Marvolo in a hug.

Knowing how important it was to encourage displays of magic at this age, he wrestled his shock and fear into submission, and carefully carded one hand through his son’s hair. “Are you having fun, Marcus?”

“A lot!” was the answer from the smiling boy, looking up to Marvolo, tilting his head back as far as it would go to do so.

“That’s great. I’m sure you, Harry, and Mr. Lupin and Lord Black will have even more fun in the next few days during your holiday. While I will have to work and do all the boring stuff.” Marvolo registered the shock wearing off from the other wizards, and that Remus Lupin had his wand in hand, fast reflexes doing him some good in reacting to unforeseen events.

“Why don’t you stay then?” Marcus wanted to know, tiny arms tightening around Marvolo’s knees.

“Because I’ll have to do the work. Just as you can’t skip your homework, I can’t skip mine.” That got a knowing nod from Marcus, which was so adorable and funny that Marvolo felt himself smiling again. “But that I have lots of work to do doesn’t mean you have to stay at home. So enjoy your stay with Harry’s godfather. And I’ll call you over the mirror in the evening. All right?”

The hug Harry silently demanded was shorter than the ten Marcus collected before Marvolo managed to depart together, but it confused Black a lot more. With a last look at his sons vanishing inside the cottage to take a look at the room they would be staying in, Marvolo concentrated on the entrance hall of Griffin House and his determination to be there before spinning on the spot.

ooOoo

After the boys had seen their room and put down a few of their things – like that creepy cuddly snake – the four of them trooped down to the garden again. “Do you want to have some ice cream? Or do you want to play some more? I have a life-sized chess set over there!” Sirius pointed to where a board was laid down with intricate mosaic patterns and a wooden shed held the animated pieces. “We could also use it to play draughts. We also have cricket, and a few balls, brooms…”

Remus placed a hand on Sirius’ shoulder effectively stopping him mid-rambling. “How about we all get a bowl of ice cream and while we eat we discuss what we might want to play after that,” he suggested calmly.

Sirius took a good look at his guests, seeing the small boy, Marcus, looking a little overwhelmed and Harry giving Sirius concerned looks. Maybe he had lost control there for a little while.

“I like that plan,” Harry decided with a little forced cheer, holding out a hand towards Marcus. “What do you think? Hungry enough for a bowl of ice cream?”

“There’s always room for ice cream!” Marcus exclaimed in such an indignant tone over being asked – as if there was even a question – that Sirius felt himself chuckle. “Do you have chocolate-peppermint-swirl with cherries?”

“Why don’t you and Harry go into the kitchen and ask the elf which flavours we have? It won’t be as big a selection as you get in Florean Fortescue’s Ice Cream Parlour, but I’m sure you’ll find something you’ll like,” Remus answered the eager question, smiling when both boys ran off, Harry only casting a short worried glance back at Sirius before he followed Marcus into the house.

“He’s a great older brother,” Sirius said, feeling incredibly sad and angry that Harry only got to be an older brother now because ruddy Slytherin had adopted another kid.

“That he is, Padfoot,” Remus agreed, once again placing a hand on Sirius’ shoulder. “And we can’t know how things might have developed differently if that night hadn’t happened the way it did. And there is no point in dwelling on it now. Try to stay in the moment, Sirius. Have fun with Harry and his little brother here and now. And starting tomorrow get to know Enora and Nawel. Concentrate on the future you want to build. Not the past we never had.”

“Right,” Sirius said, once again shaking himself and taking a few deep breaths. Concentrate on the present and the future he wanted to have. He could do that. “Do you know if we have chocolate-peppermint-swirl with cherries? Now that the kid mentioned it, I kind of would like to have some.”
Remus laughed and they started to walk towards the kitchen. “Sometimes I think you might actually be hopeless.”

ooOoo

“And then Remus and Sirius made the chessmen battle!” Marcus almost knocked Harry’s glasses of his nose, he was waving his hands around so animatedly in his description. Just in time Harry dodged another small hand, grinning from ear to ear and trying to hold the mirror somewhat steady so they could see Marvolo and he could see them.

They had both already had changed into their pyjamas, brushed their teeth, and basically were ready to go to bed and sleep.

“We got to eat ice cream! And Sirius said we can fly on a broom around the garden tomorrow if it doesn’t rain.” Marcus was almost bouncing up and down, sitting with outstretched legs on the bed that Harry was going to use.

“Then I’ll hope for you that the weather stays nice, Marcus,” Marvolo said with a smile, his red eyes sparkling with amusement, which had Harry grinning even more. His little brother’s enthusiasm really was inescapable.

“And I see you’re both ready to go to bed? I know it’s almost bedtime for Marcus, but are you really tired already, Harry?” Marvolo asked with a raised brow.

Harry gave him an unimpressed look. “Do you really think this little bundle of energy will let me sleep in tomorrow, father?”

Marcus giggled, poking Harry with one little, pointy finger into the ribs, which provoked Harry to let the mirror drop to the bed, turning on Marcus to tickle him mercilessly. Marcus squirmed on the bed, laughing almost breathlessly after a few moments, under Harry’s relentless fingers until he decided that it was enough. If he didn’t stop, Marcus would be too hyped up to sleep before he got too tired to sleep easily.

While Marcus calmed down, regaining his breath, Harry gathered the mirror back up and sat straighter. A big grin and happy red eyes looked out of the mirror.

“I see that the two of you are having fun. Remember that I’ll be busy the whole day tomorrow, and that I will call you the day after tomorrow during breakfast to hear about your day. Don’t do anything stupid, and have fun.”

For a moment Harry was tempted to ask how one could do both at the same time, but decided against it. He really didn’t want to plant dangerous ideas into Marcus’ head. “We’ll do that.”

“Good night, dad! Cuddle with Nagini for me!” Marcus said into the mirror, leaning so close his nose almost touched the reflective surface.

“Good night, father,” Harry chimed in, actually looking forward to sleeping after a long day playing with Marcus, as being the only focus for his little brother had been exhausting.

“Sleep well you two. And I’ll cuddle with Nagini. With you two gone for now, she probably will insist on sleeping in my bed anyway because it’s warmer.” They all laughed at that, it just was too true, and ended the mirror call in a good mood.

“Ready to sleep?” a voice asked from the doorway where Remus and Sirius were standing, smiling at them.

“Yes!” Marcus answered, bounding over to his own bed, where his cuddly snake was already waiting for him, her head on the pillow and her body under the duvet, and clambering up the side.

“I certainly am,” Harry agreed, carefully placing the mirror on the bedside table – shiny side down – before slipping under his own duvet, getting comfortable.

Sirius got his wand out. “I was told that you like a little sleeping snake as a nightlight by the door?” His eyes were on Marcus who nodded eagerly. “Then I’ll cast the spell before turning off the lights.” A little murmured incantation, a flick of his wand and there was a little snake curled up right next to the door on a little shelf. Remus turned the light off and with murmured good nights the two adult wizards were gone.

Harry was already half asleep when he felt Marcus climb into his bed, snuggling under his duvet and close to Harry himself. Without hesitation, one of Harry’s arms curled around Marcus and the two of them slept peacefully until the morning.

Tuesday, 9th of April 1996

Nawel was kicking small stones from where they were sitting on a bench near Gare De Lyon, waiting for their mother to pick them up. Next to them their Professor for Magical Theory was waiting, watching the people going by and obviously entranced by the differences from what they all were used to seeing at Beauxbatons. Even just comparing tourists to people commuting to and from work would provide hours of entertainment.

“Think all will go smoothly?” she asked her sister, doubt evident in her voice. She really wasn’t sure if their mother would make this harder than it needed to be.

“I hope it will, and don’t know why it shouldn’t. Maman wants the best for us. I think she and Lord Black will manage to be sensible adults during this week,” Enora answered, once more her sensible self.

Shaking her head with clicking beads, Nawel gave voice to her scepticism. “She’s still writing all her letters to him in French!” She threw her hands up in the air. “And she knows he can’t read that. Why would she do something like that and be reasonable with something of more consequence?”

Rubbing the bridge of her nose Enora nodded. “We’ll have to talk with her. I don’t really know what has caused her to be this… hostile.”

Nawel only shrugged. She didn’t really know either. Sirius Black seemed decent enough, judging by his letters and the fact that he hadn’t missed even one that he had promised to send.

Before they could go into more detail on what exactly they wanted to tell their mother, or agree on a strategy, a car stopped next to where they were sitting close to the kerb, honking insistently.

“Looks as if your mother is here, Mesdemoiselles Moreau,” Professor Toudoire said, waving a hand in the direction of the car. “Move now, quick!”

The two of them did as instructed, deftly dodging other pedestrians on their way over to where they could see their mother behind the car’s wheel.

“Maman! You’re here!” Nawel exclaimed, despite all her worries happy to see her mother after so long. She would have loved to give her a crushing hug in greeting but was reduced to quickly opening the door and slipping into the back seat, moving over to the other side to make the way free for her sister, slipping in right behind her. The professor passed them their luggage through the door – shrunken down, of course – before they closed it, and the Professor stepped back, waving.

“Of course I’m here!” Olivienne laughed. “Where else should I be, if not here to spend the holidays with my two precious girls?” She waved to the professor still standing outside, before concentrating on the traffic around them, preparing to slip right back onto the street.

“Tell me how school’s going. There is a lot of time until we’ll reach the address I was sent. And you’ll have to keep me entertained, or I’ll fall asleep. I’m still struggling with jet lag.”

“School is going well! We have almost all our homework finished already,” Nawel started to talk excitedly. Maybe they would get to show their Maman some magic during these holidays. With other adult magicals around, the risk of getting something wrong would finally be low enough that she just couldn’t forbid them to show her any longer.

ooOoo

“Deep breaths, Sirius. You can do this,” Remus murmured into his friend’s ear as they all moved from the garden – where they had once again fought a vicious game of chess to the amusement of Marcus – to the front of the house where a car had just stopped.

Harry was walking next to his godfather and Marcus, the little bundle of energy that he was, was running at full speed to see who had just arrived. “Don’t run onto the street!” Sirius called after the small boy, fingering his wand. Remus also had his wand in hand ready to cast a spell to drag the boy back should it become necessary.

The car was a relatively simple one, painted in the colours of a company renting cars to people, and three women were getting out of it.

Marcus turned tail and ran back to hide behind Harry, peering around his big brother in curiosity. The two girls grinned and exclaimed something in French that had them both giggling afterwards.

The other woman obviously was their mother, for once smiling – something Remus knew hadn’t happened often when she and Sirius had met – as she was watching the young boy run with flying robes.

Remus stopped next to Sirius, who took a deep breath, before taking one step forward. “Olivienne, Nawel, Enora, welcome. I hope you had a good drive here. I’m certain you would want to freshen up, maybe eat and drink something. Come in.” Sirius had a healthy blush on his cheeks, and he trembled slightly. For someone who knew him as well as Remus did it was obvious how nervous he was.

The teenage witches who just had arrived were nervous as well, their eyes flicking from one person to the next, taking in them and their surroundings. They seemed intelligent and curious, a good combination. Remus had trouble reading the girls’ mother, though.

With a nudge of his elbow, Remus reminded Sirius that introductions were in order.

“Right, where are my manners?” Sirius took the cue. They had arranged a number of signals beforehand making sure that Remus would be able to support his friend in a way that wasn’t too obvious. “Let me introduce my other guests.” First he laid a hand on Remus’ shoulder. “This is my good friend since we went to Hogwarts together, Remus Lupin. He has worked as a Professor for Defence at Hogwarts in the past, and now primarily is working as a history tutor.” Remus gave a slight bow and got curt nods in return. It might have been unusual not to introduce by rank, but Sirius was adamant to go by age.

“Over there is my godson, Harry, who was adopted last summer and now is heir Potter and Slytherin. Currently he’s preparing for his OWLs at Hogwarts.”

Harry rolled his eyes, smiled, and bowed. “You weren’t part of the Beauxbatons delegation during the tournament our last school year? I’m sure I would have remembered either of you if you had been.”

“We were too young,” one of the girls answered, smiling back, obviously not unhappy with Harry’s easygoing attitude.

“The boy hiding behind Harry is his little brother, Marcus. The both of them are here for a little holiday, as their adoptive father has important duties to see to, and I was only too happy to offer them a little vacation away from home. Neither of them has ever been to France before.”

Madame Moreau nodded and took a few steps until she was standing right behind her daughters. “As you may have already guessed, these are my daughters, Enora and Nawel. Both are students at Beauxbâtons, and two of the best students there.” Her accent was quite thick, and she put some emphasis on the name of the school. Remus wasn’t really sure, but he thought there was a hint of a challenge in her voice. Sometimes he really wished the stories about the heightened senses of a werewolf were true. It would come in rather handy from time to time.

“Why don’t I show you all your rooms, so you can store your luggage, before we get some refreshments from the kitchen?” Remus tried to get them all moving after a lengthy moment of them all only standing there, almost frozen to their spots on the lawn.

“Yes!” one of the girls agreed, seemingly happy to get out of the awkward situation, starting to walk in direction of the cottage. “Our professor shrunk our luggage?”

Remus picked up the hint of a question and smiled reassuringly. “I’ll be able to unshrink them once we’re in the room your sister and you will be using. Just follow me.”

Marcus followed Harry like a shadow as they all finally moved into the house and up the stairs to the bedrooms.

The whole process was painfully awkward in a way Remus hoped would quickly vanish. Maybe he should make it possible for Sirius and Olivienne to talk in private in the hope of clearing the air.

“That is a nice room.” Enora said, flopping down on one of the beds, only to sit upright again the moment Marcus jumped to land next to her.
“What ice cream do you like best?” he wanted to know, tilting his head to the side as Remus noticed him doing quite often.

“What Mango. And which is yours?”

“But I haven’t tried them all yet!” Marcus declared and then started to explain his grand plan of eating all possible flavours of ice cream at least once so he could decide which one his true favourite was.

It was a rocky start, but Marcus’ earnest interest to get to eat more ice cream helped to get them move into the kitchen and get a tentative conversation flowing.

Remus was confident that the rest would come with time.

oooOOooo

Bill had gathered a few general emergency materials from various corners of his flat, trying not to think too much about the mix of excitement, anxiety, and curiosity coursing through him.

When he had everything he thought he might need — but fervently hoped to have brought in vain in the end — Bill grabbed his favourite work robes and then walked over into his tiny kitchen. Slipping his right arm into the sleeve, Bill eyed the small bronze disk of a portkey he had put on his small kitchen table late yesterday evening after an inconspicuous owl had brought it. Without a note or any other information. He had felt as if he were in some ridiculous children’s book about a spy. A portkey without instructions.

In fact he knew exactly how to activate the portkey, and where it would take him, as he and Marvolo had talked about it after Bill had agreed to help with the ritual. But, understandably, Marvolo didn’t want to risk anyone learning about what he was doing.

For a moment Bill just stood there in his tiny kitchen — dirty dishes from the day before stacked next to the sink, a few old and wrinkly apples almost falling from the edge of the small cooling cabinet, window in dire need of being washed — and contemplated what he was about to do. The kind of ritual going to take place today was highly experimental, and because it was linked to such dark magic — even though it was created to undo what had been done — it was doubly likely to land on the list of forbidden magics should the Ministry ever learn of it.

But his father’s words that it was always good to help those who asked for help, and his own conviction that it was a good thing that Marvolo Slytherin was working towards, undoing the damage he had done to himself by creating so many horcruxes, still was at the forefront of his mind. That the plan was to create a ritual safe for Harry so that they would be able to remove that errant piece of soul from him without causing him harm, only added to the feeling that this was the right decision.

With a sigh and a decisive nod, Bill picked up the portkey and spoke the activation phrase. “Malfoy Manor.”

ooOoo
For a moment Malcolm Greengrass stood there eyeing the red-headed wizard who had landed right next to him in a lush and luxurious receiving room, before he decided to attempt some polite interaction. After all, they were here for a common goal. “Mr. Weasley.” He gave a polite nod and felt like kicking himself. Way to go to be polite.

The other wizard chuckled, shaking his head a little. “The situation is a little bit surreal, isn’t it? Hello, Healer Greengrass.” The curse-breaker – whom Malcolm knew would be there as his Lord had informed him – eyed the healer’s bag Malcolm had brought and then met the healer’s eyes. “I see you came well prepared as well?” As if to explain this question Weasley held up a satchel presumably filled with whatever he had thought to bring.

It wasn’t Malcolm’s place to question his Lord’s decisions, but today he felt different. He knew what his Lord was going to do, had taken a vow to keep what happened in the past to make this ritual necessary a secret, was trained to react to problems that might arise, and even though he wasn’t as accomplished as his Lord in the art of rituals, he had gone out of Britain for his healer training for the sole purpose of learning about the older ritualistic healing methods.

How was it that a Weasley could be here?

The wizard turned on his heel slowly, taking in the room, seeming totally unconcerned. When he spoke up, Malcolm felt himself tense. “Please try to keep your death glares down. Marvolo might get distracted. And even if you have trouble believing me, I’m here to help. In the end, this is a test run to check if the ritual created will work on Harry without harming him. If you can’t believe in me helping for any other reason, please believe that I wouldn’t want him to be harmed.”

Malcolm huffed, not answering that… plea, but remembering his Lord’s instructions. He was to work together with William Weasley, or else.

Before the uncomfortable situation between them could get any worse – Malcolm felt that the tension should be able to block a stunner – an elf made an appearance. “Please follow, wizardsies. Master Lord want you to come to ritual room.”

Picking up their supplies, the two wizards followed the elf out of the room and down a hall filled with different paintings. Malcolm had been here before, but it was obvious that Weasley had not. He was looking around like a small child in a toy store. Or a wizard just turned eleven in Ollivanders shop getting his first wand. Malcolm felt like rolling his eyes, but restrained himself. It would have been as uncouth as the other’s behaviour to do so. But it was tempting.

They walked through a music room, and soon reached a plain wooden door with a glass doorknob. The elf didn’t turn the handle to open the door – it was too short to reach it anyway – but waved a spindly hand, which caused the door to open by magic. Weasley left Malcolm to walk through first, and he gladly accepted, stepping through the doorway.

It was a spacious ritual room, made entirely with slate grey stone, no windows or seams disturbing the smooth surface.

He couldn’t walk in far, as there already was a complicated circle drawn on the floor, and the Dark Lord was still working on it, so he took a few steps to the side, careful not to disturb anything.

Weasley was just as careful as he stepped in, making Malcolm rethink his assessment as the redhead started to analyse the circle laid down with eager eyes.

The Dark Lord sat back, hair falling in loose waves around his face, piece of chalk soaked in something in hand, and looked up to where they were standing. “Malcolm, Bill, you’re in time.”
Malcolm still felt strange seeing his Lord in so little clothing. Even though he was the man’s healer, normally he didn’t get to see him in anything but robes. The Dark Lord simply didn’t get ill. “Malcolm, you can set up over there.” A hand was waved to one corner of the room, where a simple stool was set up. With a small bow – he would not kneel in front of a Weasley – Malcolm walked over and set his bag down to place potions into an order he was accustomed to in emergency situations.

While he was working on that, he did watch and listen to what Weasley and the Dark Lord were doing. “Shall I start checking everything?” the curse-breaker asked, as if he had any right to question the Dark Lord’s competence with runes.

“Yes, please. I just have to finish this part, before I’ll start checking it again,” was the Dark Lord’s answer, and Malcolm almost let go of one of the blood-replenishing potions in shock.

Setting down the last phial of a strong pain relief potion – he was pretty convinced that he would need those – Malcolm finally sat down, leaning back against the wall, and watched his Lord and the eldest Weasley son work on the circle in a way that was eerie.

It looked like they had worked together often. But how could that be?

“Can I have one piece of that chalk?” Weasley asked at one point without looking up or adding any address of respect. When the Dark Lord simply picked one up, calling out “Catch!” and threw it across the room, Malcolm felt his jaw drop. Those two must have worked together for quite a while to get to this level of… camaraderie. There was no other way to name this ease of interaction.

“Isn’t really a gap in the lines, but the floor is a little rough here, so better safe than sorry,” Weasley said, setting the chalk down on the floor to re-draw a set of runes with a careful touch.

Malcolm knew he hadn’t all the information he would need to understand the Dark Lord’s reasons to have a Weasley here, of all people, but watching the two of them work convinced the healer that it probably had been a good choice on his Lord’s part to include the other wizard.

ooOoo

Thankfully the room was heated to a degree that he didn’t feel cold when he started out, and the effort of crawling around on the floor, drawing intricate patterns, interlocking circles, and elaborate rune arrays without smudging them, helped create the warmth that he needed not to feel exposed only wearing a thin, undyed linen shirt just long enough to fall to below his knees.

At first he had tried drawing with a robe over the shirt, but it had managed to smudge the first few lines, so Marvolo had removed them and started fresh without the additional cover of a robe. Sometimes it worked, sometimes it didn’t. No use in trying to make it work when it wasn’t going to.

All in all, the preparations he had made for this ritual had been more involved than those for the last attempt. It had been a suggestion from Bill – who currently was on the other side of the circle, checking the part where the cup was going to sit – who had reasoned that Marvolo should involve his own state of mind in the ritual that had added so much to the preparations. The remorseless murder of an innocent was a big part in the creation of a horcrux. The true remorse felt for that act... was the only known and documented way of returning a soul piece to its original body. Why should they assume the state of mind of the caster of the ritual they had been working on would be of no consequence?

So Marvolo had tried to get into a frame of mind somewhat resembling remorse. He had to admit he hadn’t been all that successful.

He wasn’t sorry to have killed that old witch hoarding money and objects, keeping them away from her own family, boosting her self-image by basking in their reflected glory. The fact that she had shamelessly flirted with a much younger man really wouldn’t have counted against her that much, if not for the fact she had had a tendency to touch without asking. Marvolo remembered putting up with it, even flirting with her on Burke’s orders – and his own insight into human nature – to get her to pay more, or even part with one of her treasures. But it did nothing to make her death a loss in his eyes.

But he felt sorry that he had used her elf – he didn’t even remember the poor thing’s name – to stage an accident to explain Mrs. Smith’s death. That had been unnecessary. He was easily intelligent enough to find a way to accomplish a cover without involving others as he had done then.

Did he think it would help that he felt kind of bad about taking the easy way out with covering up his crime? Probably not, but that had been the best he had been able to manage since Bill had brought up that idea.

It probably would be easier to bring himself to feel somewhat remorseful when preparing to remove the horcrux from Harry. It would have been easy to stun Lily Potter instead of killing her. That probably would have changed everything in ways he could not fathom, but it would have been easier in that moment.

Not willing to linger too long on the fact that his irritation had spelled his own downfall that night, Marvolo carefully stood to get a better view of the whole ritual circle.

He slowly turned a full circle, barely moving his bare feet, and took in his work. The raw clay bowls with various herbs placed at the convection points around the circle, the lines connecting everything, small patches of salt lines, only the cup and himself still missing from the picture.

“What do you think, Bill?” Marvolo asked, ignoring the pale and startled looking healer in his corner. He shouldn’t let himself be distracted by the man’s inability to comprehend changes as simple as getting to know a wizard and accepting the expert knowledge gained through hard work.

“I think this looks good. Not a line or grain out of place. I see no reason to delay any longer,” Bill said, gathering the few pieces of chalk in his easy reach and carefully standing up and stepping back.

Marvolo nodded, and carefully stepped out of the design drawn on the floor, walking over to the place next to the niche where he had placed the cup hidden under his robe next to his folded clothes already stored on the shelf to be out of the way once he was ready to begin.

While he picked up one of his three remaining horcruxes – counting Harry – Bill collected the last pieces of random chalk around the circle before retreating to another stool placed in a corner of the room. Out of the way, just like Malcolm.

Setting down the cup precisely in the middle of the circle drawn for the soul container, Marvolo started to breathe in the even pattern he was so used to by now. Time to put aside everything unrelated – the incredulous disbelief Malcolm displayed, Bill’s obvious amusement with the situation, his own worry over Harry and Marcus in the care of Black – and concentrate on the ritual, and why it had been a bad idea to murder that old creepy witch.

A few careful steps brought Marvolo into the circle drawn for him to sit in, where he carefully sat down – making sure not to flash his two onlookers – and settled into the best position to sit in for a prolonged time on the hard floor.

Then he started the chant to extract the soul piece from the cup, the container he had stored the broken piece in quite some time ago. This part hadn’t been adapted to the changes made to the ritual. Those had been made mostly to the process after the soul shard was free of the horcrux container.

Slowly everything that had been on his mind vanished, his gaze concentrated on the golden cup with the badger and those two handles while Marvolo slowly noticed a red glow around the cup.

In the next minutes – or however long it actually did take – the glow grew, if not by much. Then it floated upwards, just as if it was steam rising from a cauldron. The moment the floating cloud of red-glowing soul shard detached from the cup, Marvolo changed his chant, trying very hard not to think about the pain he was expecting.

That could seriously mess up his concentration if he allowed it to happen.

This was the new part of the ritual. Instead of trying to move the shard into a different object, the lines on the ground and the burning herbs as well as the words he were speaking urged the glowing shard to move directly to his own body.

And move it did.

Quickly.

Much quicker than the last time he had tried something similar. Probably because there were no competing forces at work this very moment.

The moment the glowing cloud made contact with Marvolo’s chest, right over his heart, a wave of pain shot through him and as much as he tried, he didn’t really manage to say the words for the chant to help reconnect the severed piece of his soul.

Then the pain ebbed a little, a voice picking up the chant that wasn’t his own.

The world turned black, and Marvolo felt his body tilting sideways, but he also heard the chant coming to an end.

Just before he lost consciousness Marvolo came to the conclusion that this still needed some work.

ooOoo

Lucius was standing next to the door to the ritual room barely refraining from pacing. He knew that barging in, interrupting the ritual his Lord was conducting in there would be a tremendously stupid idea, but he felt tempted to go in anyway.

He had been playing a game of chess with Draco in the family parlour when he had felt the first howler being destroyed by the wards. And after that there had been a lot more than one. Lucius knew that there should be no way that those howlers could have an impact on the happenings in the ritual room, as that room was warded specifically to keep out outside interference. But the sheer number of howlers that had collided with the wards around Malfoy Manor had him worrying anyway.

After quickly checking in with Narcissa and their lovely newborn daughter Cassiopeia – named after one of the many Blacks Narcissa was related to – Lucius had come down to the ritual room, seeing the door still closed and the ritual under way seemingly undisturbed.

He was just about to give in to his urge to pace when the door to the ritual room opened. The greeting he was about to utter died in Lucius’ throat as he spotted the form of his Lord being carried by the curse-breaker he had only admitted into his house under his Lord’s orders.

“He’s fine,” the wizard suddenly said in a reassuring tone Lucius felt resentful against almost immediately. “Just passed out, Healer Greengrass said.” Lucius stepped aside unconsciously the moment Weasley moved forward away from the door, making room for Malcolm Greengrass.

“He’s right,” the Healer said, his wand in hand and a bag slung over his shoulder, potion phials clinking against each other as he moved. “Our Lord will need to rest, but other than exhaustion after the ritual, he is fine.”

“I’ll show you to one of the guest rooms.” Lucius said, his mind racing with possibilities, just like the last time his Lord had borrowed the ritual room he didn’t really know what the ritual had been. Should he inform the healer about the howlers? It probably was a factor the healer needed to know about.

The three of them hurried along the halls of Malfoy Manor and Lucius tried to concentrate on the important next steps. But it wasn’t all that easy to banish the question of why Weasley was carrying his Lord from his mind. Luckily he was in front, leading the group to the room always ready for their Lord since his return, so that there was no way for him to see Weasley carrying their Lord bridal style, or for him to be caught throwing glances at the odd sight.

Then they reached the suite of rooms, and Lucius opened the door. Once inside he stepped to the side, out of the way, and watched the other two act.

Weasley quickly walked over to the bed, where Malcolm Greengrass already had turned down the blanket, poised to cast diagnostics the moment their Lord was placed down.

Lucius felt his eyebrow wing up, watching how Weasley carefully tucked the Dark Lord in under the blankets before standing back, turning and walking over to where Lucius was waiting.

“Why were you waiting at the door, Lord Malfoy?” The red-headed wizard asked, his attention focused on the Healer assessing the health of the unconscious Dark Lord.

“The outer wards had been disturbed by an undetermined number of howlers. I wanted to make sure they didn’t influence the ritual in a negative way.” At the last moment Lucius caught himself calling the Dark Lord his Lord, only to realise that both he and Greengrass had done so more than once already with the Weasley clearly within earshot.

But Weasley didn’t seem to notice as he furrowed his brow in thought. “I don’t think it did impact the ritual. How many are we talking here? As many as trashed the mail room at the Prophet?”

Lucius nodded, watching Greengrass flutter around their Lord. “The impacts were so close to each other than I can’t even tell you how many there were. But I guess, considering the ritual, I can hardly call the Aurors in, can I?” He had heard from within the Ministry that Narcissa’s niece had been assigned to that investigation, and probably would be the one sent if he got word to the Auror Department about the attack of today.

“And even after I’m done with clean up they would ask why he’s here, knocked out in one of the guest rooms. But not reporting it might seem suspicious once they find the one responsible...” Weasley mused before standing up straight. “I’ll go down, clean up, and see if there’s anything of note Marvolo might want to analyse later. Once I’m done I’ll let you know?”

“I will send an elf to lead the way. You can send it back to inform me when you’re done, Mr. Weasley,” Lucius decided, working hard to make sure his surprise over Weasley calling the Dark Lord by his chosen name didn’t show.

“Sounds good to me,” Weasley agreed and quickly followed the elf Lucius did call out of the room and back down to the ritual room.

Once Greengrass declared that there wasn’t really much that Lucius could do, the blond went back to his wife, son, and daughter to explain the situation and to puzzle over the odd familiarity Weasley had shown to the Dark Lord.

As always, the amount of paperwork that needed to be filled in, the number of letters to be read, and the crowd of visitors waiting to be let in had been staggering. But now with all of that finally done and finished, Cornelius had earned a nice evening at home with his wife. Maybe the two of them could enjoy a good glass of wine and some nice music on the wireless. Wasn’t there a broadcast of Celestina Warbeck planned?

Cornelius stood from behind his desk and stretched until his back popped, and he felt some of the tension from sitting too long leave his body. That last bit of work had taken longer than he had planned for.

Just as he was picking up his cloak from the stand in the corner, there was a commotion outside of his office. What were his secretary and assistant getting up to now?

With no little bit of frustration – this certainly would take quite some time over nothing – Cornelius walked over, opened the door and found himself buried under the body of one of his Auror guards, a shield flaring to life around them.

There were explosions, the smell of burned parchment and paper, yells, and the sound of something heavy being thrown onto the floor.

Then suddenly silence. Or nearly. Only the sounds of burning paper, an almost whispery, crackly noise, and breathing were to be heard for a few moments.

“Are you unharmed, Minister?” the auror who had shielded him suddenly asked, having stood from his position on top of Cornelius, holding out a hand to help him up.

“I think I am,” Cornelius answered, still in a daze, looking around what once had been the anteroom to his office.
The heavy desk had been thrown on its side, used as a shield most likely, and was badly scorched, as was the rest of the furniture, the carpet, the walls, the ceiling, all portraits... basically, everything looked as if there had been a fire burning in here.

“What happened here?” Cornelius heard himself ask, noting almost unconsciously that there were no bodies on the floor.

“Red flying memos came in, like a murder of crows, exploding and screaming, diving for the door to your office, Minister. As if someone managed to create… flying memo... howlers…” The Auror spoke slower and slower towards the end, his eyes widening in realisation, before falling silent, raising his wand into a ready position.

“Exactly like that,” a frazzled voice said from behind the second desk. Everyone turned to look at the speaker and saw a lanky red-headed wizard crawl out from under the desk, soot marring his face a little, a frozen paper plane in a dangerous red clutched in one hand.

“How did you manage that, Weasley?” the second Auror guard asked – Dawlish was the senior Auror on protection detail today – helping the secretary to her feet.

“Mom is rather fond of sending howlers. Not that I got many, but I don’t like them screaming near me either. So I decided to learn a spell that's capable of freezing them. Wasn’t sure it would work. Glad it did.”

The reinforcements automatically alerted when there was danger detected near the Minister’s office, made an appearance in that moment, bringing the healer on staff with them, who got to work immediately.

Cornelius endured the diagnostic spells while thinking to himself that he had been right where Arthur’s middle son was concerned. The lad could become great, with the right support. He was methodical and discreet, and could keep his head under pressure, a valuable combination.

That he had managed to prevent one of those flying memos from being destroyed might give the Aurors the clue they needed to get to the bottom of these dangerous attacks via mail.

Cornelius came home later than he had planned, but he got the glass of wine he wanted to have and a nice back rub from his wife.

The next day hopefully would bring forth serious advances in the Auror investigation.

Chapter End Notes

I have to say that I just love the English group terms for several different animals and couldn’t resist incorporating one there at the end.

Thanks to Jordre and Jake for helping to improve my spelling!

The moment he woke he knew he wasn’t in his bed at home. For one, Nagini wasn’t there, and the smell was somehow different. The sheets were silk. Not really bad, but he usually preferred cotton to silk, as it wasn’t as slippery. After his senses had told him that he wasn’t under any threat to his safety, Marvolo tried to sit up, but flopped back down almost instantly.

That had hurt!

He didn’t manage to contain a painful hiss, which drew attention to the fact that he was awake.

“My Lord!” steps hurried over the floor – some polished wood with a few carpets by the sound of it – and stopped right next to the bed. “How are you feeling, my Lord? My spells indicate that you’re mostly fine, but I would like to get a first-hand account from you.”

Inwardly he rolled his eyes, as he really wanted to groan in pain and frustration, but couldn’t risk losing face like that.

Without opening his eyes or sitting up again, Marvolo gave his answer, sounding decidedly short-tempered. “I’m well enough. A little sore, but nothing a pain-relief potion won’t cure.”

“I’m glad to hear that,” Malcolm answered, and Marvolo heard glass clinking together.

A hand and arm were inserted behind Marvolo’s shoulders, helping him to sit up so he could drink the potion in the phial pressed against his lips a few seconds later. The relief of pain started almost the moment the potion reached Marvolo’s stomach. One of Severus’ creations, Marvolo was sure. The man had managed to improve on quite a few of the standard recipe. His potions kept longer and worked faster.

Once the pain was all but gone, Marvolo carefully opened his eyes and sat up, the covers falling down from his chest to pool in his lap. He was in one of the guest bedrooms – or rather, suits – at Malfoy Manor, which he had expected. Where else should he be after he had conducted that ritual the day… had it been yesterday? “How long have I been asleep?”

“Several hours, my Lord. It is the day after the ritual. Morning, to be precise,” Malcolm informed Marvolo, giving him a bow now that he no longer was lying flat on his back.

“Thank you for your care, Malcolm. I think I’m well enough to get up, take a shower, and dress. Or do you disagree?” He really wanted to take a long and hot shower, and now that the pain was gone he felt keenly that he had missed more than one meal. Breakfast would be quite nice, as well.

“I have no objections, my Lord,” Malcolm agreed with another bow. “William Weasley placed something for you on the desk by the window over there, my Lord. I’ll go inform Lord Malfoy of your good health.”

Waving him off, Marvolo carefully worked his way over to the edge of the much-too-big bed. “Go do that.”

After Malcolm was gone Marvolo didn’t keep the winces from his face any longer. Even with the pain dulled, he was pretty stiff and clumsy in his movements. A hot shower would take care of that.

Almost an hour later, Marvolo stepped out of the en-suite bathroom closing the last button on his shirt, hair still slightly damp, but most of the tension gone. Before he would go down to speak with Lucius – his wife probably was still resting – he still had a report to read. He sauntered over to the desk where Malcolm had indicated that Bill had left something for Marvolo. And there was indeed a neatly rolled and sealed scroll resting right next to a pouch made from dark green velvet on that desk.

Pretty sure that he knew what was contained in the pouch, Marvolo picked up the scroll first and broke the seal. Bill’s description of the ritual from his perspective matched well with what Marvolo remembered. The curse-breaker also had included the suggestion to change the ritual another time to include a second participant to speak the chants so that the whole process would hopefully run smoother. He couldn’t quite disagree that it probably would become necessary to create a stable process.

He sighed, and let the scroll roll back on itself before picking up the pouch which held – as Bill had written – the cup as shiny and pristine as the day he had liberated it from the showcase in Hepzibah Smith’s living room.

The ritual had worked.

With a light cold shiver running down his back, Marvolo briefly thought what changes he was going to go through because another part of his mangled soul had returned home.

It only had been a rather small part, the cup being one of the later horcruxes, so hopefully the changes wouldn’t end up being all that drastic.

Parchment and pouch vanished inside a pocket of the robes Marvolo put on, and he walked out of the room and into the hall. Now the only thing left to do here was to deliver his best wishes to Lucius. It was a bit archaic that only the father was offered congratulations, but he guessed that a woman who just had given birth would be happy to skip social niceties in favour of rest.

As usual the halls of Malfoy Manor were spotlessly clean, and before he had even passed two doors, an elf popped into the hall right next to him, bowing deep. “Where is Lord’s Master going, Master?”

Sometimes their grammar was almost painful. But he had to remember they were powerful in their own right and a force to reckon with if loyal to their family or an individual. “I’m in search of Lucius and Healer Greengrass. Where might I find them?”

“Theys are in the main parlour, Lord’s Master,” the elf answered, bobbing its head, obviously happy to be of help.
“Thanks,” Marvolo said with a nod, already adjusting his planned path to take one of the less opulent staircases, so that he would reach the main parlour more quickly than by taking the big staircase that had been built to impress. Behind him a rather loud popping sound told him about the elf’s departure. But he didn’t really pay it much mind.

The walk to the main parlour was a short one, and he could hear voices before he had reached the door.

“You shouldn’t give up hope so fast. There is a witch out there for you.” Lucius was speaking in a consoling tone which probably was intended to be helpful.

“It’s not that easy, truly it is not. I’ve been searching ever since our Lord gave out his order, but there aren’t many unmarried witches near my age around.” Malcolm sounded unhappy, as if he was about to give up. Marvolo wondered if his healer was narrowing his options too much.

He took the last few steps to the door, and moved into the room, instantly gaining the attention of his two followers. They both stood from where they had been sitting, giving him bows from the waist, before standing straight again.

“Where have you searched so far, Malcolm?” If Bill had been here, Marvolo would have been tempted to bet on his guess that the younger Greengrass brother only had tried to find a witch from an old family. One of the respectible families.

The young healer looked a little sheepish and blushed, but conditioning was enough to make him answer anyway. “All over Europe, my Lord. But most witches my age are already married, engaged, or betrothed. I’m trying to follow your order, my Lord.”

With a sigh – he would have won that bet – Marvolo walked over to the best of the armchairs and sat down, waving at the loveseat on the other side of the low table for the others to sit down as well.

They hurried to comply with his order, and for the moment, ignoring his original plan to just speak with Lucius and go home, Marvolo fixed his gaze on Malcolm. “And why limit yourself so? Severus has found a lovely wife, even if a Squib might not be a good fit to ensure that your children have strong magic. But look at my son Henry. His mother was a descendant of the Slytherin family, married to a member of the Potter family. Or the daughter of Andromeda Black, now Tonks. She’s a metamorphmagus. Don’t you think it could be a good idea to no longer limit yourself in such a way?”

Malcolm didn’t answer, but Marvolo was pretty sure he had given the other some food for thought. And with any luck, this advice would make its rounds to all the others facing the same problem from narrow mindedness as Malcolm had. It was a little disappointing that he needed to spell it out this clearly. All the hints were there for all to see. Why they all decided not to see them, to ignore them, was a conundrum he wasn’t sure he could solve.

So Marvolo turned to look at Lucius. “I want to congratulate you and your wife on your new daughter. May she find only happiness in her life.”

“Thank you, my Lord.” Lucius replied, and for a moment Marvolo could see true happiness in the grey eyes before the polite mask of a politician covered that emotion once again. “I’ll make sure to let Narcissa know of your well wishes.”

Aware that he had promised his sons – and especially Marcus – to call on the mirror this morning, Marvolo pushed himself to his feet. “Thank you for your hospitality, Lucius. I have to leave now.
Have a good day, you two.” He left the parlour and walked out onto the lawn, apparating from there directly to his own home. It was a nice spring day, and he really was curious as to what Marcus and Harry had gotten up to in the meantime.

Maybe Black would beg for him to come pick the boys up.

Only one way to find out.

oooOOooo

With a small sigh Harry let himself fall into one of the wicker chairs standing out on the patio with a good look over the garden. As he had predicted the first evening here at the cottage, Marcus hadn’t let him sleep in even one morning.

And today had been no different. After Marcus had managed to wake the whole house, they had had an early breakfast, and now they were all out in the garden enjoying a sunny if slightly chill morning.

Sirius, Remus, and Enora, as well as a reluctant Miss Moreau were entertaining Marcus with another game of chess – Marcus really liked watching the big pieces battle against each other – and Nawel was sitting in one of the other chairs out on the deck, writing in some kind of small notebook. Harry guessed it probably was a diary of some sort.

He had brought some revision cards as a voice in his mind – sounding suspiciously like Hermione – kept nagging at him to do at least a little bit of revising during the holidays.

Once he had cycled completely through the stack of cards of the plants and potion ingredients he had the most trouble with, Harry looked over to where the girl, who possibly was Sirius’ daughter, was still scribbling almost furiously in her book. He noticed with a little surprise that she was using something like a biro. He was so used to seeing people using quills by now that it really took him a moment to realise what it was.

“You’re not writing like... a really long diary entry, are you?” Harry asked and promptly blushed when he realised that that might have been an insensitive thing to ask.

“No, I’m not,” she answered, not even looking up from her work, sounding distracted.

Considering the possibility that she was doing homework for school just as he had done only a moment ago, Harry stayed silent and shuffled his cards into a new, random order.

“What are you doing?”

Harry turned to look at Nawel sitting there with her book closed in her lap. He smiled and neatened the pile of cards. “Repeating and revising for my OWL exams later on in the year. Mostly different plants, Herbology- and Potions-related information, and other potion ingredients, such as insects, stones, and the like. Mostly stuff you need to simply learn by heart.” He held the cards up, one side annotated with the Image of the plant or ingredient in question, the other filled with all the information and sometimes more sketches.

“Where did you get the cards?” she asked, holding out her hand with the silent question if she might have a look.
Harry handed the cards over. “I made them myself. And I like to think the act of making them helped me to learn at least parts of it. Gathering all the information and deciding what’s important enough to include. Well, the drawing part was fun.” That the rest had been tedious because his notes from years past had been in terrible condition better went unsaid.

“Neat,” was the comment Nawel gave when she handed the cards back, after checking a few of them out. Then she continued to talk, answering Harry’s question from the start. “I’m writing a story based on one of the books I like. Back at school such stories are passed around in the dorms. There simply are not enough fiction books available. And those that are have been read so often. What books do you like, Harry?”

She was writing her own story?

“No? I don’t really read much besides school books. Don’t really have the time. And I’m not even sure if the library has books that would count as fiction. I have borrowed a few books from friends. Not sure if I like any of those better than others.” Harry shrugged, he really didn’t have much fun reading. “A friend of mine, Hermione, would probably know if there are fiction books in the Hogwarts library. But she always seems to be having fun reading our school books, and others that are definitely not fiction.”

They both looked up when Marcus let out an unusually high-pitched squeal, clapping his hands as one pawn was smashed to rubble by a tower in the middle of the board. As far as Harry had noticed, Marcus was happy whenever a piece was destroyed, unrelated to what colour it was.

“When we learned that we had magic, Maman made sure to get us some children’s books. There was one that is pretty popular. It is about a girl learning she is a witch and how that changes all her plans. You see, she wants to be a detective once she is an adult. There always is a mystery for her to solve. I liked it. But there is no story about twins. Yet.” She fell silent, watching her sister direct one of the black pieces to catch a white pawn.

“So you changed the story to have twins instead?” Harry asked, thinking it an obvious change to make. He vaguely remembered dreaming himself away into stories the teachers had told them back when Dudley and he had started school. Did others do the same?

“Yes. And I like inventing stories. It is something we both have done all the time when we were small. Writing is fun!” At the end she had a big grin on her face.

Without any more word exchanged, the two of them returned to their work, pages turning and cards being shuffled around the only sounds from their spot on the patio, drowned out by loud cheering and laughing from the chess-playing group.

ooOoo

The moment Marvolo arrived at home, he placed the cup in a cupboard behind a closed door, uncertain what he wanted to do with it now that it no longer held a part of his soul. But at the moment, he had a call to make. The notes from Bill went into a warded drawer of his desk, later to be moved over to Headquarters, where all his notes were being kept. Then Marvolo picked up the mirror from the corner of his desk, where he had left it the previous day, and sat down in his chair, resting back comfortably for a call he expected to last quite some time.
“Harry.” Marvolo spoke to his mirror, hoping that Marcus wasn’t harassing people because he was impatient.

It didn’t take long before the reflective surface changed and Harry looked out of the mirror sporting a big grin. “Father! How are you?” Harry flinched and Marvolo could hear the sound of rubble falling in the background.

“I’m fine, Harry. Are you demolishing that cottage? I did work on making it habitable, you know, so please don’t tear it down.” There were shouts somewhere in the distance too, and something reminding him of a laugh somewhere nearer.

Harry’s grin only got wider. “Don’t worry. Marcus and most of the others are simply playing a game of chess.”

One of Marvolo’s brows winged up. A game of chess? With that much noise, the blasted enormous chess game Minerva McGonagall had contributed to Dumbledore’s gauntlet of protections came to mind. Hopefully even Black wouldn’t be that idiotic to let a child play such a set? “How big is it?”

There was no harm in asking his son.

“Relatively big. The pawns are shorter than Marcus, but the king and queen are bigger. He mostly stands by the side of the board, shouting directions.” the glint in Harry’s eyes made Marvolo think that his son might be thinking of the same set.

“Well,” Marvolo conceded, “that sounds reasonable enough.”

“I’ll go get him,” Harry said, seemingly standing if the hanging plants – something with a lot of green leaves – coming into view were any indication. “He was nagging all through breakfast that we call you.”

It was good to know that Marcus had wanted to see him, and that Harry and the adults at the cottage had managed to rein him in enough to get Marcus to play chess rather than moping around somewhere.

“Marcus! Dad is on the mirror!” Harry called and Marvolo felt something odd happening with his heart at hearing Marcus’ favourite way to address him come from Harry. It had been a big step when the boy had started calling him father even when the two of them were alone, but this was even… more.

“Come over! You wanted to talk with him!” There was some kind of answer that Marvolo didn’t understand, and then running feet as he had become accustomed to hearing almost every day since Marcus had moved in.

There followed a dizzing display of moving colours and shapes as the mirror was handed from Harry to Marcus, before the smiling face of Marcus came into focus. “Dad! Can we have a big chess set? It’s lot’s of fun! And I got to eat ice cream! And I share a room with Harry. That’s great! Can’t you come stay with us for a while?”

As usual the little boy was full of energy, and Marvolo felt himself agreeing with Nagini’s choice of nicknaming him bubbly hatchling. “I have to work, Marcus. But as Lord Black offered to take you and your brother on this little holiday, I thought it was a good opportunity for you two, even without me. We’ll be back together soon enough.”

Marcus was looking somewhere behind the mirror, obviously distracted by another chess piece being smashed to pieces, as the sound of falling rubble once again was clearly to be heard. “Go back to your chess pieces, Marcus. I can see that’s what you really want to do. Off with you!”
Marvolo felt himself grin as suddenly blue was all he could see in the mirror and a startled yelp – sounding like Harry – indicated that Marcus simply had let the mirror go.

“Sorry, Father,” Harry said once the mirror had been turned upright again. “Marcus really likes that chess set.”

Marvolo laughed. “I understand. Really, it’s nice to see that he's secure enough to have fun in this manner. How have you been?”

Harry rolled his eyes. “Marcus doesn’t let any of us sleep in. I've managed to get some revising in.
Sirius clearly likes having me here. And I’m looking forward to the paternity test that will be done this afternoon. I hope Sirius will be more at ease once that's cleared up.” Harry looked to someone or something before switching to Parseltongue. :But please tell me how the ritual went. You look well enough, so I assume nothing major went wrong. But I would like to hear it from you:.

Assuming that Harry had switched to a language so few spoke because there was someone in earshot, Marvolo answered in the same language. :It went better than the last attempt. The container remained unharmed. Bill made some suggestions on how to further adjust the process:. Happy to indulge Harry’s interest and curiosity – and always aware how Albus’ tendency to keep the boy in the dark had made his own job so much easier – Marvolo went deeper into the proposed changes and when he hoped to do another test.

ooOoo

Not for the first time, Nawel tried to decide how it would have been to live surrounded by dementors while being innocent of the crimes accused of. Sirius Black, the man she dearly hoped actually was their father, was playing over at the chess set, her mother only looking on with a frown. It really was a puzzle why she was so harsh. Hopefully Harry Potter-Slytherin – or was it Slytherin-Potter? – was right that the test planned for this afternoon would lay all doubts to rest.

He now was speaking in hissing noises with his adoptive father through an enchanted mirror, making her wonder why he stayed here if he wished for privacy for this conversation. Then her eyes wandered over to where two wand-waving wizards set the chess board back to rights, a small boy dancing up and down right next to it. She could understand a sibling’s urge to protect the younger one. She had felt it often enough when someone had attacked Enora, and had seen it at school when siblings stood up for each other even when they were squabbling most of the time.

She supposed she could overlook the rudeness of speaking in a different language while sitting at the same table under these circumstances.

Twirling her biro around her fingers, Nawel looked back down at her story and tried to pay no mind to the hissing happening only a short distance away. She didn’t want to ponder possible developments after this afternoon. Harry and Marcus were a good example how gaining a father later in life could play out. She really hoped Enora and she would be as lucky.

ooOoo
Two potions in similar small cauldrons bubbled over their flames, waiting for the last ingredients to be added. They stood far enough from each other that the twins had had enough space to work, as this was a rather quick brew, as Harry remembered only too well.

Nawel tended to the potion on the left, Enora was brewing on the right. Their mother was watching the whole procedure like a hawk. Or maybe like Hedwig watched Pigwidgeon when forced to stay in the little owl’s presence. Wary of what might happen.

The table was littered with containers of ingredients, two cutting boards, pestle and mortar, a set of scales and weights, peelings, and the two copies of the recipe.

“Come, Harry, get my hair,” Sirius said, sitting down on a simple stool so that Harry would have an easier time plucking two hairs from his godfather’s head.

Harry carefully picked up one hair at a time – he remembered none too fondly how Piers once had gotten a good hold of his hair – intent to cause the least amount of pain he could manage. Harry was pretty sure that the eyes of everyone in the room were on him when he walked over to where Enora and Nawel were waiting by their cauldrons.

He dropped one hair into the dark rolling mass inside the first cauldron and walked over to the other while Enora started stirring in even motions. Once he had dropped the second hair he turned and watched as the dark potion became clear, ready for the hair from the two girls to be added.

Those hairs the girls plucked from their heads themselves, letting them fall into the potions almost at the same time, holding each other’s gaze.

Harry felt as if the tension in the room was high enough to use as a bowstring. He shook his head to get rid of the image of Robin Hood – Marcus was fascinated by that story at the moment – concentrating instead on the colour of the potion in Nawel’s cauldron. The cauldron was bigger than the one he had used last year when he had performed this test for Dean and Sirius, so it was barely visible from where Harry was standing.

Slowly the colour was changing, with each turn of the ladle a little bit more and soon Harry was certain that the colour was a deep red and not the milky white it had turned when Dean had been tested to see if Sirius was his father.

A gust of air left Sirius, who had stood up the moment Harry had moved over to the first cauldron, and he slumped for a moment before breaking out in a grin. “Seems as if Harry didn’t bungle the repair of the family tapestry! Welcome, both of you, to the Black family, Enora, Nawel! Let’s clean up and then go get lunch.”

Harry was happy that the tapestry had been proven true, but he wasn’t as caught up in that revelation as Sirius was. He could still feel the tension in the air, saw the stiffening in Mrs. Moreau’s posture, the looks of mixed feelings on the girls’ faces. Even with the claim validated, there still was something to sort out.

If Harry only knew what the problem was.

Deciding to tip Remus off about what he had seen, Harry walked over to the table, starting to gather the ingredients into the basket they had used to carry them here.
“Let’s go play chess!” Marcus called out, jumped up from his place at the table, raced over to one of the twins, grabbed her by the arm, and started dragging her towards the door to the garden. The little boy had been obsessed with the chess pieces almost as tall as he since he had seen them the first time. And now he insisted they play with them when he didn’t want to fly on a broom together with Harry.

Harry and the other twin – Sirius had to work on his ability to tell them apart – stood from the breakfast table with a little more dignity before following the other two out, waving back at the adults.

The tension still wasn’t gone.

Sirius picked up his cup of coffee and took a sip, only to make a grimace when he noticed that it had gotten cold. He cast a quick warming spell and then emptied the cup quickly.

“Me and Harry against you and your sister!” Marcus gleefully yelled, only to be corrected a moment later by one of the girls: “Harry and I.”

Remus gave Sirius a significant look before he stood, picking up the local newspaper. “If you’ll excuse me, I really want to fill in that crossword puzzle.” And with that, Sirius was alone with Olivienne.

The evening before, everyone had retreated back to their rooms pretty quickly, and Remus had come to talk with Sirius. His friend had a way of seeing a situation from so many perspectives that it made Sirius dizzy just thinking about it. But one thing had become abundantly clear: he needed to talk with the mother of his daughters, find out what made her fear this, and make sure she could lay those fears to rest.

Nothing had ever been easier.

Taking a deep breath, because starting to cackle hysterically wouldn’t help, Sirius sat up straighter.

He would need all his Gryffindor bravery for this.

“I’m not sure what I can do to make you less tense, Olivienne. But know that I wish things had gone differently. I should have drunk less that night. I really wish I could remember, and I don’t even know if that’s the case because of my long Dementor exposure or the amounts of alcohol I consumed at that time. I wish that you could have had the option of including me in our daughters’ lives. I wish I had been involved in their lives.” He took another deep breath and looked at Olivienne, who sat at the other end of the table, a croissant broken in two held in her hands. “I know that I can’t undo what happened. But I would hope to offer both Enora and Nawel all the opportunities they could wish for.”

Had she let him jump through hoops?

Probably. He was almost sure she had.
Was it possible she would demand and keep on demanding more and more?

Not impossible. But also not likely. She was proud to have reached the place she was in now her own.

Did it matter?

No.

As long as he got to be a part of his daughters’ lives, and they could choose on their own whether they wanted to take up the mantle of Lady Black, he would be happy.

“As I said before, there will be no pressure from me. You can ask anybody, I never wanted to be Lord Black. Why would I force my own children to be what I didn’t want to become? But how could I keep that possibility from them?”

Still she was not saying anything, only shredding the poor croissant into smaller and smaller pieces.

“So I want to keep writing letters. Meet during holidays. Teach them what they need to know if one of them wants to take over as Lady one day. I’ll handle the paperwork with the Ministry so they are eligible to inherit. And I’ll set up trust funds as a nest egg for when they have finished school…”

Sirius trailed off. He had expected some dialogue here, maybe even that he wouldn’t get a word in edgewise. Not this silence.

The room stayed silent for a while, only the sound of stone smashing against stone, and happy calls from the four children reaching their ears. But Sirius couldn’t stand silence for long, so he caved pretty soon and asked. “Won’t you say something?”

“I’ll lose them, won’t I?” She sounded broken, so different from what she had shown so far. “Now that they have actual family in that world of magic, I’ll lose them even sooner.”

Sirius blinked, rearranging what he had thought was the problem. Well, he could make sure the girls had all they needed to stay in contact with their mother.

“It’s always possible that children sever the contact with their family.” He should know, as he had done exactly that. “But cost won’t be an issue any longer. International portkeys may be expensive, but they’re easily in the budget I have. The girls can go home to you for all their holidays if you can’t come here.” He shrugged. “If you’ll let me, I’ll be there too, bringing what’s needed so I can teach politics and stuff to them. I could pay for plane tickets so you can come to London.” Maybe he shouldn’t concentrate only on money. “From what I have seen and what the two have written, they love you very much. Having a stronger bond to the magical world won’t change that, Olivienne. I’m sure of that. We can sort this out.”

She nodded slowly. “Maybe you are right.” And started to dunk her croissant shreds into a pot of strawberry jam one after the other, eating them directly from her hand.

Sirius decided then and there not to bring up Remus’ idea to write everything down in a contract just now, or maybe not at all that day. It seemed they all probably needed some more time to adjust to what they all had somehow known now being confirmed without a doubt.

oooOOooo
The waiter brought them their waffles, as well as cups of delicious-smelling tea and coffee. Sonja carefully picked up the small sugar dispenser – one of those you needed to turn on its head to get what amounted to a teaspoon full of sugar – and added four measures of sugar to her cup. She had been craving sweets lately.

Severus had asked for honey for his coffee and had earned a horrified look, but got his honey to stir into his coffee.

Their host for the last few days, Yorik van Leewuen, was sitting on the other side of the square table, grinning from ear to ear. “I have to say that I haven’t had such a good time working on a project for a long time.” He raised his cup of coffee as if he was toasting them. “Thank you both for asking me, of all people, to help with the bigger testing.”

“We have to thank you,” Severus insisted, setting his spoon down with a tinkling sound, before getting out his wand to cast a privacy spell around their table. “Without your expertise in tests on the scale required for our family connection potion, we would have been looking at a much longer time before we had any publishable results.”

“But it takes innovative thinking to even get this far! Ever since the goblins forced that treaty, people actually risking research in this direction are more than rare, Severus. This potion certainly will not replace the one the goblins offer, but one might actually save money if doing this test first proves that there is no close connection.” He turned his plate so that the sea of cherry sauce was closer to his hand, giving them both another blinding smile. “And with the way prices have gone up… Rumour has it that the demand in Britain has sky-rocketed?”

Sonja took a sip from her tea to hide her smile at that blatant attempt at fishing for information. Even the first-year Slytherins were more subtle than that.

Severus swallowed his bite of waffle and smiled his little secretive smile. “I assume you have heard of Lord Slytherin returning to society?” Severus asked, and Sonja quickly looked down to her own plate at that gigantic understatement. It sounded so harmless in comparison what really had happened. But Yorik smiled and nodded, so Severus continued with his explanation. “He discovered that a student of Hogwarts is a descendant of the Slytherin family through his mother, who was considered a muggle-born witch. Understandably that caused some curiosity among the witches and wizards in our community.”

“Really? A muggle-born witch? Are you sure? There have been other cases of so-called muggle-born children who really were the result of affairs with a wizard.” The willowy, balding wizard had a secretive air about him as if he was sharing a big scandal with them.

“I’m sure, as I knew her in school and she looked too much like both her non-magical parents to be anything other than their daughter.” Sonja heard the well hidden hurt in her husband’s voice and let one of her hands slide under the table to rest on his knee. On some days the loss of his one-time best friend hurt more than on others.

“That would be an incredible discovery. Do you know of other such cases?” There was a light shining in his eyes that Sonja couldn’t quite identify.

“I know of two more, but as you said, the demand increased significantly, and the wealthy families have an easier time affording the increased fees.” Severus gave a shrug and another smile, diverting the conversation back to their Family Connection Potion and the timetable for the planned test series.
They would return to Scotland the day after tomorrow. Sonja had enjoyed almost every minute of this trip, but she also looked forward to sleeping in her own bed once again.

With a bracing breath, Dora walked up the way from the gates to the imposing building among high hedges – just now starting to sprout small blossoms – going through the questions she was going to ask. The paper-plane howler Percy had managed to freeze had proven that someone from inside the Ministry had created that explosive missile, feeding them in at one of the bigger offices in the administrative departments. The makeup of the thing also had confirmed that the howler hadn’t been bought anywhere, but had been home-crafted in its entirety. That did explain why Dora hadn’t found any hints by checking in with the usual suppliers. The report the Unspeakables had done spoke about impurities diverging from the usual recipe used for howlers, indicating that these had been crafted by someone other than the known suppliers. Maybe that could be a new trail to follow.

But now she was here to inquire after the Howler attack with howlers that had taken place the day before yesterday at Malfoy Manor.

Taking one last breath, straightening her posture and her auror robes, Tonks reminded herself that she was here with the Ministry’s authority backing her, and that she had been assigned to this case because she was capable.

The door opened and an elf stood there looking up to Dora, the toga made from a tea-towel blindingly white. “Miss Auror. What shall Mipsy tell Master why Miss Auror is here?”

“I’m here in an official capacity to investigate the incident with a number of Howlers this past Tuesday,” Dora answered, trying to infuse her voice with a tone of authority. It was still disconcerting when an elf opened the door.

“Come in, Miss Auror,” the elf said in its high-pitched slightly squeaky voice, and Dora did as she as told, coming to stand in a much-too-grand entry hall. What was it with those pretentious buildings? What other value did those materials and vast spaces have, other than bragging and intimidating visitors?

Well, she could at least attest that the intimidating part was working. Which made her feel slightly angry, not a good state to be in when one was working.

The marble floors had another effect. She heard steps – hurried steps – come closer before she could see the person walking towards her.

“Auror Tonks.” She was greeted by the head of the House coming down one hallway, his casual robes billowing around him. “Thank you for coming.”

Dora was surprised at being thanked for coming. She knew all too well that usually Lucius Malfoy faced Auror visits with only barely hidden contempt. Maybe the difference was that this time he had requested someone to come over and had not been checked based on Death Eater allegations, or suspicions over illegal dark artefacts.

“It’s our job to investigate incidents just like the one you reported, Lord Malfoy.” And didn’t calling him that leave a bad taste in her mouth, “Congratulations on your new daughter.”
He accepted her words with a smile, which probably was actually genuine. “I thank you for allowing an additional day of rest for my wife.”

Dora gave another nod back to that. It was custom not to disturb a home with a newborn in it with politics or business in the first few days. Her superiors never would have let her come here before the time was up. “There wasn’t anything to be lost by waiting a little bit longer.” And there sure hadn’t been a chance to get more information from coming earlier. But Dora knew if she wanted to make it into a leadership position, she would have to get over her aversion to handling politicians like Malfoy. Politics was very much a part of any leading position in the Ministry.

“Please follow me to the parlour, Auror Tonks, I’ll be answering your questions there.” Malfoy made a sweeping motion with one arm, indicating the way to the parlour, falling into step with her once she had taken a few steps.

They were silent on their way, Dora arranging her questions into the most efficient order to get out of here as fast as humanly possible. There was already tea waiting for them when they reached their destination and settled down.

“So, you wrote in your letter to the Minister that there was a great number of Howlers impacting with your wards, being destroyed, on the 9th of April. Is that correct?” She hoped she would get away without tacking Lord onto every second sentence. Malfoy might have been a Lord of the Wizengamot, but she really didn’t like him much. Her mother’s bias in the past might have contributed to that, but it was a hard feeling to get rid of now.

“That is correct,” was the short but polite answer.

Dora would have loved to roll her eyes, but she had to be professional here. “Can you tell me who-all was here at that time?” She had started to compile lists of people present at the incidents in the hope of narrowing it down to a common target. The first attack on the Daily Prophet hadn’t helped much – too many people worked there – and there hadn’t been any people in the Minister’s office, or the antechamber, who also worked at the paper. Maybe a third group of people would help in finding a pattern.

“Besides my family, Healer Malcolm Greengrass, Curse-Breaker William Weasley, and Lord Slytherin were here.” He offered no explanation for that interesting mix of people, and Dora used her time writing those names down in her notebook to get her bearings back, thinking about what to ask next.

That wasn’t totally obvious or rude, anyway.

She knew she had been silent too long when he set his cup of tea down and sat back, lacing the fingers of his hands over his knee. “We have an old ritual room in the Manor, that we let friends of the family use from time to time. It really is a good place to meditate.” It was totally legal to have ritual rooms, but Dora just knew that the one here would have been put to nefarious uses. “Healer Greengrass studied abroad and knows a few unusual rituals for diagnostic purposes. Lord Slytherin said he wanted to get a check done that the curse of the past and the way he regained a body don’t have undesirable long-term effects.”

It almost sounded as if it could be true. She certainly would feel the need to check to make sure that everything was fine if she had been brought back by such an incompetent wizard as Pettigrew had been described to her. “Thank you for the information. Am I right to assume that all three of them stayed for longer than a few minutes before the Howlers arrived?”

“That was the case,” he nodded, still giving off an air of nonchalance.
“You also wrote that you would check for any Howlers which might have survived. Did you find one?” The text of the Howler Percy had frozen had been vague, angry rambling and threats addressed to the Minister, not really helpful in pinning down a reason for those attacks.

“I did not. The wards around the manor simply are too well crafted, I fear.” Sure he would say that, but she had to accept this, as they would not get permission to search the premises without the owner’s consent.

But maybe... “Would you allow some experts to search the boundaries of your wards for any possible hints?” There was no real harm in asking.

“I have no objections, but I think it would be a waste of your resources,” he agreed far too easily.

“Then I will send you an owl to arrange a date, Lord Malfoy.” There, she had been polite, and now it was time to leave. She had all she was going to get here for the moment. Next she would go talk with Bill. Maybe he could tell her more. She really was curious how that particular event could have taken place.

Friday, 12th of April 1996

It was early, but as he was going to pick up his sons later in the day, he had decided to meet up with Amelia as soon as she said she would be in her office. She had been vague in her letter that had reached him the evening before and now Marvolo was pondering what she might have in mind that needed a meeting at the Ministry. The Wizengamot meeting of this month wasn’t for some time, and there wasn’t anything of great consequence planned for it anyway.

Greeting people recognising him with friendly nods, Marvolo made his way to the Department of Magical Law Enforcement, quickly dodging a loudly protesting wizard pulled along by his arm by an annoyed-looking Auror as he stepped into the big office with its open floor plan.

Amelia was already there when Marvolo reached her office and knocked on the open door to make his presence known. “Good morning, Amelia.”

“Marvolo!” She said in surprise, looking up from something she had been reading on her desk. “You’re here early. But come in, sit down! Do you want tea?”

“Yes please.” Marvolo agreed, walking in and closing the door behind himself. With a ripple he felt the wards built into walls and door take effect. No one would be able to listen in on what they would be talking about.

Whatever that was going to be.

So Marvolo sat down, his casual robes and suit under them making sitting down pretty easy. Some of the more conservative cuts either were pretty restrictive, or they were so loosely cut – and usually were worn without any undergarments – that Marvolo preferred to wear the more modern open robes, or duelling robes specifically cut to allow as much movement as possible while also offering support to some parts of his anatomy.

When they both were comfortable and had a cup of tea, Marvolo added two more spoons of sugar to his tea, and fixed Amelia with a sharp look. “You were pretty unclear what exactly you wanted to talk with me about today, Amelia. So, what’s this about?” He took a sip of his tea and then decided that it could use a little more sugar still.

Amelia watched with a raised brow as he added another spoonful to the cup, not commenting on it, but leaning back in her chair. “I wanted to ask you to help me out with setting up a few training scenarios for the Auror training programme and maybe compose some for the final exam as well.”
For a moment Marvolo stared at Amelia, the spoon held aloft just before touching the saucer, trying to make sure he had heard correctly. Had the ritual messed with his perception of reality?

“I’m sorry. You want me to help write final exams and training missions?” He wasn’t sure if he remembered a time he had sounded that confused.

Amelia actually had the audacity to chuckle at him, and his half-hearted glare only served to escalate her chuckles to a short laugh. “I’m sorry, Marvolo. You look just too funny. It seems pretty far-fetched for me to ask you for help in this. But I think you actually are a pretty good candidate. For years the same people have written the exams and training scenarios. A few days ago I got confirmation that some of the younger Aurors seem to have been selling solutions of a kind to the new trainees. I had hoped you could shake things up a bit. Maybe even broaden the training a bit. You know more about what they might face should a new danger make an appearance.” She shrugged, picking up her own cup.

He settled back into his chair, placing the spoon down. “That sounds…” He blinked and thought this through as quickly as possible. It certainly would look good for the public, and would get him more influence, “intriguing, Amelia. Are you sure I’m qualified? And are there requirements for those exams that I would need to follow?” He couldn’t very well model those exams or training after what he had subjected prospective Death Eaters to, could he? Maybe a few, but not with the same focus on dark curses and the Unforgivables.

“There are a few standards that are checked in the final exam, and a few points included in different training scenarios. I can get you a copy of the lesson plans. But I want you to come up with something that’s out of the normal, a challenge.” Amelia looked smug, sipping at her tea.

Slowly shaking his head, Marvolo smirked. “What is the Minister going to say? And the other Department Heads? You’re sure this is a wise move?”

She gave a decisive nod. “I’m not aiming for the position as Minister. And this certainly is the best for the Auror Corps. So do you agree to help?”

He wasn’t really sure that this would work out, but it was something to do that wasn’t paperwork. That alone would have been a good reason to help. Besides the possible political gain, in influence and standing, of course.

“Then let me show you the list of typical topics covered in exams.” Amelia said, grinning like a cat that got the cream, as she got a roll of parchment out of a drawer of her desk.

Resigned to listening to a long explanation, Marvolo moved to have a better look at the writing.

ooOoo

Tonks had picked up Bill from the front, and the two of them were walking past Madame Bones’ office when the door opened and Lord Slytherin stepped out, happily chatting with the Head of the DMLE.

“Marvolo!” Bill spoke up, drawing Lord Slytherin’s attention.

“Bill! Here to help in the search for the one – or the group – sending all those howlers?” the deceptively young-looking wizard asked of the wizard who was as young as he looked.
“Yes. Even though I’m not sure how I’ll be able to help, as I was inside the ritual room the whole time. But I’m not the auror here, am I?” Dora had to keep herself in check not to stand there with her mouth hanging open in shock at how familiar those two seemed to be with each other.

“Well, I don’t want to keep you from answering Auror Tonks’ questions then.” Slytherin turned back to Madame Bones where she stood in her office door. “I’ll send you my first drafts in a few days. Is that soon enough?”

Dora’s boss nodded with a smile. “That’s early enough, Marvolo. Don’t let us delay you.”

And before Dora could get herself fully under control again, Madame Bones had closed her door, Lord Slytherin had wandered off out of the Department, and Bill was grinning at her.

“Are you going to ask your questions right here?”

“No,” Dora shook her head, gesturing for him to start walking again. “We’ll go over to my desk.”

It was a short walk, but long enough for Dora to get her spinning thoughts to stop. It certainly seemed as if the one-formerly-known-as-Voldemort had managed to get a foot down to the ground. It seemed less and less likely that he was just playing at being reformed. But how this all added up was still a mystery. Maybe not being close to the man was the reason she still expected him to relapse into his old ways.

“Sit down,” she invited Bill with a wave at the visitor chair, before she let herself fall into her own chair, which moved a little. It was one of the fancier models with a hovering charm integrated. Not unlike the muggle office chair her father was using in his office at home. “Can you explain,” she waved an empty hand in the air, “all that to me? How did it happen that you were at Malfoy Manor?”

Bill took his wand in hand and waved a few runes into the air. Dora felt some wards settle into place but didn’t comment. With what she had learned as a member of the Order of the Phoenix she knew there was reason to be cautious.

“I was there to help Marvolo with a ritual. He came to me asking for a second opinion. As I have worked with the goblins and in Egypt, he knew I have insight that would be helpful.” What did Egypt have to do with all that? Malfoy had said that it had been a ritual to make sure there were no lingering ill effects… had this to do with horcruxes?

Bill continued to speak, probably having a lot of answers he wasn’t willing to give in any way usable in court. She would have to draw her conclusions from his vague hints. “He helped me clean up the old cottage Sirius owns in France. You learn a lot about someone when you work together that closely in such a dangerous place. I hadn’t had that much fun since I switched to a desk job in London. And helping with this will benefit Harry in the end.”

At that Dora looked up, meeting Bill’s steady gaze.

Helping Harry.

With a cold feeling running down her spine, she remembered how the Headmaster had told the whole order of his suspicion that Harry was a horcrux and needed to die before Voldemort could be killed permanently. “By helping Lord Slytherin to monitor his health, you help the children he has adopted?” This question in her report wouldn’t raise any questions with her colleagues. They really should keep the existence of the horcruxes from the greater public. Those still unhappy with the second chance for the man might target Harry if they knew.
“Exactly.” Bill nodded with a smile. “And getting the input of a curse-breaker and a healer who has been learning the old diagnostic and healing rituals is only sensible. After all, Lord Slytherin was subjected to an ancient and mostly forgotten curse, and then resurrected through a newly adapted ritual.” Dora was sure there were a lot of hints in that explanation that she might not pick up on. But there were enough she could see clearly.

Bill was working on creating a ritual that somehow would help Harry in getting a piece of soul stuck in his forehead out without hurting him.

She was good with that.

With the why explained, Dora switched her questions over to a probably useless line. “Did you get any howlers in the last few days?”

Bill shook his head. “No, nothing. I didn’t even know about those howlers until Lucius Malfoy came to ask if they had a negative influence on the ritual.”

“Do you know of any reason why someone might want to send you a howler?”

“Not really. Maybe if someone knew of the kind of friendship between Marvolo and me. But until now, almost no one even had an inkling about it.” Bill shrugged.

Dora nodded. She hadn’t expected that Bill would help her understand the one sending all those howlers. But he had been able to explain to her what had been going on at Malfoy Manor that day.

“Thank you, Mr. Weasley. I’ll be in contact if there should be any more questions.” They both rolled their eyes at that cliché closing line of an interrogation.

“You’re welcome. I’m happy to help,” Bill said, stood, and blinked before he left.

With a sigh Dora got out a form and started to fill in the information from the short conversation she just had had. Maybe the spell for fingerprints would yield some results. She could use some new leads.

“...I don’t wanna leave!” Harry made a grimace at the heights Marcus’ voice could reach seemingly without even trying. Marcus had been the first to leave for breakfast, and now Harry stood here at the top of the stairs right next to Enora and Nawel.

The twins weren’t really looking happy either. The three of them looked at each other, as Marcus started to scream over Sirius’ attempt to soothe him. Two pairs of brown eyes and one pair of green met, all of them unhappy with the idea of going down to join the others.

Nawel tilted her head to the side, flinching as something sounding like glass broke downstairs, and mimed for Harry and her sister to follow her, carefully placing her left foot on the first step.

Not really sure what Nawel was planning, Harry followed her down the stairs carefully, glad that they had been repaired so not one of them made a sound as the three of them tiptoed down. At the foot of the stairs Nawel turned away from the room they normally ate in and towards the way to the garden. Harry and Enora followed.
Waiting in the garden until Marcus had calmed down sounded like a good idea to Harry. Maybe it was cowardly of him to avoid his little brother while he was having a big tantrum. But Harry was pretty sure he had no idea how to help and didn’t wish to make it any worse. So he followed the twins to the backdoor and out into the garden.

When the girls walked to the edge of the property and Marcus was still easy to hear, Nawel ducked under one branch of a small tree – slipping through a small gap in the fence right at the trunk – and left the garden for a stretch of wild meadow, heading for another hedge which was surrounding another house, judging by the roof that Harry could see. He hesitated a fraction of a second at the edge of the property. The wards did end here. But who even knew that he was here in France? Why should there be any risk?

Enora followed her sister through the hole in the fence, giving Harry a mischievous grin as she slipped by him.

Trying to convince himself that there was no need to be a stick in the mud – there was no one around who could pose a problem – Harry slipped through the pretty narrow gap and fell into a short run to catch up to the girls. “Where are you going? We can’t just go into somebody else’s garden.”

“Haven’t you noticed that there is no one here besides us?” Nawel said over her shoulder, not slowing down.

Harry had to agree that it looked like there weren’t many people around here. For one thing, the houses stood wide apart, and all of them were summer homes, as it was spring the homes were empty.

That was also pretty obvious in the garden they entered. The grass was long, the beds unkempt, old half-rotten leaves were piling up in several places, and a tarp was draped over something large. Nawel walked over to the big structure, pulling on the tarp. “Come on help me, you two.”

Enora picked up one edge the moment her sister asked her to help. Harry once again hesitated, before doing the same. He wasn’t really keen to sit on the slightly damp grass. As long as it was, it would take longer to dry, if it even did.

They folded the tarp roughly and sat down on the three-seater swing that was comfortable enough, even without the pads, that they could stay a while.

“How long do we stay? We didn’t get any breakfast,” Harry asked, feeling that Ron would mock him for being unhappy with leaving the warded area without telling an adult, but his friend probably would agree with his wish to have a hearty breakfast.

“A while,” Nawel answered, kicking her legs carelessly, the picture of unconcerned laziness.

“Are you in a hurry?” Enora wanted to know.

Harry shrugged, feeling awkward. It had been a while since he had disregarded the rules. And even then it mostly had been to get something to eat at the Dursleys’, or to help someone out each year at Hogwarts.

“Will we see you again over the summer?” Enora asked, just dismissing the question of if and when they were going to go back to the cottage.

Harry shrugged. “I’m sure that I’ll visit my godfather over the holidays. We surely can coordinate our visits to see each other if you want.” It had been fun spending time with the two, and it would probably be fun to get to know them better.

“Is there a place in London you think we should visit?” Enora asked, clearly sensing the tension in the air and trying to defuse it.

“There's Diagon Alley. The shops there are great. I especially like the ice-cream parlour. I’ve never seen more different and crazier flavours in one place! I did spend several weeks there just before my third year. And my owl Hedwig is from one of the shops there.” Harry really wished he could find the words to adequately describe how great it had been to walk into Diagon Alley for the very first time. Or how much fun it had been to stay in the Leaky Cauldron all on his own, freed from his relatives. But without the proper words, he shrugged again. “Knockturn Alley is there as well, but I’m pretty sure your mother wouldn’t be happy to have you explore there. That area has a really bad reputation.” He shrugged again, not feeling all that comfortable. Why had he agreed to come here?

“And how is the house there in London? Sirius said that he is still working on repairs and stuff.” Nawel asked next, flipping her braids over her shoulder.

“It’s old.” How to describe the house without making it sound too bad? “And it was standing empty for years before Sirius moved in. He's already done a lot. But he started with the rooms most frequently used. So there is still a lot more to do.”

Birds were singing in a hedge near them, and there was a sweet fragrance of spring flowers in the air. The sun was warming their spot nicely. And despite all that, Harry was tense and trying to ignore the feeling. It probably was because he was breaking the rules for the first time since… it felt like an eternity.

“Sirius told us. Asked what colours we want for our rooms there. He also said that you repaired the tapestry. How did you do that? I heard that such things are really complicated to create and even harder to repair.”

Harry remembered all the different people Sirius had asked and nodded. “Yes, all the experts told Sirius to just get a new one. But despite the fact that his mother had burned him and others on it off, he wanted it to be repaired.” Now that he had said it Harry wondered why Sirius hadn’t started with a new tapestry, but had wanted the old one repaired. “When I was visiting over Christmas he let me test something. It worked.” Harry shrugged again, feeling foolish doing it so often.

Enora moved her upper body so that her elbows rested on her knees, her eyes fixed on Harry. “And what did you test? Come on! It sounds as if you managed a miracle. But Sirius didn’t want to explain.” She put on a puppy face, with big eyes, that was so like the look Sirius could pull off that Harry had to grin against his better judgement.

Did he want to share this?

“Parselmagic. I have been reading about it since my last birthday. It’s family magic, and heavily based on intent and carefully picking the right words. I had the clear intent to restore the tapestry to what it had been before it had been damaged. So it was repaired again.” Harry shrugged, a little smug that he had managed that feat of magic, but also not really all that sure that he should talk about family magic. On the other hand, if he wasn't supposed to talk about it, he wouldn’t have been able to do so anyway. Maybe the general terms he had used were fine.

“Can you show us?” Nawel asked also moving forward so she had a better view.

Could he show them? The colour changing wasn’t all that difficult. But Marvolo had insisted that Harry wasn’t to experiment without competent adult supervision.

“We’re outside the wards. There’s a chance that the magic will be picked up. I don’t think I should.” And he really shouldn’t. There was a good reason why Marvolo had said Harry shouldn’t experiment on his own.

Before either twin could start wheedling as he could clearly see they wanted to, the screech of an owl drew their gaze towards the other end of the garden wilderness. It looked as if the owl was carrying a red envelope and as if it was flying in their direction.

Harry stiffened, and moved to draw his wand. That red was one he had seen before.

Everytime a student had gotten a letter from an angry parent as convinced as Mrs. Weasley that publicly shaming their children was a good way to make them regret whatever they had done, a letter in that particular shade of red had done the screaming.

“Shit!” Harry said with feeling, standing from the swing and moving away from the twins. It seemed as if the lunatic sending all those howlers might have been aiming for him as well. Because who else could possibly have a reason to send him a howler?

The owl changed course slightly and closed in on him, then let the howler drop right over Harry’s head.

And then it started screaming.

“How can you just forget that he killed your parents? Killed so many people! How can it be that everyone has forgotten? He’s a danger! He needs to be killed! And you, Harry Potter, are close enough to get it done!” When the howler ripped itself apart and exploded, a shield spell flared up around Harry, so he was only pushed to the ground and not flung across the garden like one of the empty flower pots.

“Merde!” Enora called out, and before Harry could catch up to what was happening, the three of them had run almost back to the Black summer cottage.

Harry was the first to slip through the gap and looked up, happy to be back under the protection of the excellent wards.

Just a moment later Harry registered that there were people in the garden. Beside Remus and Sirius, as well as the twins’ mother, Marvolo was standing there, carrying Marcus in his arms, a dark look in his blue eyes.

Harry felt himself blush, then looked down at his shoes – muddy after that run over the meadow – clenching his fists.

Great.

Now he had done it. Gotten himself into trouble. Again. Real trouble.

“Harry, where have you been?” Marvolo asked, his voice so mild that Harry just knew he had to be furious. Behind Harry the leaves of the tree rustled. “We were worried. You three vanished without informing anyone.” Harry moved his hand to grab the pendant he was wearing all the time. Marvolo clearly had been using the spell on the pendant to locate him. “Why are you out of breath and so pale?” There was worry in that voice.
Harry swallowed and looked over his shoulder to see Enora and Nawel stand there, looking a little puzzled. He turned back and stood tall. “We left for one of the neighbouring properties. Wanted to get away from the noise for a few moments.” It had been a bad idea from the start. How Harry wished he had stayed in the garden. “We didn’t go all that far. Then there was an owl, delivering a howler. It exploded. But the shield protected me. We ran back.” Harry shrugged and let go of the pendant.

“I see,” Marvolo said. “Is one of you injured?” Harry shook his head and assumed the others did the same, as Marvolo didn’t set Marcus down to reach for his wand. “Good. Lord Black, I’m sorry to cut the day short, but I hope you understand that I want to get my sons home.”

“I do understand that,” Sirius said, and Harry looked up in surprise. Sirius, one of the Marauders, behaving like a responsible adult? “I’m sure Harry didn’t want to cause any distress.”

Marvolo heaved a breath. “I know. But the fact that a howler was able to reach him at all, is reason for concern. He also is the only one who got to hear the howler. Or did it explode without saying anything?”

Harry looked up again – somehow his shoes did attract his gaze like magnets did iron – and answered in a small voice. “I did hear the content. As did Enora and Nawel. It was angry and male, I think.”

“Then we have to talk with the Aurors,” Marvolo stated before turning. “Say your farewells, Harry. We’ll be leaving in a few moments.”

Harry did as instructed. His stomach was doing funny somersaults. And the murmured “All will be well, cub,” from Sirius did little to soothe his nerves.

He really had been stupid.

ooOoo

On arriving at Griffin House Marvolo had sent Harry to wait in the study. He needed to calm down before he spoke with his older son about what had happened today.

“You go with Mrs. Peters and take a bath,” Marvolo said to Marcus, who was looking as if he would fall asleep any moment now. “And then you can request a story, and take a nap.” Marcus nodded, yawning, and Marvolo stood, inclining his head towards the nanny.

Marvolo watched as his young son followed his nanny up the stairs, looking back over his shoulder to check if his dad – it felt oddly nice being called that – was still there. Marvolo used the time it took Marcus to get up to the next floor to go through a few breathing exercises to calm down. When he had arrived at the Cottage – right after his meeting with Amelia at the Ministry – and Harry had been missing… The last time he had felt such a spike of fear… that probably had been the fraction of a second as his own curse had been heading his way in a flash of green.

But he really had to be reasonable about this. Harry hadn’t done anything really dangerous. He only had walked over to another garden. When he thought back to his own time at Hogwarts in his fifth year, and what all the others had been experimenting with, then Harry was almost too innocent. They had played with dark magic, had experimented with potions, recreational and poisonous. He had killed.
Really, sneaking out from the wards was harmless in comparison.

Hopefully he would remember that in a few moments.

Stepping into the study, Marvolo found a pacing Harry and the concerned looking portrait of Charlus Potter. Marvolo closed the door behind himself and cleared his throat as the carpet was too effective in dampening the sound of steps and he had no desire to startle his son by appearing behind him suddenly.

“I’m sorry! I know it was stupid to leave the wards. But I somehow didn’t want to be a bore, and it was easier to follow Enora and Nawel than speak up. And I didn’t see the risk. There was no one around, no one knew I was there. But what should have happened? And then… I know I was behaving irresponsibly. I broke the rules. Please don’t punish the twins! They didn’t do anything wrong! And, I don’t want to make excuses, but nothing really happened anything. Right? No one was injured…” Harry suddenly stopped, hands balled into fists at his sides, words struggling to be said.

“Take a deep breath, Harry,” Marvolo instructed, doing the same. Then he placed a hand on his son’s shoulder and guided him over to one of the chairs, sitting down in the other.

For a moment there was silence, only the crackling of the fire making a sound.

Calling to mind what he had planned to do, Marvolo carefully started to speak. “You did break the rules. You left without informing your godfather. And you knew that there was danger afoot.” He took another deep breath, working to keep his temper in check and not yell at his son who obviously already felt guilty. “You’re grounded for the rest of the holidays.” That wasn’t really all that long, but it would be enough in light of the situation. “And I’ll inform Amelia Bones about your encounter with the howler. I’m pretty sure she’ll want to talk with you. If that is the case, you’ll be allowed to go make a statement. Outside of meals, you’re going to stay in your room. And I want you to write me an essay. Why you went against the rules knowing them full well, and what you could have done differently. Any questions?”

Harry slumped down in his chair, all tension leaving him. “No, sir.”

Marvolo felt odd. There was a need he couldn’t quite identify. Harry was here, he was healthy. Was he still worried?

“I’m happy that you’re well, Harry.” Why was it so hard to say something simple like that?

And suddenly he had an arm full of shaking teenager. Marvolo tightened the hug, and the odd feeling gave way to something more pleasant. Relief. Maybe because his son wasn’t cross with him, or because he held the proof of Harry’s wellbeing in his arms.

“I’m sorry I made you worry,” Harry mumbled into Marvolo’s shoulder, tightening his hug some more.

“I is sorry, Master Marvolo,” Flimm spoke up haltingly turning the little paper over in his hands again and again.
“What is it, Flimm?” the wizard asked without looking up from his desk where he was working on something. Maybe a letter.

“Young Master Harry asked Flimm to bring a letter to young Miss Luna.” That made the wizard look up.

“He ordered you to play owl?” the wizard asked with a raised brow.

“Young Master Harry asked, politely.” Master Harry always asked. It was nice.

“Do you have other tasks?”

There always was something to clean, plants to tend to, but this was something new. “Nothing, Master Marvolo, sir.”

“Then by all means, you have my blessing to play owl for my son.” There was a small smile on the Master’s face and Flimm gave a bow before popping over the the funny shaped house to deliver his small burden. He was pretty sure that he would make this journey several more times this day.

Dora watched as Harry walked into the open-floor-plan office, closely followed by Lord Slytherin. Harry looked sullen. Not a look Dora had expected to see on a student’s face in the middle of the spring holidays. But considering that it was his fifth year, and OWLs were just around the corner, that face might be connected to that.

“Thank you for coming, Lord Slytherin, Harry,” Dora greeted the two, standing from her chair. Harry flashed her a short grin, and she would have sworn Lord Slytherin rolled his eyes at her.

“As my son has important information for your case, it is only right for him to come here and answer your questions,” Slytherin informed her, conjuring himself a second visitor chair with a short flick of his wand. Talk around the teapot and coffee table had informed her how many of the older Aurors felt about that wand. They all claimed the sight of it made cold shivers run down their backs. She didn’t have that problem, but it was a distinctive wand.

They all sat down, and Dora activated the privacy wards before getting out a form to write down the testimony. Doing that after the fact had proven to be harder than necessary. Maybe doing it at the same time would be better.

“What can you tell me about the howler?” Dora asked, concentrating on Harry while trying to ignore the looming presence of Lord Slytherin.

Harry took a deep breath and closed his eyes, visibly relaxing his muscles in shoulders and arms. Then he opened his eyes again and started to talk. “I was outside the wards, not really long, but I guess it made it possible for the owl to find me directly.” The boy took another deep breath and Dora realised that he was using breathing exercises taught in preparation for Occlumency training. Intriguing.
“The voice was male. He was yelling. But I guess that’s pretty normal for a howler. Isn’t it?”

“It is,” Dora said with a nod, hoping to keep Harry’s recollection going by quelching any hint of doubt.

“I can give you the exact words. It wasn’t long, and father helped me make a memory copy of it. In essence, it claimed that I should kill father. He was angry that everyone seems to have forgotten about the past. Stressed that people had been killed… Tried to make me feel guilty.” Harry fell silent, flexing his hands into fists repeatedly.

Dora set down her quill and reached a hand out to her young friend. Behind him Lord Slytherin was unusually pale. Was he feeling guilty as well? “You have done nothing wrong, Harry. The laws are clear on that, and the Wizengamot’s decision was as well.” Patting Harry’s arm awkwardly, Dora sat back in her chair, picking her quill back up.

What a dirty trick, guilting a teenager with the intent to make them hurt another human being.

“Do you remember anything about the owl? Anything unusual about it?” Better get this over with quickly, so that Harry could return home.

“No. Nothing special at all. Just like all the owls at school. Average size, brown. It was gone too quickly.” Harry shrugged.

“No worries. If the memory contains the delivery as well, I can get a good look at the owl. Do you have the copy here?” She directed this question to Slytherin in the assumption that he would have a phial or other container with the memory in it on himself.

And he did indeed slip his hand into his robes, holding a small crystal phial in his hand when he pulled it out again. “I have, and it does include the owl. But I have to agree with Harry, it was a pretty ordinary post owl.” The phial was levitated over to her and she added a label to the phial and added a reference to the form.

“I think that that’s everything? Do you want to tell me anything else?” Dora waited for a moment but got only a shake of Harry’s head as an answer. “Well, then you can go. But I ask that you inform me if you remember anything else, okay, Harry?”

“Okay,” Harry said with a sad smile, before standing like Slytherin. The messy-haired teenager turned to his adoptive father. “I guess that means back to my room again?”

Dora blinked and was on the verge of asking what that was about when she noted a sad smile on Slytherin’s face as well.

“You broke the rules, and grounding is the punishment for leaving the wards while you knew there was danger afoot. So yes, back to your room once we are home. I still am waiting for that essay.” Harry groaned but didn’t protest, which made Dora kind of happy. That looked like any normal parent-child relationship.

Harry waved in farewell. “Hope that’ll help, Tonks. Even though I don’t feel very helpful at the moment.”

Dora smiled at him. “Every bit is helpful. Now I have confirmation that it’s a male, and that Lord Slytherin is the likely target. That’s a lot of information, Harry. Don’t feel bad.”

She watched Harry and his adoptive father leave, feeling better about the whole adoption business.
The weather was nice like most days, and Albus ate his lunch – a dish he hadn’t had before which was built around chickpeas – listening to a lively discussion about the finer points of cricket two of his table neighbours were engaging in.

By now the healers were rather happy with Albus’ progress, and Albus himself was feeling much better. He took potions regularly and spent time with various activities – meditation, walks around the grounds and the like – that were offered and guided by the staff. He wouldn’t be returning to Britain, but he would have a nice quiet life here, in Egypt.

An owl screeched, and everyone looked up to where the noise was coming from. It let go of a violently red envelope, which hovered near Albus and formed an angry mouth, starting to shout. “YOU HAVE FAILED US! YOU SHOULD HAVE ACTED AS YOU DID THEN! I TRUSTED YOU! NOW THAT YOU HAVE ABANDONED US, ALBUS, I’LL HAVE TO ACT! YOU’RE USELESS!”

With that last word the letter, a howler – it had been some time since Albus had gotten one of those – didn’t rip itself to shreds as they normally did, but exploded.

Then people started screaming and running. Albus himself sat there with his ears ringing, trying to make sense of that howler.

Who had sent it? And why?

“Mr. Dumbledore?” Albus turned only now noticing that someone had tried to gain his attention for a while now.

“Yes?” It seemed as if he had lost more time than he had thought. The gardens where they often ate their midday-meal was almost empty by now. Someone, most likely healers and medi-witches and wizards, had herded the others back into the buildings.

“I asked if you were feeling well.” There was concern in the voice of the young healer at his side, making Albus smile.

“The ringing in my ears is almost gone. I hope no one was injured?” Realising that it could very well happened, Albus turned on his bench to look more directly at the healer and not out over the garden.

“A few slight burns because hot food was spilled. Nothing that wasn’t easy to treat. The Administrator asked me to get your confirmation that the authorities need to be informed about this howler. It sounded vaguely threatening to me.”

Albus nodded, his eyes once more wandering over the well tended gardens. “Yes, that was most unpleasant. That explosion could have done actual harm.” He frowned. “A normal howler doesn’t act that way.”
After the more or less excited morning, Harry sat in his room at Griffin House and was writing. Not the essay Marvolo had demand he write as part of his punishment, but a much shorter missive he was going to send to Luna.

His essay was long finished, coming to the conclusion that it had been peer pressure that had led to him leaving the wards. Harry hadn’t wanted to give a cowardly, boring explanation with Enora and Nawel. So he went along with their plan, even though he knew it wasn’t all that good an idea. He even had been actively searching for an excuse why it wasn’t the dumbest thing he had ever done.

He had sat there, quill hovering over the parchment, for quite a while as he realized that he hadn’t run into this situation at Hogwarts because all the people he interacted with and actually wanted to think good of him, knew of the rules and dangers and didn’t tempt him.

If Ron was any more of a rule breaker and the others not so efficient at keeping him in line, he probably would have broken more rules.

Not for the first time that afternoon Harry shook himself to wrench his thoughts away from that path. Marvolo wasn't making it hard for Harry to follow the rules – like providing guards so he could go to Hogsmeade with his friends – and that he now was sitting here, only allowed out for meals was, his own damn fault.

Harry dipped his quill into the dark blue ink he was writing with and continued his note to Luna after going over what he had so far.

Being stuck in my room certainly isn’t all that bad. I can’t fly, that’s true, but I can read, and write to you. And the holidays aren’t that long anymore. We’ll both be back at Hogwarts soon. And even with the ramping up of exam preparations we’ll spent time together. I’m looking forward to that.

It’s nice that your father has taken you exploring the woods in Ireland. Did you find what you were looking for? Maybe you can send me a sketch? Beside writing with you, I’ll work on my drawing skills.

Harry set to drawing a little sketch of Flimm with a letter at the end of his note, more or less carelessly shoving a number of notes to the ground. The whole desk was covered in them. They had been writing back and forth, sending sketches and short stories to the other. Luna was a great girlfriend, supporting him in his grounding.

Flimm seemed oddly happy about popping back and forth between Luna’s and Harry’s homes, playing owl. It was much faster than sending Hedwig, who was on her way delivering letters to Hermione and Ron anyway. It was sad that he wouldn’t be able to visit with his friends, but once again he was the only one to blame for that.

“What cans Flimm do for young Master Harry?” the elf asked after appearing in the room, as he had done every time Harry had called on him. By now Harry was reasonably sure the elf was having a lot of fun pretending not to know what it was that Harry wanted from him.
“If you have the time, could you please bring this note to Luna and wait for a reply?” There was a small twinkle in the big eyes of the elf and Harry was sure that Flimm amused himself with making Harry squirm.

“Flimm can does that, young Master Harry.” Flimm accepted the note and with another popping sound was gone from the room.

Harry got up from his chair, pacing the length of the room as well as was possible. By now he wished he could go out and fly a few rounds in the garden. At the moment neither Marvolo nor Marcus were even at the house.

No one would notice.

Marvolo had taken Marcus to Potter Manor to show him how to fly a broom on the grounds there. Harry wished he could be there, but he understood that Marcus really needed something to distract him from the fact that Harry wasn’t allowed to play with him in the garden.

He probably could go flying and be back in his room before his father and brother were back home, but Harry knew that it was a really bad idea.

Back at the Dursleys' it had been easier to stay in his room. But maybe that was because there was nowhere else he would rather have been, or would have done. Staying in his room always also meant staying away from Dudley, his aunt, and uncle.

Now the situation was different.

With a deep sigh, Harry let himself drop onto the bed, sitting down, and then threw himself back with his arms over his head so he was lying on the bed.

There might not be a lot of days left in the holidays, but he was sure even History with Binns would be a welcome change after being grounded.

Chapter End Notes

BlackSky83 brought up the idea of Harry getting in trouble with Marvolo, and I had a bit of trouble finding a spot where it would fit. I hope this feels natural and not forced.

It was rather late already and all his friends would have to leave soon, but for the moment they all were sitting on the various surfaces in the parlour nearest to his room. Theo was looking forward to being back at Hogwarts, even as the dreaded OWLs came closer and closer.

“Pass the pastries, please?” Vincent asked of Draco, who did so without commenting on the fact that a plate of small cubes of fudge was already next to him and Gregory where they were sitting, listlessly leaving through some older Quidditch magazines.

“How was your holiday?” Pansy asked of Daphne, after finishing her own account of her holiday, which had been pretty boring, as she had spent most of it at home preparing for the exams coming up.

“It was nice, if stressful. Do you know what exactly Harry did, Theo, to not be allowed to come?” Daphne suddenly asked from where she was sitting in a wingback chair, her legs dangling over the armrest, not exactly being subtle about changing the topic.

Theo gave her an unimpressed look. “He wrote that he left the wards around the summer home of his godfather, without telling an adult. And with that Howler stuff happening.” Theo shrugged.

Harry had written more in response to Theo’s invitation to this afternoon among friends, but Theo wasn’t about to share what his friend had written him in confidence. “It was inevitable that he would break one of the rules again. I think being grounded for the last three days of the holidays is a mild punishment.” That got a lot of agreeing noises from around the room, but not from Draco.

“I don’t know. Leaving the wards? We all did something like that thousands of times. Didn’t we? When I was younger i didn’t realise that there was an alarm every time I crossed the wardline. I never was punished for it. Were any of you?”

“But you were back quick. Right?” Pansy said, giving Daphne an eye-roll, earning herself a stuck-out tongue. “And there was no big target painted on your chest. Well, not as big a target as on Harry. And you were close to your own home. I think the situation now for Harry is different. There was more than one attack on him this school year!”

Theo nodded, as she was right. After all, the attacks on Harry had led him to ask for a re-sort in the first place. “Considering Lord Slytherin's reputation I would say being grounded sounds like a fair punishment to me.” He shrugged and noted with curiosity how Draco paled.
“Dad did tell some pretty gruesome stories.” Gregory suddenly put in, picking up the last pastry, not even looking up from his magazine.

Not one of them said more to that. There really wasn’t much point. They all had known for a long time now that the Dark Lord was a demanding master, and one fond of harsh punishments for minor infractions. Theo had nearly forgotten that Harry’s adoptive father and the Dark Lord were the same man.

“Come on, Daphne, tell us how your holidays have been! Clearly something interesting did happen for you to react by deflecting so clumsily,” Pansy steered the topic back to her friend and away from the absent Harry.

Daphne groaned, letting her head fall back. “You won’t shut up until I tell you, right?”

With a smug grin Pansy nodded, sitting up straight as she did in Potions, paying attention in an exaggerated manner. Daphne rolled her eyes, and moved to sit a little straighter herself. “You all know that we went to a lot of events all over the continent, right?” They nodded dutifully. “On one of those events there was an old Tahitian Warlock with his apprentice. He’s around our age.”

Draco quipped “Who, the warlock?” and got an evil eye for his trouble. Theo grinned.

“And far travelled. My parents were really happy when they noticed that he and I talked for quite some time.” Her smile got an edge – Theo was sure it was sharp enough to cut dragonhide – and her posture relaxed. “I’m curious what they will think once they learn that his parents are muggles. Diplomats. They were working in Australia, and on vacation, when their son had the first bout of accidental magic. The Warlock was there and saw everything. He has been teaching John the whole time since then.”

Theo felt one of his brows wing up at Daphne’s enthusiasm over the idea of her parents learning that they had given their permission for her to explore the possibility of a marriage with a muggle-born wizard.

“And you think it’s a good idea to not tell your parents?” Pansy wanted to know, an intense expression on her face, which Theo assumed was equal parts worry for a friend and curiosity.

Daphne shrugged. “He grew up with magic just like any of us. Got taught much more than any of us.” She made a sweeping hand gesture indicating them all, and all the others they went to school with. “He has travelled the world both with his parents and his master. He’s not the heir to a big family somewhere, he's neither too old, too young, or too stupid to be an interesting partner.” She shrugged again, clearly trying to project an image of relaxed disregard of her parents’ likely disapproval.

“I hope you know what you’re doing, Daphne,” Theo ended this weird cross between bragging and an interrogation, quickly thinking where to steer the conversation next. “Have you all prepared for the mandatory career advice meetings with Professor Snape?”

Draco rolled his eyes – well, maybe that had been as transparent a diversion as Daphne’s earlier – and answered. “I want to confirm that my information on the requirements for a Potions Mastery program is still accurate. Maybe he can give me some hints on which Master to approach for an apprenticeship. Not sure yet if I want to go with the more formal arrangement. It’s more restricting, but also traditional, so I’m a little torn.”

They went down the niffler burrow talking about different careers they were thinking of pursuing before they had to take over family responsibilities. Theo himself wasn’t all that sure, but considered curse-breaking, or enchanting objects, as likely possibilities.

Marvolo was staring down on the parchment laying on his desk, quill poised to write, unable to concentrate. On the big wingback chair next to the fire, Marcus sat on Harry’s lap, listening attentively to the story Harry was reading him.

Giving writing his proposal up as a bad job for now, Marvolo looked up to where Marcus had his head resting against Harry’s shoulder, Nagini curled around the legs of the wingback chair, her head up on Harry’s knee, as if she was listening.

“Amused, Babbitty agreed to help the muggle king in his wish to appear being able to wield magic. Declaring that she would hide in a bush, making the magic work.” Harry gave his best to make the reading of the fairytale as dramatic as possible, having a captivated audience in Marcus, who loved it whenever Marvolo read him a story – so almost every evening – doing different voices for the different characters in the story. The Fountain of Fair Fortune still was the favourite. In fact Marvolo had read it out loud so many times by now that he was sure if someone was to wake him in the middle of the night asking him to read The Fountain of Fair Fortune he would be able to do so without ever waking up properly.

As the story progressed and the statue was erected in remembrance of the proclamation of no harm ever again to magicals – and wouldn’t that be a wish come true? – Marcus was almost asleep in his brother’s arms.

With a smile on his face, Marvolo stood from his chair – placing the quill on the gilded tray next to the inkwell – and silently walked over to where Harry was struggling to manage the book, Nagini, and his little brother.

“Let me help you,” he said, taking the book from Harry and levitating it over to its usual place on a shelf, before bending his knees and back so he could more easily pick his younger son up from his slouched position on Harry’s lap.

“Thanks,” Harry breathed back, a somewhat forlorn look on his face as he watched Marvolo adjust his hands to hold Marcus more securely.

Tomorrow they would eat breakfast together and then they would take Harry to Kings Cross so he could board the Hogwarts Express to return to the castle. The last part of the school year was before them, and then the summer.

As Marvolo walked up the stairs, Harry following them, and Marcus snuggled close one hand clutching at the fine woollen robes, he recapitulated his plans. He wanted to perfect the ritual for the Horcrux extraction so that his son could go into his sixth year without the fragment of another’s soul lodged in his head. And he wanted to slowly progress on the political stage – slow more out of necessity than preference – as well as finish the book he was working on. There was no need to hurry on the book and other plans were more important, but it still was something he wanted to make constant progress on.

Settling his little boy into the bed in Marcus’ room – he had been ready for bed before Harry started reading that story – Marvolo sighed. Tomorrow had the potential to become a stressful day.
Marcus probably would be really unhappy with Harry's leaving again for school. In fact, it could go either way. How Marcus would react to a thing was really hard to predict. Relatively often Marvolo had thought Marcus would throw a tantrum over something just for it not to happen, and the other way around.

Marcus snuggled his snake plushy when Marvolo tucked him in under the blankets, before leaving the room to find Harry standing at the door. “Happy that grounding is over?” he asked, grinning a little.

Harry rolled his eyes, and mock glared. “Haha, very funny. I’m kind of looking forward to meeting my friends again. But on the other hand, there’s a lot of revision and stress coming up. Not really looking forward to that, if I’m honest.”

Marvolo closed the door – which made a slight sound as the latched slipped into place – and turned to look at Harry. “Will it make you feel better when I ask for your help over the first few weeks of summer to revise? I plan to take a few more OWLs and the NEWTs to the OWLs I already have, and revising with you would be helpful.”

Marvolo could see the moment when the initial confusion – clearly visible on Harry’s face – change with dawning realisation when his son remembered that Dumbledore had made sure he would lose all his academic achievements in his new start as a citizen.

“Sure!” Harry agreed, and then grinned. “What do I get if I make notes on the questions we get asked during the exams?”

That made Marvolo laugh out loud, quickly muffling the sound with a hand as to not wake Marcus. “Depends on the quality, I would say.” He gave his son a quick hug, and then a light shove in direction of the boy’s room. “Go check if you have packed everything, and then go to bed. We’ll have to get up early tomorrow.”

“I know that it’s late, but could you go over a few ideas with me?” Harry asked. “Enora and Nawel asked me about how I repaired the tapestry, and then with the howler, I thought about how to protect Marcus in a situation like that, and well... is there a safe way to use Parselmagic to defend someone?”

Had he ever explored that part of their family magic? Marvolo wasn’t really sure. He certainly had found ways to attack someone else – in a sense that was a way to defend himself and others – but after his initial search into useful everyday applications, he had concentrated on its uses in rituals and warding. “We certainly can discuss your ideas. And I’ll investigate. But it’s unlikely that we’ll try anything today.”

Harry grinned, happy, where Marvolo had half expected him to be disappointed or angry because they hadn’t found the time to do more before this evening. “I’ll get ready for bed, check my trunk, and then come down to the study?”

Thinking back to his abandoned paperwork, Marvolo sighed and nodded. “I’ll try to get a little more work done.”

Harry laughed and hurried into his room, not noticing the ineffective – and not serious anyway – glare sent his way. With a huff of breath Marvolo turned to walk down the stairs and back to the parlour, Nagini slithering in his wake, probably headed for the nice rug in front of the fire.
Sunday, 14th of April 1996

It was kind of surreal sending his daughters off to school barely days after he had gained confirmation that they really were his daughters.

Gently placing the last piece of luggage he had levitated out of the house down in the boot of the car, Sirius looked up to where Olivienne and the girls had just left the cottage, speaking to Remus. His old friend handed over the papers and keys to the car, as he had been the one to collect the rented car from the next bigger city. Apparation had its advantages, but neither of them would be able to apparate all the way to Paris more than once, and even less with a passenger.

“I hope you’ll have a pleasant drive. The weather isn’t too bad for a long journey by car.” Sirius wanted to kick himself in the… behind, for such a useless comment. It was true, the day cloudy but dry, but the remark wasn’t really something he felt was appropriate in their situation. Shouldn’t he say something deep and profound?

“It will work. I am sure,” Olivienne said, rolling her eyes at him, walking over to the driver’s door, followed by the two girls.

Now the moment had come and Sirius felt a big lump forming in his throat. Sternly admonishing himself not to flee into weak jokes as he had done so often in the past, Sirius opened his arms in an offer of a hug. Just a moment later his arms were full with his two girls, embracing him with fervour.

He was a truly lucky man that he had found them after all this time.

“I’ll write you letters. And I’ll be in contact with your mother to arrange some meeting during the summer. Maybe I can come to your home, and you can show me around to all your favourite places.” Remus and Sirius had come to the conclusion that spending all the shorter holidays around Europe, and in London, would be enough time for the girls to see what being Lady Black would entail, while Sirius' visiting their home in the Caribbean would contribute to their becoming a true family.

Remus was wise like that. He had always been the most intelligent of them.

Before Sirius could let go, the twin on the left – it was hard to tell them apart only seeing the top of their heads – tightened her grip. “Is Harry in trouble?”

Sirius held back a sigh. It had felt weird being an adult when that whole mishap had taken place. He remembered quite well all the times he and his friends had done something more irresponsible than leaving the wards around the house they were staying in.

“Yes, he is.” There was no way to say anything else, even as he felt more than ambivalent about the whole situation. “He knew quite well that there always is a risk for him. Because of who his adoptive father is, of who he is. And he knew about the rules set for his protection…” Sirius trailed off, Harry had been disappointingly well-behaved in his eyes, and only Remus’ intervention had kept Sirius from expressing that feeling. “But I’m sure the punishment won't be too bad.”

He felt how the two girls relaxed, suddenly realising that they had been worried about getting Harry into trouble. Sirius felt proud of them, patted their shoulders before stepping back. “I hope you’ll write me too. I love reading what you’re up to. And good luck with your classes.”

“Thank you, Sirius.” “We’ll write,” Enora and Nawel said, smiling, turning and dashing back to the car where their mother was waiting.

After that everything was moving incredibly fast. The twins and their mother got into the car, they waved, and then the car was gone down the street, back on the way to Paris.

“You did great, Padfoot,” Moony said as he stepped up to Sirius, placing a hand on his friend's shoulder, squeezing. “I’m sure you’ll make a great father.”

Sirius heaved a sigh and looked back at his friend. “And why am I feeling as if my younger self would kick my ass if he could see this, Moony?”

“Because you’re being a responsible adult, Padfoot. I clearly remember that you never wanted to become one of those. You were determined to do everything to thwart your parents, break all the rules, disappoint them wherever you could,” Remus said, his head tilted to the side, just as a curious dog would do.

“Yeah,” Sirius sighed wistful, “that was always so satisfying. Getting her mad at me. And now? What would she say? Me, Lord Black? Restoring the family honour?” He was doing a lot of stuff he had vowed never to do.

“Don’t get maudlin on me, Padfoot. You do remember the tirades that horrible painting would spew once she was woken up?” A sharp finger dug into Sirius’ shoulder, jarring him out of his mood. “She tried to disown you! She's probably turning in her grave now that you, her disgrace of a son, have taken up the position of Lord Black. She probably would come back from Hell to scream at you if she knew that the two current possible heiresses have a muggle mother. You might be becoming an adult, Sirius, but be aware that not a thing you do at the moment would agree with the harridan that was your mother.”

Sirius nodded slowly. Remus was right, he might be an adult now – and behaving like one – but he was nothing like his late mother would want a Lord Black to be.

With a beaming grin, Sirius looked up into his friend’s eyes. “Thank you, Moony. I have no idea how I would cope without you.”

Remus laughed at that, patting Sirius on the head as he would do to pet a dog. “I don’t know either, Sirius. I don’t know either.”

Narrowing his eyes, Sirius realised that his friend just had called him unable to care for himself – how true it might be notwithstanding – and that this was a great opening to start a mock duel.

Sirius let his wand fall into his hand, out of its holster, taking careful aim at his friend's back, where he was walking back towards the cottage, away from the wind that was now picking up.

“Hey, Moony! Catch!” The moment Remus spun in reaction to that old phrase, Sirius cast a jelly-legs jinx at his friend, jumping out of the way of a spell headed his way, and the game was on.

Much later a relaxed Sirius returned to the cottage followed by Remus, intending to get his preparation for the April Wizengamot session at least started this day.

A good duel did lots for his mood. He needed to remember that.
In preparation for the next Wizengamot session, Marvolo had invited several members of that fine institution to Griffin House for tea. Under normal circumstances Marvolo got reminded why he had pondered going through with a violent revolution the very first time. These meetings were tedious and repetitive. Luckily for everyone, he had much more patience now that he was older than when he had started a political movement for the first time.

Otherwise violence would have been so much more tempting.

But today he had only invited allies to discuss strategy for the meeting and the little gatherings leading up to it where everyone would try to convince the others of their view on things.

That those gatherings tended to descend into gossiping about anything and everyone didn’t help matters now, nor did it help back then.

“Thank you,” Severus said, accepting a floating cup of tea before adding honey to it. Marvolo himself was currently stirring his tea to make sure the three spoons of sugar dissolved properly. The others were fixing their teas as well, all settling into the comfortable armchairs and love-seats. “I’m sorry to say that I’m expected back at the school in time for dinner.” Xerxes, Lucius, and Benjamin grinned at the Potions Master for that statement. They all knew very well that Severus didn’t exactly enjoy teaching Potions to the younger students, or all those who had to take the subject but had neither interest nor talent for the art.

“Duly noted, Severus. I agree that we need to wrap this meeting up before you’re expected back at Hogwarts and my son will return from school.” Marvolo took a sip from his tea, which had the perfect sweetness, before setting down the cup, casting a warming charm on it wandlessly because nothing was as bad as cold tea. “Maybe we’ll start with a quick update on your own projects?” It was phrased as a question but all of his guests understood the implied order.

As the one sitting next to him on the right side, Xerxes started. “The school is going well. I’m already planning to extend the possible trainee courses for Squib children at the start of the next year in September. A couple of muggle-born parents have visited the school over the spring holidays, and it looks like we’ll have to split a few classes next year, as more students are coming in.” Marvolo nodded, smiling. That was good news. “I regret to say, though, that there seems to be a kind of poltergeist forming. Some members of staff have seen something that they described much like Peeves, only much younger. I guess having that many untrained magicals in one place just has that effect.”

“My condolence,” Severus said, obviously thinking about all the trouble Peeves caused at the castle on a regular basis.

But Xerxes waved a hand, dismissing the issue. “It’s fine, really. One of the Unspeakables contacted me, as they’re interested to study the course of this development. Most magical schools are old and already have their poltergeist, this is the first time in living memory that they know of one forming.”

Marvolo moved to sit more forward in his chair. “That sounds like a worthy field of study. Please keep me updated.”
Severus was the next in line, shortly detailing the progress of his own research. Marvolo nodded politely, quite happy that the pregnancy created with the two-fathers potion – if they didn’t come up with a better name soon, this one probably would stick – was progressing well, that they had set up a broad base for the ancestry potion, or rather familial closeness potion, and that Severus still was making progress on a potion testing if two people would be able to have magical children together.

“My report is a little less encouraging.” Benjamin said with a grimace. “There is unrest among the ranks, my Lord. Many feel that this all takes too long, and some seem to think the direction we’re moving in is wrong. The murmurs I heard about are faint, and largely come from the young generation raised on stories of the last war. They’ll probably need close monitoring if we want to avoid other attacks like the abduction of the three young witches last year.”

“I see.” Marvolo felt that he should have anticipated such a development. Hadn’t he gathered just such young men around him? Those feeling as if they had something to lose when new members got the opportunity to move up in society? “We’ll need to know their motives. What makes them restless? What do they fear, and how can we use this to make them go along? Be careful about this, Benjamin. We already have one violent element out there. We don’t need to create more.”

Benjamin bowed his head in recognition of this order, probably already making plans on how to balance being a single father with a child at home and the delicate work needed to find possible threats before they became dangerous.

Lucius was sitting to Marvolo’s left and was therefore the last to speak. “The investigation into the Howler Attacks is moving forward. My niece,” Lucius didn’t quite manage to hide the hint of a sneer appearing on his face at the mention of the young Auror Tonks, “was at our home, as you know, my Lord, and I heard that the Weasley son working as a secretary to the Minister managed to freeze one of the howlers sent to the Minister. Currently the Unspeakables are still running tests. They didn’t find any fingerprints, and no one recognized the handwriting, but they hope the altered recipe might reveal the creator of them.” Marvolo hummed. Obviously whoever this was had learned from the errors of Madame Umbridge and knew of the new spell identifying who had touched an object based on fingerprints left behind. “But I feel that there might be an opening to move forward with one motion you had me draw up, my Lord.”

“Indeed? Which one?” There had been a lot of preliminary drafts for laws and amendments that Marvolo had given Lucius to write.

“Lifting of the ban on that one particular healing ritual that is useful for the treatment of strokes and heart attacks in older members of our society. I don’t remember its name. It was rather lengthy in the modern translation and a veritable-tongue breaking mess in the original version.” Lucius rarely was willing to risk looking like a fool because he couldn’t pronounce something properly. Back before Marvolo had lost his original body he had once caught the young man repeating a particular phrase in front of a mirror over and over. Looking back now it was rather funny, even as it had seemed mildly irritating back then.

“I remember the one. Why do you think we can move on this now?” The ritual had been banned from being taught because it was almost identical to one used to prolong one’s own life by sacrificing a newborn human. The sacrifice in the healing ritual was a handfull of leeches, and a few runes were different, but they were really close to one another in almost everything else. Not that the ritual using a baby was any good. The price the caster had to pay in addition wasn’t obvious at first glance, but it was severe and unpredictable. Reading up on them had filled a young Marvolo with a morbid fascination like that others seemed to get out of telling each other horror stories.
“Old Ogden had a stroke earlier this month. It was all over the news, and the talk for weeks at the Ministry. He didn’t die, but the rest of his life won’t be much fun. And there is only one Healer left in all of Britain – no longer young himself – who is licensed to use the ritual. He was doing the ritual on the continent at the time. With the sympathy for the family and the dismay over this unhappy coincidence still fresh in the public’s mind… many on the Wizengamot have not led the healthiest of lives and are now getting old. With the proper arguments, we’ll probably be able to get the votes we need.”

Banning the anger over having missed that important bit of news to the deep recesses of his mind, Marvolo started to moderate an impromptu planning session on how to get a majority for that vote. Attending as many tea-gatherings as possible, talking with people there about poor old Ogden and how that ritual could have helped him have more happy years to come – sadly – was a main feature of the plan they came up with.

oooOOooo

The first students already had walked past where Ginny was standing in an alcove, heading for the Great Hall. The train had arrived at Hogsmeade a while ago, and the first carriages had arrived not long after. But Ginny was looking out for a special group of students, or rather one special student.

She scanned the thickening crowd, ignoring – as much as was possible – her brother and Hermione standing near by, waiting as well. They were bickering again. The two of them had been constantly bickering since the start of the holidays.

It had been terrible!

A few times their bickering had affected the mood in the whole common room. That the twins had used the additional free time to promote more of their merchandise hadn’t helped one bit, as Hermione hadn’t been happy with them for that. The fifth year prefect really had a thing about following the rules.

Hermione had thrown the twins out of the common room one evening, to the dismay of all those students who had hoped to buy a few more of the skiving snackboxes.

Hermione was the first to spot the person she was looking for. “Harry!” she called out the moment the unruly black hair came into view. Despite the fact that Ginny felt she had managed to get past her crush – against the resistance of her dorm mates, who still thought she should be with Harry – she still thought that the unruly strands of hair gave him a rakish look. Harry said something to the others who had come in with him – mostly Slytherins from his year – then he quickly made his way over to Hermione and Ron, giving them both quick hugs, before Hermione could start grilling him on the state of his homework.

“Leave him be, Mione! You’ll kill us all with your constant need to study! Please leave us out!” Ron complained, not for the first time. Ginny rolled her eyes. Hopefully Ron would realise soon that his behaviour was only fanning the flames under the need to study, Hermione constantly displayed.

“Don’t fret, Hermione. I did do some revising, and have all my essays finished,” Harry answered, sounding quite happy.
Not really paying the two Gryffindors and the newest Slytherin any more mind, Ginny hurried over to where she had spotted a much more orderly mop of black hair on top of another Slytherin’s head.

“Theo!” She had more tact than to yell his name through the whole entrance hall, but the sound of her own voice – why did she have to sound so excited? – made her blush.

“Ginny! I missed you.” Theo answered, and their hands found each other almost without conscious thought. Theo was so much more attentive than Harry had ever been. She wished they would kiss, but so far Theo had been the perfect gentleman, moving their relationship forward slowly.

Michael had been much more forward in almost everything. But in comparison, Ginny liked Theo’s careful pace a lot more. In the end, though, Ginny felt it was time to move their relationship forward from where it was now.

Dragging Theo behind her, a cheeky grin on her face, Ginny moved them back to the alcove she had been standing in earlier. Theo followed without resistance, looking a little bemused but happy.

“May I say hello properly?” Ginny asked once they were out of the way and reasonably sheltered from the eyes of all the others.

Theo was quick to catch up, and already leaning closer to her, when he answered. “I would very much like that.”

They exchanged a not quite chaste kiss – Ginny had snogged often with Michael before breaking up, so she really had a scale to measure against concerning the chasteness of kisses – before separating again.

“Thanks for the lovely welcome, Ginny,” Theo repeated, giving her hands a squeeze. It was nice that he respected her wish not to be called Ginevra, which reminded her too much of her mother’s scolding her to be comfortable.

“I’m really glad you’re back.” Time at school was precious, because she didn’t know how her parents would react should she bring home a boyfriend at her age – she knew well enough how some of her brothers would react – and had doubts that her mother would be happy with her dating the son of a man she and many others considered a Death Eater on top of that.

“Let’s meet up during lunch break tomorrow,” Theo suggested more than asked, and Ginny nodded happily in answer.

It was a little unfortunate that they both had doubts about the likely reaction from their respective families to their budding relationship, as that made it necessary to keep their time together mostly out of the school’s eyes. All wizards and witches were too big gossips for them to hope their spending time together wouldn’t make it back to their parents if anyone noticed.

“See you then.” Ginny smiled, slipping out of the alcove and into the stream of students on their way to the evening meal.

ooOoo

“You’ve really finished all your homework?” Ron asked, clearly not being able to process this thought.
Harry laughed, feeling light as a feather. “I have really finished all of my homework, Ron. And did more revision than you'll think healthy, even if I’m sure I didn’t manage to match your expectations, Hermione.” Walking side by side with his two oldest friends towards the Great Hall, amongst all the other students, felt really good.

Returning to the castle after a happy holiday – even with being grounded for the end of it, it had been happy – was different than how it was after a summer holiday at the Dursleys’. The happiness of being with his friends again wasn’t swallowed by the relief of almost a year without his hateful aunt and uncle.

“The OWLs are important! They determine which subjects we can take next year, what career choices we’ll have! You really should have studied more!” Hermione had managed to let go of quite a lot of her bossy attitude since first year, but Harry noticed fondly that she really still had a massive streak of her studying-is-the-most-important-ever mentality behind her tempered behaviour.

“You don’t even know how much revision I have done, Hermione!” Harry laughed, opening his cloak that he had closed on the way to the carriages to fend off the wind. “You can’t just claim that I didn’t do enough.” He laughed again and gave a wink as a flustered Hermione blushed a little, shoving him half heartedly in retaliation.

“You can’t claim to have not studied to my standard and expect me not to react to that.” Hermione mock pouted, causing Harry to grin. “We’ll see how well you did in our next study session!” She exerted some effort to make it sound like a threat, but her eyes gave her away.

Harry waved, and nodded, already searching the Slytherin table to see if the others had already sat down. “I’ll remember that. We’ll see each other tomorrow? I don’t think there’s time to meet after the meal today.”

“That’s fine. I know for a fact that Ron has more than one homework assignment to finish still.”

Leaving behind a protesting Ron – who claimed there wasn’t that much left – and a scolding Hermione, Harry made his way over to the Slytherin table, making a detour to greet Luna, a happy spring in his step.

If someone would have told him how happy he would be by the time exams were already there the past summer, he would have thought that person was mad. How much could change in such a short time.

ooooOOooo

Monday, 15th of April 1996

The previous evening the fifth-year Slytherins had found a schedule with their appointments for career advice on the notice board in the common room. Harry had groaned even before he had spotted his own time. He really wasn’t sure anymore what he wanted to do once he was out of school. Then he had seen that he was to be in Snape’s office right before dinner and he had let himself fall into the next open seat, burying his head in his hands.
Hermione had been nagging them all to take a look at the pamphlets that had appeared in all the common rooms approximately a week before the holidays, but Harry had had his mind on other things.

Now standing before the office door of his Head of House, Harry wished he had listened to his friend. He knocked on the door and opened it at the call of “Enter!” from within.

“Sir,” Harry greeted and walked over to the chair sitting in front of the desk, right across from the stern Professor, who looked tired after a day of teaching, a small stack of scrolls indicating that he had been marking homework prior to this meeting.

“Mr. Slytherin. The school’s board is of the opinion that this meeting should help you determine which subjects to choose in your last two years of schooling with the aim of attaining a NEWT in them.” Harry knew instantly that Snape didn’t agree with that goal, or maybe the method, but whatever it was, his Professor really wasn’t happy with this way of going about career advice. “Have you made use of the information provided and narrowed down the possibilities?”

Harry nodded slowly. How easy it had been to say he wanted to become an Auror once he had learned that his father had been one, and with Ron being all enthusiastic about that idea. Idly wondering if he now should be considering becoming a Dark Lord, Harry carefully made his way through the maze of his indecisiveness. “Prior to this past summer I was convinced I would like nothing more than to become an auror. But now that I know how much I still need to learn for my position as the last of the House of Potter… I’m not really sure I can do that and train to become an Auror. There’s more training required, right?” This would have been so much easier with Professor McGonagall as his Head of House, Harry was sure of that.

“You’re correct, Mr. Slytherin. A number of different training courses over a timespan of three years is required of all prospective Aurors. Before that starts, there is a number of different character and aptitude tests to complete,” Snape explained, more patiently than Harry had expected him to be. “But you’re entertaining other options?”

Harry nodded slowly. He wasn’t at all sure if the Professor would even be able to help him in this. “I didn’t see any information about it, but I know that there has to be someone creating all the art I see. And illustrations in books and so on. I think I would like to go in that direction.” Somehow Harry felt self-conscious about his wish to become an artist. Luna constantly made him feel good about his art and his ambition to learn to create animated art, even realistically acting portraits. Even if the last probably involved more than the charms he had practiced on some drawings of his. The different loops of blooming herbs had been a hit with the others. But he still feared others might react like Vernon Dursley would. He’d repeatedly called painting and art in general something girly in a derisive voice.

As Professor Snape stayed silent for longer than Harry felt was normal – he had half expected to be ridiculed for this – he looked up to see a rare sight.

A speechless Professor Snape.

“Professor?” This situation was strange beyond what Harry wanted to deal with. The older wizard took a deep breath, pinched the bridge of his nose and moved to sit up more straight in his chair. “I’m sorry, Mr. Slytherin, you are indeed correct in your guess that there is not much information I can offer you for this career path. I can offer to search for more information though.”

Now it was Harry who was left speechless for a moment, before he was able to recover from the shock of a truly helpful Professor Snape. The man had been much better this year, but offering to go out of his way to help Harry with something so out of the ordinary?

Taking a deep breath and blinking a few times, Harry forced himself to nod. “That would be awesome, sir. I don’t even know where to start looking for information.”

“I would suggest that you ask your father for information. I have seen more than once that he’s informed about many branches of magic that we others know very little about.” The Professor rifled through a stack of parchment in a kind of binder, getting out a single sheet of parchment. “As we don’t know what beside a talent for art, and probably some experience with different styles,” the Professor shrugged, clearly out of his area of expertise, “I can’t really tell you what subjects would be helpful in this endeavour. I suspect Potions might come in handy for the creation of paints and the like. As I only accept the best students past OWLs who managed to get an Outstanding, you’ll still have to improve your work. Especially your precision in measurement needs work.” Harry nodded that he understood while Professor Snape took a longer look at what Harry assumed was a report on his work so far this year by his other professors.

“You’re doing quite well, it would seem. Even in Ancient Runes you are on an acceptable level. Keep up your work and you’ll be able to sit your OWL in this subject next year.” Placing the sheet of parchment down on the desk, the Professor looked up and directly at Harry, his dark hair falling around his face. Had he cut his hair? “Please ask your father for advice where you might find information on how to pursue a career in art. I’ll make inquiries of my own. I would propose another meeting in a week’s time, if that is agreeable with you?”

Harry nodded, feeling dazed. “I think I should have an answer from father by then, sir. Thank you for your time.”

And in almost no time at all Harry was out of the office with all the jars filled with disgusting things lining the walls. That had gone much smoother than he had expected, even if he really wasn’t all that much better informed, nor did he feel more sure about his plan for after school. But maybe it wasn’t as urgent as Hermione wanted them all to believe anyway. He had a lot to learn about the politics of the Wizengamot, estate management, and other stuff like that. If he didn’t know what career to choose, he could spend some time on catching up on all that he had missed out on because he had been placed with his muggle relatives.

Feeling better about the whole business, Harry made his way up to the Great Hall. Maybe Luna would be early, and he could tell her about that strange experience of a career advice meeting.

Chapter End Notes

That scene between Theo and Ginny hadn’t been planned to be that long. Well, who am I to complain about them having a mind of their own? Does anyone have any ideas for a name for the two-fathers-potion? I have been trying to come up with a name for so long now, I’m happy over every idea you might have!

Thanks to Jordre and Jake for helping to improve my spelling!

Waiting in the floo reception room, Lucius pondered his Lord’s request. It was kind of surprising that his Lord’s heir wanted to go into art after school. Taking all the rumours about the boy into account, the blond wizard had assumed that he would go into Quidditch or maybe into something with more action, like law enforcement.

Then the floo flared green and a wizard in eccentric robes stepped out, waving his wand with a flourish to get rid of any soot that might have stuck to him.

“Bartolomeo, welcome!” Lucius greeted the man, extending his arms at about hip height, moving forward in anticipation of the usual greeting.

“That you did, my friend,” Lucius agreed easily, moving to guide his guest to one of the parlours with the best light this time of day. “But I was convinced that my family would not grow beyond the size it had been back then. But I was wrong.” And how happy he was that he had been wrong. Narcissa was so happy with her, their, daughter that he wasn’t against another child should Narcissa wish to try again.

“And now if I would say it again, what would you say?” Bartolomeo wanted to know, mischief sparkling in his eyes.

Lucius laughed, earning himself a disdainful look from one of the portraits they were walking by. “Then I would say that you might be right, but that I will take the chance. At least that way there would be a portrait of my family after each addition to our number.” He certainly had enough money to indulge in getting them painted numerous times.

“How am I to decline your money, or painting such a lovely subject?” Bartolomeo said in easy acceptance.

They settled in the comfortable armchairs near one of the floor-to-ceiling windows, filling the appearing cups from the teapot provided by the manor’s elves. Then they started arranging for Bartolomeo’s coming over to reside in the manor over the summer to paint a family portrait of the now larger Malfoy family, just as he had done when Draco had been a few months old.
Once business was taken care of, a plate of small pastries joined the tea, and Lucius brought up what he had been asked by his Lord to find out. “Bartolomeo, if someone wants to become an artist, what would one need to do?”

“Your son has expressed a wish to go into art?” the artist asked, surprised, as Draco never had expressed any interest in art. At all.

“No,” Lucius answered, shaking his head. Draco was pretty set on potions as his career. “I’m asking for a close associate. He knows that I was going to speak with you and asked me to inquire for his son.” Only Bartolomeo's rolling his eyes, making a continue gesture with his hands, clued Lucius in to the fact that he had been more evasive than he should be. “Lord Slytherin asked me to ask you. His son and heir is interested in pursuing a career in art.”

“Does he have talent and dedication?” Bartolomeo asked, probably to gauge if there even was a point in answering the question.

“I have seen an oil painting of his, and have heard my son speak of drawings in coal made by Heir Slytherin-Potter. I think he isn’t a hopeless case. But as I’m by no means an expert to estimate how far someone might come with the right training, all I can say is that he seems dedicated to learn.” Maybe that had been a bit more like diplomatic avoidance than a proper answer, but Lucius truly felt unable to judge if Henry Slytherin-Potter had the dedication and talent needed to succeed in art.

“He should put together a portfolio with examples of his art, and then write to different current Masters not already having an apprentice. If you want me to, I could probably gather up a few names. He’ll need to convince one of our number that he has the skill, dedication, and determination to be worthy of the work it takes to educate a young mind in our intricate art.” Bartolomeo suddenly was much more serious, a marked change to his normally easy going demeanour.

“He’ll have to choose his NEWT subjects soon. Any advice on what he should concentrate on?” Lucius fished for more information, already pretty sure that he wouldn’t get any straight answers out of the other wizard.

Bartolomeo gave a knowing smile. “Potions is always a good choice, but other than that, he should work on other things. Most magical schools have a surprising lack of useful teachings for the art of magical paintings.”

Even after the artist had long left, Lucius was wondering what exactly was required in magical painting that wasn’t taught at Hogwarts or anywhere else.

Wednesday, 17th of April 1996

It was almost disappointing how quickly everyone fell back into the routine of homework and classes after the holiday. The workload didn’t decrease even a tiny little bit, and Harry felt like he was fighting an uphill battle with all his work right after the second day had been over.
On this morning only the thought of the upcoming Hogsmeade weekend – Luna had agreed to go with him to one of the curiosity shops – and the Quidditch practice to be held the next day let him walk into the Great Hall for breakfast without the urge to whine as some of the others had done. Some of his fellow Slytherins were decidedly not morning people.

Sitting down at his usual spot, Theo, Draco, and the others settling in around him, Harry looked over the choices and started to pick what he wanted for breakfast today. Maybe he would try some of the coffee steaming in a big pot over where the seventh years were sitting bleary-eyed. Some of them had been vocal about its advantages during a time when finding time to do work was not easy.

“Pass the milk please?” Harry asked over to where the jug was standing between Vincent and Gregory. With a grunt – those two definitely belonged to those not waking up before well into breakfast – the jug was passed over, and Harry accepted it to fill his goblet.

“How long is your Defence essay, Harry?” Theo wanted to know, getting himself another helping of baked beans.

“Long enough,” Harry answered, quickly checking that he had packed the scroll when he had packed his book bag that morning. “I had enough time, being grounded and all. And there were many stories I could include of how going to anyone with authority isn’t really the answer. You need to find the right person for the actual situation. And I went into detail!” Theo laughed at that, but nodded. It was a simple fact that Professor Slinkhard had a thing for rules, non-violent solutions, and reliance on authority over acting yourself. Harry had made an effort in each essay to find a situation in which the preferred solution Professor Slinkhard wanted them to write about wasn’t the best one. As they all were written in addition to the desired answers, Harry had gotten good grades in all his homework assignments after discovering that strategy.

As Harry contemplated if he should add an apple to his breakfast, the morning post arrived, with hundreds of owls filling the air with their screeches, the sound of packages and parchment scrolls landing on tables, and hundreds of wings brushing against each other.

Just like all other mornings, one of the delivery owls from the Daily Prophet carefully touched down in front of Harry, bringing the newest edition of the newspaper.

Even before Harry had accepted the wrapped newspaper, the murmurs all over the Hall – there were quite a few students getting the paper – clued him in that there was something noteworthy in this morning’s news.

Once he saw the headline, there was no doubt that was the reason for the murmurs.

“Karkaroff is dead?” “How long?” “I hadn’t even heard that he was missing!” While sitting there on his bench trying to wrap his head around what he was seeing on the front page, Harry heard snippets from all the others discussing what they had half-read.

Harry reminded himself that he had known, if not in detail, that Karkaroff, who had given up so many Death Eaters to get out of punishment himself, and therefore had been a traitor, had been caught and punished. Marvolo had even warned Harry that the body would probably be found sometime in spring.

Taking a deep breath, Harry made himself read the article so he would know what had been found. It seemed as if the body of Igor Karkaroff, ex-Death Eater and Headmaster of Durmstrang, had been found at the foot of a cliff in Scandinavia by muggle police a few weeks back, when the snow had started to melt. He didn’t have any identifying papers on him, which explained why it had taken so long for the magical community to catch on that the body had been found. Locals remembered when asked that he had been there at the end of the previous summer and had left an inn, just as a storm had formed. Currently the authorities were assuming that he had met with an accident in that storm.

“Harry?” He was nudged from the side, and when he turned he saw the concerned face of Theo, who had a paper folded next to his plate. “Are you feeling well?” Harry was pretty sure his surprise was clear as day on his face, as Theo didn’t wait for an answer, but clarified his concern. “You’re awfully pale.”

Harry took a deep, steadying breath. “No. I’m fine. It’s not everyday you learn that someone you have known, if only briefly and not really well, has died in an accident.” He thought it would be a reasonable enough excuse for why this information had shocked him so. Because even if only in his own head, he had to admit that it was disconcerting to be reminded of the violent side of his adoptive father.

“When... ?” Theo started a question only to cut himself off. “Oh yes, he was here last year, wasn’t he? Did you get to interact with him that often?”

To that question Harry just had to give Theo a look. It seemed that his peers here at the school that had parents, or other relatives, in the Death Eaters weren’t kept as in the loop as Harry was by Marvolo. Others might see it as a blessing not to know such things, not to know enough to imagine the torture Karkaroff had been put through. But in the end, Harry was sure he was better off knowing the truth.

“No, I didn’t get to talk to him often. But still. It’s different reading that someone died who you knew. And maybe if he had learned of how father was no longer affected by that curse, he would have returned and could have avoided falling down that cliff.” Harry pointed to the picture of a high cliff and different plants swaying in the wind, that had been printed next to the article.

“I guess you’re right,” Theo slowly answered. “Why do you think he was running?”

Giving Theo another look, Harry folded the paper and picked his utensils back up. “Why else should he have been there? At a muggle inn? Leaving shelter and heading out into a brewing storm? I think that him running is the most reasonable explanation.”

All around them students got up from the benches, talking and speculating about the article. Harry quickly picked up an apple – easy to eat on the way – and stood as well. He certainly would have to think on this a lot more, maybe speak with Mrs. Goyle about it, but for the moment they needed to go or risk being late to class. “You coming, Theo?”

Not answering with words, Theo stood as well – as did most of their year-mates – and followed Harry out of the Great Hall, heading for their classes together with all the other students leaving.

Rubbing his eyes, Marvolo folded the last of the reports so it would fit into the drawer of the cabinet he kept most of his Death-Eater-related correspondence in. “Henbane!” he called the elf who had been stationed here all this time, keeping Igor alive, the house clean, and Marvolo supplied with tea and small cakes whenever he needed to work here for extended periods of time.
“Master calls?” The elf was wearing Slytherin green, as always, and a resigned expression for a reason Marvolo wasn’t sure of.

“Tea please, Henbane. And some biscuits if there are any left.” He needed to finish the reports before he returned home to Marcus, who had been difficult since Harry had returned to Hogwarts, and without a good strong cup of tea he wasn’t sure he would make it in time.

With a bow the elf vanished again, presumably to prepare the items he was asked for.

In the meantime Marvolo picked up another letter from one of his Death Eaters, opening it with a flick of a finger before getting out the letter itself.

Halfway through the letter, a tray with a pot of tea, sugar bowl, fine china cup, and a small plate of mixed biscuits appeared on a corner of the desk Marvolo was working at.

The content of the letter wasn’t exactly unexpected – a young adult had expressed their interest in receiving the Dark Mark and the parents had written on their behalf – but tedious. Marvolo had thought more than once about if and how he should accept new followers into his service. It wasn’t as if he exactly needed them in the same way he had when violence was the main tool for the changes he wanted to achieve.

Looking up with a sigh, Marvolo reached for the tea and had to suppress a flinch when he spotted Henbane standing there at attention, obviously waiting.

“Henbane, is there a problem?” An elf waiting around where it could be seen wasn’t something Marvolo was accustomed to.

“Henbane is sorry, Lord Master sir,” the elf answered, visibly holding himself back from wringing his hands. “But here’s isn’t enough to do for Henbane, Lord Master sir. Now nasty traitor wizard gone, Henbane hoped Lord Master sir would have more to do?”

Marvolo blinked slowly.

Not enough to do?

Considering the nature of house-elves and the fact that Igor had been gone for a while now, removing a big part of Henbane’s work, not having enough work might actually be a problem. In fact, looking back, the house had seemed unusually spotless since Igor had been removed. Damage done during a duelling session vanishing before they had even finished… He guessed it was kind of his responsibility to find work for his elf.

“Isn’t there enough work over at Griffin House, though?” Marvolo asked before he had truly thought that through.

The scowl on the elf’s face was deep enough to rival one of Severus’, startling Marvolo in its intensity. “Flimm does not want Henbane helping at Griffin House! Claims being Head Elf. Says that Henbane isn’t to ask questions, can’t take care of family. Henbane tried to argue that Lord Master’s elf is Henbane. But Flimm is the Potter elf, and the family lives at a Potter House.” Henbane let his head fall forward, looking totally dejected.

Marvolo, in the meantime, was sitting behind his desk, once again rearranging his picture of reality. He knew that his Death Eaters had in the past – and still did now – maneuvered for positions of favour and influence. Even the general public was trying to curry favour with him, an influential wizard with a seat on the Wizengamot.
The fact that elves were doing the same, in a way, was a shock. But it shouldn’t have been one. He had seen what Kreacher had been capable of for his beloved master Regulus, had heard how Winky had tried to help Barty, or how that insane elf Dobby had defied Lucius to warn Harry.

House-elves obviously were as complex as humans. So this would need careful handling.

“Thank you for letting me know, Henbane.” He needed to make sure his elf knew that he was welcome to ask for help. “I fear I was remiss in defining clear boundaries for your various duties. I’ll aim to do better in the future. But for the moment. Flimm!”

With a popping sound the Potter elf appeared in the room – wearing a white tea towel with the Potter Crest on it – bowing deeply. “Master Marvolo calls?”

“Yes.” Marvolo stood, folding his hands behind his back. He felt a little as if he was about to scold a few first-years as he had done when he had been made prefect. He’d better keep his temper in check.

“I was made aware that the duties and responsibilities between you haven’t been made clear by me. Listen up.” Both elves straightened, resembling a pair of Aurors in stance and attitude, but looking kind of ridiculous despite the sense of honour and seriousness they exuded.

“Griffin House and its upkeep will remain Flimm’s main concern, this house and its upkeep are Henbane’s responsibility.” Both elves stood taller – or as tall as they possibly could – at that proclamation. “Furthermore, Henbane is my personal elf. He will care for whatever room I’m residing in, deliver snacks and drinks during the day, care for my clothes and my other possessions, as well as my mail.” Henbane seemed rather pleased with that proclamation, while Flimm made a face as if someone had forced him to chew on a lemon.

“The care of both my sons will fall to Flimm. The both of you shall work together whenever a task demands it. And if there is further dispute over a task or responsibility, you’re both hereby ordered to bring such before me to decide.” Marvolo looked between the two elves and arched a brow, before asking. “Any questions left?”

“No, Master Marvolo.”

“No, Lord Master,” the elves answered with a bow each, popping away without waiting for a clear dismissal. But as Marvolo wanted them gone for the moment anyway, that was fine with him.

Finally sitting down in his chair again and pouring the tea – thankfully there was a warming charm on that teapot – Marvolo set to finishing his correspondence before going home.

ooOoo

It had been a long day.

Not only had the demands from the lessons Harry had had today taken their toll, but also the pondering he had been doing the whole day over Igor Karkaroff’s death.

He had come up with a lot of different reasons why the path chosen by Marvolo had been the best path possible. That only with a firm example of what happened to traitors the other more violent followers were kept under control. That it had been his own fault for running, whereas Snape – who had worked as a spy – had tried to redeem himself and survived.

But all the time spent with Madame Goyle finding ways to process all that had happened in his own life, finding ways to be happy, had made him too aware of the tendency to rationalise what had happened.

So he had searched for good things coming from Marvolo Slytherin's being free, and the Death Eaters bent to a new purpose.

And he had found some.

For one, a large number of children were away from unfriendly homes, or even the streets. And Harry included himself in that. Then there was a new school and the change in status for Squibs just because the magical community had finally learned that so-called muggle-born witches and wizards were born from lost Squib lines. Even the fact that Daphne was considering a muggle-born wizard for a partner – although as Hermione probably would not be happy to learn the blonde’s reasons – likely was a result of Marvolo's being free.

With a deep sigh Harry let himself fall into the prominent wingback chair right in front of the big fireplace in the common room, his bag settling down right next to the chair.

As usual a few of the older students gave him a short glare, and his friends settled around him, getting out their work. Since Harry had managed a decent defence against that mob of older students, not one of them had tried anything again.

“What a day!” Theo said with feeling, stretching his back with his arms high over his head before letting himself fall against the backrest. “Somehow it only ever gets harder.”

Pansy snorted, not looking up from her drawing for Herbology she had gotten out the moment she had taken her seat. “What did you expect?” She carefully removed a line with her wand. “It’s almost time for the OWLs. Obviously there’ll be more work.”

While his friends descended into bickering over the amount of work expected from them all, Harry reached into his robe pocket, getting out the vibrating mirror he kept there.

“Father! Marcus! Nagini!” he greeted the moment the three heads became visible in the mirror, replacing the reflective surface. He had to grin as Marcus was closely cuddled to their father, and Nagini had somehow looped herself around the two humans, placing her head on top of Marvolo’s.

“Hello, Harry.” Marcus almost screamed, beaming like a loon, waving his hand really close to the mirror, almost knocking it out of Marvolo’s hand.

“Careful, Marcus! And hello, Harry.” Marvolo looked almost as tired as Harry felt.

“Give me a moment and I’ll go over to my room,” Harry said, standing and leaving his books – Astronomy and Care of Magical Creatures – and his bag in the care of his friends.

“How was your day, Marcus?” Harry asked to fill the way to his room with something other than silence.

“It was a great day! We were in the garden, planting some plants. We almost managed a neat row! And we mixed in some dung with the dirt.” Marcus really was excited about his day, and Harry could easily see that this wasn’t the first time Marvolo got to hear a report of the day spent planning the beds their class would care for, and later planting them.
Harry concentrated on the mirror in his hand on the way to his room, but he could see the reactions from all around as he walked past the other Slytherins. Most seemed used to the nightly routine of mirror calls between the Slytherin family members, a few chuckled, most fell silent as he walked by.

Marcus was already in bed, and once Harry had settled on his own, Marvolo started to read them one of Marcus' favourite stories. It was a little strange in Harry’s eyes to be read a story over a communication mirror, but it was kind of nice at the same time.

It took a while, but finally the story was told, Marcus was tucked in, and Marvolo carried the mirror out of Marcus’ bedroom and over to his own room.

“You look as if you need a good night’s sleep, Father.” Harry stated matter-of-factly. “Had a hard day?”

Marvolo nodded, rubbing his eyes with his free hand. “It was. Too many letters to read, and then all those people wanting my opinion on Igor’s death. I wouldn’t be surprised if there is an article tomorrow quoting me.”

“And what did you say?” Harry asked, curious, and thinking that he would need to work on his own ability to evade questions and lie without giving himself away if he wanted to be a successful politician. Not that he planned to use those skills, but having them wouldn’t hurt.

“That I truly regret how Igor Karkaroff died through what looks like an accident, and that I don’t exactly know how I could have had any influence on this. The reporter repeated the question more than once.” His father’s face was straight, nothing betraying the fact that he had had a lot to do with the death of Igor Karkaroff.

Harry rolled his eyes, but refrained from commenting.

Marvolo obviously understood and hissed :It’s over and done with:. without making any promises that something like this wouldn’t happen again.

And Harry let it rest. There was not much that could be done about those that had promised themselves to Lord Slytherin back in the day. And the magic of the bond kind of made Marvolo the one responsible for disciplining those sworn to him. Igor Karkaroff had been a traitor, Marvolo had picked the punishment. Harry wasn’t happy with it, but there was not much to interpret differently about the oath taken and the magic involved. The magic Marvolo had used as a base had been among the many things Harry still had to study.

“Did you find any information on how one would go about becoming an artist?” Harry changed the subject, not willing to linger any longer on troubling topics.

Marvolo went along with the change agreeably. “I have asked Lucius for contacts. He mentioned just recently his wish to commission another family portrait and his search for an artist. He should write you soon with information on how to reach various artists. As far as I remember, there are no schools or programs teaching art. Finding a Master to learn under is pretty much the only way to get to learn magical art.” Marvolo sat back further on his own bed – as Harry could see by the background – and smiled. “I also checked muggle education in that direction. There are summer courses in different art techniques you could take. As the basics are pretty much the same, you might consider working on your skills with the help of a teacher,” Marvolo suggested.

Harry nodded slowly. Getting to learn from an actual teacher might be interesting. “It’s possible to study art at university, isn’t it?”
“Yes. But you would need proof that you finished muggle school,” Marvolo brought up a difficulty Harry himself had not considered so far.

He made a face, making Marvolo laugh. “I’m pretty sure that I don’t want to go to school any longer once I have my NEWTs.” Taking summer courses on art was one thing. Going to school for the entirety of secondary education was not something Harry was willing to contemplate.

“I’ll keep you updated, Harry,” Marvolo chuckled. “Your friends probably will be waiting. It looked like we interrupted a study session?”

“We were just about to start.” Harry nodded in agreement, already thinking of the chapters he wanted to read again, the essays he had to write.

“Off you go, Harry. And don’t forget to get enough rest!”

Smiling at his father, Harry nodded. “The same applies to you. Take some Dreamless Sleep and get a good night’s rest.”

They finished their call on a laugh and Harry slipped the mirror back into his pocket after deactivating it. Time to return to the others and get some studying in.

Furiously writing another of the blood-red letters, he pushed his anger down through the quill onto the parchment. All his attacks had met with a frustrating lack of success. Not even one person had been seriously injured. And not one person had changed their mind. Just today he had heard rumours that the Egyptian Ministry had offered support in the investigation against the Howler Terrorist.

They were calling him a terrorist now!

Why were they all so blind? Had no one learned anything?

He-Who-Must-Not-Be-Named could not be trusted!

That dark wizard was too good a manipulator to ever not have something sinister in mind.

This Saturday was another opportunity to make the public notice the danger. Reaching many at the same time would hopefully help. And it might be one of his last chances, as that blasted Auror Tonks was closing in on him.

If he managed to incapacitate that one wizard at the right time, the Wizengamot might be an opportunity to strike swiftly and in person.

He hadn’t actually wanted to get involved that directly, acting in the open, as he felt that he wasn’t up to the task of taking out the threat. If just anyone could have rid them of He-Who-Most-Not-Be-Named, then it would have happened long before the night the Potters had died, their only son surviving in what had seemed like a miracle back then.
But now he felt as if they all should have known that there was no such thing as a miracle. The boy probably had been tainted even then and putting him down would have been the wiser choice.

Finishing up that one howler, he grabbed another prepared parchment, dipped his quill, and started writing once more. Maybe he should charm some quills to copy his movements. He would be able to produce that many more howlers that much quicker that way.

His wife had declined helping him, mostly sitting in apathy near the fireplace, stroking a picture of their lost son.

With that thought his grief tried to overcome him once more, and he turned to his anger not to fall prey to the apathy as his wife had.

Howler after howler was finished, folded, and addressed, waiting for the moment they would come close to the one they were addressed to, to activate. Getting all those owls to deliver them would be a chore, had been a problem from the beginning, but he had enough experience by now, and being discovered to be influencing illegal numbers of normal birds was no longer of great consequence. It would end soon. One way or another.

It had been a long day teaching, and only the fact that his duties as Potions Professor at Hogwarts had got him out of tea-party duty had made this day somewhat bearable. But following the small update on how their effort was progressing, Severus had received the order to find a good name for the two-fathers-potion, as the Dark Lord was not happy with the current name.

And so Severus found himself sitting at the low table in their sitting room – on the floor no less – surrounded by different books, opened to seemingly random pages, lots of parchment sheets, filled with words, word combinations, ideas, and references.

Latin and Greek – the old version, not the currently spoken one – were two of the obvious choices, and so he had started with them. That parchment currently was behind him on the floor, littered with different combinations of pater and duo. When Severus had added the Italian version, he had decided it was time to investigate other options, placing that parchment aside to go back to later.

Currently he was experimenting with different English variations on the same parchment he had noted down the possibility to name the potion after the three individuals who had been the first trio to test it. As he had to ask them for their opinion – and permission – to do so, that idea was set aside for the moment as well.

Groaning in frustration, pinching the bridge of his nose, Severus sat up straighter, moving from side to side to get the kinks out of his back.

“What are you doing on the floor, love?” Sonja asked as she walked in, carrying a tea-tray. “I wasn’t in the bathtub all that long, was I?”

The tea-tray was deposited on a small side table, displacing a book that Sonja picked up after it had fallen to the floor, then she made to sit down. While his wife settled herself in her wingback chair – transfigured to her specifications out of one she had deemed the opposite of comfy – Severus looked over the mess he had made of their living space, sighing.

“I’m trying to come up with an acceptable name for the two-fathers-potion that sounds a little…” Severus trailed off, not even sure what exactly he was searching for. “I guess official. The Dark Lord worries that the current working title will stick if we don’t come up with a final name soon.”

Sonja closed the book she had picked up to look at the title written on the spine. “And you need a book on Greek mythology for this, because?”

“Because I wanted to check on a few stories I only half-remembered. Athena, who was born from Zeus’ head, for instance. And I wanted to check on a story about Anteros. I think he was named as the son of Poseidon and Nerites. But I also found versions that Anteros is the son of Aphrodite, or Ares and one of his many female lovers. I think the last one is a later addition, as his Roman name Mars is used in the story I found. I came to the conclusion that this name might be too confusing.” He shrugged, once again pinching the bridge of his nose. Anteros Potion would sound good if not for the potential for confusion he had found in the different versions of the Greek myths. Maybe he simply should put together a list of possible names and send it to his Lord. Should he decide and free Severus of the responsibility.

At the subtle sounds of knitting – the needles moving against each other simply gave a distinct pattern of clicking noises – Severus looked up to watch Sonja knit some baby clothes. She said that she liked the motions and producing something with her own hands, and Severus loved the picture she made sitting there, a look of concentration on her face, diligently and slowly working on a tiny sweater or cap. He had trouble identifying either in the early stages of a piece.

“Have you more ideas for poetic names, or are you going for a more bland one?” Sonja asked after a few moments of silence – just her knitting and the fire making sounds – without looking up from her work.

“Most ideas are variations on two fathers. Latin, English. It’s simply the easiest descriptive naming. You know as well as I that the commonly used name will differ from the original anyway.”

Sonja hummed. It was something that happened often to potions with names that were too complicated, they acquired a mundane, simple name relatively fast.

“I don’t want to name it after me,” Severus went on, “I hope to invent many more notable potions that I’ll publish. Only Masters never inventing more than one have that potion named after them.” Having only one Snape Potion would be a shame. He hoped to invent many more. “That’s also the reason why I think naming it after Slytherin, who started research in that direction, would be misleading. I’m sure he contributed more than just this potion to the field.”

At that Sonja looked up. “Asking the parents-to-be and the surrogate to name the potion after them is on your list of ideas?”

Severus nodded. “I’ll write a letter later.”

“Maybe find something poetic in English? Like...Healed Hearts? They seemed so happy with the prospect of being parents that one time I met them.” Sonja set her knitting down and moved to pour herself a cup of herbal tea.

Picking up his quill and reaching for a fresh sheet of parchment, Severus made to start that list of possible names. “That’s definitely an option. If you have more ideas just add them to the pile. We’ll sift through them later.”

Sonja’s laugh to that analogy filled Severus with warmth. How the return of his Lord and the fact that the man no longer was insane had changed everything. And for the better at that. Taking a deep breath, Severus gathered all his various notes into one stack intent on sorting through the ideas and identifying the best ones. After that he would write the letters for the three currently testing the potion. That felt like a productive end to his evening.

Saturday, 20th of April 1996

Sitting down to an early breakfast – Marcus on the floor under the table with Nagini pretending it was their burrow, or something – Marvolo looked at the little pile of letters waiting by his plate.

With a sigh he filled his cup with tea, adding three spoons of sugar before stirring, and then reached for the fork on the plate of waffles to place some on his own plate. Before he tackled work, he needed to eat something.

The variety of food was impressive for a household of only two humans for most of the time. Ever since he had sorted out the problem between the two elves competing for the right to care for them, he had noticed a more regular change in what was offered for them to eat. Marvolo felt it might be that Flimm was learning new recipes from Henbane, or that the two of them were trying to one-up each other with their attempts to impress him.

He wasn’t about to complain.

After the waffles, Marvolo took a nicely toasted slice of bread, spreading cherry jam on it, and listening in with amusement as Marcus and Nagini discussed how good an idea it might be to stock up on grains for the winter when one was only eating mice and rats. Nagini didn’t see the point, but Marcus thought it an excellent way to lure in prey, eliminating the need to go out to hunt in the cold.

Smiling to himself, Marvolo steeled himself and picked up the topmost letter from the pile. It was from Severus. Surprised that the man was writing so soon after getting the order to find a better name for that potion, Marvolo flexed his magic to open the seal, unfurling the letter to read.

Lord Slytherin,

Below you will find the list of suggestions on how to name the potion currently referred to as the two-fathers potion. I also sent a letter to our first test group to ask if they would grant their permission to use their names as a possible alternative. The answer to that is still outstanding. I leave the decision in your capable hands.
Right below that followed a list of a mix of possible names, and Marvolo couldn’t help but snort at a few of the ideas. And at Severus’ audacity of pushing the task of choosing a name back to Marvolo. But as Severus had gone to the trouble to provide a number of choices, Marvolo felt it was not a case of avoiding a task. Maybe selecting a name himself would actually be better.

Picking up his third cup of tea, Marvolo once again read the list of proposed names, summoning himself a quill to make notes next to some of the ideas. Better work on this as long as Marcus was distracted by Nagini.

Saturday, 20th of April 1996

Amelia smiled down at her godson – it still was so new – who was sitting right next to her behind the protective wards of the training room, concentrated completely on the mock duel happening on the other side.

Marvolo was sweeping the floor with his opponents.

The two of them had appeared that morning at the Ministry, planning to let Marcus have a look at the place where Amelia worked and for Marvolo to get a look at the current trainee class of Aurors.

“What’s that one called?” Marcus suddenly asked, pointing to a young wizard on the ground fighting with his seemingly randomly flaying legs.

“The dancing feet spell. See how his legs are moving?” Amelia explained, grinning at Marvolo’s choice of spells. Every single one of the colourful jets of light that connected with one of the few junior Aurors or the trainees belonged to spells, jinxes, and charms usually used among Hogwarts students as pranks. Many of which were looked down upon by almost all junior Aurors – who proclaimed themselves to be above silly spells like those – and the more useless older Aurors.

“Looks funny.” Marcus decided, before turning his attention to where Marvolo was expertly dodging a Petrificus Totalus, spinning in place and sending another silent hex at one of the Aurors trying to sneak up behind him.

“It’s not, if you’re the one under its effect.” Amelia settled on saying to that, quite aware that she was one of the adults in place to shape Marcus’ perception of the world. And considering how she suspected Marvolo was still having trouble with empathy – she knew he was making an effort to change and work on the damage done to him by that curse, but still – providing the boy with an adult capable of compassion – or at least, one more of those – was probably a good idea.

Marcus made an agreeing noise his eyes practically glued to the duelling witches and wizards.

Suddenly one of the trainees was hanging upside down by an ankle, a wand clattering uselessly to the floor, rolling away.

Shaking her head, Amelia stood and called out to halt the duel. “Enough!” Everyone stopped moving, freezing where they stood. “That’s enough. Marvolo, let him down!”

Marvolo turned and winked at them before a flick of his wrist send the Auror crashing to the floor as the spell was released. “Thanks for the opportunity everyone. And thanks, Amelia, for asking me to come help,” he said, waving one hand causing his slightly rumpled robes to straighten out, making him look as if the most strenuous thing he had done was a quick stroll around a garden somewhere.

“How’s that even possible?” one person murmured not quite quietly enough to go unheard.

“How’s what possible?” Amelia asked, taking down the ward protecting spectators from stray spells.

“That one wizard can hold his own against a greater number just using prank spells!” There was genuine frustration in that voice and Amelia sighed.

Meanwhile Marcus ran to where Marvolo had gone down on one knee holding his arms open for the boy to give him a hug. Marvolo stood, quickly turned on his heel, whirling in place, making the boy laugh.

Focusing back at her young Aurors, Amelia tried to find a diplomatic way to set them straight. But before she could even come up with a plan, Marvolo stepped in, his son held securely in his arm.

“As long as the greater numbers don’t work as a team, don’t know how to dodge, and get out of breath too easily it isn’t all that hard. Even with a limited number of spells,” Marvolo said, his smile wasn’t unkind, and his tone was friendly, but what he said was cutting deeply, judging by the looks on the others’ faces.

“And what do you recommend we do about that?” There was a mocking vibe to that question that irked Amelia. How dare those young, barely-trained, beginners insult a Lord of the Wizengamot, just because they had been shown how much they still had to learn?

But Marvolo seemed unfazed, another hint at just how much he had changed after he had been freed of that ancient curse. “Run every day to increase your stamina. Hold training duels, and battles, in varying teams and with restricted spell lists. And I’m not talking just nothing lethal, more like only three or four spells. That will force you to get creative with the spells you know. It might seem silly, but let me tell you, being confronted with something you don’t expect can throw even the most accomplished wizard or witch off kilter.”

Amelia was pretty sure he spoke from experience and not from recent experience, either. Who had cast a prank spell at You-Know-Who? And what had it been? Could she ask Marvolo about that? She wasn’t really sure. He always got uncomfortable when the past was brought up. Obviously embarrassed and ashamed about a lot of it.

“Changing up the lists and learning new spells also will help you avoiding the development of a signature move,” Marvolo continued his impromptu lesson. “Few get known for a special spell and don’t suffer for it. Just as Auror Moody is still well known for his constant vigilance, you can bet on being known and nicknamed among those you have to confront if you use one spell above the others. And being predictable is a drawback in a battle.”

Amelia was glad to see that Marvolo’s advice was being taken seriously, even as she caught some mutters from the back of the group sounding dissatisfied. It had been a good idea to ask him to help with the Auror Training Program.

“Want to see my office next, Marcus?” She ended the discussion before it could descend into the finer details of duelling. This visit was for Marcus, not for any of the adults. Showing the boy some duelling had been a good idea – Marcus was grinning from ear to ear, proud his father had won – but he surely would tire easily if they stayed to discus theory.
“Yeah!” Marcus called with enthusiasm, one hand curled tightly into the lapel of Marvolo’s robe.

“Then let’s go. Amelia, lead the way,” Marvolo declared, before giving an exaggerated bow, making Marcus giggle by almost tipping him on his head.

Amelia laughed at their antics and did lead the way to her office.

“No Hermione, we were agreed, no talk about exams today,” Theo said decisively, laughter in his voice, making Harry grin.

Nodding along, Harry turned and walked backwards, giving the disgruntled Hermione a cheery smile. “I remember quite clearly that you agreed with the rest of us that we needed a day of relaxation. Something about avoiding the need for a calming draught, or a stay in the hospital wing. So try to relax, and banish revisions, exams, and OWLs from your head for the day.”

His bushy haired friend huffed, but nodded. “Very well. From now until tomorrow at breakfast, no one is going to mention our OWLs or any preparation for them.” Then a stubborn light entered her brown eyes. “But I insist on visiting the bookshop.”

They all laughed at that. Harry turned back around so he could see where he was walking not keen to fall over his own feet and end up in the hospital wing with a broken leg, missing this Hogsmeade weekend.

Luna skipped back up from where she had run ahead to look at something and linked her arm with Harry’s, humming something under her breath.

They hadn’t really made any plans for the day, only planning to go with whatever mood struck them, relaxing, and simply having a good time. Not that something sounding as simple as having a good time ever was as simple as it should be. Harry was pretty sure that with his bodyguards – his father had insisted on Messrs. Goyle and Crabbe acting in a protective capacity again – trailing them everywhere, relaxing would not be something that happened without effort.

They reached the edge of the village, already filled with all those students who had elected to go by carriage. In fact, it looked as if all students third year and up had decided to come. The nice warm and sunny weather certainly had had a part in that.

“Let’s go to Honeydukes first.” Harry made a decision after a few moments of aimless wandering. He really wanted to stock up on chocolate and maybe a few of the chewier sweets for their long study sessions.

“Sounds like a plan,” Draco conceded, his light summer cloak swinging open over his casual robes. And as none of their friends came up with an alternative, they turned their steps towards the sweet shop.

Over an hour later the group exited the shop again, each of them with a small bag filled with various sweets. It had been fun testing the new flavours on display. But in the end they all had pretty much selected the things they knew well.

“I’m going to the bookshop now,” Hermione declared, eager to go search for some new old book to add to her collection.

“I’ll accompany you.” Daphne decided. “Maybe we can find something on the magical community in Bulgaria. If you’re going to accept Victor’s invitation, you should know a little more about the place. And by the way, I still think it would be better to talk with your great-uncle about this.”

“Oh, I will, don’t doubt that.” Hermione answered, waving her wand at her bag to shrink it down with a muttered incantation. “I really like Victor, but I want to study more after we graduate, not marry right out of school!” Harry grinned at his friend’s exasperated tone at the thought of doing something like that.

Theo snorted. “I don’t think you need to fear him trying to trick you into a marriage, Hermione. You’re the one with more social standing here, and on top of that, he respects you too much to do something that ridiculous.”

Hermione only made some noncommittal noise to that and waited for Daphne to catch up before moving off in the direction of the book store.

Harry turned to Luna, who was standing next to him, occupied with a colourful sugar quill. “You said you wanted to have a look at one of the shops further down that street?” There were some smaller shops down that street filled with odds and ends that might interest a student. It felt like some of those charity shops aunt Petunia had visited from time to time, searching for some unusual paintings, ornaments, or other decorations she used to impress the neighbours.

“Let’s meet back here at one before we head to the Three Broomsticks for lunch?” Ron asked, getting sounds of agreement from all around before the group broke up, each of them going where they wanted.

Walking down the street holding Luna’s hand, swinging their intertwined hands between them was oddly peaceful.

“It’s nice, isn’t it?” Luna said with a serene smile on her face, upturned to the sun, eyes closed.

“It is,” Harry agreed, assuming that Luna was talking about the weather. It wasn’t always easy to know what exactly she was talking about at any given moment. “Are you looking for something specific?” A small bell sounded as Mr. Goyle opened the door, making sure it was safe to go in before Harry was allowed to follow.

“Something for Daddy when I come back home,” Luna said, following the huge wizard inside, looking around curiously.

Harry started looking around as well. Maybe he would find something for Marcus, and maybe even Marvolo. The shelves were standing close together and were packed with the oddest things. Not like the shop Harry had ended up in after that one disastrous floo trip just before second year. There were no warning signs not to touch things because of curses. But the selection was varied. Here there was a small clock with an owl – looking like it was animated wood – walking up and down a branch, blinking slowly, a set of blocks with letters on them, switching back and forth between the letters and animals starting with that letter. If half of the blocks hadn’t been missing, it might have been a nice expansion on those that Marcus already had at home.

Harry sauntered through the small space between shelves, stopping whenever he came across something interesting. A letter opener in the form of a bird – the beak was the part opening the letter – flapping tired wings, a creepy-looking doll missing an eye, a pair of dice rolling themselves, a candlestick decorated with vines, and a stack of board games.
In the end Harry found a small dragon toy for Marcus and a book on different Asian fairy tales he thought might be of interest to Marvolo.

“What have you found?” Harry asked once Luna joined him at the front before the register, which was manned by a cheery witch.

“Nothing much. But this,” she held up a delicate chain from which dangled something vaguely leaf-shaped of silver colour, “is a passable good-luck charm.”

“That’s a Sickle, my dear,” The witch at the register – was she the one owning this shop? Harry wasn’t sure – said, holding her hand out for the silver coin Luna fished out of one of her pockets.

Harry placed his purchases in his own pocket, while Luna slipped the charm around her neck to dangle right next to the butterbeer corks she had strung onto a length of some yellow cord.

“The sun is high,” Luna observed, and Harry didn’t even try to hide his grin.

“You’re right. We should head back to Honeydukes to meet up with the others.” And so they did exactly that.

When they arrived, only Ron and Neville were already there.

“Hungry, Ron?” Harry asked when they were near enough that he didn’t need to shout.

“Why shouldn’t I be?” Ron wanted to know, grinning. “What would mum say? I’m a growing lad!”

Harry laughed right along with the others at Ron’s attempt to imitate his mother’s voice.

And then he saw a dark cloud moving much too quickly, coming in from the direction opposite of where Hogwarts castle was.

“What’s that?” he asked, feeling kind of light headed, watching what looked like a thunderstorm cloud moving over the sky.

“What’s what?” Ron asked, confused and turning his head this way and that to look around.

“That,” Luna said oddly calm, pointing one hand straight at the mass that was most decidedly not a cloud.

Then the call of a raven or crow – Harry didn’t really know the difference – made the situation clear.

Those were birds.

A big mass of birds all heading for the village.

Harry remembered some half-seen scenes of a horror film with birds Dudley had seen a few years back, and then a scream from someone on the street broke the spell.

There were not many reasons Harry could think of for why a cloud made of birds would be heading towards Hogsmeade on a Hogsmeade weekend. And his two bodyguards probably thought the same, because hands were on his shoulders, trying to manoeuvre him towards Honeydukes, which was the nearest building.

But inside Harry’s head echoed the few facts he knew of the previous attacks from the so-called Howler Terrorist. If the room for incoming mail at the Prophet hadn’t been warded, the whole building could have been destroyed. How even a few of those howlers had wreaked havoc in the Minister’s office. How even that one howler that had found him in France had exploded.

Harry was about to follow his bodyguards when he spotted a bunch of third-year girls cowering next to a building, practically out in the open. His left hand moved to the portkey around his neck, while his right hand suddenly held his wand. There was no time to call help, or get everyone away from the street. And even that wasn’t a guaranteed success.

Harry knew that it was a dumb idea, but he was pretty sure that he couldn’t live with himself if he didn’t at least try.

Aware that it was a bad idea – really bad, he would be in trouble later – but that it should work in theory, that intent and the words he picked were important, Harry stopped going along with being dragged away, locked his eyes on the birds, each carrying something red, and hissed, concentrating hard on what he wanted to happen.

`:Shield us from harm:`.

Warmth spread through Harry’s whole body, and something that reminded him of wind left through his wand before a shimmering shield came into existence over the part of the street Harry could see.

Then, while hearing screams, shouts, and birds screeching, Harry passed out.

Professor Flitwick had needed to pick her up early, but she didn’t mind being early when she got to be at Hogwarts for the time she would be waiting. Carisma had acquired a few more patients in the magical world since she had started to work with young Harry and later Lord Slytherin. She was pretty sure the maybe-former Dark Lord hadn’t spoken with anyone about the fact that he was working with a squib mind healer, but judging by the people searching her out, it was possible that the man’s personal Healer had recommended her to his other patients.

Currently she was sitting in the room they were using for their appointments, reading one of the books from her pile of books she wanted to read by her bed. It was nice to have the time to do a bit of reading.

A little bit later – the book was engaging enough to let her lose track of time – there were hurried steps and raised voices in the main part of the infirmary, sparking her curiosity. She closed her book, stood from the chair, and walked to the open door.

The matron – Poppy Pomfrey – was running around frantically, but with purpose. Waving her wand, preparing beds, and setting up potions.

“Was someone injured?” Carisma asked, concerned. This was a Hogsmeade weekend – the reason the professor had had to pick her up early, and that Harry wasn’t here yet – and because of that, many children out and about in the village were at risk of accidents more than usual.

“There was an attack on the village. Filius and Pomona plan to evacuate the whole population to the castle, alongside the students. I have no idea if anyone is hurt. But I need to prepare for the worst.” The witch turned towards where Carisma stood near the door to the private room. “I think it would be best if you waited somewhere out of the way.”

For a moment Carisma was speechless. While she wasn’t able to cast magic, she was an adult with some medical schooling and common sense.

She took a deep breath and gave the mediwitch a hard look. “I’m capable of asking questions, and of handing out calming draughts. I can do triage if you tell me where the people will arrive.”

To Madam Pomfrey’s credit she only did two slow blinks before adjusting to the new information and its possibilities. “The worst cases will be flooed in directly. But all others will come in through the big front doors. I think you can help there. You can take down that basket with potions.”

Not willing to lose time over arguing, Carisma picked up the basket and left the infirmary. It was easier than usual to reach the ground floor and with it the big entrance hall. It almost felt as if the castle was assisting her in her quest to move quickly.

Professor Snape and his wife, as well as the man with his cat she had seen several times in the castle were already there. Preparing.

Stepping up to the wizard in dark robes, Carisma asked for directions. “Madame Pomfrey sends this basket of potions, Professor Snape. I might be a squib, but I do have basic medical training and regularly refresh my training for first aid. I want to help.”

Behind the wizard one of the long benches from the Great Hall was placed along one wall by some of the elves living at the castle. His dark eyes scanned her, face almost too calm and collected. “Set up near the doors over there.” He waved his hand to indicate the spot he was talking about. “Make sure all children and townspeople with visible injuries move over to where Professor McGonagall will set up, hand out calming draughts to those who need them, and keep an eye out for shock.”

There was no room for happiness at being accepted by a wizard as Carisma did exactly as she had been instructed. Such an emergency situation needed people in charge who knew what they were doing. It looked as if Severus Snape – the new Lord Prince as she had read in the Prophet she still had a subscription to – knew what he was doing.

Other adults arrived and were sent to different parts of the hall by Snape, before the first carriages – supervised by the enormous man Hagrid – arrived, pouring out children, adults, and students fleeing from the village.

“Come here dear.” Carisma greeted the first girl reaching her. One sleeve of her robe was ripped, and the palms of her hands looked as if she had tried to break her fall on a place covered with gravel. “Did you fall?”

“I was running.” The girl looked to be around sixteen and was shaking. “And I think I tripped?”

Carisma plucked one of the small phials filled with a lavender-tinted milky liquid out of her supply and handed it to the girl. “Here, that will help you calm down. Do you have any pain?”

The girl looked at her hands before accepting the unstoppered potion. “My hands and knees hurt. But that’s all, I guess.”

“Do you see those benches over there?” A few of the long benches had been arranged into a small waiting area, where they were supposed to send lightly injured people, and which had been marked off with floating yellow banners. “Go over there and sit down so that the professors can help you with your hands and knees.”
The girl nodded, mumbled a “Thanks.” and moved over to sit down where she had been told.

Before Carisma could do more than dunk her hands in a bowl of water mixed with a potion to clean them, an adult – probably living down in the village – stood before her, one eye almost swollen shut. “I think I got something in my eye, ma’am.”

“Looks likely,” Carisma agreed and felt that this was going to be a long long day.

In the next moments, she got to see many different injuries. Hands and knees skinned by falling, broken arms or legs when people did fall farther than just from standing to the floor, or when someone got stepped on after falling. There were a lot of bruises, a few bleeding from wounds on the head, and many who had been shaken by what had happened.

Just by listening to the people she came in contact with, she got a vague idea about what had happened down at the village.

“It was such a fine day! And then suddenly it got dark, and the goats tried to get into the barn. Toppled me right over in their panic!” one older wizard complained while Carisma tried to get him to accept the calming draught.

“I think I sprained my ankle when that shimmery barrier suddenly sprang up from nowhere!”

“These were demon birds! I’m sure of it!”

“My parents will never allow me to visit the village again when they hear of the explosions!”

Roughly twenty patients in, Carisma was pretty sure that the Howler Terrorist had attempted another attack, his biggest yet, and somehow the whole village had been shielded.

Only when she saw two big wizards carrying in a small figure with unruly dark hair did she get a vague picture of just who might have had a hand in the magical rescue of that many people.

Knowing that she herself could do nothing for Henry Slytherin-Potter, and that Madam Pomfrey didn’t have that many urgent cases to care for, Carisma refrained from running to the boy’s side, instead once more cleaning her hands and turning to the next terrified student coming to her for help.

Sirius watched as Marvolo Slytherin, probably still a Dark Lord, but currently very much the concerned parent, paced up and down in his most formal parlour at Grimmauld Place. It had been half an hour by now since the man had appeared on his doorstep, young Marcus at his side and worry on his face.

“Do you want something to eat, Marcus?” Sirius turned to ask of the small boy sitting in one of the armchairs, hugging his own knees, watching Slytherin pace with worried eyes. He got a small nod in return and managed not to sigh.

“Kreacher!” he called for the elf, and after he had popped into the room, bowing, gave his orders. “Please prepare some tea, hot chocolate, and snacks for my guests. And when you’re done with that, have a look around and see if you can find something for Marcus to play with.”
Kreacher nodded and, against Sirius’ expectations, opened his mouth to ask a question. “Might Kreacher ask Flimm get something from Griffin House?”

“That sounds like a good idea.” Sirius almost jumped from his seat when Lord Slytherin spoke unexpectedly.

Dismissing his elf with a nod, Sirius watched as the other man forced his mannerisms and face to be a lot calmer than he could possibly be.

Once the requested refreshments had made an appearance on the table, it didn’t take long for Marcus to move over to a corner of the room suddenly filled with different toys, books, and games as well as an elf, which Sirius was pretty sure was Flimm.

Now that the child was taken care of, Sirius turned to the agitated wizard currently stirring the fourth spoonful of sugar into his tea. “Could you possibly inform me what exactly is happening? I gathered that there’s something happening in Hogsmeade, and you’re waiting for more news?” In fact, Sirius still felt a little as if he had been run over by a car. It had seemed a bad idea to refuse entry to Lord Slytherin when he had showed up, if only for the child’s safety, but Sirius had no real information beside that simple statement.

“We were visiting Amelia at the Ministry, when an Auror trainee found us in the Wizengamot chamber to inform her about an attack at the village and that help was required. She told me to stay out of the way and that I would be informed as soon as there was news.” The spoon was placed down with so much control that Sirius felt just a little bit more pressure would snap the silver. Not that he would have been sad to see that piece of bad taste gone.

“I guess Harry had plans to go to the village, and you haven’t heard from him yet?” Sirius asked in an attempt to keep the man speaking.

“Harry and his friends most certainly were at the village this morning. He said they had agreed to make a day out of not studying.” Slytherin emptied his cup and set it down, betraying his trembling hands through the rattling sound of the cup on the saucer. “I insisted on bodyguards. But I have heard from neither them nor Harry so far.”

Sirius nodded, the communication mirrors were really useful devices. So much faster than owl post. “Harry probably left both mirrors in his dormitory. And if the old protocols are still in place, the students probably are gathered in the Great Hall. He wouldn’t be able to get it to contact either of us.” Whether he said that to assure Lord Slytherin or himself, Sirius wasn’t sure. “Can’t the bodyguards send a message via patronus?” It would indicate that there was a problem if the bodyguards could have sent a message but didn’t.

But Slytherin was already shaking his head, levitating tea and sugar into his cup without lifting the containers. “They are really good at keeping an eye on a crowd, sensing possible danger. And at getting an individual out of a tight spot. But as far as I’m aware, they can’t cast a patronus.”

For a moment Sirius contemplated asking about other means of communication. There surely was still something in place from before Lord Slytherin had reclaimed a spot in society. But that was a sensitive topic he might better leave alone.

“I wanted to ask if I can leave Marcus here if I’m needed at Hogwarts.” Slytherin suddenly broke the silence that had fallen between them.

Before his mind had completely considered what that might mean, Sirius nodded. “Of course.
Marcus is a delight to have around. He’ll be safe here.”

“Thank you,” Slytherin said, picking up his second cup of tea. “I have my elf waiting for information with the order to bring it here the moment a letter reaches my postbox or any of the houses.”

Sirius took that to mean that there still were connections in place that could provide Slytherin with information faster than normal channels of communication.

Not willing to speak about the next Wizengamot session, or engage in useless small talk, Sirius let another silence descend over the room, only occasionally broken by giggling and explosions from where Marcus was playing exploding snap with both Kreacher and Flimm.

When the shimmering form of a patronus, that of a cat, sauntered into the room through the wall, both men tensed in their seats.

“Lord Slytherin. I want to inform you that your son currently is residing in the infirmary. Madam Pomfrey is sure that he will recover. But you might want to come to Hogwarts regardless. You can use the floo to my office.”

The patronus wasn’t even completely faded before Lord Slytherin was out of his seat. “May I use your floo, Lord Black?”

“Be my guest,” Sirius answered, standing as well. “Please inform me if there is any development.”

“Of course.” Slytherin answered, before going over to inform Marcus that he would be leaving to look after Harry.

After watching the man leave – Slytherin knew the house well enough to find the floo on his own – Sirius walked over to sit with Marcus and the elves, and play a round of exploding snap. Hopefully it would work well to distract him while they were waiting.

dome of some kind over the whole village. My guess is that’s the reason we don’t see more damage than we do.”

Conceding the point, Dora turned slowly in a circle. “Creating that many howlers must have taken lots of time. Do you think we could use that to eliminate some suspects from the list? We know whoever this is works at the Ministry. It’s a wizard most likely. Probably doesn’t have a kid at Hogwarts who was out in the village today,” she mused out loud, recounting part of the clues they had so far, which had proven to be a useful technique.

“He obviously isn’t happy with how the case of Lord Slytherin was handled.” Dawlish added what Dora had learned from the Egyptians and the targets the terrorist had attempted to harm, and the fragments of the text that had been written.

“Well, considering that there are many people who don’t have any children at Hogwarts, and how many people probably still are unhappy with Lord Slytherin for the past, or his more recent actions…” Dora trailed off, thinking about the changes to the werewolf laws and how it still was only a tiny step in the right direction.

Kingsley sighed. “Let’s comb through the debris and see if we can find anything more.”

And so they did just that, and all the while Dora thought about who might be desperate enough to basically risk killing all children in Britain between thirteen and seventeen. Who would do that?

The thought that someone who had lost their child might be able to fall that far didn’t leave Dora for even a moment while they searched the village. But even as she could think of one man who would match all criteria – including the lost child – they needed evidence. Maybe she would be able to get a search permit for the house once they were done here. But they definitely needed more than just her hunch to act.

If one didn’t count the portraits of all past – and dead – Headmasters, the office was empty when Marvolo arrived by floo. Not even the phoenix was there. For a moment Marvolo wondered where the bird had gone, but the fact that his son was in the infirmary was much more important at the moment. So he left the office, hurried down the steps, and made his way to the infirmary.

In the hall in front of the hospital wing, Marvolo met a few students with bandages and ripped clothes. Nothing too dire, but they looked shaken.

Taking a few deep breaths, Marvolo calmed himself down – or tried to – before he opened the door and stepped in.

The image he saw wasn’t all that bad. A few children were lying in beds, arms or legs immobilised, probably because they were broken. Around a few more beds the curtains were drawn, and all in all the room had the usual calm quality about it that Marvolo remembered from his few visits here.

He decided to take it as a good sign that there was no hurried running around and no sobbing parents.

“Lord Slytherin!” Madam Pomfrey called from the entrance to one of the private rooms. “That was fast. Come here, please.”
Going as fast as he could without running, Marvolo hurried over to where the medi-witch was waiting for him, looking harried. “Madame Pomfrey, the Headmistress said my son is here?”

“Yes. He’s severely exhausted. No idea how much magic he used! But he’ll recover after decent rest. Currently he’s sleeping. Mr. Goyle and Mr. Crabbe brought him here, and then went down to give what information they could to the Aurors.”

She moved out of the way so that Marvolo could step into the room where the first thing he saw was his son in a bed, under the blanket looking much too small and pale.

“If it’s alright with you, Madam, I would like to stay here and wait for him to wake.” Before she had a chance to answer he had moved one of the chairs without even touching his wand, setting it down right next to the bed so he could keep an eye on his son and the door at the same time.

“Of course you can stay. Please call for me should he wake, and make sure he stays in bed.” Without waiting for him to answer, she was gone, probably to see after her other patients.

Seemed as if today was a day without much regard for social niceties. But seeing everything that had happened, that wasn’t the worst.

Settling into the chair, adding a charm to make it more comfortable, Marvolo prepared to wait.

ooOoo

He felt as if he had been run over by a car. Or as if he hadn’t been fast enough during a game of Harry-Hunting. But not exactly.

It was hard to open his eyes, and Harry contemplated just turning over and going back to sleep as an alternative to opening his eyes, when the noise of someone shifting in their chair changed that plan.

Who would be sitting at his bedside? Maybe Hermione? Or one of the Slytherins? Neville? It made Harry feel good that he had so many more friends than just last year.

Before the summer that had changed everything.

Carefully opening his eyes Harry saw nothing clearly at first.

Then a big dark shadow moved, murmuring “Let me get your glasses, Harry,” as he stood from his chair.

Marvolo had been sitting with him.

Harry was pretty sure that he shouldn’t be surprised about that by now.

His glasses were carefully placed on his nose and over his ears, bringing his surroundings into focus. After that Marvolo helped Harry to put a pillow behind his head so he could see the chair better than he could have lying on his back.

“What have you done, Harry?” Marvolo asked, sitting down again, folding his hands in his lap. His father was much too calm for Harry’s peace of mind.
Harry swallowed, feeling nervous all of a sudden. He had known that Marvolo would be unhappy the moment that idea had entered his mind.

“What happened? I haven’t heard anything…” Harry trailed off pretty sure that it wouldn’t be a good idea to bring up the fact that he had passed just now.

“What I know is that there was an attack on the village. Howlers, by all accounts. And that a shimmering magical barrier that no one could explain reduced the damage. There were broken bones and other minor injuries caused by people falling. But no one was killed or seriously injured.” Now Marvolo gave him a dark look. “No one but you, that is.”

“Well,” Harry wasn’t really sure where to begin or how to explain why he had risked himself. Hermione probably would claim that he had a saving-people-thing. “When I saw that dark cloud and realised that it was made of birds, each carrying a howler, all those other attacks came to mind. There was no way that the houses would be safe, or that everyone would manage to get out of the village!” Harry wished that his voice was a little bit stronger so he could make Marvolo understand why there had been no other way.

“Calm down, Harry,” Marvolo said, placing one hand on the leg nearest to him. “I can’t pretend that I don’t wish you had found another solution. Or that you simply had run. I think I know you better than that by now. I simply wish to understand what exactly you did and why.”

Harry took a deep breath and tried to relax back into his pillows. “I thought about using the portkey, but that wouldn’t help all the others. Then our discussion how to use Parselmagic to protect others popped into my mind. I knew it was probably too big a place to protect. But I had clear intent, and I remembered the words you agreed would be useful to shield myself and Marcus if it was ever necessary. So I simply… did it.” And it seemed as if it truly had worked.

That was kind of crazy.

Marvolo blinked slowly. “I knew that Parselmagic could achieve incredible things if the one using it was of strong mind and will. That one, not even fully grown wizard, would be able to shield a village from explosions… That’s surprising.” If Harry had to describe his father in that moment he would say that Marvolo seemed more than surprised.

“I did repair that tapestry when all the experts told Sirius he would need to have a new one done,” Harry reminded his father of his other unauthorized use of Parselmagic.

“That could have been a case of trying to sell something new,” Marvolo pointed out, but shrugged, before he stood. “I had to promise Madam Pomfrey that I would inform her the moment you wake. And Marcus will want to know that you’re on the mend.”

Already feeling the little bit of energy leaving him again, Harry only nodded and yawned. “Please tell him that I’m fine, if a little tired.” He felt himself smile, and grabbed the hand Marvolo held out, before the older wizard left the room to speak with the medi-witch.

Harry listened to the voices from outside the private room he was in, getting a glimpse of a robed arm as he tried to peek through the door to see what was happening. It seemed he had a guard standing at his door.

A few moments later – Harry was too tired to keep track of time, but it didn’t feel like he had waited long – Madam Pomfrey came bustling in, a potions phial in her hand and a frown on her face. “Mr. Slytherin, I have to say it’s a wonder how you manage to land in my infirmary so consistently. And always because of some dangerous situation.”
Harry wasn’t sure what to say to this, so he kept silent even as he could have protested that he really wasn’t at fault for many of his visits. In second year Lockhart had vanished his bones, that were only broken because Dobby had hexed the bludger.

“Here, take this. It’ll help you recover faster from your exhaustion. And you have to accept that you’re not allowed to perform any magic until I give you the all clear. In all my years here at the school, never…” She rambled on but Harry didn’t really have the energy to pay attention.

He accepted the phial, downed the potion, and nodded to her instruction not to use any magic until he was rested.

Rest and sleep sounded like a really good idea right now.

Before Marvolo came back from informing Harry’s godfather and Marcus that Harry would make a full recovery, the teenager was sleeping peacefully once again.

oooOOooo

He was furious! How could that have happened?

Everyone was saying that it was almost a miracle that not one person had died, that no one had been seriously injured. With the possibilities of magic, everyone would be fine before the new week began.

How could that be?

He stalked from one end of the house to the other. Whatever he found that could be destroyed by throwing it to the floor he picked up and smashed it. All remaining parchment had been shredded, his potions spilled.

Why had his plan failed?

How was that even possible?

There were rumours that magic herself had intervened, shielded her chosen and the precious children from harm.

He had needed to bite his own tongue when he had heard that.

How could people be that foolish?

If there was something like an entity magic, wouldn’t that entity have protected his son?

But short of divine intervention, he really wasn’t sure what could have thwarted the number of howlers he had addressed to various students of Hogwarts and residents of Hogsmeade.

Maybe he really needed to be more active and brave, act himself, out in the open. Maybe this was a sign.

Chapter End Notes
I have build up to this chapter for quite some time. I hope this was a nice action chapter. And sorry that this chapter didn't include the name of the potion ;)

Thanks to Jordre and Jake for helping to improve my spelling!

First published on the 26th of April 2019
Next chapter planned for 10th of May 2019
In the last chapter I managed to give Mrs. Goyle her second given name (simply forgot that I already had given her a first name previously) :D So she now will be known as Patricia Carisma Goyle, who prefers to be called Carisma. By the time this will be published I’ll have changed chapter 24 to match that new name. (I need to work on my note keeping of names for OCs)

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Sunday, 21st of April 1996

Another man walked forward to the dais set at one wall, falling to his knees in front of the wizard sitting in the ornate chair placed there. Red eyes met with brown for seemingly endless moments, before the man stood back up again on wobbly legs, bowing before retreating to make space for the next to come forward.

Lucius was watching the whole scene enfold from the edge of the crowd, as he had been one of the first called before his Lord, to open his mind. Now he was standing here, reminded of the few times that a raid or mission had failed so spectacularly that the Dark Lord had suspected treason among their ranks, resorting to Legilimency to find the supposed traitor. But at the same time as this was eerily familiar, the differences were the real reason he was standing here, working to not chuckle like a lunatic.

For one, after being finished, each Death Eater walked over to a basket filled with small phials of a special headache potion, getting one to combat the inevitable pain after a Legilimens pranced around in their brains.

Then there was the fact that the pain had been minimal, not at all the searing burn it had been in the past. Either his Lord had reached a new level of competence in his ability, making it possible to avoid inflicting pain, or he hadn’t cared before. Lucius was inclined to believe that his Lord had enjoyed causing others pain back then over the idea of the man not being a Master Legilimens before now.

But the most bewildering change was the buffet Lucius was standing next to.

It was a more-than-elaborate buffet. In fact it would have fit right in with the offerings Narcissa would have the elves prepare for one of her functions. There was a section of the table dedicated to sweet things – it seemed as if it was bigger than the other parts – from small elaborate cakes, to candied fruits, and small bowls of different creams and custards. And they were delicious, too. Then there were several platters with sandwiches – from cucumber to chicken – small sausages encased in pastry dough, cheese, small bread rolls, and so on. A whole piglet, lamb, duck were presented on platters. Lucius was sure it was more food than all the people currently present could eat in a day.

Hopefully this wouldn’t take that long, though. It was late in the night on Sunday. Lucius really wished to be home with his wife and daughter after a long day fielding the press on behalf of the Minister.

After that attack on the village, the public had demanded immediate action. And delivering that action wasn’t really all that easy. Most of the day had been spent assessing the damage done to the village, healing those who had been injured, and planning what else was to be done. The Headmistress had agreed to offer sanctuary to everyone living in Hogsmeade that didn’t want to – or couldn’t – return to their homes right away. Hogwarts’ wards were of the best quality, and it was the only place with enough spare rooms to accommodate that many people. There was no doubt that the castle had been built with the possibility in mind that it would need to provide shelter for a large number of people.

“Can you recommend something?” someone asked of Lucius, who turned to look at who had snug up on him.

“Benjamin.” Lucius nodded in greeting. “I haven’t tried a lot yet. But the Creme Brulee is quite good.”

Paying more attention to the buffet and its offerings than to Lucius, Benjamin addressed his fellow Death Eater, acting casually, but fooling no one. “I’m beyond curious who or what was the cause of the shield that saved the day. You wouldn’t possibly know more than the rumours tell?”

Lucius placed the empty phial he had been toying with down on the buffet table, where it promptly vanished, and picked up a small bowl of a chocolate mousse he hadn’t tried yet, before he answered that loaded question. “I certainly could speculate. But I guess that would be foolish of me.” Not that Lucius wasn’t curious after the urgent and short letter he had received from his son. “I think the speculation of that many minds focused on the same objective being the cause is the most plausible I have heard so far.”

Benjamin picked a pastry filled with something that looked like cherries and leisurely turned to look at Lucius. “Really? By all accounts I heard, the thing on most minds was panic. And looking back over history doesn’t turn up even one other instance of something like this happening. And there were more disasters compelling the people to think of safety in our history than one can comfortably count.”

Lucius held in a sigh. So Benjamin had also got news from his son – his elder son, to be precise – and was trying to confirm that their Lord’s heir had had something to do with the shield. Their Lord had been silent on the topic so far, and Lucius had to assume, for the moment, that they should keep this under wraps as much as they were able.

“What do you want me to say? I’m not an Unspeakable and therefore not an expert on unusual magical occurrences.” Hopefully Benjamin would catch on quickly.

For a moment there was silence between them, Benjamin eating his pastry and the both of them watching a moron being cursed for speaking out of turn to someone he wanted to impress, risking their operations by what Lucius could catch from the rant their Lord was not exactly shouting.

Waving his wand at his hands to get rid of the stickiness of the pastry, Benjamin hummed as the next Death Eater walked up to their Lord. “I’m no expert on this either. Do you think our Lord had the time to look into this? Such unusual magic should be something he would be interested in. Isn’t it?”

Lucius gave the other a flat look, only to get a small smirk in return. Infuriating man. “Has anyone really had any time for anything? This is the first proper meal not rushed between getting from one place to the other since the attack. I guess our Lord has even more on his plate than either of us.”

Once again Benjamin hummed, turning back to the buffet to pick up a small pumpkin pastry, carefully moving around two more men taking something to eat. “I guess you’re right, Lucius. I’ll try to refrain from speculating, and just be grateful that Theo wasn’t harmed.”

Lucius nodded. He too was grateful that Draco hadn’t been harmed, or any of the other children. “Yes. That nobody was seriously harmed is truly something to be grateful for.” And if they both were right in their speculation, their Lord’s heir most likely had something to do with the miraculous shield. And most of wizarding Britain might be in debt to a boy of not yet sixteen.

When another Death Eater came their way, clearly interested to chat, Lucius wished that Severus was here. Hiding behind a potion-centric discussion would be perfect about now. But in light of the fact that Severus was a Master Occlumens, and quite capable of keeping anyone from his thoughts, it was reasonable that the man wouldn’t be here.

Rolling his eyes at Benjamin, who quickly smothered a smirk, Lucius gave in to the inevitable and started a verbal sparring match with the lower Ministry officials in their Lord’s ranks.

With a weary sigh Marvolo sat down heavily in his chair behind the desk in his study at Headquarters. It had been a long evening.

Before Marvolo even could come up with the energy to call for Henbane and ask for a headache potion and something to eat, both just popped into existence right in front of him on the desk, while unfinished paperwork, letters and the like, were piled up to the side of the desk.

Reaching for the potion phial first, Marvolo murmured a “Thank you, Henbane.” into the air, sure that the elf would be able to hear. With no dithering around, the cork was popped out of the phial and the potion tossed back. Performing Legilimency on that many people was draining and had left him with a slight headache.

Making a face, Marvolo decided to not think on all the much-too-personal details he had learned during his search for a possible accomplice to the Howler Terrorist in the ranks of his people. Instead he moved on to take a good look at the plate of food his elf had helpfully provided.

There was a sandwich with some kind of venison and a mayonnaise-based spread, as well as a small pile of sticks of carrot and cucumber. By far the biggest part of the plate was occupied by sweets though. Pumpkin pasties – two of them – miniature waffles with chocolate sauce, a cauldron cake, and fresh berries.

It didn’t take Marvolo long to finish the food, starting with the sandwich and vegetables because he needed to get into the habit of eating the healthy things first. When Mrs. Peters had pointed out that Marcus had started to imitate Marvolo’s eating habits, he had realized that he would need to make an effort to be a responsible adult and a good example for his younger son.

It really was late, but in the hopes that Harry might just be awake, Marvolo picked up the mirror he constantly had on his person and turned the reflective surface towards himself before activating it.

“Father!” Harry answered in such short a time that Marvolo was sure the mirror had been close at hand and Harry had been waiting.

“Harry. You look as if you should be sleeping.” And the boy did. He was too pale, even in the low light of the hospital wing, and had bags under his eyes.

“Then you shouldn’t have sent Professor Snape to bring the mirror, father.” There was a slight chididing tone in that answer, and Marvolo wasn’t sure if he should be angry or amused.

“I wanted to make sure that we have a fast way of communication. But you’re right. I assumed you would stay up so we could talk.” A tray with a cup, teapot, sugar dish, and a small plate with biscuits popped onto the table, another reminder from Henbane that Marvolo needed to drink and eat enough.

“What have you been up to? What’s new?” Harry asked, changing topics rather quickly in a way Marvolo could understand perfectly. He didn’t really want to discuss his sleeping habits either.

“The Ministry is currently wrapped up in sorting out how to rebuild the village, and how to secure it better. I have checked to see if I missed something among my people. Beside one who bragged a little too much to some witches about being a Death Eater, I didn’t find anyone involved with the whole howler mess.” He didn’t see a reason to share the instances of unusual sexual practices or domestic violence with his son. He might plan to do something about the latter – the first might inspire some research out of curiosity over human nature – but he didn’t need to tell his son about the private matters of others.

“That’s good?” Harry sounded unsure, and Marvolo nodded.

“It is good. Because I like to think that I had enough intelligence left even back then to select people as my followers who would know better than to do something like that to reach their goals. On the other hand, that leaves quite a few more possible suspects still out there.” At least he now had only mostly reasonable people in his ranks. He pinched the bridge of his nose when the two cases of domestic violence came to mind.

“Will you keep me updated?” Harry asked, yawning.

“If you promise to follow Healer Greengrass’ and Madam Pomfrey’s directions so you’ll recover faster.” Marvolo demanded with a grin on his face. They both were Slytherins. Why should he just follow along with Harry’s demand?

Harry snorted and rolled his eyes. “She says that I’m not allowed to use any magic, and that I need to stay in bed. Do you know how utterly boring that is?”

“I could bring Nagini over to keep you company?” Marvolo suggested, imagining the way his familiar would curl up on top of Harry, making sure that he stayed in bed in her own unique way.

The glare Harry send him to that was withering. “Don’t you dare! And I don’t think Madame Pomfrey, or Professor McGonagall, would allow her to stay at the castle anyway.”

“Probably not.” Marvolo conceded. “And will you follow Madam Pomfrey’s directions?”

Harry huffed. “I guess. If I’m going to do that, I’ll probably should end this call and go to sleep. You should do the same.”

“Probably.” Marvolo grinned when Harry rolled his eyes at that. “I’ll finish up some things, after that’s done I’ll go home. I want you to decide if you want it to be known that it was you who created the shield, or not. The sooner I know, the better. Pleasant dreams, Harry.”
Harry glared again, and ignored that request when he answered. “Pleasant dreams! And don’t stay up too long. I’m not above asking Healer Greengrass to monitor your sleep!” As threats went, that one was weak and strong at the same time. While Malcolm Greengrass was his personal healer and therefore had some authority, he also was a Death Eater and under Marvolo’s authority because of that.

“I don’t think that will be necessary. There isn’t much left to do, and I’ll take a dose of sleeping draught so that I’ll get enough rest.” Harry relaxed after Marvolo had said that, and they quickly ended their call, leaving Marvolo to finish his letters before going home.

The next week was going to be taxing. He really should get enough rest.

Monday, 22nd of April 1996

He was watching the meandering patterns that the rain and the wind created on the window right next to his bed. They were kind of interesting, forming little rivers that vanished as quickly as they had come, running around spots every single time where there probably was some dirt stuck to the window.

It was mesmerizing.

Oh, who was he kidding? He was bored out of his mind by now. And starting to get frustrated with the lack of activity. Watching the rain out of the window was at least something to do.

Hopefully his friends would bring him something to read after lessons were over for the day. Even the book for History of Magic would be fine.

Flopping back to his back, staring at the ceiling, Harry thought about the Howler Terrorist and Marvolo’s request that he needed to decide what the public should get to know.

If he said yes to inform the public, he would get even more attention. But that would be for something he had actually done. Not for his mother’s sacrifice, his name, or the fact that he had been adopted, but for magic he had actually cast.

Did he really want everyone to know that he had performed magic that had even impressed Marvolo? The man wasn’t that easy to impress.

No, he really rather would not be known to be able to perform magic on a level that others thought to be impossible. The possibility of fear of someone more powerful, of Unspeakables demanding to use him for their research, mindless fans wanting something from him, and anything else he had not thought of, wasn’t an appealing outlook.

But would it hurt their community not to know where the shield had come from? Harry wasn’t sure, and that was making him restless. Could he be selfish and let the public believe it had been some sort of miracle?

Only the arrival of his friends managed to break that spiralling chain of thoughts. A blessing, if “I collected notes and homework from all your classes of the day,” was the first thing Hermione said when she walked in at the front of the small group coming in after classes had ended and before dinner.

“It’s nice to see you too, Hermione,” Harry answered, grinning, while he checked who had come. He was pretty sure that Madam Pomfrey had restricted the number of people who could visit him at one time, as well as the time they could stay. She had threatened to do that, and Harry knew she always kept her word. “How long can you stay?”

“Half an hour,” was Theo’s answer as he dragged the one visitor’s chair over, while Luna closed the door behind them.

“The others wanted to come too, but Madam Pomfrey said not more than three at a time. You’ll get a lot of visitors,” Luna said in her dreamy way before she sat down right next to Harry on his bed.

“I can use every distraction I can get,” Harry said with feeling, taking Luna’s hand into his, glad that she had come.

“That’s why I brought your homework. You can’t exactly practice here, but you can study the theory and write your essays.” With a dull sound she placed a bag on his bedside table, probably filled with books and writing implements. “You need to keep up with the work so you’ll not fall behind so shortly before the OWLs.”

“And to make sure that you get to do something fun, I asked Professor Snape to get your art supplies from your room,” Theo said, picking up a small satchel, and placing it on Harry’s legs. “I hope he found everything you need. It’s not easy to ask him for something like that.” Theo shuddered theatrically, making Luna and Harry laugh, while Hermione made a face.

“So what are the rumours?” The Hogwarts rumour mill was one of the fastest Harry had ever seen. Not even Little Whinging had been that fast on the trading of half-truths and judgement.

“About the identity of the terrorist, or about the shield?” Theo asked, settling back down in the visitor chair.

“Both, either.” Getting to hear a bit of gossip might help him decide what to do about the decision.

“The claims to the terrorist’s identity are all over the place,” Hermione answered, organising the books she had brought on the bedside table. “Most are not even remotely based on facts. Just over lunch one of the second-years said Professor Binns had to be the terrorist.” She shook her head, making her curls fly, clearly exasperated.

“Most in Slytherin think that it’s someone working for the Ministry or with a family member working at the Ministry. How else could they have charmed a memo to be a howler?” Theo picked up the tale.

“They didn’t listen to my information. But father is pretty sure that the Minister is trying to keep the power and sabotage Lord Slytherin with his army of heliopaths.” Sometimes Luna’s different claims were a little outlandish, and Harry could already spot that Hermione was on the verge of going on a rampage to refute that claim, so he turned to Theo and asked the first question that came to mind. “And about the shield?”

Smirking, Theo answered that one. “Some claim that Magic Herself intervened. Some claim it was you, based on the fact that you already did the impossible by surviving the killing curse. Really ancient, forgotten wards are another popular possibility. I’m not sure what to believe. I guess the ancient wards are kind of plausible.” Theo shrugged, clearly not interested in going through all the rumours.

“Have Fred and George opened a betting pool?” The twins and Lee Jordan had opened betting pools for numerous things in the past. Maybe they had done so again.

“They haven’t,” Hermione stated, sitting down at the foot of the bed. “Ron asked after one, but they don’t think it’s likely that we’ll get a definitive answer to the current questions. And with the number of injured people, the danger for more, they thought it a bad idea to bet on it. I hadn’t thought them that sensible.”

“Now you’re being mean, Hermione. Fred and George have clear boundaries. Just because you disapprove of their tendency to prank people, you can’t claim them to be insensible or unintelligent. Their work is innovative!” Harry really was unhappy at how many people looked down on the twins because they applied their creativity and knowledge to develop pranks. Their mother, one of their older brothers, people like Hermione, and, Harry was pretty sure, quite a few of their professors.

“I’m not mean,” Hermione insisted. “They could accomplish so many meaningful things with their knowledge and creativity, their ability to think outside the box. But they concentrate all of that talent on useless pranks.” She threw up her hands, her voice rising the longer she was speaking.

The discussion escalated from there, as Theo watched with an amused smirk on his face, while Luna got out a small book of poems from her pocket, seemingly ignoring them all.

The discussion only ended when Madam Pomfrey came in to remind them that the allotted time of thirty minutes was over. “Mr. Slytherin, you need rest and quiet. Not all the commotion visitors bring.”

“But I’m restless!” Harry insisted while his friends vanished, waving, out of the door to his private room.

“You don’t need to sleep, Mr. Slytherin. But you will not leave your bed!” She put emphasis on her words with chopping hand motions. And Harry found himself nodding in agreement before her vehemence had fully registered.

“Can you leave the door open? I would like to sketch the room.” Harry felt like cringing because what had been meant to be a statement came out like a question.

“I can do that,” Madam Pomfrey agreed with a nod, and strode out of the room only moments later, her prim shoes making clicking sounds on the polished floor.

Harry reached for the satchel Theo had brought and got out his sketchpad and the charcoal pieces he used, before settling back against the headboard until he found the perfect angle to get an interesting sketch of the infirmary beyond the door to his private room. Then he started sketching, the charcoal moving smoothly over the paper.

ooOoo
The useless brats once again had managed to damage one of the precious portraits in the castle, and now he had cut himself on the sharp edge of the damaged frame.

In a more-than-grumpy mood, Argus walked into the infirmary to let Madam Pomfrey look at the cut. He probably would have to wait long, with that many small brats staying here because of the injuries they had obtained at the village on Saturday.

While he searched for Madam Pomfrey, or a place to sit down, Argus noticed that one of the doors to the private rooms at the back of the hospital wing was open, revealing a slight figure sitting on the bed.

Was that the brat Lord Slytherin had adopted? And was he using a sketchpad? How interesting.

It always had offended him that Hogwarts did not have even one art-related subject on offer for the students who were artistically inclined. It looked like that one was dedicated enough to work on some art outside of classes and motivation stemming from them.

“Argus, why are you here?”

He turned to see Madam Pomfrey standing behind him, a questioning look on her face. “I cut myself. I don’t want to get any blood on my work. Could you possibly heal it?” It was so frustrating to always have to ask for help from others when he needed some magic done.

“Certainly. Please follow me into my office.” And she was gone. With a sigh Argus followed the matron into her office to get the cut cleaned and healed so he could get back to repairing the damage done to the poor painting.

Sometimes he really wished those brats had some respect for art.

Tuesday, 23rd of April 1996

One of the big conference rooms at the Ministry was quickly filling with people. Amelia was here as the representative of the Law Enforcement, together with the Aurors who had searched the scene and had been working on the whole case for longer. She was tired. The whole situation reminded her too much of the time just after Voldemort’s fall during the Death Eater trials. Too much too do in too little time with too few people.

She had a feeling that this big meeting had the potential to go bad really quickly.

“Alright! Listen, everyone!” Cornelius called five minutes after the meeting should have started and before everyone who had been invited had arrived.

It took another few moments before everyone had settled down and the Minister – as short as he was – finally could be seen from all corners of the room.

“We’re here today to map out our plan of action on how to best use the Ministry’s resources to finally find and arrest the Howler Terrorist.” Amelia made a face at that sensationalist, if accurate, nickname the Prophet had coined for the perpetrator. “Aurors Tonks, Dawlish, and Shacklebolt have been investigating the scene of the latest crime. You’ll find a copy of the information in front of you.” Amelia already had read the file, so she didn’t open it as all the others did in just that moment.

“Auror Tonks, please present the information we have at the moment, and where you think more resources can be applied to the best effect.” Cornelius waved at the young woman – who had been hesitant to speak before all those people at first – giving the floor to her. Tonks stood and started to give a succinct report. “We know that the person we are looking for is male. He creates his own howler supplies and probably has his own garden to grow some of the ingredients. We don’t currently know where he gets the birds from. Judging by the targets before Hogsmeade, it seems that he holds a grudge against Lord Slytherin and how the magical community has handled the whole situation.” She waved a hand to indicate the Wizengamot and its decision, the frenzy among the high society over getting to know the man, the adoption of the Boy-Who-Lived, and everything else. “We currently assume that he has no children at the school old enough to be allowed to go to Hogsmeade, or is the parent of one of those children who stayed at the castle.” Tonks stopped for a short moment, taking a breath. “We also suspect that the perpetrator either works at the Ministry, or has a family member, or close friend, working here. Everything else is conjecture.”

The witch currently sporting curly, bright yellow hair, took a sip from a glass of water before continuing. “We could use help in testing the scraps of the partially burned parchment pieces and the one complete howler we have from the attack on the Minister’s office. We also should investigate the way all those birds were obtained. Furthermore, we should take into account how much time it takes to create all those howlers. I think those are the most pressing and promising avenues of investigation.”

“But what’s with the shield?” Croaker spoke up, causing a murmur to go around the room. “Don’t you think that’s an interesting phenomenon in need of investigation?”

Amelia rolled her eyes and concentrated on the young Auror, interested to see how she would handle a senior employee derailing an important meeting like that.

“With all due respect, Sir, but the shield most likely wasn’t created by the man we are searching for. While knowing the cause or origin of it certainly is interesting, it will not help us catch the perpetrator. And seeing the way the attacks have escalated, we need to hurry. Otherwise we possibly will have to face many deaths.” Amelia felt like standing up and clapping. It always was a delight to see one of the self-important wizards put in their place. Especially when a young witch was the one doing it.

Croaker nodded, and refrained from commenting further.

Cornelius clapped once, drawing all attention back to him. “Thank you, Auror Tonks. I want a list of all Ministry employees who have been on holiday or ill in the last weeks. Let’s remove them from the list of suspects.” Which was a political way to say that they were the prime suspects and a good place to start.

After that the meeting dissolved into bickering over who was to do what, which department had which authority in this and which projects or normal duties could be neglected to further the investigation. They didn’t even break for lunch, and Amelia was sure this would resemble the days of the last war too much for her comfort.

oooOOooo
Staying in the hospital wing to be monitored for magical exhaustion was the most boring thing Harry had experienced in a while.

Sure, he had stayed here for the same thing back in his first year, but back then he had slept most of the time. But this time he was awake. And bored out of his mind.

Without distractions during the day, his homework and reading had been easy to do, and even though Hermione probably would make sure he got the work from today, it would not last long.

Moving to get a good look out of the window, Harry set everything up to make a sketch – his second attempt – from the view out of the window.

“Sketching again?” A voice from behind Harry asked, making him turn to have a look.

“Ron!” There right in the doorway stood Ron, looking relaxed, but tired, a chess set under his arm. “So you’re part of today’s group of visitors?” Harry asked, feeling a little pathetic for his enthusiasm, which he hoped didn’t show too much.

“That I am,” Ron agreed. “We thought to... mix it up would be a good idea.” With that explanation, the red-head walked into the room, making room for Neville and Ginny to come in as well.

“I have your assignments,” Neville said, moving one of the now three visitor chairs – Madam Pomfrey had provided two more when she had announced that Harry would have to stay the rest of the week – a little before sitting down. “Hermione was most insistent that you should get the information so you’ll be able to keep up.” Neville rolled his eyes and they all chuckled.

“I hope she won’t be such a terror next year when I’m taking my OWLs,” Ginny said with feeling, settling in the chair Ron had been about to take, making her brother roll his eyes at her.

“We could try to distract her.” Harry suggested, grinning. Visitors were a good way to stave off the boredom.

“Not gonna work,” Ron declared, dragging the remaining chair over to Harry’s bed, and placing the chess set down on the bed. “Want to play?”

“Sure!” Harry agreed and placed his drawing supplies down on the floor under the bed, where they would be out of the way.

Once the pieces were set up, and Neville and Ginny were deep in a conversation about Ginny’s latest Herbology homework, Ron almost whispered a question Harry realized had been on his mind since Saturday. “How did you do it?”

Not looking up from the board, pretending to contemplate his next move, Harry asked feeling apprehensive, “How did I do what?”

“The shield,” Ron said, annoyed. “It came out of your wand after you hissed something. I was near enough to see that. As did Neville. We talked, and decided to keep our mouths shut until we could speak with you.”

Harry huffed. Great. He guessed that he should have realised that his two friends would have seen what he had done. Luna had seen too, and just today over lunch had promised him that she wouldn’t speak with anyone if he wanted to avoid the publicity. But would Ron do the same? He really wasn’t the best at keeping secrets. Or maybe just when he thought it was something great “Thanks for that.” Harry settled on starting with. “I don’t want it to become public that the shield was created by me.” And didn’t that still feel wired? Knowing that he had done something that big? “Father agrees that it might be more trouble than it’s worth, because we would have to explain, and people might think me a danger again.”

Ron made a confused face, echoed in his question just as Harry knew it would be. “Why?”

Harry looked between his three friends and weighed what he even could say. “It’s magic based on Parseltongue. It’s family magic. I can’t tell you all that much about what is and what’s not possible.” Ginny and Neville weren’t talking any longer, and Harry was pretty sure they were listening in as well. “Let’s just say that it’s not like the spells we learn here in school. Much more basic in structure. A lot can go wrong if you don’t think things through… so I actually expected a longer lecture about me simply using this to protect a village…” Harry trailed off, looking down on the chessboard, not sure he wanted to see the looks on the others’ faces.

“So you're trying to say this wasn’t an actual spell, but more along the lines of winging it?” Ginny sounded incredulous, demanding he tell her that she had understood that wrong.

“Pretty much,” Harry nodded without looking up. “Father and I had discussed options on how I could protect Marcus if it ever was needed, and I had asked him about this method… he hadn’t looked into it much. Easier, straightforward stuff is much safer. But we discussed how it might work. And that’s what I remembered.” It wasn’t exactly how this had gone – Harry had specifically asked for protection and defence with Parselmagic – but it was close enough and probably better to grasp for his friends.

“That sounds really dangerous!” Neville almost whispered, making Harry look up at his friend’s horrified tone, getting to see a wide-eyed looking Neville, and two redheads with freckles standing out on their pale faces.

“I did end up in the hospital for a whole week,” Harry pointed out with a deadpan voice and look. “That’s why Father insisted I only ever try stuff I talked over with him first and never without adult supervision.” Harry was pretty sure knowing that would get Hermione on board at least. She was all for responsible actions, and the research into new and exciting things.

“And you don’t want it known because it’s dangerous and people will bend this out of proportion?” Ron asked, brow furrowed in thought.

“Exactly. You remember the articles about Hermione, Krum, and me being in a love triangle?” And just thinking about that whole mess made his skin crawl. That had been terribly awful.

“Can we tell Hermione?” Ron asked, a bit of colour returning to his face. “It would be terrible keeping that from her.”

“Just make sure no one listens in and she knows why I want it to be kept from the public.” Harry agreed, because it would be terrible to keep this from Hermione, who was just as much his friend as Ron.

“Great,” was the last thing said to that, and they all went back to what they had been doing before. Neville giving Ginny some tutoring in Herbology, Ron and Harry playing a game of chess.

It was pretty clear really fast that Harry was going to lose once again. Maybe he should start practising more. If Marcus’ fascination with the big chess pieces was anything to go by, if Harry didn’t want to lose to his younger brother all the time in a few years, he needed to get better.

Wednesday, 24th of April 1996

Severus was bone-tired. He had been up brewing when he had not been assisting Madame Pomfrey in the infirmary, Minerva with organising the living places for all the people from Hogsmeade searching for a safe space at Hogwarts, or teaching. He was a professor besides everything else he had to do.

As Sonja couldn’t handle most of the ingredients any longer Severus had had his NEWT classes assist. But that only helped so much.

And now he was here, in his best robes with the Prince coat of arms embroidered in painstaking detail, waiting for the regular Wizengamot meeting of the month of April to start. He really would rather have been in bed, but sadly this was one of his duties, and an order from his Lord as well.

At least he got out of teaching his classes for the day that way. He had set them a research project in the library instead. Which would result in more inane drivel for him to read. Not exactly a perfect trade-off.

But he would be an idiot if he expected a fair trade in this world of politics he had more or less stumbled into.

The mood in the Ministry was tense. Everyone Severus had met on the way down had had definite signs of people who weren't getting enough sleep. This search for the terrorist was taking a toll on everyone.

“Attention! Attention!” the Chief Warlock called out, getting an almost instant reaction, which was unusual as far as Severus could tell. Everyone settled down on their seats pretty quickly, and a hush fell over the room.

The sombre mood had reached even these usually petty wizards and witches, it seemed.

“In the light of recent events, this session will be a shorter regular one, followed by an emergency session about the terrorist currently threatening our community as a whole. Are there any objections to this, or any remarks someone might want to make before we start?” No one raised their wand, so the Chief Warlock got on with the usual preliminary things done at the start of all regular meetings, which Severus blended out in favour of calming himself down with the use of his Occlumency barriers. His Lord had decided – together with the other, older Lords – that Severus was the best man to argue their point on the amendment to some outlawed medical practices.
Severus wasn’t exactly a stranger to speaking in public, but this was something new. He never had had to argue politics in so public a fashion, or with quite as many possible consequences.

“As no one has any announcements to make, let’s proceed with the proposed amendment to the list of banned rituals brought forward by Lord Prince and Lord Nott. Gentlemen.” He waved at them both and Severus stood as had been the plan.
Giving a bow to the Chief Warlock, Severus began, "Thank you, Chief Warlock. In the past, quite a few rituals were banned because of their unpredictable nature and the dangers they could cause. While some are rightly banned for various reasons," and wasn’t that the honest truth? Thinking of some of the things he had read over the years, a cold feeling ran down his back, “More than a few useful rituals, perfectly safe to perform by a witch or wizard proficient in them, were banned as well. Sometimes over a technicality, such as sharing one element of their design with one of the truly dangerous ones.” Severus took a calming breath and tried to include everyone listening, his gaze wandering around the chamber. This was kind of similar to, and at the same time totally different from, lecturing to teenagers.

“Our amendment aims to strike those healing rituals from the list of banned rituals which are still practiced widely in the wizarding world outside of Britain, and even still technically allowed to be performed here. Witches and wizards have suffered, and died, needlessly because the last remaining healers able to perform those quick and efficient rituals here on our island, are too old or overworked to attend all the cases needing their help. Let’s remove the ban from teaching them to young, eager healers ready to pick up the mantle to serve our community before we are dependent on healers from the continent or even places much farther away.”

Looking around, Severus was pretty sure he had captured the interest of more than a few of the more neutral members and even of quite a few who had in the past mostly blindly followed Dumbledore in his beliefs.

“You all have been informed prior to this meeting about the list of rituals proposed to be removed from the list of banned rituals, and a text listing the reasons for each of them,” The Chief Warlock explained after Severus had sat down to signal the end of his small speech, which they had polished in a group effort over tea. He never had appreciated how much politics was done over tea and crumpets.

“Is there a member of this illustrious body with a counter argument?” was the next question by the Chief Warlock while he turned a small hourglass with a flick of his wand. While the sand literally ran out, they all waited the customary few minutes for someone to stand and ask to be heard. It was an odd little custom in Severus’ eyes, but tradition was important. Even the silly ones.

But they had done their work, getting respected healers to write up the list and the reasons, and had chosen the best time – even without knowing that the terrorist would distract everyone, in addition to the tragic death of one of their number making the Lords and Ladies more aware of their own mortality – so everyone stayed seated.

The following vote went quickly and brought an overwhelming number of votes in favour, with more abstained votes than actual nays.

A stone gavel hit the disk designed for it. “Accepted with over two-thirds of the votes.” The Chief Warlock quickly checked over the points on the agenda handed to him by one of the clerks before banging the gavel again. “That concludes our regular April session. Let’s move on to the emergency session and a request of the Minister. Minister.”

Given the leave to speak, Fudge, in those robes of violent plum, stood and started to speak.

Resisting the urge to rub at his burning eyes, Severus settled in to listen.

ooOoo
Marvolo was listening to Cornelius giving his reasoning for a search of all offices, as well as private desks, in the Ministry, as well as a broad application of the fingerprint charm, in the search for the terrorist when he noticed something out of the corner of his eyes.

It wasn’t really unusual for clerks or junior members to move between the rows during a session, or some member taking a short break for one reason or another – not everyone could wait for one of the regular breaks for a run to the bathroom – but it was unusual for a Department representative to walk between the seats themselves.

Amos Diggory was walking between the first and second tier of seats holding a scroll of parchment in his hand as if he was about to deliver it to one of the people sitting in their seats, listening to the Minister laying out a tentative plan that needed their approval to go forward.

It wasn’t unknown for important messages to be in need of delivery during a session, but usually it was brought in by an aide, and Marvolo was pretty sure no one had entered the chamber since before the Chief Warlock had started to speak.

Diggory was pretty close by now, and something in the man’s eyes set Marvolo’s teeth on edge. It took a while, and then Marvolo made the connection.

That was the manic glint he had seen in a young Bella’s eyes. The senseless need for destruction that Fenrir and McNair had sported more than once in the past.

Diggory drew level with the edge of the silver Slytherin seat, seemingly intending to walk past it, but the knuckles of his hand were white, as if he were gripping onto something.

“The Aurors have worked out the people matching closest to the list of hints we have to the perpetrator. I ask for the Wizengamot’s approval to start the investigation today…”

Marvolo didn’t catch what Cornelius was saying after that as he threw himself out of the seat to the floor, just barely dodging a sharp silver blade – a potions knife most likely – wielded by Amos Diggory with deadly determination.

He had no time to get his wand into his hand from where it was securely stored in the holster on his arm, as he rolled backwards to avoid another swing of the knife from Diggory, who was bending over the bench, one hand used to steady himself.

Knowing that he would pay later for these acrobatics – maybe he needed to get back into yoga to retain his flexibility – Marvolo managed to get to his feet, narrowly avoiding to bumping into one of the scribes, frantically trying to collect the notes, forms, scrolls, and what-not from the table and make it out of the chamber.

Someone let out a high-pitched scream – perhaps one of the Ladies – and Marvolo finally managed to get out his wand, reminding himself that he could not in fact use any strong curses here in front of all those witnesses.

Diggory didn’t say a thing, but let the knife fall to the floor, probably concluding that he wouldn’t manage to get close enough to Marvolo again to use it. Instead his grin got even more manic, and one hand vanished into a pocket of his plum-coloured robes.

Marvolo was jostled by more people getting frantic in their panic, trying to flee the room and not having any idea how to stay out of Marvolo’s way.
So Marvolo resorted to stunners, silently trying to cast them at Diggory who frustratingly managed to dodge the first two red streaks of magic, using Marvolo’s reluctance to harm bystanders against him.

It was more than frustrating to have scruples, but that didn’t change the fact that he suddenly seemed to have them.

Diggory threw a handful of small balls at Marvolo, and not knowing what exactly they were, Marvolo cast a quick shield able to hold off physical objects.

They fell to the floor and instantly started to burn, creating an obnoxious cloud of dark fumes.

Not willing to take any changes, Marvolo cast a bubblehead charm at himself first, then cast a small version of the shield he had used to repel the projectiles over them on the floor.

Around them people were stumbling over themselves and others, shouting and screaming, and generally not being very helpful.

Not willing to wait for his followers to get their act together, Marvolo snarled and hoisted himself up into the air with a flex of his magic and will. He needed to get out of the cramped quarters between the benches, and away from people getting in the way. The ceiling of this chamber was high enough for him to hover, if not for gaining any speed. But it would have to do.

Diggory now was flinging spells in all directions, indifferent to whom he might hit. Small fires started where he hit flammable material. And people trying to incapacitate him were adding to the pandemonium.

Pondering if they might need to arrange something like a fire drill, and cursing his own mind for making useless observations at a moment like this, Marvolo cast a spell he knew well and had used during the last few training duels he had participated in. It was one he had found in South America, and which conjured and flung a bola each time it was cast. As physical damage usually was easily healed, Marvolo hoped it was a safe choice and would catch the madman by surprise.

The first bola crashed into a bench made from some soft wood, causing splinters to spray away from it, making a part of Marvolo cringe at the damage to a part of their history. The second managed to fell an elder witch Diggory had shoved behind him, while trying to get away to one of the alcoves around the edge of the chamber.

Finally a bola wrapped around Diggory’s arms, binding them to his torso and managing to disrupt his balance enough that he fell, face first, to the floor, clipping a bench from dark stone – granite, maybe – with his head.

Carefully manoeuvring in the air to get a clear shot at the temporarily incapacitated wizard, Marvolo took aim and cast a strong Incarcerous, before landing with a light step on the bench he had harmed.

Before he could cast a reparo at the bench – would that even be wise? – Severus was by his side, and a few Aurors were entering the chamber at a run.

“Lord Slytherin, if you would allow, let be cast a diagnostic on you.” Severus was polite as ever, and quite accurately had adapted the address for his Lord to the occasion.

“Why?” Marvolo was puzzled. He hadn’t inhaled any of the fumes, and Diggory hadn’t even cast one spell at him.
“I assume you may have been hit with the knife. There seems to be a cut in the sleeve of your robe.” Severus pointed out, holding his wand made from dark wood in a loose grip most often seen in serious duellists.

“There is?” Marvolo moved his right arm to get a better look at his sleeve, and indeed found a clean cut almost the length of his forearm. “You seem to be right, Lord Prince.” And he hadn’t even noticed that the knife had come so close to cutting him.

Just then he noticed that the fabric of his robe right next to the cut seemed to be wet. A lightheadedness came over him, and with dawning horror Marvolo realized that there might have been method to the madness of the seemingly ill planned attack. And over the screams of Amos Diggory – “He killed my son! The monster! He’s getting what he deserves!” – Marvolo felt himself losing consciousness.

Chapter End Notes

I know by now it was kind of obvious who the terrorist might be. And this is a rather mean place to stop… but, well, it rather fit ;) evilgrin

Thanks to Jordre and Jake for helping to improve my spelling!

Wednesday, 24th of April 1996

With a yelp of surprise and panic, Harry sat up in his bed in the hospital wing. He often slept for short times during the day. One of the reasons that he didn’t put up much of a fight against being forced to stay in bed till the end of the week.

But now his heart was racing, as if he had had a nightmare, and he had a distinctly uneasy feeling. Like something bad was about to happen.

Or had happened.

It wasn’t even lunch yet, so Harry closed his history book – one of those books almost guaranteed to send him to sleep at the moment – placed it on the nightstand, and got out his mirror to call his father. Wizengamot session be damned, he needed to check in with Marvolo to make sure he was well.

ooOoo

The first thing Marvolo noticed was that he was cold. Then he felt the hard surface he was probably lying on, and heard a lot of people around him.

Slowly blinking, Marvolo moved to sit up, but was prevented from doing that by a firm hand on his shoulder.

“Stay down, please, Lord Slytherin.” That was Severus. Marvolo moved his eyes until they landed on the pale face of the Potions Master. “There was poison on the blade, and until we know what that poison was, the bezoar is just a stopgap measure. Not a solution. So please keep your heart rate slow and avoid moving too much.”

A bezoar would neatly explain the rather disgusting taste filling his mouth. So Marvolo did as instructed, easing back and relaxing on the bench. “He’s secured?”

“That he is,” Severus answered, looking over to another point in the chamber, prompting Marvolo to turn his head in that direction as well, just in time to see how a struggling and screaming – if silenced – Amos Diggory being dragged to the edge of the room by a pair of Aurors.

At least one problem taken care of.

“Lord Prince?” Marvolo could just see the auror robes appear behind Severus as he turned to look up to the person coming to a halt behind him. “We have taken pictures and samples from the blade, and did cast the fingerprint charm. Madame Bones said to give it to you as the best expert in identifying poisons on site. She also said you’re welcome to use the laboratory of the Auror Department.”

There was a quick flash of colourful light – maybe some kind of stasis charm – before Severus started to speak again. “Fetch Lord Lestrange, please.” Sounded as if Severus was intent on playing the mother hen.

“Did you notice any symptoms, Lord Slytherin?” Severus asked next, once again crouching next to the bench that was Marvolo’s resting place.

“No.” Marvolo answered, carefully shaking his head. “Not until the fight was over and I passed out. But I didn’t even notice that I didn’t manage to dodge the knife completely. So I don’t think I can give a helpful answer.” There was some elaborate plasterwork on the ceiling, which Marvolo hadn’t noticed until now, and delicate swirls of colour. What a change in perspective could make visible. Amazing. “But my concentration seems to be suffering.” Why else would he be musing over plasterwork and paint?

“I’ll analyse the poison quickly then.” Severus stood and made room for another wizard, who bent so that Marvolo could look up at him from where he was still working on keeping calm. “I’ll inform Healer Greengrass. Keep an eye on him, please, Lord Lestrange.” And Severus was gone.

“Hello, Xerxes.” Hopefully Severus would work quickly. Staying here was kind of embarrassing.

“Hello, Marvolo. Why is your robe vibrating?” For a moment Marvolo wasn’t sure what Xerxes was talking about, then he noticed that someone must have gotten him out of his robe before cleaning the shallow cut in his arm. The robe now was hanging towards the floor just off the edge of the bench.

“There’s a communication mirror in the pocket. If it’s vibrating, Harry is trying to contact me,” Marvolo explained and watched as his friend got the mirror out of the pocket and handed it over. Marvolo carefully accepted it with his uninjured hand, and then accepted the call to the frantic-looking face of his older son. “Harry, is everything alright?”

Harry looked taken aback. “I called to ask you. I just woke up… did something happen?” The last question came out more like an accusation and Marvolo had to smile at the resemblance to how Nagini would sometimes ask him if he had done something reckless.

“There was a light scuffle here at the Ministry, all sorted by now, so no need to worry,” Marvolo answered, using a tone that he knew wouldn’t convince his son. He was pretty confident that all would be well – Severus was really quick on his antidotes – and bantering with his son was a good way to pass the time.

But why had Harry dreamed something disturbing now? There hadn’t been any bleed-over in ages. Harry’s look was more than sceptical, and his eyes moved over Marvolo’s face, clearly assessing the situation as best as he could through the mirror. “Are you lying down?”
“I am. Healer’s orders. Or rather, Severus’ order. I’m stable, but he insists I stay here until a healer has looked at me.” He had promised not to lie, but he didn’t want to worry his son either.

“I’ll tell on you to Nagini. But I’m sure she’ll know on her own anyway.” Harry said with narrowed eyes, before they got bigger than should be allowed – his godfather probably had taught him the puppy eyes – and he pleaded. “Be careful and listen to the healer. Will you?”

“Of course,” Marvolo tried to assure his son.

“I’ll make sure he doesn’t go against the healer’s orders,” Xerxes said from his side, smirking down at Marvolo, who glared half-heartedly up at his friend.

“That’s too kind of you, Lord Lestrange,” was Harry’s response to that. “I’ll go back to resting then, as those are my orders from the healer as well.”

They ended the call, and Marvolo could once again contemplate the ceiling. Harry’s words about his own healer’s orders had reminded Marvolo that his son was recovering from a severe case of magical exhaustion. And for that reason his son’s Occlumency shields were practically worthless at the moment. And while he had been unconscious some of his feelings must have leaked through. Probably. Maybe.

He would think more about it when he felt less fuzzy.

“I think I see Malcolm and Severus at the door,” Xerxes said some time later, drawing Marvolo’s attention in that direction. “You probably can get up soon, my friend.”

Marvolo really hoped that would be the case.

ooOoo

In a different part of the Wizengamot Chamber, Amelia Bones watched Lord Prince walking back purposefully into the chamber, carrying something carefully in his hands, judging by the way he was moving.

She glanced over to where Marvolo was resting under the supervision of Lord Lestrange. The fact that they had gone to school together – kind of – seemed to have helped mend the relationship even after the two sons who had become Death Eaters had died. At least every interaction Amelia had witnessed since Marvolo had claimed his seat on the Wizengamot had seemed like a steady movement to an amicable relationship.

Reassured that her friend was safe and probably soon on the way to complete recovery, Amelia turned briefly to where Cornelius was intently listening to complaints by a few of the Wizengamot members who had gotten bruised during the scuffle.

“Please speak with the scribe. He’ll take all your complaints and write them down. That way no one will be overlooked, and everything will be taken care of,” was all she heard of what Cornelius was saying to placate the agitated members, effectively restoring order among the politicians.

Leaving him to that part of the aftermath, Amelia quickly made her way over to where two of her Aurors were trying to wrestle Amos Diggory into a pair of cuffs. Trying being the operative word.
Rolling her eyes at the lack of practical skills some of the Aurors had – just like the silly disdain for spells perceived as too simple – Amelia walked over there and once within earshot of them demanded to know what was going on. “Is there a reason you only have silenced him and didn’t use a stunner?”

“Madame…” The one Auror holding the cuffs fumbled for words, clearly embarrassed to not have thought of that solution.

Seeing as neither of them had a hand free for their wand – and why were there only two of them? – Amelia shot off a stunner at Amos, before placing her wand back into her holster. The man went limp and gravity took over, making Amos slide downwards, almost toppling the Auror trying to steady him, now that he was no longer struggling.

“Take him to the high-security holding cell. Search him thoroughly. No! Change him into different clothes, make sure he hasn’t anything to harm himself with. And there have to be at least two guards at the cell at all times.” They couldn’t take the chance that he would try to kill himself before they could question him. The way he had acted today indicated that his own well-being wasn’t a priority for him any longer. “And no visitors without my expressed approval! Understood?”

“Yes, Ma'am!” they both said, standing at attention, Amos now on the floor, his hands bound behind his back.

With that taken care of – she had a feeling that she should check on the cells to see if her orders were being followed – Amelia walked over to where a small group had gathered around the seat where Marvolo had collapsed after he had incapacitated Amos.

Once she reached the group of wizards, Lucius Malfoy was the first to notice her presence and stepped aside so she could see Marvolo sitting there, looking slightly ruffled and pale, monitored by the younger Greengrass brother.

“You were lucky, Lord Slytherin,” said the Healer as Amelia stepped into the circle. “If what Master Snape says about the poison is correct, it should have been instantly lethal if brewed right.”

“I’m pretty confident in my results.” And there was the level of sarcastic disdain Amelia was expecting to hear from Severus Snape ever since they'd had to ask him for his expertise on an experimental potion in a case where the widow had claimed murder. “You can thank Mr. Diggory’s abysmal brewing technique for your continued wellbeing, Lord Slytherin.”

“And your tendency to be over-prepared, Lord Prince,” Marvolo stated with a tired smile. “The quick administration of a bezoar certainly had an effect as well.”

“It most certainly had,” Greengrass agreed, not letting Snape diminish his part in the lucky averting of a bad outcome.

Amelia smiled, and got a small smirk from Marvolo in return. “The way you’re standing here, gentlemen, is not in the least subtle. And with most of you having been in Slytherin at that!” Her comment got a weak chuckle out of Marvolo, while the others looked like a bunch of schoolchildren caught out after curfew at the edge of the Forbidden Forest.

“Amelia, you have to admit, when we can be friends, then there’s no reason to think others who were wronged in the past can’t give me a new chance as well. Don’t you think?” She rolled her eyes at Marvolo, but smiled. He had a point, after all.
She pointed her finger at him. “You rest, and listen to your healer. I’ll inform you when we need your testimony. And I want to know where you learned that spell. I’ve never seen anything like that.”

“South America. And I’ll teach it to you when next we have time,” Marvolo promised, and then went back to enduring being fussied over by his healer.

With a bracing breath, Amelia went back to managing the madness that was an assassination attempt within the Wizengamot Chamber. That hadn’t happened in at least a hundred years. Probably. She would have to look that up. But later.

oooOOooo

Marvolo was really not sure if he should be amused or exasperated.

Currently he was sitting in one of the armchairs in the family drawing room, almost buried under his own familiar.

.:Next time you go out there you will take me with you:. she ranted at him, carefully inspecting each inch of him with her flickering tongue. .:What is it with you two leggers that you can’t protect yourself?:.

Carefully shielding his nose from her tongue – that tickled – Marvolo protested against that .:I’m perfectly capable of defending myself, Nagini:. Her weight shifted and her face now was near his ear, checking that he wasn’t hurt .:You know that I can fight off dangers:.

Nagini huffed, and suddenly moved to the floor, slithering over to the rug in front of the fireplace. .:You need someone to help you. You can’t see all that happens around you:. That was something Nagini brought up from time to time. The fact that his eyes were not able to give him a 360° panorama view of his surroundings, which she considered of as a major disadvantage.

.:I had allies with me, Nagini. And I was able to concentrate because I knew that you were here, keeping an eye on Marcus:. It wasn’t really the truth, as Marvolo hadn’t thought about Marcus at all in that moment, and the child had been at school. But that she would protect his children was something Marvolo was sure about.

.:I could be a more effective guard, if I was allowed to go with you, or the bubbly hatchling:. Nagini hissed petulantly from her place in front of the fire, still working on attaining the perfect position, sliding over herself in an intricate knot.

.:We have talked about that. You don’t like the cold, and all the other children at the school are going to annoy you. I’ll take you with me whenever I’m not going to be in the Wizengamot. Familiars aren’t allowed in there:. And they weren’t, ever since some owl had made a racket in there, or something.

Marvolo stood, sorted out his robes with a small flicker of magic, and went to get a book out from the shelves. He needed a break, and now that Marcus was asleep and his daily talk with Harry was done as well, he would read a good book before going to bed.

The next few days would be hard as well. The press was sure to make an appearance, asking questions, and the Aurors probably would have questions.

With a sigh Marvolo let himself fall into the armchair, opened the book, and started reading about old wards used to protect the city of Rome from fire during the time of the republic.

Thursday, 25th of April 1996

Standing here as his Lord’s ears and eyes in the investigation was kind of scary. John knew how important this was, even more important than his normal work, but until now he never had had the dubious honour of standing next to Amelia Bones while doing his work as a Death Eater.

They all were standing, or sitting – depending on temperament, and he guessed, the day they had already had – in a room that provided them with a prime view into the interrogation room by the use of an enchanted mirror.

In that interrogation room one lone figure was waiting, chained to a sturdy chair, seemingly uninterested in his surroundings. If his actions yesterday hadn’t been a big hint already, John would have guessed something with Diggory’s mind wasn’t right now watching the other wizard wait to be questioned.

Beside Amelia Bones, Kingsley and the young Tonks were here with John, all waiting for Scrimgeour to enter the interrogation room and start getting to the bottom of this whole situation. John was pretty sure all of them had an idea what had prompted the seeming descent into madness of the formerly respected wizard. They all knew of the tragic death of the man’s son at the wand of Peter Pettigrew, after all. And on top of that, the blatant and desperate seeming attack on the Dark Lord was a rather strong indicator as well.

The sound of shifting fabric ghosted through the room where they were waiting, when the door in the interrogation room opened and the Head of the Auror Division stepped inside, closing the door firmly behind himself.

“Amos,” the prisoner was greeted without getting a visible reaction. John was curious what approach the other man would use for this interrogation. From what he had heard through the office gossip from the two guards always standing outside the cell, Amos Diggory hadn’t said one coherent word since his arrest the previous day. Getting the wizard to talk wouldn’t be easy, and going about it the wrong way could make it impossible.

As if he had all the time in the world, Scrimgeour pulled out the only other chair in the room and sat down, folding his hands on the table. For a long moment neither wizard in the interrogation room moved.

“There are a lot of rumours going round the Ministry at the moment,” Scrimgeour started to speak, leaning back in his chair in a show of relaxed ease, adding to the effect of his casual drawl. “Most believe that you have gone round the bend, and that we shouldn’t bother with trying to get your reasoning, as they claim you can’t possibly have one.” John slowly nodded, feeling that the chosen approach of challenging the pride of the seemingly mad wizard would probably work well.
Diggory didn’t speak yet, but a snarl on his face clearly showed that he was affected.

“But Madame Bones insisted on proper procedure. You know how she is with those things.” Scrimgeour gave a one shoulder shrug. “So here it is for the record: Why did you do it?” The disinterest was well done in John’s humble opinion, and he watched in fascination as Diggory figuratively flew of the handle.

“Oh yeah, I know how she is. All prim and proper.” The mocking tone was strong. “Not questioning beyond the obvious! Following the letter of the law, but not its intent! And that cowardice and stupidity enabled the greatest Evil ever to get a hold on our community!” Diggory didn’t even draw breath, and John felt like taking a step back from the mad gleam in those eyes. The last time someone had had such an expression in his vicinity, crucios had been flying quick and fast. “And everyone just went along with it!” Diggory’s volume was steadily increasing. “And then the Evil managed to infect Dumbledore! Someone needed to do something! Make everyone aware of the danger!” By now Diggory was breathing heavily, and probably would have slammed his hands into the table if he had been able to move.

But he hadn’t actually admitted to any crime.

And Scrimgeour naturally had heard that lack as well. Not showing any reaction to the obvious agitation of his suspect for the exploding howlers, the Head Auror continued his needling. “Considering all the information we now have access to, and the good Lord Slytherin has done since that day in the Wizengamot, I feel that I might lose my bet that there is a shred of reasoning still left in your skull.” Scrimgeour sighed. “I guess that badly planned assassination attempt should have been enough of a hint.”

“It wasn’t badly planned!” Diggory cried in outrage. “I had everything set up as best as I could. Slipping that potion for an upset stomach to Steven so I could take his place. Brewing that poison! I even managed to cut him!” The sneer was back, and particles of spit flew through the space between interrogator and captive, as Diggory all but spat his words out. “I guess I should have known that the Evil would be impervious to poison as well! But you all are too dense to see! The howlers didn’t reach him! And now it’s too late, too late!” He dissolved into mad laughter, and then quickly into sobs, pretty much ending the interrogation then and there.

“Well that didn’t give us much,” Tonks stated in a flat tone, and they all nodded in agreement. Diggory had confessed to what they already knew. He had brewed the poison in an attempt to kill his target, because the howlers hadn’t managed to do so. But just that wasn’t a proof of his guilt, even if John was pretty sure they had the howler terrorist.

“Maybe mentioning what we found at his home will make him talk?” Tonks asked into the room, clearly unsure if it would work with someone that deranged.

“We can only hope. While the laboratory was pretty much all we’ll need to get him into Azkaban, I would prefer to know if he had help.” Madame Bones stated, before taking her leave.

The others followed soon after, making John the last to leave the observation room. He would finish the last of the paperwork he had to do, and then he would go report to his Lord. It hadn’t been exactly informative, but John was pretty sure that the Dark Lord would want to be kept informed of every little move made, every shred of information gathered, and all the observations John could provide.

ooooOOooo
Sirius put down the last cup on the kitchen table – sure that Kreacher wouldn’t be happy with him for doing something so plebeian – before he sat down on the other side from Remus and Dora.

“It’s just such a big mess!” Dora exclaimed, her hair constantly cycling between various shades of fiery reds and oranges. “There’s Amos, who lost his son, and his wife, both grieving. And then he goes and attacks so many children!”

Both wizards kept their mouths shut, Remus adding a generous amount of fire whiskey to the tea in all their cups.

“I mean, I had my suspicions. There aren’t that many people still holding a big grudge against Lord Slytherin. And all the attacks pointed at a connection to the fact he has been given a new chance. That places he had been then had been attacked. The Minister, Harry…” Dora trailed off and picked up her cup.

Sirius couldn’t really fault Diggory for his wish for revenge. He had felt similar in the past, after all. But as what happened when he left to go after Peter, instead of staying as he should have done, had been bad, Sirius now was sure revenge wasn’t necessarily a good idea.

“I guess no one has helped them cope. Have they?” Dora said, holding her cup out for Remus to refill. “Left alone with their grief. And then the one somehow responsible for the whole mess, curse or not, gets a second chance.” She took a sip from the fresh, heavily spiked cup of tea, and gave a world-weary sigh. “I kind of understand the frustration and how unfair it must have seemed. But why go out and attack children?”

In an attempt to comfort Dora – at least Sirius thought that was the motivation – Remus placed his hand on her arm. “No one really knows what’s happening inside another’s mind, Dora. You weren’t close to him. Were you?” She just shook her head. “So how could you have known? He wouldn’t have accepted help from you. Don’t feel bad, because you couldn’t do a thing to prevent what happened.”

She didn’t seem convinced, so Sirius decided it was his duty to change the topic. A quick move brought out the newest letter from his girls from the inner pocket of his robes. “But you’re convinced that he worked alone? I would love to tell Enora and Nawel that they have no reason to worry. The news made it to the newspapers on the continent and they inquired about Harry.”

Dora’s hair settled down somewhat – staying a sunny yellow – and she gave her cousin a tentative smile. “We aren’t sure yet. But during our search of the home of the Diggorys, we didn’t find any hints that someone else was involved.” Then her smile turned into a grin, and a teasing one at that. “So your twin daughters ask after Harry? Regularly? Do you think they like him?”

Sometimes the changes in the moods of women – and Black women in particular – frightened Sirius. He furrowed his brow. Did either Nawel or Enora like Harry? “How should I know?” he finally said, shrugging. “It’s not as if a girl would talk to her father if she had a crush on a boy. Am I right?”

Dora’s grin got wider, if that was even possible. “I know that I talked to my father about crushes. Mom takes all that stuff much too seriously. She always cautioned me to not go too far, and to guard my reputation and stuff.” She rolled her eyes, and shot a sideways glance at Remus.

Now it was Sirius who grinned. “Well, I hadn’t thought that dear Andromeda still rememberd a little about the family values. But Harry is together with that sweet Lovegood girl. He’s not the type to jump between girlfriends like that.”

Remus laughed. “He certainly is more like his father than you, Sirius. James only ever had eyes for Lily. But you! You were constantly chasing someone new.”

“And you never tried anything with anyone, Moony,” Sirius retaliated, wiggling his eyebrows. “Or did I miss something after we finished school?”

Moony rolled his eyes, and emptied his own cup of spiked tea. “You have no right to ask something like that, Padfoot.” He didn’t sound amused any longer. “It’s not as if I wanted to know what you got up to.”

Sirius snorted but had to concede the point. He had liked to brag.

“Who’s up for some dinner?” He asked his two friends, intent to fan the flames of that fledgling relationship. Remus had earned himself some happiness, and Dora clearly was set on getting Remus. Now that he had found his daughters, his days were rather empty once again. They were at school, and until the summer holidays he could only write letters. And even though that was nice, it wasn’t enough to fill his days.

Maybe he should pick up a job besides his seat on the Wizengamot as Lord Black.

But first. “Kreacher! Dinner for three, please!”

Friday, 26th of April 1996

It had been a struggle to get Cornelius to agree that it would be best if the Head of the Department of Magical Law Enforcement was to step in front of the press. He had wanted to have this dubious honour for himself, craving the limelight. In the end, Amelia had convinced him that as the investigation was still in progress, she should answer the questions, while he could wait till the moment they concluded the investigation, or maybe even until after a trial in court, to get the attention for a finished and secure outcome.

Amelia stepped up to the podium, resisting the urge to smooth down her robes, just letting her gaze wander over the gathered press once. There were representatives from most major newspapers from all around the world present. Not something that happened all that often. But thankfully not one of the tabloids was represented. Hopefully that would result in a lack of questions regarding love interests or tragic circumstances.

“Good morning,” Amelia greeted them, effectively shutting up the last of the whisperers. “You’ll have opportunity to ask questions when I’m finished with my statement. So please wait until then.” It should be unnecessary to say this – they were professionals, after all, and certainly not at their first press conference – but better safe than sorry. Amelia could do without interruptions at the moment.

“Amos Diggory, apprehended in the Wizengamot Chamber on the 24th, has admitted to attempting to brew a deadly poison with the intent of murdering Lord Slytherin.” A great number of dictaquills were taking down her statement word for word, causing a background of light scratching noises. “This was thwarted by his own errors in brewing, as well as the timely administration of a bezoar by Lord Severus Prince.” Giving the sour Potions Master a spot in the international press had a kind of subtle pleasure to it. If she had asked him, he probably would have resented the idea of being presented as any kind of hero. “A thorough search of the house of the perpetrator revealed an improvised potions laboratory, clearly used for more than just the brewing of the poison used in the assassination attempt on Lord Slytherin. Mr. Diggory expressed a feeling of sympathy for the person sending exploding howlers during the interrogation. Currently we have no solid evidence that he has been the one sending those howlers. The investigation into the terrorist attacks is therefore ongoing.” She was pretty sure they had him, especially as the ingredients found in the lab had been those needed for the howler components, and the garden had been filled with everything that could be grown in this climate.

But there was no way she would say that to the international press.

“Mrs. Diggory has been found to be unaware of her husband's plans and is working together with the Auror Department to clear up the situation.” In fact she had been found almost catatonic in her home, barely managing to care for herself, so deeply lost in her grief over her lost son that she hadn’t even noticed her husband's absence. She hadn’t even known the date, and currently was residing in St. Mungo's to get her back on her feet. Hopefully.

“You may now ask your questions.”

“Sunny Sunders, New York Ghost. Madame Bones, how was it possible for a poisoned blade to make it into the Wizengamot Chambers, or even the Ministry building?” A witch in a robe cut to the newest style of dress asked, disregarding the usual flow of waiting to be called.

Taking a breath, Amelia thought, here we go, and started to explain how it wouldn’t be feasible to prevent dangerous materials from coming into the building as it was necessary to be able to bring in such for the work they were doing, and why wards to prevent certain magics from entering the Wizengamot Chamber were heavily opposed by those with a seat on the Wizengamot. This would be the opposite of fun.

Placing the last of his books in his book bag Harry wondered how many of his things had made it from his room down in the dungeons up to the infirmary. But seeing as he had stayed rather long this time, and his friends had tried to entertain him any way possible, it wasn’t all that surprising.

“I want you to go easy these first few days, Mr. Slytherin,” Madame Pomfrey said from the entrance to the private room Harry had been using. “Only theory in your revisions. If you feel anything strange, fatigue or anything else, I want to see you back here asap. Am I clear?”

“As clear as crystal, Madam Pomfrey.” For a moment Harry contemplated asking to get that in writing, to show it to Hermione in an attempt to forestall her tendency to channel her anxiety into studying.

“Well, then, get out of here,” she said with a smile, making shooing motions at him.

With a grin Harry picked up his book bag and walked out of the once again empty Infirmary. He was the last of those people injured in the attack last week to be allowed to go. Luckily everyone else had been less severely injured.

And, Harry could hardly understand his good fortune, the fact that he had been the one to cast that shield and protect the whole village from greater harm had stayed out of the newspaper.

Not even ten steps down the hall, Harry saw Hermione and Ron walk around the corner.

“Harry!” Hermione called out, breaking into a run, the moment she saw him.

Knowing what she was about to do, Harry set his book bag down on the floor and braced himself for the impact with a grin. And just in time for the hug and the bushy hair that still hadn’t succumbed to the haircare charms Hermione had been learning from the girls she now spent more time with.

“You were so reckless. And I was so worried! But you also saved all those people, Harry. Why does something dangerous always happen around you?” She was rambling, and just loud enough that Harry could hear her where she had her mouth right next to his ear.

“I can’t explain it. But what would you have done in my place?” Harry murmured back, letting his arms fall to his sides, ending the hug between them.

To that question Hermione had no answer. Because had she been in Harry’s place, she wouldn’t have run but tried to help as well. A seemingly hopeless situation had never stopped Hermione before. And she knew that just as well as Harry did.

They stepped away from each other, Harry picked up his bag, and turned to walk further down the hallway.

“So you two are my official welcome back committee?” Harry wanted to know, looking between the not-really-happy-looking Ron – it seemed as if he wasn’t over that crush yet – and the frazzled-looking Hermione.

“Nothing so formal,” Ron rolled his eyes. “We simply volunteered to walk down together with you. Seems as if the Slytherins don’t believe you can go anywhere alone. Now that Diggory has managed to get himself caught, there’s no danger left. So why is all that security still important? Can you explain that?”

Harry’s green eyes briefly met with Hermione’s brown ones and he could see that she understood why security was still important. But Harry knew that Ron wouldn’t really accept an explanation if Hermione was to deliver it. She was much too well known for following the rules and being overly cautious for Ron to take her seriously in such a matter.

“Even if he was acting alone, and we don’t know if he did, there’s always the possibility that another person could try something. I don’t want to be subjected to a disappointed look. Would you risk getting a howler from your mother, if you could avoid it by sticking with your friends?”

Now Ron made a face, probably remembering the howler he had gotten just at the start of their second year, and nodded.

Once they reached the Great Hall – already humming with the sounds of all the students inside – Luna was there, a serene smile on her face, linking her fingers with Harry’s, going on tiptoes to give him a quick kiss. “Do you think you could make a sketch of me?”

As always slightly bemused but happy because she was so in the moment, Harry squeezed Luna’s hand, and started to swing their linked hands. “I don’t think that I’m all that good yet with portraits yet. But if you’re offering to sit in one position for me to practice... Who am I to decline?”

“We’ll meet for breakfast then?” Luna asked, almost skipping along as they walked into the Hall and to the ends of the tables.

“We’ll do that,” Harry agreed and bent down a little to give his girlfriend a kiss. When he came back up again he met Ron’s gaze and saw his friend rolling his eyes. Maybe Harry should start a list of all the times Ron had made fun of Harry and Luna so he could give them all back once Ron started dating.

When they split to walk to their respective tables, Harry spotted Theo and Draco sitting together with most of their year mates and saving him a seat. On his way there Harry more than once felt eyes on him, but there were no whispers, and nothing of more interest than him being released from the hospital wing. If it could stay this way all through the rest of his years here at the school, Harry would be really happy.

“Harry! I’m really glad that you’re back! Practice wasn’t as effective without another seeker to compete against,” Draco stated, affecting a pompous air, making all their friends around them laugh.

Harry sat down, setting his bag onto the floor carefully – it was filled to almost bursting – picked up a plate of finely cut venison, before he even looked in Draco’s direction. When he finally did look in the blond’s direction, Draco rolled his eyes, not unsettled in the least. Harry grinned, and handed the plate over to Vincent, who held out his arm. “I’m not sure if I’m allowed to fly yet, Draco. Madam Pomfrey was insistent on me taking it easy. An hour long training session with the Quidditch team probably doesn't match that description.”

Before Draco could give a retort to that – he even had his mouth opened – Theo passed Harry a bowl of steamed carrots and spoke up. “Professor Snape will have the whole team scrubbing cauldrons if you make Harry fly without consulting Madam Pomfrey. And I would bet ten galleons that she won’t let him fly for a week yet.”

“I’m in!” Draco took the bet, and Harry turned to his food, shaking his head at his friends.

It was great being back in the common room, in front of the fire, in the armchair, surrounded by his friends. Odd how much like home these rooms now felt. He would never have guessed the first time he had been in here, back in second year.

Besides the fifth and seventh-years, almost everyone else had left for their rooms, or other parts of the castle, to avoid the frantic students preparing for their exams. Sirius had claimed that it would get worse nearer to the exams in June, remembering fondly how the Marauders once had set loose a prank in the Gryffindor common room shortly before the exams, only to be tossed out on their backsides by unimpressed housemates.

Harry had admitted that he hadn’t really noticed the heightened stress and lessened tolerance for noise of those going to take their OWLs and NEWTs in previous years. Privately he speculated that was because he and his friends had been engaged in stressful situations of their own, distracting them from what the others were doing, but he didn’t say that out loud.

Harry got out his Potions book and the study aid he had created for plants and other potions ingredients he needed to know, dislodging a study plan Hermione had created for him. Deciding not to get up to pick it up from where it had floated down to the carpet – an old and well used one of high quality – Harry started to once again repeat the basics for both Herbology and Potions. The improved working relationship with Professor Snape, as well as the knowledge that his mother had been rather gifted in that particular subject – right up there with Charms – had breathed interest back into it for Harry. He wanted to get a good mark, maybe even good enough to continue into NEWT Potions.

Pansy scoffed, holding up the parchment with the timetable from Hermione on it. As Harry hadn’t notice her move, he assumed she had summoned the parchment. Which was quite rude, summoning something that wasn’t hers. What if it had been a private letter?

Or maybe Harry should also pay a little bit more attention to his stuff. He had to remember that espionage was an often-used tool in a politician's arsenal in the wizarding world.

“I don’t understand how you can put up with her constant pushing,” Pansy expanded on her sound of disapproval, making a face as if she had been asked to sort through a bucket of flobberworms.

“What right does she have to dictate how you should learn?”

That comment brought back the many instances of Hermione wanting to go through all the questions of an exam they just had finished and how Ron had groaned, all her nagging that they needed to finish their essays and the pang of guilt Harry had felt because he knew she was right, all the spells she had found for him to prepare for the third task just last year, the time she had searched for Nicolas Flamel, her research in defence of Buckbeak, all the times she had rolled her eyes at Ron and him when they had slacked in their homework.

He turned a little so he was facing Pansy more head on and gave her a frosty smile, summoning the parchment from her hand without picking up his wand, without conscious thought. “She has earned the right to worry about me and my academics, Pansy. She’s like an older sister to me in many ways. And while I agree that her academic focus can be trying at times, it also helped me survive more than once.” Catching the timetable which floated over – and which he had no intention to follow – Harry moved so he could sit more comfortably and went back to concentrating on his revision.

Hermione could get overwhelming in her pursuit of academics and good marks. But when he brought that up with Madame Goyle – after a rather hard homework session in the library – she had helped him understand that Hermione had problems of her own and only got this focused on homework and studying when she felt out of place or stressed. But she had also made sure that Harry understood that he had a right to set boundaries and insist that they were respected.

He planned to thank Hermione for her concern and willingness to help, but also tell her that her approach to revision wasn’t going to work for him all that well. Hopefully she wouldn’t be dejected, but understanding. She was only human and a teenager, just as Harry was.

He didn’t really notice the astonished look on Pansy’s face, or the surprise on Theo’s and Draco’s faces at his wandless summoning charm. Harry had been told to go easy, and not use magic for a few days yet, and everyone in Slytherin knew that. Seeing Harry using wandless magic after he had been in bed to recover was a startling event.

The rest of the evening passed in a concentrated atmosphere in the common room, all the boisterous activity of a Friday evening banished to the dorm rooms in a compromise to have the whole of Saturday for not-quite activities in the shared space of the House.

Saturday, 27th of April

Another weekend, giving the brats too much time and freedom to roam the halls and wreak havoc. Argus walked down the less-used halls of the castle, his loyal cat at his side, looking for paintings in need of cleaning, damage done to any of the priceless artefacts exhibited and not appreciated in the walkways of the school.

In a way, it was an honour to work here at Hogwarts with its high number of magical paintings. To be responsible for their care. On the other hand, he had spent years in university and later training under a master conservator in more than one museum, only to spend most of his time now mopping up dirt behind careless, snot-nosed brats to have at least something to do.

Sometimes someone would come to him asking for a portrait to be cleaned or repaired. But not many would willingly search out a squib, feeling more capable than him just because he couldn’t wield a wand and get easy results.

Argus snorted and stepped closer to a painting of a ship in rough sea, checking if he had seen a small dent in the canvas, or if it had been a trick of the light.

Then he heard voices. Two of them. A girl and a boy if he had to guess. Carefully walking along the wall – it wouldn’t do to jostle the paintings – Argus made his way over to the door to an unused classroom he was pretty sure the voices were coming from.

Mrs. Norris arrived at the door first, not making any sound but watching intently what was happening inside. When Argus finally could see inside, he was surprised at what the two of them had discovered.

That Slytherin boy was sitting there, a sketchpad on his lap, light at his back and at the other end of the room, sitting on the teacher’s desk, was a girl. She was pretty, if rather curiously decorated, for lack of a better word. She was sitting in a way that left her profile turned towards the boy sketching her, hands wrapped around her knee, and an old blanket or something draped around her.

“Are you sure that you’re still comfortable?” Mr. Slytherin asked of his model. “Please let me know if it’s not. We can stop anytime, Luna.”

The girl smiled but didn’t release her pose. “It’s fine, Harry. Keep sketching. When father and I go out to search for some of the more elusive creatures of our world, sometimes we don’t move for hours. I certainly can sit here for you a while longer.”

“As long as you’re sure,” the boy said, and went back to his sketching. His head going up and down in minute movements, when he took a look at her just before he looked back at his work.

He seemed to be really serious about his art. Spending a sunny day like this – one of those few they got in spring this far up north – inside sketching.
And now the whole getup the girl was sporting made more sense as well. The flower crown in her hair and the braids, the blanket arranged in folds around her, like a tunic, or old cloak, her bare feet. It looked like they were trying to create the basics of an ancient Greek or Roman style. Either in honour of those exact periods of time, or one of the many times later generations had found inspiration in the old imagery.

Retreating as silently as he had come, Argus contemplated what he had seen. That maybe here were the beginnings of a new artist. Not one doing quick little, animated illustrations for books, but a true artist, not using magic as a crutch. With a sad little smile Argus walked away, remembering his own time as a student, carefully sketching other students sitting, standing, posing motionless for just a pittance of money. He couldn’t hold back a snort when it suddenly occurred to him that he had been fortunate not to find Mr. Slytherin and his muse working on a nude sketch. He would have been forced to end their exploration of art in that case.

Still grinning, Mrs. Norris on his heels, Argus decided to take a look at the stonework on top of some of the castle walls, as he thought he had seen one gargoyle in need of a cleaning a few days back up there. He definitely should keep an eye out for that boy. Maybe there was someone he could nurture to follow his passion into art. Much too often, wizards and witches tried to get their children into something else.

Chapter End Notes

Kudos to everyone guessing on the poison on the blade (Willofhounds was the first!). And I do plan to expand on that scene with Argus Filch after an interesting post on Tumblr was brought to my attention several weeks back now. You might have stumbled upon it. It contemplates what skill is needed for art conservation and repair, and how Argus Filch managed to do something like that with actual slashes in a canvas in just a few days without the damage being evident after the repairs had been finished. :) Argus Filch doesn’t have many redeeming qualities, but I think we all will get to see a different side of him here.

Thanks to Jordre and Jake for helping to improve my spelling!

Welcome to chapter 100! I never expected to reach this when I started, but here we are! A special thanks to everyone who read this far, whether you were here from the beginning when I started posting or found it just a short while back! I’m grateful for all your comments, the people adding the story to their favourites, subscribing, for using all tools at your disposal to let me know what you think. Your feedback has carried me this far, and I hope it’ll carry me to the end of this story!

Sunday, 28th of April 1996

“And later, Mrs. Peters will take me to visit Aiden. We’ll be allowed to fly on brooms in the garden!” Marcus sat on Marvolo’s lap, cheerfully relaying his plans for the day to his older brother. Harry, meanwhile, sat on his bed, smiling at his little brother, while in the back of his mind thoughts were circling one another.

But there was no reason to air his frustration while Marcus was still present. So he listened, honestly interested, and waited till the late breakfast at Griffin House would be over.

“Have fun, Marcus!” Harry said, carefully waving with his free hand where it could be seen through the mirror, laughing at the cheerful chant of “I’m going to fly. I’m going to fly!” gradually getting less loud as Marcus followed Mrs. Peters out of the room.

Then the door fell shut and the smile slid off Harry’s face.

The slightly uncomfortable look on Marvolo’s face would have been funny if Harry hadn’t been quite as riled up as he still was.

“So,” Harry started and blinked in surprise at the unhappy grimace Marvolo made. It completely derailed what he had been planning to say.

“I’m sorry, Harry.” Marvolo filled the sudden silence between them. “While I did not really lie to you, I’m aware that leaving out information is just as surely not the truth as any lie would be. In my defence, I only can say that I wasn’t at my best and wanted to spare you the unnecessary upset that giving you all the details would have caused.”

Harry snorted, but couldn’t exactly contest the fact that Marvolo hadn’t told any lies while he had been resting, on his back, in the Wizengamot Chamber, after he had been attacked in an effort to kill him.

“I learned that Amos Diggory tried to kill you through the newspaper and rumours! How could that have been any better? That my visitors had strict instructions from Madame Pomfrey to tell me nothing doesn’t make it any better either. I spoke to you more than once, Father! You could have told me anytime between Wednesday and Friday!”

The mirror wobbled, and Marvolo raked his hand through his hair, destroying the meticulous hairstyle. “I’m sorry. You knew all about the rumours and speculations around the shield, I had thought you had already heard Diggory had been the one to attack me. I thought it likely One of your friends certainly would have told you.”

Harry rolled his eyes. “Sure. And my friends clearly thought that I had heard about the attack from you.” He snorted again, and took a few deep breaths. “I think you know that Madame Goyle was here yesterday evening to catch up on the session we missed last week?”

Marvolo nodded. “She also asked me to make room for an extra session to talk about the assassination attempt.”

“Probably a good idea.” Harry nodded, taking another deep breath. “We talked for some time, and I… well I hadn’t really thought about what a scuffle would have to be like that I would wake from emotions leaking through. You know?” Really, Harry wasn’t all that impressed with his own thinking on the matter. Something that led to leaking emotions from Marvolo had to be significant. Otherwise his father’s Occlumency shields should have been enough to prevent something like that from happening. They had been enough, combined with Harry’s own, to keep their minds separated for months now.

Marvolo nodded solemnly. “I was surprised that you called just then. But in retrospect, with you magically exhausted and me losing consciousness because of poison… it was a logical consequence.”

“Yes, well. We both know better now. And it isn’t as if you were in actual danger of dying,” Harry said, glad that he wasn’t out in the common room but had decided to stay in his own room for this talk. “But I guess it would have been awkward with so many witnesses?”

Marvolo sighed, leaning back into his chair. “I feel like you’re way too forgiving, Harry. Not that I’m complaining, as I’m the happiest I ever remember being with you and Marcus as my family. But you are allowed to hold a grudge. Because I did leave out important information. You know that, right?”

Now it was Harry’s turn to rake his hand through his hair, not destroying any neat hairstyle. “I know that I’m allowed, and maybe even justified to hold a grudge. But I don’t have to if I don’t want. And I much prefer being happy over being miserable. Your intention was good, and you were a little out of it. And there was an audience. So, maybe fewer assumptions over what I know or do not know will be a good way to handle stuff like that in the future?” That had been the plan Harry had come up with during his talk with Madame Goyle. She really had a way to get him to come up with solutions to his problems on his own, only occasionally offering advice and possible ways when it was clear he simply didn’t know. Those cases had been occurring less and less often recently.

Getting them both to visit with a therapist clearly had been one of Marvolo’s better ideas.

“In the spirit of not concealing important information. I’m currently in the process of once again adjusting a few steps in the ritual in preparation for trying one last time before the summer,” Marvolo suddenly changed the topic quite drastically. “I’ve asked both Bill and Healer Greengrass for their support again and am certain it’ll result in a ritual we can use this summer, once you’re back from school.”
Harry blinked, opened his mouth, closed it again, before speaking anyway. “After that only I will be left? And you’re comfortable with… having no fail-safes?”

Marvolo nodded once more. “Yes. I’m still working on accepting all the consequences. But seeing what I have missed out on, and what I have gained back since the number of them was reduced this much? It’s worth it, Harry. And I’ll make sure you can’t be harmed during the ritual.”

Harry felt a little drained, but nodded. “I know. And it’s silly that I would worry over something like this. Right? But I want you to let me know when you will next attempt the ritual, and then call me right afterwards. So I’ll know all went well.”

“As that’s not really complicated, I’m pretty sure I can manage that,” Marvolo said with a small smile. “And how is school going?”

Laughing a little, Harry went along with the change in topic and started to tell what had happened at Hogwarts since they last had spoken.

oooOOooo

Friday, 3rd of May 1996

“Come in, Severus,” Marvolo called out when there was a knock on the door. Henbane had informed him – of course – that there was a visitor and who it was, while Flimm had made sure that the Potions Master found his way to the office.

Not as if that had been necessary – Severus had been here a few times already and knew his way around – but the elves insisted on following the rules Marvolo had set. Escorting visitors inside their respective domains seemed to be one of those duties the elves seemed to cherish.

“My Lord,” Severus greeted with a respectful bow, sweeping into the room as he usually did, his robes billowing behind him.

Marvolo waved his hand at the chair he wanted Severus to take and settled down in the chair opposite the moment a tray with tea and biscuits appeared on the small side table between the chairs. That rivalry between the elves certainly had some useful side effects.

“Thank you for making time for me, Severus,” Marvolo said, pretty sure that he spotted Severus rolling his eyes at him while the other wizard was preparing a cup of tea for himself.

“I’m your son’s Head of House, my Lord. When you ask for a parent-teacher conference, there isn’t much I could do to not attend it.” Severus answered with dry politeness.

“True,” Marvolo had to concede. “But you could have called me to the school for this talk,” he just had to point out to the other.

Taking a sip from his tea, and settling more comfortably into his own armchair, Severus ignored that comment and went right for the reason they were here. “I assume that you have a question about your son’s performance in his lessons, my Lord?”
Adding a third spoon of sugar to his tea, stirring slowly, Marvolo answered. “I wanted to ask if the magical exhaustion has negatively impacted his lessons. And how well he’s prepared for the OWLs.”

“He seems to be doing well. And I’m pretty sure he didn’t need all the rest Madam Pomfrey made him take. Your son certainly has improved significantly in Potions, and not one of the other professors has made any complaints known to me. As Miss Granger is still among his friends, now bolstered by enough others to counter Mr. Weasley’s lack of ambition for the scholarly, he certainly gets enough time to study.”

“So he’s as prepared as anyone can be? That’s good to hear. Good OWLs will offer him more options.” Not that good marks in school were a necessity for a fulfilling life. Especially with Harry planning to take up the seat of House Potter in the Wizengamot and his interest in art, good grades in his OWLs weren’t all that important.

“He is, my Lord,” Severus said, picking up one of the biscuits with dried cherries in them.

“That’s good.” Marvolo nodded to himself. “I also decided on a name from your list of ideas. It did take longer than I had planned, but this wasn’t as important. Did you get an answer to your letter?”

“I did, my Lord. They would prefer for the potion not to be named after them, but were appreciative of being asked,” Severus said, visibly interested now that the topic had switched to something the Potions Master was more interested in than his students.

“Well then, the name shall be Anteros Potion. I like the possibility of ambiguity in the name, and if we’re being honest, the two-fathers-potion will be part of the name anyway. Too many people have already heard the working title, for it not to be used in the future,” Marvolo explained. He was pretty sure more than one student of Potions would stumble over the name, cursing him for that decision, and he was happy with that. Add a little history lesson to their essays. They probably would need the extra education anyway.

Slightly annoyed, Theo walked down the corridor towards Harry’s room. He just wanted to work on his homework, but everyone had evacuated the common room earlier when a relationship-meltdown had led to a shouting match. As Crabbe and Goyle had started a heated discussion over which shaving charm was the best – of all things – shortly after Theo had settled down in their dormitory to work, he had left the room with his things, hoping that the common room would be empty.

It had not been – in fact the sounds he had heard indicated that the couple had managed to resolve the problem – and so Theo had decided to try Harry’s room.

It wasn’t a long way from the dorm Theo and the others had shared since their first year to the door to Harry’s room, and to his knock there promptly was an “Enter!” called out from within.

So Theo opened the door and looked in, not daring to step over the threshold just yet. “May I ask for refuge in your room, Harry? I need to get some actual work done on this essay. There’s no quiet place around here, and it’s too late for the library.”

Harry looked up from the sketchbook in his lap, and smiled. “Sure. Come in. You can have the desk.”

With one step Theo was in the room and closed the door behind himself. On his way over to the desk he had a good look at the room and everything in it. The normal dorm rooms were not bad, but this was on another level. More elaborate woodwork, silk-velvet hangings, a comforter made from silk by the look of it, carpet and rugs. It was a beautiful room. And the best part about the room was that there was so much more space than they had in the normal rooms.

Theo walked over to the desk, tidy and with built-in shelves filled with the books they were using this year, and placed his work down, before he sat down on the chair.

While Theo made good progress on his essay, Harry was working on a sketch. Besides the scratches of Theo’s quill on the parchment there also were the sounds of charcoal moving over paper.

After he had finished the conclusion of his essay, Theo cleaned the quill with a little wave of his wand, before resting it on the desk. “Harry.” Theo turned so he could look at his friend sitting on the bed. “You do know what caused that shield, don’t you?”

For a fraction of a second Harry looked like he had been caught red-handed, before he relaxed again, looking confused. “Why would you think that? Half of all the Unspeakables have been searching the village and found nothing.”

“Granger hasn’t been constantly talking about the shield. Wouldn’t she be researching and speculating if she didn’t know what the cause for the shield was? And if she already knows, then it’s only logical to assume that you know as well.” It had become more and more obvious from day to day as the speculation in the Prophet got wilder and wilder, but Granger, Hermione, whatever, only concentrated on the upcoming OWLs, homework, and lessons, ignoring the mystery right before their eyes. Theo knew her well enough by now to recognize when something was suspicious.

Harry groaned and covered his eyes with one hand, letting it slide down slowly, leaving behind a smear of charcoal on his nose. “It’s that obvious?”

Theo shrugged, struggling not to laugh out loud over the ridiculous image Harry made with that smear on his nose. “I guess not for everyone. But yeah, she’s normally like a crup with a bone when there’s something new to investigate. Or am I wrong?”

With another pass of his hand over his face, Harry made the smears a lot worse. “No. You’re not wrong. I know how the shield could protect everyone. But it would be better if as few people as possible know.”

Giggling – and wasn’t he glad that no one but Harry would know about that – Theo got a handkerchief out of his pocket and held it out to Harry. “You have charcoal on your face. So did you learn about the shield from Hermione?”

“No,” Harry answered, summoning the offered handkerchief from Theo’s hand without his wand. He wiped down his face and continued speaking after he had cleaned and folded the square of cloth. “Promise that you will keep this to yourself.”
When Theo nodded, not daring to say anything, Harry heaved a sigh and waved his hand, floating the handkerchief back to Theo. "I was the one who erected the shield. Neville, Ron, and Luna were close enough to see and asked while I was in the hospital wing. You know Hermione," Harry waved a hand, clearly referencing the whole situation, "she would have figured out that there was something Ron and Neville were hiding from her. And well, to avoid her accidentally making things worse with her digging, I told Ron he could tell her."

Theo felt his brows move up. Harry had conjured that shield? His friend was a lot more powerful than Theo had thought he was. And he had already thought Harry near Dumbledore’s level.

“You conjured that shield?” Folding his hands, Theo whistled. “No wonder you were out of it for a week. You didn’t use a simple protego. Did you?”

Harry shook his head. “No. I used something more complicated. Not sure if there is another way to get the same result. Probably nothing that would act as fast. If it should get out that it was me…” Harry trailed off, raking his hand through his hair and falling back onto the bed, staring at the canopy. “I guess at first they’ll heap praise onto me. But I guess once they have demanded and gotten an explanation… Then they’ll fear me… You know how that will end.”

Theo hummed. Harry was probably right. People would not be happy with the explanation – or non-explanation – Harry had just given him, they would want to know exactly what he had done. Establishing a shield to protect a whole village without preparation… Harry was someone powerful enough to be frightening. “No worries, Harry. I won’t tattle.”

The small smile on Harry’s face was relieved. “Thanks, Theo. Hadn’t thought you would. But the more people know, the more likely it is that someone else might learn of it.”

“And you just can’t risk it.” Theo nodded in understanding.

Harry nodded as well and in one move sat back up, grinning at Theo. “And how is your relationship with Ginny progressing? You both are very good at avoiding the public eye.”

Theo sighed. Well, he supposed Harry might be able to give advice, and his friend had just taken him into his confidence regarding the impossible-seeming feat of conjuring that shield. “She’s unhappy about the hiding, but not really willing to face her family, especially her mother, for now at least.”

“Mrs. Weasley is a force to reckon with,” Harry agreed, looking pensive. “But I think it might be a risk not to tell her family. What about when they learn about it and that you have been hiding your relationship? Wouldn’t that be worse?”

It was late – everyone in their room was already sleeping – when Theo slipped back to go to bed. It had been an interesting discussion. Theo wasn’t sure what to do, but he had new viewpoints to consider.

Saturday, 11th of May 1996
It was the game between Slytherin and Hufflepuff, and the whole school was trekking down to the pitch, spirits high.

Ginny was grinning from one ear to the other, her hand intertwined with Theo’s and swinging with their steps. They had talked about it and had decided not to hide their relationship any longer. Life was short, they were teenagers, and they had friends in common. And Harry’s worry about their families learning about them keeping it a secret had been valid. Ginny was sure her mother would not stop with sending an angrily worded letter.

Harry was somewhere farther back, walking with Luna and the Slytherins from his year not on the team, while Theo had agreed to sit with Ginny and her friends.

“And you’re willing to sit in the Gryffindor stands while Slytherin is playing?” Geoffrey Hooper asked with a teasing grin. “Man, you have it bad!"

Theo only smiled, making an effort to look extra dopey. “I wouldn’t be brave enough if Slytherin was playing Gryffindor today. But with it being Hufflepuff, the indignity is worth sitting with my girlfriend!”

The Creevy brothers started with cat calls, and Vicky giggled madly at Ginny’s other side. She knew she was smiling, and gave Theo’s hand a squeeze, before changing the topic. “Do you feel sufficiently prepared for the exams?”

They all knew that the end-of-year exams were pretty much around the corner, starting at the beginning of next month, but normally there was the unspoken rule of no school talk at the Quidditch games. So all Ginny got as answers were groans from her own year mates and the few friends of Dennis’ who were willing to walk with the boy’s older brother and his friends. “Really, Ginny! Way to go and ruin the mood!”

She gave an unrepentant shrug. “What? We’re not at the pitch yet! And I really want to know.” She had gotten a much better look at the exhausted and stressed fifth-years than was good for her own peace of mind. Really, if she hadn’t been with Theo she probably would have been able to ignore the stress rather better than she could now. Even the trade in presumably enhancing substances probably would have gone unnoticed. It had done all previous years.

Decidedly turning her thoughts away from all the reasons she wouldn’t have noticed something like that back in her very first year at Hogwarts, Ginny smiled at Theo. “And besides, I think Theo would like the distraction of someone else complaining about the amount of homework and exams and all that.”

Theo laughed, shaking his head. “No, thank you very much! Everyone is complaining! We do have students revising for their NEWTs, and all the other classes also preparing for exams. It’s not a solely Gryffindor condition, complaining over the lack of free time. I’m pretty sure even the Ravenclaws complain from time to time, and if only because all the repetition is depriving them of new things to learn.” That got a laugh out of everyone, and then they had to get up the stairs, and conversation stopped in favour of being able to breathe. While all the stairs kept them in reasonably good shape, the ascent up to the stands was a different matter. It was long and steep and not nearly broad enough to walk more than two abreast.

Once they had reached the place where they wanted to settle, Theo got his wand out and cast a cushioning charm on the seat for Ginny, who rolled her eyes at a first-year making gagging noises. “Really, you would think they would know what manners are.”

She saw Theo biting his lip, obviously restraining himself from making a comment, then once again took his hand in one of hers. This was going to be good.

“If Hufflepuff manages to squash Slytherin good and quick, we almost won’t need to put much effort in at all to get the cup!” someone behind them proclaimed enthusiastically.

“Not very likely,” Theo said with confidence, grinning.

Getting out her omniclairs, Ginny searched the Slytherin stands to see if she could spot Harry and Luna. It was rather easy, as Luna had donned a silly hat which sported enchanted beads flying around it. Probably some kind of reference to Quidditch.

It still felt kind of unreal that Harry and Luna were a couple. But it seemed to work, and by now Ginny had realized that Harry was not likely to become an Auror or Quidditch professional, fitting the image of her dream partner. And through long thinking and talks with Hermione, she had realized that forcing someone else to change so drastically would make them rather unhappy, leading to unhappiness all around in a relationship.

Theo might not be the type to become an Auror or go into Quidditch, but he had expressed an interest in duelling, and his manners were rather charming.

Ginny really wasn’t sure if she would end up marrying Theo. But as she had realized by now, there was no reason why she should marry her first boyfriend – not that Theo was the first – out of school just as her mother had done. She was planning to get into Quidditch herself, so why should she follow in her mother’s footsteps? Not that there was anything wrong with choosing that path, it just wasn’t hers.

Then Lee Jordan announced the players and all thoughts turned to the game being played out between Slytherin and Hufflepuff.

And once again almost a month had passed since the last Wizengamot meeting. Not that they were placed exactly one month apart. But the meeting for May was today, and his classes for the day had an independent study project to finish and deliver to his classroom until the end of the day.

Severus hoped that the set maximum length would help facilitate better work from his students, and less work for himself in marking said work.

Severus was on his way down from the imposing fountain and the customary registration at the security desk to the Wizengamot Chambers when someone he didn’t really know – even those he had taught tended to look different at thirty than at seventeen – stopped him by way of addressing him from the side.

“Professor Snape! Or rather, Lord Prince. Isn’t it? I wanted to thank you for your quick action! You’re a hero, really!” More bewildered than understanding what was happening, Severus murmured some words that could be interpreted as thanks, and clearly conveyed a sense of urgency, allowing him to evade an actual conversation.
What had that been about?

By the fourth time he had been accosted by virtual strangers praising him for his quick thinking and for being prepared at all times, Severus had realised that those people were thanking him for his actions at the last Wizengamot meeting. Not that he felt that he really was deserving of such praise. Had he not stood there, watching his Lord handling the situation, when he had a wand at hand? Most of his comrades felt equally embarrassed over not acting to contain Diggory quicker. In fact they had rather expected to be harshly reprimanded for their lack of action. They were not sheep, after all. But there had been no crucios sent their way. If the order to think of a plan on how to get a regular evacuation practice for the whole Wizengamot was maybe a harsher punishment was still debated over.

“Severus,” Lord Slytherin greeted him the moment he came into calling distance of the other wizard. “Are you happy to escape a day of teaching children?”

Severus allowed himself a wry smile. “I’m not entirely sure that listening to old men bicker over inconsequential word choices is much of an improvement.”

Bemused, Severus watched his Lord roll his eyes. Such a human gesture. “At least with the children there is more potential for improvement.”

“Indeed,” was the only possible answer to that statement. Remembering the task he had been asked to carry out, Severus slipped his left hand into his robe pocket – and he really liked his Wizengamot robes even though they were not black – retrieving a small tin with ornamental enamel details in the forms of intertwined snakes on the lid.

“Your son asked me if I would be willing to give this to you, Lord Slytherin,” Severus said while extending his arm, hand turned so that the small tin sat on his open palm. “I helped him acquire this small token via owl-order.” In fact he had been greatly entertained by Mr. Slytherin coming to him on one of the evenings he spent in the Slytherin common room, asking for advice on how to acquire this present for his father. The reasoning behind the idea had been sound, and in a way it was almost a prank, if a caring one.

“Oh, did he?” Lord Slytherin asked, smiling, and picked up the tin without hesitation. A show of trust if there ever was one. “It’s quite a lovely tin.” The tone this was spoken in and the way the other man turned the tin over in his hands, indicated that he wasn’t quite sure what he should make of it.

“The tin is only an extra. The gift itself is stored inside,” Severus felt necessary to elaborate. One of Lord Slytherin’s brows winged up and he carefully opened up the tin to discover a quite unremarkable-looking stone-like object. His lips quirking upwards, eyes crinkled in amusement, his Lord addressed Severus. “I think that’s a not-so-subtle hint to take more care with my safety. Thank you, Severus, for your willingness to help him do this.”

“It was my pleasure.” And it really had been. It certainly was a good idea for Lord Slytherin to carry a bezoar with him at all times.

The session neared its beginning, and Severus walked over to his bench – made from a wood that had interesting colour differences and a nice grain, relatively simple with carvings of different poisonous plants – cast a cushioning charm so he would sit comfortably on the hard bench, and sat down.

The Chief Warlock called for order and declared the session started before handing over proceedings to Madame Bones.
“Thank you, Chief Warlock.” She performed the customary bow, before turning so she could address the whole gathering. “I’m here today to inform you all about our progress in the investigation into the terrorist attacks that were conducted using exploding howlers, and the assassination attempt on Lord Slytherin’s life.”

Well, that was a good start to the session. Something relevant and actually interesting. After that there was some reworking on the regulations of Quidditch pitches on the agenda. As far as Severus had understood from the material sent for preparation, the situation at some of the professional pitches had become dangerous, because muggle settlements were getting nearer. Not that it was a laughing matter – as it was concerning the statute of secrecy – but it wasn’t really that important either. And prone to descend into pointless bickering about teams being given unfair advantages, or disadvantages.

“Amos Diggory has proven to be uncooperative. He has expressed glee over someone taking action against who he claims to be traitors to our society, but doesn’t admit to any involvement. A search of his home has produced evidence of ongoing brewing of a few specific potions. Currently an analysis of the ingredients found in the search is under way. As soon as a result is obtained, you’ll be informed.” Which Severus read to mean that there had been everything needed to make howlers, and the DMLE was searching for evidence that would hold up in court. “His attempt on Lord Slytherin’s life was witnessed by such a great number of respectable wizards and witches, that the preparations for a trial for that is under way.”

Soon after that Madame Bones was finished and Severus’ prediction of descent into the madness of sport enthusiasts came true. With a resigned sigh, he resorted to employing Occlumency to keep his annoyance from showing on his face.

Healer Greengrass was once again sitting on a stool in the corner of the ritual room at Malfoy Manor, watching the proceedings. Marvolo had asked for his assistance in another iteration of the ritual they had been working on. Bill was amused that the healer still seemed to hold so much animosity towards him. But, well, giving up long-held beliefs and habits wasn’t easy.

In long discussions, none of them via letter, Marvolo and Bill had changed the ritual around quite a bit. Now the circle held elements to hold two humans in addition to the area where the horcrux would be placed. This time it was a locket with a big S made of green stones – probably emeralds, but Bill would have to examine it more closely to be sure – resting in that circle. It looked a little forlorn there, as they had changed the ritual circle so that this part was big enough for Harry to comfortably fit within.

Bill was sitting in the newly added circle in his role as the one to direct the whole ritual, while Marvolo was sitting in his own circle, now not the one actually conducting the ritual, but as one participating in it.

Their reasoning, won in long and sometimes hard discussions and research, was that while the creation of a horcrux was the effort of a single human, the inability to feel true remorse could be mitigated by giving trust to another human not to muck things up. And Bill was pretty sure that not having to pick up the final chant from outside the circle would remove some elements of risk from the whole endeavour.

“Ready to start?” Bill asked, once more tucking the hem of his linen shirt over his knee in the hope it wouldn’t slip. A shame that rituals usually went better with less clothing involved that could get in the way.

“Yes.” Marvolo’s answer was short and Bill was pretty sure he could detect a hint of nerves under the carefully polite tone.

Not about to make the nerves worse by drawing attention to them, Bill started to speak the starting words, lighting the candles placed at strategic points, and setting the herbs – in earthen bowls – to smoulder, filling the air with fragrant scents.

Then Marvolo took up the chant, and the red smoke-like substance – Bill really had no better word for it – he had seen the previous time started to swirl up from the locket.

When the last tendril of smoke detached from the locket, Marvolo and Bill both simultaneously – and hadn’t they spent some time practising that – changed the chant, making the smoky cloud speed along directly towards Marvolo who doubled over and stopped speaking the moment the red cloud made contact with him.

With a racing heart Bill calmly finished the chant and the ritual, which ended with all the candles and smoking herbs being extinguished at the same time.

Now that the intricate circle was no longer needed, Bill didn’t watch where he stepped as he came to his feet and walked over to his seemingly passed out friend. He arrived there after the healer had already started casting diagnostics, and seeing the man’s face Bill felt better on the spot. There was no tension – a clear sign something wasn’t right that Bill had learned to recognize in the curse-breaker camps in Egypt – and the healer took the time to straighten Marvolo out to a more comfortable resting position on his back before standing back up.

“I think that went rather well,” Bill said, feeling a need to fill the silence, while he walked over to check the locket as he and Marvolo had discussed.

“If you say so,” Healer Greengrass said, sounding distracted and not at all approving. “He’ll need considerable rest, and more than a few painkiller potions.”

This time Bill let the healer take care of moving Marvolo into a bed, instead assessing the ritual workings, and writing down everything he had seen. By now he was pretty sure this was the safest they could get it, and the fact that Harry was alive – the most obvious difference from the other horcruxes they had extracted the soul shards from – should have no adverse effect at all.

While he was cleaning up – using soapy water and a mop – Bill very firmly didn’t think about the fact that the next time they would perform this ritual, Harry would be sitting inside the circle for the horcrux. Nothing good would come out of him worrying too much over things he could not change.

Even though Dumbledore was out of the picture and the Order had disbanded, the knowledge that Harry Potter was the vessel for a piece of soul binding Slytherin to this world, unable to be killed properly, was still out there. They had to change that fact if they wanted to make sure that Harry was only in a normal amount of danger from day to day.
Snorting, Bill plunged the mop back into the bucket before scrubbing furiously at a stubborn marking on the floor.

Wednesday, 22nd of May 1996

After dinner and with enough time before curfew, Harry had escaped to the library. Daphne and her little sister had insisted on going with him – the never really officially stated rule for him to never go anywhere alone, hadn’t been revoked – but now were working on something together a table over from where Harry had settled himself.

This morning an owl from Marvolo had brought him a selection of leaflets and catalogues containing information on several art courses and classes that were offered during the summer.

He wasn’t yet sure what he wanted to do. Acrylic painting? Oil? Watercolour? Or maybe something more like he was already doing, like sketching with charcoal? There were so many options!

And the availability of magical transportation didn’t restrict him to what was offered in London. But it would have made choosing a little easier. More options weren’t really helping in that regard.

And then there was the difference of a course that only was a week long, but all five weekdays were spent in the course from morning till evening, and those that went the whole summer, just on two days a week for an hour.

Harry felt overwhelmed in a kind of happy way. Never before – or so it felt – had he been able to chose just for himself, without any expectations on him.

Hopefully things would stay this way a while.

Taking out a notepad and a biro, Harry started to make some notes, deciding to go about choosing by deciding what technique he wanted to explore, and list what courses were offered for those. Maybe sticking with offers in London would also make it possible for Harry to go there on his own, not being forced to rely on one of the adults in his life to get him there.

While Harry placed slips of parchment into the information material, marking beginner courses in oil painting, he started to make notes of what sounded important or needed to be looked up. It took awhile for him to notice Mr. Filch walking in and going over to a small painting which hung between the shelves of books, where a small section of wall – probably a pillar – was level with the front of the bookshelves.

For a moment Harry forgot what he had come here to do and watched what Mr. Filch was doing. With careful motions and gloved hands the man took down the painting from the wall, murmuring something angry sounding. Then he turned and caught Harry watching.

Feeling heat rising into his face, Harry looked down again onto his current project, hoping that he hadn’t caused any anger in the caretaker.
And then Harry almost jumped out of his chair when he was suddenly addressed by the sour man. “Interested in what I’m doing?”

Blinking in surprise, Harry looked up and nodded. He really would love to know why Filch was taking a painting from the wall.

A few steps were all that was needed to get the caretaker to stand right next to Harry. The man turned the picture so that Harry could see the front and indicated a crudely drawn shape in one edge. “I wish I knew who had the gall to do something like this to some real art.” There was a subdued fury in the other’s voice, and Harry felt himself nodding.

It looked much like some of the graffiti one could see in public restrooms, and as if it had been done with a muggle permanent marker. The occupants of the painting – witches and wizards taking part in a picnic – had edged away from the spot at the edge that had been drawn on, looking agitated.

Why would someone do something like this?

“Can you get it clean again?” Harry heard himself ask and then remembered the deep gashes Sirius had inflicted on the portrait guarding the entrance to Gryffindor tower and how fast those had been repaired. “You were the one who repaired the fat Lady’s painting. Surely this is easy?”

“Not as easy as not needing to clean it,” Filch said. “But that’s not the first time something like this has happened. I have the right tools at hand. Are you interested to see how it’s done?”

That was an unprecedented offer as far as Harry knew. “I would love to. It’s not easy to learn something about all the art we have here at the castle.” In fact ever since he had started to contemplate art as a possible career, Harry had taken a much bigger interest in the art gracing the walls of the castle. Before he had mostly been interested in the people depicted, now he would love to know more about the people who had created the art in the first place.

“Do you know who created the pictures? And how it’s done?”

Harry was sure if he was to tell the others later they would insist he visit with Madam Pomfrey, but there it was an actual smile on the face of Filch. Unheard of before.

“Yes and a little, I take it you’re interested in art?” The caretaker’s eyes wandered over all the information leaflets spread out on the table before returning to Harry himself.

“I am,” Harry said nodding, and suddenly felt as if he should be standing, but stayed seated. “Currently I’m trying to decide which courses to take during summer. And I got a list of Masters of the arts who might be interested in taking on an apprentice. The advice I’ve been given is kind of vague, and I really am unsure how to go about creating a portfolio, or how to approach a Master. It’s all very confusing, and the library hasn’t been all that useful so far.”

Once again Harry felt the heat rising in his face. That had come out rather unexpected and all at once.

How mortifying.

He wasn’t even sure Mr. Filch would be willing to help him at all. Thinking back to all previous interactions between them, Harry felt that he had not really left a positive impression.

“It’s a little late now,” Filch finally said. “But I can recommend a few books, if you want to read about notable wizarding painters and artists. And maybe after you’ve finished your OWL exams I can show you a bit of my work?” There was a beat of silence, not even the low murmur from Daphne and Astoria still present, before Filch continued speaking. “The most important thing is to keep practising and experimenting. You’ve got time still, boy. No need to skip steps or despair.”

And with those ominous words the man was gone, leaving a dazed Harry behind.

Practising. He could do that.

“Settle down please!” Professor Slinkhard called from the front of the class, and reluctantly the students all around did so. Harry wasn’t really enthusiastic for these lessons. It was better than Umbridge had been. But certainly the lessons were duller than any conducted by one of the other professors they had had.

“As the OWL examinations draw nearer, we need to change the focus of our lessons.” Harry didn’t dare hope, but he could see a few of the others perking up. “As it is hardly ideal to expect you to cast spells for your practical examination without practising them first. So, starting today, you’ll get to practise the most important defensive spells in a controlled environment.”

With a flourish one single dummy was moved from a hidden corner right next to the professor’s desk at the front of the class.

Harry felt his brows go up. One single dummy? That really didn’t look promising.

“Each of you will get a turn to cast the assigned spell, after which I and your fellow students will offer help on what to change if needed. Please keep order so that everything can proceed calmly and orderly. We’ll start with the stunner, and in the front row.” He pointed to the first student desk at his right side – Harry’s left – and smiled encouragingly. “Please come forward, bring your wand and take position over by the mark on the floor.” With a small dust of sparkles a line appeared a few paces away from the dummy.

“Please also keep in mind that practising these spells without adult supervision is a foolish endeavour and you shouldn’t do it. That’s what these lessons are for. Do you understand?”

They gave their assent and then watched as one after the other they cast the stunner at the dummy, seemingly surprising their Professor with their success. Harry had to remind himself to actually speak the incantation, and was one of many students back in their seats pretty quickly as they cast correctly on their first try.

“Well, I have to say that went better than I expected,” was Professor Slinkhard's surprised comment when Neville sat down as the last one to cast the stunner. “We have enough time to try our hand at another spell. Let’s see. Bombarda is a useful spell against a great number of possible threats. Let me demonstrate it one more time.”

While the professor did exactly that, going into an agonising amount of detail, Harry contemplated that the duelling club was working out rather well, judging by the spells he had seen cast in this lesson. Maybe he should try to get some serious revision in into the next session. It probably would be a lot more useful than this silly insistence on safety.

When Hermione came back from her turn at the spell, she rolled her eyes, and Harry hid a grin behind his hand, pretending he had to yawn. It said a lot about the teaching methods of a professor when Hermione disapproved.

Chapter End Notes

Keeping the balance between showing as much as one can and not losing the way in a tangle of different plotlines isn’t easy. But as I don’t want to end up like George R. R. Martin, I decided to not fill in all the days in between with scenes of all those plotlines that I have faded out as they lost relevance to the main plot, sticking with the main characters and their actions through the month of May, highlighting the most important happenings. I’m hoping you’re not too cross with me.
(I checked, just had to, and I haven’t reached the number of words in the entire series of “A Song of Ice and Fire” yet. It seems to be around 1,770,000 words at the moment.)

Thanks to Jordre and Jake for helping to improve my spelling!

“All I’m saying is that it shouldn’t be this hard to get permission for this kind of thing,” one of the other curse-breakers in the changing room said forcefully the moment Bill stepped out of the shower room, only a towel wrapped around his middle, water running down his chest, arms, and legs in small rivulets.

“Permission for what?” he asked as the conversation fell silent. It had occurred to Bill more than once by now that some of his colleagues here at Gringotts, who didn’t know him that well yet, were careful of what they said when he was in hearing distance. It was frustrating, and kind of infuriating, if understandable. The Weasleys were known to have been on the side of those banning magic deemed too dangerous most of the time, and known as active supporters of the fight against Voldemort and everything labeled dark magic. Not that Bill himself was happy over how everything had been tarred with the same brush. But how should the others know that?

“Research into old rituals that can’t be used any longer,” was the short and relatively harmless sounding answer.

Bill hummed, walking over to his locker to get another towel out of it. “I guess you’re talking about those where part or all of the needed ingredients are simply no longer available rather than those which have been, for more or less good reasons, banned from being used as they are?” There were indeed a few rituals which had been used in curse-breaking in the past that were now no longer available. Mostly because plants or animals they depended on were no longer available. Chief among them was a containment circle which had been so widely used that the small rodent-like animal had become extinct due to overuse.

“The ones where we can’t get all that’s needed. Getting permission for research into them, so we might find a substitute or rework it so that we can work without so much risk.” There were a few murmurs of agreement, and Bill nodded silently -- because he agreed that many containment circles and rituals weren’t that easily replaced with wards -- and ignored a muttered remark of “Having a good look at some of that banned stuff wouldn’t go amiss either.”

“Have you applied for permission, Brown?” Bill asked, sorting through the pile of his clean clothes in search for his socks.

“I tried,” Brown answered, returning to inspect a big hole in his protective robes. “But the people in the administrative offices of the Experimental Magic Department want to have all kinds of forms, and preliminary research and stuff. And to do that, I would need access to some books, but to get the access, I would need to have permission to work on a specific ritual. It would be funny if Having found his socks, Bill quickly slipped on his undies and sat down to put them on. “Yeah, if you don’t have access to an extensive library of your own, that’s pretty impossible to manage,” he agreed, thinking how lucky he had been to be helping Marvolo with his work on the horcrux extraction ritual. If he would be interested in the research into the old containment circles? “Did you try to find a sponsor of some kind?” There was also always the possibility of asking the Goblins, but then they would insist on a contract giving them the rights to whatever you might find or create. Not the best idea usually.

“Because I’m pals with that many Lords and Ladies who actually have any of the relevant books for this.” The sarcasm was thick enough to walk on, and Bill made a grimace in sympathy. That was indeed a problem. The Malfoys probably would have all the books needed for the research, but they would never willingly admit as much.

“Would you be interested in working together with someone though?” Bill just had to ask. There was a distinct possibility that this project would fall right into Marvolo’s interests, and all curse-breakers everywhere would benefit from this, if they could get it to work. “You know someone?” Brown seemed sceptical, but the repairs on his robes – Bill idly wondered what had caused that much damage – were momentarily forgotten.

“I’ve got a friend,” and wasn’t that a surprising development, “who has a great interest in curse-breaking. We often get into deep theoretical discussions, and he has a talent for finding books.” Bill was pretty sure that Marvolo’s connections with those families who had claimed their members had been forced or coerced into being Death Eaters, or had officially distanced themselves from their Death Eater relatives, had much closer contact with Marvolo now than they led everyone to believe. Why else would Healer Greengrass still work for him? Why would the Malfoys let Marvolo use their ritual room? Why would Lord Lestrange let the man adopt another child?

“And he wouldn’t insist on claiming everything?” Brown wanted to know, probably not really believing that would be true.

Bill slipped into his leather trousers, and pulled on the shirt over his head, answering while in the process of getting dressed. “I would have to ask him. But he's likely to agree with being a figure in the background. He’s more interested in such stuff out of a love for everything magic, the less commonly known the better.” Bill felt himself smiling. “I’ll let you know what he says.”

“Sure,” Brown said and when Bill left a few minutes later, on his way to meet up with Fleur for a nice night out, he felt confident that he had maybe established himself as independent from his family a little more this day.

Minerva rubbed her eyes, pinched the bridge of her nose, and then grabbed her glasses from the table in front of her to slip them back on. She had made her way to the teacher’s lounge early – leaving behind her half-eaten dinner – to get a few moments of peace.

The job of Headmistress was a bigger headache than she had anticipated. Especially because she was trying to sort out those blocked funds tied to specific classes being offered at the school. The other blocked funds were even more complicated and would have to wait.

Getting the money only if a certain class was offered made hiring a teacher to actually offer the class kind of difficult. And getting students to actually take the classes not offered yet also wasn’t easy.

Maybe finding people passionate about those topics would be the way to go. Offer them rooms to teach in and maintain the classes even if there was just one pupil to take them. Getting one subject reinstated that way might be enough to convince others that she was being serious when she was searching for someone to teach Latin, or Warding, Healing, or arts. Just to name a few.

Before she could fall down that hole again, the others started to arrive.

“Hello, Minerva,” Filius said, walking over to his favoured chair, leaving the door open so Severus and Septima could walk in, also taking their usual seats around the conference table.

“We saw each other just a moment ago, Filius,” Minerva said with an eye roll, still feeling better for the friendly greeting.

“No excuse for being rude,” was the cheerful reply, which caused Severus to roll his eyes, bringing a grin to Minerva’s face.

A plate of ginger biscuits appeared on the table, along with a big pitcher of lemonade and one with iced tea. The weather had been improving recently and summer wasn’t far away any longer, even this far north.

Pomona was the last to enter, and she closed the door behind herself before sitting down in her customary seat.

“Thank you all for coming,” Minerva opened the meeting, drawing the attention of all her colleagues. “How are the reviews for OWLs and NEWTs going?” Each year it was the same, exam time wasn’t only stressful for the students taking their big exams, it also was a time of high workload for the professors. Preparing exams for five years of their students, preparing the OWL and NEWT students for their important tests, and coping with hysterics and all the results of too many long nights spent studying.

“My classroom only blew up three times,” Severus said in a deadpan voice, his hands folded on the table in front of him. “The exams are prepared and I think my NEWT students should be able to withstand the stress.” He didn’t say anything about the OWL students, but he never did anyway.

“I’m pretty confident in the ability of my students to pass their exams,” Wilbert took up the conversation with a smile on his face after Severus dropped it so suddenly, then turned to Filius. “I think your duelling club might have contributed to that quite a lot.”

Minerva was pretty sure more than one of them thought the same at that very moment. If anyone had anything to do with the success of the students in Defence, it probably was Mr. Slytherin, who was the main teacher at those duelling club meetings. Filius had expressed his awe over how well Mr. Slytherin prepared those meetings, together with his friends, and the boy’s patience in explaining things to the other students. Filius even had asked her if she knew if Mr. Slytherin was considering a career in teaching.

She didn’t know and wasn’t sure if she could ask Severus about that career advice session. He was usually pretty concerned about keeping his students' privacy protected. If there was no reason for anyone to be involved, he wouldn’t involve anyone else. And if transfiguration or special arrangements, like an apprenticeship during school years now that she was Headmistress, weren’t part of it, there was no reason to involve her.

“That’s good to know. They suffered from a rather disjointed education.” Which was the understatement of the year.

“Have any of you noticed students we need to keep a special eye on?” Minerva changed the topic and moved the meeting along. And it wasn’t even all that obvious, as this was a standard question at this time of year. Usually they kept an eye out for those students regularly visiting Poppy in the infirmary because of sleepless nights, stress-induced stomach problems, and other such difficulties.
And there also were those students they felt would try to cheat.

Which no one had done successfully – as far as they knew – in almost a hundred years, or something around that timespan.

“I think we need to find the cause for all those cases of sudden nosebleeds, fevers, stomach bugs, and fainting.” Severus stated with a smirk on his face. In fact his classes didn’t have a sudden increase of those ailments, but many of the classes of the others did. Especially in the lower years, and in Transfiguration, History, and Herbology when work with fertilizers had been announced.

They all had their suspicions, of course, but their two suspects always had been good at covering their tracks if they put their minds to it.

“Good luck with that,” Pomona said with a snort. “We all know who sells that stuff. Whatever it is.
And I see no way to actually prove anything. Do you?” She turned to look at Severus, who grinned again.

“No,” Severus said amicably. “I don’t think I do, but if I’m not wrong, it seems as if the supply has tapered down. Maybe even to nothing since the spring holidays. Have you noticed? The frequency of suspicious incidents you have informed me of has declined.”

Minerva felt her eyebrow wing up. Could it be true that the Weasley twins had run out of material to sell? Or would they stop selling whatever it was the students were using just in time for exams to remove temptation?

“I’ll keep an eye out. It’s the usual candidates,” Poppy spoke up. “And the number of potions I have handed out so far isn’t bigger than any previous year. No need to worry, Minerva.” The mediwitch’s face scrunched up, looking over Minerva in a calculating way. “Do you get enough sleep, dear?”

Minerva waved Poppy’s concerns away. “Not as much as I would like, but it’s not long until summer now, and even if there’s still enough work to fill the whole summer, I certainly will get more freedom in how I organise myself. Don’t worry, Poppy.”

That got a discussion over holiday plans started and effectively ended the work-related meeting.

Saturday, 1st of June 1996
The weather was pleasantly warm, and dry – which was much more important today – with any luck they would be able to go swim in the lake later in the summer. Both Sirius and Remus were sitting in a small cluster of young trees, resting on the soft bed of moss, waiting for moonrise.

Thinking how nifty the wards around this part of the grounds of Potter Manor were, Sirius turned his face up towards the rustling leaves. “As Harry’s history tutor, what do you think about the chances Harry has to gain an OWL in History?”

Remus snorted. “You want to talk about schoolwork?” Sirius rolled his eyes, but didn’t react. “You, Sirius Orion Black, lackadaisical student all your life, cutting corners whenever possible. Hell! Sometimes even when there was no possible way to cut any corners! And you want to talk about History and exams on the evening of the full moon? Who are you? And what have you done with my friend?”

Once more rolling his eyes, Sirius flung out one arm, aiming at Remus, but only brushing the other's loose robes. They planned to slip out of their clothing with enough time to spare before the moon rose, Sirius transforming into Padfoot to spend the night running around with his friend.

“Yes, I want to talk about my godson. Who is going to be taking his OWLs pretty soon. I’m sorry if that’s a shock for you. And now answer the question.”

Remus laughed. “If he keeps his head he should easily manage an acceptable. Not sure if he really is interested in taking the subject up to NEWT. Wait,” Remus interrupted himself. “No, that’s not true. I’m pretty sure that he isn’t interested in taking History of Magic with Binns as a teacher any longer.”

They both laughed for long moments before they chuckled a few more times and fell quiet once again.

“He’s so big already,” Remus sighed, sitting up. “It doesn’t feel quite real.”

“Yeah,” Sirius agreed sitting up as well, then changed the topic somewhat. “I got another letter from the twins. They’re preparing for their exams as well. If I hadn’t recklessly run after Peter, I would have seen Harry grow up. And maybe even would have known about Nawel and Enora much earlier. It feels kind of sad knowing all I’ve missed. Their first words, learning to walk, the first bout of accidental magic…” Sirius trailed off, sighing.

“And maybe you still wouldn’t have known, and maybe wouldn’t have found them even now, because you never would have looked,” Remus said quite reasonably. “The what-if game isn’t one you can win, Sirius. Let it be.” Much more brightly, he continued. “But you’re in regular contact with the girls?”

That transparent effort to change the topic got Remus a dark look from Sirius, before he started to smile. Remus was right, of course, and there was no use in entertaining thoughts of what-if. “Yeah, we write regularly. They’ve started to teach me some French. Not speaking of course, but reading, and words that are in more common use outside of continental France. It’s interesting. And I hope I’ll get in some practice of actually speaking over the summer.”

“And how is contact with Olivienne progressing?” Remus’ look was much too innocent for Sirius to trust it.

“You know that well enough, Remus. She still insists on writing in French and you know that!”
After all, Sirius had had to ask for help translating something more than once. “If you want to know how I feel about the whole thing, tricking me isn’t necessary.”

Remus’ look pretty much stated his disbelief of that claim, and Sirius knew himself well enough to silently agree. He never had been one to speak about how he felt about any situation that could be described as difficult. Jokes and pranks always had been as much passion as distraction and diversion.

So Sirius huffed and did change the topic, bringing up – in a low blow – Remus’ own relationships. “Did Dora ask you out again?”

Remus cast him another grumpy look, before looking out into the airy woods around them. “She did, actually. Not that she has a lot of time at the moment with the howler investigation, or Diggory’s murder attempt. The whole Auror Department is buried in work. But she asked me to meet her for lunch sometime next week.”

The blush on his friend’s face made Sirius grin. It was much more fun speaking of the love-woes of others. “And where will you go?”

The blush got deeper. “What do you mean? Where would we go? I thought the Leaky would be a nice place.”

“Remus, it’s a date! You can’t really consider the Leaky Cauldron! Really?” Sirius turned towards his friend in astonishment. The Leaky Cauldron wasn’t a place to take a girl to for a date. A nice muggle restaurant would be a much better choice.

“Sirius! It’s a lunch date. She’s at work before and after. She won’t have time to change into something else! I thought about the nice Indian place a few streets over from your house, but, well… She can’t really go to a muggle place in her robes, can she?”

Well, Remus had a point. So Sirius nodded. Maybe a date at the leaky Cauldron wasn’t all that bad after all. One needed to consider the circumstances. “That’s true, I guess. But try to invite her. Not that she’ll let you.”

They fell into a comfortable silence, listening to the small animals around in the woods, the birds fluttering from branch to branch, waiting for the moment to shed their clothing and become their animal selves.

Sirius loved the nights of the full moon. It was absolute freedom to run without worry in the warded woods, alongside his friend, playing, hunting small game – rabbits, rats, and the like – leaving all human troubles behind for a while.

And with dry grass and fresh moss under his paws, it was even more fun than with snow and mud covering the ground.

Sunday, 2nd of June 1996
Harry started to pack his things – books, notes, learning cards, and all the other stuff – drawing the attention of all his friends sharing a study space with him.

“Where are you going?” Hermione asked, barely looking up from her runes dictionary, puzzling over a complicated translation exercise.

“Meeting with Mr. Filch. I told you all when we started. Remember?” Harry explained, rolling up a few unused sheets of parchment, and looking around the unused classroom they had claimed for their study session, which involved casting magic to see if there was anything else he should pick up.

“What have you done to earn a detention now?” Ron asked, looking up from his notes with a frown on his face, in honest confusion.

Harry snorted as did Theo, Ginny, and Luna. “It’s not a detention, Ron! He said he would show me some of his work.”

“Cleaning?” Ron looked even more confused now, as if there was a prank happening here and he was trying to figure it out.

Harry laughed and closed his bag. “Not cleaning, dusting, mopping the floor or any of that, Ron. Mr. Filch actually is working with all the paintings in the castle. Cleaning, repairing…” Harry waved his hand around trying to convey that there was much more to the position Mr. Filch filled at the castle than most gave him credit for. “He learned that I’m interested in art. And he studied art, offered to let me watch him work. I’m curious, so I accepted.”

It was more than clear that Ron really didn’t get why Harry would spend time with Argus Filch on a Sunday afternoon. But he didn’t say any of the things probably flashing through his mind. Ron just looked back down at his notes, frowning again, and mumbled a distracted, “Have fun!”

Theo gave Harry a wink, Hermione just waved absentmindedly, and Ginny didn’t even look up, clearly lost in whatever she was reading, sitting on the floor with her back resting against Theo’s legs.

Daphne was practising banishing charms with her sister, both going through the list of fourth-year charms one by one. Draco had excused himself, going for a fly, and Neville had decided that an afternoon in the greenhouses would do him some good.

With a smile on his face, happy over the large number of friends he now had in more than one House, Harry slipped out of the room and made his way down the corridor towards his destination.

That destination wasn’t the office everyone knew about, the room holding many confiscated items and the records of all detentions ever served by any Hogwarts student – at least the twins claimed that that was the case – but Mr. Filch’s workroom, which was on ground level in an out-of-the-way corner of the castle.

It took Harry a while to reach the room, and he felt unexplainable nervous once he stood in front of the door, hesitating to knock.

Mr. Filch didn’t really interact often with students outside of his duty as caretaker, supervisor of detentions, and enforcer of the no-magic rule in the halls. Harry’s own interactions up till now had been less than ideal. The evening of his detention in the Forbidden Forest, and the evening of Halloween during the whole Chamber of Secrets fiasco when Mr. Filch had assumed that it had to have been Harry who had petrified his cat.
Taking a deep breath and reminding himself that there hadn’t been any real harm done, Harry raised his hand and knocked decisively on the door.

Offering Harry advice and a look into art was more than enough compensation for the detour back in first year and the accusation uttered in a moment of terror and grief during Harry’s second year.

“Enter!” was called from inside, and Harry opened the door to do just that.

Harry greeted him politely and took a good look around. The room was not what Harry had been expecting, though if he would be hard-pressed to describe what he had expected.

One whole wall was outfitted with windows, shades drawn so that no direct sunlight could find a way inside. The room was rather large, having a big – and that was very big indeed – table placed in the middle of the room. Another wall was covered in shelves, filled with jars filled of colourful powders, boxes of cardboard and of wood, rolled-up canvas, brushes, and a number of tools Harry had no names for.

Mr. Filch was standing at the last wall – not counting the one with the door, Harry had just come through – an easel in front of him holding a painting of a hunting scene, as far as Harry could tell. The air was filled with the distinct smell of strong vinegar-based cleaners.

Carefully Harry moved closer to where the other was working, highly concentrated.

 ooOoo

“Come over, Mr. Slytherin,” Argus called the youngster over, reassured that it had been a good idea to invite the boy here by the careful way he moved around the room, and didn’t touch everything in sight without thought.

This was the first time Argus had invited anyone into this room. Not even the Headmaster had been here since the first day of Argus working here. It did look likely that this idea wouldn’t turn into a disaster.

“Have you decided on a class for your summer yet?” Argus picked up their conversation from the library, carefully brushing a last spot of pigment on the place he had had to repair the canvas of the hunting scene that normally was placed in a corridor near Ravenclaw tower.

“I have, actually,” the boy answered, staying well out of Argus’ way, and the light, which was more important anyway. “I think working with oil paints is something I can’t practice all that well during the school year. So I’ll try that. And then maybe a shorter course on how to sketch people.” The boy sounded a little embarrassed.

Argus subtly turned, pretending to check the colour he had been mixing, and saw a light blush on the boy’s face. What fifteen-year-old wouldn’t be tempted by an art class teaching drawing with live models? “Sounds like a good plan to me,” Argus said and hummed, cleaning his brush in a big glass of water – he liked the tinkling sound the brush’s metal parts made against the glass – before setting the brush down so it would stay in shape as it dried.

“Let’s go over to the table.” Argus gestured to the table where he had laid out the painting from the library. “I thought you might be interested in how I’m going to remove that muggle marker.”
The boy seemed eager enough and sat down on the stool Argus indicated.

“As you can see I’ve taken of the frame, and removed the stretcher,” Argus started to explain, slipping on the cotton cloves, enchanted not to let anything through, be it sweat from his hands, or anything he used to clean the paintings he worked with. “And I have decided that the varnish on this picture is in need of replacement. Generally the paints and varnishes used on magical paintings are much more durable than muggle products from the same time. Especially in a place as magically charged as Hogwarts.” It felt good explaining this to someone who was actually listening. Maybe he should revisit the idea of teaching some summer classes of his own.

“But this painting, according to the records kept here at the castle, hasn’t been re-varnished since it first came to the castle back in the twelve hundreds. So first I’ll remove the marker, then I’ll remove the other surface dirt, before finally removing the varnish, which has yellowed with age.”

The boy next to him was almost vibrating, not with the desire to be gone, to be anywhere but here, but with questions.

“You can ask questions, if you have any.” He had brought the boy here to nourish a young artist, in the hope of carefully fanning the flame, so he should be able to ask questions.

“How will you be able to clean up the marker but not damage the painting?” It was an obvious question, but not a bad one.

“Remember that there is also varnish between the marker and the paint. I’ll move carefully with the cleaning solution I have mixed here.” Argus indicated a small glass jar that could be closed with a metal screw-on lid. “And even though that probably will at least partially affect the varnish, it won’t reach the paint at all.” Which was good, because most of the cleaning solution was pure alcohol, one of the more reliable ways to remove most permanent markers. “That’s another reason why I decided to take off the varnish as well. It’ll probably be damaged in that spot where I need to remove the permanent marker, and it’s easier to replace it all together then trying to touch it up.”

Getting out his cotton swabs, Argus then screwed off the lid and dipped the first swab carefully into the cleaning solution. “I diluted this as much as possible, so it’ll go slowly. But we have time. If the cleaning is too fast it might burn a hole through the whole painting – canvas an all – before I can get it off again.”

The time until dinner flew by, with Mr. Slytherin occasionally asking an intelligent question – were potions part of the usual varnish? what was the purpose of a varnish in the first place? what were the differences between non-magical and magical varnishes? – and Argus explaining all of his actions, why he had chosen the specific method he was using over other possibilities, and under what circumstances he would have chosen something different.

It certainly had been one of the more pleasant afternoons in a long while.

They parted ways with Mr. Slytherin promising to bring a small example of his art to school after the summer holidays. There really wouldn’t be much time for them to repeat the afternoon in the remaining term. Exams did that to a student's timetable.

With a rare smile on his face, Argus made his way to the kitchen. He wouldn’t expose his good mood to rambunctious, sticky children to have it die a swift death. Better to eat alone in his quarters, after ordering something with the elves, and then read, than risk his good mood needlessly.
Harry met up with his friends again just at the end of the main stairs, but before he could call out to them, a sixth-year from Ravenclaw – Carmichael, if Harry wasn’t mistaken – came over with a secretive air about him.

“Hey, Slytherin! Interested in getting a little boost for your exams starting tomorrow?” the other boy asked, turning so his back was to the doors into the Great Hall, getting a small phial from his bag, which was filled with something only lightly coloured green and oily. “Too late to boost your revision. This,” he shook the bottle carefully, “is solely responsible for my nine outstanding OWL results.” Harry was pretty sure Carmichael wanted him to be impressed by that. “But it’ll also help with remembering stuff during the exams. So are you interested?”

Harry didn’t get to answer – in the negative because his father had told some really gruesome stories about what had been sold during his time at Hogwarts, and Harry had no illusions that that aspect had changed by much – as Hermione stepped up in just that moment.

“Carmichael! Do I have to report you to Professor Flitwick? This isn’t the first time I’ve caught you trying to swindle students out of their money by selling bogus Baruffio’s Brain Elixir. Hand it over,” she called the older student out, holding out her hand palm up in a motion reminding Harry of a primary teacher he’d once had, confiscating a pack of sweets from another pupil.

The Ravenclaw handed the phial over and managed to vanish from sight before Hermione could demand to search his bag for any others he might have had.

“It’s outrageous how many of our fellow students use the importance and stress of the exams to swindle others for monetary gain.” Hermione shook her head and cast a banishing charm at the phial, emptying it of its dubious contents.

During that exchange the others had caught up to them and had stopped to watch Hermione ranting, as she was wont to do. And then Hermione fell quiet, staring over to the entrance to the castle. “Are those the examiners?” she asked with a comically faint voice.

They all turned, almost as one, and looked over to the big doors, watching as Headmistress McGonagall greeted a group of elderly witches and wizards. And just as they had turned as one, they didn’t need words to decide that they were curious enough to time their arrival at the entrance to the Great Hall so they and the group of professors reached it at the same time.

“It’s so sad that the dear suffered so terribly from that curse,” an elderly, slightly bent over witch, said to the Headmistress. “I remember how he took his OWLs and NEWTs, such a bright lad. It makes one think, doesn’t it, when someone you knew as a young one suddenly declines so harshly due to age.”

Professor McGonagall seemed seriously out of her depth, rapidly changing the topic, just as Harry and his group of friends walked past them into the hall. “It certainly made me think hard, when the first children of students I had taught came to be my students as well. I hope you’ll join me for dinner today, and maybe take part in the school’s meals with everyone else.”

Then they were out of earshot inside the usual hubbub that was dinner at Hogwarts when everyone was excited. The friends split up, Luna catching Harry’s hand to draw him near for a short kiss, going to their respective tables to sit down and eat.
Everyone was to tense and focused on the exams beginning tomorrow morning to care much for socialising.

“I’m kind of glad that you’ve decided to sit here today, Harry,” Theo said as he settled down next to his friend. “As much as I like sitting with Ginny, enduring Hermione and her constant chatter about past exams, all the anti-cheating enchantments, and whatnot would drive me to do something unfortunate today.”

“Like what?” Harry asked, grinning to himself as he reached for a bowl of mashed potatoes. After that intense time with Mr. Filch in the man’s workroom, he was famished.

“Like emptying a saucier of this fine gravy over her head.” Theo said, picking one saucier up to put a generous amount of said gravy on top of his selected vegetables and piece of shepherd’s pie.

“That would indeed be unfortunate.” Draco said from a few seats over, reaching for a bowl of steamed and glazed carrots. “I can vividly imagine the lectures you would get.”

“Lectures?” Theo asked, emphasising the s at the end, clearly asking why Draco thought Theo would get more than one lecture over something silly as starting a food fight.

“Yes,” Draco answered with relish. “First by Granger of course. After she got over the shock, naturally. She has giving lectures down pat. Then by the Headmistress. She’s right there, after all. And after that,” the glee on Draco’s face was only surpassed by the one in his voice, “at least one week worth of detentions, I would guess. Professor Snape would delight in making it quite clear in front of the whole House what an utterly idiotic idea it would be to do something so asinine in front of that many witnesses.”

They all started to laugh, Harry carefully setting down his goblet of milk so he didn’t spill anything, and Daphne almost doubling over she was laughing so hard.

When Blaise started to imitate what Professor Snape would sound like, they were hopelessly lost to laughter for at least ten more minutes after Blaise had finished with a “Next time employ a little more subtlety and don’t get caught” in a haughty voice, and with a snarl on his face.

When Harry could sit up straight again, carefully using a handkerchief to wipe away the tears from laughing so hard, he grinned over to Draco and Blaise. “Thanks, I think we all were in need of that.” he said before starting in on his food, that thankfully was still warm. There were many good things to be said for charms keeping food warm on the tables.

Monday, 3rd of June 1996

“Hermione, please!” Ron was at his wits' end. And as good a friend as she was most of the time, currently Hermione was killing his last nerve. “Do you really think you can learn more now? Just moments before the exam will start?” Yes, it was true that Ron had read – or tried to at least – all his notes on Charms the previous evening, his hands clamped over his ears to shut out the worst noise, but surely now the day of the exam was too late?
“And you do know everything anyway!” That clearly had been the worst thing he could have said.

“I don’t know everything, Ronald Weasley!” Hermione all but screeched, prompting Parvati to cover her ears with her hands, bent over a book in her lap.

And she didn’t stop there. Ron was kind of dazed only a few moments in, wondering how someone who could remember over twenty instances of having gotten something only slightly less than perfect, could think so little of their own capability to remember stuff.

“Please, Hermione, for the sake of us all, cut it out,” one of the twins cut Hermione’s rant short – well, shorter at least – from the side as they all got up from their seats to leave the Hall and wait outside. “We get that you feel you have to be excellent in everything you attempt to do. And we get that you’re insecure about all the stuff. But believe us, you’ll do just fine.”

The other twin shouldered his bag and placed an empty goblet back on the table. “A little tension is good. But too much will hinder you, especially in the practicals in the evening. So try to relax a little, Hermione. You’ve got a solid foundation built over the last five years. You don’t need to learn everything now, like some others.”

Ron still tried to decide if that last bit had been a dig at him – he really had not paid as much attention to school as he should have – when they came out of the Great Hall and saw a distinctive figure standing just inside the entrance hall. “What’s he doing here?”

Harry had just stepped out of the Great Hall after the others who were going to take the Charms exam today, when he spotted a familiar figure standing there waiting.

“Dad!” He had covered the distance between them and had thrown his arms around Marvolo before his thoughts had caught up with him. Then he stiffened. Worried that this open display of affection – he had called Marvolo dad! He hadn’t done that ever before – would cause Marvolo to reject him, equally publicly.

Before those worries could take root and start to fester, Marvolo’s arms had come up and hugged Harry back. “I’m glad to see you, too.” Then he started to hiss, most likely impossible to hear for anyone but Harry. :

―I guess Marcus is influencing you, Harry. Only to be clear about that: I don’t object when Marcus calls me Dad, and I won’t object should you wish to do so:."

Hissing back a quiet :

―Thanks:. Harry was fiercely glad that he had his face buried in Marvolo’s shoulder, effectively hiding it and his bright blush from the other students.

When they both stepped back from their embrace, the others who were waiting had moved so that a respectful circle was cleared around them.

Narrowing his eyes, Harry looked up to Marvolo – it wasn’t that much of a distance any longer – and sharply said, “You didn’t tell me you would be here today!” And Marvolo hadn’t, even though they had spoken via the mirror the evening before, as they did every night.

“That’s true,” Marvolo was grinning when he answered. “I didn’t want to distract you. But as you surely remember, I need to gain my OWLs and NEWTs again. And as this is the earliest date that exams are offered this summer, I asked if I might take a few exams at Hogwarts.” He shrugged.
clearly delighted with surprising Harry. “I was given permission and will take my Charms OWL exam today, together with you and your classmates.”

“Won’t that be strange, though?” Harry couldn’t help but ask.

“What exactly should be strange?” Marvolo wanted to know, looking totally at ease.

“Taking the exams here, with the students, all so much younger…” Harry trailed off, thinking that maybe it was more strange for him to have his father here taking exams at the same time as him.

“I have no idea. Can’t be much stranger than my life has been for almost a year now. I’m certainly glad to have the opportunity.” Marvolo didn’t give anything away, but Harry was pretty sure that the other was thinking about all the changes they had lived through together. And how little Professor Dumbledore’s attempts to hinder him had actually accomplished.

“So you’ve been learning in secret?” Better not to get distracted with the philosophy and morals of second chances.

“More or less,” Marvolo confirmed. “I brushed up on the theory, and a few of the charms I don’t regularly use, like those that make seemingly random objects dance, or otherwise behave in unexpected ways. But most of the material isn’t something uncommon. I use a lot of it on a regular basis.”

That made more than a little bit of sense, so Harry only nodded, and asked after what Marcus had thought about Marvolo going to take exams during the day.

This way the time until they were called back into the Great Hall went by pretty fast. The group of nervous fifth and sixth-year students, and one adult, marched into a Great Hall transformed almost as radically as it had been for the Yule Ball during the blasted tournament.

The four big house tables were gone. Instead of them, neat rows of single desks and chairs had been arranged to face towards the teachers’ table where Professor Flitwick was standing, grinning from ear to ear, waving them in to take a seat. “Come in, come in! Ah, Lord Slytherin! Be so kind and take a seat up front here, right by my side.”

Marvolo gave Harry a wink before doing as he had been instructed, elegantly sitting down in his chair at his desk.

Harry selected a chair at random, not near Hermione, and sat down, looking at the back of the stack of parchment pieces waiting for him. There also was a quill – as Hermione had insisted on telling them repeatedly, spelled against many common ways to cheat – and a glass of fine black ink – another thing provided and spelled to prevent attempts to cheat – waiting for him to write.

Picking up the quill, Harry checked to make sure it was cut well. It would be a disaster should he get points taken from his results because the examiners couldn’t read what he was about to write.

“I would like to remind you all that cheating is not permitted and will result in you failing the exam, and being made to leave on the spot,” Flitwick spoke out loud, drawing the attention of all students sitting tensely in their chairs. “You have time until the sand runs out.” He turned a fairly big and embellished hourglass – the wood was carved – over so the sand started to run. “You may start now.”

Harry turned his stack of parchment over and reached for the ink to unscrew the lid. A few seats over, Hermione was already furiously scribbling onto her own exam sheets.
With a last bracing breath, Harry looked down at the first piece of parchment and the first question – only barely noticing that the paper was clearly labelled with his full name, Henry James Slytherin-Potter – and read it.

1. Name the incantation,

2. and describe the wand motion of the charm used to let objects fly.

Clearly remembering Ron’s voice calling out Wingardium Leviosa, sending the troll’s club flying only to knock the big beast – were they classified as beasts? He would have to check before the Care of Magical Creatures exam – moments later, Harry started to write down this first answer.

Maybe this wasn’t going to be quite as bad as he had feared when he had heard all those admonishments about the importance of OWLs and how hard they were.

ooOoo

Draco looked on in disbelief as Lord Slytherin – the Dark Lord – sat down at the Slytherin House table right next to Harry, reaching for a plate of neatly cut triangle sandwiches as if it was the most natural thing in the world.

Carefully selecting his own lunch, Draco kept the odd pair of wizards in his peripheral vision at all times. He hadn’t forgotten the one time he had spied on the Dark Lord getting angry at one of his Death Eaters for not doing as she had been told, and had cast a Cruciatux curse on the woman – Alecto Carrow – as if it was nothing.

While it probably was safe here surrounded by so many people as they currently were, Draco couldn’t quite shake the uneasiness he had around the Dark Lord.

Across from him sat Theo, who met Draco’s eyes without flinching, clearly as surprised that Lord Slytherin would sit with the students rather than the professors.

Or maybe not as surprised as Draco had thought. Because just a moment later Theo spoke up. “Could you please pass the fruits, sir?” clearly addressing the very same man most of the table was too scared to properly acknowledge.

But then the Dark Lord had spent a lot of the summer holidays at Nott’s home.

“Certainly, Mr. Nott,” the Dark Lord answered, wandlessly levitating the plate Theo had asked for, moving it effortlessly across the table. When Theo had accepted the plate with fresh fruits of the season, the Dark Lord turned back to Harry, continuing the lively discussion they seemed to be having about the exam they all had just taken.

And wasn’t that mind-boggling? The Dark Lord taking his OWLs with normal students at Hogwarts!

“Which other exams will you be taking?” Harry asked of the wizard sitting next to him, leaving off all titles. Draco felt the hairs on his arms rising. He never would dare be this disrespectful to his father in public, even knowing that, at most, he would suffer from a week not being allowed to go flying during the summer.

“‘You know that I already took Transfiguration last summer,’” Lord Slytherin simply answered between sips from his goblet filled with the sweetest juice their table had to offer. “‘I have decided to take Defence, Runes, Potions, and History with you all this year.’” Draco felt like he had to keep from laughing out of disbelief as the Dark Lord counted the exams he was planning to take in the order they would have to take them, on his fingers.

Would the man be eating with them all those days?

“No interest in attending the Herbology practical?” Harry asked with a teasing grin that made Draco’s heart race in worry.

But the Dark Lord only snorted, giving his son an exasperated look. “I’m merrily prioritising the subjects I’ll be needing most. I fully intend to strive for even better results than the first time around, in all the subjects I took when I was your age.”

Draco tried to concentrate on his own food, and the upcoming practical exam in Charms, rather than let himself be rattled by the odd family dynamics – because what else could it be? – between the Slytherins sitting only a few places over from him.

Maybe by the end of these exams he would be able to pretend to be at ease just as convincingly as Theo was doing.

One could hope.

Chapter End Notes

Inspiration for the art-cleaning scene taken from the really wonderful videos from Baumgardner Restorations on youtube (there's a new one today!). I tried to stay vague and would advise: if you have some real art to get repaired or cleaned, take it to an expert!

For the exam part I got out my own copy of book five (in German) and had a look at what was written there. So if you recognise something, that isn’t totally by chance, but also not connected to me copying word for word from the original.

Thanks to Jordre and Jake for helping to improve my spelling!

Chapter Notes

Thank you all for your lovely comments and reviews, they have helped me keep writing even as I was melting at my computer. While this summer isn’t as dry as the last, it somehow feels warmer, making writing not always an easy task.

Monday, 3rd of June 1996

Everyone not going to take exams in the morning had left the common room early, or was doing something quiet, and the fifth- and seventh-years were trying to relax.

Harry was sitting in front of the main fireplace, on the ground – and the place he usually sat in was empty which made Harry roll his eyes mentally – playing a game of chess against Theo. Pansy’s cat had placed herself between them and the fire, obviously luxuriating in the heat, purring a rumbling purr loud enough to be heard from where Harry was sitting tailor fashion.

Harry wondered for a moment what the rest of the Slytherins would have to say if Nagini had insisted on accompanying Marvolo and then had decided to stay with Harry. She would be sprawled out in front of the fire just like Pansy’s familiar now was.

Draco sighed in a rather dramatic fashion, closing his book on transfiguration theory with enough force to make a sound, and then moved to sit beside Theo and Harry, as if to watch Harry being trounced in chess. He had gotten better, but not good enough to actually win.

“You’re really bad at this,” Draco stated after one of Harry’s towers had been split in two.

Harry turned a little so he could look at the blond and noticed that he had some colour again. Maybe relaxing had helped with the stress of the first OWL exam. “You don’t say,” he said, grinning when his sarcasm startled Theo to chuckle. “It’s fun anyway.” And it was.

Draco shook his head, and seemed to relax even more. Harry wasn’t really sure how they would survive two weeks of exams every day.

“Chess isn’t the only thing you’re bad at, is it, Potter?” Adrian Pucey snidely said from where he and his friends were sitting around one of the other tables by one of the big windows into the lake. “Still a little boy, crying for his daddy?” A few people chuckled at that pretty petty taunt, but Harry just sighed, rolling his eyes at Theo.

Who looked a little concerned, and worried. And of course Harry knew why. He had had enough lessons in politics, enough experience with bullies, to know that he couldn’t ignore this, and that his reaction and response needed to be just right, if he wanted to nip this in the bud.

So Harry didn’t turn around, but contemplated the board, when he answered to the taunt. “I’m sorry that your family is so distant that you wouldn’t embrace your father when seeing him the first time in person after he almost died.” Not that Marvolo could actually die at the moment, it still would be a big problem if his body was too severely harmed, and almost no one knew of his current immortality anyway. “You might want to work on that instead of trying to make me look bad so no one will look too closely at you.” Harry tried hard to sound unconcerned and to hold a relaxed posture. It wouldn’t do to seem tense or bothered, as that would undermine what he tried to present here.

This play-acting was uncomfortably close to what he had needed to do to get by at the Dursleys and primary school without too much trouble, and he would have gladly done without it. But it also was something that was important in politics.

And if Mrs. Goyle hadn’t helped him to realise that there was absolutely nothing wrong with being happy about being cared for, and enjoying that, or with expressing his feelings. Harry hadn’t planned that outburst in front of everyone – lifelong conditioning wasn’t something easily broken – but now that it had happened he wasn’t really unhappy that it had. Drawing the strength to stand by that display from Mrs. Goyle’s words seemed to work quite well so far.

“I think you simply have no sense of decorum!” Pucey tried once more, still going for disdain in his tone. “Can’t even address your father right in public.”

Well that was a weak attempt, and Harry felt his brow wing up at that accusation.

No decorum?

“You seriously think that my father would have sat with us at the students’ table if he wanted the meal to be formal?” Harry couldn’t keep his voice from sounding astonished because why would an adult actually chose to sit with the students if they weren’t interested in keeping it formal?

“Really.” And with that Harry turned back to the chessboard – when had he looked up towards where Pucey and the others were sitting? – dismissing the others, and actually ending that dangerous conversation to Harry’s own surprise.

ooOoo

“And he really tried to call you out for lack of decorum?” Marvolo asked, even as Harry had already explained that that was exactly what had happened.

Just like any other day since Marvolo had sent the mirror to Harry, they were talking. This time while sitting on their respective beds, ready to go to sleep.

“He did. And now that I think about it, as much as I enjoyed you sitting with us, I have a feeling the others didn’t as much.” Harry looked chagrinned and tired, and Marvolo tried really hard not to smile. That would probably send the wrong message. How would a teenager react if he was called adorable?

“I can sit with the professors on Thursday when I’m back again for the Defence exam. If you prefer.” Marvolo offered, quite aware how much discomfort his presence at the Slytherin table during lunch had caused. In fact he had been really entertained by how much the young Malfoy had tried to keep his composure and how entertained the young Nott had been by that as well.

His son sighed. “I guess.” And wasn’t that hint of unhappiness flattering? His son wanted to eat lunch with him even when all his friends were there as well.
Should he be worried about that? Wasn’t happiness caused by someone’s unhappiness something bad?

“Do you feel prepared for your Transfiguration exam tomorrow?” Best change the topic of their conversation before the ground could get any more treacherous.

“I guess.” Harry moved his hand through his hair, catching his glasses and pulling them askew. With an annoyed sigh Harry righted the glasses again. “At least I did what I could in revision, I did pretty well in my last essays and the practical work wasn’t too bad.”

“So basically keep a cool head and you should at least manage an acceptable?” Marvolo cut Harry off before he could start to ramble and talk himself into a state. Even all this time later Marvolo still could remember quite clearly all the hysterics his fellow students had managed to talk themselves into when he had taken his OWLs and the years after when he had been Prefect and Head Boy.

“Yeah. Basically.” Harry was rolling his eyes now, clearly saying without words that keeping a clear head in this instance wasn’t all that easy.

“Go to sleep.” Marvolo said feeling quite fond of his son. “You’ll need it tomorrow.”

“Have fun catching up with your paperwork tomorrow.” Harry said with a grin, obviously teasing, before taking off his glasses. “Sweet dreams.”

“Sweet dreams, Harry.” They ended the call and Marvolo reached for the book he was currently reading. A book he was skimming to see if he could lend it to Bill’s colleague or if there was something too questionable in there. He was pretty sure the curse-breakers were mostly pretty happy to read books that contained magic that was currently considered illegal, but there was other magic that had been considered questionable for far longer than any laws regulating what could and couldn’t be used had been around. Better make sure to only give out books that were not that questionable.

Sadly this project would be mostly on the back burner for him until the exams were done with. It was an interesting one, and not something he had bothered with before. But he was certain it was worthwhile.

It was far later than he had wanted it to be when he finally doused the lights and went to sleep.

Tuesday, 4th of June 1996

It was lunch break, and Harry was sitting with Luna, gratefully hiding behind her request that her boyfriend sit with her. Because Hermione had looked like she wanted to ask him to sit with them at the Gryffindor table, and there was a lot of tension there.

“Do you feel the exam went well?” Luna asked from where she was lazily mixing her mashed carrots into her mashed potatoes.
“I guess.” Harry slowly answered, taking a sip from the cold tea with honey he had mixed up. “At first I couldn’t remember the definition of a switching spell. Not sure that what I wrote is close enough to the actual definition, but... well. The rest of the questions weren’t really easy, but at least I was able to write something for all of them.” He shrugged and felt himself smile in response to Luna’s serene expression of happiness. “We’ll see when the results come in the summer.” Another thing in which OWLs differed from the exams Harry had taken until now. While all other exams – except NEWTs of course – were marked by the Professors and announced before the students left for the holidays, these were marked by Ministry employees and the results were sent out by owl during the summer holidays.

“Have you made plans for the summer?” Harry asked, because he would love to visit with Luna and his friends this summer. Finally it was possible, with him no longer stuck with the Dursleys, for friends to come visit and for him to visit his friends. And for more than a week or two at the end of summer.

“Dad and I want to go on an expedition for part of the summer. We haven’t decided on a place yet. Maybe Burma, or New Zealand.” And from there Luna went on to describe all the different magical creatures supposedly native to those places which she and her father would try to find for the Quibbler and their loyal audience.

“Do you know when you’ll go? Because I really would love to visit you at home, maybe go to Diagon Alley together.” It felt a little like when he had asked her out for Valentine's Day. He was all nervous and hopeful.

“That’s a delightful idea!” Luna moved her hand to take Harry’s and leaned into him until her head rested on his shoulder. An older Ravenclaw on the other side of the table – probably sitting with them because there was more space at this section of table – rolled her eyes but refrained from commenting, for which Harry was grateful. “I would love to go out to eat ice cream with you and the others. I like having friends.”

And there was one of those open and blunt statements Luna tended to make at the oddest of times. She was right of course, but her bluntness made others uncomfortable, as Harry had witnessed more than once this year, and people tended to get nasty if someone made them confront uncomfortable truths.

“Friends are great!” Harry agreed because it was true and this year had expanded that group of people Harry could name as friends by a lot.

ooOoo

After lunch they all were herded back into the chamber they had waited in before they had been sorted back before first year and then again yesterday before their Charms practical.

Harry expected that they would be called in alphabetical order in small groups just like the day before. He was sure this would get old pretty fast. Because of his change in last name from Potter to Slytherin – as far as the school was concerned – he now came even farther down the list.

But no. The first group called was “Turpin, Lisa. Goyle, Gregory. Bones, Susan. Patil, Parvati” so it looked like Harry’s fear was unfounded and the examiners had actually thought about the dread of always having to wait for last.
But just like yesterday the students who were finished didn’t return.

Probably another safety measure to reduce attempts at cheating.

Harry was occluding most of his waiting time in an attempt to keep calm and not listen to some of the others panicking in the various corners of the room.

“Slytherin, Henry. Abbott, Hannah. Thomas, Dean. Finch-Fletchley, Justin.” The replacement professor’s voice startled Harry out of his concentrated calm, and he followed the others out of the waiting room, through the hall and into the Great Hall. Once again the big tables had been removed, replaced with several stations – composed of rugs marking an area, and a table and chair set – with a waiting examiner at each station.

“You’ll go to Professor Tofty, Mr. Slytherin.” And that Harry did.

“Welcome Mr. Slytherin.” The kindly looking, ancient, wizard said with a smile. “I hope you feel up to showing off a little for me.”

Despite his nervousness Harry had to smile at that.

The voice of Professor Tofty was kind of funny as he waved at the table and an iguana sitting on it, blinking lazily. “I would like for you to vanish that iguana, Mr. Slytherin. For a start, if you would?”

“Sure.” The vanishing spell. Harry had practiced that one until he couldn’t stand it any more. So with confidence he got his wand out, moved so he had a good angle to aim at the reptile, and called the wand movement and incantation to mind.

Then Harry moved his wand and spoke the incantation and felt instant relief the moment the iguana vanished from sight.

“Well done, Mr. Slytherin.” Professor Tofty said. “Let’s move on to…”

A shriek and the sound of many large birds trying to take off in panic interrupted the professor, and made Harry turn and duck on instinct. Panicked animals never were anything good.

“Miss Abbott! How did you manage that? Halt! Everyone halt and take cover!” The witch testing Hannah over at the next table called out. “We’ll pause the exam while we catch and remove those flamingos.”

And the examiners, together with the new Transfiguration Professor, who had taught them since Professor McGonagall had become Headmistress, started to do just that, and Harry carefully moved out of the way towards the wall behind his testing station to take cover as instructed.

“What did you do?” Harry just had to ask when a beet-red Hannah came to stand next to him.

“I don’t know!” She wailed at a hushed volume – an expressive feat in Harry’s opinion – “I was instructed to transfigure that poor ferret and then suddenly there were all those birds!”

It took almost ten minutes for all the birds to be caught and brought out of the hall, and the whole time Harry was watching the adults’ attempts valiantly holding in his laughter.

When he finally left the Great Hall Harry felt that he had done pretty well. And then he went to start on some last Herbology revision before tomorrow’s exam.
When Bill walked into the library on the second floor, led there by a house elf, Marvolo was sitting in a comfortable reading chair, and the young boy Marcus was sitting on the floor — on a rug if Bill could trust his eyes, which he usually could — colouring vigorously on a piece of paper.

It was such a sweet homely scene.

His mother never would believe it if Bill told her. Which he wouldn’t, because everyone was much happier with her not being reminded of the terrible situation, as she termed it whenever there was an article in the Prophet or Witch Weekly. Dad had complained more than once when mum wasn’t near that she obsessed too much. After all, after this many months it was pretty clear there was no need to worry. Or so Arthur said.

Bill knew that there was no need to worry, and still felt that that approach to decide if something was wrong or not was not the best.

The elf popped out of the room, and Marvolo looked up from his book, smiling a little and waving at another chair nearby as he spotted Bill. “Come in and sit down.”

“Do your elves not get along?” Bill just had to ask, while walking over to the chair to sit down, because the display when he had entered the house had been hilarious.

“Why do you ask?” Marvolo closed the book and turned a little so they were more comfortably seated for a discussion and had a look about him that reminded Bill of the twins.

“Because they almost started a fistfight over who would be allowed to take me up here. And you know about that.” At the end of that statement Bill narrowed his eyes because he knew he was right.

Marvolo grinned and smiled. “True. The two of them have distinct areas of responsibility. It’s an effort to make sure both of them have enough work.” Marvolo added to Bill’s questioning look. “And as you are both my guest — and everything regarding me is Henbane’s domain — and visiting here — this house being Flimm’s domain along with the children — they probably weren’t sure how to decide which of them was responsible for taking care of you because of those conflicting possible interpretations of the situation.” Marvolo sighed, and pinched the bridge of his nose. “I have to say negotiating between those two is more challenging than some other interests I had to bring together.”

A few interesting possible scenarios flashed through Bill’s mind at that proclamation, and then he wrenched his mind away from that to return to the reason he was here. “Did you find books that could help?” Marvolo had tentatively agreed to sponsor the investigation and research Brown was wishing to do when Bill had sent a letter inquiring.

“I have found a few books, but they contain more than only information pertaining to the topic. So before I can hand them over, I’ll have to make sure they are actually safe for someone else to handle.” Bill’s eyes fell on the book in Marvolo’s lap when he waved at it. And the reference was clear enough. Old families often put curses on books to make sure they couldn’t be stolen or read by those not of the family. It was paramount to make sure a book was safe before lending it out.

“Might Mr. Brown be willing to meet?” Marvolo asked, letting the book float from his hand over to a small desk – where a stack of others was already sitting – without even looking.

“I guess he wouldn’t be opposed on principle.” Bill wasn’t actually sure where Brown stood considering politics. Or what the man’s stance on magic considered dangerous actually was in detail. As Brown was a curse-breaker he probably had a similar basic interest in the more dangerous side of magics, just like Bill had. But if Brown was willing to just accept some other things as there but not used if it was in one of the books… that was the bigger question.

And probably the reason Marvolo was asking for a meeting.

His eyes wandering to look at where the boy was turning his head this way and that, getting different angles while he inspected his work, before picking up a red pencil to start up again. With the child here Bill felt a little restricted in what he could say. But he remembered well enough how nice it had been to be included when the grown ups were talking, that he didn’t want to ask Marvolo to send the boy away either.

He decided to pick his words carefully. “If you want to see if Brown is the right wizard to lead that research, and if you can work with him, I’m sure he’ll agree to a meeting.”

Marvolo nodded. “I think a meeting would be good before I hand over any books for him to work with. I trust your assessment of his skill, but I need to see if I can trust him to handle books belonging to the Potter family.”

Bill nodded, registering that Marvolo spoke of books belonging to the Potter family, and also realizing that there probably weren’t that many Slytherin assets left. After all, the family had been pretty much vanished from the stage of politics and society for many generations.

“I’ll try to arrange something.” Bill agreed. “What were you reading last?”

And from there they descended into a lively discussion about different spells used to detect poison, and curses that were intended to prevent antivenin and antitoxin from working, until it was time for dinner.

Bill went home his mind buzzing with new ideas.

Wednesday, 5th of June 1996

Today they had had their Herbology exam. Theo had seen Draco’s relief at another day devoid of the Dark Lord’s presence, taking his OWLs alongside them all. It had been plain as the sun shining down on them while they waited outside the greenhouses, and had been highly amusing.

Now after everyone had taken a shower – setting plants into new pots, selecting the right fertilizer from a broad selection, and that all in an early summer heat, hadn’t let them stay clean – they were sitting in their common room, resting a little before they would take up their revision materials once again.

If the OWLs were already this exhausting, how bad were the NEWTs which had nasty, exhausting in their name?

Harry was sketching something, one finger of his left hand wrapped in a small bandage. “Say Harry, what happened with your hand?” Theo hadn’t seen the bandage before now and was curious.

“That was a fanged geranium, nasty little bugger. And ungrateful, too! It has a much nicer pot now,” Harry answered without looking up from his sketch.

People close enough to hear chuckled or laughed outright. Theo was shaking his head, smiling. “I don’t think they’re intelligent enough to understand what you were doing, Harry.”

“Probably.” Harry agreed, and turned his sketch so Theo could see it. “Doesn’t change that the ungrateful thing bit me.”

Theo smothered his laughter at seeing the sketch. Harry had sketched a few slugs advancing on a fanged geranium, which seemed to be trembling in fear. It was not the usual realistic style Harry went for, but more in the art of the occasionally appearing political caricature.

“No! Tabitha, I just know I did badly! My parents will send me to Durmstrang, or maybe even take my wand from me!” A girl suddenly started to yell at the top of her lungs, her voice breaking with the distinct quality of someone who had a head-cold, or had been crying.

Theo looked around and noticed Draco and Harry do the same. He himself was only curious to see what was happening, but Theo knew that Draco, as a prefect, and Harry, as the Slytherin Heir, looked because they felt and were obligated to do something about a small girl panicking.

Over in one of the corner seating groups used by the younger-years – closer to the entrance and without a good look over the main pathways through the common room – a small girl with two pigtails of dark hair – Theo couldn't really tell if it was black or brown – was standing, her face blotchy and her eyes red. She was hiccuping, and had tears running down her face. Another girl was trying to console her, without much success.

“Draco, go fetch the Professor,” Harry ordered in a low voice, setting down his sketching material, and not looking back to see if Draco did as told, as he got up from his seat and walked over.

As Theo knew he would, Draco was gone almost as fast as Harry, but Theo stayed where he was, keeping an eye on Harry’s things, and watching how Harry approached the girls, addressing the one who wasn't crying first.

“Miss Smith, may I sit with you and your friends?” Harry didn’t really let them refuse and soon was sitting with the first-year girls, regaling them with a funny story as far as Theo could tell, bridging the time it would take Professor Snape to make it to them.

It didn’t take long for Draco to return with the Professor walking past the prefect to where the girls were sitting. Theo saw the distinct colour of a calming draught in the potions phial the man was holding loosely in his hand.

Well that probably would be sorted out soon. Picking up the novel he had been reading – recommended to him by Ginny – Theo returned his attention to the text, only to be distracted once again when Harry sat down in his armchair with a huff.

Theo looked up and raised his brows in an unspoken question, which Harry understood without problems.
“She’s worried about how her parents will react if she doesn’t manage to meet their standard. No idea if her worries are founded in something close to reality. But I think she now knows that she’s not alone. If she needs help she’ll get it.” Harry spoke in an almost-whisper, making sure his voice wouldn’t carry.

Theo nodded. It was curious how protective Harry seemed of the younger Slytherin students. Had he always been that way? Theo wasn’t sure.

“Let’s go up and have dinner, Harry.” Theo decided, sure his friend would try to skip the meal, too nervous about the Defence exam the next day, to really have much of an appetite. “And don’t pull that face. You know that Professor Snape has no qualms about feeding you more nutrition potion if you don’t show up at meals and eat something.”

Harry snorted and gathered his things to return them to his room. “Meet at the door in ten minutes?”

Theo nodded in agreement and stood to return the book to his dorm as well.

Thursday, 6th of June 1996

During lunch Marvolo sat down at the teachers table with a wink at Harry, who rolled his eyes but smiled. As fun as it was to sit with his son at the Slytherin table, he really shouldn’t put that much strain on the students taking their exams.

Severus was sitting rather far away next to his wife, and in general Marvolo got the impression that the whole usual seating order had been shuffled around. There were quite a few reasons why that might have happened, but the most likely – at least in his mind – was that the Headmistress had wanted to keep him close. She had been a close confidant of the old meddler Dumbledore, after all.

Food appeared on the table, and Marvolo eyed the offered possibilities with interest before he picked up a platter to scoop some shepherd’s pie onto his plate.

“How was the exam, Lord Slytherin?” Headmistress McGonagall started a conversation, placing mostly meat on her own plate.

“Different.” Marvolo answered, thinking back to the written exam he had taken that morning. “I’m not sure why exactly it’s so different now. But I guess the motivation that let to Madame Umbridge being sent here to teach. Or the spotty education over the whole schooling of this year’s students taking their OWLs.” And he really needed to take down that curse for good, as abysmal as the current Professor was, Marvolo couldn’t in good conscience leave the curse where it was.

“So you felt it was easier?” The Headmistress asked in follow-up.

“It was.” Marvolo nodded, not really eager to get into a deep conversation with her. Maybe he should eat down in the village or risk the marks of the other Slytherin students by sitting with Harry again tomorrow.
“Could it be that you simply have more experience now, Lord Slytherin?” The man sitting at his other side interjected, surprising Marvolo a bit.

Harry, obviously, had told him about the Squib who was taking care of all the paintings inside the castle and that Mr. Filch had offered advice to him, but that had been all he had learned so far about the man.

Inclining his head in concession, Marvolo had to agree. “That’s possible. Despite the fact that this body is not yet a year old, my mind had much more time to absorb knowledge compared to my fifteen year old self back when I took these exams for the first time.” In fact most of the time Marvolo had studied for these exams had been dedicated to making sure he knew which main points were expected of him to know. Most questions were easy, but the more open-ended ones could go badly if he failed to write the things expected because he concentrated on entirely the wrong topic.

Time for a change in topic. “My son tells me that you have allowed him to watch your work on one of the paintings, Mr. Filch. I wanted to thank you for that. Harry has developed a big interest in art. Getting to see a master conservator at work is a unique opportunity.”

Argus Filch hummed and then showed his yellowed teeth in a big grin. “It was no hardship. He’s a polite lad. And has real interest, a good eye as well. There aren’t that many wizards or witches with talent, interest, and the determination to see it through.” Filch cut into his sausage with fervour. “Something like that needs to be encouraged.”

“I didn’t know that you had a Mastery, Mr. Filch.” The Headmistress leant forward in her seat so she could see past Marvolo to Filch, interest clear in her voice, and steam from a bowl of peas clouding her glasses. “Why isn’t it noted in your file?”

Filch snorted. “That’s because I don’t hold a magical Mastery, Headmistress. Lord Slytherin was being polite.”

Now it was Marvolo who made a small unhappy noise. “I don’t know about me only saying such to be polite.” Really he hadn’t said that just to be polite. “You finished a long and rigorous education in art. It might have been at a muggle university, but that doesn’t change the level of time, dedication, and skill needed to attain it. The closest we have in the magical world is a Mastery.” Marvolo had spent some time researching muggle opportunities in art. For Harry, and because he had been curious.

“Still.” Filch said with bitterness in his voice, implying with his tone if not his words, that he didn’t agree. “There is no real way to get a muggle degree accepted by the Ministry, or most employers.”

“Do you feel able to teach?” The Headmistress asked seemingly out of the blue. But when Marvolo turned to look at her he saw a calculating gleam in her eyes.

“Teach? Those hooligans?” Filch clearly was more than skeptical. “I doubt they even would want to learn.”

“Harry certainly would enjoy the possibility to learn more than he can from books and experimentation.” Marvolo just had to interject, as securing such an opportunity for his son would be great.

Filch snorted again. “The Board never will allow a class for only one student.”

“Let the board be my problem.” McGonagall said with more force in her voice than Marvolo had expected from her, most of the time she seemed so mild-mannered. “And as it clearly would be an elective, we could make it span all years, and you would get to decide who can take the class and what to teach your students.” She seemed to warm to the topic, and more of the people seated at the head table turned their attention to their conversation. “And if you say you will only take two students at a time, that would be fine by me. I would love to expand the opportunities offered here at Hogwarts.”

An art class at Hogwarts. Marvolo was pretty sure that there hadn’t been something like that in a long time. But he guessed that might have been different when the school had been founded. Hadn’t it been a place to learn all kind of things?

“I’ll guess I’ll have to think on that.” Filch sounded cautious, and Marvolo didn’t blame him. Teaching wasn’t for everyone, and Severus was a prime example that passion for a subject didn’t automatically qualify someone to teach said subject.

The meal was over pretty soon after that, and Marvolo had to wait with all the others to be called in for the practical exam.

Lord Slytherin and his son and heir were called into the Hall at the same time. they had decided by lot who would get to examine them and had timed the moment to call them both carefully.

“Welcome, Lord Slytherin.” Tobias greeted the wizard with a smile, feeling quite giddy.

The wizard turned from where he had been looking after where his son had gone and almost visibly concentrated on his own exam. “Nice to see you again, Professor Tofty.”

As usual the man was politeness personified, and Tobias felt himself smile. “Let’s start with something easy first, shall we?” It was almost a joke that this man had to re-take his OWLs but Tobias supposed that there were rules to follow. “Please cast a shield charm for me.”

Lord Slytherin smiled. “I guess a protego is enough? Verbal?”

Chuckling, Tobias nodded. “If you would be so kind.”

With a hint of a bow from the neck, Lord Slytherin produced his wand – it was an odd feeling seeing that iconic wand up close – and expertly executed the movement and incantation to create a shield of shimmering, translucent blue energy in front of him.

Tobias clapped. “Well done!” Then he waved a hand at the dummy at his testing station, one of the rougher self-assembling ones they always used when a spell needed to be cast on a person and was destructive, or dangerous when miscast. “And now a stunner, please.”

This went on for some time, Lord Slytherin sometimes asking for confirmation when Tobias asked for a spell that belonged to a group of spells normal students taking their OWLs would only have learned one of. It amused Tobias to no end.

Floating a chest out from under the table, Tobias smiled and placed it down carefully. “And for the finish, I would like you to face this boggart.” Some thought it wasn’t a true test of capability that he announced that there was a boggart inside the chest. But Tobias was of the opinion that as he couldn’t know the deepest fears of the students he was testing, it was the height of stupidity to not give them a moments warning to prepare themselves. He didn’t want to see if they would survive a potentially deadly situation with no preparation. He only wanted to see if they knew the spell, what a boggart was, and how to go about banishing the pest. “I do ask you not to kill it.”

Curiously, Lord Slytherin suddenly was much paler, but nodded so that Tobias stepped back – so as not to confuse the boggart – and flicked his wand to open the chest.

Out came a startlingly accurate replica of the young Mr. Slytherin-Potter hissing with a derisive expression on his face.

Was the boggart speaking Parseltongue?

“Riddikulus!” There was a puff sound and suddenly the replica of the boy was on the ground laughing and squirming, a big snake on top of him, with the head right up in the boy’s face, seemingly tickling him with his tongue.

“Well done!” Tobias stepped in, banishing the boggart back into the chest. That had looked like it was a rather severe fear. It happened from time to time when someone older, or with more of a past, came to be in front of them for their exams, that someone had a deeper fear than the usual. This seemed to be a rather personal one, and that was reason enough not to draw too much attention to it.

“You can go!” Lord Slytherin placed his wand away and left with a greeting, waiting at the door for his son to catch up, who had finished almost at the same time.

Tobias meanwhile turned to his notes, marking full points before turning towards the next student he would have to test. These weeks were getting harder on him.

Harry arrived at the doors from the Great Hall to the Entrance Hall just a moment after his father, feeling quite happy with his practical exam in Defence. But that happy bubble quickly burst when he saw how shaken and pale his father was.

“Are you okay?” Harry just had to ask, reaching out to lay a hand on his father’s arm in an attempt to offer comfort.

“Not really. But it’ll pass.” Marvolo attempted a shaky smile, and visibly pulled himself together probably employing Occlumency to do so.

Harry wasn’t really convinced – Marvolo wasn’t normally someone who showed so openly when he wasn’t feeling his best – but followed his father out of the Great Hall, the ceiling hinting at the clear, sunny weather outside, and down to the shore of the lake to a shaded spot near a few trees.

A few flicks of both their wands they had a sturdy blanket to sit on, as well as spells surrounding the place to keep away others, who might try to listen in on their conversation.

It took a few moments more – which Harry waited through more or less patiently – before Marvolo started to speak.
With his face turned out towards the lake, speaking slowly and deliberately, Marvolo explained his state. “The exam went well, but the last task was to demonstrate how to handle a boggart.” Harry felt his stomach tie itself into knots, he was glad that he hadn’t had to face a boggart himself. “In the past, for the longest time, it had been my own corpse. But sometime after I regained a body it changed.”

Harry was tempted to ask what it was now, he hadn’t noticed what Marvolo had done during his exam, concentrating much too hard on doing well in his own, but knew that it would an incredibly insensitive thing to do.

“This wasn’t the first time I encountered a boggart, obviously, as there was a severe infestation in your godfather’s summer house, but…” Marvolo took a deep breath, picking up a small stone and tossing it into the lake. “It’s still so much more disconcerting than seeing my own corpse.”

Nibbling on his lip, Harry tried to decide what to do now. He didn’t want to ask what his father feared the most, so he probably should change the topic. “It looked like you had a lively discussion up at the head table during lunch.”

Marvolo snorted, tension leaving his shoulders. “That we did. I still wonder why the Headmistress decided to place me between herself and Mr. Filch. It seems as if the Headmistress is contemplating expanding the offered classes at Hogwarts. She actually asked if Mr. Filch would consider teaching an elective art class.”

Suddenly eager to hear more, Harry moved closer and leaned forward. “Art? In what form? Did he agree?”

Now Marvolo chuckled, relaxing even more, his legs stretched out before him, leaned back on his elbows, enjoying the nice weather. “He wasn’t all that keen on teaching teenagers.” The way he said that made Harry think that that hadn’t been the word used. “But the Headmistress was eager to assure him that it could be a year-spanning class, as small as he wished it to be. That he could set the requirements to be admitted to the class. I think he’ll consider it.”

“That’s great!” Harry wasn’t sure he would be able to qualify for an art class, but then there was also the fact that Mr. Filch had invited him into his workroom and had him let watch the man work. So maybe it was possible after all. “I certainly would like to be a part of that.”

“I thought as much.” Marvolo said, nodding. “Let’s wait here until your classmates are all finished?”

“Yeah.” Harry sighed and made himself comfortable. Spending the rest of the afternoon here, relaxing would be great.

After dinner he planned to do some more revision for runes, which he would write tomorrow. But for the moment he would enjoy the sun, the gentle wind, and the singing of the birds in the trees.

Friday, 7th of June 1996
Severus was on his way back from a stroll at the edge of the Forbidden Forest up to the school for breakfast, a small collection of wild flowers bundled in his hand, when he came across his Lord also walking up to the school. “Lord Slytherin.” Severus called out after a moment’s hesitation, drawing the man’s attention.

The Dark Lord turned and adjusted his route so that they would meet a few meters farther down their respective paths, on the gravel road up to the castle. “Lord Prince.” There was a slight grin on the Dark Lord’s face, and Severus didn’t even try not to roll his eyes.

“We’re on school grounds, and you’re here to take OWL exams, Lord Slytherin. So the appropriate title would be Professor Snape.” The many different ways their interactions were dictated by the places they met, or the circumstances of a meeting, were staggering.

The Dark Lord only chuckled. “True enough, Professor Snape. How did the first week of OWL exams go? And NEWTs? Any hysterical breakdowns?”

“Only a few students in need of calming draughts or sleeping potions. Nothing unusual.” Severus considered as they walked on towards the castle in a leisurely pace. “Well, that’s not entirely true. This year we had rather fewer instances of students poisoning themselves with some supposed stimulant or other. Not sure if our new prefects are that much better at confiscating the bogus elixirs and whatnot, or if the Weasley twins’ trade with joke sweets has made the students more cautious in taking things they don’t know well.” In fact it seemed that those pranks had encouraged the students to learn more detection spells and to actually use them before they ate or drank anything.

“Harry has told me a lot about those pranks. Really ingenious inventors those two.” The Dark Lord mused, smiling fondly, something that still felt unsettlingly human for that man.

“They certainly are that.” Severus agreed, because to say otherwise would be to lie, and there was no need for that out here.

They walked a few moments in silence, nearing the castle with each step.

“You’re rather early today, Lord Slytherin.” Severus would rather have stayed silent, but it would be considered rude not to talk with a visiting wizard. And even as Severus would gladly sink to one knee before his Lord out here there wasn’t much between them between Severus being Head of House Slytherin at Hogwarts, the Slytherin Heir’s Head of House, and having his research sponsored by Lord Slytherin. Not quite the same relationship than the one the mark – now hidden and much less obvious – on his arm established.

“Well, yes. Marcus was picked up for school earlier than normal today. They have a project day in the gardens, and started earlier for that. So I wasn’t quite sure what to do with myself. Starting on the mountain of paperwork on my desk wasn’t an appealing prospect, so I decided to take a stroll on the grounds instead.”

Severus had to agree that a stroll over the grounds of Hogwarts was always more pleasant than paperwork. The knowledge that there were several years of potion exams still waiting for him to grade them made a cold shiver run down his spine. “Did your son inform you that he’ll write a rune exam for fourth year today?” More idle conversation, maybe Severus shouldn’t have called out to the man, so they both could have walked in silence.

“He did. And he also advised me to stay away from Miss Granger after the Runes exam, as she tends to rehash the whole exam after it’s done.” The Dark Lord chuckled. “I’m tempted to see if she would be willing to discuss the questions with me. I remember having a similar urge when I was younger. Less out of insecurity, as it seems to be in her case, but out of a wish to show off.” There was a complicated smile on Lord Slytherin’s face, which Severus decided to decipher later.

“Miss Granger has had contact with quite a few of the Slytherin girls in her year. I think they might have taught her about proper decorum for a young heiress like her,” Severus decided to say. He knew that Lord Slytherin had no interest in girls that young, but still his protective instinct towards his charges reared its head. That sentence could hint at the wrong kind of interest.

The Dark Lord caught on quickly. “No worries, Severus. If she’s willing to talk with me, it most likely will be during the break after the written exam, while the Great Hall is being set back to serve for lunch. There’ll be a lot of witnesses around. I never would dare endanger a young lady’s reputation like that. And especially not my old friend's heiress.”

Now Severus felt uncomfortable for bringing up his worries like that. Not sure what to do about it, and as they had reached the castle entrance, Severus decided to change the topic again. “Will you join us for breakfast, Lord Slytherin?”

“No, please go on without me. I’ll go down to the greenhouses for a moment.”

They exchanged the usual pleasantries, and Severus hurried up to place the flowers into their living room to brighten Sonja’s day, before breakfast would begin in the Great Hall.

The end of the school year always was a stressful time for everyone living at the castle. Summer hopefully would be calmer when they moved to the manor.

Chapter End Notes

That was the first week of OWL exams. Not sure how the timeline works out with all those exams and NEWTs during the same time, but timelines aren't all that refined in the original books anyway. So I try not to worry too much. If you recognize certain elements that's not a coincidence. I got out my copy of the book and had a look. The exams are rather short in the first week, but a few bits I kept.

Thanks to Jordre and Jake for helping to improve my spelling!

Carefully setting down his case of correspondence – picked up from the mailbox at the post office in London set to receive mail from the general public – Barty got out his wand to cast the spell that would clear his robes of the soot and remove the wrinkles at the same time.

Travelling by floo was inconvenient at times.

Now soot-free, Barty flicked his wand to float the case – it was heavy – and started to make his way through the house to the office he normally used to presort Lord Slytherin’s mail for the man. There was no need for his Lord to read all the silly proposals from desperate witches and wizards, be it for marriage, no-strings-attached affairs, or business ventures. In fact, when his Lord had become more than annoyed by those kind of letters, Barty had proposed the open mailbox at the post office in Diagon Alley. So far it was working rather well.

A high-pitched laugh, and the sound of the heavy coils of his Lord’s familiar sliding over the ground – he had heard that often enough to recognize it by now – drew his attention to the formal dining room he didn’t usually venture into.

The door wasn’t closed properly so Barty had no trouble peering inside once he drew level with the crack.

Inside was the young boy, Marcus, crawling around on the floor in some rather short casual robes, over trousers and a buttoned shirt, followed by Nagini. For a moment Barty remembered how Nagini had chased and threatened Death Eaters to their Lord’s amusement at meetings in the past. He gripped his wand harder, preparing to cast a shield to keep the kid safe, before he remembered that there was no reason to assume that the boy was in danger.

He had been laughing, and he was the Dark Lord’s son. There was no danger.

With a sigh, Barty conceded to himself that he would have to make sure, if only for his own peace of mind. So he stepped out from behind the door, pushing it open a little more. “Good day, Master Marcus. What are you playing?”

Both child and snake turned so that they could see Barty. Nagini was half under the big table, the boy half hidden by one of the massive chairs.

“Hello, Mr. Barty!” was the sunny greeting he got, accompanied by a few casual tongue-flicks from the snake. “We’re playing ingredients-gathering.”
“Are you looking for something specific?” Barty asked, intrigued. He couldn’t remember ever playing that sort of game. Most of the time it had been either Quidditch, hunting dragons, or tracking down a rogue werewolf.

“Valerian, lavender, and flobber worms.” Marcus listed as if he had learned a list by heart. He probably was talking about flobberworms, which would make a list matching up with bases used for different variants of sleeping draughts. “And maybe some rats, as Nagini would like a snack. Don’t…” and there the sentence morphed into incoherent hissing as the boy turned to look at the snake contentedly coiled up into a heap at his side.

Bemused, Barty watched what looked like a lively back-and-forth between the boy and the snake. As he only could hear one half of the conversation he guessed was happening, he wasn’t actually all that sure. But as there were frequent breaks in the hissing coming from Marcus, it didn’t look as if the boy was talking non-stop.

That parselmouths were able to perceive the language coming from the snake – did they even hiss? Was there actually a sound produced? Or was it all magic? -- had always been kind of an enigma for Barty. Either it was all magic, or Parselmouths actually were born with differences in their anatomy enabling the communication with snakes.

“Can you help?” Barty's musing was cut short by the boy turning back to ask him that question quite earnestly.

“Can I help with what?” Barty had no idea what the snake and boy had spoken about, how should he know what they needed his help with?

“Didn’t you listen?” Marcus sat up more properly on his heels, propping up his arms at his waist, reminding Barty quite a lot of one of his old teachers back when he was learning his letters.

“I’m not a Parselmouth, Master Marcus,” Barty said in the most polite voice he could manage, while also trying not to laugh at the picture the boy was making, “So I couldn’t follow that conversation. IF you could please explain again for me.”

The boy let his arms fall to his sides, the tension and indignation draining away almost instantly. “Oh. Dad said there aren’t that many who can talk with snakes.” Barty almost did a double take, he never would have thought the Dark Lord would allow his son to call him something as disrespectful as dad. “Nagini wanted to know if you might have a snack on you.”

“I don’t think I do. But you could call for a house elf to bring something.” Barty really wasn’t in the habit of carrying dead rodents around in his robe pockets.

The way Marcus started to fidget with the seams of his robes told Barty all he needed to know. “Your father said she can’t get any snacks, didn’t he?” That was such a classical move to get around a decision made by one parent. Ask another adult for permission without telling them of the previous decision made.

Then the embarrassment was gone and Marcus shot Barty a cheeky smirk. “Worth a try!” And off he went, crawling under the table.

Chuckling, Barty went back into the hall, flicked his wand at the case, and finished his walk to the study set aside for him here on the ground floor. Time for some sorting.
Carisma was impressed by how fast her two main patients – that was what she called them in her head, anyway, because they were so very interesting in their dynamic – were making headway into their troubles. That Lord Slytherin had decided to search out help was especially remarkable. If he hadn’t accepted that he needed help, they never would have made it this far.

She watched him put his wand into the small box he had transfigured back when he first came as a patient into her office, sitting in her own chair, Tom on her lap purring gently. It had become kind of a ritual for him to place his main tool and weapon out of easy reach at the beginning of each session.

Carisma had no illusions of how easy it still would be for him to kill her with magic even without his wand. But she was glad he had found a way to put himself into the right mindset for therapy.

She had had other patients with less complicated backgrounds who had a harder time working through their set of problems. But seeing as Marvolo Slytherin had split his very soul into more than two pieces on purpose, there wasn’t much Carisma could think of that was on the same level of complicated.

“How are your exams going?” Carisma asked as a beginning question when her patient had sat down in his own chair, one leg casually crossed over the other, his hands folded in his lap.

“Reasonably well, I would say.” Just knowing that there was more to that, Carisma kept her silence. It had proven to work rather well on Lord Slytherin, even as his smile and the glances he shot her when she left silence for him to fill, implied that he knew full well what she was doing.

And there it was again: that look. “One of the tasks in my Defence practical was to banish a boggart. I assume you know what that is?” She had to give him that he managed not to sound condescending while asking that. Not even her own relatives managed that most of the time.

“A shapeshifting pest, that impersonates the biggest fear of every human it encounters. They live off that fear, though I’m not sure if they’re actually alive, or mere embodiments of energy.” Being tricked to encounter a boggart as a joke by a cousin had led Carisma to look them up and learn what she could to see if there was a way to defend herself. She hadn’t found anything, but had been stuck speculating what they looked like when no one was near in morbid curiosity for a while.

“Correct.” Lord Slytherin inclined his head, and paused, as if to order his thoughts, or gather the nerve to go on. Mrs. Goyle waited while petting her purring cat. He had always been a rather affectionate fellow, and now remained relaxed around Lord Slytherin when the man came to these rooms for his appointments.

“You probably could make an educated guess on what form a boggart would assumed for me in the past.” Lord Slytherin said, not exactly looking at her, but at Tom in her lap, contently cuddling. “It changed a few times, but mostly was about me dying without being remembered or having achieved something. But then it simply was my own corpse.” For a moment only the cat’s purring was filling the air with sound. “When I encountered a boggart cleaning up one of the houses belonging to the Potter estate, it showed me my form from before a potion returned me to the form you see here sitting before you. But just before Easter when I worked with Bill Weasley...” he trailed off and once again silence fell.

Carisma felt that this was another main point her patient was working on in this moment. A person’s worst fear certainly was something that could be considered important in getting a better grasp on problems that exist.
“I didn’t take the time to wait and take a good look, although I did notice that it was an angry-looking copy of Harry, but there were too many dangerous things around to take time to contemplate that change.” And he fell silent again. Maybe she should prompt him a little to help him keep going.

“And during the exam there was no danger and you actually got to take a closer look?” As she had learned that straightforward professional worked best with Lord Slytherin – while some patients needed open sympathy, he certainly wasn’t one of them – she used such a tone and chose her words accordingly.

“Yes.” He really looked stressed now, and was breathing in a pattern Carisma recognized as one he seemed to use when occluding. “And I’m not sure if I just interpreted the expression wrong those times in France, or if it changed again. Either way, he wasn’t looking angry. He was disdainful. Berating me for falling for his ploy, mocking me for letting me form a connection to him, for caring. I know that it’s what I fear and not the truth… but at the same time I fear it could be true.”

They had a lot to unpack there, so Carisma started to help Lord Slytherin to accept that he had made himself vulnerable, and to recognize just how much happier he was for the fact that he had let Harry and Marcus in.

There still was work to do, but he really had come far since he had started.

Sunday, 9th of June 1996

In the flurry of activity in preparation for the Potions exam the next day, Harry had felt a need for some solitude and quiet. But he hadn’t wanted to retreat to his room down in the Slytherin dungeon, the weather was too nice for that.

So he was now walking around in one of the courtyards open to the sky, in the search of a place to sit and read without being interrupted. But it didn’t look like luck would be on his side today. The younger years pretty much had finished their exams and were enjoying the nice weather as much as Harry wished to do, but a lot less quietly.

Dodging another group of excited gobstone players – and their audience – Harry contemplated if it wouldn’t be better to just fold and retreat to the dungeons when a gruff voice spoke up from behind him. “And not one thought to who will clean up all that mess when they scurry off from here for a meal, or to make an even bigger mess somewhere else.”

Not so long ago Harry would have jumped in guilt at hearing that voice, but now he felt an impulse to smile and turned with a friendly word on his lips. “Mr. Filch, it’s nice to see you.”

Mrs. Norris was – like most of the time – meandering around her owner’s legs, purring, and still was one of the ugliest cats Harry had ever seen. “Mr. Slytherin, you seem to be searching for something,” the caretaker answered, not reacting in any visible way to Harry’s expression of being glad to see him.

“I’m searching for a quiet place to read that isn’t outside where it’s windy, but also not inside the dungeons where I would miss out on the sunshine,” Harry answered easily enough. The wind was chilling outside the castle walls, and probably the reason why so many students had flocked to the courtyards when they didn’t feel the need to study.

“I’ve a commission to work on. If you're looking for a place with sunlight and without hooligans making a racket, you could come and sit in my workroom for a while.” Filch didn’t sound any friendlier than he ever had, but Harry saw the offer for what it was.

“That would be wonderful, sir,” Harry agreed happily and followed the other to the out-of-the-way workroom with its wonderful light.

Harry had settled on a chair belonging to a worktable near a window, and out of the way, getting out Magic of Intent to read a little, when a stack of big books was set down in front of him with gentle hands. “These are museum catalogues from various exhibitions from around the world. Magical and otherwise. You've had a pretty one-sided exposure to magical art so far. Hogwarts has a lot of portraits, but most of them are pretty old. But that’s hardly all that there is.” And without another word, Mr. Filch returned to the other corner of the room, setting up tools and materials to work on whatever his commission was.

As he had access to his own books pretty much all the time, Harry decided to have a look at the museum catalogues Mr. Filch had offered him to have a look at. Who knew when the dour man would offer this again?

A few pages into the first big book – filled with colourful and glossy prints of all pieces of an exhibition from over ten years ago – Harry was enthralled. These pieces seemed to be magical abstract art from South American artists. And they were nothing like what Harry had seen so far. Not when his class from muggle school had visited the National Gallery in London, nor anywhere in Hogwarts or the few manors he had visited since his adoption.

Later, when his body let Harry know that he should take a break and eat something, he was surprised to notice that Mrs. Norris had made herself at home right on his bag and was sleeping.

With a shrug Harry turned back to the catalogue of an exhibition of sculptures, he could eat later. But this was interesting now.

From the other end of the room Argus Filch looked over with a considering expression before turning back to his work, searching for a good match in his collection of linens to repair a missing piece of canvas.

The job of Headmistress was one fraught with stress and frustration. More often than in the past, Minerva needed a way to relax in the evenings that went farther than reading a good book by the fire with a small measure of whiskey. So she found herself once more wandering the halls of Hogwarts in her cat form.

Meeting with all the familiars of students, running after mice, chasing her own tail, lounging in a spot of moonlight... life as a cat was relaxing in a way life as a witch was not.

The fact that she could let her worries rest for a while and concentrate on the relatively simple task of following a scent trail, or investigate a rustling noise, made her animagus form one of her most effective ways to get rid of some of the stress.

There! What had that sound been? Ears perked up, and swivelled on her head, trying to locate the vicinity from where the sound of steps was reaching her.

In this part of the dungeon there shouldn’t be any humans around at this time of night. On silent paws Minerva prowled along the wall in the direction of the soft sound of shuffling feet. Ready to pounce – more figuratively than literally – Minerva rounded a corner and stopped in her tracks, meowing softly.

“Hello there, kitty.” Sonja, Severus’ wife was there, wrapped in a warm robe, smiling down to where Minerva was sitting in the usual cat fashion. “Prowling the halls? Can’t sleep?”

For a moment Minerva hesitated, as she didn’t know if Sonja knew that Minerva was an animagus. It was common knowledge in the castle, as transforming was one of Minerva’s favourite demonstrations in Transfiguration lessons. Had Severus told his wife?

So Minerva decided to nod in a decidedly human fashion, taking a few steps backwards – after getting back to all fours – before transforming back into her human form, leaving behind the excellent eyesight for these dark corridors, and smiling at Sonja.

“Something like that, yes,” Minerva answered the question, delighted over the slightly startled expression of the other woman. “It’s always nice to take a walk around the castle when it’s as quiet as it is now. What about you?”

“Can’t sleep. And if I stay in our quarters with a light on, Severus will be there within minutes. It’s funny how he can sleep with me not near, but will notice something is amiss when I’m sitting in the living room reading.” Sonja smiled, turned and fell into step with Minerva.

“I guess someone in the living room in the past was always a student in need of help, but you’re not married all that long that he would already be accustomed to never sleeping alone,” Minerva posed a theory that could very well be true, even as she suspected that the man’s life as a spy among the Death Eaters had a big part in that as well.

“Possible,” Sonja agreed. “In fact I’m kind of surprised how often one of the prefects comes to our door in search of Severus because something needs his attention.”

“He certainly has some experience as a surrogate parent. I hope for you both that he’ll manage as well with a baby as he does with his little snakes.” Minerva was quite glad that Severus would be staying on as professor, even now that Albus wasn’t here any longer and there was no need to keep a spy at the school from either side of the past conflict. She eyed the woman walking at her side. The pregnancy looked to be farther along than she had expected. Severus and Sonja had married in November. Now it was June, but Sonja looked to be almost at the end. “How is everything going?”

Sonja hummed, one hand rubbing over her stomach. “Reasonably well. The usual problems,” she waved her hand around, not going into detail, “but my midwife and healer are quite happy with how everything is progressing. Only the last trimester to go.”

So Sonja probably didn’t want to talk too much about her pregnancy, which Minerva would respect, of course. Therefore she changed the topic slightly. “Have you made plans for the summer holidays?”

“We’ll be moving to the manor after Severus has ordered everything in preparation for the next school year. The elves have finished renovating, and we’ll be planting some of the potion gardens.” She rubbed her stomach again. “Well, Severus will be planting, and I’ll be giving directions, most likely.”

Laughing at that mental image, the two of them wandered the halls a while longer, together this time.

oooOOooo

Monday, 10th of June 1996

The weekend hadn’t been all that relaxing with all the revisions they had done and the rising tension. The stories that Ron had told them when Hermione wasn’t near enough to hear made Harry a little more happy that he now was in Slytherin and far away from an irate Hermione sniping at first-years.

They just had been asked to place their quills down as the written part of the Potions exam was finished, and Harry was standing from his place, stretching his fingers and arms to combat the fatigue caused by writing so much in such a short time.

He felt that the exam had worked out rather well. Especially since Snape had helped him get caught up over the summer and had dropped his antagonistic behaviour right from the start of the year.

Making his way over to the door, choosing his path hoping to catch up with Marvolo before they reached the entrance hall, Harry rolled his shoulders. He may have been a little tense there. But his result in this exam would decide if he got to take Potions to NEWT level, and everything he had learned so far about the art of painting magical paintings indicated that potions did play a role in the creation of paints that would allow for the painting’s subjects to retain memories and interact with those standing in front of the painting.

It simply was important that he did do well.

When Harry spotted Hermione falling into step right next to Marvolo, already starting to speak, it was almost too late. But he managed to dodge behind Gregory – who did look kind of disheartened – and avoid being pulled into the conversation. He really would like to talk with his father, but not to rehash the whole exam as Hermione was wont to do.

“What’s your take on this exam, Lord Slytherin? Did it differ much from the one you took the first time?” She sounded eager to get some first-hand information on how OWL exams had changed over the last decades.

“Well, most of the principles haven’t developed much, especially at the level OWLs are. There are some advanced techniques that you haven’t learned yet that are pretty new. I think they probably will make an appearance in the NEWT exam, at least a few of them anyway. Only the extra credit section was kind of surprising. You really did have Polyjuice in class?” Harry heard the surprise in his father’s voice and thought back to the long answer he had written on that extra credit question.
It had been rather easy to write about the potion’s effect and limitations, as well as on why it was banned and how to identify it.
“Oh,” Harry could see Hermione waving that question away, “we didn’t learn how to brew it. But it was named as an example for a potion using lacefly-wings as a stabilizing agent, in our second year. Someone doing a little extra reading on those potions named as examples, but either illegal or too dangerous for students to brew, would have been able to answer that question.”

For a moment Harry wondered if Hermione was thinking on how she had spend quite some time as a cat-human hybrid after mistakenly putting a cat hair into her portion of the Polyjuce, but then he stepped out of the Hall – a few students between him and Marvolo talking with Hermione, obviously quite happy to do so – and gravitated over to where Ron and Neville were standing with a few of the other Gryffindors. His own housemates would be able to find him easily enough.

“Do you feel prepared for the practical, Neville?” Harry had been surprised when he had heard that the Potions practical would be in the Great Hall just like most of the others. He wasn’t really sure how the change in scenery might affect his brewing. All that light – it was a sunny day – would make a big difference. Hopefully for the better.

“As prepared as I can be, I guess.” Nevill said, rubbing his wand hand up and down the side hem of his robe. “It’ll help that Professor Snape won’t be stalking through the rows. He’s always distracting me.”

“Can you believe he isn’t allowed in because the examiners think he might try to help us?” Ron asked still boggled by the very idea of someone accusing Snape of helping anyone but Slytherins cheat.

“I think it’s more of a general rule than one created with Professor Snape specifically in mind,” Harry said once again, watching how Draco seemed to be reassuring Gregory, while there was a widening circle around where Hermione was talking animatedly – the breadth of her gestures was a somewhat good measurement of her excitement for a topic – with Marvolo a little farther into the entrance hall.

“Maybe,” Ron sounded dubious, but let the question drop.

“There you are,” Theo said from behind Harry who turned just far enough to see his friend move through the sparse crowd waiting for the Great Hall to be changed back to its normal configuration again.

“Where else should I be?” Harry asked, grinning.

“I don’t know?” Theo did a fake thinking face that made Harry chuckle. “Talking with your father, or taking a restroom break, maybe.”

Harry shrugged. Those two were likely options. “Fair enough. But as you see, I’m standing here, talking with my friends.” Theo rolled his eyes at Harry, who grinned despite his general nervousness. “It looks as if Hermione finally has found someone sharing in her desire to speak at length about an exam taken just moments ago.” Harry waved in the direction of the open space around the pair of them, and laughed again when Theo groaned.

“She’s bloody mental!” Ron said, shaking his head. “But better him than us, I think.”

Harry looked towards Ron and wondered why exactly the other had been so interested in Hermione. He was constantly complaining over her interests and habits. It was kind of baffling.

Luna’s arrival – together with a large number of other students who were hungry and wanted to eat – distracted Harry, as she grabbed his hands and tugged him until he bent that little distance down to her with a smile for a kiss.

Until the doors to the Great Hall were opened again, Harry didn’t pay that much attention to his surroundings. And once the doors had been opened, Harry walked over with Luna to the Ravenclaw table, not seeing the eye-rolls from his male friends, or the fond look his father was giving him. Harry was much too engrossed in a discussion over the question of whether there might be dryads in the Forbidden Forest.

Much too quickly lunch was over, and Harry stood at his workstation for the Potions practical.

There was a roll of parchment, and a lot of ingredients in bowls, phials, and tins, not one of them labelled. There also was a scale with a set of weights, a mortar and pestle, a cutting board, a set of knives, several stirrers, and a lot of other tools usually to be found in a potions laboratory. In short, there was everything Harry would need to brew any potion. There certainly was more than any one potion would justify.

They were allowed to have blank parchment and something to write with, their wand, and their own dragonhide gloves at hand, but nothing else from their own equipment.

Taking a deep breath, Harry picked up the roll and broke the wax keeping it closed, unfurling the roll to take a look at the potion he was supposed to brew. As far as Hermione could find out during her research into how OWL exams worked – and what the older students had said – no two students at stations next to each other got the same potion, and they were supposed to know the correct ingredients by sight, which probably was the explanation for all the extras Harry had at his station.

Fighting back another wave of insecurity – this somehow felt so much more important than all the other exams they had taken so far – Harry reminded himself that he had a plan.

He got out a piece of parchment and read over his assigned potion. First he would write out the instructions the way he now always did. Each step neatly ordered one after the other, not instructions strung along so long as there was room on the line, as it was usually done. With that format he all too easily missed adding something that was last in the line, if there was a part that took longer than a few seconds.

The moment Harry had changed the layout of his instructions, he turned to sort through the ingredients to find what he needed and move everything he didn’t need out of the way. From the other stations smoke in different colours was already rising, but Harry ignored the feeling of being behind. He wasn’t behind. Careful preparation was an important step, and rushing into this might well end with an error which he couldn’t correct.

After that Harry put on his gloves, lit the fire under his cauldron, and started to prepare the ingredients for the base. He still had plenty of time and knew what he had to do for the potion to come out right.

Once the base was finished and the colour matched what he knew it should be at this stage, Harry felt himself relax a little. He looked around while the potion needed to simmer for a few moments – he had set a timer spell that would alert him a minute before he would need to add the next ingredient – and noticed the expression of concentration, but not terror, on the face of Neville, who was brewing nearby. The absence of Professor Snape made a visible difference for the Herbology prodigy.

When his wand vibrated, notifying Harry that it was time to add the shredded beetle wings, he turned back to his work and was busy until he could bottle a sample of his potion and leave it at his
It had been kind of fun to brew a Draught of Peace surrounded by so many nervous teenagers. Marvolo was sure he was one of the few, if not the only one, having fun during this afternoon brewing. There weren’t many occasions when one was able to brew seemingly under the open sky.

Finishing up slightly early, Marvolo sat back on the stool provided and enjoyed the sounds of business around him. At a few stations the vapours rising hadn’t looked all that promising. But that was to be expected on the OWL exam. Not everyone managed to become a competent enough brewer in five years, and exam anxiety did the rest.

Walking out of the Great Hall at a leisurely pace, Marvolo kept an eye out for his son, and Miss Granger, who was an excellent conversationalist after an exam. It had been fun to discuss the questions of the written portion and the differences between now and back when Marvolo had taken the exam for the first time.

“Dad!” Harry called from somewhere further back and Marvolo turned, smiling as he spotted his son who looked a lot less nervous now that the exam was done.

“Harry. You look as if you are reasonably happy with how you have done on the exam.” The potion Marvolo had been assigned had been no easy one, but it also hadn’t been complex enough that he hadn’t noticed what was going on at Harry’s station. So he knew at least that it hadn’t gone horribly wrong.

“I think so,” Harry answered grinning, “Will you return home right away?” The boy used one finger to push his glasses back up his nose. More of the students were walking by and Marvolo could see a few of Harry’s friends gather in a group a few paces away.

“Yes. I promised Marcus that we would build a new castle and play with the dragons this evening.” Mrs. Peters had told Marvolo that Marcus had missed him in the afternoons after school on the days that he had taken exams at Hogwarts, and that Marcus had played exams with Nagini. Or so she assumed anyway, as she had no idea what Marcus had told the snake.

“Sounds like fun.” Just a fraction of a second later Harry had enveloped Marvolo in a hug and the motion to return it came much more naturally than it had the very first time.

While enjoying the hug – it felt longer than it probably was, but hugs were great – Severus walked past and made eye contact with Marvolo. There hadn’t been much reason for them to communicate mind to mind – sometimes they did during Wizengamot sessions that were exceedingly tedious – but just as every time their eyes met, Marvolo felt and saw the impression of Severus giving a deep, sweeping bow sent by the other man. Almost automatically Marvolo send back a greeting as well as acceptance of the service and respect offered.

Harry and Marvolo released their hug, Severus vanished – probably into the Great Hall – and Harry’s friends tried to gain Harry’s attention.

“It looks like your friends want a bit of your time,” Marvolo said, stepping back and ignoring some frantic whispers all around. The way Harry and he were hugging each other in public wasn’t really the done thing for families of the high society of Britain in general, which was something muggles and magicals shared. But honestly, Marvolo didn’t care what others thought about the affection shown between the members of his family. All three of them could use it.

“We wanted to use a little of the warm weather to study outside,” Harry explained the group of waiting students.

“Then have some fun, don’t study to the exclusion of all else, whatever Miss Granger might say, and we’ll speak later this evening,” Marvolo said, making a shooing motion at Harry, who rolled his eyes at him but went with a short wave.

“Have fun building castles!” Harry was laughing when he made his way over to his friends, and the group trooped out onto the grounds. Marvolo would have to at least try to say farewell to the examiners, anything else would be rude.

When he walked out of the door of the castle down towards the village, Marvolo spotted Harry and his friends on a blanket, reading in a sunny spot.

With a smile Marvolo apparated back home, where he would impersonate a dragon, attacking a castle build out of toy blocks, for the rest of the afternoon.

Thursday, 13th of June 1996

“Why did it have to be History as the last exam?” Ron groaned, falling back onto the blanket they had placed on the ground near the edge of the lake and a few trees.

“At least we’re now finished with our OWL exams,” Hermione tried to calm her friend down. “And the results will come by owl during the holidays. So stop whining and sit up, I want to take a picture of all of us!” She had run up to the tower to get her camera for a picture of all their friends now that they had finished their fifth year here at Hogwarts. It was a much larger group than Hermione had expected it ever to be. The most surprising addition was Draco, even as the other Slytherins were people Hermione wouldn’t have expected to call friends at the end of last year. “Theo, Ginny, come, I want to take a picture. Luna, Harry, you too!” It was like herding cats!

Finally she had managed to get everyone settled on the blankets, and arranged in a manner that would look passable in a picture frame. Beside Harry and Ron – her very first friends – there was Luna right next to Harry, Ginny and Theo, Draco with Vincent and Gregory – more because they always were near Draco than that Hermione would call them friends – Neville, Fred and George grinning from ear to ear because they had rented a shop, Daphne and Astoria Greengrass, Millicent and Pansy. Setting up the camera her great-uncle had given her for her birthday so it would take a picture on its own the moment Hermione was in place herself and gave the command, she mused over the changes the year had brought.
She now was heiress to a seat on the Wizengamot and a big family fortune, and on her way into politics and with that a way to work on positive change guaranteed. Harry now had a family, Sirius Black was a free man, and a father! That she now was friends with Slytherins was kind of tame in comparison!

Hermione headed over to the others, sat down right next to Fred on the one side and Daphne on the other, told everyone “Smile!” and then flicked her wand at her camera to take a series of pictures.

Then she went to get the camera, and walked back to sit in the group that had dispersed a little. “What are your plans this summer?” Astoria wanted to know, leaning back on her hands, her legs stretched out before her.

“Some art classes, more heir lessons, and father hinted at excursions we’ll take with Marcus,” Harry started the round of plans exchanges. “I also hope to have you all over at least once. Or come visit you.”

“That'd be great!” Ron exclaimed. “Maybe we can come over to Potter Manor? Bill said that the gardens would be great for a round of quidditch. Not having to avoid all the apple trees would certainly improve the game.”

“I don’t know, Ronnikins,” one of the twins said with a mean little grin. “With Mum’s ban on bludgers, the trees up the ante, so to speak.”

Ron huffed. “Playing in an open field with enough people for two whole teams would be great anyway.”

“Let’s see what we can manage. I’m sure father won’t say no when I ask.” Harry broke the tension in a way he had adopted rather frequently of late. Hermione was glad that her friend seemed to be growing up to be a responsible person.

“We’ll be in France for a while,” the older of the Greengrass sisters said, her legs folded in a more demure manner than her sister. “But I’m certainly interested in coming to watch a good quidditch match.”

“I’ll come and play. Maybe we can manage a game with girls against boys,” Astoria said, giving Ginny, who was cuddled into Theo, a rather obvious wink.

“That certainly would be fun. What to you think, Millicent, Pansy? Do you want to play too?” Ginny passed the dare on, making Hermione hope that no one would ask her to fly.

“Only if we play with beaters,” Millicent said, an unholy glint in her eyes. “That’s my favourite position.”

Harry laughed, lacing his fingers with Luna's, who was seemingly following something with her eyes that was flying around in the trees. “If we have a healer at hand, father might agree to let us play with one bludger. But you’re still a few players short.”

Hermione tried to think up a topic to distract everyone from quidditch. For a team of seven players, Luna, she, and Daphne would have to play as well, if they didn’t find other girls to take part as well.

“I’m sure we’ll find enough witches,” Luna said without looking at any of them. “Don’t you think Angelina and Katie would be interested?”

Oh, that was a good idea. Getting those two involved would make for a more interesting match and would spare Hermione the indignity of flying on a broom. Feeling relieved, she got out writing material, and started to speak, deep in planning mode. Coordinating all their plans to find dates where they could meet up would take serious effort. “Let me draw up a list of when each of us isn’t here. I’m going to be in Bulgaria for a while, and maybe uncle Xerxes will take me to South America to visit with his older sons.” She would not mention those sons who’d elected to torture upstanding members of society into insanity. “So if we want to meet up all together, we’ll need to plan.”

That made everyone laugh, but not in a way that made Hermione feel bad. These were her friends, well aware of her quirks and happy with them. Just as she knew theirs and didn’t fault them for them… much. She really had trouble accepting some less-than-stellar study habits.

She really was looking forward to this summer holiday.

oooOOooo

“How do you think you did in your History OWL, Harry?” Sirius asked with a shit-eating grin. “Remus really wants to know.”

“That’s not what I said!” his friend called over from where he was preparing a fire in the fireplace. It was a rather cold evening.

“But you want to know anyway!” Sirius called back, still looking into the mirror that showed Harry on the other side, sitting on his bed in the Slytherin dorms, a grin on his face.

“I think I did reasonably well,” Harry said, moving back to get a better position against the mountain of pillows. “I’m certain no amount of revision with Hermione would have been enough to do as well. Thanks, Professor Lupin!”

Sirius flinched at the sudden loud yell, scowling at his godson who was grinning unrepentantly. “Please don’t torment my poor ears!”

“I’ll try,” was the much-too-cheeky reply. But that answer did make Sirius feel light as a feather. It was a relief seeing the boy so happy and relaxed.

“I hardly can expect more, can I?” Sirius grinned back at his godson. “Do you have plans for the summer holidays already?”

“A few,” Harry nodded. “My friends and I want to meet, play Quidditch, and so on. We also plan to make a few excursions to different places with Marcus. And then there are two art classes I want to attend.”

While Harry went off a tangent to describe all that would be part of those courses, and what other alternatives he could have had and why he hadn’t chosen one of those, Sirius pondered what Lily and James might have said to their son being this interested in art. Lily would have loved it, Sirius was sure of that. He wasn’t so certain about James. His friend hadn’t been interested in art, not really. But Sirius liked to think that James would have supported his son in whatever path he chose to take. There were less interesting and prestigious careers than that of an artist.

It wasn’t one Sirius would take – not enough action for his tastes – but it seemed to be something that Harry really enjoyed.
“Do you have plans for the summer?” Harry wanted to know, and Sirius nodded in answer before he started to speak.

“I do. I’ll take a portkey to visit Enora and Nawel for most of the summer.” Sirius was looking forward to that, and at the same time he felt kind of guilty. “I hope you don’t feel put out for me not being here.” He really would love to spend more time with Harry, but he had promised to visit the girls as well.

“Why would I?” Harry seemed honestly confused. “They’re your daughters, and you all had no opportunity to really spent time together. Of course you should visit them at home. Get to know them, teach them all that family stuff, tell them about all the pranks you’ve pulled. You’ll be back before the next school year starts, right?”

“Of course! Maybe we can arrange some kind of visit for you in the Caribbean for next summer. There probably are many interesting things to see and experience. Would you like that?” How Sirius hated sounding so vulnerable! He should be sure of himself. There was no reason why Harry wouldn’t want to visit.

“That would be awesome! Do you think Marvolo and Marcus could come too?” Harry looked so hopeful that Sirius managed with difficulty to keep his expression under control. He really didn’t like Lord Slytherin, but the man seemed to make a genuine effort, and he made Harry happy. And that was worth a lot.

“We have almost a year to plan everything. I think that should be possible.”

Saturday, 29th of June 1996

Harry couldn’t remember one year in all his time at Hogwarts that he had felt quite as carefree before the summer holidays as he did this year. One of the biggest contributions to his good mood probably was the fact that he would return home to his adoptive father and brother – a family – and not the Dursleys.

And so he enjoyed pickup-quidditch games, long walks along the lake's edge with Luna, evenings on the astronomy tower – also with Luna at his side, and only occasionally spent looking at the stars – and a few more sessions with Mr. Filch and his exhibition catalogues. There also were a few more sessions of the Duelling Club, and one memorable improvised fight of three teams pitched against each other.

Of course a few NEWT students were taking exams in the subjects chosen less often, and a few of the younger students still had lessons and exams, but there were wonderful weather and no more homework. There certainly were worse ways to spend one's days.

Harry was pretty sure he had done well in his exams, and was more than happy to have changed subjects from Divination to Runes. What Ron had told them about his exam and his attempt to read the future from a crystal ball had been terrible.

And so it was with a light heart and a smile on his face that Harry walked together with his friends into the Great Hall decked out for the End of Year Feast. The whole room was decorated in the blue and bronze banners of Ravenclaw, who had managed to gather the most points this year and had won the House Cup with a small lead on Slytherin, which was closely followed by Gryffindor.

Not the worst outcome in Harry’s eyes. Tomorrow the train would go back to London, and the holidays would start. But first there was the feast to enjoy.

Chapter End Notes

I have to say that it’s not easy to get a good grip on the timeline of this school year. Or any of the others. The end is kind of mushy in the book and it feels as if Harry is at the school for quite some time before the train back to London. Maybe NEWT exams are held in the last two weeks of June? But wouldn’t that be almost a month for the younger years without real classes? It’s all quite confusing. So I wavered back and forth, wishing I had made more concrete plans much earlier and finally settled on what you just read.
With Harry always getting into trouble in the last weeks of the school year that time isn’t all that clearly defined in the books, I’m afraid :D

Harry and his friends had been a little bit early, and while all the Professors were already there, the students weren’t. While they were waiting, Harry enjoyed the chatter around him – Blaise and Theo were arguing over the best wax for care of a broom – and looked up at the ceiling enjoying the play of colours as the sun was nearing the horizon. That would be an interesting palette to play with.

Suddenly the constant din of voices died down, drawing Harry’s attention to the front and the head table where Professor McGonagall stood behind the lectern looking as stern as ever.

“Good evening.” Her voice easily carried through the Great Hall, either by magic or her natural ability to project her voice, and everyone was silently watching her, even the Weasley twins. “This year has brought many changes to Hogwarts.” Harry heard a snort somewhere from his right and silently agreed. That had been a massive understatement. “New students have found their footing, and our graduating class will be leaving the school this summer to go out into the world and explore it and their future. All others will return after the summer to start another year of learning.”

She certainly had a different style than Dumbledore had had. Not that Harry remembered all that many end-of-year speeches. “Before we all eat, I want to inform you of a few more changes coming in the next school year. Professor Slinkhard will not be returning next year, as he plans to invest his time in writing a new edition of his book.” A massive wave of applause and murmurs forced the Headmistress to pause, and Harry, while relieved that the theory probably wouldn’t be that big a part of lessons next year, thought it was a little bit rude to make their feelings quite that obvious.

“We all wish you the very best, Wilbert,” she continued once the clapping and murmurs had subsided. Professor Slinkhard gave a short nod, but didn’t stand to give a speech of his own – thankfully – and Professor McGonagall moved on. “We hopefully will also have a new Transfiguration Professor and Head of Gryffindor. But one change needs your action before the new year starts.”

Harry, whose attention had started to wander, perked up. Was that what he thought it might be?
“Mr. Argus Filch, who is our very own art conservator, has agreed to offer an Art class spanning all years beginning next year. If you’re interested in attending such a class, you should send an essay and some examples of your own work to Hogwarts before the end of July. Professor Filch will screen the applications, and information of acceptance and needed class materials will be sent out with your usual letters.”

Harry didn’t pay much mind to Professor McGonagall’s closing words. He was too giddy at the opportunity to get to attend an actual arts class at Hogwarts next year. He only realised that the Headmistress had finished when the platter before him filled with a big mountain of roasted chicken legs and wings and everyone around him started filling their plates.

“Do you want some peas?” Gregory asked, holding up a bowl filled with peas.

“No, thanks,” Harry said, shaking his head. “Theo, can you give me some of the mincemeat pies?”

“Sure,” Theo answered, taking Harry’s plate so he could move it closer to the dish where there were the small pies were.

“So, are you going to apply?” Daphne asked, daintily spearing some potato pieces onto her fork.

“Apply for the art class?” Harry asked, accepting his plate back from Theo and reaching for a boat filled with gravy to drown his pie in its contents. Daphne nodded, chewing, so Harry didn’t wait for more of an answer and explained his thoughts on this topic. “I plan to apply. Not sure what to write about. Maybe, I should ask him before we leave tomorrow. If he can elaborate on what the essay should be about, that would be helpful. Selecting what to send as an example of my art is a little bit easier. We spoke about how to assemble a portfolio if I want to go to university after I’m finished here, and also what a Master might require if I wanted to be an apprentice.” In fact Harry felt pretty confident that he would manage to compose a good application. “I’m more interested in who else might apply.”

For a moment there was silence around Harry, who used that to finally start eating. He knew that none of his year-mates in Slytherin were interested in art. Or at least not in creating art on a level that would make them wish to take classes on it.

“Do you think there will be enough people taking it to even have the class?” Draco asked suddenly, sounding thoughtful. “I know that some years it’s not all that certain that a new arithmancy class will start.”

Harry shrugged, chewed, swallowed, and then answered. “I’m pretty sure that it’ll take place even if I’m the only student. Mr. Filch hinted that Professor McGonagall wants to bring back more variety to the school, and hopes to get interested professors by showing that she can come through with all that’s needed.” Until now Harry had known that Mr. Filch had been offered the opportunity to teach, but not whether or not the man had decided to accept.

“But Filch as a professor?” Blaise asked, wrinkling his nose as if he was smelling something bad. “He’s a Squib, and an unpleasant person on top! I’m not sure anyone will dare to apply.”

“When have you ever interacted with him?” Harry wanted to know. Ever since Mr. Filch had shown Harry the workroom, Harry’s view of the man had changed, but he knew that the general student population had a less-than-favourable opinion of Mr. Filch.

“Interacted? Not much. The last time I was near him, I tried to avoid him because I was out after curfew,” Blaise shrugged, basking in the chuckles his allusion to breaking the rules got him.
Even Harry had to chuckle. Even under his invisibility cloak and with the map, it was a nerve-wracking experience evading Mrs. Norris and Mr. Filch. But it had been enjoyable to evade the patrols in the halls with Luna there under the cloak, as he escorted her back to Ravenclaw Tower. “Well, if you really are interested in art, it probably is worth the risk. And let me tell you, Mr. Filch knows his art,” Harry said with conviction because it was simply the truth.

“If you say so.” Blaise didn’t seem convinced, but he didn’t need to be. That others were listening in – as they almost always did – and would inform others of what Harry had said, was much more important.

“Remember our third year? When the Gryffindor guardian portrait was damaged? Mr. Filch was the one to repair it. He also does commission work on magical paintings. I’ll apply for sure!” That should be enough to make it through at least part of the student population during the train ride tomorrow. It would be kind of lonely to be the only art student in that class. And it would be sad if another interested in art might not apply because Mr. Filch had such a sunny disposition.

“Do you know if your mother will be there tomorrow to pick you up?” Daphne asked Draco, moving the topic in an entirely different direction.

Content to eat and listen, Harry wondered if Marcus was looking forward to seeing him again, or if his little brother would be unhappy with having to share the attention.

When dessert replaced the more savoury foods, Harry happily filled his plate with a good helping of the multilayer-ice-cream-sculpture that appeared right in front of him. It was much easier to enjoy the good food knowing that he would not be made to eat less than his cousin, who was forced to follow a strict diet in an attempt to make him lose weight.

Later, a sleepy and stuffed Harry followed his friends down to the common room and their beds.

A herd of hippogryphs was running across the field of lush grass reaching from horizon to horizon, and he smiled, effortlessly rising into the sky. There was a big, almost endless forest not far away, and it sounded as if there was an even bigger herd on its way.

With a start Marvolo woke up. There was a heavy weight on his bed, mostly resting over his stomach.

It took only the fraction of a second until Marvolo was awake enough to register the chattering in his ears and to realise that Marcus had run into his room, and was talking a mile a minute. The only light was the light from the hall falling into the room through the small crack the open door provided.

“Harry’ll be back today! Then we’ll be playing every day! And flying! I’m sure if I ask he’ll take me up on his broom. And can we go now to pick him up?” Marcus was obviously wide awake and Marvolo was really glad that the wards around the house were good enough that he didn’t feel he had to keep his wand directly under his pillow when he slept. He didn’t dare contemplate what could have happened being woken in this manner with his wand readily available. Maybe he should set some wards to wake him should someone enter his bedroom.

“Marcus,” Marvolo tried to interrupt the torrent of words. “Marcus, it’s not even light out yet.” Down near his feet a grumbly hiss was heard.:Bubbly hatchling is up way too early. Make the Bubbly hatchling sleep again:. Nagini wasn’t happy to be awake either.

Marvolo felt Marcus deflating, and biting back a sigh he sat up, taking his son with him. “Harry will be back later today. He and everyone else are probably still asleep. In a few hours the train will start on its journey and arrive even later at the train station here in London. Harry will be here for dinner.” Marcus slumped against Marvolo’s shoulder and Marvolo placed a kiss on the little one’s head. “I’m excited too, Marcus. But if we get up now, it’ll be long hours of waiting till Harry is here. Let’s sleep a little longer.”

Marcus nodded, and started to tug at the blanket. Resigning himself to little bony knees, elbows, and feet poking him, Marvolo moved the blankets so that Marcus could slip under them, and placed his arms around his son so they would both be comfortable.

“I’m so happy that Harry comes back today!” Marcus mumbled into Marvolo’s shoulder, wiggling to find a comfortable spot, the same as Nagini was doing further down on the bed. “I feel like I might explode with happiness.”

That simple statement filled Marvolo with a complex mess of emotions, too many to find any words to say in answer. So he simply hugged his small son a little tighter for a moment, placed another kiss on his head, and murmured some platitudes. “Maybe you’ll dream something interesting to tell Harry about later.”

It didn’t take long for Marcus to fall asleep, but with all those emotions doing cartwheels inside of Marvolo’s mind, he had to employ occlumency to calm down enough to sleep. But eventually sleep found him again, wrapped in the embrace of his son and familiar. It was a peaceful place to be.

Sunday, 30th of June 1996

Just as it happened every year, there was a hectic search for lost property going on in the Slytherin dungeons. The pandemonium he had experienced himself as a student had decided his policy of the packed trunk before going to the Leaving Feast.

Not that it was truly working.

With a sigh and a flick of his wand, Severus collected the scattered possessions of various students from all corners of the common room in the middle of a carpet in front of the main fireplace. It was early and the students were just getting up, so there was no chance of someone being injured by flying books, trinkets, empty potions phials, sweet-wrappers, chocolate frog cards, half empty packages branded as skiving snack boxes and many items more.

The elves were tasked with keeping the castle clean, but Severus had made sure that they wouldn’t remove items belonging to any students from the common room or the dorms. Somehow his charges needed to learn to keep track of their belongings and keep order. It usually worked pretty well, but there always were a few things that managed to be kicked under the shelves, seats and into other hard-to-reach places.

Before the students would arrive to look through the finds and collect what was theirs – this was a well established tradition by now – Severus quickly removed potion phials – he needed to check what those were – and everything that was labelled WWW in bright patterns and colours. No need to return potentially harmful products to his students. If they were careless enough to leave them lying around, what would happen if they got them back?

When the first student moved into the common room, Severus quickly pocketed the cardboard package of something called Canany Cream and turned, trying to look unperturbed and calm.

Relatively unsurprisingly, it was Mr. Slytherin who walked into the common room, as put together as he ever got. That hair of his seemed to be an impossible case. But the robes were fresh, the tie neatly tied, and the shirt tucked in.

“Good morning, sir,” the boy greeted giving a tiny inclination of his head.

“Mr. Slytherin,” Severus returned the greeting, feeling wrongfooted by the very fact that the boy was paying him the respect he was due. It simply didn’t go well together with the face of his school-time enemy – those glasses were different in design, but they were enough of a reminder – and the eyes of his very best friend. But even with those visual reminders, there were the colours of Slytherin in the boy’s uniform, and the memory of many hours spent teaching the child Occlumency and the basics of potions.

There really wasn’t much to say, so Severus simply stood by the haul of lost items waiting for the other students to arrive, watching Mr. Slytherin inspect the various items.

It didn’t take long until the common room was filled, prompting Severus to recite his speech, as he did each year. “Take only the things that are yours to claim. And if there’s something that you no longer need, put it in the box over there,” he waved a hand in the direction of the box, “so another may claim it.”

After that Severus made his escape – a dignified retreat towards one of the more out-of-the-way niches near the door to their quarters – watching all those teenagers searching for their lost possessions.

“I thought they were required to have their trunks packed yesterday,” Sonja asked from behind Severus, her arms snaking around his midsection, her head coming to rest on his shoulder.

“They were, and they have. For the most part, at least. I’m sure a few pyjamas, stuffed toys, and the like probably aren’t packed yet. But it’s a lot more organized than it would be without my insistence on the trunks being packed early,” Severus answered, speaking low enough not to be overheard from the group bantering over chocolate frog cards and celebrating the return of trinkets thought lost.

“I’m sure you’re right, love,” Sonja said, pressed a kiss to his cheek, and walked back to their quarters. Severus would follow her as soon as the students were finished.
“Has anyone seen my makeup?”

“Trevor! Trevor! Come on, where are you?”

Hermione carefully placed Crookshanks’ favourite blanket in the carrier that had served as a bed for him – placed next to her trunk and a little out of the way – the whole school year. She rolled her eyes when another of the boys hollered downstairs if someone had seen his Falmouth Falcons Quidditch jersey. She had had her stuff packed before the Leaving Feast yesterday. And Hermione wasn’t really sure what the difficulty was. There had to be something. Why else would so many now be running around like headless chickens, searching for seemingly important objects at the last minute?

“Have you seen my transfiguration text, Hermione?” Ginny asked from the door, looking decidedly frazzled, hair escaping from her ponytail.

“No,” Hermione answered, standing up from her crouch, automatically smoothing her skirt. “Did you check on all the tables in the common room? And all the beds in your dormitory?”

“Yes! I did!” There was an impatient undertone to Ginny’s response, and she was gone before Hermione could propose the idea of trying an Accio charm in each room that the book might be in.

Shrugging, Hermione checked her bag for the books she wanted to have at hand during the train ride, before giving Crookshanks another good ear scratch – the elves would make sure that her familiar would be down at the train – before walking down through all the usual chaos just before the summer holidays to go and eat breakfast.

Dodging a flying pair of socks, she made it to the portrait hole and slipped out, her book bag slung over one shoulder.

oooOOooo

During the rush on the carriages and all the back-and-forth, Draco somehow had ended up in one carriage with Crabbe and Goyle as well as Harry.

It wouldn’t have been his first choice, and probably also not Harry’s, but it no longer was the possibly volatile combination that it would have been before this summer.

“Are you looking forward to going home and seeing your baby sister?” Harry asked, sitting relaxed on the opposite bench, looking out at the passing grounds.

Draco was of two minds about that. But he smiled and nodded. “It’s not like we can actually play together. Yet. But yes, I’m happy I’ll be home again and seeing her and our parents.” And he was, even while he was apprehensive what changes this might bring to his own life.

Harry turned away from the view as their carriage rumbled over an uneven stretch of road. “I’m looking forward to the holidays. Even with all the lessons I’ll have.” He laughed, and dragged a hand through his hair. No wonder that it always looked as if an owl had made its nest in there.

“Isn’t he a demanding father?” Draco felt like smashing his face into the window of the carriage. That wasn’t something he had wanted to ask. He did want to know, but asking was rude and gave too much away.
One brow winged up, almost vanishing in the unruly hair, and Harry gave a wry smile. “You’ve seen us interact.” He gave a small, one-shouldered shrug. “I’ve got a lot to learn, and father makes sure I do. But he isn’t unreasonable. You’ve read the stories just like everyone else. He knows what bad guardians are like. I guess that’s why he works so hard to be better.” There was another shrug and Draco heard the admonishment his own governess always had barked out – in a ladylike manner, of course – when he had done something like that back when he had been not quite nine years old.

“It’s crazy. You’re crazy! You know that. Don’t you?” Draco really wasn’t sure what he should, or could, say to that claim. He had seen how casually the Dark Lord had cast that Cruciatus, while holding Harry in his arm. And that man should be the same as the one who claimed to have grown up in a muggle orphanage during a war? That just didn’t add up.

Harry grinned and shrugged again, picking up his bag that was resting near his feet. “I’m pretty sure you’re right. It is kind of crazy, all things considered. But, well, it works for us.”

The carriage came to a halt. They had reached the train station just outside of Hogsmeade. Before Draco could gather his own bag or make Crabbe and Goyle move, Harry had opened the door, and made his escape. Sighing to himself, Draco climbed out of the carriage and started to walk over to the train. If he moved a little faster he might find a compartment to claim even if he had to patrol the train from time to time.

oooOOooo

It wasn’t easy to find a private spot on the train. The compartments were filled with a few people at least, the few open carriages were never empty either, and the toilets were not a nice place to be, so Theo and Ginny had found a space between two carriages to have a quick talk.

“I’m just worried!” Ginny said, throwing her hands up, careful not to knock Theo against the wall. There wasn’t much space here. “Mum knows by now! There’s no way she doesn’t. But she hasn’t written a thing!”

Theo could see that she was worried, but he had no idea what to say to help her calm down. He was pretty sure that there was no way to calm her down without coming over as condescending, which was not his intention. Ginny’s worries weren’t unfounded. Over the years Mrs. Weasley had sent more than one howler, mostly to the twins.

“I expected a reaction as well.” He could admit that. It wasn’t even hard to admit. The reaction from their parents had been the reason they had kept their relationship a secret at the start.

Ginny huffed in frustration, placing her hands on her hips, as well as that was possible with what little space they had here. “Did you hear from your father?”

Theo shrugged. “He didn’t really say anything about it. I think he has fun teasing me about it. He wrote that I’m welcome to invite my friends, but that I of course have to observe the rules when it comes to girls visiting.” Theo rolled his eyes. He hadn’t really written his father that he had a girlfriend. Not in as many words, at least. But he knew that his father knew by all the hints that had been in his letters to Theo. “I’m pretty sure he didn’t remind me of those just because he thinks I’m old enough to be interested in dating. And judging by the picture Aiden send me last… well, let’s just say, why should he draw me holding hands with a girl with red hair if you hadn’t been mentioned?” Sometimes Theo wished there could be such a frank relationship between him and his father as Harry seemed to have with his adoptive father.

Ginny rolled her eyes. “I say we kiss on the platform in front of everyone and get this over with for real now. All this waiting is making me crazy!”

Startled, Theo laughed. “I see the appeal, really I do. But you’re sure that’s wise? I would guess that with Harry being most likely picked up by his father there'll be reporters around. I’m not eager to make an appearance on the front page of the Prophet.” But making a declaration of some kind seemed to be a good plan.

Ginny closed her eyes and rubbed one hand over them, the tension draining from her, slumping against the wall behind her. “What a mess.”

“I guess I should have taken Harry’s advice to just tell your parents and my father and be done with it.” He really should have. “But at the same time, I think telling them in person is better.”

“So we tell them today? On the platform?” Ginny asked, sounding sceptical.

Theo shrugged. “I guess that would be best? We want to meet during the holidays, and we don’t want to hide, so…”

Theo was cut off by Ginny leaning forward and placing her lips on his. With that decision made they didn’t talk all that much until they broke up to search out their respective friends.

oooOOooo

It was hard to control Marcus in the crowded train station. Marvolo was very glad that he could apparate them here, as he couldn’t even imagine how he would have managed in the muggle part of the building. While it was crowded here on the platform with all the families arriving, muggles hurrying to their trains would have been even more distracting than simply people waiting.

But even here waiting, Marvolo held one of Marcus’ hands firmly clasped in his, while the boy was brimming with nervous energy.

Straining to see, Marcus was constantly moving forward and around trying to get a better look through all the adults obstructing his view. Maybe he should cast a monitoring spell on Marcus and allow him to move around like some other, older, kids were doing.

“Marvolo. Who gave you a bag of kneazle kittens to keep track of?” an amused voice asked from the direction of the barrier and the one floo.

Turning his head, while also reeling in Marcus who was straining in the other direction, Marvolo spotted Amelia casually walking in his direction. “I guess I only have myself to blame for this predicament. How is everything at the Ministry?”

“Well enough,” Amelia answered, with a smile. “A few of the trainees and older Aurors are grumbling over the new training program, but I’m seeing improvement already.”

Hearing Amelia’s voice, Marcus turned suddenly and moved towards her. “Aunt Amelia!”
Marvolo smiled as she crouched down to hug the small boy-shaped projectile.

“Who are you here to pick up?” Marcus wanted to know. “We’re here to pick Harry up. He’ll be home for two whole months!”

“I’m here to pick up Susan. She’s in the same year as Harry. I take it you’re excited to see your brother again?” Amelia stood up again, and Marcus had to tilt his head back so he could still look at her face.

“Yes! He promised we’ll go flying! And he’ll read me a story! And we’ll play with Nagini!” Marcus certainly would have kept on rambling – he had a tendency to do that – but Lucius and Narcissa were walking by and greeting them with the usual politeness, which had Marcus hiding behind Marvolo’s robes.

“He’s a little shy, isn’t he?” Amelia asked, a twinkle in her eyes when Marcus once again tried to see if the train was arriving. “But maybe not.”

“Dad, I can’t see!” Marcus said tugging at Marvolo’s robes and looking up to him.

For a moment Marvolo felt torn. There was a pretty easy solution to Marcus’ problem. He could pick his son up and place him on his shoulders, but that would be seen as inappropriate for a Lord of the Wizengamot. It wasn’t really done.

Just like hugs in public, banter at the Slytherin table in the Great Hall, and other undignified displays of affection.

Breaking the expectations of society – like this would certainly do – wasn’t something that Marvolo tried to avoid. In fact as Lord Voldemort he had always worked hard to ensure he couldn’t be a target for jokes – those prank spells some Order members had tended to use in battle really had felt more threatening than some of the nastier curses – doing something like that would just solidify the difference between Marvolo and Voldemort.

“Marcus.” Marvolo got his son’s attention. “I’ll cast a featherlight spell on you and then you can watch everything from my shoulders. Would you like that?”

“Yes!” Marcus exclaimed, jumping up and down in place.

With a smile Marvolo got his wand out and flicked it in the rather simple pattern for the charm reducing his son’s weigh, so it would be rather easy to hoist him up high enough to get him settled on Marvolo’s shoulders. “Then up you go!” Turning Marcus around, so his back was facing toward Marvolo, he moved to pick him up and over his head. Once he had managed to settle Marcus comfortably, Marvolo turned back to a grinning Amelia Bones.

“I can see everyone from here!” Marcus exclaimed in glee, turning his upper body this way and that, from what Marvolo was able to feel.

“Don’t look so smug, please, Amelia. My ego might get bruises.” Marvolo admonished his friend with a fake glare, which only made her chuckle.

“I don’t think that your ego is in danger of bruising, my friend. In fact you rather look as composed and in control as I have ever seen.” Amelia’s smile was more enigmatic than Marvolo could interpret right now. Was she referring only to the time that Marvolo had been Voldemort? Or did she also intend to include the time she had known about him as Voldemort in that statement?

But in that moment Marcus called out, “I see the train!” and their conversation was cut short as everyone moved to welcome their children back for the summer.

oooOOooo

This year Harry didn’t feel trepidation when leaving the train in the usual pandemonium of students, parents, younger siblings, and familiars. Instead he was happy, carefree, and full of anticipation for good to come.

Luna and he had shared a long kiss before parting, well aware that they would be separated the moment they stepped onto the platform and off the train. And as soon as they had cleared the door, Luna was swept to one side by an excited first-year, running past them with a happy call of “Mum!” and then there was a group of boys, and Harry could only see Luna waving and moving away from the train searching for her father.

Dragging his own trunk behind, Harry also started to look for Marvolo and Marcus, as they had promised to be there to pick him up. Once again something new. Being picked up for the summer by his family on the platform and not having them waiting outside the train station, grudgingly making the effort while trying to give any other reason for that than that Harry needed to be picked up.

Theo and Ginny walked past, holding hands, their trunks trailing after them, probably because of a spell Theo had cast. Here among all those adults and children, it was unlikely that anyone would be able to distinguish who had cast what. And if Theo had cast the spell on the train, he hadn’t even broken any rules. Looked like they were going to tell their parents about the fact that they were dating and had been for a while now. Harry hoped that it would go well for them.

“Harry!” That had been Marcus yelling. Harry looked around, searching for his little brother somewhere near him, but he couldn’t spot him among the legs and trunks all around. “Harry!” There it was again, and Harry stopped where he was, taking more time to search his surroundings. Then something moving caught his attention, so far up towards the ceiling that he thought for a moment an owl had escaped its cage until he realized that green and purple weren’t colours an owl usually had.

Marcus somehow had managed to be higher up than all the adults and was waving with great enthusiasm, probably to get Harry’s attention. Waving back to make sure that Marcus knew Harry had seen him, he picked up the handle of his trunk again, carefully weaving his way through the many people in the direction of where Marcus was easily seen above all the others. After a few strides Harry finally comprehended that Marcus was sitting on Marvolo’s shoulders.

The sudden stab of jealousy was entirely unexpected. Harry couldn’t remember having been carried like that even once. Maybe James or Lily, or Sirius, Remus, or any of their other friends had carried Harry around like that when he had been old enough to sit. But Harry certainly didn’t remember any such instance. And while he had seen Dudley being carried that way a few times – until his cousin got too heavy for Vernon to manage that – no one had ever even suggested that carrying Harry that way was even a distant possibility.

And now at almost sixteen years old, there was no way that Harry ever would get to experience it.

Right on the heels of that jealousy came a wave of guilt and shame.
It was true, Harry hadn’t had the luck that Marcus had had to be adopted by a family that actually cared early enough to get to experience a happy childhood with all that belonged to it. But that was no reason to begrudge Marcus having what Harry could no longer. While he closed the distance between his waiting family and himself, Harry fell into what was by now a fairly familiar breathing pattern, and used what he had learned from Madame Goyle to work through his feelings. It was perfectly fine for him to feel sad and angry about missing out on being carried around on an adult's shoulders so he could have a good look at their surroundings. Being jealous of those that still could experience that was a natural reaction. But it was not Marcus' fault that Harry had missed out. So being angry at Marcus wasn’t a good reaction to have. Maybe there was some magical means to shrink Harry for a time – so he and Marcus would be the same size – and therefore provide a way for Harry to experience what he had missed before. Thinking about a way to actually get to be carried around like a small child suddenly made Harry doubt he actually wanted to go through with it. Being as old as he was, and having grown quite a bit, brought many benefits Harry wasn’t willing to give up easily.

Before he could manage to sort out his tangled feelings on that, Harry reached Marvolo and Marcus. Letting go of his trunk handle – leading to a thunk as the trunk came to rest on the paved platform, eliciting an indignant squeak from Hedwig in her cage on top of the trunk – and enveloping Marvolo in a hug, Harry ended up with Marcus' foot near his nose.

“Welcome back, Harry,” Marvolo murmured near Harry’s ear, squeezing a little tighter, before letting go.

Harry blinked rapidly in an attempt to quell the tears suddenly making an appearance for reasons probably buried in the mess of feelings currently making somersaults inside his stomach. “I’m glad that the year’s over.” Harry plucked his glasses from his nose, quickly cleaning them with the edge of his loose over-robe – it was warm enough that Harry had picked one of the shorter ones made from linen to wear instead of his Hogwarts uniform robes – before settling them back on his nose.

“How’s the view up there?” he asked his little brother, tilting his head back so he could look up to Marcus, who was grinning from ear to ear.

“Great! I can see everything! Aunt Amelia is over there.” Marcus pointed to somewhere off to the right. “And there are a lot of people with red hair.” Now he was pointing in the direction that Theo and Ginny had vanished to. “One of them is moving their arms in a funny way.” Marcus giggled and waved his arms around widely, almost knocking off the tall hat of a witch walking by them at that very moment.

“How do you need to say goodbye to some of your friends?” Marvolo asked, and Harry shook his head. “No, we already did that on the train.”

“Very well. Then let’s go home, shall we?” Marvolo said, carefully lifting Marcus down, while calling out, “Flimm!” which caused the elf to appear between them, facing both Harry and Marvolo in equal measure. “Please take Harry’s luggage back home, and prepare an early dinner for us. We’ll be along shortly.”

Flimm bowed again, took hold of the trunk, and vanished as fast as he had appeared, taking the luggage and the cage with him.

Marvolo was holding out a hand for Harry to take, already having linked hands with Marcus on his other side. “I’ll apparate us home, and then Harry has to tell us everything that was remarkable about his year at Hogwarts, and all his plans for the summer, so we can come up with a joint plan for our family.”
And on that note they apparated away.

“I’m sorry.” Marcus said in a tiny voice, standing there looking miserable, while Harry picked himself up from the floor of the playroom carefully.

Marvolo was there as well, as he had been roped into playing with his sons just after dinner. The big castle they had built together lay in ruins as a result of Marcus tackling Harry to land on the magnificent structure. For the moment Marvolo ignored the younger boy, all his senses concentrated on Harry. His glasses seemed to be broken, and there was blood. Working hard on not falling into a panic – he was an experienced dueller and a Dark Lord, he would not panic – Marvolo helped Harry over to the reading chair, already getting his wand out for a quick diagnostic charm. If the broken glasses had injured the eyes behind them, they would need to go to St. Mungo's, as eyes were too delicate for the limited healing spells Marvolo knew.

“Keep your eyes closed, Harry. I need to check on them and make sure there’s no glass left that could hurt you.” Marcus fidgeted behind them, but Marvolo concentrated on the result the diagnostic charm was showing him. “Seems it’s only a surface cut, there on your brow. That’s easy to heal. \textit{Episkey}.” A silent, mild, cleaning spell removed the blood that had oozed out of the cut, as well as any possible glass splinters. “You can open your eyes again, Harry. Seems as if there was no real harm done.” With that said, Marvolo turned to look to where Marcus was standing, looking afraid of what might happen next. Smiling with an ache in his chest, Marvolo gestured for Marcus to come closer. “I know that your teacher in school already said that you need to be more careful when playing, and Mrs. Peters said the same more than once. And while nothing too bad happened this time, you need to be more careful. Do you understand?”

Marcus nodded, but didn’t look up, and Marvolo really didn’t know if the boy had understood what the problem was, or if he would be able to curb his tendency to play too rough the next time. With a sigh, Marvolo tousled Marcus’ hair, before gathering the broken pieces from Harry’s glasses on the small table that always stood next to the reading chair. It looked as if everything was there. Harry shifted next to him. “Can you repair them? I don’t really have a spare pair, and I can’t really see worth a d… all that much without them.” His older son had caught himself just in time, but despite that he had a point.

“Yes, I should be able to fix them.” Marvolo answered, pointing his pale wand at the fragmented pair of spectacles. \textit{\textit{Occulus Reparo.}} and the pieces fused together once more into glasses that Harry could use. But they probably should pick up a spare set just in case, anyway. And the expense for an unbreakable enchantment wouldn’t be unreasonable, either. “Here you go.” Marvolo placed the glasses into Harry’s waiting hands, being reminded how important those glasses were for his son.

“Thanks.” Harry smiled after he had placed the glasses back on his nose, and then looked over to where Marcus was kicking at the wooden building blocks. “I’m okay, Marcus. See? Magic made my glasses whole again, and nothing bad happened. Just try to be more careful, please?”

Marcus nodded, but still didn’t look up from the floor. Marvolo watched from his crouched position next to where Harry sat on the reading chair. For a moment there was silence, until Marvolo stood with a sigh. “How about you get yourself ready for bed. Marcus? I’m sure Harry will be happy to read you a story before you go to sleep. Am I right, Harry?”
Picking up on Marvolo’s plan easily Harry nodded happily. “Sure. Marcus can pick one and then I’ll read him and Nagini a story.”

Peeking up through his fringe, Marcus already looked less unhappy, and quickly went to his room to wash, change into pyjamas, and brush his teeth, so that Harry would read him a story.

When Marcus was gone and Marvolo was alone with Harry in the playroom, he sighed again and waved his hand to clean up after them. “We’ll get you a spare pair of glasses and an enchantment to make sure your glasses won’t break that easily again. The next time we’re in Diagon Alley. I’m glad nothing too bad happened.”

“I’ve been thinking… There’s that potion that could make my eyes good enough that I won’t need glasses, right? And muggles do something like laser surgery to correct eyes. Don’t they? And using the potion isn’t really illegal anyway, right? I mean… “

Harry seemed unsure and conflicted, but Marvolo was elated. Harry had been adamant that he didn’t want to take the potion when Healer Greengrass had brought it up the first time. And now he was asking for it? “Of course. The potion isn’t illegal to use. And I know someone able to brew it correctly.” Maybe Severus still had the potion from last summer when Marvolo had added it to the list of potions he had had the man brew. And if not, he certainly was able to brew a new batch. “If you want me to, I can set everything into motion to get it for you.” Only he still had sounded rather unsure, better to leave an option for Harry to change his mind later. “And there’s no need to rush into it. You can take this potion at any point in time. If you’re not comfortable with it, you can wait until after school. Take your time.”

They were interrupted by Marcus bounding into the room, grabbing Harry’s hand and making for the door. “Come on! I’m finished. Nagini is already waiting!” With a wave back at Marvolo, Harry went with his younger brother, grinning.

Finishing the cleanup in the playroom, Marvolo then went down to the study to compose a letter to Severus. He had a potion to ask for.

oooOo00

Finally it was quiet at the Burrow. All of the children had gone to bed, or at least to their rooms, and only Arthur and Molly were still awake and in the kitchen. The sun had gone down some time ago, and the birds had gone to bed, no longer singing outside. It had been a tumultuous evening. All had started with Ginny walking up to them, hand-in-hand with the son of Benjamin Nott, suspected Death Eater.

Of course both he and Molly had heard rumours, passed along from different children to their parents via letter, and from those parents, to friends, neighbours, and colleagues. No news passed through so many hands was worth much, even as Molly normally participated happily in the rumour mill. When it came to her little darling, the idea of her dating several boys, one after the other, either didn’t register as possible or was passed off as less-than-serious experimentation.

“All of our children are growing up. And I think that he’s a polite lad.” Arthur felt a little bit out of his depth. “He’s friends with Harry. And his father was polite as well.” Molly still was sitting at the big kitchen table, her lips pursed, her hands constantly wringing. She didn’t seem to not be impressed with his attempt to help her come to terms with the fact that their little girl was growing up to be a witch who drew the attention of others.

“Yes, well. That’s true. But she’s still so young!” Molly placed her elbows on the table and then let her face fall into her hands. What she said next came out pretty muffled. “And Fred and George are going to risk everything with that silly shop idea of theirs. Why can’t they do something more… serious? Something reliable and stable?”

Arthur flicked his wand at the teapot to set the water to heating. He was pretty sure that they would be here for some time more. Adjusting to their children being adults and finding their own way was hard on Molly. It was his duty as her loving husband to help her come to terms with the inevitable changes.

Chapter End Notes

AN: Still a bit of summer to go. And I think for the first time in the whole time I've been writing this story the time in the story almost matches with the date I'm publishing.

Thanks to Jordre and Jake for helping to improve my spelling!

For the first day of the summer holidays, it had been an early morning. But if Harry was honest, he hadn't expected anything different. Marcus had woken Harry up much too early, but as he had an appointment with Madame Goyle just after a normal breakfast time, it wasn't that inconvenient.

Currently they – Marvolo, Marcus, and Harry himself – were walking from a hidden backstreet, where Marvolo had apparated them to, all the way to the office where Madame Goyle usually met with her patients. And Marcus was already nagging.

"Why can't we just wait for Harry to be done? I want to go to the Zoo with him!" Marcus was skipping along, holding Marvolo's hand, and Harry just grinned. He wasn't exactly looking forward to the appointment, but he did look forward to a day spent with his godfather while Marvolo and Marcus visited the London Zoo.

"Because the idea of this appointments is that Harry gets to talk to Madame Goyle without anyone listening in. So she can help him with problems he might have that need talking about to be solved. And after that, Lord Black will pick him up," Marvolo explained – again – with more patience than Harry would have thought the man capable of just last summer. "And while Harry is off doing that, we're going to have a nice day in the Zoo looking at all the different animals, eating an ice cream or two, and generally having a good time."

Harry had suggested the Zoo as a place for his brother and father to go to, as he fondly remembered the first snake he had ever spoken to. And the summer was going to be long enough for more than one visit. If the way Marcus spoke with Nagini was any indication, he would be delighted to speak with more snakes.

They had to stop at a traffic light when it turned red. Next to them a woman with a girl – holding hands just as Marvolo and Marcus were doing – also waited for the lights to change, and for once Harry was sure that he wasn't looked at in disdain for his oversized, washed-out, and torn clothes. If anything their clothes screamed wealth.

"Can I also go to her, to talk without anyone listening?" Marcus asked suddenly, and Harry wondered if he actually understood what going to a therapist entailed, and why someone might want to do it.

"In principle, there's nothing that says you can't. But we'll have to ask her if she has time for another patient, and if she feels she is able to… take on our whole family." Harry noticed that their father quickly had changed tracks in there. Harry vaguely remembered that there were specialists for children as young as Marcus was. Madame Goyle had been Marvolo's first choice because she was related to one of his Death Eaters – giving him a unique kind of leverage over the situation – and knowledge of the magical world and its existence. With Harry being a teenager when he started seeing her, the question of whether she had what was needed to work with small children hadn't come up.

Not that making a point of Marcus being a small child would go over well with him. He was finished with his first year of school, after all, and therefore no longer one of the small children. At least according to him, who declared those still in kindergarten babies.

"What's she called?" Marcus wanted to know as the lights turned green and they all started to cross the street.

"You mean her occupation?" Marvolo asked for clarification, getting a quick series of nods in answer, as Marcus insisted on walking quicker, passing by Harry to walk in front. "Therapist is what she has written on her door." Which was technically true, even though she would be called a mind-healer in the magical world. But they couldn't really say that when people around them – who probably were muggles – could hear.

And they were listening. Harry had seen the quick glance from the woman, assessing him, and now not only noticing the well-made clothing – tailored, just as everything else in his wardrobe – but also the fact that Harry was on his way to a therapy session. For a moment he wondered what she might be construing in her head as the reason he was going to a therapist. Was he a bored, idle student being dragged there to make him perform to his parents' expectations? Had he tormented an animal, or even a fellow student, getting off lightly because of their wealth? Or maybe she thought he was stressed out? Before Harry could descend ever deeper into what others might think of his consulting a mind-healer – the Dursleys certainly never had anything positive to say about those abnormal enough to need a psychoanalyst – he reminded himself of something he had learned since the first appointment. Asking for help was not a weakness. With all the bad reactions one had to fear, it required a lot of bravery to admit one needed help and to seek it out.

When Harry and his family turned left and the woman and the girl turned right, Harry could breathe more easily. It was unimportant what strangers thought of him. It was even unimportant what people he knew thought of him. It was harder than it should be to convince himself of that, but Harry knew it to be true. In this the only thing of importance was that Harry should do what was good for him. And going to speak with Madame Goyle was helping Harry deal with everything that kept happening in his life, as well as everything that already had happened.

And it sounded as if Marvolo thought it would be good for Marcus as well. "We'll ask her. And if she doesn't have time, she might know someone who does. How does that sound?"

Harry didn't listen, but followed behind them, thinking deeply, and relying on Marvolo to find the way.

Was there a reason for Marcus to go to therapy?

After a few moments Harry had to agree that it couldn't hurt. Marcus had been in the foster system, which wasn't ideal even though he hadn't ended up with uninterested families, nor had he been forced to change families too frequently. But he probably had had a few less-than-ideal experiences in his past, and more than likely would have complicated situations in his future.

"I really wanna go as well!" Marcus said in a tone Harry knew well enough to recognize that he had repeated that sentence more than once.

"And I have already said that we'll have to ask Madame Goyle. We can't just decide to take up her time, Marcus." Judging by Marvolo's tone Harry had missed quite a few moments of back and forth over this.

They stepped through the door into the waiting area of the office. It was early enough that Harry was the first patient of the day, so the door to the actual office was open.

"Lord Slytherin, Harry, Marcus, good morning. Do come in." Just as always she was wearing a pencil skirt and a jacket, some make-up – somehow Harry had started to pay attention to things like that – and a smile.

"Good morning, Madame Goyle," Marvolo greeted, giving her a nod. "Before Marcus and I leave, I wanted to ask you to consider taking on Marcus as your patient as well. He would like to come speak to you, just as Harry and I do."

Madame Goyle turned to look at Marcus directly. "And you think that I could help you with a problem?"

Instead of answering, Marcus suddenly was shy, hiding behind Marvolo. Which wasn't as effective as it would have been if Marvolo had been wearing robes. Trousers weren't as good at blocking the line of sight.

"I'll think about it, Marcus. Come in Harry." With a wave Harry followed Madame Goyle into the office, being greeted by her tomcat weaving his way around his legs.

Then he sat down in the comfortable armchair, trying to relax. This was different than the room they had used off the hospital wing at Hogwarts.

"How was your start into the summer holidays, Harry?" Madame Goyle asked after she had settled down herself.

For a moment Harry wasn't sure he wanted to talk much today. Maybe drawing something would be easier. He could order his thoughts, find a point to start.

And then he simply started to talk, fiddling with the hem of his polo shirt. "I'm feeling bad for being jealous of Marcus. He gets to do so many things I never had a chance to try. But he should get to try those things. Right?" Before long Harry was talking and talking and talking. Tom the kneezle on his lap, purring, while he just rambled on and on. Their last meeting hadn't been long ago, but somehow there was a lot to talk about anyway.

oooOo000

Instead of apparating them, Marvolo had decided to take the tube and wasn't sure it had been a good idea. They had gotten off at Camden Town and then had walked to the Zoo. And only the facts that Marcus had enjoyed taking public transportation and Marvolo did want his son to be able to move around in the muggle world without difficulty made the experience bearable. It simply had been too crowded for Marvolo to enjoy the travel.

Then they had bought tickets at the entrance to the Zoo and started to make their round. Determined to go to the reptile house last – there was no way they were going to go anywhere else once Marcus started to talk with the snakes there – Marvolo had turned them left, visiting the birds first. Between birds of prey, penguins, and parrots, Marcus had had many interesting animals to look at. After that they had looked at butterflies – not a favourite of Marcus – and bugs which had appealed a lot more to his son. The lions had been lazing around too much to keep a little boy's interest, and so he found himself now sitting on one bench of many lining a children's playground,
"Here alone?" another man sat down on the bench standing right next to the one Marvolo had settled on. Turning his attention to his seating neighbour – secure in the knowledge that he had put a tracking charm on Marcus before he had let him loose to play – Marvolo took in the sight of a muggle dressed much more casually than he himself was.

"No. My son is playing somewhere in there." Marvolo waved his hand at the interesting structure children were climbing around on.

The other man chuckled. "I'm waiting for my wife and our daughters. We agreed to meet here once they've found the ice cream they wanted to have." Without a clue why this stranger insisted on talking to him, Marvolo turned back to the playground under the pretence that he needed to keep an eye out for his son and his safety. "So you're giving your wife a nice day without the kid running around?"

Well aware of the usual roles assigned to women and men in this part of the muggle world, Marvolo refrained from rolling his eyes. He really had little to stand on here, there only had been one woman in his inner circle, and traditional families still expected the witches to take care of the children until they all were old enough to attend Hogwarts. For the most part, at least.

"There is no wife. My older son is back from school for the summer and visiting his uncle today. So I'm entertaining the younger one here. No need to let him feel left out." No need to give more information than needed to this random muggle, taking a more than passing interest in Marvolo's affairs.

For a moment there was only the sound of various animals, shrieking and laughing children, and off in the distance those of the city.

Then a woman and two girls approached their benches, talking with the man, obviously the wife and daughters he had spoken of. While they talked a mile a minute, even while eating their ice cream, Marvolo tried to enjoy giving Marcus an experience he hadn't gotten himself at that age.

He could remember quite clearly that when he had been relatively young – maybe four, or five – almost everyone at the orphanage had visited the Zoo. He had been banned from going as punishment for something. He didn't remember what it had been, only that he had known without a doubt that he hadn't done anything to deserve that punishment. Now, many decades later, Marvolo thought that he might have displayed an act of accidental magic without knowing that he had done so.

So maybe he had been responsible for whatever he had been accused of, but it still hadn't been something to be punished for.

Most likely, at least.

"Dad! Dad!" Marcus came running, a grin on his face, and sand on his knees. "There's a slide back there! And swings! Can you come and give me a push?" Small, sandy, hands were firmly gripping Marvolo's own, leaving sand all over his expensive trousers. Maybe going out in a fine three piece suit hadn't been the best idea. But when he wasn't able to wear robes, an old-fashioned, tailored suit was his clothing of choice. It basically was what wizards wore on a daily basis under their robes anyway.

"Sure I can. Lead the way!" Marvolo stood, happy to have an excuse to minimize his interaction with that stranger, and followed his son over to a few sets of swings, to give him the pushes he
After they had got the swing going, Marcus managed pretty well on his own, it just had been a little high off the ground for Marcus to give himself a good push to start out.

"Can we go see the snakes next?" Marcus asked with a look of concentration on his face, clearly still working out how a swing worked.

Giving a small sigh, Marvolo nodded. "I guess we can go see the snakes next. And all the other reptiles. But you know that they probably aren't as active as you would like. You know that they like to laze about." Better to remind Marcus of that fact than have a disappointed boy on his hands later.

"I'm sure I can get them interested!" Marcus was confident, and probably with good reason. There had yet to be a snake Marvolo met which was not excited to meet with a speaker.

And once they arrived at the reptile house Marvolo was proven right on both his suspicions for how this visit would go.

Every one of the snakes Marcus had looked at had been delighted to meet him and to speak with him. And the fact that Marcus didn't tire of hearing from them about their days – which were terribly mundane in Marvolo's opinion – led to a rather extended stay in this part of the Zoo.

In fact they stayed long enough here that the man, his wife, and daughters from earlier came in while Marcus was talking in low hisses with one of the pythons living here.

"Can't we just go and look at the penguins some more?" one of the girls asked in a whine that seemed well practiced.

"Or the monkeys!" her sister threw in from the side, slinking around clearly less than happy to go look at the reptiles.

"You both know how your father likes reptiles. We were everywhere you wanted to go, and now it's his turn picking what we'll look at." The mother tried to be stern but sounded mostly tired to Marvolo's ears.

."We never get live mice:. one python had just complained to Marcus while hanging leisurely from a branch that had been installed near the glass pane so people had a better chance to actually get to see the animals living here.

."I guess that's pretty boring then:. Marcus answered, commiserating with the snake.

To pass the time Marvolo walked from terrarium to terrarium, looking at the illustrations and informational texts hung by each of them. He did know a lot of the different types of snakes – he had made it a project of his to learn everything about snakes he could as soon as he had been old enough to go to school – but reading about the specific individuals here was something new and something to do while Marcus went about getting to know them all.

"It seems as if your boy thinks he can actually speak with snakes." There was a hint of derision in the muggle's voice, and Marvolo barely managed to refrain from rolling his eyes.

"A child's imagination is a wondrous thing," Marvolo said in a deceptively mild tone, it was even the truth. "He plays and has fun. Where is the harm in that?" And why did that man think it was his place to make fun of a child in this way?
The man huffed and moved on, clearly looking down on Marcus running over to Marvolo with shining eyes, starting to speak several paces before he actually had reached his father. "Do you think we can get the snakes here some live mice? It's boring to always just be getting dead ones!"

The girls made gagging noises in the background and Marvolo ignored them in favour of answering his son's question. "While they certainly would enjoy the variety in possible activity a live mouse would provide, I think it's not done to make sure that the mice are actually eaten by the snakes where a human can see and check that everything is alright."

Marcus nodded earnestly. "And they can't ask the snakes if they managed to catch the mice. So they can't let them run for the snakes to hunt?"

"That's correct." Because the muggles working here certainly couldn't ask the snakes anything. Happy with that explanation Marcus returned to his hissed conversations with the various snakes, running back and forth to carry messages between them with a happy smile on his face. He even insisted to say goodbye to each of them before they could leave when it was late afternoon.

Unwilling to once again brave the tube, Marvolo searched for a sheltered spot they could apparate from and took them home, where they would wait for Harry to return home from his visit to his godfather.

oooOOooo

A pitcher with ice cold lemonade was standing with two tall glasses on a table right next to the door, where Sirius could just make it out past Harry. He felt like he could drink something, but when he looked down on his hands, the amount of oil and grease on them advised against taking up his wand to summon it, or to walk around the motorcycle and pick up a glass without cleaning his hands first.

"Harry, could you please pour me a glass of lemonade?" Even while he posed his request, Sirius looked down in search of the rag he had been using to clean his hands from time to time.

He spotted the rag under the front tire of the bike, and bent down to pick it up. When Sirius came back up, Harry was still polishing one spot on the bike with his own rag and a far-away look on his face.

"Earth to Harry! Can you hear me?" Sirius waved one hand in front of his godson's face, a little concerned wondering what had the boy so distracted today. He had picked Harry up after his appointment with that mind-healer. Maybe something troubling had come up?

Blinking, Harry focused on the waving hand – still mostly covered in stains – and gave a tentative smile. "Sorry, I'm a little distracted. You wanted something?"

"Yes. Can you pass me a glass of lemonade, please? I'm parched." Still remembering how he had hated it to be pressured to answer when he had been Harry's age, Sirius debated if this was a case of let-it-go, or one where he needed to be persistent.

Being an adult and mostly responsible was hard.

"Here you go," Harry said, extending his hand holding a glass full with lemonade – made with limes and lemons – across the motorcycle for Sirius to take.

He did look good. Not drawn or pale, too thin or in any other way sickly. Sirius was also sure that there were no glamours on him hiding any marks or stuff like that. As the Lord of the family, the wards around the house would have informed him about such magic. It always was an irritating itch in the back of his mind when someone vain enough to hide birthmarks or love bites with magic came over for a visit. But it was useful to make sure Remus wouldn't try to hide marks because he thought that bruise balms and healing potions were too expensive.

So, what was wrong? Because something clearly was on Harry's mind.

"Thanks. Take one for yourself as well." He grabbed the glass with his left hand, as he hadn't really managed to clean the right with the already pretty dirty rag.

Drinking while Harry filled his own glass with lemonade and drank, Sirius came to the conclusion that he couldn't ignore Harry's mood, but that he would not poke and ask, but make a few guesses and just ask.

"How is that girlfriend of yours? Everything fine?" Love troubles, as Sirius remembered quiet vividly, were frequently the reason for upset and worries when one was only just starting out. Not that that necessarily stopped when one was older.

"Luna?" Harry asked, face brightening – not love trouble, then – and setting the now empty glass back down, he started to talk in a dreamy voice. "We'll all be meeting this weekend. Theo has invited everyone to come visit him. It'll be the longest we've been apart since the spring Holidays. I think I'll write her before that, though. Ask her for a date. Do you think she would like going to the cinema? I don't even know what films are currently being shown. Do you think you could get me a program that's recent?"

At the end there Harry had gotten more and more excited and Sirius felt some of his worry ease. Whatever trouble was plaguing Harry's mind wasn't of an earth shattering consequence if he could get that lost and excited over planning a date with his girlfriend.

"You know that I'm taking a portkey over to meet Nawel and Enora later tomorrow, right? I'm pretty sure I told you not so long ago that I had arranged everything." And while he was nervous, he also was absolutely hyped to spend the summer with his daughters and get to know them better.

Harry blinked and blushed. "Oh, yeah. You did tell me that." There was a short awkward pause. "Do you think Remus would be willing to help?"

Sirius laughed and quickly bent forward to ruffle Harry's hair. "Oh, pup! I'm sure he will. I'll make sure to write a letter if he sleeps longer than usual and shouldn't be back home before I have to leave. No worries!"

For a moment Harry looked confused before understanding dawned on his face. "Oh, right. Today is the full moon! Hadn't thought of that."

"No problem, Harry. And I'm sure you could make Lord Slytherin buy a muggle newspaper to check what cinemas are playing what films at the moment." That image – Marvolo Slytherin going to a muggle to buy a newspaper – made Sirius grin and for a while the two of them worked in silence.

"Can I ask you something?" Harry sounded hesitant and Sirius suddenly was pretty sure that whatever had been on his godson's mind was about to be revealed.

"Sure you can." Had that been casual enough? Had it been too casual? He didn't want to appear uninterested.

"What do you think of the Oculus Sanus potion?" Harry tried to sound as if it wasn't really all that important, but his tense posture and the light strain in his voice gave him away. Sometimes having grown up with a Slytherin family did have its advantages. That he had needed those long-thought-lost skills a lot in his role as Lord Black made it only easier to read his godson now. "Well, it's one of those that make one wonder why exactly it's banned in the first place. I know that your father never took it, and that the Weasleys would never use it. But otherwise it's still pretty common to use, as far as I understand."

"Really?" Harry sounded honestly surprised by that, which confused Sirius.

"Yes. I'm pretty sure I took one when I was about six. I think? Not sure. Why do you think so few witches and wizards actually wear glasses? There are, of course, transfiguration, and a few temporary charms. But I think mostly people get the potion. Even if they have to go out of the country to do so. It's an effective measure." Sirius shrugged, watching the other carefully.

"Huh. It sounded more rare when I heard of it for the first time." Harry shrugged and suddenly looked a lot more relaxed.

Had that been the problem?

"I think there aren't many left who can brew it here in Britain. But other parts of the world aren't as obsessed with such things as the Ministry has been in the past." He shrugged again and tried to remember what he had wanted to do next. Maybe he would find another motorcycle over at his daughter's home, leaving his baby back here somehow didn't feel right. "Can you pass me the wrench?"

The grass was pretty dry and the air filled with the sounds of crickets and the smells of dry plants, flowers, and small animals. The biggest animal that recently had wandered through this birch forest had been a fox.

Almost on its own, Remus' nose moved closer to the forest ground, sniffing in search of a trail. As Padfoot couldn't be here this night, Remus needed to find something to amuse himself with before he found himself a comfy spot of moss to sleep on.

Even as normally he preferred the presence of another during his transformations, Remus did understand that Sirius was going to travel to the home of his cubs, and needed the time.

Moony shook his head, and huffed. Even with Wolfsbane at hand – still provided by Severus and paid for by Lord Slytherin – his thought patterns were affected during the nights of the full moon. While it wasn't really a problem if Padfoot was with him, it did remind him that he wasn't willing to risk a human in his presence.

How much Dora did try to convince him it was safe notwithstanding.

He had offered her the arrangement Sirius and he had used during the winter, as it had been too cold to be outside the whole night. But she wasn't comfortable with the idea of the big, warded cast-iron cage. So Remus was here alone, and Dora was home with her parents, pouting.

And that when she, as an Auror, should know the rules for werewolves, what he had to do to comply with them, and what would happen if he didn't.

Shaking himself vigorously, loose hair flying in all directions, Moony tried to get rid of the gloomy thoughts. There was nothing he could do right here and now. But, he sniffed, it seemed it had been less than a few minutes that a rabbit had come through here.
Discarding all worries outside of the desire to catch that rabbit, Remus fell into a light trot, nose close to the ground, careful to be quiet as not to alarm the animal when he drew close.

Tuesday, 2nd of July 1996

The rhythmic sound of the knife hitting the cutting board was kind of soothing. Sonja was sitting in the chair Severus had transfigured for her in his potions laboratory back home at the Manor. Not that it actually felt like home just yet, more like a dream, a wonderful dream she feared to wake from to realize it all had been just that.

Snuggling back into her blanket – it wasn't really all that warm here in the laboratory as Severus liked to have it cool – Sonja reminded herself that this was very much real. She was married, expecting a baby, and somehow had managed to become a Lady. Not that climbing the social ladder had been her aspiration at any time. But with Severus had come the family name of Price, including a title, a seat on the Wizengamot, and this manor with its many laboratories and wonderful gardens.

"What are you brewing?" Sonja asked her husband, closing the book she had been reading in favour of a talk with her love.

"A new batch of Oculus Sanus potion. Lord Slytherin sent a letter to ask for it. It seems that Mr. Slytherin has seen sense." There was a bite in that statement that by now probably was more habit than anything else. "But I guess I'll see when he returns to school for the next year."

Sonja frowned. "Occlumency lessons are over, then? Did he already make that much progress?" The lessons had gone on the whole school year, she had thought they would continue for much longer.

"He has learned enough for what he needs. He can control his temper and deflect attacks on his mind by an outside force. He doesn't need the ability to forge memories, lie to a Legilimens in his own mind, or resist torture and truth serums. He and I can spend our time more productively."

Severus placed the knife down, moving over to one of the sinks to clean it immediately.

"I guess that makes sense," Sonja conceded. Who would need to withstand torture and truth serums? Hopefully not a teenaged boy.

Placing her chin in her hand, smiling, Sonja couldn't resist and simply had to ask. "Do you think he'll manage to score high enough in his Potions exam to make it into your NEWT classes?"

Standing in front of one of the many shelves of potion ingredients – painstakingly ordered to Severus' specifications – Severus took his time answering, picking a few bottles from their places.

"I think he has the potential. Especially as he has taken more interest in his academic performance ever since he was adopted, and especially after he was re-sorted. But I guess we'll have to wait and see if he has managed to keep a cool head on his shoulders during the exam. Both written and practical."

It was funny how much Severus had changed his perception of the boy in question. The staff all around had told her many stories about how Severus had always ranted about Harry Potter, the celebrity, the attention-seeking brat, breaking the rules just because he could. And now here he was, her stubborn and proud love, admitting that there was potential in the son of James Potter.

Not that he ever would use those words. And Sonja also wasn't blind to what had been necessary for her husband to see reason. The revelation of the harm the boy had suffered during his childhood under his muggle aunt's care – both through the potions he had had to take, and the fragments of memories Severus had seen during Occlumency lessons – had been instrumental in actually making Severus see reason.

Not that he had shared any specifics with Sonja. But one didn't need that to come to some specific conclusions after seeing the list of potions the boy had had to take.

Watching him work, all efficient motions and precision, Sonja thought back to the move here and the first evening they had spent making plans for the almost two months they would have here to themselves. They planned to put some finishing touches on all the potions Severus had worked on – he insisted she also had worked on them, planning to write her name onto all the publications – or at least the write-ups needed to publish and prepare for some more thorough testing. Especially for the Anteros Potion and the one testing familial connections and closeness. They had managed to get a few more tests in for the family connection potion, but the Anteros Potion needed another level of commitment for those willing to test it.

"Do you think we'll manage to dodge a few of those summer parties you've been grumbling about? I've seen the list of parties of past years, and there are quite a few we'll have to attend." She knew that Severus wasn't one for parties – indoors or otherwise – but she also knew that it was expected to attend them. She had decided to try softening him up a little bit in preparation. "We need to go to the Malfoy garden party. And I'm sure Lord Slytherin will organize something we'll totally have to attend." There was a sigh from Severus to that, which she could hear all the way over here over the bubbling sounds from the potion, and the slight scraping noise the stirrer made in the cauldron.

"Don't you think we can manage to get out of all the others on the grounds of not really knowing them, and your need to stay off your feet?" He sounded hopeful, and Sonja felt herself smirking.

"Not knowing them well is a reason to go, love. To get to know them. And as long as the healer doesn't say anything about staying in bed, I can stay off my feet perfectly fine at a nice garden party. There are things like benches and chairs, or even lounges." She laughed at him slumping his shoulders on purpose, exaggerating his movements. "If the Fudges organize a party, we'll have to go too. And the rest. Let's see. Shall we?"

"Maybe I'll get lucky and a few of the Potions conferences and meet-ups are going to take place on the same days as some of those social events." The disdain in those two innocent words was so thick that Sonja started to giggle, unable to stop until tears were running down her face and she was fighting for breath.

Suddenly Severus was standing right next to her chair, wand in hand, casting what Sonja guessed were diagnostic charms. "Are you feeling well, love?" The concern in his voice – he never sounded panicked, probably too much practice keeping his cool in a wide range of situations – sobered Sonja up pretty quickly.

"Yes. I'm fine. Don't worry." She placed one of her hands on Severus' arm, feeling her book slide down from the top of her leg to the side, lodging itself between her leg and the arm of the chair. "You're just too funny."

The face Severus made to that claim sent Sonja laughing again, making him scowl for real. Getting herself under control again, Sonja pushed him a little on the arm. "Get back to brewing, or do you want to have to start over because you let yourself be distracted by your wife?"

"Dastardly woman." Severus scowled, but when he turned she saw that scowl morph into a soft smile.
Fishing her book out from between the fold of her blanket, and the small space between her leg and the chair's arm, Sonja made herself comfortable again, going back to reading a manual on high society and the expected customs and manners. She wasn't ignorant, but not as knowledgeable as she wanted to be, either. Reading would get her a point to start. Once the child was born, there would be no more reason to avoid throwing some social functions herself. Sighing to herself, she went back to her reading.

ooooOOooo

Malcolm had known that being a family healer would be different from work at St. Mungo's when he had chosen to walk that path. The fact that he would be able to set his own working hours, within reason, and therefore be able to coordinate better his work as a healer for different families, and for the Death Eaters and his Lord, had been the deciding factor. But now, this very moment, the little quirks of being the healer for a whole family made it clear that this was absolutely the right thing for him.

"You're in good shape, Lord Slytherin," Malcolm started his assessment after a long look at the ritual's results. "If you keep up the duelling practice, there's no need to reduce the consumption of sweets, or otherwise chance your diet, my Lord." In fact Malcolm was surprised at how little the intake of sugar seemed to impact the Dark Lord's health. He started to gather up the ritual stones from where they had been placed on various places of the Dark Lord's body, putting them back on a small table because he would need them again soon.

While he worked he kept a tight leash on his features to keep up a friendly and professional mask. There in one corner of the nice room they were using sat Heir Slytherin, his younger brother on his lap. The boy displayed a curious mixture of curiosity, wariness, and boredom, while the older brother was grinning, his arms around the squirming boy. This wasn't the first time Malcolm had to work to gain the trust of a child, and he knew that letting them see the procedure helped a lot in that regard. That was why the Dark Lord had gone first, and his heir would be next.

"That's good to know," the Dark Lord said, sitting up, and rubbing his hands together. "I guess then I can get dressed again?"

"Of course, sir. You may get dressed again." Only long practice kept Malcolm from flinching at his audacity at correcting the Dark Lord. There was no reason to fear retribution. It had been a long while since the Dark Lord had passed out any punishments without a valid reason – being the last to arrive didn't count as valid in Malcolm's eyes – and he wouldn't do so in front of his sons. Or at least not in front of his younger son, as Malcolm was anything but sure about how much Henry Slytherin-Potter did or didn't know.

Lord Slytherin got up from the padded table-bench hybrid – transfigured for this visit – and picked up his trousers to get dressed, smirking in a way that made Malcolm nervous.

"Harry, maybe you could already change into the other shirt?" It took some convincing for Marcus Slytherin to get up so that Henry could start to change for his own exam.

When the boy was seated, ready for the ritual, Malcolm walked over and turned his back to the corner where now Lord Slytherin was seated on the chair, his younger son snuggled up against his chest.

"I assume that you have taken your potions as you were supposed to, Henry?" At the beginning of the meeting the teenager had asked to be called by his given name, citing the cumbersome length of his full name and titles as the reason.
"I did take what appeared with my meals, Healer Greengrass." The prim and proper way the boy was sitting there made Malcolm smirk, trying to be a good role model could do that to a child.

"That's good. Any problems since the last holidays?" He didn't really expect to hear a positive answer to that. If there had been any trouble, the Dark Lord would have made sure to have Malcolm at hand the evening the train came back to London.

"No problems, sir. I'm enjoying my summer." The boy was smiling, visibly more relaxed in the plain linen shirt, waiting to be told to lie down for the diagnostic ritual to begin. What a change from last summer and the very first examination.

"Then please lie down." While the teenager did as told, Malcolm once again started to explain what he was doing and why before he started to place the rune inscribed stones on their places on the boy's body. The glimpses he got from the little boy were entertaining, and distracting. There weren't that many children Malcolm had met who were this interested in the healing arts.

Once again the ritual was quickly finished, and Malcolm looked over the sheet of parchment with the results. They were encouraging. "You can stop using the potions to combat the damage you sustained in your early childhood, and your old breaks have healed nicely, too. I can confidently say that you're in good health, Henry."

"Thanks." Suddenly the boy was nervous, which made Malcolm curious. Did he want to ask something he wasn't comfortable with in front of his father and younger brother? "My eyes didn't change, did they?"

"No, they're still the same. Why do you ask?" Maybe he should check the prescription for the glasses? If his patient had noticed a change, that might be a good idea.

"I'm debating if I should take the potion to correct the problem. It's easier than constantly having to keep track of the glasses, but well, I wanted to make sure it's still an option." Henry shrugged, clearly uncomfortable.

Cutting the boy some slack, Malcolm smiled and waved for him to get dressed again. "There were no changes, so you still can take the potion to get your eyesight corrected if you so desire."

"Thank you." Henry Slytherin-Potter dressed again in his fashionable light summer clothes – trousers, a shirt, and open robes – and made room for his younger brother who had changed into a linen shirt of his own with the Dark Lord's help.

According to his previous experiences, this exam was going to follow one of a few distinct patterns. Either he would have to answer more questions than was reasonable, he would have to coax the boy every step of the way, or he would be so fidgety and twitchy that they would have to start over more than once.

Hoping for a barrage of questions, Malcolm waved the small child over. "And now let's have a look at you. Shall we?"

As usual she had worked until late in the evening. So it was rather late in the morning when Rita came out of her bathroom, wrapped in her favourite dressing gown, fluffy slippers on her feet, and hair wrapped around rollers to make sure her colour potion could get the right amount of time to soak in.
Her copy of the Prophet was already on her kitchen table, and with a few waves of her wand, she had toast with honey, a steaming cup of freshly brewed tea, and an egg boiled just right ready to eat. She would have preferred a full English breakfast, but as she didn't have a house-elf, she would have to make it herself, and she certainly hadn't the patience for that.

Especially not while she was hungry.

Not really interested in anything else, Rita opened the twine holding the Prophet rolled up, and placed the now opened newspaper next to her plate, sipping on her tea. Just as was proper, her article occupied the whole front page, with only a few smaller notices below the fold.

To make sure that none of the idiots working the presses had mangled any of her writing, Rita started to read her own article detailing the upcoming trial of the Howler Terrorist Amos Diggory.

She had worked hard on this one. As Mrs. Diggory had been too shielded by her family, Rita hadn't managed to get an official interview with her. And it would have been so wonderful to get something from the woman who should have noticed something was wrong! But spying in her animagus form hadn't revealed much that would have been usable. In fact, she had only learned that Mrs. Diggory had fallen into a deep depression, barely taking part in daily activities at her brother's house.

With nothing usable from that side, Rita had moved on to speak with the people who had worked with Amos Diggory at the Ministry, and old schoolmates. Those had been better resources to cite, because they all had been eager to bring up the questionable things Amos had done and said over the years. It was always so easy to write something worthy of the front page when people were trying to distance themselves from former friends.

A good sob-story – like the one she had written last summer about Lord Slytherin – was a close second, but it always was more fun to expose the dirty deeds of esteemed figures of society.

And Amos Diggory had been that, respected, hardworking, and reliable. And because of that perceived image of the man, his fall into darkness was so interesting for everyone.

Rita would have to make sure that she would get one of the few press places during the trial. This was too good a scoop to let some lesser reporter cover it. And in the line of that work, she might get enough information to write a follow-up piece on story about the tragic upbringing Lord Slytherin. While she was pretty sure she would be better off in the long run painting him as a wizard trying his best, there was more to write there than had been done so far. Probably because everyone remembered how vicious He-Who-Must-Not-Be-Named had been in the past, and no one dared to take position for or against him in the press, as public perception on the man was so divided and hard to predict.

With the orphan among muggles background, the adoption of another orphan in that little boy – adopting the boy he had made into an orphan could go either way if one was skilled with words – and other efforts to repair all the damage done, Lord Slytherin had a positive angle to take in a story. But with all the murders, the blood prejudices, association with dark creatures people generally feared, and connection to Dark Magic, there was a lot of resentment still present in the knowledge and memories of the public.

It was like dancing on a volcano.

Humming happily to herself, Rita finished up her breakfast and went about getting ready for the day. She had some preparations to make.
I hope I did the Zoo of London no disservice with my superficial portrayal. I only had information found on the web at hand, never have been there myself. Maybe I get to go sometime in the future.

And here after a long pause a new story recommendation: "Conditionally" by Lomonaaren on both ffnet and AO3, a not your typical Severus is Harry's father story, completed.

It was late evening and Severus really would have preferred to be at home at the manor. But he was here in London at his Lord’s behest.

“Please wipe your finger down with the alcohol soaked cloth, Heir Slytherin-Potter.” Severus pointed to the cloth he had prepared when he had set up his workstation in the small potions laboratory at Griffin House.

Without asking any inane questions, the boy picked up the cloth with his right, before cleaning the index finger of his left hand. Clever of him to let his non-dominant hand be pricked for the blood needed, even though it wasn’t strictly necessary. Severus was perfectly capable of casting a simple healing charm after the deed was done.

When Severus had moved the pre-brewed potion into a small glass goblet – one overly elaborately decorated piece, gold leaf and the engraved Potter crest – and looked up, the boy was holding out his hand for Severus to take the few drops of blood needed to make the Oculus Sanus work.

Taking a sure grip on the offered hand, Severus moved it so that the blood would fall directly into the goblet and therefore the potion. With his other hand he picked up a needle – made from silver – and looked up to the green eyes behind the glasses which would soon no longer be needed. “Brace yourself.”

As he had gotten the consent from both the boy and Lord Slytherin, who was reading a bedtime story to his other son – a strange concept Severus was ignoring for the moment – Severus simply stabbed the needle into the finger and then pressed on both sides to encourage a drop of blood to form. It fell into the middle of the goblet and dispersed with a small flash of colour, changing the potion’s colour into a bright blue, almost like robin’s eggs.

“Episkey.” The small puncture wound was healed in just a fraction of a second, and Severus let go of the boy’s hand. “Take the goblet up with you and drink it just before you lay down to sleep.” Severus almost automatically fell into a lecturing tone. That many years of teaching had left behind some serious side effects. “That way you’ll sleep through the changes the potion will induce. Tomorrow morning you should be able to see clearly without your glasses. Please inform your father if that is not the case.” It was really a fairly simple potion, if not for the ridiculous Ministry ban on all potions using blood in this manner. “Any more questions?”

Looking up from the potion, the boy shook his head, even as he still looked as if he had a myriad of questions.
Severus sighed. “You should ask your questions, Mr. Slytherin. Taking a potion when you still have questions about it is not the best plan of action. So ask away.” Teenagers and their dramatics.

“It’s silly, sir,” the boy all but mumbled, looking back down.

“Ask anyway.” Really, why did teenagers insist on being this difficult?

“How does it taste, do you know?” The boy was blushing and Severus had to agree that it was a silly question. But he had been the one to insist that the boy ask, so he couldn’t very well mock him now, regardless of how many taunts came to mind.

“I never took it myself, but all descriptions claim that it has a slightly metallic taste.” If that was the only question the boy had to ask, Severus’ chances of getting home soon were good. Sonja was waiting for him, and he looked forward to reading her some sonnets.

“That’s not too awful then. Thank you, sir. For all the trouble you went through to brew this. And for the explanation. Have a nice holiday, sir.” Severus watched with narrowed eyes as the boy took the goblet into two careful hands. Looked as if he really knew when and how to take care.

“You as well, Heir Slytherin-Potter.” It was still hard to adjust to the change in their interactions. Here in this moment their roles weren’t as defined as they were at school – where they were teacher and student – or at a Ministry function – where the boy was heir to two families and he himself Lord and Head of his family – was he Lord, Potions Master, or the boy’s professor?

The boy walked out, probably up to his bedroom, and Severus started to pack away his few supplies. The Dark Lord had told him not to wait for him – bedtime stories could take some time, or so Severus assumed – and Severus had no problem following that order.

Holidays were great. Draco couldn’t sleep in as he did whenever he could on the weekends at Hogwarts, but he had a room to himself, and he could fly without having to adhere to the training schedules of four teams. Getting to eat his favourites for breakfast with his parents in the same room – the more informal family dining room – was a nice change of pace, too. As much as he loved the Great Hall at Hogwarts, and felt it a nice change of pace at the start of each year, it simply got to be normality by the time the year neared its end.

This year was different though. With his little sister always being around their mother, Draco had gotten to see more of her than he had wanted to. Just now he concentrated on his plate, as Cassiopeia got her own meal directly from mother. Draco had known intellectually that nursing babies was normal, even considered especially beneficial for a child’s development. Seeing it happen, though, was different somehow. But he would learn to cope with the awkwardness of seeing his mother feeding the baby.

Suddenly tea was splattered over the table, and Draco turned in his seat to look at his sputtering and coughing father, the Daily Prophet opened to the society pages in front of him on top of the plate, the tea cup turned over on its side.
“Dear, what's wrong? Are you well?” His mum was quickly out of her seat, baby pressed against her side, rushing over to Draco’s father, leaving Draco floundering.

An elf was called to care for Cassiopeia, and a flurry of spells cast by Narcissa on her husband. Pretty sure that whatever had caused such surprise for his father had been something in the Prophet, Draco snatched the newspaper for himself to read.

He didn’t need to search for long as the headline of the article drew attention on the spot.

Most eligible bachelor still free

Almost a year ago Lord Marvolo Slytherin made his way back into society and has managed to find his footing rather well in the time since then. He has adopted two distant relatives into the Slytherin family, taking care of two vulnerable boys who had no one before Lord Slytherin took them in. The Potter assets are in a better state then since the last Lord Potter died. He is even involved in a reform of the Auror training program.

But all those endeavours have left him no time to find a suitable partner. And so the handsome Lord is still single to this day.

Not that there's a lack of candidates! Don’t think our fair witches didn’t show interest! For one there is Amelia Bones, Head of the Department of Magical Law Enforcement, and godmother of the younger Slytherin boy. Both her roles enable her to spend considerable time with Lord Slytherin. There’s also the fact that they have been seen in the Floating Candle, eating, just the two of them. Maybe they simply are very good at hiding?

Or maybe our reborn wizard, who’s looking much younger than one would expect, is out for someone younger? During the winter holiday season he was seen flirting with Quidditch Players. The Holyhead Harpies and also the witches from all the other teams in the league might have a chance at snatching up this delectable wizard.

Draco skipped to the end of the surprisingly long article to see who had a death wish. Rita Skeeter had been the one to write the scandalous article, and Draco nodded to himself as that sounded credible. That woman had a tendency to write the most polarizing articles she could compose with only marginal references to the facts. One only needed to look at the articles that witch had written during the Tournament, the way she had concentrated on Harry, ignoring the other champions… she really was without fear.

“Thank you, my love.” Lucius still sounded hoarse but was no longer coughing. “I'm fine now. I hope that my reaction didn’t frighten you.”

“You did frighten me for a moment, dear. What did you read to get such a reaction?” Knowing that his mother would probably want to read the article herself, Draco picked up the Prophet folded it so the article was on the top and held it out to her, as she settled back in her seat. “Thank you, Draco.”

He returned his concentration to his breakfast, trying to come up with a plan for the day, around the homework he had to do. Luckily lessons in politics and the dancing and manners lessons for Harry and Hermione he was helping with wouldn’t start until next week. All his planning didn’t prevent him from listening to his parents' discussion, though.

“Is she really insinuating that Lord Slytherin and Lord Black might end up married?” His mother sounded incredulous and almost amused.

“She is.” His father sounded resigned. “I’m not sure how to prevent the Dark Lord from taking revenge on that reporter for her… wild speculation.”

Finishing up his tea, Draco looked up from his plate. “May I be excused? And would it be agreeable for me to visit with Theodore today?”

“Ask first.” His father answered, still looking less than perfect, his hair mussed from his earlier coughing fit. “Enjoy your day, Draco.”

“I will, father.” Draco said, getting up and leaving the room. He was curious how the Dark Lord would react to that article, but it was a morbid curiosity. Not knowing might be better in this instance.

HARRY FELT INEXPLICABLE NERVOUS AS HE ACCEPTED HIS BACKPACK WITH ALL HIS SUPPLIES FROM THE DRIVER MARVOLLO HAD HIRED FOR THIS FIRST DAY. THERE WAS NO ONE HERE WHO WOULD KNOW WHO HARRY WAS. THIS WAS AN OPPORTUNITY TO GET TO KNOW PEOPLE WITHOUT ALL OF HIS BACK STORY – FROM THE HOOLIGAN IMAGE THE DURSLEYS HAD PAINTED OF HIM, TO THE POOR ORPHAN ADOPTED BY THE FORMER EVIL DARK LORD THE MAGICAL WORLD KNEW OF – GETTING IN THE WAY.

And maybe that was contributing to Harry’s nerves. He wanted to get this right. And what would it say about him if it went wrong?

Taking a deep breath to calm himself down, Harry nodded to the driver – as far as he had understood, a near-Squib offering taxi-like services to magical folks – and attempted a smile. “Thank you. You’ll be waiting somewhere around here when the lesson is over?”

“I’ll be here. See you in four hours.” As had been Marvolo’s instructions before he allowed Harry to leave, the man didn’t use any names or titles. Marvolo had cited security reasons, and Harry didn’t feel he had any grounds to argue.

“See you!” Harry waved, shouldered the bag, and started to walk up the stairs into the school building the art class was going to take place in. Before he reached the door, Harry got out a piece of notebook paper where he had written down directions and the number of the room he had to find.

When he made it to the room on the second floor, a man was puttering at the front of the room, and a few people were sitting on chairs in front of empty easels. Muttering a greeting, Harry walked in and sat down at one of the still unoccupied places nearer to the back, and with a clear view of the door. All the talk about security had made Harry twitchy.

Next to each easel was a small table, and Harry started to remove his supplies from the bag and arrange them on the table in a way that seemed practical, his sketchpad and coal pieces in the middle at the front.
“Hi, is this place taken?”

Harry turned to the girl who had spoken, and nodded, then shook his head, feeling a little surprised. She had nice long hair and a lean figure, and was wearing a short skirt combined with a form-fitting t-shirt.

“There’s no one sitting there yet,” Harry clarified his confusing, non-verbal answer, feeling his face go hot. Blushing in this situation, how mortifying.

“Thank you.” Her answer was accompanied by a dazzling smile, before she turned and started to unpack her own supplies.

“Alright everybody!” the teacher called, clapping to gain everyone’s attention. It grew quiet in the room and all ten students turned to face the front of the class. “Welcome! My name is Phil Wilson, but please call me Phil. I’m an art teacher and have given courses like this one for several years now. I see that we have a very wide age range in this course.” He smiled at them all, and Harry silently agreed with the man. The oldest student had white hair already, and the girl who had sat down right next to Harry might be a few years older than he. “Let’s start with an introduction round: your name, age, what you normally do, what you hope to learn in this course. Stuff like that.” He waved at the man – older, almost bald, and dressed casually in shorts and polo shirt – sitting right up front at the wall with the windows, indicating that he should start.

The man turned a little in his chair so that he could see everyone and started to talk. “I’m Connor Roberts. Normally I work in accounting. I started art as a way to decompress after a long day at work. My wife arranged this as a birthday present.” Harry stopped to listen as he worked not to panic. He would need to talk about himself. What should he say? He had to keep magic a secret. He needed to say something to keep the others from being suspicious, but also needed to keep a lot of his life secret. The name was easy enough, but everything else? It had been ages since he had interacted socially for any length of time with muggles. If he didn’t count Hermione’s parents. And that hadn’t been long. A few minutes at most, all in all. And the Dursleys didn’t count. They just didn’t.

“My name’s Emily, I’m seventeen, almost finished with school. I want to take art history once I start university. So I thought taking some art classes would be a good preparation.” She smiled, brightly and Harry took measured breaths to calm down.

“My name is Harry.” He had been registered as Harry Black for the course, with Sirius’ smug approval, but if he didn’t need to give a last name, then he wouldn’t. “I’m fifteen. I gained an interest in art just recently, and I want to get accepted into the art class at my school,” another part of his life he needed to be vague about. “The professor for that class recommended for me to take some classes during the holidays.” He hadn’t lied, which was a good way to start in Harry’s opinion. Fewer chances to slip up later.

“My name is Bethany, Beth.” The woman behind Harry started to speak, she somehow reminded Harry of Mrs. Weasley, with her warm smile and kind eyes. “I take courses in oil painting regularly throughout the year. It’s a lot more fun to work surrounded by people than to do it alone at home.”

Only two more students needed to speak before they all had introduced themselves, and Phil once again brought his hands together with a loud sound – Harry was sure that would get on his nerves eventually – and drew everyone’s attention back to himself.

“Thank you, and welcome to you all. Today and tomorrow we’ll work on deciding and sketching what you want to work on. I’ll explain a few general basic techniques first, and then you can take a look at some of my art catalogues and books.” He indicated a stack of said items he had stacked on
Harry took notes of how oil paints were made – he had an interest in creating his own to incorporate some magical properties – and also took note of the colour theory that Phil explained along the way, together with some pigments used throughout history. Phil’s way of explaining things was kind of confusing, jumping from one topic to the next. But the man had a lot of passion for art, which made listening to him easier.

Soon, or at least it felt soon to Harry, everyone was walking around, picking up some of the books, searching for an idea of what to do for their class project.

“What are you going to pick?” Emily asked, as she sat down at her place, setting down two books on cubism in front of her.

“I think maybe a still life, attempting to get something realistic.” Harry wasn’t really interested in abstract art. Well, it was interesting to look at, but he wanted to get a Master of Magical Art to take him on after school. As far as he knew, there was no abstract magical art.

“Which school is yours?” Emily was idly flipping pages, but she didn’t seem to concentrate on what she was seeing.

“What do you mean?” Food and plants seemed to be a staple of still life paintings.

“Well, which school here in London do you attend? I haven’t seen you around, and even if you’re a bit younger, I feel we should have met before now.” For a moment Harry was stumped. Why would she expect to know him? London was a big city with more than a few schools. Then it dawned. He was once again in expensive clothing, and all his materials were expensive. She had seen that and concluded that his family was rich. There probably were fewer schools in London favoured by the rich, than normal ones. That would make meeting the kids of other rich families more likely. And that wasn’t even taking social functions, and rich neighbourhoods, into account.

“I’ve been attending a private boarding school ever since I was eleven. Our family is rather reclusive. What school are you attending?” Harry really didn’t want to talk about himself. maybe getting her to talk about herself would help.

“The Godolphin and Latymer School.” She laughed and touched Harry on his shoulder, going for playful, making Harry blush more, even as he felt kind of nervous. “But don’t try to change the topic. Do you really call your teachers professor?”

“Yes.” Harry felt a little out of his depth, looked up from the pile of apples he currently was studying, and felt mortified when he got a good look at more cleavage than he had expected and his body reacted.

Not that he didn’t know a teenager’s body could react to the slightest stimulus – robes were a godsend in that regard – but he had a girlfriend and didn’t even know this girl, and she was older!

“That’s odd!” She laughed again, leaning a little in Harry’s direction, prompting him to move his chair a little away from her.

“It’s the way it is. Your school probably has some odd traditions as well. Right?” Harry was really confused right now, and wanted to get some sketching done before the lesson was over. Maybe he should do some herbs and plants drying. Some of the more mundane potion ingredients maybe.

“How are you two doing?” Phil had made his way to where Harry and Emily were sitting, smiling with his hands clasped in front of his belly. “Need any help?”
“I’m thinking about a still life, drying herbs, and a few fresh ones, maybe some tools. Any ideas for a composition, or example from one of your books?” Maybe Emily would leave him be when he was obviously working.

“Interesting idea. Do you know which plants you want to paint? And what tools would match that scene? I have a book on classical proportions at the front, maybe you can look through those and try a few sketches. I’ll bring some references for plants tomorrow. But I fear I don’t have a lot in that direction. You could take a photograph of what you envision and use it as a reference.”

“Thanks, Phil. I think I can get everything I need to stage a photograph for a reference. We have an extensive herb garden.” And a well stocked potions laboratory, but he wouldn’t say that out loud.

“That’s good! Start on your sketches, and don’t hesitate to call if you have any questions. Now, Emily, I will take the risk and hazard a guess: you want to work on a cubistic piece?”

“Yes. I prefer abstract art.” It seemed Emily had taken the hint as she now concentrated on her own sketch and search for what she wanted to do during the coming two weeks.

It was a content and tired Harry who returned home that evening, most of his supplies left at the school, where they would stay until the course was over.

oooOOooo

It had taken him a while to decide if he should even search out his Lord. But in the end Lucius had decided that it was within his responsibility to offer his assistance and ask for his Lord's wishes in this. And Narcissa had agreed, a lot less worried about the Dark Lord cursing any of his followers in retribution after all the changes the man had displayed in his actions.

First Lucius had tried to find his Lord at Griffin House, but there had only been the squib nanny – maybe that arrangement was a better choice than a house elf to take care of a toddler – and the younger son of his Lord.

So Lucius had apparated to Headquarters, which hadn’t seen much use lately, in search of his Lord.

The place was much cleaner than it had been in the beginning, or the last time Lucius had been here for one of the training sessions the Dark Lord asked them to take part in, and while he walked confidently down the hall, the sound of breaking pottery or china got clearer and clearer.

The racket came from the training room – one of the ballrooms cleaned out for meetings and their duelling sessions – and when Lucius dared to step in, after casting a shield charm around himself he spotted the Dark Lord.

He was a spectacular sight. Robes flaring around him with each movement, red eyes blazing, hair bound back with a simple tie, pale wand a blur in the air because of the fast spellcasting. And the number of figurines, cups, plates, and amphorae the Dark Lord was conjuring only to blast them to smithereens and dust in the next instant was more than impressive.

But it was also a testament of great stress or anger. The Dark Lord always had had a tendency to violence to cope with stress, anger, and frustration.

Blasting curses at breakable objects were a method of stress relief Lucius found preferable to casting the cruciatus at his brethren and himself.

His hunch that the Dark Lord was incensed by the article written by Skeeter seemed to have been correct.

Suddenly all noise ceased, and the dust started to settle.

“Lucius, what a surprise. How may I help you?” The Dark Lord slid his wand away in a fluid movement, carefully stepping over some shards on the floor on his way to where Lucius was standing.

He dropped his shield charm, and bowed in greeting. “My Lord, I came here to ask how I may serve you.”

“Was there a specific reason you came here today to ask such?” There was an amused glint in those red eyes – still hard to look at for Lucius, and not only because his Lord was such a good Legilimens – and he was pretty certain that his Lord knew exactly why he had come here today.

But there was nothing for it, here the Dark Lord was Lucius' liege, the man he owed his allegiance to, not a fellow Lord in the Wizengamot he could banter with. “There was, my Lord. I saw the article Rita Skeeter had in the Prophet this morning and wanted to ask what stance you would like me to take on such insinuations and invasion of your privacy.”

The Dark Lord walked past Lucius, waving for him to follow, and seemed unfazed by the question. They ended up in the small study the Dark Lord used regularly for the smaller meetings with only one or two of his Death Eaters, seated on both sides of the massive desk.

“Tea?” Lucius nodded to that casual question a little bewildered. “Henbane. Tea for two and a few of those little pastries, please,” the Dark Lord asked off the air, obviously addressing an elf, as a serving tray with tea, milk and sugar, two cups, and a plate filled with little pastries appeared only a few moments later

The Dark Lord took his time preparing his tea, waving at Lucius to do the same, and sat back once there was a huge amount of sugar thoroughly mixed in with the tea.

“I’m not sure what to do, Lucius. It was invasive, that is true, but it was kind of positive. Wasn’t it? She did paint me as a desirable wizard to marry, doing good for our society…” he trailed off, took a sip from his tea, and shrugged elegantly. “I don’t want to marry anyone, but what should I do to stop her from speculating? I honestly have no idea and am open to suggestions.”

Lucius took a sip from his tea as well and then selected one of the pastries. “I’m not sure what you could do, my Lord. I guess that depends on what your goal is. Keeping Miss Skeeter happy and writing positive if invasive articles is one way to keep up a good reputation in the public’s eye. There aren’t many ways to keep her from writing such stories and keep her happy, though. She tends to tear down those that make her unhappy or give a better story painted in a bad light than in a good one. She’s going to demand an interview, and soon.”

The way the Dark Lord sighed and pinched the bridge of his nose at that proclamation was so human that Lucius felt like pinching himself to make sure he wasn’t dreaming. Maybe he could help his Lord learn how to field questions from Rita Skeeter. “May I make a proposal?”

oooO0000
It had taken longer than he had anticipated to finish all his paperwork and preparation for the Wizengamot meeting this month, so Marvolo stood from his desk well past midnight, stretching and making his back pop to work out the kinks. Casting all those spells to work out his frustrations and then spending the rest of the afternoon being coached by Lucius on how to handle the press hadn’t been as much fun as he had hoped to have this afternoon.

Time to go to bed. Nagini had left the study hours earlier with a huff, stating she was going to curl up with the bubbly hatchling.

Marvolo was at the bottom of the stairs when he heard someone, or something, walking around, maybe coming up from the kitchen? He turned back and heard the person – definitely a person – walk up the stairs from the ground floor. As the wards hadn’t tilled and the footsteps were too heavy to be caused by Marcus, it had to be Harry. But why was he still up?

“Harry? Is everything alright?” Marvolo was looking down at his son, wearing a dressing gown over his light pyjamas, holding a mug with something hot in it, judging by the curls of vapour coming from the surface.

“Can’t sleep,” Harry answered, carefully balancing the cup, and shrugging with only one shoulder. “So I thought getting myself some warm milk might help.”

“You know that you could just have asked Flimm to get you some, right?” There was something more there than Harry was telling. Why had the boy trouble finding sleep?

“I know. But I wanted to get out of bed. Fetching it myself felt like the best idea.” Harry shrugged again and reached the last step, no longer forcing Marvolo to look down on him.

“What is troubling you? I thought you had a pleasant day at your first art class.” Deciding that they wouldn’t have a conversation in the hall just at the top of the stairs, Marvolo gently placed a hand on Harry’s shoulder to steer him towards the parlour.

Harry followed willingly enough, sighing, but not actually talking before they had settled down in the comfortable seats around the fireplace that burned brighter just moments after they had settled down.

“There was this girl. She sat down next to me. Wanted to talk all the time, was asking a lot of questions. I think she was trying to flirt? And it was confusing, and I’m not sure… “ Harry blushed a scarlet red and Marvolo was getting a bad feeling about this. That sounded as if Harry needed some advice on how to handle attraction and his relationship with Miss Lovegood, and Marvolo did not feel confident in any of those fields.

“You’re not sure?” Marvolo prompted. Even feeling out of his depth, this was his duty as a parent. He had known that and he had accepted everything that came with being a father.

“I’m not sure why I reacted… and she’s pretty. Why would I think she’s pretty when I’m in love with Luna? Am I in love with Luna?” Harry looked so lost and confused right now, and Marvolo didn’t feel he was the best person to help him sort his thoughts out, but Lord Black wasn’t in London, not even in Britain, so he had to do.

“I can’t claim to have any experience in any of this. But I think I might be able to help you anyway,” Marvolo started, folding his hands and leaning forward, his elbows resting on his knees. “Correct me if I get something wrong. That girl took the place next to you, and she tried to flirt and kept trying to engage you in a conversation?” Harry nodded, took a sip from his milk but didn’t say anything. “Did that feel good? Were you happy that she was showing an interest in you?” Marvolo remembered quite vividly the annoying hours his classmates had spent teasing each other over the girls, and who might have had a chance to gain a girl’s attention and how they might force that attention.

“No.” Harry sounded unsure. “Once I realized what she was doing, I tried to get her to stop by pretending to be absorbed in my work.” Obviously Harry was sure about that. “But the other... thing...” Blushing teenagers were kind of adorable, but also confusing. Of course Marvolo knew that there was a lot of shame and guilt around sexuality in large parts of society – both muggle and magical – but it was frustrating, because it made his own place so much harder as well.

“I’m pretty sure that if I were to get Healer Greengrass here and ask him, he would tell you that teenage boys quite frequently have such reactions with almost no stimulation or reason at all.” Harry was blushing even more now. “There is no reason to assume that you don’t love Miss Lovegood just because a girl flirted with you and your body had a reaction you had no way of controlling.”

Now Harry was blushing and glaring at Marvolo. “You know, that’s not actually helpful,” he huffed, emptied his mug of milk and set it down on the table, where it promptly vanished.

“I told you that I’m not good with romantic relationships. You could talk with your godfather. He has a lot more experience.”

“That’s not easy with the time difference,” Harry answered despondently, fiddling with the hem of his dressing gown.

“You didn’t do anything wrong. Maybe speak about your girlfriend to make the other girl back off? And if I remember correctly, you’ll be seeing her on Saturday?” He needed to speak with those of his followers who were parents. Maybe they had some more hints for him on how to handle teenagers and their problems.

“Yes, we’ll meet at Theo’s. I’m looking forward to that.” Now Harry was smiling. Maybe distraction was the best way to help his son find the peace of mind to get to sleep.

“How did your project to make a mockup for your project go?” Marvolo had only seen a glimpse of what Harry had set up in the potions laboratory, but it had seemed interesting.

“Yes! It worked rather well, but I’ll have to wait for the picture to be developed. I wish I could take my herbology notes to the class. All the notes next to the drawings would be a problem, though. Can’t risk exposing magic.”

From there their discussion meandered over to the Statute of Secrecy and what advantages and disadvantages this measure brought with it. When they finally went to bed, Harry seemed calmer. Hopefully he would be able to sleep now.

The mother of his heiress made a very good cake. It was a delight to eat and worked well with the tea that he had been offered. Xerxes was quite happy that he had agreed to Hermione’s idea of teaching her at her parents’ home. It gave him more safe immersion into current muggle culture. Or rather, the British variant of muggle culture. It hopefully would make speaking and interacting with the parents of the muggle-born students of his elementary school easier.

They currently were contacting a rather impressive number of new possible students, and some reactions had been rather strange. Luckily the number of magical children still in the foster care system had almost dropped to zero. Not that Xerxes gave in to any illusions over the number of children probably living in less-than-ideal conditions.

“I’m going to leave for the office,” Jean said from the door, jacket already put on, a smile on her face. “Do you need anything?”

“No, I think we have everything, Mum,” Hermione said with a smile, turning in her seat to look at her mother.

“I’ll be back late, darling. I hope you have a successful lesson.” And with that parting call she was gone.

“So let’s start on some political discussion. Did you have time to read some more of the files of Wizengamot sessions of the past?” There was a lot that Hermione still needed to learn that others of her station learned from the cradle up. She learned fast, and that worked in her favour, but it was still a lot to take in.

“Yes, I did,” Hermione answered, tucking a strand of her hair behind one ear. “And I have a lot of question on why flying carpets were actually banned on the British islands. What's written in the protocols as reasons given seem pretty useless to me.”

Xerxes smiled, she had such an analytical mind. “You’re right, the claims that the safety of the statute would be compromised were pushed forward into the public eye to cover up more mundane and financial reasons to ban them.” Xerxes eyed her and narrowed his eyes. “You’re upset about something not connected with shady practices in an attempt to protect the broom market in Britain. What is on your mind, Hermione?”

The girl gave a frustrated growl, that had Xerxes’ brows wing up in surprise. “Have you read the Prophet recently? That rag pretending to be a newspaper?” Xerxes just had to smile at her righteous fury, and her wild hand movements. “That horrid Skeeter has written a… an insulting article!” It seemed as if Hermione was having trouble finding the right words to express what she wanted to say.

“You’re referring to the article about the most eligible bachelor?” Xerxes put an amused spin on the last three words. He had been highly entertained while reading the article.

“Yes!” Hermione agreed with emphasis, spinning around from where she had started to pace. “It’s condescending! Implying that all women want is to marry someone rich, and that no one can be happy if they aren’t married! Where will she go next? Claim that Marcus and Harry aren’t safe or happy with Lord Slytherin? She would crush Harry if she did something like that!” Hermione stomped over to the nearest armchair and let herself fall into it with a huff. “She had no right!”

“I understand your frustration. But I fear that there’s little that can be done here. Miss Skeeter didn’t write anything wrong, everything is factually correct, and all speculations are easily recognizable as just that. I agree that she did exaggerate more than a little, but that is her usual style and the reason people love to read what she writes.” Xerxes knew only too well how people like Rita Skeeter were. He had had his share of trouble just after Halloween 1981.

“The public has a peculiar view on what they need to know. People of public interest are called that with good reason. Everyone who’s reasonably well known is a figure of public interest. Above all, those people are Quidditch players, the few musicians we have, members of rich families, members of the Wizengamot… I think you understand what I’m trying to say. As long as the press stays away from stalking someone, or character assassination, there isn’t much to be done, and I think you’ll have an easier time later, when you're Lady Lestrange in the Wizengamot, if you start to accept and work with it instead of fighting a losing battle.”

She growled low in her throat and Xerxes just knew that it would take a long time to convince Hermione Granger, Gryffindor, that there were things that couldn’t be fought.

“Dear, the human nature isn’t that easily changed, if it is possible at all. I may be old but I do remember how urgent everything is when one is a teenager.” In fact that urgency had helped Tom convince Xerxes to follow him. “I don’t think that you’ll be able to change the way Miss Skeeter and others write for those wanting to read just such drivel. But you might be able to work on other things. Like the still lingering prejudices. Don’t become a Don Quixote, my dear. Try to go for possible goals first, Hermione.”

Chapter End Notes

I have no idea how to work with oil paints, but it was fun writing the arts class! Do any of you have a favourite type of art?

Chapter Notes

Thanks to everyone who shared their favoured type of art with me. There's a lot I like to watch, or listen to, and a few things I like to do myself. I want to start watercolour, and am working on drawing, some, but creating something tangible and useful is more mine than things to just look at.
And now have fun reading the new chapter I've crafted by weaving words into sentences.

Saturday, 6th of July 1996

“Do you have everything?” Marvolo asked his two sons for the tenth time that morning. At least it felt like the tenth time. He still wasn’t used to being that worried. Being a parent required a lot of adjustment. Even after weeks of being one. With Harry at school it had been easier, somehow.

“Yes, dad. We have everything.” Harry was rolling his eyes, but he was also smiling.

Before Marvolo could say more, Marcus started up a chant of “Let’s go! Let’s go!” and Marvolo decided to do exactly that.

He stepped towards the mantle of the fireplace and picked up the container with the floo powder to hold it out to Harry who was also holding his broom. “Harry you’ll go first, Marcus and I will be right behind you, so please don’t linger in front of the fireplace once you're through. And if you should end up somewhere else, just use your portkey and return home. Any more questions?”

Marvolo would feel better about sending his son through the floo on his own once he had a little more practice.

“No, Dad. I think I know what to do.” Harry took a pinch of the powder and stepped up towards the fireplace, loose linen robes flapping around his shins. He threw the powder down into the flames, tinting them green, stepped in and called out “Nott Manor” vanishing while he started to spin.

To give Harry a moment to arrive and step out of the way, Marvolo held out his hand to Marcus before he set the pot down back on the mantle. “Do you have any questions, Marcus?” He only got a head shake in answer, and felt his son’s grip on his hand tighten. “Then stay close and keep your elbows in.”

Moments later the two of them vanished in a flash of green light, spinning quickly in place, different fireplaces flashing by. Once they slowed down, Marvolo took a measured step out of the floo-network, supporting a stumbling Marcus and entering the blue and mermaid themed reception room in Nott Manor.

Harry was standing near to the fireplace, covered in soot and deep in conversation with the Nott Heir. “You look good without glasses! What did make you decide to go through with healing your
With a flick of his free hand Marvolo removed the soot from both Marcus and himself, before turning to Harry and drawing the teenagers attention by removing the soot from his older son.

“Lord Slytherin!” Theodore Nott startled visibly, before bowing a little deeper than was necessary, once he had turned to look to where Marvolo was standing.

“Heir Nott,” Marvolo greeted back, inclining his head and smirking at the flush of embarrassment on the teen’s cheeks. “I agreed to accompany Aiden to the birthday party, do you know where he is?”

“Father said they would be down here momentarily, Lord Slytherin.” It was painfully obvious how uncomfortable his son’s friend was, almost running away and fidgeting with his robe buttons.

“Don’t wait here on my account. I’m pretty sure you have other guests you need to tend to.” Harry had recounted the expected children just this morning over breakfast. “Have fun, and I expect you back for dinner, Harry.”

“Yes thing, Father,” Harry said with a smile, shouldering his broom. “Have fun at your party, Marcus. And tell your friend Happy Birthday from me.”

Marcus only nodded, keeping a look out for Aiden who also was invited to the birthday party.

It didn’t take long after both Theo and Harry had left for Benjamin and little Aiden to turn up, the boy dressed in shorts and a t-shirt – just like Marcus – a small knapsack on his back. “You’re already here. I’m sorry it took us so long, but Aiden insisted that we should wrap the present without magic, and neither one of us has a lot of experience with that.”

The image of Benjamin Nott and his son Aiden struggling with wrapping paper and spell-o-tape almost made Marvolo smile. But that probably would have scarred Benjamin – there hadn’t been much Marvolo had smiled about during the last war – so Marvolo did hide it.

“So everything is ready now?” Marvolo asked the small boy, holding his adopted father’s hand.

“Yes, sir. We wrapped the present in really nice paper. The butterflies move around!”

“That sounds pretty. If it’s alright with your father, I would suggest that we leave now. You both certainly don’t want to be late, do you?”

Earnest shakes of small heads was his answer, and Aiden walked over to hold Marvolo’s hand. “You’ll be picking them up later?” Marvolo directed his question to Benjamin. They had arranged everything beforehand, but it always was good to check.

“Just as we discussed, Marvolo.” There was a slight pause of hesitation before Benjamin used Marvolo’s chosen name, but one by one his Death Eaters got more comfortable with the changed dynamics. “And if there should be anything preventing me from picking our children up, I’ll send an elf to inform you and arrange a different way for them to get home.”

Marvolo planned on having Flimm keep an eye on Marcus the whole day – in fact he had ordered the elf to do so before going down to breakfast – so it wouldn’t be a problem anyway. But contingency plans were a good thing to have.

“Keep a good grip on my hands, you two, and take a deep breath and exhale when I give the signal.” Marvolo checked on both boys before calling up the image of the alley they were going to
He had checked the place out as soon as Marcus had been invited to the birthday party of one of the muggle-born girls in his son’s class.

“Now.” When the boys started to exhale Marvolo turned on the spot, drawing them in tight, concentrating on their destination, apparating to the nice village in the North of England.

Once they arrived it took a few moments – and a stomach-soother per boy – to mitigate the effects of apparation before they started to walk towards the house with its garden decorated with garlands, balloons, and lampions. The sound of playing children was a dead give-away as well.

Soon Marvolo had dropped off the two little wizards at a muggle house in a muggle neighbourhood. It was an odd situation. But the mother of the birthday girl had a friend over who was a witch, so the group of magical school children wasn’t without competent supervision.

Smiling to himself when he, without effort, thought that Harry would frown at that phrasing, and corrected that thought to clarify the competent to act in a magical emergency, Marvolo walked away back to the alley. He had a lot to do today, with the children out of the house for a longer time. Better get to it.

ooOoo

“You got rid off those ugly glasses!” was the first thing Draco said when Harry followed Theo out of the house and into the garden.

Harry laughed and shook his head. Trust Draco to make an almost Gryffindor-brash announcement like that while also being an obnoxious git about it. “How is life with a baby sister, Malfoy?”

Harry teased, setting his broom right next to the others against the wall of the house. “I guess your manor is big enough to get lost in, so she probably doesn’t wake you in the middle of the night crying because she’s hungry?”

“I’m lucky we’re rich. Her room is far enough from mine. And you know that there are silencing wards and charms that can be put on walls, right?” Draco was grinning from ear to ear, enjoying their bantering.

“Who else is here already?” Harry asked of Theo, who was standing right next to them, amused by their quips.

“Hermione is down by the herb garden, asked if she could look at what we have in there. She wants to write an essay about typical magical household gardens for herbology, or something.”

“Wait,” Harry interrupted his friend, “I thought we were to write an essay about one plant and its care?” Had he forgotten part of their homework?

“Yes. She said something about extra credit work?” Theo didn’t sound too sure, but it would fit with Hermione. She tended to go overboard with her efforts for school. there simply was no denying that. “Neville was also interested and went with her. Luna is somewhere over there.” Theo waved towards where Harry knew the owlery to be, “She said something about some Wrackspurts over there she wanted to shoo away?”

“I’ll go say hello to her then,” Harry decided, after all he hadn’t seen her since the train back to London, and he needed to talk with her about Emily and her insistent flirting that was getting on his nerves. Talk of his girlfriend from school hadn’t worked as a deterrent like Harry had hoped.

“Sure. When a few of the others are here I would like to have a pickup Quidditch game before there will be cake and such later,” Theo said, nodding agreeably.

Not sure if and how to bring up Ginny, Harry simply nodded his agreement and made off towards the owlery in search of Luna. The whole situation with Theo and Ginny and their families was like a hornets’ nest. Not worth disturbing only for his curiosity's sake.

It didn’t take Harry long to find his girlfriend sitting on the grass near the owlery, an owl perched on her knee, letting itself being petted.

With a smile and nervous butterflies in his stomach Harry approached Luna, enchanted by the blonde strands of hair dancing in the almost non-existing wind. There always was something magical about her.

“Hi there!” he greeted once he was near enough, sitting down right next to her, folding his legs in tailor fashion.

“Harry! I missed you!” Luna moved closer to Harry, giving him first a quick peck on the lips, and then moving back in for a much longer kiss.

“I missed you too.” Hearing how breathless he sounded made Harry flush, but he also was really happy. He really had missed her.

“How is your art class? You did start one already, didn’t you?” In typical Luna fashion her attention was on the owl again, giving head scratches that seemed to be just in the right spot.

Not having her eyes on him made talking so much easier. “The class is great. The teacher, Phil, knows a lot and can explain really well. I have decided to paint a still life, herbs being prepared and dried, and have been trying different layouts all through class yesterday. And the other students are mostly nice too. I’m the youngest. But there’s this girl, Emily, she’s getting on my nerves.” Harry swallowed. Why did he tend to ramble when he was nervous?

“What did she do to be so irritating? Do you think she might have a problem with nargles?” Luna didn’t stop petting the owl, but Harry knew she was listening attentively even while seeming distracted.

“She’s always flirting with me. And doesn’t stop even though I said I have a girlfriend. It’s irritating,” Harry huffed, only barely happy with that explanation. The fact that her perfume and the clothes she had chosen to wear on Friday once again had gotten his body’s attention was bothering him a lot. But he had no idea how to talk about that. It was all so embarrassing.

“Is she pretty?” Luna asked, tilting her head as if she wanted to get a better angle for looking at the owl on her knee.

“Emily?” Luna managed time and again to react in surprising ways, so Harry was confused, and trying to decide what he or someone else would call pretty. “I guess? She does try to look good. Makeup and clothes and stuff.” What was Luna getting at? And was there even any reason to her question?

“Did you kiss?” The serene smile somehow made that question creepy. Why had Harry wanted to tell Luna about Emily again?

“No!? Why would I want to? I don’t even know her! And you’re my girlfriend! That would be…
simply wrong!” For a moment Harry longingly thought back to the days before Hogwarts. Life at the Dursleys' had been hard and boring, but predictable. This here was so confusing, terribly confusing.

“There’s nothing wrong with looking, Harry. Or with more if all agree,” Luna shrugged, still smiling. She looked up and tilted her head again like a curious puppy. “You’re cute, Harry. I’m not angry for something Emily is doing. Don’t worry so much. Are there Wrackspurts in the room you have your art class in?”

That made Harry laugh and lean close into Luna’s space, which led to them kissing, for quite some time.

ooOoo

“Where have you two been?” Hermione turned in her seat at the table on the porch – the lemonade was very good, not too sweet and refreshingly tart – as Draco called out to someone behind her.

When she spotted Harry and Luna, holding hands, walking towards them she smiled. It was so nice to see Harry so happy enjoying simple things.

“Why should we tell you?” Luna asked, sounding puzzled, before sitting down in Harry’s lap the moment he had settled down in one of the empty chairs.

“Are we going to play a game of quidditch now?” Harry asked, obviously in an attempt to change the topic. But that wouldn’t do. Or well, Hermione wanted to change the topic too, but to something serious, not that silly game.

“Have you read that horrible article that Skeeter woman published a few days ago?” Even after she had had time to think about the article – taking everything Uncle Xerxes had said into account – she still got angry every time she thought about it. She wanted to act, and acting without getting Harry’s input would not be right. He was affected. She shouldn’t act without his approval.

Harry rolled his eyes, which made Hermione bristle. Why couldn’t he take this seriously? “Yes, I’ve seen it. Father was not happy, but she didn’t lie. And I know you remember the terms of her agreement with you. She didn’t break it. We don’t gain anything if we get angry about it.”

“Harry!” Why was he always so contrary? “I don’t believe you! That article didn’t make you angry? Isn’t still making you angry? She may not be lying, but she speculates to a totally unreasonable degree. We can’t let her get away with that!”

“What agreement?” Theo injected a question from where he was sitting next to Draco, interrupting before Harry could react to Hermione’s question.

“Not really important, Theo.” Harry waved that question away, turning a suddenly serious look at Hermione. “You have seen those women’s magazines, those with gossip in them, like My Weekly. What Skeeter wrote isn’t that different from what’s written about celebrities anywhere in the world. And they tend to go even more overboard. Please, you don’t need to be offended on our behalf.”

In her frustration – why was Harry so dense about such things? – Hermione threw up her hands, barely refraining from grabbing her own hair which would ruin her hairdo. “But she’s projecting harmful prejudices and expectations from society through that rubbish! Don’t you see all the damage she’s doing by writing this drivel?”

To Hermione’s confusion Harry pinched the bridge of his nose in a way reminiscent of Professor Snape before he took a deep breath, and opened his eyes. The moment he started to speak, Hermione felt her frustration grow at his tone. “You won’t change prejudices like those by putting pressure on one journalist. Not even in such a small community like ours. You know that people don’t like being told that what they do isn’t right. I can see it in your eyes, Hermione, you don’t like that I don’t seem to agree. Am I right?”

Hermione narrowed her eyes. Then she huffed, closing her eyes. Harry was right, but it was so frustrating. “Excuse me for a while, please.” Hermione stood and left to ponder her approach to this problem. Before she was out of earshot she heard Theodore ask. “Seriously, Harry, what agreement?”

She picked up her pace and walked down to the nice bench that stood near the herb garden. The others probably would stay away from there, giving her the time she needed to calm down and come up with a plan.

A tentative one would be enough for a start.

ooooOoooo

One of the elves had informed Benjamin that there were two visitors waiting for him in the reception room, so Benjamin was on his way there to greet his visitors. Probably more of Theo’s friends from school. He had invited quite a few of them, and Benjamin was happy that his son’s circle of friends had grown over the past year.

When he reached the room he was surprised to see Arthur Weasley standing there with his sole daughter right beside him. The girl seemed to be vibrating with tension and anticipation, almost enough to float up from the ground. Benjamin wasn’t really sure if it was a good idea for the two of them to enter into a relationship, but as they were teenagers a certain amount of experimentation and impulsive decisions were expected.

Not that this knowledge of teenagers and their antics was helping him keep calm and act reasonable in this situation.

“Mr. Weasley, welcome to my home. Am I to assume that your daughter is here on Theodore’s invitation?” Reminding himself to be polite as Theo had claimed that he currently was interested in marrying Miss Weasley once they both had finished their education – as earnest as he had been, the possibility this would change was high – Benjamin smiled and waited for the other wizard to answer.

“That’s correct, Lord Nott. I’m here because my wife insisted I make sure that Ginny knows what is expected of her.” And Benjamin as the host, went unsaid. “And to agree on a time when I’ll be back to pick her up. She also wanted to make sure that Ginny isn’t alone with the boys.” Benjamin held back a smile when he saw Mr. Weasley roll his eyes.

“Hermione Granger and Luna Lovegood are here already. And the Greengrass sisters might arrive later. Theo told me the whole list of friends he invited, but to my shame I don’t remember them all.” Interesting to see that Mrs. Weasley insisted on following one of the oldest pure-blood traditions, but only for her daughter as far as Benjamin could see. “You can come pick your daughter up before dinner.”

“Sounds reasonable,” Mr. Weasley said, nodding to his daughter, who bobbed a curtsey towards Benjamin before dashing off to the garden, or so Benjamin assumed.

“I’m sorry for her behaviour,” Mr. Weasley said, exasperated.

“No reason to be. Theo has been jittery the whole time since the children have been back from Hogwarts. I’m sure they have been waiting for this weekend. It must have felt like an eternity.” Benjamin knew how it had felt to not be able to see his love for an extended time. He still felt his loss from time to time, as if it had happened just days before, not years.

“Probably.” Mr. Weasley sighed. “I’ll be back to pick her up.”

“See you then,” Benjamin nodded, and waited until the flames went back to their normal red from the green tint floo powder caused, before turning on his heel and returning to his study. He probably would be interrupted again, but there were letters to read and answers to be written.

How long do we want to wait until we go play a round of Quidditch?” Draco asked after Hermione had stormed off and Harry had – once again – declined to explain what agreement he had alluded to. The lemonade was great, but sitting here and talking wasn’t why Draco had come. He wanted to fly and play.

“I guess until enough people are here?” Neville said, shrugging. “I will not touch a broom. And I think Hermione isn’t up to flying either. So that leaves, Harry and Luna, as well as you, Draco, and Theo… What, would you play two against two?”

“We could play one chaser and keeper against each other. Or two chasers without keeper. I want to play!” Draco knew he was whining but he really had looked forward to flying and didn’t want to wait any longer.

“We could.” Harry agreed, darting a look over to where Theo was playing with a small, thin piece of wood. “What do you think, Theo?”

“Hu?” Theo looked up, clearly not aware of what Harry had asked him.

“What do you think of playing two against two until the others are here? Do you know if Ginny and the others will be here soon?” Harry asked and Draco rolled his eyes. They could simply play, why were they talking?

“No idea when they’ll be here. But there’s a still a chance that she’ll be here.” Theo held up the small piece of wood he had been fiddling with. “I asked father to charm two pieces for me. I placed one into the letter for Ginny and asked her to snap it if her parents refuse to let her come.” He held up his piece. “Mine would snap as well. But it’s still whole.”

“So you want to wait and do nothing until your girlfriend’s here?” Draco moaned in annoyance. “Why are you romantic fools so pathetic?”
Harry had the audacity to laugh, but Draco's indignation quickly changed to dread when a dangerous gleam started in those green eyes. “And when will you join the ranks of the lovesick fools, Draco? I’m sure Pansy would be willing to help.”

Before Draco could come up with a good answer to that a person ran out of the house and jumped Theo. The person had red hair and Draco was pretty sure that it had to be the Weasley girl.

“Good, let’s start playing!” Draco stood and clapped his hands together. If he didn’t force the others to start already, it might never come to a game. “Okay! Harry and I against Theo and Ginny.
Or do you want to play, Luna?”

“No, that’s fine. I like watching more than playing.” She didn’t even look at him. That girl was strange, but she was Harry’s girlfriend not his, so why should he complain?

“And we can switch after a while.” Ginny agreed, her cheeks flushed. “Can I borrow a broom? I didn’t bring one.”

“You can have one of mine. Let’s move over to the pitch.” It wasn’t really a pitch like they had at their manor, or like the one at Potter Manor, more a big stretch of relatively flat grass. But it was enough for a pick-up game with a few friends.

Laughing and talking animatedly, everyone – with the exception of Granger who was still sulking – walked over to the pitch a few moments later. Maybe this would get to be a great afternoon.

And maybe Draco would manage to find out what exactly that agreement was between Skeeter and Granger. Probably had something to do with the articles during the tournament fiasco, and possibly something with the beetle like qualities that witch had.

Not really caring one way or the other – he was just curious – Draco claimed the spot of chaser on his team and swooped up into the air on his broom, hair blowing in the wind, calling out a whoop of joy.

It was afternoon when Bill apparated over to Griffin House where Marvolo had suggested they meet for the start of preparations and planning.

While everything before had been exhilarating and out of what was normal, even for a curse-breaker, removing the portion of a soul from a living being was so much more daunting. That the living being in this case was human, and a child, and someone Bill knew and actually liked, made the whole situation so much worse.

The door was opened by an elf Bill hadn’t seen before, bowing as seemed to be custom, and walking quickly to stay ahead of Bill while leading him to the study Marvolo normally used. The first thing Bill noticed the moment he stepped into the study was the desk covered in papers, letters, and books. Once he had settled down in one of the visitor chairs, it became clear that nothing of what was covering the desk had to do with the ritual they had worked on, or horcruxes.
It looked more like books about laws and estate management, as well as a lot of letters of normal conversation, invitations, business proposals and the like.

“Who’s that elf? Have I seen it before?” Bill really wasn’t sure, he didn’t pay that much attention to house elves when he came into contact with them, which didn’t happen all that often usually.

“His name is Henbane, he’s my personal elf, and I have no idea if you have met before,” Marvolo said, writing some last word with a flourish onto one piece of parchment before looking up. “Hi, Bill. Thanks for coming.”

“You know that I want to help. Why shouldn’t I come when you ask me for help?” Bill shrugged. “What exactly do you need my help for now? I’m not an expert in laws or any of that high-society… stuff.” Bill waved at the mess on the desk, tilting his head in question. “There isn’t even a date coming up that I think would be especially beneficial for this ritual.” Bill felt reluctant to really speak out loud what they would have to do, hopefully to remove something from Harry that had no place to be stuck in him.

“We have a blue moon this month, Bill. We decided that a day of power is too dangerous, because it’s too powerful, but any normal day could be too weak. A second full moon in a month is not a situation that happens all that often, but it isn’t rare either. I know that means we’ll be rather short of time to prepare everything we need. But I’m not comfortable leaving the horcrux where it is, longer than necessary. And with Harry being at school most of the year, opportunities are rare as it is.” Marvolo sighed and waved a hand, neatening up the random stacks into something resembling a planned mess rather than a haphazard one.

“A blue moon… yes, that could work. When is it? The 30\textsuperscript{th}, right? That leaves us with more than three weeks for preparation. I think that’s enough. We’ve come to a place where we can replicate the ritual adequately, but we might want to adapt some of the surrounding parameters.”

Bill made a face, that sounded much too stuck-up and clinical. He rubbed a hand over his face, taking a deep breath.

“Like what?” Marvolo didn’t sound his best, leaning back in his chair.

“Another healer on scene, so there is one for you and one for Harry, for starters,” Bill said without a moment’s hesitation. “I think using the Malfoys’ ritual room is a good idea, after it's been cleaned once more. It’s very well made.” Then Bill fell quiet when things came to mind that needed sorting but were kind of gruesome to contemplate.

“I also should prepare for the eventuality that the ritual goes wrong… don’t you think?”

Unhappy that his fear had been said out loud, Bill gave Marvolo a dark look. “If you fear something might go wrong now, you should have feared something going wrong before now while you did the same ritual in experimental form several times, Marvolo.”

Now it was Marvolo who shrugged. “Maybe because I was missing several pieces of my soul when I started out experimenting? This is the last piece, and it’s really small. Maybe I’m back to being almost normal? The fact I’m now also responsible for two children, one of them still really young, might have changed my perception of things.”

Bill inclined his head, conceding the point.

“So, updating your Will?” Bill winced, that sounded so bad. “Or maybe finding a different way? One that isn’t risking your life? We could include a few more rune sequences into the circle to protect you.” That idea had merit and set Bill’s mind on a merry chase for possible ways to do that and not risk the integrity of the circle.

“Sounds like a reasonable precaution. As well as the second healer. I'll have to see who might be available and able, as well as willing, to help. Any suggestions?” Marvolo pulled out an empty sheet of parchment and picked his quill back up, starting on what looked like a list of tasks.

“What about the healer that works at St. Mungo's as an expert on the consequences of dark magic? I know he’s really good, he helped quite a few curse-breakers I know. And didn’t he work with Dumbledore after he was subjected to that unique curse last year?” Bill offered as an option.

“Do you think he can be trusted? I’m pretty sure what we plan to do isn’t actually legal, even as I’m also pretty confident that it’s not exactly illegal either. I would rather not ruin the lives of my sons and myself, because I involve someone new at this stage.” Bill narrowed his eyes, there was the slightest glimmer in Marvolo’s eyes that indicated some hidden amusement. They had spent a lot of time together.

“Yes,” Bill answered slowly, while trying to puzzle out what was amusing Marvolo so much, “he’s proven himself trustworthy.”

“That’s good.” Marvolo was smirking now, and when Bill growled in frustration, he had the audacity to chuckle. “Let it rest, Bill. I’m pretty sure you don’t want to know.” Bill gave an exasperated sigh, but let it go. Marvolo had a past – a dangerous, dark, murderous past – and Bill really didn’t want to know too many details.

“So two healers, a freshly cleaned ritual room, a reworked Will… what else needs to be done?” Bill tried to steer the conversation back on topic.

“I need to find someone to look after Marcus for a few days. I think both Harry and I will probably need to rest after we are finished. Maybe I’ll ask Benjamin if Marcus can have a sleepover with Aiden.” The quill moved over the parchment, adding another item to the list.

“Do you intend to inform Madame Bones that there might be a risk of her…” Bill couldn’t speak it, maybe it was superstition but talking about the things that needed to be done if a ritual went wrong wasn’t something done by those taking part in the preparation. It simply was bad luck and therefore not done.

“I’m not sure… maybe in general terms? That I intend to reverse something that is still a danger, and that I don’t want to involve anyone not needed in it. I also would ask you to read my first draft of a book. I need some feedback on presentation of the information, and if it is not too biased. I want it to be a deterrent by providing all the information I didn’t have. But I’m not unbiased, and I know you have enough knowledge to adequately judge the content, and are also stable and grounded enough not to be tempted.”

It took a moment for Bill to notice that Marvolo was holding a stack of loosely bound parchment pieces into his direction. When he had taken in the mixed compliment, Bill took the draft from Marvolo and looked at the first page, which showed only name of the author and title – annotated with working draft – and Tom Marvolo Riddle, Lord Marvolo Slytherin, also known as Lord Voldemort was noted as the author. “That’s thorough,” was all Bill could say, still too shocked to say anything else.

“I wanted to provide some context. There’s also a rather personal introduction. The order might seem counter intuitive, but I plan to charm it so that a reader can’t skip forward without reading every single page. So all deterents and all the important information of the adverse effects can’t be skipped before one reaches the information on how to create horcruxes.” Marvolo seemed oddly calm about the whole thing while Bill was wondering what his mother would say if she saw him reading something like that.
“You can write in the margins, mark words, whatever you need to make your point. This is an extra copy. I charmed it to be unreadable for anyone who didn’t receive it directly from my hand. I don’t want to get you into trouble.”

“Thanks,” was all that could be said to that. “Do you want to make a plan for preparations, like practising the whole ritual and its steps?” Bill really felt they would feel better about the whole situation if they were sure about the steps and secure in the knowledge that they had done everything they could in preparation.

“Let’s do that,” Marvolo agreed, picking up another piece of parchment to draw up a schedule.

Wednesday, 10th of July

A summer storm was raging outside the cabin Charlie lived in, and Ron folded the letter Harry had sent with Hedwig several days ago, back into its original shape. It had been a long letter, expressing happiness over Ron’s sudden luck in being able to visit his brother, talking at length over Hermione’s newest obsession with Rita Skeeter and her tendency to exaggerate, and behind it all hope that they would have time to play quidditch together once Ron was back in England.

He felt bad about uprooting the plans they had made on the train, and about not writing sooner. So he got out Charlie's inkwell and one of the quills – it looked like it had been burned at the edges – and started on a letter to his friend.

Hi Harry,

*Sor*ry*ry for taking so long. It’s so exciting here! Charlie hasn’t let me too close to the dragons. Not as close as you were when you tried to get that egg. But still closer than sitting in those stands let me be. And they are huge! I have to tell you it’s great that dad convinced mum to let me go. You know her. She didn’t think it would be a good idea for me to be here.

I like the people here. They’re so laid-back and easygoing. Not such stuck-up pricks like the people Percy works with. It’s funny how almost all of them wear their hair short, or even shaved. Even the witches! I guess the danger of setting it on fire when near the dragons, or their eggs, makes that the better choice. A few have long hair but braided really close to the head. It looks kind of neat. Do you think it would look good on me? But I would have to have my hair grow out… a potion would work. I wonder why Snape has long hair while always working around flames and fumes. And not even tied back. Can you imagine Hermione with her hair really short?

If I’m lucky I can stay another two weeks. Currently the weather is terrible, a storm with thunder and heavy rain is forcing us to stay inside. Even the dragons have hunkered down to ride the weather out. But the cabin is great. There are bunk-beds and a small fireplace made from stones you can find all around here. The rain blows against the windows. I think they would break if there wasn’t a charm on them to prevent that.
Next week a clutch of abandoned eggs are expected to be hatching. First I wasn’t sure if I wanted to come close to those mini beasts. You remember Norbert? Baby dragons are still dragons, way too many sharp teeth for my liking. But the dragon handlers here do know what they’re doing. More than Hagrid did. For one thing, they only build their cabins out of stone and specially treated wood that's covered with stone on the outside. Nothing can burn here.

No, that’s not completely correct, almost all the trees are heavily burned. I guess that’s what happens when there are grown dragons around.

This place is so big that we need to use brooms to get from one point to the other. I think I could do something like that if I don’t manage to get onto a Quidditch Team. Do you think there will be scouts from the teams at our games next year? It would be absolutely great to have that opportunity! Think you’ll play again? Maybe against Hufflepuff? I think as long as you don’t play seeker against us I think you should absolutely play!

Charlie has dinner finished, so I’ll wrap up. Will have to wait for better weather before I can send this letter. Hope your holidays are as much fun as mine!

See you!

Ron

Leaving the letter out so the ink hopefully would dry, Ron went over to eat the scrambled eggs with sausages Charlie had made. He was ravenous!

It had been one of those long and boring sessions, tedious beyond belief. Marvolo was happy that it was over, and judging by the way Harry rolled his shoulders as they both stood from the Slytherin seat – Harry had opted to sit with Marvolo and let the man explain instead of sitting in the Potter seat and writing a report later – and made their way over to the almost obligatory mingling after the session.

“Can I go over and talk a while with Neville?” Harry asked from just next to Marvolo’s elbow, all manners and respect. He had learned a lot since Marvolo had adopted Harry.

“Of course. Don’t leave the vicinity. Be prepared to leave soon. I don’t think we’ll stay much longer.” Marvolo gave his permission, smiling, and his glamoured eyes – would the last ritual return them from red to the colour they had been before? – searching the room for Amelia. He wanted to speak with her.

“Thanks, Dad.” Harry whispered while already starting to make his way over to where his friend was standing next to his grandmother.
Moments later Marvolo spotted Amelia in a conversation with Cornelius and a few other department heads. Nodding to a few of the others as he walked past, Marvolo made his way over, catching her eyes with his request for a talk.

When she nodded almost imperceptibly, Marvolo changed his course subtly to walk over to a more secluded spot. This time he would erect some privacy charms. Even though he didn’t plan to make too-obvious statements where others might see or hear.

“You looked bored out of your mind there. If not for your son sitting next to you I’m almost sure you would have dozed off like Lord Ogden,” Amelia said the moment she had made her way over to where Marvolo was waiting.

Marvolo chuckled, adding a charm for a backrest was a nice idea, before shaking his head. “Well, it certainly wasn’t the most exciting one.”

“What do you want to talk about? You certainly wouldn’t go to all that trouble,” Amelia waved her hand around, clearly indicating the privacy charms Marvolo had raised, “if you wanted to organise a time for Marcus and I to meet.”

“True. I wanted to inform you that I’m going to adjust my Will to see to it that you will be the one holding Marcus’ inheritance in trust for him until he comes of age should something happen to me.” In fact Marvolo already had finished those parts of the preparations for the final horcrux retrieval ritual. “Dowager Longbottom will do the same for Harry.”

“Why the sudden concern over something happening to you, Marvolo? You’re not really old. And while you might have a rather large number of possible enemies, you also are one of the most accomplished duellers currently alive. You can protect yourself.” Her eyes narrowed. “Do you plan something foolish?”

Marvolo gave her his best “who-me?” look, before he answered. “There’s still some stuff around I need to take care of. And no, I can’t let more people in to make it safer. And yes, I’ll let you know once I have finished with what I need to do, and if you can provide help.”

Amelia huffed and rolled her eyes. “I’ve got a feeling that I don’t really want to know more. So the only thing left to do is for me to wish you luck. Be careful and get as much help as you can. Promise me that. Marcus and Harry need you.” She placed her hand on his arm, emphasising her point.

Marvolo placed one of his own hands on top of hers and squeezed before letting his arm fall to his side. “I promise.”

They parted ways without exchanging further words, knowing that it would be pointless in this moment.

Marvolo collected his son, only greeting Dowager Longbottom and the Longbottom Heir briefly, before walking out and making their way to the foyer where they planned to use the floo to get home.

Harry needed more practice with that method of travel.

“Lord Slytherin! A moment of your time, please!”

Taking a deep breath, Marvolo braced himself for the assault of questions he expected from Rita Skeeter. He had trained for this with Lucius’ help. He would get through this with dignity and without losing her goodwill.
“Keep calm and let me answer her questions, Harry,” Marvolo said before raising his occlumency shields to full power and turning to face the ruthless reporter Rita Skeeter to answer questions. Calmly and with dignity.

Chapter End Notes

kind of a cliffhanger :D
Some of you probably have already noticed that I'm wrapping this story up. We're coming close to the end I had planned from the beginning. If everything goes like I have planned there will be another chapter and an epilogue after this one. I know that there are a lot of plot lines I could work with further, but the main one, the relationship between Marvolo and Harry, comes to a close. I don't want to go on rambling with this story just because there is more to explore in the world I have created here. Maybe I'll come back for some of the other story seeds later. One never knows.

Thanks to Jordre and Jake for helping to improve my spelling!

“I do have a few moments, Miss Skeeter,” Marvolo said with a smile that was devoid of warmth but all professionalism.

“Thank you,” she said with a smile bright as a lumos, but all professionalism as well. While she readied her notepad and quill, Marvolo noticed how Ministry employees and attendees of the Wizengamot meeting stopped around them. Some of them were less than subtle in the way they stopped just inside hearing range.

“Do you plan to marry anytime soon? Are the single witches going to lose the most eligible bachelor before they can make a pass themselves?” Skeeter resembled a shark having sensed blood in the water.

“I don’t plan to marry. And there have been several people making passes so far,” Marvolo answered, remembering the many flirting people on all the functions around Yule.

“You don’t plan to marry? Why ever not? You’re young yet and have two sons who certainly would benefit from a female presence in their lives!” The nods all around made clear that most of the people watching agreed with that assessment. Sometimes society was tiring.

“Henry is at Hogwarts most of the year, where he has regular contact with Professors, including witches. I do employ a nanny for Marcus, who also has several female teachers at his school. There’s no reason to marry simply to give my sons a female presence in their lives.” Really, that was one of the dumbest reasons to marry Marvolo could imagine.

“And what about your own needs? Staying single isn’t the most happy a wizard can be!” Skeeter seemed pretty convinced that she was telling the truth, and Marvolo could understand better now why Amelia had decided to simply let the assumption stand that she was still mourning her family, devoting herself to magical law and her niece.

“I’m not alone, Miss Skeeter. I’ve got friends and family. And before you claim that no wizard can be happy without a wife or other companion, I want to ask you if you would ask a widower the same questions?” Marvolo was pretty sure he was asexual. The human form simply held nothing of interest for him. Madame Goyle had given him literature on other forms of sexual attraction – interesting to read, but nothing felt really relevant to him – and it seemed there were a lot of layers to this aspect of human life and a chance for him to find a romantic interest. Not that he was sure that he wanted to fall in love, or that he didn’t want to fall in love.
Skeeter seemed to flounder for a moment, and Marvolo took the chance, smiled, kinder this time – at least he was going for kind – trying to end this impromptu interview right there. “I stumbled unprepared into that curse, Miss Skeeter, I don’t want to repeat the error of running headfirst into something unknown. I’m Lord Slytherin, not Gryffindor.” That last line brought about a lot of laughter and a break in tension that made it possible for him to sketch a bow, turn, place an arm around Harry’s shoulders, and start to walk away.

“Was that a joke?” Harry asked in an almost whisper.

“I’m sure Lucius feels smug about the fact it worked so well. It was his idea.” In fact there had been quite a few jokes Lucius had insisted they prepare. Marvolo had practiced them again and again until they seemed natural and spontaneous once again.

Harry chuckled. “We need to hurry, or I’ll be late to my class.”

Nodding, Marvolo agreed, taking a pinch of floo powder. “I’ll apparate you into the area. It’s quicker than waiting for the driver. You’ll be in time.”

Sunday, 21st of July 1996

It was a sunny day, and Draco was really happy that he had gotten his dream birthday party. As his birthday had been when they all had taken their OWL exams, no one had been in the mood to have a party. That had swayed his parents to allow a party with only his friends, and games and nice food, without all the adults and their politics.

It was great!

Walking over to the buffet to secure himself another slice of the excellent chocolate cake, Draco noticed Harry just standing there, holding a glass of reddish lemonade, smiling a little wistfully. Or sadly? Draco wasn’t sure, but would find out. “Who are you hiding from? The little ones aren’t here to demand you play dragon.” That story had been told up and down in school after that party. And one benefit of only having his own friends here was that the small children weren’t here as they tended to be at summer parties.

Harry sighed, tipping the scales in favour of his being sad. “I know. But the girls are after me, demanding to help me get a total makeover. Something about when I get rid of my glasses I should also do something about my hair. I didn’t wait around to hear what else they might want to do. Astoria is a force to reckon with!”

Draco shared in the chuckle over that.

But hiding from the girls and a makeover plan didn’t explain the odd look on Harry’s face. For a brief moment Draco’s curiosity warred with his common sense and training of how an heir and Slytherin should act. Then he decided to change the topic.

“When do you plan to have your own birthday party? On your actual birthday? I guess you can’t get your little brother out of the picture? I guess that’s not really an option, is it?” Why was he
And Harry gave another sigh – that was getting irritating – before he shrugged, took a sip from the lemonade and answered. “No. To both. Marcus wants to be there, and I want to have him there. It’s nice having a little brother. I guess that might change later;” he shrugged again, “but at the moment it’s still new enough to be nice. And I won’t have a party on my actual birthday. Maybe the weekend after. Something small. We’ll see.”

Deciding that enough was enough, Draco plucked the lemonade glass out of Harry’s hands, placed it on the table, right next to the bowl of candied fruits to go with the ice cream, and started to pull his friend over to where Theo and Blaise were talking with Greg and Vincent.

“Let’s go and play a game of Quidditch. This morose mood can’t stay this way. You don’t want to ruin my birthday party, do you?”

Following along with a laugh, Harry reclaimed his hand, and walked faster once they reached the others. “No, we don’t want to make little Draco cranky. So let’s play Quidditch!”

“Hey!” Draco exclaimed, indignant, running to catch up with Harry, while the others started to laugh and followed as well. This was better. And he was going to win!

Wednesday, 29th of July 1996

“Harry! Is something wrong? Why did you call? Everything all right? It’s the middle of the night over in London, isn’t it? Tell me that you’re all right, please!” Harry was so happy to see his godfather’s face and was endlessly amused by the man’s antics.

“I can’t tell you anything if you don’t stop to let me speak!” It had been the right decision to call Sirius. He already felt better, tension leaving his muscles, which had kept him from sleeping for hours now.

“I’m sorry, you’re right. Please, go ahead,” Sirius answered, nodding a bit too rapidly to be convincing.

Harry felt himself smile, legs stretching out more comfortably under his light summer blanket. “I couldn’t sleep. Tomorrow is a full moon, the second this month.”

“A blue moon, I know. I’ve been keeping track ever since I learned of Remus’ furry little problem. Why is that relevant?” Sirius certainly wasn’t a patient man.

“I’m coming to that. Can you please stop interrupting me?” And still Harry felt oddly comforted by Sirius simply being Sirius. His godfather mimed spelling his lips shut – and had that gesture taken Harry some time to understand – and Harry took a deep breath before explaining what had him up at this ungodly hour. “I’m sure you remember what Dumbledore told the Order about me? The connection and my scar?” Harry really didn’t want to go into detail and use the words to describe more. Sirius should know what he was talking about. And judging by the suddenly paler face, he did remember. “Marvolo has worked hard to create a way to get it out without harming me. And we agreed to do it now and not wait longer. The night of the blue moon seemed like a good choice. Don’t want to risk one of the more powerful days, and I’m going to be at Hogwarts for most of those anyway, but a normal day might not be ideal either, so, yes, tomorrow.” Harry shrugged suddenly feeling awkward. Rambling was a bad habit of his he wasn’t fond of.

The sound of Sirius taking a deep breath made Harry focus back on the mirror in his hand. “Are there risks?” He sounded oddly controlled.

“Not for me, Bill is pretty sure. The circle contains a lot of rune sequences aiming to protect me. I’m not sure I like that there aren’t as many protecting Marvolo as there are for Bill and me. Marcus would be really… I don’t even know. I think it would break him to lose his new father so soon after gaining a family.” Harry really didn’t want to think about how his life would change should Marvolo die with the reintegration of the very last horcrux.

“Bill is working on this? I’m sure he made sure that all is set up correctly. And I have to say that it makes me feel better to know that you’ll be safer after this is done. There are still people around knowing about that, and who might take exception to him.” Sirius took another deep breath, calming down further. “Shouldn’t you be sleeping? Resting to be prepared for the ritual?”

Harry nodded. He really should be. “I simply couldn’t sleep. I’ve been tossing and turning all night so far. Calling you came to mind. Decided you needed to know.” Harry nodded into the mirror. His thought process hadn’t been that coherent, but it had been a good decision nonetheless. His godfather needed to know that he would be in potential danger pretty soon.

“Do you feel like you could sleep now?” Sirius asked, his grey eyes looking soft in his tanned face.

“Not really. How’s your summer? How are Enora and Nawel?” They hadn’t really talked since Sirius had travelled to stay the summer with his daughters. The time difference had made it difficult. Harry had really missed their talks.

“It’s going quite well. The weather is nice, and the locals don’t seem to be as untrusting as they were at the start…” Sirius rambled on and on, slowly talking Harry into a sleepy state. After they had said their farewells, it didn’t take long for Harry to drift off into sleep.

Tuesday, 30th of July 1996

Draco watched as his father almost let himself fall into the armchair he favoured in their family parlour. He hadn’t seen his father this unsettled often. His hair was even in disarray!

“They’re now settled in the ritual room, and preparations have started. We shouldn’t go in there until Mr. Weasley or one of the healers comes to inform us that the ritual has concluded.” He raised one hand and used it to move his hair out of his eyes, ruining his careful styling it even more.

“There’s no need to worry so much, love,” Draco’s mother interjected from where she was playing with Cassiopeia, who was resting on her lap. “It’s not the first ritual our Lord has conducted here, and you know as well as I that he’s more than competent.”
I’m not worried because I doubt our Lord’s competence, but because he has two healers and a curse-breaker here to help, and his son will be involved too. The boy was changing into a linen shirt when I left!” That would explain why his father was so stressed. Harry would be taking part in a ritual? One that required two healers to be present?

“What ritual are they going to perform?” Draco asked before he could think better of it.

“I don’t know, Draco. But there aren’t any rituals that would require the attendance of two healers. The last few I witnessed the aftermath of… I’m worried.” He bent forward, resting his elbows on the armrests, and his face in his hands.

While his mother started to talk in soothing tones, obviously trying to reassure her husband, Draco’s mind raced. Harry had known of this ritual back when he had been at Draco’s birthday party, and it was the reason that there would be no birthday party for Harry tomorrow. What were they doing? What kind of ritual was so important that it needed to be done so urgently that a birthday took a less important place? And what important ritual didn’t get performed on one of the days of power?

Now he was worried as well. Maybe he should distract himself. “Am I allowed to visit Theo?”

“Sure, darling. Please ask if he has time before you floo over, and be back for dinner,” his mother answered, looking over with a smile.

“Thank you, mother.” Theo probably was worried as well. Maybe spending time together would make the waiting easier. Draco almost ran to the floo once he was out in the hall.

ooOoo

Malcolm wasn’t sure how to feel. His Lord’s heir was sitting in one corner of the ritual room at Malfoy Manor, meditating in preparation for a ritual that he had witnessed before. That was a clear sign that the boy was to take part in the ritual. That Jugson was here as well was another sign. But Malcolm wasn’t sure why the boy was participating in the place where objects had been before, and that was anything but reassuring.

“Hey! Have the fairies got to you? Greengrass, I’m talking to you.” Feeling himself blush, Malcolm concentrated on their discussion once more. How mortifying to be this distracted, and to be caught being distracted.

“I’m sorry.” Malcolm took a deep breath and banned his worry for one of his charges – the Dark Lord was powerful in a way that made worrying for him feel redundant – and continued with his rundown of the boy’s health. “He finished a course of long-term healing potions and nutrition potions just before the school year ended. We had to mend several badly healed bones last summer. I’ve been monitoring him for possible effects of the Imperius, the Cruciatues, and the Killing Curse. Not that there seem to be any negative effects.” He shrugged, still mystified by the odd fact that there was nothing his scans had shown.

Throwing a short look over his shoulder to see what the Dark Lord and the red-headed curse-breaker were doing, Malcolm huffed a frustrated breath. “I don’t know what this is about, exactly, and therefore don’t know why exactly you’re here, Jugson, but I guess it’s good to have two healers on site when two people are involved in a ritual this complex.”
Jugson looked contemplative and nodded. “I think it would be good to have someone there for Weasley as well, but I guess we’ll have to do.” Malcolm had the feeling that Jugson was more in the know than he himself. How frustrating, but kind of logical. Jugson was the expert on the long-term and short-term effects of Dark Magic. He was the expert here, while Malcolm was the family healer and therefore the expert for the general health of both Lord Slytherin and his heir.

“So we agree on the division of labour?” Jugson asked. “You concentrate on our Lord, and I take care of his son as soon as Mr. Weasley gives us the all-clear?”

“We’ve gone over the plan at least three times now, Jugson. I already agreed to this plan, because our Lord insists that you take care of his son. You know that you’re not helping my nerves with your insistence on going over the plan this many times.” Malcolm gave Jugson a withering glare.

“Sorry for being nervous and for only knowing about this roughly half a month. I didn’t want to believe this for the first week. Have been researching since then. You know this is highly experimental, right?” The sarcasm was laid on thick, and Malcolm could do nothing but shrug.

Really, what could he say? “I assume you can’t tell me more that would help me with my work?”

Jugson just shook his head. “You know what to do, Greengrass. You’ve cared for our Lord more than once after one of these rituals. The addition of our Lord’s heir shouldn’t change anything for you.”

Malcolm huffed again, but nodded. He picked up his case of potion phials – prepared by Snape – and walked over to the part of the room nearest to where his Lord was going to sit inside the circle. It did take longer than if he could have taken a straight path, but he needed to avoid the part of the floor where the circle was being drawn by the two other wizards in the room.

Once he reached his designated corner, he started to arrange the potions in the way he always did when he had time to prepare. It was a comfort to know that long practice would help him to pick up the right potions even under stress when he placed them just right.

Jugson was doing the same on the other side of the room and the two men crawling around on the floor.

ooOoo

Deep in concentration, Bill worked on his assigned part of the ritual circle. The chalk moved fluidly over the smooth floor. This ritual room was on par with those that he had used at Gringotts, much better than any they had had set up in Egypt, or any he had seen in any other private home. Not that he had seen very many of those. If someone had no extra money, an empty room was not something people tended to keep around.

With all the times Marvolo and he had drawn this exact same rune configuration in preparation for this day, doing it now was slowly leading him into a meditative state. Despite all that rested on this ritual’s working as they had designed it, Bill’s pulse slowed, his breathing deepened, and he relaxed.

Glass was making almost imperceptible noises from the places where the healers were setting up their places. Harry shifted where he was meditating, adding fabric shifting against itself to the cacophony of soft sounds. Chalk on slate, glass against glass, fabric against the floor and itself, the breathing of them all.

There were also the smells. Clean linen, the beeswax from the candles, the potion-soaked chalk, the variety of dried herbs in their bowls, mixed with the scent of human sweat. And not a bit of soap or cologne. Even the two healers, who weren’t involved directly in the ritual, had cleaned themselves and had changed into simply linen shirts just like the rest of them. They would probably look silly if someone were watching from outside.

Adding a last curl to one of the runes, Bill stood and carefully moved out of the circle to start inspecting their work. Marvolo's and his own. Nodding to himself, Bill came to the conclusion that this circle was perfect. Now he needed to make sure that he didn’t mess up the chants.

ooOoo

Marvolo was nervous.

Very nervous.

More nervous then when he had been sitting under the Sorting Hat as an eleven-year-old boy. Or when he had done his very first ritual. After that he had lost his fear and nerves. Maybe it had been teenage arrogance, maybe it had been the fact that he had started to cut up his soul.

Marvolo didn’t know, and he didn’t care.

He was nervous now.

He had prepared as best he could, had gotten competent help – something he had never really done before this quest to patch his soul back up – and he had been working on regret.

It seemed to have helped with the cup. It couldn’t do any harm now.

It was a logical conundrum to feel regret for something that had made his current living situation possible. If he hadn’t killed Harry’s parents, he would never have adopted the boy, or Marcus. Maybe he never would have regained a large part of his soul, staying insane. It was also quite possible that he would have won, and destroyed everything.

In fact, that problem had kept Marvolo up at night, until he had decided to talk with Mrs. Goyle about it. He was happy with the way his life was now. Was it possible to feel regret for what had happened to make that possible?

She had helped him understand that it was possible, even quite normal, to feel contradictory things at the same time, and even about the same situation.

And feeling the way he did, Marvolo had to concede that she was right.

“Everything is prepared.” Bill said, drawing the attention of all the adult wizards, and not Harry’s who seemed deep in meditation.

“And it’s almost time,” Healer Jugson said, before shutting his mouth, his teeth clicking against each other.

Not willing to concentrate on impertinent subordinates, Marvolo just nodded and moved to touch
Harry’s shoulder, rousing him from his calm, meditative state

“Huh?” Harry blinked sleepily, shaking his head a little, before his green eyes focused on Marvolo. “Everything ready?”

“Yes, only we two are missing from the picture,” Marvolo said in a poor attempt at humour. “Do you need a hand up?”

Harry started to shake his head, but when he fell back onto his behind on his first attempt to stand, he changed the motion to a nod. “Yes, please. I think my legs have fallen asleep. How long will this take? Sitting on this floor is cold and not all that comfortable. I’m not sure how much longer I can do it.” Without much effort – Harry still was pretty lanky – Marvolo pulled Harry to stand, then let go of the boy’s hand. Harry shook out his legs, and used his shirt to dry his sweaty palms.

“Not too long, I would hope.” Marvolo tried to sound reassuring, but he was pretty sure that his attempt fell flat.

Harry gave a wavering smile, and on a whim Marvolo embraced his son.

How he wished that he had ceded to Severus’ request that night. A stunner was a pretty easy spell to cast, not hard at all, and so effective. It was not important that if he had done that, Harry probably would be dead right now. But with that Killing Curse he had killed another descendant of Slytherin. She had been family, and he hadn’t learned of that fact until much too late.

Harry’s arms snaked around Marvolo’s torso, returning the hug that Marvolo really didn’t want to break.

He was glad that he had Harry as his son, but because of what he had done, Harry had had to grow up without a mother, just as Marvolo had. So many missed opportunities. He should have done something else, anything else.

.:I’m so very sorry:. Marvolo whispered into his son’s unruly dark hair, tightening the embrace, and wishing he could change the past, change what he had done.

.:I know:. Harry whispered back.

Suddenly there was a red glow very near Marvolo’s face, where the scar had been on Harry’s forehead since the night Marvolo – no, Voldemort – had tried to kill him as a baby. The glow got brighter and brighter, and a deep burning pain spread through Marvolo’s chest before there was a sudden burst of dust-like substance in red around both Harry and Marvolo, enveloping them before surging into Marvolo’s mouth, which he had opened as he gasped in pain.

There was no panic, even as Marvolo knew he should feel panic. This wasn’t what was supposed to happen. Not at all.

Suddenly all pain was gone, as well as the feeling in his arms and legs. While falling to the floor, Marvolo wondered what exactly had happened here, and how long they would have to delay the ritual.

Before he lost consciousness, he saw Malcolm and Jeremy bending over him and Harry, looking worried, casting what looked like diagnostics. Then everything went dark...
“Dad said that he and Harry need to rest today, sleep a lot, so I get to stay with you, Aiden.” Marcus was rambling on and on to his little friend while Severus was setting up the stations and tools they would need today.

He had been working on another version of the paper for the family connection potion they had been working on intermittently, when his Lord’s call had reached him. It had been shocking to be led to the bedroom by the elf, instead of to the study or one of the parlours. Only too gladly had he accepted the assignment to transport one of the communication mirrors to Nott House to give to his godson.

“Why do they need to rest?” the little Nott boy asked, swinging his legs where he was sitting on one of the tall stools in the potions laboratory of the house.

“Dad said that they were doing some pretty complicated magic yesterday, and now they’re tired,” Marcus answered with an air of seriousness that was kind of amusing in a kid as young as he was.

And so it went back and forth, and Severus had a few moments to contemplate what exactly had gone down in Malfoy Manor the day before. It was entirely possible that the Dark Lord had attempted to remove the soul shard from his heir on the night of the blue moon they had had yesterday. That both were alive – if forced to rest – was promising, but no sure indication that it actually had worked. If that what even what they had tried to do.

Severus would need to get some more information to be sure of what had happened and if it had worked. If it was tied to the soul shard Dumbledore had claimed was residing in young Harry, Severus was pretty sure that his Lord would make sure a positive outcome would become known in some way.

“But isn’t your brother as old as Theo? Father told Theo that he’s not allowed to perform magic during the holidays,” Aiden said, drawing Severus’ attention.

“Actually,” Severus interjected, “if under the supervision of a parent, a child may perform magic outside of school. The important part being the supervision. Speaking of which, I’m finished with setting up.” Both boys perked up significantly, making Severus smile one of his almost-not-there smiles. “Let me move you closer.” A wave of his wand was enough to bring the boys over to the high working bench Severus had prepared. “Now pay attention.” Teaching smaller groups than a normal class was a lot more agreeable to him. Seeing how the two boys concentrated on him and his words, so eager to learn, was a balm on his frayed nerves. “When working with knives, as we will be doing today, you need to make sure to keep your fingers clear of the blade. If you’re not using your knife you will place it over your cutting board, closer to the middle of the workbench than to the edge, so it will not fall.” Severus demonstrated what he had explained with slow and slightly exaggerated movements. “Show me,” he encouraged the boys to copy his movements, and had a harder time hiding his smile as Marcus repeated what he had been shown with his tongue poking out just slightly.

“Well done. Now place your knife back down and watch. I’ll demonstrate how to best cut herbs into pieces if a specific size isn’t required.” Severus waited until both Aiden and Marcus had placed their knives down before he started to show and explain how to cut with a rocking motion. Later he would let the boys work a handful of beetles into a fine powder. That would be a good way to end the lesson, something fun and not too complicated.

“That’s really fun, Uncle Sev!” Marcus called out, carefully cutting some fresh mint to shreds, getting a little enthusiastic.

“I know, Marcus. Please be careful and don’t move too fast. When you start out you should move slowly until you get more practice.” Seeing Marcus react on the spot, slowing down, was so different from the unheeded advice he called out in his classroom at Hogwarts. Small children in small groups were maybe easier then pre-teens in groups close to twenty.

“How will you tell us a story later? Aiden’s dad isn’t really good at telling them, and dad needs to go to bed early today.” Marcus nodded decisively, “He said I can stay another night here. So will you tell us a story?”

For a moment Severus had a refusal on his lips, but then he thought it might be good practice. Soon enough he would be a father himself, and even though the baby would not be able to comprehend a story at first, a time would come when he had to tell bedtime stories.

“Do you two have a favourite story? Marcus? Aiden?”

“The fountain of fair fortune!” Marcus called out, thrusting a small fist into the air.

“Jack and the Beanstalk!” was Aiden’s favourite, called out just as loudly as Marcus had been.

Severus nodded seriously. “I know them both. How do we determine which story I’ll tell?”

For a moment the boys were thinking, then Marcus got a dangerous gleam in his eyes and a small grin spread over his face. “Tell both!”

Severus chuckled, that was a simple solution for the problem, and in favour of the boys. “Only if you manage to keep concentrating through the next two ingredients.”

Eager nodding signalled the boys agreement, and Severus exchanged the cutting boards. “Now let us cut some carrots. They are not really used in potions, but their structure is similar to some other plant roots that are used in potions, and therefore they are perfect to practice on.” Especially as many other roots were poisonous and better substituted for if one was working with young children. “Look closely.”

oooOOooo

Saturday, 3rd of August 1996

Letting his gaze wander over the crowd populating the gardens of Potter Manor, Harry sighed a little. It would have been nice to have a birthday party like the one Draco had had a few weeks back. Too bad that it was necessary for as many people as possible to see that Harry was well, and they had invited everyone.

And that meant everyone.

All the Department Heads from the Ministry were there. Amelia Bones was playing with Marcus and the other younger children, Minister Fudge was over by the buffet filling a plate with the delicious cake Flimm and Henbane had prepared for this party. The Weasleys had been invited as well. All of Harry’s year-mates had been invited! It felt like a bigger crowd than had been attending the World Cup the summer before fourth year. Not that it was, but it felt like it.

“There you are!”

Harry turned from his spot to come face to face with Ron, who looked as if he had spent days outside in the sun.

“Ron! I’m happy you could make it! Your family has an odd tendency to be late!” Harry chuckled, feeling the urge to hug his friend, but refraining, because he had no idea how Ron would react.

He made a face. “Ginny couldn’t decide what to wear, and Mum sent the twins back more than once to empty out their pockets. I’m sure they brought some of the canary creams anyway.” Ron thrust a box wrapped in red paper sprinkled with fluttering golden snitches at Harry. “Here, I hope you like it!”

Harry accepted the present with a smile. “Thanks! Good thing you arrived after the receiving line was finished. So I can open it now and don’t have to wait until later. Have you seen the table with all those gifts?” Harry shook his head. Dudley would pale if he could see the number of presents Harry had been given for his sixteenth birthday. “Let’s go over to the others. Luna has found a nice mossy spot over there, and said she would gather the others so we can stay away from all the political stuff.”

“That’s a good idea!” Ron’s relief was obvious in his voice, which made Harry laugh. He felt so light he could dance.

“Then let’s go.” Abandoning his task of gathering food for their group – he could ask Flimm to deliver them a basket, anyway; the elf would be happy – Harry clutched the parcel closer to his chest and carefully chose a path through the decorated garden. He didn’t plan to be intercepted and drawn into a long and boring conversation.

They dodged a few groups of Lords and Ladies of the Wizengamot, and hastily ducked behind a pair of corpulent wizards – in garish robes – to hide from a group of Marcus and his friends, before reaching a small copse of birches, slipping through the branches into the centre.

“Harry! Ron! Come on, sit down!” Hermione waved her arms in their direction, while Luna was plucking small flowers from the ground, weaving a flower-crown, and Draco helped Theo to drape blankets over the ground so they could sit comfortably.

“That looks cosy,” Harry remarked, walking over to the blanket already smoothed out and sitting down tailor-fashion. This was much more comfortable than the floor in the Malfoys’ ritual room.

“Did you forget about the food?” Daphne demanded, sitting down much more gracefully than Harry had done, shooting him a playful glare.

“No I did not.” Harry glared right back, carefully setting the present down on the blanket before him. “Flimm!” he called the house elf assigned to him and Marcus, who appeared a moment later with a soft popping sound.

“How can Flimm help young Master Harry and his friends?” Flimm asked, bowing as was his way.

“Please bring us a basket with a variety of the food from the buffet, Flimm. And if father searches for me, let him know that I have retreated with my friends for a little bit of quiet.”
“Flimm will do that, young Master Harry.” The elf bowed again and was gone. Before they could say a word, a basket filled to the brim appeared next to Harry.

“I agree that was better than trying to sneak food from the buffet,” Draco said, bending over the basket and plucking out a small pastry. “There’s a pitcher of lemonade in here, and glasses.”

It didn’t take long until they all were sitting on blankets in the speckled light and shade of the leaves moving in the light breeze, happily eating cake, pastries, and other delicious confections.

“Open the present, Harry. I’m really curious what Ron got you, and I don’t think Gran will let me stay long enough to get to see you unwrapping that mountain of presents in the floo room,” Neville said, handing the lemonade to Daphne, who accepted with a murmured thanks.

Harry laughed, but complied with Neville’s request by putting his plate down and picking the present up. “Sure. I fear that I’ll have to spend hours unwrapping presents, and even more hours writing all those thank-you notes.” With a grin towards Ron, Harry pretended to carefully unstick the spell-o-tape before he ripped the paper to shreds.

The falling paper revealed a big book about dragons. The title was Dragon Anatomy and Scale Patterns, and it was quite a hefty tome. “Cool!” Harry opened the book, and the first thing he saw was a detailed sketch of the muscles that enabled dragons to fly.

“Charlie said it’s the best book on how dragons are built. And Hermione said such books help artists to create good pictures of things. I hope you can use it.” Ron’s ears had turned red.

“It’s great, Ron! In the one-week course I had on sketching poses, we worked a lot with anatomical references. This is a really good book and present, thank you!” It had been a good course, but Harry wasn’t sure if he wanted to look closer into portraits and the human form. But magical creatures were something different.

“Glad you like it.” Ron said, quickly averting his eyes, and concentrating on his plate of chocolate cake.

“You haven’t told us yet if you were accepted in Filch’s art class,” Theo said, from where he was sitting near the edge of the clearing, peering out from time to time, as if he was searching for something or someone. “We know you got an Outstanding both in Defence and Potions – I still can’t really believe that one – and an Acceptable in History, of all things! But you didn’t tell us if you were accepted into the arts class.” Theo threw Harry a look before turning back to watch the people milling about outside their hiding place.

“Yes, I was accepted, and I got a long list of supplies I need to buy. It seems that we’ll be making our own paints.” Harry felt himself blush, and automatically drew his hand through his hair. The letter that Mr. Filch had written and sent on the same day his OWL results and normal school letter had been sent, had been really flattering. And demanding. Filch was convinced that Harry could become a great artist if he applied himself and practiced. Daily. It had been mortifying and encouraging all at once.

“Harry!” Hermione suddenly exclaimed, pointing at Harry, or more accurately his forehead. “You scar! It’s… it’s almost gone!”

And there was the first person noticing the change, and also mentioning it. Harry wasn’t sure Hermione truly was the first to notice, but most of the adults were politicians and unlikely to speak about something like this. It was the reason Harry had agreed readily to inviting basically everyone, so that as many people as possible could – hopefully would – notice the change and speak about it. They needed for everyone to know so that those in the know about the horcrux would learn it was gone without them needing to tell anyone.

“Yeah,” Harry nodded with a small smile. “Father found something that works on reducing the scarring. We hope it’ll be gone almost completely in a few years.” And they did. Professor Snape had brewed a special scar-reducing cream that Harry was putting on every night before going to bed.

“That’s great!” Hermione gushed, a knowing look in her eyes. And through the following discussions of plans which classes they all planned to take up to NEWTs, Daphne’s attempts to get her parents to agree to a betrothal to the muggleborn wizard she had fallen in love with, Ron’s enthusiastic tales about his time at the Dragon Reserve, Harry noticed the looks.

Draco seemed to have figured out that this was somehow tied to the ritual Harry had taken part in just before his birthday. Theo seemed still to be puzzling things out, in between kissing Ginny, who had found them after they had half-finished their basket.

Neville seemed to know more about the whole horcrux debacle than Harry had thought he would. Maybe his gran had told him about what Dumbledore had revealed to the order in an attempt to gain their loyalty when he had started to lose control of the situation back in the last year. Or maybe Neville had overheard enough to put the pieces together.

Harry decided to not bring it up, just as Marvolo and he had discussed beforehand. The ritual they had done was absolutely illegal if anyone ever got to know it existed and put it on the list with other rituals of a similar design. They wanted it known that the horcrux was removed and that Harry was no longer an obstacle between Death and Marvolo, but they couldn’t admit to performing rituals. Even when the horcrux in Harry had been removed through the only known way before Marvolo had started to search for an alternative.

In fact, Marvolo still wasn’t sure his regret for Harry’s mother’s death had been great and heartfelt enough to make what had happened possible.

“Come on, let’s play a round of Quidditch!” Draco suddenly said, getting up from the ground, brushing down his fancy robes. “I’m sure we can get enough people to have two full teams, and find an adult to charm a pair of those kiddie bludgers, so we can play almost like at Hogwarts.” Draco rolled his eyes at mentioning the kiddie bludgers, making Harry laugh.

“That’s a good idea. Otherwise father might come search for me. Can’t really get out of the job of entertaining my guests at my own birthday party.” Looking around the clearing, Harry saw a lot of dirty plates, empty glasses, and blankets with crumbs on them. “Flimm? Please clean up here.” Hermione gave him a shove on one of his shoulders, giving him an accusing look. “Please.” Hermione nodded approvingly and followed the others out of their hiding place, leaving a grinning Harry behind.

Life was good. And Harry was looking forward to their next year at Hogwarts.

ooOoo

“You look content.” Amelia half stated, half asked of Marvolo as she stepped up to the part of the buffet with child-proofing charms around it. She really wanted to have some wine right about now.
She had forgotten how demanding a small child could be compared to a teenager.

Marvolo hummed, considering, before he smiled, toasting with his own glass of red wine. “Probably because I am.”

“So whatever you had planned is finished?” Amelia, of course, was aware of the possibility of being overheard, but without the context of that worrying meeting when Marvolo explained his plans to rewrite his will, no one should be able to use any of what they were speaking of now against either of them.

“Yes. It worked out differently from what I had planned. But it did work out in the end.” When Marvolo smirked, Amelia narrowed her eyes, which made him smirk even more. “No more planned scaring Amelia almost to death.” That he held his hand over his heart didn’t help Amelia stay serious. But she did her best to glare at him anyway.

When he started to chuckle, Amelia lost it too. “You’re terrible. You do know that, don’t you?” He only nodded unrepentantly, smiling a true smile.

“I wanted to ask you something for a while now. You know that there’s an enchantment on the Wizengamot Chamber alerting the Aurors on guard to identity-concealing spellwork. It’s not perfect. For instance it doesn’t react at all to Metamorphmagi but reacts to even the smallest cosmetic charm. And... well, it’s kind of silly, but you have registered with those charms every single time that you were inside the chambers. I know that it isn’t my place to ask, but I have to confess that I’m seriously curious why you would constantly have such a small charm on you that registers with those enchantments…” Amelia trailed off, blushing. She had been curious for a while now, but never felt the moment was right to ask. And now she wasn’t so sure that it was worth asking at all.

Marvolo smiled a little sadly at her question, making Amelia feel even more uncomfortable. She should just not have asked. “Some things seem to leave their marks. And I’d rather not remind people just looking at me of an uncomfortable past.”

That hadn’t really answered her question, but asking for clarification would be more than rude. So she just nodded and changed the topic again. If he had some scales on his face he wanted to hide, he was totally allowed to do that.

Chapter End Notes

AN: Ok, hands up: who suspected I would solve the last horcrux in this way? Not sure if it was obvious before, but I had planned it this way from the start. Feels good to finally have written this part of the end. I have an epilogue planned after this. And then that's it!

Thanks to Jordre and Jake for helping to improve my spelling!

CW: Suicide, Major Character Dead, nothing graphic

This is for Sharis B who asked me a question but didn’t leave me a way to answer. Please create an account on ffnet and write me a private message so I can answer your question. For everyone else: here is the end of this story. I hope it is a good conclusion as this is another part I had planned from the start.

Harry watched with unease as his father carefully moved over the meticulously prepared floor, drawing the lines of a runic circle. He really wished that this wasn’t happening, but as he had known for decades by now, Marvolo was set to perform this ritual. To make sure that the information on Horcruxes and all their drawbacks would be available to everyone contemplating their use, in the hope of giving them enough information to make them reconsider.

“Harry, please, you knew as well as I that this was coming. And as sorry as I am that Father will no longer be with us… the fact that there’s something he fears more than death is a big step for him.” Marcus had come over to stand with Harry, placing a hand on his shoulder in an attempt to console his older brother.

“I know that Father fears dementia more than he fears death. But with everything he managed to invent, why does he insist on this ritual?! He could stay with us for several decades still!” Harry wanted to pace, but refrained because he didn’t want to agitate his wife – Tara was standing with their five daughters and their partners – so he dropped his voice down to almost a whisper and moderated his gestures. “Don’t you wish that he would be with us longer?”

“Harry,” Marcus sighed, clearly struggling with how to word what he wanted to say. “Yes, it’s true that I wish Father would stay. I would like for him to be still here when my youngest graduates, and I become a grandfather. But he has planned this for so long.” Marcus trailed off, looking back to where his wife and husband were talking to their adult children and their spouses. Harry still was happy that he and Marvolo had managed to make marriages of more than two people legal, so that those families built with the use of Severus’ completion of the Anteros Potion could legally stay together, with all the advantages, for instance the handling of material possessions such as houses. That both Marcus and his husband liked women as well had made for an interesting family dynamic from Harry’s point of view.

“But you know how obsessed he’s been with making sure others don’t repeat his error. Making sure every magical library will hold a copy of his book as long as there are individuals able to perform the magic needed to split a soul… I can understand why he wants that.” Harry huffed. Marcus was always so reasonable about everything. Even after all those years, his sorting into Ravenclaw was still obvious and understandable.

“You’ll make a great Lord Slytherin.” Harry had taken the position as Lord Potter after he had finished his apprenticeship in art on the continent. But when he never had a son, only girls, they had transferred the title of Heir Slytherin to Marcus, who had several sons able to speak...
“I still struggle with being that diplomatic.”

“Don’t be too hard on yourself, Harry. You and father have come far in removing a lot of the bad laws and senseless bans. And you’re a renowned artist.” Marcus once again placed his hand on Harry’s shoulder, shaking him a little. “You did finish that portrait of father. We won’t lose him completely.”

Harry brushed his brother’s hand away. Marcus really was trying to comfort him, but Harry didn’t want to be comforted. “Portraits are not my main… Please, Marcus, let me wallow in my guilt and grief. The fact that we needed to go to Albania for this should be hint enough that this isn’t some benign magic. And regardless of my understanding of father’s reasons for this,” Harry waved his hand around the rune circle, the pyre, and the members of their family gathered around, “I still would rather keep my father.” Harry would have been happy if there was no country allowing the use of a willing human sacrifice, because as bizarre as it was, his father wouldn’t go against the law to do this.

Marcus sighed and embraced Harry. “I know, brother, I would rather keep him too.”

While Marcus wandered back towards his immediate family, Harry turned around to wait for other guests, fighting to keep his Occlumency going.

When he saw who had just arrived Harry smiled a little, despite the tense situation. “Severus, Sonja, I’m happy you could make it.” Harry embraced first Sonja – her hair gone completely grey by now – and then Severus, once again marvelling how much their relationship had changed since Severus had been Professor Snape.

“We are too,” Sonja said with a sad smile. “Sadly, the twins couldn’t make it. As the Heads of Slytherin and Gryffindor,” Severus made a face while his wife explained, but it was obvious that Severus was only joking, as he had done since the younger of the twins had been sorted into Gryffindor, “they had to go to the school early to prepare everything.”

Desperate and full of tension, Harry turned fully towards Severus. “Please, Severus, did you find anything to cure father? If we could remove the reason father wants to go through with this ritual of his now, he could stop!” Harry knew the possibility that Severus had found something was slim, but he also knew that Severus didn’t want his friend and Lord to die either.

“The healers haven’t found anything, and I haven’t found anything either. The onset of dementia is clearly tied to the fact that Marvolo’s body was created through a dark magical ritual. Short of creating a new body and transferring his mind and soul to it, there is no way. And you know enough to realise that such an endeavour would be dark magic as well.” Severus was patient – much more patient than he had been as a Potions Professor – while he explained.

“I know.” Harry’s voice was small and defeated.

“And I’m sure you tried to find a way to bind a book to the existence of magical humans, so it’ll appear in all magical libraries, that doesn’t need a willing human sacrifice.” Harry nodded. He had tried, he really had. But it was useless. The requirements that Marvolo had written down for the ritual, and that he insisted on needed to be met, demanded a level of power that wasn’t to be gained any other way. “I wish I didn’t understand why father wants to do this. But I do… kind of.” Making sure no other desperate teenager would find fragmented information, making a horrible mistake… Harry did understand. But he was anything but happy.

When Marvolo finished, he called everyone over. Marcus and Harry walked over to say their goodbyes. Lots of tears were shed as the Head of their families said farewell to everyone.
Harry really didn’t want to let him go and held the embrace even as Marvolo carefully indicated that it was time to let go. :Please, my son. I love you, but knowing that I will lose myself, I’d rather perform this ritual, giving my life willingly, than become a burden to you, your brother, and your families:.

Harry’s hissed reply was almost choked with his tears. :I love you. I’ll miss you:.

Later, Harry would only remember snatches of the ritual: Marvolo climbing onto the pyre, his book – to be magically bound to be available everywhere, anytime – and an athame the only things with him.

The sound of blood and the flare of the fire starting and consuming the body of Lord Marvolo Slytherin.

An important part of Harry’s life had just ended. Later Tara wrapped her arms around Harry, offering her silent support as their daughters who had finished school – the youngest one hadn’t been able to come – gathered around them. There was a future here. With time Harry would learn to look forward and remember his father fondly. But for today and the near future he would mourn his father.

Chapter End Notes

I want to thank you all for four years of fun. If there had been no reaction to my story I don’t know if I would have finished it. It was a lot of work and a lot of fun as well as a good practice for my English and writing skills. Not sure what I’ll be writing next, but I’m sure I’ll keep writing.

People have mentioned this should have a warning and as I can see where they are coming from with this I decided to add it.
That I leave a lot of the side plots open and some changes unexplained is intentional and matches with what I like about stories. I know it's not to everyone's taste and am aware that there is a lot that could be written still, but I wanted to concentrate on Harry, Marvolo, and Severus and their start of healing. The world and people around them were important to show them and their journey, which is why I decided to not start concentrating on them instead.

Once again I want to express my thanks to Jordre and Jake who have helped me remove a great many of my usual errors and typos from the chapters before I published them. It was a delight working with them.
